ecclesiastical abuses. He died in 1061. III. was elected pope in 1277. He attempted a reconciliation with the Greek Church, but marred his otherwise remarkable qualities by his nepotism—a fault for which he was severely censured in the nineteenth canto of the “Inferno.” He died in 1280. IV. was elected pope in 1288. He displayed great interest in the restoration of Roman monuments, embellished the city, laid the first stone of the famous cathedral of Orvieto and earnestly endeavored to lead the Christian princes into a new crusade against the Saracens. He died, in 1292, of sorrow at the news of the fall of Acre. V. was born at Sarzana, in 1339, and became pope in 1447. He was one of the most celebrated of pontiffs for his zeal in the promotion of ecclesiastical interests as well as of learning. He had from an early age obtained great reputation as a scholar. He succeeded in putting an end to the differences which had arisen from the Council of Bâle, restored order in his states, improved the university of Bologna, founded those of Barcelona, Treves and Glasgow, our Lord. He had many disciples in Holland chiefly from the fanatical branches of the sect of Anabaptists, and his notions spread to England, where his followers had private assemblies for devotion. Nicholas was the author of “The Looking-glass of Righteousness” and other works.

NICODEMUS (nik-o-de'mus), a Pharisee and member of the Sanhedrim who was impressed by what he had heard concerning Jesus, but being unwilling, on account of his station, to commit himself without greater surety than he possessed, repaired by night to the house in which Christ dwelt, and held with him that important discourse which occupies the third chapter of John's Gospel. The effect which was then produced upon his mind may be collected from the fact that subsequently, at one of the sittings of the venerable body to which he belonged, he ventured to let fall a few words in favor of Jesus, whose proceedings were then in question, John vii. 50; and that he took part with his colleague, Joseph of Arimathea, in meaning of the name Balaam is nearly that of the name Nicolas, he says that the Nicolaitanes or Balaamites were “those who, after the pattern of Balaam's sin, sought to introduce a false freedom, the freedom of the flesh, into the Church of God.” Jewish legalism was the first enemy of the truth; afterward came heathen licentiousness. The reader must take his choice of these two explanations, each of which is supported by distinguished critics.

NICOLAS (nik'olas), one of the seven chosen to administer the goods of the Church, Acts vi. 5. He is described as a proselyte of Antioch.

NICOLE (ne-kol'), PIERRE, an eminent French divine and controversial writer, was born at Chartres, in 1625. He became member of the society of Port Royal, where he taught with great reputation, and was associated with Arnauld in his defence of Jansenius. A letter he had written to Pope Innocent XI., in defence of certain bishops, raised such a storm that he was compelled to retire for a season from his native country. Finally, in 1683, every ban was removed, and he was suffered to pursue his studies uninterruptedly in Paris. He died in 1695. His chief works are “Letters and Reflections on the Epistles and Gospels” and “Moral Essays.”

NICOLSON (nik'ol-sun), WILLIAM, a learned English prelate, was born at Orton, in Cumberland, in 1655, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, became successively bishop of Carlisle, Derry, and archbishop of Cashel, but died suddenly a few days after he was raised to the archiepiscopal dignity, in 1727. He published “The English, Scotch and Irish Historical Library,” the “Leges Marchiarum, or Border Laws,” and several other works. He also distinguished himself by the zeal and ability with which he entered into the Bangorian controversy.

NICON (ni'kon), a saint in the Greek and Roman calendars, lived in the tenth century. He entered a monastery on the borders of Pontus and Paphlagonia, and gained a reputation for extraordinary sanctity. In 961 he was sent on a mission into Armenia, where his labors are said to have been eminently successful. From Armenia he went to Crete, and thence to Lacedæmon, whence he was called to Corinth. He died in 998.

NICON, patriarch of the Russian empire, was born near Nischni Novogorod, of mean parentage, in 1605. He had a strong prejudice in favor of a monastic life, and the loss of his children led him to assume the habit of a monk and to send his wife to a convent. His austerities, as well as his learning, by degrees raised him to public consequence; he was patronized by his sovereign, and at last made archbishop of Novogorod and patriarch of Russia. Some innovations which he introduced into the Church, and the publication of the Bible in the Russian language, raised him enemies among the clergy, and at last, by intrigue and violence, he was obliged to abdicate his high office, in 1658, and was imprisoned; but the emperor permitted him to retire to the privacy of his original cell. He died in 1681, after enduring much undeserved persecution.

NICOPOLIS (ni-kop'o-lis). There were many ancient cities which bore this name; three in particular have been supposed by different critics the one meant, Tit. iii. 12. One of these was in the procured equitable reforms in maritime laws and offered liberal hospitality to the Greek exiles from Constantinople. The Vatican Library first rose under his auspices. His pontificate was troubled by the famous conspiracy of Stefano Porcari in behalf of Roman freedom against the temporal power of the papacy. He died in 1455.

NICHOLAS, HENRY, a German Mystic of the sixteenth century, and founder of the fanatical sect known by the name of “The House or Family of Love,” was a native of Munster. He first attracted the notice of the public about the year 1540, and pretended that he had a commission from Heaven to teach men that the essence of religion consisted in the feelings of divine love, and that all other theological tenets, whether they related to objects of faith or modes of worship, were of no moment. He pretended that he was greater than Moses and Christ, because Moses taught mankind to hope, Christ to believe, but he to love. He also gave out that the kingdom of Israel was to be raised and established in the time of his ministry, applying to himself those prophecies that refer to

NICOLAITANES (nik-o-la'i-tânz), the designation of a party or sect whom our Lord declares, Rev. ii. 6, 15, that he hates. There is a difficulty in deciding who these persons were and whence they had their origin. A prevailing early opinion was that they were the followers of Nicolas the deacon, who had lapsed from the faith and lived in impurity. Afterward another Nicolas was deemed the founder of the Nicolaitanes. Dr. Alford believes a plain historical fact referred to, and sees nothing unreasonable in imagining that an associate of the apostles made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. Dr. Trench, on the other hand, prefers a symbolical interpretation. He does not deny that in the second century there were actual Nicolaitanes, but he thinks that no sect really bore the name in the apostolic times. He considers those who held the doctrine of Balaam, Rev. ii. 14, identical with those who held the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, Rev. ii. 15; and as the north-eastern corner of Cilicia; another on the Nessus, in the interior of Thrace; the third in Epirus (though Pliny assigns it to Arcanania). This last, most probably the Nicopolis intended by St. Paul, was built by Augustus in commemoration of his victory at Actium.

NIELD (neeld), JAMES, a man who, like the philanthropist Howard, devoted a great part of his life to the relief of human wretchedness, was born at Knutsford, in Cheshire, England, in 1744, and coming to London as an apprentice to a goldsmith, realized a fortune in that business. In 1773, by his exertions, a society was formed in the metropolis having for its object the relief and discharge of persons confined for small debts. Of this benevolent institution Mr. Nield was chosen treasurer, and he continued to hold that office through life. He traveled not, as most do, for pleasure or profit, but to gauge the depths of human misery and to alleviate the sufferings of his fellow-men. It was his constant practice in his prison excursions, as he called them, during thirty years, to wait upon the magistrates in cities and boroughs, and respectfully to represent what he saw amiss in their jails. By these means he was the instrument of producing many substantial improvements and of diffusing a kindred spirit of beneficence far and wide, so that it would be difficult to estimate the extent of his services in the humane cause to which he cheerfully and perseveringly devoted his time and fortune. He died, universally lamented, in 1814.

NIEREMBERG (ni'rem-berg), JOHN EUSEBIUS DE, a learned Spanish Jesuit, descended from a noble Tyrolese family, was born at Madrid in 1590, and educated at Salamanca, where he entered the society in 1614. Natural history, divinity and the Scriptures were the subjects to which his chief attention was devoted. He filled the chair of natural history in the royal school at Madrid for fourteen years, with very high reputation, and afterward, during three years, read lectures illustrative of the Scriptures. At the same time he was held in high estimation as a director of consciences, and was attended in his confessional by vast numbers of distinguished characters, in the highest ranks. He was the author of a prodigious number of works in Latin and Spanish, among which is "Worshiping in Spirit and in Truth." His death took place in 1658.

NIGEL (ni'jel), bishop of Ely, was nephew of Roger, bishop of Salisbury, the great justiciary of Henry I., through whose influence he was made treasurer of England. He held the castle of Devizes against Stephen for three days, in consequence of which he was suspended for several years. In the reign of Henry II. he was restored, and rose in favor, and is supposed to have held the great seal. He was a man of learning and ability, and showed incomparable knowledge of the business of the exchequer.

reputation by his writings, was born at Wolpe, in the duchy of Brunswick, in 1584. He was educated in the Lutheran religion, and after studying for some time in the colleges of Verden and Goslar, went to the university of Helmstadt about 1607. While private tutor at the court of Weimar he conceived a disgust against the Lutheran Church, owing, it is said, to his being disappointed of preferment, and he retired to Cologne, where he became a convert to the Romish religion, about 1622. His first employment was that of director of the college of proselytes, and he afterward entered the lists in defence of the popish cause. In 1626 he returned to the duchy of Brunswick, to be director of a convent of nuns, and in 1629 he was made abbot of Ilfeld. From this abbey he was driven by the Swedes in 1633, when he withdrew into Holland, where he continued to reside till 1649. Returning afterward into Germany, he was made suffragan of the archbishop of Mentz, with the title of bishop of Mysia. He died in 1657.

NIMROD (nim'rod), an eminent early warrior and king; he was the son of Cush and grandson of Ham, and his history is briefly summed in a few verses, Gen. x. 8-12; 1 Chr. i. 10. He was the first mighty hero upon the earth; he was successful in war, and was distinguished in the chase, so that his skill and intrepidity as a huntsman passed into a proverb. He was not content with a narrow sphere; he roamed northward into the fertile land of Shinar and to the great town Babylon. There he established the first seat of his empire, so that Babylon was afterward called "the land of Nimrod," Mic. v. 6. His ambition prompted him, however, to wider conquests; he went into the country called Asshur, Gen. x. 11, margin, and there he founded Nineveh, not at its origin so considerable as the neighboring Resen, but destined far to outshine it in celebrity. Resen, Rehoboth and Calah were the other cities built in his reign by Nimrod. This is all that at present we know for certain of Nimrod. Among the Assyrian monuments a figure has been discovered which is said to represent Nimrod; he is grasping a lion in his left hand, while his right holds probably a missile weapon.

NIMSHI (nim'shi), the grandfather of King Jehu, 1 Ki. xix. 16.

NINEVEH (nin'e-veh), the capital of the ancient kingdom and empire of Assyria, was situated on the east bank of the Tigris. The name appears to be compounded from that of an Assyrian deity, "Nin," corresponding, it is conjectured, with the Greek Hercules, and occurring in the names of several Assyrian kings, as in "Ninus," the founder of the city, according to Greek tradition. The political history of Nineveh is that of

NIOBE (ni-o'be), in classical mythology, was the daughter of Tantalus and one of the Pleiades, married to Amphion, king of Thebes. Proud of her numerous offspring, she provoked the anger of Apollo and Diana, who slew them all. She was herself changed by Jupiter into a rock, from which a rivulet fed by her tears continually poured. The subject of Niobe and her children was a great favorite with the ancients, and it has afforded great room for sculpture among modern artists.

NISAN, NISON. See MONTHS.

NISBET (nis'bit), CHARLES, D.D., was born in 1736, at Haddington, in Scotland, and educated in the university of Edinburgh, where he graduated in 1754. He began his ministry in Glasgow at the church in the Gorbals, but in two years he removed to Montrose. When the presidency of Princeton College was offered to Dr. Witherspoon, he declined it, and suggested the name of Mr. Nisbet, but eventually Dr. Witherspoon was induced to change his mind, and thus the mind of the other was directed to the American colonies. He was decided in his views that the cause of the colonists was just in their complaints against the policy of the home government. In 1783, the degree of doctor of divinity was conferred on him, by the trustees of Princeton College; and when the new college at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, was established, he was induced to become the first president. He reached Philadelphia in June, 1785, and in due time entered on the duties of his office. He lectured with great acceptance, on systematic theology, to students who had the ministry in view, and he often aided Dr. Davidson in the services of the Presbyterian church in Carlisle. He died in 1804, of fever and inflammation of the lungs, resulting from a severe cold, leaving behind him the character of a man of fine scholarship, great earnestness and determination, with a firm purpose ever to do all that he knew to be right. He belonged to the evangelical side in Scotland, and in his adopted country, all who heard recognized the clear Scriptural doctrines of the standards of the Church. His library, through the kindness of Bishop McCoskry and Henry C. Turnbull, two of his grandsons, was given to the theological seminary at Princeton.

NITRE (ni'ter), Prov. xxv. 20. This is, no doubt, the natron found abundantly in certain Egyptian lakes fifty miles west of Cairo. The Egyptians use it in bread, and for soap; also, it is said, mixed with vinegar as a cure for toothache. The contrariety between these two ingredients illustrates the place referred to.

NIX, an eminent bishop of Norwich, holds a distinguished place along with Bishops Goldwell, Lyart, Walter de Suffield, Ralph de Walpole and others of the great mediæval ecclesiastical builders. He succeeded Goldwell, and carried out several of the works which that prelate did not live to finish, and his taste may still be seen in the stone vaulting of the transept. He was held in high esteem as an efficient ruler in the Church, and after his death a monument was erected to his memory, which still remains in the cathedral. It stands on the south side of the nave.

NISROCH (nis'rok), an Assyrian deity in whose house or temple Sennacherib was worshipping when he was slain by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer, 2 Ki. xix. 37; Isa. xxxvii. 38. Very little is known of this god, but it has been proposed to identify him with Asshur, the supreme deity of the Assyrians. It is certain that a human figure, with the head of an eagle and wings springing from the back, occurs frequently on early Assyrian monuments. The name of Nisroch may have been given to this, and it may correspond with the Egyptian sun-god Phrah, which had the head of an eagle or hawk. But learned men can but at present offer conjectures.

NOADIAH (no-ad'yah). 1. A Levite, Ezra viii. 33. 2. A prophetess who would have intimidated Nehemiah, Neh. vi. 14.

NOAH (no'ah). 1. An eminent patriarch, the ninth in descent after Adam. He lived in evil times. Five hundred years he spent in a world filled with violence, and in rampant rebellion against its Maker. But he walked with God. He was a preacher of righteousness, 2 Pet. ii. 5, by his conduct, and probably by his words also. At length a message was revealed to him: "The end of all flesh is come before me," Gen. vi. 18; and he was instructed to build an ark for the preservation of his own family. Moved with godly fear, he obeyed; and his preparations must have preached still more plainly to the world of sinners. For a full century still the long-suffering of God waited. Whether in that interval any had humbled themselves and sought mercy we know not, but we know that when the hour of destiny arrived the world was in its mad uproar. There was feasting, and there was the business of life in full whirl, and no man chose to recognize his danger till the storm burst suddenly upon them, Matt. xxiv. 37-39. A year passed over. Noah had more than once opened the window of the ark and sent forth birds, and at last the command came for him to go forth. He built an altar then and sacrificed to the Lord; and glad must have been his heart when he heard the gracious words of a fresh covenant, and beheld the beautiful bow, the pledge of it, and knew now by personal experience how gracious God is to those that humbly seek him. He had exercised faith, and his faith was crowned with blessing.

Noah was to be the father of a new race. From his small family the earth was to be re-peopled. And three hundred and fifty years did he live among his posterity, a monument of God's justice and God's faithfulness. One more incident is related of him, Gen. ix. 20-27. He planted a vine and drank, knowingly or not we cannot say, too freely of the fruit of it. A shameful scene ensued. But the patriarch recovered, and in the spirit of prophecy predicted happiness to his faithful sons, judgment to the ungodly. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." "The days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years, and he died," Gen. ix. 29. See DELUGE.

NOAILLES (no-al', or no-a'yeh), LOUIS ANTOINE DE, a French prelate and cardinal, was born in 1651. At his birth he inherited the dukedom of St. Cloud and other dignities, all which temporal advantages he relinquished in order to become an ecclesiastic. When but twenty-five years old, he was made a doctor of the Sorbonne. His rise was progressive, till at length he became archbishop of Paris. He was a firm opponent of the Jansenists and Quietists, although he at one time was himself accused of heresy, in opposing the bull Unigenitus, so that a sentence of banishment was recorded against him. He afterward, however, made his submission to the pope, and accepted the bull Unigenitus without any reserve or qualification. He died in 1729.

NOB, a city in Benjamin, on the great road from the north to Jerusalem, in the immediate neighborhood of which it must have been, perhaps on the ridge of Olivet. The tabernacle seems to have been here in the time of Saul, who, for the alleged favor shown by the high-priest Ahimelech to David, destroyed the city, which was, however, afterward rebuilt, 1 Sam. xxi. 1; xxii. 9-19.

NOBAH, the later name of the town Kenath, Jud. viii. 11.

NOBILI (nob'i-le), PADRE ROBERTO DE, a Tuscan missionary of the Order of Jesus, was born in 1577. He was considered by his religious brethren only second to St. Francis Xavier in his zeal and achievements for the conversion of the infidels. He was also a very learned Orientalist and conversant with all Indian idioms. The Ezouwedan, a modern imitation of the Vedas, is ascribed to him. He died in 1656.

NOBLEMAN (no'b'l-man). The word so rendered in John iv. 46 has somewhat various significations. It may mean: 1. Descended from a king. 2. One belonging to the court. 3. A soldier of the king, in which latter sense it often occurs in Josephus. The second signification seems, however, to be the prevalent one, and the Greek interpreters are also favorably inclined toward it. This person was probably of the court of Herod Antipas, who reigned over Galilee and Peræa.

NOEL (no'el), SILAS MERCER, D.D., was born in Essex county, Virginia, in 1783. He was educated in his native State, part of the time under a Scotch teacher who held skeptical principles, and from whom he received impressions which remained with him for a considerable time. He began to read works on medicine, but ere long he turned to the study of the law, was called to the bar, and he soon commanded a good practice. In 1806 he settled as a lawyer in Kentucky, living in Louisville, which he left for the sake of his health. In 1811 his mind received a decidedly religious impression, and he offered himself for baptism to the Baptist church at the Forks of Elkhorn, in Franklin county, and was received. In 1813 he was ordained as pastor of the church at Big Spring, Woodford county, whence he removed to Frankfort, the capital of the State. In 1833 he was induced to settle in Lexington. For several years he had derived much of his support from a salary which he received for acting as judge in the fourth district, in which he resided, but he relinquished this in 1818, and gave himself exclusively to the duties of the ministry. In 1822 Transylvania University conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity. He was earnest, faithful and successful as a pastor, and he gave himself sedulously to the advancement of every good work, and in May, 1839, he was called to the rest which he had long anticipated, as he had been suffering under growing infirmities, which intimated that his season of work was drawing near a close.

NOETUS (no-ä'tus), the founder of the sect of Noetians, flourished during the third century, and was a native of Ephesus, in Asia. Augustin ascribes to him the notion "that Christ was also the Father himself and the Holy Ghost." The sum of his heresy is this: that there is one God and Father, the Creator of all things, not appearing when he thinks fit, appearing when he pleaseth; and that the same is invisible and visible, begotten and unbegotten; unbegotten from the beginning, begotten when he pleased to be born of a virgin; impassible and immortal, and again passible and mortal.

NOGAH (no'gah), a son of David, born at Jerusalem, 1 Chr. iii. 7. He is not mentioned in the list of David's children in 2 Sam. v. 14-16.

NOHAH (no'hah), a Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 2.

NOLLEY (no'l'le), RICHMOND, was born in Virginia, in 1785. His parents removed to Georgia, where they shortly died, leaving him an orphan. A kind friend, Captain Lucas, took him under his care, educated him and gave him a place in his office. He was converted at a camp-meeting in the year 1806, and next year he was admitted to the traveling connection. In 1809 he was stationed at Wilmington, North Carolina, where he labored with great efficiency, and in the following year he was removed to Charleston, South Carolina. In 1812 he was sent to Louisiana. Here he labored with unwonted zeal, displaying a remarkable capacity for dealing with rough characters, meeting unexpected emergencies and succeeding where other men would have failed. He was lost in crossing a stream which he attempted to pass when engaged in traveling in the Attakapas circuit in Louisiana—a region in which, amid swamps, swollen rivers and scenes of desolation which few men could have lived in, he had cheerfully attempted to evangelize. Thus, in 1815, at thirty years of age, he passed from his labors to the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

NON, 1 Chr. vii. 27. See NUN.

NONCONFORMISTS (non'con-form'ists), a general term under which all the different persons were included who did not conform to the Church of England. Properly, it referred to the large body of the clergy and their followers who refused to subscribe to the Act of Uniformity, and were consequently ejected in 1662 from the Church. Two thousand persons resigned their livings rather than conform, and they had to endure many sore trials afterward, as a "Conventicle Act" forbade more than five persons besides the family to assemble in any house for religious worship, and the

NON-JURORS (non-ju'rorz). This name was given to that portion of the English clergy who held that they were bound by the oath of allegiance to James II., and consequently they could not recognize the validity of the title of William and Mary. Eight bishops, together with Sancroft the Primate and about four hundred of the clergy, were accordingly excluded from their benefices. The bishops thus deprived were Ken, of Bath and Wells; Turner, of Ely; Frampton, of Gloucester; Lloyd, of Norwich; White, of Peterborough; Thomas, of Worcester; Lake, of Chichester; and Cartwright, of Chester. They continued to minister privately among their adherents, and they consecrated bishops and ordained ministers. The party gradually declined, and it was supposed that Dr. Gordon was the last non-juring bishop. He died in 1779, leaving a few presbyters behind him. The Scottish Episcopal Church was considered to be non-juring until the death of Prince Charles Stuart, in 1788, when a resolution was adopted to recognize and pray for the reigning family.

NON-RESISTANCE, THE DOCTRINE OF, is that which inculcated the unlawfulness, on religious grounds, of resistance by force to the commands of a prince or magistrate. In England it was understood to mean unqualified obedience to any and all commands of the prince or supreme magistrates, whether lawful or not; and thus the doctrines of divine right and passive obedience were combined. These views were sanctioned in 1622 by the university of Oxford. After the civil wars men's minds were led to consider these questions more intelligently. The celebrated "Essay on Civil Government" by Locke did much to lead men to clearer views, but in 1683 the university again endorsed these views. The Revolution of 1688-89 produced a decided change in the nation;

and it is believed that few in Great Britain, and perhaps none in these United States, hold that conscience is bound to submit to the orders of magistrates when they evidently violate known law.

NOON. The Hebrew word which is translated "noon," Gen. xliii. 16, 25, is a dual form; it signifies, therefore, double light—i. e., the strongest brightness. It is metaphorically used for great prosperity or happiness, Job xi. 17. The phrase, "Let us go up at noon," Jer. vi. 4, probably means unexpectedly; an attack would be rarely made in the heat of the day.

NOPHAH (no'fah), a Moabite town, Num. xxi. 30.

NORBERT (nor'bert), the name of two persons eminent in the Roman Catholic Church:

1. A saint in the Roman calendar, and founder of the Premontre order of Augustinian monks, was descended from some of the most illustrious families of Germany, and was born at Santen, in the duchy of Cleves, in 1082. He was educated in the palace of the archbishop of Cologne; and having made choice of the ecclesiastical life, he received deacon's and priest's orders in the same day, and was made canon of his native place. The bishop of Laon, in Picardy, bestowed upon him a sequestered dale named Premontre, to which he retired in 1120, and there founded an institution of canons-regular, which took its title from the name of the secluded spot. Hither he attracted vast crowds by the popularity of his sermons, and gained many disciples. Soon after, he founded eight other monasteries, which adopted his discipline. He died at Magdeburg in 1134. Gregory XIII. placed him in the catalogue of saints in 1584.

2. A French Capuchin friar, famous for his adventures and his hostility to the Jesuits, was born at Bar-le-Duc, in 1697. He embraced the monastic life at the abbey of Saint Michael, in 1716. In 1736 he went to Pondicherry, in the East Indies, where he quarreled with the Jesuits; upon which he removed from the East Indies to this country. In 1744 he returned to Rome and employed himself in drawing up an account of the religious rites of the Malabar Christians. To escape from the hostility of the Jesuits, which he had provoked by his strictures upon the proceedings of their missionaries, he retired to Venice, whence he went to Holland, and from that country to England, where he established, near London, two manufactories of tapestry. Afterward he went to Prussia, and thence to Brunswick, where he received, in 1759, a brief from the pope, which permitted him to assume the habit of a secular priest. He then went to France, and thence to Portugal, where the quarrel with the Jesuits and their hatred of him recommended him to the court. Having completed in this asylum his great work against the Jesuits, he revisited France, where he committed it to the press. Afterward he re-entered the order of Capuchins at Commercy. He died in 1770.

NORFOLK (nor'fok), an illustrious English family descended from the Plantagenets. Those who were specially distinguished in ecclesiastical matters were—

1. ROGER BIGOD, who was head of the embassy of the king and the barons to the Council of Lyons in 1245 to make formal complaint of the unjustifiable claims and intolerable exactions of the pope, Innocent IV., in England. He also took part in the armed Parliament of 1157-8 to compel Henry III. to confirm the Great Charter and redress the grievances of the nation, but he subsequently went over to the king's side. He died in 1270.

2. THOMAS HOWARD, was born in 1473. He was one of the few witnesses present at the marriage of Anne Boleyn, who was his niece, to Henry VIII. But he was a steady opponent of the Reformation, and looked on as the head of the Romish party. He presided at the trial of Anne Boleyn, and pronounced the sentence of death on her. The merciless law called the Act of the Six Articles was promoted by the influence of the duke of Norfolk, who also urged the king on in the path of persecution. He was again employed in Scotland and in France, and then, becoming an object of the king's suspicion, he was suddenly arrested and committed to the Tower, December, 1546. The duke was sentenced to death, but the king died at the very time, and he was left in prison till the accession of Queen Mary, who restored him to his dignities and estates. He died at Kenninghall, in Norfolk, July 18, 1554.

NORIS (nor'is), ENRICO, a learned prelate of the Romish Church, was born at Verona, in 1631. He entered the Augustinian order, and devoted himself wholly to study and piety. The Jesuits accused him of Jansenism, but he was protected against their attacks by the grand duke of Tuscany, who appointed him professor at Pisa, by Queen Christina of Sweden, and by Pope Innocent XII., who made him cardinal in 1695. He left, besides a number of historical and archæological dissertations, a valuable history of the controversy against Pelagius. He died at Rome in 1704.

NORMAN (nor'man) ARCHITECTURE, or the Anglo-Norman style, was first used about the time of the Norman conquest of England, for the specimens which exist of the time of Edward the Confessor, or earlier, are so very rude that they can scarcely be called Norman. In the early stages this style was plain and massive, with few mouldings, and those principally confined to small features, such as the string, impost, abacus and base, the arches being plain or formed with a succession of square angles, and the capitals of the pillars were generally devoid of ornament. Sculpture was rarely used before the twelfth century, but earlier buildings, when repaired, were often ornamented. As the style advanced, greater lightness and enrichment were introduced, and many of the later specimens exhibit a profusion of ornaments. A very common mode of decorating buildings in this style was with rows of small shallow niches or panels which were often formed of intersecting arches, and some of them were frequently pierced to form windows. The doorways were often deeply recessed, and they had small shafts in the jambs which, when first introduced, were cut on the same stones with the other parts of the work and built up in courses, but later in the style they were set in as separate columns, like the early English. The windows were not usually of large size, and in general appearance they resembled small round-headed doors. They had no mullions or perpendicular shafts dividing the windows into two or more lights. Sometimes they were placed in pairs when much light was required, and often they were surmounted by an arch. In this style the pillars were heavy and often exceedingly massive, and sometimes they were channeled or moulded in zigzag or spiral lines, as in Durham Cathedral. The buttresses were commonly broad and of small projection from the wall, often uniting with the face of the parapet or terminating just below the cornice. When ornament was introduced into the style, small shafts were frequently worked on the angles of the buttresses.

Spires and pinnacles were not in early use, but at a late date turrets with conical tops, as at the west end of Rochester Cathedral, were used. In Normandy, several small church towers had steep pyramidal roofs of stone. It was not till toward the end of the Norman style that groining on a large scale was practiced; and when introduced, the vaults of churches were groined without bosses or diagonal ribs; and many of the old Norman churches, even of large size, had horizontal ceilings or plain cylindrical vaults, as at the chapel in the White Tower of London.

A marked feature of Norman architecture was the round arch of the window-head, and the round arch from the head of one column to the head of another. Doorways, windows and arches, whether in cathedrals or churches, are known to belong to this style by the round or semicircular arch, no matter how much ornamented the arch may be. This peculiarity distinguishes the Norman from the Early English, the style which succeeded it, with its sharp-pointed lancet arch, the Decorated still later, and the Perpendicular later still, in all of which the arch is pointed, though the tracery and filling in of the heads of the windows differ in these later styles.

When the Norman style began to give place, in the latter part of the twelfth century, to the Early English, the pointed arch was introduced; but in this transition period the ornaments and many of the members were still of pure Norman character. It only remains that reference may be made to a few edifices which serve as specimens of this style, at the date of their erection: William the Conqueror, A. D. 1066-1087—the dormitory of Canterbury Cathedral; Rochester Cathedral, tower on north side; London, the keep in the Tower. William II., 1087-1100—the transepts of Ely Cathedral, Durham Cathedral, Norwich Cathedral, part of Carlisle Cathedral, the transepts of Winchester Cathedral and Colchester Castle. Henry I., 1100-1135—the choir of Peterborough Cathedral, the nave of Durham Cathedral, of Norwich and of Rochester. Stephen, 1135-1154—the choir of St. Cross, Hampshire, the nave of Hereford Cathedral, the doorway of Kenilworth Priory Church. Henry II., 1154-1189—the period of transition into the Early English, the nave and transepts of Peterborough Cathedral, the nave of Ely Cathedral, the Galilee of Durham, the Temple Church in London and the choir of Canterbury, as rebuilt by William of Sens, 1175-1184.

The reader of this Encyclopedia will find examples of Norman work by referring to the illustrations on pages 27, 128, 138, 139, 140 (141 TRANSITION), 180, 181, 183, 356, 379, 446, 607, 621, 817, 844, 845, 935, 1060, 1061, and elsewhere throughout this work. These specimens will enable any intelligent person to understand all the peculiarities of this style.

NORRIS (nor'ris), JOHN, an eminent Mystic divine and Platonist, was born in 1657, at Collingbourne Kingston, in Wiltshire, England, and was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and became rector of Bemerton, near Salisbury, where he died in 1711. He ranks as one of the most eminent of the English Platonists, and was a good man, though a visionary. Among his works are—"The Theory and Regulation of Love," "Reflections upon the Conduct of Human Life."

NORTH. A Hebrew, when speaking with reference to the points of the compass, was considered as having his face to the east; the north consequently was on the left, and thus "the left hand" designates the north, Gen. xiv. 15. The north also was considered higher than the south, hence those traveling from north to south went down, Gen. xii. 10, while those who traveled from south to north went up, Gen. xlv. 25. The lands of the north denote Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, etc., Jer. i. 14; Ezek. xxvi. 7—not that they were precisely to the north of Palestine, but that the course in proceeding from those countries would be from north to south in order to enter Judæa, instead of taking the straight direction across deserts.

century, when the most beautiful of all the forms of ecclesiastical architecture had begun to prevail. He found that the choir of the cathedral, as finished by Bishop Hotham, extended only three arches, and terminated by a circular apse; and in 1235 he removed the apse, added six splendid arches to the choir, thus lengthening it and finishing it as it now stands, leaving as his memorial one of the most perfect choirs to be found either

NORTH SIDE. In the English Prayer-Book a rubric requires the officiating minister to stand at the "north side" of the table in the early part of the communion service. In the United States, where all churches are not placed due east and west, the minister stands at the side which would be the north if the church were so placed.

in England or elsewhere. Northwold was engaged for seventeen years on his work, and the perfection of the style, which is in the purest form of Early English, is unsurpassed. The work was completed and dedicated in 1252.

NORTON (nor'tun), JOHN, was born in 1606, at Storford, in Hertfordshire, England, and was educated at Peterhouse College, Cambridge. A vigorous but unsuccessful effort was made to convert him to Popery. He displayed very brilliant powers at the university, and he was urged to accept a fellowship, and his uncle offered to present him to a Church benefice; but he declined both, and in 1634 he resolved to leave England for New England. The vessel in which he sailed from Yarmouth was driven back; but in October, 1635, he reached Plymouth harbor, and here he preached during the winter. In 1636 he removed to Boston, where he attracted great notice, especially in a discussion with a French friar. In 1638 he consented to settle at Ipswich, where he was joined by several families that emigrated from England. His learning was recognized by his brethren on two important occasions—one touching doctrine, when he aided in showing the errors of the Antinomians, and the other in answering questions on Church government which had been sent from Holland to ministers in England, and which they referred to their brethren in New England. The work which he prepared on the subject was in Latin, and it was the first Latin treatise ever written in this country. In 1645 he took a leading part in the synod which met at Cambridge to draw and curb various animals, as buffaloes and camels, Ezek. xxix. 4. Hence we find a metaphorical expression used to signify the subduing of an enemy, Isa. xxxvii. 29.

NOSE-JEWELS, literally "rings of the nose," are mentioned by the prophet Isaiah, ch. iii. 21, among the female ornaments which were esteemed marks of pride and luxury by the daughters of Judah, to be visited by the judgment of Heaven. They were essentially the same with those used for the ear.

NOTRE DAME (no'ter dahm) is the title of the most important of the great ecclesiastical edifices of Paris, in France. (See engravings on pages 150 and 151.) The words signify "Our Lady," and intimate that the church is dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Paris is celebrated for its churches, among the most prominent being St. Germain l'Auxerrois, St. Eustache, St. Roch, the Madelein, St. Vincent de Paul, St. Jean Baptiste, St. Sulpice, but over and beyond them all in the elements of dignity up the celebrated Platform of Church Discipline, and in 1652 he obeyed a request to prepare a work on "The Sufferings of Christ," in opposition to prevailing errors. John Cotton, when on his deathbed, pointed to him as a worthy successor to his pulpit; and so ardent were the desires of the people of Ipswich and of Boston to secure his services that he was on the point of returning to England to free himself from the difficulty in which he was placed, when a council determined that he should settle in Boston. He was sent to England along with Governor Bradstreet on the affairs of the colony, and there he died of apoplexy, in April, 1663. He was a fine scholar, an acute theologian, a laborious pastor and a voluminous author. In addition to the works published in his lifetime, he left behind him a "Body of Divinity" and other uncompleted writings, which are now preserved in the archives of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

NOSE. The Hebrews generally placed anger in the nose because of the hard breathing of an angry person, 2 Sam. xxii. 9. The idea is used as applied both to men and to the Deity. Further, hooks or rings were placed in the nostrils to secure and commanding appearance stands Notre Dame, which occupies a part of the Cité island of the river Seine. It was commenced in the twelfth and completed in the fourteenth century, and it takes rank with the great European cathedrals of the first class. Its dimensions are on a grand scale. It extends four hundred and sixteen feet in length, and at the transept it is one hundred and fifty-three feet wide. Like all French cathedrals, it is lofty, as the vaulting rises one hundred and nine feet from the floor. The western front is very imposing, stretching one hundred and thirty-six feet, and terminated by two imposing massive towers, which rise two hundred and seventeen feet, while the new spire rises to the altitude of two hundred and ninety-eight feet. The interior observes the usual cathedral form. It consists of a nave and choir, with four aisles and side chapels. The pillars of the nave support pointed arches, resting on decorated capitals. There are three magnificent rose windows, and they contain all the remains of the splendid stained glass which is coeval with the foundation of the cathedral. It is placed in an unfavorable position, and the exterior is disappointing in consequence of the manner in which at different times it has been changed and

The storm of the Revolution marred it greatly, and it was then turned into a "Temple of Reason." So far as architectural style is concerned, the most attractive part of the great edifice is decidedly the west façade, with its three deeply recessed entrances. The rose window is thirty-six feet in diameter, and the sculpture is good and abundant. It is intended to portray the last judgment.

There are several other churches in France and elsewhere which are called Notre Dame, as Notre Dame de Lorrette in Paris, Notre Dame de Bon Secours and Notre Dame de Toutes Joies in Nantes, Notre Dame at Chalons (page 726), Notre Dame, the great cathedral, in Chartres (pages 152 and 153), Notre Dame du Port at Clermont, a splendid specimen at Poitiers called Notre Dame la Grande; and very generally the title is applied to great ecclesiastical edifices which were dedicated to the Virgin Mary.

NOTT, ELIPHALET, LL.D., was born in 1773. He was brother to Samuel Nott, D.D., and like him he was a man of great worth and eminence. He was licensed to preach in 1795, and settled at Cherry Valley, where he ministered to the church, and presided over an academy. From 1798 to 1804 he was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Albany, and in 1804 he was made president of Union College. In 1854 the semi-centennial anniversary of his presidency was held, and above six hundred persons who had graduated under him assembled to do him honor. He died at Schenectady, in January, 1866.

NOTT, SAMUEL, D.D., was born in 1754, at Saybrook. In early life he had to encounter great difficulty, and after severe toil he accumulated so much as enabled him to advance himself in scholarship; and to increase his knowledge he began to act as a teacher. In 1776 he succeeded in entering Yale College, where he supported himself by ringing the bell and acting as a waiter at commons. The struggle of the Revolution told on him severely, and again he had recourse to teaching; but eventually he procured license to preach, and in 1781 he was invited to Norwich as a candidate, and he was ordained there in 1782. Dr. Sprague says: "In 1842 he preached his sixtieth year sermon, at which time there was not an individual living who was a legal voter at the time of his settlement in the parish." He continued preaching until 1849, in which year a colleague was associated with him in his charge. In 1852 he suffered so severely from an accident in which his dressing-gown was burned that he died. His publications were sermons preached on important occasions, which were published from year to year. Dr. Nott was one of those examples which testify to the value of long pastorates. He was a man of indomitable energy, as he not only educated himself, but by his tender affection and great labor he succeeded in educating his brother, Eliphalet Nott, D.D., who became president of Union College.

NOVATIAN (no-va'sh'an, or NOVATIANUS (no-va-she-a'nus), called also NOVATUS (no-va'tus), a celebrated heresiarch of the third century, founder of the sect named after him. He adopted the doctrine taught by the presbyter Novatus, that it was sinful to admit persons who had once lapsed to idolatry to communion—a practice then universal in the Church. This produced a schism, in which Novatian had many partisans. He adopted a practice which was calculated to advance his cause by calling his followers "Cathari," or Puritans, because of their strictness. In 251 Novatian got himself elected bishop of Rome, in opposition to Cornelius, and he was ordained by some country bishops, but his election was soon annulled. His sect, after the Council of Nice, fell into disrepute in the Western empire, though it continued to prevail for a much longer period in the East. He must be distinguished from Novatus of Carthage. (See the next article.) He has been called the first antipope in consequence of the dispute which prevailed between him and his followers on the one side, and Cornelius and his supporters on the other side, being terminated in favor of Cornelius. He had become a presbyter of the Roman Church, in which he acquired fame by his uncommon learning and eloquence. A vacancy having occurred in the bishopric of Rome upon the death of Fabianus, which, owing to great dissensions, continued fourteen years, eventually a successor was chosen with the approbation of a great majority of the clergy and people of that Church. Several of the clergy and of the people dissenting, they chose Novatus bishop. After their ordinations, both Novatus and his rival sent letters and deputies to foreign bishops and churches, notifying their election, and Novatus found many supporters in various places. As, however, his rival was approved of as the legitimate possessor of the Roman see, Novatus is esteemed the first antipope. The council at Rome which condemned Novatus and his doctrines also degraded the bishops who had assisted at his ordination. With respect to the time and manner of his death, nothing can be affirmed with certainty.

NOVATUS (no-va'tus), a presbyter of the Church of Carthage in the third century. Saint Cyprian accuses him of perfidy, adulation, arrogance, extreme covetousness, and of pillaging the funds of the Church, as well as of pillaging the widows and orphans. He maintained, in opposition to Cyprian, that such persons as fell from the faith through the fear of persecution ought to be restored to Church communion, without undergoing the long course of penitential discipline enjoined by the ecclesiastical canons. Upon the return of Cyprian to Carthage, whence he had fled on the breaking out of the Decian persecution, he procured the excommunication of Novatus and his adherents; but they, despising the sentence, formed a new sect.

NOVICE (nov'is), a newly-converted person. Such a one was not to be ordained to the ministry, 1 Tim. iii. 6. The precept is reasonable, and might well apply to all the churches which St. Paul had planted, the Epistle in which it occurs not being of very early date.

NOVICE, a person who is admitted into a religious community for the purpose of preparing to become a member, and the state of preparation is termed the "novitiate." Before it closes the novice may change his purpose and retire from the establishment.

was born in the parish of Whalley, Lancashire, in 1507, and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he resided for thirteen years. He was licensed as a preacher in 1550. In 1551 he held an interesting conference with Redmayne, master of Trinity College, Cambridge, then on his deathbed, respecting the principal articles which separated the English from the Romish Church. In that year, also, he succeeded Redmayne as one of the prebendaries of Westminster. In 1553 he found it necessary to join his countrymen who were exiles in Germany from the popish persecution of Queen Mary's reign. On the accession of Elizabeth, Nowell returned to England, and was appointed one of the commissioners for visiting the various dioceses, in order to introduce such regulations as might establish the Reformation. In 1560 he was made dean of St. Paul's, and collated to the prebend of Willand, in the same church. When the memorable convocation in which the Articles of Religion were revised and subscribed met, in 1563, Nowell was appointed prolocutor of the lower house, and he took a conspicuous part in the discussions of that body. In 1572 he completed the endowment at one and the same time of a free school at Middleton, in Lancashire, and of thirteen scholarships in Brasenose College; and in the following year he was elected principal of that institution. He died February 13, 1602.

who was born in 1798, at Newburyport, became a tutor in Harvard University. He was licensed to preach in 1822, and became pastor at Brookfield, Massachusetts, whence he removed to Petersham. In 1840 he was made Hancock professor of Hebrew and Oriental languages, and also Dexter lecturer in Biblical literature, in Harvard University, which offices he held until 1868. He was a voluminous writer, producing translations of the book of Job, the Psalms, the Prophets, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Canticles. He wrote frequently for theological journals, and he prepared an excellent Hebrew Reader, which is justly esteemed. He died at Cambridge, in 1868, greatly regretted.

NOYES, JAMES, was born at Chaldington, Wiltshire, England, in 1608. He was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. Under the ministry of his cousin Mr. Parker and the celebrated Dr. Twisse he was brought to the knowledge of the truth; and thinking himself unable to enter the Established Church, he emigrated and came, with Mr. Parker and a younger brother, Nicholas Noyes, to New England. He differed in many points from his brethren, inasmuch as he would have admitted a moderate episcopacy. He held that a profession of faith and repentance, with submission to Church ordinances, was sufficient to admit to Church-fellowship, and that the children of baptized persons might be baptized without any covenant on the part of the parents; and he believed that the Sabbath began on Saturday evening. He died in 1656, having been minister of Newbury for more than twenty years.

NUBIA (nu'be-ah) is the name given, in a more or less restricted sense, to the countries on and around the valley of the Nile south of Egypt as far as Abyssinia, and the hilly regions which are occupied by the dark-skinned descendants of the early settlers of Africa. The name, as now used, is not to be found in ancient geography. The Ethiopia of Greek and Roman writers began immediately above Egypt, and the Nubæ, or Nobatæ, of Strabo and Ptolemy were evidently the natives of Kordofin. The name appears to have originated in Egypt, where the word nûb, or nôb, which signifies gold, was applied to those countries whence the precious metal was derived. The Romans, under Diocletian, deserted this part of Africa, and in the sixth century Christianity spread through the population. In the next century the Arab conquerors of Egypt found a nation on the Nile to the south of Egypt called Nubah, and the modern form of the name has been extended, without regard to race or government, to all the states on the river which have any form of

NUMBERS, BOOK OF. See PENTATEUCH.

NUMENIUS (nu-me'ne-us), 1 Macc. xii. 16, 17, a person sent on embassy in the Maccabæan times to Rome and Sparta.

NUN, an Ephraimite, the son of Elishama, prince of Ephraim in the wilderness, and father of Joshua, Ex. xxxiii. 11. He is also called Non, 1 Chr. vii. 27.

NUNC DIMITTIS (nunk de-mit'tis), two Latin words in the Latin form of the Song of Simeon, Luke ii. 29, which in the English Prayer-Book is appointed a part of the evening service. In its stead the American service-book designates a part of the one hundred and third Psalm.

NUNCIO (nun'se-o), the title given to an envoy sent by the pope to any sovereign to settle ecclesiastical affairs. Previous to the Council of Trent, nuncios acted as judges in matters which came under their jurisdiction, but since then questions come before them only on appeal from the decision of bishops in all places which recognize the decretals of the Council of Trent.

NUNS, female devotees who, like monks, devote themselves to a life of seclusion or residence in a community. They make a vow of chastity and bind themselves to observe the rules of their order.

NUNCUPATIVE (nun-ku'pa-tiv) WILL, an oral or word of mouth testament declared before witnesses by a dying person and afterward reduced to writing. In Great Britain such wills are declared to be illegal except in the case of soldiers in actual service and mariners at sea.

NUREMBERG (nu'rem-berg), DIET OF. In 1523 the first diet of Nuremberg was held, where the nuncio of Adrian VI. demanded the execution of the bull of Leo X. and the edict of Charles V. against Luther. Instead of yielding to the nuncio, a list of grievances was drawn, in which one hundred points were set forth on which reform was demanded, and the authority of the pope on several points was assailed. The second diet of Nuremberg was held in 1524, and it was decreed that, with the consent of the emperor, the pope should convene a council in Germany, and to prepare for it an assembly should first be held at Spire. This, Charles emphatically prohibited, and enjoined that the edict of Worms should be strictly observed.

NURSE. The Hebrew term for this is used both in the masculine and feminine, and denotes any one who sustains and nourishes another. Moses applied it to himself in relation to Israel, though only to express his inability to fulfill what it required, or his sense of oppression under the responsibility involved in it, Num. xi. 12. But more commonly it is applied to women, and much, apparently, in the same manner, and with the same regard, that is usual among ourselves. The nurse, especially in patriarchal times, appears to have been treated with great kindness and respect, Gen. xxiv. 59.

NUT. The "nuts" of Gen. xliii. 11 are Pistachio nuts. The Pistachio tree is frequently found in Palestine and Syria. It thrives best in a dry and rocky soil, but it is of slow growth. It attains a height of twelve to twenty, sometimes thirty, feet. The stem is not thick, but the branches are numerous and much divided. It is in full bloom in April, and the blossoms are whitish and in clusters. The shell of the nut is odoriferous. These nuts are a favorite fruit in the East; they have a spicy taste, and are eaten either dry or preserved. It has been imagined that the kernel strengthened the stomach, and was a specific against the bite of serpents. In India the seeds are eaten with sweetmeats or fried with pepper and salt. Another word is translated "nuts" in Song Sol. vi. 11. Possibly walnuts may be there intended.

NYE (ni), PHILIP, an eminent English non-conformist divine of the Commonwealth, was born in Sussex, about 1596. He graduated at Oxford, entered the Church, and after officiating three years in a London parish, he had to flee into Holland to escape persecution. Returning in 1640, he was presented to the living of Kimbolton, in Huntingdonshire. He actively promoted the taking of the Solemn League and Covenant, sat in the Assembly of Divines and officiated in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on occasion of the taking of the covenant by the two houses of Parliament and the Assembly. For his services he was presented to the rectory of Acton, near London. Nye took part in various other political affairs, was named one of the "tryers" for examining ministers, and was one of the leaders in the assembly of Congregational churches at the Savoy, in 1658. Deprived of his living after the Restoration, he spent the rest of his life in retirement. He was the author of numerous works, mostly of temporary interest. He died at London, in 1672.

NYMPHAS (nim'fas), a Christian, it would seem at Laodicea, who had a church in his house, and whom St. Paul saluted, Col. iv. 15.

NYMPHS, female beings in Grecian mythology partaking of the nature of gods and men. They peopled all the regions of the earth and water, and were called after the places of their abode. Thus, the Naiades lived in the streams, the Oreiades the mountains, the Hamadryades the trees, and the Dryades the woods, to each of which they were confined. They lived and died in them. They were very beautiful, and they attended the higher divinities, especially Diana, and they were also the muses of many of the gods, as Jupiter and Pan.

Christianity, including Nubia proper, or the valley of the Nile; the ancient Meroe, which may be considered as extending along the Nile from Dongola to the confluence of the Blue and White rivers; and Sennaar, which lies still farther south. Nubia is celebrated for the numerous and extensive remains which indicate the ancient civilization of the country. They are chiefly north of Dongola, and many of these are displayed in this work. The inhabitants, who are called Berâber, or Berbers, in Egypt, are a handsome people, of dark brown complexion, cheerful, bold, frank and free from the corruption of the tribes that lie to the north and the south of their country.

NUMBER (num'ber). In expressing numbers the Hebrews used, at all events in later times, the letters of the alphabet. Hence the facility of errors of transcription, different letters having a near resemblance. Certain numbers frequently occur as indicating perfection. See SEVEN. Multiples of these are also used, in the way in which we use "round numbers." Thus, in enumerations we often find only multiples of ten or a hundred.

OAK, a well-known tree of which there are a vast number of species. The oak is frequently mentioned in Scripture, but it is not easy to decide which species in the various places is meant. There are several Hebrew words used, el, elah, elon, ilah, allah, allon, all implying the idea of strength. In our version the meanings "oak," "teal tree," Isa. vi. 13, "elm," Hos. iv. 13, are given, and one of the words, elon, is constantly but incorrectly ren-

He yielded to the request, and in 1675 was placed at the head of the college. In 1680 he was induced to devote himself exclusively to the affairs of the college, and he was formally inducted as president. By his contemporaries he was esteemed as a man of undoubted piety and of wide erudition. In Latin he especially excelled, and his literary remains justify this estimate of his attainments. He died in 1681.

OATES (ôts), TITUS, the contriver of the popish plot, born about 1619, was the son of an Anabaptist preacher, received his education at Cambridge, and afterward entered into holy orders. In 1677 he pretended to be a convert to the Roman Catholic religion, but subsequently declared himself a Protestant, and gave information of a pretended popish plot for the overthrow of the Protestant faith, falsely accused several Catholic lords and other persons of quality of being concerned in it, and having excited a popular ferment, brought several innocent men to the scaffold. On the accession of James II. he was thrown into prison and indicted for perjury, and being convicted, was sentenced to stand in the pillory five times a year during his life, and to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate, and thence to Tyburn. Though the whipping was very severely inflicted, he recovered from its effects; and in the reign of William III. this execrable tool of faction obtained his liberty and a pension. He died in 1705.

OATH, a solemn appeal to the Deity or some superior being in token of the good faith of him who declares or promises anything. We find oaths taken in patriarchal times, Gen. xiv. 22, 23, regulated by the Mosaic law, forbidden when unnecessary in the New Testament, but used by God himself to seal his promise as most trustworthy, and thereby to end all disputation, Gen. xxii. 16-18; Heb. vi. 13-18.

Oaths were usual on occasion of contracts, covenants, agreements or stipulations, Gen. xxiv. 2, 8, 9; in making vows, Lev. v. 4; as confirming promises, 2 Ki. xxv. 24; and in denouncing imprecations, 1 Sam. xiv. 24, 26-28. These were voluntary; as also were those more common asseverations when God was called to witness the firm purpose of him that expressed it, Ruth i. 17. But sometimes oaths were exacted, as by a sovereign from his subjects, or by a superior from a vassal, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 13; akin to which were the oaths laid upon a people to obey the laws of God or of the land, Ezra x. 5. Of the same nature were judicial oaths, persons on trial being obliged to clear themselves by oath, Ex. xxii. 10, 11. Witnesses, too, were probably put on oath, Lev. v. 1.

Certain ceremonies were frequently used in taking an oath in order to increase the solemnity of it. Such were the lifting of the hand, Gen. xiv. 22; Rev. x. 5, 6, analogous to which was the laying of witnesses' hands on a criminal's head, Lev.

xxiv. 14, and the placing of the hand under the thigh of another who required the oath, Gen. xxiv. 2, 3, 9; the passing between the pieces of a divided victim, Jer. xxxiv. 18. Oaths, too, were sometimes taken before the sacred altar, 1 Ki. viii. 31.

Perjury and the non-fulfillment of an oath were regarded as great crimes. According to the law, he who had given false witness was to suffer the same penalties to which his injustice had exposed the man against whom he testified, Deut. xix. 16-21. Even if any one had sworn to his own detriment, he must perform his oath, Ps. xv. 4. This could not, however, be held to justify a sin. Herod was not excused by his rash oath for the Baptist's murder, Matt. xiv. 9.

We find in the New Testament prohibitions against swearing, Matt. v. 34-37; James v. 12. It cannot be supposed that it was intended by these to censure every kind of oath. For our Lord himself made solemn asseverations equivalent to an oath, and St. Paul repeatedly calls God to witness the truth of what he was saying. The intention was, to show that the proper state of Christians is to require no oaths; that, when evil is expelled from among them, every yea and nay will be as decisive as an oath, every promise as binding as a vow.

OATH EX-OFFICIO, an oath whereby any person may be obliged to make any presentment of any crime or offence, or to confess or accuse himself or herself of any criminal matter or thing whereby he or she may be liable to any censure, penalty or punishment.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE, an oath taken by public officers and ministers of the Church established in Great Britain, whereby they swear to be faithful and loyal to the reigning sovereign.

tered "plain"—e. g., Gen. xii. 6. It has been imagined that some of the terms designate the terebinth and others the oak, but then critics are not agreed which terms should describe the one and which the other. And it is very doubtful whether the terebinth is ever really referred to.

Dr. Thomson argues strongly for the oak. "The Hebrew writers," he says, "seem to use these names (elah and allon) indiscriminately for the same tree, or for different varieties of it (one probably deciduous, the second evergreen), and that was the oak. For example, the tree in which Absalom was caught . . . was the elah, not the allon, and yet I am persuaded it was an oak. . . . There are thousands of such trees still in the same country, admirably suited to catch long-haired rebels, but no terebinths. . . . I do not believe that Abraham's celebrated tree at Hebron was a terebinth, as many now affirm without qualification. It is now a very venerable oak, and I saw no terebinth in the neighborhood." Elsewhere the same writer remarks that the so-called Abraham's tree cannot be more than one thousand years old. He concludes, "Until we have more light on this particular matter, and more decisive, let us continue to read out bravely the good old word oak, and never fear the smile of over-wise critics."

OAK, COUNCIL OF THE, the title of a council of thirty-six bishops held near Chalcedon A. D. 403, at which the enemies of Chrysostom succeeded in deposing and banishing him. He was soon recalled, as the injustice of the procedure was recognized.

OAKES (òks), URIAN, was born in England, in 1631. He was educated at Harvard, and returned to his native land, where he settled as pastor of Titchfield, in Hampshire. In 1668 a messenger was sent to England in order to induce him to become pastor of the church at Cambridge.

ters of the Established Church in England, whereby they swear to bear true allegiance to the reigning sovereign, and in which they declare their belief that the pope of Rome has no supremacy in temporal and ecclesiastical affairs in England. By the Act of 10 G. 4, c. 7, s. 10, Roman Catholics are qualified for offices on taking a declaration which is substituted for former oaths.

OBADIAH (o-ba-di'ah), the name of several persons mentioned in Scripture, none of whom were of any importance except the prophet, who was the author of the shortest prophetic book in the canon. Of his personal history nothing is known. The date of his ministry was probably between the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, in the year 588 B. C., and the conquest of Idumæa by Nebuchadnezzar, which took place about five years afterward. At this time Edom was an independent nation, priding itself upon its mountain fastnesses and the wisdom for which it was proverbial.

The jealousy which had existed between Esau and Jacob was perpetuated among their posterity. The Edomites refused the Israelites a passage through their territory, Num. xx. 14-21. They also joined zealously in the great confederacies formed against David, until they were for a time completely subdued by him, 2 Sam. viii. 14. They were among the first to revolt in the latter days of Solomon; but though they made many attempts to regain their independence, they did not succeed till the time of Jehoram, 2 Chr. xxi. 10. From that period they were among the bitterest of Israel's enemies, and when the whole race of Jacob was humbled triumphing maliciously in its fall, Ps. cxxxvii. 7. So bitter and persevering was their hostility that they are often introduced by the prophets as representing the earthly powers that oppose God and his kingdom, Isa. xxxiv., lxiii.; Ezek. xxxv.

Such aggravated and obstinate wickedness could not pass unpunished, and Obadiah was commanded to announce to the Edomites their ruin, and to give as the reason for it not only their pride and presumptuous confidence in their own strength and wisdom, but chiefly their bitter enmity to the people of God.

But the chosen race themselves had just been carried into captivity, the Holy Land was deserted, and the chastisement denounced against the Edomites might therefore appear not to differ from that which had already been inflicted upon the seed of Jacob. The prophet, however, goes on to declare that Edom shall be as though it had never been and shall be swallowed up for ever, while Israel shall rise again from her present fall, shall repossess not only her own land, but also Philistia and Edom, and shall finally rejoice in the holy reign of the promised Messiah.

OBEDIA (ob-di'a), 1 Esd. v. 38, a corrupted form of Habaiah, Ezra ii. 61.

OBED (o'bed), son of Boaz and Ruth, and father of Jesse the father of David, according to the apparently incomplete genealogical list, Ruth iv. 17; 1 Chr. ii. 12. The name occurs in the genealogies of Matthew, Matt. i. 5, and Luke, Luke iii. 32. Other persons of this name are mentioned, 1 Chr. ii. 37, 38; xi. 47; xxvi. 7; 2 Chr. xxiii. 1.

OBED-EDOM, a Levite in whose premises and under whose care the ark was deposited when the death of Uzzah caused David to apprehend danger in taking it farther. It remained here three months, during which the family of Obed-edom so signally prospered that the king was encouraged to resume his first intention, which he then happily carried into effect, 2 Sam. vi. 10-12. The family of Obed-edom remained in the service of the temple, and are found as guardians of its treasures in the reign of Amaziah, 2 Chr. xxv. 24.

OBEDIENCE (o-be'd'ens), compliance with the requirements of law. Even inanimate things and irrational creatures may be said to pay obedience when they fulfil the purpose for which they were created, and are subservient to divine authority, Ps. cxlviii. 6-8; Matt. viii. 27; James iii. 3, 4. But this is not the moral obedience which reasonable beings are to render to those who have the just control of them. The pure angels do exactly God's commandments, Ps. ciii. 20; and men ought to show an equal obedience, as their paramount duty, to their Creator, 1 Sam. xv. 22. Our blessed Lord, having become man, paid obedience to the law of God which was laid on man. Christ's obedience was perfect; he entirely fulfilled his Father's commandments, becoming "obedient unto death," Phil. ii. 8, his death being, so to speak, the acme of his willing compliance and entire performance of the work given him to do. It is this, the fulfillment of the law in his life, which, together with the endurance of its penalty in his death, completes that work, for the virtue of which those who believe in him are saved, Rom. v. 12-19.

OBELISK (ob'e-lisk), the name of a lofty quadrangular, monolithic column, "diminishing upward, with the sides gently inclined, but not so as to terminate in an apex at the top." Egypt was the land of obelisks, and they are among the oldest of their monuments. No reliable information has been reached as to their original use; that they were raised in honor of the sun, that they were intended for sundials and for other uses, have all been asserted. Usually they were adorned with hieroglyphics, and inscriptions on them recorded matters of public import. The two largest were erected by Sesostris, in Heliopolis, measuring one hundred and eighty feet in height. Augustus removed them to Rome. The Lateran obelisk in Rome is one hundred and five feet high, and that in the piazza of St. Peter's is one hundred and thirty-two feet high. In 1833 the obelisk of Luxor was removed to Paris. (See engravings on pages 142 and 143). Another celebrated one, known as Cleopatra's Needle, is still standing, and, exclusive of the base, it is sixty-three feet high.

OBERLIN (ob'er-lin), JOHANN FRIEDRICH, an eminent Lutheran divine, was born at Strasburg, in 1740. In 1767 he succeeded to the pastorate of Ban de la Roche, in the north-east of France. He was known as a zealous clergyman and a warm advocate of education. He founded the first infant schools, and was the first correspondent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He also took a considerable interest in agriculture, and in 1818 received the gold medal from the Royal Agricultural Society of Paris. He died in 1826.

OBIL (o'bil), an Ishmaelite who had charge of David's camels, 1 Chr. xxvii. 30.

OBLATES (ob'lates), OBLATI (ob-la'te). In ecclesiastical language the term "oblate" signifies—1. A person who, on embracing the monastic state, has made a donation of all his goods to the community. 2. One dedicated to a religious order by his parents from an early period of his life. 3. A layman residing as an inmate in a regular community to which he had assigned his property, either in perpetuity or during the period of his residence. 4. A layman who had made donation, not only of his property, but of his person, as bondsman, to a monastic community. In France, the king anciently possessed the privilege of recommending as "oblats" a number of invalided soldiers to monasteries, where they were maintained.

The Oblates of Mary Immaculate is the name of missionary priests founded, in 1815, at Aix, by Mazenod, the bishop of Marseilles. St. Frances of Rome founded an order of female oblates, who are called "Collatines."

OBLATION (ob-la'shun). There is an ecclesiastical usage of the word which requires notice. 1. In the Romish Church the "greater oblation" is the offering to God the Father of the body and blood of our Lord in the mass. 2. The lesser oblation in Romish usage means the offering to God of the unconsecrated elements and of the alms at the eucharist. 3. Oblation of boys is their dedication by their parents to a monastery in order that their capacity for a monastic life may be tested. 4. Oblation, Prayer of, the prayer in the mass at the offering of the elements, and at the offering of the sacrifice, as it is called, to the eternal Father. See OFFERINGS.

OBLIGATION (ob-li-ga'shun), DAYS OF, the name given in Romish usage to those days on which the faithful are bound to attend mass. They are—all Sundays in the year, Christmas, the Circumcision, the Epiphany, the Ascension and All Saints' Day, and to these have been added the festivals of St. Peter and St. Paul, the Assumption and Corpus Christi day. Feasts of obligation are the feasts connected with these occasions.

OBOOKIAH (o-boo-ki'ah), HENRY, deserves a place in this work. He was born in 1792, in Hawaii, where he came under the influence of Christian teaching from the American missionaries. So much did he commend himself by his talents and piety to those who had him under their care that in 1809 he was brought to New Haven and educated for the ministry. He began the great work of rendering the Bible into his native dialect; but when he had finished the book of Genesis, his labors closed, at Cornwall, Connecticut, in the year 1818. A memoir of his life was published in the same year.

OBOOTH (o'both), one of the stations of the Israelites, to the east of Edom, not very far from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, Num. xxi. 10, 11.

OBSEQUIES (ob'se-kweez), the different ceremonies which are observed in different countries and ages at the interment of the dead.

OBSERVANTINES (ob-serv'ant-eenz). In France and Belgium this branch of the Franciscan order is called Recollets, in distinction from the Conventuals. They were founded in 1250, modified in 1316, and in 1414 by St. Bernardine of Siena. Their habit is a reddish-brown cassock of coarse cloth, a narrow hood, a girdle of cord, a short cloak and wooden shoes, from which they are called Sabotiers.

OCCAM, or OCKHAM (ok'am), WILIAM, an English philosopher of the order of the Franciscans, in the fourteenth century. He was a pupil of Duns Scotus, whose views, however, he opposed, and he became the head of the so-called Nominalists, denying that ideas had any existence than what they possess in the understanding by which they are contemplated. He held further that God is known by his attributes, wisdom, goodness, power, etc., for there can be no immediate perception of God. In Paris he taught theology, attaining the highest reputation as a scholar, for he was dignified by the title of the Invincible Doctor by the pope, while by others he was admirably called the Venerable Preceptor, the Singular Doctor, and even the Unparalleled

Doctor. When he rendered himself noted by opposing the assumption of temporal power by the papacy, and incurring the hostility of Boniface VIII. and John XXII., the latter of whom excommunicated him, he was protected by the king of France and by the emperor of Germany. He gave a decided blow to the power of the papacy, for he questioned the infallibility of the pope in judging even of doctrinal matters, and he was unwilling even to accept a general council as an ultimate court of appeal, while he very earnestly contended that the distinction between civil authority as vested in the hands of the civil magistrate, and spiritual things in the hands of spiritual officers, would keep them to their respective jurisdictions, and so rebuke the assumptions of the pope to rule over king and temporal magistrates. He was the only schoolman whom Luther studied or kept in his library. The greatest of his works is the "Summa totius Logice."

OCCIDENTALS (ok-se-den'talz), a name given to the Christian Church in Western nations to distinguish it from the Greek and other Eastern branches of Christianity.

OCCUM (ok'um), SAMPSON, who was ordained as an Indian preacher, was born at Mohegan, near Norwich, Connecticut, in 1723. In his youth Mr. Jewett, of New London, was accustomed to preach to his tribe, and in 1739 and 1740 several ministers labored at Mohegan with success. No sooner was his mind affected than he desired to become a teacher, and he began to learn to read. In the Indian school of Mr. Wheelock he made progress, and in 1766 Mr. Wheelock had him sent to England, where he attracted great notice and procured large donations, which enabled the Indian school to be removed to Hanover, New Hampshire, and to be connected with Dartmouth College. He began to preach among the Indians at Brotherton, near Utica, and he ministered very earnestly among the Indians of Connecticut, Long Island and Rhode Island, closing an earnest, active life in 1792, aged sixty-nine years. He left a sermon behind him which he had preached at New Haven, in 1772, at the execution of an Indian.

OCHINO (o-ke'no), BERNARDINO, a celebrated Italian Reformer, was born in 1487. His earnest devotion as a monk and extraordinary power as a preacher made him one of the most marked men of the Roman Church, and in 1538 he was elected general of his order. He had, however, already begun to doubt the purity of his creed in relation to Christian truth, and he undertook in his preaching to unfold doctrines which were akin to those of the Reformers. Persecution followed immediately. In 1541 he preached in Venice, and hardly escaped the interference of the Inquisition. He resolved, therefore, to go to Geneva. There he was hospitably received by Calvin, who expressed his gladness for such an acquisition to Melancthon. Ochino, however, had too much of the skeptical tendency in his mind to please the Reformers. The freedom of his opinions and his controversial asperity soon put him in opposition to the leaders of the Protestant churches in Switzerland and Germany. After having been successively pastor of the Italian exiles at Geneva and at Augsburg, he joined Peter Martyr at Strasburg, and went with him to England, where he resided as Italian pastor in London till the accession of Mary. He subsequently returned to Switzerland, and was appointed at Zurich minister of an Italian congregation of exiles from the Ticino. At this period of his life he adopted some of the views of the Socini, and gave offence by the publication of some dialogues in which he maintained the doctrine of polygamy. Beza, Bellinger and other leading Reformers rose against him. He was compelled to leave Zurich, took a temporary refuge in Poland, then in Moravia, where he ended his days in sorrow and in poverty, in 1565.

OCIDELUS (o-si-de'lus), 1 Esd. ix. 22, a strangely-corrupted form of Jozabad, Ezra x. 22.

OCINA (o-se'na), Judith ii. 28, probably Aecho.

OCRAN (ok'ran), the father of Pagiel, prince of Asher, Num. i. 13.

OCTAPLA (ok'ta-pla), the Septuagint arranged in eight columns by Origen in the third century, containing the Hebrew text and various Greek versions of it.

OCTATEUCH (ok'ta-teuk), the first eight books of the Old Testament. The word is derived from two Greek terms which signify eight bindings or eight rolls connected together.

OCTAVE (ok'tav), eight days after a feast, the eighth day being termed the octave day. All the great movable feasts of the Church have octaves, as also certain fixed ones.

ODED (o'ded). 1. The father of the prophet Azariah in Asa's reign, 2 Chr. xv. 1-8. 2. A prophet in Samaria in Pekah's reign, 2 Chr. xxviii. 9-11.

ODENATUS. See TADMOR and ZENOBIA.

ODIANS (o'de-anz), AUDIANS (au'de-anz). About the time of the Council of Nice, Audius (or Audæus) formed a sect. He was a reputation which the monastery of Clugny acquired by his discipline, doctrine and sanctity of manners rendered it the most celebrated in France, and induced the most exalted personages to cultivate the acquaintance of this abbot. He was the founder of the annual service of the Church of Rome in commemoration of the dead. He died in 1048.

ODIN (o'din), a Scandinavian deity who seems, like the Jupiter of the Greeks, to have formed the connecting link between the ancient and the more recent systems of their mythology. Odin appears to have been a conquering chieftain who led the Asi (the Goths) from the confines of Asia to Northern Europe. When deified by public adoration, the attributes of an earlier deity seem to have been transferred to him. Odin is the chief of the gods; by his wife Freya

he has two chief sons, Thor and Balder; and as the Scandinavian gods are not all immortal, the death of Balder has furnished many legends to the northern mythology. Among the Romans, Odin was regarded as a representative of the god Mercury.

ODO (o'do), the name of two noted prelates who are associated with the ecclesiastical history of England.

1. Archbishop of Canterbury in the tenth century, was the son of a Danish chieftain who took part in the invasion of England in 870. Converted to Christianity, he was adopted as son by an Anglo-Saxon noble, who had him well educated and induced him to enter the Church. Odo was made bishop of Ramsbury in 926, and was selected by Dunstan, then minister to King Edmund, to be archbishop of Canterbury, in 942. Odo made great improvements in the cathedral, and set himself to effect three measures of reform—the separation of the clergy from their wives, the expulsion of the secular clergy from the cathedrals and the introduction of the Benedictine rule into the monasteries. In carrying them out he showed himself the soldier and barbarian to the last. The climax of his cruelty was reached when, in 955, shortly after the coronation of Edwy, he divorced the young king and Elgiva, and had the queen forcibly carried off and branded in the face with hot irons. He died June, 958, and was buried at Canterbury.

2. Bishop of Bayeux and earl of Kent, was born in Normandy about 1032. He was the brother of William the Conqueror, and was named by him bishop of Bayeux in 1049. He took a very active part in the preparations for the expedition to England in 1066, blessed the troops on the morning of the battle of Hastings and took part in the battle. He was rewarded with a grant of the town of Dover, and on William's return to Normandy Odo was charged with the government of England, William Fitz-Osborn being associated with him. Odo amassed immense riches, and had a large share of power during the greater part of William's reign; but not satisfied with his almost royal power and wealth, and irritated by the appointment of Lanfranc to the see of Canterbury, he cherished the hope of getting by craft, money or power the papal chair. He had a palace built at Rome, sent his agents there with rich presents for bribes, and resolved to go himself, attended by several powerful barons. The king, however, heard of the project, and ordered the arrest of Odo. He was deprived of his dignities and estates, and kept a prisoner at Rouen till William's death, in 1087. Odo assisted at several councils, and in 1096 set out for the Holy Land, but died at Palermo early in the following year. The famous Bayeux tapestry was given to the cathedral by Odo.

ODOCEUS (o-do'se-us) is the name of an ancient bishop of Llandaff Cathedral who was celebrated in his day for his great sanctity. Dubritius, the first bishop, died A. D. 522, and his successor, Eliud, was famed for his piety. According to Usher, Odoceus followed Eliud, and was consecrated in A. D. 604. During his time several synods were held in Llandaff; and owing to the great esteem in which Odoceus was held, he was made president at least of one of these assemblies. The piety of these early bishops led to the bestowal on Llandaff of great amounts of property, which would have sufficed to endow many churches, but recklessness and unfaithfulness have made sad havoc in these endowments.

ECOLAMPADIUS (e-ko-lam-pa'de-us), JOHANNES, vernacularly HEUSSGEN (heus'-gen), a learned German Reformer, was born at Weinsberg, in Wirtemberg, in 1482. He went to the university of Bologna to study law; but his inclinations not favoring legal studies, he removed to Heidelberg, where he studied theology and the humanities. He afterward pursued other studies at Tübingen and Stuttgart, and then returned to his native town and entered on clerical duties there. Not long after he was invited to Basle, and there he assisted Erasmus in preparing his edition of the Greek New Testament. He left Basle in 1518 and became preacher at Augsburg. Whilst there he surprised his friends by becoming a monk in April, 1520; but as his leanings were strongly toward the Reformation party, it was not long before he found his position in the cloister uncongenial and regretted the step he had taken. In February, 1522, he made his escape from the bonds under which he had brought himself, and after residing for some time at Heidelberg and other places, he returned to Basle, October, 1522. Here the rest of his life was spent. Having been appointed a teacher in the university, he set himself to expound the prophecies of Isaiah, and his efforts in this direction were so successful that not only multitudes of students crowded to his prelections, but many of the clergy and citizens were found amongst his hearers. Having now openly joined the Reformers, he, in 1525, became pastor of one of the churches in Basle, and this gave him the opportunity of carrying forward the work of the Reformation by abolishing the Romish ceremonies in his church and instructing the people in the doctrines of the gospel. He died November 24, 1531.

His contributions to Biblical literature are numerous. Besides editing and translating Theophy-

Syrian of Mesopotamia. He became a censor of church morality and reproved all the clergy whom he found living luxuriously. He soon became the subject of personal violence, and he separated himself from the Church, and his followers adopted a monastic life. He held to the tenets of Anthropomorphism and Quartodecimanism, the first being the views of those who believed that the Almighty has a material body of human shape, and the second being the belief of those who celebrated Easter on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, whatever day of the week that happened to be, whereas the Councils of Nice and Antioch ordered Easter to be kept on the first Sunday after the full moon, which was observed by the churches of the West of Palestine, Jerusalem and Cæsarea, but the churches of Asia Minor followed the Jewish rule.

ODILO (o-de'lo), a saint in the Roman calendar and an illustrious abbot of Clugny, in Burgundy, was born in Auvergne, in 962. The lact on the Gospels, the Homilies of Chrysostom and other patristic writings, he issued commentaries on Genesis, Job, Psalms, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, most of the minor prophets, Matthew, John and the Epistle to the Hebrews.

ŒCUMENICAL (e'keu-men'i-kal), that which concerns the whole Church. The title œcumenical bishop is assumed by the popes, but was first taken by John the Faster, the patriarch of Constantinople, in the sixth century, and Cyril his successor also claimed the title.

An œcumenical council is an assembly of the hierarchy of the whole Church, called by lawful authority, with freedom of speech and voting to decide on matters of faith and practice. The value of a general council has been a subject of much discussion in the Church of Rome, some holding that a council is above the pope, and others holding that the decree of a council requires the confirmation of a pope before it can be received as infallible. Among Protestants the authority of councils has been admitted when their decisions do not contradict Scripture, and importance is attached to the decisions of the first four councils, viz., of Nice, Constantinople I., Ephesus and Chalcedon, but they hold that a council to be general should include and represent the laity as well as the clergy of the Church.

Touching the infallibility of councils they ask—

1. Where is the proof that infallibility has been vested by the Head of the Church in a council?
2. If this were proved, where is the infallible rule to indicate how a council should be called, and who the constituent members should be?
3. How can it be shown that infallibility resides in a bare majority, rather than in the minority, when a difference exists?
4. If the decision of a council be right, then the confirmation of a pope does not make it right; and if the decree of a council be wrong, the approval of a pope cannot make it right; and if the pope by his own authority has a right to set aside the deliverance of a council, then the infallibility rests not in the council, but in a single man who for the time being is pope.

It has been well observed by Jortin that councils "were a collection of men who were frail and fallible. Some of these councils were not assemblies of pious and learned divines, but cabals, the majority of which were quarrelsome, fanatical, domineering, dishonest prelates who wanted to compel men to approve all their opinions, of which they themselves had no clear conceptions, and to anathematize and oppress those who would not implicitly submit to their determinations."

The Greek and Roman Churches agree on seven councils, and to these the Romish Church adds twelve, making the number nineteen, and to these must be added the late council at Rome, under Pius IX., which has proclaimed the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope. The synod of the apostles, Acts xv., held at Jerusalem, determined by the action of inspired men the questions which were brought before that assembly. Then at various intervals followed the councils which in history have been described as general.

1. The Council of Nice, A. D. 325, in which the views of Arius were condemned.
2. The first Council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, in which the doctrine of the Church on the Holy Ghost was discussed.
3. The first Council of Ephesus, in which Nestorianism was condemned.
4. The Council of Chalcedon, in which the union of the divine and human natures in the person of Christ was asserted, and the heresies of the Eutychians and the Monophysites were condemned. 5. The second Council of Constantinople, A. D. 553, when Origen, Arius, Macedonius and others were condemned. 6. The third Council of Constantinople, A. D. 681, when the Monothelite heresy was condemned. 7. The second Council of Nice, A. D. 787, held to establish the worship of images. 8. The fourth Constantinople, A. D. 869, when Photius was removed from the see of that city and Ignatius, its former occupant, was restored. 9. The first Lateran Council at Rome, A. D. 1123, to settle the Investiture. 10. The second Lateran Council, A. D. 1139, when the views of Arnold of Brescia and others were condemned. 11. The third Lateran Council, A. D. 1179, when the Albigenses and the Waldenses were condemned. 12. The fourth Lateran Council, A. D. 1215, when the dogma of transubstantiation was asserted and ratified. 13. The Synod of Lyon, A. D. 1245, to promote the Crusades. 14. The second Synod of Lyon, A. D. 1274, to promote supreme universal jurisdiction and infallible teaching of the pope. On July 13, 1870, four hundred and fifty-one voted "placet," and eighty-eight voted "non placet," sixty-eight votes were conditional, while ninety-one members abstained from voting at all. The minority bishops handed in a protest and left Rome before July 18th, when the final vote, as a matter of course, was all but unanimous.

National councils are assembled to determine affairs connected with national churches, and provincial councils attend to matters which are considered worthy of adjudication by a section of the Church especially concerned in their settlement.

The Church of England speaks with respect of "those six councils which were allowed and received of all men," viz., Nice, A. D. 325; Constantinople, A. D. 381, A. D. 553, A. D. 680; Ephesus, A. D. 431; and Chalcedon, A. D. 451; and in article xxi. it is declared that general councils may not be gathered together without the command-the union of the Greek and Latin Churches. 15. The Synod of Vienna, in Gaul, A. D. 1311, to suppress the Knights Templars. 16. The Council of Constance, A. D. 1414, which continued for four years, declared the authority of an œcumenical council to be superior to the pope, and condemned the views of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, who were both burned. 17. The Council of Basle, A. D. 1430. It continued nearly ten years, aiming at reforming the discipline, and even on some points changing the constitution, of the Romish Church. It was formally dissolved by the pope, and all its acts are regarded by Romanists as null and void. 18. The celebrated Council of Trent, which sat from A. D. 1545 until A. D. 1563, when discipline was settled and the doctrines of the Romish Church declared, as set forth in the canons of that memorable assembly. 19. The Vatican Council assembled by Pope Pius IX., December 8, 1869. Two "schemata," or papers to be voted on, were prepared and handed in to the council, one "Schema de Fide" and the other "Schema de Ecclesia." They excluded the chapters on the ment and will of princes. . . . They may err, and sometimes have erred, even in things pertaining unto God, wherefore things ordained by them as necessary unto salvation have neither strength nor authority unless it may be declared that they be taken out of Holy Scripture.

OFFA (of'fa) was one of the most eminent of the Mercian kings, and the founder of the great abbey of St. Alban's. St. Alban's had long been celebrated as the scene of the sufferings of the first British martyr. He had suffered much in mind because of the murder of Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, and to make all right he determined to build a monastery. He was directed, of course miraculously, to the place where the relics of St. Albanus had been buried. They were raised and deposited with great honor in a shrine in a church, around which the monastery was subsequently erected. This religious house was of vast size, and it was endowed with lavish abundance. In every respect the abbey of St. Alban's was characterized by all the elements of greatness which belonged to the first-class monastic houses. Great in its wealth, in the rank and power of its abbots, in their influence both in Church and State, in the promotion of literature, as well as in the vast proportions of its church, it deserved all the fame that ages have associated with its name. The church was in the form of a cross, extending from east to west about six hundred feet, and the transepts were more than two hundred feet long. It displayed every style from the heavy, rude period of the Saxons down to the fifteenth century. Originally, heterogeneous materials were used in its construction, such as tiles, brick, flints and the débris of the old Roman city of Verulam, but the additions of future years exhibit the taste of the age when the edifice was enlarged.

OFFERINGS (of'fer-ingz), various kinds of sacrifice. In the earlier ages of the world it appears to have formed a part of divine worship; and there was a certain distinction between those the burnt-offering, the peace-offering, with the meat and drink-offerings, each having its peculiar signification.

The sin-offering is commanded and the order of it prescribed in Lev. iv. 1-v. 13; vi. 24-30. This betokened abasement in the most express sense, and was to be offered for special acts of sin, not those merely which had been unconsciously committed, but all which arose from that want of care which men to whom the will of God was revealed were bound to exercise. In this offering there was a gradation of victims, more or less costly, to mark the more or less offensive character of the sin, according to the position of the offender or other circumstances. The blood of these victims was to be variously dealt with. If the victim were of an inferior kind, for a poor person, some of it was to be sprinkled on the side of the altar and the rest poured out at the altar foot. If the victim were of a higher degree, for a private person or a ruler, then in addition some of the blood was to be put

be a burnt-offering. The burning, therefore, took place without. Thus most clearly through the whole was the prominent idea exhibited—the identification of the offering with the sinner's guilt, the completeness of the satisfaction and the entire removal of the iniquity.

The trespass-offering is the next to be considered. The regulations in regard to it are given in Lev. v. 14-vi. 7; vii. 1-7. The trespass or, as it might be called, the debt-offering was a supplement or appendage to the sin-offering; it represented sin in a fresh light, as an injury for which there must be recompense. The injury was twofold—against the Lord, whose rights had been violated, and against a fellow-creature, whose property or person had been maltreated. In all such cases there must be a trespass-offering. The rites prescribed were these: that the victim should be killed, but the blood only poured around the altar, not sprinkled on the horns or carried into the sanctuary; the same parts as in the sin-offering were to be burnt on the altar, and the rest to be eaten in the holy place. Then, too, in respect of the injury done or debt incurred, estimation of value was to be made, and a fifth part added thereto; this, where the Lord was wronged, was to be given to the priest, where a neighbor, to him that had so suffered. Here we see a dealing with sin, not for its sinful nature, but for the evils that flow from it; and there was a great lesson inculcated, pressing home upon the conscience the moral debt incurred, and the consequent necessity of satisfying the divine justice and making restitution to the brother who had been injured.

The burnt-offering must be now examined. The statutes respecting it are found in Lev. i.; vi. 8-13. It differed from the two kinds of offering before spoken of in this: they were for special sins which, unatoned for, excluded the transgressor from covenant blessings. But when the conscience was so purged, then God's servant might approach him on the general ground of his promise, seeking in such an offering as this the large remission, not of this or that specified offence, but of all his shortcomings and imperfections and sins. It was a voluntary service, and the offerer laid his hand on the head of the victim; the blood was to be sprinkled round about upon the altar, and the sacrifice to be entirely burnt, the skin alone being given to the priest. The entire consuming betokened the unlimited self-dedication of the offerer to God; and as this would express itself in the fruits of a holy life and conversation, a meat and drink-offering must accompany the burnt-offering.

The law of the peace-offerings is given in Lev. iii.; vii. 11-21. There were three different kinds of these, viz., of thanksgiving, the adoring gratitude of a full heart, expressing its sense of rich spontaneous mercy; for a vow, when some benefit had been granted as in consideration of a promise made; and a freewill-offering, when something was devoted to the Lord, but without any special purpose or occasion. Of these the first-named would seem to stand in highest estimation.

Portions of the peace-offerings were reserved for the priest, Lev. vii. 31-34, being consecrated by "heaving" or "waving." According to Jewish tradition, the parts were placed on the hands of the offerer; and then the priest, putting his hands underneath, moved them in a vertical direction for the heaving, in a horizontal one for the waving. This ceremony must have implied a presentation of the parts to God, and they became animals which might and those which might not be thus offered to the Deity, Gen. viii. 20. In the Mosaic law minuter details were given, and various offerings were prescribed which, while they were graciously accepted as an act of service from the worshiper, inculcated also lessons most instructive for all future time, and had their full significance and completion in the great Christian Sacrifice, the one offering of the Lamb of God once for all. The type contains less than the antitype. To convey all the lessons, therefore, that were intended, several forms of offering were commanded. And it is only by putting them together that we can at all grasp the entire purpose of God in them.

It was the first demand of the Israelites that they might be permitted to leave Egypt to offer sacrifices to Jehovah, Ex. v. 1-3; and we find them very soon after their departure making offerings on various occasions, Ex. xviii. 12; xxiv. 5. One of the first directions also given them was for an altar to be constructed for the different kinds of sacrifice, Ex. xx. 24, 25. Somewhat later we have the whole code of regulations for offerings, Lev. i.-vii., the sin-offering, the trespass-offering, upon the horns—the most prominent part—of the altar. If, still further, the offering were for the congregation or for the high-priest, then also a portion of the blood must be taken into the sanctuary and sprinkled seven times before the inner veil, some being put upon the horns of the altar of incense. In each case the offerer had to lay his hand upon the victim before it was slain; and thus the blood-shedding with the sprinkling was taken as an atonement for his sin. Certain portions of the victim were then burnt upon the altar, while the rest, if the offering were for an individual, was to be eaten by the priest within the precincts of the sanctuary; if for the congregation or for the priest himself, then it was to be carried forth and burnt in a clean place. The full acceptance of the offering was thus shown; the flesh had become most holy; it was God's; by his priests, therefore, it was eaten, in his more immediate presence, except when the priests were directly, for their own sin, or indirectly, as members of the congregation, concerned; then the priests could not eat the flesh, else it would have been a peace-offering; neither could it be consumed upon the altar, else it would

The meat-offering is prescribed in Lev. ii.; vi. 14-23. It was an unbloody offering, and therefore it was not to be presented alone; it accompanied the burnt-offering and the peace-offering. The meat-offering consisted of flour or cakes, prepared with salt, oil and frankincense, salt being the preservative against decay, oil the symbol of spiritual influence and frankincense betokening the pleasant savor of a pure offering to the Lord. So that, as the meat-offering was to teach that God's servants were to be fruitfully engaged in good works, those good works must, it was shown, be incorrupt, unwrought by the divine Spirit, and must be presented before God with the incense of grateful prayer.

The offerings which have been enumerated might be made as occasion should require, or were the voluntary expression, the freewill-offering, of a loving heart. But there were particular seasons when sacrificial rites were necessary to be performed; these were daily, weekly, monthly and annual. The daily sacrifice was a burnt-offering, consisting of two lambs, offered every day, morning and evening, at the third and ninth hours, Ex. xxix. 38-42. They were burnt as holocausts, but by a small fire, that they might continue burning the longer, a bread-offering and a drink-offering accompanying each. Incense also was to be burned every morning and evening, Ex. xxx. 7, 8. The weekly offering on the Sabbath was equal to the daily offering, and was in addition to it, Num. xxviii. 9, 10. The monthly sacrifice at the new moon consisted of two young bullocks, one ram and seven lambs of a year old, for a burnt-offering, with a suitable meat- and drink-offering, together with a kid for a sin-offering, Num. xxviii. 11-15. There were, besides, the yearly offerings, at the passover, on the day of pentecost, on the first of the seventh month or beginning of the civil year, on the tenth of the same month or day of expiation, and at the feast of tabernacles. The offerings for these are carefully prescribed, Num. xxviii. 16-31; xxix.

There were besides perpetually other occasions when offerings were to be made. Families seem sometimes to have had yearly sacrifices, 1 Sam. xx. 6, 29. There were the purification-offerings for women after childbirth, Lev. xii., at the cleansing of the leper, Lev. xiv. 1-32, and of other persons who had been unclean, Lev. xv. 13-33, by the Nazarite, Num. vi. 9-21, those at dedications, marriages, etc.; there was also the offering of the shewbread, rites being continually prescribed in which some of the great lessons of the law were impressed upon the mind.

Such, briefly, were the ceremonial offerings of the first dispensation, not a mere collection of unmeaning burdensome services, but full of instruction, intended and adapted to prepare for the better covenant wherein the shadows would have their abiding substance. Doubtless devout Israelites looked onward to this, the prophets testifying to the inutility of mere formal offerings, Isa. i. 11-15. And believers now may argue, from the legal offerings which fulfilled their purpose, to the full efficacy of the Redeemer's offering of himself, Heb. ix. 13, 14. Let no man, moreover, forget that he is to be himself "a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God," Rom. xii. 1.

OFFERINGS, ECCLESIASTICAL, small sums presented by persons when receiving the Lord's Supper, at marriages, baptisms, churchings and burials. These were also called oblations and obventions. Easter offerings were of this nature.

OFFERING DAYS, four days on which royal offerings were formerly made, viz., Christmas, Easter, St. John the Baptist's day and Michaelmas.

OFFERTORY, a name for the lesser oblation of—1. The elements in the eucharist; 2. The alms; also 3. A verse from the Psalms which precedes the oblation.

OFFERTORY VEIL, a silken veil which the deacon or subdeacon used to throw over his shoulders, and in which he received the oblations of the faithful. It is also used to hold the paten at mass, as in some places acolytes performed this office, who, in common with subdeacons, were not formerly allowed to touch the sacred vessels. It is also called a "humeral" and a "consecration veil."

BURNT-OFFERING.—See OFFERINGS.

OFFICE (of'fis), any position of trust, honor or service. The ecclesiastical usages of the term only demand notice.

OFFICE, CONGREGATION OF THE HOLY, a name usually applied to the Romish Inquisition, founded by Pope Paul III., 1542. See INQUISITION.

OFFICE, EUSEBIAN, a form of service introduced by Eusebius, bishop of Vercellæ, but afterward abandoned for the Roman form in 1572.

OFFICE, HOLY. See INQUISITION.

OFFICE, LITTLE, the office or service of the Virgin Mary introduced by Peter Damiani, and sung by his monks after canonical hours.

OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED, the institution of a suit in the court of Arches by sending letters of request signed by the bishop of the diocese in which the cause originated.

OG, an Amoritical king of Bashan, Num. xxi. 33. In form he was a giant, so that his bedstead [or rather sarcophagus] was preserved as a memorial of his huge stature, Deut. iii. 11. He was defeated by the Israelites under Moses, Num. xxi. 33, and his country, which contained many walled cities, was assigned to the tribe of Manasseh, Deut. iii. 13.

OGDEN (og'den), UZAL, D.D., was born in 1744, at Newark, New Jersey, and educated by the Rev. Dr. Chandler. He entered the Episcopal Church, and was ordained a priest in 1773 at the chapel of the palace at Fulham, near London, in England. His first publication was a Masonic sermon in 1784. After it followed "The Reward of Iniquity" and "Antidote to Deism," in 1795, together with several sermons, which were printed from year to year. In 1798 he had been elected bishop of New Jersey, when he was rector of Trinity Church in Newark, New Jersey, but his consecration never took place, and the result was his passing into the Presbyterian Church, in 1805, after an exciting controversy. He died at Newark, in 1822, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

OGEE ARCH (o'je arch), a pointed arch the sides of which are each formed of two contrasted curves. It is made from four centres, two in or near the springing and two others above it reversed, hence it is sometimes called the contrasted arch.

OGILBY (o'g'l-be), JOHN DAVID, D.D., was born in Dublin, Ireland, in 1810. In early life he was brought to New York, and entered in Columbia College, and so remarkable were his gifts and attainments that he was placed by the president, Dr. Harris, as rector of the grammar school, while he was in the junior class. He graduated in 1829, but his excessive labor produced a disease which affected him through life. He now began the preparation and issuing of classical works; and when only twenty-three years of age, he was made professor of languages in Rutgers College, New Brunswick. In 1838 he was ordained by the Protestant Episcopal bishop of New York. In 1841 the chair of ecclesiastical history in the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, and he forthwith began the preparation of text-books, but next year he was obliged to seek relaxation by a voyage to Europe, and in 1846 he had to cross the ocean again. On his return he was appointed rector of Grace Church, Newark, New Jersey, but the influence of his friends prevailed, and he was retained in the seminary. Declining health continued to interfere with his labors; and having gone to Europe again, he died in Paris, in February, 1851, greatly regretted. He was wonderfully learned, incessant in his application to duties, and his mental activity was greater than his bodily frame could endure. His piety and geniality commended him to all who knew him, and he was greatly beloved.

OGILVIE (o'g'l-ve), JOHN, D.D., was born in New York city, in 1722, and was a descendant of the old family of Ogilvie, the head of the house being the earl of Findlater and Seafield. He was educated at Yale College, ordained to the Episco-

ceremony. In order to prevent idolatry, the queen commanded him not to elevate the host, and on the point of his compliance there is a controversy. It seems that he reproached himself for his compliance, and he subsequently refused to obey the queen, who ordered him to attend a public disputation, whereupon he was fined £250 by the council, and shortly afterward he was expelled from his see.

OGYGIAN (o-gi'je-an) DELUGE, the name given to a great inundation mentioned in fabulous history, supposed to have taken place in the reign of Ogyges, in Attica, whose death has been held to be fixed at 1764 B. C. This deluge is said to have taken place before that of Deucalion, and Ogyges is reported to have been the only person saved when all Greece was covered with water. He evidently belongs to the mythical period. Varro places the deluge of Ogyges, which he calls the first, four hundred years bemetic for the refreshing and adorning of the person, as the special instrument of consecration to holy offices, as a healing medicament, as the chief source of artificial light, and partly also as a perfume in the last offices of affection and respect for the dead. But as all these subjects are treated under their proper heads, it is unnecessary to go into further details here.

OILLY (oil'le), ROBERT D', who had been lord high constable in the reign of Henry I., was the founder of the priory at Oseney, which was built in 1129 on one of the islets made by the rivers adjoining the castle of Oxford. The house was dedicated to the honor of the Blessed Virgin, and was placed under the rule of St. Augustin. His wife induced him to undertake the pious work by telling him how she had heard a miraculous chattering of birds, and how a friar had interpreted to her their speech. Such knowledge served the purposes of monks and friars in the twelfth and later centuries, and the priory which was thus founded became an abbey, and it in time changed its character; for when Henry VIII., in 1542, founded the see of Oxford, the abbey church became the cathedral of the diocese, and it also serves the purposes of the chapel of Christ Church, the largest of the colleges in the university of Oxford.

OIL TREE, Isa. xli. 19. See OLIVE TREE.

OILS ECCLESIASTICAL are of three kinds—1. Chrism oil; 2. Oil of catechumens; 3. Oil of the sick. In the West these are all consecrated by the bishop on Maundy Thursday, but in the East the chrism alone is; whilst any priest may consecrate the oil of catechumens, and seven priests that of the sick. The oil of catechumens is used in baptism, consecration of altars, ordaining of priests and in coronations. That of the sick is used for extreme unction and the benediction of bells.

OINTMENT. See ANOINTING.

OLAMUS (ol-a'mus), 1 Esd. ix. 30, identical with Meshullam, Ezra x. 29.

OLD BELIEVERS, a sect of dissenters from the Russian Church who separated two hundred years ago, in the time of Czar Alexei Michaelovitch, on the ground of the State's interference, as the Free Church of Scotland left the Established Church. The difference of the two bodies lies in usages more than in essentials or in necessary doctrines.

pal ministry, and in 1749 he began his labors among the Mohawks, near Albany, among whom he spent ten earnest years of his life. The war with France, in 1755, deranged his plans, and he accepted a chaplaincy in the royal American regiment and served during the war. In 1764 he became an assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York, a position which he held until his death, in 1774. In the vestry of Trinity Church there is a portrait of him by Copley, the father of the late Lord Lyndhurst. He left behind him the character of an excellent preacher, a faithful, resolute missionary, a devoted minister and a truly pious man.

OGLETHORP (o'g'l-thorp), OWEN, a well-known bishop of Carlisle. He is a memorable character in English history as being the person who consented to officiate at the coronation of Queen Elizabeth when all the other bishops had refused. Canterbury was then vacant, but Heath, the archbishop of York, had refused, and the bishop of Carlisle consented to perform the fore Inachus, and consequently sixteen hundred before the first Olympiad, and this would place it 2376 B. C. Now, the deluge of Noah, according to the Hebrew text, occurred 2349 B. C., there being only twenty-seven years of difference. These facts go far to show how widely, and even accurately, tradition has carried the fact of the deluge, though different names were of course connected with it in different ages and countries.

OHEL (o'hel), one of David's descendants, 1 Chr. iii. 20.

