Those who hold the highest views of inspiration do not suppose that the divine Spirit, except in a few instances, so influenced the writers of Scripture as to interfere with the use of their rational faculties or their peculiar mental habits and tastes, or in any way to supersede secondary causes as the medium through which his agency produced the desired effect. If God so influenced the sacred writers that, either with or without the use of secondary causes, they wrote just what he intended and in the manner he intended, then what they wrote is as truly his word as though he had written it with his own hand on tables of stone, without any human instrumentality.

The writers themselves were the subjects of the divine influence. The Spirit employed them as active instruments, and directed them in writing both as to matter and manner. They wrote "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." The matter, in many cases, was what they before knew, and the manner was entirely conformed to their habits—it was their own.

Their mental faculties and habits, their style, their mode of speech, all remained as they were. What, then, had the divine Spirit to do? What was the work which appertained to him? We our life, our comfort in affliction and our sure guide to heaven.

INSTALLATION (in-stawl-la'shun), the formal ceremony by which an ordained minister is placed over the parish or church to which he has been appointed.

INSTANT, INSTANTLY. Some examples will illustrate the meaning of these words. In Luke ii. 38 "that instant" is that very hour. But in Luke vii. 4 by "they besought him instantly" must be understood earnestly; so in Luke xxiii. 23 "they were instant"—i. e., they were urgent. The signification is somewhat different elsewhere; thus "instantly serving God," Acts xxvi. 7, is expectedly or fervently; "continuing instant in prayer," Rom. xii. 12, persevering or persisting; comp. Acts xii. 5, marg.; "be instant in season," 2 Tim. iv. 2, be active or ready.

INSTINCT (in'stinkt), a strong natural impulse which leads a person to adopt a particular course of action without the intervention of reason or deliberation.

INSTITUTION (in-sti-teu'shun) is the final act by which a clergyman or clerk is invested with him, than having intimate converse or dealing with him, obtaining his ear for anything we want, so that to press a suit or make entreaty with one came to be a quite common meaning of it. But it did not necessarily imply that what was sought had respect to another, any more than to one's self; and it might indifferently be a good or an evil that was the specific object of the entreaty. Hence, it is sometimes coupled with the preposition "against," as when Elias is said to have made "intercession against Israel," Rom. xi. 2, although the link of connection is usually "for," or in favor of one. As an equivalent, "intercession" is somewhat too limited, since it always carries a reference to others as the objects of the entreaty. But in regard to the more prevalent applications of the term, in Scripture as well as in common discourse—namely, as regards the priestly action of Jesus in representing the cause and seeking the good of his people in the presence of the Father—the English word conveys the idea with substantial correctness, Isa. liii. 12; Rom. viii. 34; Heb. vii. 25. Elsewhere it is called his advocacy, or simply his praying for them, 1 John ii. 1; Luke xxii. 32. In its aim and sphere the intercession of Christ must be understood to be as wide as those of his mediatorial work generally; it has respect to all for whom he died, and is specially directed to the end of bringing home to their experience the blessings of his redemption. In one passage—though only in one—the action of the Holy Spirit in the souls of believers is designated by the same term, Rom. viii. 26, "he maketh intercession for them with groanings." The word "intercession" here plainly does not quite suit, as they are themselves the subjects as well as the objects of the operation. The meaning is that he has close dealing and intercourse with them for their spiritual good, raising in them the affections and desires which are proper to their condition.

INTERDICTION (in'ter-dikt), a papal prohibition of sacraments or other religious rites, inflicted either upon a parish or a priest on account of disrespect to ecclesiastical authority and other offences.

INTERIM (in'ter-im), the name given to the decrees of the emperor Charles V. requiring the acceptance by the Reformers of certain confessions of faith until the questions in dispute between the Protestants and Catholics should be settled by a general council. There were three such decrees.

1. The interim of Ratisbon, or Regensburg. After the formation of "League of Smalkald" in 1531, several attempts had been made to reconcile the differences between the Protestants and Catholics by means of conferences of both parties, one of which was held at Worms and adjourned to Ratisbon in 1541; but though the Romanists at this conference made several concessions regarding the sacraments, sacerdotal celibacy and other points, neither party was really satisfied, and it was impossible that the reconciliation could be permanent. Charles V. hoped to secure a ratification of the agreement entered into by means of a national council, and meanwhile prohibited the Protestants from discussing the questions in controversy—a decree which they disregarded, however.

2. The Augsburg Interim. After the defeat of the Protestants at the battle of Mühlberg, Charles V., still hoping to reunite the two contending parties, employed one Lutheran and two Roman Catholic divines to draw up a series of articles to be observed until a council should be called, and reply, his work was so to direct them in the use of their own talents and habits, their style and all their peculiar endowments, that they should speak or write, each in his own way, just what God would have them speak or write for the good of the Church in all ages.

Finally, after carefully investigating the subject of inspiration, we are conducted to the important conclusion that "all Scripture is divinely inspired," that the sacred penmen wrote "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," and that these representations are to be understood as implying that the writers had, in all respects, the effectual guidance of the divine Spirit. And we are still more confirmed in this conclusion because we find that it begets in those who seriously adopt it an acknowledgment of the divine origin of Scripture, a reverence for its teachings, and a practical regard to its requirements, like what appeared in Christ and his apostles. Being convinced that the Bible has, in all parts and in all respects, the seal of the Almighty, and that it is truly and entirely from God, we are led by reason, conscience and piety to bow submissively to its high authority, implicitly to believe its doctrines, however incomprehensible, and cordially to obey its precepts, however contrary to our natural inclinations. We come to it from day to day, not as judges, but as learners, never questioning the propriety or utility of any of its contents. This precious word of God is the perfect standard of our faith and the rule of office. In the Romish Church the pope confers "institution" upon a bishop after he has been duly elected. In the Church of England the benefice is vested in the clerk by the bishop.

INSTITUTION OF A CHRISTIAN MAN, or "the bishop's book," the title of a book issued in 1537, by a committee of prelates and divines of the Anglican Church, for the guidance of the bishops and clergy in matters of doctrine. The English Reformation having begun about this time, it was deemed necessary to give some formal expression to the opinions of the Church regarding the Romish superstitions and errors to which the people had hitherto been attached, and this book was put forth for that purpose. The author of the work was Stephen Poynt, the bishop of Winchester, and it was revised and sanctioned by a number of bishops and divines. In the work the superstitions of Romish worship were earnestly denounced, and the human origin of the papacy was declared, and the right was asserted of men to withdraw from it and take their stand on the old foundation before such a structure had been built up.

INTERCESSION (in-ter-sesh'un). This word is commonly employed in the English Bible as the rendering of a word which does not precisely correspond with it. The Greek word, whether as a noun or as a verb, signifies primarily a falling in with one, or getting close to

they were published in the diet of Augsburg, May 15, 1548. The communion in both kinds was granted to the laity, and the marriage of the clergy was permitted, but the Church observances were to continue as previously, and thus the articles pleased no one, Protestants and Romanists alike opposing them.

3. The Leipzig Interim. Among those who were prominent in their opposition to the Augsburg interim was Maurice of Saxony, who called a council which met at Leipzig and decided against its acceptance. As a compromise, however, a series of resolutions was adopted, recognizing the papal authority and allowing a portion of the Romish ceremonials, but rigidly preserving the Reformed creed. This compromise was promulgated, December 22, 1548, as the "Leipzig interim." In 1552 it was revoked, and the Lutheran states were granted full liberty of conscience.

INTERPRETATION (in-ter-pre-ta'shun).

It is of the utmost importance that the student of the sacred book should be furnished with right principles for the due understanding of its contents. The variations and frequent absolute contradictions between those who have taken upon themselves to expound it sufficiently prove that there must be radical error somewhere, and that consequently the system of certain interpreters is thoroughly unsound.

Thus some have proceeded on the supposition that every possible sense that the words can be made to bear may be put upon the Scripture. Every plain historical statement is supposed to have a deep meaning; narratives are allegorized, and the very names of men and places believed to teach mysteries. The sacred book is thus made little more than a book of riddles for the amusement and ingenuity of the curious. Others, as the Romanists, would receive only the interpretation which the Church has sanctioned. Mystics would interpret according to some inward light. Rationalists would make everything square with their own notions of probability, and pronounce even the sense of Scripture as declared by our Lord and his apostles but an accommodation to Jewish prejudice.

In attempting to lay down some just principles of Biblical interpretation the greatest brevity must be here observed. But though it is impossible to compress the substance of a volume within the limits of a short article, it is hoped that a right direction may be given to the student's investigations, so that he may be prepared to avail himself of other works which will be recommended to him, and may at least be warned to avoid the glaring errors which have been just noted.

Interpretation has been defined the art of teaching the real sentiment contained in any form of words, or of effecting that another may derive from them the same idea that the writer intended to convey. It is manifest that the first object must be to ascertain the meaning of simple terms; from that we may proceed to examine the meaning of words or terms united into sentences or propositions, and thus arrive at the real sense of the sacred penmen.

Words are the exponents of thoughts. To every word a certain idea or notion must correspond, and this is called the sense or meaning of it. It is the literal sense, and is so united to a word by custom, that when that word is heard the sense is at once conceived in the hearer's mind. But the same word has not always the same meaning, and hence ambiguity will arise. For we are manifestly not at liberty to give any word any one of its meanings we may choose; we are bound to ascertain that which rightly belongs to it in the place or on the occasion on which it may be used. The sense of words has in a considerable degree been impressed upon them by derivation, yet we must not forget that the connection between words and ideas is moulded by custom. To ascertain, therefore, the signification of terms, we must examine what has been called the usus loquendi—the usage of language. This, indeed, is by no means invariable. It is affected by the time, the religion of the writers, the habits of ordinary life, the political institutions of a country, etc., so that a word which in one place or period conveys one idea conveys in another an idea very different. "Liberty," for instance, as understood by ourselves, has a much more extended meaning than it had in the mouth of our ancestors. The knowledge of the usus loquendi—the basis of sound interpretation—is naturally more difficult to acquire when we have, as in the case of the Scriptures, to do with works composed in a dead language. It can be successfully pursued only in a way of historical investigation. And the following plain rules for this have been given by an eminent commentator. The usus loquendi of a dead language must be ascertained—

"1. From the works of those who lived when it was current, and to whom it was vernacular. Thus, in investigating the meaning of a term, we naturally consult the writer himself by whom it was used. He may give a definition of the word in question. Or its connection may probably explain it, or, again, parallel passages point out its signification with sufficient clearness. If we do not find its signification in the author himself, we have recourse to some other writer who employed the same language.

"2. From the traditional knowledge of the usus loquendi, retained partly in ancient versions, partly in commentaries and lexicons.

"3. From writers who employed a cognate dialect.

"These are general principles applicable to all languages. They are the true means of discovering the legitimate use of every tongue which has ceased to be spoken."

These general rules might be amplified and illustrated to almost any extent. But it must be the aim of the present article, as indeed already hinted, not so much to present a mass of details as to indicate how those details may be safely reached. The student must ever remember that though words may have to be examined separately for their meaning, yet it is not their independent meaning which is to be traced, but that which belongs to them in the position in which they are found. A word will often have many and various meanings; to gather up these is the province of the lexicographer. To select out of possible meanings that one which belongs to it in relation to those words with which it is in connection is the duty of the interpreter. And for this he must consult the context. Here he may find the definitions which a writer sometimes gives of the terms he employs; here by the adjuncts of a word, or by the position of comparison, parallelism or contrast in which it stands, he may infer the sense in which it is introduced in the place where he meets with it. The immediate context will perhaps throw the greatest light upon its signification, but the remoter context also must be examined. The tone of a paragraph, the subject of a section, will often point out the particular idea which is to be attached to a given word. And the way in which the writer uses it elsewhere, the way in which other writers treating on similar subjects use it—in a word, the cautious use of parallel passages—may lead to a just discrimination. A version shows what sense has actually been selected for the word. And if he who made the version had a competent knowledge of the language from which and the language into which he translated, and can be seen to have performed his task conscientiously and with fidelity, his authority must be high; his version serves as an adjudged case in the courts according to which others are determined. And if two languages have flowed from the same source, and have run, so to speak, side by side with the same general complexions, used by kindred peoples, it is manifest that a term in the one may well be illustrated by an allied term in the other.

Perhaps two or three examples are necessary for the full appreciation of the rules which have thus been briefly explained. See, then, how the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews defines in xi. 1 that "faith" the effectual working of which he intends to exhibit in the rest of the chapter. See, again, how the meaning of denying one's self is fixed by the connection. In Luke ix. 23, where it is coupled with taking up the cross, it is to be understood as sacrificing personal gratifications, while in 2 Tim. ii. 13, where it closely follows "he abideth faithful," being spoken of God, it as clearly signifies that he cannot be inconsistent with himself. So, also, from the parallel form of Hebrew sentences, we may determine the word rendered "deceased" in our version of Isa. xxvi. 14. Some have translated it "physician;" but as it corresponds with "dead" in the preceding clause, it must have a similar signification: it is not identically the same, but closely allied, having, as Dr. Davidson says, from whom the example is taken, "the accessory idea of debility and incorporeity." Further, the word rendered "daily" in the Lord's Prayer, Matt. vi. 11; Luke xi. 3, occurs nowhere else. Here, then, we are led by the judgment of Greek Fathers and the early Peshito-Syriac version to that etymological derivation of it which gives the sense of "proper for our sustenance." Once more, the root of Elôah, Elôhîm, appellations of the Deity, would seem to be lost in the Hebrew, but in a cognate dialect, the Arabic, a root exists involving the idea of admiration and adoration; therefore it has with some reason been inferred that God is so called as being the admirable and most glorious One. Examples might be multiplied to any extent, but these must suffice.

It is in this way that the meaning of terms is to be carefully ascertained; and when direct modes fail, subsidiary processes must be resorted to, but a fuller explication of them cannot be given here.

Attention having been carefully paid to determine the signification of words and phrases, we are next in due order to examine the meaning of propositions and sentences—that is to say, to investigate the sense of the sacred text. A preliminary note may, however, be properly introduced. There is an obvious distinction between the sense and the signification of terms. The words of a writer in one language may be exactly rendered into the corresponding words of another, and yet the sense intended be not thereby conveyed. For example, we may take the modes of ordinary familiar salutation. The phrases so used in France and Spain, literally translated, would be unintelligible in England. Hence we must seek terms in one language equivalent to those employed in another.

The investigation of the sense of Scripture must be pursued on principles similar to those adopted in ascertaining the meaning of terms. The passage must be systematically examined, and additional light be sought from the context, from parallels and other less immediate sources. The first step must be to settle the right construction of a sentence. A sentence is not a mere mass of words; it possesses organization; it has parts and members more or less closely united, the dependence of which on each other, and the relation of each separate one to the whole, are to be determined. Hence we must attend to the punctuation; we must see whether there are ellipses to be supplied, whether or no the sentence is interrogative, and must make a proper adjustment of the various parts. Take an example or two. The Authorized Version supplies a word in Prov. xxx. 15. But a slight consideration will show that there is no ellipse. "Give, Give," are the names of the two daughters of the horse-leech. Again, the common punctuation should be abandoned in Rom. viii. 33, 34. The clauses are interrogative: "God that justifieth?" "Christ that died?" So also the sense is not so good if "Father, save me from this hour," John xii. 27, be taken affirmatively. Our Lord exclaims, "What shall I say? Father, save me from this hour?" No, I will not shrink from it. It is fair, however, to say that some eminent expositors of this text dissent. Then, further, we must ascertain the proper construction of a period, its syntactical principles, the relation between the subject and the predicate, with the due dependence of the subordinate clauses on the main part. Some knowledge of the grammar is of course required. Ordinarily, the subject and the predicate of a proposition are readily distinguished. As general rules, to which, doubtless, there are exceptions, it may be said that the subject for the most part precedes the predicate. The first has the article in Greek—not so the other. In Hebrew, if a substantive is the predicate, it follows the subject, which stands after the verb; if an adjective is the predicate, it has no article, and comes first. We conclude from these principles that, in 2 Ki. viii. 13, it was the greatness, not the atrocity, of the thing that startled Hazeel. The meaning is, What is thy servant, who is but a dog? what power has he to accomplish so great an object? So in 1 Tim. vi. 5 we must translate, "that godliness is a source of gain," and in 2 Tim. ii. 13, "the solid foundation of God continues to stand." And just as the signification of a word, as before shown, is often determined by a parallelism, so the meaning of sentences may be similarly ascertained. There are various kinds of parallelisms. There is that of members, where one clause by comparison or contrast illustrates the other, e. g., John iii. 6; and there are numerous historical and doctrinal parallels, as when the same events are narrated in different places, e. g., 2 Sam. xxi. 18-22, compared with 1 Chr. xx. 4-8, or when the same point of teaching is insisted on, e. g., Eph. i. 5, 6, compared with Col. ii. 13.

Into the numberless ramifications of special rules and illustrations it is impossible to go. But perhaps enough has been said to exhibit the proper mode of fair interpretation—that which has been called the literal and historical, or historico-literal mode, "that method which not only concerns itself with the simple and grammatical meaning of the words, but also with that meaning viewed under what may be termed, for want of a better word, its historical relations—viz., as illustrated by facts, modified by the context, substantiated by the tenor of the holy book, and receiving elucidation from its minor specialties and details." We are frequently told that the Bible must be interpreted like any other book, and the rule is admirable so far as it resembles any other book. But to apply no other rule than this is to assume that the Scripture is but of human origin, that it contains no prophetic disclosures of things not yet come to pass, that it teaches not the future by the past, that there is in it no system of typical development, no principle of expansion, which makes it emphatically the book of all ages and of all men. To treat this—"a world," it has been called, "in itself"—as but an ordinary book is palpably unfair, until by clear and convincing proof it shall have been shown to be no more than an ordinary book. Men who so cramp themselves must fail in the interpretations they attempt.

Far wiser are the directions which Bishop Ellicott supplies for right interpretation, and he who has learned justly to follow these directions will have attained no mean proficiency in the understanding of the Scripture. "Interpret," says the bishop, "grammatically;" "interpret historically;" "interpret contextually;" "interpret minutely;" "interpret according to the analogy of faith." To the brief illustration of these rules some space shall be dedicated, and for matter tending to illustrate them deep obligation to the bishop's admirable essay must be at once acknowledged.

1. Little need be said upon the first. It is just the embodiment of the principles before laid down. Let the signification of words in themselves, and the sense of them as combined in sentences, be carefully and systematically sought in accordance with the fundamental rules of language. We shall not then be in danger of making prophets and apostles speak according to our own notions, or be induced to substitute a human gloss for the veritable language of the sacred record. Man's liability to such freedom of exposition, unless guarded by a strict adherence to grammatical propriety, is well exposed by Bishop Ellicott: "To sit calmly in our studies, to give force and meaning to the faltering utterances of inspired men, to correct the tottering logic of an apostle, to clear up the misconceptions of an evangelist, and to do this without dust or toil, without expositors and without versions, without anxieties about the meaning of particles or humiliations at discoveries of lacking scholarship,—to do all this, thus easily and serenely, is the temptation held out; and the weak, the vain, the ignorant and the prejudiced are clearly proving unable to resist it. Hence the necessity of a return to first principles, however homely they appear."

2. Equally important is the second direction. Late researches have poured a flood of light upon the history, the topography, the antiquities, of Eastern lands. Assyrian and Babylonian discoveries are giving form and precision to prophetic imagery; the examination of Palestine and the adjacent regions, their natural characteristics and the remains of human works which they contain, is corroborating the truthfulness of the sacred narratives; while the historical facts from time to time springing forth teach us how to connect and explain circumstances heretofore deemed inexplicable. Take a single instance. The explorations of Bashan, discovering the massive ruins of numerous cities yet studding portions of its surface, are an admirable commentary upon Deut. iii. 1-7—a passage in regard to which interpreters heretofore felt inclined to explain away the grammatical force of the expressions used. All the helps thus supplied must be diligently adopted; and many an incident, many a description, many a precept, will start up with lifelike reality before the student's gaze who uses these keys for unlocking the recesses of what had once seemed a sealed book.

3. The third direction has been already in some measure illustrated. Half the puzzles which have bewildered men in the Scripture, and more than half the strange and erroneous inferences which have been drawn, have originated in the determination of a meaning apart from the connection in which it lay (so to speak) imbedded. The limitations of the context, then, must be exactly observed. The interpretation of a single passage, to be sound, must agree with the general scope and meaning of the rest, with the circumstances under which it was produced, with the purpose of the writer. This rule is useful both negatively and positively; it will prevent improper applications, and it will decide which of two interpretations—so far as grammar goes equally tenable—is to be preferred. An example or two of its use shall be produced. How often do we find St. Paul's declaration, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin," Rom. xiv. 23, stretched to every possible case, as if it had been a general admonition for the guidance of all thought and feeling and conduct! But look at it in its connection; see how it is a part of a particular discussion, and then, however it may be taken by inference to extend to other difficulties beyond that immediately in hand, we cannot hesitate in deciding that as a plain rule the words were never meant "to be applied to all imaginable cases, but to be restricted to scruples or cases of conscience that bear some analogy to the instances which the apostle is discussing." So the prophetic blessing of Asher, Deut. xxxiii. 25, is appropriated by men who might shrink from a similar application of that on Dan, Deut. xxxiii. 22.

4. Of vast importance, too, is the direction to examine Scripture with so much care as to bring out its full significance. There is no superfluity in the word of God. Nothing is put down at random there; and it is the business of the interpreter, while he does not introduce more from his own fancy into a passage than is actually in it, to discover all the instruction which it was really intended to convey. Instances innumerable might be produced in which, by a word, a touch, the turn of a sentence, the order of names, some necessary information, some important conclusion, not the product of mere imagination, but the sober result of sound reason, is obtained, which cursory readers altogether fail in appreciating. It is by a course of such minute investigation that Paley, in his "Horæ Paulinæ," and Blunt, in his "Undesigned Coincidences," have collected such a mass of evidence to the veracity of the sacred writers. Let an illustration or two be added here. It has been sometimes wondered why the hands of our Lord's attached female attendants were not employed in preparing his precious body for the tomb. A single word, "sitting," Matt. xxvii. 61, supplies the explanation. They were on the spot, but they could not bestir themselves; their stupefying grief disabled them; they could but sit by to watch the last sad rites performed. And again, from the order in which St. Peter names the countries where those he wrote to dwelt, 1 Pet. i. 1, we may not uncertainly gather his locality when writing. That which was natural in the East would have been unnatural had he been at Rome.

5. There is yet another direction specially applicable to the book of Revelation. Ordinarily we should say that a writer was his own best expositor; and seeing that the Scripture is an organized and harmonious whole, we may well add that one part throws light upon another, even if both proceed not from identically the same pen. But when we go, as we are authorized in going, still farther, and regard the book as containing divine communications, from which may be gathered, as there has been gathered, a body of doctrine, held always in its main points by the Church, and compressed into her creeds and confessions, which, though of human compilation, "may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture," then we are justified in concluding that no interpretation can stand which contradicts the analogy of faith. Doctrines indeed may be true, and yet may not belong to the analogy of faith, which is the general rule deduced, not from two or three parallel or coincident passages, but from the harmony of all parts of Scripture on the fundamental points of faith and practice. But we can never receive those which are plainly contradictory to it. Take, as an illustrative example of its value, such an assertion as that Christ is "the first-born of every creature," Col. i. 15; by itself it is not perfectly clear whether, giving him a pre-eminence, it excludes him from the class of creatures. But compare it with the whole tenor of Scripture teaching, place it beside the multifarious testimonies to the proper divinity of Christ, and it will be seen at once how it maintains the dignity of Him who of the same essence with the Father was begotten before the worlds of creation. Any other interpretation would be opposed to the analogy of faith.

It is hoped that, brief as these observations have necessarily been, they may have indicated the safe course of Scripture interpretation. They have, however, touched only that historico-literal interpretation, as it has been called, in which we reach the plain meaning of the sacred writers and discover what it is that they really intended to say. But beneath the letter there is to be discerned a deeper meaning. If we at all admit the authority of Scripture, we cannot deny this. Our Lord often showed it in his discourses; the apostles have carried out the same truth. For God is in the habit of teaching not only by words, but by facts representing, in the histories of the past, things which after a higher significance occur again, and making his dealings of old ensamples and admonitions of his dealings with his Church for ever. Of these deeper meanings—the spirit under the letter of Scripture—more cannot be here said. Many of the topics connected therewith are treated of under the heads of PROPHECY, TYPES, which see. Only let it be remembered that these, too, must be regulated by certain laws, and that it is the sober judgment which must be exercised upon them.

One word must be said on the temper in which men should approach the great business of Scripture interpretation. It must be in a candid and trustful spirit, not allowing small difficulties to neutralize extended proofs; it must be with a sincere desire to discover truth, whatever prejudices may have to be cast aside; it must be with earnest prayer for the illumination of that Holy Spirit by whose means holy men of old were enabled to speak.

INTERSECTING ARCH, a name applied to the form of certain Norman arches when the semi-circular curve is cut into two parts by other semi-circular curves, thus producing a number of pointed arches, as may be seen in the subjoined illustrations from Croyland Abbey and Lincoln Cathedral.

INTHRONIZATION (in-thron-i-za'shun) is the formal act of investing a bishop with his office after the ceremony of consecration.

INTINCTION (in-tink'shun), a method of administering the sacrament in the Eastern Church by mingling the elements together and giving them to the communicant in a spoon. It is believed, by some writers, that the custom was introduced by Chrysostom, but the evidence is not conclusive. The practice was condemned by Popes Urban II. and Pascal II., and by the convocation of Canterbury in 1175.

INTORCETTA (in-tor-set'tah), PADRE GIOVANNI, a Jesuit, and one of the most energetic missionaries in China, was born at Piazza, in Sicily, in 1625. He left a Latin version of Confucius, and various writings on the doctrines of the Chinese legislator; also, "Testimonium de Cultu Sinensi," and an account of the Chinese mission. He died in 1696.

INTROIT (in'tro-it), a name derived from the Latin, is the name of a psalm which in some churches is sung as the priest proceeds to the altar to celebrate the Eucharist. Edward VI. introduced an introit in his prayer-book before every collect, epistle and gospel, but they were afterward omitted. The term is also used to designate such verses as are used on entering the church—a custom which is said to date from the fourth century.

INTRUSION (in-troo'zhun), in the ecclesiastical sense of the term, means an unlawful entrance into or usurpation of a church or religious benefice. The term is of common use in Scotland. In 1736 the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland passed an act against intrusion of ministers into vacant congregations, declaring that no minister shall be intruded into any church contrary to the will of the congregation. The last great movement in Scotland on this subject was the separation of 474 ministers from the Church, and the formation of the Free Church of Scotland, rather than submit to the dictation of patrons and civil courts in their efforts to intrude ministers into vacant parishes against the will of the people.

INVENTION OF THE CROSS, a festival celebrated by the Greek and Latin Churches on May 3, to commemorate the supposed discovery of the cross of Christ by Helena, mother of Constantine the Great. According to the legend, which obtained wide credence, she made a journey to Palestine, and on arriving at Jerusalem employed laborers to dig away the earth and rubbish at Golgotha, when she found three crosses. These she ordered to be applied to a dead person; the first two had no effect, but at the application of the third life was restored. She thereupon concluded that she had found the object of her search.

IONA (i-o'na), the name of a very celebrated island lying off the west coast of Scotland. It is only about three miles long by the breadth of a mile, and in some parts of only half a mile, and

806 another martyrdom of the inmates of Iona took place, and in 825 another sad devastation and murder left the place desolate. Still later, in 986, the abbot and fifteen monks were slain by another attack of the ruthless Norsemen. The fate of the island was most unsettled after this date, as Norwegians, Manx and Irish bishops claimed authority over it, and in the end of the fifteenth century it passed into the hands of the Scottish bishop of the isles. There is an old ruined church in the island which appears to have been erected in the early part of the thirteenth century by an Irish architect who died in 1202, but the date is uncertain. The island was long the burial-place of kings and princes, and even yet there are many tombstones with Irish inscriptions; but the monastery yet this small patch of land is invested with an amount of interest that elevates it to a high place in mediæval history. From this little spot the gospel was carried out by ardent missionaries among the Picts in Scotland. The men who were educated here penetrated England and Christianized the Northumbrians, carrying the standard of the cross into the regions farther south, until much of the east and central parts of England were made acquainted with the truth.

In A. D. 563 Columba, a scion of a royal Irish family, received a grant of the island from his kinsman Conall, the son of a Scottish king. He founded a monastery or a place of learning in it for missionary objects, and for centuries the island was venerated as one of the most favored places on the earth because of the influence of its missionaries on all lands around it. In 795 the Norsemen ravaged the island and burned the monastery. In is gone, the cathedral is in ruins, and the glory of Iona is only in the past and in the fruit that followed the sowing of the seed by the faithful men who went from its shores as messengers of mercy to heathen lands.

IONIA (i-o'ne-ah), the district bordering on the Ægean Sea from Phocæa to Miletus. Its original inhabitants were Greeks, but in later times a large Jewish element was found in the population. Under the Roman dominion the name Ionia remained, but its towns were distributed politically under other provinces. Ptolemy ranks them in Asia Proper, while Strabo, Pliny and Mela speak of Ionia as a distinct territory. In the account which Josephus gives of the appeal of the Jews in Ionia to Agrippa for exemption from certain oppressions to which they were exposed the ancient name of the country is retained.

IOTA (e-o'tah), the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet (i), corresponding to the Hebrew jod (י) and the Syriac jadh, and employed metaphorically to express the minutest trifle. This is, in fact, one of several metaphors derived from the alphabet, as when alpha, the first letter, and omega, the last, are employed to express the beginning and the end. We are not to suppose, however, that this proverb was exclusively apposite in the Greek language. The same practical allusion equally existed in Hebrew. See JOT.

IPEREN (ip'e-ren), JOSUA VAN, a distinguished divine of the Reformed Church of Holland, was born February 23, 1726, at Middleburg. After pursuing his studies at Groningen and Leyden, he became pastor of Lillo, and removed thence to Veere. In 1778 he went to Batavia, where he labored diligently, but the climate proved fatal to him, and he died in 1780. He was a man of extensive attainments, and received the highest honors from various learned societies. He took a prominent part in the preparation of a new metrical version of the Psalms, which is still in use, and wrote a "History of Church Psalmody."

IPHEDEIAH (if'e-de-yah), a Benjamite of the family of Shashak, 1 Chr. viii. 25, and himself the head of a branch or clan of that family.

IR, or IRI (i're), a Benjamite, 1 Chr. vii. 7, 12.

IRA (i'rah), the name of one or more of David's distinguished men of valor. In 2 Sam. xx. 26 we read of "Ira the Jairite" as a cohen, strictly a priest, but probably here, as in some other places, a chief officer or active man of business for David; this, rather than "chief ruler," the rendering adopted in the English Bible. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 26 "Ira the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite" appears in the list of thirty heroes. And still again, at ver. 38 we have "Ira the Ithrite" as another of the same class. It is possible that the first may have been identical with one of the two latter; but these two themselves, occurring in the same list, must have been diverse persons. Except the distinction, however, of having attained to such high positions in David's military or civil staff, nothing further is known of them.

IRAD (i'rad), a grandson of Cain, Gen. iv. 18.

IRAM (i'ram), the personal or territorial designation of one of the Edomite chiefs or alluphim; "dukes," Gen. xxxvi. 43; 1 Chr. i. 54.

IRELAND (i'r'land), JOHN, D.D., dean of Westminster, celebrated for his learning, was born at Ashburton, in Devonshire, in 1762. He was educated at Oxford, and after holding a small curacy in the neighborhood of his native place, he was in 1793 collated to the vicarage of Croydon, in Surrey. In 1802 he was made a prebendary of Westminster, and succeeded to the deanery of Westminster in 1816. He was a somewhat voluminous author; he published "Five Discourses, containing certain Arguments for and against the Reception of Christianity by the Ancient Jews and Greeks;" "Paganism and Christianity compared;" "Nuptia Sacra, an Inquiry into the Scriptural Doctrine of Marriage and Divorce," and other works, exclusively theological. As his life had been distinguished by his patronage of literature, so his will evinced that he was desirous that his ample fortune—an immense one, if we consider his origin and early prospects—should benefit both religion and literature after his death. Besides many charitable bequests for the benefit of the various places with which he had been connected, he left £2000 to his college, Oriel, Oxford, for an exhibition; £5000 for a chapel in Westminster; and the princely sum of £10,000 to the university of Oxford; for a professorship of exegesis of Holy Scripture. He died September 1, 1842.

IRENÆUS (i-re-né-us), an early Church Father, was equally celebrated for his connection with the Church in the East and the Church in the West. Of the time and the place of his birth nothing is accurately known. He was acquainted with Polycarp, the bishop of Smyrna, and it has hence been inferred that he was a native of Asia Minor and probably of that city. His name indicates a Greek parentage. Some have dated his birth as early as A. D. 98, others A. D. 120, and others as late as A. D. 140. The latest writers favor a period intermediate between these last dates. There is evidence that he accompanied Polycarp to Rome, having been one of his disciples, and through his great master the teaching of the apostle John affected him and gave a cast to his theological views; for although his sphere of labor was in the West, he brought with him the characteristics of his early Asiatic training. This is evident from a fragment of a letter addressed by him to Florinus, a former companion and friend who had fallen into the Valentinian heresy. Florinus had become a presbyter at Rome; and referring to the views which he had adopted, Irenæus says, with great tenderness, "Those doctrines the presbyters before us, who were also the immediate disciples of the apostles, never delivered to you. For I saw thee when I was but a boy in Lower Asia with Polycarp. I remember the circumstances of those times better than those which have recently occurred; the pursuits of our childhood, growing with our minds, become united to it. I can tell the very place where the blessed Polycarp was accustomed to sit and teach; his coming in; his going out; the manner of his life; the form of his body; his discourses with the people; and how he related his familiar intercourse with John and others who had seen the Lord, and how he related their sayings and what he had heard from them concerning the Lord. Also concerning his miracles and his doctrines as he had received them from eye-witnesses of the gospel of salvation, and which were told by Polycarp, agreeably with the Scriptures. These things, through the mercy of God, I there attentively heard, and noted them down, not on paper, but in my heart; and by the grace of God these same facts I am continually and faithfully recalling to mind." When he went to Gaul is uncertain, some holding that he had been advised by Polycarp to proceed thither, and others thinking that he had accompanied Photinus, who became bishop at Lyons, and whom Irenæus succeeded after his martyrdom. That he was a presbyter at Lyons during the time of Marius Aurelius is certain; that he was sent on a mission to Rome concerning the Montanist troubles is also known, and this it was that saved his life, for in his absence Photinus fell as a martyr in the persecution which then raged, and thus on his return he was elected bishop of Lyons about the year 177. Tradition reports that he too died as a martyr about A. D. 202 under Septimus Severus, but Eusebius and the early Fathers are silent on this subject. "Irenæus was the leading representative," as Dr. Schaff has well said, "of the Asiatic Johannean school in the second half of the second century, the champion of Catholic orthodoxy against Gnostic heresy, and the mediator between the Eastern and Western Churches. He united a learned Greek education and philosophical penetration with practical wisdom and moderation and a just sense of the simple essentials in Christianity. We plainly trace in him the influence of the spirit of John. . . . He was an enemy of all error and schism, and, on the whole, the most orthodox of the anti-Nicene Fathers, except in eschatology. Here, with Papias and most of his contemporaries, he maintained the Millenarian views, which were subsequently abandoned by the Catholic Church."

The writings of Irenæus are exceedingly valufirm grasp of the great cardinal doctrines of the gospel and a fine intellectual mastery of the subject, in the treatment of which he shows how unfounded are the vagaries of the Gnostic system, and how decidedly they are opposed to the verities of the Christian faith. Only three ancient manuscripts of this treatise are known to remain, and great anxiety is felt that the copies which Erasmus must have possessed could be recovered, as they might serve in elucidating some obscure passages in those which are known to exist, and which have puzzled commentators. Several of the "Letters" also of Irenæus remain, written by him against persons at Rome who were corrupting Christian truth; and in the last century four Greek fragments were discovered at Turin which have able, and more of them are preserved than might have been expected when the ravages of time are considered. Their value does not consist so much in their record of historical facts as in the light which they cast on the questions which were then felt to be all-important in the Church's testimony. The most valuable of them all was directed against the errors of the Gnostics and the danger of admitting their tenets into the Christian system. This work, which is usually published in Latin, is known by the short title "Adversus Hæreses"—i. e., "Against the Heretics"—is justly said by Dr. Schaff to be "at once the polemic theological masterpiece of the anti-Nicene age, and the richest mine of information respecting the Gnostics, particularly the Valentinian heresy, and the Church doctrine of that age." The Greek original no longer exists, but in its Latin form it bears evidence of a minute acquaintance with Scripture, a been justly attributed to him. In one of them he writes against Gnosticism, in the second on the eucharist, in the third on toleration and in the fourth on the object of the atonement, which he held to be the purging away sin and the annihilation of all evil.

There is a remarkable fullness in his statement of doctrine, and he deals not only with passing questions of his own time, but with controverted subjects which have been agitated even in the present day. Thus he is very express on the point at issue with the pantheists. He states the unity of the Godhead, and he shows that the eternal, omnipresent, almighty and good Creator is the maker of all things, and thus, while he opposes pantheism, he equally repudiates polytheism. In the opening verses of Genesis he finds all that he requires to establish his position that the world was good when it came from the hand of the divine Creator, and hence evil cannot be an eternal entity, but only a lapse or corruption of nature. On the doctrine of the person of Christ he is a faithful representative of the school of John. Although trained by a Greek education, he keeps in the way of the Western writers with great closeness to simple Biblical statements. He makes no attempt to explain the derivation of the Son from the Father, because it is an unrevealed mystery, but he holds that though the Son is begotten of the Father, still the Son is not of the creation which had a beginning, as he is uncreated and eternal, and thus he approaches the terms in the Nicene creed. On the doctrine of the manhood of Christ his great object was the refutation of Gnostic error, and he argues that Christ must be a real man like us if he would redeem us from corruption and make us perfect. Sin and death came into the world by a man, and so they can only be legitimately blotted out by a man supernaturally begotten, a new progenitor as divine as he is human.

On the doctrine of the Trinity he is express, as his words make both Christ and the Holy Spirit parts of the supreme divinity, and yet he has been claimed by both Arians and Socinians as a supporter of their views. On the subject of redemption he is the soundest and clearest of the anti-Nicene Fathers. To redeem man there was the union of the divine and human in Christ, and the obedience of his pure life was completed by the satisfaction to divine justice on the cross. On the sacraments his expressions are indefinite, and we need more from his hand, perhaps, to enable us to state with accuracy what his views were precisely. That he approached Papias on his millennial views must, perhaps, be admitted, and although educated in the East, held, as Polycarp did, that great forbearance should be exercised with the Western brethren. At the present day, however, it is of the utmost importance that, while rationalists are so sedulously engaged in depreciating the historical value of the New Testament, and especially of the Gospel of John, the testimony of Irenæus, who was born before the death of John, and who, living in the second century, had abundant opportunity to know without doubt what inspired Scriptures were then received, is so clear that any unprejudiced mind must admit that it settles the question. He states expressly that the way of salvation was made known by the first preachers of the gospel, who also by the will of God committed the gospel to writing. He proceeds to state that among the Jews Matthew wrote the first Gospel, the second was by Mark, the third by Luke, a companion of St. Paul, and then of the fourth he says, "Afterward, John, the disciple of the Lord, who also leaned upon his breast, he likewise published a Gospel while he dwelt in Ephesus, in Asia." It is utterly useless for rationalism to carp at this testimony. Neither the intelligence nor the honesty of Irenæus can be successfully assailed, nor can it ever be shown that his actual statements have been tampered with to meet a difficulty in the nineteenth century. Taking the New Testament, the only book which he received, and which is not now admitted by the Church, is the "Shepherd of Hermas," and with this exception the same canon was then and now received. This ancient Father recognizes the inspiration and authority of the word of God, and bows to its teaching as Christians are now accustomed to do, while he adduces its statements and teachings as possessing controlling authority when reasoning with Gnostic and other errorists. It only remains to be stated that in no place in which he refers to historical or popular traditions does he ever place such traditions on a level with the word of God.

2. OF SIRMIMUM, was a native of Hungary, born in the beginning of the fourth century. Little is known of his early life, but he must have been a person of such eminence as to have attracted attention at Rome, for Probus, the governor of the province, who sought to induce him to renounce Christianity, is believed to have acted on instruction from Diocletian and Maximus. Probus failed in his object, and Irenæus sealed his testimony with his blood. The date of his martyrdom is unknown.

3. OF TYRE, a prelate of the fifth century, took a conspicuous part in the Nestorian struggle at the Council of Ephesus in 431, where he advocated the cause of Nestorius, but failed in his endeavor to prevent the condemnation of the latter. Returning to the emperor Theodosius, he sought to counteract the influence of the Cyrilians, but his efforts in this direction were equally unavailing, and he was banished from court. In 444 he was made bishop of Tyre, but by an edict of the emperor he was deposed in 448. He afterward wrote an account of the controversy in which he had borne so active a part.

4. A Tuscan martyr who suffered under Aurelius in the persecution about A. D. 275. Little is known of his life, and the memory of his faithfulness is preserved by the fact that he was canonized and a day set apart in the calendar for his commemoration.

IRENÆUS. There were two Russian ecclesiastics of this name. Irenæus Klementievski was born in the Vladimir district in 1753. He became bishop of Tvar and archbishop of Pskof, wrote commentaries on the Hebrews and the Epistle to the Romans, and died in 1818. The other, Irenæus Falkovski, born in 1762, attained to great eminence in languages and philosophy, and died in 1823.

IRENE (i-re'ne), empress of Constantinople, was born in 725, at Athens. She was a woman of rare beauty and ability, but of most wicked impulses and inordinate ambition. It is believed that she murdered her husband, the emperor Leo IV., in order to gratify her greed of power, and she signalized her reign, during the minority of her son Constantine, by a violent persecution of the Iconoclasts. Constantine, attaining his majority in 790, placed her in confinement, but in a short time Irene regained her power, and caused her son to be deprived of sight. In 802 she was again dethroned and forced into exile on the island of Lesbos, where she died in 803.

IRHAHERES (ir-ha-he'res). This word occurs only once, Isa. xix. 18, where in our version it is rendered "the city of destruction," and in the margin, "of Heres," or "of the sun." The reading of the original passage is uncertain, and according as hheres or heres is preferred (the difference being only a single letter), one or other meaning will be adopted.

The prophecy would seem to point to the time when, by the influx of the Jews into Egypt, the knowledge of the true God would be disseminated there, and a way made for the fuller reception of divine truth in the gospel dispensation. Under the Greek dominion the Jews were permitted to build a temple in Egypt, in which the services nearly imitated those at Jerusalem. The Scriptures were translated into Greek, and many became thereby instructed in God's will. And though a philosophizing spirit prevailed and grew, yet Moses and the prophets were read in Egypt, and their testimony was ready there to corroborate the claims of Messiah. So had the prophecy its fulfillment. A writer who prefers the rendering, "city of destruction," says: "If the prophecy is to be understood in a proper sense, we . . . must suppose that Ir-ha-heres was one of the cities partly or wholly inhabited by the Jews in Egypt; of these Onion was the most important, and to it the rendering 'one shall be called a city of destruction' would apply, since it was destroyed by Titus, while Alexandria and perhaps the other cities yet stand."

But possibly "city of the sun" is a preferable interpretation; and then Heliopolis or On might be intended. It was at Leontopolis, in the Heliopolitan nome or district, that the Jewish temple stood. And this view seems confirmed by the mention of Ieth-shemesh, with the same meaning, Jer. xliii. 13, the same place being referred to, comp. Jud. i. 35. Some writers, however, would give the whole passage a figurative interpretation. See ON.

IRI (ir'e), 1 Esd. viii. 62, Uriah, Ezra viii. 33.

IRIJAH (i-re'jah), an officer who arrested Jeremiah, Jer. xxxvii. 13, 14.

IRNAHASH (ir-na'hash). In 1 Chr. iv. 12 we have read that Eshton of the tribe of Judah "begat Tehinnah the father of Ir-nahash," which means that Tehinnah occupied the ancient town of Ir-nahash. Its situation is not indicated, and the place is not again mentioned in the Bible.

IRNERIO (ir-ne're-o), the restorer of the study of Roman law in Italy in the eleventh century. He opened at Bologna a school which was the foundation-stone of that celebrated university which has since taken rank with the best educational institutions in Europe. He died in 1118.

IRON, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 38.

IRON. The references to this metal in Scripture are both of a very early and very frequent occurrence. In the Cainite section of the antediluvian race, Tubal-cain, Lamech's son by Zillah, is said to have been "an artificer in brass and iron," Gen. iv. 22. And though no mention is made of the use of iron in the construction of the ark, yet there can be no doubt that instruments of iron must have played an important part in the erection of such a vast structure. "A furnace of iron" is taken as the image of the fearful bondage from which the Lord delivered his people in Egypt, Deut. iv. 28—an image which could never have been thought of unless furnaces in connection with iron had already been in familiar use. So well was the article known at that early period, and so much esteemed for the purposes it was made to serve amid the conveniences of life, that Canaan is said, among other natural advantages, to have possessed hills out of which the people might dig brass and iron, Deut. viii. 9. Iron is also specified among the spoils of war taken at the overthrow of the Midianites, which had to be purified by being passed through the fire, Num. xxxi. 32. And in the subsequent history of the covenant people we read of iron being used as the material from which a great variety of implements were formed—axes, harrows and saws, nails, weapons of war, bars and gates, rods and pillars, etc., Deut. xix. 5; 2 Ki. vi. 5, 6; 2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chr. xxii. 3; 1 Sam. xvii. 7; Ps. cvii. 16; Isa. xiv. 2; Jer. i. 18, etc. Nor is the evidence of Scripture singular on this point; it is borne out by the wellnigh contemporary testimony of the monuments. "In the sepulchres of Thebes," Wilkinson says, "I have had occasion to remark butchers sharpening their knives on a round bar of metal attached to their apron; and the blue color of the blades and the distinction maintained between the bronze and steel weapons in the tomb of Rameses III., one being painted red and the other blue, leaves little doubt that the Egyptians of an early Pharaonic age were acquainted with the use of iron." In Ethiopia, he also states, iron was even more abundant than in Egypt; and that while among the ancient Latins and Greeks bronze was much used in the fabrication of warlike weapons, the Etruscans are known to have almost invariably used iron for swords, daggers, spear-heads, and other offensive weapons, confining bronze to defensive armor. The remains of ancient Nineveh still further confirm the testimony; for, though articles simply of iron have not been found there, any more than in Egypt (on account of the rapid decomposition it undergoes from exposure to air and moisture), yet coated articles of iron have been found at Nineveh, overlaid with bronze, several specimens of which were discovered by Layard, and have been deposited in the British Museum. Iron weapons also were found, but in so brittle a state that most of them fell to pieces when exposed to the air. Fragments, however, of shields, arrow-heads, axes and other things have been saved and brought to this country.

There can be no doubt, therefore, of the fact that among the nations of antiquity generally the use of iron was known from very remote times, and in reference to purposes which bespoke its comparative cheapness and abundance. The difficulty is to understand how the practical skill could have been acquired which was necessary for such an end. For it is rarely found in the metallic state—never in any quantities; and the extraction of it from the ore, and raising it to the proper degree of hardness, is not quite a simple process. It requires, in the first instance, a considerable degree of heat, much beyond what is needed for melting most of the other metals. Tin melts at a temperature of 470° Fahrenheit, copper, silver and gold at 1800°, or from that to 2000°. But to melt cast iron requires a heat of 3000°, and malleable iron is only softened by a heat of this temperature. It seems doubtful, however, whether the ancients knew cast iron, although it is certain they were acquainted with malleable iron and steel. And it is supposed that the process adopted is much the same with that by which Indians of the present day smelt the iron ore, and convert it into wootz, or Indian steel. It is thus described in Ure's "Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures": "The furnace or bloomery in which the ore is smelted is from four to five feet high; it is somewhat pear-shaped, being about five feet wide at top and one at bottom. It is built entirely of clay, so that a couple of men may finish its erection in a few hours, and have it ready for use the next day. There is an opening in front about a foot or more in height, which is built up with clay at the commencement and broken down at the end of each smelting operation. The bellows are usually made of a goat's skin, which has been stripped from the animal without ripping open the part covering the belly. The apertures at the legs are tied up, and a nozzle of bamboo is fastened into the opening formed by the neck. The orifice of the tail is enlarged and distended by two slips of bamboo; these are grasped in the hands, and kept close together in making the stroke for the blast; in the returning stroke they are separated to admit the air. By working a bellows of this kind with each hand, making alternate strokes, a tolerably uniform blast is produced. The bamboo nozzles of the bellows are inserted into tubes of clay, which pass into the furnace. The furnace is filled with charcoal; and a lighted coal being introduced before the nozzles, the mass in the interior is soon kindled. As soon as this is accomplished a small portion of the ore, previously moistened with water to prevent it from running through the charcoal, but without any flux whatever, is laid on the top of the coals, and covered with charcoal, to fill up the furnace. In this manner ore and fuel are supplied, and the bellows are urged for three or four hours. When the process is stopped, and the temporary wall in front broken down, the bloom is removed with a pair of tongs from the bottom of the furnace." The iron thus made is converted into steel by being cut into pieces and put into a crucible made of refractory clay, mixed with a large quantity of charred husk of rice. In this state it is put into a furnace and subjected for two or three hours to heat urged by a blast, when the process is considered complete. The crucibles are taken out and allowed to cool; they are then broken, and the steel is found in the form of a cake at the bottom.

The mode of hardening iron or steel by plunging it when red hot into water is of great antiquity. And the hardness of iron above the other metals was matter of frequent reference both with sacred and classical writers. Hence, rods, bars or yokes of iron are proverbial expressions for things of great firmness and strength, Job xl. 18; Ps. ii. 9; Jer. xxviii. 13; and the fourth kingdom in Daniel's vision is represented as being strong as iron, which breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things, Dan. ii. 40. There is no evidence, however, of the ancient Israelites having been themselves manufacturers of iron; and it is still doubtful whether the expression formerly quoted about the mountains of their land being such that iron and brass could be dug from them is to be understood in a literal or a metaphorical sense. Iron is mentioned among the articles of commerce in which Tyre traded, Ezek. xxvii. 19; and the allusion in another prophet to northern iron as of superior value, Jer. xv. 12, has been supposed to refer to that produced by the Chalybes on the Euxine Sea, who were celebrated for their skill in this line of industry.

IRPEEL (ir'pe-el), an ancient town of Benjamin, apparently situated on the mountain ridge north of Jerusalem, Josh. xviii. 27.

IRRIGATION (ir-re-ga'shun) by the artificial use of water was an important means of cultivation in the East. Palestine is a rolling country, abounding in hills, and having few streams of any importance that could be depended on in the hot season. It became apparent, therefore, as soon as agriculture or gardening was cultivated to any extent, that supplies of water for permanent use were indispensable. Hence rain had to be saved by means of reservoirs, and streams had to be utilized, so that the treasures thus preserved might be made serviceable in time of need. The monuments which have come down to us from antiquity show us the different modes in which irrigation was practiced. When water was raised into a cistern, it was an easy process to conduct it by small streams through the channels made in gardens. Many of these were so shallow that by pressing the foot on the margin the water would be permitted to flow gently over the beds which required to be nourished, and the same process was adopted in watering agricultural lands which lay in lower regions. This custom will explain Deut. xi. 10, which, without a knowledge of the customs of the East, would be unintelligible to the American reader. The lessons acquired by the Israelites in Egypt, where the water of the Nile was used all over Lower Egypt in this manner, must have influenced their descendants in their culture of the hilly districts of their own land.

The influence of Egypt extended over the East, for the "shadouf" of the Nile, or the bucket and the well-sweep, all of which are portrayed on monuments, may be seen in use at the streams near Damascus at the present day. The greater part of Persia also required such a mode of culture, and the "sackieh" and "taboot," now in use in that country, have entirely displaced the earlier means of irrigation in the regions east of the Euphrates and the Tigris. The illustrations which accompany this article will enable the reader to understand the nature of the machinery and the various appliances which human ingenuity called forth to meet the recognized wants of a people living in a region where water, an essential of life, was irregularly supplied.

IR-SHEMESH (ir-she'mesh), "City of the Sun," a city of Dan, near Zorah and Eshtaol, Josh. xix. 41, and doubtless identical with BETH-SHEMESH—"House of the Sun."

IRU (e'ru), a son of the eminent Caleb, 1 Chr. iv. 15.

IRVING (erv'ing), EDWARD, M.A., an eminent pulpit orator and founder of a religious sect, was born in 1792. He was brought up in the Scotch Church and educated at Edinburgh University. After holding the successive appointments of mathematical master at Haddington and master at Kirkcaldy, he was ordained Dr. Chalmers' assistant at St. John's, Glasgow. His eloquence soon got him the appointment of minister of the Caledonian Church, Hatton Garden. His striking appearance, combined with his terrible, prophet-like denunciations of vice, drew all London to hear him. A new church, built by his admirers in Regent Square, was completed in 1829; but soon his views began to differ so widely from those of the Scotch Church that he was accused of heresy, tried, and deprived of his charge for questioning the sinlessness of Christ. He retained, however, a large body of followers. Prophecy and its interpretation were greatly cultivated by the Irvingites, the end of the world being fixed by them for 1868. He died in 1834.

ISAAC (i'zak), the heir of promise, the long looked-for son of Abraham by his wife Sarah, born probably in the territory of Gera when his father was a hundred years old. His name, prescribed before his birth, Gen. xvii. 19, was highly significant. Abraham had smiled incredulously when the promise was renewed to him and Sarah designated as the mother of the covenant seed, Gen. xvii. 17, and Sarah laughed derisively afterward when she heard the reiterated word, Gen. xviii. 12. The son by his very name, therefore, was to warn the parents against unbelief, and characterized the jubilant satisfaction with which they received at last the fulfillment of the promise, Gen. xxi. 6.

Isaac's life was far less stirring than that of his father Abraham, or that of his son Jacob. He was a man of mild, contemplative character, without much strength of mind, suffering more than acting, easily persuaded, yet upon occasion firm. The incidents related of his history illustrate this.

When he was weaned, Abraham made a feast, Gen. xxi. 8, 9. Ishmael had probably till Isaac's birth conceived himself the heir. He would naturally become jealous of his young brother, and very likely this jealousy was fostered and aggravated by his mother. At the feast, therefore, the wild, ungovernable and pugnacious character ascribed to his descendants began to develop itself, and to appear in language of provoking insolence. Offended at the comparative indifference with which he was treated, he indulged in mockery, especially against Isaac, whose very name furnished him with satirical sneers. It is to this that St. Paul alludes, Gal.

iv. 29. And there is no occasion to imagine, as some have done, that the apostle followed here a Jewish tradition; he simply gives the full sense of the original expression. When a young man, possibly about five-and-twenty, Isaac was taken by his father to Mount Moriah, there to be offered as a burnt-sacrifice, Gen. xxii. 1-19. For the reasons of this extraordinary incident, see ABRAHAM. But the unresisting meekness which Isaac evinced should not be passed over without notice. When he was thirty-seven, his mother Sarah died, for whom he grieved with all the tenderness of an affectionate heart. Afterward, Abraham selected through the steward of his house a wife for him from his own kindred. His evening meditation in the field, his reception of Rebekah and his being comforted in her after his mother's death are very characteristic, Gen. xxiv. Isaac was forty at his marriage, and twenty years elapsed before his sons Esau and Jacob were born. In fifteen more years his father Abraham died, and he united with his brother Ishmael, now an aged man of eighty-nine, in burying him.

Isaac did not rule well his own house. His sons grew up apparently uncontrolled; and though before their birth the younger was marked out as the heir of the covenant, yet the father let his partiality for the elder appear, while his mother favored the other, Gen. xxv. Isaac had lived by the well Beerlahai-roi, Gen. xxiv. 62; xxv. 11, and on occasion of a famine would probably have followed his father's example and gone into Egypt. He was, however, divinely directed not to quit the land of Canaan. Moving, therefore, but a little way, he settled himself at Gerar. And here he repeated the fault of Abraham: when asked of his wife, he represented her as his sister—a fault which some have vainly striven to palliate. But the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy; he delivered Isaac from the evil which might have fallen upon him, and blessed him with so large an increase of the seed he sowed, and so much other wealth, that the Philistines became jealous of him. He left Gerar, therefore; and after some opposition on the part of Abimelech and his people on account of certain wells, he fixed his abode at Beersheba, where the Lord appeared to him with words of encouragement, and where he built an altar, Gen. xxvi. In his age, not less than one hundred and twenty, perhaps one hundred and thirty-seven, Isaac's eyesight had failed, and probably sickness was on him, which made him anxious to give a solemn blessing to his favorite son. The occasion was to be marked by a feast, which Esau was to procure. Jacob, however, instigated by his mother, appeared first with the savory meat his father loved, and obtained the blessing. When Isaac discovered the fraud, he still firmly held to what he had done, blessed Jacob again, and sent him away to provide a wife from among his relatives at Padan-aram, Gen. xxvii.; xxviii. 1-5. We know little more of Isaac. His latter days appear to have been spent at Hebron, where Jacob with his family, returned from Padan-aram, visited him, and where he died aged one hundred and eighty, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah by his two sons, Gen. xxxv. 27-29.

Isaac stands forth to view especially as the affectionate, obedient son, the model of that loving submission which those who become, as inheritors of his father Abraham's faith, sons and heirs of God, ought to pay to their heavenly Parent, the highest type of which is to be seen in the perfect performance of his Father's will by the only begotten Son of God, Ps. xl. 6-8; Matt. xxvi. 39, 42; John v. 30; vi. 38. This is the character in which we best love to contemplate Isaac; his figure recurs to us bearing the wood with his father up the slopes of Moriah. Gentle, pious, conciliating as he was through the rest of his days, he never rose higher in after life—he hardly fulfilled this promise of his youth. Indeed, it is not too much to say that in the more advanced stage of his history he fell into a state of general feebleness and decay in which the moral but too closely corresponded with the bodily decline. Yet Isaac was a man of faith and prayer, and God was not ashamed to be called his God, Heb. xi. 16. His history conveys many instructive lessons, and his memory has always been had in honor as one of the great patriarchs.

Many curious legends exist among the Jews and Mohammedans respecting Isaac, such as that he was an angel created before the world, who descended to earth in a human form, that he was one of the three in whom there was no sin, and one of the six over whom the angel of death had no power, and that he was the instituter of evening prayer, as Abraham was of morning and Jacob of night prayer. But that related by Canon Stanley, in his account of the visit of the prince of Wales to the patriarchal tomb at Hebron, is the strangest because of its being so totally out of harmony with the character of the patriarch. It is as follows: "On requesting to see the tomb of Isaac, we were entreated not to enter. Asking the reason of this, we were told that Abraham was full of loving-kindness, etc.; but that Isaac was proverbially jealous, and it was exceedingly dangerous to provoke him. When Ibrahim Pasha, as conqueror of Palestine, had endeavored to enter, he was driven out by Isaac, and fell back as if thunder-struck."

Kimchi, Ibn Ezra, Levi ben Gershon, Salomon ben Melech, giving also a German explanation of the difficult expressions, and an abridgment of Alsheich's exposition; and (3) a commentary on the Sabbath lessons from the prophets, entitled "The Face of Isaac," which consists of excerpts from nine of the most distinguished commentators. The works of Isaac ben Elia are very valuable, inasmuch as they enable the Biblical student to see on one page the expositions of the best and most famous Jewish commentators on every difficult passage without being obliged to search for them in inaccessible and costly volumes.

BEN MOSES, also called AROJO, lived in the sixteenth century, and wrote—(1) a commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled "The Consolation of God;" and (2) a commentary on the book of Ecclesiastes, called "The Gatherer of the Congregation." Both these commentaries are written in a philosophical spirit, and are valuable contributions to Biblical exegesis.

5. Surnamed THE BLIND, has been recognized as the author of the modern "Cabala," but it is probable that he only gave a decided stimulus to that system of interpretation. One of the mystical books, the "Jezirah," is attributed to him. In the cabalistic system, ideas were attached to the Hebrew letters, words were added to words, and arbitrary uses were made of different terms, so that the most fanciful meanings were assigned to the sacred text; and the Old Testament was made by transposition of words, and even of the letters of a word, to teach anything that the ingenuity of the manipulator might desire. Isaac "the Blind" flourished in the thirteenth century.

ISAACSON (i'zak-sun), HENRY, author of a system of chronology, was the son of Richard Isaacson, sheriff of London. He wrote a "Life of Bishop Andrews," whose amanuensis he had been. Born in 1581; died in 1654.

ISAACUS (i'zak-us), JOHN, is the Christian name of JOCHANAN HA-LEVI, a distinguished Jewish grammarian and lexicographer who flourished in the middle of the sixteenth century, who embraced Christianity and became Oriental professor in Cologne. He wrote "An Introduction to the Hebrew Grammar and to the Art of Writing a Pure Hebrew Style." Isaacus gives in this work different specimens of Hebrew writing, dialogues and epistles, both from the Old Testament and other Hebrew writings, as well as the books of Obadiah and Jonah in Hebrew, with a Latin translation; a grammatical treatise, which consists of a useful analysis and excellent translation of the entire book of Ruth; and other valuable works.

ISABELLA (iz-a-bel'la) OF CASTILE, surnamed "the Catholic," was born in 1451. She was the daughter of John II., king of Castile, by Isabella of Portugal, his second wife. Notwithstanding that her brother, Henry IV., filled the throne, she was offered the crown by the discontented nobles; but she refused. In 1469 she married Ferdinand of Aragon, and on the death of Henry IV., in 1474, was proclaimed queen of Castile and Leon. The battle of Toro, gained by Ferdinand over the king of Portugal, established her power. Isabella con-

ISAIAH (i-za'yah) was called to the prophetic office about the end of the reign of Uzziah. Nothing is known of his parentage, except that he was "the son of Amoz." The Jews have a tradition that Isaiah belonged to the royal family of Judah, his father being brother of King Amaziah; and they say that he was father-in-law to Manasseh, and was put to death by him. His prophetic ministry extended at least from the last year of Uzziah to the fourteenth of Hezekiah, a period of forty-seven years. If his later prophecies were written at the beginning of Manasseh's reign, fifteen years more must be added, which would make the whole length of his public life at least sixty-two years.

Isaiah was called to public duty during a very eventful period in the history of Judah. Uzziah and Jotham were, upon the whole, peaceful and prosperous monarchs, but luxury and sensual indulgence were increasing among the people, and true piety was rapidly declining. The reign of the next king, the wicked Ahaz, was most disastrous, for, in addition to internal disorders and sufferings, the country was invaded by the combined forces of Syria and Israel. Upon this occasion Isaiah came forward with a divine message both of reproof and encouragement to the panic-stricken king and people, but his warnings and his counsels were disregarded. Ahaz brought the kingdom into subjection to the Assyrian monarch, and left it on the very verge of ruin, and it was not restored to independence and prosperity till the latter part of Hezekiah's reign. This pious king abolished idolatry, reopened the temple, which had been closed by his father, and restored the worship of Jehovah. He treated Isaiah with great respect, and sought his counsel during the agitating events of his reign.

Isaiah also witnessed the fall of the kingdom of Israel, which, after flourishing anew under Jeroboam II., the contemporary of Uzziah, became the ducted the affairs of her kingdom with extraordinary prudence and power. By the capture of Granada, in 1492, she destroyed the power of the Moors, and henceforth took the title of queen of Spain. prey of successive usurpers, till, in the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign in Judah, it was completely subjugated by the Assyrians, and many of its inhabitants were carried into captivity.

The writings of Isaiah are distinguished amongst the inspired poems by their elevation and variety. Always clear, fresh and vivid, they are also marked by great energy, sublimity or tenderness, according to the nature of his subject. His descriptions are for the most part masterly outlines rather than elaborate pictures. A few words set before us the majesty of Jehovah, the absurdity of idol-worship and the fall of heathen powers. If the prophet enlarges upon any subject, it is the humiliation, the work and glory of the Messiah and the blessed results of His salvation. Whatever be the primary topic, it always leads him to these; and these are unfolded with such distinctness, adorned with so much beauty and dwelt upon with such delight that the fuller disclosures of the New Testament have only taught believers to prize more highly the earlier revelations of "the evangelical prophet."

ISAIAH, THE BOOK OF. Some parts of the book of Isaiah, especially ch. xl.-lxvi., have been attributed by some modern critics to an unknown author or authors who lived at a later period, near the end of the captivity in Babylon. It has been alleged that these portions are distinguished by Chaldaisms and other peculiarities of style from the genuine writings of Isaiah. In vindication of the genuineness of these passages it may be observed:

(1.) If there were many traces of Chaldee in the style, this would not be surprising, as it is evident that the public functionaries of Hezekiah's court were well acquainted with that language, 2 Ki. xviii. 26. But, in fact, only three Chaldaisms, or at most four, occur in the book, and all these are in the portions which are universally allowed to be Isaiah's. (2.) The alleged diversity of style is not greater than is often found to exist between the earlier and the later writings of the same author, or between those addressed at first to the ear and those intended only for the eye. On the other hand, a careful perusal of the whole will show that there is throughout an essential similarity in that energy and sublimity which have always been regarded as characteristic of Isaiah. In these respects the later chapters certainly are not inferior to the former. (3.) The book is referred to as one by our Lord and his apostles, who quote Isaiah more frequently than any other prophet, and expressly attribute to him passages from chapters i., vi., ix., x., xi., xxix., xl., xli., liii., lxi., lxx. These portions are included in the Septuagint version, which was made about 280 B. C. And it was "the book of the prophet Isaiah" which was delivered to our Lord in the synagogue at Nazareth when he opened it and read the passage which we find in ch. lxi. 1-3, Luke iv. 17. The unity of the book is also indicated by the regular arrangement of the whole as shown in the subjoined analysis. (4.) It is also to be remembered that almost all those critics who give to these portions a later date doubt or deny prophetic inspiration, of which these chapters contain the clearest evidence. No human sagacity could have foreseen in Isaiah's time the rise and fall of the Chaldean monarchy or the nation and name of its future conqueror. Those, therefore, who refuse to believe in true prophetic inspiration are under the necessity of ascribing these writings to a later period. But the theories of the objectors are at variance with each other, and the investigations which they have occasioned have resulted in establishing more firmly the genuineness of the disputed passages, and consequently the divine origin of the prophetic writings. Various opinions have been held respecting the arrangement of Isaiah's prophecies. It appears most probable that Isaiah, like Jeremiah, revised and collected the whole book, which seems to fall naturally into the following divisions:

I. CH. I.-VI.—Early discourses, chiefly of the prosperous but luxurious times of Uzziah and Jotham, denouncing the sins of the people, with some intimations of divine mercy. Ch. vi. is a kind of appendix, relating the prophet's call to more public work as the warrant for his threats and promises.

II. CH. VII.-XII.—Prophecies connected with the invasion of Judah by the combined forces of Israel and Syria, and the subsequent invasions of the Assyrians; comprising warnings to Ahaz against court-ing their alliance, and predictions of their devastating inroads and of the overthrow of their hosts, with cheering promises of a greater salvation.

III. CH. XIII.-XXIII.—Woes denounced against various nations which were hostile to God and his people. In these even Jerusalem and a high officer of the royal palace are included, ch. xxii., for they were deeply infected with the sins of the heathen.

IV. CH. XXIV.-XXVII.—A general view of all these divine dealings of judgment and mercy, showing their gracious purposes and results.

V. CH. XXVIII.-XXXV.—Prophecies, chiefly of the time of Hezekiah, denouncing the sins of Israel and Judah, but promising mercy, and turning the burden of woe upon their oppressors.

VI. CH. XXXVI.-XXXIX.—A narrative of Sennacherib's invasion and his overthrow, illustrating the foregoing prophecies; and another narrative of Hezekiah's vanity, and a consequent threatening of punishment, preparatory to the consolatory portion which follows.

VII. CH. XL.-LXVI.—A lengthened disclosure of God's purposes of mercy to his true Israel. This is one continuous prophecy, but it may be divided into three parts. (1.) Chapters xl.-l. contain a vindication of the Deity of Jehovah, who is about to manifest himself as the righteous Saviour of his people. (2.) Chapters li.-lvi. 8 announce and describe this manifestation in the Messiah and the glorious result of his work. (3.) Chapters lvi. 9-lxvi. exhibit more largely these results in the superiority of the Church of Christ over the ancient national Israel in its character, privileges and destinies.

This portion of Isaiah's prophecies was probably written after he had retired from public life. It appears to have been designed primarily to sustain the faith of God's people in the prospect of threatened chastisements and during their long endurance. Its great subject, the divine work of salvation by Christ, is always kept in view. It contains no circumstantial reference to the men and events of the prophet's days; and the predictions of the capture of Babylon and the desolation of Edom which occur in it must be regarded as only temporary and partial illustrations of the working out of its great plan. Even the promises which it holds out to the Jewish nation of restoration and prosperity are always used to carry the mind forward to the divine Messiah and his spiritual and everlasting kingdom. His coming is ever presented as the chief object of Israel's hope. For him, as Jehovah, the way is prepared, by proofs of his creative and upholding power, his prescience and faithfulness and his delivering grace. And though he comes in "the form of a servant," and as "a man of sorrows," yet his vicarious sufferings and expiatory death are to be the source of blessedness to the world and to the Church, and they shall be abundantly recompensed by the honor and joy of his mediatorial reign.

ISHBAK (ish'bak), one of the sons of Abraham by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chr. i. 32. Various conjectures have been started as to the locality of the tribe which may be supposed sprung from Ishbak, but no certainty can be as yet arrived at; the etymology would seem to allude to a wandering people.

ISHBI-BENOB (ish'bi-be'nob), one of the sons of the Philistine giant who thought to have slain David, but was killed by Abishai, 2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17.

ISH-BOSHETH (ish-bo'sheth), one of the sons, probably the youngest, of King Saul. He is called Esh-baal in 1 Chr. viii. 33; ix. 39, the adjunct Baal, a name of heathen worship, being here, as in some similar cases, interchanged with Bosheth, "shame." After the death of Saul and three of his sons upon Gilboa, when the state was in confusion, and many were looking to David, Abner carried Ish-bosheth across the Jordan and established him at Mahanaim. He was a man of no energy, but Abner's influence was great, and by degrees the greater part of the kingdom was brought to acknowledge Ish-bosheth's sovereignty, only the tribe of Judah adhering to David. And from this time of real submission to him his reign of two years is to be dated, 2 Sam. ii. 8-12, 15. There was war, however, between the two kingdoms; and at length the ambitious Abner, receiving an affront from Ish-bosheth, resolved to join David. This chief's assassination by Joab followed; and soon after, Ish-bosheth was murdered by two of his officers, who thought to obtain David's favor by it, but were by his order immediately executed, iii., iv.

A Hebrew term, entirely distinct from the foregoing, symbolically used, Hos. ii. 16, in opposition to the Canaanitish or heathen word Baali, the signification being the same, but in the last case an idolatrous notion was included.

ISHMAEL (ish'ma-el). 1. The son of Abraham by the Egyptian Hagar, servant of Sarah, whom her mistress, despairing of children herself, gave to her husband, Gen. xvi. 1-3. Before the birth of Ishmael, Hagar had fled from Sarah's severity, but was commanded by an angel to return and submit herself, and was assured that her son should be the progenitor of a numerous seed, that he should be bold and independent—this being the characteristic of his race—and should dwell in the presence of or before all his brethren, an expression indicating the localities to be occupied by his posterity close to kindred tribes. Hagar returned to Abraham's encampment, and Ishmael was born when his father was eighty-six.

At thirteen years of age Ishmael was circumcised, that rite being then undergone by Abraham and all his household as a seal of the covenant thus renewed. Abraham, in some doubt, it would seem, whether, after all, this son were not to be the heir of promise, prayed at the time, "Oh that Ishmael might live before thee!" He was assured, however, that though Ishmael should be the father of a great nation, yet the heir of promise should be a child to be born of Sarah, Gen. xvii. It was a great privilege, the being members of Abraham's family and included in Abraham's covenant, but Hagar and Ishmael were insensible of it. And when Isaac was weaned, and the feast of joy was held, Ishmael, now a grown lad of fifteen or sixteen, mocked. The guilt was obvious: both had insulted those who ought to have been to them objects of respect and veneration; Hagar despised Sarah; Ishmael sneered at Isaac; the former boasted of her conception, the latter of his primogeniture; the one forgot the dignity of a prophet's wife, the other the higher promises vouchsafed to her son. The result was that Hagar and Ishmael were expelled from the encampment; and, though Abraham, whose affection for his son was strong, had supplied Hagar with bread and water, yet the two were soon destitute in the wilderness. Ishmael, still but a boy, was at once ready to sink. But again there was a divine interposition, and the assurance was renewed that Ishmael should multiply into a nation. He grew, and became skillful in archery, dwelling in the wilderness of Paran. In due time his mother took him a wife from her own country, Egypt, Gen. xxi. Little more is recorded of him. He joined with his brother Isaac in burying their father, Gen. xxv. 9. He had twelve sons, the heads of tribes, and he died "in the presence of all his brethren," his descendants dwelling "from Havilah unto Shur that is before Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria," Gen. xxx. 12-19.

The descendants of Ishmael were mixed Arabian tribes, the purer Arabs boasting that they were the posterity of Joktan, or, as they call the name, Kah-tan. The proper settlements of the Ishmaelites were in the desert Arabia. They were therefore bounded in the east by Babylonia and the Euphrates, extended in the north to Syria, spread in the west to Coele-Syria and Palestine, and in the south indefinitely into the peninsula of Asia proper. They lived, therefore, regularly indeed "to the east" of their Abrahamic brethren, but they extended their predatory excursions to the borders of all contiguous countries: their erratic mode of life gave them the character of ubiquity; they wandered wherever their wild spirits incited them, and thus they might be said to be always "before their brethren." They restlessly strayed through the greater part of Arabia Petræa, and reached not unfrequently even the borders of Egypt. The predictions in regard to Ishmael have, indeed, been wonderfully fulfilled. The wide conquests of the Saracens and the mode of life of the modern Bedouins alike testify to the truth of the prophetic word. The Bedouins are literally "wild ass-men;" lawless, and despising the agricultural population, they live by plunder, their hand being lifted against every man. Nor have their habits, their mode of tent and desert life been changed for centuries; there they are, as described by every traveler, the living witness to the literal truth of the oracles of God.

2. One of the royal family of Judah, who treach-erously murdered Gedaliah, appointed governor after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, 2 Ki. xxv. 23, 25. Ishmael had with several followers joined Gedaliah. His base purposes were not unknown, for he had been tampered with by Baalis, king of the Ammonites, and Johanan warned Gedaliah against him. The governor, however, with generous but (as it proved) misplaced confidence, refused to credit Ishmael's treason. Accordingly, Ishmael had full opportunities of perpetrating the atrocious act. He associated ten men with him, murdered Gedaliah and various other Jews, kept the massacre for a while secret, imposed on eighty persons who were bringing offerings, killed all of them as they entered the residence but ten, who bought their lives by disclosing where certain stores were treasured, and then carried off the rest of the people with the princesses to go into the land of Ammon. Johanan, however, hastily collected forces, pursued Ishmael, overtook him "at the great waters," probably the pool of Gibeon, and rescued the tions of the war. The remarkable part of his life to us is the system of interpretation which he laid down and propounded to his disciples, in opposition to that of his contemporary, Rabbi Akiba, who maintained that every repetition, figure, parallelism, synonym, word, letter, particle, pleonasm—nay, the very shape—and every ornament of a letter or title, has a recondite meaning in the Scripture, "just as every fibre of a fly's wing or an ant's foot has its peculiar significance." Philo was of the same opinion, and so also was the Greek translator of Ecclesiastes in the Septuagint. Now, Rabbi Ishmael opposed this mode of interpretation, and maintained that the Bible, being written in human language, uses expressions in their common acceptation, that many of the repetitions and parallelisms are simply designed to render the style more rhetorical and powerful, and cannot, therefore, without violation of the laws of language, be adduced in support of legal deductions. Accordingly, he laid down thirteen exegetical rules which are called "the thirteen rules of Rabbi Ishmael,"

ISHMAEL BEN ELISA. This renowned rabbi was born about A. D. 60, in Upper Galilee. He was carried away a captive to Rome during the destruction of Jerusalem, when a child, and was afterward redeemed by Rabbi Joshua, who, when at the Eternal City to intercede with the emperor Domitian in behalf of his suffering brethren, heard of the imprisonment of this far-famed beautiful boy, and vowed that he would not quit Rome till he had redeemed him. Rabbi Ishmael afterward lived in Southern Judæa, not far from the Idumæan boundaries, where he occupied himself with the cultivation of the vine, and spent a large portion of his wealth in maintaining and fitting out young women who had been impoverished by the desola-by which alone, as he contends, the Scriptures are to be interpreted. He is also the reputed author of the celebrated Midrash or traditional commentary on Ex. xii.-xxiii. 20.

ISHTOB (ish'tob) occurs only at 2 Sam. x. 6, 8, where the several parties composing the great Syrian army that came against David are given. Nothing is known of Ishtob as a region of country, but Tob is mentioned in connection with the history of Jephthah, Jud. xi. 3, and the probability is that what is to be understood by Ishtob in the passage of Second Samuel is simply the people of that place or district.

ISHUI (ish'we), one of the sons of Saul, 1 Sam. xiv. 49. He is not elsewhere mentioned. Perhaps he was also called Abinadab, see 1 Chr. viii. 33, marg.

ISIDORE (is'e-do'r), or ISIDORUS (is-e-do'rus). 1. SAINT OF ALEXANDRIA, born about 318 in Egypt, led the life of a hermit in the wilderness of the Thebaid and the desert of Nitria until he was ordained priest by Arhanasius, who appointed him to the charge of a hospital, and from this he acquired the surname of THE HOSPITALLER. Isidore evinced his gratitude to his benefactor by earnestly defending his writings and his memory against the aspersions of the Arians. He was subsequently compelled to flee from Constantinople in consequence of having incurred the wrath of Theopolis, patriarch of Alexandria. He died in 403. The fifteenth of January is his day in the Greek calendar.

2. MERCATOR, sometimes called PECCATOR. His name is of great importance in Church history because of his supposed connection with the decretals usually designated the "Pseudo-Isidorian." His place of residence, and even his real name, are uncertain. The basis of his collection was that of Isidore of Seville, which was enlarged by a great number of forged decrees, and by writings which had been floating about in the South of Europe, and which had no real authority. It would appear that they must have been written in the South of France, for it was in that country that they were first circulated. The forged decretals must have been compiled early in the ninth century, for as early as A. D. 840 the capitularies of Benedict Levita contain extracts from them. In the sixteenth century they found their way into Spain, but they had little circulation in Germany and Italy. They have been used by Romish writers in establishing the supremacy of the pope over all other bishops, and for showing that his sovereignty over all Christendom was early recognized. Their true character is now fully known, and it may be expected that, among the number of learned antiquaries who delight in penetrating the mysteries of past ages, some one adequate to the task may be found to produce a history of these decretals, which will remove the clouds that for ages have hung over them.

3. OF MOSCOW, was born in the fourteenth century, at Thessalonica. He rose from being archimandrite of a convent in Constantinople, to be archbishop of Illyria, and finally he attained the rank of metropolitan bishop of Russia. He distinguished himself at the Council of Florence in 1439, at which one hundred of the Russian bishops and clergy attended, when the Greek and Romish Churches were united. Vasili the grand duke became furious at the conduct of Isidore, seized him, imprisoned him and condemned him to the flames, but he escaped to Rome, where Eugene IV. acknowledged him as a martyr. The union of the Churches by the Council of Florence was displeasing to the Easterns; and when it speedily came to an end, Isidore was sent to Constantinople to heal the breach, but in vain. He returned to Rome, where he died in 1463.

5. OF SEVILLE, or I. HISPALENSIS, an eminent ecclesiastic of the seventh century, was born about 570, at Carthage. In the year 600 or 601 he was made bishop of Seville. He presided at the second council of Seville, in 619, and at the council of Toledo held in the year 633. He died April 4, 636. For variety and extent of knowledge Isidore is entitled to rank among the most learned men of his time, and his numerous writings, which exhibit a marvelous degree of familiarity with almost every branch of learning then known, rendered important service to his country and age. Of his extant works those which relate to Biblical exegesis are—"Summary of the Old and New Testament," "Numbers which occur in Sacred Scripture," "Questions on the Old and New Testament," and "Mystical Expositions of the Old Testament." The latter work is constructed on the principle of finding a mystical meaning in exegetical writer, was born at Alexandria, about 370. He passed a large part of his life in monastic seclusion at Pelusium, and was greatly celebrated amongst his contemporaries, for the austerity of the discipline to which he subjected himself. He is styled presbyter by a writer of the sixth century, who says of him "that he wrote two thousand letters to the edification of the Church, as many persons well knew." Other writers speak of nine or ten thousand. Of the letters now extant, which are more than two thousand in number, a large proportion are devoted to the explanation of Scripture passages. From these it is evident, that Isidore enjoyed a high reputation as an expositor of Scripture, and that a large number of persons, amongst both the clergy and the laity, were in the habit of seeking from him the solution of their exegetical difficulties. As an expositor he follows in the steps of Chrysostom, of whom he was a warm admirer; and although not wholly free from the allegorizing tendencies of the time, he commonly bases his exposition upon a careful investigation of the grammatical sense.

the minutest details of the Scripture narrative. Thus, for instance, in the explanations of the work of creation, the gathering together of the salt waters is said to denote the punishment of unbelievers, by leaving them to the consequences of their unbelief, whilst the dry land represents the men who are thirsting after faith. The formation of man from the dust of the earth prefigures the birth of Christ from the seed of David, and the creation of Eve from the rib taken out of Adam's side, represents the origination of the Church from the blood which flowed from the side of the Saviour.

ISIS (i'ss), one of the chief deities of the Egyptian mythology. It is difficult, amid the mass of contradictory assertions, to ascertain the real origin and attributes of this divinity; for while the Egyptians themselves are said to have confined their worship chiefly to Isis and Osiris, the Greek and Latin writers, though differing widely in details, assert broadly that these two divinities included, under different names, the whole pagan mythology. By the Egyptians themselves Isis was regarded as the sister or sister-wife of Osiris, who united with her in the endeavor to polish and civilize their subjects, to teach them agriculture and several other necessary arts of life. Among the higher and more philosophical theologians she was the Pantheistic divinity, but by the people she was worshiped as the goddess of fecundity, and in her honor an annual festival was instituted which lasted seven days. The fables which account for her being recognized as the goddess of fruitfulness are remarkable for their wild and licentious character. They gave origin to the impure orgies which afterward characterized her worship, for in many places her rites became a mere cloak for sacerdotal licentiousness, which at length reached to such a pitch that they were prohibited at Rome. In order to banish them, Tiberius ordered the images of the goddess to be thrown into the Tiber, and the worship to cease in Rome for ever. Soon afterward the service was revived, and the abominations practiced afforded matter for the powerful pen of Juvenal, who denounced in no measured terms the vices of his day. The cow was sacred to Isis. She was usually represented as a woman with the horns of a cow, sometimes with the lotus on her head, and the sistrum or timbrel in her hand. Among the early Egyptians, Isis was a personification of the Nile valley, fecundated by Osiris, the god of the Nile; but in time, when Osiris became identified with the sun, Isis was viewed as the moon, the silver goddess of the night, and thus the imagination proceeded, recognizing her as the goddess of the lower world, the ruler of the sea and the divine power which is the source of life and the cause of all the phenomena in nature.

ISITES (is'ites), a sect of the Mohammedans who reject the doctrine that the Koran was eternal.

ISLE. The original word thus rendered has a wider meaning than our term isle or island. It is properly habitable ground, dry land, as contrasted with water, the sea, rivers, and thus it is used in Isa. xlii. 15. Hence it signifies sea-coast, either the shore of a continent or actually an island. Examples of its implying the coast of any country may be found in Isa. xx. 6; xxiii. 6; Ezek. xxvii. 7, "the isles of Elisha" being the coasts of Greece. But it is an island literally in Jer. ii. 10; xlvi. 4, marg.; Ezek. xxvii. 6; so too in Esth. x. 1, where there is an antithesis between islands and continent. In the plural the word occurs for maritime regions, especially beyond sea, that expression being sometimes added, Jer. xxv. 22; and so generally remote coasts and islands, Isa. xxiv. 15; xl. 15; etc.; particularly those of the Mediterranean, Ps. lxxii. 10; Dan. xi. 18. And these are sometimes specially called "the islands of the sea," Isa. xi. 11, "the isles of the Gentiles," Gen. x. 5; Zeph. ii. 11. In Ezek. xxvii. 15 the Indian archipelago is intended.

ISLIP (is'lip), SIMON, an English prelate of the fourteenth century. He was warmly attached to Wyckliffe, whom he held in the highest esteem, which he manifested by appointing him overseer of Canterbury College, Oxford, which he had founded and liberally endowed. He died in 1366.

ISMACHIAH (is-mak'yah), an overseer of the offerings under Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxxi. 13.

ISMAEL (is-ma'el). 1. 1 Esd. ix. 22. Ishmael, Ezra x. 22. 2. Jud. ii. 23. Ishmael the son of Abraham.

ISMAEL, HAJI, a renowned Mohammedan reformer, was born in the district of Delhi, September 11, 1781. He vigorously opposed the superstitious practices with which the Mohammedan worship in India had become tainted, and traveled through Turkey and Arabia, where he preached to large assemblages of the people and gained many followers.

ISMAIAH (is-ma'yah), a Gibeonite chief who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 4.

ISPAH (is'pah), a Benjamite chief, 1 Chr. viii. 16.

ISRAEL (is'ra-el). 1. The name given by the angel of God to Jacob, in commemoration of the conflict of faith which in deep humility and earnestness of soul he maintained with the heavenly messenger at Peniel, Gen. xxxii. 28. "Thy name," it was said to him, "shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel; for thou hast fought (so it should be rendered) with God and with men, and hast prevailed." See JACOB. 2. From Jacob, as the immediate head of the twelve tribes, or covenant people, the name of Israel became the common and distinctive appellation of the whole community. They were at once called the seed of Jacob, and the tribes or people of Israel. 3. After the unhappy division into two separate kingdoms in the time of Rehoboam, it was chiefly appropriated to the kingdom comprising the ten tribes, partly, perhaps, because this division formed considerably the larger portion of those who were entitled to the name, and partly because it might have been invidious to select from among the several tribes any less comprehensive appellation, while, on the other side, Judah formed so preponderating a part of those who adhered to the house of David that the kingdom of Judah became for that portion the fitting designation. 4. Notwithstanding this actual division, however, and the separation of Judah from Israel, the term Israel still remained the proper designation of the covenant people, and is often so used in the prophets; the twelve tribes of Israel still formed the ideal representation of the whole stock, 1 Ki. xviii. 30, 31; Ezra vi. 17; Jer. xxxi. 1, etc. Hence, also, in New Testament Scripture, Israel is applied to the true people of God whether of Gentile or of Jewish origin, Rom. ix. 6; Gal. vi. 16, etc.; it is comprehensive of the entire Church of the redeemed.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF. The separation of the Hebrew nation into two parts, of which one was to embrace ten of the tribes and be distinctively named Israel, had its origin in a rivalry which had long existed between the powerful and haughty Ephraimites and the imperial tribe of Judah, and which finally ripened into the revolt witnessed after the death of Solomon. As the territory of Judah lay to the south, while that of Ephraim occupied the centre, of Palestine, it was hardly to be expected that the house of Joseph would contentedly submit to the authority of a line of rulers of the tribe of Judah. With a view of conciliating the Ephraimites probably, the solemn inauguration of Rehoboam was to be in one of their chief cities—Shechem. But they were ready with their grievances to be redressed first, and they presented themselves under the ominous leadership of one of the house of Joseph, Jeroboam, whom even Solomon had feared, to demand satisfaction. And it was not merely political discontent which manifested itself. It is evident that there was religious alienation. Ephraim and the other tribes did not choose to be bound to worship at Jerusalem. Accordingly, on the disruption, Jeroboam appointed new feasts and home sanctuaries, and, as it would probably be thought, an unsectarian priesthood and mode of worship, 1 Ki. xii. Here was the great line of demarkation between the two states into which the nation was split, and likewise the principle of repulsion which forbade any future union. The priests and Levites and the more faithful servants of Jehovah poured from Israel into Judah, 2 Chr. xi. 13-16, while from Judah proceeded divine messages condemning the apostasy of Israel, 1 Ki. xiii. 1-3; and it was not till the downfall of Israel as a kingdom that there was again any national gathering of the tribes at the sacred feasts, 2 Chr. xxx.; xxxiv. 6, 7, 9; xxxv. 1-19. This, then, must never be lost sight of: the animating principle of this kingdom, that which bound its parts together, was its irreligion, its Baal-worship, its compliance with the customs of the nations round about, which effectually kept it in a state of antagonism to Judah, except when for a time, by a disastrous alliance and intermarriage of the house of Ahab with the house of David, solemnly rebuked by the Lord's prophets, 2 Chr. xix. 1-3; xx. 35-37, Israel had leavened Judah with its own evil. The theocracy, though with many imperfections and backslidings, was yet upheld in Judah; it was nationally lost in Israel, which was thus held up by the prophets as a warning to the southern more faithful state, Hos. iv. 15.

The Lord had promised to give his servant David a light always before him in Jerusalem, 1 Ki. xi. 36. Yet Judah was to be the smallest of the two kingdoms. Israel is called the ten tribes; and it would seem that at first all the tribes, save Judah and Benjamin, with the Levites, were included in it. But as Simeon's inheritance lay interspersed within that of Judah, and Dan's half overrun by the Philistines could be sheltered only by Judah, so ultimately it would seem that the northern kingdom comprised Asher, Naphtali, Zebulun, Issachar, Ephraim, western Manasseh, with the trans-Jordanic tribes of Reuben, Gad and eastern Manasseh, encroaching probably somewhat upon the Benjamitish territory. Its area has been estimated at 9375 square miles, and its population at about three millions and a half. Of David's empire much, as the Syrian districts, had been lost, but for a time Edom was still subject to Judah, and Moab to Israel.

Ki. xii. 25; afterward it would seem that Tirzah was the metropolis, xiv. 17; xv. 33; xvi. 8, 9, 15, 17, 18. Omri at length, seeing the necessity of some fortress-city for the seat of power, fixed upon the hill of Samaria. His choice was amply justified. Beautiful for situation, Samaria could be well defended. It was repeatedly besieged, but it held out against the Assyrian power for three years, 2 Ki. xvii. 5; while Jerusalem itself was reduced by Nebuchadnezzar in a year and a half, xxv. 1-3.

The dynasties of Israelitish kings were frequently broken. Jeroboam was succeeded by his son; and then there was a revolution. Baasha, the new king, was succeeded by his son; and then there was another revolution. Omri, after the destruction of one or two temporary princes, transmitted the sceptre to his descendants. His son and two grandsons reigned, lamentably distinguished as the maintainers of Baal-worship. Then Jehu quenched their line in blood, and his posterity sat upon the throne to the fourth generation. But they were disastrous times. Repeatedly the Syrian power imposed the most humbling terms on Israel. There was now and then a breathing-time, and victories were gained over Syria, but the monarchy was surely sinking, 1 Ki. xv. 20; xx. 1-4; 2 Ki. xiii. 3-7, 22-25; xiv. 25-28. Moab was lost, i. 1; and besides the pressure from Syria, the great Assyrian monarchy began to make its supremacy felt. There would seem, too, to have been intervals of anarchy; and, when, one after another, the few remaining sovereigns appeared, nearly all obtaining the crown by blood, it was over a circumscribed territory that they reigned; for the northern districts were overrun and the people carried into captivity, xv. 29, and the trans-Jordanic tribes, or those that remained of them, in like manner, 1 Chr. v. 26. And then at last, under Hoshea, in spite of the help he reckoned on from Egypt, Samaria fell, and multitudes of the people were transported into Assyria, their country being occupied by colonists from the East, 2 Ki. xvii. 6, 24. It was a mixed population that subsequently inhabited the land (see SAMARITANS); and though many individuals of the various tribes returned after the fall of Babylon with their Jewish brethren, yet nationally Israel no more existed, a just punishment having fallen on them for their repeated idolatries and sins. Verily, the way of transgressors is hard, and judgment must be executed on those who refuse to listen to the Lord's warning voice.

The following is a list of the kings of Israel; between each dynasty a line is drawn:

ISRAELITE, one of the nation of Israel, 2 Sam. xvii. 25; John i. 47; Rom. ix. 4; xi. 1; and feminine, Lev. xxiv. 10, 11. The word is sometimes used in a higher sense, as indicating the spiritual character which one so designated ought to bear, John i. 47.

ISSACHAR (is'sa-kar). 1. A son of Jacob and Leah who gave name to one of the tribes of Israel, Gen. xxx. 18; Num. xxvi. 25.

2. The tribe called after Issachar. Jacob, on his deathbed, speaking metaphorically of the character and destinies of his sons, or rather of the tribes which should spring from them, said, "Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens," Gen. xlix. 14, 15. Remembering the character of the ass in Eastern countries, we may be sure that this comparison was not intended in disparagement. Its true attributes are patience, gentleness, great capability of endurance, laborious exertion and a meek submission to authority. Issachar, therefore, the progenitor of a race singularly docile and distinguished for their patient industry, is exhibited under the similitude of the meekest and most laborious of quadrupeds. The descriptive character goes on: "And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute;" which seems to mean that, finding itself in possession of a most fertile portion of Palestine, the tribe devoted itself to the labors of agriculture, taking little interest in the public affairs of the nation. But although a decided preference of agricultural over commercial or military pursuits is here indicated, there seems no reason to conclude, as some gather from the last clause, that the tribe would be willing to purchase exemption from war by the payment of a heavy tribute. The words do not necessarily imply this, and there is no evidence that the tribe ever declined any military service to which it was called. On the contrary, it is specially commended by Deborah for the promptitude with which it presented itself in the war with Jabin, Jud. v. 15, and in the days of David honorable testimony is borne to its character, 1 Chr. xii. 32.

On quitting Egypt the tribe of Issachar numbered 54,400 adult males, which gave it the fifth numerical rank among the twelve tribes, Judah, Simeon, Zebulun and Dan being alone above it. In the wilderness it increased nearly 10,000, and then ranked as the third of the tribes, Judah and Dan only being more numerous, Num. i. 29; xxvi. 25. The territory of the tribe comprehended the whole of the plain of Esdraelon and the neighboring districts—the granary of Palestine. It was bounded on the east by the Jordan, on the west and south by Manasseh and on the north by Asher and Zebulun. It contained the towns of Megiddo, Taanach, Shunem, Jezreel and Bethshan, with the villages of Endor, Aphek and Ibleam, all historical names. The mountains of Tabor and Gilboa, and the valley of Jezreel, were in the territory of this tribe, and the course of the river Kishon lay through it.

3. A Levite porter, 1 Chr. xxvi. 5.

ISSHIAH (is-shi'ah). 1. A Levite descended from Moses 1 Chr. xxiv. 21. He is called Jeshaiiah in xxvi. 25. 2. A Kohathite Levite descended from Uziah, xxiv. 25. He is called Jesiah in xxiii. 20.

ITALIAN ART AND ARTISTS. The term art, employed in a general sense, comprehends all the products of the plastic and graphic arts. It is also extended to the orchestric, rhythmic and mimic arts, but in the present instance the arts of design are only to be considered. These are distinguished from each other in this, that sculpture or the plastic art places bodily before us the organic forms themselves, and that the other, the graphic art, merely produces, by means of light and shade, the appearance of bodies on a surface, inasmuch as the eye only perceives corporeal forms by means of light and shade.

Art had its origin in the East. The Egyptian monuments display an infantile state, when rude efforts were struggling to embody events, sacred and secular, by means of sculpture and painting. As among the Chinese perspective has never been understood, so among the Egyptians the representations of the human figure present the face in profile, with absurd forms for the different portions of the human body, and yet without any desire after caricature. In statuary, the Egyptians aimed at effects by magnitude, rather than by form and expression. In Babylon the same peculiarities existed, but there was a greater freedom of design and a nearer approach to nature than in Egypt. It was reserved for Greece to reach the summit of perfection in the plastic art, and among the Greeks art was a glory, and its practice sacred. To be an artist was to be a superior being, acknowledged and honored as such, as the "fine arts" were the vital breath of Greek life; and in reference to this Cicero says: "The Greeks enthusiastically admire statues, paintings and works of art; there is no calamity they are so little able to bear as the pillage of their temples and cities." The Romans, who conquered the world, had no absorbing love of art. It was a luxury, an ostentation, but not a sacred elimination of beauty, and as Roman influence extended art decayed.

From the night of barbarism which succeeded the fall of Rome the Church raised art. Christian emblems and sacred subjects were depicted by the earlier artists of the Greek Church, but the style was stiff in attitude, hard and ungraceful, and quite defective in anatomical principles; and it is a remarkable fact that while in the old Roman world a purely national school did not exist in Italy. Under the influence of the Church art revived, and all Europe felt the effect of the spirit which from age to age flowed forth from that land. It is to the schools of Florence and Rome that the world is indebted for the resuscitation of art. In the works of Giotto, Cimabue and Fra Angelico we see the revival of that purity of manner and gracefulness of thought which had slept among men so long. Michael Angelo in sculpture, and Raphael in painting, again claimed and obtained the assent of the world to the great principles of the creative powers which they wielded. Other artists, imbued with varied genius, appealed to the taste of men in other countries, and aided in its spread, until art again exerted a powerful influence in all civilized lands.

The Italian schools have generally been classified under the heads Florentine, Roman, Venetian and Lombard. The Florentine was divided into the "natural," the "poetic" and the "sculpturesque," having at their heads Botticelli, Paggi, Strozzi, Verocchio, Leonardo da Vinci and Michael Angelo. The Roman (into which the Bologna Romana merged) is the most important for its legitimate effect because of the delicacy of feeling which it displayed, and its masters were Raffaele (Raphael), Giulio Romano, Carlo Marrati and others. The Venetian school gloried in its color, and the magic pencil of Titian gave it a position which Giorgione and Sebastian del Piobino had but prepared for it. To these followed Tintoretto, Bordone, Paul Veronese, Bassano and others, who gave this school a European reputation. The Lombard school, at the head of which the Caracci stand, boasted of having adopted the "design" of the Roman, with the "color" of the Lombard and the "motion" and "shade" of the Venetian; and thus the "symmetry" of Raphael, the "power" of Michael Angelo, the "purity" of Correggio, the "truth" of Titian, the "solidity" of Tebaldi and the "grace" of Parmigiano were combined. When this school began to decline, it was resuscitated by the genius of Guido Reni, Guercino, Giardano and Poussin.

The German school originated with Albert Durer, who was followed by Van Leyden, Holbein, Mengs and others. The Flemish school dates from the Van Eycks, and its glories culminate in Rubens and Vandyke. Teniers is one of its chief ornaments, and he was followed by Steynwick, Spranger and Snyder. The Dutch school has been exceedingly prolific in the number of its masters. At its head stands Rembrandt, so celebrated for his marvelous power over light and shade; and to him may be added Ostade, Gerard Dow, Nicolas Maas, Paul Potter, Jan Steen and Wouverman. The Spanish school is characterized by a certain gloom and wildness, resulting from the national character; still, it had a close connection with the Italian school and the Flemish, because of the immigration of Flemish artists into Spain. Art in Spain has been divided into the schools of Valencia, Madrid and Seville, and the number of great names connected with them has been very great, among whom the most eminent are Antonio del Riñcon, Luis de Vargas, Morales, Cespedes, Pacheco, Velasquez, Zurbaran and Murillo. Until lately the French school was a branch of the Italian; and although the English school has of late years risen into importance, still the superiority of Italian masters has hitherto drawn students from England, Denmark and the United States, to the land which is acknowledged as the home of art. So also the great men of other lands, such as Thorwaldsen of Denmark and Powers of America, have been induced to settle either in Florence or Rome because of the influences which affect their studies and the patronage which they enjoy in the prosecution of their art.

ITALY (it'a-le), as used in the New Testament, denotes the same extent of country that it does in modern times; it comprehends the whole peninsula which reaches from the Alps to the Straits of Messina. The term was originally applied to only the more southerly portion of the region, but before the gospel era it was extended so as to embrace the whole. It but rarely occurs in New Testament Scripture, and only as a general designation, Acts xxvii. 1; Heb. xiii. 24.

ITCH, Dent. xxviii. 27. The original word embodies the idea of scraping or scratching; the disease intended was probably, therefore, some feverish cutaneous eruption.

ITTHAI (e'thi), one of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 31; he is called Ittai in 2 Sam. xxiii. 29.

ITHAMAR (ith-a'mar), fourth son of Aaron. He was consecrated to the priesthood along with his brothers, Ex. vi. 23; Num. iii. 2, 3. The property of the tabernacle was placed under his charge, Ex. xxxviii. 21, and he superintended all matters connected with its removal by the Levitical sections of Gershon and Merari, Num. iv. 23-33. Ithamar, with his descendants, occupied the position of common priests till the high-priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eli. Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed, was the last high-priest of that line, and the pontificate then reverted to the elder line of Eleazar in the person of Zadok, 1 Ki. ii. 27.

ITHAMAR, SAINT, was distinguished as being the first bishop of the see of Rochester, in England. When Augustine landed in the isle of Thanet, he began his labors at the place now known as Canterbury. In the reign of Ethelbert the cause of Christianity had advanced so far that a bishopric and a college of secular priests were established at Rochester. The church for the diocese was commenced in A. D. 600, and in four years it was finished. By the time of William the Conqueror, the cathedral had become dilapidated, and a new edifice was required. The church of Ithamar had been dedicated to St. Andrew, out of respect to the monastery at Rome from which St. Augustine came, and now, when it required to be re-edified, the work fell into the right hands. In 1077 Gundulf, of the royal abbey of Bec in Normandy, was consecrated to the see of Rochester by Lanfranc, the archbishop of Canterbury, and he forthwith undertook the task. Gundulf was more distinguished for energy and administrative capacity than for his learning. By the aid of Lanfranc, he raised funds which enabled him to enter on the erection of the present cathedral. Like most of the very ancient large ecclesiastical edifices, it is built in the form of a cross, with a massive square tower at the point of intersection. Usually the style is called Norman, but some critics prefer the title Lombard, as expressive of the place in which this style was matured, and this title is preferred, although a tower prevails in the English edifices, where an octagonal cupola is placed in the Lombard churches. Much as Gundulf did for his cathedral, it was not completed until 1130, when a magnificent ceremonial took place, with Henry I., the archbishop of Canterbury, eleven English and two Norman bishops and a great body of nobles among the number of the spectators. Strange to say, a fire broke out during the dedication, which seriously injured the new church and destroyed a part of the city. Many changes have been made in the lapse of time in different parts of the cathedral, and it suffered severely at the time of the Reformation at the hands of those who aimed at removing symbols of popery. The present building exhibits the styles of four distinct eras. The western front is a most perfect specimen of early Anglo-Norman; the central doorway, with its recessed semicircular arch, its pillars with rich capitals, is in the highest perfection of the style. Over this doorway, there is a magnificent window of the Perpendicular period. The easternmost arches of the nave and the western transept, are in the Pointed style. In the door of the chapter-house another style prevails; it is acknowledged to be one of the most beautiful specimens in England.

The size of the cathedral may be estimated by judging of the following measurements: The nave is 150 feet long by 75 feet wide; the choir is 156 feet long; the western transept is 122 feet, and the eastern 90 feet long. St. Ithamar, the first bishop, died A. D. 655, and his remains were enshrined in the new church by Bishop John about A. D. 1130. For a long time the priory contained a legend of his miracles.

ITHIEL (ith-e'el). 1. A Benjamite, Neh. xi. 7. 2. An unknown person to whom Agur delivered his discourse, Prov. xxx. 1.

ITHMAH (ith'mah), a Moabite, one of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 46.

ITHNAN (ith'nan), a city of Judah in the extreme south, Josh. xv. 23. Its site is unknown.

ITTRA (ith'ra), the father of Amasa, 2 Sam. xvii. 25. See JETHER.

ITHRAN (ith'ran). 1. One of the descendants of Seir the Horite, Gen. xxxvi. 26. 2. A chieftain of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 37. Possibly he is the same with Jether, 38.

ITHTHEAM (ith're-am), one of David's sons born at Hebron, 2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chr. iii. 3.

ITHRITE (ith'rite), the designation of two of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 38. The Ithrites are said to be one of the families of Kirjath-jearim, 1 Chr. ii. 53. They may have been the descendants of some one named Jether, or possibly from Jathir.

ITINERANCY (i-tin'e-ran-se), one of the distinguishing features of the Methodist denomination. The system was very early introduced by Wesley, who established circuits throughout England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, with a preacher to each, whose appointments were generally about thirty for each month. The system as originally established is still in operation in England and in the sparsely settled districts of our own country.

ITTAH-KAZIN (it'tah-ka'tseen), a border town of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 13.

ITTAI (it'ti). 1. The Gittite, usually regarded as a native of Gath and a Philistine, commander of David's body-guard of Gittites. We first meet with him, 2 Sam. xv. 19, when, during the rebellion of Absalom, David, at a distance from Jerusalem, took up a position to review his servants and his troops as they passed before him. Among those who passed were the Cherethites and the Pelethites and the Gittites, who had followed the king from Gath, and of whom Ittai seems to have been the leader. "And David said to Ittai the Gittite, Wherefore goest thou also with us? Return to thy place," etc. But Ittai nobly resolved to abide with the king in life or death, so he passed over before the king with all his men and his little ones, 19-22. In the battle which ensued David appointed him commander of a third part of his army, co-ordinate in authority with Joab and Abishai. After this we, apparently at least, hear no more of him in Bible history. 2. A Benjamite warrior, 2 Sam. xxxiii. 29, called also Ithai, 1 Chr. xi. 31.

ITUREA (it-oo-re'a), a district on the north of Palestine which along with Trachonitis formed the tetrarchy of Herod Philip, Luke iii. 1. Its limits are not very exactly defined, but there can be no doubt it stretched from the base of Mount Hermon toward the north-east, between Damascus and the northern part of the country anciently called Bashan, including perhaps a little of the latter. It is supposed to have derived its name from Jetur, one of the sons of Ishmael, 1 Chr. i. 31; and Jetur, along with the Hagarites and some others in the same region, were among the tribes with whom the men of Reuben, Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh had to make war. The war was successfully waged by these parties, and the children of Manasseh dwelt in the land, and spread from Bashan unto Baal-hermon and Seir, and unto Mount Hermon, 1 Chr. v. 23. Little comparatively is known of the region as it existed in ancient times, or of the changes through which it passed; but a portion of the Ishmaelite race appear to have still held their ground in it, for the Itureans were noted in subsequent times for the usual Arab propensities, and required to have strong measures taken with them. Before the Christian era the district had fallen into the hands of the Romans, and formed part of the extensive domains given to Herod. By him it was destined to his son Philip, and the arrangement was confirmed by the Roman emperor.

ITZCHAKI, SOLOMON. See RASHI.

IVAH (iv'vah), a city in Babylonia, mentioned as having been subdued in spite of its gods by the Assyrian power, 2 Ki. xviii. 34; xix. 13; Isa. xxxvii. 13. It appears to be the same with Ava, from which colonists were brought into Samaria, 2 Ki. xvii. 24. It was very probably the modern Hit, lying on the Euphrates, and noted for bitumen springs. Perhaps Ivah may be the Ahava of Ezra, Ezra viii. 15, 21, 31.

IVES (ivz), LEVI SILLIMAN, D.D., LL.D., a theologian, formerly of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who afterward went over to Romanism, was born September 16, 1797, at Meriden, Connecticut. He pursued his studies at Hamilton College, and received his final preparation for the ministry in New York city, under the direction of Bishop Hobart. He began preaching in Batavia, New York, and shortly after removed to Philadelphia, where he was ordained by Bishop White, and became rector of Trinity Church. Thence he removed to Lancaster, and then to New York city, where he was first assistant rector of Christ Church and then rector of St. Luke's. From 1831 to 1852 he was bishop of North Carolina, where he was at first very popular, but he lost his influence through the advocacy of doctrines contrary to the spirit of Protestantism; and in the latter year, while in Europe, he publicly avowed his adhesion to the Romish Church. After his defection he held the chair of rhetoric in St. Joseph's Theological Seminary, and founded an asylum for destitute children at Manhattanville. He published "The Trials of a Mind in its Progress to Catholicism" and two volumes of sermons. He died October 13, 1867.

IVIMEY (iv'e-me), Joseph, born in 1773, was a Baptist minister of London, where he preached for twenty-nine years. He is best known by his "History of the English Baptists," which has been warmly praised for the excellence of its historical information and the felicity of its style. He also wrote "The Life of John Bunyan," which was long held in high repute as a standard authority. He died in 1834.

IVO (e'vc), a prelate of the eleventh century, studied theology in the convent of Bec. He achieved high renown as a theologian, and in 1090 was made bishop of Chartres, in which position he exerted a powerful influence by his moderation no less than by his great learning. He died in 1115.

IVORY (i'vo-re) is the substance of the tusks of the elephant, 1 Ki. x. 22; and we find it mentioned as an article of Tyrian commerce, Ezek. xxvii. 15. It was largely used in ornamental work, Rev. xviii. 12. Solomon had a throne of ivory overlaid with gold, 1 Ki. x. 18. Ahab is said to have made an ivory house, xxii. 39, probably a palace, of which the walls were inlaid with ivory, comp. Ps. xv. 8, though perhaps in this last-named place ivory perfume boxes may be intended. Beds or couches were also inlaid with this material, Amos vi. 4; and many specimens yet preserved of Assyrian and Egyptian ivory work sufficiently show the uses to which it was put.

IYAR (e'yar) is the late name of that month which was the second of the sacred, and the seventh of the civil, year of the Jews, and which began with the new moon of May. The few memorable days in it are the tenth, as a fast for the death of Eli; the fourteenth, as the second or lesser Passover, for those whom uncleanness or absence prevented from celebrating the feast in Nisan, Num. ix. 11; the twenty-third, as a feast instituted by Simon the Maccabee in memory of his taking the citadel Aera in Jerusalem, 1 Macc. xiii. 51, 52; the twenty-eighth, as a fast for the death of Samuel. The name Iyar does not occur in the Old Testament, this month being always described as the second month, except in four places in which it is called Ziv, 1 Ki. vi. 1, 37; Dan. ii. 31; iv. 33.

IZEBEL (iz'e-bel), 1 Ki. xviii. 4, marg., Jezebel.

IZEHAR (its'e-har), Num. iii. 19. See IZHAR, of which name it is another form.

IZEHARITES (its-e-har'ites), Num. iii. 27. See IZHARITES.

IZHAR (its'har), one of the sons of Kohath and grandson of Levi, Ex. vi. 18, 21; Num. xvi. 1; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18, 38; xxiii. 12, 18. But in vi. 22 Amminadab is substituted for Izhar. This may be the error of a copyist.

IZHARITES (its'har-ites), a Levitical family descended from Izhar, 1 Chr. xxiv. 22; xxvi. 23, 29.

IZRAHLAH (iz-rah'yah), a chieftain of Issachar, 1 Chr. vii. 3.

IZRAHITE (iz-ra'hite). Shamhuth, one of David's military officers, is thus designated, 1 Chr. xxvii. 8. Perhaps it is for ZERAHITE or ZARHITE, which see.

IZRI (its're), the head of a division of singers, 1 Chr. xxv. 11. He is also called Zer, 3.

J.

J and I. There is no distinction between these letters in Hebrew. It is the same letter, only in the one case placed before a consonant, and in the other before a vowel. In the latter case the proper pronunciation is that of the English Y, not J.

JAAKAN (ja'a-kan), Deut. x. 6. See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN. The name is the same with that given as Jakan in 1 Chr. i. 42.

JAAKOBAB (ja-a-ko'ba), a chieftain of Simeon, 1 Chr. iv. 36.

JAALA, JAALAH (ja'a-la), one of Solomon's servants, whose descendants returned from the captivity, Ezra ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58.

JAALAM (ja'lam), one of Esau's sons, a chief or "duke" of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. i. 35.

JAANAI (ja'ni), a chieftain of Gad, 1 Chr. v. 12.

JAARE-OREGIM (ja'a-re-o're-gim), the name, according to 2 Sam. xxi. 19, of the father of Elhanan, who slew the brother of Goliath, but the text is understood to have suffered corruption. See JAIR, which appears to be the correct name.

JAASAU (ja'a-saw), one who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 37.

JAASIEL (ja-a-se'el), the son of Abner, a chief of the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Chr. xxvii. 21.

JAAZANIAH (ja-a-zan'yah). 1. One of the captains who, with Johanan, joined Gedaliah at Mizpah, 2 Ki. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8, where he is called Jezaniah. He most probably aided in recovering those whom Ishmael carried off after the murder of Gedaliah, and with them went down to Egypt, Jer. xli. 11-18; xlii. 1. In Jer. xliii. 2 he is called Azariah. 2. A Rechabite, probably chief of the tribe, Jer. xxxv. 3. 3. One whom Ezekiel saw, with seventy elders, worshipping abominable idols, Ezek. viii. 11. 4. One of the princes of the people against whom Ezekiel was directed to prophesy, Ezek. xi. 1.

JAAZER (ja'a-zer), often also written JAZER, a town in Gilead taken from the Amorites, and in the territory which was assigned to Gad, Num. xx. 32; xxxii. 3, 35; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5. It became one of the cities of the Levites, Josh. xxi. 37. It is mentioned in connection with good pastures, and also with the cultivation of the vine, Num. xxxii. 1; Isa. xvi. 8, 9. In the ancient Onomasticon of Eusebius the site is placed at the distance of fifteen Roman miles from Heshbon, and ten from Philadelphia, to the west. Modern research has as yet thrown no certain light upon this subject.

JAAZIAH (ja-a-ze'ah), a Levite of the family of Merari, 1 Chr. xxiv. 26, 27.

JAAZIEL (ja-a-ze'el), a Levite of the second order of those who had charge of the music in the temple service in the time of David, 1 Chr. xv. 18; called Aziel in ver. 20, and Jeiel in xvi. 5.

JABAL (ja'bal), the son of Lamech, of the line of Cain, described as "the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle," Gen. iv. 20. He probably led a nomad or migratory life.

JABBOK (jab'bok), a brook which traverses in a western course the land of Gilead, and empties itself into the Jordan about halfway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. It bounded the kingdom of Sihon on the north, as Arnon did on the south, hence the children of Israel are said to have possessed his land "from Arnon unto Jab-bok," Num. xxi. 24. Various streams run into the Jabbok on its course, but most of these are only mountain-torrents, flowing in winter, dry in summer; at its confluence with the Jordan the Jabbok itself never ceases to flow, and in the rainy season is often a considerable river. It was beside this brook, and near one of its fords, that the memorable scene lay of Jacob's wrestling with the angel of the Lord, in connection with which his name was changed into Israel, Gen. xxxv. 22-30.

THE JABBOK.—See JABBOK and JACOB.

JABESH (ja'besh). 1. The father of Shallum, one of the kings of Israel, 2 Ki. xv. 10, 13, 14. 2. A town generally called JABESH-GILEAD, seated on a mountain east of the Jordan. The inhabitants seem to have been an independent race. They would not join in the crusade against Benjamin, and for this the whole male population were devoted to destruction, Jud. xxi. 8-14. Yet Jabesh survived and recovered its importance. And when it was besieged by Nahash, king of Ammon, the Israelites rose under Saul to rescue it, 1 Sam. xi. 1-11. Gratefully did the people of Jabesh remember and requite the kindness Saul had shown them. A bold troop stole down by night and took the bodies of Saul and his sons from the walls of Bethshan, where, after the fatal field of Gilboa, they were exposed, and buried them with tokens of great reverence and sympathy, 1 Sam. xxxi. 11-13; 1 Chr. x. 11, 12—a service which David thankfully acknowledged, 2 Sam. ii. 4-6, though he afterward removed the bones to the sepulchre of Kish, 2 Sam. xxi. 12-14. The ruin el-Deir, on the south of Wady Yabes, is supposed to mark the site of Jabesh-gilead.

JABEZ (ja'bets). A town in the tribe of Judah, said to be occupied by scribes, 1 Chr. ii. 55. As it is mentioned in connection with Salma, who is called the father of Bethlehem, ver. 51, and is also associated with the Kenites, the probability is that it lay somewhere in the South of Judah, and at no great distance from Bethlehem. But nothing of a definite kind is known of it. 2. A person named among the posterity of Judah, remarkable for his prayer and for the gracious answer to it, 1 Chr. iv. 9, 10.

JABIN (ja'bin). 1. A king of Hazor who headed a confederacy of northern chiefs against Joshua, by whom he was defeated and afterward slain, Josh. xi. 1-13; xii. 19. 2. Another king, of Canaan he is called, into whose hands for twenty years the Israelites were delivered for their sins. Hazor was likewise the residence of the second Jabin. Sisera was the captain of his host, over which a mighty victory was gained by Deborah and Barak, and Jabin was destroyed, Jud. iv.; Ps. lxxxiii. 9.

JABINEAU (zha-be-no'), HENRY, a French theologian, was born in the early part of the eighteenth century at Etampes, and pursued his collegiate course at Paris. He declined subscribing the formulary submitted to candidates for orders, but in deference to his superior attainments he was admitted to the priesthood without the customary obligation. He was professor, and afterward rector, at the Vitry-le-Français College, which he left for the pulpit, but he was more than once interdicted on account of the latitude of his views. He subsequently adopted the legal profession, and during the French revolution bitterly denounced the Romish clergy. He died in 1792. He published "Jurisdiction of the Temporal Power relative to the Erection and Suppression of Episcopal Sees."

JABLONSKI (ya'blon-ske), DANIEL ERNST, an eminent theologian, was born in 1660, at Nassenhuben, near Danzig. Having acquired his first instruction at the gymnasium of Lissa, he went to the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. In 1668 he set out for a tour to the universities and libraries of Holland and England, and remained for a considerable time at Oxford. At his return he was appointed preacher at Magdeburg, and was afterward rector of the gymnasium at Lissa. In 1690 he was made court preacher at Konigsberg, and in 1693 preacher to the king at Berlin. He died in 1741. His chief work is an edition of the Hebrew Bible. His son, PAUL ERNST, was born in Berlin, 1692. Having completed his preliminary studies at the Joachimsthal gymnasium at Berlin, he applied himself at the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, whither he went in 1714, to theology and linguistic studies, chiefly Coptic, in which La Croze was his instructor. In 1720 he was appointed preacher at Liebenberg, but in the very next year the chair of philosophy was offered to him at the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. In 1722 he was elected professor of theology, and afterward member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin. He died in 1757. Although he had a singular aversion to print any of his writings, yet more than fifty independent smaller or larger works are extant. The following are the most important: "Treatise on Nestorianism," "Pantheon of the Egyptians; or, Disquisition on their Deities, with an Introduction to Egyptian Religion and Theology." Jablonski's principal work, and one which will for all time ensure him the high respect of the learned, is his "Institutes of Ancient Christian History."

JABNEEL (jab'ne-el). 1. A town on the border of Judah, Josh. xv. 11. It appears afterward to have been occupied by the Philistines, for under the name of Jabneh it was one of the places which Uzziah dismantled, 2 Chr. xxvi. 6. It was known as Jamnia in Maccabæan history, 1 Macc. iv. 15, and was noted as a school of learning after the fall of Jerusalem. Here, according to Jewish tradition, Gamaliel was buried. The modern name is Yebna, on a hill two miles from the sea and eleven south of Jaffa. It contains about 3000 people, all agriculturists, with threshing-floors ranged all round the town. 2. A city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33. It may have been identical with the village Jamnia, which Josephus fortified during the Jewish wars, but its site is unknown.

JABNEH. See JABNEEL.

JACHAN (ja'kan), a chieftain of Gad, 1 Chr. v. 13.

JACHIN (ja'kin). 1. The fourth son of Simeon, Gen. xlv. 10; Ex. vi. 15; Num. xxvi. 12. He is also called Jarib, 1 Chr. iv. 24. 2. A priest after the captivity, ix. 10; Neh. xi. 10. 3. The head of one of the courses of priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 17. Perhaps the name No. 2 means the representative of this course.

JACHIN, one of the columns set up in or before the porch of Solomon's temple, 1 Ki. vii. 21; 2 Chr. iii. 17. It was on the right hand—that is, to the south, 1 Ki. vii. 39. See BOAZ, TEMPLE.

JACHINITES (jak'in-ites), the family descended from Jachin, son of Simeon, Num. xxvi. 12.

JACINTH (ja'sinth), or HYACINTH, properly a flower of a deep purple or reddish blue. In our English Bible it occurs only once in this sense, Rev. ix. 17, and once as indicating one of the gems that form the foundations of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 20. The Septuagint has given this as its rendering of leshem, Ex. xxviii. 19, one of the stones in the high-priest's breastplate, for which our translators, following the Vulgate, have preferred jacinth. The jacinth stone was of various colors, from white or pale green to purple red. Pliny speaks of it as shining with a golden color, and in much favor as an amulet or charm against the plague. It is related to the zircon of mineralogists.

JACKSON (jak'sun), ARTHUR, an eminent English nonconformist divine. He was born in JACOB'S PRAYER.

1593, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, became preacher and rector of St. Michael's, in Wood Street, London. He next received the rectory of St. Faith, but in 1662 he was ejected along with the other Puritans. His writings are of an exegetical character, and are still sought after on account of their sterling merit. He died in 1666.

JACKSON, JOHN, a chronologist and controversial writer, was born at Lensey, Yorkshire, in 1686, was educated at Jesus' College, Cambridge, and became rector of Rossington. In 1704 he commenced his controversial writings by a treatise in defence of Dr. Samuel Clarke. His Arian opinions prevented him from receiving the M.A. degree at Cambridge, but he obtained the confraternity of Wigston's Hospital, in Leicester, of which he became master in 1729. He was the author of numerous controversial works, but his chief work was his "Chronological Antiquities," and left behind him the character of a learned and sincere writer, though strongly tinctured with the faults of a violent polemic. He died in 1763.

JACKSON, SAMUEL, was one of the most influential of the great leaders of English Wesleyanism at the close of the last and the beginning of the present century. His influence was chiefly exerted among the young, and he became the great instrument in the divine Hand of awakening great multitudes in their early years and leading them to a solemn and determined choice of eternal things. In fact, his whole life was given to this great cause, for which he seemed to live. His preaching was characterized by simplicity and intense feeling and earnestness.

JACKSON, THOMAS, D.D., was born at Witton, Durham, in 1579. A very learned divine. He was a scholar and probation Fellow, and afterward president, of Corpus Christi College, chaplain to Charles I., and finally dean of Peterborough. He left a number of works, the chief one being "Commentaries on the Apostles' Creed." He died in 1640.

JACKSON, WILLIAM, a most effective minister of the Reformed Dutch Church, was born in 1732. His preliminary theological education was conducted under the direction of Rev. John Frelinghuysen, and at the united call of the church at Bergen, New Jersey, and that on Staten Island, he went to Holland to complete his preparation for the ministry. He was there ordained by the classis of Amsterdam; and returning after an absence of more than four years, he took joint charge of both congregations. His pastorate, which continued for thirty-two years, was a period of marked blessing and prosperity. As a pulpit orator he was widely popular, and the fame of his eloquence attracted throngs from all parts of the surrounding country. In 1789 the malady of insanity seized him and put an end to the usefulness of his career. He died in 1813.

JACKSON, WILLIAM, an English divine who rose to be bishop of Oxford. He was born in 1750. He was educated in Oxford, was made preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He became canon of Christ Church, his own college at Oxford, and professor of Greek in the university, after which he was raised to the episcopal see. He died in 1815.

JACKSON, WILLIAM, D.D., a Congregational minister of New England, who was born in 1768. He was educated at Dartmouth College. He studied theology under Drs. Emmons and Spring, and in 1793 he was licensed to preach. In 1796 he was ordained, and settled at Dorset, Vermont; and though his health continued to be feeble, he held the charge along with an assistant until his death, in 1842. The college of Middlebury, of which he was a trustee, conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity.

JACOB (ja'kob), "heel-catcher," "supplanter." 1. The second of the twin sons of Isaac and Rebekah, born when their father was sixty years old, Gen. xxv. 26.

As the brothers grew up the difference of their characters was soon manifested. Esau was "a man of the field;" Jacob was "a plain man, dwelling in tents," Gen. xxv. 27. Esau was the chief favorite of his father, but "Rebekah loved Jacob."

Jacob was quiet, fearful and submissive to those who had acquired an influence over him, but selfish and not scrupulous as to the means by which he gained anything he desired. The first action of his mentioned in Scripture does not tell well for him. Esau had come in faint from hunting, and Jacob would give him his pottage only on condition that Esau resigned to him the birth-right. The reckless hunter, perhaps without much thought, agreed to the bargain, and so Jacob purchased that chiefship of the tribe, Gen. xxv.

to Padan-aram, which Isaac, ignorant of Esau's threats, sanctioned also, in order that Jacob might marry with his own kindred, and not imitate his brother by taking a wife of the daughters of Canaan. On his solitary journey Jacob was favored with a divine vision at a place to which he gave in consequence the name of Bethel; and here, perhaps for the first time, his heart was lifted above mere worldly thoughts, and he took and acknowledged the Lord for his God, Gen. xxviii.

His subsequent history at Padan-aram may be dan-aram is generally estimated at twenty years, and then he must have been seventy-eight when he left his father's house. But it has been imagined by some critics that in Gen. xxxi. 38, 41, he speaks of two different terms of twenty years each; if this be so, he was fifty-eight when he went to Padan-aram and ninety-eight when he left that country. After Laban's departure, Jacob had a fresh fear; his brother Esau might avenge himself for the ancient grudge. Jacob therefore sends him a humble message, and beseeches the Lord's pro-

29-34, involving temporal and spiritual pre-eminence, which indeed it had been said before the children's birth should belong to the younger, but which God could and would have given to Jacob of his own gracious pleasure, without the intervention of any questionable expedient. Jacob's next recorded conduct is still more to be censured. At the instigation of his mother he obtained his father's blessing by deceit; Isaac, however, confirmed it to him even after he became sensible how he had been imposed on, Gen. xxvii. But it was necessary now for Jacob to flee from his brother Esau's vengeance; and Rebekah desired him to go read in the later chapters of Genesis—his love for Rachel, his servitude of seven years for her hand, the cruel deception practiced on him, his taking both Leah and Rachel for wives, the birth of his eleven sons and one daughter by these wives and their dotal slaves, his continued service with Laban, and the means, evincing probably some of the old craft of his natural character, by which he became rich, till his departure, unknown to Laban, for the land of Canaan. Laban pursued him in anger, but was forbidden by a divine warning to do Jacob any harm, and the two parted with a friendly covenant. The time Jacob spent in Pa-tection in a prayer, almost the first recorded in Scripture, which may well serve as a model for all special supplications. He had a gracious answer; and in a visible manifestation of the Deity he was assured that he had power with God to prevail; and a new covenant name, Israel (warrior or soldier of God), was bestowed upon him, to be the appellation of his seed for ever, the name of blessing which was to designate God's Church through countless generations, Gen. xxxii. The brothers met in peace, and Jacob re-entered Canaan.

Here peculiar trials awaited him. Benjamin was born, but Rachel died; the ill-conduct of his sons alarmed and distressed him; Joseph his darling was lost, and the aged patriarch was sorely chastened, the trial touching him in his tenderest part. Though, as we have seen, naturally selfish, he loved warmly where he did love—Rachel, Joseph, Benjamin. The first two were taken from him, and in the famine, when he must send down for food to Egypt, Benjamin was demanded. We cannot wonder that his faith wellnigh failed: "All these things," he cried, "are against me." Yet God was chastening him in mercy, purging out his dross. Jacob had no doubt experienced this when in his deep sorrow for Rachel he had changed the infant's name from Benoni to Benjamin, from a memorial of grief to a name of strength, a name of gladness and of power, Gen. xxxv. With his sorrows he had doubtless their divine consolation. And yet more, his long-lost Joseph was discovered to be the lord of Egypt; and the patriarch the Church created much enmity amongst the clergy; and resigning his bishopric, he retired to a monastery in Toledo, where he devoted himself to Syriac studies and made many valuable annotations to the Syriac version of the Old Testament. He died in 708.

2. OF HUNGARY, a fanatical adventurer. Very little is known of his history till 1251, when he placed himself at the head of a mob of fanatics called "pastoureux," who, under the pretext of avenging and delivering King St. John, then a captive at Cæsarea, committed many frightful excesses. He was gifted with a singularly persuasive eloquence, under the influence of which the lower orders of the people flocked around him to the number of thousands, and followed him in their infatuation, as he traveled through the provinces from Flanders to Paris. Arriving at Paris, he divided his forces, then numbering one hundred

4. OF MIES, a noted theologian and controversialist, was born toward the close of the fourteenth century, at Nisa, in Bohemia. After graduating at Prague, he was appointed priest at Trina and afterward at Prague. He is best known by his strong opposition to the Romish usage in the administration of the eucharist, and defended his views in a work entitled "Proof by Scripture Testimony of the Necessity of Administering the Sacrament to the Laity," to which various replies were made. In his own church he departed from the prevailing custom, and administered the cup to the people, for which he was excommunicated; notwithstanding which he retained possession of his parish, and was encouraged by the approbation of the people no less than by that of John Huss, in whom he found an ardent adherent of his views. He died August 9, 1429.

5. OF VITRY, a French prelate of the twelfth century. He commended himself to the favor of the pope by preaching against the Albigenses; and after the capture of Acre from the Saracens he was elected bishop of that diocese, whither he went at the special request of Honorius III. While there he nobly cared for the children of the conquered Saracens, and having baptized them, placed them in charge of pious women. In 1225 he resigned his bishopric, and in 1229 he was honored by Gregory IX. with the appointment of cardinal and papal legate of France, Brabant and the Holy Land. His chief literary production is "Oriental History," a work chiefly ecclesiastical, most of the materials for which were collected during his sojourn in the Holy Land. He died in 1240.

6. DE VORAGINE (vo-raj'-ine), a provincial of the order of preaching friars and afterward archbishop of Genoa, was born in 1230, at Viraggio, near Genoa, and died in 1298. He is chiefly known as the author of "Sacred Legends," or "Golden Legends," a collection of fabulous biographies of saints and martyrs. Not only are many of them mere inventions, but they are utterly lacking in the poetic qualities which render this class of works attractive.

JACOB BEN ASHERI BEN JECHIEL BEN URI BEN ELIAKIM BEN JEHUDAH, also called "BAAL HA-TURIM," after his celebrated ritual work, was born in Germany about 1280. At the age of eighteen he was an eye-witness to the fearful massacres of his brethren which began at Röttingen, April 20, 1298, under the leadership of Rindfleisch, and spread over Bavaria, France and Austria, when upward of one hundred and twenty Jewish communities, numbering more than one hundred thousand souls, were slaughtered in less than six months. He felt it unsafe to remain in Germany, and hence emigrated in the year 1303, with his renowned father, his mother and seven brothers, and settled at Toledo, in Spain, in 1305. Here he entered upon his literary labors under most straitened pecuniary circumstances, and published—(1) "A Commentary on the Pentateuch," the basis of and his household went down thither, to be kept under God's shelter till his posterity grew into a nation. He saw and blessed Joseph's sons; and having predicted the fortunes of the tribes, he died in peace at one hundred and forty-seven years of age, his body being carried into Canaan, to hold it (with the bones of Abraham and Isaac) in pledge, till in the fullness of the time his seed should come to possess it for their pleasant heritage, Gen. xlii., xlv.-1.

In after days and in later books of Scripture, Jacob's name is mentioned with honor, as one that had the promises, the selfish supplanter mercifully pardoned and sanctified and made a venerated head of God's people.

2. The father of Joseph, the Virgin Mary's husband, Matt. i. 15, 16.

JACOB. 1. OF EDESSA, an eminent Syrian theologian of the seventh century, became bishop of Edessa in 651, but the violence of his zeal for thousand, into smaller bands, which were despatched to various points. Their stay in France was marked by frightful atrocities; priests and monks were brutally murdered wherever they could be found, and it finally became necessary to resort to force of arms to stop their high-handed proceedings. Jacob himself, while in the capitol one day, was seized in the midst of his followers while in the act of preaching, and instantly executed.

3. OF JÜTERBOCK, one of the earliest advocates of reform in the Church, and who may justly be regarded as a forerunner of Luther, was born about 1333, at Jüterbock. In early life he joined the Cistercian order, but soon became disgusted with the vices of his fellow-monks. He afterward became a Carthusian, removed to Erfurt, and was prior of the monastery at that place. He vigorously combated the doctrine of papal infallibility, and strongly urged a thorough reform in the Church, from the pope down throughout the whole clergy. He died in 1445.

which is Nachmanide's exposition. Such was the extraordinary popularity of the Gematrical portions of this commentary that they were detached from the exegetical part and printed repeatedly in a separate form, and also in five editions of the Bible between 1595 and 1653, and in no less than twenty different editions of the Pentateuch between the years 1566 and 1804; and (2) the celebrated religious code, consisting of four parts or rows, respectively denominated "The Way of Life," "The Teacher of Knowledge," "The Stone of Help" and "The Breastplate of Justice," which treats on the ritual, moral, matrimonial, civil and social observances of the Jews. This remarkable work soon became the text-book of the Jewish rabbins throughout the world, and is indispensable to the formation of a correct knowledge of the manners and customs of this ancient people. Jacob ben Asheri died in 1340.

JACOB BEN CHAJIM BEN ISAAC IBN ADONIA, the celebrated editor of Bomberg's Rabbinic Bible, was born at Tunis, about 1470. When about forty years of age (1510) he was driven from his peaceful home and literary labors. He then went to Italy, lived for some time in Rome and in Florence; and not finding any occupation, he at last went to Venice, where through the exertions of Rabbi Chajim Alton he became connected, in 1520, with the celebrated Hebrew printing-office of Daniel Bomberg as corrector of the press. He published (1) the celebrated "Tod Ha-Chezaka" of Maimonides, and (2) edited, in four volumes folio, the Rabbinic Bible called Bomberg's second Rabbinic Bible, the first being the one edited by Felix Pratensis. See PRATENSIS. Jacob ben Chajim bestowed the utmost labor in amassing the Massora and in purifying and arranging those materials which Felix Pratensis published very incorrectly in the first edition of Bomberg's Rabbinic Bible. He was, moreover, the first who, in his introduction, furnished the Biblical student with a treatise on the Massora; and his edition of the Bible is of great importance to the criticism of the text, inasmuch as from it most of the Hebrew Bibles are printed. Kennicott published a Latin translation of Jacob ben Chajim's introduction from an anonymous manuscript in the Bodleian Library in an abridged form, and Ginsburg has published an English translation of the whole, with explanatory notes, in the "Journal of Sacred Literature," 1863. In after life Jacob ben Chajim embraced Christianity—a circumstance which will account for Elias Levita's vituperations against him.

JACOB, BERAB, a wealthy and ambitious Jewish rabbi, was born near Toledo, Spain, in 1474. At the age of eighteen he was driven by persecution from Spain, and after traveling through various countries he finally reached Palestine, and settled at Safet. With the co-operation of the rabbins in his own neighborhood, he re-established the Sanhedrim in 1538, designing probably that this should be the beginning of the restoration of the Jewish kingdom, but the opposition of the authorities at Jerusalem effectually prevented the fulfillment of his scheme. He died in 1541.

JACOB, HENRY, father and son. The former was pastor of the first congregation of Independents in England, and a native of Kent. After graduating at Oxford, he was preferred to the benefice of Cheriton, near Hythe; but having published a polemical tract entitled "Reasons proving the Necessity of Reforming our Churches of England," he found it necessary to withdraw from England for a time. After a residence at Leyden, where he enjoyed the society of John Robinson, he returned and established a separate congregation on Indeof Spinoza" he entered upon a controversy with Mendelssohn concerning the pantheism of Spinoza, and first developed his own philosophical opinions, which are thus stated by Schwegler: "1. Spinozism is fatalism and atheism; 2. Every path of philosophic demonstration leads to fatalism and atheism; 3. In order that we may not fall into these, we must set a limit to demonstration, and recognize faith as the element of all metaphysical knowledge." It may well be supposed that the enunciation of such principles when atheism held sway throughout Germany would awaken intense opposition. His opponents charged him with being an enemy to science and philosophy; and to develop his "faith philosophy" more fully he published "Idealism and Realism." In 1807 he was made president of the Munich Academy of Sciences. In 1811 he published "Revelation of Divine Things," which pendent principles; but in 1624 he came to America, where he died. He was the author of several theological works, the most important of which is "Treatise on the Sufferings and Victory of Christ." His son, of the same name, studied under Erpenius at Leyden, and was distinguished for his knowledge of Oriental literature. He obtained a fellowship at Merton College, Oxford, and graduated both in arts and physic; but he was ejected from his fellowship by the Parliamentary commissioners, and died at Canterbury in 1652. He wrote many learned works.

JACOBI (ja-ko'be), FRIEDRICH HEINRICH, a German philosopher, was born in 1743, at Dusseldorf. He was educated at Frankfort-on-the-Main, whence he proceeded to Geneva to prepare himself for a mercantile career, but his tastes inclined him to literary pursuits; and relinquishing his business occupations, he finally devoted himself to authorship. In his "Letters on the Doctrines occasioned a bitter controversy with the philosophical school of Schelling. He died at Munich, March 10, 1819. Concerning his philosophy, Hagenbach very aptly says: "Jacobi stood to the philosophy of his day, as it had flowed down from Kant to Schelling, in a very peculiar relation. He was incited by each of these systems; he learned from each, and on each of them he exercised his strength. But he was not satisfied by either of them; yet he was most strongly repelled by pantheism, whether the earlier pantheism of Spinoza, whom he highly esteemed as a man, or its later form in Schelling's natural philosophy. Jacobi did not despise reason—he rather pleaded for it; but reason was not to him a faculty for the creation, discovery or production of truth from itself. By reason is meant, according to the derivation of the word, that which perceives the inmost and original sense. He did not regard reason and faith as being in conflict with each other, but as one. Faith inwardly supplies what knowledge cannot gain. Here Jacobi united with Kant in acknowledging the insufficiency of our knowledge to produce a demonstration of God and divine things. But the vacant place which Kant had therefore left in his system for divine things Jacobi filled up by the doctrine of faith." Though he is not entitled to be ranked as a Christian philosopher, yet he was a believer in revelation, and in so far was an advocate of religion.

JACOBITES (ja'kob-ites), the common name of the Oriental sect of Monophysites, and the special designation of the Monophysites of Syria, Mesopotamia and Chaldaea. The name is derived from a Syrian monk called Jacobus Baradaeus, who in the reign of Justinian formed the Monophysite recusants of his country into a single party. The Jacobites at present number about forty thousand families, and are subject to two patriarchs appointed by the sultan, one resident at Diarbekir, with the title of patriarch of Antioch, the other at Saphran, under the style of patriarch of Jerusalem.

JACOB'S WELL is situated on a low spur

of Mount Gerizim, at the mouth of the valley of Shechem, where it opens out into the wide plain of cornfields leading down to the Jordan. It is thus described by Dr. Porter: "Formerly there was a square hole opening into a carefully-built vaulted chamber, about ten feet square, in the floor of which was the true mouth of the well. Now a portion of the vault has fallen in and completely covered up the mouth, so that nothing can be seen but a shallow pit half filled with stones and rubbish." Dr. Wilson carefully measured the well, and found it nine feet in diameter and seventy-five feet deep. It was probably much deeper in ancient times, as there are signs of considerable accumulation of stones and rubbish below its present bottom; and Maundrel says that in his time it was thirty-five yards, or one hundred and five feet, deep. It sometimes contains a few feet of water, but at others it is quite dry. This is the only foundation for the story sometimes told to travelers, that it is dry all the year round, except on the anniversary of the day on which our blessed Saviour sat upon it, but that then it bubbles up with abundance of water.

Over the well there stood formerly a large church, built in the fourth century, but probably destroyed before the time of the crusades, as Sæwulf and Phocas do not mention it. Its remains are just above the well toward the south-west, merely a shapeless mass of ruins, among which are seen fragments of gray granite columns, still retaining their ancient polish.

We should naturally look for Jacob's well near to Shechem, Gen. xxxiii. 18, 19; John iv. 5, and Gerizim, ver. 20, to the east of the city, as Jacob, we know, approached it from the Jordan, Gen. xxxiii. 17, in the plain of cornfields ("white already to harvest"), John iv. 35. Some have objected that the distance (one mile and a half) from Shechem renders it improbable that the woman would have come so far to draw water; but even if no accident had brought her into its neighborhood, the sacred site and Jacob's name, or the excellence of the water drawn from so great a depth, would account for the preference. Dr. Porter remarks on this: "There is a well called Ez-Zenabyeh, a mile or more outside St. Thomas' Gate, Damascus, to which numbers of the inhabitants send for their daily supply, though they have fountains and wells in their own houses far more abundant than ever existed in the city of Shechem." It was evidently not the public well of the city, as there was no apparatus to draw with.

The tradition is as old as the fourth century, and common to Christians and Mussulmans. It is first mentioned by Eusebius, who was born only one hundred and fifty years after the death of St. John; and Dr. Robinson is of opinion that the tradition is not likely to have been lost in the interval. Jerome places it at the foot of Gerizim, and so identifies the supposed site of his time with the well as shown to travelers now.

There is no well in the whole plain which would so well accord with the words of the woman of Samaria, "The well is deep." It bears evident marks of antiquity, and the labor of sinking it through the solid rock must have been so great that it would not have been undertaken except by some one who had not access to the many streams and fountains of the neighborhood. Of its origin Dr. Porter writes: "What need for a well here? Every proprietor wishes to have a fountain or well of his own. A stream may run past or through his field, yet he dare not touch a drop of it. Jacob bought a field here, doubtless a section of the rich plain at the mouth of the valley, but this gave him no title to the water of the neighboring fountain. He therefore dug a well for himself in his own field, and indeed the field may have been bought chiefly with a view to the digging of a well. Every attentive reader of the Bible will observe that the patriarchs, while wandering in Canaan, had no difficulty about pasture, but they had often serious difficulties and quarrels about water, Gen. xxi. 25-30; xxvi. 13-15, 18-22, etc. This is the case still in many parts of Syria."

Here, then, is Jacob's well, on which the Saviour, wearied with his journey, rested for a while, finding that his meat and drink was to do his Father's business. Few scenes of sacred history gain so much reality and interest by a reference to the place where they were enacted. The well was there, its water more precious and more refreshing than any other of the neighborhood, fit emblem of the living water of everlasting life. The mountain rose above them, probably the scene of Isaac's intended sacrifice, and in those days the site of the Samaritan temple where their fathers worshiped. Around were the cornfields which served to suggest to the Saviour "the glorious vision of the distant harvest of the Gentile world," of which he had himself just sown the first seeds.

JACOPONE (ja-ko'po-ne), or JACOPO DI TODI, so called on account of his birthplace, was an Italian poet whose real name was JACOPO DI BENEDETTI. On being left a widower he distributed his property among the poor, and entered into the order of Minorites as a servitor. He composed Sacred Canticles, Latin poems and, as it is said, the famous "Stabat Mater," since so celebrated by the compositions of Haydn, Pergolesi, etc. Died in 1306.

JACUBUS (jak'u-bus), 1 Esd. ix. 48, Akkub Neh. viii. 7.

JADA (ja'da), a descendant of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 28, 32.

JADAU (ja'dow), one who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 43.

JADDUA (jad'du-a), the name of two persons Neh. x. 21; xii. 22, the latter a high-priest, the immediate successor, probably son, of Jonathan and remarkable on this account—that he was the last priest whose name has found a certain record in Old Testament Scripture. The priests, in the passage of Nehemiah referred to, are said to have been given "to the reign of Darius the Persian"—i. e., the Darius who was overthrown by Alexander. Jaddua is very commonly understood to be the same who is mentioned by Josephus as going out in his priestly robes to meet Alexander, and to implore his good-will toward the people and city of Jerusalem. But of this there can be no certainty, and the story given by Josephus respecting Jaddua's interview with Alexander is probably to a large extent fabulous. It manifestly savors too much of Jewish vanity, like many other things in the same quarter, to be entitled to implicit credit.

JADON (ja'don), a person who took part in building the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 7.

JAEL (ja'el), the ibex, or, according to some, the chamois. The only person certainly known under this name in Old Testament history is the wife of Heber the Kenite, and she comes into notice simply in connection with a memorable transaction—the murder of Sisera. Her husband was evidently a person of some importance, in modern phrase a sheikh, who belonged to the family of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses, but who, for some unexplained reason, had separated himself from his brethren. They had an inheritance assigned them, at the period of the conquest, on the south of Canaan, while he transferred himself, with his flocks and herds, to the extreme north, not far from Kadesh. See KENITES. Here he occupied a sort of intermediate position between the settled possessions of Israel on the one hand and those of Jabin, king of Hazor, on the other. But being of a peaceable disposition, as the Kenites appear generally to have been, he contrived to keep on friendly terms with both; and when the fierce war broke out which ended in the total route of Sisera, the leader of Jabin's host, the vanquished general on his flight homeward sought a refuge in the tent of Jael, Heber's wife, Jud. iv. 17. Why Jael's tent, rather than Heber's, should be mentioned as the asylum he sought in this perilous extremity, may possibly have arisen from Heber himself having been absent at the time; or, more probably, from the female tent being regarded among nomadic tribes as the more peculiarly safe receptacle, which stood comparatively secure against violence and intrusion. So much indeed was this the case that Sisera himself could scarcely have ventured, even in the most disastrous circumstances, to press for admission there, unless the privilege was readily conceded to him. But Jael, it would appear from the narrative, anticipated his wishes; and desecrating his approach, as she had no doubt heard of the disaster that led to it, she went forth to meet him, and invited him to turn into her tent and fear not. It was more almost than he could have looked for; and as if still further to throw him off his guard, she cast her mantle over him; and when he asked for a drink of water to quench his thirst, she opened a bottle of milk, and gave him what Deborah called butter, or curdled milk, in a lordly dish, Jud. v. 25. In a word, he was treated with the greatest apparent cordiality and kindness; the usual pledges of Arab hospitality and protection were given, but only to lull him into a fatal security. For during the profound sleep which presently after stole over him, Jael drew a nail from the tent, and with a hammer drove it into his temples with such a deadly aim as to pass entirely through the head and fasten it to the floor on which he lay. The pursuers of Sisera, with Barak at their head, were not long in coming up in quest of their prey; them also Jael went out to meet, and having asked them to go in, that they might see the man whom they sought after, they found Sisera lying dead with the nail in his temples.

A good deal perhaps might be said to palliate the conduct of Jael on this occasion, partly on the ground of the much more ancient and intimate alliance which the family of Heber had with Israel than it could possibly have with Sisera or Jabin; and still more from the danger which she could scarcely fail to apprehend to her own life, if she either refused Sisera the protection he sought, or should afterward have been discovered by Barak to have afforded an asylum to the so lately dreaded enemy of Israel. At such a moment the neutral position of her tribe brought with it a double peril; and if, in the sudden and trying emergency which burst upon Jael, she chose the way of personal safety rather than of high honor, regard should at least be had to the peculiar difficulties of her position before judgment is pronounced upon her conduct. This certainly has not always been done; on the contrary, everything that makes against her has often been prominently exhibited, while all that belongs to the other side has been industriously kept in the background. Her conduct has been denounced for its abominable treachery, as if every step had been taken with the most deliberate intent and freest choice. At the same time, while we cannot join in an unqualified condemnation, having regard to the peculiar circumstances in which she was placed, as little can we vindicate the part she acted; it was undoubtedly marked with such deceit and violence as no external circumstances or apprehended results can justify. How, then, should she have been celebrated in the song of Deborah as blessed above women? Jud. v. 24. Not certainly as a pious and upright person is blessed when performing a deed which embodies the noblest principles, and which goes up as a memorial before God, but merely as one who acted a part that accomplished an important purpose of Heaven. In the same sense, though in the opposite direction, Job and Jeremiah cursed the day of their birth—not that they meant to make it the proper subject of blame, but that they wished to mark their deep sense of the evil into which it had ushered them—mark it as the commencement of a life-heritage of sorrow and gloom. In like manner, and with a closer resemblance to the case before us, the Psalmist pronounces happy or blessed those who should dash the little ones of Babylon against the stones, Ps. cxxxvii. 9, which no one who understands the spirit of Hebrew poetry would ever dream of construing into a proper benediction upon the ruthless murderers of Babylon's children as true heroes of righteousness. It merely announces, under a strong individualizing trait, the coming recompense on Babylon for the cruelties she had inflicted on Israel; her own measure should be meted back to her, and they who should be the instruments of effecting it should execute a purpose of God, whether they might themselves intend it or not. Let the poetical exaltation of Jael be viewed in the light of these cognate passages, and it will be found to contain nothing at variance with the verdict which every impartial mind must be disposed to pronounce upon her conduct. It is in reality the work of God's judgment through her instrumentality that is celebrated, not her mode of carrying it into execution; and it might be as just to regard the heathen Medes and Persians as a truly pious people, because they are called God's "sanctified ones," to do his work of vengeance on Babylon, Isa. xiii. 3, as from what is said in Deborah's song to consider Jael an example of righteousness.

The Jael mentioned by Deborah in Jud. v. 6 is supposed by Winer and by Gesenius to be another person than the wife of Heber—to be, indeed, one of the judges of Israel, though nowhere else mentioned. Certainly the prophetess appears to be speaking of those who acted as judges of Israel before her, when she speaks there of the ways being occupied in the days of Shamgar the son of Anath in the days of Jael. In no proper sense could the time preceding Deborah's agency be represented as the days of Jael, if the Jael meant were the wife of an extra Israelitish chief. But as no judge of that name has been noticed in the history, it is better to leave the passage as one respecting which no certain opinion can be formed than give a positive deliverance as to the person indicated in it.

JAFFE (jaf'fe), PHILIPP, a learned Jew, was born about 1820, at Schwarsenz in Russian Poland. He studied medicine, but declined entering the medical profession, and devoted himself to the study of history and philology. In recognition of his contributions to historical literature, he was appointed extraordinary professor of history at the university of Berlin—an honor never before conferred on a Jew. In 1868 he professed Christianity, doubtless with a view merely to further advancement, but he bitterly regretted his action, and died by suicide in 1870. His chief work is "Register Book of the Roman Pontiffs," which is valuable for its chronological records of the papacy.

JAGUIS (jag'wis), a hermit sect of India, of which there are three classes: the Van-aphrastas, who dwell in the woods and live upon wild herbs and fruits; the San-jasis, a wandering tribe, who abstain from all pleasures and indulgences, live upon alms, and anxiously await the separation of soul and body; the Avadontas, who forsake their wives and children, and deny themselves all worldly enjoyments. They depend entirely on food obtained from strangers.

JAGUR (ja'gur), a city on the extreme south-eastern border of Judah toward Edom, Josh. xv. 21. Its name might perhaps indicate that it was one of the fortified camping-grounds of the border Arabs. Its site is unknown.

JAH (jah), an abbreviated form of the peculiar name of God, Jehovah, used only in poetry or in forming compound names, such as Eli-jah, Isa-jah, Jahas-jah, Jeremiah. The genuine pronunciation of the original word is taken by some to be Jahveh, by others Jahaveh, by others again Jahavah. Hence, either by abbreviation or accentuation, as Delitzsch prefers calling it, we obtain Jah. Both of these abbreviated forms occur in the proper names of Scripture, in the latter more frequently than in the former, though not quite so frequently in the original as in the English Bible. Jah is often also disguised to the English reader by the rendering LORD, which, in the great majority of cases, is put for Jehovah—for example, at Ps. civ. 35; cv. 45; cxi. 1, etc. It is thus obscured in its earliest occurrence, Ex. xv. 2, where the first clause should run "My strength and song is Jah." See JEHOVAH.

JAHATH (ja'hath). 1. A descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 2. 2. A Levite of the family of Gershon, vi. 20, 43. 3. Another chief of the same family in David's time, xxiii. 10, 11. 4. A Levite of the Kohathite family, xxiv. 22. 5. A Levite of the family of Merari in the reign of Josiah, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 12.

JAHAZ (ja'hats), JHAZA, JHAZAH (ja-ha'tsa) and JAHZAH (jah'tsa), a town in the territory of the Amorites, on the confines of the eastern desert, where the Israelites gained the victory over Sihon, Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32. It was given to the Reubenites, and was assigned out of that tribe to the Levites, Josh. xiii. 18; xxi. 36; 1 Chr. vi. 78. Isaiah and Jeremiah include it, with Heshbon and Elealeh, in the curse pronounced upon Moab, Isa. xv. 4; Jer. xlvi. 34. The whole country east of the Dead Sea had originally been given to the Moabites and Ammonites, Gen. xix. 36-38; Deut. ii. 19-22, but the warlike Amorites from the west of the Jordan conquered them and expelled them from the region north of the river Arnon. From the Amorites the Israelites took this country, but subsequently the Ammonites claimed it as theirs, Jud. xi. 13, and on the decline of Jewish power the Moabites and Ammonites again took possession of it. For this reason Jahaz is ascribed by the prophets to Moab. Eusebius states that in his day Jahaz—he writes it Iessa—still existed, and was situated between Medaba and Debus (Jerome says Diblatha). The situation thus given to it appears to be too far west for the requirements of the sacred narrative. We read in Num. xxi. 23 that Sihon “went out against Israel into the wilderness, and he came to Jahaz and fought against them.” Consequently, we must look for the site on the extreme eastern border of Ammon. This region is still unknown. No traveler has ventured to explore it, and the site of Jahaz remains yet to be identified.

JAHAZIAH (ja-haz'yah), one who took part with Ezra in investigating the cases of marriage with foreign wives, Ezra x. 15.

JAHAZIEL (ja-ha-zi'el). 1. A Benjamite chief who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 4. 2. A priest whom David appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark, 1 Chr. xvi. 6. 3. A Kohathite Levite, 1 Chr. xxiii. 19; xxiv. 23. 4. A Levite of the sons of Asaph, inspired to encourage Jehoshaphat when marching against the Moabites and Ammonites, 2 Chr. xx. 14-17. 5. One whose son was the chief of the sons of Shechaniah, who accompanied Ezra from Babylon, Ezra viii. 5.

JAHDAI (jah'di), a name in the genealogies of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 47.

JAHDIEL (jah-di'el), a chief of Manasseh beyond the Jordan, 1 Chr. v. 24.

JAHDO (jah'do), a Gadite, 1 Chr. v. 14.

JAHLEEL (jah'le-el), one of the sons of Zebulun, Gen. xlvii. 14; Num. xxvi. 26.

JAHLEELITES (jah'le-el-ites), a family of Zebulun descended from Jahleel, Num. xxvi. 26.

JAHMAI (jah'mi), one of Issachar's posterity, 1 Chr. vii. 2.

JAHN (yahn), JOHANN, a celebrated Biblical and Oriental scholar of the Roman Catholic Church, was born at Taswitz in Moravia, June 18, 1750. He studied at the gymnasium of Xnaym, at Olmutz and at Bruck. In 1775 he was ordained priest, and devoted himself for some time to the care of souls at Miswitz. In 1782 he received the degree of doctor at Olmutz, and became vice-director of the gymnasium at Xnaym. In 1784 he was chosen professor of Oriental languages and Biblical hermeneutics at the lyceum of Olmutz. In 1789 he was transferred to a wider sphere of influence, being appointed to the same office, with the superadded duties of teaching Biblical archæology and dogmatics in the university of Vienna. Here he labored successfully for seventeen years amid suspicions and petty persecutions which pained his ingenuous spirit. Some words in the preface to his “Introduction to the Old Testament,” the assertion that the books of Job, Jonah, Judith and Tobit are didactic poems, and that the demoniacs in the New Testament were possessed with dangerous diseases, not with the devil, were made charges against him. Complaints of his unsoundness were laid before the emperor Francis II. by a cardinal, and a commission was appointed to examine the matter, which decided that the views were not heterodox. The worthy critic, however, received a caution to be more guarded in future. Though he honestly submitted, his detractors continued their machinations till he was removed from the congenial duties of an office to which he had dedicated his life, and made canon or domherr in the metropolitan church of St. Stephen, 1806. Even before he was compelled to resign his professorship, his two great books, “Introduction to the Old Testament” and “Biblical Archæology,” were condemned without their author being heard in his defence. His death took place August 16, 1816. Jahn was a clear, methodical writer, whose numerous works diffused a knowledge of Biblical subjects in places and circles where the books of Protestants would scarcely have been received. The latter, however, have appreciated his writings fully as much as Catholics. He was not profound in any one thing, because he scattered his energies over so wide a field, but he was a most useful author, and one of his books is still the largest and best on the subjects of which it treats. As a theologian of the Romish Church he was so liberal that Hengstenberg finds fault with him on the Pentateuch. Besides the works already named, he is the author of a valuable chrestomathy on Chaldaic and on Arabic, and other exegetical and philological works. The memory of this meritorious scholar ought to be respectfully cherished by every Biblical student. Succeeding works have been largely indebted to his, of which several have been translated into English.

JAHZEEL (ja'tse-el), a son of Naphtali, Gen. xlvii. 24; Num. xxvi. 48; he is called Jahziel in 1 Chr. vii. 13.

JAHZEELITES (jah'tse-el-ites), a family of Naphtalites descended from Jahzeel, Num. xxvi. 48.

JAHZERAH (ja-ze'rah), one of the priests, 1 Chr. ix. 12. He may be the person called Ahasai in Neh. xi. 13.

JAHZIEL (jah'tse-el), 1 Chr. vii. 13. See JAHZEEL.

JAIR (ja'r). 1. A descendant of Manasseh by his grandmother and of Judah by his grandfather. His grandmother was probably an heiress, and therefore Jair was reckoned to the tribe of Manasseh, 1 Chr. ii. 5, 22, 23. When the Israelites entered Eastern Palestine, Jair led an expedition against a part of Northern Gilead, and having taken a number of its towns, called them Havoth-Jair (the towns of Jair), Num. xxxii. 41. He subsequently conquered the province of Argob in Bashan, with its threescore great cities, and called it Bashan-Havoth-Jair, to distinguish it from the province previously occupied in Gilead, Deut. iii. 14. Most writers have confounded these two territories, but in Josh. xiii. 30 and 1 Chr. ii. 22, 23 they are clearly distinguished from each other. See ARGOB, HAVOTH JAIR. 2. One of the judges of Israel, doubtless a descendant of the former, who had thirty sons that rode on thirty ass colts, and they had thirty cities, which are called Havoth Jair unto this day, which are in the land of Gilead, Jud. x. 3, 4. 3. A Benjamite, father of Mordecai, Esth. ii. 5. 4. The father of Elhanan, who killed Lahmi, Goliath's brother, 1 Chr. xx. 5. This Jair is also called Jaare-oregim, 2 Sam. xvi. 19.

JAIRITE (ja'r'ite), a descendant of the first Jair, 1, 2 Sam. xx. 26.

JAIRUS (ja-i'rus). 1. A ruler in one of the synagogues on the shore of the Sea of Galilee whose daughter was restored to life by our Lord, Matt. ix. 18; Luke viii. 41. Nothing further is recorded of him, and his name appears to have been the Hebrew Jair with a Greek termination. 2. Rest of Esther, xi. 2. The father of Mordecai. See JAIR.

JAKAN (ja'kan), 1 Chr. i. 42, probably a misprint for Jaakan, one of the sons of Ezer the Horite. He is called Akan in Gen. xxxvi. 27.

JAKEH (ja'keh), the father of Agur, whose words are recorded in Prov. xxx. Nothing is known of him, and consequently conjecture has been busy. Some would alter the text; some would suppose a symbolical meaning, but their guesses cannot be recorded here.

JAKIM (ja'kim). 1. A Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 19. 2. The head of one of the courses of the priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 12. 3. A marginal reading of Matt. i. 11, where it means Jehoiakim.

JAKUSI (ja-koo'se), the Japanese god of physic, to whom a gorgeous temple has been erected. He is represented by a gilded idol, which holds in his left hand a sceptre, but an unknown substance in his right. This idol is reverently worshiped by the Japanese, who approach it bareheaded, and ringing a bell at one portal of the temple, repeat a prayer, with their hands clasping their foreheads.

JALON (ja'lôn), a descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 17.

JAMBlichus (jam'bli-kus), a neo-Platonic philosopher who flourished at the beginning of the fourth century, and was a native of Chalcis, in Coele-Syria. He was the disciple of Anatolius and Porphyry, from whom he learned the Platonic system of philosophy, which he taught with great reputation. Among the works of Jamblichus now extant are—one on the “Life and Philosophy of Pythagoras,” and another on the “Mysteries of the Egyptians, Chaldeans and Assyrians.”

JAMBRES (jam'brees). See JANNES.

JAMBRI (jam'bre), apparently a mighty man in the city of Medaba, with whom we first become acquainted in the first book of Maccabees, ch. ix. 36. Jonathan, who succeeded his brother Judas in the government of the Jews (B. C. 161), about to be attacked by Bacchides, an officer of the king of Syria, on the Sabbath day, sent off a detachment, under the command of his brother John, in charge of all his baggage, to leave it for security with their friends, the Nabathites. But “the children of Jambri came out of Medaba, and took John and all that he had and went their way.” This hostile act was not, however, left unavenged, for, soon after, it was told Jonathan and Simon that the “children of Jambri” were celebrating a great marriage, and bringing the bride from Nadabath, when Jonathan and his party laid an ambush for them, and as the bridegroom was coming forth with great pomp to meet the bride, with timbrels and songs, fell upon them, committing great slaughter and taking great spoil, thus “converting the marriage into mourning and their melody into lamentation,” 1 Macc. ix. 33-42. But who Jambri was we know not. Some suppose that the “children of Jambri” were a family of Amorites who lived in Medaba, and who, as such, were ready to show their hatred to the Jews. But, query, May not Jambri be the same as Jambres, one of the two magicians who opposed Moses? and may not the persons who, on the above-named occasion, attacked the Jews, be called the "children of Jambri," or Jambres, to brand them with infamy as the enemies of God's people and cause?

JAMES. Two, if not three, persons of this name are mentioned in Scripture.

1. THE SON OF ZEBEDEE is the one respecting whom we have the most explicit information. Of the place of his birth, however, or of his life generally, except that he was a fisherman up by an extraordinary draught of fishes; at the close of which he told them that they should become fishers of men, and gave them to understand that what had now happened in the lower sphere was to be taken as a presage of what they might expect in the higher. When matters were right for the election of an apostleship, we find James numbered with the twelve, and of these he formed one of the first four. In two of the lists his name stands second, Mark and Luke, and in the other two third, Matt. and Acts. In all of them he is placed before his brother John, and may, therefore, be regarded as in reality the second in order, since precedence in two of the lists was given to Andrew merely on account of his near relationship to Peter. When-ardent and ambitious temper, on account of which they received from our Lord the name of Boanerges—sons of thunder, Mark ii. 17; but the old leaven, in this respect as in others, was purged out by the descent of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and the energy of character which underlay what was in it took henceforth a higher and holier direction. It was probably owing to this native energy that James owed his high place in the apostleship, since this, when enlightened and sanctified by grace, would naturally inspire confidence and fit him for taking a prominent position in guiding the affairs of the infant community amid the difficulties and dangers which beset it. That he actually did hold such a position may be certainly into the time that he became a follower of Christ, nothing is recorded. Our Lord, it is said, found him at a certain place, with his father Zebedee and his brother John, mending their nets on the shore of the Sea of Galilee; and having with his brother received a call to follow Jesus, they both immediately obeyed the call, Matt. iv. 21, 22; Mark i. 9. This prompt response seems to bespeak a previous acquaintance with Jesus, and an incipient conviction that he might be, or actually was, the promised Messiah; but of this no historical notice has been preserved, though it may be said to be implied in what his brother John records of himself, John i. 35-40. An occasion which has been regarded by some as the same, but by others as different, presents James as, along with John, associated in a fishing expedition with Simon and Andrew, which was directed by our Lord in person and signalized ever a selection was made from the twelve for any special purpose, James was always of the number. He was one of the four present at the raising to life of Jairus' daughter, Mark i. 29; one of three on the mount of transfiguration, Matt. xvii. 1; Luke ix. 29; one of four at the delivering of the discourse concerning the latter days, Mark xiii. 3; and one of three at the memorable scene in Gethsemane, Matt. xxvi. 37, etc. The only other incidents recorded of him in the gospel are—his uniting with John in the request that fire should be called down from heaven on a village of the Samaritans for refusing to entertain Christ, Luke ix. 54; and again presenting, along with him, through their mother, the request that they should sit nearest to Christ in his kingdom, Matt. xx. 23. Both requests were rejected, and not without marks of indignation. They seem to indicate a naturally ferred from the treatment he received from Herod when the latter began to persecute the Church, Acts xii. 2, James being the first of the apostles that were called to seal their testimony with their blood, and the only apostle whose martyrdom or death has found a record in New Testament Scripture. He is supposed to have suffered about ten years after our Lord's crucifixion. A tradition has been handed down by Eusebius from Clement of Alexandria that the soldier who conducted him to the place of execution was so struck with the holy boldness and serenity of the apostle when going to lay down his life that he also avowed himself a Christian, and shared the same fate. What credit should be attached to the story it is impossible to say. Things not very dissimilar did sometimes happen in the early persecutions; and whether true or not, the undaunted firmness which it ascribes to James in the final trial that awaited him is in perfect accordance with what we otherwise know of his character. A man of resolute purpose and determined action, he would shrink from nothing that was required of him as called to take a leading part in conducting the Church through her earlier struggles, for which he was rather fitted than for ministering to her future growth and development. In this latter respect his younger brother must be ranked far above him.

2. THE SON OF ALPHÆUS, was another of the apostles, and in all the lists of them given by the Evangelists stands ninth—the first of the last quaternion. It is probable that Alphæus, the father of this James, was but another form of what is elsewhere read Cleophas, or, as it should be, Clopas (see ALPHÆUS), and whose wife was called Mary, John xix. 25. This Mary appears to have been the same who in Matt. xxvii. 56 and Mark xv. 40 is called the mother of James the Less (properly "the little") and of Josès; so that James, the son of Mary, or James the Less, appears to have been all one with James the son of Alphæus. This, however, is the whole that can with any degree of certainty be affirmed regarding the James in question; and whether he is to be identified with or distinguished from the person to be next named is a point on which commentators have differed in the past, and are likely to differ in the time to come.

3. THE LORD'S BROTHER, Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Gal. i. 19. By comparing the last passage referred to with Gal. ii. 9, 12, there can be no doubt that this James is the same with the person of that name who is frequently mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, xii. 17; xv. 13; xxi. 18, as having, in the later notices there of the church in Jerusalem, a place of chief consideration, if not of official presidency. But was such eminence accorded to him simply on account of his relation to our Lord, or from this in conjunction with his possessing apostolical dignity? If the former, then the probability would be that the relationship was of the stricter kind—a brother-german; if the latter, then, as James the son of Alphæus was the only apostle of that name, except the son of Zebedee, the James who was the Lord's brother must have been so called in the looser sense—a cousin perhaps of Jesus, but really the son of Alphæus or Clopas and Mary. Various circumstances are alleged in support of this latter view—in particular that the expression of Paul, "other apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother," and the designation of him, along with Peter and John, as a pillar in the Church at Jerusalem, Gal. i. 19; ii. 9, seem to imply that he was an apostle in the proper sense, being put on a footing with those that were such, in a certain sense even above them; that the Mary who was his mother appears to be placed by St. John in apposition with the Virgin Mary—"his mother and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Clopas," John xix. 25; in which case he must have been the cousin-german of our Lord, and so in popular language his brother; and that both our Lord and the James who was the son of Mary and Clopas had a brother named Josès, Mark vi. 3; xv. 40. But the considerations on the other side seem at least equally strong, and by many of the ablest commentators are thought to preponderate. It is no way certain, for instance, that the Mary spoken of in John xix. 25 was meant to be represented as sister to the Virgin Mary, and it is indeed highly improbable that two in one family should have borne the same name. When John mentions beside the cross of Jesus "his mother and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene," he appears rather to intend four persons composed of two pairs—first the virgin and her sister; then two other Marys, the wife of Clopas and the Magdalene. Again, whoever may be meant in gospel history by the brothers of Jesus, whether half brothers or cousins, it is expressly said of them generally, long after the calling of the apostles, that they did not believe in him, John vii. 5. Besides, if the James who rose to such high consideration in the church at Jerusalem was merely a cousin of Christ, and really the son of Alphæus or Clopas, it seems difficult to understand why either such peculiar weight should have been attached to a relationship of that sort, or why the James who originally stood only in

In support of this view it is urged also that it is more probable that the permanent president of the church at Jerusalem would not be one of the twelve apostles, it being hardly consistent with their special mission, Matt. xxviii. 19, that any of them should settle at any particular spot as the president of a single church, and that in the particular circumstances of the church at Jerusalem at that period no person would be so likely to enjoy the confidence and affection as the eldest of our Lord's nearest relations, especially one who possessed the characteristics by which James appears to have been distinguished.

It may be added that the James who is called our Lord's brother, and occupied so prominent a position in the church of Jerusalem, was known in later times by the surname of the Just, and is reported to have been killed in a tumult about the year 62. The traditions respecting him, which are evidently much mixed with fable, are given by Eusebius. The Epistle which bears the name of James is unanimously ascribed to him by all who identify this James with the son of Alphæus; and by those who hold the other view to be different, some prefer the one and some the other.

the third quaternion of apostles should latterly have been elevated to so singular a place. The position of this James would certainly be more easily accounted for if he had been actually of the same family with our Lord—the son of Joseph and Mary; for having this high claim to regard, if he otherwise approved himself to the Church as possessed of the higher qualities for government, it was natural that they should concede to him a place of peculiar dignity and honor—should even lift him into the noble company of the apostles. In so honoring him the Church would feel as if it honored the Lord, to whom, according to the flesh, he stood in such close proximity. This seems to us, upon the whole, the more probable view. In addition to the reasons given above, it may be further said that the supposition that they are identical seems to be excluded by the fact that, at a period subsequent to the appointment of the twelve, our Lord's brethren according to the flesh (of whom James was probably the eldest) did not believe on him. And it is therefore supposed that they first joined the disciples after our Lord's ascension, Acts i. 14, having been convinced by the great events of his death and resurrection.

to a very large body of Christians, and not, as in the case of the thirteen Epistles of Paul, to particular churches or individuals, it may certainly on that account be called catholic, without any unwarrantable extension of the strict meaning of the word. It may be, however, that the name indicates ultimate universal recognition of all the Epistles in question. Two of them,—viz., 1 Peter and 1 John—were from the beginning universally received. The remaining five, though for a time held in doubt by some, were in the end also universally received; and the whole seven, according to this view, were therefore classed together as catholic Epistles. It does not seem probable that the appellation, as suggested by Hug, was given to these Epistles because they comprise the writings of all the apostles with the exception of those of Paul. But however accounted for, the title was given to them as early as the days of Eusebius, and indeed in the time of Origen, a hundred years earlier.

AUTHORSHIP.—On the question of authorship it is quite clear that James the son of Zebedee can have no claim to it, and this is all but universally admitted. The Peshito or old Syriac version indeed ascribes it to him. But it is incredible that the church in the days of this James, who was put to death by Herod A. D. 42, Acts xii. 2, could have been so widely spread as the inscription to this epistle implies, chap. i. 1. As yet it must have been confined within the limits of Palestine; and we suppose with many that the Epistle makes special allusion to the doctrine of Paul on the subject of justification by faith alone, and condemns certain widespread and mischievous corruptions of that doctrine, besides manifesting an undoubted acquaintance with the writings of Paul generally, it will appear simply impossible that an apostle whose death antedates Paul's Epistles by so many years could have been the author.

On the supposition that James the son of Alphaeus or Cleopas and James the Lord's brother were distinct persons, there can be no doubt that the latter is the author of the Epistle. None who maintain the distinction in question have imagined otherwise. Indeed, on this supposition James of Alphaeus entirely disappears from the history of the Church after his name is mentioned in the list of apostles, Acts i. 13; and after the martyrdom of James the brother of John only one James figure in the history, and he most conspicuously; so that in point of fact the controversy about the identity of the Jameses is really of less importance to the question of authorship than might be imagined, because all allow that the author is that James who governed the church at Jerusalem so long, who occupies so prominent a place in the Acts, whose opinion guided the first council, and of whom so honorable mention is made by Paul in his Epistles, Acts xii. 17; xv. 13; xxi. 18; Gal. i. 19; ii. 9, 12; 1 Cor. ix. 5; xv. 7. By that apostle James is mentioned as one of the three pillars of the church at Jerusalem, and the first of the three, Gal. ii. 9. All that we learn of him, both in the New Testament and in early ecclesiastical history, goes to show that his position and character and views were precisely such as this Epistle might be supposed to demand in its author. Occupying, as we have seen, the chief place in the parent church at Jerusalem, and being distinguished, moreover, by stronger attachment to the law of Moses than either Peter or Paul, Acts xxi. 18; Gal. ii. 12, his influence with the dispersed tribes to whom he wrote must necessarily have been very great. Hegesippus tells us that his piety and integrity were so conspicuous that he obtained the surname of the Just, and that he set himself against every form of corruption and oppression that he was further styled the bulwark of the people. The same author reports that from his childhood he lived the life of a Nazarene, which would give him peculiar respect among the Jews, that he frequently prostrated himself on his knees in the temple, calling upon God to forgive the sins of the people and lead them to repentance and faith, and that after a life of stainless integrity and eminent usefulness he was slain by the leaders of the Jews, A. D. 62. It is needless to say how the character of the man accords with the contents of the Epistle. Both matter and style are just such as might have been expected from the Lord's brother—from one who, in consequence of close intimacy with Jesus, might be supposed to have drunk deep into his spirit. The Epistle bears a striking resemblance to the sermon on the mount in the purity and loftiness of its morality, and in the simple and sententious grandeur of its expression.

DATE.—The date of the Epistle, according to the very general concurrence of authorities, is A. D. 61, shortly before the death of the writer; and the conjecture of Lardner is probable, that the pungent rebukes contained in it and its fearless exposure of the sins of the rich and great, chap. v., occasioned or hastened his martyrdom. There are few marks of date in the Epistle itself. There is, however, an intimation that the destruction of Jerusalem was drawing nigh, ch. v. 8.

PERSONS TO WHOM THE EPISTLE IS ADDRESSED.—On this point there is considerable diversity of opinion. They were the twelve tribes of the dispersion, chap. i. 1. They were of course Jews. Moreover, they were converted or Christian Jews, chap. i. 3; ii. 1; v. 7, 11, 14. Had the Jews at large been designed, or all Jews out of Judæa, as many contend, it is justly supposed the Epistle would have contained such proofs of the Messiahship of Jesus, and extended statements of the nature of Christianity, as the apostles were accustomed to address to their unbelieving countrymen. On the other hand, those passages which evidently of the Fathers and councils in the fourth century without exception recognize it, as well as the other antilegomena of Eusebius, and from that time till the era of the Reformation there was no longer doubt or difference of opinion.

That an epistle should not have been admitted into the number of sacred books till its claims had been sifted and established, instead of creating doubt and uneasiness in our minds, strengthens our faith in the care and fidelity of the ancient churches, and therefore in the canon itself as transmitted to us by them. Very probably the doubts about the Epistle of James may have originated in the uncertainty to which James the Epistle ought to be ascribed. The afflicted condition of the Jewish Church, too, almost immediately after the date of the Epistle, may also have exercised an unfavorable influence. James had scarcely written when the Jewish churches were involved in the troubles of war, flight and persecution. The Judaizing churches were broken up, and the Jewish converts were regarded with increasing dislike and prejudice by the Gentile Christians. It is not wonderful, therefore, that some few of these last should have been slow to receive an Epistle that notwithstanding had so many claims to their respect.

At the time of the Reformation the Epistle was again called in question by Luther and others, from its supposed hostility to the doctrine of justification by faith alone, ch. ii. 21. The eager Reformer, instead of resolving the question of supposed difference between Paul and James, at once cut the knot and styled our epistle an epistle of straw. On more mature consideration, however, he acknowledged his error, although this latter circumstance is sometimes forgotten by those who are fond of parading his original mistake. There is much truth in an excuse which has been made for Luther. It was not easy in his time to distinguish in every instance the real from the supposed monuments of antiquity, to recognize the true principles of sacred criticism, nor to consult the materials for it, many of which were yet to be discovered. For example, the epistle of Clement of Rome, furnishing, as we have seen, so important a testimony to James, imply an unbelieving character, chap. iv. 1-10; v. 1-5, are to be explained on the principle that the apostles address themselves in their Epistles to professing Christians or Christian bodies, among whom, as now, there might be many unworthy of the name. It is manifest that many corruptions both in doctrine and practice had crept into the Jewish Christian Church by this time, which James found it necessary severely to reprehend.

CANONICITY.—There can be no doubt on this head. The Epistle was at once received. Eusebius indeed ranks it among his five antilegomena, or writings regarding which doubt was entertained by some few persons in the beginning, but it is found in the Peshito or old Syriac version, which dates so early as the end of the first or beginning of the second century. The Epistle was therefore received in the place where its claims could be best canvassed, and by the people who of all others were the most competent to detect anything that might affect its genuineness. It is quoted, moreover, by Ephrem the Syrian, who mentions the name of the author, by Clement of Rome, by Hermas, who has seven allusions to it, by Origen, Jerome, Athanasius, etc. The eleven catalogues was not discovered for more than a hundred years after—A. D. 1628. Doubtless there is nothing in the Epistle of James that in any way contradicts the doctrine of Paul in Romans and Galatians. The two inspired writers deal with justification from different points of view, and address persons occupying extremes of opinion on the subject. Paul deals with the proud Legalist, who would be justified by his works; James, with the licentious Antinomian, who maintained that justification by faith entitled him to dispense with works altogether, and to give them no place even in the believer's life. And a fair examination of the whole passage shows the meaning of James simply to be that the faith which justifies is a faith productive of works whenever occasion shall demand, and containing them in itself from the very first as the principle out of which they spring. It is the inoperative and dead faith only that in his view saves not.

CONTENTS AND STYLE.—The Epistle contains expositions and exhortations connected with various topics within the field of Christian ethics. It is pre-eminently a practical Epistle, designed to correct erroneous views and mischievous perversions of Christianity which had sprung up even in this early age. We advert only to the leading topics. Sore trials, as we have seen, were impending, and in view of them the writer exhorts to patience and steadfastness, to believing prayer and holy obedience. He condemns respect of persons in the Church, cautions against speculative or notional religion, and maintains the operative character of faith in opposition to the Antinomian notions which seem already to have been entertained by many, ch. i., ii. Rebuking the ambitious desire of being chief masters and teachers in the Church which naturally belonged to men of a speculative tendency, James next discourses, with a view to check that ambition, on the evils of an unbridled tongue, in a strain of eloquence that has never been surpassed. At the same time, and with the same end in view, he presents a noble and beautiful contrast between the wisdom of the world and that which cometh from above, ch. iii. The Epistle next passes to the evils which spring from the ambitious and worldly spirit in the Church, viz., wars and fightings, sinful lusts, cold and formal prayers, worldly friendships and alliance, envy, pride, duplicity, evil-speaking, and finally a presumptuous dependence on the continuance of life, and the formation of plans for the morrow without taking God at all into account, ch. iv. Naturally following these manifestations of the worldly spirit, we have next an outpouring of eloquent and terrible indignation against the unjust and ungenerous rich, while, at the same time, Christians, however poor and oppressed, are comforted by the near prospect of their Lord's coming, and are therefore exhorted to patience. The Epistle concludes with a solemn caution against swearing, with directions regarding prayer for the sick and an exhortation to zeal in the conversion of sinners.

In this brief summary we have attempted in part to trace the connection of topics in our Epistle. But the style of James is bold, rapid, abrupt and figurative, so that the connection is not always easily found, and is to be sought more in the course of thought than in the language or form of expression. Two things, we think, distinguish the style of this Epistle which are not always or often found together. It is not only logical, precise, terse, but also imaginative and rhetorical by turns. The definitions, or descriptions rather, in ch. i. 27 and iii. 17, are at once most exact and beautiful, and exhibit a wondrous command of precise and appropriate language. The logical compactness and force of argument in ch. ii. 14 to the end of the chapter cannot be too much admired, while of beautiful and striking imagery we have examples in the rich passing away as the flower of the field, in the wavering soul tossed like the wave of the sea, in the hearer who is not a doer of the word likened to the man forgetting his natural face in a glass, and in human life melting like a vapor into air and vanishing away. The discourse on the tongue is characterized by extraordinary wealth and profusion of illustration. We have in succession the unruly horse and the bit, the great ship and small helm, the little spark and mighty fire, and the wild animals of earth, air and ocean tamed of mankind, exhibiting the ungovernable character and terrible power for evil of the "little member."

On the whole, this Epistle holds a place of its own in the New Testament, and gives unity and consistency to it, as a collection of inspired books, containing the whole will of God for the salvation of man.

JAMES, LITURGY OF SAINT, originated probably as early as the first century, and was used throughout the patriarchdom of Antioch, both by the Monophysites and the orthodox, the former using a Syriac and the latter a Greek version.

JAMES, the name of two kings of England.

I., who was also VI. of Scotland, the only son of Mary queen of Scots, by Lord Darnley, was born in 1566, at Edinburgh, and on the abdication of his mother, in 1567, was proclaimed king of Scotland under the title of James VI., being then an infant. Among the eminent scholars to whom the education of the young king was entrusted was the great historian and poet, George Buchanan. On the death of Elizabeth, March 24, 1603, he succeeded to the throne of England, shortly after which an attempt was made to place his cousin, Arabella Stuart, on the throne. The celebrated Sir Walter Raleigh was accused of being concerned in this conspiracy, and kept in imprisonment for several years. He was then released, but afterward beheaded in execution of the sentence previously pronounced against him. During his reign he was fortunate in discovering and thwarting a plot which the Roman Catholics had formed to subvert the government by blowing up the houses of Parliament on the day when the king and both houses were assembled. In this purpose they had hired one Guy Fawkes, a Spanish officer, who, with some of his companions, was executed for the attempted crime. His contempt of Parliament and his high-handed measures, especially against the Puritans, created deep discontent, and many of the latter left the kingdom, and afterward settled in New England. One of the most memorable events of his reign was the translation of the Bible by a number of eminent divines appointed by himself, which was completed in 1611, and continues in use as the Authorized English version of the Bible among Protestants. The characteristic features of this monarch are feebleness, indolence, vulgarity in tastes and pursuits, vanity and pedantry. The best known of his literary works are—"The Basilikon Doron," "A Treatise on Demonology" and a "Counterblast to Tobacco." He died in 1625.

II., born in 1633, duke of York and lord high admiral, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother, Charles II., and, from the time of his ascending the throne, seems to have acted with a steady determination to render himself absolute and to restore the Roman Catholic religion. After disgusting the great majority of his subjects by attending mass with all the ensigns of royalty, he proceeded to levy the customs and excise without the authority of Parliament. even sent an agent to Rome to pave the way for solemn readmission of England into the bosom that Church, and received advice on the score of moderation from the pope himself. A few months after his accession, severe laws having been passed against the Covenanters, against whom Graham Claverhouse was sent, the invasion of Scotland took place under the earl of Argyle, and the invasion of England under the duke of Monmouth, both of which failed, and cost the lives of thousands of leaders. By virtue of his assumed dispensing power, James rendered tests of no avail, and filled his army and council with Roman Catholics, which by a declaration in favor of liberty of conscience he also sought to gain the favor of the dissenters who were, however, too conscious of his ultimate object to be deluded by this show of liberality. The resistance to this illegal declaration led to the trial of the seven bishops, and their acquittal was an occasion of great popular rejoicing. Thus the king proceeded by every direct and indirect attack to overthrow the established constitution; but these innovations, in regard both to the religion and government, gradually united opposing interests, and a large body of the nobility and gentry concurrent in an application to the prince of Orange, who had been secretly preparing a fleet and an army for the invasion of the country. James, who was long kept in ignorance of these transactions, when informed of them by his minister at The Hague, was struck with terror equal to his former infatuation; and immediately repealing a his obnoxious acts, he practiced every method to gain popularity. All confidence was, however, destroyed between the king and the people. William arrived with his fleet in Torbay November 4th 1688; and being speedily joined by men of high rank, his ranks swelled, while the army of James began to desert by entire regiments. Incapable of any vigorous resolution, and finding his overture of accommodation disregarded, James resolved to quit the country. He repaired to St. Germain's where he was received with great kindness and hospitality by Louis XIV. In the mean time the throne of Great Britain was declared to be abdicated, and William and his consort Mary (the daughter of James) were unanimously called to fill it conjointly. Assisted by Louis XIV., James was enabled, in March, 1689, to make an attempt for the recovery of Ireland. The battle of the Boyne, fought July, 1690, compelled him to return to France. All succeeding projects for his restoration proved equally abortive, and he spent the last years of his life in acts of ascetic devotion, dying a Germain's, September 16, 1701, aged sixty-eight. To sum up his character in a few words, we may say that his prejudices were strong, his understanding narrow and his temper cold and ungenerous.

JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD STUART, known as the Chevalier de St. George, or the Old Pretender, was the son of James II. by his second wife, Mary d'Este, and was born 10th June, 1688. In the following December the queen fled with him to France, and on the death of James, his father, in 1701, he was acknowledged as King of England by Louis XIV., which led to the recall of the English ambassador and war with France. He was also acknowledged as king by the pope, the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy, while he was attainted of high treason by an Act passed in 1702. In 1708 he sailed from Dunkirk with a French fleet for the invasion of Scotland, but the vigilance of the English admiral prevented the execution of the plan, and the prince returned to France. On the death of Queen Anne he was refused an interview with Louis XIV., and ordered to leave France. In the following year, 1715, a rebellion in his favor broke out in Scotland, and he was proclaimed on the 6th September. The rebels were defeated at Preston on the 13th November, and their leaders made prisoners. In December the Pretender himself arrived at Peterhead, assumed royal state, formed a council and made a progress through the country, but the case was hopeless, and he was glad to escape to Gravelines. He soon after dismissed Lord Bogbrooke, who had been his secretary, and appointed the duke of Ormond to that post. Ordered to quit France, he went to Italy, and afterward to Spain, where he was received as king of England, and an expedition was undertaken in his favor, which ended in failure. Disaffection and restlessness continued in Great Britain, and showed themselves, from time to time, in overt acts, and in 1745 another Jacobite rebellion broke out in Scotland in favor of Charles Edward, the son of James the Pretender. He is usually known as the Chevalier, and for a considerable time his prospects seemed to promise an undoubted success. The enthusiasm among his adherents in Scotland was intense, and

JAMES THE PRETENDER.

The Jacobite party in England began to hope, as his march into England had exceeded their highest anticipations. Reaching nearly the centre of the kingdom, vacillation and mismanagement began to appear; then followed retreat toward the north of Scotland, pursued by the English troops. The event was decided at Culloden, which blasted the hopes of the Stuart cause and permanently settled the Hanoverian family on the British throne.

JAMES, JOHN ANGELL, a distinguished Congregational minister, was born at Blandford, Dorset, in 1785. In 1805 he was ordained pastor of the nonconformist congregation of Carr's Lane, Birmingham. Here he became celebrated as a preacher and as a man of great charity and piety. He is famous, however, chiefly as the author of "The Anxious Enquirer," "Female Piety," "A Pastor's Sketches," and many other religious works which have attained extraordinary popularity. He died in 1859.

JAMES, THOMAS, D.D., an eminent divine, was born at Newport, Isle of Wight, in 1571. He was educated at New College, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow. He was much occupied with the collection and collation of old manuscripts, and wrote "Catalogue on the Bodleian Library," and "Treatise on the Corruption of Scriptures, Councils and Fathers," etc. Sir Thomas Bodley made James his first librarian in 1602. He died in 1629.

JAMESON (ja'me-sun), MRS., whose maiden name was ANNA MURPHY, was born in Dublin in 1796, and in 1823 married Mr. Robert Jameson, afterward vice-chancellor of Canada. Her numerous works have gained a wide reputation. The most important may be divided into two classes, of which one relates to women, their characteristics and social position. In her "Sisters of Charity at Home and Abroad" and the "Communion of Labor" she enters into the subjects of the employment of women and of criminal laws and reformatory institutions. But she will continue to be known chiefly for her art criticism, in which she has been surpassed by few. Her "Handbook to the Public Galleries of Art in and near London," published in 1842, was the first of a series of works of great value on the special subjects of which they treat. Among these are the volumes on "Sacred and Legendary Art," "Legends of the Monastic Orders," "Legends of the Madonna." At her death, which took place March 17, 1860, she left nearly completed a more laborious and elaborate work on the "History of our Lord and of his Precursor, St. John the Baptist, with the Personages and Typical Subjects of the Old Testament as represented in Christian Art." This work has since appeared, completed and edited by Lady Eastlake.

JAMIESON (ja'me-sun), JOHN, D.D., an eminent Scotch divine and philologist, was born at Glasgow in 1759. After studying at Glasgow and Edinburgh he was ordained in 1780, and ministered to a congregation in Forfar till 1797, when he moved to Edinburgh. Dr. Jamieson was the author of "Socinianism Unmasked," "Sermons on the Heart" and "Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language." He died at Edinburgh in 1838.

JAMIN (ja'min). 1. A son of Simeon, Gen. xlv. 10; Ex. vi. 15; 1 Chr. iv. 24. 2. A descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 27. 3. One who expounded the law in the time of Ezra, Neh. viii. 7.

JAMINITES (jam'in-ites), a family of Simeon descended from Jamin, Num. xxvi. 12.

JAMLECH (jam'lech), a chieftain of Simeon, 1 Chr. iv. 34.

JAMNIA (jam'ne-a), 1 Macc. iv. 15; v. 58; x. 69; xv. 40, most probably identical with JABNEEL, which see.

JAMNITES (jam'nites), 2 Macc. xii. 8, 9, 40, inhabitants of Jamnia or Jabneel.

THE YOUNG PRETENDER.

JANEWAY (jan'way), JACOB J., D.D., an eminent American Presbyterian divine and commentator, was born in 1774, at New York, and educated at Columbia College. Dr. Janeway was one of the most eminent men of his age in the American Presbyterian Church, and his services were justly esteemed in the various charges which he filled. He was a voluminous and able author, his greatest works being commentaries on the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles to the Romans and the Hebrews. He also wrote on the "Internal Evidence of the Bible," "A Communicant's Manual," a treatise on "Unlawful Marriage," "Letters on the Atonement," on "The Abrahamic Covenant," "The Mode of Baptism," a "Review of Dr. Schaff on Protestantism," and "Essays on the Inability of Sinners." He resided for several years at New Brunswick, N. J., where he died in 1858.

JANEWAY, JAMES, the author of the well-known little work, "Janeway's Token for Children," was a native of Hertfordshire, in England; and although he was educated in Christ Church College, Oxford, he was a Presbyterian, and in 1652 he became pastor of a church in Rotherhithe, London. He wrote "Heaven upon Earth" and "The Saint's Encouragement," and a life of his brother, John Janeway, who was also born at Lilly, in Hertfordshire, in 1633, and educated at Cambridge. He traced his conversion to Baxter's "Saint's Rest," but before entering the ministry he was seized with severe sickness, and died triumphantly in the faith and hope of the gospel in 1657.

JANIZARIES (jan'e-za-rees), a military force of the Ottoman empire which was at first recruited from Christians taken captive in war, and afterward from the Christian subjects of the Turks, who were compelled to sever all family ties and adopt the religion and language of their conquerors. They were abolished in 1826.

JANNA (jan'na), a person in the line of our Lord's ancestry, Luke iii. 24.

JANNES (jan-nes) and JAMBRES (jam'bres), the names of two Egyptian magicians who are mentioned by St. Paul, 2 Tim. iii. 8, 9, as having headed the opposition that was made to Moses when endeavoring to persuade Pharaoh to let magicians who spoke against Moses, and by their incantations sought to withstand him. The Jerusalem Talmud does the same, only instead of Jannes and Jambres it gives the variations Joachene and Mamre. In several other Jewish writings the names again occur with slight variations, as in Tanchuma, where they are called Jonos and Jombros. Origen against Celsus states that Numenius, a Pythagorean philosopher, takes notice of the wonders performed by Moses in Egypt, and how Jannes and Jambres, sacred scribes and magicians, were made to stand in the breach against him. Other stray references occur, especially to the doubt its correctness or validity. And from an example of sophistical evasion growing into hardened belief which was known to have been exhibited by those champions of a doomed heathenism in former times, he warns the Church to expect like cases in the future, that when they occur those who have charge of her affairs may be on their guard, and may be stimulated to put forth the resistance which if faithfully exerted cannot fail to be crowned with success.

JANNING (jan'ning), CONRAD, a learned Jesuit, was born in 1650, at Groningen, and Israel go. The statement only differs from the accounts contained in the books of Moses in so far as it gives the individual names of parties who go there by the general designation of magicians, and all that we have to suppose is that those names had somehow been handed down in a manner so generally known and so well authenticated as to warrant the familiar allusion of the apostle. We cannot justify the allusion by an appeal to the sources which were accessible to him, but neither are we without such respectable fragments of evidence as may be sufficient almost to satisfy the most skeptical on the subject. The Targum of Jonathan at Ex. i. 15 and vii. 11 expressly mentions Jannes and Jambres as chiefs of the magi-name of Jannes, one even in Pliny; but these are enough to show that the names of the two magicians in question had obtained a world-wide celebrity in ancient times as the representatives of Egyptian arts and lore in the great conflict that was waged against them by Moses, and this can only be accounted for by two persons with those names having actually taken the part ascribed to them, for in such a matter there was no temptation to feign what did not exist, or to adopt names different from those of the real actors in the drama. Certainly, as Lightfoot has said, the apostle is not to be regarded as taking up the names as if he had them by revelation, but he falls in with the current use of them, there being no reason to ceived his education at the Jesuit College in Wepphalia. In 1679, in connection with the Bollandists, he began the task to which his industrious life was devoted, the preparation of the Acta Sanctorum, or "Acts of Saints and Martyrs," of which stupendous work he contributed thirteen volumes. In 1681 he went to Rome, and after the completion of his theological course was ordained priest. He traveled extensively throughout Italy, Germany, and Bohemia, collecting materials for the above-named work. He died in 1723.

JANOAH (ja-no'ah), a town of Northern Palestine, situated apparently between Abel-beth Maachah and Kedesh, and within the boundaries htali. It was taken, with several other cities, on the first invasion of Palestine by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, 2 Ki. xv. 29. It is mentioned by Eusebius, but he strangely confounds it with Janohah, a town of Ephraim, and in this he is followed by Jerome and others. The site of Janohah has not been identified. The modern village of Hunin, which stands on the brow of a mountain between Jericho and Kedesh, and which contains the massive remains of a large and strong castle, would answer to the situation, and the names Hunin and Janohah, which apparently so unlike, have some slight radical affinity.