OIL. Much use was made of oil by the ancient inhabitants of Palestine, and many allusions to it are found in their sacred and other writings. It was employed as an article of food, serving to a large extent the purposes of butter in this country; in meat- or bread-offerings, sometimes poured on them, at other times mixed with them; as a cosating in 1809, he acted as a tutor in the college, and in 1813 he was settled as pastor at Bound Brook, New Jersey. Thence he removed to Morristown, New Jersey, and on the failure of his health he resigned that charge and went to Charleston, where he remained for several years. After retiring from the Domestic Mission Board, he settled in New Jersey, where he died in 1851. He was characterized by great piety, wisdom and zeal, and he held a prominent place among his brethren, by whom he was greatly beloved.

McFARLAND (mak-far'land), JAMES, who became well known in the Reformed (Dutch) Church and the Presbyterian Church of the United States, was born in 1800, at Dumbarton-on-the-Clyde, in Scotland. He was educated at the university of St. Andrews, and after acting as a tutor in the family of the duke of Argyle, he was settled at Arbroath, on the east coast of Scotland. He removed to this country in 1835, and after a brief stay in Delaware county, New York, he became pastor of the Reformed (Dutch) Church at Bloomingdale. There, at Canajoharie, at Esopus in the Reformed, and in the Presbyterian Church at Galway, in Fulton county, New York, he ministered with great acceptance. He was a distinguished scholar and a clear evangelical and forcible preacher. He died in 1870.

McGAVIN (mak-ga'ven), WILLIAM, who has been long known as the author of a large work called "The Protestant," was born in 1773, in Ayrshire, in Scotland. He settled in Glasgow and held the position of agent of the British Linen Company's banking establishment. He was drawn into the Romish controversy by a paragraph in a newspaper in which the writer attached a degree of sanctity to the new Romish cathedral, and his criticism led to a discussion, and eventually to a series of papers which, when completed, were published in several volumes. These papers were written with great clearness and vigor, and Robert Hall pronounced "The Protestant" to be "the fullest delineation of the popish system and the most powerful confutation of its principles in a popular style." He edited the "History of the Reformation," by John Knox, and "The Scots Worthies," by John Howie of Lochgoine. He was a devotedly pious man, and he frequently collected careless and degraded people together in neglected districts, where he preached to them and by great earnestness and kindness sought their spiritual and temporal reformation. He died in 1832.

McILVAINE (mak-il-vain'), CHARLES PETIT, D.D., who was born at Burlington, New Jersey, in 1798, rose to be one of the leading bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. He was educated at Princeton, where he graduated in 1816. In 1820 he was ordained by Bishop White, and he commenced his ministry at Christ Church, Georgetown, Maryland, and in 1822 he was admitted to priest's orders. Three years subsequently he undertook the duties of chaplain and professor of ethics in the military school at West Point. Thence he removed to Brooklyn, where he remained until he was consecrated over the diocese of Ohio in 1832. He rose very rapidly to a high position in the Church, being recognized as a man of decided talent, fine culture and genuine piety. He was known as a prominent leader in what has been called the Evangelical or Low Church side of the denomination, and as such he was deservedly esteemed. He was a voluminous writer, and the works which he published displayed a remarkable grasp and fertility of mind as well as unwonted diligence. In 1841 his "Oxford Divinity compared with that of the Romish and Anglican Churches" made a great impression. Then followed "The Truth and the Life," "Select Family and Parish Sermons," "No Priest, no Altar, no Sacrifice," "The Holy Catholic Church," "Valedictory Offering," "The Sinner's Justification," "Works on Confirmation," "Chief Dangers of the Church," "Memoir of Simeon," besides a great number of valuable contributions to the leading reviews and journals. He was as well known and esteemed in England as he was in this country. The university of Oxford granted him the degree of D.C.L., and in 1858 the university of Cambridge conferred on him the degree of LL.D. He possessed great tenderness in the pulpit, and he was unusually clear and impressive as a masterly preacher of evangelical truth. He died in 1873, at Florence, in Italy, whither he had gone for his health.

McKENDREE (mak-ken'dre), WILLIAM, was a native of King William county, Virginia, where he was born in 1757. He served in Washington's army for several years, and was present at Yorktown when Lord Cornwallis surrendered, in 1781. Being under permanent religious impressions, he was admitted as an itinerant preacher. In 1796 he became presiding elder, and five years afterward he was entrusted with the responsible position of presiding over the Kentucky district; and thus he supervised the religious state of the members in Ohio, Tennessee, part of Illinois and part of Virginia, as well as Kentucky. In 1808 he was made a bishop, an office which he held for twenty-seven years. He was a man of unwonted powers. Self-taught, powerful in intellect, forcible in diction, fertile in illustration and vivid in imagination, he was decidedly one of the most effective preachers of his day. His great prudence and his energy admirably fitted him for the office to which he was raised, and the reforms which he effected in the administration of Church affairs proved most beneficial, and their value is now fully recognized. He died in 1835, at Nashville, Tennessee.

McKINNEY (mak-kin'ne), JAMES, was born in 1759, in Cookstown, in the province of Ulster, Ireland. He was greatly distinguished in Glasgow university; and having studied medicine, he then entered with all his powers on a full course of theology. He settled as pastor at Kirkhills, in Antrim country, but his affections led him to this country, and in 1793 he emigrated. He remained for seven years at Galway and Duanesburg, New York, as pastor of a Reformed Presbyterian church; but he resigned and removed to South Carolina in 1804, where he died soon after his arrival. He was a man of unusual eloquence and power. He was a profound theologian, a close thinker and a learned man. He had entered on the preparation of a work which showed his mental grasp, but he only lived to finish the introduction. He aimed at discussing the "Rights of God, the Rights of Christ as Mediator, the Rights of the Church and the Rights of Humanity in General." As Dr. Sprague has well observed, "the work would have been worthy of the man—not only sound in matter, but deep in thought and impressive in style."

McLEOD (mak-lowd'), ALEXANDER, D.D., was born in 1774 in the island of Mull, on the west coast of Scotland. His father and his grandfather had both labored in the ministry of the Scotch Established Church. He removed to this country in 1792; and having entered Union College, he graduated in 1798, was licensed to preach, and in 1801 he was admitted as pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church. He was a man of vigorous mind, great energy of character, and an active, earnest minister of the gospel. In 1803 he issued "Messiah governing the Nations." Then followed an "Ecclesiastical Catechism," the "Gospel Ministry," a work on "The Prophecies," "Life and Power of True Godliness." Very early in his career he published a work on negro slavery, and he became a leading organizer and friend of the American Colonization Society. His high character led several congregations to seek him as pastor, but nothing would induce him to sever the connection which had been formed between him and his first church. He died in 1833.

MELROSE ABBEY, SCOTLAND.—See article.

McLEOD, JOHN NEILL, D.D., who was the eldest son of the Rev. Alexander McLeod, D.D., was born in New York in the year 1807, and educated at Union College. He entered the ministry, and succeeded his father as pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church of New York. He was a determined adherent to the theological views and governmental principles of the body to which he belonged, and all suggestions or plans which were proposed to merge his denomination, or to unite with any other section of the Presbyterian family, met with his steadfast opposition. He held a high place among his brethren, and he was greatly esteemed as a laborious pastor and excellent preacher. He died in April, 1874.

McLEOD, NORMAN, D.D., was born in 1812, at Campbelltown, in Argyleshire, Scotland. After scholastic training at Glasgow, he went to the university of Edinburgh, and to enlarge his mind he was sent to the North of Europe, where he traveled extensively, and on his return he entered on an elaborate theological course. His first charge was the parish of Loudon, in Ayrshire. When the disruption of the Church of Scotland issued in the formation of the Free Church, he adhered to the Kirk, although he had been educated under Dr. Chalmers, whom he admired and loved. His character was now known and his services were greatly sought. Eventually he was induced to settle at Dalkeith, near Edinburgh, which he resigned in 1851 to enter on the Barony Church, in Glasgow, where his work was crowned with great success. Three solid sermons every Lord's day, and the exercises of a large intellectual class which would have taxed the powers of any man, were his customary Sabbath services. During the week his labor was equal to the toil of three ordinary men, and yet he edited a magazine for ten years in addition to all these public duties. He next entered on the great work of editing the celebrated periodical "Good Words," which is known throughout all the churches, and shortly afterward came the distinguished mark of royal favor, his appointment of chaplain to the queen in Scotland. His clear theology, bold and manly preaching, his intense earnestness and his entire

First Reformed Church of New York, was born in that city in 1821. He was educated at Columbia College, and entered the ministry of the Episcopal Church in 1845. After five years' labor he visited Europe, and while abroad he entered the Church of Rome. On his return to America he engaged in literature, among his works being a "Life of Mary Queen of Scots." In 1860 he went to Mount St. Mary's College, near Cincinnati, as professor of belles-lettres, and afterward became a professor in the Romish communion. He died in 1865.

McMASTER (mak-mas'ter), GILBERT, D.D., who became a very eminent Presbyterian minister in the United States, was born in Ireland in 1778. He was brought to this country in his childhood, and his education was conducted at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania. He graduated in Indiana and Michigan. Centreville and Constantine, in Michigan, and South Bend, in Indiana, were the main spheres of his labors. He closed a life of intense zeal and great devotion in 1854.

McSWAIN (mak-swain'), WILLIAM ADNEY, was born in North Carolina in 1814. He became a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1836. He labored with much success in South Carolina until his death, in 1866. As a preacher he had a peculiar power of attraction, which made his sermons exceedingly effective, and in private life he was greatly beloved.

McVICKAR (mak-vik'ar), JOHN, D.D., was born in New York in the year 1787, and was educated at Columbia College and at the university of Cambridge, in England. He was rector of the church at Hyde Park from 1811 until 1817, when he became professor of moral philosophy, rhetoric and belles-lettres in Columbia College—an office which he held until 1857, when he retired to private life in consequence of declining health. He was held in great esteem both in the college and in the Church, and on his resignation of the active duties of the chair he was continued as an "emeritus" professor. His chief writings were of a biographical character, among which may be mentioned "A Memoir of the Rev. Edmund D. Griffins," "Early Years of Bishop Hobart" and "The Professional Years of Bishop Hobart." He died in 1868 at Bloomingdale, New York.

MEADE (meed), WILLIAM, D.D., who became one of the most eminent of the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, was born in the year 1789, in Clarke county, Virginia, and educated at Princeton, where he graduated in 1808. He was ordained to the ministry in 1811; and being a member of a family in affluent circumstances, with large territorial property, he labored near his patrimonial estate without salary. A diocesan theological seminary was completed under his auspices, and he succeeded in the formation of missionary and other educational institutions of great usefulness. He was unanimously chosen as an assistant bishop in 1829, and consecrated at Philadelphia. As his predecessor Bishop Moore was infirm, he assumed the chief care of the diocese, and in 1841 he took the sole charge. His high character and great zeal, combined with the social position of his family, enabled him to exercise great influence in Virginia. He was a voluminous writer, notwithstanding the great demands which were made on his time by his administrative duties. He published "Family Prayers," "Lectures on the Pastoral Office," "Lectures to Students," "Old Churches, Ministers and Families of Virginia;" and the attractiveness of this last work was widely acknowledged, as it preserved facts and incidents of interest to the population of the State, many of which were likely to be lost to future generations. Bishop Meade died in 1862, closing a life of great usefulness, and deservedly regretted. He belonged to the theological school in the Church usually designated evangelical.

MEADOW (med'o), Gen. xli. 2, 18. The original word so translated in this place is Egyptian, meaning some kind of water-plant or green thing growing in marshy ground. In Jud. xx. 33, our version, "meadows," must be incorrect. There are said to be no meadows about Gibeah. Waste places may be intended. By a slight change of punctuation, the word would denote a cave.

freedom from all assumption of a piety which he did not possess, united to a dignified manner and openness of nature, won the affectionate regard of the sovereign, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He had a horror of all religious pretence; he was genial, cheerful, and among all men who knew him he was acknowledged to have a readiness and adaptation for every kind of work which few men of any age ever have displayed. Earnest on behalf of the conversion of the heathen, he traveled through India, so as to gain such information as would guide and stimulate the Church at home. Highly cultured and anxious to be clear about Bible scenes, he traveled through Egypt, Palestine and Syria, and thus he lived a life of unworldly toil, until, in 1872, his vigorous frame gave way, and he passed on to his rest.

He was an eminent preacher of great character, and a prolific writer. His principal works are—"An Analysis of the Shorter Catechism," "The Moral Character of Civil Government," "An Essay in Defence of some Fundamental Doctrines of Christianity," "An Apology for the Book of Psalms" and "Thoughts on Union in the Church of God." He died in 1854 at New Albany.

Having completed his studies he entered on the work of home missions, and gave himself with intense zeal to the cause of God in MEASURE (mez'h'eur), MEASURES. There are measures of length and measures of capacity. Measures of length have generally been taken from the proportions of the human body. Thus we have the digit, or finger's breadth; the palm or hand-breadth, or breadth of four fingers; the span, or space reached between the thumb and the little finger extended; the cubit, or length from the elbow to the point of the middle finger; also the foot.

There is great uncertainty in reducing Hebrew measures to English. The accompanying tables of measures of length and capacity must be taken, therefore, more as an approximation than as an exact determination.

MEASURING REED, Ezek. xl. 3. See MEASURES.

MEAT, MEATS. This word, as it occurs in our version, is frequently used for food in general, Lev. xxii. 11, 13, and elsewhere, or for what is allowed to be eaten, proper for sustenance, Gen. i. 29, 30; ix. 3. More specially, though perhaps sometimes indicating, as in our ordinary employment of the term, flesh-meat, Gen. xxvii. 4, 7, 31, it is almost exclusively applied to vegetables or vegetable products. Thus a meat-offering was a kind of cake made of flour and oil, Lev. ii.

A controversy arose in the early Church respecting meats, the flesh of victims which had been offered to idols, whether this might lawfully be eaten by Christians. It was evidently a matter of expediency. The flesh itself was not polluted, and much that had been so offered was exposed for sale in the ordinary market, and was found generally on men's tables at their meals. Hence St. Paul lays down the rule that Christians might lawfully buy what was for public sale or placed before them by their acquaintances, without asking questions; but if they were specially told that the meat had been offered to an idol, or if the conscience of a brother (even though he might be weak) was likely to be offended, they should abstain, and not give cause for scandal. The same principle was laid down in the Council of Jerusalem. Christians, in the sight of Jews, who would be sure to take exception, should not eat meats offered to idols, Acts xv. 20, 21, 29; Rom. xiv. 20, 21; 1 Cor. viii. 4, 7-10; x. 19, 25-33. MEDAD (me'dad), one of the elders who, along with Eldad, began to prophesy in the wilderness, Num. xi. 26-30.

MEDAN (me'dan), one of the sons of Abraham and Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2. The district which his descendants occupied has not been ascertained.

MEDE (meed), JOSEPH, a learned English divine, was born in 1586, at Berden, in Essex. He was the author of the "Clavis Apocalyptica," which is considered by Biblical critics as one of the ablest expositions of the obscure prophecies to which it refers. He died in 1638.

MEDEBA (med'e-bah), a city of the Amorites on the east of Jordan, at the time of the conquest by the Israelites, but at an earlier period a Moabite town, Num. xxi. 26-30. In later times it again appears in connection with the history of Moab and Ammon, 1 Chr. xix. 7, who seem to have recovered it from Israel. The site has been identified and described by various modern travelers, and is placed about one and a half hours south-east from Heshbân. During the Maccabean wars it was the scene of some severe struggles and lengthened sieges, but in the subsequent decline of the Jewish power it passed into the hands of the Arabians. In Christian times it became the seat of a bishop, and as such occasionally appears in the ancient ecclesiastical lists.

MEDIA (me'dyah), a large region in Asia lying between Persia, Armenia and Assyria. It was separated from Persia on the south by a desert; on the west the boundary was the mountains of Zagros, and the chain proceeding thence to Ararat; the Araxes limited it northward; while on the east it reached to the desert, the Caspian gates and the mountains south of the sea. In length it might be from north to south five hundred and fifty miles, and in breadth from two hundred and fifty to three hundred. It comprised, according to Rawlinson, the modern provinces of Irak Ajemi, Persian Kurdistan, part of Luristan, Azerbaijan, and perhaps Talish and Ghilan. Anciently, Media was divided into Media Magna and Media Atropatene. The former was mountainous and fertile in the west, rocky and bare toward the east. It included the Nisæan plains, famous for a breed of horses, and corresponded to Irak Ajemi, with parts of Kurdistan and Luristan. Media Atropatene, which had its name from a satrap, Atropates, who established himself as monarch there when Alexander overthrew the Persian empire, corresponded to Azerbaijan, and perhaps Talish and Ghilan. It is a high tract, fertile and well watered. Tabriz, the summer residence of the kings of Persia, is its capital. In each of the two divisions of Media was a chief city called Ecbatana. Another principal town was Rhages, or Raga.

The Medes must be supposed descended from Madai, of the sons of Japheth, Gen. x. 2. Over their early history much obscurity hangs. Perhaps in very ancient times they were powerful, and they are said to have conquered Babylon. Later, however, they appear in a subordinate position, though not perhaps actually incorporated with the Assyrian empire, yet oppressed and plundered by the Assyrians, who planted military colonies among them. Herodotus represents them as revolting early, and ultimately taking Nineveh and establishing an extensive monarchy. But his story cannot be implicitly credited. In its main outline it may be true; for indisputably the Medes took Nineveh, perhaps about 625 B. C., and Cyaxares their king reigned over a vast expanse of country—Assyria, Persia, Media, Armenia and other countries, from the Halys to the Caspian gates, and from the Caspian and Black Seas to the Persian Gulf. But this dominion did not last; the Persians under Cyrus defeated them, and he is said to have captured their king Astyages. Thence-forward the Medes made a part of the Persian empire, not as subjected to a yoke, but rather as a kindred race with the Persians. Sometimes, indeed, they struggled for independence; revolts occurred, but these were suppressed by Darius Hystaspis and Darius Nothus.

The earliest notice we find of them in Scripture is when, after the conquest of Samaria, the Assyrian king removed some of the Israelites into Median cities, 2 Ki. xvii. 6; xviii. 11. It was afterward predicted that the Medes would take part in the destruction of Babylon, Isa. xiii. 17, 18; Jer. li. 11, 28—a prediction exactly accomplished, as we read in Daniel, Dan. v. 28, 31. Possibly the Medes had suffered at the hand of the Babylonian kings, and were therefore actuated by a spirit of revenge, Jer. xxv. 25. The Medo-Persian kingdom is alluded to in Dan. viii. 3, 4, 20, and continually the two nations are spoken of as in union, Esth. i. 3, 14; Dan. vi. 8, 12. The palace or royal residence, Achmetha or Ecbatana, in Media, is also mentioned, Ezra vi. 2; it had been the seat of government under Cyrus.

The Medes were brave, and excelled in the use of the bow. Their dress was flowing and of rich colors, and they were fond of decorating themselves with ornaments. In their religion they admitted the existence of two opposing powers of good and evil. But in later times their creed was modified and changed into Magianism, or worship of fire and the other elements. Among their customs it may be noted that they left their dead to be devoured by birds and beasts of prey.

MEDIAN (me-dyan), Dan. v. 31, the designation of Darius, also called the Mede, Dan. xi. 1.

MEDIATOR (me-di-a'tor), one who interposes between two parties in order to bring them to agreement or to a common purpose, Gal. iii. 20. Moses so interposed between God and Israel, Ex. xx. 19. But the Lord Jesus Christ is the only mediator in the highest sense between God and man, so that we find this special designation given him, 1 Tim. ii. 5; Heb. viii. 6. See ATONEMENT.

MEDICINE (med'i-sin), Prov. xvii. 22. See PHYSICIAN. The word is sometimes used figuratively. Sin is spoken of as a disease, Isa. i. 5, 6; the remedy for it is therefore called a medicine.

MEEDA (me'e-da), 1 Esd. v. 32, identical with Mehida, Ezra ii. 52.

MEGIDDO (me-gid'do), occasionally MEGIDDON, a city in the great plain of Esdraelon, which at the time of the conquest had a king of its own, with tributary towns, Josh. xii. 21. Along with all the places of importance in that part of Palestine, it fell into the hands of the Israelites, but the original inhabitants still kept possession of the city, Josh. xvii. 11, 12; and when or how the population came to be of a properly Israelitish character is not stated. In the struggle that took place, at no great distance from the times of Joshua, between the forces of Israel under Barak and the host of Sisera, it comes again into notice, but only in a passing allusion, when, depicting the scene of conflict, Deborah represents the kings of Canaan as fighting "in Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo," Jud. v. 19. Nothing more is heard of Megiddo till the time of Solomon, during whose reign it was fortified or enlarged, 1 Ki. ix. 15, and formed, along with Taanach, the district of one of Solomon's purveyors, 1 Ki. iv. 12. At a later period it is celebrated as the scene of two mournful events connected with the house of David—the death of Ahaziah, who fled thither after being mortally wounded by the hand of Jehu, and more particularly the death of Josiah after his defeat by Pharaoh-Nechoh, beside or in the valley of Megiddo, 2 Ki. ix. 27; xxiii. 29, 30; 2 Chr. xxxv. 22. These are all the strictly historical notices or allusions to Megiddo; and no doubt exists as to its site having been that of the modern el-Lejjun, the Legio of Eusebius and Jerome, which is placed by them about four Roman miles to the north of Taanach, and was still in their day of some note, though now only a village, distinguished by a minaret and a few olive-groves. It stood in the central and widest portion of the great plain of Esdraelon—that portion which stretches straight across, without interruption, from the hills of Samaria to those of Galilee. This is what, for the sake of distinction, may be specially termed “the plain of Megiddo.”

MEHETABEEL (me-he'ta-bel), a person whose grandson attempted to alarm Nehemiah, Neh. vi. 10.

MEHOLATHITE (me-ho'lath-ite), 1 Sam. xviii. 19, a native or resident of Abelmeholah.

MEHUJAEEL (me-hu'ja-el), a descendant of Cain, Gen. iv. 18.

MEHUMAN (me-hu'man), one of the eunuchs or chamberlains at the court of Ahasuerus, Esth. i. 10.

MEHUNIM (me-hu'nim). Certain persons, Nethinim, who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 50, are designated “children of Mehunim.” They were probably not Israelites. The word is written Meunim in Neh. vii. 52.

MEHUNIMS (me-hu'nims), 2 Chr. xxvi. 7. See MAONITES.

MEJARKON (me-jar'kon), a town in the territory of Dan, apparently in the plain near Joppa, Josh. xix. 46.

MEKITAR (me-ke'tar), PETROS, founder of the Armenian convent at Venice, was born in 1676. He was educated in the convents of Armenia, and at an early age conceived the project of making the Armenian Church obedient to the pope. With that in view, he traveled much about, disseminating his views, but at length settled down in Modena, in the Morea, then subject to the Venetians. Driven from this by the Turks, he removed to Venice, where he founded the monastery mentioned above, and also established an Armenian printing-press. He died in 1749.

MEKONAH (me-ko'nah), a town, apparently of some importance, in the tribe of Judah at the period of the return from Babylon; it is mentioned as one of the places which were occupied by the returned exiles, and had villages attached to it, Neh. xi. 28.

MELANCHTHON (me-langk'thon), PHILIP, a German divine, who was one of the principal associates of Luther in the reformation of the Church. He was born February 16, 1497, at Bretten, in the palatinate of the Rhine, and studied at the college of Pfortzheim, where he became acquainted with Reuchlin, who, in compliance with a frequent custom of the period, gave his young friend the Græcised name of Melanchthon, having the same signification with that of his family, which was Schwartzerd, or black earth. In 1518 he was appointed professor of Greek literature in the university of Wittenberg, which situation he held to the end of his life. Here his intercourse with his colleague, Luther, led to a permanent friendship between them and a similarity of religious sentiment, though their personal character and dispositions were widely different, Melanchthon being as remarkable for suavity of manners as Luther was for impetuosity and unbending firmness. In 1519 Melanchthon assisted at the conference with Ecclus, at Leipsic; and in 1527 he visited the Saxon churches under the sanction of the elector, and aided in framing a code of ecclesiastical constitutions. In 1530, the states of the empire being assembled at Augsburg, he made a speech in the presence of the emperor, which for its moderation excited the applause of his opponents. He was employed in drawing up the Augsburg Confession, and was afterward accused of having made alterations in it without the consent of other doctors of the Reformed Church. Such was the opinion entertained of his desire to promote unity among Christians that Francis I. invited him to visit his kingdom for the purpose of settling the religious disputes among his subjects. He was also invited to England in the reign of Edward VI.; and he had many friends and well-wishers who belonged to the communion which he had forsaken. But his liberality was productive of inconvenience, by involving him in disputes with the zealots of his own party, who branded with the names of Adiphorists and Interimists such as were not as obstinately opposed as themselves to measures of concession or conciliation. These advocates for separation he thought it his duty to combat as long as he lived. His death took place at Wittenberg, April 19, 1560. His writings consist of numerous theological treatises, notes and commentaries on several of the Greek and Latin classics, and works on history and philosophy.

MELCHIZEDEK (mel-kiz'e-dek) (“priest of the most high God” and king of Salem, who went forth to meet Abraham on his return from the pursuit of Cherdorlaomer and his allies, who had carried Lot away captive. We read that Melchizedek, on the occasion referred to, brought refreshment for the fatigued warriors, and bestowed his blessing upon their leader, who, in return, gave to the royal priest a tenth of all the spoil which had been acquired in his expedition, Gen. xiv. 18, 20.

This statement seems sufficiently plain and to offer nothing very extraordinary, yet it has formed the basis of much speculation and controversy. In particular, the fact that Abraham gave a tithe to Melchizedek attracted much attention among the later Jews. In one of the Messianic Psalms, cx. 4, it is foretold that the Messiah should be “a priest after the order of Melchizedek,” which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, vi. 20, cites as showing that Melchizedek was a type of Christ; and the Jews themselves certainly, on the authority of this passage of the Psalms, regarded Melchizedek as a type of the regal priesthood, higher than that of Aaron to which the Messiah should belong. The bread and wine which were set forth on the table of show-bread were also supposed to be represented by the bread and wine which the king of Salem brought forth to Abraham. A mysterious supremacy acy came also to be assigned to Melchizedek, by reason of his having received tithes from the Hebrew patriarch. Heb. vii. 1-10. This superiority is, as we take it, inherent in his typical rather than his personal character. But the Jews, in admitting this official or personal superiority of Melchizedek to Abraham, sought to account for it by alleging that the royal priest was no other than Shem, the most pious of Noah's sons, who, according to the shorter chronology, might have lived to the time of Abraham. Christian writers have not failed to enter into the same unprofitable researches, and would make Melchizedek to have been either Shem, or Mizraim, or Canaan, the sons of Ham, or Ham himself, or even Enoch. The last-named conjectures seem to require no notice, but the one which holds Melchizedek to have been Shem, and which we find in the Jerusalem Targum and also that of Jonathan, requires an explanation of how his name came to be changed, how he is found reigning in a country inhabited by the descendants of Ham, how he came forth to congratulate Abraham on the defeat of one of his own descendants, as was Chedorlaomer, and how he could be said to have been without recorded parentage, Heb. vii. 3, since the pedigree of Shem must have been notorious. In that case, also, the difference of the priesthoods of Melchizedek and Levi would not be so distinct as to bear the argument which the Epistle to the Hebrews founds upon it. Rejecting on such grounds this opinion, others, in their anxiety to vindicate the dignity of Abraham from marks of spiritual submission to any mortal man, have held that Melchizedek was no other than the Son of God himself. But in this case it would hardly have been said that he was made "like unto the Son of God," Heb. vii. 3, or that Christ was constituted "a priest" after the order of Melchizedek, Heb. vi. 20, or, in other words, was a type of himself. Some who do not go so far as this take him to have been an angel, and this was one of the wild notions of Origen and several of his school. The best founded opinion seems to be that of Carpzov and most judicious moderns, who, after Josephus, allege that he was a principal person among the Canaanites and posterity of Noah, and eminent for holiness and justice, and therefore discharged the priestly as well as regal functions among the people; and we may conclude that his twofold capacity of king and priest (characters very commonly united in the remote ages) afforded Abraham an opportunity of testifying his thankfulness to God in the manner usual in those times by offering a tenth of all the spoil. This combination of characters happens for the first time in Scripture to be exhibited in his person. The union of the royal and priestly offices in him, together with the abrupt manner in which he is introduced, and the nature of the intercourse between him and Abraham, renders him in various respects an appropriate and obvious type of the Messiah in his united regal and priestly character.

MELECH (me'lek), a descendant of King Saul, 1 Chr. viii. 35; ix. 41.

MELEK EL ADEL (me'lek el a'del), sultan of Egypt and of Damascus, and younger brother of Saladin, was born in 1218. During the third crusade he took many places in Palestine from the Christians, and concluded an advantageous peace with Richard Cœur de Lion, one stipulation of which was that he should marry the sister of the English king, but that princess refused to give her hand to an infidel. In 1217 an army of crusaders from Hungary ravaged his territories and carried him away to Damietta.

MELETIANS (me-le'sh'anz). Those were so called who refused to hold communion with or to restore the "lapsed" after repentance. They were so called after Meletius (A. D. 306-309), a bishop of Lycopolis, in Egypt, who had been deposed for having sacrificed to heathen idols in time of persecution. He assumed great powers on the subject of ordination, particularly in dealing with persons who had "lapsed." The Council of Nice deprived Meletius of the authority to ordain. He was ordered to reside in his own city, and the principles of his followers were condemned.

MELHO (mel'ho), PHILIP DE, celebrated as a divine, Biblical translator and Oriental poet, and as the first native of Ceylon who was ordained a Christian minister, was born in 1723. He was an eloquent preacher in Dutch, Portuguese and Tamul. He sprang from a patrician Tamul family, and studied at the seminary founded by the Dutch in Ceylon. He translated into Tamul the New Testament, the Pentateuch, the Psalms of David and the Dutch liturgy, and wrote a work against Romanism, entitled "Triumph of the Truth." He died in 1790.

MELISSUS (me-lis'sus), a philosopher of Samos, of the Eleatic sect, who flourished about B. C. 440, was a disciple of Parmenides. He was likewise a man of political wisdom and courage, which gave him great influence among his countrymen. As a philosopher he maintained that the principle of all things is one and immutable, or that whatever exists is one being; that this one being includes all things, and is infinite, without beginning or end; that there is neither vacuum nor motion in the universe, nor any such thing as production or decay; that the changes which it seems to suffer are only illusions of our senses; and that we ought not to lay down anything positively concerning the gods, since our knowledge of them is uncertain.

MELITA (mel'e-ta), an island in the Mediterranean on which the ship which was conveying St. Paul as a prisoner to Rome was wrecked, and which was the scene of the interesting circumstances recorded in Acts xxvii., xxviii.

Melita was the ancient name of Malta, and also of a small island in the Adriatic now called Meleda, and each of these has found warm advocates for its identification with the Melita of Scripture. The received and long-established opinion is undoubtedly in favor of Malta, and those who uphold the claims of Meleda are to be regarded as dissenting from the general conclusion. This dissent proceeds chiefly upon the ground that the ship of St. Paul was "driven about in (the sea of) Adria," when wrecked on Melita. But it is apparent from ancient writers that the name Adria was not, in its ancient acceptance, limited to the present Adriatic Sea, but comprehended the seas of Greece and Sicily, and extended even to Africa. This seems to have been established beyond dispute, and every one acquainted with the mass of evidence brought to bear on this point must regard the only strong argument in favor of Meleda as entirely overthrown. Moreover, ample memorials of St. Paul's visit exist in Malta. There is, perhaps, no piece of land of the same extent in the world which is made to contain reference so diversified and so numerous to any one person as this island to St. Paul, who is, in fact, the tutelary saint of the island. These appropriations of Pauline memorials may in detail be open to dispute, or may possibly all be erroneous, but they serve in the mass to indicate a current of opinion which may be traced back to a remote source in ancient times.

The name of St. Paul's Bay has been given to the place where the shipwreck is supposed to have taken place. This, the sacred historian says, was at "a certain creek with a shore"—i. e., a seemingly practicable shore—on which they purposed, if possible, to strand the vessel, as their only apparent chance to escape being broken on the rocks. In attempting this the ship seems to have struck and gone to pieces on the rocky headland at the entrance of the creek. This agrees very well with St. Paul's Bay—more so than with any other creek of the island. This bay is a deep inlet on the north side of the island, being the last indentation of the coast but one from the western extremity of the island. It is about two miles deep by one mile broad. The harbor which it forms is very unsafe at some distance from the shore, although there is good anchorage in the middle for light vessels. The most dangerous part is the western headland at the entrance of the bay, where the currents and shoals are particularly dangerous in stormy weather. It is usually supposed that the vessel struck at this point. From this place the ancient capital of Malta (now Citta Vecchia, Old City) is distinctly seen at the distance of about five miles; and on looking toward the bay from the top of the church on the summit of the hill whereon the city stands, it is very evident that the people of the town might easily from this spot have perceived in the morning that a wreck had taken place; and this is a circumstance which throws a fresh light on some of the circumstances of the deeply interesting transactions which ensued.

The sacred historian calls the inhabitants "barbarians"—"the barbarous people showed us no small kindness." This is far from implying that they were savages or uncivilized men; it merely intimates that they were not of Greek or Roman origin. This description applies to the ancient inhabitants of Malta most accurately; and as it could not apply to the inhabitants of Melida, who were Greeks, this is another argument to show that not Melida, but Malta, is the Melita of Scripture.

Malta lies to the south of Sicily, from the nearest point of which it is fifty-eight miles distant. Its greatest length is seventeen and one quarter miles; its greatest breadth, nine and one quarter. There are some other small islands in the group, of which Gozo is the largest. Valetta is the seat of government. Malta was colonized by the Phœnicians, and afterward by the Greeks. The Carthaginians obtained possession of it in 402 B. C., and the Romans in 242 B. C. In modern times it passed to the emperor Charles V., who in 1530 A. D. granted it in full sovereignty to the knights of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, lately expelled from Rhodes. They kept it till 1798, when it was surrendered to the French. The English obtained possession of it in 1800, and held it in military possession till 1814, when it was formally acknowledged a British dependency.

MELITO (mel'-e-to), bishop of Sardis, flourished about A. D. 160-172. He was author of many works, now known only by their titles and a fragment or two preserved by other writers. His "Catalogue of the Books of the Old Testament," however, is extant, and is the earliest list of them found in Christian literature. Melito addressed an "Apology for the Christians" to the emperor Marcus Aurelius on occasion of their persecution under his edict.

MELROSE (mel'rōz) ABBAY. This abbey and Dryburgh, only five miles distant, and both in ruins, were among the most famous of all the ecclesiastical edifices in Scotland. Melrose was founded in 1136 by David I. of Scotland, and Dryburgh dates from 1150. They are both situated in localities of great historical interest and of surpassing beauty. Melrose was founded for monks of the Cistercian order, who were brought from the abbey of Rievaulx in Yorkshire. It was destroyed by the English under Edward II. in their retreat in 1322, but four years afterward it was rebuilt. At the time of the Reformation it suffered severely. The style of the architecture is exceedingly beautiful, resembling the features which prevail in Exeter and York cathedrals. The stone is so hard that much of the ornamental work remains in its original sharpness. The church was built in the form of a Latin cross, with a square tower in the centre eighty-four feet high. The eastern portion, shown in the illustration, and parts of the southern side, are best preserved. In the centre of the choir a small stone indicates the spot where the heart of King Robert Bruce was buried, while the tombs of Alexander II. and James, earl of Douglas, the hero of Otterburn, are on either side.

MELTON (mel'tun), who was a celebrated archbishop of York, became very distinguished in consequence of his successful efforts to re-edify the great church of Ripon, now the cathedral. In 1317 the town of Ripon and the church were burned by the Scots, and Melton at once undertook the restoration of the sacred edifice. He extended the new building eastward to twice its former length, and its perfection and splendor of style are greatly owing to the purity of taste of its builder. It is far superior to all the Welsh churches, and even Carlisle, Chester, Oxford, Bristol, Rochester and Chichester are all inferior, while it vies with those of Hereford, Exeter and Worcester. The west front is superior to all English churches except those of York, Lincoln, Peterborough, Salisbury and Wells. The style of the windows shows that alterations had taken place as architecture progressed in the country; for while the Early English prevails in the western entrance, the east window of the choir is decorated, and has six lights. The south transept, as well as the windows of the nave, is decorated, but no record remains of the dates of the changes or of the men by whom they were made. Dr. Longley became the first bishop of Ripon; he was appointed to the see on its erection, in 1836. The cathedral is two hundred and sixty-six feet long internally, the choir being one hundred and one feet; the nave is eighty-seven feet wide and eighty-nine feet high, while the choir is sixty-seven feet by seventy-nine feet high; the transept extends one hundred and thirty-two feet, while the central tower and the two towers at the angles of the west front are each about one hundred and ten feet high. The cloisters have been destroyed, and the chapter-house is really a small chapel on the south side of the choir.

MELVILLE (mel'vil), ANDREW, a learned Scottish professor and promoter of the Reformation, was born in 1545, and after studying at St. Andrews five years, completed his education at Paris and Poitiers. He next lived at Geneva, where he held the chair of humanity, and enjoyed the friendship of Beza and other leading Reformers. Returning to Scotland in 1574, he was chosen principal of Glasgow College, and rendered important services to the cause of education and literature, both by his noble enthusiasm and personal influence and by the reforms he introduced. After six years he was called to St. Andrew's to fill the office of principal of St. Mary's College. He distinguished himself by his zeal and courage in opposing the arbitrary measures of the court and in promoting the establishment of the Presbyterian form of Church government, and in 1582 was prosecuted and imprisoned. He escaped, however, and for a time took refuge in England, resuming his professorship in 1585, and pursuing the same course in public affairs as before. James I. called him to London the year after his accession to the throne, and in 1607 he was imprisoned by a sentence of the privy council. After several years' confinement, he went abroad, and accepted a chair in the university of Sedan, where he died in 1622.

MELZAR (mel'zar). The word appears as a proper name, denoting the person who was charged with the oversight of the young Israelitish captives in the palace of Babylon, Dan. i. 11, 16. But as the article is in each case prefixed to it, there can be little doubt that it ought to be translated and read as it is in the margin, "the steward."

MEMMIUS (mem'me-us), 2 Macc. xi. 34, a person called a Roman ambassador, who is said, with Manlius, to have written a letter to the Jews.

MEMNON (mem'nōn), in Greek mythology, was a fabulous king of Ethiopia, son of the goddess Aurora, who is said to have assisted the Trojans in the siege of Troy, and to have been slain by Achilles. Several Egyptian kings of this name are mentioned by Greek writers. The name is supposed to be a general appellation borrowed from the Egyptian language (Mei-amun, "beloved of Ammon"), and erroneously applied by them to different individuals. The famous statue called by the Greeks Memnon, at Thebes, in Upper Egypt, which possessed the real or imaginary property of emitting a sound like that of a harp at the rising of the sun, is supposed to have been in the building called the Rhamesseion, from its founder Rhameses or Sesostris. The statue of black granite, in the British Museum, styled the brother of the younger Memnon, was found in the Rhamesseion. The real Memnonium was, however, probably the temple erected by Amenoph, or Amenothph.

MEMPHIS (mem'fis), a very ancient and celebrated city of Egypt. It lay just at the northern end of the narrow Nile valley, on the western bank of the river. According to the tradition, Menes the founder, obtained a site for his city by damming up a branch of the Nile and restraining the water to a new channel which he dug. Memphis as surrounded with mounds and embankments to protect it against the inundations of the river; and these served also for security against hostile attacks. It would seem to have been the capital of those Pharaohs who reigned in Lower Egypt in the times of the patriarchs, and it was their territory in which Abraham, Jacob and the Israelitish tribes sojourned. Under Psammetichus this city became the metropolis of the whole of Egypt, and grew and flourished as the southern Thebes declined. Under Persian rule and the government of the Ptolemies, Memphis continued the chief city, but the foundation of Alexandria was fatal to its prosperity. Even in Strabo's time, though still large and populous, many of its great buildings were falling into decay; and when at length Cairo rose in its neighborhood, Memphis rapidly declined, and its site is now only marked by ruins near the village of Minyet Rahinah, or Mitrahenev. In the time of its prosperity Memphis must have been a noble city, one hundred and fifty stadia in circuit. Among its noticeable buildings was a famous temple of Phtah (corresponding to the classical Vulcan); and Apis is said to have been specially honored here. His temple, also, was one of the most noted structures of the city. There was besides a temple of Serapis, in which the sacred cubit and other symbols used for measuring the inundations of the river were kept. Memphis was a busy city. Various manufactures were successfully carried on here. That of glass was particularly celebrated. From the acacia trees in the neighborhood planks and masts of boats, and various articles for many uses, were constructed.

MEMUCAN (mem'u-kan), one of the princes of the court of Ahasuerus, Esth. i. 14, 16, 21.

MENAHM (men'a-hem), the son of Gadi, who, having slain Shallum, king of Israel, reigned in his stead ten years, 771-760 B. C. He was an impious and cruel king. In his reign Pul, king of Assyria, came against the land; but Menahem obtained his protection by the payment of a thousand talents of silver, 2 Ki. xv. 14-22.

MENANDRIANS (me-nan'dre-anz), followers of Menander, a disciple of Simon Magus, who added one of his own heresies to those of his master. In his reign Pul, king of Assyria, came against the land; but Menahem obtained his protection by the payment of a thousand talents of silver, 2 Ki. xv. 14-22. Menander belonged to the Asiatic school of Gnostics, and on some points differed from the Alexandrian and Syrian schools. Platonism prevailed among the Asiatics, and on some points differed from the Alexandrian and Syrian schools. MENDÆANS (men-de'aniz), a name of the Christians of St. John the Baptist who still remain in Bassora, a city lying between Arabia and Persia. They are also called "Disciples of St. John" and "Hemerobaptists," from their frequent washing.

MENDELSSOHN (men'dels-sōn), MOSES, celebrated Jewish philosopher, commonly called the "Socrates of the Jews," was born September 1729. His early life was spent amid circumstances of extreme penury, approaching at times the verge of destitution; but in spite of these he prosecuted with dauntless perseverance his literary and philosophical studies, first at Dessau and afterward at Berlin. At length, however, a Jewish merchant employed him to educate his children. Being thus relieved from want, he devoted himself more than ever to the acquisition of learning, and though only one-and-twenty, began publishing a weekly periodical in Hebrew, entitled "A Collection of Ethics." The philosophical works which he now published spread his fame over Europe, and secured for him the friendship of eminent literary men, who were constantly corresponding with him about philosophical, archaeological, religious and Biblical subjects, and who solicited his aid in literary enterprises. Had it not been for his religion, Mendelssohn might have won far greater laurels, but he refused to become a Christian, and did much for the benefit of the Jews. The influence which this famous philosopher and Hebraist exercised over the Jewish nation is incalculable. He effected a reformation in MENI (me'ne). This word does not occur in our English Bible, but there is a passage in Isaiah where, instead of being translated, it probably ought to be retained without alteration: "But ye are they that forsake Jehovah, that forget my holy mountain, that prepare a table for that troop, and that furnish the drink-offering for that number"—more literally and properly thus: "prepare a table for Gad, and fill a mingled draught for Meni," Isa. lxv. 11. There can be no doubt, that in both these clauses idolatrous practices are referred to, though there is a great diversity of opinion as to the proper identification of the two principal names, Gad and Meni. By a considerable number Meni is understood to be the planet Venus (identical with Ashtoreth), and Gad with Jupiter (the Sidonian Baal); while these, again, are associated in the Arabian astrology with fortune or fate in the sense of good luck. On the whole, it must be confessed no certain light has yet been Judaism, and founded in Berlin that new school of Hebrew literature and Biblical exegesis which has now produced so many and such distinguished Jewish literati, not only in Germany, but throughout Europe. His principal work is "Phadæ," a discourse on immortality. He died January 4, 1786.

MENDICANT ORDERS. See MONKS.

MENE (me'ne), the first word in the mysterious inscription which the king of Babylon, in the midst of his revelries, saw written by a hand on the wall, Dan. v. 25. It signifies "numbered," and was interpreted by Daniel to mean, "God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it"—the double mene apparently indicating the completeness and certainty of the act.

MENELAUS (men-e-la'us), 2 Macc. iv. 23-50, an usurping high-priest, who purchased the dignity from Antiochus Epiphanes, 172 B. C., but was ultimately put to death by Antiochus Eupator.

thrown upon the precise idol-power indicated either by Meni or by Gad. The different opinions entertained by commentators can only be regarded as more or less probable conjectures; but that respect was had in the terms to one or other of the heavenly bodies seems to have been the prevailing conviction from ancient times, and there is no reason for disturbing it.

MENNO (mèn'no), SIMONIS, was the reorganizer, and under God the reformer, of the denomination which took his name. (See the following article.) He was born in 1496, became a Catholic priest, was converted and became an eminently successful leader and preacher among the Dutch Reformers. No man has been more shamelessly maligned, not only by papists but by unjust Protestant writers. His theological views were evangelical, his piety earnest; he was a man of genius and sound judgment. He possessed a natural and persuasive eloquence. He appears, moreover, to have been a man of probity, of a meek and tractable spirit, gentle in his manners, affable in his commerce with persons of all ranks and characters, and extremely zealous in promoting practical religion and virtue, which he recommended by his example as well as by his precepts. He died in 1561, in the duchy of Holstein.

MENNONITES (men'non-ites), or DUTCH BAPTISTS. Notwithstanding the fact that many churches of this name have lapsed from the earlier rule of baptizing only by immersion, yet, as founded by Menno Simons, the body was Baptist in the strongest sense. Menno himself spoke and wrote in terms not to be misunderstood; witness one sentence, like which his writings contain many: "After we have searched ever so diligently, we shall find no other baptism but dipping in water, which is acceptable to God and approved in his word." Besides, the entire Church rigidly adheres to the Baptist views of the proper subjects of the ordinance. They reject infant baptism, and refuse to commune at the Lord's table with any who administer the ordinance to children or with those who have been baptized without previous testimony of repentance and faith.

THE DORMOUSE.—See MICE.

An "Account of the Origin of the Dutch Baptists," published at Breda, in 1819, by two learned ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church, says:

"The Mennonites are descended from the tolerably pure evangelical Waldenses, who were driven by persecution into various countries, and who during the latter part of the twelfth century fled into Flanders, and into the provinces of Holland and Zealand, where they lived simple and exemplary lives, in the villages as farmers, in the towns by trades, free from the charge of any gross immoralities, and professing the most pure and simple principles, which they exemplified in a holy conversation.

"There were then two sects among them, the one distinguished by the name of the Perfect (who held to a community of goods), and the other the Imperfect. By far the greater part of the first sect, and the whole of the second, were certainly among the most pious Christians the Church ever saw and the worthiest citizens the State ever had. History removes every doubt on this subject.

"In the year 1536 their scattered community obtained a regular state of Church order, separate from all Dutch and German Protestants, who at that time had not been formed into one body by any bonds of unity. This advantage was procured them by the sensible management of a Friesland Protestant, Menno Simons, who had formerly been a pish priest. This learned, wise and prudent man was chosen by them as their leader that they might by his paternal efforts, in the eyes of all Christendom, be cleared from the blame which some of them had incurred. This object was accomplished accordingly; some of the perfectionists he reclaimed to order, and others he excluded. He purified also the religious doctrines of the Baptists."

In the matter of government the Mennonites appear to form one undivided Christian body. Associations are held at different times similar to those in England and the United States, though some churches, as among the English and American Baptists, decline union with any association. Divine worship is conducted as among the other churches of the Reformed. They have preaching only once on the Sabbath, and the ministers are chosen in some places by the congregation and in others by the elders and deacons. In their private meetings every one has the liberty to speak, to expound the Scriptures and to pray. They assemble (or used to do so) twice every year, from all parts of Holland, at Rynsbouurg, a village two leagues from Leyden, at which time they partake of the Lord's Supper, sitting at a table.

Their "Confession of Faith" shows them to be in accord with evangelical Christians of other names on the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith. They maintain that practical piety is the essence of religion, and that the surest mark of the true Church is the sanctity of its members. They plead for universal tolerance in religion, and debar none from their societies who lead pious lives and own the Scriptures for the word of God, only insisting that those who have not been baptized on confession of repentance and faith shall make such confession and then receive the ordinance. They are utterly averse to oaths and war, and to capital punishments, as contrary to the spirit of the Christian dispensation. They do not permit their ministers to receive any salary or grants of any sort from the civil government. They have a college at Amsterdam, established a century ago, that is liberally supported and maintains a high rank.

In the United States there are a large number of Mennonites, and they are noted here, as in Holland, for their piety and the simplicity of their lives. They adhere in the main to the forms and views of their ancestors.

MEN-STEALER (men-steel'er). Kidnaping or reducing men to slavery, was strictly forbidden by the Mosaic law, Ex. xxi. 16. See SERVANT.

MENUCHA (me-noo'ka), Jer. li. 59, margin. See SERAIAM.

MENUCHAH (me-noo'kah), "rest," Jud. xx. 43, margin. The meaning is substantially that given in the text, quietly, without tumult.

MENUCHITES (me-noo'kites), 1 Chr. ii. 52, margin. See HATSI-HAMMENCHOTH, MANAHE-THITES.

MEONENIM (me-o-ne'nim). This word occurs as a proper name in our version of Jud. ix. 37; in the margin, however, it is translated. It might be more justly rendered "the oak of the diviners," probably some tree under or in connection with which divination had been practiced.

MEONOTHAI (me o-no'thi), one of the descendants of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 14.

MEPHAATH (me-pha'ath), a city in the territory of Reuben, Josh. xiii. 18, afterward assigned to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 37. It was at a later period in the possession of the Moabites, Jer. xlvi. 18.

MEPHIBOSHETH (me-fib'o-sheth). 1. Son of Jonathan, called also Merib-baal, 1 Chr. viii. 34; ix. 40. He was five years old at the time of the catastrophe of Gilboa, when his nurse fled away with him, but stumbled, and caused him thereby an incurable lameness. After some years David, finding that Jonathan's son yet lived, restored to him the family possessions and granted Mephibosheth a constant place at the royal table. On Absalom's rebellion, Mephibosheth remained at Jerusalem, and, according to his servant Ziba's statement, hoped that the convulsions of the time might pave the way for his accession to the throne. David, therefore, instantly confiscated his estate. But on the king's return to Jerusalem, Mephibosheth met him with marks of mourning, which declared he had shown throughout the rebellion, and said that Ziba's accusation was untrue. It is evident, however, that David was not altogether satisfied; for, though he revoked the decree of confiscation, he made Mephibosheth and Ziba equal shareholders in the estates, 2 Sam. iv. 4; ix. xvi. 1-4. 2. One of the sons of Saul by his concubine Rizpah, delivered by David into the hands of the Gibeonites, and hanged by them, 2 Sam. xvi. 8, 9.

MERAB (me'rab), the eldest daughter of Saul, 1 Sam. xiv. 49, promised to David, but given to Adriel in marriage, 1 Sam. xviii. 17, 19.

MERAIAM (me-ri'ah), a priest in the days of Joiakim, Neh. xii. 12.

MERAIOTH (me-ri'oth). 1, 2. Two priests in the line of Eleazar, 1 Chr. vi. 6; ix. 11. One of those priests who went to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, 1 Chr. xii. 15; he is called also Meremoth.

MERAN (me'ran), Bar. iii. 23, some count it is uncertain what, through or from which caravans of merchants passed.

MERARI (me'ra-re), youngest son of Levi, born in Canaan, Gen. xli. 11. He is only known from his name having been given to one of the three great divisions of the Levitical tribe.

MERARI, Judith viii. 1, the father of Judith.

MERARITES (me-rar'ites), a family of Levi, descendants of Merari, Num. xxvi. 57. When the census was taken in the wilderness, the number of their males above a month old was six thousand two hundred; of those between thirty and fifty three thousand two hundred, Num. iii. 34; iv. 4. They were divided into two great families, the Mahlites and the Mushites, Num. iii. 33, and they were to pitch on the north side of the tabernacle. Ethan, or Jeduthun, was an eminent Merarite. To this family was entrusted the care of the boards, bars, pillars of the tabernacle and the appurtenances, with the pillars, sockets, pins and cords of the surrounding court, Num. iii. 33-34; iv. 29-33; vii. 8. When Israel entered Canaan twelve cities in the territories of Reuben, Gad and Zebulun were allotted to the sons of Merari, Josh. xxi. 7, 34-39, there being, however, some variation in the accounts.

MERATHAIM (me-ra-tha'im), the dual of Marah, and signifying "the two rebellions," or repeated rebellions, applied by the prophet Jeremiah to Babylon, ch. l. 21, on account, no doubt, of its proud and God-defying spirit, which was ever manifesting itself in hostile deeds, and which, therefore, as the prophet declares, must draw down the severest measures of divine vengeance.

MERCATOR (mer-ka'tor), MARIUS, an ecclesiastical and controversial writer in the fifth century, the friend of Saint Augustine. Some maintain that he was an Italian, while others say that he was an African. He wrote against the Pelagians and Nestorians, commencing his polemical career in 418 and continuing it till about 451. Many of his writings are translations from the Greek into Latin, with prefaces by Mercator, of considerable use in the study of ecclesiastical history.

MERCER (mer'ser), JESSE, was born in North Carolina in 1769. He entered the Baptist Church, was ordained as minister in 1789, and took charge of a church in Wilkes county, Georgia. He was an excellent and powerful preacher and a liberal, kind man. He composed a volume of hymns, which are still in use, and to the university which was founded at Penfield, Georgia, and which was named after him, he left the sum of sixty thousand dollars. He died in 1841.

MERCER, JOHN, a learned Hebrew critic of the sixteenth century, was born at Uzes, in Languedoc. He studied law at Toulouse and Avignon. Philology, however, and Biblical literature had stronger charms for him than legal studies, and he soon relinquished the latter for his favorite pursuit. He made an astonishing proficiency in the belles-lettres, and in the Latin, Greek, Hebrew and Chaldee languages. In the last two especially he was so profoundly skilled that, in 1546, he was appointed to the Hebrew chair in the Royal College at Paris. In this department he acquitted himself with the highest reputation, and his lectures were so famous that the royal auditory was always full when he read. The Jews went to hear him, and owned that he understood Hebrew best of any man of that age. He had been brought up in the Romish religion; but in consequence of his maturer inquiries, he was led to embrace the Protestant faith. During the civil wars in France he retired to Venice; and returning with a design to publish the learned works which he had composed, he died at Uzes in 1572. His works consist chiefly of commentaries on the books of the Old Testament, drawn from the writings of the Jewish literati.

MERCHANT. See COMMERCE.

MERCURY (mer'keu-re), the name of one of the heathen gods, called Mercurius by the Romans and Hermes by the Greeks. He was the son of Jupiter and Maia, and acted as the messenger of the gods. Part of his duty was to conduct the souls of the departed to Hades. He presided over eloquence, profit, good fortune and theft, in which he was himself so great a proficient, that on the day of his birth he stole fifty kine from the flocks of Apollo, whom he repaid by the invention of the lyre. He stole the trident of Neptune, the girdle of Venus, the sword of Mars, the sceptre of Jupiter and the various implements of art used by Vulcan. Mercury was represented as a youth lightly clad, with the "petasus" or winged hat, and wings at his heels. In his hand he bears the emblem of his herald's office, the "caduceus," a rod with two serpents twined about it. By means of his winged cap and sandals he could go into any part of the universe he pleased, and he could become invisible or assume any shape. The more ancient statues of Mercury were square blocks of stone with a rudely carved head on them. They were set up in great numbers in the streets of Athens. Barnabas and Paul were taken by the people at Lystra for Jupiter and Mercury, Acts xiv. 11-13. Ovid has a story of these two deities wandering in the adjacent country of Phrygia.

MERCY (mer'se), a blessed attribute of God, which he wonderfully showed in not permitting man's fall to be irrevocably fatal, but devising a means whereby, without violence to his justice, sinners might be forgiven, Ex. xx. 6; xxxiv. 6, 7. To accomplish this the great work of redemption was effected by the Lord Jesus Christ. It is in Christ that mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace embrace each other; and mercy is now extended to guilty men who approach God through faith in Jesus. There is no limitation. The blood of Jesus Christ can cleanse from all sin, 1 John i. 7. Mercy also is a Christian grace, which Christ's followers must cultivate, Matt. v. 7.

MERCY, SISTERS OF THE ORDER OF. This order was founded at Dublin, in 1831, by Catherine McAuley, for the care of the sick and the instruction of poor children. The order was recognized and confirmed by the pope in 1841. A black habit and a black veil are worn, and the rules of the Augustinians, with some modifications from the Presentation order, are adopted.

Another order of the same name was founded in 1823 by P. Bazin, the vicar-general of the diocese of Seez, for the purpose of nursing the sick at their own houses. This order was confirmed by the pope in 1839. The members are bound to nurse the sick in any disease whatsoever. The habit is black, black veil, white cap, and a crucifix on the breast.

MERCY-SEAT, the piece of sacred furniture which formed the lid of the ark of the covenant, and on which the high-priest once every year sprinkled the blood of atonement. Its proper nature and design can only be understood by being viewed in connection with the other parts of the tabernacle, especially those belonging to the most holy place.

MERED (me'red), a descendant of Judah who married (at what date we know not) Bithiah, Pharaoh's daughter, 1 Chr. iv. 17, 18.

MEREMOTH (mer'e-moth). 1. A priest after the captivity, Ezra viii. 33, who helped in repairing the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 4, 21. 2. One who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 36.

3. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel, whose descendant or representative sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 5; xii. 3; he is called Meraioth in Neh. xii. 15. 4. 1 Esd. viii. 2, identical with Meraioth, Ezra vii. 3.

MERIBAH (mer'e-bah). 1. One of the names given by Moses to the place where a fountain of water issued from the rock. This was in the desert of Sin; and the place was called Massah because the people tempted the Lord; and Meribah because they strove with Moses, Ex. xvii. 1-7. 2. Another place near Kadesh where, many years after, water was also miraculously produced, named for a similar reason. This was in the desert of Zin, Num. xx. 13, 24. It was on this last occasion that Moses and Aaron were guilty of the fault for which they were excluded from Canaan. In order to distinguish the two, the last-named place is generally called the "water" or "waters of Meribah," Deut. xxxii. 51. In Ps. xcvi. 8 the word is translated "provocation," and Massah "temptation."

MERIB-BAAL. See MEPHIBOSHETH.

MERLIN (mer'lin), JAMES, a learned French priest of the sixteenth century, was a native of Limoges, and studied at the university of Paris. He was rector of the parish of Montmartre, and canon of Notre Dame at Paris. He used so much freedom in declaiming against the Reformed religion, and against the courtiers who were supposed to be favorable to it, that Francis I. caused him to be arrested and imprisoned in the castle of Louvre in 1527. He was released, but banished to Nantes, whence he was permitted to return in 1530, and was made vicar-general to the archbishop of Paris. He died in 1541. He published "A Collection of the Councils," and was the first who ventured to defend Origen when publishing his works, which he did in an apology prefixed to them.

Mars, to which, as being the god of blood and slaughter, human sacrifices were offered. The honor in which this deity was held is illustrated by the fact that the names of several Assyrian and Babylonian monarchs were compounded with Merodach, as Merodach-baladan, Evil-merodach, mentioned in Scripture. The names Bel, or Bil, and Merodach are sometimes coupled as denoting a single god, who appears to have been worshiped sometimes under one title, sometimes, with perhaps a difference of attributes, under the other. Rawlinson believes that Bel-merodach corresponds to the Greek Zeus, or Jupiter, the great source of power and blessing, and also identifies him astronomically with the planet Jupiter.

MERODACH-BALADAN (bal'a-dan), a king of Babylon who sent ambassadors to Hezekiah after his sickness to inquire of the wonder (the shadow receding on the dial) that had been done, 2 Chr. xxxii. 31. In 2 Ki. xx. 12 the name is Berodach-baladan. This king appears to have been the Mardocempalus of Ptolemy. He reigned from 721 B. C. for twelve years, and then was dethroned and banished by Sargon. In about seven years he obtained power again, and reigned for six months, but was dethroned by Sennacherib. His sons and grandsons made head against the Assyrian supremacy down to the time of Esar-haddon.

THE HAMSTER.—See MICE.

MEROM (me'rom), WATERS OF, the place where Joshua attacked and defeated the confederate princes of Northern Palestine who had been collected by Jabin, king of Hazor, Josh. xi. 5, 7. It is only mentioned in the one passage of Scripture, and no clear indication is given of its geographical position. The name would seem to indicate some elevated position. It must have been in the North of Palestine, and not far distant from Hazor, for after Joshua had pursued the routed Canaanites to Zidon, it is said "he turned back and took Hazor," vers. 8, 10. It is somewhat remarkable that Josephus, in giving an account of this great battle, states that the scene of it was "Beroth, a city of Upper Galilee, not far from Kadesh," and he does not mention the Waters of Merom.

Most geographers identify the Waters of Merom with the lake Samochonitis, now called el-Hüleh. The words of Josephus seem to indicate it. He describes the city of Hazor as situated "over the lake Samochonitis;" and Hazor, as has been seen, must have been at or near the Waters of Merom. The Hebrew word here translated "waters" is employed in a great variety of meanings in Scripture. It signifies either a fountain, river, tank, lake or sea, and may therefore be given appropriately to the lake Samochonitis. There is besides no other collection of waters in Northern Palestine answering to the notices of Merom in the book of Joshua; and it may also be added that the shores of this lake form the only ground near the site of Hazor where war-chariots could be used with any effect against an enemy. It may, therefore, be safely admitted that "the Waters of Merom" are identical with the Samochonitis of Josephus and the modern Bahret el Hüleh.

"The Waters of Merom," or Lake Hüleh, is a sheet of water triangular in form, its apex pointing southward to the place where the Jordan issues from it. Its length is about four and a half miles and its breadth three and a half, but it is subject to periodical variations in extent, owing to the fall of rain and the melting of the snow on the neighboring mountains. It occupies the southern end of a plain or large basin fifteen miles long by five wide. Around the lake is a broad margin of marshy ground, which extends several miles to the northward along the banks of the streams, and is covered with dense jungles of canes, the home of wild swine and buffaloes.

The lake is fed by numerous streams and fountains. The largest is the Jordan, which falls in near the north-eastern angle, and is made up of the united streams from Dan, Baniás and Hasbeiya. West of the Jordan is the stream from Merj 'Ayún, the Ijon of Scripture. At the foot of the mountains of Naphtali, on the western side, are several large fountains, whose waters flow into the lake.

MERONOTHITE (me-ro-nóth'ite), a designation given to Jehdeiah and Jadon, 1 Chr. xxvii. 30; it is not known whence derived.

MEROZ (me'roz), a place in the North of Palestine whose inhabitants refused to join Barak against the host of Sisera, Jud. v. 23. It has not been identified.

MERRICK (mer'rik), JAMES, an English divine and poet, whom Lowth calls one of the best of men and most eminent of scholars, was born in 1720, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He entered into orders, but seldom preached, being subject to acute pains in his head and frequent debility. He died at Reading in 1769. He was the author of numerous prose works and poems, among which are "A Metrical Version of the Psalms" and "Messiah, a Divine Essay."

MERRILL (mer'ril), DAVID, was a Presbyterian minister at Urbana, Ohio, from 1827 until 1841, whence he removed to Peacham, Vermont. He was educated at Dartmouth College. He was a powerful writer in leading journals and the author of "Sermons" which were published after his death. He died July 21, 1850, in the fifty-second year of his age.

MERRILL, THOMAS ABBOTT, a Congregational clergyman, born in 1780, at Andover, and educated at Middlebury College. He was a tutor at Dartmouth and Middlebury colleges, and from 1805 until his death he was pastor of the church at Middlebury. He was a most powerful preacher, and his ministry produced great awakenings, and he was favored with several revivals. For forty-nine years he was a member of the corporation of Middlebury College. He published sermons and a "History of Middlebury," where he died in 1855.

MERRIT (mer'it), TIMOTHY, was born in 1755, at Barkhamstead, Connecticut. In 1796 he became a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He acted as editor in Boston of "Zion's Herald;" and having removed to New York, he took charge of "The Christian Advocate and Journal." He was the author of "The Christian's Manual," "The Convert's Guide and Preacher's Assistant," a work on "Universal Salvation" and a "Memoir of Miss S. H. Bunting." He died in 1845, at Lynn, Massachusetts.

MERTON (mer'tun), WALTER OF, a learned and munificent prelate of the thirteenth century, and founder of the very eminent college which bears his name at Oxford, was born at Merton, in Surrey, and educated at the convent of that place. After obtaining several preferments, he became lord-chancellor in 1258, was deprived of the seal the same year by the barons, but had it restored to him in 1261, and in 1274 was consecrated bishop of Rochester. Walter of Merton founded a hospital at Basingstoke for poor travelers and decayed ministers, and in this foundation he took always a warm interest. His college at Oxford was founded in 1264, and became the archetype, so far as architectural and social arrangements were concerned, of all colleges subsequently founded. Its great distinctive feature was that it was a "literary," not a sacerdotal, institution. The students were not to be monks. He died in 1277.

MERUTH (me'ruth), 1 Esd. v. 24, identical with Immer, Ezra ii. 37.

MESECH (me'sek), or MESHECH (me'shek), the sixth son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2, and the progenitor of a race who bore his name. This race or people are always mentioned in connections which indicate their remote and somewhat outlandish character. The Psalmist bewails his condition as an exile in language borrowed from Mesech on the one side and Kedar on the other: "Woe is me that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar," Ps. cxx. 5; not as being literally in both (which had been impossible, as they lay in opposite directions), or perhaps in either, but his state was all one as if he were located in such distant and barbarous regions. The only other inspired writer who mentions them is Ezekiel, and by him they are always associated with Tubal, as if by position or otherwise the two were most closely allied, ch. xxvii. 13; xxxii. 26; xxxix. 1. The opinions of the learned are not altogether agreed upon the subject, but the great majority identify Mesech with the Moschi, a warlike people dwelling in the mountainous district which lies between Armenia, Iberia and Colchis. The region bore the name of the Moschian mountains, and was every way suited to the habits and character of a hardy, resolute and warlike race, such as the ancient Moschi appear to have been. In the first centuries, however, of Christianity, the gospel found an entrance among them, and doubtless had some effect in softening and civilizing the manners of the people.

MESENGUY (mā-zong-ge'), FRANCIS PHILIP, a French abbé, was born at Beauvais in 1677, and for several years taught the classics and rhetoric at his native place. He was then sent for to Paris, to preside over the rhetorical class in the college of Beauvais, and was made catechist of the pensionaries, for whose use he drew up his "Exposition of Christian Doctrine." He excited the displeasure of the court by his vehement opposition to the constitution Unigenitus, in consequence of which he was obliged to relinquish his situation and withdraw into privacy. He died in 1763. He wrote "History of the Old Testament," "Remarks on the Constitution Unigenitus" and other works.

MESHA (me'shah). 1. The name of the king of Moab who revolted from the ten tribes after the death of Ahab, against whom Jehoshaphat and Jehoram led their united forces. He is noticed as a great sheep-breeder, 2 Ki. iii. 4. 2. The first-born son of Jerahmeel's brother Caleb. He is named "the father of Ziph," 1 Chr. ii. 42. 3. A descendant of Benjamin, apparently born in the land of Moab, 1 Chr. viii. 8, 9.

MESHA, "middle district," a place mentioned as the boundary of the settlements of Joktan's descendants, "from Mesha unto Sephar (and beyond to), the mountains of Arabia," Gen. x. 30. Before the Tigris reaches the Persian Gulf it divides, at the confluence of the Karun (Pasatigris) and the Shat-al-Arab, into two branches, enclosing the island Mesene. This is Mesha, and the boundary extends from the north-western point of the Persian Gulf toward Sephar to the south-west till it reaches that range of peaks, "the mountain of the east," which is known as the mountains of Nejed, intersecting Central Arabia from the vicinity of Mecca and Medina to the Persian Gulf.

MESHACH (me'shak), "guest of the king," the Chaldee name of Mishael, one of the young Jews captive with Daniel in Babylon, Dan. i. 7; ii. 49.

MESHECH (me'shek). See MESSECH.

MESHELEMIAM (me-shel-em'yah), one of the Levite porters, 1 Chr. ix. 21; in 1 Chr. xxvi. 14 he is called Shelemiah.

MESHEZABEEL (me-shez-ab'e-el). 1. The grandfather of one (Meshullam) who repaired the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 4. 2. A person who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 21. 3. A descendant of Judah, Neh. xi. 24, perhaps identical with No. 2.

MESHILLEMITH (me-shil'le-meth), 1 Chr. ix. 12, called also Meshillemoth, Neh. xi. 13.

MESHILLEMOTH (me-shil'le-moth). 1. An Ephraimite, 2 Chr. xxviii. 12. 2. A priest of the course of Immer, Neh. xi. 13, called also, 1 Chr. ix. 12, Meshillemoth.

MESHOBAB (me-sho'bab), a descendant of Simeon, 1 Chr. iv. 34.

MESHULLAM (me-shul'lam), one of the most common names among the ancient Israelites; but though upward of twenty individuals are found to have borne it, not one of them rose to any distinction, and the name occurs only in genealogical registers and lists of persons concerned in public transactions, 1 Chr. iii. 19; v. 13; Ezra viii. 16; x. 15; Neh. iii. 4, 30; vi. 30, and elsewhere.

MESHULLEMETH (me-shul'le-meth), the mother of King Amon, 2 Ki. xxi. 19.

MESOBABTE (me-so-ba'e-te), a designation given to Jasiel, one of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 47; its origin is unknown.

MESOPOTAMIA (me-so-po-ta'me-a), a country of Asia, situated between the 31st and 36th degrees of north latitude, and the 55th and 64th of east longitude. It is bounded on the north-east by the river Tigris, and on the south-west by the Euphrates. From this circumstance it derives its Greek name of Mesopotamia, or between the rivers. Its Hebrew appellation, Aram, Mharaim—Aram amidst the rivers—bears the same testimony to its position, and points out in addition the tribe by which it was first cultivated—viz., Aram, the fourth son of Shem. Mesopotamia is interesting as having been the earliest dwelling-place of mankind after the flood. In it were situated the plains of Shinar, and the northern portion of the district repeated the name of its first possessor in the title Padan-Aram—the fields or plains of Aram. In it were born the chief of the postdiluvian patriarchs down to the sons of Jacob. And at a subsequent period we hear of Balaam the prophet being a native of this country, and of a mighty kingdom established there under Chushan-rishathaim, Num. xxiii. 7. The southern part of Mesopotamia is an arid and sterile country, contrasting remarkably with the rich and luxuriant character of the north. The history of this country after the patriarchal period is very obscure. It was a warlike and populous country in the time of David; for when he found it necessary to resent the insult offered to him by Hanun, king of the Ammonites, 1 Chr. xix., that sovereign sent one thousand talents of silver to hire chariots and horsemen from Mesopotamia and the adjacent countries. A large number both of cavalry and war-chariots was thus obtained. Joab gained over these a decided victory; but further forces having been obtained from beyond the Tigris, another campaign took place, in which David himself commanded and totally routed the force opposed to him. After this we hear no more of Mesopotamia in Scripture till the name occurs in the Acts, Acts ii. 9, as one of the countries whose inhabitants heard in their own tongue the wonderful works of God.

MESSENGER (mes'sen-jer). See FOOTMAN, FORERUNNER.

MESSER (mes'ser), ASA, D.D., LL.D., was born in Methuen, in Massachusetts, in 1769, and educated at Brown University, where he served as tutor in 1791. He became professor of languages in 1796, and of mathematics and moral philosophy in 1799. In 1802 he was made president, and he held this position until 1826. He was licensed to preach in 1792 and ordained in 1801. As a minister he was deservedly held in great esteem by all the members of the Baptist Church, and among all classes of citizens he was recognized as wise, prudent and reliable, and accordingly he was frequently obliged to accept important places of trust. Several of his sermons and orations have been published. He died in 1836.

MESSIAH (mes-si'ah). See JESUS CHRIST.

MESTREZAT (may-tre-zah'), JOHN, a celebrated Protestant minister, born at Geneva in 1592, and educated at the academy of Saumur, where he was offered a professorship in philosophy when only eighteen years of age. In his twenty-second year the church of Charenton chose to retain him in their service as their pastor. He died in 1657. He was the author of "A Treatise on the Church" and "A Treatise on Communion with Jesus Christ in the Sacrament of one Eucharist."

METALS (met'alz). The following are the names of the metals mentioned in the Scriptures—viz., gold, Gen. ii. 11, 12; silver, Ex. xii. 35; iron, Gen. iv. 22; steel, 2 Sam. xxii. 35; brass, Deut. viii. 9; lead, Ex. xv. 10; tin, Num. xxxi. 22. These will be found noticed under their respective heads.

METAMORPHISTS (met-a-morf'ists), a sect in the fifteenth century who held that Christ's natural body, with which he ascended, was wholly deified and lost its humanity. The sect soon died out.

METANGISMONITES (met-an-gis'mon-ites), a sect who affirmed that the second person of the Trinity is in the first as one vessel is in another.

METANOIA (met-a-noi'a), a Greek term which signifies a change of mind, and it is therefore used to signify the mental change in repentance. In Romish theology it is rendered "penance;" but as this word is used to signify not only the change in the mind, but also the suffering of such inflictions as are laid on in the discipline of the Church, a meaning is attached to the Greek word which it does not legitimately bear.

BARBARY MOUSE.—See MICE.

METEMPSYCHOSIS (me-temp'se-ko'sis), a Greek term, compounded of two words, which signifies the migrations of the soul which are supposed by Orientals to take place after death. This was a leading doctrine of one of the most celebrated of all the ancient heathen schools of philosophy. It prevailed in Egypt, but more extensively and permanently in India and the East. So far back as history and tradition go in India, there are evidences that this belief prevailed, and the manners of the people are to a large extent modified by it. The belief rests on the supposition that all beings derive their origin from God, and are placed in this world in a state from which they will rise to a higher or sink to a lower according as they allow the virtuous or the vicious elements of their nature to prevail. Where souls have passed during life through the faithful discharge of religious duties, and where they have not been tainted by vice, the soul goes on to reunion with the Deity, just as a river unites its waters with the water of the parent ocean. Hence, absorption, complete and absolute, is the blessed portion of such, and name, form and person being all lost in the Deity, the individual thus absorbed becomes immortal and filled with eternal joys.

METHEG-AMMAH (meth'eg-am'mah), 2 Sam. viii. 1: "And David took Metheg-Ammah out of the hands of the Philistines." But no place of this name anywhere else occurs as connected either with Israel or with the Philistines, and the corresponding passage in 1 Chr. xviii. 1 simply says that "David smote the Philistines, and subdued them, and took Gath and her towns (daughters) out of the hands of the Philistines." Regarding this passage as explanatory of the other in Kings, Gesenius, Maurer and others translate the latter, "And David took the bridle of the metropolis from the hand of the Philistines," understanding by the metropolis, or mother-city, Gath, which David subdued, and of which, as ruler, he held the reins of government.

METHODIST CHURCH. The reign of Charles II. witnessed the commencement of a marked decline in the fervor of the religious life of the English nation. The influence of the court had been disastrous, and a spirit of formality spread very rapidly over the land. Evangelical truth lost its value to an age that became occupied with the study of the great masters of eloquence among the Greeks and the Romans, and a dry heathen morality began to supplant the gospel in many of the churches of England. The extent to which a heathen spirit had affected the country and the rapidity with which it spread are demonstrated by the facts that, while William III. died in 1702, Anne in 1714 and George I. in 1727, yet when the Wesleys and Whitefield began to preach the gospel the populace listened to their message with an amazement which was only equaled by the contempt and savage treatment which these godly men and their fellow-workers received at the hands of an ignorant and degraded generation. Churchmen were spending their strength in their attempts to crush Dissenters, some of whom had become equally political, while many others had fallen from evangelical views of divine truth. Doctrinal preaching was becoming obsolete, and a dry and utterly ineffective system of morals had taken the place of the great reformation doctrines which in a former age had revolutionized Germany, France and Britain.

The decline of the pulpit and the spread of immorality progressed with equal pace, and among the lower classes a rough and reckless spirit began to prevail. All parts of the land had not yielded to the evil spirit, for in many parishes the candle of the Lord still continued to burn; but as a Luther was needed for Germany in his day, so a great reformer whose presence and whose voice would awaken the land and call the people back to God was the great want of the age when the eighteenth century began to run its course in England. Then, as at all times in the history of the Church, God's hand was not shortened, and the men were prepared and sent forth who shook England out of its spiritual lethargy, who affected Scotland and Ireland, and whose ardent zeal carried them over the ocean to proclaim the message of God's love to colonists in distant lands.

John Wesley was born on the 17th of June, 1703, at Epworth, in Lincolnshire. His father, a learned and earnest man, was the godly vicar of the parish where he labored from 1696 till his death, in 1735. Like many men who have risen to greatness, young Wesley owed much to the example, the training and the warnings of an eminent mother. Her discipline, exact without being severe, told on the formation of his character, and the habits he acquired under her care affected him throughout life. Perhaps he never would have become the great "organizer," the effective "administrator," that the world afterward saw in him, had it not been that his natural gifts were directed and stimulated by the influence of his noble mother. At the early age of ten and a half years, he passed from the obscurity of the vicarage to the stirring scenes of the great Charter-house school in London, where he spent five years, and where amid many trials he acquired a fair share of classical learning. From the Charter-house he passed to Christ Church, the largest and most important of all the colleges of Oxford. Referring to this period, he afterward declared that though he attended prayers, read the Scriptures and other good books, yet he "had not all this while so much as a notion of inward holiness." At the instance of his father and others, he commenced a course of reading on theology and of self-examination; and after much prayer he entered deacon's orders, being ordained in 1725 by Potter, who was then bishop of Oxford. Next year, on the 17th of March, he was elected to a Fellowship in Lincoln College, with which his name has ever since been gratefully associated; and he became curate to his father. Details connected with his fellowship brought him to Oxford again; and as he was already recognized as a young man of learning, he was made a lecturer in Greek and moderator of the classes. He was ordained priest in 1728 by Bishop Potter, and by this time he had become an earnest member of an association of young university men who stately met together for prayer, religious converse and mutual improvement. Their regulations were of the strictest character; their conduct at once made them conspicuous among the residents of the college, and forthwith they were jeeringly spoken of as the godly club, the holy club, the sacramentarians, from their diligent observance of the Lord's Supper; and still further, as they were known to walk according to strict rules and methods in their daily life, they became known as "Methodists." Such references as may be needful to present the reader with a general view of the lives of the saintly men who were thus associated with John Wesley in the great awakening, for which the Lord raised him up and qualified him as a precious instrument, will be found in the memoirs attached to their respective names (see WESLEY, CHARLES; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE; HERVEY, JAMES; INGHAM, BENJAMIN), as the object of this article is rather to describe the organization which, in the providence of God, resulted from the labors of these devoted men, who began in weakness and much darkness to seek their own salvation, and who were afterward honored in doing a work which has extended round the globe.

On the death of his father, his future course seemed to be somewhat clouded. His Oxford friends had left the university, and now he was pressed by Dr. Burton, of Corpus Christi College, to emigrate to Georgia, a young and rising colony, respecting the prosperity of which the governor was greatly exercised. Wesley sailed for Georgia in 1735, but his labors in the colony were not productive of the fruits which he desired. And now, during his absence from England, Whitefield entered on his marvelous career. The thunders of his eloquence, the tenderness of his spirit, the affluence of his rich evangelical matter, flowing from a heart deeply exercised, and the intensity of his powerful appeals produced the most astonishing effects. It was with regret that men learned that he also had resolved to cross the ocean; and when he sailed for Georgia, the ship which brought Wesley home was met in the Downs by that which was conveying Whitefield to the American colonies. During his stay in the colonies, his unwonted power awakened intense enthusiasm, and wherever he went the people seemed to rejoice in the precious gospel which he proclaimed with such unwonted power.

When Wesley returned to England, a combination of circumstances gradually affected his future course. He had commenced his labors as an exceedingly High Churchman, but his missionary zeal carried him from place to place, in a manner which excited the fears of many of his clerical brethren, and his resolution to preach where he could find audiences willing to hear him led him to adopt practices which were not in accord with the order and regularity which prevailed in the parish churches of the land. Thus he became a field preacher, and ere long he had to face a difficulty which he had not hitherto contemplated. Associations and meetings for prayer and spiritual profit had spread apace, and there were no ministers to preside over them, and thus he felt himself obliged to let the work decline, or to set apart a number of men of intelligence, prudence and piety to preside in such meetings, as well as to extend the cause. Still further, when churches were closed against him, it became absolutely necessary, in a climate like that of England, that "meeting-places" should be provided, and thus another step in advance had to be taken, and gradually the work of organization went on.

Differences of judgment between the Wesleys and Whitefield on theological points led to a separation, and the remainder of Whitefield's life was chiefly spent in working in accordance with the doctrinal views of the countess of Huntingdon, who held the tenets of the Calvinistic faith, though Lady Huntingdon and Whitefield never united in their counsels so as to form a communion or a sect under their joint rule or administration, as the churches which she was instrumental in originating were called by her name, and a few of them retain the title even at the present day.

The labors of the Wesleys and the numerous band of zealous workers whom they called into the field were greatly blessed. Methodism extended all over England. Dark and desolate regions were blessed, multitudes were awakened, and ere Wesley died, in 1791, he saw the organization which he had formed firmly established in Great Britain and Ireland, and widely spread in the rising nation of this western land.

It was with great regret that the leaders of the new organization eventually took the step of separating from the Established Church of England, and declaring themselves a distinct Church; their earlier associations and affections held them back, until at length, in 1791, they concluded that the step was unavoidable.

Accordingly, a Book of Discipline was drawn up and adopted, containing the Articles of Faith which were held by the members. With a few modifications, twenty-five of the Articles of the Church of England were adopted, and the other fourteen were set aside. The articles which were retained and approved declare the doctrine of the Trinity, including the Deity of Christ, the Divinity of the Holy Ghost proceeding from the Father and the Son, the Resurrection, the Natural Corruption of Man, the necessity of Divine Grace, Salvation by Faith in the work of Christ, and Good Works as a necessary consequence flowing from Faith, the sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures to teach the way of salvation; two Sacraments only, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, are acknowledged, while certain doctrines are disavowed as contrary to the truth.

On Predestination and Election, the members and ministers of the Methodist Church hold and profess Arminian views. Great importance is attached to the doctrine of the realizing by the believer of the actual forgiveness of sin. "Faith," says Wesley, "is a divine supernatural evidence or conviction of things not seen." Justifying Faith is a "sure trust and confidence that Christ died for my sins, that he loved me and gave himself for me. And the moment a penitent sinner believes this God pardons and absolves him; and as soon as his pardon is witnessed to him by the Holy Ghost he is saved." They hold also that a true Christian may "fall from grace, and at last die in sin and be lost." They insist also with great earnestness on the importance of sanctification, urging men to aim so as by faith to reach such a state as will enable them to love the Lord with all their heart, and so to avoid known sin. On the subject of "perfection," the views of intelligent Methodists have frequently been misunderstood. Mr. Wesley and his followers have held that those who enjoy "perfect love" "are not free from ignorance nor from mistake. We are no more to expect any man to be infallible than to be omniscient. They are not free from infirmities, such as weakness or slowness of understanding, irregular quickness or heaviness of imagination." He held that "there is no perfection of degrees, none which does not admit of continual increase." Methodists are pædobaptists, and they do not decide that it is essential for the subject of the ordinance to be baptized either by sprinkling, pouring or immersing, as they hold that water is to be used, but the quantity or the mode is left indefinite.

The "Class-meeting" has always been an important institution in Methodism. Very early in his experience Wesley saw the necessity of instruction being given to all the members of the body individually, also that by frequent and diligent intercourse all should have a godly oversight exercised toward them, to prevent them from declining or going back again to the world. Accordingly, the system of "Classes" was adopted. A "leader" has a "class" of about twelve or more members placed under his care, and in a weekly meeting for prayer, singing praise to God and religious intercourse, the leader reports his own experience and hears the statements of the others, giving suitable advice and encouragement. At these meetings also the members hand in their contributions for the support of the ministry and for other purposes; thus a spirit of liberality is fostered, and the means of all the church members are brought into the treasury of the church.

Another peculiarity of the system is found in the rule adopted for securing the greatest efficiency of the Ministry. The whole Church is divided into Circuits, and no minister is allowed to preach in the same circuit more than three years in succession. Every minister must be an "Itinerant"—that is, he must remove from church to church for the stipulated term, as the law directs him, and thus the varied talents of all the ministers are brought to bear in process of time over all the Church. Laymen are licensed to act as "Local Preachers," as distinguished from the "Itinerants," or ministers in full standing; and all ministers are required to preach four years, thus giving evidence of their gifts and graces, before they are admitted into full standing in the Conference.

A peculiarity exists in the English Wesleyan body which deserves notice. Since 1784, a large amount of power has been lodged in a number of the ministers who are called the "Legal Hundred." These brethren are elected by the whole Wesleyan Conference, and they are invested with the power of appointing preachers to their circuits, and they also act as trustees to hold "in trust" the chapels and other property which may belong to the Wesleyan body. When a vacancy occurs in the Legal Hundred, the Conference, judging from their knowledge of the brethren, select men to fill such vacancies, due regard being had to age and experience.

It has already been stated that, owing to difference of views on theological points, Wesley and people to hold their public worship at such hours as were most convenient, without being restricted to the intervals appointed for service in the parish church. 2. The right of the people to receive Baptism and the Lord's Supper from their own ministers and in their own places of worship. 3. The right of lay representation in the government of the Church and in the appropriation of funds. 4. The right of the people to have a voice in business meetings, in receiving and expelling members, in choosing local officers and in calling out candidates for the ministry. 2. Whitefield had separated, and consequently the followers of the latter, when they became an organization, adopted a Calvinistic creed.

Questions of Church polity soon led to difference of judgment in the Wesleyan body, and several separations have accordingly taken place, but the matters in dispute have usually been of minor importance, for the same theological views and the same form of administration characterize all these parties, so that all that is necessary here is to state the names of the different organizations. 1. The New Connection was established in 1797, under the leadership of Alexander Kilham, and they have often been denominated "Kilhamites." On their first separation, they were also called "The New Itinerancy." This body was formed by those in the Connection who were discontented because Conference did not grant—1. The right of the worldly spirit had crept into the body, and that greater purity of life and discipline should be displayed; and to secure this end the agency of "revival services" was had recourse to by the promoters of the reform. Lorenzo Dow, an American Methodist who had labored for some time in Ireland, passed over into England and took part in the work. To him is traced the origin in England of the well-known "camp-meetings," the first of which was held at Mole Cop, near Newcastle, in Staffordshire. The Primitive Methodists grew very rapidly. 3. The Association; 4. Bryanites, so called from a local preacher in Cornwall named O'Bryan, who separated from the main body in 1815 and returned to it in 1829. They differ chiefly from their brethren in permitting women to preach, and that their preachers form a smaller proportion of their governing bodies. They have prevailed chiefly in the South-west of England, although there are several congregations in Canada and Australia. 5. Reformers. A dispute about the establishment of the Wesleyan Theological Institution led, under Dr. Samuel Warren, to the formation of this body. Another dispute respecting certain pamphlets, called the "Fly Sheets," led to a division, and the two seceding bodies united in 1857. 6. Bible Christians. A union has taken place between the Reformers and the New Connection, the body thus organized being known as the United Methodist Free Church.

CALVINISTIC OR WELSH METHODISTS.—At an early date the Principality felt the influence of the great revival which the Wesleys, George Whitefield and their fellow-workers had been raised up by the Head of the Church to bring about. Divers causes served to give a peculiar direction to the awakening in Wales. The influence of Lady Huntingdon, who agreed in doctrine with Whitefield, was extensively felt through the country, and the "Methodism" which rapidly spread through Wales assumed a Calvinistic form; and the doctrines then embraced by the awakened population have been held by their descendants until the present day. The direct originator of Welsh Methodism was an Oxford student, a friend of Wesley and of Whitefield, named Howell Harris. He had some property at Trevecca, in Wales, and in 1736 he began to preach. In a few years he had succeeded in inducing a number of devoted ministers to join in his labors, among whom was the eminent Daniel Rowlands. The labors of Harris and Rowlands were greatly blessed, and at present the "Welsh Methodists" are found extensively all over the Principality. Their Confession of Faith, adopted in 1823, is founded on that of the Westminster Confession, with a few modifications. The members are included in two organizations, known as the Tabernacle and the Lady Huntingdon Connections. They differ in a few unimportant points only. The use of the Welsh language has tended to keep them separate from any other body. In faith and government they approximate very closely to the English Presbyterian Church, but the difference of language seems to be a decided obstacle to a union which has often been suggested; besides, the character of their Church offices, such as their leadership and other arrangements with which custom has made them familiar, would seem to oppose an insurmountable barrier to any change. Their administration includes the management of, 1. Private Societies, in which persons assemble who feel an interest in religious subjects, especially in their own salvation. Leaders in these societies give heed to the purity of life and soundness of doctrine of the members. From these meetings matters may be carried to, 2. The Monthly Societies, in which the preachers and leaders of a county attend, to review the condition of the Private Societies of their bounds, and they have special regard, also, to order, life and doctrine. Above these are, 3. The Quarterly Societies, which meet once in each quarter of a year. In these associations the members are supposed to represent the whole body, and the decisions of the meeting are held as final by all the members of the Church. The Denomination has grown rapidly in Wales, and in the United States the immigrants from the Principality have brought along with them a profound attachment to their faith and Church order. In the Western States their churches are organized, and the Denomination is growing in numbers and influence.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.—It has been truthfully affirmed that in England Methodism was a special provision for the religious wants of the nation; and so, when the moving population that left the shores of the Old World for homes in the New began to feel their need of gospel ordinances in a strange land, it became apparent that the mode of spreading the gospel which had been so greatly blessed at home was eminently suitable to the condition and wants of the people in this Western land. The system of itineracy was adapted to the condition of the new and sparsely settled districts; the classes, with their leaders, were calculated to water and cherish the seed that had been sown; and accordingly, when Methodism was introduced into the United States, the members who had settled in the country from England and Ireland hailed the advent of the first laborers with thankfulness, and their ministry, from the outset, was abundantly blessed. In the South-west of Ireland a colony had been planted of the persecuted inhabitants who had fled from the Palatinate. Among them the cause of Methodism had greatly prospered, and it was from this source that American Methodism derived its origin. In 1766 Philip Embury formed a Methodist class in the city of New York. The meetings were held in a small rigging-loft in William street. Two years afterward the John Street Chapel was built, the first meeting-house of the denomination ever erected in this country. The members increased in numbers very rapidly, and in order to meet their wants Mr. Wesley was induced to ordain the Rev. Thomas Coke, D.D., who at the time was a presbyter in the Church of England, as bishop, or "general superintendent of the American societies." Dr. Coke arrived in the United States in 1784; and having summoned the preachers to meet him, they assembled in Baltimore, on the 24th of December. Sixty preachers assembled, and they constituted themselves "The Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States," as a distinct Church. They recognized superintendents, or bishops, elders and deacons; they adopted a "Discipline" and accepted Dr. Coke as bishop. The Rev. Francis Asbury was then elected and ordained as the second bishop. Thus in the year 1784 the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States was organized, with a membership of fourteen thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight, and eighty-three ministers. Few Churches have been more careful in the oversight of their members than the Methodists, and their records, which have been diligently kept, have attested from year to year how signal has been the favor which the Lord has extended to the devoted men who have earnestly served him in this Church.

The American Church is in harmony with the leading features of government and doctrine with the mother Church in Britain. There are bishops, but they are not diocesan, and virtually they are superintendents, doing a great work by their extended and ceaseless oversight of the whole Church. The supreme legislative authority is vested in the General Conference, made up at first of all the traveling Elders in assembly every four years, from the Annual Conferences, but in 1812 it became a delegated body. The General Conference meets once in four years. The subject of lay delegation was a controverted question for many years, but it has now been settled, and by a decided vote, and lay delegates are admitted to the Conference. Under the General Conference are the Annual Conferences, which are increased in number as the Church extends her growth. The Conferences are subdivided into Districts, each having a Presiding Elder, and the Bishop, with the aid of the Presiding Elder, appoints the ministers to their respective charges each year.

The records of the Church show, in the long lists of schools, academies, colleges and theological seminaries, how faithful the Methodist Church has been in the important duty of education, and among all the Churches of Christ none have been more honored in the foreign field. At home the cause of Sabbath-schools and religious publications has been sedulously cared for, and the support which has been extended to the Bible Society and other non-sectarian institutions has attested the catholicity of view and the liberality of spirit which have ever characterized the M. E. Church.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.—In 1845 this body separated from the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Northern States in an amicable manner, in consequence of an inability to harmonize the views of the members in the two sections on the subject of slavery. In May, 1845, a meeting was held in Louisville, Kentucky, at which the Southern Church was organized, holding to the same great doctrines and Church order as their brethren from whom they had parted, one point of difference being that the Southern Church still holds to the Watson Catechisms, not using those more recently adopted by the Northern Church. A similar zeal has been displayed in all departments of Church work at home and abroad, whether educational, missionary or otherwise, by the membership of this section of the Church.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.—This branch, which was formed in 1830, has no bishops; ministers and laymen of equal numbers constitute its General Conference; the classes select their leaders, and the stewards are chosen by the male members of the congregation. Thus the principle of representation pervades this body. The Annual Conferences are composed of all the ordained itinerant ministers; each elects a president annually, they decide on appeals from the decision of committees appointed to try ministers, they station ministers, preachers and missionaries, they regulate circuits, and make rules for defraying expenses of itinerant ministers and their families.

The Quarterly Conferences are composed of the ministers, preachers, exhorters, leaders, stewards and trustees of the circuit. They decide on appeals, grant licenses to ministers to preach, and recommend ministers and preachers to the annual conference for ordination and itineracy. The General Conference has authority to make rules for the government of the Church, to fix the compensation and duties of the ministers, and allowances for the wives and widows, as well as for agents, editors and others who serve the Church.

THE METHODIST CHURCH.—In 1867 a number of preachers and members seceded from the Methodist Protestant Church; and receiving accessions from other non-episcopal bodies, they called their new organization the Methodist Church. It differs but slightly from the Methodist Protestant Church.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, called also ALBRIGHTS or GERMAN METHODISTS.—This Church is not formed by secession from any section of the other Methodist organizations. Jacob Albright, by birth a German, who had been brought under deep religious convictions, was aggrieved at witnessing a great amount of infidelity among his fellow-countrymen who had settled in this country. He began to seek their salvation, and God blessed his labors. In 1800 a church organization was formed, and Albright was elected the pastor; and as there was no body with which the new Church had any affiliation, it remained separate, and ere long the cause extended, and even reached Canada. The form of government is episcopal, resembling that of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The bishops ordain elders, license preachers and appoint districts in which they are to labor. This body is exceedingly devoted and zealous, being engaged in educational, missionary and Sunday-school work; and it maintains in the most praiseworthy manner and with great efficiency, at New Berlin, Pennsylvania, a book establishment, which not only provides a religious literature, but which, by the profits realized, does much to sustain the widows and orphans had himself been lately led to clearer views and deeper experiences than he had ever known in his earlier years. He assisted Dr. Coke, at the request of Asbury, at the ordination of the latter as a bishop. Mr. Otterbein and the friends who joined him were soon known by the name of German Methodists, and in 1800 they became one body, under the name of the "United Brethren," and elected Mr. Otterbein and Martin Boehm as superintendents. The members had been gathered out of different denominations, and therefore questions connected with baptism, the Lord's Supper, washing of the saints' feet, and others, have been left to the judgment of each individual member. They have a general conference, and annual and quarterly conferences, and in all their leading details are in harmony with the Methodist Episcopal Church of this country.

Several small bodies exist, such as the "American Wesleyan Connection," founded in 1843, the "Primitive Methodists," the "Free Methodists" and the "Congregational Methodists." These denominations in the main accord with the Methodist Episcopal Church in doctrine and polity, except that they are non-episcopal and have some differences in minor details of administration and practice.

of deceased ministers—a labor of love, an exhibition of Christian principle which might well be followed by other denominations.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, or GERMAN METHODISTS, was formed under the leadership of the Rev. William Otterbein, who had emigrated to this country in 1752. He had belonged to the German Reformed Church; but becoming acquainted with two German brethren, named Boehm and Geeting, and with Asbury and Wright, he felt that sympathy which his soul needed, as he at the request of several princes who had made application to the court of Constantinople for instruction in the Christian faith. He also assisted his brother in translating the Psalter, the Gospels and many other parts of the Scriptures into the Slavonic. He continued his labors among the Slavonic converts for about thirty years, in the course of which time he is said to have translated all the Scriptures. It is supposed that the Slavonic version adopted by the Greek Church is derived immediately from that of Methodius and Cyrillus.