JANOHAH (ja-no'hah), a town on the northern border of Ephraim, and consequently in the Jordan valley, Josh. xvi. 6, 7. It is once mentioned in Scripture, but Eusebius and Jerome mention that in their time it was still a village in the district of Acrabante, twelve miles from Neapolis, the ancient Sichem. About three and a half hours (12 miles) east by south of Nabatulus stands the little village of Yanun, situated in a vale which descends the eastern slope of the mountains of Ephraim to the Jordan. The village is now mostly in ruins, but it has a few houses intact, and its ancient remains are extensive and interesting. Entire houses and walls are still existing, but covered with immense heaps of earth and rubbish. The dwellings of the present inhabitants are built upon and between the houses of the ancient Janohah.

JANOW (ya'now), MATTHIAS VON, one of the earliest Bohemian reformers, of whose early history but little is known. He pursued his studies at the universities of Prague and Paris, and in 1526 was appointed prebendary at Prague and canon of Charles IV., which position he held until his death, in 1394. Though not gifted with pulpit eloquence, he exerted a wide influence through his writings, in which may be plainly seen the germ of those principles which at a later day were un-dermined in the Reformation under Luther. His chief work is entitled "Rules of the Old and New Testaments," in which he tests everything by the standard of God's word, denies the authority of papal edicts, denounces the conduct of the priests and bishops, and boldly asserts that a thorough reformation of the Church can only be effected by the overthrow of the Roman hierarchy. For the condemnation of these sentiments the pope de-clared him guilty of heresy, and he was compelled to leave Prague. In 1410 his writings, with those of Wycliffe, were publicly burned.

JANSEN (jan'sen), or JANSENIUS (jan-se-ne-us), CORNELIUS, bishop of Ypres and professor of divinity in the universities of Louvain and Douay, was one of the most learned divines of the seventeenth century, and founder of the sect of the Jansenists. He was born in 1585, at Akay, near Bruges, in Holland, and studied at Louvain. He was sent into Spain on business relating to the university, the Catholic king engaged him to write a book against the French for having formed an alliance with Protestant states, and rewarded him with the see of Ypres, in 1635. He had already maintained a controversy against the Protestants on the subject of grace and predestination; and having studied with intense delight the works of Augustine, he devoted the best years of his life to the composition of a treatise entitled "Augustinus," a kind of epitome of the views of his great teacher. This book appeared after his death, and was the occasion of the famous and long-continued controversy between the Jesuits and the Jansenists. He died, 1638. See PORT ROYAL.

JANSENIUS, CORNELIUS, bishop of Ghent, was born at Hulst, in Flanders, in 1510. He distinguished himself at the Council of Trent by his learning and modesty. He wrote a "Harmony of the Gospels" and other works, and died at Ghent in 1576.

JANUARIUS (jan-u-ah're-us), SAINT, a martyr of the Christian faith under Diocletian, was a native of Benevento, and became a bishop of that see in the latter part of the third century. According to tradition, he was taken prisoner at Nola, and the place of his martyrdom in 305 was Pozzuoli. His body is preserved at Naples, in the crypt of the cathedral, and in a chapel of the same church are also preserved the head of the martyr and two phials supposed to contain his blood. On three festivals each year the chief of which is the day of the martyrdom, September 19, and on occasions of public danger, the head and the phials of the blood are carried in solemn procession to the high altar of the cathedral, where, after prayer, the blood in the phials is believed to liquefy, and in this condition is presented for the veneration of the people or for the conviction of the doubter.

JANUM (ja'num), or more correctly, as in the margin, JANUS (ja'nus), a town in the mountain district of Judah, Josh. xv. 53, for which we find in the margin—

JAPHETH (jaf'eth), ["enlargement," if, as Scripture itself seems to warrant, Gen. ix. 27, from the root phathah, "to extend," but if from japhah, "to be fair," as Gesenius would regard as the more natural derivation, then the meaning would be "fairness," in the sense of lightness of complexion or beauty], one of the sons of Noah. In the lists given of these sons Japheth always stands last; the order is Shem, Ham and Japheth, Gen. v. 32; vi. 10; vii. 13. But as Ham is on good grounds supposed to have been the youngest, Gen. ix. 24, so, if the common rendering of Gen. x. 21—"unto Shem also, the brother of Japheth the elder, even to him were born," etc.—were correct, it might with equal certainty be inferred that Japheth was the eldest. And so it is very generally understood, even apart from the testimony of this verse; but the verse itself should rather, according to a common Hebrew construction, be read, "Shem, the brother of Japheth—the elder" (literally the great); or more plainly, "Shem, the elder brother of Japheth." So the Vulgate, "fratre Japhet majore." Similar examples of the like construction may be seen in Jud. i. 13; ix. 5; Deut. xi. 7. With respect to the races which were severally to spring from them, the second place only belonged to Japheth, the first to Shem; namely, when those races are considered in the relation they were to hold to the higher purposes of God and the nobler destinies of mankind. According to the remarkable prophecy of Noah, Gen. ix. 25-27, it was in connection with the race of Shem that the Lord had purposed to make the more peculiar manifestations of himself to men; and the distinctive characteristic of Japheth was to be expansive energy and enlargement, in consequence of which it should, as it were, overflow and obtrude itself also into the tents of Shem. But this perhaps points fully as much to the participation the race of Japheth should have in the peculiar blessing of Shem as to territorial occupation. Looking to the genealogical tables, however, in the tenth chapter of Genesis, there can be no doubt that the race of Japheth was characterized by a remarkable tendency to diffuse itself abroad over the remoter regions of the earth, and that from that root have sprung many of the most active and enterprising nations both of earlier and later times. They took chiefly a north and westerly direction—first, the Medes, the inhabitants of Caucasus and of the regions about the Black Sea, the Scythians, the tribes generally that occupied the North of Asia and Europe; then the communities of Asia Minor, Greece and the southern parts of Europe; so that, as is said in Gen. x. 5, "by them were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands"—that is, not merely the islands scattered through the Mediterranean, but the more distant coasts and regions which were separated by sea from the original seat of the human family. If the descendants of Shem, and of Ham also, attained to an earlier distinction in the government and commerce of the world, those of Japheth both occupied more extensive territories and rose ultimately to far greater power and resources; and since the early Egyptian and Assyrian monarchies fell into decay, the governing and directing power in worldly affairs may be said to have been chiefly in their hands. The Median, Grecian and Roman monarchies were examples on a gigantic scale in ancient times of the offspring of Japheth making their way into the tents of Shem, and the history of conquest, colonization and commerce in modern times is almost a continued exemplification of the same tendencies. The details of this general outline will be found to some extent filled up under the several names of Japheth's posterity, Gomer, Magog, Javan, etc., but for the full, systematic and most learned proof of it recourse must be had to Bochart's "Phaleg," where everything in this line of inquiry has received so thorough an examination that later research has been able to add little to it. But with all this superiority on the part of Japheth in physical energy, vigorous enterprise and capacity for rule and government, the races of this line have held but a secondary place in all that concerns the true knowledge and worship of God. Immediate revelations from heaven have come only through the posterity of Shem; through them also has come the salvation of the world; and the blessing, which they were the first to receive, has reached the tribes of Japheth only by these coming to dwell, not as givers, but as receivers, as captives, not as conquerors, in the tents of Shem.

JAPHETH. There have been two eminent Karaite commentators of this name, both of Bussora. Their works have never been published; the MSS. of them are, however, preserved in the Paris and Leyden libraries. Both were largely quoted by Ibn Ezra. Pinkster has examined twenty volumes of these MSS.

JAPHIA (ja'fia). 1. The king of Lachish at the time of the conquest of Canaan, and one of the five kings of the Amorites, as they are called, Josh. x. 3, 5, who conspired together to cut off the Gibeonites for having entered into a league with Joshua. The result, however, was that the party were routed by Joshua, and Japhia, along with the others, hanged. 2. Japhia, one of the sons of David, the tenth that was born to him after his settlement in Jerusalem, 2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chr. iii. 7. No further notice is taken of this son. 3. A border-place of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 12. It is now an appellative. The grammatical form of the original forbids the first supposition. The second has some reasons in its favor, but perhaps, referring it to the king of Assyria, we may best understand the meaning of the prophet if we adopt the third, and translate "the hostile king."

JARED (ja'red), one of the antediluvian patriarchs, the father of Enoch, Gen. v. 15-20; Luke iii. 37. In Gen. v. 15, marg.; 1 Chr. i. 2 he is called Jered by our translators.

JARESI AH (jar-e-si'ah), a Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 27.

JARHA (jar'ha), probably an Egyptian name, as it occurs only in connection with an Egyptian person, the servant or slave of one Sheshan, the head of a family in Judah who had daughters only, but no sons, and took his servant Jarha as a called Yafa, about two miles south-west of Nazareth. There is a tradition that this was the birth-place of Zebedee and his two sons.

JAPHLET (ja'let), a descendant of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 32, 33.

JAPHLETTI (ja'le-te), "the Japhletite," a land-mark on the southern frontier of Ephraim, Josh. xvi. 3, probably from some individual Japhlet, or some tribe or clan now unknown.

JAPHO (ja'fo), Josh. xix. 46. See JOPPA.

JARAH (ja'rah), one of Saul's descendants, 1 Chr. ix. 42. He is called Jehoadah in 1 Chr. viii. 36.

JARCHI (jar'ki). See RASHI.

JAREB (ja'reb), an adversary. It is questioned whether this, Hos. v. 13; x. 6, is the name of a king or of a country, or whether it is used as husband for his daughter Ahlai, 1 Chr. ii. 34. It is the only instance of the kind recorded in the Hebrew annals, and as such is deserving of notice. Nothing is known of the time when it took place, but the probability is that it occurred after the settlement in Canaan. Sheshan belonged to the Jerahmeelites, whose possessions lay in the extreme south, where the country adjoins to Egypt, and this probably had something to do with the origination of such a connection.

JARIB (ja'rib). 1. One of the sons of Simeon, 1 Chr. iv. 24. He is elsewhere, Gen. xlvi. 10, called Jachin. 2. One who accompanied Ezra, and was sent by him to invite priests and Levites to go to Jerusalem, Ezra viii. 16. 3. A priest who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 18. He may be the same with number 2. 4. Occurs in 1 Macc. xiv. 29, and is identical with Joarib of 1 Macc. ii. 1. See JEHOIARIB.

JARIMOTH (jar'e-moth), 1 Esd. ix. 28, Jeremioth, Ezra x. 27.

JARMUTH (jar'muth), exalted. 1. One of the cities in Canaan whose king, Priam, entered into the conspiracy against the Gibeonites to avenge their submission to Joshua, Josh. x. 3. That occasion it is associated with Jerusalem, Bethoron, Lachish and Debir; in another place it is mentioned among the cities that stood in the valley of the low ground of Judah, Josh. xvi. 35, and is connected with Adullam, Socoh and Azekah. It is set down in the Onomasticon as ten Roman miles from Hierapolis, on the way toward Jerusalem, but the distance is thought too large. "It is now the village of Jarmuth, about 40° W. N. W. from Beit Netif; a mile rises above it, which we heard called 'Ermut, or Armuth, evidently a different pronunciation of the same name."

2. A town in the tribe of Issachar, Josh. xxi. 21, apparently the same place which in another passage is called Remeth, Josh. xix. 21, for in the passages the two names stand in precisely the same connection. It was a Levitical city, 1 Chr. vi. 73, and is thought to be represented by the modern village Rameh, which is about three hours north of Sebastiyeh, on the way to Keftir Kud. See RAMOTH.

JAROAH (ja-ro'ah), a Gadite, 1 Chr. v. 13.

JASAEL (ja-sa'el), 1 Esd. ix. 30, Sheshan, Ezra x. 29.

JASHEN (ja'shen), a person of whose sons at least was among David's warriors, 2 Sam. x. 18, 32. The list is somewhat different in 1 Chr. xi. 32, probably there is some transcriber's error.

JASHER (ja'shur), or rather JASHAR (ja'shar), "upright." "The book of Jasher," understood generally to mean "the book of the upright," i. e., annals of upright or faithful men—is twice mentioned in Scripture, Josh. x. 13; 2 Sam. i. 18. Nothing is with certainty known of it. There are various conjectures as to its name, among which one of the most reasonable, perhaps, is that of Bishop Lowthian, who, considering it a collection of national poetry, thought it might begin with the triumphal ode of Moses, Ex. xv., the initial words of which are yashir, "then sang," and so, after a common Hebrew custom, might receive yashir or jasher as a distinctive name. It is useless to set down other conjectures, or to try to amuse the reader with the strange speculations with which ingenious men have pleased themselves. Suffice it to say that while some fancy it was the book of Deuteronomy, others imagine it that of Judges, some think it a collection of the minor prophets and others a book of God's eternal predestination. The particulars which can be gathered with any degree of like certainty are that it must have been a poetical work or collection, and that it is now lost. Jasher has been supposed to allude to it, but this is very doubtful.

There are some rabbinical works still extant which bear this title, and an impudent forgery printed in English, in 1751 and 1829, pretending to be the book of Jasher. See LIVE, JACOB. It would be a waste of time to refute such impostures.

JASHOBEAM (ja-shob'e-am), son of Heman, one of David's worthies, and the first named in the two lists which are given of them, 2 Sam. xxiii. 8; 1 Chr. xi. 11. One of these texts is held to have suffered through the negligence of copyists; and as Jashobeam is not historically known, commentators have been much embarrassed paring them. The former attributes to him defeat of 800, the latter of 300, Philistines; the question has been whether there is a mis- of figures in one of these accounts, or whether different exploits are recorded. Further diffi- es will appear in comparing the two texts. have assumed Jashobeam to be intended in , but this is open to question. In Chronicles ead, "Jashobeam the Hachmonite, chief of eaptains: he lifted up his spear against 300 e slain by him at one time;" but in Samuel, yn, "Josheb-bassebet the Tachmonite, head of hree, Adino of Ezni, who lifted up his spear e against 800 men, whom he slew." That Jashobeam achmonite and Josheb-bassebet the Tachmon- e the same person is clear, but may not Adino zni, whose name forms the immediate anteceicles with those of Samuel and Kings. The exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines to procure David a draught of water from the well of Bethlehem is ascribed to the three chief heroes, and therefore to Jashobeam, who was the first of the three, 2 Sam. xxiii. 13-17; 1 Chr. xi. 15-19.

A Jashobeam is named among the Korhites who came to David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 6, but this could scarcely have been the same with the preceding.

We also find a Jashobeam who commanded 24,000, and did duty in David's court in the month Nisan, 1 Chr. xxvii. 2. He was the son of Zabdiel; if, therefore, he was the same as the first Jashobeam, his patronymic of "the Hachmonite" must be referred to his race rather than to his immediate father. This seems likely, as it cannot be regarded as his father's name.

acted deceitfully by the law, that by so great a miracle they might be converted to God; this failing, a famine ensued, by which they were driven from their country. Men of a lie (Chozeba)—that is, Mahlon and Chilion, called here Secure (Joash) and Flaming (Saraph), and who are styled princes of Moab because they married Moabite wives. They who returned to Lehem are Naomi and Ruth, and these are said to be ancient words because they are recorded in the book of Ruth.

JASIEL (ja'si-el), one of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 47. The name in the original is the same with that rendered Jaasiel.

of the exploit, which, as related here, consti- s the sole discrepancy between the two texts, another person? Many so explain it, and thus in a solution of the difficulty. But a further parison of the two verses will again suggest e whole of the last cited must belong to ashobeam; for not only is the parallel incom- e if we take the last clause from him and as- it to another, but in doing this we leave the eief among the captains" without an exploit in t which records some feat of every hero. We ine, therefore, to the opinion of those who sup- e that Jashobeam, or Josheb-bassebet, was the e as chief, Adino the proper name and Hach- e the patronymic of the same person; and e discrepancy which thus remains we account for, on the supposition of different exploits, but of e those corruptions of numbers of which sev- will be found in comparing the books of Chron-

JASHUB (ja'shub). 1. One of the sons of Issachar, Num. xxvi. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 1. He is called Job in Gen. xlvii. 13. As the two words have the same meaning, "the returner," the one may have been substituted for the other by an oversight. 2. One of the "sons" or former residents of Bani, who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 29.

JASHUBI-LEHEM (jash-u'bi-le-hem), "Returner to Lehem"—i. e., Bethlehem—the last in the list of the sons of Shelah, 1 Chr. iv. 22. According to one Jewish tradition, as presented by the Targum, this was Boaz; but another, as given by Jerome, represents the words as describ- ing Naomi and Ruth, who returned to Bethlehem. The latter tradition explains the whole verse thus: "Who made the sun to stand"—that is, Elimelech, in whose time the sun stood still because of those who JASMINE (jas'mine). This word does not occur in the authorized version of the Scriptures, but there are several terms in the original which may include a plant or shrub, which abounds as plentifully in Palestine as the jasmine does. There are several species of the genus "Jasminum," such as the Arabian, the Persian, the red, the bastard, the scarlet and the yellow jasmine. The common white jasmine is a climbing shrub rising on supports fifteen or twenty feet. The flowers are beautiful and the perfumes extracted from them are delicious.

JASON (ja'son), a Thessalonian Christian who received Paul and Silas, and was attacked for this by the mob, Acts xvii. 5-9. He is very likely the same that St. Paul calls his kinsman, Rom. xvi. 21.

JASON. 1. A Jewish ambassador sent to Rome, 1 Macc. viii. 17. He is probably identical

JEDUTHUN (je-du'thun), "who gives praises," also occasionally JEDITHUN, 1 Chr. xvi. 38; Ps. xxxix., title; lxxvii., title; Neh. xi. 17, a Levite, and one of those who were appointed by David to preside over the company of sacred singers. In this honorable capacity he was associated with Asaph and Heman, 1 Chr. xvi. 37-41; xxv. 6; 2 Chr. v. 12. In one place he is even designated "the king's seer," 2 Chr. xxxv. 15, implying that prophetic gifts to some extent belonged to him, though no record exists of any inspired productions having come from his hand. Indeed, it is probable, from his being designated the king's seer, that the supernatural insight which he possessed discovered itself rather in the divine wisdom with which, on particular occasions, he was enabled to counsel David than his being employed to give forth revelations of a more general kind. In grateful commemoration of the good obtained through him, and of the place he held among the servants of God, David inscribed his name in three of the titles to his Psalms, Ps. xxxix., "to the chief musician Jeduthun," and Ps. lxii., lxxvii., "to the chief musician, upon (or over) Jeduthun;" such is the exact rendering. The expression is somewhat peculiar, but it probably takes Jeduthun for the name of his choir—q. d., to the chief musician, and in particular under him to the choir of Jeduthun. The sons of Jeduthun were employed in the sacred music of the temple service as players on the harp, and also as porters or gatekeepers, 1 Chr. xvi. 38, 42; xxvi. 11. Mention is made of them so late as the time of Hezekiah, in the time also of Josiah, and even of Nehemiah in the same connection, 1 Chr. ix. 16; 2 Chr. xxix. 13, 14; Neh. xi. 17.

JEEJEEBHOY (je-je-b'hoy'), SIR JAMSET-JEE (jam-set-je'), was one of the most remarkable of the natives of Western India of the present day. He was born in 1783 at Bombay, and by commerce he amassed a vast fortune. His liberality was most wonderful, especially in connection with schools and hospitals. He spent upward of a million and a quarter of dollars on such objects, besides the large sums which he had contributed to the support of Christian schools in India and Egypt. His great eminence and unusual liberality have been recognized by the queen of Great Britain, who conferred on him the rank of knighthood in 1857. He died in 1859.

JEELI (je'e-le), 1 Esd. v. 33, Jaaiah, Ezra ii. 56.

JEELUS (je'e-lus), 1 Esd. viii. 92, Jehiel, Esd. x. 2.

JEEZER (je'e-zer), a shortened form of Abiezer, a descendant of Manasseh through Gilead, Num. xxvi. 30. See ABIEZER, 1.

JEEZERITES (je'e-zer-ites), a family of Manasseh, descendants of Jezer, Num. xxvi. 30.

JEFFERY (jef'er-e), JOHN, an eminent English divine, was born in 1647, at Ipswich. He was educated at Catharine Hall, Cambridge; and having entered the Church, he held livings in Suffolk and Norwich. He became archdeacon of Norwich in 1694, through the influence of Tillotson. He belonged to the school of Wichcote, or the "latitudinarians," as they were called, and he disliked all religious controversy. In addition to several works of Wichcote which he edited, he left sermons and tracts of his own behind him, which were published in two volumes in 1753. He died in 1720.

JEFFREYS (jef'freez), GEORGE, notorious in English history as the chief-justice of the King's Bench in the reign of James II., has left behind him a name that is the synonym of brutality and utter heartlessness. He was the ready instrument of tyrants, and his conduct on the bench was that of a ruffian. After the flight of James, in 1688, he was seized by the rabble in London, committed to the Tower, and left there to close his life in utter degradation and infamy. He died in 1689.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA (je'gar-sa-ha-doo'tha), "heap of testimony" or "witness," the Aramaic name given by Laban to the heap of stones which was raised after his reconciliation with Jacob, and on which the two families sat down and ate together, Gen. xxxi. 46, 47. Jacob's name for it was Gilead, "heap-witness," or, as we would rather put it, "witness-heap." This name may be regarded as a kind of play on Gilead, the name of the rocky and mountainous region where the memorable interview took place. See GILEAD.

JEHALELEEL (je-hal'e-lél), a descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 16.

JEHALELEL (je-hal'e-lel), a Levite, 2 Chr. xxix. 12.

JEHDEIAH (jeh-di'ah). 1. A Levite, 1 Chr. xxiv. 20. 2. An officer who had charge of David's asses, 1 Chr. xxvii. 30.

JEHEZEKEL (je-hez'e-keel), the chief of one of the courses of the priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 16. The name is the same as that of Ezekiel.

JEHEZKEL, Ezek. i. 3, marg., Ezekiel.

JEHLIAH (je-hi'ah), one of the doorkeepers for the ark, 1 Chr. xv. 24. This name is possibly for Jehiel or Jeiel; comp. 1 Chr. xv. 18.

JEHIEL (je-hi'el). 1. One of the lineal descendants of Gershon by his son Laadan, and the founder of one of the great patriarchal houses of the Levites, 1 Chr. xxiii. 8. The members of this family or clan are termed Jehieli, 1 Chr. xxvii. 21, 22. 2. A Levite, and one of the singers appointed to accompany the ark from the house of Obededom, 1 Chr. xv. 18, 20, and subsequently to minister before it in the tabernacle which David had prepared for it in Jerusalem, 1 Chr. xvi. 5. 3. The representative of the family of Jehieli in the reign of David, to whom were entrusted the precious stones contributed by the princes of Israel toward the erection of the temple, 1 Chr. xxix. 8. Jehiel was probably his surname only, or title of his rank, his personal name being Zetham, 1 Chr. xxvii. 22. 4. Son of Hachmoni, rendered in the Authorized Version "an Hachmonite," 1 Chr. xi. 11, and one of the officers of David's household, described as "with the king's sons;" probably he was their tutor, 1 Chr. xxvii. 32. 5. Son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, 2 Chr. xxi. 2. 6. A Levite of the branch of Kohath, and a descendant of Heman the singer. He took an active part in the religious reformation originated by Hezekiah, and was appointed one of the overseers of the free-will offerings given for the maintenance of the priests, 2 Chr. xxxi. 13. 7. A Levite, and one of the rulers of the house of God in the reign of Josiah, 2 Chr. xxxv. 8. 8. father of Obadiah, the head of the Benei-Jo the time of Ezra, Ezra viii. 9. In the book of Esdras, viii. 32, he is called Jezelus. 9. The father of Shechaniah, one of the contemporaries of Ezra x. 2. He is described as one of the sons of Elam. In the book of Esdras he is styled "one of the sons of Israel," 1 Esd. viii. 92. 10. One of the Benei-Elam, who, at the exhortation of Ezra, agreed to put away his strange wife, Ezra x. 26; 1 Esd. ix. 27. 11. A priest of the court of Harim, who also made public acknowledgment of his transgression in marrying a strange woman, Ezra x. 21; also 1 Esd. ix. 21, which reads "one of the sons of Israel." 12. The chief of a Benjamite family which settled at Gibeon, and one of the ancestors of Saul, 1 Chr. ix. 35, see also viii. 29. 13. Son of Hotham the Gileadite and one of David's valiant men, 1 Chr. xi. 38.

JEHIZKIAH (je-hiz-ki'ah), one of the princes or chiefs of the tribe of Ephraim who, at the invitation of the prophet Oded, withstood the king of Assyria in captivity of those whom the host of Israel under Pekah had carried away out of Judah, succeeded, after clothing and feeding them of the spoils, in restoring them to their own land.

JEHOADAH (je-ho'a-dah), one of the descendants of Saul, 1 Chr. viii. 36. He is elsewhere called Jarah, ix. 42.

JEHOADDAN (je-ho-ad'dan), the mother of Amaziah, king of Judah, 2 Ki. xiv. 2; 2 Chr. xxiv. 26.

JEHOAHAZ (je-ho'a-haz), the son and successor of Jehu, king of Israel, who reigned fifteen years—from B. C. 856 to 840, 2 Ki. xiii. 24. The history of his reign was the reverse of prosperous. Forsaking the pure worship and service of Jehovah for the ways of idolatry and sin, he made to reap the consequences of his folly in universal prostration and threatened ruin. Hazael, the king of Syria, and his son Benhadad ravaged the kingdom of Israel, and made its armies "like the chaff by thrashing." Yet the Lord did so far interfere for his help as to prevent total destruction, and people went out from under the hand of the Syrians. The disasters of his reign were in great measure retrieved by his son Joash. 2. A son of Josiah, king of Judah, and also immediate successor on the throne. It is said that he was a young man, on the death of his father, took him anointed him, and made him king, 2 Ki. xxiii. 31, although it is clear he was not the eldest son; after a brief reign of three months he was deposed by Pharaoh-Necho, and another brother—Eliakim, called afterward Jehoiaquim—placed on the throne who appears to have been two years older than Jehoahaz, ch. xxiii. 36. In the genealogical table of 1 Chr. iii. 15 Jehoahaz is even put fourth in the order of birth; in which, however, there must be some mistake, if by fourth is meant fourth in the order of birth, for in 2 Chr. xxxvi. 11 the age assigned to Zedekiah, the brother who reigned third in 1 Chr. iii. 15, makes him several years younger than Jehoahaz. Some error must have crept into one of the passages, or in the general arrangement the strict order of time is departed from in the case of the last two sons. In that passage, also, instead of Jehoahaz, Shallum is the name given to this son of Josiah—a name that occurs again in Jer. xxii. 11, and was probably given to him in consequence of the judgment which so early befell him on account of his evil ways, and probably not without respect to his unbrotherly conduct in grasping the throne. The word means retribution, and fitly expressed the fate of one who, after a brief reign of three months, was carried away in chains to Egypt, and ultimately died there.

3. A name applied on one occasion to the youngest son of Jehoram, king of Judah, 2 Chr. xxi. 17. But his proper name was Ahaziah, and under this name he is known as king. See AHAZIAH.

JEHOASH (je-ho'ash). 1. A king of Judah, 2 Ki. xi. 21; xii. 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 18; xiv. 13. See

JEHOIACHIN (je-ho-ya'kin), appearing also as JECONIAH and CONIAH; in Ezek. i. 2 contracted into JOIACHIN; the Greek uses three different forms in different places. He was the son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and reigned only for three months and ten days in Jerusalem, for Nebuchadnezzar came against Judah to revenge the alliance that had been entered into by his father with Egypt; and Jehoiachin, his mother Elnathan and many besides were carried away to Babylon, 2 Ki. xxiv. 8-16. In the latter passage, Jeho-pears to have been the last survivor in Solomon's line; he is at least the last who has a place in the genealogies; they pass over, after him, to the line of Nathan. That such was to be the result, the prophet Jeremiah gave distinct intimation when he changed Jeconiah—the name by which he called Jehoiachin—into Coniah, withdrawing the Je, or abbreviated form of Jehovah, from it, and declaring, in the most solemn manner, that "this man was to be written childless, and that none of his seed should ever sit on the throne of David,"

THE PROPHET DENOUNCING PASHUR.—See JEREMIAH and PASHUR.

JOASH, 3. 2. A king of Israel, xiii. 10, 25; xiv. 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 16, 17. See JOASH, 4.

JEHOHANAN (je-ho-ha'nan). 1. One of the Levite porters of the family of the Korhites, 1 Chr. xxvi. 3. 2. A military chief in the reign of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chr. xvii. 15. It was perhaps he that was father of the Ishmael whom Jehoiada associated with him for the purpose of making Joash king, 2 Chr. xxiii. 1. 3. One who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 28. 4. A priest in the days of Joiakim, Neh. xii. 12. 5. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. xii. 42.

achin is said to have been eighteen years old when he became king; but in 2 Chr. xxxvi. 9 his age is given as only eight, which is the more probable number, as his father died when only thirty-six years old. Jehoiachin was kept not only in exile, but in actual imprisonment, nearly all the rest of his life. After thirty-six years, it is said, Evil-Merodach, the successor of Nebuchadnezzar, restored him to liberty, and even elevated him above the other subject-kings who were about the Chaldean court. An allowance was also given him to support his position with an air of respectability, which continued to the end of his life, but how long that might be is uncertain. Jehoiachin ap-

Jer. xxii. 30. Whether this means that he was actually without offspring, it at all events announces that the royal line was no longer to be reckoned from him or the branch of the house of David he represented. The patience of God was exhausted, and no further account was to be taken of it. In 1 Chr. iii. 16 there are sons reckoned to Jehoiachin—first, Zedekiah, by whom is doubtless meant the uncle who succeeded him; also Assir, who may actually have been his son; but the genealogy passes over him to Salathiel.

JEHOIADA (je-ho-ya'dah), sometimes contracted into Joiada. 1. Father of Benaiah, one of David's well-known chief-captains, 1 Chr. xxvii. 5. This Jehoiada is also called a chief-priest, while his son was reckoned among the captains, and undoubtedly followed the vocation of a warrior, 2 Sam. viii. 18, though by his birth he should rather have given himself to sacred ministrations. His father, it would appear from another passage, 1 Chr. xii. 27, was among those who came to David at Hebron while still matters were in suspense between him and the house of Saul; and on that occasion Jehoiadah was at the head of 3700 Aaronites, whence, it may be inferred, he was of priestly rank. The irregularity in the case of his son Benaiah giving himself to military pursuits would probably be regarded as finding its justification in the peculiarities of the time and the necessity of applying all available talents and resources to the support of the cause of David.

A Jehoiada, son of Benaiah, appears in 1 Chr. xxvii. 34, as one of David's chief counselors, next to Ahithophel. The probability is that there is a corruption in the text, and that it should be Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, as in the preceding notice. If this is not the case, then we must understand Jehoiada to be designated as the son of another Benaiah.

2. A person who filled the office of high-priest in the time of Athaliah, and acted the chief part in planning the overthrow of her usurpation, 2 Chr. xxiii. The precise period when he entered on his high-priesthood is not stated, nor whether it was before Ahaziah's ascension to the throne or after it. At the time of Ahaziah's death he appears to have been in the office, and for the important part in regal affairs which he soon after played he had the advantage, not only of his high official position, but of near affinity to the royal family. His wife Jehosheba, or Jehoshabeath, as it is also written, was daughter of the late king Jehoram, sister of Ahaziah, whose seed, with one exception, was slain by the ambitious and cruel Athaliah. That one exception was the child Joash, who was secretly conveyed away by his aunt Jehosheba, and for six years preserved in a chamber connected with the temple buildings. At the close of that period, and when the people had already become disgusted with the course pursued by Athaliah, Jehoiada concerted measures with the leading men in the kingdom for the destruction of the murderess and the proclamation of the youthful Joash as the lawful king. The measures were well laid and perfectly successful, issuing in the sudden death of Athaliah and the installation of Joash as king at the tender age of seven years. Under the advice and direction of Jehoiada, both king and people entered into a solemn covenant to be faithful to the Lord, and to put away from them the instruments and ministers of idolatry. Accordingly the house of Baal was broken down, and Nathan the high-priest slain at the altar, while the service of Jehovah was again re-established in conformity with the law of Moses. Matters went on well both with king and people so long as this upright and faithful high-priest lived, and his life was prolonged to a very advanced age. This is given in 2 Chr. xxiv. 15 as one hundred and thirty years; but it is almost certain there must be some corruption in the text, as in that case Jehoiada must have been fully ninety when he took the leading part in organizing the conspiracy against Athaliah, which can scarcely be regarded as probable. There would also have been fifty years of disparity between his age and that of his wife. For the great services he had rendered to his country, and especially to the royal house, possibly also in part from his affinity to that house by marriage, the singular honor was granted to him of being buried among the kings of Judah, 2 Chr. xxiv. 16.

3. A priest in the days of Jeremiah, Jer. xxix. 26. By comparing the passage referred to in the writings of Jeremiah with 2 Ki. xxv. 18 we are led to infer that this Jehoiada was succeeded in his office by Zephaniah, and that, as Zephaniah is expressly called "the second priest," his predecessor must have been the same—viz., the priest who stood nearest to the high-priest, and who would naturally, on certain occasions, have to act as a kind of vice high-priest.

JEHOIAKIM (je-ho-ya'kim), contracted into Joiakim, a king of Judah, the eighteenth of David's line, including himself, and not counting Jehoahaz, and the last but two before the captivity. His reign extended from B. C. 609 to 598. His original name was Eliakim, differing from the other only in the more general name of God, El, being placed at the commencement, instead of the more peculiar Jehovah. The change was made by Pharaoh-Necho, probably for no other reason than as a memorial of Jehoiakim's dependence on the throne of Egypt. His father Josiah had lost his life in an unwise attempt to arrest the progress of Pharaoh's march toward the Euphrates, where the resources of Egypt and Babylon were preparing to come into deadly conflict. The little kingdom of Judah was immediately laid under tribute to Egypt; a heavy fine imposed on it; Jehoahaz, the eldest son of Josiah, deposed, almost as soon as crowned, and Eliakim, with his new name, set upon the throne—bound, of course, in fealty to the king of Egypt. But this bond was soon broken by a change of fortune in the affairs of the Egyptian monarch, who sustained a sad reverse in the disastrous battle at Carchemish, which left Nebuchadnezzar virtual master of the world. Jehoiakim had been little more than three years on the throne (in the fourth year of his reign, says Jeremiah, ch. xlv. 2; but Daniel, ch. i. 1, by a different computation, probably by referring to an earlier part of the transactions, makes it a year less) when Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem, and after a short siege got possession of it. The king and the chiefs of the nation now formally transferred their allegiance from the king of Egypt to the king of Babylon, and Nebuchadnezzar carried with him to Babylon some of the seed royal and members of the best families as hostages for the fulfillment of the stipulations. Among these were Daniel and the three noble youths whose faith and piety shone out so brightly amid the corruptions of the Chaldean court. At Jerusalem, however, idolatry and wickedness continued to bear sway. The humiliations which had befallen the kingdom, and which should have been regarded as solemn chastisements from Heaven for the sinful courses pursued, seemed to have no other effect than to harden the heart in evil, and make it cling the more fondly to its deceitful confidences. Jehoiakim, though the son of a godly father, did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, and was so generally followed in the same course that, as is plainly intimated by the sacred historian, there was a fresh bursting forth in his reign of the abominable idolatries and God-dishonoring practices which in the days of Manasseh had cried so loudly to Heaven for vengeance, 2 Ki. xxiv. 2-4. The guilt was now the more aggravated, and argued a more resolute spirit of alienation from God, that not only were God's judgments calling aloud for repentance, but the earnest remonstrances and solemn warnings of the prophets, especially of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, were continually pressing upon king and people the inevitable retribution which they were provoking, and the necessity of a thorough reformation if they would avoid the impending doom. But so far from profiting by these wholesome admonitions, the king only waxed violent against the servants of God; Jeremiah was opposed and persecuted, and his writings contemptuously burned in the fire, Jer. xxxvi.; Urijah, another faithful prophet, was even pursued into Egypt, slain with the sword, and his very corpse treated with barbarity, Jer. xxxvi. 21-23. Such extreme wickedness and perversity could not but draw down fresh visitations of divine judgment; and accordingly the land was harassed on every side; bands of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites invaded it, 2 Ki. xxiv. 7, not improbably instigated by the Chaldean monarch; for after three years' servitude to Babylon, Jehoiakim, in a spirit of senseless infatuation, proved false to his engagements, and courted anew the alliance of Egypt. The ungodliness and folly of this course were very strikingly portrayed by Ezekiel in ch. xvii. of his prophecies, and the terrible retaliation announced which it was sure to provoke. It was also strongly denounced by Jeremiah, ch. ii. 18, 36; xxvii. 1-11; and though Nebuchadnezzar was so much occupied with other and mightier adversaries that he could not for a time come personally to Jerusalem to chastise the king's unfaithfulness, yet it was only what might be expected that he would give his tributaries and allies in the neighborhood a license to harass Judah. At length Jehoiakim himself fell a victim to his own sinful and crooked policy, but by what agents, or in what precise manner, is not recorded. That his death was a violent one there can be no doubt, from the strong language used regarding it by Jeremiah, which speaks even of indignities of the most shameful kind being poured upon his lifeless body, Jer. xxii. 18, 19; xxxvi. 30, 31. Thus perished one of the most worthless princes that ever sat on the throne of David; and within two or three months after his death the king of Babylon came, and amid other severe reprisals carried off his son Jehoiachin and all the most influential people to Babylon.

JEHOIARIB (je-ho-ya'rib), abbreviated to JOIARIB, JOARIB and JARIB, head of the first of the twenty-four courses into which the priests were divided according to David's arrangement, 1 Chr. xxiv. 7. Of these courses only four are mentioned as having returned from Babylon, those of Jedaiah, Immer, Pashur and Harim, Ezra ii. 36-39; Neh. vii. 39-42; and Jewish tradition says that each of these was divided into six, so as to preserve the original number with the original names. This might account for our finding at a later period Mattathias described as of the course of Joarib, 1 Macc. ii. 1, even though this course did not return from Babylon. We find, however, that some of the descendants of Jehoiarib did return from Babylon, 1 Chr. ix. 10; Neh. xi. 10; we find also that in subsequent lists other of the priestly courses are mentioned as returning, and in one of these that of Jehoiarib is expressly mentioned, Neh. x. 2-8; xii. 1-7, and mention is made of Mattenai as chief of the house of Joarib in the days of Jeshua, Neh. xii. 19. The probability, therefore, is that the course of Jehoiarib did go up, but at a later date perhaps than those four mentioned, Ezra ii. 36-39 and Neh. vii. 39-42.

To the course of Joarib Josephus tells us he belonged.

JEHONADAB (je-ho-na'dab), contracted into JONADAB, which see.

JEHONATHAN (je-ho-na'than). 1. The superintendent of David's storehouses, 1 Chr. xxvii. 25. 2. A Levite sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people, 2 Chr. xvii. 8. 3. A priest, the representative of the family or course of Shemaiah, he put away the image of Baal that his father had made," 2 Ki. iii. 2, 3. It fell to him to punish the Moabites, who had revolted after the death of his father; but the expedition which he undertook, with the assistance of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and of the king of Moab, was saved from utter destruction only by miraculous intervention through the instrumentality of Elisha, and was not successful to the extent of reducing the Moabites to subjection again, 2 Ki. iii. 4-27. Some other instances of connection between the king and the prophet sent one of his disciples to anoint as king for this very purpose, 2 Ki. ix.; compare the original command to Elijah, 1 Ki. xix. 16, 17; xxi. 17-29. Joram was engaged in war with the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead, in struggling for the recovery of which his father had received a mortal wound. Joram, being himself now wounded, had returned to Jezreel to be healed, apparently leaving Jehu at the head of the army. And when Jehu was anointed king, he laid his plans and executed them with such celerity that Joram had no intel-

Jeremiah weighing out the money in payment for his kinsman's piece of land.

Neh. x. 18. He is probably the same with the Jonathan mentioned in Neh. x. 35, Jonathan being the contracted form of Jehonathan.

JEHORAM (je-ho'ram), or, contracted, JORAM (jo'ram), the name of two kings.

1. The son of Ahab and Jezebel, succeeded to the throne of the ten tribes after the short reign of his brother Ahaziah. He reigned twelve years, from about B. C. 896 to 884. Like all the rest of their kings, he is declared to have wrought evil in the sight of the Lord, not departing from the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat; yet his evil doing was "not like his father and like his mother, for appear in 2 Ki. iv. 13; v. 5-8; viii. 4-6, but more especially in 2 Ki. vi., vii. From these we learn that Joram was very much engaged in war with the Syrians, that repeatedly he was laid under deep obligations by the miraculous agency of Elisha, and yet that he was at one time on the point of committing a judicial murder, as if the prophet deserved to die because he had not by a miracle restrained the ravages of famine. At last the vengeance which had been denounced against the house of Ahab by Elijah, on occasion of the murder of Naboth, though it had been delayed on account of some manifestations of penitence, was executed upon Joram by Jehu, whom Elisha had ligence of them till Jehu met him close by Jezreel, and drawing a bow, shot him dead in his chariot. The body was thrown out upon the ground; and the hand of God was manifest in this—that the plot of ground was no other than the possession of Naboth, in which it had been predicted that the bloody requital should take place.

2. The son of Jehoshaphat, succeeded him in the throne of Judah for eight years. There are some very considerable difficulties as to the chronology, however, on which we do not enter here, see 2 Ki. i. 17; iii. 1; viii. 16. His character presented a melancholy contrast to that of his father, as "he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, as did the house of Ahab, for the daughter of Ahab was his wife; and he did evil in the sight of the Lord." He appears early to have given proofs of his character by murdering the whole of his brothers, to whom his father had assigned subordinate posts in the government, and also some of the other "princes of Israel." Such atrocities could scarcely fail to excite disaffection. Accordingly, we read that Edom revolted from the kingdom of Judah during his reign; and though he executed terrible vengeance upon the Edomites, he was unable to reduce them to obedience. At the same time also there were internal troubles, for Libnah revolted "from under his hand, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his fathers." On account of his daring and persistent wickedness after the pattern of Ahab's family, there came to him a letter with terrible threatenings from the prophet Elijah. And accordingly the Lord stirred up the Philistines and "the Arabians that were near the Ethiopians," who carried on war successfully against him, and spoiled his kingdom and his very palace of its treasures, and led captive his wives and all his sons except the youngest. In addition to all this, he was smitten with an incurable disease, and at the end of two years "his bowels fell out by reason of his sickness, so he died of sore diseases." And his people marked their strong disapprobation by withholding all royal honors from his burial, 2 Ki. viii. 16-24; 2 Chr. xxi.

JEHOSHABEATH (je-ho-shab'e-ath). See JEHOSEBA.

JEHOSHAPHAT (je-hosh'a-fat). 1. A great officer, called "recorder" or annalist, under David and Solomon, 2 Sam. viii. 16; 1 Kings iv. 3.

2. The head of one of Solomon's commissariat departments in Issachar, 1 Ki. iv. 17.

3. The son of Asa, who succeeded his father on the throne of Judah at the age of thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years, 914-890 B. C., 1 Ki. xv. 24; xxii. 42.

He was a man of piety, and his reign was upon the whole prosperous. At first, the jealousy of Judah and Israel still subsisting, Jehoshaphat placed his kingdom in a posture of defence against that of the ten tribes, garrisoning the cities which Asa had conquered. He also took away the idolatrous high-places and groves in Judah, and in the third year of his reign sent princes, priests and Levites with the book of the law to teach the people. And the blessing of God was upon him; he had riches and honor in abundance, and neighboring tribes respected him and brought him presents and tribute, 2 Chr. xvii. But then came the great error of his life and reign. He not only contracted friendship and alliance with the weak and wicked Ahab, possibly from mutual fear of Syria, but sanctioned, it would seem, the marriage of his son Jehoram with the atrocious daughter of Ahab and Jezebel—a marriage which inflicted evil for several generations upon Judah. Jehoshaphat after this frequently aided the kings of Israel. He was with Ahab in the disastrous battle of Ramoth-gilead, and appearing in the field in royal state, nearly lost his life, being mistaken for the Israelitish king. His cry to the Lord, who delivered him, ought to be noticed, 1 Ki. xxii. 1-40. Jehoshaphat had shown, while at Samaria, his distrust and dislike of the idolatrous priests; but when he returned to Jerusalem, he was rebuked by the prophet Jehu for having at all allied himself with the ungodly. He took the rebuke in good part, and set himself again, both personally and by delegated officers, to carry out religious reforms in his own kingdom, and to render the administration of justice pure, 1 Ki. xix. The fatal alliance, however, with Israel still hampered him. He joined in a commercial project with Ahaziah, and prepared a fleet at Ezion-geber. For this he was reproved by Eliezer, who predicted the loss of the fleet. Jehoshaphat then refused any further partnership with Ahaziah in such enterprises, 1 Ki. xxii. 48, 49. Afterward he was attacked by the Moabites, Ammonites and other tribes. In the prospect of this great danger he proclaimed a fast, and humbly sought the Lord's help, which was promised through Jahaziel, a Levite. Accordingly, God supernaturally interfered. The invaders set upon each other and were destroyed, and Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem in triumph, 1 Ki. xxii. 1-29, this deliverance being supposed, not without probable reason, to be alluded to in Ps. xlviii., lxxxiii. It was, perhaps, subsequently to this event that Jehoshaphat, with his vassal the king of Edom, joined Jehoram, king of Israel, in that expedition against Moab which was terminated by the fearful deed of the Moabitish king, 2 Ki. iii.

The last years of Jehoshaphat were peaceful. Probably he admitted his son Jehoram to partnership with him, whom also, when previously he joined Ahab, it is thought he had left in authority at home. He had many sons, to whom he gave gifts and made them governors of cities, but to Jehoram, the eldest, he left the crown, 2 Chr. xxi. 1-3. He is called Josaphat in Matt. i. 8.

4. The father of King Jehu, 2 Ki. ix. 2, 14. 5. A priest in the time of David, 1 Chr. xv. 24.

JEHOSHAPHAT, THE VALLEY OF, the name now given to the valley of the Kidron. It is broad and shallow where it commences to the north-west; passing eastward, it has the general platform of the city to the south. Then, when it meets the north-western corner of Olivet, it turns due south, pursuing this direction to Bir Eyub, or the well of Job, at the junction with the valley of Hinnom, where it bends again to the south-east. From the church of the Virgin it is a narrow ravine, sinking rapidly between Ophel and Olivet, till at the Bir Eyub it is more than 500 feet below the top of Zion. Into the depth of this melancholy glen one could hardly look down from the roof of the temple above without dizziness. Various sepulchres are found along the course of this ravine, among them the so-called tomb of Absalom, and close to it the reputed tomb of Jehoshaphat, from which possibly the valley may have taken its name. But it is not so called either in Scripture or by Josephus, nor can the use of this appellation be traced higher than the fourth century after Christ. Both Jews and Mohammedans believe that it is to be the scene of the last judgment; and the latter show a stone pillar on which they say Mohammed is to sit. This notion is probably derived from Joel iii. 2, 12; but there is a strong objection against the identification of the valley, emek, there mentioned, with the ravine, nahhal, of the Kidron. It has otherwise been imagined that Joel alludes to "the valley of Berachah" or "blessing," 2 Chr. xx. 26; but as neither of these localities at all comports with the magnitude of the subject treated of by the prophet, we have no alternative but that of considering the words, not as constituting a proper name or the name of any specific locality, but as symbolical in their import, and designed to characterize the theatre of the bloody wars that took place after the Babylonish captivity, by which the hostile nations contiguous to Judæa had signal vengeance inflicted upon them. They literally signify the valley where Jehovah judgeth, and mean the scene of divine judgments. The term valley appears to have been selected on account of such locality being mentioned in Scripture as the usual theatre of military conflict.

JEHOSHEBA (je-ho'she-bah), a daughter of Jehoram, king of Judah, but whether also of Athaliah, his idolatrous and cruel wife, is not stated, 2 Ki. xi. 2. From the pious character maintained by Jehosheba, it has very commonly been supposed that she must have been Jehoram's daughter by another spouse. Of this, however, there is no certain evidence, and it is quite possible that, by coming under better influences, she may, even though the daughter of so infamous a mother, have taken the part she did. She became married to the excellent high-priest Jehoiada—the only recorded instance of a female of the royal line marrying into one of the families of Aaron; and by preserving, in concert with her husband, the life of the young Joash till he could be brought forth for the occupation of the throne, she rendered an important service to the cause of righteousness and order at a very critical and melancholy period. See JEHOIADA.

JEHOSHUA, or JEHOSHUAH (je-hosh'-eu-a), the full form of the name generally found as Joshua, Num. xiii. 16; 1 Chr. vii. 27. See JOSHUA.

JEHOVAH (je-ho'vah), the name of God in most frequent use in the Hebrew Scriptures; in the English Bible, for a reason to be afterward mentioned, it is commonly represented, we cannot say rendered, by the word LORD.

In treating of this most sacred name we shall inquire—

1. WHETHER JEHOVAH IS THE TRUE AND ORIGINAL PRONUNCIATION OF THE NAME.—When the Hebrew language was first reduced to writing, it was not thought necessary to invent signs to indicate the vowel sounds; only the consonants were expressed in writing at first. The vowel signs which appear in our Hebrew Bibles were not introduced for centuries after the Hebrew ceased to be a living language. Further, it is necessary to explain that in reading the Scriptures the Jews were accustomed, in certain cases, to substitute for the word in the written text another word which appeared to them more proper to be used. One of the words thus written but not read was the divine four-letter name, YHWH. Soon after the Babylonish captivity the Jewish teachers, from a feeling of superstitious reverence, allowed this name to fall almost entirely into disuse. They thought it too sacred to take upon their lips, even when reading the Scriptures in the synagogues on the Sabbath. Wherever, therefore, this name appears in the sacred Scriptures, they substituted for it—not in the written text, but in reading—some other less sacred and mysterious name of God, usually the name Adonai. They continued to write YHWH—not for the world would they alter the text in one iota—but they read Adonai. That this was the established practice centuries before Christ is evident from the fact that in the oldest Greek version, that of the Seventy, the name YHWH, "Jehovah," is not found even once, but instead of it, kurios, which is the Greek equivalent of Adonai, "Lord." The Greek translators gave the equivalent of the text as read, not of the text as written. The sacred name would have been desecrated by translation into Greek even more than by being uttered in Hebrew. Now, in order to account for the formation of the word Jehovah one other explanation is required, and it is this—that when the Jewish grammarians found it necessary, in order to preserve as far as possible the ancient pronunciation of their language, to invent a system of signs to represent the vowel sounds, which had hitherto been without any representation in writing, and proceeded to attach these signs to the sacred text, the rule they observed in the case of the words above mentioned, which were written but not read, was to attach to these words not the points which properly belong to them, but the points belonging to the words which were read in place of them. Following this rule, they attached to YHWH the points of 'ādonāy; and hence the name Yēhovah, "Jehovah." There can be no doubt, therefore, that the common pronunciation, notwithstanding the sacredness with which, from early associations, we have been accustomed to invest it, is quite erroneous, combining as it does the consonants of one word with the vowels of another. It is besides comparatively modern; it is found in none of the ancient versions; it was known to none of the Church Fathers. Even Origen, in that column of his "Hexapla" in which he tried to express in Greek characters the original Hebrew as pronounced in his day, always, so far as can be ascertained, set down Adonai where the Hebrew has YHWH. It is said that Peter Galatin, a learned convert from Judaism of the sixteenth century, was the first who suggested the pronunciation Jehovah.

2. WHAT IS THE TRUE IMPORT OF THIS DIVINE NAME?—In attempting to answer this question the two most important passages for our purpose are found in Ex. iii. and vi. In the former we read that God called to Moses from the midst of the burning bush, and after commanding him to put off his shoes from his feet because the place whereon he stood was holy, proceeded to declare himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob. And when Moses hid his face because he was afraid to look upon God, then the LORD said, "I have seen, I have seen the affliction of my people, and I have heard their cry, . . . and have come down to deliver them; . . . and now, come, I will send thee to Egypt." And when Moses shrank back from the arduous mission, saying to God, "Who am I that I should go to Pharaoh, and that I should bring the children of Israel forth from Egypt?" the divine answer is, "But I will be with thee." And again, when Moses asks by what name he will speak of him to his people, the answer of God is, "I AM THAT I AM. Thus shalt thou say is thus ascertained. The only difference between the two names is that the one is a verb in the first person, the other the same verb in the third. The meaning of the one is I AM; the meaning of the other is HE IS. The one is therefore the name of God revealing himself, the other the name of this revealed God contemplated and adored by man.

JEHOIAKIM DESTROYING THE "ROLL OF A BOOK" OF JEREMIAH'S PROPHECIES (Jeremiah xxxvi.).—See JEREMIAH.

to the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." And this is repeated in the verse which follows, ver. 15: "And God said moreover unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, THE LORD God of our fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you: THIS IS MY NAME FOR EVER, and this is my memorial unto all generations." From which it is evident that YHWH is just another form of the name I AM; and its origin

In both names the root-idea is that of undervived existence. When it is said that God's name is HE IS, simple being is not all that is affirmed. He is in a sense in which no other being is. He is; and the cause of his being is in himself. He is because he is. This is evidently the meaning of the divine utterance, "I am that I am." Just as elsewhere, on a similar occasion, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy," Ex. xxxiii. 19—i. e., in the exercise of my mercy I am under no constraint—what I will I will; what I do I do; so here—that I am I am; I am because I am; the cause (if one may so speak) of the being of God is only in himself. This surely was a wonderful conception for those early times; but, indeed, it is in a simple, unpolished age, before the mind has been varnished over by the influences of civilization, that such thoughts most easily find entrance and take firmest hold. The notion, therefore, that the name Jehovah had its origin rather in the age of David and Solomon than in that of Moses, is not less false philosophically than critically.

From the idea of underived and independent existence, which seems to be the root-idea in this divine name, follows at once that of independent and uncontrolled will and action. This also is a leading thought in the narrative quoted a little ago. I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob, and my name is I AM. As God's being is underived, so his will is uncontrolled. All other being flows from him, so all other wills must bend to his. It may not always seem so; it may rather seem as if the reverse of this were sometimes true. Doubtless in Moses' day the will of Pharaoh seemed to be the great power in Egypt. But God revealed himself as Jehovah, the self-existent, the supreme and sovereign Will; and Pharaoh—what proved he then? Man, that is a worm, and a son of man that is a worm.

With the idea of underived existence are also closely allied those of eternity and unchangeableness. He who has in himself the cause of his being can never cease to be, and he cannot change. This has been thought by not a few to be the primary import of the name Jehovah, which accordingly has been rendered "The Eternal." And in support of this view, the form of the name, a verb in the future tense, has been appealed to, יהוה, he is; rather, it has been said, "he will be, he shall never cease to be." But the so-called future in Hebrew differs very widely from our future, expressing as it does what has been wont to be in the past as well as what will be in the future—the ongoing of being or action, as opposed to its completion, in whatever sphere of time. And there can be no doubt that in the present case, though it is impossible to reproduce the Hebrew exactly in English, the translation "I am that I am" is much more accurate than "I will be that I will be."

Still, though the ideas of eternity and unchangeableness do not constitute the primary import of the name Jehovah, they are in Scripture, as we might anticipate, very constantly associated with it. "I am Jehovah; I change not," Mal. iii. 6. To Moses the revelation of this name was connected with God's covenant promise to Abraham—the promise of a seed in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed. I am the God of Abraham, and I am Jehovah—the God of Abraham, and of Abraham's seed for evermore. Hence it is that Jehovah is pre-eminently in Scripture the covenant God of Israel, the God of grace and truth and love. Though these attributes are not, primarily at least, contained in the name, they are inseparably associated with it.

3. WHAT IS THE RELATION BETWEEN THE DIVINE NAMES JEHOVAH AND ELOHIM?—This is an important question—important in itself, and also in its bearings upon other questions of Scripture criticism, in the solution of which the whole Christian world is interested. It is well known that the discussions as to the origin and authorship of the Pentateuch turn very much, though not so much now as formerly, on the import and use of these names. The fact that in some sections of Genesis the one name is almost exclusively employed, in some the other, whilst in one section, Gen. ii. 4–iii. 24, both are combined in the compound name Jehovah-Elohim, could not fail to attract attention even at an early period; but with the attempts to explain this and similar phenomena in Hebrew Scriptures we are at present concerned only in so far as they may have tended to throw light on the import and relation of the divine names themselves. The view which early found acceptance among the Jewish doctors was that Elohim is the name of the Supreme as the God of judgment, Jehovah as the God of grace and mercy. But let us see what light the Scriptures themselves throw upon this subject.

The name Elohim is the name of God as THE DEITY. The plural form of the name does not denote plurality nor a trinity of persons, but, as constantly in Hebrew, the greatness and majesty of Him who bears the name. It is the name of God rather as a power—the supreme power—to whom weak man looks up with adoring awe. Hence the frequent opposition in Scripture of Elohim and "man," Deut. v. 21; iv. 33, etc. In the name Jehovah, on the other hand, the personality of the Supreme is more distinctly expressed. It is everywhere a proper name, denoting the personal God, and him only, whereas Elohim partakes more of the character of a common noun, denoting usually, indeed, but not necessarily nor uniformly, the Supreme. Elohim may be grammatically defined by the article, or by having a suffix attached to it, or by being in construction with a following noun. The Hebrew may say the Elohim, the true God, in opposition to all false gods, but he never says the Jehovah, for Jehovah is the name of the true God only. He says again and again my God, but never my Jehovah; for when he says my God, he means Jehovah. He speaks of the God of Israel, but never of the Jehovah of Israel, for there is no other Jehovah. He speaks of the living God, but never of the living Jehovah, for he cannot conceive of Jehovah as other than living. It is obvious, therefore, that the name Elohim is the name of more general import, seeing that it admits of definition and limitation in these various ways, whereas Jehovah is the more specific and personal name, altogether incapable of limitation. Occasionally Elohim is used in the very general sense of superhuman, supernatural, as when the witch of Endor exclaimed that she saw Elohim ascending from the earth, 1 Sam. xxviii. 13; she could never have said she saw Jehovah ascending. So we read of "men of God, Elohim"—i. e., men who seemed to have become partakers in some measure of the divine nature—but never of men of Jehovah. And of man when he was first created, it is said that he was created in the image of Elohim, not of Jehovah.

But if Elohim is a name of wider import than Jehovah, the latter is a name of deeper significance. It is the incommunicable name of God, emphatically THE NAME, embodying as it does his most distinctive attributes—self-existence, unchangeableness, eternity.

As the entrance of sin and suffering was the occasion of this deeper revelation of the divine nature, Jehovah is eminently the God of redemption—under the old covenant, the God of Israel. The correlative of Elohim is man; the correlative of Jehovah is redeemed man, Israel. Elohim is God in nature, Jehovah is God in grace, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7. Elohim is the God of providence, Jehovah the God of promise and prophecy. "Thus saith Jehovah" are the words with which the prophet al-

4. WHEN DID GOD FIRST REVEAL HIMSELF AS JEHOVAH?—If Jehovah be in a special manner the name of God as the Redeemer, it would seem that the revelation of the name must have been coeval with the promise of redemption. Accordingly, in the second section of Genesis, in which sin and redemption are first mentioned, the name Jehovah also for the first time appears, compare also Gen. iv. 1, 26. It has been thought, however, that the conclusion most naturally deducible from this early introduction of the name in the sacred Scriptures is shown to be incorrect by Ex. vi. 2, 3, where we read, "And God spake unto Moses, and said, I am Jehovah; and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them." But those who think so have not studied the last words just quoted in the light of other scriptures, otherwise they would have perceived that by "name" must be meant here not the two syllables which make up the word Jehovah, but the idea which it expresses. When we read in Isaiah, ch. lii. 6, "Therefore my people shall know my name," or in Jeremiah, ch. xvi. 21, "They shall know that my name is Jehovah," or in Psalms, Ps. ix. 11, 17, "They that know thy name shall put their trust in thee," we see at once that to know Jehovah's name is something very different from knowing the four letters of which it is composed. It is to know by experience that Jehovah really is what his name declares him to be, compare also Isa. xix. 20, 21; Ezek. xx. 5, 9; 2 Chr. vi. 33. And when, therefore, it is said of the patriarchs that God was not known to them by his name Jehovah, but appeared to them in the character of God Almighty, what is meant is that the aspect of the divine character which was presented to them was rather God's almightiness than that special aspect which is expressed in the name Jehovah. God makes himself known as Jehovah when he hears the cry of his people out of the depths, rescues them from the fearful pit, from the iron furnace, and fills their hearts with the joys of salvation. This was an experience to which, outwardly at least, the patriarchs were usually strangers. The name of God Almighty was thus to them a sufficient support of their faith; the dark days had not yet come when faith, in order to endure, must take a deeper view and a firmer grasp of Him who is its object.

But though we believe the name Jehovah was known to the patriarchs and revealed anew by Moses, it was not until the great awaking of the prophetic spirit under Samuel that its import and the value of the revelation embodied in it were fully realized by the people of Israel. Jehovah is eminently the prophetic name of God. For while the psalmists frequently address their prayers and hymns to Elohim, it is always Jehovah who speaks by the prophets. Thus we account for the fact that after the age of Samuel the name Jehovah seems to have come into more common and, as it were, popular use than before, and especially appears with much greater frequency as an element in the names of individuals—a fact from which the rash and erroneous conclusion has recently been drawn that previous to that age the name was altogether unknown.

JEHOVAH-JIREH (jir'eh), "Jehovah will provide," the name given by Abraham to the mount on which the angel of the Lord appeared to him and not only arrested the sacrifice of Isaac, but provided a ram to be put in his place, Gen. xxii. 14. It was embodying in a name the sentiment expressed in an earlier part of the narrative, "God will provide for himself a burnt-offering." For the import of the transactions themselves, see under ABRAHAM.

JEHOVAH-NISSI (-nis'se), "Jehovah my banner," the name given by Moses to an altar he erected in the wilderness in commemoration of the JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (tsid-ken'noo), "Jehovah our righteousness," a name applied by the prophet Jeremiah to the king who should spring from David's line, Jer. xxiii. 6, margin, thus describing Messiah's divine character. The same appellation is given to the Church, Jer. xxxiii. 16, margin, who, by her union with Christ, shares his titles. Some critics, however, propose a different translation: "This is he who shall call to her, Jehovah our righteousness."

JEHU (je'heu). 1. A prophet who pronounced the divine sentence against Baasha, king of Israel, 1 Ki. xvi. 1-4, 7, 12. He also rebuked Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, 2 Chr. xix. 1-3, and compiled some annals of the last-named monarch, 2 Chr. xx. 34.

2. The son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi. He was designated as the future king of Israel to Elijah in the wilderness of Horeb, 1 Ki. xix. 16, 17, and his commission was to extirpate the idolavictory gained by the Israelites under Joshua over the forces of Amalek, Ex. xvii. 15.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (-sha'lom), "Jehovah is peace," the name given by Gideon to the altar he built at Ophrah of the Abi-ezrites after the angel of the Lord had appeared to him, Jud. vi. 24, at that place.

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH (-sham'mah), "Jehovah is there," the name to be given to the city prophetically described by Ezekiel, Ezek. xlvi. 35, margin.

JEHOZABAD (je-ho-za'bad). 1. One of the conspirators who slew Joash, king of Judah, 2 Ki. xii. 21. 2. One of the Levite porters, 1 Chr. xxvi. 4. 3. A military commander in Jehoshaphat's reign, 2 Chr. xvii. 18.

JEHOZADAK (je-ho-tsa'dak), the son of the high-priest Seraiah. He was carried into captivity to Babylon, 1 Chr. vi. 14, 15, when Judah and Jerusalem were captured and laid waste by Nebuchadnezzar. He was the father of Jeshua or Joshua, who returned with Zerubbabel. He is more frequently called Jozadak and Josedech.

trous house of Ahab, slaying those whom the sword of Hazael would not touch. Though so designated, the solemn anointing of Jehu to his office was to be not yet. Elijah passed first into the eternal world, and it was not till Ahab had ended his weak and godless career, and Ahaziah had committed his daring acts of impiety, and Joram had for some years swayed the sceptre with sinful hand, that Elisha, who had succeeded to Elijah's office, admonished doubtless by God that the time of repentance was past and judgment must now be done, sent a messenger, one of the sons of the prophets, to Ramoth-gilead, which Jehu and the other Hebrew commanders were keeping, to anoint him king. Jehovah was sovereign paramount, and he had a right to choose who should reign under him, 2 Ki. ix. 1-10. When Jehu's companions were made aware of the real nature of the young prophet's message, they entered heartily into the conspiracy and proclaimed Jehu king. With little delay he set out for Jezreel, where Joram had gone to be healed of his wounds. From the towers of the city he is espied hastening with his company across the plain; and when two messengers brought back no answer, Joram and his nephew, Ahaziah of Judah, who had come to visit him, both went out to meet Jehu. Both were slain, and the prophecy against Ahab's house was fulfilled literally when Joram's dead body was cast into the plot of ground which had been illegally wrested from Naboth, and when Jezebel, who had taunted the avenger as he entered Jezreel, was crushed beneath his chariot wheels and her carcass devoured by the hungry dogs that prowled about the city, 2 Ki. ix. 11-37. Jehu accomplished God's command; he destroyed all the rest of Ahab's family, 2 Ki. x. 1-17. And he gathered the worshipers of Baal by a stratagem, and slew them in Baal's temple, 2 Ki. x. 18-28. But his deeds were done from his own lust of reigning; and though he boasted of his zeal for God, it was simply because that zeal he perceived was making him a king. And so, though God set his seal upon the judgment of Ahab's house by promising Jehu that for four generations his seed should reign, yet, because Jehu had gratified therein his own ambition, God declared also that judgment should come on his ungodly posterity, Hos. i. 4. Jehu reigned twenty-eight years, 884-856 B. C., still keeping up the calf-worship of Jeroboam. His kingdom was harassed by Hazael, king of Syria, 2 Ki. x. 29-36; and the Assyrian power was beginning also to make its pressure felt. Jehu's name as the son—i. e., one of the successors—of Omri has been read on the black obelisk in the British Museum.

3. A descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 38. 4. A Simeonite chief, 1 Chr. iv. 35. 5. A Benjamite, one of those who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 3.

JEHUBBAH (je-hub'bah), a chieftain of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 34.

JEHUCAL (je-hoo'kal), an eminent person in Jerusalem in the reign of Zedekiah, Jer. xxxvii. 3. He is also called Jucal, Jer. xxxviii. 1.

JEHUD (je'hud), a city allotted to the tribe of Dan, Josh. xix. 45. It is probably El-Yehudiyeh, about seven miles east of Jaffa.

JEHUDI (je-hoo'de), a person who was sent for the roll of Jeremiah's prophecies, and read it to King Jehoiakim, Jer. xxxvi. 14, 21, 23.

JEHUDIJAH (je-hoo-di'jah). This is perhaps not a proper name, but used to distinguish one wife of Mered from the other, who was an Egyptian, 1 Chr. v. 18. She is the same with Hodiah, 1 Chr. v. 19.

JEHUSH (je'hush), a descendant of King Saul, 1 Chr. viii. 39. The word is the same with that rendered Jeush.

JEIEL (je-i'el). 1. A Reubenite chief, 1 Chr. v. 7. 2. A Levite porter appointed for the musical service of the sanctuary, 1 Chr. xv. 18, 21. 3.

A Levite of the sons of Asaph, 2 Chr. xx. 14. 4. A scribe in the time of Uzziah, 2 Chr. xxvi. 11. 5. A Levite who took part in Hezekiah's reformation, 2 Chr. xxix. 13. 6. A chief Levite in Josiah's time, 2 Chr. xxxv. 9. 7. One who accompanied Ezra on his journey from Babylon to Jerusalem, Ezra viii. 13. 8. A person who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 43.

JEKABZEEL (je-kab'tse-el), a city in the extreme south of Judah, Neh. xi. 25. It is the fuller form of Kabzeel, Josh. xv. 21. See KABZEEL.

JEKAMEAM (je-kam'e-am), a Levite in David's time, 1 Chr. xxiii. 19.

JEKAMIAH (je-kam'yah), a descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 41, called also Jecamiah, 1 Chr. iii. 18.

JEKUTHIEL (je-ku-thi'el), one of Judah's descendants, 1 Chr. iv. 18.

JEKUTHIEL, BEN ISAAC BLITZ, has the honor of being the first Jew who translated the whole Old Testament into German. It was published under the title, "The Four-and-Twenty Books Translated into German."

JEKUTHIEL, BEN JEHUDAH, who lived in the thirteenth century, and who was known as the "Punctuator," became very celebrated for his edition of the Hebrew Scriptures. His edition of the Pentateuch and of the book of Esther displayed great research and much learning. His grammatical treatises have been deservedly esteemed.

JEMIMA (je-mi'ma), the eldest of Job's daughters, born after his restoration to prosperity, Job xlii. 13, 14.

JEMINI (jem'i-ne), 1 Sam. ix. 1, margin. The textual rendering is no doubt right. See GEMINI.

JEMNAAN (jem'na-an), Judith ii. 28, perhaps Jamnia or Jabneel.

JEMUUEL (je-moo'el), the eldest son of Simeon, Gen. xlii. 10. But in Num. xxvi. 12 the name is given as Nemuel.

JENISCH (yā'nish), DANIEL, was born in Eastern Prussia, in 1762. After passing through the university of Königsberg, he became the pastor of the Mary Church in 1786, from which he removed to the Nicholas Church. In consequence of excessive study his mind lost its balance, and he is supposed to have ended his life when laboring under a fit of insanity. He was chiefly celebrated as a philosophical writer, with a leaning toward the close of his life to latitudinarianism. He died in 1804.

JENKIN (jeng'kin), ROBERT, an English divine, who was born in Kent in 1656, and educated at Cambridge. He became master of St. John's College, and professor of theology. He retired into private life in 1688, as he was unable to take the oath required of those who were inducted into ecclesiastical benefices. He was a very voluminous writer. He wrote on the authority of the general councils, a criticism of the work of Barsnaghe on the Jews, and another on Lake's Paraphrase of St. Paul's Epistles. He also translated Tillemont's Life of Apollonius of Tyana; but his most important work is "The Reasonableness of the Christian Religion," which ran through several editions.

JENKINSON (jeng'kin-sun), JOHN BANKS, D.D., an English prelate, who was born in the year 1781. After the usual university education he entered the Church, and in 1817 he was made dean of the cathedral of Worcester. In 1825 he was raised to the see of St. David's, in Wales, and in the same year he received a prebendal stall in Durham. Two years afterward he was raised to the deanery of Durham. He displayed the same mental characteristics of solid thought and calmness of judgment which characterized his brother, the earl of Liverpool, who held the office of prime minister of Great Britain for many years. Bishop Jenkinson died in 1840.

JENKS, BENJAMIN, well known as the author of "Prayers and Offices of Devotion for Families, and for Particular Persons upon most Occasions," was born in 1646. He entered the Church, and became rector at Harley, from which he removed to Kenley. He also wrote "Submission to the Righteousness of God" and "Meditations." He died in 1724. The first of these works has been issued from year to year, until its circulation has become so great that it could not now be determined.

JENKS, WILLIAM, D.D., a very eminent Congregational minister, born in 1778, at Newton, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard. After a pastorate at Bath in Maine of twelve years, he became professor of Oriental and English literature in Bowdoin College. Thence he removed to Boston, and for twenty-three years he filled the Green Street Church with great efficiency. He was eminent for his knowledge of Oriental literature, as his edition of the "Comprehensive Commentary on the Holy Bible" showed. He also published an explanatory Bible, atlas and Scripture gazetteer, which was well received. He died in 1866.

JENKYN (jeng'kin), WILLIAM, has now been well known for two hundred and twenty years as the author of the famous treatise "Jenkyn on Jude." He was born in 1612, at Sudbury, in Suffolk, and educated at St. John's, Cambridge. In St. Nicholas, Acons, Christ Church, Newgate Street and St. Anne's, Blackfriars, all in London, he held the office of lecturer, but in 1662 he was ejected for nonconformity. He was seized and sent to the town on the charge of being implicated in Love's plot, but he was shortly afterward released. He refused to take the Oxford act, and he had to retire from London. In 1671 he returned in consequence of "The Indulgence," but again in 1682 he was seized under the conventicle act and cast into prison, where he died in 1685. He was an eminent theological writer and an earnest, learned man.

JENNINGS (jen'ningz), DAVID, D.D., an eminent dissenting minister, son of one of the ejected nonconformists, was born at Kibworth, Leicester, in 1691, and died in 1762. He pursued his studies in London, and after certain minor appointments became assistant pastor of the Congregational Church of Old Gravel Lane, Wapping, where he continued forty years. In 1740 he wrote against Dr. Taylor in defence of original sin. In 1744 he was appointed theological tutor in Coward College, in which office he exhibited great adaptation for his work, and had great success. In 1747 the university of St. Andrews conferred on him the degree of D.D. His principal work is, "Jewish Antiquities; or, A Course of Lectures on the Three First Books of Godwin's Moses and Aaron. To which is annexed a Dissertation on the Hebrew Language." It is divided into three books, treating respectively of persons, places and times. His work is distinguished by learning and sound sense, and long held a distinguished place on account of its solid worth, but has been quite superseded by more recent and accurate works on the subject.

JENNINGS, SAMUEL KENNEDY, who was distinguished for the part he took in the movement for the introduction of lay representation in the Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1771 in Essex County, New Jersey, and educated at Rutgers College. In early life he held skeptical views, but in 1794 he was brought under the influence of the truth. In 1805 he was ordained a deacon by Bishop Asbury, and in 1814 he became an elder. In 1817 he settled in Baltimore, where he practiced as a physician and labored with great zeal in the spiritual duties of his office. He was expelled from the Methodist Episcopal Church along with other brethren who had advocated the introduction of lay representation, and he engaged very actively in founding the "Methodist Protestant Church." He died in 1854.

JENYNS (jen'inz), SOAME, was a very distinguished writer on theological and Biblical subjects. He was born in London in 1704, and educated at St. John's in Cambridge. He had fallen into the popular infidelity of the day; but being induced to engage in Biblical studies, he abandoned his skepticism, and devoted himself to the support of Christian truth. His most important work, entitled a "View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion," had an extensive circulation, and ran through a great number of editions. It is remarkable that after it appeared an effort was made to show that it was really opposed to Christianity, and a protracted controversy ensued. The object of Jenyns was to exhibit the exalted morality of the gospel, and later writers held that the argument is one of great power. His "Free Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil" brought him into conflict with Dr. Johnson, and it is not a matter of wonder that he should have failed on a subject which is above the capacity of all uninspired men. He died in 1787.

JEPHTHAH (jef'tha), an Israelitish hero and judge, the son of Gilead by a concubine. Driven out by his brethren, he established himself in a district called Tob, and gathered round him a band, who, probably by marauding expeditions, acquired a formidable renown, so that when the Ammonites had occupied some of the trans-Jordanic territory, and had even passed the Jordan and attacked the western tribes, Jud. x. 8, 9, Jephthah was solicited to take the command against them. He reproached the Gileadites with their conduct toward him, but consented to lead them on condition of being appointed their governor. He then sent envoys to the Ammonitish king, maintaining Israel's right to the territory north of the Arnon. The negotiations came to nothing; and then Jephthah, having collected troops from Manasseh and Gilead, utterly defeated the Ammonites. But prior to his march he had vowed to devote and sacrifice to the Lord whatever might first welcome him on his return in triumph to his residence at Mizpeh. It was his only daughter that first came forth, to Jephthah's utter dismay; and he did with her according to his vow, Jud. xi.

Scarcely any Scripture topic has been more keenly discussed than the question, What did Jephthah do? Did he actually sacrifice his daughter? or did he merely devote her to perpetual celibacy? and learned men will never agree in the solution. It is clear that there are formidable difficulties in the way of believing that an Israelite instructed in the law and history of his country could offer human sacrifice, especially as Jephthah is mentioned with commendation among the worthies of the race, 1 Sam. xii. 11; Heb. xi. 32. But yet he could not have expected that any animal would come out to meet him; he must therefore have contemplated human sacrifice. His daughter, it is evident, was not aware of his vow, but the intended sacrifice of an animal would no doubt have been at once proclaimed. There was perhaps little intercourse between the tribes east JERAH (je'ra), a son of Joktan, or name of a tribe descended from him, in Southern Arabia, Gen. x. 26; 1 Chr. i. 20. There is a difficulty in identifying the locality of this tribe, and various conjectures have been made respecting them. There is, it seems, a fortress still bearing the name Yerakh at the extremity of the Yemen. Or their settlement may have been in the neighborhood of Hadramaut (Hazar-maveth), as there are there a "moon-mountain" and a "moon-coast." But nothing certain can be stated.

and west of the Jordan at the period. Besides, Jephthah, a kind of brigand chief, though he knew much of the history of Israel, might know little of the law, and human sacrifices were practiced by neighboring nations. Further, we have no instance of females being devoted to celibacy; and, if this girl were so devoted, she needed not to ask delay in order to bewail her lot. All these reasons, briefly given, and more might be added, incline to the fearful alternative that Jephthah did sacrifice his daughter. But the opinion is expressed with diffidence, and many will dissent from it. It may be added that there is no ground for imagining that the high-priest sanctioned the act, as the Jews believe.

One more fact in Jephthah's history is to be noticed. The Ephraimites, angry that they had not been summoned, crossed the Jordan and threatened to destroy Jephthah and his property. He therefore gathered his army, attacked and entirely defeated them, detecting the fugitives by their dialect, as they tried to recross the river. Forty-two thousand Ephraimites fell. Jephthah retained his power in the trans-Jordanic region six years, till his death, Jud. xii. 1-7.

JEREMAI (jer-e'mi), one who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 33.

JEREMIAH (jer-e-mi'ah). The meaning of the name is "Jehovah throws"—i. e., according to some, "overthrows, casts down," Ex. xv. 1; according to others, "lays down, founds, appoints, ordains." But the latter view has no support from Hebrew usage; and the former, besides having this support, gives to the name an import much more distinctive, almost prophetic both of the history of the man and of the character of his time. He who bore this name was consecrated to that God who with an almighty hand throws to the ground all his enemies, ch. i. 10. With the prophecies of Jeremiah are interwoven many minute biographical details which are lacking in the writings of the other prophets. He was of a priestly family, being born in Anathoth, one of the towns allotted to the priests of the line of Ithamar. It is probable that Jeremiah continued to reside at Anathoth for some years after his call to the prophetic office, which took place in the thirteenth year of Josiah, B. C. 628, while he was yet a youth, ch. i. 2, 6. Like our Lord, who, residing in Bethany under the friendly roof of Lazarus and his sisters, made daily journeys to and from Jerusalem, Jeremiah may have continued to spend quiet evenings in his father's house, while by day he labored in his prophetic mission amid the throng and bustle of the capital. But after some years he was compelled by the bitter hostility of his fellow-towns-was in his heart as a burning fire shut up in his bones; and he was weary with forbearing and could not stay," ch. xx. 9.

Not long after Jehoiakim ascended the throne, and probably on occasion of one of the great feasts which drew multitudes together from all parts of the land, ch. xxvi. 2, Jeremiah made what seems to have been his first public appearance and appeal since the accession of the new monarch. Undeterred by the fate of a brother prophet, Urijah the son of Shemaiah, who had already fallen a victim to the fury of the king, Jeremiah, in obedience to a divine impulse, appeared in the temple courts, and by words of truth and judgment stirred the thronging multitudes. A tumult ensued, the priests and prophets inciting the people to violence. The report of the tumult speedily reaching the palace, the officers of state appeared on the scene, and proceeded to investigate the cause of the uproar. To these princes Jeremiah made a noble appeal, and not in vain. Still, the influence of the priests and prophets, the most violent antagonists of Jeremiah, was very great, and it was only by the interposition of a powerful friend, Ahikam the Jewish history as the year in which the first Chaldean invasion took place, was an epoch also in the history of Jeremiah, for in that year he was divinely directed to collect into one body the various prophecies he had delivered during the twenty-three years which had elapsed since the commencement of his ministry, ch. xxv. 3; xxxvi. 1, etc. These prophecies Baruch, having written down from the lips of Jeremiah, recited within the temple courts to a large and mixed audience of princes and people. Some of the former, affected by the divine message, resolved, though with but slender hopes of success, to have it read before the king. The result was such as might have been anticipated. The headstrong tyrant, after listening impatiently for a short time to words very different from those which he was accustomed to hear, started up, and seizing the roll, cut it in pieces and threw it into the fire. Jeremiah and Baruch would have instantly fallen victims to his fury had they not, at the instigation of the princes, shut themselves up in a place of concealment. In that retreat Baruch wrote down, from Jeremiah's dictation, the same series of prophecies, many like words, we are told, being added unto them; and doubtless this first collection formed the nucleus around which were gathered, from time to time, other prophecies subsequently delivered, till the whole assumed the form in which they now appear in the Scriptural book of Jeremiah.

The second invasion of the Chaldees, which issued in the capture of Jerusalem and the captivity of the young king Jehoiachin, an issue which Jeremiah had distinctly foretold, may naturally be supposed to have given him a position of greater authority in Jerusalem; and accordingly we find the new king Zedekiah, unlike his brother Jehoiakim, not only listening patiently to his prophetic admonitions, but even sending of his own accord to consult him in more pressing emergencies. Zedekiah, however, though willing to ask, was not equally disposed to follow, advice. Still less so his princes and ministers, who were for the most part rash and inexperienced, proud of their new dignity, and resolved to pursue at whatever hazard the course of policy which had already brought so terrible disasters upon the nation. To these men Jeremiah speedily made himself obnoxious, and it was not long before he experienced the effects of their hostility. The duty imposed upon Jeremiah was one from which he might well have recoiled. The whole nation was bent upon a war of freedom. Notwithstanding their heart-apostasy from Jehovah, they still retained the conviction that they were the peculiar favorites of Heaven, and that, however low they might sink, they could not perish utterly. In their carnal minds the permanence of the true religion, which the prophets had so often foretold, was always associated with the continued preservation of the temple and city in which it was visibly enshrined. It was to oppose these strong national convictions, to counsel submission to the yoke of Babylon, to proclaim the utter fruitlessness and fatal issue of the meditated revolt, that Jeremiah stood forth—one man against a nation. His position was not an enviable one—a patriot counseling submission to a foreign master and laboring to repress the heavings of the national spirit impatient of the yoke! This was a strange spectacle, and we can scarcely wonder that Jeremiah was by not a few regarded as an emissary of the Chaldeans rather than a prophet of the Lord; and that the once timid and shrinking prophet had the courage to take up this position—to place himself in the way of an excited men, whose immoralities he had exposed and denounced, to quit his native place and take up his residence in Jerusalem, ch. xi. 21; xii. 6.

This change of residence, however, only exposed him to new dangers, and brought him within the reach of more formidable adversaries than the priests of Anathoth, for the death of Josiah and the captivity of Jehoahaz opened up the way for the accession of the violent and ungodly Jehoiakim to the throne of Judah, Jer. xxii. 17. Under such a king Jerusalem was no longer a safe residence for the faithful prophet of the Lord, yet Jeremiah felt that at so momentous a crisis in the national history it was not his part to purchase personal safety by the abandonment of public duty. Though naturally of a timid disposition, so that at first he shrank from the responsibilities of the prophetic office, yet now the word of God which had come to him had taken such complete possession of his soul that he could not but give utterance to it, be the danger ever so great. And though in some seasons of deep depression, when he seemed to himself to have labored in vain and spent his strength for naught, he almost resolved to speak no more in the name of the Lord, yet this momentary impulse was speedily overpowered, for "the word of God son of Shaphan, that he escaped with his life, ch. xxvi.

During his residence at Jerusalem, Jeremiah was doubtless the centre of the little circle amid which true piety still lingered, but there was one whom he singled out from all his associates, honoring him with peculiar marks of his friendship, and even admitting him to share the labors of his prophetic ministry. This was Baruch, the son of Neriah, who seems to have been a person of rank and influence, ch. xliii. 3; li. 59, though, being also a man of worth and piety, he preferred the society and friendship of Jeremiah to the high official dignity and authority which he might have aspired to and enjoyed. The friendship and active co-operation of Baruch proved highly valuable to the prophet. For shortly after the incident just mentioned, and probably in consequence of it, we find that Jeremiah had become so obnoxious, either to the court or to the people, or to both, that he could no longer venture to appear in public. In this exigency Baruch came to his aid, and by acting as his amanuensis and representative secured the transmission of the divine message to the rulers and people, ch. xxxvi. 5; xlvi. 5.

The fourth year of Jehoiakim, remarkable in and rushing nation and try to stop and turn it—shows that God had not forgotten his promise, ch. i. 18, 19.

During the greater part of the reign of Zedekiah, which continued eleven years, the prophet seems to have pursued his work unmolested—at least without encountering any violent persecution. But toward the close of that reign, when the rebellion had broken out, and the Chaldean army, hastening from the east, had invested Jerusalem, and when it was essential to the success of the dominant policy that the nation should rise as one man against the invaders, and not destroy their cause by divided counsels, it became evident that the conflict between Jeremiah and the rulers must speedily come to an issue. So accordingly it was; for—a very trivial circumstance being seized upon as a pretext for violent measures—the prophet was submission. The princes, indignant that the hands of king and people should be weakened by the prophet's dark forebodings, resolved on his destruction, and it was not difficult for them to work on the fears of the king and extort from him permission to carry their deadly purpose into execution. Armed with the royal mandate, they entered the court of the prison, laid hold of Jeremiah and cast him into one of the dungeons, so deep that it was necessary to let him down by means of cords. And doubtless, as they turned away from their victim, they imagined that his voice had been silenced for ever. But God, who had yet some work for his prophet to do, interposed in his behalf strangely and unexpectedly. An Ethiopian eunuch pleads for him with the king, and obtains an order for his release. Jeremiah, covered with the mire into which he had sunk, is drawn up by means of cords of kin, the purchase of a small property in Anathoth which he is about to sell. Here was a trial of his faith. When the proposal was made to him, Anathoth must have been occupied by the Chaldeans; Jerusalem, he knew, would soon be a heap of ruins and the whole land a desolation. Yet he at once agrees to the proposal of his relative; and having gone through the various formalities necessary to the legal completion of the purchase, he weighs out the money and assumes the proprietorship of the ground. The transaction was a prophecy in act; for the spirit of the prophet, so often clouded and overwhelmed, was at this time irradiated by bright anticipations of Israel's destiny; and as he delivered over the purchase-papers to Baruch he said to him with calm confidence, "Take these and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days; for thus saith arrested as a deserter and traitor to his country and cast into the common prison. In this prison, which seems to have consisted of several dark underground vaults, ch. xx. vii. 16, he was closely confined for "many days." Afterward, by command of the king, he was removed to the "guard-house" attached to the royal palace, which was a place of considerable extent, with walls and gates, having upper apartments for the reception of the less guilty or less dreaded prisoners and a row of dungeons underground. At first Jeremiah occupied one of the upper apartments, having the use of writing materials, enjoying the visits and converse of his friends, and being occasionally sent for to be consulted by the king, who probably expected to find him, after his lengthened imprisonment, a more courtly and pliant counselor. Jeremiah, however, still continued undauntedly to declare the mind of God, predicting, as before, the disastrous issue of the siege and counseling timely and restored to his apartment in the upper prison. Meanwhile the Chaldean army was pressing the siege. Jeremiah continued in prison till the city was taken, when he was released by order of Nebuchadnezzar. Strange fate for a prophet of Jehovah—to have his life saved by an Ethiopian eunuch and his liberty restored to him by a heathen conqueror!

The imprisonment of Jeremiah must have continued for more than a year. It is remarkable that during this period God favored him with some of the brightest glimpses into the future which he ever enjoyed, ch. xxxii. 36-44; xxxiii. 1-26. The guard-house was his Patmos, where he saw the heavens opened and read the glorious future which God had in store for his Church.

These revelations were connected with a somewhat remarkable transaction which took place previous to his release. Hanameel, his uncle's son, visits him in prison and offers him, as next the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Houses and fields and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land," ch. xxxii. 15.

The capture of Jerusalem restored Jeremiah to liberty, but to him restored liberty brought no joy. What a scene must have burst upon him as he passed the prison gates—Jerusalem and her palaces fallen to the ground, and that holy and beautiful house which the piety of a former age had reared, and around which so many hallowed associations had clustered, burned up with fire! To a heart like his, so tender and impressible, the spectacle must have been overwhelming. Can we wonder that the first gush of his poetic spirit poured itself forth, not in joyful strains, but in those "Lamentations" over his fallen country which will remain an enduring monument at once of his patriotism, his genius and his piety?

The story of Jeremiah now draws near its close. After the murder of Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, the remnant of the Jewish people still resident in Palestine resolved, contrary to the advice and despite the remonstrances of Jeremiah, to retire into Egypt; and thither they bore the prophet along with them. There the dangers he had foreboded speedily manifested themselves. The exiled remnant, contaminated by the example of their Egyptian neighbors, fell anew into all manner of abominations; their wives burned incense and poured out drink-offerings to the queen of heaven; so that Jeremiah was compelled in his old age still to prophesy bitter things: "Behold, I will watch over them for evil, and not for good; . . . and all the remnant of Judah that are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there shall know whose word shall stand, mine or theirs," ch. xlv.

These were among the last prophetic words of Jeremiah. As more than forty years had elapsed since the commencement of his ministry, he could not have lived long after this period. But of the exact time and circumstances of his death we have no record, and the Jewish and Christian traditions topics: 1. Authorship; 2. Subject-matter and general character; 3. Arrangement; 4. Text.

1. AUTHORSHIP.—This question presents no serious difficulty. The external evidence is altogether in favor of the received view that Jeremiah was the author of the whole book, and the internal evidence is scarcely less decisive. There is in Jeremiah's writings, though not so strongly marked as in Ezekiel's, a prevailing and dominant character—a peculiar cast of thought and expression; and this character pervades nearly every part of the book which bears his name. Criticism thus corroborates the testimony of tradition, and accordingly the book as a whole has been universally received as the work of Jeremiah. Doubts indeed have been expressed as to the genuineness of some portions of it, but these doubts, with one or two exceptions, are not of sufficient importance to merit any extended notice. It is now generally agreed that the first forty-nine chapters are the composition of Jeremiah. The evidence in the case of the last three chapters is not so decisive.

are not in harmony. By the early Fathers of the Christian Church he was enrolled among the martyrs, having, according to the account transmitted by them, fallen a victim to the rage of his fellow-exiles, whose sins he rebuked and whose delusive hopes he unsparingly exposed. And in truth we may well claim for Jeremiah all the honors of a martyr, though we know not how he died. His life was one continued martyrdom. The forty years of a ministry pursued with unflinching fortitude through dangers and discouragements under which many a braver and stronger heart than his would have succumbed, amid fightings without and fears within, with nothing to lean on or to draw strength from but the word of an unseen God,—surely such a spectacle of unswerving fidelity, of invincible perseverance, presented too by one naturally of a weak and timid disposition and tender heart, is not less noble and worthy of admiration, and certainly not less fruitful of instruction, than the awful but short-lived agonies of the martyr's death.

JEREMIAH, THE BOOK OF. Under this head we shall take up in succession the following

With regard to the last chapter, which is historical throughout, it is not probable that Jeremiah was its author. For, 1. It stands quite apart from the rest of the historical matter in the book, according to the Hebrew arrangement; and the chapter immediately preceding closes with the words, "thus far the words of Jeremiah," which seem intended to intimate that the chapter which follows is not his. 2. The greater portion of the chapter in question is taken almost verbatim from the last two chapters of 2 Ki., where it evidently forms an original and integral part of the history. In Jeremiah several explanatory clauses are inserted, as in ver. 9, 10, 11, 15, 19, 20, 21, 23. 3. The chapter contains an account of the release of Jehoiachin, which took place when Jeremiah was about ninety years of age.

The fiftieth and fifty-first chapters contain a prophecy against Babylon, with a brief historical appendix recording the date and occasion of its composition. In that appendix it is stated that the prophecy which precedes was written by Jeremiah, and placed by him in the hands of Zeriaah, the son of Neriah and brother of Baruch, who was about to proceed on an official journey to Babylon in the fourth year of Zedekiah, with instructions on his arrival in Chaldaea to read it to the exiled Israelites, and having done so, to cast it, with a stone attached to it, into the Euphrates, saying, "Thus shall Babylon sink and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her." It must be allowed that the whole of this transaction is very much after Jeremiah's usual manner, especially the prophetic act which followed the reading of the prophecy, and which is remarkable at once for its simplicity and its significance. Of the prophecy itself four different views have been taken, some assigning the entire composition to a later period than Jeremiah's; others holding that, though Jeremiah is the principal author, there are many interpolations; others acknowledging Jeremiah to be the author of the prophecy, but assigning it to a later date than that mentioned in the historical appendix; whilst a fourth class, including almost all English critics, receive the whole as genuine, the historical appendix as well as the prophecy, and we cannot but accept this view as having the strongest if not absolutely conclusive evidence in its favor.

2. SUBJECT-MATTER AND GENERAL CHARACTER OF THE PROPHECIES.—The death of Josiah had an important influence on the prophetic teaching of Jeremiah and his immediate successors. For centuries the hopes of the Jewish people had been eagerly directed to the prince of David's line destined to arise and restore the glory and pre-eminence of Israel. Was not Josiah just such a prince? It is not improbable that many of the Israelites beheld in him the predicted restorer. But now he had fallen, and with him had been extinguished the last ray of freedom and hope. And to the still repeated announcement of the coming Christ doubtless the popular reply would be: "You speak of a king yet to come—a king of righteousness and peace. Was not Josiah such a king—a king after God's own heart? And if he has not delivered us, what hope have we more? Has not the word of the prophets become as wind?"

The prophets of this age, accordingly, in order to adapt their teaching to the circumstances and wants of their times, give special prominence, not to the fact that the Messiah was yet to come, but to the moral and spiritual revolution which his coming was destined to usher in. True, Josiah was a pious king, and he had extirpated idolatry and restored the temple worship; but the Messiah—he must accomplish something greater. The change he is to work is not an outer and formal, but an inward and spiritual, change. The aim and end of his rule will not be an external conformity with the Mosaic ordinances, but the subjecting of the heart to God. This thought, accordingly, we find specially prominent in Jeremiah and in his disciple Ezekiel—so prominent that it may be regarded as the thought which ruled their prophetic activity, and to lodge which in the national mind they were specially raised up and supernaturally endowed. Compare Ezek. xxxvi. 25, etc. and Jer. xxxi. 31–34, the latter a passage on which a great part of the argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews is founded. See also Jer. iii. 16, 17; iv. 3, 4, 14; xxxiii. 7, 8.

Still, though the kingdom is more prominently the subject of Jeremiah's prophecy than the king, the latter is by no means forgotten, Jer. xxiii. 5, 6; xxx. 9; xxxiii. 15, etc.

But to the prophet's eye the revelation of the kingdom of God was by no means close at hand. In the near future he saw dark overwhelming clouds of judgment. Only out of the deepest af-fiction was it possible for the future glory of Israel to spring. Hence the predominantly dark character of the prophecies of Jeremiah. The night is at hand, the day is yet afar off. Again and again we hear from him the wail of despair, alternating with words of passionate remonstrance and urgent appeal. His call is no longer that of the earlier prophets—to fight the battles of the Lord—but to submit to the Lord's rod and to hear its voice.

The style of the prophet accords with his character and theme. In the writings of Jeremiah, indeed, we find specimens of almost every description of Hebrew composition, from the simplest prose narrative to the highly impassioned utterance of poetic feeling. Rarely, however, does he reach the highest poetic elevation. His was not the eagle eye and wing of Isaiah. His dove-like spirit usually meditated a humbler flight. We do not find in his writings the nervous, compressed his style, though Lowth says he can discover no traces of it.

3. ARRANGEMENT OF THE PROPHECIES.—The mode in which the book of Jeremiah is arranged has long and often been complained of by critics. The prophecies are certainly not arranged in order of time, but the chronological is not the only principle on which the different parts of a volume may be arranged. It is quite as natural to group together prophecies bearing a similar character or relating to the same subject as those belonging to the same period. And that this principle has determined in part at least the present form of the book of Jeremiah is obvious at a glance. For in ch. xvi.—li. we find the prophecies against foreign nations grouped together, as also in ch. xxx.—xxxiii. those which announce the final triumph of truth and religion, at least the more important of them, and we cannot fail to observe formed the first collection of Jeremiah's prophecies. We are further informed in the chapters just quoted that after the roll which contained this collection was destroyed by the king the prophet again, with the aid of Baruch as amanuensis, prepared another roll, on which he set down all that was contained in the first, "adding many like words."

Of another collection of prophecies of very different import we have an account in the beginning of the thirtieth chapter, where we read of a second command received by the prophet to write all the words which God had spoken to him in a book. From the reason which is given for this command, "For lo! the days come, saith the Lord, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah," etc., there can be no doubt that this new collection included ch. xxx.—xxxiii., which constitute the most purely Messianic portion of the and abrupt style of the older prophets. His language is flowing, loose, and one might almost say redundant were it not that the gentler emotions naturally find utterance in such language. As an expression in language of the singular beauty of the soul's deep grief, the book of Lamentations is without a rival.

In this book Jeremiah exhibits, in an astonishing degree, his power to accumulate images of sorrow. The whole series of elegies has but one object—the expression of sorrow for the forlorn condition of his country; and yet he presents this to us in so many lights, alludes to it by so many figures, that not only are his mournful strains not felt to be tedious reiterations, but the reader is captivated by the plaintive melancholy which pervades the whole.

A Chaldee influence begins, as we might have anticipated, to make itself perceptible in the writings of Jeremiah. It was probably on this account that Jerome complained of a certain rusticity in that in the commencement of the book the purely prophetic predominates, while the latter half is chiefly historical.

In investigating this matter more minutely, there are three sources from which we receive aid. 1, the historical notices met with in the book relating to collections of prophecies formed by Jeremiah himself; 2, the titles prefixed to the prophecies; 3, their internal character. The first of these sources of information is most interesting and important, furnishing us, as it does, with at least one instance of a prophet collecting and arranging his own writings, or part of them. For we are informed that in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and twenty-three years after Jeremiah began to prophesy, he was divinely instructed to make a collection of all the prophecies he had delivered against Israel and against Judah and against all the nations, ch. xxxvi., xlv., from the day when God called him to be a prophet. This injunction he obeyed, employing Baruch as his amanuensis; and thus was book as at present arranged. This collection was formed toward the close of Zedekiah's reign, shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem, and therefore about twenty years after the publication of the first collection.

In the title of the book we find traces of a third collection, including the three already mentioned, which was formed shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem. In ch. i. 3, it is said that Jeremiah prophesied unto the end of the eleventh year of Zedekiah, unto the carrying captive of Jerusalem in the fifth month. But as we know that Jeremiah prophesied for some time after the period here assigned, it is probable that the words just quoted were originally attached as a title, not to the whole of the present book, but to a somewhat smaller collection formed immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem, and during the short interval of rest which the land enjoyed under the government of Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, ch. xl. 6.

Of this collection the two earlier formed the ground-work; but it may help to account for the apparent want of order in the collection, if we suppose that the prophet, either on this or some earlier occasion, divided his first collection into two parts—viz., the prophecies against Israel and the prophecies against the Gentiles. Thus of the new collection three documents would on this hypothesis form the basis, the two just mentioned and the prophecies of Israel's return and of the final triumph of the true religion. Now, a great part of the apparent disorder of the present arrangement is removed if we adopt the very natural supposition that to each of these three documents, especially to the first, the prophet added other prophecies subsequently delivered, but of a similar scope and tendency, and also illustrative historical notices. It is not improbable that in the original documents some "like words" were at the same time introduced, suggested by the experience of the intervening years.

The book as it now stands must have been commenced at a still later period by the introduction of ch. xl.-xlv., and possibly some of the other

d. Ch. xxxiv.-xlv.—Chiefly historical. The prophet reverts to the dark present. His main design seems to be to illustrate the necessity of the divine judgments by examples of the stubbornness and resolute unbelief of all classes of the people.

historical chapters. According to the arrangement of chapters in the Hebrew Bible, it may be divided at once into two portions.

I. Ch. i.-xlv.—Prophecies and historical notices regarding Israel.

II. Ch. xlv.-li.—Prophecies against the nations.

I. may be subdivided according to the character of the composition into two parts of nearly equal length, the first purely prophetic, ch. i.-xxiii.; the second, ch. xxiv.-xlv., in which the prophetic and the historical are intermingled, the historical becoming more and more prominent toward the close. Or it may be subdivided into four parts according to the nature of its contents, viz.,

a. Ch. i.-xxiii.—The divine judgment on apostate Israel.

b. Ch. xxiv.-xxix.—Nebuchadnezzar the instrument of divine judgment on Israel and the nations, his power meanwhile irresistible, but of temporary duration; present duty of submission; superior happiness of the exiled portion of the nation.

c. Ch. xxx.-xxxiii.—The glories of the latter days; Israel restored; the Messiah reigns upon the throne of David.

Of greater moment are the omissions (the additions are few) of the Greek text as compared with the Hebrew, some of these of such extent that they can scarcely be ascribed to accident or carelessness on the part of translator or transcriber, as ch. viii. 10-12 (repeated from vi. 13-15), xvii. 1-4; xxvii. 12-14 and 17-22 (much fuller in Hebrew); xxix. 16-20; xxxiii. 14-16; xxxix. 4-13; xlviii. 45-47; lii. 28-30. To account for these differences between the two texts, it has been supposed, with some degree of probability, that when the Greek translation was made there were in existence two recensions, so to speak, of the text of Jeremiah, an Egyptian and a Palestinian, a shorter and a longer. The existence of these, if allowed, may possibly be connected with the fact that Jeremiah was in the habit of revising and enlarging his prophecies, adding to them many like words. The added portions do not contain any new matter, but are in almost every case repetitions or expansions of older prophecies.

An important question connected with the book of Jeremiah is the relation of that book to the other Scriptures, both earlier and later. It holds, as it were, a central position, and affords to the student good standing-ground, from which he may look back into the remote past or forward upon the future. It is of special importance in the criticism of the Pentateuch and of Job.

Besides the book which bears his name, and the Lamentations, several other portions of the Old Testament Scriptures have been ascribed to Jeremiah, some of the Psalms, the books of Kings and the book of Deuteronomy. But the investigation of such questions does not properly belong to the present article. SEE LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

JEREMIAH. Besides the prophet, seven other persons bearing this name are mentioned in Scripture, viz., Jeremiah of Libnah, the father of Hamutal, wife of King Josiah, 2 Ki. xxiii. 31; the head of one of the houses of Manasseh, 1 Chr. v. 24; three of the warriors who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 4, 10, 13; a priest, one of those who sealed the covenant along with Nehemiah, Neh. x. 2, 8, and after whom one of the courses of the priests under Zerubbabel was named, Neh. xii. 1, 12; the father of Jaazaniah, a contemporary of the prophet, Jer. xxxv. 3.

JEREMIAH, THE EPISTLE OF, one of the Apocryphal writings, purporting to proceed from the pen of the prophet Jeremiah.

This Apocryphal piece, which derives its title from purporting to be an epistle sent by the prophet Jeremiah "to them which were to be led captive to Babylon," constitutes the sixth chapter of the Apocryphal book of Baruch. It is, however, an independent production, and has nothing to do with Baruch.

The design of this Epistle is to admonish the Jews who were going into captivity with the king to beware of the idolatry which they would see in Babylon. It tells the people of God not to become idolaters like the strangers, but to serve their own God, whose angel is with them, 1-7, and it exposes in a rhetorical declamation the folly of idolatry, 8-72, concluding every group of verses, which contains a fresh proof of its folly, with the reiterated remarks, "seeing that they are no gods, fear them not," vers. 16, 23, 29, 66, "how can a man think that they are gods?" vers. 40, 44, 56, 64, 69, "how can a man not see that they are not gods?" vers. 49, 53.

The inscription claims the authorship of this Epistle for Jeremiah, who, it is said, wrote it just as the Jews were going to Babylon, which is generally reckoned to be the first year of Nebuchadnezzar the Great—i. e., A. M. 3398, or B. C. 606. This is the general opinion of the Romish Church, which, as a matter of course, regards it as canonical. But modern critics, both Jewish and Christian, who deny the power to any Church to override internal evidence and defy the laws of criticism, have shown satisfactorily that its original language is Greek, and that it was written by Hellenistic Jews in imitation of Jeremiah, chapters x. and xxix. This is corroborated by the fact that this Epistle does not exist in the Hebrew, and was never included in the Jewish canon. The date of this Epistle cannot be definitely settled. It is generally supposed that 2 Macc. ii. 2 alludes to this Epistle, and that it must, therefore, be older than this book of Maccabees. Herzfeld infers from it the very reverse—namely, that this Epistle was written after the passage in 2 Macc., whilst Fritzsche and Davidson are utterly unable to see the appropriateness of the supposed reference. It is most probable that the writer lived toward the end of the Maccabæan period.

JEREMIAH. A celebrated patriarch of this name was elected at Constantinople in 1572. His public career was a continuation of difficulties. He was expelled from his see, but in a year he was permitted to return. Five years afterward he was driven off, and in 1585 he was banished to Rhodes. On his restoration, in 1587, he found the pecuniary state of the see so low that he had to apply for aid decided antagonism to the Reformed views. Jeremiah died in the year 1594.

JEREMIAS (jer-e'mi-as), Matt. xvi. 14, a Greek form of Jeremiah, used likewise in the Apocrypha, as in Ecclus. xlix. 6; 1 Esd. ix. 34. Probably Jeremai of Ezra x. 33.

JEREMOTH (jer-e'mōth). 1. A Benjamite chief, 1 Chr. viii. 14. 2. A Levite of the family of Merari, 1 Chr. xxiii. 23, called also, 1 Chr. xxiv.

JERIAH (jer-i'a), JERIJAH (jer-i'jah), a Kohathite Levite, 1 Chr. xxiii. 19; xxiv. 23; xxvi. 31.

JERIBAI (je-ri'bi), one of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 46.

to the czar of Russia, and as a return he had to constitute the metropolitan of Moscow a patriarch—a step which so enraged a number of his bishops that they joined the communion of the Church of Rome. When the Tübingen divines formed the scheme of a consolidation of the Greek and the Reformed Churches, it was with Jeremiah that the correspondence was opened. The Augsburg Confession and Luther's Smaller Catechism had been translated into Greek very soon after the Reformation, and then a letter had been prepared by Melancthon to the patriarch. Crusius and Andræ were sent as an embassy, but the effort utterly failed, and a formal declaration was put forth in

The name, according to the written text, of one of the Benei-Bani, who also took part in the same public acknowledgment of guilt, Ezra x. 29. The marginal note (Keri) reads "and Ramoth," and this is followed by the Septuagint and Vulgate. In Esdras the name is Hieremoth, 1 Esd. ix. 30.

tioned in connection with the approach of the Israelites to Palestine. The Israelites "pitched in the plains of Moab, on this side Jordan by Jericho," Num. xxii. 1. It was then a large and strong city, and must have existed for a long period. The probability is that on the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire from heaven Jericho was founded, and perhaps by some who had resided nearer the scene of the catastrophe, but who abandoned their houses in fear. Had the city existed in the time of Abraham and Lot, it would scarcely have escaped notice when the latter looked down on the plain of Jordan from the heights of Bethel, Gen. xiii. From the manner in which it is referred to, and the frequency with which it is mentioned, it was evidently the most important city in the Jordan valley at the time of the Exodus, Num. xxxiv. 15; xxxi. 12; xxxv. 1, etc. It was then encompassed by groves of palms, which attracted the special attention of the Israelites as they looked down upon its plain from the heights of Moab, and led them to call it the "city of palm trees." Jericho was the first city captured by the Israelites west of the Jordan, and the story of the two spies who were sent to it, and of its subsequent siege and destruction, forms one of the most wonderful and romantic episodes in sacred history. Scarcely less remarkable was the curse pronounced upon the city by Joshua: "Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho; he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it." It is evident this was no hasty or causeless anathema. The sin of Sodom appears to have clung to the spot, perhaps in some measure owing to the relaxing nature of the climate and the great productiveness of the soil, generating habits of idle luxury. On the division of the land among the tribes, Jericho was one of the marks on the border of Benjamin, whose territory extended down in a narrow point to the Jordan. But though the Benjamites possessed the site of the city, and though a few inhabitants gathered round to cultivate the plain, the ban of Joshua lay upon it for nearly five centuries. We read that, in the reign of Ahab, "Hiel the Bethelite built Jericho: he laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the Lord." Jericho thus became once more a large and important city; and notwithstanding the curse of Joshua and the fatality attendant upon its rebuilding, the prophets gathered round it, established a famous school, and gave it a name for sanctity and learning which it retained down to the commencement of our own era. Doubtless the visit of Elijah and Elisha, the translation of the former on the opposite bank of the Jordan and the miraculous healing of the poisonous fountain by the latter contributed much to the celebrity of the place. With the exception of two incidental references, 2 Ki. xxv. 5; 2 Chr. xxviii. 15, we hear nothing more of the city till after the captivity. Of "the children of Jericho three hundred and forty and five" returned from Babylon, and aided in rebuilding Jerusalem. In the interval between the Old Testament and New Testament histories, Jericho was a place of note. It was one of the towns fortified by Bacchides, a general of Demetrius Soter, when defeated by the Jews under Jonathan Maccabæus. Pompey encamped here on his way to Jerusalem in B. C. 63. Antony gave Jericho with nearly all Palestine to Cleopatra, and there is an old tradition that she caused slips of the balsam shrub, for which the gardens of Jericho were famous, to be taken to Egypt and planted at Heliopolis. From Cleopatra Jericho and its plain were farmed by Herod the Great, who adorned them with splendid palaces, castles and theatres. The city became one of his favorite places of residence, and in it he died.

The history of Jericho is incomplete. It appears that its site was changed, but at what period or for what reason we cannot tell. The city destroyed by Joshua and rebuilt by Hiel stood beside Elisha's fountain. This we infer from the narrative in 2 Ki. ii. 19-21; and Josephus says, "In the immediate vicinity of Jericho is a copious spring of great virtue in irrigation. It bursts forth near the ancient town, the first in the land of the Canaanites which yielded to the arms of Israel." There can be no doubt that the spring here mentioned is that now called Ain-es-Sultan, and also sometimes "Elisha's fountain," which is situated about a mile and a half north-west of the village of Riha. Now, from the "Jerusalem Itinerary," we learn that the Jericho of the fourth century, which was identical with that of the first, stood at the base of the mountains, on the right of the place where the road from Jerusalem enters the plain, and nearly two miles south of the fountain. After describing the fountain, the author of the "Itinerary" says, "Ibi fuit civitas Hiericho, cujus muros gyraverunt cum arca Testamenti filii Israel et ceciderunt muri."

Rev. Dr. Porter was acquainted with these facts before he visited the plain of Jericho, and was hence led to make a careful survey. The substance of the following sentences was written on the spot. The ancient, and indeed the only practicable, road from Jerusalem zigzags down the rugged and bare mountain side, close to the south bank of Wady el-Kelt, one of the most sublime ravines in Palestine. In the plain, half a mile from the foot of the pass, and a short distance south of the road to Riha, is an immense reservoir, now dry, and round it are extensive ruins, consisting of mounds of rubbish and ancient foundations. Riding northward, similar remains were seen on both sides of Wady el-Kelt. Half a mile farther north we enter cultivated ground, interspersed with clumps of thorny nubb ("lote tree") and other shrubs; another half mile brings us to Ain-es-Sultan, a large fountain bursting forth from the foot of a mound. The water though warm is sweet, and is extensively used in the irrigation of the surrounding plain. The whole plain immediately around the fountain is strewn with ancient ruins and heaps of rubbish. There can be no doubt that this is the fountain healed by Elisha, and that the ruins beside it are those of the city captured by Joshua and rebuilt by Hiel the Bethelite, while the ruins lying at the foot of the pass, and on the banks of the Kelt, mark the site of the Jericho of the New Testament.

The more modern city thus lays on the direct route from Peræa to Jerusalem. Our Lord followed this route. On approaching Jericho he appears to have cured one blind man, and on leaving it on the opposite side he cured another. Then, proceeding on his journey, a vast crowd having gathered round him, he saw Zaccheus up in the sycamore tree, went into his house, probably a villa in the gardens near the road; and having rested there for a time, and related the parable of the ten pounds, "he went forward, ascending up (by the steep wild mountain road) to Jerusalem." At this period the environs of Jericho must have been exceedingly rich and beautiful. The abundant waters of Elisha's fountain, and of other larger fountains at the foot of the mountains northward, were conducted by aqueducts and canals, and distributed far and wide over the vast plain. The gardens and orchards abounded in spices, shrubs and fruit trees of the rarest kinds, and were dotted besides with the palaces of the Jewish princes and nobles.

The subsequent history of Jericho contains little worthy of note. It was made the head of one of the toparchies of Palestine under Vespasian. Eusebius and Jerome state that it was destroyed during the siege of Jerusalem. It afterward contained a considerable Christian population, and was for a long period the seat of a bishopric. A church and hospice were built here by the emperor Justinian, but these buildings and the city appear to have been destroyed during or soon after the Mohammedan conquest, for Adamnanus, at the close of the seventh century, describes the site as deserted, with the exception of Rahab's house. During the rule of the Saracens, Jericho again in some measure revived; the old aqueducts were repaired and the plain rendered fruitful. But it would seem that the site was again changed, and the new town or village built where the little hamlet of Riha now stands. When the crusaders conquered Palestine, the plain of Jericho was one of the most fertile regions in the country, and was assigned to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. After the close of the crusades Jericho again gradually declined, and it has never since revived.

Riha, the only modern representative of the ancient royal city of Jericho, is a small, poor, filthy hamlet. The houses consist of rough walls of old building stones, roofed with straw and brushwood. Each has in front of it an enclosure for cattle, fenced with branches of the thorny nubb, and a stronger fence of the same material surrounds the whole village, forming a rude barrier against the raids of the Bedouin. Not far from the village is a little square castle or tower, evidently of Saracenic origin, but now dignified by the title of "the house of Zaccheus." This village, though it bears the name of Jericho, is, as has been stated, about a mile and a half distant both from the Jericho of the prophets and that of the Evangelists. Very probably it may occupy the site of Gilgal. See GILGAL. The soil of the plain is unsurpassed in fertility; there is abundance of water for irrigation, and many of the old aqueducts are almost perfect; yet nearly the whole plain is waste and desolate. The few fields of wheat and Indian corn and the few orchards of figs are enough to show what the place might become under proper cultivation. But the people are now few in number, indolent and licentious. The palms which gave the ancient city a distinctive appellation are gone; even that "single solitary palm" which Dr. Robinson saw exists no more. The climate of Jericho is exceedingly hot and unhealthy. On the 13th of May the thermometer rose to 102° Fahrenheit in Dr. Robinson's tent beside the village, and other writers testify that they have never suffered so severely from the effects of intense heat as in the plain of Jericho, even during the early spring months. The heat is accounted for by the depression of the plain, which is about 1200 feet below the level of the sea. The reflection of the sun's rays from the bare white cliffs and mountain ranges which shut in the plain and the noisome exhalations from the lake and from the numerous salt springs around it are enough to poison the atmosphere.

The forest gardens and verdant fields and meadows of Jericho must have been a glorious sight to the Israelites from the mountain sides of Moab and to Moses from the top of Pisgah. After the bare rocks of Sinai and the bare valley of Arabah and the bare downs of Moab, the waving palm groves and broad plains sparkling with streams, and the wide sea, would seem an earthly paradise. And desolate as the plain has now become, it is still beautiful to the eye of the pilgrim, after his six hours' weary march down through the wide and parched wilderness of Judæa. The glory of the "city of palm trees" has long since passed away, but the beauty of the site is perennial.

JEROBOAM (je-ro-bo'am). 1. The founder of the kingdom of Israel in its separate and independent existence. He was of the tribe of Ephraim, and the son of Nebat by Zeruah, who is called a widow, 1 Ki. xi. 26. No other particulars of his early life or connections have been preserved to us in the sacred narrative. But when still only a young man, he is represented as having first risen to distinction under Solomon's reign, and then proceeded to project schemes of rebellion. At the building of Millo, and in the repairs generally of the city, Jeroboam so distinguished himself that Solomon took special notice of him, and committed to him the oversight of the public burdens exigible for such purposes from the tribe of Ephraim, and to avoid summary vengeance, he had to make his escape to Egypt.

In Egypt he found not only an asylum, but apparently a kind and honorable reception. Shishak, the Sesonchis of profane history, then occupied the throne of Egypt. With a view to weaken the dominion of the house of David, not improbably through the advice and instigation of Jeroboam, Shishak at a later period brought war against Rehoboam, and extorted from him great treasure. But as soon as the commotions arose which grew out of Solomon's death, and the people began to press their demands on Rehoboam, they sent tidings to Jeroboam, and invited him to come and take the lead in urging their grievances, 1 Ki. xii. 3. He was not slow to do so; and the result was, through the folly of Rehoboam on the one side, and the skillful management of Jeroboam on the other, the accomplishment of Ahijah's prophecy by the formation of the ten tribes into a separate kingdom. See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF. For this action Jeroboam had a divine warrant; and however a false of the overseers of offerings and tithes in the reign of Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxxi. 13.

JERIOTH (je-ri'oth), the wife or concubine of Caleb, the son of Hezron, 1 Chr. ii. 18. The Vulgate makes Jerioth the daughter of Azubah, Caleb's wife, and some of the older interpreters regard Jerioth as another name of Azubah; but both expedients are arbitrary.

JERMENT (jer'ment), GEORGE, D.D., who was an eminent minister of the Scottish Secession Church, was born in Peebles, in the year 1759. His father was also a minister, and he belonged to the strict section of the Secession Church known as the Anti-burghers. After the usual course of collegiate and theological training, he became an associate minister with Mr. Wilson in Bow Lane, Cheapside, in 1782. During the long period of thirty-five years he ministered to this charge, attracting great congregations and commanding the respect and affection of the educated and the pious in all classes. He occupied a prominent place among the directors of the London Missionary perhaps also of Manassah. It was then that he began to lift up his hand against Solomon, 1 Ki. xi. 27, seeking to stir up disaffection against the existing government. A memorable interview occurred between him and the prophet Ahijah, who met him one day by the way and made known to him from the Lord that, on account of the idolatrous defection into which Solomon had fallen, the kingdom was to be rent asunder, that two tribes only were to be left to the house of David, that Jeroboam himself was to be made head of the other ten, and that if, when raised to this high position, he should walk in the fear of God and keep the commandments delivered in the law of Moses, the kingdom would be secured to his house for many a day to come. In token also of the certainty of all this, Ahijah took the new mantle which Jeroboam wore, and having torn it into twelve pieces, gave ten of these to Jeroboam as his proper share. Instead of patiently waiting God's time, like David, Jeroboam sought to precipitate the result which he not only ardently wished, but now had certified to him from heaven. His selfish zeal betrayed itself too soon for his own ends; and ambition may have morally vitiated the procedure, the procedure itself was chargeable with no blame. This new kingdom, called into being for a specific aim and purpose, stood on a divine promise not less than the kingdom of David itself. But the misfortune was that Jeroboam was not content with what that promise secured for him; he would be the founder of a kingdom which should acknowledge no superior, and should stand in another relation to the kingdom of Judah than one of temporary subservience to its ultimate good. And so, while he fulfilled God's counsel in withdrawing his allegiance from the house of David, he withstood that counsel in framing a constitution for his new kingdom which was both designed and fitted to sever the now divided tribes religiously, as well as politically, from each other, and that for ever. In this higher respect he acted the part of a rebel against the proper head of the theocracy, and changed the very spirit of the Hebrew commonwealth. It was on the religious side that the chief danger lay of a relapse in the ten tribes to the original unity. When the first few years of excitement were over, and the tribes began anew to go up to Jerusalem and meet together in solemn festival on the spot hallowed by so many associations, how likely was it that they should yearn again after the old fraternal unity! So Jeroboam forecast in his mind; and distrusting the divine promise, which assured him of a reasonable prolongation of his dominion if he adhered to the law of Moses, he resolved to make the separation complete by setting up in Dan on the north and Bethel in the south (places already esteemed sacred) two centres of worship, where the people might assemble to pay their vows. However the worship established in these places had been ordered, it was at variance with the spirit of the constitution introduced by Moses; for according to this, there was to be but one altar of burnt-offering and one place of meeting, where God should put his name. But the contrariety became much greater when calves were set up as symbols, in the new temples at Dan and Bethel, through which Jehovah was to be worshiped, for here it came into conflict with the stringent prohibitions of the second commandment, and the religious feelings of the people were shocked by the innovation. Jeroboam soon found that so radical a change could not stand alone; it involved others. The priests refused to minister at the altars, and he had to supply their place from such as could be had, "the lowest of the people." He changed the feast of the seventh month, the feast of tabernacles, into one in the eighth, and himself at times took it upon him to minister in the priests' office. It was while standing, on one occasion, beside the altar to offer incense, that a prophet from Judah suddenly appeared and cried out against the altar, predicting its destruction by a future king of Judah—a denunciation peculiarly galling to Jeroboam, since the grand object he was aiming at by his whole policy was to achieve for his institutions a stability that should be independent of the sister kingdom. He stretched forth his hand to arrest the man of God, but the hand became paralyzed in the effort, and was only restored to use on the prophet's intercession, 1 Ki. xiii. 1-4. Still, he persisted in his course, even with the manifest seal of Heaven's displeasure upon it and the earnest protest of all the more pious and upright members of the community. The multitude followed, and the corrupt worship he established came by and by to be regarded as the settled order of things for Israel, paving the way for still more flagrant departures from the faith, which were also in due time introduced; so that the name of Jeroboam stands written with the dreadful brand on it as that of the man "who made Israel to sin."

Politically considered also, the course of Jeroboam proved a fatal one; his worldly-wise policy weakened what should have been its firmest bonds, subverted the grand principle of order in men's minds, and presenting him to his subjects in the light of a merely successful usurper, naturally encouraged others to try the same perilous course. Accordingly, heavy disasters and ominous defeats befell him even in his own lifetime, 1 Ki. xiv. 1-18; 2 Chr. xiii. 1-20, and the son who succeeded him on the throne; and all the house he had labored so much to consolidate were within a brief space swept away by a fresh usurper—Baasha, of the tribe of Issachar, 1 Ki. xv. 25-30.

2. JEROBOAM II., the son and successor of Joash, and the last member but one of the fourth Israelitish dynasty. In the general principles and character of his government he entirely agreed with the first Jeroboam. Corruptions of all kinds were rampant in his time, and the prophet Amos ventured, even at Bethel, to lift up his voice against them, and to proclaim the approaching visitation of divine judgments on account of them, Amos vii. For this the high-priest of Bethel reported him to Jeroboam as a preacher of sedition, and sought the interposition of the civil arm; but whether any violent measures were taken against him is not stated. The probability is that an arrest was at least laid on his prophetic agency in the kingdom of Israel, for Jeroboam was evidently an energetic ruler, and was not likely to allow so faithful a reprobator as Amos to continue his ministrations. He not only held all the territory that he had received from his father, but enlarged its border toward the north, and recovered Hamath of Judah—i. e., the part of Hamath which once belonged to Judah—and Damascus, which had fallen into the hands of the Syrian monarchy. These temporary successes, it is said, had been predicted by the prophet Jonah, and are represented as one of the last flickering manifestations of divine mercy toward Israel before the final extinguishment of their light as a people, 2 Ki. xiv. 25-28.

Jeroboam's reign was a long one—forty-one years. The manner of his death is not mentioned, and no intimation is given of its being other than a natural one. In Amos vii. 11, Amaziah, the high-priest of Bethel, in reporting what he called the conspiracy of Amos against Jeroboam, represents the prophet as declaring that Jeroboam should die by the sword; and some would regard this as a prophecy that had failed of its fulfillment. But the probability rather is that the high-priest, who displayed the true spirit of a persecutor, gave an unduly specific and offensive turn to the words of Amos, in order to inflame Jeroboam the more against him; for in the utterances of Amos, so far as he himself reports them, nothing is affirmed of the mode of Jeroboam's death. The Lord, he said, was to rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword, Amos vii. 9; but that is a different thing from affirming that Jeroboam himself should die by it, although the high-priest, for his own purposes, might very readily put that sense upon the words. We find the Jews of our Lord's time dealing after the same fashion with his words, John viii. 52, 53; Mark xiv. 57, 58, and with Stephen's, Acts vi. 13, 14.

JEROHAM (jé-ro'ham). 1. The father of Elkanah and grandfather of Samuel the prophet, 1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chr. vi. 27, 34. 2. The father of Adaiah, a priest of the returned captives and son of Pashur, whose brethren are described as "very able men for the work of the service of the house of God," 1 Chr. ix. 12, 13. It is surely the same who is mentioned Neh. xi. 12, notwithstanding the discrepancy. 3. The father of Azareel, 1 Chr. xxvii. 22. 4. The father of Azariah, one of the "captains of hundreds," 2 Chr. xxiii. 1. 5. A man of Benjamin, the father of six sons, who were of "the heads of the fathers, by their generations, chief men," 1 Chr. viii. 27. 6. A man of Benjamin, the father of Ibneiah, 1 Chr. ix. 8. 7. A man of Gedor whose sons, described as "mighty men, helpers in the war," although they were "of Saul's brethren of Benjamin," yet united themselves with David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 1, 2, 7.

JEROME (je-róm' or jer'óm), one of the most eminent of all the Latin Fathers, was born about the middle of the fourth century, but the exact time is unknown. The place of his nativity was on the confines of Dalmatia, and his parents were Christians, who gave him such education as their means afforded. He removed to Rome for the study of philosophy, and here he was baptized. He had gone to Gaul after a course of study at Rome, and in 370 he was at Treves, where he commenced his first essay in the form of a letter to Innocentius. Three years afterward he removed to the East, and he settled at Antioch, where he suffered from a severe attack of fever which greatly affected him. On his recovery he changed the course of his life, abandoning classical study and general literature, and devoting himself to ascetic habits with great fervor. In this state of mind he retired to the desert of Chalcis, where he divided his time between the study of Hebrew and such exercises of mortification as accorded with the monkish views of the age. In 378 he returned to Antioch, and his fervid spirit led him into active life again. He was ordained as a presbyter the following year; but continuing to lead an itinerant life, he went to Constantinople, where he profited by the prelections of Gregory Nazianzen, who was then assailing the views of the Arian party. During his residence at Constantinople, his attention was largely drawn to the Greek Fathers and the study of Greek, but he was induced to return to Rome in connection with the Meletian controversy, which was dividing the Church at Antioch. He became secretary to the pontiff, and his friendship was enjoyed by Jerome as long as Damasus lived. His fame had now become known all over the Church, and he used his great powers with unceasing activity to advance the monastic system. In his enthusiasm and intense earnestness he went so far that, if his principles had been carried out by society, the condition of the Church of the world would have been so changed, that human progress must have been arrested. His addresses became exceedingly extravagant, and many placed themselves under his direction, but his converts were mostly females, among whom were members of the wealthy and elevated families of Rome. As has been well said, "Among these patrician converts he expounded the Holy Scriptures; he answered their questions of conscience, he incited them to a celibate life, lavish beneficence and enthusiastic asceticism, and flattered their spiritual vanity by extravagant praises. He was the oracle, biographer, admirer, and eulogist of these holy women, who constituted the spiritual nobility of Catholic Rome." Eminent as his position now was at Rome, still, when Damasus died, in A. D. 384, he concluded that his wisest course was to seek a home in the East, where the passion for asceticism was fully recognized. Accordingly, he abandoned all his interests at Rome; and journeying at his leisure, he finally after a visit to Epiphanius at Salamis, settled at Bethlehem, in A. D. 386. Here he was followed by some of his female converts, one of whom, Paula, founded four convents; and here he entered on his great life-work, the translation of the Scriptures. Absorbing as this work proved to be, it did not prevent him from rushing into controversy with all the fervor of his spirit. He dealt heavy blows against Vigilantius, Jovinian and the Pelagians, and even assailed Augustine. He became so greatly alarmed about the designs of the Pelagians that he fled from Bethlehem for two years, but he returned in 418, greatly enfeebled and worn out; he gradually sunk under sickness, and died A. D. 420.

Jerome deservedly occupies a prominent place among the greatest Fathers of the Church because of the intense energy of his character, the impression which he made on his age and the influence which he brought to bear on the Church by his writings; and most of all by the well-known Latin version of the Scriptures which he prepared. The version in use in his day had "become greatly distorted by the blending together of different translations, the mixing with each other of the different Gospels and the ignorance of transcribers." The circumstances of his life united to fit him for the great work which he ultimately finished. Born in the West and familiar with the Latin tongue from his infancy, his removal to Antioch secured a competent knowledge of Hebrew, while his residence and studies at Constantinople gave him an entire mastery of Greek. While he was at Rome his friend Damasus had urged his attention to the condition of the translations then in use, and he had entered on the preparation of a version of the Gospels and the Psalms. In his retreat at Bethlehem he had leisure to prosecute the work which gradually grew upon his hands; and the energy of his character was such that he toiled on until he had completed the vast undertaking. He knew that he was exposing himself "to reproaches on the part of those who, in their ignorance, which they identified with a pious sim-plcity, were wont to condemn every deviation from the traditional text, however necessary or salutary it might be. They were ready to see in any change of the only text which was known to them a falsification, without inquiring any further into the reason of the alteration. Yet here he had in his favor the authority of a Roman bishop, as well as the fact that in this case it was impossible to oppose to him a translation established and transmitted by ecclesiastical authority, or a divine preservation of the text hitherto received." As Neander has well said, "he must have given far greater offence by another useful undertaking, viz., a new version of the Old Testament, not according to the Alexandrian translation, which before this had alone been accepted, but according to the Hebrew. This appeared to many, even of those who did not belong to the class of ignorant persons, a great piece of impiety—to pretend to understand the Old Testament better than the seventy inspired interpreters—better than the apostles who had followed this translation, and who would have given another translation if they had considered it to be necessary—to allow one's self to be so misled by Jews as for their accommodation to falsify the writings of the Old Testament." Of the Vulgate, the great work of Jerome, Dr. Schaff has correctly said that it takes the first place among the Bible versions of the ancient Church, and it exerted the same influence on Latin Christianity that the Septuagint did on the Greek Church. Indeed, it became the mother of the most of the translations which were used in different European nations; and being made from the Hebrew and the Greek, it was vastly superior to the imperfect versions in use in the West before Jerome took his great work in hand. In the light of modern information, with the manuscripts now collected, and the accurate knowledge of Hebrew and Greek to which the critical learning of the Church has attained, the imperfections and inaccuracies of the Vulgate are very obvious. It was no wonder, however, that the Vulgate rose to such a place as it did in the Western Church, but it cannot, however, be seen by the really learned men in the Romish Church but that a grand mistake has been made by that Church in placing it on a level with the original text of the inspired word.

still takes the first rank, and as an influential theologian the second (after Augustine), among the Latin Fathers."

JEROME GHINUCCIIS (ghe-nook'che-is), an Italian who became bishop of Worcester. As an evidence of the power of the court of Rome in England in the sixteenth century, it may be stated that he was the fourth Italian who held this see in regular succession. His predecessor had been Julius de Medecis, who resigned the see in 1522. Ghinucciis was bishop of Asculum when appointed to Worcester, and he had been auditor-general of the apostolic chamber and domestic chaplain to the pope. Henry VIII. took him into his service and used him as an envoy in different countries, and he also labored with great zeal and success in procuring the judgment of Italian and Spanish divines against the marriage of Henry with Queen Catherine, and at the instigation of Henry, Clement VII. raised him to the dignity of a cardinal. Nevertheless, he was ejected from his bishopric in 1534, and to him succeeded the well-known Reformer and martyr Hugh Latimer, who after four years of sore trials resigned the see in 1539.

cluding Matthew, the Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, Titus and Philemon. They are justly placed on a level with the works of Augustine for learning, though they are inferior in theological accuracy and spiritual fervor. His book on the "Interpretation of Hebrew Names" was valuable, but it yielded in real worth to his well-known "Onomasticon" or word-book, a treatise in alphabetical order, in which he modified a similar work of Eusebius, containing an enumeration of the places mentioned in Scripture so far as their localities could in his day be identified. In the words of a modern historian of sound judgment, Jerome was "orthodox in theology and Christology, semi-Pelagian in anthropology, Romanizing in the doctrine of the Church and tradition, anti-chiteastic in eschatology, legalistic and ascetic in ethics, a violent fighter of all heresies, a fanatical apologist of all monkish extravagances; he was revered throughout the Catholic middle age as the patron saint of Christian and ecclesiastical learning, and next to Augustine as 'Maximus doctor ecclesie' (the greatest doctor of the Church), but by his enthusiastic love for the holy Scriptures, his recourse to the original languages, his classic translation of the Bible and his manifold exegetical merits, he also played materially into the hands of the Reformation, and as a scholar and an author

JEROME OF PRAGUE, the companion of John Huss, whom he surpassed in learning and eloquence, was born at Prague in the latter half of the fourteenth century. After attending the university of his native town, he continued his studies at Paris, Cologne, Oxford and Heidelberg. At Oxford he became thoroughly imbued with the tenets of Wycliffe, and on his return to the Continent he entered with his whole soul into the contest carried on by his friend Huss against the abuses of the hierarchy and the profligacy of the clergy. His zeal, however, carried him too far, but the treatment he and his friend Huss received at the hands of the dominant party has justly been pleaded in extenuation. He created great excitement by presenting two large placards, one representing Christ and his disciples barefooted and in great humility, and the other the pope with his cardinals in state and splendor. When the papal bull was issued in 1412 granting plenary indulgence to all who would engage in a holy warfare against King Ladislaus, he is said to have had the bull carried about the streets by two improper characters before a great body of students, and afterward he caused it to be burned. Many of the charges which were urged against him have been earnestly denied, such as his having ordered a priest to be thrown into the river Moldau, and who was rescued before he was drowned. When Huss was arrested at Constance, Jerome hastened to defend him; but receiving no satisfactory answer to his demand for a safe-conduct from the council, he set out on his return to Prague, when he was arrested at Hirschau, in April, 1415, and conveyed in chains to Constance. Here he was cast into a dungeon, and placed on trial. After a short imprisonment, he recanted his opinions, but subsequently abjured his recantation, and went to the stake with great firmness. He was burned alive May 30, 1416. Well has it been said, "Historians, (Roman) Catholic and Protestant alike, vie with each other in paying homage to the heroic courage and apostolic resignation with which Jerome met his doom. Posterity has confirmed their verdict, and reveres him as a martyr to the truth, who, unwearied in life and noble in death, has acquired an immortal renown for his share in the Reformation."

JEROMITES (jer'om-ites), usually designated HIERONYMITES (he-er-on'im-ites), were an order of monks founded by Vasco, a Portuguese, and a Spaniard named Pecha, at the close of the fourteenth century. The order spread rapidly in Spain, the Netherlands (because of the connection of the two countries) and in Spanish America. The convents of the order became wealthy. When Charles V. retired from public life, he entered this order. At present the Jeromites are mostly found in the South American regions which were formerly in the hands of Spain.

JERUBBAAL (jer-ub-ba'al), "whom Baal pleads or contends with," a surname of Gideon, given to him in consequence of Gideon's having thrown down an altar of Baal; and when the Abiezrites brought an accusation against him to his father Joash, the latter defended his son, and said, Let Baal plead against him, Jud. vi. 32. Jerubbaal was thenceforth applied as a surname to Gideon. The name Jerubbaal appears in the Grecized form of Hierombal in a fragment of Philo-Byblius preserved by Eusebius. In the Palmyrene inscriptions Iaribolos appears as the name of a deity.

JERUBBESHETH (je-rub'be-sheth), "whom the idol contends with," the same term substantially as Jerubbaal, only with the general word for idol, shemeth, shameful thing, abomination, substituted for Baal. It is only once, and at a comparatively late period, applied to Gideon, 2 Sam. xi. 21.

JERUEL (jer-er'el), WILDERNESS OF, the scene of the discomfiture of the Ammonites, Moabites and other Arab tribes who invaded Judæa in the reign Jehoshaphat, 2 Chr. xx. 16. Although not mentioned elsewhere, the situation of this region may be determined with tolerable precision from the circumstantial details given in the chapter cited. The invading tribes, having marched round the south of the Dead Sea, had encamped at Engedi. The road thence to Jerusalem ascends from the shore by a steep and terrible pass, and thence leads northward, passing below Tekoa. Jehoshaphat, by the direction of Jahaziel, goes forth from Jerusalem to the wilderness of Tekoa. He is told that the invaders are coming up by the ascent of Ziz, evidently the difficult pass just mentioned, and that he should find them at the end of the brook before the wilderness of Jeruel. Three days having been consumed in spoiling the dead, he leads his army to the valley of Berachah (Bereikut) to offer thanks for the deliverance. The wilderness of Jeruel must therefore have been traversed by the road from Engedi to Jerusalem, adjacent to the wilderness of Tekoa, and distant by a short march from Bereikut. In all these respects the large tract of table land called El-husasah from a wady on its northern side, and extending in verdant slopes to the hill country about Tekoa, satisfies the requirements of the narrative.

JERUSALEM (je-roo'sa-lem), "habitation or foundation of peace," the Jewish capital of Palestine.

PART I. NAME AND HISTORY.—This far-famed and most sacred of all cities has a name which at once suggests inquiry as to its meaning and origin. The old traditions and natural prepossessions both of Jews and Christians connect it with that Salem of which Melchizedek, the priest of the Most High God, was king, and there is no doubt that it is the place which the Psalmist had in view when he sang, "In Judah is God known; his name is great in Israel. In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Zion." It is also worthy of note that at the conquest of Canaan by the descendants of Abraham the king of Jerusalem had a name, Adonizedek, "Lord of Righteousness," almost identical in meaning with that of Melchizedek, "King of Righteousness," who was king of Salem in the time of Abraham.

The position of Jerusalem was such as to make it a place of leading importance at the time of the invasion of the land by Joshua; and we accordingly find Adonizedek, its king, summoning four other chieftains of the land to punish Gibeon for having made peace with Israel. Its great strength also appears in the fact that it was not one of the places sacked by Joshua after he had slain Adonizedek and the other four kings who had gone up with him against Gibeon, and that the Jebusites continued to hold it for so long a period afterward. The difficulty of dislodging the Jebusites, and the fact that they continued to dwell with the children of Israel in Jerusalem, clearly indicate the natural division of the place into an upper and lower town. Of the upper town, enclosed within powerful defences, and forming the stronghold of Zion, the Jebusites no doubt maintained possession while the rest of the city was in flames, and they continued to dwell there after the children of Benjamin had established themselves in the valley at its foot, or on contiguous but lower heights. This view is confirmed by the authority of Josephus, from whom we also learn that the children of Judah, disappointed in their attempt upon the upper town, withdrew to Hebron, about thirty miles to the south of Jerusalem. This would naturally give the tribe of Benjamin an opportunity for occupying the ruined town which Judah had abandoned, as the boundary-line which separated the northern edge of the territory apportioned to Judah from the southern edge of that apportioned to Benjamin passed through or close to Jerusalem, possibly at the foot of Zion, comp. Josh. xv. 8 and xviii. 28 with Ps. xlvi. 2.

The stronghold of Zion which was thus maintained by the Jebusites in this first recorded siege of Jerusalem (B. C. 1443) continued in their hands throughout the whole of the troubled times of the judges and the early days of the kingdom of Israel. It was about 400 years afterward, according to the chronology of the Authorized Version, that David "the man of Judah," having finally triumphed over the house of Saul "the Benjamite," and being firmly established on the throne of the kingdom of all Israel as well as Judah, B. C. 1048, in that Hebron which had been the chief city of the tribe of Judah ever since its first ineffectual attempt on the stronghold of Zion, gathered together his forces for a fresh attempt on the fortress which had hitherto baffled the efforts of its Hebrew invaders. Great as was the reputation of David, the confidence of the men of Jebus was still greater. As the Hebrew armies lay round about them they shouted insultingly from their walls, "Except thou take away the blind and the lame thou shalt not come in hither." The simplest interpretation of this insult seems to be that the lame and the blind, the most infirm and helpless of the place, were exhibited on the walls as a sufficient defence against its besiegers. Others have thought that the idols of the Jebusites were so displayed, and that the words lame and blind were used ironically and derisively, in allusion to the terms in which those idols were spoken of by the Israelites. This futile taunt, however, only served to rouse the indignation of the divinely assisted hero whom the giant of Gath had once so vainly cursed by his gods, threatening to give his flesh to the fowls of the air and the beasts of the fields. A fresh impulse was added to the zeal of the besiegers, and the hill of Zion was taken.

Jerusalem was now made the capital of the united kingdoms of Israel and Judah, and Zion, its stronghold, henceforth called the city of David, became the residence of the king and the site of that royal palace for the building of which "cedar trees and carpenters and masons" were furnished by Hiram, king of Tyre. The position of the new capital with reference to the territories of the several tribes was eminently suited to give it a commanding influence among them. It rested on the southern edge of that grand and lofty plateau which, interrupted only by the valley of Esdraelon crossing it midway between its northern and southern extremity, occupies the entire area of the Holy Land between the valley of the Jordan and the low lands bordering on the Mediterranean Sea. And yet it did not occupy, like Hebron, Shechem and other great cities of Israel, the crest of one particular hill, but was seated at a height of some 3000 feet above the level of the sea, at a point on the eastern edge of the great southern table-land which is protected on its south and east sides by two deep valleys or ravines running down from the west and north, and joining at its south-east corner, where they form the head of a deep, winding cleft rather than valley, which reaches to the Dead Sea, and forms the dry bed of the Kedron. This stream also gives its name to the ravine which comes from the north and protects Jerusalem on the east, while the southern ravine is known as the valley of Hinnom. Jerusalem, being thus defended against invaders on the south and east, and partly on the north by these ravines, is open and able to extend itself, and hold ready communication with the whole country toward the west and north-west over the undulating height of the plateau on which it rests. This peculiarity of position is the key to much of its subsequent history.

But Jerusalem was something more than the civil capital of the kingdom. It was the place which had been foreordained by the wisdom of God to be its spiritual centre, the holy city to which the tribes of the Lord were to go up every year to celebrate at different seasons their three great festivals. David accordingly proceeded to invest it with that sacredness of character which it was to possess throughout all future ages. The ark of the covenant was still resting at Kirjath-jerim, where it had remained ever since the high-priesthood of Eli and those terrible manifestations of its sanctity which fell both on Philistines and Israelites after its removal from the tabernacle at Shiloh. The sacred receptacle, with its mysterious contents, David now resolved to carry to Jerusalem. But its progress to its intended shrine was again arrested by the anger of God, which burst with fatal violence on the head of Uzzah, a man who had ventured to steady it with his hand as it tottered with the motion of the cart which bore it on its way. The revered and dreaded object, left once more in charge of a private person, became a blessing to those who sheltered it with reverence, and David was again encouraged to carry out his purpose. This time a troop of Levites was employed to bear it with staves on their shoulders, and David himself headed a great procession, which conducted it in triumph, with music and singing and dancing, to the tabernacle prepared for it on Mount Zion. We then find David performing the functions of priest as well as king, offering burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, and blessing the people in the name of the Lord. He also appointed certain Levites to minister before the ark continually, and to "record, and to thank and praise the Lord God of Israel."

and horses, the palace which he built for Pharaoh's daughter and the palace of the forest of Lebanon. In the mean time, other cities were built in different parts of his dominions; he formed alliances with powerful princes, and carried on a lucrative commerce with Egypt by land, with Eastern Africa and India by the Red Sea, and with Spain and Western Africa by the Mediterranean. By his wealth and influence, and the prestige of his power, he extended the range of his dominion from the Euphrates to the Nile, 1 Ki. iv. 21; 2 Chr. ix. 26.

But Solomon, who filled the world with the fame of his wisdom and received so many testimonies of the favor of God during his youth and manhood, was at length infatuated by the same seductions which brought so much sorrow on his father. Toward the close of his reign,

His heart, though large, and he built temples for Ashtoreth, Chemosh and Milcom on the right hand—i. e., the south side—of the Mount of Corruption, 1 Ki. xi. 7; 2 Ki. xxiii. 13. There can be no doubt that this means on one or more of the four hills lying to the east of Jerusalem, on the opposite side of the valley restored the temple-worship and invited the people of Israel to come up to Jerusalem and keep the Passover. He also constructed the famous works for drawing the waters of the Gihon from their source into the city to supply the citizens, and distress the enemy, in the event of a siege. During the reign of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar visited Jerusalem, reduced the king to subjection and took some treasure and captives to Babylon, among the rest Daniel and the "three Hebrew children." Jehoiakim's rebellion, three years later, resulted in a harassing warfare which lasted until after his death. During the reign of his son Jehoiachin Jerusalem was again besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, who despoiled the king's house and the temple of the chief portion of their treasures, and carried into captivity the princes and chief men as well as all the artificers and the men who were fit for war, and placed on the throne an uncle of Jehoiachin, to whom he gave the name of Zedekiah, and "made him swear by God" that he would remain his subject, Ezek. xvii. 14. This oath Zedekiah, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 13, broke, trusting in the help of Pharaoh Hophra, king of Egypt, and thereby not only provoked the vengeance of Nebuchadnezzar, but incurred the anger of God. Nebuchadnezzar

In the mean time, the building of Jerusalem and its enclosure within walls of wider circuit than those which had surrounded the Jebusite city was zealously carried on. But the king could not see the contrast between his own magnificent palace and the slight structure which sheltered the ark without fervent desires to build for it a temple more suited to the majesty of God. Besides which, the divine oracles seemed to point at a centralization of his worship which was not yet realized; for while the "ark of the covenant" was enshrined in the city of David, the tabernacle of the Lord was at Gibeon, and there the whole ritual of the Mosaic law continued to be observed by the high-priest and his attendant priests and Levites.

His pious wish was made known to the prophet Nathan, who at first applauded the design, but was afterward instructed by special revelation to forbid its present accomplishment, while he foretold the perpetual establishment of the house of David and the birth of a son who would carry out his father's purpose in more peaceful times. See DAVID. For a description of the temple and history of its erection, see TEMPLE.

After the completion of the temple, Solomon surrounded Jerusalem with strong walls and towers and filled it with magnificent structures—his own palace, the vast establishment for his chariots of the Kidron, and constituting together what we know as the Mount of Olives. The name "Corruption" (Hammashchith) seems to have been given to this range of hills on account of its desecration by Solomon, and to be a sort of play upon the word Hammishchah, which means "unction," and which it may be supposed to have derived from the olives for which it was famous. These temples continued to give a character of unholiness to the ground which was afterward made so holy by the footsteps of our Lord, till Josiah removed them about 360 years afterward. The same dishonor was done to the valley of Hinnom, on its south side, by the establishment there of the worship of Molech, 2 Ki. xxiii. 10.

Grievous troubles fell upon Solomon as a punishment for these sins, the worst of them all being the threatened disruption of his kingdom under his son and successor Rehoboam. Egypt, the old enemy of Israel, was the fosterer of this revolution, Jeroboam, who had been announced by prophecy as its instrument, having sought shelter there from the expected indignation of Solomon. After Solomon's death the separation of the kingdoms took place through Rehoboam's weakness and folly, and during the reigns of his successors the city had varied fortunes. Hezekiah, who succeeded Ahaz, destroyed the vestiges of idolatry, invested Jerusalem on the tenth day of the tenth month (B. C. 588), in the ninth year of Zedekiah. Engines of war raised on heights about the walls hurled weighty missiles into the city, the walls were battered with rams, and famine and pestilence prevailed within them. There was a temporary lull in the siege, during which the Chaldean army went to meet the Egyptians who were coming to the relief of Jerusalem, but the Egyptians turned back without an encounter, and the siege was resumed. The wall was broken on the ninth day of the fourth month of the second year of the siege, and Zedekiah secretly took flight, passing over the Mount of Olives toward the Jordan, but he was taken near Jericho and conveyed to Riblah in Coele-Syria, on the extreme north of Palestine, where Nebuchadnezzar was watching from afar the siege of Tyre. There his two sons were slain before his eyes, and he was deprived of sight and carried to Babylon. There also were slain Seraiah the chief priest and Zephaniah the second priest, three doorkeepers of the temple, five officers of the court, two of the army and sixty persons of note who were found in Jerusalem. The rest of the people, with the remaining treasure of the temple—some of it broken in pieces for facility of removal, including the great brazen sea and the two pillars Jachin and Boaz—were carried away. This was the third great deportation of captives and treasure from Jerusalem to Babylon. It was effected by Nebuzaradan about a month after the siege. He completed his work by burning the temple and the city, and razing the walls to the ground. From this time the land "enjoyed her Sabbaths" till the end of the seventy years.

The general tradition of the East, the testimony of ancient inscriptions and profane history, agree with sacred history in asserting the fact that in the latter part of the sixth century before Christ a prince named Cyrus, of the hitherto unimportant state of Persia, conquered the greater part of Asia. This prince, whom the Lord by the mouth of the prophet Isaiah had named as his "shepherd" and his "anointed one" 200 years before, wrested Babylon out of the hands of Belshazzar (538 B. C.) at the very moment when he was profaning the vessels of the Lord's house by using them at his impious revels. The successes of this conqueror had been foretold in the ancient writings of a people whom he found in captivity within its walls, and he was glad to co-operate with the divine Being who had thus singled him out as his instrument in restoring that people to their own land and enabling them to raise again the temple and the city on which their hearts still dwelt with such tender recollection.

From a comparison of Ezra i. 1 with Daniel ii. 1, we may infer that after the capture of Babylon, Cyrus set "Darius the Mede" upon the throne, perhaps conjointly with himself, giving him the dignity of the position, while he undertook its toils and responsibilities. Certain it is that in the first year of his own reign he invited any among the Jews who might feel so disposed to go up to Jerusalem and build the house of the Lord God of Israel, and directed all those that remained to assist them liberally with treasure, while he restored to them all the sacred vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had taken from the temple. Joshua and Zerubbabel were the leaders of the noble band of 42,360, comprising within it members of the royal family, priests, Levites, servants of the temple and private persons, which set out from Babylon to recolonize the country of their forefathers.

Seven months were spent in the necessary work of settling themselves in the different cities of the Holy Land to which their families belonged, after which they all collected together at the ruins of Jerusalem. Their first work on arriving there was to set up an altar to the Lord, their next to lay the foundation of the temple. They were soon hindered by the officious zeal of some of their neighbors, who first proposed to assist them in their work and afterward represented it as a source of danger to the Persian empire. Other casualties, incident to all new settlements, delayed their operations, and at length the representations of their enemies led to a stoppage of the works by order of Artaxerxes (the pseudo-Smerdis, who succeeded Cambyses, B. C. 522); but urged by the exhortations of Haggai and Zechariah, who reproached the people with living in "ceiled houses" while the temple lay waste, Zerubbabel and Joshua began the work again in the second year of Darius Hystaspes; and on a report of their proceedings being sent to that prince by Tatnai, the Persian governor of the province, he caused a search to be made; and the original decree of Cyrus for the building of the temple being discovered, he not only ordered it to proceed, but directed Tatnai and his subordinate officers to co-operate heartily in the work, which was completed, and the feast of dedication kept, in the sixth year of his reign, B. C. 515.

An interval of fifty-eight years follows of which we have no account, but on the first day of the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus (457 B. C.), Ezra, a priest of the line of Eleazar, with a small party of seventeen or eighteen hundred men of all classes, left Babylon, furnished with a commission from Artaxerxes to collect money for the temple-service and inquire into the state of the Jews at Jerusalem. His journey occupied four months, and on his arrival he found it necessary to effect an important and very difficult reform among the people who were already settled in the land; for priests, Levites and persons of all classes had broken the Mosaic law by connecting themselves with women of heathen parentage. The matter was solemnly brought before the Lord and the assembled people with prayers, humiliations and confessions of sin. A plan of examination into the several cases was agreed upon, and the evil was put an end to by the voluntary submission of those who had transgressed.

Eleven years afterward Jerusalem was visited by another eminent reformer, Nehemiah, a great Jewish officer of the court of Artaxerxes Longimanus. Morally and externally, the Holy City was at this time in a lamentable condition—its walls unbuilt, its houses in ruins and mixed marriages and other bad practices continued. A report of the state of things determined Nehemiah, with the sanction and credentials of his royal master, who appointed him tirshatha, or governor of the district, to visit Jerusalem. His arrival caused dismay to the principal foreigners, one of whom had a daughter married into the high-priest's family. On the third day after his arrival he made a secret inspection of the walls by night, and soon afterward called all the people together and exhorted them to lay themselves out with one accord for the work of rebuilding them; and they undertook this work with so much system, zeal and perseverance that, in spite of the opposition, both open and secret, of the powerful foreigners, which obliged them to build with arms in their hands and be ready at any moment for a hostile interruption, the whole wall was finished in fifty-two days. Other work was done in the mean time, usury renounced, restitution made, a genealogical enumeration of the people recorded and strict and self-denying economy introduced. Public readings and explanations of the law by Ezra, and an appointed staff of priests and Levites, were set on foot. The Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated for the first time since the days of Joshua, Neh. viii. 17, a solemn fast with confession of sin was held and a covenant of obedience made and signed in the name of the people, of princes, priests and Levites. The numbers who were to live at Jerusalem were appointed, and an unceasing effort made by the great and good Nehemiah to correct, by his personal influence, every practice inconsistent with the character of the people of God.

Nothing further in the history of Jerusalem worthy of special mention occurs until 320 B. C., when Ptolemy Soter made an incursion into Syria and took Jerusalem, his conquest being facilitated by the refusal of the Jews to fight on the Sabbath. They suffered severely afterward, and multitudes of the people were carried captive to Egypt and Northern Africa.

The possession of Jerusalem was secured to the Ptolemies by the defeat of Antigonus at Ipsus, B. C. 301, and remained in their hands for more than 100 years. Under their peaceful rule Jerusalem increased in wealth and prosperity.

But the power soon passed into other hands. Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, the great-grandson of Alexander's general Seleucus Nicator, had already endeavored without success to wrest from Ptolemy Philopator the provinces of Phœnicia, Palestine and Cœle-Syria, which he claimed as belonging to his own kingdom. The attempt was renewed with various results, when Philopator was succeeded by Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old (B. C. 205), but it was not till B. C. 198 that he was finally successful. In that year he gained a decisive victory over Scopas, the Egyptian general. Jerusalem opened her gates to receive him, and the Jews were glad to help him in reducing the garrison which Scopas had the year before set over their city.

As long as Antiochus lived, and in the first year of his son Seleucus Philopator, Jerusalem enjoyed great prosperity under its excellent high-priest Onias III. But Seleucus was induced by a wretched informer named Simon to attempt to gain possession of the treasures of the temple. His own treasurer Heliodorus, who afterward murdered him, was sent to execute this act of spoliation, but was deterred from its performance by a terrible appearance, which is recorded in 2 Macc. iii. The whole story is rendered doubtful by the silence of Josephus. See HIRCANUS.

Seleucus Philopator was succeeded by his brother, the detestable Antiochus Epiphanes, B. C. 175. Onias III., who was then high-priest, had two brothers, Joshua and another also named Onias. Joshua changed his name to Jason, and having purchased the high-priesthood from Antiochus, forced his brother out of office, and did his utmost to introduce into Jerusalem the morals and customs of a Greek city. He established a gymnasium, and induced his young countrymen to practice the Grecian games and to pay court to the king by calling themselves Antiochians. Jason was in his turn ousted from the high-priesthood by the third brother, Onias, who took the name of Menelaus, and robbed the temple to pay to Antiochus the price of his office. Thence ensued party riots and merciless slaughter. Antiochus was at this time in Egypt, of which he had almost effected the conquest, on the plea of reasserting his claim to the possession of Cœle-Syria and Palestine. On his return from Egypt he visited Jerusalem to quell the disturbances and take vengeance on the partisans of Pompey. Massacre and pillage followed. The temple was once more robbed of its treasures, and a great train of captives carried to Antioch. Two years afterward there was a fresh attack upon Jerusalem, fresh slaughter, fresh pillage and burning of the city. A Syrian garrison seized and fortified a height within the city called the Acra. [It is difficult to say whether this height, called Acra, or the hill on which the upper city was built, was the original Mount Sion. The former lay to the north, the latter to the west, of Mount Moriah, a hill of lower elevation, which was occupied by the temple and its precincts, and is sometimes called the "Mountain of the House of the Lord."] The temple was profaned by idolatrous rites, enactments were made against the practice of the Jewish ritual, persecutions and martyrdom followed.

All this led to an insurrection, which was begun at some distance from Jerusalem by an aged man of priestly family named Mattathias, the father of five sons. See MACCABEES, THE. His noble opposition to the tyrant aroused a war of independence, in the first year of which he died. But he left behind him a family of heroes. His son Judas gained signal victories over the Syrians, and thereby obtained for himself and his race the surname of Maccabæus, from the Hebrew word Makkab, a hammer. Having conquered Lysias, a general of Antiochus, at Bethzur (B. C. 165), he repaired to Jerusalem, and found the sacred enclosures of the temple encumbered with ruins, the altar of burnt-offering surmounted by an altar to Jupiter, the sanctuary open and empty and the whole place overgrown with shrubs and herbage.

He cleansed and repaired it, and it was once more dedicated to God (B. C. 165), three years after its desecration. He also fortified the temple and placed in it a Jewish garrison, the Syrian garrison retaining possession of the Acra and annoying the people by frequent sallies. Judæa remained under the Maccabæan rule for more than 100 years, until B. C. 63. They were independent monarchs, with varying prosperity, but actually independent. For a history of Jerusalem under the MACCABEES, see the article on that family.

In B. C. 63, Pompey, after a severe siege, captured Jerusalem, but permitted Hyrcanus (see MACCABEES, THE) to govern as high-priest, without the title of king, which had been assumed by Aristobulus I. and held by his successors hitherto. Hyrcanus governed peacefully for a great many years under the favor of Rome and by the advice of Antipater the Idumæan, and about the year 47 B. C. received the title of ethnarch from Julius Cæsar, together with confirmation in the high-priesthood, for help given to his ally Mithridates. Cæsar also made Antipater procurator of Judæa, and allowed the walls of Jerusalem to be rebuilt. The article HERODIAN FAMILY necessarily embraces a history of Jerusalem during their ascendancy, and it is not needful to repeat it here. See HERODIAN FAMILY.

About B. C. 31 an earthquake destroyed a great part of the city, and a large number (stated variously from 10,000 to 20,000) of its inhabitants perished.

From this time until A. D. 66 there is but little in the history of the city that calls for notice here. All the more important events, such as the life and labors, death, resurrection and ascension of our Lord, the lives and doings of the apostles, etc., are noticed in their appropriate places. It is sufficient to remark here that under the Roman supremacy, with its double system of sub-rulers, the Herods and the procurators, while much was done to beautify the city architecturally, the rights and immunities of the Jews were gradually but steadily subverted, and they were reduced to the lowest condition of a tyrant-ridden people. In the country about Jerusalem brigandage, impostures and assassinations were rife. High-priests and priests quarreled for their share of the tithes, and acts of violence ensued which were referred to Rome. Jerusalem was invested with a banditti (Sicarii), who cloaked their murders and robberies with a pretended zeal for Jewish interests. There were also frequent disorders in the form of partial rebellions, and much loss of life necessarily resulted, without any improvement in the political or social status of the Jews. Indeed, the chains of their slavery became more and more galling, until a violent dispute between Herod Agrippa II. and the priests culminated in a more serious revolt and a partial success of the Jewish forces. This was in A. D. 66. Cestius Gallus, the Roman governor of Syria, came to Agrippa's aid, but was defeated in his efforts to subdue the Jews. He succeeded in forcing the Jews to take refuge within the walls surrounding the temple and the inner city. For six days he assaulted the walls without success, and then, apparently without cause, but, as Josephus hints, through the secret influence of Florus, withdrew his whole force back to Scopus. Thither he was followed by the now exulting rebels, who spoiled his camp, carried off his war engines and killed 5000 of his troops.

The Jews now began an organized resistance to the sovereign states, and the most important posts throughout the country were assigned to their bravest and best citizens. Josephus, son of Gorion, and the high-priest Ananus had the command at Jerusalem, Josephus the historian in Galilee and Eleazar in Ituræa. Cestius Gallus and Florus being both dead, Nero gave the government of Syria to Vespasian, who desired his son Titus to come to him from Egypt with the seventh and tenth legions.

Father and son met at Ptolemais in the winter in the summer of 68, when Vespasian, who had now approached Jerusalem, hearing of the death of Nero, sent Titus for fresh orders from his successor Galba. It was about the same time that the quieter party in Jerusalem, unable to bear the excesses of the zealots led by Eleazar and by John of Giscala, invited Simon, son of Gioras, the leader of a band of marauding Galileans, to come to their assistance. In the middle of the following year Vespasian himself was made emperor, and went to Rome. Titus devoted the remainder of it to active preparations for the siege; and when the city was crowded with the multitudes who came up for the feast of the passover, which was to occur in April, A. D. 70, he drew up his forces and placed them on the heights which lay to the

of A. D. 66-7, and during the following summer and autumn the important places of the country fell one after another into their hands, among the rest Jotapata, with its governor Josephus the historian, who was made prisoner, but treated with respect, and Giscala, whose chief, John, the subsequently famous John of Giscala, escaped to Jerusalem. This unhappy city in the mean time became the most frightful scene of civil strife and violence. It comprised two great parties, those who wished for order and peace and those who, guided by wild fanaticism or rapacity, thirsted only for deeds of violence. These latter were now known by the general name of zealots, and were not less dreaded by the quieter citizens than the Romans themselves, while they were ever ready to split into new factions and fall upon one another like wild beasts. This was the state of things north and east of Jerusalem, three legions on Scopus and one on the Mount of Olives. When the ground between Scopus and the city was cleared of obstruction and made fit for the march of an army, the three legions advanced, and bearing to the west, made their attack on one of the western faces of Agrippa's wall, in order, as Cestius had done three years and a half before, to break into the new suburb. But the besieged were now better prepared for resistance, and what Cestius seems to have accomplished by escalade was not done without the aid of catapult and battering-ram and the erection of mounds surmounted by lofty towers, from which the assailants could cast their arrows at the defenders, who on their side sallied out from the gates, fought from the walls, and made good use of the engines they had taken from the Antonia and the camp of Cestius Gal-

lus. At length, however, they were driven back by the missiles discharged from the Roman towers, a breach was made in the wall on the fifteenth day of the siege, the gates were thrown open, and the whole of the Assyrian camp and Bezetha suburb were in the hands of Titus.

This suburb occupying the ground on the north of the city, Titus had three points of attack before him, the upper city facing him on the west, the temple and its precincts on the east, and the lower city, protected by the second wall, cropping out toward him in the middle. Within this second wall Simon had retired. The same efforts were now repeated by both parties as at the first wall. The Jews sallied out and attacked their invaders with desperate bravery, the Romans drove them back with equal courage. This went on for five days, and at length a breach was made in the second wall. Titus did as little harm as he could, hoping the people would now surrender, but he entered with a thousand picked men. They were met with determined obstinacy by constantly increasing numbers in the narrow streets and lanes of the lower city, and were at length obliged to retreat. But Titus repeated his efforts; an entrance was

The whole strength of the besiegers was now directed against the Antonia and the temple. The Antonia lay before them to the east, a strong and lofty tower, within a square enclosed by strong walls. Behind the Antonia, stretching farther to the east, lay the much larger square of "the mountain of the Lord's house," this too was protected with strong walls lined on the inside by lofty pillared cloisters, the flat roof of which ran nearly on a level with the top of the wall. Within this large square was another enclosure of an oblong shape, also protected by walls of great strength, cloistered like the others on the inside, and containing within them the sacred courts of the Lord's house and the holy edifice itself. The whole of this ground was called the temple, and with it the Antonia was connected by a passage opening upon the cloisters of the great square at its north-west corner. Titus began by raising four fresh mounds to act against the Antonia. These mounds were of great size, and it took twenty-one days to complete them. They seem to have been erected as a support for the engines by which projectiles were thrown into the fortress, while the battering-rams acted against its walls. Some sal-mean time, he strove to win the Jews to submission by sending them proposals of peace, and graciously receiving those who placed themselves in his power, while famine and its usual attendants, death, pestilence and horrible rapacity, added force to his persuasions. But they were met with obstinate refusal and contempt by the heads of the fighting party, while the unhappy sufferers could do nothing. On the 17th Tammuz (June 23), about the time of the first attack upon the temple, the daily sacrifice ceased for want of priests to offer it, and from that day to the 9th Ab (July 14) was the last death-struggle of Jerusalem. Titus hemming in the holy places closer and closer, every inch of the way to the inner courts disputed and again and again recovered, the wall of the great court taken and its cloisters burnt, the inner court invested, its walls battered in vain, its silver-plated gates forced by fire, its cloisters and encircling chambers burnt piece by piece. Onward still went the flames, making their way round the court of the priests, burning down cloister and sacred chamber, while the holy fane itself still reared its "polished corners" in all their glory, resplendent with gold and marble, before the astonished eyes of its besiegers, still sheltered its ministering priests, its priceless treasures and its objects of mysterious sanctity. Titus anxiously desired to preserve it, but a Roman soldier flung a burning brand through a window which opened into its exterior chambers. The fire, once kindled, never ceased to rage till the whole was a ruin, and the roar of its burning was mingled with cries of agony, terror and despair.

On the south side of the great enclosure of the temple were two gates, which led by a bridge across the deep valley of the cheesemongers (Tyropœon) to the upper city. Along this way now rushed the crowd of fighting men, leaving 10,000 of the more helpless, who had sought shelter in the temple, to be butchered by the Roman soldiers, who, when the work of destruction was over, set up their standards before the east gate of the temple, paid them divine honors and saluted Titus as emperor. After this the conqueror still anxious to spare the people and the city, held a parley with the chiefs of the insurrection, the two parties standing at opposite ends of the bridge. Titus required an unconditional surrender, but promised them their lives and kind treatment. This they refused, requiring permission to leave the city with their wives and children. Titus thereupon directed its plunder and destruction. This was not the work of a day, nor was it accomplished without a valorous resistance. But at length the whole city was reduced to ashes, except the three great towers on the western wall, and all its inhabitants put to the sword, except those who were reserved for slavery or to grace the triumph of the conqueror.

After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and the occupation of a military post among its ruins by a Roman garrison, we hear nothing of any consequence connected with the city till A. D. 130. In that year the emperor Hadrian took some first steps with a view to the rebuilding of Jerusalem for his own purposes. Stringent laws had been made for the control of the Jews, and a heavy tribute exacted from them, immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem, and violent outbreaks had occurred among them in various parts of the empire, at Cyrene, in Egypt, in Cyprus, in Mesopotamia; and it was obviously important that Rome should have a powerful centre of dominion in the midst of them, and that a race possessing so much vitality and so turbulent a spirit should be once more effected, and this time he took care to demolish the whole wall, and became master of all that portion of the city which was not surrounded by the first (or innermost) wall—i. e., the temple, with the Antonia and the adjoining structures, and the upper city. The engines on the Mount of Olives had been hurling their huge projectiles on the temple and its precincts since the beginning of the siege, and four great mounds were now erected within the suburb, two facing the temple and two facing the upper city, to act upon these places from the north. But the two mounds opposite the temple had been undermined and sunk by the skill and untiring efforts of John of Giscala, and the engines on the other two had been burnt by the no less pertinacious bravery of Simon and his men. This disheartened the Romans a good deal. But in the mean time famine had begun its horrors, and many daily crept out of the city on the sides where it was not invested to seek for food. Great numbers of these wretched people were caught by the Roman soldiers and cruelly scourged and crucified in the sight of their fellow-citizens. At last Titus determined to surround the city with a wall. This was completed in three days by the efforts of the whole Roman army, and the siege was then recommenced with fresh vigor.

lies were in the mean time made by the besieged, but not with as much vigor as before, nor did they interfere much with the progress of the besiegers; and such was the effect of one day's battering upon the wall, the foundations of which had been already loosened by the mine which had destroyed the first mounds, that it fell in the night. It was then discovered that the besieged had built a second wall within, and the ruins of the first had fallen against it and formed a sort of bank by which it might be scaled. A forlorn hope of twelve men, fired by the exhortations of Titus and the example of their leader, sprang forward, but perished in their attempt to dislodge the enemy. Two nights afterward another party of twelve stole in over the ruins, killed the guards of the Antonia tower and let in the Romans. Then followed a scene of terrible struggling and bloodshed, while Roman and Jew fought together in a space too narrow for the action of great numbers, both parties urged forward from behind and the places of the slain perpetually filled up by fresh men, the Romans striving to press through the passage from the Antonia into the temple, the Jews thrusting them back. That day's fight accomplished nothing, and Titus resolved to clear a passage through the Antonia precincts for the main body of his troops. In the prevented from seizing it themselves. He was interrupted in this design by a more serious outbreak than any previous one, which led to another long Jewish war, and which cost Rome so much blood that the victory by which it was finally suppressed was not considered a subject for congratulation. The leader of the insurrection was Ben Coziba, a bandit chief, who proclaimed himself to be the Messiah, and changed his name to Barchochab or Barchocheba (son of a star), in allusion to the star foretold by Balaam. He took possession of Jerusalem, stamped money there with his own insignia, and was so bold and specious an impostor that Rabbi Akibah, a president of the Sanhedrim, was induced to join him and become his armor-bearer. [The Sanhedrim, which originally held its sittings in a chamber of the temple, continued to exist, and was treated with some favor by the Romans, after the destruction of Jerusalem. It sat first at Japhne, afterward at Tiberias. It was a school of education rather than a centre of government. But its influence was considerable, and it became wealthy by the exaction of a small tax, which was readily paid by the Jews.] Julius Severus was summoned from Britain in this emergency, and two years were spent in various attempts to suppress the insurrection before Jerusalem was taken, after an obstinate defence, and Barchocheba slain. The insurgents then betook themselves to Bether (otherwise written Bitter and Beth Tar), a strong place near Jerusalem, which was also taken with terrible slaughter after great sufferings from famine and disease, A. D. 135. R. Akibah was made prisoner, and after a close confinement of two years cruelly put to death.

Hadrian's first work after this victory was the utter demolition of all remains of the old Jerusalem. His next was to build a new city with a new name, and occupying a site rather more to the north than the former one, so as to exclude the suburb of Ophel, to the south of the temple, and a portion of what had been the upper city. To this new city he gave the name of Ælia Capitolina, from his own name, Publius Ælius Hadrianus, and that of Jupiter Capitolinus. All persons of Jewish descent were excluded from it by peremptory decree. They were not even to approach it within a distance of three miles; and to extinguish all affectionate remembrance of the place, everything was done to give it the character of a heathen city. A temple of Jupiter Capitolinus and statues of the emperor occupied the site of the Lord's house; a temple of Astarte, the ancient Ashtoreth or Syrian Venus, was built on the place afterward recognized as the holy sepulchre. The worship of Serapis was introduced from Egypt, and the military ensigns of Rome were sculptured over the gates.

But though Jews were so rigorously excluded from Rome, Christians of Gentile descent were allowed to reside there; and consequently we find that the return of the Christian Church of Jerusalem from Pella, where, according to our Lord's forewarning, it had taken refuge before the siege by Titus, and the appointment of the first Gentile bishop, were contemporaneous with the foundation of the new Roman colony of Ælia Capitolina. From St. James, the first bishop, to Jude II., who died A. D. 136, there had been a series of fifteen bishops of Jewish descent; and from Marcus, who succeeded Simeon, to Macarius, who presided over the church of Jerusalem under Constantine, there was a series of twenty-three bishops of Gentile descent, but beyond a bare list of their names little is known of the church or of the city of Jerusalem during the whole of this latter period.

The adoption of Christianity as the religion of the empire, which dates from the edict of Milan, A. D. 313, the year in which Macarius began his episcopate, produced a great change in the circumstances of Jerusalem. Pilgrimages had already been made to the holy places in the previous centuries. In the year 326 they were visited by the empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, then in her eightieth year. At this visit the true cross is said to have been discovered under the temple dedicated to Astarte during the progress of its demolition. It is certain that noble Christian churches now took the place of the heathen temples by which the holy city had previously been defiled, and A. D. 335 a council was held at Jerusalem for their dedication. It was at this council that Arius, abetted by Eusebius of Nicomedia, had a temporary triumph over Athanasius. Twenty-seven years later an attempt was made by the emperor Julian the Apostate to falsify the predictions of our Lord by rebuilding the temple and re-establishing the Mosaic ritual. The plan was adopted with enthusiasm by the Jews, who thought no sacrifice too costly to promote the work. It was, however, interrupted, tradition says, by whirlwind, earthquake and fire, which destroyed the workmen and consumed their tools. After the death of Julian the Jews were again rigorously excluded from Jerusalem, except on the anniversary of its capture, when they were allowed to enter the city and weep over it. Their appointed wailing-place remains, and their practice of wailing there continues to the present day.

During the two following centuries little is known of Jerusalem beyond the part taken by its bishops in councils which determined various ecclesiastical and theological questions. At the council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451, Jerusalem was made an independent patriarchate, and a synod held at Jerusalem A. D. 536 affirmed the twofold nature of our Lord. In A. D. 529, Justinian built a church in honor of the Virgin Mary on the site of the ancient temple, founded several convents in or near Jerusalem and Jericho, and at least one hospital for pilgrims. But the peace of Jerusalem was to be interrupted by a fresh storm of invasion. The Persian dynasty, which had originated in Ardechyr, the son of Sasan, A. D. 226, had long struggled, first with the Roman and afterward with the Greek empire, for the dominion of the East, and now its reigning monarch, Chosroes II., conducts a victorious army, swelled by 24,000 Jews eager to emerge from their state of subjection and to be avenged on their oppressors, from Syria to Palestine. The combined forces stormed Jerusalem A. D. 614. The churches were sacked and plundered, the Christian inhabitants put to the sword without mercy and the supposed true cross carried away. But as Chosroes advanced toward Constantinople he was met by the emperor Heraclius, who defeated him, and after further triumphs came to Jerusalem as a pilgrim, bearing the true cross on his shoulders, rebuilt the churches which had been destroyed, and re-enacted Hadrian's law forbidding the Jews to come within three miles of the city.

But a new power, and one more formidable than that of Persia, was now springing up—the religion and rule of Mohammed. He died A. D. 632, and then the work of spreading his system through the world was taken up with ardor by his followers, whose successive leaders received the title of khalif or vicegerent of the prophet. Omar, the second of the khalifs, a man of singular austerity, enthusiasm and elevation of character, having conquered Arabia, Syria and Egypt, sent his forces against Jerusalem. The valor with which they were met won the admiration of the besiegers, but the inhabitants were at length obliged to yield, and Omar himself, at the request of the patriarch Sophronius, proceeded there on a red camel, which also carried his simple provisions, a bag of corn, a bag of dates, a wooden dish and a bottle of water, to ratify the terms of capitulation, which secured to the Christians their liberty to worship in the churches they already possessed. This done, he entered the city, conversed freely with the patriarch on its antiquities and knelt for prayer on the steps of the church built by Constantine. The mosque of Omar is an existing record of his conquest, and of his desire to raise a temple to the honor of God in a place regarded so sacred both by Jews and Christians.

After the conquest of Jerusalem by Omar it passed to the different Arab powers which successively had dominion in the East, and was from time to time snatched out of their hands by the Turks, the general name by which all the Tartar tribes called themselves. Finally, in the year 1076 it was taken from the Fatimite Arabs, who then came hereditary, were the ancestors of the house of Brandenburg and the kings of Prussia. The capture of the city by Saladin produced the third crusade, but it was never retaken by the Christians, and the remaining kings of the series, ending in Jean de Brienne, were only titular, and resided at most of the knights of the two great orders, by the Kharismians, a Tartar horde driven out of their country by more powerful tribes. The Kharismians were themselves dispossessed of Jerusalem and driven back to the Caspian Sea by the Mohammedans of Syria, A. D. 1247.

The Ottoman sultan Selim I. took possession of Jerusalem with the rest of Syria and Egypt in 1517, and his successor, Soliman the Magnificent, built its present walls in 1542. In 1832 Jerusalem became subject to Mohammed Ali, the pasha of Egypt, receiving him without resistance within its gates. In 1841 he was deprived of all his Syrian possessions by European interference, and Jerusalem was again subjected to the government of the Ottoman Porte, and in the same year a bishopric of the Anglican Church was established there by the combined movement of England and Prussia.

In 1850 a dispute about the guardianship of the holy places between the monks of the Greek and Latin Churches, in which Nicholas, emperor of Russia, sided with the Greeks, and Louis Napoleon, emperor of the French, with the Latins, led to a decision of the question by the Porte which was unsatisfactory to Russia, and which resulted in a war of considerable magnitude between that country, on the one side, and the allied forces of England and France on the other.

possessed it, by Acis, an officer of the sultan Malek Shah, of the race of the Seljouk Turks. Previously to this it had been visited by many pilgrims, and had once been the scene of an interchange of courteous messages between Haroun-el-Raschid, the great Eastern ruler, and Charlemagne, the emperor of the West. But its Seljouk masters, a barbarous and cruel race, heaped wrongs and insults upon the Christians, and these wrongs and insults awakened throughout Christendom that burning desire to possess the holy city which, during a period of 200 years, gave rise to seven crusades, conducted by the monarchs, the nobles and the people of Europe, to effect or maintain its conquest. Jerusalem was taken by the first Crusaders, A. D. 1099, after a fearful slaughter of its defenders, now again the Fatimites of Egypt, who had expelled the Seljouks eleven months before.

Godfrey de Bouillon was elected to be its king, notwithstanding the opposition of the bishops, who said, Non debere ibi eligi Regem, ubi Deus passus et coronatus est; the feudal system was adopted, and a code of laws called the Assize of Jerusalem drawn up for the government of its people. Godfrey was the first of a dynasty of thirteen Latin kings, nine of whom, ending in Guy de Lusignan, husband of Sybilla, great-granddaughter of Baldwin II., reigned successively in Jerusalem, till it was taken by Saladin, October 2, 1187.

The possession of Jerusalem during this period by a Christian power gave birth to the two great orders of knighthood, that of the temple and that of St. John of Jerusalem; the former of which was distributed throughout Europe, and the latter, known also under the name of Knights Hospitalers, first fixed themselves at Rhodes, and afterward dwindled down into the little society of the Knights of Malta. The Teutonic order sprang up at Acre in 1191, and its grand-masters, who became hereditary, were the ancestors of the house of Brandenburg and the kings of Prussia. The capture of the city by Saladin produced the third crusade, but it was never retaken by the Christians, and the remaining kings of the series, ending in Jean de Brienne, were only titular, and resided at

As the ground plan of the topography of ancient Jerusalem we have the following description by Josephus: "It was built upon two hills, one part once more, through neglect, into the hands of the Mohammedans. In 1241 it was again given up to the Christians by the sultan of Damascus, to induce them to help him against Egypt, but three years afterward it was taken, after a battle of two days' duration and the loss of the grand-masters and facing the other, separated by an intervening valley, at which, one upon another—i. e., crowded together—the houses ended. Of these hills, that on which the upper city stood was much the higher and straighter in its length. Accordingly, on account of its strength, it was called the fortress of ng David, the father of Solomon, by whom the temple was originally built, but by us it is called the upper market-place. The other hill, called Acra, which sustains the lower city, was curved on each side. Over against this was a third hill, naturally lower than Acra, and formerly separated from it by another broad ravine. Afterward, however, when the Asmonæans were in power, desiring to connect the city with the temple, they filled in this ravine; and cutting down the summit of Acra, they reduced its elevation so that the temple might appear above it. The valley called Tyropœon, which we have said separated the hill of the upper city from that of the lower, extends as far as Siloam, for so we call a fountain whose waters are both sweet and abundant. From without—i. e., anterior to the city—the two hills of the city were compassed by deep ravines; and because of the precipices on both sides, there was nowhere any approach."

The main features of this description are confirmed by the terse and graphic picture which Tacitus gives of the siege of the city: "Two hills of immense height were enclosed by walls projecting outward or retiring inward. The extremities of the rock were abrupt. . . . The temple was like a citadel, with walls of its own. . . . Thus Jerusalem, by nature difficult of approach, was fortified by works which would have been a sufficient defence had the city stood upon a plain."

Leaving out of view all details as to the interior of the modern city, and all questions of the sacred places, and regarding only the general face of the country, it seems not difficult to project upon paper a ground-plan of Jerusalem as Josephus describes it.

We first lay down upon the map a lofty craggy hill, or rather a bold promontory, with steep declivities upon three sides. Facing this at some distance, with a valley intervening, we lay down a second hill, somewhat lower than the first, but like the first steep and craggy upon its outer side. Opposite to this must now be placed a third hill—the site of Solomon's temple. But at what point? In designating the three hills the Jewish historian gives no hint of their relations to the points of the compass, but elsewhere, in describing the gates of the temple, he gives a clue to the relative position of the first and third hills: "In the western parts of the enclosure stood four gates, one leading over to the royal palace, the valley between being intercepted to form a passage, two leading to the suburb, and the remaining one into the other city being distinguished by many steps down into the valley, and from this up again upon the ascent, the city lay over against the temple in the manner of a theatre, being encompassed by a deep valley on all its southern quarter." This statement places the third or Temple hill upon the east, and the first or Palace hill upon the west, of a dividing valley, and bounds the Palace hill, or Zion, by another "deep valley" upon the south. In this first rough draft of the topography of Jerusalem we therefore have two hills—Zion and Moriah, or the upper city and the Temple hill—proximately determined. The southernmost and westward knob of the double promontory marking the site of Jerusalem is Mount Zion, the sharper, narrower eastward ridge is Moriah, or the Temple hill with the pointed elongation of Ophel. The valley of Hinnom bounds Zion on the west, and passing around its southern extremity, unites with the valley of Jeshoshaphat, which bounds Moriah upon the east. These two valleys define the promontory upon which the city was built. Between Zion and Moriah is the valley known anciently as the Tyropœon, extending northward from the Pool of Siloam. Over this valley passed the viaduct leading from the temple gate to the royal palace. Above the point where it separates Zion from Moriah, the Tyropœon also separated Zion from Acra. The Tyropœon began at the Damascus gate; Acra lay upon its eastern side, facing Zion, and consequently it lay north of the Temple hill, or the present Haram, from which it was separated by a valley the traces of which are now hardly discernible. This fulfills the condition of Josephus.

Besides the above view, which seems to be the correct one, the following theories have their respective supporters, viz., that—

1. Acra is the ridge between the Jaffa and Damascus gates, the principal Christian quarter of the modern city. The Tyropœon then began at the Jaffa gate.

2. Acra is identified with the hill of the present site of the temple. Thus the temple stood within the lower city.

The fortress of Antonia bounded the north-west angle of the temple area. Adjacent to this was the hill Bezetha, which, in its highest elevation, cut off the view of the temple from that quarter. Antonia was within the circuit of the second wall, which, beginning at the gate Gennath in the first wall, enclosed Acra or the lower city; and the wall which was overflowed by a population crowding outward upon Bezetha was the northern wall of Acra. Moreover, the Acra—i. e., the tower of the Acra hill—commanded the temple in the time of the Asmonæans, as Antonia commanded it in the time of Herod, 1 Macc. xiii. 52. Then we may regard the fortress Baxis, afterward Antonia, as identical with the Acra of Antiochus Epiphanes, the hill Acra as the ridge north of the temple area sloping toward the Damascus valley, then the Tyropœon, and Bezetha, the ridge rising north-

THE MODERN CITY FROM OLIVET.

Mohammedan quarter, but Zion is not extended northward, so as to stand "face to face" with it, as the statement of Josephus would require.

3. Acra was that portion of the Haram esh-Sherif which was not occupied by the temple. This reduces Acra to the insignificant area of fifteen or twenty acres.

4. Acra was the ridge south of the temple area and east of Zion commonly known as Ophel. But there never was room for a city on that rocky declivity; it could not have been separated from the temple by a valley; and it is naturally lower than the site of the temple, whereas Acra was originally higher.

5. Acra was the lower eastern portion of the hill commonly known as Zion—i. e., Acra answers to the Jewish quarter, and Zion to the Armenian quarter, of the modern city. But this theory greatly contracts the area of the city, and interposes Acra between Zion and the temple, which Josephus states were directly connected by a viaduct.

6. Acra is the entire ridge of the Haram, from Stephen's gate to Siloam, including, of course, the ward from this, and skirted by the valley of Jeshoshaphat.

2. The Walls.—Next in importance to the relative location of the hills of Jerusalem is the course of the several walls mentioned by Josephus. His general description of these walls is to the following purport. The single wall which enclosed that part of the city skirted by precipitous valleys began on the north at the tower of Hippicus. On the west it extended (southward) through a place called Bethso to the gate of the Essenes; thence it kept along on the south to a point over against Siloam; and thence, bending to the east, it was carried along by Solomon's Pool and Ophel (Ophel), till it joined the eastern portico of the temple. On the north this wall began at the tower of Hippicus, and extending (along the northern brow of Zion) to the Xystus, terminated at the western portico of the temple. The second wall began at the gate of Gennath (apparently near Hippicus), and encircling only the northern part of the city, extended to the castle of Antonia, at the north-west corner of the area of the temple. The third wall was built by Agrippa at a later period; it also had its beginning at the tower of Hippicus, ran northward as far as the tower of Psephinos, and thence, sweeping round toward the north-east by east, it turned afterward toward the south, and was joined to the ancient wall at or in the valley of the Kidron. This wall enclosed the hill Bezetha. The Xystus here spoken of was an open area upon the eastern brow of Zion, extending from the first wall, which there crossed the Tyropæon, southward to the bridge which connected the temple with the upper city. In this area, where perhaps there was a colonnade, the people were accustomed to gather upon public occasions. The position of the bridge, so often referred to by Josephus in connection with the Xystus, has been well identified with the immense fragment of an ancient arch discovered by Dr. Robinson in the western wall of the Haram enclosure, near the south-west corner. This arch measures fifty-one feet along the wall, and three courses of its stones remain. Some of the stones are of great size.

The valley at this point is about 116 yards in

No trace of it can now be perceived, but by digging through the rubbish the foundations might perhaps be discovered.

The account given by Josephus of the second wall is very short and unsatisfactory. This is the more to be regretted, as on the course taken by the eastern part of that wall rests the question, whether that which is now shown as the site of Calvary and the Holy Sepulchre was anciently beyond the wall or not. The precise course of this wall might perhaps be determined by excavations, especially along one of the two streets which intersect the Via Dolorosa. It is likely that the foundations of the old wall still exist; and if it lay at a point within the present wall, those foundations must pass under this street, and an excavation of no great extent would bring them to light, and show whether the alleged site of Calvary lay within or without the second wall. See HOLY SEPULCHRE.

3. Later Walls.—Although the two walls above described were the only walls that existed in the time of our Saviour, we are not to infer that the width. The discovery of this bridge is of great importance in determining the position of the Xystus and the line of the western wall of the temple. Dr. Robinson was the first explorer who identified this fragment of an arch with the bridge that spanned the Tyropæon from the temple to the upper city.

The first or most ancient wall described above appears to have enclosed the whole of Mount Zion toward the south. Indeed, it must have formed the exterior and sole wall on that side, overlooking the deep valleys below Mount Zion, and the northern part evidently passed from the tower of Hippicus on the west side along the northern brow of Zion, and across the valley to the western side of the temple area. It probably nearly coincided with the ancient wall which existed before the time of David, and which enabled the Jebusites to maintain themselves in possession of the upper city long after the lower city had been in the hands of the Israelites. Much of Mount Zion upon the south lies without the walls of the modern city. Some traces of this old wall were visible in the time of Benjamin of Tudela, who says that the stones of the foundation were then taken away for building.

habitable city was confined within their limits. On the contrary, it was because the city had extended northward far beyond the second wall, that a third was built to cover the defenceless suburb; and there is no reason to doubt that this unprotected suburb, called Bezetha, existed in the time of Christ. This wall has already been described as having also begun at the tower of Hippicus; it ran northward as far as to the tower Psephinos, then passed down opposite the sepulchre of Helena (queen of Adiabene), and being carried along through the royal sepulchres, turned at the corner tower by the Fullers' monument, and ended by making a junction with the ancient wall at the valley of the Kidron. It was begun ten or twelve years after our Lord's crucifixion by the elder Herod Agrippa, who desisted from completing it for fear of offending the emperor Claudius. But the design was afterward taken up and completed by the Jews themselves, although on a scale of less strength and magnificence. Some traces of this wall have been found to the north of the modern city wall.

Robinson thinks that the wall of the new city, the Ælia of Adrian, nearly coincided with that of the present Jerusalem; and the portion of Mount Zion which now lies outside would seem then to have been excluded, for Eusebius and Cyril the fourth century, speak of the denunciation of prophet being fulfilled, and describes Zion as ploughed field," Mic. iii. 2.

We know from Josephus that the circumference of the ancient city was thirty-three stades equivalent to nearly four English miles. The circumference of the present walls does not exceed two and a half geographical miles, but the extent of Mount Zion, now without the walls, of the tract on the north formerly enclosed, or perhaps so, by the third wall, sufficiently account for the difference.

The present walls have a solid and formidable appearance, especially when cursorily observed from without, and they are strengthened, rather ornamented, with towers and battlements after the Saracenic style. They are built of limestone, the stones being not commonly more than a foot or fifteen inches square. The height varies with the various elevations of the ground. The lower parts are probably about twenty-five feet high, while in more exposed localities, where ravines contribute less to the security of the city, they have an elevation of sixty or seventy feet.

4. The Ancient Gates.—Much uncertainty exists respecting the ancient gates of Jerusalem. It has been objected that the gates named in the Scriptures are more in number than a town of the size of Jerusalem could require, especially as they occur within the extent embraced by the first and second walls, the third not then existing. It has therefore, been suggested as more than probable that some of these gates were within the city, the walls which separated the town from the temple and the upper town from the lower, in which gates certainly existed. On the other hand, considering the circumstances under which the wall was rebuilt in the time of Nehemiah, it is difficult to suppose that more than the outer wall was constructed, and certainly it was in the wall then built that the ten or twelve gates mentioned in Nehemiah occur. But these may be somewhat reduced by supposing that two or more of the names mentioned were applied to the same gate. If this view of the matter be taken, no better distribution of these gates can be given than that suggested by Raumer.

A. On the north side.

1. The Old Gate, probably at the north-east corner, Neh. iii. 6; xii. 39.

2. The Gate of Ephraim or Benjamin, Jer. xxxvii. 7; xxxvii. 13; Neh. xii. 9; 2 Chr. xxv. 23. The gate derived its names from its leading to the territory of Ephraim and Benjamin.

3. The Corner-gate, three hundred cubits from the former, and at the north-west corner, 2 Chr. xxv. 9; 2 Ki. xiv. 13; Zech. xiv. 10. Probably the Gate of the Furnaces is the same, Neh. iii. 12; xii. 38.

B. On the west side.

4. The Valley-gate, over against the Dragon Fountain of Gihon, Neh. ii. 13; iii. 13; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 9. It was probably about the north-west corner of Zion, where there appears to have been always a gate. Dr. Robinson supposes it to be the same with the Gennath of Josephus.

C. On the south side.

5. The Dung-gate, perhaps the same as Josephus' Gate of the Essenes, Neh. ii. 13; xii. 31. It was 1000 cubits from the valley-gate, Neh. iii. 14, and the dragon-well was between them, Neh. i. 13. This gate is probably also identical with the gate between two walls," 2 Ki. xxv. 4; Jer. xix. 4; Lam. ii. 7.

6. The Gate of the Fountain, to the south-east, eh. ii. 14; iii. 15; the gate of the fountain near the king's pool, Neh. ii. 14; the gate of the fountain near "the pool of Siloah by the king's garden," Neh. iii. 15. The same gate is probably denoted in all these instances, and the pools seem to have been also the same. It is also possible that this fountain-gate was the same otherwise distinguished as the brick-gate (or potter's gate), leading to the valley of Hinnom, Jer. xix. 2, where the authorized Version has "east-gate."

d. On the east side.

7. The Water-gate, Neh. iii. 26.

8. The Prison-gate, otherwise the Horse-gate, near the temple, Neh. iii. 28; xii. 39, 40.

9. The Sheep-gate, probably near the sheep-pool, eh. iii. 1-32; xii. 29.

10. The Fish-gate was quite at the north-east, eh. iii. 3; xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 14.

It will be observed that in two of the cases the distances of the gates from each other are mentioned. Thus the corner-gate (3) was only 300 cubits from the gate of Ephraim (2), and the Dung-gate (5) was 1000 cubits from the valley-gate (4). If the circumference of the wall of Jerusalem before the third wall was added be assumed to have been two miles and a half, or equal to the present wall, then this extent would have allowed ten gates at the highest named distance of 1000 cubits apart, and more than thrice that number at the lowest named distance of 300 cubits.

In the Middle Ages there appear to have been two gates on each side of the city, making eight in all; and this number, being only two short of those assigned in the above estimate to the ancient Jerusalem, seems to vindicate that estimate from the objections which have been urged against it.

On the west side were two gates, of which the principal was the Porta David, Gate of David, often mentioned by the writers on the Crusades. It was called by the Arabs Bab el-Mihrab, and corresponds to the present Jaffa gate, or Bab el-Khail. The other was the gate of the Fuller's Field (Porta Villæ Fullonis), so called from Isa. vii. 3. This seems to be the same which others call Porta Judiciaria, and which is described as being in the wall over against the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, leading to Silo (Neby Samwii) and Gibeon. This seems to be that which the Arabian writers call Serb. There is no trace of it in the present wall.

On the north there were also two gates; and all the Middle Age writers speak of the principal of them as the gate of St. Stephen, from the notion that the death of the protomartyr took place near it. This was also called the gate of Ephraim, in reference to its probable ancient name. Arabic writers called it Bab 'Amud el-Ghurab, of which the present name, Bab el-'Amud, is only a contraction. The present gate of St. Stephen is on the east of the city, and the scene of the martyrdom is now placed near it, but there is no account of the change. Farther east was the gate of Benjamin (Porta Benjaminis), corresponding apparently to what is now called the gate of Herod.

On the east there seem to have been at least two gates. The northernmost is described by Adamnanus as a small portal leading down to the valley of Jehoshaphat. It was called the gate of Jehoshaphat, from the valley to which it led. It seems to be represented by the present gate of St. Stephen. The Arabian writers call it Bab el-Usbat, Gate of the Tribes, being another form of the modern Arabic name Bab es-Subat. The present gate of St. Stephen has four lions sculptured over it on the outside, which, as well as the architecture, show that it existed before the present walls. The other gate is the famous Golden Gate (Porta aurea), in the eastern wall of the temple area. It is now called by the Arabs Bab ed-Dahuriyeh, but formerly Bab er-Rahmeh, "Gate of Mercy." The name Golden Gate appears to have come from a supposed connection with one of the ancient gates of the temple, which are said to have been covered with gold, but this name cannot be traced back beyond the historians of the Crusades. This gate is, from its architecture, obviously of Roman origin, and is conjectured by some to have belonged to the enclosure of the temple of Jupiter which was built by Adrian upon Mount Moriah; but Mr. Fergusson ascribes it to Constantine. The exterior is now walled up; but being double, the interior forms within the area a recess, which is used for prayer by the Moslem worshiper. Different reasons are given for the closing of this gate. It was probably because it was found inconvenient that a gate to the mosque should be open in the exterior wall. Although not walled up, it was kept closed even when the Crusaders were in possession of the city, and only opened once a year, on Palm Sunday, in celebration of our Lord's supposed triumphal entry through it to the temple.