3. Surnamed the Confessor, flourished toward the middle of the ninth century, and was born at Syracuse. He was ordained priest by the patriarch Nicophorus, after whose death he signalized himself by his zeal for image-worship, on which account he was committed to prison by the emperor. He recovered his liberty in 842, during the regency of the empress Theodora, a zealous worshiper of images. In the same year he was preferred to the patriarchate of Constantinople; and no sooner was he settled in his see than he convened a synod, in which the iconoclasts were condemned and image-worship was re-established in the Greek Church. He died in 847.

METHUSAEEL (me-thoo'sa-el), the son of Mehujael, in the line of Cain, and father of Lamech, Gen. iv. 18.

METHUSELAH (me-thu'ze-lab), the son of Enoch, in the line of Seth, and the father of the Lamech who begat Noah. His name is chiefly remarkable as that of the person who attained to the greatest age on record, having lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years. According to the Hebrew chronology, he died in the year of the flood.

METOPHRANES (met-o-fra'neez), bishop of Smyrna in the ninth century, and a native of Constantinople, had a share in the disputes which terminated in the schism between the Greek and Latin Churches. Metophranes was pronounced an obstinate schismatic by a council held at Constantinople in 880, and deposed from his episcopate and cut off from the communion of the faithful. He wrote "A Letter to Manuel, a Patrician," which throws light on the history of the schism between the Greek and Latin Churches.

METRICAL PSALMS (met'ri-kal). In the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII. some of the Psalms were versified by Sir Thomas Wyatt, and published in 1549. The "old version" originated with Sternhold, who was groom of the robes to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. Hopkins and others completed the work in 1562, and these versions were only "allowed," not enjoined. In the reign of William and Mary, two Irishmen, Dr. Nicholas Brady and Nahum Tate, completed a new version, which was authorized by the crown, and which has continued in use ever since in the Church of England and in other Protestant Episcopal Churches. From time to time various collections of hymns have been used in different parts of these Churches in addition to the metrical psalms.

In Scotland an attempt was made by Zachary Boyd, the minister of the Barony Parish and a pared a paraphrase in which he sought to give a New Testament expression to the ideas in the Psalms, and his work is extensively used by non-conformists in England, by Churches in the United States. Bishop Mant and many others have made metrical versions of the psalms, but the above are the leading versions which have obtained a general usage in the leading Churches of Great Britain and America.

METROPOLITAN (me-tro-pol'i-tan). 1. An archbishop, so called because he presides over the city which is considered to be a sort of mother or capital over other cities of the province, and he is therefore president of the provincial synod. He ordains the bishops of his province, convokes provincial councils, and exercises a general superintendence over the bishops, the clergy, and the doctrine and discipline of the province. Such were the functions of the "metropolitan" as recognized by the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, and by subsequent councils, as well as by the edicts of Justinian. 2. The word is sometimes used for a bishop or abbot, or one set over others. In the early ages Rome and Milan were the only cities in the West which had metropolitans.

MEUSCHEN (mew'shen), JOHANN GERHARD, a learned divine and philologist, was born in 1680, at Osnabruck, in Westphalia, studied at Jena and obtained the degree of A. M. in 1702. He then went to Kiel, where he eventually became professor of philosophy in 1704. Having returned to his native place, he assisted his father for some time in the ministry, until he was elected preacher at St. Catherine's. In 1708 he was made pastor of the Lutheran congregation in The Hague, in 1716 he became court-preacher of Hanau, and subsequently general superintendent of Coburg, church-councilor and professor of theology at Coburg, where he died in 1743. Among his works is "The New Testament illustrated from the Talmud."

MEUZAL (mewt'zal), Ezek. xxvii. 19, margin. It is questionable whether or not this is a proper name. Gesenius would translate it "something spun"—i. e., thread, yarn—and De Wette agrees. But most critics, altering a vowel of the Hebrew word, translate "from Uzal," which is the ancient name of Sanaa, the metropolis of Yemen.

MEYER (mi'er), HERMANUS, D. D., who became an eminent minister in the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in 1733, in Bremen, Lower Saxony. He was educated at Bremen and Groningen. While at Groningen the consistory of the place put a call into his hands to the Reformed (Dutch) Church at Kingston, New York, which he accepted, and in November, 1763, he entered on his ministry in that place. Owing to a dispute in his church, a party, enraged because he did not take sides with them, caused a censure to be passed on him and the church door to be closed, but in 1766 the censure was declared to be without authority, and therefore null and void. In 1784 he was appointed by the General Synod to the chair of Hebrew, and in 1786 he was made lector or assistant in the department of divinity. He held both these offices until his death, in 1791. He was eminently learned, and he held a high place among the best scholars of his day. In his ministry he was evangelical, pious and assiduous in all his duties. He was remarkable for his meekness and gentleness, and his sympathetic character gained him the love of all who knew him.

MEZAHAB (me-za'hab), the father of Matred, who became mother-in-law to Hadar, the last person who is said to have reigned in Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 39.

MIAMIN (mi'a-min). 1. One who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 25. 2. A priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel and Jeshua, Neh. xii. 5. He is also called Mijamin, Neh. x. 70, and Miniamin, Neh. xii. 17, 41.

MICAH (mi'kah). 1. A man of Mount Ephraim who set up images in his house and hired a wandering Levite to be his priest. All were stolen from him by a troop of lawless Danites, Jud. xvii, xviii. This transaction must have occurred in early times, as there is reason to believe that the Levite was the grandson, at least no distant descendant, of Moses. 2. One of Reuben's posterity, 1 Chr. v. 5. 3. The son of Mephibosheth, 1 Chr. viii. 34, 35; he is called Micha in 2 Sam. ix. 12. 4. A Levite of the family of Asaph, 1 Chr. ix. 15, called Micha in Neh. xi. 17, and Michaiah in Neh. xii. 35. 5. A Levite, the son of Uzziel, a Kohathite, 1 Chr. xxiii. 20; his name appears as Michah in 1 Chr. xxiv. 24, 25. 6. The father of one of Josiah's officers, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20, called Michaiah in 2 Ki. xxii. 12.

MICAH THE PROPHET, one of the twelve minor prophets, the sixth in order according to the Hebrew arrangement, the third according to the Septuagint. In the title of his book Micah is described as the Morasthite, or native of Moresheth or Moresheth-Gath, ch. i. 14, a town professor in the university of Glasgow, to produce a version of the psalms. His work was examined by the General Assembly and rejected, but a committee of the Assembly, having examined a version made by Francis Rouse, who had been an English member of Parliament, provost of Eton College, a member of the Westminster Assembly and a member of Cromwell's Privy Council, adopted it, after several corrections and modifications. This was done in 1647, and it has remained in use in the Scottish Churches and in the Churches which, in government and descent are connected with the Church of Scotland. Several of these Churches also use "paraphrases" on portions of Scripture and selections of hymns. Dr. Isaac Watts pre-probably situated in the south-west of Judæa, not far from the ancient Philistine city of Gath. From this it appears that Micah, like Isaiah, was a native of the southern kingdom of Judah; and in that kingdom, so far as we are informed, he spent his entire life.

From the figures and illustrations which he employs in the course of his prophecy, it would seem that, like Elisha and Hosea, and others of the prophets, he belonged to the agricultural, rather than to the pastoral, portion of the population, ch. i. 6; ii. 2; iv. 12, 13; vi. 15; vii. 1.

The title of the book informs us that he prophesied "in the days of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah," in the second half of the eighth century B. C. He thus formed one of that remarkable group of prophets of which Isaiah may be regarded as the centre. And between his prophecies and those of Isaiah there are many points of contact. These two prophets, indeed, seem to have been as intimately related as their elder contemporaries Hosea and Amos, and at a later period Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

In 1 Ki. xxii. an older prophet of the same name is mentioned, who has not unfrequently been confounded with the author of the book of Micah. But the former Micaiah, the son of Imlah, prophesied in the reign of Jehoshaphat, more than a century and a half earlier than Micah. The coincidence, however, between the opening words of the book of Micah—"Hearken, ye nations all"—and the last recorded words of Micaiah, 1 Ki. xxii. 28, is striking.

An interesting notice of Micah is found in Jer. xxvi. 18, where he is mentioned by name as Micah the Morasthite, and a prophecy of his, ch. iii. 12, is quoted verbatim. He is also said to have prophesied to all the people of Judah in the days of Hezekiah, and with such good result that Hezekiah and his people "besought the Lord, and the Lord repented him of the evil which he had pronounced against them."

MICAHA, THE BOOK OF, 750-700 B. C. Attempts have been made to divide this book according to the supposed chronology of different parts. But this cannot be satisfactorily done. It is true that we can assign with certainty the prediction, Mic. ii. 12, to the time of Hezekiah, Jer. xxvi. 18; and as that sovereign commenced his reformation immediately upon his accession to the throne, we must believe that the denunciations against idolatry, Mic. v. 13, 14; vi. 16, were delivered at an earlier date, under either Jotham or more probably Ahaz. Still, no accurate apportionment can be generally made. Indeed, there is a unity in the composition which would lead us to suppose that the prophet had collected his utterances and arranged them into one connected whole in the book he has transmitted to us.

The structure of it is curiously elaborated. There are three sections—i., ii.; iii.-v.; vi., vii.; each begins with the same words, "Hear ye," and each closes with a promise of strength and salvation to God's people. And there is a kind of parallel development. Thus, in the first section, Judah is threatened that the deadly blows which are soon to be dealt out on Samaria should reach to the gates of Jerusalem, ch. i. 9, 12. There is also the deliverance of the covenant people from their distress predicted and a victorious bursting out of captivity, ch. ii. 12, 13. In the second section the prophecy assumes a graver aspect; the actual destruction of Jerusalem, with the ruin of the temple, is proclaimed, and the exile in Babylon, ch. iii. 12; iv. 10, while the promise also rises higher, and describes positive salvation through the supremacy of Messiah, ch. iv., v. The third section is altogether of a hortatory cast.

Micah was contemporary with Isaiah, and his book comprises a summary of the prophecies delivered by the last-named seer concerning Messiah and the final blessedness of God's covenant people. Occasionally the one repeats the other; for example, compare Isa. ii. 2-4 with Mic. iv. 1-3. The style in some degree resembles that of Isaiah; it is forcible, pointed and concise, frequently animated and sublime. The tropes, varied according to the nature of the subject, are very beautiful. Two predictions contained in this book may be particularly noticed. The first relates to Samaria, ch. i. 6, a city beautiful for situation, the crowned hill of Ephraim, adorned with sumptuous palaces. Yet the stones thereof should be poured down into the valley. And modern travelers describe the exact accomplishment. There are the fragments of massy columns, the foundations thereof discovered, and the stones rolled down into the valley—

a living witness to the truth of the prophetic word. Another utterance is yet more remarkable. Earlier prophecy had noted the Seed of the woman, the descendant of Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, in the line of Judah, from the family of David; and here, ch. v. 2, his birthplace is designated by name—Bethlehem Ephratah; so that, when Herod inquired of the chief priests and scribes where Messiah should be born, they replied in Bethlehem, and referred him to this prediction, Matt. ii. 4-6.

MICAHIAH (mi-ka'yah), the son of Imlah, a faithful prophet who predicted in vain to Ahab the fatal termination of his expedition to Ramoth-gilead, 1 Ki. xxii. 8-28. He delivered his warning in the form of a remarkable vision, in which the weighty lesson is conveyed, that God blinds judicially those who have shut their eyes and ears to his monitions, letting them be deceived by lying spirits. Some have conjectured that Micaiah was the unnamed prophet of 1 Ki. xx. 32-42.

MICE. This name occurs in three passages in the Old Testament. 1. In the enumeration of unclean "creeping things," Lev. xi. 29, a category which includes small short-legged, long-bodied mammalia as well as true reptilia. 2. In the narrative of the plagues that were inflicted on the Philistines while the ark of Jehovah was in captivity among them, 1 Sam. vi. 3. As an unclean creature eaten by the rebellious Israelites, Isa. lxvi. 17.

It is the second of these references that affords us most aid in identifying the little animal named achbar. It is alluded to as marring the land, and that to such an extent that the victorious Philistines were compelled to humble themselves under the infliction, and to acknowledge it, in conjunction with the hæmorrhoids, as a direct visitation from Jehovah. From Ps. lxxviii. 66 we learn that the nature of the disease carried a disgrace with it—it was a shame for a warrior to be smitten in the back; and perhaps the minuteness of the mice was also intended to lower their pride, for it must have been very humbling to succumb to so mean an instrumentality.

We conclude the animal in question to have been the common field-vole, often called the short-tailed field-mouse, the campagnol of the French and the Arvicola agrestis of modern zoologists. It is about the size of the house-mouse, to which it bears a general resemblance, but it is easily distinguished by its larger head, its short ears and tail, its stouter form and its reddish color, no less than by its habits.

The same species, or what is believed to be the same, has always been a destructive pest in Syria and Palestine. In the beginning of the twelfth century, William, archbishop of Tyre, mentions a sort of penitential council at Nablous (the ancient Shechem), at which canons were framed for the correction of morals in the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem on account of the calamities of earthquakes, war and famine. This last the archbishop ascribes to locusts and mice, which had for four successive years destroyed the crops.

Burckhardt asserts that the province of Hamah, in Syria, is the granary of the country, though the harvest never yields more than a tenfold increase, chiefly in consequence of the immense numbers of mice, which sometimes wholly destroy the fruits of the earth. He repeats the same statement with respect to the crops of the Hauran.

It is by no means improbable that with this little animal may be included, under the name achbar, one not only of a different species, but even of another genus, yet so similar to it in size, form and habits as to be called by the same name. It is the long-tailed field-mouse (Mus sylvaticus), a true mouse, which would scarcely be distinguished by a cursory observer from the house-mouse.

This is only inferior to the field-vole in destructiveness, and is "a bitter enemy to the horticulturist, the agriculturist and the planter." Its fecundity causes it to be always abundant in districts where its food is plentiful and easy of access, for it brings forth eight or ten at a birth, and has frequently two or more litters in the season. It either adopts ready-made, or makes by its own labor, excavations under the surface of the ground, frequently beneath tree-roots, in which it stores up quantities of grain, pulse, mast, etc., which are truly astonishing when the diminutive size of the animal is considered. Buffon records that in one field of forty acres 2300 were caught by a single trap in twenty-three days, which would be exactly 100 per day. Owls prey extensively on both this and the preceding species, and are said sometimes to congregate in large numbers, completely clearing the district for a time. Both species appear to be equally common not only throughout Europe, but also in the East.

MICHAEL (mi'ka-el) is a proper name which also occurs repeatedly in the Old Testament, but in regard to persons of whom scarcely anything is known. It is also the name of one of the chief angels, sometimes called prince and archangel, Dan. x. 13, 21; xii. 1; Rev. xii. 7. In these places it may be that the name is used symbolically. Many are disposed to view the being who is described as the special defender of the time. On this occasion he struck the first blow by a letter written in his own name, and in the name of the bishop of Acrida, in which he publicly accused the Latins of various errors. Leo X. wrote a most imperious reply, and at the same time he assembled a council at Rome, in which the Greek churches were solemnly excommunicated, while the papal legates at Constantinople publicly excommunicated the patriarch and all who should continue in his communion. These measures were followed, on both sides, by a number of controversial writings, which continued to widen the breach between the two Churches till it became irreparable. Michael died in exile.

MICHAEL VIII., emperor of the East, was brought up as a soldier, and in 1260 usurped the throne while governor of Nice. Combinations among the European princes involved him in so many troubles that he was induced to seek the favor of the Romish see, by proposing a union between the Greek and Latin Churches, with an acknowledgment of the supremacy of Rome. This was at length effected at the general council of Lyons under Gregory X., in 1274; but Michael lost more from the dissatisfaction of his own subjects with this act, than he gained by reconciliation with the Roman pontiff. He was excommunicated by Martin IV. for the share he had in the massacre of the French in Sicily, known by the name of the Sicilian Vespers. Soon after, as he was marching against the Turks, who had invaded his eastern provinces, he was taken ill, and died December 11, 1282. His son and associate in the empire immediately dissolved the union of the Greek and Latin Churches, and refused his father Christian burial.

MICHAELIS (mi-kay'lis) is the name of a German family, of which several members have been eminent in theological and Biblical literature since the Reformation.

1. JOHN HENRY, who was the most accurately learned of all the accomplished members of his family, was born at Klettenberg, in Hohnstein, in the year 1668. He studied Oriental literature for some years at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. He removed to Halle and became professor of the Oriental languages, and eventually of divinity, in that university. Halle was at that time the most renowned of the German universities; its professors were eminent men and its schools crowded with eager students, and John Henry Michaelis was the soul of the place. After some thirty years' conscientious labor, he led the way in Old Testament textual criticism by issuing from the press a carefully edited Hebrew Bible, the first which contained any various readings collected from Hebrew manuscripts by a Christian editor. This is a work of still acknowledged value. This diligent and profound scholar ended his labors in the year 1731.

2. CHRISTIAN BENEDICT, nephew of the preceding, was born at Elrich, in Hohnstein, in the beginning of 1680. Educated at Halle, he became in 1713 "extraordinary," and the year after, "ordinary," professor of philosophy, and in 1731 professor of theology. In 1738 he succeeded to the chairs of Greek and Oriental literature, to the duties of which he continued to apply himself until the year of his death, 1764, at the ripe age of eighty-four. He was not so extensive an author as his uncle, but what writings he left show him to have been an intelligent and careful scholar. His knowledge of Hebrew was very sound, and he was in advance of many of his contemporaries in his method of teaching it. His chief works are "A Disputation on Hebrew Ellipses," "Philological Observations on Hebrew Proper Names."

3. JOHN DAVID, who has been in many respects more influential than any other of the great writers in Biblical literature whom Germany has produced during the last one hundred and fifty years, was born in 1717; and surviving until 1791, Michaelis, whose indomitable activity and inquiring spirit evaded nothing of interest, was a connecting link between the old orthodoxy, which took everything on trust, and the new rationalism, which rejected authority and accepted nothing but what stood the trial of critical search. He received his education at his birthplace, Halle; and in 1740 he visited England, and formed a friendship with Bishop Lowth and other learned men. In 1746 he removed to Göttingen, in which university he became professor of philosophy and Oriental literature. Although he spent the remainder of his life and died at Göttingen, he became connected with other countries by literary and political ties. He was made a knight of the Polar Star by the king of Sweden in 1775, and in 1789 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of London. Intent on the interests of his favorite pursuit, Biblical science, Michaelis planned, in the year 1756, the expedition to Arabia and India which was conducted by Carsten Niebuhr. The project, being submitted to Frederick V., king of Denmark, was accepted by that liberal monarch, and the choice of the travelers was left to Michaelis, who drew up a series of questions for their guidance. The literary results of the expedition, though short of the exaggerated expectations of the time, have, in the shape of five quarto volumes, been permanently beneficial to Biblical science. The principal works of this voluminous writer are "Commentaries on the Laws of Moses" and "Introduction to the New Testament."

MICHAELMAS (mi'kel-mas), the feast of St. Michael, the archangel. It falls on the 29th of September, and is supposed to have been established toward the close of the fifth century—Brady says in 487. In England, Michaelmas is one of the regular periods for settling rents; and an old custom is still in use of having a roast goose for dinner on that day, probably because geese are at that period most plentiful and in the highest perfection, in consequence of being fed for some time on the stubble of the harvest-field.

Jewish Church, and as leading the armies of heaven against the dragon and his forces, as no other than the Son of God. But there is another mention of Michael more perplexing. He is said to have contended with the devil "about the body of Moses," and to have brought no railing accusation, but to have said, "The Lord rebuke thee," Jude 9. Various legends there are professing to explain this statement. The question is whether the apostle was describing a literal fact, or whether "the body of Moses" might not intend the Jewish law or the Jewish Church, just as Christian believers are termed "the body of Christ," 1 Cor. xii. 27. If this interpretation be admitted, there is doubtless an allusion to Zech. iii. 1, 2.

MICHAEL, CERULARIUS, became patriarch of Constantinople in 1043. He was a determined enemy to the Church of Rome and the papal claims; and in 1053 he revived the famous contest between the Greek and Latin Churches, which had been suspended for a considerable MICHAL (mi'kal), the younger daughter of King Saul, who was bestowed in marriage on David, 1 Sam. xiv. 49. She assisted David to escape when her father sent officers to apprehend him, 1 Sam. xix. 11-17. She was given, after David had fled, in marriage to Phalti, or Phaltiel, 1 Sam. xxv. 44, from whom, at David's demand, she was taken by her brother Ish-bosheth and restored to her rightful husband, 2 Sam. iii. 13-16. But a change had probably passed upon the two, David and his wife. Michal, perhaps, regretted Phaltiel, and she seems to have inherited Saul's bitter temper. On the occasion of the festive rejoicing at the bringing of the ark to Jerusalem she was displeased at the part the king took, and as a judgment was childless, 2 Sam. vi. 16-23. Some manuscripts have Merab, and it may be the right reading in 2 Sam. xxi. 8.

MICHMAS (mik'mas), or MICMASH (mik'mash), a town to the eastward of Beth-aven, and south of Migron, not far from Gibeah. It must have been a place of military importance, 1 Sam. xiii. 2, 5, 11, 16, 23, more especially as there was a narrow pass between sharp rocks, through which the road passed, 1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5, 31. Some of the inhabitants returned after the captivity, and appear to have again settled in their ancient habitation, Ezra ii. 27; Neh. vii. 31. Michmas is now a desolate village—Mukmas—with ruins, near a steep ravine, called Wady es-Suweinit, which was probably the above-noted pass, where some travelers believe that they have recognized the rocks Bozez and Seneh, the scene of Jonathan's exploit.

MICHMETHAH (mik'me-thah), a border town of Ephraim and Manasseh, Josh. xvi. 6; xvii. 7. It is difficult so to fix the position of Michmethah as to satisfy the conditions in the two passages referred to.

MICHRI (mik'ri), a Benjamite, 1 Chr. ix. 8.

MICHTAM (mik'tam), a title prefixed to Psalms xvi., lvi., lvii., lviii., lix., lx. Some have believed that it means "golden"—i. e., precious or pre-eminent. But a more probable interpretation is that, by the interchange of m and b, michtam is equivalent to michtab, a "writing;" "poem;" which word is found prefixed to Hezekiah's lamentation or prayer, Isa. xxxviii. 9.

MIDDIN (mid'din), a city in the wilderness of Judah, Josh. xv. 61.

MIDDLE AGES, a term usually employed to denote, somewhat vaguely, a space of several centuries in European annals, intervening between what are called the ancient and modern periods of history. The centuries between the ninth and tenth and the end of the fifteenth, after Christ, are generally comprehended under this loose denomination. In the work of Mr. Hallam on "The Middle Ages" that historian has assumed as his period of commencement the conquest of Gaul by the Franks, about A. D. 500, and for his conclusion the invasion of Italy by Charles VIII., about 1500; and with reference to the affairs of the Greeks and their Oriental neighbors, he places, as the most convenient limit between ancient and modern history, the era of Mohammed.

MIDDLE CROSS DAY, a name in the Eastern Church for the Wednesday in the fourth week in Lent, being the middle of the great fast. It was the custom to make little cakes or biscuits on that day in the form of a cross.

MIDDLETON (mid'd'l-tun), CONYERS, a celebrated English divine and critic, was born at York, in 1683, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow. In 1717 he was created doctor of divinity by mandamus, on which occasion he resisted the claim of Dr. Bentley, then regius professor, to exorbitant fees. This occasioned a lawsuit, in which Middleton triumphed. A personal enmity was the consequence of this affair; and when Bentley printed his proposals for a new edition of the Greek Testament, Middleton attacked them with such force that the design was abandoned. In 1724 he visited Italy, and five years later he wrote his famous "Letter from Rome," in which he drew an elaborate and highly ingenious parallel between the religious rites of popery and those of paganism. His "Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers which are supposed to have existed in the Christian Church from the Earliest Ages through several Successive Centuries" brought on the author the imputation of infidelity, and gave rise to much vehement censure from a host of opponents. Both the above works hold an important place in the history of the growth of religious liberalism in England. He died in 1750.

MIDDLETON, THOMAS FANSHAW, first bishop of Calcutta, was born at Kedleston, in Derbyshire, in 1769, educated at Christ's Hospital and at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and, after having held various small livings, was, in 1809, collated to a stall in the cathedral of Lincoln, and was shortly after presented to the rectory of Puttenham, Herts, and the archdeaconry of Huntingdon. The government having determined on providing for the spiritual wants of British subjects in the East, Dr. Middleton was selected as the fittest person to take the important charge of bishop; he was accordingly consecrated at Lambeth, and in November, 1814, he arrived at Calcutta. In 1820 he laid the foundation-stone of a church at Calcutta, near to which a school was erected for the Christian poor, and soon after arose on the banks of the river a college for the liberal education of youth. But in the midst of unwearied efforts for the propagation of true religion he was seized with a fever, and died in 1822. His chief work is "The Doctrine of the Greek Article applied to the Criticism and Illustration of the New Testament."

MIDIAN (mid'e-an), a son of Abraham by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2, and the father of the afterward numerous and powerful tribe who, under the name of Midianites, so often meet us in the history of the chosen people. Of Midian himself it is merely said that, along with the other children of Keturah, he received a portion of his father's goods, and was sent away into the east country, ver. 6—a somewhat indefinite expression, but pointing in the direction of Arabia, as the region where we might look for the future offspring of Midian. One of the difficulties, however, connected with the race of Midian is to obtain an intelligible view of the occasional notices of Scripture respecting them, such as to admit of their being associated with a single tribe and a specific locality. They appear first as traveling merchants, passing through Palestine on their way from Gilead to Egypt, and purchasing Joseph from his envious brethren that they might again dispose of him, with other treasures, when they reached the marts of commerce on the Nile, Gen. xxxvii. 28. On this occasion the Midianites seem to be somehow identified with the Ishmaelites; for what is said of the Midianites in one clause of the verse is said of the Ishmaelites in another. The same identification is also made on a future occasion, Jud. viii. 24, and is probably in both cases to be understood of their mode of life and manners; though Midianites in race, they lived and acted as the Ishmaelites. We next hear of them in quite a different region, when Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh and sought refuge in the Arabian desert, somewhere in the peninsula of Sinai. It is now that, for the first time, we read of "the land of Midian;" and with the priest of that land, Jethro, Moses found both a temporary home and the future mother of his children. The relations between the covenant people generally, as well as Moses himself, with this section of the Midianite family continued to be of the most friendly character, and even issued in a kind of merging of the one into the other. Yet in the lifetime of Moses, just as the children of Israel had reached the close of the wilderness sojourn and were encamped in the plains of Moab, the Midianites are represented as entering into a league with Moab to fight against them and destroy them. Their elders went along with those of Moab to invite Balaam to curse Israel, Num. xxii. 7; their women joined with the daughters of Moab in enticing Israel to idolatry and corruption, ch. xxv. 1-6; and the result was that they were smitten with so terrible an overthrow that nearly all their fighting men perished, and their women were doomed to captivity, ch. xxxi. A few generations afterward, however, we find the Midianites so far recovered from this catastrophe that they were again in a condition to cope with Israel; and with the purpose, doubtless, of revenging their former defeat, they came up, along with the Amalekites and other eastern tribes, in an immense host, and overspread the land of Canaan. But their success was only temporary, as under Gideon the Israelites gained over them a complete triumph, and so shattered and reduced their forces that they never again attempted to wage war with the people of God, Jud. vi. vii-viii. Indeed, they now virtually disappear as a separate race, and the allusions that are made to them in the later Scriptures have reference chiefly to the past or make a somewhat ideal use of their name to paint the destined ascendancy of Israel in the future. The victory won over them by Gideon became the symbol of other and still greater triumphs, Isa. ix. 4; x. 20; Hab. iii. 7; Ps. lxxxiii. 9; or Midian itself is contemplated as taking rank among the converted Gentiles, laying aside its ancient enmity to the cause and people of God, and doing homage to the interests of the divine kingdom, Isa. lx. 6.

MIDWIFE (mid'wife). See BIRTH.

MIGDAL-EL (mig'dal-el), a fenced city in the tribe of Naphtali, mentioned between Iron and Horem, Josh. xix. 38, and probably possessing some remarkable tower among its fortifications; but its name never occurs in the history after the conquest, nor has any clue been found to its site or that of the places associated with it.

MIGDAL-EDAR. See EDAR.

MIGDAL-GAD, a town in the low country of Judah, one of the second group, which comprised altogether sixteen cities, Josh. xv. 37. But nothing has yet been ascertained more definitely respecting it.

MIGDOL (mig'döl), a place between which and the Red Sea the Israelites were commanded to encamp on leaving Egypt, Ex. xiv. 2; Num. xxxiii. 7. The name, which means "a tower," appears to indicate a fortified place. In Jer. xliv. 1; xlvi. 14 it occurs as a city of Egypt, and it would seem to have been the last town on the Egyptian frontier in the direction of the Red Sea; hence "from Migdol to Syene," in Ezek. xxix. 10; xxx. 6. In the itinerary of Antoninus there is mention of Magdol as a town in Egypt about twelve Roman miles southward of Pelusium.

It is probable that this is the Migdol of the prophets. Whether this is the Migdol of Exodus is doubted by some.

MIGRON (mig'rön). In the only historical passage which makes mention of Migron, 1 Sam. xiv. 2, we are led to think of a tract of land, or, as Josephus perhaps correctly states, and as the import of the name itself seems to imply, a prominent height, rather than a town, as what is meant to be indicated by the term. Saul dwelt, it is said, along with the few hundreds who still clave to him, "in the uttermost part of Gibeah, under a pomegranate tree which is in Migron." We have nothing, however, either in ancient or modern notices, to help us to a more exact knowledge of its nature or locality.

MIJAMIN (mi-ja'min). 1. The head of one of the courses of the priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 9. 2. A priest, perhaps the representative of No. 1, who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 7. See MIAMIN.

MIKKELSEN (mik'kel-sen), HANS, author of the first Danish version of the New Testament, was originally mayor of Malmoe, in Scaiaa, and subsequently secretary to Christian II. of Denmark. When the king was in 1523 obliged to flee from his dominions and take refuge in Holland, Mikkelsen accompanied him, and it was whilst there that, at the suggestion of his sovereign, he set himself to the work of translating the New Testament. Driven by the bigoted jealousy of the papal party in the Netherlands from his place beside the king, he retired to Harderwick, in Guelderland, where he died about the year 1532. His translation professes to be made from the Latin, but this applies only to the four Gospels, in translating which he seems to have followed the version of Erasmus; for the other books he has closely followed the German version of Luther.

MIKLOTH (mik'löth). 1. A Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 32; ix. 37, 38. 2. One of David's military officers, 1 Chr. xxvii. 4.

MIKNEIAH (mik-ne'yah), a Levite porter appointed to play on the harp, 1 Chr. xv. 18, 21.

MILBURN (mil'burn), WILLIAM HENRY, known as "the blind preacher," was born in Philadelphia, in 1823. He was taken to Illinois by his father, who, with his family, settled in Jacksonville, in 1827. In early life he lost his sight, but with unwonted energy he determined on being educated, and he distinguished himself in Illinois College. Ill health constrained him to abandon his studies at the age of twenty, and he connected himself with the Methodist Church, in which he became an itinerant preacher. In 1846 he obtained the position of chaplain in Congress, which he held for ten sessions. Afterwards he removed to the South, and in 1848 he was stationed in Montgomery, and next in Mobile. Six years afterward he went to New York, where he entered on a course of popular lecturing, in which he had great success. In 1859 he visited Europe, and he made a remarkable impression in England. In this year his "Ten Years of Preacher Life" was published, and next year "Pioneers and People of the Mississippi Valley" appeared. His other work, "Rifle, Axe and Saddlebags," was equally peculiar and popular. Late in life he joined the Episcopal Church.

MILCAH (mil'kah). 1. The daughter of Haran and wife of Nahor; the mother also by him of Bethuel and seven children besides, Gen. xi. 29. 2. One of the daughters of Zelophehad, Num. xxvi. 33.

MILCOM (mil'kom), the same as MOLECH or MOLOCH, the peculiar idol of the Ammonites.

MILDEW (mil'dew). The word so rendered is always found in conjunction with one rendered "blasting," Deut. xxviii. 22; 2 Chr. vi. 28. The blasting or blight, as by the cutting east wind, Gen. xli. 6, is the cause, and then mildew is the result; the exact meaning of the Hebrew word is "paleness," "yellowness," the turning yellow from disease. It is the same that is used Jer. xxx. 6 to express the ghastly pallor which characterizes the countenances of those who are surprised by some disastrous tidings.

MILE. See MEASURES.

MILETUS (mi-le'tus), a city of Asia Minor, to the south of Ephesus, twenty or thirty miles away. It was the old capital of Ionia, though Ptolemy assigns it to Caria; it had four havens, and was the mother of many colonies. Thales, Anaximander and other eminent men were natives of this place, which had an evil reputation for licentiousness and luxury. It was to Miletus that St. Paul, hastening to Jerusalem, summoned the elders of Ephesus, that he might give them a solemn charge, Acts xx. 15-35. The remains of this city were probably absorbed in the swamp formed by the silting up of the Mæander, but there are ruins still visible of the magnificent temple of Apollo, and an insignificant village, Palat or Palatsha, stands near the site of Miletus.

MILK. The proper equivalent to this in Hebrew is chäláb, and it denotes milk with reference to its richness or fatness, consequently sweet and fresh. Milk, in a sour or in a coagulated state, went by the name chemah, and in our version is translated "butter." From the earliest times milk has always formed an important article of diet among the people of the East, especially among such as follow pastoral occupations; and they have been accustomed to derive it from sheep and goats, and even from camels, fully as much as from cows. In Scripture we nowhere read of camel's milk being partaken of, but possibly some reference to this use of them is made in the thirty milch-camels, with their colts, which formed part of Jacob's present to his brother Esau, Gen. xxxii. 15. Niebuhr, however, mentions it as among the dishes which were presented to him by certain Arabs at Menayre, and it is well known to be in common use among the Bedawins. Goats' milk is referred to in Prov. xxvii. 27 in such a manner as to imply that it formed a chief source of nourishment in an industrious and thriving family. And this species of milk is now, as among the ancient Hebrews, highly esteemed. From the beginning of April to September the towns are supplied with milk by large herds of goats, which pass through the streets every morning, and are milked before the houses of customers. The milk of sheep, also, and of cows, is commonly used, Deut. xxxii. 14, but that of cows less, it would appear, in summer than in winter. The scarcity of good pasture in summer renders their milk usually poorer than that of goats, which is therefore preferred where it can be had, and only during winter is resort more frequently made to the produce of cows.

There are several allusions in Scripture to milk, of an emblematic kind. In a general way, and with reference to the quality of richness involved in the name, "a land flowing with milk and honey" is a common expression for a land of great natural fertility and abundance, Ex. iii. 8; Deut. vi. 3. Sometimes, however, abundance of milk or butter, which implies a state of pasturage rather than of vine and corn cultivation, is employed to indicate comparative desolation or thinness of inhabitants, Isa. vii. 15, 22. More specifically, since milk is the peculiar food of infants, the being fed with milk is put in contrast to having the nourishment of strong food—the one indicative of spiritual feebleness, the other of robustness, 1 Cor. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12, while, again, without respect to this distinction, as characterizing one class of believers to their disadvantage as compared with others, Peter represents believers generally as requiring milk for their support, and finding it in the gospel of the grace of God, 1 Pet. ii. 2. In much the same manner, also, and with reference to the generous aid to be given to the true people of God in the latter days by the world, the prophet Isaiah says, "Thou shalt suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt also suck the breast of kings," Isa. lx. 16.

MILL. The word thus rendered properly means two mill-stones, and is used of a hand-mill, Isa. xlvi. 2. The mill for grinding corn had not wholly superseded the mortar for pounding it in the time of Moses. The mortar and the mill are named together in Num. xi. 8. But fine meal—that is, meal ground or pounded fine—is mentioned as early as the time of Abraham, Gen. xviii. 6; hence mills and mortars must have been previously known. The mill common among the Hebrews differed little from that which is in use to this day throughout Western Asia and Northern Africa. It consisted of two circular stones two feet in diameter and half a foot thick. The lower is called the "nether millstone," Job xli.

16, 24, and the upper the "rider," Jud. ix. 53. The former was usually fixed to the floor, and had a slight elevation in the centre, or, in other words, was slightly convex in the upper surface. The upper stone had a concavity in its under surface fitting to or receiving the convexity of the lower stone. There was a hole in the top, through which the corn

6. On the second day, in warm climates, bread becomes dry and insipid; hence the necessity of baking every day, and hence also the daily grinding at the mills early in the morning. The operation occasions considerable noise, and its simultaneous performance in a great number of houses or tents forms one of the sounds as indicative of an

was introduced by handfuls at a time. The upper stone had an upright stick fixed in it as a handle, by which it was made to turn upon the lower stone, and by this action the corn was ground and came out at the edges. As there were neither public mills nor bakers, except the king's, Gen. xl. 2; Hos. vii. 4-8, each family possessed a mill; and as it was in daily use, it was made an infringement of the law for a person to take another's mill or millstone in pledge, Deut. xxiv.

active population in the East as the sound of wheel carriages is in the cities of the West. This sound is alluded to in Scripture, Jer. xxv. 10; Rev. xviii. 22, 23. The incessant daily noise of the grinding came to be inseparably associated with the very existence of the family. The ceasing of this sound was the sign of utter desolation, Jer. xxv. 10; Rev. xviii. 22, with which compare the figurative representation of old age and death, including the traits, "the (female) grinders shall cease because Pallas or Athena. She was fabled to have sprung in full armor from the forehead of her father Jupiter. Minerva was worshiped as the goddess of wisdom and the patroness of industry and the arts. Athens, to which she gave name, was her favorite city; and there her worship was celebrated with great splendor, and the magnificent temple the Parthenon was erected to her honor. She was also worshiped at Rome with peculiar veneration, and two great festivals were held in her honor. Three temples were dedicated to her—one on the Capitol, which she shared with Jupiter and Juno, a second on the Aventine, and a third on the Caelian Mount. The origin of the name has long puzzled etymologists, but it is most probably derived from "Menrfa," the Tuscan name of the goddess.

MINES. That the Hebrews were acquainted with methods of extracting ore from the bowels of the earth seems a legitimate inference from the fact that the hills of Palestine contained veins of copper, which might be obtained by digging, Deut. viii. 9, and from the fact that they possessed metals in such abundance as could be supplied only by means of mines. There is, however, no reference in Scripture to mining operations, unless such be found in Job xxviii. 1-11. This is a passage not free from serious difficulties as to its meaning, but it is on the whole most probable that the passage contains an allusion to mining. The taking of iron from the earth, the forming of subterranean passages and galleries and the diverting of the waters, so as to prevent their bursting in and overwhelming the works, all seem to point to operations such as those of the mines. Still, the allusion is by no means certain; and even if it be admitted, it still remains doubtful whether what the speaker here describes can be applied to Palestine.

MINIAMIN (min-ya'min). 1. One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah to distribute the free-will offerings, 2 Chr. xxxi. 15. 2. Neh. xii. 17, 41. See MIAMIN. But different persons may possibly be meant in these two places.

BUST OF MINERVA.—
See article.

MINIMS (min'ims). The term means the "least of all friars." The order was founded by St. Francis of Paula, in Calabria, in 1473, and was confirmed by Sixtus IV. The members observe a continual fast, which they term the quadragesimal life. Their superior is called "corrector." Their habit is a tawny cassock, hood, scapular and leathern girdle.

MINISTER. See DEACON.

MINNI (min'ni), a province or district mentioned only, Jer. li. 27, in conjunction with Ararat; it must have been an Armenian region, perhaps that of the Manavassai, near the centre of Armenia.

MINNITH (min'nith), a place east of the Jordan in the land of the Ammonites, in a district rich in grain, which was carried thence to the markets of Tyre, Jud. xi. 33.

MINOR CANONS. In the old cathedrals an arrangement existed by which certain vicars were permitted to officiate when the canons were absent, and these were known as minor canons. In Rome they are designated chaplains.

MINOS (me'nos), in mythological history, was son of Jupiter and Europa, and king of Crete, and so celebrated as a lawgiver on earth, that after his death he was appointed judge of the infernal regions, in which office he was associated with Æacus and Rhadamanthus.

MINSTREL. See MUSIC.

MINT, Matt. xxiii. 23; Luke xi. 42, a well-known herb much used in domestic economy. The Jews are said to have scattered it, on account of its pleasant smell, on the floors of their houses and synagogues. The species most common in Syria is the horse-mint; this and the Mentha arvensis were the kinds best known to the ancients. According to Jewish writers, mint was one of the herbs to be tithed, and subject to the law of the seventh year.

MINUCIUS FELIX (me-noo'sh'us fe'liks), who is also called MARCUS, was an African Christian in the early part of the third century. Jerome considers him to have been an eminent pleader of Rome, and to have lived between Tertullian and Cyprian. He had been a heathen in early life; but having embraced Christianity, he became a zealous defender of the faith. He and two friends, it seems, had gone to Ostia, in the law vacation, for the enjoyment of sea-bathing, and while walking on the shore he perceived Cæcilius salute an image of Terapis. This led to a discussion, and eventually to the conversion of Cæcilius. He wrote a dialogue called "Octavius," in which his argument on behalf of Christianity is set forth with great elegance. This argument has been held by some to be really the eighth book of Arnobius. He is also said to have written a tract, "De Fato;" but this wants confirmation. Minucius Felix is made a contemporary with Marcus Aurelius by some. Baronius places him about A. D. 212; Cave, A. D. 207-220; and Baldwin, after A. D. 250.

MIRACLES (mir'a-k'lz). Three words are employed in the New Testament to denote, from different points of view, the supernatural works performed by Christ and his apostles—terata, miracles or wonders; semeia, signs; and dunamis, powers or mighty works. Sometimes all three are used in conjunction, as by St. Peter in relation to Christ, Acts ii. 22, by St. Paul in describing the signs of an apostle, 2 Cor. xii. 12, and again by St. Paul in speaking of the revelation of the man of sin, 2 Thess. ii. 9, where, however, the special character of the works is marked by the addition of the epithet "lying wonders." It may be observed, however, that none of these words necessarily implies either the supernatural origin or the religious purpose of the phenomena so called; these, when implied at all, are to be gathered from the context or inferred from the nature of the acts themselves, but are not distinctly or exclusively expressed in the signification of the name. The word teras is expressive of the astonishment produced by an extraordinary phenomenon in the mind of the spectator, but does not necessarily imply that the phenomenon itself is of a supernatural kind; and it is used in the Septuagint not only of miracles properly so called, but sometimes also of acts astonishing, but not necessarily supernatural. Deut.

xxviii. 46; Isa. xx. 3; Ezek. xii. 6. The word semeion, even in its religious application, as denoting a sign of the presence and working of God, does not necessarily imply that the significant fact is itself supernatural, or even extraordinary; on the contrary, many of the Scripture signs are in themselves natural and common events, though employed by God for a special purpose. And finally, the word dunamis, though applied in an especial sense to those mighty works by which the power of God is manifested in a more striking and remarkable manner than in the ordinary course of nature, yet is in itself applicable to the divine power in its ordinary as well as in its extraordinary exercise, and to the powers of other agents, whether natural or supernatural.

On the other hand, the modern use of the word miracle implies, as an essential part of its signification, that the phenomenon so called is, if not contrary to nature, at least beyond and above nature. The whole meaning of the controversy on the possibility of miracles rests on the assumption that a miracle necessarily implies something supernatural. "A miracle," says Hume, "may be accurately defined a transgression of a law of nature by a particular volition of the Deity, or by the interposition of some invisible agent." "A miracle," says Bishop Butler, "in its very notion, is relative to a course of nature, and implies somewhat different from it, considered as being so." "A miracle," says Bishop Douglas, "is an event brought about in a way contrary to the course of nature." And recently Archbishop Trench, while justly objecting to the language which describes the miracles as unnatural or against nature, at the same time distinctly admits that they are beyond and above nature, and that "aught which is perfectly explicable from the course of nature and history is assuredly no miracle in the most proper sense of the word." Citations to the same effect might be added from many other writers, but the above are sufficient to show that, in the language of modern theology, the word miracle has acquired a distinct and precise implication of the supernatural—an implication which was not necessarily involved in the meaning of the names by which the same events are called in Scripture. Accepting this as the proper signification of the term miracle in its present sense, let us endeavor to ascertain the nature of the events denoted by it.

A very slight observation of the phenomena of the visible world is sufficient to indicate a division of them into two great classes—those which are produced by the action of mind, and those which are produced by the action of matter; those in which human volition is exercised, and those in which it is not. There are some phenomena of nature which we regard as dependent on the regular action of material causes, which have been in operation from the beginning of the present state of things, and which will continue in operation so long as that state of things is permitted to last; and there are other phenomena which we regard as dependent upon the free action of man, which may take place or not according as he wills to act or to forbear, and which, having once taken place, may or not take place again, according to the free choice of man to bring them about or not. The phenomena of the one class are regarded as necessary, those of the other as contingent; the one are supposed to take place regularly by virtue of certain established laws of nature, the other are supposed to take place occasionally by the free interposition of a personal agent.

In endeavoring to apply an analogous distinction to the conception of a miracle, as compared with that of a natural phenomenon, we must be careful not to press the analogy beyond the point to which it may be fairly extended. An apparent objection meets us at the outset. It is true, it may be urged, that to have any conception of God at all we must conceive him as a person, and personality necessarily implies will and the power of free action according to that will. But the will of God is manifested in the regular order of the universe no less than in departures from that order. There is a broad and marked contrast between those necessary phenomena of the world which take place independently of man, and those contingent phenomena which are brought about by a direct interposition of human will, but no such contrast can be supposed to exist in relation to the Being on whom the whole world is dependent. If, then, all the sensible phenomena of the universe are alike manifestations of the divine will, what room, it may be asked, is there for any special interposition of that causation. And, secondly, this distinction is not proposed as an argument to prove the necessity or the reality of miracles, but only to obviate a preliminary objection against their possibility, and thus to clear the way for an examination of their proper evidence.

In our present ignorance of the manner in which the action of the regular forces of nature is carried on, and of the means by which exceptions are brought about, it is perhaps not possible to frame any definition of a miracle which shall not be open to objections. The most that we can hope to do is to explain what a miracle is not; and, in order to do this, we must inquire what is meant by that course of nature to which miracles are said to be an exception.

Two kinds of natural causes come within the field of our experience—physical or necessary causes, to which class belong all the material conditions requisite to the occurrence of a sensible change, and efficient or free causes, of which the only instance directly perceived is found in the power of voluntary action possessed by ourselves as personal agents. For our present purpose it is not necessary to enter upon the abstruse metaphysical questions connected with this subject. We shall merely assume what is implied in the conception of a uniform system of nature; that in material causation every event is determined to take place through some antecedent phenomenon or group of phenomena, from which it invariably follows, and we shall assume also that by natural events are meant such as take place either through this causation or by an exercise of human will. If, therefore, any event takes place in the world which is neither the result of such a series of necessary antecedents, extending back to the beginning of the present state of things, nor produced by the will of a human agent, such an event is supernatural or miraculous.

We do not imply by this that a miracle has no physical conditions, but only that it would not have taken place without some addition to those conditions beyond what takes place in natural causation. We deny, therefore, that the antecedents are the sufficient reason of the miracle, in the same way and to the same extent as they are of natural events. But in saying this we do not imply that the miracle is an event without a cause. It is the effect of a supernatural cause, as ordinary events are the effects of natural causes. There is nothing incredible in the supposition of such a supernatural cause, at least to those who believe in a God who, though working in the world, is yet distinct from the world. The possibility of miracles in general is not more incredible than the possibility of creation at all. Those who believe that the world was created in time do not therefore believe that God, before the creation, existed in an eternity of idleness. Personal existence is itself an activity; and if there was a personal God before the creation of the world, there was also a divine action before the creation of the world. In creating the world, therefore, God did not begin to act, but entered on a different mode of action. If a new exertion of divine power was possible then, it is equally possible at any subsequent time.

matically pronounced against the possibility of miracles, the strength of the Christian argument rests mainly on the special contents of the gospel narrative, particularly as regards the character of the Saviour portrayed in it, and the distinctive nature of his miracles as connected with his character and on the subsequent history of the Christian Church. It is far easier to talk in general terms about the laws of nature and the impossibility of their violation than to go through the actual contents of the Gospels in detail, and show how it is possible that such a narrative could have been written, and how the events described in it could have influenced, as they have, the subsequent history of the world, on any other supposition than that of its being a true narrative of real events. There is, however, one phase of the skeptical argument which may be noticed here. It has been objected that no testimony can prove a miracle as such. "Testimony," we are told, "can apply only to apparent sensible facts; testimony can only prove an extraordinary and perhaps inexplicable occurrence or phenomenon; that it is due to supernatural causes is entirely dependent on the previous belief and assumptions of the parties." This objection is singularly inapplicable to the works recorded as having been done by Christ and his apostles. It may, with certain exceptions, be applicable to a case in which the assertion of a supernatural cause rests solely on the testimony of the spectator of the fact, but it is not applicable to those in which the cause is declared by the performer. Let us accept, if we please, merely as a narrative of "apparent sensible facts," the history of the cure of the blind and dumb demoniac, or of the lame man at the Beautiful Gate, but we cannot place the same restriction upon the words of our Lord and of St. Peter, which expressly assign the supernatural cause, "If I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you." "By the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth doth this man stand here before you whole." We have here, at least, a testimony reaching to the supernatural; and if that testimony be admitted in these cases, the same cause becomes the most reasonable and probable that can be assigned to the other wonderful works performed by the same persons. For if it be admitted that our Lord exercised a supernatural power at all, there is, to use the words of Bishop Butler, "No more presumption worth mentioning against his having exerted this miraculous power in a certain degree greater than in a certain degree less, in one or two more instances than in one or two fewer."

And this brings us to the consideration on which the most important part of this controversy must ultimately rest—namely, that the true evidence on behalf of the Christian miracles is to be estimated, not by the force of testimony in general, as compared with antecedent improbability, but by the force of the peculiar testimony by which the Christian miracles are supported, as compared with the antecedent probability or improbability that a religion of such a character should have been first introduced into the world by superhuman agency. The miracles of Christ, and, as the chief of them all, that great crowning miracle of his resurrection, are supported by all the testimony which they derive from his own positive declarations concerning them, taken in conjunction with the record of his life and the subsequent history of the Christian religion. The alternative lies between accepting that testimony or regarding the Gospels as a fiction and the Christian faith as founded on imposture.

will, such as man exerts in a world which is not dependent on him, and which he can only partially control?

In answer to this objection it may be observed, first, that the distinction between the general and the special action of God's will is a distinction not relative to God, but to man; and, secondly, that it is proposed, not as an explanation of the mode in which miracles must or do take place, but only as suggesting a mode in which they may take place, and thus as answering the objection which denies that they can take place at all. For, first, the miracle is not supposed to be anything special or exceptional in the sight of God. It is as much a part of his eternal purpose from the beginning as the most ordinary natural occurrence, but it differs from ordinary occurrences in the manner in which it is manifested to us; and these modes of manifestation are, relatively to us, the ground of a valid distinction in our conceptions of the divine activity. We do not see the operation of the divine mind upon the material world in itself, but only in its effects, and it is from a difference in the effects that we infer an analogous difference in the mode of

In adopting this argument we do not, as is sometimes said, reason in a circle, employing the character of Christ as a testimony in favor of the miracles, and the miracles again as a testimony in favor of the character of Christ. For the character of Christ is contemplated in two distinct aspects: first, as regards his human perfectness; and secondly, as regards his superhuman mission and power. The first bears witness to the miracles; the miracles bear witness to the second. When our Lord represents himself as a human example, to be imitated by his human followers, he lays stress on those facts of his life which indicate his human goodness: "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart." When, on the other hand, he represents himself as divinely commissioned for a special purpose, he appeals to the superhuman evidence of his miracles as authenticating that mission: "The works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me."

It is true that the evidence of the miracles, as addressed to us, has a different aspect, and rests on different grounds from that which belonged to them at the time when they were first performed. But this change has not diminished their force as evidences, though it has somewhat changed its direction. If we have not the advantage of seeing and hearing and questioning those who were eyewitnesses of the miracles, the deficiency is fully supplied by the additional testimony that has accrued to us, in the history of Christianity, from their day to ours. If we have stricter conceptions of physical law and of the uniformity of nature, we have also higher evidence of the existence of a purpose worthy of the exercise of God's sovereign power over nature. If the progress of science has made many things easy of performance at the present day which would have seemed miraculous to the men of the first century, it has also shown more clearly how inimitable and unapproachable are the miracles of Christ, in the maturity of science no less than in its infancy. And when it is objected that "if miracles were, in the estimation of a former age, among the chief supports of Christianity, they are at present among the main difficulties and hindrances to its acceptance," we may fairly ask, What is this Christianity which might be more easily believed if it had no miracles? Is it meant that the gospel narrative, in general, would be more easy to believe were the miracles taken out of it? The miracles are so interwoven with the narrative that the whole texture would be destroyed by their removal. Or is it meant that the great central fact in the apostolic preaching—the resurrection of Christ—would be more natural and credible if he who thus marvelously rose from the dead had in his lifetime exhibited no signs of a power superior to that of his fellow-men? Or is it meant that the great distinctive doctrines of Christianity—such as those of the trinity and the incarnation—might be more readily accepted were there no miracles in the Scripture which contains them? We can scarcely imagine it to be seriously maintained that it would be easier to believe that the second Person of the divine Trinity came on earth in the form of man, were it also asserted that while on earth he gave no signs of a power beyond that of ordinary men. In short, it is difficult to understand on what ground it can be maintained that the miracles are a hindrance to the belief in Christianity, except on a ground which asserts also that there is no distinctive Christianity in which to believe. It may with more truth be said that the miraculous element which forms so large a portion of Christianity has its peculiar worth and service at the present day as a protest and safeguard against two forms of unchristian thought to which an intellectual and cultivated age is liable—pantheism, the danger of a deeply-speculative philosophy, and materialism, the danger of a too exclusive devotion to physical science. Both these, in different ways, tend to deify nature and the laws of nature and to obscure the belief in a personal God distinct from and above nature. Against both these, so long as the Christian religion lasts, the miracles of Christ are a perpetual witness; and in so witnessing they perform a service to religion different in kind, but not less important than that which they performed at the beginning.

The miracles of the Old Testament may be included in the above argument if we regard, as Scripture requires us to regard, the earlier dispensation as an anticipation of and preparation for the coming of Christ. Many of the events in the history of Israel as a people are typical of corresponding events in the life of the Saviour, and the earlier miraculous history is a supernatural system preparing the way for the later consummation of God's supernatural providence in the redemption of the world by Christ. Not only the occasional miracles of the Old Testament history, but some of the established institutions under the law—the gift of prophecy, the Shechinah, the Urim and Thummim, the Sabbathical year—are of a supernatural character, and thus manifest themselves as parts of a supernatural system ordained for and leading to the completion of the supernatural in Christ.

A practical question in connection with this subject is that which relates to the means of distinguishing between true and false miracles, meaning by the latter term phenomena pretended to be miraculous, but in fact either natural events or human impostures or fabrications. Various rules for distinguishing between these have been given by several authors, the best known being the four rules laid down in Leslie's "Short and Easy Method with the Deists," and the three given in Bishop Douglas' "Criterion." Yet the practical value of these rules is available rather for particular and temporary phases of controversy than for general and perpetual edification. A more permanent principle in relation to this question is suggested by Leslie in his remarks on the pretended miracles of Apollonius, where he shows that the assumed miracles, even if admitted, have no important connection with our belief or practice. "But now," he says, "to sum up all, let us suppose to the utmost that all this said romance were true, what would this amount to? Only that Apollonius did such things. What then? What if he were so virtuous a person as that God should have given him the power to work several miracles? This would noways hurt the argument that is here brought against the Deists, because Apollonius set up no new religion, nor did he pretend that he was sent with any revelation from heaven to introduce any new sort of worship of God; so that it is of no consequence to the world whether these were true or pretended miracles, whether Apollonius was an honest man or a magician, or whether there ever was such a man or not; for he left no law or gospel behind him to be received upon the credit of those miracles which he is said to have wrought." To this it may be added that there is an enormous a priori improbability against miracles performed without any professed object, as compared with those which belong to a system which has exercised a good and permanent influence in the world. This improbability can only be overcome by a still more enormous mass of evidence in their favor, and until some actual ca-

can be pointed out in which such evidence exists, the unimportance of a reported series of miracles as a valid reason for withholding belief in them. The Scripture miracles in this respect stand alone and apart from all others as regards the evidence of their reality combined with their significance if real.

MIRANDOLA (mi-ran-do'la), GIOVANNI PICODELLA, one of the most extraordinary persons of his time, and distinguished at once for precocity and compass of intellect, was born in 1463. Almost from his childhood he displayed remarkable powers of memory and an uncommon disposition to literature. At the age of fourteen he was sent to Bologna to study the canon law; but after pending two years in that pursuit, he attached himself to philosophy and theology, and also made himself master of the Hebrew, Chaldee and Arabic. In 1486 he repaired to Rome, in the pontificate of Innocent VIII., where, with the pardonable ostentation of a young scholar conscious of extraordinary acquisitions, he posted up nine hundred propositions appertaining to dialectics, morals, metaphysics, theology, natural magic and the cabala, extracted from writers in Latin, Greek, Arabic and Chaldee, offering to dispute with any antagonist whomsoever upon any one of them.

JOHN MILTON.

His challenge, however, was not only rendered ineffectual, but thirteen of his propositions were denounced before the pope as contrary to sound doctrine. He now withdrew to Florence, where he published an elaborate defence of these propositions, in consequence of which he was, in 1492, cited before the pontiff; but his successor, Alexander VI., by a brief, declared Pico guiltless of the new charge. The effect of these troubles upon Pico's mind was such that, although young, rich, elegant in person and manners and in some degree habituated to pleasure, he totally changed his course of life and gave himself up to devotion. He confined his future studies to theological subjects, and usually spent twelve hours a day in study. His indifference to praise led him to permit his writings to appear under another name, and he shunned those public disputations in which he had taken so much pride. But his course was terminated by death, in November, 1494.

MIRIAM (mir'e-am), sister of Moses and Aaron, and supposed to be the same that watched her infant brother when exposed on the Nile, in which case she was probably ten or twelve years old at the time. When the Israelites left Egypt, Miriam naturally became the leading woman among them. She is called "a prophetess," Ex. xv. 20. After the passage of the Red Sea she led the music, dance and song with which the women celebrated their deliverance, Ex. xv. 20-22. The arrival of Moses' wife in the camp seems to have created in her an unseemly dread of losing her influence and position, and led her into complaints of and dangerous reflections upon Moses, in which Aaron joined. For this she was smitten with leprosy, and, although healed at the intercession of Moses, was excluded for seven days from the camp, Num. xii.; Deut. xxiv. 9. Josephus says she was the wife of Hur and mother of Bezaleel. Her death took place in the first month of the fortieth year after the exodus, at the encampment of Kadesh-barnea, Num. xx. 1, where her sepulchre was still to be seen in the time of Eusebius.

MIRROR (mir'ror), Ex. xxxviii. 8; Job xxxvii. 18. In the first of these passages the mirrors in the possession of the women of the Israelites when they quitted Egypt are described as being of brass; for "the laver of brass, and the foot of it," are made from them. In the second, the firmament is compared to "a molten mirror." In fact, all the mirrors used in ancient times were of metal; and as those of the Hebrew women in the wilderness were brought out of Egypt, they were doubtless of the same kind as those which have been found in the tombs of that country, and many of which now exist in the museums and collections of Egyptian antiquities. These are of mixed metals, chiefly copper, most carefully wrought and highly polished; and so admirably did the skill of the Egyptians succeed in the composition of metals that this substitute for our looking-glass was susceptible of a lustre which has even been partially revived at the present day in some of those discovered at Thebes, though buried in the earth for many centuries. The mirror was usually nearly round, and was inserted in a handle of wood, stone or metal, the form of which varied according to the taste of the owner.

MISER (mi'ser), a person who sinfully hoards money, and cherishes it for the sake of accumulating treasure, instead of using it for the welfare of man and the glory of God. The spendthrift sins by a reckless and unwise dissipation of his means, instead of having a due regard to his possessions and the legitimate claims which his own true welfare, the claims of family, religion and society, may have on him. On the other hand, the miser sins by ignoring these claims, and using all his ingenuity and care to accumulate and hold, thus placing his happiness in the creature and making "gold his god." The miser is thus an idolater, although he does not publicly bow down to any image of wood or of stone.

MISERERE (miz-er-ay'ray). 1. A name for the fifty-first Psalm, from the first word in the Latin version of the psalm. 2. Small brackets on the under side of stall-seats in old churches, generally richly carved. These when turned up formed a rest for the occupant when standing.

MISGAB (mis'gab), the name of a place in Moab, Jer. xlvi. 1. It has the article; it may, therefore, be merely "the height," or the town on the height. Perhaps it is alluded to in Isa. xxv. 12.

MISHAEL (mish'a-el). 1. One of the sons of Uzziel, the uncle of Moses and Aaron, Ex. vi. 22. He, with his brother Elzaphan, was commanded by Moses to remove the bodies of Nadab and Abihu from the camp after they had been destroyed for their presumption in offering strange fire, Lev. x. 4. 2. One of those who stood beside Ezra when he read the law to the people, Neh. viii. 4; 1 Esd. ix. 44. 3. One of the three companions of Daniel who were cast into the burning furnace by Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iii. 13-30. His Chaldee name was Meshach, Dan. i. 7.

MISHAL. See MASHAL.

MISHEAL. See MASHAL.

MISHMA (mish'ma). 1. One of the sons of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 14; 2. A Simeonite, 1 Chr. iv. 25, 26.

MISHMANNAH (mish-man'nah), a Gadite chieftain who joined David in the wilderness, 1 Chr. xii. 10.

MISHNA (mish'na) is a part of the Talmud, the other part being the Gemara. See TALMUD.

MISHRAITES (mish'ra-ites), the designation of some family or clan, 1 Chr. ii. 53, of which nothing certain is known.

MISPAR (mis'par), or MISPERETH (mis'pe-reth), one who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 2.

MISREPHOTH-MAIM (mis're-föth ma'im), some place or district, probably not far from Sidon, Josh. xi. 8; xiii. 6, "on the north border of the plain of Acre," says Dr. Thomson, "now called Musheirifeh."

MISSA (mis'sah). 1. A name for the service of "the mass." 2. The feast of a saint was so called; as "Missa St. Joannis" for "Festum St. Joannis."

MISSAM PRÆSANCTIFICATORUM (prä-sank-tif-e-ka-to'rum), a mass so called from the fact that the elements used had been consecrated at a previous celebration. According to a canon of the Council of Trullo, the elements might be used on other days in Lent than on those in which consecration was performed; and a canon of the Council of Laodicea ordered that the eucharist should not be "offered" in Lent except the Sabbath of the Lord's day—that is, the elements consecrated on these days, and not used, might serve on other days without new consecration.

MISSAL (mis'sal) is the name of a book in the Romish Church which contains the services of the mass for the different days of the whole year. In early ages different services were described in different books, as in the "Sacramentary," which contained the communion service and collect; the "Lectionary," which contained the lessons from Scripture; and the "Antiphony," which comprised the portions designed for singing or chanting. According to Palmer, "About the eleventh or twelfth century it was found convenient to unite these books, and the volume obtained the name of the Complete or Plenary Missal, or Book of Missæ. Of this description were almost all the liturgical books of the Western Churches."

MISSIONARY APOSTOLIC, a missionary priest in the Romish Church sent by commission from the pope.

MIST. This word occurs in its literal sense of vapor in Gen. ii. 6. Some would translate "Neither had there gone up a mist." The intention of the sacred writer is to show how plants and trees came from their Maker's hand without the ordinary process which now they undergo: vegetation was by the fiat of his will, not requiring as it first showed itself the genial moisture which now fosters it. Mist is elsewhere used figuratively, Acts xiii. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 17.

MITE, the name of a small Jewish coin, referred to in Mark xii. 42 and Luke xii. 59; xxi. 2. Its value was about the fourth of an English farthing, or three hundred and fifty-two mites would equal one quarter of a dollar. See MONEY.

MITHCAH (mith'kah), a station of the Israelites in the desert, Num. xxxiii. 28, 29.

MITHNITE (mith'nite). Joshaphat, one of David's warriors, is so called, 1 Chr. xi. 43; it is not known whence.

to which they paid adoration as the purest emblem of the divine essence. The Romans also raised altars to the honor of this divinity, with the inscriptions "Deo Soli Mithræ," or "Soli Deo invicto Mithræ." It is remarkable that this form of worship resisted Christianity the longest.

MITHREDATH (mith're-dath), or MITHRIDATES (mith-rid'a-teez). 1. The treasurer of Cyrus, king of Persia, Ezra i. 8; 1 Esd. ii. 11. 2. A Persian officer in Samaria, Ezra iv. 7; 1 Esd. ii. 16.

MITRE (mi'ter), the head-dress of the high-priest, Ex. xxviii. 4, 37, 39; Zech. iii. 5.

MITRE, the pontifical ornament worn on the head by the pope, cardinals and, in some instances, by abbots in the Romish Church, and by archbishops and bishops in the English Episcopal Church on certain occasions. It appears to have been of great antiquity. Pellerin says it was worn by the regal pontiffs of the Hebrews, and with a few slight modifications was afterward adopted by the Oriental kings and pagan high-priests. As a heraldic ornament, the mitre of a bishop is surrounded by a fillet set with precious stones, and the MITYLENE (mit-e-le'ne), the chief town of Lesbos, situated on its eastern coast, with two harbors. It was noted for its beauty, riches and literary renown. St. Paul touched here when voyaging toward Palestine, Acts xx. 14. The ancient town has given name to the whole island, which is now called Mitylini. The modern town is called Castro. Some ruins still exist.

MIXED CHALICE (chal'is), or MIXED CUP. According to Cyprian, the custom of the Church was to use wine mixed with water; and he even goes so far as to rest on the example and the command of Christ for the usage. His explanation is that the water represented the people, and the wine the blood of Christ, and their union symbolizes the fact that Christ and his people are united together. The practice was authorized by

It is probably this town that is mentioned in Neh. iii. 7, and perhaps it is the Maspha of the Apocrypha, 1 Macc. iii. 46. Its site is supposed to be marked by the ancient referred to his going to the Father and the coming of the "Paraclete." Now, it appears that the Syriac translator read "Periclyte," the illustrious or praised, instead of Paraclete; and in the Arabic, which was made from the Syriac, the word is "Ahmad"—i. e., "praised"—the meaning of Mohammed being the same. In this way the prophet, instead of wounding the pride of the Arabians, flattered them by the avowal that his aim was to restore the glory of the olden time.

Mohammed was in the strictest sense a Unitarian. He rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, and he held that pictures and images are not to be employed in divine worship. He enjoined fasting during the month of Ramadan, and during all this time no food is to be eaten from daybreak to sunset, but at night refreshment may be enjoyed. Prayer preceded by ablution is to be offered up five times daily, and alms, amounting in some cases to a tenth of the personal property, are to stroyed and a new text was prepared under his authority. No classification of topics is observed, and the Mohammedan doctors are in great straits to comprehend the actual meaning of the Koran, because of the dislocation and confusion which exists in its treatment of subjects.

The leading tenets of the Mohammedan system can easily be classified without going into any detail of the minor subdivisions and sects which have come into existence in different lands and ages. Thus they believe—1. In the being and the unity of God. 2. The existence of angels; for the man is held to be an infidel who denies their being and their pure spirituality. 3. They receive the Koran as containing the will of God made known by Mohammed, "the prophet of God;" and further, that in different ages God by several prophets vouchsafed revelations of his will, which are recorded in one hundred and four books, all of which good Moslems must receive. Ten of these books count, and the culprit shall be sent to hell laden with iniquity. It is an important tenet in the Mohammedan creed that when the judgment is finished all have to pass over the bridge "Al Sirat," which is laid over hell. It is so sharp even as a sword, so narrow even as a hair, and so surrounded with briars and obstacles that the wicked shall fall off it into hell, but the good shall pass with ease, as Mohammed goes before them and conducts them in safety. The numerous hells that await the wicked are described in the Koran, and the glories of heaven, with its waters, its fruits and the charms of the beautiful females that await the followers of the prophet, are depicted in glowing colors. 6. Mohammedans are fatalists, holding that good and bad, welfare and misery, are alike eternally fixed by the divine will, that man's state, life, actions and fate are irrevocably determined, and that change or escape is impossible.

In the daily routine of the life of the Mohammedan believer importance is attached—1. To prayer, with the prescribed washings and purifications. It is necessary in prayer to direct the face toward Mecca; and in order to accuracy, a mark in the several mosques indicates what the posture of the worshiper should be. By means of tables also, when they are at a distance from any mosque, they can find out their "Keblah," or place toward which they should pray. 2. Alms are viewed as legal or voluntary, the former being those which are enjoined by the law, and the latter being such offerings as a liberal piety may lead the donor to bestow. 3. Fasting is recognized as of great importance. In fact, Mohammed designated it "the gate of religion," declaring that the "odor of the mouth of him who fasteth is more grateful to God than that of musk." This service is subdivided into—1. Fasting from food and from all lustful desires. 2. Guarding the eyes, ears and all the members of the body from sin; and 3. Ceasing from worldly care and restraining the thoughts from everything except meditating on God. 4. The pilgrimage to Mecca is of the utmost importance, for a tradition of Mohammed affirms that any one who dies without having performed it might as well die a Christian or a Jew.

In different countries fanatical practices have obtained in the religious observances of the Moslems, such as may be seen among the dervishes and other sects. So also merit can be attained not only by fasting and prayer, but by the endurance of bodily suffering, as in the case of the Doseh, the celebration of which may be understood by the illustration, for the essential principle of the system repudiates salvation through atonement and rests on personal merit as determined by the award of a righteous Judge.

Very early in the history of Mohammedanism a decided breach occurred among the professors of the Moslem faith. One of these parties is known as the Sonnites, or Traditionists—that is, in addition to the written words of the Koran, they recognize the authority of the Sonna, a collection of traditional sayings of the "prophet," which is a kind of supplement of the Koran, directing the right observance of many things omitted in that book. They are generally very strict in their fastings and other observances. There are other sects, such as the Meldwileh, or the followers of Ali, the son-in-law of Mohammed, whom they maintain to be the lawful Imam; and they claim that supreme authority in temporal and spiritual things be distributed. The Moslems practice polygamy, abstain from wine, observe the rite of circumcision, divide the year into weeks of seven days each and meet on Friday for religious exercises. The Koran is the fountain of doctrine, and it is held as sacred, its existence being held as a miracle. It is made up of alleged revelations delivered from time to time by Mohammed, and committed to writing by his disciples. These revelations were written on the leaves of the palm tree or the skins of animals; and the manuscripts, under the care of one of his wives, are said to have been deposited in a receptacle called "The Chest of the Apostleship." The prophet himself asserted that he received the Koran from the angel Gabriel, that the original was laid up in heaven, and that he was supplied with chapter after chapter as occasion required. Part of it was published by him at Mecca and part at Medina. After his death the whole was put together into a volume, but the discrepancies in the copies were so numerous that were given to Adam, fifty to Seth, thirty to Enoch, ten to Abraham, and the others to Moses, David, Jesus and Mohammed; and that as Mohammed was the last and greatest prophet, no more revelations are to be made. 4. They believe in the mission of several thousands of prophets sent as teachers, and several hundreds of apostles, all of whom were free from great sins. 5. They receive a future state and a general resurrection; and as to the judgment and the principles on which a final award shall be made, their system is somewhat peculiar and complicated. Every one's works shall be weighed in a just balance, and all shall receive satisfaction for the injuries which they may have received. Good works shall be taken from him who did the injury and given over to him who suffered it; then, when the balance is adjusted, if any good works remain, God will double the value of that remainder, and the person shall then be received into paradise. Should the good works be exhausted, the balance shall be as heretics by the orthodox. They are allied in saith to the Shiites of Persia, who are exceedingly strict in their observances. Others, such as the Nusairiyeh or the Ansairiyeh, hold a system in which Mohanmedanism and Christianity are strangely commingled; and the Ismailiyeh, who lean toward the Shiites, and who are chiefly found in the Ansairiyeh Mountains. The Druzes cannot be properly enrolled among the Moslems as a distinct sect.

MOLADAH (mo-la'dah), a town in the southern part of Judah toward the Edomitish border, Josh. xv. 26, afterward transferred to Simeon, Josh. xix. 2; 1 Chr. iv. 28. It was inhabited after the return from captivity, Neh. xi. 26. The ruins of el-Milh, nine hours to the south of Hebron, appear to mark the site.

MOLAI (mo-lay'), JACQUES DE, the last grand-master of the Knights Templar, was a native of Burgundy. He was admitted into the order about 1265, and having signalized himself by his valor in Palestine, was unanimously elected grand-master on the death of William de Beaujeu. The great wealth and power of the Templars, their pride and their dissolute manners created them a multitude of enemies, and at length Philippe le Bel, king of France, and Pope Clement V., formed a plan for their extermination. They were ac-

MOLINA (mo-le'na), LOUIS, a celebrated polemic, was born at Cuenza, in New Castile, in 1535. He became a member of the Jesuits' College, after having completed his studies at Coimbra, where he had distinguished himself by his perseverance in the acquirement of classical as well as theological learning. Molina was afterward professor of theology at Eborá, and filled the chair there for more than twenty years with great reputation, although his adversaries accused him of a leaning toward the Pelagian heresy. In support of this charge they cited his treatise "On the Harmony of Divine Grace and Free-Will," which gave rise to such a fierce altercation between the followers of Loyola and Dominic that in 1607 the pope found it advisable to issue a bull, in order to suppress them. His death took place at Madrid in 1600.

MOLINISM (mo-le'nizm) is the name of a system of theology in the Romish Church on the doctrines of grace and predestination ists, was born in 1627, near Saragossa, but passed the greater part of his life at Rome. There, in 1675, he published his celebrated "Spiritual Guide," which was condemned by the Inquisition ten years after its first appearance, and the author sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He died in prison, in 1696. The followers of Molinos, of whom Madame Guyon was the principal, were called Quietists, because they maintained that religion consists in an abstraction of the mind from external and finite objects.

The position of mollah, like all others in Turkey, is held only at the will of the sultan.

cused of heresy, impiety and various crimes revolting to human nature. In October, 1307, all the Templars throughout France were arrested at the same hour; and they were tried and convicted, some on their own confessions and others on such evidence as could be procured. Fifty-seven were committed to the flames in 1311, and after an imprisonment of seven years, De Molai shared their fate at Paris, in 1314, declaring the innocence of his order to the last.

MOLE, a well-known animal of the family Talpida. The common mole has its limbs remarkably adapted to its habits of burrowing under ground. We find the "mole" classed among unclean animals, Lev. xi. 30; but the word so translated—implying respiration—is thought to signify the chameleon. Possibly the animal in question may be the common chameleon. Moles are mentioned again in our version of Isa. ii. 20; but a different Hebrew word is used in that place. Perhaps rats or mice may be meant; and it is more likely that these should occupy deserted places than moles. Indeed, travelers tell us that the forsaken sites of the East are "perforated with the holes of cave-digging animals." Any such creatures, therefore, may be comprehended in the term.

which resembles that advocated by the Arminians among Protestants. It derived its name from the Jesuit Louis Molina, a professor of theology in the university of Evora, in Portugal, who in 1588 laid down a series of propositions on those points which he discussed in his work called "Liberi Arbitrii cum Gratia Donis . . . Concordia," or the "Concord of Free Will and Free Grace." The Dominicans attacked the work on the ground of being Pelagian or semi-Pelagian, and brought it before the Inquisition. The cause was appealed to Rome, debated for twenty years, and eventually, in 1687, by a decree of Paul V., it was left undecided. Since that time the views of Molina have been usually adopted by the Jesuits and opposed by the Dominicans, but the members of the Church are left free on the subject.

This system must be distinguished from "Molinism," a name which was attached to the views of Molinos on mystical life. He was a Spanish enthusiast, and his doctrines were condemned by Innocent XI. in 1687. The French Quietists also opposed the views of Molinos.

MOLLER (mol'ler), HENRY, a learned Lutheran divine, was born at Hamburg, in 1530. He officiated for some time as pastor to a church in the landgraviate of Hesse. He was celebrated for his skill in Biblical literature, and particularly excelled in a knowledge of the Hebrew and Chaldee languages. For fourteen years he filled the chair of professor of the Greek and Oriental tongues in the university of Wittenberg, of which he was deprived for refusing submission to the famous Form of Concord. He died in 1589. He was the author of "Commentaries on the Psalms" and other works of high merit.

MOLOCH (mo'lok), an idol-god whose name is sometimes given as Molech, Lev. xviii. 21; 1 Ki. xi. 7. It is generally identified with Milcom, 1 Ki. xi. 5, 33, Melcom, Jer. xlix. 1, 3, margin, and Malcham, Zeph. i. 5.

To this idol the Hebrews sacrificed children in the valley of Hinnom. According to the rabbins, its image was of brass, with the head of an ox and the members of a human body. It was hollow, and was heated from below, the children to be sacrificed being placed in its arms, while drums were beaten to drown their cries. It has, however, been questioned whether the children were actually burnt or only made to pass through the fire for a purification. But that they were really destroyed may be gathered from several passages of Scripture, Ps. cvi. 37, 38; Jer. vii. 31; Ezek. xvi. 20, 21; xxiii. 37. It is probable, indeed—especially from the passages last referred to—that the children were not burnt alive, but first put to death, their bodies being then burnt.

THE DOSEH.—See MOHAMMEDANISM.

Pentateuch, was practiced among the Canaanites, but it is questionable whether it was of Canaanitic origin. Keil, maintaining that the Milcom to whom Solomon built a high-place, the abomination of the Ammonites, was different from Moloch, supposes that the worship of the latter was introduced from the Assyrians. Ahaz certainly appears to be the first who practiced it in Judah.

Moloch has been identified with Saturn, and points of resemblance have been noted in the descriptions of their worship; but perhaps it may be more just to regard this idol as one of the forms of Baal, the sun-god, to whom in Carthage and Numidia children were immolated.

It may be added that, as the Hebrew name of this idol signifies ruler or king, the idol may possibly be sometimes meant where "king" appears in our version—for example, Isa. xxx. 33; lvii. 9.

It has hence been thought that the worship of it was very widely spread in Israel, more so than at first sight might be thought.

MOMMIERS (mom'myerz), a term which since 1818 has been applied to certain religionists in Switzerland, parts of France and Germany who became dissatisfied with the evangelical party. The word is derived from the French "momerie," which signifies "mummery." They have been compared to the Wesleyans in England, who in their origin became dissatisfied with the Established Church, and endeavored to reform and spiritualize the members. In 1818, under the ministrations of Cæsar Malan and Robert Haldane, the movement began. Mr. Haldane had established a class at Geneva in 1817 (of whom Merle d'Aubigné was one) which soon provided a better description of pastors than had been known for a long time in that city. The prayer-meetings held by these (after the custom of Methodists and Evangelicals in England) gained for them the absurd name of "Mommiers," but in the year 1831 the party was strong enough to form an organized body with a theological college, and it then became known as "The Evangelical Society of Geneva." A similar society was afterward formed on the opposite shore of the lake for the Canton de Vaud.

MONASTERIES (mon'as-ter-eez), DISSOLUTION OF. Monasteries were dissolved in England both before and at the time of the Reformation. The earliest case was in 1312, when the Templars were suppressed, and their lands were given in 1323 to the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem. During the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth centuries the conviction had been growing in the public mind that the evils which had been developed in monastic life demanded eradication, and accordingly commissioners were appointed by Parliament to "visit" the English monasteries, and in October, 1535, the work began. In ten weeks the examination closed. The report showed that property to a large amount had been embezzled and misapplied, rules were systematically violated, and many of the houses had become scenes of gross immorality. Disgraceful impostures were laid bare. The Rood of Grace at Bexley, Kent, which hung its lip when a pilgrim offered silver, shook its beard merrily at an offering of gold—motions which the multitude attributed to divine power, but which were shown to be worked by wires. At Hales, in Gloucestershire, the blood of Christ, which none in mortal sin could see, was a colored substance in a cunningly contrived vial, visible in one position and invisible in another, while the smaller foundations were found to harbor the greatest amount of vice and fraud. The result was that in 1536 an act was passed under which 376 monasteries with incomes not exceeding £200 a year were suppressed, and their revenues, amounting to about

The larger houses were next visited, and the total number of monasteries suppressed was 555; and in the year 1539 an act was passed which gave the king the control of their revenues, amounting to nearly £160,000 a year. Next year the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem were suppressed, and thus the last remnant of English monachism was removed. Six new bishoprics (instead of fourteen, as Cranmer advised) were established out of the proceeds, aid was given to Trinity College and King's College Chapel, and to a few grammar schools, while large sums were given to civilians for their services. The see of Rome itself had furnished a precedent for these attacks on monastic institutions. In 1517 Wolsey designed some reformation of the clergy, and he aimed at building and endowing two splendid colleges, one at Ipswich, the place of his birth, the other at Oxford, the place of his education. For this purpose Pope Clement VII. granted him a bull which empowered him to dispense for a certain time with the laws of the Church, and to visit and suppress monasteries. Accordingly, from nineteen to forty (for the record is uncertain) were dissolved, and their revenues were applied by Wolsey to the purpose contemplated, and thus Rome herself inaugurated and sanctioned the policy of treating monastic property as liable to alienation when public interest required, and on this plea Parliament afterward acted when the wholesale dissolution was carried out.

MONASTERY (mon'as-ter-e), a house for the reception of monks and persons who lived together to cultivate a religious life, and the establishment was called, according to circumstances, an abbey, a priory, a convent or a nunnery. Originally they were places of learning, of education for missionary work, for benevolence and the aid of the poor and the distressed, as well as for retirement and a secluded life. See MONKS.

MONCREIFF (mon-kreef'), SIR HENRY, an eminent divine and ecclesiastical leader in the Church of Scotland, was born in 1750. In 1775 he became minister of St. Cuthbert's, in Edinburgh, where he remained till his decease. He was zealous, learned and of impressive address, and was frequently chosen moderator of the General Assembly. He wrote "Discourses on the Evidences of the Jewish and Christian Revelations" and an "Account of the Life and Writings of Dr. John Erskine." He died in 1827.

MONEY (mun'ë). The first intimation of the use of precious metals as expressive of value is that which speaks of Abraham as "rich in cattle, in silver and in gold," Gen. xiii. 2. This, it will be observed, is just after the patriarch's return from Egypt, where he had been treated well and enriched by Pharaoh for his wife's sake, Gen. xii. 16. Now, the Egyptian monuments show us that gold and silver were there used in the form of rings, and that these rings were placed in scales, payments being made by the weight of the metal. Abraham, therefore, if ignorant of it before, would have become acquainted with a circulating medium in Egypt, and might have brought back with him some of the forms of gold and silver—in other words, the ring-money—which he there found. Some time after, he received a present from Abimelech, king of Gerar, of "a thousand pieces of silver," Gen. xx. 16, according to our version. These thousand pieces, we may suppose, were of some definite weight. Still later we have the purchase of the field and cave of Machpelah for four hundred shekels of silver, Gen. xxiii. 16, 17; but that this was not coined money and that the shekel was simply here a measure of weight is evident from the expression used that "Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver." Afterward Jacob bought a piece of land of the children of Hamor "for an hundred pieces of money," Gen. xxxiii. 19.

We find soon after another monetary transaction. The sons of Jacob went down into Egypt to buy corn, and they took money with them. This money is frequently mentioned, but with distinct reference to weight, Gen. xlii. 25, 27, 35. Money is again spoken of as paid by the Egyptians and Canaanites to Joseph for corn; but the circulating medium, whatever it was, does not seem to have been very abundant. For it was all speedily gathered up, and then barter was resorted to, Gen. xlvii. 14-16. Here also is presumptive evidence that there was no coin, which would most likely in the process of ordinary business have been again disseminated, instead of coming into and remaining in Joseph's hands. Indeed, there is little reason to believe that Egypt had a coinage till the Persian conquest, when coins were introduced, as afterward by the Greeks. In several of the enactments of the Mosaic law shekels are mentioned in the imposition of a poll-tax, Ex. xxx. 13, 15, in the compensation or redemption-money for a vow, Lev. xxvii. 3-7, etc. The shekel was a measure of weight, and therefore we may still suppose that the silver—for it is observable that silver and not gold is almost exclusively mentioned in monetary transactions—was told out by weight.

But though coins are not as yet distinctly named, it is clear that the process of buying and selling must have brought the usage pretty nearly to what it would be with a coinage. And there is a singular narration in the life of Saul which confirms this. When Saul was about to consult Samuel in regard to the asses which had been lost, he paused, because he had no present ready, without which he could not think of waiting on the seer. But his servant had about him a bit of silver, the fourth part of a shekel, and this it was agreed should be offered to Samuel, 1 Sam. ix. 6-8. It is manifest that there was no weighing at the time of this transaction, and that, whether its weight had been previously ascertained or not, this little piece of silver was to all intents and purposes for commercial value the same as if it had been coined.

This, however, it must be repeated, was not coined money, and it is observable that in Assyria and Babylonia clay tablets have been found commemorating grants of money specified by weight. Probably the Lydians were the first to coin. At all events, the first idea of impress and actual coin is due to them, while the Æginetans must have the credit of completing pieces of money according to our notion of it by adding a reverse design. Greek coinage may, it seems, be carried up to the eighth century before Christ, but purely Asiatic cannot be traced too early. It is clear, therefore, that coinage could not have been known in Palestine till the taking of Samaria, 721 B. C.

On the return from captivity coined money is really mentioned, the "drams"—i. e., darics—of the Persian kings, Ezra ii. 69; viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70-72, and the same word occurs in 1 Chr. xxix. 7. See DARIC. There were coins of Alexander and the Syrian monarchs. And afterward Jewish rulers coined money themselves. The first notice of this occurs in the Apocrypha. The Syrian king Antiochus VII. granted to Simon Maccabæus the power of coining money with his own impress, 1 Macc. xv. 6. This appears to have been 139 B. C. Subsequently there were coins of the Idumæan kings, coins issued by the procurators of Judæa under the Roman emperors from Augustus to Nero, coins during the first revolt under Eleazar, those which commemorate the capture of Jerusalem, also the imperial colonial coins struck at Jerusalem by Adrian and succeeding emperors, and those by the Arabian conquerors to 695 A. D.

The materials of coins have most generally been gold, silver, copper, but other substances have been occasionally employed, such as iron, tin, lead, leather, wood, shells. The names of Hebrew money were significant, talent implying circle, globe, perhaps aggregate sum, shekel weight, bekah division—i. e., half—gerah grain or bean.

It is to be observed that the legends on Jewish coins are in a character nearly resembling what is now called the Samaritan, and the representations are most probably the pot of manna and Aaron's rod which budded. The gold shekel weighed one hundred and twenty-nine grains troy; the silver

MONEY-CHANGERS were wont to sit with their tables, especially about the great feasts, in the court of the Gentiles, ready at a small profit to supply worshipers from distant countries with the current money of Judæa, and in particular with the half-shekel, which every adult Jew was in the habit of paying yearly into the treasury of the temple. In itself the trade was a perfectly lawful one, if carried on in a proper and becoming manner; and the rebuke administered by our Lord to those whom he found plying it, both on a first and a second visit to the temple, was called forth simply by their pressing this worldly traffic into the precincts of the sanctuary, and profaning what should have been kept secret to holy uses.

MONK (munk). The term is derived from the Greek word "monachos," which means a solitary person; and it has been used generally to signify a person who retires from the world to give himself wholly to God, to live a religious life, either in solitude or in a society where certain rules are observed, and in the practice of ascetic habits. Monasticism had its origin in the early days of persecution, when many Christians found safety in retirement from the scenes and intercourse of ordinary life to the deserts of Egypt, where they could live in safety. Thus the seeds of the system were planted which eventually grew and expanded not only in the East, but which spread over the West, and by its agency in the different orders and subdivisions of orders which arose produced most important results on the development of Christianity. The system of asceticism and the tendency to mysticism which began in the East to creep into the Christian Church soon affected the lives of those who thus retired from the world, and aided very rapidly in increasing their numbers.

In early times monks were distinguished as "solitaries," or those who live alone in places remote from society, as hermits continue to do. The "cœnobites" lived in communities under certain rules, and presided over by a head of their institution, and the "sarabites," or those who wandered about without any fixed residence.

Although the first regular monks who had established residences were those of St. Anthony, it is probable that Paul, the hermit of Thebes, was the root of the system, and his example rapidly made the tendency to retirement very popular. The regulations which Anthony had made among his followers in Egypt were carried by Hilarion into Palestine and Syria. Eugenius and others carried the monastic tendency into Mesopotamia; and in a short time the system spread throughout all the East, and great numbers retired from all the enagements and duties of public life to languish out their existence in a condition in which it was held that they could enjoy more close and holy fellowship with God and more thoroughly prepare for eternity. Monasticism was brought into the West by the great Athanasius when driven from his see, and his Life of Anthony contributed much to promote asceticism in Italy and Gaul. Ambrose and Augustin were both in the number of its patrons, and Jerome labored with all his might to extend the system; but in the Western Church it did not prevail so rapidly at first as it did in the East. It is said that St. Martin, the eminent bishop of Tours, erected the first monastery in Gaul, and he commended the desirableness of religious solitude with such effect that the cause prospered; and it is reported that no less than two thousand monks attended his funeral. And thus the monastic discipline, once fairly started, extended until it became firmly established in all the countries of Europe. Jerome did not meet with the success at Rome which he desired, and he went to the East. In Palestine he was permitted to use all his zeal for the advancement of his favorite views.

Originally, monks were laymen, and they were distinguished from other people by the peculiar dress which they wore, by their living together in their respective establishments, and by their profession of greater devotion and their attention to stricter rules of living, and various ascetic practices which they observed in their secluded lives. They have been named from their "orders," and for many centuries they have popularly been called by titles derived from the peculiarities of their dress; thus they are spoken of as Franciscans, Dominicans or Augustinians, and as Black Friars, White Friars and Gray Friars.

The climate of Egypt, Palestine, Syria and the adjacent countries was peculiarly favorable to the indulgence of the monastic spirit, for there the solitary could support himself on a slender stock of food and remain day and night under the shade of a rock. Near a stream or a well of water, he could live on a little grain or some fruits, and indulge in safety his desire for meditation; and hence it came to pass that when Anthony returned to the capital of Egypt his presence produced the most wonderful effects, and the mania for monachism assumed the form of an epidemic; and so great was the commotion that the Council of Gangra (the metropolis of Paphlagonia, in Asia Minor), held about A. D. 369, was obliged to interpose and check its extravagance. This council denounced the folly of those who in their zeal for celibacy refused to receive the eucharist from the hands of married presbyters, and forbade husbands and wives, under pretence of piety, to separate from each other and desert their families. So also, in

A. D. 365, the emperor Valens found it necessary to enact a law requiring that all who had betaken themselves to what was called a religious life through sloth, or with a view to evade their social obligations, should be dragged from their seclusion.

While Hilarion carried monachism into the East, Basil is still more widely known as the leading patron of the system, and almost all the monasteries of the East continue to the present day to observe the rules of Basil. The monks of the West could not subsist on the slender diet sufficient to sustain their brethren in Palestine or Syria; and though they were partially guided by the rule of Basil, the great work of improving their organization was effected by Benedict in the sixth century. His celebrated monastery was established about A. D. 529 at Monte Cassino, in Campania, and it has ever since served as the model for all the houses and branches of his order.

In process of time, as the institution became

and strictness of life, or at the reformation of abuses which in the lapse of time had crept into the orders. Thus, the Benedictine order, which at the commencement was governed by rules of great strictness, fell into laxity of observance, and hence arose the "Clugniacs," the "Carthusians," the "Cistercians," and the orders of "Camaldoli," "Vallombrosa" and "Grandmont." All these adhered to the Benedictine rule, and they each aimed at giving more tone and efficiency to the order. The "Clugniac" order was founded A. D. 927 by Odo, the abbot of Clugny, in Burgundy. The "Carthusian" was founded A. D. 1084 by St. Bruno, at Charteux, near Grenoble. This was the most severe of all the reformed Benedictine orders. In A. D. 1098 the Cistercians were established by Robert de Thierry at Citeaux, the object being to devote to labor the hours which the Benedictines had set apart for study.

Another great monastic family is included under the generic name of "Augustines," embracing the "Canons Secular" and the "Canons Regular of St. Augustine." This class has been considered as the parent rule of all the monastic orders and religious communities which are not included under the Benedictine order; and retrospectively it included all the distinguished recluses and clerics before the institution of St. Benedict from the fourth to the sixth century.

The convents of Friars were not independent bodies; like the Benedictines and Augustines, as each order was an independent body governed by the general of the order, and under him by provincial priors, priors of the convents and their subordinate officers. These are usually reckoned four orders of friars—the "Dominicans," "Franciscans," "Carmelites" and "Augustines." They were called friars out of humility, as their founders would not have them called Father and Dominus, like the monks, but simply Brother (frater, frère, friar).

The Dominicans and Franciscans rose at the beginning of the thirteenth century. Dominic, a Spaniard, who had been an Augustinian canon, founded the Dominicans with the special aim of converting heretics. The Dominicans have been learned, energetic, dogmatic and stern controversialists. They have been the preaching friars, and as inquisitors their fame has for merciless cruelty been deeply engraven on the pages of history. The aim of the Franciscans, who agreed with the Dominicans in the vow to hold no property, was mainly to do good among men. They, like their founder, were ardent, fanciful and enthusiastic. They held most firmly the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, which the Dominicans as vigorously opposed, and the war between these orders on this point was long lish Exercises" and the "Key" to the Exercises. He also published an "English Spelling-book," a "Selection from Horne's Commentary on the Psalms" and "The Duty and Benefit of Reading the Scriptures." After his death a memoir of his life, of which he had prepared a part himself, was completed by Elizabeth Frank, of York, and published. He died at Holdgate, in 1826. Notwithstanding the fact that a multitude of grammars have been published since his day, very competent teachers hold that as a brief, well-condensed, easily-understood and comprehensive compend of principles the "Grammar" of Lindley Murray is exceeded by none of them.

MURRAY, NICHOLAS, D.D., was born at Ballynaslow, in Ireland, in 1802. He emigrated to this country in 1818, and on his arrival in New York he was admitted to the printing-office of Harper & Brothers. He left the Church of Rome, in which he had been brought up, became seriously impressed with religious truth, and after having with great energy secured a theological education at Princeton, New Jersey, he was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry as pastor of the church at Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, in 1829. In 1833 he was removed to Elizabethtown, New Jersey, where he remained until his death, in 1861. He rose to great eminence in the Church, in which he was greatly beloved. He became moderator of the General Assembly in 1849. Two years previously he had distinguished himself by a series of letters on the Romish controversy, addressed to Archbishop Hughes, which for shrewdness, keen logic, playfulness and good-humor have, perhaps, never been surpassed. In 1853 and in 1860 he visited Europe, and his "Men and Things as I saw them in Europe," afterward published, had a wide circulation. He was the author of a great number of works, the chief of them being—"The Happy Home," "Preachers and Preaching," "Parish and other Pencilings," "Romanism at Home," "American Principles and National Prosperity" and a "History of Elizabethtown." A volume of his sermons was published after his death. Dr. Murray was deservedly held by all who knew him as one of the most excellent, genial, pious and attractive men of his day.

MUSCULUS (mus'keu-lus), ANDREW, a Lutheran divine, was a native of Schneberg, in Misnia. He was appointed to fill the theological chair at Frankfort-upon-the-Oder, made superintendent-general of the churches in the march of Brandenburg, and died in 1580. He persuaded himself that some predictions in the Scriptures indicated great revolutions which should speedily take place in Germany, and that the end of the world was near at hand; and he wrote upon these subjects with the assurance of one who claimed to have a key to all the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments.

MUSCULUS, WOLFGANG, a celebrated German Lutheran divine and Hebrew scholar, born at Dentze, in Loraine, in 1497. His father being poor, he gained his education by singing from door to door as a traveling scholar. At fifteen he entered a Benedictine house at Lutzelstein, directing himself to the study of divinity and the Holy Scriptures, and gaining celebrity as a popular preacher. The perusal of Luther's Theses, in 1518, led him to embrace the Reformed doctrines, which he defended with such zeal from the pulpit that he became known as the "Lutheran Monk." In 1527 he was chosen prior of the convent; but alarmed by plots against his life, he fled to Strasburg. He afterward obtained various ministerial charges at Dortisheim, Strasburg, and in 1531 at Augsburg, enduring the rigors of extreme poverty with the utmost constancy, and devoting himself to the study of Greek, Hebrew and Arabic. In 1536 he attended the Synod of Eisenach as deputy of the senate, and in 1540-41 acted as secretary during the diets of Worms and Ratisbon. In 1547, when Charles V. came to hold a diet at Augsburg, Musculus was deprived of his church, and having boldly attacked the Interim, withdrew to Switzerland, and having declined an invitation of Archbishop Cranmer to settle in England, became, 1549, professor of divinity at Berne, where he discharged his duties with diligence and well-deserved reputation until his death, in 1563, at the age of sixty-six.