On the south side were also two gates. The easternmost is now called by the Franks the Dung-gate, and by the natives Bab el-Mugharibeh. The earliest mention of this gate is by Brocard, about A. D. 1283, who regards it as the ancient Water-gate. Farther west, between the eastern brow of Zion and the gate of David, the Crusaders found a gate which they call the Gate of Zion, corresponding to one which now bears the same name.

It thus appears that before the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem by the Turks in the sixteenth century the principal gates of the city were much the same as at the present day. But of the seven gates mentioned as still existing, three, the Dung Gate, the Golden Gate and Herod's Gate, are closed. Thus there are only four gates now in use, one on each side of the town, all of which have been enumerated. St. Stephen's, on the east, leads to the Mount of Olives, Bethany and Jericho. From the nature of the ground, taken in connection with the situation of the temple, a little south, there must always have been a great thoroughfare here. Zion Gate, on the south side of the city, connects the populous quarter around the Armenian convent with that part of Mount Zion which is outside the walls, and which is much resorted to as being the great field of Christian burial, as well as for its traditional sanctity as the site of David's tomb, the house of Caiaphas, house of Mary, etc. The Jaffa Gate, on the west, is the termination of the important routes from Jaffa, Bethlehem and Hebron. The formation of the ground suggests this as one of the great thoroughfares of the ancient city, which could here be approached from the quarters just indicated much more conveniently than at any other point. The Damascus Gate, on the north, is planted in a vale, which in every age of Jerusalem must have been a great public way, and the easiest approach from Samaria and Galilee.

5. Subterranean Quarries.—Dr. Barclay was so fortunate as to discover near the Damascus gate an entrance to a large excavation under Bezetha, which was probably the quarry from which much of the stone was taken for building the temple. The principal cave is upward of 3000 feet in circumference, its roof about thirty feet high, supported by rude pillars of rock. There are numerous lateral galleries leading to halls of various sizes, in some of which are traces of artificial excavation. Dr. W. M. Thomson, who also visited the quarry, gives the following graphic description of it:

"The excavations under the ridge which extends from the north-west corner of the temple area to the north wall of the city are most extraordinary. I spent a large part of this forenoon examining them with a company of friends from the city. Passing out at the Damascus gate, we ascended the hill of rubbish east of it, and just under the high precipice over which the wall is carried, we crept, or rather bucked, through a narrow opening; and letting ourselves down some five feet on the inside, we stood within the cavern. Lighting our candles, we began to explore. For some distance the descent southward was rapid, down a vast bed of soft earth. Pausing to take breath and look about, I was surprised at the immense dimensions of the room. The roof of rock is about thirty feet high, even above these huge heaps of rubbish, and is sustained by large, shapeless columns of the original rock, left for that purpose by the quarriers, I suppose. On we went, down, down, from one depth to a lower, wandering now this, now that way, and ever in danger of getting lost, or of falling over some of the many precipices into the yawning darkness beneath. In some places we climbed with difficulty over large masses of rock, which appear to have been shaken down from the roof, and suggest to the nervous the possibility of being ground to powder by similar masses which hang overhead. In other parts our progress was arrested by pyramids of rubbish which had fallen from above through apertures in the vault, either natural or artificial. We found water trickling down in several places, and in one there was a small natural pool full to the brim. This trickling water has covered many parts with crystalline incrustations, pure and white; in others, stalactites hang from the roof and stalagmites have grown up from the while the besiegers are frequently described as suffering greatly from want of water, and as being obliged to fetch it from a great distance. The agonies of thirst sustained by the first Crusaders in their siege of Jerusalem will be remembered by most readers from the vivid picture drawn by Tasso, if not from the account furnished by William of Tyre. Yet when the town was taken, plenty of water was found within it. This singular circumstance is only in part explained by reference to the system of preserving water in cisterns, as at this day in Jerusalem. Every house is furnished with cisterns and tanks into which the rain-water is conducted. Some of the reservoirs are very capacious.

Besides these, there were several aqueducts for conveying water from reservoirs outside the city. The principal of these was that leading from the enormous pools of Solomon near Bethlehem. But in time of war these external supplies of water could be cut off by the besiegers. At the siege of Titus the well of Siloam may have been in possession of the Jews—i. e., within the walls; but at the siege by the Crusaders it was certainly held by the besieging Franks; and yet the latter perished from thirst, while the besieged had “ingentas copias aquæ.” There is good ground to conclude that from very ancient times there has been under the temple an unfailing source of water, derived by secret and subterranean channels from springs to the west of the town, and communicating by other subterranean passages with the pool of Siloam and the fountain of the Virgin in the east of the town, whether they were within or without the walls of the town.

Barclay is of opinion that there was a natural but small fountain under the temple, but he thinks the early travelers and geographers who speak of this were misled by the sound of water falling into a subterranean reservoir from the aqueduct of Ethaia, and that the overflow of this reservoir produced the stream that Omar found flowing from the temple area when he took the city. The existence of a perennial source of water below the temple has always been admitted. Tacitus knew of it, and Aristeas, in describing the ancient temple, informs us that the supply of water was unfailing, inasmuch as there was an abundant natural fountain flowing in the interior and reservoirs of admirable construction under ground, extending five stadia round the temple, with pipes and conduits, unknown to all except those to whom the service was entrusted, by which the water was brought to various parts of the temple and again conducted off. The Moslems also have constantly affirmed the existence of this fountain or cistern, but a reserve has always been kept up as to the means by which it is supplied. This reserve seems to have been maintained by the successive occupants of Jerusalem as a point of civic honor; and this fact alone intimates that there was danger to the town in its becoming known, and points to the fact that the supply came from without the city by secret channels which it was of importance not to disclose. Yet we are plainly told in the Bible that Hezekiah stopped the upper watercourse of Gihon, and brought it down to the west side of the city of David, 1 Ki. i. 33, 38. From 2 Chr. xxxii. 30 it seems that all the neighboring fountains were thus stopped or covered, and the brook which then had formed diverted by subterranean channels into the town, for the express purpose of preventing the besiegers from finding the “much water” which previously existed outside the walls; compare Ecclus. xlviii. 17. Perhaps, likewise, the prophet Ezekiel, xlvii. 1–12, alludes to this secret fountain under the temple when he speaks of waters issuing from the threshold of the temple toward the east and flowing down toward the desert, as an abundant and beautiful stream. This figure may be drawn from the waters of the inner source under the temple being at the time of the overflow discharged by the outlets at Siloam into the Kidron, which takes the eastward course thus described.

There are certainly wells, or rather shafts, in a neighborhood near the temple area, which are alleged to derive their waters through a passage of masonry four or five feet high, from a chamber or reservoir cut into the solid rock under the grand mosque, in which the water is said to rise from the rock into a basin at the bottom. The existence of this reservoir and source of water is affirmed by all Moslems, and coincides with the preceding intimations, but must be left for future explorers to clear up all the obscurities in which the matter is involved.

Dr. Barclay, who has given much attention to the water sources of Jerusalem, both ancient and modern, and who made several fruitless attempts to explore this subterranean stream, leaves the question of its origin in uncertainty. Whether there be indeed any natural spring of water descended within the temple enclosure, and the way of which runs off at Siloam, cannot perhaps at present be certainly determined; it is a question which, with many others of the same kind, must await the time when the Holy City comes under the sway of some civilized government.

7. The Modern City.—Upon the whole, the best verbal description of Jerusalem is that from the pen of Dr. Olin. The summit of the Mount of Olives is about half a mile east from the city, which it completely overlooks, every considerable edifice and almost every house being visible. The city, seen from this point, appears to be a regular inclined plain, sloping gently and uniformly from west to east or toward the observer, and indented by a slight depression or shallow vale running nearly through the centre in the same direction. The south-east corner of the quadrangle—for that may be assumed as the figure formed by the rock—that which is nearer to the observer, is occupied by the mosque and its extensive and beautiful grounds. This is Mount Moriah, the site of Solomon's temple, and the ground embraced in the sacred enclosure occupies about an eighth of the whole modern city. It is covered with green sward and planted sparingly with olive, cypress and other trees, and it is certainly the most lovely feature of the town, whether we have reference to the splendid structures or the beautiful lawn spread out around them.

The south-west quarter, embracing that part of Mount Zion which is within the modern town, is to a great extent occupied by the Armenian convent, an enormous edifice which is the only conspicuous object in this neighborhood. The north-west is largely occupied by the Latin convent, another very extensive establishment. About midway between these two convents is the castle or citadel, close to the Bethlehem gate, already mentioned. The north-east quarter of Jerusalem is but partially built up, and it has more the aspect of a rambling agricultural village than that of a crowded city.

floor. The entire rock is remarkably white, and though not very hard, will take a polish quite sufficient for architectural beauty.

“The general direction of these excavations is south-east, and about parallel with the valley that descends from the Damascus gate. I suspect that they extend down to the temple area, and also that it was into these caverns that many of the Jews retired when Titus took the temple, as we read in Josephus. The whole city might be stowed away in them; and it is my opinion that a great part of the very white stone of the temple must have been taken from these subterranean quarries.”

6. Water Resources of Jerusalem.—In his account of the siege of Jerusalem by Pompey, Strabo says that the town was well provided with water within the walls, but that there was none in the environs. Probably the Roman troops then suffered from want of water, as did other armies which laid siege to Jerusalem. In the narratives of such sieges we almost never read of the besieged suffering from thirst, although driven to the most dreadful extremities and resources by hunger,

The vacant spots here are green with gardens and olive trees. There is another large vacant tract along the southern wall and west of the Haram, also covered with verdure. Near the centre of the city also appear two or three green spots, which are small gardens. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre is the only conspicuous edifice in this vicinity, and its domes are striking objects. There are no buildings which, either from their size or beauty, are likely to engage the attention. Eight or ten minarets mark the position of so many mosques in different parts of the town, but they are only noticed because of their elevation above the surrounding edifices. Upon the same principle, the eye rests for a moment upon a great number of low domes, which form the roofs of the principal dwellings and relieve the heavy uniformity of the flat plastered roofs which cover the greater mass of more humble habitations. Many ruinous piles and a thousand disgusting objects are concealed or disguised by the distance. Many inequalities of surface, which exist to so great an extent that there is not a level street of any length in Jerusalem, are also unperceived.

From the same commanding point of view a few olive and fig trees are seen in the lower part of the valley of Jehoshaphat, and scattered over the side of Olivet from its base to the summit. These are sprinkled yet more sparingly on the southern side of the city on Mounts Zion and Ophel. North of Jerusalem the olive plantations appear more numerous as well as thriving, and thus offer a grateful contrast to the sunburnt fields and bare rocks which predominate in this landscape. The region west of the city appears to be destitute of trees. Fields of stunted wheat, yellow with the drought rather than white for the harvest, are seen on all sides of the town.

Jerusalem, as seen from Mount Olivet, is a plain inclining gently and equably to the east. Once enter its gates, however, and it is found to be full of inequalities. The passenger is always ascending or descending. There are no level streets, and little skill or labor has been employed to remove or diminish the inequalities which nature or time has produced. Houses are built upon mountains of rubbish which are probably twenty, thirty or which runs under a succession of arches barely high enough to permit an equestrian to pass under them. A canopy of old mats or of plank is suspended over the principal streets when not arched. This custom had its origin, no doubt, in the heat of the climate, which is very intense in summer, and it gives a gloomy aspect to all the most thronged and lively parts of the city. These covered ways are often pervaded by currents of air when a perfect calm prevails in other places. The principal streets of Jerusalem run nearly at right angles to each other. Very few, if any, of them bear names among the native population. They are badly paved, being merely laid irregularly with raised stones, with a deep square channel for beasts of burden in the middle; but the steepness of the ground contributes to keep them cleaner than in most Oriental cities.

The houses of Jerusalem are substantially built of the limestone of which the whole of this part of Palestine is composed; not usually hewn, but broken into regular forms, and making a solid wall of very respectable appearance. For the most part there are no windows next to the street, and the few which exist for the purposes of light or ventilation are completely masked by casements and lattice-work. The apartments receive their light from the open courts within. The ground-plot is usually surrounded by a high enclosure, commonly forming the walls of the house only, but sometimes embracing a small garden and some vacant ground. The rain-water which falls upon the pavement is carefully conducted, by means of gutters, into cisterns, where it is preserved for domestic uses. The people of Jerusalem rely chiefly upon these reservoirs for their supply of this indispensable article. Every house has its cistern, and the larger habitations are provided with a considerable number of them, which occupy the ground-story or cells formed for the purpose below it. Stone is employed in building for all the purposes to which it can possibly be applied, and Jerusalem is hardly more exposed to accidents by fire than a quarry or subterranean cavern. The floors, stairs, etc., are of stone, and the ceiling is usually formed by a coat of plaster laid upon the stones, which at the same time form the roof and the vaulted top of the room. Doors, sashes and a few other appurtenances are all that can usually be afforded of a material so expensive as wood. The little timber which is used is mostly brought from Mount Lebanon, as in the time of Solomon. A rough, crooked stick of the fig tree, or some gnarled, twisted planks made of the olive—the growth of fifty feet above the natural level, and the streets are constructed with the same disregard to convenience, with this difference, that some slight attention is paid to the possibility of carrying off surplus water. The streets are, without exception, narrow, seldom exceeding eight or ten feet in breadth. The houses often meet, and in some instances a building occupies both sides of the street,

Palestine—are occasionally seen. In other respects the description in the article HOUSE will afford a sufficient notion of those in Jerusalem. A large number of houses in Jerusalem are in a dilapidated and ruinous state. Nobody seems to make repairs so long as his dwelling does not absolutely refuse him shelter and safety. If one room tumbles about his ears, he removes into another, and permits rubbish and vermin to accumulate as they will in the deserted halls. Tottering staircases are propped to prevent their fall; and when the edifice becomes untenable, the occupant seeks another a little less ruinous, leaving the wreck to a smaller or more wretched family, or, more probably, to a goatherd and his flock. Habitations which have a very respectable appearance as seen from the street are often found, upon entering them, to be little better than heaps of ruins.

Nothing of this would be suspected from the general appearance of the city as seen from the various commanding points without the walls, nor from anything that meets the eye in the streets. Few towns in the East offer a more imposing spectacle to the view of the approaching stranger. He is struck with the height and massiveness of the ample are the large dimensions, Rev. xxi. 10-27. This city is called "the bride, the Lamb's wife," Rev. xxi. 9, the abode of the gathered company of such as are redeemed from among men.

By some interpreters the New Jerusalem is regarded as a happy city to be founded upon earth in the days of millennial blessedness, by others it is deemed a representation of the glory of heaven. For a discussion of this question commentaries and expositions of prophecy must be consulted.

eminence. After studying at Leipsic and Leyden, he visited London; and in order to perfect his education, he returned a second time to England. During his sojourn he became intimately acquainted with Sherlock, Waterland and Samuel Clarke; and having already known Schultens and Peter Burman in Holland, his mind received the impressions which the leading theologians and scholars of both countries were able to convey to him. In 1742 he was made preacher and tutor in the family of the duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbittel, and afterward became principal of the Collegium Carolinum. He conducted for many years a school at Riddagshausen, and in this seminary his influence became so great that the increase of a religious feeling in Brunswick has justly been attributed to his earnest and intelligent labors. His chief work is entitled "Considerations on the Fundamental Truths of Religion."

JAMES IN. In 1840 the king of Prussia became very active in his determination to secure more liberty for Christians in the East than they had enjoyed. He appealed to the queen of England, the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London on the subject, and the correspondence issued in the appointment of a Protestant bishop in Jerusalem to represent the Prussian and English Churches. The plan was carried out, an endowment fund was created, a church and schools were erected on Mount Zion, and in January, 1849, the church was dedicated. Dr. Alexander, who had been professor of Hebrew at Christ's College, London, was consecrated as the first bishop, and on his death, in 1845, the Prussian sovereign exercised his alternate right, and appointed Samuel Gobat of the Basle mission-house as the second bishop. In the church the gospel is preached in Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish, French, German and English, and the schools are well attended, while branch schools are opened at Jaffa, Nablus, Nazareth and Bethlehem.

JESAJAH (je-sa'yah). 1. A descendant of David, 1 Chr. iii. 21. 2. A Benjamite, Neh. xi. 7.

JESHAIAH (je'sha-yah). This name is identical with Isaiah. 1. A son of Jeduthun, chief of a division of singers, 1 Chr. xxv. 3, 15. 2. A Kohathite Levite, descended from Moses, 1 Chr. xxvi. 25. See ISSIAH. 1-3. One who returned from Babylon with Ezra, Ezra viii. 7. 4. A Levite of the family of Merari, Ezra viii. 19.

JESHANAH (je-sha'na), one of the places taken by Abijah from Jeroboam I., 1 Chr. xiii. 19.

JESHARELAH (je-sha're-la), the head of one of the divisions of singers, 1 Chr. xxv. 14. He is called also Asarelah, 1 Chr. xxv. 2.

JESHEBEAB (jesh'e-be-ab), chief of the fourteenth course of priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 13.

JESHER (je'sher), one of the sons of Caleb the son of Hezron, 1 Chr. ii. 18.

JESHIMON (je-shi'mon). In our Authorized Version this word is rendered as a proper name in six passages in which it has the article Num. xxi. 20; xxiii. 28; 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100. In two of these passages the Septuagint reads eremos; in the others, Jessaimos. The Vulgate reads desertum, solitudo and Jesimon. The word also occurs in the following poetical passages: Deut. xxxii. 10 and Ps. lxxviii. 7, in which it is translated wilderness; Ps. lxxviii. 40, cvii. 1 and Isa. lxiii. 19, 20, translated desert; and Ps. cvii. 4, translated solitary. There can be no doubt that in "the poetical passages" it means simply wilderness, and is applied to the "wilderness of Sinai." In the other passages its import is not so clear. It may possibly be a proper name; but if so there were two Jeshimons—one east of the Jordan connected with Pisgah and Peor, Num. xxi. 20, the other west of the Jordan, and connected with Hachilah and Maon, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, etc. We are inclined to believe that in these cases also it means wilderness; in the former the "wilderness of Arabia," in the latter the "wilderness of Judaea."

JESHOAIAH (je-sho-ha'yah), a descendant of Simeon, 1 Chr. iv. 36.

JESHUA, or JESHUAH (jesh-u-a). 1. The head of one of the courses of the priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 11; Ezra ii. 36. 2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxxi. 15. 3. A high-priest after the captivity. He returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem, and took a leading part in the restoration of the sacred rites and the building of the second temple, Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7. He is represented, especially by the prophet Zechariah, as an eminent type of Christ, Hag. i., ii.; Zech. iii.; vi. 9-15. 4. A head of the family of Pahath-moab, Ezra ii. 6. 5. The progenitor of a Levitical house, Ezra ii. 40. It was perhaps the representative of this house that signed the covenant, Neh. x. 9. 6. A Levite, Ezra viii. 33. 7. The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 19. 8. A Levite who took part in the solemn reading of the law, Neh. viii. 7. He may be the same with No. 6; and, indeed, it is not easy accurately to distinguish several so designated or to know whether a family or an individual is meant. 9. The great Joshua, Ezra viii. 17. 10. A town, as it would seem, in the South of Judah, inhabited after the return from Babylon, Neh. xi. 26.

JESHURUN (je-shoo'run) or JESURUN, a symbolical name for Israel, Deut. xxxii. 15; Isa. xli. 2. The reference of Deut. xxxiii. 5 is not, as sometimes supposed, to Moses, but to the Lord, who was Israel's true and rightful King.

JESIAH (je-si'ah). 1. A warrior, apparently a Korhite, who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 6. 2. A Levite of the family of Kohath, 1 Chr. xxiii. 20; he is the same with Isshiah, 1 Chr. xxiv. 25.

JESIMIEL (je-se-mi'el), one of Simeon's descendants, 1 Chr. iv. 36.

JESSÆANS (jes-se'anz) was held by Epiphanius to have been one of the earliest designations of Christians, but the origin of the name is quite uncertain. It is very unlikely that the word could be derived from Jesse, the father of David, and the probability is that it may have been formed from the title Jesus. Philo Judæus is known to have written a work called "Peri Jesaion," which refers to the Church of St. Mark at Alexandria, but the name never had an extensive application.

JESSE (jes'se), the son of Obed, of the tribe of Judah, and the father of David, consequently the immediate progenitor of the kings of Judah. It is singular that, while so distinguished in his posterity, his name never appears again. The line to which Jesse belonged was descended from Pharez, through Hezron his eldest son; and being himself the grandson of Boaz, who was one of the wealthiest persons in the south of Judah, the family might be regarded as occupying a respectable place amid a rural population. Bethlehem was the home of Jesse, as formerly of Boaz, and he is hence called "Jesse the Bethlehemite," 1 Sam. xvi. 1; once, the Ephrathite of Bethlehem-Judah, 1 Sam. xvii. 12. Nothing is heard of him till the memorable period when Samuel was instructed to go and anoint one of his sons to be king over Israel in the room of Saul, and he is then spoken of as an old man having no fewer than eight sons, most of them in full manhood. The name of his wife is never mentioned, but that she lived to a considerable age appears from the notice in 1 Sam. xxii. 3, which mentions the provision made by David for the safety of his father and mother, by placing them under the protection of the king of Moab. We never hear of them again; and the tradition among the Jews was that the king of Moab betrayed his trust, and put them and some of the other members of the family to death. Of this, however, there is no intimation in Scripture. The grand honor and distinction of the family was that it gave birth to David, who rose to be the most gifted member and the noblest representative of the old covenant.

JESSE, in ecclesiastical architecture, is applied to—1. A window containing the genealogy of Christ from David. A Jesse tree contains the genealogical scroll of our Lord's descent; a Jesse window is one in which is a picture of such a tree. 2. A candelabrum with many branches.

JESU (je'soo), 1 Esd. viii. 63.

JESU (je'zeu) is used in Latin poetry for Jesus, and in forms of invocation, as "O Jesu!"

JESUATES (jes'u-ates), a religious order which was recognized in 1368 by Urban V., but Clement IX. suppressed it in the seventeenth century. They followed the rule of the Augustinians, although they had Jerome for their patron saint. Professedly, their object was to aid the poor by their prayers and benevolent attentions. They were called "apostolic clerks," for they were not in holy orders. It is worthy of note that they entered largely into the distillation of brandy, and hence they were called Padri dell'acqua vitæ, or "Fathers of the Water of Life." They still exist in Italy under the Augustinian rule.

JESUI (jes'u-e), a son of Asher, Num. xxvi. 44. He is also called Isui, Gen. xlvi. 17, and Ishuai, 1 Chr. vii. 30.

JESUITES (jes'u-ites), a family of Asher descended from Jesui, Num. xxvi. 44.

JESUS CHRIST. It is of no practical moment whether we couple the personality of our Redeemer with the name CHRIST or with that of JESUS. Very commonly the latter is preferred as being historically and properly the personal designation. But if respect be had to the whole course of revelation on the subject—if the divine testimonies before the incarnation be taken into account as well as those posterior to it—it may seem fully as natural to give the preference to the name of Christ or Messiah; for before the volume of Old Testament Scripture had closed this had come to receive a strictly personal application, and was employed much as a proper name. On this account, therefore, and because it is the name from which has flowed the more distinctive epithets both of the people and of the cause of Jesus, we adopt it as presenting the fittest place for the little that can be said directly, in a work like the present, on the wonderful and glorious being to whom it relates.

The name Christ in Greek, Messiah in Hebrew, bearing as it does the participial or adjective sense of anointed, was capable of being applied, and act-to the expected Deliverer without the article or any accompanying epithet, precisely as a proper name: "Know, therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment unto Messiah (Christ) Prince;" and again, "And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah (Christ) be cut off," ver. 25, 26.

It need not surprise us, therefore, when we open the New Testament, to find, in the very first announcement of the actual birth of the Saviour, this name applied to him as a personal designation: "Fear not," said the angels to the shepherds, "for unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ, Lord," Luke ii. 11. But before his birth the name, in its Greek form, Jesus (Hebrew, Yeshua) had been divinely appointed for his more strictly personal designation. "Thou shalt call his name Jesus," said the angel to Joseph, "for he shall save his people from their sins." Unfortunately, by the translation the ground of the connection is lost between the name and the reason assigned for its imposition, there being no formal resemblance between Jesus and he shall save. As usually was applied, in the earlier parts of Scripture to a variety of persons. Because the high-priest was emphatically the anointed one at the first institution of the tabernacle worship, he is therefore called "the priest, the Christ," Lev. iv. 3. After the institution of the kingly office and the setting apart of him who bore it by an act of consecration with oil, he became, in a peculiar sense, the Lord's anointed, or the Christ of the Lord, as Saul is once and again designated by David, 1 Sam. xii. 3, 5, etc. Hannah, however, at the close of her song of praise, has already given the word a loftier direction; not without respect, it may be, to the more immediate bearers of the royal dignity, but still more especially pointing to One who should gather into his person the highest powers and prerogatives associated with the chosen people and give them a world-wide development, for she speaks of the Lord "exalting the horn of his Messiah" (anointed), so as, at the same time, to "judge the ends of the earth." In Ps. ii. the Lord's Christ is He who is God's Son by way of eminence, and who receives the heritage of earth to its utmost bounds as his sure possession. And, to say nothing of other passages, in Daniel, ch. ix., we find the term applied originally spoken, it would run thus: Yeishua ki Yoshiya, Saviour, for he shall save. And when sins are mentioned as the specific evil from which the bearer of this name was to save his people, it was intimated from the outset that he was to appear pre-eminently as a spiritual Redeemer—one who had higher ends in view and a nobler mission to accomplish than the political regeneration of his country or the promotion of the merely secular interests of the world. If these should any how come within the scope of his benevolent working, it could only be as results following in the train of his more direct and proper undertaking.

When viewed in respect to their ultimate meaning, the two names of Jesus and Christ differ only by pointing to diverse aspects of his high calling: the one (Jesus) gave indication of the nature of the work he had to do, the other (Christ) bespoke his consecration and special endowment for the service it required at his hands. Each implied the other; he could not have been the Jesus if he had not been destined to receive the unction which constituted him the Christ, nor, on the other hand, should he have been constituted the Christ, unless the infinitely great and important work implied in his development of that germ, there was such a reach of discernment, such a breadth of view, such a loftiness of aim, such a many-sided fullness of instruction, and all cast into forms so admirably fitted to take a deep and lasting hold of the hearts of mankind, as has left even the greatest of those who went before at an immeasurable distance from him. Now, for the first time, was the veil properly uplifted from the upper sanctuary, and the Lord of glory openly disclosed to men's view, as full of grace and truth, according to the word of Christ himself, "No one hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him," John iii. 16. In the strictly moral sphere also we perceive the same relative superiority, the same realized perfection; for Christ, to use the words of Mr. Taylor, "as founder of a system of mundane ethics, revises and overrules all bygone moralities, issuing anew whatever is of unchangeable obligation, and consigning to non-observance or oblivion whatever had a temporary force or a local reason. With a have laid the foundations of a universal religion and a perfect morality—were it not that the human in him was informed and elevated by the divine?

The PRIESTHOOD of Jesus was of a kind that bespoke, if possible, a still higher elevation above those around him, and a yet deeper insight into the mysteries of Godhead. The priestly element had entered largely into the religion of Judaism; its sacrifices and oblations had all to be offered by a mediating priesthood; and by them alone, as having immediate access to God, could the more peculiar intercessions for the blessing of Heaven be made with acceptance. But could it with all these prevail to satisfy the conscience? Did it adequately meet the moral wrong occasioned by sin in the government of God, and provide on grounds of righteousness for its final extirpation? So the men of our Lord's generation seemed universally to think. Not a thought apparently had ever crossed their imaginations respecting the merely provisional nature of the ritual institutions of Moses; they held it blasphemy to breathe a and with perfect consciousness of all that it called him to do and to suffer, he said, as he entered on the work, "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me: Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God," Heb. x. 5, 7. So completely in this did Jesus stand alone that the work was already done before he could get men distinctly to apprehend the necessity of its accomplishment. But then at length the light broke upon their minds; the conviction forced itself upon them that here also the true idea was realized in its perfection; since the priest and the offering, the person to intercede and the ground of the intercession being one and the same, and that one of spotless purity and infinite worth, there could be nothing wanting to ensure full and perpetual acceptance with the Father. So "by one offering he has for ever perfected them that are sanctified," and on the ground of that all-sufficient offering, "he is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him."

The kingly office of Christ so far differed from the priestly that it formed the matter of universal expectation; all looked for him as the King of Zion. This had been so prominently announced in the ancient prophecies, and was also associated in so palpable a manner with the circumstances of his appearance in the world, that a certain unanimity could scarcely be avoided. The angel who gave intimation of his birth to Mary declared that the throne of his father David should be given him; and the eastern magi who came to do homage to him at his birth inquired after him, and when they found where he was did obeisance to him in the specific character of the King of the Jews, Luke i. 32; Matt. ii., etc. When the time approached for his manifesting himself to Israel, the era was heralded by his forerunner as that which was to be signalized by the setting up of the kingdom of heaven, and he, therefore, who was at hand to do it, could himself be no other than the proper king. The same truth breaks out at intervals throughout the whole of his career, and formed the most prominent part of the good confession which he witnessed before Pilate and sealed with his blood, John xviii. 36, 37. There was no question then whether he was to be a king, but only what sort of king. Here it was that the difference between Jesus and others discovered itself, and that his incomparably deeper insight into the mind of God and the real nature of things shone fully out. The kingdom over which he was to preside could be no merely terrene dominion or worldly lordship, such as they in their superficial earthliness imagined; it must stand in fitting accordance with the other parts of his office, and be, indeed, the natural outgoing and result of the revelations of divine truth which he brought as the prophet, and the priceless redemption from the evil of sin which he executed as the high-priest, of his people. Like these, therefore, it must be predominantly spiritual in its character and agencies—a kingdom, as he himself testified, founded in the truth, and through the truth operating upon the heart and consciences of men. Thus only could he make them willing subjects of the King of heaven, and provide for himself a dominion such as it became him, the Lord of glory, to wield, and as he could render it, wherever it prevailed, a kingdom of righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. That he never had any other plan in view respecting his kingdom, as has sometimes of late been asserted, is devoid of all proof. In his sermon on the mount, in his parables, as well as in the whole spirit and tenor of his touch, with a word—a word of far-reaching inferences—he rules the ages to come; and he so sends morality forward, he so launches it into the boundless futurity of the human system on earth, as that it shall need no redressing, no complementing, no retrenchment, even in the most distant era." It was the more remarkable that he should appear a prophet of this lofty stamp, when we reflect how many others had been working at the same problem and failed in the attempt—Jewish theosophists at Alexandria, who combined the advantage of an acquaintance with God's earlier revelations with the highest culture of heathendom; Scribes and Pharisees in Judæa, who could think of nothing higher or better for the future of the world than the diffusion of unmodified Judaism; and Essenes, the ascetic reformers of Judaism, who only succeeded in compounding out of pharisaic and mystic elements a system which was repulsive to the common sentiments of mankind, and died in the deserts that gave it birth. How should one who, humanly considered, was but a Jewish peasant in an obscure Galilean village have so readily done what all besides had failed to accomplish—should, in a few short years, sentiment in that direction, Matt. xxvii. 61; Acts vi. 14. Yet their own prophets had given no doubtful indications of something higher being needed—of a covenant and a priesthood founded upon better promises and destined to secure more satisfactory results. David had looked forward in joyful hope to his great Successor—Him who was to be at once his son and Lord—being a priest upon the throne, a priest after the order of Melchizedek, Ps. cx. 4. And the later prophets, when pointing to the time of his appearing, spoke in ominous terms of sufferings that were to precede, as well as of a glory that was to follow; of a fearful struggle with sin, in which his very soul was to be poured out, and a ransom of priceless value paid, whereby the guilt of iniquity was to be forever atoned, sacrifice and oblation to cease, a new and higher temple consecrated, Isa. liii. 8, 10; Dan. ix. 26, 27; Zech. vi. 12; xiii. 1. It was the mighty burden of these prophetic bodings which Jesus undertook to bear when he assumed the high-priesthood of our profession, as well as of that implied in the handwriting of ordinances going before, which with manifold iteration pressed the claims of a debt that was never paid; life, he made it evident that he had no sympathy with the carnal views of his countrymen, and that his kingdom was to be one rooting itself within, and developing itself in all that is holy and good.

It thus appears that the offices of Christ form one complex and closely related whole; each, when rightly understood, is the necessary complement of the other; and though they were from the first contemplated as essential to the work of Christ, and as such had formed the theme of prophetic intimation, yet in the idea conceived of them, and the manner in which the idea was actually realized, we perceive undoubted evidence of a divine elevation and a true originality. The appearance in this world of one capable of forming so lofty a conception of his office as the foundation of a new standing and destiny for fallen man, and embodying the conception in the actual doing and suffering of what it required at his hand, was an event of surpassing interest and importance; it was like the bursting forth of a fresh spring-time upon the world, or, as it is represented in Scripture itself, the commencement of a new creation. To come forth as one not despairing of the thorough reformation of the world, notwithstanding the foul abominations that were feeding upon its vitals and the many fruitless efforts that had been made to rectify them, was itself matter of admiration. But it was greatly more so to exhibit in his own spirit and behavior the living exemplar of what a world so renovated would be—to be cognizant of all sin, and yet himself free from any taint of its impurities, in thought and deed perfectly conformed to the holiness of God; and not only this in himself, but generously braving the mighty task of undertaking to make as many as would submit to him partakers of the same excellence, heirs of the same glorious destiny. This was emphatically a new thing in the world, and was fitted to produce, as it actually has produced, a mighty revolution in individual and social life, such as may well serve for a pledge and earnest of what still remains to be accomplished. It was of necessity that he who had charged himself with the work should be without spot or blemish; for as has been justly said, "the real manifestation of divine grace can exist only in one in whom the one spring of action is the fullness of love which he derives from perfect fellowship with God, and in whom this forms the principle which regulates his whole life. The power of a new life in God can proceed only from that source in which all the creative power of this life lies. Now, this is the idea of a sinless and holy personality. Were there not at the head of the Christian religion such a being, it were inconceivable how it could be eminently the religion of reconciliation and redemption, or how the deep-rooted consciousness of being reconciled and redeemed should have come to form the fundamental belief of the Christian world. With such a being at the head of Christianity, this is at once explained." It is explained if—but only if—along with the existence of the perfect life that is in Jesus we take into account the provision he made for its communication to the souls of men. Like the corn of wheat that must fall into the ground and die before it can bring forth fruit, so Jesus had not only to be in himself the living One, but also to die in the room of others, that he might communicate to them of the life that is in himself; and so, when we combine with the properties of his person and the faultless excellences of his life the perfection also of his mediatorial work, there is everything that is required to render him the stay and the hope of mankind.

DATES AND PERIODS CONNECTED WITH THE HISTORY OF JESUS CHRIST.—The common era of A. D. was fixed by the abbot Dionysius Exiguus in the sixth century, and assumes the birth of Jesus to have taken place in the year of the city Rome 754. A more careful examination, however, of the historical data proves this to have been about four years too late. 1. For in the first place the gospel narrative leaves no room to doubt that the birth of Jesus took place before the death of Herod the Great. But there is good reason to believe that Herod died in the year of Rome 750, and shortly after a noticeable eclipse of the moon that took place that year. 2. This date is confirmed by the historical circumstances given by Luke, ch. iii. 1, 2, in connection with the Baptist's entering on his public ministry, presently after which Jesus is affirmed to have been about thirty years of age, Luke iii. 23. The most specific of the circumstances noted is that it was the fifteenth year of Tiberius. Augustus had died in the year of the city 767; if 15 were added to that, we should have 782, and again 30 subtracted for the approximate period of Christ's birth, we should have the year of the city 752. This brings the matter two years farther down than the former date; but then it is known that Tiberius was associated in the imperial government with Augustus two years before the death of the latter; and if these two years are included, as is most probable, then the fifteenth of Tiberius would be coincident with the year of the city 750. 3. An argument is also deducible from the presidency of Cyrenius as mentioned in Luke ii. 2; for according to recent investigations, this could not have commenced earlier than about four years before the common era of A. D., or lasted longer than two years. But this cannot be exhibited in detail here. See under CYRENIUS. 4. The early Christian Fathers Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and of later date Eusebius and Epiphanius, concur in placing it in 751 or 752. They do not, however, appear to have investigated the matter very carefully, and rested chiefly upon the fifteenth of Tiberius. Indeed, it is scarcely possible to determine quite exactly the time; but if we should say not less than three and not more than four years before the common era, we must be on either side within the mark.

The season of the year when Christ was born has also, it is now generally admitted, been wrongly fixed. It was a considerable time before any day appears to have been observed as an anniversary; and when an observance of that description began, churches and individuals in different parts of the world differed from each other regarding the proper time. The Eastern Church for a time coupled together the birth and baptism of Jesus, and celebrated both on the 6th of January as the Epiphany. Ultimately the Romish tradition came to prevail which connected it with the 25th of December. The circumstance that shepherds were found by night tending their flocks on the plains of Bethlehem when the event happened is alone decisive evidence against this opinion, for there the nights are greatly too cold at that season of the year to admit of such a practice. The custom now is, and doubtless also then was, for the shepherds to begin to tend it with their flocks about the vernal equinox, and to cease doing so shortly after the autumnal. One or other of these periods has been thought the most probable by independent inquirers, and the greater probability, we think, on general grounds, is in favor of the vernal equinox. Such is the opinion also of Mr. Greswell, though several of his grounds appear fanciful. There are historical probabilities, however, that seem to point in that direction; and surely, if the event was ordered, as we may well conceive it might be, so as to present some fitting correspondence between the natural and the supernatural, no period of the year could be imagined more appropriate for the birth of Him who was to make all things new than the fresh and joyous season of spring, when the deadness of winter has gone and everything is ready to burst forth into leaf and blossom. That season also presented a historical as well as natural correspondence, for it was then that the birthday of Israel as a people had commenced, and in the feast of the passover had its ever-recurring commemoration. It was worthy of divine wisdom to arrange it that the event which was to constitute the new and higher life era should take place about the same period, and the coincidence might even serve as one of the incidental circumstances that gave indication of the great reality being come.

That the birth of Jesus Christ, therefore, took place in the year of Rome 750, or in the year of the world 4000, and most probably in the spring of that year, may be regarded as the nearest approximation to the truth we can now arrive at.

But the exact year of his death is still matter of dispute, and will probably continue to be so. This arises chiefly from the vague manner in which one of the feasts occurring during his ministry is indicated by St. John—that, namely, noticed at ch. vi. 1, at which he healed the poor paralytic beside the pool of Bethesda. If this feast was the passover, as is believed by many of the ablest commentators, then his entire ministry must have extended over three years—about three years and a half—as in that case there would be three passovers, including the last, on which he was present at Jerusalem, John ii. 13; v. 1; xiii. 1, and one which apparently he did not attend on account of the violence exhibited toward him by the Jews about Jerusalem, John vi. 4; vii. 1. Not a few, however, contend for the feast mentioned in John v. 1 being that, not of the passover, but of Purim, which took place in the latter part of February or beginning of March, in which case the passover referred to at John vi. 4 may have been that of the April following, and the whole duration of the public ministry of Jesus may not have exceeded three and a half years. Wieseler, among others, strenuously adopts this view, but in doing so he crowds the events of one of the most important stages of Christ's ministry into what one cannot but feel to be an incredibly short period. He would throw all that is recorded between Matt. iv. 12 and xv. into the transactions of one or two months, placing also the Baptist's imprisonment in March and his death in April of the same year. This is against all probability, and the grounds of the calculation are in many respects extremely fanciful. It is plain, that after the first passover which our Lord attended subsequent to his baptism, he continued for a considerable time about the Jordan and in Judæa, John iii. 22; iv. 1-3; and that he should, in the course of what remained of the year, have himself performed three distinct missionary tours through Galilee, Matt. iv. 23-25; Luke viii. 1; Matt. ix. 35-38, besides sending out his disciples on a similar tour, Matt. x. 1, delivering the sermon on the mount, and doing many of his mightiest works—all which would be necessary on the supposition in question—is so extremely unlikely that nothing but the most urgent reasons could commend it to our belief. It is impossible to speak of more than probabilities, where the data are so comparatively few and general; but they seem decidedly greater on the side of those who hold that the feast in John v. 1 was a passover, that there were consequently three passovers in our Lord's ministry besides the one at which he died, or in all four, and that his death took place in his thirty-fourth year. If his birth occurred, as we suppose, in U. C. 750, and his baptism in U. C. 780, then his death would fall in U. C. 784.

One of the most remarkable features of the sacred biographies of our Lord is seen in the fact that without any attempt at concealment there is no drawing aside of the curtain so as to present unnecessary views of the early life of Jesus. He went down to Nazareth and was obedient to Joseph and Mary. He resided in their humble home; and associating with his brethren, he engaged in the usual duties of their primitive and honorable home, thus dignifying labor and investing with moral beauty a household where the knowledge and fear of God habitually dwelt. Occasionally his brethren are referred to, as in Matt. xiii. 55, 56. "Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James and Joses, and Simon and Judas? and his sisters, are they not all with us?" Comp. Matt.

xii. 46, 48; xxvii. 56; Mark iii. 31; vi. 3; xv. 40; xvi. 1; Luke viii. 19; xxi. 10; John ii. 12; vii. 3-10; Acts i. 13, 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5; Gal. i. 19. Speculation was very early rife on the nature of this relationship to Jesus, and the question is still unsolved, and probably insoluble. In the fourth century we find that the question had assumed a shape from which it has never since quite extricated itself. Jerome asserted the perpetual virginity of our Lord's mother against Helvidius, who held that after the birth of Christ his mother Mary, by her husband Joseph, became also the mother of the four who in the Gospels are called "the Lord's brethren." Much of the argument on either side up to the present time may be found in germ employed by Helvidius and Jerome. Although the diversity of opinions may be generally classed under the two prevalent heads of Helvidianism (the opinion that Mary had other children after Jesus, even the "brethren" of Matt. xiii. 55), and the orthodox view opposed to it by St. Jerome, that the mother of Christ was aparthenos and the avnt only of our Lord's brethren, as stated in the text, our account of the controversy would be incomplete were we to omit mention of the third opinion, which was prevalent in the Eastern Church, to the effect that the persons whom the evangelists call "the Lord's brethren" were in fact his brothers-in-law, being the sons of Joseph (who was much older than the Virgin Mary) by a former wife. Thus Epiphanius and St. Gregory of Nyssa both hold Mary, the mother of our Saviour, to have been the step-mother only, though in a lax sense called the mother, of James, Joses, Simon and Jude.

Jerome maintained that the Lord's brethren were in fact his cousins. The Hebrew usage undoubtedly justifies the extension of the word "brethren" required by our view, see Gen. xiii. 8; xiv. 14; xxix. 12; Lev. xxv. 48, 49; Judg. xiv. 3; Job xlii. 11. The men of Nazareth who predicated the fraternal relation to Jesus of James and the rest, Matt. xiii. 55, seem either to have spoken in a lax and popularly understood sense, or to have been ignorant of the real degree of the family relationship of the persons whom they were somewhat contumeliously speaking of. This is apparent from their very first question, "Is not this the carpenter's son?" Of the Marys who so nobly endured the agonizing scenes of the crucifixion, one is called "the mother of James," etc., Matt. xxvii. 66; Mark xv. 40; and "the other Mary," Matt. xxvii. 61. These designations, indeed, leave it undetermined whether this mother of James was the Virgin Mary, as Helvidius asserted, and as Gal. i. 19 (considered hastily and alone) might suggest. We have, however, the additional testimony of another eye-witness of the awful events on Calvary, decisive, we think, of the question. St. John, xix. 25, tells us of a third Mary who saw the Saviour's agony, even his own Virgin Mother. So that "the other Mary," the mother of James and others, was the Virgin's sister, and bore [no unusual thing in Hebrew families] her name. The domiciliation of either sister, when a widow, in the other's house at Nazareth, on the decease of either husband, Joseph or Cleophas, so that the children of both would thenceforth form but one household and well be accounted "brethren," is therefore a most conceivable and probable event; still more if, as the ancient historian Hegesippus positively testifies, those husbands of the sisters were themselves brothers. The marriage of two brothers to two sisters appears to have been no uncommon case among the Hebrews. Now, assuming that the four "brethren" mentioned in Matt. xiii. 55 were brothers, we infer that (Alphæus, and Clopas or Cleophas being one and the same person, both names being in the Hebrew "Chalpi" or "Chlopai") as they were the sons of the Mary, wife of Cleophas, whom St. John, as we have seen, expressly calls the sister of the blessed Virgin, John xix. 25, they must needs stand to our Lord in the relation of first cousins. St. John, xix. 25, calls the mother of James "the wife of Cleophas, or Clopas," a name not to be confounded with that of "Cleopas" mentioned in Luke xxiv. 18. This has given rise to two suppositions, either that Mary had two husbands, named Alphæus and Clopas, or that her husband, as was not unfrequent among the Hebrews, bore himself these two names. It certainly supports this latter view that in an important fragment of the very early Christian writer Papias, who was a scholar of St. John, the identity of Alphæus and Clopas is asserted: "The second Mary was the wife of Cleophas or Alphæus, and mother of James, bishop and apostle, and of Simon, and of Thaddæus, and of a certain Joseph or Joses. John calls Alphæus also Cleophas, either from his father or his family, or some other cause." Papias, we need not add, makes James, Joses, Simon and Jude cousins, and not literal brothers, of our Lord.

It was in the retirement of his village home that he prepared for the duties of his early ministry on which he entered at Nazareth and Capernaum. Then followed his first circuit through Galilee, with a few devoted followers, during which, as Matthew states, he "went all about Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and disease among the people," Matt. iv. 23. The duration of this tour is uncertain, some holding with Ellicott that it extended only "a few days," and others, with Greswell, that it reached as far as three or four months. The passover called our Lord to Jerusalem; and his Galilean ministry was thereafter resumed, and among its momentous incidents were the delivery of the sermon on the mount and the calling of his twelve apostles. During this ministry, at the small village of Nain, on the north slope of the valley of Esdraclon, our Lord's power over death was first displayed. He was passing the gate as they were carrying to the grave the only son of a weeping widow. Full of kindness as well as of power, he spoke a word of comfort to the mother and of life to the son. The effect of both was complete; amidst the awful fear and adoration of the crowds that thronged him he delivered the young man alive to his mother. Three instances only occur in Christ's history of his assertion of this dominion over death. In the present case the corpse was on its way to burial when interrupted by the fiat of the Life-restorer. In the next instance—of the daughter of Jairus—the bands of death were loosened almost at once after life had ceased. The widow's son was raised in the sight of all Nain; the ruler's daughter in the presence only of the apostles Peter, James and John. In the third instance, at the close of his own life, in the case of Lazarus, when the vital spark had departed four days previously, he called him back not only to life, but from corruption and decay to health and freshness. Again, in his circuit through Galilee he depicted the character of Pharisaism, and taught the people by his inimitable parables. Now followed the mission of his disciples, to announce through Galilee that "the kingdom of heaven was at hand;" and it is held by some commentators that their return to Caper-naum, and their removal with Jesus to the northern Bethsaida (called Julias by the tetrarch Philip, after the emperor's daughter), was occasioned by the excitement connected with the violent death of John the Baptist. His discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum tended not only to correct the views of those who followed him for the food which by his miraculous power he had produced, but also to sift the sincerity of those who professed to be his real followers, and the result was a large secession of many who exclaimed against his teaching as harsh and intolerable, John vi. 41-64. In the circuit through North Galilee he was brought into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon; and then occurred the interview where he acknowledged the faith of the Syro-Phœnician woman whose daughter was "grievously vexed with a devil." Thereafter he crossed the headwaters of the Jordan and passed into the region of Decapolis.

In his intercourse with his disciples he now began to intimate his death and departure, and to speak of the glories that should follow as the result of his suffering. With a view to strengthen their faith and to prepare them for trials, he vouchsafed to three of his disciples a view of his glory in the scene of the transfiguration, which is recorded in the three synoptical Gospels, and which is also alluded to by the two apostles who lived to hand down their writings to the Church, John i. 14; 2 Pet. i. 16-18. There is little doubt but that it was on one of the lofty spurs of the Hermon range that this scene occurred, and not on Tabor, as tradition has popularly intimated. See TABOR, TRANSFIGURATION. Now the allusions to his approaching death become more decided. Before his journey to Jerusalem, with a view to spread over Judæa a more accurate knowledge of his ministry, he sends as many as five-and-thirty bands of his disciples, two and two together, to travel over the land and to make known his real doctrines, and thus his followers penetrated districts which he had never reached. His different tours had carried him to the north-west toward Sidon, through Galilee, and southward to Jerusalem, through Decapolis and the parts to the east of the Lake of Galilee, and now he retires over Jordan to the region of Gilead, which, because of his fame, had been prepared for his personal ministry. John tells us, x. 40-42, that "many believed in him there;" and there are several intimations to the effect that he continued for a considerable time on that side of the river. His ministry there closed on his removal to Bethany, where the divinity of his mission was attested and his power over the grave fully displayed. In consequence of the excitement produced by that event, which stimulated the faith of his followers and equally excited the enmity of his foes, a well-digested plan was formed for his capture, and Jesus withdrew for a time to the town of Ephraim, or Ophrah, the modern Taiyibeh, about twenty miles north of Jerusalem. After a sojourn here of two or three weeks, he crossed the Jordan again; and here, while laboring in Peræa, he began again to prepare them for his decease, which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem. Reaching Jericho, the fickle populace hailed his advent, but the ignorance and the prejudice of the people were at once seen when he condescended to be the guest of the repentant Zaccheus. Still teaching—for the parable of the ten pounds was now delivered—he gradually approached the capital, and ere long he sought the rest of his wonted home at Bethany again. Thus the labors of our Lord over the land in his various circuits had come to an end, and now he stood at the beginning of the eventful week which ended in his death as the great Sacrifice. The incidents of that week, from day to day, come under the head Leaving Bethany, he was borne into Jerusalem as a triumphant conqueror, amidst the plaudits of surrounding multitudes, only to meet with reviling and reproaches by the populace when the plans of the chief-priests and the Pharisees had at length succeeded and he was caught in their toils. The incidents which are required to fill up this sketch of the life of our Lord, as well as those connected with the CRUCIFIXION, the RESURRECTION, the ASCENSION and the great events of his life and ministry, will be found in connection with these words, and with the following, to which the reader is referred. ers the appellation Judæans or Jews was usually given to the nation, and so the classical authors speak; this, too, has subsisted to our own days.

The design of God to use the descendants of Abraham for great purposes in the history of the world has been displayed in all periods of their history. Dwelling in Egypt as they did, they still remained a separate people. Oppression seemed only to intensify their nationality; and when the time of their deliverance under Moses and Aaron arrived, they had attained to a magnitude that made their departure a serious question affecting the political stability of Egypt. See MOSES. In the wilderness, during the years of their wanderings, as recorded in the books of Exodus, Numbers and Deuteronomy, although they were exposed to hostile assaults from settled nationalities around them, and encumbered by the impediments of their strange condition, they continued to grow in numbers and martial prowess, so as under Joshua to become the victors in their wars after entering the promised land. During the period of the Judges their condition was exceedingly peculiar. Their tribal existence unified them as a people, and yet to a certain extent kept them separate, for it was chiefly the Levitical economy under the high-priest which formed the bond of their union. In the lapse of time, as the faith of the early fathers died out, and difficulties overtook them which required the leadership of earnest men, the judges who arose were placed in command, because of recognized power and the evidence which they gave that they were raised up by the Lord. Still, these judges had no succession in their families, and they belonged to different tribes. They were incidental leaders, called to their office as the conditions of their country from time to time required. The decay of religion also in the priesthood, and notably in the case of the family of Eli, at length constrained the people to give utterance to a desire which had long been growing in the popular mind. The unity of the people under a recognized head, and with a more permanent form of government, had become a widespread desire; and as the books of Samuel show, this longing had its gratification in the elevation of Saul to the throne. The genius of David as a military leader told on the surrounding nations, and at his death there was an apparent prospect that the kingdom would continue to increase in extent and general prosperity. The magnificence of the style of his successor, the amount of the taxes raised in the later years of David, and during all the time of Solomon, for public buildings and for the extravagant luxury of a court that vied with the surrounding nations, were felt to be exceedingly oppressive to the people. Thus the seeds of discontent were sown in the popular mind, and it only required the display of folly which Rehoboam exhibited, and the political trickery of the usurper Jeroboam, to produce the disruption of the kingdom which ensued. If the separate portions of the disrupted state were to remain apart, it was necessary that influences should at once be brought to bear which would ensure a permanent division. These influences were found in a new capital, a new system of religion and a new priesthood, thus raising up hostile feelings in both the Church and the State. No doubt Jeroboam and his supporters held that they were eminently shrewd and wise, and yet they did not foresee that they were sowing seed which would be reaped in a harvest of invasions and calamities, terminating in their national captivity. They cast off the worship of the true God, and would not be warned. They would neither reform nor repent, and at length Jehovah swept their land as with the besom of destruction.

The smaller kingdom of Judah maintained its existence for centuries notwithstanding its diminutive size, but the tendency of its court and of the people to become assimilated to the worship and customs of the surrounding nations, again and again brought down the threatened visitations of God. The lessons of the tribulations with which the kingdom of Israel had been visited, the explanations and warnings of the different prophets whom God in mercy raised up from time to time to restrain and purify them, failed, and that kingdom, too, eventually succumbed to the arms of a foreign power. Abundance of time after the fall of Israel was given to the people of Judah to study the lesson of God's providences, the principles of the divine procedure, and to anticipate the judgments which must overtake them if they repented not, and yet they would not hearken or learn. Their downward progress was certain, and at length the blow fell; Judah was led away captive, and the land was left to be occupied by strangers. The great body of the people, especially among the upper classes, were carried to the provinces near Babylon. A few only of the lowest and of the poorest were permitted to remain, and they had to mingle with the new colonists, and many went into Egypt and made themselves a home there. There subsequently, at Leontopolis, a temple was built; and though their connection with their brethren in Palestine was not altogether broken, yet in this Egyptian temple the ritual of the law was observed. Throughout other countries, bodies of the Jews were settled in the various provinces—perhaps even beyond the limits—of the Persian empire. The restored in Judæa were of course vassals of the same crown. But this monarchy was subverted by Alexander the Great, who is said to have bestowed privileges on the Jews. On his early death, 323 B. C., four kingdoms—Macedonia, Thrace, Syria and Egypt—were formed of his dominions. Between the two last named Judæa lay, and was for a long while under the power of one or other of them, and frequently the battle-field of their armies. It formed part of the kingdom of Egypt under Ptolemy Soter, and was favorably treated by Ptolemy Philadelphus, in whose reign most probably the Septuagint version of the Old Testament was commenced. Oppressed by Ptolemy Philopator, the Jews revolted, and placed themselves under Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. By Antiochus Epiphanes they were cruelly persecuted; their religion was proscribed and their temple profaned. Then that determined patriotic spirit was roused which, under the leadership of the Maccabæan family, high-priests as well as princes, achieved at last their independence. The regal title was taken by Aristobulus, of this family, son of Hyrcanus, 107 B. C., and transmitted to his successors. See MACCABEES. But the Roman power was now extending itself in the East. Syria was made a Roman province by Pompey, who took Jerusalem 63 B. C., and from that time the Jews were more or less directly dependent on the authority of Rome.

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN JEWELRY.

The term frequently occurs in Jeremiah, and from the time of the Babylonish captivity, as the members of the tribe of Judah formed by far the larger portion of the remnant of the covenant people, Jew became the common appellation of the whole body, and as such is found both in the New Testament and among classical writers. In the first three Gospels the term rarely occurs, Matt. xxviii. 15; Mark vii. 3; Luke vii. 3; xxiii. 51; except in the derisive title "King of the Jews," Matt. xxvii. 11; but in John the use of the term is peculiar. He sometimes applies it with a national reference, John ii. 6, 13; iii. 1; iv. 9; but very frequently as "designating the Jews in their peculiar aspect as a hostile community to our Lord, and as standing in marked contrast to the irrepressible multitude," John i. 19; ii. 18, and elsewhere. In the Epistles we sometimes find the word employed nationally, 2 Cor. xi. 24, sometimes with reference to religion, Rom. i. 16; ii. 28, 29, sometimes distributively, Jews and Gentiles (Greeks) constituting the population of the world, 2 Cor. iii. 9. And it is observable that it is more comprehensive than "Hebrews," Acts vi., for Hellenists (Grecians) might be Jews, nor is it quite synonymous with "Israelites," which term seems, sometimes at least, to express more decidedly covenant hopes and relationship, John i. 47; 2 Cor. xi. 22. By foreign-

The sovereignty was indeed granted to members of the Herodian family (see HEROD), of whom Herod the Great, and, after an interval, Herod Agrippa I., had the largest dominion. But ultimately the Jews were governed by Roman procurators till the disastrous war in which their capital, their ritual, and their polity were destroyed by Vespasian and Titus. When the apostles and early missionaries of the gospel went forth on their great errand of mercy, they found many Jews in all the leading cities and important centres of commerce in the cities of the Roman empire. Among them the idea of the spirituality and unity of the Godhead existed, and they were familiar with the idea of a revelation. To them the apostles addressed themselves, and in many places Jews were gathered into the early Christian Church. They were scattered by the Roman army through the province and held as slaves, and for several generations their treatment by the Western nations of Europe was exceedingly inhuman. And yet they still exist, a separate nation, the living evidence of prophecy; and though without a country, they exercise no unimportant influence on the affairs of the world. But the time will come when they shall again assume their place and reoccupy their land, a faithful people, under the renewed protection of the God of their fathers. See under NEBUCHADNEZZAR, CYRUS, EZRA, NEHEMIAH, TITUS, JERUSALEM, and under other appropriate heads for further details of Jewish history.

JEW, THE WANDERING. The legend of the Wandering Jew, who cannot die, but, as the punishment of his sin, is obliged to wander over the face of the earth till Christ shall pronounce his doom at the last day, seems to have originated in that passage of the Gospel of St. John, xxi. 22, where Jesus says of John, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me. Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die." It arose, probably, in the thirteenth century, and may be supposed to indicate the Jewish people, scattered throughout the world, and nowhere finding a home. According to the current legend, the Wandering Jew is Ahasuerus, the shoemaker at Jerusalem, who, when the Saviour wished to rest before his house, on his way to Golgotha, drove him away. Another states him to be Pilate's doorkeeper, who struck Jesus on the back as he led him out of his master's judgment-hall. So recently as the last century impostors took advantage of the belief in this legend and gave themselves out for the Wandering Jew; and people were not wanting who, from time to time, maintained that he had appeared to them under different forms. The legend has been frequently worked up into the forms of poem and romance.

JEWEL, JEWELRY (joo'el-re). Among the Asiatic nations of antiquity, the Egyptians and the Greeks, a love of ornament prevailed. The idea of the beautiful in form and color has always been exhibited in the hues of the raiment and the arrangement of gems and lustrous stones worn on their dress and on the person. Hence the rings and bracelets, the armlets and coronals, and the girdles of various forms, all of which were enriched with the most precious jewels which the wealth of the possessors enabled them to obtain. The Egyptian monuments afford abundant illustrations of the style of art which existed in the land of the Nile, and the Israelites followed the customs of Egypt, of Syria and of the surrounding nations. From the time of Solomon the trade with the East by way of Tadmor in the desert, and by Ezion-geber on the Red Sea, enabled the Jewish people to cultivate a taste for a form of luxury which was not developed in the days of Abraham and of the patriarchs. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

JEWELL (joo'el), JOHN, D.D., an eminent English prelate, was born at Buden, in Devonshire, in 1522. He was sent to Oxford at the age of thirteen, became bachelor of arts and tutor of Merton five years afterward, and subsequently professor of rhetoric at Corpus Christi College. During the early part of his university career, while Henry VIII. was still living, he was careful not to take an open or decided part in the theological controversies, though he was secretly attached to the principles of the Reformation. Upon the accession of Edward VI. he adopted a bolder line, and on the visit of Peter Martyr to Oxford he attached himself warmly to him. With the death of Edward, however, fortune again turned, and Jewell's position became one of peril. When recantation was proposed to him, he hesitated for a moment, but at length sought safety in exile. He went to Frankfurt, where he found others similarly situated with himself; thence to Strasburg, where he again met that part of the country and the regions, such as Galilee, which stood less closely connected with the capital. See JUDÆA.

JEWRY-WALL is the name of an interesting relic of Roman architecture, at Leicester, in England. Four recessed arches, about seventy-four feet long and nearly thirty feet high, remain. Formerly there were Jews' quarters in cities where they resided, and this wall no doubt adjoined the boundary of their habitations at Leicester.

JEW'S CANDLE. See JUDAS CANDLE.

JEW'S HOUSE. In castellated structures, contracted space and few accommodations were usual characteristics of the Norman style, while the windows were reduced to narrow openings. In towns and under the shelter of fortresses the dwellings of the wealthy were more decorated. A good specimen is presented in the remarkable building at Lincoln called "the Jews' house"—no doubt because of the occupancy by a wealthy Israelite. The style and size of the windows, the door and all the features of the residence indicate a sense of security and a desire for comfort which could only be attained in street architecture.

with Peter Martyr, and assisted him in some of his works. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England, and in the following year, 1559, was raised to the see of Salisbury. Jewell was a prelate of great piety and erudition, a strenuous and determined adversary of the Romish Church and an indefatigable worker, rising, it is said, at four and not retiring to rest till midnight. In his "Exposition of the Two Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians" he finds ample scope for his anti-Romanist zeal; the exposition is chiefly polemical and practical. His best-known work is the "Apology for the Anglican Church." Jewell used to say that a bishop should die preaching; and it was literally fulfilled in his own case, for he was seized with his mortal illness when on a tour in a retired portion of his diocese, and died September 21, 1571.

JEWESS (joo'ess), Acts xvi. 1; xxiv. 24, a woman of Hebrew birth.

JEWISH (joo'ish), an epithet with an unfavorable meaning, applied, Tit. i. 14, to rabbinical fables.

JEWRY (joo're), the land of Judæa, strictly so called—that is, the territory lying around Jerusalem, or the southern portions of Palestine. It is only twice so used, Luke xxiii. 5; John vii. 1, and in each case with a marked distinction between JEZANIAH (jez-a-ni'ah), Jer. xl. 8; xlii. 1. In xliii. 2 he is called Azariah. See JAAZANIAH, 1.

JEZEBEL (jez'e-bel), the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians. She was married to Ahab, king of Israel, who, weak and irresolute, yielded himself entirely to the guidance of his unscrupulous wife. Jezebel, therefore, occupies a more prominent position than any other queen of an Israelitish king. The wives of the reigning monarch are usually in the shade; the king's mother is first in influence; but Jezebel had the reins of power completely in her hand. She cut off the prophets of the Lord; she introduced the public worship of Baal, and maintained 450 prophets of Baal and 400 prophets of Astarte at her own table, 1 Ki. xvi., xviii. When, on the great day of Carmel, Ahab dared not resist the righteous vengeance which, according to the law, Elijah executed on these false prophets, Jezebel did not yield. Perhaps unable at the moment to seize Elijah, for the general voice of the people proclaimed that Jehovah was God, she sent him a defiant message, swearing by her gods that by the morrow she would take his life for the lives of her prophets, 1 Ki. xix. 1, 2. The firmness of the Tishbite failed, and he fled from Israel through Judah into the far wilderness. The evil power of Jezebel was ere long evinced again. Ahab coveted the possession of Naboth, which lay hard by the royal domain. Naboth would not part with his inheritance, and Ahab dared not seize it; and so, like a spoiled child, he lay upon his bed and would not eat. Jezebel had no scruples. She upbraided her husband for his pusillanimity, wrote at once to the elders of Jezreel, ordered them by letters, which she sealed with the king's signet, to hold a mock court on Naboth and condemn him; and when they reported to her that the deed was done, she roused her husband to go and take possession. But he met in Naboth's vineyard the awful form of Elijah, who pronounced the tremendous sentence of God on Ahab and on Jezebel, 1 Ki. xxi. 21, 22. Ahab humbled himself, but Jezebel did not. During the reign of her sons, Jezebel, though queen-mother, sinks out of sight. In Jehoram's reign her influence was evidently gone, for he, careless and ungodly as he was, yet put away the image of Baal, 2 Ki. iii. 2. But when Jehu was come to take vengeance on the house of Ahab, Jezebel was again the imperious queen of other days. She dressed herself with regal splendor, and as the chariot of Jehu rolled up to the gate of Jezreel

she flung at him a bitter taunt. Retribution was instant; she was dashed by her own chamberlains from the window, crushed under the horses' feet, and the dogs ate Jezebel in the portion of Jezreel, 2 Ki. ix. 30-37.

Her name was afterward symbolically used, Rev. ii. 23, and it is to this day used in a similar way as a word of ignominy.

JEZELUS (je-ze'lus), 1 in 1 Esd. viii. 32, for Jahaziel, Ezra viii. 5. 2 in 1 Esd. viii. 35, for Jehiel, Ezra viii. 9.

JEZER (je'tsur), one of the sons of Naphtali, Gen. xlvi. 24; Num. xxvi. 49; 1 Chr. vii. 13.

JEZIAH (je-zi'ah), one who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 25.

JEZIEL (je-zi'el), a Benjamite chief who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 3.

JEZLIAH (jez-li'ah), a Benjamite, one of those who dwelt in Jerusalem, 1 Chr. viii. 18.

JEZOAR (je-tso'ar), one of the descendants of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 7. Probably the name is really Zohar, with the conjunction.

JEZRAHIAH (jez-rah'yah), the overseer of the singers at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. xii. 42.

JEZREEL (jez're-el). 1. A name in the genealogy of Judah, probably a man, 1 Chr. iv. 3, unless some words are omitted or to be understood. 2. The symbolical name given to a child, Hos. i. 4; ii. 23. 3. A city of Lower Galilee, clearly identified with the modern village of Zer'in, which lies at the base of Gilboa, ten miles south by east of Nazareth. The site was known to the Crusaders, but has since been lost and confused with Jenin, the ancient Engannim. Jerome and Eusebius rightly place it between Legio and Scythopolis.

Jezreel is first mentioned as belonging to Issachar, Josh. xix. 18. It was part of the kingdom of Ishbosheth, though the fact of the name occurring in a list, not of towns, but of tracts of country, renders it probable that the plain, not the town, of Jezreel is intended, 2 Sam. ii. 9. But its chief importance arises from its having been the royal residence during the reigns of Ahab, Ahaziah and Jehoram, though Samaria seems still to have been the capital of the country, 1 Ki. xviii. 46; xxi. 1; xxii. 10; xxxviii. 51; 2 Ki. ix. 15; x. 1, 17. The royal palace seems to have been on the eastern side of the city, looking down the valley toward the Jordan, and probably contained the ivory house of Ahab, 1 Ki. xxii. 39, and the watchman's tower, 2 Ki. ix. 17. Near to the palace was the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, from its situation convenient as a garden of herbs to Ahab, and therefore coveted and seized by him. There are, however, two passages which might lead us to suppose that the vineyard of Naboth was at Samaria, not Jezreel. In the first of these, 1 Ki. xxi. 18, the word Samaria would seem to be put for the whole country, not for the capital city. In the other passage, 1 Ki. xxii. 38, we read one washed the chariot in the pool of Samaria and the dogs licked up his blood, whereas the prophecy of Elijah was, "In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine," 1 Ki. xxi. 19. This may be explained either by supposing Naboth to have been taken to Samaria for his trial and execution, or by adopting the reading of Josephus, "When they had washed his chariot in the fountain of Jezreel, which was bloody with the dead body of the king, they acknowledged that the prophecy of Elijah was true, for the dogs licked his blood." By this fountain of Jezreel the army of Israel pitched before the fatal battle of Gilboa, 1 Sam. xxix. 1, and it was probably near the vineyard of Naboth, for it is now to be seen on the northern base of Mount Gilboa, about a mile east of Zer'in. Dr. Robinson thus describes it: "A very large fountain flowing out from under a sort of cavern in the wall of conglomerate rock which here forms the base of Gilboa. There is every reason to regard this as the ancient fountain of Jezreel."

The modern village of Zer'in contains about twenty houses and a square tower, which may be seen from a great distance, and its immediate neighborhood has still a park-like appearance. Of its situation Dr. Robinson writes: "Zer'in itself lies comparatively high, and commands a wide and noble view, extending down the broad low valley on the east to Beisan, and to the mountains beyond the Jordan, while toward the west it includes the whole great plain quite to the long ridge of Carmel. It is a most magnificent site for a city, which, being thus a conspicuous object in every part, would naturally give its name to the whole region." Dr. Stanley writes as follows: "We see how up the valley from the Jordan Jehu's troops might be seen advancing, how in Naboth's field the two sovereigns met the relentless soldiers, how, whilst Joram died on the spot, Ahaziah drove down the westward plain toward the mountain pass by the beautiful village of Engannim (translated in Eng. version garden-house), but was overtaken in the ascent, and died of his wounds at Megiddo, how in the open place which, as usual in Eastern towns, lay before the gates of Jezreel, the body of the queen was trampled under the hoofs of Jehu's horses, how the dogs gathered round it, as even to this day in the wretched village now seated on the ruins of the once splendid city of Jezreel they prowl on the mounds without the walls for the offal and carrion thrown out to them to consume."

JEZREEL, VALLEY OF, probably signifies the branch of the plain of Esdraelon between Gilboa and El Duhy, or the Little Hermon. It is a broad deep plain about three miles across, and runs from Jezreel in an east-south-east direction to the plain of Jordan at Beisan. It was the scene of Saul's defeat and Gideon's victory, and of Jehu's encounter with Jehoram. But probably in Hos. i. 5, and certainly under its Greek form Esdraelon in the book of Judith, and in modern times, this name is given to the great plain of Central Palestine, which is called by Josephus "the great plain," and by Arabs Mirj ibn Amir, and extends from Jenin (Heb. Engannim) on the south to the hills of Nazareth on the north, and from Gilboa on the east to Carmel on the west. See ESDRAELON.

JEZREELITE (jez're-el-ite), JEZREELITESS (jez-re-el-i'tess), an inhabitant or native of Jezreel, 1 Ki. xxi. 1, 4; 2 Ki. ix. 21, 25; also 1 Sam. xxvii. 3.

JIBSAM (jib'sam), a descendant of Issachar, 1 Chr. vii. 2.

JIDLAPH (jid'laf), a son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, Gen. xxii. 22.

JIMNA, or JIMNAH (jim'nah), the eldest son of Asher, Gen. xlvi. 17; Num. xxvi. 44. He is also called Imna, 1 Chr. vii. 30.

JIMNITES (jim'nites), a family of Asher descended from Jimna, Num. xxvi. 44.

JIPHTAH (jif'ta), a city in the low country of Judah, Josh. xv. 43.

JIPHTHAHEL (jif-tah-el'), a valley, the boundary of the territories of Zebulun and Asher, Josh. xix. 14, 27. It is most probable that Jotopata, noted in the war with Vespasian, stood here, on the site of the modern Jefat.

JOAB (jo'ab). 1. The eldest of the three sons of Zeruiah, David's sister. After David's accession to the throne of Judah, the three brothers appear as heading the troops of Judah in an engagement with Abner, commander of Ish-bosheth's forces. Asahel, the youngest, was killed by Abner in self-defence, and this laid the foundation of that enmity in Joab's mind against Abner which could be satiated only with his blood, 2 Sam. ii. 12-32. After a time the opportunity presented itself. Abner made overtures to David, which the king favorably received, and means were taken to bring the rest of the tribes of Israel under his sceptre. Joab, who had been absent while Abner was at Hebron, pretended on his return that the visit was made with a treacherous object; and sending after Abner, he met and assassinated him, Abishai, it would seem, being privy to his purpose. Besides revenge for Asahel's death, Joab was actuated by ambition. If Abner brought over Israel to David, he would necessarily be captain of the host, and Joab could brook no superior. David denounced the murder, but thought himself too weak to punish it, 2 Sam. iii. 6-39.

Joab's authority was confirmed by his bold success in the capture of Zion, 2 Sam. v. 6-9; 1 Chr. xi. 4-8. He was now the undisputed commander-in-chief, in influence and power second to David only. Of course he had titles, 2 Sam. xi. 11; and of course, while in the field in the king's absence, he acted independently, 2 Sam. ii. 28; 1 Ki. xi. 16, 21. He had a staff, 2 Sam. xviii. 15, estates perhaps near Baal-hazor, 2 Sam. xiii. 23, and a house in the wilderness, 1 Ki. ii. 34. Joab took a leading part in the great wars of David's reign, especially distinguishing himself against the Ammonites and Syrians, 2 Sam. x. 6, 14. Professor Blunt, and after him Dr. Stanley, have imagined that Joab's chief power over David was acquired by his possession of the terrible secret of the monarch's adultery and murder of Uriah. But these able critics have forgotten that the most remarkable examples of Joab's unscrupulous boldness were either before that great sin or after it ceased to be a secret. From Uriah's death to Absalom's rebellion probably the matter was known to but few. And in that interval Joab was so little confident of his own influence with the king that he did not venture to propose Absalom's recall without having recourse to stratagem, 2 Sam. xiv. When David was dethroned and his concubines dishonored in accordance with Nathan's sentence, we cannot believe that there was a man in Israel who did not know the worst. Joab was faithful to David in that rebellion, but disobeyed his command to spare Absalom, and reproved his master in very uncourtly terms for his too great grief. David's feelings were, however, thoroughly aroused. He superseded Joab and appointed another nephew, Amasa, who had been Absalom's general, commander-in-chief. This appointment was evidently unpopular, and Joab took advantage of the unwillingness of the soldiery to serve under Amasa, and assassinated him as he had done Abner. Having, then, been successful against Sheba, he resumed his former post. We afterward find him remonstrating against the census, but compelled to carry out the king's commands. At the end of David's reign he supported Adonijah's claim to the throne, 1 Ki. i. 7. His evil deeds were rehearsed by David to Solomon; and on a fresh indication of Adonijah's discontent, he was put to death by Solomon. His character, ambitious, daring, unscrupulous, yet with an occasional show of piety, is sufficiently exhibited by his career. Possibly it is from him that Ataroth Beth-Joab, or the house of Joab, had its name, 1 Chr. ii. 55.

2. A name in the genealogies of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 14. 3. One whose descendants returned after the captivity, Ezra ii. 6; viii. 9; Neh. vii. 11. Perhaps the person mentioned in Ezra viii. 9 was not identical with the individual noted in the other texts.

JOACHAZ (jo-a'kaz), 1 Esd. i. 34, a name for Jehoiakim.

JOACHIM (jo-a'kim). 1. Bar. i. 3, Jehoiakim. 2. Bar. i. 7. Probably Joiakim, the high-priest, Neh. xii. 10. But if so, there is an anachronism, and additional proof is afforded of the untrustworthiness of the apocryphal book of Baruch.

JOACIM (jo-a'sim). 1. 1 Esd. i. 37-39, Jehoiakim. 2. 1 Esd. i. 43, Jahoiachin. 3. 1 Esd. v. 8, probably Joiakim, the son of Jeshua, comp. Neh. xii. 10. 4. Jud. iv. 6, 8, 14, etc., a high-priest in whose time Judith is said to have lived. 5. Hist. Sus., the husband of Susanna.

JOADANUS (jo-a-da'nus), 1 Esd. ix. 19.

JOAH (jo'ah). 1. The son of Asaph, recorder or chronicler to Hezekiah, 2 Ki. xviii. 18, 26, 37; Isa. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22. 2. A Levite of the family of Gershon, 1 Chr. vi. 21, probably the same with Ethan, 1 Chr. vi. 42. 3. A Korhite, son of Obed-edom, one of the porters, 1 Chr. xxvi. 4. 4. A Gershonite Levite who, with his son, assisted in the reforms of Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxix. 12. 5. The son of Joahaz, recorder to Josiah, 1 Chr. xxxiv. 8.

JOAHAZ (jo-a'haz), the father of Joab, recorder to King Josiah, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8.

JOAMITES (jo'am-ites), a name given to the adherents of Chrysostom during the opposition made to him at Constantinople.

JOAN D'ALBRET, known also as JEANNE D'ALBRET, queen of Navarre, was the daughter of Margaret of Valois, and mother of Henry IV., king of France and Navarre. She was married to Antoine of Bourbon, who espoused the cause of the Huguenots.

JOAN, POPE, the name of a supposed female occupant of the papal chair in the ninth century. The popular story represents this singular personage as of English parentage, but educated at Cologne, Rome, and ultimately Athens, in all which places in the assumed character of a man, and under the name of Joannes Anglicus—"John of England"—she is alleged to have attained great distinction as a scholar. The narrative adds that having come in the end to Rome, she had ability and adroitness enough to carry the deception so far as to obtain holy orders, and to rise through various gradations to the papal sovereignty itself, but that being nevertheless of immoral life, the fraud was at length discovered, to the infinite scandal of the Church.

JOAN OF ARC, the Maid of Orleans, was born in 1412, in the village of Domremy, in France. She learned neither to read nor write, but in early life was distinguished for her simplicity, modesty, industry and piety. When about fifteen years of age, she believed that she received supernatural revelations, and that unearthly voices called her to go and fight for the dauphin. Her story was at first rejected as that of an insane person, but she not only succeeded in making her way to the dauphin, but in persuading him of her heavenly mission. She assumed male attire, and with a sword and white banner, she put herself at the head of the French troops, whom she inspired with new enthusiasm. On April 29, 1429, she threw herself, with supplies of provisions, into Orleans, then closely besieged by the English, and for five days made successful sallies upon the English, which resulted in their being compelled to raise the siege, and from this time Joan became the dread of the previously triumphant English. She conducted the dauphin to Rheims, where he was crowned, and Joan, with many tears, saluted him as king. She still remained with the army, and was present in many conflicts, till, on May 24, 1430, she entered with a few troops into Compiègne, which the Burgundian forces besieged, but was taken prisoner and sold by the Burgundian officer to the English for a sum of sixteen thousand francs. Being conveyed to the English headquarters at Rouen, she was brought before the spiritual tribunal of the bishop of Beauvais as a sorceress and heretic, and condemned to death. She was subjected to great indignities, and burned at the stake May 30, 1431.

EGYPTIAN NOSE-RINGS.—See JEWELRY.

JOAN OF KENT, a celebrated English-woman who was commonly known as the Maid of Kent, was charged with heresy in 1552 for maintaining that "Christ was not truly incarnate of the Virgin, whose flesh, being sinful, he could not partake of; but the Word, by the consent of the inward man in the Virgin, took flesh of her." She was brought before a commission, and was so persistent in her refusal to recant that she was condemned to be burned to death. It is said that the young king Edward VI. for a long time refused to sign the death-warrant, and was only induced to do so through the importunity of Archbishop Cranmer.

JOANAN (jo-a'nán), 1 Esd. ix. 1. for Johanan, Ezra x. 6.

JOANNA (jo-an'na). 1. One of our Lord's ancestors, Luke iii. 27. Lord A. Hervey would identify him with Hananiah, 1 Chr. iii. 19. 2. The wife of Chuza, the steward of Herod Antipas, Luke viii. 3; xxiv. 10. She appears to have been a devoted follower of Jesus, having a place among the women who ministered to him of their substance, and who had prepared spices to anoint his body in the tomb.

JOANNAN (jo-an'nán), 1 Macc. ii. 2, the eldest son of the Maccabæan family, surnamed Caddis. He is elsewhere called John, 1 Macc. ix. 36, 38, and Joseph, 2 Macc. viii. 22.

JOARIB, 1 Macc. ii. 1, Jehoiarib, 1 Chr. xxiv. 7.

JOASH (jo'ash), contracted for JEHOASH.

1. The father of Gideon, who appears to have been a man of wealth and consideration among the Abiezrites. That he was by no means free from the prevailing idolatry of the time is clear from there being idols of Baal and Asherah on his property, but his subsequent conduct in defending his son, who broke them down, shows that he was not wedded to it, John vi.

2. A king of Judah, son of Ahaziah, and the only surviving male representative of the line of Solomon. Jehoram, his grandfather, who married Athaliah, in order to strengthen his position on the throne, slew all his brethren, and all his own sons were slain in an incursion by the Arabians, except Ahaziah, the youngest, who succeeded him, while, on the death of Ahaziah, his wicked mother Athaliah "arose and destroyed all the seed royal of the house of Judah," excepting the little child Joash, who was rescued from her grasp by Jehosh-eba, his aunt, 2 Chr. xxi. 4; xxii. 1; xxii. 10. The unholy alliances formed by the descendants of Solomon, and the manifold disorders thence accruing, in Jerusalem, not excepting Joash himself, whom they left in an enfeebled state, afterward slain by his servants. Such was the unhappy termination of a career which began with much promise of good; and the cloud under which he died even followed him to the tomb; for while he was buried in the city of David, it was not in the sepulchres of the kings of Judah. He reigned forty years, from B. C. 878-838.

3. King of Israel, son and successor of Jehoahaz. He was for a short period contemporary with Joash king of Judah, reigning from B. C. 840-825, about sixteen years. The kingdom of Israel was in a very reduced and enfeebled state at the time of his ascension to the throne, especially from the severe devastations made on it by Hazael and the repeated conquests gained by him. Joash, however, proved himself to be a person of energy; and though he still clave to the sins of Jeho-boam, one may infer from the respect he paid to Elisha that he was not so far gone from the way of holiness as either his father on the one side or his son on the other. Elisha was in extreme JOB (jōb). 1. Possibly an error for Jashub, Gen. xlv. 13. See JASHUB.

2. An eminent patriarch who resided in the land of Uz. See UZ. He was a prosperous man; his family consisted of seven sons and three daughters, and he possessed abundant wealth. He was a man, too, who feared God, and his reputation was high through the East. Satan obtained permission to try him; and first his substance was destroyed and his children perished; afterward he himself was afflicted with a grievous malady, Job i. 2. But he held fast his integrity, rebutting the unkind accusations of his friends, though unable to comprehend why he was thus dealt with. And at length the Lord appeared, restored him to more than his original wealth, surrounded him again with friends and raised him up another family, seven more sons and three fair daughters, Jemima, Kezia and Keren-happuch, ladies far renowned for their beauty, Job xlii.

Some critics have chosen to doubt Job's existence. Those, however, who are more reasonable, if they do not admit all that is recorded of him in the book bearing his name, are ready to believe that there was such a man, and that the outline at least of the history is true. Ewald has tried to separate what he supposes the real basis from embellishment and coloring, and he specifies four particulars as facts—that there was a man so called; that he had friends with the names which we find attributed to them; that Job and they lived in the region mentioned; and that Job was afflicted with elephantiasis. But if this were the whole groundwork of fact, we could by no means explain the mention of Job by Ezekiel and St. James, Ezek. xiv. 14, 16, 18, 20; James v. 11. It had been far better, had this meagre sketch been all the truth, to select other men as patterns—men whose history was unquestionable and more largely developed. But it is just for what are called the embellishments that the prophet and the apostle place Job before their readers. It is not a man whose memory could be but a fancy portrait that would be put forward as one whom God delighted to honor, and whose faith and patience believers in Christ were to follow. The reference would be nugatory had not Job really held on through a long course of unexampled afflictions, maintaining, though with human infirmity, his hope in God, and ultimately commanded to intercede for those friends with whose arguings the Lord was provoked. The words of St. James' notice are very striking. It is "the patience of Job" of which he speaks and "the end of the Lord" which he commemorates, that crowning result in which God doubled to his servant his original plenty. We must acknowledge in all this more than the bare fact of Job's existence.

Little can be said of the time when Job lived, save that it must have been at a very early period. The fact that there are no allusions to Levitical observances in the book, and the general air of antiquity pervading the manners described or referred to, are strong proofs that Job lived in remote times. He was the priest of his family, Job i. 5; his riches are reckoned by his cattle, Job i. 3; xlii. 12; comp. Gen. xii. 16; xxvi. 14; xxx. 43. Writ-had reduced everything to the verge of ruin. Measures were concerted by Jehoiada, the high-priest, for getting rid of Athaliah and placing Joash on the throne after he had attained to the age of seven; and having in his youth the wise and the faithful around his throne, the earlier part of the reign of Joash was in accordance with the great principles of the theocracy. The Lord's house was repaired and set in order, while the temple and idols of Baal were thrown down. But after Jehoiada's death persons of a different stamp got about him; and notwithstanding the great and laudable zeal which he had shown for the proper restoration of God's house and worship, a return was made to idolatry to such an extent as to draw forth severe denunciations from Zechariah the son of Jehoiada. Even this was not the worst, for the faithfulness of Zechariah was repaid with violence; he was even stoned to death, and this, it is said, at the express command of the king, 2 Chr. xxiv. 21. The martyred priest uttered, as he expired, "The Lord look upon it and require it;" and it was required as in a whirlwind of wrath. For a Syrian host under Hazael made an incursion into Judæa, and both carried off much treasure and executed summary judgment on many old age, and on his death-bed, at the time he received a visit from Joash; but the visit appears to have been marked by sincere respect on the part of the king, and to have been duly reciprocated by the prophet. A promise was given that he should smite Syria; and when, after arrows had been put into his hand to smite, and he smote only thrice, Elisha was displeased that the smiting was not more frequent, as there might then have been the assurance of greater successes over Syria, 2 Ki. xiii. 14-19. But as it was, Joash was enabled to turn the tide against Syria; and not only so, but in a conflict, which he was not the first to provoke, with Amaziah, king of Judah, he gained a complete victory, took Amaziah prisoner, went to Jerusalem and carried off immense treasure, as well as broke down 400 cubits of the wall, leaving the city in a reduced and defenceless condition. Joash seems to have died in peace, and was buried in the sepulchre of his fathers.

There were several others of less note—4. A son of Ahab, 2 Chr. xviii. 25. 5. A descendant of Shelah, 1 Chr. iv. 22. 6. A hero of Benjamin, son of Shemaiah, 1 Chr. xii. 3. 7. Another Benjaminite, son of Becher, 1 Chr. vii. 8. 8. An officer in David's household, 1 Chr. xxvii. 28.

ing also is spoken of as by sculpture, Job xix. 24. Other similar particulars might be noted, but the conclusion must still be very vague, and no exact date can be assigned.

JOB, THE BOOK OF. Various conjectures have been propounded as to the authorship of this work. It must be fully understood that, though Job himself lived in a very early age, it by no means necessarily follows that the book was written by a contemporary. So the book of Genesis, from Moses' pen, narrates events that happened long before. The guesses that have been gravely produced and defended by scholars of name are instructive as exposing the uncritical helplessness of those wise men who in these our times have undertaken to correct Moses and to teach the world how prophets and apostles ought to have written. It is with comparative sobriety that some propose Job, Elihu, Moses, Solomon, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Ezra as author; and Dr. Hengstenberg may properly fix its limits between the ages of Samuel and Isaiah, within which he thinks the work must be dated. But when others have no difficulty in coming to an exact conclusion, and require us to believe that the author was an Idumæan, a Hebrew who lived in Idumæa, an Egyptian, a Nahorite, and one sage, minutely informed of every particular, places him in the South of Judæa, near a caravan road, and says he was a citizen of Tekoah, it is difficult to refrain from wishing criticism a little more under the control of common sense. The fact simply is that on the question of authorship we must be content to remain in ignorance. The knowledge of the author affects not the place of the book in the sacred canon. The book of Job was demonstrably in the canon sanctioned by our Lord's usage.

The question whether this book is altogether real history, or rather the elaboration of a great truth from historical materials, requires some notice. Several of the most conscientious scholars have held the last-named view. They consider the dialogue between God and Satan, Job i. 6-12; ii. 1-6, as evidently figurative; they do not suppose that the artificial and highly-finished speeches of Job and his friends could have been uttered at once in the course of ordinary conversation; they think the audible interposition of the Deity not accordant with his usual modes of dealing with his creatures. It must be confessed that, provided its composition under divine guidance be allowed, the literal truth of the narrative is a subordinate question. Our Lord himself has used parables, and introduced unreal persons into his discourses. There is nothing, therefore, to shock the reverent mind in the notion of fictitious narrative being adopted as the vehicle of momentous instruction. But the extreme circumstantiality of the details, the description of the patriarch himself, his family, his property, his country, his friends, with their names and special designations, the genealogy of Elihu, the exact account of the feasting of Job's sons, the particular mention of the plunderers,—these and other similar points mark a history rather than a parable. No such minute details are found in any Scripture parable; it seems, therefore, a necessary inference that these details are not the play of fancy, but all historically true. Doubtless we are not to believe that God holds court (if the expression may be used) on certain days, when evil angels as well as fallen spirits have access to him. But in speaking of the Deity words in their proper sense applicable only to men must be employed. We may not hence entertain gross notions of him, but it is hard to see how in any other way we could be taught the perfect control in which he holds all the beings and things of the universe. And objections of the kind made to the book of Job would apply equally to other parts of Scripture. Compare, for example, the address of Micaiah to Ahab, 1 Ki. xxii. 19-23, in which he tells how a lying spirit proposed to deceive the false prophets. Then we have the still small voice, after the wind and the earthquake and the fire, sounding in Elijah's ear, 1 Ki. xix. 11-18. We are not to limit the Holy One to place or time, or to prescribe how he should make his communications to men. Dr. Kitto, again, has very well observed in reference to the elaborate character of the speeches: "Nothing is more remarkable among the Semitic nations of Western Asia, even at this day, than the readiness of their resources, the prevalence of the poetical imagination and form of expression, and the facility with which the nature of a God, and that he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him, Heb. xi. 6. These truths are variously illustrated—the creation of the world by God's power, Job x. 8; xxxviii.-xli.; the administration of it by his providence, Job v. 8-27; ix. 4-13; the existence of angels that do his will, though some of those mighty spirits are fallen, Job i. 6-12; ii. 1-6; iv. 18; xv. 14-16; xxxviii. 7; the polluted state of man, Job xiv. 4; xxv. 4-6; the need of a propitiation by sacrifice, Job i. 5; xlii. 8, 9; the future day of retribution, Job xx. 4-29; xxvii. 8; all these doctrines are set forth with more or less clearness. And if the passage, Job xix. 25-27, may be interpreted, as many critics believe it may, of the expected Redeemer, we have in it not only a Messianic promise, but also an anticipation of the resurrection of the flesh. It is fair, however, to say that some would refer this expression of hope merely to deliverance from tem-this group of languages allows all high and animated discourse to fall into rhythmical forms of expression, while the language even of common life and thought is replete with poetical sentiments and ideas."

This book gives an interesting view of religious belief in patriarchal times. It is true that some critics imagine they detect signs of a knowledge more advanced than we have reason to suppose revelation had taught in very early ages. If this notion be well founded, it may be some reason for considering the book, and perhaps the time when Job lived, not so very remote as other evidence would seem to show. Still, it can hardly be denied that, while great truths are distinctly held, the interlocutors of this poem were not advanced beyond the elementary understanding of God's plans and purposes, and that one great object of the work is to show how man in his ignorance must wait for the fuller manifestation which only the gospel has effected. The chief principles of religion which we find recognized are that there is poral distress. Throughout the book, further, there is a high-toned morality, obedience to God regarded as an imperative duty, Job xiii. 15, and brotherly-kindness inculcated by example, Job xxix., xxxi. And yet there is a great dimness in the views exhibited. The afflictions that befell Job are a problem which neither he nor his friends can solve. And when the Deity appears, he does not reveal clearly, as he does in later times, how his chastening was in wise love, a training for eternal life; he rather, by the exhibition of his majesty, enforces submission and humble acknowledgment. There was light enough to guide men in practical godliness, and promise enough to call out faith. But the promise was not fully realized, Heb. xi. 39, 40; and it was not till the glorious gospel appeared that life and immortality were actually brought to light, 2 Tim. i. 10. It is very questionable whether Job, as distinctly as Abraham, saw and rejoiced in the prospect of Messiah's day, John viii. 56.

The exact design and object of this book has not always been clearly apprehended. Dr. Hengstenberg considers that the question is "how the afflictions of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked can be consistent with God's justice. But it should be observed," he proceeds, "that the direct problem exclusively refers to the first point, the second being only incidentally discussed on occasion of the leading theme. If this is overlooked, the author would appear to have solved only one half of his problem; the case from which the whole discussion proceeds has reference merely to the leading problem." But he regards it an error to refer the whole solution to the doctrine of retribution after death. God's moral government is always in exercise, not inactive at present, to wake up hereafter. It is to be shown not merely that the ultimate result of a good man's afflictions is happy, but that, while these afflictions are needful, there is present consolation under them as they work their due effect. In the earlier dispensations such consolations depended more on external cir-those who in times immediately subsequent to its composition pondered this book. It has not lost its effect for us. We, as the apostle James admonishes, must see "the end of the Lord," and hold on in faith and patience accordingly.

Little need be said as to the nature of the poetry of this book. Some will have it an epic, some a dramatic, poem, while others class it with lyric compositions. It matters not what name be given it; it is poetry of the highest order. There is a wonderful glow of fancy and power of description, so that even if it had no higher merit it must be regarded as one of the most admirable productions of the pen. The language, it may be added, has much in it of an archaic cast.

Perhaps it may be worth while to advert to an argument sometimes taken from the book of Job against the doctrine of inspiration. It is alleged that the false assumptions of the interlocutors never could have been dictated by an infallible Intellito condole with him. The overwhelming calamities which have come upon so good a man appear to confound them. His case is contrary to all their views and maxims with respect to God's way of dealing with the righteous; and when he breaks out into the language of complaint and despair, cursing the day of his birth, and implying that God acted arbitrarily in sending afflictions, they come at once to the conclusion that, so far from being upright and holy, as they had supposed, he must be a wicked man and a hypocrite. This therefore, originates an important discussion with reference to the principles on which the divine government in this world is conducted—whether a life of piety is not invariably attended with prosperity, and whether extraordinary sufferings are not demonstrative of corresponding guilt.

Eliphaz leads the way in the argument, and is followed by his two companions. They hold that there is a strict retribution in the present life, and that it is reasonable to infer what a man's character is from the present dealings of God with him; and they insinuate that Job's extraordinary calamities must be a punishment for peculiar wickedness. They reprove him for impatience and irreverent complaints of God, and exhort him to repentance and reformation as a certain means of regaining his former prosperity.

Job replies to each of the speakers, boldly denying their charges. He maintains that God, in distributing good and evil, acts according to his sovereign pleasure, and that prosperity and adversity are no evidence of character, and appeals to indisputable facts in proof of the long life and success of the wicked. He complains bitterly of the treatment of his friends, who, instead of offering him consolation, aggravate his distress by false accusations, and expresses his earnest desire to carry his cause at once before God, in whom he still confides.

His friends are greatly offended at his sentiments, and attempt to vindicate the conduct of God toward him, repeating their charges with increasing warmth and asperity, and even accusing him of particular crimes. But the more they press their arguments, the more confidently does Job assert his innocence and appeal to God to vindicate his character, until they are reduced to silence.

Elihu then, who appears to have been an attentive listener, comes forward to reason with Job. His leading principle is that afflictions are for the good of the sufferer, and that if the afflicted hearken to the counsel which God thus sends, and turn from their sins, they will find their sufferings to be sources of great benefit. He reproves Job for justifying himself rather than God, and vindicates the character and government of the Most High. To illustrate his views, and to show the necessity of submission, he concludes with a sublime description of the greatness and majesty of God.

After this the Lord himself addresses Job, not condescending to enter into any particular explanation of his conduct, but from the consideration of his infinite and unsearchable wisdom and greatness, as seen even in the works of creation and providence, convincing Job of presumption, ignorance and guilt in arraigning the dispensations of his providence.

Job, subdued and humbled, confesses that he is vile. His confession is accepted and his general course approved. His three friends are rebuked; Job is directed to make intercession for them; and prosperity is heaped upon him more largely than ever.

THE TOWN ZER'IN, ON THE SITE OF ANCIENT JEZREEL.—See JEZREEL.

cumstances; in the New Testament they have more of a spiritual cast. Dr. Kitto, in a sensible paper, takes substantially the same view, and observes that "the book is, in fact, engaged with the great problem regarding the distribution of good and evil in the world, especially as viewed in connection with the doctrine of righteous retribution in the present life. It sets forth the struggle between faith in the perfect government of God and the various doubts excited by what it sees and knows of the prosperity of the many among those who are despisers of God. The subject thus appears to be one that comes home to men's business and bosoms. Even under the light of Christianity there are perhaps few who have not at particular seasons felt the strife between faith in the perfect government of the world and the various feelings excited in the mind by what they have experienced of human suffering." The event showed that Job's friends had judged him too soon; had he been a righteous man, his troubles, they thought, would end. They did end; and very consolatory must have been the story to gence. Of course not. There are many speeches of evil men and of the evil spirit in Scripture. God never dictated them. But he did see it good in his wisdom that they should be chronicled in the holy book for warning and instruction, and it was under the guidance of his Spirit that they were so preserved. Rightly viewed, such speeches afford not the shadow of an argument against inspiration.

ANALYSIS OF THE BOOK.—The book opens with a description of the character and sufferings of the patriarch. He is a man of large possessions, highly honored by all who know him, and of unimpeachable uprightness before God. Satan, having asserted that his religion is mere selfishness, is permitted to deprive him of his children and of all his possessions. The faith of the patriarch, however, sustains him under every trial. To the loss of property and to domestic bereavements is then added the infliction of a most painful and loathsome disease. Still Job keeps his integrity, and piously submits to God's chastening hand.

In this state of things, three of his friends come

Whilst the course and result of the argument are sufficiently clear, the object of the book has long been a subject of controversy. Perhaps the following remarks may set this in the right point of view. In asserting that the religion of one of the best of men was only a refined selfishness, "the accuser of the brethren" had impugned the fundamental principle of true piety. God, therefore, permits this to be put to the severest test by the removal of everything that could be supposed to have produced a mercenary religion, and the result is that Satan's falsehood is completely refuted. For whilst Job too passionately maintains his innocence of those egregious sins with which his friends had erroneously connected his unusual sufferings, and thus loses some of the consolation which he might have enjoyed, he is so far from turning away from God and renouncing the desire of his favor that he only asks to obtain from him a hearing, fully assured that "the Judge of all the earth" will "do right," and that it shall ultimately be well with those who trust in him, Job xix. 23-26. Herein Job speaks of him "the thing that is right," and in the end is accepted and honored as a true believer, Job xlii. 7, 8. Thus the nature and power of confiding faith in God are illustrated, and it is shown that the principle of real piety was the same under the patriarchal dispensation as under those economies which are blessed with larger revelations of the divine will.

In connection with this, believers in all ages are taught that in the most inscrutable acts of God's sovereignty his divine justice, wisdom and love are engaged. So that, however difficult it may sometimes be to discover why afflictions are sent, the righteous ought to bear them with patient resignation, and to maintain unimpaired their confidence in the all-wise Disposer of events, who sends such trials in mercy and will give to them a happy issue. "Behold," says the apostle James, "we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy."

We are also warned against hastily judging our brethren, and reminded of the bad effects of warm controversies on religious subjects. Job and his friends, though all pious men, disputed till they became angry, censured and condemned each other, departed in opposite directions from the truth and uttered many irreverent things about the divine character and government. They lost their temper, and would have lost their labor and have been more at variance than ever if the controversy had not been decided by the intervention of the highest authority.

This book also shows the opinions which prevailed in the early ages of the world on an important question connected with the divine government, which often tried the faith of believers, see Ps. lxxiii.; John ix. 2, why the good are afflicted and the wicked are often prosperous; and while we see on the one hand the great superiority of the views of divine Providence here expressed to anything which can be found in the writings of the Greek and Roman sages, we see also on the other how much cause we have for gratitude on account of the clearer and fuller revelation we enjoy.

It should be observed that, although the inspiration of the book of Job is undoubted, it is clear that when he or his friends utter erroneous opinions, or argue incorrectly by drawing wrong inferences from right principles, we are not to consider their sentiments as the voice of inspiration. Their arguments and expressions must be compared with the law of God, and with the nature of true religion as exhibited in other portions of God's word, and especially as manifested in the example and spirit of Him who was the only perfect Being who ever appeared in our nature.

JOB'S DISEASE. The opinion that the malady under which Job suffered was elephantiasis, or black leprosy, is so ancient that it is found, according to Origen's "Hexapla," in the rendering which one of the Greek versions has made of Job ii. 7. It was also entertained by Abulfeda, and in modern times by the best scholars generally. The passages which are considered to indicate this disease are found in the description of his skin burning from head to foot, so that he took a potsherd to scrape himself, Job ii. 7, 8; in its being covered with putrefaction and crusts of earth, and being at one time stiff and hard, while at another it cracked and discharged fluid, Job vii. 5; in the offensive breath which drove away the kindness of attendants, Job xix. 17; in the restless nights, which were either sleepless or scared with frightful dreams, Job vii. 13, 14; xxx. 17; in general emaciation, Job xvi. 8; and in so intense a loathing of the burden of life that strangling and death were preferable to it, Job vii. 15.

In this picture of Job's sufferings, the state of the skin is not so distinctly described as to enable us to identify the disease with elephantiasis in a rigorous sense. The difficulty is also increased by the fact that shechin is generally rendered "boils." But that word, according to its radical sense, only means burning, inflammation—a hot sense of pain which, although it attends boils and abscesses, is common to other cutaneous irritations. Moreover, the fact that Job scraped himself with a potsherd is irreconcilable with the notion that his body was covered with boils or open sores, but agrees very well with the thickened state of the skin which characterizes this disease.

In this, as in most other Biblical diseases, there is too little distinct description of symptoms to enable us to determine the precise malady intended. But the general character of the complaint under which Job suffered bears a greater resemblance to elephantiasis than to any other disease. See LEPROSY.

and that he had to contend against arrogant and erroneous teachers in the Church. It has been held that in extreme old age he died a natural death, although Polycrates, who wrote about A. D. 200, according to Eusebius, calls him Martius—"Martyr." There is little doubt but that Ignatius and Polycarp were among his personal disciples. But the story of his being thrown into a caldron of burning oil at Rome at the Latin gate, from which he came forth unharmed, and others of a similar kind, are worthy of little credit. Some of them, however, one could wish to believe; as that the apostle sought a robber chief, formerly his scholar, and melted him into repentance; and that, when through infirmity he could say nothing more, he used to reiterate in Christian assemblies the touching words, "Little children, love one another." He is believed to have died at Ephesus past the age of ninety, in the reign of the emperor Trajan. Accomplished by the special interposition of God. What was needed, however, in this respect, was not to be withheld; for while Zecharias was engaged in the presentation of incense in the temple, the angel Gabriel announced to him that his wife should bear a son, and that they should call his name John. The proper ground and reason of the procedure lay in the divine purpose to be accomplished by this offspring of Zecharias, since in him was to be found the commencement of a new era in God's dispensations, and one that should at once fulfill and antiquate the old. But this new era was to be pre-eminently the day of grace for which the people of God had been waiting in hopeful expectation—grace rising above nature, and with its God-empowered redemptive agencies working out the good which nature was altogether unable to accomplish. Hence, as here all was to be, in a manner, wonderful, and in the centre of the whole there ple, amid all their outward respect for the name and worship of God, were again in a state of alienation, and this new prophet-reformer was to have it for the main object of his striving to "turn them back to the Lord their God." In doing this he should also of necessity turn the hearts of fathers and children toward each other, so that the godly fathers should again, as it were, embrace their degenerate offspring, which is all one with saying what, indeed, is said in the explanatory clause, that he should bring "the disobedient to the wisdom of the just"—i. e., should make the disobedient children become like their just or righteous parentage. In a word, both should again become of one heart and mind, having the God of the covenant for the common object of their homage and affection.

With this high promise of future service and glory, the expected child was in due time born, and, according to the divine command, was named John. From the day of his circumcision till the period of his entering on the discharge of his reforming agency we hear nothing of him, except that "he grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts," Luke i. 80. There, doubtless, in those wild solitudes which lay around his native region in the hill country of Judæa, he nursed his soul to the holy contemplation on the state of things among his countrymen and the high calling in respect to them which the divine word had marked out for him. While still in the wilderness the Spirit of the Lord began to move him to his enterprise; there "the word of God came to him," Luke iii. 2, and he gave forth at once what he received, but in doing so naturally advanced toward the edge of the wilderness till he approached the banks of the Jordan, as thus only could he get a sufficient audience to listen to his proclamation. Even when moving thither, however, he did not altogether quit his connection with the desert; he wished and no doubt acted so as to appear still in some sense a sojourner in it; for when the authorities of Jerusalem were startled by the excitement he was raising and sent to inquire what he said of himself, he gave answer, in the words of Isaiah, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord," etc. His appearance in such a place was itself a sign, the natural wilderness being intended to serve as a symbol of the moral condition of the people, with whom all, in a manner, lay desert—no spiritual highways for the Lord to move up and down in, no fields of righteousness from which he might receive the fruit he desired to reap. It was Heaven's voice, indeed, that cried in him, but it cried as in a waste, howling wilderness; therefore cried, in loud and earnest peals, that men would repent and prepare to meet their God. With this, also, corresponded his dress, which was made of camel's hair and girt about with a leathern girdle—the coarsest attire, the garb of penitents, 1 Ki. xxi. 27—and his food locusts and wild honey, the spontaneous products of waste or uncultivated places, the diet of one who was keeping, as far as possible, a continual fast, Matt. iii. 4. As John's earnest cry was a call to repent, so his appearance and mode of life were a kind of personified repentance; and if the people had understood aright, and responded to his mission, they would have conformed themselves to the type and pattern which they saw in him. This, however, was what few comparatively did, and even they in a very imperfect manner.

One can easily conceive how the singularity of John's appearance, the earnestness of his manner, and, above all, the solemn announcement he made, that the kingdom of heaven was at hand,

According to Jerome, he was a hundred years old, and according to Guidas a hundred and twenty. There is a strange tradition that he wore on his forehead a golden plate with the sacred name upon it. We may perhaps infer from Scripture that John was not married, but no doubt the accounts of his ascetic mode of life are exaggerated.

JOHN THE BAPTIST was the son of Zecharias and Elisabeth, who were both of the house of Aaron, Luke i. 5, and both distinguished for their God-fearing disposition and upright character. They were well advanced in life before they appear on the stage of gospel history, in addition to which Elisabeth was barren; so that if any child was now to proceed from them it could only be ac-was to appear the greatest of all wonders—the incarnation of the Son of God—a divine wonder fitly opened the series, in the birth of him who was to herald the new era, the son of a barren mother and of parents both already stricken in years.

It was John's singular honor to have been made, ages before his birth, the subject of prophecy, Mal. iv. 5, 6, and in respect to the purpose for which he was announced placed in such close juxtaposition with the Lord of glory. But the reverse of honor was implied in that purpose, as regards the generation for which and among which he was to appear, since it betokened their general and deep-rooted alienation from God. His relation to Elias should have put this beyond a doubt, and made it patent to all, for Elias was the great prophet-reformer, whose whole striving was directed to the object of reclaiming a backslidden people to the worship and service of Jehovah.

Such, precisely, was the work to which the son of Zecharias was destined. The hearts of the peowould strike an awe into men's minds, and raise a deep wave of religious feeling through the community. Such evidently was the case, and as men's acquaintance with John grew, and they saw more distinctly into the nature of his aims and operations, their interest and concern would be the more profoundly awakened. For they could not but perceive a terrible energy in his words; what he spake must have rung almost like the knell of doom in their ears. The time, he said, was gone for fair pretexts and hypocritical observances; now all worldliness, and Pharisees made for the moment to feel the insufficiency of their outward observances; so that John himself seemed astonished at the anxiety that was evinced and the kind of persons who applied to him, Matt. iii. 7.

The temporary success which attended John's mission produced no undue elation in his own mind; like a divinely taught man, he kept steadfastly to his proper place and work. When the people began to doubt whether he might not be himself the long-expected Messiah, and the author-self, he meekly acquiesced in the result, and even expressed his joy on account of it, as seeing therein the great end of his mission reaching its accomplishment, John iii. 26-36. By the time this circumstance had occurred he had moved considerably upward from the region where he commenced his ministry, and was probably either within the bounds of Galilee or in the immediate neighborhood. He is said to have been at Ænon, near to Salem or Salim, the exact position of which, however, is uncertain. But that his ministry actually must be matter of stern reality, since the Lord himself was presently to appear, with supreme authority and prompt decision, to deal with all according to their real state, and either to draw them to himself in love or cast them from him as refuse. In further proof of his sincerity, and as indicative of the greatness of the crisis that had arrived, John came not only preaching these stirring doctrines, but sealing them by an appropriate ordinance, the baptism of repentance. The result was that the people's hearts were everywhere moved, and from all parts of Judæa, including Jerusalem, they flocked to Jordan, and were baptized confessing their sins. Sadducees were shaken from their ities at Jerusalem sent a formal message of inquiry to learn who he was, he announced in the most explicit manner that he was but a servant and forerunner of Him who was to come, unworthy even to loose or to bear his shoes. When Jesus presented himself at Jordan for baptism, John, with a becoming consciousness of his own inferiority, though still without any certain assurance of the proper Sonship of Jesus, sought, as unworthy, to be excused from the service, John i. 31; Matt. iii. 14. And when, after having received such assurance, and publicly pointed out Jesus to his followers as the coming Saviour, he heard that the multitudes were by and by crowding to Jesus rather than to him-extended to the precincts of Galilee, and that some of his more regular disciples were gathered thence, we know from the account in St. John's Gospel, ch. i. 29-43; and also from the fact of his imprisonment by Herod Antipas, which implied his having come within the bounds of Herod's jurisdiction. He must, therefore, have ultimately extended his labors into Galilee, or have passed into Peræa, on the farther side of Jordan, near the southern extremity of the Lake of Galilee. His imprisonment was the starting-point of our Lord's more public career, and in part also the reason of Galilee being chosen for the more peculiar theatre of its operations; when the herald was silenced, the Master himself took up the word, and carried it onward to the higher stages of development. But John must previously have labored for some time in Galilee or its neighborhood, and produced there also a deep wave of religious feeling, otherwise he could never have gained the estimation in which he was there held, and the profound respect entertained toward him by such a man as Herod. For we are told that "Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man, and an holy, and observed him; and when he heard him he did many things and heard him gladly." He would not, however, do the one thing, which John doubtless pressed upon him as most especially requiring to be done, if Herod would attain to the character and position of a true penitent—namely, dissolve his adulterous connection with Herodias, his brother Philip's wife. But to press this was to touch upon the tender point which Herod and his guilty partner could not bear to be named; and John presently found that as he was the new Elias, so he had to confront a new Ahab and Jezebel, who would seek to do with him as they might list. Accordingly, he was cast into prison, probably at the instigation of Herodias, who was not even satisfied with this measure of violence, but watched her opportunity to consummate the matter by getting Herod in an unguarded moment committed to the execution of John. This she found on the occasion of Herod's birthday, and through the instrumentality of her daughter, who won so much upon the favor of Herod by her dancing as to obtain the promise from him of whatsoever she should ask. At the instigation of her mother she asked and received the head of the Baptist, Matt. xiv. 6-11; Mark vi. 21-28. Josephus says, and it is the general belief, that the castle of Machærus, which stood in Peræa, toward the extreme south-east of the district, and not very far from the top of the Dead Sea, was the place of John's confinement and death. The precise period, either of his imprisonment or of his death, cannot be ascertained. It seems plain that all the events and discourses related in the Gospel of Matthew, from ch. iv. 12 to the commencement of ch. xiv., lay between the one and the other; and this included the calling and appointment of the twelve apostles, partly preceded and partly followed by an extensive missionary tour through the synagogues and towns of Galilee, ch. iv. 17-25; the delivering of the sermon on the mount, followed by a series of miraculous cures, and a visit to the farther side of the lake; another series of discourses and miracles, followed by a second extensive tour through the cities of Galilee, with much teaching in the synagogues, ch. ix.; the sending forth of the twelve on their separate missionary tour, ch. x.; the message from John himself, and the discourses to which it gave rise, ch. xi.; the return of the disciples, with many transactions and discourses ensuing, and in particular the formal commencement of speaking in parables, ch. xii., xiii. Looking simply at the variety and fullness of the evangelical narrative, stretching between the two events, the natural conclusion is that John's imprisonment must have lasted several months, and may even have continued for the best part of a year. By comparing Matt. xiv. 15-21 with John vi. 4, it would appear that the execution of John took place shortly before the passover which preceded the one at which our Lord suffered, so that very little more than a year must have elapsed between the two deaths.

The manner of John's death is on no account to be regarded as throwing a depreciatory reflection on his position and ministry. He was, as Christ himself testified, "a burning and a shining light," John v. 35; and with one slight exception, he fulfilled his arduous course in a truly noble and valiant spirit. The exception referred to was the message he sent from his prison to Jesus, asking whether Jesus was he that should come or they should still look for another. The question has appeared so unsuitable for John that a large proportion of commentators from the earliest times have thought that it must have been suggested by John's disciples, and that for their satisfaction, rather than his own, he agreed to send it. But there is nothing of this in the narrative. The disciples are expressly said to have been sent by John on this errand; or, as it is still more explicitly given in what appears to be the correct reading of Matt. xi. 2, "he sent through" his disciples. The occasion also which is represented as having led to the sending—namely, John's having heard in prison of the wonderful works of Jesus—connects it with a peculiarity in his condition, not theirs.

ST. JOHN THE APOSTLE.

And then the specific and personal form given to our Lord's reply, "Go and tell John the things which ye do see and hear," fixes the matter as distinctly upon him as it is possible for language to do. By sending such a message, however, John had not lost his confidence in Jesus as the great representative of Heaven whose coming he had heralded; the very application to him for an authoritative direction betokened the reverse; but he could not understand how, while such mighty works were showing themselves forth in him, there should be so little seen of that decisive action on the side of righteousness and against iniquity which John had been led by the writings of Malachi and by his own spiritual insight to connect with the coming Messiah. Manifestly, it was from no want of power that the work was not done; why, then, did it not appear? Might there not be still some other and future manifestation of the Holy One to be looked for? In short, the Baptist had been fixing his eye too exclusively on one aspect of the Lord's work, and overlooking others which required equally to be taken into account. He hence got bewildered in his views, and received from Christ a message in reply which was exactly fitted to rectify them; since it reminded him of things being in progress which ancient prophecy had distinctly associated with Messiah's agency, and of the necessity of allowing him who had so great a work to do to take his own way of doing it: "Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me." But lest those around should, from what John did, or what our Lord said in reply, take up disparaging views of this great messenger of Heaven, Jesus proceeded in very strong and animating language to discourse to the people concerning him, and declared him to be not only a true prophet of God, but greater even than a prophet in the ordinary sense, the greatest that up till his time had been born of woman, because standing the nearest in his work and calling to the Lord himself. Yet still only relatively greatest, for the very circumstance which raised him above those who had gone before—his proximity to Christ—depressed him in respect to those who were to follow, so that the least, or rather the comparatively little, in the kingdom of heaven should be greater than he who stood only at its threshold. Knowing more and receiving more of Christ and his glorious work, they should stand higher in the endowments and privileges of grace. Viewed thus, the circumstance which at first sight appears so strange is perfectly explicable. And though it does involve a certain weakness or defect, in respect to John's apprehension of divine things, yet not more certainly than appeared for a time in the apostles themselves, who were relatively greater than he, Matt. xvi. 21, etc.; and it leaves untouched his integrity and honor as a special messenger of Heaven, in whom and in whose work divine wisdom was justified.

JOHN, THE EPISTLES OF. There are three Epistles ascribed to St. John.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the first Epistle proceeded from the beloved disciple. There is abundant external evidence. Thus, a passage in it, 1 John iv. 3, is cited by Polycarp, St. John's disciple; and, indeed, the universal voice of antiquity agrees in maintaining its canonicity. The internal evidence is equally conclusive, so that, in confidently ascribing this work to the author of the fourth Gospel, Dr. Alford says, "To maintain a diversity of authorship would betray the very perverseness and exaggeration of that school of criticism which refuses to believe, be the evidence never so strong."

Some have imagined this not properly an Epistle, but rather a treatise supplementary to the Gospel; the answer to which is that the Gospel is obviously complete, and needed no such appendix. There has also been a notion that it was directed to the Parthians. This, however, is groundless; it is a letter addressed generally to a cycle of churches mainly consisting of Gentile converts, among whom the apostle had labored, and with whose spiritual condition he was intimately acquainted. It was designed to certify them of the reality of the things they believed, to guard them against erroneous and licentious tenets, and to animate them to communion with God and to a holy life. It is characterized by artless and loving simplicity, blended with singular modesty and candor, together with a wonderful sublimity of thought. It is the production of an aged man, and, as presupposing an acquaintance with Christian doctrine, was probably written after the Gospel. Nothing more precise can be said as to the date.

Various arrangements of the subject-matter have been proposed. Thus the Epistle has been distributed into six sections. I. An assertion of the true divinity and humanity of Christ, urging the union of faith and holiness of life as necessary to the enjoyment of communion with God, ch. i. 1-7. II. The announcement that all have sinned, with an explanation of Christ's propitiation for sin. Hence the marks of true faith are exhibited, obedience to God's commandments and love to the brethren, the love of the world being inconsistent with the love of God, ch. i. 8-ii. 17. III. Assertion, in opposition to false teachers, that Jesus is the same with Christ, ch. ii. 18-29. IV. The privileges of true believers, their consequent happiness and duties, and the marks by which they are known to be the sons of God, ch. iii. V. Criteria by which to distinguish Antichrist and false Christians, ch. iv. VI. Exhibition of the connection between faith in Christ, regeneration, love to God and his children, obedience to his commandments and victory over the world, with a declaration that Jesus Christ is truly the Son of God, able to save, and to hear and answer prayer, ch. v. 1-16. The concluding summary shows how inconsistent a sinful life is with true Christianity, asserting the divinity of Christ, and cautioning against idolatry, ch. v. 17-21.

Another division has been made by Dusterdieck, which is substantially adopted by Dr. Alford. Besides the introduction, ch. i. 1-4, he distinguishes into two great parts, each pervaded by a master-thought, and both tending to illustrate the leading subject of the whole, viz., fellowship with God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ: I. Ch. i. 5; ii. 28, the theme being "God is light;" II. Ch. ii. 29-v. 5, the theme being "God is righteous." The conclusion begins with ch. v. 6. It is in two portions, ch. v. 6-12, 13-21, both serving to bring the whole to its full completion, and (so to speak) to set it at rest: "Jesus is the Son of God."

It is necessary to add a brief notice of the disputed clause, "in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth," ch. v. 7, 8. The proofs relied on in favor of it are that it has (1) external evidence, for it is found in the old Latin version, and in most manuscripts of the Vulgate, in the confession of faith and liturgy of the Greek Church, in the primitive liturgy of the Latin Church, and in citations by Latin Fathers; also (2) internal evidence, for the connection requires it, also the grammatical structure of the Greek, especially the right doctrine of the Greek article; it is said, further, that the mode of thinking it exhibits is peculiar to St. John, and that its omission, if genuine, could be more easily accounted for than its insertion, if spurious. On the other hand, (1) it is not found in a single genuine Greek manuscript earlier than the fifteenth century, nor is it admitted into the best critical editions of the New Testament; it occurs in no other ancient version than the Latin, and not in the best manuscripts of that; it is cited by no Greek Father, even when it would have seemed most natural to cite it; and as to the Latin Fathers, the earliest real citation (though this is not without suspicion) is that by Vigilius in the fifteenth century; and where it appears in the liturgies, it is a late interpolation. (2) Again, it is argued that the words are alien from the context and in themselves incoherent, betraying therefore another hand. Internal evidence, even if it were thought favorable to the clause, must here give way. Internal evidence may show that a passage is spurious when external evidence is in its favor, but no amount of internal evidence can prove a passage genuine when external evidence is plain against it. That is the case here; and accordingly scholars have with almost one consent pronounced against the clause in question. But it is well to mark that its rejection neither does nor can diminish the force of evidence which other undisputed passages of holy writ afford for the doctrine of the Trinity.

The second and third Epistles of St. John may be considered together. They are clearly from the same pen. Eusebius classed them among the disputed books; he, however, himself received them. They were probably not included in the Peshito-Syriac version. Yet many of the very early Christian writers cite or allude to them; we may therefore say that there is evidence sufficient to prove their authority, and that the reason of their being at first questioned was the fact that they were addressed to private individuals, less likely, therefore, to attract notice than if they had been sent to a community or church. There is no force in the argument that the writer, by calling himself "the elder," meant to show that he was not the apostle John, comp. Philem. 9; 1 Pet. v. 1.

As to the date or place of writing, it is useless to say more than that probably they were composed when St. John was residing at Ephesus, toward the close of his life.

The second Epistle is addressed to a lady, "the elect lady" in our translation. Possibly one or other of the words used may be a proper name, and the lady in question be either "the elect Kyria" or "the lady Electa." She is commended for her piety, and warned against the delusions of false teachers, the commandment of Christian love being also pressed upon her.

The third Epistle is directed to Gaius, or Caius. The name was a very common one, and it is impossible to say whether the person here intended was one of those mentioned elsewhere, Acts xix. 29; xx. 4; Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14. The scope of the letter is to commend his steadfastness in the faith and his hospitality, to caution him against Diotrophes, and to recommend Demetrius to him, reserving other matters to a personal interview.

For an account of St. John's other work which has a place in the sacred canon, see REVELATION, THE BOOK OF.

JOHN, THE GOSPEL OF. This, which occupies the fourth place among the Gospels in our Bibles, was, we cannot doubt, chronologically the last of them.

Some attempts have been made by modern critics to prove that this work was not from the pen of the apostle John. They have chosen to suppose that there was an irreconcilable difference between the Gentile and the Jewish types of Christianity represented by Paul and Peter respectively, and certain books of the New Testament they think were written to bridge over this difference. The fourth Gospel they consider one of them, and they have invented in their wisdom the hypothesis that about the middle of the second century a Gentile Christian composed it under the name of the apostle to recommend love as higher than faith, and to show how the Jewish system was fulfilled in Christ, the true paschal lamb. The Church, according to their notion, was easily deceived, and hailed the production as the genuine work of St. John. But surely most men will think that it is the critics who are credulous and easily deceived; for, to glance at the external evidence, not only have we the testimony of Jerome and Eusebius in the fourth century after Christ, but in the beginning of the third and end of the second we find the leading writers in various parts of the Christian world recording their belief of the authenticity of St. John's Gospel. Of these Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and Irenæus may be specified. The last-named writer, in whose lifetime the forgery, if real, must have been committed, was acquainted with the state of the Church in the East and the West; he had known Polycarp, St. John's disciple, and may therefore be taken as a most competent witness. Now, he declares that in his time the fourth Gospel was universally received, and has an argument about the four Gospels—just so many and no more—being the necessary pillars of the truth.

How is this compatible with the theory that the work had just been fraudulently concocted? There are yet earlier testimonies. Justin Martyr, born in St. John's lifetime, about 89 A. D., quotes this Gospel. Further, it is found in the Peshito-Syriac version and in the Muratorian canon, and additional proof may be obtained even from the early heretics. More it is impossible to say on this part of the question here, but it may fairly be asked, in the words of an able critic, "if it was possible for a history of Christ falsely pretending to be from the pen of the apostle John to be brought forward twenty, thirty or forty years after his death, and be introduced into all the churches East and West, taking its place everywhere in the public services of Sunday? Was there no one to ask where this new Gospel came from and where it had lain concealed? Was there no one of the many who had personally known John to expose the gigantic imposture, or even to raise a note of surprise at the unexpected appearance of so important a document, of which they had never heard before? How was the populous church at Ephesus brought to accept this work on the very spot where John had lived and died?"

We may reasonably conclude from a consideration of the external evidence that fraud was a moral impossibility. This conclusion is strengthened by a view of the internal evidence. For there are repeatedly assertions made that John was the author, John xix. 35; xxi. 24; and even if we admit, as has been imagined, that the last chapter is a later appendix, the testimony is not thereby weakened. There is also the graphic minuteness of detail, with the many touches clearly indicative of an eye-witness, of which xiii. 22 may be taken as an example. The structure of this Gospel, too, is far different from what we should suppose a forger would have devised. The variations from the other Gospels bespeak an independent witness. A forger would have servilely followed them, and the wonderful discourses recorded of our Lord, the loftiness of his character portrayed, the emphatic maintaining of his deity, are all such as the beloved disciple, looking back under the light of Christ's glorification to the days and months of his familiar earthly converse with him, may well be supposed to have most diligently pondered, and to have been most anxious to record for the Church's guidance and consolation, while a forger would have been utterly incompetent for such a delineation, and his attempt would have proved a glaring failure. Indeed, looking only at this book as a composition, and discovering the master-hand that penned it, we may well ask if St. John was not the author, who was that greater than St. John who has produced such a marvelous work and yet has left no name or trace of his existence? Besides, from its tone and character, it is incredible that it should have been composed in the second century. Let any one who doubts this, read along with it the apostolic and immediately succeeding Fathers, and see the mighty difference between them and this writer. It is indeed alleged that the very sublimity of this Gospel places it at a distance from three preceding ones, so that, if they be accepted, it could not proceed from one of the same company of Christ's immediate followers. To argue this question at length would be impracticable here; it must suffice to say that it has been most satisfactorily handled and the objection proved to be without weight. Dean Alford, Dr. Westcott, Professor Fisher and other able commentators have exhaustively discussed the question and irrefutably proven its author to have been "the disciple whom Jesus loved."

The date of this Gospel has been variously assigned, and it is questioned whether it was written at Ephesus or at Patmos. The former supposition is the more probable. Dr. Alford places its composition loosely between the years 70 and 85 A. D.; others bring it down as late as 96 or 97.

JOHN THE BAPTIST PREACHING IN THE WILDERNESS.

The Gospel of St. John may be considered in some measure supplementary to the other three. Some critics, indeed, are disposed to deny that this evangelist was acquainted with the works of the rest. But there is a great antecedent improbability in this. Surely we must suppose them welcomed by the Church. They would soon circulate through Palestine and Asia Minor. It would be strange indeed if, after the lapse of several years, they never reached the hands of St. John, resident in one of these countries. And though some of the events narrated by the other evangelists are given also by John, yet there are omissions in his work

—a notice of the transfiguration, for instance—for which it is hard to account if he was not aware that this had been already chronicled. But his Gospel is not a mere supplement. It had a great object—the revealing to the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ, in his most deep and solemn teaching and in the mystery of his person. Errors, too, were creeping in, and found encouragement among the motley population of Ephesus, where doctrinal truth had to contend with Jewish prejudice and heathen philosophy and luxurious idolatry. Cerinthus was one of the heretics who was corrupting the faith. He was a Jew imbued with Alexandrian philosophy, and he devised a monstrous combination of Christianity with Jewish and Gnostic ideas. He taught that the most high God dwelt in a remote heaven with certain spirits or æons, and that he was unknown before our Lord's appearance; that he generated an only-begotten, who begat an inferior, the Word; that there were two high æons, Life and Light, to whom Christ was inferior; that from the invisible æons lower orders of spirits proceeded; that one of these, Demiurgus, ignorant of the true God, created the visible world out of eternal matter and was the God of the Israelites, his laws being intended to be of perpetual obligation; that Jesus was but a man on whom the æon Christ descended at his baptism, endowing him with supernatural powers; that the æon Light had similarly entered John the Baptist; that it was Jesus who at the instigation of the Jewish deity, whom he opposed, alone died, the æon Christ ascending up on high, but that he will return, be reunited to Jesus and reign in Palestine a thousand years, bestowing on his disciples exquisite sensual delights. Some have imagined that Cerinthus borrowed his terms from this Gospel. Whether this were so, or whether John intended to refute the heretic, he manifestly has refuted the errors of Cerinthus and of Gnosticism in its widest sense, "in its Ebionitish form, as denying the divinity and pre-existence of Christ, and in its Docetic, as denying the reality of his assumption of the human nature."

This Gospel was written in Greek of considerable purity; its style is characterized by unaffected simplicity and tenderness. It exhibits a regular plan, so that the treatment of the subject satisfies the conditions of variety, progress and completeness, which, when combined with the essential nature of the subject itself, make up the notion of a true epic. Various distributions of the matter have been proposed. Mr. Westcott gives an elaborate plan, Bengel has a very good one, Dr. Alford adopts that of Luthardt, while of Lampe's the following is a very condensed sketch:

- A. The prologue, John i. 1-18.
- B. The history, John i. 19-xx. 29, including—
 - (a). Various events in connection with various journeys.
 1. John i. 19-ii. 12.
 2. John ii. 13-iv.
 3. John v.
 4. John vi.
 5. John vii.-x. 21.
 6. John x. 22-42.
 7. John xi. 1-54.
 8. John xi. 55-xii.
 - (b). History of Christ's death, John xiii.-xx. 29, comprising—

1. Preparation for the passion, John xiii-xvii.
 2. The circumstances of the passion and death, John xviii, xix.
 3. The resurrection and the proofs of it, John xx. 1-29.
- C. The conclusion, John xx. 30-xxi.
1. Scope of foregoing history, John xx. 30, 31.
 2. Confirmation by additional facts, and the testimony of the elders of the Church, John xxi. 1-24.
 3. Reason of the termination of the history, John xxi. 25.

It must be added that the closing chapter was probably added as a kind of appendix at a later date, and we may well believe by the apostle himself. Also there is a section, John vii. 53-viii. 11, which has occasioned much discussion. It is not easy to decide on it. It is found, but not in exactly the same words, in some good manuscripts and important early versions. Bishop Ellicott expresses his belief that it is not from St. John's pen; he would rather ascribe it to St. Luke, and observes that it cannot be too strongly impressed on the general reader that no reasonable critic throws doubt on the incident, but only on its present place in the sacred narrative.

JOHN. 1. ÆGEATES (ay-jay'a-tay), has been considered the author of an ecclesiastical history which began with the incidents of the Council of Ephesus at which Nestorius was condemned in 431, and in five books reached to 477. It is well known that the history of Socrates closes at the Council of Ephesus, and that Evagrius began his work as a continuation; and it is probable that John of Ægæ began at the same date, but the period to which he carried his narrative is unknown.

2. AGRICOLA. See AGRICOLA, JOHANN.

3. ALASCO. See ALASCO, JOHN.

4. THE ALMSGIVER, was a native of Cyprus, born in 550. He was of elevated rank, but on the death of his wife he sold his property and gave his wealth to the poor. His fame for piety, benevolence and ascetic habits became so great that in A. D. 606 he was raised to the dignity of a patriarch. The invasion of Chosroes II. into the Roman possessions filled Alexandria with homeless, destitute refugees, who found in him a liberal benefactor. So, also, his benevolence was equally great on the fall of Jerusalem in A. D. 619, when he interfered to save captives and provide for the misery of those who suffered by the siege. Next year he left Alexandria in view of the approach of the Persians, and settled in Cyprus, where he died. When the celebrated "Hospitallers" were founded, they were called "The Knights of St. John," after this man.

5. OF ANTIOCH, who became patriarch about 427, figured conspicuously in the Nestorian controversy. He at first espoused the cause of Nestorius, and at the Council of Ephesus influenced the Eastern bishops in his behalf; but when he found that the followers of Cyril were gaining favor at the court of the emperor Theodosius, he renounced his former position, and also induced the Eastern bishops in several provincial councils to declare against his former friend. It has even been asserted that it was through his influence the emperor condemned Nestorius to perpetual banishment. He died about 442. He wrote "Epistles Concerning the Nestorian Controversy," as well as several other works.

6. ARCHAPH (ar'kaf), became famous as a determined opponent of Athanasius. He was the leader of the party who falsely accused Athanasius of having murdered Arsenius, a Melitian bishop, who had been secreted to give color to the charge. He failed in his object, professed sorrow for his conduct, but ere long he was cast out of the church for his divisive, distracting conduct. In 335 the enemies of Athanasius prevailed at the Council of Tyre, but the emperor, who had banished Athanasius into Gaul, determined to get rid of John also because of his turbulence in Egypt, and in 336 he was exiled, but the place of his banishment is not known, and no record remains of his subsequent career.

7. ARGYROPULUS (ar-gi-ro-peu'lus), was a presbyter of Constantinople, and on the capture of that city in A. D. 1453 he fled into Western Europe. He chose Italy as his residence, having visited that country before. To this man great credit is due for the share which he had in reviving learning in the Cordova, Ubeda, Montilla and Bæza. After twenty years of feeble health, he died at Montilla in 1569. He left a work called "Spiritual Epistles," which has been translated into several languages.

9. BAPTIST, who became distinguished as a Romish missionary in the East during the early part of the present century, was a native of France. He accompanied the bishop of Adran, who went to Cochin China with Gya-Long, the son of the emperor, who had visited France. After promoting the interests of the Church of Rome for several years, on the death of Gya-Long in 1819 he was obliged to leave the country, and he settled at Macao, where he died in 1847.

10. OF BASSORA, so called because he was bishop of Bassora from A. D. 617 till A. D. 650, is chiefly known in consequence of one of the liturgies having been called after him, and by many he was reputed its author.

JOHN THE BAPTIST IN PRISON.

West. He became the tutor of Lorenzo de Medici in Greek philosophy and ethics, and afterward, under the patronage of Lorenzo, he presided over an academy in which the language and the learning of the Greeks were taught to the rising Italian youths. Besides commentaries on philosophical works, he wrote on the "Procession of the Holy Spirit," and he prepared a version of "The Predicables of Porphyry and the Homilies of Basil." The date of his death is uncertain, but he was living in 1478, when Theodore Gaza died.

8. OF AVILA, was born about the year 1500, in the province of Toledo, became celebrated as the apostle of Andalusia. So famous was he as a preacher, that he fell under the suspicion of the Inquisition, and for a time he lay in prison. He aimed at the exaltation of the Virgin Mary, and he had so great success that high honors were offered to him. He was detained by failing health from attending the Council of Trent. Among the most eminent of his labors was the system of schools which he established at Granada, Seville,

11. OF BEVERLY. See BEVERLY, JOHN OF.

12. BURIDANUS (beu-re-dah'nus), holds a prominent place in the great controversy between the nominalists and the realists. He was born in Artois in the fourteenth century, and he had, as is believed, the celebrated Occam as his master. In the university of Paris he rose to great eminence; and after holding the position of rector until the realists had triumphed, he retired, and took part in founding the university of Vienna. He was an able dialectician, wrote on logic and on free will, holding that the mind chooses the greater apparent good. To him the celebrated puzzle has been attributed about the ass starving between two bundles of hay, but there is no trace of it in his collected works, which have frequently been published in folio.

13. CHRYSOSTOM. See CHRYSOSTOM.

14. IV., PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, was appointed patriarch in 712, on account of his agreement with the emperor in his monothelite opinions, and in rejecting the authority of the sixth Œcumenical Council. John was deposed not long after his elevation, in consequence apparently of the deposition of his imperial patron.

15. OF CORNWALL, who was a theologian of the twelfth century, and who had studied under Peter Lombard, was claimed by both France and England. He is chiefly to be remembered because of his work on the human nature of Christ, in which he refuted a heresy of his day which held that his humanity was but an accidental form of his nature.

16. OF CREMA, a cardinal of the twelfth century who was sent to England to promote celibacy among the English clergy. The anecdote which Lea, in his "History of Celibacy," records of him shows how thoroughly he was qualified for his mission: "After fiercely denouncing the concubines of the priests, and expatiating on the burning shame that the body of Christ should be made by one who had just left the side of a harlot, he was that very night surprised in the company of a courtesan, though he had on the same day celebrated mass." He labored to secure the election of Innocent II.; and failing a grateful support for his services, he joined Anacletus, the rival pope.

17. OF DAMASCUS. See DAMASCENUS, JOHANNES.

18. OF DARA, was a bishop of Mesopotamia. He has been placed by historians in the fourth, sixth, seventh and eighth centuries, but he really belonged to the ninth. Three of his works are in the Vatican library, the most valuable being that which treats on "The Resurrection of the Body."

19. DE DIEU (deh-dew'), the founder of the Order of Charity, was born in Portugal, in 1495. He was stolen by a priest from his father's home and afterward left to poverty. After wandering about in misery and living in extreme asceticism and self-mortification, he founded his order, which Pius V. acknowledged in 1572, and placed under the rules of the Augustinians.

20. OF DRÄNDORF, was one of the most eminent of the men in Germany who labored to promote a reform in the Church before the Reformation. At Dresden, Prague and Leipzig he studied with great earnestness; and his views becoming known, he was refused admission to the ranks of the clergy. He traversed Germany and Bohemia, calling for reform, until he was seized by the civil authorities and held for judgment by the faculty of the university that had condemned Jerome and Huss. The trial took place in February, 1425, and ended in the condemnation of Drändorf, who was given to the flames at Worms as a heretic.

21. DUNS SCOTUS. See DUNS SCOTUS.

22. OF EGYPT, a martyr who suffered in the beginning of the fourth century, in the severe persecution under Diocletian. He had lost his eyesight, but he was enabled by a retentive memory to repeat whole books of Scripture. After inhuman and protracted sufferings he was beheaded, along with several others, by order of Maximin Daza, the governor of the eastern provinces, A. D. 311.

23. Missionary bishop of Ephesus, was a native of Syria, and was born about 591. The early portion of his life was spent principally at Constantinople, where he was held in great favor by the emperor Justinian, who commissioned him to secure the conversion of the heathen, both in Constantinople and in foreign parts. The success of his missionary efforts is attested by the fact that during a missionary journey through the empire he established nearly one hundred churches. Under the emperor Justin II. he shared in the persecutions inflicted upon the Monophysites.

The time and manner of his death are not definitely known. He wrote an "Ecclesiastical History," embracing the period between the founding of the Roman empire and the year 571. Of this work only a small and fragmentary portion has been preserved.

24. OF FALKENBERG (faul'ken-berg), was a member of the Dominican order, and a determined supporter of Gregory XII. at the Council of Constance. He became involved in trouble because of a libel which he wrote against the king of Poland. Being imprisoned, he succeeded in escaping before the sentence of drowning was inflicted on him, and after a sojourn in the convent of Kämpfen he was permitted to attend the celebrated Council of Basle in 1431, about which time he appears to have died.

25. OF GISCALA, or GISCHALA (gis'ka-la),

ST. JOHN, THE BAPTIST.

From the statue by Jacob Sansovino.

was a prominent leader of the Jews in the final great struggle with the Romans. He was a rival of Josephus, who was a determined opponent, and who writes with great bitterness against him. He was evidently a superior military leader, as his defence of Gischala and his famous escape from the troops of Titus abundantly testify. On reaching Jerusalem, his mastery of the contending and maddened partisans who furiously assailed each other still further showed his military ability, and his success in destroying the first works erected against the city for a time filled the defenders with hope. At length he was driven into the great tower of Antonia, before the fall of the city, and he was one of the Jews who escaped. Concealed in a cave, he suffered from hunger, until at length he surrendered in expectation of being saved from indignity, but he was taken with seven hundred others to form a procession through the streets of Rome to grace the triumph of the conqueror, after which he was thrown into prison, where he died of a broken heart.

26. OF JERUSALEM. There were four men thus designated. 1. The first was a bishop of Jerusalem, A. D. 386. He was accused of favoring the Arians. He was friendly toward Jerome, who then resided at Bethlehem, but Epiphanius of Constantia involved John in trouble because of his reported toleration of Origenism. Next he was accused of favoring Pelagius; but it would appear that in a work which he wrote he merely admitted the talent of Origen without upholding his views. 2. Early in the sixth century there was a patriarch named John at Jerusalem, and a synodical letter of his is contained in the "Concilia," as edited by Labbe. 3. A third is called John of Jerusalem or John of Damascus, who is to be distinguished from the eminent man of that name who was the author of the text-book of theology in the Greek Church. The other is famed for his connection with Iconoclastic controversy. 4. A fourth was a patriarch of Jerusalem who lived at the close of the tenth century, and who is credited with having translated a life of the great John Damascenus from the Arabic. This life has been republished at Rome, at Basle and at Paris, and it is still invested with great interest because of its references to the Iconoclastic controversy which had terminated at the death of the emperor Theophilus in A. D. 842.

27. OF LEYDEN (li'den), called BOCKHOLD, was a native of Leyden, originally a tailor, then an actor. He united with the Anabaptists in Amsterdam, and in 1533, at Münster, he declared himself a prophet and next king of Zion. On the fall of Münster, in 1535, he was put to death with others of his associates. See ANABAPTISTS.

28. OF MATHA, SAINT, who established the "Order of the Holy Trinity for the Redemption of Captives," was born in 1154, at Faucon, in Provence. He completed his studies at the university of Paris, and was then admitted to the priesthood. According to a legend, at his first celebration of the mass he saw a vision of an angel clothed in a white robe on which was a cross of red and blue. His hands, which were crossed, rested upon the heads of two slaves, who knelt on either side. Regarding this vision as a divine intimation that his life was to be devoted to the relief of prisoners and captives, he founded the order named above; and having obtained followers and collected money, he sent disciples, and went himself to Africa and Spain, returning home, after successive voyages, with prisoners whom they had ransomed. The latter years of his life were spent in preaching at Rome, where he died December 21, 1213.

29. OF MONTE CORVINO (mon'teh kor've'no), who flourished at the end of the thirteenth century, became famous as a Romish missionary among the Mongols. He took his name from the place of his birth. He had traveled in the East, and in 1289 he obeyed the request of Nicholas IV. to avail himself of an opening which he had discovered to labor among the Mongols; and after most arduous labors he succeeded in forming a Christian church. Having collected some six thousand converts, he got other laborers sent to his help, and he was made archbishop of a see named Cambalu. He continued his efforts among the Mongols until his death, in 1328.

30. OF NEPOMUK (neh-po'muk), more properly POMUK, a popular Bohemian saint of the Roman Catholic Church, and honored as a martyr of the inviolability of the seal of confession. He was born at the village of Pomuk, about the middle of the fourteenth century. Having entered into orders, he rose rapidly to distinction, being created a canon of the cathedral of Prague, and eventually vicar-general of the diocese. The queen having selected him for her confessor, the king, himself a man of dissolute life, conceiving suspicions of her virtue, required of John to reveal to him what he knew of her life from the confessions she had made to him. John steadfastly refused, and the king resolved to be revenged for the refusal. An opportunity occurred soon afterward, when the monks of the Benedictine abbey of Kladran, having elected an abbot in opposition to the design of the king, John, as vicar-general, at once confirmed the election. The king, having first put him to the torture, had him tied hand and foot and flung into the Moldau in March, 1393. His memory was cherished with peculiar affection in his native country, and he was eventually canonized as a saint of the Roman Catholic Church, his feast being fixed for March 20.

31. OF NICKLAUSHAUSEN (nick-laushow'sen), lived in the close of the fifteenth century, and seems to have been a precursor of John of Leyden. He was a swineherd; and resolving on the reformation of the clergy, he claimed to have been sent by the Virgin Mary to call them to repentance and reformation. He was soon followed by immense crowds, and he became quite fanatical and revolutionary in his conduct. At length the bishop of Würzburg seized him and a number of his followers; and being tried, he was burned at the stake.

32. OF OXFORD, an eminent prelate, flourished during the reign of Henry II. of England, by whom he was in 1165 appointed dean of Salisbury, in opposition to the wishes of à Becket, who claimed the right of making such appointments. The archbishop suspended the bishop of Salisbury for approving the king's appointment, and John was excommunicated, whereupon the king sent an embassy to Rome, John being himself of the number, which resulted in securing the papal confirmation of his appointment. In 1175 he was appointed bishop of Norwich, and attended the Lateran Council in 1179. The date of his death is not known. See JOCELINE OF SALISBURY.

33. DE OXFORD, who became bishop of Norwich in the twelfth century, distinguished himself as one of the great builders of his age. The nave of the cathedral had been severely damaged by fire in the year 1171, and John de Oxford set about the work of restoration. He was occupied in it until the year 1197, when it was completed in a splendor far exceeding its former state, thus improving on the work of Herbert, who had raised the nave and the aisles. The unusual length of the nave of this cathedral makes it one of the most imposing ecclesiastical structures not only in Great Britain, but in all Christendom.

34. OF PARIS lived in the thirteenth century. He was a Dominican, and a professor of theology in the university of Paris. Boniface VIII. had put forth the most unlimited claims for the papal supremacy in temporal and spiritual things, but Philip the Fair of France resisted his assumptions, and the university of Paris took the side of the king. Chief among his supporters was John, who maintained the supremacy of the clergy in spiritual things and the lordship of the king in temporal things. He argued that the kingdom of Christ is a spiritual one, being a rule in the heart, and not in earthly things, and therefore the pope could only have power in spiritual matters. He also stood up for the rights of the bishops, arguing as he did that the pope was only the successor of Peter, and Peter did not send the other apostles, whose successors the bishops were. He went so far as to hold that the pope was amenable for his conduct in the papal chair to the secular princes, who, if his life was scandalous, could lawfully bring about his deposition. He also differed from the Romish doctrine on the subject of transubstantiation, and the bishop of Paris prohibited him from preaching. An appeal to the pope, as might have been expected, proved useless. He died in 1304.

35. PHILOPONUS (fil-o-po'nus), or THE LABORIOUS, was a native of Alexandria, where he was born about the commencement of the seventh century. A tradition prevailed that he had conformed to Mohammedanism to save the great library of Alexandria, but this is uncertain. His fame is founded on his philosophical and theological speculations. He was an ardent admirer of the Platonic and Aristotelian systems, and in consequence of his peculiar speculations he was pronounced a tritheist, but it is believed without cause. He held that in the Trinity, three particular and individual existences or hypostases are comprised in one unity. In his work on "Creation" he attempts to establish the Christian idea of the formation of the world out of nothing, without an appeal to Scripture. In another work, he aims at showing the congruity of the Mosaic account of the creation with our experience; and in another, on the "Resurrection," he holds that the soul is imperishable, that the natural body is destroyed by death, and that the resurrection of the body is a new creation of the body.

36. THE PRESBYTER. The important place which has been assigned by some to this individual, as the writer of certain books in the sacred canon, renders it proper that some notice should be taken of him in this work. As his existence has been wholly denied by some, whilst it has been assumed as unquestionable by others, we shall best serve the interests of the reader by, in the first instance, setting before him in order all the statements occurring in ancient Christian writers respecting the object of our inquiry.

The earliest testimony is that of Papias, who says, speaking of the efforts he made to establish himself with certainty in Christian truth: "Whenever any one arrived who had had intercourse with the elders I made inquiry concerning the declarations of these; what Andrew, what Peter, or Philip, or Thomas, or James, or John, or Matthew, or any other of the disciples of the Lord said, as also what Aristion and John the Presbyter, disciples of the Lord, say; for I believed that I should not derive so much advantage from books as from living and abiding discourse." Eusebius says that this confirms the report of those who relate that there were two men in Asia Minor who bore that name and had been closely connected with Christ, and that two tombs had been found in Ephesus bearing the name of John; and he cites Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria about the middle of the third century, as ascribing to John the Presbyter the authorship of the Apocalypse—an opinion to which Eusebius himself inclined. Jerome reports the opinion of some that the second and third Epistles of John are the production of John the Presbyter. An earlier testimony, that of the Apostolical Constitutions, declares that there was a second John who was bishop of Ephesus after St. John, by whom he was instituted in this office.

Such is the evidence in favor of the existence of John the Presbyter. On examining it we find—1. That Papias knew a disciple of our Lord named John, distinct from the Evangelist, and known as John the Presbyter; but Papias says nothing of his being bishop of Ephesus or of his being at Ephesus at all. 2. That there was a bishop at Ephesus of the name of John, who was the successor of the apostle John there. 3. That there was a tradition that two tombs were found at Ephesus bearing the name of John, one of which was supposed to be that of the apostle, the other that of the presbyter. 4. That this supposition did not obtain universal acceptance, and was by Eusebius held so doubtful that he appeals to the statement of Papias as supporting it. This tradition, consequently, must be discounted; and in that case there remains only the statement of Papias that he knew one John the Presbyter who had been a disciple of the Lord, and the statement of the Apostolical Constitutions that there was a bishop at Ephesus of the name of John who was instituted to his office by the apostle. As there is nothing to prove that these two were the same person, the testimony of the Constitutions must also be discounted in our present inquiry, and consequently the statement of Papias remains as the sole direct evidence for the existence of John the Presbyter.

To this evidence there is opposed—1. The negative evidence arising from the silence of all other ancient authorities, especially the silence of Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, who, in a list of eminent teachers and bishops in Asia Minor, preserved by Eusebius, makes no mention of John the Presbyter; and 2. The positive evidence afforded by the statement of Irenæus, who not only omits all mention of the Presbyter, but says that Papias was a hearer of John the apostle along with Polycarp. This counter evidence has appeared to some so strong that they have thought it sufficient to set aside that of Papias, who, they remind us, is described by Eusebius as a man of very small intellect. But this seems going too far. Papias describes himself as a hearer of the presbyter John, and in this he could hardly be mistaken, whatever was his deficiency in intellectual power; whereas it is very possible that Irenæus may have confounded the presbyter with the apostle, the latter of whom would be to his mind much more familiar than the former. The silence of Polycrates may be held proof sufficient that no John the Presbyter was bishop of Ephesus or famed as a teacher of Christianity in Asia Minor; but as Papias does not attest this, his testimony remains unaffected by this conclusion.

37. PRESTER ("Priest John"), the supposed Christian king and priest of a mediæval kingdom in the interior of Asia, the locality of which was vague and undefined. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the Nestorian missionaries penetrated into Eastern Asia, and made many converts among the Keraeit or Krit Tartars, including, according to the report, the khan or sovereign of the tribes, Ung Khan, who resided at Kara Korum, and to whom the afterward celebrated Genghis Khan was tributary. This name the Syrian missionaries translated by analogy with their own language, converting Ung into "Juchanan" or "John," and rendering Khan by "priest." In their reports to the Christians of the West, accordingly, their royal convert figured as at once a priest and the sovereign of a rich and magnificent kingdom. Genghis Khan having thrown off his allegiance, a war ensued, which ended in the defeat and death of Ung Khan in 1202, but the tales of his piety and magnificence long survived, and not only furnished the material of numberless mediæval legends, but supplied the occasion of several of those missionary expeditions from Western Christendom to which we owe almost all our knowledge of mediæval Eastern geography. The reports regarding Ung Khan, carried to Europe by the Armenian embassy to Eugene III., created a most profound impression; and the letters addressed in his name, but drawn up by the Nestorian missionaries, to the pope, to the kings of France and Portugal, and to the Greek emperor, impressed all with a lively hope of the speedy extension of the gospel in a region hitherto regarded as hopelessly lost to Christianity. The earliest mention of Prester John is in the narrative of a Franciscan who was sent by Innocent IV. to the court of Batu Khan of Kiptchak, the grandson of Genghis Khan. He supposed that Prester John's kingdom lay still farther to the east, but he did not prosecute the search. This was reserved for another member of the same order, who was sent as a missionary into Tartary by Saint Louis, and having reached the camp of Batu Khan, was by him sent forward to the seat of the supposed Prester John. He failed, however, to find such a personage, and his intercourse with the Nestorian missionaries satisfied him that the accounts were grievously exaggerated. Under the same vague notion of the existence of a Christian prince and a Christian kingdom in the East, the Portuguese sought for traces of Prester John in their newly-acquired Indian territory in the fifteenth century. A similar notion prevailed as to the Christian kingdom of Abyssinia.

38. DE SAIS (deh-say') holds a distinguished place in connection with the great religious house at Peterborough in the beginning of the twelfth century. Before the Norman conquest, Leofrice, who was of the blood royal, had done much to increase and give permanence to the abbey. He brought all his influence to bear against the Norman William, and he even headed an army in the field. Theobald, who succeeded him, wasted the abbey lands, and in 1116 a destructive fire destroyed the buildings. In 1117 John de Sais became abbot; and having made great preparation, he laid the foundation of a new church, and proceeded with great energy during the remainder of his life in completing the abbey church. He did not live to see the work finished, as he died in 1125. See MARTIN DE VECTI.

39. OF SALISBURY, bishop of Chartres, in France, was born at Salisbury, in Wiltshire, in the beginning of the twelfth century. He studied at Oxford, and under Abelard in France and other eminent teachers on the Continent. After his return to England he became the intimate friend and companion of Thomas à Becket, whom he had attended in his exile, and is said to have been present when he was murdered in Canterbury cathedral. He was one of the best classical scholars of his time, and an elegant Latin poet. He has a place, too, in the history of philosophy, the progress of which he promoted by his attacks on the scholastic logic. He left numerous works, among which are lives of Archbishops Anselm and

EFFIGY OF KING JOHN IN WORCESTER CATHEDRAL.

Becket, and a very curious book entitled "Polycricon." He died in 1182.

40. OF SCYTHOPOLIS (sith-op'o-lis), a Greek ecclesiastical writer, apparently of the latter end of the fifth century or the beginning of the sixth. He wrote a work against the followers of Eutychus and Dioscorus. It was divided into twelve parts, and was undertaken at the suggestion of a certain prelate, one Julianus, in reply to an anonymous Eutychian writer who had published a book deceitfully entitled "Against Nestorius," and who was supposed to be Basilius, a presbyter of Cilicia. This Basilius wrote a reply to John in very abusive style, charging him, among other things, with being a Manichean, and with restricting Lent to a period of three weeks, and not abstaining from flesh even in that shortened period.

41. OF TALAIA (ta-li'a), or TALAIDA, an ecclesiastic of the fifth century, was sent by the advice of some of the Alexandrians on a mission to the emperor Zeno, that in case of a vacancy in the patriarchate of that city, then held by a defender of the Council of Chalcedon, the clergy and laity of Alexandria might be allowed to choose his successor. It is said that John was detected in intrigues to obtain his own appointment. However this might be, though Zeno granted to the Alexandrians the liberty which they had requested, he bound John by a solemn oath not to seek the succession for himself. Soon after the return of John, in 481, he was elected patriarch, but was almost immediately expelled from his see by order of the emperor. The cause of his expulsion is differently stated. According to some, he was expelled mainly through the jealousy of Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople; according to other authorities, he was detected in having procured his own election by bribery, and thus breaking the oath which the emperor had constrained him to take. John, expelled from Alexandria, obtained from the patriarch of Antioch and his suffragans a synodical letter commending him to the pope, and departed to Rome to plead his cause there in person. The pope, with the usual papal jealousy of the patriarchs of Constantinople, took the side of John against Acacius and Zeno, the latter of whom replied that John had been expelled for perjury, and for that alone; but neither the exertions of the pope nor his successor could obtain the restoration of the banished patriarch. John after a time accepted the bishopric of Nola, in Campania, where he lived many years, and at last died peaceably.

42. ARCHBISHOP OF THESSALONICA, was a stout defender of the orthodox faith against the Monothelites of the seventh century. He attended as papal legate the third Council of Constantinople in 680, and in that character subscribed the "acts" of the council. The time of his death is altogether uncertain. He wrote a discourse or treatise, in which his object is to show that there is no contradiction in the several accounts of the resurrection of Christ given by the four evangelists.

43. DEVILLULA (deh-vil-leu'la), who became bishop of Bath, after having for some time been bishop of Wells, was a native of Tours, in France. He had practiced physic in Bath; and being greatly attached to the place, he resolved to please the inhabitants by removing the see from Wells. The monks of Bath gave him five hundred marks, and petitioned him to unite the splendid abbey with his bishopric at Wells, which he did, having purchased the city with the money, and he then assumed the title of bishop of Bath. He died in 1122. Afterward a dispute arose between the monks of Wells and those of Bath as to which city should remain the episcopal seat, and it was settled that the bishops of this diocese should neither be called bishops of Wells, as they had been, nor of Bath, as they were, but that for the future they should be called the bishops of Bath and Wells. He was buried at Bath. The abbey at Bath, though, like the abbey at Westminster, not reckoned among the cathedrals of the kingdom, is a magnificent pile. The city of Bath is one of the most beautiful in the empire, or indeed in any land. It fills the valley in which it is built, and the magnificent terraces and crescents of the Georgian period rise on the sides of the surrounding hills, while the enormous structure of the abbey, with its splendid central tower, rises in the middle of the old city as if had gathered all the population around it to be protected by its shade. The fan-tracery and the groining of the roof and the style of the windows show the lateness of the period when the edifice was erected.

JOHN, the name of a long line of popes. The first was a native of Tuscany, and was made pope in 523. He died in 526. The second was a Roman, surnamed MERCURIUS. He seconded the emperor Justinian in his efforts to reduce the schismatics to the faith. The third became pope in 560. He was a zealous supporter of papal supremacy. The fourth, who was elected in 640, condemned the Monothelites and wrote a defence of his predecessor, Honorius. The fifth ascended the papal throne in 685. He replaced the island of Sardinia under papal jurisdiction. The sixth was a native of Greece. He was elected in 701. His contest with Theophylact of Ravenna was the most prominent event of his pontificate. He died in 705. The seventh succeeded the above, and died in 707. The eighth succeeded Adrian II. in 872. He endeavored to obtain the help of Charles the Bold against the Saracens, and recognized Photius as patriarch of Constantinople. The ninth was elected in 898, and died in 900. He held a council at Rome in order to absolve the memory of his predecessor Formosus from the imputations of Stephen VI. The tenth was elected in 914 through the influence of the ill-famed Theodora, his paramour. He led a worldly and disgraceful life. The eleventh was made pope in 931. He fell a victim to the ambition of his brother Alberic. The twelfth, who became pope in 956, waged war with Pandulfus, duke of Capua, and called Otho I. of Germany against Berengarius, king of Italy, giving him the imperial crown. The thirteenth was chosen by Otho I. in 965. He was imprisoned in the castle of Saint Angelo by an adverse party, but escaped from prison and fled to Capua. The emperor restored him to his throne, abandoning to his vengeance the hostile faction with its leader. The fourteenth was elected in 983, but soon after deposed and left to die of starvation in the castle of Saint Angelo. The fifteenth was elected in 985, but died a few days after his election, without having been consecrated. The sixteenth was elected in 986, and died the same year. The seventeenth was elected in 997, and died the following year. He was a man of the most profligate character. The eighteenth was elected in 1003, but died five months afterward. He was a mere tool in the hands of turbulent nobles. The nineteenth was elected in 1003. He abdicated, and died in a Benedictine convent in 1009. The twentieth was elected in 1024, and died in 1033. During his pontificate he was visited by Canute the Great, the originator of the tribute of Peter's pence. The twenty-third was named Baldassarre Cossa, and was elected in 1410, at the time of the great schism. Two other popes, Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII., shared with him the divided homage of Christendom. To decide the contest, the emperor Sigismund convoked the Council of twenty-first, a native of Portugal, was elected in 1276. He condemned the rationalistic tendency then growing in the university of Paris, and tried to induce Philip the Bold, of France, to undertake a crusade against the infidels. He died in 1277. The twenty-second succeeded Clement V. in 1316. The chief act of his reign was his opposition to Louis of Bavaria, who had been elected emperor without his consent. He died in 1334. The Constance, which proved unfavorable to all the competitors, but more especially to Baldassarre Cossa, who was accused of every kind of vice and deposed. Martin V. was elected in his stead. The desecrated pope, after having been for some time a prisoner and an exile in Germany, went to Florence, and submitted himself to Martin, who made him dean of the college of cardinals. Cossa died in 1419.

JOHN, the youngest son of Henry II. of England, deserves a place in this work because of his connection with the great controversy between the Church and the State in the twelfth century. In his early manhood he proved a weak, incompetent governor of Ireland. When his brother Richard ascended the throne, he had so many places and honors given to him that he was practically the ruler of the kingdom. He succeeded to the crown in the year 1199, and on the death of the archbishop of Canterbury his troubles began. Hitherto, in elections to sees and positions in the Church which had the influence of great estates and political rank associated with them, it had been the custom to wait until the king had issued a "congé d'élire," and the monarchs held that the authority to invest with the civil authority and civil rights belonged to them. Secretly, however, the monks of Canterbury elected Reginald, installed him and sent to Rome for a confirmation of their act. John, on discovering the transaction, compelled an election to be made of the bishop of Norwich. Appeals were of course made to Rome, and Innocent III., one of the most determined and resolute of all the Roman pontiffs, knowing John's character and seeing the way to be now open for advancing the papal claims, took a determined stand. He held that it belonged to him to declare the see of Canterbury vacant; he rejected both the nominations and gave the place to Langton, an Englishman who was a known advocate of the papal claims. As John held out, an interdict was threatened, and in 1208 it was published, thus punishing the whole kingdom. Next year he excommunicated John, and declared the people to be free from all allegiance to him. He then induced the king of France to set about an invasion of England; and this alarmed John, who submitted in the year 1213 to all the demands of Innocent, and he even degraded himself so far as to acknowledge himself the vassal of the pope, and he gave over in fee the kingdoms of England and Ireland to the pontiff, and sealed his infamy by taking the oath of vassalage to Innocent III. as his sovereign lord. At length the English barons arose and prepared for war, which was ward off by the king's consenting to meet them and signing the "Great Charter," known as the "Magna Charta" of England. This was done at Runnymede, a small island in the Thames near Windsor, in the month of June, 1215. As might have been expected, the pope indignantly pronounced this charter invalid, and the troubles of the kingdom commenced again. The career of John soon closed, as he died on the 30th day of May, 1216, at Newark Castle, after suffering great loss in attempting to cross the Wash, a shallow bay on the coast of Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire.

JOHN'S, EVE OF SAINT, one of the most joyous festivals of Christendom during the Middle Ages, was celebrated on midsummer eve. It seems to have been observed with similar rites in every country of Europe. In the streets and market-places fires were kindled, over which the young people leaped, or threw flowers and garlands into them, with merry shoutings. At a comparatively late period the very highest personages took part in these festivities. In England the people were accustomed to go into the woods and break down branches of trees, which they placed over their doors, amidst demonstrations of joy, to make good the prophecy respecting the Baptist that many should rejoice in his birth. This custom was universal in England till the recent change in manners. In England and in Ireland several superstitious notions connected with the observance prevailed for many years. The kindling of the fire, the leaping through the flames and the flower-garlands clearly show that these rites are essentially of heathen origin and of a sacrificial character. They are obviously connected with the worship of the sun, and were doubtless practiced long before the Baptist was born. In old heathen times, midsummer and yule, the summer and winter solstices, were the two greatest and most widespread festivals in Europe. The Church could not abolish these; it could only change their name, and try to find something in the history of Christianity that would justify the alteration.

JOHNSON (jon'sun), SAMUEL, a divine, eminent for his zeal and for his numerous writings in the cause of civil liberty, was born in 1649, in the county of Stafford, received his education at St. Paul's School and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and became minister of Corringham, in Essex. In the reign of Charles II., while Lord Russell and his coadjutors were promoting the bill for excluding the duke of York from the succession to the throne, he published a tract, entitled "Julian the Apostate," for which he was fined and imprisoned. In 1686, when the army was encamped on Hounslow Heath, he drew up a paper, entitled "A humble and hearty Address to all the English Protestants in the present Army," for which he was tried, and condemned to stand in the pillory in three places, to pay a fine of five hundred marks, to be degraded from the priesthood, and to be publicly whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. He bore all these disgraceful punishments with unshrinking fortitude, and continued to employ his pen in the same cause until the revolution, when the king offered him the rich deanery of Durham, but this he refused, as inadequate to his sufferings and services, which he thought merited a bishopric. He finally received a present of £1000 and a pension of £300 per annum for the life of himself and his son. He died in 1703.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, LL.D., who was the greatest of all the English essayists, was born at Lichfield, on the 18th day of September, 1709. After an elementary education in Lichfield, he entered Pembroke College, Oxford, in 1728; but owing to the death of his father, in 1731, and the want of means, he left the university without a degree. He started as an usher in a school; but the drudgery proving intolerable, he attempted to support himself by writing for the booksellers in Birmingham, and after a vain effort to establish an academy he went to London. Parliament had hitherto prohibited any publication of its debates, but Johnson, by the pretence of reporting the proceedings of a parliament in Lilliput, and by using Roman names, managed to prepare such eloquent speeches on the subjects discussed in Parliament that the range of English literature contains nothing more remarkable for vigor and wonderful eloquence. He may be considered the father of lexicography. His most remarkable poem was "The Vanity of Human Wishes." "The Rambler," "The Idler," "Rasselas," the "Lives of the Poets," all of which hold their place in the literature of the language, attest the gigantic power of the great moralist. He died in the faith of the gospel, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, in 1784.

JOHNSTONE, BRYCE, an eminent Scotch divine, born in 1747, was a son of a magistrate of Annan, in Dumfriesshire. He entered in the university of Edinburgh in 1762; in 1771 he was appointed minister of Holywood, and in 1786 the degree of D.D. was conferred on him. He was the author of a "Commentary on the Revelation of St. John the Divine," an "Essay on the Influence of Religion on Civil Society and Civil Government," and some sermons. He also assisted Sir John Sinclair in drawing up the statistical account of Scotland, and contributed greatly toward the improvement of the agricultural and social condition of his native country. He died in 1805.

JOIADA (jo-ya'da), the contracted form of JEHOIADA, but in that form appears as the name of a high-priest, son of Eliashib, who lived not very long after the return from Babylon, and whose son married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite, Neh. xi. 22.

JOIAKIM (jo-ya'kim), the contracted form of JEHOIAKIM, son of Jeshua the high-priest, and his successor in office, Neh. xii. 10.

JOIARIB (jo-ya'rib), he whom Ezra sent to persuade some of the priests to accompany him to Jerusalem, Ezra viii. 16. 2. A descendant of Judah, Neh. xi. 5. 3. A priest, Neh. xi. 10. But perhaps the name is only mentioned here to indicate the head of a course, as in Neh. xii. 6, 19. See 2 Chr. xxiv. 7, where it is given in full, JEHOIARIB, which see.

JOKDEAM (jok/de-am), a city in the hill-country of Judah, Josh. xv. 56.

JOKIM (jo'kim), a son or descendant of Sheiah, son of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 22.

JOKMEAM (jok/me-am), a city of the tribe of Ephraim given to the Levites, 1 Chr. vi. 68. But in Josh. xxi. 22 we find Kibzaim for Jokmeam. It was on the border of one of Solomon's commissariat districts, 1 Ki. iv. 12, where in our translation erroneously Jokneam. Some other English versions, for example the Genevan, read rightly Jokmeam.

JOKNEAM (jok'ne-am), a city on the border of the territory of Zebulun whose king was one of those that Joshua destroyed, Josh. xii. 22; xix. 11. It was allotted to the Merarite Levites, Josh. xxi. 34. Its site is marked by Tell Kaimon, a hill below the eastern end of Carmel, with the Kishon a mile away. Jokneam is an error in 1 Ki. iv. 12.

JOKSHAN (jok'shan), a son of Abraham and Keturah, the father of Sheba and Dedan, Gen. xxv. 1, 2. It is by these sons, rather than by Jokshan himself, that we obtain any trace of the future residence and destiny of his race. See DEDAN and SHEBA.

JOKTAN (jok'tan), one of the descendants of Shem, whose posterity peopled the whole of the south of the Arabian peninsula, Gen. x. 25-30; 1 Chr. i. 19-23. His sons were the progenitors of various tribes, and he himself appears to be identical with the Kahtan of the Arabs.

JOKTHEEL (jok'the-el). 1. A city in the plain country of Judah, Josh. xv. 38. 2. The name which Amaziah, king of Judah, imposed on Selah, the Edomite stronghold, after his victory and capture of it, 2 Ki. xiv. 7.

JONA (jo'na) or JONAS, the father of the apostle Peter, from whom the latter was called Bar-jona, John i. 42; Matt. xvi. 17. Nothing of a personal description is indicated concerning him, but the probability is that he was, like his son, a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee.

JONADAB (jo'na-dab). 1. A nephew of David, a crafty person, whose counsel suggested to his cousin Amnon the means by which he accomplished his abominable design upon his half-sister Tamar, 2 Sam. xiii. 4, 5.

2. A son or descendant of Rechab, the progenitor of those nomadic Rechabites who held themselves bound by a vow to abstain from wine and never to relinquish the nomadic life. Jonadab was at the head of this tribe at the time when Jehu received his commission to exterminate the house of Ahab, and is supposed to have added to its ancient austerities the inhibition of wine. He was held in great respect among the Israelites generally; and Jehu, alive to the importance of obtaining the countenance and sanction of such a man to his proceedings, took him up in his chariot when on his road to Samaria to complete the work he had begun at Jezreel. The terms of the colloquy which took place on this occasion are rather remarkable. Perceiving Jonadab, he saluted him and called out, "Is thine heart right, as my heart is with thy heart?" Jonadab answered, "It is." Then said Jehu, "If it be, give me thine hand." And he gave him his hand, and was taken up into the chariot, Jehu inviting him to "Come and see my zeal for the Lord," 2 Ki. x. 15-17; Jer. xxxv. 6-10. It would seem that the Rechabites were a branch of the Kenites, over another branch of whom Heber was chief in the time of Deborah and Barak, Judg. iv. 11, 17; and as it is expressly said that Jonadab went out to meet Jehu, it seems probable that the people of Samaria, alarmed at the menacing letter which they had received from Jehu, had induced Jonadab to go to meet and appease him on the road. His venerated character, his rank as head of a tribe and his neutral position well qualified him for this mission; and it was quite as much the interest of Jonadab to conciliate the new dynasty, in whose founder he beheld the minister of the divine decrees, as it was that of Jehu to obtain his concurrence and support in proceedings which he could not but know were likely to render him odious to the people.

JONAH (jo'na) was a native of Gath-hepher, in Galilee. He is mentioned in 2 Ki. xiv. 25 as having predicted the extension of the kingdom of Israel to its former boundaries, which was accomplished by means of the valor and prudence of Jeroboam II. He is supposed to have lived during that reign, or perhaps at an earlier period, about the time of Jehoaahaz. In either case he is the most ancient of the prophets whose writings we possess, and may have been a contemporary, and, as some think, a disciple, of Elisha.

JONAH, BOOK OF. This book, with the exception of the prayer in ch. ii., is a simple narrative, apparently extracted from a larger volume, for it begins with the word "and," and terminates abruptly. It relates that Jonah, being sent on a mission to Nineveh, attempts to flee to Tarshish, but is overtaken by a storm, is cast into the sea, and is swallowed by a great fish, in whose belly he continues for three days, ch. i., when, earnestly praying to God, he is wonderfully delivered, ch. ii. At the renewed command of God he goes to Nineveh and announces its destruction, upon which the Ninevites, believing his words, fast, pray, repent and are graciously spared, ch. iii. Jonah is vexed at the divine forbearance, and wishes for death. Leaving the city, he is sheltered by a gourd, which, however, shortly withers; and Jonah, manifesting great impatience, is taught, through his concern about the gourd, the propriety of God's mercy to Nineveh, ch. iv.

That this book is a strictly historical narrative, to be understood according to its plain literal import, and not allegorically, as some have argued, is evident not only from the plain meaning of the language employed, but also from the manner in which the ministry of Jonah and the main facts of his history are referred to by our Lord, Matt. xii. 39-41; xvi. 4; Luke xi. 29, 30, who recognizes his prophetic office as explicitly as he does that of Elijah, Isaiah and Daniel; speaks of all nations. But the great object of this book, and its place in the whole system of the Bible, can be understood only as it is regarded in connection with the rest of prophetic revelations. For Jonah was a kind of link between the earlier and the later prophets. Like the former, he delivered oral promises of temporary mercies, and of these little is preserved. But he is closely connected with his successors by this fragmentary portion which has been handed down to us, and which contains an intimation of God's gracious purposes to raise up among the Israelites, however opposed this might be to their views, the instruments for extending his mercy to other nations; to fit them for this work by needful chastisements; to give them a success among the heathen far greater than among their own people; and in the end so to vindicate all his doings that they should be constrained, instead of mur-

of his being in the belly of the fish as a real miracle; grounds upon it as a fact the certainty of a future analogous event in his own history; and after mentioning the prophet's preaching at Nineveh and the repentance of the inhabitants declares respecting himself, "Behold, a greater than Jonah is here."

This history is probably the source from which have been derived the traditions anciently current in the Levant respecting the deliverance of persons who had been exposed to sea-monsters.

The whole narrative presents the most striking contrast between the long-suffering mercy of God and the rebellion and impatience of his servant; and further, between the readiness with which the Ninevites repented, at the preaching of a prophet who visited them as a stranger, and the manner in which the Israelites treated the servants of Jehovah who lived and labored amongst them. And these events would serve to teach them that the divine regards and compassion were not confined to them alone, but were extended to men muring, to adore the riches of his power and wisdom. See Rom. xi. And as if to direct attention to this chief object of the prophet's mission, God was pleased to arrange certain circumstantial coincidences between this pioneer of the more permanent and extended portion of Old Testament prophecy and the divine Author of our faith. See Matt. xii. 39-42; xvi. 4.

It is probable that the book was composed by Jonah himself. If so, it affords satisfactory evidence that he had a due sense of the faults which he here unshrinkingly displays for the warning and instruction of others.

JONAN (jo'nan), a person named among the ancestors of Christ, Luke iii. 30.

JONAS (jo'nas). 1. The Greek form of Jonah, Matt. xii. 39-41; xvi. 4. 2. See JONA.

JONAS. 1. 1 Esd. ix. 23. 2. The prophet Jonah, 2 Esd. i. 39; Tob. xiv. 4, 8.

JONAS, JUSTUS, a celebrated German Reformer, was born at Nordhausen, in 1493. He was the intimate friend of Luther and Melancthon, and helped them materially by his counsel, and by spreading the tenets of the Reformed faith. He was educated at Erfurt and Wittenberg, at the former of which universities he obtained a professorship. In 1521 he went with Luther to Worms, and from 1536 to 1547 he was busily employed in preaching the Reformed religion. He contributed to render the works of Luther popular by his translations. He died in 1555.

JONATHAN (jon'a-than). 1. A Levite, son of Gershom, son of Manasseh, which last name is supposed to be put for Moses in the Masoretic copies of the Hebrew Bible, out of reverence to the great lawgiver, Jud. xviii. 30. This young man, wandering from Beth-lehem-judah in search of employment, was engaged by Micajah to be the any one who touched a morsel of food before night. When the fact transpired, Saul felt himself bound to execute his vow even upon his gallant son; but the people, with whom the young prince was a great favorite, interposed, saying, "Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid! As the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground, for he hath wrought with God this day," 1 Sam. xiv. 16-52.

Jealousy and every mean or low feeling were strangers to the generous heart of Jonathan. Valiant and accomplished himself, none knew better how to acknowledge valor and accomplishment in others. The act of David in meeting the challenge of Goliath and in overcoming that huge barbarian entirely won his heart; and from that day forward the son of Jesse found no one who loved him so tenderly, who admired his high gifts with so much enthusiasm or who risked so much to preserve him priest of his house of gods. He afterwards accompanied the Danites in their expedition against Laish, and he and his posterity continued priests in that city, called by the conquerors Dan, "until the day of the captivity of the land," Jud. xvii. 7-13; xviii.

2. The eldest son of Saul, king of Israel, and consequently heir-apparent of the throne which David was destined to occupy, 1 Sam. xiv. 9. The war with the Philistines, which occupied the early part of his father's reign, afforded Jonathan more than one opportunity of displaying the chivalrous valor and the princely qualities with which he was endowed. His exploit in surprising the Philistine garrison at Michmash, attended only by his armor-bearer, is one of the most daring which history, or even romance, records, 1 Sam. xiv. 1-14. His father came to follow up this victory, and in the ensuing pursuit of the confounded Philistines Jonathan, spent with fatigue and hunger, refreshed himself with some wild honey which he found in a wood through which he passed. He knew not that his father had rashly vowed to put to death from harm as the very prince whom he was destined to exclude from a throne. Jonathan knew well what was to happen, and he submitted cheerfully to the appointment which gave the throne of his father to the young shepherd of Bethlehem. In the intensity of his love and confidence he shrank not to think of David as his destined king and master, and his dreams of the future pictured nothing brighter than the day in which David should reign over Israel and he be one with him in friendship and next to him in place and council; not because he was covetous even of this degree of honor, but because "next to David" was the place where he wished always to be, and where he desired to rest.

When Saul began to hate David as his intended successor, he was highly displeased at the friendship which had arisen between him and his son. This exposed Jonathan to much contumely, and even to danger of life, for once at least the king's passion against him on this account rose so high that he cast a javelin at him "to smite him to the wall."

This unequivocal act taught Jonathan that the court of Saul was no safe place for David. He told him so, and they parted with many tears. David then set forth upon those wanderings among strangers and in solitary places which lasted all the time of Saul. The friends met only once more. Saul was in pursuit of David when he was in the wilderness of Ziph; and Jonathan could not forbear coming to him secretly in the wood to give him comfort and encouragement, 1 Sam. xxiii. 18-13. Nothing more is related of Jonathan till both he and his father lost their lives in the fatal battle of Gilboa, combating against the enemies of their country. When informed of this catastrophe, David uttered a lamentation over his lost friend, than which there is, perhaps, nothing in Hebrew poetry more beautiful and touching, nothing more complete as a whole, or more full of fine images and tender thoughts.

3. The son of Abiathar the high-priest, 2 Sam. xv. 27, 36. 4. The son of David's brother Shimeah. He slew a giant in Gath, 2 Sam. xxi. 20, 21. 5. One of David's heroes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 32. 6. A descendant of Jerahmeel, 2 Sam. ii. 32, 33. 7. An uncle of David, 1 Chr. xxvii. 32. 8. The father of a person who accompanied Ezra from Babylon, Ezra viii. 6. 9. One who with Ezra investigated the cases of those who had married foreign wives, Ezra x. 15. 10. One in the line of the high-priests, Neh. xii. 11; also called Johanan, Neh. xii. 22, 23. He held his office thirty-two years. His brother Jeshua attempted to dispossess him of it, but was slain by Johanan in the inner court of the temple. 11. A priest in the line of Joakim, representative of the family of Melicu, Neh. xii. 14. 12. A priest whose son took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. xii. 35, perhaps identical with Jehonathan, Neh. xii. 18. 13. A scribe in whose house was the prison in which Jeremiah was confined, Jer. xxxvii. 15, 20. 14. A son of Kareah, one of those who joined Gedaliah after the capture of Jerusalem, Jer. xl. 8. 15. A son of Mattathias and brother of Judas Maccabæus. He was surnamed Apphus, 1 Macc. ii. 5. He succeeded his brother Judas in the leadership of the Jews, and was made high-priest by Alexander Balas. After some vicissitudes of fortune he renewed the league his brother had formed with the Romans, and was at last treacherously slain by Tryphon. 16. An officer sent by Simon Maccabæus to Joppa, 1 Macc. xiii. 11. 17. A priest, 2 Macc. i. 23.

JONATHAN BEN UZZIEL, the celebrated translator of the Pentateuch and Prophets into Chaldee, was the distinguished disciple of Hillel I., and therefore flourished about 30 B. C. He was the first of those thirty disciples of Hillel who, in the language of the Talmud, "were worthy to possess the power of stopping the sun like Joshua," and "when he sat studying the Scriptures every bird which happened to fly over his head was burned or converted into a seraph." His expositions were those of the last three prophets, viz., Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, which had been orally transmitted, and the high esteem in which they were held by the nation may be gathered from the following description in the Talmud: "When the illuminating sun arose upon the dark passages of the prophets, through this translation, the length and breadth of Palestine were agitated, and everywhere the voice of God or the voice of the people was heard asking, 'Who has disclosed these mysteries to the sons of men?' With great humility and becoming modesty Jonathan ben Uzziel answered: 'I have disclosed thy mysteries; but thou, O Lord, knowest that I have not done it to get glory for myself or for the house of my father, but for thy glory's sake, that discussion might not increase in Israel." From these notices in the Talmud it will be seen that he is only described as the Chaldee translator of the prophets; and, indeed, it is distinctly declared in the last-quoted passage that when Jonathan wanted also to translate the Hagiographa the same voice from heaven emphatically forbade it because of the great Messianic mysteries contained therein, especially in the book of Daniel. But as tradition has also ascribed to him the paraphrase of the Pentateuch which is known by the name of Pseudo-Jonathan, and the Targum of the Five Megilloth, and as the student will naturally look for an account of the editions of and the literature on these paraphrases under the name which they bear, it is deemed best to describe them here.

"The (reputed) Paraphrase of Jonathan on the Pentateuch" was made in the middle of the seventh century by some one who was anxious to make a complete version of what is called "The Jerusalem or Palestine Targum," which in reality is nothing but desultory glosses on Onkelos' paraphrase. The Targum thus based upon the ancient Jerusalem fragments was at first called "Targum Jerusalem," and afterward erroneously obtained the name of "Targum Jonathan." This so-called paraphrase of Jonathan ben Uzziel on the Pentateuch was first published in Venice, 1590-91, with the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch, the paraphrase of Onkelos, the commentaries of Rashi and Jacob ben Asher, and has lately been printed, with a commentary, in the beautiful edition of the Pentateuch with the rabbinic commentaries.

"The reputed Paraphrase of Jonathan on the Five Megilloth" is perhaps of a still later date, and has most likely been compiled by several individuals from ancient materials. It is generally published with the Hebrew text of these Megilloth in the Jewish editions of the Pentateuch, and is contained in all the rabbinic Bibles.

"The Paraphrase of Jonathan on the Prophets" embraces Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the twelve minor prophets. The importance of this version may be judged of not only from the opinion of the ancient Jews that it embodies the expositions of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, but from the fact that it contains numerous ancient readings which are undoubtedly genuine, and which relieve many an obscure passage in the prophets from the constrained and unnatural interpretations forced upon it by critics who are determined to adhere to manifest textual corruptions.

JONATHAS (jo'na-thas), Tob. v. 13, a person said to be of Tobit's acquaintance.

JONATH-ELEM-RECHOKIM (jo'nath-e'lem-re-ko'kim). A variety of symbolical meanings have been given to this phrase, which is found in the title to Ps. lvi. It has most likely a musical meaning indicating that the psalm was to be sung or chanted to the melody so called. This melody, no doubt well known, belonged to an ode or poem bearing the name Jonath-elem-rechokim.

JONCOURT (zhong-koor'), PETER DE, was an eminent preacher and theologian among the French Protestants of the seventeenth century. He was born at Clermont, and in 1678 he became the pastor of Middleburg, having left France after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He was a voluminous writer, chiefly on the theological questions of interest in his day. He edited a new edition of the Psalms by Marot and Beza, which was extensively circulated. He died at La Haye in 1725.

JONES, CHARLES COLCOCK, D.D., was born in Georgia, in 1804. After a short experience in commercial life he resolved on dedicating himself to the ministry, and he studied in Andover seminary, then known as Phillips Academy, whence he proceeded to Princeton. Being licensed to preach by the presbytery of New Brunswick, he returned to his native State and began to labor among the negro population, and during his life he never ceased to feel an intense desire to elevate the race. He accepted a chair in the theological seminary at Columbia, South Carolina, with the understanding that he could still prosecute his schemes for the colored masses of the Southern States, but in 1838 he resigned after two years' experience, and he returned to his former direct work. In 1847 he was again induced to return to the professorship, and in 1850 he removed to Philadelphia to the arduous position of secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, which he held for three years, but declining health obliged him to retire and seek rest in the South. He was eminent for his decision of character united with great warmth of heart, activity and cheerfulness of spirit. Few men in modern times have been more beloved by their associates. He was eminent as a preacher, and his loss was much deplored. He died in 1863.

JONES, GRIFFITH, usually designated the Welsh apostle, was born in the year 1684, in Caermarthenshire. He was ordained by Bishop Bull in 1708, and the rectory of Llanddowror was given to him by Sir John Phillips. Here his earnest zeal and great spirituality produced the most blessed results. He became the founder and patron of free schools, and above one hundred and fifty thousand of his countrymen owed their education to his zeal and influence. He was equally energetic and successful in the circulation of the Bible. His religious tracts in Welsh and English were sown broadcast over the principality, and few men have been more successful in the ministry than he was in the different counties of Wales. His life was a scene of devotion and consecration, and in April, 1761, he closed his earnest career.

JONES, HORATIO GATES, who was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, in 1777, was the son of a Baptist minister. After a thorough education he devoted himself to the ministry, and his first settlement was at Salem, in New Jersey, to which place he was called in 1802. His health became weak, and he removed to a place on the river Schuylkill, near Philadelphia, devoting his time as his strength allowed to preaching and editing the "Latter-day Luminary," a Baptist magazine. He published a "History of the Philadelphia Baptist Association." He died in 1853. He was deservedly held in great esteem by his brethren. Brown University gave him the degree of master of arts, and the university of Lewisburg, of which he was a trustee and for some time its chancellor, conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity.

JONES, JEREMIAH, a learned dissenting minister of England, was born in 1693 and died in 1724. He was for some time pastor of a congregation at Forest Green, Avening, Gloucestershire. He had also an academy at Nailsworth, in that neighborhood, where he resided. His leisure time was devoted to Biblical studies. In 1719 he published "A Vindication of St. Matthew's Gospel from Mr. Whiston's Charge of Dislocations, etc.," in which he maintains with much ability and learning the integrity of the existing text of that Gospel, and offers some valuable remarks on the harmony of the four Gospels. At his death he left in manuscript the work on which his fame principally rests, his "New and Full Method of Settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament." The writings of Jones are marked by sound erudition, careful citation and judicious influence.

JONES, JOEL, was a native of Connecticut. He was born in 1795, at Coventry, and his education was completed at Yale College. Adopting the profession of the law, he attained to great eminence as a man of sound judgment and great moral worth. He was made judge of the Philadelphia district court, and subsequently he was appointed mayor of the city. He was much beloved in the Presbyterian church, of which he was a ruling elder, and he deserves a place in this work not only because of his great moral worth and high intellectual standing, but as a Hebraist and an author. Few men of his day were better acquainted with Hebrew than he was. He wrote frequently for the "Princeton Review." His "History of the Patriarchal Age" in connection with the life of Joseph, his "Notes on Scripture" and his work on "The Knowledge of one another in the Future State" are very valuable. He also translated from the French "Outlines of a History of the Court of Rome, and of the Temporal Power of the Popes," to which he appended notes. He died in 1860.

quainted with Hebrew than he was. He wrote frequently for the "Princeton Review." His "History of the Patriarchal Age" in connection with the life of Joseph, his "Notes on Scripture" and his work on "The Knowledge of one another in the Future State" are very valuable. He also translated from the French "Outlines of a History of the Court of Rome, and of the Temporal Power of the Popes," to which he appended notes. He died in 1860.

JONES, JOHN, LL.D., was born in Caermarthenshire, in Wales, and educated at the Unitarian college at Hackney. He engaged in the duties of teaching for a short time, and in 1797 he settled at Halifax as minister of a Unitarian congregation. In 1800 he removed to London, where he spent his life in literary pursuits, and preaching occasionally. His chief works are—"Illustrations of the Gospels, founded on Circumstances peculiar to Our Lord and the Evangelists," "The Epistle to the Romans analyzed," "A Version of the Epistle to the Colossians, the Thessalonians, Timothy, Titus and the Epistle of James," "Ecclesiastical Researches, or Philo and Josephus proved to be Historians and Apologists of Christ," and a "Version of the First Three Chapters of Genesis." He introduced an important change in the mode of teaching Greek, having used the English language instead of the Latin in the grammar and elementary studies. Formerly, pupils who had acquired Latin were considered to be able to use Latin when learning the grammar of another ancient tongue. The university of Aberdeen, in view of his scholarship, conferred the degree of LL.D. on him. He died in 1827.

JONES, JOSEPH HUNTINGDON, D.D., a brother of Judge Joel Jones, was born at Coventry, Connecticut, in the year 1797, and educated at Harvard. He devoted a short time to teaching at Bowdoin College, whence he passed to Princeton for theological training, having dedicated himself to the ministry. He settled at Woodbury, New Jersey, in 1824, but in the next year he was removed to New Brunswick, where he remained until 1838, when he accepted a call to the Sixth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. In these charges he was distinguished for his solid attainments and his devotion to duty, and his influence was felt beyond the sphere of his immediate charge. In 1861 he retired from pastoral work to take charge of the "Fund for the Aid of Disabled Ministers," and in that department of the Church's work he was eminently successful. He published a work on "Revivals of Religion," "A Memoir of Dr. Ashbel Green," "Effects of Physical Causes on Christian Experience," a subject which he handled with great delicacy and judgment. Several of his sermons and essays were also published, and in 1837 he issued from the press a "History of the Revival at New Brunswick." Lafayette College, in view of his high standing, conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity.

He died very suddenly in the midst of his labors, in the year 1868.

JONES, WILLIAM, an English divine, eminent for his abilities and public spirit, and a strenuous champion of the Hutchinsonian doctrines, was born in 1726, at Lowick, in Northamptonshire. He was educated at the Charter House and University College, Oxford, where he formed an intimate acquaintance with Mr. Horne, afterward bishop of Norwich. On leaving the university he became curate of Finedon, Northamptonshire, and next of Wadenhoe, where he wrote his "Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity," which passed through numerous editions. In 1762 he published "An Essay on the First Principles of Natural Philosophy." In 1764 the archbishop of Canterbury gave him the vicarage of Bethersdean, in Kent, to which was afterward added the rectory of Pluckley, and at the time of his death he was perpetual curate of Nayland and rector of Paston and Holingbourne. When the French revolution gave birth to seditious movements in England, Mr. Jones printed "A Letter from Thomas Bull to his Brother John," which was widely circulated by the friends of government. He was also concerned in establishing the British "Critic," and he published a collection of excellent tracts, under the title of "The Scholar Armed against the Errors of the Times." On the death of his friend, Bishop Horne, to whom he had been chaplain, he paid an affectionate tribute to his memory in an account of his "Life and Writings." He died in 1800.

JONES, SIR WILLIAM, an eminent lawyer and Orientalist, was the son of an able mathematician, and was only three years of age when his father died, in 1746. He was educated at Harrow School, from whence, at the age of eighteen, he went to University College, Oxford, where he had been but a few months before he was invited to be private tutor to an English nobleman, with whom he made a tour on the Continent. In 1766 he obtained a Fellowship, and began his "Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry." Soon after this he was engaged to translate the "Life of Nadir Shah" from an Eastern manuscript brought to England by the king of Denmark. Another tour to the Continent, with his pupil and family, followed, which occupied his time until 1770, when, his tutorship ceasing, he entered himself as a law student in the Temple: He did not, however, abandon literature; but, on the appearance of the "Life and Works of Zoroaster," by Anquetil du Perron, he vindicated the university of Oxford, which had been attacked by that writer, in an able pamphlet in the French language, which he wrote with great elegance. In 1778 appeared his translation of the "Orations of Iseus," with a prefatory discourse, notes and commentary, which for elegance of style and profound critical and historical research excited much admiration. In the mean time, he rapidly advanced in professional reputation, and obtained the appointment of judge in the supreme court of judicature in Bengal. The honor of knighthood was on this occasion conferred on him, and he soon after married Miss Shipley, daughter of the bishop of St. Asaph, with whom he embarked for India in April, 1783. One of his earliest acts in India was the establishment at Calcutta of an institution on the plan of the Royal Society, of which he was chosen the first president. Another was to take vigorous measures for procuring a digest of the Hindoo and Mohammedan laws. He applied himself with ardor to the study of Sanscrit; and his health suffering from the climate, he took a journey through the district of Benares, during which cessation of public duties he composed a "Treatise on the Gods of Greece, Italy and India." His translation of the celebrated "Ordnances of Menu," the famous Indian legislator, published early in 1794, had scarcely appeared, when he was seized with an inflammation of the liver, which terminated his truly valuable life on the 27th of April. As a judge he was indefatigable and impartial. As a poet, essayist and translator there were few who excelled him; his translations of the beautiful Indian drama, "Sacuntala," and of the collection of Indian fables entitled "Hitopadesa," being especially noteworthy. In private life his character was unimpeachable.

JONSSON (yon'sun), FINN, or in Latin FINNUS JOHANNÆUS, an Icelandic historian, was born in 1704. He completed his education at the university of Copenhagen. He settled in his native country as a parish priest, and was made bishop of Skalholt in 1754. His name is likely to be remembered in connection with his "Ecclesiastical History of Iceland," published between 1773-78. It is written in Latin, and contains much curious matter, literary as well as ecclesiastical. He died in 1789.

JOPPA (jop'pa) is one of the oldest cities in the world, and ranks with Hebron, Zoan and Damascus; and such is its repute for antiquity that early geographers ascribe to it an antediluvian paternity, and regard its name as derived from Japheth. Being a city of the Philistines, the name may be Egyptian, not Hebrew, and the etymology may be gathered from the hieroglyphics of Egypt. Cepheus, its earliest king, may have been a representative of the ancient Caphtor, and Ovid's "Cepheia arva" may be the Philistine sea-board, the plain of Sharon. Phineus, brother of Cepheus, fabled to have been turned into stone by Perseus, may have left his name to Phœnicia, for the usual derivation of that word from the palm is untenable. It is the local habitation for the Ovidian myth of Andromeda and the sea-monster, which no doubt had some foundation in the early story of the city, though whether grafted on Jonah's miraculous deliverance is questionable.

It is set down in the inheritance of Dan, who there remained in his ships, Jud. v. 17, selfishly imperiling the nation's weal in not coming to the help of Jehovah against the mighty. To this Hiram floated down from Tyre the fir trees of Lebanon for the temple of Jerusalem, and about five hundred years after, Zerubbabel, acting on the edict of Cyrus, which must have applied to Phœnicia as well as Judæa, caused the cedar trees from the same mountains to be brought. "They gave money also unto the masons, and to the carpenters, and meat and drink and oil unto them of Zidon, and to them of Tyre, to bring cedar trees from Lebanon to the Sea of Joppa, according to the grant that they had of Cyrus king of Persia," Ezra iii. 7. Here Jonah embarked in his Tarshish-bound vessel. Here the Jewish patriots in the days of the Maccabees waged not a little of their warfare, for Modin, the place of the Maccabean nativity and sepulchres, was not far off, 1 Macc. x. 75; xi. 6. Here Peter wrought the miracle on Tabitha; here he tarried many days with one Simon, a tanner, whose house and stone skin-vat on the shore tradition still kindly points out. Here the apostle saw the heavenly vision which told him that Jew and Gentile were one in Christ, Acts x. 15, 16, and here he received the summons from Cornelius.

Early in the Christian era it became the haunt of robbers and pirates, whose marine depredations so provoked the Romans that a first time under Cestius and a second under Vespasian it suffered destruction. It is said to have been early the seat of a Christian bishopric, but others mention it as attached to the Church of the Sepulchre. It continued to be a port, but did not rise into importance till the era of the Crusades, when it became the scene of many a conflict, and for more than half a century it was alternately built and destroyed.

The Franks were at last expelled from Syria, and the Armenians, who were marched slowly in single file that their names might be taken down. Thrust into these horrid cellars, they would have been suffocated with the stench, had not some traders got access to the prisoners and filled the place with sweet odors. Through the kindness of a native Felix himself was brought out for a little and shown the ruins of the city and two towers still standing.

The description which Felix Fabri thus gives of Joppa in his day applies to a long period both before and after that. The harbor was wretched, the city in ruins and the natives bent on extorting money from the pilgrims. Two centuries after, the Franks began to be better and Joppa sank into ruin and poverty, though still a port at which travelers and pilgrims landed for Jerusalem. Here we find De Caumont landing in 1418, and De Lannoy in 1422, telling us that Jaffa is entirely in a state of decay, having only three uninhabited vaults, where the pilgrims lodge on their way to the Holy Sepulchre. Here, in 1484, Felix Fabri came with his fellow-pilgrims in their Venetian galley, singing as they rushed through the rock gate of Andromeda, "In God's name we ride," the roar of the breakers drowning the old melody. The description which this last traveler gives us of the port, and of the sufferings of his two hundred brethren thrust by the Saracens into one of three great cellars or caves, remnants of ancient Joppa, for nine days, and filth and damp and every form of indignity, is very graphic. As they disembarked the shore was lined with Sara-and the Armenian convent, in which they were accommodated, was said to contain four or five thousand people. But still in the days of Wey and Sandys the town was a ruin. After that it began to revive, but it had hardly risen when it was assailed. It was greatly damaged by Ali Bey in 1771, and Mohammed Abudahab in 1776. The French besieged and took it in 1799, and laid all its gardens waste. By it Napoleon entered Syria; here he poisoned his sick on his retreat, to prevent their falling into Turkish hands; here he massacred the defenceless inhabitants, encamping hard by the town. Judas Maccabæus, Antiochus, Herod, Cestius, Vespasian, Omar, Saladin, Richard, Godfrey, Napoleon, have all in their turn laid siege to it. Perhaps no city save Jerusalem has seen so many foes and stood so many assaults. Within this century it has risen considerably, but especially within the last thirty years.

Its geographical position is lat. N. 32° 2', long. E. of Greenwich, 34° 47' 25". It is thoroughly a maritime town, washed by and almost overhanging the sea. It lies about thirty-six miles north-west from Jerusalem, and Strabo affirms that from Joppa Jerusalem was visible. In the neighborhood are many of the noted places in Scripture story. The plain of Sharon encircles it. Lydda or Lod, Acts ix. 38, now Ludd; Ono, Neh. vi. 2, now Auna; Ekron, Judg. i. 18, now Akir; Beth-dagon, now Beit-dejan, are all in its neighborhood. Being the only seaport on the southern coast of Palestine, it drew influence round it, and raised up towns; so that, though the notices of it are not minute, we never lose sight of it from the days of Jonah. It figures in the history of the Maccabees, and Josephus refers to it frequently. It comes before us in the history of Peter, in the wars of the crusaders, and in the itineraries of pilgrims and Perhaps its steep streets, which you ascend by stairs, are an advantage, as helping to carry off its impurities. Its environs are exquisite, and the endless groves of olive, orange, lemon, citron, mulberry, fig and palm delight the traveler with their shade and their fragrance. Its hedges of cactus or prickly pear, some fifteen feet high, are remarkable, though not perhaps beautiful, except when in flower. Each garden has here, as in Egypt, its well, its reservoir and its wheel, the last worked by a mule or ox, and bringing up water for so many hours each day to fill the little trenches and irrigate the garden.

Its population is variously reckoned from 5000 to 15,000, the latter being the estimate of Dr. Thomson. Of these about a half are "Christians"—that is, Greeks, Latins, Armenians, Maronites, Greek Catholics. Of these the Greeks are the most numerous. The Moslems amount perhaps to 4000; the Jews are very few, though not perhaps so few as in the days of Benjamin of Tu-

JORDAN (jor'dan), THE RIVER OF, has three sources. Of these the northernmost, and geographically speaking the most important, occupies but a small share of the attention either of history or of modern travelers. It is situated near Hasbeiya, between Hermon and Lebanon, and is thus described by Van de Velde: "When you have descended the wild ravine of Hasbeiya, you turn to the right, crossing a grassy plain where the olive trees offer at all times a most refreshing shade; you then come by a most romantic way along the river to the first bridge built over it. A few yards above is the basin or source, where the water comes bubbling up from under steep projecting rocks. It is of a transparent dark color, and appears to be of immense depth." The stream from this the highest permanent source is called the Hasbany. The source at Banias (Cæsarea Philippi) is best known of the three. At the foot of a high cliff there is a large pool fed by numerous gushing streamlets which rise near the entrance of a deep cavern, now half filled with rubbish. Out of this pool the Jordan flows, already a fair-sized stream. Here Herod erected a temple in honor of Augustus, and Philip his son had the capital of his tetrarchy. Here also, when our Lord himself reached the northern limit of his journeys, was the scene of Peter's confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," Matt. xvi. 16. The third source of the Jordan is at Dan, or Tel-el-Kady. It is at the foot of a green eminence overgrown with shrubs. From its north-west corner a magnificent spring bursts travelers of all ages to the present day. The havens along the Palestine coast are Beirut, Haifa and Jaffa; at these French and Russian steamers touch week after week, bringing to the Mediterranean and Ægean something of their ancient traffic and importance. These harbors are poor and unsafe, Jaffa the poorest and most perilous; yet some place of debarkation and embarkation was needful, and on the whole Jaffa was the best.

In front of the harbor the rocks rise, over which the north-west wind dashes the waves in fury—the rocks on which Andromeda was fabled to have been chained, and where, according to Josephus, the fragments of the iron links remain. They are gloomy and inhospitable, and many a brave vessel has been broken there. The city is built on an eminence which slopes backward from the sea, and with its castle is reckoned one hundred and ninety feet high. On it the houses are so placed as to seem to rise up, tier upon tier, irregular, but still beautiful, especially when approached from the sea at sunset. The interior is as displeasing as the exterior is pleasing, though it is not worse than the usual run of Oriental towns.

dela, who only found one Jew, a dyer, here. It has three convents, Greek, Latin and Armenian, and three or four mosques. But certainly Joppa has within the last twenty or thirty years made wonderful advances, commerce as well as population increasing, as in all the towns of the Syrian coast. Commerce is returning to Syria as well as to Egypt. The cornfields of Philistia and the pastures of Sharon may ere long become of importance to Europe, and the East again become the granary of the West. Its present exports are a few native productions, such as soap, and these chiefly to Egypt. Its imports are from the manufactories of England. It is likely to rise, especially if modern skill and capital will give it a harbor, for which it possesses first-rate natural capacity and materials, and construct a railway between it and Jerusalem, which competent engineers who have surveyed the ground have pronounced quite practicable.

forth into a wide crystal pool, sending forth at once a wide crystal river through the valley. The three streams unite near Tel Dafneh, and flow in a sluggish course through a marshy plain into the Lake Merom.

At its outlet from the lake the river at first flows through a level plain covered with reeds and abounding in all kinds of water-fowl. The valley soon contracts, and the banks of the stream are like sloping meadows as far as the Jisr Benat Yacobe (the bridge of the daughters of Jacob). This, the traditional site of Jacob's crossing the river on his return from Padan-aram, is about a mile and a half from the Lake Merom and six miles from the Sea of Galilee. Thence a road leads to Damascus over the hills of the Jaulan, and a ruined khan stands at the head of the bridge. From this spot, says Dr. Thomson, the Jordan "commences its headlong course over basaltic rocks down to the Lake of Tiberias, a distance of about six miles, and the descent, according to my aneroid, is one thousand and fifty feet. Of course it is a continued repetition of roaring rapids and leaping cataracts. I once walked and scrambled from the bridge down to the entrance into the lake—a wild, stern gorge, fit haunt for robbers, from which it is never free.” It is singular that at this, the least attractive part of its course, the Jordan must have been best known to Naaman of Damascus, who would commonly cross it here in his incursions into the land of Israel, and who compared it unfavorably with Abana and Pharpar, the rivers of his own country, 2 Ki. v. 12. Continuing its course, and flowing through the Sea of Galilee, the exit of the Jordan is at Kerak, anciently called Tarichœa, the naval station of Josephus in his war with the Romans. From this point the Jordan commences the third and last division of its course, and rushes into the Dead Sea through frequent rapids, and with so many windings that in sixty miles of the direct distance which it traverses its actual length is two hundred miles. It has twice been fully explored—by Lieutenant Molyneux in 1847, and by Lieutenant Lynch in 1848. At Tarichœa its stream is one hundred feet wide and four or five feet deep, but in many places lower down it is split up into innumerable rivulets, too small for navigation, while at other times it flows in one tortuous and rapid stream between steep cliffs and high banks. Two streams of importance join it on its way, the Hieromax or Jarmuk and the Jabbok, both from the eastern side. There were anciently four fords of the Jordan—the first at Tarichœa, the second at the confluence of the Jabbok and the other two near Jericho. But its bed must have undergone considerable changes, if we are to receive the observation of Lieutenant Molyneux, who says, “There are many hundreds of places where we might have walked across without wetting our feet on the large rocks and stones.”

The site of our Lord’s baptism is now generally placed at Bethabara, John i. 28, the second of the above-mentioned fords, near Succoth, near also to “Enon near to Salem,” where we read of the Baptist afterward, John iii. 23; and the wild scenery of this spot would agree far better with St. John’s character and life than that of the traditional site near Jericho, which was no doubt chosen as being near to Jerusalem, and so more convenient to the pilgrims who frequent it. At this latter spot, or in its neighborhood, the passage of the Israelites took place, Josh. iv., and afterward the passage of Elijah and Elisha, followed by Elisha’s return, 2 Ki. ii. 8, 14. The Jordan is here about eighty feet broad and nine deep. It rushes in a turbid stream between high banks covered with tamarisks and willows, so that there are few places of access to its waters. At one of these, on Monday before Easter, the Pilgrims of the Greek Church, often eight thousand in number, who have come down from Jerusalem escorted by the pasha and a guard of Turkish soldiers, perform the well-known ceremony of bathing in the sacred stream. A short distance below this the river loses itself in the clear and lifeless waters of the Dead Sea.

The Jordan is emphatically the river of Palestine, as the Nile is the river of Egypt. No other stream of importance was known to the Israelites; and in one passage it is used as the representative of all great rivers: “He trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into its mouth,” Job xl. 23. In consequence of its long course, direct in the main, though winding, throughout the country from north to south, it naturally formed the great eastern boundary, at first of the land promised of old to Abraham, and afterward, when the two tribes had settled in the territory of Sihon and Og, of Palestine proper, the home of the remaining ten tribes. Hence the expressions “on this side Jordan,” “on the other side Jordan,” “beyond Jordan,” etc.

but sixty miles from the Dead Sea in a direct line, and yet the difference of level is no less than one thousand feet. This has been explained by the expeditions of Lieutenants Molyneux and Lynch, who found no less than twenty-seven rapids in this part of its course; and moreover, the latter writes, “The great secret of the depression between the Lake Tiberias and the Dead Sea is solved by the tortuous course of the Jordan. In a space of sixty miles of latitude and four or five miles of longitude the Jordan traverses at least two hundred miles.”

JORDAN, VALLEY OF. This name is generally applied to the country between the Lake of Tiberias and the southern end of the Dead Sea. Its Old Testament name was “the desert,” translated in most places “the plain;” in Deut. ii. 30, “the champaign;” in Josh. xviii. 18, “Arabah,” JOPPA FROM THE SOUTH.—See JOPPA.

There are two phenomena connected with the Jordan that remain to be noticed.

1. Its Annual Rise.—It is easy to account for this taking place so late in the year as “barley harvest” when it is borne in mind that it rises in permanent springs which are not affected by the early winter rains; nor is it till the snows on Lebanon or Hermon begin to melt that its tributary streams attain their full volume. Then there is a further delay while the lakes of Merom and Gennesaret are being filled, before at length they pour their accumulated waters into the lower Jordan. Lieutenant Lynch says: “The river was falling rapidly; the banks showed a daily fall of about two feet, and frequently we saw sedge and drift-wood high up on the branches of overhanging trees, above the surface of the banks, which conclusively proves that the Jordan in its swelling still overflows the plain and drives the lion from his lair as it did in the ancient times,” Jer. xlix. 19; l. 44.

2. Its Rapid Descent.—The Lake of Galilee is and in Ezek. xlvii. 8, “the desert.” By Josephus and the later Jews it is called Aulon. Its modern Arabic name is El Ghor. It is a deep-sunken plain, sixty miles long, gradually sloping from the level of six hundred and fifty feet to that of thirteen hundred feet below the Mediterranean. In most places it is about eight miles broad, but at the northern end of the Dead Sea the mountains recede and leave a space twelve miles in width, the western portion of which is often called “the plains of Jericho.” Its general appearance is that of a wide valley shut in by mountains on either side; those on the west continuous like a wall, but rent by deep wild chasms; those on the east more varied, often receding and intersected with fertile plains. The valley is divided across by a low ridge called Kurn Surtabeh, situated one-third of the distance from the Dead Sea to the Lake of Tiberias. Longitudinally it is divided into terraces two or three in number on each side of the river. The upper of these terraces on each side, immediately under the hills, is covered with vegetation; the middle terrace is the wide desert plain, the arabah, properly so called, which in its southern part is barren, except where large springs fertilize it. Its northern part is fertile and cultivated, bearing its harvest earlier than other parts of Palestine, but on account of its great heat requiring irrigation. It is inhabited by fellahin where fertile, elsewhere by Bedouins. The lowest terrace is occupied by a jungle of agnus castus, tamarisks and willows, sometimes fringed by a brake of reed and cane at the banks of the river itself. From this jungle the lion of old was driven by "the swelling of Jordan," Jer. xlix. 19, and the traces of other wild beasts may in modern days be found in it. But the distinction of these terraces cannot be traced throughout its course. The jungle of willows and tamarisks is alone continuous, and sometimes occupies the whole valley. In the neighborhood of Kerak, at the outlet of the Jordan from the Lake of Tiberias, the Ghor, or great valley of the Jordan, is about eight or nine miles broad; and this space is anything but a flat—nothing but a continuation of bare hills, with yellow, dried-up reeds, which look when distant like corn-stubbles. These hills, however, sink into insignificance when compared to the long range of mountains which encloses the Ghor; and it is, therefore, only by comparison that this part of the Ghor is entitled to be called a valley.

Lower down, near Jisr Mejamia, the Ghor or valley begins to bear a much better and more fertile aspect. It appears to be composed of two different platforms; the upper one on either side projects from the foot of the hills which form the great valley, and is tolerably level, but barren and uncultivated. It then falls away in the form of rounded sand-hills, or whitish perpendicular cliffs, varying from one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet in height, to the lower plain, which should more properly be called the valley of the Jordan. The river here and there washes the foot of the cliffs which enclose this smaller valley, but generally it winds in the most tortuous manner between them. . . . About this part of the Jordan the lower plain might be perhaps one and a half or two miles broad, and so full of the most rank and luxuriant vegetation, like a jungle, that in a few spots only can anything approach its banks. Some of the bushes and ferns are very beautiful, particularly a feathery-leaved tree, something like the cedar of Lebanon, of which there is a great quantity.

The lower valley is about three quarters of a mile broad, and within these bounds the river winds extremely. The cliffs on either side have still the same whitish, chalky appearance, and fall away abruptly from the upper land, which both to the east and west of the river, for the last thirty miles of its course, has a barren and desolate appearance and is but little cultivated. Near Jericho the formation of the ground becomes less regular; the western mountains in one or two places jut out considerably into the Ghor; the cliffs less exactly mark the bounds of the lower plain; and just abreast of Jericho, near the bathing-place, the descent from the higher ground is by a number of rounded sand-hills.

The Jordan valley fell to the lot of several of the tribes. Its eastern terraces were pastured by the flocks of Gad and Reuben, and its western plains were occupied by Issachar, Josh. xix. 22, Manasseh, Josh. xvii. 9, and Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 18. Its history is that of the river whose name it bears, and most of the remarkable events which took place in it are referred to in the preceding article and in that on Jericho.

JORIM (jo'rim), a person named in the ancestry of Christ, Luke iii. 29.

JORIS (jo'ris), DAVID, founder of a sect of Anabaptists, was born at Delft, in Holland, in 1502. This enthusiast, after having laid the foundation of the sect of the "Davidists," or "David-Georgians," deserted the Anabaptists and removed to Basle, in Switzerland, in the year 1544, where he changed his name, and by the liberality and splendor that attended his opulence, joined to his probity and purity of manners, acquired a very high degree of esteem, which he preserved till his death. The lustre of his reputation was, however, but transitory, for soon after his decease, which happened in 1556, he was charged with having maintained the most blasphemous errors. The senate of Basle, before whom this accusation was brought, being satisfied with the evidence by which it was supported, ordered his body to be dug up and publicly burned. He is said to have given himself out for the Son of God, to have denied the existence of angels and to have rejected the doctrine of a future judgment, and he is also charged with having trampled upon the rules of decency and modesty with the utmost contempt. In all this, however, it is very possible that there may be much exaggeration. The enthusiast in question, though a man of some natural genius, was, nevertheless, totally destitute of learning of every kind, and had something obscure, harsh and illiberal in his manner of expression, that gave too much occasion to an unfavorable interpretation of his religious tenets. That he had more sense and more virtue than is generally imagined appears not only from his numerous writings, but also from the simplicity and candor that were visible in the temper and spirit of the disciples he left behind him; but the excessive warmth of an irregular imagination threw him into allusions of the most dangerous and pernicious kind, and seduced him into a persuasion that he was divinely inspired.

JORKOAM (jor'ko-am), possibly a place in the tribe of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 44.

JORNANDES (jor'nan-des), or JORDANES (jor-da'nes), a historian of the sixth century, was by birth a Goth, or both of Alan and Gothic descent. He was first a notary, but afterward adopted the Christian religion, and was made bishop of Croton, in Italy. He wrote "Concerning the Origin and Deeds of the Goths," a work which has obtained great renown, chiefly from its being our only source of information about the Goths and other barbarian tribes, except when they are casually mentioned by some Greek or Latin historian. The work is, however, full of inaccuracies.

JORTIN (jor'tin), JOHN, D.D., an eminent scholar and divine, was born in London, in 1698, and educated at Cambridge. Here he acquired so high a character for learning and acuteness that he was employed by Pope to select the notes from Eustathius, to print with his translation of the Iliad. He took orders in 1724, and held successively the livings of Swavesey, St. Dunstan's in the East and Kensington; he was also a prebendary of St. Paul's and archdeacon of London. His chief works are—"Discourses Concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion," "Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, Ancient and Modern," "Remarks upon Ecclesiastical History," "Life of Erasmus" and seven volumes of "Sermons and Charges," which were printed after his death. He was simple in manners, liberal in sentiments, independent in spirit and as much beloved for his private virtues as he was admired for his piety and learning. He died in 1770.

JOSEPH (jo'sef), son of Jacob and Rachel, born under peculiar circumstances, as may be seen in Gen. xxx. 22, on which account and because he was the son of his old age, Gen. xxxvii. 3, he was beloved by his father more than were the rest of his children, though Benjamin, as being also a son of Jacob's favorite wife, Rachel, was in a peculiar manner dear to the patriarch. The partiality evinced toward Joseph by his father excited jealousy on the part of his brethren, the rather that they were born of different mothers, Gen. xxxvii. 2. Joseph had reached his seventeenth year, having hitherto been engaged in boyish sports or aiding in pastoral duties, when some conduct on the part of "the sons of Bilhah and the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives," seems to have been such as in the opinion of Joseph to require the special attention of Jacob, to whom, accordingly, he communicated the facts. This regard to virtue, and this manifestation of filial fidelity, greatly increased his brothers' dislike, who henceforth "hated him and could not speak peaceably unto him," Gen. xxxvii. 4. Their aversion, however, was carried to the highest pitch when Joseph acquainted them with two dreams that he had had, to the effect—the first, that while he and they were binding sheaves his sheaf arose and stood erect, while theirs stood round and did obeisance to his; the second, that "the sun and the moon and the eleven stars paid him homage." These dreams appeared to indicate that Joseph would acquire pre-eminence in the family, if not sovereignty; and while even his father rebuked him, his brothers were filled with envy. Jacob, however, was not aware of the depth of their ill-will; so that on one occasion, having a desire to hear intelligence of his sons, who were pasturing their flocks at a distance, he did not hesitate to make Joseph his messenger for that purpose. His appearing in view of his brothers was the signal for their malice to gain head. They began to devise means for his immediate destruction, but through the interference of his half-brother, Reuben, a compromise was entered into, in virtue of which the youth was stripped of the distinguishing vestments which he owed to his father's affection and cast into a pit. Having performed this evil deed, and while they were taking refreshment, the brothers beheld a caravan of Arabian merchants, who were bearing the spices and aromatic gums of India down to the well-known and much-frequented mart, Egypt. Judah on this feels a bitter emotion arise in his mind, and proposes that, instead of allowing Joseph to perish, they should sell him to the merchants, whose trade obviously embraced human beings as well as spicery. Accordingly, the unhappy young man was sold for a slave, to be conveyed by his masters into Egypt. While on his way thither, Reuben returned to the pit, intending to rescue his brother and convey him safely back to their father. Joseph was gone. On which Reuben went to the wicked young men, who, not content with selling a brother into slavery, determined to punish their father for his partiality toward the unoffending sufferer. With this view they dipped Joseph's party-colored garment in the blood of a kid and sent it to Jacob, in order to make him believe that his favorite child had been torn to pieces by some wild beast. The trick succeeded, and Jacob was grieved beyond measure.

Meanwhile, the merchants sold Joseph to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh and captain of the royal guard, who was a native of the country. It is by no means easy to determine who at this time was the Pharaoh, or ruling monarch, though the condition of the country and the progress of civilization are made clear in the course of the narration.

In Potiphar's house Joseph enjoyed the highest confidence and the largest prosperity. A higher power watched over him, and whatever he undertook succeeded, till at length his master gave everything into his hands. The Hebrew race have always been remarkable for personal beauty, of which Joseph seems to have had an unusual share. This fact explains, if it cannot palliate, the conduct of Potiphar's wife, who tried every means to bring the uncontaminated and pure-minded youth to fulfill her unchaste desires. Foiled in her evil wishes, she resolved to punish Joseph, who thus a second time innocently brings on himself the vengeance of the ill-disposed. Charged with the very crime to which he had in vain been tempted, he is, with a fickleness characteristic of Oriental lords, at once cast into the state prison.

The narrative, which is obviously constructed in order to show the workings of divine Providence, and may not possibly have received some shape or hue from the predominant idea, states, however, that Joseph was not left without special aid, in consequence of which he gained favor with the keeper of the prison to such an extent that everything was put under his direction. If the suddenness and magnitude of this and other changes in the lot of Joseph should surprise any one, the feeling will be mainly owing to his want of acquaintance with the manners and customs of the East, where vicissitudes not less marked and sudden than are those presented in our present history are not uncommon, for those who come into the charmed circle of an Eastern court, especially if they are persons of great energy of character, are subject to the most wonderful alternations of fortune, the slave of to-day being the vizier of to-morrow.

Among the many advantages secured to posterity by this interesting and admirable narrative regarding the patriarch Joseph is an intimate acquaintance, so far as it goes, with the state of civilization in Egypt. In the part at which we are now arrived we read of "the chief of the butlers" and "the chief of the bakers," officers who vouch by the duties which they had to discharge for the

the free air of day; but when again in the enjoyment of his butlership, he forgot Joseph, Gen. xl. Pharaoh himself, however, had two dreams, which found in Joseph a successful expounder, for the butler remembered the skill of his prison companion, and advised his royal master to put it to the test in his own case. Pharaoh's dream, as interpreted by Joseph, foreboded the approach of a seven years' famine, to abate the evils of which Joseph recommended that some discreet and wise man should be chosen and set in full power over the land of Egypt. The monarch was alarmed, and called a council of his advisers. The wisdom of Joseph was recognized of divine origin and super-eminent value, and the king and his ministers resolved that Joseph should be made—to borrow a term from Rome—dictator in the approaching time of need. It has been supposed that Joseph was taken into the priestly order, and thus ennobled. The Biblical narrative does not support this opinion, though it leaves it without a doubt that in reality, if not in form as well, the highest trust and the proudest honors of the state were conferred on one so recently a Hebrew slave.

Seven years of abundance afforded Joseph opportunity to carry into effect such plans as secured an ample provision against the seven years of need. The famine came, but it found a prepared people. The visitation did not depend on any mere local cause, for "the famine was over all the face of the earth; and all countries came into Egypt to Joseph to buy corn," Gen. xl. 56, 57. Among these customers appeared ten brethren, sons of the Hebrew Jacob. They had of necessity to appear before Joseph, whose license for the purchase of corn was indispensable. Joseph had probably expected to see them, and he seems to have formed a deliberate plan of action. His conduct has brought on him the always ready charges of those who advanced and complex condition of society in which their services were required and supplied. How true and trustworthy, too, the Biblical narrative is may be learned by an implication which is here offered. The head butler had a dream in which he saw a vine. On the authority of Herodotus and others, it was long denied that the vine grew in Egypt; and if so, the imagery of the butler's dream would hardly have been appropriate. Wilkinson, however, has shown beyond a question that vines did grow in Egypt, and thus not only removed a doubt, but given a positive confirmation of the sacred record.

The two regal officers just mentioned had, while in prison with Joseph, each one a dream, which Joseph interpreted correctly. The butler, whose fate was auspicious, promised the young Hebrew to employ his influence to procure his restoration to would rather impeach than study the Bible, and even friends of that sacred book have hardly in this case done Joseph full justice. Joseph's main object appears to have been to make his brothers feel and recognize their guilt in their conduct toward him. For this purpose suffering was indispensable. Accordingly, Joseph feigned not to know his brothers, charged them with being spies, threatened them with imprisonment and allowed them to return home to fetch their younger brother, as a proof of their veracity, only on condition that one of them should remain behind in chains with a prospect of death before him should not their words be verified. Then it was, and not before, that "they said one to another, We are very guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul and would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us. And Reuben said, Spake I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child, and ye would not hear? Therefore, behold also his blood is required," Gen. xliii. 21. On which, after weeping bitterly, he by common agreement bound his brother Simeon, and left him in custody. How deeply concerned Joseph was for his family, how true and affectionate a heart he had, may be learned from the words which escape from the brothers in their entreaty that Jacob would allow Benjamin to go in to Egypt as required by Joseph: "The man asked us straitly of our state and of our kindred, saying, Is your father yet alive? have ye another brother?" Gen. xliii. 7. At length Jacob consents to Benjamin's going in company with his brothers: "And God Almighty give you mercy before the man, that he may send away your other brother and Benjamin. If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved," Gen. xliii. 14. Thus provided, with a present consisting of balm, honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds, and with double money in their hands, they went again down to Egypt and stood before Joseph, Gen. xliii. 15; and there, too, stood Benjamin, Joseph's beloved brother. The required pledge of truthfulness was given. If it is asked why such a pledge was demanded, since the giving of it caused pain to Jacob, the answer may be thus: Joseph knew not how to demean himself toward his family until he ascertained its actual condition. That knowledge he could hardly be certain he had gained from the mere words of men who had spared his life only to sell himself into slavery. How had these wicked men behaved toward his venerable father? His beloved brother Benjamin, was he safe? or had he suffered from their jealousy and malice the worse fate which he himself had been threatened? Nothing but the sight of Benjamin could answer these questions and resolve these doubts.

Benjamin had come, and immediately a natural change took place in Joseph's conduct. The brother began to claim his rights in Joseph's bosom. Jacob was safe, and Benjamin was safe. Joseph's heart melted at the sight of Benjamin. "And he said to the ruler of his house, Bring these men home, and slay and make ready, for these men shall dine with me at noon," Gen. xliii. 16. But guilt is always the ready parent of fear. Accordingly, the brothers expected nothing but being reduced to slavery. When taken to their own brother's house, they imagined they were being entrapped. A colloquy ensued between them and Joseph's steward, whence it appeared that the money put into their sacks, to which they now attributed their peril, was in truth a present from Joseph, designed, after his own brotherly manner, to aid his family in their actual necessities.

Noon came, and with it Joseph, whose first question regarded home. "He asked them of their welfare, and said, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake? Is he yet alive? And he lifted up his eyes and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son. And Joseph made haste, for his bowels did yearn upon his brother, and he sought where to weep, and he entered into his chamber and wept there." Does this look like harshness?

The connection brings into view an Egyptian custom which is of more than ordinary importance in consequence of its being adopted in the Jewish polity: "And they set on (food) for him by himself (Joseph), and for them by themselves (the brethren), and for the Egyptians which did eat with them, by themselves, because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination with the Egyptians," Gen. xliii. 32. This passage is also interesting as proving that Joseph had not, in his princely grandeur, become ashamed of his origin, nor consented to receive adoption into a strange nation; he was still a Hebrew, waiting, like Moses after him, for the proper season to use his power for the good of his own people.

Other customs appear in this interesting narrative: "And they (the brothers) sat before him (Joseph), the first-born according to his birthright, and the youngest according to his youth." "And he sent messes (delicacies) unto them from before him, but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs," ver. 32, 33. Fear had now given place to wonder, and wonder at length issued in joy and mirth. Thus ended the second act in the drama. Another now opens.

Joseph, apparently with a view to ascertain whether they would make any and what sacrifice in order to fulfill their solemn promise of restoring Benjamin in safety to Jacob, orders not only that every man's money should be put in his sack's mouth, but also that his "silver cup, in which my lord drinketh, and whereby he divineth," should be put in the sack's mouth of the youngest. The brethren leave, but are soon overtaken by Joseph's steward, who charges them with having surreptitiously carried off this costly and highly-valued vessel. They on their part vehemently repel the accusation, adding, "With whomsoever of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord's bondmen." A search is made, and the cup is found in Benjamin's sack. Accordingly, they return to the city. And now comes the hour of trial. Would they purchase their own liberation by surrendering Benjamin? After a most touching interview, Joseph declares himself unable any longer to withstand the appeal of natural affection. On this occasion Judah, who is the spokesman, shows the deepest regard to his aged father's feelings, and entreats for the liberation of Benjamin even at the price of his own liberty. In the whole of literature we know of nothing more simple, natural, true and impressive; nor, while passages of this kind stand in the Pentateuch, can we even understand what is meant by terming that collection of writings "the Hebrew national epic," or regarding it as an aggregation of historical legends. If here we have not history, we can in no case be sure that history is before us, Gen. xlv.

Most natural and impressive is the scene also which ensues, in which Joseph, after informing his brethren who he was, and inquiring, first of all, "Is my father alive?" expresses feelings free from the slightest taint of revenge, and even shows how, under divine Providence, the conduct of his brothers had issued in good: "God sent me before you to preserve a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance." Five years had yet to ensue in which "there would be neither earing nor harvest," and therefore the brethren were directed to return home and bring Jacob down to Egypt with all speed. "And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck and wept, and Benjamin wept upon his neck. Moreover, he kissed all his brethren and wept upon them, and after that his brethren talked with him," Gen. xlv. 14, 15.

The news of these striking events was carried to Pharaoh, who, being pleased at Joseph's conduct, gave directions that Jacob and his family should come forthwith into Egypt: "I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land; regard not your stuff, for the good of the land is yours." The brethren departed, being well provided for: "And to his father Joseph sent ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she asses laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way."

The intelligence which they bore to their father was of such a nature that "Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not." When, however, he had recovered from the thus naturally told effects of his surprise, the venerable patriarch said, "Enough; Joseph my son is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die," Gen. xlv. 26, 28.

Accordingly, Jacob and his family, to the number of threescore and ten souls, go down to Egypt, and by the express efforts of Joseph are allowed to settle in the district of Goshen, where Joseph met his father: "And he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while." There Joseph "nourished his father and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families," Gen. xlvii. 12.

Meanwhile, the predicted famine was pauperizing Egypt. The inhabitants found their money exhausted and their cattle and substance all gone, being parted with in order to purchase food from the public granaries, until at length they had nothing to give in return for sustenance but themselves. "Buy us," they then imploringly said to Joseph, "and our land for bread, and we and our land will be slaves unto Pharaoh." "And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, so the land became Pharaoh's." The people, too, "Joseph removed to cities from one end of the borders of the land to the other end." Religion, however, was too strong to submit to the political and social changes, and so the priests still retained their land, being supplied with provisions out of the common store gratuitously. The land, which was previously the people's own, was now let to them on a tenancy, at the rent of one-fifth of the produce, the land of the priests being exempted.

This is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, social revolution recorded in history. Under the pressure of famine an entire nation is reduced from freedom to dependence, while the population, which had been apparently limited to certain districts, was distributed all over the land on different spots.

At this distant period it may not be easy to understand and explain the entire conduct observed by Joseph in this crisis of the nation's fate, but we must protest against the application to it of measures of judgment which are derived from modern notions and the pure and lofty morality of the gospel. If a great change was suddenly effected in the social condition of the people, we are not hastily to conclude that the change was for the worse, especially considering that a very long and grievous famine had afflicted so fertile a land as Egypt under the previously existing social condition. And if an opportunity was taken to increase the royal power over the nation, it cannot be denied that the nation was saved from impending destruction by the foresight, wisdom and benevolence of the Hebrew vizier.

Joseph had now to pass through the mournful scenes which attend on the death and burial of a father. Having had Jacob embalmed, and seen the rites of mourning fully observed, the faithful and affectionate son, leave being obtained of the monarch, proceeded into the land of Canaan, in order, agreeably to a promise which the patriarch had exacted, to lay the old man's bones with those of his fathers in the "field of Ephron the Hittite." Having performed with long and bitter mourning Jacob's funeral rites, Joseph returned into Egypt. The last recorded act of his life forms a most becoming close. After the death of his father, his brethren, unable, like all guilty people, to forget their criminality, and characteristically finding it difficult to think that Joseph had really forgiven them, grew afraid, now they were in his power, that he would take an opportunity of inflicting some punishment on them. They accordingly go into his presence, and in imploring terms and an abject manner entreat his forgiveness. "Fear not"—this is his noble reply—"I will nourish you and your little ones."

Joseph lived an hundred and ten years, kind and gentle in his affections to the last; for we are told, "The children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were brought up upon Joseph's knees," Gen. l. 23. And so, having obtained a promise from his brethren that when the time came, as he assured them it would come, that God should visit them, and "bring them unto the land which he swore to Abraham, to Isaac and to Jacob," they would carry up his bones out of Egypt, Joseph at length "died, and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin," Gen. l. 26. This promise was religiously fulfilled. His descendants, after carrying the corpse about with them in their wanderings, at length put it in its final resting-place in Shechem, in a parcel of ground that Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor, which became the inheritance of the children of Joseph, Josh. xxiv. 32.

By his Egyptian wife Asenath, daughter of the high-priest of Heliopolis, Joseph had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, whom Jacob adopted, and who accordingly took their place among the heads of the twelve tribes of Israel.

2. One of the spies who were despatched to search out the Promised Land—the representative of the tribe of Issachar, Num. xiii. 7. 3. A person of the family of Bani who was among those that had married heathen wives after the return from Babylon, and were compelled by Ezra to part with them, Ezra x. 42. 4. A priest, Neh. xii. 14, an ancestor of Judith, Judith viii. 1. 5. A Jewish captain in the Maccabean wars, 1 Macc. v. 8. 6. John, the brother of Judas Maccabæus, appears to have been sometimes called Joseph, 2 Macc. viii. 22; x. 19.

7. The husband of the Virgin Mary and the reputed or legal father of Jesus. Of his personal history next to nothing is known, except what is recorded in connection with the birth and child-charge given by our Lord on the cross to John to view Mary henceforth as his mother—a charge which he carried out by taking her to his own home, John xix. 27. We cannot imagine such a thing should have taken place, or have even been thought of, if Joseph had been still alive. This reserve in gospel history is remarkable, and contrasts strikingly with the numerous legends concerning Joseph which sprang up in after times, and which have found a record in some of the apocryphal gospels. It shows how intent the Evangelists were on their one grand theme, and how little they thought of gratifying the curiosity of their readers on points but incidentally connected with it.

8. A rich and honorable Israelite called, from his birth-place, "of Arimathea." He belongs to that class of persons who appear for a moment on the stage of sacred history to teach some great lesson or perform some special service, and then cease to be heard of. All we know of him is sim-hood of Jesus. Even this comprises but a limited number of particulars. He was in humble circumstances, though of royal lineage; resident at Nazareth, though retaining a civil connection with Bethlehem, where he sought to have his name taken at the general enrolment; followed the trade of a carpenter; was a man of devout and upright character; by divine admonition received Mary, to whom he had been previously espoused, as his wedded wife, knowing her to be with child of the Holy Ghost; fled with her and the infant Jesus to Egypt, having been so instructed, to escape the violence of Herod; on returning deemed it prudent to pass beyond the jurisdiction of Archelaus, and settled again at Nazareth; and there, after the mention by St. Luke, ch. ii. 41-52, of a visit paid by him to Jerusalem together with Mary and Jesus, when the latter had reached his twelfth year, we altogether lose sight of him. When the period arrived for Jesus showing himself to Israel, we read not unfrequently of Mary and of the brothers and sisters of Jesus, but never of Joseph. The natural inference is that he had meanwhile died, which is rendered in a manner certain by the ply that he was of Arimathea; that he was a man of wealth and a member of the supreme council of the Jews; that he was a person of enlightened views and godly character, secretly, indeed, a disciple of Jesus; that the fear which had hitherto prevented him from avowing his belief gave way when he saw the things which happened at the close of Christ's earthly career, so that he received courage to ask from Pilate the dead body of his Master, and had the unspeakable honor, along with Nicodemus, of laying it in his own new tomb that had been hewn from a rock in the immediate precincts of the city, Matt. xxvii. 57-60. In him it is seen how at times faith, when it really exists, though only as a feeble germ, can rise with the occasion to confront the most formidable difficulties—how again such faith, with its mighty action and triumphant results, is at times found in quarters where by men it may have least been expected; and viewed in connection with the predetermined and even formally announced purpose of God respecting Christ, the example shows how certainly the means and instruments will be forthcoming, however apparently impossible, at the proper time to execute the counsels of Heaven. It had been written centuries before the gospel age that somehow the promised Messiah, even when despised and rejected of men, and amid the darkest signs of condemnation and grief pouring out his soul an offering for sin, was yet to be with the rich in his death, Isa. liii. 9. Up till the moment when it became necessary to dispose of our Lord's mortal remains, it seemed as if this announcement had failed to come in remembrance, and as if it were impossible in the circumstances that any one could be found to do the part it indicated. But, lo! precisely at that crisis there appeared in Joseph of Arimathea, with his associate Nicodemus, the very instrumentality needed for the occasion; so that,

JOSEPH BEN CHIJA. This distinguished president of the college at Pumpadita, and reputed translator of Hagiographa into Chaldee, was born in Babylon about A. D. 270. He was a disciple of Jehudah ben Jecheskel, founder and president of the college at Pumpadita, and was installed as president of the college at Pumpadita about 330; but he was not permitted to occupy long this distinguished position, for he died in the third year of his rectorate, about 333. His learning was so extensive and his knowledge of the traditional lore was so profound that he obtained the appellation Uzziel—a fact which has led some to suppose that this Targum, ascribed to Jonathan, is in reality Joseph's. But there is no necessity for such a conclusion, since we are expressly told that Jonathan's Targum embodied the traditional renderings of Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, and that Joseph also was the depository of the ancient traditions. The identity of the renderings is therefore to be ascribed to the identity of the ancient source from which both paraphrasts drew their information. That a Chaldee paraphrase of the prophets existed before Joseph made his is moreover evident from the fact that he himself declares on several occasions, when discussing the meaning of a difficult passage in the Scriptures, "If we had not the Targum on this passage, we should not know what it means." But though the quotations in the Talmud from Joseph's Chaldee paraphrase are restricted to the prophets, yet the version in our rabbinic and Polyglot Bibles, which is now ascribed to him, is that of the Hagiographa—i. e., Psalms, Proverbs and Job. In his advanced life Joseph became totally blind, and also lost his memory, which greatly afflicted him and ruffled his temper, as he could not remember his own sayings about the traditions of the fathers.

JOSEPH, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, who had previously held the archbishopric of Ephesus, was elected in 1416. He was at first opposed to a union of the Eastern and Western Churches, but attended the Council of Florence in 1439. Here he showed himself a warm supporter of the proposed union, urging upon his companions and attendants the necessity of conciliating the Latins. Toward the close of the council he fell ill, and during his illness was induced to subscribe to the dogmas of the Latin Church on the points in dispute, but he greatly regretted his step, and died at Florence, June 10, 1439, before the conclusion of the council.

JOSEPH, SAINT, the hymnologist, was a Greek ecclesiastic, or keeper of the sacred vessels under Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century. He was a zealous defender of image-worship, the founder of a monastery at Constantinople and a celebrated writer of hymns in honor of the Virgin Mary. A collection of them, usually designated the "Mariale," is well known in the ecclesiastical literature of the Greek Church. He died at an advanced age in A. D. 883.

JOSEPHUS (jo-se'fus), FLAVIUS, the renowned Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem, A. D. 37. His father was a priest of the first course, and his mother belonged to the royal Asmonean family. The only authority for the outline of his life is his own self-laudatory autobiography; but in spite of the egregious vanity which marks every page of the performance, he does not seem to have willfully perverted any facts. He tells us that even at the age of fourteen he was so remarkable for learning that the high-priests and chief men of the city came to inquire of him about minute questions of the law. After a careful examination of the tenets held by the three chief sects of Jews—Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes—and after residing three years in the desert with the ascetic eremite Banus, he embraced Pharisaism, which, he says, resembled the Stoic philosophy. At the age of twenty-six he sailed to Rome to plead the cause of some imprisoned Jewish priests. Like St. Paul he was shipwrecked, but after a night's swimming was picked up by a Cyrenian

Three persons in the ancestry of Christ, Luke iii. 24, 26, 30. 12. A disciple surnamed BARSABAS was one of the two persons whom the primitive Church, immediately after the resurrection of Christ, nominated, praying that the Holy Spirit would show which of them should enter the apostolic band in place of the wretched Judas. On the lots being cast, it proved that not Joseph, but Matthias, was chosen.

Joseph bore the honorable surname of JUSTUS, which was not improbably given him on account of his well-known probity. He was one of those who had "complicated with the apostles all the time of "Sinai"—that is, one who is acquainted with all the traditions in succession since the giving of the law on Sinai. One of his favorite studies was the Jewish theosophy, the mysteries of which, being contained in the vision of Ezekiel respecting the throne of God, he endeavored to propound. Another department of his studies, which is of great interest to the Biblical student, was the rendering of the Hebrew Scriptures in Chaldee. From the twelve passages of his version which are quoted in the Talmud, it is evident that he translated Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea, Amos, Obadiah, Zephaniah and Zechariah, since these passages are distinctly cited with the declaration "as Rabbi Joseph has rendered it into Chaldee." These renderings are almost exactly the same that are given in the Targum of Jonathan ben vessel, and obtained the patronage of Poppæa, who gained his cause for him and dismissed him with great gifts. About the time of his return, A. D. 66, the Jewish insurrection broke out, the causes of which he very obscurely describes, although the greater part of his autobiography, as well as much of the book on the Jewish war, is occupied with this portion of his history. Although he despaired from the first, and advised his countrymen to submission, he accepted the command in Galilee, and has given us a most graphic account of the numerous plots and perils in which he was entangled during the brilliant and stormy period of his life as a general. After displaying consummate courage and ability in putting Galilee in a state of defence, and in resisting the Romans, he finally threw himself into Jotapata, which was taken after a splendid defence of forty-seven days. He hid himself with forty others in a cave, and being betrayed, refused to surrender on a promise of safety. Against his wishes they all determined to commit suicide, but at his proposal finally agreed to kill each other by lot, when he and another alone survived. They surrendered to the Romans, and Vespasian put him in chains, intending to send him to Nero—a fate which he avoided by prophesying Vespasian's future elevation to the purple. After three years of lenient imprisonment, A. D. 70, his prophecy came true, and his chains were cut off by order of Titus. He took part in the siege of Jerusalem, and was once struck senseless by a stone while urging the Jews to surrender. He was enabled by the patronage of Titus to save the lives of his brother and fifty other Jews, and to rescue from destruction a valuable copy of the Scriptures. Detested as he was, and suspected of double treachery both by Jews and Romans, subjected to endless accusations and attacks, his life must have been sufficiently burdensome, but the position of a renegade was rendered supportable by imperial favor, and probably by unlimited self-approbation. After the fall of Jerusalem he lived as a court-pensioner, comfortably following his literary pursuits, and surviving till the early years of Trajan's reign, about A. D. 103, in contented and wealthy infamy.

Josephus is one of those men for whose character, in spite of their learning, their ability, and even their good qualities, it is impossible to feel any respect. An almost girlish conceit is everywhere visible in his narrative of his own proceedings, and a consciousness of his own importance often betrays him into a superstition quite alien to the natural tone of his mind. Cunning, worldliness and a vulgar desire for external prosperity appear in him throughout his life. He was a fulsome flatterer of the great, and was not even ashamed to assume the name of Flavius, as though he had been a freedman of Titus. He was a strange mixture of the bigoted Pharisee and the time-serving Herodian, and he mingles the national pride of the patriot with the apostasy of a traitor. The worst stain on his character is his desertion of his country in the hour of her sorest need, and the fact that he was eager to kiss the hands that were reeking with her blood, and to sing the praises of the men for whom his countrymen could find no curse too deep or loud. While captive Judæa wept under her desolate palm tree, he could live in splendor in the house assigned to him by her conquerors, enjoy a share of their booty and boast of their patronage; while his countrymen were dead, degraded or enslaved, he could bear to see his own triumphal statue set up among their oppressors, and could sit as a congratulating guest, offering homage and adoring cringes, whilst the triumphal pageant for Judæa ravaged and Jerusalem burned filled the hours of a long summer's day ere it unfolded its pomps before him.

Josephus was an admirable writer. Although he could not pronounce Greek well, he writes it with singular purity, with the exception of a few constant errors, and he is fairly entitled to his own claim of possessing the highest qualifications for a Greek writer of Jewish history. Jerome well styles him "the Livy of the Greeks." "His work," says Niebuhr, "is one of the most charming and interesting books, and is read a great deal too little." Nevertheless, though he understood the duty and importance of veracity to the historian, yet he is often untrue, and his archæology abounds in distortions of historical facts and in falsifications which arise from his inordinate national pride; and wherever he deals in numbers, he shows his Oriental love of exaggeration. Hence his narrative, even of events sufficiently near his own times, requires constant correction.

sions, and especially by a rationalistic method of dealing with miracles, to make Jewish history palatable to Greeks and Romans. Thus he omits all the most important Messianic prophecies; he manipulates the book of Daniel in a most unsatisfactory manner; he speaks in a very loose way about Moses and Abraham; and though he can swallow the romance of the pseudo-Aristeas, he rationalizes the account of the Exodus and Jonah's whale.

Nothing is more certain than that Josephus was no Christian; the whole tone of his mind was alien from the noble simplicity of Christian belief, and, as we have seen already, he was not even a good Jew. Whatever, therefore, may be thought about the passages alluding to John the Baptist and James, "the Lord's brother," which may possibly be genuine, there can be no reasonable doubt that the famous allusion to our Lord is either absolutely spurious or largely interpolated. The silence of Josephus on a subject of such importance, and with which he must have been so thoroughly acquainted, is easily explicable, and it is intrin-

Yet he has received very hard measure at the hands of Baronius and other writers, and we must admit that his works have been preserved to us by a singular providence, and throw a flood of light on Jewish affairs.

It is hardly possible to overrate the importance of Josephus to the theologian. The numberless references to all his writings show how indispensable he is, and how constantly his works elucidate the history, geography and archæology of Scripture. Yet, in spite of his constant assertions, he can have had no real respect for the writings which he so largely illustrates. If he had felt, as a Jew, any deep or religious appreciation of the Old Testament history, which he professes to follow, he would not have tampered with it as he does, mixing it with pseudo-philosophical fancies, with groundless Jewish traditions, and with quotations from heathen writers of very doubtful authority. Moreover, he constantly varies from the sacred text in numbers and in names, so that in his genealogy of the high-priests scarcely five of the names agree with anything that we have in Scripture. The worst charge, however, against him is his constant attempt, by alterations and suppress-sions, much more probable that he should have passed over the subject altogether than that he should only have devoted to it a few utterly inadequate lines; and even if he had been induced to do this by some vague hope of getting something by it from Christians like Flavius Clemens, he certainly would not have expressed himself in language so strong, and still less would he have vouched for the Messiahship, the miracles or the resurrection. Justin, Tertullian, Chrysostom, Origen, and even Photius, knew nothing of the passage, nor does it appear till the time of Eusebius. Whether Eusebius forged it himself, or borrowed it from the marginalia of some Christian reader, cannot be determined, but that Josephus did not write it may be regarded as settled. Nay, the very next section is a disgusting story wholly irrelevant to the tenor of the narrative, and introduced in all probability for the sole purpose of a blasphemous parody on the miraculous conception, such as was attempted by various rabbinical writers. That Josephus intended obliquely to discredit some of the chief Christian doctrines by representing them as having been anticipated by the Essenes seems by no means improbable.

The works of Josephus are—1. "The Jewish Wars," in seven books, translated by himself from the Syro-Chaldee. 2. "Jewish Antiquities," in twenty books, an apologetic paraphrase of Scripture history for Gentiles. 3. "The Autobiography," in seventy-six chapters. 4. "Against Apion," a treatise of immense learning on the antiquity and nobility of the Jews. The other works attributed to him are not believed to be genuine.

JOSHUA (josh'u-a). 1. This eminent leader was the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, grandson of that Elishama who was prince of the tribe, Num. ii. 18, and probably seven descents from Joseph. He was originally called Oshea, but his name was changed to Jehoshua or Joshua, Num. xiii. 16, rendered in Greek "Jesus," Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8.

Joshua was born in Egypt, and was of mature age at the time of the exodus. We first hear of him as appointed to command the troops selected for resisting the attack of Amalek in Rephidim; he was completely successful, and Moses was directed to write an account of the victory, Ex. xvii. 8-16. He is afterward repeatedly mentioned as attending Moses, and was appointed one of the spies to search Canaan, Ex. xiii. 8. He alone with Caleb brought a true account, and expressed his firm persuasion that, according to God's promise, Israel was well able to dispossess the Canaanites.

To the faithful two it was declared that while the people were condemned to wander forty years in the wilderness, and the rest of the spies died almost immediately, they both should survive to inherit their portion of the good land. Moses, for his sin at Meribah, was not to lead the people over the Jordan, and Joshua was then solemnly designated as his successor, Ex. xxvii. 18-23; Deut. i. 38; and earnest charges were given him to be faithful in his high leadership, Ex. iii. 21, 22, 28. In this he may be considered as a type of Christ, bearing, to note no other particulars, the same name; and as the one led the Israelites into a place of earthly rest, so the other brings his chosen into the heavenly Canaan, the glorious eternal "rest" which "remaineth for the people of God," Heb. iv. 9.

Joshua, having assumed the command after Moses' death (at about eighty-three or eighty-four years of age), received a promise of continued support from God, Josh. i. 1-9; he then sent spies to Jericho, soon after crossed the Jordan with the host, the waters being miraculously cut off; and and maintained themselves in different strong places, and probably, as Israel grew remiss, afterward recovered several cities that had at first been taken. But Joshua was now in a position to allot the land to the various tribes. This was done in conjunction with Eleazar; and Timnath-serah, in Mount Ephraim, was given to the leader himself. Here doubtless he enjoyed a rest; but we find him at the close of his life again publicly charging the people, in two addresses, with some foreboding of the evil into which they would run after his decease. Then he died in peace, aged one hundred and ten years, and was buried in his own inheritance.

Joshua's character is a very noble one, and few blemishes are found in it. The favored disciple of Moses, he learned to be faithful to the Lord God. Once indeed he was too jealous for what he conceived Moses' honor, Num. xi. 28, 29. He was generally bold and fearless, though an unexpected check, as already noted, at one time dispirited him. But with these small exceptions, an able commander, a wise ruler, a faithful servant of the Lord, Joshua shines as a bright star among the noble luminaries with which God has decorated his Church; and his resolution may well be taken as the humble decision of all who bear the name of Christ: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord," Ex. xxiv. 15.

2. A man of Beth-shemesh, in whose field the cart stopped which brought back the ark from the Philistines, 1 Sam. vi. 14, 18. 3. A governor of Jerusalem, 2 Ki. xxiii. 8. 4. A high-priest after the captivity, Hag. i. 1 and elsewhere. In the books of Ezra and Nehemiah he is called Jeshua.

JOSHUA, THE BOOK OF. This book receives its name from its recording the conquest and appropriation of the land of Canaan by the Israelites under the leadership of Joshua. It may be considered as comprising three parts:

I. THE CONQUEST OF CANAAN: including the appointment of Joshua, and his directions to the people, Josh. i.; the spies sent to Jericho, Josh. ii.; the passage of the Jordan, Josh. iii., iv.; the circumcision and passover at Gilgal, Josh. v. 1-13; the capture and destruction of Jericho and of Ai, with Achan's sin and punishment, Josh. v. 14; viii. 29; the reading of the law on Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, Josh. viii. 30-35; the wily conduct of the Gibeonites, Josh. ix.; victories over the Canaanites, first in the south and then in the north; and the subjugation of the country, Josh. x., xi.; with a recapitulation of conquests, Josh. xii.

II. THE DIVISION OF THE COUNTRY: including both the conquered and the unconquered parts, describing the portions of the several tribes, Josh. xiii.-xix; the appointment of the cities of refuge and the Levitical cities, Josh. xx., xxi.; the return of the two tribes and a half east of Jordan, and transactions which followed thereupon, Josh. xxii.

III. JOSHUA'S FAREWELL ADMONITIONS AND DEATH, Josh. xxiii., xxiv.

Attempts are made by several modern critics to dismember this book; as if it were compiled by some comparatively late writer from various materials, which he has not succeeded, they say, in reducing to a consistent whole. Discrepancies are alleged and interpolations supposed; but when examined, they amount to little more than that whereas Joshua is represented as having subdued the entire country, yet portions are still said to be unconquered; that he is declared to have rooted out the Anakim, who appear afterward in force, and to have captured and destroyed many cities encamping at Gilgal, he renewed the divine covenant by circumcising the people, and afterward solemnly kept the passover, the manna now ceasing. He had then a vision of the Captain of the Lord's host, most probably no created being, but the Son himself; and according to God's command, he attacked and destroyed Jericho, the walls of which fell suddenly down, when Israel had for seven days compassed the city. But on a repulse before Ai, Joshua seems for the time to have lost heart; the cause, however, the crime of Achan, was soon discovered, the culprit punished, Ai taken, and Joshua, penetrating into the heart of the country, solemnly read the blessings and curses of the law on Gerizim and Ebal, as Moses had commanded. The submission of the Gibeonites, who obtained terms from Israel by fraud, and the consequent league of several southern chiefs, led to the conquest of a large part of the south; and another confederacy of northern kings drew on a battle and complete victory near the Lake of Merom; the north was then occupied, and after various campaigns, one of which is particularly specified against the gigantic Anakim, Joshua may be said to have had, in about six or seven years, military possession of the whole of the country. It is true that many of the Canaanites still held fastnesses, which subsequently were held against the Israelites. Some observations have been made in the preceding article which tend to explain these alleged contradictions; it is enough to say that generally, after campaigns are decided by great victories, there are sure to remain petty wars of detail, and that it was not possible for the Israelites at once to disseminate themselves through every corner of the country. It is natural, therefore, to suppose that places might be lost and won, occupied and reoccupied, by both contending parties. And we must remember that it by no means follows that the limitation of a general statement is a contradiction of it.

Neither is the alleged diversity of style and diction an argument of much force. The proofs brought to support it are insufficient. Besides, a portion of the book is historical, another portion geographical. If we find the style more complete and round in the one, more loose and feeble in the other, it is only what we might naturally expect. It is not denied that documents were used in the composition; the territorial descriptions of the districts allotted to the various tribes were most probably taken from the surveys made by the appointed officers; and so accurately have they been copied that, whereas too much land was at first allotted to Judah, and afterward Simeon's inheritance was taken out of it, both the first and second apportionments are preserved. Documents were used, then, but faithfully, judiciously and harmoniously. And so well is the book compacted that it is acknowledged that it is not possible with any certainty to separate it into what is regarded as its discordant parts.

Taking, then, the book of Joshua as a whole, we may inquire who was the author and to what date it is to be assigned. Conjectures as to the author range over a vast extent, from Joshua himself down to Jeremiah. Bleek, who places the book of Deuteronomy late, believes that the final editor of that was also the compiler of Joshua. In opposition to such a notion must be set the proofs that of Deuteronomy Moses was the author. Perhaps we may arrive by careful research at a more satisfactory result. The compilation was later than Joshua. He is said, indeed, Josh. xxiv. 26, to have committed several things to writing; but this record of his, though added, it would seem, to some book of authority previously existing, can hardly be supposed to include more than the renewal of the covenant, the circumstances and substance of the address he had just made to Israel. And there are indications that the composition must be placed later than the time of Joshua; for, to refer to but one of these, the expedition of the Danites to Leshem or Laish is mentioned, Josh. xix. 47, a fuller account of which is given in Judges xviii. And from that account it appears that a system of image-worship was established immediately on the settlement of Laish, ever after called Dan. We find, also, that the same system had previously existed in Mount Ephraim, probably for a few years. Now, though there are indications in Joshua's last address that he thought declension into idolatry not unlikely, and though there might be individual instances of sin, yet, looking at the declarations of Josh. xxiii. 8; xxiv. 31, we can hardly imagine that such flagrant examples of open image-worship could have occurred in that great captain's lifetime. Yet the date could not have been late; there are some expressions tending to prove this which must be noticed. We cannot, indeed, lay stress on vs. 1, 6, where the use of the first person is not decisive, but we may observe that Rahab is spoken of as still alive, Josh. vi. 25. We have no knowledge how long she lived, yet, as in all probability young at the taking of Jericho, she might very well have survived it sixty or seventy years. The expression, "She dwelleth in Israel even unto this day," would not have been used by one writing immediately; it points rather to a time when few who had taken part in the stirring scenes of the conquest still remained. The words "unto this day" occur not less than seventeen times in the whole book. The last four instances are found in Joshua's own addresses; that in Josh. vi. 25 is, as just observed, an argument for an early date, and the rest may very well come within, if not Joshua's lifetime, at least the next generation. But Josh. xv. 63 fixes a lower limit, later than which the composition of the book cannot be dated. In the seventh or eighth year of David's reign the Jebusites were expelled from Jerusalem, 2 Sam. v. 6-9. Perhaps, then, we may 5 showing how, by God's help, Canaan should be entirely subdued; 6 pointing to its distribution among the tribes; 7, 8 corresponding with the narrative of Josh. xxiii., xxiv. All the parts are closely linked together, the end of the first portion, Josh. xii., clearly preparing for an account of the division of the country, and the conclusion of the geographical sections referring back not only to Josh. xi. 23, but also to Josh. i. 2-6; while the remaining chapters both are necessary to narrate the return of the trans-Jordanic tribes to their own settlements and the close of Joshua's administration, and have also various references to what had preceded. The independent character of the book, moreover, is evidenced by the mention of the assignment of their lands to those Eastern tribes, and of the appointment of the refuge-cities; all of which had been narrated in the Pentateuch.

The canonical authority of this book has never been disputed; there are references to it (besides not unreasonably believe that this history was compiled in the days when judges ruled; it may be when some who witnessed the conquest were yet alive, or, if all had passed away, with such a scrupulous adherence to authorities as to embody some of the expressions in which eye-witnesses had chronicled the events as they occurred. There are indications, too, in the style, faint no doubt, but still pointing to the same period of time. It slightly differs from that of the Pentateuch, but yet is not quite assimilated to that of later books. To take a single instance: the expression "Lord of Hosts" is nowhere found in Joshua. It first occurs in 1 Sam. i. 3, 11, and thenceforth is sufficiently common.

It has been already said that this book has a historical and a geographical part. Some have believed that the last named was a subsequent addition. But there seems to be one leading idea, according to which the whole was arranged. Thus, in Josh. i. 2-9, a command and a promise are conjoined. Verses 5-8 are a kind of table of contents, allusions in the Old Testament) in Acts vii. 45; Heb. iii. 5; iv. 8; xi. 30, 31; James ii. 25.

But objection has been made to the credibility of the narrative because it records miraculous events. Thus, various expedients have been devised by men who seem to have a nervous fear of God's working a miracle to account for the statement that the walls of Jericho fell down. And great perplexity has been felt in regard to the assertion that the sun and moon stood still. The main argument against the literal truth of this wonder is that it must be of a character so stupendous that all other miracles sink in comparison into the shade. The plain meaning of which is that God may work an easy miracle, but not a hard one. As if hard and easy could have any place in respect to the power of Him at whose word creation started forth! Man is unable to perform the so-called least miracle; God is mighty enough to perform the so-called greatest. The only question for the reverent inquirer is whether the statement is so distinctly made that it must be received without violence to the text. A learned critic in an elaborate examination has endeavored to show that the historian is merely extracting from the poetical book of Jasher, which he cites by name, to apprise the reader that he by no means himself asserts the reality of the miracle. But if the statement were not literally true, why did the sacred writer introduce and so far endorse it? It is passing strange that an author, gravely recording history, should suddenly incorporate poetry with his prose, and intend it to be understood that the poetry was but a flourish, a fictitious exaggeration of plain fact. Mr. Greswell considers an ordinary day far too short for all the events said to have happened in it. He analyzes fully the narrative, and investigates the extraneous evidence which can be produced for the occurrence of the miracle. His conclusions are very weighty. It is

JOSHUA, THE GATE OF, one of the gates of Jerusalem, called after a person of the name who was governor of the city, 2 Ki. xxiii. 8. We have no means of identifying the position of this gate.

JOSIAH (jo-si'ah). 1. Seventeenth king of Judah and son of Amon, whom he succeeded on the throne in B. C. 698, at the early age of eight years, and reigned thirty-one years.

As Josiah thus early ascended the throne, we may the more admire the good qualities which he manifested. Avoiding the example of his immediate predecessors, he "did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in all the ways of David his father, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left," 2 Ki. xxii. 1, 2. So early as the sixteenth year of his age he began to to Jeroboam the future punishment of his sin. He even named Josiah as the person by whom this act was to be performed, and said that it should be performed in Bethel, which was then a part of the kingdom of Israel, 1 Ki. xiii. 2. All this seemed much beyond the range of human probabilities. But it was performed to the letter, for Josiah did not confine his proceedings to his own kingdom, but went over a considerable part of the neighboring kingdom of Israel, which then lay comparatively desolate, with the same object in view, and at Bethel, in particular, executed all that the prophet had foretold, 2 Ki. xxiii. 1-19. In these proceedings Josiah seems to have been actuated by an absolute hatred of idolatry such as no other king since David had manifested, and which David had scarcely occasion to manifest in the same degree.

In the eighteenth year of his reign and the twenty-sixth of his age, when the land had been thoroughly purified from idolatry and all that belonged to it, Josiah proceeded to repair and beautify the temple of the Lord. In the course of this pious labor, the high-priest Hilkiah discovered in the sanctuary a volume which proved to contain the books of Moses, and which, from the terms employed, seems to have been considered the original of the law as written by Moses. It appears that the king was greatly astonished when some parts of this were read to him. It is manifest that he had previously been entirely ignorant of much that he then heard; and he rent his clothes in consternation when he found that, with the best intentions to serve the Lord, he and all his people had been living in the neglect of duties which the law declared to be of vital importance. It is difficult to account for this ignorance. Some suppose that all the copies of the law not intended to decide dogmatically how the wonder was accomplished. It might be by a powerful refraction of the solar light. This we must be content to leave.

It may be added that, in corroboration of the general history of this book, a Phœnician inscription is cited as inscribed on a column in Africa, intimating that the Canaanites had fled from Joshua. Some writers, however, doubt the authenticity of this account.

Two other books bear the name of Joshua. One, printed 1848, is an Arabic chronicle, written most likely in the thirteenth century; it contains a legendary history of Joshua, with later stories, and comes down to the time of Theodosius the Great. The other (a part of the preceding) is in the Samaritan dialect, a free translation of the genuine book, modified according to the Samaritan dogmas. It was probably the work of a Samaritan who resided in Egypt.

manifest that enmity to idolatry in all its forms which distinguished his character and reign, and he was not quite twenty years old when he proclaimed open war against it, although more or less favored by many men of rank and influence in the court and kingdom. He then commenced a thorough purification of the land from all taint of idolatry by going about and superintending in person the operations of the men who were employed in breaking down idolatrous altars and images and cutting down the groves which had been consecrated to idol-worship. His detestation of idolatry could not have been more strongly expressed than by ransacking the sepulchres of the idolatrous priests of former days and consuming their bones upon the idol altars before they were overturned. Yet this operation, although unexampled in Jewish history, was foretold three hundred and twenty-six years before Josiah was born by the prophet who was commissioned to denounce had perished, and that the king had never seen one. But this is very unlikely; but however scarce complete copies may have been, the pious king was likely to have been the possessor of one. The probability seems to be that the passages read were those awful denunciations against disobedience with which the book of Deuteronomy concludes, and which from some cause or other the king had never before read, or which had never before produced on his mind the same strong conviction of the imminent dangers under which the nation lay as now when read to him from a volume invested with such a solemn character.

The king in his alarm sent to Huldah, "the prophetess," for her counsel in this emergency; her answer assured him that, although the dread penalties threatened by the law had been incurred and would be inflicted, he should be gathered in peace to his fathers before the days of punishment and sorrow came.

It was perhaps not without some hope of averting this doom that the king immediately called the people together at Jerusalem, and engaged them in a solemn renewal of the ancient covenant with God. When this had been done, the pass-over was celebrated with careful attention to the directions given in the law and on a scale of unexampled magnificence. But all was too late, the hour of mercy had passed, for "the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath, where-with his anger was kindled against Judah," 2 Ki. xxii. 3-20; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8-33.

That removal from the world which had been promised to Josiah as a blessing was not long delayed, and was brought about in a way which he had probably not expected. His kingdom was tributary to the Chaldean empire; and when Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, sought a passage through his territories on an expedition against the Chaldeans, Josiah, with a very high sense of the obligations which his vassalage imposed, refused to allow the march of the Egyptian army through his dominions, and prepared to resist the attempt by force of arms. Necho was very unwilling to engage in hostilities with Josiah; the appearance of the Hebrew army at Megiddo, however, brought on a battle, in which the king of Judah was so desperately wounded by arrows that his attendants removed him from the war-chariot and placed him in another, in which, apparently, he died whilst being taken to Jerusalem. No king that reigned in Israel was ever more deeply lamented by all his subjects than Josiah; and we are told that the prophet composed on the occasion an elegiac ode, which was long preserved among the people, but which is not now in existence, 2 Ki. xxiii. 29-37. 2. A son of Zephaniah, in whose house the symbolical crowning of Joshua, the high-priest, was represented by the prophet Zechariah as going to take place in the presence of the representatives from Babylon, Zech. vi. 10.

JOSIPPON BEN GORION (jo-sip'pon ben go're-on), also called JOSEPH BEN GORION, the reputed author of the celebrated Hebrew chronicle entitled "The Book of Josippon," or "The Hebrew Josippon." This chronicle consists of six books, begins its record with Adam, explains the genealogical table in Gen. xi., then passes on to the history of Rome, Babylon, Cyrus and the fall of Babel, resumes again the history of the Jews, describes the times of Daniel, Zerubbabel, Esther, etc., gives an account of Alexander the Great, his connection with the Jews, his exploits and expeditions of his successors, and then continues the history of the Jews, of Heliodorus' assault on the temple, the translation of the Old Testament into Greek, the deeds of the Maccabees, the events of the Herodians and the last war which terminated in the destruction of the temple by Titus.

As to the author and date of this book the greatest divergency of opinions prevails amongst scholars. The writer himself says that he is "the priest of Jerusalem"—i. e., Flavius Josephus—and that he was appointed governor of the whole Jewish nation by Titus; and this has been the unanimous opinion of the most learned Jewish writers since the days of Saadia, A. D. 950. It is quoted as the genuine production of Flavius Josephus by the celebrated Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Kimchi, Pseudo-Saadia, De Rossi and a host of other scholars, both Jewish and Christian. But Zunz has tried to show that this Josippon is ignorant of history. He says, for example, that Titus executed the high-priest Ishmael ben Elisa, and makes Ptolemy Lagi and Antigonus identical; he sometimes forgets to simulate Josephus, quotes the Latin translation of Josephus as belonging to somebody else and speaks of Josephus as a third person; he speaks of later nations and countries, viz., of Compagna, Romagna, Sorrento, Trani, Tessino, Po, Candia, the Danes, Turkomans and the Goths in Spain; he also describes the coronation of an emperor, and speaks of popes and bishops. Zunz, therefore, concludes that the writer was a French Jew who flourished in the ninth century, that this deceiver made the fragments of the genuine Josephus which had been translated into Hebrew the basis of his work, and that he made use of other apocryphal writings and his own imagination to fill up the gaps, and that subsequent hands have made all manner of interpolations into it. Zunz afterward, however, speaks of Josippon ben Gorion in more respectful terms, regards him as "the [Hebrew] translator and editor of Josephus," and says that "he lived in Italy about the middle of the latter half of the tenth century, and that his accounts of the several nations of his time are as important as his orthography of Italian towns is remarkable." Steinschneider, who also assigns his birth to the tenth century and to Northern Italy, describes the book as "the Hebrew edition of the Latin Hege-sippus," and as an offshoot from the fully developed Midrash of Arabian and Latin literature; whilst Graetz maintains that it is a Hebrew translation of an Arabic book of Maccabees, entitled "History of the Maccabees of Joseph ben Gorion," and that the translator, an Italian Jew, has made additions to it and displayed great skill in his Hebrew style.

JOST (yöst), ISAAC MARCUS, the ornament of modern Jews, the first Israelite who, since the days of Josephus, wrote the history of God's ancient people, was born in Bernburg, February 22, 1793, of very poor Jewish parents. At the tender age of five he, being the only brother of eleven sisters, had to become the guide of his blind father, a duty which he performed for five years with the utmost filial affection; and when his father died, in 1803, Jost went to Wolfenbüttel, where his grandfather lived, and where he was received into Samson's Institute. Here he spent four years studying Hebrew and the Talmud. At the age of thirteen he was for the first time properly instructed in German, which was his mother-tongue, and his unquenchable desire to learn other languages was then kindled. Favored with the friendship of a fellow-inmate, Leopold Zunz, Jost and his friend eagerly prosecuted their studies, laboring to acquire as much of Latin and Greek as would fit them for entering the Gymnasium. "Whole nights," he touchingly records, "have we labored by the tapers which we made ourselves from the wax that ran down the big wax-candles in the synagogue. By hard study we succeeded in bringing it so far in the course of the six months terminating with April, 1809, that we, Zunz in Wolfenbüttel and I in Brunswick, were put in the senior class in the Gymnasium." Jost remained in the Gymnasium at Brunswick till 1813, acquiring a wonderful knowledge of Latin and Greek, as well as of some modern languages, and then went to the university at Göttingen, where he most diligently devoted himself to the study of history, philology, philosophy and theology. In 1816 he undertook the management of a civil and commercial school at Berlin, which consisted of both Jewish and Christian youths, and to which he continued to devote his energies till 1833, though all the Christian students were ordered by a ministerial decree to leave it in 1819. It was here, during his seventeen years' attending to the school, that he published his gigantic historical work, entitled "History of the Israelites from the times of the Maccabees until the Present Day;" "Universal History of the Jewish People," being an abridgment, with corrections, of the former work; and "The Mishna," with the Hebrew text and vowel points, accompanied by a German translation, a rabbinic commentary and German annotations. His literary fame, as well as the great ability he displayed in the management of the school at Berlin, made the directors of the Jewish high-school at Frankfort-on-the-Main offer to him the office of head-master, which he accepted in 1835, and held to the end of his life. Whilst discharging his scholastic duties Jost vigorously prosecuted his literary researches, and started in 1839 "Jewish Annals," a weekly journal for Jewish history and literature, of which three volumes appeared. It is not too much to say that in this journal, to which some of the greatest Jewish literati contributed, the student of Biblical exegesis, Hebrew grammar or of Jewish antiquities and history will find materials which he will rarely meet with elsewhere. The same year in which this journal was discontinued Jost started a Hebrew periodical, of which appeared two volumes, entitled "Hebrew Ephemerides." This, like the former journal, is a very important contribution to Biblical and Jewish literature, and will always be read with great pleasure by the lover of the sacred language, owing to the beautiful Hebrew style in which it is written. All this time, however, Jost was laboring at his grand history of the Jews, of which he published three more parts, under the title "New History of the Israelites," being a continuation, and forming a tenth volume, of his great historical work; and he embodied all his historical and critical researches, in which he was engaged the whole of his life, in the "History of Judaism." This work is a cyclopædia of Jewish history and Biblical literature, containing the ripest scholarship of the nineteenth century. It would be impossible to catalogue the numberless articles which Jost contributed to various periodicals, all bearing more or less upon the history of the Jews and upon Scriptural subjects. After enriching the world for upward of forty years from his abundant stores of sacred literature, this noble descendant of Abraham died November 20, 1860.

JOT, Matt. v. 18. The Hebrew letter yod appears to be referred to, as the smallest in size of the alphabet. We have reason to conclude from this that the present characters were in use in our Lord's time. In the older, now called the Samaritan, alphabet, the yod was as large as any of the other letters.

JOTAPATA (jo-ta-pa'ta), a fortress in Galilee in which Josephus, by whom it had been strongly fortified, resisted for a considerable time the assault of the Romans under Vespasian, but was ultimately defeated and taken prisoner. Josephus describes it as situated on a precipitous rock of great height, and accessible only on the

From the time that his father was smitten with leprosy, Jotham had the administration of affairs much in his hand, 2 Chr. xxvi. 21, but on his father's death, and at the age of twenty-five, he ascended the throne, and reigned sixteen years, B. C. 758-742. He is represented as walking uprightly before God and being prospered in his reign. He made some addition to the defences of Jerusalem, and in various parts of the country built fortifications, 2 Ki. xv.; 2 Chr. xxvii. 3. A descendant of Judah, of whom nothing is known except that he was the son of Jahdai, 1 Chr. ii. 47.

JOUFFROY (zhoc-frwa'), THEODORE SIMON, a celebrated French philosopher, was born in 1796. At the age of ten he was confided to the care of his uncle, professor at the college of Pontarlier. After quitting the professorship of philosophy at the Bourbon College, 1820, he became a contributor to several journals. In 1833 he succeeded to the professorship of Greek and Latin philosophy at the college de France, and in 1835 he went to Italy on account of his health. He returned to Paris in 1838, and resigned his professorship at the college of France for the post of librarian to the university. To his translations of the works of Reid and Dugald Stewart may be attributed the popularity of their philosophy in France. Besides other works, he was the author of "Philosophical Miscellanies" and "The Law of Nature." He died in 1842.

JOURNEY (jur'ne). It is customary in the East to journey in the morning or evening, and to rest in the heat of the day. So the three strangers were naturally expected by Abraham to pause as he saw them coming toward his tent door, where he sat for coolness, Gen. xviii. 1-5. A day's journey was probably ten to twenty miles, Num. xi. 21; Deut. i. 2. A Sabbath's-day journey was two thousand cubits or paces, about six furlongs, or three-quarters of a mile, Acts i. 12. The measure is supposed to have been borrowed from the space left between the people and the ark when they passed the Jordan, Josh. iii. 4.

JOUVENCY (zhoo-vong-se'), JOSEPH DE, a learned Jesuit, was born at Paris, in 1643. His principal work is a continuation of the "History of the Jesuits." He also wrote "Notes on the Principal Latin Classics." He died in 1719.

JOVIAN (jo've-an), fully FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS JOVIANUS, born 331, was on the death of Julian elected emperor of Rome by the soldiers. He effected a disadvantageous peace with the Persians, against whom Julian had led his troops, and retired to Constantinople. He revoked the proscriptions of Julian against the Christians. He died in 364.

JOVINIAN (jo-vin'yan), an Italian monk of the fourth century who distinguished himself as a rational, temperate and spiritual opponent of the ascetic tendencies of the Church in that age. He denied the merit of celibacy and virginity, of fasting, and of martyrdom so far as it was a merely outward suffering; he taught that no one regenerated could fall from grace, and that in the resurrection all will be equal. Jovinian and eight of his adherents were condemned by Siricius, bishop of Rome, at a synod held in 390, and he fled to Milan. There he found a zealous opponent in Ambrose, and was again condemned and banished. Jerome wrote a violent book against Jovinian in 393. He was an example of those followers of the primitive and apostolic faith that existed in different classes of society and in different lands, who held the truth, when men of prominence whose names have come down to us had become the asserters of priestly rule, and the advocates of novelties and errors that helped forward the growing corruption of the Church. This early "Protestant," as he has been called, died before 406.

JOY, that happy state of mind which is the privilege and duty of God's servants, resulting from reconciliation with him through faith in Christ, Rom. v. 11. It is reckoned as one of the fruits of the Spirit, Gal. v. 22. It is to remain with those that keep Christ's commandments, John xv. 11. Future happiness is illustrated by the expression "joy of the Lord," Matt. xxv. 21, 23. Believers, therefore, are commanded to rejoice, Phil. iii. 1; iv. 4. But there is a worldly, foolish or hypocritical joy, Job xx. 5; Prov. xv. 21. That which has no better source than in vanity or sin will in the end be turned to bitterness.

JOZABAD (jo-za'bad), or JOSABAD. 1. Two chiefs of Manasseh who joined David as he went to Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 20. 3. One, probably a Levite, who took part in the reforms of Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxxi. 13. 4. A Levite chief in Josiah's reign, 2 Chr. xxxv. 9. 5. A Levite who helped to weigh the vessels brought to Jerusalem by Ezra, Ezra viii. 33. 6. A priest who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 22. 7. One who assisted in expounding the law when Ezra read, Neh. viii. 7; he may possibly be the same with No. 5. 8. A chief of the Levites, Neh. xi. 16, perhaps also the same person. 9. 1 Esd. ix. 29, Zabbai, Ezra x. 28.

JUBAL (joo'bal), son of Lamech by Adah, of the Cainite branch of Adam's family, celebrated as the inventor of the harp and organ, Gen. iv. 21—not organ, however, in the modern sense, but some simple wind instrument, probably a sort of fife or flute; so the word by its etymology appears to import.

JUBE. 1. A rood-loft at the entrance of the choir where the gospel in the Romish mass was sometimes read; so called from the words of the deacon: "Jube Domine benedicere" (Grant, O Lord, thy blessing). 2. The ambo was so called from the same reason.

JUBILEE, or JUBILE (joo'bi-le), a festal year prescribed by the Hebrew law, and so called as implying the flowing forth of loud sound, because it was ushered in by the clangor of trumpets. It recurred every fiftieth year, after seven sabbaths of years (not being, as some have supposed, the seventh sabbatical year), marking off a great cycle of time, so that at each half century the Israelitish polity began as it were afresh, a new morning of holy gratulation and recovered strength dawning on the land.

The account of this institution, which had its type in the weekly sabbath, is carefully given in the law, Lev. xxv. 8-16, 23-55, whence we learn that the jubilee commenced on the tenth day of the seventh month, and was proclaimed through the whole country. The laws respecting the jubilee embrace the following three main enactments: 1. Rest for the soil; 2. Reversion of landed property to its original owner, who had been driven by poverty to sell it; and 3. Manumission of those Israelites who through poverty or otherwise had become slaves.

The first enactment enjoins that, as on the sabbatical year, the soil is to be at rest, and that there should be no tillage nor harvest during the jubilee year. The Israelites, however, were permitted to fetch the spontaneous produce of the field for their immediate wants, but not to lay up in their store-houses.

By the second enactment, every man was to "return unto his possession"—that is, all alienated landed property was to revert to the original owner. There were two exceptions: houses in walled towns, if not redeemed within a year, became the purchaser's for ever, the jubilee release not touching them. But this provision did not apply to house-property belonging to Levites, which was the only property they could so mortgage, for they were forbidden to part at all with the field of the suburbs of their cities. The other exception related to lands dedicated to God. These, if not redeemed, or if so sold as to make redemption impossible by the original owner, did not return to him at the jubilee; they became the priests' for ever. But if the mortgagee or person who had purchased such lands dedicated them, in that case, as his right over them extended only for the time till the next jubilee, they returned then to the first proprietor, Gen. xxvii. 14-25. It was therefore a general principle that landed property could be alienated only for a term of years. The nearer to the jubilee, the shorter was the term, and the less that which could be raised upon the property. The owner, too, or his next representative, could, subject to the provisions above noticed, redeem his lands at any time; only, if they were sanctified to the Lord, he must add one-fifth of the estimated value to the redemption money.

The third enactment provided that Hebrew bondmen also became free in the year of jubilee, whether in servitude to their own countrymen or to resident foreigners (in which last case the right of redemption might at any time be exercised). Generally they were to serve their brethren but seven years, Ex. xxi. 1, 2; but if the jubilee occurred before the seven years expired, they obtained their liberty, even in all probability those who had declined leaving their master at the ordinary term, Ex. xxi. 5, 6. Josephus adds that debts were remitted at the jubilee. It is not, however, easy to see what practical operation such a provision could have had, as the jubilee immediately succeeded a sabbatical year, in which there was such a remission, Deut. xv. 1, 2, and the Scripture says nothing on the subject.

The Bible says nothing about the manner in which the jubilee is to be celebrated, except that it should be proclaimed by the blast of a trumpet. As in many other cases, the lawgiver leaves the practical application of this law, and the necessarily complicated arrangements connected therewith, to the elders of Israel. Now, tradition tells us that the trumpets used on this occasion, like those of the feast of trumpets, or new year, were of rams' horns, straight, and had their mouth-piece covered with gold; that every Israelite blew nine blasts, so as to make the trumpet literally "sound throughout the land," Lev. xxv. 9; and that "from the feast of trumpets, or new year—i. e., till Tishri 1—till the day of atonement—i. e., Tishri 10—the slaves were neither manumitted to return to their homes nor made use of by their masters, but ate, drank and rejoiced, and wore garlands on their heads; and when the day of atonement came, the judges blew the trumpet, the slaves were manumitted to go to their homes, and the fields were set free." Though the Jews, from the nature of the case, cannot now celebrate the jubilee, yet on the evening of the day of atonement the conclusion of the fast is announced in all the synagogues to the present day by the blast of the horn, which, according to the rabbins, is intended to commemorate the ancient jubilee proclamation.

It has been disputed whether the law of the jubilee ever came into full operation. Little is directly recorded, but there are several allusions to it, Num. xxxvi. 4; Isa. lxi. 1, 2; Ezek. vii. 12, 13; xvi. 16-18. No doubt, like other commandments of the law, it was neglected in days of declension and apostasy.

The design of this institution is that those of the people of God who, through poverty or other adverse circumstances, had forfeited their personal liberty or property to their fellow-brethren, should have their debts forgiven by their co-religionists every half century, on the great day of atonement, and be restored to their families and inheritance as freely and fully as God on that very day forgave the debts of his people and restored them to perfect fellowship with himself, so that the whole community, having forgiven each other and being forgiven by God, might return to the original order, which had been disturbed in the lapse of time, and being freed from the bondage of one another, might unreservedly be the servants of Him who is their Redeemer. The aim of the jubilee, therefore, is to preserve unimpaired the essential character of the theocracy, to the end that there be no poor among the people of God, Deut. xv. 4. Hence God, who redeemed Israel from the bondage of Egypt to be his peculiar people, and allotted to them the Promised Land, will not suffer any one to usurp his title as Lord over those whom he owns as his own. It is the idea of grace for all the suffering children of man, bringing freedom to the captive and rest to the weary as well as to the earth, which made the year of jubilee the symbol of the Messianic year of grace, when all the conflicts in the universe shall be restored to their original harmony, and when not only we, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, but the whole creation, which groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, shall be restored into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, Rom. viii. 18-23; Heb. iv. 9.

2. JUBILEE, or JUBILEE YEAR, an institution of the Romish Church, the name of which is borrowed from that of the Jewish jubilee. The Romish jubilee is of two kinds, "ordinary" and "extraordinary." The ordinary jubilee is celebrated at stated intervals, the length of which has varied at different times. Its origin is traced to Pope Boniface VIII., who issued for the year 1300 a bull granting plenary indulgence to all pilgrim-visitors of Rome during that year, on condition of their penitently confessing their sins and visiting the church of St. Peter and St. Paul a prescribed grimage to Rome, and granting the indulgence to all who should visit any church in their own country designated for the purpose, and should contribute toward the expenses of the Holy Wars. The substitution by Leo X. of the fund for building St. Peter's Church for that of the Holy War, and the scandalous proceedings of many of those appointed to preach the indulgence, were among the proximate causes of the Reformation. In later jubilee years the pilgrimage to Rome gradually diminished in frequency, the indulgence being obtained by prescribed works at home; but the observance itself has been punctually maintained at each recurring period, with the single exception of the year 1800, when the papal see was vacant.

JOSEPH WELCOMING HIS FATHER.—See JOSEPH.

number of times. The invitation was accepted with marvelous enthusiasm. Innumerable troops of pilgrims from every part of the Church flocked to Rome, the constant number in the city during the entire year never falling below two hundred thousand. As instituted by Boniface, the jubilee was to have been held every hundredth year, but Clement VI. abridged the time to fifty years. His jubilee accordingly took place in 1350, and the average number of pilgrims, except during the heats of summer, was no fewer than one million. The interval was still further abridged by Urban VI., and again by Paul II., who in 1470 ordered every twenty-fifth year to be held as jubilee, an arrangement which has continued ever since. Paul II. further extended the spiritual advantages of the jubilee by dispensing with the personal pil-

The extraordinary jubilee is ordered by the pope out of the regular period either on his accession or on some occasion of public calamity, one of the conditions for obtaining the indulgence in such cases being the recitation of certain stated prayers for the particular necessity in which the jubilee originated.

JUBILEES, BOOK OF. This Apocryphal or Hagadic book, which was used so largely in the ancient Church, and was still known to the Byzantines, but of which both the original Hebrew and the Greek were afterward lost, has recently been discovered in an Ethiopic version in Abyssinia.

I. TITLE OF THE BOOK, AND ITS SIGNIFICATION. The book is called "the Jubilees," or "the book of Jubilees," because it divides the period of the Biblical history upon which it treats—i. e., from the creation to the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan—into fifty jubilees of forty-nine years each, equal to two thousand four hundred and fifty years, and carefully describes every event according to the jubilee, sabbatic year or year in which it transpired, as stated in the inscription: "These are the words of the division of the days according to the law and the testimony, according to the events of the years, in sabbatic years and in jubilees," etc. It is also styled "the Apocalypse of Moses," because the book pretends to be a revelation of God to Moses, and is denominated "the book of the division of days" by the Abyssinian Church, from the first words of the inscription.

2. DESIGN AND CONTENTS OF THE BOOK.—This Apocryphal book is designed to be a commentary on the canonical books of Genesis and Exodus. It fixes and arranges more minutely the chronology of the Biblical history from the creation to the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan; solves the various difficulties to be found in the narratives of these canonical books; describes more fully events which are simply hinted at in the sacred history of that early period; and expatiates upon the religious observances, such as the sabbath, the festivals, circumcision, sacrifices, lawful and unlawful meats, setting forth their sacred character as well as our duty to keep them.

In its chronological arrangements we find that it places the deluge in 1353 A. M., and the exodus in 2410 A. M. This, with the forty years' sojourn in the wilderness, yields fifty jubilees of forty-nine years each from the creation to the entrance into Canaan—i. e., two thousand four hundred and fifty. Though in the calculations of this period the book of Jubilees agrees in its particulars with the Hebrew text of Genesis and Exodus, yet it differs from the canonical text both as to the time of the sojourn in Egypt and the years in which the ante- and post-diluvian patriarchs begat their children. Thus Jared is said to have lived sixty-two instead of one hundred and sixty-two years before Enoch was born, Methuselah was sixty-seven instead of one hundred and eighty-seven at the birth of Lamech, and Lamech again was fifty-three instead of one hundred and eighty-two when he begat Noah, agreeing partly with the Samaritan Pentateuch and partly with the Septuagint in their statements about these antediluvian patriarchs. In the chronology of the post-diluvian patriarchs, however, the book of Jubilees deviates from these versions. The going down into Egypt is placed about 2172-2173 A. M., so that when we deduct it from 2410, in which year the exodus is placed, there remains for the sojourn in Egypt two hundred and thirty-eight years. In the description of the lives of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph, the chronology agrees with the Hebrew text of Genesis.

Of the difficulties in the sacred narrative which the book of Jubilees tries to solve, may be mentioned that it accounts for the serpent speaking to Eve by saying that all animals spoke before the fall in paradise; explains very minutely whence the first heads of families took their wives; how far the sentence of death pronounced in Gen. ii. 17 has been fulfilled literally; shows that the sons of God who came to the daughters of men were angels; with what help Noah brought the animals into the ark; wherewith the tower of Babel was destroyed; why Sarah disliked Ishmael and urged Abraham to send him away; why Rebecca loved Jacob so dearly; how it was that Esau came to sell his birthright for a mess of pottage; who told Rebekah, Gen. xxvii. 42, that Esau determined to kill Jacob; how it was that he afterward desisted from his determination to kill Jacob; why Rebekah said, Gen. xxvii. 45, that she should be deprived "of both her sons" in one day; why Er, Judah's first-born, died; why Onan would not redeem Tamar; why Judah was not punished for his sin with Tamar; why Joseph had the money put into the sacks of his brethren; and how Moses was nourished in the ark; and that it was not God, but the chief-mastemah, "the enemy," who hardened the hearts of the Egyptians.

As to the religious observances, we are told that the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost, is contained in the covenants which God made with Noah and Abraham, Gen. ix. 8-17; xiv. 51-54; xv. 18-21; the Feast of Tabernacles was first celebrated by Abraham at Beersheba; the concluding festival, which is on the 23d of Tishri, continuing the Feast of Tabernacles, was instituted by Jacob after his vision at Bethel, Gen. xxxv. 9-14; and that the mourning on the Day of Atonement was instituted to commemorate the mourning of Jacob over the loss of Joseph.

3. AUTHOR AND ORIGINAL LANGUAGE OF THE BOOK.—That the author of this book was a Jew is evident from his minute description of the Sabbath and festivals, as well as all the rabbinic ceremonies connected therewith, which developed themselves in the course of time, and which we are told are simply types described by Moses from heavenly archetypes, and have not only been kept by the angels in heaven, but are binding upon the Jews world without end. But though there is a wide diversity of opinion as to which phase of Judaism the author belonged, all agree that this book was written in Hebrew, that it was afterward translated into Greek, and that the Ethiopic, of which Dillman has given a German version, is made from the Greek. This is evident from the fact that many of the expressions in the book can only be understood by retranslating them into Hebrew.

4. DATE AND IMPORTANCE OF THE BOOK.—That this book was written before the destruction of the temple is evident not only from its description of the sacrifices and the services performed therein, but from its whole complexion, and this is admitted by all who have written on it. Its exact date, however, is a matter of dispute, though it probably originated during the first or second century before Christ. The importance of this book can hardly be overrated when we remember that it is one of the very few Biblical works written between the close of the Old Testament canon and beginning of the New Testament which have come down to us. There are, however, several other considerations which render this book a most important contribution both to the interpretation of the Bible and to the history of Jewish belief anterior to the Christian era. Many portions of it are literal translations of the book of Genesis, and therefore enable us to see in what state the Hebrew text was at that age, and furnish us with some readings which are preferable to those given in the received text. It shows us that the Jews of that age believed in the survival of the soul after the death of the body, though the resurrection of the body is nowhere mentioned therein; that they believed in the existence of Satan, the prince of legions of evil spirits, respecting which so little is said in the Old Testament and so much in the New; and that these evil spirits have dominion over men, and are often the cause of their illnesses and death. It shows us that the Jews believed about the coming of the Messiah and the great day of judgment. It explains the statements in Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2 which have caused so much difficulty to interpreters by most distinctly declaring that the law was given through the presence angel. Such passages are 2 Pet. ii. 4 and Jude 6 leave scarcely any doubt that it is quoted in the New Testament.

It has already been remarked that the Hebrew original of this book is lost. The Greek version, which was made at a very early period of the Christian era, was soon lost in the Western Church, but it still existed in the Eastern Church, and was freely quoted by several Byzantine theologians and historians of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. From that time, however, the Greek version was also lost, and the book of Jubilees was quite unknown to Europeans till 1844, when Ewald announced that Dr. Kraff had found it preserved in the Abyssinian Church in an Ethiopic translation, and brought over a manuscript copy, which was made over to the Tubingen University. This Ethiopic version has been translated in German.

JUDA (joo'da). 1. One of those called our Lord's brethren, Mark vi. 3. He is termed Judas in Matt. xiii. 55. 2. One in the list of our Lord's ancestry, Luke iii. 26. Some identify him with Abiud, Matt. i. 13; and it is possible that both names may indicate Hodaiah, 1 Chr. iii. 24. 3. Another in the same list, Luke iii. 30. 4. The patriarch Judah, Luke iii. 33; Rev. v. 5. He is called Judas in Matt. i. 2, 3. 5. Used for the land, Matt. ii. 6; so also in the Apocrypha, 1 Macc. ii. 6, 18.

JUDÆA, or JUDEA (joo-de'a), sometimes also in Authorized Version JEWRY, Jud. vii. 1, properly signifies the southernmost of the three later divisions of Palestine. Its boundaries may be said to extend from Samaria on the north to the desert of Arabia Petræa on the south, and from the Jordan and Dead Sea on the east to the Mediterranean on the west.

We first find the name Judæa in Ezra v. 8, and Jewry in Dan. v. 13. They are substituted for Judah or "the land of Judah." They are constantly to be found in the Apocrypha, and are invariably used in the New Testament. Generally speaking, when the tribe is named we find Judah; for the district or province which in later times occupied the ancient possessions of Dan, Judah, Simeon and Benjamin, the name Judæa is employed.

Apart from Jerusalem, Judæa occupies but a small part of New Testament history. We read of St. John the Baptist born in the hill country of Judæa, and living in the adjoining deserts until the time of his showing unto Israel; but besides Jerusalem and Jericho, only two of its cities and villages, as far as we know, were tracked by the footsteps of our Lord himself—Bethlehem, the inhospitable scene of his infancy; Bethany, the friendly home of his last days on earth. It may be that the passage mentioned above, John vii. 1, gives the key to this desertion of David's tribe by David's Son. "The Jews sought to kill him," so he would not walk in Jewry, but in distant Galilee, and even in unfriendly Samaria, most of his mighty works were done. And, strangely enough, this land of Judæa, thus unblest by the Saviour's footsteps, is in point of scenery the least attractive district of Palestine. To the eye of one who enters it from the north there is nothing to compare with the forests of Lebanon or Gilead, the hills of Galilee, the wide expanse of Gennesaret or the deep valleys and fertile plains of Samaria. On the other hand, he who approaches from the south passes imperceptibly from the desert into the midst of the country; and while he loses the grandeur of Sinai and the rocky desolation of Petra, he finds instead none of the beauty of a civilized country. The hills are low and conical, uniform in shape even to weariness; the vegetation, save in early spring, is dry and parched; the valleys are broad and featureless. Everywhere are signs that the land of corn and wine and oil is become desolate. The fenced cities and villages surmount the hills, but they are in ruins; the terraces where once were vineyards and cornfields can be traced along the mountain sides, but they are neglected; wells and pools of water are to be found in every valley, but there is none to drink of them. The prophecy of Jeremiah is fulfilled; the cities of Judah are "a desolation without inhabitant," Jer. xxxiv. 22. Nor is the scenery of the wild and rocky region which borders the Dead Sea more attractive. Grand and striking as it is, the mountains rising to the height of nearly three thousand feet, the valleys filled with huge calcareous boulders in every variety of form, it was better suited to afford a hiding-place to David when hunted as a partridge by Saul, and to be the abode of the Baptist during his early years, than to be frequented by the gentle, loving Saviour.

JUDAH (joo'dah), the fourth son of Jacob and Leah. The narrative in Genesis brings this patriarch more before the reader, and makes known more of his history and character, than it does in the case of any other of the twelve sons of Jacob, with the single exception of Joseph. It is indeed chiefly in connection with Joseph that the facts respecting Judah transpire; and as they have already been given in the articles JACOB and JOSEPH, it is only necessary to indicate them shortly in this place. It was Judah's advice that the brethren followed when they sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites, instead of taking his life. By the light of his subsequent actions we can see that his conduct on this occasion arose from a generous impulse, although the form of the question he put to them has been sometimes held to suggest an interested motive: "What profit is it if we slay our brother and conceal his blood? Come, let us sell him," Gen. xxxvii. 26, 27. After the return of Jacob and his family to Canaan, Judah married a woman of the country. Her death and the disgraceful circumstances which followed are recorded in Gen. xxxviii. These circumstances seem to have disgusted Judah with his residence in towns, for we find him ever afterward at his father's tents. His experience of life and the strength of his character appear to have given him much influence with Jacob; and it was chiefly from confidence in him that the aged father at length consented to allow Benjamin to go down to Egypt. This confidence was not misplaced; and there is not in the whole range of literature a finer piece of true natural eloquence than that in which Judah offers himself to remain as a bond-slave in the place of Benjamin, for whose safe return he had made himself responsible to his father. The strong emotions which it raised in Joseph disabled him from keeping up longer the disguise he had hitherto maintained, and there are few who have read it without being, like him, moved even to tears.

We hear nothing more of Judah till he received, along with his brothers, the final blessing of his father, which was conveyed in lofty language, glancing far into futurity and strongly indicative of the high destinies which awaited the tribe that was to descend from him.

Judah was the leading man in Jacob's household, and he prepared the way for making his tribe the leading tribe in Israel. There seems to be an acknowledgment of his ascendancy, and a prediction of its continuance, in Jacob's blessing: "Judah is a lion's whelp; . . . who shall rouse him? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come," Gen. xlix. 9, 10. The knowledge that the Shiloh—the great Deliverer—was to spring from this tribe doubtless tended to increase its influence.

2. One, apparently a Levite, whose sons took part in setting forward the workmen at the rebuilding of the temple, Ezra iii. 9. Possibly he is the same with Hodaviah, Ezra ii. 40. 3. A Levite who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 23. 4. A Benjamite, Neh. xi. 9. 5. A Levite who had returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Neh. xii. 8. 6, 7. Persons who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. xii. 34, 36. Some of these may have been identical.

TRIBE AND TERRITORY OF JUDAH.—Before the conquest of Canaan the descendants of Judah exceeded in number those of any other tribe, yet the difference was not very great between them and Dan, the former possessing seventy-six thousand five hundred grown men, and the latter sixty-four thousand four hundred, or even Issachar, who numbered sixty-four thousand three hundred, Num. xxvi. 22, 25, 43. It could not, therefore, have been inferred from the relative position of the tribes that Judah was to hold in Canaan any place of peculiar predominance among the tribes of Israel. And when the inheritance came to be divided by lot, the portion which fell to Judah only seemed to surpass the rest in extent of surface, while in richness of soil and many natural advantages the territories of Ephraim, of Zebulun, Naphthali and some others rose greatly above it. But the very extent of Judah's possession bespoke a relative superiority, reaching, as it did, from the mountains of Edom on the south-east, up by the head of the Dead Sea and Jerusalem; to Ekron on the Mediterranean, and southward to the wilderness of Sin, Kadesh-Barnea and the river of Egypt, Josh. xv.; in short, the whole of that division of Palestine which lies south of the line that passes from Joppa to the top of the Dead Sea. This large territory, however, the tribe of Judah was not allowed to enjoy altogether alone, for the tribe of Simeon had its inheritance assigned "out of the portion of the children of Judah," Josh. xix. 9. This is stated to have been because "the part of the children of Judah was too much for them." But the question naturally occurs, Why, then, assign them a territory so large and so much beyond their proper wants? It can only be explained by the valiant part performed by the tribe of Judah in subduing the warlike occupants of this more southern district and getting possession of its strongholds. A somewhat detailed account of their particular conquests, in some of which they were associated with Simeon, is given in the first chapter of Judges. They did not succeed in every case, but in the great majority of instances their arms triumphed; and the more hilly portion of the district, which necessarily to a large extent commanded the rest, became nearly their undivided possession, Jud. i. 19. Then the vast extent of this territory, and the large tracts of pastureland in the direction of Egypt and Arabia to which it gave them access, formed sources of wealth beyond what most of the tribes had at their command.

It was doubtless in good measure owing to the circumstances just mentioned that the tribe of Judah came to be reckoned very much by itself. Othniel, the first judge, was of this tribe, but no mention is made of it in the great conflicts with Barak, Gideon or Jephthah, which more directly concerned the middle and northern divisions of Israel, while from the time of Saul, and especially of David, it rose into great prominence and power, and appeared to occupy a place above that of a single tribe. Thus, even in Saul's time, when the available force of fighting men was ascertained with a view to the approaching war with Ammon, Judah was numbered apart from the other tribes; three hundred thousand of the children of Israel were numbered at Bezek, and thirty thousand of Judah, 1 Sam. xi. 8. In like manner, at the unhappy numbering which took place toward the latter part of David's reign, the returns were presented by Joab for Judah separate from the others, and the proportion for Judah also had now vastly increased (reaching even to about five hundred thousand), doubtless from the singular prosperity of David's reign, and the desire of many to be associated with the tribe and region that stood nearest to him. The fortress of Jerusalem and nearly all the remaining strongholds within the territory of Judah fell under his arms, their former possessors in many cases probably, as in Jerusalem, becoming converts to Judaism, and consequently reckoned in the tribe of Judah, 2 Sam. xxiv. 20-25; Zech. ix. 7. But this vast influx of power and greatness, still further increased and confirmed in the hand of Solomon, proved too much for the other tribes, especially for the once ascendant and still powerful and jealous tribe of Ephraim, to bear with equanimity. And as soon as Solomon was removed from the scene the fire that had been smouldering for two generations broke out with such violence that it could not again be extinguished. Thenceforth Judah, including the adjoining tribe of Benjamin, with probably the greater part, if not the whole, of Simeon, and many refugees also from the other tribes, formed a distinct kingdom.

To this tribe belonged by divine appointment the honor of bearing sway within the sphere of God's kingdom—an honor which came first to a realization in David and his immediate successors; and though afterward suffering a capital abridgment and temporary suspension, yet only that it might in the fullness of time rise to its complete and perpetual establishment in the hands of Him who was to be David's Son and Lord. It was in the person of a Jew of David's house and lineage that Deity became incarnate to accomplish the redemption of the world. Jews—descendants for the most part, though not exclusively, of the same tribe—were his immediate representatives and instruments in planting his kingdom of grace and blessing in the world. And when the time comes for their future conversion and final ingathering, Jews shall still be, in a manner altogether peculiar, "the life" of the world, Rom. xi. 15.

The territory of Judah did not differ very greatly from what in later times went by the name of Judea or Judæa, though the latter as generally understood was somewhat more extensive. It seems from the period even of the conquest to have been distributed into three main divisions, "the hill country, the Negeb (or south country), and the Shefelah (valley or low land)," Josh. xv. 20-63; and in Jud. i. 9, etc., an account is given of the operations of Judah in these different sections of their inheritance. Hebron, Debir, the regions of Arad, and Zepath or Hormah, all distinctly specified in that brief record of successful occupation, belong to the hill country. The cities of Gaza, Askelon, Ekron, which were for the time taken but not properly possessed and occupied, lay in the low country, the tract of flat land stretching along the Mediterranean, which continued for generations after the conquest, as it had been before, to be chiefly occupied by the Philistines. The third chief division was called Negeb or the south country. It was of very considerable extent, no fewer than twenty-nine cities, with their dependent villages, in all thirty-seven, being enumerated in it, Josh. xv. 20-32, the first of which was Kabzeel on the south-east, and the last Rimmon, near the north-west extremity. It fell into two or three subdivisions. Besides these principal divisions in the territory of Judah, there was a narrow tract which appears to have been in some respects distinct—the Midbar, or wilderness, in connection with which six towns are named, all lying in the neighborhood of the Salt Sea, Josh. xv. 59-62. Very little is known of them.

JUDAH HAKKADOSH (hak'ka-dosh), or JEHUDAH THE HOLY, a famous rabbi who lived in the reign of Marcus Antoninus and became head of the Sanhedrim, which then sat at Tiberias. He compiled the Mishna, or first Talmud, a digest of the oral law of the Jews.

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF. When the territory of all the rest of Israel, except Judah and Benjamin, was lost to the kingdom of Rehoboam, a special single name was needed to denote that which remained to him; and almost of necessity the word Judah received an extended meaning, according to which it comprised not Benjamin only, but the priests and Levites, who were ejected in great numbers from Israel and rallied around the house of David. At a still later time, when the nationality of the ten tribes had been dissolved, and every practical distinction between the ten and the two had vanished during the captivity, the scattered body had no visible head except in Jerusalem, which had been reoccupied by a portion of Judah's exiles. In consequence, the name Judah (or Jew) attached itself to the entire nation from about the epoch of the restoration. But in this article Judah is understood of the people over which David's successors reigned, from Rehoboam to Zedekiah.

When the kingdom of Solomon became rent with intestine war, it might have been foreseen that the Edomites, Moabites and other surrounding nations would at once refuse their accustomed tribute, and become again practically independent, and some irregular invasion of these tribes might have been dreaded. It was a mark of conscious weakness, and not a result of strength, that Rehoboam fortified fifteen cities, 2 Chr. xi. 5-11, in which his people might find defence against the irregular armies of his roving neighbors. But a more formidable enemy came in Shishak, king of Egypt, against whom the fortresses were of no avail, 2 Chr. xii. 4, and to whom Jerusalem was forced to open its gates; and from the despoiling of his treasures Rehoboam probably sustained a still greater shock in its moral effect on the Moabites and Edomites than in the direct loss; nor is it easy to conceive that he any longer retained the commerce of the Red Sea or any very lucrative trade. Judged of by the number of soldiers recounted in the Chronicles, the strength of the early kings of Judah must have been not only great, but rapidly increasing.

As the most important external relations of Israel were with Damascus, so were those of Judah with Edom and Egypt. Some revolution in the state of Egypt appears to have followed the reign of Shishak. Apparently, the country must have fallen under the power of an Ethiopian dynasty, for the name of the Lubim who accompanied Zerah in his attack on Asa is generally regarded as proving that Zerah was from Sennaar, the ancient Meroë. But as this invasion was signally repulsed, the attempt was not repeated, and Judah enjoyed entire tranquillity from that quarter until the invasion of Pharaoh-necho. In fact, it may seem that this success assisted the reaction, favorable to the power of Judah, which was already begun, in consequence of a change in the policy of Damascus. Whether Abijah had been in league with the father of Benhadad I., as is generally inferred from 1 Ki. xv. 19, may be doubted, for the address cannot be rendered, "Let there be a league between me and thee, as there was between my father and thine;" and it possibly is only a hyperbolical phrase of friendship for "Let us be in close alliance; let us count our fathers to have been allies." However this may be, Asa bought, by a costly sacrifice, the serviceable aid of the Damascene king. Israel was soon distressed, and Judah became once more formidable to her southern neighbors. Jehoshaphat appears to have reasserted the Jewish authority over the Edomites without war, and to have set

It is strikingly indicative of the stormy scenes through which the line of David passed that the treasures of the king and of the temple were so often plundered or bargained away. First, under Rehoboam, all the hoards of Solomon, consecrated and common alike, were carried off by Shishak, 1 Ki. xiv. 26. Two generations later, Asa emptied out to Benhadad all that had since accumulated "in the house of Jehovah or in the king's house." A third time, when Hazael had taken Gath, and was preparing to march on Jerusalem, Jehoash, king of Judah, turned him away by sending to him all "that Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, Ahaziah and Jehoash himself had dedicated, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of Jehovah and in the king's house," 2 Ki. xii. 18. In the very next reign Jehoash, king of Israel, defeated and captured Amaziah, took Jerusalem, broke down the walls, carried off hostages and plundered the gold and silver deposited in the temple and in the royal palace, 2 Ki. xiv. 11-14. A fifth sacrifice of the sacred and of the royal treasure was made by Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser, 2 Ki. xvi. 8. The act was repeated by his son Hezekiah to Sen-his own viceroy over them, 1 Ki. xxii. 47. Intending to resume the distant commerce which had been so profitable to Solomon, he built ships suitable for long voyages; but not having the advantage of Tyrian sailors, as Solomon had, he lost the vessels by violent weather before they had sailed. Upon this Ahaziah, king of Judah, offered the service of his own mariners, probably from the tribe of Asher and others accustomed to the Mediterranean; but Jehoshaphat was too discouraged to accept his offer, and the experiment was never renewed by any Hebrew king. The Edomites, who paid only a forced allegiance, soon after revolted from Jehoram and elected their own king, 2 Ki. viii. 20, 22. At a later time they were severely defeated by Amaziah, 2 Ki. xiv. 7, whose son, Uzziah, fortified the town of Elath, intending, probably, to resume maritime enterprise; but it remained a barren possession, and was finally taken from them by Rezin, in the reign of Ahaz, 2 Ki. xvi. 6. The Philistines, in these times, seem to have fallen from their former greatness, their league having been so long dissolved. The most remarkable event in which they are concerned is the assault on Jerusalem in the reign of Jehoram, 2 Chr. xxi. 16, 17.

nacherib, who had demanded "three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold." It is added, "Hezekiah cut off the gold which he had overlaid from the doors of the temple and from the pillars," 2 Ki. xviii. 14-16. In the days of Josiah, as in those of Jehoash, the temple appears to have been greatly out of repair, 2 Ki. xii. and xxii.; and when Pharaoh-necho, having slain Josiah, had reduced Judah to submission, the utmost tribute that could be exacted was one hundred talents of silver and one talent of gold. Even this sum was obtained by direct taxation, and no allusion is made to any treasure at all, either in the temple or in the king's house. It is the more extraordinary to find expressions used when Nebuchadnezzar took the city which at first sight imply that Solomon's far-famed stores were still untouched. "Nebuchadnezzar carried out all the treasures of the house of Jehovah and of the king's house, and cut in pieces all the vessels of gold which Solomon had made in the temple of Jehovah," 2 Ki. xxiv. 13. They must evidently have been few in number, for in 1 Ki. xiv. 26 "all" must, at least, mean "nearly all." "Shishak took away the treasures of the house of Jehovah, and of the king's house; he even took away all." Yet the vessels of gold and silver taken away by Nebuchadnezzar, and restored by Cyrus, are reckoned five thousand four hundred in number, Ezra i. 11.

The severest shock which the house of David received was the double massacre which it endured from Jehu and from Athaliah. After a long minority, a youthful king, the sole surviving male descendant of his great-grandfather, and reared under the paternal rule of the priest Jehoiada, to whom he was indebted not only for his throne, but even for his recognition as a son of Ahaziah, was not in a situation to uphold the royal authority. That Jehoash conceived the priests to have abused the power which they had gained sufficiently appears in 2 Ki. xii., where he complains that they had for twenty-three years appropriated the money which they ought to have spent on the repairs of the temple. Jehoiada gave way; but we see here spiracy against him," etc. Thus the house of David appeared to be committing itself, like that of Saul, to permanent enmity with the priests. The wisdom of Uzziah, during a long reign, averted this collision, though a symptom of it returned toward its close. No further mischief from this cause followed until the reign of his grandson, the weak and unfortunate Ahaz, after which the power of the kingdom rapidly mouldered away. On the whole, it would appear that, from Jehoiada downward, the authority of the priests was growing stronger and that of the crown weaker, for the king could not rule successfully except by submitting to what we might call "the constitutional check" of the priests; and although it is reasonable to believe that the priests became less simple-minded, more worldly and less religious as their order advanced in authority—whence the keen and the disorganization of the kingdom which his madness had wrought is commemorated as the cause of the Babylonish captivity, 2 Ki. xxiii. 26; xxiv. 3, 4. It is also credible that the long-continued despotism had greatly lessened patriotic spirit, and that the Jewish people of the declining kingdom were less brave against foreign invaders than against kindred and neighbor tribes or civil opponents. Faction had become very fierce within Jerusalem itself, Ezek. xxii., and civil bloodshed was common. Wealth, where it existed, was generally a source of corruption, by introducing foreign luxury, tastes, manners, superstitions, immorality or idolatry, and when consecrated to pious purposes, as by Hezekiah and Josiah, produced little more than a formal and exterior religion.

Thoroughly to understand the political working of the monarchy we ought to know—1. What control the king exercised over ecclesiastical appointments; 2. How the Levites were supported when ejected from Israel; 3. What proportion of them acted as judges, lawyers and scribes, and how far they were independent of the king. The nature of the case and the precedent of David may satisfy us that the king appointed the high-priest at his own pleasure out of the Aaronites; but (as Henry II. of England and hundreds of monarchs besides have found) ecclesiastics once in office often disappoint the hopes of their patron, and to eject them again is a most dangerous exertion of the prerogative. The Jewish king would naturally avoid following the

the beginning of a feud (hitherto unknown in the house of David) between the crown and the priestly order, which, after Jehoiada's death, led to the murder of his son Zachariah. The massacre of the priests of Baal, and of Athaliah, grand-daughter of a king of Sidon, must also have destroyed cordiality between the Phœnicians and the kingdom of Judah; and when the victorious Hazael had subjugated all Israel and showed himself near Jerusalem, Jehoash could look for no help from without, and had neither the faith of Hezekiah nor a prophet like Isaiah to support him. The assassination of Jehoash in his bed by "his own servants" is described in the Chronicles as a revenge taken upon him by the priestly party for his murder of "the sons" of Jehoiada; and the same fate, from the same influence, fell upon his son Amaziah, if we may so interpret the words in 2 Chr. xxv. 27: "From the time that Amaziah turned away from following Jehovah they made a conrebukes of them by the prophets—it is not the less certain that it was desirable for Judah, both in a temporal and a spiritual sense, to have the despotic power of the king subjected to a strong priestly pressure.

The struggle of the crown against this control was perhaps the most immediate cause of the ruin of Judah. Ahaz was probably less guided by policy than by superstition or by architectural taste in erecting his Damascene altar, 2 Ki. xvi. 10-18. But the far more outrageous proceedings of Manasseh seem to have been a systematic attempt to extirpate the national religion because of its supporting the priestly power; and the "innocent blood very much" which he is stigmatized for shedding, 2 Ki. xxi. 16, was undoubtedly a sanguinary attack on the party opposed to his impious and despotic innovations. The storm which he had raised did not burst in his lifetime; but, two years after, it fell on the head of his son Amon, law of descent, in order to preserve his right of election unimpaired; and it may be suspected that the line of Zadok was rather kept in the background by royal jealousy. Hilkiyah belonged to that line; and if any inference can be drawn from his genealogy, as given in 1 Chr. vi. 8-15, it is that none of his ancestors between the reigns of Solomon and Josiah held the high-priesthood. Even Azariah, who is named in 2 Chr. xxxi. 10 as of the line of Zadok, is not found among Hilkiyah's progenitors. Jehoiada, the celebrated priest, and Urijah, who was so complaisant to the innovating Ahaz, 2 Ki. xvi., were of a different family. It would seem that too many high-priests gained a reputation for subservience (for it often happens in history that the ecclesiastical heads are more subservient to royalty than the mass of their order); so that, after Hilkiyah, the race of Zadok became celebrated for uprightness, in invidious contrast to the rest of the priests; and even the Levites were regarded as more zealous than the generality of the Aaronites, 2 Chr. xxix. 34. Hence, in Ezekiel and other late writers the phrase "the priests the sons of Zadok," or even "the priests the Levites," is a more honorable title than "the priests the sons of Aaron." Hilkiah's name seems to mark the era at which (by a reaction after the atrocities of Manasseh and Amon) the purer priestly sentiment obtained its triumph over the crown. But the victory came too late. Society was corrupt and convulsed within, and the two great powers of Egypt and Babylon menaced it from without. True lovers of their God and of their country like Jeremiah saw that it was a time rather for weeping than for action, and that the faithful must resign themselves to the bitter lot which the sins of their nation had earned.

JUDAH, LEO, a learned Protestant divine, was born in Alsace, in 1482. Being sent to Basel to complete his academical studies, he became acquainted with Zuinglius, from whom he imbibed the principles of the Reformed faith. He became pastor of the church of St. Peter at Zurich, where he undertook a translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew into Latin, but did not live to complete it. He died in 1542.

JUDAISM (ju'-da-ism) is the title by which the system of doctrines, rites, laws and ordinances has been designated which has characterized the Jewish or Israelitish people. The faith of this peculiar people and their wondrous history are fully set forth in their books of the Old Testament Scriptures, and the importance of these books to all classes of Christians must be acknowledged, as they constitute the basis and foundation of their own faith. As a structure rests on its foundation, so does the New Testament rest on and complete the revelation commenced in the Old.

From the testimony of the book of Genesis it is apparent that shortly after the flood the descendants of Shem in all their branches, as well as the Hamites and the descendants of Japheth, soon began to lose the idea of the one living and true God. Originally there was, no doubt, a primitive religion, and among the Assyrians, the Babylonians and the Phœnicians the knowledge existed that there was one true God, the Creator and Preserver of all things; but the symbolism of the importance that, while the tribes and families between the Mediterranean, the Caspian, the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf were all held in the degrading thralldom of idolatry, a monotheistic faith should have originated in a Shemitic family in that region, and have prevailed among the descendants of the great promulgator of the system whose name is associated with it. To Abraham powers of nature soon introduced a change which tended to obscure the monotheistic faith. When men devised symbolic images, it was an easy process to regard them first with interest and next with superstitious regard, and finally with reverence and worship. Hence, it came to pass that, while among the nations of Western Asia they had Bel, Moloch, Chemosh, Usshur and others who were held to be supreme, they also had subordinate deities who ruled in the heavens and on the earth. It is, therefore, a fact of momentous pertains the distinction of rising up to the full recognition of the uncreated, eternal, spiritual, great first Cause of all things, the supreme and only God. In the Hebrew branch of the Shemitic people only was the idea fully realized that God was before, apart from and above the physical universe. Elsewhere, along with the dim idea of a first cause, was associated the existence of a host of subordinate deities of various powers and characters; but the Abrahamic faith apprehended the character of the eternal, the spiritual, the pure and the righteous Creator, Upholder and Ruler of all things. It was the only pure monotheistic faith in all the world, and its founder proclaimed the divinity of its origin as he taught that his knowledge of spiritual worship was an immediate revelation from the Unseen and the Eternal.

Moses, as a great legislator, by the arrangements of the Levitical economy established a social system which was calculated to segregate the people of Israel, and so preserve their monotheistic faith in its purity. Intercourse with the people of sur-well as in the Church they were trained to recognize Jehovah as their only rightful Lord.

In process of time the frequent intercommunications of the people of Israel with Egyptians, Syrians, Moabites and others produced a demoralizing effect. Idolatry crept in among them, and false worship led to immorality and a rejection of the God of their fathers. Prophets were sent from time to time to expostulate and warn of coming judgments. Eventually ten of the tribes fell under the woes that were predicted; and subsetheir restoration synagogues were multiplied, the law was diligently read, a passionate regard for the ritual of Moses spread among the people, who afterward avoided the sin of polytheism, and externally they conformed to the ordinances of the law.

Now, however, the Jewish mind passed from one state to another. Before the captivity the leaning was to the idolatries of neighboring nations. Restored to their land, their leaders and teachers became divided. No doubt the residence in the East made the thoughtful and rounding nations tended to familiarize the Israelites with the polytheism and ritual which prevailed in other lands; but the wondrously minute provisions of an economy which guided and guarded the people in their food and raiment, in every part of their social economy as well as in their worship, had the direct tendency to make them the depositaries and retainers of a pure faith. The Mosaic system not only energized the Israelitish mind in the direction of the sole worship of Jehovah, but by means of sacrifice familiarized the nation with the idea of reconciliation through atonement, as the people were also taught that Jehovah was their King; and thus in the State as quently the little kingdom of Judah, refusing to profit by warning and to see the hand of God in the lesson of his dealing with Israel, was also swept away into captivity. Yet the inspired men whom God had sent to intimate the fate that befell the land, even in the midst of their warnings and denunciations, still predicted the permanency of the Abrahamic faith.

After the return from the Babylonish captivity the temporal condition of the people was altogether changed. It is not certain when the synagogue system was first introduced. It may have been made to subserve the religious want of the people in their captivity, but there is no doubt that after speculative Jews acquainted with the philosophy of Persia and Babylon, and so helped on the tendency to the divisions which soon appeared among them, and which in process of time assumed distinctive forms in the parties of the Pharisees, the Sadducees and the Essenes. The Pharisees comprehended all who attached importance to forms, ceremonies and traditions, or to externals, disregarding the religion of the heart and the state of the inner life. The Sadducees were the free thinkers and the skeptics, who, rejecting the doctrine of the soul's immortality, the existence of angels and spirits, regarded only the realities of the present life; while the Essenes, who had unquestionably received a bias from the influence of the philosophy of the East, were the ascetics of the Jewish people who laid claim to special sanctity. But among them all the desire for the idolatrous services of the surrounding nations, which so captivated their fathers, seems to have been eradicated by the discipline at Babylon. Grievously as they erred respecting the design of God in the institution of the Mosaic economy, to which they clung with a passionate zeal, maintaining that it was blasphemy to admit that the customs established among the fathers would ever change, they held to the monotheistic system of the Abrahamic faith. This feature of their character stands out very prominently in the incidents recorded in the Acts of the Apostles in connection with their treatment of Stephen, Peter and Paul. The dispersion that ensued after the destruction of Jerusalem carried them into the different provinces of the Roman empire, and utterly prevented them from observing their ritual economy as laid down in the Levitical books. Scattered through the nations, they still held to the Abrahamic faith regarding the Deity, though influenced by the traditions and interpretations which were collected into the Talmud. See GEMARA, MISHNA, TALMUD.

A comprehensive and classified statement of the creed of the Jews was drawn up by Moses Maimonides, an Egyptian rabbi, in the eleventh century, and it is still acknowledged as a correct statement of their faith. It is arranged under thirteen heads, as follows, viz.:

JEW, MODERN, SENTIMENTS OF.
—A summary of the Jewish creed was drawn up by Moses Maimonides, otherwise called the Great Rambam (i. e., Rabbi Moses ben Maimon), an Egyptian rabbi of the eleventh century, which is still acknowledged as their confession of faith. It consists of thirteen articles, and reads as follows:

I. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is the governor and creator of all the creatures, and that it is he who made, maketh and will make all things.

II. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is one, and that no unity is like his, and he alone, our God, was, is and shall be.

III. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is incorporeal; that he is not to be comprehended by those faculties which comprehend corporeal objects; and that there is no resemblance to him whatever.

IV. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is the first and the last.

V. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is alone worthy of adoration; and that none besides him is worthy of adoration.

VI. I believe, with a perfect faith, that all the oracles of the prophets are true.

VII. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the prophecies of Moses, our master, on whom be peace, are true; and that he is the father of all the wise men who were before him and who came after him.

VIII. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the whole law of commandments which we now have in our hands was given to Moses, our master, on whom be peace.

IX. I believe, with a perfect faith, that this law will not be changed, and that there will not be any other law from the Creator, blessed be his name!

X. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! knows all the actions of the children of men and all their thoughts, as it is said, "Who frameth all their hearts; who understandeth all their actions."

XI. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! will recompense good to him who observeth his commandments, and that he will punish him that transgresseth them.

in the Godhead, as held by Christians. They still maintain observances at the feasts of the Passover, Pentecost, Trumpets, Tabernacles and Purim, and they commemorate the victory over Antiochus Epiphanes; and though they have no temple, they observe an Expiation Day.

They are divided into two classes—the conservative and the reformed. The former adhere with great tenacity to old forms, whereas the reformed or progressive Jews have made many changes in the old system. Their places of worship are called temples instead of synagogues. They have sermons, organs and family pews, as in other churches. They reject the Talmud's claim to be superior to the Bible, and they have ceased to expect the return of their people to Palestine, the restoration of the temple at Jerusalem and of animal sacrifice, while they expect no resurrection of the body and no day of judgment. They place no reliance on miracles

PROCLAIMING THE JUBILEE.—See JUBILEE.

XII. I believe, with a perfect faith, in the advent of the Messiah; and though he should tarry, yet I will patiently wait for him every day till he come.

XIII. I believe, with a perfect faith, that there will be a revivification of the dead at the period when it shall please the Creator, blessed be his name! and let his remembrance be exalted for ever and ever!

The modern Jews still adhere as closely to the Mosaic dispensation as their dispersed and despoiled condition will permit them. Their service consists chiefly in reading the law in their synagogues, together with a variety of prayers. They use no sacrifices since the destruction of the temple. They repeat blessings and particular praises to God, not only in their prayers, but on all accidental occasions. They believe in a future life, in rewards and punishments. They hold that all men shall finally be happy. They offer prayers for the welfare of the souls of their departed friends, and they do not receive the idea of a trinity of persons as an evidence of revelation; and they rest on the accordance of the statements in the Scriptures with the dictates of reason and the general acceptance of men, as showing their truth. So also their great principle that all things not in the decalogue were intended to be local and transient, and thus they have adopted a rationalistic faith. This system was gradually developed by different commentators between the years 1000 and 1500.

JUDAS (ju'das). 1. 1 Esd. ix. 23. Judah, Ezra x. 23. 2. The third son of Mattathias, surnamed Maccabæus, 1 Macc. ii. 4. 3. The son of Calphi, a Jewish captain, 1 Macc. xi. 70. 4. A brother of John Hyrcanus, murdered by Ptolemæus, 1 Macc. xvi. 2, 9, 14, 16. 5. 2 Macc. i. 10. It is doubtful who the person here intended was. Some have supposed him Judas Maccabæus.

6. One of the twelve apostles, the son of Simon, John vi. 71; xiii. 2, 26, called also ISCARIOT, probably from Kerieth. According to the reading of John vi. 71; xiii. 26, approved by Lachmann and Tischendorf, his father Simon bore the same designation. In the list of the apostles given by the Synoptists, Judas stands last, Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 19; Luke vi. 16; and the Evangelists usually fix on him the mark of his great crime by the addition of the words "the traitor," or "who also betrayed him." According to John xii. 4-6, he had charge of the common fund out of which the wants of Christ and his immediate followers were supplied—a trust which he abused for selfish ends. But all his other iniquities are lost in the enormous crime which has affixed a perpetual infamy to his name, the betrayal of his Master to his enemies for thirty shekels of silver—not quite twenty dollars. This money he, shaken with remorse when he saw the result of his treason in the condemnation of his Master, returned to the Sanhedrim, by whom it was expended in the purchase of a piece of land formerly called "the potters' field," but after that "the field of blood." See ACELDAMA. This name it received from the tragic circumstances connected with the purchase of it, especially the death of Judas himself, who, harassed by remorse, went and hanged himself, and falling headlong—probably from the breaking of the rope by which he was suspended—burst asunder, and his bowels gushed out, Acts i. 18.

The extraordinary nature of Judas' crime in betraying his Master has prompted inquiry as to the motives by which he was actuated to commit it. The only conceivable motives for his conduct are a sense of duty in bringing his Master to justice, resentment, avarice, dissatisfaction with the procedure of Jesus, and a consequent scheme for the accomplishment of his own views. With regard to the first of these motives, if Judas had been actuated by a sense of duty in bringing his Master to justice for anything censurable in his intentions, words or actions he would certainly have alleged some charge against him in his first interview with the chief-priests, and they would have brought him forward as a witness against Jesus, especially when they were at so great a loss for evidence, or they would have reminded him of his accusations when he appealed to them after our Lord's condemnation, saying, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood"—a confession which amounts to an avowal that he had never seen anything to blame in his Master, but everything to approve. Moreover, the knowledge of the slightest fault in Jesus would have served, at least for the present, to tranquillize his own feelings and prevent his immediate despair. The chief-priests would also have alleged any charge he had made against Jesus as a justification of their conduct when they afterward endeavored to prevent his apostles from preaching in his name, Acts iv. 15-23; v. 27, 28-40. The second motive supposed—namely, that of resentment—is rather more plausible. Jesus had certainly rebuked him for blaming the woman who had anointed him in the house of Simon the leper, at Bethany, Matt. xxvi. 8-17; John xii. 4, 5, and Matthew's narrative seems to connect his going to the chief-priests with that rebuke, Matt. xxvi. 14: "Then one of the twelve, called Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief-priests;" but closer inspection will convince the reader that these words are more properly connected with verse 3. Besides, the rebuke was general: "Why trouble ye the woman?" Nor was it nearly so harsh as that received by Peter: "Get thee behind me, Satan;" and certainly not so public. Even if Judas had felt ever so much resentment, it could scarcely have been his sole motive; and as nearly two days elapsed between his contract with the chief-priests and its completion, it would have subsided during the interval and have yielded to that covetousness which we have every reason to believe was his ruling passion. St. John expressly declares that Judas was "a thief, and had the bag, and bare"—that is, conveyed away from it, stole—"what was put therein." This rebuke, or rather certain circumstances attending it, might have determined him to act as he did, but is insufficient, of itself, to account entirely for his conduct, by which he endangered all his expectations of worldly advancement from Jesus at the very moment when they seemed upon the verge of being fulfilled. It is, indeed, a most important feature in the case that the hopes entertained by Judas and all the apostles, from their Master's expected elevation, as the Messiah, to the throne of Judæa, and, as they believed, to the empire of the whole world, were never more steadfast than at the time when he covenanted with the chief-priests to deliver him into their hands. Nor does the theory of mere resentment agree with the terms of censure in which the conduct and character of Judas are spoken of by our Lord and the Evangelists. Since, then, this supposition is insufficient, we may consider another motive to which his conduct is more commonly ascribed—namely, covetousness. But if by covetousness be meant the eager desire to obtain "the thirty pieces of silver" with which the chief priests "covenanted with him," it presents scarcely a less inadequate motive. Can it be conceived that Judas would deliberately forego the prospect of immense wealth from his Master by delivering him up for about twenty dollars of our money, and not more than double in value, a sum which he might easily have purloined from the bag? Is it likely that he would have made such a sacrifice for any further sum, however large, which we may suppose "they promised him," and of which the thirty pieces of silver might have been the mere earnest? Had covetousness been his motive he would have ultimately applied to the chief-priests, not to bring again the thirty pieces of silver, with the confession "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood," Matt. xxvii. 4, but to demand the completion of their agreement with him. We are now at liberty to consider the only remaining motive for the conduct of Judas—namely, dissatisfaction with the procedure of his Master, and a consequent scheme for the furtherance of his own views. It seems to us likely that the impatience of Judas for the accomplishment of his worldly views, which we conceive to have ever actuated him in following Jesus, could no longer be restrained, and that our Lord's observations at Bethany served to mature a stratagem he had meditated long before. He had, no doubt, been greatly disappointed at seeing his Master avoid being made a king, after feeding the five thousand in Galilee. Many a favorable crisis had he seemed to lose or had not dared to embrace, and now while at Bethany he talks of his burial, John xii. 7; and though none of his apostles, so firm were their worldly expectations from their Master, could clearly understand such "sayings," Luke xviii. 34, yet they had been made "exceeding sorry" by them, Matt. xvii. 23. At the same time Judas had long been convinced by the miracles he had seen his Master perform that he was the Messiah, John vii. 31. He had even heard him accept this title from his apostles in private, Matt. xvi. 16. He had promised them that when he should "sit upon the throne of his glory they should sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Yet now, when everything seemed most favorable to the assumption of empire, he hesitates and desponds. In his daily public conferences, too, with the chief-priests and Pharisees he appears to offend them by his reproofs rather than to conciliate their favor. Within a few days the people, who had lately given him a triumphal entry into the city, having kept the passover, would be dispersed to their homes, and Judas and his fellow-apostles be, perhaps, required to attend their Master on another tedious expedition through the country. Hence it seems most probable that Judas resolved upon the plan of delivering up his Master to the Jewish authorities, when he would be compelled, in self-defence, to prove his claims by giving them the sign from heaven they had so often demanded; they would, he believed, elect him in due form as the King Messiah, and thus enable him to reward his followers. He did, indeed, receive from Jesus many alarming admonitions against his design; but the plainest warnings are lost upon a mind totally absorbed by a purpose and agitated by many violent passions. The worst he could permit himself to expect was a temporary displeasure for placing his Master in this dilemma; but as he most likely believed, judging from himself, that Jesus anticipated worldly aggrandizement, he might calculate upon his forgiveness when the emergency should have been triumphantly surmounted. Nor was this calculation wholly unreasonable. Many an ambitious man would gladly be spared the responsibility of grasping at an empire which he would willingly find forced upon him. Judas could not doubt his Master's ability to extricate himself from his enemies by miracle. He had known him do so more than once. Hence his directions to the officers to "hold him fast," when he was apprehended, Matt. xxvi. 48. With other Jews, he believed the Messiah would never die, John xii. 34; accordingly, we regard his pecuniary stipulation with the priests as a mere artful cover to his deeper and more comprehensive design; and so that he served their purpose in causing the apprehension of Jesus, they would little care to scrutinize his motive. All they felt was being "glad" at his proposal, Mark xiv. 11; and the plan appeared to hold good up to the very moment of our Lord's condemnation, for after his apprehension his miraculous power seemed unabated, from his healing Malchus. Judas heard him declare that he could even then "ask, and his Father would give him twelve legions of angels" for his rescue. But when Judas, who awaited the issue of the trial with such different expectations, saw that, though Jesus had avowed himself to be the Messiah, he had not convinced the Sanhedrim, and instead of extricating himself from their power by miracle, had submitted to be "condemned, buffeted and spit upon" by his judges and accusers, then, it should seem, he awoke to a full view of all the consequences of his conduct. The prophecies of the Old Testament, "that Christ should suffer," and of Jesus concerning his own rejection and death, flashed on his mind in their true sense and full force, and he found himself the wretched instrument of their fulfillment. He made a last desperate effort to stay proceedings. He presented himself to the chief-priests, offered to return the money, confessed that he had sinned in that he had betrayed the innocent blood, and upon receiving their heartless answer was wrought into a frenzy of despair, during which he committed suicide. There is much significance in these words of Matt. xxvii. 3, "Then Judas, when he saw he was condemned"—not expiring on the cross—"repented himself," etc. If such be the true hypothesis of his conduct, then, however culpable it may have been, as originating in the most inordinate covetousness, impatience of the procedure of Providence, crooked policy or any other bad quality, he is certainly absolved from the direct intention of procuring his Master's death. "The difference," says Archbishop Whately, "between Iscariot and his fellow-apostles was that, though they all had the same expectations and conjectures, he dared to act on his conjectures, departing from the plain course of his known duty to follow the calculations of his worldly wisdom and the schemes of his worldly ambition."

brother of James and one of the apostles, called also Thaddeus and Lebbeus, Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18. See THADDEUS. 9. Judas of Galilee, a leader of insurrection, Acts v. 37. According to Josephus, this man was a native of Gamala, in Gaulanitis. He boldly declared it unlawful to acknowledge any foreign authority, and drew after him vast multitudes of followers, the insurrection beginning in Galilee about 6 A. D. When he perished, though his adherents were dispersed, yet it seems that from them sprang the Zealots and Sicarii of later times. 10. A person dwelling in Straight street in

7. One described as one of the Lord's brethren, called also Juda, Mark vi. 3. An interesting story is related of his family by Eusebius, out of Hege-sippus. The emperor Domitian was alarmed by what he had heard of Messiah's kingdom, and ordered some of the descendants of the house of David to be sought out and brought to him. Those so presented to the emperor were the grandsons of Judas, but the hardness of their hands, proving that they were but ordinary peasants, and their description of the spiritual nature of the new sovereignty removed all apprehensions. They were let go, and lived on, honored as the Lord's relatives, into the reign of Trajan. 8. A

Damascus, to whose house Saul of Tarsus was conducted after the divine manifestation to him, and where he was visited by Ananias, Acts ix. 11, 17. Straight street is supposed to be that now called the Street of the Bazaars; a house popularly said to be that of Judas is still shown. 11. A disciple, surnamed Barsabas, eminent in the early Church, endued with the gift of prophecy. He was deputed by the apostles and elders at Jerusalem to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, carrying the decree of the council just held, Acts xv. 22-33.

JUDAS CANDLE, the name given to the fifteenth candle at the top of the triangular candle-learning, and distinguished himself as a poet, grammarian and philosopher. It is related of him that when on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, as he approached the holy city, he rent his garments and recited aloud lamentations for the miseries of his people, which so enraged a Mohammedan horseman that he rode over him and trampled him to death. Judas Levita was the author of the work entitled "Cozri," a dialogue on the principles of natural religion. It was written in Arabic, and translated into Hebrew, Latin and Spanish.

JUDE (jude). The writer of one of the epistles is so called in our translation. He designates himself "the brother of James," Jude 1, and must therefore be either that Judas the apostle who was brother of James the son of Alphaeus, or Judas brother of James the Lord's brother. If the Lord's brother was James the apostle, then Jude was both an apostle and also brother—or cousin—to Jesus. For discussion of this question, see next article. Little is known of Jude.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF, the last in order in the canon of the Catholic Epistles.

1. CANONICITY.—This Epistle is not cited by any of the Apostolic Fathers, the passages which have been adduced as containing allusions to it presenting no certain evidence of being such. It is, however, formally quoted by Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius. Tertullian refers to the Epistle as that of Jude the apostle. Origen repeatedly refers to it, and occasionally as the work of the apostle Jude, though in one place he speaks as if doubts were entertained by some as to its genuineness. It is not in the Peshito, and does not appear to have been known to the Syrian churches before the fourth century, near the close of which it is quoted by Ephraem Syrus. Eusebius ranks it among the Antilegomena, but this rather because it was not universally known than because where known it was by any regarded with suspicion. By Jerome it is referred to as the work of an apostle, and he states that, though suspected by some in consequence of containing a quotation from the apocryphal book of Enoch, it had obtained such authority as to be reckoned part of the canonical Scriptures. From the fourth century onward the place thus conceded to it remained unquestioned.

There is nothing in the Epistle itself to cast suspicion on its genuineness; on the contrary, it rather impresses one with the conviction that it must have proceeded from the writer whose name it bears. Another, forging a work in his name, would have hardly omitted to make prominent the personality of Judas and his relation to our Lord, neither of which comes before us in this Epistle.

2. AUTHOR.—The writer designates himself Judas, "the servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James." The former of these designations affords no help in determining whether the writer was the apostle Jude or another person of the same name, for the phrase "servant of Jesus Christ" is neither peculiar to an apostle nor does it exclude the supposition that the party to whom it is applied was an apostle. It is to the other designation that we must look for the decision of this question. Now, were we sure that "Jude the brother of James" is the same person who is designated "Jude of James" by Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13, the evidence that the writer of this Epistle was the apostle Jude would be conclusive. But there are difficulties in the way of this conclusion. For one thing, the words "Jude of James" are more naturally in accordance with the usage of the language translated "Jude, the son of James," than "Jude, the brother of James." It is, moreover, extremely improbable that an apostle of the Lord would, in writing an Epistle of warning and reproof to Christians, designate himself by his family relationship to a fellow-creature, instead of assuming the authority which his divine commission as an apostle would have at once expressed and claimed. To this it may be added that in ver. 17 the writer seems to speak of the apostles of the Lord as a class to which he himself did not belong; for though one of their number might have expressed himself as the writer does here, the probability is on the other side. If on these grounds we conclude that the writer of this Epistle was not the apostle Jude, we are led to inquire whether he may not be the other Jude mentioned in the Gospels as among "the brethren of Jesus," Matt. xiii. 55, and as a younger brother of James. This would remove all difficulty were it not that it remains in dispute whether the two brothers, James and Judas, who were apostles, are not identical with the James and Judas who were among the brethren of our Lord. Our opinion inclines to the view that the brethren of our Lord were really sons of Joseph and Mary, and consequently that James the son of Cleophas and Judas the son of James, who were apostles, are not to be identified with the persons bearing the same names among the brethren of our Lord. We incline also to think that the James who presided over the church at Jerusalem was not the surviving apostle of that name, but the other James, "the Lord's brother," as he is expressly termed, Gal. i. 19. The question may be thus briefly stated. Discounting James the son of Zebedee, respecting whom there is no dispute, the other Jameses and the Judes (omitting Judas Iscariot) may be placed thus:

- | | |
|--------------------------------------------------|-------------------------|
| I. James, son of Alphaeus, | } apostles. |
| Jude of James, | |
| II. James, president of the church at Jerusalem, | } brethren of the Lord. |
| Jude, the brother of James, | |

The question is, Are the persons in No. 1 the same as or different from the persons in No. 2? Two objections occur to their being identical—1. That for this purpose we must render "Judas of James" in an unusual way, supplying "brother," and not "son;" and 2. That we must understand the phrase "brethren of the Lord" as meaning his cousins or near relations. The former of these objections is not of serious weight, because instances can be produced in which other terms of relationship besides that of son were left to be supplied in similar ellipses; and in such a case as that before us the principle which Winer lays down may be held to operate, "that where acquaintance with the family circumstances of any is presupposed, the relationship of father, brother, servant, may be so expressed as well as that of son." The latter of the above objections is of more weight; for though the Hebrew usage admits of a liberal construction of terms of relationship, yet when we find that the brethren of Jesus are associated with his mother and his sisters, Matt. xiii. 55, 56, and when it is expressly mentioned that his brethren believed not on him, John vii. 5—a statement which cannot be meant to apply to persons who were actually of the number of his select disciples—the strong probability is that the persons so designated were really the sons of Joseph and Mary, and so uterine brothers of Jesus. On the other side, it is objected that James the Lord's brother is called an apostle, Gal. i. 19, and that several of the Fathers speak of Jude, the author of this Epistle, as an apostle. On this, however, much cannot be built, for the term "apostle" is used occasionally in the New Testament in a lax way, as applicable to persons who were associated with the apostles in their work, Acts xiv. 14; Rom. xvi. 7, and persons who sustained the honorable position of being the Lord's brothers would be especially likely to be regarded by a later age as standing on a par with the apostles, and worthy of receiving that designation. On the whole, we conclude that the writer of this Epistle was not Jude the apostle, properly so called, but Jude the Lord's brother, the son of Joseph, as he is expressly designated by Clement of Alexandria. His reason for describing himself as the "brother of James" was probably that James, from his peculiar position, was more extensively and influentially known than Jude himself was. If any should ask, Why did Jude, if he was indeed the Lord's brother, not present this his higher relationship rather than that which he bore to James, as a claim upon the regard of those to whom he wrote? it may be answered that the Lord himself had taught his followers that relationship to him according to the flesh was of very inferior importance to spiritual relationship to him, Matt. xii. 48-50; Luke xi. 27, 28; and we may believe that none of those who had imbibed the spirit of his teaching would have so much as thought of resting on their earthly affinity to him for any portion of that authority which they sought to attach to their teaching. So utterly foreign is this from the spirit of the apostolic writers that, as Alford justly remarks, "had such a designation as 'brother of the Lord' been found in the address to an epistle, it would have formed a strong a priori objection to its authenticity." Whilst, however, we ascribe the authorship of this Epistle to one who was not an apostle, there is nothing in the Epistle unworthy of an apostle's pen.

3. CONTENTS AND DESIGN.—The Epistle commences with an assertion of the necessity of zeal for and steadfastness in the faith once delivered to the saints; the writer then warns his readers against some who had crept in unawares, and were insinuating doctrines of an unwholesome kind; instances are adduced of the danger of apostasy, rebellion and laxity of moral principle; a contrast is instituted between the dogmatism and audacity of the teachers he has in view, and the gentleness and modesty with which the highest of God-fearing beings speak; these wicked persons are then strongly denounced and their evil end predicted; the believers are exhorted to continue in the faith of the gospel, in humble dependence on promised grace, and in pious efforts to preserve others from the snares of the false teachers, and the whole concludes with a solemn doxology to the only wise God our Saviour. The design of such a train of thought is obviously to put the believers to whom the Epistle was addressed on their guard against the misleading efforts of certain persons to whose influence they were exposed. Who these persons were, or to what class of errorists they belonged, can only be matter of conjecture. Some, indeed, think the persons alluded to held no peculiar opinions, and were simply men of lax morals, but from the manner in which the writer refers to them it is evident that they were not merely practically corrupt, but teachers of error as well. Their opinions seem to have been of an Antinomian character, ver. 4, 18, 19, but there is nothing to connect them, except in a very vague and distant way, with any of the later Gnostic systems. The writer formally charges them with "denying the only Lord God and our Lord Jesus Christ," language which De Wette admits usually applies to error of doctrine, but which here he, without any reason, would understand of feeling and conduct. The licentious courses in which they indulged led Clement of Alexandria to think that they were the prototypes of the Carpocratians and such like: "Of these, and such as these," he says, "I think that Jude spoke prophetically in his Epistle;" but this does not imply that they had formed a system like that of the Carpocratians, but only that the notions and usages of the one adumbrated those of the other. Perhaps there have been in all ages persons who have sought by perverted doctrine to gain a sanction for sensual indulgence, and such undoubtedly were found disturbing the peace and corrupting the purity of the churches of Christ in different places as early as the second half of the first century. The persons against whom Jude writes were apparently of this class, but in their immorality the practical element was more prominent than the speculative.

4. THE PARTIES TO WHOM THE EPISTLE IS ADDRESSED are described by the writer as "the called who are sanctified in God the Father and kept for Jesus Christ." Beyond this general intimation that they were Christians, however, nothing more is said to guide us to an acquaintance with them. From the resemblance of some parts of this Epistle to the Second of Peter, it has been inferred that it was sent to the same parties in Asia Minor, and with a view of enforcing the apostle's admonitions, whilst others, from the strongly Jewish character of the writing, infer that it was addressed to some body of Jewish Christians in Palestine. But neither of these inferences rests on a strong basis. From the fact that the parties addressed seem to have been surrounded by a large and wicked population, some have supposed they may have dwelt in Corinth, while others suggest one of the commercial cities of Syria. But all this, as well as the supposition that they dwelt in Egypt, is mere conjecture.

5. The TIME when and the PLACE at which the Epistle was written cannot be exactly determined. From the allusion, however, to the preaching of the apostles, we may infer that it was among the later productions of the apostolic age, for it was written whilst persons were still alive who had heard apostles preach, but when this preaching was beginning to become a thing of the past, ver. 17. "It is not credible," says Huther, "that Judas would refer to the preaching of the apostles as already past if these were still at the height of their apostolic working." As the writer, in speaking of the divine judgments, makes no allusion to the destruction of Jerusalem, it has been inferred that this catastrophe had not occurred when he wrote; but on this much stress cannot be laid, because the destruction of Jerusalem was not traceable to the divine wrath against the particular class of sins which Jude seeks to expose, and therefore might be passed over by him as not a case exactly in point. Attempts have been made to prove a late date for the Epistle, from an alleged quotation in it from the Apocryphal book of Enoch, ver. 13; but it is by no means certain that the passage is a quotation from the book of Enoch, and scholars have yet to settle when the book of Enoch was written, so that from this nothing can be inferred as to the date of this Epistle. As to the place where it was written, there is not ground for even a plausible conjecture.

JUDGES. This name is applied to fifteen persons who at intervals presided over the affairs of the Israelites during the four hundred and fifty years which elapsed from the death of Joshua to the accession of Saul. The station and office of these judges are involved in great obscurity, partly from the want of clear intimations in the history in which their exploits and government are recorded, and partly from the absence of parallels in the history of other nations by which our notions might be assisted. In fact, the government of the judges forms the most singular part of the Hebrew institutions, and that which appears most difficult to comprehend. The kings, the priests, the generals, the heads of tribes, all these offer some points of comparison with the same functionaries in other nations, but the judges stand alone in the history of the world; and when we think that we have found officers resembling them in other nations, the comparison soon breaks down in some point of importance, and we still find that nothing remains but to collect and arrange the concise intimations of the sacred text, and draw our conclusions from the facts which it records.

There were of course judges among the Israelites in the sense in which such persons are to be found in every nation. It appears from Ex. xviii. that Moses was the great and only regular judge after the people came out of Egypt, but that he introduced a systematic arrangement of inferior judicatures, with an appeal finally to himself, in order that he might bring any hard case before God. This arrangement, which was made on genealogical principles, among tens and hundreds and thousands, seems to have been modified, with a regard to locality as the leading principle, after the people took possession of the land of Canaan, in accordance with the direction of Moses himself before he left the world, Deut. xvi. 18: "Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates which the Lord thy God giveth thee throughout thy tribes, and they shall judge the people with just judgment." And the Levites seem to have had much to do with these tribunals, since they were the very men who made the law of God their study, Deut. xvii. 8-13. Thus we read in David's days of six thousand who were set apart to be officers and judges, 1 Chr. xxiii. 4. Probably they acted along with the local magistrates, the elders of every city, who are very frequently described as sitting in the gates of the city and executing judgment there. We find these Levites also in Jehoshaphat's tribunals, 2 Chr. xix. 8-11.

But the restricted technical sense of the word "judge" is that in which it means that officer who stood at the head of the Hebrew state in the intermediate period between the times of Moses and Joshua and those of the kings. To each individual of those whom we are accustomed to call judges the name is not expressly applied, but it is given to them in general by the prophet Nathan in a review of the period, 2 Sam. vii. 11, as it is in the preliminary statement, Jud. ii. 16-19, and also Acts xiii. 20. Another title which seems to be given to the order of judges in the last verse of Obadiah is that of saviours, which title is given directly to the first two in the book of Judges, ch.

iii. 9, 15; and in general it is said, ch. ii. 16, that "the Lord raised up judges which saved them out of the hand of those that spoiled them." Shamgar and Gideon and Tola are also said to have "saved" Israel, ch. iii. 31; vi. 15; vii. 7; x. 1, while in the disastrous period before Jephthah was raised up God declared that he would not "save" the people any more, but would leave them to be saved by the gods whom they had chosen for themselves, ch. x. 12, 13; and finally, it is said that Samson began to "save" Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, ch. xiii. 5. This, however, is less plain to the reader of our English Bible than it might be, because our translators have preferred the word "deliver" in almost every instance, and often without even noticing the strict rendering in the margin. The origin of their authority must in all cases be traced ultimately to Jehovah, owing to the very nature of the theocracy. And thus Nathan said to David, in the name of God, 2 Sam. vii. 7, "In all the places wherein I have walked with all the children of Israel, spake I a word with any of the tribes (in Chronicles it is explained by substituting the word "judges") of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people Israel," etc. Yet this might not prevent differences of detail in the manner of the appointment. In Jud. ii. 16 it is distinctly asserted that "the Lord raised up judges;" as we find him from time to time calling the most eminent of them by a special gift of his Spirit to them, ch. iii. 10; vi. 34; xi. 29; xiii. 25. We find one, Barak, nominated by a prophetess, who was herself acknowledged as the judge of Israel, a solitary instance of female administration, ch. iv. 5, 6. Of others it is simply said that they "arose," ch. x. 1, 3. And in Jephthah's history we have a clear instance of popular election, ch. x. 18; xi. 5, 6, though he was also called by the Spirit. There is nothing said of the length of time during which the judges retained their office until the case of Gideon, and his refusal to rule over the people, ch. viii. 22, 23, has been interpreted by some to mean that he retired into private life after having delivered his country from its enemies. But even those who hold such an opinion agree that the judge would receive great deference, and have much indirect influence over the people. From Gideon's time and forward, however, there is some trace of a more consolidated government, for the years of the judge's administration are always given; and of Eli and Samuel it is said in explicit terms that they judged the people till the day of their death, 1 Sam. iv. 18; vii. 15, though in Samuel's case this is remarkable, considering that Saul had been anointed to be king. Moreover, in Gideon's time the offer which the people made to him evinces an inclination for a hereditary office; and his son Abimelech assumed that one or other of Gideon's family would, as a matter of course, be acknowledged as ruler over Israel, Jud. ix. 1-3. But of this there is no further trace until Samuel associated his sons with himself as judges, 1 Sam. viii. 1—an act which precipitated the change to a hereditary kingdom.

It has been the fashion with some writers to speak of the period of the judges among the Hebrews as being like the heroic period in Grecian history. Except from the circumstance that the judges, in several instances at least, were heroes, there is no foundation on which the parallel can be rested. It was a period succeeding one of distinct, well-regulated legislation, the giving of the law by Moses and the establishment of the people according to their constitution in the land of Canaan by Joshua. It was itself a period certainly of much lawlessness and ignorance. But the lawlessness was less than would appear to a hasty reader, if we remember that the servitudes lasted only one hundred and eleven years out of the three hundred and ninety of which we have an account in the book of Judges, and during the great part of which the land was quiet and orderly, so that this book is very much a record of the diseases of the body politic, while the years of health are passed over almost in silence. Nor have we any right to call that an age of ignorance in which a young man of Succoth, whom Gideon caught without any selection, was able to write (as properly rendered in the margin) to him the princes and elders of the town to the number of seventy-seven persons. Neither are there any fabulous narratives in the history analogous to the Grecian stories of gods and demi-gods in their heroic period. The only individual in whom the period of sacred history is important chiefly as showing the intimate connection between departure from the Lord and misery on the one hand, and between return to him and well-being on the other. Apostasy and punishment, repentance and deliverance, are the main subjects which the whole narrative was professedly intended to exhibit. See ch. ii. 11-23.

In this narrative the condition of the Israelites does not appear so prosperous nor their character so religious as might have been expected from the history which precedes it. But this period must not be regarded as an uninterrupted series of idolatries and crimes. The apostasies which incurred punishment, and the deliverances which attended repentance, occupy almost the whole book, while long intervals of peace (amounting together to nearly three-fourths of the whole time), when the people in the main served God under the administration of pious judges, are passed over in a few sentences. And even amidst the scenes of religious defection and civil discord and violence which darken this history, there were doubtless many who feared and loved God, and some are quoted, in Heb. xi. 32, as illustrious examples of faith. It must also be borne in mind that some of the disorders here related affected certain districts only, while the rest of the country was in a better state.

This history is full of important instruction. It presents some striking pictures of an unsettled nation, showing the disorders which prevail when the bonds of union and the salutary control of government are relaxed, see ch. v. 6, and when the people are without the advantage of religious teaching. It illustrates the corrupt tendencies of our fallen state, showing how prone men are to be drawn aside to ungodliness and false religion. It displays, in a very affecting manner, the bitter effects of sin and the happy consequences of repentance, and it exhibits the attributes of God—his holiness and justice, his truth in fulfilling his word and his compassion and mercy toward the penitent.

By whom this book was written is not known, but it is ascribed by an ancient Jewish tradition to Samuel, and nothing appears to render this improbable. It was certainly written before the events recorded in 2 Sam. v. 6-9. See ch. i. 21. Some have inferred, from the expressions used in ch. xvii. 6; xviii. 1; xix. 1; xxi. 25, that it was written after the establishment of the monarchy, but those passages all occur in the appendix, which was probably added by a different author at a later period.

The contents of this book are as follows:

1. A short account of the extent to which the wars against the Canaanites were carried on after the death of Joshua, followed by a sketch of the general course of events during the times of the judges, forming an introduction to the narratives which follow, ch. i.-iii. 4.

2. The oppressions of the Israelites by their enemies, and their deliverances by their judges, comprising their subjection to the kings of Mesopotamia and of Moab, and their deliverance by Othniel and by Ehud, the deliverance of the western tribes by Shamgar, ch. iii. 5-31; the oppression of the northern tribes by Jabin, king of Canaan, and their deliverance by Deborah and Barak, ch. iv., v.; the deliverance of the eastern and northern tribes from the Midianites, with the history of Gideon and his family, ch. vi.-ix.; the administrations of Tola and most irreverent critics have pretended to find an analogy is Samson, and their supposition shows how ill they understand his character and work. And finally, there is no political resemblance between the Greek and the Hebrew histories. The commencement of the Greek heroic period introduces to us a multitude of petty kingdoms, and at its termination we find these transformed into republics. But in the Hebrew history we have a well-arranged republican form of government before any judges are mentioned, and at its close the confederated republics are seen to be drawn closer together under a constitutional monarchy.

JUDGES, THE BOOK OF. This book contains some account of the affairs of the Israelites under the government of their judges, from the death of Joshua to the time of Eli. It is not to be considered as a complete and connected history, many particulars being omitted which would have been essential to such a plan. Nor was such a history required, as the times of the judges formed no new era in the annals of God's people and the development of his purposes. At their close a new era did begin under the monarchy, but the present

Jair, the deliverance of Israel from the Ammonites by Jephthah, and the administrations of Ibzah, Elon and Abdon, ch. x.-xii.; the servitude of the Israelites to the Philistines, their deliverance by Samson, and his history, ch. xiii.-xvi. With this the regular narrative closes.

3. The remainder of the book may be regarded as an appendix, relating events which happened not long after the death of Joshua. It gives an account of the introduction of idolatry among the Israelites, and their consequent corruption and punishment, exemplified by—1. An account of Micah's idols which were stolen by the Danites, ch. xvii., xviii. 2. The brutal outrage committed by the men of Gibeah, leading to a fierce civil war, in which the tribe of Benjamin was nearly destroyed, ch. xix.-xxi.

The chronology of the book of Judges is peculiarly difficult. Different systems are founded upon statements in different parts of Scripture. In 1 Ki. vi. 1 the period from the exode to the foundation of the temple is said to be four hundred and eighty years, and many have adjusted all the intervening chronology to this date. But others disregard that passage, which they deem an interpolation, for the following reasons: 1. There is a variation in the numbers between the Hebrew and the Septuagint, and no date is assigned in the parallel passage in 2 Chr. iii. 2. Josephus, Theophilus and Origen, in treating of the subject, appear to have been ignorant of this computation, which is first mentioned in the fourth century by Eusebius, though in his latest works he does not adopt it. 3. It is directly opposed to the language of Paul, who assigns four hundred and fifty years to the time between the division of Canaan and Samuel the prophet, Acts xiii. 20. 4. It would require that many of the times of servitude should be included in the government of the judges (apparently in opposition to repeated statements that "the land had rest"), and that several of these should be regarded as contemporaneous. Still, there is not a perfect agreement among these chronologers. A table of the whole era is subjoined, exhibiting the dates of Usher and Hales, as representing the extremes of opinion on the question. The most probable theory fixes the length of the period at about thirty years below that assigned by Hales.

JUDGMENT (judg'ment), JUDGMENTS, properly the decision of a judge, Deut. xvii. 9. And as this ought to be a just decision, judgment is put for equity or justice, Ps. lxxii. 2; cxix. 66. Judgments signify also the right ways or statutes of the Lord, Ps. cxix. 102. Very frequently the term implies the punishment inflicted by sentence, 2 Chr. xxii. 8; Ezra vii. 26; Prov. xix. 29; God's final condemnation of sinners, Rom. ii. 5; Jude 15; the plagues which he brings upon the wicked in this world, Ex. vi. 6, or the moderation in which he afflicts his people, Jer. x. 24. Some other shades of meaning occur, easily explained by the context.

JUDGMENT, THE DAY OF. God is called "the Judge of all the earth," Gen. xviii. 25; and it is reasonable to suppose from the very notion we are taught of him that he will righteously administer his dominions. In the world, however, the ungodly are often seen to prosper, and the righteous to be oppressed. And this has sometimes grievously perplexed God's servants, who have not known how to reconcile the fact with his holy justice, Ps. lxxiii. Scripture, therefore, points onward to a time when all these apparent anomalies will be explained, when a great assize will sit and a just recompense of reward will be meted out to men, Eccles. xi. 9; xii. 14; Acts xxiv. 25. This judgment, we are told, shall be exercised by Christ, Acts x. 42; xvii. 31; Rom. xiv. 10. Men might be judged either individually, each on his departure from the world, or collectively. Scripture gives us reason to believe that the latter will be the course of God's procedure, Matt. xxv. 31-46; Rev. xx. 12, 13; and a day is spoken of, sometimes called the "last day," John xi. 24, sometimes the "great day," Jude 6, when this shall be. The space of time to be so occupied it is impossible for us to calculate; about the nearness or distance of that day it is useless to speculate, Matt. xxiv. 36; it will be a strict and searching judgment, Matt. xii. 36; so that the lesson we have to learn is to be so prepared that we be not condemned of the Lord, 1 John ii. 28; iv. 17.

JUDGMENT-HALL. This, in our English Bible, is the common, though not the uniform, rendering of the Greek prætorium. It is so rendered in John xviii. 28, 33; xix. 9; Acts xxiii. 35; but in Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16, "common-hall" is the expression employed; and in Phil. i. 13 the term "palace" is employed. There appears to be some diversity in the New Testament use of the original word, to which nothing altogether similar is found in classical writers. Its original meaning was that of the general's tent in a camp, but by and by it came also to signify the house or palace of the governor of a province. Herod, though bearing the name and possessing many of the prerogatives of a king, yet being still subject to the Romans, consequently stood in a certain relation to the governors of Roman provinces, and his palace in Jerusalem might not unnaturally be called a prætorium, especially after the time that it came to be occupied by the Roman governors, who, in process of time, took the place of the Herods. Pilate was the provincial governor of Judæa at the time of our Lord's death; and the house he occupied, which was in all probability the palace of Herod, though some doubt this, was fitly enough designated the prætorium. It was one of the apartments of that in which our Lord appeared before him, was accused, examined and condemned. The provincial residence at Cæsarea might, in like manner, be called by the same name, though originally a palace in the stricter sense—that is, as built and occupied by Herod—because, by the time Paul appeared there before Felix and Festus, the palace had passed into the hands of the governor for the time being. As applied, however, to some domicile in Rome, in Phil. i. 13, it could scarcely be the palace, as designating the residence of the emperor, that was meant, but either the prætorian camp, or, as is more probable, the barracks of that detachment of the prætorian guard which was in immediate attendance on the emperor. But nothing quite certain can be determined on the subject. It is clear, however, from the salutation sent by Paul from those of Cæsar's household, Phil. iv. 22, that the prætorium he had access to did somehow bring him into contact with persons who held positions in the domestic establishment of the emperor. So that the statement in the English Bible, that the bonds of Paul had become manifest in all the palace, if not formally correct, conveys a sense which is in substantial conformity with the truth of things.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL. In the reigns of William IV. and Victoria the privy council was constituted a court of appeal, and it came to be the last court for the settlement of all ecclesiastical questions in the Church of England. All disputed questions respecting doctrine and discipline in the Church are determined by the decision of this court.

JUDITH (ju'dith), Gen. xxvi. 34. 1. See AHO-LIBAMA. 2. The only other person in ancient Hebrew story bearing this name is the person, whether fabulous or real, whose history and exploits are celebrated in the apocryphal book JUDITH.

JUDITH (ju'dith), THE BOOK OF. This apocryphal work professes to relate the history of a great deliverance of the Jews from the Assyrians by the instrumentality of Judith. According to the account there given, she was a descendant of Simeon, Judith ix. 2, and first the wife, then the widow, of Manasseh, who belonged to her own tribe, Judith viii. 2. She was distinguished for beauty, wisdom and address, on account of which she became the admiration of all who knew her. But her heroic devotion to her country in a time of peril, and her determination to rid it by stratagem from the hand of its adversaries, issuing in speedy and triumphant success, absorbed in a manner all other grounds of merit, and rendered her the glory of her age. The period in which the story is laid is not very precisely indicated, but is expressly said to have been after the children of Israel had "newly returned from the captivity, and all the people of Judæa were lately gathered together," Judith iv. 3. About this time a Nebuchodonozor is said to have reigned in great power and splendor in Nineveh, while also Arphaxad reigned over the Medes in Ecbatane. He made war upon Arphaxad, took his capital city and slew him with the sword. Then, turning his regards toward the West, he commanded his general, Holofernes, to go forth with an immense army and subdue all under his sway. Success everywhere crowned his arms till he came to the hill-country of Judæa, where he found the passages shut against him and the mountain tops fortified. Astonished at this resistance by a comparatively small people, Holofernes, after various preliminary inquiries and movements, determined to subdue them, and for that purpose took possession of many of the heights, and encamped before Bethulia, in a valley with a copious fountain. The city was by and by reduced to the greatest straits, and was on the point of being surrendered by its governor, when Judith conceived and boldly undertook a plan of rescue. Without disclosing the nature of her plan, but promising, with the help of God, to deliver the city in five days, she was allowed to leave Bethulia, taking with her a maid and a quantity of provisions. Appearing before Holofernes, he and his attendants were captivated with her beauty; and as she professed to have left Bethulia because she saw the cause was hopeless, the people who would have been invincible if they had remained faithful to God having by their profanation of sacred things and other sins provoked him to prepare destruction for them, she met with a welcome reception, and readily obtained what she sought—permission to abide in the camp, and to go out every night for prayer and purification to the fountain, till the hour of vengeance should come. When that time came, she promised to conduct Holofernes into the city, and afterward into Jerusalem itself. After the lapse of a day or two, Holofernes, being taken with the charms of Judith, made a splendid entertainment in her honor, drank to excess in wine, and being at last left with her alone in the tent, she seized her opportunity, when he had sunk into a profound sleep, to strike off his head with his falchion. Bearing off the head, she and her maid went forth professedly for the usual purposes of devotion, but in reality with the design of stealing away into Bethulia, where she soon appeared and displayed in triumph the head of Holofernes. The people, seeing the advantage that had been gained for them by a woman's prowess, took courage, and fell next day on the Assyrians, who, on account of what had befallen their general, were seized with a panic, and fled from the country disconcerted and routed. The Jewish people, along with Judith, assembled in Jerusalem to give thanks for their wonderful deliverance; and Judith, recognized by all as the glory of her age, returned to Bethulia, where she spent the remainder of her days, and died at the advanced age of 105.

The narrative is agreeably written; but though some critics have imagined that it carries with it an air of truth, yet when examined there are difficulties, chronological, historical and geographical, so great that its authority is now all but universally given up. It does not, however, by any means follow that it was written without a purpose. It may have been intended by an allegorical representation to stir up the Jews to a bold resistance against the enemies that then threatened them. Perhaps the names introduced, Judith, "a Jewess, the daughter of Judah;" Bethulia, "the virgin of Jehovah," etc., may be taken to strengthen this view. Too much stress, however, Hebrew names being generally significant, must not be laid on this. The original language of the book was probably the vernacular Syro-Chaldee of Palestine at the time of its composition, and from it the existing Greek text seems to have been translated. Of this Greek there is a Syriac version extant. The Latin text is of a different cast, with various additions, transpositions and omissions. Jerome in making his translation would seem to have taken the old Latin as the basis of his work, though he used a copy of the work in Chaldee. It is from the Greek, it may be added, that the English version was made; Luther's version follows the Latin text. As to the date of this book, it may be assigned to the first, or with yet greater probability to the second, century before Christ. The author was no doubt a Palestinian Jew. It is referred to by Clement of Rome and by several subsequent early writers.

JUDSON (jud'sun), ADONIRAM, the son of Adoniram and Abigail Judson, and the senior Baptist missionary to Burmah, was born August 9, 1788, at Malden, in Massachusetts. He graduated at Providence College before he reached his twentieth year; and being awakened to the importance of religious matters, he entered the theological school at Andover, where his views became decided, and he joined the Congregational Church. In 1810 he devoted himself to the missionary field, and at the instance of a number of earnest young men who were similarly minded the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions was commenced, and he was deputed to visit England for consultation with the London Missionary Society. He was carried by a privateer that had captured his ship into France, and he did not reach London until April, 1811. Eventually, having married Ann Hasseltine, he sailed for the East in the year 1812 as the agent of the new American society. On the voyage he changed his views on the subject of baptism, and on reaching Serampore he applied to Dr. Carey and was immersed. As soon as this was known at home the Baptists established a denominational society and adopted Judson as their missionary. Being driven from India by the hostility of the East India Company, he made another effort to settle at Madras, but in vain, and in 1813 he settled in Burmah and made it the field of his permanent labors. He attained a thorough knowledge of the language, and hence his great life-work, in translating the Bible into that tongue, produced a version which bids fair to be the common Bible of Burmah for ages to come. He made a vigorous effort at Ava to secure the favor of the king for the mission, but in vain; and when the war broke out between the Burmese and the British, he and others suffered fearfully from a protracted imprisonment, being fettered for months together, and living in the daily expectation of death. His services as an interpreter, when the war closed, were of great value in the formation of the treaty of peace and commerce. His wife, who was one of the most noble of the great band of American ladies who devoted themselves to the cause of missions, died at Amherst while he was absent; and having left Ava, he settled at Maulmain, a place of greater importance for his work. Rangoon and Prome were also included in his labors, and he frequently visited the Kavens, whom he viewed with great interest. In 1834 he married Mrs. Sarah Boardman, and he began to revise his translation of the Bible, and he devoted sixteen years of careful labor to this work. In consequence of the health of Mrs. Judson failing, he undertook a voyage to America in 1845, but his wife died at St. Helena. His reception in America was most enthusiastic, and wherever he went his fame as the messenger of the gospel to the Burmese preceded him, and he was hailed as a modern apostle. In 1846, with renovated health, he married Miss Emily Chubbuck, a lady of great talent, and known after his death as a prolific writer under the pseudonym of "Fanny Forrester," and sailed again for the East. Reaching Rangoon, his health gave way; and in order to escape the severity of the climate and to enjoy the bracing effects of a sea-voyage, he set sail, but he died on the passage to the Isle of Bourbon, on April 12th, 1850, and was buried at sea. Such was the career of this great man, whose name will always be associated with Burmah.

JUDSON, ANN HASSELTINE, the first wife of Dr. Judson, was born in 1789, at Bradford, Massachusetts. She was the first American lady who devoted her life to the cause of missions. Her health having failed in Burmah, she made the voyage to America alone, and her labors during her sojourn in her native land were of great service in awakening an earnest zeal among the Churches for the conversion of the heathen. She returned to Ava in 1823. Her danger and distress were extreme during the war, and it is well known that she was largely instrumental in prevailing on the Burmese government to yield to the terms of the English. Anxiety and the effects of the climate told on her constitution, and she died in 1826, at Amherst, while her husband was absent attending to his public duties. She was a woman of rare intelligence and judgment, of great piety and self-consecration, and she had every attribute of character to fit her to be the faithful wife of a devoted missionary.

JUGGERNAUT (jug'ger-nawt), or JAGGERNAUT PURI, or simply PURI (poo-re'), a town on the eastern coast of Hindoostan, in the province of Orissa. It is celebrated as being the seat of a temple erected to Vishnu, and it is one of the principal resorts of Hindoo pilgrims, who come hither to worship the idol Juggernaut, a hideous figure of wood which, placed upon a movable platform sixty feet in height, is drawn by means of ropes, while the infatuated worshipers throw themselves under its ponderous wheels and are crushed to death, hoping thus to secure eternal blessedness. The testimony of several government officials has lately been given to the effect that the deaths which occur in these idolatrous scenes result more from the pressure of the vast crowds and the confusion of the excited multitude than from a determined desire for self-immolation. Greater care is now taken by the civil authorities to preserve order, and consequently to save life, but still the scenes on the roads as the multitudes come to the temple, at the temple itself and on the return are of a most demoralizing and destructive character. After all that may be said in extenuation or explanation by the officials, the testimony of those who have for many years been spectators of the exciting scenes at this loathsome and disgusting worship clearly establishes the fact that self-immolations prevail, and they are considered a special honor to the idol and a means of exaltation after death.

JULIA (jool'yah), a Christian woman of Rome to whom St. Paul sent his salutations, Rom. xvi. 15; she is named with Philologus, and is supposed to have been his wife or sister. Some have supposed this to be the name of a man, but the analogy of the following words, "Nereus and his sister," is against this.

JULIANUS (joo-le-ah'nus), FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed THE APOSTATE, Roman emperor, was the youngest son of Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great. He was born in 331, educated in the tenets of Christianity, but apostatized to paganism. In 354 he was declared Cæsar, and sent to Gaul, where he obtained several victories over the Germans; and in 361 the troops in Gaul revolted from Constantius and declared for Julian. During the lifetime of his cousin Constantius he made profession of the orthodox faith, but on succeeding to the throne he threw off all disguise, reopened the heathen temples and sought to restore the heathen worship in all its splendor, while he labored both by his pen and authority to destroy Christianity. He took from the Christian churches their riches, which were often very great, and divided them among his soldiers. He sought likewise to induce the Christians, by flattery or by favor, to embrace paganism; but failing in the attempt, he shut up their schools, prohibited the followers of that religion from teaching grammar and rhetoric and published an edict that the name of Christian should be abolished. His malice was further evinced by extraordinary indulgence to the Jews and an attempt to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem that the prophecy of Christ might be falsified; but it is said that flames of fire rose from beneath and consumed some of the workmen, by which miraculous interposition the design was frustrated. He did not long survive this disappointment, being killed in 363, in his expedition against the Persians. The character of Julian is full of contradictions. He displayed learning, magnanimity, justice and mercy, yet we find him insincere, superstitious, vain and ambitious.

JULIANUS, bishop of Eclana, a small town in Campania, and founder of the dogmatic system called Semi-Pelagianism. He was born of a noble family in the latter part of the fourth century, studied under Pelagius, became a deacon, married

Ia, daughter of a bishop, and was chosen bishop of Eclana. He was a man of high culture and unspotted character, and the most distinguished of the eighteen bishops who boldly refused to subscribe the anathema of Pelagius which Zosimus, bishop of Rome, published in A. D. 418, and appealed to a general council. He was then involved with his brethren in the same anathema and deposed from his see. The pope, the emperor and Augustine were at one in this matter, and an edict of banishment against the remonstrants was issued by the emperor in 420. Julianus sought refuge in vain at Constantinople, and for many long years was driven from place to place, proscribed by popular opinion no less than by imperial authority. He spent his last days as a schoolmaster in a small town in Sicily, distinguishing himself to the last by great generosity to the poor. He died, probably about 450. Some fragments of his writings are preserved.

JULIUS (joo'le-us), the name of three popes. 1. The first succeeded to the papal see on the death of Mark, in 337. He was celebrated for the part he took in the Athanasian controversy. He died in 352. 2. The second, known at first as GIULIANO DELLA ROVERE, was born near Savona about 1441. He was bishop successively of several sees, in 1471 became cardinal and in September, 1503, succeeded Pope Pius III. His pontificate was almost wholly occupied with wars. Against the Venetians, who held part of the Romagna, he concluded, in 1508, the iniquitous League of Cambray, with the emperor Louis XII. of France and the king of Aragon, and also published a terrible bull. After much fighting the Venetians submitted, and he made peace with them in 1510. He then made war on the French, to drive them out of Italy, saw his army defeated at Bologna, and was compelled to retire to Rome. A council being convoked at Pisa by the king of France, Julius convoked another at Rome, excommunicated Louis XII., and put his kingdom under an interdict in 1512, and died early in the following year. It was this pope by whose consent Henry VIII., then prince of Wales, married Catharine of Aragon. The rebuilding of St. Peter's at Rome was commenced by Julius, and Michael Angelo and Raphael were among the great artists who found in him a patron. 3. The third, previously known as Cardinal DEL MONTE, was chamberlain to Julius II., whose name he consequently assumed. He took little part in public business, but led a life of indolence at the villa still known by his name. He died in 1555.

JULIUS, the centurion who had the charge of conducting Paul as a prisoner to Rome, and who treated him with much consideration and kindness on the way, Acts xxvii. 1, 3.

JULIUS DE MEDICIS (joo'le-us deh med'e-che) was a Florentine nearly related to Leo X. He had been a soldier of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, and from this situation he was raised to be a cardinal priest and vice-chancellor of the Roman see, administrator thereof in both spirituals and temporals, and archbishop of Narbonne and Florence. To show how far corruption and nepotism could go in that age, he was appointed bishop of Worcester, in England. When Leo X., his uncle, died, his successor, Adrian VI., was an Englishman; and Julius, fearing that the new English pope might consider him too great a pluralist, resigned the see of Worcester in September, 1522, after having held it only a year. To him, however, another Italian, Jerome Ghinucci, succeeded, being the fourth Italian who had followed each other in this sadly-managed diocese. Julius de Medicis, after the death of Adrian VI., was himself elected pope, taking the name of Clement VII. He died in 1534. See CLEMENT.

JUMNA MUSJID (jum'na mus-jeed'). The great mosque at Delhi is known by this name. It is a vast and imposing structure. A rocky eminence has been leveled for an open square of 1400 yards, having three grand entrances. In the centre is a marble fountain for ceremonial ablutions. Airy colonnades surround three sides of this square, and on the fourth rises the mosque, which is built of red sandstone relieved by white marble. It is 260 feet long, and the domes and minarets which rise aloft are colored with black marble, thus introducing an additional shade, and so producing a varied and splendid effect. No images, no pictures, catch the eye or distract attention, only the pure marble, unadorned and harmonizing with the summer sky; and hence educated travelers agree that, as a place for worship, the Masjid is vastly superior to any dark, tawdry, image-crowded church in Rome.

JUNG (jung), JOHANN HEINRICH, generally called STILLING, an author the events of whose life and whose gifts of imagination render him worthy of notice, although at one time his merits were greatly overestimated. He was born of poor parents at Imgrund, in Nassau, December 12, 1740, and after trying various occupations became a student of medicine at Strasburg and settled as a medical practitioner at Elberfeld, where he distinguished himself as an operator for cataract. He is said to have improved the eyesight of more than two thousand persons. He subsequently held professorships at Marburg and Heidelberg. He died at Carlsruhe, April 2, 1817. His first publication was an autobiography, which attracted much attention, and was followed by other publications from time to time, continuing the history of the author's career. In religion Jung represents a generally understood to be a species of broom, Genista monosperma. It is a leguminous plant, and bears a white flower. It grows in Spain, Portugal and Palestine, and is abundant in the desert of Sinai, where it affords shade and protection to travelers. The roots are bitter, and could be eaten only in extreme hunger; they are much valued by the Arabs for charcoal. Dr. Thomson imagines that the roots were used only to cook the mallows which are described as cut in the same place, Job xxx. 4. "This," he says, "would give a sense in accordance with the known use of these roots, and still preserve the connection with the food of the poor."

JUNIUS (joon'yus), FRANCIS, the Latinized name of JON, FRANÇOIS DU (fron-swah' du-zhong'), a scholar and theologian, born at Bourges, May 1, 1545. Having studied jurisprudence, he repaired to Lyons, hoping to join the ambassador whom the king sent to Constantinople; but he was too late. Having remained some time, he returned to Bourges. He then repaired to Geneva with the intention of devoting himself to the study judgment, moderation and tolerance. His disposition was kindly and benevolent. The number and character of his works show vast industry and multifarious learning.

His principal work, which he executed in conjunction with Tremellius, was his Latin translation of the Old Testament. It appeared in five parts, the first containing the five books of Moses; the second, embracing the historical books; the third, the poetical books; the fourth, the prophets; and the fifth, the Apocryphal books. After the death of Tremellius, the translation was revised by his colleague, and in the course of twenty years it passed through twenty editions. Junius lived to superintend a third edition; but the best is that called the seventh, containing a good index by Paul Tossanus. The index was published in a volume by itself. The translation cannot be called elegant; it is too literal, and is sometimes obscure on that account. It is also disfigured with useless glosses and rabbinical traditions.

JUNIUS, FRANCIS, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg, 1589. In early life he studied mathematics with a view to the military profession, but the peace of 1609 caused him to turn his attention to literature and theology. After finishing his studies, he went to France to visit his parents. In 1620 he went over to England, and was received into the house of the earl of Arundel, where he lived as his librarian for thirty years. In 1650 he returned to the Continent in order to pass some time in the bosom of his family. For two years he lived in Friesland, in a district where the ancient Saxon tongue was preserved, that he might study the language. In 1675 he returned to England, and in 1676 went to Oxford, whence he retired to Windsor, to his nephew Isaac Vossius, and died there November 19, 1677.

Junius the younger was a very learned philologist, simple and pure in his manners, without ambition. He is said to have studied fourteen hours a day, and to have suffered no inconvenience from so sedentary a life. He wrote "Annotations on the Four Evangelists," and several other works.

class by no means uncommon in Germany, the pietistic rationalists, who put little stress upon the written word of God, but are full of veneration, often degenerating, however, into a mere sentimental enthusiasm, for the spiritual truths of Christianity.

JUNGE (yun'geh), or JUNGIUS (yun'je-us), JOACHIM, an eminent philosopher of the seventeenth century, was born at Lubeck, in 1587, and distinguished himself as an able antagonist of the Aristotelian philosophy. Like his great contemporary, Lord Bacon, he substituted experiment in the place of idle and antiquated theories, and is ranked by Leibnitz as equal to Copernicus and Galileo, and but little inferior to Descartes. He died in 1657.

JUNIA (joon'ya) (for Junilius or Junianus), a Christian at Rome whom St. Paul speaks of with Andronicus as his kinsman—i. e., of the same tribe—of note among the apostles, and in Christ before himself, Rom. xvi. 7. Some have imagined the name that of a female; but this is less likely.

JUNIPER (joo'ni-per). The word so translated, 1 Ki. xix. 4, 5; Job xxx. 4; Ps. cxx. 4, is of theology. In 1565 he became minister of the Walloon church at Antwerp, and was afterward Protestant pastor at Limbourg, whence he went to Heidelberg and superintended a small church in the neighborhood. In 1568 he went to the Low Countries and officiated as chaplain to the prince of Orange. Returning to his church in the palatinate, he remained there till 1573, when the elector palatine Frederick III. called him to Heidelberg to work upon a Latin version of the Old Testament along with Tremellius. In 1578 he was sent to Neustadt, where he taught in the college newly established by the elector for sixteen months. Repairing thence to Otterbourg, in order to found a Reformed church, he returned to Neustadt, whence he was called to the chair of theology at Heidelberg. Having been taken to France by the duke de Bouillon, he was charged by Henry IV. with a mission to Germany. Returning to his native country with the purpose of settling at Bourges, he was requested by the magistrates of Leyden, as he passed through their city, to accept the chair of theology. He died there of the plague, October 13th, 1602.

Junius was a man of extensive erudition. He was well acquainted with the ancient languages, and as a theologian was distinguished by good JUNKIN (jung'kin), GEORGE, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister of great eminence, born in the year 1790, at Kingston, Cumberland county, Pennsylvania. He was educated at Jefferson College, and after graduating, he commenced the study of theology under Dr. John Mason of New York. In 1818 he was ordained and settled at Gettysburg, where he remained until 1830. He commenced a manual labor academy at Germantown, whence he removed to Easton, Pennsylvania, to preside over Lafayette College, from which, in 1841, he was transferred to the presidency of Miami University, and in 1848 he became president of Washington College, Lexington, Virginia, which he resigned in 1861. He was held in great esteem not only for his intellectual and theological attainments, his arduous services in the work of the ministry, but for his great knowledge of ecclesiastical forms and laws of procedure in church courts, which made him a valuable member of synods and assemblies. Few men of his day preached more diligently, and his literary diligence in the production of sermons, essays and treatises on the leading questions of the age was truly wonderful. He wrote on "Justification," on "Prophecy," "The Great Apostasy," "Sanctification," "The Gospel according to Moses," "Political Fallacies," "The Vindication," and he was the author of several articles in the Princeton Review. Jefferson College conferred the degree of doctor of divinity on him in 1833, and he received the degree of LL.D., in the year 1856, from Rutgers College. He died May 20, 1868.

JUNO, the Roman goddess, was the queen of heaven, and under the name of Regina was worshiped in Italy at an early period. She bore the same relation to women that Jupiter did to men. She took a special interest in marriage, whence her name of Juga or Jugalis (the yoke-maker); but she was also a kind of female providence, protecting the sex from the cradle to the grave. Her epithets, Virginialis (the goddess "of virgins") and Matrona ("of mothers"), indicate this. It is a very significant feature of the Roman character that Juno was also believed to be the guardian of the national finances, watching over her people like a thrifty mother and housewife. A temple, containing the mint, was erected to her on the Capitoline as Juno Moneta (the money-coiner). She was besides the goddess of chastity, and prostitutes were forbidden to touch her altars. She had a multitude of other surnames, which need not here be enumerated. Her great festival was called the Matronalia, and was celebrated on the first of March. Her month (June) was considered the most propitious for fruitful marriages; and even yet, after eighteen centuries of Christianity, this old Roman faith lingers, superstitiously in the popular mind.

JUPITER (joo'pi-ter) or JOVE [Greek Zeus], the father and king of gods and men, and the supreme ruler of the Hellenic race, to whom the Jews, under Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, were to be compelled to do honor. It is stated in 2 Macc. vi. 1, 2, "that the king sent an old man of Athens to compel the Jews to depart from the laws of their fathers, and not to live after the laws of God; and to pollute also the temple in Jerusalem, and to call it the temple of Jupiter Olympius, and that in Gerizim of Jupiter the defender of strangers, as they did desire that dwelt in the place." Olympius was a very common epithet of Zeus, and he is sometimes simply called Lympius. Olympia was the name of the temple and sacred grove of Zeus Olympius, and it was here that the famous statue of gold and ivory, the work of Phidias, was erected. Caligula attempted to have this statue transferred to Rome, and it was only preserved in its place by the assurance that it would not bear removal. Antiochus Epiphanes surpassed all other kings in his worship and veneration of the gods, so that it was impossible to count the number of the statues he erected. His especial favorite was Zeus. He commenced, in B. C. 174, the completion of the temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens, and associated the worship of Jupiter with that of Apollo at Daphne.

Antiochus, after compelling the Jews to call the temple of Jerusalem the temple of Jupiter Olympius, built an idol altar upon the altar of God. Upon this altar swine were offered every day, and the broth of their flesh was sprinkled about the temple, 1 Macc. i. 47; 2 Macc. vi. 5. The idol altar which was upon the altar of God was considered by the Jews to be the "abomination of desolation" foretold by Daniel, 2 Macc. xi. 31; xii. 11, and mentioned by our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 15.

The grove of Daphne was not far from Antioch, and at this city Antiochus Epiphanes erected a temple for the worship of Jupiter Capitolinus, to whom the Jews, after the taking of Jerusalem, in whatever country they might be, were compelled by Vespasian to pay two drachmæ, as they used to pay to the temple at Jerusalem. Hadrian, after the second revolt of the Jews, erected a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in the place where the temple of God formerly stood. There is probably reference made to Jupiter Capitolinus in Dan. xi. 38, alluding to Antiochus Epiphanes: "But in his estate shall he worship the god of forces," for under this name Jupiter was worshiped by the victorious general on his return from a campaign, and it was in honor of Jupiter Capitolinus that he celebrated his triumph.

In the passage from 2 Macc. above quoted a temple was also ordered to be set up to Zeus Xenius on Mount Gerizim. Josephus gives a different account. He relates that the Samaritans, who, when it pleased them, denied that they were of the kindred of the Jews, wrote to Antiochus Epiphanes, begging him to allow the temple on Mount Gerizim, which had no name, to be called the temple of Jupiter Hellenius. This petition is said to have been granted. The epithet "Xenius" is given to Zeus as the supporter of hospitality and the friend of strangers, and it is explained in 2 Macc. by the clause "as they did desire, who dwelt in the place." Ewald supposes that Jupiter was so called on account of the hospitable disposition of the Samaritans, whilst Jahn suggests that it was because the Samaritans in their letter to Antiochus Epiphanes said they were strangers in that country. Grotius says the dwellers of the place were pilgrims from Mysia and Mesopotamia, specially referring to their idolatrous practices, 2 Ki. xvii. 24.

The appearance of the gods upon earth was very commonly believed among the ancients. Accordingly, we find that Jupiter and Mercury are said to have wandered in Phrygia, and to have been entertained by Baucis and Philemon. Hence the people of Lycaonia, as recorded in the Acts, ch. xiv. 11, cried out, "The gods have come down to us in the likeness of men; and they called Barnabas, Jupiter, and Paul, Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker." Barnabas was probably identified with Jupiter, not only because Jupiter and Mercury were companions, but because his personal appearance was majestic. Paul was identified with Mercury as the speaker, for this god was the god of eloquence. The temple of Jupiter at Lystra appears to have been outside the gates, Acts xiv. 13, as was frequently the custom; and the priest being summoned, oxen and garlands were brought, in order to do sacrifice with the people to Paul and Barnabas, who, filled with horror, restrained the people with great difficulty. It is well known that oxen were wont to be sacrificed to Jupiter.

JURE DIVINO (joo'ray di-ve'no). Things ordained expressly by God are said to exist "jure divino" (by divine right or authority). Differing from this are "jure humano" (human law), "jure ecclesiastico" (church authority) and "jure gentium" (national authority). Sacraments, doctrines and offices ordained and set forth in Scripture to be observed are "jure divino;" customs and ordinances instituted by the Church are "jure ecclesiastico;" and common laws, or statute laws of men in their national estate, are "jure gentium."

THE JUNIPER.—See JUNIPER.

JURIEU (zhoo-r'yeu'), PIERRE, a distinguished Protestant theologian of France, was born at Mer, near Blois, December 24, 1637, of which place his father was Protestant minister. He commenced his studies at Saumur, where he became M. A. when barely nineteen, and continued them in Holland and England, in which latter country he received Episcopal ordination, but on being recalled to succeed his father in the pastorate at Mea, was reordained according to the Geneva form. He was already known as a distinguished scholar, and was chosen professor of theology in the university of Sedan in 1764, where he shortly afterward obtained the chair of philosophy for the famous Bayle, whose correspondence with his favorite pupil Basnage had caused him to entertain a high opinion of his abilities. The university of Sedan having been suppressed by Louis XIV. in 1681, Jurieu followed his colleague Bayle to Rotterdam, where he became pastor of the Walloon church, and then, by Bayle's influence, professor of theology in the newly-established academy. While resident in France he had made himself known as one of the ablest and most zealous defenders of the Reformed faith, though the ardor with which he maintained the necessity of baptism for salvation had displeased the leaders of the Protestant Church, by whom his thesis was condemned at the synod of Saintonge. His natural irritability was much exasperated by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, which deprived him of all hope of returning to France, and his life was thenceforward one perpetual scene of varying controversy, in which friend or foe, Protestant or Catholic, received the same severe handling, and were denounced with a rancorous hostility very unbecoming a Christian minister. His irritability at last amounted to a disease, under which both his mental and bodily powers gave way, and after a languishing illness of some years, he died at Rotterdam, January 11, 1713, at the age of seventy-five. His private life was characterized by many virtues. His beneficence exceeded his means, and he employed his influence with foreign courts for the relief of the sufferings of his exiled Protestant brethren.

As an author, his fame rests chiefly on his controversial writings, which, apart from their undue harshness, sometimes amounting to rancor, toward his adversaries, merit much commendation. His learning was profound, his quotations exact and his acuteness in discovering the weak points in the writings of his antagonists very considerable.

JURISDICTION (joo-ris-dik'shun). This term, when used in an ecclesiastical sense, denotes the authority which appertains to a bishop in carrying out the laws of the Church. The controversies that have been waged respecting the boundaries of this power have been carried on for ages with great keenness and vigor, inasmuch as the State has accused the Church of intruding into civil things, and the Church has equally held that the State has unduly interfered with spiritual things. Formerly in several places an earl and a bishop sat in the same court, so as to secure a judgment from each on the cases which came before them of a double or complicated nature. The definition usually admitted is that the Church, being a free society, has to do with spiritual and moral things, and the State with civil and temporal things; but the difficulty arises in practice chiefly from the fact that men's conduct in temporal affairs is often found to act upon the interests of the Church, and in all such cases the determination of the question who is to rule presents the knotty problem.

JUS ASYLI (jus a-si'le). Among the Greeks, Romans and Hebrews sacred places were held in reverence, and men who fled to them were protected. Very early, even as soon as the time of Constantine, such a privilege was recognized as belonging to Christian Churches, but for two hundred years it has been abolished.

JUS DEVOLUTUM (jus dev-oo'tun), a term used in Scotch ecclesiastical law which means that, if the patron of a parish do not provide a successor to a parish in six months after it became vacant, the right to provide and present a successor devolves on the presbytery of the bounds.

JUSHAB HESED (joo'shab-he'sed), 1 Chr. iii. 20, a descendant of the line of David.

JUSTI (jus'te), KARL WILHELM, a Protestant theologian, was born at Marburg, January 14, 1763. After studying for some years in his native place and at Jena, he became a private tutor at Metzlar, whence he removed to Marburg as a preacher in one of the churches there, 1790. In 1793 he was chosen professor of philosophy in the university. In 1801 he was appointed archdeacon, soon after superintendent and consistorialrath. In 1814 he was made oberpfarrer, and in 1822 professor of theology. He died August 7, 1846. Justi devoted himself to the explanation of the Old and New Testaments, after the method of Eichhorn and Herder, to whom he was by no means equal in genius. He was a man of erudition, taste and liberality, superficial rather than profound. The prophets of the Old Testament occupied his chief attention. He published "National Songs of the Hebrews," an enlarged edition of Herder's "History of Hebrew Poetry."

JUSTICE (jus'tis), a divine attribute, Ps. lxxxix. 14, according to which God acts in the government of the universe, Gen. xix. 25. His justice is seen in his holding to his righteous law, 1 John i. 9, and in his punishing those who disobey his righteous and equitable commands, Ex. xxiii. 7. The divine justice has been viewed in two lights, as legislative, laying down just and righteous laws, and distributive, dealing with creatures according to those laws, while justice, as applied to men, is administrative, as exercised by those in authority, Deut. i. 16, 17, and commutative, as governing men's dealings one with another, Mic. vi. 8.

JUSTIFICATION (jus-ti-fi-kay'shun), one of the most common terms of theology. It expresses an act of divine favor whereby a sinner is absolved from the penalty of his sins and accepted as righteous, not on account of anything in himself, but on account of the righteousness of Christ imputed to him. According to this view, it is a purely forensic act—the act of a judge sitting in the place of judgment, and acquitting the condemned by an exercise of clemency, in consideration of the merits of another, who has paid the penalty which was justly his due. In this sense of the word the apostle is understood to speak of God as "the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus."

The doctrine of justification is laid down most plainly in the Epistles of Saint Paul, and it has appeared to some as if there were a discrepancy in this respect between these writings and the Epistle of James. Whereas one says: "For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory, but not before God. For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness." The other says: "Was not Abraham our father justified by works? Ye see then that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only." Perhaps the most effectual way of reconciling these statements is to suppose that the apostle Paul is describing the nature of justification as the act of God in pardoning and accepting the sinner who by faith flees to Christ and trusts in him; and this justification has no dependence upon works, but only upon faith, while Saint James is speaking of its outward manifestation—of its reality as evinced in the Christian character and conduct, which necessarily expresses itself in good works, without which, in this sense, there can be no justification. Justification, in short, is independent of works in its origin and primary condition. Its origin is the grace of God, its only primary condition acceptance of this grace or faith. But it is dependent upon works as its essential manifestation. Faith is not passive, but active; and a faith which is not active, which is not a spring of earnest Christian activity, is not a true faith. Such a faith cannot justify a man.

JUSTIN, surnamed THE MARTYR, and frequently THE PHILOSOPHER, a Father, and, after Tertullian, the most distinguished apologist of the Christian Church, was a native of Flavia Neapolis, a Roman city erected on the site of the ancient Shechem, in Samaria. The date of his birth is variously assigned to the years 89, 113, 114 and 118. His father was a heathen, and Justin was educated in the religion of his father. He became an ardent student of the philosophy of his age, beginning with the school of the Stoics, but finally adhering to that of the Platonists. With the last, as he himself relates, he was in the commencement highly satisfied; but as he was one day wandering along the sea-shore he encountered a man of mild and venerable aspect, who created in Justin's mind a desire for higher knowledge than Plato had reached, referring him to the study of the Jewish prophets, and through them to the great Christian Teacher whom they foretold. The result was his conversion to Christianity, at some date between 119 and 140. After his conversion, he retained the garb of a philosopher, but as a Christian philosopher he strove by his writings and his instructions to bring others to the truth which he had himself discovered. He is said to have been beheaded about the year 165, in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, because he refused to offer sacrifice to the heathen gods. His death is attributed by the ancients to the enmity and malignant arts of the Cynic philosopher, Crescens. The works of Justin, although not very voluminous, are highly interesting and important. The books ascribed to him with certainty are two "Apologies for the Christians," the first addressed "to Antoninus Pius," the second "to the Senate;" a "Dialogue with Tryphon the Jew," which professes to be the record of an actual discussion held at Ephesus. The "Address to the Greeks" is not so certainly a genuine work of Justin, and the same may be said of his "Exhortation to the Greeks," his "Letter to Diognetus" and his work "On the Monarchy of God," an argument against the polytheism of paganism. The other works ascribed to him are certainly spurious.