MUSES (men'zes). In the Greek and Roman mythology nymphs or inferior divinities were called by this name. They presided over poetry, painting, rhetoric, music, and generally over the liberal arts. Helicon and the region around Parnassus was the favorite seat of the Muses, where, under the presidency of Apollo, they were supposed to be engaged in song and the dance. It is probable that the early Grecian poets, recognizing the beauty of the scenery in that part of Greece, clothed it with fable, and placed it under tutelary divinities. Originally there were only three of these divinities, though Cicero speaks of four, named "Mneme," "Melete" and "Aeode," or "Memory," "Reflection" and "Song," thus showing the arts over which they were supposed to preside.

MUSHITES (moosh'ites), a family of Levi, descended from Mushi, Num. iii. 33.

MUSIC (meu'zik). We find a very early notice of music in Scripture, Gen. iv. 21. Indeed, it is but natural to man to express his feelings by some kind of modulated sounds which would be varied according as the emotion was joyous or mournful. We may be sure, therefore, that from the first infancy of the world music was practiced, rough and simple in its original, Ex. xxxii. 17, 18, to be afterward refined and regulated.

Music, though little is said of its cultivation as a science, is spoken of as the accompaniment of family celebrations, of leavetaking or return, Gen. xxxi. 27; Luke xv. 25; as the expression of triumph, Ex. xv. 1-21; of grief, Matt. ix. 23; as soothing a distempered mind, 1 Sam. xvi. 16-18, as customary at revels, Isa. xxiv. 8, 9, and cojoined with dancing; also as connected with religious observances, 1 Sam. x. 5; as composing the spirit of a prophet, 2 Ki. iii. 15. David made regulations for sacred music, appointing twenty-four bands of twelve, two hundred and eighty-eight in all, under the superintendence of Asaph, Heman and Ethan or Jeduthun, who were to order the services of praise. Provision was made for the instruction and training of musicians, for masters and scholars are specially mentioned, and there was a body of four thousand Levites out of whom choirs could be selected, 1 Chr. xv. 16-24; xxiii. 5; xxv. We may conclude that under such guidance the musical art attained considerable perfection, and the delight experienced from it is sometimes alluded to, Ezek. xxxiii. 32. Of course in times of sorrow the sweet strains of music ceased, Ps. cxxxvii. 2; and it was peculiarly descriptive of utter desolation when the sound of musical instruments was no more heard in a city, Rev. xviii. 22. Some notice is taken in Scripture of the music of Gentile nations, Dan. iii. 5; vi. 18.

Of the nature of Hebrew music we can best judge from that which at present prevails among the Orientals, consisting not so much in harmony (as the term is now usually applied) as in melody or unison. Vocal and instrumental music were combined, Ps. lxix. 25, and different choirs appear to have taken separate parts. Thus, on an occasion already referred to, Miriam and the women are represented as responding to the strain led by Moses. The music was doubtless of a monotonous character, less pleasing to ears accustomed to modulations and cadences, but acceptable to Eastern taste.

MUSICAL (meu-si'k'l) INSTRUMENTS. The obscurity attaching to this subject has been long felt and complained of. But much light has of late been thrown, by the discovery of Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, upon the instruments which were used by these two great peoples—the nearest neighbors of the Hebrews, and with whom, at different periods of their history, they came into close and long-continued contact; and we have now the advantage of being able to infer, with a high degree of probability, if not with absolute certainty, from these collateral examples, what were the forms and powers of at least the principal instruments referred to in the Hebrew Scriptures.

The musical instruments of the Hebrews were of three main kinds—1. Stringed instruments; 2. Wind instruments; 3. Instruments of percussion.

I. STRINGED INSTRUMENTS.—We begin with these, because upon almost all occasions of the

which he painted excelled the series of eleven large pictures which he executed for the hospital of San Jorge, at Seville, belonging to the Hermandad de la Santa Caridad. Eight of these were pictures of Charity. Besides these chefs-d'œuvre, Seville still possesses in its museum "The Charity of St. Thomas of Villanueva," a work which Murillo esteemed above all his other works. This eminent artist was engaged on a large picture of the espousals of St. Catherine, as an altar-piece for the church of the Capuchin friars at Cadiz, when mounting a scaffold, he fell, and received a hurt which caused his death, in 1682.

MURRAY (mur'-re), JOHN, who was born in Alton Hampshire, England, in 1741, has been considered the founder of Universalism in America. His family removed to Cork, in Ireland, in 1752. When young, he joined the Wesleyans and became a preacher. He returned to England in 1760, and adopted Universalist opinions, and ten years after, he emigrated to the colonies. He itinerated through New York, New Jersey and New England, preaching the doctrines which he had embraced. He was viewed as a spy in the interests of Great Britain for a time, and on this ground he met with trouble in Massachusetts. He became a chaplain of a Rhode Island brigade, but ill health obliged him to retire, and he settled at Gloucester as a Universalist preacher. In 1785 a convention was held at Oxford, Massachusetts, to advance the cause of Universalism, in which he took part, and three years afterward he returned to England. After preaching in that country for a few years, he was designated to a church at Boston, Massachusetts, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died in 1815. His chief works are "Letters" and "Sketches of Sermons," and an autobiography, of which several editions have been published.

MURRAY, JOHN, born in Antrim county, Ireland, in 1742, and educated in Edinburgh, came to this country in 1763. He settled as a Presbyterian minister in Philadelphia, whence he removed to a charge in Maine; and in 1781 he settled in Newburyport, where he remained until his death, in 1793. He was a man of vast eloquence;

He turned aside to the law, and was admitted to the bar in 1766; but he left the bar for the counting-house. During the Revolutionary struggle he resided at Islip, Long Island, where he

it is recorded of him that a company of soldiers was raised for the Revolutionary army in two hours from the effect of one of his addresses. He exercised great influence in his district, and he was extensively known. He published works on "Original Sin" and on "Justification."

MURRAY, LINDLEY, the eminent grammarian, was born in 1745, at Swatara, near Lancaster, Pennsylvania. His family belonged to the society of Friends; and as his father was a merchant, he was educated with the view of entering on commerce. He turned aside to the law, and was admitted to the bar in 1766; but he left the bar for the counting-house. During the Revolutionary struggle he resided at Islip, Long Island, where he attempted the business of making salt, without success; but in New York he afterward gained a competency by trade. In 1784 he went to England and purchased a small property at Holdgate, near York, where he resided until his death. In 1787 he issued a tract on "The Power of Religion on the Mind," which had an immense circulation. Then in 1795 appeared his great work, the "English Grammar," followed by his "Eng-

MUNCER (mun'ser), MUNTZER, or MUNZER, THOMAS, a famous German fanatic, was born toward the end of the fifteenth century, at Zwickau, in Misnia, and after being educated for the Church became a disciple of Luther, whose principles he propagated for some time with great zeal and success in Thuringia. Being, however, of an enthusiastic turn of mind, it was his misfortune to become connected with Nicholas Storck, the leader of a fanatical branch of the sect of Anabaptists. To his notions Muncer became a convert, and having been rebaptized, embarked in making proselytes to his new principles from among his former associates. These wild and en-

He was elected professor of Hebrew and theology at the university of Heidelberg, and subsequently at that of Basle, where he died of the plague, in 1552. Besides being an eminent Hebraist, he was also an excellent mathematician. Yet his erudition is hardly more praised by his contemporaries than his modesty. He published a Latin version of the Bible, from the Hebrew, with notes; "Universal Cosmography," which was translated into the principal European languages, and is noteworthy as the first of modern general geographies; a Latin translation of Josephus, and other works.

MURDER (mur'der). The principle on which the act of depriving any one of life was regarded by the Almighty as a capital offence is defined in Scripture to be an outrage on the likeness of God in man, to be punished with death even when caused by an unreasoning creature. The language in Genesis is very positive on this subject, ix. 5, 6. The prohibition against murder, viewed in its social aspect, appears to be implied also in the direction to replenish the earth which immediately follows, Gen. ix. 7.

God had kept the punishment of murder in his own hand until now, as we gather from the story of Cain, whom he banished, though he suffered nobody to kill him; but the time had arrived when God thought fit to authorize rulers to punish capitally any who had shed the blood of another.

In Egypt the laws against those who deprived a man of life were inexorably severe. To slay even a foreign slave was a crime punished with death. And so particular were they in such matters that to be an accidental witness of an attempt to murder, without endeavoring to prevent it, was a capital offence, which could only be palliated by bringing proofs of inability to act. The Greeks were also most careful of the lives of their slaves. It was the same amongst the Jews, according to the law of Moses. If a slave who had been beaten by his master with a rod died under his hand, the master was punished with death; but if he survived the beating a day or two, the master was not punished, because it might be presumed, as he smote with a rod in place of a sword, that he only intended to correct him, not to kill him. Besides, no man could be thought willing to lose his own goods, as such servants were. All penal laws were to be construed as favorably as possible to the accused, Ex. xxi. 20, 21.

Striking a pregnant woman so as to cause her death was punished capitally, Ex. xxi. 22, 23. So also if a vicious "ox" caused the death of any one, not only was the animal destroyed, but the owner likewise, if he had taken no steps to prevent such a calamity, was deemed guilty of murder, and suffered accordingly, Ex. xxi. 28, 29. So minute were the details affecting life in the law of Moses that it appears, from Ex. xxii. 2, 3, that it was lawful to kill a housebreaker taken at night in the act; but if the sun had risen, it became unlawful, and he was to be sold instead.

MURILLO (mu-ri'l'o), BARTOLOME ESTEBAN, the great Spanish painter, was born in 1618. The execution of a series of pictures in the "Claustro Chico" of the Franciscan convent in Seville brought his name into renown, and was the beginning of his brilliant career. The chief subjects of his easel were Madonnas and holy families; but it is generally agreed that nothing thusiasm spread wonderfully among the peasants of Thuringia, and combined with the spirit of revolt against tyrannical oppression which broke out among them about the same time, produced the most unhappy tumults and commotions. Backed by forty thousand enthusiasts, he commanded the sovereign princes of Germany to resign their authority to him, as armed not only with temporal force, but with directions from Heaven. His devastations were great, till the landgrave of Hesse took up arms. Muncer, with the title of king, met him in the field, promising his associates a complete victory; but after losing seven thousand of his followers, he fled to Franchausen, where he was seized, and afterward beheaded at Mulhausen in 1525.

MUNSTER (moon'ster), SEBASTIAN, a German divine, was born in 1489, at Ingelheim, in the Palatinate. At sixteen years of age he went to divine, was born in 1735, at Lubeck, and educated at the university of Jena. Having acquired much celebrity by his pulpit eloquence, he was appointed chaplain to the orphan-house at Gotha and dean of the court. He was afterward invited to Copenhagen to be pastor of the German congregation in that city. In 1772 he attended the unfortunate count Struensee during his imprisonment. The account given by Munter of Struensee's conversion was read with great avidity. Several editions of it were sold in a few months, and it was translated into several European languages. By this means Munter's name became known throughout every part of Europe. A consequence of this work was another, entitled "Conversations of a Reflecting Christian with Himself." He died in 1793, very generally and deservedly regretted.

prophets. Muggleton was prosecuted and convicted of blasphemy in 1676, and died in 1697.

MUHLENBERG (meu'len-berg), HENRY ERNST, D.D., who became eminent as a Lutheran minister, was born in 1753, in Montgomery county, Pennsylvania. After being educated in Philadelphia, he proceeded to Europe, and went to Halle, where he studied for several years, and in 1770 he returned to America, and was ordained at Reading, Pennsylvania. He preached as an assistant to his father in Philadelphia, which he had to leave during the Revolutionary struggle. In the spring of 1780 he settled in Lancaster, where he continued to labor until his death, in 1815, in the sixty-second year of his age, having preached in Lancaster during thirty-five years. He was a man of great learning. In botany and other departments of natural science he stood very high, and as a pastor he was deservedly beloved.

MUHLENBERG, HENRY MELCHIOR, D.D., was born in 1711, in the electoral principality of Hanover. In early life he had to struggle with adverse circumstances, owing to the death of his father and the limited means of the family. Still, he persevered with remarkable energy; and availing himself of the aid of a fund raised for meritorious students, he entered the university of Gottingen, lately established. He began his course in 1735, and next year he began to teach, although the propriety of his course was questioned. In 1737 he entered the theological seminary, and thence he passed to Halle. In 1741 he accepted an offer to proceed as a missionary to America, and on the 22d of September, 1742, he landed in Charleston, South Carolina. Ere long after, reaching Philadelphia, he was elected to three charges, viz., Philadelphia, New Providence and New Hanover, and for two years and a half he labored with great diligence in sustaining these congregations. From 1745 until 1761 he lived at New Providence, and in the latter year he removed to Philadelphia; and when the Revolutionary troubles affected the churches, he had again to retire to New Providence. He died in 1787, with words of triumph on his lips, and he was regretted by all the ministry of the Lutheran Church whom he had seen growing up around him, and esteemed by all who knew him as a faithful, pious and laborious servant of the Lord.

MUIS (mwe), SIMON DE, a learned French Hebraist and Biblical critic, was born at Orleans in 1587. He became canon and archdeacon of Soissons, and in 1614 became professor royal of the Hebrew language at Paris. He is considered one of the ablest Hebrew scholars whom France has produced, and besides his profound skill in this language possessed a solid judgment, an intimate knowledge of religion and sacred history, and all the necessary qualifications for an excellent interpreter of the Scriptures. His commentary on the Psalms is allowed to be one of the best critical illustrations of that portion of the Bible which have been given to the world. He died in 1644. Besides the work already mentioned he wrote numerous learned notes, illustrative of difficult passages in the Old Testament from Genesis to Joshua.

MULBERRY (mul'ber-e) TREE, the name of a tree, which signifies "weepers"—i. e., weeping or distilling—is so given in our version, 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chr. xiv. 13, 14. But though mulberry trees are now found all over Palestine (see SYCAMINE), the tree in question is rather a balsam tree, distilling white "tears" of a pungent, acrid taste. Mulberries are mentioned in the Apocrypha, 1 Macc. vi. 34. See SYCAMINE.

MULLER (mool'ler), ANDREW, a celebrated German divine and linguist, was born in 1630, at Greiffenhagen, in Pomerania, and educated at Konigsberg and Wittenberg. He became so skilled in the Oriental languages that he was invited to England by Walton to assist him in his Polyglot Bible, on which he labored with incredible diligence for ten years. After his return to Germany he retired to Stettin, where he devoted himself exclusively to the study of languages, after having published the Lord's Prayer in sixty-six alphabets. He died in 1694.

any description of hybrid. Hybrids are not prolific, or only under certain limitations. The Hebrews were forbidden to let their cattle gender with another kind, Lev. xix. 19; but the prohibition does not seem to have been directed altogether against the use of such animals, but rather against the taking means to produce them. Still, mules for riding are not mentioned before the time of David, when they became common, 2 Sam. xiii. 29; 2 Ki. v. 17. They were used, it appears, both for domestic service and in war; also on state occasions, one being specially appropriated to the king. Mules were imported into Palestine, 1 Ki. x. 25; probably from Egypt, Armenia and Persia. We find them mentioned as an article of commerce between Togarmah and Tyre, Ezek. xxvii. 14. From Tyre, therefore, the Israelites could supply themselves. The mule is a proverbially patient and sure-footed animal, obstinate, but active and highly serviceable. It is still much used in the East, and in other countries, as Spain, etc.

theology at Copenhagen, and in 1830 bishop of Zealand. He was author of the "Sagabibliothek," a useful chronological view of the perplexing mass of Icelandic legends; of critical examinations of the Edda of Snorro and of the work of Saxo Grammaticus, and other historical and critical treatises, besides several theological works. He was also editor for twenty-five years of one of the leading literary journals of Denmark. He died in 1834.

MUMMY (mum'me), a word derived from the Arabic "mumia," which comes from "mum," signifying wax. It is applied to the dead bodies of men or animals which by any means have been preserved from putrefaction. Mummies have been divided into two classes, natural and artificial, the former being made by some mineral or peculiar condition of soil or atmosphere which preserves the tissues while certain gases escape, the latter where artificial means are used for the preservation of the body. The Greeks and Romans to tain, Isa. ii. 2; xi. 9; Dan. ii. 35, and its universality by its being the resort of all nations, and by its filling the whole earth. The mystic mountains of the Apocalypse denote kingdoms and states subverted to make room for the Messiah's kingdom, Rev. vi. 14; xvi. 20.

The Chaldean monarchy is described as a mountain in Jer. li. 25; Zech. iv. 7, and the Targum illustrates the idea by substituting the word "fortress" in the former text. In this view, then, a mountain is the symbol of a kingdom or of a capital city with its domains, or of a king, which is the same. Mountains are frequently used to signify places of strength, of what kind soever and to whatsoever use applied, Jer. iii. 23.

Eminences were very commonly chosen for the sites of pagan temples; these became places of asylum, and were looked upon as the fortresses connected with idolatrous practices, Gen. xxxvii. 34; Ex. xxxiii. 4-6; Lev. xix. 27.

MOUSE. This animal was forbidden as an article of food to the Hebrews, Lev. xi. 29; Isa. lxvi. 17. An esculent species of dormouse may be meant here, though some suggest the jerboa. But it is likely that the term is generic, including various species. The ravages of field-mice are referred to in 1 Sam. vi. 4, 5, 11, 18. There are several kinds of these, of which the short-tailed field-mouse is said to be still very destructive to the harvest in Syria. See MICE.

MOUTH. There are some phrases into which this word is introduced which may require explanation. To speak with any one "mouth to mouth," Num. xii. 8, means in person, without cut it down. So that to mow must be understood as all one with reaping, and the instrument employed a sickle or some such article.

MOYER'S LECTURES (moy'erz lek'churz). This is the name of a series of lectures which were founded by Lady Moyer. The Bampton and the Boyle lectures are of the same order. Lady Moyer designed that the lectures on her foundation should be preached at St. Paul's or elsewhere in London on the doctrine of the Trinity and the Deity of Christ. Among the lecturers were Berriman (1723), "Historical Account of the Controversies that have been in the Church concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity;" Bishop (1724), "The Errors and Absurdities of the Arian and Semi-Arian Schemes;" Browne (1730), "Divine Authority of the Christian Religion and the Natural Deity of the Lord Jesus Christ its Author;" Ridley (1730), "The Divinity and Operations of the Holy Ghost." Waterland, Dawson, Twell, Felton and others of equal eminence were among the lecturers, but in time the course was suspended, and the fund has been alienated or directed to another object.

MOZA, or MOZAH (mo'zah). 1. A descendant of Judah, son of Caleb, 1 Chr. ii. 46. 2. One of King Saul's posterity, 1 Chr. viii. 36, 37; ix. 42, 43. 3. A place in the territory of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 26. It has not been certainly identified.

MUFFLERS (muf'flerz). The word so rendered, Isa. iii. 19, is derived from a root signifying "to tremble." It denotes light, thin veils, so called from their tremulous or fluttering motion. They consisted of two pieces, united by clasps near the eyes, and hung over the face to and defenders of the worshipers, by reason of the presence of the false deities in them. On this account mountains were the strongholds of paganism, and therefore in several parts of Scripture they signify idolatrous temples and places of worship, Jer. iii. 23; Ezek. vi. 2-6; Mic. iv. 1.

MOURNING (mōrn'ing). For the ceremonies of mourning on occasion of deaths see FUNERAL. Similar signs of grief were customary on other occasions of public or domestic calamity. Persons wept, laid aside ornaments, rent their clothes, struck their breasts or their thighs, fasted, lay upon the ground, went barefoot, wore sackcloth or black or dirty garments, covered their heads or lips, and put dust upon them, lay in ashes, pulled their hair and their beards, tearing themselves with their nails and making incisions in their flesh. Some, however, of these excesses were forbidden as being con-any mediator; "with one mouth," 1 Ki. xxii. 13, with one accord; "with the mouth" or with the whole mouth, Job xix. 16, earnestly, with strength of voice; to "put words in" another's "mouth," Ex. iv. 15, to suggest to him what to say; to be "in" one's "mouth," Ex. xiii. 9, to be often spoken of; to "lay the hand upon the mouth," Jud. xviii. 19, to be silent; to "write from" a person's "mouth," Jer. xxxvi. 4, to write at his dictation. A "mouth" is also put for a spokesman, or, so to speak, mouthpiece, Ex. iv. 16. There are many similar uses of the word which it is easy to understand.

MOWING (mo'ing), though once or twice used in our English Bible, Ps. cxxix. 7; Amos vii. 1, can scarcely be said to exist in Palestine as a separate thing from cutting with the sickle. The climate is too hot and dry to admit of the herbage reaching such a height as to require a scythe to protect it from the sun. The clasps were doubtless gorgeous; and to these, perhaps, particular allusion may have been intended by the prophet.

MUGGLETONIANS (mug'l-to'ne-anz), the name of a sect founded by Ludowick Muggleton. He was born about 1610. He was a tailor by trade, and began to attract attention as a preacher and writer in conjunction with one Reeve, about 1650. The two gave themselves out for the last and greatest prophets of Jesus Christ, and pretended that they had absolute power to save or damn. The numerous writings in which they set forth their ridiculous pretensions and fantastic doctrines were collected and published so recently as 1832. They found many believers in their day, and some remnants possibly still linger among us, although the sect is not mentioned in the British census report of 1651. George Fox and William Penn were the principal opponents of the new occurs in Job iv. 19; Isa. l. 9, and elsewhere. The Greek σῆς is also so rendered in Matt. vi. 19, 20; Luke xii. 33. There can be no doubt that some species of the genus Tinea is intended. In almost all the cases in which the moth is mentioned it is in reference to its habit of destroying garments. Now, it was customary in the East to accumulate articles of apparel, hence the allusion is peculiarly apposite. We may therefore fairly suppose that the Tinea pellionella, the clothes-moth (not excluding some kindred species), is meant. The larvæ of this insect constructs a kind of nest or case of the material on which it feeds; compare Job xxvii. 18, "He buildeth his house as a moth," and it is said to be common in Palestine.

MOTHER (muth'er). There is nothing that can be reckoned very peculiar to the Hebrews in the natural use of this term and the relation it indicates, but the figurative use of it is carried somewhat farther than is usual in colder latitudes. Not only were they wont to designate a country or city the mother of those who belonged to it—a usage common to most nations—but a larger city was wont to be called the mother of the villages dependent on it, which consequently were its daughters, 2 Sam. xx. 19; Josh. xv. 45, etc. Also a place where two ways part has the designation of mother applied to it, Ezek. xi. 21; though not so expressed in the Authorized Version, it appeared like the prolific source from which they both issued. The other applications can give rise to no difficulty.

MOULDING (mold'ing), a word which is derived from the French "moule," is an architectural term which is applied to the ornamental outline or form given to the edges of the projecting or receding members of the various points of a building. There are eight sorts of mouldings, technically called the fillet, which is square in profile; the astragal; the torus, being larger than the astragal; the scotia; the echinus, or quarter round; the inverted cyma, talon or ogee; the cyma recta, or cymatium; and the cavetto, or hollow.

MOULDY (mold'e), Josh. ix. 5, 12. The word so translated properly means "crumbs." It occurs again in 1 Ki. xiv. 3, where our version has CRACKNELS, which see.

MOULIN (moo-long'), DU, the name of a French family, several members of whom were eminent as theological writers.

1. PETER, was born at Buhy, in the Vexin, in 1568, and studied at Sedan, and afterward at Christ's College, Cambridge. He obtained the professorship of philosophy at Leyden, where he had among his pupils the celebrated Grotius. In 1599 he became minister of Charenton and chaplain to Catharine of Bourbon, whom he preserved in the Protestant faith against all the machinations of the papists. In 1615 he was invited to England by James I., who gave him a prebend of Canterbury. He was afterward deputed by the Gallican Church to the Synod of Dort, where the affairs of the Reformed churches were to be discussed, but was prevented from going thither by intrigues and menaces. He was offered, in 1618, the divinity chair of Leyden, but declined it, though he afterward settled at Sedan as theological professor and minister of the Church. He died in 1658. He wrote, among other things, "On the Keys of the Church" and "A Defence of the Reformed Churches."

2. PETER, a divine of the Church of England and son of the preceding, was born at Paris about 1600, and educated at Leyden. Afterward he went to England, and thence removed to Ireland, where he resided successively at Lismore, Youghall and Dublin. In the latter city he remained several years, and for a considerable time preached constantly in the church of Saint Peter-in-the-East. After the restoration of Charles II. he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king, and promoted to a prebendal stall in the metropolitan church of Canterbury, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died in 1684. He wrote "The Blood of the King crying to Heaven," which was published by Alexander More, and drew down on its editor the castigation of Milton.

3. LOUIS, younger brother of the preceding, and the author of several learned pieces maintain-

Troyes in the twelfth century. That performance consists of an abridgment of the historical parts of the Old and New Testament, accompanied with glosses and comments, and it is the form in which alone the Bible was read for a long period in France. Des Moulins commenced his undertaking in 1291, and finished it in about four years. In 1297 he was promoted to the deanery of his chapter, and died soon after.

MOUNTAIN, JACOB, the first Protestant bishop of Quebec, was born in Norfolk, England, in 1750, and was educated at Caius College, Cambridge. In 1793 he was nominated to the bishopric of Quebec, where he presided with dignity and erected a cathedral. He was also active in promoting missions, building churches and establishing schools. Previous to his advancement he held the livings of Holbeach, in Lincolnshire, Buckden, in Huntingdonshire, and a prebend in the cathedral of Lincoln. He died in 1825.

ing the principles of non-conformity to the Church of England, was born at Paris in 1603. He pursued his studies at the university of Leyden, and afterward settled in England. He became zealously attached to the Independents, through whose influence he was appointed Camden professor of history at Oxford. This preferment he retained till the restoration of Charles II., when he was expelled from it by the king's commissioners. Upon this event he retired to Westminster, where he practiced as a physician until his death, in 1680. Among other works he published "A Short and True Account of the Several Advances the Church of England hath made toward Rome" and "Moral Reflections upon the Number of the Elect."

MOULINS (moo-long'), GUYART DES, born in 1251, was a priest and canon of Aire, in Artois, and was the first who gave a translation of the Scriptures in French. In this work he did not pretend to give a version from the Hebrew and Greek originals, but only to render into French the celebrated performance of Peter, dean of MOUNTAINS (mown'tenz). The mountains mentioned in Scripture are noticed under their different names, and a general statement with reference to the mountains of Palestine is given under that head. We have therefore in this place only to notice more fully some remarkable symbolical or figurative uses of the word in the Bible.

In Scripture the governing part of the body politic appears under symbols of different kinds. Thus the words head, mountain, hill, city, horn and king are used in a manner as synonymous terms to signify a kingdom, monarchy or republic under one government, only with this difference—that it is to be understood in different respects; for the term head represents it in respect of the capital city; mountain or hill in respect of the strength of the metropolis, which gives law to or is above and commands the adjacent territory. When David says, "Lord, by thy favor thou hast made my mountains to stand strong," Ps. xxx. 7, he means to express the stability of his kingdom. It is according to these ideas that the kingdom of the Messiah is described under the figure of a moun-

The Israelites frequently murmured and were disobedient during about forty years. In a part of the desert of Kadesh, which was called Zin, near the boundaries of the Edomites, after the sister of Moses had died, and after even the new generation had, like their fathers, proved to be obstinate and desponding, Moses fell into sin, and was on that account deprived of the privilege of introducing the people into Canaan. He was appointed to lead them only to the boundary of their country, to prepare all that was requisite for their entry into the land of promise, to admonish them impressively and to bless them.

It was according to God's appointment that the new generation also, to whom the occupation of the country had been promised, should arrive at their goal only after having vanquished many obstacles. Even before they had reached the real boundaries of Canaan they were to be subjected to a heavy and purifying trial. It was important that a man like Moses was at the head of Israel quest and distribution of the whole country, and took leave of his people with powerful admonitions and impressive benedictions, transferring his government to the hands of Joshua, who was not unworthy to become the successor of so great a man. With a longing but gratified look, he surveyed from the elevated ground on the border of the Dead Sea the beautiful country destined for his people.

Moses died in a retired spot at the age of one hundred and twenty years. He remained vigorous in mind and body to the last. His body was not buried in the promised land, and his grave remained unknown, lest it should become an object of superstitious and idolatrous worship. This honor was due not to him, but to the Lord, who had manifested himself through the whole life of Moses. Not the body, but the word, of Moses was permanently to abide in Israel. The people of God produced no prophet greater than Moses, because by none was the Lord more glorified.

Among all the men of God recorded in the Old Testament, Moses presents the most wonderful and imposing aspect.

The Pentateuch is the greatest monument of Moses as an author. The ninetyeth Psalm also seems to be correctly ascribed to him. Of the poetical pieces in the Pentateuch, some are certainly, others probably, of his composition. To the former belong the "songs" in Ex. xv. 1-19 and Deut. xxxii. 1-43, and the blessing on the tribes in Deut. xxxii. 1-15; to the latter the pieces in Ex. xvi. 16; Num. xxi. 14, 15, 16, 27-30. Some learned men have endeavored to prove that he was the author of the book of Job, but their arguments are inconclusive.

Numerous traditions, as might have been expected, have been current respecting so celebrated a personage. Some of these were known to the ancient Jews, but most of them occur in later rabbinical writers. The name of Moses is celebrated among the Arabs also, and is the nucleus of a mass of legends. The Greek and Roman classics repeatedly mention Moses, but their accounts contain the authentic Biblical history in a greatly distorted form.

MOSHEIM (mos'hime), JOHANN LORENZ VON, the famous ecclesiastical historian, was born at Lubeck, October 9, 1694. He began to teach philosophy in the university of Kiel when yet a young man, and with great success. In 1725 he removed to Helmstadt, where he occupied the chair of theology until 1747, when he became chancellor and professor of divinity in the university of Göttingen, occupying that high position till his death, September 9, 1755. The best known of his very numerous works is his "Institutes of Ecclesiastical History," written in Latin, and translated into German and English. The Institutes is a clear, skillful, impartial, though somewhat mechanical compend, after the centurial style and arrangements of Flacius. Mosheim was a liberal Lutheran, distant alike from pietism and rationalism. It may be added that while in his Institutes his neutrality and apparent coldness have been construed into indifference, his other writings manifest glowing piety and ardent emotion.

MOSQUE (mosk) is the name of a Mohammedan place of worship. Mosques, like Christian churches, are of various sizes, and they differ greatly in the splendor of architectural style and decoration. Generally they assume the form of a square or parallelogram. The chief interior decoration of mosques consists in the lamps, which are numerous and arranged in a peculiar manner. The floor is covered with carpets, and the direction of Mecca is indicated by a niche or by a tablet inscribed with verses from the Koran, called the Keblah. In Arabia and Syria, and especially in India, large mosques have large quadrangles, surrounded with numerous columns, which, in the manner of Gothic cloisters, enable the Moslems to walk under cover. At the entrance of mosques there is usually a large court planted with trees, in the centre of which or under a vestibule paved with marble are fountains for prescribed ablutions, while small galleries are attached to them as dwelling-places for the ministers and officials. There are other mosques set apart as places for the instruction of young men in science and in the doctrines of the Koran, and hospitals for the poor, the sick or insane persons are attached to them. Many of these are largely endowed. Before the consolidation of the power of the Moslems they used the buildings which they found in those countries that they subjugated, but very speedily they began to exhibit their skill and taste in the splendid mosques and other edifices which indicate the Arabian or Moorish type. Pictures and images are not admitted into any Moslem temple.

MOSS, ROBERT, a learned divine and celebrated preacher of England, was born at Gillingham, in Norfolk, in 1666, and educated at Cambridge. He was chaplain to William III., and afterward to Queen Anne. In 1708 the parishioners of Saint Lawrence Jewry, in London, invited him to accept of their Tuesday's lectureship. His lectures were constantly attended by a numerous audience, and particularly by the clergy of the first distinction in the city. In 1712 the queen nominated him to the deanery of Ely. Upon the accession of George I. he was sworn, a third time, chaplain in ordinary, which place he retained till 1718, when the part which he took in the famous Bangorian contest gave such offence at court that he was dismissed. He died in 1729. He was the author of a treatise on the Bangorian controversy, entitled "The Report Vindicated from Mis-Reports."

MOSSOM (mos'sum), ROBERT, a learned Irish prelate who, during the usurpation, was silenced and persecuted. After the Restoration he was made, in 1660, dean of Christ Church, Dublin, and in 1662 prebendary of Knaresborough in the cathedral of York. Thence he was promoted to the see of Derry in 1666, with which he held his deanery of Christ Church, but resigned his prebend. He died at Londonderry in 1679. He wrote "Narrative Panegyric on the Life of George Wild, Bishop of Derry."

during all these providential dispensations. His authority was a powerful preservative against despondency under heavy trials.

Having in vain attempted to pass through the territory of the Edomites, the people marched around its boundaries by a circuitous and tedious route. Two powerful kings of the Amorites, Sihon and Og, were vanquished. Moses led the people into the fields of Moab over against Jericho, to the very threshold of Canaan, Num. xx., xxi. The oracles of Balaam became, by the instrumentality of Moses, blessings to his people, because by them they were rendered conscious of the great importance of having the Lord on their side.

Moses happily averted the danger which threatened the Israelites on the part of Midian, Num. xxv.-xxxii. Hence he was enabled to grant to some of the tribes permanent dwellings in a considerable tract of country situated to the east of the river Jordan, Num. xxxii., and to give to his people a foretaste of that well-being which was in store for them.

Moses made excellent preparations for the con-denounced ruin on them and captivity on the nation of their votaries: "Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off; the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces; it shall be also carried into Assyria for a present to King Jareb; Ephraim shall receive shame, and Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel." The memory of this sin, especially of Aaron's share in its origin, is retained sadly and bitterly by thoughtful Jews; a proverb of theirs attests somewhat strangely this sentiment: "No punishment happeneth to thee, O Israel, wherein there is not an ounce of the sin of the calf." But the Mohammedans, no less than the Jews, labor hard to explain away, or at least extenuate, the odium of this idolatry. In the Koran there are many express references to Aaron's calf the two chief are—Sura, vii. 146-148, and Sura, xx. 81-96.

MOSERA (mo-se'ra), or MOSEROTH (mo-se'roth), one of the stations of the children of Israel, Num. xxxiii. 30, 31. Evidently it must have been near to Mount Hor, where Aaron died.

MOSES (mo'zes), the lawgiver of Israel, belonged to the tribe of Levi, and was a son of Amram and Jochebed, Ex. vi. 20. His brother Aaron and his sister Miriam, both his seniors, constituted the other members of the family. According to Ex. ii. 10, the name means "drawn out of water." Even ancient writers knew that the correctness of this interpretation could be proved by a reference to the Egyptian language. In Coptic mo signifies "water," and ushe, "saved;" and with this derivation accords also the Greek form of the name, Mouses. Hence it appears that the name is a significant memorial of the marvelous preservation of Moses when an infant, in spite of those Pharaonic edicts which were promulgated in order to lessen the number of the Israelites. It was the intention of divine Providence that the great and wonderful destiny of the child should be from the first apparent; and what the Lord had done for Moses he intended also to accomplish for the whole nation of Israel.

It was an important event that the infant Moses, having been exposed near the banks of the Nile, was found there by an Egyptian princess, to whom Jewish tradition gives the name of Thermuthis, and that, having been adopted by her, he thus obtained an education at the royal court, Ex. ii. 1-10. Having been taught all the wisdom of the Egyptians, Acts vii. 22, the natural gifts of Moses were fully developed, and he thus became in many respects better prepared for his future vocation. Though educated, however, as an Egyptian and the adopted son of the daughter of the Pharaoh, his own mother was his nurse, and to this doubtless his adherence, when he came of age, to the religion and people of his fathers is to be traced.

After Moses had grown up, he returned to his brethren, and, in spite of the degraded state of his people, manifested a sincere attachment to them. He felt deep compassion for their sufferings, and showed his indignation against their oppressors by slaying an Egyptian whom he saw ill-treating an Israelite. This doubtful act became by divine Providence a means of advancing him farther in his preparation for his future vocation, by inducing him to escape into the Arabian desert, where he abode for a considerable period with the Midianitish prince-priest Jethro, whose daughter Zipporah he married, Ex. ii. 11. Here, in the solitude of pastoral life, he was appointed to ripen gradually for his high calling, before he was unexpectedly and suddenly sent back among his people, in order to achieve their deliverance from Egyptian bondage.

His entry upon this vocation was not in consequence of a mere natural resolution of Moses, whose constitutional timidity and want of courage rendered him disinclined for such an undertaking. An extraordinary divine operation was required to overcome his disinclination. On Mount Horeb he saw a burning thorn-bush or acacia, in the flame of which he recognized a sign of the immediate presence of Deity, and a divine admonition induced him to resolve upon the deliverance of his people. On this occasion God revealed to Moses had deserved death. The formidable power of paganism, in its conflict with the theocracy, was obliged to bow before the apparently weak people of the Lord. The Egyptians paid tribute to the emigrating Israelites, Ex. xii. 35, who set out laden with the spoils of victory.

The enraged king vainly endeavored to destroy the emigrants. Moses, firmly relying upon miraculous help from the Lord, led his people through the Red Sea into Arabia, while the host of Pharaoh perished in its waves, Ex. xii.-xv.

After this began the most important functions of Moses as the lawgiver of the Israelites, who were destined to enter into Canaan as the people the full import of his covenant name. See JEHOVAH. Thus instructed, he returned into Egypt, where neither the dispirited state of the Israelites nor the obstinate opposition and threatenings of Pharaoh were now able to shake the man of God.

Supported by his brother Aaron, and commissioned by God as his chosen instrument, proving, by a series of marvelous deeds in the midst of heathenism, the God of Israel to be the only true God, Moses at last overcame the opposition of the Egyptians. According to a divine decree, the people of the Lord were to quit Egypt, under the command of Moses, in a triumphant manner. The punishments of God were poured down upon the hostile people in an increasing ratio, terminating in the death of the first-born, as a sign that all of promise, upon whom rested the ancient blessings of the patriarchs. By the instrumentality of Moses they were appointed to enter into intimate communion with God through a sacred covenant, and to be firmly bound to him by a new legislation. Moses, having victoriously repulsed the attack of the Amalekites, marched to Mount Sinai, where he signally punished the defection of his people, and gave them the law as a testimony of divine justice and mercy. From Mount Sinai they proceeded northward to the desert of Paran, and sent spies to explore the land of Canaan, Num. x.-xiii. On this occasion broke out a violent rebellion against the lawgiver, which he, however, by divine assistance, energetically repressed, Num. xiv.-xvi.

is used to designate a species of painting or representation of objects by means of minute stones of different colors so arranged that their shades blend with each other and present the appearance of a picture. The work is carefully laid on and fastened to a back, usually of metal. The art was practiced many ages ago, and it was reintroduced to Italy by the Byzantine Greeks. Mosaics, because of the care and labor required for their production, are very costly; and when well executed, they are exceedingly effective. In St. Peter's at Rome there are several works of this style executed on a vast scale, and they are magnificent specimens of art.

MOSCHOLATRY (mos-shol'a-tre), or CALF-WORSHIP. Prominent among the characteristic sins of the Jewish people stands "moscholatry." In spite of the divine prohibi-ship, 1 Ki. xi. 40; xii. 2. In the Egyptian worship of Apis, therefore, most writers, with a remarkable unanimity, have found the original hint which suggested the Jewish calf-worship.

The fickle and impatient Israelites requested, in the protracted absence of their lawgiver, that his brother would make them "gods to go before them," Ex. xxxii. 1, probably "back again to Egypt," Acts vii. 39, 40. Aaron gratified their impious desire by an expedient suggested by the superstition of Egypt. The fatal compliance of their leader only encouraged them in the indulgence of their tendency to the grossest idolatry; the dedication festival itself was turned by them into a heathen revel; "the people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play," giving themselves fully up to the most indecent ritual of pagan worship, comp. Ex. xxxii. ver. 6 with ver. 25.

bols of Jehovah, and we have the patent fact that Holy Scripture recognizes a distinction between this image-worship of Jeroboam and the idolatry of Ahab. The Baal-worship of the latter was a rejection of Jehovah, whereas the ritual of Jeroboam expressly, like Aaron's, acknowledged the God "which had brought Israel out of Egypt," compare Ex. xxxii. 4 and 1 Ki. xii. 28 with Lev. xxii. 32, 33, and provided a feast "like unto the feast that is in Judah," with other institutions resembling those of the temple, 1 Ki. xii. 32, 33. By and by, when Jehu had executed the judgment of God upon the family of the apostate Ahab, the divine approbation is expressed in terms which indicate the distinction which we have stated, see 2 Kings x. 28-31. In the history of Ahab himself the sacred historian had plainly indicated the distinction in 1 Ki. xvi. 31-33; but the most expressive passage is 2 Ki. iii. 2, 3, where, concerning Ahab's son Jehoram, it is said that "he wrought evil in the sight of the Lord, but not like his father and like his mother, for he put away the image of Baal. . . . Yet he clave unto the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, which made Israel to sin."

But it is a dangerous exegesis which draws distinctions or degrees in a question of sin and moral guilt. It is observable how the least flagrant, no less than the most violent, of these cases of image-worship led to idolatry and apostasy. Not only did Aaron's calf lead on to Moloch and Chiun, and Jeroboam's to Baal and Ashtaroth, but even Gideon's domestic and apparently harmless ephod soon degenerated into the gross formulary of Baalberith, Jud. viii. 27 compared with 33. A great deal of discussion has been indulged in as to how Moses destroyed the golden calf. Both from the narrative in Ex. xxxii. 20 and his own statement in Deut. ix. 21 it seems that he adopted much ceremony to mark his indignation at the sin of his brother and the people. He tion in the moral law, a sensuous representation of deity was constantly resorted to from the very beginning of the nation to the time of the captivity. Various forms of this idolatrous tendency appear in the sacred history. In the ephod of Gideon, Jud. viii. 27, and in the images and teraphim of the Ephraimite Micah, Jud. xvii. 5, we have what may be called the domestic instances; while in the golden calf of Aaron and the calves of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, occur the public and state form of the image-worship. In this article we have only to do with the latter instances. In the moscholatry both of Aaron and of Jeroboam a connecting link with Egypt is afforded us in the sacred narrative. In the case of Aaron we have not only the general fact of Egypt having been the birthplace of the sinning people, but the clear comment of Ezekiel, in xx. 6-10, on their conduct; while in the case of Jeroboam we have the fact that it was after a long residence in Egypt, in the court of Shishak, that he devised the wor-

The Jewish writers exhibit much anxiety to exculpate the brother of Moses; some, as the Jerusalem Targumist, pretend that Aaron yielded through fear to the frenzied crowd who had slain his colleague Hur for resisting their insane request. But Eben-Ezra rejects with disdain a theory which, while rescuing Aaron from one imputation, overwhelms him with a worse. He takes the view that the golden calf was not at the first designed to be an idol, but a symbol of Jehovah; that afterward it was the people who abused it as an object of idolatrous adoration. Aben Ezra sees in this view a reconciliation of some difficulties, and justly, as it seems to us. Identical in drift and character was the moscholatry of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat. The avowed purpose of his calves at Dan and Bethel was to provide his new subjects with a substitute of divine worship which should supersede their attendance at the temple-service at Jerusalem, 1 Ki. xii. 26-29. Some writers regard these images, no less than Aaron's, as cherubic sym-took the calf, melted it in the fire to destroy its shape; then ground or beat or filed the gold into small pieces or dust, and threw the latter into the water of the stream which flowed from Horeb. "This," says Kalisch (on Ex. xxxiv. 15, 24), "is the only possible explanation which the literal sense of the text admits. Moses threw the atoms into the water, as an emblem of the perfect annihilation of the calf, and he gave the Israelites that water to drink, not only to impress on them the abomination and despicable character of the image which they had made, but as a symbol of purification, to remove the object of the transgression by those very persons who had committed it, compare Num. xix." Not less decisive, though more tardy, was the fate of Jeroboam's moscholatry. However astutely designed by its founder, it carried the seeds of its own dissolution from the very first. In 2 Ki. xvii. 22, 23, the fall of the kingdom is expressly attributed to the gods of Jeroboam, and the prophet Hosea had scended in the sixth generation from Anthony Morse, who emigrated from Wiltshire, in England. He was educated at South Woodstock and Yale College, graduating in 1788. He began the work of education, and was licensed to preach in 1785, and next year he became a tutor in Yale College. Being urgently pressed to settle at Midway, in Georgia, he went thither; but he only re-when in college, he was a great advocate for the forms and ceremonies of the Church. An examination of the practical morality of the two parties during the civil war led him to adopt the side of the Parliament, and ere long he became an earnest Puritan from conviction. He had become a Fellow of college, which position he resigned to become minister of Blisland, a place from which his father had been ejected for nonconformity. Being ejected himself, he began to teach with a view to aid the dissenters who were excluded from the universities, and after twenty years of trials and annoyances he was obliged to emigrate to New England. It was expected that he might have been made president of Harvard College, but the policy of James II., which was felt in the colony, prevented the scheme, and he taught philosophy at his own dwelling. In 1686 he was inducted as pastor of Charlestown, when he was about sixty years of age. He continued in this charge until his death, and along with this position he held the office of vice-president of the college, a place which had been specially created for him. He died in 1698, leaving a great number of small works behind him. He had an aversion to large books, considering a "great book a great evil."

MORTON, JOHN, archbishop of Canterbury and cardinal, was born in 1410, at Bore, in Dorset-

where he joined the earl of Richmond. In 1486 he was made archbishop of Canterbury, and the next year lord chancellor; in 1493 he was created a cardinal, in 1494 elected chancellor of the university of Oxford, and he died in 1500.

MORTON (mor'ton), THOMAS, was one of the most eminent of the bishops of Durham since the Reformation. He was educated in St. John's College, Cambridge. For five years he held the office of university lecturer, and he distinguished himself very greatly at York by a discussion to which he was brought with two celebrated Romanists. Here his conduct elicited great admiration because of his services during the prevalence of the plague, as he separated himself from the population and became a hospital attendant on the sick. He was raised to the see of Durham in 1632, and he expended all the revenues of the diocese in hospitable, charitable and other Christian uses. No relative or member of his family was ever enriched by him. During the civil wars he was ejected from his house in London, but the earl and countess of Rutland protected him. He was also shielded by a friend in Hertfordshire, and by Sir Henry Yelverton in Northamptonshire, until his death, in 1659, in the ninety-fifth year of his age.

MORUS (mo'rus), SAMUEL FRIEDRICH NATHANAEL, an eminent German professor of the last century, was born November 30, 1736, at Laubau, in Upper Lusatia. He entered the university of Leipzig in his nineteenth year. He became a devoted pupil of Ernesti, and under the guidance of this celebrated master of exegesis laid the foundations of his future usefulness and renown. In 1768 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Leipzig. In 1771 he was chosen to fill the chair of the Greek and Latin languages, and in 1782 he mained six months, and on his return to the North he was settled as pastor in Charlestown, Massachusetts. In 1804 he took a leading part in opposing the election of a professor of divinity in Harvard College, on the ground that the appointee did not hold the theological views of the founders, and which views were intended to be inculcated in the institution; and in order to stem the tide of principles which he believed to be erroneous, he commenced and edited "The Panoplist," which was conducted with great vigor. He was influential in the establishment of the theological seminary at Andover, and he sustained this institution with all his vigor as long as he lived. During his early experience as a teacher he felt the want of a suitable text-book on geography, and his first work on this subject was published in 1784. This became the germ of all his future geographical productions; and his services in this department entitle him to be considered the father of American geography. His geographies and his gazetteer have had an immense circulation. He removed to New Haven in 1820, and he resided there until his death, in 1826. In addition to his literary works, he published from year to year an immense number of sermons, nearly all of which were preached on public occasions.

MORTAR (mor'tar), Num. xi. 8; Prov. xxvii. 22. See MILL. Dr. Thomson says a large stone mortar is found in every house in Palestine, and that it is commonly used to bray wheat in to make kibby, a favorite dish.

shire. He received his education at Baliol College, Oxford, after which he became principal of Peckwater Inn, now merged in Christ Church. In 1473 he was appointed master of the rolls, in which situation he adhered faithfully to Henry VI., notwithstanding which Edward IV. made him bishop of Ely, and lord chancellor in 1478. Richard III., however, committed him to the custody of the duke of Buckingham, who confined him in his castle of Brecknock, from which fortress he escaped to Ely, and next to the Continent, was called to fill the vacancy in the theological faculty occasioned by the death of Ernesti. He died November 11, 1792. It was as a teacher rather than as a writer that the influence of Morus was chiefly felt. His works are mostly posthumous publications, among which are "Theological and Philological Dissertations" and "Introduction to Paul's Epistle to the Romans."

for at the point where the place was seen Abraham left his attendants, and loaded Isaac with the wood, taking himself the fire and the knife. Gerizim is seen miles away, and it is inconceivable that the patriarch and his son should toil along, burdened as they were, for several miles. The most probable belief, therefore, is that the scene of Abraham's sacrifice was on the spot where afterward the temple stood, not far apart from that on which our Saviour suffered.

MORIN (mor'in), JEAN, Latin Morinus, the author of several works of Biblical interest, was born at Blois in 1591. He was educated in the Protestant faith, and studied at Leyden. In 1618 he renounced Protestantism and entered the Congregation of the Oratory, then recently established. Among his published works are the "Samaritan Pentateuch," in Samaritan and Hebrew letters, and "A Samaritan Grammar and Lexicon." He has been regarded as the restorer of the ancient Samaritan language. He died in 1659.

MORLEY (mor'lee), GEORGE, a learned Anglican prelate, was born in 1597. He became successively chaplain to the earl of Carnarvon and to Charles I., who presented him to the canonry of Christ Church. In 1642 he was nominated one of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster. In 1660 he was appointed bishop of Winchester. In 1661 he was one of the chief speakers at the Savoy Conference. He was a benefactor to the university of Oxford, and expended several thousand pounds in repairing Winchester Palace and Farnham Castle. His death occurred in 1684.

MORLIN (mor'lin), JOACHIM, a German Lutheran divine, was born in 1514, and educated at Wittenberg, where he distinguished himself by his proficiency in philosophy and theology, and by his skill as a disputant. Having been admitted to the ministry, he discharged the duties of that profession, first at Wittenberg, and then at Eisleben, Wollin and Arnstadt. In 1543 he was ex-earl of Essex, and papers were sent up to the pulpit so frequently, importuning prayer on their behalf, that compliance was found to be impossible. Accordingly, a morning hour was appointed for this purpose, one half to be spent in prayer and the other half to be devoted to the exposition of subjects bearing on the doctrines and duties which were of moment at the time. After the war the lecture so far changed its character as to become casuistical, and the course continued until the reign of Charles II. These lecture-sermons were published in several volumes under the title "Morning Exercises," and they were in great demand for many years. Archbishop Tillotson was one of the lecturers. The sermons were preached, some at St. Giles, some at Cripplegate, and a volume on Popery at Southwark.

MORONE (mor'o-ne), GIOVANNI, a celebrated cardinal, was born at Milan in 1509, and educated at Modena and Padua. At the age of twenty he was nominated by Clement VII. to the bishopric of Modena, and in 1536 Paul III. appointed him nuncio in ordinary to the king of the Romans, and he was present at the diets held at Hagenau and Spire. It was chiefly owing to him that, after much discussion concerning the approaching general council, the proposal for holding it at Trent was agreed upon. His success was rewarded in 1542 with the cardinalate, and he was fixed upon to be president of the council. On the assembling of the council, however, he was excluded from the presidency from the suspicions of the French, who thought him too much devoted to the cause of the emperor. This cardinal, though a staunch papist in all his disputations with the Protestants, yet disapproved of the rigorous methods which some zealots employed to bring them back to the Romish Church. His levity caused him to fall under the suspicion of Paul IV., who caused him to be arrested, and charged him with having entertained and favored heretics. He obtained, however, a complete absolution, and was appointed president of the Council of Trent, and by the dexterity of his management he brought its affairs to a conclusion in 1563. During the troubles of Genoa, in 1575, he was sent thither as legate by Gregory XIII. He died at Rome in 1580.

MORRISON (mor-ri'son), ROBERT, D.D., an eminent missionary and Chinese scholar, was born in Newcastle-on-Tyne, in Northumberland, in 1782. He was the first Protestant missionary to China who went to that country under the auspices of the London Missionary Society. He arrived in 1807, and in the course of a few years he had prepared a grammar and a dictionary of the Chinese language for the press, besides a Chinese version of the New Testament, which were afterward printed. He was appointed by the East India Company their correspondent and interpreter, but never lost sight of the chief object of his toil, namely, to complete a Chinese translation of the Bible, and thereby extend and establish the Christian doctrine. He afterward projected an Anglo-Chinese college at Malacca, of which he was a liberal patron until his death, which took place at Macao, in 1834. In him was lost to the world the greatest Chinese scholar Europe had produced, and one of the most zealous of Christians.

knowledge of ecclesiastical antiquities recommended him to the esteem of St. Carlo Borromeo. He was entrusted by Popes Gregory XIII. and Sixtus V. with the revision of the text of the Septuagint, as well as the Vulgate version of the Scriptures. He superintended the editions of the "Decretals" and of "The Œcumenical Council." He died in 1608.

MORIN, SIMON, a French fanatic, was born about 1623, at Richemont, in Normandy. He conceived certain extravagant and blasphemous notions, which he published with the title, "In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. The Thoughts of Morin, Dedicated to the King." He also composed "A Proof of the Second Advent." He was committed to the Bastille, whence he was brought for trial, and condemned to be burned alive. This cruel sentence was carried into execution March 14, 1663.

MORISON (mor'i-son), JAMES, an ingenious writer, born at Perth, England, in 1760, where he received his education. He was for some years a member of the society of Glassites, from whom he seceded and founded a distinct sect, of which he became the minister. He wrote an "Introduction to the Scriptures," the object of which is to prove that the gospel was preached in paradise. He died in 1809.

pelled from the latter place by the magistrates on account of his intemperate zeal in defending the cause of rigid Lutheranism, upon which he removed to Göttingen and afterward to Schleusingen. In 1551 he became professor in the university of Königsberg. Here he was involved in controversy with Osiander concerning the Lutheran doctrines of repentance and justification; but Osiander's influence prevailed against him, and he was banished from the Prussian territories in 1552. He soon after removed to Brunswick. Here the most violent disputes agitated the Lutheran party, and to such a length did his zeal carry him against his antagonists that he opposed the burial of those who attended on the sermons of Osiander. In 1556 Morlin was recalled to Prussia, where he was appointed bishop of the province of Sambia. He died in 1571.

MOREH (mor'eh). 1. There was an oak-grove near to Shechem, for the word should be rendered "oak," not "plain," as in our version, Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xii. 30, which it has been thought took its name from a Canaanite called Moreh, as the oak-grove of Mamre from Mamre, Gen. xiii. 18. 2. MOREL (mo'rel), ROBERT, a French monk, was born at La Chaise-Dieu, in Auvergne, in 1653. At the early age of eighteen he entered the order of Benedictines of the congregation of Saint Maur, and became successively prior of Meulen, prior of Saint Crispin's, at Soissons, and secretary to the visitor of France; but in 1699 he retired for the remainder of his life to Saint Denis, where he died in 1731. His writings became very popular; they are written in a very devotional style, abounding in Scripture language and expressions borrowed from the ascetic writings of the Fathers. His popularity excited the envy of his enemies, who called him a Jansenist, and as such he is described in the "Dictionary of the Jansenists." Among his works are—"Spiritual Conversations," "Christian Hope and Confidence."

MORGAN (mor'gan), JAMES, D.D., who was one of the most eminent of the Presbyterian ministers in the Church in Ireland, was born June 15, 1799, near Cookstown, in Tyrone. His family were of Welsh descent; he was educated in the Royal College, in Belfast. In 1820 he became the pastor of a small congregation in Carlow, in which his extraordinary diligence in all duties and his great accuracy and power as a preacher became apparent. In 1824 he was removed to the important charge of Lisburn, near Belfast; and here he became still more distinguished. When the great Church extension movement began in Belfast, he was called to Fisherwick Place Church, the first of the charges established. Here he was installed in November, 1828, and in this Church he labored until his death, on August 5, 1873. Few men

MORGAN, WILLIAMS, who became abbot of St. Augustin's Monastery, at Bristol, enjoys the notoriety of having been the last president of the house, which was seized by Henry VIII. in 1539. The king assigned him a yearly pension of eighty pounds, which at that time was a liberal support. He retired to private life, and thus he made way for founding the new see of Bristol, which only dates from the time of the Reformation.

MORESHETH-GATH (more'sheth-gath), a place most likely very near to Gath, the birth-place or residence, it is thought, of the prophet Micah, Mic. i. 14, whence he was called (1) the Morasthite. Dr. Thomson seems inclined to identify it with Mareshah, and to regard it as just a suburb of Gath itself. But others are disposed to doubt the identification.

in modern times have possessed more of the qualifications which constitute the efficient and successful pastor. An economist of time, of rare punctuality, diligent in labor, knowing all his flock, even the names of the youngest children, careful in preparation, clear, tender and impressive in the pulpit, and eminently godly, he was a model pastor. He was an ardent friend of Church extension, a founder of churches at home and a promoter of missions abroad. He was safe as a counselor and sincere and kind as a friend. He was a prolific writer, acting as editor of "The Orthodox Presbyterian" for some time, and contributing to several journals until the close of his life. His chief works are—"The Penitent," "Rome and the Gospel," "A Commentary on the First Epistle of John," "A Treatise on the Lord's Supper," and "Scripture Testimony to the Holy Spirit." burnt-sacrifice, Gen. xxii. 2. On Mount Moriah also Solomon is said to have built the temple at Jerusalem, 2 Chr. iii. 1. It therefore lay on the north-east of Zion, overlooking the valley of the Kidron or of Jehoshaphat, and is at present crowned by the mosque of Omar. See JERUSALEM. It has, however, been disputed whether the Moriah of Abraham be identical with that of Solomon; and chiefly because the "place" is said to have been seen "far off," Gen. xxii. 4, while Moriah at Jerusalem is not visible at any great distance, it has been urged that Gerizim better fulfills the conditions of the narrative, and must have been the spot on which Isaac was bound for sacrifice. But this conclusion is hardly tenable; for besides that the journey from Beer-sheba to Gerizim could not well have been accomplished in the specified time, it is evident that the expression "afar off" cannot imply a considerable interval,

MOPINOT (mop-e-no'), SIMON, a learned Benedictine, of the congregation of St. Maur, was born at Rheims, in 1685. He went through his courses of philosophy and divinity at St. Denis, and afterward taught the classics and rhetoric at Point-le-foi, in the diocese of Blois. He also occasionally appeared in the pulpit, and was much admired as a preacher. About 1715 his superiors called him to Paris, where he assisted in preparing the "Letters of the Popes," and he was in the connected himself with the "Lords of the Congregation," as the Protestant chiefs were designated, and did much for Protestantism in Scotland, though for some time he upheld the reign of his half-sister Mary, violent Papist though she was. He opposed her marriage with Darnley, and its consummation caused a breach in his relations with her court. Upon her deposition and confinement in Lochleven Castle, Moray was made regent, and evinced great civil and military ability. In January, 1570, he was murdered by James Hamilton, of Bothwellhaugh, a notorious desperado. Probably no man was ever more extravagantly praised or more unjustly traduced than Earl Murray.

MORDECAI (mor'de-ki). 1. One who re-

Languedoc, in 1616. He became successively professor of Greek and divinity at Geneva; but being suspected of laxity of morals, he retired to Middleburgh, in Zealand, where he obtained a professorship of divinity, which three years afterward he exchanged for another at Amsterdam. While in Holland he became engaged in a contest with Milton in consequence of editing a work of Peter du Moulin's. In 1654 he visited Italy, and while at Venice received a golden chain for writing a fine Latin poem on a naval victory over the Turks. He afterward settled in Paris, where he died in 1670.

MORE, HANNAH, moralist and miscellaneous writer, was born at Stapleton, in Gloucestershire, in 1744. In the early part of her literary career she produced several dramas, but later her opinions of public theatres underwent a change, and she did not consider the stage in its present state as "becoming the appearance or countenance of a Christian." Early in life she was honored by the intimate acquaintance of many eminent men. But she quitted, in the prime of her days, the circle of fashion and literature, and retiring into the neighborhood of Bristol, devoted herself to a life of active Christian benevolence and to the composition of various works having for their object the religious improvement of mankind. Her first prose publication was "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great;" this was followed by her "Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World." In 1795 she commenced at Bath "The Cheap Repository," a series of tales for the common people, one of which is the well-known "Shepherd of Salisbury Plain." She subsequently produced "Hints toward Forming the Character of a Young Princess," "Practical Piety," "Christian Morals," an "Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul" and "Moral Sketches of the Prevailing Opinions and Manners, Foreign and Domestic, with Reflections on Prayer." She died at Clifton, in September, 1833, having realized upward of turned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7. 2. A Benjamite whose ancestor had been carried away captive by Nebuchadnezzar with Jehoiachin. Mordecai adopted and brought up his uncle's daughter Esther. Refusing to pay obeisance to Haman, he provoked that jealous courtier to plot the destruction of the Jews, but by God's providence the design was defeated. Mordecai had rendered great service to the Persian king by discovering a conspiracy against his life; and the honor paid him for this was the first step of the advancement which, through the influence of Esther, now queen, he reached as one of the chief ministers of the king, Esth. ii.-x. At the feast of Purim, while curses are invoked against Haman, blessings are pronounced upon Mordecai.

MORE, ALEXANDER, a French Protestant divine, was born of a Scottish family at Castres, in

MORE, HENRY, an eminent divine of the Church of England, was born at Grantham, in Lincolnshire, in 1614; was educated at Eton and Christ's College, Cambridge; and while at the latter profoundly studied the most celebrated systems of philosophy, and finally adopted that of Plato. In 1640 he published "Psycho-Zoia, or the Life of the Soul." He refused the highest ecclesiastical preferments, and died, universally beloved, in 1687. That he was a man of great genius and vast erudition there can be no doubt, but his opinions were singular and deeply tinged with enthusiasm. The most admired of his works are his "Divine Dialogues" and his "Enchiridium," or "Handbook of Morals."

MONUMENTAL CROSS, a cross erected to commemorate some important event, especially in connection with religious matters. Such memorials were commonly raised during the Middle Ages. They abound in Ireland, as at Glendalough, Clonmacnoise, Monasterboice, Kells, Tuam and elsewhere. Specimens of the Scottish crosses may be seen at Iona. In England, also, there are many remains, and the monuments of this kind erected in connection with civil events are commonly found in different parts of the country, as at Durham, where the defeat and capture of David II. of Scotland was commemorated by a cross; at Waltham and Charing Cross in London, where crosses were erected by Edward I. to mark the places where the remains of his queen Eleanor had rested on the way to Westminster Abbey.

MOODY (mood'e), JOSHUA, was born in Wales, in the year 1634. His family was Puritan, and in 1635 his father emigrated and settled at Newbury, Massachusetts. In 1653 the son Joshua graduated at Harvard College, and he settled as the minister of Portsmouth. He was subjected to a severe persecution because of his refusal to admit a perjured man to the Lord's Supper, and after being liberated from confinement he went to Boston, and he became a Fellow of the college. Urgent appeals were made to induce him to return to his old charge, and in 1693 he reluctantly consented, and he entered on his labors with unwonted zeal. At length, in 1697, owing to his excessive study and labor, his health broke down; and having visited Boston for medical aid, he died there, in the triumph of faith. Cotton Mather preached his funeral sermon, and the language is in the most tender, devoted and eulogistic strain. An idea may be gained of his wonderful industry by mentioning the fact stated by Dr. Sprague—that "his four thousand and seventieth sermon closes a manuscript volume of his discourses preserved in the library of the Massachusetts Historical Society."

MOON. We find this secondary planet very early mentioned as appointed to be the great light-bearer of the night, Gen. i. 14-18, ruling, so to speak, among the stars, and testifying to the glorious power of the Creator, Ps. viii. 3, 4; cxlviii. 3.

The worship of the heavenly bodies was one of the corruptions which we find largely prevalent in ancient times, an influence over the fortunes of men being attributed to them. Thus the moon was honored, Job xxxi. 26, 27, under various names (see ASHTORETH, DIANA), generally with some relation to the sun, which was believed to be the active generative principle, while the moon, commonly regarded as feminine, was deemed the passive productive power. The Israelites were warned against imitating this idolatry, Deut. iv. 19, but in vain; they burnt incense to the moon, 2 Ki. xxiii. 5, and their women especially adored her as the "queen of heaven," offering her cakes—probably honey-cakes, Jer. vii. 18, a kind of oblation usual in moon-worship elsewhere.

The moonlight has been supposed to exercise a baneful influence upon both animate and inanimate creation, Ps. cxxi. 6. Eastern people have had exaggerated notions of this, and an explanation of it has been attempted, as owing merely to the change of temperature, the nights being chill, while the days are warm, Gen. xxxi. 40. And there seems no reason to doubt that any unfavorable power which has been attributed to the beams of the moon may be accounted for by the lowering of the temperature.

The moon is sometimes introduced in Scripture into a comparison for beauty, Sol. Song vi. 10, and sometimes is symbolically used, Joel ii. 31; Matt. xxiv. 29; Rev. vi. 12; xii. 1, probably for the ecclesiastical, as the sun for the civil, state.

MOOR, MICHAEL, a learned Romish divine, was born in Dublin, in 1640, and studied at the college of Nantes, whence he removed to Paris. He taught philosophy and rhetoric in the Grassin college for some years, but at length returning to Ireland, took priest's orders. When James II. came to Ireland, Moor was recommended to him, often preached before him, and had influence enough to prevent him from conferring Trinity of Dr. Stillingfleet to the see of Worcester. In 1691 he was advanced to the see of Norwich, and was thence translated to Ely, in which he remained until his death, in 1714. Bishop Moore was one of the most eminent patrons of learning and learned men in his time, and his name will be carried down to posterity not only for his published sermons, but also for his noble library of thirty thousand volumes collected by him, and purchased after his death by George I., who presented it to the university of Cambridge.

MOORE, JOHN, archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1733, and graduated at Pembroke College, Oxford, from which he was recommended to the duke of Marlborough as tutor to his sons. He was rewarded for his services with a prebendal stall at Durham. In 1771 he was made dean of Canterbury, in 1776 he was raised to the see of College, Dublin, on the Jesuits, to which he had been advised by his confessor. Dr. Moor, being made provost of this college, was the means of preserving the valuable library, at a time when the college was a popish garrison and many of the chambers were employed as prisons for the Protestants. But the Jesuits could not forgive him for preventing them from gaining the entire property of the college; and James, influenced by his confessor, ordered Moor to quit his dominions. He went to Paris, where he was twice made rector of the university and principal of the college of Navarre. He died in 1726.

MOORE (mōr), JOHN, an eminent English prelate, was born at Market-Harborough, in Leicestershire, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. He was also Fellow of that college, and was afterward promoted to the first prebendal stall in the cathedral church of Ely. In 1689 he was presented by William and Mary to the rectory of St. Andrew's, Holborn, vacant by the promotion Bangor, and in 1783 he was made archbishop of Canterbury. He died in January, 1805.

MOORE, ZEPHANIAH SWIFT, was born in 1770, at Palmer, Massachusetts. He was educated at Dartmouth College, where he graduated in 1793. He took charge of the academy at Londonderry, where he gained great reputation. Having studied theology, he was ordained and installed as pastor at Leicester, Massachusetts, and during his residence at Leicester he acted as principal of the academy at that place. In 1811 he was made professor of languages in Dartmouth College, and in 1815, when his character had become extensively known as a learned man of great executive ability, he was appointed president of Williams College, and he continued in this position until 1821, when he accepted the invitation of the trustees of the newly-founded college at Amherst to become president of that institution, and his management of the college was remarkably successful. He died in 1823, greatly lamented.

no announcement was made on the thirtieth day, that day was reckoned to the current month, which was in that case called full, and the ensuing day was at once considered to be the first of the next month. Further, as the cloudy state of the weather sometimes hindered the actual sight of the new moon, it was an established rule that no year should contain less than four, and more than eight, full months. It is generally assumed, although without express warrant, that the commencement of the month was determined in the same way in the first period; but it is very probable, and the Mosaic festivals of the new moon seem to be some evidence for it.

This is a fit occasion for discussing a question which equally concerns both periods: With which of our months, namely, did the first month, "the month of ears," or Nisan, most nearly coincide? If the first month began with the new moon of March, as was commonly asserted by rabbinical writers, the climate of Palestine would not in that month permit the oblation of the sheaf of barley of our April, which was then the period of the vernal equinox." As Nisan then began with the new moon of April, we have a scale for fixing the commencement of all the other months with reference to our calendar, and we must accordingly date their commencement one whole month later than is commonly done, allowing, of course, for the circumstance that, as the new moon varies its place in our solar months, the Jewish months will almost invariably consist of portions of two of ours.

With regard to the third period, it is not necessary to say more here than that as the dispersion of the Jews rendered it impossible to communicate the intelligence of the visible appearance of the new moon, they were obliged to devise a systematic calculation of the duration of their months; but that they retained the above-mentioned names for the months, which are still lunar months, of the mean duration of twenty-nine days, twelve hours, forty-four seconds; and that when they were no longer able to regulate the epochs of their festivals by the agricultural year of Palestine, they came to place every month earlier by one lunation than it had been in the first two periods, so that their Nisan now most nearly coincided with March. The rabbinical writers, therefore, who maintained that the ancient Nisan likewise began with the new moon of March, were mainly led into that opinion by the practice existing in their own time.

which is ordered on the second day of the Paschal Feast; nor could the harvest be finished before the Feast of Weeks, which would then fall in May; nor could the Feast of Tabernacles, which was after the gathering of all fruits, accord with the month of September, because all these feasts depend on certain stages in the agricultural year which, as is clearly shown from the observations of travelers, solely coincide with the states of vegetation which are found in that climate in the months of April, June and October. Moreover, the Syrian calendar, which has essentially the same names for the months, makes its Nisan absolutely parallel with our April. And, lastly, Josephus, in one place, makes Nisan equivalent to the Macedonian month Xanthicus, and in another mentions that on the fourteenth of Nisan the sun was in the sign of the Ram, which could not be on that day, except in April. The later Jews fell into this departure from their ancient order either through some mistake in the intercalation or because they wished to imitate the Romans, whose year began in March. Ideler says: "So much is certain, that in the time of Moses the month of ears cannot have commenced before the first days

MONTLUC (mong-luke'), JOHN DE, a learned French Dominican of the sixteenth century. Being suspected of an attachment to Calvinism, Queen Margaret of Navarre took him from his cloister and brought him forward in public life, employing him in a variety of embassies. In 1553 he was nominated to the bishoprics of Valence and Die, and in that situation he published several instructions and addresses to his clergy which were admired for their eloquence. In the reign of Francis II., at an assembly held at Fontainebleau for the purpose of seeking a remedy for the public disorders, he ventured to speak in favor of tolerating the Protestants in the exercise of their religion, and severely censured the ignorance and misconduct of the clergy, not sparing the court of Rome itself. In time he began to be more free in declaring his sentiments, and drew up a summary of the Calvinist doctrine with as much precision as if it had been published at Geneva; but he was careful not to put his name to it. In his latter years he returned to the Romish Church. He died in 1579. He published two volumes of sermons, which are much sought after by the curious for the free sentiments which they contain.

MONUMENT (mon'u-ment), a memorial for perpetuating the remembrance of an event. They were of different kinds, rising in importance from the single large stone and the cairn to the most splendid and costly forms of architecture. Among those in honor of individuals are tombs, sepulchral edifices or columns. Memorial tombs of the most elaborate character abound in cathedrals and large churches, those dedicated to knights or laymen differing in style from the tombs of bishops or other clerical persons. The ages of these tombs may usually be determined by the style of the architecture, if not by the inscription which records the name and character of the personage whose memory is thus sought to be preserved. In the English as well as in Continental churches these memorials are exceedingly beautiful, and their size and elaborate adornments attest the perfection of art in the age in which they were erected. Among the most remarkable monuments of an ecclesiastical character are the "brasses" which were inserted on the gravestones of departed worthies, and which may be seen in most of the great churches and minsters of Europe. They are monuments of art as well as testimonials of the age to the virtues of the men whose history they perpetuate. Brasses, sculptured figures in half relief, figures and inscriptions in colored windows and other devices continued to be used from age to age in the buildings dedicated to religion because of the safety which might be expected in a sacred place, and in order that attendant worshippers might have such lessons presented to them as would affect their future lives.

Monuments of the rudest and most primitive kind are referred to in Gen. xxviii. 18, where Jacob erected a monument of his special intercourse with God; in Gen. xxxi. 44-48, where a cairn was erected in testimony of a covenant; and in Josh. iv. 2-9, where the passage of the Jordan was commemorated by monuments of stones. All over the East these pillar-stones and cairns abounded. In Egypt the monuments were of the massive type of the national architecture. Obelisks, pyramids and other structures abounded, and the latter especially have survived the effects of time and the hand of the spoliator. Persia abounds with monuments of enormous size and great costliness, as may be seen in the ruins of Persepolis; while Greece was especially characterized by the taste displayed in the many structures which the admiration and gratitude of the people erected to preserve the memory of the great departed dead. Of this class were the Choragic monuments in honor of those who had received prizes in the theatrical and musical games. Of these the most splendid which remains is the Choragic monument of Lysicrates, vulgarly called the Lantern of Demosthenes. The Romans also expended great sums in the massive buildings of a monumental character with which they adorned the capitals—such as the arches of Constantine, of Titus, of Janus and of Septimus Severus; the column of Trajan, the mausoleum of Augustus and the pyramid of Caius Cestius.

In modern times the taste of European nations and of the inhabitants of the United States has leaned to the erection of columns surmounted with a statue, as may be seen in Paris and very generally in Continental cities, in London, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Glasgow, Dublin and elsewhere. In Paris, also, the style of the Romans was imitated in the celebrated "L'Arc de Triomphe de l'Étoile," and the same taste prevailed in Milan, when the "Arco della Pace," or the Arch of chapel. Religious antagonism between him and his Presbyterian neighbors led to his return to London, where he resumed his ministerial labors in Percy Street Chapel, and drew a large congregation, among whom were many distinguished in science, art and literature. His chief poetical works are—"The Omnipresence of the Deity," "Satan," "The Messiah." He died in 1855.

MONTFORT (mont'fort), SIMON DE, the fourth count, took part in the crusade with Theobald, count of Champagne, in 1199. On the proclamation by Innocent III. of the crusade against the Albigenses, he was chosen leader of the crusaders, and took several towns. In 1211 he turned his arms against Raymond, count of Toulouse, and after a long series of successes obtained a great victory over the forces of Raymond, at Muret, in 1213. Two years later he was invested by the Council of the Lateran with the county of Toulouse and the conquest of the crusaders. In 1217 Ray-

MONTHS. It is important to distinguish three periods in the Jewish mode of denoting dates by months, the first extending until the Babylonian captivity, the second until one or two centuries after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the third from the adoption of the calendar of Rabbi Hillel the younger—that is, from about the middle of the fourth century of our era—until the present time.

In the first period the months are, as a rule, mentioned by their numerical designation only—as "the first month," "the second," etc. We have no explicit indication of the number of days in a month, nor of the number of months in a year; the twenty-seventh day and the eleventh month being respectively the highest mentioned, Gen. viii. 14; Deut. i. 3; unless 1 Ki. iv. 7 be considered to prove that the year had twelve months. Nevertheless, as the two Hebrew terms for month—one of which means literally "new moon," thence "month," from a root signifying "to be new;" and the other "moon," and thence "month"—afford some proof that the months were measured by the moon, compare Ps. civ. 19; and as the festivals of the Mosaic law bore a fixed relation to certain epochs of the agricultural year which were fixed by nature, there is much reason to conclude that the year had twelve lunar months, and that it must have been kept parallel with the sun by some mode of intercalation adequate to, if not identical with, the one afterward employed.

In the second period we find, in part, a continuation of the previous method, with somewhat more definite statements—for instance, 1 Chr. xxvii. clearly proves that the year had twelve months—and, in part, the adoption of new names for the months. But the co-existence of both these systems is not easily explained; for whereas Zechariah, Ezra, Nehemiah and Esther introduce the seven new names—Shebat, Chisleb, Adar, Nisan, Elul, Tebeth and Sivan—all the other canonical books written after the restoration do nothing more than enumerate the months, without any name, in the order of their succession. There is, moreover, another discrepancy in the usage of the writers of the former class, inasmuch as, while they all generally give the name of the month together with its ordinal adjective, Nehemiah gives the naked names alone. On these discrepancies rests one theory, that these names of the month are not Aramaic, as is commonly supposed, but Persian, and adopted during the captivity. Although only the above-mentioned seven names occur in the Old Testament, yet there is no manner of doubt that the Jews at the same time adopted the entire twelve names, of which the following is a table:

Nisan.	Tishri.
Iyar.	Marcheshvan.
Sivan.	Chisleb.
Tammuz.	Tebeth.
Ab.	Shebat.
Elul.	Adar.

In the same manner as the Old Testament contains no indication of the mode of intercalation, when yet it is certain that some mode must have been used, so also it does not mention by what method the commencement and conclusion of every month were ascertained in either of these periods. According to the Talmud, however, it is certain that, in the second period, the commencement of the month was dated from the time when the earliest visible appearance of the new moon was announced to the Sanhedrim; that if this happened on the thirtieth day of the current month, that month was considered to have ended on the preceding twenty-ninth day, and was called deficient; but if fourteenth century it was kept in a pyx, but after the institution of the feast of Corpus Christi, the host was exhibited in a visible form. A common form of the "monstrance" is that of a circle of crystal in which the wafer is enclosed, surrounded by rays of gold and silver, and this modern arrangement dates from the sixteenth or seventeenth century.

MONTAGU (mon'ta-gu), RICHARD, an Armenian divine of great learning, was born in 1578. He was celebrated for his knowledge of the Greek language, the ancient Fathers and ecclesiastical antiquities. He took a prominent part in the quinquarticular controversy, and was a copious writer. He assisted Saville in his edition of St. Chrysostom, and edited other patristic works. He was appointed bishop of Chichester, from whence he was translated to the see of Norwich. He died in 1641.

MONTANISTS (mon'tan-ists). This heretical sect arose, according to Eusebius, about A. D. 171, during the reign of Marcus Aurelius, from the teaching of one Montanus, a native of Ardaba, in Mysia, on the borders of Phrygia, whence they obtained the name of "Phrygians" and "Cataphrygians;" they also had the name "Pepuzians," from a village in Phrygia which was then the centre of their preaching. This spot was called the new Jerusalem from which the millennium would proceed. Montanus was a convert to Christianity, and had expectations of promotion in the Church, but he pretended to an extraordinary degree of inspiration, giving out that he was the instrument or mouthpiece of the Paraclete—promised by Christ—that would reveal things which the apostles and men of that time were unable to comprehend, and who was to bring the Church to maturity, and that his two disciples, Priscilla and Maximilla, two noble ladies who, in their religious enthusiasm, had abandoned their husbands, were prophetesses. It has been supposed that he really meant that although the Holy Ghost had descended on the apostles on the day of Pentecost, yet God had made some additional revelations to him for the perfection of believers. The Montanists attempted no alteration in the doctrines in the beginning of their career, but they introduced great changes in the external order of the Christian system, pretending to wonderful degrees of spiritual illumination. Those who followed the voice of God, as declared by the new prophets, were held to be "the Church," the only genuine Christians. All such were spiritually minded, and all others were carnal. They condemned second marriages, considered wedlock a spiritual union sanctified by Christ which would exist beyond death. They advocated celibacy, encouraged martyrdom, allowed of divorce and held it unlawful to fly in time of persecution. They held themselves in great esteem and looked down on all others. When Praxeas, a violent opponent of the Montanists, came from Rome to Asia Minor, and urged Eleutherus, the then bishop, to forbid their approach to the communion, the Montanists then separated themselves and became a distinct party. Eusebius held that the Montanists became exceedingly heretical, that they were astray respecting the Trinity and the generation of the Son from the Father. They became divided into different minor sects, such as the Quintilliani, from a vision seen by a female named Quintilla, Artoburita, from using bread and cheese in the ordinance of the eucharist, and Tascodrugita, from putting the forefinger on the nose during prayer. The chief writers against the Montanists were Miltiades, Caius, Asterius Urbanus and an anonymous writer said by Jerome to be Rhodon. The sect prevailed for a considerable time; but when it split into parties, it became disintegrated; and having been condemned by bishops and councils, it gradually disappeared.

MONTANUS (mon-ta'nus), originator of the sect of the Montanists, was a Phrygian by birth, and flourished about A. D. 170-212. Soon after his conversion to Christianity the mental peculiarities of his countrymen showed themselves strikingly in his way of appropriating and carrying out the ideas of the Christian system. He seized especially on the supernatural side of things, gave himself out for a prophet, and proclaimed that he was empowered to supplement the defects of the Christian system. He fell into ecstasies and saw visions, announced the near approach of the millennium and fostered the fanatical craving for martyrdom. The signal failure of some of his most remarkable predictions, and the condemnation of his views by the councils of the Church, served to arrest the progress of his sentiments, but they reappeared in the theology of the Church, where they exercised a pernicious influence.

MONTANUS, BENEDICT ARIAS, a Spanish Orientalist, was born at Frexenal, in Estremadura, in 1527, and educated at Alcala. He was present at the Council of Trent, and on his return to Spain was employed in editing the famous Polyglot Bible usually called the Antwerp Polyglot. He completed it in 1572, and for his labors on it received from Philip II. a pension of two thousand ducats. He was afterward made librarian of the Escorial. He was one of the most learned divines of the sixteenth century, and died at Seville in 1598.

MONTCHAL (mong-shal'), CHARLES DE, a learned French prelate, was born in 1589, at Annonai, in the Vivarais, and educated at the college of Autun at Paris, of which he became principal. Afterward he was nominated canon of Angoulême, and in 1628, upon the resignation of the cardinal de la Valette, to whom he had been tutor, archbishop of Toulouse. He had obtained a high reputation for his acquaintance with sacred and profane history, the canon and civil law, and the Greek and Hebrew languages. At the request of the clergy of France he undertook to procure improved editions of the Greek Fathers, but he did not proceed far with this design. He bestowed considerable labor in establishing the genuine text and correcting the versions of Eusebius. He died in 1651.

MONTE (mon'teh), ANDREAS DE, is the Christian name of the distinguished chief rabbi in the synagogue of Rome who, before his conversion to Christianity, was called R. Joseph Tzarphati Ha-Alaphasi. He was born in the early part of the sixteenth century at Fez, in Africa, of Jewish parents. He emigrated to Rome, where, after exercising the office of chief rabbi for many years, and distinguishing himself as an expounder of the Mosaic law, he embraced Christianity about the year 1552, during the pontificate of Julius III. He at once consecrated his vast knowledge of Hebrew and rabbinical literature to the elucidation of the prophecies, with a view of bringing his brethren according to the flesh into the fold of the Romish Church, and wrote a voluminous work, entitled "The Perplexity of the Jews," demonstrating both from the Scriptures and the ancient rabbinical writings all the doctrines of the Christian religion. Gregory XIII. appointed De Monte in 1576 preacher to the Hebrews of Rome in the oratory of the Holy Trinity; he was afterward made Oriental interpreter to the pope, in which capacity he translated several ecclesiastical works from the Syriac and Arabic, and died in the beginning of the seventeenth century.

waged with extreme bitterness. As the Dominicans were called the Preaching Friars, so the Franciscans were known as the Lesser Brothers or Friars Minor.

They have been known in England as the White Friars. They had as many as fifty houses in England. The "Austin Friars" were founded in the middle of the thirteenth century. They had the rule of St. Augustine, and their habit was a black gown with broad sleeves, a leather belt and a black cloth hood.

The manifold subdivisions into which these orders branched out would require a volume of considerable size to describe, and at the present day these divisions are not of great moment to the general reader.

MONOPHYSITES (mo-nof'is-ites), the name of those Eastern seccaries who only admit that there is one nature in the person of Christ. The term is derived from two Greek words, "monos," single, and "phusis," nature. The theological views of those who, in an early age of the Church, adopted the Monophysite scheme, were influenced by the protracted and fierce discussions which for several ages were carried on respecting the person of Christ. Holding both the deity and the humanity of the Saviour, this school held that such a union existed, that only one nature was formed, and yet without any mixture or confusion of the two. This view was condemned in the fourth oecumenical council, which assembled A. D. 451 at Chalcedon, at which six hundred and thirty bishops affirmed that Christ is "true God and true man; that he was like us in all things, yet without sin; that according to his divinity he was begotten from all eternity and equal to the Father; that according to his humanity he was born of the Virgin Mary and mother of God; and that he has two natures unmixed and unchanged, undivided and not separated, the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by their union."

The emperor Anastasius encouraged the Monophysites, but Justin and his successors sought to repress them. Jacob Baradaeus, who died as bishop of Edessa in A. D. 588, did much to establish and extend the sect, which had spread through Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Egypt, Nubia, Abyssinia and elsewhere, and he was greatly aided by Theodosius, the bishop of Alexandria; he was considered a second founder, and they have been called Jacobites in his honor.

There are two sects of the Monophysites, the African and the Asiatic, the former including the Copts in Egypt and the Abyssinians; and the latter are presided over by a patriarch of Antioch, who resides in the monastery of St. Athanasias, near the city of Merdin. Since the fifteenth century they have taken the name of Ignatius, in order to intimate that they are the lineal descendants of Ignatius, the bishop of Antioch, in the first century. In the seventeenth century a small body of the Asiatics entered the Romish communion, but the Africans held steadfastly to their creed, notwithstanding their poverty and the persevering efforts which were made to induce them to conform. So, also, during the eighteenth century, the efforts of the Romish emissaries have utterly failed to make any impression on the Asiatics, who refused to submit to the pope, as the small number of their communion had done in the former age.

At present the Monophysite Churches are—1. The Syrian-Jacobite Church. 2. The Coptic or Egyptian Church. 3. The Abyssinian, which is really a branch of the Coptic, as it acknowledges the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria. 4. The Nestorian-Chaldaean Church, the head of which is the patriarch of Babylon, residing at Mosul. 5. The Armenian Church; and 6. The Indo-Syrian Church, under the patriarch of Malabar, who acknowledges the supremacy of the patriarch of Antioch.

MONOTHEISM (mon-o-the'izm) is the belief in and worship of one God in opposition to polytheism, which acknowledges and serves many gods.

The term is derived from two Greek words, "monos," single or alone, and "theos," god. In the mythologies of the Romans, the Greeks and all ancient idolatrous nations, there are enrolled a multitude of gods, but still there are traces of the fact that above these deities there was an uncreated eternal power, a being that was supreme.

There is no doubt but that this belief, which was grasped by different people and in different ages with more or less firmness, was a remnant of the primary and uncorrupted religion of mankind. At Athens, and to the people of Rome, Paul felt that he might appeal, and show that the attributes of this eternal great first cause were obvious to all men who would read aright the evidences which are apparent in the works of the divine Creator and Ruler of all things.

FRANCISCAN.—See MONKS.

MONOTHELITES (mo-noth'e-lites), an ancient sect who held that there was only one will in the Lord Jesus Christ. As the Monophysites held that the divine and the human were so united in Jesus that there was really but one nature, so the Monothelites held that there was in the Saviour only one will. The term comes from the two Greek words "monos," one or alone, and "thelema," will. The emperor Heraclius favored the supporters of this view, but the sect were condemned in the sixth general council, A. D. 680, which completed the doctrine of the Church respecting the person of the Saviour, and declared the perfection of the two natures, and therefore the necessity for a human will, as well as the divine, but both being ever in perfect accord and harmony.

The views of the Monothelites were held by the Maronites of the northern part of Mount Lebanon. They are the descendants of a remnant of the early Monothelites, who fled from the coercive measures of the emperor Anastasius II. in the early part of the eighth century.

There is evidence to show that the Maronites held the views of the early settlers on the Lebanon range until the twelfth century, when they submitted to the see of Rome. Of late years they have made a viguse of instrumental music, either in public or private, we find them occupying the principal place. The common name for all such instruments in Hebrew is neginoth, from a root denoting "to strike." The chief varieties of this class of instruments may be arranged as follows:

1. The kinnor, commonly translated in our version "harp." This is the stringed instrument ascribed to the invention of Jubal, and the only one referred to by Laban in his remonstrance with Jacob, Gen. xxxi. 27. It is mentioned among the instruments used by the sons of the prophets in the Egyptian and Assyrian specimens no plectrum occurs, but the instruments are all played with the hands, as we always figure to ourselves David handling his favorite harp.

2. The nebel, usually translated "psaltery," was an instrument apparently much resembling the kinnor in its nature and properties, though considerably different in form. According to Josephus, it had twelve strings, which were played upon with the hand. One variety of it had only ten strings, and from an expression in Isa. xxii. 24—all manner of nebel instruments—we gather that name passed over into Greek and Latin in the form sambuca; female performers on it, from the East, called sambucineæ, and sambucistrice by the classical authors, visited the cities of Europe and found their way as far as Rome; and the instrument is described as a harp-like instrument of four or more strings and of a triangular form.

II. WIND INSTRUMENTS.—1. The most ancient of these was the ugab, mentioned along with the kinnor as the invention of Jubal, Gen. iv. 21. It was used on occasions of domestic festivity and joy. It was probably of a rude and simple con-their schools, 1 Sam. x. 5; and it was the favorite instrument of David, of which he became so celebrated a master.

The approximate illustrations of the kinnor or harp supplied by the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments are very copious and interesting, and we cannot err far in supposing the various modifications of the Hebrew instrument to have been substantially the same as those in use among their neighbors.

The most ancient form of the kinnor was probably the curved or bent form, and it was by a natural transition that the curved form gave way in many cases to the triangular. The ancient harp was sometimes played with a plectrum, but in all the instrument, like the harp, was used in various sizes and shapes. The etymology of the name, like that of kinnor, suggests a curved shape like that of a leathern bottle; but whether it was so called because the whole instrument was of this shape, like the lyre, or because only a part of it was thus curved, viz., the sounding-board, as in the lute or guitar, it is impossible to decide.

In Dan. iii. 5, 7 we have a large enumeration of musical instruments, several of which belong to the class of stringed instruments. Of these the kaithros—cithera or harp—was no doubt the same instrument as the Hebrew kinnor. Another instrument in the list is the sabbeka, or sackbut. That this was a stringed instrument is certain, for the struction, and is best understood of the so-called Pandæan pipe, formed by a combination of reed-pipes of different lengths and thicknesses.

2. Of almost equal antiquity was the keren, or horn, originally consisting of the natural horn of the ram or the bullock, though afterward made of various metals, as bronze or brass. It was used to announce the advent of the year of jubilee and also for signals and alarms in war, Jud. iii. 27; 1 Sam. xiii. 3.

3. The chatzotzera, or straight trumpet, is occasionally mentioned, showing that these two kinds of trumpets were sometimes used together, as in Ps. xcvi. 6, "with trumpets and sound of cornet make a joyful noise before the Lord the King," compare 1 Chr. xv. 28; 2 Chr. xv. 14. The two silver trumpets appointed by Moses to be made for the use of the priests of the tabernacle were of this construction, and were used for announcing to the people the advent of the different feasts, for signaling "the journeyings of the camps" and for sounding alarms in times of war, Num. x. 1-10.

4. The halil, flute, was originally formed from the reed by the simple contrivance of cutting a larger or smaller number of holes in one of its lengths, but it was afterward, in the progress of the arts, more artificially made of wood, bone, horn and ivory. It was sometimes single and at other times double, the two pipes uniting at top in a single mouthpiece. It is first mentioned in 1 Sam. x. 5 as one of the instruments used by the company of prophets, and is frequently referred to subsequently, both on public occasions and as a favorite instrument for domestic use, Isa. v. 12; 1 Macc. iii. 45; Jer. xlviii. 36.

5. There remains still to be noticed a wind instrument, mentioned along with so many more in RAM'S HORN.—See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Dan. iii. 5, the mashrokitha. The etymology of the name indicates that it was an instrument of the pipe class, but whether a bagpipe, a Pandean pipe or a flute-pipe, single or double, it is impossible to determine. All these identifications have found supporters, and some are even inclined to the opinion that it was of the nature of a rudimentary wind-organ, such as was afterward imitated and somewhat improved upon by the temple organ—the magrêpha of the Talmud.

III. INSTRUMENTS OF PERCUSSION AND AGITATION.—1. Of such instruments the most ancient mentioned in the Old Testament is the toph, consisting of a narrow circle or hoop of wood or metal covered with a tightened skin, and struck with the hand. There can be no doubt that the instrument was of the same nature and form as the timbrel or tambourine still in use in Oriental countries. It is mentioned as early as the days of Laban, Gen. xxxi. 27, where our version has "tabret;" and it was the instrument with which Miriam and the women of Israel accompanied and beat time to their song and dance when they sang responsively the song of Moses, Ex. xv. 20.

2. The tseltselim. This name, being found only in the plural or dual form, implies an instrument consisting of more parts than one and of not more than two. It is accordingly interpreted to mean cymbals, and this is no doubt correct. Josephus describes the two parts of the instrument as held in either hand and dashed sharply together, yielding a powerful and penetrating metallic sound. They are first mentioned in 2 Sam. vi. 5, as used by direction of David in the bringing up of the ark; and in 1 Chr. xvi. 5 the remarkable fact is recorded that when David organized the musical service which was to be carried on before the ark when brought up to Mount Zion, and "appointed certain of the Levites to thank and praise the Lord God of Israel," while the rest performed their office "with psalteries and with harps," Asaph, the chief musician, or conductor of the choir, "made a sound with cymbals." It thus appears that this was the instrument by which the conductor beat time to the whole Levitical choir.

3. Menanim. This instrument is only once mentioned in Scripture, 2 Sam. vi. 5, where it stands next before cymbals in an enumeration of several instruments, and is strangely translated "cornets" in our version. It was generally from eight to sixteen or eighteen inches long, and entirely of bronze or brass, movable rings and bars of the same metal being inserted in the frame, by the sharp impact of which upon the frame, when shaken in the hand, a piercing metallic sound was produced. It was used by the priests and priestesses of Isis and Cybele in their religious rites, and instruments of the same rude principle, though different form, are still in use in the military music of some modern nations.

4. Shalishim. This instrument is only once mentioned, viz., in 1 Sam. xviii. 6, where it is spoken of as used by the women of Israel when they came out to meet King Saul and David. Our translators render vaguely "instruments of music," but insert in the margin "three-stringed instruments." The word more probably denoted an instrument with three sides; and as some harps were of that shape, it may probably have meant such harps. We insert the name in this place because it is generally thought by recent scholars that it meant what is understood by a triangle—an instrument of percussion which is said to have been derived from Syria. If so, it was possibly in use among the Hebrews, and may have been the instrument referred to in 1 Sam. xviii. 6. But, on the other hand, no figure of such an instrument of percussion has been found on any of the monuments either of Assyria, Egypt or Greece. Like the cymbals, it is still in use in military music, especially in the Turkish army.

MUSSO (mus'so), CORNELIO, a learned Italian prelate and one of the most celebrated preachers in the sixteenth century, was born at Piacenza, in 1511. In his nineteenth year he was sent to Venice, where, though upon his entrance into the pulpit at the church of Saint Mark, his youthful appearance, diminutive stature and sickly countenance created unfavorable impressions against him, he speedily effaced these, and captivated his audience by the charms of his voice, the sublimity of his conceptions and the graces of his delivery. He afterward applied himself diligently to the study of philosophy and divinity, read lectures and held disputations, by which he acquired high reputation. He preached a course of Lent sermons at Padua, at Venice and at Milan, and was so highly esteemed that he received the appointment of professor in ordinary of metaphysics at the university of Pavia. In 1541 he was made bishop of Bertinoto, in the Romagna. Afterward Paul III. translated him to the see of Bitonto, in Apulia, and in 1545 sent him to the Council of Trent, where he was selected to preach a Latin sermon at the opening of the council, and distinguished himself in the debates on the points of doctrine and discipline which took place in that assembly. In 1560 he was sent nuncio into Germany. He died in 1574. His most celebrated writings are his sermons, several of which were translated into French and Spanish.