JUSTIN I., EMPEROR OF THE EAST, was born in 450, of barbarian parents, and entered as a private into the emperor's body-guard, of which he rose to be commander. He held this last post till the death of Anastasius I., whom he succeeded on the throne, in 518. In the following year he entered into an arrangement with the pope which resulted in a cessation of hostilities between the Greek and Latin Churches. In 525, on hearing the news of the destruction, by an earthquake, of Antioch and several other cities, he took off his crown, put on mourning and ordered a supply of money and necessaries for the sufferers. Some time before his death, which took place in August, 527, he had adopted his nephew Justinian and associated him with himself in the government.

JUSTINA (jus-te'na). There were two female saints of this name. One of them was said by tradition to have been martyred in the beginning of the fourth century at Nicomedia. Her purity and constancy are reported to have so greatly affected Cyprian that they induced him to examine the claims of Christianity, and he finally embraced the faith. It is further stated that during the severe persecution of Diocletian and Maximian she was carried to Nicomedia, where she maintained the faith with great steadfastness, and ultimately she was beheaded. Afterward a poem was written in her memory by Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius the Younger. She is recognized as a saint by both the Greek and Roman Churches. The other was reputed to be a native of Padua, of which city she is recognized as the patron saint, and she is associated with St. Mark in the patronage of Venice. Little is known concerning her, except that her death took place by martyrdom about A. D. 304 under Diocletian, or, as others say, under Nero. Her relics are reported with the usual degree of dogmatism to have been found, and they are with equal certainty preserved in a church at Padua.

JUSTINIAN (jus-tin'e-an) I., EMPEROR OF THE EAST, nephew of the emperor Justin I., was born in 483, in the village of Tauresium, which afterward grew into the splendid city of Justiniana. Although of obscure parentage, he shared the success of his uncle, being invited at an early age to Constantinople, where he was carefully educated and attained to considerable eminence in knowledge. When his uncle was elevated to the purple in 518, he appointed Justinian commander-in-chief of the army of Asia—an appointment which he declined, however, his tastes inclining him to civic pursuits. In 521 he was named consul, and during the remainder of his uncle's reign he continued to exercise great influence. In 527 the emperor Justin proclaimed him his partner in the empire. Justin survived the step but a few months, and Justinian was crowned as sole emperor, along with his wife, the famous Theodora. His reign of thirty-eight years is the most brilliant in the history of the late empire. Although himself without the taste or capacity for military command, he was successful in selecting the ablest generals of the last days of Roman military ascendancy. Under the direction of his generals, his reign may be said to have restored the Roman empire to its ancient limits, and to have reunited the East and West under a single rule. It is, however, as a legislator that Justinian has gained renown. Immediately on his accession he set himself to collect all previous legislative enactments which were still in force; and in order to do this thoroughly, he first compiled a code which comprised all the constitutions of his predecessors. The authoritative commentaries of the jurists were next harmonized and published under the title "Digesta Pandecta," with the addition of his own constitutions. His third great legal undertaking was the composition of a systematic treatise on the laws for the guidance of students and lawyers. This was published under the title of "Institutes." The character of Justinian as a ruler contrasts favorably with that of most of the emperors, whether of the earlier or of the later empire. His personal virtues were of a class and in a degree seldom united in one of such station, and his public administration, with the single exception of that of ecclesiastical affairs, in which he was an arbitrary and imperious intermeddler, exhibits great ability and just and upright intentions. He died November 14, 565.

JUSTINIANI (jus-tin-e-ah'ne), AGOSTINO, bishop of Nebbio, in Corsica, was a prelate of distinguished literary abilities. He was author of "Annals of the Republic of Genoa" and a "Psalter in Hebrew, Greek, Arabic and Chaldee, with Latin Notes," being the first of the kind that ever appeared in print. He perished in a voyage from Corsica to Genoa in 1536.

JUSTINIANI, ST. LORENZO, the first patriarch of Venice, was born there in 1381, died in 1469, and was canonized by Pope Alexander VIII. in 1690. He was the author of several devotional works.

JUSTUS (jus'tus). 1. Surnamed Barsabas. See JOSEPH. 2. A Christian at Corinth with whom Paul lodged, Acts xviii. 7. 3. Called also Jesus, a believing Jew who was with Paul at Rome when he wrote to the Colossians, Col. iv. 11. The apostle names him and Marcus as being at that time his only fellow-laborers.

JUTTAH (jut'ta), a city in the hill-country of Judah, Josh. xv. 55, afterward allotted to the priests, Josh. xxi. 16. It is now a village called Yutta. Conjectures have been hazarded that this was the birth-place of John the Baptist, Luke i. 39; but they are only conjectures.

JUXON (juk'son), WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Chichester, in 1582. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and St. John's College, Oxford, was patronized by Laud, and through his influence obtained the bishopric of Hereford in 1633 and of London in the same year. In 1635 he was made lord high treasurer of England—an office which no churchman had held since the reign of Henry VIII. This gave great offence to the Puritans; but on his resignation of the office, after having held it something less than six years, the integrity and ability with which he had discharged its various duties were admitted on all hands. During the whole of the civil wars he maintained an unshaken fidelity to the king, whom he attended during his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight and on the scaffold, on which occasion he received from the hand of Charles the moment previous to his execution his diamond George, with directions to forward it to his son. After the king's death the parliament threw him into confinement for contumacy in refusing to disclose the particulars of his conversation with the king, but he was soon released, and continued to live in privacy until the Restoration. He was then raised to the see of Canterbury, but did not long enjoy the honors and emoluments of the primacy, his death occurring about two years after his elevation, in 1663.

great deal of criticism and some misconstruction, and Kant was obliged to popularize his design in the "Prolegomena to every Future System of Metaphysics claiming to be a Science." This was followed by the "Metaphysical Element of Physics," and in 1788 the second part of his great philosophical system, the "Critique of Practical Reason." Lastly, in 1790, he published his "Critique of Judgment," which, showing the relation of human nature to aesthetics and natural theology, may be said to complete the Kantian system. Two years after this he appeared again as an author, and published the first part of his "Religion within the Bounds of Pure Reason." This publication provoked the hostility of the Prussian government, and the author was forbidden to proceed with the work. Kant referred the case to the theological faculty at Königsberg, who seem to have had appellate jurisdiction in such cases. The decision was in his favor, and the whole work was published in 1793. It was his last important contribution to philosophy. The life of Kant was but he was most probably an educated Brahmin. It is uncertain whether Buddha or Kapila is the more ancient teacher; and even Max Müller has failed to determine the propriety of the claims that have been urged that Kapila copied from Buddha, and that Buddha, on the other hand, got much of his system from Kapila.

KARAITES (kar'a-ites). This is the name of a celebrated sect among the Jews distinguished by their holding to the written law altogether and rejecting the oral law, or tradition. They have been unjustly confounded with the Sadducees, but the time of their origin cannot be accurately determined. All evidence worth reception indicates their existence after the return from Babylon, but they were not recognized as a distinct sect until after the oral law was collected; but when the Talmud was completed, they made their existence and power felt. They are not referred to in the New Testament and in Josephus as the Pharisees and Sadducees are, simply because they were not organized as a distinct sect; but it is well known that in the time of our Lord the synagogues differed greatly from each other. The Karaites have made themselves felt in all the ages since the dispersion, and the fact that their writings are not generally known is the reason why they have not attracted greater attention; but since the seventeenth century their views have been better understood, since Protestant theologians have become interested in their condition. They admit any doctrine or duty which may legitimately be deduced from the Old Testament Scriptures. In their Confession they attach great importance to prayer, fasting and pilgrimages to Hebron. They build their synagogues north and south instead of east and west, so as to have their faces toward Jerusalem when they pray. They are moral, temperate and sober in their habits, though avoiding asceticism. They are found in the Crimea, in Austria and in Russia. One remarkable tenet of the Karaites is the belief that the Messiah will proceed from their sect. Their literature is valuable. The most valuable of their Hebrew works are collected in the Imperial Library of St. Petersburg.

KAREAH (ka-re'ah), father of Johanan, but otherwise entirely unknown, Jer. xl. 8.

KARENA (ka-re'na), written also KAREMA (ka-re'ma), is the name of a public penance of forty days' fast imposed by bishops on the clergy and laymen of the Romish Church, and also by abbots on monks. It is also a term applied to the season in the Romish calendar called Lent.

KARENS (kar'enz) is the name of a portion of the inhabitants of the Burmese empire scattered through the country to the number of about five millions. Tradition traces them to Thibet; and according to their own belief, they came from a northern region. They have been recognized by many ethnologists as the earliest settlers in the country. They live together in a patriarchal manner, somewhat on the principle of clanship, as the descendants of a family having the same name associate with each other around a great home or patriarchal dwelling.

Their religious traditions are very remarkable. They hold that originally one man was created from the earth, and one woman was formed from one of his ribs. They have allusions to a serpent, to dwelling in a garden, to fruits that might be used and to one that was forbidden, to the woman eating and giving also to her husband. So also they have distinct traces of a flood which rose up to the heavens, and likewise to the confusion of man's speech. On the subject of the Deity they have remarkably clear views. They hold that God is immutable, eternal, and that he was from the beginning; that he is omnipotent, good and holy. They hold the immortality of the soul, but their views on this point are not settled. Besides "Ywah," their name of the Deity, which seems to be a modification of the Hebrew name Jehovah, they believe in a great number of spiritual beings which dwell in trees, plants, and indeed in nearly everything animate and inanimate.

They are chiefly interesting to the people of a Christian country because of the great progress which the gospel has made among them since the year 1828, when the American Baptist missionaries Boardman and Judson began a work which under the blessing of God has produced the most precious results. In the year 1868 this mission had sixty-six native ordained pastors and evangelists, three hundred and forty-six native preachers unordained, three hundred and sixty native churches, and nineteen thousand two hundred and thirty-one church members. So great is the change which has been produced among this people that a late traveler has stated that "he found himself for seventeen successive nights, at the end of his days' journeys through the forest, in a native Christian village."

KARG, GEORG, a German divine of the sixteenth century who became famous for his views on the nature of the atonement. He was in 1512 at Haroldingen. After entering the ministry, to which he was ordained by Melancthon, and holding several charges, he became superintendent of the churches of the duchy of Baireuth. On the subject of the atonement he held that it was only by the passive obedience of Christ that reconciliation was made for man, that the law only binds to obedience or to penalty, that Christ for sinners paid the penalty, and that his active obedience was rendered on his own account, as he was a moral agent, and therefore under law. After maintaining these views for a time he retracted them in 1570. Piscator of Herborn and Camero of Saumur subsequently held similar views. Karg died in 1576.

KARKAA (kar-ka'ah), a place on the southern border of Judah, situated on the high tableland west of Kadesh-barnea, Josh. xv. 3. It is not again mentioned, and the site is unknown.

KARKOR (kar'kor), a place on the east side of the Jordan to which Zeba and Zalmunna fled marked by few events. For more than forty years he had to struggle against poverty, and it was only his election as professor, in 1770, that gave him a reliable independence. He died at St. Petersburg in 1804.

KANTO-PLATONISM (kan-to-pla/ton-ism) is the designation of a philosophical school which attempts to unite the idealism of Kant with the system of Plato. Cousin has been the great master of this school. Avoiding as he did the views of Locke on sensationalism, and the Germans on ontology, he held that, by the knowledge of phenomena which we actually possessed, it was possible to rise up to a knowledge of real existence, as reason received truth spontaneously by direct and immediate perception. He rejected in a decided manner the charges which were brought against his system as involving pantheism.

KAPILA (kap'e-lah) was a celebrated Hindoo philosopher, and the reputed author of the "Sankhya" system. In the usual manner of the Hindoos he has been called a son of Brahma, and he has even been described as an incarnation of Vishnu, with their army when defeated by Gideon, Jud. viii. 10. Its situation is not described, but we read that when Gideon pursued them he "went up from the ford at Succoth) by the way of them that dwell in tents, on the east of Nobah and Jogbehah," ver. 11. It must therefore have been somewhere on the level plateau of Mishar, near the eastern border of Moab. Eusebius and Jerome mention it as in their day a castle a day's journey distant from Petra. The site is now unknown, but that assigned to it by Eusebius seems too far south.

KARL-BORROMÆUS (karl-bor-ro-me'us) UNION is the name of an association formed in Prussia for the purpose of disseminating the theological literature of the Romish Church. It was formed in 1844, and under its auspices a monthly journal and occasional works are issued. An institution called the "Gustavus Adolphus Society" of the Protestant Church had been laboring in Prussia, and the Romish union was formed with a view to oppose the other.

KARMATHIANS (kar-ma'the-anz), a Mohammedan sect which arose in Irak during the ninth century. It derived its name from Karmata, its founder, a poor laborer who assumed the rank of a prophet. They maintained bloody wars with the kaliphs for nearly a century.

KARNAIM (kar-na'im). See ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

KARNKOWSKI (karn-kov'ske), STANISLAUS, a Polish writer and prelate, was born in 1526 in Bland. He became bishop of Uladislav about 1563, and in 1577 he was made coadjutor to the archbishop of Gresna, and in 1581 he succeeded to that see and to the primacy. He died in 1603. He established seminaries for education both at Uladislav and Gresna, and occupied himself with success in the reform of his clergy. He wrote a "History of the Polish Interregnum."

KARO (kar'o), JOSEPH BEN EPHRAIM, was one of the most eminent of all the great rabbinical teachers among the Jews. He was born in Spain, in 1488, and in consequence of the savage persecution to which his people were exposed the family removed to Nicopolis, in Turkey in Europe. Very early in life he became attached to rabbinical lore. He committed the text of the Mishna to memory, and rapidly established his character as a great authority. After a sojourn at Adrianople and Salonica, he removed to Safet, in Palestine, which was then the great centre of Cabbalistic learning. He was ordained, and he prosecuted the arduous labor of preparing a ritual codex, which he expected would have given the highest character, and even constrained the Jews to recognize him as the writer of his people and the preparer of the way for the Messiah. A second work which, after nine years of toil, he completed, had great acceptance, and it remains a rabbinical authority until the present time. The appearance of this compendium of law made him well known, and the first place was assigned to him amongst all the great teachers of the law. He died in 1575.

KARTAH (kar'tah), a town locally in Zebulun, allotted to the Levites of the family of Merari, Josh. xxi. 34.

KARTAN (kar'tan), a city of Naphtali allotted to the Levites of the family of Gershon, Josh. xxi. 32. It is probably the same with Kirjathaim, 1 Chr. vi. 76.

KASSIMIR (kas'se-mer), SAINT, has been recognized as the patron saint of Poland. He was born in the year 1458, and as a prince of Poland he made most vigorous efforts to secure the crown of Hungary. He led a great army, in 1471, toward Hungary; but when Pope Sixtus IV. pronounced in favor of the deposed monarch, he retired. He fell into a degree of asceticism that made him famous of all admirers, and so he continued until his death, in 1483, at Wilna, in Lithuania. He was declared a saint in 1522 by Leo X.

KATHISMATA (ka-this'ma-ta). When certain parts of Scripture were read in the early Church, the people sat, and this name came in process of time to be applied to them. When other portions were read, the people stood. Thus it has been customary to stand while the selections called the Gospels are read, and when the psalms are sung.

KATTATH (kat'tath), a town in the territory of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 15.

KATYAYANA (kat-ya-yah'na), a name of great celebrity in the literary history of India. It belongs, in all probability, to several personages renowned for their contributions to the grammatical and ritual literature of the Brahminical Hindoos, but it is met with also amongst the names of the chief disciples of the Buddha Sakyamuni.

KAUTZ (kowitz), JACOB, was one of the leading German Anabaptists in the sixteenth century.

He preached at Worms against infant baptism, and he had separated himself from the Lutherans on questions connected with the Trinity. Being in danger of imprisonment at Worms, he fled, and after wandering about he began preaching at Strasburg; but in 1529 he had excited such a feeling that he was arrested and obliged to leave the place. In 1532 he again appeared at Strasburg, but he was constrained to depart, and the circumstances of his later years and of his death are unknown.

RUINS OF A NORMAN KEEP AT PEVENSEY, ENGLAND.—See KEEP.

He was known to Capito, Bucer and Ecolampadius, who sought to restrain him, but in vain, as he even hoped to gain Capito over to his views.

KAYE (kay), JOHN, D.D., bishop of Lincoln, a learned and estimable prelate, was born at Hammersmith in 1783. He received his education at Cambridge, where he had the rare distinction of being highest at once in classics and mathematics. In 1814 he was elected master of Christ's College; in 1815 was created D.D. by royal mandate; and in 1816, on the death of Dr. Watson, bishop of Llandaff, he was appointed his successor, as regius professor of divinity. Some of the lectures delivered from this chair have been published under the title of "Ecclesiastical History as illustrated by the Writings of Tertullian and Justin Martyr." In 1820 he was nominated to the see of Bristol, and in 1827 advanced to that of Lincoln. Ecclesiastical history was his favorite study, and few had better acquaintance with patristic lore. His "Account of the Writings and Opinions of Clement of Alexandria," and his "Athanasius and the Council of Nice," attest his learning and research; and his publications on occasional topics include sermons, charges and some controversial pamphlets. He died in 1853.

KEACH (keech), BENJAMIN, a distinguished divine of the Baptist denomination, was born in Buckinghamshire, February 29, 1640, and died in Southwark, July 18, 1704. His parents, too poor to give him a liberal education, intended him for business, but his aspirations were after literature, and he eagerly devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures. At the age of fifteen he joined the Baptist church in Winslow, and three years afterward was chosen by the members of the same church as their pastor. After the Restoration, in common with multitudes, he suffered persecution. Finding no rest from informers in the country, he sought refuge in London, where, with his wife and family, he arrived penniless, having been robbed on the way. Soon after, he was ordained pastor of a small society which met in a private house in Tooley Street. His congregation, however, increased, and erected a commodious house of worship in Horsley Down, Southwark, where Dr. Gill afterward preached. He was very popular, and his congregation at length averaged one thousand persons. His pen was ever active. He published forty-three works, of which sixteen were controversial, nine poetical and eighteen practical and expository. The works by which he is usually known are—"Tropologia; or, a Key to Open the Scripture Metaphors and Types;" "Gospel Mysteries Revealed." Mingled with much good material of which the judicious student may avail himself with advantage, there is a large amount of fanciful exposition and of unwise spiritualizing in these volumes.

KEATING (keet'ing), GEOFFRY, "priest, poet and prophet," as described in the mortuary memorial in his chapel of Tybrid, county of Tipperary, Ireland, was educated at Salamanca; and on his settling in his parish, he devoted much of his time to collecting materials for a history of Ireland, while, at the same time, he acquired great fame as an eloquent preacher. One of his sermons being supposed to reflect on a lady of influence with the lord-president, he was forced to fly from his anger to the mountain fastnesses, where he composed his celebrated history in the Irish tongue, which was translated into English. Despite its fables and legends, it has ever been highly popular. Dr. Keating wrote some poems and treatises; of the latter "The Three Shafts of Death" is much admired by Irish scholars. He died in 1650.

KEBLAH (keb'lah) is the term used by the Mohammedans to indicate the point toward which they look while at their devotions. Sale, in his translation of the Koran, says: "At first, Mohammed and his followers observed no particular rite in turning their faces toward any certain place or quarter of the world when they prayed, it being declared to be perfectly indifferent. Afterward, when the prophet fled to Medina, he directed them to turn toward the temple of Jerusalem (probably to ingratiate himself with the Jews), which continued to be their Keblah for six or seven months." Afterward, in the second year of the Hegira, with a view to gain the Arabs, he directed worshipers not to turn toward Jerusalem, but toward Mecca; and the fact that he so far changed in the matter of worship led several followers to abandon him.

KECKERMANN (kek'er-mann), BARTHOLOMEW, an eminent Prussian Calvinist divine and philosophical professor, was born at Dantzic in 1571. After studying divinity and philosophy at the university of Wittenberg, he became Hebrew professor at Heidelberg, and finally co-rector of the celebrated academical institution in his native city. In this capacity he proposed to initiate students in philosophy in a more compendious manner, and with that view drew up a great number of systems and treatises of logic, ethics, metaphysics and astronomy, and was so assiduous in writing and teaching that his health became irreparably injured, and he died in 1609. The next most valuable of his works is his systematic treatise on rhetoric.

KEDAR (ke'dar), a son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 13. A powerful Arabic tribe sprang from him, to which reference is frequently made in Scripture, Isa. xxi. 16; xlii. 11; lx. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 21, etc. It would seem from some of the passages as if Kedar was taken in a kind of representative sense, the most powerful of the Arabian tribes known to the covenant people being put for those tribes generally, much as Ephraim was employed in relation to the ten tribes of Israel; so that by the princes or the people of Kedar may be understood the sons of the desert, who inhabited the north-eastern districts of Arabia. In Ps. cxx. 5, two outlandish and barbarous people—those of Mesech to the north-east, and of Kedar to the north-west—appear to be named as the representatives generally of savage populations and desert wilds. The reference made in some of the passages to Kedar's multitudes of flocks, their pastoral habits and rocky haunts leave it beyond a doubt that their manners were of the true Ishmaelite type, and it is hence impossible to fix definitely their local boundaries, for these would naturally vary from time to time. Some later writers speak of them as being not far from Babylon, but such was certainly not their original territory, and could only have become theirs after the province of Babylon had sunk into a state of comparative neglect and desolation.

KEDEMOTH (ked-e'moth), a city in the territory of Reuben, Josh. xiii. 18, assigned to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 37; 1 Chr. vi. 79. It gave name to the neighboring wilderness, Deut. ii. 26.

KEDESH (ke'desh). 1. A Canaanitish city, whose king Joshua smote, Josh. xii. 22. It was assigned to the tribe of Naphtali, hence was sometimes called Kedesh-naphtali, and was subsequently given to the Levites and made a city of refuge, Josh. xix. 37; 1 Chr. vi. 76. Barak was a native of Kedesh, Jud. iv. 6-11, and thither he summoned the northern tribes. In later times it was seized with the neighboring district by Tiglath-pileser, 2 Ki. xv. 29. The modern village Kudes is four miles from the Lake Merom, and stands upon a hill where are many ruins, fragments of pillars, sarcophagi and huge doorposts. Also in the mountain-cliffs to the southwest are many rock-tombs. 2. A place in the extreme South of Judah, Josh. xv. 23. See KADESH. 3. A Levitical city in Issachar, 1 Chr. vi. 72. See KISHION.

KEDRON (ke'dron). See KIDRON.

KEEP is the name by which the strongest part of the old castles in the Saxon and Norman periods was called. Usually a wall enclosed a yard or space of ground sufficient for holding cattle, and even a garden. Then the castle was built of various forms and strength, according to the means and dignity of the possessor, and a part of the structure was made of unusual strength, and having all known devices for defence. It was called "the keep," and into it defenders retired when other parts were captured. The keep was provided with a well for the use of the defenders, a dungeon for the prisoners, and such appliances as the forms of war required before the invention of firearms. The engravings will give a correct idea of the character of such strongholds. In the South of Scotland, along the border, were small chieftains and men only above the rank of farmers, who dwelt in houses known as "peel" houses, which had a tower or keep attached to them as a place for safety, in view of the turbulent and reckless condition of society in which they lived.

KEHELATHAH (keh-e-la'thah), one of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness, Num. xxxiii. 22, 23.

KEIL (kile), KARL AUGUST GOTTLIEB, a distinguished German theologian, was born at Grossenhain, April 23, 1754, and died at Leipzig, where he was professor of theology, April 22, 1818. His writings are chiefly hermeneutical. In 1811 he published "Manual of Hermeneutics." After his death his occasional writings were collected and published. Besides treatises on topics of hermeneutical interest, this collection contains several exegetical essays, and an elaborate dissertation "On the Philosophy of Plato." Keil is a perspicuous writer, and his works, though cold and formal, are full of good sense and solid learning.

KEILAH (ke-i'lah), a city in the plain country of Judah near the Philistine border, Josh. xv. 44. The inhabitants are disgracefully distinguished for endeavoring to betray David to Saul just after he had protected him from a Philistine invasion, Sam. xxiii. 1-13. The rulers of Keilah took part in repairing the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 17, 18. It is said to have been about eight miles east of Eleutheropolis, toward Hebron. The name also occurs among the genealogies of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 19, where it is not clear whether a place or person is meant.

KEIR (keer), JOHN, D.D., who became eminent in Nova Scotia as a missionary, a pastor and a professor of theology, was born in Stirlingshire, Scotland, in February, 1770. After a university course at Glasgow, he passed through the usual theological training of the associate synod; and being licensed to preach, he was commissioned as a missionary to Nova Scotia in 1818. He labored assiduously in Prince Edward's Island and at Halifax, and at length, in 1843, he undertook the duties of professor of theology in the body in which he had labored so long and so faithfully. He was powerful as a preacher, clear and forcible as a teacher, and an excellent man. He died in 1858.

KEITH (keeth), GEORGE, a noted Quaker of the seventeenth century, was a native of Aberdeen, where he was a fellow-student with Bishop Burnet, and took his degree of master of arts, after which he turned Quaker, and went to Pennsylvania; but becoming dissatisfied with the sect, he formed a new one of his own. At length he entered into the Church of England, took orders and obtained some preferment. He died about 1715. He wrote several books for the Quakers, and some against Penn, with reasons for renouncing that sect.

KEITH, REUEL, D.D., was an eminent minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. He was born in 1792, at Pittsford, in Vermont, and educated at Middlebury. After serving for a short time as assistant in St. John's Church, Georgetown, District of Columbia, he was elected professor of humanity and history in the college of Williamsburg, Virginia, in 1820. Thereafter he was removed to the chair of pastoral theology and pulpit eloquence in Alexandria, and in 1827 Middlebury College conferred the degree of doctor of divinity on him. After a diligent discharge of his duties in that chair, his health failed him, and he became afflicted on the subject of his salvation, but the great Head of the Church mercifully delivered him by death on September 1, 1842.

KEITH (keeth), ROBERT, a prelate of the Scotch Episcopal Church, and a learned antiquarian, was born in 1661. He was made bishop of Caithness and Orkney in 1727, whence in 1733 he was transferred to Fife. He was the author of a "History of the Affairs of Church and State in Scotland." He died in 1757.

KELATAH (ke-la'yah), or KELITA (ke-la'ta), a Levite who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 23.

KELLER (kel'ler), BENJAMIN, who became an earnest, efficient minister of the Lutheran Church, was born at Lancaster, in 1794. After a classical and theological training, he was commissioned by the synod of Pennsylvania to preach in 1814, and in Germantown, Philadelphia, and Gettysburg he labored faithfully in pastoral charges. He succeeded in procuring funds for the endowment of a German professorship in the Gettysburg institution. He also labored with great zeal in the cause of the Publication Society of the Lutheran Church, and after a long life of earnest, faithful labor, he died in the year 1864.

KELLER, EZRA, D.D., who was born in 1812 in Indiana and educated at Pennsylvania College, became a Lutheran minister after a course of theology at Gettysburg. He labored with great zeal for a time in the Western States, and afterward settled in Maryland, first at Taneytown and subsequently at Hagerstown. Thence he removed to the presidency of Wittenberg College, at Springfield, Ohio, and here he devoted his great energies to the building up of this seminary, that it might become a school of the prophets. In 1845 he received an honorary degree in divinity from Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, and in the full vigor of his life, and while toiling with great zeal, he was removed by death in the year 1848.

KELLER, JACOB, a German theologian and controversialist, was born at Seckingen, in 1568. He became a Jesuit at the age of twenty, and was appointed to teach rhetoric, theology and philosophy. He was made successively rector of the colleges of Ratisbon and Munich. He died at Munich in 1631.

KELLOW (kel'lo), RICHARD, was one of the most eminent of the English bishops in the fourteenth century. He succeeded to the rich and important diocese of Durham in 1311, when society was in a condition that demanded the display of great wisdom and firmness among those in whose hands the administration of law had been reposed. The bishop of Durham was a prince palatine as well as an ecclesiastical ruler, and his purity of life and his sense of justice eminently fitted him for the arduous and complicated duties which his position involved. His piety was undoubted, and his humility was such that he sought the applause of no man. Accordingly, he was inflexible in the distribution of justice, and his meanest vassal shared his due protection. Wealth and rank were insufficient to shield the most exalted criminals, and the proudest barons were obliged to recognize law and submit to penances on occasion of their violent conduct or licentious behavior. Kellow adorned his princely station, and closed a long life deservedly regretted by all over whom he had ruled.

KELLS (kelz), SYNOD OF. In the year 1152 an important synod was held at the small town of Kells to debate on a matter which vitally affected the whole Church in Ireland. It is well known that the Irish Church had continued from the fifth until the ninth century in an isolated state, almost separated from Christendom and entirely independent of any other Church. As Usher has truthfully said, "All the affairs of the bishops and Church of Ireland were done at home. . . . The people and the king made their bishops." Thus the Irish Church continued from age to age to conduct her own services and carry out her own discipline, without sharing in the changes which were taking place in the nations of the Continent. The Danish invasion entirely changed the aspect of affairs. New colonists were settled in the island; and when they embraced Christianity, into subjection by the payment of Peter's pence and by other acknowledgments of fealty of obedience to Rome. The influence of the Dano-Irish Church was exerted in his favor, as the power of England was subsequently brought, in the reign of Henry II., under the auspices of another pope, to bring the people into submission to Rome. Thereafter the history of the Irish church was a long record of testimony bearing against innovation, and a reclamation against the tyranny of ecclesiastical power forced on the country by the iron hand of invaders. But eventually the Irish were obliged to learn that the work which was inaugurated at Kells went on and became gradually consolidated, just as the primitive clergy who, from the Irish monastery of Iona on the coast of Argyleshire, had Christianized the North of England in a former age, were taught at the famous synod at Whitby how, when the emissaries of the Church of Rome succeeded in securing the favor and aid of a monarch, they were able to accomplish their ambitious schemes.

KELLY (kel'le), JOHN, LL.D., a learned Eng-

they applied to the English for the ordination of their clergy. It is well known that Lanfranc, the Italian, who became archbishop of Canterbury in 1070, and who brought a strong Norman element into the English Church, ordained Donatus as bishop of Dublin. At his consecration he declared, "I, Donatus, bishop of the see of Dublin, in Ireland, do promise canonical obedience to you, O Lanfranc, archbishop of the holy church of Canterbury, and to your successors." This was done in A. D. 1085, and never before had such a declaration been made by a pastor of an Irish church. Thus, by means of a foreigner, consecrated by a foreigner to a place among colonists, was a system introduced which gave rise to two systems of church organization in Ireland, the native and the foreign. The synod of Kells was convened in 1152 under the auspices of Paparo, or Papyrio, a cardinal priest and a legate of Eugenius III., the object being to unite the two branches of the Church, or at least to consolidate the Romish cause in Ireland. Paparo endeavored to suppress the old Irish bishops, who were scattered in great numbers all over the country. He aimed at establishing four archiepiscopal sees, at Armagh, Dublin, Cashel and Tuam, and at reducing the people Irish clergyman, was a native of Douglas, in the Isle of Man, and born in 1750. He was employed by Bishop Hildesley in translating the Bible into the Manx language, and was ordained a minister of the Episcopal congregation of Ayr, in Scotland. He afterward obtained the rectory of Copford, in Essex; and having entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, he was there honored with the degree of LL.D. In 1803 he published "A Practical Grammar of the Ancient Gaelic, or Language of the Isle of Man," and in 1805 issued proposals for publishing "A Triglot Dictionary of the Celtic Tongue," which was nearly completed when the sheets were destroyed by a fire on the premises of the printer. Dr. Kelly died in 1809.

KELLY, THOMAS, who became one of the most celebrated preachers in the city of Dublin in modern times, was born in Queens County, Ireland, in 1769. His father was a judge, and he contemplated the profession of the law, and accordingly began his studies in Dublin University with that object in view, where he greatly distinguished himself, and in due course he entered the Temple in London. Becoming deeply exercised in religious subjects, he turned aside from his legal studies and prepared himself with great care for the Church. In 1793 he was ordained, and as soon as he began to preach he was followed by immense congregations. Ere long the higher authorities of the Church began to express dissatisfaction with his course, and he left the Established Church, but in his future ministry he still adhered to the doctrines of the Articles. He labored in Dublin for upward of sixty years with untiring zeal and great effect. He was endowed with considerable wealth, which he freely used in the erection of churches and other benevolent works. He had a fine poetical talent, and understood music very thoroughly, and accordingly the hymns which he composed are well known and greatly prized. His "Thoughts on Imputed Righteousness" and the little tract on the Romish controversy called "Andrew Dunn" are well known. He suffered from paralysis for some time before his death, and he departed this life on May 14, 1855, closing a laborious and most useful career.

KELPIES (kelp'eez). Among the mythological superstitions which prevailed in Scotland and in the North of Ireland, it was believed that a number of spirits frequented rivers and streams, especially in glens or retired places, and they were known by this name. The superstition was similar to that of the Nök of Norwegian mythology.

KEMP (kemp), one of the bishops of London, is celebrated for his connection with the famous St. Paul's Cross. Preaching crosses were generally quadrangular or hexagonal, open on one or more sides and elevated a few steps, so as to raise the speaker above his audience. St. Paul's Cross stood in the northern side of the cathedral close; it was hexagonal, covered with a roof, above which rose a cross. In this small structure, sermons were delivered by eminent preachers. It was the scene of some of Latimer's greatest achievements, when he denounced the errors and superstitions of the clergy. Citizens were accustomed to hold town-meetings at such crosses. The cross at St. Paul's Cathedral was the great meeting-place for all popular assemblies. Bishop Kemp rebuilt it in 1449, but it was destroyed by the order of Parliament for the demolition of all crosses in the year 1623.

KEMP (kemp), JAMES, D.D., was a native of Aberdeenshire, in Scotland, who became a bishop in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. He was born in 1764, and educated at the university of Aberdeen. He came to the colonies in 1787, prepared for the ministry, and was ordained in 1789 by Bishop White. He preached in Great Choptank parish, Maryland, for more than twenty years, and in 1804 he was elected suffragan bishop with Bishop Claggett of Maryland. His duties were mainly connected with the Eastern Shore parishes, but in 1816 he succeeded to the oversight of the whole diocese. He became provost of the university of Maryland in 1816, which office he held until his death, in 1827. Bishop Kemp was characterized by great prudence and moderation, and he was beloved by the laity as well as the clergy. In 1802 he received the degree of D.D. from Columbia College.

KEMP, JOHN THEODORE, VAN DER, was a native of Holland, and deserves notice in this work because of his missionary efforts in Southern Africa. He was born at Rotterdam, in 1748, and educated at Leyden. He joined the army, but after a short time he went to Edinburgh to study medicine, and after practicing at Dort for a brief season, he entered on the study of theology. His wife and daughter were drowned, and the providence so deeply affected him that he became entirely devoted to spiritual things. He wrote a work on the views of the apostle Paul respecting the relation of God to the universe, and eventually he sailed for the Cape of Good Hope. The Dutch governor did not favor his views; but when the English gained the colony, he was permitted to settle at Bethelsdorf. He published a narrative of his labors among the natives in 1809, and he died in 1811 at the Cape of Good Hope.

KEMPE, STEPHAN, was a distinguished reformer of the sixteenth century. He was born at Hamburg at the close of the preceding century, and after being educated at Rostock, he became a Franciscan monk. Having visited Hamburg on business, he became acquainted with Joachin Sluter, an eloquent preacher of the Reformed faith, and ere long he became a convert and an enthusiastic propagator of the gospel. He was the great leader of the Reformation in Hamburg, as Knox was in Edinburgh and Calvin was in Geneva. He was successfully aided by Ziegenhagen, and in 1528 they were able to control the city. His influence extended to Luneburg and the Hanse towns, and his zeal continued with unabated vigor, and his influence extended until his death at Hamburg, in 1540. He wrote a narrative of the Reformation in his native city, which was published in 1693.

KEMPER (kemp'er), JACKSON, D.D., LL.D., who was the first missionary bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, was born in 1789, in Dutchess county, New York, and educated at the Episcopal Academy in Cheshire, Connecticut. After a course under Dr. Barry, a celebrated teacher from the university of Dublin, he entered Columbia College, where he graduated in 1809. He studied theology under Bishop Moore, and was ordained by Bishop White, at Philadelphia, in 1811. Until 1831 he acted as assistant under Bishop White, when he became rector of St. Paul's Church, Connecticut, and in 1835 he was designated the first missionary bishop, his jurisdiction being the North-west. He resided at St. Louis for a time, but in 1844 he settled in Wisconsin. The diocese of Maryland was offered to him; and when Wisconsin was constituted a diocese, the position of diocesan was tendered to him, but he declined both these places. In 1854 the latter position was again offered, and he accepted it on the understanding that he should still be recognized as a missionary. In 1859 he signed the duties of a missionary at the General Convention, and from that time he continued his labor in the diocese of Wisconsin until his death, 1870. He was a man of great energy and indomitable perseverance. He rendered effective service in establishing the theological seminary at Nashville, in his diocese; and with a view to promote efficiency, he took up his residence in the immediate vicinity of the institution.

KEMPIS (kem'pis), THOMAS À, reputed author of the famous book on the "Imitation of Christ," was born at Kempen, in the diocese of Cologne, in 1380. He entered the monastery of Mount St. Agnes, and being a good copyist, was chiefly engaged in making copies of the Bible and religious treatises. He became sub-prior in 1421. In a collection of his beautiful manuscripts there is an "Imitation of Christ," which was afterward erroneously attributed to him as author. His few genuine writings are of little importance. He died in 1471. The "Imitation" is the most universal translated book in the world, next to the Bible. Various editions and translations amounted in 1870 to more than two thousand. Its singular charm and power are confessed by thoughtful men of all denominations, who hear in it, says a recent critic, "the voice of human nature struggling in its weakness, its disappointments and its consciousness of a capacity for a life that shall be a real life and not a fever, when the cage is broken and the veil is rent asunder." It is distinguished from too many religious books by its clearness, honest simplicity and freedom from exaggeration.

KEMUEL (ke-meu'el). 1. The third son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, Gen. xxii. 21. Nothing further is recorded of him than that he was the father of six sons, among whom and the last named is Bethuel, the father of Laban. Kemuel, therefore, was the nephew of Abraham, and the grandfather of Rebekah. 2. A prince of the tribe of Ephraim chosen to represent the tribe in respect to the division of the inheritance of Canaan, Num. xxxiv. 24. 3. A Levite in the time of David, 1 Chr. xxvii. 17.

KEN, THOMAS, D.D., who rose to be bishop of Bath and Wells, was born in 1637, at Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire. He received his early training at Winchester and Oxford. Having entered the Church, he was made a prebendary in Westminster in 1669 by Bishop Morley. He held an appointment for a time in the household of the princess of Orange, and in 1684 he was made chaplain to Charles II., on the recommendation of Lord Dartmouth, whom he had accompanied to Tangier, and in the same year he was made bishop of Bath and Wells. In the following reign the efforts to restore the papacy to place and power were vigorously carried on, but Ken resisted the movement with all the power he could command. He labored more as a preacher than as a writer. He protested against the edict of tolerance in 1688, showing that he understood the nature of the king's policy; and when the king commanded the declaration of indulgence to be read, he utterly refused. So also he was one of the seven bishops who presented their protests against the measure to the king, and for which course they were imprisoned. He is classed among the non-jurors because his view of religion bound him to the king reigning, and he refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, whereupon he was deprived of his shopic. Mary, however, granted him a pension, by which he lived at Longleate, in Wiltshire, until his death, in 1711. He was eminent for his great learning and decided piety. He published an "Exposition of the Church Catechism," an "Exposition of the Creed," and volumes of "Prayers," besides religious poetry which is still sought after by the members of evangelical Churches. Several of his hymns are exceedingly precious, and they are used by multitudes who have never heard of their author.

KENATH (ke'nath), a town and district of Bashan which Nobah took and called by his own name, Num. xxxii. 42, though this new appellation does not seem to have lasted. He possibly acted in conjunction with Jair. But the passage in 1 Chr. ii. 22, 23, may be more accurately translated, "Geshur and Aram took the towns of Jair with Kenath," and the notice refers to a later period. Kenath has been identified with Kunawdt, where splendid ruins adorn the slopes of the Jebel Hauran.

KENAZ (ke'naz). 1. A son of Eliphaz and descendant of Esau who became the head of a distinct Edomite family, and himself bore the title of duke, Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, 42. 2. A younger brother of Caleb, and father of the Othniel who married Caleb's daughter, Josh. xv. 17; Jud. i. 13. 3. A grandson of Caleb, 1 Chr. iv. 15.

KENDAL (ken'dal), GEORGE, a Calvinistic divine, was born at Dawlish, in Devonshire, and educated at Exeter College, Oxford. On entering into orders he obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Exeter, and the rectory of Blissland, in Cornwall, but was rejected at the Restoration for non-conformity. He wrote "A Vindication of the Doctrine of Absolute Predestination." He died in 1663.

KENDRICK (ken'drik), CLARK, was a native of New Hampshire, born at Hanover, in October, 1775. He was ordained as pastor of the Baptist church of Poultney, in Vermont, in 1802, where he labored with great faithfulness. He took a deep interest in foreign missions, and he was active in forming an auxiliary in his own State, of which he was vice-president, and for which he acted as secretary until his death. His great work, however, was the formation of the Baptist Education Society of the State of Vermont, at the same time rendering valuable aid to the Madison University, at Hamilton, for the Baptists of Central and Western New York. He published several pamphlets on baptism and sermons. He died in 1824.

KENDRICK, NATHANIEL, D.D., who rose to great eminence as a Baptist minister, was born at Hanover, in New Hampshire, in 1777. He received little education in early life, but after he had joined the communion of the Baptists, he felt a desire to enter the ministry, and after a course of reading and study, he was admitted. His first charge was the pastorate of the church at Lansingburg, New York, from which he removed to Middlebury, in Vermont, in 1810. Thence he went to Easton, New York, and in 1822 he was made professor of theology and moral philosophy in Madison University, New York, where he remained until his death. Brown University conferred the degree of doctor of divinity on him, and he was made one of the overseers of Hamilton College. Though mainly a man of action, he published a few sermons. He died in 1848.

KENEZITE (ken'e-zite), a designation given to Jephunneh, the father of Caleb, Num. xxxii. 12. Some have imagined this to be derived from an Edomitish ancestor, probably Kenaz, 1.

KENITE, KENITES (ke'nites), a nomadic tribe, first mentioned with those whose territories were promised to the seed of Abraham, Gen. xv. 19. Their principal seat seems to have been the rocky tracts on the south and south-west of Palestine, near the Amalekites, Num. xxiv. 21, 22. Kalisch supposes that "they may have spread in

xv. 6. David maintained the same friendly relation with the Kenites, 1 Sam. xxx. 29. Possibly they had embraced the Israelitish religion, or at least were not idolaters. The house of the Rechabites were of this tribe, 1 Chr. ii. 55, traced to an original ancestor, Hemath.

KENIZZITES (ken'iz-zites), a Canaanitish tribe of which nothing is known beyond what is stated in Gen. xv. 19. The tribe cannot be supposed to have any connection with the Edomitish chief Kenaz.

a western direction to the land of Egypt, so that by their expulsion the frontiers of the promised land would have nearly touched the valley of the Nile." Probably those who lived near the Amalekites shared their sentiments of hostility to Israel; but it is clear that many of the tribe were accounted friendly, and were treated with marked favor by the Hebrews. Jethro was a Kenite, which indicates some connection between them and Midian, and his descendants were afterward to be found in the North of Palestine, Jud. i. 16; iv. 11, 17; v. 24. And even those that were dwelling in the south were carefully separated by Saul when he marched against the Amalekites, 1 Sam.

KENNADAY (ken'na-day), JOHN, D.D., who rose to eminence as a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in New York, in 1800. He was largely self-educated. He commenced his ministry in the New York conference in 1823, and thereafter his services were much sought after in the churches and conferences in Connecticut, East New York, New Jersey, Philadelphia and Wilmington. Those churches which had enjoyed his services were always anxious to secure his return. He was an exceedingly clear and felicitous preacher, displaying considerable powers of oratory; and among the sick and in general society there was a tenderness in his manner which endeared him to all who knew him. He died in 1863.

KENNEDY (ken'ne-de), JAMES, bishop of Saint Andrew's, Scotland, and founder of the college of San Salvador, was born in 1405. Entering into holy orders, he was appointed to the bishopric of Dunkeld, and in 1440 advanced to that of Saint Andrew's. During the minority of James III. he was appointed one of the lords of the regency, but in fact enjoyed the whole power, and conducted himself with great prudence. He died in 1446. He is said to have written a work entitled "Monita Politica" or "Political Advices;" also a history of his own times.

KENNEDY, SAMUEL, M.D., was a native of Scotland, born in 1720, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. He emigrated to the colonies, and the presbytery of New Brunswick, in New Jersey, licensed him to preach in the year 1750, and in the year following he was settled over the congregation of Baskinridge, New Jersey. Here he superintended a classical academy; and having taken the part of an Episcopal minister in 1760, he made himself somewhat famous because of his connection with a celebrated paper headed "Eighteen Presbyterian Ministers for a Groat." Having studied medicine, he was enabled to act as a physician with great success, and he discharged the duties of the pastorate and of the teacher with great efficiency. He died in 1787.

KENNEDY, WILLIAM MEGEE, a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1783, in what is now the eastern portion of Tennessee. In 1805 he entered the South Carolina conference, and during upward of thirty years labored with zeal and fidelity in the cause of the gospel. He died in 1840.

KENNET (ken'net), BASIL, a distinguished English divine, and brother of Bishop Kennet, was born in 1674. He was educated at Corpus Christi College, and through the interest of his brother was made chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn—a situation which exposed him to some danger from the power of the Inquisition. Orders were issued for his imprisonment, but he at length secured his freedom, and he retained his post till ill health obliged him to return home. He died in 1714. Among his publications, which relate chiefly to theology and classical literature, is a treatise on Roman antiquities, which was long reckoned the best work on the subject.

KENNET, WHITE, a learned English prelate, was born at Dover, in 1660. He was educated at Westminster and St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, of which latter he became vice-principal and tutor, after having held for some time the vicarage of Ambrosden, in Oxfordshire. He was afterward made successively archdeacon of Huntingdon, dean of Peterborough, and in 1718 bishop of Peterborough. His works and collections are exceedingly numerous, including antiquarian, historical and controversial subjects. He died in 1728.

KENNICOTT (ken'ne-cot), BENJAMIN, D.D., one of the most eminent Biblical scholars, was born at Totness, in Devonshire, England, April 4, 1718. At an early period he was master of a charity school, and subsequently entered Wadham College, where he applied himself to the study of divinity and Hebrew with diligence and success. While an undergraduate he published dissertations "On the Tree of Life in Paradise" and "On the Oblations of Cain and Abel," which procured him the distinguished honor of a bachelor's degree before the statutable time, and without the usual fees. Shortly afterward he was elected Fellow of Exeter College, and in 1750 took his degree of master of arts. He was appointed librarian of Radcliffe Library, and made doctor of divinity in 1767. He was also canon of Christ Church and rector of Culham, in Oxfordshire. He continued to reside at Oxford till the last, and died of a lingering illness, September 18, 1783.

No man has done more than Kennicott to advance the cause of Biblical science in the department of the Old Testament, upon which all his labors were concentrated. His great work, to be immediately named, was preceded, and its way prepared, by his dissertations, entitled "The State of the Printed Hebrew Text of the Old Testament Considered." In these dissertations he evinces the necessity of the work upon which he had set his heart by refuting the popular notion of the "absolute integrity" of the Hebrew text. In 1760 Dr. Kennicott issued his proposals for collating all the Hebrew manuscripts made before the invention of printing which could be discovered in the British Isles or in foreign countries. Liberal subscriptions were raised for defraying the expenses which such a work necessarily involved. The name of King George III. headed the list. Dr. Secker, bishop of Oxford, afterward archbishop of Canterbury, was among his first subscribers. Dr. Kennicott was assisted in his work by many learned men, and more than six hundred Hebrew manuscripts and sixteen manuscripts of the Samaritan Pentateuch were either wholly or partially collated. To the collation of manuscripts was also added a collation of the most distinguished printed editions of the Hebrew Bible. Dr. Kennicott also availed himself of quotations from the Hebrew Bible in the works of rabbinical writers, especially the Talmud. At length, sixteen years after the publication of his proposals, appeared the first, and four years subsequently the second, volume of his magnificent edition of the Hebrew Bible, "The Old Testament, with Various Readings." The text is that of Van der Hooght; "but as variations in the points were disregarded in the collation, the points were not added to the text." The various readings are printed at the foot of the page. In the Pentateuch the deviations of the Samaritan text were printed in a column parallel to the Hebrew. To the second volume Dr. Kennicott annexed an account of the manuscripts and other authorities collated for this edition, and also a review of the Hebrew text, divided into periods, and beginning with the formation of the Hebrew canon after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity.

Though this great work has numerous faults yet there can be no doubt that Kennicott was most laborious editor. To him belongs the merit of bringing together a large mass of critical materials. . . . The task of furnishing such an apparatus, drawn from so many sources, scattered through the libraries of many lands, was almost herculean, and the learned author is entitled all the praise for its accomplishment.

KENOSIS (ke-no'sis) is a theological term derived from the Greek which has come into use among modern theologians to signify the abasement or voluntary humiliation of Christ. In Phil. ii. 7, Christ is said to have "made himself of no reputation," rather "emptied himself." So also in John xvii. 5; 2 Cor. viii. 9, Christ is exhibited as having veiled the glory which he had with the Father when he became incarnate. The discussion of this subject brings forward the difficult points connected with the incarnation. In the seventeenth century the subject was discussed with great keenness between the theologians of Giessen and Tübingen. Menzer and Feuerborn, on behalf of Giessen, held that Christ, in his earthly humiliation, did really divest himself of omniscience, omniscience and other divine attributes, while Osiander, Melchior, Nicolai and Thummius contended, on behalf of Tübingen, that he still possessed, but merely concealed them while he sojourned among men.

KENRICK (ken'rik), FRANCIS PATRICK, D.D., a distinguished prelate of the Roman Catholic Church in America, was a native of Dublin, Ireland, where he was born December 3, 1797, and received his early education. In 1815 he began his theological preparation in Rome, where he remained six years, and was ordained in 1821, after which he took charge of an ecclesiastical seminary in Bardstown, Kentucky. In 1832 he became coadjutor to Bishop Connell of Philadelphia, and succeeded to the episcopate in 1842. It was during his administration that the anti-Catholic riots took place. In 1851 he was made archbishop of Baltimore, and in 1859 he received from the pope the "primacy of honor," which entitled him and his successors to precedence over all other Roman Catholic prelates in the United States. He died July 8, 1863. Archbishop Kenrick held a high rank in his own Church as a Biblical scholar and theologian. He was a voluminous writer and skillful controversialist, and many of his works attracted wide attention. The last work of his life was a revision of the English version of the Bible, which was nearly completed, and is very likely to supersede the Douay version. Among his other published works are—"The Primacy of the Apostolic See Vindicated," "Vindication of the Catholic Church," "Catholic Doctrine on Justification Explained and Vindicated," and two treatises on "Dogmatic Theology" and "Moral Theology," which are used as text-books in most of the Roman Catholic seminaries in this country.

KENT, JAMES, an English musician favorably known for the simplicity and harmony of his sacred compositions. He was born in 1700 at Winchester, and educated in the choir of that cathedral, till his talent procured his removal to the chapel royal, where he laid the foundation of his future excellence. He became subsequently organist, first to the chapel of Trinity College, Cambridge, and eventually succeeded to a similar situation in his native city, where he remained till his death, in 1776. Few pieces of cathedral music are more generally popular than his anthems "Hear my Prayer" and "My Song shall be of Mercy."

KENTIGERN (ken'te-ger-n), who flourished in the close of the sixth century, is equally celebrated in Scotland and in Wales. He was bishop of Glasgow; but owing to dissensions, he was obliged to leave Scotland and take up his abode in Wales. Here his labors led to the formation of the see of St. Asaph, so called from Asaph, the immediate successor of Kentigern in the diocese. Having established the cause of Christianity in Wales, and peace being again restored in his former charge, he returned to Scotland. When the see of St. Asaph was founded, the first church was of wood. It was burned, and a structure of stone erected. The present cathedral dates from the thirteenth century, when Anian II. began its construction. The walls have stood since 1284, but the roof was destroyed in 1404, and it was altered in subsequent centuries in different parts. In the great rebellion horses and oxen were kept in it, and calves were kept in the bishop's throne and in the choir. But in 1660 it was restored by Dr. Griffith. The situation of the cathedral is exceedingly beautiful. It stands on a rising ground in a large churchyard at the lower end of the vale of Clwyd, between two streams, not far from the sea-coast, in Flintshire. The edifice is plain, and it is small, but comparatively uniform in style. There is no crypt, no cloister, no chapter-house, nor any monuments which deserve notice. It is only 179 feet long, and the transept extends 108 feet.

Small as the cathedral is, it has been enriched by the presence of several of the greatest men that the English Church has produced, among whom may be mentioned Anian II. and Redman, who rebuilt it, Reginald Peacock of Oriel, in Oxford, John Owen, the great preacher in the Welsh tongue, Isaac Barrow, D.D., William Beveridge, D.D., Thomas Janner, D.D., Samuel Horsley, LL.D., and William Cleaver, D.D.

KEPLER (kep-ler), JOHANN, who became celebrated for his great services to the science of astronomy, was born in Wurtemberg, in the year 1571. As a discoverer he takes rank with Tycho Brahe, Galileo, Copernicus and Newton. He encountered almost insurmountable obstacles in his early years, but he succeeded in obtaining a degree, with great honor, at Tubingen, in the year 1591. He entered on theology, from which he turned aside to mathematics because of a lectureship offered to him at Gratz. The Copernican system was equally discredited in the time of Kepler by Romanists and Protestants. When Kepler submitted his views to the faculty at Tubingen, his conclusions were declared to be heretical. He resided for a time at Prague, whence he removed to Vienna. He died in 1630, having fully established the three great laws which are known by his name: 1. That the planets describe ellipses each of which has one of its foci in the same point—namely, the centre of the sun. 2. That every planet moves so that the line drawn from it to the sun describes about the sun areas proportional to the times. 3. That the squares of the times of the revolution of the planets are as the cubes of the mean distances from the sun.

KERCHIEFS (ker'chefs) occurs twice in the English Bible, but in one passage, Ezek. xiii. 18, of Dort may be judged of from the fact that he was one of the theologians appointed to draw up the canons of that synod. He was also appointed on the committee to revise an edition of the Scriptures. He was a voluminous writer. Among the most important of his works are—"The Agreement of Passages in Scripture which Appear to be Contradictory," "Theses in Logic and Ethics," "Reply to Cochletius of the Sorbonne touching his Interpolations," "Miscellaneous Tracts on Predestination and the Lord's Supper," "Arguments against Socinianism," a small work against Cellius on the "Essential Existence of Christ," besides translations from the Commentaries of Cartwright on the Proverbs of Solomon. He died in 1646.

KEREN-HAPPUCH (ke'ren-hap'pook), Job's third daughter, born after his restoration to prosperity, Job xlii. 14.

21, as the rendering of a word which is derived from a root signifying to cover; and the more exact rendering would be "coverings" or "mantles," such as are still commonly used by females in the East as an envelope for their heads. The prophet apparently reproves the women of artful and seductive habits for the ornamental articles of this description they used for the purpose of decoying weak souls.

KERCKHOVE (kerk-ho'veh), JAN POLYANDER VAN DEN, has been celebrated as a member of the synod of Dort and a professor of theology at Leyden. He was born in 1568 at Metz, and educated at Embden, at which place his father was minister of the French church. He studied at Bremen, Heidelberg and Geneva, in the last city under Beza. He became pastor of the French church at Leyden in 1591, from which place he removed to Dort, and his next position was that of successor to Arminius in the chair of theology at Leyden. His importance in the Synod

KERIOOTH (ke-ri'oth). 1. A city in the extreme South of Judah, Josh. xv. 25. Some have supposed this the birthplace of Judas Iscariot. It is probably the modern et-Kuryetein, to the south of Hebron. Most likely Keriouth-bezron is one name. See HEZRON. 2. A city of Moab, Jer. xlviii. 24, 41, called also Kiriath, Amos ii. 2. Perhaps the word is not a proper name, and should be translated "the cities."

KERO (ke'ro) was one of the monks of St. Gall in the eighth century. He is known by his commentary on the rules of the Benedictine order, of which several editions have been published. The version of the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer in old High German, and a number of hymns, are attributed to him. The dates of his birth and death are not accurately known.

KEROS (ke'ros), one whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubabel, Ezra ii. 44.

KERR (ker), GEORGE, D.D., LL.D., was a native of the county of Antrim, Ireland, where he was born in the year 1814. His family emigrated to the United States; and the young man becoming deeply impressed with religious convictions, he studied at Williams College, Massachusetts, and subsequently at Union Theological Seminary, in the city of New York, so as to prepare himself for the ministry. He settled at Conesville, in Schoharie county, New York, as pastor of the Reformed church, and in 1846 he became principal of the Franklin Academy, which under his influence and fine scholarship became one of the most important institutions of the State. The New York Agricultural College, the Watertown Academy and the institution at Coopersville all enjoyed his services, but the Franklin Academy, knowing his great value, prevailed on him to return, but in the act of removal he died, in 1867.

self in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, was born in 1782, in York District, South Carolina. After such an education as he could enjoy in his native place and at Roman Academy, North Carolina, he studied theology, and in 1816 he was ordained. He labored in North Carolina for some time, and afterward in Tennessee, where he became remarkably famous for his success in the formation of new churches. He closed a faithful and successful life near Watervalley, in 1865.

KERR, JOSEPH, D.D., who was an eminent minister in the Associate Reformed Church, was a native of the county of Antrim, in the North of Ireland. He was born in 1778, and educated in the university of Glasgow. He removed to this country in 1801, and settled in Western Pennsylvania, where in the pulpit and as a professor of theology he became greatly distinguished. He closed a useful life in the year 1829, leaving behind him two sons, Joseph R. and Moses Kerr, both of whom entered the ministry and gave promise of great usefulness, but delicacy of constitution prevented them from effecting such a great work as their earnest and cultured minds seemed qualified to achieve. Moses died in 1840, and Joseph R. followed him in 1843.

KESSLER (kes'ler), JOHANN JAKOB, who rose to be dean of St. Gall in 1573, was a native of that place, where he was born in 1502. He studied at Basle; and having set out on a journey to see Luther, he met him at Jena without knowing who the stranger was. He refused to enter the priesthood in consequence of having adopted the tenets of the Reformers, but he began to edify a number of hearers by opening up the Scriptures, and eventually his work so far increased that he was obliged to meet his audience in the church of St. Lawrence. He finally yielded to the solicitation of his friends, and became the pastor of this church, and dean of St. Gall in 1573. He wrote a work on the "Reformation at St. Gall." He died in 1574.

KETTENBACH (ket'ten-bakh), HEINRICH VON, a popular German preacher of the time of the Reformation, was originally a Franciscan, but became very active and zealous in the promotion of evangelical opinions, in consequence of which he was obliged by the Dominicans to leave Ulm, from which place he went to Wittenberg, where he publicly espoused the cause of the Reformation. His influence with his contemporaries was very great, and he made many converts. The date of his birth and of his death is unknown.

KETTLE (ket't'l), 1 Sam. ii. 14, a boiler. In 2 Chr. xxxv. 13 the same word is rendered "caldron;" in Job xli. 20; Ps. lxxxix. 6 a "pot;" and in 2 Ki. x. 7; Jer. xxiv. 2 a "basket."

KETTLEWELL (ket't'l-wel), JOHN, an English nonjuring divine, was born at North Allerton, in Yorkshire, March 10, 1653. He was educated at Edmundhall, Oxford, and entered early into orders. When very young, he wrote his celebrated book, entitled "Measures of Christian Obedience." In 1682 he was presented with the living of Coleshill, in Warwickshire; but refusing to take the oath to William and Mary at the revolution, he was deprived of it in 1690, and retired to London, where he continued to write and publish books. He died in 1695.

KETURAH (ke-too'rah), the person taken to wife by Abraham after the death of Sarah, and by whom he had six sons, Gen. xxv. 1, 2. She is called also his concubine, 1 Chr. i. 32, either because, as is not improbable, she had occupied an inferior position in the household previously, or because her sons were not to take rank with the son of Sarah, but to have only such a place as was usually assigned to the sons of concubines. Nothing is said of the race or family to which she herself belonged.

KEUCHENIUS (ku-ke'ne-us), PETRUS, learned Dutch theologian, was born at Bois-le-Duc, August 22, 1654, and studied at Leyden and Utrecht. He was successively minister at Alen Tiel and Arnheim, at which last place he died March 27, 1689. He wrote "Annotations on the New Testament." The author's aim in these annotations is to throw light on the New Testament by determining the sense in which words and phrases were used at the time it was written and among those with whom its writers were familiar. For this purpose he compares the language of the New Testament with that of the Septuagint, and calls in aid from the Chaldee and Syriac versions. His notes are characterized by sound learning and great good sense.

KEY, in its natural sense, as an instrument for turning the lock of a gate or door, has been treated of under GATE. Because of its power to open into or exclude from, all the treasures of a city or house, it is very often in Scripture used as the symbol of power and authority, whether in the Church or State. Thus, in regard to the management of the earthly kingdom of Judah, Isaiah speaks of the key of the house of David going to be laid on Eliakim, as the most influential adviser of the king, Isa. xxii. 22. With reference to the administration of that house in the higher sense, our Lord is represented as having the key of David, receiving and excluding whom he pleases as partakers of its glorious privileges and blessings, Rev. iii. 7. But having constituted the apostles his representative for the establishing and ordering of this spiritual house as an organized institution among men, he committed to them—to Peter first, as the most prominent member of the apostolic body, then to the apostolate collectively, Matt. xvi. 19; xviii. 18—the keys of the kingdom. Whence "the power of the keys" has been among theologians a common term for the authority to exercise discipline in the Church. In a still more extended sense our Lord uses the term "key" in respect to command over spiritual things generally; the scribes, he said, had taken away the key of knowledge, Luke xi. 52, meaning that by their manifold traditions and false interpretations they had deprived people of the means of coming to the right understanding of divine things.

KEYS, POWER OF THE, in Roman Catholic theology, properly signifies the supreme authority in the Church, which Romanists believe to be vested in the pope, as successor of Saint Peter. The phrase is derived from the metaphor addressed by our Lord to Peter in Matt. xvi. 19, and which

Roman Catholic interpreters, relying on the analogous use of the phrase in Isa. xxii. 22; Rev. iii. 7, and again in Rev. i. 18, and also in classical writers, understand as implying the supreme power in the Church. The power of the keys is divided into two branches—that of order, which, though possessed by all bishops and priests, is believed to belong specially and primarily to the pope; and of jurisdiction, which chiefly regards the supreme government of the Church, and embraces the power of enacting laws and dispensing in them, and of directing and governing not only the Christian flock, but also its pastors in their several spheres. The jurisdiction of the keys is exercised in a more limited field and in a subordinate way by patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops and other dignitaries, but that, according to the Roman theory, it has its source, as well as its chief seat, in the pope, is implied in the distinctive use of the emblem of the keys as a symbol of papal jurisdiction. The technical phrase, "power of the keys," is also used in a more restricted sense by Roman Catholic theologians as applied to the sacrament of penance, in which use it designates the power of remitting or retaining sin. To this more limited sense of the word is also applicable the same distinction of order and jurisdiction, of which the former is imparted to every priest by his ordination, while the latter is only communicated by an express act of the bishop or other superior.

Protestants in general regard the power of the keys as equally entrusted to the whole ministry of the Church of Christ, and as including doctrine and discipline. They admit the argument from the use of the key in Scripture as a symbol of authority, but refuse to acknowledge any limitation of that authority inconsistent with their views of Christian doctrine and of the relation of the ministry to the whole Church of Christ, and of Peter to the rest of the apostles.

KHAZARS (kha'zarz), or KHOZARS (kho'zarz), a semi-barbarous people who formerly inhabited the southern part of Russia, along the shores of the Caspian Sea. They were warlike, and gave serious annoyance to surrounding nations by their frequent incursions. In the eighth century the king and the entire body of nobles embraced the Jewish religion, which was soon extended among the whole people. The Khazars ceased to exist as an independent people in 945.

KHEDR (khe'd'r), AL. See KORAN.

KHLESL (kle's'l), MELCHIOR, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in 1553, at Vienna. Though his parents were Protestants, he entered the order of Jesuits and held several high ecclesiastical offices. He was an earnest advocate of reform among the Romish clergy, but took a livelier interest in political affairs than in those of the Church. He died in 1630.

KIDDER (kid'der), RICHARD, D.D., successively prebend of Norwich, dean of Peterborough and bishop of Bath and Wells. He was born about the year 1635, at Brighton. He was admitted sizar of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in June, 1649, took the degree of B.A. in 1652, and was elected Fellow of his college in 1655. In 1662 he was ejected for nonconformity from the vicarage of Stanground, in Huntingdonshire; but conforming soon after, he was presented in 1664 to the rectory of Raine, in Essex. In 1674 the Merchant Taylors' Company gave him the rectory of St. Martin's, Outwich. In 1681 he was made prebend of Norwich, and in 1689 dean of Peterborough; two years afterward, on the deprivation of Ken, he was raised to the see of Bath and Wells. He died November 26, 1703, at Wells, being killed in bed by the fall of a stack of chimneys occasioned by the great storm. His Biblical writings are—"A Commentary on the Five Books of Moses" and "A Demonstration of the Messiah."

KIDRON (ke'dron). The Kidron is a mountain ravine, in most places narrow, with precipitous banks of naked limestone; but here and there its banks have an easy slope, and along its bottom are strips of land capable of cultivation. It contains the bed of a streamlet, but during the whole summer, and most of the winter, it is perfectly dry; in fact, no water runs in it except when heavy rains are falling in the mountains round Jerusalem.

On the broad summit of the mountain ridge of Judæa, a mile and a quarter north-west of Jerusalem, is a slight depression; this is the head of the Kidron. The sides of the depression and the elevated ground around it are whitened by the broad jagged tops of limestone rocks. The valley or depression runs for about half a mile toward the city; it is shallow and broad, dotted with corn-fields and sprinkled with a few old olives. It then bends eastward, and in another half mile is crossed by the great northern road coming down from the hill

Scopus. On the east side of the road, and south bank of the Kidron, are the celebrated "Tombs of the Kings." The bed of the valley is here about half a mile due north of the city gate. It continues in the same course about a quarter of a mile farther, and then, turning south, opens into a wide basin containing cultivated fields and olives. Here it is crossed diagonally by the road from Jerusalem to Anathoth. As it advances southward the right bank, forming the side of the hill Bezetha, becomes higher and steeper, with occasional precipices of rock, on which may be seen a few fragments of the ancient city wall, while on the left the base of Olivet projects, greatly narrowing the valley. Opposite St. Stephen's gate the depth is fully one hundred feet, and the breadth not more than four hundred feet. The olive trees in the bottom are so thickly clustered as to form a shady grove, and their massive trunks and gnarled boughs give evidence of great age. This spot is shut out from the city, from the view of public roads and from the notice and interruptions of wayfarers. May not this be the site of Gethsemane rather than the more public traditional site some distance farther down? A zigzag path descends the steep bank from St. Stephen's gate, crosses the bed of the valley by an old bridge, and then branches. One branch leads direct over the top of Olivet. This path has a deep historical interest; it was by it that David went when he fled from Absalom, 2 Sam. xv. 23. Another branch runs round the southern shoulder of the hill to Bethany, and it has a deep, sacred interest, for it is the road of Christ's triumphal entry, Matt. xxi. 1; Luke xix. 37. Below the bridge the Kidron becomes still narrower, and here traces of a torrent bed first begin to appear. Three hundred yards farther down, the hills on each side—Moriah on the right and Olivet on the left—rise precipitously from the torrent bed, which is spanned by a single arch. On the left bank is a singular group of tombs, comprising those of Absalom, Jehoshaphat and St. James (now so called), while on the right, one hundred and fifty feet overhead, towers the south-eastern angle of the temple wall, most probably the "pinnacle" on which our Lord was placed, Matt. iv. 5. The ravine runs on, narrow and rocky, for five hundred yards more; there, on its right bank, in a cave, is the fountain of the Virgin; and higher up, on the left, perched on the side of naked cliffs, the ancient village of Siloam. A short distance farther down the valley of the Tyropæon falls in from the right, descending in terraced slopes, fresh and green, from the waters of the Pool of Siloam. The Kidron here expands, affording a level tract for cultivation, and now covered with beds of cucumbers, melons and other vegetables. Here of old was the "king's garden," Neh. iii. 15. The level tract extends down to the mouth of Hinnom, and is about two hundred yards wide. A short distance below the junction of Hinnom and the Kidron is the fountain of En-Rogel, now called Bir Ayûb, "the well of Job." The length of the valley from its head to En-Rogel is two and three-quarter miles, and here the historic Kidron may be said to terminate. Every reference to the Kidron in the Bible is made to this section. David crossed it at a point opposite the city, 1 Sam.

EGYPTIAN REPRESENTATION OF A KING ON HIS THRONE.—See KING.

xv. 23; it was the boundary beyond which Solomon forbade Shimei to go on pain of death, 1 Ki. ii. 37; it was here, probably, near the mouth of Hinnom, that Asa destroyed the idol which Maachah, his mother, set up, xv. 13; and it seems to have been at the same spot, "in the fields of Kidron," that King Josiah ordered the vessels of Baal to be burned, 2 Ki. xxiii. 4. It would seem, from 2 Ki. xxiii. 6, that a portion of the Kidron, apparently near the mouth of Hinnom, was used as a burying-ground. The sides of the surrounding cliffs are filled with ancient rock tombs, and the greatest boon the dying Jew now asks is that his bones be laid in the valley of Jehoshaphat. The whole of the left bank of the Kidron opposite the temple area, far up the side of Olivet, is paved with the white tombstones of Jews. This singular longing is doubtless to be ascribed to the opinion which the Jews entertain, that the Kidron is the "valley of Jehoshaphat" mentioned in Joel iii. 2.

Below En-Rogel the Kidron has little of historical or sacred interest. It runs in a winding course east by south through the wilderness of Judæa to the Dead Sea. For about a mile below En-Rogel the bottom of the valley is cultivated and thickly covered with olive trees. Farther down a few fields of corn are met with at intervals, but these soon disappear, and the ravine assumes the bleak and desolate aspect of the surrounding hills.

About seven miles from Jerusalem the features of the valley assume a much wilder and grander form. Hitherto the banks have been steep, with here and there a high precipice and a jutting cliff giving variety to the scene. Now they suddenly contract to precipices of naked rock nearly three hundred feet in height, which look as if the mountain had been torn asunder by an earthquake. About a mile farther, on the side of this frightful chasm, stands the convent of St. Saba, one of the most remarkable buildings in Palestine, founded by the saint whose name it bears, A. D. 439. The sides of the chasm both above and below the convent are filled with caves and grottoes, once the abode of monks and hermits; and from these doubtless this section of the valley has got its modern name Wady er-Raheb, "Monk's Valley." Below Mar Saba the valley is called Wady en-Nar, "Valley of Fire," a name descriptive of its aspect, for so bare and scorched is it that it seems as if it had participated in the doom of Sodom. It runs on, a deep, narrow, wild chasm, until it breaks through the lofty line of cliffs at Ras el-Feshkha, on the shore of the Dead Sea.

It will thus be seen that the head of the Kidron is just on the verge of the watershed of the mountain chain of Judah, about two thousand six hundred feet above the sea. Its length, as the crow flies, is only twenty miles, and yet in this short space it has a descent of no less than three thousand nine hundred and twelve feet, the Dead Sea having a depression of one thousand three hundred and twelve feet.

Various opinions have been formed regarding the origin of the name "Kidron." Some derive it from a root signifying "to be black," but they are not agreed as to cause of this name. It may arise from the gloominess of the glen, or from the "turbid" stream, or from the blood and refuse of the temple sacrifices running into it. Others think that it was so called from cedar trees which grew in it. It was doubtless the Kidron valley which was in the mind of the prophet Ezekiel when he described the vision of the holy and healing waters flowing from the temple through the desert into the sea.

KIEF (ke-ef'), or KIEV (ke-ev'), COUNCILS OF. At the first of these, held in 1147, the bishops elected Clement as metropolitan to succeed Michael II., and refused to the patriarch of Constantinople the right either of nominating or consecrating. The latter, however, reversed the action of the council, and consecrated Constantine. At the second council, held in 1622, Meletius, archbishop of Polotsk, was censured for having written a book against the orthodox Church, and obliged to do penance therefor.

KIERNANDER (kyer-nan'der), JOHN ZACHARIAH, a zealous missionary, was born in Akland, in Sweden, in 1711. He was educated at the university of Upsal, and under the auspices of the English society for promoting Christian knowledge he was sent out a missionary to Cuddalore, on the surrender of which to the French in 1758, he removed to Calcutta, where he opened a school, and in 1767 he founded a new church, the expense of which fell chiefly on himself. He subsequently accepted the office of chaplain at the Dutch settlement of Chinsura, on the capture of which in 1795 he removed once more to Calcutta, where he died in 1799.

KIFFIN (kif'fin), WILLIAM, a noted English Baptist preacher and founder of the "Particular Baptists," was born in 1616. He was held in high favor at the courts of Charles II. and James II., and through his influence a number of Baptists under sentence of death were pardoned by the king. For sixty-two years, from 1639, he was minister of the Baptist church in Devonshire Square, London. He died in 1701.

KILDARE (kil'dare) is the name of a small town in the province of Leinster which was greatly distinguished in the early Christian Church of Ireland. A Christian female, afterward known in history as St. Bridget, established a school in this place for educating women in the faith, and a town grew up around the institution. Afterward it became the seat of a bishopric, and the fame of the great St. Bridget has ever afterward been associated with the place. It has been observed, no doubt with truth, that more children have been called after her name than after any person who is not mentioned in Scripture. Among the Irish and the Scots in Scotland, in the islands of the Hebrides and elsewhere her name has been held in great honor. Churches have been dedicated to her memory and called by her name, and thus the piety and eminent services of a Christian lady who died about A. D. 515 have commanded an affectionate remembrance which has continued from generation to generation in many countries for nearly fourteen centuries.

KILHAM (kil'ham), ALEXANDER, was born in 1762, at Epworth, in England. His parents were Methodists, and young Kilham early began to preach. An earnest friend of Wesley's named Brackenbury associated the young preacher with himself, and after a tour in the Channel Islands he was admitted as a regular itinerant minister. He met the usual fate of the itinerant preachers of his day, being often stoned and otherwise abused, but he went on his way with undaunted zeal. During Wesley's life his followers adhered to the Established Church, receiving baptism and the Lord's Supper at the hands of the ministry of that Church, but many earnest men, and Kilham among the number, sighed for freedom on these points, and he took a decided part in the controversies which soon arose about separation from the Church and the introduction of a lay representation in the conference. So far did the controversy go that in consequence of statements which he made he was arraigned and expelled from the connection in 1796, and thus he became one of the most distinguished of the founders of the "New Connection of Wesleyan Methodists." The body thus formed was known for a time as the Kilhamites, and to Kilham belongs the distinction of being the first to advocate with decision and ability the introduction of the lay element in the government of the Methodist body. He was characterized by great vigor and decision of character, eminent for his piety and his love of the denomination to which he was attached. He died in 1798, very shortly after his brethren had censured his course of action in the conference.

KILIAN (kil'yan) is the name of one of the most eminent of the old Irish saints, celebrated for his labors in Thuringia in the seventh century. He had become a monk in his early life; and having undertaken a journey to Rome, he was made a prisoner by the pagans in Thuringia while on his way. He became an earnest missionary among them, succeeded in converting Gosbert, the duke, and many of the chief people. He is said to have reproved Gosbert for having married Geilana, the widow of his brother; and having declared the marriage invalid, he was murdered at her instigation. Tradition records how insanity overtook her and her agents, but a cloud of uncertainty hangs over the narrative. One thing is certain: Kilian belonged to the noble band of missionaries who went forth from the primitive Irish Church to labor in Scotland, the North of England, Germany, and even among the Apeninnes in Italy. Mosheim says of him: "He exercised his ministerial functions with great success among the Franks, and vast numbers of them embraced Christianity;" and hence he has been always called "the apostle of Franconia." It was a custom of these Irish missionaries to change their names, so as to become more useful in the lands where they labored, and hence among them are many names which give no evidence of any connection with their native land, such as Rumbold, bishop of Mechlin, Florentius, bishop of Strasburg, Albinus, Colman, Clementus, and many others, of whom it has been said most truly by Mosheim, when referring to their views of the independence of the early Irish Church, "They refused a blind submission, and gave much trouble to Rome."

KIMCHI (kim'ke). There have been three eminent Hebraists of this name—JOSEPH BEN ISAAC and his two sons DAVID BEN JOSEPH and MOSES BEN JOSEPH. 1. The father, was compelled to leave Spain on account of the persecutions to which the Jews were subjected by the Mohammedans, settled in Narbonne, where he died about 1180. He devoted his whole life to the science of the Hebrew language and Biblical exegesis, and succeeded, by his clear and independent judgment, in creating a new epoch in the study of the Hebrew Scriptures among his brethren in Southern France by introducing there the learning of Spain and continuing the labors of Ibn Ezra. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, the Later Prophets, Job, Proverbs, and a Hebrew grammar called "The Book of Remembrance," which is the first written by a Jew in a Christian country.

2. Was born in Narbonne in 1160, and died about 1235. Very little is known of the private life of this celebrated commentator, grammarian and lexicographer, who is justly regarded as the teacher of Hebrew of both Jews and Christians throughout Europe. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, The Earlier Prophets, The Later Prophets, The Psalms, Ruth, Chronicles and Job, also "A Refutation of Christianity," in which he tries to explain away some Messianic Psalms. Kimchi does not pretend to originality; he frankly says that his aim is to exhibit the results of the manifold and extensive labors of his numerous predecessors. But though his claims are modest, yet his merits are great, and he became eminent among his brethren. Equally great was his reputation amongst Christians after the revival of learning and at the time of the Reformation, notwithstanding his hostility to Christianity. The first Hebrew lexicons or glossaries compiled by Christians, as well as the grammars and the notes accompanying the Latin Bibles of Munster and Stephen, are derived from Kimchi.

3. The eldest son, flourished about 1160–1170. Though far below his father and brother, yet he has also distinguished himself as a commentator and grammarian. He wrote commentaries on Proverbs, Ezra and Nehemiah, also a grammatical work, entitled "Journey on the Paths of Knowledge," which became a manual for both Jews and Christians who were anxious to acquire the rudiments of Hebrew grammar.

KINAH (ki'nah), a place on the southern border of Judah, toward Edom, Josh. xv. 22. It is only once mentioned, and its site is unknown.

KINDRED (kin'dred). This term, or the equivalent "near of kin," repeatedly occurs in Scripture, Lev. xviii. 6, and may be supposed to have a comprehensive meaning. The particular degrees of kindred are noticed under their respective names, to which the reader is referred. See also MARRIAGE.

KING. This term is used in the Old Testament Scripture with some latitude, and is often applied where some inferior epithet would correspond better with modern ideas. It occurs first in connection with the leaders of the expedition which called the prowess of Abraham into play, and those who suffered by it, Gen. xiv. Several of the kings in question may have had dominions of some extent. But when one hears of the king of Sodom, the king of Gomorrah, the king of Admah, the king of Zeboim, all towns lying within a very limited district, and necessarily of moderate size, it is manifest that "king" must be understood much in the sense of local superior or chief ruler.

In regard to the first distinct indication of a kingly government in Israel—that namely in Deut. xvii. 14–20, as what might possibly happen; and if it should happen, perfectly compatible with the ends of the theocracy—there was a point of affinity with the constitution of things in Egypt which it is well to mark, because, though the spirit of all was different in Israel, yet the form sketched by the hand of the lawgiver bore a certain resemblance to what existed in Egypt. There, also, a theocratic element entered into the monarchical regimen, for the king was to a large extent subject to the declared will and ministers of the heavenly powers. It was, therefore, but applying to Israel, with a fitting accommodation to the demands of the theocracy, the polity with which they had been familiar in Egypt, when Moses, contemplating the probable institution of an earthly kingdom, appointed the king, who might be chosen to regard himself as in a peculiar sense the servant of Heaven, and to take counsel daily at the word of God. Even apart from the divine direction which Moses here also doubtless received, the instruction could not be viewed as unnatural; the people of Israel had already been familiar with something akin to it.

The close connection between the king and the priesthood in Israel, and of the king with the higher ends of the covenant, may of itself serve to explain the custom, which was adopted at the very institution of the kingdom, of setting apart or consecrating the person appointed by anointing him with oil, 1 Sam. x. 1, whence the king for the time being came to be called "the Lord's anointed." But for this also there was found, even from very remote times, a prototype in Egypt, where kings received this mode of consecration from the hands of the priests, and were familiarly called "the anointed of the gods." The spiritual meaning of the ceremony, however, differed materially in the two cases, taking its distinctive character from the spirit of the religions belonging to the respective countries.

KING, EDWARD, a profound and erudite English antiquary, was born in Norfolk, in 1735. He studied at Cambridge University and afterward at Lincoln's Inn, where he completed his education as a lawyer. He was chiefly distinguished for his literary works, most of which were on archaeological subjects. But besides these, he wrote a treatise entitled "Morsels of Criticism, tending to illustrate some few Passages in the Holy Scripture upon Philosophical Principles and an Enlarged View of Things." This production, as well as his "Remarks on the Signs of the Times," displays a partiality for fanciful speculation more or less observable in all the works of this learned and ingenious writer. He died in 1807.

KING, HENRY, D.D., an English prelate, was born in 1591, and educated at Westminster School and Christ's College, Oxford. After being ordained, he was made chaplain to James I.; then, in 1638, he was promoted to the deanery of Rochester, and in 1641 he became bishop of Chichester. This preferment he lost on the outbreak of the civil war, but recovered it at the restoration of Charles II. He died in 1669. His works consist of sermons and other religious publications, besides "A Poetical Version of the Psalms."

KING, JOHN GLEN, D.D., F.R.S., F.A.S., an English divine and writer on ecclesiastical antiquities, was born in Norfolk, in 1731, and received his education at Caius College, Cambridge. In 1764 he was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Petersburg. He subsequently obtained the rectory of Wormley, in Hertfordshire, and afterward officiated as preacher at a chapel in London. He died in 1787. He wrote "The Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia."

KING, PETER, an eminent English lawyer and theological writer, was born in 1669, in the city of Exeter. He was intended for mercantile pursuits; but displaying a strong inclination for literature, he was sent to the university of Leyden, where he turned his attention chiefly to divinity, and the fruit of his studies appeared in a work entitled "An Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity and Worship of the Primitive Church," but on his return from Leyden he became a student of the Inner Temple, and in 1699 he was introduced into the House of Commons as member for Beerlston, in Devonshire. He did not, however, relinquish his theological researches, having published in 1702 "The History of the Apostles' Creed," as the author of which he is principally known to the literary world. On the accession of George I., in 1714, he was made chief-justice of the common pleas, and in 1725 he was appointed lord chancellor, when he was raised to the peerage. He died in 1734.

A PERSIAN KING AND HIS ATTENDANTS.—See KING.

KING, ROBERT, became associated with the diocese of Oxford in consequence of the fact that when the priory of Osney had become an abbey, and subsequently was raised to a bishopric, King was made the first bishop, and his church was changed into a cathedral, dedicated to Christ and the blessed Virgin, and Gloucester Hall, now Worcester College, was assigned to him as a palace. Another change was impending, and in 1546, only four years after this arrangement, the see was removed to the priory of St. Frideswide, in Oxford, and it in process of time became the chapel of the great college of Christ Church, as well as the cathedral of the bishop of the diocese.

KING, DR. WILLIAM, archbishop of Dublin, was born in 1650, and educated at Trinity College. He was the author of a celebrated treatise "On the Origin of Evil," wherein he undertook to show how all the several kinds of evil with which the world abounds are consistent with the goodness of God, and may be accounted for without the supposition of an evil principle. He published several other works, and attained the dignity of archbishop in 1702. He died in 1729.

KINGDOM OF GOD. See HEAVEN, KINGDOM OF.

KINGS, FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF. The two books of the Kings originally formed one in the Hebrew; but they were divided by the Greek translators and called the Third and Fourth Books of the Kings, the two books of Samuel being the First and Second. They further develop the leading subjects of the last-mentioned books, taking up the history of the Hebrew nation at the period of its greatest glory, then relating its division into two independent states, and tracing their gradual declension to the time of their subversion.

In the history of the monarchy the various characters of the successive kings and the general spirit of their government are faithfully portrayed, together with such of their actions and such national events as had an immediate bearing upon their relation to their divine Sovereign, and consequently upon the religious state of the people. All this is exhibited in particular connection with the promise given to David, 2 Sam. vii. 12-16, which, indeed, furnishes the key to the subsequent history. It is shown that the Lord fulfilled his gracious promise, chastising the seed of David for their sins, and even casting them off, but not for ever. So that the kingdom was not wholly taken from his family for the sin of Solomon, 1 Ki. xi. 32-37; xii. 20; nor was the nation or the family of David extinguished when Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed, 2 Ki. xxv. 27-30.

This view of the special purposes of the history will explain why in some parts more prominence is given to the affairs of the ten tribes than to those of the kingdom of Judah; inasmuch as they offer more exemplary illustrations of the manner in which the invisible Sovereign asserted his supremacy over both kings and people. The introduction and obstinate maintenance of idolatry in the kingdom of Israel made it needful that he should constantly interpose by his servants the prophets, reminding the nation of their backslidings, alarming hardened sinners by signs and wonders, and publicly punishing their kings, who led the people into sin, by frequent changes of the dynasty; so that in the short space of two hundred and fifty years the throne was occupied by nine different families; until at last, after warnings and milder punishments had failed to produce amendment, the kingdom was utterly overthrown, and "Ephraim ceased to be a people," Isa. vii. 8.

In the smaller state of Judah, which continued faithful to the house of David, the existence of the temple-worship and of the Levitical priesthood tended to uphold the authority of Jehovah. Some idolaters appear among the monarchs, but their reigns were generally short, while those of the pious kings were, according to the divine promises by Moses, usually long and prosperous. These princes, with the aid of the prophets and priests, repressed idolatry and revived from time to time the knowledge and service of Jehovah. Thus Judah, though a much smaller country, preserved her national existence for more than a century longer than Israel; but finally, as no lasting reformation was effected, her land also was desolated, and the best of her sons were subjected to a seventy years' exile.

In these books, also, is further displayed the agency and influence of the prophets, who were specially commissioned by the supreme King of Israel to assert his rights and demand obedience to his laws, counseling, guiding and aiding the monarchs and the people when they acted aright and warning and judging them when they sinned. Great prominence is given to the prophetic ministry, so that we find it frequently taking part in the affairs of the nation as well as declaring the divine purposes respecting the future. Nathan's interference secures the accession of Solomon, 1 Ki. i. 45. Ahijah announces the division of the kingdom, with its causes, 1 Ki. xi. 29-40. Shemaiah, after the division has taken place, confirms it by directing Rehoboam to disband his army, 1 Ki. xii. 22, 23. By various prophets Jeroboam's idolatry is publicly reprov'd and its punishment threatened, 1 Ki. xiii. 1-3; xiv. 7, judgment is denounced against the house of Baasha, 1 Ki. xvi. 1, and Ahab's doom is distinctly declared, 1 Ki. xxii. 17-28; whilst in the midst of the national history the wonderful works of the two great prophets Elijah and Elisha occupy so much of several chapters that the kings appear to hold but a secondary place, 1 Ki. xvii.; 2 Ki. xiii. And besides these, there were Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea and others, whose inspired writings, if carefully compared with the contemporaneous histories, will afford much aid in understanding the national affairs, and particularly the moral state of the times.

Nothing certain is known with respect to the authorship of these books of the Kings, but it appears that narratives of Solomon's reign had been composed by Nathan, Abijah the Shilomite and Iddo, 2 Chr. ix. 29; that a history of Rehoboam had been written by Shemaiah and Iddo, to which the latter had added an account of Abijah, 2 Chr. xii. 15; xiii. 22; that Jehu, the son of Hanani, had recorded the life of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chr. xx. 34; that annals of the kings from Uzziah to Hezekiah had been kept by Isaiah, among whose prophecies may be found narratives almost verbally agreeing with these, see 2 Chr. xxvi. 22; xxxii. 32; Isa. xxxvi.-xxxviii. 1-8, 21, 22; xxxix.; compared with 2 Ki. xviii. 13-37; xix., xx. 1-19; and that Jeremiah had done the same in his days, 2 Ki. xxiv. 18-20; xxv.; Jer. lii. From such records of contemporary prophets some inspired writer, in the time of Nebuchadnezzar and Evil-Merodach, compiled the present books, containing as much as the Holy Spirit deemed necessary, 1 Ki. xi. 41; xiv. 19, 29; xv. 7, 23; xvi. 5, 14, 20. The Jewish tradition which ascribes this work to Jeremiah appears highly probable on comparing the period at which the history closes, 2 Ki. xxv. 27-30, with what we know of the duration of his life, and further observing the occasional resemblance in style and expression to some parts of his writings.

The chronology of this period is not easily settled, and nothing more than an approximation to correctness seems now to be attainable. The parallel histories in the books of the Kings and the Chronicles disagree respecting some dates, and other dates are manifestly erroneous in both. The most careful investigations give from four hundred and twenty-two to four hundred and thirty-two years for the two books—from the accession of Solomon to the capture of Jerusalem—divided into four periods: 1. The undivided monarchy under Solomon, forty years; 2. From the division of the kingdom to the accession of Jehu, who put to death the two kings of Judah and Israel, between eighty-eight and ninety-two years; 3. From the accession of Jehu to the captivity of the ten tribes, between one hundred and sixty-one and one hundred and sixty-seven years; 4. The duration of the kingdom of Judah alone, one hundred and thirty-three years.

The FIRST BOOK OF THE KINGS comprehends a period of about one hundred and twenty years, from the accession of Solomon to the death of Jehoshaphat, and may be divided into two parts:

I. The history of the UNDIVIDED KINGDOM under Solomon, including David's old age and death, Solomon's accession to the throne and suppression of Adonijah's conspiracy, 1 Ki. i., ii.; Solomon's vision and prayer, and his wisdom, 1 Ki. iii.; his court and officers, and the extent and prosperity of his kingdom, 1 Ki. iv.; the building of the temple and of Solomon's palaces, 1 Ki. v.-vii.; dedication of the temple, 1 Ki. viii.-ix. 9; Solomon's wealth and magnificence, and the queen of Sheba's visit, 1 Ki. ix. 9; x.; Solomon's wives and idolatry; God's displeasure; Solomon's adversaries, 1 Ki. xi.

II. The history of the TWO SEPARATE KINGDOMS for about eighty years, including Rehoboam's accession and the revolt of the ten tribes, 1 Ki. xii. 1-24; Jeroboam's idolatry and the prophecies against him and his family; 1 Ki. xii. 24-xix. 20; the reigns of Rehoboam, Abijam and Asa in Judah, 1 Ki. xiv. 21-xv. 24, and of Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Omri and Ahab in Israel, 1 Ki. xv. 25-xvi.; Elijah's prophetic ministry and the call of Elisha, 1 Ki. xvii.-xix.; war between Israel and Syria, 1 Ki. xx.; murder of Naboth and Elijah's reproof of Ahab, 1 Ki. xxi.; Jehoshaphat's league with Ahab; Micaiah and the false prophets; death of Ahab, 1 Ki. xxii. 1-40; Jehoshaphat's reign in Judah and Ahaziah's in Israel, 1 Ki. xxii. 41-53.

The SECOND BOOK OF THE KINGS is a continuation of the preceding, and comprises a period of about three hundred years, and may be divided into two parts:

I. The further history of the TWO KINGDOMS of Israel and Judah to the end of the former, containing the ministry of Elijah continued; his message to Ahaziah, 2 Ki. i., and his translation to heaven, 2 Ki. 1-11; the ministry and miracles of Elisha, 2 Ki. 11-viii. 15; the reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah in Judah, 2 Ki. viii. 16-29; reign of Jehu in Israel, 2 Ki. ix., x.; Athaliah's usurpation and the preservation and reign of Joash in Judah, 2 Ki. xi., xii.; reigns of Jehoahaz and Jehoash in Israel; Elisha's last prophecy and death, 2 Ki. xiii.; reign of Amaziah in Judah and of Jeroboam II. in Israel, 2 Ki. xiv.; reign of Azariah in Judah, and of Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah and Pekah in Israel; Assyrian invasions, 2 Ki. xv. 1-31; reigns of Jotham and Ahaz in Judah, 2 Ki. xv. 32-38, xvi.; reign of Hoshea in Israel; conquest of the country by the Assyrians; overthrow of the kingdom and colonization of the land of Israel by idolaters, 2 Ki. xvii.

II. The history of the surviving KINGDOM OF JUDAH continued to its overthrow by the Chaldeans, comprising Hezekiah's good reign; invasions of the Assyrians and destruction of Sennacherib's army, 2 Ki. xviii., xix.; Hezekiah's sickness and recovery; visit of ambassadors from Babylon, 2 Ki. xx.; wicked reigns of Manasseh and Amon, 2 Ki. xxi.; Josiah's good reign and reforms, 2 Ki. xxii. 1-xxiii. 30; reigns of Jehoahaz, Jehoakim and Jehoiachin; invasions of the Chaldeans and the first transportation of the people to Babylon, 2 Ki. xxiii. 31-xxiv. 17; reign of Zedekiah; capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; destruction of the city and temple and second transportation of the people to Babylon, 2 Ki. xxiv. 18-xxv. 21; Gedaliah is appointed governor, and is killed; the remnant of the people flee into Egypt; mitigation of Jehoiachin's captivity, 2 Ki. xxv. 22-30.

KINGSBURY (kingz'ber-re), WILLIAM, an English independent minister, was born July 12, 1744, in London. From 1765 to 1810 he filled the pulpit of the independent church at Southampton, and during that period founded a seminary for young men. He deserves honorable mention as one of the originators of the London Missionary Society, of which he was the first president. He died February 18, 1818. He wrote "An Apology for Village Preachers."

KING'S COLLEGE CHAPEL, in Cambridge, is one of the most imposing Gothic structures in the world. It was begun in the reign of Henry VI. and finished in that of Henry VII. For decoration it stands pre-eminent, and the senses are overpowered by the beauty and splendor that everywhere meet the gaze. The elaborate magnificence of the doorway astonishes the spectator until the painted windows meet the gaze; and yet these are surpassed by the wondrous roof composed of arches of the most airy, fan-like tracery, compared with which all other decoration—except perhaps in the chapel at Westminster—seems to be insignificant. The whole interior glows with a beauty and fascination which is indescribable; and yet the king, we are told, had aimed at an edifice of a more marvelous splendor. Such magnificence was projected for the chapel of a college, for in this way the monarch exhibited his regard for learning. In the length and elevation of the building this chapel and the Sistine at Rome have been considered as parallel, though it must be admitted the architectural splendor belongs to Cambridge.

KING'S DALE.

In only two passages of Scripture is this place mentioned, and from neither of them can we get any information as to its position. When Abraham was returning with the spoil of Sodom, the king of Sodom went out to meet him "at the valley of Shaveh, which is the king's dale," Gen. xiv. 17; and in the narrative of the death of Absalom the incidental remark is inserted by the historian: "Now Absalom in his lifetime had reared up for himself a pillar which is in the king's dale," 2 Sam. xviii. 18.

We have no direct indication of the geographical position of the king's dale either in the Bible or any ancient author. Some have supposed that it is identical with the Valley of Jehoshaphat or Kidron, and that the well-known monument now called the tomb of Absalom is the pillar raised by that prince. Others locate the king's dale at Beersheba, others at Lebanon, others near the Jordan. But if we identify Salem with Jerusalem, then doubtless the king's dale was close to that city; and it seems highly probable besides that Absalom should have raised his memorial pillar in the vicinity of the capital. Now, in the immediate neighborhood of Jerusalem there is one place, and only one, which appears to answer to these indications, and it is the Plain of Rephaim. It is on the direct route from the north to Hebron; a practicable road leads down from it through the wilderness to the shore of the Dead Sea; and it is so close to Jerusalem that Melchisedec, from the heights of Zion, could both see and hear the joyous meeting of the princes of Sodom with the victorious band of Abraham and the reclaimed captives.

KING'S EVIL. A form of scrofulous disease was called by this name in England. From the time of Edward the Confessor the belief prevailed that it was curable by the king touching the patient. In 1683 the privy council restricted the time for the public healings from All Saints' day to a week before Christmas, and after Christmas until March 1, to cease then until passion week. So strong was the popular conviction on this point that the ecclesiastical authorities prepared a religious form to be used during the ceremony. The custom was discontinued by George I.

KINGSLEY (kingz'le), CALVIN, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished and greatly beloved bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born September 8, 1812, at Amesville, Oneida county, New York. His early education was pursued under great discouragements and privations, and he graduated at Alleghany College, Pennsylvania, in 1841, immediately after which he was made professor of mathematics, and at the same time began the work of the ministry. In 1843 he came prominently before the public in a discussion with Luther Lee and Elias Smith on the subject of slavery, and acquitted himself with singular ability. During the two following years he performed ministerial work in the city of Erie, where his labors were followed by deep religious feeling. In 1864 he was elected bishop, and held this office until his death, at Beirut, in 1870, while on his way home from a tour around the world.

KIPLING (kip'ling), THOMAS, an English divine, was born in Yorkshire, in the first half of the eighteenth century. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1768, and became D.D. in 1784, and filled the office of deputy regius professor of divinity under Bishop Watson. In 1792 he preached the Boyle Lectures, which were not published. In 1793 he brought out at the University Press a very handsome edition of the famous "Codex Bezae," with fac-simile types, which was immediately assailed with a virulence amounting to personal hostility by the party which had espoused the cause of the once notorious Friend, who was banished the university for Unitarianism, and in whose case Kipling had come forward as promoter, or public prosecutor. Dr. Edwards, the leader of the party, charged him with ignorance and want of fidelity. But though his "Prolegomena" do not manifest much accurate scholarship, and he commits the serious error of printing the corrections instead of the original reading of the text, which he relegated to the notes at the end, Tregelles allows that he "appears to have used scrupulous exactitude in performing his task efficiently, according to the plan which he had proposed to himself," and his work is one of real value. He was rewarded with the deanery of Peterborough, in which dignity he died in 1822.

KIPPIS (kip'pis), ANDREW, a dissenting divine, biographer and miscellaneous writer, was born at Nottingham, in 1725. He was the pastor successively of congregations at Boston, Dorking and Westminster, received a doctor's degree from the university of Edinburgh, and was latterly one of the tutors at the new academy or dissenters' college, Hackney. Dr. Kippis laid the foundation of the "New Annual Register," and devoted his principal attention during the latter years of his life to an improved edition of the "Biographia Britannica," of which five volumes were printed; but it was conducted on a plan so elaborate as to afford no prospect of its termination. He also published the lives of Captain Cook, Pringle, Doddridge and Lardner, "A Vindication of the Dissenters," a volume of sermons and "Observations on the late Contests in the Royal Society." He died in 1795.

KIR (ker). 1. A city or district to which the king of Assyria carried away the people of Damascus, 2 Ki. xvi. 9. Kir is also named with Elam, Isa. xxii. 6; and the Syrians are said to have been brought from Kir, Amos ix. 7. A difference of opinion exists in regard to the position of Kir. Very probably it was in Media, the present Kerend.

KIRGHIS (ker'ghis), or KIRGHIS-KAISAKI (ki'sa-ke), or COSSACKS OF THE STEPPES, a people spread over the immense territory bounded by the Volga, desert of Obshtchei, the Irish, Chinese Turkestan, Ala-Tau Mountains, the Sir-Daria and Aral and Caspian Seas. They are a Turkish race and speak the dialect of the Uzbeks, from whom they profess to be descended. They are, in general, nomadic, and are ruled by their own sultans or khans. They are restless and predatory, and have well earned for themselves the title of the "Slave-hunters of the Steppes" by seizing upon caravans, appropriating the goods and selling their captives at the great slave-markets of Khiva and Bokhara. Their wealth consists of cattle, sheep, horses and camels. Their religion is a corrupt Islamism.

KIR-HARESH, KIR-HERES, KIR-HARASETH, KIR-HARESETH and KIR-MOAB, a city and important fortress of Moab, 2 Ki. iii. 25. It is now called Kerak, seated on a high calcareous rock, rising from a deep and narrow glen, which thence descends westward under the name of Wady Kerak to the Dead Sea. It was a place of importance in the time of the crusaders.

KIRIATHAIM (ker-ytha'im), Jer. xlvi. 1, 23. See KIRJATHAIM.

KIRIATHIARIUS (ker-ythe-a're-us), 1 Esd. v. 19. See KIRJATH-JEARIM.

KIRIOTH (ker-i'oth). See KERIOTH.

KIRJATH (ker'jath), a city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 28. Some have identified it with Kirjath-jearim.

KIRJATHAIM (ker-jatha'im). 1. A city east of the Jordan, built or fortified by the Reubenites and allotted to them, Num. xxxii. 37. In later times it was in the possession of the Moabites, Jer. xlvi. 1, 23, in which place it is called Kiria-thaim. According to Dr. Porter, it is the modern Kureiyat, under the southern side of Jebel Attarus. 2. 1 Chr. vi. 76.

KIRJATH-ARBA (ker'jath-ar'ba), "city of Arba," or, according to the Jews, "city of four," because Adam, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were buried there, Gen. xxiii. 2. See HEBRON.

KIRJATHARIM (ker-jath-a'rim) and KIRJATH-BAAL (ker'jath-ba'al), the same with Kirjath-jearim.

KIRJATH-HUZOTH (kir'jath-hu'tzoth), a city of Moab, Num. xxii. 39, perhaps regarded as a place of sanctity.

KIRJATH-JEARIM (kir'jath-je-a'rim), one of the cities of the Gibeonites, Josh. ix. 17. On the allotment of Canaan it was on the border of Judah and Benjamin, but yet belonging to Judah. It was variously called Baalah, Josh. xv. 9, 10, Baale of Judah, 2 Sam. vi. 2, Kirjath-baal, Josh. xviii. 14; Kirjath-arim, Ezra ii. 25. It was to this place that the ark was brought after the catastro-phie at Bethshemesh, and from thence carried by David to Jerusalem. Some of the families who settled in it are mentioned in 1 Chr. ii. 50, 52, 53; and a number of its inhabitants returned from Babylon after the captivity. Urijah, the prophet put to death by Jehoiakim, was of Kirjath-jearim. The modern Kuriet el-Aineb is satisfactorily identified with Kirjath-jearim. It is but a poor village, with a ruined Latin church. On the hill to the north-west probably stood the house of Abinadab, 1 Sam. vii. 1. Dr. Thomson believes it identical with EMMAUS, which see.

KIRJATH-SANNAH (ker'jath-san'nah), the same with Debir, Josh. xv. 49, or—

KIRJATH-SEPPER (ker'jath-se'fer), a city, perhaps originally a seat of learning, taken by Othniel, for which he obtained Achsah, Caleb's daughter, in marriage, Josh. xv. 15-17. It was also called Debir, Josh. x. 38, 39, and Kirjath-sannah, Josh. xv. 49.

KIRK (kerk), a word which is commonly used in Scotland to designate a church—thus, the parish kirk, the Kirk of Scotland. It is traced to the Greek word "kuriakon," the house of God, by some, but it no doubt comes more directly into the usage of the Scotch people from the Saxon, and it still appears in the German "kirche."

KIRK OF SCOTLAND. See PREBYTERIAN CHURCH.

KIRK SESSION, or CHURCH SESSION, the lowest ecclesiastical court in the Presbyterian Church. In every parish in Scotland and in all Presbyterian churches the minister and the ruling elders compose the session. They have charge of the flock and attend to the department of the people. From their decision in all matters of discipline an appeal may be taken to the presbytery, thence to the synod, and thence to the general assembly, where all questions of discipline or of doctrine are finally decided.

KIRKLAND (kerk'land), JOHN THORNTON, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished Unitarian clergyman, was born August 17, 1770, at Herkimer, New York. He graduated at Harvard University, where he was subsequently tutor of metaphysics. In 1794 he became pastor of the New South Church, Boston, and preached with distinguished success. In 1810 he was elected president of Harvard University, and the period of his presidency was one of brilliant prosperity in the history of the college. He died April 26, 1840.

KIRKPATRICK (kerk-pat'rik), JACOB, D.D., who was long known and much beloved as an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born in 1785, at Baskinridge, in New Jersey. He graduated at Princeton in 1804, and after studying theology, he settled as pastor at Ringoes, New Jersey, where he labored for fifty-six years. He was one of the founders of the society for promoting the circulation of the Bible in Hunterdon county, New Jersey, and after a long and successful ministry, he died in 1866.

KIRKPATRICK, JAMES, was one of the most famous of the ministers of the Irish Presbyterian Church in the beginning of the eighteenth century. His father, Hugh Kirkpatrick, a Scotchman, became minister of Lurgan, in Armagh county, Ireland, where his son James was born. Leaving Lurgan, his father, at the time of the revolution, settled at Dalry, in Scotland, whence he removed to Old Cumnock; but in 1695 he returned to Ireland, and died at Ballymoney in 1712. James, who was educated at Glasgow, at once rose to fame as the minister of the second congregation at Belfast. When Parlia-

KIRWAN, WALTER BLAKE, one of the most eloquent preachers of his day, was born in Galway county, Ireland, in 1754. He received his first education at the college of the English priests at St. Omer, and subsequently at the university of Louvain, where he filled the chair of natural and moral philosophy. Having taken priest's orders, he became, in 1778, chaplain to the Neapolitan embassy in London, where he attracted attention as an able and impressive preacher. In 1787 he conformed to the Protestant faith at St. Peter's, in Dublin. The vivid, earnest power of his discourses "disturbed the repose of the pulpit," and as a preacher for charities he wrought wonders. He was made a prebendary of Howth, rector of St. Nicholas Without, and dean of Killala. Gratian said that with him "the preacher's desk became a throne of light." He died in 1805.

KISH (kish). 1. The father of King Saul, 1 Sam. ix. 1, 3. 2. Another Benjamite of the same family, 1 Sam. viii. 30. 3. A Levite of the family of Merari, 1 Sam. xxiii. 21, 22. 4. A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxix. 12. But the name may stand for the family instead of an individual, and may be identical with Kishi. 5. An ancestor of Mordecai, Esth. ii. 5.

KISHI (kish/i), a Levite of the family of Merari, 1 Chr. vi. 44, called also Kushaiah, 1 Chr. xv. 17.

KISHION (kish'e-on) and KISHON (ki'shon), a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 20; xxi. 28, allotted to the Gershonite Levites, but in 1 Chr. vi. 72, Kedesh is substituted.

KISHON, a stream which issues from the mountains of Carmel, and discharges itself after a very short course into the Bay of Acre. It is described as sluggish, with brackish water, passing through a marsh. But there is besides a more remote source near En-gannim—the fountain of Jenin. The water, however, which flows hence, though augmented by winter torrents still farther to the east, fails during the summer and autumn. It is only therefore in certain seasons of the year that the Kishon is full. But what it becomes when swollen with rains may be imagined from the resistless force with which it swept away the flying troops of Sisera, Jud. iv. 7; v. 21. This stream is noted for another great event in Scripture history. It was to its banks that Elijah on the day of Carmel brought down the idol priests for execution, 1 Ki. xviii. 40. The Kishon is now the Mukutta.

KISS. As a mode of salutation between near relatives and friends the kiss has been common to all ages and countries, and in that respect there is nothing that can be called peculiar to the Bible. In token of affection and mutual endearment, such persons on meeting or parting with each other naturally exchange a kiss, Gen. xxvii. 26; Luke vii. 45. From being the natural expression of a true affection and regard, it readily becomes the artful token of the hypocrite and seducer, professing a love which they do not feel, Prov. vii. 13; Matt. xxvi. 48. In the early Church the kiss came into use among the Christian brotherhood as a token of relationship and mutual endearment in a spiritual sense, hence the exhortations in some of the Epistles to salute one another with a holy kiss, or with a kiss of charity, Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 1 Thess. v. 26; 1 Pet. v. 14. It might perhaps be understood among the members of the Church that the kiss was to be exchanged between persons of the same sex only, though no direction to this effect is found in the apostolic Epistles; and it is known that in process of time the heathen took occasion from the practice to reproach the Christians for looseness of manners. On this account care was taken, as appears from the apostolical constitutions, to maintain in respect to it the distinction of sexes, but the practice itself was kept up for centuries, especially in connection with the celebration of the Supper. It was regarded as the special token of perfect reconciliation and concord among the members of the Church, and was called simply the "peace" or the "kiss of peace." It was exchanged in the Eastern Church before, but in the Western after, the consecration of prayer. Ultimately, however, it was discontinued as a badge of Christian fellowship, or a part of any Christian solemnity.

In Scripture, however, the kiss sometimes appears as the mark of homage and veneration, not less than of love and endearment. Thus, it was given to earthly rulers in respectful and loyal ment attempted a system of persecution of the Irish Presbyterians, he wrote a memorable work, entitled "An Historical Essay upon the Loyalty of Presbyterians in Great Britain and Ireland, from the Reformation to the Present Year." The work was published in Belfast, in 1713, and such was the state of the times that the names of the writer and the printer dared not appear in the book, which created a wonderful reaction, and which long continued to be a household book in Ulster. He died in the year 1725.

KIRKTON (kirk'ton), JAMES, was a Scottish divine who flourished in the latter half of the seventeenth century. He is known by his "Secret History of the Church of Scotland from the Restoration to 1678." To be appreciated at its true value, it should be studied in connection with the "History of the Church of Scotland," by W. M. Hethrington, D.D. Kirkton died in 1690.

KIRKWOOD (kirk'wood), ROBERT, was a native of Paisley, in Scotland, where he was born in 1793. He was educated at the university of Glasgow, and after a course in theology under the Rev. Dr. Dick, he accepted an invitation to settle at New York. He began his labors in the missionary society in connection with the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church. He settled as pastor at Cortlandville, New York, in 1830, and in 1839 he went as a missionary to Illinois. Returning to the East in 1857, he connected himself with the Presbyterian Church, and he spent the remaining years of his life at Yonkers, being chiefly engaged in literary engagements. He wrote on the millennium, having adopted the pre-millennial view, on Universalism, on the Offices of Christ, and on the value of the Bible. He died in 1866.

acknowledgment of their dignity, whence Samuel kissed Saul immediately after having anointed him, 1 Sam. x. 1, and the exhortation to kiss the Son as anointed King of Zion follows directly on the proclamation of his divine appointment to the office, Ps. ii. 12. The modern practice of kissing the hand of the monarch survives doubtless as a witness of that ancient custom. And from a mark of devotion to early monarchs it passed into a similar mark toward the heavenly powers. To kiss the hand toward the sun or the moon was to do it divine homage—an act solemnly abjured by Job, ch. xxxi. 27; and where idols were worshiped a kiss was often actually applied to them. More commonly, however, even with respect to images, the kiss was only done toward them, the images themselves being enshrined in a temple. Hence, in 1 Ki. xix. 18; Hos. xiii. 2, the expression used is literally kiss to Baal, or to the calves. A servile imitation of this heathenish custom sprang up in England about the middle of the thirteenth century, and began to spread elsewhere; a table with a crucifix on it, or an image of Christ, was placed for the purpose of allowing the people to get round and kiss it. But the practice was discontinued on account of the strife and wrestling that attended it.

KIST-VAENS (kist'-va-enz). This word is used to designate the Druidical structures in which enormous stones sustain a superincumbent slab, as may be seen in the engraving. These stones, which have been generally considered Druidical, are found in different arrangements in Phœnicia, Persia, India, Portugal, Malta, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, France, and in Great Britain and Ireland. They have been held to be stones of memorial, altars and places of sepulture of heroes, and the great prevalence of these structures, when taken along with the "cairns," which also abound, shows how powerful was the motive which operated among the families of the primitive dispersion.

KITE, an unclean bird, Lev. xi. 14; Dent. xiv. 13. The word, which signifies a cry, occurs again in Job xxviii. 7, where it is rendered "vulture." It may possibly be used as a generic name for various species of hawk, falcon, etc. Or it may be supposed identical with the Falco cesalon of Linnæus—merlin. The common kite is well known in Europe, and the Arabian kite is one of the most abundant of birds of prey in Egypt. See GLEDE.

KITHLISH (kith/lish), a town in the plain country of Judah, Josh. xv. 40.

KITRON (kit/ron), a town of Zebulun, Jud. i. 30; it has been thought the same with Kattath, Josh. xix. 15.

KIT'S COTY HOUSE is the name of a good specimen of the Druidical altar-table or cromlech with its supporting stone. It is near Maidstone, in Kent. It is surrounded by a number of large stones, showing that in the dim ages of the past there must have been other structures around it. Two hundred and fifty years ago, Stow, the antiquarian, says of it: "I have myself, in company with divers worshipful and learned gentlemen, beheld it in Anno 1590, and it is of four flat stones, one of them standing upright in the middle of two others enclosing the edge sides of the first, and the fourth laid flat across the other three, and is of such height that men may stand on either side the middle stone in time of storm or tempest, safe from wind and rain, being defended with the breadth of the stones, having one at their back, on either side, and the fourth over their heads." Camden, who wrote at the same time as Stow, describes this as a kist-vaen or stone chest; and Grosse, in his Antiquities, says that the "upright stone on the north or north-west side is eight feet high, eight feet broad and two feet thick, estimated weight, eight tons and a half. Another stone is eight tons, another two tons, and the upper stone, which is irregular, is eleven feet long, eight feet broad and two feet thick, estimated weight about ten tons seven hundred." According to Camden, a great battle was fought here between the Britons, commanded by Catigern, and the Saxon invaders, under Hengist and Horsa. The Saxons were routed, but Catigern lost his life; and as Lambarde, in 1570, has recorded, the Britons here erected this monument in memory of their valiant leader. The name is said to be "Kit," an alteration of "Cati," and "Coit," which means a flat stone. The idea still prevails, that the vast tables which are found both east and west among rude and primitive races were connected with worship and had a common origin.

KITTIM (kit'tim), Gen. x. 4. See CHITTIM.

KITTO (kit'to), JOHN, D.D., one of the most distinguished of Biblical scholars, was born at Plymouth in 1804. His father, who began life as a master-builder, was reduced to the position of a jobbing mason, in which business young Kitto's help was required at a very early age. While thus occupied, in 1817, a fall from the top of a house totally destroyed his sense of hearing. His previous education had been meagre; but the love of reading, which he had already acquired, became the solace of his loneliness and the foundation of his attainments. In 1819 his parents, being unable to maintain him, placed him in the workhouse; whence he was removed, in 1821, to become an apprentice to a shoemaker, who, however, treated him so ill that he was compelled once more to take refuge in the workhouse. In 1823 he was enabled, by the kindness of two gentlemen of the neighborhood, to publish a small volume of essays and letters, and was placed in a position less unfavorable to self-improvement. The next ten years of Dr. Kitto's life were spent abroad. He journeyed over a large part of Europe and Asia, and acquired that familiarity with the scenery and customs of the East which was afterward of such signal service in the department of literature to which he became devoted. Returning to England in 1833, he gained attention by a series of papers under the title of "The Deaf Traveler," and having married, commenced a course of literary activity which was continued without interruption till within a few months of his decease. His chief productions consist of "The Lost Senses," a "Bible History of the Holy Land," "Palestine," "Physical Geography of the Holy Land;" he also founded and edited "The Journal of Sacred Literature;" but his chief title to fame rests on his "Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature." For several years before his death Dr. Kitto was exposed to pecuniary difficulties which a pension of five hundred dollars a year did not wholly remove. Dr. Kitto's services to the cause of Scripture learning were great in his own sphere. He revived and freshened the study of Eastern manners, and his life itself, with his physical defect and early privations, was a marvel of self-education and heroic perseverance. He died in 1854.

KLARENBACH (klar'en-bakh), ADOLF, who suffered exceedingly for the cause of gospel truth and ultimately became a martyr, was a native of the duchy of Berg, being born near Lennep in the end of the fifteenth century. He was educated at Munster and Cologne, and it is worthy of note that his teachers Zongern and Venradt became his relentless persecutors. He was obliged to flee from place to place, and thus even the virulence of his enemies drove him into new regions, where he was enabled to declare the truth. Thus he taught in Wesel, Munster, Osnabruck and Cologne. In Cologne he was imprisoned, and here his persecutors refused to obey an imperial requisition, and in March, 1529, he was brought before the inquisitors for final trial. He maintained his testimony with the utmost fortitude, and at length, on September 27, he and his friend Peter Flysteden were led out to execution. A narrative of this sad tragedy was afterward written, and the scenes which it records attest the power of divine grace to sustain the soul amid the tortures of the most relentless cruelty.

KLEE (klee), HEINRICH, was born in the year 1800, near Coblenz, and after an education at Mayence and a course of theology, he became a professor at the age of nineteen years. Ordained to the priesthood in 1823, he entered the chair of Exegesis and Church History, and two years afterward he became professor of philosophy. In the same year he received the degree of D.D. from Wurzburg as an acknowledgement of his treatise on the millennialism of the early ages of Christianity. This work was followed by one on auricular confession and by a commentary on the Gospel of St. John. Klee, as a strict Romanist, differed from Hermes, who desired to base religion on philosophy, while the other held that religion could only rest on faith. In metaphysics and psychology Klee followed Kant, but he was a warm defender of the Church, referring to historical demonstration for the truth of the facts and doctrines which the Church maintained; and thus it has been held that, after all, his system must be fatal to Romanism. As a lecturer his class-room was crowded, especially after he had accepted a call to the university at Bonn. Clement August, the archbishop, was his patron; and when he was banished, Klee accepted a call to Munich in 1839, at which place he died two years afterward.

KLEY (kli), EDWARD, who was born in 1789 in Silesia, became a famous Reformer and a preacher among the progressive Jews in Hamburg, where he also did a great work in connection with education. He was the first preacher among the Jews to use a German liturgy, an organ, and a temple instead of a synagogue. So greatly was he esteemed that when age obliged him to retire his friends raised a fund as a testimony of respect for his services, but he declined it, and arranged that it should be dedicated to the support of aged teachers who had no proper support from the state. His sermons were published, and they have been much esteemed by his brethren. He published homilies also, and a catechism. Kley died in 1867.

KLOPSTOCK (klop'stok), FRIEDRICH GOTTLIEB, a celebrated German poet, was born at Quedlinburg, in 1724. After receiving a liberal education at his native place, he was sent to study theology at Jena, where he wrote a great part of his "Messiah." Klopstock was invited into Switzerland, and while there the people regarded him with a kind of veneration. From thence he was attracted to Copenhagen by the most flattering promises, which were amply fulfilled. In 1771 he went to reside at Hamburg as Danish ambassador and counselor from the court of Baden. He died in 1803, and was buried with great pomp and solemnity. As a lyrical writer Klopstock is, perhaps, amongst the most successful of his countrymen. His tragedies, though not calculated for the stage, contain beautiful language and the loftiest sentiments; but his greatest work, "The Messiah," though possessing much sublimity, did not fulfill the high expectations of his countrymen, who predicted that it would eclipse the "Paradise Lost" of Milton. Like Milton's great work, it is said to be more commonly praised than read. Margaret, his first wife, whom he married in 1754, and who died in 1758, was a woman of kindred genius and literary accomplishments. Among her productions are—"The Death of Abel," a tragedy, and "Letters from the Dead to the Living."

KLUPFEL (klup'fel), ENGELBERT, who was born in 1733 near Wurtzburg, was educated at that place, and after a short experience with the Augustinians, he retired from the order and entered on a course of philosophy at Freiburg. After he was ordained, he held chairs in philosophy and theology in Mannerstadt, Obendorf, Mentz and Constance. In 1768 he was assigned a chair at Freiburg by the Austrian court with a view to repress the Jesuits, who retaliated by charging him with holding Jansenist views. The empress Maria Theresa recognized his great literary effort, and tendered him aid in his vast undertaking of the "Ecclesiastical Treasury," in seven volumes. In 1776 he brought the wrath of some Romanists on him because of a work on "Indulgences," and he was blamed as being a second Luther; and with the Protestants he also became involved by his recension of Semler's institutes. He wrote on Isaiah vii. 14, on marriage as held by Tertullian, but his "Institutes of Dogmatic Theology" form his greatest work. He died in 1811.

KNAPP (nap), ALBERT, a German poet and author of many of the best modern German hymns, was born in Wurtemberg, in 1798. He studied for the Church, and was the principal clergyman in Stuttgart until his death, June 18, 1864. Knapp has breathed a new life into that long-neglected branch of poetry, the religious hymn. His chief publications are—"Christian Hymns" and "Evangelical Songs for Church and Home."

KNAPP, GEORG CHRISTIAN, a distinguished German theologian, was born in 1753, at Glaucha, near Halle, his father being director of the celebrated orphan asylum and educational institute in this town. His studies were carried on first in the school and afterward in the university of his native town. During a single session he studied at Gottingen. In 1777 he was appointed professor extraordinary of theology at Halle, and in 1782 was placed on the staff of ordinary professors. In 1785 he was also appointed, along with Niemeyer, to the directorate of the institution at Glaucha, and in the division of labor the superintendence of the Bible and missionary department fell to his lot. The duties of these several offices he discharged with honor to himself and to the credit of his university during nearly half a century. He died in 1825. In theology he ranks amongst the expounders and defenders of a Biblical supranaturalism, in opposition to the doctrines of the rationalistic school. Tholuck has described him as the latest offshoot of the old theological school of Halle. His chief Biblical works are—"A Translation of the Book of Psalms, with comments," and a very carefully edited and useful edition of the Greek Testament.

KNATCHBULL (knach'bul), SIR NORTON, an English baronet, and the representative of an ancient family settled at Mersham Hatch, in Kent, was born in 1601. He was a man of considerable erudition, and devoted himself with some success to the exposition of the New Testament. In 1659 he gave to the world "Observations on the Books of the New Testament," which speedily went through a considerable number of editions, and was reprinted both at Amsterdam and Frankfurt. Knatchbull's remarks are sensible and show very fair learning, but they are entirely wanting in depth, and we cannot read them without wonder at the small amount of knowledge which procured for their author such a widespread reputation. He died in 1684, and was buried at Mersham, his epitaph attributing to him the eloquence of Cicero and Chrysostom and the judgment of Varo and Jerome.

KNEADING-TROUGH (kneed'ing troff), Ex. viii. 3. See BREAD.

KNEPH (nef) is an Egyptian word which signifies "spirit" or "water," and it is the oldest name of the Deity among the ancient dwellers on the Nile. The title appears as "knuphis" and "Num" or "Nef." Perhaps the name has reference to the fact stated in the Hebrew Cosmogony, that "the Spirit of God moved on the face of the waters." At Thebes this was the god which alone was held to be immortal, as all the others were subject to change. In his image a snake is introduced in the form of a ring to indicate his eternal existence. Kneph was specially the god of Upper Egypt, and he was usually depicted as a man with a ram's head and other symbols. There are representations of Kneph engaged at a potter's wheel making the limbs of Osiris, and the god of the Nile is assisting him by pouring water on the clay. The egg, and an egg between the head and tail of a serpent, are also his emblems, indicating his undervalued existence and his being the source and cause of productiveness.

KNIB (nib), WILLIAM, an eminent Baptist missionary, was born at Kettering, Northamptonshire, in 1803. He was at first apprenticed to a printer in Bristol, but in 1825 he succeeded his brother as teacher of a mission school in Jamaica. A few years later he became pastor of the church at Falmouth, in the island, and was very successful as a preacher. His efforts in behalf of the slaves, however, brought him into trouble, and he suffered a short imprisonment. He afterward paid several visits to England, and was one of the most eloquent and effectual of the abolitionists, carrying on his missionary labors zealously. He died in 1845.

KNIFE (nife). Knives were made variously of flint, bone, copper, iron and steel. At first perhaps a single knife, worn in the girdle—a practice still almost universal in the East—was sufficient for all general purposes. But in course of time knives of various shapes and purposes were multiplied. In sacrificing, one was used to kill the victim; there was another, rounded at the top to the fourth of a circle, for flaying it, and a third for dissecting the carcass. Knives were little used at meals, and still meat is usually divided with the fingers.

KNIGHT (nite), JOEL ABRAHAM, who has been recognized as one of the missionary Fathers in consequence of his having been one of the founders of the great London Missionary Society, was born in 1754, at Hull, in Yorkshire. In 1788 he was the preacher at Pentonville Chapel, in London, and thence he was sent to the great tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road, where he remained until his death, in 1808. He was an excellent preacher and a most pious, devoted man. In his theology he insisted with peculiar emphasis on the two facts that, while man is saved through grace, when grace reigns in the soul it is always manifested by godly living and holiness of life. His sermons were published before his death.

KNIGHT, SAMUEL, D.D., an Episcopal minister who became chaplain to George II. and archdeacon of Berkshire, was born in London in 1675, and educated at St. Paul's School and subsequently in Trinity, in Cambridge. His first living was in Cambridgeshire, at Borough Green. He was afterward made rector of Bluntesham, in the adjoining county of Huntingdon, and prebendary in the cathedral at Ely. In 1730 he became court chaplain, and archdeacon in 1735. He wrote a "Life of Dr. John Coles, Dean of St. Paul's," a "Life of Erasmus," and Sermons, which were published between the years 1721 and 1738. He died in the year 1746.

KNIGHTHOOD (nī'thood). The institution of knighthood, as conferred by investiture, and with certain oaths and ceremonies, arose gradually throughout Europe as an adjunct of the feudal system. The character of the knight was at once military and religious. The defence and recovery of the Holy Sepulchre and the protection of pilgrims were the objects to which, in the early times of the institution, he especially devoted himself. The system of knight-service, introduced into England by William the Conqueror, empowered the king, or even a superior lord who was a subject, to compel every holder of a certain extent of land, called a knight's fee, to become a member of the knightly order, his investiture being accounted proof that he possessed the requisite knightly arms and was sufficiently trained in their use.

The ceremonies practiced in conferring knighthood have varied at different periods. In general, fasting and bathing were in early times necessary preparations. In the eleventh century the creation of a knight was preceded by solemn confession and a midnight vigil in the church, and followed by the reception of the eucharist. The new knight offered his sword on the altar, to signify his devotion to the Church and a determination to lead a holy life. The sword was redeemed in a sum of money, had a benediction pronounced over it, and was girded on by the highest ecclesiastic present. The title was conferred by binding the sword and spurs on the candidate, after which a blow was dealt him on the cheek or shoulder, as the last affront which he was to receive unrequited. He then took an oath to protect the distressed, maintain right against might, and never by word or deed to stain his character as a knight or a Christian. A knight might be degraded for the infringement of any part of his oath, in which case his spurs were chopped off with a hatchet, his sword broken, his escutcheon reversed, and some religious observances were added, during which each piece of armor was taken off in succession and cast from the recreant knight.

KNIPSTRO (nīp'stro), JOHN, a German Reformer, was born May 1, 1497, at Sandow, in Silesia, and received his education at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. He was a member of the order of Franciscans; but having read the works of Luther, he soon adopted the views of the latter, and through his public preaching nearly the whole town became his followers. He was obliged, therefore, to seek refuge from the Romish authorities by flight, first to Stettin, thence to Stargard and Stralsund. In 1547 he was made rector of the university of Griefswald, in which he had been professor since 1539. He died October 4, 1556.

KNITTEL (nīt'tel), FRANZ ANTON, a theologian of Germany, was born at Salzdalum, April 3, 1721, and died April 13, 1792. In 1756 he discovered in the library at Wolfenbuttel a manuscript containing some fragments of the Epistles to the Romans in the Gothic version of Ulfias. The manuscript is a palimpsest, the newer surface being occupied with the Origines and some letters of Isidorus Hispalensis. The portions of the Gothic version of the Epistle to the Romans contained in it are, ch. xi. 33-36; xii. 1-5, 17-21; xiii. 1-5; xiv. 9-20; xv. 3-13, and were printed by Knittel. The text is printed on one side of the page in Gothic letters. Under each word is Knittel's reading of it in italics, and under that a Latin translation of each. On the other side there is a Latin version found in the Codex, under that the reading in the Vulgate, and under that the Greek text. The volume contains also two fragments from ancient Greek codices of the New Testament in the Wolfenbuttel library, and a copious critical commentary by Knittel. The book is altogether a splendid one, but its literary merits are not quite equal to its sumptuous appearance. Knittel was not a man of large endowments; his knowledge of Gothic was imperfect, and he was too fond of miscellaneous literature to be very profound or exact in any one department of knowledge. He deserves, however, the praise of great laboriousness, and his honest endeavors to make his work worthy of the acceptance of scholars have enabled him to collect a vast amount of curious matter not elsewhere to be found.

KNOLLIS (nol'lis), FRANCIS, an English statesman, was born at Grays, in Oxfordshire, and educated at Oxford; and when introduced at the court of Edward VI., he was distinguished for his zeal in the cause of the Reformation. He was author of a treatise against the "Usurpation of Papal Bishops." He died in 1596.

KNOP (nop), an ornament of the golden candlestick, Ex. xxv. 31; probably formed like a pomegranate. Also a carved ornament of the cedar work of the temple and the molten sea, 1 Ki. vi. 18, perhaps like wild gourds or cucumbers.

KNOTT (not), EDWARD, a learned English Jesuit, whose real name was Matthias Wilson, and who is chiefly known by the part which he sustained in the controversy with Chillingworth, was born at Pegsworth, in Northumberland, in 1580. Having already taken priest's orders, he entered among the Jesuits in 1606. He taught divinity at the English College at Rome, and was afterward appointed provincial of England. He died in London in 1656. He was the author of several controversial works, in which he displayed great acuteness and learning. It was in answer to him that Chillingworth wrote his "Religion of the Protestants," to which Knott rejoined by a work entitled "Infidelity Unmasked," in which the latitude of principle displayed by his opponent afforded him several advantages.

KNOWLEDGE (nol'ej), THE TREE OF, a tree placed in the midst of the garden of Eden, possibly in some conspicuous part, of which man was not to eat and not to touch it, under the penalty of death, Gen. ii. 9, 17; iii. 3. It must have been a literal tree, the prohibition against the use of which is not so unreasonable as some are pleased to consider it. For many commandments, afterward given to the world when replenished with inhabitants, were quite inapplicable to the circumstances of a single pair in possession of all their eyes beheld. And it may be added that if the Deity had devised any other kind of test of the obedience of his creatures certain critics would have equally found some ground of objection. We need not try to discover the species of this tree. Naturally the food was wholesome and the aspect of it pleasant, and it had, according to the tempter, marvelous virtue. More than this we cannot know. It was called the tree of knowledge of good and evil, not because God would know by the result of the trial whether man would cleave to good or make choice of evil, but rather because Adam, if he ate, would know—that is, have a practical and experimental acquaintance with—good and evil. Bush is of opinion that the term "tree" is used as a noun of multitude, so that trees of life and of knowledge were interspersed throughout the garden, that Adam might be constantly reminded of the terms on which he held his happiness.

KNOWLES (nōlz), JAMES SHERIDAN, dramatist and theologian, was born at Cork, in 1784. At an early age he was taken to London, where he became acquainted with many of the prominent literary characters of the day, and began writing dramatic pieces, in some of which he acted, but not with full success; and he frequently gave popular lectures. In his old age he became a Baptist preacher and polemical theologian, making speeches at Exeter Hall, and publishing "The Rock of Rome" and "The Idol demolished by its own Priests." He died at Torquay in 1862.

KNOWLES, THOMAS, a learned and pious divine, was born in 1723 at Ely, and educated at the school there and at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow. He was made lecturer of Bury St. Edmunds and prebendary of Ely cathedral. He wrote, among other works, "The Scripture Doctrine of the Existence and Attributes of a God" and "Primitive Christianity in Defence of the Trinity." He died in 1802.

KNOX (nox), JOHN, the great champion of the Scottish Reformation, was born in 1505, at Gifford, in East Lothian, and was educated at St.

Andrew's. Having been converted from the Romish faith, he became a zealous preacher of the new doctrines. Notwithstanding the opposition he met with from the clergy, he every day grew bolder in the cause, until the castle of St. Andrew's surrendered to the French in July, 1547, when he was carried with the garrison into France, and remained a prisoner on board the galleys until the latter end of 1549. Being then set at liberty, he passed over to England, and arriving in London, was licensed either by Cranmer or the Protector Somerset, and appointed preacher first at Berwick and afterwards at New Castle. In 1552 he was appointed chaplain to Edward VI., and preached before the king at Westminster, who recommended Cranmer to give him the living of All Hallows, in London, which Knox declined, not choosing to conform to the English liturgy. On the accession of Queen Mary he went to Geneva, and next to Frankfort, where he took part with the English exiles, who opposed the use of the liturgy; but the other side prevailing, Knox returned to Geneva, and soon after went to Scotland. While engaged in the ministry, he received an invitation to return to Geneva, with which he complied; and in his absence the bishops passed sentence of death upon him for heresy, against which he drew up an energetic appeal. In 1558 he published his treatise, entitled the "First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women," chiefly aimed at the cruel government of Queen Mary of England, and at the attempt of the queen regent of Scotland to rule without a parliament. In April, 1559, he would have visited England, but was prevented by the resentment felt by Elizabeth at his late treatise. He therefore proceeded directly to Scotland, where he found a persecution of the Protestants just ready to commence at Stirling. He hurried to the scene of action to share the danger, and mounting a pulpit, aroused the people by a vehement address against idolatry. The strength of his appeal, aided by the indiscretion of a priest, who immediately on the conclusion of this discourse was preparing to celebrate mass, precipitated his hearers into a general attack on the churches of the city, in which the altars were overturned, the paintings and finest works of architecture destroyed, the images broken and the monasteries almost leveled to the ground. From that time forward he never ceased to promote, by all the means in his power, the cause he had espoused. Like other men of great powers and clear discernment who have lived in days of darkness when light begins to break forth, Knox has been misunderstood, and misrepresented as a ferocious and unamiable bigot. It has remained for the historians of the present age to recognize his greatness and to do justice to his work and character. He was the Luther of Scotland and the Calvin of Geneva, and but for him his native land would have been involved in confusion, from which, because of the clearness of his views, it was happily set free. After his death appeared his "History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realms of Scotland." He died November 24, and was buried at Edinburgh, several lords attending; and when he was laid in the grave, the earl of Morton, that day chosen regent, exclaimed, "There lies he who never feared the face of man."

KNOX, VICESSIMUS, D.D., an eminent author and an eloquent preacher, was born in 1752, and received his education at Merchant Taylors' School and St. John's College, Oxford. On the death of his father he was chosen his successor in the head-mastership of Tunbridge grammar school, over which he presided with great reputation thirty-three years. In theological and classical learning he excelled most of his contemporaries; in an acquaintance with polite literature he was surpassed by none. He held the living of Ramsden, in Essex, and the chaperly of Shipbourne, in Kent, at which latter place and at Tunbridge he for many years officiated. His chief works consist of—"Essays, Moral, and Literary," "Liberal Education," "Winter Evenings," "Sermons," and a pamphlet on the "National Importance of a Classical Education." He died in 1821.

KNUTZEN (nutz'en), MATTHAIS, a formal professor of atheism of the seventeenth century. He was a native of Holstein, but first broached his opinions at Konigsberg, in Prussia; and in consequence of assuming that all ideas of God and religion should be laid aside, and the dictates of reason and conscience be alone pursued, his followers were denominated Conscientiarists. He gave the substance of his doctrines in a letter dated from Rome, from which it appears that he denied the existence of both a good and evil principle, deemed churches and priests useless, and held that there is no life beyond the present, for which conscience is a sufficient guide. He died probably about 1678.

KOA (ko'a). This word is found only in Ezek. xxiii. 23, where it is used with shoa, "wealthy," in paronomasia.

KOBUDAISI (ko-bu-di'si), a Japanese Buddhist, was born in 774. He early devoted himself to religious studies, for that purpose traveling to China and Hindoostan, where he obtained books and information. Through his preaching the Japanese emperor became a convert to Buddhism. He died in 835.

KOCH (kokh), JOHN HENRY, a Methodist minister, was born February 14, 1807, in Wollmar, Germany. In 1834 he came to America, and in 1845, as a member of the Kentucky conference, began preaching among the German Methodists in the West. He was a zealous minister, and his preaching was attended with encouraging results. He died October 1, 1871.

KOFFLER (kof'ler), JOHN, a Roman Catholic missionary of whose early life very little is known. In 1740 he went to Cochin China, where, after a residence of fourteen years, he was arrested with several other missionaries and carried to Portugal. Through the intervention of Maria Theresa he was released in 1765, and went to Transylvania, where he died in 1780.

KOHATH (ko'hath), one of the sons of Levi, from whom the great Kohathite branch of that tribe was descended, Gen. xlvi. 11.

KOHATHITES (ko'hath-ites), one of the three great families of the tribe of Levi, descended from Kohath, Levi's son, distinguished into four branches, Amramites, Izeharites, Hebronites and Uzzielites, after Kohath's four sons, and comprising at the first census eight thousand six hundred males from a month old, two thousand seven hundred and fifty between the ages of thirty and fifty. They were to encamp in the wilderness on the south side of the tabernacle, and were to have charge of the ark, and the table, and the candlestick, and the altars, and the vessels of the sanctuary, and the service thereof, Num. iii. 27-31; iv. 2-15, 34-37. These, when they were covered by the priests, the Kohathites carried on their shoulders on a march; and therefore not any of the wagons given by the princes were apportioned to them, Num. vii. 9. When the Israelites entered Canaan, the priests who were sons of Kohath had thirteen cities allotted them in Judah, Benjamin and Simeon, and the rest of the Kohathites, ranking from their closer connection with the priests as first of the Levites, ten cities from the territories of Ephraim, Dan and Western Manasseh, Josh. xxi. 4, 5, 20-26; 1 Chr. vi. 61, 66-70. Their service was afterward arranged with that of the other Levitical families by David, when the whole were divided into courses and had special offices assigned, 1 Chr. xxv., xxvi.

KOHEN (ko'en), NAPHTHALI, a Polish rabbi, was born about 1660, at Ostraw. In early life he followed the occupation of a shepherd, but his mental impulses manifested themselves, and he became proficient in cabalistic learning as well as the Talmud. He was afterward chief rabbi at Posen, and enjoyed an extraordinary reputation for the possession of cabalistic powers, which having been unsuccessfully put to the test during a conflagration in the Jews' quarter at Frankfort-on-the-Main, he was obliged to flee from the popular indignation, and he ended his days in his native place.

KOHLER (ko'ler), CHRISTIAN and JEROME, two enthusiasts of the eighteenth century, were born at Brugglen, and led a vagrant sort of life till their conversion during a revival in 1745. They pretended to have supernatural revelations, and to have the power of saving souls from purgatory. They had large numbers of disciples, and for purposes of mere gain shamefully imposed upon popular credulity, but their career was cut short. On January 16, 1753, Jerome was executed, and his brother was about the same time taken prisoner, but there is no account of his fate.

KOLAIAH (ko-la'yah). 1. A Benjamite, Neh. xi. 7. 2. The father of the false prophet Ahab, Jer. xxix. 21.

KOLLAR (kol'lar), JAN, one of the most conspicuous Slavic poets and scholars, was born in 1793, at Moschowze, in Hungary, studied at Presburg and Jena, and in 1819 became pastor of a Protestant congregation at Pesth. His first work was a volume of songs and poems; this was followed by his "Daughter of Glory," regarded by his countrymen as his greatest work. His fame, however, rests more on his being one of the earliest and most zealous advocates of Panslavism. The work in which this tendency first appears is entitled "Literary Mutuality between the Races and Dialects of the Slavic Nation." The revolution in Hungary compelled him to abandon his country. He withdrew to Vienna, where he was made professor of archaeology in 1849. He died January 29, 1852.

KOLLOCK (kol'lok), HENRY, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at New Providence, New Jersey, December 14, 1778, and pursued his studies at the college of New Jersey, where he graduated in 1794. After serving a few years as tutor in his Alma Mater, he preached for a brief period at Princeton, and delivered a course of sermons on the life and character of St. Peter which attracted considerable attention at the time. He removed thence to Elizabethtown, returned to Princeton for three years, and in 1806 became pastor of the Independent Presbyterian church at Savannah, Georgia. He died December 29, 1819.

KOMANDER (ko-mand'er), JOHANN, the chief promoter of the Reformation in the Bunden region, left the Romish Church and priesthood in 1525. At the Bundestag held at Ilanz during the previous year there had been presented a complaint against the vices of the clergy, and Komander was in consequence appointed to the charge of Saint Martin's Church, where he labored for thirty-three years in the face of malignant opposition, though his efforts were highly successful. He died in 1557.

KOPPE (kop'pe), JOHANN BENJAMIN, an eminent Biblical scholar, was born at Dantzig, August 19, 1750. He received his early education in the gymnasium of his native city, and afterward studied at Leipzig and at Gottingen. In 1774 he was appointed to the chair of Greek in the recently formed gymnasium of Mittau. In 1776 he was called to a chair of theology in Gottingen, to which were shortly afterward added the offices of preacher to the university and director of the seminary for preachers. In 1784 he was invited to Gotha, and to the high offices of superintendent-general, counselor of the superior consistory and chief pastor. In 1788 he was appointed preacher to the court and counselor of the consistory at Hanover. He died February 12, 1791. Koppe is chiefly known by the edition of the New Testament which he projected. The first volume, containing the Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians and Thessalonians, was intended to exhibit the plan of the entire work. It contained a corrected text, the more important various readings, prolegomena, philological notes and excursus on those passages and phrases which needed a more lengthened discussion. His purpose was to supply the Biblical student with the same kind of assistance toward the determination of the grammatical sense of the writings of the New Testament as was provided for the classical student in the better editions of the Greek and Roman authors. Accordingly, he abstained from all doctrinal discussions, and labored chiefly to illustrate the phraseology, to explain historical and archaeological references and to exhibit the order of the writer's thoughts. Koppe's early death prevented the completion of his purpose.

KORAH (ko'rah). 1. A son of Esau of whom nothing further is known, Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14. 2. A son of Eliphaz, and of an Edomitish tribe of which he was the head, Gen. xxxvi. 16. 3. A Levite, son of Izhar, and grandson of Kohath, Ex. vi. 18, 21, 24. Korah is notable as a ringleader of a rebellion excited, in conjunction with Dathan and Abiram, against Moses and Aaron. These conspirators were fearfully punished. The earth opened and swallowed Dathan and Abiram, with their immediate adherents, while two hundred and fifty who offered incense, together with Korah, perished by fire. Korah's children, however, survived, not being partakers in his guilt, Num. xvi.; 1 Chr. vi. 22, 37. Some discrepancy has been imagined in the history given of Korah's rebellion, but the charge cannot be sustained. Indeed, Professor Blunt has shown that there are minute coincidences which go to prove the exact accuracy of the sacred writer. Korah is called "Core" in Jude 11. 4. A descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 43.

KORAHITE, KORHITE or KORATHITE (ko'rath-ite), a descendant of Korah, used of those who are usually called sons of Korah. To them was assigned an important part in the conducting of the temple music. They had also the office of keeping the door in the temple assigned to them. The appointment of the Korahites to this office dated from the time of David.

Of the Psalms, several, Ps. xlii., xlix., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii., are inscribed "for the sons of Korah." Whether this implies that they were the composers of these Psalms, or merely that they received them to set them to music or to sing them in the temple service, is matter of dispute. These psalms are marked by peculiar elevation of sentiment and poetical power.

KORAN (ko'ran), a term first applied to every single portion of Mohammed's "Revelations;" at a later period used for a greater number of these; and finally for their whole body, gathered together into the one book which forms the religious, social, civil, commercial, military and legal code of Islam. The Koran is, according to the Moslem creed, coeval with God, uncreated, eternal. Its first transcript was written from the beginning in rays of light upon a gigantic tablet resting by the throne of the Almighty; and upon this tablet are also found the divine decrees relating to things past and future. A copy of it in a book bound in white silk, jewels and gold was brought down to the lowest heaven by the angel Gabriel, in the blissful and mysterious night of Al-Khadr, in the month of Ramadan. Portions of it were during a space of twenty-three years communicated to Mohammed, both at Mecca and Medina, either by Gabriel in human shape, "with the sound of bells," or through inspirations from the Holy Ghost "in the prophet's breast," or by God himself, "veiled and unveiled, in waking or in the dreams of night."

Mohammed dictated his inspirations to a scribe in finished chapters, and from this copy the followers of the prophet procured other copies, unless they preferred learning the oracles by heart from the master's own mouth. The original fragments were, without any attempt at arrangement, promiscuously thrown into a box, and a certain number were entirely lost. A year after the death of Mohammed the scattered portions were collected and faithfully copied, without the slightest attempt at moulding them into shape or sequence, together with all the variants, the repetitions and the gaps.

This volume was entrusted to the keeping of one of the prophet's wives. A second digest was made in the thirtieth year of the Hejirah, by Calif Othman, not for the sake of arranging and correcting the text, but in order to restore its unity, many different readings being current among the believers. He ordered new copies to be made from the original fragments, in which all the variants were to be expunged, but without any further alteration, and the old copies were all consigned to the flames: With respect to the succession of the single chapters—one hundred and fourteen in number—no attempt was made at establishing continuity, but they were placed side by side according to their respective lengths; so that immediately after the exordium follows the longest chapter, and the others are ranged after it in decreasing size. They are not numbered in the manuscripts, but bear distinctive, often strange sounding, headings, as, the Cow, Congealed Blood, the Fig, the Star, the Towers, Saba, the Poets, etc. taken from a particular matter or person treated of in the respective chapters. Every chapter begins with the introductory formula, "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate." It is further stated at the beginning whether the chapter was revealed at Mecca or at Medina.

As to the contents of the Koran, it may be briefly stated here that the chief doctrine laid down in it is the unity of God and the existence of but one true religion, with changeable ceremonies. When mankind turned from it at different times, God sent prophets to lead them back to truth, Moses, Christ and Mohammed being the most distinguished. Both punishments for the sinner and rewards for the pious are depicted with great diffuseness, and exemplified chiefly by stories taken from the Bible, the Apocryphal writings and the Midrash. Special laws and directions, admonition to moral and divine virtues, more particularly to a complete and unconditional resignation to God's will, legends, principally relating to the patriarchs and almost without exception borrowed from the Jewish writings, form the bulk of the book, which throughout bears the most palpable traces of Jewish influence, evidenced by the frequency of ideas and notions taken bodily, with their Arabicized designations, from Judaism. The general tendency and aim of the Koran is found pretty clearly indicated in the beginning of the second chapter: "This is the book in which there is no doubt; a guidance for the pious who believe in the mysteries of faith who perform their prayers, give alms from what we have bestowed upon them, who believe in the revelation which we made unto thee, which was sent down to the prophets before thee, and who believe in the future life." To unite the three principal religious forms which he found in his time and country—viz., Judaism, Christianity and Paganism—into one was Mohammed's ideal, and the Koran, properly read, discloses constantly the alternate flatteries and threats aimed at each of the three parties. No less are certain abrogations on the part of the prophet himself of special passages in the Koran due to the vacillating relation in which he at first stood to the different creeds and the concessions first made and then revoked.

The language of the Koran is of surpassing elegance and purity—so much so that it has become the ideal of Arabic classicality; and no human pen is supposed to be capable of producing anything similar—a circumstance adduced by Mohammed himself as a clear proof of his mission. The style varies considerably, sometimes concise and bold, sublime and majestic, impassionate and harmonious; it at other times becomes verbose, sententious, obscure, tame and prosy; and on this difference modern investigators have endeavored to form a chronological arrangement of the Koran whenever other dates fail. But none of these attempts can ever be successful. Full manhood, approaching age and declining vigor are not things so easily traced in the writings of a man like Mohammed. The Koran is written in prose, yet the two or more links of which generally a sentence is composed rhyme with each other—a peculiarity of speech used by the ancient soothsayers of Arabia, only that Mohammed used his own discretion in remodeling its form and freeing it from conventional fetters; and thus the rhyme of the Koran became an entirely distinctive rhyme. Refrains are introduced in some chapters, and plays upon words are not disdained.

The outward reverence in which the Koran is held throughout Mohammedanism is exceedingly great. It is never held below the girdle, never touched without previous purification, and an injunction to that effect is generally found on the cover which overlaps the boards, according to Eastern binding. It is consulted on weighty matters, sentences from it are inscribed on banners, doors, etc. Great lavishness is also displayed upon the material and binding of the sacred volume. The copies for the wealthy are sometimes written in gold, and the covers blaze with gold and precious stones. Nothing also is more hateful in the eyes of a Moslem than to see the book in the hands of an unbeliever.

KOZ (koz), a priest, head of one of the courses, 1 Chr. xxiv. 10. The article is prefixed, and here our translators have given it as part of the name Hakkoz. But in other places where descendants of this person are mentioned, Ezra ii. 61; Neh. iii. 4, 21; vii. 63, our version has rightly Koz. It appears that the pedigree of the family was not accurately preserved.

KRANTZ (krantz), ALBERT, a celebrated historian and divine, was born at Hamburg toward the middle of the fifteenth century. He received a classical education, and after traveling for improvement became professor of canon law and theology in the university of Rostock, and rector of it in 1482. He was made doctor in theology about 1490, and removing to Hamburg, was elected dean of the cathedral there. He died in 1517. Among his writings are—"History of the Vandals," "Ecclesiastical History of the Saxons."

KRASINSKI (kra-sin'ske), COUNT VALE-RIAN, a scion of an illustrious Polish family that had early adopted the Protestant religion, was born about 1780. Being possessed of great natural abilities, improved and matured by a thorough education, he was appointed one of the chief officials in the bureau of public instruction for Poland. He strenuously exerted himself to promote education among the various classes of dissenters, and with a view to this introduced, at great personal expense, the process of stereotyping. When the Poles rebelled in 1830 and set up an independent government, Krasinski was sent as their representative to London, where he remained as an exile for twenty years, and then removed to Edinburgh, where he died, December 22, 1855. Being a man of extensive learning, and possessing a profound knowledge of the history and literature of the Slavonic nations, his works are of considerable authority. The chief of them are—"The Rise, Progress and Decline of the Reformation in Poland," "Lectures on the Religious History of the Slavonic Nations," together with several religious works and political pamphlets on the subject of Poland.

KRAUSE (krows), JOHANN FRIEDRICH, D.D., professor of theology at Königsberg, was born at Reichenbach, October 26, 1770, and died March 31, 1820. His Biblical writings consist of several academical programmes, two on the Epistle of the Philippians, one on the First Epistle of Peter and four on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, besides some discussions pertaining to philosophy and theology.

KREBS (krebz), JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a German theologian, was born at Bayreuth, March 5, 1651. He studied at Jena, and became rector of the gymnasium at Heilsbrunn in 1675, where he afterward filled the posts of professor of theology and Hebrew and inspector. He died August 16, 1721. He was a copious writer, and his works embrace natural and moral philosophy, historical and political science and theology. His only direct contribution to Biblical literature is a work on the first five chapters of Genesis, illustrated from the Syriac, Chaldee, Persian, Æthiopic and other Oriental languages.

KREBS, JOHANN TOBIAS, a German theologian, was born at Buttstadt in 1718. From his twentieth year he studied theology and philology at Leipsic, where, in 1740, he became magister, and read lectures on the New Testament. He died in 1782, rector of the furstenschule at Grimma. He was the compiler of a work of considerable value for the illustration of the facts and language of the New Testament, "The Utility of Roman History in the Interpretation of the New Testament."

KRUDENER (kroo'de-ner), BARBARA JULIANA VON, a noted religious enthusiast, was the daughter of the Russian count Wittowkoff, governor of Riga, where she was born in 1765. At an early age she married Baron Krudener, the Russian ambassador to the court of Berlin, and subsequently to Venice. Here the secretary of legation fell in love with her and committed suicide, on which event she wrote a romance, entitled "Valorie," which created a considerable sensation. After many adventures she went to Berlin, where she was admitted to the close intimacy of the queen Louisa, of all whose projects she was the confidante and sharer. The shock occasioned by the death of this princess is said to have disturbed the balance of Madame von Krudener's mind, and from that date she became a zealous disciple of the celebrated pietist Jung, and ultimately gave herself up to religious mysticism in its most exaggerated form. From Berlin she removed to Paris, where she appeared as a prophetess and the herald of a new religious era; and she attracted such notice by the fulfillment of certain of her predictions of public events—as of the fall of Napoleon, his return from Elba and the final crisis of Waterloo—as to obtain access to the emperor Alexander, and eventually to acquire much influence over him. Her gigantic schemes for the elevation of the social and moral condition of the world caused her to appear a dangerous character in the eyes of persons in authority, and she was obliged to withdraw from France and other countries in succession. In consequence, she retired to one of her paternal estates near Riga, where she entered into relations with the Moravian Brethren, but her restless disposition soon carried her into fresh enterprises, the latest of which was the formation of a great correctional establishment in the Crimea for the reformation of criminals and persons of evil life. In the midst of her efforts for this object she died, December 13, 1824.

KRUG (kroog), WILHELM TRAUOGT, a celebrated Prussian philosopher, was born June 22, 1770, at Radis, and was educated at the university at Wittenberg, where he afterward held the position of adjunct professor. In 1801 he was appointed to the department of philosophy in the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and while there he brought out the work on which his fame chiefly rests—"Fundamental Philosophy." In this work he promulgated a system which he styled "transcendental synthetism," the object of which he professed to be the reconciliation of realism and idealism. Upon the death of Kant he was made professor of logic and metaphysics at Königsberg. From 1809 to 1831 he was professor of philosophy at Leipzig, where he died, January 13, 1842.

KRUMMACHER (krum'ma-kher), FRIEDRICH ADOLPH, a German religious writer, whose "Parables" and many other works are well known in this country, was born at Techlenburg in 1768, and became successively minister of Crefeld, Kellwick and Bernberg, and ended a long and useful career as an efficient preacher and writer at Bremen, 1845, where he had labored for twenty-one years.

KRUMMACHER, FRIEDRICH WILHELM, the son of F. A. Krummacher, a popular and eloquent clergyman of Germany, was born in 1796, at Mors on the Rhine. According to the usual German custom, he was trained at the Gymnasium, after which he prosecuted his studies at Halle, entering the university in 1815. Among his instructors he had Gesenius, De Wette, Wegscheider and Knapp. From Halle he went to Jena with excited hopes that he would profit in philosophy and theology under Fries and Schott; but he was miserably disappointed, and he left it on record that "nothing remained but to seek refuge from this spiritual famine in reading." He settled in 1819 at Frankfort-on-the-Main in a German Reformed congregation. Four years afterward he removed to Ruhort, near Dusseldorf, where he remained but a short time. After nine years' ministry at Gemarke, he was called in 1834 to Elberfeldt, and during his pastorate at that place he declined an urgent call to a professor's chair at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, and after his declination the place was happily filled by the Rev. Dr. Schaff. By this time his fame as a preacher had spread over Germany, and in 1847 Frederick William IV. of Prussia brought him to Trinity Church, in Berlin, as the pulpit was vacant by the death of Marheinecke. In 1849 he was made court-preacher at Potsdam, where the royal family sojourns during summer. He had now reached the summit of earthly promotion, and his life was spent in disseminating among the upper classes the evangelical views which he had so earnestly proclaimed during all the years of his ministry. He was a splendid orator, fluent in diction, fertile and vivid in imagination, with a flexible and yet powerful voice; his commanding presence arrested attention, while his fervid appeals affected all audiences as only the utterances of real eloquence can make men feel. He distinguished himself by his zeal for old Lutheranism, and also as an opponent of the rationalists. He was a voluminous writer, and some of his works, particularly his discourses on the history of Elijah the Tishbite, have not only acquired a great popularity in Germany, but by means of translations they have had an immense circulation in Great Britain and America. Along with this may be named his discourses on the "Life of Elisha." He died December 19, 1868.

KUFIC WRITING, an ancient form of Arabic characters which came into use shortly before Mohammed, in which the first copies of the Koran were written. The alphabet was arranged like the Hebrew and Syriac, and this order, though now superseded by another, is still used for numerical purposes.

KUHLMANN (kūl'man), QUIRINUS, a visionary enthusiast of Germany, was born in 1651, at Breslau. In early life he was a youth of great promise; and when only fifteen years of age, he wrote a treatise on ethics and a book of epigrams; but being attacked with a severe illness in his eighteenth year, his brain became affected, and on the recovery of his bodily strength his diseased imagination gave vent to the wildest absurdities.

He pretended to have acquired the faculty of foreknowledge and of holding communion with invisible spirits. These day-dreams acquired additional force from the perusal of Jacob Behmen's works, which he met with in Holland, while, the more to confirm him in his extravagances, there appeared in the same country one John Rothe, a self-styled prophet. To this fanatic Kuhlmann dedicated a treatise, in which he expressed the utmost faith in his pretensions and the most unbounded veneration for his person. His thoughts, however, appear not to have been so exclusively confined to spiritual subjects as he would have had it believed, for he was neither averse to the pleasures of the table nor to female society of equivocal description. After visiting several parts of Europe, he traveled into the East, till on his return through Russia one of his prophecies was of a nature so distasteful to the government there that he was seized and brought to the stake, at which he perished with the fortitude of a martyr, October 3, 1689.

KUINOEL (kwe'nol), CHRISTIANUS THEOPHILUS, a German theologian, was born in Leipzig, January 2, 1763, and educated at the university of his native city. After taking the double degree of D.D. and Ph. D., he commenced to deliver, as a privat-docent, courses of lectures on Greek and Latin philosophy, and on Biblical exegesis. In 1790 he was appointed extraordinary professor of philosophy, and in 1796 preacher at St. Paul's, the university church. In 1801 he was appointed to the chair of poetry and eloquence in the university of Giessen, and in 1806 to one of the theological chairs. He died at Giessen, October 15, 1841. He was a man greatly beloved by his students, and distinguished by the power of securing the strong attachment of persons of various sentiments. His published works are numerous. Of those which are devoted to the elucidation of the Scriptures, the following are the most important: "Commentary on the Historical Books of the New Testament," "Metrical Translation of the Psalms, with Comments," and "Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews." Kuinoel's commentaries are still valuable for the stores of philological learning which they contain, but are wanting in spiritual insight.

KUSTER (kus'ter), LUDOLPH, one of the ablest Greek scholars of his day, was born at Blomberg, in Westphalia, in 1670, and educated at the Joachim College at Berlin. The attention attracted by his ability as a student obtained for him the reversion of a professorship in the college. While waiting for a vacancy he visited many of the chief seats of learning in Europe, consulting libraries, examining and collating manuscripts and cultivating the society of scholars. His long-expected chair proved anything but a position of comfort; so, after holding it about a year, he gave up the post in disgust, and retired to Amsterdam. Having removed to Paris, where he joined the Romish Church, he was brought to the notice of Louis XIV., and was rewarded with a handsome pension and admission into the academy of inscriptions. He was planning new and important works when he died, October 12, 1716. His claim to a place in a Biblical cyclopædia rests on his edition of Mill's Greek Testament.

KYNEGILS (kin'e-gilz) is the name of a man who stands at the head of a long list of great worthies. On the top of the partition in the screen of the sanctuary in Winchester Cathedral, in England, is a range of six mortuary chests, which contain the bones of several exalted personages that have been interred in the cathedral. Each chest is carved, painted and gilt, and inscribed with the name of the illustrious characters whose remains it contains. The inscriptions are in Latin, and on the first is recorded the fact that "The bones of Kynegils and of Adolphus lie together in this chest; the former was the founder, the latter the benefactor, of this church." In other of these chests are the bones of Kings Egbert, Canute, Rufus, Edmond, and Bishops Wina and Alwyn. The church was founded and endowed by Kynegils, the first Christian king of the West Saxons, A. D. 634. He granted to the church all the lands within seven miles' distance. His son Kenelwach confirmed the grant, and added to it the manors of Arlesford, Downton and Worthe.

KYPE (kipe), GEORG DAVID, a learned German Orientalist, was born at Neukirk, in Pomerania, October 13, 1724. He studied at Königsberg and Halle, and at the latter university took a degree in philosophy in 1744. In 1746 he was appointed professor extraordinary of Oriental languages at Königsberg, and in 1755 ordinary professor of the same. He died May 28, 1779. He was the author of several works intended to aid in the study of the Hebrew and Chaldee languages, and published at different times numerous programmata on various passages of the Old Testament.

KYRIE ELEISON (ki're-ay el-ay'e-son), a form of prayer which occurs in all the ancient Greek liturgies and is retained in the Roman Catholic mass, and since the Reformation in some of the Protestant churches. It follows immediately after the introit, and forms the introduction to the hymn of praise, "Glory to God on high." The retention of the Greek language in this prayer is one of many evidences of the predominance of the Greek element in the early Roman Church.

KYRLE (kurl), JOHN, who became well known and greatly esteemed as a philanthropist, was born in Gloucestershire, in England, in 1637. Like the venerable John Howard, he spent his life in doing good, and with a very moderate fortune he accomplished a remarkable result in the founding of orphanages, asylums and other benevolent institutions. Pope, the poet, has enshrined his name in his works under the title of "the man of Ross." He died in 1754.

KYTE (kite), JOHN, who became the twentieth bishop of Carlisle, was a man of decided ability and learning. He had aided Wolsey in his measures so generally that it became a matter of surprise when it was found that he took the king's side in the matter of the divorce. Still, he held on to Wolsey, defending him with great earnestness in all his trials; and during his great reverse of fortune Kyte never deserted him. Kyte had filled the office of archbishop of Armagh for some time; but preferring the associations of his native land, he succeeded in obtaining the see of Carlisle, whereupon he resigned the primacy of Ireland. As an index of the regard to rank and title which then prevailed, he took the title of archbishop of Thebes, to show that, though discharging the duties of the see of Carlisle, he still claimed the style and title of the higher position. He was elected in 1521 and died in 1537, and was buried at Stepney.

L.

LAADAH (la-da), one of Judah's descendants, 1 Chr. iv. 21.

LAADAN (la'dan). 1. An Ephraimite, ancestor of Joshua, 1 Chr. vii. 26. 2. A Gershonite Levite, 1 Chr. xxiii. 7, 8, 9; xxvi. 21. He seems to have been identical with Libni, Ex. vi. 17.

LABADIE (la-ba-dye'), JEAN, a French fanatic, born in 1610, was educated by the Jesuits; but giving himself out to be the Baptist, he left their society to carry on his supposed mission. He forsook the Roman communion and joined the Reformed, and became pastor at Montauban, but was banished in consequence of his conduct. He was condemned by the synod of Dort, and driven from different places by the civil authorities, his teaching leading to great licentiousness. He died in 1764.

LABAGH (la-baw'), PETER, D.D., was born in 1773, in New York. After a regular education, he entered the ministry of the Reformed Dutch Church, being licensed in 1796. After a missionary tour, he was successful in organizing a church in Mercer county, in Kentucky, but his first charge was at Greenbush, Rensselaer county, New York, where he remained until 1809, when he removed to Shannock and Harlingen, where he labored until his increasing years obliged him to retire, in 1844. He was famed for the solidity of his mind, the accuracy of his judgment and his wisdom as a counselor. He was greatly blessed in his ministry, and in 1831 he was favored with such a revival in his church as affected the country all around. He closed an active, honored and useful life in the year 1858.

LABAN (la'ban), a son of Bethuel, and grandson of Nahor, the brother of Abraham, Gen. xxviii. 5, also brother to Rebekah, who became Isaac's wife. When Abraham's servant arrived at Charran with proposals of marriage to Rebekah, Laban entreated the stranger courteously and gave his consent. But the manner in which at a much later period he acted toward Jacob, when he fled to Padan-aram from the face of his brother Esau, shows him to have been a person of selfish disposition, and by no means scrupulous as to the means he employed to effect his purposes. In him Jacob met with one who was well able to mete to him his own measure in artful cunning, and one who, in some respects, proved even more than a match for him. His conduct in making Jacob, who stood to him in the relation of nephew, serve seven years for his daughter Rachel, and then on the wedding-night substituting Leah for Rachel, was utterly base and heartless; and his future behavior toward Jacob betrayed such a keen regard to his own interests at the expense of Jacob's that the latter at last formed the resolution of stealing away from him by night with his family and possessions, lest some wholesale robbery should have been practiced on him. It is too plain, indeed, that Laban pursued after his son-in-law with some intention of that sort; but being warned by God in a dream to do no violence to Jacob, the two relatives met on Mount Gilead, and after some altercation parted again in peace, Gen. xxxi. From this time nothing more is heard in sacred history of the family of Laban or of his Syrian relatives. Wives were no longer fetched from that region for the posterity of Abraham; and the removal, a few years later, of the household of Jacob to Egypt, and their sojourn there for hundreds of years, entirely separated them from the kindred races in Mesopotamia. Indeed, the grasping policy, domestic corruption and incipient idolatry which had already obtained a footing among even the better portion of those races, rendered it manifest that the chosen family could henceforth derive little from them of a wholesome and elevating influence.

LABAN appears also to have been the name of a town on the Arabian or Eastern side of the Jordan, and in the direction of the Red Sea, but nothing certain is known of its position or character, Deut. i. 1.

LABANA (la'ba-na), 1 Esd. v. 29, Lebanah, Ezra ii. 45.

LABARUM (lab'a-rum), the celebrated imperial standard used by Constantine the Great. Near the extremity of the shaft of a lance, sheathed in plates of gold, was affixed, in a horizontal position, a small rod, so as to form the exact figure of a cross. From this transverse little bar hung drooping a small purple veil of the finest texture, interwoven with golden threads and starred with brilliant jewels. Above this rose the sacred monogram of JESUS CHRIST encircled with a golden crown. Under this banner were his victories gained. It was carried near the emperor, and defended specially by the flower of his army. The etymology of the word is utterly unknown.

LABAT (la-bah'), JEAN BAPTISTE, a Dominican missionary, was born in Paris, in 1663. He possessed great mathematical knowledge, and while in America, where he remained twelve years, he acted as an engineer in defence of Guadaloupe when attacked by the English in 1703. On his return to Europe, in 1706, he accurately surveyed the coast of Andalusia, traveled into Italy and other parts, and finally returned to Paris, where he died in 1738. He wrote many works, the chief of which are his "Voyage to America," "Travels in Spain and Italy," and a "Description of the Countries of Western Africa."

LABBE (lab-bay'), PHILIPPE, a learned French Jesuit, was born at Bourges, in 1607. He taught philosophy, divinity and languages with great success, and was a most laborious writer as well as a sound critic. He died at Paris, in 1667. His chief work is the "Collection of Councils."

LABOR (la'bor), or the exercise of the limbs both for obtaining subsistence and for the benefit of health, was ordained by God as soon as man was created. We are told that even before his fall Adam was to work in Paradise. After the fall, however, pain and exhaustion were, as a consequence of sin, to be connected with the labor which from the beginning was designed to be a pleasant pastime and healthy exercise. It is, therefore, the prostration of strength, wherewith is also connected the temporary incapacity of sharing in the enjoyments of life, and not labor itself, which constitutes the curse pronounced on the fallen man. Hence we find that, in primitive times, manual labor was neither regarded as degrading nor confined to a certain class of society, but was more or less prosecuted by all. It was enjoined on all Israelites as a sacred duty in the fourth commandment; and the Bible entertains so high a respect for the diligent and skillful laborer that we are told in Prov. xxii. 29, "Seest thou a man skilled in his work, he shall stand before kings." Among the beautiful features which grace an excellent housewife, it is prominently set forth that "she worketh willingly with her own hands," Prov. xxxi. 13. With such an honorable regard for labor, it is not to be wondered at that when Nebuchadnezzar carried the Jews away into captivity he found among them a thousand craftsmen and smiths, 2 Ki. xxiv. 14-16; Jer. xxix. 2. The ancient rabbins, too, regarded manual labor as most honorable, and urged it upon every one as a duty. The great apostle of the Gentiles honored and sanctified labor by engaging in it with his own hands; and he could boast that he worked hard day and night for maintenance, even when a preacher of the gospel, rather than be dependent upon any one, 2 Cor. xii. 13, 14; 1 Thess. ii. 9. He could therefore teach others by example how to labor with their hands, and to use the wages of labor for holy purposes, Acts xx. 33-35. For the different kinds of labor in which the Hebrews were engaged, see HANDICRAFT.

LABROUSSE (la-broos'), CLOTILDE SUZAN COURCELLES DE, a noted enthusiast, was born in 1747, at Vauxain, in France. At an early age she imbibed mystical ideas, and was so impressed with the notion that she was destined to become a saint that she attempted suicide when only nine years of age, that she might the sooner fulfill her destiny. When nineteen years old, she entered the third order of St. Francis, and shortly afterward announced that she had been divinely commissioned to convert sinners, but was detained by the superior of her order. At the outbreak of the Revolution she went to Paris, and afterward to Rome, preaching to the people on her way wherever she could gather an audience. At Viterbo she was taken into custody and imprisoned in the castle of San Angelo, where she remained until the capture of Rome by the French, in 1798, when she returned to Paris. She died in 1821.

LACE, Ex. xxviii. 23, 37. The word so rendered is translated "bracelets" in Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25, but it means there the cord or string by which the signet ring was suspended. It signifies twisted, and must be in the places where it is called lace a thread or cord.

LA CHAISE (la-shayz'), FRANCOIS DE, the celebrated confessor of Louis XIV., was born at Forez, in 1624. He obtained the above-named post in 1675, and at once exerted himself to check the power of Madame de Montespan. He was a great patron of the Jesuits, and was the real founder of the college of Clermont. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes and the cruel treatment of the Protestants were ascribed to his influence with the king. The famous cemetery at Paris, Pere la Chaise, had been his residence. He died in 1709.

LA CHALOTAIS (la-sha-lo-tay'), LOUIS RENE DE CARADEUC DE, an eloquent French writer and a great opponent of the Jesuits, was born in 1701. He wrote "An Account of the Constitutions of the Jesuits," which contributed to the downfall of that order. This brought him into trouble, and he was for a long time imprisoned, and exiled for ten years. He died in 1785.

LACHISH (la'kish), a city of Canaan captured by Joshua, Josh. x. 3, 5, 23. It was situated in the plain country of Judah, and was fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Chr. xi. 9. King Amaziah was killed here, 2 Ki. xiv. 19. Lachish was besieged and probably taken by Sennacherib, 2 Ki. xviii.; 2 Chr. xxxii. 9. A description has been deciphered at Kouyunjik to this effect: "Sennacherib, the mighty king, king of the country of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment, before the city of Lachish; I give permission for its slaughter." There is also sculptured a representation of the siege. This city is mentioned in Jer. xxxiv. 7; Mic. i. 13, and was inhabited after the return from Babylon, Neh. xi. 30. The site of Lachish has not been identified. There is indeed still a village on a knoll between Gaza and Beit Jibrin called Um Lakis; but the city was probably farther to the south. According to Eusebius, it lay seven Roman miles south of Eleutheropolis.

LACHMANN (lak'man), KARL KONRAD FRIEDRICH WILHELM, an eminent philologist of Germany, was born at Brunswick, March 4, 1798. His academical career was principally pursued at Gottingen. In 1816 he was appointed to a professorship at Konigsberg, where he remained till 1825, when he removed to Berlin. In this city the rest of his life was spent. He died March 13, 1851. The studies to which Lachmann chiefly devoted himself belong to the department of philology, but in this his range was wide. Besides editions of classical authors, he edited some of the remains of early Teutonic literature. In 1831 he issued an edition of the Greek New Testament, followed, in 1842, by the first volume of his larger critical edition of the original text, the result of the united labors of himself and the younger Buttmann. In this he aimed at presenting the text as it was in the authorized copies of the fourth century. On its first appearance his work was subjected to much hostility, but his great services to the cause of New Testament criticism are now universally admitted.

LACOMBE (la-kōm'), PERE, who became well known in France as a companion and follower of Madame Guyon, was born in Savoy in the close of the seventeenth century. Molinos, the propagator of Quietism, was condemned in 1687; and as Lacombe had heartily adopted his views, he was seized and imprisoned. His intimacy with Madame Guyon was the occasion of an unjust scandal, and his sufferings on this account, added to the effects of his confinement, at length unbalanced his mind, and his afflictions became so heavy that he died in the prison in 1699. His "Analysis of Mental Prayer and Praise" was forbidden to be circulated in 1688, and this also added to his distress.

LACORDAIRE (la-kor-dayr'), JEAN BAPTISTE HENRI, a distinguished French preacher, was born in 1802. He was brought up as an advocate, and quickly obtained celebrity as a pleader. But the dry facts of law did not suit his taste; he had higher aspirations than it could gratify. He therefore entered holy orders, and threw the whole force of his ardent soul into the work of the ministry, equally eager in his search after truth and in his conveyance of it to others. He assisted in conducting the "Avenir," but retired when it was condemned by the pope. In the pulpit of Notre Dame he preached for several years with a force and eloquence to which even the French were strangers. He became a Dominican, and journeyed through the departments as an itinerant preacher until the French Dominicans were formed into a regular order, with himself at their head. The abbé Lacordaire was considered to have eclipsed all who ever preceded him in France as a preacher. He died in 1861.

LACOUR (la-koor'), DIDIER, DE, born in 1550, was prior of the Benedictine abbey of St. Vannes, at Verdun, his native place. The reforms which he introduced eventuated in his being the founder of the celebrated congregations of Benedictines of St. Vannes and St. Maur. He died in 1623.

LACTANTIUS (lak-tan'sh'us), LUCIUS CÆLIUS, or CÆCILIANUS FIRMIANUS, an eminent Father of the Church, was by some esteemed an African and by others a native of Fermo, in Ancona. He studied rhetoric under Arnobius, and by his "Symposium" he obtained such renown that Diocletian appointed him to teach rhetoric in Nicomedia. Subsequently he was appointed tutor to Crispus, the son of Constantine, who dying not long after, Lactantius was neglected. He wrote many works in vindication of Christianity, from the style of which he has been honored with the name of the Christian Cicero. His principal work is the "Institutiones Divinæ." He died probably about 325.

LACUNARY ROOFS. The ceiling of any part in architecture receives this name when it consists of compartments sunk or hollowed. These are frequently richly ornamented.

LADAN (la'dan), 1 Esd. v. 37, probably a corruption of Delaiah, Ezra ii. 60.

LADDER OF TYRUS, 1 Macc. xi. 59, a mountain north of Acre, rising immediately from the sea, a natural barrier between Palestine and Phœnicia. It is the modern Ras-en-Nakhurah, and is crossed by a zigzag path.

LADISLAS (lad'is-laws) II., king of Poland, was born in 1348, in Lithuania. He came to the throne in 1386, and shortly afterward was converted to Christianity, which he introduced into his kingdom, where it soon became the prevailing religion. He died in 1434.

LADY CHAPEL. Before the Reformation the services paid in honor of the Virgin Mary had rapidly increased, and eventually altars and chapels were erected in her honor. In cathedrals these chapels were usually placed at the east end of the choir, with a view to intimate a peculiar reverence and sanctity. Lady chapels were finished in the most perfect style and with the richest adornments. The carving of the altar, the leafage around the capitals of the columns, the groining of the roof and the gorgeousness of the windows, all united to show the intense fervor of devotion that was rendered to the mother of the Saviour. Popularly she was styled "Our Lady." In parish churches where Lady chapels were erected, they were usually placed at the side of the chancel. In Westminster Abbey the chapel of Henry VII. occupies the place usually assigned to the Lady chapel.

LADY DAY. See ANNUNCIATION.

LADY FAST, a species of penance, voluntary or enjoined, in which the penitent had the choice of fasting once a week for seven years on that day of the week in which Lady Day happened to fall, beginning his course from that day, or of finishing his penance sooner by taking as many fasting days together as would amount to an entire year.

LAEL (la'el), a Gershonite Levite, Num. iii. 24.

LÆTARE (lay-ta'ray) SUNDAY, called also MID LENT, is the fourth Sunday of Lent. It is so named from the first word of the introit of the mass, which is from Isaiah lxvi. 10. From this name the characteristic of the services of the day is joyousness, and the music of the organ, suspended throughout the rest of Lent, is on this day resumed.

LÆTICIANA (lay-tish-e-ah'nah), an ecclesiastical term designating certain kinds of food the use of which was prohibited during Lent, and included all articles obtained from mammalia, such as butter, cheese and milk.

LAFITAU (la-fe-to'), JOSEPH FRANCOIS,

LAHAD (la'had), a descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 2.

LAHAI-ROI (la'hi-roy), Gen. xxiv. 62. See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

LAHMAM (lah'mam), a town in the plain country of Judah, Josh. xv. 40.

LAHMI (lah'me), the brother of Goliath, slain by Elhanan, 1 Chr. xx. 5. See ELHANAN.

LAILIE (laid'le), ARCHIBALD, D.D., who became greatly distinguished in the ministry of the Reformed Dutch Church, was born at Kelso, on the Tweed, Scotland, in 1727, and educated at Edinburgh. In 1759 he was appointed to the Scotch church at Flushing, in Holland, where he learned the Dutch language thoroughly and became intimately acquainted with the state of the Church. He was thus prepared in a remarkable was associated with Loyola in the formation of the Society of Jesus, and was the author of its famous Constitutions. He succeeded the founder as general of the order, and gave to it its spirit of intrigue and ambition. He took an active part in the Council of Trent, and disputed with Beza and Martyr at Poissy. He died in 1565.

LAISH (la'ish), a person to whose son Michal, David's wife, was given, 1 Sam. xxv. 44.

LAISH. 1. Jud. xviii. 7, 14, 27, 29. See DAN. 2. A place near Jerusalem, Isa. x. 30, which passage would be more properly rendered, "Listen, O Laish!" Nothing more is known of this Laish.

LAITY (lay'e-te), the name given in the Roman Catholic Church to all persons who do not belong to the clergy. The name appears to have originated as early as the second century, when the idea grew up that the priesthood formed an intermedia Jesuit missionary in North America, wrote "Habits of the Savages of America compared with the Habits of Early Times," a work of great value as giving a faithful account of the aboriginals of North America. He died in 1740.

LAGARAYE (la-ga-ray'), CLAUDE TOUS-SAINT MAROT DE, a noted philanthropist, was born at Rennes, in 1675. He devoted his entire life and fortune to alleviating the wants and miseries of his fellow-creatures, founding schools for the young and hospitals for the sick and aged. He died in 1755.

LAGOMARSINI (la-go-mar-se'ne), GIROLAMO, a learned Jesuit and philologist, was born at Genoa, in 1698. He was professor of rhetoric at Florence twenty years, and in 1750 he was appointed professor of Greek in the college at Rome, where he died in 1773. He published many classical works, and left in MS. a collection in thirty volumes, having for its object the justification of his order from all the odious imputations that had been cast upon it.

manner for the work which he accomplished in New York; for being called to the Collegiate church, he practically settled a dispute which had long agitated the denomination about the use of the English tongue in divine service. In April, 1764, he preached an elaborate and carefully prepared sermon of two hours' length in the Middle Dutch Church, and thus he introduced an era which Dr. Livingston said should have been inaugurated a century previous. During the war of the Revolution he retired to Red Hook, where he died at the early age of fifty-one, in the year 1778, thus closing a ministry of great vigor in the midst of unbounded usefulness. It is worthy of note that several of the most influential families that had resisted the introduction of English into the services, left the Dutch Church and entered the Episcopal Church, where the worship is conducted wholly in that tongue, thereby illustrating a phase of human nature which is confined to no age and no denomination.

LAINÉZ, LAYNEZ or LEYNEZ (li-neth'), JAGO, a Spanish Jesuit, was born in 1512. He ate class between Christ and the Christian community. The influence which the laity had at first exercised in the government of the Church gradually declined as the power of the hierarchy increased; and although, as late as the end of the third century, cases occur in which learned laymen taught publicly with the approval of bishops, still this liberty was ever more and more narrowed, until finally, in 502, a synod, held at Rome under the bishop Symmachus, forbade laymen to interfere in any way in the affairs of the Church. The Protestant Church, in general, maintains on Scriptural grounds the common and equal priesthood of all Christians; still, as marking a visible distinction of office, the words continue in very general use, the depth of the distinction implied varying with the denominational views of those employing them.

LAKE. There are several noticeable lakes in Palestine, as that of Sodom or the Dead Sea, known by several other names; that of Gennesaret, which also had other appellations, and the waters of Merom, which lies nearer the source of the Jordan. These are described under their own names.

LAKE, ARTHUR, an eminent prelate, was born about 1550, at Southampton, and graduated at New College, Oxford. Passing successively through several preferments, he was, in 1616, made bishop of Bath and Wells. He endowed a professorship of Hebrew and one of mathematics in New College, and contributed liberally to its library. He distinguished himself not only as a preacher, but as a profound scholar. His death occurred in 1626.

LAKUM (la'kum), a town on the border of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33.

LA LUZERNE (la-zayrn'), CÉSAR GUILLAUME DE, an eminent prelate, was born at Paris, in 1738, and having studied at the seminary of Saint Magloire, and then at the house of Navarre, obtained orders in 1762. He was one of the first who proposed the establishment in France of a representative system like that of England; and he advocated other patriotic measures for the relief of his country. He held several high offices, including that of vicar-general of Narbonne and bishop of Langres. He died in 1822. His works.

which are numerous, include the following: "Dissertation on Human Liberty," "On the Existence and Attributes of God."

LAMAISM (lam'a-izm) is the name of the religion prevailing in Thibet and Mongolia. It is Buddhism corrupted by Sivaism and by Shamaism, or spirit-worship. As ancient Buddhism knows of no worship of God, but merely of an adoration of saints, the latter is also the main feature of Lamaism.

LA MARCK (la-mark'), EVARD DE, was born at Liege, in 1475. The influence of his family secured his election as bishop of that city, which he ruled with much wisdom and energy. Louis XII., grateful for his services, made him bishop of Chartres; but the duchess of Angoulême having secured a cardinal's hat which he expected, he joined Austria against France, and went so far as to assail his own brother, who had made peace with the French king. He was made archbishop of Valencia because he favored Charles V. as emperor of Germany; and when he was made a cardinal, in 1521, he forthwith began to oppose the Reformation. He became a ferocious persecutor, banishing, imprisoning, and even putting to death, the professors and teachers of the Reformed faith, while their goods were seized and sequestered.

For a time he favored Erasmus; but when he became aware of his real views, he assailed him with opprobrious names, calling him a heathen and a publican. He lent his aid to the war against the Turks in 1532; and in the next year, being appointed a legate, he set himself to extirpate heresy with renewed diligence, even going so far as to engage all his clergy to enter practically into his views. He died suddenly in 1538 before he had succeeded in his plans, as he found his clergy unwilling to carry out his views.

LAMB. This word, according to our usage, signifies the young of the sheep. More than one Hebrew word is so rendered, some including also a kid, the young of the goat. A lamb or a kid without blemish was to be the paschal-offering, to be killed and eaten at the passover, Ex. xii. 3-10. See PASSOVER. Lambs also were continually offered in the various sacrifices of the law; daily, Ex. xxix. 38, 39, weekly, Num. xxviii. 9, monthly, Num. xxviii. 11, at the great yearly festivals, Lev. xxiii. 18-20, and on various special occasions.

LAMBERT (lam'bert) OF HERTZFELD, commonly called LAMBERT OF ASCHAFFENBURG, one of the best German chroniclers of the Middle Ages, was born probably about 1020. He became a Benedictine monk, and entered the monastery of Hertzfeld in 1058; was ordained priest at Aschaffenburg the same year, and made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Returning in 1059, he spent the rest of his life in his monastery, was charged with various ecclesiastical missions, wrote several works and died about 1080. His most important work is the "Chronicon," a most accurate and impartial record of the events of his time down to the year 1077, prefaced, as usual, by a universal history, compiled from Bede and other writers. Lambert had the best opportunities of informing himself of passing events, frequently saw the emperor Henry IV. at the monastery, and has told what he knew with singular fairness, clearness and elegance. The manuscript of his "Chronicon" was discovered by Melancthon in the monastery of the Augustines, at Wittenberg, and was first printed in 1525.

LAMBERT OF MÆSTRICHT, so called because of the place of his birth, was born about the middle of the seventh century. He succeeded Bishop Theodard in the see of Mæstricht, who suffered as a martyr in the year 668. For seven years he was deprived of his position by the violence of Ebroin, but on the accession of Pepin d'Heristal to power he was restored. In consequence of his resisting the rapacity of a Frankish chieftain named Dodō, and his reproof of improper intimacy of Pepin and a sister of Dodo, Lambert was murdered at the instigation of Dodo in revenge. He was held in great veneration for his sanctity, and a church was built at Liege in 714 in order to perpetuate his memory.

LAMBERT, RALPH, D.D., was a noted Irish prelate who lived in the close of the eighteenth century. He was made dean of Down, in the diocese of Dromore, and he was afterward promoted to that see, whence he was removed to the oversight of the diocese of Meath. He lived at a time when very vigorous efforts were made by the Irish Episcopal clergy to repress all dissent, and Bishop Lambert distinguished himself by his zeal in the attempt which was made at the time to prohibit all Presbyterian ministers from celebrating the rite of marriage. He left sermons which were published in the years 1693, 1702 and 1703.

LAMBERT, SAINT DE CHARLES FRANÇOIS, who was born in 1716, in Lorraine, became famous as an infidel philosopher and literary associate of Voltaire in preparing the French "Encyclopædie" along with Rousseau and others of the same views. His philosophical views were set forth very clearly in his "Universal Catechism, or the Principles of the Morals of all Nations," in which he utterly ignores all moral feeling, moral law and moral sanctions. His position was utterly Epicurean, holding as he did that "Man, when he first enters on the stage of life, is simply an organized and sentient mass, and that, whatever feelings or thoughts he may afterward acquire, still they are simply different manifestations of the sensational faculty, occasioned by the pressure of his various wants and necessities." With regard to ethics, he maintains that, as man possesses only sensations, his sole good must be personal enjoyment, his only duty the attainment of it; and that, as we may be mistaken as to what objects are really adapted to promote our pleasure, the safest rule by which we can judge of duty in particular cases is public opinion." His life, which was immoral, was an illustration of such licentious principles. He died in 1803.

LAMBETH (lam'beth) ARTICLES. See ARTICLES, LAMBETH.

LAMB OF GOD, a title repeatedly given to the Lord Jesus Christ, John i. 29, 36. It had been predicted that Messiah should be, like a lamb, patient under suffering, Isa. liii. 7; and the passage in which this was declared was distinctly applied to Jesus by the early Christian teachers, Acts viii. 32-35; 1 Pet. ii. 24. But the special idea with its peculiar application is taken not from a lamb generally, its gentleness and harmlessness, but from the fact of a lamb being selected, without blemish, as a sacrificial offering. Thus for the passover a male of the first year was to be set apart and slain, Ex. xii. 3, 5-7. And so Christ is called the "passover," "sacrificed for us," 1 Cor. v. 7. Lambs of the first year without spot were also to be offered day by day, in the morning and at even, for a continual burnt-offering, and on various other occasions, Num. xxviii. 3 and elsewhere; see last article. And thus redemption was made "with the precious blood of Christ without blemish and without spot," 1 Pet.

i. 18, 19. Further, when St. John beheld the Lamb in heavenly glory, it was "as it had been slain," Rev. v. 6. Christ, therefore, is the Lamb of God, in that he was offered a sacrifice and propitiation for the sins of the world, 1 John ii. 2.

ROMAN CANDELABRUM, OR LAMP-STAND.—See LAMP.

LAMBRUSCHINI (lam-broos'ke-ne), LOUIS, who was born in 1776, at Genoa, became well known as a cardinal and a public character in the papal court. His first promotion was to the bishopric of Sabine, after which he became archbishop of Genoa. During the reign of Charles X. he served as nuncio at the court of France, and in 1831 he was made a cardinal. Under Gregory XVI. he became secretary of state for foreign affairs. A thorough opponent of all change, he went heartily into all the persecuting policy of the pope. On the death of Gregory he had a large number of votes among the cardinals for the pontificate, but Pius IX., who had been successful, induced him to accept the secretaryship and the librarianship of the Vatican, which he had resigned. Favors were still conferred on him, for in 1847 he was made sub-dean of the Sacred College, chancellor of the pontifical orders and bishop of San Rufina and of Civita Vecchia. On the outbreak of the Revolution he fled to Naples and thence to Gaeta, returning in 1850 with Pius to Rome. He wrote on "The Immaculate Conception," on "The Sacred Heart of Jesus" and "Meditations on the Virtues of St. Theresa." He appeared to have seen the need of a change in the policy of public affairs, but Antonelli, who had succeeded to power, rejected his suggestions. He died in 1854.

LAMECH (la'mek), an antediluvian of the line of Cain. He had two wives and was the father of distinguished sons: one, Jubal, was a musician; another, Tubal-cain, a worker of metals. Lamech had, it does not appear how, slain some one; and some verses are preserved, the oldest snatch of poetry known, in which he addresses his wives, expressing his conviction that if Cain was to be avenged seven-fold on any who slew him, vengeance seventy-and-seven-fold would be exacted for Lamech himself. This may intimate that the homicide he was chargeable with was accidental or in self-defence, Gen. iv. 18-24. 2. An antediluvian patriarch, son of Methuselah and father of Noah, 1 Chr. i. 3.

LA MENNAIS (la-meh-nay'), HUGUES FÉLICITÉ ROBERT DE, a celebrated French writer, was born in 1782. He entered holy orders, and devoted himself to the promotion of religion. His "Essay on Indifference" fell like a thunder-bolt on the public and gave a great impetus to the religious revival in France after the fall of the empire. In it he upheld extreme ultramontane views, and on a visit to Rome was most warmly received by Leo XII., who offered him a cardinal's hat. He was a bitter opponent of the monarchical régime; and his ardent nature and deep convictions leading him into the wildest radicalism, he came into contact with the civil tribunals. In the columns of "L'Avenir" he, with the help of Lacordaire and Montalembert, strove to propagate his views, declaiming against the temporal abuses of the Church, calling for a separation of Church and State and advocating religious propagandism among the masses of the people. These views were distasteful to the French episcopate, which procured their formal condemnation by Gregory XVI., who forced La Mennais to a recantation. Retiring to La Chenaie, he composed "Words of a Believer." Its publication the next year completed that rupture with the Church of Rome. The appearance of this work was followed by an outburst of enthusiastic applause and of bitter malignity. In an encyclical dated July 7, 1834, the pope condemned the book, "little in its size, but immense in its perversity." He now became an acknowledged leader of the republican party, and vigorously employed his pen in its behalf. Disappointed in the results of the revolution of 1848, he retired from active political life, though, as a member of the Constituent Assembly, he supported republicanism by his vote. But the coup d'état completely overwhelmed him, and he spent the remainder of his life in translating "La Divina Commedia." La Mennais was a remarkable man, but it must be confessed that his forte lay rather in pulling down than in building up. He died in 1854.

LAMENTATIONS (lam-en-tay'shunz), BOOK OF. This book is an appendix to the prophecies of Jeremiah, of which in the ancient Scriptures it formed a part. It consists of five elegies, in which the prophet pathetically expresses his grief for the miseries of famine, the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem, the cessation of public worship and the other calamities with which his countrymen had been visited for their sins. His great object evidently was to teach the suffering Jews neither "to despise the chastening of the Lord, nor to faint when rebuked of him," but to turn to God with deep repentance, confessing their sins and humbly looking to him for pardon and deliverance.

As a composition this book is remarkable for the great variety of pathetic images which it contains, all expressive of the deepest sorrow and worthy of the subject which they are designed to illustrate.

Each of these poems consists of twenty-two stanzas. All but the last are in the Hebrew alphabetical acrostics, and the lines are longer than is usual in Hebrew poetry. The first three consist chiefly of triplets, and the stanzas commence with the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet in regular order. The third has this further peculiarity, that all the three lines in each stanza begin with the same letter. In the fourth, each stanza consists only of two lines, and the last resembles in its structure the ordinary poetry.

LAMMAS-DAY (lam'mas-day), the first of August, is one of the cross-quarter days or half-quarter days, in England. On this day, which is the feast of "Saint Peter's Chains," it was customary in early times to make offerings of the first-fruits of the harvest, and hence the feast took the name of "loaf-mass," afterward corrupted into Lammas. In Scotland it is the practice with farmers to pay the half year's rent due at Whit-sunday on Lammas-day.

LAMOURETTE (la-moo-ret'), ADRIEN, a French ecclesiastic, was a conspicuous character in the Revolution. He became a Lazarist, and in 1789 was grand-vicar of Arras. He much assisted Mirabeau, and in 1791 he was admitted to the Legislative Assembly, where he distinguished himself by his moderation. After the massacres in September, 1792, he retired to Lyons, but on the taking of the city by the republicans he was captured and sent to Paris, where he was guillotined, in 1794.

LAMP. We have frequent mention of lamps in Scripture, but little or no indication of their shape or of the material of which they were made. But as Egyptian and Assyrian lamps have been found of terra cotta, baked clay, bronze, etc., we may very well suppose that those used by the Hebrews were of similar materials, and very probably of similar shapes. The "lamps" which were carried by Gideon's soldiers in pitchers, Jud. vii. 16, 20, must have had handles, and have been so formed as that the oil could not easily be spilled. Not improbably, however, these were torches or flambeaux, which, when the pitchers were broken, would make a stronger glare. Animal fat is now very frequently burnt in lamps in Western Asia. It is likely that it was also used by the ancient Hebrews, though for the lamps of the candlestick in the tabernacle pure olive oil was specially prescribed, Ex. xxvii. 20; Lev. xxiv. 2. Cotton wicks are at present in common use, but it is supposed that the Hebrews, like the Egyptians, employed the outer coarse fibre of flax. According to rabbinical tradition, the priests' linen garments were unraveled when old to furnish wicks for the sacred lamps. Lamps are now often supported on stands of brass or wood, or they are placed upon brackets. This was probably an ancient custom; and if we may further suppose that anciently, as now, lamps were kept burning through the night, we shall find many Scriptural expressions illustrated. The keeping up of the light is thus a symbol of unbroken succession, 1 Ki. xi. 36; xv. 4; Ps. cxxxii. 17; while the extinguishing of the lamp betokens change and decay, 1 Sam. xxi. 17; Prov. xiii. 9; xx. 20. The illustration may, however, have been borrowed from the perpetual light of the sanctuary. Again, our Lord speaks of "outer darkness" into which the wicked should be cast, Matt. viii. 12; xxii. 13. Lamps, of course, were used at festivals and marriage-feasts, and the contrast is the more striking when one is expelled at once from a well-lighted apartment into the dark night.

The Jewish feast of dedication is, from the illuminations then made, sometimes called the Feast of Lamps. It was founded by Judas Maccabæus in celebration of the restoration of the temple-worship, and has ever since been observed by the lighting up of lamps or candles in all the countries of their dispersion. Other Orientals have at this day a similar feast, of which the "Feast of Lanterns" among the Chinese is, perhaps, the best known.

LAMPADARY (lamp'a-da-re), an officer in the ancient church of Constantinople; so called because it was his business to see that the lamps of the church were lighted, and to carry a taper before the emperor, the empress and the patriarch when they went to church or in procession.

LAMPE (lam'pe), FRIEDRICH ADOLPH, a distinguished divine of the Reformed Church in the eighteenth century, was born February 19, 1683, at Detmold, in Lippe Detmold. He studied first at Bremen, then at Franeker, and afterward at Utrecht. At Franeker the leading professors were followers of J. Cocceius, and Lampe's theological tendencies are those of the Cocceian school. After laboring as pastor at Weeze, Duisburg and Bremen successively, he was invited in 1720 to a chair of theology at Utrecht. In 1726 he was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history in the same university. In the following year he returned to Bremen, being invited to the joint offices of professor of theology and pastor of the church. He died December 8, 1729. His principal exegetical works are "Dissertation on Sacred Chronology" and "Commentary on the Gospel of John."

LAMPETIANS (lam-pe'sh'ans). In the seventeenth century a sect, so named, prevailed, who, adopting the views of the Syrian monk Lampetius, held that man, being born free, is not called on by any necessity to recognize subjection to the law of God. Lampetius mingled the views of Arius, Carpocrates and others.

LAMPS were often placed in graves of the catacombs as a symbol of the eternal light which the departed, it is hoped, enjoy—a memorial of their shining lights before men and their future glory, Matt. xiii. 43. These lamps are found in Italy, Southern France, Egypt and North Africa. At York, near Saint Helen's, in the wall, Camden records the discovery of a burning lamp in a tomb, and another was found, in 1833, at Baena, near Cordova. Some Norman stone lamps have been found at Romsey. At Lichfield, in 1194; at Salisbury, by Osmund's Custumal; at Hereford, in the time of Edward III., by bequest; and in all wealthy churches, by episcopal injunctions, in the thirteenth century, a perpetual lamp burned day and night before the high-altar. In the Constitutions of Oxford, 1222, a lamp is first mentioned. Usually, however, lights were placed in the standing candelabra upon the altar-step.

LAMSON (lam'sun), ALVAN, D.D., who was born in 1792, at Weston, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard, became a tutor in Bowdoin College, from which he went to Harvard to study divinity. He settled as pastor of the First Church in Dedham, Massachusetts, where he became known as a favorite Unitarian preacher. His writings were chiefly sermons and papers in the "Christian Examiner." After a long pastorate of more than forty years he died, in 1864.

LAMY or LAMI (lah'me), BERNARD, a learned Roman Catholic divine, born at Mans, in 1640, commenced his education at the college of his native place and completed it under the Fathers of the Oratory in Paris. He speedily gained a considerable reputation, and became successively professor of belles-lettres at Vendôme and Juilly and of philosophy at Saumur and Angers. In the latter city Lamy's zealous advocacy of the Cartesian philosophy raised most violent opposition from the Thomists, through whose influence he was prohibited from exercising any ecclesiastical or educational function in France. Abandoned by the superiors of the Oratory, Lamy retreated first to St. Martin, in Dauphiny, and then to Grenoble, where he found an enlightened protector in the bishop, Cardinal de Camus, by whose influence his sentence was partially revoked, and he was permitted to preach theology in that city. In 1686 he was recalled to Paris, where he passed a tranquil life until a controversy with M. de Harlay, archbishop of Paris, forced him to retire to Rouen, where he spent the remainder of his life in study and devotion. He died January 29, 1715. Lamy lived an ascetic life, and was as remarkable for his piety as for his extensive learning. His principal works are "Introduction to the Holy Bible" and "Harmony of the Four Evangelists."

LANCE, Jer. i. 42. See ARMS.

LANCE, THE HOLY. This term is used to designate—1. A knife shaped like a lance which is used by the clergy in the Greek Church to cut the bread in the communion. 2. A lance which was, according to one tradition, made out of the nails used at the crucifixion, and according to another, it was the veritable lance with which the Roman soldier pierced the side of our blessed Lord. Through the influence of the bishop of Cremona this lance was given by Rudolph of Burgundy to Henry I. of Germany, and it was long recognized as an important insignia of the empire. 3. A third lance, said to have been found by Helena, kept in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and subsequently at Antioch, where a French priest found it. Its possession so nerved the crusaders that they gained a victory over the Saracens, and after being kept at Constantinople and Venice, whence it passed into the hands of St. Louis of France, it was again found at Constantinople, and Pope Innocent III. got it as a present, and it is reported to be in the Vatican. The genuineness of these lances has, of course, never been established.

LANCELOT (lan-se-lo'), CLAUDE, a learned French ecclesiastic, was born in 1619, at Paris. He lectured on belles-lettres at the monastery of Port Royal, and subsequently became a Benedictine monk. Upon the suppression of his order he was banished to Quimperlay, in Brittany, where he died in 1695. He was the author of the well-known Port Royal grammars and of many other useful philological works.

LANCELLOTTI (lan-sel-lot'te), GIOVANNI PAOLI, an eminent jurist, was born at Perugia, in 1511. He kept a school of law at his native place, and was engaged by Paul IV. to draw up an institute of canon law, in imitation of Justinian's "Institutes of Civil Law." This was annexed to the body of canon law, and still retains its place in the recent editions of that compilation. Lancellotti died in 1591.

LANCET (lan'set), 1 Ki. xviii. 28. Probably a light spear. See ARMS.

LANCET-WINDOW (lan'set-win'do), a narrow window with acutely-pointed arch head.

This form was much used in England and Scotland, during the early pointed period of Gothic architecture. Several lancet-windows are frequently grouped together, so as to produce a pleasing effect. In Scotland, the lancet-window was, like many other features of Scotch Gothic, retained to a much later period than in England.

LAND. See EARTH.

LANDMARK (land'mark), or boundary-pillar, for such was, and still to a large extent is, in Eastern countries, the sign that distinguishes and marks off the possession of one man from that of another. A stone or post was usually placed at convenient distances, instead of a wall or hedge, to separate between the two; and as, in favorable circumstances, a cunning and unscrupulous man might take advantage of his neighbor by shifting the place of such movable partitions, a strong injunction was given in the law to leave them intact, Deut. xix. 14; xxvii. 17.

LANDO (lan-do'), also called LANDON (lan'dun), who rose to the pontificate, was born in Sabina. Of his early life little is known. He reached the papal chair in 913, and he reigned only six months, closing his life in 914.

LANE, GEORGE, was born in 1784, in the State of New York. In 1805 he was admitted to the Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Church, and in 1836 he became agent of the Methodist Book Concern, which he raised to a condition of great prosperity. As treasurer of the Missionary Society he was exceedingly active, freeing it from an oppressive debt and bringing it into a condition of vigor and extensive usefulness. He died in 1859.

LANE, JOHN, who was born in Virginia in 1789, became one of the most influential members of the Methodist body in the Southern States. He spent some time in Georgia, entered the South Carolina Conference, labored among the Creek and Cherokee Indians, and assisted in forming the Mississippi Conference. In 1820 he had the management of his father-in-law's estate devolved on him, and on it he founded the city of Vicksburg. He acted as merchant, judge and railroad director, while he preached as he had opportunity. In 1831 he re-entered the Conference, became a presiding elder and president of the board of trustees of the Centenary College and president of the Missionary Conference. He died in 1855.

LANFRANC (lan'frangk), who became archbishop of Canterbury, A. D. 1070, and was by far the most eminent of the Continental Churchmen who were brought over to England, was born at Pavia, in Italy, about the year 1005. He was descended from a family of rank, who had him educated for the law at Bologna. He taught jurisprudence at Pavia; but desirous of seeing other lands, he traveled over France, and at the suggestion of Duke William of Normandy he became a teacher at Avranches, where he was soon surrounded by a crowd of pupils. With a view to a life of greater solitude he proposed to retire to Rouen, and on his way he was seized by a band of robbers, who bound him to a tree. Being delivered, he determined to enter a monastery in fulfillment of a vow, and he selected the Benedictine house at Bec. Here again he became an instructor, and pupils from many lands crowded around him. He was made prior of the house in 1046, and forthwith he recast the order of study and enlarged the course, introducing the study of logic and giving much attention to Latin. He had Anselm and the future pope Alexander II. under his care at Bec. Three years after his promotion to the head of the house his great controversy began with Berengarius, who was at that time archdeacon of Angers. Berengar had sought to gain Lanfranc's support to the views of Scotus Erigena on the subject of the Lord's Supper, and the letter fell into the hands of some who charged Lanfranc with heresy. Lanfranc became very violent in his own defence, and in consequence of his display of learning he rose in the favor of Duke William and had several abbacies offered to him. Under a false charge he was ordered to leave Normandy, and a miserable horse was given to him for his journey. Meeting the duke, he told him that unless a better was provided he could not get out of the country, and the interview ended in such an explanation as led to permanent friendship. He succeeded in procuring the permission of Nicholas II. for William to marry a near relative, on condition that the duke should build a religious house for monks and one for nuns; and when the monastery at Caen, called after St. Stephen, was built, Lanfranc was settled over it, and Anselm took his place at Bec. The controversy between Lanfranc and Berengar continued with great vigor. Paschasius Radbertus had promulgated the dogma of transubstantiation; and when at Rome, Berengar had been led through fear to admit this doctrine, yet when he got free he defended the views of Scotus Erigena, who on the subject of the eucharist agreed with Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome and others of the Fathers that there was no change of the elements of bread and wine into the real body and blood of our Lord. Great ability was displayed in this controversy on both sides. Lanfranc refused the archbishopric of Rouen, but at the urgent solicitation of William, and influenced by the advice of his old friend Abbot Herluin, he accepted the archbishopric of Canterbury, in the year 1070. He entered on an arduous field, as he had an uncultured clergy to rule and his own dignity to defend, while the imperious temper of the Conqueror and the equally difficult disposition of William Rufus kept him in constant disquiet. So troubled was he at times that only for the influence of Pope Alexander II. he would have resigned the primacy and retired again to a monastery. He esteemed his old pupil Pope Alexander II. very highly, but Gregory VII. became dissatisfied with him because of a want of obedience in not restraining the imperious monarch, who had shown an unwillingness for the bishops to visit Rome. He had gone to Rome himself to receive the pallium from the hands of Alexander II., although he would have preferred that the pope, in view of his dignity as primate of England, had sent it to him; but when Gregory enjoined him to appear in Rome in the space of four months, he disregarded the command, although threatened with a sentence of suspension. This coolness has by some been attributed to the fact that Lanfranc believed that in Gregory he saw a leaning toward his old opponent Berengar. It is the testimony of history that through the energetic policy of Lanfranc the English Church received as strong an infusion of the Norman element as was forced upon the political system of the country by the iron hand of the Conqueror. In addition to his works against Berengarius, he left "Decrees for the Order of St. Benedict," "Letters," a work on "Confession" and a "Commentary on St.

Paul's Epistles." He wrote a life of the Conqueror, but it is lost. He died in 1089, two years after the death of his great patron.

The cathedral of Canterbury is worthy of the rank which it holds of being the metropolitan church of England. Its vast size, its varied styles, the beauty of its different parts, the number of offices, chapels and other edifices which are attached to it, unite in clothing it with a wondrous amount of solemn pictorial beauty. And then its history is an embodiment of the history of the Church of England. When Augustine died, in 604, his church was unfinished, and it was afterward ruined by the Danes. Odo, in 938, repaired it, and again the Danes destroyed it. In 1017 it was re-edified, and in 1067 a fire left it in a ruinous state. In this condition it was found by Lanfranc when, in 1070, he accepted the see. He was a great architect, and his plan included a great enlargement as well as repairs. Nothing in England, as William of Malmesbury has said, could be found to equal this cathedral for the brilliancy of its windows, the splendor of the marble pavement or the pictured roof which attracted the eyes of beholders. Again, in 1174, the choir and other parts of the building were consumed by fire, but under the celebrated William of Sens the entire east end of the cathedral was rebuilt and completed in 1180. From this year until 1376 many changes and additions were made, under Peckham and others, and in this year Archbishop Sudbury commenced the western transept. Courtenay, Arundel and Chicheley carried on other additions. Selling, the prior, undertook the great central tower, which was finished by Morton and Goldstone, his successors. Like others of the great cathedrals, the structure has suffered from the hands of those who undertook to remove the symbols of Romish doctrines and practices; and the effects of time, also, have clothed this gray and venerable structure with a solemnity of aspect which is most impressive and affecting. Some idea of the magnitude of the cathedral may be gathered from a consideration of the following measurements. The great central tower is thirty-five feet in diameter, and it rises to the vast elevation of two hundred and thirty-four feet, while the style and the arrangement of the windows are far more pleasing than the tower windows at York. Two transepts cross the main building, and the circular building at the eastern extremity, called Becket's Crown, is a unique example in the plan

1789 he became court preacher and counselor to the reigning princess at Ratisbon. His "Dictionary of the New Testament" raised his name to the front rank of the literary men in Germany. In later years he devoted himself to the practical side of the Christian life, and his character shone out with great simplicity and beauty. He died in 1806.

LANG, MATTHAUS, a natural brother of the emperor Maximilian I. who rose to great eminence in the Romish Church, was born in 1469, at Augsburg. His education was conducted at Ingolstadt, and he entered public life first as a secretary to Frederic III. and next to his brother Maximilian I. Entering the Church, he soon rose to be bishop of Gurk, and Julius II. made him a cardinal in 1511 to attach him to his interests, and thus Maximilian was secured also. The archbishopric of Salzburg was conferred on him, and in 1518 he attended the diet of Augsburg. For some time he favored reform in the Church, and he even went so far as to intimate his purpose to secede if his views were not entertained. At length he entirely changed; he overcame the revolutionary party at Saltzburg, joined the Romish league and successfully attacked the peasants in 1525 who had risen in insurrection. He was a determined opponent of Luther; but, after all, it must be admitted that he had an elastic conscience, was more adroit and prudent than candid, honest or faithful, and as a politic manager and partisan he was equal in adroitness to any of the cardinals of his day. He died in 1540.

Imilian passed his life amid scenes of unusual turmoil and difficulty. After having been dean of Tours, he became bishop in 1072. He was deposed and excommunicated by the pope on a charge of incest, but he vindicated his character, and was restored. On the accession of Gregory VII. he was again deposed, and his clergy rose up against him. At the council of Poitiers he was accused of simony, and to save himself he broke up the council. Gregory appointed a committee to investigate his conduct; and although nothing definite has been recorded of the proceedings, Langeais appears afterward to have enjoyed the confidence of the pope. Next he incurred the anger of Philip, the king, because of siding with the pope about the investiture, and he was driven from his see and excommunicated by the canons of St. Martin. Next came the excommunication of the count of Anjou and his associates, who had opposed Langeais, and so confusion and jealousy prevailed. It has been justly surmised that Langeais had brought his troubles on himself by favoring the reforms which Gregory aimed at effecting, for he had the favor of the people when the clergy and the monks opposed him. He died about the year 1093.

of this church. The total exterior length of the cathedral is five hundred and forty-five feet, and at the eastern transept it is one hundred and fifty-six feet broad. These measurements, however, give no idea of the extent of the cloisters, the chapter-house, the library and the different chapels which surround or are attached to the main edifice, and which invest the cathedral with a varied appearance of pictorial effect, which a more formal and regular structure fails to produce. As a study it presents all the different styles from the Norman down to the Perpendicular, and thus it exhibits in stone a history of the progress of ecclesiastical architecture for at least four hundred years.

LANG, GEORG HEINRICH, who was born in 1740, at Oettingen, and educated at Jena, served as a pastor at Bühl and Hohen-und-Nieder-Altheim. Thence he went to Trochtelsingen, and in 1789 he became court preacher and counselor to the reigning princess at Ratisbon. His "Dictionary of the New Testament" raised his name to the front rank of the literary men in Germany. In later years he devoted himself to the practical side of the Christian life, and his character shone out with great simplicity and beauty. He died in 1806.

LANGHEAIS (long-zh'ay'), RAOUL DE, who rose to be a French bishop in the eleventh centure, passed his life amid scenes of unusual turmoil and difficulty. After having been dean of Tours, he became bishop in 1072. He was deposed and excommunicated by the pope on a charge of incest, but he vindicated his character, and was restored. On the accession of Gregory VII. he was again deposed, and his clergy rose up against him. At the council of Poitiers he was accused of simony, and to save himself he broke up the council. Gregory appointed a committee to investigate his conduct; and although nothing definite has been recorded of the proceedings, Langeais appears afterward to have enjoyed the confidence of the pope. Next he incurred the anger of Philip, the king, because of siding with the pope about the investiture, and he was driven from his see and excommunicated by the canons of St. Martin. Next came the excommunication of the count of Anjou and his associates, who had opposed Langeais, and so confusion and jealousy prevailed. It has been justly surmised that Langeais had brought his troubles on himself by favoring the reforms which Gregory aimed at effecting, for he had the favor of the people when the clergy and the monks opposed him. He died about the year 1093.

LANGHAM (lang'ham), SIMON OF, an English bishop of great eminence, was born in 1310, at Langham, in Rutlandshire. As abbot of St. Peter's, Westminster, he became a zealous reformer of abuses, and Edward III. made him his treasurer in 1360, and four years afterward he elevated him to the chancellorship. Meantime, he had filled the see of Ely, and in 1366 he was made primate. Wycliffe had been made head of Canterbury Hall, at Oxford, and from this place he was removed by Langham, on the ground that a secular priest was not qualified to hold the position. Two results flowed from this: Wycliffe was led to inquire into the nature of papal abuses; and Edward, seeing Langham created a cardinal for his conduct, seized on the temporalities of Canterbury on the plea that his exaltation to the rank of cardinal had vacated the inferior office. This threw Langham into the hands of the pope, who used him for the promotion of his policy. He continued with the pope at Avignon, where he died in 1376.

LANGHORNE (lang'horn), WILLIAM, M.A., who was a clergyman of the Church of England, is chiefly remembered because of the translation which he and his brother John Langhorne made of "Plutarch's Lives." John had been a preacher at Lincoln's Inn; and contrary to the usage of that learned and profoundly legal association, where deep thought and solid matter are sought after, his sermons have been characterized as "short, florid and superficial." William was the author of some poetry, a paraphrase of a part of Isaiah and two volumes of practical sermons. He died in 1772.

LANGLEY (lang-le), RALPH, who lived in the fifteenth century, was one of the most eminent of the wardens of Manchester. He entered on his office in 1465, and he found the church over which he was to preside in an exceedingly dilapidated state. He removed a wooden fabric which had been placed between the stone chancel and the lower part of the present tower, which had been erected perhaps soon after the chancel, for the purpose of receiving one or more bells. The tower was in a good condition and sufficiently strong; so he joined his new building of stone to it. Then he built the present nave of the cathedral with the north and south aisles, and next the chapel of St. James on the north and that of St. Nicholas on the south, thus giving the church a cruciform plan. Still further, he added a clerestory to the choir of the first warden with octagonal turrets, and he replaced the former roof, which had been of timber. Next he took down the old vestry and built the present chapter-house on its site; and he closed his labors by adding the stalls on the south side. He serves as an excellent illustration of the peculiar talent which the mediæval clergy displayed in the department of architecture. Their taste and education may be seen in the vast cathedrals, colleges and other edifices devoted to ecclesiastical and educational purposes, which still command the admiration of all spectators.

LANGLEY, or LONGLEY (long'le), THOMAS, was educated at Cambridge, and taking holy orders, became canon in 1400 and dean of York in 1401. In 1403 he was appointed keeper of the king's privy seal, and received the great seal from Henry IV. in 1405, being promoted to the archbishopric of York the same year. He was frequently employed in state affairs by the king and his successor, under whom and Henry VI. he held the great seal. Retiring from public life in 1426, he occupied the rest of his life in works of piety, charity and munificence, restoring his cathedral, founding schools for grammar and music, and contributing to the libraries of Cambridge, Oxford, Leicester and Manchester. He died in 1437.

LANGRES (long-gray'), SYNOD OF. In the year 859 an important synod was held at Toul, in which the state of religion in Neustria, Loraine and Provence was discussed, and a preparatory synod was held at Langres, with a view to secure a thorough adjustment at Toul. The questions then under discussion were the propriety of taking the election of bishops out of the hands of the laity on the plea that, while they were ignorant, the clergy were qualified by their education to make a judicious selection. The appointment of the heads of convents, the rapacity of the temporal power and the independence of convents from episcopal control were also discussed; but the deliberations about predestination were the most important, but the result was unsatisfactory, and, after all, nothing was settled, and the proceedings at Toul were uninfluenced by all that had been done at Langres.

LANGTON (lang'ton), JOHN DE, was a bishop of Chichester, in the fourteenth century, who did much for the cathedral over which he presided. He was appointed to the see in 1305, and he at once commenced his architectural labors, beginning with the presbytery; and having completed it, he undertook the south transept, which he rebuilt, adding to its length, and terminating it by one of the most enriched windows to be found in any cathedral in England. The decorated style had begun to prevail, and the south window is of such size and beauty of detail that the only one of the period which is held to surpass it is in the chapel of Merton College, Oxford.

LANGTON, STEPHEN, archbishop of Canterbury in the time of King John, was born in England, but educated in France. He rose through the various offices of the university of Paris till he became its chancellor; and then, on visiting Rome, Innocent III. so admired his learning and abilities as to promote him to the see of Canterbury, assuming a power of disposal then disputed by the king of England. John refused to confirm the nomination, and the kingdom was accordingly placed under an interdict. After some years of resistance the pusillanimous monarch yielded, and Langton entered into quiet possession of his diocese in 1213. This prelate was not so subservient to the pope as he was expected to be, but became a strenuous supporter of the liberties of the English Church and people, and died in 1228, leaving various works, some of which have been printed.

LANIGAN (lan'e-gan), JOHN, D.D., was a well-known literary member of the Irish Romish priesthood. He was born in 1758, at Cashel, in the South of Ireland, and educated at Rome, in the Irish College. For some time he occupied the chair of Hebrew and divinity at Pavia. When the Irish College was founded at Maynooth, he refused a chair which was offered to him, but in 1799 he assumed the position of editor, librarian and translator for the Dublin Society. The complicated duties of the office and the weight of literary labor which he undertook affected his brain, and in 1828 he died near Dublin in an asylum. His "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland" is well known as a learned work. It closes at the thirteenth century. He wrote on the questions bearing on Protestantism and Popery, and a work on the Scriptures, which appeared in 1794, at Pavia.

LANSING (lan'sing), NICOLAS, who was born in 1748, at Albany, became a most valuable and greatly beloved minister of the Reformed Dutch Church. He was licensed to preach in 1780, and he continued preaching until a fortnight before his death, at the age of eighty-seven. His first charge was at Greenbush, near Albany, and subsequently he labored at Tappan and Clarksburg, in Rockland county, New York. In his later years he labored in Tappan only, from 1830 until 1835. His dwelling-house and church at Tappan adjoined the place where Major André was hanged in the war of the Revolution.

LANTERN (lan'tern), once only used in our English Bible, John xviii. 3, and as the equivalent of the same word which in all other places has been rendered "lamp" or "candle." But as a lantern is simply a light with a covering of some sort to protect it from wind and other external means of violence, the distinction between it and lamp cannot be sharply drawn, and not unfrequently either term might be indifferently employed. The lamps, for example, carried by Gideon's select band must have been lanterns rather than lamps in the ordinary sense; and when the Psalmist speaks of "a lamp to his path," Ps. cxix. 105, what we naturally think of is the lantern required for dark and devious ways. The lantern common at present in Western Asia consists of waxed cloth strained over rings of wire, with a top and bottom of tinned copper. It is usually about two feet long by nine inches in diameter, and is carried by servants before their masters, who often pay visits to their friends at or after supper-time. In many Eastern towns the municipal law forbids any one to be in the streets after nightfall without a lantern.

LANTERN, in architecture, is an ornamental structure raised over domes and roofs to give light and ventilation. The dome of Saint Paul's cathedral and many other large domes are crowned with a lantern. Where a lantern is for the purpose of giving light, it is called a lantern-light. In Gothic architecture, a lantern-tower is frequently placed over the centre of cross churches, the vault being at a considerable height, and the light admitted by windows in the sides. York and Ely cathedrals have such lantern-towers.

LANTERNS, FEAST OF. Among the Chinese of the upper classes the custom is general on the 15th of January to have a huge lantern lighted up with wax candles, but the origin of the practice is involved in uncertainty. One tradition derives the custom from the incident in the family of a mandarin whose daughter was drowned, and her father employed a number of lanterns in his search after her. Another traces it to an emperor whose palace was destroyed by the people, because he illuminated it on an occasion when he had collected his concubines together for licentious revelry. In some respects this Chinese custom resembles the rite of the ancients, who went about the streets with torches in commemoration of the search of Proserpine by her mother Ceres.

LANTFREDUS (lant-fre'dus), who flourished in the close of the tenth century, at Winchester, was a protégé of Ethelnoth, the bishop. He is now known by his curious life of St. Swithin, which, like the work of Jocelin of Brakelonde, presents the most interesting views of the condition of society in his day. The actual life of abbeys and priories may be seen in the writing of Jocelin, while civil life is illustrated by the memoir of St. Swithin. The name is sometimes written Lamfridus.

LAODICÆA, or LAODICEIA (la-o-de-se'a), a city of Phrygia in Asia Minor, chiefly interesting to the Scriptural student as the site of one of the seven churches in Asia to which epistles were addressed by direction of the Holy Spirit by the author of the Apocalypse. Laodicea was situated about a mile to the south of the river Lycus, a branch of the Meander. Its original name was Diospolis, and Pliny mentions the change of the name to Rhoas. That by which the city has been since known was conferred upon it by Antiochus Theos in honor of his wife Laodice. Among the residents in this city in the time of the apostles were many Jews, and it was probably owing to this circumstance that a Christian church was planted here at so early a period of the Church's history. The present state of Laodicea is most desolate; the site is singularly barren, and the area of the ancient city is covered with the relics of a former civilization. Not a single monument of antiquity remains standing; a stadium, a few arches of an aqueduct, three or four blocks which once supported the arches of a bridge and a portion of an amphitheatre are all that remain to attest the ancient magnificence of the town. The Turks call it Eski Hissar. It appears from the Epistle to the Colossians that St. Paul never visited Laodicea; but hearing, most probably from Epaphras, of the false doctrines spread in that city, he wrote to the Colossians, desiring that his Epistle to the Colossians, and that of the Laodiceans in Colossæ, Col. iv. 13-16. From this some have supposed that St. Paul wrote an epistle to the Laodiceans which is no longer extant.

The message of the Spirit, Rev. iii. 14-22, to the church at Laodicea was an awful warning. It is, perhaps, scarcely possible for us to say what effect it produced on the church in that city. Laodicea is indeed a desert, but the same may be said of Ephesus and Sardis, as well as of Colossæ and Hierapolis.

LAODICÆA, COUNCIL OF. In the fourth century a council was held at Laodicea, in Phrygia, and yet it is strange that the date of the council cannot be fixed. Baronius, Binius, Pagi, Hardouin, Beveridge and others place the year from A. D. 314 to 381. Thirty-two bishops attended, chiefly from Asia, and they passed sixty canons, which were generally accepted by the churches. The most important of them was the last, in which the canon of Scripture was settled, and in the list of the books the Apocrypha and the book of Revelation are omitted. The others give a clear view of the questions which were then agitated in the Church; thus, in the twelfth it is determined that bishops shall be appointed by the metropolitan and his provincials, and the thirteenth forbids the election of priests by the people. The fifth forbids ordination to be administered before those who were hearers only, and the sixth excludes heretics from admission to churches, while the fourteenth prohibits the eucharist to be sent from one parish to another. The twentieth orders a deacon not to sit in the presence of a priest without his permission, and the twenty-fourth enjoins all the clergy and all ascetics to shun taverns. The thirty-third prohibits church members from praying with heretics, and the thirty-seventh forbids fasting with Jews or heretics, while all dancing is denounced by the fifty-third. The object of the council was obviously to lay down such rules as would regulate the life and morals of church members in a loose and declining age.

LAODICÆANS (la-o-de-se'anz), Col. iv. 16, inhabitants of Laodicea.

LAOS (la'os) is the name of a people who live south-east of Burmah and of Farther India, surrounded by Assam, Siam, Tonquin and China. They are scattered through Siam and the adjoining provinces, and number about three millions.

They are Buddhists, though more lax than the Siamese. The American Presbyterian Church in 1867 made the first attempt at their conversion to Christianity. Mr. McGilvray was received by the people with great kindness; a house and other comforts were provided for him; but ere long a very determined spirit of hostility began to appear. Dread of change, loss of power and other worldly influences have united with the opposition of the heart to the holiness which the gospel demands, in leading the king and others to discourage the labors of the men who have toiled for years to elevate them in the social scale and brighten their hopes for eternity.

LAO-TZU (la'o-tzoo), a celebrated philosopher of China, the founder of a religion as ancient and important as that of Confucius. This sect is commonly known as the Taou, or sect of reason. Little authentic is known of the life of Lao-Tzu, his followers having made a myth of his biography. He was born B. C. 604, in the state of Tseu, at present known as Hooph and Hoonan, fifty-four years before Confucius. He was probably a historian and archivist of a king of the Chow dynasty, and went about B. C. 600 to the western parts of China, where he might have become acquainted with the worship of Fuh or Buddha. Confucius was so attracted by his renown that he went to see him, but the meeting does not seem to have been entirely amicable, for Lao-Tzu reproached the sage with pride, vanity and ostentation, stating that sages loved obscurity and retreat, studied time and circumstances before they spoke, and made no parade of knowledge and virtue. Confucius, however, highly lauded Lao-Tzu to his followers, and called him a dragon soaring to the clouds of heaven which nothing could surpass. Lao-Tzu asked Confucius if he had discovered the Taou (path or reason) by which heaven acts, when Confucius answered that he had searched for it without success. Lao-Tzu replied that the rich sent away their friends with presents, sages theirs with good advice, and that he humbly thought himself a sage. By this he probably meant that all he could offer Confucius was the advice of seeking the Taou. He retired to Han Kwan, where the magistrates of the place received him, and there he wrote the Taou-tih-king, or book of reason and virtue. He died B. C. 523, having attained the age of one hundred and nineteen years.

The doctrines of Lao-Tzu differ from those of Confucius, the object of the latter being the practical government of man through a code of morals, that of Lao-Tzu, the rendering of man immortal through the contemplation of God, the repression of the passions and the perfect tranquillity of the soul. Hence his doctrine was that silence and the void produced the Taou, the logos or reason by which movement was produced; and from goodly mountain, even Lebanon." The goodly mountain is Hermon, which is visible so far off, and the whole range of Lebanon behind it stretching northward to the eye of the dying saint.

There are allusions to several ridges or peaks of Lebanon in Scripture, but the identification of these with any modern name is difficult. The most striking of these allusions is that in Song of Solomon, ch. iv. 8:

With me from Lebanon, my Bride,
With me from Lebanon thou shalt come;
Thou shalt look from the top of Amanah,
From the top of Shenir and Hermon,
From the lion's den,
From the leopard mountain.

The great central valley between the two Lebanons, now called simply El-Beka (the valley), was anciently known as Cœle-Syria, and contains among other things the magnificent ruins of the temple of the sun at Baalbek. Few fragments of ancient splendor and idolatry can equal this, save perhaps those of Egypt and India. Such architectural grandeur was singularly suitable for the situation, with the snowy peaks of Libanus on the one side and Antilibanus on the other.

MOUNT LEBANON.—See LEBANON.

The thunder-storms of Lebanon are terrific: the thick clouds, the dashing rain, the wild mountain blasts, and the rapid lightning gleams, make up a scene which one is glad to have to say that he has seen once, but which he would not willingly encounter a second time.

The glimpses of the Mediterranean which the traveler gets and loses as he slowly winds his way downward, through ravines and heights and broken slopes, are remarkably beautiful—like the similar glimpses of the Dead Sea which he gets and loses when descending from Jerusalem. A week's ride through Lebanon would bring the traveler into contact with more varied beauty than in almost any other region of the world. It is the highlands of Syria; and though the whole district from the Red Sea northward to Asia Minor is mountainous, yet Lebanon, or "the Lebanon," as it is called, is pre-eminently the mountain district. Hence its name "Aram," the lofty—just the name which we can suppose might be given by the colonists from the plains of the far east when first coming within sight of such a noble mountain range.

Its height gives it in some places the advantage of a various climate. At its foot, in such places as Baniyas, the heat is great, while on its top there sits the cold of winter. To this variety of climate frequent reference has been made, in the many descriptions and praises of Lebanon that have been given, both in ancient and modern times. The reader may not be unacquainted with the following specimen:

"Now upon Syria's land of roses
Softly the light of eve reposes,
And, like a glory, the broad sun
Hangs over sainted Lebanon,
Whose head in wintry grandeur towers,
And whitens with eternal sleet;
While summer, in a vale of flowers,
Is sleeping rosy at his feet."

The population of Lebanon is considerable, scattered over its many villages. The inhabitants are chiefly Druses and Maronites; the latter in name Christians, the former peculiar in their religion and manners—so much so that they have been conjectured to be the remains of the ancient Canaanites. There are Mohammedans also in different places.

LEBAOTH (le-ba'oth), Josh. xv. 32. See BETH-BIREI, BETH-LEBAOTH.

LEBBEUS (leb-be'us), one of the names of the apostle Jude, Matt. x. iii.

LEBONAH (le-bo'nah), a place not far from Shiloh, Jud. xxi. 19. It has been identified with El-Lubban, about four hours south of Nablous.

LEBRIJA (le-bre'ha), ÆLIUS ANTONIUS, a learned Spaniard, was so called from the place of his birth. He was born in 1442, at Lebrija, and after a course of study in that place, he went to Salamanca. Thence he went to Italy, and after ten years he returned with a competent knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, medicine and theology. His great object was the reformation of the Spanish colleges, and he had considerable success, as he published grammars and a lexicon which were extensively used. He attempted a reform of the text of the Vulgate, and he aided Cardinal Ximenes in preparing his "Polyglot." He found himself in danger, and the Inquisition prohibited some of his works, but Ximenes protected him from the intended violence of his enemies. In 1522 he died at the university of Alcalá de Henares, in which he filled the Latin chair. Many of his works have come down to the present day.

LEBWIN (leb'win), whose name is often written LIAFWIN, was a successful missionary in spreading the gospel among the Frieslanders. The scene of his greatest success was Deventer, where he built a church. He is reported by tradition to have been a man of unwonted boldness, and he succeeded among the Anglo-Saxons where it is probable a less energetic man would have failed. He was a native of Brittany, and he is said to have been led by a dream to join Gregory at Utrecht for the mission. He has been confounded with a pupil of Augustine named Livin who was not engaged in the mission to Germany.

LECAH (le'kah), a name found in the genealogy of Judah; it is probably that of a town, 1 Chr. iv. 21.

LECENE (la-sân'), CHARLES, a Protestant pastor at Honfleur, of Socinian principles, was born in 1647. In 1685 he went to England, and there made a translation of the Bible, which was published by his son. It is open to severe criticism, which it has not escaped. He died in 1703.

LECKEY (lek'ke), WILLIAM, who lived in the last half of the seventeenth century, in Ireland, became famous for his scholarship, his pulpit power and his death by hanging at Dublin, on a charge of being a party to the celebrated plot of Colonel Blood. After the Restoration, Leckey, who was a Presbyterian minister and a Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, was accused of having taken part in the plot to embarrass the government. He was imprisoned, tried and condemned to death. His life was offered to him provided he would conform to the Established Church, and on his refusal he was hanged, July 15, 1663, although the university used all its influence to have him spared.

LECLERC (lay-klerk'), JEAN, one of the most profound scholars of Europe, was born at Geneva, in 1657. He was a Calvinistic minister, but became a zealous Arminian, and was lecturer in the Remonstrant College at Amsterdam. His work on the Bible is a monument of critical learning. Besides this, he was a copious writer and collator. One of the best of his works is "A Treatise of the Causes of Incredulity," translated from the French. He died in 1736.

LECTERN (lek'tern), a reading-desk or stand, properly movable, from which the Scripture lessons which form a portion of the various church services are chanted or read. The lectern is of very ancient use, of various forms and of different materials. It is found in Roman Catholic churches, in the cathedrals and college chapels of the Church of England and in the Protestant Episcopal churches of America. The most ancient lecterns are of wood, but they were frequently also made of brass, and sometimes in the form of an eagle (the symbol of St. John the Evangelist), the outspread wings of which form the frame supporting the volume.

LECTOR (lek'tor), in the early Church a person set apart for the purpose of reading parts of the Bible and other religious writings to the people. They were consecrated by prayers and ceremonies for this office, and in the third century appear to have been proper officers of the Church.

LECTURES (lek'churz). There are several courses of sermons or lectures delivered in England, under endowments of certain public-spirited individuals, called by their names, or by some name designated by them.

1. BAMPTON, a course of lectures founded by the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury, to be delivered in St. Mary's Church yearly in Oxford. This is a celebrated course. See BAMPTON LECTURES.

2. BOYLE, a course founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle in 1691 to maintain a course of eight sermons yearly in support of Christianity against Atheists, Deists and other opponents. See BOYLE LECTURE.

3. CONGREGATIONAL, a series delivered in to be succeeded by another generation of the same kind, are frequently applied to illustrate prosperity, Ps. i. 3; Jer. xvii. 8, or decay, Job xiii. 25; Isa. i. 30. Other illustrations are also taken from leaves, Lev. xxvi. 36; Isa. xxxiv. 4; Dan. iv. 12, 14, 21; Mark xiii. 28; Rev. xxii. 2.

The "leaves" of folding-doors are mentioned in 1 Ki. vi. 32, marg.; 1 Ki. vi. 34; Isa. xlv. 1; Ezek. xli. 24.

The "leaves" of the roll, Jer. xxxvi. 23, were the columns in which the roll was written.

LEAGUE OF CAMBRAY. The alliance entered into between Pope Julius II., the emperor Maximilian and the kings of France and Navarre in the year 1508, to make war against the republic of Venice, is known by this name. The temporal and the spiritual powers were both to be enlisted in this great struggle. Venice stood firm, but its territories were ravaged. The pope, having gained the Romagna, made peace with Venice, and then he sought to embroil the French and the Germans, as he wanted neither of them south of the Alps.

LEAGUE AND COVENANT. See SOLEMNI LEAGUE AND COVENANT.

LEAGUE, HOLY. The term "Holy League" has been applied to three celebrated compacts. 1. In 1576, when an edict of toleration was published in France, the Guises, Philip II. of Spain, the pope, the monks and the French parliament entered into a "holy league" to overthrow the Huguenot party. 2. In 1512 Pope Julius II. made a "holy league" with Ferdinand of Spain, Henry of England, the Venetians and the Swiss to drive the French out of Lombardy. 3. In 1538 Charles V., the archbishops of Mayence and Salzburg, William and Louis of Bavaria, George of Saxony, Erich and Henry of Brunswick entered into a "holy league" to defend the Romish faith against the League of Smalcald.

LEAGUE OF SMALCALD (smal'kald), an alliance formed in 1530, at Smalcald, and renewed at Frankfort, by the elector of Saxony and other princes, with a view to defend their religion and liberties against the dangers to which they were exposed by the proceedings which had been framed at Augsburg. The kings of England, France and Denmark, with the rulers of other states, were invited to join the league, and to unite their influence in maintaining their liberties.

LEAH (le'ah), the elder daughter of Laban, and one of the wives of Jacob. She was the mother of six of his sons, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and of his daughter Dinah. The known incidents in her history are noticed in the life of JACOB. She was buried in the cave of Machpelah, Gen. xlix. 31.

LEATHER (leth'er). Existing specimens prove that the Egyptians were well acquainted with the art of tanning. Pieces of leather dyed various colors have been discovered in their tombs, and they applied this article to many different uses. The Israelites must have learned from them. There could be no lack of the skins of animals in Israel, so numerous were their sacrifices; and we find these skins, more or less dressed and prepared, used sometimes for clothing, Job xxxi. 20, sometimes for coverings, Ex. xxvi. 14, for girdles, 2 Ki. i. 8, and for other purposes, Lev. xiii. 48, 49. Leather, too, was employed for writing upon. The trade of a tanner was in very low esteem among the Jews, and on account of the unpleasant smell was usually carried on outside a city, near rivers or by the sea-side, Acts ix. 43; x. 6, 32.

LEAVEN (lev'en), any substance that promotes fermentation. Sour dough is generally used in the East for this purpose; lees of wine are also employed. The fermentation produced is a kind of putrefaction; indeed, it is distributed into three kinds, the vinous, the acetous, the putrefactive. All leaven was prohibited in meat-offerings, Lev. ii. 11; vii. 12; viii. 2; Num. vi. 15, and specially in the paschal feast of the Hebrews, Ex. xii. 3, 19, 20; whence this was often called "the feast of unleavened bread," Matt. xxvi. 17. The nature of leaven, affecting the whole lump of the substance to which it is added, furnishes some striking illustrations in Scripture, Matt. xiii. 33; 1 Cor. v. 6, as also does the corruption it had undergone; thus we have warnings in Luke xii. 1; 1 Cor. v. 7, 8, where the word is symbolically used for corruptness of life or doctrine.

DISTANT VIEW OF THE LEBANON MOUNTAINS.—See LEBANON.

LEBANA, or LEBANAH (le-bah'nah), one whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 45.

LEBANON (leb'a-non). By this name the double range of mountains to the north of Palestine is known in Scripture. It means "white," or "exceeding white." It takes its name from the brilliance of its snowy peaks, not, as some conjecture, from its gray limestone, which gives to so many parts of Palestine a faded appearance.

Lebanon does not rise in groups or clusters like the Alps, or in one long ridge like the Apennines, but in two parallel ranges of very unequal height, running nearly north and south, the western sloping gradually down, by many subordinate ridges and spurs, to the maritime plain of Phœnicia, the eastern, by a similar series of descents, to the sandy flats of ancient Aram that encircle Damascus.

According to the usual reckoning, Lebanon may be said to extend about eighty or ninety miles in length, and from fifteen to twenty miles in breadth; though, of course, in estimating the breadth and length of such a range, it is not easy to give a precise measurement.

The two ranges were well known to classical writers as Libanus and Antilibanus; and though this distinction is not directly brought out in Scripture, yet it is not unlikely that Lebanon "toward the sun-rising," Josh. xiii. 5, is meant to indicate Antilibanus. Though the western ridge is on the whole loftier than the eastern, yet the southern point of the latter, Jebel-esh-Sheikh (Hermon), towers above all. On one or two of the highest peaks snow lies all the year through.

Looking up the slopes of Lebanon from the maritime plain of Phœnicia, one is not struck with the fertility of the district; but when we ascend, the barrenness disappears, and we find ourselves among cultivated slopes and terraces covered with both fruit trees and forest trees.

Like the mountain groups of Palestine, but unlike those of the Sinaitic district, Lebanon is composed of limestone of a grayish color. Villages root themselves on its sides and heights, castles, chiefly of crusading date, perch themselves on its peaks, while through its magnificent glens rush torrents, great and small, eastward and westward.

Many parts of Lebanon are verdureless, but others are rich in verdure. The heights are often barren, but the valleys are clothed with all kinds of trees—pines, oaks, mulberries, olives, and even figs and vines. The cedar is not so plentiful as it was three thousand years ago. In winding his way through the wild glens or along the mountain slopes the traveler recognizes the meaning of the Scriptural expression, "the smell of Lebanon," Song Sol. iv. 11. The little cluster of ancient cedars, now nearly all that remains of Hiram's forests, is still visited by travelers, and presents a specimen of what Lebanon must once have been. These stand upward of six thousand feet above sea-level.

The allusions to Lebanon are frequent both in Scripture and in the Apocrypha. The "forest of Lebanon" is referred to 1 Ki. vii. 2; "the flower of Lebanon," Nah. i. 4; its "roots," Hos. xiv. 5; its "snow," Jer. xviii. 14; its "streams," Song Sol. iv. 15; its "thistles," 2 Ki. xiv. 9; its "cedars," Ps. xcii. 12; its "wine," Hos. xiv. 7.

"That goodly mountain and Lebanon," Deut. iii. 25, referred to by Moses, are probably two distinct objects, not, as is commonly rendered, "that Among Presbyterians the laity are represented by the ruling elders, who are chosen by the members, and these elders and the pastor rule in the local church, subject to an appeal to the presbytery, the synod and the general assembly. In the Church of England the civil power grasped the control of the Church at the time of the Reformation, and this policy has been defended by many in England as most effectively securing the influence of the laity in the Church through Parliamentary and royal influence. In the Methodist Church, after long discussion, it was settled at Brooklyn, in 1762, that lay delegates should be recognized, but in England the subject of lay representation is still under consideration among the Wesleyan Methodists. In England lay representation has been sanctioned among the primitive Methodists and the New Connection Methodists, and in Ireland the tendency is toward this form of government. The disestablishment of the Irish Episcopal Church in 1869 left that body free, and forthwith lay delegation was adopted, and it also exists in the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States.

CUTTING DOWN TIMBER IN LEBANON.—See LEBANON and CEDAR.

LAY BROTHERS, among the Romanists, are the servants of a convent. A lay-brother wears a different habit from that of the religious; he never enters into the choir, nor is present at the chapters. He is not in any orders, and is employed in the temporal concerns of the convent.

LAYING ON OF HANDS, a significant ordinance used as an outward means for the transference of responsibility and the communication of spiritual gifts, whether in the exercise of supernatural power or as designating or qualifying for some office in the Church, Lev. iii. 2; Num. xxvii. 23; Matt. xix. 15; Mark v. 23; Acts vi. 6; 1 Tim. v. 22; Heb. vi. 2. See HANDS, IMPOSITION OF.

LAYRITZ (li'ritz), PAUL ENGEN, who was born in 1707, in Bavaria, rose to be an influential bishop in the Moravian Church. He was educated at Leipsic. Owing to his acquaintance with Count Zinzendorf, he was made director of the great Moravian educational establishment at Marienborn. The prudence which he evinced led to his appointment to places of trust, and he was sent to St. Petersburg to obtain permission for the Moravians to settle in Russia, to England to examine into the condition of the mission at Labrador, and in 1775 he was made a bishop and appointed over the communities in Silesia. He was also entrusted with the care of the important place at Hernhutt. He was famed for his practical wisdom, his diligence and great efficiency. As an Orientalist he was distinguished, and his acquaintance with modern tongues prepared him for the work to which he was called in different countries. He died in 1788.

LAZARUS (laz'a-rus). 1. A name introduced by our Lord into that remarkable parable in which he exposes the carnal and luxurious selfishness of the worldly man placed in sharp contrast with the poorest, exhibits the change in the world of spirits and delivers an impressive warning, partaking of the character of prophecy, of the rejection of himself and his kingdom by those whom the law and the prophets failed to humble and convince, Luke xvi. 19-31. 2. One, perhaps the youngest, of a family at Bethany whom Jesus loved. He died and was buried, and was restored to life by Christ's almighty power after being in the grave four days. This wonderful miracle enraged the Jews and incited them to seek our Lord's destruction. Lazarus, too, they wished to destroy, as his life was a standing evidence for Christ, inclining many to believe in him, John xi.; xii. 1-11. We hear nothing more of Lazarus in Scripture; perhaps it was felt that one who had seen the eternal world and was restored to this must not be spoken of as a common man; there would be an awe regarding him which would make his history one to be pondered over, not talked about. And this may be a reason why the narrative is given in but one of the Gospels, that written after Lazarus had died again. Of none of those raised by Christ or his apostles from the dead have we any later account. For the rest of their life on earth they must have been wonders to themselves, and must naturally have dwelt in privacy. About Lazarus tradition has been busy; but the stories that are told are not trustworthy.

LAZARISTS (laz'ar-ists), in ecclesiastical history, a body of missionaries founded by St. Vincent de Paul in 1632, so termed from occupying the priory of St. Lazarus, at Paris, as their headquarters. Their primary object was to dispense religious instruction and assistance among the poorer inhabitants of the rural districts of France. They were dispersed at the time of the Revolution, but have been since re-established.

LEACOCK (lay'kok), HAMBLE JAMES, who passed a life of remarkable changes, and who became famous as a missionary of the Church of England, was born in 1795, in the island of Barbadoes. He was educated in his island home, became a parish reader, and Dr. Coleridge, the bishop, admitted him to deacon's orders in 1826. He had inherited many slaves, all of whom he liberated; and owing to his views on slavery, he encountered great opposition, and he removed to St. Vincent and next to Nevis. Thence he went to Kentucky, United States, and he began to teach at Lexington. In 1836 he took charge of a church, and soon had to remove to Tennessee, but in a few months he returned to another charge in Kentucky, at Louisville, and next to his old charge. In 1840 he settled on a farm which he had bought in New Jersey, and he preached in different places around his new home. Having gained a portion of his West Indian property, he undertook a charge at Perth Amboy, but in 1847 his health obliged him to return to the West Indies, and he resigned his parish at Perth Amboy. In Nevis and Barbadoes he denounced the immorality which he witnessed, and in 1855 he volunteered to go as a missionary to Africa; and taking England on his way, he reached Sierra Leone in November of that year. He founded a station at Rio Pongas, and very speedily his efforts told among the population, especially in the training of the young. The climate affected him so severely that he had several times to seek a change of place, but eventually he sunk, in 1855, under the pressure of his labors and the trying climate which his enfeebled system was unable to endure. He opened a great mission field, and he prepared the way for those who are now, under the blessing of God, accomplishing so much for the negro race in their own home.

LEAD (led), a well-known metal. Ancient workings of it have been discovered in the mountains between the Red Sea and the Nile; it is said to exist also near Mount Sinai. But it is not extensively used in the East, nor do we find many notices of it in Scripture. Its weight is alluded to, to illustrate the sinking of the Egyptians in the sea, Ex. xv. 10. Generally, however, it is mentioned in connection with the refining or purifying of more precious metals, for which purpose it was employed, Jer. vi. 29. There is a difference of opinion in regard to Job xix. 23, 24; it might be that engraving on a leaden tablet was meant, but many critics believe that lead was poured into the cavities of the letters after they had been cut in the rock for the purpose of preserving the sharpness of their edges. Lead is also mentioned in Num. xxxi. 22, being probably used for weights, and it may be supposed to have been the material of which a plummet was made, Amos vii. 7; Acts xxvii. 28.

LEADER, CLASS. In the Methodist Church this is the technical term applied to the person who is charged with the care of a "class-meeting." As the "leader" is called on to see the members of the "class" weekly, to advise, pray and consult with them on matters of experience and all details of Christian duty, it is obvious that the qualifications of a leader demand the possession of knowledge, prudence, stability, order and zeal. The "leader" has also to meet the pastor weekly, and thus the class-leaders aid him effectually in his labors.

LEADERS' MEETING. This assembly is composed of the itinerant ministers of a circuit, and all persons in it who are leaders or stewards. These brethren had originally great power, as they admitted or refused membership; they acted as jurors in the trial of accused members; they watched over the administration of the Lord's Supper, and the fund for aiding poor members is under their care. In the American Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, leaders' meetings are held monthly, and in them the pastor learns who are sick or who are walking disorderly. The class-books are examined, and consultation is had as to such persons as may be admitted or dismissed. The leaders are inquired of as to their mode of dealing with their classes; and thus these meetings become most profitable to the pastors, in all details that are of interest in their churches and congregations.

LEAF (leaf). The leaves of trees, which are organs of respiration, and which, from being first green and flourishing, afterward fade and fall off, Christ, and in all he suffered and did most gloriously exemplified. It is as the embodied righteousness of God, satisfying all its demands, that he is, and only could be, the Redeemer of his people; and they who believe in him are now under grace, for the very purpose that the righteousness of the law might be more and more fulfilled in them, by their walking after the Spirit. In short, while the law in its outward and formal exhibition as a covenant, and in its connection with a provisional method of discipline and atonement, has passed away, it lives still, and must ever live, as the revelation of God's righteousness. If replenished as he should be with this Spirit, the believer may be said to be free from the law in the one respect, because he already has it in the other; he breathes the spirit of holy love it requires and aims at that conformity to God's will which it is intended to secure. But lest any, like the false prophets in former times, should set up the fleshly impulses of their own spirit for the promptings of the Spirit of God, the law still stands, with its eternal principles of holiness and its grand landmarks of duty, to expose their folly and determine for ever the path of obedience.

LAW, EDMUND, D.D., a learned divine and able metaphysician, was born in 1703. Ere he left the university of Cambridge, he published an annotated translation of King's "Essay on the Origin of Evil" and "An Inquiry into the Ideas of Space and Time." He was appointed to the living of Salkeld, and soon after wrote two books which are highly esteemed, "Considerations on the Theory of Religion" and "Reflections on the Life and Character of Christ." He was subsequently promoted to and held for twelve years the mastership of Peterhouse, when he was made bishop of Carlisle. It was after this that he published the most important of his undertakings, an edition of the works of Locke, with his life. Of Locke's writings Law was a devoted student, and owed to them much of the liberality which marked his character and appears in his works. He died in 1787.

LAW, WILLIAM, a pious English divine, was born at King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, in 1686, was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, and lived for the most part a retired life at the house of Mrs. Hester Gibbon, aunt of the celebrated historian, to whom he had been tutor. He wrote against Bishop Hoadly, and was also the author of some valuable practical books, as "A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life" and "A Treatise on Christian Perfection." In his latter days he fell into the mystic reveries of Jacob Behman, whose works he intended to publish, but died in 1761 without fulfilling the intention.

LAWN SLEEVES, sleeves of fine linen. At the present day they are fastened to the bishop's "chimere," which is a sort of cope of black satin which has the sleeves of the rochet. The word "chimere" seems to have been first used by Archbishop Parker. It was probably the doctor of divinity's scarlet sleeveless habit worn by bishops in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. Owing to Bishop Hooper's objections, the color was changed to black.

LAWRENCE (law'rens), ABBOTT, who was born in 1792, at Groton, Massachusetts, became one of the most eminent citizens of his country, distinguished in Congress and in civil life for his purity and integrity. He was a commissioner to determine the north-east boundary in the dispute with Great Britain. He represented the United States as minister at the court of St. James, London, in 1849. He honored himself by a donation of $100,000 to found the scientific school at Harvard which bears his name, and he also bequeathed $50,000 to serve as a fund for the erection of model lodging-houses. He died in 1855.

LAWRENCE, AMOS, deserves a place in this work because of his intelligent and profuse liberality in distributing his ample means in the support of different benevolent and literary institutions. He dedicated an immense fortune to these objects, using great discretion in the arrangements which he made. He was born in 1786, at Groton, Massachusetts, and he died in 1852.

LAWRENCE, SIR HENRY MONTGOMERY, was one of the three Lawrence brothers whose names stand out in the administration of Indian affairs with a prominence which their intelligence, integrity, zeal and remarkable powers of administration have justly gained. Henry, who was born in Ceylon, served on the Sutlej, was governor of the Punjaub and chief commissioner at Lucknow when the mutiny of 1857 broke out. He was killed in the siege of Lucknow. His eldest brother was raised to the peerage and made governor-general of India. The valuable "Lawrence Asylum" for the reception of the children of European soldiers in India was founded by Sir Henry; and the three brothers have been as happily characterized by a regard for religion as by their sterling qualities in the administration of civil affairs.

LAWYER (law'yer). This word, in its general sense, denotes one skilled in the law, as in Tit. iii. 13. Hence, among the Jews a lawyer was one versed in the law of Moses, which he taught in the schools and synagogues, Matt. xxviii. 35; Luke x. 25. The same person who is called "a lawyer" in these texts is in the parallel passage, Mark xii. 28, called a scribe; whence it has been inferred that the functions of the lawyers and the scribes were identical. The individual may have been both a lawyer and a scribe, but it does not thence follow that all lawyers were scribes. Some suppose, however, that the "scribes" were the public expounders of the law, while the "lawyers" were the private expounders and teachers of it. But this is a mere conjecture, and nothing more is really known than that the "lawyers" were expounders of the law, whether publicly or privately, or both.

LAY, BENJAMIN, who became known as one of the earliest and most vigorous opponents of slavery, was born at Colchester, in England, in the year 1681. He settled for a short time in Barbadoes, but he was obliged to leave the island because of his hostility to the system of slavery which prevailed. He came to Abingdon, Pennsylvania, and along with Franklin Benezet and others, he soon began to make his views known. The Friends at that time held slaves, and he preferred leaving their communion rather than change his views, as he resolutely refused to eat or wear anything which he knew was produced by slave labor. It is reported of him that "he came into the yearly meeting with a bladder filled with blood in one hand and a sword in the other. He ran the sword through the bladder and sprinkled the blood on several Friends, declaring that so the sword would be sheathed in the bowels of the nation if they did not leave off oppressing the negroes." He lived to see the Friends take a decided stand against the system which he opposed. Lay wrote a work entitled "All Slave-keepers that keep the Innocent in Bondage, Apostates." He died in 1760.

LAY ABBOT, a layman in possession of abbey property. In early times abbots were often appointed because of court favor, and the higher clergy, and even military and civil servants, were raised to the office of abbot with a view to the rich endowment. These lay abbots, and even their families, resided in the "religious houses," and they turned their establishment into places of luxurious entertainment and revelry. A great reform was effected by Charlemagne, who enjoined that educational establishments should be conducted with due diligence, and that the rules of the order should be observed in these institutions.

results of the Reformation in the sixteenth century was the securing to the lay members of the Church a due share in the administration of ecclesiastical affairs. As Christ is the only and all-sufficient Mediator and High Priest, there is no need in Christianity for a mediating priestly caste; for as Neander has observed, "all believers were conscious of an equal relation to Christ as their Redeemer, and of a common participation of communion with God through him, so on this consciousness an equal relation of believers to one another was grounded." As the sacerdotal system of the post-apostolical age grew, the laity gradually lost their place in the government of the Church, and eventually the power was admitted to lie in the bishop's hands; and the Council of Trent decreed that "if any one affirm that all Christians indiscriminately are priests of the New Testament, or that they are mutually endowed with an equal spiritual power, he clearly does nothing but confound the ecclesiastical hierarchy, which is as an army set in array, as if, contrary to the doctrine of the blessed Paul, all were apostles, all prophets, all evangelists, all pastors, all doctors."

and in its general effect upon those who rightly understood and received it, "the law bore the same relation to the spiritual Judaism, which was afterward to merge in the Christian Church, that the casket does to the jewel which it encloses, or the external fence to the garden which it shelters. In itself it was incapable of giving life; it afforded no nutriment to faith, except so far as its ritual and sacrifices raised an expectation of better things to come; but it was valuable as an outward fence against the encroachments of heathenism, as a shelter beneath which the tender blossoms of religion might flourish and expand. The law, in fact, was intended to protect (and mould) the Christianity of the Old Testament, until, in Christ, fections. It could scarcely fail, in such a case, that what was most openly displayed should also be most frequently considered and felt—that the severe aspect of the law, its burdensome ritual and terrible array of penalties against the disobedient, should sink deep into the heart and create a kind of trembling awe upon the spirit even of good men, when they drew into the presence of God and thought of his holiness. They were, as the apostle intimates, in a species of bondage, not having yet in the proper sense received the spirit of adoption, Rom. viii. 18; Gal. iv. 3, 6; yet it was the bondage of children rather than of slaves, loving even while they dreaded, rejoicing while they trembled before the God whom they served. This, however, was the case only with the more enlightened and spiritual members of the old covenant; by much the larger proportion of the Jewish people came greatly short of it, and knew the law mainly, if not exclusively, as an irksome bondage, from which they were fain, as far as possible, to get free. In the worse periods of their history they sought this freedom by altogether bursting the bands which the law threw around them, and openly embracing the rites and pollutions of heathenism. Far more frequently, however, they took the law in part and forsook it in part; complied with certain of its provisions and neglected others; or in the crouching temper of slaves paid a scrupulous regard to the letter of its requirements, while they were content to remain destitute of its spirit of willing and devoted love. Hence the strong denunciations so often met with in the prophets against one or an-

ately contemplated. The apparent contrariety arises simply from regard being had in certain of the passages to the essential principles involved in the law, and in others to the distinctive form these assumed in the Old Testament economy, as that definite covenant of law which was established at Sinai. In the one respect, what existed before exists still, and must ever exist; in the other, it is done away in Christ. Our Lord himself said, in one of his most emphatic announcements, "Think not I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled," Matt. v. 17, 18. No words could more distinctly assert, whatever precise meaning we attach to the fulfilling here spoken of, an absolutely good and perpetually abiding element in the law, independent of all times and circumstances. And yet they could not intend to affirm the perpetuity of what then existed in the very shape and form which belonged to it; for even the prophets, as we have seen, had connected with the era to be brought in by Messiah a change so great that they did not scruple to represent it as the making of a new covenant and an outpouring of gifts such as could not then be looked for. And thus it came to pass that the ceremonial institutions, such as the scapegoat, the two pigeons used in the cleansing of the leper, the cities of refuge, and all others which foreshadowed a spiritual deliverance, such as the manumission of slaves, the year of jubilee, forgiveness of debts, necessarily became obsolete when the real deliverance which they symbolized had been effected. Safety was intimated to the Jew in the paschal service by taking refuge under the blood of the lamb that had been shed, and the shadow or type became obsolete when the true Lamb of God, by one sacrifice, made an end of all offerings for guilt and sin. So also in the case of the scapegoat and the other Levitical arrangements which pointed to the removal of guilt and spiritual cleansing, their value and significance terminated when the true Sin-bearer carried our iniquities and secured for his people that freedom and safety which it is the office of the gospel to proclaim. To this end is the argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in which it is clearly established that the shadowy and typical rites had served their purpose when the substance had been realized in the person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ, while the law of right and wrong—the moral law—still remained as the rule of life for the people of God, to obey which the disposition of heart is given them by the Spirit of the Lord.

Hence it is clear that the statements in New Testament scripture which speak of a continuance must refer to the principles of truth and righteousness embodied in the law, but where they indicate a change they point only to the form of administration. The law, as already stated, viewed in respect to its formal character, bespoke its adaptation to a people still in comparative pupilage; and the means it provided for purification and atonement—by their very nature and the frequency of their recurrence palpably inadequate to the end they aimed at—carried with them the evidence of a framework inherently weak and unprofitable. In that respect, therefore, a change was inevitable; the external framework, having served its purpose, gave way, but only that the great truths and principles it enshrined might be more effectively carried out in the work of Christ and the experience of his people. These, being the expression of God's essential character, were heartily responded to by and through the outpouring of the Spirit of Christ, the latter should attain a strength and maturity which would enable it to stand alone."

The economy of law was in its very nature an imperfect one, and by its inevitably threatening and imperative form was fitted to work more upon the lower than the higher impulses of the soul. Its tendency hence was to "gender unto bondage," Gal. iv. 4, producing, when too exclusively looked to, a slavish spirit of fear, and a certain measure of such a spirit in those who were still by no means enthralled by it. It could scarcely be otherwise, when the revelation of law stood so prominently out, spake so loud, so full, so strong, while the more peculiar gifts and purposes of grace were as yet revealed only in a mystery—under clouds, and shadows, and manifold imper-

other of these forms of contrariety to the covenant of law, Isa. i.; ii. 8-15; Jer. ii.-vii.; Ezek. xvi.; xxiii.; Hab. i., etc., and the imperfection occasionally charged upon that covenant itself, especially on account of its prevailing outwardness, as compared with the better things to come, when the Lord would deal more directly with the hearts of his people, and implant in them a new spirit of life, Jer. xxxi. 31; Ezek. xxxvi. 22, 38.

5. The relation of the law to Christ and Christianity cannot require much explanation, after what has been already advanced. If the statements in New Testament scripture on this branch of the subject are looked at superficially, they may appear somewhat inconsistent with each other, and different conclusions will naturally be drawn from them, according to the class of passages more immedi-but recognizing the seed of Israel as by virtue of the prior covenant already children of promise, children whom he had signally owned and redeemed, it sought to educate them as such, and form them to the high calling and destiny it became them to fulfill. Not, therefore, to supersede the former covenant (in which all wealth and blessing had been freely conferred first on Abraham, then on the chosen portion of his seed) was the law introduced, but as a handmaid to the covenant of promise, that the heirs of promise might not by unworthy conduct forfeit their title to the blessing, but might act so as to secure its fullest possible realization.

This is the line of thought which in the gospel was pursued by the apostle Paul in dealing with his erring countrymen, more generally in the Epistle to the Romans, more specially and particularly in the Epistle to the Galatians. In both of these he shows it was quite a mistake to imagine that salvation and blessing could come to fallen men by the law, that the very period of its introduction, and the parties to whom it was given, alone sufficed, when duly considered, to prove the reverse, and that, so far from being designed, or in itself fitted, to constitute a title to life and blessing, the law rather tended to destroy any hope of this, and to shut men up to another ground of confidence than could by means of it be possibly attained. The whole matter, indeed, becomes plain as soon as it is distinctly ascertained what is the relation of men, as partakers of life and blessing, to God. They enter into this relation simply as subjects of grace—not that they have deserved or can deserve anything at the hands of God, but that he has chosen in his sovereign mercy to make them partakers of his loving-kindness and place them on a friendly footing with himself. But then this very relationship to God—a God of untainted purity as well as rich grace, and from whom grace itself must ever work in subservience to the ends of righteousness, Rom. v. 21—inevitably carries with it the obligation and the call to be like him in mind and character. So it appears in the case of Abraham, who, while he had nothing whereof to boast before God, receiving as he did all freely, yet had it in charge to walk before God and be perfect—nay, was by the Lord himself apprehended as one who would command his children and his household after him to keep the way of the Lord, to do judgment and justice, Gen. xvii. 1; xviii. 19. So again was it with collective Israel, who were no sooner redeemed from the house of bondage than they were told how needful it was for them to obey the Lord's voice and be a holy nation, in order to make good the purpose of their redemption and attain to the proper enjoyment of its blessings, Ex. xix. 5, 6. In such things we have already the germ and spirit of the law; and to give distinct utterance to what had been thus previously understood or briefly announced, to present it in full detail before Israel, and formally bind it upon their conscience—this, and nothing more, was the direct end aimed at by the revelation of law at Mount Sinai.

3. We naturally look next to the internal structure of the law and the relative adjustments of its parts as bearing on the end in question. In this respect pre-eminence regard must ever be had to the ten commandments, which formed the heart and kernel of the whole legislation at Sinai. Here, however, it is unnecessary to enlarge upon the point itself or to dwell upon the nature of the decalogue, as this fundamental portion of the law, being strictly moral in its tone, necessarily diffused the same spirit through other parts of the legislation. Even such provisions as in their formal aspect bore much of an outward and ceremonial impress, could not but derive from this central code a moral character and design. It is only thus also we can explain how the more gifted and pious members of the old covenant—those who really sought and were in some measure enabled to penetrate into the design of its legislation—could speak in such high terms of the law generally, of the manifold depth of meaning they found in it, and the spiritual benefit they were conscious of deriving from the earnest and thoughtful meditation of its contents, Ps. xix.; cxix., etc. It was the character of God even more than his being, and the spirit of his worship more than the worship a right and a wrong which it behoved the people carefully to consider, and calling in the aid of outward and corporeal things to remind them of the fact of the distinction or to deepen the impression of it on their minds. Thus the touch of the dead was held to defile, because death is the wages of sin, and wherever death is there should be a remembrance of iniquity and an earnest turning from it as from that which is abhorrent to the nature of the ever-living and blessed God. Thus also certain articles of food were prohibited, while others were permitted, to impress them with the truth that as children of the covenant they had perpetually to choose between an evil and a good, to lay a restraint upon the tendencies of fleshly nature and subordinate its desires to the mind of God. And in like manner with other provisions of the law; there was nothing in the externalism of these that might be said to stand apart or to be prescribed merely for its own sake. It pointed in one respect or another to the eternal principles of itself, which it was the aim of the law to reveal, and which it sought by manifold rites and institutions to work into the convictions and lives of the covenant people. Only in so far as this took effect was the proper work of the law accomplished, as many a passage in the Psalms and prophets might be adduced to prove—for example, Ps. xv.; xxiv. 1; Isa. i. 10-18; v. 1-7, etc.—and as appears indeed from the apostle's brief but pregnant delineation of a Jew, Rom. ii. 28, 29.

There are three leading principles or positions to be here maintained respecting the law, in which the truth upon this subject may be summed up. 1. Its predominantly moral aim as exhibited especially in what formed the fundamental part of the revelation—the law of the ten commandments—and which gave the tone to all the other and subsidiary parts of the system. 2. The symbolical or teaching character of the ceremonial part of its enactments. These stood to the moral principles and obligations of the law in the relation of signs and monitors, not, indeed, defining what was right or wrong in behavior, but implying that there was truth and righteousness written on the tables of stone, and warned men to consider how they stood affected to such. 3. Besides this teaching element, however, there was a propitiatory and purifying element associated with the rites and observances of the law. This was necessary to relieve it of what would otherwise have been its intolerable rigor; for had it only spoken of righteousness and sin, obligations of duty and liabilities of punishment, it would have entirely overshadowed the covenant of promise and crushed the spirit of those on whom it was imposed. Therefore, as it was itself ordained to be a handmaid to that covenant of promise, it coupled symbols of cleansing and atonement with methods of instruction and discipline, so that the sense of guilt which by one class of its provisions it was ever awaking was graciously met by another, and the heart was again reassured as to its interest in the favor and loving-kindness of God.

4. It will readily be understood from the preceding remarks what was the natural, proper and legitimate operation of the law. Viewed as a whole, rifice. They were connected with the civil and political law; for they separated Israel from other nations, and with their sanctions, so to speak, they were the framework of the theocracy.

3. The CIVIL or POLITICAL LAW regulated the relations of man to man in society, exhibited God in his theocratical character as the legislator and monarch of Israel, and constituted the statutes of his kingdom. Their excellence consisted in their adaptation to the circumstances of the people to whom they were given. Men have to be educated up to a good system; laws, therefore, are made suited to the growth of those for whom they are intended. They should be a little in advance of the age, to lead men forward; were they more than that little, they would be as useless as an instrument in the hands of a person who was unaccustomed to use it. God's wisdom was seen in fitting the system he promulgated to the untutored state of the Hebrew people. It mitigated many evils; it tended to refine their habits; and it is no impeachment of its value, to say that a state of society would come which had outgrown it. This fact was openly stated by our Lord, Matt. xix. 8; and it is because this principle is not perceived that some have fallen into dangerous error and have dared to charge Jehovah with folly. A grand principle pervades it—that crime is more than a breach of human law, it is sin also against God; and disobedience was a fault against the heavenly King. In no sense did the law of Moses contradict the coming dispensation, for it was the elementary introduction to a more developed system; and thus our Lord declared that he came not to destroy but to fulfill it, to give all its types their perfect realization, to establish that spiritual kingdom which carried to its highest glory the theocratical principle of the earlier polity, to inspire the only effective motive which could ensure obedience to its moral precepts, and thus to be "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth," Rom. x. 4. Crimes against the Mosaic law were visited with specified punishments. Some acts, indeed, were reserved to the peculiar judgment of God, but for most of them penalties were named, sometimes capital and sometimes of a secondary nature, while distinctions were made between those committed presumptuously and those which flowed from human infirmity.

Having thus given a general idea of the relation which the moral, the ceremonial and the civil law bear to each other, it is necessary that certain points should be considered which require elucidation, for on the right understanding of them not a little depends for the clear comprehending of the word of God.

1. The historical place of the law, or the period of its introduction into the divine communications, is the first point that claims attention. "The law came by Moses," not sooner; and amid all the transactions recorded in the earlier portions of Scripture respecting God's intercourse with men, no attentive reader can fail to mark the general absence of what wears the aspect of law. In the primeval constitution of things there was just the one authoritative prescription—the prohibition against eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, given as a test of obedience; and between the memorable period of the fall and Moses the appointment of blood for blood, Gen. ix. 6, and the institution of the ordinance of circumcision, Gen. xvii., are the only divine acts which take the form of law, and as such were afterward embraced in the legal economy. Not but that there were the elements of law in much that was transacted and done in those earlier times, because there was what contained the grounds and principles of moral obligation. These are inherent in the very constitution of man and his relative place in creation; they were also more or less embodied in every manifestation and act of Godhead toward the human family from the commencement of time to the revelation from Mount Sinai. For everything by which God makes himself known in his character as the moral Governor of the world of necessity brings with it a corresponding obligation to his rational offspring. In this respect the whole history of God's dealings with the primeval and patriarchal world, from first to last, was inwrought with indications of God's character, consequently with the essential principles of truth and duty; and on the measure of light and sense of obligations thus obtained were founded the religious observances, the social institutions and relative duties which prevailed among the better portion of the human family. Doubtless, had they been more earnest inquirers into the ways of God, and more conscientious imitators of them, even the best would have both understood and done more in the divine service than they actually did, while the practices of idolatry, polygamy, licentiousness and crime, which filled the world with their foul and bitter fruits, would have been unknown.

It is one thing, however, to say that in those works and ways of God there were the elements of law, and another to say that God revealed himself by law; the one is true, but not the other, except in the occasional and partial manner already noticed. The law needed its preparation as well as the gospel, and the preparation chiefly consisted in the trial that was made of human nature during the lengthened period in question, under sufficiently clear revelations of God's mind and will, coupled with numberless acts of divine mercy and judgment, yet with scarcely anything that could be called positive restraint or authoritative command. God sought to deal with men as with children, by his own gracious procedure pointing to them the way, and appealing to their better natures whether they would follow it or not. But the trial, though infinitely varied and perpetually renewed, failed of its great design; it served only to show how deep the fountain of evil was in men's bosom, how prone they were on every hand to presume on God's goodness and break forth into acts of waywardness and folly. It became manifest that if he was to have a people formed in any measure after his holiness, and capable of doing him faithful service in the world, they would need, besides other methods of instruction, to be hemmed in by the restraints of an effective discipline and trained to habits of righteousness. And such was the primary design of the law: "it was added because of transgressions," Gal. iii. 19—namely, because of the inveterate proneness to these which had discovered itself in the past, and that now, at length, by the more direct and stringent exercise of God's authority, commanding what is good, forbidding what is evil, there might be secured a general conformity to the ways of holiness.

2. The relation of the law to preceding revelations of God, in particular to the covenant of promise made with Abraham and his seed, comes next in order as a point for consideration. It undoubtedly formed a marked era in the history of the chosen seed, and was above all other things the means of uniting them into a compact, and in spirit and character somewhat homogeneous, people; so that, if guided by merely patriotic feelings, it might not be unnatural for them to look to the legislation of Moses as the ground of their national greatness. And this might have been well, had the polity established by the law been only of a civil kind, and had the calling of Israel under it reached no higher than that of some earthly commonwealth. But it was another matter when contemplated, as the law should have been, with respect to their relation to God and the position they were appointed to occupy as his covenant people. In this point of view, the law could not be isolated from former revelations without thrusting it out of its proper place, and to some extent defeating the very end for which it was given. Such, however, was the mistake, and such also was the consequence of the mistake, too often made by the Israelites themselves, and never more than in the later periods of their history. Yet, looking at the matter historically, the mistake might be said to be without any reasonable excuse. For the law, in its very form and structure, as well as its professed design, was based upon the covenant of promise made with Abraham, and assumed an existing relationship already formed by that covenant. It did not aim at making those who were far off from God, and dead, as regards the interests of righteousness, living members of his kingdom ward he obtained the living of Hayford Warren, Oxfordshire, and subsequently a stall at Worcester, which, in 1732, he resigned for a residentiaryship at St. Paul's. Soon after, he was presented by the chapter of that cathedral with the livings of St. Michael Bassishaw and St. Mary, Aldermanbury, but vacated all his benefices in 1747, on being advanced to the see of Exeter. Over this diocese he continued to preside till his death, in 1762. Bishop Lavington was the author of an able and well-known treatise, entitled "The Enthusiasm of the Methodists and Papists Compared," besides a tract against the Moravians.

LAW is a rule of conduct enforced by an authority superior to that of the moral beings to whom it is given. The word law is sometimes also employed in order to express not only the moral connection between free agents, inferior and superior, but also in order to express the connection between cause and effect in inanimate nature. The expression, however, "law of nature," is improper and figurative. The term "law" implies, in its strict sense, spontaneity, or the power of deciding between right and wrong, and of choosing between good and evil, as well on the part of the lawgiver as on the part of those who have to regulate their conduct according to his dictates. It frequently signifies not merely an individual rule of conduct, as "the law of burnt-offering," the law concerning the conduct of women after childbirth, Lev. xii. 2, the law concerning the conduct of persons afflicted with leprosy, Lev. xiv. 2, but it signifies also a whole body of legislation, as "the law given by Moses," 1 Ki. ii. 3, which, in reference to its divine origin, is called "the law of Jehovah," Ps. xix. 8; Isa. v. 24. In the latter sense it is called, by way of eminence, "THE LAW," Deut. i. 5.

In a wider sense, the word "law" is employed in the New Testament to express any guiding or directing power originating from the nature of anything existing. Law is a certain power restraining from some and impelling to other things or actions. Whatever has such a power, and exercises any sway over man, may be called law, in a metaphorical sense. Thus the apostle, Rom. vii. 23, calls the right impulses and the sanctified will of the mind "the law of the mind," and the perverse desire to sin which is inherent in our members, "the law in the members." In the same manner he calls that power of faith which certainly governs the whole man, since the actions of every man are swayed by his convictions, "the law of faith." So the power and value ascribed to ceremonies, or rather to all outward acts, he designates "the law of precepts." Similar expressions are, "the law of sin," Rom. vii. 23, "the law of the Spirit," Rom. viii. 2, "the law of righteousness," Rom. ix. 31, the authority of the husband over his wife, Rom. vii. 2, the holy impulse created by the sense of spiritual liberty, James i. 25; ii. 12.

The Mosaic law is especially embodied in the last four books of the Pentateuch. In Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers there is perceptible some arrangement of the various precepts, although they are not brought into a system. In Deuteronomy the law or legislation contained in the three preceding books is repeated with slight modifications. The whole legislation has for its manifest object to found a theocratical hierarchy, the manifest aim of which is to make that which is really holy prevail.

The Jews divide the whole Mosaic law into six hundred and thirteen precepts, of which two hundred and forty-eight are affirmative and three hundred and sixty-five negative. The number of the affirmative precepts corresponds to the two hundred and forty-eight members of which, according to rabbinical anatomy, the whole human body consists. The number of the negative precepts corresponds to the three hundred and sixty-five days of the solar year, or, according to a rabbinical work, the negative precepts agree in number with the three hundred and sixty-five veins which, they say, are found in the human body. Hence their logic concludes that if on each day each member of the human body keeps one affirmative precept and abstains from one thing forbidden, the whole law, and not the decalogue alone, is kept. Women are subject to the negative precepts or prohibitions only, and not to the affirmative precepts or injunctions. This exception arises partly from their nature and partly from their being subject to the authority of husbands. According to some rabbinical statements, women are subject to one hundred precepts only, of which sixty-four are negative and thirty-six affirmative. The number six hundred and thirteen corresponds also to the number of letters in the decalogue.

THE HOOPOE.—See LAWYING.

The Jews assert that besides the written law, which may be translated into other languages, and which is contained in the Pentateuch, there was communicated to Moses on Mount Sinai an oral law, which was subsequently written down, together with many rabbinical observations, and is contained in the twelve folio volumes which now constitute the Talmud, and which the Jews assert cannot be, or at least ought not to be, translated. See TALMUD.

In the Old Testament we do not read of a learned profession of the law. Lawyers are mentioned only after the decline of the Mosaic institutions had considerably advanced. It is, indeed, very remarkable that, in a nation so entirely governed by law, there were no lawyers forming a distinct profession, and that the lawyers of a later age were not so much remarkable for enforcing the spirit of the law as rather for ingeniously evading its injunctions by leading the attention of the people from its spirit to a most minute literal fulfillment of its letter. See LAWYER.

In treating of the subject of law, in connection with the Old Testament, it is necessary to view it—

1. In its moral aspect as the rule of right and wrong. 2. As ceremonial, including the details given to the Israelites by Moses, which was embodied in their ritual, and which was intended to affect them in the regulation of their daily life. 3. As civil, including the regulations which were given by Moses to govern the Israelites in their national life, touching obedience to rulers, the enjoyment, tenure and disposal of property, the payment of taxes, and all the details which were requisite for the government and conduct of an associated civilized people.

1. LAW, MORAL. On the first a long exposition is not required, as the whole subject is contained and fully covered in the decalogue, or the ten commandments. The fact that man conceives the ideas of right and wrong clearly shows that he has been created a moral agent; for the feeling of right involves a reference to a rule of right, and the consciousness of wrong always carries with it a reference to law and authority that have been set at naught, and it is inseparable from a feeling of ill desert or guilt because of such wrong-doing. It is evidently a matter of the utmost importance to all moral agents that a lucid, simple and yet comprehensive digest should be available in which the range of human duty should be described. This digest is found in the code contained in the ten commandments, which because of its brevity and simplicity may be easily comprehended and remembered, while the range of its requirements extends over all the relations in which the moral agent stands toward God and toward his fellow-man. That all possible forms of obedience could be included in the requirements of a code so simple in its terms and so contracted in its bulk is certainly a powerful argument for the divine origin of the decalogue, seeing that it comprehends in its requirements and forbids in its prohibitions more than the statute-books of nations are able to set forth, even after years of legislation. The imperfection of human legislation and the all-seeing range of the divine mind are thus brought together in a most impressive connection; and on this point it only requires that the reader should be reminded of the fact that in all philosophical and ethical disquisitions on human duty, the more fully that they evolve such principles as enjoin moral purity and human goodness, the nearer do they approach to the sublime standard which the great Lawgiver has set forth in his own law. This law of human duty has never been repealed. It was obeyed and honored by our Lord, who opened up the spirituality of its character, and who has given it to his people as the rule of their lives. To its requirements he would have them to conform, and to secure their conformity thereunto he has graciously given the Holy Spirit to renew, to purify their hearts, and thus he enables them to love his law and to walk with freedom in the paths of his commandments.

2. The CEREMONIAL LAW, or the law of ordinances, prescribed the mode of Hebrew worship. It was constructed with an elaborate reference to the great gospel doctrines which should be at last fully revealed to mankind. It was suited for a temporary purpose, and its rites were also shadows with a definite relation to the substance which was to supersede them. They were types and figures of better things to come, Gal. iv. 3-5. They were connected with the moral law, because, while that demanded undivided reverence to God, they showed how that reverence might be paid; and when the moral law was broken, they held out the hope of forgiveness, as they taught that pardon and safety were to be had by substitution and sac-

LAUDS, in church music, are hymns of praise. The service which followed next after the Nocturn was so designated before the Reformation. The lauds are now, in the reformed Church of England, merged in the matins. The office of Lauds contains the Benedicite and the Benediction, as that of Matins does the Te Deum. Both have psalmody and hymns.

LAUGH (laf), LAUGHTER (laf'ter). Laughter sometimes implies incredulity, Gen. xviii. 12-15; Matt. ix. 24, sometimes derision, Neh. ii. 19, sometimes joy, Gen. xxi. 6; Ps. cxxvi. 2, and sometimes the consciousness of security, Job v. 22. When God is said to laugh, the phrase is to express scornful indignation, Ps. ii. 4; xxxvii. 13; Prov. i. 26.

LAURA (law'ra), a name given to a collection of little cells in which the hermits of ancient times lived together in a wilderness. These hermits did not live in community, but each monk provided for himself in his distinct cell. The most celebrated lauras mentioned in ecclesiastical history were in Palestine. The most ancient monasteries in Ireland were lauras.

LAURENCE (law'rens), RICHARD, D.C.L., an eminent prelate, was born at Bath, in 1760, and graduated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. Upon the appointment, in 1796, of his brother to the regius professorship of civil law, he was made deputy professor, and took up his residence in Oxford. He was the preacher of the Bampton Lectures in 1804; and in consequence of the reputation he thence acquired, he was presented by the archbishop of Canterbury to the rectory of Mersham, Kent. In 1814 he was appointed to the chair of regius professor of Hebrew and to the canonry of Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1822 was elevated to the archiepiscopal see of Cashel. He died suddenly in Dublin, December 28, 1838. His most important contributions to Biblical literature are his translations of Apocryphal books of the Old Testament from the Ethiopic, and the critical investigations with which they were accompanied.

LAURENTIUS (law-ren'sh'us). Three persons of this name deserve notice: 1. Who lived during the last half of the sixth century. As an anti-pope he was opposed to Symmachus, who had been elected in A. D. 498. The strife raged with great violence for some time; but the case being left in the hands of the Arian Theodoric, the king of the Goths, he decided on behalf of Symmachus. Laurentius was made bishop of Nocera, but in A. D. 501 he was deposed under a charge of Eutychianism, and he died in exile.

2. The successor of Augustine at Canterbury, and an exceedingly sagacious prelate. On the death of Ethelbert, his successor, Eadbald, had married his own mother-in-law, who was a heathen, and the cause of Christianity soon became endangered; but Laurentius succeeded in prevailing on Eadbald to embrace the new faith, to renounce his marriage, and to aid the Church so effectively that its power rapidly increased.

3. Under the persecution by Valerian, when the pope was led out to execution, an archdeacon named Laurentius wished to go with him to martyrdom, but the pope intimated that great sufferings awaited him. Being called by the Roman governor to reveal where the treasures of the Christians were concealed, he collected a number of the lame, the sick and the poor, and told him that these were the treasures of Christians, whereupon he was condemned to be roasted alive on an iron chair. Under Constantine the church known as that of "St. Lawrence Without the Walls" was erected over the place where his remains were said to have been deposited. His name and fame have ever been conspicuous in Rome, as he has held the same position in that city as was assigned to Stephen at Jerusalem.

LAURENTIUS (law-ren'sh'us), VALLA, who became one of the most remarkable men of his age, was born in the year 1415 at Rome. Very early in life he directed his powers against the growing scholasticism of the age. He boldly assailed the claim of the Church which had rested on the great deed of donation by Constantine the Great, which he affirmed was a mere device of the theologians. In the same spirit he disputed the origin of the so-called Creed of the Apostles, and he pointed out many errors in the different versions of the Latin Bible. He had to fly to Naples, as he was denounced as an infidel, but in Naples he continued his assaults, aiming also at irregularities among the clergy, and the result was he had to submit to a public whipping. Strange to say, Pope Nicholas V. permitted him to return to Rome, even to teach, and he granted him a salary. He rested his arguments against scholasticism on common sense, held that many mysteries connected with our being and with religion must ever remain mysterious, that faith was essential to virtue, and that where faith and hope are excluded the views of the Epicureans or of the Stoics must prevail, for philosophy is utterly powerless to purify, to sustain or comfort the human soul. He died at Rome in 1457.

LAVALETTE (la-va-let'), ANTHONY DE, who was born in 1707, at Valbres, and who became a Jesuit, enjoys the peculiar distinction of being the occasion of the suppression of the order in France in 1764. He spent some time in the island of Martinique, and in 1754 he became the general of the Jesuits in South America. In order to reduce the debt of the Jesuit mission he entered on commercial speculation, which increased the complications of the society. He failed and fled; and on reaching England, he was turned out of the society. The society was prosecuted by his creditors, but on the plea that he had acted without authority the claim was resisted. On an appeal to Parliament the question was decided against the Jesuits, and on the 8th day of May, 1761, the society was decreed to pay the whole claim, amounting to five millions of francs, together with costs. A few months afterward, their institution was attacked as illegal, and unfit for protection in any free country; while in France the order was suppressed by an edict in the month of November, A. D. 1764.

LAVATER (la-va'ter), JOHANN GASPAR, a celebrated physiognomist and eloquent preacher, was born at Zurich, in 1741. He became pastor of the principal church of St. Peter at his native place, and was distinguished by his unwearied zeal in behalf of practical Christianity. He died in 1801, in consequence of a wound which he received in 1799, when the French troops under Massena took Zurich by storm. He was the author of "Jesus the Messiah," "Spiritual Hymns," "Swiss Lays," etc.; but the work by which he is universally known, and which once was highly popular, is his "Physiognomic Fragments," which has been translated into most European languages. Lavater was pious, but credulous; enthusiastic, but sincere.

LAVATORY (lav'a-to-re), the conduit used by monks for washing their hands before dinner in the cloisters. It remains at Norwich and Westminster; also a trough for the sacristans to wash the corporals and their hands, as at Chichester, Elgin and Lincoln.

LAVER (la'ver), one of the utensils of the tabernacle to contain the water necessary for the ablutions of the priests during their ministrations. It was made of the metal mirrors of the women, and consisted of a large basin and a foot or pedestal, Ex. xxx. 18-21; xxxviii. 8. It was to stand in the court of the tabernacle, between the sacred tent and the altar, Ex. xl. 30-32. Possibly the sacrifices were also washed in this laver. When the temple was built, a much larger basin, called the molten sea, was constructed for the priests; while, for the washing of the things offered, ten lavers were made, each holding forty baths, about three hundred gallons. Five of them were placed on the right hand, and five on the left, 2 Chr. iv. 6. These lavers stood upon square bases mounted on wheels, and were ornamented with figures of cherubim, lions and palm trees. Possibly the bases or stands received the water drawn from the lavers, 1 Ki. vii. 27-40. But it is very difficult to understand from the description, minute as it is, exactly how the lavers and bases were constructed.

LAVINGTON (lav'ing-ton), GEORGE, a prelate of great piety and learning, was born in Wiltshire, England, in 1683, and graduated at New College, Oxford, in 1713. Four years after cannot be defended. No doubt the power of the Church has been largely consolidated and its mastery over the spiritual concerns of its people has been secured by the retention of Latin in the sacramental services of the Church; and a recognition of the fact that advantages have followed the usage, can on one account for the determined opposition which has been displayed against a change. In the ninth century an effort was made with a view to a change. In 1431 the Bohemian Church, at the Synod of Basle, obtained permission to use the vernacular, but ere long all such concessions were gradually repealed. The Council of Trent justified the practice of celebrating mass in Latin, on the grounds that, as languages are liable to change, if modern tongues were used, the terms might vary, and so ideas would creep in which might introduce false doctrine and heresy; that if different languages were permitted, such priests as understood their vernacular alone would be unable to celebrate the mass in a foreign country; and farther, that the mass being the most solemn of mysteries, it would be wrong to use the vernacular in its celebration, lest heretics might profane such a solemn service. Bellarmine and all subsequent theologians have defended the Romish use on these grounds, which they have modified so as to meet the form in which the arguments of opponents have been presented; and thus the strange spectacle has been presented of a Church, from age to age, calling its members to worship God in the most solemn acts, and yet the service must be observed in a tongue which the people do not comprehend, as if that could be most precious to mankind which they do not understand.

Since the Reformation, the Protestant Churches have held that God should be worshiped in a tongue which was understood by the worshippers. The Church of England declared in the twenty-fourth article that "It is a thing plainly repugnant to the word of God and the custom of the primitive Church to have public prayer in the Church, or to minister the sacraments, in a tongue not understood of the people." In France, Scotland, America, and wherever Protestant missions have carried the gospel to the heathen, the vernacular has been used, on the obvious principle that all worship ought to be an intelligent, rational service, a principle which is ratified alike by reason and the word of God.

LATIN VERSIONS. See VERSIONS.

LATITUDINARIANS (lat-i-too-di-na're-anz), certain divines so called from the latitude of their principles. The term is chiefly applied to some divines of the seventeenth century who were attached to the English establishment as such, but regarded episcopacy and forms of public worship as among the things indifferent. They would not exclude from their communion those who differed from them in those particulars.

LATOMIUS (la-to'me-us), JACOBUS, a celebrated controversial divine in the sixteenth century, was born at Cambron, in Hainault, and became a doctor and professor of divinity in the university of Louvain, and is classed by the Romanists among the ablest opponents of Luther. He died in 1544. Among his works is "A Dialogue concerning the Three Languages, or the Study of Theology," in which he endeavors to defend scholastic divinity, and, without naming Erasmus, to refute many things in his treatise on the study of divinity.

LATRIA (la'tre-a). In Roman Catholic theology this term is applied to the worship of God, the adoration paid to the saints being distinguished by the name dulia.

LATTA (lat'ta), JAMES, D.D., who greatly distinguished himself in the Revolutionary war, was born in Ireland, in the year 1732. He came to America, and graduated in the university of Pennsylvania, in which institution he became a tutor. He entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, and settled in the church of Deep Run in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, from which, in 1770, he removed to Chestnut Level, in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania. The academy which he established at this place was long celebrated. In the Revolutionary war he served as a soldier and as a chaplain. Subsequently he took a decided part in the introduction of the hymns and paraphrase of the Psalms by Dr. Watts, in the worship of the Presbyterian Church; holding to the principle that the chief subjects of psalmody should be taken out of the gospel, and in support of his views he published a pamphlet which was well received. He died in 1801.

LAUD (lawd), WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Charles I., was born in 1573, at Reading, in Berkshire; was educated at St. John's College, Oxford; was ordained in 1601; accompanied James I. to Scotland, as one of his chaplains, in 1617; was installed prebendary of Westminster in 1620; and obtained the see of St. David's in the following year. On the accession of Charles I. his influence became very great, and he was translated to the see of Bath and Wells, and, in 1628, to that of London. In 1630 he was elected chancellor of the university of Oxford, to which he was a great benefactor, and which he enriched with an invaluable collection of manuscripts in a great number of languages. In 1633 he attended Charles into Scotland; on his return he was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and during the same year he was chosen chancellor of

LATTA, SAMUEL A., who was born in 1804, in Ohio, and educated for the practice of medicine, devoted himself to the work of the ministry in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He labored in Michigan and in various districts in Ohio. He acted as agent for the American Colonization Society, and Augusta College, in Ohio, and for some years he edited the "Methodist Recorder." He published "The Chain of Sacred Wonders," which became very popular. He was eminent for his pulpit power and his great felicity in description. He died in 1852.

the university of Dublin. The zeal which he displayed for conformity to the Church, and his endeavors to introduce the liturgy into Scotland, created him numerous enemies. At the commencement of the Long Parliament, therefore, he was impeached by the Commons and sent to the Tower. After lying there three years, he was brought to his trial before the Lords, by whom he was acquitted, but the lower house passed a bill of attainder, declaring him guilty of treason, which they compelled the peers to pass; the archbishop was accordingly beheaded on Tower Hill, January 10, 1644-45, and met his fate with great fortitude. The works of Archbishop Laud consist of sermons, the report of his famous controversy with the Jesuit Fisher, in 1622, his speeches, diary, "Book of Devotions," "History of his Troubles and Correspondence." His character has been depicted in exaggerated colors by opposite parties, some expressing unmitigated contempt, others almost unlimited reverence.

cal dignities was the exclusive right of the Church, and that the practice of secular princes giving such investiture was an usurpation. The celibacy of the clergy was also decreed. The second was held in 1139. It was composed of nearly one thousand bishops, under the presidency of Pope Innocent II. It decided on the due election of this pope, and condemned the errors of Peter de Bruys and Arnold of Brescia. The third was held in 1179. At this council, with Pope Alexander III. at their head, three hundred and two bishops condemned what they were pleased to call the "errors and impieties" of the Waldenses and Albigenses. The fourth was held in 1215. It was composed of four hundred and twelve bishops, under Innocent III., and had for its objects the recovery of the Holy Land, reformation of abuses and the extirpation of heresy. The fifth was convened in 1512 by Julius II. to oppose another held by nine cardinals of high rank the year before at Pisa with a view to bridle his wild animosity, day, in the same pulpit utterly discomfited the prior, who was present, and subsequently came out of the lists victorious against the learned Venetus. These occurrences caused West, bishop of Ely, to interfere and issue his inhibition against Latimer, which, however, was withdrawn by Cardinal Wolsey, who gave him license to preach throughout England. On this he acted, and preached plainly and boldly. He gained the favor of Henry VIII. by a sermon preached before him, and further won upon that monarch by a letter of remonstrance respecting the prohibition of a translation of the New Testament. His enemies were everywhere on the alert to injure him, and heard various accusations against him, which were brought before appointed commissioners. He was called on to subscribe to a set of articles placed before him, but he resolutely refused. When, however, these were reduced to two, the obligation of Lent and the lawfulness of the crucifix and of images in churches, he consented, and asked forgiveness for having

After being imprisoned here, they were conducted to St. Mary's Church, to appear before the commissioners. Articles were read to him, and he was called on to dispute against them on the following Wednesday. Instead of doing this, the aged Latimer commenced to read a profession of his faith, but was not allowed to proceed. Refusing either to dispute or subscribe, on the following Friday he was excommunicated, and then condemned, along with his brother prelates. But he and they lay miserably in prison for sixteen months, when another commission pronounced sentence against them for heresy, and a fortnight afterward, on October 16, 1555, they were burned on a spot opposite Balliol College. As the burning fagot was laid at Ridley's feet, Latimer cried out, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man! We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out!"

LATIN (lat'in), Luke xxiii. 38; John xix. 20, the language of the ancient Romans.

LATIN CHURCH is the name which has been extensively given to the Romish or Western branch of the Church, to distinguish it from the Eastern or Greek Church. As Greek is used in the services of the Greek Church, so Latin is used in the services of the Romish or Western Church as the common ecclesiastical language. In all Reformed or Protestant churches, the vernacular of each country is appropriately used.

LATIN CROSS, a plain cross whose transverse beam is one-third the length of the upright one.

LATIN DOCTORS, FOUR, Jerome of Bethlehem, A. D. 420, the author of the Vulgate translation; Ambrose, the bishop of Milan, 397, usually considered the author of the "Te Deum;" Augustine, 430, the bishop of Hippo, the great theological writer of his age; and Gregory, 604, usually styled the Great, who sent Augustine of Canterbury to England, and who introduced Christianity into the southern part of the kingdom among the heathen Anglo-Saxons.

LATIN, USAGE OF, IN RELIGIOUS SERVICES. In the early ages of the Church, when Christianity was being spread throughout the Latin-speaking provinces of the Roman empire, it was natural that Latin should be used in all religious services, just as Greek was used in Greece and in other lands in Asia where the Greek language prevailed. This was in accordance with the apostolic practice, 1 Cor. xiv. 16, 19, as the early preachers always used a language which could be understood by the people whom they addressed. At a later day, when the Roman empire began to manifest symptoms of decline, and new dialects were developed which afterward matured into distinct tongues, there was a propriety in still adhering to the ancient language. Only for this course, as it has been well observed, "not a book, not a page, not a syllable, would have reached us of the thought, the life or the events of that period. From the fourth to the seventh century there would have been an impenetrable gap in the annals of humanity; the voice of history would have been hushed into a dead silence, and the light of the past, which beacons the future, would have been extinguished in the darkness of a universal chaos."

turbulence and contumacy. It declared that council schismatic, abolished the Pragmatic Sanction and strengthened the power of the Roman see.

LATIMER (lat'e-mer), HUGH, one of the promoters and martyrs of the English Reformation, was born in 1491. He was the son of an industrious yeoman, who gave him the benefit of a good education and sent him to Cambridge. There he made himself conspicuous by his opposition to the reforming party; but in a private interview, after a fierce sermon against Melancthon, Bilney sowed the seed which afterward bore abundant fruit. Once convinced of where truth lay, Latimer followed it with all the ardor of an honest mind and impulsive nature. Soon he preached boldly the doctrines he once inveighed against, and incurred the hatred of Romish zealots. Card-playing being a national amusement at Christmas, Latimer drew from it illustrations of his subject, on which Dr. Buckingham, prior of Blackfriars, brought out his dice in the pulpit to prove by them that the Reformation was wrong; but Latimer the same preached against such things. Notwithstanding the steady opposition to Latimer, Henry, at the instigation of Anne Boleyn, appointed him to the see of Worcester, the duties of which he discharged in an exemplary way for three years, until he resigned it in consequence of the passing of the Act of the Six Articles. Gardiner had him accused of controverting these articles and sent to the Tower, where he remained for six years, until Edward VI. came to the throne. During his reign Latimer, who refused to be restored to the bishopric of Worcester, lived at Lambeth with Cranmer, employing himself chiefly in a course of practical preaching. But on the accession of Queen Mary he was cited to appear before the privy council. Passing through Smithfield, he said, "This place hath long groaned for me;" and the next day he found himself once more an inmate of the Tower. Here, though his treatment was harsh, it was softened by having the company of Cranmer, Ridley and Bradford. In the following year the three prelates were removed to Windsor, from whence they were brought to Oxford.

in 1570, at the celebrated Synod of Sendomir. He prepared a history of the Moravians and several other works respecting the religious affairs of the eastern regions of Europe. He died in 1599.

LASKO (las'ko), JOHN À, who became an influential prelate in the Romish Church in Poland, was born in 1466; and after having acted as provost at Skalbimierz and at Posen, he became coadjutor to the archbishop of Gnesen, whom he succeeded in 1510. He was a member of the third Council of Lateran, in 1513, his great object in the council being a vigorous effort to induce the princes who were present to move against the Turks and Tartars, and so resist their aggressions in South-eastern Europe. He was a vigorous administrator of his archdiocese and a most determined opponent of the Reformation, using all his power to arrest the progress of the Reformation in Poland; and to this end he called synods very frequently, issued canons and decretals, and used every agency which he could command to hold the people under the sway of the Romish Church. He died in 1531.

LASKO, JOHN À, who was descended from a noble family in Poland, and who became the great Reformer of his country, was born in 1499, at Warsaw. In his early years he was destined for the Romish priesthood; but the writings of Luther being freely circulated at the university of Cracow, he was thus attracted to the views of the German Reformers. Following the custom of the age, he sought by foreign travel to have his views expanded and his judgment matured, and accordingly he went to Louvain, where he was disgusted by the ignorance which he witnessed. At Zurich he met with Zwingle, who influenced him toward the Reformers. At Paris he was engaged in correpromotion, honestly telling the king what views he had adopted. He now, with permission of the king, retired from Poland, and in the Netherlands he married, thus severing his connection with the Church of Rome. He now became superintendent of all the Reformed churches in Friesland, refusing to return to Poland, where, notwithstanding his marriage, a bishopric was offered to him. He met with much opposition in his reformatory measures, but he persevered with great zeal, and gradually established a system of church order which was substantially Presbyterian. He had an offer from Prussia to organize the Church in that kingdom, but he insisted that the Church should be separated from the State, and the tender was withdrawn. At the earnest solicitation of Cranmer he went to England to advance reform there, and for six months he resided in Lambeth palace, being lauded by Latimer and all the leading Reformers, and gaining great favor for his sermon before the king. Returning to the Continent, he was in danger for a time; and after a sojourn at Emden, Bremen and Hamburg, he again returned to England, where in 1550 he became the superintendent of the continental Protestants then in London from Germany, France and Italy. Here he established the same church order which he had settled at Emden, and there is no doubt but that the catechism which he prepared was afterward of great use to the authors of the "Heidelberg Symbol." On the death of Edward VI., the foreign Protestants fled from London in great numbers, and Lasko had to return to Emden. He was invited to Sweden, but he wandered through Germany for a time, and at length, after twenty years' absence, he was permitted to return to his native land. He became the superintendent of the churches in Little Poland, where he had many trials to encounter because of the conduct of many who had adopted Socinianism, and who chose to conceal their views. He did much to restore harmony and promote union, and the great end at which he aimed was effected after his death, in the Consensus, which was agreed to at the Synod of Sendomir. He died in 1560, leaving behind him the reputation of a devoted, conscientious, clear-headed Reformer whom no worldly influence could divert from the path of duty. In England as well as in Germany he was recognized as a truly great and good man.

LATERAN (lat'e-ran), CHURCH OF ST. JOHN, the first in dignity of the Roman churches, and styled, in Roman usage, "the mother and head of all the churches of the city and the world," is so called from its occupying the site of the splendid palace of Plautius Lateranus, which, having been escheated in A. D. 66, in consequence of Lateranus being implicated in the conspiracy of the Pisos, became imperial property, and was assigned for Christian uses by the emperor Constantine. It was originally dedicated to the Saviour, but Lucius

II., who rebuilt it in the middle of the twelfth century, dedicated it to St. John the Baptist. The solemn entrance of the newly-elected pope into office is inaugurated by his coming in procession to take possession of this church; and over its portico is the balcony from which, on certain festivals, as from St. Peter's upon other days, he blesses the entire world. The original church is said to have been an adaptation to religious uses of the basilica which was presented to Sylvester by Constantine, but has been several times rebuilt and modified, its final completion dating from the pontificate of Clement XII. It has been the scene of five councils regarded as œcumenical by the Roman Church. See LATERAN COUNCILS. The palace was the residence of the popes until the return from Avignon, when they removed to the Vatican. It is now occupied partly by officials of the chapter, partly for public purposes. Pius IX. has converted a portion of it into a museum of Christian archæology. See the engraving on page 289.

LATERAN COUNCILS, the name given to the councils that have been held in the Lateran church of Rome, but more particularly to the five œcumenical councils that have been held there, which will here be briefly mentioned. The first was convoked in 1123 by Pope Calixtus II., who presided in person. It consisted of three hundred bishops. It decreed that investiture to ecclesiastispondence with Margaret of Navarre, and at Basle he became intimate with Erasmus. Thence he journeyed through Italy, and at length he found his way home. The death of his uncle, the archbishop, in 1531, left him free from restraint; and although in private he leaned to the Reformers, yet he hoped for reform in the Church, and so he accepted several dignities, among them the deanery of Gnesen and Lenciez. In 1536 the king tendered him the bishopric of Cujavia, but he declined the Hoopoes are numerous in Egypt, where they are said to form two species, one stationary, which is considered inedible, the other migratory, which wades in the mud when the Nile has subsided, and feeds on worms and insects. This, however, is questionable; more likely there is but a single species. Its flesh is sometimes eaten, and has been pronounced very good. The hoopoe is often met with in Palestine, where the Arabs have a superstitious reverence for it, believing it to possess medicinal qualities. They call it, therefore, "The doctor."

LARDNER (lard'ner), NATHANIEL, one of the most learned English theologians and writers on the evidences of Christianity, was born at

A SUPERB EGYPTIAN LANTERN.—See LANTERN.

Hawkhurst, in Kent, in 1684. He studied at Utrecht and Leyden, and in 1709 became a minister of the Presbyterian denomination. He was afterward preacher at the Old Jewry. He spent his life in laborious studies and researches on Christianity and its evidences, and gave the world the fruit of them in his great works "On the Credibility of the Gospel History" and "Jewish and Heathen Testimonies in Favor of Christianity." He published other lesser works, sermons, etc. He died at Hawkhurst in 1768.

LARNED (lar'ned), SYLVESTER, who became greatly distinguished for his gift of pulpit eloquence, was a Presbyterian minister, born in 1796, in Massachusetts. He was educated at Middlebury College and Princeton. As soon as he was licensed to preach he attracted vast crowds by his rare brilliancy, his matter, his rhetoric and his emotional power. Prominent places and abundant support were offered to him; but impelled by a desire to be most useful, he determined to settle only in places where the Church was weak, and accordingly he went to New Orleans, where he collected the First Presbyterian Church, over which he was settled as pastor. He closed a life of great promise and much self-sacrifice and devotion in the year 1820. After his death his sermons were published, accompanied by a memoir written by R. R. Gurley, D.D.

LARNED, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, who was born in Connecticut, in 1806, became a distinguished professor in Yale College, in which he had graduated about the year 1826. His ancestors, who had reached the colony in 1630, in John Winthrop's band of emigrants, had remained in their old home, and had maintained the old primitive character of the fathers. William A., after graduating at Yale, taught for some time at Salisbury, North Carolina, and then, after three years' service as a tutor at Yale, he became pastor of the Second Congregational Church at Millbury, Massachusetts; but owing to his failing health, he was obliged to resign the charge in the course of the next year. He united with Drs. Beman and Kirk in training theological students at Troy, New York, from which duty he retired on his appointment to Yale College as professor. He died in 1862, greatly regretted.

LA SALLE (la-sal'), who founded an order called the "Brethren of the Christian Schools," which has risen into great importance, was born in 1651, at Rheims. He finished his education at St. Sulpice, in Paris, was made canon of his native place, and in 1671 he became a regular priest. He saw and lamented the widespread ignorance of the populace, and at length he planned the system of teaching which eventually became matured in the "order." He met with great hostility from the teachers of the day; but having procured a house at Rouen, which he made the headquarters of his order, in 1725 Benedict XIII. sanctioned the institution. The members take the vows of chastity, poverty and obedience, but they may abandon the order if they please. Their dress consists of a black robe, black stockings, shoes, a black coat, bands under the chin and a broad-leaved felt hat looped up on three sides. This order has spread into most of the countries where Romanism is powerful. The members are found in Great Britain, the United States, Portugal, Spain, the Netherlands, Germany and France, and much of the education of the Romish population is in their hands. La Salle died in 1719, and he was canonized by Pius IX.

LASEA or LASÆA (la-se'a), a town in Crete, near the Fair Havens, where Paul for a time was anchored, Acts xxvii. 8. The place is nowhere else mentioned, but it has been identified in comparatively recent times, and the name is still borne by a few ruins.

LASHA (lash'a), a place mentioned in Gen. x. 19 as marking the utmost border of the ancient Canaanites. Their border was "from Sidon unto Gaza; toward Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, unto Lasha." Lasha thus appears to have been situated east, or north-east, of the cities of the plain, and consequently beyond the Dead Sea. The name is only casually mentioned in the "Onomasticon" of Eusebius, but upon the passage in Genesis, Jerome identifies it with the Callirhoe of Josephus. This conjecture is highly probable. The position of Callirhoe agrees in all respects with the Mosaic narrative. It is situated in a narrow, wild ravine which falls into the Dead Sea near its north-eastern angle. The scenery is very romantic. The cliffs rise up in jagged frowning masses, variously colored—red, gray and black—while the whole bottom of the ravine is densely filled with foliage. Canes, aspens, tamarisks and palms are intermixed with the bright and beautiful oleander. A copious stream of hot water, fed by numerous hot springs, dashes along a rocky torrent-bed, throwing up clouds of white steam and tinging every stone and cliff-side in its track with the bright yellow of the sulphur with which it is largely impregnated. Around the springs, which are about three miles from the lake, are some ruins strewn all over with broken pottery. Here stood the baths, once famous for their medicinal properties, where Herod the Great went, by the advice of his physicians, during his last illness.

LASHARON (la-sha'ron). The king of Lasharon is enumerated among those whom Joshua destroyed, Josh. xii. 18. Lasharon has been supposed identical with the district of Sharon, but this is doubtful.

LASITIUS (la-sish'yus), JOHN, who was born in Poland, about 1534, studied at Basle, Berne, Geneva and Strasburg, became a teacher in the family of Krotowsky, a nobleman who had attached himself to the Moravians. He disliked permanent work in one place, and accordingly he moved from place to place, generally settling in university towns, such as Paris, Halle and Heidelberg. He maintained a controversy on the Trinity at Paris with Genebrard, a Romanist. He has been often classed among the Moravians, but it is uncertain whether or not he had actually joined their communion. He labored zealously for the union of the Polish Protestants, which was effected these two sprung all beings which contained in themselves the dual principle of male and female. Man was composed of two principles, the one material and the other spiritual, from which he emanated and to which he ought to return by throwing off the shackles of the body, annihilating the material passions, the inclinations of the soul and pleasures of the body. By this means the soul was to regain its origin, become immortal. This could only be effected by the renunciation of riches, honors and the ties of life.

The followers of his sect considerably altered his doctrines. The moral code of the Tao sect is excellent, inculcating all the great principles found in other religions—charity, benevolence, virtue, and the free-will, moral agency and responsibility of man. But it subsequently became corrupted with strange doctrines and practices. Alchemy became a pursuit of the sect; so did divination, the invocation of spirits and the prediction of the future. The doctors of the sect were supposed by these means to become ethereal, and to be caught up to heaven without passing through the intermediate state of death. Such statements, however, were ridiculed by the sect of Confucius, the skeptics of China, who openly derided their pretensions. Innumerable gods were also introduced into the worship, which was assimilated to the Buddhist. Since the second century the sect has continued to spread in China, Japan, Cochin China and amongst the Indo-Chinese nations. Monasteries and nunneries belonging to them were founded and flourished.

LAPHRIA (laf're-ah), a surname of ARTEMIS, among the Calydonians, from whom the worship of the goddess was introduced at Naupactus and Patræ, in Achaia. At the latter place it was not established till the time of Augustus, but it became the occasion of a great annual festival. The name Laphria was traced back to a hero, Laphrius, son of Castalius, who was said to have instituted her worship at Calydon.

translation of his native name, VAN DER STEEN (steen). This eminent commentator was born in the year 1567, at Boehaff or Bucold, in the diocese of Liege, in Belgium. In 1592 he entered the Society of the Jesuits and gave himself up to the study of Holy Scripture. For twenty years he was divinity professor at Louvain, after which he pursued the same avocation at Rome, where he died greatly respected for his unaffected piety and profound learning, March 12, 1637. His commentaries have always commanded great popularity in the Church of Rome. Nowhere else can the student find collected so rich a treasury of patristic and scholastic exegesis, and the general value of this honest and pious commentator is proved by the frequency with which he is quoted by authors beyond his own communion of unmistakable impartiality, such as De Wette and Meyer.

LAPIDES JUDAICI (lap'e-dayz ju-da'e-se). A curious class of stones so called is found at Mount Carmel in the chalk formation. They are really hollow flint stones lined inside with formations of spar which resemble peaches, olives and other fruit. They have been called "Elijah's Melons," and they are held to be useful in several diseases, such as the stone and gravel, when the sparry matter is dissolved in the acid juices of the lemon. Formations resembling petrified fishes are also found in the district.

LAPIDOTH (lap'e-döth), the husband of the prophetess Deborah, Jud. iv. 4.

LAPIS (la'pis), "the stone," a surname of Jupiter at Rome. It was formerly believed that Jupiter Lapis was a stone statue of the god, or originally a rude stone serving as a symbol, around which people assembled for the purpose of worshipping Jupiter. But it is now generally acknowledged that the pebble or flint-stone was regarded as the symbol of lightning, and that, therefore, in some representations of Jupiter, he held a stone in his hand instead of the thunderbolt.

LAPLACE (la-plass'), JOSUÉ DE, known among divines by his Latinized name PLACÆUS (pla-say'us), was born in Brittany, in the year 1605, and educated at Saumur. He taught philosophy for a short time, after which, in the year 1625, he became pastor of the church at Nantes. He remained here eight years, and in 1633 he was placed in the chair of theology at Saumur, where he distinguished himself by his attempt to modify the Calvinistic system. He held that man is only responsible for his own personal actions, that original sin is merely imputed indirectly, whatever that may mean, and that the views of the Calvinists are incompatible with divine justice and mercy. His grand difficulty lay in attempting an explanation of the fact that in the economy of the universe the whole family of man are linked together in such a manner that people are born in circumstances greatly differing from each other, and not of their own choosing. His views were condemned by the professors of Geneva, Holland and Sedan, his chief opponents being Rivet and Desmarets. He wrote very extensively on different books of the Old Testament, on the "Imputation of the First Sin of Adam," on the "Typical Character of the Life of Joseph." The work which was condemned in 1644 at Charenton was "Theological Theses concerning Fallen Man before he becomes a Subject of Grace." He died at Saumur, in 1665.

LAPLACE, PIERRE SIMON, Marquis de, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer, was born at Beaumont-en-Auge, in 1749, where he became professor of mathematics in the military school. From this place he soon removed to Paris, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of analysis and the highest branches of geometry, and was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences, one of the forty of the French Academy, and member of the Bureau des Longitudes. In 1796 appeared his famous work, "Exposition du Système du Monde." After the Revolution, on the 18th Brumaire, in 1799, he was made minister of the interior by the first consul. But from this post he was removed to make room for Lucien Bonaparte, and was then admitted into the senate, of which, in 1803, he became president. Having, in 1814, voted for the deposition of Napoleon, on the reorganization of peers he was made a marquis. He died in 1827, leaving numerous scientific works, the most celebrated of which is the "Traité de Mécanique Céleste." He has been called an atheist, but his works are so purely mathematical and scientific that he never alludes to any point on natural theology, or indeed to any principle which would indicate what views he entertained respecting providence or the being of a God.

LAPPING (lap'ping). The custom of lapping still prevails in the East. A person will sit on his heels, with his head close over a river, and so dextrously throw the water into his mouth with his hand, putting out his tongue to meet it, as scarcely to spill a drop.

LAPSE (laps). When a patron neglects to present a clergyman to a benefice in his gift within six months after its vacancy, the benefice lapses to the bishop, and if he does not exercise the right within six months it lapses to the archbishop, and if he neglects to present within six months it lapses to the crown.

LAPSI (lap'se). Those persons were so called who in time of persecution denied the faith of Christ, but again, on persecution ceasing, sought reconciliation and Church communion. The discipline with which such persons were visited included a long absence from the sacrament, which, however, was not denied them in case of extreme illness. And the maternal solicitude of the Church for her sons was so great that when dangerous sickness was prevalent, or when another persecution seemed to impend, it somewhat relaxed the rule. Those who absolutely and for ever fell away were classed by the Church as heathens, and had of course no ecclesiastical position, however low.

LECTURERS (lek'chur-erz), an order of preachers in parish churches, in England, who hold a distinct office from the vicar, rector or other ecclesiastical functionaries; they are chosen by the vestry or chief inhabitants of the parish, supported by voluntary subscriptions and legacies, and usually officiate on Sunday afternoon.

LEDEVICH (led'e-vik), EDWARD, D.D., who was one of the most eminent Irish scholars of the eighteenth century, was born in 1739. He rose to be a Fellow of Trinity College, in which he was greatly distinguished, and he afterward retired to the living of Aghaboe, in Queens county, which was in the gift of the university. In 1794 he published his well-known "Antiquities of Ireland," a work which was hailed with great applause, although he made sad havoc with the numerous "lives" and ridiculous traditions of St. Patrick.

LEE, ANN, the foundress of the sect of the Shakers, was born in 1736, at Manchester, England. Her father was a poor blacksmith, and her brother Charles rose to be a celebrated general in the Revolutionary struggle. In her early years, the "Camisards" and "French prophets" who had fled to England, and who had fallen into excesses of fanaticism, attracted a person named James Wardley to their number. He laid claim to spiritual influences; and as he and his adherents were violently agitated when "prophesying," they obtained the name of "Shaking Quakers." Ann Lee, who had married a blacksmith named Abraham Standley, became a convert, and forthwith she became a leader. Her bodily excitement became excessive; her flesh wasted away, the blood oozed through her skin, and again she received unwonted strength and vigor, all of which her followers looked upon as evidences of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. Eventually her conduct brought her into the hands of the civil authorities, who imprisoned her, and on her release she became more decided than ever. She was acknowledged as the leader of the Church of Christ, as their spiritual "mother in Christ," and she went so far as to call herself "Ann the Word," meaning that the "Word" dwelt in her. Now she began to declaim against the married state, and on this point she became so violent that she was sent to a madhouse. Eventually, in 1773, because of a "revelation," she and a number of her friends left England for America. She settled near Albany, and in 1780 she had gathered a considerable number of followers, and called her sect "The Church of Christ's second appearing." Her cause prospered, and she succeeded in establishing the flourishing community which is now well known at New Lebanon. See SHAKERS.

LEE, JESSE, well known as the founder of the Methodist Church in New England, was born in 1758, in Virginia. His parents joined the Methodist society, and the young man grew up in that connection. In 1778 he became a class-leader, and next year he began to preach. He was excused from serving in the Revolutionary army, and in 1783 he was taken on trial as a preacher. Next year he was at the celebrated conference in Baltimore at which the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized. In 1785 he had an earnest discussion with Coke on the subject of gradual emancipation, and now he began to itinerate in Maryland, New Jersey and New York. In 1789 he was appointed to Stamford, Connecticut, and for eleven years he labored in New England, preaching and forming classes in Rhode Island, and in 1790 he appeared in Boston. In 1796 he began to travel with Bishop Asbury. He closed his labors in New England in 1800, having seen fifty preachers and six thousand members as the result of his toil. His first work was his "History of Methodism," which was published in 1807. He served as chaplain of the House of Representatives in 1812 and 1813, and in 1814 he was chaplain of the Senate. He died in 1816, at the age of fifty-eight. He was an admirable preacher—ready, fluent, of an emotional nature, apt with anecdote and illustration and possessed of great pathos. He was tireless in his energy, and he may fairly be placed next to Asbury for his public services.

LEE, ROWLAND, who was made bishop of Lichfield in the year 1534, became famous as the person who solemnized the marriage of Henry VIII. with Anne Boleyn, in the nunnery of Sopewell, near St. Alban's. When the Reformed religion was established, he had the mortification of seeing his noble cathedral at Coventry destroyed, although he made most vigorous efforts to save it.

LEE, SAMUEL, D.D., a learned divine, was born in 1783. At twelve years of age he was bound as a carpenter, and continued at that trade until twenty-five years. During this time he taught himself, without the aid of a living instructor, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee and Syriac. Relinquishing his tools, he became a schoolmaster, and added to his linguistic knowledge by the acquisition of other Eastern languages, as well as some of those of Europe. At thirty years of age he went to Cambridge, where he was remarkable for his quickness. In 1819 he was made professor of Arabic in that university, and in 1831 regius professor of Hebrew. His knowledge of Biblical and Oriental literature was profound and extensive, and his reading deep and varied. He published a grammar of the Hebrew language, and a lexicon of Hebrew and Chaldee. He died in 1852.

LEECH (leech). See HORSE-LEECH.

LEEK (leek), a species of vegetable food after which the Israelites longed in the wilderness, Num. xi. 5. The same word is elsewhere rendered "grass," 1 Ki. xviii. 5, "herb," Job viii. 12, "hay," Prov. xxvii. 25. The specific translation "leek" is questionable. The fenu-grec may be meant—an annual plant, resembling clover, known in Egypt by the name of helbeh, the food both of cattle and of men. It is described as tied up in large bunches, which the inhabitants eagerly purchase at a low price, and which they eat with incredible greediness, without any kind of seasoning. They pretend that this singular diet is an excellent stomachic—specific against worms and dysentery—in fine, a preservative against a great number of maladies. They in fact regard it as endowed with so many good qualities that it is in their estimation a true panacea. The Allium Porrum, or common leek, is sufficiently well known.

LEES (leez). Wine was preserved in strength and color by standing upon the dregs or lees. In Isa. xxv. 6 the meaning is generous old wine racked off or purified from the lees. Some, however, have suggested that rich preserves made from grapes may be intended in the place. There is a proverbial expression occasionally used, "to settle upon the lees," Jer. xlvi. 11—that is, to live a life of quiet indifference and sloth; while "to drink the lees" or "dregs," Ps. lxxv. 8, was to endure the extremity of suffering.

LEETISTERNIUM (le-tis-tur'ne-um), a religious festival among the ancient Romans, celebrated during times of public calamity, when the gods themselves were invited to the entertainment; their statues were taken from their pedestals and laid on couches. The first festival of this sort, according to Livy, was held in the year of Rome 354, on the occasion of a contagious disease which committed frightful ravages among the cattle, and it lasted for eight successive days. On the celebration of this festival enemies were said to forget their animosity and all prisoners were liberated.

LE FEVRE (le-fe'ver), JACQUES. See FABER, JACOBUS STAPULENSIS.

LECTERN.—See article.

LEGALIST (le'gal-ist), strictly speaking, is one who acts according to or consistent with the law; but in general the term is made use of to denote one who expects salvation by his own works. We may further consider a legalist as one who has no proper conviction of the evil of sin, who, although he pretends to abide by the law, yet has not a just idea of its spirituality and demands, and denies the necessity of the work of the Spirit by supposing that he has ability in himself to perform all those duties which God has required.

LEGATE (leg'ate), the name of the ambassador or representative, whether temporary or permanent, sent by the pope to a particular church. In the ancient Church there were many examples of such officials, but their commission was commonly temporary, and granted for some special object. In the later constitution of the Church, three classes of legates are distinguished: 1. Legati a latere, "legates despatched from the side" of the pontiff, who are commonly cardinals. 2. Legati missi, called also "apostolic nuncios," and including a lower grade called "internuncios." 3. Legati nati, "legates born," whose office is not personal, but is attached by ancient institution or usage to the see or other ecclesiastical dignity which they hold. Of the last class there were examples in most national churches; thus, the bishop of Thessalonica was legate born for Illyricum, the bishop of Arles for Gaul, the bishop of Canterbury for England, etc. This institution, however, has gone entirely into abeyance; and, indeed, the authority of legates is much modified in the modern Church. In the mediæval times the legate claimed full papal jurisdiction in the country assigned to him, even overruling the local jurisdiction of the bishops of the national Church. This led to many disputes, to refusals to receive legates, as in France, where the legate was obliged to wait at Lyons till his credentials should have been examined and approved at court, and to counter legislation, as in England to the statute of 16 Richard II., commonly known as the statute of Premunire; and the Council of Trent removed the ground of contention by abolishing all such claims to local jurisdiction as entrenched upon the authority of the bishops. The legate, in the modern Church, is little other than the ambassador, mainly for spiritual purposes, of the pope. He is held as belonging to the diplomatic body, and by the usage of Roman Catholic courts enjoys precedence of all other ambassadors. The legates at the second-rate courts have the title of internuncio. Legates are commonly bishops or archbishops in partibus infidelium.

LEGENDS (le'jendz). By this word we are to understand those idle and ridiculous stories which the Romanists tell concerning their saints and other persons, in order to support the credit of their religion. The legend was originally a book used in the old Romish churches, containing the lessons that were to be read at divine service. Hence the lives of saints and martyrs came to be called "legends," because chapters were to be read out of them at matins and in the refectories of the religious houses. The "Golden Legend" is a collection of the lives of the saints, composed by James de Varase, better known by his Latin name of John de Voragine, vicar-general of the Dominicans, and afterward archbishop of Genoa, who died in 1298. It was received in the Church of Rome with great applause, which it maintained for two hundred years; but, in truth, it is so full of ridiculous and romantic stories that the Romanists themselves are ashamed of them. The Romish breviaries are full of legendary stories, which are appointed to be read on the saints' days, which being almost as numerous as the days in the year, there is hardly a day free from having idle tales mixed in its service. However, there have been considerable reformations made in this matter, several legends having been from time to time retrenched, insomuch that the service of the Church of Rome is much freer from these fooleries than formerly.

LEGION (le'j'un), a division of the Roman army containing at first three thousand, afterward four thousand, then five thousand or fifty-two hundred, and in the time of Christ about six thousand infantry, besides horsemen. In the New Testament the term is applied to an indefinitely large number of spiritual beings acting in concert and disciplined and officered like an army. Thus Christ speaks of the "legions of angels" which his Father would readily send to fight for him, Matt. xxvi. 53, and the interrogated unclean spirit replies, "My name is Legion, for we are many," Mark v. 9.

LEGION, THEBAN. A protracted controversy has prevailed respecting a legion called by this name that came to the aid of Maximian from the East, and on orders being issued to the army to persecute the Christians this legion resolutely refused; whereupon it was twice decimated, and ultimately its entire destruction was ordered. In Magdeburg the tradition was first questioned; then Dubourdieu, a Reformed French minister, attempted to show that there was an error in the number (6666) of the men in the legion, and next the silence of the early ecclesiastical historians was assumed as sufficient evidence to disprove the tradition altogether. It is known, however, that Eusebius makes few references to the martyrdoms in the West, while Ambrose seems to refer to the legion and its fate by his allusion to the slaughter at Milan. In 390 Vitricius has an expression in his "Praise of the Martyrs" of the same kind. A shield was found in the river Arve, near Geneva, with an inscription, and other testimonies have been subsequently discovered which appear to prove that the slaughter of the legion did take place, though the numbers who were martyred may have been modified by the tradition from time to time.

LEGION, THUNDERING. In the wars of the Romans, under the emperor Marcus Antoninus, with the Marcomanni, the Roman troops being surrounded by the enemy, and in great distress from intense thirst, in the midst of a burning desert, a legion of Christians who served in the army imploring the merciful interposition of Christ, suddenly a storm with thunder and lightning came on, which refreshed the fainting Romans with its seasonable rain, while the lightning fell among the enemy and destroyed many of them. The Christian legion to whose prayers this miraculous interposition was granted, was thenceforth called the Thundering Legion.

LEHABIM (le-ha'bim), descendants of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. They are certainly the Libyans, being generally coupled with Ethiopia and Egypt. Libya was bounded by the Nile on the east, the Atlantic on the west, by the Mediterranean on the north, the southern limits being variable. Lehabim is often found in a contracted form, Lubim, 2 Chr. xii. 3; Dan. xi. 43.

LEHI (le'hi), the name of a place or district on the borders of Philistia where Samson slew a thousand Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass. The name fully was Ramath-Lehi, "the hill of Lehi," so called, perhaps, from a ridge of craggy serrated rocks, or from Samson's casting away—such would be the meaning with a slight change of vowels—of the jaw-bone. Athirst and weary with the slaughter he had made, he cried to the Lord; and thereupon a stream gushed forth, not from the jaw-bone, but from the place Lehi, Jud. xv. 14-19.

LEIBNITZ (lib'nitz), GOTTFRIED WILHELM, BARON VON, an eminent German philosopher, theologian and mathematician, was born at Leipsic, in 1646. He was educated at the university of that city, and early gave evidence of the genius which was to render him so distinguished. His studies were very varied, law and mathematics for a time holding the chief place; but philosophy and theology gradually attracted him, and engaged his most earnest attention. He first appeared as an author at the age of eighteen, and two years later graduated at Altdorf, where he refused the offer of a professorship. He then lived for a short time at Nurnberg, and was secretary to a society of alchemists. He removed to Frankfort on being appointed councilor to the elector of Mentz, a post which he held till 1676. Visiting Paris and London in 1672, he became acquainted with the leading men of science of the age. About this period he invented an arithmetical machine, and made the discovery of the differential calculus. Having undertaken to write the history of the house of Brunswick, he made extensive travels for the purpose of collecting materials; and soon after published several historical and political works. In 1692, Leibnitz took a leading part in a project of union of the Roman Catholic and Protestant Churches, and had a correspondence with Bossuet respecting it. But the scheme was found to be impracticable. Some years later he was called to Berlin and named president of the newly founded Academy of Sciences. He was consulted by Peter the Great on his plans for the advancement of civilization in his empire, and received from him a pension, with the title of councilor of state. Similar honors were bestowed on him by the German emperor Charles VI. Leibnitz passed the last years of his life at Hanover. The writings of Leibnitz are very numerous, and treat of a wide variety of subjects. His aim was to apply to philosophy the method of demonstration, and to reconcile philosophy and theology; he maintained the existence of innate ideas and necessary truths, and our capacity of discovering them; and though he did not present his system as a whole, he became the founder of a new school of philosophy, and gave an extraordinary stimulus to metaphysical studies by "the infinitude of bright ideas, hints and conjectures which were perpetually scintillating from his brilliant mind." He died at Hanover, November 14, 1716, and was buried at Leipsic.

LEIDRAT (li'drat), the librarian of Charlemagne, was made archbishop of Lyons, A. D. 798, and he greatly distinguished himself by his efforts to suppress the sect of the "Adoptionists," in the South of France, who held that Jesus was the son of God, as to his human nature, by adoption only, and not by a natural relation. He displayed great zeal in establishing schools and in transcribing portions of the Scriptures for use in churches. The dates of his birth and death are unknown.

LEIFCHILD (leef'child), JOHN, D.D., who was born in 1780, rose to be one of the most influential and greatly-beloved ministers of the Congregational body in England. He was educated at Hoxton Academy, and settled at Craven Chapel, London, where in the twenty-three years of his ministry he added more than fifteen hundred persons to the membership. He was greatly beloved by the members of other denominations. He died in 1862.

LEIGH (lee), SIR EDWARD, a learned Biblical critic and historian, was born at Shawell, in Leicestershire, in 1602. He was educated at Oxford, studied in the Middle Temple and afterward devoted several years to professional and literary researches. He was a member of the Long Parliament, and a colonel in the Parliamentary army, was expelled from the House in 1648, along with other Presbyterian members, and occupied himself, after the Restoration, in literary pursuits. His most important work is entitled "Critica Sacra." He died in 1671.

LEIGHLIN (lay'lin), SYNOD OF, was held A. D. 633, in Ireland, at a place of this name, the object being the settlement of the disputed question about the proper time to celebrate Easter. So decided were the Irish clergy that Laurentius of Canterbury has left it on record that Dugan, an Irish bishop, affirmed that he would not eat, drink or sleep under the roof of any person who observed the Roman custom. A deputation was sent from this synod to learn the mode observed in other countries, not to procure a decision from Rome, which had been sent already, but to inquire extensively how different churches acted, so that they might decide for themselves. The controversy continued for centuries, for even as late as A. D. 1070, Margaret, the Saxon wife of Malcolm Canmore, of Scotland, found the Irish customs maintained, and she held a vigorous discussion with the monks of Iona on the subject.

LEIGHTON (lay'ton), the name of two very eminent Scotch divines.

1. ALEXANDER, was born at Edinburgh, in 1568. He became professor of moral philosophy in that university, but afterward went to Leyden and took his doctor's degree. He then visited London, where he had a lectureship till he was prosecuted in the Star Chamber for publishing two libels, one entitled "Zion's Plea" and the other "The Looking-glass of the Holy War." He was sentenced to stand in the pillory, to have his ears cut off, his nose slit, branded on the cheek, publicly whipped and imprisoned in the Fleet, where he remained eleven years, and died insane, in 1644.

2. ROBERT, eldest son of the preceding, was born in 1613, and became archbishop of Glasgow, which see he resigned after holding it for four years. He is celebrated as a striking example of unfeigned piety, extensive learning and unbounded liberality. He was a minister of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, and was chosen professor of divinity at Edinburgh, but on the Restoration he accepted the bishopric of Dunblane. After eight years he was made archbishop of Glasgow, when Alexander Burnet was expelled from it by the duke of Lauderdale. The duties of this post he discharged with zeal; but the circumstances of the times making it too great a burden for him, he resigned it and retired into privacy, passing the rest of his life with his sister in Sussex. Of his works, his admirable "Commentary on the First Epistle of St. Peter" is the best known. Bishop Gilbert Burnet, who was with him in Glasgow, speaks highly of his style of preaching, and says that he has seen whole assemblies often melt in tears before him. He died in 1684.

LEITCH (leech), WILLIAM, D.D., who became eminent in Scotland and in Canada as a scientific theologian, was born in 1814, at Rothesay, and educated at Glasgow University, in which he served as a lecturer on astronomy. He entered the Scottish Church and became parish minister of Monimail, but in 1859 he was chosen principal of the Queen's University, in Canada, and in 1860 he also became a member of the senate of the university of Toronto and an examiner. He wrote on astronomical subjects, on miracles, controverting the views of Dr. Wardlaw. His scientific productions were published in the "Transactions of the British Association" and in the "Annals of the Botanical Society of Canada," his object being a refutation of the views of the German naturalist Siebald on alternate generation as illustrated in the class of the hymenoptera. He died in 1862.

LEITOMISCHEL (li-to-mis'kel), JOHN, surnamed "John the Iron," was one of the most famous of the Bohemian prelates who were engaged in the Council of Constance, and who used their influence to secure the martyrdom of Jerome and Huss. Before him and the archbishop of Prague, Huss had to appear when charged with heresy, and his advice was sought by the archbishop when the difficulties of the Church in Bohemia increased. At Constance he displayed a determined, unrelenting hostility to the Hussites; and he was sent into Bohemia, with a letter from the council, threatening all who refused entire submission to the clergy, but his mission was an entire failure. His first elevation was to the bishopric of Olmutz; and when Conrad of Prague joined the Calixtines, he was made archbishop of Prague, but the honor was almost an empty one, for the Calixtines had become so powerful that his life would have been lost had he fallen into the hands of his countrymen during the civil wars. It is believed that this stern and ferocious prelate died shortly after the close of the Council of Constance.

LEJAY (le-zhay'), GUY MICHEL, a distinguished exegetical scholar, was born in 1588. He was at first an advocate in Parliament, and then took holy orders. He was the editor of the celebrated Polyglot Bible sometimes called the Paris Polyglot. It was in seven languages—Hebrew, Samaritan, Chaldaic, Greek, Syriac, Latin and Arabic. It took seventeen years to accomplish, and all his means. He died in 1674.

LEJEUNE (le-zheun'), PAUL, a French Jesuit, was born in 1592. He labored for eighteen years to convert the Indians of Canada, and published an account of his labors in "New France," which gave interesting details of the people among whom he labored so long with little success. He died in 1664.

LELAND (le'land), JOHN, an English divine and apologist for Christianity, was born at Wigan, in Lancashire, in 1691, became a dissenting minister in Dublin, in 1761, and first appeared as an author in 1733, by publishing a reply to Tindal's deistical work, "Christianity as Old as the Creation." In 1737 appeared another apology, "The Divine Authority of the Old and New Testament." His best work is "A View of the Prin-works are—"The Nativity," at St. Roche, "The Flight into Egypt," "The Transfiguration," "The Apotheosis of Hercules," at Versailles, upon the saloon of which he was employed for four years. He also painted a representation of "The Assumption," upon the ceiling of the Virgin in St. Sulpice.

LEMPRIERE (lem-preer'), JOHN, D.D., an eminent biographer, was born in Jersey, about 1760, was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, and died February 1, 1824. His "Classical Dictionary" was for many years the standard work of reference on all matters of ancient mythology, biography and geography.

LEMUEL (lem'u-el), a king to whom instructions were given by his mother, Prov. xxxi. 2-9. Various conjectures have been hazarded respecting Lemuel, but nothing of him can be said with certainty.

LEMURES (lem'u-rayz), the general designation given by the Romans to all spirits of departed persons, of whom the good were honored as Lares, and the bad were feared, as ghosts or spectres still are by the superstitious. Like the latter, they were said to wander about during the night, seeking for an opportunity of inflicting injury on the living.

LENFANT (long'fong), JACQUES, a minister of the French Protestant Church, was born April 13, 1661, at Bazoches, in the district of Beauce, in France. He was educated at Saumur, Geneva and Heidelberg. In the last-named place he officiated as minister of the French church; he afterward repaired to Berlin, where he was associated with Beausobre. He died August 7, 1728. Besides his histories of the Council of Constance and that of Nice, he is known for the share he had, along with Beausobre, in the French translation of the New Testament which appeared in 1718.

LENT, the fasting-time before Easter which is observed in the Roman and in the Greek and other Oriental and in the Protestant Episcopal Churches. It is certainly of very ancient institution. The earliest allusions to it speak of it as an established usage handed down from the Fathers. The forty days' period, as commemorative of our Lord's forty days' fast, or of the similar perfunctory fasts of Moses and of Elias, commences with Ash Wednesday, between which day and Easter Sunday, omitting the Sundays on which the fast is not observed, forty clear days intervene. The rigor of the ancient observance, which excluded all flesh, is now much relaxed; but the principle of permitting but one meal, with a slight refection or collation, is everywhere retained. In the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church, Lent is retained as a Church season of the calendar, with special services and proper collects and prayers; but the observance of the fast is left to the discretion of each individual.

LENTILES (len'tilz), a leguminous plant producing a kind of pulse resembling small beans. They are chiefly used for pottage, which is of a red or chocolate color. Such was that for which Esau sold his birthright, Gen. xxv. 29-34. An illustration of this is furnished in the tomb-paintings of Egypt, where there is a representation of a man cooking lentiles for soup or porridge. Among the provisions brought to David while he lay at Mahanaim, in Absalom's rebellion, we find lentiles, 2 Sam. xvii. 28; and it was in a field of lentiles that an exploit of one of his warriors was performed, 2 Sam. xxiii. 11. Sometimes lentiles, in seasons of scarcity and by the poor, were employed for making bread, Ezek. iv. 9. Mixed with barley, they are said to be frequently so used in the southern parts of Egypt.

LENTULUS (len'tu-lus), EPISTLE OF, is the title of a very celebrated letter which is quite apocryphal, but nevertheless it is received as genuine and authentic by the Romish theologians. Professedly it is written by Publius Lentulus, a Roman officer in Palestine, in which he describes the personal appearance of Christ. It was greatly esteemed in former ages. It was first printed in the "Magdeburg Centuries," and it has been translated into different languages. In the works of Anselm it is given in a condensed form, and the personal appearance of the Virgin Mary is also described. The epistle contains evident marks of its spuriousness. It is addressed to the senate, instead of the emperor. The writer is called "Præses," but no such office existed in Palestine. No procurator of Palestine or proconsul of Syria was called Lentulus, and no mention is made of the epistle by any of the early writers, who even allude to writings that were acknowledged as apocryphal. The style is merely in imitation of the Classical Latin, and the name given to Christ is such as no heathen would have used. Expressions occur in it which even show an acquaintance with the Hebrew Psalms. The history of this forgery shows that it must have been written after the time of Nicephorus and before the year 1500.

LEO (le'o). 1. ÆGYPTIUS, or THE EGYPTIAN. The early Christian writers, in their controversy with the heathens, refer not unfrequently to a Leo or Leon as having admitted that the deities of the ancient Gentile world had been originally men. Augustin says he was an Egyptian priest of high rank, and expounded the popular mythology to Alexander the Great in a manner which, though differing from those rationalistic explanations received in Greece, accorded with them in making the gods to have been originally men. It is to be observed that, although Leon was high in his priestly rank at the time when Alexander was in Egypt (B. C. 332-331), his name is Greek.

2. Surnamed THE DEACON, a Byzantine historian, lived in the tenth century, and wrote a history of the events which took place between 959 and 975. It gives an account of the victories of the emperors Nicephorus and Zimisces over the Mohammedans, and their wars against the Bulgarians and Russians.

3. JUDÆ, one of the Swiss Reformers, was born at Germar, in Alsace, in 1482. His father's name was John Jud; but whether this name arose from his family being of Jewish descent, Leo himself tells us he was unable to say. The name, however, exposed him to reproach, and perhaps for this reason we find him sometimes designating himself Leo Keller. In Zürich he was known as Meister cipal Deistical Writers that have appeared in England." It once held a high position in Christian apologetic literature, and many people still regard it as a satisfactory demolition of Deism. Leland died in 1766. To his honor it should be added that, though his life was one of controversy, the spirit of fairness and charity never forsook him.

LEMECH (le'mek), Gen. v. 25, marg. See LAMECH.

LEMOINE (le-mwan), FRANCIS, a painter of history, was born at Paris, in 1688. Though without genius, he by astonishing application became an eminent painter. He committed suicide in a fit of melancholy, June 4, 1737. His chief Löw, and this name his descendants adopted. He was educated for the medical profession, but through the influence of Zuingli he forsook this for the clerical, and in 1522 became minister of St. Peter's Church, at Zürich. Here he labored till his death, and had an important share in the reformatory movements of the time and the doctrinal controversies which divided the Reformers. He died June 19, 1542. At the time of his death he was engaged on a translation of the Bible into Latin, which he left unfinished. This translation is marked by adherence to the meaning rather than the words of the original; it is consequently somewhat paraphrastic; but it is fair and true, and the Latinity is good. It has been often reprinted. Leo translated also into German Erasmus' Paraphrases of the New Testament, and edited several of the works of Zuingli.

4. OF MODENA, whose true name was JUDA ARIEH, born in 1571, was a learned rabbi, at the head of the synagogue in Venice. He was author of the "Rabbinical Hebrew Bible," which contains the Targum, the Massoras and the commentaries of the rabbins. He died in 1654.

5. OF THESSALONICA, a Byzantine prelate and philosopher of the ninth century. He was deprived of his see as being an iconoclast, but was appointed to the head of the mathematical school at Constantinople. He invented a system of transmitting from Tarsus news of what was going on farther east, the hour at which the fire was lighted indicating the nature of the intelligence.

6. THE THRACIAN, or LEO I., emperor of the East, was born in 400. He obtained the consent of the Eastern bishops to the Council of Chalcedon, repressed the performance of heathen rites and restored peace to the empire. He put Aspar to death in consequence of his treachery in the war against the Vandals. He died in 474.

LEO, the name of an illustrious line of popes. I., surnamed THE GREAT, succeeded Sextus III. in 440. He took a very decided part against the Manichæans and other schismatics, held a council at Rome against Eutyches in 449, and presided by his legates at the General Council of Chalcedon two years later. When Attila invaded Italy, Leo was sent by the emperor Valentinian to dissuade him from his threatened march on Rome, and Rome was saved. Leo afterward saved the city from being burned by Genseric. St. Leo is the first pope of whom we possess any written works. He died in 461. II. was elected in 682. He approved the seventh general council against the Monothelites, introduced the kiss of peace in the mass and the custom of the holy water in the churches, and supported the primacy of Rome against the archiepiscopal church of Ravenna. He died in 684. III. was elected pope in 795 and died in 816. His election having been contested, he placed himself and the Church under the patronage of Charlemagne, took refuge in France, and was, in 799, restored to Rome through the help of Charlemagne, who followed him there in the subsequent year, and was crowned emperor by the pope on Christmas day, a leading event of mediæval history. Notwithstanding his alliance with the emperor, Leo resisted the latter's entreaties as to the question raised by the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle about the words "qui ex Patre filioque procedit," which the French clergy were inclined to retain in the creed, contrary to the ancient tradition of the Church. IV., elected in 847, was a native of Rome and a Benedictine monk, who displayed great energy in the defence of the Roman territory against the Saracens. He held correspondence with Ethelwulf, king of England, and resisted the doctrines of Hincmar of Rheims, a staunch supporter of episcopacy against papal theocracy. He died in 855. V. was elected in 903. On the plea of his having been irregularly elected, he was deposed by his adversary, Christopher, cardinal of San Lorenzo, in Damaso. Leo died of grief whilst a prisoner in a Benedictine convent, in 903. VI. was elected in 928 and died in 929. He was a nephew of Christopher, and seems to have died by poison, a victim to rival ambitions, the papal chair having in those days become an object of eager competition between the various factions of the Roman nobility. VII., elected in 936, was a pious monk who tried to restore morals and discipline in the Church. He died in 939. VIII. was elected by a Roman council, on the deposition by the same of John XII., in 963. His election was contested by the latter as well as by a third competitor, Benedict V., till the emperor Otho of Germany, espousing his cause, restored him to Rome, where he died, he ever afterward cultivated; and on his return in Italy, under Julius II., he took an active part in the warlike policy of that pope. On the death of Julius, in 1513, he was elected his successor to the papal chair, which he illustrated more by his literary tastes, his liberal administration and the splendor he conferred on classical studies and the fine arts than by his general policy, which was selfish, or by his ecclesiastical character, which was wholly subordinate to his secular interests. As a politician his chief objects were to obtain princely stations for his relatives and to increase the States of the Church. He was carrying on his hostile projects against French domination in Italy when, on the news of the surrender of Milan to the emperor, he was suddenly taken ill amidst the festivities excited by the event, and went prematurely to his grave in the year 1521. During the latter part of his life he witnessed the dawn of the great Reformation which he provoked, as is well known, through the sale of indulgences in Germany—and the importance of which was scarcely felt as yet in 965. IX., born in 1002, had previously been bishop of Toul, under the name of Bruno. He was elected by the Diet of Worms, in 1049, and confirmed by the Roman clergy. In accordance with the views of Hildebrand (subsequently Gregory VII.) he held several councils in Rome against simony, condemned the views of Berengarius, went twice to Germany, and on his return personally led the war which he had declared against the Normans of Sicily. He was made prisoner at Benevento, but was soon afterward released on his consenting to grant them the investiture of Apulia. He died in 1054. He left several homilies and epistles. X., Giovanni de Medici, son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, was born at Florence in 1475, and was made cardinal when only thirteen years old. He received the most liberal education, and became a scholar and a man of elegant manners. Both at Florence and at Rome he distinguished himself from his early youth as a munificent patron of men of letters and of artists. Exiled from Florence with his family in 1497, he traveled in Germany and Flanders, making acquaintance with many scholars, among them Erasmus, whose friendship by the secular mind of the learned pope and by the literary and artistic world which surrounded him. The fabric of St. Peter's, the paintings of Raphael, the miracles of Michael Angelo's genius, Ariosto's poems, Machiavelli's politics, Bibiena's comedies, musical entertainments, agreeable society, entirely absorbed Leo's mind, preventing him from appreciating in its full bearing what, after all, he considered as the passing whim of a rude monk in a half-barbarous country. For what he did to foster the intellectual movement of the age and the revival of classical learning, he fully deserves the fame that has attached to his name. XI. was elected in 1605, and died a few days after his election. He had been bishop of Pistoja, archbishop of Florence and legate of Clement VIII. to Henry IV. in Paris. His regard for honesty and justice and his love of literature had raised hopes which were cut short by his sudden death. XII. succeeded Pius VII. in 1823. He had been employed by his predecessor in several diplomatic missions in Germany and France. He applied himself, as pope, to the reform of abuses in Church and state government and the repression of liberal opinions.

The political persecution which he relentlessly exercised, by means of exceptional courts against the Carbonari and Freemasons, roused public opinion throughout Italy against temporal papacy. He died in 1829.

LEO III., surnamed THE ISAURIAN, emperor of the East, was a native of Isauria. He gained admission to the guards of Justinian II., and after distinguishing himself by his courage and ability, he was made by Anastasius II. commander of the imperial forces in Anatolia. Refusing, in 717, to acknowledge Theodosius III., he marched on Constantinople, and was raised by the army to the imperial throne. After the first nine years of his reign, in which he showed himself a great soldier and an able ruler, he involved himself in theological strife by his attempt to suppress image-worship, and thus began the great iconoclastic controversy which lasted above a hundred years. The common accounts of Leo are derived from the statements of his bitter enemies, and they have depicted him in the blackest colors. His first measures were cautious and moderate; they were followed by more decisive ones. Insurrections broke out at Constantinople, the patriarch Germanus being opposed to the emperor. The pope, Gregory II., condemned his edicts and remonstrated with him; the succeeding pope, Gregory III., had the Iconoclasts condemned at the Council of Rome, in 732, which provoked retaliatory measures on the part of the emperor, and in the midst of the momentous struggle Leo died, in 741.

LEO VI., surnamed THE PHILOSOPHER, emperor of the East, succeeded his father Basil, the Macedonian, in 886. He immediately expelled the patriarch Photius, who was his personal enemy. He made war on the Bulgarians and Hungarians, but only to be defeated, and his whole reign was troubled by inroads of the barbarians and disgraceful war intrigues. Leo distinguished himself as an author, and especially by his treatise on "Tactics," and by completing the body of laws entitled "Basilica."

LEOFRIC (le'o-fric) is distinguished as having been the last of the bishops of the ancient see of Crediton. Dating from Aidulf, who died in the year 931, and who fixed the see of Devonshire at Crediton, Leofric was the tenth bishop, and he effected the removal of the see to the rising city of Exeter. He was descended of an illustrious race in Normandy, and celebrated for his great learning. He and Livingus, his predecessor at Crediton, were much esteemed by Edward the Confessor; and as the clergy in that age had a monopoly of learning, Leofric acted as chaplain and chancellor to the king. It is recorded of him in an old manuscript in the Bodleian library at Oxford that, "going over his diocese, he studiously preached the word of God to the people committed to his charge, enlightened his clergy by his superior learning, built many churches, and omitted nothing of the duties which belonged to his high and responsible situation." The prevalency of piracy on the shores of Cornwall and Devon led him to desire the removal of the see to a place of quiet and safety, and he aimed also at uniting Crediton with St. German's, and so having only one diocese in the two countries. This he effected by the order of Edward the Confessor, who yielded to his request. The grant for the removal of the united sees of Crediton and St. German's to Exeter is very curious, and the ceremony was performed in the following manner: King Edward first placed the charter with his own hand upon the high altar of St. Peter's abbey church, which was chosen for the cathedral. He then led Leofric by the right hand, while his queen, Eaditha, led him by the left, up to the episcopal seat, and placed him in it in the presence of many nobles and ecclesiastics.

LEON (le'on), LUIS PONCE DE, a Spanish monk of the Augustinian order, was born in 1528. Imprisoned by the Inquisition for translating one of the books of the Bible, he wrote a work in which he eloquently explained the various titles of Christ. He lived for fourteen years after he came out of prison, and among other works wrote poems of high excellence. He was prior of his order when he died, in 1591.

LEONARD (len'nard), GEORGE, an eminent Baptist minister of New England, was born in Massachusetts, in the year 1802, and educated at Brown University and the Newton theological institution. He held two charges, the first at Salem, Massachusetts, and the other at Portland, Maine, where he died in 1831. He acted as secretary of the Foreign Missionary Society while at Salem. He wrote on temperance, and a volume of his sermons was published after his death.

LEONTIUS (le-on'sh'us), the name of several who were eminent in the early Church. 1. A physician, saint and martyr, who was probably of Arabian origin, but born at Vicentia, in Venetia, in the third century after Christ. He afterward removed to Aquileia, in Venetia, where he distinguished himself by his zeal in favor of Christianity. For this offence he was brought before the governor, Lysias, and after being tortured in various modes, he was at last beheaded, probably A. D. 300. His memory is celebrated by the Romish Church on August 20.

2. OF ANTIOCH, was born in Phrygia, and was a disciple of the martyr Lucianus, and having entered the Church, was ordained presbyter. He was one of the instructors of the heresiarch Aëtius, to whom it is said he expounded the writings of the prophets, especially Ezekiel. He died about A. D. 358. Of his writings, which were numerous, only a few fragments remain.

3. ARELATE, or OF ARLES, was bishop of that city about the middle of the fifth century. He presided in a council at Arles, held about 475 to condemn an error into which some had fallen respecting the doctrine of predestination. He appears to have died in 484.

4. OF BYZANTIUM, an ecclesiastical writer of the latter part of the sixth and the commencement of the seventh century, sometimes designated, from his original profession, Scholasticus, or the pleader. Among his writings are "Apology for the Council of Chalcedon," a treatise "Against the Eutychians and the Nestorians" and "Concerning the Twofold Nature of Christ, in Opposition to the Monophysite heresy."

LEOPARD (lep'pard). The original word thus rendered implies spotted or speckled, and probably includes various feline species which are distinguished by us as leopards, panthers, etc. The animal meant would seem to be the panther, now not uncommon in the Lebanon, and occasionally to be found elsewhere in Syria. It is much smaller than a lioness, but heavy in proportion to its bulk. It prowls about by night, is catlike in its habits, and is mischievous to domestic cattle, sometimes even to men. There is a larger variety in Asia Minor. The leopard is noted in Scripture as infesting Lebanon and Antilibanus, Song Sol. iv. 8; its fierceness is indicated, Isa. xi. 6; its mode of watching for its prey, Jer. v. 6; Hos. xiii. 7; the spottings of its hide, Jer. xiii. 23; its fleetness, Hab. i. 8; and it is also symbolically introduced, Dan. vii. 6; Rev. xiii. 2.

LEOPOLD (le'o-pöld) II., born in 1747, became emperor of Germany in 1790, after being grand duke of Tuscany for twenty-five years. In that position he showed himself an able reformer in civil and ecclesiastical matters, and stood up undauntedly and successfully against the pope. On becoming emperor, he found an ample field for the exercise of his administrative powers, as discontent and disturbance everywhere prevailed, and the revolution of France had spread abroad the spirit of revolt. But by his wise measures Leopold made the Netherlands submit, and brought tranquillity to every part of the empire. He was engaged with Austria and Prussia in arranging to succor his unhappy sister, Marie Antoinette, and her husband, when he died, in 1792.

LEPORIUS (le-po're-us), a monastic, was by birth a Gaul, and embraced the monastic life in the early part of the fifth century, at Marseilles, where he enjoyed a high reputation for purity and holiness until he became the advocate of the double heresy that man did not stand in need of divine grace, and that Christ was born with a human nature only. Having been excommunicated in consequence of these doctrines, he went to Africa, where he became familiar with Aurelius and St. Augustine, by whose instructions he profited so much that he not only became convinced of his errors, but drew up a solemn recantation, after which he was reinstated in his ecclesiastical privileges. He did not return, however, to his native country, but laying aside the profession of a monk, was ordained a presbyter by St. Augustine, about 425. We know nothing further regarding his career, except that he was still alive in 430.

LEPROSY (lep'ro-se), called emphatically by the Jews the "stroke" and the "stroke of the scourge," because they regarded it as inflicted by Jehovah as an indication of his wrath, is a chronic, cutaneous, tubercular disease, prevalent from the earliest historic times among the ancient Jews and Egyptians, and a malady that was very common during the Middle Ages in the different countries of Europe, and which still exists to a great extent in many quarters of the New and Old Worlds. Leprosy is one of the most incurable and most loathsome of human maladies. When speaking of the cases of it which he saw in Syria in the seventeenth century, the old traveler Maundrell describes it as a distemper so noisome that it might well pass for the utmost corruption of the human body on this side of the grave. There were several species of real leprosy, the white, the black, the red, or a certain form of alopecia, and a mild kind which did not render the subject of it unclean.

The white leprosy is that which was most prevalent among the Jews. It begins with mealy crusts and scurfy scabs, originally not larger than a pin's point, a little depressed in the skin, Lev. xiii. 3, 30, and covered with white hairs, ver. 3, 20. These spots rapidly spread, ver. 8, and produce wild flesh, ver. 10, 14. The leprosy symptoms appear most frequently in the hairy parts of the body, ver. 29, and also on members which have been ulcerously affected, ver. 18.

When the leprosy is fully developed, it is characterized by the presence of dusky red or livid tubercles of different sizes upon the face, lips, nose, eyebrows, ears and extremities of the body. The skin of the tuberculated face is at the same time thickened, wrinkled and shining, and the features very greatly distorted. The hair of the eyebrows, eyelashes and beard falls off; the eyes are often injected, the voice becomes hoarse and nasal, the sense of smell impaired or lost, and that of the touch strangely altered; for whilst the tuberculated and other affected parts are in the first instance sometimes super-sensitive, latterly, in course of the disease, they became devoid of feeling. As the malady proceeds onward in its course, the tubercles soften and open, ulcerations of similar mucous tubercles appear in the nose and throat, rendering the breath extremely offensive, tubercular masses begin also to form internally upon the various mucous membranes, on the surfaces of the kidney, lungs, etc., cracks, fissures and circular ulcers appear on the fingers, toes and extremities, and joint after joint falls off by a kind of spontaneous gangrene. Sometimes the upper and sometimes the lower extremities are affected by this mortifying and mutilation of the parts.

In the Middle Ages leprosy prevailed in Europe to a fearful extent; laws were enacted to arrest its spread, and leper hospitals, or leper-houses, were everywhere erected to receive the victims of the disease. The leper hospitals were intended for the isolation of the lepers, not for their cure. In the leper hospital in Edinburgh the inmates begged for the general community, sitting for the purpose at the door of the hospital. They were obliged to warn those approaching them of the presence of an infected fellow-mortal by using a wood rattle or clapper. The infected in European countries were obliged to enter leper hospitals, and were considered legally and politically dead. The Church, taking the same view of it, performed over them the solemn ceremonies for the burial of the dead, the priest closing the ceremony by throwing upon them a shovelful of earth. The physical causes of the disease are uncertain. In Europe it is now principally confined to Norway, where the last census gave two thousand cases. It visits occasionally some of the seaboard localities of Spain. It has made its appearance in the most different climates, from Iceland through the temperate regions to the arid plains of Arabia, in moist and dry localities, and it still exists in Palestine and Egypt.

The laws which Moses instituted relative to leprosy are fully and clearly expressed in the Pentateuch, and do not call for detail here.

Leprosy was polluting, spreading, transmissible and incurable by any known remedy. It was therefore the standing symbol of sin, the most malignant evil in God's universe—of sin in connection with its deserved punishment, the doom of death. The leprosy is the foulness of death; consequently, there is a very close analogy both between the states themselves of death and leprosy and the modes of purification from them respectively. The death spots which soon begin to appear in the corpse after the vital spark has fled, and which spread till the whole has become a mass of corruption, had their image in the plague spots of the leper, which also, if unchecked, wrought on till rotteness penetrated through the whole system.

Therefore every leper was a living sermon, a loud admonition to keep unspotted from the world. The exclusion of lepers from the camp, from the Holy City, conveyed figuratively the same lesson, as is done in the New Testament passages, Rev. xxi. 27; Eph. v. 5. It is only when we take this view of the leprosy that we account for the fact that just this disease so frequently occurs as the theocratic punishment of sin. The image of sin is best suited for reflecting it. He who is a sinner before God is represented as a sinner in the eyes of man also by the circumstance that he must exhibit before men the image of sin. God took care that ordinarily the image and the thing itself were perfectly coincident, although, no doubt, there were exceptions.

The cleansing of the leper had two very distinctly marked stages, one having respect to his restoration to the position of a citizen, his admission to the fellowship of the living, and the other to the re-establishment of his right to participate in the sacred privileges of the clean. In regard to the first, the priest was obliged to visit the leper outside the camp, in after times at his own house, wherever that might be, or where the priest might choose to appoint. Having inspected the healed leper, and being satisfied with his state, the priest took for him two living birds, probably doves. One of these he killed above a vessel of living water—that is, water taken fresh and pure from the stream—and allowed the blood to drop into it. He then took the other bird and dipped it into the water which had become mingled with blood, also took a bunch of cedar, scarlet and hyssop, with which, after being similarly dipped into the water, he sprinkled the recovered leper seven times, and then he let go the live bird into the open air, to fly at large and consort as it might please with its kind. This done, the leper, with no further ceremony than shaving his body and washing his clothes, might return to the camp and mix freely with his fellow-citizens, though still for a week he had to remain out of his own tent.

The other stage in the leper's purification had to do with his readmission to the sanctuary or his restoration to the privileges of an accepted worshiper of God. This commenced on the eighth day, at the sanctuary, when the healed leper brought first a he-lamb for a trespass-offering, with a log of oil, then a ewe-lamb for a sin-offering, also a he-lamb for a burnt-offering and three-tenths of an ephah for a meat-offering, in cases of extreme poverty doves being allowed to be substituted for the lambs, with a diminished quantity of meal for the meat-offering. The man was led by the priest to the door of the tabernacle, where his trespass-offering was slain and waved for him. With the blood of this victim the priest marked the tip of the leper's right ear, the thumb of his right hand and the great toe of his right foot; then, after sprinkling a little of the oil seven times toward the door of the tabernacle, he anointed the same parts over the blood. It was nearly the same service as that which was performed at the consecration of the priesthood, and must be understood with reference to the priestly character of Israel as the elect nation, Ex. xix. 6. The leper had lost his place in this sacred community while the disease was upon him which formed at once the image and the chastisement of sin, and his fresh incorporation with the community fitly took the form of an act of consecration, and that with the blood of his trespass-offering, which brought to remembrance the loss the community had sustained by his separation and uncleanness. Through this offering he had first to come into a right position with the community at large, and only then was he in a condition to offer for himself, as a member of the great priestly race, the sin-offering, the burnt-offering and the meat-offering, indicating in succession his reconciliation with God, his dedication to the service of Him who had restored him and the fruits of righteousness in which this dedication was henceforth to make itself manifest. The oil which was superadded to the blood on the ear, thumb and toe must have borne the same general sense that attached to anointings with oil. It bespoke the promise of the Spirit's grace to fit the recipient for the service to which he was afresh consecrated. And to mark more distinctly the sacred character and import of the oil, it was, before being applied, both waved before the Lord and sprinkled seven times. That the application of the oil and the blood should have been made to parts of the ear, hand and foot, was doubtless to show how all the powers and organs of the man were to partake of the consecrating energy, so that the ear should be ever ready to listen to the voice of God, and the hand and foot to carry into execution the behests of his will. And now, when the whole of this long and instructive ceremonial had been gone through, the recovered leper was admitted to his domestic position in the family, as one who could hold the place and discharge the functions, whether civil or sacred, which belonged to a recognized member of the commonwealth of Israel.

The application of the ordinance to Christian times can so readily be made by intelligent readers that there is no necessity for enlarging on it. The blood of Christ applied to the conscience, and the renewing and sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit, dimly foreshadowed by these symbolical rites, are here the openly revealed, as they are the only effectual, means of purification from the defilement and death of sin. No one smitten with the spiritual leprosy can repair in vain to the remedy thus provided.

LEPROSY OF GARMENTS.—The law respecting this point is given in Lev. xiii. 47-59. It is there spoken of as a thing that might infect indifferently woolen, linen and skin or leather apparel, and as appearing in green or reddish spots which resisted washing, and continued to spread, the material of the garment meanwhile becoming bare and fretted. Directions were given to the priest to ascertain whether the appearances in any case were really of this description, or were such as to give way to ordinary applications; in the former case the garment was to be burned, in the latter preserved. Much difference of opinion has prevailed as to what should be understood by this leprosy-like marring of garments, and there is still no certainty upon the subject. There is some probability in the idea of Sommer, that what is meant are the fusing-stains occasioned by damp and want of air, and which, when confirmed, cause the cloth to moulder and fall to pieces. But the materials no longer exist for arriving at a certain conclusion. At the period of the legislation something must have been known to exist, which, from a resemblance to leprosy in the human frame, was wont to be called by the same name, and was, for legal purposes, subjected to a specific treatment.

LEPROSY IN HOUSES.—This stands much in the same predicament as the leprosy of garments; it is impossible to arrive at certainty regarding it. The prescriptions respecting it are contained in Lev. xiv. 33-57. It may have consisted in the formation of some fungi or minute plants upon the stone, as has recently been supposed by some inquirers; but this view, as well as many others, must be held to be little more than conjectural. Whatever the nature of the disorder might be, there can be no doubt that in the house respect was had to its possessor, since when it came to be in a good condition a cleansing or purification quite analogous to the man's was prescribed. He was thus taught to see in his external environments a sign of what was, or might be, internal.

LERINS (le'rinz), THE CONVENT OF, is one of the most famous of all the old monastic houses in France. It is situated in the small island of St. Honoré, near the coast of Provence, adjoining Antibes. Its origin is traced to Honoratus, who had adopted the Christian faith in opposition to his family, who held a high rank. Honoratus and his brother, who had also become a believer, settled in an island near Marseilles with a view to seclusion and meditation, just as Iona and Holy Isle were afterward occupied by their celebrated owners. Monasticism was now introduced from the East, and in retired spots along the sea-shore convents were speedily established. After some time Honoratus removed to Provence and settled at Jerins, and he was subsequently made bishop of Arles, whereupon the convent at Lerins grew in importance and fame. It became a great school in which many of the clergy of the South of France were educated, among whom were the celebrated Hilary of Arles and Eucherius of Lyons. In the fifth century, the theology taught in the place leaned toward Pelagianism, and in process of time so great irregularities appeared in the management, that a reform had to be sought, which was not effected without great strife and bloodshed. In the eighth century, the abbot could point to thirty-seven hundred monks under his government. Then came the Saracens, who laid it waste, but it revived, and at the close of the tenth century it had reached the summit of its fame. Establishments in Spain, Italy and Corsica were assigned to Lerins; and after a varied history the Benedictines gained possession in 1505. The island was captured by Spain in 1635, and ever afterward it declined, although the convent still continued to exist.

LESHEM (lesh'm), Josh. xix. 47. See DAN, 1.

LESLEY (les'le), JOHN, a Scotch Roman Catholic priest, the councilor and faithful adherent of Queen Mary, who made him bishop of Ross, was born in 1527. He joined the queen after her escape from Loch Leven, acted as her ambassador at the court of Elizabeth, was imprisoned in the Tower, and after his release he went to Rome on a mission from Mary. He was nuncio at the courts of Vienna and Prague, and became vicar-general and suffragan of the diocese of Rouen. He died in 1596.

LESLIE (les'le), CHARLES, an Irish clergyman, was born in 1650. He united loyalty to James II. with his own opposition to Romanism. He was an able controversialist, and disputed publicly with the Romish bishop of Connor, and exerted himself to convert James and the Pretender, whom he joined in exile. He was the author of "A Short and Easy Method with Deists" and other works. His Method with Deists is one of the most remarkable works of the age. The argument for the truth of Christianity, as he presents it, is irrefragable. It never has been met by any skeptic, and it has only to be comprehended in order to be seen to be unanswerable. Besides, its brevity and condensation are such that it may be read and mastered in a few hours.

LESLIE, JOHN, D.D., an Irish prelate, was a native of Scotland, and was educated at Aberdeen and Oxford. After twenty-two years' residence abroad, he returned to England, and was patronized by Charles I. and Charles II. He was made bishop of the Orkneys; and in 1633 he was translated to Raphoe, in Ireland, where he built a palace so strongly fortified that he was the last who surrendered to the arms of Cromwell. At the Restoration he returned to England, and in 1661 he was translated to the see of Clogher. He died in 1671, when he was more than a hundred years old.

LESS [Latin, LESSIUS], LEONHARD, a learned Jesuit, was born at Brechtan, near Antwerp, in 1554. He was successively appointed professor of philosophy and professor of divinity in the college of his order at Louvain. He opposed the doctrine of Thomas Aquinas concerning grace, and the faculty of divinity at Louvain charged him with semi-Pelagianism. He died in 1623.

LESSONS (less'onz), certain portions of the Scriptures read in most Christian churches during divine service. The performance of this duty in the ancient Church devolved on the catechumen. In the English Church the greater part of the Old Testament is read once through in daily lessons, and the New Testament, with the exception of Revelation, three times in the year. In the Presbyterian and some other Churches the word "lesson," in this sense, is unknown, the selection of the passage to be read being left to the choice of the officiating clergyman.

LETUSHIM (le-tu'shim), an Arabian tribe descended from Dedan, Gen. xxv. 3.

LEUCOPETRIANS (leu-co-pe'tre-ans), a fanatical sect which sprang up in the Greek and Eastern Churches toward the close of the twelfth century. They professed to believe in a double trinity, rejected wedlock, abstained from flesh, treated with contempt the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper and all the various branches of external worship, and placed the essence of religion in internal prayer alone. The founder of this sect is said to have been a person called Leucopetrus, and his chief disciple Tychicus, who corrupted by fanatical interpretations several books of Scripture, and particularly the Gospel of Matthew.

LEUMMIM (le-um'mim), also an Arabian tribe descended from Dedan, Gen. xxv. 3; possibly those called by Ptolemy Allumæoti, in the central part of Yemen.

LEUSDEN (loos'den), JOHN, a celebrated Biblical critic and theologian, was born at Utrecht, in 1624, and died in 1699. For nearly fifty years he sustained a very high reputation as a professor of Hebrew in the recently-founded university of his native city. He had well qualified himself for the duties of this office by careful study of theology and the Oriental languages at Utrecht, and afterward of the sacred original of the Old Testament under the tuition of a very learned rabbi of Amsterdam. Few writings have descended to us from the Biblical scholars of former days of more solid utility than Leusden's. If they are defective in originality of genius, they undoubtedly afford evidence of their author's varied resources of learning, adorned by clearness of method and an easy style, characteristics which made Leusden one of the most renowned and successful teachers of his age. The following are some of his numerous works: "Compendium of the Old and New Testament," "Sacred Onomasticon" and "Elementary Hebrew Grammar."

LEVELERS (lev'el-ers), in English history, a party which arose in the army of the Long Parliament about the time when it overawed that assembly and transferred the king to Hampton Court, in 1647. The Levelers professed what their name implied—a determination to level all ranks and establish an equality in titles and estates throughout the kingdom. Several of the officers belonging to this party were cashiered in 1649; and on Cromwell's departure for Ireland, in the end of that year, they raised mutinies in various quarters occupied by the army, and were put down with some bloodshed.

LEVER (le'ver), THOMAS, master of St. John's College, Cambridge, was distinguished as a preacher in the reign of Edward VI. A warm upholder of the Reformation, he had to seek refuge on the Continent when Mary came to the throne. He became so infected with Calvinism that on his return to England he was deprived of all his preferments. He died in 1577.

LEVI (le'vi), the third son of Jacob and Leah, born in Mesopotamia, B. C. 1750, Gen. xxix. 34. No circumstance is recorded of him save the part which he and his full brother Simeon took in the massacre of the Shechemites, to avenge the wrong done to their sister Dinah, Gen. xxxiv. 25, 26. This transaction was to his last hour regarded by Jacob with abhorrence, and he failed not to allude to it in his dying declaration. As Simeon and Levi were united in that act, so the patriarch couples them in his prophecy: "Accursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel. I will divide them in Jacob, and disperse them in Israel." And accordingly their descendants were afterward, in different ways, dispersed among the other tribes; although, in the case of Levi, whose descendants were set apart to the priesthood, this curse was eventually turned into a benefit and blessing.

Two other persons of the name of Levi are mentioned in the genealogy of Jesus Christ, viz., the son of Malchi, a near ancestor of our Lord, Luke iii. 24, and a more remote ancestor, son of Simeon, Luke iii. 29. The Evangelist Matthew also bore the name of Levi, Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27, 29. See MATTHEW.

enemy, Ps. lxxiv. 14. In the passage last named the allusion would seem to be to Egypt. Probably it is so in the denunciation of Isaiah, though there it may be to the Assyrian or Babylonian power. Job iii. 8 is confessedly obscure. It is rendered by Carey, "Let execrators of days note it infamous who are prepared to provoke the crocodile," and he illustrates his version by the fact that, though Egyptians generally venerated this reptile, there were those who hunted and destroyed it. The sense of the entire verse, he thinks, is, "Let that might be stigmatized with names the most odious by that particular class of men whose practice it is solemnly to devote certain days to the object of waging war with the evil demon in the person of the crocodile." Implying, then, generally, a monster, the word seems to have sometimes a more precise signification. Such it must have in Job xli, where it clearly intends a particular creature

LEVI, DAVID, a London Jew of considerable acquirements though of humble origin, was born in 1740. He was first a shoemaker and afterward a hatter, but the works he published evinced much study and ability. In 1787 he entered into a polemical controversy with Dr. Priestley, whose "Letters to the Jews" he answered in two series of epistolary essays. He was also the author of a volume on the rites and ceremonies of the Jews; "Lingua Sacra, or a Hebrew and English Dictionary," "The Pentateuch in Hebrew and English," "Dissertations on the Prophecies" and some other works. He died in 1799.

LEVIATHAN (le-vi'a-than). This word, according to its derivation, properly denotes an animal wreathed, gathering itself in folds. Hence, according to Gesenius, it signified sometimes a serpent, Job iii. 8, marg.; sometimes a sea-monster, Ps. civ. 26, and was used in a figurative way of a hostile kingdom, Isa. xxvii. 1, or a cruel remarkable for its size and its power of resisting attack. The conjectures which have been hazarded as to what it was are many, and need not be enumerated here. But an indication has been already given of the quarter to which we are to look; and it may be said that Biblical critics are now pretty well agreed that the sacred writer is describing the crocodile. Indeed, this is so evident that no one could ever have attempted to show that it was any other creature but from the necessity supposed by other texts, of showing that the leviathan must be something else than a crocodile. A Jewish legend in regard to Leviathan is found in 2 Esd. vi. 49, 52.

LEVIRATE (le-vi'rate). See MARRIAGE.

LEVISON (lev'i-son), MORDECAI GUMPEL, a learned Jewish physician and commentator, and a fellow-student of the celebrated philosopher, Moses Mendelssohn, in Berlin. He afterward went to London, and was physician in one of the hospitals, was then nominated by Gustavus III. of Sweden to the professional chair in Upsal, which office he held for several years, returned to his native place, Berlin, in 1781, thence went to Hamburg in 1784, where he died, February 10, 1797. Among his works which illustrate the Bible are "A Commentary on Ecclesiastes," "A Treatise on the Pentateuch, the Prophets and the Talmud," and a "Hebrew Lexicon."

LEVIS (le'vis), 1 Esd. ix. 14, a corruption for "the Levite," Ezra x. 15.

LEVITE, LEVITES (lêv'ites), the descendants of the patriarch Levi, in whose history we have a remarkable example of a prophetic curse, Gen. xlix. 7, literally fulfilled and yet made into a blessing. The sins of the fathers may be visited upon the children, Ex. xx. 5, but penally upon those children alone that partake their fathers' sins, Ezek. xviii. 5-20.

Distinguished persons were early born of this tribe. Moses and Aaron, the great leaders of the movement from Egypt, were Levites, Ex. ii. 1; vi. 16-25. But the Levites do not multiply rapidly. At the first census there were only twenty-two thousand of them, though all the males from a month old were numbered, Num. iii. 39, fewer

Aaron and his family were soon designated for the priesthood, Ex. xxviii. 1, but nothing was as yet said of the rest of the tribe. It may be supposed, however, that they would naturally be employed by Moses, and would specially adhere to their great tribesman; and an opportunity occurred while the Israelites were encamped about Sinai, when they evinced a higher principle and stood by Moses, not merely because he was of kin to them, but because his was the cause of God. It was when Moses came down hastily from the mount and espied the golden calf. Anxious to avenge the foul idolatry, he cried, "Who is on the Lord's side? let him come unto me." The Levites, we are told, responded to the call, and at the divine command slew three thousand of the guilty people, Ex. xxxii. 25-29. It was for this, done from the high motive of vindicating God's honor without regard to earthly ties, that the tribe was selected to be Jehovah's peculiar inheritance, his ministers, the privileged servants of his sanctuary. Deut. x. 8, 9; xviii. 1, 2; xxxiii. 8-11. When the first-born of the Egyptians were slain, and those of Israel preserved, God declared—and it was to be a standing ordinance—that the first-born, were it of man or beast, should be his, Ex. xiii. 2. The first-born of animals fit for sacrifice were to be so offered; others were to be redeemed in a specified way; the first-born of man also were to be redeemed, ver. 13. Now, at the census there were found twenty-two thousand two hundred and seventy-three first-born of Israel. For these, then, the Levites, nearly equal in number, were to be taken in redemption, five shekels apiece being paid to the priests as redemption-money for the overplus, Num. iii. 44-51.

The tribe of Levi was composed of three great families, the Kohathites, the Gershonites and the Merarites. The whole of them were generally to do the service of the tabernacle, and were cleansed and sanctified in a solemn manner, Num. viii. 5-22, but a special distribution of their work was made among the three families. The Kohathites were to have charge of the sacred vessels, the Gershonites of the hangings and curtains of the tabernacle, while to the Merarites was assigned the care and custody of the boards and pillars thereof. And exact directions were given how each were to perform their office when the Hebrew host was on the march through the wilderness, Num. iii. 21-37. Their service was to last from twenty-five years of age to fifty, Num. viii. 23-26. Much of this was but a temporary arrangement. It suited a movable camp; it would not suit a settled nation. Accordingly, we find that Moses assigned judicial duties to the Levites, and made them keepers of the book of the law, Deut. xvii. 8-12. Besides, their numbers would multiply, and they would become far more than would be needful for the actual service of the tabernacle or the temple. Hence, though the great principle was ever to be kept in view, that the tribe was specially the Lord's for his service, we find in later times Levites engaged in various pursuits, holding secular offices and living very much as the rest of Israel, save that the tenure of their property distributed them through the whole land, instead of their being located as others were in a defined territory of their own.

Moses had, before his death, commanded that forty-eight cities should be allotted to the tribe of Levi, with the suburban districts a thousand cubits from the wall on each side, in order to supply pasture-land for cattle, Num. xxxv. 1-8. Accordingly, when Canaan was divided among the Israelites, forty-eight cities were selected by lot from the inheritance of the various tribes, thirteen of them being appropriated to the priests, and six being also refuge cities. A table of these Levitical cities will be found in Josh. xxi. 1-42.

It will be observed that the Levites were scattered in Israel; but they had a large inheritance—so many goodly cities in every district of the land. And it must have been a blessed provision for these colonies of sanctified men to be located everywhere, always ready for God's service—the nurseries of holy literature, the models of just and righteous conduct. It was a blessed provision, but, as with the rest of the law, its benefits were but partially reaped. There may be a doubt whether the Levites ever occupied all the cities reserved for them; and though there are some noble examples which they gave of godly sincerity and self-denial, yet the subsequent history shows us that they were not the working leaven they were intended to be through the masses of Israel.

In addition to their cities, the Levites were to have tithes of all produce, and from these they were to set apart a tithe for the priests, Num. xviii. 21, 24, 26-31. And it would seem that every third year they were to have an additional tithe shared with the poor; and the rest of the people were charged never to forsake them, but to let them share their abundance and participate in their feasts, Deut. xiv. 27-29. Also, if any Levite not bound to attend on the tabernacle came up of his own devout mind to take part in the sacred service, his zeal was not to go unrewarded, Deut. xviii. 6-8.

It has been observed that it was because of their readiness to avenge the Lord's quarrel that the Levites were selected as his ministers. Once in the wilderness we find a considerable body of the tribe ambitiously desiring further pre-eminence, and envying the family of Aaron, who had exclusively the priesthood. This movement was repressed and punished by the destruction of Korah and his company; and by the sign of Aaron's rod blossoming and yielding fruit God's immutable purpose was sufficiently declared. The Levites seem ever after to have acquiesced in their position; and they were relieved of the most onerous duties when, on entering Canaan, the Gibeonites were made hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation and the house of God, Josh. ix. 21, 23, 27.

Nevertheless, as hinted above, the Levites did not in Canaan fill the place which properly belonged to them; and the accounts we gather during the times of the judges are somewhat perplexing as compared with the ordinances delivered in the Pentateuch. For a long time they did not secure hierarchical power, were little regarded as the religious teachers of the nation and were indeed in a state of dependence and helplessness. The reason must be sought in the failure of the people generally to realize their high destiny. If the Levites did not obtain possession of the cities allotted to them, the other tribes shrank equally from occupying their territories, Jud. i. 21-36. If the Levites failed in carrying out their peculiar organization, other tribes were alike remiss, every one, from the want of some central authority, doing that which was right in his own eyes, Jud. xvii. 6. Besides, the sacerdotal tribe was small in point of numbers; they were not able, from the paucity of men, to supply the demand; for we find a wandering Levite eagerly caught up, first by a household and afterward by a section of a tribe, and his presence and ministrations, though above those he had a right to perform, regarded as a pledge of the divine blessing, Jud. xvii., xviii. Under such circumstances the original system of household priesthood, the eldest born or chief of a family acting as the priest of it, no doubt largely prevailed. But in this condition of the Levites we may see how remarkably the prediction of Jacob had its accomplishment.

Progress, however, was made. Samuel was a Levite, and his administration must have reflected honor on the tribe and contributed to his importance; and though anomalies still occurred—the holy ark, for example, being left long in the charge apparently of laymen, 1 Sam. vii. 1, 2, and even David, when intending to bring it to Jerusalem, not at first understanding that none ought to carry it but the Levites, 1 Chr. xv.—yet in the reign of that monarch, by whom so many other excellent arrangements were made, the Levites were recognized and set in their proper position "to wait on the sons of Aaron for the service of the house of the Lord, in the courts and in the chambers, and in the purifying of all holy things, and the work of the service of the house of God, both for the shew-bread and for the fine flour for meat-offering, and for the unleavened cakes, and for that which is baked in the pan, and for that which is fried, and for all manner of measure and size, and to stand every morning to thank and praise the Lord, and likewise at even; and to offer all burnt sacrifices unto the Lord in the sabbaths, in the new moons, and on the set feasts, by number, according to the order commanded unto them, continually before the Lord; and that they should keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the charge of the holy place, and the charge of the sons of Aaron their brethren, in the service of the house of the Lord," 1 Chr. xxiii. 28-32. The tribe was now very numerous. The males, from thirty years upward, amounted to thirty-eight thousand. Of these, twenty-four thousand were selected "to set forward the work of the house of the Lord"—that is, to do the ordinary ministerial service. Six thousand were officers and judges, four thousand were porters, and four thousand were musicians, ver. 3-5. These were properly arranged, divided into courses, their term of service beginning now at twenty instead of twenty-five or thirty, when their work was more laborious, Num. iv. 47; and it would seem probable that they discharged their duties in rotation, coming up from the cities to the sanctuary according to their turn, 1 Chr. xxiii. In illustration of their political and judicial functions, we find special mention of a family supplying judges and officers, some for the kingdom west of the Jordan, others for the trans-Jordanic tribes, ver. 29-32.

This full organization did not last very long. At the revolt of the ten tribes, the Levites, nobly refusing to participate in Jeroboam's unhallowed doings, left their cities and repaired to the southern kingdom, 2 Chr. xi. 13-15. Judah was of course strengthened by this migration, but the worldly wealth of the tribe must have been materially diminished. Doubtless the Lord's favorable presence was more to them than perishable treasure, and in the subsequent history we often find them honorably mentioned. Various prophets were of the sacerdotal tribe, and Levites took their part in the occasional revivals of religion. Abijah referred with pride to their presence in his kingdom, 2 Chr. xiii. 9, 10. They were put in places of trust by Jehoshaphat, 2 Chr. xix. 8-11; they led his host with holy songs, 2 Chr. xx. 14-19. They had a great part in establishing Josiah on the throne after the usurpation of Athaliah, 2 Chr. xxiii. 1-8. They were more zealous than their brethren the priests at Hezekiah's reformation, 2 Chr. xxix. 3-36. Their courses were reorganized, and the tithes again brought to them, 2 Chr. xxxi. 2-4, and their genealogies were revised, ver. 11-19; and later they were employed in promoting the reformation under Josiah, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 12, 13.

After the captivity some Levites and priests returned with Zerubbabel and Ezra, Ezra ii. 36-42. Those that thus came back resumed their proper functions, Ezra iii. 8-12. They subscribed the national covenant, Ezra x. 2-13, and dwelt around Jerusalem, Ezra xi. 36; they also aided Ezra and Nehemiah in their pious works, Ezra x. 15.

In later times many of the scribes and elders, we may well suppose, were Levites, but in the New Testament they have little prominence. They are coupled with the priests as formalists and opposers of truth, Luke x. 31, 32. Nevertheless, there were Levites, such as Barnabas, Acts iv. 36, 37, who gladly embraced and preached the gospel.

Since the destruction of Jerusalem, all trace of the separate existence of the tribe has been lost. Some Jews, indeed, have a traditional notion that they are of Levitical families; but it is needless to say that the assumption is incapable of actual proof.

LEVITICUS (le-vit'e-kus), BOOK OF. See PENTATEUCH.

LEYCZON NOBLA (lays'sōng no'bla), a poem so named had a great circulation among the Waldenses. It treats of the experiences of the Christian life, setting forth the importance of holiness, showing the certainty of future punishment and exhorting to sincere repentance. The word "leyczon" is a corruption of the Latin "lectio," which signifies "sermon" or "lesson;" and therefore the title in English is "The Noble Lesson." It has been attributed to the Bohemian brethren, but its Waldensian origin may not be doubted. It was generally known in the fifteenth century.

COL. JOHN LILBURNE.—See article.

LEYDEN (li'den), SCHOOL OF. A party of rationalistic theologians has of late years been spreading through Holland the skeptical views which have prevailed at Tubingen, in Germany. The university of Leyden has been the fountain-head whence the current of rationalism has flowed, and J. H. Scholten has been the great agent in directing the stream. He was orthodox in his early years; he even opposed the Tubingen doctors; but quite unexpectedly he veered around and adopted their conclusions, and on some points he has gone much farther. Professedly he admits the Scriptures, but on a level with them he places the views and feelings of believers. The writing of the Scriptures is merely human, and criticism must examine what is written. Very speedily he settles it as a fact that nothing is certain before the time of Hosea and Amos, and so the work of destruction goes on. Abraham and the patriarchs are only personifications, and not persons; and thus the Old Testament can be made anything that dogmatic assertion may affirm. So with the New Testament, also; every miracle must disappear; there can be nothing supernatural, and hence there never was. To this condition have matters come in the great school of solid Dutch theology. Along with Scholten, Kuenen and Ravenhoff, both professors in the university, are engaged in promulgating these views, which already have obtained extensive acceptance in the Dutch Church.

LEYDEN, JOHN OF, or BOCKHOLD. See ANABAPTISTS.

LEYDT (lit), JOHANNES, who became an influential minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, and an ardent supporter of the Revolutionary struggle, was born in Holland in 1718. He was educated in this country, and entered the ministry in 1748. He was settled as pastor over the united churches of New Brunswick and Six-mile Run, New Jersey. When the controversy arose respecting a home or a Dutch education for the ministry, he took a decided part in behalf of home-training and separation from the mother Church, so that all ecclesiastical matters should be finally settled in this country without any appeal to Holland. He was a vigorous promoter of the establishment of a college—at first called Queen's College (1770), now known as Rutgers College—at New Brunswick, of which he was appointed a trustee. He was famed for his energy, his prudence, his manifold labors, and his influence in behalf of the Revolution was given with all his heart, as he earnestly desired to see the independence of the colonies recognized. He died in 1783.

L'HÔPITAL (lo'pe-tahl), MICHEL DE, a very enlightened Christian statesman of France, was born in 1505. He practiced at the bar with such success that he was made a counselor of Parliament, was sent as ambassador to the Council of Trent, and held many other important public offices. In every way he proved himself the friend of toleration, and made strenuous efforts to allay the disputes between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. He successfully opposed the establishment of the Inquisition in France, assembled the States-General and made a stirring appeal to them to put down all religious strife and to establish religious freedom. He obtained great toleration for the Protestants, and issued the proclamation of "Peace," which increased their religious privileges. To achieve these enlightened measures he had to contend with the duke of Guise and his followers, who opposed his measures of toleration with the uttermost bitterness. Their religious rancor broke out into a civil war, which, as L'Hôpital could not restrain, he did all in his power to moderate. Weary of useless struggles, and getting some idea of the sanguinary projects of Charles IX. and his regent-mother, Catherine de Medicis, he resigned the seals of office and retired into the privacy of a quiet country life. Here he was for four years, when tidings came of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Though a strict Romanist, he had shown himself so liberal minded that he narrowly escaped being included in the bloody proscription. But that eve proved fatal to him. Shocked at its barbarity, and grieving for his country, he sank into his grave a few months afterward, in 1573, leaving behind him a character which not only overtopped that of his cotemporaries, but for integrity, ability and Christian moderation is equal to that of any statesman.

LIBANIUS (li-ba'ne-us), a Greek philosopher who taught with great success in the schools of Antioch and Constantinople, was born at Antioch in 314. He was a great favorite with the emperor, but declined to receive any of the honors which were offered to him. Although a pagan and an opponent of Christianity, Basil and Chrysostom were among his pupils. He died in 390.

LIBANUS (lib'a-nus), 1 Esd. iv. 48; Judith i. 7, the same as Lebanon. In the last-named place Antilibanus occurs.

LIBATION (li-ba'shun), anything poured out before the gods as an act of homage or worship; a drink-offering. The term was often extended in signification, however, to the whole offering of which this formed a part, and in which not only a little wine was poured upon the altar, but a small cake was laid upon it. This custom prevailed even in the houses of the Romans, who at their meals made an offering to the Lares in the fire which burned upon the hearth. The libation was a sort of heathen "grace before meat."

LIBELLATICI (li-bel-lat'e-se), a designation of one kind of the lapsed from Christianity in times of persecution. Every one accused or suspected of being a Christian was permitted to purge himself before a heathen magistrate, on which occasion a libellus, or certificate, was given him that he had never been a Christian, or that he had abjured the name of Christ. This was the origin of the term.

LIBER DIURNUS PONTIFICALIS is the title of a very curious collection of papers which contains copies of letters addressed by the bishops of Rome to the several monarchs, patriarchs, bishops and other important personages with whom they had public business to transact.

It is probable that this collection was written before A. D. 752, and on matters of detail, during the sixth and seventh centuries, such as the mode of election of the Roman bishops and the ritual, is very minute and comprehensive. It seems to have fallen aside for a time, lest its evidence should establish the fact that the popes really depended on the emperors for their elevation. Since 1660 several editions have been published.

LIBER PONTIFICALIS is the title of a celebrated work which contains the names and history of the bishops of Rome from Peter the apostle down to Stephen VI., A. D. 891. The great differences which are apparent in different copies warrant the belief that several writers were engaged in preparing it. The most ancient authority for this collection yet known is a list of the popes, which was probably written during the life of Liberius (A. D. 352-366), but the original is lost. Another list, the original of which is also lost, came down to Felix IV. (A. D. 530). These lists were continued, and thus the Liber Pontificalis was produced. Traditions, monuments, inscriptions and other helps have been used in completing the work. As the Roman archives were arranged and regulated at the close of the seventh century, the incidents in the lives of the popes have been more faithfully recorded since that date; and yet an extent of confusion and uncertainty hangs over these matters that is really surprising. There are three continuations of the "Liber Pontificalis," one codex in the Vatican, another in the library of Este, and a third which originated at the close of the twelfth century; and the readers of these will see how utterly hopeless of all extrication from confusion is the biography and the history which they contain; and the difficulty as to facts and incidents is increased by the numerous "lives" of popes which from age to age were published by their friends or admirers.

LIBERA (lib'e-rah). When the worship of Ceres and Proserpina was introduced at Rome, Proserpina was named Libera, and the conjoined deities were honored as Ceres, Liber and Libera. The name is commonly derived from liber, "free," and is referred to the effect of wine in freeing from care; while others deduce it from libo, "to pour forth," and make Liber to be the god of productivity effected by moisture. The illustration shows Libera clothed to the feet, a wreath of ivy on the head, her hair parted and a young panther at her feet.

LIBERATUS (lib-e-rah'tus), a deacon of the church of Carthage in the sixth century. He was at Rome in 533 when Pope Joannes II. received the bishops sent by the emperor Justinian I. to consult him on the heresies broached by the monks who had imbibed Nestorian opinions. He was again at Rome in 535, having been sent the previous year, by the synod held at Carthage, to consult the pope on the reception into the Church of those Arians who recanted their heresies. When, in 552, Reparatus, bishop of Carthage, was banished by Justinian to Euchaida, Liberatus accompanied him, and probably remained with him till the bishop's death, in 563. Nothing further is known of him.

LIBERIUS (li-be're-us), bishop of Rome from 352 to 356, gave a proof of his fallibility by consenting to the condemnation of Athanasius, whom he had previously supported. He was banished by Constantius for resisting the Arians, and retracted in order to get back to his see.

LIBERTINES (li-ber'teenz), the descendants of Jewish freedmen at Rome who had been expelled, 19 A. D., by Tiberius, Acts vi. 9. They might very well have a synagogue of their own at Jerusalem, as they were numerous, and as there are said to have been not fewer than four hundred and sixty or four hundred and eighty synagogues in that city.

LIBERTINES, a sect of Christian heretics whose ringleaders were Quintin, a tailor of Picardy, and one Copin, who about 1525 divulged their errors in Holland and Brabant. They maintained that whatsoever was done by men was done by the Spirit of God, and from thence concluded there was no sin but to those that thought it so, because all came from God. They added that to live without any doubt or scruple was to return to the state of innocency, and allowed their followers to call themselves either Catholics or Lutherans, according to the company among whom they found themselves.

LIBNAH (lib'nah). 1. One of the stations of Israel in the wilderness, Num. xxxiii. 20, 21. 2. A city of Canaan which Joshua took, Josh. x. 29-32, 39; it was in the plain country of Judah, and was afterward assigned to the priests. Libnah revolted in the disastrous reign of Joram, king of Judah, 2 Ki. viii. 22; it seems, however, to have been afterward recovered. In Hezekiah's reign it was besieged by Sennacherib, 2 Ki. xix. 8. After this we hear nothing more of Libnah, save that Hamutal, a wife of Josiah, and mother of two of his sons, Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, was a native of the place, 2 Ki. xxiii. 31. Its site has not been certainly identified, but conjecture finds it variously at Arak el-Menshiyeh and Tell es-Safieh.