MUSTARD (mus'tard), Matt. xiii. 31, 32; Mark iv. 30-32. This, according to the belief of many naturalists, is the plant called in Syria kharad, and known to botanists as the Salvadora Persica. From a small seed it grows into a considerable tree with numerous branches, in which birds may shelter

OX'S HORN.—See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

It bears its fruit in bunches resembling the currant, and the seeds have a pleasant aromatic taste, much like our mustard, being used for the same purposes. It has been said to grow abundantly on the shores of the Lake of Galilee. According to late travelers, however, the Salvadora is rare in Palestine, and our Lord is more likely to have taken for his illustration some common shrub. Now, the Sinapis nigra, common wild mustard, grows to a considerable height. Dr. Thomson says he has seen it "as tall as the horse and his rider." The seed, it is true, is not the smallest of all seeds in the world, but it was the least the husbandman was accustomed to sow, and the shrub the largest in his garden. It is likely, therefore, that this is the plant intended.

MUTH-LABBEN (muth-lab'ben), Ps. ix. title. It is not easy to tell what is meant by this expression. Probably the word al, rendered as a preposition, "upon," should be taken as a part of muth; this may then signify a virgin song, or for a chorus of virgins. Labben means "to (Ben) the son." But Ben is mentioned as a Levite, 1 Chr.

xv. 18; perhaps he was the preceptor, compare 1 Chr. xv. 20. Some have fancied that the words are incomplete, and that they may have signified "upon Alamothe (compare Ps. xlvi., title) for the sons of Korah," but this is merely a conjecture.

MYCONIUS (mi-ko'ne-us), FREDERIC, a German divine, originally a Franciscan monk,

MYCONIUS, OSWALD or GEISSHAUSER, a Reformer, born at Luzerne, in Switzerland, in 1488. He studied at Basel, under Erasmus and Glareanus, after which he became successively master of the schools of St. Theodore and St. Peter. He next removed to Zurich, where he held the office of regent of the college three years, after which he returned to Basel, obtained the head pastorage of the church and was chosen professor of theology. He wrote several commentaries transferred to a ship of Alexandria, Acts xxvii. 5. It stood, not immediately upon the sea, but about three miles up, on a navigable river (Andracus), which had an excellent harbor at its mouth. It is still called Myra by the Greeks, but by the Turks Dembre. There are extensive ruins at it, and the scenery in the neighborhood is described as singularly beautiful.

was born at Lichtenfelt, in Franconia, in 1491. When Luther declared against indulgences, Myconius opposed him, but soon changed his sentiments, and became a missionary for the propagation of the principles of the Reformation. In 1538 he accompanied the chancellor of Weimar in an embassy to England, and while in that country held a disputation with some bishops and other divines. On his return he was employed to reform the churches of Thuringia, but he protested strongly against the alienation of the ecclesiastical and monastic revenues to secular purposes. He died in 1546.

MYNDUS (min'dus), a town of Caria, between Miletus and Halicarnassus, 1 Macc. xv. 23. It is mentioned by Herodotus and other historians, and seems to have been a place favorable for trade, which may account for the number of Jews who had settled there.

MYRA (mi'ra), a town in Lycia, on the coast of Asia Minor, mentioned incidentally in St. Paul's voyage to Rome as the place at which he was aromatic properties. It derives its name from the Hebrew word môr, which implies "flowing" or "distilling." The Balsamodendron myrrha, of the natural order Terebinthaceæ, is the tree, found in Arabia and Africa, from which myrrh is chiefly procured. It exudes from the bark, and is at first soft, oily and yellowish-white; it afterward acquires the consistency of butter, and becomes still harder by exposure to the air, changing to a reddish hue. It was an ingredient in the holy anointing oil, Ex. xxx. 23; it was used in perfumes, Ps. xlv. 8; in unguents, Esth. ii. 12; for strengthening wine, Mark xv. 23; also in embalming, John xix. 39.

Myrrh was among the offerings made by the Eastern sages, Matt. ii. 11. The best was that which flowed spontaneously from the tree. Another Hebrew word, lot, is translated "myrrh," Gen. xxxvii. 25; xliii. 11. This, more properly ladanum, is at present imported chiefly from Greece and the Greek islands. It is the produce of the oak-rose, a shrub about two feet high, from which the ladanum is beaten with a kind of whip furnished with thongs, which when filled with the sticky resin are scraped with a knife. Sometimes a bow is passed over the plant, with the string stretched and covered with wool, to which the ladanum adheres. It is used in medicine.

MYRTLE (mer't'l), Neh. viii. 15; Isa. xli. 19. This charming plant gives name to the natural order Myrtaceæ. With its pure starry blossoms shining through its dark foliage, with its leaves so delightfully scented, and with flexible sprays which so readily twist into garlands, there is no wonder that every nation familiar with it has loved this exquisite evergreen. Although it has disappeared from the Mount of Olives, where it grew in the days of Nehemiah, the myrtle still flourishes in many parts of Palestine, more especially in the northern provinces; and in the lands of their dispersion, wherever they are able, the Jews still adorn their booths with its branches at the feast of tabernacles, as did their fathers of old. For this purpose they greatly prefer the broad-leaved variety, called "Jew's myrtle," especially any specimen which chances to have three leaves instead of the usual opposite pair. A more delicious canopy can scarcely be conceived, for the fallen leaves, crushed under foot, are as fragrant as the branches overhead are beautiful. And the day is coming when a truer Israel than ever shall repose under this exquisite shadow; when rivers shall be opened "in high places and fountains in the midst of the valleys;" when the Lord "will plant in the wilderness the cedar, and the shittah, and the myrtle, and the oil tree." "Instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off."

MYSIA (mizh'e-a), the north-western province of Asia Minor, separated from Europe by the Propontis. It was just upon the frontier of Asia and Bithynia. This region was fertile in corn and wine, but is now in a neglected condition. St. Paul passed through Mysia just before he first entered Europe, Acts xvi. 6, 7. Troas, a district round the city of that name, was sometimes reckoned as belonging to Mysia.

MYSTERIES (mis'ter-eez). The secret rites of pagan worship were designated by this name. Different views have prevailed among modern scholars respecting the origin, the nature and the object of the secret mysteries of the heathen priesthood. Warburton held that they were of civil origin, and intended by legislators and rulers to promote authority by acting on the masses of the people. Mosheim held that they were commemorative, and had reference to the character of the gods that the worshippers served. Others again, looking at the character of the Egyptian worship, have asserted that they were the fruits of superstition and priestcraft, originated and perpetuated to maintain the dominancy of the priesthood. Hence every duty, every maxim, was wrapt up in some veil which was supposed to conceal a secret that the favored few who were initiated could understand. This mystery clothed the unknown with importance and gave power to the possessors of such knowledge as the rude vulgar were not permitted to learn.

MYSTERY (mis'ter-e). This word does not mean something absolutely hidden and unintelligible, neither is it used in the sense in which it is applied to heathen idolatrous doctrines and rites, into which only chosen persons were initiated. It is rather a design hidden in God's counsels until revealed to mankind in and by Christ. Hence we find it continually employed in the New Testament to indicate those gracious purposes and plans which were by degrees elaborated and illustrated, and on which the teaching of our Lord and his apostles threw the clearest light, but which remained hidden to those who would not understand, and who had their minds blinded against the truth. Thus the gospel is called "the mystery of the faith," "the mystery of godliness," 1 Tim. iii. 9, 16, which mystery is immediately after explained to be the revelation and glorious work of the Lord Jesus Christ. So the calling of the Gentiles and their union into one body, God's Church, with the Jews, is called a mystery, long hidden, but at last made known, Eph. i. 9, 10; Col. i. 25-27. In the same way it is elsewhere used for a truth or doctrine which required elucidation, and which received it,

Matt. xiii. 11; Rom. xi. 25; 1 Cor. xiii. 2; xv. 51, 52. The word is also employed symbolically. Thus St. Paul, treating of the primary institution of marriage, introduces the term, because the marriage-tie was a figurative representation of that yet closer union into which Christ brings his Church, wherein the two are "one spirit," Eph. v. 31, 32. In prophetic language there is a similar use of the word mystery. Thus the "seven stars" symbolized "the angels of the seven churches," and the "seven candlesticks" the "seven churches," Rev. i. 20.

MYSTICS (mis'tiks), a sect which aimed at a pure, unselfish devotion and an elevated communion with God. The authors of this system seem to have adopted the doctrine of the Platonic school, which was also adopted by Origen and his disciples; that the divine nature was diffused through all human souls; or that the faculty of reason, from which proceed the health and vigor of the mind, was an emanation from God into the human soul, and comprehended in it the principles and elements of all truth, human and divine. They denied that men could by labor or study excite this celestial flame in their breasts, and therefore they disapprove highly of the attempts of those who, by definitions, abstract theorems and profound speculations, endeavored to form distinct notions of truth and to discover its hidden nature. On the contrary, they maintained that silence, tranquillity, repose and solitude, accompanied with such acts as might tend to attenuate and exhaust the body, were the means by which the hidden and internal word was excited to produce its latent virtues and to instruct men in the knowledge of divine things.

The number of the Mystics increased in the fourth century, under the influence of the Grecian fanatic who gave himself out for Dionysius, the Areopagite disciple of St. Paul, and probably lived about this period; and by pretending to higher degrees of perfection than other Christians, and practicing greater austerity, their cause gained ground, especially in the eastern provinces, in the fifth century. In the twelfth century these Mystics took the lead in their method of expounding the Scriptures. In the thirteenth century they were the most formidable antagonists of the schoolmen, and toward the close of the fourteenth many of them resided and propagated their tenets almost in every part of Europe. They had in the fifteenth century many persons of distinguished merit in their number; and in the sixteenth century, previous to the Reformation, if any sparks of real piety subsisted under the despotic empire of superstition, they were only to be found among the Mystics. The celebrated Madame Bourignon, and vegetable kingdom till it have the vegetable life in it, or be a member of the animal kingdom till it have the animal life. Thus all nature joins with the gospel in affirming that no man can enter into the kingdom of heaven till the heavenly life is born in him. Nothing can be our righteousness or recovery but the divine nature of Jesus Christ derived to our souls.

MYTHOLOGY (mith-ol'o-je). This word, which is derived from two Greek terms, "muthos," a fable, and "logos," a discourse, is used to designate the collective body of the traditions of the ancients respecting their gods and other preternatural beings. Although the word is usually applied to the religious beliefs of the Greeks and the Romans, it includes the ideas which the ancient Egyptians, the Hindoos, the Scandinavians and other nations of Asia and Europe entertained in reference to their heroes and deities. The course of education in Europe and America for upward of two hundred years has made the mythology of Greece and Rome more thoroughly understood than that of less prominent nations in the olden time; but the intercourse with India and the East, which has continued to increase during the last century, the labors of missionaries, of ethnologists, of the students of comparative philology and of the antiquities of Northern Europe, have cast a flood of light on the early beliefs of all the leading nations of the ancient world. In Egypt, Greece and Rome it is evident that these countries had many things in common in their ideas of the gods, and yet there was a national characteristic in their respective idolatries. That the Greeks received much of their theology from Egypt is well known, yet the plastic mind of Greece, with its poetic temperament, speedily clothed the gods in the Greek pantheon with a grace and beauty which Egypt never knew. The powers of nature were symbolized and worshiped in the objects which both these people placed in their temples; but there was a power of personification in the Greek mind, and a capacity for investing the imaginary deity with fanciful attributes, entirely different from the more prosaic Egyptian temperament. A crocodile, an ape, a bull or a leek might serve as an object of worship in a massive, dark Egyptian temple; but in the Grecian fane, of lighter architecture and more beautiful forms, the gods which were honored by the worshipers were also of a more poetic character.

The mythology of Rome was essentially that of Greece, with certain modifications. Greeks and Romans alike had their Jupiters, their Junos, their Mercurys and their Mars; but when the worship of these gods was carried to Italy, the temperament of the Romans gave a cast and a character to the gods which had been received from the land which also gave them their philosophy and literature as well as their religion. So, also, was it with the mythology of Syria and the nations lying to the east of the Mediterranean Sea. Their idolatry was not so diffused and scattered over so many objects as that of Greece. They symbolized the sun and the moon. They had emblems of the productiveness of nature, and the dwellers by the sea had their fish-gods, but Bel, Baal and Tammuz are entirely different in character from the Jupiter, the Apollo or the other gods of Greece and Rome.

Then, again, the Scandinavian nations of Europe, dwelling amid the storms and mists, the savage wildness and bleakness, of their northern lands, in every part of their mythology give striking evidence of the effects of climate and of their own sternness of character in the forms of their faith. Their gods of giant mould, their heroes in the halls of Odin and their conceptions of the beings whom they dreaded or served were clothed with attributes similar in character, majestic, grand and stern, but wanting in the poetry of Greece.

The culture of the present age is making the Western nations more familiar than they formerly were with the religious myths and systems of India and the East. Nowhere, in any land, has the imagination had freer play than among the ancient Aryan nations that entered India ages ago and brought with them the early forms of the Hindoo faith. Here, also, while the powers of nature were symbolized and personified, there was an investiture of the fabled gods with a fanciful wildness and beauty unknown to the more gloomy minds of the North. They dwell amid miracles and wonders of surpassing strangeness. They accomplish feats which even task the imagination to invent, while their moral character exhibits the moral standard of their worshipers. The power of the gods is symbolized by the many arms and hands in which snakes are strangled, while their wisdom is set forth by the many faces which look everywhere, and their fleetness by the number of feet. In India, also, as in Greece, the modifications which took place from age to age in the myths that prevailed respecting almost every god were almost endless; but the farther down the the amiable Fénelon, archbishop of Cambray, were of this sect.

The late Rev. William Law, who was born in 1687, makes a distinguished figure among the modern Mystics. He supposed that the material world was the very region which originally belonged to the fallen angels. At length the light and Spirit of God entered into the chaos and turned the angels' ruined kingdom into a paradise on earth. God then created man and placed him there. He was made in the image of the triune God, a living mirror of the divine nature, formed to enjoy communion with the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, and live on the earth as the angels do in heaven. He was endowed with immortality, so that the elements of this outward world could not have any power of acting on his body; but by his fall he changed the light, life and Spirit of God for the light, life and spirit of the world. He died the very day of his transgression to all the influences and operations of the Spirit of God upon him, as we die to the influences of this world when the soul leaves the body; and all the influences and operations of the elements of this life were open in him, as they were in any animal, at his birth into this world; he became an earthly creature, subject to the dominion of this outward world, and stood only in the highest rank of animals. But the goodness of God would not leave man in this condition; redemption from it was immediately granted, and the bruiser of the serpent brought the light, life and spirit of heaven once more into the human nature. All men, in consequence of the redemption of Christ, have in them the first spark or seed of the divine life, as a treasure hid in the centre of our souls, to bring forth by degrees a new birth of that life which was lost in paradise. No son of Adam can be lost only by turning away from the Saviour within him. The only religion which can save us must be that which can raise the light, life and Spirit of God in our souls. Nothing can enter into the stream of time the student travels in his investigations into the Hindoo faith, the more thoroughly will he become satisfied that once man departs from and loses the knowledge of the true God his distance increases and greater gloom settles down upon his path. In the works of Bryant and Keightly, as well as in those of Faber and Creuzer, and still more in the learned treatises of Stillingfleet and Cudworth, this important subject is treated in the manner that its importance deserves.

letter from his master to the king of Israel, who at first thought that a quarrel was intended. But Elisha desired Naaman to be directed to his house that the power of the God of Israel might be vindicated. Naaman accordingly presented himself with his suite at Elisha's door, expecting to be treated as a patient of importance. He was mortified and affronted when told by message to bathe seven times in Jordan. But his wrath was appeased by one of his servants; he obeyed the command, dipped himself seven times in Jordan and was healed. And now he desired to offer presents. He had received a wholesome lesson. His pride was abated, and he was convinced that Jehovah was the only God; but with a lingering notion that the God of Israel's power was in some measure connected with Israelitish ground, he asked for two mules' burden of earth to erect therewith an altar to Jehovah in his own land. To him alone he would himself sacrifice, but still he would attend the king his master to the house and worship of Rimmon. Elisha's reply has been misunderstood; it expressed neither approbation nor disapprobation; it was just a commendation of the Syrian to the Lord, leaving him to God's further guidance and grace, 2 Ki. v. He treated David very churlishly, and was saved from the disastrous consequence by his wife Abigail, whom David married after Nabal's death, 1 Sam. xxv.; 2 Sam. ii. 2; iii. 3. Nabal's character is sufficiently depicted in the history—obstinate, low minded and sensual, whom even his own dependants did not dare to warn of the danger his NABATHITES (na-bath'ites), 1 Macc. v. 25 the descendants of Nebaioth.

NABOTH (na'both), an inhabitant of Jezreel who was the possessor of a patrimonial vineyard adjoining the garden of the palace which the kings of Israel had there. King Ahab had conceived a desire to possess this vineyard, but found that Naboth could not be induced to alienate a property which he had derived from his fathers. This gave the king so much concern that he took to his bed and refused his food; but when his wife, the notorious Jezebel, understood the cause of his trouble she bade him be of good cheer, for she would procure him the vineyard. Some time after Naboth was at a public feast accused of blasphemy, by an order from her under the royal seal, and being condemned through the testimony of false witnesses, was stoned to death, according to the law, outside the town, Lev. xxiv. 16. When Ahab heard of the death of Naboth, he hastened to take possession. But he was speedily taught that this horrid crime had not passed without notice by the all-seeing God, and would not remain unpunished by his justice. The only tribunal to which he remained accountable pronounced his doom through the prophet Elijah, who met him on the spot: "In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine," 1 Ki. xxi.

NABUCHODONOSOR (nab-u-ko-do-no'-sor), 1 Esd. i. 40, 41, 45, 48, Nebuchadnezzar. The name also occurs for some other Assyrian or Babylonish king in Tob. xiv. 15; Judith i. 1, and elsewhere.

NADABBAR (na-dab'bar) is the name of a place in Ethiopia where, according to tradition, the apostle Matthew died as a martyr. Another tradition carried him to Parthia or Persia; but the historian Socrates says that he "went to Ethiopia," and Cave, in his "Lives of the Apostles," records the ordinarily received story that he suffered martyrdom at Nadabbar, though the manner and place of his death are alike unknown.

NADAL (na'dal), BERNARD. H., D.D., LL.D., who became eminent among the scholars and the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, was born in Maryland in the year 1815. He was educated at Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and joined the Baltimore Conference in 1835; and after preaching in Maryland, at Washington, Philadelphia, and the others were consecrated in the chapel of Lambeth on Sunday, December 17th, in the first year of Elizabeth's reign. Dr. Burnet discovered an original manuscript of the consecration, and the story is now only referred to as one of the curiosities of ecclesiastical literature.

NAHOR (na'hor). 1. One of the postdiluvian patriarchs, father of Terah and grandfather of Abraham, Gen. xi. 22-25. He is called Nachor in Luke iii. 34. 2. A son of Terah. It would seem that he must have accompanied his father to Haran, for it is sometimes styled the city of Nahor, Gen. xi. 26; xxii. 20-24. He is called Nachor in Josh. xxiv. 2.

NAHSHON (nah'shon), the prince of the tribe of Judah in the wilderness, Num. i. 7; Ruth iv. 20. He is also called Naashon, Ex. vi. 23, and Naasson, Matt. i. 4.

NAHUM (na'hum), one of the minor prophets who is designated, Nah. i. 1, "the Elkoshite." It seems that there was an Elkosh, or Elkosha, in Galilee; and this, there can be little doubt, was the birthplace or residence of Nahum. There is, however, an Assyrian Elkosh on the east of the Tigris, not far from Nineveh; and here it is supposed by Ewald and others that the prophet lived, being one of the Israelites carried captive into Assyria. But taking all the circumstances into consideration, it seems most probable that Nahum lived and prophesied in Palestine; in support of which view there are several passages in which phrases occur similar to those in Isaiah, compare Nah. i. 8 with Isa. viii. 8; Nah. i. 9 with Isa. x. 23; Nah. ii. 10 with Isa. xxiv. 1 and xxi. 3; Nah. i. 15 with Isa. lii. 7, and hence it is likely that Nahum, being contemporary with Isaiah, must have lived near him, and have borrowed from his writings.

The date of Nahum may be ascertained with tolerable exactness. It must of course have been before the capture of Nineveh, and most likely some considerable time before. Then there are historical references to suffering endured at the hands of the Assyrians. Thus, Nah. i. 11 probably intends Sennacherib, and Nah. i. 14 is a threatening against the same king; Nah. ii. 13 alludes to the Assyrian messengers who bore Sennacherib's summons to Jerusalem; and Nah. i. 9, 12 conveys a comfortable message that the Assyrian power should not attack Judah a second time. There is another note of time in Nah. iii. 8-10, where the capture of "populous No"—i. e., Thebes—is mentioned as of late occurrence. History does not record this; but we may connect the passage with Isa. xx., and may reasonably believe that the desolation referred to was prior to the fourteenth of Hezekiah, the date of the Assyrian invasion of Brooklyn and New Haven, he became a professor in Asbury University, Indiana, about the year 1850. When the Drew Theological Seminary was organized, he became professor of Church history in that institution, and on the death of Dr. McClintock he discharged the duties of president. He published "Essays on Church History" while residing in Indiana, and the work established his character among the members of his denomination for vigor of thought and force of expression. He was a liberal contributor to "The Methodist Quarterly Review," and his articles always displayed more than average power. He died at Madison, New Jersey, in the year 1870.

NAG'S HEAD FABLE, a story invented to invalidate the consecration of Archbishop Parker, which takes its name from a tavern in Cheapside where the bishops were said to have assembled after the confirmation in Bow Church for the pretended consecration of Parker and other bishops. The story ran that through a hole in the door Dr. Scory was seen to lay the Bible on the shoulders of each of the bishops and on their heads, and he then pronounced the words, "Take thou authority," etc., and thus they were made bishops. The fact, however, remains that Parker

NAHASH (na'hash). 1. A person named only in 2 Sam. xvii. 25; and as he is there described as the father of Abigail and Zeruah, who are elsewhere called the sisters of David, this must have been either another name for Jesse, or, as some suppose, of a former husband of David's mother. 2. King of the Ammonites, noted for the barbarous terms of capitulation which he offered to the town of Jabesh-Gilead, and for his subsequent defeat by Saul. It was natural that the enemy of Saul should be friendly to David; and we find that he did render to the latter, during his persecutions, some acts of kindness which the monarch did not forget when he ascended the throne of Israel, 2 Sam. x. 2; 1 Chr. xix. 2.

NAHATH (na'hath). 1. A grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 13, 17. 2. A Kohathite Levite, Gen. vi. 26, called also Toah, Gen. vi. 34. 3. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxxi. 13.

NAHAVENDI (na-ha-ven'de), BENJAMIN BEN MOSES, a celebrated Karaite commentator who flourished about A. D. 800, and derived his name from his native place, Nahavend, in ancient Media. He not only immortalized his name by effecting a reformation and consolidation in the opinions of the Jewish sect called Karaites, and by being next in importance to Anon, the founder of this sect, but has greatly distinguished himself denotes pointed things, nails of iron, 1 Chr. xxii. 3, or of gold, 2 Chr. iii. 9. This is the word used in Eccles. xii. 11; the words of the wise penetrate, sink deep, into the heart. •

Judah. Hence we shall hardly err in placing Nahum in Hezekiah's reign.

NAHUM, THE BOOK OF, 720-698 B. C., is placed seventh among the minor prophets. Its purpose is to foreshow the destruction of the Assyrian empire, and specially of its metropolis, with which is intermingled consolation for the prophet's countrymen, who should be delivered from the oppressor and hear the happy news of peace. The whole is one undivided poem, in which, after an introduction, Nah. i. 1-8, describing in lofty terms the righteous power of God tempered with abundant mercy, the prophet notices the destruction of Sennacherib's army, Nah. i. 9-12, and announces his death, with good news for Judah, to have doubtless its full significance in Messianic times, Nah. i. 13-15. Then the fall and utter desolation of Nineveh are predicted with a singular minuteness of detail, Nah. ii., iii.

A female captive, described as for a month bewailing her parents, Deut. xxi. 10-13, is said to pare her nails. The exact meaning of the passage is disputed. Most probably at the beginning of the month the head was shaven, and through the whole time the nails neglected. The word implying nail of the finger is sometimes used for a point or style for writing, Jer. xvii. 1, margin.

NAIL-HEAD MOULDING, a moulding which is very common in Norman work. It is formed by a series of projections resembling square nail-heads.

NAIN (na'in). Of this place no mention is made in Old Testament Scripture, and only once NAIOTH (na'yoth), a place close by Ramah, where Samuel dwelt, and whither David fled to him, 1 Sam. xix. 18-23; xx. 1. It was probably either a suburb of Ramah, or perhaps the buildings of the school of the prophets there.

NAKED. This word is used literally to denote persons altogether unclothed, Gen. ii. 25; iii. 7, or those partly uncovered, being without their upper garments, 1 Sam. xix. 24; also figuratively to express the being empty of worldly goods, Job i. 21; destitute of divine grace and righteousness, and so defenceless, 2 Chr. xxviii. 19; Rev. iii. 17, 18. It further alleges that a thing is discovered, laid open to the eyes, Job xxvi. 6.

It may be added, in illustration of Ex. iii. 5, that the Orientals appear with bare feet in a superior presence, or in a place accounted holy; they manifest thus the respect which an European shows by uncovering his head. It is most probable that the Hebrew priests officiated with naked feet.

NAMA (na'ma), the term used for wine in the mass of the Greek Church.

NAME. A child sometimes received its name immediately upon its birth, Gen. xxxv. 18; sometimes at the time of circumcision, Luke i. 59. The mother frequently gave the name, Gen. xxix. 32-35, occasionally the father, Gen. xxxv. 18. Names were significant, and were suggested by some circumstance connected with the birth, Gen. xxxviii. 29, 30, some hope of the parent, Gen. xxx. 24, some prophetic anticipation, Gen. v. 29, some event of joy or sorrow, 1 Sam. i. 30, some suggestive divine command, Gen. xvi. 11, 15. Names were frequently changed, or a fresh one superadded, sometimes by God in making a covenant with an individual, or designating him to some office, Gen. xvii. 5, 15. Occasionally also an appellation was affixed as a mark of judgment for some great sin, Jer. xx. 3. Sovereigns, moreover, changed the names of vassal princes, 2 Ki. xxiii. 34, or of those they raised to dignities; or if they were foreigners, they gave them a name significant in the language of the country into which they were brought, Gen. xli. 45. Similarly persons often bore two names, sometimes those which had the same signification in different languages, John xi. 16, sometimes when the name in one language was altered by assuming a form more akin to the usage of another, 2 Sam. xxiii. 39 compared with Matt. i. 6. Names were also changed by augmentation or contraction, 2 Ki. viii. 16, 21, 24, 25, or by substitution of a form having the same meaning, 2 Sam. xi. 3 compared with 1 Chr. iii. 5. But we cannot always account for the variety of names by which the same individual is known, 2 Sam. iii. 3 compared with 1 Chr. iii. 1. As in the case of persons, so in that of places, appellations were significantly given, Ex. xvii. 7, and frequently the names were changed, Gen. xxviii. 19. The names by which the Deity made himself known were descriptive, often conveying the idea of covenant blessing, as Jehovah, Jesus, compare Rev. iii. 17; iv. 12; xiv. 1; xix. 12; xxii. 4. Hence the reverent estimation and use of such names, Lev. xxi. 11, 16; Acts iv. 10, 12. "To know by name" implies favor and friendship, Ex. xxxiii. 12, 17.

NAMES OF THE THREE WISE MEN. In the Gospel of Matthew no reference is made to the number of the visitors who came to Bethlehem, Nahum's composition must be placed high among those of the minor prophets. He evinces great poetic power; his language is pure, his images beautifully appropriate. It may be added that he appears occasionally to refer to the Pentateuch, compare Nah. i. 2, 3, with Ex. xx. 5; xxxiv. 6, 7, 14; Num. xiv. 18; Deut. iv. 24. The destruction of Nineveh occurred almost a century after the delivery of Nahum's prophecy.

NAIL. There are two Hebrew words rendered "nail" or "pin" in our version. Yathed, from a root signifying to fix fast, is a peg or nail forced into a wall, Isa. xxii. 25; Ezek. xv. 3. It is also a stake driven into the ground to secure a tent, a tent-pin, Jud. iv. 21, 22. This word is sometimes used, Jud. xvi. 14, for the pin by which the cloth was fastened in a loom. Hence, to drive a peg, to fasten a nail—i. e., in the wall—is a metaphorical expression denoting to render firm or stable, Isa. xxii. 23. And, further, a nail or peg means a prince, who supports the weight of state affairs, Zech. x. 4. Mismeroth, found only in the plural, is it spoken of in the New Testament, Luke vii. 11, where it is said of our Lord that upon one occasion "he went into a city called Nain." He had been at Capernaum on the preceding day; and obviously, therefore, within the limits of a day's journey from Capernaum, the position of Nain must be sought. Eusebius speaks of it as lying near to Endor, the situation of which has been thoroughly ascertained. It is on the eastern slope of the Little Hermon, a detached hill which rises from the great plain of Esdraelon, or Jezreel, at the distance of five or six miles from Gilboa. The place still bears the name of Aindur. About four miles westward from the ruins and village of Endor, on the northern face of the same hill, the traveler finds himself at another hamlet, with a cluster of ruins beside it, and which is known among the natives of the country by the name of Nein. This village is within sixteen or eighteen miles of Capernaum, and there can be no reasonable doubt that here stood the Nain that was visited by our Lord, and where he restored to life the bereaved and mourning widow's only son.

but their number was soon settled. They were three, for thus, according to Leo, they symbolized the Trinity, or following Hilary of Arles, they corresponded to the number of their gifts and to the three parts of the earth, or according to Bede, to the three great families of man descended from Noah. So, also, their gifts were symbolical: gold they presented as to a king, myrrh was the emblem of the bitterness of the passion, and the frankincense intimated the deity of the Son of God. Their names as well as their dress have been recorded—Gaspar, Balthasar and Melchior. They are said to have been martyred at Sissania, a city of Arabia Felix, and their remains, according to an old and well-known tradition, were taken to Cologne.

people of God are built; he is the Gift of God, John iv. 10, to sinners, provided by free grace, and not because of their deserving or merit. He is the Light, the true Light, the Morning Star, to show that as the great Prophet he is the Teacher of the people of God; he is the Redeemer, the Saviour, who by his precious blood has purchased the Church, the Vine, the Bread of Life, the Hidden Manna, the Plant of Renown, the Rose of Sharon, and, in one word, the Sent of the Lord, "Messiah, which is called Christ."

NANEA (nan'ea), 2 Macc. i. 13, 15, a Persian deity, perhaps the moon-goddess, whose temple Antiochus Epiphanes, fatally for himself, attempted to plunder.

useful and best skilled of the population fled from their native land, carrying along with them all the money they could accumulate, together with the knowledge of the arts which had enriched the kingdom. About fifty thousand of these refugees passed over into England, and there is little doubt but that the representations by these sufferers of the cruelties perpetrated by the king of France tended to excite the suspicions of the English against their own Roman Catholic sovereign, and in some degree accelerated the revolution of 1688.

NANUK (na'nook), one of the most remarkable religious reformers of India, was born in 1469. He belonged to the trader class of the Punjab, and preached devotion to God, belief in one Supreme Being and abolition of the distinctions of

TIONS OF JESUS CHRIST. The names by which the Saviour is designated in Scripture indicate the glory of his person, the character of his work, and the relation in which he stands to his Church as the deliverer of all who believe in him. Thus, the names that indicate Deity are ascribed to him; the attributes which inhere in and are essential to Deity are said to be his; the works which Deity can alone perform are ascribed to him; and the worship which God alone should receive is ascribed to and claimed by him. He is the Son of God. Heb. i. 2. Immanuel, or "God with us," Matt. i. 23; the Word, or divine "Logos," John i. 1, 2, 3, existing before all things, and by whom every creature was made; the Lamb of God, John i. 29, to indicate the sacrificial work on which he came; the Shepherd, John x. 16, to declare his watchful care of all his people; the Rock, 1 Cor. x. 4, as indicating the security of the foundation on which all the most famous enactments in modern history. After many years of long-continued and almost intolerable sufferings for their religion, including the occurrences which led to the massacre of St. Bartholomew and the sad years of bloodshed which followed, the Protestants of France at length, on the accession of Henry IV., were permitted to indulge the hope that relief would be vouchsafed to them. He became king of France in 1594, and in 1598 he was enabled to issue the celebrated edict by which a certain measure of security and religious freedom was guaranteed to his former brethren in the faith. This edict continued in force nearly a century, but it was repealed by Louis XIV. in 1685, and forthwith the persecutions and bloody scenes which had formerly prevailed were renewed. To escape from the widespread and terrible cruelties which rapidly depopulated the land, many of the Protestants sought safety by emigration, and thus above half a million of the most caste. During his lifetime many miracles were claimed for him, and he obtained many converts. His religious precepts spread to most of the Hindoo sects of his country. These were compiled by his successors into a book which forms the foundation of the present Sikh faith, and is esteemed a divine revelation. He died in 1539.

NAOMI (na-o'me), wife of Elimelech of Bethlehem and mother-in-law of Ruth, in whose history hers is involved. See RUTH.

NAOS (na'os), the nave or that part of a church which is west of the choir or chancel, and in cathedrals it was west of the central tower and the transepts.

NAPHISH (na'fish), one of the sons of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 15; called also Nephish, Gen. v. 19.

NAPHISI (naf'i-se); 1 Esd. v. 31, identical with Nephusim, Ezra ii. 50.

NAPHTALI (naf'ta-le), "my wrestling," was the sixth son of Jacob and the second of Bilhah, the handmaid of Rachel, Gen. xxx. 7, 8. Nothing is recorded of him, except in so far as he was identified with the doings of his brethren, the other eleven patriarchs. In Jacob's dying prophecy, Naphtali was described as "a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words," respecting the true reading and interpretation of which there has been much discussion. The first part of the prophecy seems to denote that the tribe of Naphtali was to be distinguished for their warlike and independent spirit, while the second member—"he giveth goodly words," or words of beauty—foretold that they would be equally conspicuous for gifts of poetry and eloquence; and though very little of the special history of the tribe has been recorded, by the territory of Asher, which separated it from the sea.

The territory included in these limits was one of the most fruitful of the whole land, and fulfilled well the blessing pronounced upon the tribe by Moses, Deut. xxxiii. 23, already quoted. It included the sources of Jordan, the sea of Merom and the hilly region called Mount Naphtali, Josh. xx. 7, now called Djebel Safed. Among its considerable towns were Hazor, Kedesh, Chinnereth (afterward called Gennesareth) and Migdal-el, afterward called Magdala.

The men of Naphtali did not immediately take possession of the whole of the land assigned to them by Joshua. They did not "drive out the inhabitants of Bethshemesh, nor the inhabitants of Bethanath, but dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land; nevertheless the inhabitants of Bethshemesh and Bethanath became tributaries unto them," Jud. i. 33. This circumstance, of their powerful neighbors. In the reigns of Baasha king of Israel, and Asa king of Judah, this tribe was the first to suffer from the invasion of Benhadad king of Syria, who "sent the captains of the hosts which he had against the cities of Israel, and smote all Cinneroth, with all the land of Naphtali," 1 Ki. xv. 20, especially "all its store cities," 2 Chr. xvi. 4. It was also one of the first tribes to be carried into captivity by the Assyrians, 2 Ki. xv. 29.

NAPHTHAR (naf'thar), 2 Macc. i. 20-36, a substance called also Nephi, of which a legendary account is given as found in a pit where, before the captivity, the sacred fire was hidden. Tradition identifies the pit with the Bir Eyub close by Jerusalem.

NAPHTUHIM (naf'tu-him), an Egyptian race, classed among the sons of Mizraim, placed in the genealogy between Lehabim and Pathrusim, Gen. x. 13; 1 Chr. i. 11. That they occupied a region not far from the Lehabim and the Pathrusim is probable from their place in the genealogy, but any more exact determination seems now impossible.

NAPKIN (nap'kin), Luke xix. 20; John xi. 44; xx. 7. This was a handkerchief, the Greek name being derived from its use of wiping off perspiration. In the two places last referred to it was employed to tie up the chin of a corpse.

NARCISSUS (nar-sis'sus), a Greek name borne by one who was probably one of Paul's Greek converts to the faith, and who, at the time of his writing the Epistle to the Romans, was residing in Rome. He sends a salutation to those who belonged to Narcissus, his household, as our translators put it, Rom. xvi. 11, indicating that Narcissus was at the head of a Christian family. Beyond this we have no definite information respecting him.

NARD. See SPIKENARD.

NARES (närz), ROBERT, a learned critic and theologian, was born in 1753, and received his education at Westminster School and Christ Church College, Oxford. After entering into holy orders he was presented to the rectory of Sharnford, in Leicestershire; he was also chosen preacher at Lincoln's Inn and obtained the office of assistant librarian at the British Museum. He was afterward a prebendary of Lincoln; and at the time of his death, in 1829, he was archdeacon of Stafford, canon of Lichfield and rector of All Hallows, London. Dr. Nares, in conjunction with Dr. Beloe, established and conducted the "British Critic," a High Church literary review, and besides several other works wrote "A Chronological View of the Prophecies relating to the Christian Church."

NARNI (nar'ne), JEROM MAUTIN DE, a famous Capuchin preacher who flourished in Italy in the seventeenth century. He was called to Rome, and appointed to preach before the pope and cardinals, on which occasion he struck such a terror into his hearers, by showing the sinfulness of a neglect of duty, that no less than thirty bishops posted the next day to their dioceses. The effects of his oratory upon the people were no less extraordinary, and many went from the church crying for mercy as they walked along the streets. Narni, however, saw so little real fruit produced by there is enough of valor in the exploits of Barak and the other men of Naphtali, Jud. iv., and enough of high poetry in the joint song of Deborah and Barak preserved, Jud. v., to justify to the full prophetic anticipations of Jacob regarding the descendants of Naphtali.

The tribe of Naphtali, at the time of the exodus from Egypt, numbered fifty-three thousand four hundred males able to bear arms, Num. i. 42, 43, but was reduced at the end of the long sojourn in the wilderness to forty-five thousand four hundred, Num. xxvi. 50. It ranged at the time of the conquest of Canaan as seventh of the tribes in point of numbers. During the encampments of the desert its place was to the north of the tabernacle, alongside of Dan and Asher; and on the march it brought up, with the same tribes, the rear of the whole column, Num. x. 25-28. The portion of the land of promise assigned to Naphtali was the extreme north-easterly district, extending on the north to the foot of Anti-Libanus, and on the south to the Lake of Gennesaret; and bounded on the east by the upper stream of the Jordan, and on the west and the geographical position of the district, upon the northern border of the country, which necessarily led to a considerable admixture of their heathen neighbors with the Naphtalites, gave occasion to that part of the land being called "the district of the Gentiles," and from this again first the frontier and afterward the whole of North Palestine came to be called Galilee, Josh. xx. 7; Isa. ix. 1. Their position on the northern frontier laid the tribe open, of course, to the first dangers of invasion in that direction, and they are repeatedly mentioned with honor, in the days of Barak and Gideon, for their services in the cause of the nation's independence. In the song of Deborah and Barak, Jud. v. 18, Naphtali and Zebulon are applauded as "a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death in the high places of the field;" and on repeated occasions they went to the help of Gideon against the Midianites, Jud. vi. 35; vii. 23. Naphtali shared in the revolt of the ten tribes, and shared also largely in the calamities which that division of the strength of a small nation brought upon both sections at the hands his eloquence that he retired to his cell, where he employed himself in writing the history of his order.

NARTHEX (nar'thex). After the profession of Christianity was legalized in the Roman empire and churches of considerable size began to be built, their internal arrangements were entirely different from anything that can be seen in modern ecclesiastical edifices. Those in full membership had a special place provided for them, those who were under instruction had another, and those who were under discipline were confined to a distinct part. Now, the narthex was the western part, at the entrance, separated from the nave itself by folding doors, which were usually open during the parts of the service in which those placed in the narthex were allowed to participate. Frequently there was an outer and an inner narthex, in the latter of which funeral rites and sometimes baptisms were celebrated. The outer narthex was often a mere porch or an area in front of the church.

NASH, DANIEL, who during life was generally known as "Father Nash," was born at Great Barrington, Massachusetts, in 1763, and was educated at Yale College, where he graduated in 1785. For some time he was a member of the Congregational Church, and it is believed that he preached as a licentiate. He taught at Pittsgrove and Swedesborough, New Jersey, and while residing in New Jersey he changed his ecclesiastical relations and entered the Episcopal Church. He studied theology under the Rev. John Croes, who became the first bishop in New Jersey, and in 1797 he was ordained deacon; and forthwith he entered with great earnestness on a missionary career through Southern and Western New York. In 1801 he was ordained priest by Bishop Moore, who had become acquainted with him, and who appreciated his earnestness and zeal. During the remainder of his life he labored with untiring diligence through Otsego and Chenango counties and other desolate regions in the State of New York, among the Indians and settlers who were remote from regularly organized churches; and in 1836 he closed a life of unwonted devotion and great consecration to the service of the Lord.

NASITH (na'sith), 1 Esd. v. 32, identical with Nezhiah, Ezra ii. 54.

NASMITH (na'smith), DAVID, a Scottish philanthropist, was born at Glasgow, in 1799. At the age of twenty-two he became secretary to the united benevolent societies of his native town, in which capacity he gained the knowledge and experience which were of so much value to him in his subsequent labors. His name will be remembered with honor as the originator of "city missions," the first of which he succeeded in establishing at Glasgow in 1826. After retiring from his secretaryship two years later, he devoted himself exclusively to the propagation of his favorite views and the establishment of town missions. Not only in his own country, but in Ireland, in the United States and in Canada, and last in England, he carried on his chosen task with success. He founded the London city mission in 1835. He died at Guildford, November 17, 1839.

NASOR (na'sor), 1 Macc. xi. 67, the Hazor of the Bible.

NASSARIANS (nas-sa're-anz), a sect of the Mohammedans belonging to the Shiite party, formed in the two hundred and seventieth year of the Hejira, and so called from Nasar, near Keufa, the birthplace of their founder. The sect occupy a portion of Mount Lebanon, and are tributary to the Turkish empire. They have about eight hundred villages. Their manners are rude, and many heathenish customs prevail among them. Polygamy is not allowed, but indiscriminate licentiousness prevails on their feast days. Like the Hindoos, they have "caste" firmly established, and they believe in transmigration, though not in heaven or hell. A sheik or spiritual head directs their concerns, and they recognize him as a prophet.

NATALE (na-ta'le), a saint's day commemorating the martyrdom or the death of a saint, so called from its being the day of his birth into heaven. The day of the death of a saint who was not a martyr was usually called "depositio," or a "laying down," or "putting off," the body.

COINING AND FINISHING MONEY.—See MONEY.

NATALITIA (na-ta'lish'e-a), "birthdays." Natural birthdays were observed by the early Christians, but when the season of Lent was established in the Church, these customs were suspended until after Easter.

NATALIUS (na-ta'le-us) became distinguished as an advocate of the Theodotian heresy in the second century. Theodotus, according to Epiphanius, had apostatized from the faith; and being charged with denying God, he avowed his belief in God, but he affirmed that he recognized Jesus as a mere man, thus denying the doctrine of the Trinity of God. Another party at the same time, headed by Praxeas, declared Christ to be the one supreme God himself. Theodotus was expelled by Victor, the bishop of Rome, who put him out of the communion of the Church; but he gained several followers, among whom were Artemon, or Artemas, Asclepiodatus and Natalius, who, according to Eusebius, "was persuaded to be created a bishop of this heresy, with a salary of one hundred and fifty denarii a month." It is said that he was eventually brought back to the Church by Zephyrinus, the successor of Victor. The Theo-dotian heresy was allied to the Ebionistic denial of the divinity of Christ, and was no doubt one of the sources of the later heresy of Socinianism.

NATHAN (na'than). 1. One of the sons of David, born in Jerusalem, 2 Sam. v. 14. 2. A prophet who delivered the divine message to David after his sin with Bath-sheba; we find him also taking part in other transactions of the time, 2 Sam. vii. 1-17. Probably also it is he that is mentioned in 1 Ki. iv. 5. 3. A resident at Zobah, father of one of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 36. 4. A descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 36. 5. One whom Ezra sent in order to obtain the company of some priests and Levites, Ezra viii. 16. 6. A person who had married a foreign wife, Ezra x. 39.

NATHAN, ISAAC, or MORDECAI, a learned Jewish rabbi who, about the middle of the fifteenth century, published the first Hebrew concordance of the Old Testament. This work, with additions, has been several times reprinted, but little or nothing is known of the history of its author.

NATHANAEL (na-than'a-el). 1. 1 Esd. i. 9, identical with Nethaneel, 2 Chr. xxxv. 9. 2. 1 Esd. ix. 22, identical with Nethaneel, Ezra x. 22. 3. Judith viii. 1, an ancestor of Judith. 4. The name of one of the earliest disciples of our Lord, who was hailed, even on his first approach, as "an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile," John i. 47. The notices given of him seem to mark him out as a disciple in the closer sense; for the manner in which he was first brought to the knowledge of Jesus and established in the belief of his Messiahship has all the appearance of a preparation for the duties of the apostolic calling, John i. 45-51; and when our Lord showed himself to his apostles after his resurrection, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, Nathanael is found among them, John xxi. 2. The prevailing belief in the Church concerning him has been that he was an apostle, and the same with Bartholomew of the other evangelists, Bartholomew being the patronymic (son of Tholmai), like Barjonas in the case of Simon, and Nathanael his proper name.

NATHANIAS (na-than'i-as), 1 Esd. ix. 34, identical with Nathan, Ezra x. 39.

NATHAN-MELECH (na'than-me'lech), an eunuch or officer of state in Jerusalem, 2 Ki. xxiii. 11.

NATIONAL SYNOD, a synod of the Church of any particular country.

NATIVITARIANS (na-tiv-i-ta're-anz), the name of a heretical sect of the fourth century who held that the generation of our Lord was not eternal.

NATIVITY OF CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST, sub-head DATES AND PERIODS CONNECTED WITH THE HISTORY OF JESUS CHRIST, page 1007.

NATURALISM. See INFIDELITY.

NATURE (na'chur). This word variously implies the regular course of things according to God's ordinance, Rom. i. 26, 27; habit, feeling of propriety, common sense or general custom, Rom.

ANCIENT COIN-MOULD AND DIE.—See MONEY.

ii. 14; 1 Cor. xi. 14; birth or natural descent, Gal. ii. 15; essence, Gal. iv. 8; qualities or dispositions of the mind, whether good, 2 Pet. i. 4, or evil, Eph. ii. 3.

NATURE, LAW OF, means that order in which events follow each other in the universe; or, in other words, as law involves the idea of a lawgiver, so the mind of the lawgiver is indicated in the order of succession which appears in the antecedents and consequents that are seen in all changes. In popular language the antecedent, which is always observed to precede a certain consequent, is called the cause, as the consequent is called the effect. It is obvious, therefore, that there is no activity in law, which can only be an expression of the mind and will of the lawgiver that such should be the character of the succession; and the permanency of the operation of the law merely means the presence and the power of the lawgiver to uphold and carry on the system of order which has been by him conceived and established.

NAVE (nah've), Eccus. xlv. 1, the same with NUN, the father of Joshua.

NAVE, the body of a church, which lies to the west of the choir or chancel, in a cathedral or a large church. In cathedrals, the four arms of the church were thus named; commencing at the west, the nave, with aisles right and left, was entered. Then came the central tower, raised on arches, through which the choir was approached, and which stretched out toward the east in the same line with the nave, while the transepts were carried north and south from the central tower. Generally the choir and the transepts had aisles as well as the nave, and in very large cathedrals, as Canterbury and Salisbury, there were two transepts, thus giving great variety to the light and shade and the general effect, both external and internal, of the building.

NAVES, 1 Ki. vii. 33, the original word put here for the central part of a wheel implies protuberance. Elsewhere it is the "bosses" of a shield, Job xv. 26, and has other meanings.

NAVIGATION. See SHIP.

NAZARENE (naz'a-reen), an epithet frequently applied to Jesus Christ to indicate his connection with Nazareth. To this place his parents took him on their return from Egypt, Matt. ii. 23, in which St. Matthew finds the fulfillment of an ancient oracle, "that he should be called a Nazarene." At Nazareth "he was brought up," Luke iv. 16; and his connection with this place was so well known that he came to be commonly designated Jesus the Nazarene, or, as the Authorized Version gives it, Jesus of Nazareth. This appellation is given to him by his own disciples and followers, Luke xxiv. 19; by the people of the Jews, Mark x. 47; by the servants of the high-priest, Matt. xxvi. 71; by the soldiers who arrested him, John xviii. 5, 7; and by Pilate in the inscription on the cross, John xix. 19. It is also given to him by the unclean spirit whom he cast out in the synagogue at Capernaum, Mark i. 24; and it is used by our Lord himself after his ascension, Acts xxii. 8. From the first the term carried in it a latent reproach according to Jewish prejudices, John i. 46; compare John vii. 41; and afterward it was applied to the followers of Jesus Christ by the Jews as a designation of contumely and scorn. This began in the first age of the Church, as we learn from Acts xxiv. 5, where the Christians are stigmatized by the Jews as "the heresy of the Nazarenes."

2. A name of reproach given to the early Christians as followers of Jesus of Nazareth, who was "called a Nazarene." 3. A sect of heretics so called at the end of the first century, which arose during the sojourn of the Christians in Pella, contemporary with the Ebionites and holding similar tenets. They are supposed to have retained a Judaizing adherence to the Mosaic law, and are charged with holding a low opinion about the divinity of our Lord.

NAZARETH (naz'a-reth), a town of Lower Galilee, in the territory of Zebulun. It is not mentioned in the Old Testament, but we read of it frequently in Gospel history. Here Mary resided when the angel announced to her that of her womb Messiah should be born, Luke i. 26-28. From Nazareth Joseph went with Mary to Bethlehem to the taxing, Luke ii. 4, 5, and at Bethlehem, according to prophecy, the divine Child was born, Matt. ii. 5, 6; and there, probably, they intended to settle, believing it most fitting that the heir of David's throne should dwell in David's city. But first the cruel quest of Herod, and then, after their return from Egypt, the fear of Archelaus, induced them, by heavenly monition, to return to their original abode at Nazareth, where our Lord's infancy and youth were spent, Matt. ii. 13-23. It was from Nazareth that Jesus went to the Jordan to be baptized by John, Mark i. 9; and it would seem that he returned thither, though for but a brief season. When in Galilee, after his baptism, he was chiefly at Capernaum or Cana, John ii. 1, 12. His early Judæan ministry succeeded, subsequently to which he visited Nazareth, and preached there in the synagogue. His family was probably still resident in the place. But so maddened were the people at his address that they attempted to precipitate him from the hill on which their city was built. And thenceforth Capernaum was his home, so far as the Redeemer had an earthly home, Matt. iv. 13, though it is possible that one more visit was paid to Nazareth. We afterward hear little of the place except as a designation of our Lord, sometimes merely descriptive, Matt. xxi. 11, but most generally by way of reproach, Matt. xxvi. 71; for proverbially no good thing could come out of Nazareth, John i. 46.

Nazareth lies on the western side of a narrow vale, to the north of the plain of Esdraelon. It is south of Cana, an hour and a half from Tabor, eight hours from Tiberias, and about equidistant from the Lake of Gennesaret and the Mediterranean. It grew into some importance at the time of the Crusades, and has now, under the name en-Nazirah, about three thousand inhabitants. Many places are shown as scenes of events connected with our Lord's history, such as the cave of the annunciation, the kitchen of Mary, the workshop of Joseph, the dining-table of our Lord and his apostles, the synagogue where he read the prophet Isaiah, and the mount of precipitation. It is needless to say that most of these rest on no sufficient authority. The precipice is certainly well suited to the purpose with which the Nazarenes were actuated, but it is two miles from the modern town. Dr. Thomson, indeed, mentions a ruin much nearer to it, where he was told the ancient Nazareth stood, higher therefore than the present, but he adds, "On my way back through the upper part of the town I found precipices enough for all the requirements of the narrative in Luke. Most of them, it is true, appear to be partly artificial, but doubtless there were some of the same sort in ancient days." He observed, too, the bold, immodest aspect of the girls to be found at the fountain of the annunciation. Shut in by hills—fourteen they are said to be—Nazareth is hot, and the views are confined. But from the so-called mount of precipitation there is a noble prospect.

NAZARETH, SISTERS OF, originally a branch house of the Little Sisters of the Poor, constituted as a separate foundation in 1853 by Cardinal Wiseman. They devote themselves to the care of the aged poor and of foundling children. Their habit is black, edged with blue, white cap and black hooded cloak.

NAZARIOS (na-zar'e-os), an epithet for a monk in the Greek Church. See NAZARITE.

NAZARITE (naz'a-rite), a person separated and devoted to the Lord by a special vow, the terms of which were carefully prescribed, Num. vi. 1-21. The restrictions of the vow were threefold. There must be entire abstinence from all strong drink, from the juice of the grape and from everything belonging to the vine. The second injunction was that the hair of the Nazarite was to grow, no razor touching his head all the days of his separation. The third restriction was, like that laid upon the high-priest, Lev. xxi. 10-12, that the Nazarite should not defile himself in any case for the dead, indicating not merely the purity which every one set apart for God should cultivate, but more pointedly that, being alive to God, he has nothing to do with that death which is sin's penalty, and with the sin of which death is the wages. If unavoidably the Nazarite became so defiled, he was to shave his head, bring a trespass-offering, for the discharge of the debt he had thus contracted to the Lord, also a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, and to begin again his vow, all the time before the defilement being lost. And when the term of the vow expired, the Nazarite brought a sin-offering—for he was still a sinful creature—a burnt-offering and a peace-offering, with the usual appendages, his hair being shorn or shaven, and cast into the fire, under the sacrifice of the peace-offerings, indicating the ordinary state of friendly communion with God.

The customary term of the Nazarite vow, according to the rabbins, was thirty days; but sometimes it was to continue for life. Three instances are recorded in Scripture of persons so sanctified and devoted from their mother's womb—those of Samson, Jud. xiii. 5, of Samnel, 1 Sam. i. 11, and of John the Baptist, Luke i. 15. Such persons are said to have had certain sacerdotal privileges. It will not escape notice that the Nazarites were not bound to celibacy; their vow, therefore, gives no countenance to any profession involving such a restriction.

NE ADMITTAS (nay ad-mit'tas), a writ so called from these words, which occur in it. It is a writ directed by the patron of any church to the bishop, when the patron fears lest the bishop should collate a favorite of his own to the benefice, or a person presented by another to the injury of the rights of the lawful patron. The presentation of this writ to the bishop arrests procedure, until the suit pending can be determined.

NEAH (ne'ah), a place on the border of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 13.

NEAL (neel), DANIEL, an eminent dissenting divine, was born in London, in 1678, and was educated at the university of Utrecht. On his return he began to officiate as a preacher, and in 1706 succeeded Dr. Singleton as minister of a congregation in Aldersgate street, in which office he continued for thirty-six years. Although assiduous as a minister, he found leisure for literary labors, and published, among other works, the well-known "History of the Puritans." He died at Bath, in 1743.

NEALE (neel), LEONARD, D.D., was a native of Maryland, born in 1746. He entered the priesthood of the Romish Church, where he greatly distinguished himself. In 1800 he was consecrated as coadjutor to Archbishop Carroll, and in 1815 he succeeded him as archbishop of Baltimore. He died in 1815.

NEANDER (ne-an'der), JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, one of the most distinguished ecclesiastical historians of modern times, was born at Göttingen, in 1789, of Jewish parents. In his sixteenth year he was converted to Christianity, and proceeded to study first at Halle and then at Göttingen, where he gained the reputation of great learning and piety, though struggling with an extremity of poverty which would have crushed a less ardent and heroic soul. He removed to Heidelberg in 1811, and occupied himself in writing his first work, "The Emperor Julian and his Age," which led to his appointment to a chair of theology in that university in 1812. A few months afterward he was nominated to the same chair in the university of Berlin.

Here he labored assiduously for thirty-eight years, with what result will be seen if we look at his works on many periods of Church history, his pamphlets and monographs of every variety of subjects, his daily lectures on every conceivable theological topic—philosophy, doctrine, history, Biblical criticism—or the numberless pupils in Germany, England and America whom he inspired with a portion of his own noble enthusiasm and sent out as laborers in the same sacred field. With Neander theology was not a mere profession; the purity of his daily life and his devotion to Christian labor proved how sincerely he believed the truth of his favorite motto, that "it is the heart which makes the theologian." He died July 14, 1850. The first volume of Neander's great work, the "History of the Christian Religion and Church," appeared in 1825. Of his other works we may name the "Life of Jesus" and "History of the Planting of the Church by the Apostles," both of which, like the Church History, are well known through translations, and highly esteemed by all students of ecclesiastical history.

NEAPOLIS (ne-ap'o-lis), a sea-port on the coast of the Ægean, originally belonging to Thrace, and about ten miles from Philippi, the frontier Macedonian town, but it was attached to the province of Macedonia by Vespasian. St. Paul landed there on his voyage to Europe, Acts xvi. 11. The village of Kavalla is on the site of Neapolis.

NEARIAH (ne-a-ri'ah). 1. One of David's descendants, 1 Chr. iii. 22, 23. 2. A Simeonite chieftain, 1 Chr. iv. 42.

NEBAIOTH (ne-ba'yoth), or NEBAJOTH (ne-ba'yoth). Nebaioth was the eldest son of Ishmael, 1 Chr. i. 29, called Nebajoth in Gen. xxv. 13. His descendants were the Nabathæans, a most distinguished Arabian tribe. They originally devoted themselves to the feeding of cattle, Isa. lx. 7; their habits were simple and their principles independent. Afterward they built towns, especially the noted Petra. They were under a monarchical government, but the power of their king was limited. In later times they applied themselves to commerce. They were plundered by Sennacherib and had wars with the Syrian kings. By this time their manners had deteriorated, and they were little better than a nation of robbers;

but the Syrian wars curbed and reformed them. They had the confidence of more than one of the Maccabæan princes, and it was not till the reign of Trajan that they were fully subjected to the Roman power. The extent of their territories varied at different times, according to their successes and commercial enterprise.

NEBALLAT (ne-bal'lat), a town inhabited after the captivity by Benjamites, Neh. xi. 34. It was probably in the territory of Dan, on the site of the modern Beit Nebdla, north-east of Lydda.

NEBAT (ne'bat), the father of Jeroboam I., 1 Ki. xi. 26; xii. 2, 15, and elsewhere.

NEBO (ne'bo), a Chaldæan and Assyrian idol mentioned in Isa. xlvi. 1 and Jer. xlvi. 1, and supposed to preside over learning and eloquence; hence described as the "far-hearing," and "he who instructs." He corresponds with the Latin Mercury, the Greek Hermes and the Thoth of the Egyptians. He was likewise worshiped by the Sabians in Arabia. The divine worship paid to summit of the ridge of Pisgah belonging to the chain of Abarim, Deut. xxxii. 49; xxxiv. 1. It was from Nebo that the Lord showed Moses the extent of Canaan, just before his death. 2. A town occupied by the tribe of Reuben, Num. xxxii. 3, 38. It would appear after the captivity of the trans-Jordanic tribes to have fallen under the power of Moab, Isa. xv. 2. Possibly it was not far from the mountain so called, but Eusebius locates it eight miles south of Heshbon. 3. A place belonging to Judah, called for distinction's sake "the other Nebo," Ezra ii. 29. Perhaps it may be identical with the modern Beit Nabah, twelve miles north-west of Jerusalem. Some of the inhabitants who returned from captivity had married strange wives, Ezra x. 43. It has been supposed that both these towns derived their name from the worship of the god Nebo, or they may have been denominated from a Hebrew word signifying "high."

NEBUCHADNEZZAR (neb-u-kad-nez'zar), or NEBUCHADREZZAR (neb-u-kad-rez'zar), the most celebrated of the kings of Babylon, great for both his warlike achievements and his magnificent works in embellishing his capital and promoting the internal prosperity of his dominions.

Nebuchadnezzar was the son of a monarch generally called Nabopolassar, the founder of the great Babylonian empire. When Nabopolassar rebelled against Assyria, he cemented the alliance between himself and the Medes by marrying his son Nebuchadnezzar to Amuhea, daughter of the Median prince Astyages. In the later years of his father's reign Nebuchadnezzar appears to have headed the armies of the empire; and it was under his command that the victory at Carchemish was gained over Pharaoh-necho's army, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Jer. xlvi. 2.

After the victory at Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar, who was pressing his advantages against Egypt, received intelligence of the decease of his father. He, therefore, deemed it necessary to hasten back to Babylon, where his authority was at once acknowledged, and he commenced his actual reign, 604 B. C.

It was in his second year, three years after Daniel had been placed at the Babylonian court, Dan. i. 5, that Nebuchadnezzar had his prophetic dream, Dan. ii. The time to which we must assign the erection of the image in the plain of Dura is not mentioned, Dan. iii. The transaction is more of a political than a religious cast. Doubtless, as the three Jews felt, to comply with the king's mandate would be to transgress the command of Jehovah. But Nebuchadnezzar's purpose seems to have been to require an open mark of subjection to the symbol of his own power from the civil officers in the various districts and provinces subjected to his sway. Daniel held then no civil office. He was attached to the court as "chief of the governors over all the wise men;" he, therefore, was not required to perform this homage.

Whether Nebuchadnezzar made another personal campaign in Judæa during Jehoiakim's life is questionable. The Scripture, speaking of the Jewish king's rebellion, says that bands of Chaldees, Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites were sent against him, but is silent as to any march of the great king himself, 2 Ki. xxiv. 2. And when Jehoiachin had succeeded, it is said first that his servants besieged Jerusalem before that Nebuchadnezzar besieged it, 2 Ki. xxiv. 10, 11. Be this as it may, Jehoiachin submitted, and his uncle Zedekiah was placed on the throne, who afterward rebelled; and Nebuchadnezzar's forces again reduced Jerusalem in his nineteenth year, while the wretched king of Judah, brought to his conqueror at Riblah, was blinded, his sons having been previously slain before his eyes. And it is noted that different parties of captives were carried to Babylon in Nebuchadnezzar's seventh (the year of Jehoiachin's short reign), eighteenth (just before the burning of Jerusalem) and twenty-third years, Jer. lii.

Little more can be said with certainty of the great emperor's campaigns. He besieged Tyre in the seventh year of his reign, and the siege lasted for thirteen years. The Egyptians attempted to relieve Jerusalem during the investment in Zedekiah's reign, Jer. xxxvii. 5-12, but they were either defeated or retired through fear of the superior Babylonian force; and Nebuchadnezzar, after the reduction of Phœnicia and Judæa, invaded and subdued Egypt, Jer. xlv. 8-13; xlvii. 13-26; Ezek. xxix. 1-20. His madness, Dan. iv., was probably in the latter part of his reign, which lasted forty-three years; he died in 561 B. C., probably upward of eighty, and was succeeded by his son Evilmerodach.

Nebuchadnezzar was not merely a conqueror; he was distinguished by the magnificence of his civil administration. Many of the great works which adorned Babylon—temples, palaces, the hanging-gardens, constructed, we are told, for the gratification of his queen, Amuhea, to remind her of her native Median mountains, the canals, reservoirs, not in the metropolis alone, but in many other cities of his dominions—were executed by Nebuchadnezzar, a proof of which is that his name is inscribed on multitudes of the bricks yet remaining in Babylonia.

This monarch was, indeed, one of the great ones of the earth, Dan. ii. 37, 38; iv. 36. With vast abilities, he was vainglorious, passionate and cruel; yet there are traits of nobleness in the way in which he received the intelligence of the judgment that was to befall him, and in his account of it, also in the honor he gave to Daniel. How far he became really acquainted with the power of Jehovah must be uncertain. Inscriptions and incidental notices of Scripture seem to show him devoted to his god Bel-merodach, and he might but regard the God of Israel as a local deity inferior to Bel. It would be pleasing to draw, if we could, a different conclusion from Dan. iv.

NEBUSHASBAN (neb-u-shas'ban), Jer. xxxix. 13, one of the Babylonian officers sent by Nebuzar-adan to take Jeremiah out of prison. He was chief of the eunuchs.

NEBUZAR-ADAN (neb'u-zar-a-dan), one of the great military officers in the army of Nebuchadnezzar, who was charged to protect Jeremiah the prophet, 2 Ki. xxv. 8, 11, 20.

NECESSARY DOCTRINE AND ERUDITION OF A CHRISTIAN MAN. This is the title of a book issued by Henry VIII. in the year 1543, and called "The King's Book," in contradistinction to the "Institution of a Christian Man," which was put forth in 1537, and was known as "The Bishop's Book." "The King's Book" was not sanctioned by the authority of the Convocation. It was prepared by a committee nominated by the king, who assisted in the work. He corrected many parts of it, collated the opin-this idol by the Chaldeans and Assyrians is attested by many compound proper names of which it forms part, as Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzar-adan, Nebushasban, besides others mentioned in classical writers—Nabonedus, Nabonassar, Naburianus, Nabonabus, Nabopolassar.

NEBO. 1. A mountain in the land of Moab, over against Jericho. It was probably a spur or ions of bishops and divines on many points, and in the preface, which he probably wrote, there is a vigorous effort to vindicate the prohibition of the Bible.

NECESSITY (ne-ses'si-te), whatever is done by a cause or power that is irresistible, in which sense it is opposed to freedom. Man is a necessary agent, if all his actions be so determined by the causes preceding each action that not one past action could possibly not have come to pass, or sary one; and the obedience of Christ cannot be good, because it was necessary. Further, say they, necessity does not preclude the use of means, for means are no less appointed than the end. It was ordained that Christ should be delivered up to death, but he could not have been betrayed without a betrayer, nor crucified without crucifiers. That it is not a gloomy doctrine, they allege, because nothing can be more consolatory than to believe that all things are under the direction of an all-wise Being, that his kingdom ruleth over all, and that he doth all things well. It is also observed that to deny necessity is to deny the foreknowledge of God and to wrest the sceptre from the hand of the Creator, and to place that capricious and undefinable principle—the self-determining power of man—upon the throne of the universe. Beside, say they, the Scripture places the doctrine beyond all doubt, Job xxiii. 13, 14; xxxiv. 29; Prov. xvi. 4; Isa. xlv. 7; Acts xiii. 48; Eph. i. 11; 1 Thess. iii. 3; Matt. x. 29, 30; xviii. 7; Luke xxiv. 26; John vi. 37.

have been otherwise than it hath been, nor one future action can possibly not come to pass, or be otherwise than it shall be. On the other hand, it is asserted that he is a free agent if he be able at any time, under the causes and circumstances he then is, to do different things; or, in other words, if he be not unavoidably determined in every point of time by the circumstances he is in, and the causes he is under, to do any one thing he does and not possibly to do any other thing. Whether man is a necessary or a free agent is a question which has been debated by writers of the first eminence. The Anti-necessarians suppose that the doctrine of necessity charges God as the author of sin—that it takes away the freedom of the will, renders man unaccountable, makes sin to be no evil and morality or virtue to be no good, precludes the use of means and is of the most gloomy tendency. The Necessarians deny these to be legitimate consequences, and observe that the Deity acts no more immorally in decreeing vicious actions than in permitting all those irregularities which he could so easily have prevented. The difficulty is the same on each hypothesis. All necessity, say they, doth not take away freedom, for it only makes actions certain. The actions of a man may be at one and the same time free and necessary too. It was infallibly certain that Judas would betray Christ, yet he did it voluntarily. Jesus Christ necessarily became man and died, yet he acted freely. A good man doth naturally and necessarily love his children, yet voluntarily. It is part of the happiness of the blessed to love God unchangeably, yet freely, for it would not be their happiness if done by compulsion. Nor does it, says the Necessarian, render man unaccountable, since the divine Being does no injury to his rational faculties, and man, as his creature, is answerable to him; besides, he has a right to do what he will with his own. That necessity doth not render actions less morally good is evident; for if necessary virtue be neither moral nor praiseworthy, it will follow that God himself is not a moral being, because he is a neces-

NECK. The neck being that part of the body through which the life is frequently destroyed, it is sometimes taken as the representative of the animal life; hence "to lay down the neck," Rom. xvi. 4, is a strong expression for hazarding one's life; to "give one the necks of one's enemies," 2 Sam. xxii. 41, was to surrender their life into his hands. But the most common reference was to beasts of burden, which bore upon their neck the yoke whereby they did service, and as such were viewed as emblems of men in their relation either to a good or bad service. Christ invites all to "take up his yoke" (upon their neck understood), in other words, to yield themselves obediently to his authority, Matt. xi. 29; and a stiff or hardened neck is a familiar expression for an unpliant, rebellious spirit.

NECK MOULDING, a small moulding at the junction of the shaft and capital of a column.

NECODAN (ne-ko'dan), 1 Esd. v. 37, identical with Nékoda, Ezra ii. 60.

NECRO CAMPANA (nâ'kro kam-pa'na), the passing-bell, or the bell which intimates that a person is dying. The term is used in the Greek Church.

NECROLOGY (ne-krol'o-je), formed of "nekros," dead, and "logos," discourse or enumeration, a book anciently kept in churches and monasteries wherein were registered the benefactors of the same, the time of their deaths and the days of their commemoration, as also the deaths of the priors, abbots, religious canons, etc. This was otherwise called calendar and obituary.

NECROMANCER (nek-ro-man'ser), Deut. xviii. 11. See DIVINATION, MAGIC.

NECROMANCY (nek'ro-man-se), the art of revealing future events by conversing with the dead. See DIVINATION.

NECTAN (nek'tan), who was a celebrated king of the Scottish Picts, obtained great notoriety because of his dealings with the monastery of Iona and its venerable inmates. Ever after the establishment of the Romish forms, which Augustine and his successors had brought to Kent and extended over the South of England, a determined effort was made to change the system, which from Iona had been carried into the North of England, as well as through the South and East of Scotland. Eventually, Adamnan, the abbot of Iona, received the Roman usages, but he failed to convince the members of the monastery. He died in A. D. 704. In A. D. 716 Nectan became a convert to the Roman system, and forthwith he expelled from Iona every one who refused to follow his example, and thus he changed the character of that venerable place, which for centuries had been the nursery of missionaries to many European lands.

NEDABIAH (ne-dab'yah), one of David's descendants, 1 Chr. iii. 18.

NEDFRATRES (ned-fra'trez), sometimes written NEFRATRES, were bonfires lighted by the superstitious on the feast of St. John the Baptist. Reference was made to them in a synod of the time of Charlemagne. The word seems to be Saxon and to mean "necessary fire." It has been held that these fires are really the remains of the old services in the East connected with the Baal-fires, and which were carried westerly, although in the lapse of ages the ideas of the people changed as to their origin and use. Even yet, in retired districts in Ireland, fires are kindled at this season; but the population are either ignorant of the origin of the custom, or they associate them with some political and historical event of comparatively modern date.

NEEMIAS (ne-eh-mi'as), Ecclus. xlix. 13; 2 Macc. i. 18-36; ii. 13, Nehemiah, of whom the apocryphal writer relates a legendary story.

NEGATIVI (neg-a-te'vi), a name applied to such persons as refused to admit that they were rightfully condemned by the Inquisition. They held that they were true "Catholics," and that they died in the faith, denying all heresies and all wrong doing.

NEGINAH (ne-gi'nah), "a stringed instrument," Ps. lxi. title, the singular of Neginoth.

NEGINOTH (ne-gi'noth), Ps. iv. It would seem that the compositions to which this expression is prefixed were to be sung or chanted with an instrumental accompaniment.

NEHELAMITE. See SHEMAIAH.

NEHEMIAH (ne-he-mi'ah). 1. One who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 2.

2. An eminent Jew, probably of the tribe of Judah, a descendant of the royal house, who held the post of king's cup-bearer at the Persian court. While in attendance his countenance was so sad for the evil news he had heard of the desolation of Jerusalem and afflicted state of the returned remnant of Jews there, that the monarch inquired the cause. Nehemiah, lifting up his heart to God, entreated that he might be permitted to visit Jerusalem; and the king accordingly sent him thither, with a commission as governor. There he rebuilt the walls, and in conjunction with Ezra carried on a work of reformation among the people. His administration lasted twelve years, and then he returned to the Persian court; but after some time, variously estimated from five to nine years, he was permitted to resume his office at Jerusalem, to redress the abuses which had grown up during his absence. Here it is probable he spent the remainder of his life, having shown himself a humble, disinterested, pious man and a zealous, patriotic and conscientious governor. His administration, including the interval, lasted probably from 445 to 409 B. C.

3. A person who had a charge in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 16.

NEHEMIAH, THE BOOK OF. This book was placed by the Jews in one volume with Ezra; contemporary events are treated of in both. It may be roughly divided into three sections: I. Ch. i.-vii., comprising the narrative of Nehemiah's appointment to office, his rebuilding, in spite of opposition, the walls of Jerusalem, and his purpose of bringing the people to an orderly settlement. In II., ch. viii.-x., there is an account of certain religious solemnities; and in III., ch. xi.-xiii., we have various lists, appointments and settlements, with a recital of some acts of Nehemiah's administration on resuming his post.

In many parts of this book Nehemiah appears as speaking in the first person, but there are difficulties in the way of believing that the whole proceeded from his pen. When we find a perceptible diversity of diction, when in parts of the book Nehemiah seems to retire into the background, when his own title varies and the designation of the nobles is not the same, when, too, we see lists extended beyond what we can reasonably imagine was the limit of Nehemiah's life, we can hardly help coming to the conclusion that various hands contributed to this book. The following will probably be found not an unfair apportionment of the parts of it. Nehemiah evidently was in the habit of noting the occurrences of his time. Now, the section, Neh. i. 1-vii. 5, is written in the first person; there is a uniformity in its style, and several favorite expressions recur. The writer also declares that he found a document (nearly identical with Ezra ii.) which he adds to his own narrative, Neh. vii. 6-73. There is no reason to doubt that the whole of this section, therefore, belongs to Nehemiah himself. But in ch. viii.-x. there is a change; the governor is spoken of in the third person, and it is therefore most probable that the section is from another pen. The remainder of the book, ch. xi.-xiii., was, with small exceptions, most likely written by Nehemiah; ch. xi. 1 seems to connect itself with the first part of ch. vii. 5. But the list of ch. xii. 1-26 was from a later hand, as the succession of high-priests is carried down to Jaddua, who was contemporary with Alexander the Great, or else the final editor added some names. Jaddua, however, may have been born before Nehemiah's death. The verses ch. xii. 44-47 may possibly not be by Nehemiah, as ch. xiii. 1 is closely connected with ch. xii. 43. We may believe, then, that, as much of this book was written by Nehemiah, but not the whole, it was ultimately arranged in its present form by some one, the author of the Chronicles very possibly (to which it, with Ezra, formed an appendix), who, under divine guidance, has transmitted to future ages of the Church this most instructive narrative as we now have it.

NEHEMIAS (ne-he-mi'as). 1. 1 Esd. v. 8, identical with Nehemiah of Ezra ii. 2. 2. 1 Esd. v. 40, Nehemiah, the governor.

NEHILOTH (ne'hi-lōth), Ps. v., title. This word, signifying "perforated," showed that the psalm was to be accompanied by the music of a wind-instrument. Some have supposed that the organ, others that flutes were meant.

NEHUM. See REHUM.

NEHUSHTA (ne-hoosh'ta), the mother of King Jehoiachin, 2 Ki. xxiv. 8.

NEHUSHTAN (ne-hoosh'tan), "brazen," the serpent of brass or copper which Moses made by God's command in the wilderness, Num. xxi. 8, 9, was preserved for many ages. Hezekiah, perceiving that the people had been in the habit of paying a superstitious reverence to it, broke it up, 2 Ki. xviii. 4. Probably Nehushtan was the name by which it had been ordinarily known, though some believe it a term of contempt then first applied.

NEIEL (ne-i'el), one of the landmarks on the northern border of Asher, Josh. xix. 27.

NEIGHBOR (nay'bur). The Pharisees were disposed to restrict the meaning of neighbor to their own countrymen or friends. Our Lord, therefore, to teach the universal brotherhood of men, spoke his parable of the good Samaritan, Luke x. 25-37. When compassion can be shown, or a kind office done, there must be no limitation; every one is to be deemed for such purposes a "neighbor," Matt. v. 43-48.

NEILL (neel), WILLIAM, D.D., who was born near Pittsburg, in 1779, was educated at Princeton. He became a tutor in the college, and in 1805 he was settled as Presbyterian minister at Coopers-town, New Jersey, from which he removed, in 1809, to Albany, New York. In 1816 he was settled in Philadelphia as pastor of the Sixth Presbyterian Church, from which office he retired in 1824 to act as president of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania. In 1829 he was appointed secretary and general agent of the Presbyterian Board of Education, and in 1831 he assumed the work of the ministry in Germantown, where he continued until 1842. Dr. Neill was a most faithful minister, greatly beloved, and an excellent, pious man. He was the author of "Lectures on Biblical History," "Exposition of the Epistle to the Ephesians," "The Divine Origin of the Christian Religion" and other works. He died in 1860.

NEKEB (ne'keb), "a cavern," a boundary town in the territory of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33.

NEKODA (ne-ko'dah), one whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 48. Some of them, however, could not show their genealogy, Ezra ii. 60.

NELSON (nel'sun), DAVID, M.D., who became extensively known and very eminent in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, was born in the year 1793 near Jonesborough, Tennessee. He was educated at Washington College, Virginia, and studied medicine at Danville, Kentucky, and in Philadelphia. He served in Canada as a surgeon during the war of 1812, and at its close he settled in Jonesborough. In early life he had made a profession of religion, but he had fallen into infidelity, from which he was mercifully delivered; and resigning a lucrative practice, he dedicated himself to the Christian ministry.

He was licensed to preach in 1825, and in 1828 he settled as pastor at Danville, Kentucky, but in 1830 he was induced to remove to Missouri, which greatly needed an increase of ministers and a large accession to the staff of educators. He rendered important aid in founding Marion College, of which he became the first president. In 1836 he removed to Illinois, and at Quincy he established an educational institute with a view to the cultivation of a missionary spirit. He died at Oakland, near Quincy, in 1844. His greatest work was the "Cause and Cure of Infidelity," a noble performance which has taken a high place in religious literature. He wrote frequently for reviews and other journals, but his whole strength was devoted to the publication which will long be associated with his name.

NELSON, ROBERT, a pious and learned writer, was born in London, in 1656, and received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was strongly attached to James II., and he continued to communicate with the non-jurors till the year 1709, when he returned to the Established Church, in taking which step he yielded to the arguments of his friend, Bishop the work of promoting all benevolent institutions; and while engaged in advancing the cause of the Kentucky Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb he went to Tallahassee, Florida, in 1827, where he suddenly died. He was succeeded in the pastorate at Danville by his brother, the author of "The Cause and Cure of Infidelity."

NEMESIUS (ne-me'se-us), an eminent Christian philosopher who was bishop of Emesia, in Phœnicia, and flourished toward the close of the fourth century. He was the author of an admirable treatise on the nature of man which refutes the notions of the Manichæans, Eunomians and Apollinarists and defends that of Origen concerning the pre-existence of souls. His treatise is chiefly curious because it discovers a degree of acquaintance with physiology not to be paralleled in any other writers of so early a date, and it is one of the most elegant specimens now extant of the philosophy which prevailed among the ancient Christians.

NEMUEL (ne-mu'el). 1. A descendant of Reuben and brother of Dathan and Abiram, Num. xxvi. 9. 2. One of the sons of Simeon, Num. xxvi. 12; 1 Chr. iv. 24. He is also called Jemuel.

NEMUELITES (ne-mu'el-ites), a family of Simeon, descended from Nemuel, Num. xxvi. 12.

NEOLOGISTS (ne-ol'o-gists). Rationalists of Germany and elsewhere who frame their religious views according to the progress of scientific research and the changes introduced by Biblical criticism, aiming especially at eliminating all supernatural elements out of the system which they profess. See RATIONALISM.

NEOLOGY. See RATIONALISM.

NEOMENIA (ne-o-me'ni-a), a feast of the new moon. It appears from Chrysostom, Augustine and the early councils, that Christians were often tempted in primitive times to observe this and similar heathen festivals.

NEONOMIANS (ne-o-no-me'anz), a sect so called from the fact that they were viewed as turning the Gospel into a new law, the condition of which is imperfect through sincere and persevering obedience. The term is derived from the Greek words "neos," new, and "nomos," law. At the Synod of Dort much attention was given to a position which some theologians had adopted, and which was in opposition to the views ratified by the synod. According to that party, "The new Covenant of Grace which through the medium of Christ's death the Father made with man consists not in our being justified by faith as it apprehends the righteousness of Christ, but in this, that God, abrogating the exaction of perfect legal obedience, reputes or accepts of faith itself, and the imperfect obedience of faith, instead of the perfect obedience of the law, and graciously accounts them worthy of the reward of eternal life."

Toward the end of the seventeenth century a controversy prevailed in England among the Dissenters, one party holding with Dr. Crisp and being charged with "Antinomianism," and the other agreeing with the views of Dr. Daniel Williams, who leaned to the theology of Baxter, and who was considered to have adopted "Neonomianism." The views of Dr. Williams were thus set forth by himself: "Is the Gospel a law in this sense, viz., God in Christ thereby commandeth sinners to repent of sin and receive Christ by a true operative faith, promising that thereupon they shall be united to him, justified by his righteousness, pardoned and adopted; and that, persevering in faith and true holiness, they shall be finally saved; also threatening that if any shall die impenitent, unbelieving, ungodly, rejecters of his Grace, they shall perish without relief and endure sorer punishments than if these offers had not been made to them? 2. Hath the Gospel a sanction—i. e., doth Christ therein enforce his commands of faith, repentance and perseverance by the aforesaid promises and threatenings as motives of our obedience? Both these I affirm, and they deny, saying the Gospel in the largest sense is an absolute promise without precepts and conditions, and a Gospel threat is a bull. 3. Do the Gospel promises of benefits to certain graces, and its threats that those benefits shall be withheld and

Ken. He lived on terms of intimacy with Archbishop Tillotson, and was the zealous promoter of all works of charity, having the ability as well as the disposition to give what true benevolence prompted. He was the author of many popular works, among which are—"The Practice of True Devotion," "A Companion to the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England," "The Whole Duty of a Christian." He died in 1714, and was the first person buried in the cemetery of St. George's, Queen Square, London, where a long Latin inscription by Bishop Smalridge records his virtues.

NELSON, SAMUEL KELSEY, was born at Jonesborough, Tennessee, in 1787, and graduated at Washington College, then under the care of Dr. Doak. He directed his attention to the study of the law, but he abandoned it, and entered the ministry. After preaching for some time in South Carolina, he returned to Kentucky and settled at Danville as pastor. Here he labored very faithfully, and ere he died he had signal testimony of the power of the gospel in the great number of conversions which occurred in 1826. To him belongs the honor of founding Centre College at Danville, Kentucky. He entered very earnestly also into the contrary evils inflicted for the neglect of such graces, render those graces the condition of our personal title to those benefits? This they deny, and I affirm," etc.

It does not appear to have been a question in this controversy whether God in his word commands sinners to repent and believe in Christ, nor whether he promises life to believers and threatens death to unbelievers, but whether it be the Gospel under the form of a new law that thus commands or threatens, or the moral law on its behalf, and whether its promises to believing renders such believing a condition of the things promised. Several years afterward a similar controversy prevailed in Scotland. Boston, the Erskines and others had to meet and answer the question, whether they did or did not admit that in the Gospel there were commands of the nature of law. To which they replied that strictly there was nothing of law in the Gospel. It was a revelation and offer of mercy, a tender of deliverance by the acceptance of a Saviour, and that as all men, even though fallen, are still under the rule of the moral law, the law commands and enjoins all men to accept all offers made by God, to believe all teachings and to accept all tenders of mercies made by him to sinners.

as well to this signification. Another word is found in Isa. xxxiv. 13; Hos. ix. 6; it means a prickly weed, and may designate the nettle or the thistle. The nettle, Urtica, is too common to need description; its apparatus for stinging consists of a pointed tube through which the poison is forced into the wound which the point has made.

NETTLETON (net'tl-tun), ASAHEL, D.D., was born in 1783, at North Killingworth, Connecticut. He studied at Yale College, and was licensed to preach in 1811, but not ordained until 1817. He had resolved on being a missionary, but he had to abandon the resolution, because he saw that his preaching was acknowledged and needed in his own land. He continued to preach as a missionary in Connecticut and Massachusetts; and having published a volume of hymns, he went to Virginia for recruiting his health in 1827, and again he returned and preached through New England until 1831. After a voyage to England, he settled at East Windsor, where he lectured to the students without accepting a permanent situation in the seminary which was offered to him. In his later years he opposed what has been known as the "New Haven School of Theology." He died in May, 1844.

NEUMAN (neu'man), JOHN NEPOMUCENE, D.D., born in Bohemia, in 1811, was ordained a priest in the Romish Church at New York in 1836. He entered the order of "The Holy Redeemer," and in March, 1852, he was consecrated bishop of Philadelphia. He died in 1860.

NEUTRALS (neu'tralz), a title given by way of contempt to certain followers of Zwinglius who were charged with holding that communion in one or both of the elements in the Lord's Supper was indifferent, as mere bread or wine was received in either case.

Trinity College, Cambridge, was born in Canterbury, and educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He held various offices, both collegiate and ecclesiastical. In 1595 he was concerned in the controversy which originated at Cambridge from the public declaration of one of the Fellows of Caius College against the doctrine of predestination and falling from grace. The dispute, which was referred to Archbishop Whitgift, occasioned the well-known conference of divines at Lambeth, where certain propositions were agreed on, in conformity to Calvin's principles, commonly called the Lambeth Articles. In 1597 Nevil was promoted to the deanery of Canterbury. On Queen Elizabeth's death he was sent by Archbishop Whitgift to Scotland to address her successor, in the name of all the clergy, with assurances of their loyalty and affection. James I. afterward, when on a visit to Cambridge, in 1615, was entertained at Trinity College by Dr. Nevil, who died in May of the same year. By his munificence to Trinity College, Dr. Nevil has secured to himself the gratitude and admiration of posterity. He expended more than fifteen thousand dollars in rebuilding that fine quadrangle which to this day retains the name of Nevil's Court. He was also a contributor to the library of that college, and a benefactor to Eastbridge hospital in his native city.

NEVILLE (nev'il), EDMUND, D.D., was a native of London. He entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was ordained at Philadelphia in 1840. He had charge of St. Thomas' Church, Taunton, Massachusetts, until 1842, when he assumed the duties of St. Philip's Church, Philadelphia. In 1850 he settled in New Orleans, whence he removed to New York and again to Taunton, Massachusetts, only to change to Newark, New Jersey, in 1857. He is the author of "Autumnal Leaves," "George Selwood" and "Questions on the Morning and Evening Services."

NEVILLE, RALPH DE, an English churchman and lawyer of the thirteenth century, high in the favor of Henry III. He was made bishop of Chichester, chancellor of Ireland, and in 1231 was elected archbishop of Canterbury, though the pope refused to confirm the election. Through the queen's influence he lost the king's favor, who endeavored to remove him, but he refused to resign without the authority of Parliament. He was finally restored to the royal favor in 1242. He built a magnificent mansion in the street which was in consequence called Chancellor's Lane, afterward corrupted into Chancery Lane. Ambitious and wealthy, he was yet a man faithful to his sovereign, and able and irreproachable in his administration; accessible alike to poor and rich, and a munificent benefactor to the Church.

NEVINS (nev'inz), WILLIAM, D.D., was born in 1797, in Norwich, Connecticut, and after an effort to train him to mercantile life, he was allowed to enter Yale College, where he graduated in 1816. He then entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and after three years' study of theology, he was licensed to preach by the New London Association in 1819. He was ordained as successor to the Rev. Dr. Inglis in the First Presbyterian Church in Baltimore. Here he had to assume the duties of a most weighty charge, and his pastoral work showed that the great Head of the Church had planted in that portion of the field the under shepherd who by intellectual endowments, prudence and determination, and still more by earnest spirituality of mind, was exactly fitted for the place. In 1832 Baltimore was severely scourged by cholera, and in that trying season he lost his wife and her mother. Soon afterward it became evident that his own health was on the wane. He rapidly declined, and in September, 1835, he died most triumphantly in the full assurance of faith and hope. Dr. Nevins was eminent for his originality, his great clearness and nervous power of style, and accordingly his preaching was direct and most impressive, reaching every faculty and power of all in his audience. He was a great and good man.

NEWBURY (new'ber-e), WALTER, is the name of one of the great men connected with the abbey of St. Augustine, now the cathedral of Bristol. In 1148, Robert Fitzharding, the mayor of Bristol, founded a priory of Black Canons at Bristol, and in the reign of Henry II. it was changed into an abbey. It became one of the great abbeys of England, and at the dissolution of the religious houses in 1542 Henry VIII. changed the church of the abbey into a cathedral, appointing a bishop, a dean, a subdeacon, six canons, six lay clerks, six choristers, two grammar-school masters, four almsmen and other beneficiaries, at the same time endowing the cathedral church with the greatest part of the lands of the old monastery. Newbury was elected in 1428, and he encountered great trouble in governing the abbey. He was even thrust out of it in a most illegal manner, and for five years he had to endure great oppression. After being restored, he became a great benefactor to the place, and in addition to all his improvements made at the abbey, he erected the great manor-house of Almondsbury, which still belongs to the see of Bristol. Newbury died in 1463.

The cathedral of Bristol does not take rank with the churches of the first or even second class in England. The edifice is small and low, but the tower is imposing. It has no clerestory, and the side aisles are of the same height as the body of the church. Approaching the western entrance, there is no long-drawn nave with expansive window and gorgeous canopied doorway. In fact, there is no nave at all, and from the tower to the right and left the transepts extend, and the choir beyond the tower, with its side aisles, constitutes the main body of the church. There is a chapter-house to the south of the south transept, and a Lady chapel to the east of the north transept, and these with vestries make up the cathedral of Bristol—a church in which some of the most profound scholars and eminent divines of England have ministered. The names of Butler, the author of the "Analogy," of Conybeare, the author of the great works on "Miracles" and on "Revealed Religion," of Thomas Newton, of Gray, of Monk and Thompson are sufficient to reflect credit on any see.

NEWCOMB (neu'kum), HARVEY, D.D., who became a very voluminous author, especially as a writer for the young, was born at Thetford, Vermont, in 1803. He became a teacher, and in Westfield, New York, he edited and published "The Western Star." He removed to Pittsburg, where he edited "The Christian Herald" and produced Sabbath-school books of much value. Being licensed to preach, he took charge of the Roxbury Congregational Church, and afterward of the Needham and Grantville churches. He was then engaged to edit "The Traveler," and in 1851 he connected himself with "The New York Observer," preaching at the same time in Brooklyn. He wrote one hundred and seventy-eight volumes, mostly for children, and among them were fourteen volumes of Church history. His largest work was "The Cyclopædia of Missions," which appeared in 1855. In addition to all this labor, he was a frequent contributor to several journals, and he prepared works on "The North American Indians" and on the "Great Truths of Christianity." He possessed great versatility of talent, much readiness and vast energy, as his numerous works abundantly display. He died in 1863, at Brooklyn.

NEWCOME (new'kum), WILLIAM, an eminent Irish prelate, descended from a non-conformist family, was born at Barton-le-Clay, in Bedfordshire, in 1729, and educated at Pembroke College, Oxford. In 1765 he was appointed chaplain to the earl of Hertford, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, who conferred on him the see of Drogheda. In 1775 he was translated to Ossary, and in 1778 he produced his first work, "An Harmony of the Gospels," which involved him in a controversy with Dr. Priestley respecting the duration of our Lord's ministry, Dr. Priestley confining it to one year, while the bishop extended its duration to three years and a half. In 1795 he was translated to the archbishopric of Armagh. He died in Dublin in 1800.

NEWCOMEN (neu'kum-en), MATTHEW, nonconformist divine of England, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. As member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, he assisted in the drawing up of their catechism, and he was one of the five divines who attacked Bishop Hall's "Vindication of Episcopacy." He was ejected from the living of Dedham, Essex, in 1662, and then retired to Leyden, where he died in 1666.

NEWELL, HARRIET, who was the daughter of Moses Atwood, of Haverhill, Massachusetts, was born in 1793. She became the wife of the missionary Samuel Newell, with whom she went to the East. In 1812 she died of consumption, in the Isle of France, whither, with her husband, she had been driven from India. She had unusually great mental and spiritual endowments. She was intellectual, exceedingly sensitive and tender, and deeply experimental and earnest in her piety, without any tendency to austerity or ostentatious sanctimoniousness. The biography of Mrs. Newell by Dr. Woods did much to promote the cause of missions; and thus it may be truly said that by her death she did more than she accomplished in her life.

NEWELL, SAMUEL, who was born at Durham, Maine, in 1785, graduated at Harvard College in 1807, and studied theology at Andover. Along with Judson, Nott and Mills, he offered himself as a missionary to the General Association of Ministers at Bradford, in June, 1810, and was ordained at Salem in 1812. He landed at Calcutta, and was ordered to leave the country by the Bengal government. He went to the Isle of France, where he lost his wife and child. He was permitted to settle in Ceylon, and after good service there, he succeeded in establishing himself at Bombay, where he labored until his death by cholera, in 1821. He was eminent for his piety, great sweetness and entire devotion to the work of his life.

NEW-FOUNDATION CATHEDRALS, a title given to the cathedrals which were founded and endowed by Henry VIII. out of the revenues of the dissolved monasteries. They were Oxford, Gloucester, Bristol, Chester and Peterborough; and the see of Sodor and Man, though formerly existing, was placed by Henry in the province of York.

NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH, or SWEDENBORGIANS (swe-den-bor'je-anz). These are the titles of those Christians who receive the doctrines taught in the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, a Swedish nobleman who was born in 1689, at Stockholm. He enjoyed the advantage of a good education in his early years; and as he was endowed with great intellectual capacity, he made great progress, and soon acquired a wide knowledge of the sciences. He was also trained very sedulously by his father in the faith of the Lutheran Church, and he gave evidence of a regard for religious truth from his youth up. In 1719 he was placed among the nobles of the kingdom, and he entered on the duties of legislation, taking his part in the management of public affairs. He was characterized by great literary industry, and he published a great number of philosophical works; but it is to the theological part of his system that this article must be devoted.

He declared that in the year 1743 the Lord manifested himself to him by an actual personal appearance, and that he so opened his eyes that he was afterward able to see and converse with angels and spirits—a privilege which he enjoyed without interruption for twenty-seven years. He then began to print and publish many marvelous things respecting heaven, hell, the state of men after death, the worship of God, the spiritual sense of the Scriptures and the different parts of the universe, which were incorporated into his system, and which soon attracted a large share of attention—by some who ridiculed his pretensions and by many who admitted his claims. He lived and died in the communion of the Lutheran Church. His theological views may be easily classified.

THE SCRIPTURES AS INTERPRETED BY THE WRITINGS AND REVELATIONS OF SWEDENBORG, TAKEN AS THE STANDARD OF SWEDENBORGIAN DOCTRINE.—On the doctrine of the Trinity Swedenborgians hold "that Jehovah God, the Creator and Preserver of heaven and earth, is Love itself and Wisdom itself, or God itself and Truth itself; that he is One, both in essence and in person, in whom, nevertheless, is the Divine Trinity of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, which are the essential Divinity, the Divine Humanity and the Divine Proceeding, answering to the soul, the body and the operative energy in man; and that the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is that God." An interpretation of this dogma is found in a clause in the "Conference Deed" which is enrolled in the Chancery, viz., "That our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is the only God of heaven and earth, and that in him is the Divine Trinity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit." On the Incarnation, the second article declares "that Jehovah God descended from heaven as Divine Truth, which is the Word, and took upon him human nature, for the purpose of removing from man the powers of hell and restoring to order all things in the spiritual world and all things in the Church; that he removed from man the powers of hell by combats against and victories over them, in which consisted the great work of redemption;" that "he for ever keeps the infernal powers in subjection to himself, and that all who believe in him with the understanding, from the heart, and live accordingly, will be saved."

Along with these statements must be taken the proposition "that to believe redemption to have consisted in the Passion of the Cross is a fundamental error of the Old Testament," and that the imputation of the merit and righteousness of Christ which consist in redemption is a thing impossible, the only imputation being one "of good and evil, and at the same time of faith; and that the Lord imputeth good to every man, and that hell imputeth evil to every man." On the subject of the Holy Scripture, the third article declares "that the sacred Scripture, or Word of God, is divine truth itself, containing a spiritual sense hitherto unknown, whence it is divinely inspired and holy in every syllable, as well as a literal sense, which is the basis of its spiritual sense, and in which divine truth is in its fullness, its sanctity and its power, thus that it is accommodated to the apprehension both of angels and man; that the spiritual and the natural senses are united by correspondences like soul and body, every natural expression and image answering to and including a spiritual and divine idea; and thus that the Word is the medium of communication with heaven and of conjunction with the Lord."