LIBNI (lib'ne). 1. A Levite, one of the sons of Gershon, Ex. vi. 17. 2. Another Levite of the family of Merari, 1 Chr. vi. 29.

LIBNITES (lib'nites), a Levitical family descended from Libni, Num. iii. 21.

LIBRARIES (li'bra-reez). In the early Church there were many noble libraries, of which those at Lichfield and the Gray Friars, London, were noteworthy. Adjoining the monastic library the copyists had cells from the twelfth century. An aumbry with shelves, a chamber having a door opening on the cloister, contained the ordinary books in use for readers during cloister time; and another almy near the altar held the Gospels, epistles and choir song-books. The monastic writers of books, called amanuenses, used a stylus, or pointed bodkin, and pens contained in a case to which an inkstand was attached. They formed a numerous class, as the sale of manuscripts was no less productive than the multiplication of service-books for the use of the community was indispensable. Those who added miniatures, rich borders and initials in color, and burnished gilding, were called illuminators.

LIBYA (lib'ya). The name is commonly supposed to be derived from the people by whom the country was originally inhabited—namely, the LUBIM (which see). Among the Jews who had come to worship at Jerusalem, and who heard the first proclamation of the gospel on the memorable day of Pentecost, are mentioned "dwellers in the parts of Libya about Cyrene," Acts ii. 10. Those who had come from Egypt are also mentioned; so that Libya must be understood not in the larger sense in which the term was often used by the Greeks and Romans, as comprehending the whole of the northern part of Africa, but in its stricter application to a particular province. The province of Libya, which stretched along the African coast to the west of Egypt, and lay right over against Crete, was of somewhat uncertain dimensions, especially on the southern side, where it stretched into the interior. That part of it which lay nearest to the valley of the Nile was inhabited by a variety of nomade tribes, and was in great part desert. The other and more westerly portion was much more fertile, and possessed some cities of considerable population and resources—in particular five, Berenice, Arsinoë, Ptolemæis, Apollonia, Cyrene. It is to this latter region, undoubtedly, that the Jews spoken of in the Acts belonged, as may be inferred from the mention of Cyrene along with Libya.

LIBYANS (lib'yanz), Jer. xlvi. 9; Dan. xi. 43, inhabitants of Libya. See PHUT.

LICE (lise), Ex. viii. 16-18, one of the plagues inflicted on the Egyptians. Some have supposed that the mosquito gnat is intended. See GNAT. But these gnats could hardly be said to be "in man and in beast;" besides, the "lice" were produced from the "dust," and not from watery ground. And lice still abound in Egypt, and are said to be a yet greater nuisance than mosquitos.

LIE. See LYING.

LIEUTENANTS (lef-ten'antz), Ezra viii. 36; Esth. iii. 12, the satraps or viceroys of the large provinces among the ancient Persians, possessing civil and military authority, and representing the person of the sovereign.

LIFE. This word is frequently used in its ordinary acceptation as opposed to natural death, Gen. xxv. 7; Acts xvii. 25, and elsewhere. It is, besides, employed in a moral sense to denote the course of conduct, Acts xxvi. 4. Also it signifies the active principle imparted by the Spirit of God to the soul, whereby he that was "dead in trespasses and sins" is "quickened" to a new existence, Eph. ii. 1, 5, and "is passed from death unto life," John v. 24—that spiritual life which has its workings in holy conformity to Christ's image, John xi. 26; Rom. v. 18; Col. iii. 3, and which emphatically is salvation, John vi. 47, 51, 54. Further, it denotes the life of glory in God's eternal kingdom, everlasting life and blessedness, Matt. xix. 16, 17; Rom. v. 17, 21. Life is also used to indicate the living One, the Deity, who lives by his own inherent power and is the source of life, bestowing it in its various forms upon his creatures; it is applied to the different Persons in the Godhead, John i. 4; v. 26; vi. 57; Rom. viii. 2; Col. iii. 4. Still further, the term is connected with various things as possessing life tending to it or supporting it—for example, "tree of life," Gen. ii. 9, "path of life," Ps. xvi. 11, "bread of life," John vi. 35, "word of life," Phil. ii. 16, "crown of life," James i. 12, "water of life," Rev. xxii. 1.

LIFE, THE TREE OF, that wonderful tree planted in the garden of Eden which must have been gifted with special natural qualities, and which had also a symbolical character, Gen. ii. 9.

Its fruit was intended for man's gratification and support, and it was probably endowed with so much virtue that by feeding upon it, as a means, the strength and vitality of the human body would be preserved for ever. The language used after the fall, that Adam must not be allowed to taste this excellent tree, seems to warrant this conclusion. Not merely was the blessing which the tree symbolized now forfeited, but the tree itself, it is declared, was no longer free for use, else a result would follow incongruous and unendurable in the new condition of man's fallen nature. Access to it, forfeited by sin, the wages of which was death, should again be opened if, sin being atoned for, life were restored. And this, the gospel reveals to us, the wisdom of God has devised; and the fruit of the righteousness fulfilled and perfected in the work of Jesus Christ is the restoration to all the privileges which man, while yet unfallen, had enjoyed in Paradise. Paradise then would be won back, and all that was lost in Adam would be recovered in Christ.

LIFTERS (lift'ers). In the West of Scotland a remarkable dispute occurred in certain Presbyterian churches respecting the propriety of officiating ministers lifting the bread, or the plate containing it, before its distribution in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper. Parties known as "lifters" and "anti-lifters" engaged in this question, and the controversy produced a great deal of strife and confusion. The terms "new lights" and "old lights" were used in the discussion, which came to an end, as might have been expected, seeing that no matter of faith or Scriptural command was at issue.

LIGHT (lite). It was formerly believed that the light of day was produced by the emission of luminous particles from the sun. It was therefore a difficulty to conceive how light could exist before the formation of that great luminary. Now, however, philosophers generally hold that light is the result of the pulsations of some subtle ethereal medium. There is nothing, therefore, antagonistic to modern science in the statement that God, at an early period of his creative work, commanded "Light be!" a command immediately obeyed: "And light was," Gen. i. 3. Afterward he formed light-bearers—that is, made heavenly bodies the great means of exciting the undulations of the ethereal fluid by which we see, Gen. i. 14-18.

Light is often figuratively used in Scripture. The term is applied to the Deity, James i. 17, and so to Christ, Luke ii. 32. Angels are said to be light, 2 Cor. xi. 14, and the term is also referred to men, God's servants, Matt. v. 14; and it represents posterity, knowledge, joy, perpetuity and happiness in a multitude of places, 1 Ki. xi. 36; Esth. viii. 16; Ps. iv. 6; cxix. 105; Prov. iv. 18; Isa. viii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 9; and in fine the bliss of that kingdom which is the glorious inheritance of the Lord's redeemed in eternity, Col. i. 12; Rev. xxi. 23-25.

LIGHTFOOT (lit'foot), JOHN, a learned English divine, was born at Stoke-upon-Trent in the year 1602. He was early imbued with the elements of sound learning, and after a thorough preparatory training entered Cambridge, whence he graduated with distinction. He was remarkable both at Cambridge and afterward as assistant in the well-known school of Repton, in Derbyshire, for his proficiency in Greek and Latin; but it was not till he had taken orders that he began that acquaintance with Hebrew which ripened into the most familiar and consummate knowledge of the whole range of Biblical and Rabbinical literature. When he had become rector of Ashford, in Staffordshire, that he might devote himself more uninterruptedly to his learned labors, he bought a piece of ground not far from his parsonage, and built upon it a small house, with a study below and a sleeping-room above, where he spent most of his time, visiting his family once a day. And here he remained in the quiet discharge of his professional duties during the turbulent years which led to the death of Charles I., the establishment of the Commonwealth and the temporary subversion of the Church of England. He became D.D. in 1652, and was vice-chancellor of the university in 1653. He was appointed to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Ely, where he died peaceably, after a life full of labors, in the year 1675. His principal work is entitled "Erubhim, or Miscellanies, Christian and Judicial."

SYRIAN DOG-BANE.—See LINEX.

LIGHTHOUSE (lite'house). The primitive condition of navigation among the ancients did not demand such aids as are afforded by modern lighthouses. Still, there were beacons erected, such as at the harbor of Rhodes and the great port of Alexandria. An interesting relic of the olden time may still be seen at Dover, where an octagonal building, some thirty or forty feet high, with walls ten feet thick, still remains to show the style of Roman building. There was a corresponding tower at Boulogne (Gesoriacum), and the poor fisherman, with his oyster-laden bark, was lighted across the Channel by aid of the blazing fagots at Dover until he caught sight of the beacon on the other side. Caligula is said to have erected the tower at Boulogne, which had twelve stages of floors and was one hundred and twenty-five feet high.

LIGHTNING (lite'ning), the visible flash of electricity from the clouds. Thunder is called in Hebrew the voice of God, Ex. ix. 28, marg., and lightnings and thunders symbolize the divine presence and the terrors of his wrath, Ex. xix. 16; Ps. xviii. 14; Rev. iv. 5.

Among the early Romans the belief was entertained that a person who was killed by lightning suffered death by the immediate hand of the gods. In an age when the natural sciences were not cultivated, and the phenomena of electricity were not understood, this was by no means strange. The illustration on page 1128 shows a tomb where a person thus stricken was buried.

LIGHTS. The use of lights in public worship prevailed in the Jewish and in most of the ancient religions, and is retained both in the Roman and in the Oriental Churches. The use of lights in the night-services and in subterranean churches, such as those of the early Christians in the catacombs, is of course easily intelligible; but the practice, as bearing also a symbolical allusion to the "Light of the World" and to the "Light of Faith," was not confined to occasions of necessity, but appears to have been from an early time an accompaniment of Christian worship, especially in connection with the sacraments of baptism and the eucharist. The time of the service in which lights are used has varied very much in different ages. St. Jerome speaks of it only during the reading of the gospel; Amalarius, from the beginning of the mass till the end of the gospel; Isidore of Seville, from the gospel to the end of the canon; and eventually it was extended to the entire time of the mass. In other services, also, lights have been used from an early period. Lighted tapers were placed in the hand of the newly baptized, which were interpreted as emblems of future glory. Indeed, in the Roman Catholic Church the most profuse use of lights is reserved for the services connected with that sacrament. In the English churches candlesticks, and in some instances candles themselves, are retained in many churches on the communion-table, but they are not lighted.

LIGN-ALOE (lin-al'ōz), Num. xxiv. 6. See ALOE.

FIGURE (lig'yūr), the name of a precious stone forming the first in the third row on the high-priest's breastplate, Ex. xxviii. 19. The word itself is the English form of the Greek ligurion, employed by the Septuagint as an equivalent for the Hebrew leshem. The gem denoted by the Greek word resembles amber, and is a species of jacinth deriving its name from Liguria, a region in the North of Italy, where it abounded. But whether this was actually the gem meant under the Hebrew leshem is by no means certain.

LIKHI (lik'hi), one of the descendants of Manasseh, 1 Chr. vii. 19.

LILBURNE (lil'burn), JOHN, who passed a life of storm and trial during the reign of Charles I. and the Commonwealth, was born in Durham, in 1613. His family were of good standing in the county. In his early years his bold and uncompromising spirit gained him the title of "Free-born John," because of his resistance to the High Church party. He was condemned to the pillory, and to receive five hundred lashes at the tail of a cart, but nothing depressed him. He fought at Edge Hill, and led a regiment at Marston Moor against the king. He failed to understand the actual condition of affairs because of the narrowness of his views, and he accused Cromwell and Neton of treason. Cromwell had at last to prosecute him, but he was acquitted, and he eventually settled down as a preacher among the Quakers. He died in 1657.

LILIENTHAL (lil'yen-thaul), MICHAEL, a learned divine and philologist, was born in 1686, at Lielstadt, in Prussia. He was appointed professor of theology at Königsberg, and held that office until his death, in 1750. He published "Biblical Archives" and other works.

LILIENTHAL, THEODOR CHRISTOPHER, who was born in 1711, at Königsberg, rose to great eminence as a theologian and author. He laid a solid foundation for future greatness by his education at Königsberg, Jena, Tubingen and Halle, as well as by tours through England and Holland. Having acted as adjunct professor at Königsberg, he reached the rank of doctor and full professor in 1744. He next received the chair of theology, and he was a church and school counselor. From 1750 until 1782 he published a work, in sixteen parts, which treats of and fully replies to all objections against Christianity. Like many German works, it is too voluminous, and it is now antiquated, but it served its purpose admirably when it appeared. He also wrote on "The Mass" and on the fabulous "History of St. Dorothy," and a "Criticism on Two Codices of the Hebrew Bible." He died in 1782.

LILLIE (lil'le), JOHN, D.D., was a native of Scotland, born in 1812, at Kelso. He distinguished himself at the university of Edinburgh, where he graduated and studied theology. He removed to this country and entered the theological seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, New Jersey. He settled as pastor in the Reformed church at Kingston, New York, in 1835, but in 1841 he removed to the grammar-school of the New York University. In this sphere he edited the "Jewish Chronicle," gathered a church which was established in Stanton street, and aided in the translation of the Scriptures for the Baptist Bible Union. In 1858 the Presbyterian church at Kingston, New York, tendered him a call, which he accepted, and he remained at Kingston until his death, in 1867. His pre-millennial views were brought out in his work on "The Perpetuity of the Earth," and his ripe scholarship may be seen in his translation and revision of the "Epistles to the Thessalonians," the "Second Epistle of Peter" and those of "John," "Jude" and the "Revelation," for the edition of "Lange's Commentary" which is offered to the American public.

LILY (lil'e). This flower is repeatedly mentioned in Scripture in both the Old and the New Testaments, but it is extremely difficult to decide which species of the genus Lilium is intended. Various travelers mention flowers which they have seen, and conjecture that they are the lilies of the Bible; but their descriptions are generally too vague for identification. Some of the notices we may collect point to a particular kind of lily. It was of gorgeous beauty, Matt. vi. 28, growing near the place where the sermon on the mount was delivered, luxuriant and probably rapid in its growth, Hos. xiv. 5; it was found in the valleys among thorns and on pasture-land, Song Sol. ii. 1, 2, 16; iv. 5; v. 3; still, whether it was scarlet or emitted a fragrant odor we cannot gather with certainty from Song Sol. v. 13, as critics differ in their interpretation of this verse. If the former idea be preferred, the flower may be supposed to be the Lilium Chalcedonicum, or scarlet martagon, which is said to be found plentifully in Galilee in spring-time. But this flower has little fragrance; so that, if the lily was fragrant, it was probably the Lilium candidum, or common white lily, which also grows in Palestine. Dr. Thomson describes a lily which seems exactly to correspond to the postulates of Scripture, but unfortunately he does not know the botanical species of the plant: "It is very large, and the three inner petals meet above and form a gorgeous canopy such as art never approached and king never sat under even in his utmost glory. And when I met this incomparable flower in all its loveliness among the oak-woods around the northern base of Tabor and on the hills of Nazareth, where our Lord spent his youth, I felt assured that it was to this he referred. We call it Hûleh lily, because it was here that it was first discovered. Its botanical name, if it has one, I am unacquainted with. I suppose also that it is this identical flower to which Solomon refers in the Song of Songs ii. 1, 2, 16. . . . Our flower delights most in the valleys, but is also found on the mountains. It grows among thorns, and I have sadly lacerated my hands in extricating it from them. Nothing can be in higher contrast than the luxuriant velvety softness of this lily and the crabbed, tangled hedge of thorns about it. Gazelles still delight to feed among them, and you can scarcely ride through the woods north of Tabor, where these lilies abound, without frightening them from their flowery pasture."

Lily-work is mentioned in relation to the temple and some of its utensils, 1 Ki. vii. 19, 22, 26; ornaments resembling lilies are probably meant.

LIMBO (lim'bo), or LIMBUS (lim'bus), the name assigned in Roman Catholic theology to that place or condition of departed souls in which those are detained who have not offended by any personal act of their own, but nevertheless are not admitted to the divine vision. They distinguish it into the limbus patrum and the limbus infantium. By the former name they understand the place of those just who died before the coming of the Redeemer, and of whom it is said, 1 Pet. iii. 19, that he preached to those spirits who were in prison. By the latter is meant the place or state of the souls of infants who die without baptism. Regarding the nature of both these places of detention great variety of opinion prevails in Roman Catholic schools.

LIMBORCH (lim'bork), PHILIP A., a celebrated Dutch theologian, was born at Amsterdam, June 19, 1633, and died there, April 30, 1717. He was a distinguished professor of theology among the Remonstrants, and in his "Christian Theology" is presented the clearest and ablest exposition of the theological views of that body extant. He published also "Commentary on the Acts and the Epistles to the Romans and the Hebrews."

LIME. The Hebrew word sîd is twice so rendered, Isa. xxxiii. 12; Amos ii. 1; it is also used for plaster, Deut. xxvii. 2, 4. Lime combined with carbonic acid, carbonate of lime, is the abundant material of rocks in almost every part of the world. Many of the Syrian mountains are limestone; and from this, marble, chalk, etc., lime is obtained by a process of burning or calcining. The earthy matter of bones is phosphate of lime; from them, therefore, also lime may be procured. The various uses of this substance for mortar, plaster, etc., were as well known in ancient as in modern times.

LINDGERUS (lind'ge-rus), who was born about the middle of the eighth century, became a great missionary in Friesland. After he was admitted to "orders" by Saint Boniface, he studied for upward of four years at York, in England, under the celebrated Alcuin. He had great success in his mission to Friesland, until an invasion of the Saxons obliged him to retire from his labors, whereupon he visited Rome, and subsequently settled in the monastery at Mount Cassin. On the repulse of the Saxons by Charlemagne he returned, and now he had an equally great success among the Saxons in Westphalia. He was raised to the bishopric of Münster, formerly called Mimigardford, before he died, in 809.

LINDSEY (lind'ze), THEOPHILUS, an eminent Unitarian divine, was born in 1723, at Middlewich, in Cheshire, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He entered into orders, and held the vicarage of Catterick, in Yorkshire, which from conscientious scruples he resigned and embraced the principles of Unitarianism. From 1774 till 1793 he was minister of a congregation in Essex street, in the Strand, and died in 1803. He wrote several works on the subject of his faith, among which are, his "Apology" and a "Sequel to the Apology," "Considerations on the Divine Government," an "Historical View of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship," etc.

LINDSLEY (lindz'le), PHILIP, D.D., who became very celebrated as a minister of the gospel and an influential professor in educational institutions, was born in 1786, at Morristown, New Jersey. He was educated at Princeton, spent two years preaching in Long Island, and in 1812 became Senior tutor and in 1813 professor of languages in his Alma Mater. He held the offices of librarian and inspector, and in 1817 he was made vice president. In view of the great field which was presented in the South, he consented to go to Nashville in 1824, where he labored for upward of a quarter of a century. His great reputation led colleges in the South and elsewhere to secure his services. Twice he was chosen president of Dickinson College, and the university of Pennsylvania in 1834 elected him provost. Eventually he consented to remove to New Albany, Indiana, to the chair of ecclesiastical polity, in 1850, but he returned in 1853 to Nashville, where he died in 1855. His works have been published in three volumes 8vo. He was placed in the chair of the moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, was made a member of the Royal Society of Northern Antiquaries at Copenhagen, and his great reputation carried his name through European lands as well as through his own country.

LINE. See CORD.

LINEN (lin'en). There are several words in Hebrew which have been rendered "linen" in our English Bible, and the meaning is somewhat different in each. By much the most common term is bad, the root-meaning of which is "separation," or a distinct and separate thing, and the common meaning "linen cloth," with the subordinate ideas of white and fine, supposed by the rabbins to be so called because of the isolated appearance presented by the stalks of flax on the ground, and by Gesenius because, probably, of the distinctness of the threads in the texture of the cloth. It is very frequently used with reference to the garments of the priesthood, Ex. xxviii. 42; Lev. vi. 10; xvi. 4, which, like those of the priesthood in Egypt, were undoubtedly of linen and of a white appearance.

Another term which the rabbinical Jews held to be quite synonymous with bad is shesh, which Aben-Ezra describes as signifying, equally with bad, "a species of flax, growing in Egypt alone, slender and white;" this first, then the cloth made from it. In the Authorized Version the epithet "fine" is coupled with "linen" to convey what was understood to be the full sense of the word; the shesh was held to be linen of a finer quality than usual, Gen. xli. 42; Ex. xxxix. 28, etc. Our translators seem occasionally to have hesitated whether linen or silk should be adopted as the rendering; at Gen. xli. 42 "silk" is the marginal reading, and at Prov. xxxi. 22, where there is no marginal reading, "silk" is the rendering given in the text. In the Septuagint shesh is always rendered by byss; so that this latter word, in Hebrew bâtz, which occurs only in a few passages in some of the later books, was anciently held to be the same with shesh, and the Targumists also uniformly treat them as identical.

and, apparently, must be determined in the negative. Bâtz, or byss, and shesh, as we have already seen, were two names for the same thing; but the Arabs of the present day designate fine muslin by the name shesh or shash, which goes far to establish the application of the term in ancient times also to a similar cotton fabric. Then we have the fact that the cotton plant was anciently cultivated in Egypt, and dresses made of it which were worn by all classes. Pliny expressly states that the cotton fabrics were remarkable for their brightness and softness, and were most agreeable to the priests of Egypt. We learn also from Plutarch that cotton garments were supplied by the government for the use of the temples. Yet the same writer assures us that linen was preferred. Herodotus even affirms that the priests wore nothing but linen clothing, nor were they allowed to use any other, and that the people generally dressed in linen which was always new-washed. It is impossible that both testimonies can be correct, unless it be that

DESERT SCENE IN SYRIA, WITH LIONS, ETC.—See LION.

In New Testament scripture there is only one passage which can be referred to; it is where the attendants of the glorified Redeemer are represented (symbolically) as clothed in byssine shining and clean, Rev. xix. 8, 14, which is explained to mean the righteousness of the saints. Here, however, it is the appearance of the attire—its clean, bright and shining aspect—not the material of which it was formed, that plainly was in view, and cotton or silk might, equally with linen, have been contemplated as forming the substance of the natural fabric, which to the eye of the apocalypticist carried a symbolical meaning.

A passage more directly bearing on the point occurs in Herodotus, in which, speaking of the mummies, he says that they were wrapped in bands of byssine sindon; and accurate scientific investigations establish, beyond any reasonable doubt, two points—namely, that the Egyptian mummies were wrapped in linen cloth, and that this cloth went by the name of byssine; but whether linen was the only cloth so called is another question, the statement of Herodotus refers to the inner portion of the dress of the priests, or to the garments which they were obliged to wear when entering a temple to minister. It is not improbable that on solemn occasions the priestly dress had always to be of linen, as the dead had always to be wrapped in it, while still the ordinary attire may have been chiefly of cotton, or at least of cotton and linen indifferently, according as the softness of the one or the coolness of the other might be most relished.

The conclusion which seems necessarily to follow from all this is that the terms byss and shesh were used with some freedom as regards the material of the fabrics to which they were applied, and that cotton as well as linen cloth was included, both alike being capable of the lustrous appearance and the fine texture which were usually associated with the terms.

LINGARD (ling'gard), JOHN, the Roman Catholic historian of England, was born at Winchester, in 1771. He was educated at the college of Douay, and on its removal to England, during the French Revolution, accompanied it thither. He commenced his laborious literary career in 1805 by a series of "Letters on Catholic Loyalty," contributed to a North of England newspaper. The work on which his fame rests is his "History of England, from the First Invasion by the Romans to the Accession of William and Mary, in 1688," which has passed through many editions, having deservedly attained the rank of a standard work. Based for the most part on original researches, and abounding in solid learning and acute suggestion, it is esteemed one of the best text-books on our history yet written. While looking at ecclesiastical affairs and persons from the Romanist point of view, Dr. Lingard has the merit of not overpassing the limits of fairness and moderation in his treatment of controverted matters. He was author also of the "History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," a work charged by Southey with much sophistry and misrepresentation. The dignity of cardinal was offered to Dr. Lingard, and declined. He died at Hornby, in July, 1851.

LINK (lingk), WENCESLAUS, a friend of Luther and of the Reformation in Germany, was born about 1433. He became a monk of the Augustinian order, studied theology at Wittenberg, graduated as doctor, and he held the office of prior of several convents. For some time he was exceedingly popular because of his learning, but as soon as it was discovered that he favored the views of the Reformers he incurred the hostility of his associates. Eventually he seceded, joined the Reformers, married and settled as a Protestant minister at Nuremberg, where he died in 1547.

LINN, JOHN BLAIR, D.D., was the son of the Rev. W. Linn, D.D., a celebrated minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church who held the office of chaplain in the Revolutionary army, and was pastor at Elizabethtown and New York. He was born at Shippensburg, Pennsylvania, in 1777, and educated at Columbia College. He began the study of law, but abandoned it and entered the ministry. In 1799 he was settled as pastor in the First Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, but he died quite suddenly, in 1804. He displayed a fine emotional and poetic temperament. He left two tracts against the views of Dr. Priestly and poems behind him.

LINTEL (lin'tel), the headpiece of a door-frame or window-frame. See Posr.

LINTZ (lintz), THE PEACE OF, was of importance in the history of religion in Hungary. The emperor Ferdinand III. was obliged to conclude a peace with Rakoczy, the prince of Transylvania, in 1645, in which the legal existence of the Evangelical Church in Hungary was admitted. The people were permitted to attend the churches of their choice, ministers were to be free from molestation, the property in churches which had been sequestered was to be restored, and violators of the treaty were to be punished. The Romish party, however, refused compliance in the case of the church edifices, as only ninety out of four hundred that had been seized were returned, and this in spite of a royal edict which proclaimed the binding nature of the treaty.

LINUS (li'nus), one of the Christians at Rome whose salutations Paul sent to Timothy, 2 Tim. iv. 21. He is said to have been the first bishop of Rome after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul.

LION, the most powerful, daring and impressive of all carnivorous animals, the most magnificent in aspect and awful in voice. Being very common in Syria in early times, the lion naturally supplied many forcible images to the poetical language of Scripture, and not a few historical incidents in its narratives.

The lion is the largest and most formidably armed of all carnassier animals, the Indian tiger alone claiming to be his equal. One full grown, of Asiatic race, weighs above four hundred and fifty pounds, and those of Africa often above five hundred pounds. The fall of a fore paw in striking has been estimated to be equal to twenty-five pounds' weight, and the grasp of the claws, cutting four inches in depth, is sufficiently powerful to break the vertebræ of an ox. The huge laniary teeth and jagged molars worked by powerful jaws, and the tongue entirely covered with horny papillæ, hard as a rasp, are all subservient to an immensely strong muscular structure, capable of prodigious exertion, and minister to the self-confidence which these means of attack inspire. In Asia the lion rarely measures more than nine feet and a half from the nose to the end of the tail. In Africa they are considerably larger, and supplied with a much greater quantity of mane.

The Scriptures present many striking pictures of lions, touched with wonderful force and fidelity; even where the animal is a direct instrument of the Almighty, while true to his mission, he still remains so to his nature. Thus nothing can be more graphic than the record of the man of God 1 Ki. xiii. 28, disobedient to his charge, struck down from his ass, and lying dead, while the lion stands by him without touching the lifeless body or attacking the living animal. See also Gen. xlix. 9; Job iv. 10, 11; Nah. ii. 11, 12, and Samson's adventure with the young lion, Jud. xiv. 6.

The lion, as an emblem of power, was symbolical of the tribe of Judah, Gen. xlix. 9. The type recurs in the prophetic visions, and the figure of this animal was among the few which the Hebrews admitted in sculpture, or in cast metal, as exemplified in the throne of Solomon. The heathen assumed the lion as an emblem of the sun, of the god of war, of Aries, Ariel, Arioth, Re, the Indian Seeva, of dominion in general, of valor, etc., and it occurs in the names and standards of many nations. Lions in remote antiquity appear to have been trained for the chase, and are even now occasionally domesticated with safety.

LIONS, FOUNTAIN OF. In the celebrated Moorish palace of the Alhambra a fountain, which is illustrated on pages 1138 and 1139, will serve to show the peculiarities of the style which the Moors introduced into Spain. The palace, which was of enormous extent and excessive splendor, was built in the beginning of the thirteenth century.

LIP (lip). This word is often used in a figurative sense, but the phrases in which it occurs are easily intelligible. Thus it is put for the organ of speech. To open the lips of any one, Ps. li. 15, is to cause him to speak. To be of uncircumcised lips, Ex. vi. 12, is to be not ready of speech. Sometimes it expresses the manner of speech—thus, "one lip," Gen. xi. 1, marg., signifies one language or dialect. Then, as the manner of speech indicates the disposition of an individual, "lying lips," Prov. x. 18, intend falsehood; "the lip of truth," Prov. xii. 19, veracity; "burning lips," Prov. xxvi. 23, ardent professions. So, again, "the word of thy lips," Ps. xvii. 4, is God's precept. "The talk of the lips," Prov. xiv. 23, mere empty discourse; "a fool of lips," Prov. x. 8, marg., a talkative fool. Again, "the calves of the lips," Hos. xiv. 2, are the sacrifices—calves being offered in sacrifice—of praise. Lip also signifies a boundary, as of the sea, Gen. xxii. 17, marg.—that is, the shore, or of a country, Jud. vii. 22, marg.—

that is, its frontier, or perhaps rather the bank of the river, the Jordan, at the place mentioned. To cover the upper lip, Lev. xiii. 45, Ezek. xxiv. 17, was a sign of mourning.

LIPPOMANI (lip-po-mah'ne), ALOYSIUS, a learned Roman Catholic divine, was born at Venice in 1500. He was one of the divines who attended the Council of Trent, where he acquired considerable reputation by the part he took in the discussions of that assembly. Upon the interruption of the council, he was sent as papal nuncio into Germany in 1548, and two years afterward he was recalled by Julius III., who fixed upon him for one of the three presidents of the Council of Trent. In 1556 Paul IV. sent him as nuncio into Poland, and made him his secretary. He was successively promoted to the bishoprics of Modon, Verona and Bergamo. He died in 1559, with the reputation of being well skilled in ecclesiastical history, divinity, and particularly in an acquaintance with the Scriptures and the Fathers. He published "Catenas of the Greek and Latin Fathers, upon Genesis, Exodus and the First Ten Psalms."

LIPSIUS (lip'se-us), JUSTUS, an eminent Belgian critic and scholar, was born at Overysche, a village of Brabant, in 1547. He studied at Aeth, Cologne and Louvain, then went to Rome, and became secretary to Cardinal Granvella. On his return to the Netherlands, after a short time spent at Louvain, he visited Vienna, and then accepted a professorship in the university of Jena. He held it but a short time, was afterward professor of history at Leyden, and finally at Louvain, where he died in 1606. Lipsius changed his religion several times; and whether as a Catholic, a Lutheran or a Calvinist, he was for the time equally zealous and equally bigoted. He wrote many learned treatises.

LISMANINI (lis-ma-ne'ne), FRANCIS, who was born in Corfu in the beginning of the sixteenth century, became a Franciscan. He went to Poland, where he became confessor to the queen of Sigismund I., and superior of the Franciscans in Poland. He gradually fell into doubt about the power of the Romish bishop, but the favor of the queen sustained him, and he was sent to Rome to congratulate Julius III. on his accession to the papal chair. Returning to Poland, he became intimate with Socinus, who changed his views on the trinity, whereupon the king sent him on a mission, avowedly to collect works for his library, but really to discover all he could respecting the views of the Reformers in other countries. He traveled through Italy and Switzerland; and having married, he lost the favor of the king, which the Swiss Reformers sought in vain to regain for him. In 1556 he was permitted to return to Poland; but owing to his Socinian views, he was banished. At length he settled at Königsberg as counselor to the duke; and his affairs becoming involved, he drowned himself in the year 1563. His chief work was on the trinity.

LITANY (lit'a-ne), a word the specific meaning of which has varied considerably at different times, but which means in general a solemn act of supplication addressed with the object of averting the divine anger, and especially on occasions of public calamity. Through all the varieties of form which litanies have assumed, one characteristic has always been maintained—namely, that the prayer alternates between the priest or other minister, who announces the object of each petition, and the congregation, who reply in a common supplicatory form, the most usual of which was many other offices. Although called by the name of litany of the saints, the opening and closing petitions, and indeed the greater part of the litany, consist of prayers addressed directly to God; and the prayers to the saints are not for their help, but for their intercession on behalf of the worshipers. The litany of Jesus consists of a number of addresses to our Lord under his various relations to men, in connection with the several details of his

the well-known "Kyrie eleison" (Lord, have mercy!). From the fourth century downward, the use of litanies was general. The Antiphony of St. Gregory the Great contains several. In the Roman Catholic Church three litanies are especially in use—the "litany of the saints," which is most ancient, the "litany of the name of Jesus" and the "litany of Our Lady of Loretto." Of these, the first alone has a place in the public service-books of the Church, on the rogation-days, in the ordination service, the service for the consecration of churches, the consecration of cemeteries and passion and of adjurations of him through the memory of what he has done and suffered for the salvation of mankind. The litany of Loretto resembles both the above-named litanies in its opening addresses to the Holy Trinity and in its closing petitions to the "Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world;" but the main body of the petitions are addressed to the Virgin Mary under various titles, some taken from the Scriptures, some from the language of the Fathers, some from the mystic writers of the mediæval Church. Neither this litany nor that of Jesus has ever formed part of any of the ritual or liturgical offices of the Roman Catholic Church, but there can be no doubt that both have in various ways received the sanction of the highest authorities of the Roman Church.

In the Prayer-book of the English Church the liturgy is retained; but although it partakes of ancient forms, it differs from that of the Roman Church, and contains no invocation of the Virgin or the saints. It is divided into four parts—invocations, deprecations, intercessions and supplications, in which are preserved the old form of alternate prayer and response. It is no longer a distinct service, but when used forms part of the morning prayer.

LITERÆ ENCYCLICÆ (lit'er-ay en-ci-kle-kay). The pope has been accustomed to send letters to the clergy when matters of importance require his views or his advice on the state of religion. The clergy are expected to disseminate the views expressed in these letters, which are called encyclicals because they were sent forth generally over the Church; and they are distinguished from "briefs" and "bulls," inasmuch as they do not apply to cases which are merely individual or local. See ENCYCLICA.

LITERÆ FORMATÆ (lit'e-ray for-ma'tay). According to the rules and practice of the ancient Church, no Christian could travel without taking letters of credence with him from his own bishop, if he meant to communicate with the Church in a foreign country. These letters were of three kinds, commendatory, communicatory and dismissory. The first were granted only to persons of quality, to persons whose reputations had been questioned, or to the clergy about to travel in foreign countries. The second kind were granted to all who were in peace and communion of the Church. The third kind were given only to the clergy when they were removing from one church to settle in another, and they were to testify that the bearer had the bishop's leave to depart. All these were under the general name of "formed letters," because they were written in a particular form, with particular marks and characters whereby they might be distinguished from counterfeits.

LITTER (lit'ter), a conveyance resembling a cradle, covered handsomely with cloth, so as to protect a person carried in it from sun and rain, Isa. lxvi. 20. Such litters are borne sometimes by men, sometimes on camels, one on each side the animal, and have openings for the admission of light. The same word is found, joined with another, in Num. vii. 3, "litter-wagons"—that is, covered and commodious, like litters. These litters are common in the East at the present day.

LITTLE CHRISTIANS is the name of a sect which has sprung up in Russia. In 1868 sixteen persons seceded from the Russian Church, declaring that Christ had commanded them to do so. According to Dixon, "they have no priest and hardly any form of prayer. They keep no images, use no wafers and make no sacred oil. They bake a cake which they afterward worship as a special gift from God; and it is supposed to possess a potent virtue and mystic charm." The government has dealt hardly with them, and accordingly they have increased in numbers. See RUSSIAN CHURCH.

LITURGY (lit'ur-je), in general, signifies a form of prayer and ceremonial established by ecclesiastical authority, to be used in the public services of the Church, but is especially applied to that used in the celebration and administration of the eucharist. The very earliest historical records plainly show that such forms were in use in primitive times, but it seems highly probable that for a considerable period they were not reduced to writing.

1. JEWISH LITURGIES. The Mosaic records contain an ordinance respecting the "confession of sins," Lev. v. 5, without, however, prescribing a distinct form for the purpose. Three formulas only are fixed—the benediction of the priests, Num. vi. 24–26, the prayer of thanksgiving on the occasion of the first offering, Deut. xxvi. 5–10, and that which was to accompany the offering up of the third year's tithe, beginning: "I have brought away the hallowed things out of my house." Although often mentioned before the exile, yet they do not seem, except in the cases mentioned, to have been introduced as yet as a regular element into the service of the temple. Private devotions were common, but every one prayed when his heart prompted him in the words inspired by his joy or sorrow. Not before the time of Daniel is a fixed institution of three daily prayers mentioned, Dan. vi. 11. The task of compiling a liturgy proper, and of fixing the times and seasons of prayer, was probably first undertaken by the men of the great synagogue. Two chief groups around which, as time wore on, an enormous mass of liturgical poetry has clustered, are distinctly discernible—the one, the Shemah, "Hear, Israel, etc.," being a collection of the three Biblical pieces, Deut. vi. 4–9; xi. 13–21; Num. xv. 37–41, expressive of the unity of God and the memory of his government over Israel, strung together without any extraneous addition; the second, the Tefillah, or prayer by way of eminence, consisting of a certain number of supplications with a hymnal introduction and conclusion and followed by the priestly blessing. The single portions of this prayer gradually increased to eighteen. The first additions to the Shemah formed the introductory thanksgiving for the renewed day, in accordance with the ordinance that every supplication must be preceded by a prayer of thanks and the supplication for spiritual enlightenment in the divine law. Between the Shemah and Tefillah was inserted the Geulah, or praise for the miraculous deliverance from Egypt and the constant watchings of Providence. A Kaddish of sanctification and certain psalms seem to have concluded the service of that period. This was the order of the morning prayer, while in the afternoon prayer the Shemah was omitted. The first compilation of a liturgy is recorded of Amran Gaon, 870–880 A. D.; the first that has survived is that of Saadja Gaon, 942 A. D. These early collections of prayers generally contained also compositions from the hand of the compiler and minor additions, such as ethical tracts, almanacs etc., embracing the whole calendar year. Besides these, we find the penitential prayers, hosannas and special supplications, chiefly for private devotion.

2. ORIENTAL LITURGIES. These were six in number, four of which are derived from the great churches in which they were used, the fifth from the Armenian Church, and the sixth from the sect of Nestorius, by which the liturgy was modified to suit its own peculiar tenets. These liturgies are severally known as the liturgies of Jerusalem, of Antioch, of Alexandria and of Constantinople, the Armenian liturgy and the Nestorian liturgy. The diversities of these liturgies, although very great in appearance, yet can hardly be said to be substantial. Certain leading parts are common to them all, and are found in all without substantial variation; but they are arranged in a different order, and, except in the form of the eucharistic consecration, the hymn Trisagion and a few other details, the form of words is often entirely dissimilar. The liturgy of Jerusalem, although ascribed to Saint James, is of uncertain origin and date, nor is it well ascertained whether its original language was Syriac or Greek. The latter is the language in which it is now found, and the present liturgy closely corresponds in the main with that which formed the text of Saint Cyril of Jerusalem in his well-known "Mystagogical Lectures." The liturgy of Antioch exists in Syriac, but it is evidently only a free translation of the liturgy of Jerusalem. The ancient liturgy of Alexandria is ascribed to Saint Mark; but the existing liturgy has received numberless additions at later dates, and has been modified by both the great sects of this patriarchate to suit their peculiar doctrines. Several other liturgies are in use among the Copts, under the name of Saint Basil, Saint Gregory and Saint Cyril; and the Abyssinian Christians have no fewer than ten, which are distinct at least in name. The church of Constantinople has two different liturgies, both of great antiquity, that of Saint Basil and that of Saint Chrysostom. These, however, are not indiscriminately used, each being employed on special occasions or on certain defined festivals. The liturgy of Constantinople is the original of the Slavonic liturgy, which is used in the Russian and Russo-Greek Church and in its various branches. The Armenian liturgy dates from the introduction of Christianity into Armenia under Gregory the Illuminator. It is in most respects derived from that of Saint Chrysostom. The Nestorians have three liturgies—the liturgy of the apostles, the liturgy of Theodore of Mop-suestia and the liturgy of Nestorius. These, however, are all combined into one, each being assigned to a particular season or used on special occasions. The language of all is Syriac.

3. WESTERN LITURGIES. The liturgies of the West present much less variety, and indeed are all derived either from the Eastern liturgies or from a common source. The Catholic liturgies may be reduced to four—the Roman, the Milanese or Ambrosian, the Gothic or Mozarabic and the Gallic liturgies. The oldest forms of the Roman liturgy are to be found in three so-called sacrato the Roman. Neither of these, however, is to be confounded with the more modern missals in use in several of the French dioceses, which do not differ from the Roman except in minor details, and most of which have now been displaced by the Roman missal. Of Protestant communities, the Church of England and Protestant Episcopal Church alone profess to follow the ancient liturgical forms.

LION OF ARABIA AND PERSIA.—See LION.

mentaries—that of Leo, that of Gelasius and that of Gregory the Great. It is the last that has left its impress most clearly on the modern Roman missal, which was brought to its present shape by a commission ordered by the Council of Trent, after a careful revision and collation of all the liturgical forms in use in the West in the sixteenth century. The first revision took place under Pius V., and two subsequent revisions were made by Urban VIII. and Clement VIII. The Ambrosian liturgy is used only in the diocese of Milan, and is popularly traced to Saint Ambrose. It bears a close analogy to the Roman liturgy, but it has many peculiarities, some of which are highly interesting as illustrating the history of the details of Christian worship. Its ceremonial, which is observed with great solemnity in the cathedral of Milan, is in some parts highly striking and characteristic. The Gothic is of still more limited use, being now confined to a single chapel at Toledo, founded and endowed for the purpose by the celebrated cardinal Ximenes. It is the old liturgy of the Gothic Church of Spain; and after the infusion of the Arabic element, which followed the Moorish invasion, it was called by the name of Mozarabic, a word of disputed etymology. The liturgy is certainly of Oriental origin, but its history and the time and circumstances of its introduction into Spain have furnished matter for much speculation. Some parts of the rite are exceedingly curious, especially those which accompany the breaking of the host. The Gallican liturgy has no precise modern representative, and is only known from ancient forms, more or less complete, which have been edited by Mabillon and recently by Mone. The older Gallican forms bespeak an Oriental origin, and are probably derived from the Greek Christian colony which settled at Marseilles, Lyons and the other churches of the South. The later forms approximate more LIVER (liv'er). The word often occurs in the natural sense as indicative of a vital organ in the animal system, and especially with reference to the parts of animals slain in sacrifice, Lev. iii. 4, 10; iv. 9, etc. But in this respect it calls for no particular remark. The use to which the liver was applied for purposes of divination by the ancient heathens was not unknown to the Jews, though it is only once referred to in the Hebrew Scriptures, and with reference to the proceedings of a heathen prince, Ezek. xxi. 21. There is no evidence of that form of superstitious augury having ever obtained a footing among the covenant people. The chief peculiarity among them as regards the place of the liver in the animal system, and occasionally also its symbolic use, is that they seem to identify it more with the source and centre of life than we are wont to do (as indeed the ancients generally did), and sometimes put "liver" where we would substitute "heart." Thus Jeremiah speaks of his liver being poured upon the earth, Jer. ii. 11, meaning that vital part in him which carried along with it all power of sentiment, courage or strength. So again, Prov. vii. 23, where the misguided and foolish youth is represented as proceeding in his course till a dart strike through his liver—that is, till his very heart-strings are broken or life itself gone. These, however, are the only passages where language of this sort occurs.

LIVINGSTON, GILBERT ROBERT, D.D., who was descended from the celebrated John Livingston whose name has been connected with the great revivals in Ireland and Scotland in the seventeenth century, was born in 1786, at Stamford, Connecticut. He was educated at Union College, and he studied theology under his father, John Henry Livingston, and Dr. Perkins, of Hartford, Connecticut. He settled in the Reformed (Dutch) Church of Coxsatchie, New York, in the year 1811, and in 1826 he was removed to the Crown Street Church in Philadelphia. He was a man of fine, commanding presence, an intellectual preacher and a most successful minister. He died in the year 1834.

LIVINGSTON, HENRY GILBERT, who was the son of the Rev. G. R. Livingston, D.D., was born in 1821, at Coxsatchie, New York, and educated at Williams College. He presided for two years over Clinton Academy, and in 1844 he finished his theological studies in Union Theological Seminary, New York, and after being licensed by the presbytery of Long Island, he settled as pastor in the Presbyterian Church of Carmel, New York. In 1849 he removed to the Third Reformed (Dutch) Church in Philadelphia, from which he retired because of declining health in 1854. He entered on the duties of principal of the Raymond Institute, at Carmel, but his death took place on January 25, 1855. He was a man of noble form, splendid intellect, genial temperament, great purity and integrity, and his holy, simple, consistent life endeared him to all who knew him.

LIVINGSTON, JOHN, who was one of the most eminent Scottish ministers of the seventeenth century, was born in 1603, and educated at the university of Glasgow. He graduated in 1621, entered the ministry, and forthwith he became a celebrated preacher. The policy of the court at the time was to suppress the Presbyterian tendency of Scotland, and consequently Livingston was soon engaged in difficulties. He was settled at Killinchy, in the county of Down, Ireland, where he had great success, and many were awakened under his ministry, and where his memory is still freshly preserved among the inhabitants. On his removal to Scotland he acted as chaplain to the countess of Wigton, and on June 21, 1630, he preached his memorable sermon at the "Kirk of Shotts," which led to one of the most remarkable revivals since the Reformation. He settled as parish minister at Ancrum, but his opposition to the policy of the government led to his banishment, and he had to remove to Holland, where he became minister of the Scotch church at Rotterdam. He has occupied one of the most prominent places assigned to the great theologians and daring Reformers of his native land. He died in 1672.

LIVINGSTON, JOHN HENRY, D.D., S.T.P., who was born at Poughkeepsie, New York, in 1746, was descended from John Livingston, the preacher at the "Kirk of Shotts" and the pastor at Rotterdam. After his education at Yale College he studied law; but becoming serious, he went to Europe to study theology. He remained four years at Utrecht, and was licensed by the classis of Amsterdam. Having passed his examination for the degree of doctor in theology, he accepted a call to settle in New York, and in 1770 he entered on his great and most successful work in that city. A great strife had existed among the Dutch in New York about ecclesiastical matters, and the young pastor, by his prudence and great weight of character, brought it to a lasting termination. He had to leave the city during the Revolutionary war, but he returned in 1783, and in 1784 he began to lecture on theology. In 1810 he removed to New Brunswick to the seminary opened at that place, and nearly two hundred students were trained by him for the ministry. His lectures have continued to be used as a text-book. He prepared a psalm and hymn book, aided in drawing up the "constitution," and so great was his influence that he has justly been designated "the father of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in this country." His influence in his denomination exceeded that of any other man, and his power was felt in all departments of Church work, as his splendid sermon in 1804 before the New York Missionary Society showed, for its effects spread over the country and largely tended to promote the organization of the Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions. Like all of his family, he our version of the Bible, Lev. xi. 30. It is probable that the Lacerta stellio, so termed from the bundles of star-like spines upon the body, is the animal meant, or possibly the fan-foot lizard, from the toes of which a poisonous matter exudes, raising pustules on the skin which it touches. There are others of the lizard kind designated in Scripture, such as those called in our translation the "tortoise," the "ferret," the "chameleon," the "snail," the "mole," Lev. xi. 29, 30, and the "spider," Prov. xxx. 28. For some notice of these reference must be made to the articles under their respective names. Lizards of various species abound in different parts of Syria and Palestine. They are specially plentiful among ruined buildings.

LLORENTE (lor-en'teh), JUAN ANTONIO, a Spanish historian and ecclesiastic, born in 1756. He wrote a "Critical History" of the Inquisition, historians attach but little importance to his "Critical History." He was driven out of Spain in 1814, and in 1822 he was obliged to leave France. He ventured to return to Spain, where he died in 1823.

LLOYD (loid), THOMAS, who reached the dignity of president of the council and deputy-governor of Pennsylvania, was a native of Wales. He had entered Oxford, and during a vacation he visited his brother Charles, who had been imprisoned for the part he took in advancing the cause of the Friends or Quakers, as they were called. He became a convert to his brother's views, and set out as a preacher; but his losses and trials obliged him to emigrate, and he found a home in the new colony of Pennsylvania, where he proved himself to be a wise and energetic man. He was born in 1649, and he died in 1694.

LLOYD, WILLIAM, a learned English prelate, was born in 1627, at Tilehurst, in Berkshire, was educated at Oxford, and after being honored with several Church preferments, in 1680 he was raised to the bishopric of St. Asaph, when he joined Archbishop Sancroft and other prelates in presenting a petition to James II. deprecating his assumed power of suspending the laws against popery. This led to the imprisonment and trial of the "seven bishops," who were, however, at once acquitted. On the revolution taking place, Lloyd was made almoner to King William, was promoted to the see of Lichfield in 1692, and died bishop of Worcester, in 1717. His writings, which relate to divinity and history, display much learning and acuteness. Among them are—"A Dissertation upon Daniel's Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks," "An Account of the Life of Pythagoras," "The History of the Government of the Church."

LLOYD'S PULPIT is the name given to a remarkable collection of massive stones, near Festiniog, in Merionethshire, in Wales. It is really a natural arrangement of stones, but it bears such a resemblance to the vast masses which have been moved about in the so-called Druidical age, that it has sometimes been considered to belong to that period. It takes its name from its resemblance to a pulpit, and from the tradition that it had been used as a preaching place by a Hugh Lloyd, of whom, however, nothing is known.

LOAMMI (lo-am'mi), applied symbolically as a name to the (ideal) son of the prophet Hosea, in whom was meant to be embodied the sad truth that Israel was to be meanwhile cast off, Hos. i. 9.

LOAN. Brotherly kindness, in lending to the needy, was enjoined both in the Old and New Testaments and by our Lord, Lev. xxv. 35; Matt. vi. 42. These loans were not to be usurious. Of a foreigner interest might be exacted, but not of a Hebrew, Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36, 37. This regulation, however, like so many of the other was tall and noble in his appearance. He was effective as a preacher, clear and practical as a professor, having that electrical power which moulds and quickens the student; and few men of greater power have ever served in the ministry of the American Church. He died in the year 1825.

LIVINGUS (li-vin'gus) held the see of Canterbury during part of the reign of Canute, by whom he was greatly beloved. The king extended many favors to the see because of his regard for the archbishop, and among his testimonials was his golden crown, which, instead of being broken up and used as money or offered for sale, was preserved as a signal mark of royal esteem, and the precious gift was safely kept in the cathedral until the Reformation.

LIZARD (liz'ard). Under this term are included all the cold-blooded animals that have the conformation of serpents, with the addition of four feet, some of the species being of vast size and formidable strength. "Lizard" occurs but once in for the production of which he had abundant preparation, for he had served as commissary of the Inquisition in 1785, and he was made the secretary in 1789, and thus he had full evidence in his hands for all that he recorded. He had been ordained as a priest, was made advocate of the Council of Castile and vicar-general of the bishopric of Calahorra. When French ideas began to prevail in the Peninsula, he adopted the side of progress, and in 1809, when the Inquisition was abolished, he was appointed to examine the records and prepare a history. It was known that he had already spent several years in arduous research and arranging materials for such a work. He was a Romanist when he wrote the history, and he seems to have aimed at showing that the Inquisition was only a political machine, and that the Church was not to be credited with its enormities. The storm of denunciation that burst on him when his work appeared drove him farther in his "Political Portraits of the Popes" and the other volumes which he published. He collected materials hitherto inaccessible; but calm, solid and judicious statutes, was often disobeyed, Neh. v. 1-13. Security might be taken for the due discharge of the loan, but only under certain restrictions. An outer garment, which was the covering by night, must be returned before sunset; a widow's garment was not to be taken at all; nor a millstone, since without that the family could not provide their daily bread. Moreover, the lender must not enter the debtor's house, but wait outside for the pledge, Ex. xxii. 26, 27. Persons in poverty might serve as bondmen, but they would be released at the seventh year or at the jubilee, Lev. xxv. 39, 41; and in the sabbatical year there was a general remission of debts, Deut. xv. 1-3, 7-10. This provision did not apply to a foreigner. In later times we read of sons being seized for their fathers' debts, 2 Ki. iv. 1; but it does not appear that this was allowed by the law.

LOAVES. What bears this name in our English Bible would often be better expressed by "cakes," in shape somewhat flat and round, though sometimes also angular, if one may judge from the specimens from Egypt which have survived. See BREAD.

LOBO (lo'bo), JERONIMO, a Portuguese Jesuit, born in 1593, at Lisbon, who was sent to India as a missionary. He settled at Goa in 1622, and in the following year he volunteered to go to Abyssinia because of a remarkable opening at the court. He landed on the coast of Africa, tried to penetrate to the interior; but being repulsed, he returned to India. In 1625 he made another attempt, landing on the coast of the Red Sea, and he succeeded in reaching Fremona, where the mission had been established. Political dissensions exposed him to great danger, and eventually all the Portuguese, the clergy and the Jesuits had to leave Abyssinia, in 1634. Shipwrecked on the coast of Natal, he at length reached Portugal; and failing to secure the interposition of the court of Lisbon on his behalf against the Abyssinian rulers, he again sailed for Goa in 1640. He became provincial of the Jesuits there, returned to Portugal in 1656, and published a work on his Abyssinian journeys, with notices of the religion and socialistic state of the country, in which he took an abiding interest. His work was translated into English in 1735, by Dr. Johnson. Lobo died in 1678, at Lisbon.

LOBWASSER (lob-was'ser), AMBROSIUS, was born in 1515, in Saxony. Having studied law, he reached the position of chancellor of Misnia, and in 1563 he removed to Königsberg to a professor's chair. As the versions of the Psalms by Marot and Beza in France, by Rouse in England, produced remarkable results in these countries, so the German version which Lobwasser prepared, though destitute of poetical merit, was at once spread abroad, and it continued in use until the middle of the eighteenth century. The metrical form of the poetry was such as to suit the airs which Claude Gondimel had arranged for the French collection, and thus the book, though based on the French version, yet being really German, was admirably calculated to impress the German mind. He died in 1585.

LOCAL PREACHERS. This is the title of those preachers in the Methodist Church who, though laymen, are licensed and subject to appointments from time to time in the districts in which they reside. They are thus distinguished from the "itinerant" preachers, who are members of Annual Conferences. Sometimes, where an urgent need is felt, a "local" preacher is assigned to a charge for some time. He who desires the office of "local" preacher must submit to examination on doctrine and discipline by a Quarterly Conference, and be recommended by a leaders' meeting. When received, he is licensed for a year, and this license requires to be renewed yearly. Local preachers may be ordained, and so become "itinerants," after examination before the Quarterly Conference, and a certificate of character and attainments is given which enables them to appear before the Annual Conference, where they must again submit to a full examination before they are finally ordained.

LOCI COMMUNES THEOLOGICI (lo'se com-mu'nayz the-o-loj'i-se) is a term commonly used at the time of the Reformation to designate the formal expositions of doctrinal matters in which truths were set forth as distinct from opposing errors. The word "loci," which in Latin signifies "places," was used to convey the idea that such and such truths had their "place" and their "connection" in the system of theology which was revealed in Scripture. Of course, all these "common places" had to be based on the Scriptures, and the idea may be comprehended by the fact that Melancthon in his "Loci Communes" derived the system which he sought to establish mainly from the Epistle to the Romans. The term was used by the Lutherans and the Reformed, but it became less frequent as the use of Latin in theological treatises declined.

LOCK. See GATE, HOUSE, KEY.

LOCKE (lok), JOHN, one of the most eminent philosophers of modern times, was born at Wrington, in Somersetshire, in 1632. He was educated at Westminster School, from which he was elected to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1651. Classical literature, metaphysics and philosophy were diligently studied by him, and he took his medical degree, though he did not practice. Among his friends he numbered many eminent men, including Lord Shaftesbury, with whom he resided for some years, even accompanying him to Holland in his flight from persecution for high treason. He resided the last few years of his life with his friends the Mashams, at Oates, in Essex, and there he died, October 28, 1704. As philosopher, Locke stands at the head of what is called the Sensational School, in England. His great work is the "Essay on the Human Understanding," in which he endeavors to show that all our ideas are derived from experience—that is, through the senses, and reflection on what they reveal to us. He also investigates the general character of ideas, the association of ideas, the reality, limits and uses of knowledge, the influence of language and the abuses to which it is liable. This essay was first published in 1690, and became immediately popular. It passed through numerous editions in rapid succession, and was translated into French and Latin. It has been extensively used as a text-book in colleges on both sides of the Atlantic, in connection with the works of Berkeley, Hume, Reid, Stuart and Hamilton. Whatever may be thought of Locke's theories, his Essay has a solid and permanent worth, and will not cease to attract and charm inquirers and lovers of truth. His other works are the "Treatise on Civil Government," "Letters on Toleration," "On the Conduct of the Understanding," "Vindication of the Reasonableness of Christianity."

president of Harvard, where he was educated, was born in 1732, at Woburn, Massachusetts. For ten years, from 1759 to 1769, he preached at Sherburne, Massachusetts, when he was elected to Harvard. In 1773 he was made doctor of divinity, and shortly after, because of some trouble, he resigned and went into comparative seclusion until his death, in 1788, at Sherburne, Massachusetts. In a letter to Mr. Hollis of London, who was a great benefactor of Harvard, Dr. Eliot of Boston describes Dr. Locke as a man "of fine talents, a close thinker, having, when at college, the character of a first-rate scholar, of an excellent spirit and generous catholic sentiments." He left no publication behind him except his "Convention Sermon," which he preached in 1772.

LOCKE, WILLIAM E., was a native of New York city. In 1833 he became a Baptist preacher, after which he entered the Hamilton Institute, now Madison University, and in 1836 he was ordained. Having changed his views on the subject of baptism, he passed in 1849 over to the Presbyterian Church, and in 1850 he settled at Springfield, New Jersey. His health failed, and he removed to Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and thence to Missouri to preside over the Van Rensselaer Academy; but he died in 1858, shortly after entering on the office.

or referred to in Scripture. A variety of Hebrew words are used to designate either different species or different forms, as the larva, or the winged state of this creature. These are arbeh, from a root implying to be numerous, the word in most frequent use, and well it describes the swarming host; gazam, signifying "the devourer," rendered in our version "palmer-worm," Joel i. 4; ii. 25; gob, perhaps "creeper," rendered "grasshoppers" or "green worms," Amos vii. 1, marg.; hhagab, implying "to hide or veil," for the clouds of them hide the sun, Joel ii. 2, 10. In our version, once "locust," 2 Chr. vii. 13, elsewhere "grasshoppers," Lev. xi. 22; hhargól, a "leaper," rendered "beetle," Lev. xi. 22; hhásil, "devourer," in our translation, "caterpillar," 1 Ki. viii. 37; yelek, "the feeder," translated "caterpillar," Jer. li. 14, 27, and "canker-worm," Nah. iii. 15, 16; sal'am, "the consumer," "bald locust," Lev. xi. 22; and tzelatzal, which implies "whizzing," Deut. xxviii. 42.

We may well conclude that, as above noted, these different terms indicated different species or different states of the locust; and such passages as Joel i. 4 are best interpreted on such a supposition. We are told that there are some locusts which in their larva state are quite as destructive as when they have expanded their wings. But naturalists have hitherto found it impossible to interpret with full precision the various Hebrew terms. We have to be content, therefore, with knowing that some of them must designate the Ædipoda migratoria and the Aceridium peregrinum, two species at this day very common in Syria and Arabia, and most formidable for the devastations they commit.

Locusts (four species are enumerated) were and are still used for food, Lev. xi. 22, the so-called "beetle" being unquestionably a species of locust. So John the Baptist is said to have fed on locusts, Matt. iii. 4. They are at the present day boiled, sometimes in salt water and sometimes in butter, by the Bedouin Arabs, and are said to resemble shrimps in flavor. Three names are used to describe the locusts that devastated Egypt, arbeh, hhásil, yelek.

The terms applied in Scripture to the insect itself, to its sound, its appearance, its destructive effects, are admirably illustrative of the habits and effects of locusts as observed in the present day.

LOD, the LYDDA of the New Testament (which see).

LODEBAR (lo-de'bar), a town in Gilead, apparently not far from Mahanaim, the residence of Ammiel, whose son befriended David in the time of his distress, 2 Sam. xvii. 27; comp. ix. 4, 5. Its precise locality is not indicated, nor has any trace of it been found in modern times.

LODENSTEIN (lo'den-stine), JODOCUS VON, who became well known in Holland for his great spirituality of mind, his ardent temperament and energy of character as a preacher, was born in 1620, at Delft. He was educated at Utrecht under Voëtius, and at Franeker under Cocceius and Amesius. He labored at Zoetermeer, Sluys and Utrecht, and he had great success. Entertaining exalted conceptions respecting the sacred character of the Lord's Supper, and looking at the ordinary lives of men, he feared to dispense the ordinance generally, and many fell into his views, though he and his followers never left the Reformed Church. The results of his preaching in Holland were similar to those of Spener in Germany in later years. He was pastor at Utrecht in 1677, when he died. He wrote hymns and two small works which appeared after his death.

LODGING-PLACE, Josh. iv. 3. See INN.

LOFFLER (lof'ler), JOSIAS FRIEDRICH CHRISTIAN, who rose to considerable eminence as a rationalistic writer, was born in 1752, at Saalfeld. He was educated at Halle, and in 1777 he settled in one of the churches in Berlin. In the following year he served as chaplain in a Prussian regiment, but he returned to Berlin. He went to Frankfort-on-the-Oder in 1783, where he officiated in a church and taught theology. His literary character gained him a degree in theology from the university of Copenhagen. He was one of the school which gradually advanced the free-thinking tendency in the German mind which has culminated in the pronounced rationalism of the present day. He published sermons, essays and tracts. He died in 1816.

LOFT, Acts xx. 9. See HOUSE.

LOFTUS (lof'tus), DUDLEY FIELD, who was born at Rathfarnham, near the Irish capital, in 1618, was educated for the law, but he became greatly distinguished for his attainments in theology and in Oriental literature. He rendered the Ethiopic version of the New Testament into Latin for the Polyglot of Walton, and he also translated several Syriac works into Latin and English. It is recorded of him that when he was only twenty years of age he was able to translate as many languages as he had numbered years. He became a master in chancery, and he was raised to the bench as judge in the Prerogative Court. He died in 1695.

LOFTUS, WILLIAM KENNETT, who became one of the most energetic and successful of modern English travelers, was born in 1820, at Rye, in Kent. He explored the region of the Tigris and the Euphrates very minutely, and his results were given to the world in two valuable works, "Travels and Researches in Chaldæa and Susiana" and an account of "Excavations at Warka, the Erech of Nimrod and Shushan, the Palace of Esther." These works are not known so extensively as their great merits deserve. He died in 1858.

LOG. See MEASURES.

LOGAN, JOHN, a divine and poet, was born in 1748, in the parish of Fala, in the county of Mid-Lothian, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. He became a minister of the Scotch Kirk, and in 1773 was appointed to the pastoral charge of South Leith. His reputation as a poet caused his appointment, in 1775, as one of the committee ordered by the General Assembly to revise the psalmody; and besides improving some of the old versions, he added others of his own composition. In 1781 he published "Elements of the Philosophy of History," and soon after, an "Essay on the Manners of Asia." In the same year he published a volume of poems, which was followed, in 1783, by his tragedy of "Runamede." He died in 1788.

LOGOS (log'os), the Word, a title given to our Lord and Saviour, so designated not only because the Father first created and still governs all things by him, but because, as men discover their sentiments and designs to one another by the intervention of words, speech or discourse, so God by his Son discovers his gracious designs to men. All the various manifestations of himself, whether in the works of creation, providence or redemption, all the revelations he has been pleased to give of his will, are conveyed to us through him; and therefore he is, by way of eminence, called the Word of God, as he is the great Revealer and Teacher of all that we know of God.

LOINS. See GIRDLE.

LOIS (lo'is), the mother of Eunice and grandmother of Timothy, well reported of by St. Paul as a woman of faith and probity, 2 Tim. i. 5.

LOKE, or LOKI (lo'ke), is the name of the evil spirit in Scandinavian mythology. Loki is the instigator of crime, the seducer to vice and all forms of wickedness. He is venomous and the father of monsters. Loki has been identified with Satan in the system of Christianity, and "Laake" is the name for Satan at the present time in Norway.

LOLLARDS (lol'lards), a class of persons in Germany and the Netherlands who professed, in the fourteenth century, to undertake spiritual offices in behalf of the sick and dead, and succeeded in attracting the attention and love of the mass of the people when they were in a great measure alienated from the secular and regular clergy by their general indifference and neglect. The origin of the name has been much disputed, but the inquiries of Mosheim seem to show that it is compounded of the German words lallen (identical with the lallare of the Romans and the lull of our own language, signifying to sing in a murmuring strain) and hard, a common affix, as in the somewhat similar word beghard. A lollard, therefore, meant one in the habit of singing the praises of God, or funeral dirges and the like. The Lollards, however, were accused—probably through the spite of the mendicant friars and others whose neglected duties they zealously performed—of holding many heretical opinions. Their reforming views may have been violent, but the charges made against them of vicious habits appear to rest upon no authentic grounds. The term was afterward applied by the partisans of the Church to the heretics and schismatics of the day generally; and the followers of Wicliffe in England are frequently stigmatized under the name of Lollards.

LOMBARD (lom'bard), PETER, designated MAGISTER SENTENTIARUM, a distinguished scholastic philosopher, was born of poor parents, near Novara, in Lombardy. He studied at Bologna, Rheims and Paris, was created doctor of theology, and in 1159 became bishop of Paris. His principal work is the "Libri Sententiarum," a compilation from the works of the Fathers, so methodically and effectively arranged that it became and continued for centuries a standard authority in the schools. Hundreds of commentaries were written upon it, and it was prized as an armory for theological warfare. Lombard was one of the most illustrious disciples of Abelard. He died in 1164.

distinguished valor, who played an important part in the early history of Europe. About the fourth century they left their original seats on the Lower Elbe, where the Romans first came in contact with them about the beginning of the Christian era, and fought their way southward and eastward till they came into close contact with the eastern Roman empire on the Danube, adopted an Arian form of Christianity, and after having been tributary to the Heruli, became one of the most wealthy and powerful nations in that part of the world. The conversion of the Arian Lombards to the orthodox faith was brought about by the policy of Gregory the Great and the zeal of Theodolinda of Bavaria, wife of Authari, and subsequently of his successor, Agilulf. Theodolinda persuaded Agilulf to restore a portion of their property and dignities to the Catholic clergy, and to have his own son baptized according to the Catholic rites. She also built the magnificent basilica of St. John the Baptist at Monza, near Milan, in which, in subsequent times, was kept the Lombard crown. The Lombards were ere long fully united to the Roman Catholic Church.

LONGCHAMP (long'shong), the fourth bishop of Ely, succeeded Geoffrey Ridel, who died in 1189. Ridel had finished the splendid tower of the cathedral, leaving only the battlements to be finished by Longchamp, who unfortunately raised on the tower the unsightly mass of an octagonal form which not only disfigures it, but has, as is believed, by its enormous pressure, destroyed the north wing which projected from the tower. Longchamp enjoys the unenviable distinction of being one of those mediæval ecclesiastical architects who were defective alike in taste and judgment, and who accordingly saw nothing strange in heaping together large masses of buildings which had no congruity of style. The ruin of the north wing, which served as a kind of transept, has left the beautiful cathedral of Ely in a sadly unbalanced and defective state.

LONGINIUS (lon-jin'e-us), DIONYSIUS CASSIUS, a Platonic philosopher and famous rhetorician, was born probably at Emesa, in Syria, during the third century. In his earlier years he traveled a great deal in the company of his parents, and made the acquaintance of many celebrated scholars and philosophers. After studying Greek literature at Alexandria, he settled as a teacher of rhetoric in Athens, where he soon acquired a great reputation. His knowledge was immense, but his taste and critical acuteness were no less wonderful. He was a heathen, but a generous and tolerant heathen. Of his works, the only one extant is a treatise "On the Sublime." He was beheaded on the charge of treason by command of the emperor Aurelian, in 273.

LONGLAND, or LANGLAND, JOHN, bishop of Lincoln, was born in 1473. He was a great friend of Cardinal Wolsey, who made him confessor to Henry VIII. He is said to have suggested to the king a divorce from Queen Catherine. He died in 1547.

bishop of the diocese of Ripon, was born in 1794. He was educated at Westminster school; and having entered Christ Church College, he was greatly distinguished in his university course at Oxford. He rose to the position of tutor in his college, and afterward he held the appointment of head-master of Harrow school. The scholarship and administrative ability which are required for the successful government of such responsible places as Eton, Rugby, Harrow and other similar institutions in England are usually considered to be such attributes as qualify for the appointment to a bishopric; and accordingly, when the great increase of population rendered it necessary that a new see should be formed by separating the north-eastern parts of Chester and the western of York, Ripon was constituted the cathedral seat. In 1836, Dr. Longley was consecrated the first bishop, whence he was translated to Durham, then to York, and in 1862 he was made archbishop of Canterbury and primate of England. He died in 1868. With the exception of sermons and charges, he has published but few works, as his labors have been mainly devoted to the duties of a new diocese.

LONGOBARDI (lon-go-bar'de), NICCOLO, born at Caltagirone, in Sicily, in 1565, was a missionary who belonged to the company of Jesus, and went in 1596 to China, where he devoted himself to the conversion of the natives and the study of the Chinese language and literature. Among many tracts on religious subjects, he left an interesting work, "The Doctrines of Confucius," which was translated into Spanish and into French. He died at Peking, in 1655.

LONSDALE (lonz'dale), JOHN, D.D., who was born near Wakefield, in Yorkshire, in the year 1788, was educated at Eton, whence he passed to King's College, Cambridge, in consequence of the close connection which subsists between these institutions. He became very eminent at Cambridge, and after taking his bachelor's degree, he studied law, but soon turned aside to theology.

His high character soon procured him the position of a preacher at the temple in London. He became examiner for the archbishop of Canterbury, a prebendary of St. Paul's cathedral, and in 1843 he reached the dignity of principal of King's College, Cambridge. He became archdeacon of Middlesex; and he also acted as chaplain at Lincoln's Inn, a position which requires the highest talent, and in 1844 he was appointed to the see of Lichfield. He was famed as a preacher, as well as a varied and profound scholar, of genial temperament, great humility, and much beloved by those who did not belong to his own communion as well as by the members of his own church. In 1849 he published his "Annotations on the Gospels." He died in 1867.

LORD. This is the rendering of two words in the Hebrew, Adonai and Jehovah. But as the words themselves are very different, and it is important that readers of the Bible should know when Lord stands for the one and when for the other, our translators have printed LORD in capitals whenever it is the equivalent of Jehovah and in ordinary letters when it stands for Adonai. By attending to this distinction English readers can easily perceive which is the word in the original, although it had certainly been better if no such dubiety had existed in the translation, and Jehovah, which is found in a few passages, Ex. vi. 3; Isa. xii. 2, had been found in all where it exists in the Hebrew, for by the practice actually adopted the proper force of the original is often lost. But see Jehovah.

LORD (lord), NATHAN, D.D., LL.D., who was born in 1793, at South Berwick, in Maine, was educated at Bowdoin College and Andover Theological Seminary. He served as an assistant in Phillips Academy for a short time, and having become the pastor of the Congregationalist church, at Amherst, New Hampshire, he remained there until 1828, when he accepted the position of president of Dartmouth College, which office he held till his death. As a theologian he belonged to the school of Edwards, Bellamy and Hopkins. As an educator he was remarkably successful, for the great number of eighteen hundred and twenty-four students sat under his care while he presided over Dartmouth. He was an excellent scholar, a wise and firm administrator, attractive and engaging to the young, and commanding the confidence and permanent regards of his equals, he was admirably fitted for the office which he filled. His writings chiefly appeared in Quarterlies, with the exception of sermons and essays. He died in 1870.

LORD'S DAY, Rev. i. 10. See SABBATH.

LORD'S SUPPER. This holy feast, one of the Christian sacraments, was instituted by Christ on the evening of his passion, at or after the pass-over meal. He intended to point out the typical reference which the passover had to himself, to give to it a higher signification, and leave a memorial with his Church of his death in which the union of his people with himself and with each other might be testified, and which might be the means to them of blessing derived from him and a mode of participating therein.

The account of the institution is given by several of the sacred writers, Matt. xxvi. 26-29; Mark xiv. 22-25; Luke xxii. 17-20; 1 Cor. xi. 23-25. By a reference to the mode of eating the paschal feast (see PASSOVER) our Lord's actions will be more clearly illustrated. It was probably of one of the earlier cups that he first declined to partake. The sop that was given to Judas was a piece of the bread dipped in the bitter sauce, after which the traitor retired; the bread broken and distributed to the disciples was the unleavened cake; and the cup after supper was one of those cups, the third or fourth, with which the ceremony concluded. It would hence seem most probable that Judas did not partake the newly instituted ordinance.

The passover was celebrated annually. Our Lord did not specify the frequency with which the Holy Supper was to be received; but the expression, "This do, as oft as ye shall drink it," may be taken to imply a frequent commemoration. Accordingly, we soon find traces of its observance. It has been, indeed, supposed that Christ himself repeated the celebration at Emmaus on the evening of his resurrection, and that it was this which occasioned the immediate recognition of him, Luke xxiv. 30, 31. More probably it was the Lord's Supper which is referred to in the accounts of the growing Church when the baptized "continued steadfastly in the apostles' fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers," Acts ii. 42, 46; xx. 7, 11. Very generally combined with the Lord's Supper, which was at first celebrated in private houses, were those feasts of charity which grew ere long to such a pitch of disorder as to call forth the grave censure of the apostle Paul upon the church which allowed it, 1 Cor. xi. 20-22; and subsequently, it may be added, these feasts of charity were generally discontinued. But the occasion led St. Paul more fully to explain the institution and meaning of the Lord's Supper, and to enforce that careful self-examination with which professing Christians should approach the Lord's table, 1 Cor. x. 16, 17; xi. 26-34.

It is not necessary to trace here the further history of this sacred rite—how, according to early Christian writers, it was the high act of worship; still less to detail the corruptions and controversies which arose upon it, and which to this day divide one part of Christendom from another. And the reader may well be reminded of the doctrine of the Anglican Church as expressed in her twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth articles: "The supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another; but rather it is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death, inasmuch that, to such as rightly, worthily and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ. . . . The wicked and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as St. Augustine saith) the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, yet in nowise are they partakers of Christ, but rather to their condemnation do eat and drink the sign or sacrament of so great a thing."

LORSBACH (lorz/bakh), GEORG WILHELM, who was born in the duchy of Nassau, in the year 1752, was educated at Herborn and Göttingen, where he displayed great proficiency in Oriental studies. He entered the ministry, but chiefly gave himself to instruction at Herborn, where he taught Oriental languages, history and exegesis. Subsequently he taught divinity, and eventually his great fame led to his appointment at the university in Jena to the chair of Oriental literature. The faculty at Marburg gave him the honor of doctor of divinity, which he merited because of his varied and profound knowledge, for he has been justly recognized as one of the most eminent German Orientalists. He died in 1816.

LORUHAMA (lo-ru-ha'mah), the symbolical name given to the (ideal) daughter of Hosea, in whom was meant to be embodied the solemn truth that God had meanwhile withdrawn the exercise of mercy from his rebellious people, Hos. i. ii.

LOSADA (lo-sah'dah), CHRISTOPHER, enjoyed the honor of being an eminent martyr for the cause of Christ's gospel in Spain in the sixteenth century. He undertook the pastorate of a church in the house of a lady of rank and influence in Seville, and he had the celebrated Domingo de Guzman and Don Juan Ponce de Leon among his hearers. The latter was imprisoned in the Inquisition for having translated parts of the Bible into Spanish, and he was brought more than fifty times before the high court, condemned to the rack, but ultimately liberated. Losada was less mercifully dealt with. He also was imprisoned and fearfully tortured on the rack, and in 1559 he suffered martyrdom at Seville, having at his death a great array of four bishops, the members of the court of justice, the chapter of the cathedral and a crowd of nobles to witness the faithfulness of the dying martyr.

LOSCHER (lo'sher), VALENTIN ERNST, who was born in 1673, at Sondershausen, was educated at Wittenberg and Jena. He enjoys the honor of being the first person in Germany to publish a theological periodical. This work became the organ of the friends of orthodoxy in Saxony. He became a professor in the university of Wittenberg in 1702, and two years afterward he was made superintendent of Dresden and member of the supreme consistorial court. He was eminent as a preacher, as an extensive correspondent with important persons on all subjects connected with the advancement of religion. He died in 1741.

LOSKIEL (los-keel'), GEORGE HENRY, was born in 1740, in Courland. He joined the Moravians in early life, and was educated in theology and medicine. He preached through Holland, Germany and Livonia; and having been made a bishop in 1802, he accepted the position of provincial of the Board which governs the churches in the United States. His failing health induced him to retire from the place, but he was detained in this country by the war with Great Britain. He had been elected to the General Board in Saxony, but he was unable to accept the position, and he died at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, in the year 1814.

LOT, the son of Haran, the son of Terah, who died before his father. Abraham seems then to have treated Lot much as if he had been his own younger brother; and when Abraham and his father moved from Ur of the Chaldees, Lot went with them, Gen. xi. 27, 31. The Scripture narrative of Lot's life is so clear and simple that a full notice is not needed here. See Gen. xi.; xii.; xiii.; xix.; Heb. xiii.; 2 Pet. ii. See also, articles on SALT, PILLAR OF, ABRAHAM, MOAB, AMMON, SODOM.

As to the spiritual character of Lot, it may be observed that the testimony in his favor by the men of Sodom, Gen. xix. 9, is expanded and connected with other acts of God's providence by Peter, 2 Pet. ii. 7-9, God "delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked (for that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds)." This is inspired authority for regarding him as a man of genuine piety. Plainly he shared to some extent in the blessing of Abraham, and this seems to have been for Abraham's sake. But he had not Abraham's clear faith and steady purpose, as was manifest in his choice of Sodom for a dwelling and the taint he contracted in that abominable city, else he could not have made the proposal he did make to the men of the city about his daughters, nor could he have fallen so terribly when he lived in the cave. Also his solicitude about Zoar implies a weakness and unsteadiness of faith, or why should he have thought that he must seek a refuge in it, and that he could not escape to the mountain and be safe there, when he had the command and promise of God? And yet again his vacillation appears in his retiring from Zoar to the mountain, "for he feared to dwell in Zoar," although he had no longer the divine command to forsake the society of men and no need to leave the city, which had been spared in the long-suffering of God for the express purpose that it might be an asylum to him.

LOT, LOTS. The casting of lots was a common mode of deciding a disputed question or dividing property practiced among heathens, Jon. i. 7; Matt. xxvii. 35. The decision by lot was resorted to by the Hebrews, with special appeal to God, Prov. xvi. 33. And God sanctioned this mode of appeal to him, and in some cases prescribed it, Lev. xvi. 8, 9; Num. xxvi. 55, 56; Josh. vii. 14; xiv. 2; xviii. 6. Hence the word "lot."

Lot frequently occurs in Scripture in the sense of appointment, portion or inheritance. This was a secondary meaning of the word, but one that quite naturally came into use, the thing befalling or by divine destination becoming one's share being put for a specific mode of getting it.

LOUIS (loo'e). Several French kings of this name have been more or less connected with ecclesiastical affairs, of whom but one requires notice here.

XIV., called the "Grande Monarque," son of Louis XIII., was born in 1638, and was only five years old on the death of his father, so his mother, Anne of Austria, acted as regent, with Cardinal Mazarin as her chief adviser, until 1651, when Louis himself took the reins of government. The civil and military history of his reign does not come within our scope; suffice it to say he proved himself a great chieftain and won glory for himself and his country. Amidst all his glory Louis committed an act of impolitic cruelty by the revocation, in 1685, of the Edict of Nantes, granted by Henry IV. in favor of the Protestants—a measure which drove from France a vast number of ingenious mechanics and others, who settled in England and Holland, and was the signal of fresh hostilities, which continued till the peace of Ryswick, in 1697. War broke out afresh in 1701, when Louis claimed the throne of Spain for his grandson. This is the well-known War of the Succession, which raged over the Continent for twelve years. The French arms were at length utterly vanquished by the genius of Marlborough, and the peace of Utrecht, in 1713, closed the last hostilities of the reign. Louis died in 1715. His reign was adorned by great statesmen and generals, ecclesiastics and men of literature and science, who made the national glory the object of their exertions. At his court, which became a model for all the others of Europe, everything had reference to the king and tended to augment his dignity, while no man possessed in a higher degree than Louis the requisite qualities for playing well the part of a monarch. But his natural pride degenerated into haughtiness, his love of splendor into useless extravagance, his firmness into despotism. Determined no longer to tolerate Calvinism in France, which had for some years existed in peaceful separation from the national Church, he said, "My grandfather loved the Huguenots without fearing them; my father feared without loving them; I neither fear nor love them." But his conduct showed that a stern and unfeeling rigor toward them was uppermost in his mind; their privileges were gradually infringed; missionaries, supported by dragoons, were employed for their conversion; and severities were practiced which excited the horror and indignation of every breast that was not hardened by bigotry and intolerance.

LOUIS or LEWIS, IV. or V., was the opponent of his cousin Frederick of Austria, both of whom claimed to have been elected as emperor of Germany. War was the result, and in the protracted struggle the Guelphs aided Frederick, while the Ghibelines sustained the cause of Lewis. In 1322 Frederick was made prisoner by Lewis, who afterward released him, having obtained from him a renunciation of his former claim. Lewis had to resist the policy of Clement VI., who by a bull sought to dethrone him in favor of Charles IV., and he maintained his cause until his death, in 1347.

LOUWARD (loo'vard) FRANCOIS, who greatly distinguished himself as a theologian of the Jansenist school in France, was born in 1661. In 1700 he was removed to the convent of St. Denis at Paris from a convent in Brittany, where he had been for twenty-one years. When Clement IX. published the celebrated bull "Unigenitus," Louvard forthwith opposed it openly, but his brethren contented themselves with condemning it in private. He was accordingly sent to Amiens in disgrace, where he persevered in his views, and he was then confined in a monastery in Brittany, but he was permitted to return to Paris on the death of Louis XIV., in 1715. Two years afterward he began a determined opposition, and he secured the agreement and aid of many of the Benedictines, but he was exiled to Tuffe, and afterward to the diocese of Tours, then to Blois and next to St. Gildas de Bois, in Brittany, where he continued to proclaim his views and to denounce Jesuitism. The result was his imprisonment at Nantes in 1728 and his removal to the Bastille. He managed to escape to Holland, still holding his sentiments; he labored to extend them until his death, in 1739. He wrote several works on St. Gregory of Nazianzen, an argument for a general council in France to promote concord among the French churches, on the bull Unigenitus, and on his repeated arrests and imprisonments.

LOVE, one of the most blessed attributes of God. "God is love," 1 John iv. 16.

When the great Father had formed the world, he beheld it with loving eye as he pronounced the work of his fingers "very good," Gen. i. 31. And even when his creatures had provoked him by disobedience, his love was not exhausted; he was still "kind unto the unthankful and to the evil," Luke vi. 35. He proved this in a marvelous manner: "God so loved the world"—the sinful world—"that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have

John iv. 8. And love to God is evidenced by love to our brethren, 1 John iii. 14. The injunction of the gospel is that we love one another as he hath loved us, 1 John iii. 16; iv. 11. This is the great commandment of the divine law, Rom. xiii. 10. Even faith is but an empty notion, if it does not work by love, 1 Cor. xiii. 2; Gal. v. 6. Were this great principle of the gospel carried out as it ought to be, it would establish the harmony and happiness of the world. A religion with such a tendency is worthy of the Deity; it is, it must be, divine.

LOVE, CHRISTOPHER, an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born at Cardiff, in 1613. He studied at Oxford, and entered into orders; but refusing to subscribe to the canons enjoined by Archbishop Laud, he was expelled. He repaired to London, was one of the commissioners for the Par-

LOW CHURCHMEN is a term applied to members and ministers in the Protestant Episcopal Churches who prefer their own communion, but who do not consider the constitution of their Church to be essential. Usually their theological views are such as have been denominated evangelical. The name originated in connection with the nonjurors and those who were known to moderate in their feeling toward dissenters.

everlasting life," John iii. 16. Out of his love he gave a priceless boon to win their love and to free them from everything which could incapacitate them from tasting his love. Those who avail themselves of his offers enjoy the fullness of his love; they are his dear and cherished children, the love of God being shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto them, Rom. v. 5. The Christian revelation thus shows God in the most attractive character; it announces a loving message—"good-will toward men," Luke ii. 14. And this is one of the broad stamps upon it by which we see that it comes from God.

Love will beget love. No one can really know the excellent perfections of God, and the love he has shown to sinful men, without responsive love to him. "We love him because he first loved us," 1 John iv. 19. These are "the cords of a man," "the bands of love," Hos. xi. 4, by which he draws us; and "he that loveth not knoweth not God," 1

After this he was concerned in a plot against Cromwell and the Independents, for which he was tried and beheaded, August 22, 1651. Ashe, Calamy and Manton, three eminent nonconformist divines, accompanied him to the scaffold, and he was deemed a martyr by the whole of the Presbyterian party.

LOVE, VIRGINS OF. This is the name of an order in the Romish Church. It was founded in 1660 by Louisa le Gras to afford aid to sick persons who were poor and in distress. The order is also called the "Daughters of Charity."

LOWELL (lo'el)

CHARLES, D.D., who became very celebrated as a Unitarian preacher and writer in Boston was born in that city in the year 1782, and educated at Andover and Harvard. He traveled in Europe and studied divinity in Edinburgh, and he prosecuted the same subject when he returned to his native land under Dr. Sanger of South Bridgewater and Dr. Tappan at Cambridge. He was settled in the West Church, Boston, in 1806, and with the aid of a college league he remained in this church until his death. He commanded the respect and love of his congregation in an eminent degree. His voice, style, and manner made him an unusually attractive preacher. He published several volumes of sermons, and numerous works intended for the young, the sick, and for church members. He died in 1861.

LOWELL, JOHN, the founder of the "Lowell Institute," was born in Boston in 1799, educated at Harvard where he studied law. His feeble health obliged him to live abroad, and from 1815 until his death, at Bombay, in 1836, he chiefly resided in the East. He was eminent for his great philanthropy and among his other benevolent and wise provisions which he made with his abundant means was the dedication of $250,000 to found an institute in Boston in which annual courses of lectures should be delivered on religion, natural and revealed, on the sciences, on belles-lettres, philology and art. Several of the courses secured by this foundation are of rare interest and value.

LOWMAN (lo'man) MOSES, the author of the well-known "Paraphrase and Notes of Revelation," was born in London in the year 1680, and educated in the Middle Temple, at Leyden and at Utrecht, after which he settled as pastor of a Presbyterian church at Clapham, near London. He remained here from 1710 until his death, in 1752. He was profoundly learned in Jewish literature, as his "Civil Government of the Hebrews" and his "Rationale of the Ritual Hebrew Worship" displayed. His power of reasoning and of analysis was seen in his "Argument from Prophecy in Proof that Jesus is the Messiah." He was one of the fine scholars and bold men of a past age.

LOWRIE (low'ree), JOHN MARSHALL, D., who was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in 1777, and educated at Jefferson College, afterward at Lafayette and at Princeton Theological Seminary, became eminent as an effective Presbyterian minister, well known as a preacher and a writer. He served his Master in the churches of Blairstown and Knowlton, New Jersey, of Wellsville and Lancaster, Ohio, and finally of Fort Wayne, Indiana, where his remarkable clearness and accuracy in theology, his power of simplification and his energy in enforcing religious truths placed him in the front rank of preachers. He wrote extensively for the periodical press, and his work on the closing scenes of our Lord's life is wonderfully pictorial and attractive. He died at Fort Wayne in 1867.

LOWRIE, REUBEN, who was a distinguished missionary, at first among the Choctaw Indians and afterward in China, was born in 1797, at Butler, Pennsylvania, and educated in the University of New York city and the theological seminary at Princeton. In 1851 he was licensed to preach as a missionary among the Choctaws, and in 1853 he was ordained and sailed to China. He soon mastered the language at Shanghai so far as to enable him to translate the "Shorter Catechism" and a "Catechism of Old Testament Histories" into the vernacular. He also attempted the completion of a "Dictionary of the Four Gospels," which his deceased brother had undertaken, and he had gone far in completing a "Commentary of the Gospel of Matthew," when he was removed by death in 1860.

LOWRIE, WALTER MACON, a missionary in China, was born in Butler, Pennsylvania, and graduated in Jefferson College in 1837. After completing his course of theology at Princeton, he was ordained by the Second Presbytery of New York, and he sailed to China as a missionary. He entered on his labors in China with great zeal, and his "Sermons" preached in China, his "Land of Sinai" and "Letters to Sabbath-school Children" display fine powers of style and grasp of thought. In 1847 he sailed from Shanghai to Hongkong, but the vessel was seized by pirates, and he was thrown overboard, thus cutting short a life which promised great usefulness to the Church and the world.

LOWTH (louth), WILLIAM and ROBERT, two eminent English divines.

WILLIAM, the father, was born in London, in 1681. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' school and at St. John's College, Oxford. His first publication was a "Vindication of the Divine Authority of the Old and New Testament," in answer to Le Clerc's attacks on the inspiration of Scripture. This brought him to the notice of Bishop Mew of Winchester, who made him his chaplain, and presented him with a prebendal stall at Winchester, in 1696, and the living of Buriton near Petersfield in 1699, which preferments he held till his death, in 1732. He was a profound scholar, though such was his modesty that it is rather from his contributions to the works of others than from his own that the extent and depth of his reading are to be estimated. He had carefully read and annotated upon almost every Greek and Latin author, whether profane or ecclesiastical, and he dispensed his stores with a most liberal hand. In addition to the "Vindication," Lowth published "Directions for the Profitable Reading of Holy Scripture," an excellent little work which has gone through many editions. The work with which his name is chiefly connected is his "Commentary on the Prophets," originally published in separate portions, and afterward collected as a continuation of Bishop Patrick's commentary on the earlier portions of the Old Testament.

ROBERT, son of the preceding, was born at Boriton or, as some will have it, in the Close at Winchester, November 27, 1710. He was educated on the foundation of Winchester College, where he displayed his poetical talent at a very early age, and from whence he was elected to a scholarship at New College, in 1730, and took the degree of M.A. in 1737. He became professor of poetry in 1741, was presented to the rectory of Ovington, in Hampshire, in 1744, was appointed to the archdeaconry of Winchester in 1750, and to the rectory of East Woodhay, in Hampshire, in 1753. It was in this year that Lowth published his famous "Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews," which he had previously read to the students at Oxford when poetical professor. In 1766 he was promoted to the see of St. David's, and thence to that of Oxford, and thence to the see of London in 1777. He had hardly been twelve months in the metropolis when he published his last and greatest work, entitled "Isaiah; a New Translation, with a Preliminary Dissertation and Notes, Critical, Philological and Explanatory," in which he aimed, as he states in the preface, "not only to give an exact and faithful representation of the words and sense of the prophet by adhering closely to the letter of the text and treading as nearly as may be in his footsteps, but, moreover, to imitate the air and manner of the author, to express the form and fashion of the composition, and to give the English reader some notion of the peculiar turn and cast of the original." Lowth died November 3, 1787, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, full of years and full of honors.

LOYOLA (loy'o-la), IGNATIUS, founder of the society of Jesuits, was born in 1491, of a noble family, in the Spanish province of Guipuscoa. He was at first in the army, and served with distinguished bravery; but having been severely wounded, he beguiled his time with books, and on reading the lives of the saints his imagination became highly excited, and he determined to devote himself from that time to works of piety. He began by making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, in the hope of converting the infidels who were masters of the Holy Land, or of gaining the palm of martyrdom in the attempt. Having accomplished this painful and perilous journey, he returned to Spain, more unprovided even than he had left it. In 1526 he went to the university of Alcala, where he found some adherents, but the Inquisition imprisoned him for his conduct, which appeared strange and caused him to be suspected of witchcraft. He was not delivered from the prison of the Holy Office until 1528, when he went to Paris to continue his studies. Here he became acquainted with several Spaniards and Frenchmen who were afterward noted as his followers. They conceived the plan of an order for the conversion of heathens and sinners; and on ascension day, in 1534, they solemnly pledged themselves to this great work in the subterranean chapel of the abbey of Montmartre. They met again in 1536, at Venice, whence they proceeded to Rome, and received the confirmation of their fraternity from Pope Paul III. as "Clerks of the Society of Jesus." In 1541, Ignatius was chosen general of the society, invested with absolute authority, and, subject only to the pope, continued his abstinence and penances during life, and died in 1566. Loyola was in person of a middle stature, of an olive complexion, with a bald head, eyes full of fire, and an aquiline nose. His fanaticism was certainly dignified by sincerity, and he doubtless believed, as he taught, that the Society of Jesus was the result of an immediate inspiration from heaven. He was canonized in 1622 by Gregory XV.

LOZING (lo'zing), ROBERT, also known as ROBERT OF LORRAINE, was consecrated bishop of Hereford A. D. 1079, and soon after his elevation to the see, he commenced the erection of his cathedral church on a more extensive scale than the old edifice, and in the style which prevailed in his age. The see had existed from A. D. 544, but the first stone church was erected by Milfred, the viceroy to Egbert the king of Mercia, and the chronicler Brompton says it was "an admirable stone church which cost a considerable sum of money." Bishop Athelstane began a new church in 1012, but the Danes "burned it utterly." No part of the present cathedral is prior to the time of Lozing, and the work which he began is said to have been finished by Bishop Raynelm, who presided from 1107 to 1115 over the diocese. Portions have been added, and some parts have been rebuilt; thus Bishop de Vere erected the part behind the high altar in 1186 and 1199. The Lady Chapel is later, and the great central tower is attributed to Bishop de Breuse, between the years 1200 and 1215. Bishop Cantilupe erected the greater transept before 1282, and the chapter-house and cloisters were erected soon afterward. Next came the aisles of the nave and choir, and then the eastern transept, so that these changes produced an edifice of an appearance greatly different from the structure of Lozing and Raynham. Hereford does not take rank with the largest cathedrals, and yet there are portions of the edifice which are wondrously beautiful and impressive. The cloisters, which are partly destroyed, were exceedingly rich. Although many objects of interest in the cathedral have been destroyed, it still contains more monuments of bishops and deans than any other in England.

The external length of Hereford Cathedral is three hundred and eighty-two feet, three hundred and twenty-five internal; the western transept, externally one hundred and seventy-five, internally one hundred and fifty; eastern transept, externally one hundred and thirty one, internally, one hundred and six; nave, one hundred and thirty; choir, ninety-six. The height of the nave to the vaulting, seventy feet; of the choir, sixty-four; and of the great central tower, to the summit of the battlements, one hundred and forty feet. Benjamin Hoadley, D.D., who presided over the see from 1721 until 1723, when he was removed to Salisbury, was one of the most important of its modern bishops. He was eminent as a controversialist, and according to his own statement, "fury seemed to be let loose upon him." He held that the sovereign was invested with the right of governing in ecclesiastical things. Atterbury, Sherlock, Snape, Law and Hare were his great opponents in the field of controversy, on which he was always found a sturdy and a ready champion.

LUBIENIETZKI (loo-ben-yetz'ke), STANISLAS, a celebrated Pole, was born in 1625. He was minister of the Socinians, and was very active in promoting their opinions and seeking toleration for them. He wrote several works, of which the best known are "Theatrum Commeticum," a curious dissertation upon the supposed influence of comets, and "History of the Reformation in Poland." He died in 1675.

LUBIM (loo'bim), 2 Chr. xii. 3. See LIBYA.

LUBIN (loo'bin), EILHARD, a theologian and philologist, was born in 1565, at Westerstede, in the county of Oldenburg, and was educated at several German universities. He was appointed professor of poetry at Rostock in 1595, and of theology ten years afterward. He died in 1621. The work by which he obtained most fame was a treatise on the "Origin of Evil." The hypothesis he proposed was that of two coeternal principles, God and nothing, of which the latter stood in the place of the evil principle of the Manichæans and other theorists.

LUCANUS (loo-ka'nus), a Gnostic who lived at the close of the second century. He was a follower of Marcion, and he deserves a place in this work because of the connection which he is believed to have held to several of the Apocryphal and forged books of the early age. The "History of the Nativity of the Virgin Mary" is attributed to him; so also is the "Protevangelion," which is only a parody on the early chapters in Luke's Gospel, and the "Gospel of Nicodemus." He is sometimes called Lucianus, Lucius, Leontius, and even Leonides. He denied the reality of Christ's human body, as well as the immortality of the soul, and he held that animals and man were endowed with spirits of the same kind, and that both were equally capable and sure of a resurrection.

LUCAR (loo'kar), CYRIL, patriarch of Constantinople, was born in Candia, in 1572. Educated in Italy, he traveled to England, and there became acquainted with the principles of the Reformation. On his return home he was ordained, and became archimandrite to the bishop of Alexandria, living at Constantinople, whom he soon succeeded. Here he vigorously opposed the efforts of the Romish emissaries against the Greek Church, and carried on a correspondence on the subject with Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury. At the instigation of the Jesuits, the Turks persecuted him and several times drove him from Constantinople, to the chair of which he had been appointed. Their machinations were successful in procuring his strangulation on a false charge of treason. The English ambassador had given Cyril much support in all his difficulties, and to show his gratitude he presented through him to Charles I. the famous Alexandrian manuscripts, which he had obtained at Mount Athos. His death occurred in 1638.

LUCAS (loo'cas), Philem. 24, identical with Luke, which see.

LUCAS, FRANCISCUS (BRUGENSIS), one of the ablest of the Roman Catholic commentators, was born at Bruges, in 1549. He studied under Arias Montanus, was a licentiate of theology of Louvain and dean of St. Omers, and died February 19, 1619. He was celebrated for his knowledge of the sacred languages and their cognate dialects, and was appointed to superintend the edition of the "Biblia Regia" brought out by Plantin, the famous printer of Antwerp, under the auspices of Philip II. of Spain. The work by which he is principally known is his "Commentary on the Four Evangelists," a work of no ordinary merit. He also produced a "Concordance of the Vulgate."

LUCIAN (loo'sh'an), SAINT, OF ANTIOCH, one of the most eminent ecclesiastics and Biblical scholars in the early Church, was born at Samosata, on the Euphrates, of respectable parents, by whom he was early trained in religious principles and habits. He was left an orphan at twelve years of age, and went to Edessa, where he was baptized, and devoted himself to ascetic practices. Having determined to embrace an ecclesiastical life, he became a presbyter at Antioch, and established in that city a theological school, which was resorted to by many students, and which exercised a considerable influence on the religious opinions of the subsequent generation. What were the religious opinions of Lucian himself it is difficult exactly to determine. They were such as to expose him to the charge of heterodoxy, and to induce three successive bishops of Antioch to excommunicate him, or else to induce him to withdraw with his followers from communion with them. Whatever may have been his heterodoxy, he either abjured it or explained it so as to be restored to the communion of the Church, in which he continued until his martyrdom, the glory of which was regarded as sufficient to wipe off all the reproach of his former heresy. After his reunion with the Church, Lucian appears to have recovered or increased his reputation both for learning and sanctity. He was especially eminent for his charity to the poor. His eminence marked him out as a victim in the persecution under Diocletian and his successors. He fled from Antioch and concealed himself in the country, but near the close of the year 311 he was apprehended at Antioch, and conveyed by land across Asia Minor to Nicomedia in Bithynia, where, after suffering the greatest tortures, he was remanded to prison. He died in 312, most probably from the effects of the torture already inflicted, and especially by starvation. His body was cast into the sea, and having been washed ashore near the decayed town on the ruins of Drepanum, was buried there. The works of Lucian comprehended two small works on the Christian faith and some short letters to various individuals; but the most important of his literary labors was his revision of the text of the Septuagint.

LUCIDUS (loo-se'dus) was a celebrated preacher of the fifth century who belonged to the Gallic Church, and who distinguished himself as a supporter of the views of Augustine against the semi-Pelagianism of the age. His opponent was Faustus of Riez, who compelled him to recant, having accused him at the Synod of Arles of carrying his views so far as to deny all free agency in man, and reducing man's activity merely to a manifestation of the indwelling influence of God. A copy of his recantation has been preserved.

LUCIFER (loo'se-fer), the Latin name for the morning star, meaning "light-bringer." It occurs only once in Scripture, Isa. xiv. 12. Coupled with it is with the explanatory epithet "son of the morning," there can be no doubt that the rendering Lucifer is quite appropriate; and the application of it to the once bright and aspiring king of Babylon adds peculiar force and beauty to the poetical delineation in which it occurs. In another and far higher sense, however, the designation was applicable to Him in whom promise and fulfillment entirely corresponded, and it is applied by Jesus when he styles himself "the bright and morning Star," Rev. xxii. 16. In certain sense it is the emblem also of all those who are destined to live and reign with him, Rev. 28. These are the only Scriptural applications of the term; but from the fall of the proud and domineering Babylon being regarded by some of the Fathers as a reflex of that of Satan, Lucifer came to be among them, and in later times, a very frequent designation of Satan. This, however, is without countenance in Scripture.

LUCIFER, bishop of Cagliari, the metropolis of Sardinia, lived in the fourth century and was famous for his extraordinary virtues and abilities. He refused to allow the decree made in the Council of Alexandria, A. D. 352, for receiving the Arian bishops who openly acknowledged their errors. This he opposed so resolutely, that rather than yield, he chose to separate himself from the communion of the rest and to form a new schism, which bore his name and soon gained a considerable footing, especially in the West. It continued to the end of the reign of Theodosius the Great, after which time authors make little or no mention of it.

LUCIFERIAN. See LUCIFER.

LUCIUS (loo'sh'us), a Cyrenian mentioned among the prophets and teachers of the church at Antioch, Acts xiii. 1. He is probably the same who joins in Paul's salutations to the church at Rome, Rom. xvi. 21.

LUCIUS, a British prince of the second century, sometimes erroneously called king. He is also said to have sent to Pope Eleutherius for Christian teachers—an assertion that is much controverted by the learned. But there is no doubt that he publicly protected and nourished the Church in Britain. According to one of the Welsh triads, he "erected, at Llandaff, the first church in Britain."

LUCIUS. There were three popes of this name. I. A confessor, suffered martyrdom under Gallus, in 253. II. Was made pope in 1144. In the following year he led out his troops to suppress a disturbance, and was killed with a paving-stone. III. Was pope from 1181 to 1185. He was the first pontiff elected solely by the cardinals, in consequence of which his reign was very turbulent.

LUCIUS, the name of several prelates of the early Church.

1. OF ADRIANOPE, was bishop of that city in the fourth century. He was expelled from his see by the Arian party, then predominant in the East, and went to Rome to lay his cause before Pope Julius I. The pope, having satisfied himself of his innocence and orthodoxy, sent him back with a letter requiring his restoration and rebuking his persecutors. The Oriental bishops rejected the pope's authority, and sent him back a remonstrance against his rebukes. Lucius, however, recovered his see by the authority of the emperor Constantius. He was afterward deposed by the Arian party, who bound him neck and hands with irons and in that condition banished him. He died in exile. The Roman Church commemorates him as a martyr on February 11.

2. OF ALEXANDRIA, was elected patriarch by the Arians, in 361, after they had been expelled from the churches, on the death of the emperor Constantius, and the murder of the Arian patriarch George of Cappadocia, and when Athanasius had recovered the patriarchate of Alexandria. Although, when the Arian Valens became emperor of the East, the hopes of Lucius and his party revived, yet he was not allowed to return to Alexandria during Athanasius' lifetime. On the death of the latter, in 373, and the ordination of Peter, whom he had nominated as his successor, Valens sent Lucius to Alexandria, with orders to the authorities of Alexandria, in consequence of which Peter was deposed and imprisoned and Lucius forcibly established in his stead. Peter, having escaped, fled to Rome, and after some time was sent back to Alexandria by Pope Damasus I., with letters confirming his ordination, in consequence of which he obtained possession of the patriarchate, and Lucius in turn was obliged to flee to Constantinople. It is doubtful whether Lucius was ever restored. He withdrew from Constantinople at the time of the expulsion of Demophilus, Arian patriarch of that city, in 380, and nothing more is known of him.

LUCKEY (luk'ee), SAMUEL, D.D., became eminent as a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He labored chiefly in Canada, Northern and Western New York. He was born in 1791, in Albany county, New York, and entered the ministry in 1811, at Ottawa, in Canada, whence he removed to the region of Saratoga. In 1821 he was at Schenectady, and he received the degrees of master of arts and doctor of divinity from Union College. He served as principal of the seminary at Lima, New York, and he became editor of the "Christian Advocate and Journal," at New York. He wrote on "The Lord's Supper," "The Trinity," "Hymns," and all his works displayed great mental vigor. In 1847 he was made westward and driven out the Mæonians, who inhabited the tract between the rivers Hermus and Mæander, which was from this Eastern race denominated Lydia. They were a brave people whose warlike service was sought by the Tyrians, Isa. lxvi. 19; Ezek. xxvii. 10. 2. Judith ii. 23. The Lydians are probably meant, though the word is coupled with "Phud"—i. e., Phut.

LUDGARDIS (lud-gar'dis), eminent for the reported visions which she saw and the miracles which she wrought, was born at the close of a regent of the State university—an office which his solid judgment and great prudence, as well as love of learning, qualified him to hold. He died in the year 1869.

LUCOPETRIANS (loo-ko-pet're-anz), a wild sect of the Greek Church who have been charged with holding a double Trinity and allegorical interpretations which nullify the sense of Scripture. They have been described as despisers of marriage and all forms of outward worship, and thus they may be classed with many other fanatics who do not deserve the name of Christians.

LUD, a son of Shem, Gen. x. 22; 1 Chr. i. 17, ancestor of a people in Asia Minor called Ludi, or Lydians. Their original settlements were probably in Armenia; but they seem to have migrated the twelfth century. In the Benedictine convent of St. Trudo she claimed to have special converse with angels, the apostles, the Virgin and other saints. The Evangelist John, she affirmed, appeared to her in the form of an eagle, and from his beak he poured all knowledge and wisdom into her soul. Still more highly was she favored by the communications which she had with the Saviour himself. The claims were received as all valid, and she was made abbess of the convent; but in 1206 she went to the Cistercian convent of Acquiric, near Brussels, where she became still more ecstatic and famous for her visions, for it was believed that at times her body was covered with blood when she became absorbed in her spiritual meditations and intercourse with our Lord. The Dominican Thomas Cantipratanus wrote her life. She died in 1246.

LUDIM (loo'dim), a people descended of the family of Ham, through Mizraim, Gen. x. 13; 1 Chr. i. 11. It is clear that they must have been an African nation, and not the Lydians of Asia Minor. And as coupled with Ethiopia and Lybia (Cush and Phut or Put), they must be intended in Jer. xlvi. 9; Ezek. xxx. 5, where our translation wrongly gives "Lydians" and "Lydia." They were celebrated as archers, and were probably settled in Lower Egypt, north of Memphis, where was a town called Letopolis, or Letus.

LUDLOW (lud'lo), JOHN, D.D., LL.D., who was one of the most eminent ministers of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in the United States, was born in 1793, at Passaic, New Jersey. He was educated at Union College, and at the seminary in New Brunswick, New Jersey. In 1817 he settled as pastor of the First Reformed (Dutch) Church in New Brunswick, and two years afterward he was made a professor in the seminary; but in 1823 he removed to the First Church in Albany, where he greatly distinguished himself as a preacher, and his usefulness became unusually extensive. The office of provost of the university of Pennsylvania was his next position, and he held it from 1834 until 1852, when he removed to New Brunswick and assumed the duties of the chair of mental philosophy in Rutgers College, at the same time acting as professor of ecclesiastical history and church government in the theological seminary. Dr. Ludlow stood in the front rank of the most eminent men who ever adorned the ministry in the United States, and it has been truly said of him, "He adorned every relation that he sustained, and was one of the finest specimens of intellectual and moral nobility."

LUDLOW, PETER, who became a Baptist minister of great note, was born in 1797, in Connecticut. He entered Princeton College, began the study of the law, but turned to theology in consequence of his religious experience controlling his views. He became a Baptist, received license and settled as pastor of the Second Baptist Church in Providence, Rhode Island. Thence he removed to Georgetown, South Carolina, in consequence of the feebleness of his health. He was a man of fine mind, unwonted eloquence and effective power in urging the evangelical truth which he loved to preach. He died in New York city in 1837.

LUECKE (loo-ek'eh), GOTTFRIED CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, a celebrated German theologian, was born at Egelin, near Magdeburg, in 1792, and died in 1855, at Göttingen. In 1816 he went, after having passed his university career chiefly in Halle and Göttingen, and having filled the office of repetitor at the latter place for several years, to Berlin, where he became intimate with De Wette and Schliermacher, and lectured on New Testament exegesis. In 1818 he was called to fill a chair at the newly-founded university at Bonn, which, in 1827, he left for another professorship at Göttingen. Among his works are—"The Apostolic Church" and "Commentary on the Epistles of John."

LUHITH (loo'hith), a town or place of Moab, Isa. xv. 5; Jer. xlvi. 5.

LUITPRAND (luit'prand), or LIUTPRAND (leut'prand), an author to whom we owe much of our knowledge of the history of the tenth century, was born in Italy, about 922. He was educated at the court of King Hugo, and entered into the service of his successor, Berengarius, but falling into disgrace at court about 955, resided for some years at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, followed the emperor Otto I. to Italy in 961. He was made bishop of Cremona, and in 963 he went to Rome to stir up the aristocracy against Pope John XII., and with great boldness he spoke against him in a synod which was convened at Rome. He was afterward sent on an embassy to Constantinople, in which he failed. He died about 970. His "Antapodosis" treats of the period from 886 to 948. He also wrote several other historical works which are valuable from the fact that he was an eye-witness of the events described.

LUKE (leuk) was the companion of the apostle Paul in some of his labors and travels. He appears first in the apostolic history at Troas, and accompanies Paul to Philippi, Acts xvi. 10, 17, where he seems to have remained, perhaps to instruct the new converts. Seven years later he is at the same place, and goes thence with Paul to Asia and Palestine, and finally to Rome, Acts xx. 5-xxviii. 16, where he is again with the apostle shortly before his martyrdom, 2 Tim. iv. 11. He is generally allowed to have been the "beloved physician" mentioned in Col. iv. 14. He appears to have been of Gentile extraction, being distinguished in Col. iv. 11, 14, from those who were "of the circumcision." He is said by some of the Fathers to have resided at Antioch, in Syria, and this statement is somewhat confirmed by passages in his writings. The form of his name and his medical profession make it likely that he was a freedman of some wealthy Roman. But from his accurate acquaintance with the Jewish religion it may be inferred that he was a proselyte to Judaism before he received the gospel. His medical knowledge may be traced in his descriptions of diseases, and in his accounts of cures wrought by our Saviour and his apostles, which have more of technical definiteness than we find in the other Gospels. And his superior education is apparent from the great beauty of his style, which is more classical than that of the other evangelists.

LUKE, THE GOSPEL OF. It appears, from Luke's own preface, ch. i. 1-4, that he was not an eye-witness of the facts which he records, but that he compiled his Gospel carefully from the testimony of those who had personally known and attended our Lord. It contains many things which are not to be found in any of the other Gospels. The chief of these are—1. A narrative of the events preceding and accompanying the birth of Jesus, for which purpose Luke appears to have used a documentary record, derived, perhaps, from our Lord's mother, who alone was competent to narrate many of the particulars; 2. Discourses and sayings of our Lord, contained in ch. ix. 51-xviii. 15, apparently belonging to the period between his leaving Galilee and his last passover at Jerusalem; and 3. An enlarged account of some events following our Lord's resurrection, and of the circumstances of his ascension.

This Gospel was certainly written before the "Acts of the Apostles," see Acts i. 1, which probably may be dated not long after the expiration of the two years mentioned in Acts xxviii. 30, see Preface to the Acts, about A. D. 63. Some suppose that, during the seven years which elapsed between the first and the second occasion on which we find Luke with Paul at Philippi (compare Acts xvii. 1 with xx. 6), Luke may have traveled into Palestine and the neighboring regions for the purpose of collecting the information which he has incorporated in this Gospel. Others think that this was done during the two years of Paul's detention at Caesarea, Acts xxiv. 27. The date of its composition was probably somewhere between A. D. 50 and 58.

Luke's immediate object in writing his Gospel was the instruction of his friend Theophilus, see ch. i. 3, but he evidently designed it for permanent and universal use. Tracing our Lord's genealogy up to the common head of the whole human race, he represents him as the Saviour of man making no distinction between Jew and Gentile. He brings out in the fullest manner all that connects the Son of God most closely with our nature. Hence, without obscuring our Lord's divine dignity and glory, the evangelist relates his birth, his growth in childhood, his human ancestry, his constant prayerfulness, his support on various occasions by angels' help, and his quick and tender sympathy with human feelings, and especially sorrows. Upon these subjects Luke dwells with pathos which gives to the incidents and parables he relates a most powerful hold upon the heart; see particularly ch. ii. 40-52; iv. 16-22; vii. 11-17; x. 30-37; xv.; xvi. 19-31; xxiv. 13-32. So that this Gospel, more than any other portion of the Bible, enables us to see and feel how truly and thoroughly our condescending Saviour identified himself with us in nature and interests.

The Gospel of Luke possesses, in some respects, more of historical completeness than any of the others. He begins with the announcement of the forerunner's birth, and concludes with our Lord's ascension; he notes the connection of the leading events he relates with incidents of contemporary history, and he supplies many important additional facts which give to his Gospel a peculiar value. He relates, with remarkable clearness, the observations and occasional sayings of our Lord with the incidents which gave rise to them, and the replies of those who were present. But his narrative differs greatly as to copiousness in different parts according to the sources from which he drew his information. Sometimes he gives only a brief compendium; at others he is most minute and circumstantial in detail, and as graphic in description as Mark.

The contents of his Gospel may be thus divided—

The birth and early life of Jesus, ch. i., ii.

His baptism, genealogy and temptation, ch. iii. 1-iv. 13.

His ministry in Galilee, ch. iv. 14-ix. 50.

His last journey from Galilee, ending with his arrival in Jerusalem, ch. ix. 51-xix. 27.

His entrance there, and all that followed, down to his crucifixion, ch. xix. 28-xxiii.

His resurrection and its results, ch. xxiv.

LUKEWARM (leuk-warm), Rev. iii. 16. The state intended by this word is not a transitional but a final, state. The "cold" are those apart from gospel influence; the "hot" are earnest believers. But the "lukewarm" are men to whom the gracious call had come and made no impression, to whom the privileges vouchsafed had been useless. From the cold, when the voice of mercy reaches them, converts might be hoped. The "lukewarm," gospel-hardened, were wellnigh hopeless.

LUMINUM DIES (loo'me-num de'ayz). The Epiphany has been called by this name. In the East the Epiphany is one of the three solemn times of baptism. It has been regarded as the anniversary of our Lord's baptism, and of the miracle of Cana of Galilee. Baptism was frequently called "lux," or light, and hence the term luminum dies, "day of light."

LUMLEY (lum'le), MARMADUKE, who was a scion of the noble family of Lumley Castle, near Durham, rose to be bishop of Carlisle in the fifteenth century. He was one of the most eminent men of his day in England for piety and great moral worth. In the rude state of society which then existed, when raids from Scotland over the border into England were so common, he suffered so much from the Scots that his means were almost exhausted. He had been preceded in the see by Barrow, a distinguished chancellor of Oxford University, and his successor was Close, equally eminent as the architect of the magnificent chapel at King's College, Cambridge.

LUNATIC (loo'na-tik), Matt. iv. 24; xvii. 15. See DEMONIAC.

LUNDY (lun'de), BENJAMIN, who was born in New Jersey, in 1789, became deeply interested in the negro race, in consequence of a residence at Wheeling, Virginia, where he had an opportunity of studying their character and examining their state. In 1815 he organized the "Union Humane Society." He next commenced a journal, traveled and lectured through North Carolina. He next began a journal in Baltimore, sailed to Hayti to provide for the well-being of emancipated negroes. He was obliged to leave Baltimore, and after severe treatment in Philadelphia, where his property was burned by a mob in 1838, he removed to Lowell, in La Salle county, Illinois, where he issued his paper until his death, in 1839.

LUPETINO (lu-pe-te'no), FRA BALDO, an Italian martyr, was of a noble family. He suffered for his attachment to and open proclamation of the truth in the sixteenth century. He was born at Albano, and labored through the Venetian territory. He had entered the Franciscan order; and having become practically acquainted with monastic life, he used all his influence to dissuade men from any connection with conventual orders when he came to the knowledge of the truth. He became a powerful preacher, and produced a great effect on the populace; but he was seized by the inquisitor and the papal legate and thrown into prison, where for twenty years he bore a faithful testimony to the truth. "At last," to use the language of McCrie, "this pious man, whom neither threatenings nor promises could move, sealed his doctrine by an undaunted martyrdom, and exchanged the filth and protracteh tortures of a prison for a watery grave."

LUPUS (loo'pus), HUGH, who was earl of Chester, is acknowledged to be the founder of the cathedral of Chester. Chester held an important place among the Roman stations in Britain. It is reported by Ormerod, in his "History of Cheshire," that Wulpherus, king of the Mercians, who flourished about A. D. 600, built a house here for his daughter Werburgh, where she was veiled, and where with other ladies she spent a religious life. In the sixth year of William Rufus, Earl Hugh Lupus began the foundation of a new monastery, and he even induced Anselm of Bec to visit England and aid in furthering the work. Anselm appointed Richard of Bec as the first abbot, and so great was the zeal of Earl Hugh that he caused himself to be admitted as a monk. His son Richard, who succeeded to the earldom, confirmed all his father's grants, and the house thus established grew in wealth and architectural importance until the thirtieth year of Henry VIII., when it and the other great religious houses went to wreck, and the abbot surrendered it to the king. Six new bishoprics being appointed, the conventual church was made a cathedral and the abbey buildings were converted into a palace for the bishop. Such is the origin of the see of Chester.

The cathedral does not take rank with York,

Markham and others. Among the latest were Blomfield and Sumner, who had respectively distinguished themselves in Trinity College and King's College, Cambridge, before their elevation to the see. The dimensions of the cathedral are as follows: Length from east to west, three hundred and fifty feet; nave, one hundred and seventy-five; choir, one hundred; Lady Chapel, sixty; transept from north to south, one hundred and eighty; breadth of nave, choir and aisles, seventy-four and a half feet; south wing of transept, eighty feet square; height of nave and choir, DIVIDING THE LAND BY LOT.—See LOT AND JOSHUA.

Winchester, Lincoln, Salisbury or Canterbury, nevertheless there are several parts of it, such as the west entrance, which are singularly beautiful. The door is a Tudor arch enclosed within a square head; the spandrils are filled in with rich foliations. Above the entrance is the great west window of the nave, deeply and richly recessed; it is of eight lights with elaborate tracery, of some breadth just below the spring of the arch, and above this some simple tracery in the latest pointed style. The south transept is nearly as long as the nave, and it is lofty, having aisles on both sides. Its central tower, though of only one story above the ridge, is of a fair height, and it is extremely fine and imposing. Chester has generally been favored by men of great learning and moral worth—such as Bird, Morton, Wilkins, Cartwright, seventy-eight; tower, one hundred and twenty-seven; Lady Chapel, thirty-three; north wing of transept, thirty-nine feet broad. The sandstone used in the structure is of a friable character, and it has yielded to the effect of the weather to such an extent that many parts of the edifice require extensive restoration.

LUPUS, SERVATUS, a French abbot, was born about 805. After receiving a learned education, he embraced the ecclesiastical life in the abbey of Ferrieres. In 828 he went to the abbey of Fulda, in Germany, where he studied the Scriptures under the celebrated Rabanus. In 844 he assisted at the Council of Verneuil, and was selected to draw up the canons of the council. He also assisted at other assemblies of the French bishops, particularly at the Council of Soissons, in 853. Charles the Bald commissioned him to assist in the reformation of all the monasteries in France. The time of his death is uncertain. Besides his "Letters," which throw considerable light on the period in which he lived, he wrote "A Book of the Three Questions," relating to free-will, predestination and redemption, in which he takes the side of Gottschalk against John Scotus, Erigena, Hinemar and Maurus, holding the necessity of grace being imparted in order to good impulses.

LUPUS (loo'pus), SAINT. There are several persons known in the Romish Church by the name "Saint Lupus." The most eminent of them was born in the beginning of the fifth century at Toul. He was married to the sister of Hilarius of Arles, but after seven years of conjugal life he deserted his wife and family to unite with Honoratus in establishing the celebrated convent at Lerins, off the coast of Provence, near Antibes. He was chosen bishop of Troyes in 426, and he took part with Germain of Auxerre, in a council in Brittany to oppose the Pelagian heresy. He was held in great esteem by his contemporaries. Two of his works are known. One of them is a letter to Apollinarius, and the other contains replies to the bishop of Angers on canonical matters. In this latter it is stated that there is no general rule about marriage among the clergy, that at Autun and Troyes deacons are ordained without any objection, although they are married. Persons ordained when single are not allowed to marry, and priests are not permitted to marry a second time. Lupus is usually reported to have died A. D. 479.

LUSTRATION (lus-tra'sh'n), a purification by washing or sprinkling with water. Among the Greeks it followed the commission of some crime, which it was to expiate. With the Romans it was simply an act to win the favor of the gods, as on fields after the crops were sown and on armies before the beginning of a campaign. A general lustration of the Roman people was held at the end of every period of five years, when a sacrifice was offered up. Hence the word lustrum, as signifying the time between two such days of purification, came to be used for the exact space of five years.

LUTHER (loo'ther), MARTIN, the great Reformer, was born in 1483, at Eisleben, in Lower Saxony. His father was a poor miner, and soon after his son Martin's birth, settled at Mansfield. At the age of fourteen, he was sent to the school of Magdeburg, from which he removed to Eisenach, and thence to the university of Erfurt, where, in 1503, he received his first degree; and two years later, having obtained the degree of doctor of philosophy, he delivered lectures on the physics and ethics of Aristotle. He was destined by his father for the legal profession; but his early religious education induced him to devote himself to the monastic life, and he entered the monastery of the Augustines in 1505. During his residence in the monastery he studied with great enthusiasm the writings of St. Augustin, and passed through severe mental conflicts, seeking vainly guidance or consolation. He had entered the convent with an intense desire to find mental peace, as he was deeply exercised about the salvation of his soul. Accordingly, having no light to guide him except the usages around him, he began a course of exercises from which he expected to derive the repose which he desired. "I chose for myself," said he, "twenty-one saints, read mass every day, calling on three of them each day, so as to complete the circuit every week; especially did I invoke the holy Virgin, as her womanly heart was more easily touched, that she might appease her Son. I verily thought that by invoking three saints daily, and by letting my body waste away with fastings and watchings, I should satisfy the law and shield my conscience against the goad; but it all availed me nothing; the further I went on in this way, the more I was terrified, so that I should have given over in despair had not Christ graciously regarded me, and enlightened me with the light of the gospel." He gained some light, by the aid of a brother, who drew his attention to the fact that in the creed is the clause, "I believe in the remission of sins;" and thus he was directed to look away from his own performances for forgiveness. He was led to meditate on the expression the "righteousness of God," and in time he saw that the gospel declares the fact that the righteousness of the Saviour which is provided for sinners is held forth as the ground of their confidence, and he began to understand the meaning of the expression "the just shall live by faith," a passage which he afterward declared was to him "the true door of Paradise." In 1507 he was ordained priest, and in 1508 he was made professor of philosophy in the new university of Wittenberg. In this sphere of action his powerful mind soon showed itself; he threw off the fetters of the scholastic philosophy, asserted the rights of reason and attracted a large number of disciples. He was called by the senate to preach, and it was with very great reluctance and timidity that he made his first attempts in the pulpit. But it was not long before the conviction began to be uttered that he was the man to reform the Church. In 1510 he visited the court of Pope Leo X., at Rome, a journey which revealed to him the irreligion and corruption of the clergy and destroyed his reverence for the sanctity of the pope. After his return, in 1512, he was made doctor in theology. His profound learning, his intimate acquaintance with the Bible, together with the fame of his eloquence, soon made Luther known to the principal scholars, and esteemed as a powerful advocate of the new light which was breaking upon the world. Great, therefore, was the attention excited by his ninety-five propositions affixed to the church of Wittenberg Castle, October 31, 1517, and intended to put an end to the sale of indulgences by the Dominican Tetzel. They were condemned as heretical and burnt; but neither menaces nor persuasions could induce him to recant, and he maintained the invalidity of indulgences and denied the papal supremacy. In 1518 Luther had a controversy with Dr. Eck, and the same year met the cardinal-legate Cajetan at Augsburg. In 1520 Luther and his friends were excommunicated, and his writings burnt at Rome, Cologne and Louvain. Indignant at this open act of hostility, Luther burned the bull of excommunication and the papal decretals. Being called upon by many of the German nobility to defend the new doctrine, he presented himself at the Diet of Worms, April, 1521, before the emperor and a vast assemblage of the princes and prelates of Germany. He there made an elaborate defence, and concluded it with these words: "Let me, then, be refuted and convinced by the testimony of the Scriptures or by the clearest arguments, otherwise I cannot and will not recant, for it is neither safe nor expedient to act against conscience. Here I take my stand; I can do no otherwise, so help me God! Amen." It was in 1521 that the papal bull was fulminated by which he was excommunicated, and it is important in this connection to note the language of Dr. Manning, a cardinal of the Church: "The just causes of complaint which made Luther first address the bishops, his steady appeals through every gradation of ecclesiastical order to the award of a general council, and, on the other, the violent and corrupt administration of Leo X., ending in an excommunication of a man whose cause was still unheard, seem effectually to clear both him and those who, for his sake, were driven from the unity of the Church from the guilt of schism." He left Worms, in fact, a conqueror; but it was so manifest that his enemies were determined upon his destruction that the elector of Saxony conveyed him to the castle of Wartburg to save his life. In this "Patum," as he called it, Luther remained ten months, spending his days in laborious studies and in carrying on the fight of faith by numerous writings, and then returned to Wittenberg, where he published a sharp reply to Henry VIII., who had written a book against him on the seven sacraments. Luther also printed, in 1522, a translation of the New Testament, which greatly alarmed the Romanists, and severe edicts were issued against the reading of it by the princes of that communion. In 1525 he married Catherine de Bora, who had been a nun, and by whom he had three sons. In 1529 the emperor assembled another diet at Spire, to check the progress of the new opinions; and here it was that the name of "Protestants" first arose, protest being made on the part of the electoral princes, who were for the Reformation, against the rigorous impositions brought forward in this assembly. After this, the protesting princes determined to have a common confession of faith drawn up, which was accordingly prepared by Melancthon, and being presented at the diet of Augsburg, in 1530, was called "The Confession of Augsburg." In 1534 Luther's translation of the whole Bible was published; and the same year he printed a book against the service of the mass. At length, worn out, more by labor than by age, this brave man died at his native place, February 18, 1546, having lived to see that his doctrines had taken such deep root that no earthly power could eradicate them. Luther's works are very numerous.

LUTHERAN CHURCH. This Church occupies a larger area, embraces a larger population and includes a larger number of communicants than any other Protestant communion. It is the established Church in Denmark, Norway, Sweden and in Saxony; also in Livonia, Esthonia and many parts of the German empire. There are likewise Lutheran churches in Holland, Courland, Russia, Hungary, the Danish West India Islands and many other parts of the world, especially France, England and the United States. Their roll of communicants comprises from thirty to forty millions of souls. In the United States the Lutheran Church stands fourth, the Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians alone exceeding it in numbers.

The organic name of the Lutheran Church in its native land is the Evangelical Church, but it is far better known by the popular designation derived from its great founder. The personal character, the labors and the successful Reformation wrought out by him have made the name of Luther an honored household word in all the families of the true Church of God scattered throughout the world, and the Church founded by him has no cause to be ashamed to be known by his illustrious name. The history of Luther and the Lutherans is intimately connected with almost all the transactions in Germany and the northern kingdoms of Europe in the sixteenth century. They have been a hundred times detailed by different historians, civil and ecclesiastical, and were it necessary, which it is not, it would be impossible to give more than the briefest sketch of them here.

The debt which the Reformed or Protestant Churches owe to Luther may be inferred from the fact that he reduced the number of sacraments to two—viz., baptism and the eucharist—proved the mass to be no sacrifice, exploded the adoration of the host, auricular confession, meritorious works, indulgences, purgatory, the worship of images, transubstantiation, etc., which had been introduced in the corrupt times of the Romish Church. He also opposed the fastings of the Romish Church, monastical vows; the celibacy of the clergy, etc.

The Lutheran Church, as a Reformed or Protestant body, may be said to date from 1521, the year when Martin Luther was excommunicated from the Papal Church, though it was not really organized as a distinct body till 1530, and did not obtain by treaty full exercise of religion till the treaty of Passau, in 1552. Three years later it was guaranteed independence of the pope by the religious peace of Augsburg. It was in 1530 that the great standard and exponent of the doctrines of the Lutherans, known as the Augsburg Confession, was laid before the Diet of Augsburg. That celebrated symbol differs from other Protestant confessions in regard to the nature and character of the Lord's Supper, teaching (Art. X.), "Of the Supper of the Lord we teach that the true body and blood of Jesus Christ is verily present, under the species of bread and wine, in the Supper, and there communicated and received." This view has been incorrectly called "impanation" and "consubstantiation;" Lutherans designate it as the doctrine of the true sacramental presence. On the subject of predestination and election the Augsburg Confession declares that "Christ was a sacrifice for all the sins of men; that all infants are at baptism received into God's favor. It rejects the doctrine that those who have once been justified cannot leave the Holy Spirit; teaches that the cause of sin is solely the will of the evil, that the Holy Spirit is given through the word and sacraments, as instruments, and that the objective character of the word and sacraments is not determined by the personal worthiness or faith of the recipient, though their benefits are conferred only on faith. The Formula of Concord states more explicitly the doctrine of election. It distinguishes between foreknowledge and election. Election pertains only to God's children, and is the cause of their salvation, for it provides the way of salvation. In a word, it embraces the election or choice of the end and all the means. All salvation rests on the election or choice of God, taken in this wide sense. The promises of the gospel are universal, pertaining to all men; its rejection by some is not caused by God's prescience or election, but by their own will. In other words, they hold to a mediated instead of an absolute election unto life; and in this they differ from Calvinists. In other points their doctrinal views are in general harmony with those of other Protestant Churches, both in their positive teachings and in their testimony against the errors and superstitions of the Church of Rome.

Notwithstanding the commanding influence of Luther, differences and strifes upon doctrinal points arose after his death, which led to the adoption of the "Formula of Concord." This formula was not sanctioned by a General Synod, but was ratified by nearly all the German Lutheran States; and all who held offices in schools, churches or universities were required to subscribe it. It was rejected by a few of the German States, mainly for political or personal reasons, but it was eagerly signed by nine thousand Church pastors and teachers. The "Book of Concord," of which it forms the last part, embraces, together with it, the ancient creeds, the unchanged Augsburg Confession, the Apology of Melancthon, the articles of Smalcald and Luther's Catechism. It was signed by fifty-one princes and thirty-five cities, at Dresden, June 25, 1580, the fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Augsburg Confession.

During the early part of the seventeenth century several important secessions from the Lutheran to the German Reformed Church occurred, and some abortive attempts were made to unite the two communions. Maurice, landgrave of Hesse, and John Sigismund, duke of Brandenburg, were among the seceders, and they established the German Reformed and proscribed the Lutheran Church in their dominions. In consequence of these events several conferences were held about the middle of the century at the suggestion of the king of Poland, the landgrave of Hesse and the dukes of Brandenburg, between the Lutheran and German Reformed divines, but with no other result than the conviction of the impossibility of the union of the two Churches. At this period, according to the testimony of the impartial Mosheim, "there was much worldliness and bigotry among the higher clergy, and among the lower much ignorance and incapacity." Toward the close of the century a school of jurists, led by Christian Thomasius, successfully advocated a theory of the supremacy of the State over the Church, the effect of which was to diminish the influence and lower the position of the clergy, and to make them largely officials and vassals of the civil government. The condition of the Lutheran Church led to the celebrated "Pietist" movement in 1670. See PIETISTS, at the close of this article.

The eighteenth century opened in the Lutheran Church with the warm disputes between the Pietists and their opponents, and with severe persecutions from the papal power. From the middle of the eighteenth until the early part of the nineteenth century the Lutheran Church fell under the baneful influence of rationalism in its various forms. This deplorable "eclipse of faith" continued to darken the Church until about fifty years ago, when a reaction took place in favor of the old Lutheran faith. Since that period the Lutheran Church has revived in many parts of Germany, and has produced many illustrious theologians who are loyal to the old Lutheran standards, and a vast number of churches, under this new impulse, have exhibited a great increase of spiritual life and love and zeal.

In the details of Church government, the Lutherans differ very considerably in the various countries, though they are united on its fundamental principles. In those countries where the Lutheran is the established Church, the head of the State is at the same time the visible ruler of the Church; but all civil rulers of the Lutheran persuasion are restrained by the fundamental principles of the doctrine they profess from any attempts to change or destroy the established rule of faith and life, as defined in the confessions. The councils or societies appointed by the sovereign to watch over the interests of the Church and direct and govern its affairs are composed of persons versed in the knowledge both of civil and of ecclesiastical law, and according to a very ancient designation, are called consistories.

The internal administration of the Lutheran Church seems to be, but if its principles are understood really is not, somewhat anomalous. It has virtual bishops, usually under the title of superintendents, and has retained diocesan episcopacy in Denmark, Norway and Sweden, but holds to the parity of ministers, and allows a certain subordination in rank and privileges only on the ground of human right. Where the civil government is of a republican form, the ministers and lay delegates together form a body for the purpose of governing the Church and examining and ordaining ministers. There is but one Lutheran archbishop, the primate of Sweden, but his is little more than a civil title.

Members of the Lutheran Church settled in this country at an early date. The results of the Synod of Dort in Holland were felt by many non-Calvinists, and a desire began to prevail that by a change of residence greater religious freedom might be secured. Accordingly, when settlers from Holland began to build up New Amsterdam, several Lutherans left their homes for the New World, but they were unable to procure the services of a pastor. In 1638 a number of Swedish Lutherans, who had settled on the banks of the Delaware, secured a pastor, Reorus Torkillus, who labored in the district now covered by the city of Wilmington. John Campanius, his successor, enjoys the honor of having been the first minister to provide a Christian literature in the Indian language, as he prepared an edition of Luther's Smaller Catechism for the red man. In the mean time, Lutherans from Germany had been arriving from year to year; and at length, in 1669, they were favored by the settlement of a pastor, Jacob Fabricius, who was able to preach to them in their own tongue. In consequence of his great zeal, a Lutheran church was secured in 1671, but the jealousy of the Dutch soon deprived the members of the use of the building. In the beginning of the eighteenth century great numbers of Lutherans settled in New York, Pennsylvania and in South Carolina, being driven from their homes by persecution; and by the year 1717 their numbers had so increased that they excited the apprehensions of the governor of Pennsylvania, who drew the attention of the council to their condition. In 1734 a colony was established in Georgia, and they were favored by the pastoral services of Martin Bolzius and Israel Christian Gronau; and thus in different parts of this country the foundations of the Lutheran Church were extended and secured.

The year 1742 is a memorable period in the history of the Lutheran Church in America, as it dates its organization from that time. When H. M. Muhlenberg arrived in the country, he found a sad absence of order, and he forthwith addressed himself to the work of providing pastors and churches, and of attracting adequate aid from the fatherland, so as to secure effective church order. His labors were greatly blessed, and in 1748 he saw a synod established, and John Nicholas Kurtz was ordained by this body. The cause of theological education was taken up by Drs. Helmuth and Schmitt, who began a private seminary in 1765; and this led in 1787 to the establishment of Franklin College, which now stands in the front rank of our educational institutions. Thus the Lutheran Church was consolidated, and it rapidly spread until it has attained the high position which it holds among the Christian denominations of the land.

Among American Lutherans there are four judicatories, viz.: 1. The church council, consisting of the pastor and officers of the congregation. 2. The district or special conference. 3. The synods. 4. Several general bodies, though some of the synods are independent. The synods, local or general, are composed of ministers and an equal number of laymen, chosen as deputies by their respective congregations. The ministerium is a title sometimes given to the ministers of a particular synod, who in some cases meet separately, especially for examining, licensing and ordaining ministers, etc.

The Lutherans in all countries have liturgies which are essentially the same, but which differ in minor points. They are at liberty to use extempore prayer if they choose. Catechisms are provided from which pastors and schoolmasters are required to teach the young. The catechism of Luther is almost universally retained in the Church. They also retain the principal festivals of the ecclesiastical year—those which commemorate the nativity, the death, the resurrection and the ascension of the Saviour—and some others. Confirmation is practiced, by which they intend a solemn renewal or ratification of their baptismal vows, at which time the pastor of the congregation imposes his hands on the confirmed, accompanied by prayer. Confession and absolution in a very simple form are also practiced. After a lecture preparatory to the communion, some questions are put to the congregation, which are answered by the affirmative. The congregation then kneels and unite in a confession of sins. The minister then pronounces an absolution to all the true penitent.

The Lutherans have probably a greater number of universities under their direction than any other religious body, unless it be the Roman Catholics. They are also very largely engaged in Bible circulation, missionary operations, foreign and domestic, the establishment of orphan homes and hospitals, and in other benevolent operations.

PIETISTS.—This was the name applied to the members of the Lutheran Church who followed Dr. Philip James Spener in his movement to reform the Church when, as noticed in the foregoing article, it had partially fallen from the pure evangelical teaching and living of its earlier life. Neither Spener nor his followers ever separated from the Church or sought to create a new sect. The movement began with devotional meetings, which were called "colleges of piety," whence sprang the name applied to those engaged in them. These meetings were a sort of combination of the Bible class and the prayer-meeting. Dr. Spener also published a book called "pious desires," which helped his effort materially. His first aim was to make the ministry more Scriptural in their living and preaching, but religious persons of every class and rank were encouraged to meet for the purpose of reading the Scriptures, singing and prayer and the exposition of the Scriptures, not in a dry and critical way, but in a strain of practical and experimental piety, whereby they mutually edified each other.

This work began about 1670. In 1691 Dr. Spener removed from Dresden to Berlin, where he propagated the same principles, which widely spread and were well supported in many parts of Germany by Professor Francke and others. This raised a considerable controversy, in which the Pietists were charged with many errors. They taught that without divine help no man can enter into the spirit of them; no man can relish or enjoy those parts which relate to the divine life and the experience of the Christian; for so saith St. Paul, "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." In many cases it was not the doctrine of the Pietists as put in words which gave offence, but the narrow, one-sided way in which it was urged that they actually applied it. They claimed to hold inflexibly to the doctrine of the Lutheran Church, only desiring that it might be lived as well as taught. Another thing which gave great offence was that they renounced the vain amusements of the world. Thus, dancing, pantomimes, public sports, theatrical diversion, the reading of humorous and comical books, with several other kinds of pleasure and entertainments were prohibited by the Pietists as unlawful and unseemly, and, therefore, by no means of an inferior nature. But the most offensive of all their errors, real or supposed, was "that no person that was not himself a model of piety and divine love was qualified to be a public teacher of piety or a guide to others in the way of salvation." This was so offensive to some of the clergy of the Lutheran Church that they raised the cry of heresy and charged them with making void the efficacy of the divine word by confounding the person and character of the preacher with the divine validity of the word. The founding of the university of Halle, in 1694, by the Pietists, gave a new impulse to the movement and greatly increased their numbers. The movement continued through a large part of the following century.

LUTZ, SAMUEL, was born in 1674 at Biglen, where his father was pastor. He applied himself to scientific studies, but soon turned to theology, and as mysticism had begun to spread in Switzerland he adopted the views of those who affected an emotional piety and the experience of a high spiritual life. In 1703 he settled at Yverden as pastor, where he remained for twenty-three years. The fact that he was charged with pietism prevented his promotion, and not until 1726 did he succeed in obtaining a wider sphere, when he removed to Amfoldingen. He was transferred in 1738 to Diesbach, where he died in 1750.

LUZ, the ancient name of BETHEL, also of a town built in the land of the Hittites by the man who betrayed the original city into the hand of the Israelites, Jud. i. 26. But its precise locality and subsequent history are quite unknown.

LUZZATTO (luz'zat-to), MOSE CHAJIM, who was born in 1707 at Padua, became one of the most famous mystics of his day among the Jewish teachers. He was so far led astray by his meditations on the Cabala that he at length persuaded himself that he was actually the Messiah. He fled from Italy to Holland in consequence of being excommunicated, and in 1744 he went to the East. His multitudinous works have been left unedited. He died at Safet in 1747, and was buried at Tiberias.

LUZZATTO, SAMUEL DAVID, who was descended from a celebrated Jewish ancestry, was born in 1800 at Trieste. He early distinguished himself as a writer on Jewish history and literature, especially in searching out the facts and incidents of the sad persecutions endured by the Jews in France and Spain during the Middle Ages. Perhaps his most important work was his dialogues on the Cabala, in which he points out the folly of the Cabala. He shows that the Zohar originated in the thirteenth century, the vowel points in the fifth, and the accents are not earlier than the sixth. He compiled a Hebrew grammar, a version of Job and commentaries on the Pentateuch and Isaiah. He died in 1865.

LYBRAND (ly'bran), JOSEPH, who was born in 1793 in Philadelphia, became eminent in the Methodist Episcopal Church as a powerful preacher and a man of deep piety. In 1811 he entered the Philadelphia Conference, became presiding elder of the Philadelphia district, and continued to labor until 1843. He was eminently fitted for the pulpit; and so anxious was he to make the gospel known by his ministrations that he could not be induced to accept any situation which would have interfered with his constant preaching, and so aiming directly at the salvation of souls. He died in 1845.

LYCAONIA (ly-ka'o-ne-a), a province of Asia Minor, having Cappadocia on the east, Galatia on the north, Phrygia on the west and Isauria and Cilicia on the south. It extends in length about twenty geographical miles from east to west, and about thirteen in breadth. It was an undulating plain, involved among mountains, which were noted for the concourse of wild asses. The soil was so strongly impregnated with salt that few of the brooks supplied drinkable water, so that good water was sold for money. But sheep thrive on the pasturage and were reared with great advantage. It was a Roman province when visited by Paul, Acts xiv. 6, and its chief towns were Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, of which the first was the capital. "The speech of Lycaonia," Acts xiv. 11, is supposed by some to have been the ancient Assyrian language, also spoken by the Cappadocians; but it is more usually conceived to have been a corrupt Greek, intermingled with many Syriac words.

LYCH-GATE (lik), or LICH-GATE (lik), a gate at the entrance of the churchyard where the body was placed before burial. These are of frequent occurrence in ancient churchyards, and may be still be seen in rural parishes in England.

LYCHNOSCOPE (lik'nos-kope), a narrow window near the ground, very frequently found at the south-west end of a chancel, and sometimes, though seldom, in other parts of the church. It has been supposed that lychnoscopes were confessionals; and their use as ventilators has also been suggested.

LYCIA (lis'e-a), a province of Asia Minor, in the south-west, having Pamphylia on the east, Caria on the west, Phrygia on the north and the sea on the south. Its two chief towns, Patara and Myra, were both, though on different occasions, visited by Paul, Acts xxi. 1; xxvii. 5. The people were early given to seafaring; and having also a fertile soil, they attained to considerable wealth and prosperity. Many architectural remains of the district and coins have been recovered and illustrated by travelers. The people maintained long their independence; they successfully resisted Croesus of Lydia, and under the Persian rule were allowed to retain their own kings as satraps. Even to the time of the emperor Claudius, Lycia contrived to secure for itself the privileges of a free state; but thenceforth it was reduced to the ordinary condition of a Roman province, and shared in the general fortunes of that part of the empire.

LYDDA (lid'da), the Greek name of the town known in Old Testament history as Lod, by the Romans called Diospolis. Here Peter preached and healed Eneas of his palsy; after which multitudes, both in Lydda and the neighborhood, were converted to the faith, Acts ix. 32-38. Lydd (for that is its modern name) is now a flourishing village, with about two thousand inhabitants, embosomed in rich orchards of olive, fig, pomegranate, mulberry, sycamore and other trees, and surrounded by a very fertile country. Here it is said Saint George was born and buried, and here are the remains of a noble church dedicated to him. Lydda, the district doubtless, is mentioned,

1 Macc. xi. 34, as one of the three governments added to Judæa.

LYDIA (lid'e-a), a woman of Thyatira who, at the time of Paul's first visit to Macedonia, was resident in Philippi as a seller of purple—that is, probably, of purple-dyed cloth. She became a convert to the faith preached by the apostle, and received him into her house, herself the first member of a church which soon sprung into great vigor and was distinguished for its hearty and devoted zeal in the cause of the gospel, Acts xvi. 14–40.

LYDIA. 1. The district in Asia Minor inhabited by the offspring of the Sethite Lud. It occurs only once in the English Bible, Ezek. xxx. 5, and then as the incorrect equivalent of Ludim. The province had Mysia on the north, Phrygia on in the Armenian controversy. He forwarded the works of Koornhert and Arnold Cornelius to Arminius, with a desire that he would refute them, but they led Arminius to change his own views. Lydius was born at Lubeck in 1539, and he died in 1601.

LYING (li'ing). The precepts of Scripture pointedly forbid lying and deception, Lev. xix. 11; Eph. iv. 25; Col. iii. 9. A fearful judgment was inflicted on Gehazi, 2 Ki. v. 25–27, and on Ananias and Sapphira for their false dealing, Acts v. 1–11. But it is remarkable that many even of the holier persons mentioned in Scripture fell into this sin. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, are familiar examples, Gen. xii. 11–13; xxvii. 18, 24; 1 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 8. Falsehood is a besetting vice of Oriental nations, but it is abominable, whether spoken or acted, in the eyes of Him who will not admit a liar into his pure kingdom.

LYON (li'on), JOHN C., who was born in 1802, in Wurtemberg, and who emigrated to the United States in 1817, entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and served in the districts in and around Baltimore, through Maryland, Philadelphia and New York, until he was superannuated, in 1862. He was mighty in the pulpit, eminently pious and devoted, and in 1868 he closed a life of unusual devotedness and zeal in the work of the Lord.

LYDIUS (lid'e-us), JOHANNES, was one of the early ministers of the Reformed (Dutch) church in America. He emigrated from Holland, where he had been educated, and settled, in 1702, at Schenectady and Albany. He gave great attention to the wants of the Indians, among whom he labored as far as his other duties permitted, and he had a number of them brought into the membership of his church. He was a diligent pastor, a pious man, and greatly beloved by the members and ministers of other churches. He died in 1710.

LYDIUS, MARTIN, who was eminent as a Dutch theologian, was settled in Amsterdam in 1579, which he left for a chair in the university at Franeker in 1585. He took a prominent part LYRA (li'rah), NICHOLAS DE, or, when Latinized, LYRANUS, a celebrated commentator and forerunner of the Reformation, was born about 1270, of Jewish parents, at Lyre, a small town in Normandy, in the diocese of Eurecca, from which he took his surname. Having embraced Christianity when young, he entered the order of the Franciscans at Verneuil in 1291, whence he was sent to the Franciscan convent at Paris to complete his studies. Here he applied himself with great diligence and success to his studies, was admitted to the degree of doctor, and became a most distinguished lecturer on the Bible. His great learning, refined taste and eminent worth, raised him to the principal offices of his order, and secured him the friendship of the most illustrious persons of his age. He died at Paris, October 23, 1340. His principal work is a "Treatise in Defence of Christianity," which is a work of value, and had quite a demand in its day.

LYSANIAS (li-sa'ne-as), tetrarch of Abilene in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, when John the Baptist entered on his public ministry, Luke iii. 1. In later times some have attempted to throw doubt on the statement, but without any valid grounds. See ABILENE.

LYSCYNSKI (lys-cyn'ski), CASIMIR, who was descended from a family of rank in Lithuania, and educated at Wilna in the Jesuits' college, became notorious in his early life for his skepticism. He was made a judge at Brzeski, but having written a work in which he displayed his atheistical views, he was arrested and held to be an outlaw, because he wrote against the existence of God, the Author and Fountain of all law. He was tried, and his explanations were deemed to be unsatisfactory; and though he affirmed his desire to die in the communion of the Church in which he had been educated, he was sentenced to be burned, and his books and dwelling also to be destroyed by fire. The sentence was altered so far that he was beheaded before his body was committed to the flames. His execution took place in 1689.

LYSIAS CLAUDIAS (lys'si-as klau'di-us), a Roman captain or chiliarch who at the time of Paul's last visit to Jerusalem happened to be in charge of the troops which were stationed in the citadel. He was the means of rescuing the apostle from the fury of the crowd, and of afterward saving his life from a cunningly devised stratagem that was led by a company of Jewish zealots, Acts xxi. 27–36; xxiii. Nothing more is heard of him; but from the prompt and impartial manner in which he conducted himself, as between Paul and his accusers, he appears to have been a person of prudence and sagacity.

LYSIAS (lis'i-as), 1 Macc. iii. 32, 33; 2 Macc. x. 11; xi. 1, a nobleman of the Syrian blood royal entrusted with important offices by Antiochus Epiphanes.

LYSIMACHUS (li-sim'a-kus). 1. Rest of Esth. xi., the son of Ptolemæus of Jerusalem. 2. Brother of Menelaus, 2 Macc. iv. 29, 39.

LYSTRA (lis'tra), a city of Lycaonia, though by some reckoned to other provinces. Here was performed the miraculous cure which induced the people to believe that Paul was Mercury and Barnabas Jupiter. Timothy was probably a native of Lystra, Acts xiv. 6, 8–11; 2 Tim. iii. 11. Lystra seems to have been situated at the foot of the mountain-mass Karadagh, to the south of Iconium. There are some ruins of churches north of this mountain, at a place called Bin-ber-Kilisseh; perhaps this was Lystra.

LYTTLETON (lit't'l-tun), CHARLES, was born at Hagley, in 1714. He was the third son of Sir Thomas Lyttleton of that place. After the usual course of academic and university education he entered the church; and in 1762 he was advanced to the see of Carlisle. He was a man of great learning, and in consequence of the range of his attainments, he was made president of the antiquarian society. He was as eminent for his benevolence, great mildness and generosity as he was distinguished for his acquirements. He died on December 22, 1768, and was buried at Hagley, and at his decease it was observed by all classes who knew him that he never had an enemy.

MAACAH (ma'a-kah), the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur: she was one of David's wives, the mother of Absalom, 2 Sam. iii. 3, and was called also Maachah, 1 Chr. iii. 2.

MAACAH, a district or kingdom of Syria, to the north-east of Palestine, bordering on the territories of the trans-Jordanic tribes, perhaps eastward of Argob, the modern Lejah, 2 Sam. x. 8, termed also Maachah and Syria-maachah, 1 Chr. ix. 6, 7. It is not clear whether any connection subsisted between it and Abelbeth-maachah.

MAACHAH. 1. One of the children of Nahor, Abraham's brother, by his concubine Reumah, Gen. xxii. 24. 2. The father of Achish, king of Gath, 1 Ki. ii. 39, called also Maach, 1 Sam. xxvii. 2. 3. A daughter, perhaps granddaughter, of Absalom, who is sometimes called Abishalom; he was one of Rehoboam's wives, mother of Abijam and grandmother of Asa. It has been thought that Asa's own mother was dead; Maachah therefore still held the dignity of queen-mother, 1 Ki. xv. 2, 10, 13. She is called also Michaiiah, 1 Ki. xiii. 2. 4. A concubine of Caleb, 1 Chr. ii. 48. 5. 1 Chr. iii. 2. See MAACAH. 6. A descendant of Benjamin, wife of Machir, 1 Chr. vii. 15, 16. 7. The wife of Jehiel, father or colonizer of Gibeon, 1 Chr. viii. 29; ix. 35. 8. The father of one of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 43. 9. The father of the ruler of the Simonites in David's time, 1 Chr. xvii. 16.

MAACHAH, 1 Chr. xix. 1, a Syrian kingdom. See MAACAH.

MAACHATHI (ma-a-ka'the), the inhabitants of Maacah, or Maachah, Deut. iii. 14.

MAACHATHITES (ma-a-kath'ites), also inhabitants of Maacah or Maachah, Josh. xii. 5; Sam. xxiii. 34.

MAADAI (ma-a'di), one who had taken a foreign wife, Ezra x. 34.

MAADIAH (ma-a-di'ah), a priest who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, Neh. xii. 17, called also Moadiah, Neh. xii. 17.

MAAI (ma'i), a Levite who took an active part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. xii. 36.

MAANI (ma-a'ni), 1 Esd. ix. 34, Bani, Ezra 29.

MAARATH (ma-a'rath), a town in the mountains of Judah, Josh. xv. 59.

MAASELAH (ma-a-se'yah). 1. A Levite porter appointed to play on the psaltery, 1 Chr. xv. 18, 20. 2. An officer who joined with Jehoiada in placing Joash on the throne of Judah, 2 Chr. xxiii. 1. 3. A ruler under King Uzziah, 1 Chr. xxvi. 11. 4. A son of King Ahaz, 1 Chr. xxviii. 7. 5. The governor of Jerusalem under Josiah, 1 Chr. xxxiv. 8. 6, 7, 8, 9. Four priests who had married foreign wives, Ezra x. 18, 21, 22, 30. 10. The father of one who repaired the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 23. 11. One who, when Ezra read the law, assisted in explaining it, Neh. viii. 4, 7. 12. A person who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 25. 13. A descendant of Judah, Neh. xi. 5. Possibly identical with Asaiah, 1 Chr. ix. 5. 14. A Benjamite, Neh. xi. 7. 15, 16. Two priests that took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. xii. 41, 42. 17. The father of Zephaniah, a priest in King Zedekiah's MABILLON (ma-beel'ong), JEAN, a distinguished French Benedictine monk remarkable for his profound and extensive theological and antiquarian learning, was born in 1632. Educated at Rheims, he was ordained priest at Amiens in 1660, and subsequently moved to St. Denis, from whence in 1664 he went to Paris to assist Lucas d'Achery in the preparation of his "Spicilegium." In 1685 he visited Italy, from whence he brought to France a splendid collection of books and rare manuscripts, of which he published an elaborate account. Mabillon's contributions to theological literature were numerous and important. He edited an edition of the works of St. Bernard and nine volumes of the "Lives of the Saints," and wrote in six books an exhaustive and elaborate work upon ancient records. He was eminent for his piety as well as learning, and regarded by his contemporaries as a liberal-minded ecclesiastic, having maintained in opposition to Rance, the abbot of La Trappe, the importance of secular learning. He died in 1707.

MABNADEBAI (mab-nad'e-bi), Ezra x. 40, margin. This appears in some copies for Machnadebai in the text.

MABON (ma'bon), JOHN SCOTT, who was greatly distinguished in the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in Scotland, in 1784. Very early in life he was brought to this country by his parents; and having graduated at Union College and at the theological seminary at New Brunswick, he was made a tutor in Union College. In 1815 he became rector of the grammar school at Rutgers College, which position he held for ten years; and during part of this time he acted as professor of Hebrew in the theological seminary at New Brunswick. He was famed for the accuracy of his knowledge, for the depth of his views and his keen appreciation of the duties of a public teacher. In all the positions which he filled he was beloved by his pupils, and the large number of ministers who passed through his classes ever felt for him an undying regard. He died in 1849.

(ma-ka're-anz.) This name was given by the Donatists to the members of the Church because an officer of the emperor Constans, named Macarius, had slain some of the Donatists in a dispute. In the ninth century the followers of Macarius, an Irish teacher, were called by this name. He taught that one soul performed the rational functions in all the human race.

MACARIOTES

(mak-ka-re-o'teez), a title given to bishops in the Greek Church. One of the æons was thus named among the Gnostics.

MACARIUS (ma-ka're-us). There were several persons of this name who rose to eminence. 1. The Great, as he has been called, was an Egyptian who lived in the fourth century. He lived as an ascetic in the Libyan desert, and he is credited with having wrought miracles to confound the heathen and convince them of the truth of Christianity.

2. The Alexandrian, was contemporary with the former, was a disciple of St. Anthony, and quite famed as an ascetic and a worker of miracles. He was celebrated for the immense number of monks who sought his advice. According to Mosheim, if due allowance be made for some superstitions of the day, his teachings on practical godliness were really admirable.

3. A patriarch of Antioch, who was banished because of his avowal, at the third Council of Constantinople, of his belief that "Christ's will was that of a god-man."

4. Ireland, of, a famed Irish teacher in France in the ninth century, who held that one soul or intelligence performed all the functions of the human race, a tenet which was afterward held by Averrhoes.

MACAULAY (ma-kaw'le), ZACHARY F.R.S., a zealous co-operator with Mr. Wilberforce and other distinguished philanthropists in the abolition of slavery in the British colonies, to which end he devoted his eminent talents and best energies for upward of forty years. He died May 13, 1838.

MACCABEES (mak'ka-beez), THE BOOKS OF. The two historical books so designated have their name as containing the history of the gallant exploits of the Maccabæan family in behalf of their countrymen the Jews.

The first book comprises a history of events from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes to the death of the high-priest Simon, 175-135 B. C. After an introduction and account of the Maccabæan family to the death of the father Mattathias, the events under the administration of his brother Jonathan, 1 Macc. ix. 23-xii. 53, and thirdly, the establishment of Jewish freedom under Simon, 1 Macc. xiii.-xvi.; this part closes with a notice that, though Simon had fallen by treachery, his perfect information, and the brevity of some parts of the narrative renders it occasionally obscure. Examples of inaccuracy are the statements that Antiochus the Great was taken prisoner by the Romans, 1 Macc. viii. 7, that a single annual magistrate governed the Roman commonwealth, 1 Macc. viii. 16. The tone of the book is simple and natural; the style is easy and unaffected. In a religious point of view it differs widely from such Hebrew annals as the books of Samuel and Kings. The author did not feel himself empowered to describe the divine purposes and interpositions, and in one noteworthy passage, 1 Macc. ix. 27, he acknowledges that the prophetic spirit had ceased among the chosen people.

There is every probability that the First Book of Maccabees was originally written in Hebrew and it must have been the work of a Palestinian Jew. From the closing sentences we may place the date of it either toward the end of the administration of John Hyrcanus, or shortly after his death. We may, therefore, venture to assign it to some point between 110 and 90 B. C. The author of the Greek translation is not known. There are Syriac and old Latin versions closely rendered from the Greek.

The Second Book of Maccabees is very inferior to the First; and it is indeed far less simple and trustworthy.

It commences with two letters purporting to be written by the Jews in Palestine to their Alexandrine brethren, 2 Macc. i. 1-ii. 18. Then follows an abridgment of a work of Maccabæan history, five books, by one Jason of Cyrene, prefaced by an introduction, 2 Macc. ii. 19-32, and closed with a brief epilogue, 2 Macc. xv. 38, 39. The intervening part, 2 Macc. iii. 1-xv. 37 begins with the narrative of an attempt to plunder the temple by Heliodorus under King Seleucus Nicator, and terminates with the death of Nicanor, made governor of Judæa. The period comprised may be reckoned as extending from 176-161 B. C. Nothing certain is known of Jason, the author of the larger work, but it has been conjectured that he lived between 120 and 100 B. C. As little is known of the epitomizer who may have lived between 100 and 50 B. C. The two letters at the beginning were probably prefixed by him to his compilation from another son succeeded to his power and maintained the position he had won.

It would seem that the author drew from written sources, 1 Macc. ix. 22; he has also inserted many source. The original language must have been Greek of an Alexandrine cast.

The history of this second book is a more full account of a part of the time comprised in the first; but the statements do not always agree. Moreover, there are demonstrable inaccuracies and contradictions in the book itself. Thus the account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes in 2 Macc. i. 13-16 is quite different from that in 2 Macc. ix. This book, too, is peculiar in its religious tone. It contains legends and records of supernatural events. The style is embellished and exaggerated, and the narrative is interspersed with moralizing observations.

MACCABEES, THE FAMILY OF MACCABÆUS. Maccabæus was a surname of Judas, the son of Mattathias, 1 Macc. ii. 4, probably derived from makkabi, a hammer. Hence the line of Maccabæan princes, who, after freeing their country from the Syrian tyranny, governed it for about one hundred and twenty-six years. They were also called the Asmonæans, perhaps from a Hebrew word signifying fat—i. e., nobles or princes, Ps. lxxviii. 31. Mattathias commenced his patriotic course 167 B. C. His sons Judas, Jonathan and Simon carried out their father's purpose. Simon transmitted his power and the pontifical dignity to his son Hyrcanus, whose son and successor, Aristobulus, assumed the title of king. His brother Alexander Jannæus succeeded, after whose death a civil war was waged between his sons Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, the last named of whom was defeated by Pompey, and with Antigonus, his son, the dynasty ended. The last two members of the family were Aristobulus and Mariamne, grandchildren of Aristobulus II.; and with the death of Mariamne the Maccabæan race may be said to be extinguished.

The accompanying table of the Maccabæan or Asmonæan family may be found convenient for reference:

The line of succession in the government is as follows:

- B. C.
- 166 Judas Maccabæus.
- 161 Jonathan.
- 143 Simon. The first year of Jewish freedom was 142 B. C.
- 135 John Hyrcanus.
- 107 Aristobulus.
- 105 Alexander Jannæus.
- 79 Alexandra.
- 70 Hyrcanus II.
- 69 Aristobulus II.
- 63 Hyrcanus II. restored.
- 40 Antigonus.

From Jonathan downward the pontifical as well as the civil dignity was held by all these princes, of course with the exception of Queen Alexandra. The kingly title Aristobulus I. assumed was borne by his successors. The last male of the family was Aristobulus, son of Alexander. He was high-priest, and was drowned when bathing, by Herod's procurement, 35 B. C.

MACCARTY (mak-kar'te), THAD-DEUS, a native of Boston, born in 1721, and a graduate of Harvard University, became famous for the position which he assumed toward the celebrated George Whitefield. He was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Kingston, Massachusetts, in 1742. In 1745, when Whitefield appeared in his neighborhood, Maccarty had a committee appointed to prevent the intrusion of roving exhorters, but his people closed the doors of the church, owing to a false report that nevertheless Whitefield was going to officiate for him at the communion. He retired from Kingston, and settled at Worcester, Massachusetts, where he preached until his death, in 1784. He published several sermons, chiefly bearing on incidents in his ministry.

MAC CRIE (mak-kre'), THOMAS, D.D., a Scottish divine of great eminence and well known as an accurate historian, was born in 1772, and received his education at the university of Edinburgh. In 1806 he separated from the General Associate Synod, and became one of the founders of the Constitutional Associate Presbytery. He was the author of the lives of "Knox," "Melville," and a "History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy in the Sixteenth Century." He died in 1835.

MACEDONIA (ma-se-do'ne-a), a country to the north of Greece proper; its boundaries varied at different times.

After the time of Philip it reached on the east to the Ægean Sea and the frontiers of Thrace; on the north it was separated from Mœsia by a mountain-chain, and similarly from Illyricum on the north-west and west; on the south it bordered on Thessaly and the Ægean. It was perhaps originally peopled by the Chittim or Kittim, Gen. x. 4. It rose to great power under Philip, whose son, Alexander the Great, subdued the chief part of the then known world. His empire is described by Daniel under the emblem of a one-horned goat, Dan.

viii. 5-8, 21, and coins still exist representing Macedonia under this symbol. Its king, Perseus, was conquered 167 B. C. by the Romans under Paulus Æmilius, and the country was at first declared free; but after being divided into four districts, of which Amphipolis, Thessalonica, Pella and Pelagonia were the chief towns, it subsequently, 142 B. C., became a single Roman provincial province till the reign of Tiberias. A change was afterward made; and from the time of Claudius, Macedonia and Achaia comprehended the whole of Greece, Rom. xv. 25; 1 Thess. i. 8. St. Paul (summoned by a remarkable vision, in which a man of the country prayed for help) preached the gospel in Macedonia in his second and third missionary journeys, Silas and Timothy being his companions, Acts xvi. 9; xx. 1-3. Other Macedonian cities besides those above noted are mentioned in the New Testament—Philippi, by the Son, were thus called. This heresy was formally condemned by the second Ecumenical Synod at Constantinople A. D. 381, which enlarged the Nicene Creed, so as to express the belief of Christians that God the Holy Ghost is truly God. The Macedonian heresy had few adherents, and soon ceased. They were also called "Pneumatomachi."

MACEDONIUS (ma-se-do'ne-us), an eminent deacon of the church of Constantinople in the fourth century, was forced upon the church by the emperor Constantius as patriarch of that see. He prevailed on the emperor to persecute those who did not think with him, but his conduct was so atrocious that he was deposed by a council at Constantinople in 359. Irritated by this, he resolved to distract the Church, and broached the heresy respecting the Holy Spirit which has been named after him, and which was condemned in the second Œcumenical Council, 381.

MACHPELAH (mack-pe'lah) comes into notice as the tract that contained the field with the cave which became the burying-ground of Abraham and his family. The cave itself is first called "the cave of Machpelah," and is described as being in the end of Ephron's field, Gen. xxiii. 9. But in the fuller description which is given at the completion of the purchase, the language runs thus: "The field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, which was before Mamre, the field and the cave which was therein," ver. 17. So that, apparently, Machpelah was the larger designation, which included the field with its cave; and not Machpelah as a whole, but merely the portion of it which comprised the field of Ephron, became the property of Abraham. That it lay near to Hebron there can be no doubt, and the building which has so long stood over the reputed cave, is generally understood to have preserved the true tradition. The Mohammedans have guarded it with the most jealous care.

He threw himself with all the ardor of his impulsive nature into the scheme, organized it at home, was consecrated its bishop at the Cape of Good Hope on New Year's day, 1861, and settled at Magomeni between the Shire and Lake Shirwa. From thence the mission commenced its work amid great trials and privations, and in six months there were indications of abundant success, when Bishop Mackenzie, on his way down the Shire to meet his sister, was seized by a fever, and suddenly died, 1862. He was buried beneath a tree in the island where he fell a victim to his eagerness to make known the gospel of Christ.

MACKEY (mak'ke), JAMES LOVE, who was born in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, 1820, succeeded by unwonted zeal in preparing himself for the ministry, and after studying at Princeton, New Jersey, he devoted himself to the work of foreign missions. He sailed in 1849 for Corisco, in Africa, where he founded the Evanga-

MACHNADEBAI (mach-nad'e-ba-i), one who had taken a foreign wife, Ezra x. 40.

MACKEE (mak'ke), C. B., who was born in Pennsylvania, in 1792, became eminent in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church and as a college professor. He was educated at the university of Pennsylvania; and having studied theology, he was licensed to preach in 1819 by the presbytery of Philadelphia, and in 1821 he was ordained. He became professor of languages in Cincinnati College, Ohio, which position he held for eleven years, and in 1835 he removed to Rochester, where he became pastor of a church. He held this position until 1861, when he removed to Washington, District of Columbia, where he died in 1866. The only important work which he published was "A Critical Examination of the Offices of Christ."

MACKENZIE (mac-ken'zie), CHARLES FREDERICK, bishop of the Central African mission of the Church of England, was born at Portmore, in England, in 1825. He was a man of superior mental powers and manly Christian humility. He held an influential position in the university of Cambridge, when he accepted a call from Bishop Colenso to go with him to Natal as archdeacon of Pieter Maritzburg. After a sojourn of four years among the Kaffirs, to whom he earnestly and successfully preached the gospel, he returned to England at the time when it had been resolved to found the Zambesi mission, and he was unanimously selected as the man to be at its head. He threw himself with all the ardor of his impulsive nature into the scheme, organized it at home, was consecrated its bishop at the Cape of Good Hope on New Year's day, 1861, and settled at Magomeni between the Shire and Lake Shirwa. From thence the mission commenced its work amid great trials and privations, and in six months there were indications of abundant success, when Bishop Mackenzie, on his way down the Shire to meet his sister, was seized by a fever, and suddenly died, 1862. He was buried beneath a tree in the island where he fell a victim to his eagerness to make known the gospel of Christ.

MACKIE (mak'kie), JOSIAS, was a native of Donegal county, Ireland. He was among the earliest of the Presbyterian ministers who came to this country, for a notice of his name appears in 1692. He settled at Elizabeth River, in Virginia, and having taken the oath which was then enforced on dissenters, that he believed in certain specific articles, he was permitted to preach. His district included the eastern branch, Tanner's creek and the western branch, and at these places he was laboring in 1696. He seems to have supported himself by his own industry, as he had a farm and store. Tradition states that he was the successor of Francis Makemie, the first Presbyterian minister who ever preached in the American colonies.

MACKLIN (mak'lin), ALEXANDER, D.D. who long held an eminent place in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, was born in 1808, at Lambeg, near Lisburn, in the vicinity of Belfast. He graduated in the Royal College in Belfast, and studied theology in the divinity school of the secession Church in Ireland before the union of that branch of the Church with the Synod of Ulster, thus forming the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. H was licensed in 1830 by the Presbytery of Belfast, ordained in 1831, and immediately afterward he removed to this country, and he was installed as pastor of the Clinton Presbyterian Church, New Jersey, in 1832. He accepted a call of the Scots Presbyterian Church in 1835 to settle in Philadelphia; and from that time until his death, in 1839, he distinguished himself by his great diligence as a pastor, his sedulous efforts to advance the cause of domestic and foreign missions and by his ardent and effective support of all the agencies of the Church. He lived in the affections of his people, who loved him for his faithfulness, his zeal and great diligence in the work of the Lord.

MACKNIGHT (mak-nūt'), JAMES, a learned Scottish divine, was born in 1721, at Irvine, in Argyleshire, and was ordained minister of May-

MACLAY (mak-lay'), ARCHIBALD, D.D., who became first a Presbyterian and subsequently a Baptist minister of great influence, was born in Scotland, in 1778. In 1804 he was designated to the foreign mission in India, but the opposition of the government prevented his going to India. He emigrated to New York in 1805, and organized a church in that city; but in 1808 he changed his relations from the Presbyterian to the Baptist communion; and being followed by many of his people, the Mulberry Street Church, now known as the Tabernacle Church, was formed. He ministered to this church until 1837, when he became agent for the American and Foreign Bible Society. In 1850 he succeeded Dr. Cone as president of the American Bible Union, thus continuing his labors in his own communion, and his influence in this position on both sides of the Atlantic was most

At Auchinsnaugh, near Douglas, the societies under his care met on the 23d of July, where they renewed the Covenants, drew up an expression of their principles and entered into solemn engagements to maintain these principles. Their cause spread. Congregations were gathered, ministers were secured, and in Scotland, in Ireland, as well as in the United States, the Covenanted body continued to grow, notwithstanding the strifes and jarings which prevailed among them, and which for a length of time weakened their energies and retarded their cause.

MACNEILE (mak-neel'), HUGH, D.D., was one of the most eminent of the great preachers and pastors in the Church of England in the present century. He was born in the northern part of the county of Antrim, at Ballycastle, in 1793, and bole, where he composed his "Harmony of the Gospels" and his "New Translation of the Epistles." In 1772 he became one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and was employed nearly thirty years in the execution of his last and greatest work, viz., "New Translation from the Greek of all the Apostolical Epistles," with commentaries and notes. He died in 1800.

MACLAINE (mak-lain'), ARCHIBALD, a learned divine, was born at Monaghan, in Ireland, in 1722. He was educated at Glasgow, and about the time of the rebellion in 1745 succeeded his uncle as English pastor at The Hague, in which situation he remained fifty years, when he was obliged to quit it, owing to the French invasion of Holland in 1794. On his arrival in England he fixed his residence at Bath, where he died November 25, 1804. Dr. MacLaine is principally known by an excellent translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, and by his popular letters to Soame Jenyns in opposition to his "View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion." He was celebrated for his taste as well as for his learning.

powerful. Dr. Maclay commanded the loving admiration of all who knew him. He was eminent for his shrewdness and wisdom, his sterling honesty, his freedom from all cant and affectation, and his earnest, deep and tender piety.

MACLENNAN (mak-len'nan), JAMES, who held a distinguished position in the Methodist Church in Mississippi, was a native of Scotland. He emigrated to this country; and being greatly impressed during a revival, he entered the ministry in Mississippi in 1840. He had been well educated, and he rose at once to notice. He continued to labor with great zeal and much success in Mississippi and Louisiana until his death, in 1870.

MACMILLANTES (mak-mil'lan-ites), a term given to the followers of the Rev. John Macmillan. The strict Cameronian Covenanters who did not fall in with the revolution settlement of the Church of Scotland had been without a minister for some years. Macmillan had been deposed in the year 1706 because of his defence of these people, and he ultimately became their minister.

educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He distinguished himself during his residence in the Irish capital, and he was soon called to London, where he became famed for his unwonted power in the pulpit. After preaching for some time at Charlotte Street Chapel, near Fitzroy Square, he was removed to Liverpool, where, in St. Jude's Church, for many years he labored with remarkable success. In manner, in voice, and in every element which gives power to the preacher, he was pre-eminent. His influence on the intelligent and wealthy classes of Liverpool seemed unbounded. He was eminently evangelical in his theology, and his counsel and aid were much sought after by those who desired to advance the evangelical cause. Trinity College made him a master of arts and subsequently a doctor in divinity. His relation as son-in-law to the late Archbishop Magee gave him great influence. A canonry in Chester Cathedral was conferred on him, and in 1868 he was made dean of Ripon. For some time before accepting the office of dean, he had preached in St. Paul's Church, at Prince's Park, a suburb of Liverpool, an edifice which had been specially built of a magnitude to suit the congregations that assembled to hear his ministrations. He was a voluminous writer. Chief among his publications are—"Lectures on the Prophecies of the Jews," "Sermons on the Second Advent," "Lectures on the Sympathies of our Saviour," "Lectures on the Church of England," "Seventeen Sermons," and "The Church and the Churches, or the Church of God in Christ Militant here on Earth." He died in 1872.

MACRON (mak'ron), 2 Macc. x. 12, the surname of Ptolemee or Ptolemeus, an officer of Antiochus Epiphanes.

MACROSTICHON (mak-ros'ti-kon), a creed formed by certain heterodox bishops in A. D. 325 which exhibited Arian views very distinctly, affirming the inferiority of the Son to the Father, and asserting that the Son was made, although not like other creatures which were created by him.

MACWHORTER (mak-whor'ter), ALEXANDER, D.D., was born in 1734, in Delaware, and educated at Princeton, where he graduated in 1757. He settled at Newark two years afterward, and in 1764 and the following year he labored as a missionary in North Carolina. During the Revolutionary struggle he acted as a chaplain, and after having preached for some time at Charlotte, North Carolina, he removed to Newark, New Jersey, in 1780. When important matters touching the standards of the Presbyterian Church demanded settlement, he was one of the most useful and influential members in drafting the constitution and determining that the Westminster Confession of Faith should be adopted as the standard. Yale College conferred the degree of doctor of divinity on him in 1776. He died in the year 1807.

MAD, MADNESS (mad'nes). Various words occur in the original which are so rendered in our version. Occasionally excitement, ungovernable frenzy or fierce wrath is implied, Deut.

xxviii. 28, 34; 2 Ki. ix. 11; Luke vi. 11; Acts xxvi. 11. But sometimes actual insanity is meant, 1 Sam xxi. 13-15; 1 Cor. xiv. 23. And once it is connected with demoniacal possessions, John x. 20. See DEMONIAC. Madness is supposed in the East to open the mind, which loses its right estimation of ordinary things to supernatural influence. Hence the insane are looked on with a kind of reverence. Perhaps this belief has been fostered by the practice of wildly and madly gesticulating in idolatrous worship. See 1 Ki. xix. 26-28. It might tend to secure to David when simulating madness an escape from Philistia.

MADAI (mad'i), the Hebrew term for Medes, first occurring as the designation of the third offspring of Japheth, Gen. x. 2, but whether to be taken for the name of the third son or in an ethnical sense for the people sprung from him is a matter of dispute among commentators. The latter seems the more probable opinion, as many of the names in the genealogical table in Gen. x. are those of nations rather than of individuals. See MEDES.

MADAN (ma'dan), MARTIN, an English divine, was born in 1726, and was educated for the bar, but took orders, and became a popular preacher at the Locke chapel, till, by publishing an apology for polygamy, in a work entitled "Thelyphthora," he lost his popularity and retired from the pulpit. He was also the author of "A Commentary on the Articles of the Church of England," a "Treatise on the Christian Faith," and the translator of Juvenal and Persius. Died 1790.

MADDEN (mad'den), SAMUEL, D.D., an Irish clergyman, was born in 1687. He received his education at Trinity College, Dublin, and afterward became a liberal benefactor to that society by instituting, in 1731, prizes for such students as specially distinguished themselves in the college examinations. The year following he published the first volume of a work entitled "Memoirs of the Twentieth Century; or, Original Letters of State under George VI." This singular book was originally intended to occupy six octavo volumes, and extraordinary despatch was used in striking off a thousand copies of it; but the rapidity with which it was bought up by the author equaled the diligence used in bringing it out. He died on the last day of the year 1765.

MADDOX (mad'duks), ISAAC, an English prelate, was born in London, in 1697. Being left an orphan, he was placed with a pastry-cook, but he soon left that situation, and went to Scotland with a view of obtaining at St. Andrew's cheap but solid education, and eventually becoming a minister of the Kirk. The tenets and discipline of Presbyterianism, however, not being congenial with his sentiments, he returned to England, entered at Queen's College, Cambridge, was Episcopally ordained, and rose so rapidly that in 1733 he was made dean of Wells. In 1736 he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph, whence, in 1743, he was translated to Worcester, where he died in 1759. Bishop Maddox published "A Vindication of the Church of England," in answer to Neal's "History of the Puritans." The Vindication has been esteemed a very successful performance.

MADIAN (ma'de-an), Acts vi. 29, the Greek form of Midian.

MADISON (mad'e-sun), JAMES, D.D., who was born in 1749, in Rockingham county, Virginia, rose to be one of the early bishops in the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. He graduated in 1772, in the college of William and Mary, and for a time he practiced at the bar; but he resigned the law for the gospel ministry. In 1773 he was made mathematical professor at William and Mary, and two years afterward he went to England for ordination. On his return he resumed his position in the college, which he resigned in 1784 for the chair of natural and moral philosophy. Four years afterward he was elected to the office of bishop, and in 1790 he was consecrated in England. He published a "Eulogy on Washington," "Sermons," "Letters" and "Addresses." His theology has been questioned by some ardent members of the Church, but all admit that he displayed great zeal and diligence in the discharge of his official duties. He died in 1812.

MADIUS MENSIS (ma'de-us men'sis), a name for May in some ecclesiastical writers.

MADMANNAH (mad-man'nah), a town in the South of Judah, Josh. xv. 31. It is probably the modern el-Minyay, about fifteen miles south-west of Gaza.

MADMEN (mad'men), a variation of the preceding, but applied to a quite different place, a town in the country of Moab, and only mentioned in Jer. xlvi. 2, in connection with the desolation to be caused by the threatened invasion of the country, but its locality is entirely unknown.

MADMENAH (mad-me'nah), another variation of the above word, and the name of a city in the tribe of Benjamin, which is represented by Isaiah, ch. x. 31, as fleeing before the approach of Sennacherib's army. This is the only notice we have of it, and no trace has been found of it by modern research.

MADON (ma'don), a city, apparently in the North of Palestine, which, with its king, was conquered by Joshua, Josh. xi. 1; xii. 19.

MADONNA (ma-don'na), an Italian term which signifies "My Lady," and used as a designation of the Virgin Mary, especially in connection with pictorial representations. After the fifth century, when the expression "Mother of God" became customary, and when art was introduced into the Church, pictures of the Virgin conformed to a certain style. The face was full, oval in form, dignified and mild in expression; and painters were supposed to excel who succeeded most effectually in combining these qualities in their "Madonnas." Usually the Virgin was represented as accompanied with the Child, and symbols, such as a mantle, a globe or a half moon, were added to express some attribute belonging to the Virgin. Raphael stands at the head of all artists in this department of art.

MAD THURSDAY. The Sunday before Quinquagesima is thus called in the Tyrol, because it is kept as an especial carnival.

MAELUS (ma-e'lus), 1 Esd. ix. 26, identical with Miamin, Ezra x. 25.

MAGARITÆ (ma-gar'e-tay) were apostates from Christianity to Mohammedanism. The term was used in the Middle Ages, but its origin is unknown.

MAGBISH (mag'bish). The children of Magbish returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 30. Probably it was the name of a place. It is omitted in the corresponding list of Neh. vii.

MAGDALA (mag'da-lah). According to the received text, supported by a good many MSS., this is the name of a town or region to which our Lord and his disciples came after the second miracle of the loaves and fishes, Matt. xv. 39. In the corresponding passage in Mark's Gospel, Dalmanutha is substituted for it, Mark viii. 10. And what increases the perplexity, three of the older MSS., with several of the ancient versions and Fathers, read Magadan, instead of Magdala in Matthew, which is adopted by Tischendorf as the more correct text. No remains, however, literary or monumental, have been found to throw light on this Magadan. Whatever may be the correct reading in the passage referred to, that there was a Magdala within the range of our Lord's ministrations may confidently be inferred from the epithet given to one of the Marys—the Magdalene. The name is most probably a later form of the Hebrew Migdol, or tower, which several places bore as a proper name; and the modern representative of the Magdala to which Mary belonged, and from which our Lord and his apostles could not have been far distant on the occasion mentioned above, is generally supposed to be the poor village of el-Mejdel, on the border of the Lake of Galilee, a little more than an hour's ride north of Tiberias. It has a miserable appearance, and there are no ancient ruins, but it is in the immediate neighborhood of a beautiful plain and a mountain that rises not less than three or four hundred feet high.

MAGDALENE (mag'da-leen), an inhabitant (female) of Magdala. From its application to the repentant Mary it has in popular usage come to designate a woman who had fallen from purity, but who has repented. In this sense it is frequently used as a name for penitent females in pictures. See MARY.

MAGDEBURG CENTURIES. See CENTURIES OF MAGDEBURG.

MAGDIEL (mag-de'el), one of the dukes of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 43; 1 Chr. i. 54.

MAGED, 1 Macc. v. 36. See MAKED.

MAGEE (ma-ge'), WILLIAM, a learned Irish prelate and a theological writer, was born in humble life and admitted as sizar at Dublin University. He was soon distinguished for his scholastic attainments, and in 1806 became a Senior Fellow of Trinity College and professor of mathematics. In 1801 he published his celebrated "Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of the Atonement and Sacrifice," a work directed against the tenets of the Unitarians. By this he added much to his former reputation, as the amount of learning, the keenness of the criticism, the closeness of the logic and brilliancy of the style which this great treatise displayed, placed him at once in the front rank of the great theologians of the Church. These "Discourses" are still recognized as a standard work on the subjects which they discuss. In 1818 he was advanced to the deanery of Cork, in 1819 he was consecrated bishop of Raphoe, and in 1822 translated to the see of Dublin. He died in 1831.

MAGI (maj'i), the original term designating the Eastern sages who paid their homage to the infant Jesus at Bethlehem, Matt. ii. 1-12. These Magi must be carefully distinguished from the sorcerers or magicians to whom the same appellation was sometimes given, Acts xiii. 8. We find the term used in the Old Testament, Jer. xxxix. 3, where Rab-mag is the prince-magus, the chief of the sacerdotal caste among the Chaldeans. Originally one of the Median tribes to whom the sacred ministrations belonged, the magi held a high position in the Medo-Persian empire. They were the priests, the prophets, the scholars, of the nation, indicating the holiness of their functions by an exact cleanliness of body. They were held in high respect by the sovereigns, and frequently took part in political business and revolutions. Their religious system, which had become debased, is said to have been reformed by Zerdasht or Zoroaster. It would seem that, after the example of the Medes, a similar sacerdotal caste existed among other Oriental nations. Thus we find them in Babylon, Dan. i. 20; ii. 2. Possibly these might have had a Median origin. Be this, however, as it may, such orders of men were to be found in various countries, degenerating often, it is likely, into mere astrologers and soothsayers, such as are stigmatized by Greek and Roman writers.

Of the actual place of residence of the sages to whom the sign of Messiah's birth was vouchsafed we know nothing; it has been said that they were from Persia, from Arabia, from Assyria. But they must certainly be supposed of that class which, as above remarked, was originally Medo-Persian. And the Persians were "distinguished," says Dr. Mill, "from all the other great ruling nations of antiquity, as well by the comparative purity of their religion as by their uniform gentleness and often distinguished favor to the people of God under their sway. To that nation's general abhorrence of idolatry, in all its grosser aspects, the Magian order mainly contributed—an order whose study of the powers and principles of nature was fitted to attain the best knowledge of God within the reach of the Gentiles of old, whose worshipful invocation of fire, air and the rest ever carefully distinguished those elementary powers from the supreme Deity, and whose error respecting the origination of evil beings from Ahriman, and his share with Ormuzd in the formation of the world, was unaccompanied, in their most ancient authorized books, with any of that ascription of independence to the evil principle which imparts the chief malignity to that error." We may, therefore, acknowledge the divine wisdom in making choice of these sages, comparatively free from heathen pollution, as the representatives of the Gentile world to whom to announce the expected Messiah. At a later period the Persian magi, but threatened, in order to compel them to a certain course of action. In the Egyptian system of therapeutics, too, there was a magical character. The same principle may be traced in Chaldæa, where the object was not merely to forecast the destiny by observing the heavens, but to fix it by sacrifice and incantation, so as to react upon the stars.

The Greeks and Romans similarly had sacrifices and rites of secret observance, to which the special power was attributed of making the gods subservient to the will of men. Such were the Roman rites with men, and to these it was that magical rites applied. And the art was denominated white or black, according as good or malicious demons were addressed. In Greece magic was connected with the worship partly of deities of foreign origination, and partly of those subterranean ones to whom the demons were subject as ministering spirits. The practice of magic might be publicly avowed, if persons did not intend thereby to injure others. But usually it was attended with dark and mysterious usages. Then there were human sacrifices, magical rites being connected therewith. And the object was evil. Thus persons were to be struck with disease, or madness, or loss of memory. Love-potions were of this kind. And what were called Ephesian and Milesian words had the highest reputation for efficacy. The former were characters engraved on the pedestal, girdle and crown of the Ephesian Artemis, or Venus, meaning "darkness, light, earth, year, sun, true sounds." They were graved also on stones or rings worn as amulets. Similar to these probably were the "books," or written formulæ, brought together and burnt at Ephesus, Acts xix. 19.

Necromancy was connected with the magical worship of demons, invoking and appeasing the manes of those who had died a natural death. Theurgy was magic of the highest character. It professed to communicate, not with lower and mediate beings, but with the most exalted gods, to make them subservient to the desires of those who practiced it.

The Egyptian magicians do not appear to have practiced magic in the sense in which it has been explained. They were interpreters of dreams, Gen. xli. 8, diviners, and professed by their incantations to secure happiness to the soul in another life. Little need be said on their opposition to Moses and Aaron. They were successful in deceiving Pharaoh on three occasions, Ex. vii. 11, 12, 22; viii. 7, and then, trying again, they failed, Ex. viii. 18. We can hardly suppose that they effected more than a clever juggle.

MAGIE (ma-ge'), DAVID, D.D., who became a very eminent minister of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, was born in 1795 at Elizabeth, New Jersey. He studied at Princeton, and after completing his theological course in the seminary, he discharged the duties of tutor in the college where he had graduated. He settled as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Elizabeth in 1821, where he remained among a loving and fervently attached people until his death, in 1865. Many efforts were made to induce him to remove from this his only charge, but he resisted them all. He was a model minister, evangelical in doctrine, holy in life, devoted to his people and greatly blessed in his work. His high standing led him into positions of great trust. He was a trustee of the college of New Jersey, and of the theological seminary at Princeton, a member of the American Board of Foreign Missions and of the Publishing Committee of the American Tract Society. He was the author of "The Spring-Time of Life" and several "Discourses," all of which displayed the lofty spirit of this excellent man.

MAGINNIS (ma-gin'nis), JOHN SHARP, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister and professor, was born in 1805 in Butler county, Pennsylvania. He was educated at Waterville College, Brown University and in the Newton Theological Seminary, Massachusetts. He settled in the First Baptist Church, Portland, Maine, whence he re-fearful of losing their privileges, violently persecuted the Christians.

MAGIC (maj'ik), MAGICAL (maj'i-kal) ARTS, MAGICIANS (ma'jish'anz). Magic was an art of deeper significance and power than astrology and divination, from which it must be carefully distinguished. The latter were exercised in discovering future events; by magic it was supposed that future events might be influenced.

It was practiced among various nations of antiquity. There was a magic element in the Persian religion of Zoroaster. So with the Egyptian religion, where the gods were not only worshiped, of the dead, formulæ of prayer and evocation of the gods. According to the Pythagorean notion, all beings with souls are homogeneous. Hence the spirit of man can act directly on higher natures, and attract them into the circle of its existence and requirements. And then, as it was supposed that men possessed a double soul, the nobler emanating from the Deity, and a natural one in affinity with other natural beings, a magic power could, it was conceived, be exercised on nature.

It was not generally the supreme gods that might be thus acted on. There were demons, inhabitants of the air, having passions in common moved to the Pine Street Church, in Providence, Rhode Island. He next assumed the duties of the theological chair at Hamilton, New York, and in 1850 he went as professor of Biblical and pastoral theology to Rochester University. For some time he also took charge of the class in intellectual and moral philosophy. Declining health compelled him to retire from the university, but he taught in the theological school until he died, in the year 1852. In 1844 he received his degree in divinity from Brown University. His ceaseless engagements as a teacher prevented him from publishing more than a number of Review articles.

MAGISCOLA (ma-jis'ko-la). During the Middle Ages it was common to use the cloisters and other portions of cathedral and conventual churches as places of instruction, and the master of the school in these establishments was called by this name.

MAGISTER DISCIPLINÆ (ma-jis'ter dis-si'ple-nay), a name given to a person deputed by a bishop to instruct in the rules and discipline of the Church, and educate those children whom their parents had entrusted to him and dedicated to the service of the Church.

MAGISTER SACRI PALATII (ma-jis'ter sa'kre pa-lat'e-e), the name of a Dominican officer at the head of the congregation of the Index at the papal court. St. Dominic first held the office, which was created in 1218 by Pope Honorius III., and the Dominicans were invested in perpetuity with the duty of instructing such persons at court as were at leisure to come under their care. These privileges were extended and modified from time to time, and at present the censorship of books only pertains to this officer.

MAGISTRAL (ma-jis'tral), an ecclesiastic in cathedral and collegiate churches and royal chapels in Spain, whose duty is to preach at certain seasons. He is so called because it is necessary for him to be a master in theology.

MAGISTRATE (maj'is-trate). The word is sometimes used in our translation in a general sense for those possessing legal authority, Tit. iii. 1. The "magistrate" in Jud. xviii. 7 is, literally, possessor of dominion, or possessor of wealth, referring not to a ruler, but to a people. The word thus translated in Ezra vii. 25 is frequently elsewhere rendered "judges," as in Deut. i. 16; Jud. ii. 18. The magistrates of Luke xii. 11, 58, are properly rulers. We find again the term in our version of Acts xvi. 20, 22, 35, 36, 38, a place which seems to require some explanation. First, the general name "rulers," or authorities, is employed, Acts xvi. 19; and then these are afterward more particularly specified as being "magistrates," stratēgoi. They were the Roman colonial officers, properly called duumviri, analogous to and sometimes claiming the more venerable title of prætors.

MAGNA CHARTA (mag'na chart'a), a charter granted by King John, A. D. 1215, to the English nation. Originally it contained seventy-two clauses, but when the charter was confirmed by Henry III. they were reduced to thirty-seven. This celebrated charter lies at the foundation of the liberties of the English people. It is reported to have been chiefly drawn up by the earl of Pembroke, and Langton, archbishop of Canterbury. Its most important articles are those which provide that no freeman shall be imprisoned or proceeded against "except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land," and that no tax should be imposed in the kingdom unless by the common council of the king. Thus parliamentary taxation and not royal authority was ordained. It has been often recorded that this charter was ratified thirty-eight times.

MAGNIFICAT (mag-nif'e-kat), a spiritual song used in the services of the Romish, the Lutheran and the Anglican Churches. The name is derived from the first words of the Latin text in the Vulgate. It appears to have been introduced their names are associated. The Cathedral of St. Magnus was founded in 1138. It was a magnificent structure in mixed Gothic style. From time immemorial the choir has been used as the parish church.

MAGOG (ma'gog), a tribe of the sons of Japheth, Gen. x. 2; 1 Chr. i. 5. Nothing more is said of Magog in the historical books of Scripture, but we can gather some notion of the greatness of the people intended from the magnificent descriptions of Ezekiel, Ezek. xxxviii.; xxxix. That prophet, predicting events which, perhaps, have not yet been accomplished, describes Gog of the

into the services of the Church in the sixth century, as it was used in France in that age. In the service of the Church of England it is introduced after the first lesson, unless the ninety-eighth psalm should come in according to the Psalter.

MAGNUS DIES (mag'nus de'āz), a mediæval term for Easter day.

MAGNUS (mag'nus), SAINT. Several persons have been called by this name, the most eminent being—1. An Irish missionary who succeeded St. Gall, and who labored with great success around Augsburg. 2. The great apostle of the Orkneys, who, like St. Patrick in Ireland and St. Cuthbert on the coast of Northumberland, became famous as the great evangelizer of the regions with which land of Magog as sovereign over vast regions. Rosh, Meshech and Tubal are his subjects; Persia, Ethiopia and Lybia attend him; Gomer and Togarmah are at his beck. And with mighty will this ruler of Magog comes down upon the land of Israel; but there his innumerable legions shall perish. St. John uses the same language. The nations of the earth, who, deceived by Satan, are to gather as the sand of the sea against the beloved city, and be destroyed by the last awful fire that shall flash down from God's eternal throne, are denominated Gog and Magog, Rev. xx. 8, 9. Without attempting to interpret these prophecies, we may see in them sufficient grounds for determining the quarter to which we must look for Magog. There can scarcely be a doubt that the Scythians are intended, those wild and almost numberless tribes which peopled Asia from the Caucasus and the middle of the seventeenth century near Rathmelton, in county Donegal, a few miles from Londonderry, Ireland. He was educated at Glasgow, where he was enrolled as a student of the university in 1675, as "Franciscus Makemius, Scoto Hybernus." Having finished his studies, he was licensed by the Lagan Presbytery in 1781. "Colonel Stevens, from Maryland beside Virginia," had applied for a minister to settle in that colony, and on that call Makemie was ordained. He went on a mission to Barbadoes, and thence he removed to Maryland, and he is supposed to have founded the church at Snow Hill. He removed to Virginia, where he labored with great zeal, having previously secured protection and liberty to preach under the "Toleration Act." He went to England in 1704, with a view to procure ministers, and next year he returned, bringing John Hampton and George McNish with him. He visited Boston, Long Island, and diligently preached as he journeyed from place to place. In Long Island he was arrested by Lord Cornbury, and after protracted proceedings, he was fined eighty-three pounds for having preached in Long Island; and thus, amidst difficulties which would have appalled many men, he persevered until his death, in 1708. Other ministers, it is held, had preached in the colonies before Makemie, but it is not doubted that he was influential in establishing the first presbytery at Philadelphia, in 1706, thus laying the foundation of the solid organization of the Presbyterian Church. He was a man of great energy, and of fair education and love for learning, as may be seen by the fact that in such an unsettled condition as that in which he lived, he was able to bequeath one hundred and twenty English books to his family, giving law-books to Andrew Hamilton (father to the governor of Pennsylvania), and the residue of a library to Andrews and his successors in Philadelphia.

MAKHELOTH (mak-he'lôth), a station of the Israelites in the wilderness, Num. xxxiii. 25, 26.

MAKKEDAH (mak-ke-dah'), a city in the low country of Judah to which Joshua pursued the Amorites after the victory before Gibeon, Josh. x. 10, 16, 17, 21, 28, 29.

MAKTESH (mak'tesh). The word appears as a proper name only in Zeph. i. 11, where it is said, "Howl, ye inhabitants of Maktesh, for all the merchant people are cut off." Occurring, as this address does, in a prophecy on the destruction of Jerusalem, it has been supposed to refer to some hollow or valley about the city, somewhat resembling a mortar, in which wares were wont to be exposed and merchant traffic carried on; but as to the particular spot or quarter indicated by it, there is no general agreement.

MALABAR CHRISTIANS. See CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS.

MALACHI (mal'a-ki) was the last of the Old Testament prophets, and is supposed to have prophesied about a hundred years after Haggai and Zechariah. As the word "Malachi" means my angel, or my messenger—i. e., of the Lord—it has been supposed by some to be rather an appellation than a proper name. Nothing is known of his personal history, but he evidently lived after the second temple had been built, and its offerings and sacrifices had been re-established, for it is an insincere and mercenary spirit in those services, especially among the priests, which he labors to correct. It is probable that he was contemporary with Nehemiah, or immediately followed him. The offences which he particularly censures are those which excited the indignation of that pious governor and called forth his earnest endeavors for their removal.

MALACHI, THE PROPHECY OF. It appears from this book that the moral and religious state of the people had greatly declined since the time of Haggai and Zechariah; for whereas at the former period they were addressed chiefly in the language of promise and encouragement, in the time of Malachi they had more need of reproofs and warnings. They were the slaves of formalism and self-righteousness; satisfied with themselves, complaining of God, irritated at the afflictions which he sent them, and not hesitating even to accuse him of injustice and to blaspheme his name.

Malachi reproves both the priests and the people; announces the unexpected appearance of the Lord for whom they looked, preceded by his harbingers to prepare his way; declares the distinction that shall be finally made between the righteous and the wicked; and concludes with an assurance of approaching salvation to those who fear God, upon whom "the Sun of righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings," and with a solemn injunction to the people of God to observe the law of Moses while expecting the promised Saviour.

The manner in which this book concludes implies that the Jewish people were to expect no more prophets till the Messiah's forerunner should come; and from this period the spirit of prophecy appears to have ceased until the commencement of the New Testament era.

MALACHY (mal'a-ke), 2 Esd. i. 40, Malachi the prophet.

MALACHY, SAINT, whose original name was Maol-Maodhog, the descendant of an ancient Irish noble family, was born at Armagh, in 1094. He became a missionary to his poor countrymen, restored the ruined monastery of Bangor, and was subsequently appointed bishop of Connor, and then archbishop of Armagh. He died at Clairvaux, on his way to Rome; and having been the first of the Irish hierarchy to submit the independent Church of his own country to the authority of the pope, he received the honor of canonization, being the first Irish resident who received this distinction. He died in 1148.

MALADERIA (mal-a-de're-ah), the ancient name of a hospital for lepers.

MALAKANES (mal-a-ka'nes), a Russian sect which forbids making the sign of the cross or the use of images, considers all wars unlawful and observes the laws of Moses respecting meat. They differ from the "orthodox" Russian Church also respecting the sacraments.

MALCHAM (mal'kam). 1. A Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 9. 2. Zeph. i. 5. The word is perhaps here used for an idol generally worshiped by idolaters as "their king." Or it may refer to Moloch or Molech specially.

MALCHIAH (mal-ki'ah). 1. A Levite of the family of Gershon, 1 Chr. vi. 40. 2, 3. Two who had married foreign wives, Ezra x. 25, 31. 4, 5. Two who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 14, 31. 6. One who stood with Ezra at the solemn reading of the law, Neh. viii. 4; perhaps the same with Malchijah, Neh. xii. 42. 7. A priest, Neh. xi. 12; most probably the person mentioned in Jer. xxi. 1, where Melchiah, Jer. xxxviii. 1. See MALCHIJAH, Jer. xxxviii. 1. 8. An officer into whose dungeon Jeremiah was cast, Jer. xxxviii. 6.

MALCHIEL (mal-ke'el), a descendant of Asher, Gen. xlvi. 17; Num. xxvi. 45; 1 Chr. vii. 31.

MALCHIELITES (mal-ke'el-ites), a family of Asher descended from Malchiel, Num. xxvi. 45.

MALCHIJAH (mal-ki'jah). 1. A priest, 1 Chr. ix. 12. It is probably he that was the head of one of the courses, 1 Chr. xxiv. 9, and his representative that sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 3, also called Malchiah, Neh. xi. 12. See MALCHIAH, 7. 2. One who took a foreign wife, Ezra x. 25. 3. A person who aided in repairing the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 11. He is also called Malchiah, Ezra x. 31. See MALCHIAH, 3. 4. One who took part in the solemn dedication of the wall, Neh. xii. 42.

MALCHIRAM (mal-chi'ram), one of David's descendants, 1 Chr. iii. 18.

MALCHI-SHUA (mal-chi-shoo'a), one of the sons of King Saul, 1 Chr. viii. 33; ix. 39; x. 2. He is also called Melchi-shua, 1 Sam. xiv. 49; xxxi. 2.

MALCHUS (mal'kus), the servant of the high-priest (Caiaphas) whose ear was cut off by Peter, when, in the garden of Gethsemane, and on the impulse of the moment, he drew the sword in defence of his Master, Matt. xxvi. 51; Mark xiv. 47; Luke xxii. 49-51; John xviii. 10. The assault of Peter on the man is mentioned by all the evangelists, but John alone gives his name; and the healing action of our Lord repairing the injury that had been done is noticed only by Luke. The future history of Malchus is altogether unknown to us, so that we are unable to say whether the subject of our Lord's last miraculous act of healing profited by it in a spiritual respect.

MALDONATUS (mal-do-nah'tus), JOANNES, a very learned Spanish Jesuit, was born at Casas de la Reina, in 1534, studied at Salamanca, and was distinguished in his youth for his knowledge of Greek and philosophy. He took the vows and habit of the Society of Jesus at Rome in 1562. He was sent by the Jesuit authorities to Paris as a teacher of Catholic theology, during the excitement of the French Reformation and Catholic reaction, between 1562 and 1572. His exegetical lectures were attended by Protestants in Paris and elsewhere, and the renown of his teaching reminds the reader of the history of Abelard. His brilliant course was chequered by malicious charges of heresy on the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, and also of "deathbed robbery" in favor of the Society of Jesus. He retired after this to the solitude of the convent of Bourges, and prepared the various exegetical and other works by which he is known to posterity. He was called to Rome by Gregory XIII. to superintend the publication of the Septuagint. His works comprise commentaries on some of the books of the Old Testament and on the Gospels, which are remarkable for their depth ing with every difficulty and bringing out the literal sense. He died in 1533.

MALEBRANCHE (male-brongsh'), NICO-LAS, a celebrated French philosopher, was born at Paris, in 1638, and at the age of twenty-two embraced the monastic life. His attention was first directed to metaphysics by perusing Descartes' "Treatise on Man," and he immediately became a devoted partisan of the Cartesian philosophy. His famous "Treatise on the Search after Truth" is principally distinguished by the maintenance of a mysterious union between God and the soul of man, and the doctrine that the human mind immediately perceives God and sees all things in him. Malebranche also wrote several other works, among which are—"A Treatise on Nature and Grace," "Christian Conversations" and "Dialogues on Metaphysics and Religion." He was highly venerated for his elevated genius, and nothing could be more amiable and simple than his conversation and manners. He died in 1715.

MALELEEL (ma-le'/le-el), Luke iii. 37, the Greek form of Mahalaleel.

MALIGNANTS (ma-lig'nantz). During the civil war in England this term was freely applied to the Royalists and Churchmen by the Roundheads and others because of their opposition to the objects of the Parliamentarians.

MALLOTHI (mal-lo'thi), a Levite, head of a course of singers, 1 Chr. xxv. 4, 26.

MALLOWS (mal'löz). The word so translated Job xxx. 4 appears to be the sea-purslain, Atriplex halimus; it is likened to the rhamnus (a white bramble), but has no thorns; its leaf is similar to that of the olive, but wider; it grows near the sea-coast and about hedges, and the tops of it are eaten when young. It is, however, collected for food only by the poor.

MALLUCH (mal'luk). 1. A Merarite Levite, 1 Chr. vi. 4. 2, 3. Two who had married foreign wives, Ezra x. 29, 32. 4. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel. His representative in the days of Joiakim was Jonathan, and he or the head of his family or course sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 4; xii. 2, 14, where he is called Melicnt. 5. One of the people who sealed the covenant, ver. 27; he may be identical with No. 2 or 3.

MALMESBURY (mamz'ber-e), WILLIAM OF, an English historian who flourished in the twelfth century, was born in Somersetshire, became a Benedictine monk of Malmesbury and librarian of the monastery. His writings were very numerous, and his veracity as a chronicler is rated high. His most important works are a history of England, from the arrival of the Saxons in 449 to the year 1126, and biographies of Sts. Dunstan, Patrick and Wulstan. He died in 1143.

MAMMON (mam'mon), the Syrian term for riches, not, as has been often imagined, of any idol-deity formally acknowledged among the Syrians, for no evidence exists of this. By our Lord, however, it was used in a personified manner as a power that might actually receive men's homage, much as we sometimes speak of gold: "Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (gold), Matt. vi. 24; Luke xvi. 9.

MAMRE (mam're), an Amorite chief, as plainly appears from Gen. xiv. 13, 24, where we read of "Mamre the Amorite, brother of Eshcol." It is chiefly, however, not the man himself, but something which belonged to him and went by his name, that the sacred narrative takes notice of. In the English Bible, Abraham is said to have dwelt "in the plain of Mamre," but the expression ought undoubtedly to be "under the oaks (or terebinths) of Mamre," Gen. xiii. 18; xiv. 13; xviii. 1, the trees going by the name of the chieftain who planted them, or who had somehow been peculiarly associated with them, as elsewhere we read of the oak of Deborah, Jud. iv. 5, and of the magicians, Jud. ix. 37. By and by the simple term Mamre is used as sufficiently descriptive of a relative position. Machpelah was before, over against Mamre, Gen. xxiii. 17; and Jacob is said to have come to his father Isaac to Mamre, which is further explained by its being said to be unto Hebron, Gen. xxxv. 27. Josephus placed it six stadia—less than a Roman mile—from the city, but some other ancient authorities make it two Roman miles distant. Robinson thinks the latter the more probable locality, and is disposed to identify it with the hill er-Râmeh, where there are considerable remains of dwellings, which he supposes to have been built upon the spot in later times on account of its reputed sacredness.

MAN. See ADAM.

MANAEN (man'a-en), a Christian teacher in the Church at Antioch, foster-brother of Herod Antipas, the tetrarch, Acts xiii. 1.

MANAHATH (ma-na'hath), a descendant of Seir, the Horite, Gen. xxxvi. 23.

MANAHATH, a place mentioned only in 1 Chr. viii. 8, probably in Benjamin.

MANAHETHITES (ma-na'heth-ites), 1 Chr. ii. 52, 54. These may be the inhabitants of the place above mentioned, but there is an uncertainty about the meaning.

MANASSEAS (ma-nass'e-as), 1 Esd. ix. 31, identical with Manasseh, Ezra x. 30.

MANASSEH (ma-nas'eh). 1. The first-born son of Joseph, Gen. xli. 51. Nothing is known of his history except the remarkable incident recorded in Gen. xlvi. When Joseph learned that his aged father was extremely ill, he took with him his two sons Ephraim and Manasseh to visit Jacob, who strengthened himself and sat upon the bed, first to bless Joseph and adopt these two grandsons to be his own "as Reuben and Simeon," and next to bless them also. On this occasion Joseph brought them near his father, whose eyesight had greatly failed, in such a manner that Manasseh was at Jacob's right hand and Ephraim at his left; but Jacob crossed his hands, "guiding them wittingly," so as to lay his left hand on Manasseh.

Joseph seems to have been so intensely engaged in his devotions that he did not notice this circumstance till the blessing had been pronounced; but as soon as he did discover it he was displeased, and would fain have rectified what he regarded as an error. His father, however, refused, and foretold that, while both were to be blessed in Israel, Ephraim should be before his brother.

MANASSEH, TRIBE OF.—This personal narrative leads us on to the fortunes of the tribe, in whose history we observe the prophecy fulfilled. In the wilderness the three tribes descended from Rachel kept together both in the encampment and on the march, but Ephraim took the command and gave the name to the whole division, Num. ii. 18-24; x. 22-24. In the first census the men of Ephraim amounted to forty thousand five hundred, and those of Manasseh only to thirty-two thousand two hundred; yet at the second census the proportions were reversed, being respectively thirty-two thousand five hundred and fifty-two thousand seven hundred. Joseph had the portion of the first-born by having two tribal divisions assigned to his sons, 1 Chr. v. 1, 2, compared with Deut. xxi. 17; and in like manner it is to be noticed that in some sense Manasseh did retain the privilege of the first-born by having two portions of the land of Canaan assigned to him, one on each side of the Jordan, Josh. xvii. 1. And so in the arrangement of the kingdom in David's time we read of a prince for each of the two sections, and these princes are placed on a level with the princes of entire tribes, 1 Chr. xxvii. 20, 21. Yet, on the whole, the effect of this arrangement can scarcely have been for the real strength of Manasseh; rather the tribe must have been weakened by being divided, especially as the western half of them became unavoidably overshadowed by the powerful and united tribe of Ephraim, close to whose northern border they were placed, and to whom they seem to have been required to assign a number of cities which territorially ought to have been their own, Josh. xvi. 9. And in the complaint which the children of Joseph—namely, Ephraim and western Manasseh—made to Joshua of too narrow an allotment of territory, they reckoned themselves the occupants of only a single lot, Josh. xvii. 14, 17. On the other hand, it appears from ver. 11 that these Manassites were to some extent indemnified by receiving certain cities within the territories of Issachar and Asher.

TOMB IN MALMESBURY ABBEY.

There is considerable obscurity about the geography of this western half, though it is treated at some length in these two chapters of Joshua, where also it is stated that the district was divided into ten portions; and again about the half of this half fell in the first instance to heiresses, according to laws given in the wilderness, Num. xxvii. 1-11. The other half of the tribe was settled on the eastern side of Jordan, along with the two tribes of Reuben and Gad, Num. xxxii. 33, 39-42. In Josh. xiii. 31 the territory of eastern Manasseh is described as lying to the north of the tribe of Gad, and as taking in all Bashan and half of Gilead, and Ashtaroth and Edrei. In Deut. iii. 13-15 Moses recapitulates what he had done, assigning to them the northern part of Gilead, the whole of Argob and the whole of Bashan. The original account in Numbers speaks generally of Gilead being given to Machir; the small towns of it to Jair, who therefore named them Havoth-Jair; and Kenath and its villages to Nobah; in each case the right of possession being associated with the right of conquest. This Jair was himself a descendant of Machir, though only by the mother's side, 1 Chr. ii. 21-23, so that there was some irregularity in counting him a Manassite. This land of eastern Manasseh was a magnificent territory, but it is doubtful whether it ever was fully possessed, and assuredly it never was so long. Thus, according to the correct translation of 1 Chr. ii. 23, "Geshur and Aram," or the Geshurites and Syrians, "took Havoth-Jair from them." On the other hand, an interesting historical fragment in 1 Chr. v. 18-22 tells of their success, along with the Reubenites and Gadites, against several of their heathen neighbors, and of the continued good results till the captivity. The western portion of the tribe was also very remiss in the duty of driving out the Canaanites from the cities which they had received within the limits of Issachar and Asher, Josh. xvii. 11, 12; Jud. i. 27, 28.

The tribe of Manasseh does not take a prominent place in the history of Israel. Machir is celebrated in the song of Deborah as sending governors to the great struggle against Jabin, Jud. v. 14. Gideon belonged to western Manasseh, to the family of Abiezer, Jud. vi. 11; at ver. 15 he says, "My family is poor," or, as in the margin, "My thousand is the meanest in Manasseh." Jair, a judge somewhat later than Gideon, was a Gileadite, and probably belonged to the eastern Manassites, Jud. x. 3-5. Whether "Jephthah the Gileadite," Jud. xi. 1, belonged to this tribe or to that of Gad, we cannot positively determine. The eastern Manassites seem to have gone along with the rest of the Gileadites, and those in the west along with the Ephraimites, in submitting to Ishbosheth as their king after the death of Saul, 2 Sam. ii. 9. Yet numbers of them attached themselves to David before the death of Saul; and afterward the tribe was well represented when the nation united to make David king, 1 Chr. xii. 19-22, 31, 37. The one half of them shared the general fortune of the eastern tribes, when Hazael smote them as "the Lord began to cut Israel short," 2 Ki. x. 32, 33; and they were finally carried away by Pul and Tilgath-pilneser, kings of Assyria, 1 Chr. v. 25, 26. In the last days of degradation and misery to the ten tribes, it is said of that kingdom that, in their famished and maddened state, "they shall eat every one the flesh of his own arm, Manasseh, Ephraim, and Ephraim, Manasseh; and they together shall be against Judah," Isa. ix. 20, 21. Yet there are traces of repentance for the sins of their kingdom and return to the Lord at Jerusalem in the reign of Asa, 2 Chr. xv. 9, and of Hezekiah, ch. xxx. 1, 10, 11, 18, and of Josiah, ch. xxxiv. 9; and their land was partly purged of idolatry by these two last kings, ch. xxxi. 1; xxxiv. 6. In the account of the restoration of Israel in Ezek. xlvi., Manasseh appears with only a single territory, between Naphtali and Ephraim, ver. 3-5.

2. The ancestor of that Jonathan the Levite whom Micah consecrated as priest for his house of images, and who afterward was priest to the northern Danites, Jud. xviii. 30. The word Manasseh is peculiarly written in the original, and it is supposed, with much probability, that Moses was really meant.

3. Fourteenth king of Judah, son and successor of Hezekiah, who began to reign in B. C. 699, at the early age of twelve years, and reigned fifty-five years. It appears that the secret enemies of the vigorous reforms of Hezekiah reappeared and managed to gain much influence at court during the youth of Manasseh; and he was prevailed upon to re-establish all the idolatries and abominations which it had taken his excellent father so much pains to subvert. This bent having been unhappily given to the mind of one old enough to listen to evil counsels, but too young to see their danger, the king followed it with all the reckless ardor of youth, and without any of the prudent reservations which older sovereigns, more discreet in evincing the same inclinations, had maintained. Idolatry in its worst forms, and all the abominations connected with its observances, were practiced without stint and without shame, not only in the face of the temple, but in its very courts, where altars to the heavenly bodies were set up and rites of idolatrous worship performed. Under this altered state of things, the Judahites, with the sanction of the king's example, rushed into all the more odious observances of Syrian idolatry with all the ardor which usually attends the outbreak of a restrained propensity, till they became far "worse than the heathen, whom the Lord destroyed before the children of Israel." In vain did the prophets raise their voice against these iniquities, and threaten Manasseh and his kingdom with awful tokens of divine indignation. Instead of profiting by these warnings, the king vented his rage against those by whom they were uttered, and in this and other ways filled Jerusalem with innocent blood beyond any king who reigned before him, 2 Ki. xxi. 1-16.

At length the wrath of God burst over the guilty king and nation. At this time there was constant war between Assyria and Egypt, and it would seem that Manasseh adhered to the policy of his father in making common cause with the latter power. This, or some other cause not stated by the sacred historian, brought into Egypt an Assyrian army, under the generals of Esar-haddon, which carried all before it. The miserable king attempted flight, but was discovered in a thorn-brake in which he had hidden himself, was laden with chains and sent away as a captive to Babylon, which was then subject to the Assyrians, where he was cast into prison, B. C. 677. Here, at last, Manasseh had ample opportunity and leisure for cool reflection, and the hard lessons of adversity were not lost upon him. He saw and deplored the evils of his reign, he became as a new man, he humbly besought pardon from God, and implored that he might be enabled to evince the sincerity of his contrition by being restored to a position for undoing all that it had been the business of his life to effect. His prayer was heard. His captivity is supposed to have lasted a year, and he was then restored to his kingdom under certain obligations of tribute and allegiance to the king of Assyria, which, although not expressed in the account of this transaction, are alluded to in the history of his successors, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11-13.

On his return to Jerusalem, Manasseh exerted himself to the utmost in correcting the errors of his early reign, and in establishing the worship of Jehovah in its former purity and splendor. The good conduct of his latter reign was rewarded with such prosperity as enabled him to do much for the improvement and strengthening of his capital and kingdom. He thoroughly repaired the old walls of Jerusalem, and added a new wall on the side toward Gihon; he surrounded and fortified by a separate wall the hill or ridge on the east of Zion which bore the name of Ophel; and he strengthened, garrisoned and provisioned "the fenced cities of Judah," 2 Chr. xxxiii. 13-17. He died in peace, B. C. 664, at the age of sixty-eight, after having reigned longer than any other king of Judah, and was buried in a sepulchre which he had prepared for himself in his own garden, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 20.

4, 5. Two persons mentioned in Ezra x. 30, 33 who had married foreign wives, and of whom nothing whatever is known.

MANASSES (ma-nas'ses). 1. Matt. i. 10, Manasseh the king. 2. Rev. vii. 6, the patriarch Manasseh. 3. 1 Esd. ix. 33, identical with Manasseh of Ezra x. 33. 4. Judith viii. 2, 3, the husband of Judith.

MANASSES, THE PRAYER OF. This is a short apocryphal piece intended to express the penitent feelings which the king might have while justly suffering for his sins. That he did so humble himself and pray, and that his prayer was preserved among the ancient records of the kingdom, we know, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 18, 19. But the composition now in existence is certainly not genuine. For it was written originally not in Hebrew, but in Greek; it is not certainly mentioned by any writer prior to the so-called Apostolical Constitutions in the fourth century after Christ, and it never was accounted canonical by the Church. Yet it embodies pious thoughts; it is found in the Codex Alexandrinus, and though allowed to be spurious by the Church of Rome, is in the Vulgate. It is, however, not known by whom the Latin translation was made, nor can the date of the original be determined with any exactness.

MANDRAKE (man'drake), a plant which was supposed to promote fecundity. Reuben had found mandrakes in a field, and brought them to his mother Leah. Rachel, seeing them, and anxious for children, requested them of her sister, and obtained them on a certain condition, Gen. xxx. 14-16. It is clear that the plant intended blossomed in spring, that the flowers had a strong scent, that the fruit ripened in May, the time of wheat harvest in Padan-aram, that these mandrakes were not common, else Rachel would have had no reason for bargaining with Leah, and further that they were found in Palestine, Song Sol. vii. 13. Now the Atropa Mandragora, called also Mandragora vernalis, appears to answer these conditions. "The root," says Kalisch, "is white, mostly forked, but straight and thick, having some resemblance to the human form, about four feet long, unwholesome and of repulsive smell. The leaves are of a lively green, oval, about one foot long, four to five inches broad, with an undulating border; the flowers are small, whitish green, bell-shaped, blossoming in spring, and exhaling a strong but fragrant odor; the fruit is yellow, of the size of a small egg, pleasant both to sight and smell, filled with seeds, and ripens in the month of May. . . . It is freely eaten by the natives as wholesome, genial and exhilarating, is believed to strengthen affection, and employed for the preparation of love-philtres." Mandrakes still grow near Jerusalem and in various parts of Syria. Dr. Thomson saw them near Hebron and on the lower ranges of Lebanon and Hermon. The mandrake is nearly allied to the Atropa belladonna, deadly nightshade.

MANEH (ma'neh). See WEIGHTS.

MANES (ma'nes), or MANICHÆUS (man-i-ke'us), the founder of a sect called, after him, Manichæans, was a native of Persia, and born early in the third century. He was instructed in the Christian religion, but he afterward distinguished himself by attempting to combine its doctrines with those of the magi. The leading idea of his system is the existence of two eternal powers, one good, the other evil, thus really adopting the essential principle of Parseism, which holds the eternal existence of two contending powers or beings. He rejected the Old Testament, and taught that Christ had come to save mankind, and that he himself was the paraclete announced in the New Testament. He also pretended to the gift of healing; but failing to cure the son of the king of Persia, he was flayed alive, and his body given to the dogs, A. D. 274. There is no proper ground for including Manes among the early Christians. Augustine refuted some of his works.

MANETHO (ma-ne'tho), an ancient Egyptian historian who was high-priest of Heliopolis in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about 280 B.C. He wrote the history of his country in Greek, and professed to have derived it from ancient sacred inscriptions. His work is no longer extant, but fragments of it are preserved by other writers, from which we learn the names of the Egyptian kings and the length of their reigns through what are called the thirty dynasties, occupying a period of above thirty-five hundred years.

MANGER (mān'jer), Luke ii. 7, 12, 16. See INN.

MANI (ma'ne), 1 Esd. ix. 30, identical with Bani, Ezra x. 29.

MANLIUS (man'le-us), 2 Macc. xi. 34, the name of a Roman ambassador said to have written a letter to the Jews. This letter is with reason considered a fabrication.

MANNA (man'na), "portion," the name given to the food supernaturally supplied to the Israelites during their abode in the wilderness. Many writers have endeavored to account for the production of this substance, and have believed that they recognized in it the exudations of certain plants still collected and known as articles of commerce. But if we are to take the Scripture narrative as recording real events, we must admit that the manna provided for the Israelites was something entirely different from natural products. Their surprise when they first saw it, the regularity and immense quantity of the supply, the preservation of some of it for the inspection of future generations, are facts which the theory of the ordinary exudations from trees or bushes fails to interpret. It is useless, therefore, to give a description of substances which certainly could not be the manna of Israel.

Manna is mentioned as first given when the Israelites were in the wilderness of Sin. It was found in the morning after the dew evaporated; it lay like the hoar-frost on the ground, the size of coriander-seed and the color of bdellium; it was to be gathered at once before the sun melted it. Each person was to collect for his household at the rate of an omer (about three quarts) a head, so that, according to the size of a family, more or less was taken. It was used as a meal and made into cakes, the taste of it being like oil or wafer cakes made with honey. All was to be consumed the day it was gathered, else it corrupted; but the day before the Sabbath a double quantity was to be brought in, and then it lasted without corrupting for two days. An omer of it was long preserved as a memorial in the sanctuary, testifying God's power and willingness to give food for the sustenance of his people in the most apparently destitute circumstances. The supply of manna lasted till after the Israelites of Gilgal had eaten of the old corn of Canaan, Ex. xvi.; Num. xi. 4-9; Josh. v. 10-12. Our Lord, referring to the manna, declares himself the true bread from heaven, John vi. 31-35, 48-51, 58. With regard to the hidden manna, Rev. ii. 17, Dr. Trench considers this as pointing to Christ after his ascension. He is hidden from his people's sight, but shall not remain hidden for ever, and even now he gives them prelibations of that feast they shall hereafter partake of.

MANOAH (ma-no'ah), a Danite, the father of Samson, Jud. xiii.; xvi. 31. Little is told of him save in connection with Samson's birth. He most probably died before his son, whose "brethren" and the "house of his father" are said to have buried him.

MANT, RICHARD, bishop of Down, Connor and Dromore, was born in 1776 at Southampton, England. He was educated at Oxford, and he became a distinguished Fellow of Oriol College. After taking his degree of M. A., he traveled for some time on the Continent, on his return from which he became successively curate at Buriton and Sparsholt, in Hampshire. In 1810 he was presented to the vicarage of Great Coggeshall, in Essex; and the sermons which he preached at the Bampton Lecture, in 1812, having attracted general attention, he rose rapidly in the Church. In 1815 he became rector of St. Botolph's, Bishops-gate Street, and three years later vicar of East Horsley, Surrey. In 1820 he was consecrated bishop of Killaloe, and translated to the see of Down and Connor in 1823, the care of the diocese of Dromore devolving upon him in 1842, on the death of the last bishop, Dr. Laurie. During his long life, Dr. Mant was constantly engaged in authorship, chiefly on subjects connected with his professional duties. Those works which have gained him the greatest celebrity are the edition of the Bible, with notes and commentaries, which he prepared in conjunction with Dr. d'Oyley, and several Tracts printed by the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, such as "A Step in the Temple," "Romanism and Holy Scripture Compared," "History of the Church in Ireland," "The Churches of Rome and England Compared." He died in 1848.

MANTLE (man't'l). See DRESS.

MANUEL (man'u-el), NICOLAS, a Swiss painter, poet and Reformer, was born at Berne, in 1484. He was employed in the monastery of his native city to paint a series of pictures entitled the "Dance of Death." His works, however, have perished; and in his later life Manuel became a soldier, took an active part in public affairs, and especially distinguished himself as a promoter of the Reformation. His writings consist of various controversial tractates, "Moralities and Mysteries" and popular songs. He died in 1530.

MANUSCRIPTS (man'u-skripts). Before the invention of printing, copies of the Scriptures, as of other books, were multiplied in writing; and volumes so written are called manuscripts, and these are either autographs by the original penman, or apographs, copies made from those originals. All the manuscripts at present existing are apographs, the originals having perished. Many, however, of those we possess of the Scriptures are of very great antiquity.

The manuscripts to be here described are Hebrew and Greek.

Hebrew manuscripts are synagogue rolls and private copies. The first are those used in the synagogue worship. They are written with great exactness on the skins of clean animals, specially prepared, and fastened together with strings also taken from clean animals. They are in the square Chaldee letters, without vowels or accents; and as they are of a considerable length, they are rolled round cylinders, so as to afford facility in displaying any portion required. The writing is in columns, presenting, so to speak, separate pages to the eye of the reader as he unrolls the manuscript. The private manuscripts are in books, written on vellum, parchment or paper. Some of these are in the square Chaldee and some in the rabbinical character. They have vowels and accents.

Classifications have been made of Hebrew manuscripts. There are the Spanish—to which Oriental manuscripts are nearly allied—the German, and the French and Italian intermediate between Spanish and German. The Spanish copies are said to follow the Masoretic order in the arrangement of the books; the letters are regular, square and well proportioned. In German copies the Talmudic arrangement is observed, and the characters are ruder and more inclined, with pointed corners. In French and Italian manuscripts the character is somewhat smaller, more round than pointed. The Spanish manuscripts are most highly valued by the Jews.

It is difficult to determine the age of Hebrew manuscripts. Sometimes, indeed, a date is inscribed, or external circumstances may afford some testimony; but where internal marks alone present themselves, the utmost caution is required in judging of the antiquity and goodness of a manuscript. It may, however, be said that existing manuscripts are all more or less fully of a Masoretic cast, and consequently they exhibit substantially the same text. Even those obtained from the East are of this class. Thus the celebrated roll of the Pentateuch procured by Dr. Buchanan from the black Jews in Malabar was probably transcribed from a Spanish manuscript, and those brought to England from the Jewish settlement at K'ae-fung-foo, in China, appear to have the Masoretic text.

Kennicott and De Rossi, and of late, Pinner, are the critics who have labored chiefly in collating Hebrew manuscripts. Two or three of the older ones which they examined shall be briefly described. The "Codex Laudianus," in the Bodleian library, is on vellum; it consists of two folio parts. The letters are moderately large, plain, simple, elegant and unadorned; the points, it would seem from the color of the ink, were added at a later date. Some of the letters, obliterated by the lapse of ages, have been written over a second time; and yet some of these are becoming a second time invisible. Dr. Kennicott assigns this to the tenth century, De Rossi to the eleventh. A very ancient codex in quarto was examined by De Rossi. It is but a fragment, containing Lev. xxi. 19 to Num. i. 50. The vellum on which it is written is decayed by age; the character is intermediate or Italic, approaching to that of the German manuscripts. De Rossi assigns it to the eighth century. In the collation made by Dr. Pinner at Odessa, of manuscripts which are now deposited in the imperial library at St. Petersburg, there is mention of a Pentateuch roll on leather. It is complete. It has neither vowels, nor accents, nor Masorah; but the rules of the Masorah are complied with, and the words are separated. The form of the letters differs much from that now in use. It has a subscription stating that it was corrected in A. D. 580; and Pinner believes that this statement is accurate. If so, it is the oldest Hebrew manuscript known to exist. It was brought from Derbend, in Daghestan. Among the manuscripts examined by Dr. Pinner are some with vowels shaped differently from those to which we are accustomed. It has been thought that the system they present had its origin in Babylonia. It may be added that seventeen manuscripts are known to exist of the Samaritan Pentateuch, six of which are in the Bodleian and one in the British Museum. This last, procured by Archbishop Usher, is complete on two hundred and fifty-four pages of vellum. It is in a good state of preservation, a leaf of fine paper having been placed between every two leaves of vellum. It was written A. D. 1362.

Greek manuscripts of Scripture are either of the whole Bible or of the New Testament. They are in the square form; and though doubtless rolls like the Hebrew existed in very early times, none of these have been preserved. The most ancient manuscripts are without accents, spirits or breathings, or any separation of words, though by the beginning of the fifth century, and probably earlier, a dot was used to divide sentences. The older manuscripts are generally imperfect; a few have originally contained the whole Bible, others the New Testament, and others only particular books or portions of it. Sometimes the original writing has been almost or altogether obliterated, and fresh matter has been introduced. These manuscripts are called codices palimpsesti or rescripti—that is, rewritten; and when the text is accompanied by a version, the manuscripts are termed codices bilingues, or double-tongued. These are generally Greek and Latin, and in a very old manuscript the Latin translation is likely to be that in use before the time of Jerome.

The "Codex Alexandrinus," or Alexandrian manuscript, is one of the oldest and most celebrated. It was presented by Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I., in 1628, and has been preserved since 1753 in the British Museum. It has its name from its having been brought, it is said, by Cyrillus from Alexandria. It is on thin vellum, and consists of four folio volumes, the first three containing the Old Testament and apocryphal books, with certain odes or hymns, while the fourth comprised the New Testament, the epistles of Clement to the Corinthians and the psalms ascribed to Solomon. But these psalms are gone, and only a few lines remain of the second epistle of Clement. The writing on each page is in two columns, and there are about fifty lines in a column. The Old Testament is defective in part of the Psalms. In the New Testament there are the following chasms: Matt. i. 1-xxv. 6; John vi. 50-viii. 52; 2 Cor. iv. 13-xii. 6. The Alexandrian manuscript was probably written in Egypt; the date may reasonably be supposed the latter part of the fifth century.

The Codex Vaticanus, or Vatican manuscript, is another most precious relic of antiquity. It also is written on vellum, in uncial characters, in quarto, with three columns on each page, and is preserved in the Vatican library at Rome. It contains the Old and New Testaments, but is imperfect, wanting Gen. i.-xlv. and Ps. cv.-cxxxvii. and Heb. ix. 15 to the end of that Epistle, also the pastoral Epistles and the entire Book of Revelation. There are reasons for believing that the Vatican manuscript was written in Egypt, most probably before the middle of the fourth century. It has been repeatedly but imperfectly collated by various critics, but no fac-simile of it has ever been produced.

A third most precious uncial manuscript has been but lately brought to light. It was procured by Dr. Tischendorf in 1859 from the convent of Mount Sinai, and has been purchased for the imperial library at St. Petersburg. It originally contained the Old and New Testaments. A fragment now in the university library at Leipsic was obtained by Tischendorf in 1844, and edited by him in 1846. This fragment—forty-three leaves—included part of Chronicles and other historical books, also part of Jeremiah. The Codex Sinaiticus—it is so called—is of special value as containing the New Testament entire; it contains also the so-called epistle of Barnabas and part of the Shepherd of Hermas, and considered as belonging to the fourth

(if not the third) century. A noble edition of it has been published by Dr. Tischendorf at the expense of the emperor of Russia.

One more celebrated manuscript may be mentioned, the Codex Cantabrigiensis, or Codex Beza, presented to the university of Cambridge, in 1581, by Theodore Beza. It is a Greek-Latin manuscript, containing the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles. It must also once have had at least the catholic epistles, there being now belonging to it a fragment of 3 John. There are several imperfections, and besides sixty-six leaves are torn or mutilated. This manuscript was probably written in the sixth century, but it is not considered of great critical value, as the Greek text ap-

MAON, a town in the mountains of Judah, south-east of Hebron, Josh. xv. 55. In its neighborhood was the wilderness of Maon, Josh. xxiii. 24, 25. The ruins now called Ma'in are on the summit of a hill about seven miles from Hebron.

MAONITES (ma'on-ites), an Arabian tribe mentioned, Jud. x. 12, in conjunction with the Amalekites. They were probably the Mehunims whom Uzziah conquered, 2 Chr. xxvi. 7, and perhaps they are meant in 1 Chr. iv. 41, where our version has "habitations." They might be the inhabitants of a place now called Ma'an in Arabia Petraea, to the south of the Dead Sea, on the route from Damascus to Mecca.

also assisted in the Roman edition of the Arabic Bible, and was the author of many other works.

MARAH (ma'ra), "bitterness," a station in the wilderness to which the Israelites came after three days' journey when they had passed the Red Sea. There they found a bitter or brackish fountain of which they could not drink. But when they murmured, Moses, at God's command, cast a tree into the waters, and they were supernaturally made sweet, Ex. xv. 22-26. Marah is supposed to be the same with the modern 'Ain Howarah, where there is still a salt and bitter fountain. The basin of it lies in a kind of rocky mound composed of the deposits of the water during the lapse of ages;

pears to have been altered, and readings perhaps introduced from some Latin version.

Of course the account of manuscripts above given is of the briefest character, but it may afford the general reader some notion of the precious remains from which the printed text of the Scripture is derived, and by means of which scholars are continually endeavoring to reproduce still more faithfully, by careful examination and correction, the holy books as they came forth from the hands of their respective authors.

MAOCH (ma'och), the father of Achish, king of Gath, 1 Sam. xxvii. 2, called also Maachah, 1 Ki. ii. 39.

MAON (ma'on), a name found in the genealogies of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 45, described as the "father"—i. e., settler—of Bethzur.

MARA (ma'ra), "sad," the name which Naomi considered more suitable to her than her own (signifying my pleasantness) after her bereavements and return in sorrow to Bethlehem, Ruth i. 20. See NAOMI.

MARACCI (ma-rak'se), LEWIS, a learned Orientalist of the seventeenth century, was a native of Lucca in Italy, and became a member of the congregation of regular clerks of the Holy Virgin. He devoted himself to a study of the Eastern languages, and particularly the Arabic, on which account he was appointed professor of that tongue in the college of Wisdom, at Rome. Pope Innocent XI., to whom he was confessor, would have made him a cardinal, but his humility induced him to decline the promotion. He died in 1700. Maracci is chiefly known as the publisher of the Koran in Arabic, with a Latin translation and notes. He it is six or eight feet in diameter, and the water two feet deep. There are stunted palm trees and bushes of the shrub Ghürküü about, but no tree now can cure the bitterness. It was not the virtue of the wood, but the divine power, that effected the change. Opinions, however, differ as to the identification of Marah, and perhaps travelers have been mistaken in looking out for a place where the waters continue still bitter. The supernatural healing of them might, it is likely, be permanent.

MARAN-ATHA (ma'ran-a'tha), "the Lord cometh," an Aramaic expression which St. Paul added to the censure on those that loved not the Lord Jesus Christ, to enforce the duty of being ready for his coming, 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

MARKET (mar'ket). Markets and market-places are mentioned in Scripture, though not exactly in our sense of the word. In the Old Testament the "markets" of Tyre are spoken of, Ezek. xxvii. 13; but it may be questioned whether the word so rendered should not be translated "merchandise." In the New Testament we have frequent mention of markets. For the purposes of trade dealers must naturally resort to some specified place, and this among the Jews seems to have been at the gates of cities. Here those who were in want of employment would be found. Hence the laborers of our Lord's parable are said to have stood "idle in the market-place," Matt. xx. 3. It was at points of public concourse that the Pharisees were most likely to receive the salutations which they loved, Matt. xxiii. 7; Mark xii. 38; Luke xi. 43; xx. 46. We are not, therefore, to understand the coming "from the market," Mark vii. 4, as necessarily from the place of commerce, but from any place, the streets or elsewhere, which might be deemed in public. The "market-place" must sometimes be understood of the forum, where the Roman magistrates administered justice, Acts xvi. 19. The "market," or agora, where St. Paul disputed at Athens, was between the Areopagus and the Museum hill. In modern Eastern cities the places of trade are the bazaar, or streets of shops, generally covered walks.

MARKHAM (mark'am), WILLIAM, LL.D., who distinguished himself in Oxford so greatly that he became dean of Christ Church, as the headship of that college is called. His administrative talents in that position, taken along with his eminent scholarship, marked him out for promotion, and accordingly he was made bishop of the see of Chester in 1771. Here he displayed the same qualities, and he was promoted to the archbishopric of York in 1776, while his place in Chester was given to the excellent Dr. Porteus. Dr. Markham was an excellent type of the highly-educated university man who acquits himself with great ability in the highest ecclesiastical places of the English Episcopal Church.

MARLORAT (mah-lo-ra'), AUGUSTINE, a French divine, was born in 1506. Educated as a Romanist by the Augustinian friars, he afterward became a Protestant, and a popular preacher among the French Protestants. He took a prominent and Lorraine. In 1562 war began between the Huguenots and Catholics, and Rouen was seized by the former. Although Marlorat labored to the utmost to moderate the violence of the Protestants, and kept aloof from all political affairs, he was apprehended by the royalists, after the recapture of the town, and condemned to death. He was executed in front of the church of Notre Dame, November 1, 1563.

MAROTH (ma'rōth), a place mentioned only in Mic. i. 12. It was probably in the western part of Judah.

MAROZIA (ma-ro'zh'a), a Roman lady of extraordinary beauty and of infamous character, was born near the end of the ninth century. Left a widow soon after her first marriage, she carried on her intrigues with the principal barons, and even, it is said, with Pope Sergius III., was for some time mistress of Rome, and occupied the castle of San Angelo. After her second marriage she caused Pope John X. to be strangled in prison, and made two of her creatures successively popes. Widow a second time, she made one of her sons pope, John XI., in 931, and the next year married again. She was finally imprisoned by Alberico, her son by her first marriage, in San Angelo, and he possessed himself of the supreme power, which he held for twenty years. Marozia died, it is said, in a convent. Her son (John XI.), grandson (John XII.) and great-grandson were raised to the chair of St. Peter.

MARRIAGE (mar'r'ej) is a divine institution coeval with the origin of the human race. It was designed to form a permanent bond of union between man and woman, that they might be helpful to one another under the trials and sorrows of life, and living in mutual love and unbroken confidence, might enjoy the greater happiness. Besides looking to the well-being of the parties themselves, marriage also contemplates the formation of families, knit together by the endearing relationships of parents and children, of brothers and sisters. Without the conjugal tie the inhabitants of this world would have been a mixed multitude of whom none would have stood more closely connected together than the different individuals of a herd of cattle. The family circle, family instruction, parental love and care would have been altogether unknown.

The same reasons, too, which rendered marriage necessary at all, equally required that it should subsist between one man and one woman at a time. All experience shows that the intermixture of families consequent upon polygamy is nearly as fatal to domestic peace and comfort, and to the proper training of children, as the entire absence of marriage would be. And hence the wisdom of the divine appointment of monogamy, which may be satisfactorily established, both from the express declarations of Scripture, and also from the remarkable equality between the sexes in point of number. It was but one Eve that God created and brought to Adam; and the striking words which follow the account of this first conjugal union show that it was designed for the model of marriage in all time coming: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh," Gen. ii. 24. These words, too, are so quoted by it obvious that he viewed the law of monogamy and the indissolubility of marriage as dating from the commencement of the world, and that he designed them both to remain in full force under the new dispensation which he was establishing. Marriage with one of the other sex, and that terminable only by death or by adultery, is beyond all question both the Christian law and the original law instituted by the Creator. Some view the verse cited above from Genesis as containing the words of Adam, but our Lord's language in Matt. xix. 4, 5, shows that they are the words of God himself: "Have ye not read that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh?"

At an early period the original law of marriage, as made known to Adam, was violated through the degeneracy of his descendants, and concubinage and polygamy became not uncommon. Of course at no time was it possible for the great mass of men to have more than one wife; and indeed, in so far as polygamy prevailed among some classes, the tendency must have been to prevent others from obtaining wives at all. It was only in the case of princes and heads of tribes and wealthy individuals that wives could be multiplied. And it appears that, whatever disapprobation the practice might excite at first, the feeling that there was anything sinful connected with it gradually subsided, and at length it was looked upon as hardly, if at all, reprehensible. The patriarchs themselves fell into it. Abraham indeed seems to have had no desire for more than one wife, but at the instigation of Sarah, for special reasons, he took her maiden as a concubine or subordinate wife. And Jacob in like manner, although he would have preferred to marry none but the one object of his ardent affection, was nevertheless inveigled, through the duplicity of Laban, into taking Leah first, and then he married Rachel also, to whom he had been betrothed; and in the end, through the rivalry of the sisters, he took both their handmaids.

From these facts some have inferred that polygamy was not wrong in ancient times, nor at all opposed to the divine law as revealed to the Jews. But this is an unwarrantable conclusion. It is true indeed, respect being had to the state of religious knowledge, the rude condition of society and the views prevalent in the world, that the practice could not infer, in the case of individuals, the same amount of criminality as would necessarily adhere to it now amid the clear light of gospel times. But still all along it was a departure from the divine law. This is obvious both from the terms of the law as addressed to Adam and recorded in Genesis, and also from the words of our Lord regarding the practice of divorce on light grounds among the Jews, which was the natural consequence of the loose views of marriage introduced by polygamy. "The Pharisees also came unto him tempting him, and saying unto him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? And he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read that he who made them at the beginning made them male and female; and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh? They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you

The legislation of Moses regarding marriage embraces some peculiar features, regarding which the reader is referred to Lev. xviii.; xx. 10-21; Deut. xxv. 5-10. Besides prohibitions of marriage grounded upon affinity and consanguinity, there were various others relating to marriage with the heathen, which will be found in Ex. xxxiv. 16; Deut. vii. 3; xxiii. 3, 7, 8. The purpose of all these restrictions was to preserve the children of Israel as a distinct and separate people, and to guard them from being corrupted by the idolatry and wickedness of the surrounding nations. After the return from the Babylonish captivity, the prohibitory laws on the subject were made more stringent than ever, Ezra x. 2; Neh. xiii. 23-31. With regard to marriages, too, among Israelites themselves, there were sundry prohibitions besides those already noticed, Num. xxxvi. 5-13; Lev. xxi. 7, 13, 14.

Under the gospel we know nothing of territorial distinctions. The general spirit, however, of the ancient regulation survives; for although foreign wives are not interdicted merely as such, yet believers are required to maintain their separation from unbelievers. It is true the admonition not to be unequally yoked with unbelievers, exhibited in 2 Cor. vi. 14, does not refer specifically to marriage, but beyond question it applies to that connection with more force than to any other bond of union.

In regard to the customs connected with betrothal and marriage, it was very much the case in ancient times that young people were not left themselves to enter into matrimonial engagements; but their parents and friends undertook the task of finding suitable partners for them. The initiatory lay with the friends of the young man, who made proposals to the friends of the maiden, as when Hamor sought Dinah for his son Shechem, Gen. xxxiv. 11, and Abraham sent a trusty servant to his own country and kindred to procure a wife for Isaac, Gen. xxiv. 51. Next there followed betrothment, which was a much more formal proceeding than anything known among us at so early a stage, and really carried with it all the obligations of marriage with the exception of cohabitation. At the time of betrothal oaths were sometimes exchanged, gifts corresponding to the condition of the parties were presented to the bride and her friends, and the engagement was celebrated with festive rejoicings, so that the parties were considered as bound to one another, and faithlessness was regarded and punished as adultery, Deut. xxii. 23, 24. When Eliezer first met Rebekah at the well, and observed her acting in the very manner which he had fixed upon as the token of success in his mission, he at once presented her with a golden ring and two bracelets for her hands, and after gaining her consent and that of her friends he brought forth jewels of silver and jewels of gold for the bride, and he gave also to her brother and to her mother precious things. In some Eastern countries wives were purchased from their parents for a stipulated sum; but among the Jews what was presented seems rather to have been viewed simply as a customary gift. Rachel and Leah made it a ground of complaint against their father that he had treated them as strangers, in that he had exacted services from Jacob for them, thus selling them and devouring their money, Gen. xxxi. 14-16.

Between betrothment and marriage a certain time intervened, during which the bride remained in her father's house, and all intercourse between the parties was carried on through the bridegroom's friend. When at length the wedding-day arrived, the bridegroom arrayed himself in festive garments and put on a nuptial crown of gold or silver or flowers. He then proceeded with his friend and other attendants to the residence of the bride, who, purified in the bath, richly attired, decked with jewels and covered completely with a veil—the symbol of subjection to her husband, 1 Cor. xi. 10—was waiting for his arrival. She wore also a girdle or ornament for the breast, which Jeremiah, ch. ii. 32, describes as an article which it was not conceivable that a bride should forget.

It was generally in the evening when the two companies met at the bride's residence, and both of them went thence in procession to the house of the bridegroom, lighted on the way with torches or lamps, serenaded with music, and surrounded with every demonstration of joy and gladness, Matt. xxv. 7. And now they sat down to a feast previously prepared, to which large numbers of relatives and neighbors had been invited, Gen. xxix. 22; and for many days they continued to meet together and to indulge in mirth and feasting, that they might rejoice with the newly-married couple, Jud. xiv. 12. These protracted festivities were enlivened with various amusements, such as music and dancing, and the proposing of riddles for the mutual exercise and trial of ingenuity, Luke xv. 25; Jud. xiv. 12. For the space of a year, too, the young husband was exempted from military service and from all public business, that he might rejoice with the wife whom he had taken, and even during the interval between betrothal and marriage the same privilege was enjoyed, Deut. xx. 7; xxiv. 5. It thus appears that the wedding-day was rather the day when the bride was taken home to her husband's house than what we should designate the day of marriage. At least the formal engagement to become husband and wife, and to continue faithful to one another, had taken place at the time of betrothal, and from that period was considered obligatory upon the parties. And it is necessary to keep these customs in view in order to understand the evangelic narrative regarding Joseph and Mary the virgin mother of Jesus, and the idea Joseph entertained for a time of disowning his betrothed wife.

The relation between husband and wife is frequently employed by the prophets to describe figuratively the relation of God to his people. He is represented as the husband, and they in their collective capacity are the wife; and in conformity with this view their forsaking of Jehovah and worshiping idols is characterized as whoredom and adultery. Whatever might draw them aside from the service of the living and true God is represented as the object of an adulterous affection, and hence they are even said to commit adultery with stocks and stones, Jer. iii. 9, with Molech and with Baalim, Lev. xx. 5; Jud. viii. 33. In all these cases the meaning simply is that they deserted the worship of Jehovah and paid homage to the idols of the surrounding nations. No doubt licentiousness entered very largely into the worship of the heathen divinities, but that is not what is meant when the Jews are charged with adultery for deserting the Lord God. The term is figurative, and simply means that they worshiped idols.

The same figure is of frequent occurrence in the New Testament, Christ being represented as the bridegroom and the Church as the bride, the Lamb's wife. The union between them is described as planned by the Father, the marriage-feast is spread and the guests are invited by him, and the wearing of a proper wedding-garment is a figure of the moral and spiritual qualifications requisite for admission to the Church. Unfaithfulness, too, or spiritual declension is exhibited under the same figure as idolatry in the Old Testament. The apostate Church is described as the great whore with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and who carries a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication, Rev. xvii. 1, 2, 4.

From the fact that marriage has thus always been the favorite emblem of the relation between God and his people, between Christ and the Church, we are warranted to argue that the union of husband and wife is not only an intimate and endearing connection, but also holy, honorable and pure. It is the state for which God designed us; and not only is there nothing in it adverse to the attainment of the highest sanctity, but it is the condition most favorable to the growth of every excellence. Nowhere in canonical Scripture is marriage spoken of disparagingly. It was among the Essenes and the Therapeutæ, during the interval between Old and New Testament times, that the idea first sprang up of some sort of impurity attaching to marriage. The apostles, however, set themselves in direct opposition to this notion, and they even represent forbidding to marry as one of the marks of departure from the faith, and of being misled by seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, 1 Tim. iv. 1-3. The idea, too, that those who discharge spiritual functions in the Church ought for that reason to avoid marriage with a view of preserving themselves in a state of higher purity, stands in manifest contradiction to the fact that marriage is the chosen emblem of Christ's union to his people. The apostles had no idea that preachers more than other men should be debarred from marriage. Among the qualifications of bishops it is specially mentioned that they should be the husband of one wife, 1 Tim. iii. 2, and the apostles, themselves, not excepting even Peter, were mostly married men. Experience, too, has shown that the attempt to originate and maintain an imaginary purity higher than God's law prescribes not only defeats itself, but even issues in augmented degeneracy of manners. The abodes of monachism were far from being the pure and holy places which they pretended to be. The ancient maxim of Scripture, "It is not good for man to be alone," remains true to this day, and marriage is the mother of the highest virtues.

MARS was a chief deity among the Greeks and Romans. His Greek name was "Arēs," and he was fabled to be the son of Juno, conceived by means of the virtue of a certain plant. He was honored as the god of war, and in Rome he was held to be the progenitor of Romulus, the founder of the city, of which he was esteemed the protector. The priests of Mars, who were designated "salii," were entrusted with a sacred shield which was said to have fallen from heaven during the reign of Numa. He was honored by a strange sacrifice, in which were offered a pig, a sheep and a bull.

MARSENA (mar-se'na), one of the seven princes in the Persian court, Esth. i. 14.

MARSH (marsh), HERBERT, D.D., bishop of Peterborough, was born in 1758. Eminent both as a scholar and a divine, this prelate is chiefly known at the translator of the profound and elaborate work of Michaelis on the New Testament. For this work he was perhaps better qualified than any English clergyman of his day, for after finishing his classical studies at St. John's College, Cambridge, he resided for many years at Gottingen, where he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the German language. On the invasion of Germany by the French he returned to Cambridge and took his B.D. degree; and in 1807 he was elected Lady Margaret professor of divinity. In this important situation he made a most useful change. Up to his election the lectures of the Lady Margaret professor had always been delivered in Latin, but he delivered his in English; and as he did so from the university pulpits, all ranks flocked to hear him. Besides several translations and controversial pamphlets, he published "A Course of Lectures, containing a Description and Systematic Arrangement of the Several Branches of Divinity," "A History of the Translations which have been made from the Scriptures." In 1806 Mr. Marsh was created D.D. by royal mandate. In 1816 he was made bishop of Llandaff, and three years later translated to the see of Peterborough. He died in 1838.

MARSHALL OF EXETER was an eminent bishop of that diocese, who died 1206. He was the last of four great prelates who devoted their energies to the completion of the cathedral. King Stephen had besieged Exeter, and the great church was reduced to a ruinous condition, in consequence of which its rebuilding had to be undertaken. Bishop Chichester commenced the work with vigor, and to stimulate the contributions he traveled extensively to collect relics, so as to enrich the new edifice in the popular estimation. Marshall completed this work, and a sculptured effigy was erected to his memory in the cathedral after his death.

MARSHALL (mar'shal), STEPHEN, a nonconformist minister, and a leader of the assembly of divines. He was a favorite preacher before Parliament, a principal promoter of the rebellion and one of the authors of the Puritan tract "Smectymnus." He published a letter in which he maintains "the lawfulness of Parliament taking up defensive arms." He died in 1655.

MARSHALL, THOMAS, an eminent English divine, was born about 1621, in Barkly, in Leicestershire. He was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, of which he eventually became the rector, but during the interval having taken arms against the Parliament, he withdrew to the Continent on the subversion of the royal cause. In Holland, where he had taken refuge, he continued till the Restoration, officiating as minister to a congregation at Rotterdam; but on the news of that event having taken place, he returned to England, and was fortunate enough not only to get reinstated in his former preferment, but to rise to additional dignities. As a scholar Dr. Marshall was distinguished by his familiar acquaintance with early English history and antiquities, as well as by his knowledge of the Saxon, Gothic and other ancient northern dialects. He was also a good Orientalist. He published a commentary on the Gothic and Anglo-Saxon versions of the Gospels. In 1681 he obtained the deanery of Gloucester, but survived his elevation only four years.

MARSHAM (mar'sham), SIR JOHN, a learned writer on ancient history and chronology, was born in London, in 1602, and educated at Westminster School and St. John's College, Oxford.

He chose the law as his profession, and having completed his studies at the temple, was appointed to a chief clerkship in Chancery. His learning was both extensive and curious, as is evident from his great work, "Chronicus Canon Ægyptiacus Hebraicus Græcus et Disquisitiones," in which the author's chief aim is to fix the chronology of the Egyptian dynasties. The tendency of the book is adverse to the chronology of the Bible. He also improved by a learned preface the great work "Monasticon Anglicanum," and his history of philosophy was specially valuable. Marsham died in 1685.

MART. See MARKET.

MARTHA (mar'tha), one of the blessed family at Bethany whom Jesus loved, and with whom he deigned to hold familiar intercourse. Martha has been supposed the elder sister, as the house is called hers, and she undertook the special charge of entertaining the Lord, Luke x. 38-42. Some have imagined that she was the wife or widow of Simon the leper, which would account for the place where Mary anointed Christ being termed his house, Matt. xxvi. 6, 7; Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 1-3. Martha was of more stirring mind and active habits than her sister Mary; she was cumbered about much serving when Mary, in her deep, still love, sat humbly listening at Jesus' feet. But her faith was strong, and she made a noble confession of it when she met the Saviour on his way to raise her brother Lazarus, though even her expectation reached not to the mighty work he was about to do, John xi. 1-46. Nothing certain is known of her later history.

MARTHA, SISTER, was the conventual name of ANNE BIGET, who was born about 1744 and had, previous to 1792, spent many years in a convent at Besançon as postress, and at that time retired on a pension of one hundred and thirty-three francs, and with another woman devoted her time to the wants of the necessitous. They sought the wounded after an engagement, and by their humane exertions saved numerous lives. In the campaign of 1814, though Martha was nearly seventy years of age, yet her energy and activity seemed to receive a new impulse, and the powerful assistance she rendered the wounded French and allied soldiers caused the duke of Reggio to say to her, "Sister Martha, I was made acquainted with your character on the field of battle, for there I continually heard the wounded exclaim, 'If the good sister Martha were here, our sufferings would be relieved,' while blessings followed the name." When the allied sovereigns met in Paris, each was desirous to see this extraordinary woman. Nor did they forget to reward her virtues: the emperor of Russia gave her a valuable gold medal and a sum of money; the emperor of Austria gave her the cross with the order of merit and two thousand francs, and the kings of France and Spain also sent her medals, and each added a present of money. Martha had no other ambition than that of doing good, but she rejoiced in her fortune, as it gave her more ample means to exercise her charitable disposition, and she died, regretted and esteemed, at Besançon, in 1824.

MARTIN DE VECTI (mar'tin deh vek'te), an English abbot of great fame as a builder who lived in the beginning of the twelfth century, is entitled to the credit of being the real founder of the cathedral church of Peterborough, in England. The see of Peterborough dates from the reign of Henry VIII. only, but the abbey, which had existed for centuries, was one of the most magnificent in the kingdom. The Saxon name of the place was Medeshamsted, and Penda, the second king of the Mercians, founded a monastery there, which was dedicated to St. Peter. King Wulfere endowed it with lands, but it was burned by the Danes A. D. 870, but in 970 King Edgar rebuilt it, and in his time the place took the name of Peterborough. The abbey increased in wealth very rapidly, but in 1116 it was again destroyed by fire. Tradition says that the abbot, who was a rash man, had been cursing all the day because a fire in his lodgings would not burn, whereupon he exclaimed, "The devil kindle thee;" upon which the whole monastery was in a blaze, and the church built by King Edgar was utterly destroyed. Two succeeding abbots failed in their efforts to rebuild, but Martin de Vecti, who was elected in 1133, set about the work, and his great church was dedicated in 1143. Several changes have been made in his structure, such as rebuilding the transept, adding cloisters, changing windows in the nave, restoring the central tower and making repairs as the lapse and waste of time required, but the church as a whole retains the form and dimensions as planned by De Vecti. It was constituted a cathedral by Henry VIII. In the time of Cromwell it suffered greatly, as the cloisters and other surrounding buildings were destroyed, and by an act in 1651 it was given to the people as a church, for a workhouse and for manufactures. The length of the cathedral is 479 feet and the height is 81 feet, the western façade is 156 feet, the transept is 185 feet, thus placing Peterborough in the number of first-class churches. It is erected on gently rising ground; and being clear of buildings, it can be viewed on all sides. At a distance it is not imposing, because the towers are not greatly elevated above the roof, but on a near approach, and especially when the western façade is seen, the magnificence of the vast pile at once appears. Peterborough, Lincoln, Wells and Salisbury are all celebrated for the splendor of their western fronts, but it is generally admitted that there is a majesty and solemnity which all spectators feel in contemplating the front of this great church which is experienced nowhere else. There is a peculiarity in the nave, which is ceiled with wood, and architects agree that it is as old as the walls of the building. The arches in the nave are Norman, but the windows have been constructed at later periods, and they are Perpendicular and Late Decorated, while the groining of the Lady Chapel at the east end is richly ornamented, and the windows are of four lights in the Perpendicular style.

MARTIN, SAINT, was born of heathen parents, in 316, at Sabaria, in Pannonia, now Hungary. He served in the army some years; but being converted to Christianity, he embraced a religious life, and appeared as the model of all virtue. In 371 he was made bishop of Tours, but still retained the simplicity and austerity of the recluse. He erected the monastery of Marmontier, and is considered as the apostle of the Gauls. He died in 397.

MARTIN (mar'tin), the name of a line of popes. The first, who was pope from 649 to 655, opposed the decree of the emperor Constans, called his Typus, in consequence of which an order was issued for his arrest. He was brought to Constantinople and there tried, and, but for the interposition of the patriarch, would have lost his head as a traitor. He was banished to Cherson, where he died in great distress. The second and third afford no materials for a biography. The fourth was a French nobleman, Simon de Brie, and was elected in 1281. He was a strong-minded man, and excommunicated the Greek emperor Michael Palæologus. He stripped Peter of Aragon of his kingdom and all his property because he had seized upon Sicily, and gave them to Charles, son of the French king. He died suddenly, in 1285. The fifth, Otho Colonna, succeeded to the papal throne in 1417, when the Council of Constance was sitting, and prevented it from entering on its great work of reforming the Church. He summoned another for the purpose, but died as it was on the point of assembling, at Basle, in 1431. In his reign the Western schism was terminated.

MARTIN, SARAH, whose life was spent in pious and philanthropic labors, was born near Great Yarmouth, in 1791. Deprived of her parents when very young, her education was merely such as could be obtained at a village school. At fourteen she learned the business of dressmaking, and while pursuing this avocation she visited the prisoners in the jail during such intervals as she could spare from her daily labors, at first reading the Scriptures to them, and then instructing them in reading and writing. After three years' perseverance she began to introduce employment, and after another interval she formed a fund for the furnishing of work for prisoners upon their discharge. For many years she read printed sermons to the prisoners on Sundays; but about 1832 she began to write her own sermons, and after continuing this course for five years she was enabled, she says, "By the help of God, to address the prisoners without writing beforehand, simply from the holy Scriptures." Her addresses were admirably suited to the circumstances and comprehension of her audience; and there is reason to believe that her appeals, urged with kindly, warm-hearted sincerity, were eminently successful. Meanwhile, her customers began to fall off, and she saw herself on the verge of destitution. Still she never paused in her course, and not only did she continue her prison instructions, but she organized and superintended a large school at the workhouse, and devoted her spare time to visiting the sick and other works of charity. But such unremitting labors of love proved too severe for a constitution naturally delicate, and after a few weeks of poignant suffering her pure spirit passed to its reward, October 12, 1843. She was buried in the churchyard of Caister, where a simple monument records her name. She left a small volume of poems, many of which breathe the true poetic spirit.

MARTINIUS (mar-tin'e-us), MATTHIAS, a learned German Protestant divine and philologist, was born at Freienhagen in 1572, and studied at Herborn under the celebrated Piscator. In his twenty-third year he was called to officiate as minister in the courts of the counts of Nassau Dillenburg. The following year he was appointed professor in the college of Herborn, and in 1595 he was chosen regent of the schools. He particularly excelled in his philological lectures and in initiating his pupils in the Hebrew, Chaldee and Syriac languages. In 1607, upon the breaking out of the plague at Herborn, he removed, with the members of the college, to Siegen, and soon afterward accepted an invitation to become pastor of the church of Embden; and after three years, in 1611, he accepted the rectorship of the college of Bremen, which under his superintendence was entirely remodeled, and gradually rose to the highest reputation throughout Germany. In 1618 he was one of the deputies who were sent by the city of Bremen to the Synod of Dort, where he avowed similar opinions with Cameron and other French divines on the subject of universal grace, and enlisted among the combatants against the Supralapsarians. He signed, however, the acts of the synod. He died in 1630.

MARTINIUS POLO-NUS (mar'tin-e-us po-lo'-nus), a Dominican friar of the thirteenth century, of a Polish family. After having distinguished himself by his learning, he went to Rome, where he held the offices of apostolical chaplain and penitentiary under Popes John XXI. and Nicholas III. The latter nominated him archbishop of Gresna, in Poland, in 1278, but Martin died at Bologna shortly after. He is known as the author of a history of the popes and emperors called "Chronicon Martinianum."

MARTYN (mar'tin), HENRY, the son of a Cornish miner, occupies a high place in the annals of English missionaries. He was born in 1781. Entering St. John's, Cambridge, he graduated with the highest honors before he was twenty years of age. Coming under the influence of Charles Simeon, he turned his great and ardent mind to the work of a missionary; and obtaining an Indian chaplaincy, he directed his zealous efforts to evangelizing the natives. He made a Hindostanee version of the New Testament; and acquiring command of the Persian language, he extended his labors into Persia, and there made a Persian translation of the Psalms and revised one of the New Testament. He took a fever in that country, of which he died, in 1812, while endeavoring to reach Europe.

MARTYR (mar'tyr). This is a Greek word occurring frequently in the New Testament, and generally rendered "witness." Thus it is found signifying a witness in a judicial sense, Matt. xviii. 16. It hence denotes generally one who witnesses, and who therefore does or can testify to the truth of what he knows or has seen, Rom. i. 9, and is especially used of those who witnessed what Jesus did, Luke xxiv. 48. In this sense, as knowing the truth of the gospel, and teaching or confirming it, Jesus Christ himself is called "the faithful witness," Rev. i. 5. But such witnesses in the face of opposition might have to seal their testimony with their blood—that is, to be martyrs in our sense of the word, Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13; xvii. 6.

with a degree of correctness and purity which he could not have excelled had they been his mother-tongues. He is also highly commended by Simon as an expositor of the Old Testament. It is said that he was sent to Antwerp, by order of Philip II. of Spain, and associated with Arias Montanus, Fabricius and others in publishing the Antwerp Polyglot. Masius had been the possessor of the celebrated Syriac manuscript of the seventh century, afterward the property of D. E. Jablonski, which exhibited the edition given by Origen of the book of Joshua and the following books of the Old Testament, which was translated word for word from a Greek copy corrected by Eusebius. Jahn says that this manuscript has now been missing for a long time. The works of Masius are—"Syriac Grammar," "Institutes of the Greek Language," "Syrorum Peculium," or an explanation of peculiar words which occur frequently in Syriac writers. He died in 1573.

MASON (ma'son). See ARCHITECTURE, HANDICRAFT.

MASON, FRANCIS, an able divine and vindicator of the English Church, was born in 1566, in the county of Durham, and was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where, after taking his Bachelor's degree, he was chosen probationer Fellow in 1586. He then took orders, was presented to the rectory of Oxford, in Suffolk, and was made chaplain to James I. In 1619 he was installed archdeacon of Norfolk. He wrote "The Authority of the Church in making Canons and Constitutions concerning Things Indifferent," "Vindication of the Church of England concerning the Consecration and Ordination of Priests and Deacons." He died in 1621.

MASORAH (ma-so'rah), MASORETES (ma-so'retes). The word Masorah signifies tradition, and designates a collection of notes made upon the Old Testament, supposed to have been derived from very ancient times. The Masoretes were those who collected these notes, and the Hebrew text settled according to them is called the Masoretic text.

After the destruction of Jerusalem and the wide dispersion of the Jews, various schools of literature were established by them, in which the holy books were carefully preserved, studied and taught. One of the most noted of these schools was that of Tiberias, which Jerome mentions as existing in his time. The doctors of it busied themselves from the sixth century in gathering all the critical and grammatical observations they could find which might contribute to fix the reading and the interpretation of Scripture. These observations were handed on through successive ages, whence the name Masorah; and by some an incredible antiquity was ascribed to them, from at least the time of Ezra. They comprised traditional definitions, precepts, corrections of the text; and when these were committed to writing, it was felt necessary also to settle the pronunciation by vowel-points and accents. The pronunciation itself was not new; it was simply a new mode of expressing it which was then introduced, and which was developed into the elaborate vowel-system at present adopted in Hebrew reading. The Masoretic notes were mainly critical, bearing upon the orthography, the grammar and the explanation of the text which they were to accompany. The Masoretic doctors marked the number of the sections and verses of different books, with the middle verse in each. They further noted the verses which they deemed superfluous, the different readings of words redundant or defective, the letters that were out of their place or inverted, with a vast variety of such minute particulars, and they professed to give the number of times each Hebrew letter occurs in the Bible. These Masoretic notes were written both separately and also on the margin of manuscripts of the sacred books. They were sometimes in full and sometimes abridged, with more added at the end of the text, and according to their length and position they were differently characterized as the "great," the "little," the "textual" and the "final" Masorah. The great Masorah was first printed in Bomberg's rabbinical Bibles, the little is included in most Hebrew Bibles.

The Masorah is of value for textual criticism. We can judge from it of the state of the text in the early centuries after Christ; we see also with what care the Jews preserved the sacred oracles entrusted to them; for when these doctors supposed a reading was false, they did not venture to alter it, but simply added in the margin that which they considered preferable. And many of these marginal suggestions deserve great respect. For example, in Ps. c. 3, for "not we ourselves," the Masoretes propose "his we are," by the change of but a single Hebrew letter, with no difference of pronunciation. Our translators have introduced many of these Masoretic notes into the margin of our version, as in the example just given.

MASPHA (mas'fa). 1. 1 Macc. iii. 46, Mizpeh in Benjamin. 2. 1 Macc. v. 35, probably Mizpeh in Gilead.

MASREKAH (mas-re'ka), the seat of one of the early kings of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 36.

MASSA (mas'sa), one of the sons of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 14. His descendants may have been the Masani in Arabia Deserta.

MASSAH (mas'sah), "temptation," a name given to the place where the Israelites encamped in Rephidim. The people had no water to drink, therefore "they did chide with Moses, . . . and Moses said, Why do ye chide with me? wherefore do ye tempt the Lord?" Ex. xvii. 2. When water was procured from the smitten rock, Moses "called the name of the place Massah, 'temptation,' and Meribah," ver. 7. Ever after this period the sacred writers, when speaking of this event, call the place Massah, and not Rephidim, Deut. vi. 16; ix. 22; xxxiii. 8. So also, in Ps. xc. 8, which ought to be translated, "Harden not your heart as in Meribah, as in the day of Massah, in the wilderness." For the geographical position of Massah see REPHIDIM.

MASSIAS (mas-se'as), 1 Esd. ix. 22, identical with Maaseiah, Ezra x. 22.

MASSILLON (mas-seel-yong), JEAN BAPTISTE, an eminent French preacher, was born in 1663, at Hieres, in Provence. He entered into the congregation of the Oratory, and became so celebrated for his eloquence that the general of his order called him to Paris, where he drew crowds of hearers. Louis XIV., who knew the value of a kingly compliment, and seldom passed a bad one, observed to him, "When I hear other preachers, I go away much pleased with them; but when I hear you, I go away displeased with myself." In 1717 he was made bishop of Clermont, was admitted two years later to the French academy, and died in 1742. His discourses are distinguished for simplicity, a graceful flow of eloquence, great knowledge of the human heart and a richness of ideas.

MASSUET (mas'su-ay'), RENÉ, a learned French Benedictine, of the congregation of Saint Maur, was born in 1666, at Saint Ouen, in Normandy. He devoted himself to the monastic life at the abbey of Notre Dame de Lyre in 1682, and became distinguished for his proficiency in ancient literature, particularly in the writings of the Fathers and ecclesiastical antiquities. In 1710 he published an excellent edition of the works of Irenæus, more full and complete than any that had hitherto appeared. He was engaged by his superiors on a continuation of the "Lives of the Saints" and the "Annals of the Benedictine Order." In the midst of the latter work he was seized by a paralytic stroke, of which he died in 1716.

MASTER (mas'ter), the head of a household, Gen. xxxix. 20; Ps. cxxiii. 2; Col. iii. 22; iv. 1. A chief man or public instructor, Luke vi. 40; John iii. 10; Matt. xxiii. 8, 10. Hence our Lord was frequently addressed by this title, Matt. xxii. 16, 24, 36.

MASTERS (mas'terz), ROBERT, an English divine and antiquary, was born at London in 1713, and was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he obtained a Fellowship. In 1756 he was presented to the rectory of Landbeach, in Cambridgeshire, which he afterward resigned to one of his sons-in-law, though he continued to reside in the place, and died there in 1798. He also had the vicarage of Linton, which he exchanged for that of Waterbeach. He was the author of a most complete "History of Corpus Christi College" and several other works.

MASTICK TREE (mas'tik tree), Sus. 54. The tree intended is the Pistacia lentiscus, mastich tree, producing a fragrant resin. There is in the original Greek a play on the words schinos and schisei, the first signifying the tree, the latter, Sus. 55, the cutting.

MATHANIAS (ma-tha-ni'as), 1 Esd. ix. 31, identical with Mattaniah, Ezra x. 30.

MATHER (ma'ther), INCREASE and COTTON, two learned American divines. The former was born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, in 1639. His father emigrated from England in 1636, and took an important ecclesiastical position as pastor in Dorchester. Increase graduated at Harvard, and became its president in 1685. He was eminent both as a preacher, a writer and a politician. He supported the colonial charter against the English government, and visited England in 1688, where he obtained a new charter. He was a laborious student, and left no less than eighty-five publications. He died in 1723.

COTTON, son of the preceding, was born at Boston in 1663. A precocious intellect was sedulously cultivated, so that at twelve years of age he had read the Latin and some of the Greek classics, and "a mountain of learning and theology was heaped" upon him. Leaving college, he taught for a time, and in 1684 he was ordained. His life is an unbroken scene of scrupulous dedication of himself to devout work, both by his writings and actions, taking also a lively interest in political matters, promoting charities, encouraging temperance and ameliorating the condition of negroes. The only cloud on his bright reputation is his persecution of persons accused of witchcraft. The great work of Cotton Mather is the "Magnalia Christi Americana," being the ecclesiastical history of New England, and including the civil history of the times and over eighty biographies, to which he afterward added more. His "Christian Philosopher" holds the next place, and the "Essays to do Good," an abridgment of which is still popular, and of which Franklin wrote it "gave me such a turn of thinking as to have an influence on my conduct through life." He died in 1728.

MATHER (math'er), RICHARD, the first of a family of nonconformist divines of considerable reputation both in the Old and New Worlds, was born at Lowton, in Lancashire, England, in 1596, and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. He afterward took orders, but in 1633 he was suspended for nonconformity; and although this suspension was soon taken off, his prejudices against the Church Establishment became so strong that he determined to settle in New England, where, in 1635, he was chosen minister of a congregation newly formed at Dorchester, where he remained until his death, in 1669.

MATHEW (ma'thu), THEOBALD, "Father Mathew," apostle of temperance, was born at Thomastown House, Tipperary, in 1790. He was remarkable in childhood for beauty and sweetness of disposition, and by a casual word of his mother was determined his devotion to the priestly office. He was sent to Maynooth, but left it suddenly in 1808, and joined the Capuchin Minorites, and in 1814 he was ordained priest. After a short residence at Kilkenny, where, as preacher in the Friary church, he became very popular, he settled at Cork, and with great earnestness and faithfulness devoted himself to his work. The daily sights and sounds of the streets of Cork, and the fearful prevalence of drunkenness, deeply moved his compassionate heart, and another chance word, spoken by a Quaker, sufficed to make him the apostle of temperance. He applied himself to the task about 1837, toiled for a year and a half before any impression seemed to be made on the enormous mass of evil and misery, and then success began and rapidly rose to a full tide, and the name and fame of this better "Liberator" spread over the world. The most overpowering enthusiasm attended him in all the towns he visited, and from twenty to forty thousand persons are said to have pledged themselves to abstinence in a day. He extended his mission with like success to the principal towns of England and to the United States, and throughout his life he worked unweariedly in his chosen field. His thoughtless liberality involved him in pecuniary difficulties which threw a shadow over his life. During his latter years he received a pension from the government. He died at Queenstown, December 8, 1857.

MATHUSALA (ma-thu'sa-la), Luke iii. 37, the Greek form of Methuselah.

MATILDA (ma-til'da), countess of Tuscany, daughter of Boniface III., marquis of Tuscany, was born in 1046. She succeeded in 1054 to her father's domains. On the breaking out of the war between Gregory VII. and the emperor Henry IV., Matilda espoused the cause of the pope with all the energy of her womanly devotion; and at her death she bequeathed to the Church all her feudal estates, a source of endless contests between Rome and the empire in the twelfth century. The scene at the castle of Canossa, in 1077, when Gregory VII., who was there as her guest, compelled the German emperor to submit to the famous penance, is one of the most striking incidents of mediæval history. She died in 1115.

MATRED (mat'red), the mother of Mehetabel, wife of Hadar, a king of Edom, 1 Chr. i. 50.

MATRI (mat'ri), a Benjamite to whose family Saul belonged, 1 Sam. x. 21.

MATTAN (mat'tan). 1. A priest of Baal, slain at the deposition and death of Athaliah, 2 Ki. xi. 18. 2. One whose son in Jeremiah's time is reckoned among the princes, Jer. xxxviii. 1.

MATTANAH (mat-ta'nah), a station in the border of Moab, between Beer, the well which called forth an Israelitish song, and Nahaliel, Num. xxi. 18; described by Jerome as "situated in Arnon, twelve miles distant, toward Medeba on the east." We have no other notices of it.

MATTANIAH (mat-ta-ni'ah), a very common name among the Israelites, especially in later times, and among the priests and Levites, though none of them attained to a place of distinction; a son of Heman, 1 Chr. xxv. 4; three descendants of Asaph, 1 Chr. ix. 15; 2 Chr. xx. 14; xxix. 13; a son of Elam, Ezra x. 26; with several others, Ezra x. 27, 30, 37; Neh. xiii. 13. The only person of some note who bore the name of Mattaniah was the last king of Judah, but whose name on coming to the throne was changed by Nebuchadnezzar to Zedekiah. It is by this latter name that he is generally known and has a place in history.

MATTATHA (mat-ta'thah), a grandson of David, one of our Lord's ancestors, Luke iii. 31.

MATTATHAH (mat-ta'thah), one who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 33.

MATTATHIAS (mat-ta-thi'as). 1. 1 Esd. ix. 43, identical with Mattithiah, Neh. viii. 4. 2.

MATTHAT (mat'that). 1, 2. Two persons in the list of our Lord's ancestors, Luke iii. 24, 29.

MATTHELAS (mat'the-las), 1 Esd. ix. 19, identical with Maaseiah, Ezra x. 18.

MATTHEW (math'u), who is generally acknowledged to be the author of the first Gospel, appears, from the identity of the circumstances related in Matt. ix. 2-9, Mark ii. 1-14 and Luke v. 17-28, to be the same person as Levi, the son of Alphæus. He was a publican, or receiver of customs, and pursued this occupation at Capernaum, on the Sea of Galilee, having his toll-house near the lake; but not so much with a view to any traffic conducted upon it as to the traffic upon the highway between Damascus and the sea-port towns of Phœnicia, which passed by the borders of the lake and through the town. Of Matthew's character and feelings previous to his being called to the apostleship we know nothing, although the fact that he followed the despised and hated occupation of a publican might lead us to believe that even then his mind had recoiled from the Judaism of his day. This much at least appears from the whole character of his Gospel—that that which afterward chiefly attracted him in the words of Jesus was the proclamation of a true kingdom of God, of a true righteousness, as opposed to the selfishness, hypocrisy and Pharisaism which he beheld around him. And as the natural tendencies of character are sanctified and not destroyed by the Spirit, it is not unreasonable to think that the choice of his profession may at least have been facilitated by a total want of sympathy with the empty formalism of his countrymen.

The circumstances attending his call to follow Christ are related by three of the evangelists, Matt. ix. 9; Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27, 28, and need not be repeated. It is every way probable that before that time he had made at least some acquaintance with the teaching and miracles of Jesus, and that he had been struck with the contrast between his own old notions of religion and that manifestation of its fresh and living power which he beheld in the Redeemer. No sooner, therefore, did Jesus address to him the words "Follow me," than he "left all, rose up and followed him."

Of Matthew's history subsequent to his call to the apostleship we know almost nothing. We learn from Acts i. 13 that he was one of those who, after the ascension of our Lord, assembled in the upper room at Jerusalem. Tradition makes him continue in that city fifteen years, preaching to his fellow-countrymen. Afterward he is said to have gone to other lands for the same purpose—to Southern Arabia, according to some; to Ethiopia, or Macedonia, or Parthia, or Upper Syria near the Euphrates, according to others. The accounts vary so much that little reliance can be placed on any of them. Nor does the story of his martyrdom in Persia, although celebrated in the martyrologies both of the Eastern and Western Church, seem to deserve more credit. According to the oldest and most trustworthy authorities, he died a natural death. Enough for us that he was chosen of God to be one of the relators of the history of Him before whom all his servants must "decrease," and that he is the author of our first canonical Gospel.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF. It is evident that this Gospel was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, see ch. xxiv. 15; but there is no further clue to its date. Some think that it was composed as early as A. D. 37; others as late as A. D. 63. The most probable period is somewhere between eight and sixteen years after our Lord's ascension, or between A. D. 42 and A. D. 50.

The Gospel of Matthew bears marks throughout of having been written by a Christian Hebrew who was not only familiar with the sacred writings of his nation, but deeply imbued with their spirit. And his chief object in writing the life of Jesus appears to have been to show that the despised Teacher of Nazareth is really the long-promised and expected King of Israel. He finds the lawful heir to David's throne in a humble workshop in a Galilean village, and sees in Joseph's adopted child the "IMMANUEL" of Isaiah. He records the dangers and deliverances of the infancy of Jesus from the jealousy of a rival, and observes in them the illustration and fulfillment of "that which was spoken by the prophets." The teachings of Jesus are here presented as the completion of the ancient law by the King of Israel; and his labors and miracles, and all the circumstances of his sufferings and death, are the accomplishment of the prophecies which related to the Son of David. And of our Lord's predictions those are here preserved which relate either to the persecution of his disciples by the Jews or to the overthrow of the Jewish state, which the ancient prophets had connected with the establishment of the spiritual kingdom of Israel, comp. ch. xxiv. with Isa. lxvi. This Gospel is consequently the fittest to stand first (as it was probably composed first), for it exhibits most fully the connection between the Old Testament and the New. It was also the most adapted to the Hebrew people, for whom, in the first instance, the writer seems to have designed it.

It results, from this plan of the Gospel of Matthew, that the order of time, though not altogether neglected, is made subordinate to the development of the great idea. Events are grouped together according to their bearing upon that part of the Messiah's character and work which the evangelist is delineating. For instance, the choice and call of the apostles are not mentioned at the time when they occurred, but are introduced in a parenthesis, when he is about to relate the charge which our Lord gave them as the heralds of his reign.

Many of the ancient Fathers assert that Matthew wrote in Hebrew, by which they mean Aramæan. This opinion has been adopted by many recent critics, partly on the ground that this Gospel was designed for the inhabitants of Palestine, where the common people spoke this language. Others pay little regard to the authority of the Fathers in this matter, on account of their frequent palpable mistakes on such subjects; and they remark that at the time when Matthew wrote, though Hebrew was preferred by the Jews, Greek was rapidly superseding it even in Palestine, and was understood by the mass of the people. Greek, too, was the more suitable for a book of permanent and universal interest, and was accordingly used by James and by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, though they wrote to the Jews. The Greek of Matthew, too, bears all the marks of being an original composition; and as no Hebrew Gospel of Matthew is now in existence, it would be needful to adduce some strong reason for believing that an inspired volume has been lost. A few have endeavored to reconcile both views by supposing that Matthew wrote a shorter narrative in Hebrew, and then composed this Gospel in Greek. But of this there is no proof. Although it is difficult to decide the question, the balance of probabilities is against a Hebrew original, especially as the ancient Fathers seem to have taken the apocryphal Gospel of the Ebionites for a Hebrew original of Matthew; and some of them, upon a discovery of the mistake, appear to have altered their opinion. The subject, however, though interesting, is not of any great practical importance, as the Greek Gospel, if a translation, was early received as authoritative.

The Gospel by Matthew may be divided as follows:

I. The genealogy, birth and infancy of the King Messiah, ch. i., ii.

II. The proclamation of his reign; his inauguration by baptism and by the "anointing of the Holy Ghost;" and his first great conflict with Satan, ch. iii., iv. 1-11.

III. His public life in Galilee, in preaching, teaching and healing; comprising—1. The introduction, ch. iv. 12-25. 2. The promulgation of his gracious law, ch. v., vi., vii. 3. His works of power and goodness, ch. viii., ix. 1-34. 4. His compassion manifested in sending forth laborers, with their instructions, ch. ix. 35-38; x.; xi. 1. 5. Various forms of hostility to himself, and his servants and their work, ch. xi. 2-30; xii., xiii. 6. Circumstances connected with the fame and popularity resulting from his work, ch. xiv., xv., xvi. 1-12.

IV. His progress to the royal city and the important events which occurred there; including—1. Preparatory revelations respecting his personal glory, mission and destiny, with some practical lessons, ch. xvi. 13-28; xvii., xviii. 2. His journey through Peræa to Jerusalem, ch. xix., xx. 3. His public entry into the city and the purification of the temple, ch. xxi. 1-17. 4. His reproofs of the Jews, and especially of their religious guides, whom he denounces and threatens as fruitless, disobedient, caviling, hypocritical and tyrannical, ch. xxi. 18-46; xxii., xxiii. 5. His predictions of the destruction of the temple and city and the overthrow of the national polity, followed by exhortations to watchfulness and a description of the final judgment, of which these nearer events were representative, ch. xxiv., xxv. 6. His betrayal and death, with preliminary and attendant circumstances, ch. xxvi., xxvii. 7. His resurrection from the dead and his commission and promise to his disciples, ch. xxviii.

MATTHEW PARIS, a Benedictine monk who flourished in the reign of Henry III. He is said to have enjoyed the favor of the king, and to have been sent on a mission to Norway by Pope Innocent IV. He was a mathematician, poet, divine and historian; a man of great accomplishments and of rare integrity. His principal work is the "Historia Major," a history of England from 1066, the period of the Norman Conquest, to 1259, the year in which he died. He also wrote an epitome of this work, and the "Lives of the Abbots of St. Albans."

MATTHEW, TOBIAS, an eminent prelate, was born at Bristol in 1546, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He then entered into orders, and in 1569 he was elected public orator of the university. After filling several ecclesiastical positions, he was in 1573 elected president of Saint John's College, Oxford, at which time, being in high reputation as a preacher, he was appointed one of the queen's chaplains in ordinary. He received high praise from his contemporaries, one of whom says that learning and piety, art and nature, vied together in his composition. In 1595 he was consecrated bishop of Durham. He attended the Hampton Court Conference, in 1603, of which he gave an account at large to Archbishop Hutton. In 1606 he was translated to the archiepiscopal see of York. He died at Cawood in 1628, and was buried in Our Lady's Chapel in York Minster, where a long Latin epitaph is inscribed on his tomb. Archbishop Matthew appears to have been a man of great wit, of a sweet disposition, very bountiful and learned, and as a divine most exemplarily conscientious and indefatigable both in preaching and other duties. He kept a record of all the sermons which he preached, and it appears that while dean of Durham he preached seven hundred and twenty-one sermons, while bishop of Durham five hundred and fifty, and while archbishop of York seven hundred and twenty-one, in all no less than nineteen hundred and ninety-two sermons. No preferment kept him from duty, and there was scarcely a pulpit in the region covered by the dioceses of Durham and York in which he had not preached. His widow, after his death, gave his library of three thousand books for the use of the Church. She was a remarkable woman, of great intelligence and piety. She was the daughter of a bishop, had four sisters married to bishops, "so that a bishop was her father, an archbishop her father-in-law, she had four bishops her brethren and an archbishop her husband."

MATTHEW OF WESTMINSTER, an English historian of the fourteenth century. He was a Benedictine monk of the abbey of Westminster, and is highly esteemed for his veracity, acuteness and diligence. His "Flores Historiarum" is a kind of universal history, beginning at the creation and coming down to the year 1307.

MATTHIAS (mat-thi'as), one of our Lord's disciples, possibly of the number of the seventy, who was chosen by lot to be an apostle in the place of Judas Iscariot, Acts i. 23-26. No other particulars of his history are certainly known. Various traditions describe him as preaching in Ethiopia, or in Colchis, and being there martyred; or, according to yet another account, as preaching in Judæa, and being stoned by the Jews.

MATTHIAS, emperor of the West, son of Maximilian II., was born in 1557. He was elected king of Hungary in 1607, king of Bohemia in 1611, and on the death of Rudolph, in the following year, he was chosen emperor. He resigned the crown of Bohemia to his cousin Ferdinand in 1617, and the persecution of the Protestants in that country by the latter occasioned the Thirty Years' War. Matthias died, broken down by the sense of the calamities impending over his dominions, in 1619.

MATTITHIAH (mat-te-thi'ah). 1. A Levite of the family of the Korahites who had charge of things made (for the offerings) in pans, 1 Chr. ix. 31. 2. A Levite porter appointed to play the harp, 1 Chr. xv. 18, 21. 3. A son of Jeduthun, chief of one of the courses of singers, 1 Chr. xxv. 3, 21; he may have been identical with No. 2. 4. One who had taken a foreign wife, Ezra x. 43. 5. Perhaps a Levite who stood by the side of Ezra when he read the law, Neh. viii. 4.

MATTOCK (mat'tok). There are two Hebrew words nearly allied which are rendered "share" and "mattock" in our version of 1 Sam. iii. 20. These are two agricultural cutting instruments, of which one is thought to denote the ploughshare and the other the coultter. The plural, occurring in 21, "mattocks," of both words is alike. In Isa. vii. 25 the word translated "mattock" is probably a weeding-hook, or hoe.

MAUL (mawl), a mace or war-club, Prov. xxv. 18. But in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 6, marg., where the word appears in our version, mattocks being in the text, it is questionable whether any implement is meant. It might be better to translate "with" or "in their ruins." The cities of the northern kingdom had been desolated, but the altars still subsisting in these wasted places Josiah destroyed.

MAUR (mawr), SAINT, a disciple of Saint Benedict, who died about 584, abbot of Glanseuil, in Anjou. A congregation bearing his name was formed in France in 1618. Pope Gregory XV. gave it his approval in 1621, and Urban VIII. granted it new privileges in 1627. The report of the sanctity of this congregation induced several bishops, abbots and monks to submit their monasteries to the direction of its superior, so that the congregation at last became divided into six provinces, of which each contained about twenty religious houses. The advantages which letters have derived from this famous congregation, whose researches took in the whole circle of sciences, philosophy excepted, are well known.

MAURAND (maw'rand), PETER, a leading man among the Albigenses in Languedoc, born of an illustrious family of Toulouse in the twelfth century. In consequence of his zeal in denouncing the corruptions of popery, he was stripped of his property and condemned, after severe trials, to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and there to administer to the relief of the indigent. He underwent this sentence and returned to Toulouse, where he died in 1199.

MAURICE (maw-rees'), emperor of the East, was born in Cappadocia, A. D. 539. He rendered great services to the empire under Justin and Tiberius, especially in his four campaigns in Persia, 578-581, and on his return to Constantinople, in 582, was declared Cæsar, and soon after crowned emperor. During his reign John, patriarch of Constantinople, assumed the title of universal bishop, with the sanction or connivance of the emperor; and in 595 the pope, Gregory the Great, indignant at this claim of supremacy, wrote letters of remonstrance to the emperor, who, however, only treated him with contempt. Hence the triumph of Gregory in the fall of the emperor and his shameful flattery of the tyrant Phocas. In 602 a mutiny broke out in the army on the Danube; Phocas was proclaimed emperor, and Maurice with his five sons was murdered at Chalcedon.

MAURICE, an eminent bishop of London of the eleventh century, became famous as the re-founder of the cathedral of St. Paul. He began his work in A. D. 1086. The former church and a large part of the city had been destroyed by fire, and now the plan was devised for constructing a cathedral which would vie with the most splendid churches of any land. Maurice built the nave, which was acknowledged to be superior to any other work in England. Richard de Beaumes, his successor, began the transepts in 1120, and in 1199 they were finished by Richard Fitz-Nele. The choir and the chapter-house were begun in 1220, and Bishop Wingham erected the cloisters in 1260, and lastly the Lady Chapel was begun in 1310 by Bishop Baldock. The cathedral when finished was of unusual magnificence and size. The nave, familiarly termed "Paul's Walk" in the old plays, was two hundred and ninety feet long, by one hundred and twenty feet wide, while the vaulting of the roof was one hundred and two feet high. The central tower and spire were the loftiest in Europe, rising to a height of five hundred and thirty-four feet, while, according to Dugdale, the whole structure covered "three acres and a half, one rood and a half and six perches." The space now known as "St. Paul's Churchyard" was enclosed by a wall with six gate-houses, the principal one entering on the west front opposite Ludgate Hill; and in the middle of the yard, on the north side, stood the celebrated cross known as "Paul's Cross," where sermons were preached, and assemblies of the citizens were held for public occasions.

The great fire of 1666 so damaged this building that it was impossible to restore it, and in 1673 a commission was appointed to superintend the preparation of plans for a new edifice; and in 1675 the warrant was issued for commencing the work. The first stone was laid by the architect, Sir Christopher Wren, on the 21st of June, 1675. In ten years the walls of the choir and aisles were finished, together with the northern and southern porticos, and the great piers of the dome were brought to the same height. On the 1st of February, 1699, the highest and last stone was laid by Sir Christopher Wren, and thus this great cathedral church was completed in the period of five and thirty years, under the superintendence of one architect, under the direction of one principal mason and during the occupation of the see of London by one bishop; and it is worthy of notice that it remains without alteration or addition since its original erection, with the exception of the introduction of colored glass in a few of the windows.

St. Paul's Cathedral, one of the most conspicuous objects of the British capital, stands in the very centre and on the most elevated part of the city of London. The edifice is entirely built of fine Portland stone and on the plan of a Roman cross. The whole length of the church, with its portico, is five hundred feet, and the width of the western front is one hundred and eighty feet. The transepts are two hundred and fifty feet long internally, and the linear measurement of the whole building is twenty-two hundred and ninety-two feet. The dome, which rises from the huge piers at the crossing of the transepts, choir and nave, is one hundred and forty-five feet in diameter, and it is the most magnificent feature in the building, and generally it is spoken of in terms of unqualified admiration; as it is conceded that "for dignity and elegance no church in Europe affords an example worthy of comparison with the cupola of St. Paul's." From the ground to the top of the cross, the entire height of the dome and lantern is three hundred and forty feet. The monuments in this cathedral are generally erected to the memory of statesmen, generals and men who have distinguished themselves in the civil departments of life. The bishops who have presided over the diocese have been men who for intellect, learning, moral and religious worth, and every attribute which dignifies humanity, have stood prominent among the most famous characters of their age.

MAURICE, elector of Saxony, was born in 1521. He bore an important, but not consistent, part in the German wars to which the Reformation gave rise. He was a man of ambitious character, and his policy seems to have been guided by selfish motives rather than by religious principle. He at first sided with the Protestant princes, but subsequently joined the emperor Charles V., not only against the Turks, but also against the Protestant princes of the League of Smalcald. For the efficient help he rendered at Mühlberg, the emperor bestowed on him the crown and territories of his uncle, the elector; but five years after, he led the troops of France and some of the German princes against the emperor, and obtained from him at Passau favorable terms for the Protestants, which laid the foundation of the liberties of the German Protestant Church. He did not live to see the work accomplished, for in the next year, 1553, he died in battle at Sivershausen.

MAURY (mow're), JEAN SIFFREIN, a French cardinal, was born in 1746, studied at Lyons, and on entering into orders became a celebrated preacher at Paris. When the Revolution broke out, he was chosen one of the representatives of the clergy in the States-General, where he distinguished himself by his eloquence in behalf of his order, and also in defence of royalty. On the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly he went to Italy, was nominated bishop of Nicæa and in 1794 made a cardinal; and in 1808 Napoleon gave him the archbishopric of Paris. But in 1814 he was obliged to quit the archiepiscopal palace and retire to Rome. He was the author of several works, the best of which is his "Essay on Pulpit Eloquence." He died in 1817.

MAUZZIM, Dan. xi. 38, marg. In the text of the place referred to we have "the god of forces." There have been many conjectures as to the meaning and the deity intended. The suggestion of Gesenius that it was a Syrian god obtruded upon the Jews—perhaps Jupiter Capitolinus, for whom Antiochus built a temple at Antioch—is as feasible as any.

MAWSON (maw'sun), MATTHIAS, was one of the most eminent bishops in the Church of England during the eighteenth century. He was educated at Cambridge, where he became a Fellow and afterward master of Corpus Christi College. He declined the bishopric of Gloucester in 1734, because he conceived that Dr. Rundle had been injuriously treated; but in 1738 he accepted the see of Llandaff, from which he was translated to Chichester. Here he commenced extensive repairs in the cathedral at his own cost, but he was removed to Ely in 1754. He proved himself to be a great benefactor to the whole region embraced by the diocese, including drainage, roads, bridges and improvements in the fens. He promoted education, intellectual and religious, and he founded the large number of twelve scholarships in his own college at Cambridge. He died in 1777 at an advanced age, and was buried in the cathedral; he was deservedly highly esteemed and beloved.

MAXFIELD (max'feeld), THOMAS, was one of the most celebrated of the early Wesleyan preachers. He was greatly concerned about religion after having heard John Wesley preaching at Bristol; and without waiting for ordination he began to preach at the Foundery, in London, in the absence of Wesley, who, hearing of the young man's course, hastened up to London to restrain him. The result, however, was that Wesley's High-Church views gave way; and thus Maxfield became the first of the great band of itinerant lay-preachers who have been so instrumental in spreading abroad the tidings of the gospel. In process of time he was ordained by the bishop of London-derry. Eventually he fell under the influence of a man named Bell, who led him into fanatical proceedings and views which were erroneous respecting personal sanctification. He separated from Wesley and founded a chapel, where he preached for twenty years. Shortly before his death John Wesley visited him, and as an evidence of sympathy and regard he preached in his chapel.

MAXIMILIAN (max-i-mil'yan) I., emperor of the West, was born in 1459. In 1486 he was elected king of the Romans, and in 1493 he succeeded his father in the empire. He was the first who took the title of emperor without being crowned at Rome. In 1518 he assembled the Diet of Augsburg, at which Luther, just commencing his great task, appeared on citation and appealed to the pope. Maximilian was not only ambitious of dominion and successful in his schemes of aggrandizement, but he had the desire to be pope and to be canonized. He died in January, 1519.

MAXIMUS (max'i-mus), SAINT, was born in 580. He resided at the court of Heraclius for the purpose of writing the history of the emperors, and became his chief secretary. When this prince adopted the Monothelite heresy, Maximus retired to a monastery. Going to Rome, he did much to persuade Martin I. to call the Lateran Council, and was joined with him in the order of arrest issued by Constans. He was banished to Byzias, and fell a victim to the cruelties of his enemies. His death occurred in 662.

MAXIMUS OF TURIN, a celebrated bishop of that see in the fifth century. He was present at the Synod of Milan, in which the provincial bishops were obliged to support with their sentence what Pope Leo wrote to the patriarch Havianus against Eutyches. He was also present at the Council of Rome in 465, and is said to have died in the following year. He was the author of several homilies, which are still extant, and though short are for the most part commendable both for their eloquence and piety.

MAXIMUS, TYRIUS, a celebrated philosopher in the second century, was a native of Tyre, in Phœnicia, whence he took his name. He resided principally at Athens, but sometimes visited Rome. He appears to have adopted the principles of the Platonic school, with some tendency toward skepticism. Forty-one of his dissertations on various philosophical topics are still extant, and are written in a pleasing style.

MAXWELL (max'wel), LADY, who became celebrated in Edinburgh for her life of piety and practical godliness, was the daughter of Thomas Brisbane, in the county of Ayr. She was born in 1742, educated in Edinburgh, and at an early period she became the wife of Sir Walter Maxwell. The unexpected death of a child became the occasion, under the divine blessing, of deciding her future course of living altogether for the Lord. In 1764 she came under the influence of John Wesley when he visited Edinburgh, and ever afterward she was advised by him in the formation and carrying out of all her plans for usefulness. The school which she established in 1770, in Edinburgh, has been greatly blessed, and all her schemes for advancing religion among the careless masses of the population were remarkably acknowledged by the Lord. Her order and regularity in all duties, the value which she attached to time, the wisdom with which she used the means which she possessed, and the high-toned yet gentle, attractive piety which she displayed have given her a special prominence among the Christian women of her age. She died in 1810.

MAY, JAMES, D.D., an eminent divine and professor in the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, was born in 1805, in Chester county, Pennsylvania. He was educated at Jefferson College and in the theological seminary at Alexandria, Virginia. His first charge was at Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, whence he removed to St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia. During his residence in that city he took part in the management of the "Episcopal Recorder." He spent two years in foreign travel, and on his return he became professor of pastoral theology and ecclesiastical history at Alexandria. In 1861 he retired from Alexandria to Philadelphia, and became professor of ecclesiastical history and systematic theology in the theological school which had been lately established in that city. He was greatly beloved by all who knew him, and he did a great work in training the large body of ministers who had been under his care. He died in 1863.

MAYA (may'ah) is a philosophical expression among the Hindoos used to designate the power by which the phenomena of the physical universe are created and so sustained as to make impressions on our senses. This doctrine of Hindooism is allied to that of Berkeley on perception, who held that sensations were caused by that which existed out of ourselves, and which was continued in being by the divine power. In the Hindoo theology it is the name of the wife of Brahma.

MAYER (may'er), JOHN FREDERIC, a learned German Lutheran divine, was born at Leipsic in 1650. He was very deeply read in the Latin, Greek and Hebrew languages, and he became professor successively at Wittenberg, Hamburg and Stettin, in Pomerania, and was appointed superintendent-general of the churches in the district of that city. He died in 1712. Among his works are "The History of Martin Luther's German Version of the Bible" and "Bibliotheca Biblica."

MAYNOOTH (may'nooth) is the name of the village situated about twelve miles west of Dublin at which the great theological college of the Irish Roman Catholic Church has been erected. For a long period the Romish clergy of Ireland had been educated at Salamanca, Alcalá, Rome, Douay, Paris and other places on the Continent of Europe. When the French Revolution broke out, intercourse with the Continent became difficult, and a desire began to be expressed that a seminary should be established in Ireland, where under home influence the Irish priesthood might be trained, without being affected by the principles which at the time were so extensively disorganizing the other nations of Europe. The government of the day favored the scheme, and a measure was carried through Parliament in 1795 which established the college and secured for it an endowment of eight thousand pounds sterling per annum. About the year 1835 a controversy which attracted great attention was commenced respecting the text-books which were used in the college, and many petitions were forwarded to Parliament praying that the support of the government might be withdrawn from the institution. The agitation, which was continued for several years, resulted in a large parliamentary grant for the erection of additional buildings, and the general furnishing of the institution with all appliances for the use of a first-class college. Thirty thousand pounds sterling were given for that object, and about one hundred and seventy thousand dollars per annum were voted for its yearly support. This measure was carried by the government of the day over determined opposition. In 1869, when the Irish Episcopal Church was disestablished, the government commuted the yearly grant to Maynooth, giving a sum at once in hand which represented the value of all the receipts from the government of all persons holding any office in the college at Maynooth. Thus the college has now been permanently and very amply endowed by this measure, and it is no longer liable to have its support withdrawn by an adverse parliamentary vote. In this sense it has been "disestablished," or, in other words, it has been placed at once on a secure basis, instead of encountering the risk of having its support modified or withdrawn, according to the feeling of leading statesmen whose views might change at any time. The college is happily situated in a fertile region. The establishment is of great magnitude, and the professors are so numerous as to enable them to direct the students to every department of theological literature which is included in a Romish course.

MAYO (may'o), RICHARD, who distinguished himself in Oxford University, and rose to be president of Magdalen College because of his administrative capacity and great learning, was made chancellor of the university. He became almoner to Henry VII., and in 1505 he was raised to the see of Hereford, over which he presided for eleven years. He was held in such estimation that a costly and splendid monument was erected to his memory in the south aisle of the choir, which has long attracted the admiration of spectators because of the beauty of its fan tracery, its pendants, its arches and crocketed canopies, with highly enriched pinnacles. He bequeathed his mitre, pastoral staff and five hundred marks to the cathedral.

MAZARIN (maz'a-rene), JULES, who was descended from a noble Italian family, was born in 1602 and educated at Rome and in Spain. He accompanied Cardinal Sachetti into Lombardy, and became effective in securing peace between the French and the Spaniards. The pope sent him as nuncio extraordinary, in 1634, to the court of France, and he entered the service of the French king in 1639, was made ambassador to Turin, and in 1642 he succeeded Richelieu as prime minister of France. He encountered great opposition in his administration, but he eventually prevailed.

He advocated the despotic principles under which Louis XIV. acted. He was inferior to Richelieu as an administrator, and great corruption prevailed under his management of affairs. He founded and endowed the college called after his name, and he enriched it by the gift of his vast library. He was subtle, unreliable, had few virtues, and his policy was to aim at being safe during his own time. He died in 1661.

MAZDAK (maz'dak), or MAZDEK (maz'dek), a famous Persian priest and impostor, was born at Istakhar about A. D. 501. Taking advan-

"twelve signs or constellations" in the margin. Mazzaroth is found in Job xxxviii. 32 ("the twelve sings," margin). The name may have been given from the popular belief in the influence of the constellations over the destiny of men, thus prefiguring future events. That by Mazzaroth, or Mazzaloth, are meant the signs of the zodiac, there can be little doubt. The authority of the Targums and of later Jewish writers fully confirms this supposition.

McCALLA (mak-kawl'la), WILLIAM LATTA, who was born in 1788, in Kentucky, and edutage of a famine, followed by a pestilence, which desolated the country, he excited an insurrection, and preached the necessity of a community of goods and a general equality of civil rights. He obtained a vast multitude of adherents, and at length made a disciple of the king himself. Mazdak was afterward put to death by Khosrow.

MAZITIAS (maz-e-ti'as), 1 Esd. ix. 35, identical with Mattithiah, Ezra x. 43.

MAZZAROTH (maz'za-röth), "prognostications." This word is most likely another form of Mazzaloth, "influences," which occurs in 2 Ki. xxiii. 5, rendered "the planets" in the text, ated at Transylvania University, Kentucky, became very eminent in the American Presbyterian Church. His first charge was at Augusta, Kentucky, whence, in 1823, he removed to the Scots' Church, Philadelphia. In 1835 he resigned that church, and afterward preached in the Fourth Church, Philadelphia. In 1839 he removed to Texas, but he returned to Philadelphia again, and for some time he preached at Middleton and Ridley, near the city, and in the Union Church, until 1853, removing to Missouri, and ultimately to Louisiana, where he died in 1859. He was characterized by a remarkable power of precision of expression and keen, sharp logic, combined with an acuteness which made him an able controversalist. He managed several oral discussions on Universalism and Infidelity, and he published several works on these subjects.

McCARTEE (mak-kar'te), ROBERT, D.D., who was born in New York in 1791, and educated at Columbia College, commenced the study of the law, but eventually he decided on the Christian ministry. He was licensed to preach in 1816, called to Philadelphia, whence he returned to New York to the Orange Street Church, which was greatly broken down. He left that church in 1836, having raised it to a degree of remarkable prosperity, and having seen a new edifice erected in Canal Street. He settled for four years at Port Carbon, Pennsylvania, and in 1840 he went to Goshen, New York, from which, in 1856, he removed to his last charge, the Westminster Church in New York. He was remarkable for his fervor, his tenderness and great power as a preacher, and as a man he was greatly beloved. Columbia College gave him a degree in divinity in 1831. He died at Yonkers in 1865.

McCARRON (mak-kar'ron), MICHAEL, D.D., who was eminent as a Romish theologian, was born in 1804, in the county of Monaghan, Ireland. He was educated at Maynooth, and after his ordination, he emigrated and settled at Brooklyn, whence he was removed to New York, and in which city he served in several important churches. He became very influential in promoting the educational views of Archbishop Hughes, and for his services in this cause he was made archdeacon of the diocese of New York. He died in 1867.

McCAUL (mak-kawl'), ALEXANDER, D.D., a distinguished Church of England divine and Hebrew and rabbinical scholar, was born at Dublin, May 16, 1799, and graduated at Trinity College, Dublin. After a short visit to Poland as missionary to the Jews, he was ordained in 1822, and in 1832 became a home missionary of the London Jews Society. He assisted in the translation of the New Testament and the Anglican Liturgy into Hebrew, and was created D.D. honoris causa by the university of Dublin in 1837. Three years later he was named principal of the Hebrew College for Missionary Students, was soon after called to the chair of Hebrew and Rabbinical Literature at King's College, London, and in 1846 to the chair of divinity. He became rector of St. James, Duke's Place, London, in 1843, rector of St. Magnus, London Bridge, in 1850, and on the revival of Convocation was elected proctor for the diocese of London, which office he filled at the time of his decease. Among the numerous writings of Dr. McCaul the most noteworthy are "The Old Paths," "Sketches of Judaism," Warburtonian Lectures, Boyle Lectures and "An Examination of Bishop Colenso's Difficulties." He died November 13, 1863.

McCHEYNE (mak-chain'), ROBERT MURRAY, who became one of the most extensively known and generally admired of the modern preachers of the gospel in Scotland. He was born at Edinburgh in 1813, and educated at the university in that city, where he greatly distinguished himself. He became a proficient in modern languages, in drawing and music. He began his labors in the parish of Larbert in 1835, and in the following year he was ordained and settled in St. Peter's Church, Dundee. The size of this parish, his close study and indefatigable labor affected his health, and he sought relaxation by a tour to the East, along with several ministers who were sent to examine into the condition of the Jews. After his return his health failed, and in 1842 he visited the North of England on a preaching tour. In the following year he undertook a similar work among the dense population of the manufacturing towns, and on his return he sunk under an attack of fever in February, 1843. Few men have ever displayed a more consistent, devoted and godly life than this beloved minister from the time of his awakening until the close of his earthly journey always exhibited. He seemed to live above the world, in holy fellowship with God, and yet he was ceaseless in his diligence, in season and out of season, and few men have been more blessed by the great Head of the Church than he was in awakening and building up immortal souls. The fragrance of his memory will long continue to be felt in Scotland as most precious.

McCLELLAND (mak-klel'land), ALEXANDER, D.D., who was born in 1796, educated at Union College and trained in theology by the Rev. John Anderson, D.D., having been licensed to preach in 1815 by the Associate Presbytery of New York, was elected in the twentieth year of his age as pastor of the Rutgers Street Presbyterian Church, New York. Here his fine talents brought him rapidly into notice, and very soon he stood in the front rank of the eminent men of the city. In 1822 he assumed the duties of the chair of logic, rhetoric and mental philosophy in Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and in 1829 he was transferred to the chair of languages at Rutgers College, from which, in 1832, he was removed to the department of Oriental Literature and Biblical Criticism. He continued as a professor until 1857; and having traveled extensively in Europe, he returned to New Brunswick, where he resided until his death, in 1864. He was celebrated for his boldness and vigor of thought, at times bordering on rashness. In 1834 he was called to explain his views on the subject of spiritual renewal, and he satisfied his brethren that he held and taught the truth. In the pulpit he displayed unwonted power, and his published sermons, though brilliant, fail to give an idea of the effect which his wonderful eloquence displayed. He was a prolific writer, and he left "Lectures on the Epistles to the Romans, the Hebrews," "The Canon and Interpretation of Scripture," besides an excellent "Condensed Hebrew Grammar."

McCLINTOCK (mak-klin'tok), JOHN, D.D., who rose to a position of deserved eminence and literary fame in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Philadelphia in 1814. He was educated in the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1835 he began to preach in the New Jersey Annual Conference. Next year he went as professor of mathematics to Dickinson College, which had been acquired by the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was transferred to the department of classics in the year 1840, and his experience as a teacher showed him that elementary works of a solid character were urgently required, and he began the preparation of a series of Latin and Greek text-books. In 1848 he became editor of the "Quarterly Review," and in this position he served the interests of the Church and of evangelical literature for eight years. Along with Bishop Simpson he visited the Wesleyan Conference in England in 1856 as a deputy, and in 1857 he was placed in St. Paul's Church, New York, where his learning and eloquence attracted great audiences. His next position was at Paris, in France, where he ministered to the congregation in the chapel of the American and Foreign Christian Union, and on his return, in 1864, he was again placed in St. Paul's Church. On the foundation of the Biblical and theological school at Madison, Dr. McClintock was appointed the first president, and he entered on his duties in the year 1867. His health had been greatly weakened by his devotion to study and his ceaseless toil, and it became evident to all who saw him, from the time of his appointment to the presidency, that his life was near its close. He died on the 4th of March, 1870. He was unquestionably one of the most learned, versatile, ready and extensively informed ministers who ever held a position in the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States. Manifold as the works are which he left behind him, and which indicate his mental capacity, his great memorial will ever be the "Encyclopedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature," which he projected, and of which he lived to see three volumes published, being aided in his work by the Rev. James Strong, S.T.D. The plan of the work, its general character, range of subjects and mode of treatment were chiefly determined by Dr. McClintock, and his great range of information admirably qualified him for such a task.

McCONAUGHY (mak-kon'a-ghe), DAVID, D.D., LL.D., a very eminent Presbyterian minister and educator, was born in York county, Pennsylvania, in 1775, and educated at Dickinson College, Carlisle. In 1800 he settled at Upper Marsh Creek, and at length he devoted his analytical mind to the work of education, which was much required in the southern part of Pennsylvania. In 1832 he became president of Washington College and he held this office until 1849. He was an excellent, clear and faithful preacher, and as an educator he had great success. He published "A Summary and Outline of Moral Science," "Tracts on the Trinity and on Infant Baptism," "Discourses on Eminent Characters in Sacred History" and sermons and addresses. He died in 1852.

McDOWELL (mak-dow'el), JOHN, D.D., was one of the most admirable and greatly beloved of the ministers of his day in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church. He was born in 1780, at Bedminster, Somerset county, New York, and educated at Princeton. After a course in theology, he was licensed, and settled in 1804 at Elizabethtown, New Jersey, until 1833, when he was removed to the Central Church, Philadelphia. Both these charges increased in a remarkable degree under his ministry. In 1856 he organized the Spring Garden Church, and settled as pastor in that charge, and here he labored until his death, in 1863. He held an important place in the great schemes of the Church. For fifty years he was a trustee of Princeton College, and from the establishment of the theological seminary at Princeton he was a director of that institution. He was the author of "Bible Questions," "Bible Class Manual" and a "System of Theology."

McDOWELL, WILLIAM ANDERSON, D.D., who became moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States and secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, was born in Somerset county, New Jersey, and educated at Princeton. After graduone of the family from which Saul descended, 1 Chr. viii. 30; ix. 36.

NADABATHA (na-dab'a-thah), 1 Macc. ix. 37, the scene of an attack upon a wedding-party, in revenge for the death of John or Joannan, one of the Maccabean family. The locality has not been ascertained.

NADABBAR (na-dab'bar) is the name of a place in Ethiopia where, according to tradition, the apostle Matthew died as a martyr. Another tradition carried him to Parthia or Persia; but the historian Socrates says that he "went to Ethiopia," and Cave, in his "Lives of the Apostles," records the ordinarily received story that he suffered martyrdom at Nadabbar, though the manner and place of his death are alike unknown.

NADAL (na'dal), BERNARD H., D.D., LL.D., who became eminent among the scholars and the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, was born in Maryland in the year 1815. He was educated at Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and joined the Baltimore Conference in 1835; and after preaching in Maryland, at Washington, Philadelphia, and the others were consecrated in the chapel of Lambeth on Sunday, December 17th, in the first year of Elizabeth's reign. Dr. Burnet discovered an original manuscript of the consecration, and the story is now only referred to as one of the curiosities of ecclesiastical literature.

as an expositor of the Hebrew Scriptures. He wrote commentaries on most of the books of the Old Testament.

NAHBI (nah'bi), the spy selected from the tribe of Naphtali, Num. xiii. 14.

NAHOR (na'hor). 1. One of the postdiluvian patriarchs, father of Terah and grandfather of Abraham, Gen. xi. 22-25. He is called Nachor in Luke iii. 34. 2. A son of Terah. It would seem that he must have accompanied his father to Haran, for it is sometimes styled the city of Nahor, Gen. xi. 26; xxii. 20-24. He is called Nachor in Josh. xxiv. 2.

NAHSHON (nah'shon), the prince of the tribe of Judah in the wilderness, Num. i. 7; Ruth iv. 20. He is also called Naashon, Ex. vi. 23, and Naasson, Matt. i. 4.

NAHUM (na'h'um), one of the minor prophets who is designated, Nah. i. 1, "the Elkoshite." It seems that there was an Elkosh, or Elkosha, in Galilee; and this, there can be little doubt, was the birthplace or residence of Nahum. There is, however, an Assyrian Elkosh on the east of the Tigris, not far from Nineveh; and here it is supposed by Ewald and others that the prophet lived, being one of the Israelites carried captive into Assyria. But taking all the circumstances into consideration, it seems most probable that Nahum lived and prophesied in Palestine; in support of which view there are several passages in which phrases occur similar to those in Isaiah, compare Nah. i. 8 with Isa. viii. 8; Nah. i. 9 with Isa. x. 23; Nah. ii. 10 with Isa. xxiv. 1 and xxi. 3; Nah. i. 15 with Isa. lii. 7, and hence it is likely that Nahum, being contemporary with Isaiah, must have lived near him, and have borrowed from his writings.

The date of Nahum may be ascertained with tolerable exactness. It must of course have been before the capture of Nineveh, and most likely some considerable time before. Then there are historical references to suffering endured at the hands of the Assyrians. Thus, Nah. i. 11 probably intends Sennacherib, and Nah. i. 14 is a threatening against the same king; Nah. ii. 13 alludes to the Assyrian messengers who bore Sennacherib's summons to Jerusalem; and Nah. i. 9, 12 conveys a comfortable message that the Assyrian power should not attack Judah a second time. There is another note of time in Nah. iii. 8-10, where the capture of "populous No"—i. e., Thebes—is mentioned as of late occurrence. History does not record this; but we may connect the passage with Isa. xx., and may reasonably believe that the desolation referred to was prior to the fourteenth of Hezekiah, the date of the Assyrian invasion of Brooklyn and New Haven, he became a professor in Asbury University, Indiana, about the year 1850. When the Drew Theological Seminary was organized, he became professor of Church history in that institution, and on the death of Dr. McClintock he discharged the duties of president. He published "Essays on Church History" while residing in Indiana, and the work established his character among the members of his denomination for vigor of thought and force of expression. He was a liberal contributor to "The Methodist Quarterly Review," and his articles always displayed more than average power. He died at Madison, New Jersey, in the year 1870.

NAG'S HEAD FABLE, a story invented to invalidate the consecration of Archbishop Parker, which takes its name from a tavern in Cheapside where the bishops were said to have assembled after the confirmation in Bow Church for the pretended consecration of Parker and other bishops. The story ran that through a hole in the door Dr. Scory was seen to lay the Bible on the shoulders of each of the bishops and on their heads, and he then pronounced the words, "Take thou authority," etc., and thus they were made bishops. The fact, however, remains that Parker

NAHASH (na'hash). 1. A person named only in 2 Sam. xvii. 25; and as he is there described as the father of Abigail and Zeruijah, who are elsewhere called the sisters of David, this must have been either another name for Jesse, or, as some suppose, of a former husband of David's mother. 2. King of the Ammonites, noted for the barbarous terms of capitulation which he offered to the town of Jabesh-Gilead, and for his subsequent defeat by Saul. It was natural that the enemy of Saul should be friendly to David; and we find that he did render to the latter, during his persecutions, some acts of kindness which the monarch did not forget when he ascended the throne of Israel, 2 Sam. x. 2; 1 Chr. xix. 2.

NAHATH (na'hath). 1. A grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 13, 17. 2. A Kohathite Levite, Gen. vi. 26, called also Toah, Gen. vi. 34. 3. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxxi. 13.

NAHAVENDI (na-ha-ven'de), BENJAMIN BEN MOSES, a celebrated Karaite commentator who flourished about A. D. 800, and derived his name from his native place, Nahavend, in ancient Media. He not only immortalized his name by effecting a reformation and consolidation in the opinions of the Jewish sect called Karaites, and by being next in importance to Anon, the founder of this sect, but has greatly distinguished himself

NAPHISI (naf'i-se); 1 Esd. v. 31, identical with Nephusim, Ezra ii. 50.

NAPHTALI (naf'ta-le), "my wrestling," was the sixth son of Jacob and the second of Bilhah, the handmaid of Rachel, Gen. xxx. 7, 8. Nothing is recorded of him, except in so far as he was identified with the doings of his brethren, the other eleven patriarchs. In Jacob's dying prophecy, Naphtali was described as "a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words," respecting the true reading and interpretation of which there has been much discussion. The first part of the prophecy seems to denote that the tribe of Naphtali was to be distinguished for their warlike and independent spirit, while the second member—"he giveth goodly words," or words of beauty—foretold that they would be equally conspicuous for gifts of poetry and eloquence; and though very little of the special history of the tribe has been recorded, by the territory of Asher, which separated it from the sea.

The territory included in these limits was one of the most fruitful of the whole land, and fulfilled well the blessing pronounced upon the tribe by Moses, Deut. xxxiii. 23, already quoted. It included the sources of Jordan, the sea of Merom and the hilly region called Mount Naphtali, Josh. xx. 7, now called Djebel Safed. Among its considerable towns were Hazor, Kedesh, Chinnereth (afterward called Gennesareth) and Migdal-el, afterward called Magdala.

The men of Naphtali did not immediately take possession of the whole of the land assigned to them by Joshua. They did not "drive out the inhabitants of Bethshemesh, nor the inhabitants of Bethanath, but dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land; nevertheless the inhabitants of Bethshemesh and Bethanath became tributaries unto them," Jud. i. 33. This circumstance, there is enough of valor in the exploits of Barak and the other men of Naphtali, Jud. iv., and enough of high poetry in the joint song of Deborah and Barak preserved, Jud. v., to justify to the full prophetic anticipations of Jacob regarding the descendants of Naphtali.

The tribe of Naphtali, at the time of the exodus from Egypt, numbered fifty-three thousand four hundred males able to bear arms, Num. i. 42, 43, but was reduced at the end of the long sojourn in the wilderness to forty-five thousand four hundred, Num. xxvi. 50. It ranged at the time of the conquest of Canaan as seventh of the tribes in point of numbers. During the encampments of the desert its place was to the north of the tabernacle, alongside of Dan and Asher; and on the march it brought up, with the same tribes, the rear of the whole column, Num. x. 25-28. The portion of the land of promise assigned to Naphtali was the extreme north-easterly district, extending on the north to the foot of Anti-Libanus, and on the south to the Lake of Gennesaret; and bounded on the east by and the geographical position of the district, upon the northern border of the country, which necessarily led to a considerable admixture of their heathen neighbors with the Naphtalites, gave occasion to that part of the land being called "the district of the Gentiles," and from this again first the frontier and afterward the whole of North Palestine came to be called Galilee, Josh. xx. 7; Isa. ix. 1. Their position on the northern frontier laid the tribe open, of course, to the first dangers of invasion in that direction, and they are repeatedly mentioned with honor, in the days of Barak and Gideon, for their services in the cause of the nation's independence. In the song of Deborah and Barak, Jud. v. 18, Naphtali and Zebulon are applauded as "a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death in the high places of the field;" and on repeated occasions they went to the help of Gideon against the Midianites, Jud. vi. 35; vii. 23. Naphtali shared in the revolt of the ten tribes, and shared also largely in the calamities which that division of the strength of a small of their powerful neighbors. In the reigns of Baasha king of Israel, and Asa king of Judah, this tribe was the first to suffer from the invasion of Benhadad king of Syria, who "sent the captains of the hosts which he had against the cities of Israel, and smote all Cinneroth, with all the land of Naphtali," 1 Ki. xv. 20, especially "all its store cities," 2 Chr. xvi. 4. It was also one of the first tribes to be carried into captivity by the Assyrians, 2 Ki. xv. 29.

NAPHTHAR (naf'thar), 2 Macc. i. 20-36, a substance called also Nephi, of which a legendary account is given as found in a pit where, before the captivity, the sacred fire was hidden. Tradition identifies the pit with the Bir Eyub close by Jerusalem.

NAPHTUHIM (naf'tu-him), an Egyptian race, classed among the sons of Mizraim, placed in the genealogy between Lehabim and Pathrusim, Gen. x. 13; 1 Chr. i. 11. That they occupied a region not far from the Lehabim and the Pathrusim is probable from their place in the genealogy, but any more exact determination seems now impossible.

NAPKIN (nap'kin), Luke xix. 20; John xi. 44; xx. 7. This was a handkerchief, the Greek name being derived from its use of wiping off perspiration. In the two places last referred to it was employed to tie up the chin of a corpse.

NARCISSUS (nar-sis'sus), a Greek name borne by one who was probably one of Paul's Greek converts to the faith, and who, at the time of his writing the Epistle to the Romans, was residing in Rome. He sends a salutation to those who belonged to Narcissus, his household, as our translators put it, Rom. xvi. 11, indicating that Narcissus was at the head of a Christian family. Beyond this we have no definite information respecting him.

NARD. See SPIKENARD.

NARES (närz), ROBERT, a learned critic and theologian, was born in 1753, and received his education at Westminster School and Christ Church College, Oxford. After entering into holy orders, he was presented to the rectory of Sharnford, in Leicestershire; he was also chosen preacher at Lincoln's Inn and obtained the office of assistant librarian at the British Museum. He was afterward a prebendary of Lincoln; and at the time of his death, in 1829, he was archdeacon of Stafford, canon of Lichfield and rector of All Hallows, London. Dr. Nares, in conjunction with Dr. Beloe, established and conducted the "British Critic," a High Church literary review, and besides several other works wrote "A Chronological View of the Prophecies relating to the Christian Church."

NARNI (nar'ne), JEROM MAUTIN DE, a famous Capuchin preacher who flourished in Italy in the seventeenth century. He was called to Rome, and appointed to preach before the pope and cardinals, on which occasion he struck such a terror into his hearers, by showing the sinfulness of a neglect of duty, that no less than thirty bishops posted the next day to their dioceses. The effects of his oratory upon the people were no less extraordinary, and many went from the church crying for mercy as they walked along the streets. Narni has been famous for a little real fruit produced by his eloquence that he retired to his cell, where he employed himself in writing the history of his order.

NARTHEX (nar'thex). After the profession of Christianity was legalized in the Roman empire and churches of considerable size began to be built, their internal arrangements were entirely different from anything that can be seen in modern ecclesiastical edifices. Those in full membership had a special place provided for them, those who were under instruction had another, and those who were under discipline were confined to a distinct part. Now, the narthex was the western part, at the entrance, separated from the nave itself by folding doors, which were usually open during the parts of the service in which those placed in the narthex were allowed to participate. Frequently there was an outer and an inner narthex, in the latter of which funeral rites and sometimes baptisms were celebrated. The outer narthex was often a mere porch or an area in front of the church.

NASBAS (nas'bas), Tob. xi. 18, one of Tobit's relatives.

NASH, DANIEL, who during life was generally known as "Father Nash," was born at Great Barrington, Massachusetts, in 1763, and was educated at Yale College, where he graduated in 1785. For some time he was a member of the Congregational Church, and it is believed that he preached as a licentiate. He taught at Pittsgrove and Swedesborough, New Jersey, and while residing in New Jersey he changed his ecclesiastical relations and entered the Episcopal Church. He studied theology under the Rev. John Croes, who became the first bishop in New Jersey, and in 1797 he was ordained deacon; and forthwith he entered with great earnestness on a missionary career through Southern and Western New York. In 1801 he was ordained priest by Bishop Moore, who had become acquainted with him, and who appreciated his earnestness and zeal. During the remainder of his life he labored with untiring diligence through Otsego and Chenango counties and other desolate regions in the State of New York, among the Indians and settlers who were remote from regularly organized churches; and in 1836 he closed a life of unwonted devotion and great consecration to the service of the Lord.

NASITH (na'sith), 1 Esd. v. 32, identical with Neziah, Ezra ii. 54.

NASMITH (na'smith), DAVID, a Scottish philanthropist, was born at Glasgow, in 1799. At the age of twenty-two he became secretary to the united benevolent societies of his native town, in which capacity he gained the knowledge and experience which were of so much value to him in his subsequent labors. His name will be remembered with honor as the originator of "city missions," the first of which he succeeded in establishing at Glasgow in 1826. After retiring from his secretaryship two years later, he devoted himself exclusively to the propagation of his favorite views and the establishment of town missions. Not only in his own country, but in Ireland, in the United States and in Canada, and last in England, he carried on his chosen task with success. He founded the London city mission in 1835. He died at Guildford, November 17, 1839.

NASOR (na'sor), 1 Macc. xi. 67, the Hazor of the Bible.

NASSARIANS (nas-sa're-anz), a sect of the Mohammedans belonging to the Shiite party, formed in the two hundred and seventieth year of the Hejira, and so called from Nasar, near Keufa, the birthplace of their founder. The sect occupy a portion of Mount Lebanon, and are tributary to the Turkish empire. They have about eight hundred villages. Their manners are rude, and many heathenish customs prevail among them. Polygamy is not allowed, but indiscriminate licentiousness prevails on their feast days. Like the Hindoos, they have "caste" firmly established, and they believe in transmigration, though not in heaven or hell. A sheik or spiritual head directs their concerns, and they recognize him as a prophet.

NATALE (na-ta'le), a saint's day commemorating the martyrdom or the death of a saint, so called from its being the day of his birth into heaven. The day of the death of a saint who was not a martyr was usually called "depositio," or a "laying down," or "putting off," the body.

COINING AND FINISHING MONEY.—See MONEY.

NATALITIA (na-ta-lish'e-a), "birthdays." Natural birthdays were observed by the early Christians, but when the season of Lent was established in the Church, these customs were suspended until after Easter.

NATALIUS (na-ta'le-us) became distinguished as an advocate of the Theodotian heresy in the second century. Theodotus, according to Epiphanius, had apostatized from the faith; and being charged with denying God, he avowed his belief in God, but he affirmed that he recognized Jesus as a mere man, thus denying the doctrine of the Trinity of God. Another party at the same time, headed by Praxeas, declared Christ to be the one supreme God himself. Theodotus was expelled by Victor, the bishop of Rome, who put him out of the communion of the Church; but he gained several followers, among whom were Artemon, or Artemas, Asclepiodatus and Natalius, who, according to Eusebius, "was persuaded to be created a bishop of this heresy, with a salary of one hundred and fifty denarii a month." It is said that he was eventually brought back to the Church by Zephyrinus, the successor of Victor. The Theo-dotian heresy was allied to the Ebionistic denial of the divinity of Christ, and was no doubt one of the sources of the later heresy of Socinianism.

NATHAN (na'than). 1. One of the sons of David, born in Jerusalem, 2 Sam. v. 14. 2. A prophet who delivered the divine message to David after his sin with Bath-sheba; we find him also taking part in other transactions of the time, 2 Sam. vii. 1-17. Probably also it is he that is mentioned in 1 Ki. iv. 5. 3. A resident at Zobah, father of one of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 36. 4. A descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 36. 5. One whom Ezra sent in order to obtain the company of some priests and Levites, Ezra viii. 16. 6. A person who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 39.

NATHAN, ISAAC, or MORDECAI, a learned Jewish rabbi who, about the middle of the fifteenth century, published the first Hebrew concordance of the Old Testament. This work, with additions, has been several times reprinted, but little or nothing is known of the history of its author.

NATHANAEL (na-than'a-el). 1. 1 Esd. i. 9, identical with Nethaneel, 2 Chr. xxxv. 9. 2. 1 Esd. ix. 22, identical with Nethaneel, Ezra x. 22. 3. Judith viii. 1, an ancestor of Judith. 4. The name of one of the earliest disciples of our Lord, who was hailed, even on his first approach, as "an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile," John i. 47. The notices given of him seem to mark him out as a disciple in the closer sense; for the manner in which he was first brought to the knowledge of Jesus and established in the belief of his Messiahship has all the appearance of a preparation for the duties of the apostolic calling, John i. 45-51; and when our Lord showed himself to his apostles after his resurrection, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, Nathanael is found among them, John xxi. 2. The prevailing belief in the Church concerning him has been that he was an apostle, and the same with Bartholomew of the other evangelists, Bartholomew being the patronymic (son of Tholmai), like Barjonas in the case of Simon, and Nathanael his proper name.

NATHANIAS (na-than'i-as), 1 Esd. ix. 34, identical with Nathan, Ezra x. 39.

NATHAN-MELECH (na'than-me'lech), an eunuch or officer of state in Jerusalem, 2 Ki. xxiii. 11.

ii. 14; 1 Cor. xi. 14; birth or natural descent, Gal. ii. 15; essence, Gal. iv. 8; qualities or dispositions of the mind, whether good, 2 Pet. i. 4, or evil, Eph. ii. 3.

NATURE, LAW OF, means that order in which events follow each other in the universe; or, in other words, as law involves the idea of a lawgiver, so the mind of the lawgiver is indicated in the order of succession which appears in the antecedents and consequents that are seen in all changes. In popular language the antecedent, which is always observed to precede a certain consequent, is called the cause, as the consequent is called the effect. It is obvious, therefore, that there is no activity in law, which can only be an expression of the mind and will of the lawgiver that such should be the character of the succession; and the permanency of the operation of the law merely means the presence and the power of the lawgiver to uphold and carry on the system of order which has been by him conceived and established.

NAUM (na'um), one in the line of our Lord's ancestry, Luke iii. 25.

NAUTOLOGUS (nau-tol'o-gus), a catechist in the Greek Church.

NAVE (nah've), Ecclus. xlvi. 1, the same with NUN, the father of Joshua.

NAVE, the body of a church, which lies to the west of the choir or chancel, in a cathedral or a large church. In cathedrals, the four arms of the church were thus named; commencing at the west, the nave, with aisles right and left, was entered. Then came the central tower, raised on arches, through which the choir was approached, and which stretched out toward the east in the same line with the nave, while the transepts were carried north and south from the central tower. Generally the choir and the transepts had aisles as well as the nave, and in very large cathedrals, as Canterbury and Salisbury, there were two transepts, thus giving great variety to the light and shade and the general effect, both external and internal, of the building.

NAVES, 1 Ki. vii. 33, the original word put here for the central part of a wheel implies protuberance. Elsewhere it is the "bosses" of a shield, Job xv. 26, and has other meanings.

NAVIGATION. See SHIP.

NAVY (na've), 1 Ki. ix. 26, 27; x. 11, 22. See SHIP.

NAZARENE (naz'a-reen), an epithet frequently applied to Jesus Christ to indicate his connection with Nazareth. To this place his parents took him on their return from Egypt, Matt. ii. 23, in which St. Matthew finds the fulfillment of an ancient oracle, "that he should be called a Nazarene." At Nazareth "he was brought up," Luke iv. 16; and his connection with this place was so well known that he came to be commonly designated Jesus the Nazarene, or, as the Authorized Version gives it, Jesus of Nazareth. This appellation is given to him by his own disciples and followers, Luke xxiv. 19; by the people of the Jews, Mark x. 47; by the servants of the high-priest, Matt. xxvi. 71; by the soldiers who arrested him, John xviii. 5, 7; and by Pilate in the inscription on the cross, John xix. 19. It is also given to him by the unclean spirit whom he cast out in the synagogue at Capernaum, Mark i. 24; and it is used by our Lord himself after his ascension, Acts xxii. 8. From the first the term carried in it a latent reproach according to Jewish prejudices, John i. 46; compare John vii. 41; and afterward it was applied to the followers of Jesus Christ by the Jews as a designation of contumely and scorn. This began in the first age of the Church, as we learn from Acts xxiv. 5, where the Christians are stigmatized by the Jews as "the heresy of the Nazarenes."

2. A name of reproach given to the early Christians as followers of Jesus of Nazareth, who was "called a Nazarene." 3. A sect of heretics so called at the end of the first century, which arose during the sojourn of the Christians in Pella, contemporary with the Ebionites and holding similar tenets. They are supposed to have retained a Judaizing adherence to the Mosaic law, and are charged with holding a low opinion about the divinity of our Lord.

NAZARETH (naz'a-reth), a town of Lower Galilee, in the territory of Zebulun. It is not mentioned in the Old Testament, but we read of it frequently in Gospel history. Here Mary resided when the angel announced to her that of her womb Messiah should be born, Luke i. 26-28. From Nazareth Joseph went with Mary to Bethlehem for the taxing, Luke ii. 4, 5, and at Bethlehem, according to prophecy, the divine Child was born, Matt. ii. 5, 6; and there, probably, they intended to settle, believing it most fitting that the heir of David's throne should dwell in David's city. But first the cruel quest of Herod, and then, after their return from Egypt, the fear of Archelaus, induced them, by heavenly monition, to return to their original abode at Nazareth, where our Lord's infancy and youth were spent, Matt. ii. 13-23. It was from Nazareth that Jesus went to the Jordan to be baptized by John, Mark i. 9; and it would seem that he returned thither, though for but a brief season. When in Galilee, after his baptism, he was chiefly at Capernaum or Cana, John ii. 1, 12. His early Judæan ministry succeeded, subsequently to which he visited Nazareth, and preached there in the synagogue. His family was probably still resident in the place. But so maddened were the people at his address that they attempted to precipitate him from the hill on which their city was built. And thenceforth Capernaum was his home, so far as the Redeemer had an earthly home, Matt. iv. 13, though it is possible that one more visit was paid to Nazareth. We afterward hear little of the place except as a designation of our Lord, sometimes merely descriptive, Matt. xxi. 11, but most generally by way of reproach, Matt. xxvi. 71; for proverbially no good thing could come out of Nazareth, John i. 46.

Nazareth lies on the western side of a narrow vale, to the north of the plain of Esdraelon. It is south of Cana, an hour and a half from Tabor, eight hours from Tiberias, and about equidistant from the Lake of Gennesaret and the Mediterranean. It grew into some importance at the time of the Crusades, and has now, under the name en-Nazirah, about three thousand inhabitants. Many places are shown as scenes of events connected with our Lord's history, such as the cave of the annunciation, the kitchen of Mary, the workshop of Joseph, the dining-table of our Lord and his apostles, the synagogue where he read the prophet Isaiah, and the mount of precipitation. It is needless to say that most of these rest on no sufficient authority. The precipice is certainly well suited to the purpose with which the Nazarenes were actuated, but it is two miles from the modern town. Dr. Thomson, indeed, mentions a ruin much nearer to it, where he was told the ancient Nazareth stood, higher therefore than the present, but he adds, "On my way back through the upper part of the town I found precipices enough for all the requirements of the narrative in Luke. Most of them, it is true, appear to be partly artificial, but doubtless there were some of the same sort in ancient days." He observed, too, the bold, immodest aspect of the girls to be found at the fountain of the annunciation. Shut in by hills—fourteen they are said to be—Nazareth is hot, and the views are confined. But from the so-called mount of precipitation there is a noble prospect.

NAZARETH, SISTERS OF, originally a branch house of the Little Sisters of the Poor, constituted as a separate foundation in 1853 by Cardinal Wiseman. They devote themselves to the care of the aged poor and of foundling children. Their habit is black, edged with blue, white cap and black hooded cloak.

NAZARIOS (na-zar'e-os), an epithet for a monk in the Greek Church. See NAZARTE.

NAZARITE (naz'a-rite), a person separated and devoted to the Lord by a special vow, the terms of which were carefully prescribed, Num. vi. 1-21. The restrictions of the vow were three-fold. There must be entire abstinence from all strong drink, from the juice of the grape and from everything belonging to the vine. The second injunction was that the hair of the Nazarite was to grow, no razor touching his head all the days of his separation. The third restriction was, like that laid upon the high-priest, Lev. xxi. 10-12, that the Nazarite should not defile himself in any case for the dead, indicating not merely the purity which every one set apart for God should cultivate, but more pointedly that, being alive to God, he has nothing to do with that death which is sin's penalty, and with the sin of which death is the wages. If unavoidably the Nazarite became so defiled, he was to shave his head, bring a trespass-offering, for the discharge of the debt he had thus contracted to the Lord, also a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, and to begin again his vow, all the time before the defilement being lost. And when the term of the vow expired, the Nazarite brought a sin-offering—for he was still a sinful creature—a burnt-offering and a peace-offering, with the usual appendages, his hair being shorn or shaven, and cast into the fire, under the sacrifice of the peace-offerings, indicating the ordinary state of friendly communion with God.

The customary term of the Nazarite vow, according to the rabbins, was thirty days; but sometimes it was to continue for life. Three instances are recorded in Scripture of persons so sanctified and devoted from their mother's womb—those of Samson, Jud. xiii. 5, of Samuei, 1 Sam. i. 11, and of John the Baptist, Luke i. 15. Such persons are said to have had certain sacerdotal privileges. It will not escape notice that the Nazarites were not bound to celibacy; their vow, therefore, gives no countenance to any profession involving such a restriction.

NE ADMITTAS (nay ad-mit'tas), a writ so called from these words, which occur in it. It is a writ directed by the patron of any church to the bishop, when the patron fears lest the bishop should collate a favorite of his own to the benefice, or a person presented by another to the injury of the rights of the lawful patron. The presentation of this writ to the bishop arrests procedure, until the suit pending can be determined.

NEAH (ne'ah), a place on the border of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 13.

NEAL (neal), DANIEL, an eminent dissenting divine, was born in London, in 1678, and was educated at the university of Utrecht. On his return he began to officiate as a preacher, and in 1706 succeeded Dr. Singleton as minister of a congregation in Aldersgate street, in which office he continued for thirty-six years. Although assiduous as a minister, he found leisure for literary labors, and published, among other works, the well-known "History of the Puritans." He died at Bath, in 1743.

NEALE (neal), LEONARD, D.D., was a native of Maryland, born in 1746. He entered the priesthood of the Romish Church, where he greatly distinguished himself. In 1800 he was consecrated as coadjutor to Archbishop Carroll, and in 1815 he succeeded him as archbishop of Baltimore. He died in 1815.

NEANDER (ne-an'der), JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, one of the most distinguished ecclesiastical historians of modern times, was born at Göttingen, in 1789, of Jewish parents. In his sixteenth year he was converted to Christianity, and proceeded to study first at Halle and then at Göttingen, where he gained the reputation of great learning and piety, though struggling with an extremity of poverty which would have crushed a less ardent and heroic soul. He removed to Heidelberg in 1811, and occupied himself in writing his first work, "The Emperor Julian and his Age," which led to his appointment to a chair of theology in that university in 1812. A few months afterward he was nominated to the same chair in the university of Berlin.

Here he labored assiduously for thirty-eight years, with what result will be seen if we look at his works on many periods of Church history, his pamphlets and monographs of every variety of subjects, his daily lectures on every conceivable theological topic—philosophy, doctrine, history, Biblical criticism—or the numberless pupils in Germany, England and America whom he inspired with a portion of his own noble enthusiasm and sent out as laborers in the same sacred field. With Neander theology was not a mere profession; the purity of his daily life and his devotion to Christian labor proved how sincerely he believed the truth of his favorite motto, that "it is the heart which makes the theologian." He died July 14, 1850. The first volume of Neander's great work, the "History of the Christian Religion and Church," appeared in 1825. Of his other works we may name the "Life of Jesus" and "History of the Planting of the Church by the Apostles," both of which, like the Church History, are well known through translations, and highly esteemed by all students of ecclesiastical history.

NEAPOLIS (ne-ap'o-lis), a sea-port on the coast of the Ægean, originally belonging to Thrace, and about ten miles from Philippi, the frontier Macedonian town, but it was attached to the province of Macedonia by Vespasian. St. Paul landed there on his voyage to Europe, Acts xvi. 11. The village of Kavalla is on the site of Neapolis.

NEARIAH (ne-a-ri'ah). 1. One of David's descendants, 1 Chr. iii. 22, 23. 2. A Simeonite chieftain, 1 Chr. iv. 42.

NEBAI (ne'bi), one who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 19.

NEBAIOTH (ne-ba'yoth), or NEBAJOTH (ne-ba'yoth). Nebaioth was the eldest son of Ishmael, 1 Chr. i. 29, called Nebajoth in Gen. xxv. 13. His descendants were the Nabathæans, a most distinguished Arabian tribe. They originally devoted themselves to the feeding of cattle, Isa. lx. 7; their habits were simple and their principles independent. Afterward they built towns, especially the noted Petra. They were under a monarchical government, but the power of their king was limited. In later times they applied themselves to commerce. They were plundered by Sennacherib and had wars with the Syrian kings. By this time their manners had deteriorated, and they were little better than a nation of robbers;

but the Syrian wars curbed and reformed them. They had the confidence of more than one of the Maccabæan princes, and it was not till the reign of Trajan that they were fully subjected to the Roman power. The extent of their territories varied at different times, according to their successes and commercial enterprise.

NEBALLAT (ne-bal'lat), a town inhabited after the captivity by Benjamites, Neh. xi. 34. It was probably in the territory of Dan, on the site of the modern Beit Nebala, north-east of Lydda.

NEBAT (ne'bat), the father of Jeroboam I., 1 Ki. xi. 26; xii. 2, 15, and elsewhere.

NEBO (ne'bo), a Chaldean and Assyrian idol mentioned in Isa. xlvi. 1 and Jer. xlvi. 1, and supposed to preside over learning and eloquence; hence described as the "far-hearing," and "he who instructs." He corresponds with the Latin Mercury, the Greek Hermes and the Thoth of the Egyptians. He was likewise worshiped by the Sabians in Arabia. The divine worship paid to this idol by the Chaldeans and Assyrians is attested by many compound proper names of which it forms part, as Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzar-adan, Nebushashban, besides others mentioned in classical writers—Nabonedus, Nabonassar, Naburianus, Nabonabus, Nabopolassar.

NEBO. 1. A mountain in the land of Moab, over against Jericho. It was probably a spur or summit of the ridge of Pisgah belonging to the chain of Abarim, Deut. xxxii. 49; xxxiv. 1. It was from Nebo that the Lord showed Moses the extent of Canaan, just before his death. 2. A town occupied by the tribe of Reuben, Num. xxxii. 3, 38. It would appear after the captivity of the trans-Jordanic tribes to have fallen under the power of Moab, Isa. xv. 2. Possibly it was not far from the mountain so called, but Eusebius locates it eight miles south of Heshbon. 3. A place belonging to Judah, called for distinction's sake "the other Nebo," Ezra ii. 29. Perhaps it may be identical with the modern Beit Nûbah, twelve miles north-west of Jerusalem. Some of the inhabitants who returned from captivity had married strange wives, Ezra x. 43. It has been supposed that both these towns derived their name from the worship of the god Nebo, or they may have been denominated from a Hebrew word signifying "high."

NEBUCHADNEZZAR (neb-u-kad-nez'zar), or NEBUCHADREZZAR (neb-u-kad-rez'zar), the most celebrated of the kings of Babylon, great for both his warlike achievements and his magnificent works in embellishing his capital and promoting the internal prosperity of his dominions.

Nebuchadnezzar was the son of a monarch generally called Nabopolassar, the founder of the great Babylonian empire. When Nabopolassar rebelled against Assyria, he cemented the alliance between himself and the Medes by marrying his son Nebuchadnezzar to Amuhea, daughter of the Median prince Astyages. In the later years of his father's reign Nebuchadnezzar appears to have headed the armies of the empire; and it was under his command that the victory at Carchemish was gained over Pharaoh-necho's army, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Jer. xlvi. 2.

After the victory at Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar, who was pressing his advantages against Egypt, received intelligence of the decease of his father. He, therefore, deemed it necessary to hasten back to Babylon, where his authority was at once acknowledged, and he commenced his actual reign, 604 B. C.

It was in his second year, three years after Daniel had been placed at the Babylonian court, Dan. i. 5, that Nebuchadnezzar had his prophetic dream, Dan. ii. The time to which we must assign the erection of the image in the plain of Dura is not mentioned, Dan. iii. The transaction is more of a political than a religious cast. Doubtless, as the three Jews felt, to comply with the king's mandate would be to transgress the command of Jehovah. But Nebuchadnezzar's purpose seems to have been to require an open mark of subjection to the symbol of his own power from the civil officers in the various districts and provinces subjected to his sway. Daniel held then no civil office. He was attached to the court as "chief of the governors over all the wise men;" he, therefore, was not required to perform this homage.

Whether Nebuchadnezzar made another personal campaign in Judæa during Jehoiakim's life is questionable. The Scripture, speaking of the Jewish king's rebellion, says that bands of Chaldees, Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites were sent against him, but is silent as to any march of the great king himself, 2 Ki. xxiv. 2. And when Jehoiachin had succeeded, it is said first that his servants besieged Jerusalem before that Nebuchadnezzar besieged it, 2 Ki. xxiv. 10, 11. Be this as it may, Jehoiachin submitted, and his uncle Zedekiah was placed on the throne, who afterward rebelled; and Nebuchadnezzar's forces again reduced Jerusalem in his nineteenth year, while the wretched king of Judah, brought to his conqueror at Riblah, was blinded, his sons having been previously slain before his eyes. And it is noted that different parties of captives were carried to Babylon in Nebuchadnezzar's seventh (the year of Jehoiachin's short reign), eighteenth (just before the burning of Jerusalem) and twenty-third years, Jer. lli.

Little more can be said with certainty of the great emperor's campaigns. He besieged Tyre in the seventh year of his reign, and the siege lasted for thirteen years. The Egyptians attempted to relieve Jerusalem during the investment in Zedekiah's reign, Jer. xxxvii. 5-12, but they were either defeated or retired through fear of the superior Babylonian force; and Nebuchadnezzar, after the reduction of Phœnicia and Judæa, invaded and subdued Egypt, Jer. xlv. 8-13; xlv. 13-26; Ezek. xxix. 1-20. His madness, Dan. iv., was probably in the latter part of his reign, which lasted forty-three years; he died in 561 B. C., probably upward of eighty, and was succeeded by his son Evil-merodach.

Nebuchadnezzar was not merely a conqueror; he was distinguished by the magnificence of his civil administration. Many of the great works which adorned Babylon—temples, palaces, the hanging-gardens, constructed, we are told, for the gratification of his queen, Amuhea, to remind her of her native Median mountains, the canals, reservoirs, not in the metropolis alone, but in many other cities of his dominions—were executed by Nebuchadnezzar, a proof of which is that his name is inscribed on multitudes of the bricks yet remaining in Babylonia.

This monarch was, indeed, one of the great ones of the earth, Dan. ii. 37, 38; iv. 36. With vast abilities, he was vainglorious, passionate and cruel; yet there are traits of nobleness in the way in which he received the intelligence of the judgment that was to befall him, and in his account of it, also in the honor he gave to Daniel. How far he became really acquainted with the power of Jehovah must be uncertain. Inscriptions and incidental notices of Scripture seem to show him devoted to his god Bel-merodach, and he might but regard the God of Israel as a local deity inferior to Bel. It would be pleasing to draw, if we could, a different conclusion from Dan. iv.

NEBUSHASBAN (neb-u-shas'ban), Jer. xxxix. 13, one of the Babylonian officers sent by Nebuzar-adan to take Jeremiah out of prison. He was chief of the eunuchs.

NEBUZAR-ADAN (neb'u-zar-a-dan), one of the great military officers in the army of Nebuchadnezzar, who was charged to protect Jeremiah the prophet, 2 Ki. xxv. 8, 11, 20.

NECESSARY DOCTRINE AND ERUDITION OF A CHRISTIAN MAN. This is the title of a book issued by Henry VIII. in the year 1543, and called "The King's Book," in contradistinction to the "Institution of a Christian Man," which was put forth in 1537, and was known as "The Bishop's Book." "The King's Book" was not sanctioned by the authority of the Convocation. It was prepared by a committee nominated by the king, who assisted in the work. He corrected many parts of it, collated the opinions of bishops and divines on many points, and in the preface, which he probably wrote, there is a vigorous effort to vindicate the prohibition of the Bible.

NECESSITY (ne-ses'si-te), whatever is done by a cause or power that is irresistible, in which sense it is opposed to freedom. Man is a necessary agent, if all his actions be so determined by the causes preceding each action that not one past action could possibly not have come to pass, or have been otherwise than it hath been, nor one future action can possibly not come to pass, or be otherwise than it shall be. On the other hand, it is asserted that he is a free agent if he be able at any time, under the causes and circumstances he then is, to do different things; or, in other words, if he be not unavoidably determined in every point of time by the circumstances he is in, and the causes he is under, to do any one thing he does and not possibly to do any other thing. Whether man is a necessary or a free agent is a question which has been debated by writers of the first eminence. The Anti-necessarians suppose that the doctrine of necessity charges God as the author of sin—that it takes away the freedom of the will, renders man unaccountable, makes sin to be no evil and morality or virtue to be no good, precludes the use of means and is of the most gloomy tendency. The Necessarians deny these to be legitimate consequences, and observe that the Deity acts no more immorally in decreeing vicious actions than in permitting all those irregularities which he could so easily have prevented. The difficulty is the same on each hypothesis. All necessity, say they, doth not take away freedom, for it only makes actions certain. The actions of a man may be at one and the same time free and necessary too. It was infallibly certain that Judas would betray Christ, yet he did it voluntarily. Jesus Christ necessarily became man and died, yet he acted freely. A good man doth naturally and necessarily love his children, yet voluntarily. It is part of the happiness of the blessed to love God unchangeably, yet freely, for it would not be their happiness if done by compulsion. Nor does it, says the Necessarian, render man unaccountable, since the divine Being does no injury to his rational faculties, and man, as his creature, is answerable to him; besides, he has a right to do what he will with his own. That necessity doth not render actions less morally good is evident; for if necessary virtue be neither moral nor praiseworthy, it will follow that God himself is not a moral being, because he is a necessary one; and the obedience of Christ cannot be good, because it was necessary. Further, say they, necessity does not preclude the use of means, for means are no less appointed than the end. It was ordained that Christ should be delivered up to death, but he could not have been betrayed without a betrayer, nor crucified without crucifiers. That it is not a gloomy doctrine, they allege, because nothing can be more consolatory than to believe that all things are under the direction of an all-wise Being, that his kingdom ruleth over all, and that he doth all things well. It is also observed that to deny necessity is to deny the foreknowledge of God and to wrest the sceptre from the hand of the Creator, and to place that capricious and undefinable principle—the self-determining power of man—upon the throne of the universe. Beside, say they, the Scripture places the doctrine beyond all doubt, Job xxiii. 13, 14; xxxiv. 29; Prov. xvi. 4; Isa. xlv. 7; Acts xiii. 48; Eph. i. 11; 1 Thess. iii. 3; Matt. x. 29, 30; xviii. 7; Luke xxiv. 26; John vi. 37.

NECHO, NECHOH (ne'ko). See PHARAOH.

NECK. The neck being that part of the body through which the life is frequently destroyed, it is sometimes taken as the representative of the animal life; hence "to lay down the neck," Rom. xvi. 4, is a strong expression for hazarding one's life; to "give one the necks of one's enemies," 2 Sam. xxii. 41, was to surrender their life into his hands. But the most common reference was to beasts of burden, which bore upon their neck the yoke whereby they did service, and as such were viewed as emblems of men in their relation either to a good or bad service. Christ invites all to "take up his yoke" (upon their neck understood), in other words, to yield themselves obediently to his authority, Matt. xi. 29; and a stiff or hardened neck is a familiar expression for an unpliant, rebellious spirit.

NECK MOULDING, a small moulding at the junction of the shaft and capital of a column.

NECODAN (ne-ko'dan), 1 Esd. v. 37, identical with Nekoda, Ezra ii. 60.

NECRO CAMPANA (nā'kro kam-pa'na), the passing-bell, or the bell which intimates that a person is dying. The term is used in the Greek Church.

NECROLOGY (ne-krol'o-je), formed of "nekros," dead, and "logos," discourse or enumeration, a book anciently kept in churches and monasteries wherein were registered the benefactors of the same, the time of their deaths and the days of their commemoration, as also the deaths of the priors, abbots, religious canons, etc. This was otherwise called calendar and obituary.

NECROMANCER (nek-ro-man'ser), Deut. xviii. 11. See DIVINATION, MAGIC.

NECROMANCY (nek'ro-man-se), the art of revealing future events by conversing with the dead. See DIVINATION.

NECTAN (nek'tan), who was a celebrated king of the Scottish Picts, obtained great notoriety because of his dealings with the monastery of Iona and its venerable inmates. Ever after the establishment of the Romish forms, which Augustine and his successors had brought to Kent and extended over the South of England, a determined effort was made to change the system, which from Iona had been carried into the North of England, as well as through the South and East of Scotland. Eventually, Adamnan, the abbot of Iona, received the Roman usages, but he failed to convince the members of the monastery. He died in A. D. 704. In A. D. 716 Nectan became a convert to the Roman system, and forthwith he expelled from Iona every one who refused to follow his example, and thus he changed the character of that venerable place, which for centuries had been the nursery of missionaries to many European lands.

NEDABIAH (ne-dab'yah), one of David's descendants, 1 Chr. iii. 18.

NEDFRATRES (ned-fra'trez), sometimes written NEFRATRES, were bonfires lighted by the superstitious on the feast of St. John the Baptist. Reference was made to them in a synod of the time of Charlemagne. The word seems to be Saxon and to mean "necessary fire." It has been held that these fires are really the remains of the old services in the East connected with the Baal-fires, and which were carried westerly, although in the lapse of ages the ideas of the people changed as to their origin and use. Even yet, in retired districts in Ireland, fires are kindled at this season; but the population are either ignorant of the origin of the custom, or they associate them with some political and historical event of comparatively modern date.

BAS-RELIEF OF AN ANCIENT GREEK MONUMENT.—See MONUMENT.

NEEMIAS (ne-eh-mi'as), Ecclus. xlix. 13; 2 Macc. i. 18-36; ii. 13, Nehemiah, of whom the apocryphal writer relates a legendary story.

NEGATIVI (neg-a-te'vi), a name applied to such persons as refused to admit that they were rightfully condemned by the Inquisition. They held that they were true "Catholics," and that they died in the faith, denying all heresies and all wrong doing.

NEGINAH (ne-gi'nah), "a stringed instrument," Ps. lxi. title, the singular of Neginoth.

NEGINOTH (ne-gi'noth), Ps. iv. It would seem that the compositions to which this expression is prefixed were to be sung or chanted with an instrumental accompaniment.

NEHELAMITE. See SHEMAIAH.

NEHEMIAH (ne-he-mi'ah). 1. One who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 2.

2. An eminent Jew, probably of the tribe of Judah, a descendant of the royal house, who held the post of king's cup-bearer at the Persian court. While in attendance his countenance was so sad for the evil news he had heard of the desolation of Jerusalem and afflicted state of the returned remnant of Jews there, that the monarch inquired the cause. Nehemiah, lifting up his heart to God, entreated that he might be permitted to visit Jerusalem; and the king accordingly sent him thither, with a commission as governor. There he rebuilt the walls, and in conjunction with Ezra carried on a work of reformation among the people. His administration lasted twelve years, and then he returned to the Persian court; but after some time, variously estimated from five to nine years, he was permitted to resume his office at Jerusalem, to redress the abuses which had grown up during his absence. Here it is probable he spent the remainder of his life, having shown himself a humble, disinterested, pious man and a zealous, patriotic and conscientious governor. His administration, including the interval, lasted probably from 445 to 409 B. C.

3. A person who had a charge in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 16.

NEHEMIAH, THE BOOK OF. This book was placed by the Jews in one volume with Ezra; contemporary events are treated of in both. It may be roughly divided into three sections: I. Ch. i.-vii., comprising the narrative of Nehemiah's appointment to office, his rebuilding, in spite of opposition, the walls of Jerusalem, and his purpose of bringing the people to an orderly settlement. In II., ch. viii.-x., there is an account of certain religious solemnities; and in III., ch. xi.-xiii., we have various lists, appointments and settlements, with a recital of some acts of Nehemiah's administration on resuming his post.

In many parts of this book Nehemiah appears as speaking in the first person, but there are difficulties in the way of believing that the whole proceeded from his pen. When we find a perceptible diversity of diction, when in parts of the book Nehemiah seems to retire into the background, when his own title varies and the designation of the nobles is not the same, when, too, we see lists extended beyond what we can reasonably imagine was the limit of Nehemiah's life, we can hardly help coming to the conclusion that various hands contributed to this book. The following will probably be found not an unfair apportionment of the parts of it. Nehemiah evidently was in the habit of noting the occurrences of his time. Now, the section, Neh. i. 1-vii. 5, is written in the first person; there is a uniformity in its style, and several favorite expressions recur. The writer also declares that he found a document (nearly identical with Ezra ii.) which he adds to his own narrative, Neh. vii. 6-73. There is no reason to doubt that the whole of this section, therefore, belongs to Nehemiah himself. But in ch. viii.-x. there is a change; the governor is spoken of in the third person, and it is therefore most probable that the section is from another pen. The remainder of the book, ch. xi.-xiii., was, with small exceptions, most likely written by Nehemiah; ch. xi. 1 seems to connect itself with the first part of ch. vii. 5. But the list of ch. xii. 1-26 was from a later hand, as the succession of high-priests is carried down to Jaddua, who was contemporary with Alexander the Great, or else the final editor added some names. Jaddua, however, may have been born before Nehemiah's death. The verses ch. xii. 44-47 may possibly not be by Nehemiah, as ch. xiii. 1 is closely connected with ch. xii. 43. We may believe, then, that, as much of this book was written by Nehemiah, but not the whole, it was ultimately arranged in its present form by some one, the author of the Chronicles very possibly (to which it, with Ezra, formed an appendix), who, under divine guidance, has transmitted to future ages of the Church this most instructive narrative as we now have it.

NEHEMIAS (ne-he-mi'as). 1. 1 Esd. v. 8, identical with Nehemiah of Ezra ii. 2. 2. 1 Esd. v. 40, Nehemiah, the governor.

NEHILOTH (ne'hi-löth), Ps. v., title. This word, signifying "perforated," showed that the psalm was to be accompanied by the music of a wind-instrument. Some have supposed that the organ, others that flutes were meant.

NEHUM. See REHUM.

NEHUSHTA (ne-hoosh'ta), the mother of King Jehoiachin, 2 Ki. xxiv. 8.

NEHUSHTAN (ne-hoosh'tan), "brazen," the serpent of brass or copper which Moses made by God's command in the wilderness, Num. xxi. 8, 9, was preserved for many ages. Hezekiah, perceiving that the people had been in the habit of paying a superstitious reverence to it, broke it up, 2 Ki. xviii. 4. Probably Nehushtan was the name by which it had been ordinarily known, though some believe it a term of contempt then first applied.

NEIEL (ne-i'el), one of the landmarks on the northern border of Asher, Josh. xix. 27.

NEIGHBOR (nay'bur). The Pharisees were disposed to restrict the meaning of neighbor to their own countrymen or friends. Our Lord, therefore, to teach the universal brotherhood of men, spoke his parable of the good Samaritan, Luke x. 25-37. When compassion can be shown, or a kind office done, there must be no limitation; every one is to be deemed for such purposes a "neighbor," Matt. v. 43-48.

NEILL (neel), WILLIAM, D.D., who was born near Pittsburg, in 1779, was educated at Princeton. He became a tutor in the college, and in 1805 he was settled as Presbyterian minister at Coopers-town, New Jersey, from which he removed, in 1809, to Albany, New York. In 1816 he was settled in Philadelphia as pastor of the Sixth Presbyterian Church, from which office he retired in 1824 to act as president of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania. In 1829 he was appointed secretary and general agent of the Presbyterian Board of Education, and in 1831 he assumed the work of the ministry in Germantown, where he continued until 1842. Dr. Neill was a most faithful minister, greatly beloved, and an excellent, pious man. He was the author of "Lectures on Biblical History," "Exposition of the Epistle to the Ephesians," "The Divine Origin of the Christian Religion" and other works. He died in 1860.

NEKEB (ne'keb), "a cavern," a boundary town in the territory of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33.

NEKODA (ne-ko'dah), one whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 48. Some of them, however, could not show their genealogy, Ezra ii. 60.

NELSON (nel'sun), DAVID, M.D., who became extensively known and very eminent in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, was born in the year 1793 near Jonesborough, Tennessee. He was educated at Washington College, Virginia, and studied medicine at Danville, Kentucky, and in Philadelphia. He served in Canada as a surgeon during the war of 1812, and at its close he settled in Jonesborough. In early life he had made a profession of religion, but he had fallen into infidelity, from which he was mercifully delivered; and resigning a lucrative practice, he dedicated himself to the Christian ministry.

He was licensed to preach in 1825, and in 1828 he settled as pastor at Danville, Kentucky, but in 1830 he was induced to remove to Missouri, which greatly needed an increase of ministers and a large accession to the staff of educators. He rendered important aid in founding Marion College, of which he became the first president. In 1836 he removed to Illinois, and at Quincy he established an educational institute with a view to the cultivation of a missionary spirit. He died at Oakland, near Quincy, in 1844. His greatest work was the "Cause and Cure of Infidelity," a noble performance which has taken a high place in religious literature. He wrote frequently for reviews and other journals, but his whole strength was devoted to the publication which will long be associated with his name.

NELSON, ROBERT, a pious and learned writer, was born in London, in 1656, and received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was strongly attached to James II., and he continued to communicate with the non-jurors till the year 1709, when he returned to the Established Church, in taking which step he yielded to the arguments of his friend, Bishop

Ken. He lived on terms of intimacy with Archbishop Tillotson, and was the zealous promoter of all works of charity, having the ability as well as the disposition to give what true benevolence prompted. He was the author of many popular works, among which are—"The Practice of True Devotion," "A Companion to the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England," "The Whole Duty of a Christian." He died in 1714, and was the first person buried in the cemetery of St. George's, Queen Square, London, where a long Latin inscription by Bishop Smalridge records his virtues.

NELSON, SAMUEL KELSEY, was born at Jonesborough, Tennessee, in 1787, and graduated at Washington College, then under the care of Dr. Doak. He directed his attention to the study of the law, but he abandoned it, and entered the ministry. After preaching for some time in South Carolina, he returned to Kentucky and settled at Danville as pastor. Here he labored very faithfully, and ere he died he had signal testimony of the power of the gospel in the great number of conversions which occurred in 1826. To him belongs the honor of founding Centre College at Danville, Kentucky. He entered very earnestly also into the work of promoting all benevolent institutions; and while engaged in advancing the cause of the Kentucky Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb he went to Tallahassee, Florida, in 1827, where he suddenly died. He was succeeded in the pastorate at Danville by his brother, the author of "The Cause and Cure of Infidelity."

NEMESIUS (ne-me'se-us), an eminent Christian philosopher who was bishop of Emesia, in Phoenicia, and flourished toward the close of the fourth century. He was the author of an admirable treatise on the nature of man which refutes the notions of the Manichæans, Eunomians and Apollinarists and defends that of Origen concerning the pre-existence of souls. His treatise is chiefly curious because it discovers a degree of acquaintance with physiology not to be paralleled in any other writers of so early a date, and it is one of the most elegant specimens now extant of the philosophy which prevailed among the ancient Christians.

NEMUEL (ne-mu'el). 1. A descendant of Reuben and brother of Dathan and Abiram, Num. xxvi. 9. 2. One of the sons of Simeon, Num. xxvi. 12; 1 Chr. iv. 24. He is also called Jemuel.

NEMUELITES (ne-mu'el-ites), a family of Simeon, descended from Nemuel, Num. xxvi. 12.

NEOLOGISTS (ne-ol'o-gists). Rationalists of Germany and elsewhere who frame their religious views according to the progress of scientific research and the changes introduced by Biblical criticism, aiming especially at eliminating all supernatural elements out of the system which they profess. See RATIONALISM.

NEOLOGY. See RATIONALISM.

NEOMENIA (ne-o-me'ni-a), a feast of the new moon. It appears from Chrysostom, Augustine and the early councils, that Christians were often tempted in primitive times to observe this and similar heathen festivals.

NEONOMIANS (ne-o-no-me'anz), a sect so called from the fact that they were viewed as turning the Gospel into a new law, the condition of which is imperfect through sincere and persevering obedience. The term is derived from the Greek words "neos," new, and "nomos," law. At the Synod of Dort much attention was given to a position which some theologians had adopted, and which was in opposition to the views ratified by the synod. According to that party, "The new Covenant of Grace which through the medium of Christ's death the Father made with man consists not in our being justified by faith as it apprehends the righteousness of Christ, but in this, that God, abrogating the exaction of perfect legal obedience, reputes or accepts of faith itself, and the imperfect obedience of faith, instead of the perfect obedience of the law, and graciously accounts them worthy of the reward of eternal life."

Toward the end of the seventeenth century a controversy prevailed in England among the Dissenters, one party holding with Dr. Crisp and being charged with "Antinomianism," and the other agreeing with the views of Dr. Daniel Williams, who leaned to the theology of Baxter, and who was considered to have adopted "Neonomianism." The views of Dr. Williams were thus set forth by himself: "Is the Gospel a law in this sense, viz., God in Christ thereby commandeth sinners to repent of sin and receive Christ by a true operative faith, promising that thereupon they shall be united to him, justified by his righteousness, pardoned and adopted; and that, persevering in faith and true holiness, they shall be finally saved; also threatening that if any shall die impenitent, unbelieving, ungodly, rejecters of his Grace, they shall perish without relief and endure sorer punishments than if these offers had not been made to them? 2. Hath the Gospel a sanction—i. e., doth Christ therein enforce his commands of faith, repentance and perseverance by the aforesaid promises and threatenings as motives of our obedience? Both these I affirm, and they deny, saying the Gospel in the largest sense is an absolute promise without precepts and conditions, and a Gospel threat is a bull. 3. Do the Gospel promises of benefits to certain graces, and its threats that those benefits shall be withheld and the contrary evils inflicted for the neglect of such graces, render those graces the condition of our personal title to those benefits? This they deny, and I affirm," etc.

It does not appear to have been a question in this controversy whether God in his word commands sinners to repent and believe in Christ, nor whether he promises life to believers and threatens death to unbelievers, but whether it be the Gospel under the form of a new law that thus commands or threatens, or the moral law on its behalf, and whether its promises to believing renders such believing a condition of the things promised. Several years afterward a similar controversy prevailed in Scotland. Boston, the Erskines and others had to meet and answer the question, whether they did or did not admit that in the Gospel there were commands of the nature of law. To which they replied that strictly there was nothing of law in the Gospel. It was a revelation and offer of mercy, a tender of deliverance by the acceptance of a Saviour, and that as all men, even though fallen, are still under the rule of the moral law, the law commands and enjoins all men to accept all offers made by God, to believe all teachings and to accept all tenders of mercies made by him to sinners.

as well to this signification. Another word is found in Isa. xxxiv. 13; Hos. ix. 6; it means a prickly weed, and may designate the nettle or the thistle. The nettle, Urtica, is too common to need description; its apparatus for stinging consists of a pointed tube through which the poison is forced into the wound which the point has made.

NETTLETON (net'tl-tun), ASAHEL, D.D., was born in 1783, at North Killingworth, Connecticut. He studied at Yale College, and was licensed to preach in 1811, but not ordained until 1817. He had resolved on being a missionary, but he had to abandon the resolution, because he saw that his preaching was acknowledged and needed in his own land. He continued to preach as a missionary in Connecticut and Massachusetts; and having published a volume of hymns, he went to Virginia for recruiting his health in 1827, and again he returned and preached through New England until 1831. After a voyage to England, Trinity College, Cambridge, was born in Canterbury, and educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He held various offices, both collegiate and ecclesiastical. In 1595 he was concerned in the controversy which originated at Cambridge from the public declaration of one of the Fellows of Caius College against the doctrine of predestination and falling from grace. The dispute, which was referred to Archbishop Whitgift, occasioned the well-known conference of divines at Lambeth, where certain propositions were agreed on, in conformity to Calvin's principles, commonly called the Lambeth Articles. In 1597 Nevil was promoted to the deanery of Canterbury. On Queen Elizabeth's death he was sent by Archbishop Whitgift to Scotland to address her successor, in the name of all the clergy, with assurances of their loyalty and affection. James I. afterward, when on a visit to Cambridge, in 1615, was entertained at Trinity College by Dr. Nevil, who died in May of the same year. By his munificence to Trinity College, Dr. Nevil has secured to himself the gratitude and admiration of posterity. He expended more than fifteen thousand dollars in rebuilding that fine quadrangle which to this day retains the name of Nevil's Court. He was also a contributor to the library of that college, and a benefactor to Eastbridge hospital in his native city.

NEVILLE (nev'il), EDMUND, D.D., was a native of London. He entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was ordained at Philadelphia in 1840. He had charge of St. Thomas' Church, Taunton, Massachusetts, until 1842, when he assumed the duties of St. Philip's Church, Philadelphia. In 1850 he settled in New Orleans, whence he removed to New York and again to Taunton, Massachusetts, only to change to Newark, New Jersey, in 1857. He is the author of "Autumnal Leaves," "George Selwood" and "Questions on the Morning and Evening Services."

NEVILLE, RALPH DE, an English churchman and lawyer of the thirteenth century, high in the favor of Henry III. He was made bishop of Chichester, chancellor of Ireland, and in 1231 was elected archbishop of Canterbury, though the pope refused to confirm the election. Through the queen's influence he lost the king's favor, who endeavored to remove him, but he refused to resign without the authority of Parliament. He was finally restored to the royal favor in 1242. He built a magnificent mansion in the street which was in consequence called Chancellor's Lane, afterward corrupted into Chancery Lane. Ambitious and wealthy, he was yet a man faithful to his sovereign, and able and irreproachable in his administration; accessible alike to poor and rich, and a munificent benefactor to the Church.

NEVINS (nev'inz), WILLIAM, D.D., was born in 1797, in Norwich, Connecticut, and after an effort to train him to mercantile life, he was allowed to enter Yale College, where he graduated in 1816. He then entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and after three years' study of theology, he was licensed to preach by the New London Association in 1819. He was ordained as successor to the Rev. Dr. Inglis in the First Presbyterian Church in Baltimore. Here he had to assume the duties of a most weighty charge, and his pastoral work showed that the great Head of the Church had planted in that portion of the field the under shepherd who by intellectual endowments, prudence and determination, and still more by earnest spirituality of mind, was exactly fitted for the place. In 1832 Baltimore was severely scourged by cholera, and in that trying season he lost his wife and her mother. Soon afterward it became evident that his own health was on the wane. He rapidly declined, and in September, 1835, he died most triumphantly in the full assurance of faith and hope. Dr. Nevins was eminent for his originality, his great clearness and nervous power of style, and accordingly his preaching was direct and most impressive, reaching every faculty and power of all in his audience. He was a great and good man.

NEWBURY (new'ber-e), WALTER, is the name of one of the great men connected with the abbey of St. Augustine, now the cathedral of Bristol. In 1148, Robert Fitzharding, the mayor of Bristol, founded a priory of Black Canons at Bristol, and in the reign of Henry II. it was changed into an abbey. It became one of the great abbeys of England, and at the dissolution of the religious houses in 1542 Henry VIII. changed the church of the abbey into a cathedral, appointing a bishop, a dean, a subdeacon, six canons, six lay clerks, six choristers, two grammar-school masters, four almsmen and other beneficiaries, at the same time endowing the cathedral church with the greatest part of the lands of the old monastery. Newbury was elected in 1428, and he encountered great trouble in governing the abbey. He was even thrust out of it in a most illegal manner, and for five years he had to endure great oppression. After being restored, he became a great benefactor to the place, and in addition to all his improvements made at the abbey, he erected the great manor-house of Almondsbury, which still belongs to the see of Bristol. Newbury died in 1463.

The cathedral of Bristol does not take rank with the churches of the first or even second class in England. The edifice is small and low, but the tower is imposing. It has no clerestory, and the side aisles are of the same height as the body of the church. Approaching the western entrance, there is no long-drawn nave with expansive window and gorgeous canopied doorway. In fact, there is no nave at all, and from the tower to the right and left the transepts extend, and the choir beyond the tower, with its side aisles, constitutes the main body of the church. There is a chapter-house to the south of the south transept, and a Lady chapel to the east of the north transept, and these with vestries make up the cathedral of Bristol—a church in which some of the most profound scholars and eminent divines of England have ministered. The names of Butler, the author of the "Analogy," of Conybeare, the author of the great works on "Miracles" and on "Revealed Religion," he settled at East Windsor, where he lectured to the students without accepting a permanent situation in the seminary which was offered to him. In his later years he opposed what has been known as the "New Haven School of Theology." He died in May, 1844.

NEUMAN (neu'man), JOHN NEPOMUCENE, D.D., born in Bohemia, in 1811, was ordained a priest in the Romish Church at New York in 1836. He entered the order of "The Holy Redeemer," and in March, 1852, he was consecrated bishop of Philadelphia. He died in 1860.

NEUTRALS (neu'tralz), a title given by way of contempt to certain followers of Zwinglius who were charged with holding that communion in one or both of the elements in the Lord's Supper was indifferent, as mere bread or wine was received in either case.

NEVIL (nev'il), or NEVILLE, THOMAS, dean of Canterbury and an eminent benefactor to of Thomas Newton, of Gray, of Monk and Thompson are sufficient to reflect credit on any see.

NEWCOMB (neu'kum), HARVEY, D.D., who became a very voluminous author, especially as a writer for the young, was born at Thetford, Vermont, in 1803. He became a teacher, and in Westfield, New York, he edited and published "The Western Star." He removed to Pittsburg, where he edited "The Christian Herald" and produced Sabbath-school books of much value. Being licensed to preach, he took charge of the Roxbury Congregational Church, and afterward of the Needham and Grantville churches. He was then engaged to edit "The Traveler," and in 1851 he connected himself with "The New York Observer," preaching at the same time in Brooklyn. He wrote one hundred and seventy-eight volumes, mostly for children, and among them were fourteen volumes of Church history. His largest work was "The Cyclopædia of Missions," which appeared in 1855. In addition to all this labor, he was a frequent contributor to several journals, and he prepared works on "The North American Indians" and on the "Great Truths of Christianity." He possessed great versatility of talent, much readiness and vast energy, as his numerous works abundantly display. He died in 1863, at Brooklyn.

NEWCOME (new'kum), WILLIAM, an eminent Irish prelate, descended from a nonconformist family, was born at Barton-le-Clay, in Bedfordshire, in 1729, and educated at Pembroke College, Oxford. In 1765 he was appointed chaplain to the earl of Hertford, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, who conferred on him the see of Dro-more. In 1775 he was translated to Ossary, and in 1778 he produced his first work, "An Harmony of the Gospels," which involved him in a controversy with Dr. Priestley respecting the duration of our Lord's ministry, Dr. Priestley confining it to one year, while the bishop extended its duration to three years and a half. In 1795 he was translated to the archbishopric of Armagh. He died in Dublin in 1800.

NEWCOMEN (neu'kum-en), MATTHEW, a nonconformist divine of England, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. As member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, he assisted in the drawing up of their catechism, and he was one of the five divines who attacked Bishop Hall's "Vindication of Episcopacy." He was ejected from the living of Dedham, Essex, in 1662, and then retired to Leyden, where he died in 1666.

NEWELL, HARRIET, who was the daughter of Moses Atwood, of Haverhill, Massachusetts, was born in 1793. She became the wife of the missionary Samuel Newell, with whom she went to the East. In 1812 she died of consumption, in the Isle of France, whither, with her husband, she had been driven from India. She had unusually great mental and spiritual endowments. She was intellectual, exceedingly sensitive and tender, and deeply experimental and earnest in her piety, without any tendency to austerity or ostentatious sanctimoniousness. The biography of Mrs. Newell by Dr. Woods did much to promote the cause of missions; and thus it may be truly said that by her death she did more than she accomplished in her life.

NEWELL, SAMUEL, who was born at Durham, Maine, in 1785, graduated at Harvard College in 1807, and studied theology at Andover. Along with Judson, Nott and Mills, he offered himself as a missionary to the General Association of Ministers at Bradford, in June, 1810, and was ordained at Salem in 1812. He landed at Calcutta, and was ordered to leave the country by the Bengal government. He went to the Isle of France, where he lost his wife and child. He was permitted to settle in Ceylon, and after good service there, he succeeded in establishing himself at Bombay, where he labored until his death by cholera, in 1821. He was eminent for his piety, great sweetness and entire devotion to the work of his life.

NEW-FOUNDATION CATHEDRALS, a title given to the cathedrals which were founded and endowed by Henry VIII. out of the revenues of the dissolved monasteries. They were Oxford, Gloucester, Bristol, Chester and Peterborough; and the see of Sodor and Man, though formerly existing, was placed by Henry in the province of York.

NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH, or SWEDENBORGIANS (swe-den-bor'je-anz). These are the titles of those Christians who receive the doctrines taught in the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, a Swedish nobleman who was born in 1689, at Stockholm. He enjoyed the advantage of a good education in his early years; and as he was endowed with great intellectual capacity, he made great progress, and soon acquired a wide knowledge of the sciences. He was also trained very sedulously by his father in the faith of the Lutheran Church, and he gave evidence of a regard for religious truth from his youth up. In 1719 he was placed among the nobles of the kingdom, and he entered on the duties of legislation, taking his part in the management of public affairs. He was characterized by great literary industry, and he published a great number of philosophical works; but it is to the theological part of his system that this article must be devoted.

He declared that in the year 1743 the Lord manifested himself to him by an actual personal appearance, and that he so opened his eyes that he was afterward able to see and converse with angels and spirits—a privilege which he enjoyed without interruption for twenty-seven years. He then began to print and publish many marvelous things respecting heaven, hell, the state of men after death, the worship of God, the spiritual sense of the Scriptures and the different parts of the universe, which were incorporated into his system, and which soon attracted a large share of attention—by some who ridiculed his pretensions and by many who admitted his claims. He lived and died in the communion of the Lutheran Church. His theological views may be easily classified.

THE SCRIPTURES AS INTERPRETED BY THE WRITINGS AND REVELATIONS OF SWEDENBORG, TAKEN AS THE STANDARD OF SWEDENBORGIAN DOCTRINE.—On the doctrine of the Trinity Swedenborgians hold "that Jehovah God, the Creator and Preserver of heaven and earth, is Love itself and Wisdom itself, or God itself and Truth itself; that he is One, both in essence and in person, in whom, nevertheless, is the Divine Trinity of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, which are the essential Divinity, the Divine Humanity and the Divine Proceeding, answering to the soul, the body and the operative energy in man; and that the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is that God." An interpretation of this dogma is found in a clause in the "Conference Deed" which is enrolled in the Chancery, viz., "That our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is the only God of heaven and earth, and that in him is the Divine Trinity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit." On the Incarnation, the second article declares "that Jehovah God descended from heaven as Divine Truth, which is the Word, and took upon him human nature, for the purpose of removing from man the powers of hell and restoring to order all things in the spiritual world and all things in the Church; that he removed from man the powers of hell by combats against and victories over them, in which consisted the great work of redemption;" that "he for ever keeps the infernal powers in subjection to himself, and that all who believe in him with the understanding, from the heart, and live accordingly, will be saved."

Along with these statements must be taken the proposition "that to believe redemption to have consisted in the Passion of the Cross is a fundamental error of the Old Testament," and that the imputation of the merit and righteousness of Christ which consist in redemption is a thing impossible, the only imputation being one "of good and evil, and at the same time of faith; and that the Lord imputeth good to every man, and that hell imputeth evil to every man." On the subject of the Holy Scripture, the third article declares "that the sacred Scripture, or Word of God, is divine truth itself, containing a spiritual sense hitherto unknown, whence it is divinely inspired and holy in every syllable, as well as a literal sense, which is the basis of its spiritual sense, and in which divine truth is in its fullness, its sanctity and its power, thus that it is accommodated to the apprehension both of angels and man; that the spiritual and the natural senses are united by correspondences like soul and body, every natural expression and image answering to and including a spiritual and divine idea; and thus that the Word is the medium of communication with heaven and of conjunction with the Lord."

As to ordinances, it may be observed that Baptism and the Lord's Supper are considered as sacraments of divine institution to be permanently observed, the view of their efficacy being nearly in accordance with the Zwinglian conception.

The doctrines of Swedenborg extended into Germany, England, the United States and Canada. Of late years much attention has been paid to the publication of the works of Swedenborg, a society having been formed for that purpose. In England several of the views of the Swedish baron have been adopted by members of the Church of England without their separating from the Church.

NEWLAND (neu'land), an abbot of Bristol, became famous as the historian of the establishment. All the remains of an historical character which were produced by the officers of the old religious houses are fraught with great interest, inasmuch as they cast a flood of light on the inner life of these institutions. They record the difficulties, the jealousies, the misrule, the rebellions against authority, and other circumstances which from time to time were occurring in their history, and which showed that, whether in or out of a cloister, human nature is much the same. Newland died in 1515.

NEWMAN (neu'man), SAMUEL, was born in 1602, in England, and educated at the university of Oxford. He became a minister of the Established Church, but retired from it, and came to New England, about the year 1636. He labored for a year and a half at Dorchester, and about five years at Weymouth, and in 1644 he removed to Rehoboth, a place which bordered on the Providence Plantations. He gave this name to the place because of the opening which was there presented to his flock. He was the author of a concordance which passed through several editions, the fifth being published in London, in 1720, in a goodly-sized folio. He was a man of earnest character, learned and much devoted to his ministerial duties. Cotton Mather quaintly says of him, "He was a lively preacher, and a very preaching liver." He died in 1660.

NEW MOON, TABLES OF THE. Various tables have been devised for finding the new moon, from which Easter is calculated. The Metonic cycle was employed at the time of the Nicene council, and was supposed to contain nineteen years; but in reality it contained somewhat less, which deficiency amounts to a whole day in about three hundred and twelve years. The numbers belonging to this cycle have been called "golden numbers."

NEW STYLE. The present method of computing the year was introduced by Pope Gregory XIII., in October, 1582. By it ten days were deducted from the year 1582 by calling what, according to the old calendar, would have been the 5th of October the 15th of October, 1582. It did not come into force in England until September 2, 1752.

NEWTON (neu'tun), JOHN, who became rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, in London, was born in that city, in 1722. His father was the master of a ship that traded to the Mediterranean. His mother, who was a pious dissenter, taught him the Westminster Shorter Catechism with the proof-texts, and the catechisms and hymns of Dr. Watts, but she died when he was only seven years of age. He had but little attendance at school; for when he was only eleven years old, he went several voyages with his father, and on the occasion of the fifth voyage he was left with a friend of his father at Alicante, in Spain. He became master of a vessel in the African slave-trade, and on the African coast he fell into habits of dissipation and profligacy that seemed to have erased all the impressions of his childish years. Eventually, he became surfeited and tired of his degradation and vice. He retired from the sea and engaged in the duties of tide-waiter at Liverpool, which, after three years, he resigned in 1778, to prepare himself for the duties of a minister in the Established Church of England, as his whole heart and life had become entirely changed. He failed in an effort which he made to induce the archbishop of York to ordain him, and began to act as an expounder of Scripture and a missionary among the careless classes, thus spending seven or eight years of his life. At length, in 1764, the curacy of Olney was offered to him, and the bishop of Lincoln ordained him. For fifteen years he resided at Olney, and here he was the intimate friend of the poet Cowper, the "Olney Hymns" being the joint production of these two congenial minds. In 1779 Mr. John Thornton presented Newton to the rectory of St. Mary Woolnoth, and St. Mary Woolchurch Haw, in Lombard street, London, and he removed to the capital; and here, during twenty-seven years of great usefulness and remarkable popularity, he labored till his death, in 1807, at the age of eighty-five years. He was a man of great originality, much acuteness and admirably fitted for the practical details of ministerial life. His views were Calvinistic in accordance with those of his friend Thomas Scott, the commentator, and his influence on behalf of practical and experimental religion was universally recognized. His published works extend to six volumes octavo, and they continue to be much sought after until the present time.

NEWTON (neu'tun), RICHARD, a learned English divine, founder of Hertford College, Oxford, was born in 1676, at Yardley Chase, in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he distinguished himself as a tutor. In 1710 he was inducted principal of Hart Hall, and subsequently was made rector of Sudbury, in Northamptonshire. His application for a charter to take Hart Hall from under the jurisdiction of Exeter College and erect it into an independent college occasioned a most ably-sustained controversy between him and the rector of Exeter. In 1740, however, he obtained the charter for raising Hart Hall into a perpetual college for the usual studies. In 1752 he was promoted to a canonry of Christ Church. He died in 1753. He was the author of "Pluralities Indispensable."

NEWTON, THOMAS, an English prelate, was born at Lichfield in 1704. After finishing his education at Westminster, he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and in 1744 he was presented to the rectory of St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside. In 1794 he published an edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, with notes and the life of the author, which was followed by the "Paradise Regained," in a similar form. But his reputation rests on his "Dissertations on the Prophecies," completed in 1758. He was made a prebendary of Westminster in 1757, and soon after precentor of York, both which preferments he resigned in 1761, on his promotion to the see of Bristol. In 1768 he was made dean of St. Paul's, and died in 1782.

NEZIAH (ne-tsi'ah), one whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubabel, Ezra ii. 54.

NEZIB (ne'tsib), a town in the plain country of Judah, Josh. xv. 43, doubtless Beit Nusib, between Beit Jibrin (ancient Eleutheropolis) and Hebron.

NIBHAZ (nib'haz), an idol deity of the Avites whose worship was introduced into Samaria after the deportation of the ten tribes, 2 Ki. xvii. 31. According to the Hebrew interpreters the idol bore the figure of a dog, which, however, it is supposed may have been a conjecture founded on the derivation of the name from a word signifying "to bark." But some traces have been thought to be discovered of a Syrian idol under that figure.

NIBSHAN (nib'shan), a city in the wilderness of Judah, Josh. xv. 62—that is, the region contiguous to the Dead Sea.

at which in A. D. 325 a celebrated council was convened by the emperor Constantine to settle the differences that had arisen in the Christian Church in respect to the doctrines of Arius. It was attended by two hundred and fifty bishops, most of them from the East, by presbyters, deacons and others from different parts of the Christian world. The decision of this council did not give peace to the Church, as the controversy still went on, but it supplied that mode of stating the doctrine of the Church on the subject of the Deity which ever since has been recognized as orthodox. See NICENE CREED.

NICENE (ni'seen) CREED is so called because it was in its first form drawn up at Nicæa, in Bithynia, in A. D. 325, to express the faith of the Church in opposition to the heresy of Arius. Some have thought that it was soon used in the services of the Church, though others date its use from the following century, the latter part Ages. 1. A patriarch of Constantinople, who was born in that city about 750. He attended at the second Council of Nice, in 787, where he zealously exerted himself in defence of image-worship. In 806 he was elected patriarch. In 814, an edict having been promulgated by the emperor Leo, the Armenian, for the suppression of the worship of images, the patriarch made use of all the means in his power to prevent it from being carried into execution. The emperor, finding that neither advice nor admonition had any effect in inclining the patriarch to submission, passed a decree of deposition and banishment against him. The chief part of his exile was spent in a monastery which had been founded by himself in an island of the Propontis, where he was confined till his death, in 828. He is honored as a confessor by both the Greek and Latin Churches.

NICANDER (ni-kan'der) and MARCIAN (mar'sh'an) were two Christian martyrs who suffered in the fourth century. They were officers in the Roman army who had received the faith. The wife of Nicander was also a Christian, and in the most devoted manner she encouraged her husband to constancy in the faith. Marcian, on the other hand, had to bear the solicitations of his wife, who remained a pagan, to renounce his religion for her sake and for the sake of their child. He remained steadfast, admonished her touching her idolatry, and both suffered death (A. D. 306) for their attachment to Christ the Saviour.

NICANOR (ni-ka'nor). 1. 1 Macc. iii. 38, an officer of Antiochus Epiphanes and other Syrian kings. 2. One of the seven chosen to administer the goods of the Church, Acts vi. 5.

having been added at the Council of Constantinople in 381, for the last clause as the creed was at first prepared ended with the words, "I believe in the Holy Ghost." The addition contravened the heresy of Macedonius with regard to the Holy Spirit. Still later, in 589, the words "filioque" (and the Son) were added by the Western Church to express the doctrine that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son as well as the Father—a tenet which the Greek Church considers heretical. The Nicene Creed is recognized in the Greek and Romish Churches, and most Protestant Churches admit it. At the time of the Reformation it was introduced by the Lutherans into their "Formula of Concord." In the English Prayer-book the Nicene Creed is introduced into the communion service, but in the American Prayer-book it is placed in the morning and evening services, the minister having liberty to use it or the Apostles' Creed as he may please.

NICEPHORUS (ni-sef'o-rus), the name of several eminent ecclesiastics during the Middle ages. Eusebius, Socrates and others, and he completed his work before he was thirty-six years of age. On account of the elegance with which it is written, the author has been honored with the title of the ecclesiastical Thucydides by some critics, while others, from the marvelous tales and fables which are interspersed in it, have given him the name of the theological Pliny.

NICHE (nich), a term in architecture derived from the French, which means a recess, either square or cylindrical, usually made for the reception of a statue.

NICHOLAS (nik'o-las). The name of a line of popes. I, surnamed the Great, was raised to the pontificate in 858. He was distinguished for his virtues and his energy in spreading Christianity, his resisting heresy and restoring piety and splendor to the Roman Church. He died in 867. II, a native of Savoy, became pope in 1058. He was a friend of Hildebrand (Gregory VII.), agreeably to whose reforming views he endeavored to correct