As to ordinances, it may be observed that Baptism and the Lord's Supper are considered as sacraments of divine institution to be permanently observed, the view of their efficacy being nearly in accordance with the Zwinglian conception.

The doctrines of Swedenborg extended into Germany, England, the United States and Canada. Of late years much attention has been paid to the publication of the works of Swedenborg, a society having been formed for that purpose. In England several of the views of the Swedish baron have been adopted by members of the Church of England without their separating from the Church.

NEWLAND (neu'land), an abbot of Bristol, became famous as the historian of the establishment. All the remains of an historical character which were produced by the officers of the old religious houses are fraught with great interest, inasmuch as they cast a flood of light on the inner life of these institutions. They record the difficulties, the jealousies, the misrule, the rebellions against authority, and other circumstances which from time to time were occurring in their history, and which showed that, whether in or out of a cloister, human nature is much the same. Newland died in 1515.

NEWMAN (neu'man), SAMUEL, was born in 1602, in England, and educated at the university of Oxford. He became a minister of the Established Church, but retired from it, and came to New England, about the year 1636. He labored for a year and a half at Dorchester, and about five years at Weymouth, and in 1644 he removed to Rehoboth, a place which bordered on the Providence Plantations. He gave this name to the place because of the opening which was there presented to his flock. He was the author of a concordance which passed through several editions, the fifth being published in London, in 1720, in a goodly-sized folio. He was a man of earnest character, learned and much devoted to his ministerial duties. Cotton Mather quaintly says of him, "He was a lively preacher, and a very preaching liver." He died in 1660.

NEW MOON, TABLES OF THE. Various tables have been devised for finding the new moon, from which Easter is calculated. The Metonic cycle was employed at the time of the Nicene council, and was supposed to contain nineteen years; but in reality it contained somewhat less, which deficiency amounts to a whole day in about three hundred and twelve years. The numbers belonging to this cycle have been called "golden numbers."

NEW STYLE. The present method of computing the year was introduced by Pope Gregory XIII., in October, 1582. By ten days were deducted from the year 1582 by calling what, according to the old calendar, would have been the 5th of October the 15th of October, 1582. It did not come into force in England until September 2, 1752.

NEWTON (neu'tun), JOHN, who became rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, in London, was born in that city, in 1722. His father was the master of a ship that traded to the Mediterranean. His mother, who was a pious dissenter, taught him the Westminster Shorter Catechism with the proof-texts, and the catechisms and hymns of Dr. Watts, but she died when he was only seven years of age. He had but little attendance at school; for when he was only eleven years old, he went several voyages with his father, and on the occasion of the fifth voyage he was left with a friend of his father at Alicante, in Spain. He became master of a vessel in the African slave-trade, and on the African coast he fell into habits of dissipation and profligacy that seemed to have erased all the impressions of his childish years. Eventually, he became surfeited and tired of his degradation and vice. He retired from the sea and engaged in the duties of tide-waiter at Liverpool, which, after three years, he resigned in 1778, to prepare himself for the duties of a minister in the Established Church of England, as his whole heart and life had become entirely changed. He failed in an effort which he made to induce the archbishop of York to ordain him, and began to act as an expounder of Scripture and a missionary among the careless classes, thus spending seven or eight years of his life. At length, in 1764, the curacy of Olney was offered to him, and the bishop of Lincoln ordained him. For fifteen years he resided at Olney, and here he was the intimate friend of the poet Cowper, the "Olney Hymns" being the joint production of these two congenial minds. In 1777 Mr. John Thornton presented Newton to the rectory of St. Mary Woolnoth, and St. Mary Woolnoth church Haw, in Lombard street, London, and he removed to the capital; and here, during twenty-seven years of great usefulness and remarkable popularity, he labored till his death, in 1807, at the age of eighty-five years. He was a man of great originality, much acuteness and admirably fitted for the practical details of ministerial life. His views were Calvinistic in accordance with those of his friend Thomas Scott, the commentator, and his influence on behalf of practical and experimental religion was universally recognized. His published works extend to six volumes octavo, and they continue to be much sought after until the present time.

NEWTON (neu'tun), RICHARD, a learned English divine, founder of Hertford College, Oxford, was born in 1676, at Yardley Chase, in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he distinguished himself as a tutor. In 1710 he was inducted principal of Hart Hall, and subsequently was made rector of Sudbury, in Northamptonshire. His application for a charter to take Hart Hall from under the jurisdiction of Exeter College and erect it into an independent college occasioned a most ably-sustained controversy between him and the rector of Exeter. In 1740, however, he obtained the charter for raising Hart Hall into a perpetual college for the usual studies. In 1752 he was promoted to a canonry of Christ Church. He died in 1753. He was the author of "Pluralities Indispensable."

NEWTON, THOMAS, an English prelate, was born at Lichfield in 1704. After finishing his education at Westminster, he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and in 1744 he was presented to the rectory of St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside. In 1794 he published an edition of Milton's Paradise Lost with notes and the life of the author, which was followed by the "Paradise Regained," in a similar form. But his reputation rests on his "Dissertations on the Prophecies," completed in 1758. He was made a prebendary of Westminster in 1757, and soon after precentor of York, both which preferments he resigned in 1761, on his promotion to the see of Bristol. In 1768 he was made dean of St. Paul's, and died in 1782.

NEZIB (ne'tsib), a town in the plain country of Judah, Josh. xv. 43, doubtless Beit Nusib, between Beit Jibrin (ancient Eleutheropolis) and Hebron.

NIBHAZ (nib'haz), an idol deity of the Avites whose worship was introduced into Samaria after the deportation of the ten tribes, 2 Ki. xvii. 31. According to the Hebrew interpreters the idol bore the figure of a dog, which, however, it is supposed may have been a conjecture founded on the derivation of the name from a word signifying "to bark." But some traces have been thought to be discovered of a Syrian idol under that figure.

NIBSHAN (nib'shan), a city in the wilderness of Judah, Josh. xv. 62—that is, the region contiguous to the Dead Sea.

at which in A. D. 325 a celebrated council was convened by the emperor Constantine to settle the differences that had arisen in the Christian Church in respect to the doctrines of Arius. It was attended by two hundred and fifty bishops, most of them from the East, by presbyters, deacons and others from different parts of the Christian world. The decision of this council did not give peace to the Church, as the controversy still went on, but it supplied that mode of stating the doctrine of the Church on the subject of the Deity which ever since has been recognized as orthodox. See NICENE CREED.

NICENE (ni'seen) CREED is so called because it was in its first form drawn up at Nicæa, in Bithynia, in A. D. 325, to express the faith of the Church in opposition to the heresy of Arius. Some have thought that it was soon used in the services of the Church, though others date its use from the following century, the latter part Ages. 1. A patriarch of Constantinople, who was born in that city about 750. He attended at the second Council of Nice, in 787, where he zealously exerted himself in defence of image-worship. In 806 he was elected patriarch. In 814, an edict having been promulgated by the emperor Leo, the Armenian, for the suppression of the worship of images, the patriarch made use of all the means in his power to prevent it from being carried into execution. The emperor, finding that neither advice nor admonition had any effect in inclining the patriarch to submission, passed a decree of deposition and banishment against him. The chief part of his exile was spent in a monastery which had been founded by himself in an island of the Propontis, where he was confined till his death, in 828. He is honored as a confessor by both the Greek and Latin Churches.

NICANDER (ni-kan'der) and MARCIAN (mar'sh'an) were two Christian martyrs who suffered in the fourth century. They were officers in the Roman army who had received the faith. The wife of Nicander was also a Christian, and in the most devoted manner she encouraged her husband to constancy in the faith. Marcian, on the other hand, had to bear the solicitations of his wife, who remained a pagan, to renounce his religion for her sake and for the sake of their child. He remained steadfast, admonished her touching her idolatry, and both suffered death (A. D. 306) for their attachment to Christ the Saviour.

having been added at the Council of Constantinople in 381, for the last clause as the creed was at first prepared ended with the words, "I believe in the Holy Ghost." The addition contravened the heresy of Macedonius with regard to the Holy Spirit. Still later, in 589, the words "filioque" (and the Son) were added by the Western Church to express the doctrine that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son as well as the Father—a tenet which the Greek Church considers heretical. The Nicene Creed is recognized in the Greek and Romish Churches, and most Protestant Churches admit it. At the time of the Reformation it was introduced by the Lutherans into their "Formula of Concord." In the English Prayer-book the Nicene Creed is introduced into the communion service, but in the American Prayer-book it is placed in the morning and evening services, the minister having liberty to use it or the Apostles' Creed as he may please.

Eusebius, Socrates and others, and he completed his work before he was thirty-six years of age. On account of the elegance with which it is written, the author has been honored with the title of the ecclesiastical Thucydides by some critics, while others, from the marvelous tales and fables which are interspersed in it, have given him the name of the theological Pliny.

NICHE (nich), a term in architecture derived from the French, which means a recess, either square or cylindrical, usually made for the reception of a statue.

NICHOLAS (nik'o-las). The name of a line of popes. I., surnamed the Great, was raised to the pontificate in 858. He was distinguished for his virtues and his energy in spreading Christianity, his resisting heresy and restoring piety and splendor to the Roman Church. He died in 867. II., a native of Savoy, became pope in 1058. He was a friend of Hildebrand (Gregory VII.), agreeably to whose reforming views he endeavored to correct ecclesiastical abuses. He died in 1061. III. was elected pope in 1277. He attempted a reconciliation with the Greek Church, but marred his otherwise remarkable qualities by his nepotism—a fault for which he was severely censured in the nineteenth canto of the “Inferno.” He died in 1280. IV. was elected pope in 1288. He displayed great interest in the restoration of Roman monuments, embellished the city, laid the first stone of the famous cathedral of Orvieto and earnestly endeavored to lead the Christian princes into a new crusade against the Saracens. He died, in 1292, of sorrow at the news of the fall of Acre. V. was born at Sarzana, in 1389, and became pope in 1447. He was one of the most celebrated of pontiffs for his zeal in the promotion of ecclesiastical interests as well as of learning. He had from an early age obtained great reputation as a scholar. He succeeded in putting an end to the differences which had arisen from the Council of Bale, restored order in his states, improved the university of Bologna, founded those of Barcelona, Treves and Glasgow, our Lord. He had many disciples in Holland chiefly from the fanatical branches of the sect of Anabaptists, and his notions spread to England, where his followers had private assemblies for devotion. Nicholas was the author of “The Looking-glass of Righteousness” and other works.

NICODEMUS (nik-o-de'mus), a Pharisee and member of the Sanhedrim who was impressed by what he had heard concerning Jesus, but being unwilling, on account of his station, to commit himself without greater surety than he possessed, repaired by night to the house in which Christ dwelt, and held with him that important discourse which occupies the third chapter of John's Gospel. The effect which was then produced upon his mind may be collected from the fact that subsequently, at one of the sittings of the venerable body to which he belonged, he ventured to let fall a few words in favor of Jesus, whose proceedings were then in question, John vii. 50; and that he took part with his colleague, Joseph of Arimathea, in meaning of the name Balaam is nearly that of the name Nicolas, he says that the Nicolaitanes or Balaamites were “those who, after the pattern of Balaam's sin, sought to introduce a false freedom of the freedom of the flesh, into the Church of God.” Jewish legalism was the first enemy of the truth afterward came heathen licentiousness. The reader must take his choice of these two explanations each of which is supported by distinguished critics

NICOLAS (nik'olas), one of the seven chosen to administer the goods of the Church, Acts vi. 5. He is described as a proselyte of Antioch.

NICOLE (ne-kol'), PIERRE, an eminent French divine and controversial writer, was born at Chartres, in 1625. He became member of the society of Port Royal, where he taught with great reputation, and was associated with Arnauld in his defence of Jansenius. A letter he had written to Pope Innocent XI., in defence of certain bishops, raised such a storm that he was compelled to retire for a season from his native country. Finally, in 1683, every ban was removed, and he was suffered to pursue his studies uninterruptedly in Paris. He died in 1695. His chief works are “Letters and Reflections on the Epistles and Gospels” and “Moral Essays.”

NICOLSON (nik'ol-sun), WILLIAM, a learned English prelate, was born at Orton, in Cumberland, in 1655, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, became successively bishop of Carlisle, Derry, and archbishop of Cashel, but died suddenly a few days after he was raised to the archiepiscopal dignity, in 1727. He published “The English, Scotch and Irish Historical Library,” the “Leges Marchiarum, or Border Laws,” and several other works. He also distinguished himself by the zeal and ability with which he entered into the Bangorian controversy.

NICON (ni'kon), a saint in the Greek and Roman calendars, lived in the tenth century. He entered a monastery on the borders of Pontus and Paphlagonia, and gained a reputation for extraordinary sanctity. In 961 he was sent on a mission into Armenia, where his labors are said to have been eminently successful. From Armenia he went to Crete, and thence to Iacedæmon, whence he was called to Corinth. He died in 998.

NICON, patriarch of the Russian empire, was born near Nischni Novogorod, of mean parentage, in 1605. He had a strong prejudice in favor of a monastic life, and the loss of his children led him to assume the habit of a monk and to send his wife to a convent. His austerities, as well as his learning, by degrees raised him to public consequence; he was patronized by his sovereign, and at last made archbishop of Novogorod and patriarch of Russia. Some innovations which he introduced into the Church, and the publication of the Bible in the Russian language, raised him enemies among the clergy, and at last, by intrigue and violence, he was obliged to abdicate his high office, in 1658, and was imprisoned; but the emperor permitted him to retire to the privacy of his original cell. He died in 1681, after enduring much undeserved persecution.

NICOPOLIS (ni-kop'o-lis). There were many ancient cities which bore this name; three in particular have been supposed by different critics the one meant, Tit. iii. 12. One of these was in the procured equitable reforms in maritime laws and offered liberal hospitality to the Greek exiles from Constantinople. The Vatican Library first rose under his auspices. His pontificate was troubled by the famous conspiracy of Stefano Porcari in behalf of Roman freedom against the temporal power of the papacy. He died in 1455.

NICHOLAS, HENRY, a German Mystic of the sixteenth century, and founder of the fanatical sect known by the name of “The House or Family of Love,” was a native of Munster. He first attracted the notice of the public about the year 1540, and pretended that he had a commission from Heaven to teach men that the essence of religion consisted in the feelings of divine love, and that all other theological tenets, whether they related to objects of faith or modes of worship, were of no moment. He pretended that he was greater than Moses and Christ, because Moses taught mankind to hope, Christ to believe, but he to love. He also gave out that the kingdom of Israel was to be raised and established in the time of his ministry, applying to himself those prophecies that refer to

NICOLAITANES (nik-o-la'i-tānz), the designation of a party or sect whom our Lord declares, Rev. ii. 6, 15, that he hates. There is a difficulty in deciding who these persons were and whence they had their origin. A prevailing early opinion was that they were the followers of Nicolas the deacon, who had lapsed from the faith and lived in impurity. Afterward another Nicolas was deemed the founder of the Nicolaitanes. Dr. Alford believes a plain historical fact referred to, and sees nothing unreasonable in imagining that an associate of the apostles made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. Dr. Trench, on the other hand, prefers a symbolical interpretation. He does not deny that in the second century there were actual Nicolaitanes, but he thinks that no sect really bore the name in the apostolic times. He considers those who held the doctrine of Balaam, Rev. ii. 14, identical with those who held the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, Rev. ii. 15; and as the north-eastern corner of Cilicia; another on the Nessus, in the interior of Thrace; the third in Epirus (though Pliny assigns it to Arcanania). This last, most probably the Nicopolis intended by St. Paul, was built by Augustus in commemoration of his victory at Actium.

NIELD (neeld), JAMES, a man who, like the philanthropist Howard, devoted a great part of his life to the relief of human wretchedness, was born at Knutsford, in Cheshire, England, in 1744, and coming to London as an apprentice to a goldsmith, realized a fortune in that business. In 1773, by his exertions, a society was formed in the metropolis having for its object the relief and discharge of persons confined for small debts. Of this benevolent institution Mr. Nield was chosen treasurer, and he continued to hold that office through life. He traveled not, as most do, for pleasure or profit, but to gauge the depths of human misery and to alleviate the sufferings of his fellow-men. It was his constant practice in his prison excursions, as he called them, during thirty years, to wait upon the magistrates in cities and boroughs, and respectfully to represent what he saw amiss in their jails. By these means he was the instrument of producing many substantial improvements and of diffusing a kindred spirit of beneficence far and wide, so that it would be difficult to estimate the extent of his services in the humane cause to which he cheerfully and perseveringly devoted his time and fortune. He died, universally lamented, in 1814.

NIEREMBERG (ni'rem-berg), JOHN EUSEBIUS DE, a learned Spanish Jesuit, descended from a noble Tyrolese family, was born at Madrid in 1590, and educated at Salamanca, where he entered the society in 1614. Natural history, divinity and the Scriptures were the subjects to which his chief attention was devoted. He filled the chair of natural history in the royal school at Madrid for fourteen years, with very high reputation, and afterward, during three years, read lectures illustrative of the Scriptures. At the same time he was held in high estimation as a director of consciences, and was attended in his confessional by vast numbers of distinguished characters, in the highest ranks. He was the author of a prodigious number of works in Latin and Spanish, among which is "Worshiping in Spirit and in Truth." His death took place in 1658.

NIGEL (ni'jel), bishop of Ely, was nephew of Roger, bishop of Salisbury, the great justiciary of Henry I., through whose influence he was made treasurer of England. He held the castle of Devezes against Stephen for three days, in consequence of which he was suspended for several years. In the reign of Henry II. he was restored, and rose in favor, and is supposed to have held the great seal. He was a man of learning and ability, and showed incomparable knowledge of the business of the exchequer.

reputation by his writings, was born at Wolpe, in the duchy of Brunswick, in 1584. He was educated in the Lutheran religion, and after studying for some time in the colleges of Verden and Goslar, went to the university of Helmstadt about 1607. While private tutor at the court of Weimar he conceived a disgust against the Lutheran Church, owing, it is said, to his being disappointed of preferment, and he retired to Cologne, where he became a convert to the Romish religion, about 1622. His first employment was that of director of the college of proselytes, and he afterward entered the lists in defence of the popish cause. In 1626 he returned to the duchy of Brunswick, to be director of a convent of nuns, and in 1629 he was made abbot of Ilfeld. From this abbey he was driven by the Swedes in 1633, when he withdrew into Holland, where he continued to reside till 1649. Returning afterward into Germany, he was made suffragan of the archbishop of Mentz, with the title of bishop of Mysia. He died in 1657.

considerable as the neighboring Resen, but destined far to outshine it in celebrity. Resen, Rehoboth and Calah were the other cities built in his reign by Nimrod. This is all that at present we know for certain of Nimrod. Among the Assyrian monuments a figure has been discovered which is said to represent Nimrod; he is grasping a lion in his left hand, while his right holds probably a missile weapon.

NIMSHI (nim'shi), the grandfather of King Jehu, 1 Ki. xix. 16.

NINEVEH (nin'e-veh), the capital of the ancient kingdom and empire of Assyria, was situated on the east bank of the Tigris. The name appears to be compounded from that of an Assyrian deity, "Nin," corresponding, it is conjectured, with the Greek Hercules, and occurring in the names of several Assyrian kings, as in "Ninus," the founder of the city, according to Greek tradition. The political history of Nineveh is that of NIMROD (nim'rod), an eminent early warrior and king; he was the son of Cush and grandson of Ham, and his history is briefly summed in a few verses, Gen. x. 8-12; 1 Chr. i. 10. He was the first mighty hero upon the earth; he was successful in war, and was distinguished in the chase, so that his skill and intrepidity as a huntsman passed into a proverb. He was not content with a narrow sphere; he roamed northward into the fertile land of Shinar and to the great town Babylon. There he established the first seat of his empire, so that Babylon was afterward called "the land of Nimrod," Mic. v. 6. His ambition prompted him, however, to wider conquests; he went into the country called Asshur, Gen. x. 11, margin, and there he founded Nineveh, not at its origin so

NIOBE (ni-o'be), in classical mythology, was the daughter of Tantalus and one of the Pleiades, married to Amphion, king of Thebes. Proud of her numerous offspring, she provoked the anger of Apollo and Diana, who slew them all. She was herself changed by Jupiter into a rock, from which a rivulet fed by her tears continually poured. The subject of Niobe and her children was a great favorite with the ancients, and it has afforded great room for sculpture among modern artists.

NISAN, NISON. See MONTHS.

NISBET (nis'bit), CHARLES, D.D., was born in 1736, at Haddington, in Scotland, and educated in the university of Edinburgh, where he graduated in 1754. He began his ministry in Glasgow at the church in the Gorbals, but in two years he removed to Montrose. When the presidency of Princeton College was offered to Dr. Witherspoon, he declined it, and suggested the name of Mr. Nisbet, but eventually Dr. Witherspoon was induced to change his mind, and thus the mind of the other was directed to the American colonies. He was decided in his views that the cause of the colonists was just in their complaints against the policy of the home government. In 1783, the degree of doctor of divinity was conferred on him, by the trustees of Princeton College; and when the new college at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, was established, he was induced to become the first president. He reached Philadelphia in June, 1785, and in due time entered on the duties of his office. He lectured with great acceptance, on systematic theology, to students who had the ministry in view, and he often aided Dr. Davidson in the services of the Presbyterian church in Carlisle. He died in 1804, of fever and inflammation of the lungs, resulting from a severe cold, leaving behind him the character of a man of fine scholarship, great earnestness and determination, with a firm purpose ever to do all that he knew to be right. He belonged to the evangelical side in Scotland, and in his adopted country, all who heard recognized the clear Scriptural doctrines of the standards of the Church. His library, through the kindness of Bishop McCoskry and Henry C. Turnbull, two of his grandsons, was given to the theological seminary at Princeton.

NITRE (ni'ter), Prov. xxv. 20. This is, no doubt, the natron found abundantly in certain Egyptian lakes fifty miles west of Cairo. The Egyptians use it in bread, and for soap; also, it is said, mixed with vinegar as a cure for toothache. The contrariety between these two ingredients illustrates the place referred to.

NIX, an eminent bishop of Norwich, holds a distinguished place along with Bishops Goldwell, Lyart, Walter de Suffield, Ralph de Walpole and others of the great mediæval ecclesiastical builders. He succeeded Goldwell, and carried out several of the works which that prelate did not live to finish, and his taste may still be seen in the stone vaulting of the transept. He was held in high esteem as an efficient ruler in the Church, and after his death a monument was erected to his memory, which still remains in the cathedral. It stands on the south side of the nave.

NISROCH (nis'rok), an Assyrian deity in whose house or temple Sennacherib was worshipping when he was slain by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer, 2 Ki. xix. 37; Isa. xxxvii. 38. Very little is known of this god, but it has been proposed to identify him with Asshur, the supreme deity of the Assyrians. It is certain that a human figure, with the head of an eagle and wings springing from the back, occurs frequently on early Assyrian monuments. The name of Nisroch may have been given to this, and it may correspond with the Egyptian sun-god Phraih, which had the head of an eagle or hawk. But learned men can but at present offer conjectures.

NOADIAH (no-ad'yah). 1. A Levite, Ezra viii. 33. 2. A prophetess who would have intimidated Nehemiah, Neh. vi. 14.

NOAH (no'ah). 1. An eminent patriarch, the ninth in descent after Adam. He lived in evil times. Five hundred years he spent in a world filled with violence, and in rampant rebellion against its Maker. But he walked with God. He was a preacher of righteousness, 2 Pet. ii. 5, by his conduct, and probably by his words also. At length a message was revealed to him: "The end of all flesh is come before me," Gen. vi. 18; and he was instructed to build an ark for the preservation of his own family. Moved with godly fear, he obeyed; and his preparations must have preached still more plainly to the world of sinners. For a full century still the long-suffering of God waited. Whether in that interval any had humbled themselves and sought mercy we know not, but we know that when the hour of destiny arrived the world was in its mad uproar. There was feasting, and there was the business of life in full whirl, and no man chose to recognize his danger till the storm burst suddenly upon them, Matt. xxiv. 37-39. A year passed over. Noah had more than once opened the window of the ark and sent forth birds, and at last the command came for him to go forth. He built an altar then and sacrificed to the Lord; and glad must have been his heart when he heard the gracious words of a fresh covenant, and beheld the beautiful bow, the pledge of it, and knew now by personal experience how gracious God is to those that humbly seek him. He had exercised faith, and his faith was crowned with blessing.

Noah was to be the father of a new race. From his small family the earth was to be re-peopled. And three hundred and fifty years did he live among his posterity, a monument of God's justice and God's faithfulness. One more incident is related of him, Gen. ix. 20-27. He planted a vine and drank, knowingly or not we cannot say, too freely of the fruit of it. A shameful scene ensued. But the patriarch recovered, and in the spirit of prophecy predicted happiness to his faithful sons, judgment to the ungodly. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."—"The days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years, and he died," Gen. ix. 29. See DELUGE.

NOAILLES (no-al', or no-a'yeh), LOUIS ANTOINE DE, a French prelate and cardinal, was born in 1651. At his birth he inherited the dukedom of St. Cloud and other dignities, all which temporal advantages he relinquished in order to become an ecclesiastic. When but twenty-five years old, he was made a doctor of the Sorbonne. His rise was progressive, till at length he became archbishop of Paris. He was a firm opponent of the Jansenists and Quietists, although he at one time was himself accused of heresy, in opposing the bull Unigenitus, so that a sentence of banishment was recorded against him. He afterward, however, made his submission to the pope, and accepted the bull Unigenitus without any reserve or qualification. He died in 1729.

NOB, a city in Benjamin, on the great road from the north to Jerusalem, in the immediate neighborhood of which it must have been, perhaps on the ridge of Olivet. The tabernacle seems to have been here in the time of Saul, who, for the alleged favor shown by the high-priest Ahimelech to David, destroyed the city, which was, however, afterward rebuilt, 1 Sam. xxi. 1; xxii. 9-19.

NOBAH, the later name of the town Kenath, Jud. viii. 11.

NOBILI (nob'i-le), PADRE ROBERTO DE, a Tuscan missionary of the Order of Jesus, was born in 1577. He was considered by his religious brethren only second to St. Francis Xavier in his zeal and achievements for the conversion of the infidels. He was also a very learned Orientalist and conversant with all Indian idioms. The Ezouwedan, a modern imitation of the Vedas, is ascribed to him. He died in 1656.

NOBLEMAN (no'b'l-man). The word so rendered in John iv. 46 has somewhat various significations. It may mean: 1. Descended from a king. 2. One belonging to the court. 3. A soldier of the king, in which latter sense it often occurs in Josephus. The second signification seems, however, to be the prevalent one, and the Greek interpreters are also favorably inclined toward it. This person was probably of the court of Herod Antipas, who reigned over Galilee and Peræa.

NOEL (no'el), SILAS MERCER, D.D., was born in Essex county, Virginia, in 1783. He was educated in his native State, part of the time under a Scotch teacher who held skeptical principles, and from whom he received impressions which remained with him for a considerable time. He began to read works on medicine, but ere long he turned to the study of the law, and was called to the bar, and he soon commanded a good practice. In 1806 he settled as a lawyer in Kentucky, living in Louisville, which he left for the sake of his health. In 1811 his mind received a decidedly religious impression, and he offered himself for baptism to the Baptist church at the Forks of Elkhorn, in Franklin county, and was received. In 1813 he was ordained as pastor of the church at Big Spring, Woodford county, whence he removed to Frankfort, the capital of the State. In 1833 he was induced to settle in Lexington. For several years he had derived much of his support from a salary which he received for acting as judge in the fourth district, in which he resided, but he relinquished this in 1818, and gave himself exclusively to the duties of the ministry. In 1822 Transylvania University conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity. He was earnest, faithful and successful as a pastor, and he gave himself sedulously to the advancement of every good work, and in May, 1839, he was called to the rest which he had long anticipated, as he had been suffering under growing infirmities, which intimated that his season of work was drawing near a close.

NOETUS (no-ä'tus), the founder of the sect of Noetians, flourished during the third century, and was a native of Ephesus, in Asia. Augustin ascribes to him the notion "that Christ was also the Father himself and the Holy Ghost." The sum of his heresy is this: that there is one God and Father, the Creator of all things, not appearing when he thinks fit, appearing when he pleaseth; and that the same is invisible and visible, begotten and unbegotten; unbegotten from the beginning, begotten when he pleased to be born of a virgin; impassible and immortal, and again passible and mortal.

NOLLEY (nol'le), RICHMOND, was born in Virginia, in 1785. His parents removed to Georgia, where they shortly died, leaving him an orphan. A kind friend, Captain Lucas, took him under his care, educated him and gave him a place in his office. He was converted at a camp-meeting in the year 1806, and next year he was admitted to the traveling connection. In 1809 he was stationed at Wilmington, North Carolina, where he labored with great efficiency, and in the following year he was removed to Charleston, South Carolina. In 1812 he was sent to Louisiana. Here he labored with unwonted zeal, displaying a remarkable capacity for dealing with rough characters, meeting unexpected emergencies and succeeding where other men would have failed. He was lost in crossing a stream which he attempted to pass when engaged in traveling in the Attakapas circuit in Louisiana—a region in which, amid swamps, swollen rivers and scenes of desolation which few men could have lived in, he had cheerfully attempted to evangelize. Thus, in 1815, at thirty years of age, he passed from his labors to the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

NON, 1 Chr. vii. 27. See NUN.

NONCONFORMISTS (non'con-form'ists), a general term under which all the different persons were included who did not conform to the Church of England. Properly, it referred to the large body of the clergy and their followers who refused to subscribe to the Act of Uniformity, and were consequently ejected in 1662 from the Church. Two thousand persons resigned their livings rather than conform, and they had to endure many sore trials afterward, as a "Conventicle Act" forbade more than five persons besides the family to assemble in any house for religious worship, and the

NON-JURORS (non-ju'rorz). This name was given to that portion of the English clergy who held that they were bound by the oath of allegiance to James II., and consequently they could not recognize the validity of the title of William and Mary. Eight bishops, together with Sancroft the Primate and about four hundred of the clergy, were accordingly excluded from their benefices. The bishops thus deprived were Ken, of Bath and Wells; Turner, of Ely; Frampton, of Gloucester; Lloyd, of Norwich; White, of Peterborough; Thomas, of Worcester; Lake, of Chichester; and Cartwright, of Chester. They continued to minister privately among their adherents, and they consecrated bishops and ordained ministers. The party gradually declined, and it was supposed that Dr. Gordon was the last non-juring bishop. He died in 1779, leaving a few presbyters behind him. The Scottish Episcopal Church was considered to be non-juring until the death of Prince Charles Stuart, in 1788, when a resolution was adopted to recognize and pray for the reigning family.

NON-RESISTANCE, THE DOCTRINE OF, is that which inculcated the unlawfulness, on religious grounds, of resistance by force to the commands of a prince or magistrate. In England it was understood to mean unqualified obedience to any and all commands of the prince or supreme magistrates, whether lawful or not; and thus the doctrines of divine right and passive obedience were combined. These views were sanctioned in 1622 by the university of Oxford. After the civil wars men's minds were led to consider these questions more intelligently. The celebrated "Essay on Civil Government" by Locke did much to lead men to clearer views, but in 1683 the university again endorsed these views. The Revolution of 1688-89 produced a decided change in the nation;

and it is believed that few in Great Britain, and perhaps none in these United States, hold that conscience is bound to submit to the orders of magistrates when they evidently violate known law.

NOON. The Hebrew word which is translated "noon," Gen. xliii. 16, 25, is a dual form; it signifies, therefore, double light—i. e., the strongest brightness. It is metaphorically used for great prosperity or happiness, Job xi. 17. The phrase, "Let us go up at noon," Jer. vi. 4, probably means unexpectedly; an attack would be rarely made in the heat of the day.

NORBERT (nor'bert), the name of two persons eminent in the Roman Catholic Church:

1. A saint in the Roman calendar, and founder of the Premontré order of Augustinian monks, was descended from some of the most illustrious families of Germany, and was born at Santen, in the duchy of Cleves, in 1082. He was educated in the palace of the archbishop of Cologne; and having made choice of the ecclesiastical life, he received deacon's and priest's orders in the same day, and was made canon of his native place. The bishop of Laon, in Picardy, bestowed upon him a sequestered dale named Premontré, to which he retired in 1120, and there founded an institution of canons-regular, which took its title from the name of the secluded spot. Hither he attracted vast crowds by the popularity of his sermons, and gained many disciples. Soon after, he founded eight other monasteries, which adopted his discipline. He died at Magdeburg in 1134. Gregory XIII. placed him in the catalogue of saints in 1584.

2. A French Capuchin friar, famous for his adventures and his hostility to the Jesuits, was born at Bar-le-Duc, in 1697. He embraced the monastic life at the abbey of Saint Michael, in 1716. In 1736 he went to Pondicherry, in the East Indies, where he quarreled with the Jesuits; upon which he removed from the East Indies to this country. In 1744 he returned to Rome and employed himself in drawing up an account of the religious rites of the Malabar Christians. To escape from the hostility of the Jesuits, which he had provoked by his strictures upon the proceedings of their missionaries, he retired to Venice, whence he went to Holland, and from that country to England, where he established, near London, two manufactories of tapestry. Afterward he went to Prussia, and thence to Brunswick, where he received, in 1759, a brief from the pope, which permitted him to assume the habit of a secular priest. He then went to France, and thence to Portugal, where the quarrel with the Jesuits and their hatred of him recommended him to the court. Having completed in this asylum his great work against the Jesuits, he revisited France, where he committed it to the press. Afterward he re-entered the order of Capuchins at Commercy. He died in 1770.

NORFOLK (nor'fok), an illustrious English family descended from the Plantagenets. Those who were specially distinguished in ecclesiastical matters were—

1. ROGER BIGOD, who was head of the embassy of the king and the barons to the Council of Lyons in 1245 to make formal complaint of the unjustifiable claims and intolerable exactions of the pope, Innocent IV., in England. He also took part in the armed Parliament of 1157-8 to compel Henry III. to confirm the Great Charter and redress the grievances of the nation, but he subsequently went over to the king's side. He died in 1270.

2. THOMAS HOWARD, was born in 1473. He was one of the few witnesses present at the marriage of Anne Boleyn, who was his niece, to Henry VIII. But he was a steady opponent of the Reformation, and looked on as the head of the Romish party. He presided at the trial of Anne Boleyn, and pronounced the sentence of death on her. The merciless law called the Act of the Six Articles was promoted by the influence of the duke of Norfolk, who also urged the king on in the path of persecution. He was again employed in Scotland and in France, and then, becoming an object of the king's suspicion, he was suddenly arrested and committed to the Tower, December, 1546. The duke was sentenced to death, but the king died at the very time, and he was left in prison till the accession of Queen Mary, who restored him to his dignities and estates. He died at Kenninghall, in Norfolk, July 18, 1554.

NORIS (nor'is), ENRICO, a learned prelate of the Romish Church, was born at Verona, in 1631. He entered the Augustinian order, and devoted himself wholly to study and piety. The Jesuits accused him of Jansenism, but he was protected against their attacks by the grand duke of Tuscany, who appointed him professor at Pisa, by Queen Christina of Sweden, and by Pope Innocent XII., who made him cardinal in 1695. He left, besides a number of historical and archæological dissertations, a valuable history of the controversy against Pelagius. He died at Rome in 1704.

NORMAN (nor'man) ARCHITECTURE, or the Anglo-Norman style, was first used about the time of the Norman conquest of England, for the specimens which exist of the time of Edward the Confessor, or earlier, are so very rude that they can scarcely be called Norman. In the early stages this style was plain and massive, with few mouldings, and those principally confined to small features, such as the string, impost, abacus and base, the arches being plain or formed with a succession of square angles, and the capitals of the pillars were generally devoid of ornament. Sculpture was rarely used before the twelfth century, but earlier buildings, when repaired, were often ornamented. As the style advanced, greater lightness and enrichment were introduced, and many of the later specimens exhibit a profusion of ornaments. A very common mode of decorating buildings in this style was with rows of small shallow niches or panels which were often formed of intersecting arches, and some of them were frequently pierced to form windows. The doorways were often deeply recessed, and they had small shafts in the jambs which, when first introduced were cut on the same stones with the other parts of the work and built up in courses, but later in the style they were set in as separate columns, like the early English. The windows were not usually of large size, and in general appearance they resembled small round-headed doors. They had no mullions or perpendicular shafts dividing the windows into two or more lights. Sometimes the

were placed in pairs when much light was required, and often they were surmounted by an arch. In this style the pillars were heavy and often exceedingly massive, and sometimes they were channeled or moulded in zigzag or spiral lines, as in Durham Cathedral. The buttresses were commonly broad and of small projection from the wall, often uniting with the face of the parapet or terminating just below the cornice. When ornament was introduced into the style, small shafts were frequently worked on the angles of the buttresses. Spires and pinnacles were not in early use, but at a late date towers with conical tops, as at the west end of Rochester Cathedral, were used. In Normandy, several small church towers have steep pyramidal roofs of stone. It was not till toward the end of the Norman style that groining on a large scale was practiced; and when introduced, the vaults of churches were groined without bosses or diagonal ribs; and many of the old Norman churches, even of large size, had horizontal ceilings or plain cylindrical vaults, as at the chapel in the White Tower of London.

A marked feature of Norman architecture was the round arch of the window-head, and the round arch from the head of one column to the head of another. Doorways, windows and arches, whether in cathedrals or churches, are known to belong to this style by the round or semicircular arch, no matter how much ornamented the arch may be. This peculiarity distinguishes the Norman from the Early English, the style which succeeded it with its sharp-pointed lancet arch, the Decorated still later, and the Perpendicular later still, in all of which the arch is pointed, though the tracery and filling in of the heads of the windows differ in these later styles.

When the Norman style began to give place, in the latter part of the twelfth century, to the Early English, the pointed arch was introduced; but in this transition period the ornaments and many of the members were still of pure Norman character. It only remains that reference may be made to a few edifices which serve as specimens of this style, at the date of their erection: William the Conqueror, A. D. 1066-1087—the dormitory of Canterbury Cathedral; Rochester Cathedral, tower on north side; London, the keep in the Tower. William II., 1087-1100—the transepts of Ely Cathedral, Durham Cathedral, Norwich Cathedral, part of Carlisle Cathedral, the transepts of Winchester Cathedral and Colchester Castle. Henry I., 1100-1135—the choir of Peterborough Cathedral, the nave of Durham Cathedral, of Norwich and of Rochester. Stephen, 1135-1154—the choir of St. Cross, Hampshire, the nave of Hereford Cathedral, the doorway of Kenilworth Priory Church. Henry II., 1154-1189—the period of transition into the Early English, the nave and transepts of Peterborough Cathedral, the nave of Ely Cathedral, the Galilee of Durham, the Temple Church in London and the choir of Canterbury, as rebuilt by William of Sens, 1175-1184.

The reader of this Encyclopedia will find examples of Norman work by referring to the illustrations on pages 27, 128, 138, 139, 140 (141 TRANSITION), 180, 181, 183, 356, 379, 446, 607, 621, 817, 844, 845, 935, 1060, 1061, and elsewhere throughout this work. These specimens will enable any intelligent person to understand all the peculiarities of this style.

NORRIS (nor'ris), JOHN, an eminent Mystic divine and Platonist, was born in 1657, at Collingbourne Kingston, in Wiltshire, England, and was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and became rector of Bemerton, near Salisbury, where he died in 1711. He ranks as one of the most eminent of the English Platonists, and was a good man, though a visionary. Among his works are—"The Theory and Regulation of Love," "Reflections upon the Conduct of Human Life."

NORTH. A Hebrew, when speaking with reference to the points of the compass, was considered as having his face to the east; the north consequently was on the left, and thus "the left hand" designates the north, Gen. xiv. 15. The north also was considered higher than the south, hence those traveling from north to south went down, Gen. xii. 10, while those who traveled from south to north went up, Gen. xlv. 25. The lands of the north denote Chaldaea, Assyria, Media, etc., Jer. i. 14; Ezek. xxvi. 7—not that they were precisely to the north of Palestine, but that the course in proceeding from those countries would be from north to south in order to enter Judea, instead of taking the straight direction across deserts.

century, when the most beautiful of all the forms of ecclesiastical architecture had begun to prevail. He found that the choir of the cathedral, as finished by Bishop Hotham, extended only three arches, and terminated by a circular apse; and in 1235 he removed the apse, added six splendid arches to the choir, thus lengthening it and finishing it as it now stands, leaving as his memorial one of the most perfect choirs to be found either

NOAH'S SACRIFICE.—See NOAH.

NORTH SIDE. In the English Prayer-Book a rubric requires the officiating minister to stand at the "north side" of the table in the early part of the communion service. In the United States, where all churches are not placed due east and west, the minister stands at the side which would be the north if the church were so placed.

century, when the most beautiful of all the forms of ecclesiastical architecture had begun to prevail. He found that the choir of the cathedral, as finished by Bishop Hotham, extended only three arches, and terminated by a circular apse; and in 1235 he removed the apse, added six splendid arches to the choir, thus lengthening it and finishing it as it now stands, leaving as his memorial one of the most perfect choirs to be found either

NORTON (nor'tun), JOHN, was born in 1606, at Stortford, in Hertfordshire, England, and was educated at Peterhouse College, Cambridge. A vigorous but unsuccessful effort was made to convert him to Popery. He displayed very brilliant powers at the university, and he was urged to accept a fellowship, and his uncle offered to present him to a Church benefice; but he declined both, and in 1634 he resolved to leave England for New England. The vessel in which he sailed from Yarmouth was driven back; but in October, 1635, he reached Plymouth harbor, and here he preached during the winter. In 1636 he removed to Boston, where he attracted great notice, especially in a discussion with a French friar. In 1638 he consented to settle at Ipswich, where he was joined by several families that emigrated from England. His learning was recognized by his brethren on two important occasions—one touching doctrine, when he aided in showing the errors of the Antinomians, and the other in answering questions on Church government which had been sent from Holland to ministers in England, and which they referred to their brethren in New England. The work which he prepared on the subject was in Latin, and it was the first Latin treatise ever written in this country. In 1645 he took a leading part in the synod which met at Cambridge to draw and curb various animals, as buffaloes and camels, Ezek. xxix. 4. Hence we find a metaphorical expression used to signify the subduing of an enemy, Isa. xxxvii. 29.

NOSE-JEWELS, literally "rings of the nose," are mentioned by the prophet Isaiah, ch. iii. 21, among the female ornaments which were esteemed marks of pride and luxury by the daughters of Judah, to be visited by the judgment of Heaven. They were essentially the same with those used for the ear.

NOTRE DAME (no'ter dahm) is the title of the most important of the great ecclesiastical edifices of Paris, in France. (See engravings on pages 150 and 151.) The words signify "Our Lady," and intimate that the church is dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Paris is celebrated for its churches, among the most prominent being St. Germain l'Auxerrois, St. Eustache, St. Roch, the Madelein, St. Vincent de Paul, St. Jean Baptiste, St. Sulpice, but over and beyond them all in the elements of dignity up the celebrated Platform of Church Discipline, and in 1652 he obeyed a request to prepare a work on "The Sufferings of Christ," in opposition to prevailing errors. John Cotton, when on his deathbed, pointed to him as a worthy successor to his pulpit; and so ardent were the desires of the people of Ipswich and of Boston to secure his services that he was on the point of returning to England to free himself from the difficulty in which he was placed, when a council determined that he should settle in Boston. He was sent to England along with Governor Bradstreet on the affairs of the colony, and there he died of apoplexy, in April, 1663. He was a fine scholar, an acute theologian, a laborious pastor and a voluminous author. In addition to the works published in his lifetime, he left behind him a "Body of Divinity" and other uncompleted writings, which are now preserved in the archives of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

NOSE. The Hebrews generally placed anger in the nose because of the hard breathing of an angry person, 2 Sam. xxii. 9. The idea is used as applied both to men and to the Deity. Further, hooks or rings were placed in the nostrils to secure and commanding appearance stands Notre Dame, which occupies a part of the Cité island of the river Seine. It was commenced in the twelfth and completed in the fourteenth century, and it takes rank with the great European cathedrals of the first class. Its dimensions are on a grand scale. It extends four hundred and sixteen feet in length, and at the transept it is one hundred and fifty-three feet wide. Like all French cathedrals, it is lofty, as the vaulting rises one hundred and nine feet from the floor. The western front is very imposing, stretching one hundred and thirty-six feet, and terminated by two imposing massive towers, which rise two hundred and seventeen feet, while the new spire rises to the altitude of two hundred and ninety-eight feet. The interior observes the usual cathedral form. It consists of a nave and choir, with four aisles and side chapels. The pillars of the nave support pointed arches, resting on decorated capitals. There are three magnificent rose windows, and they contain all the remains of the splendid stained glass which is coeval with the foundation of the cathedral. It is placed in an unfavorable position, and the exterior is disappointing in consequence of the manner in which at different times it has been changed and

The storm of the Revolution marred it greatly, and it was then turned into a "Temple of Reason." So far as architectural style is concerned, the most attractive part of the great edifice is decidedly the west façade, with its three deeply recessed entrances. The rose window is thirty-six feet in diameter, and the sculpture is good and abundant. It is intended to portray the last judgment.

There are several other churches in France and elsewhere which are called Notre Dame, as Notre Dame de Lorrette in Paris, Notre Dame de Bon Secours and Notre Dame de Toutes Joies in Nantes, Notre Dame at Chalons (page 726), Notre Dame, the great cathedral, in Chartres (pages 150 and 153), Notre Dame du Port at Clermont, a splendid specimen at Poitiers called Notre Dame la Grande; and very generally the title is applied to great ecclesiastical edifices which were dedicated to the Virgin Mary.

NOTT, ELIPHALET, LL.D., was born in 1773. He was brother to Samuel Nott, D.D., and like him he was a man of great worth and eminence. He was licensed to preach in 1795, and settled at Cherry Valley, where he ministered to the church, and presided over an academy. From 1799 to 1804 he was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Albany, and in 1804 he was made president of Union College. In 1854 the semi-centennial anniversary of his presidency was held, and above six hundred persons who had graduated under his administration assembled to do him honor. He died at Schenectady, in January, 1866.

NOTT, SAMUEL, D.D., was born in 1754, at Saybrook. In early life he had to encounter great difficulty, and after severe toil he accumulated so much as enabled him to advance himself in scholarship; and to increase his knowledge he began to act as a teacher. In 1776 he succeeded in entering Yale College, where he supported himself by ringing the bell and acting as a waiter at commons. The struggle of the Revolution told on him severely, and again he had recourse to teaching; but eventually he procured license to preach, and in 1781 he was invited to Norwich as a candidate, and he was ordained there in 1782. Dr. Sprague says: "In 1842 he preached his sixtieth year sermon, at which time there was not an individual living who was a legal voter at the time of his settlement in the parish." He continued preaching until 1849, in which year a colleague was associated with him in his charge. In 1850 he suffered so severely from an accident in which his dressing-gown was burned that he died. His publications were sermons preached on important occasions, which were published from year to year. Dr. Nott was one of those examples which testify to the value of long pastorates. He was a man of indomitable energy, as he not only educated himself, but by his tender affection and great labor he succeeded in educating his brother, Eliphalet Nott, D.D., who became president of Union College.

NOVATIAN (no-va'sh'an, or NOVATIANUS (no-va-she-a'nus), called also NOVATUS (no-va'tus), a celebrated heresiarch of the third century, founder of the sect named after him. He adopted the doctrine taught by the presbyter Novatus, that it was sinful to admit persons who had once lapsed to idolatry to communion—a practice then universal in the Church. This produced schism, in which Novatian had many partisans. He adopted a practice which was calculated to advance his cause by calling his followers "Cathari," or Puritans, because of their strictness. In 251 Novatian got himself elected bishop of Rome, in opposition to Cornelius, and he was ordained by some country bishops, but his election was soon annulled. His sect, after the Council of Nice, fell into disrepute in the Western empire, though it continued to prevail for a much longer period in the East. He must be distinguished from Novatus of Carthage. (See the next article.) He has been called the first antipope in consequence of the dispute which prevailed between him and his followers on the one side, and Cornelius and his supporters on the other side, being terminated in favor of Cornelius. He had become a presbyter of the Roman Church, in which he acquired fame by his uncommon learning and eloquence. A vacancy having occurred in the bishopric of Rome upon the death of Fabianus, which, owing to great dissensions, continued fourteen years, eventually a successor was chosen with the approbation of a great majority of the clergy and people of that Church. Several of the clergy and of the people dissenting, they chose Novatus bishop. After their ordinations, both Novatus and his rival sent letters and deputies to foreign bishops and churches, notifying their election, and Novatus found many supporters in various places. As, however, his rival was approved of as the legitimate possessor of the Roman see, Novatus is esteemed the first antipope. The council at Rome which condemned Novatus and his doctrines also degraded the bishops who had assisted at his ordination. With respect to the time and manner of his death, nothing can be affirmed with certainty.

NOVATUS (no-va'tus), a presbyter of the Church of Carthage in the third century. Saint Cyprian accuses him of perfidy, adulation, arrogance, extreme covetousness, and of pillaging the funds of the Church, as well as the property of widows and orphans. He maintained, in opposition to Cyprian, that such persons as fell from the faith through the fear of persecution ought to be restored to Church communion, without undergoing the long course of penitential discipline enjoined by the ecclesiastical canons. Upon the return of Cyprian to Carthage, whence he had fled on the breaking out of the Decian persecution, he procured the excommunication of Novatus and his adherents; but they, despising the sentence, formed a new sect.

NOVICE (nov'is), a newly-converted person. Such a one was not to be ordained to the ministry, 1 Tim. iii. 6. The precept is reasonable, and might well apply to all the churches which St. Paul had planted, the Epistle in which it occurs not being of very early date.

NOVICE, a person who is admitted into a religious community for the purpose of preparing to become a member, and the state of preparation is termed the "novitiate." Before it closes the novice may change his purpose and retire from the establishment.

NO WELL (no'el), ALEXANDER, an eminent divine, and the last surviving Father of the English Reformation, was born in the parish of Whalley, Lancashire, in 1507, and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he resided for thirteen years. He was licensed as a preacher in 1550. In 1551 he held an interesting conference with Redmayne, master of Trinity College, Cambridge, then on his deathbed, respecting the principal articles which separated the English from the Romish Church. In that year, also, he succeeded Redmayne as one of the prebendaries of Westminster. In 1553 he found it necessary to join his countrymen who were exiles in Germany from the popish persecution of Queen Mary's reign. On the accession of Elizabeth, Nowell returned to England, and was appointed one of the commissioners for visiting the various dioceses, in order to introduce such regulations as might establish the Reformation. In 1560 he was made dean of St. Paul's, and collated to the prebend of Willand, in the same church. When the memorable convocation in which the Articles of Religion were revised and subscribed met, in 1563, Nowell was appointed prolocutor of the lower house, and he took a conspicuous part in the discussions of that body. In 1572 he completed the endowment at one and the same time of a free school at Middleton, in Lancashire, and of thirteen scholarships in Brasenose College; and in the following year he was elected principal of that institution. He died February 13, 1602.

who was born in 1798, at Newburyport, became a tutor in Harvard University. He was licensed to preach in 1822, and became pastor at Brookfield, Massachusetts, whence he removed to Petersham. In 1840 he was made Hancock professor of Hebrew and Oriental languages, and also Dexter lecturer in Biblical literature, in Harvard University, which offices he held until 1868. He was a voluminous writer, producing translations of the book of Job, the Psalms, the Prophets, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Canticles. He wrote frequently for theological journals, and he prepared an excellent Hebrew Reader, which is justly esteemed. He died at Cambridge, in 1868, greatly regretted.

NOYES, JAMES, was born at Chaldrington, Wiltshire, England, in 1608. He was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. Under the ministry of his cousin Mr. Parker and the celebrated Dr. Twisse he was brought to the knowledge of the truth; and thinking himself unable to enter the Established Church, he emigrated and came, with Mr. Parker and a younger brother, Nicholas Noyes, to New England. He differed in many points from his brethren, inasmuch as he would have admitted a moderate episcopacy. He held that a profession of faith and repentance, with submission to Church ordinances, was sufficient to admit to Church-fellowship, and that the children of baptized persons might be baptized without any covenant on the part of the parents; and he believed that the Sabbath began on Saturday evening. He died in 1656, having been minister of Newbury for more than twenty years.

NUBIA (nu'be-ah) is the name given, in a more or less restricted sense, to the countries on and around the valley of the Nile south of Egypt as far as Abyssinia, and the hilly regions which are occupied by the dark-skinned descendants of the early settlers of Africa. The name, as now used, is not to be found in ancient geography. The Ethiopia of Greek and Roman writers began immediately above Egypt, and the Nubæ, or Nubatæ, of Strabo and Ptolemy were evidently the natives of Kordofan. The name appears to have originated in Egypt, where the word nûb, or nób, which signifies gold, was applied to those countries whence the precious metal was derived. The Romans, under Diocletian, deserted this part of Africa, and in the sixth century Christianity spread through the population. In the next century the Arab conquerors of Egypt found a nation on the Nile to the south of Egypt called Nubah, and the modern form of the name has been extended, without regard to race or government, to all the states on the river which have any form of Christianity, including Nubia proper, or the valley of the Nile; the ancient Meroe, which may be considered as extending along the Nile from Dongola to the confluence of the Blue and White rivers; and Sennaar, which lies still farther south. Nubia is celebrated for the numerous and extensive remains which indicate the ancient civilization of the country. They are chiefly north of Dongola, and many of these are displayed in this work. The inhabitants, who are called Beráber, or Berbers, in Egypt, are a handsome people, of dark brown complexion, cheerful, bold, frank and free from the corruption of the tribes that lie to the north and the south of their country.

NUMBER (num'ber). In expressing numbers the Hebrews used, at all events in later times, the letters of the alphabet. Hence the facility of errors of transcription, different letters having a near resemblance. Certain numbers frequently occur as indicating perfection. See SEVEN. Multiples of these are also used, in the way in which we use "round numbers." Thus, in enumerations we often find only multiples of ten or a hundred.

NUMBERING. See POPULATION.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF. See PENTATEUCH.

NUMENIUS (nu-me'ne-us), 1 Macc. xii. 16, 17, a person sent on embassy in the Maccabæan times to Rome and Sparta.

NUN, an Ephraimite, the son of Elishama, prince of Ephraim in the wilderness, and father of Joshua, Ex. xxxiii. 11. He is also called Non, 1 Chr. vii. 27.

NUNC DIMITTIS (nunk de-mit'tis), two Latin words in the Latin form of the Song of Simeon, Luke ii. 29, which in the English Prayer-Book is appointed a part of the evening service. In its stead the American service-book designates a part of the one hundred and third Psalm.

NUNCIO (nun'se-o), the title given to an envoy sent by the pope to any sovereign to settle ecclesiastical affairs. Previous to the Council of Trent, nuncios acted as judges in matters which came under their jurisdiction, but since then questions come before them only on appeal from the decision of bishops in all places which recognize the decretals of the Council of Trent.

NUNS, female devotees who, like monks, devote themselves to a life of seclusion or residence in a community. They make a vow of chastity and bind themselves to observe the rules of their order.

NUNCUPATIVE (nun-ku'pa-tiv) WILL, an oral or word of mouth testament declared before witnesses by a dying person and afterward reduced to writing. In Great Britain such wills are declared to be illegal except in the case of soldiers in actual service and mariners at sea.

NUREMBERG (nu'rem-berg), DIET OF. In 1523 the first diet of Nuremberg was held, where the nuncio of Adrian VI. demanded the execution of the bull of Leo X. and the edict of Charles V. against Luther. Instead of yielding to the nuncio, a list of grievances was drawn, in which one hundred points were set forth on which reform was demanded, and the authority of the pope on several points was assailed. The second diet of Nuremberg was held in 1524, and it was decreed that, with the consent of the emperor, the pope should convene a council in Germany, and to prepare for it an assembly should first be held at Spire. This, Charles emphatically prohibited, and enjoined that the edict of Worms should be strictly observed.

NURSE. The Hebrew term for this is used both in the masculine and feminine, and denotes any one who sustains and nourishes another. Moses applied it to himself in relation to Israel, though only to express his inability to fulfill what it required, or his sense of oppression under the responsibility involved in it, Num. xi. 12. But more commonly it is applied to women, and much, apparently, in the same manner, and with the same regard, that is usual among ourselves. The nurse, especially in patriarchal times, appears to have been treated with great kindness and respect, Gen. xxiv. 59.

NUT. The "nuts" of Gen. xliii. 11 are Pistachio nuts. The Pistachio tree is frequently found in Palestine and Syria. It thrives best in a dry and rocky soil, but it is of slow growth. It attains a height of twelve to twenty, sometimes thirty, feet. The stem is not thick, but the branches are numerous and much divided. It is in full bloom in April, and the blossoms are whitish and in clusters. The shell of the nut is odoriferous. These nuts are a favorite fruit in the East; they have a spicy taste, and are eaten either dry or preserved. It has been imagined that the kernel strengthened the stomach, and was a specific against the bite of serpents. In India the seeds are eaten with sweetmeats or fried with pepper and salt. Another word is translated "nuts" in Song Sol. vi. 11. Possibly walnuts may be there intended.

NYE (ni), PHILIP, an eminent English non-conformist divine of the Commonwealth, was born in Sussex, about 1596. He graduated at Oxford, entered the Church, and after officiating three years in a London parish, he had to flee into Holland to escape persecution. Returning in 1640, he was presented to the living of Kimbolton, in Huntingdonshire. He actively promoted the taking of the Solemn League and Covenant, sat in the Assembly of Divines and officiated in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on occasion of the taking of the covenant by the two houses of Parliament and the Assembly. For his services he was presented to the rectory of Acton, near London. Nye took part in various other political affairs, was named one of the "tryers" for examining ministers, and was one of the leaders in the assembly of Congregational churches at the Savoy, in 1658. Deprived of his living after the Restoration, he spent the rest of his life in retirement. He was the author of numerous works, mostly of temporary interest. He died at London, in 1672.

NYMPHAS (nim'fas), a Christian, it would seem at Laodicea, who had a church in his house and whom St. Paul saluted, Col. iv. 15.

NYMPHS, female beings in Grecian mythology partaking of the nature of gods and men. They peopled all the regions of the earth and water, and were called after the places of their abode. Thus, the Naiades lived in the streams, the Oreiades the mountains, the Hamadryades the trees, and the Dryades the woods, to each of which they were confined. They lived and died in them. They were very beautiful, and they attended the higher divinities, especially Diana, and they were also the muses of many of the gods, as Jupiter and Pan.

OAK, a well-known tree of which there are a vast number of species. The oak is frequently mentioned in Scripture, but it is not easy to decide which species in the various places is meant. There are several Hebrew words used, él, élah, élon, élah, allah, allón, all implying the idea of strength. In our version the meanings "oak," "teal tree," Isa. vi. 13, "elm," Hos. iv. 13, are given, and one of the words, élon, is constantly but incorrectly ren-

tered "plain"—e. g., Gen. xii. 6. It has been imagined that some of the terms designate the terebinth and others the oak, but then critics are not agreed which terms should describe the one and which the other. And it is very doubtful whether the terebinth is ever really referred to.

Dr. Thomson argues strongly for the oak. "The Hebrew writers," he says, "seem to use these names (élah and allón) indiscriminately for the same tree, or for different varieties of it (one probably deciduous, the second evergreen), and that was the oak. For example, the tree in which Absalom was caught . . . was the élah, not the allón, and yet I am persuaded it was an oak. . . . There are thousands of such trees still in the same country, admirably suited to catch long-haired rebels, but no terebinths. . . . I do not believe that Abraham's celebrated tree at Hebron was a terebinth, as many now affirm without qualification. It is now a very venerable oak, and I saw no terebinth in the neighborhood." Elsewhere the same writer remarks that the so-called Abraham's tree cannot be more than one thousand years old. He concludes, "Until we have more light on this particular matter, and more decisive, let us continue to read out bravely the good old word oak, and never fear the smile of over-wise critics."

OAK, COUNCIL OF THE, the title of a council of thirty-six bishops held near Chalcedon A. D. 403, at which the enemies of Chrysostom succeeded in deposing and banishing him. He was soon recalled, as the injustice of the procedure was recognized.

OAKES (ôks), URIAN, was born in England, in 1631. He was educated at Harvard, and returned to his native land, where he settled as pastor of Titchfield, in Hampshire. In 1668 a messenger was sent to England in order to induce him to become pastor of the church at Cambridge.

He yielded to the request, and in 1675 was placed at the head of the college. In 1680 he was induced to devote himself exclusively to the affairs of the college, and he was formally inducted as president. By his contemporaries he was esteemed as a man of undoubted piety and of wide erudition. In Latin he especially excelled, and his literary remains justify this estimate of his attainments. He died in 1681.

OATES (ôts), TITUS, the contriver of the popish plot, born about 1619, was the son of an Anabaptist preacher, received his education at Cambridge, and afterward entered into holy orders. In 1677 he pretended to be a convert to the Roman Catholic religion, but subsequently declared himself a Protestant, and gave information of a pretended popish plot for the overthrow of the Protestant faith, falsely accused several Catholic lords and other persons of quality of being concerned in it, and having excited a popular ferment, brought several innocent men to the scaffold. On the accession of James II. he was thrown into prison and indicted for perjury, and being convicted, was sentenced to stand in the pillory five times a year during his life, and to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate, and thence to Tyburn. Though the whipping was very severely inflicted, he recovered from its effects; and in the reign of William III. this execrable tool of faction obtained his liberty and a pension. He died in 1705.

OATH, a solemn appeal to the Deity or some superior being in token of the good faith of him who declares or promises anything. We find oaths taken in patriarchal times, Gen. xiv. 22, 23, regulated by the Mosaic law, forbidden when unnecessary in the New Testament, but used by God himself to seal his promise as most trustworthy, and thereby to end all disputation, Gen. xxii. 16-18; Heb. vi. 13-18.

Oaths were usual on occasion of contracts, covenants, agreements or stipulations, Gen. xxiv. 2, 8, 9; in making vows, Lev. v. 4; as confirming promises, 2 Ki. xxv. 24; and in denouncing imprecations, 1 Sam. xiv. 24, 26-28. These were voluntary; as also were those more common asseverations when God was called to witness the firm purpose of him that expressed it, Ruth i. 17. But sometimes oaths were exacted, as by a sovereign from his subjects, or by a superior from a vassal, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 13; akin to which were the oaths laid upon a people to obey the laws of God or of the land, Ezra x. 5. Of the same nature were judicial oaths, persons on trial being obliged to clear themselves by oath, Ex. xxii. 10, 11. Witnesses, too, were probably put on oath, Lev. v. 1.

Certain ceremonies were frequently used in taking an oath in order to increase the solemnity of it. Such were the lifting of the hand, Gen. xiv. 22; Rev. x. 5, 6, analogous to which was the laying of witnesses' hands on a criminal's head, Lev.

xxiv. 14, and the placing of the hand under the thigh of another who required the oath, Gen. xxiv. 2, 3, 9; the passing between the pieces of a divided victim, Jer. xxxiv. 18. Oaths, too, were sometimes taken before the sacred altar, 1 Ki. viii. 31.

Perjury and the non-fulfillment of an oath were regarded as great crimes. According to the law, he who had given false witness was to suffer the same penalties to which his injustice had exposed the man against whom he testified, Deut. xix. 16-21. Even if any one had sworn to his own detriment, he must perform his oath, Ps. xv. 4. This could not, however, be held to justify a sin. Herod was not excused by his rash oath for the Baptist's murder, Matt. xiv. 9.

We find in the New Testament prohibitions against swearing, Matt. v. 34-37; James v. 12. It cannot be supposed that it was intended by these to censure every kind of oath. For our Lord himself made solemn asseverations equivalent to an oath, and St. Paul repeatedly calls God to witness the truth of what he was saying. The intention was, to show that the proper state of Christians is to require no oaths; that, when evil is expelled from among them, every yea and nay will be as decisive as an oath, every promise as binding as a vow.

OATH EX-OFFICIO, an oath whereby any person may be obliged to make any presentment of any crime or offence, or to confess or accuse himself or herself of any criminal matter or thing whereby he or she may be liable to any censure, penalty or punishment.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE, an oath taken by public officers and ministers of the Church established in Great Britain, whereby they swear to be faithful and loyal to the reigning sovereign.

OATH OF SUPREMACY, an oath taken by ministers of the Established Church in England, whereby they swear to bear true allegiance to the reigning sovereign, and in which they declare their belief that the pope of Rome has no supremacy in temporal and ecclesiastical affairs in England. By the Act of 10 G. 4, c. 7, s. 10, Roman Catholics are qualified for offices on taking a declaration which is substituted for former oaths.

OBADIAH (o-ba-di'ah), the name of several persons mentioned in Scripture, none of whom

The jealousy which had existed between Esau and Jacob was perpetuated among their posterity. The Edomites refused the Israelites a passage through their territory, Num. xx. 14-21. They also joined zealously in the great confederacies formed against David, until they were for a time completely subdued by him, 2 Sam. viii. 14. They were among the first to revolt in the latter days of Solomon; but though they made many attempts to regain their independence, they did not succeed till the time of Jehoram, 2 Chr. xxi. 10. From that period they were among the bitterest of Israel's enemies, and when the whole race of Jacob was humbled triumphing maliciously in its fall, Ps. cxxxvii. 7. So bitter and persevering was their hostility that they are often introduced by the prophets as representing the earthly powers that oppose God and his kingdom, Isa. xxxiv., lxiii.; Ezek. xxxv.

Such aggravated and obstinate wickedness could not pass unpunished, and Obadiah was commanded to announce to the Edomites their ruin, and to give as the reason for it not only their pride and presumptuous confidence in their own strength and wisdom, but chiefly their bitter enmity to the people of God.

But the chosen race themselves had just been carried into captivity, the Holy Land was deserted, and the chastisement denounced against the Edomites might therefore appear not to differ from that which had already been inflicted upon the seed of Jacob. The prophet, however, goes on to declare that Edom shall be as though it had never been and shall be swallowed up for ever, while Israel shall rise again from her present fall, shall repossess not only her own land, but also Phillistia and Edom, and shall finally rejoice in the holy reign of the promised Messiah.

OBAL (o'bal), a son of Joktan, or a tribe of the Joktanite Arabs, Gen. x. 28. Nothing is certainly known of their place and history, as the name only is given in the text.

OB DIA (ob-di'a), 1 Esd. v. 38, a corrupted form of Habaiah, Ezra ii. 61.

OBED (o'bed), son of Boaz and Ruth, and father of Jesse the father of David, according to the apparently incomplete genealogical list, Ruth iv. 17; 1 Chr. ii. 12. The name occurs in the genealogies of Matthew, Matt. i. 5, and Luke, Luke iii. 32. Other persons of this name are mentioned, 1 Chr. ii. 37, 38; xi. 47; xxvi. 7; 2 Chr. xxiii. 1.

OBED-EDOM, a Levite in whose premises and under whose care the ark was deposited when the death of Uzzah caused David to apprehend danger in taking it farther. It remained here three months, during which the family of Obed-edom so signally prospered that the king was encouraged to resume his first intention, which he then happily carried into effect, 2 Sam. vi. 10-12. The family of Obed-edom remained in the service of the temple, and are found as guardians of its treasures in the reign of Amaziah, 2 Chr. xxv. 24.

OBEDIENCE (o-be'd'ens), compliance with the requirements of law. Even inanimate things and irrational creatures may be said to pay obedience when they fulfill the purpose for which they were created, and are subservient to divine authority, Ps. cxlviii. 6-8; Matt. viii. 27; James iii. 3, 4. But this is not the moral obedience which reasonable beings are to render to those who have the just control of them. The pure angels do exactly God's commandments, Ps. ciii. 20; and men ought to show an equal obedience, as their paramount duty, to their Creator, 1 Sam. xv. 22. Our blessed Lord, having become man, paid obedience to the law of God which was laid on man. Christ's obedience was perfect; he entirely fulfilled his Father's commandments, becoming "obedient unto death," Phil. ii. 8, his death being, so to speak, the acme of his willing compliance and entire performance of the work given him to do. It is this, the fulfillment of the law in his life, which, together with the endurance of its penalty in his death, completes that work, for the virtue of which those who believe in him are saved, Rom. v. 12-19.

OBELISK (ob'e-lisk), the name of a lofty quadrangular, monolithic column, "diminishing upward, with the sides gently inclined, but not so as to terminate in an apex at the top." Egypt was the land of obelisks, and they are among the oldest of their monuments. No reliable information has been reached as to their original use; that they were raised in honor of the sun, that they were intended for sundials and for other uses, have all been asserted. Usually they were adorned with hieroglyphics, and inscriptions on them recorded matters of public import. The two largest were erected by Sesostris, in Heliopolis, measuring one hundred and eighty feet in height. Augustus removed them to Rome. The Lateran obelisk in Rome is one hundred and five feet high, and that in the piazza of St. Peter's is one hundred and thirty-two feet high. In 1833 the obelisk of Luxor was removed to Paris. (See engravings on pages 142 and 143). Another celebrated one, known as Cleopatra's Needle, is still standing, and, exclusive of the base, it is sixty-three feet high.

OBERLIN (ob'er-lin), JOHANN FRIEDRICH, an eminent Lutheran divine, was born at Strasburg, in 1740. In 1767 he succeeded to the pastorate of Ban de la Roche, in the north-east of France. He was known as a zealous clergyman and a warm advocate of education. He founded the first infant schools, and was the first correspondent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He also took a considerable interest in agriculture, and in 1818 received the gold medal from the Royal Agricultural Society of Paris. He died in 1826.

OBIL (o'bil), an Ishmaelite who had charge of David's camels, 1 Chr. xxvii. 30.

OBLATES (ob'lates), OBLATI (ob-la'te), In ecclesiastical language the term "oblate" signifies—1. A person who, on embracing the monastic state, has made a donation of all his goods to the community. 2. One dedicated to a religious order by his parents from an early period of his life. 3. A layman residing as an inmate in a regular community to which he had assigned his property, either in perpetuity or during the period of his residence. 4. A layman who had made donation, not only of his property, but of his person, to a monastic community. In France the king anciently possessed the privilege of recommending as "oblats" a number of invalided soldiers to monasteries, where they were maintained. The Oblates of Mary Immaculate is the name of missionary priests founded, in 1815, at Aix, by M. Mazenod, the bishop of Marseilles. St. Francis of Rome founded an order of female oblates, who are called "Collatines."

OBLATION (ob-la'shun). There is an ecclesiastical usage of the word which requires notice. 1. In the Romish Church the "greater oblation" is the offering to God the Father of the body and blood of our Lord in the mass. 2. The lesser oblation in Romish usage means the offering to God of the unconsecrated elements and of the alms at the eucharist. 3. Oblation of boys is their dedication by their parents to a monastery in order that their capacity for a monastic life may be tested. 4. Oblation, Prayer of, the prayer in the mass at the offering of the elements, and at the offering of the sacrifice, as it is called, to the eternal Father. See OFFERINGS.

OBLIGATION (ob-li-ga'shun), DAYS OF, the name given in Romish usage to those days on which the faithful are bound to attend mass. They are—all Sundays in the year, Christmas, the Circumcision, the Epiphany, the Ascension and All Saints' Day, and to these have been added the festivals of St. Peter and St. Paul, the Assumption and Corpus Christi day. Feasts of obligation are the feasts connected with these occasions.

OBOOKIAH (o-boo-ki'ah), HENRY, deserves a place in this work. He was born in 1792, in Hawaii, where he came under the influence of Christian teaching from the American missionaries. So much did he commend himself by his talents and piety to those who had him under their care that in 1809 he was brought to New Haven and educated for the ministry. He began the great work of rendering the Bible into his native dialect; but when he had finished the book of Genesis, his labors closed, at Cornwall, Connecticut, in the year 1818. A memoir of his life was published in the same year.

OBOOTH (o'both), one of the stations of the Israelites, to the east of Edom, not very far from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, Num. xxi. 10, 11.

OBSEQUIES (ob'se-kweez), the different ceremonies which are observed in different countries and ages at the interment of the dead.

OBSERVANTINES (ob-serv'ant-eenz). In France and Belgium this branch of the Franciscan order is called Recollets, in distinction from the Conventuals. They were founded in 1250, modified in 1316, and in 1414 by St. Bernardine of Siena. Their habit is a reddish-brown cassock of coarse cloth, a narrow hood, a girdle of cord, a short cloak and wooden shoes, from which they are called Sabotiers.

OCCAM, or OCKHAM (ok'am), WILLIAM, an English philosopher of the order of the Franciscans, in the fourteenth century. He was a pupil of Duns Scotus, whose views, however, he opposed, and he became the head of the so-called Nominalists, denying that ideas had any existence than what they possess in the understanding by which they are contemplated. He held further that God is known by his attributes, wisdom, goodness, power, etc., for there can be no immediate perception of God. In Paris he taught theology, attaining the highest reputation as a scholar, for he was dignified by the title of the Invincible Doctor by the pope, while by others he was admirably called the Venerable Preceptor, the Singular Doctor, and even the Unparalleled

Doctor. When he rendered himself noted by opposing the assumption of temporal power by the papacy, and incurring the hostility of Boniface VIII. and John XXII., the latter of whom excommunicated him, he was protected by the king of France and by the emperor of Germany. He gave a decided blow to the power of the papacy, for he questioned the infallibility of the pope in judging even of doctrinal matters, and he was unwilling even to accept a general council as an ultimate court of appeal, while he very earnestly contended that the distinction between civil authority as vested in the hands of the civil magistrate, and spiritual things in the hands of spiritual officers, would keep them to their respective jurisdictions, and so rebuke the assumptions of the pope to rule over king and temporal magistrates. He was the only schoolman whom Luther studied or kept in his library. The greatest of his works is the "Summa totius Logice."

OCCIDENTALS (ok-se-den'talz), a name given to the Christian Church in Western nations to distinguish it from the Greek and other Eastern branches of Christianity.

OCCUM (ok'um), SAMPSON, who was ordained as an Indian preacher, was born at Mohegan, near Norwich, Connecticut, in 1723. In his youth Mr. Jewett, of New London, was accustomed to preach to his tribe, and in 1739 and 1740 several ministers labored at Mohegan with success. No sooner was his mind affected than he desired to become a teacher, and he began to learn to read. In the Indian school of Mr. Wheelock he made progress, and in 1766 Mr. Wheelock had him sent to England, where he attracted great notice and procured large donations, which enabled the Indian school to be removed to Hanover, New Hampshire, and to be connected with Dartmouth College. He began to preach among the Indians at Brotherton, near Utica, and he ministered very earnestly among the Indians of Connecticut, Long Island and Rhode Island, closing an earnest, active life in 1792, aged sixty-nine years. He left a sermon behind him which he had preached at New Haven, in 1772, at the execution of an Indian.

OCHINO (o-ke'no), BERNARDINO, a celebrated Italian Reformer, was born in 1487. His earnest devotion as a monk and extraordinary power as a preacher made him one of the most marked men of the Roman Church, and in 1538 he was elected general of his order. He had, however, already begun to doubt the purity of his creed in relation to Christian truth, and he undertook in his preaching to unfold doctrines which were akin to those of the Reformers. Persecution followed immediately. In 1541 he preached in Venice, and hardly escaped the interference of the Inquisition. He resolved, therefore, to go to Geneva. There he was hospitably received by Calvin, who expressed his gladness for such an acquisition to Melancthon. Ochino, however, had too much of the skeptical tendency in his mind to please the Reformers. The freedom of his opinions and his controversial asperity soon put him in opposition to the leaders of the Protestant churches in Switzerland and Germany. After having been successively pastor of the Italian exiles at Geneva and at Augsburg, he joined Peter Martyr at Strasburg, and went with him to England, where he resided as an Italian pastor in London till the accession of Mary. He subsequently returned to Switzerland, and was appointed at Zurich minister of an Italian congregation of exiles from the Ticino. At this period of his life he adopted some of the views of the Socini, and gave offence by the publication of some dialogues in which he maintained the doctrine of polygamy. Beza, Bellingier and other leading Reformers rose against him. He was compelled to leave Zurich, took a temporary refuge in Poland, then in Moravia, where he ended his days in sorrow and in poverty, in 1565.

OCCIDELUS (o-si-de'lus), 1 Esd. ix. 22, a strangely-corrupted form of Jozabad, Ezra x. 22.

OCCINA (o-se'na), Judith ii. 28, probably Accho.

OCCRAN (ok'ran), the father of Pagiel, prince of Asher, Num. i. 13.

OCTAPLA (ok'ta-pla), the Septuagint arranged in eight columns by Origen in the third century, containing the Hebrew text and various Greek versions of it.

OCTATEUCH (ok'ta-teuk), the first eight books of the Old Testament. The word is derived from two Greek terms which signify eight bindings or eight rolls connected together.

OCTAVE (ok'tav), eight days after a feast, the eighth day being termed the octave day. All the great movable feasts of the Church have octaves, as also certain fixed ones.

ODED (o'ded). 1. The father of the prophet Azariah in Asa's reign, 2 Chr. xv. 1-8. 2. A prophet in Samaria in Pekah's reign, 2 Chr. xxviii. 9-11.

ODENATUS. See TADMOR and ZENOBIA.

ODIANS (o'de-anz), AUDIANS (au'de-anz). About the time of the Council of Nice, Audius (or Audæus) formed a sect. He was a reputation which the monastery of Clugny acquired by his discipline, doctrine and sanctity of manners rendered it the most celebrated in France, and induced the most exalted personages to cultivate the acquaintance of this abbot. He was the founder of the annual service of the Church of Rome in commemoration of the dead. He died in 1048.

ODO (o'do), the name of two noted prelates who are associated with the ecclesiastical history of England.

1. Archbishop of Canterbury in the tenth century, was the son of a Danish chieftain who took part in the invasion of England in 870. Converted to Christianity, he was adopted as son by an Anglo-Saxon noble, who had him well educated and induced him to enter the Church. Odo was made bishop of Ramsbury in 926, and was selected by Dunstan, then minister to King Edmund, to be archbishop of Canterbury, in 942. Odo made great improvements in the cathedral, and set himself to effect three measures of reform—the separation of the clergy from their wives, the expulsion of the secular clergy from the cathedrals and the introduction of the Benedictine rule into the monasteries. In carrying them out he showed himself the soldier and barbarian to the last. The climax of his cruelty was reached when, in 955, shortly after the coronation of Edwy, he divorced the young king and Elgiva, and had the queen forcibly carried off and branded in the face with hot irons. He died June, 958, and was buried at Canterbury.

2. Bishop of Bayeux and earl of Kent, was born in Normandy about 1032. He was the brother of William the Conqueror, and was named by him bishop of Bayeux in 1049. He took a very active part in the preparations for the expedition to England in 1066, blessed the troops on the morning of the battle of Hastings and took part in the battle. He was rewarded with a grant of the town of Dover, and on William's return to Normandy Odo was charged with the government of England, William Fitz-Osborn being associated with him. Odo amassed immense riches, and had a large share of power during the greater part of William's reign; but not satisfied with his almost royal power and wealth, and irritated by the appointment of Lanfranc to the see of Canterbury, he cherished the hope of getting by craft, money or power the papal chair. He had a palace built at Rome, sent his agents there with rich presents for bribes, and resolved to go himself, attended by several powerful barons. The king, however, heard of the project, and ordered the arrest of Odo. He was deprived of his dignities and estates, and kept a prisoner at Rouen till William's death, in 1087. Odo assisted at several councils, and in 1096 set out for the Holy Land, but died at Palermo early in the following year. The famous Bayeux tapestry was given to the cathedral by Odo.

ODOCEUS (o-do'se-us) is the name of an ancient bishop of Llandaff Cathedral who was celebrated in his day for his great sanctity. Dubritius, the first bishop, died A. D. 522, and his successor, Eliud, was famed for his piety. According to Usher, Odoceus followed Eliud, and was consecrated in A. D. 604. During his time several synods were held in Llandaff; and owing to the great esteem in which Odoceus was held, he was made president at least of one of these assemblies. The piety of these early bishops led to the bestowal on Llandaff of great amounts of property, which would have sufficed to endow many churches, but recklessness and unfaithfulness have made sad havoc in these endowments.

ECOLAMPADIUS (e-ko-lam-pa'de-us), JOHANNES, vernacularly HEUSSGEN (heus'-gen), a learned German Reformer, was born at Weinsberg, in Wirtemberg, in 1482. He went to the university of Bologna to study law; but his inclinations not favoring legal studies, he removed to Heidelberg, where he studied theology and the humanities. He afterward pursued other studies at Tübingen and Stuttgart, and then returned to his native town and entered on clerical duties there. Not long after he was invited to Bâle, and there he assisted Erasmus in preparing his edition of the Greek New Testament. He left Bâle in 1518 and became preacher at Augsburg. Whilst there he surprised his friends by becoming a monk in April, 1520; but as his leanings were strongly toward the Reformation party, it was not long before he found his position in the cloister uncongenial and regretted the step he had taken. In February, 1522, he made his escape from the bonds under which he had brought himself, and after residing for some time at Heidelberg and other places, he returned to Bâle, October, 1522. Here the rest of his life was spent. Having been appointed a teacher in the university, he set himself to expound the prophecies of Isaiah, and his efforts in this direction were so successful that not only multitudes of students crowded to his prelections, but many of the clergy and citizens were found amongst his hearers. Having now openly joined the Reformers, he, in 1525, became pastor of one of the churches in Bâle, and this gave him the opportunity of carrying forward the work of the Reformation by abolishing the Romish ceremonies in his church and instructing the people in the doctrines of the gospel. He died November 24, 1531.

His contributions to Biblical literature are numerous. Besides editing and translating Theophy-

Syrian of Mesopotamia. He became a censor of church morality and reproved all the clergy whom he found living luxuriously. He soon became the subject of personal violence, and he separated himself from the Church, and his followers adopted a monastic life. He held to the tenets of Anthropomorphism and Quartodecimanism, the first being the views of those who believed that the Almighty has a material body of human shape, and the second being the belief of those who celebrated Easter on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, whatever day of the week that happened to be, whereas the Councils of Nice and Antioch ordered Easter to be kept on the first Sunday after the full moon, which was observed by the churches of the West of Palestine, Jerusalem and Cæsarea, but the churches of Asia Minor followed the Jewish rule.

ODILO (o-de'lo), a saint in the Roman calendar and an illustrious abbot of Clugny, in Burgundy, was born in Auvergne, in 962. The lact on the Gospels, the Homilies of Chrysostom and other patristic writings, he issued commentaries on Genesis, Job, Psalms, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, most of the minor prophets, Matthew, John and the Epistle to the Hebrews.

ECUMENICAL (e'keu-men'i-kal), that which concerns the whole Church. The title ecumenical bishop is assumed by the popes, but was first taken by John the Faster, the patriarch of Constantinople, in the sixth century, and Cyril his successor also claimed the title.

An ecumenical council is an assembly of the hierarchy of the whole Church, called by lawful authority, with freedom of speech and voting to decide on matters of faith and practice. The value of a general council has been a subject of much discussion in the Church of Rome, some holding that a council is above the pope, and others holding that the decree of a council requires the confirmation of a pope before it can be received as infallible. Among Protestants the authority of councils has been admitted when their decisions do not contradict Scripture, and importance is attached to the decisions of the first four councils, viz., of Nice, Constantinople I, Ephesus and Chalcedon, but they hold that a council to be general should include and represent the laity as well as the clergy of the Church.

Touching the infallibility of councils they ask—

1. Where is the proof that infallibility has been vested by the Head of the Church in a council?
2. If this were proved, where is the infallible rule to indicate how a council should be called, and who the constituent members should be?
3. How can it be shown that infallibility resides in a bare majority, rather than in the minority, when a difference exists?
4. If the decision of a council be right, then the confirmation of a pope does not make it right; and if the decree of a council be wrong, the approval of a pope cannot make it right; and if the pope by his own authority has a right to set aside the deliverance of a council, then the infallibility rests not in the council, but in a single man who for the time being is pope.

It has been well observed by Jortin that councils "were a collection of men who were frail and fallible. Some of these councils were not assemblies of pious and learned divines, but cabals, the majority of which were quarrelsome, fanatical, domineering, dishonest prelates who wanted to compel men to approve all their opinions, of which they themselves had no clear conceptions, and to anathematize and oppress those who would not implicitly submit to their determinations."

The Greek and Roman Churches agree on seven councils, and to these the Romish Church adds twelve, making the number nineteen, and to these must be added the late council at Rome, under Pius IX., which has proclaimed the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope. The synod of the apostles, Acts xv., held at Jerusalem, determined by the action of inspired men the questions which were brought before that assembly. Then at various intervals followed the councils which in history have been described as general.

1. The Council of Nice, A. D. 325, in which the views of Arius were condemned.
2. The first Council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, in which the doctrine of the Church on the Holy Ghost was discussed.
3. The first Council of Ephesus, in which Nestorianism was condemned.

Eutychians and the Monophysites were condemned. 5. The second Council of Constantinople, A. D. 553, when Origen, Arius, Macedonius and others were condemned. 6. The third Council of Constantinople, A. D. 681, when the Monothelite heresy was condemned. 7. The second Council of Nice, A. D. 787, held to establish the worship of images. 8. The fourth Constantinople, A. D. 869, when Photius was removed from the see of that city and Ignatius, its former occupant, was restored. 9. The first Lateran Council at Rome, A. D. 1123, to settle the Investiture. 10. The second Lateran Council, A. D. 1139, when the views of Arnold of Brescia and others were condemned. 11. The third Lateran Council, A. D. 1179, when the Albigenes and the Waldenses were condemned. 12. The fourth Lateran Council, A. D. 1215, when the dogma of transubstantiation was asserted and ratified. 13. The Synod of Lyon, A. D. 1245, to promote the Crusades. 14. The second Synod of Lyon, A. D. 1274, to promote supreme universal jurisdiction and infallible teaching of the pope. On July 13, 1870, four hundred and fifty-one voted "placet," and eighty-eight voted "non placet," sixty-eight votes were conditional, while ninety-one members abstained from voting at all. The minority bishops handed in a protest and left Rome before July 18th, when the final vote, as a matter of course, was all but unanimous.

National councils are assembled to determine affairs connected with national churches, and provincial councils attend to matters which are considered worthy of adjudication by a section of the Church especially concerned in their settlement.

The Church of England speaks with respect of "those six councils which were allowed and received of all men," viz., Nice, A. D. 325; Constantinople, A. D. 381, A. D. 553, A. D. 680; Ephesus, A. D. 431; and Chalcedon, A. D. 451; and in article xxi. it is declared that general councils may not be gathered together without the command-

- the union of the Greek and Latin Churches. 15. The Synod of Vienna, in Gaul, A. D. 1311, to suppress the Knights Templars. 16. The Council of Constance, A. D. 1414, which continued for four years, declared the authority of an ecumenical council to be superior to the pope, and condemned the views of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, who were both burned. 17. The Council of Basle, A. D. 1430. It continued nearly ten years, aiming at reforming the discipline, and even on some points changing the constitution, of the Romish Church. It was formally dissolved by the pope, and all its acts are regarded by Romanists as null and void. 18. The celebrated Council of Trent, which sat from A. D. 1545 until A. D. 1563, when discipline was settled and the doctrines of the Romish Church declared, as set forth in the canons of that memorable assembly. 19. The Vatican Council assembled by Pope Pius IX., December 8, 1869. Two "schemata," or papers to be voted on, were prepared and handed in to the council, one "Schema de Fide" and the other "Schema de Ecclesia." They excluded the chapters on the

OFFA (of'fa) was one of the most eminent of the Mercian kings, and the founder of the great abbey of St. Alban's. St. Alban's had long been celebrated as the scene of the sufferings of the first British martyr. He had suffered much in mind because of the murder of Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, and to make all right he determined to build a monastery. He was directed, of course miraculously, to the place where the relics of St. Albanus had been buried. They were raised and deposited with great honor in a shrine in a church, around which the monastery was subsequently erected. This religious house was of vast size, and it was endowed with lavish abundance. In every respect the abbey of St. Alban's was characterized by all the elements of greatness which belonged to the first-class monastic houses. Great in its wealth, in the rank and power of its abbots, in their influence both in Church and State, in the promotion of literature, as well as in the vast proportions of its church, it deserved all the fame that ages have associated with its name. The church was in the form of a cross, extending from east to west about six hundred feet, and the transepts were more than two hundred feet long. It displayed every style from the heavy, rude period of the Saxons down to the fifteenth century. Originally, heterogeneous materials were used in its construction, such as tiles, brick, flints and the débris of the old Roman city of Verulam, but the additions of future years exhibit the taste of the age when the edifice was enlarged.

OFFERINGS (off'er-ingz), various kinds of sacrifice. In the earlier ages of the world it appears to have formed a part of divine worship; and there was a certain distinction between those the burnt-offering, the peace-offering, with the meat and drink-offerings, each having its peculiar signification.

The sin-offering is commanded and the order of it prescribed in Lev. iv. 1-v. 13; vi. 24-30. This betokened abasement in the most express sense, and was to be offered for special acts of sin, not those merely which had been unconsciously committed, but all which arose from that want of care which men to whom the will of God was revealed were bound to exercise. In this offering there was a gradation of victims, more or less costly, to mark the more or less offensive character of the sin, according to the position of the offender or other circumstances. The blood of these victims was to be variously dealt with. If the victim were of an inferior kind, for a poor person, some of it was to be sprinkled on the side of the altar and the rest poured out at the altar foot. If the victim were of a higher degree, for a private person or a ruler, then in addition some of the blood was to be put

be a burnt-offering. The burning, therefore, took place without. Thus most clearly through the whole was the prominent idea exhibited—the identification of the offering with the sinner's guilt, the completeness of the satisfaction and the entire removal of the iniquity.

The trespass-offering is the next to be considered. The regulations in regard to it are given in Lev. v. 14-vi. 7; vii. 1-7. The trespass or, as it might be called, the debt-offering was a supplement or appendage to the sin-offering; it represented sin in a fresh light, as an injury for which there must be recompense. The injury was twofold—against the Lord, whose rights had been violated, and against a fellow-creature, whose property or person had been maltreated. In all such cases there must be a trespass-offering. The rites prescribed were these: that the victim should be killed, but the blood only poured around the altar, not sprinkled on the horns or carried into the sanctuary; the same parts as in the sin-offering were to be burnt on the altar, and the rest to be eaten in the holy place. Then, too, in respect of the injury done or debt incurred, estimation of value was to be made, and a fifth part added thereto; this, where the Lord was wronged, was to be given to the priest, where a neighbor, to him that had so suffered. Here we see a dealing with sin, not for its sinful nature, but for the evils that flow from it; and there was a great lesson inculcated, pressing home upon the conscience the moral debt incurred, and the consequent necessity of satisfying the divine justice and making restitution to the brother who had been injured.

The burnt-offering must be now examined. The statutes respecting it are found in Lev. i.; vi. 8-13. It differed from the two kinds of offering before spoken of in this: they were for special sins which, unatoned for, excluded the transgressor from covenant blessings. But when the conscience was so purged, then God's servant might approach him on the general ground of his promise, seeking in such an offering as this the large remission, not of this or that specified offence, but of all his shortcomings and imperfections and sins. It was a voluntary service, and the offerer laid his hand on the head of the victim; the blood was to be sprinkled round about upon the altar, and the sacrifice to be entirely burnt, the skin alone being given to the priest. The entire consuming betokened the unlimited self-dedication of the offerer to God; and as this would express itself in the fruits of a holy life and conversation, a meat and drink-offering must accompany the burnt-offering.

The law of the peace-offerings is given in Lev. iii.; vii. 11-21. There were three different kinds of these, viz., of thanksgiving, the adoring gratitude of a full heart, expressing its sense of rich spontaneous mercy; for a vow, when some benefit had been granted as in consideration of a promise made; and a freewill-offering, when something was devoted to the Lord, but without any special purpose or occasion. Of these the first-named would seem to stand in highest estimation.

Portions of the peace-offerings were reserved for the priest, Lev. vii. 31-34, being consecrated by "heaving" or "waving." According to Jewish tradition, the parts were placed on the hands of the offerer; and then the priest, putting his hands underneath, moved them in a vertical direction for the heaving, in a horizontal one for the waving. This ceremony must have implied a presentation of the parts to God, and they became animals which might and those which might not be thus offered to the Deity, Gen. viii. 20. In the Mosaic law minuter details were given, and various offerings were prescribed which, while they were graciously accepted as an act of service from the worshiper, inculcated also lessons most instructive for all future time, and had their full significance and completion in the great Christian Sacrifice, the one offering of the Lamb of God once for all. The type contains less than the antitype. To convey all the lessons, therefore, that were intended, several forms of offering were commanded. And it is only by putting them together that we can at all grasp the entire purpose of God in them.

It was the first demand of the Israelites that they might be permitted to leave Egypt to offer sacrifices to Jehovah, Ex. v. 1-3; and we find them very soon after their departure making offerings on various occasions, Ex. xviii. 12; xxiv. 5. One of the first directions also given them was for an altar to be constructed for the different kinds of sacrifice, Ex. xx. 24, 25. Somewhat later we have the whole code of regulations for offerings, Lev. i.-vii., the sin-offering, the trespass-offering, upon the horns—the most prominent part—of the altar. If, still further, the offering were for the congregation or for the high-priest, then also a portion of the blood must be taken into the sanctuary and sprinkled seven times before the inner veil, some being put upon the horns of the altar of incense. In each case the offerer had to lay his hand upon the victim before it was slain; and thus the blood-shedding with the sprinkling was taken as an atonement for his sin. Certain portions of the victim were then burnt upon the altar, while the rest, if the offering were for an individual, was to be eaten by the priest within the precincts of the sanctuary; if for the congregation or for the priest himself, then it was to be carried forth and burnt in a clean place. The full acceptance of the offering was thus shown; the flesh had become most holy; it was God's; by his priests, therefore, it was eaten, in his more immediate presence, except when the priests were directly, for their own sin, or indirectly, as members of the congregation, concerned; then the priests could not eat the flesh, else it would have been a peace-offering; neither could it be consumed upon the altar, else it would

The meat-offering is prescribed in Lev. ii.; vi. 14-23. It was an unbloody offering, and therefore it was not to be presented alone; it accompanied the burnt-offering and the peace-offering. The meat-offering consisted of flour or cakes, prepared with salt, oil and frankincense, salt being the preservative against decay, oil the symbol of spiritual influence and frankincense betokening the pleasant savor of a pure offering to the Lord. So that, as the meat-offering was to teach that God's servants were to be fruitfully engaged in good works, those good works must, it was shown, be incorrupt, unwrought by the divine Spirit, and must be presented before God with the incense of grateful prayer.

The offerings which have been enumerated might be made as occasion should require, or were the voluntary expression, the freewill-offering, of a loving heart. But there were particular seasons when sacrificial rites were necessary to be performed; these were daily, weekly, monthly and annual. The daily sacrifice was a burnt-offering, consisting of two lambs, offered every day, morning and evening, at the third and ninth hours, Ex. xxix. 38-42. They were burnt as holocausts, but by a small fire, that they might continue burning the longer, a bread-offering and a drink-offering accompanying each. Incense also was to be burned every morning and evening, Ex. xxx. 7, 8. The weekly offering on the Sabbath was equal to the daily offering, and was in addition to it, Num. xxviii. 9, 10. The monthly sacrifice at the new moon consisted of two young bullocks, one ram and seven lambs of a year old, for a burnt-offering, with a suitable meat- and drink-offering, together with a kid for a sin-offering, Num. xxviii. 11-15. There were, besides, the yearly offerings, at the passover, on the day of pentecost, on the first of the seventh month or beginning of the civil year, on the tenth of the same month or day of expiation, and at the feast of tabernacles. The offerings for these are carefully prescribed, Num. xxviii. 16-31; xxix.

There were besides perpetually other occasions when offerings were to be made. Families seem sometimes to have had yearly sacrifices, 1 Sam. xx. 6, 29. There were the purification-offerings for women after childbirth, Lev. xii., at the cleansing of the leper, Lev. xiv. 1-32, and of other persons who had been unclean, Lev. xv. 13-33, by the Nazarite, Num. vi. 9-21, those at dedications, marriages, etc.; there was also the offering of the shewbread, rites being continually prescribed in which some of the great lessons of the law were impressed upon the mind.

Such, briefly, were the ceremonial offerings of the first dispensation, not a mere collection of unmeaning burdensome services, but full of instruction, intended and adapted to prepare for the better covenant wherein the shadows would have their abiding substance. Doubtless devout Israelites looked onward to this, the prophets testifying to the inutility of mere formal offerings, Isa. i. 11-15. And believers now may argue, from the legal offerings which fulfilled their purpose, to the full efficacy of the Redeemer's offering of himself, Heb. ix. 13, 14. Let no man, moreover, forget that he is to be himself "a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God," Rom. xii. 1.

OFFERINGS, ECCLESIASTICAL, small sums presented by persons when receiving the Lord's Supper, at marriages, baptisms, churchings and burials. These were also called oblations and obventions. Easter offerings were of this nature.

OFFERING DAYS, four days on which royal offerings were formerly made, viz., Christmas, Easter, St. John the Baptist's day and Michaelmas.

OFFERTORY, a name for the lesser oblation of—1. The elements in the eucharist; 2. The alms; also 3. A verse from the Psalms which precedes the oblation.

OFFERTORY VEIL, a silken veil which the deacon or subdeacon used to throw over his shoulders, and in which he received the oblations of the faithful. It is also used to hold the paten at mass, as in some places acolytes performed this office, who, in common with subdeacons, were not formerly allowed to touch the sacred vessels. It is also called a "humeral" and a "consecration veil."

OFFICE (of'fis), any position of trust, honor or service. The ecclesiastical usages of the term only demand notice.

OFFICE, CONGREGATION OF THE HOLY, a name usually applied to the Romish Inquisition, founded by Pope Paul III., 1542. See INQUISITION.

OFFICE, EUSEBIAN, a form of service introduced by Eusebius, bishop of Vercellæ, but afterward abandoned for the Roman form in 1572.

OFFICE, HOLY. See INQUISITION.

OFFICE, LITTLE, the office or service of the Virgin Mary introduced by Peter Damiani, and sung by his monks after canonical hours.

OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED, the institution of a suit in the court of Arches by sending letters of request signed by the bishop of the diocese in which the cause originated.

OG, an Amoritish king of Bashan, Num. xxi. 33. In form he was a giant, so that his bedstead [or rather sarcophagus] was preserved as a memorial of his huge stature, Deut. iii. 11. He was defeated by the Israelites under Moses, Num. xxi. 33, and his country, which contained many walled cities, was assigned to the tribe of Manasseh, Deut. iii. 13.

OGDEN (og'den), UZAL, D.D., was born in 1744, at Newark, New Jersey, and educated by the Rev. Dr. Chandler. He entered the Episcopal Church, and was ordained a priest in 1773 at the chapel of the palace at Fulham, near London, in England. His first publication was a Masonic sermon in 1784. After it followed "The Reward of Iniquity" and "Antidote to Deism," in 1795, together with several sermons, which were printed from year to year. In 1798 he had been elected bishop of New Jersey, when he was rector of Trinity Church in Newark, New Jersey, but his consecration never took place, and the result was his passing into the Presbyterian Church, in 1805, after an exciting controversy. He died at Newark, in 1822, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

OGEE ARCH (o'je arch), a pointed arch the sides of which are each formed of two contrasted curves. It is made from four centres, two in or near the springing and two others above it reversed, hence it is sometimes called the contrasted arch.

OGILBY (o'g'l-be), JOHN DAVID, D.D., was born in Dublin, Ireland, in 1810. In early life he was brought to New York, and entered in Columbia College, and so remarkable were his gifts and attainments that he was placed by the president, Dr. Harris, as rector of the grammar school, while he was in the junior class. He graduated in 1829, but his excessive labor produced a disease which affected him through life. He now began the preparation and issuing of classical works; and when only twenty-three years of age, he was made professor of languages in Rutgers College, New Brunswick. In 1838 he was ordained by the Protestant Episcopal bishop of New York. In 1841 the chair of ecclesiastical history in the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, and he forthwith began the preparation of text-books, but next year he was obliged to seek relaxation by a voyage to Europe, and in 1846 he had to cross the ocean again. On his return he was appointed rector of Grace Church, Newark, New Jersey, but the influence of his friends prevailed, and he was retained in the seminary. Declining health continued to interfere with his labors; and having gone to Europe again, he died in Paris, in February, 1851, greatly regretted. He was wonderfully learned, incessant in his application to duties, and his mental activity was greater than his bodily frame could endure. His piety and geniality commended him to all who knew him, and he was greatly beloved.

OGILVIE (o'g'l-ve), JOHN, D.D., was born in New York city, in 1722, and was a descendant of the old family of Ogilvie, the head of the house being the earl of Findlater and Seafield. He was educated at Yale College, ordained to the Episco-

ceremony. In order to prevent idolatry, the queen commanded him not to elevate the host, and on the point of his compliance there is a controversy. It seems that he reproached himself for his compliance, and he subsequently refused to obey the queen, who ordered him to attend a public disputation, whereupon he was fined £250 by the council, and shortly afterward he was expelled from his see.

OGYGIAN (o-gi'je-an) DELUGE, the name given to a great inundation mentioned in fabulous history, supposed to have taken place in the reign of Ogyges, in Attica, whose death has been held to be fixed at 1764 B. C. This deluge is said to have taken place before that of Deucalion, and Ogyges is reported to have been the only person saved when all Greece was covered with water. He evidently belongs to the mythical period. Varro places the deluge of Ogyges, which he calls the first, four hundred years be-pal ministry, and in 1749 he began his labors among the Mohawks, near Albany, among whom he spent ten earnest years of his life. The war with France, in 1755, deranged his plans, and he accepted a chaplaincy in the royal American regiment and served during the war. In 1764 he became an assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York, a position which he held until his death, in 1774. In the vestry of Trinity Church there is a portrait of him by Copley, the father of the late Lord Lyndhurst. He left behind him the character of an excellent preacher, a faithful, resolute missionary, a devoted minister and a truly pious man.

OGLETHORP (o'g'l-thorp), OWEN, a well-known bishop of Carlisle. He is a memorable character in English history as being the person who consented to officiate at the coronation of Queen Elizabeth when all the other bishops had refused. Canterbury was then vacant, but Heath, the archbishop of York, had refused, and the bishop of Carlisle consented to perform the fore Inachus, and consequently sixteen hundred before the first Olympiad, and this would place it 2376 B. C. Now, the deluge of Noah, according to the Hebrew text, occurred 2349 B. C., there being only twenty-seven years of difference. These facts go far to show how widely, and even accurately, tradition has carried the fact of the deluge, though different names were of course connected with it in different ages and countries.

OHEL (o'hel), one of David's descendants, 1 Chr. iii. 20.

OIL. Much use was made of oil by the ancient inhabitants of Palestine, and many allusions to it are found in their sacred and other writings. It was employed as an article of food, serving to a large extent the purposes of butter in this country; in meat- or bread-offerings, sometimes poured on them, at other times mixed with them; as a cosmetic for the refreshing and adorning of the person, as the special instrument of consecration to holy offices, as a healing medicament, as the chief source of artificial light, and partly also as a perfume in the last offices of affection and respect for the dead. But as all these subjects are treated under their proper heads, it is unnecessary to go into further details here.

OILLY (oil'le), ROBERT D', who had been lord high constable in the reign of Henry I., was the founder of the priory at Oseney, which was built in 1129 on one of the islets made by the rivers adjoining the castle of Oxford. The house was dedicated to the honor of the Blessed Virgin, and was placed under the rule of St. Augustin. His wife induced him to undertake the pious work by telling him how she had heard a miraculous chattering of birds, and how a friar had interpreted to her their speech. Such knowledge served the purposes of monks and friars in the twelfth and later centuries, and the priory which was thus founded became an abbey, and it in time changed its character; for when Henry VIII., in 1542, founded the see of Oxford, the abbey church became the cathedral of the diocese, and it also serves the purposes of the chapel of Christ Church, the largest of the colleges in the university of Oxford.

OIL TREE, Isa. xli. 19. See OLIVE TREE.

OILS ECCLESIASTICAL are of three kinds—1. Chrism oil; 2. Oil of catechumens; 3. Oil of the sick. In the West these are all consecrated by the bishop on Maundy Thursday, but in the East the chrism alone is; whilst any priest may consecrate the oil of catechumens, and seven priests that of the sick. The oil of catechumens is used in baptism, consecration of altars, ordaining of priests and in coronations. That of the sick is used for extreme unction and the benediction of bells.

OLAMUS (ol-a'mus), 1 Esd. ix. 30, identical with Meshullam, Ezra x. 29.

OLD BELIEVERS, a sect of dissenters from the Russian Church who separated two hundred years ago, in the time of Czar Alexei Michaelovitch, on the ground of the State's interference, as the Free Church of Scotland left the Established Church. The difference of the two bodies lies in usages more than in essentials or in necessary doctrines.

OLIN (o'lin), STEPHEN, D.D., was born in 1797, at Leicester, Vermont. His early training was for the legal profession. For the sake of his health he was sent to South Carolina, and there he became principal of an academy at Abbeville. His mind was awakened by Methodist influences to the importance of religion; he became a probationer, was received into full communion, and he began to exhort and preach. In 1824 he was admitted to the South Carolina Conference. Delicate health interfered with his services very seriously; and from 1826 to 1828, and again from 1831 to 1833, he acted as professor of belles-lettres in Franklin College, Georgia; and he then entered the Georgia Conference. He accepted the position of president of Randolph-Macon College; but his health obliged him to seek relaxation in foreign travel, and he sailed for Havre in 1837. He visited England, Ireland, Holland, Prussia, Austria, Italy, Egypt, the Sinaitic Peninsula and Palestine, whence, by way of Smyrna, the Danube and London, he returned to his native land. He published his "Travels in the East" after his return. In 1842 he became president of the Wesleyan University of Middletown, Connecticut, and this office he held until his death, in 1851. His travels and other works show him to have been a man of fine parts, capable of great things, had his physical strength enabled him to labor as he earnestly desired. He was greatly beloved by all the members of the denomination who knew him.

OLIVE (ol'iv), OLIVE TREE. The olive grows plentifully almost everywhere near the shores of the Mediterranean, and is abundant in Palestine, Deut. vi. 11; viii. 8. Olive-yards are therefore commonly mentioned as a considerable part of a man's property, 1 Sam. viii. 14. This tree flourishes in Syria, in warm and sunny situations, on a rocky soil, at a height not greater than about three thousand feet above the level of the sea. It increases slowly to a moderate altitude of twenty or thirty feet, with a knotty trunk and numerous extended branches. The leaves grow in pairs, of a pale dusty color, and are not deciduous. The white flowers appear in June, and the fruit is an oblong berry, first green, and when fully ripe a blackish-purple. The wood is something like box, but softer, with dark gray veins. The olive tree lives to a great age.

This tree is mentioned very early in Scripture. It was with an olive leaf in her mouth that the dove returned to Noah, apprising him thereby that the waters of the flood were abated, Gen. viii. 11. The high estimation in which the olive tree was held is seen by its being placed first in Jotham's parable, Jud. ix. 8, 9. And it is often mentioned as indicating plenty, prosperity and strength, the allusion taking its force from the products, from the evergreen character and the protracted existence of the tree, Ps. lii. 8. And various applications are referred to of the berries, Deut. xxiv. 20, the oil, Lev. xxiv. 2, which was an article of commerce, 1 Ki. v. 11, and the wood, 1 Ki. vi. 31-33.

For obtaining the oil, the olives were ground to a pulp in a kind of stone basin, a heavy stone roller being passed over them; and the oil was received in stone presses, the best being that which flowed first. Many of such presses, with their floors, gutters, troughs and cisterns, may still be seen almost perfect in a ruin above Tyre, called Em El-Awamid. They consist of upright posts, two feet apart, in the inner faces of which are grooves. A plank moved in these, forced down by a lever on the masses of olives. The oil flowed into a stone trough. In the large basin the olives were ground to a pulp by the stone wheel. In the other perhaps they were trodden with the feet, see Mic. vi. 15.

at whose treacherous information Saul destroyed the city, was "detained before the Lord," 1 Sam. xxi., xxii. And this may explain the singular phrase, "where David worshiped God," 2 Sam. xv. 32: David's feet were treading in sorrow the precincts of that sanctuary where he had been accustomed, ere its desolation, to worship in joy. And it has been suggested that it was hither David brought the giant's head, 1 Sam. xvii. 54. The towers of Jebus were so close to Nob that at a distance they seemed one city. Even now to the spectator, in some positions, the buildings on Olivet are mixed with those in Jerusalem.

It is from the New Testament, however, that this mount derives its most touching interest. Hither the Lord was wont to resort. From Olivet he looked down upon the rebellious city and wept bitter tears over its perverseness and its fate. Over Olivet he passed to and fro visiting Bethany. On the side of Olivet was Gethsemane. From Olivet, when all was done, the great atonement made, the east of Jerusalem, from which it is separated by the valley of Jehoshaphat. It is generally described as having three summits or peaks. It derives its name from the olive trees which clothed its sides. Some of these still remain (see GETHSEMANE), and on part of the hill are corn-fields, and in a few half-cultivated gardens are fig and pomegranate trees.

Little mention is made of Olivet in the Old Testament, save that it was up its slopes that David, when fleeing from Jerusalem for fear of Absalom, went wearied and weeping as his faithful guards filed on before him. Here he met Hushai and Ziba, 2 Sam. xv. 30-xvi. 4. It is also referred to by Zechariah, Zech. xiv. 4. And yet it may very well be that there were other deeds done on Olivet recorded in the Old Testament, though the well-known name is not mentioned in connection with them. On the northern summit there is great reason to believe stood Nob, that city of the priests where David and his men ate the shewbread, where the sword of Goliath was kept, and where Doeg, the evil-minded Edomite the victory over death achieved by the glorious resurrection, the last charge given to the disciples, who were thenceforth to build up the impregnable fortress of the Christian Church, Christ ascended to reign till every enemy should be subdued beneath his feet, Matt. xxiv. 3; xxvi. 30.

Christ did not ascend from the spot whereon now stands the church of the Ascension; it was rather from some point over the summit, near upon Bethany, Luke xxiv. 50, 51. The views from this mount in different directions are extensive; you look into Jerusalem on one side, while on another there are the dreary hills over which the road passes to Jericho, with the northern end of the Dead Sea visible and the mountains of Moab beyond.

OLIVETAN (o-leev-tong'), PETER ROBERT, born at Noyoa, toward the end of the fifteenth century, was the first who published a version of the Scriptures in the French language, from the Hebrew and Septuagint, for the use of the inhabitants of the Valais, by whom he was engaged to execute that task. He was a townsman and relation of Calvin, and produced the first impressions on his mind in favor of the new doctrines advanced in Germany. His translation was the foundation of the Geneva version in common use after it had undergone various revisions by Calvin and others. It is said that he was poisoned at Rome in 1536.

OLSHAUSEN (ôls'how-zen), HERMANN, a German exegetical writer, was born at Oldesloe, August 21, 1796. He finished his preparatory studies at the universities of Kiel and Berlin, and in 1821 was appointed an extraordinary and in 1827 an ordinary professor of theology at Königsberg. Here he remained, enjoying a great reputation as an academic teacher, till 1834, when he removed to Erlangen; and after five years more of work, he expired, September 4, 1839. His principal works are "Genuineness of the Four Gospels" and "Commentary on the New Testament." The latter work was completed only to the end of Second Thessalonians. It is highly esteemed for its spiritual insight into the meaning of the sacred writers and a deep sympathy with them. As a commentator he is justly valued for his judgment as well as his erudition.

OLYMPAS (o-lim'pas), a Christian at Rome whom Paul salutes in his Epistle to the Romans, Rom. xvi. 15.

OLYMPIAD (o-lim'pe-ad), a period of four years, was reckoned from one celebration of the Olympic games to another, and constituting an important epoch in history and chronology. The Olympiads were reckoned from the victory of Coræbus in the foot-race which took place in the year 776 B. C.

OLYMPIC (o-lim'pik) GAMES, solemn games among the ancient Greeks, dedicated to Olympian Jupiter, celebrated once in four years, at Olympia, or Pisa, in Elis. They had fallen into disuse, but in 776 B. C. they were revived, and the Olympiads were dated from that epoch. None but Greeks who were free men were permitted to contend. Successful contestants in oratory, music, poetry and athletic games were crowned with garlands, which were held in the highest estimation. See GAMES.

OMAR, caliph of the Saracens, was born in 581. He was at first an opponent and then became the disciple and ardent supporter of Mohammed. He carried the sword and the Koran into Syria, took Jerusalem, built a splendid mosque on the site of Solomon's temple, subdued Persia and conquered Egypt, destroying the great library of Ptolemy Philadelphus in Alexandria. He was assassinated by a Persian slave in the midst of his victorious career, in 644.

OMISH (o'mish) CHURCH, the name of a sect of strict Mennonites. The name is derived from Jacob Amen, a Swiss preacher of the seventeenth century, and they were originally called "Amenites."

OMRI (om'ri). 1. The captain of the host of Israel who, when Zimri had killed King Elah and occupied his throne, marched with the army to Tirzah, besieged Zimri and reduced him to such straits that after a miserable reign of seven days he fired the palace and perished in the conflagration. Omri was supported in his pretensions to the vacant throne, it would seem, by the army, but a competitor, Tibni, had a large part of the people with him. The struggle continued for some years, from 928 to 925 B. C.; then Omri prevailed, and Tibni died. From this time Omri reigned with full authority till 918, twelve years in all. His conduct was ungodly, and he left his crown to his weak and wicked son Ahab. It was this king who, having purchased the hill Samaria from its owner Shemer, built thereon the splendid city which was ever after the capital of the kingdom of the ten tribes, 1 Ki. xvi. 16-30. It appears from the treaty of Ben-hadad with Ahab that Omri had been engaged in an unsuccessful war with Syria. 2. A Benjamite, 1 Chr. vii. 8. 3. A descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ix. 4. 4. The ruler of Issachar in the time of David, 1 Chr. xxvii. 18.

ON, a Reubenite who joined with Dathan and Abiram, Num. xvi. 1. As his name is not again mentioned, it has been supposed that he separated himself in time from those who persisted and perished in their rebellion.

ON, "light," or specially "the sun," an ancient and celebrated city of Lower Egypt in which was a famous temple of the sun. Joseph married the daughter of one of the priests of On, Gen. xli. 45, 50; xlv. 20—an alliance which must have contributed greatly to his credit with the Egyptians. From the worship paid at On to the sun, the city was called Beth-shemesh, "house of the sun," by the Hebrews, Jer. xliii. 13. It was rendered Heliopolis, "sun-city," by the Septuagint translators, and was known under that name to Greek writers as one of the four great Egyptian cities which were centres of religious solemnities. This city suffered much from the Persian invasion, and works of art were carried from it to enrich first Rome and afterward Constantinople. In the time of Strabo it was but a mass of splendid ruins, among which some of those halls could be traced in which Greek sages as well as Egyptians had studied. The site is still marked by low mounds enclosing a space of about three-quarters of a mile long and half a mile broad. The only remnant of ancient magnificence amid the utter desolation is an obelisk of red granite, sixty-eight feet high, attributed to the reign of Osirtesen I. The ruins lie two hours, or nearly ten miles, north-east of Cairo, six hours from ancient Memphis.

ONAM (o'nam). 1. One of the descendants of Seir the Horite, Gen. xxxvi. 23. 2. A descendant of Judah, son of Jerahmeel, 1 Chr. ii. 26, 28.

ONAN (o'nan), one of the sons of Judah who died by God's visitation for his criminal evasion of the Levirate law, Gen. xxxviii. 4, 8, 9.

ONESIMUS (o-nes'e-mus), the slave of Philemon who had fled from his master, but was converted by means of St. Paul, who sent him back from Rome with a letter to Philemon, Col. iv. 9; Philem. 10.

ONESIPHORUS (o-ne-sif'o-rus), a Christian who had been serviceable to St. Paul at Ephesus. He also sought him out when a prisoner at Rome and ministered to him, 2 Tim. i. 16-18; iv. 19.

ONIARES (o-ni'a-res), 1 Macc. xii. 19. This word is a corruption; with a slight alteration it would be "Areus to Onias."

ONIAS (o-ni'as). 1. A Jewish high-priest, successor of Jaddua, about 330-309 B. C.; it is he most probably who is referred to in Ecclus. i. 1 as the father of Simon the Just, who was the father of a second Onias. 2. Another high-priest, the third of the name, about 198-171 B. C., grandson of the Onias son of Simon the Just. It must have been with him that the correspondence of the Lacedonians and the Jews commenced, 1 Macc. xii. 7, 8, 19, 20. He was unjustly deposed and murdered, 2 Macc. iv. 33-38. He is said to have appeared in a vision to Judas Maccabeus, 2 Macc. xv. 12-16. His brother bore the same name, but exchanged it for Menelaus.

ONION (un'yun), one of the plants which the Israelites in the wilderness regretted. They had eaten it in Egypt, and they murmured for want of it, Num. xi. 5. The common onion has been cultivated in Egypt from time immemorial, and there attains its greatest excellence.

ONKELOS (ong'ke-los), a celebrated rabbi, tical, and some depression or broad torrent-bed in the plain of Sharon may have been meant by the sacred writers.

ONYCHA (on'e-ka), one of the ingredients in the sacred perfume, Ex. xxx. 34. It is the shell of a species of mussel found in the waters of India, in the Red Sea and on the Arabian coast. When burned, it emits a sweet musky odor.

ONYX (on'icks). The Hebrew word shóham is thus rendered, Gen. ii. 12; 1 Chr. xxix. 2. Opinions differ as to the gem intended by this word; some prefer translating it "beryl." The onyx has its particles arranged in parallel layers; white, alternating with blue, gray or brown. It was much used by the ancients for cameos, the device being cut out of the opaque white, while the darker part formed the ground.

is often placed on the African coast, and identified with Sofala or Zanguebar, where it is said there is a gold district called Fura. But this district is two hundred miles from the coast, and the name Sofala cannot at all be connected with Ophir, the significations being quite different. Besides, Ophir is named, Gen. x. 29, between Sheba and Havilah—that is, in Arabia. And, indeed, there is at present an Arabian town Ophar, in the province of Oman; though, to be sure, the names are not so closely allied in the original as they appear to be in English. The long time consumed in the voyage to a country comparatively so near as Arabia may be accounted for by the slowness of ancient coast navigation; and besides, commodities might be exported, as well as others imported, and thus a longer delay be necessary at the ports. Neither is the fact that some of the articles imported are not now found in Arabia decisive. Ophir might was the author of the Chaldee Targum, or paraphrase on the Pentateuch. The Babylonian Talmud states that he was contemporary with Gamaliel; this would place him about the time of our Lord. From the mention made of him by the Babylonian Talmud, and from the purity of his language, it would seem that he was a native of Babylon. The Targum is a faithful version, and corresponds so exactly with the Hebrew text that it used to be chanted to the same notes, alternately with the Hebrew, in the Jewish synagogues, down to the beginning of the sixteenth century.

ONO (o'no), a town of Benjamin built, together with Lod, by the sons of Elpaal, 1 Chr. viii. 12. It was reoccupied after the captivity, and is again grouped with Lod, Ezra ii. 33. It appears that there was a plain near it called by the same name, Neh. vi. 2. A valley is also mentioned in connection with it by Nehemiah, Neh. ix. 35. The plain and valley may, perhaps, have been iden-

OPHEL. See JERUSALEM.

OPHIR (o'fer). 1. A descendant or son of Joktan, of the family of Shém, Gen. x. 29.

2. A country peopled by the posterity of Joktan's son. There is much difficulty in determining the region designated in Scripture by this name. It was a place whence the navies of Solomon and Hiram, sailing from a port on the Red Sea, brought gold, precious stones, ivory, almug trees, apes and peacocks, 1 Ki. ix. 26-28. The gold procured from this region was peculiarly valued, 1 Chr. xxix. 4, so that "gold of Ophir" was proverbial for gold of the most precious kind.

Now, as to the situation of this country, no difficulty need be felt on account of its being said that ships of Tarshish were engaged in the Ophir trade, as if Tarshish and Ophir were near. Large vessels were called "ships of Tarshish;" besides, the vessels used might be those that had been employed in voyages to Tarshish or Tartessus. Ophir be an emporium where trade from the east and west might meet, and thus Indian treasures might be procured there. These reasons are very strong for identifying Ophir with some part of Arabia. Still, the Septuagint translators frequently render Ophir by a word understood to mean India, and Josephus favors this interpretation. And the argument of Professor Max Muller is most weighty. He observes that the Hebrew expressions for apes, peacocks, sandal-wood and ivory are clearly of a foreign cast, that there is every reason to believe that they are Sanscrit or of Sanscrit origin; hence he concludes that these things must have come from the country from which they brought their names. Ophir, therefore, is India. Still, that some of the commodities imported came from India is not proof that Ophir was in India. It is conclusive for the country from which the commodities originally came, not for the place where the Hebrews obtained them. As above stated, Ophir might be an emporium where Indian and Hebrew merchants met.

OPHITES (of'ites), or OPHITÆ (of'e-tay), a heretical sect that prevailed about the middle of the second century who held a number of Oriental Gnostic tenets, to which they added the strange notion that the serpent by which our first parents were deceived was either Christ himself or the Æon Sophia concealed under the form of that reptile. Hence they kept a number of serpents about them, and paid them a kind of divine honor. The system of the Ophites was nearly allied to that of the Valentinians. Some have thought that the serpent was the symbol of the Sophia or wisdom, the soul of the world, and hence viewed as an object of worship, and thus the name of the sect originated.

OPHNI (of'ni), a town of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 24. Perhaps the modern Jifna, two or three miles north-west of Bethel.

OPHRAH (of'ra). 1. A person of the family of Kenah, son of Meonothai, 1 Chr. iv. 14, but otherwise unknown.

2. A town belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 23. This has been supposed identical with Ephraim or Ephron, 2 Chr. xiii. 19, and Ephraim, John xi. 54. See EPHRAIM. Perhaps it may be the village et-Taizibeh, on a hill north-east of Bethel.

3. A city in the territory of Manasseh west of the Jordan, the residence of Gideon, Jud. vi. 11, 24. It has not been satisfactorily identified.

ORACLE (or'a-k'l). This word is sometimes used to denote the sanctuary of the tabernacle and of the temple, where the special presence of Jehovah dwelt, 1 Ki. vi. 16; viii. 6. Divine communications were made to persons inquiring of the Lord; hence "the counsel of Ahithophel" was accounted so judicious, "as if a man had inquired at the oracle (or word) of God," 2 Sam. xvi. 23. In the New Testament the revelations of God in his holy word are denominated "oracles," Acts vii.

38; 1 Pet. iv. 11. They were the true testimony of Him who cannot lie.

But by oracle ordinarily is understood that power of utterance ascribed to heathen deities when interrogated by their worshipers, the word being loosely applied sometimes to the response itself, and sometimes to the place where the response was delivered. The Greek oracles were of chief note. The mind of the Greeks was specially inquisitive into futurity, and the multiplicity of the gods they worshiped would furnish facilities for communications with them. The most celebrated oracle was that of Apollo at Delphi. Here the Pythia—in early times a young maiden, later a woman of fifty, of low origin and uneducated, but of unsullied moral character—was supposed to have the divine inspiration. She prepared herself by chewing laurel leaves and drinking from the Castalian fountain. She then mounted a tripod, placed over a chasm, from which ascended an intoxicating vapor which she received, and under its influence uttered incoherent words. These were arranged and interpreted by a prophet and five assistants, and formed the oracular response. Other noted oracles were three, also of Apollo, in Asia Minor, at Didyma, Claros and Patara, that of Zeus or Jupiter at Dodona, and that of Ammon in Libya. Unquestionably imposture was practiced; dubious replies were given, which the superstition of inquirers disposed them to accept when the result did not agree with their anticipation, and it is likely that oracles were not always inaccessible to bribery. But after every allowance of this kind, the whole mystery of them is not solved.

The Greek oracles decayed or were extinguished in the last days of the Roman republic and those of the early emperors. In the time of Adrian, indeed, and of the Antonines, with the convulsive struggle of paganism, oracles in some measure revived, ere long entirely to pass away. The fact of their gradual extinction is puzzling. May we suppose that He who had winked at earlier ignorance, see Acts xvii. 30, was now resolved, on the promulgation of Christ's gospel, that the vanity of all opposing power should be manifested, when he "commanded all men everywhere to repent"?

ORANGE TREE OF PALESTINE.

Of all the varieties of the orange tribe the citron is the most common species in Palestine. It is a native of Media, and it is known as the orange in Palestine. The leaves are larger than those of the common orange, and the blossom is pale purplish, like the lemon, instead of white, like the orange. The fruit is much larger than the lemon, of an oblong shape, and it is mostly used as a conserve. In the synagogue a citron is handed round and smelled by the worshipers as they go out, when they thank God for all good things and sweet odors given by him.

ORATOR (or'a-tor). So Tertullus is called in Acts xxiv. 1. Here is an example of a hired advocate being employed, according to the forms of the Roman law. In Isa. iii. 3 the word may be used in a bad sense, perhaps with reference to divination.

ORCHARD. See GARDEN.

ORDAIN (or-dain'). This term in a general sense means to command or appoint, Num. xxviii.

6. Our translators have used it to express several different words of the original. With regard to some of them, the theological meaning has caused much discussion. Thus the apostles are said to "have ordained elders in every church," Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5, implying that certain persons were solemnly set apart for ecclesiastical purposes.

Again, there are passages, Acts xiii. 48; Jude 4, in which some have found a predetermination of God influencing men's eternal destiny for life or death. It may be sufficient on the first of these texts to cite a few sentences from Dr. Alford's note upon it: "The meaning of this word must be determined by the context. The Jews had judged themselves unworthy of eternal life; the Gentiles, 'as many as were deposed to eternal life,' believed. By whom so disposed is not here declared, nor need the word be in this place further particularized. We know that it is God who worketh in us the will to believe, and that the preparation of the heart is of him." In Jude 4 the word properly means "before written," with a reference probably to the Old Testament prophecies.

ORDINANCE (or'di-nans), a word used for general laws, whether of God, Isa. xxiv. 5, or of civil governors, 1 Pet. ii. 13, to which due obedience must be paid. It also sometimes occurs in our version for the ceremonies or regulations of divine worship, Heb. ix. 1, 10.

OREB (o'reb). 1. One of the two princes of Midian whom the Ephraimites took and slew, sending their heads to Gideon, Jud. vii. 25; viii. 8. 2. A rock, so called because Oreb was slain there, Jud. vii. 25; Isa. x. 26. It is probable that it was to the west of the Jordan. 3. Occurs 2 Esd. ii. 33, and is identical with Horeb.

OREN (o'ren), a descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 25.

ORIENTAL (o-re-en'tal) ARCHITECTURE. This term in a wide sense includes the architecture of the East, both ancient and modern, and thus Babylonish, Assyrian, Chinese, Japanese, Indian, Egyptian, as well as the styles which followed each other in Greece, would all fall to be described in a treatise on this subject. The term, however, is usually applied to the prevailing styles which came into existence after the fall of the Roman empire, and which began to appear in the East in the hands of Moorish or Saracenic builders.

On the structures of the ancients little need be said. The prevailing idea in Egypt was solidity, massive grandeur and heavy shade, all of which were secured by the vast temples with their columns of huge size, which sustained deep colonnades and cool recesses, where priests and worshipers could be safe from the glare and heat of the torrid sun. Like the pyramids erected to last for all time, so was the great temple, the various stones of which were so great that the power of an earthquake would scarcely serve to separate them. In distant India the temples also assumed a pyramidal form. Different in shape and size from the Egyptian model, and ornamented with turrets and pinnacles that pointed toward heaven, still the mass of the structure affected the pyramidal form. Altogether different were the great brick mounds of the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris, the ideal being seen in the remains which yet can be deciphered in the regions of Nineveh and Babylon. Among the Chinese and the Japanese, as well as among the inhabitants of Thibet, the prevalence of the use of wood affected their style, and the older forms continue to the present day, displaying in the shapes of their roofs, verandahs and entrances a type essentially different from that which can be found to the south and west of the Himalayan range.

As mentioned in the article on architecture, the structures of Palestine were fashioned from the models on the banks of the Nile, and not for many centuries after the Jewish temple was built did the principles of the Greek styles find their way into Palestine. When Rome rose into power and subdued Greece, the Romans received their philosophy, their architecture and much of their religion from the people whom they had conquered; and thus Greek buildings, especially of the Corinthian order, prevailed under the dominant period of the sway of Rome. When the Mohammedan conquerors started from the East in their march toward the Atlantic Ocean, their presence and their power soon became associated with the peculiar style of structure which they raised, and which has been known as Moorish or Saracenic, from the people who introduced it. In Africa and Spain, where their empire became firmly established, the great edifices which they erected showed how diligently they had cultivated the arts and sciences. At Cordova, the mosque, which extended six hundred by four hundred feet, was exceedingly gorgeous. It had nineteen naves, formed by seventeen rows of columns from north to south, and thirty-two narrower naves from east to west. Each of these naves was sixteen feet wide by four hundred feet long. Thus the intersection of the naves produced eight hundred and fifty columns, which, with the fifty-two columns of the court, made a total of nearly one thousand columns in this great edifice.

The Alhambra at Granada was perhaps the most remarkable Moorish edifice in the world. It served the purposes of a fortress and a palace, and its arrangements and adornments made it like a fairy palace. The principles of this architecture do not bear investigation. The style, though highly decorated, wanted the solidity of the Egyptian, the Etrurian or the Greek. Their domes were not lofty, the span of their peculiar arches was narrow; and as their religion forbade them to represent the figures of men and animals, they covered their walls with an incrustation of mosaic, gilding and foliage which was lavish even to profuseness. Specimens of this style are scattered very profusely through this work.

ORIENTAL CHURCH. This term includes all the different communities into which Christianity is divided in the East, such as the Greek Church, the Armenian, the Nestorian, the Coptic, the Maronites, the Syrian Christians on the Malabar coast in India, all of which except the first will be found treated of under their respective heads.

The Greek Church is by far the largest branch of the Oriental Church. It embraces all who hold to the Christian faith who follow the Greek or Græco-Slavonian forms, and who receive the first seven General Councils, and who do not acknowledge the supremacy of the Roman bishop and the later Councils which have been received by the Western Church. Respecting the propriety of the title Palmer has well said: "A communion embracing several other nations and languages besides the Greek, each performing divine worship in its own tongue, and in which out of sixty-six millions of Christians perhaps fifty-nine millions are Slavonians, and pray in the Slavonian tongue, cannot properly be called Greek, merely because its ritual is derived in great measure—by no means exclusively—from Greek sources, and because it was once united with the Græco-Roman empire." The Western or Latin Church is united under one head, the Roman pontiff, but the Greek Church comprises eleven different groups, independent of each other so far as administration is concerned; they fully accord in doctrine.

As soon as the imperial residence was removed to Constantinople the foundation was laid for the feeling his ground comparatively safe, assumed the title of œcumenical patriarch. When Acacius, the patriarch of Constantinople, sustained the "HENOTICON" (which see), A. D. 471, 489, he and the emperor, together with the patriarch of Alexandria, were excommunicated by Felix III., who charged them with assailing the prerogatives of the patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem, thus producing a strange state of affairs, for intercourse was suspended between Rome and Constantinople for fourteen years, while the majority of Eastern bishops took the side of Acacius. And yet in Illyria, and even near Constantinople, many parties took sides with Rome. Then, again, the patriarchs in Constantinople sustained the empealienation and divergence which afterward took place between the bishops of Constantinople and Rome. It became a matter of course that the emperors and bishops of the new capital should seek to enlarge the prerogatives and dignity of the Eastern see. In A. D. 381 it was determined in the first œcumenical council at Constantinople that "precedence in honor" next to that of the Roman bishop should belong to the bishop of Constantinople because it was "New Rome." Rome and Alexandria, foreseeing the future, did not assent to this action; but in A. D. 451 the Council of Chalcedon recognized this precedency and placed under the bishop of Constantinople the districts of Thrace, Asia and Pontus. Again the Roman see withheld its sanction. On the division of the empire the three patriarchs of the East fell under the control of the bishop of Constantinople, who, in their crusade against images in churches; and when Photius rose to the see and found that Pope Nicholas would not recognize him, he formally excommunicated the pope, and arraigned the Western Church for having admitted the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son (see FILIOQUE), for the manner in which the celibacy of the clergy was enforced, and likewise because priests were debarred from celebrating the rite of confirmation. Nicholas not only had refused to recognize Photius, but he excommunicated him. And thus the war raged between the East and West until 1054, when the mutual excommunications pronounced against each other by Cerularius and Leo IX. led to a separation. Several futile attempts were made, from time to time, at reconciliation. Even articles of agreement were signed as late as 1439, only to be neglected again; but in 1453, when Constantinople fell, all attempts at reconciliation were abandoned.

As to doctrine, the Greek Church admits the authority of the first seven Councils; and the Confession of Mogilas, the metropolitan of Kief, which was sanctioned at Yassy, signed by the patriarchs in 1643, and sanctioned again by a synod which met in 1672, at Jerusalem, contains a faithful exhibition of the doctrines which are considered orthodox.

The Greeks and Romanists agree in making the Bible and tradition the rule of faith, and in the Bible the Deutero-Canonical Books, or the Apocrypha, are included. The procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son is denied, and the supremacy and authority of the Roman pontiff is rejected. Baptism by trine immersion is practiced, and even in the case of infants confirmation follows baptism. Priests as well as bishops administer confirmation. Communion in both kinds is administered. They receive all the seven sacraments which the Church of Rome contends for, but their ceremonies differ in the celebration. Priests and deacons cannot contract marriage after ordination, and they cannot be married more than once, nor to a widow. They prohibit fourth marriages. Images are not admitted, and the cross is the only figured object which is permitted in the services of the Church. On the subject of the eucharist the teaching seems to approximate to the doctrine known as consubstantiation.

The constitution of the Church resembles the Roman. The superior clergy are patriarchs, archbishops and bishops, who live in celibacy. The lower clergy are divided into the regular and the secular, called, from their dress, the black and the white clergy.

The conquests of the Mohammedan power greatly affected the Greek Church, because almost all the lands in which the members of the Church resided passed under Mohammedan sway. Certain of the people fell under the rule of Austria and Poland, and Russia alone remained as the protector of the interests of the Greek Church. Religious liberty is vouchsafed in Turkey, and the corruption of the upper clergy is more injurious to the Church than any oppression which is suffered at the hands of the sultan. The services of the Church consist mostly of ceremonial observances, as preaching and reading or interpreting Scripture receive but little attention. The former was at one period actually forbidden for a time in Russia. The mass of the people are grossly ignorant on religious subjects; and as the lower classes of the clergy are generally unlettered, the religion of the lowest body of the people differs little in many places from heathenism. The formation of the kingdom of Greece has to a considerable extent affected the state of religion in that small state, and improvement may be expected because of the influence of the school system which the government has introduced.

The Greek Church, as already stated, is scattered through eleven independent organizations, the following being a condensed view: 1. The patriarchate of Jerusalem, with six metropolitan sees. 2. The patriarch of Antioch, with six sees also. 3. The patriarch of Alexandria, with four sees. 4. Constantinople, with the large number of one hundred and thirty-five sees. 5. Russia, with sixty-five sees, of which five are metropolitan and twenty-five are archiepiscopal. 6. Cyprus, having four sees. 7. Austria, which comprises eleven sees. 8. Montenegro, one see. 9. Mount Sinai, one see. 10. Roumania, with seven sees; and 11. Greece, with thirty-one sees, the archbishop of Athens being the president of the Holy Synod of Greece.

ORIGEN (or'e-jen), a Father of the Church and one of the most learned ecclesiastical writers, was born at Alexandria A. D. 185. For several years he held the appointment of catechist or head of the Christian school of Alexandria. In this situation he distinguished himself by the austerity of his life; and taking the Scripture in the most rigid sense, he went so far as to put in practice the passage of the gospel, "There be some who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven." He subsequently acknowledged the literal acceptance of this saying to be a mistake. From Alexandria he went to Rome, where he began his famous "Hexapla," an edition of the Hebrew Bible, with five Greek versions of it. At the command of his bishop he returned to Alexandria, and was ordained. Soon after this he began his "Commentaries on the Scriptures;" but Demetrius, who envied his reputation, persecuted him with violence, and in a council assembled in 231 it was decreed that Origen should desist from preaching and quit the city. On this he went to Cæsarea, where he was well received by the bishop and permitted to preach. He was consulted in several episcopal synods; but in the persecution under Decius he was thrown into prison and put to the torture. On his release he applied himself to his ministerial labors and to writing. He died in 254. In his commentaries he indulged too much the fancy for allegory, and in his other works he advanced notions more agreeable to the Platonic philosophy than to the Scriptures. To his contemporaries the most offensive of his doctrines were those of the pre-existence of souls and the finite duration of future punishments.

ORPAH (or'pa), daughter-in-law of Naomi, who remained behind among her kindred in Moab when Ruth returned with Naomi to Bethlehem, Ruth i. 4-14. See RUTH.

ORPHAN (or'fan). The fatherless and the widow were equally regarded in the Mosaic law, Ex. xxii. 22; Deut. x. 18. A fatherless child among the Jews had two guardians. He became of age at the time appointed by his father's will, Gal. iv. 2; but if the father died intestate, the minority terminated at the usual age of thirteen years and one day, if the signs of ripeness of age then appeared; if not, it might be protracted till the youth was twenty, or, it is said, sometimes thirty-five.

OSGOOD (os'good), DAVID, D.D., was a Congregationalist clergyman, who was born at Andover in 1747. He was descended from a founder of the Andover Seminary. For nearly fifty years he was pastor at Medford, an earnest Calvinistic preacher and an eminently good man. A volume of his sermons was published in 1824. He died at Medford in 1822.

OSGOOD, SAMUEL, D.D., who was pastor of the First Congregational Church at Springfield, was born in the year 1784 at Fryeburg, Maine. He was a thoroughly able and earnest preacher, and held his place in Springfield from June, 1809, until his death, in December, 1862. His published works are chiefly sermons, as his life was mainly devoted to the duties of his pastoral work.

OSHEA (o-she'a), the original name of Joshua, Num. xiii. 8, 16.

OSIANDER (o-se-an'der), ANDREAS, a celebrated German Protestant theologian, was born at Guntzenhausen, in Franconia, in 1498. He early adopted the opinions of Luther, and took an active part in preparing the Confession of Augsburg; became minister and professor at Königsberg, in Prussia, and died in 1552. He was the author of "Harmony of the Evangelists."

OSIANDRIANS (o-se-an'dre-anz), a section of the early German Protestants who followed Andrew Hosemann rather than Luther. His name, as Latinized, was Osiander. He held that the atonement was effected by the power of the divine and not the human nature of Christ, the exact counterpart of this being that of the STANCARISTS, which see. He became the head of the newly-founded university of Königsberg in A. D. 1543, but his followers were never numerous. His son-in-law, Funch, held them, but after his execution, in 1566, for treason, the views of Osiander declined and the sect was absorbed by the Lutherans.

OSMAN (os'man), an extraordinary personage of the seventeenth century, was the son of Ibrahim, emperor of the Turks. To fulfill a vow made by his father, he was sent to Mecca, to be consecrated to Mohammed. Maltese galleys encountered the Turkish fleet on the voyage to Alexandria, engaged, captured and defeated the whole. The sultana, who had accompanied him, died at Malta, and Osman was instructed and baptized in the Christian religion. Subsequently he joined himself to a convent of Dominicans. In 1676 he became prior and vicar-general of his order at Malta, where he died the same year.

OSMUND (os'mund), who was canonized, held the office of bishop of Old Sarum, from which place, in the reign of Henry III., the seat of the see was removed to Salisbury. The see had originally been instituted at Sherbourn, in Dorsetshire, A. D. 705, and the bishop presided over the territory now embraced by the dioceses of Salisbury, Bristol, Wells and Exeter. In A. D. 905 this diocese was divided, and again, in 1056, the see was established at Sarum, the Sorbiodunum of the Romans, a place of great importance, and a cathedral was founded there by Osmund. After lying neglected and covered with earth for ages, in 1834 the foundations of the original cathedral were left bare and its extent was defined. It was in the form of a cross about two hundred and seventy feet long. The nave and aisles were seventy-two feet broad. The transept was one hundred and fifty feet, and its breadth sixty feet. It is now known that this venerable structure must have stood on the north-western side of the old fortress in a commanding position, and the place is still kept in remembrance, as it continues to give the title by which all the bishops of Salisbury sign their official name. See POORE, RICHARD.

OSPRAY (os'pray), an unclean bird, Lev. xi. 13. There is a difference of opinion in respect to it, but it very probably is the Pandion haliaetus. This is a very powerful bird, sometimes weighing five pounds. Its limbs are muscular and its feet adapted for retaining firm hold of its prey. It feeds on fish, and is therefore found in the vicinity of lakes and rivers. It pounces upon its prey with sudden dash and carries it off in its talons. It is found in all the various quarters of the world.

OSSENES (os-se'nez), or OSSENIANS (os-se'ne-anz), the name given to the Essenes, an ascetic sect of the Jews, by Epiphanius. See ESSENES.

OSSIFRAGE (os'se-fraj), "bone-breaker," an unclean bird, Lev. xi. 13. This is believed to be the bearded vulture. It is large and powerful, measuring four feet from the point of the bill to the end of the tail. This bird is bold in its predatory habits, seizing animals larger than itself—the mountain hare, the wild goat, the young chamois and various kinds of birds. It devours its prey, when it has seized it, on the spot, and refuses flesh when in a state of putrefaction; and hence, by a wise provision, its numbers are limited, while vultures, which are to clear off animal matter in a state of decomposition, largely multiply.

OSTRICH (os'trich), a large bird, the Struthio camelus of Linnæus, of the order Cursores, belonging to the family Struthionidæ. The Hebrew words ya'en, bath-hayya'ânah, signifying, probably, "voracious," "the daughter of the voracious," describe this bird, the flesh of which was forbidden as food, Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15, where in our version "owl;" but in several places "ostrices" is given rightly in the margin, Job xxx. 29; Isa. xiii. 21; xxxiv. 13; xliii. 20. There is another word, rânân, or rênânâh, implying a wailing cry, which, though our translators make it "peacocks," Job xxxix. 13, certainly denotes the ostrich. The verse is rendered by Carey, "The wing of the ostrich thrilleth joyously: is the feather and-plume [that] of the stork?" The description given in the succeeding verses, Job xxix. 14-18, has caused some perplexity. Naturalists describe the bird as the largest of the feathered tribe, exceedingly swift, employing its wings, which are useless for flight, to aid it in running. It is voracious, and will swallow any hard substance, as stones or metal. Sometimes, however, it is said that its indiscriminating appetite proves fatal to it. Several female ostriches lay their eggs in a single nest, a mere shallow hole in the sand, and then carefully cover them. In very hot climates the sun's heat on them is sufficient in the day-time without incubation by the parent birds, but in less sultry regions both male and female are said to sit upon the eggs. There are also other eggs scattered near which are apparently neglected, but are really designed for the food of the young birds when hatched. These habits are the result of the instinct with which the Deity has endowed the ostrich; but some of them are so strange as to have given rise to an Arabian proverb, "As foolish as an ostrich." And this is sufficient to justify the statement in the book of Job. Scripture must of course be composed in popular language, and the meaning here is evidently not that the bird is through stupidity unfaithful to its instinct, but that that instinct is of a kind which seems to imply want of forethought and natural care.

OSWALD (os'wald). Of all the names connected with the northern part of England none is more venerable and held in greater esteem than Oswald. He was the second son of Ethelrith, king of Northumberland. His mother and her sons had to fly to Scotland, where they received protection. The sons were brought to some extent under the influence of Christianity, but one after another of them was slain after having lapsed into idolatry. Cedwell of Cumberland was then the great enemy of Northumberland, and Oswald, seeing that the small force in his hands was quite unable to meet the army of Cedwell, is said to have erected a cross as a standard in the front of his army, holding it with his own hands until it was firmly fixed in the ground, then falling on his knees he called on almighty God, leaving himself, his army and all his interests in God's hands, and the result was a decided victory. He at once made a renewed profession of faith in God, sent to Scotland for teachers; and when the first missionary proved to be an austere man, he received Aidan of Iona in answer to a second application. Aidan fixed his abode in Lindisfarne, which ever since has been called Holy Island, and under him the nobles and the people were brought to receive Christianity. His character as given by Bede was eminent for piety, humility and earnest zeal. He became the great instrument of establishing order and prosperity in Northumberland, and thus he was the main support of Oswald's throne. Aidan died A. D. 651.

tenth century. He was one of the great preachers and of the great builders of his age. He is reported to have had enormous audiences, to whom he preached in the open air, and in A. D. 983 he completed the cathedral, which had engrossed much of his energy to raise. This edifice was ravaged by the soldiers of Hardicanute, and it is chiefly in the crypt of the present cathedral that the style may be seen of the structure which was raised by Oswald. Like almost all the great English churches, the cathedral of Worcester is of different ages. The choir, Lady chapel and the eastern transept are of the Early English period. The great western window and the windows of the north aisle of the nave are of decorated work, while the north transept of the choir is distinctly Early English, and exceedingly pure and beautiful. The cloisters are especially dignified, showing plain windows of an early type of perpendicular work, while the jambs of the windows are elaborately decorated. Though not so large as Salisbury, the plan bears a striking resemblance to that great model of ecclesiastical edifices. It has two transepts like Salisbury. The cloisters occupy a similar position to the south of the nave, and so also the chapter-house stands to the east of the cloisters, while a large building, the king's school, stands to the south of the cloisters.

The cathedral is four hundred and twenty-six feet long, the western transept is one hundred and eighty feet, the eastern is one hundred and twenty feet, the nave is seventy-eight feet broad, the choir is seventy-four feet and the central tower is one hundred and ninety-six feet high, thus showing that this great church takes a prominent place among the cathedrals of England. Among the eminent men who have presided over the diocese may be mentioned Julius de Medecis, who held the see for the year 1521-22. He was afterward Pope Clement VII., and he died in 1534. Hugh Latimer held the see for a few years. John Whitgift, D.D., in 1577. Edward Stillingfleet in 1689. William Lloyd, who was one of the seven bishops whom James II. sent to the Tower. Richard Hurd, 1781, and others, show the learning and eminence of the men who have presided

PACHA (pa-shaw'), a title of honor given on the origin of the Turkish empire to the ministers and chief assistants of the sultan, whether military or learned. It is contracted from the Persian "padi-shah"—i. e., the foot of the shah. In process of time the name was given to the governors of provinces, hence called "pashaliks." The distinctions of rank were indicated between the two classes by the two or three horsetails carried on the standards before them.

father of the Cœnobites, or brethren associated together in monasteries. The climate of Egypt, Palestine and Syria was peculiarly favorable to the indulgence of the monastic spirit, and the system soon gained great popularity. At the time of his death Pachomius is said to have had several thousands of ascetics under his jurisdiction. In addition to these Cœnobites of the common life and the hermits who led a solitary life were the Sarabaites, a species of ascetics who wandered about from city to city, trading in relics, and often attempting by jugglery and impudence to impose on popular credulity. Then, again, the Euchile, or the "Prayerful," who appeared in Mesopotamia about A. D. 360, displayed less impudence, but as little discretion. They refused to work, and lived by alms and beggary. The Boskoi, or the "Graall fours, frequently almost naked, lived on roots or berries and led lives of great debasement. The "Pillar Saints," of whom Simon Stylite was the most famous, were distinct from all the others. This wretched visionary, who occupied his strange abode for thirty years, was deemed one of the lights of his age, and Roman emperors were not ashamed to solicit his counsel on important occasions.

PACIFICATION (pa-sif-i-ka'sh'n), EDICTS OF, the term usually applied to the edicts issued by the French monarchs in favor of their Protestant subjects, in view of arresting their terrible persecutions. The first of this nature was published by Charles IX. in 1562; but the most celebrated was the EDICT OF NANTES, which see, issued by Henry IV. in 1598, and revoked by Louis XIV. in 1685.

PACKARD (pak'ard), FREDERICK ADOLPHUS, LL.D., was born in 1794, at Marlborough, Massachusetts. He studied law, was called to the bar, and became a member of the State Legislature. In 1829 he removed to Philadelphia, where he became editor for the Sunday-school Union. Two thousand of the publications passed through his hands, and he compiled or altogether wrote more than forty of these works. In 1849 he declined the position of president of Girard College. The "Sunday-school Magazine," "Sunday-school Journal," the "Youth's Penny Gazette," and eleven volumes of the "Journal of Prison Discipline" were also edited by him. Among his other works are—"The Union Bible Dictionary," "The Teacher Taught," "Separation of Convicts," "The Rock," "The Life of Robert Owen," "European Hospitals," "Daily Public Schools of the United States," etc., all of which have had an immense circulation. After a life of unwonted literary toil he retired from public labor, and died in 1867.

PACKARD, HEZEKIAH, D.D., was born in 1761, at North Bridgewater, Massachusetts. He entered the Revolutionary army in 1775, while yet a mere lad, but next year his military life came to a close. In 1780 he came under the influence of religious impressions, and he earnestly sought the advantages of a collegiate education, and after diligent preparation he entered Cambridge in 1783. He graduated in 1787. He was made librarian and mathematical tutor, and while he held these offices he prepared himself for the ministry. In 1793 he became pastor of the church in Chelmsford, Massachusetts, where he remained for about nine years. He remained at Wiscasset for a few years, and then took charge of a private school which eventually assumed an academic importance. Thus he continued, teaching and ministering in the Unitarian Congregational Church, until increasing infirmities obliged him, in 1836, to retire. In 1849 he died, at Salem, in the eighty-eighth year of his age. His published works consist almost altogether of sermons published at intervals, and they had been preached on important occasions.

PACKARD, THEOPHILUS, D.D., was

lege, where he graduated in 1796. He preached for some time in the region around the place of his studies, and in 1799 he was ordained and settled at Shelburne, Massachusetts, and his connection continued with this church until his death, in 1855. He was eminent as a preacher and also as an instructor, for he taught no fewer than thirty-one students, all of whom entered the ministry. He published many sermons from year to year which had been preached at special occasions.

PADAN-ARAM. See MESOPOTAMIA.

PADDY (pad'de). This name, which is vulgarly used in Ireland, is merely a contraction for Pallady, a modification of the name PALLADIUS, which see.

PADON (pa'don), one whose children, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 44.

PAGIEL (pag'i-el), the prince of the tribe of Asher in the wilderness, Num. i. 13.

PÆAN (pe'an). Among the Greeks it was properly a hymn in honor of Apollo, who was called Pæan. Also a war-song before or after battle. In the first case it was sung in honor of Mars; in the second case, as a thanksgiving to Apollo.

PÆDOBAPTISTS (pe'do-bap'tists), those who hold that baptism should be administered during infancy. Churches which follow this practice are so called in opposition to those denominated Anti-pædobaptists, who deny the propriety of infant baptism.

PAGAN (pa'gan). This word is now used as the opposite of Christian. It is derived from the Latin word pagus, "a village;" and it originally obtained its modern meaning from the fact that in villages and in rural regions the people remained heathen long after Christianity prevailed in towns and cities. Gratian, who became emperor in A. D. 375, was the first of the Roman rulers who refused to permit himself to be arrayed in the official robes of the high-priest of heathenism; and under the advice of Ambrose he removed the altar of Victory from the Senate-house, confiscated the property of the temples and withdrew the privileges of the priesthood. His successor, Theodosius the Great, carried on the work, and an edict in A. D. 391 commanded the destruction of the heathen temples of Alexandria, while in other places they were pulled down without any express authority. Of all the temples consigned to ruin none attracted more regard than that of Serapis in Egypt. It was inferior to no other structure in the Roman empire. It was quadrangular in form, raised on an elevated position and reached by one hundred steps. The priests resided in outer buildings of vast magnitude. The inner square was surrounded with a range of galleries, and on the middle stood the habitation of the idol, built of marble and upheld by pillars of immense magnitude and rare symmetry. The idol itself was of human form, of colossal proportions, made of gold, silver, iron and other metals, and inlaid with precious stones.

this statue would involve the ruin of the world, and that if any one injured it, he would be swallowed up by an earthquake. When the multitude assembled to destroy it, all stood silent for a time, but a soldier, urged on by the bishop Theophilus, struck it on the knee with a hatchet; then, climbing up, he succeeded in cleaving the jaw asunder; whereupon a swarm of mice rushed out and scampered off. Forthwith the work of destruction was accomplished.

A few of the more famous of the religious edifices of the pagans were preserved as specimens of architecture, and they became Christian churches; but many were leveled to the ground. In the end of the reign of Theodosius, heathen rites were prohibited. In Rome, many of the old nobility adhered to the old system; but the public revenues being withdrawn from its support, the shrines were deserted, and the outward observances gradually disappeared.

In a wide sense, the word has been applied to the religions of India, but improperly. More correctly, it is used to designate the degraded systems which prevail in Africa and in the islands of Oceanica.

PAGODA (pa-go'da). This word is derived from the Persian "poutghad," and signifies the house of an idol. In India the pagoda is generally of three subdivisions: First, an apartment whose ceiling is a dome resting on columns of stone or marble. This part is open to all persons. The second is forbidden to all but Brahmins, and the third contains the statue of the deity enclosed with a massive gate.

PAHATH-MOAB (pa'hath-mo'ab), head of one of the families or houses of Judah which came up with Zerubbabel from Babylon, whose chief was one of those who sealed the covenant along with Nehemiah, and some of the members of which were amongst those who had taken to them strange wives, Ezra ii. 6; Neh. vii. 11.

PAINÉ (pane), ROBERT, D.D., who was a native of North Carolina, was born in 1799. He united with the Methodist Church in early life, and joined the Tennessee Conference in 1819. From 1830 till 1846 he was president of Lagrange College, Alabama, and on his election as bishop he resigned this position to enter on the active duties of the oversight of the Church. He wrote the "Life and Times of Bishop McKendree," in two volumes, and a work on Hopkinsianism. He was known as a distinguished pulpit orator and an admirable administrator in every department of ecclesiastical affairs.

PAINÉ, THOMAS, a noted infidel writer, was born at Thetford, in Norfolk, England, in 1737. After a varied life of exciseman, teacher, grocer and essayist, he came to America in 1775, on the eve of the Revolution, where he engaged chiefly in literary pursuits, and published several political pamphlets. In 1787 he went to England, and in 1791 published, in reply to Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution," his "Rights of Man," for which he was prosecuted and found guilty, but he fled to France, and being elected a deputy for Calais in the convention, voted against the death sentence of the king. He was thrown into prison by Robespierre, and during his imprisonment appeared the first part of "The Age of Reason," a blasphemous, impudent and shallow attack on Christianity. The second and third parts were published in 1796, and consist of a savage and ignorant tirade against the Bible, yet nevertheless starting questions which are still under controversy. The latter part of his life was by no means happy; for although occupied in various mechanical and literary pursuits and possessed of decent competence, his attacks upon religion had narrowed his circle of acquaintance, and his habitual intemperance tended to the injury of his health and the production of a complication of disorders to which he fell a victim in 1809.

PAINTING (paint'ing), with respect especially to the eyes, a very common practice in the East from early times. See EYE.

PALACE (pal'as). The word "palace" is employed by our translators as the rendering of the Greek prætorion, Phil. i. 13, "so that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace and in all other places." The Latin word prætorium originally denoted the headquarters of the prætor or commander-in-chief in a Roman camp; and it was naturally transferred to signify the official residence of the governor of a province, which was frequently the palace of the former kings. In this sense it is used of the former palace of Herod at Cæsarea, which had become the headquarters of Felix, Acts xxiii. 35, and of the place where the Roman procurator Pontius Pilate took up his abode when he visited Jerusalem—either the palace of Herod there or a residence in the castle of Antonia, Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16; John xviii. 28. In these passages the word is rendered in the Authorized Version "judgment-hall" or "common-hall." Later usage occasionally applied the term to any large house or palace, much as the word "castle" has come to be applied among ourselves, and it has accordingly been supposed by many commentators that it denotes in Phil. i. 13 the palace of the emperor on the Palestine Mount.

PALAL (pa'lal), one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 25.

PALANQUIN (pal-an-keen'), the name of a covered chair or vehicle which is used very generally in India and the East as a carriage for travelers. Palanquins are furnished with cushions and made so large that the traveler can recline or even lie recumbent on them, and by means of curtains the glare and heat of the sun can be excluded. They are made of different degrees of lightness, but they are all borne on the shoulders of a number of men.

PALESTINA (pal-es-te'na), or PALESTINE (pal'es-teen), "land of strangers," or "sojourners," a region comprising the southern portion of the coast and plain of Canaan along the Mediterranean, which was hence called "the sea of the Philistines," from Ekron to the border of Egypt. The inhabitants of this district were termed Philistines, and at various times they pushed their conquests and held possession of large portions of the interior. See PHILISTINES. This name was frequently by ancient writers applied to the whole land of Israel, and is also the common modern appellation. See CANAAN, Palestine, at the extremity of Asia, closely connected with Africa, lying on the shores of the Mediterranean, which washed many of the most important states of Europe, not far either from that extended gulf by means of which intercourse could be had with India, it yet was compact and defensible, a kind of citadel from which influence and authority might flow forth, but which, except for one weak point, the lowland near the coast, other nations could not successfully assail. In length it is about one hundred and forty miles, in average breadth not more than forty between the Mediterranean westward and the deep Jordan valley to the east, while to the north it is closed in by Lebanon and Antilibanus, and bordered on the south by the desert.

tending (so to speak) in subordinate eminences through the whole country, but among these mountains are plains and valleys and torrent-beds. And the mountain mass which occupies the central region is bordered on each side east and west by a lowland belt. On the west the plains of Philistia and Sharon lie between the Mediterranean and the hills, interrupted by a ridge which, shooting out from the main highlands, terminates in the bold promontory of Carmel. To the north of this ridge the low plain widens and extends in one part its undulating surface quite across the country to the Jordan. And still farther to the north is Phœnicia, with headlands down to the sea. The eastern depression is much more remarkable than that just noticed on the west. It is a deep cleft in which lies a chain of lakes, connected by the Jordan. And the bottom of this cleft is not only below the mountains and the east-

PALMYRA. See TADMOR.

PALSY (pawl'ze), or PARALYSIS (paral'e-sis), implies a dissolving, namely of the nerves and sinews of the bodily frame, so as to render them incapable of action; but this, in contradistinction from apoplexy, only as affecting particular parts or members of the body. "Sick of the palsy" is the expression usually applied in the Authorized Version to persons under such affections, though "paralytic" and "paralyzed," which are just the Greek terms in an English form, would perhaps have been better. Many laboring under this form of disease were brought to Jesus for healing, Matt. iv. 24; and the sudden recovery to healthful and vigorous action effected by the word of Jesus naturally struck those present as one of the most palpable evidences of supernatural agency. The only feature in the representation given of the cases which appears to conflict with our notions of the disease is that once there is mentioned the accompaniment of severe pain, Matt. viii. 6. But this part of the description may have referred to the convulsions, foamings or heavy breathings under which the patient labored, and which gave the impression of heavy suffering or torment, whether he might himself be conscious of pain or not.

PALTI (pal'ti), the spy from the tribe of Benjamin, Num. xiii. 9.

PALTIEL (pal'te-el), a chief of Issachar selected to superintend the division of Canaan, Num. xxxiv. 26.

PALTITE (pal'tite), the designation—it is unknown whence derived—of one of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 26. He is elsewhere called the Pelonite, 1 Chr. xi. 27.

PAMPHYLIA (pam-fil'e-ah), a maritime province of Asia Minor, having to the south that part of the Mediterranean called the Pamphylian Sea, Acts xxvii. 5, Cilicia to the east, Pisidia to the north; whence we find St. Paul passing through Pisidia to Pamphylia, Acts xiv. 24, and from Pamphylia to Pisidia, Acts xiii. 14. To the west it bordered on Lycia. Pamphylia was a small slip of country lying on the slope of the Taurus, which stretched in a north-westerly direction, and along the heights and in the hollows of which was Pisidia. It was fruitful, well watered and possessed some navigable rivers and considerable towns.

PAMPHYLUS (pam'fi-lus), who lived in the third century, deserves attention because of his connection with the Christian literature of his age. Origen had aimed at collecting the several versions of the Holy Scriptures into one book, and called it the "Hexapla;" but the work proving too extensive, he composed the "Tetrapla," which comprised the Greek versions only, viz., those of Aquilla, Symmachus, Theodotion and the Septuagint. The entire "Hexapla" is lost to us; but the column containing the corrected list of the Septuagint has been transcribed by Eusebius and Pamphylus, and was lately published by Montfaugon. Pamphylus also defended Origen against the charges of Methodius. He was a native of Berytus, studied at Alexandria and settled at Cæsarea, where he founded an extensive library and a theological school, where, it is believed, Eusebius was educated. Pamphylus suffered martyrdom about A. D. 309, during the persecution of Diocletian.

PAN. Several Hebrew words are thus rendered in our version; that which occurs most frequently, from a root which signifies "to cook," probably meant a cooking-pan or frying-pan, Lev. ii. 5; vi. 21; vii. 9; 1 Chr. xxiii. 29. It was sometimes made of iron, Ezek. iv. 3, and was probably a flat, or nearly flat, plate. A derivative of the same root is used, 1 Chr. ix. 31, to denote the things cooked on such an utensil. The "pans" of 2 Chr. xxxv. 13 were pots for boiling. The same original word signifies "ash-pans" which were of copper, Ex. xxvii. 3. Those in Num. xi. 8 were also pots for boiling—saucepans. We have another word in 1 Sam. ii. 14, a basin or fire-pan for cooking. The "pan" of 2 Sam. xiii. 9 was a metal pan, which probably had its name from its being kept bright. The "fire-pans," Ex. xxvii. 3, from a root implying to take up, were fire-shovels in which coals were taken up or incense kindled. The "frying-pan," Lev. ii. 7; vii. 9, was a kettle or pot for boiling.

PAN, the chief rural divinity of the Greeks who presided over flocks and herds. He was said to have been the son of Mercury. He was represented with the head and shoulders of an elderly man, but he had horns on his forehead, and his lower extremities were like the hind-quarters of a goat. The name is probably derived from pain, to "feed" or "tend flocks;" and it is believed that Pan was a symbol of Nature feeding all who were dependent on the nourishment of the earth. It was held that Pan appeared and blamed the Greeks for neglecting him who had been so good to them; whereupon, after the defeat of the Persians, a temple was built to his honor below the Acropolis, at Athens.

PANDECTS (pan'dekts), the name by which the great compilation of Roman law published by the emperor Justinian has been known. The word is derived from two Greek terms which signify "to receive all," meaning that the contents of scattered enactments have all been gathered up, arranged and condensed in the systematic form which was prepared by Justinian after three years' careful labor. The code appeared in A. D. 529.

PANDORA (pan-do'ra), which literally means "the all-gifted," was the name in Grecian mythology given to the first mortal female, according to Hesiod, that ever lived. She was formed of clay by Vulcan, at the request of Jupiter, and was created to punish Prometheus for his numerous impieties. All the gods made her presents; thus from Venus she got beauty; from the Graces, the power of pleasing; Mercury taught her eloquence; Minerva wisdom; but Jupiter gave her a box filled with all the evils, which she was to give to the man who married her. Prometheus detected the plan and rejected her, but his brother Epimetheus fell a victim to her charms; and when the box was opened, all the evils flowed forth which have ever since afflicted mankind. Hope alone remained at the bottom of the box as the only consolation for trouble and distress.

PANELING (pan'el-ing). Among the ancients great attention was paid to the manner in which ceilings and walls were ornamented by minute subdivisions, which exhibited great skill and accuracy in detail. In modern Egypt the walls of houses are usually plastered and whitewashed, but cupboards and recesses are frequently introduced and elaborately paneled. Owing to the heat and dryness of the climate, the wood of the panels is made of small pieces to avoid shrinkage, and the arrangement is managed to produce a fanciful effect. The illustration on page 1295 will explain the style.

PANNAG (pan'nag). Judah and the land of Israel are represented, Ezek. xxvii. 17, as conveying to Tyre as articles of commerce "wheat of Minnith, and pannag, and oil, and honey, and balm." According to the Septuagint, it was cassia, the Vulgate translates it balsam, the Syrian version millet and the Targum "sweet cakes." In the utter uncertainty as to its meaning the Authorized Version has been content to retain the Hebrew word, of which even the etymology is entirely conjectural.

PANTÆNUS (pan-te'nus) was the celebrated president of the catechetical school at Alexandria under Julianus, at the close of the second century. He had been thoroughly educated in the Stoic philosophy before he embraced Christianity. He has been considered to have been a Sicilian, an Athenian and a Jew, but his origin is not known. Clement mentions him honorably in his "Stromata." Tradition bears that he was sent to Ethiopia (India), and that he found the Gospel of Matthew in Hebrew among the people, which Bartholomew the apostle had given them. Jerome says that Pantænus wrote some commentaries on the Scriptures, but he also says that he was more powerful as a speaker than as a writer. Alexander, the bishop of Jerusalem, also highly commends him.

PANTALEON (pan-ta'le-on), a Christian martyr under Galerius, was a native of Nicomedia. His father, from whom he received his education, was a pagan; his mother, a Christian. Having applied himself to the study of medicine, he became eminent in his profession, and was appointed physician to the emperor Galerius. He was one of the most benevolent of men and successful of practitioners. His reputation roused the jealousy of the pagan physicians, who accused him to the emperor. Galerius, finding him a Christian, ordered him to be tortured and then beheaded, which was done, A. D. 305.

PANTHEISM (pan'the-izm). This word is derived from two Greek terms, pan, "all," and theos, "God." In metaphysical theology pantheism identifies nature, or the "to pan," the universe in its totality, with God. This doctrine differs from Atheism in the greater distinctness with which it asserts the unity and essential vitality of nature, parts of which all animated beings are. In this sense the ancient Greeks were pantheists, Anaxagoras being the first who distinctly enunciated the doctrine of the coexistence with nature of a reasonable creator—"a mind, the principle of all things." In this sense Spinoza, in more modern times, was a pantheist. The pantheism of Schelling and other modern Germans is of a different type, as these writers conceive of God as the absolute and original Being, revealing himself variously in outward nature and in human intelligence and freedom. Some have attempted to identify this view with that of Paul when he says of God that "in him we live and move and have our being." It is quite obvious that Paul everywhere distinguished between God and the creature, the Creator and the things created. The world is formed and sustained by God, but his separate and independent subsistence are clearly stated. God may exist without the world, but the world is inconceivable without God, as he is the Author of all phenomenal existences, and of all the laws under which they exist, as a law always involves the existence of a lawgiver.

PANTHEON (pan'the-on), a temple dedicated to all the gods. The word is made up of two Greek words, pan, "all," and theos, "god." There were two celebrated structures in antiquity thus called, one at Athens and one at Rome. The latter, which still exists, though comparatively in decay, is one of the most splendid remains of ancient magnificence. It was founded by Agrippa, the son-in-law of Augustus, and it now forms a Christian church dedicated to the Virgin Mary and all the saints, and is usually called the Rotunda from its form, which is circular. Its roof is a semicircular dome of one hundred and forty-four feet in diameter, the height to the top of the dome being exactly the same. It has a noble Corinthian portico of sixteen columns. Pliny held that this temple was one of the wonders of the world. It suffered greatly during the lapse of ages. Boniface IV., in A. D. 610, obtained by gift the Pantheon at Rome, and consecrated it to the honor of Mary and all the martyrs, as it had formerly been sacred to Cybele and all the gods. The Feast of the Martyrs was originally celebrated on May 12th, but Gregory IV., in A. D. 834, transferred it to the 1st of November because provisions can then be had more easily, and called it the Feast of All Saints.

The term pantheon has been applied to places of amusement in a loose and general sense; and it is also used to describe a work which contains a view of the mythology or a description of all the gods of the ancients.

PAPA (pah'pa). This word means "father." Originally it was the common title of all bishops, who were called fathers of the Church and fathers of the clergy. The name was also given to some of the inferior clergy, who were called papæ pissini, "little fathers." Gregory VII. restricted the title to the bishop of Rome alone. The Greek Church continues to give this title to its parish priests.

PAPELLARDS (pap'el-lardz), a name given in the thirteenth century to the party which uncompromisingly supported the papacy. It was applied chiefly to the begging friars and their adherents, and especially to their affectation of poverty and their arrogant pretence of humility.

EGYPTIAN PANEL-WORK.—See PANELING.

William of St. Amour (A. D. 1255) uses it not only with reference to the mendicant friars, but also to "those young men and maidens itinerating about in France, who, under pretence of living only for prayer, had really no other object in view than to get rid of work and live on the alms of the pious." When Louis IX. was almost persuaded by the Dominicans to enter their order, he was nicknamed "Rex Papellardus." The name was also given to the Beguins.

PAPHNUTIUS (paf-noo'sh'us), an Egyptian ascetic and confessor who took an earnest part in the controversies which prevailed in the Church in connection with the spread of clerical celibacy.

As soon as it was generally believed that those who led a single life were more pious than husbands and fathers, the higher orders of ecclesiastics were deterred from matrimony. The monastic system soon began to control public opinion, and at the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, a proposal was made that the married clergy should be separated from their wives. Paphnutius successfully resisted this overture, but it was ruled that bishops, presbyters and deacons, after ordination, should not be at liberty to enter into wedlock.

PAPHOS (paf'os), a city of Cyprus, at the western extremity of the island, and the seat of the Roman governor. That officer, when Paul visited the place, was named Sergius Paulus, who was converted through the preaching of the apostle and the miracle performed on Elymas, Acts xiii. 6-11. Paphos was celebrated for a temple of Venus, whose infamous rites were still practiced here four hundred years afterward, notwithstanding the success of Paul, Barnabas and others in preaching the gospel. Paphos is now a poor and inconsiderable place, but gives its name to a Greek bishopric.

PAPIAS (pa'pe-as), bishop of Hierapolis, a city of Phrygia, near Laodicea, was, according to Irenæus, the disciple of St. John the Evangelist. He wrote five books, entitled "The Expositions of the Discourses of the Lord," of which there are only some fragments left in the writings of Irenæus and Eusebius. He made way for the opinion which several of the ancients held respecting the millennium, or temporal reign of Christ, who, they supposed, would come upon earth a thousand years before the day of judgment, to gather together the elect, after the resurrection, into the city of Jerusalem, where they should enjoy all felicity during that period.

PAPIST (pa'pist), a word in common use to designate a member of the Romish Church. It has a shade of meaning somewhat different from the term "Romanist," indicating a more thorough subjection of the mind to the doctrines of the Church, which ascribe full authority to the Roman pontiff to exercise authority in matters of faith and civil affairs.

PAPYLUS (pap'i-lus) was a Christian martyr of the second century. The celebrated Polycarp suffered during the year 169; and in the severe persecution of the period twelve of the church at Philadelphia, and many in Pergamos, were faithful unto death. Among those who suffered at Pergamos were Carpus, Papyrus and a woman named Agathonice; and it is recorded that a man named Quintus, a Phrygian, recanted. These martyrdoms usually took place at the public games and other heathen shows.

PAPYRI (pa-pi're) is the name given to the written scrolls made of the papyrus which have been found in different places, but chiefly in Egypt and Herculaneum. The sheets of the papyri were made of the interior of the plant cut into thin slices and put at right angles over each other. They were then glued and firmly pressed, and thus they served as paper. Much interest was excited some years since by the discovery at Herculaneum of a large quantity of papyri, but they contained nothstructure connected with the gates on the western side of the temple court. Gesenius supposes that it was an open porch which adjoined the temple. Probably there were at the western gates of the temple some open porches or chambers for the accommodation of guards or servants, and to these was given the name Parbar.

PARCHED GROUND. The word thus rendered, Isa. xxxv. 7, refers to a phenomenon frequent in the deserts of Arabia, Egypt, India and Persia which is usually known by the name mirage.

PARIS (par'is), MATTHEW, an early English historian, was a monk of St. Alban's, and flourished from 1245 to 1259. He made a journey to Norway by command of the pope to introduce some reforms into the monastic establishments of that country. He stood high in the favor of PARK, CALVIN, D.D., was born in 1774, at Northbridge, Massachusetts, and educated at Brown University. He studied theology at Worcester, under Samuel Austin, D.D., and entered on a course of teaching in which he became greatly distinguished. His life-work, however, was in the chair of languages, and afterward of intellectual and moral philosophy, in Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island. He died at Stoughton, in 1847, at the age of seventy-two years, having borne the reputation of a vastly learned, accurate and useful professor, as well as a pious, godly man. He published little, as his life was devoted to earnest practical work.

PARKER (park'er), MATTHEW, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich, in 1504, was educated at Cambridge and entered the Church. He adopted the views of the Reformers; became chaplain to Anne Boleyn and dean of the college of Stoke Clare; after the death of Queen involved him in great difficulties. He held on to his post, and after the close of the war, he devoted great pains to rebuild the scattered churches of his communion. In 1803 he succeeded Bishop Bass as bishop of the eastern diocese, and shortly after his consecration at New York, in 1804, he was prostrated by gout, of which disease he died on the 6th of December of the same year. He was an earnest, laborious man, greatly respected, and acknowledged by all who knew him to have been earnest and faithful in the work of the Lord.

PARKER, THEODORE, was born in 1812, at Lexington, Massachusetts. He studied at Cambridge, and became pastor of the Second Unitarian Church at Roxbury. In 1841 his advanced views in religion gave offence to his friends, whereupon he went to Europe, where he remained for some time. On his return he involved two of his brethren in difficulties because of the sentiments which he proclaimed in their pulpits. He then established an independent service at the Melodeon, in Boston, and afterward in the Music Hall, where he enunciated his opinions to crowded audiences. His lectures and sermons were published from time to time as they were prepared, and they are exceedingly numerous, and in the London edition they amount to twelve volumes. On slavery he was exceedingly decided. In his view of Christianity he eliminated every element of the supernatural, and he aimed at merely setting forth a clear ethical system. In 1859 his health failed. He went to the West Indies; thence to Switzerland, to Rome and to Florence, where he died May 10, 1860. His library, which consisted of about thirteen thousand volumes, he bequeathed to the Boston Library. No man has ever lived in this country who has shown more boldness and power than he displayed in assailing evangelical religion and in attacking every creed which acknowledged a supernatural element as essential to its system.

PARKER, THOMAS, was born in 1595 and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He removed to Dublin, and studied under the celebrated Dr. Usher, and thence he went to Leyden. He returned to England, and settled at Newbury, in Berkshire, where he preached and taught a school. He came to New England in 1634, and acted as assistant at Ipswich to Mr. Ward, and next year he became pastor of Newbury, where he remained during the remainder of his life. So thoroughly had he mastered Latin, Greek and Hebrew that, though blind for many years before his death, he was able to teach them with ease. It is reported of him that when certain ministers objected in English to his views he replied in Latin; if they answered, he then spoke in Greek; if they still replied, he used Hebrew; and if they again rejoined, he took refuge in Arabic, where they were unable to follow him.

PARKHURST, JOHN, was born in 1723, at Catesby, in Northamptonshire, and educated at Rugby School and Clare Hall College, Cambridge. He was the author of a Hebrew lexicon, which was greatly celebrated in its day, but it has given place to more modern works. His lexicon of the New Testament, though much valued, has also become obsolete. He wrote on the "Pre-existence and the Divinity of Christ." He died in 1797.

Henry III., and obtained various privileges for the university of Oxford through his influence with that king. He was employed to visit the monasteries and revive their decayed discipline, and he freely censured what was wrong in all orders of people. His principal work is his "History Major," a valuable work which displays great freedom in exposing the usurpations of the Roman see.

PARISH (par'ish), a parish is that circuit of ground which is committed to the charge of one parson or vicar or other minister having cure of souls therein. It differs from the term congregation, which means the people who assemble stately in a particular place of worship whether they reside in one, two or more parishes. There is a loose usage of this word in the United States, in which the members of a congregation are called a parish, as if they were actually limited to a territorial district. In England parishes are mentioned as early as the time of King Edgar, in 970, when the whole kingdom seems to have been divided. Towns originally contained but one parish, but they are now divided as their size may require.

Anne was named chaplain to the king, and returning to Cambridge, was appointed master of Corpus Christi College in 1544. As a married clergyman he was deprived by Queen Mary, and lived during her reign in studious retirement. Queen Elizabeth, the year after her accession, appointed him archbishop of Canterbury. He filled this office with much dignity, and by his wisdom and moderation contributed to the orderly establishment of the Reformed Church. The "Bishops' Bible" was prepared under his direction, and he published editions of several early English historians. He died May 17, 1575.

PARKER, SAMUEL, D.D., was born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in 1744. He graduated at Harvard in 1764; and having studied theology, he became dissatisfied with his early ecclesiastical connection, and entered the Episcopal Church. He became assistant minister in Trinity Church, Boston, in 1773. In England he was ordained by the bishop of London, and on his return to Boston he entered fully on his work, but the troubles of the Revolution tarian minister of that city. He graduated at Harvard and studied theology at Edinburgh and under Dr. Channing. In 1813 he became pastor of the new North Church in Boston, and he held this place until 1849. When difference of opinion separated the Congregational body in New England, he adhered to the Unitarian side, and his numerous writings were all devoted to the support of Unitarian views. The Parkman professorship of pulpit eloquence and pastoral care in the Cambridge theological school, was founded by his munificence. He died in Boston in 1852.

PARLOR. See HALL.

PARMENAS (par-me'nas), one of the seven deacons selected to administer the secular business of the Church, Acts vi. 5.

PARMENIAN (par-me'ne-an), PARMENIANISTS (par-me'ne-an-ists). Parmenian was the immediate successor of Donatus the Great, and was thus the third Donatist bishop of Carthage. He was the contemporary of Optatus, who wrote against him. After his death Augustine wrote a work in three books in reply to one of his publications. The title Parmenianists was a name given to the Donatists because of the influence of their leader Parmenian. See DONATUS.

PARNACH (par'nak), the father of a chief of Zebulun, Num. xxxiv. 25.

PARNASSUS (par-nas'sus), in mythology, a celebrated mountain in ancient Greece sacred to Apollo and the Muses, and from the numerous objects of classical interest of which it formed the theatre, it was considered "holy" by the Greeks. On its side stood the city of Delphi, near which flowed the Castalian spring, the grand source of ancient inspiration; and from this circumstance, in metaphorical language, the word Parnassus has come to signify poetry itself.

PAROSH (pa'rosh). No person of this name occurs in the early history of the covenant people, but of the families that returned from Babylon no fewer than two thousand one hundred and seventy-two are called children of Parosh, Ezra ii. 3; Neh. vii. 8. These were among the first company who returned, and still more of them at a later period joined the party of Ezra, ch. viii. 3.

PARRIS (par'ris), SAMUEL, was born in London in 1653. He emigrated to America and studied at Harvard, where he did not graduate. Three years after his settlement at Danvers the delusion of the Salem witchcraft originated in his family in 1692. His daughter and niece accused an Indian woman living in the family of witchcraft, and he beat her until she acknowledged her guilt. The delusion spread, and more than one hundred women were caught and imprisoned, the wife of Governor Phipps being among the number. This frenzy lasted sixteen months, during which nineteen persons were hung, and one was pressed to death for refusing to plead. Charges were brought against Parris, and in 1696 he was dismissed and left the place.

PARRY (par're), HENRY, D.D., who became chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, was educated at Oxford, where he became a Fellow in Corpus Christi College, a house which has always been celebrated for the learned men who have risen to enjoy its honors. He was made bishop of Rochester, whence he was removed to Gloucester in the year 1607, and finally to Worcester. James I. said of him "that he had never heard a better or more eloquent preacher." He was famed for his benevolence to the poor.

PARSEES (par'seez), the name given to the adherents of the ancient religion of Media and Persia, founded probably not later than 1000 B. C., by the Bactrian, Zarath-rustra Spitama, or Zoroaster. The Parsees have declined in number, at the present time numbering only about one hundred and fifty thousand persons. They are now found in the town of Yezd and the surrounding villages, in the north of Persia, but chiefly in Bombay and the neighborhood, in Gujerat and elsewhere in Hindostan. Of late years many of them have settled for the purposes of trade in Calcutta, in China and in Great Britain, owing to their experience of the safety which they have enjoyed in the East under British rule. The name "Parsees" signifies "inhabitants of Fars," or Persia. Other names by which they are known are, "Zoroastrians," from their founder; "Magians," properly the name of another religion incorporated with that of Zoroaster; "Ghebers," or "Guebers," applied in contempt by the Mohammedans to the small remnant in Persia.

The Parsee religion arose out of a schism from, and a revolt against, the primitive Aryan worship of nature-powers, known to us from the earliest portions of the Vedas. The doctrines of the Parsee religion are contained in the remains of the sacred books called the Zend-Avesta, or, more properly, Avesta-Zend. They consist of a text and a commentary equally sacred as the text, written in the language called Zend, a sister language to the Sanscrit, and, like it, now a dead language. Only a small portion of the Zend-Avesta now remains. A part, consisting of songs in metre, is the most ancient, and is plausibly attributed to the founder himself or his immediate followers. The modern Parsees also use other works, mostly of post-Christian date, though they are not canonical, and they receive the doctrines and observe the ritual and practices which are enjoined by these books.

The religion of Zoroaster, so far as it can be gathered from the earliest books, was a pure Monotheism. The supreme deity was invested with all sublime attributes except fatherhood. He was the creator and lord of the entire universe, and of earthly and spiritual life. He is to be served by purity, truth, goodness—by prayers and offerings. No images of him are allowed. The existence of evil was accounted for by the supposition of two primeval causes which, though opposed to each other, were united in every existing being, even in the highest object of adoration, Ahura Mazdas himself. The two eternal principles are regarded as coequal and coeternal in the past; neither is absolutely victorious as yet; their strife extends through all creation; everything existing is ranged on one side or the other, for nothing can be neutral. Man was created in holiness, but through the temptation of the Devs or evil spirits, the agents of Ahriman, the principle which opposes Ormuzd, or the good, he fell, and became exposed to sin and evil. Every man is called on to decide whether he will serve Ormuzd, the good, or Ahriman, the evil, and as he chooses and acts he is rewarded or punished. There is no recognition of the doctrine of atonement, but the morality of Zoroastrianism is simple, pure and practical. Luminous bodies, such as the sun, moon, planets and fire, are revered as symbols of Ormuzd. In the temples, altars are fed by sacred fire ever kept burning, toward which worshipers turn, and which are regarded with reverence. It is disputed whether this reverence of the elements belonged to the religion of Zoroaster, or whether it was a later addition from the Turanian elemental worship of the mountain regions of Armenia, some holding that Zoroaster was a "fire priest," and others decidedly rejecting this view. The modern Parsees are very exclusive: they will eat no food cooked by a person of another religion; they marry only among themselves, and polygamy is forbidden. The religious Jews among the ancients were more inclined to Parseeism than to the other systems with which they were brought into contact, owing to the monotheism of the system.

PARSISM (pars'izum), a system which prevailed among the Asiatic Gnostics, in which two eternal and essential principles were recognized, the good and the evil; the demi-urgos (see DEMI-URGE, GNOSTIC), they considered as the opponent of the Supreme Being. Among the Alexandrian Gnostics the Platonic philosophy predominated; they held that the Demi-urge was a willing and obedient instrument of the Supreme Being, and that the visible was an image of the invisible. The chief Gnostic heretics were—Syrian, Saturninus, Bardesanes, Tatian. Asiatic, Simon Magus, Marcion, Lucian, Cerdo, Apelles, Menander. Alexandrian, Basilides, Carpocrates, Valentinus.

cause in his person the church which he occupies is represented. He has the freehold of the parsonage-house, the glebe, the tithes and other dues. Four requisites are necessary to constitute a parson—holy orders, presentation, institution and induction. In vulgar language a parson is a clergyman of any kind.

PARSONS (par'suns), DAVID, D.D., was born at Amherst in 1749, and graduated at Harvard in 1771. He was induced to become successor to his father in his native place in 1782, and in 1795 he declined the chair of theology in Yale College, to which he was elected, and he preferred using his spare hours to the instruction of students in a private manner. He resigned his charge in 1819, and died in 1823, having laboriously and successfully served the Head of the Church in a long and faithful pastorate.

PARSONS, LEVI, was born in 1792. He graduated in 1814 at Middlebury College, and in 1819 he sailed as a missionary to Palestine. He arrived at Smyrna in 1820, went thence to Jerusalem, and returned to Smyrna. Suffering with disease, he proceeded to Alexandria, where he died on the 10th day of February, 1822.

PARTHENON (par'the-non). See ATHENS.

PARTHIA (par'the-ah), the country of the Parthians, mentioned in Acts ii. 9 as being, with their neighbors the Medes and Elamites, present at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. The persons referred to were Jews from Parthia, and the passage is a strong evidence showing how widely spread were members of the Hebrew family in the first century of our era. The term originally referred to a small mountainous district lying to the north-east of Media. Afterward it came to be applied to the great Parthian kingdom into which this province expanded. Parthia Proper, or ancient Parthia, formed a part of the great Persian monarchy, but finally extended itself, in the early days of Christianity, over all the provinces of what had been the Persian kingdom, having the Euphrates for its western boundary.

PARTICULARISTS (par-tik'u-lar-ists). This name has been given to those theologians who have held the doctrine of God's particular decrees of salvation and reprobation. As a party name, it dates from the time of the Synod of Dort.

PARTRIDGE (part'rij). The original word for the bird so called implies "the crier;" and evidently the family of the grouse and the partridge is intended. These birds abound in Palestine, and the dangers to which they are exposed are set forth in Jer. xvii. 11. The red-legged partridge is also common, and the Arabs catch them in great numbers by means of a piece of canvas stretched over two reeds or sticks, 1 Sam. xxvi. 20. The partridge is partial to upland brushwood.

PARUAH (pa-ru'ah), the father of one of Solomon's officers, 1 Ki. iv. 17.

PARVAIM (par-va'im), the name of a gold-bearing region, 2 Chr. iii. 6. Of gold so denominated, however, we nowhere else read; and as the gold provided by Solomon for the house of God and his own dwellings is elsewhere said to have been chiefly derived from Ophir, Parvaim has very commonly been understood to be another name for gold of the same description.

PASACH (pa'sak), an Asherite chief, 1 Chr. vii. 33.

PASAGIANS (pa-sa'ge-anz), a sect of Judaizing Catharists which appeared in Lombardy late in the twelfth or early in the thirteenth century, and which probably originated in the East, the name being given from their wandering habits. They observed the law of Moses, except as to sacrifice, holding to circumcision, the Sabbath and the distinctions of clean and unclean food; hence they were called Cathari. They only admitted that Christ was the highest of created beings, and that he was a kind of demi-urge by whose work all other creatures were brought into being.

PASCAL (pas'kal), BLAISE, a very distinguished French mathematician and philosopher, was born at Clermont, in Auvergne, in 1623. From his infancy he showed marks of extraordinary capacity, and attained considerable celebrity in mathematical pursuits, only equaled by the wide reputation of his scientific sagacity. When he was in his twenty-fourth year, he all at once renounced the study of mathematics and natural philosophy, as well as all human learning, and devoted himself wholly to a life of religious meditation, mortification and prayer. Yet, however abstracted from the world, he could not be entirely indifferent to all that was passing in it, and especially interested himself in the contests between the Jesuits and Jansenists. Taking the side of the latter, he wrote his celebrated "Provincial Letters," which attack upon the detestable casuistry of some of the most distinguished leaders of that dangerous body has, in the estimation of Voltaire, rendered him the first of French satirists. Of all the books published against the Jesuits, none did them more injury or inflicted greater mortification than these celebrated letters. Pascal was only thirty years of age when he produced this celebrated work, yet he had become exceedingly infirm; and conceiving his end to be approaching, he redoubled his austerities and mortifications until he became afflicted with the most melancholy hypochondria, and after languishing in a state of nervous imbecility for some years, he died at Paris, August 19, 1662. Toward the close of his life he occupied himself wholly in pious and moral reflections, which he wrote down on slips of paper as they occurred to him. After his death these pieces of paper were found filed on different pieces of string, without any order or connection; and being exactly copied as they were written, they were afterward arranged and published under the title of "Thoughts of Pascal on Religion and other Subjects."

PASCHAL, the name of a line of popes: I., a Roman by birth, succeeded Stephen IV. in 817. He quarreled with the emperor Louis the Pious, of France, and his son Lotharius, about the imperial right to approve the election of the Roman pontiff, but was compelled to submit to their power and the influence of the French party in Rome. He died in 824. II., a Tuscan by birth, succeeded Urban II. in 1099. This pontificate is chiefly memorable through the concessions of the pope to Henry I. of England in the contest with Anselm of Canterbury and his weak policy with Henry V. of Germany concerning the right of investiture. The convention he made on the matter with that monarch was annulled by the Lateran Synod of 1112. He died in 1118. III. (antipope) was set up against the pontiff Alexander III., in 1165, by Frederick I. of Germany, at the time of the war between the Lombard League and himself. He died in 1168.

PASCHAL CONTROVERSY. Very early in the Church a dispute arose between the churches of the East and the West respecting the day on which our Lord's death and resurrection should be observed. The Asiatic churches alleged that they followed a rule laid down by St. John and St. Philip, while the Church of Rome pleaded the authority of St. Peter and St. Paul. The Eastern custom was to observe the day of the year which answered to the fourteenth day of the Jewish month Nisan for the death of our Lord, and the resurrection on the third day after, or the sixteenth of Nisan, without any regard to the day of the week on which these days fell. See QUARTODECIMANS. The Western custom was to keep as Easter Day the Sunday following the fourteenth day of Nisan, and to commemorate the death of our Lord on the preceding Friday.

This question was long debated with great earnestness, and the Churches which were derived from Eastern influences, such as the Irish Church, held to the Eastern usage with great tenacity. The matter was referred to the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, and the bishops there assembled ruled that Easter day should always be observed on a Sunday, and the Council fixed on the Sunday which follows the vernal equinox, and the church of Alexandria was directed to give good notice every year what Sunday that would be on the year following. Uniform accuracy was not obtained, however, for many years; and in England, the use of one cycle in the north and west, because of the influence of Iona and the Irish Church, and of another cycle in the south and south-east, because of the Roman influence, caused Easter to be kept on different days so late even as the year 664, when a uniform custom—that of the Roman—was established by the synod of Whitby.

PASCHASIUS (pas-ka'zh'us), RADBERT, a celebrated French monk in the ninth century, to whose writings Protestant controversialists trace the origin of the doctrine of transubstantiation, was a native of Soissons, and embraced the monastic life among the Benedictines of the abbey of Corbie, of which he was elected abbot in 844. He, however, resigned his dignity and returned to the condition of a simple monk, spending the remainder of his life in the exercises of the cloister, close study and the composition of various works. He died in 865. He wrote a treatise "Concerning the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ." In this work he pretended to explain with precision the doctrine of the Church on this head, maintaining that after the consecration of the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, nothing remained of those symbols but the outward figure, under which the body and blood of Christ were really and locally present.

PASDAMMIM (pas-dam'mim), the same place which is elsewhere called EPHES-DAMMIM, which see.

PASEAH (pa-se'ah). 1. One of Judah's posterity, 1 Chr. iv. 12. 2. One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 49; in Neh. vii. 51 called Phaseah. 3. The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 6. Perhaps the reference is to No. 2.

PASHT (pasht), the Egyptian Diana, worshipped with great expense and ceremony at Bubastis, as Isis, the Egyptian Ceres, was honored at Busiris. The worshipers went by water in great numbers, accompanied by music, and on reaching Bubastis, a great number of victims was sacrificed and an enormous quantity of wine was drunk. As many as seven hundred thousand persons, not including children, are said to have attended these festivals; but this is probably an exaggeration, although the population of ancient Egypt was very great and the gods were served with great honor.

PASHUR (pash'ur), a priest and chief overseer of the temple who smote Jeremiah and put him in the stocks for his prophecies of captivity and ruin; on which the prophet was commissioned to declare that he should be one of those to go into exile, and that he and all his friends should die in Babylon and be buried there, Jer. xx. i. 6. 2. A high officer of King Zedekiah, and one of those at whose instance Jeremiah was cast into prison, Jer.

xxi. 1; xxxviii. 1-6. A descendant of his is mentioned among the new colonists of Jerusalem after the captivity, Neh. xi. 12.

PASSALORYNCHITES (pas-sa-lo-rink'-iteś), a branch of the MONTANISTS (which see), who held it necessary to observe a perpetual silence, wherefore they are said (no doubt in ridicule) to have kept their finger constantly upon their mouth, and dared not open it even to say their prayers; and from this circumstance arose the denomination, the name of which, according to Broughton, is derived from passalos, a nail, and rin, the nostril, which looks as if they put their finger (or finger-nail perhaps) to their nose rather than mouth. It seems, however, that they were a prudent, cautious sect, more ready to hear than to speak.

PASSENGERS, THE VALLEY OF THE, a place where the multitude of Gog were to be buried, Ezek. xxxix. 11, so called in reference to its position, which was on the east of the Dead Sea, on the usual route to Petra and Ezion-geber. See HAMON-GOG.

PASSION (pas'shun), in one place, Acts i. 3, the sufferings and death of Christ; elsewhere, James v. 17, human feelings or nature.

PATEN.—See article.

PASSIONS (pas'shunz). In mental philosophy, a common classification of mental states has arranged the feelings and powers under two heads: the intellectual and active, the former including sensation, perception, memory, judgment, association, etc., while the active powers include the various emotions, such as veneration, joy, compassion, pity, love, fear, hatred, scorn, anger and the like. In all treatises on moral philosophy, the discussion of the passions, or the active powers, forms one of the most important departments of study; because of the practical results which flow in all classes of society from the exercise of these powers. An analysis of these powers is to the philosopher what anatomy is to the surgeon, and it is obvious, that while the knowledge which is gained by the study of the intellectual faculties which we possess, must be comparatively useless, if that study do not form the basis for an accurate investigation into the nature and the activities of those feelings, emotions, desires and aversions which prompt to the actions of our daily life.

PASSIVE (pass'iv) OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST. Among the theologians, the work of Christ as our Saviour has been viewed in two aspects. He obeyed all the injunctions of the moral law. The law said "do," and he did, or actively obeyed all its precepts and commandments. But men whom he came to save were exposed to the wrath, the condemnation and the penalty of the law which they had broken, and he bore this penalty. He was "stricken, smitten and afflicted;" he died, "the just for the unjust," and this has been called his "passive obedience."

PASSIVE PRAYER, among the Mystic divines, is a total suspension or ligature of the intellectual faculties, in virtue whereof the soul remains of itself, and as to its own power, impotent with regard to the producing of any effects. The passive state, according to Fénelon, is only passive in the same sense as contemplation—i. e., it does not exclude peaceable, disinterested acts, but only unquiet ones, or such as tend to our own interest. In the passive state the soul has not properly any activity, any sensation of its own. It is a mere flexibility of the soul, to which the feeblest impulse of grace gives motion. See MYSTIC and QUIETISM.

PASSOVER (pass'o-ver), one of the chief yearly festivals of the Israelites. Its name expresses the great deliverance when at its first institution the Lord passed through the land of Egypt to destroy their first-born and passed over the houses in which his own people dwelt.

This was the last plague, and it forced the oppressors to let go their captives. The event was, therefore, to be commemorated for ever, and the month in which it occurred to be the first of the Hebrew year. The directions given for the observance of the passover will be found in Ex. xii. 1-28, 48-51, and need not be detailed here. The Israelites obeyed these directions, and at midnight the loud wail echoed through every Egyptian habitation, for the first-born in each family was dead. Then was Israel thrust out in haste; and the passover was ever after to be observed, a season of holy gladness.

In the post-exodus legislation on this festival several enactments were introduced at different times which both supplement and modify the original institution. For these the reader is referred to Ex. xiii. 4-10; Lev. xxiii. 5-14; Num. xxviii. 16-25; Deut. xvi. 1-8, 16.

Very many particulars in regard to the celebration of the paschal feast are enumerated by the Talmudists; some of the principal alone can be noticed here. The priests were arranged in two rows in the court of the temple, provided with basins of silver and of gold. The people were admitted in three divisions; and as each killed his lamb the blood was received into a basin, which was passed up to the priest nearest the altar, who cast the blood thereon. The lamb was then prepared for roasting, while the Hallel, or psalms of praise, were sung, the fat being burnt with incense that evening on the altar. A skewer or spit of pomegranate wood was thrust through the lamb when taken away for roasting, or, according to some authorities, two skewers crossed. The oven used was of earthenware, and care was taken that the lamb did not touch its sides. The unleavened bread was usually of wheat-flour, made quickly, that no fermentation might begin; the houses, the evening before the fourteenth of Nisan, were carefully searched for any piece of leavened bread which might remain, and all that was found was burned by the sixth hour of that day. Endive, chicory, wild lettuce, etc., were used as the bitter herbs; and a kind of sauce was made of vinegar and water, or, as some say, vinegar, dates, figs, almonds and spice, beaten into the consistency of mustard, to represent the clay in which their ancestors were made to work; this was eaten with number; they might be more, twenty, even one hundred—as many as the lamb would supply with a piece as large as an olive. A cup of wine was first mixed with water, over which the master of the household or the person who presided pronounced a thanksgiving for the day and for the wine, which was then drunk. All next washed their hands, another benediction being pronounced. The different dishes of the feast, the lamb, the unleavened bread, the bitter herbs and the thick sauce were next placed on the table; and the president first, and afterward the rest of the company, dipped some of the bitter herbs in this sauce and ate them. Then the dishes were removed, in order that the children might inquire the reason of such a festival, and a second cup of wine was drunk; and the dishes being replaced, the import of them was explained and a thanksgiving uttered, followed by Ps. cxiii., cxiv. The hands were again washed, with a brief prayer, and then the president broke a cake of unleavened bread, which he blessed, and all partook of it, dipping the portions with the bitter herbs into the sauce. Then the lamb was eaten, and another blessing pronounced, when the third cup, or cup of blessing, was handed round. This was succeeded by the fourth, termed the cup of Hallel or song, because Ps. cxv.—cxviii. (the rest of the Hallel) were recited with a prayer. A fifth cup of wine might be introduced, provided that was called the Greater Hallel, Ps. cxx.—cxxxvii., were sung over it. So the celebration concluded. We may believe, from many expressions used in the Gospels when describing the Last Supper, that this substantially was the mode of celebration in our Lord's time.

Besides the offering of the first-fruits of harvest, there were other certain voluntary peace-offerings, which seem to have accompanied all the festivals, Num. x. 10; these followed the general rule given in Lev. iii. 1-5; vii. 16-18, 29-34. At the passover, too, a criminal was released, Matt. xxvii. 15; Luke xxiii. 17, it is uncertain whether by Roman courtesy or by ancient Israelitish custom.

The symbolical and typical meaning of this rite is full of interest. It was instituted, as we have seen, at the deliverance from the bondage of Egypt, and the sprinkling of the blood of the lamb was a sign and an assurance of the preservation of the Hebrew first-born, while those of their oppressors were cut off. And many attendant cir-

the lamb and the other viands. There were also to be not fewer than four cups of wine; it was red, and was drunk mixed with water. Such were the materials of which the Paschal feast was composed.

The order of partaking it is thus described. The company, who had not eaten since mid-day, assembled in the evening and took their places on couches. They were usually not under ten in removed, in order that the children might inquire the reason of such a festival, and a second cup of wine was drunk; and the dishes being replaced, the import of them was explained and a thanksgiving uttered, followed by Ps. cxiii., cxiv. The hands were again washed, with a brief prayer, and then the president broke a cake of unleavened bread, which he blessed, and all partook of it, cumstances, as the hard bondage and the haste of the departure, were signified. The celebration was, therefore, a standing memorial of the Lord's mercy and the Lord's power, and we may well conceive the glowing triumph with which the pious Hebrew, questioned as to the meaning of such rites by his children, would describe the wonderful works done of old for their fathers. But besides the retrospective meaning, the passover had also a future aspect. It was to read lessons for the present and the coming time. It was to point to a yet greater deliverance, and to teach the befitting temper and purity of heart which God demands. These lessons are brought out by the apostle Paul, who speaks of Christ as "our pass-over sacrificed for us," and exhorts us to "keep the feast, not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth," 1 Cor. v. 7, 8. Thus, then, as the lamb without blemish was selected, slain and roasted whole, its blood being accepted as a propitiation and all its flesh being eaten by the household, so Christ, a pure and spotless victim, designated by his Father, was sacrificed for his people; not a bone of him was broken, for he was a complete offering, and his blood sprinkled is of precious power, and he is received whole and undivided by his people's faith, who feed on him and are nourished thereby to salvation and eternal life. And as bitter herbs were eaten, symbolizing the hard bondage of Israel, so the power of sin and the miserable captivity in which it leads its victims will be felt by those who are taught to appreciate the Saviour's sacrifice. Bitter will be their grief, deep their repentance, for what they have done amiss under the yoke of Satan. And as all leaven was to be cleared away, so will he who partakes the benefit of Christ's Atonement, purge out and cast off everything which defiles and swells, fermenting and festering against the holy law of God. In sincerity, and truth, and pureness, he is taught to adorn his profession. And the presentation of the first-fruits and the sacrifice of peace-offerings may also have their meaning. The believer brought nigh by the blood of Christ has peace with God, whom now, in his new position, he regards as his Father reconciled, and he will present himself, the first and best, yea, all he has and is, a thank-offering, a living sacrifice, to the Lord.

PASTOR (pas'tor), a word equivalent to shepherd, Eph. iv. 11. See FLOCK.

PASTURAGE (pas'chur-aj), PASTURE (pas'chure). We find it noted that the early patriarchs sowed and reaped an abundant harvest, Gen. xxvi. 12; but for the most part they are described as possessors of flocks and herds, for which they must provide pasture. Sometimes, therefore, they had to travel far for convenient places. Thus, Jacob's sons led their flocks from Hebron to Shechem and Dothan, Gen. xxxvii. 12, 17. Generally speaking, the southern parts of Palestine and the neighboring wilderness were well adapted for pasturage—hilly ranges abounding in herbage and shrubbery, on which during the moister parts of the year food for cattle was produced.

PATARA (pat'a-ra), a large seaport town of Asia Minor to which St. Paul went from Rhodes, Acts xxi. 1. It was in Lycia, lying east of the mouth of the river Xanthus. It had a celebrated temple and oracle of Apollo. Considerable ruins of it still exist.

PATEN (pat'en), the name of the stand or plate on which the "Host" is placed on the celebration of the eucharist. In early times it was made of glass; but this was forbidden about the sixth century. In England it was often made of other metals than gold and silver, such as lead and tin, and it was much larger than at present.

PATER NOSTER (pa'ter nos'ter), the Latin of "Our Father." They are the first words in Latin of our Lord's Prayer, and hence they are often used to designate it.

PATERNUS (pa-ter'nus) was the proconsul of Africa who summoned Cyprian before him; and when he held to the faith, Paternus banished him, A. D. 257, to Curubis. Here he remained eleven months, and on the arrival of Galerius Maximus, the new proconsul, in the stead of Paternus, he was recalled. Soon after, he was summoned before the proconsul, and condemned to death, "to be ence, and reckoned as one of the Sporades. It is situated about twenty miles south of Samos and about twenty-four west of the coast of Asia Minor. On account of its stern and desolate character, the island was used, under the Roman empire, as a place of banishment, which accounts for the exile of John thither "for the testimony of Jesus," Rev. i. 9. He was here favored with those visions which are contained in the Apocalypse, and to which the place owes its Scriptural interest. The island is now called Patino. See REVELATIONS, BOOK OF.

PATRIARCH (pa'tre-ark), "head of a tribe or family." By this word are now commonly understood those eminent persons who lived in the earlier ages of the world, specially before Moses; notices of them will be found under their respective names.

PATRIARCH, an ecclesiastical term derived from two Greek words, pater, "father," and put to death by the sword, . . . as being an enemy of the gods and a seducer of the people." Upon which he exclaimed, "God be thanked!" and immediately he was beheaded, A. D. 258.

PATHEUS (path'e-us), 1 Esd. ix. 23, identical with Pethaniah, Ezra x. 23.

PATHROS (path'ros), "region of the south," the proper name of what is said to be the native land of the Egyptians, Ezek. xxix. 14. It is ordinarily used to signify Upper Egypt or Thebaid, as distinguished from Mazor, Mizraim, Lower Egypt, Jer. xlv. 1, 15; Ezek. xxx. 14. The inhabitants of Pathros were one of the tribes descended from Ham, and are found in the genealogical list of nations under the denomination of Pathrusim.

PATHRUSIM (pa-thru'sim), 1 Chr. i. 12, the people of Pathros.

PATMOS (pat'mos), a rocky and bare island of the Ægean Sea, about fifteen miles in circumfer-ence, and reckoned as one of the Sporades. It is situated about twenty miles south of Samos and about twenty-four west of the coast of Asia Minor. On account of its stern and desolate character, the island was used, under the Roman empire, as a place of banishment, which accounts for the exile of John thither "for the testimony of Jesus," Rev. i. 9. He was here favored with those visions which are contained in the Apocalypse, and to which the place owes its Scriptural interest. The island is now called Patino. See REVELATIONS, BOOK OF.

maliei appears to have possessed a singularly calm and judicious mind, and to have exercised a freedom of thought, as well as pursued a range of study, very unlike what was common among the party to which he belonged, Acts v. 34-39. How much the instructions and the example of such a teacher among the Jews that "he who does not teach his son a trade teaches him to steal."

At the proper age—supposed to be after he was fourteen years old—the apostle proceeded to Jerusalem to prosecute his studies in the learning of the Jews. Here he became a student under Gamaliel.

diffusion of their doctrines, he obtained the authority of the high-priest to pursue them to Damascus, for the purpose of bringing back as prisoners to Jerusalem those who had fled thither. He probably hoped, in this way, not only to punish those whom he might seize, but by arresting

He is introduced to our notice by the sacred historian for the first time in connection with the martyrdom of Stephen, in which transaction he was, if not an assistant, something more than a mere spectator. He is described as at this time "a young man;" but this term was employed with so much latitude by the Greeks that it is impossible, from the mere use of it, to determine whether the party to whom it was applied was under thirty or between that and forty. The probability is that Paul must have reached the age of thirty at least; for, otherwise, it is not likely that he would have shared the counsels of the chief priests, or been entrusted by them with the entire responsibility of executing their designs against the followers of Jesus, Acts xxvi. 10, 12. For such a task he showed a painful aptitude, and discharged it with a zeal which spared neither age nor sex, Acts viii. 1-3; xxvi. 10, 11. Accounting it, apparently, his special vocation to uphold the Mosaic law, and to put down all who were unfaithful to it, he devoted himself to the persecution of the Christians; and, infuriated by the thought that their dispersion after the death of Stephen had only tended to the wider to which Damascus was the door. If Aretas also, the friend of the Jews, had then an ethnarch in Damascus, he might count on his aid in carrying out his purpose against the Christians. But whilst thus, in his ignorance and unbelief, he was seeking to be "injurious" to the cause of Christ, the great Author of Christianity was about to make him a distinguished trophy of its power, and one of the most devoted and successful of its advocates. Whilst journeying to Damascus, and when he had ox, by kicking against the goad, endeavor to exempt itself from the control of its driver—"but arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what to do." This command the confounded and now humble zealot immediately rose to obey; but as the brilliancy of the light which had shone around him had dazzled him to blindness, he had to be led into the city by his attendants. Here he remained for three days and nights in a state of deep mental conflict and dejection, tasting neither sonal evidence of the fact, in having "seen the Lord" in his heavenly state. For these ends the scene through which he passed on the road to Damascus was admirably adapted. The appearance in glory of Jesus was proof sufficient of two things—of his actual resurrection from the dead by the power of God, and of his acceptance and exaltation as the Mediator between God and man and the King of the spiritual kingdom; and in the presence of these truths the mind of Saul, sincere, almost completed his journey, he was suddenly arrested by a miraculous vision of Christ, who, addressing him from heaven, demanded the reason of his furious zeal, in the remarkable words, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Struck to the ground by the suddenness and overwhelming splendor of the vision, and able only to ask by whom he was thus addressed, he received for answer, "I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest. It is hard for thee to kick against the goad"—i. e., in vain dost thou resist my arrangement to make thee my servant, as in vain does the meat nor drink, until a person of the name of Ananias appeared, at the command of Christ, to relieve his distress, and to admit him into the Christian fraternity by baptizing him into the name of the Lord, Acts ix. 1-18; xxii. 6-8; xxvi. 14-16.

The design of this extraordinary scene was, on the one hand, to turn the mind of Saul, by one decisive impulse, from his former state of enmity to the cause of Christianity to one of firm and deep conviction of its divine authority, and, on the other, to fit him for being a competent witness of the resurrection of Jesus, by having had per-truthful and accustomed to processes of reasoning, could not hesitate as to the conclusion to be drawn in favor of the divinity of that system which he had been madly seeking to destroy. No mere mental vision, no mere verbal revelation, no mere announcement, however impressive, could have gained these ends. It was the presentation to the view of Saul of Him who could say, "I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest," which could alone meet the requirements of the case. Such a presentation the future apostle had on the road to Damascus; and it changed the whole tenor of his

that the Epistles to the Galatians, the Romans and the Corinthians were written.

On his arrival at Jerusalem he had the mortification to find that, whilst the malice of the Jews was unabated, the minds of many of his brother Christians were alienated from him on account of what they deemed his too lax and liberal notions of the obligations of the Mosaic ritual. To obviate these feelings on their part, he, at the suggestion of St. James, joined himself to four persons who had taken on them the vows of a Nazarene, and engaged to pay the cost of the sacrifices by which the Mosaic ritual required that such should be absolved from their vows. With what success this somewhat questionable act of the apostle was attended, as respects the minds of his brethren, we are not informed, but it had no effect whatever in securing for him any mitigation of the hatred with which he was regarded by the unconforced by scourging to confess his crime. From this indignity Paul delivered himself by asserting his privileges as a Roman citizen, whom it was not lawful to bind or scourge. Next day, in the presence of the Sanhedrim, he entered into a defence of his conduct, in the course of which, having avowed himself a believer in the doctrine of a bodily resurrection, he awakened so fierce a controversy on this point between the Pharisees and the Sadducees in the council that Lysias, fearing he might be torn to pieces among them, gave orders to remove him into the fort. From a conspiracy, into which above forty of the Jews had entered to assassinate him he was delivered by the timely interposition of his nephew, who, having acquired intelligence of the plot, intimated it first to Paul and then to Lysias. Alarmed at the serious appearance which the matter was assuming, Lysias determined to send Paul to Cæsarea, where

Felix the procurator was residing, and to leave the affair to his decision. At Cæsarea, Paul and his accusers were heard by Felix; but though the apostle's defence was unanswerable, the procurator, fearful of giving the Jews offence, declined to pronounce any decision, and still retained Paul in bonds. Some time after, he was again summoned to appear before Felix, who, along with his wife Drusilla, expressed a desire to hear him "concerning the faith in Christ;" and on this occasion the faithful and fearless apostle discoursed so pointedly on certain branches of good morals, in which the parties he was addressing were notoriously deficient, that Felix trembled and hastily sent him from his presence. Shortly after this Felix was succeeded in his government by Porcius Festus, before whom the Jews again brought their charges against Paul, and who, when the cause came to be heard, showed so much of a disposition to favor the Jews that the apostle felt himself constrained to appeal to Cæsar. To gratify King Agrippa and his wife Bernice, who had come to Cæsarea to visit Festus, and whose curiosity was excited by what they had heard of Paul, he was again called before the governor and "permitted to speak for himself." On this occasion he recapitulated the leading points of his history, and gave such an account of his views and designs that a deep impression was made on the mind of Agrippa favorable to Christianity and to the apostle—so much so that, but for his having appealed to Cæsar, it is probable he would have been set at liberty. His cause, however, having by that appeal been placed in the hands of the emperor, it was necessary that he should go to Rome, and thither accordingly Festus sent him. His voyage was long and disastrous. Leaving Cæsarea when the season was already considerably advanced, they coasted along Syria as far as Sidon, and then crossed to Myra, a port of Lycia; thence they sailed slowly to Cnidus; and thence, in consequence of unfavorable winds, they struck across to Crete, and with difficulty reached a port on the southern part of that island called "The Fair Havens," near the town of Lasea. There Paul urged the centurion under whose charge he and his fellow-prisoners had been placed to winter; but the place not being very suitable for this purpose, and the weather promising favorably, this advice was not followed, and they again set sail, intending to reach Phenice, a port in the same island, and there to winter. Scarcely had they set sail, however, when a tempest arose, at the mercy of which they were driven for fourteen days in a westerly direction, until they were cast upon the coast of Malta, where they suffered shipwreck, but without any loss of life. Hospitably received by the natives, they abode there three months, during which time Paul had a favorable opportunity of preaching the gospel and of showing the power with which he was endued for the authentication of his message by performing many miracles for the advantage of the people. On the approach of spring they availed themselves of a ship of Alexandria which had wintered in the island, and set sail for Syracuse, where they remained three days; thence they crossed to Rhegium, in Italy; and thence to Puteoli, from which place Paul and his companions journeyed to Rome. Here he was delivered by the centurion to the captain of the guard, who permitted him to dwell in his own hired house under the surveillance of a soldier. And thus he continued for two years, "receiving all that came to him, preaching the kingdom of God and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him," Acts xxi. 17; xxviii. 31. It was during these two years that the Epistles to the Ephesians, the Philippians, the Colossians and Philemon were written.

At this point the Evangelist abruptly closes his narrative, leaving us to glean our information regarding the subsequent history of the apostle from less certain sources. Tradition steadfastly affirms that he suffered martyrdom at Rome, and that the manner of his death was by beheading; but whether this took place at the close of the imprisonment mentioned by Luke, or after a second imprisonment incurred subsequent to an intervening period of freedom and active exertion in the cause of Christianity, has been much discussed by modern writers. Though the whole subject is involved in much obscurity, the preponderance of evidence seems to be in favor of the latter supposition. If we adopt this supposition, it will follow that Paul, during the interval between his first and second imprisonments, undertook an extensive apostolic tour, in the course of which he visited his former scenes of labor in Asia and Greece, and perhaps also fulfilled his purpose of going into Spain, Rom. xv. 24-28. He probably also visited Crete and Dalmatia.

In the apostle's own writings one or two incidents of his life are alluded to of which no notice has been taken in the preceding sketch of his history, in consequence of the obscurity in which they are involved, in some cases as to the time when they occurred, and in others as to the nature of the event itself. These are his visit to Jerusalem, mentioned in Gal. ii. 1; his rapture into the third heavens, 2 Cor. xii. 1-4; the thorn in the flesh with which he was afflicted after that event, ver. 7; and his fighting with wild beasts at Ephesus, mentioned in 1 Cor. xv. 32. As to the first of these, it does not readily synchronize with any visit of the apostle to Jerusalem noticed by Luke. That it was in the visit mentioned in Acts xv. is entirely out of the question; and the only supposition to which we can resort is that during the interval which elapsed between what are commonly reckoned the apostle's second and third visits to Jerusalem—an interval of about five years—a short visit was paid by him and Barnabas, along with Titus, probably with a view to coming to a distinct understanding with the older apostles as to their relative position and independent working.

verted Jews; on the contrary, his appearance in the temple so much exasperated them that before his vow was accomplished they seized him, and would have put him to death had not Lysias, the commander of the Roman cohort in the adjoining citadel, brought soldiers to his rescue. Under the protection of Lysias, the apostle addressed the angry mob, setting forth the main circumstances of his life, and especially his conversion to Christianity and his appointment to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. Up to this point they heard him patiently, but no sooner had he insinuated that the Gentiles were viewed by him as placed on a par with the Jews than all their feelings of national bigotry burst forth in a tempest of execration and fury against the apostle. Lysias, ignorant of what Paul had been saying, from his having addressed the people in Hebrew, and suspecting, from these vehement demonstrations of the detestation in which he was held by the Jews, that something flagrantly vicious must have been committed by him, gave orders that he should be examined and

As respects the rapture into the third heavens, one thing appears very certain, viz., that those are mistaken who attempt to identify this with the vision on the road to Damascus which led to the conclusion to which Neander has come on this subject appears to us much the most judicious: "We must regard it as something entirely personal, affecting him not as an apostle, but as Paul; though, in the absence of any information as to its characteristics, it would be foolish to decide more precisely what it was."

Respecting the apostle's fighting with wild beasts at Ephesus, the question is, whether this should be understood literally, of an actual exposure in the theatre to the assault of savage beasts, or figuratively, of dangers to which he was exposed from the attacks of savage men. It is no objection to the literal interpretation that Luke has not noticed any such event in his narrative, for from Rom. xvi. 4 we find that the apostle must have encountered many deadly perils at Ephesus of which no notice is taken by Luke. As little force is there in the objection that Paul, as a Roman citizen, could not legally be subjected to such a punishment; for, however his privileges in this respect may have availed him on some occasions, we know that they did not on all, else he would not have endured the indignity of being scourged, as he was at Philippi, Acts xvi. 23, and, according to his own testimony, often besides, 2 Cor. xi. 24, 25. Tradition is in favor of the literal interpretation.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE AND CHARACTER.—All testimony, his own included, 2 Cor. x. 10, leads to the conclusion that, in outward appearance, the apostle had nothing to command admiration or respect. His figure was diminutive, his eyesight defective, compare Acts xxiii. 5; Gal. iv. 15, and his speech such as produced little effect. An ancient writer adds, that he was bald and had a hooked nose like an eagle's beak. The combination of these features presents such a figure as one may often see among the Jews of our own day, especially in the humbler class of them. Such pictorial representations of the apostle as have come down to us in paintings and mosaics agree in the main with this, though they give more of power and dignity to the apostle's countenance than this would lead us to expect.

A diminutive and feeble body is often the tenement of a great soul and an ardent, energetic spirit. Such was the case with St. Paul. When he first comes before our view in the history, we see a man of intense energy, firm decision, iron resolution and uncompromising zeal; and these qualities, tempered by purer religious feeling, guided by higher knowledge and modified by experience, continued to characterize him so long as he appears upon the stage of life. His natural mental endowments were of the highest order. He had great breadth of view, great clearness of apprehension, a capacity of firmly grasping principles, the power of arranging his thoughts in their proper logical order, and the ability to utter them in forcible and fitting words. The dialectician predominates in his writings; but he could also play the orator after no mean fashion, and there are passages in his Epistles which could have come only from the pen of one who had in him the faculties of the poet. In his moral development everything is great and noble. To honesty of purpose and sincerity of speech he added humility and self-distrust, generous regard for the welfare of others, a tender sympathy with those he loved, and a philanthropy that embraced the race; while the absence of everything mean, mercenary or selfish, and a noble devotedness, at whatever cost, to the interests of a great cause, combine to shed around a character, in other respects so beautiful, traits of sublimity and grandeur. We feel that here is a man at once to be admired and loved—a teacher at whose feet one might sit with unhesitating docility—a friend on whose bosom one might lean with confidence and affection. The vigorous intellect and the large heart which belonged to him by nature would have brought him distinction under any circumstances; but his highest claim to honor is derived from his having, under the constraining power of the love of Christ, consecrated himself, body, soul and spirit, to the service of God in promoting the best interests of men. In this respect he stands foremost among the Church's heroes and the benefactors of the race.

PAUL. There have been five popes of this name: I., a Roman, succeeded his brother, Stephen II., in 757. He carried on the contest of papacy against the Longobard kingdom of Italy, and endeavored to appropriate to the papal see the exarchate of Ravenna. He died in 767. II., a Venetian noble, succeeded Pius II. in 1464. His internal policy was reactionary and hostile to secular culture, as witnessed by the persecution and tortures inflicted by him upon the learned members of the Roman Academy. The chief aim of his external policy was a crusade of the Christian princes against the Turks; but he could effect little or nothing for the purpose. He died in 1471. III. succeeded Clement VII. in 1534. Under his pontificate the moderate Catholic party made endeavors to reform the Church and bring about a reconciliation with the Protestants. The pope, however, refused to countenance these efforts, and yielding to his nature and to party spirit, adopted a policy of resistance and persecution.

In his time began the famous Council of Trent, and the Inquisition in Italy was formally organized. He died in 1549. IV., a Neapolitan nobleman and a fanatic priest, became pope in 1555. He continued with redoubled ferocity the inquisitorial system, and not only issued a bull against all heretics, but apostle's conversion. The design, character and consequences of the one are so different from those of the other that it is surprising any should have imagined the two events were the same. It is not improbable that the event of which Paul writes to the Corinthians was the same as the trance referred to by him in the recapitulation of the events of his life in his address to the Jews as recorded in Acts xxii. 17. When in an ecstasy or trance, all outward perception is suspended, and the whole mind is wrapped in contemplation of the objects presented in the vision. The date, moreover, which the apostle assigns to the event mentioned in the Epistle to the Corinthians agrees very closely with that of the event mentioned in the Acts. The latter, Paul says, occurred when he was in Jerusalem for the first time after his conversion; the former, he says, took place "about fourteen years" before the time of his writing the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. Now, according to almost all the chronologers, a space of fourteen years intervened between the apostle's first visit to Jerusalem and his writing that Epistle; so that it is highly probable that the vision referred to in the two narratives is the same.

What "the thorn in the flesh" was, with which the apostle was visited after his vision, has proved indeed a vexed question to interpreters. The con-volumes of his sermons and his "Commentary on the Four Evangelists" were published.

PEARL (perl). This substance is mentioned but once in our version of the Old Testament, Job xxviii. 18; but the word so translated there is more likely to be crystal. Some have imagined that the "rubies" in the same place are pearls, but this is questionable; and Lam. iv. 7, where the same word is found, seems to offer an insuperable objection. If, then, "bdellium," Gen. ii. 12, be not pearl, of which there is some probability (see BDELLIUM), the Old Testament writers do not mention it at all. In the New Testament, however, we repeatedly find pearls put for jewels or precious things generally, or, possibly, wise sayings, Matt. vii. 6; as choice and sought-for articles of costly merchandise, Matt. xiii. 45, 46; as used ornamentally by females, 1 Tim. ii. 9. The gates of the heavenly Jerusalem also are described as each one several pearl, Matt. xxi. 21. The mother-of-pearl shell is from the pearl-oyster. Fisheries of this are established in various parts of the world; the principal are near Ceylon, Cape Comorin and in the Persian Gulf. Pearls hold a high place among the decorations of an Eastern monarch.

PEARSON (peer'sun), EDWARD, D.D., a very learned English divine, was born in 1756, at Norwich. In 1778 he entered Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, where he graduated in arts in 1785. He obtained the celebrated Norrisian prize in 1786 for his well-known "Essay on the Goodness of God as seen in the Mission of Jesus Christ." He became tutor in his college, and in 1797 he was presented to the rectory of Rempstone, in Nottinghamshire. In 1807 he became Warburtonian lecturer at Lincoln's Inn, and next year he was made principal of Sidney Sussex College and raised to the status of doctor of divinity by royal mandate. His Warburtonian Lectures, a work on the "Theory of Morals" and his "Essay" are his chief writings. He died of apoplexy in the year 1811, very greatly regretted.

PEARSON, ELIPHALET, LL.D., was born in Byfield, near Newbury, Massachusetts, in 1752, and educated at Harvard College. In 1778 he became a professor in Phillips Academy, and in 1786 he was placed in the chair of Hebrew and Oriental languages at Harvard. He was ordained in 1808, and in that year he became professor of sacred literature in Andover Theological Seminary. He died in 1826, leaving sermons and other less important works behind him.

PEARSON, JOHN, D.D., who rose to be bishop of Chester, was born in 1612, at Snoring, in Norfolk. He was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, where he rose to be a Fellow. Having retired from his fellowship, he became chaplain to Lord-Keeper Finch and to Lord Goring, and he subsequently held the livings Torrington and St. Clement's, Eastcheap, London. In 1661 he was made Margaret professor of divinity, and next year he was chosen Principal of Trinity College; and here he distinguished himself very greatly. He succeeded Dr. Wilkins in the see of Chester in 1673. His great work is his "Exposition of the Creed," which still continues in demand. He opposed Daillé on the Ignatian controversy, and he wrote on the "Times of Cyprian," besides a great number of minor works. Burnet called him the greatest divine of his age, and Dr. Bentley said of him that "the very sweepings of Bishop Pearson's study were all gold." He died at Chester, in 1686.

PECK, ALBERT D., was born in 1810, at Mexicoville, Oswego county, New York. In early life he passed through deep religious experiences, and in 1825 he attained to a comfortable persuasion that he had found peace with God. He became a class-leader; and having obtained license to exhort, he entered on a more public manifestation of his gifts and graces. He traveled in the Madison circuit, was received in the Oneida Conference in 1834, and in 1835 he was settled at Oswego. Having discharged the duties incumbent on him at Watertown, Syracuse and other places, his health failed, and he continued to decline in strength until 1847, when he passed away. He was an excellent, pious and devoted man.

PECK, FRANCIS, was born at Stamford, in Lincolnshire, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and he became curate of King's Clifton, in Northamptonshire. In 1723 the living of Godeby Maureward, in Lincolnshire, was conferred on him, and in 1736 he was made prebend of Lincoln. He was an ardent antiquary, a most industrious and voluminous writer.

PECK, JOHN, was born in 1780, at Stanford, in Dutchess county, New York. At eighteen years of age he felt the importance of religion, and was received by baptism into the Church, after which he made several trials of his powers as a preacher. In 1804 he received a call to the First Baptist Church in Cazenovia, New York, and he was ordained there in 1806. In 1839 he became general agent of the Baptist Home Mission Society, which office he held until his death, in 1849. He was associate editor of "The Western Baptist Magazine." He wrote a history of the Baptist Missionary Convention of the State of New York, and he published a catechism, together with several discourses.

PECOCK (pe'kok), REGINALD, bishop of St. Asaph and Chichester in the reign of Henry VI., was born in Wales about the end of the fourteenth century. He studied at Oxford, became Fellow of Oriel in 1417 and was ordained priest in 1421. Having distinguished himself by his great attainments in theological learning, he was called to the Court, and in 1431 was promoted to the mastership of Whittington College, London, to which the rectory of St. Michael in Riola was attached. After filling that post for thirteen years, during which he diligently studied the controversy between the Church and the Lollards, he was made bishop of St. Asaph in 1444. Three years later he caused extraordinary excitement by a sermon he preached at Paul's Cross, in which he defended on grounds of reason the non-preaching of bishops, their non-residence and the papal bulls of provision. In 1450 he was translated to the see of Chichester, but he soon after fell into disgrace at court. In the council held at Westminster in 1457 the wrath of his enemies burst forth, and he was expelled and cited to appear before the archbishop of Canterbury. His examination took place the same year; and being condemned, and compelled either to abjure his opinions or to die for them, he made a coward's choice, signed an abjuration, and afterward read it, kneeling, at Paul's Cross in the presence of twenty thousand persons. He then handed his numerous books to the executioner, who threw them into the fire. His books were soon after publicly burnt at Oxford. He was kept a prisoner, but made his case known to the pope, who interfered in his favor, but unsuccessfully. His see was given to another, and he was confined in Thorney Abbey, in Cambridgeshire. Nothing further is known of his fate. Most of his writings have perished. Among those extant are "The Book of Faith" and "The Repressor." The last is the most important; its object is the defence of the Church of England, as it then was, against the attacks of the Lollards. Pecock maintained the supremacy of reason as well as the infallibility of the pope, advocated religious toleration, and had the singular fate to be persecuted by the party which he defended, and also to be claimed as a friend by the party against which his whole energies were directed. His influence doubtless contributed materially to the Reformation, which took place in the following century.

PEDAHZUR (pe-dah'tsur), father of Gamaliel prince of Manasseh, Num. i. 10.

PEDAIAH (pe-da'yah), apparently a pretty common name among the covenant people in later times, but with few exceptions found only in the genealogical lists. The father of Zebudah, who was mother to Jehoiakim, 2 Ki. xxiii. 36; the father of Joel, of the tribe of Manasseh, 1 Chr. xxvii. 20; a son of Jeconiah and brother of Shealtiel, 1 Chr. iii. 18; a son of Parosh, Neh. iii. 25; a priest who stood beside Ezra when he read the law, Neh. viii. 4; also of a Benjamite and a Levite, Neh. xi. 7; xiii. 13.

PEIRCE (peers), JAMES, a very learned divine and eminent minister among the Protestant Dissenters, was born in London, in 1673. Losing his parents early, he was placed under the care of Mr. Matthew Mead, of Stepney, who had him educated along with his own sons, under his own roof; after which he went to Utrecht, where he had his first academical instruction. He afterward removed to Leyden, where he studied for some time; and having passed at these two celebrated universities between five and six years, attending the lectures of Witsius, Leydecker, Grævius, Spanheim and other learned men, he returned to England. On his return he took up his abode for some time in London, and set up a Sabbath evening lecture at Miles' lane, which he continued for two years, when he accepted an invitation from a congregation of Dissenters at Cambridge to become their pastor. In 1713 he was invited by the three dissenting congregations in Exeter to succeed one of their ministers, the surviving ministers joining the people in the invitation. Accordingly, he settled in that city, where his residence for the first three years proved exceedingly agreeable to him; and during this period he published his "Vindication of the Protestant Dissenters." But a dispute arising in consequence of his refusing, in conjunction with Mr. Hallett, to subscribe certain articles of belief respecting the doctrine of the Trinity, they were both ejected, and driven to the necessity of building a chapel for themselves. A controversy ensued in which Mr. Peirce greatly distinguished himself; but he continued his ministry at Exeter to the period of his death, in 1726. His publications are numerous, amounting in all to about twenty-four. That by which he is best known, is his "Continuation of Mr. Hallett's Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistle to the Hebrews," quarto. He also gave to the public a volume containing "Fifteen Sermons on Various Occasions," and an "Essay on the Ancient Practice of giving the Eucharist to Children."

PEKAH (pe'kah), the son of Remaliah, a captain in Pekahiah's army who conspired against his master, slew him and reigned over Samaria in his stead for twenty years, 758-738 B. C. His conduct was evil; he maintained the sinful worship set up by Jeroboam I. In the latter part of his reign he allied himself with Rezin, king of Syria, against Judah, over whom he gained a great victory; but he was himself attacked and his kingdom dismembered by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria; and then he was slain by conspirators headed by Hoshea, who afterward obtained the crown, 2 Ki. xv. 25-38; xvi. 1-9.

PEKAHIAH (pe-ka-hi'ah), the son and successor of Menahem on the throne of Israel, who, after a short and worthless reign of two years, was slain by Pekah, one of his captains, 2 Ki. xv. 23-

25. His reign belongs to the years B. C. 760-758, and is distinguished by no memorable event.

PEKOD (pe'kod), a name allegorically given to Babylon, perhaps in anticipation of her destruction, the city to be visited and punished, Jer. i. 21; Ezek. xxiii. 23; compare Ps. cxxxvii. 8. But the meaning seems to vary in the two passages in which the word occurs.

PELAGIUS (pe-la'je-us), an eminent Church teacher of the fifth century, author of the system of doctrines called Pelagianism, was probably a native of Britain. He began to publish his doctrines about 413, having previously visited Carthage. In 415 he went to Palestine, where Jerome, still living at Bethlehem, wrote against him, and the young Orosius attacked him, but unsuccessfully, at the Synod of Jerusalem. Another synod was held at Diospolis, by which Pelagius was recognized as a member of the Catholic Church. His doctrine was soon after condemned by two North African synods, by Innocent I., bishop of Rome, and his successor Zosimus, the latter having once declared it orthodox. In 418 it was again condemned by a Council of Carthage, and through the influence of Augustine several imperial edicts were afterward published against Pelagius and his adherents. Many bishops of the West were deprived for refusing to subscribe the condemnation. Pelagius was a man of cold temperament, with a sober, clear understanding, with no capacity for such profound spiritual conflicts and experiences as those of his great adversary, with limited speculative power, but of genuine piety and spotless character. His system was in direct opposition to the leading doctrines of Augustine, and included a denial of the hereditary depravity of man, of absolute predestination to salvation and of irresistible grace. Led by a strong practical interest, he sought to guard against what he considered errors dangerous to morality. He gave prominence to the freedom of the will and the natural power of men to follow the divine commands, appealing to the examples of goodness among the heathen. The controversy to which his views gave rise was long continued, and numerous councils pronounced his condemnation. Mere fragments of his writings are now extant. It is not known when or where Pelagius died.

PELAGIUS. There were two popes of this name: I. A Roman, became pope in 555. He owed his elevation to Greek influence, but his accession was distasteful to the Church, and the French accused him of heresy. He died in 560. II. A Roman of Gothic descent and a Benedictine, became pope in 578. He endeavored in vain to reconcile the bishops of Istria and Venetia to the Church, and opposed John, the patriarch of Constantinople, who assumed the title of œcumenical bishop. He died in 590.

PELALIAH (pe-la'yah). 1. One of David's posterity, 1 Chr. iii. 24. 2. One of the Levites who expounded the law and sealed the covenant, Num. viii. 7; x. 10.

PELALIAH (pe-lal'yah), a priest, Neh. x. 12.

PELATIAH (pe-lat'yah). 1. One of David's posterity, 1 Chr. iii. 21. 2. A Simeonite captain, 1 Chr. iv. 42. 3. One who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 22. 4. A prince of the people against whom Ezekiel was commanded to prophesy for his wicked counsel, and who died while the prophet was speaking, Ezek. xi. 1, 13.

PELEG (pe'leg), one of the sons of Eber, the sixth in descent from Noah by the line of Shem, and memorable from the circumstance that "in his days the earth was divided," Gen. x. 26, from which he got the name of Peleg. The notice seems to relate to the more marked separation of the descendants of Noah into distinct tribes, with a view to so many local settlements, which took place shortly after the confusion of tongues at Babel.

PELET (pe'let). 1. One of Judah's posterity, 1 Chr. ii. 47. 2. A Benjamite chief who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 3.

PELIAS (pe-li'as), 1 Esd. ix. 34, perhaps a corruption of Bedeiah, Ezra x. 35.

PELICAN (pel'i-can). This bird is common in Palestine and the adjacent countries. Its general aspect is said to give the notion of thoughtfulness or melancholy. The Hebrew term for it signifies "vomiter," most probably from its disgorging what it has swallowed. It was forbidden as food, Lev. xi. 18.

PELONITE (pel'on-ite), the designation of some of David's warriors, of which the origin is unknown, 1 Chr. xi. 27, 36; xxvii. 10.

PEMBERTON (pem'ber-tun), EBENEZER. There were two eminent men of this name, father and son. 1. The first was the son of James Pemberton, who founded the Old South Church, Boston. He was born at Boston, in 1671, and educated at Harvard, where he acted as tutor, and he became a Fellow. In 1700 he was ordained to the Old South Church, in Boston, as colleague to the Rev. S. Willard, and he remained in this charge until his death, in 1717. 2. His son Ebenezer was born in 1704, in Boston, educated in Harvard and settled as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in New York in 1727. In 1754 he became pastor of the New Brick Church, in Boston, and here he remained until his death, in 1777. He was the author of sermons and a work on "Salvation by Grace through Faith," all of which were published, and were much esteemed.

PEN. See WRITING.

PENANCE (pen'ance). In the Romish Church this is held to be one of the sacraments of the Christian Church. According to Romish theologians, it consists of three parts, contrition, confession and satisfaction, followed by absolution. In Article XIV. of the Church of England it is declared that penance came to be considered a sacrament only through "the corrupt following of the apostles."

PENATES (pen-a'teez), the household gods of the ancient Italians who presided over families and were worshiped in each dwelling. The name is derived from the Latin word "penitus," within. The term really includes all the gods which were worshiped in the interior of the house. The Lares were also domestic deities, probably the souls of departed relatives, but their worship was not confined to private houses.

PENDANT (pen'dant). This term is derived from the Latin word "pendo," I hang. In Gothic architecture it is applied to an ornamented polygonal piece of stone or timber hanging down from the vault or roof of a building. Of stone pendants, the splendid specimens which may be seen in Henry VII.'s Chapel in Westminster Abbey are among the richest examples to be found in any ecclesiastical edifice. Among ancient writers, the springers of arches which rest on shafts or corbels are improperly called "pendants." The finish of the pendant downward was usually of a very florid character; but the use of the pendant indicated a declining period of art. See pages 715, 744.

PENIEL (pe-ni'el), "face of God," the place where Jacob had his mysterious conflict; he wrestled through the night; and though the might of his antagonist was manifested by a touch upon Jacob's thigh, yet the patriarch had power with God, and prevailed; at daybreak he received a blessing, and his name was changed from Jacob to Israel, from the "supplanter" to the "prince of God," Gen. xxxii. 24-30. The spot must, in all probability, have been to the south of the Jabbok. From early times it had a tower or castle called Penuel; this tower Gideon destroyed, Jud. viii. 8-17, and the city was afterward rebuilt or fortified by Jeroboam I., 1 Ki. xii. 52.

PENITENTIAL (pen-e-ten'sh'al) PSALMS are seven in number—viz., the Sixth, Thirty-second, Thirty-eighth, Fifty-first, One Hundred and Second, One Hundred and Thirtieth and One Hundred and Forty-third.

PENINNAH (pe-nin'nah), one of the wives of Elkanah, the father of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 2, 4.

PENN (pen), WILLIAM, whose name stands justly at the head of the founders of the State of Pennsylvania, was born in London on October 14, 1644. His father was Sir William Penn, and he had held the offices of admiral and general of the fleet, commissioner of the admiralty and navy. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He and others of the students became impressed by the preaching of Thomas Loe, a follower of George Fox, and fines and other forms of college discipline were tried in vain to reclaim these offenders. At his home matters were still more decided. Commands, entreaties, and even blows, were used in order to reduce him to obedience, and eventually he was ejected from his paternal abode. He was sent to travel on the Continent, and he spent two years in France and Italy. He entered Lincoln's Inn, visited Ireland to see his father's estate in that country, was arrested at a meeting-house, and released through the influence of the earl of Orrery, whereupon his father recalled him, and again every argument and varied forms of reproach were used to "reclaim" him, but in vain, and he was again driven from his father's house. He was twice in Newgate, being convicted under the Conventicle Act, and in 1670 his father died, leaving him an income of fifteen hundred pounds per annum. In 1672 he married Gulielma Maria, daughter of Sir William Springett, and settled first at Rickmansworth, and afterward at Worminghurst. He traveled with George Fox and Robert Barclay, and published a narrative of his tour in Holland and Germany. In 1680 he accepted from the crown the Province of Pennsylvania, in lieu of sixteen thousand pounds which had been due to his father. He visited his colony in 1682 and again in 1699. He was several times arrested on the charge of being a Jesuit and a plotter to restore James II. He died at Ruscombe, in Berkshire, in 1718. The details of the settlement of Pennsylvania, of the proceedings between Penn and the Crown, and those which took place between his family and the colony after his death, belong to the department of civil history.

PENNY (pen'ny), PENNYWORTH (pen'ny-worth), the Roman denarius, Matt. xv. 2, 9, 13. See MONEY.

PENRY (pen'ry), JOHN, or AP-HENRY (ap-hen'ry), the Brownist, known also by his assumed name of MARTIN MAR-PRELADE, was born in Brecknockshire about 1559. He studied both at Cambridge and at Oxford, and entered the Church. After preaching before the university and in Wales, he published a pamphlet on the necessity of religious reformation in the Principality, and an address to the governors and people of Wales on the same subject. In 1590 appeared his famous tract, entitled "Martin Mar-Prelate," and a special warrant was issued for his seizure, to avoid which he retired into Scotland and remained there three years. Having prepared notes of a petition or address to the queen on Church abuses and affairs, he went to London to present it if possible. But he was seized, tried and condemned, not for his printed works, but for mere notes found on him, and hastily hung in May, 1593. His sentence was both unjust and illegal, and he is not without reason counted among the martyrs of Puritanism.

PENTATEUCH (pen'ta-teuk), the name by which the first five books of the Old Testament, commonly ascribed to Moses, are collectively designated. The word is of Greek origin, implying five books or volumes. In Scripture, various appellations are given to the Pentateuch, such as "the law," "the law of Moses," "the book of the law of the Lord," and by the rabbins it is termed "the five-fifths of the law." It forms to the present day but a single roll or volume in the Jewish manuscripts, distributed into fifty-four larger perashioth or sections, and into six hundred and sixty-nine smaller ones, called open or closed, according as they commence respectively at the beginning or in the middle of lines.

The authorship, date, integrity and credibility of the Pentateuch have often been keenly discussed. It is only a compendious account of the discussion that can be given in the present work. The observations to be made shall be ranged under two heads—(1) the Mosaic authorship, (2) the truthfulness of the record.

1. The current of external evidence is very strongly in favor of the Mosaic authorship. That great lawgiver is said to have been "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," Acts vii. 22. Now, it is notorious that the art of writing was known and was continually practiced in Egypt prior to the time of Moses. It was among such a people that Moses was reared, and in such wisdom he must have been trained. When, then, the stirring events of the Exodus occurred, when a nation was to be organized, laws to be promulgated and customs to be established, it is a moral certainty, apart from the consideration of any divine command, that such a man would take care to chronicle passing events and to have his laws a written code.

Perfectly reasonable, therefore, are the notices which we find in the Pentateuch itself, Ex. xvii. 14; xxiv. 3, 4, 7; xxxiv. 27, 28; Num. xxxiii. 2; Deut. i. 5; xvii. 18; xxviii. 58; xxxi. 9-11, 22, 24-26, which go to show that Moses was in the habit of committing things to writing for preservation to succeeding ages. Some of these notices, indeed, refer to particular historical events or to a compendium of laws. But others furnish a strong presumption that the entire Pentateuch was intended. Thus, when it is said that "the book of the law" was to be placed beside the ark of the covenant, Deut. xxxi. 26, a natural conclusion is that this was the complete roll. So, when the "law" was ordered to be read to the people at the feast of tabernacles, Deut. xxxi. 9-11, it could is the use of Egyptian words, of which some became incorporated into the language, while others subsequently disappeared. This fact is reasonable enough on the ground of the Mosaic authorship, but is not readily to be explained on any other hypothesis. Still further, a vast deal of Pentateuchal legislation is suitable to the wilderness of the Israelites. There are statutes for their circumstances and position, with prospective and modifications in regard to their future life in Canaan; for example, Num. xv. 1-31; xvi. 1-5; xii. It is unreasonable to believe that these things were devised by a later writer. If possible, is the evidence of progression. God treats his creatures as sensible beings. He lets them find out their own way and make application to him for their help. The daughters of Zelophehad concluded that their father's house should lose its inheritance because he had no son; and it was provided that daughters should inherit. Subsequently, the tribe of Manasseh objected to the unrestrained marriage of their daughters, and hence inheritance might pass from tribe to tribe; and therefore, that such should marry only their own tribesmen, Num. xxvii. 1-11. The chronicler these things as they are, and it is preposterous to suppose that they were added centuries after they are said to have happened. To all this the fact that in the Pentateuch there is no distinct enunciation of the law.

But if we read from Genesis to the end of the Pentateuch, the devotional poetry, the prophecies of Scripture, we see an organic growth of the future world, distant and yet near, and draws nearer and nearer; and flashes of the inner life of the soul go forth. So that David could say, "I will praise thee, O Lord, for evermore, for thou hast put forth thy right hand for evermore, and thou shalt exultingly the spirit of the Lord shall be of Messiah's salvation, the Church advancing, the ages rolled on, and you have a new covenant, and the laws of the Pentateuch, and the covenant, even if he had not those old documents, could not have thrown back his mind and have shut out that blessed light which was glowing around him. It is impossible to account for the phenomena of the Pentateuch in regard to the great doctrine of the soul's immortality if you bring down its composition to a late period.

There is no growth of law and legislative enactments after the settlement of Israel in Canaan. In the history of other states we find this growth; nay, we may see it during Moses' lifetime as the circumstances of his people changed. Why was there no subsequent advance? Why, rather, on the contrary, are there laws remaining in the statute book the strictness of which—the punishment decreed against adultery is an example—had ceased? Surely, if a compiler in the time of the judges or the kings—such is the allegation of certain critics—had for his own purposes reduced old documents into a code, he would have been succeeded by others who would have tried to improve upon his labors. But we find no trace of this. Not even did David or Solomon presume to make new laws. They accepted those already existing, and in the revivals and reformations of later kings, directed and aided by prophetic men, we find only the ancient authority reasserted, the regulations not going beyond the orderly assignment of the already-prescribed duties of priests and Levites. In what time could a compiler live who could so fix the whole worship and polity of the nation? In the disturbed period of the judges, when there was hardly ever a central government, and separate tribes made separate wars uncontrolled, and suffered under separate captivities? In Saul's reign? Who can believe that? In David's or any of his successors'? We should have had particular notice of the fact, then. It is hard, therefore, to fix on any date for the Pentateuch save that to which it has by the voice of ages been ascribed; and almost as well might we imagine the New Testament written in mediæval times as, taking all the circumstances into consideration, the Pentateuch in the later days of Israel's history.

Besides, look at its particularity, consisting, a very large part of the last four books, of words distinctly said to be uttered by God to Moses, or by Moses to the people. Who could chronicle these? A subsequent author must have devised mainly from his own mind those sacred conversations, those authoritative utterances, which are presented to us with such minuteness as the very words of God. Some have actually embraced this theory, and have fixed on the prophet Samuel as the guilty man. For guilty, in spite of all the explanations offered, he must be called who dared to publish as the very words of God what God never uttered. The sin of Hananiah, Jer. xxviii., was not so deep; the presumption of Korah, Num. xvi., was not so daring.

It is necessary now to see how far this evidence is neutralized by the objections which are commonly made to such a theory. Objections are taken mainly from internal phenomena. They are grounded on the use in these writings of different divine names, on alleged variations in the style, on imagined repetitions and discrepancies, on the assumed improbability of Moses writing certain parts, on the traces of several hands throughout the work, on the supposed introduction of topics and events reasonably thought to be posterior to the age of Moses.

Let us look at these allegations.

The Pentateuch is not a whole from a single hand. Floating suspicions of this kind had been long entertained. Writers, both Jewish and Christian, were inclined to believe that earlier documents were incorporated. This is what we find not unfrequently in other books of Scripture. The decree of Cyrus, for example, was obtained from what we may call the State-paper Office at formed into a collected consistent whole. It is not merely that, as has been shown, there is distinct mention of a law-book, but the rest of the Old Testament is, so to speak, impregnated with the Pentateuch. Besides this, there are archaisms in the language of this book which are for the most part wanting in other books of the Bible; and these archaisms run through even those portions—Deuteronomy may be instanced—which are frequently called most modern. Then, again, there

Ecbatana, Ezra vi. 1-5; and the genealogies in the Gospels, Matt. i. 2-16; Luke iii. 23-38, were copied, there is no doubt, from carefully-preserved records. But two names, it is observed, were given to the Deity. It was not, however, till the middle of the last century that Astruc, a Belgian physician, ventured to mark out by this rule the documents which he supposed had been employed. In a work published in 1753, he maintained that Moses had compiled Genesis from two principal documents, in which the names Jehovah and Elohim were respectively used, with additions from ten others of inferior importance. It was concluded from Ex. vi. 3 that the name Jehovah was unknown to the ancient patriarchs, and that therefore the introduction of this word in early history must indicate a writer diverse from the one who used in his early description the name Elohim. From these two document, and another who supplemented and completed it. Some must have an Elohist, a Jehovist and a final editor. Others require two or more Elohist, or two Jehovists. Some introduce a Deuteronomist. Some consider one document complete in itself, and some another, while others will not allow that any is complete, so that the editor, according to their notion, worked from a mass of fragments. And these different writers are assigned to all possible ages, from the time of Samson to that of Jeremiah. It must not be thought that these statements are exaggerated. There are more diversities on the different points among critics of name than can possibly be here enumerated. It is self-evident that criticism leading to such inconsistent conclusions must be in a high degree imaginative; a little examination shows that it is also unreasonably arbitrary. Very may be added here that it by no means follows from Ex. vi. 3 that the first patriarchs were ignorant of Jehovah as a name; it was the covenant relation implied in it which they did not comprehend. The stress of the passage lies in the term "know," denoting an experimental acquaintance with fulfilled promise. That it and kindred expressions mean something more than bare acquaintance is evident from such passages as the following: Ex. ii. 25; Ps. i. 6; Isa. xliii. 1; Jer. i. 5; Nah. i. 7; John x. 3; 1 Thess. v. 12.

Great stress is laid upon the alleged fact that two different accounts are frequently given of the same story, with such diversity, or even discrepancy, in the details that both, it is inferred, cannot have proceeded from the same hand. Only a single illustration can here be given. We have, it is asserted, two narratives of the deluge, so inartificially combined as that in one part the command prescribes that pairs of all creatures were to be taken into the ark, in another sevens of many kinds; in one part Noah is represented as embarking seven days before the flood, in another the very day it began; in one part the rains are described as descending forty days, in another the waters prevailing one hundred and fifty, Gen. vi., vii. Critics who have stumbled at statements like these forget that two different communications must necessarily have been made to Noah. Again, even an ordinary flood does not cease so soon as the descending rains are stopped. Every one with eyes perceives that the inundation is not all over. So that very well, after the forty days of rain and the breaking up the fountains of the great deep, may the waters have "prevailed" with little or no sensible diminution three or four months longer. The narrative, fairly read and interpreted as ordinary histories are interpreted, is consistent enough, and does not require the hypothesis of two different writers to it.

Then, further, it is urged that there is a difference in the phraseology. Very little can be said on this topic. Scholars have explained again and again that there are varying shades of meaning which required varying phrases to express them. Yet again and again the same objection is pressed, as if no reasonable explanation had ever been attempted. The reader shall judge by a single instance. Padan-aram, we are told, is peculiar to the Elohist, Aram-naharaim, rendered "Mesopotamia" in our version, to the Jehovist. But the names are not identical. Padan-aram is the district of Mesopotamia which lies around Haran, Mesopotamia the whole sweep of the country between the rivers. And be it known that "Mesopotamia" occurs—a slender foundation on which to base a theory—but twice in the whole Pentateuch, Gen. xxiv. 10; Deut. xxiii. 4, in both which passages the name of a particular place is properly adjoined. In the first, Gen. xxiv., the country is given from which Isaac's wife was to be brought words the supposed two writers have been called the Elohist and the Jehovist. There are other marks. Thus the Elohist is more simple and circumstantial in his style, with less polish. He abounds with repetitions, and is fond of introducing genealogical and ethnological registers. He uses many words and phrases foreign to the Jehovist, who also has his peculiar phraseology. The style of the latter is more compact and shorter, also more smooth and clear. He frequently cites proverbs and snatches of old poetry; he describes appearances of angels and of the Deity, and is careful to magnify his own nation.

But unfortunately these critics have not been successful. For if tables are made out of their distributions, these are found marvelously at variance. And the disagreement does not end here. Some multiply and some diminish the number of original writers. Some are content with an Elohist and a Jehovist, one who produced the ground-often, for instance, a passage has to be cut up into fragments because the word Jehovah appears just where it should not.

But these two names of Deity are not synonymous. They imply different notions. What, then, if they were introduced, not according to the varying custom of individual writers, but because the use of one or other suited best with the scope of the passages in which they respectively appear? There are scholars of the highest name who think they can trace such a propriety of use. And it is very similar to what we find in the New Testament. The names Jesus and Christ, though we now through familiar habit employ them indifferently, have each a special signification, and generally in the earlier books the change of one for another would obscure and confuse the sacred writer's meaning. In regard to the derivation and meaning of the names Jehovah and Elohim something has been said elsewhere. See JEHOVAH. —And it error was that they substituted a religion of externals for a religion of the heart; yet the converting grace of God was powerful enough to bring one of them (and doubtless many more) humbly to the cross. The great apostle of the Gentiles had in his earlier years, "after the most straitest sect" of their religion, lived a Pharisee, Acts xxvi. 5.

PHAROS (fa'ros) is properly the name of an island in the harbor of Alexandria on which a lighthouse was erected, whence it came to be applied as a common name for all lighthouses. See ALEXANDRIA.

PHAROSE, Ezra viii. 3. See PAROSH.

PHARPAR (far'par), or PARPER (par'per), one of the two chief rivers near Damascus, coupled with Abana, 2 Ki. v. 12, the Pharpar being, as is now generally understood, represented by the Awaja, and the Abana by the Barada. See ABANA.

PHASELIS (fa-se'lis), 1 Macc. xv. 23, a town on the coast of Asia Minor, on the borders of Lycia and Pamphylia, where Jews were settled, many brought thither as slaves.

PHASSARON (fas'sa-ron), 1 Esd. v. 25, identical with Pashur, Ezra ii. 38.

PHEASANT (fez'ant). This fowl, much valued and carefully preserved in Great Britain, is from the East, but it does not seem to have been known in Palestine. Among the Jews natural history and other sciences were not greatly cultivated, and thus the products of other countries were not sought after. Thibet, Nepal, China and the regions east and west of the Himalaya range appear to be the early home of this beautiful fowl.

PHEBE, or PHCEBE (fe'be), a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea whom St. Paul commends to the Romans, Rom. xvi. 1, 2. See DEACONESS.

PHELPS (felps), ELIZABETH STUART, was born at Andover, in 1815. She was the daughter of Professor Moses Stuart. In 1842 she was married to the Rev. Austin Phelps. In early life she displayed great vigor and versatility of mind, and she became a voluminous writer. She died at Andover in 1852. Her daughter, Elizabeth Stuart, is still more eminent as an authoress, several of her works having attracted great notice on both sides of the Atlantic.

PHENICE (fe-ni'se). 1. Acts xi. 19. See PHENICIA. 2. A town, more properly Phoenix, with a harbor on the south-west coast of Crete, which the officers of the vessel in which St. Paul was endeavored to reach in order that they might winter there, Acts xxvii. 12. It has been identified as the modern Lutro. The inhabitants preserve the memory of the ancient name Phœnikî; and there are some ruins of the town remaining on a hill a little way from the shore.

PHENICIA, or PHCENICIA (fenish'yah), was a small, narrow strip of country, with an average breadth of hardly twenty miles, lying along the shores of the Mediterranean, from the river Eleutherus near Aradus on the north, one hundred and twenty miles to the promontory of Carmel, or the town of Dor on the south. But this limit appears to have varied at different times. The whole country, sloping from the foot of Lebanon, comprised hilly plains, well watered by streams descending from the uplands, very fruitful and studded with towns and cities, of which the principal were Tripolis, Byblos, Sidon, Tyre and Berytus. It was admirably situated for commerce. Lebanon supplied timber for ship-building; there were iron and copper mines near Sarepta. Celebrated in the oldest writings of pagan antiquity, the Phœnicians are said to have traded with distant lands and planted numerous colonies, of which Carthage may be mentioned as the most distinguished.

Phœnicia was peopled by the descendants of Ham, for Sidon is said to have been the first-born of Canaan; and the Arkite and probably the Sinite, the Arvadite and the Zemarite, had their settlements in this region, Gen. x. 15, 17, 18. At first their towns are supposed to have been independent, but subsequently they were united under the dominion of Tyre. The Assyrians in later times, the Chaldæans, the Persians, the Macedonians, the Egyptians and the Romans were in turn their masters.

The religion of the Phœnicians, in its popular form, was that natural, but debased and foolish, worship paid to the sun, moon and planets by the appellations of Baal, Ashtoreth, etc., of which some account is given in the articles under their respective names. These bodies were supposed to be intelligent beings exercising an influence on mundane events, and by the more refined thinkers the chief deities were deemed the male and female productive powers. Very pernicious effects were produced on Israel by their contact and alliance with the Phœnicians. Not only was idol-worship thus imported, but also the most cruel rites of it, Jer. xix. 5; xxxii. 35.

PHERECYDES (fer-e-si'deez), a philosopher of the isle of Scyros, was the first preceptor of Pythagoras, and flourished about 600 B. C. Josephus is of opinion that he studied philosophy in Egypt, and this is not improbable, as a strong resemblance may be discovered in his doctrines to the dogmas of the Egyptian school. From the circumstance of his predicting the events of a storm and of an earthquake, both of which took place, he has been regarded as possessing supernatural powers, though he only availed himself of his superior knowledge of the phenomena of nature to impose upon the multitude. He was the first who wrote a theogony of the ancient gods in prose, but from his symbolical manner of delivering his opinions it is difficult to form any idea of his doctrines. According to Cicero, he was the first philosopher who wrote on the immortality of the soul; he also taught the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul, afterward adopted by Pythagoras.

PHERESITES (fer'e-sites), or PHEREZITES (fer'e-zites), 1 Esd. viii. 69; Judith v. 16, the Perizzites.

PHIBSETH (fi-be'seth), in some copies, Ezek. xxx. 17, for PI-BESETH, which see.

PHICHOL (fi'kol), the chief captain of the army of the Abimelech who was king of Gerar in the days of Abraham and Isaac, Gen. xxi. 22; xxvi. 26. Of the personal character of Phichol nothing is said; he appears only as the representative and agent of his master.

PHILADELPHIA (fil-a-del'fe-ah), a city of Lesser Asia, and one of the seven containing the Christian churches to which the Apocalyptic admonitions were addressed. The town stood about twenty-five miles south-east from Sardis. It was the second in Lydia, and was built by King Attalus Philadelphus, from whom it took its name. In B. C. 133 the place passed, with the dominion in which it lay, to the Romans.

PHILARCHES (fe-lar'keez), 2 Macc. viii. 32. This is really not a proper name, but the designation of the chief of the cavalry.

PHILEMON (fi-le'mon), a Christian at Colosse, or, as some critics believe, at Laodicea, whose wife it is likely was Apphia, and Archippus their son—at least a near relation, Philem. 2. It seems that Philemon was converted by the instrumentality of St. Paul, Philem. 13, 19; and it is clear that he was a large-hearted, zealous believer, abounding in good works, Philem. 4-7.

PHILEMON, THE EPISTLE TO. This, the shortest of St. Paul's letters, bears upon its face decisive proof of its authorship. There is also abundant testimony to it given by early writers; and though some have disputed its genuineness, yet the evidences for its canonicity are too plain, and the arguments adduced against its authority too superficial, to require further notice here. The occasion on which this letter was written is clear from the contents. Onesimus, a slave of Philemon's, escaped from his master and took refuge in Rome. Here he was converted to the Christian faith by Paul, who, unwilling to detain him without his former master's consent, sent

2. The Pharaoh of Joseph, Gen. xxxvii. 36, is supposed by Bunsen to be Sesertesen I., the head of the eleventh dynasty, but Mr. Poole contends that this would place Joseph's history at too early a date, and is besides rendered improbable by the fact that Sesertesen I. was a native Egyptian prince who would hardly under any circumstances have elected a Hebrew slave to such eminence of dignity and favor as Joseph received. It is more probable that he was one of the Shepherd kings, and there is reason to believe that Eusebius is right in calling him Apophis, who appears to have been the fifth or sixth king of the fifteenth dynasty.

3, 4. The Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites is by Bunsen and others supposed to have been Rameses II., and his son Menephtah, the Pharaoh of the exode. But there is little evidence for this beyond the statement of Manetho, and the date thus assigned to the exode is much too late. Mr. Poole thinks that the oppressor of the Israelites was probably a foreigner of Assyrian descent, and refers to Isa. lii. 4 in corroboration of his opinion.

5. Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Mered, 1 Chr. iv. 8. Speculation is useless in regard to this king.

6. Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Hadad. Hadad was one of those who rose up against Solomon, and being defeated by him, fled to Egypt, where he married the sister of Tahpanhes, the queen of the Pharaoh. It is not probable that this Pharaoh was the one whose daughter Solomon married; he may have been his predecessor, in which case he was Phinakes or Osochor of the twenty-first dynasty.

7. Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon. This was probably Pusemes II., a king of the twenty-first dynasty.

8. Pharaoh, the ally of the Jews against Sennacherib, Isa. xxxvi. 6. By many this "king of Mizraim" is supposed to be the same person who appears as Tirhakah, king of Cush, 2 Ki. xix. 9, and So, king of Mizraim, 2 Ki. xvii. 4, and they identify him with Sevech II., who reigned about 715 B. C. But others think the person styled whom the Jews placed on the throne, and gave the kingdom to Jehoiakim, as his vassal, 2 Ki. xxiii. 29-35. This king was subsequently defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Ki. xxiv. 7; Jer. xli. 2. He is known as the Necho who reigned fifteen years, from 609 to 594 B. C.

11. Pharaoh-hophra, Jer. xli. 30, most probably the king who attempted to raise the siege of of them. The name Pharisee imports "separated."

The main distinguishing principle of this party was that they placed tradition upon a level with the divine written law. Nay, as they conceived the written law imperfect—i. e., not containing all that God delivered—they not only superseded but in some degree superseded it by the interpretations

PRINCES OF PHARAOH.—See PHARAOH.

Jerusalem, Jer. xxxvii. 5-11. He received into his dominions the Jews who against God's warning fled into Egypt after the murder of Gedaliah, but there they were told that war should overtake them. There is every reason to believe that Nebuchadnezzar successfully invaded Egypt in Hophra's reign. This and other untoward events alienated his subjects; the army placed Amasis on the throne, and the deprived monarch was ere long put to death.

PHARES (fa'res), or PHAREZ (fa'rez), one of the sons of Judah by his daughter-in-law Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 29. He gave name to one of the great families of Judah, the Pharzites. He is also called Perez, Neh. xi. 4, 6. Of his personal history nothing is recorded; his numerous descendants are frequently noticed in the genealogies.

PHARIRA (fa-ri'ra), 1 Esd. v. 33, identical with Peruda or Perida, Ezra ii. 35; Neh. vii. 57.

PHARISEES (far'i-seez), THE, one of the religious sects or parties among the Jews, occupying a very distinguished position in their later history. The origin of the Pharisees is somewhat obscure. We may readily believe that after the return from the Babylonish captivity, when the nation was placed under foreign sovereignty, a tendency would soon show itself to form parties. The administration of the Persian, and especially the Syrian, government would naturally have an influence in assimilating the Jews to the rest of their subjects. Some would be inclined to yield to this influence, and others would hold the more strictly to the observances of their own law. The difference would probably be aggravated by the neighborhood of the Samaritans, hostile politically and, yet more, religiously. And the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, attempting to force the Jews into idolatry, would push matters to a crisis. It is to this period that we must ascribe the origin of the Pharisees. They are not mentioned by name till the New Testament times. But it has been supposed that the Assideans (probably meaning "the pious") of whom we read, 1 Macc. ii. 42; 2 Macc. xiv. 6, were the beginnings which they put upon it. For this our Lord especially reproveth them, showing how they had "made the commandment of God of none effect by their tradition," Matt. xv. 1-9. Their teaching on this point, as recorded in the Mishna, was that Moses received on Sinai both the law and the interpretation of it, with the command to commit the former to writing, but to deliver the other only by word of mouth to be preserved in the memories of men; that, accordingly, he communicated it to Joshua, Joshua to the elders, the elders to the great synagogue, from whom it was handed down through a succession of rabbis. Hence the Pharisees inculcated the most minute and frivolous observances, and to all these things they attached a greater degree of sanctity than to moral virtues, Matt. xxiii. 23. It was no wonder, therefore, that they were bitterly opposed to our Lord's teaching, which demonstrated the folly of trusting in these "weak and beggarly elements," declared that the only acceptable worship to God, who is a Spirit, must be that offered "in spirit and in truth," John iv. 24, and contradicted their favorite notion that they were the chosen ones who had a right to look down upon others as less righteous than themselves, Luke xviii. 9-12.

The Pharisees maintained the immortality of the soul and the doctrine of a resurrection. Hence St. Paul enlisted them in his favor in a council composed partly of them and partly of Sadducees, whose belief was far different, Acts xxiii. 6-9.

The Pharisees, further, are said, by Josephus, to have held that all things were controlled by fate, though not so as absolutely to take away man's free-will. But the account of the Jewish historian must probably be taken with some allowance. They were anxious to make proselytes, Matt. xxiii. 15, and as of republican principles they were in this respect, as well as in others, opposed to the more aristocratic Sadducees.

But after admitting all their faults—and they were great enough to deserve the strong condemnation of our Lord—it must be acknowledged that among the Pharisees there were those who were zealous and conscientious. Neither, generally speaking, were they chargeable with luxurious living or licentiousness of morals. Their grand

He flourished toward the close of the fifth century before the Christian era, and from the condition of a slave rose to be the disciple of Socrates and the friend of Plato. By the latter he was held in such esteem that one of that sage's most cultivated treatises on the immortality of the soul is called after his name. When Socrates was put to death by his countrymen, B. C. 400, Phædon retired to Elis, where he passed the remainder of his days. He was the author of some philosophical dialogues.

Returning to Europe, he founded the abbey of Neu-Montier, where he died in 1115.

PETER DE LEIA (li'ah) is well known as the great builder of the cathedral of St. David, in Wales. In the year 1176 he became bishop of the see; and finding the cathedral ruined by the incursions of the Danes and other pirates, he resolved on taking it down and erecting a new edifice. This he did, and the greater part of the cathedral was really raised by his munificence and zeal. There is a spaciousness and dignity about the nave and its aisles which produces an imposing effect, and the Norman work, which is bold and strong, is sufficiently ornamented to present a good specimen of that style. The roof of the nave, which is flat—as many Norman ceilings were—is of Irish oak, arranged in square compartments, with pendants on each side, connected with each other by a series of small Tudor arches, which are elaborately carved. Much of the cathedral has long lain in ruin, but the work of Peter de Leia which remains amply attests his architectural taste, although he was not able to raise a structure which could take its place among the greatest churches of the land.

PETERS, HUGH, an English fanatic, was born at Fowey, in Cornwall, in 1599, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained the degree of master of arts, but was expelled for irregular behavior. He afterward went on the stage, where he acquired that buffoonery which subsequently distinguished him in the pulpit. He was for some time lecturer of St. Sepulchre's, London, but afterward joined the Independents and went to America. At the beginning of the rebellion he returned to London, where he became a zealous preacher in the cause of the parliament and an active promoter of the king's death. For this he was tried and executed with the regicides, in 1660.

PETER'S PENCE, a tribute of a penny paid yearly by each family in England to the pope from about the eighth till the sixteenth century. It is still collected in places where the papal supremacy is acknowledged. It was originally offered voluntarily, but it afterward was levied. In the Norman laws of William the Conqueror it was recognized. Edward III. discontinued it when the popes resided at Avignon, but it was afterward revived, and it finally ceased in the reign of Henry VIII.

PETERS, RICHARD, D.D., was born in Liverpool, and in 1735 he came to Philadelphia as a clergyman of the Church of England. He continued to preach in Philadelphia until his death, in 1776, and he held different offices of trust and importance. He was greatly esteemed as an estimable man, "a gentleman of fortune and a most liberal benefactor of the Church." In his latter years he displayed a tendency to mysticism, and he leaned considerably to the views of Jacob Behmen and William Law.

PETERS, SAMUEL, LL.D. He was born in 1735, at Hebron, Connecticut. He was connected with Peters the Regicide, as his father was a descendant of William, who was brother to Hugh Peters. He was educated at Yale College, and in 1759 he went to London, and was ordained deacon and priest in the Church of England. He discharged the duties of the church at Hebron, preaching elsewhere in Connecticut. He was opposed to the Revolution, and in 1774 he returned to England and received a pension for property which was alleged to have been confiscated. He returned to America in 1805, residing in New York until his death, in 1826. He had been elected bishop of Vermont, but he was never consecrated.

PETRE (pet'tr), EDWARD, is deserving of notice because of his research in the department of literature in which he chiefly labored. When the cause of Romanism in Great Britain suffered by the dissolution of the religious houses and the transition of the colleges into the hands of the Reformers, the leaders of the Romish cause began to establish colleges and convents on the Continent. Petre devoted himself to the accumulation of the details connected with the foundation and progress of the seminaries which were established at Rome, Madrid, Valladolid, Seville, Rheims, Douay, Louvain, St. Omer, Paris, St. Malo, La Trappe, Ghent, Bruges, Brussels, Antwerp, etc., and thus he produced a record which is fraught with antiquarian and religious interest.

was one of the most learned and successful antiquaries of modern times. He enjoys the distinguished honor of having settled the controversy respecting the origin, date and uses of the round towers in Ireland, a subject on which for many years a vast amount of wild conjecture and speculation had prevailed. He held a government appointment in connection with the antiquarian and historical sections of the ordnance survey of the kingdom; and in consequence of his numerous important works on the ancient history, the religious condition and changes of Ireland, the old manuscripts, edifices and remains of the country, he received a pension from the Crown. His works are of special value, and they deservedly find a place in all important libraries. He died in 1866, aged seventy-five years.

PETROBRUSSIANS (pe-tro-broosh'anz), a sect founded about the year 1110, in Languedoc and Provence, by Peter de Bruys, who made the most laudable attempts to reform the abuses and to remove the superstitions that disfigured the beautiful simplicity of the gospel, though not without a mixture of fanaticism. The following tenets were held by him and his disciples: 1. That no persons whatever were to be baptized before they were come to the full use of their reason. 2. That it was an idle superstition to build churches for the service of God, who will accept of a sincere worship wherever it is offered; and that, therefore, such churches as had already been erected were to be pulled down and destroyed. 3. That the crucifixes, as instruments of superstition, deserved the same fate. 4. That the real body and blood of Christ were not exhibited in the eucharist, but were merely represented in that ordinance. 5. That the oblations, prayers and good works of the living could be in no respect advantageous to the dead. The founder of this sect, after a laborious ministry of twenty years, was burnt in the year 1130 by an enraged populace set on by the clergy, whose traffic was in danger from the enterprising spirit of this new reformer.

this Epistle, addressed to churches which had been founded mainly by Paul, may have been to oppose such views, and to show Peter's perfect agreement with Paul's doctrine.

Of the latter part of Peter's life little is known with certainty. He appears to have traveled about on missionary work, accompanied by his wife, 1 Cor. ix. 5. It is supposed that he visited Syria and the countries mentioned in the inscription of this Epistle, and that he subsequently went into the Parthian empire.

Some hold that he afterward went to Rome, and was there put to death by crucifixion in fulfillment of our Lord's declaration concerning him, John xxi. 18, 19; others maintain that he died in Babylon. Both parties, however, agree that he was put to death during the persecution of the Christians which took place under Nero, probably about 64 or 65 A. D.

The alleged visit of Peter to Rome during the reign of Claudius is altogether without satisfactory foundation. It appears certain that he had not been there before Paul's Epistle to the Romans (see preface to that Epistle); that he was not there during any part of Paul's imprisonment, see Acts xxviii. and the Epistles written at that period; and that he never was, in any sense of the word, bishop of Rome.

is here used as a mystical name for Rome has been favored by Roman Catholic writers, in order to prove the contested point of Peter's residence in the imperial city, and by some Protestant controversialists also as helping to identify Rome with the Babylon of the Apocalypse. But there is no evidence that at that early period the name "Babylon" was ever given to Rome; nor can any reason be assigned why such a name should at that time have been applied to it, or why Peter should employ a figurative name which, though adapted to a symbolical style, is plainly unsuited to epistolary writing. It appears, therefore, most reasonable to take this name, like every other in the apostolic Epistles, in its literal meaning, and to understand it as designating either the region of Babylonia or the city of Seleucia, which had risen up in the immediate neighborhood of ancient Babylon, and which is said to have contained a large Jewish population and to have been known in the apostolic age by the name of Babylon.

The Christians addressed in this Epistle resided in the different provinces of Asia Minor which are named in the opening address, ch. i. 1, beginning with Pontus as the most easterly province, and ending with Proconsular Asia and Bithynia. They appear to have been suffering persecution, ch. iii. 17; iv. 12-19, and to have previously received a complete system of Christian doctrine. But they needed to have divine truth brought vividly to their remembrance, to have their hearts strengthened and comforted, and to be further instructed as to some points of practical importance and difficulty in their present circumstances, especially as to their relations and duties as members of civil society, and as to their whole conduct toward the heathen around, who regarded them with unfriendly and suspicious eyes, ch. ii. 12-21; iii. 14-17; and at the same time to be cautioned against conformity to the heathen manner of living, ch. ii. 12, 16, and against thinking and speaking ill one of another, ch. ii. 1; iii. 8-11; iv. 8. And the elders or presbyters were in some danger of yielding to covetousness, ambition and self-exaltation, ch. v. 2, 3.

The style of this Epistle is remarkably concise and forcible, in accordance with Peter's earnest, practical and fervid spirit. While its whole teaching, both as to doctrine and practice, is in perfect harmony with that of Paul's writings, there is yet that diversity, both in thought and language, which shows that they were thoroughly independent witnesses for the common truth.

This Epistle is well described by Archbishop Leighton as "a brief and yet very clear summary both of the consolations and instructions needful for the encouragement and direction of a Christian in his journey to heaven, elevating his thoughts and desires to that happiness, and strengthening him against all opposition in the way, both that of corruption within and temptation and afflictions from without. The heads of doctrine contained in it are many, but the main that are most insisted upon are these three: faith, obedience and patience, to establish in believing, to direct in doing and to comfort in suffering."

The general object of the Epistle is stated in ch. v. 12, and it may be divided into two parts, comprising—

I. A salutation, ch. i. 1, 2, and introduction, ch. i. 3-12, followed by exhortations to love and holiness, ch. i. 13-ii. 10.

II. Particular exhortations and directions respecting specific duties, ch. ii. 11-v. 12, and conclusion, ch. v. 13, 14.

The second Epistle appears to have been addressed to the same persons or communities as the former, ch. iii. 1, but at a later period, and when the aged apostle was in expectation of speedy martyrdom, ch. i. 14. As the first Epistle has been mainly designed to confirm their faith and patience in expectation of fearful trials and persecutions from without, so the chief object of this second Epistle appears to have been to guard them against still greater dangers that would arise within the Church from false teachers, licentious professors and profane scoffers. For this purpose the writer seeks further to establish them in the faith, especially in the firm persuasion of the Lord's second coming, and to stir them up to constant efforts after growth in holiness and in all Christian virtue.

PETER, an eminent bishop of Lichfield, made himself celebrated in English Church history by the share which he took in the removal of the see to Chester, in A. D. 1085. In that year a council had been held in London, and the order to remove the see was carried by Peter, who removed to Chester, where he lived until his death, and where he was also buried. After the death of Peter the see was removed to Coventry, and in 1128 it was again restored to Lichfield, and the bishop assumed the title of bishop of Lichfield and Coventry.

PETER DE AQUABLANCA was a native of Savoy; and owing to the desire of the pope to exercise a lordship over English dioceses, he was accustomed to present foreigners to sees without regard to the interests of the people. The see of Hereford was given to Peter de Aquablanca, who ruled over it from 1239 until 1268. He was of low origin, and proved to be a turbulent, ambitious and mercenary man. In 1263 he was obliged to leave England for some time; but he managed to get back to his see. He founded a monastery at Aquablanca, the place of his nativity, by means of the funds he accumulated in England, and his heart was carried thither after his death. He aided the poor and was liberal to the cathedral and a monument was erected to his memory in the cathedral. It is placed between the aisles of the eastern transept and the choir, and it consists of columns, three open arches with canopies and an effigy of the prelate beneath them.

PETER OF BLOIS, so named from the place of his birth, was a learned ecclesiastic of the twelfth century who, settling in England by invitation of Henry II., obtained the archdeaconry of Bath and afterward that of London, becoming very influential both as a politician and a churchman. He was an elegant ecclesiastical writer, and is said to have been the first to use the word "transubstantiation." He died in 1200.

PETER THE HERMIT, a Frenchman who exchanged the soldier's dress for a hermit's garb, made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land about 1093, and on his return was the bearer to the pope of a letter from the patriarch of Jerusalem, detailing the sufferings of Christians in the East and the profanation of the Holy Sepulchre. been there before Paul's Epistle to the Romans (see preface to that Epistle); that he was not there during any part of Paul's imprisonment, see Acts xxviii. and the Epistles written at that period; and that he never was, in any sense of the word, bishop of Rome.

PETER, EPISTLES OF. The date generally assigned to the first Epistle is about 63 or 64 A. D., but some think that it was written as early as about 48 A. D., before the earliest of Paul's Epistles. The allusions to Silvanus or Silas as the bearer of the Epistle and to Mark as being then in Peter's company, ch. v. 12, 13, have been regarded as affording some evidence of its date. But no certain inference can be drawn from either passage. Some think that as this Epistle is addressed to churches which Paul had founded, and over which he continued to exercise a pastoral oversight, it may be presumed to have been written when he was either temporarily or finally withdrawn from his active labors.

This Epistle appears to have been written from Babylon, ch. v. 13. The notion that "Babylon"

guished by his talents, was born in 1556, of a noble Huguenot family, and quite early in life exhibited a remarkable precocity in literary attainments. At the age of twenty he appears to have been familiarly versed in all the learned languages, as well as in the sciences of ethics and mathematics. The perusal of the works of Aquinas is assigned as the cause which conduced principally to his abandoning the faith in which he had been brought up and entering the Church of Rome. His zeal for making converts was soon only equaled by his subtlety and ingenuity as a controversialist, whilst his efforts reached their highest pinnacle of success in making a nominal proselyte at least of Henry IV. At the special request of Henry, he composed his "Reply to King James I. of Great Britain," and received in reward the bishopric of Evreux and the archbishopric of Sens, with the dignity of grand almoner of France, in succession. Pope Clement VIII. at length elevated him to the purple. His death took place at Paris in 1618.

PERSEPOLIS (per-sep'o-lis), 2 Macc. ix. 2, a celebrated city of Persia, the capital of Persia proper, the frequent residence of Persian monarchs till the time of Alexander the Great, by whom it was wantonly fired. It seems in a degree to have recovered, as it was rich enough for Antiochus Epiphanes to attack and attempt to plunder it. It was some distance from the ancient capital, Pasargadae, and its splendid remains are yet seen at a spot called Cehl-Mindr, "the forty pillars."

PERSEUS (per'zeus), 1 Macc. viii. 5, the last king of Macedon, defeated, 168 B. C., by the Romans under L. Æmilius Paulus, at Pydna. His kingdom became subject to the Roman power.

PERSIA (per'zh'ah). This name is generally applied in Scripture to the wide Persian monarchy. In Ezek. xxxviii. 5, however, it appears to designate the region which may be called Persia proper; and this is separated from Media on the north by a mountain ridge; on the west it borders on Susiana (Elim), to the east on Carmania, and extends southward to the Persian Gulf. In the larger sense, Persia must be taken to comprehend the empire that extended from India to Egypt, including the wide regions between the Black Sea, the Caucasus, the Caspian Sea, the Persian Gulf and Indian Ocean and the Arabian Desert, together with parts of Europe and Africa.

The Persians were a brave and active people, vain and impulsive, but truthful and simple in their habits till they came into close contact with the Medes. Their own dress had been close-fitting, but they adopted the Median flowing robes and fondness for ornament, becoming by degrees a luxurious and effeminate nation. Polygamy was practiced among them. They worshiped a supreme god, Oromasdes, but believed also in other inferior deities, as Mithra, the sun, and Homa, the moon. They imagined, too, that there was an independent and very powerful principle of evil, Arimanius, or Ahriman. But at length this simple faith was alloyed with Magianism, the worship of fire and the other elements, a system that widely prevailed among the people of Western Asia. The two contended for pre-eminence, but a kind of compromise was effected; the old creed was retained, and the rites and ceremonies of Magianism were super-added. The language of ancient Persia was near akin to the Sanscrit; the modern speech is a modification of it.

the Church, John i. 35-42. But the two brothers continued to follow their business until they were summoned by our Lord to be in constant attendance upon himself, Matt. iv. 18-20. Peter subsequently received repeated proofs of his Master's esteem, being selected as a witness of the raising of Jairus's daughter, of the glory of the transfiguration and of the agony of Gethsemane.

The facts related of Peter in the gospel history bring out his character with remarkable distinctness. His ardent attachment to his Master, his appreciation of our Lord's divine person and mission, and his zealous and energetic activity, were blended with some measure of rashness and overconfidence in himself, which resulted at a critical hour in his triple fall and his bitter repentance. But after his restoration a great change is observable.

PETER (pe'ter), one of the most prominent of the twelve apostles, originally called SIMEON or SIMON. He was a native of Bethsaida, on the Sea of Galilee, John i. 44, and the son of Jonas, Matt. xvi. 17. At the time of his first appearance in the sacred narrative he was married and living at Capernaum, and, like the sons of Zebedee, followed the occupation of a fisherman, Mark i. 16, 30. Being brought to Jesus by his brother Andrew, he received from our Lord the honorable surname of "Cephas," or "Petros" (the one an Aramaic and the other a Greek word), signifying a "stone" or "rock," and containing a prophetic intimation of his future character and services in cost, Peter was honored to open the gates of the kingdom of heaven first to the Jews, Acts ii., and afterward, in the case of Cornelius and his friends, to the Gentiles, Acts x. And throughout the whole of the earlier portion of the apostolic history, Acts i.-xii., relating to the spread of the gospel among the Jews, he appears everywhere as the chief actor. After this, however, his ministry being chiefly confined to his own countrymen, much less prominence is given to it than to that of Paul, whose special mission it was to carry the gospel to the Gentile world. At the council held at Jerusalem respecting the obligation of the Mosaic law on the Gentile converts, Acts xv., he consistently advocated their freedom; but on a later occasion, at Antioch, a timid concession to Jewish prejudices brought upon him Paul's faithful rebuke, Gal. ii. 11-21. The Judaizing party, both at Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 12, and elsewhere, appear to have set him above Paul, as holding more to the law than that apostle. And it is not unlikely that one object of

He became a leader of the democratic party and a determined opponent of Cimon. He was eminent as a rhetorician, an orator and statesman. He excelled as a military leader; and so great was his eminence that when Thucydides was banished (B. C. 444) Pericles was almost absolute in Athens. published in defence of his doctrines, involved him in a controversy with Arminius which lasted until his death. He was also for some time suspended by Archbishop Whitgift for having subscribed or declared his approbation of the Book of Discipline.

PERPETUAL CURACY. Churches and chapels built and endowed by particular individuals have districts assigned to them, and are deemed perpetual curacies.

history, sketched its yet future fortunes, drew the accurate picture of its present state, but one endued with the wisdom which could flow from the Spirit of truth alone.

PENTECOST (pen'te-kost), the name, signifying "fiftieth," by which the Hebrew feast of weeks is known in the New Testament. It was to be kept the fiftieth day—that is, seven weeks, a week of weeks—after the Passover, counting from "the morrow after the Passover Sabbath," the second day of that feast, Ex. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 15, 16. It was a festival of thanksgiving for the harvest, which began immediately after the Passover; and the first-fruits were then to be offered to the Lord, Num. xxviii. 26-31. This was one of the three great occasions on which the Israelites were to resort to the sanctuary, Ex. xxiii. 14-17. And accordingly we find several notices in the New Testament that the practice was still observed, Acts ii. 1, 9-11; 1 Cor. xvi. 8. The giving of the law was also considered as commemorated at Pentecost; for it was delivered from Sinai on the fiftieth day after the departure of Egypt—that is, after the institution of the Passover. It was at Pentecost that the promised outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the gathered disciples occurred; and continually since, almost if not quite from the time of the apostles, has this great event been commemorated with solemn joy in the Church of Christ at the season now called Whitsuntide.

PENUUEL (pe-nu'el). 1. One of the descendants of Judah who was the "father" or founder of Gedor, 1 Chr. iv. 4. 2. A Benjamite chief, one of those who dwelt in Jerusalem, 1 Chr. viii. 25. 3. Gen. xxxii. 31. See PENIEL.

PEOR (pe'or). 1. A mountain in the territory of Moab, at the north-east end of the Dead Sea, Num. xxiii. 28. 2. Put for Baal-peor, an idol of the Moabites, Num. xxv. 18; xxxi. 16; Josh. xxii. 17.

PEPIN LE GROS (pe'pin le grō), or PEPIN D'HERISTAL (pe'pin day-ris-tal'), sovereign of France, but without the title of king, was grandson of Pepin the Old, and made himself master of Austrasia in 680. He carried on a war with Thierry, king of Neustria and Burgundy, and in 687 defeated and made him prisoner, thus virtually putting an end to the Merovingian dynasty and becoming sole ruler of France. Pepin was master of Austrasia for thirty-four years and of all France for twenty-seven years, under four nominal kings. He was a successful soldier, a wise governor and a promoter of religion. He sent Willibrord to preach Christianity in Friesland, and founded for him the see of Utrecht. Pepin died 714, leaving his son Charles Martel successor to his power.

PEPIN THE SHORT, king of France, first of the Carolingian race, was second son of Charles Martel, and was born in 714. On the death of his father, in 741, he became mayor of the palace (sovereign, under a nominal king) of Neustria and Burgundy, and on the retirement of his brother Carloman, in 747, of all France. In 752 he had Chaldeic III. deposed, and himself proclaimed and consecrated king at Soissons by St. Boniface. Two years later he was crowned a second time by Pope Stephen II., who declared him and his successors patricians of Rome. Pepin then marched into Italy to assist the pope against Astolphus, king of the Lombards, defeated him, acquired the exarchate of Ravenna and the district called the Pentapolis, and made a donation of this territory to the Holy See. This was the commencement of the temporal power of the popes. Pepin carried on wars with the Saxons, the Saracens and the duke of Aquitania. Died at St. Denis, 768.

PEPYS (pe'pis), SAMUEL, was secretary to the navy in the reign of Charles II. and James II. He was educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge. His position in the government brought him into contact with all the private details of government policy and with the leading men of his day. His correspondence was most ample, and his diary, which has been several times edited and published, with annotations, now takes a high place among the curiosities of court life and literature. For one hundred and fifty years his diary and correspondence had lain undeciphered, but now that they have appeared, their value is recognized as containing a faithful picture of the manners of the age.

PERCY (per'se), THOMAS, D.D., born in 1728, at Bridgenorth, in Shropshire. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and his first position after his ordination was vicar of Easton Maudit, in Northamptonshire. He became chaplain to the duke of Northumberland, chaplain to the king, dean of Carlisle, and in 1782 he was elevated to the see of Dromore, in Ireland. He died at Dromore in 1811, after a long life, earnest labor in the service of the Church, and his zeal for learning and the dissemination of polite and refining literature continued until his death. His influence on literature was much greater than that of most men of his age, and his numerous works have continued to appear in new editions from time to time to the present day. His "Reliques of Ancient Poetry" displayed great taste, research, and the work is still received as one of the most interesting of any age.

PERCY, WILLIAM, D.D., who was born in 1744, in Warwickshire, England, was educated in Oxford; and having entered the Church, he was induced to emigrate and accept the position of rector of St. Paul's Church, Radcliffeborough, in South Carolina, in 1816. He returned to London in 1819, where he died. He wrote on the nature, grounds and apology for the Episcopal Church, and several other works for the use of clergymen.

PERFUME. See ANOINTING, INCENSE.

PERGA (per'gah), a town in Pamphylia, upon the river Cestrus, about seven miles from its mouth. It contained a celebrated temple of Artemis, or Diana. Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel here; and it was here that Mark left them, Acts xiii. 13, 14; xiv. 25. There are some ruins of Perga, almost entirely Greek, sixteen miles north-east of Attalia, at a spot now called Eski-Kalesi.

To the church there one of the apocalyptic epistles was addressed, Rev. i. 11; ii. 12, 17. In that epistle it is called "Satan's seat," respecting which there have been various conjectures, but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given. The most feasible, perhaps, is that persecution, Satan's work, even to death, was already rife there.

mitted him, have devolved on Aaron and Miriam all the authority they coveted? Moses was not "meek" in the ordinary sense of the word, for we frequently read of his wrath, but he was thoroughly unambitious. So far, then, from personal commendation, he simply records, Ex. xii. 3, the fact that for his part his brother and sister might have had their way. What is there inconsistent with his authorship of the history in this?

NAPOLEONIC COLUMN AT BOULOGNE.—See MONUMENT.

Besides the question of authorship, there is yet another—that of the truthfulness of the record—which must be briefly looked at. If we cannot depend upon it as credible, it matters little by whom the Pentateuch was written. A large part of it comprises events in the lifetime of Moses—events many of them witnessed by the Israelitish nation, events published before those who could have exposed their falsehood if they were falsely reported, and who, from the temper they manifested, we may be sure would have exposed it if they could. The Pentateuch demonstrably moulded the manners of Israel; it contained the ordinances of their religion, based upon alleged facts; it prescribed their political constitution and rights, based also upon alleged facts; it regulated, moreover, their domestic habits, meeting them, so to speak, at every point publicly and socially. Their passover was to be observed because they had been delivered by divine judgment from bondage. The division of the nation was fixed because their early ancestor had twelve sons. Their priesthood was assigned to one of these tribes because of the zeal reported at a particular crisis to have been shown by that tribe. How could all these ordinances have taken effect unless the events which are said to have led to them really happened?

Attacks, however, have been made upon the credibility of the Pentateuch, and certain critics, not content with assigning different portions of it to different persons, have assumed that the Jehovist and Elohist have written, not according to the truth of history, but according to their own turn of mind, coloring events as their predisposition inclined them. Thus, as before hinted, the Jehovist is said to have been imbued with ritualistic tendencies, to have manifested a Levitism, as it is termed. And yet very many references to ceremonial observances appear in the so-called Elohist. Again, the Jehovist is said to have been anxious to exalt the patriarchs and the Israelitish nations. And yet it is in sections attributed to him, Gen. iii. 6, 16-24; ix. 20-27; xii. 10-20; xxvi. 6-11; xxvii. 1-36; xxx. 25-42; xxxviii.; Ex. xvii. 2, 3; Num. xi., xii.; xiv. 1-4, that some of the worst features of their history appear. So far, then, there is not much to discredit the truth of the history.

Such cavils, however, are petty and little deserving notice, as they are mere assertions of fanciful critics. Still more formidable objections have been urged. Thus it is alleged that the Pentateuch is contradicted by scientific discovery, that it contains demonstrable historic errors, and, which is the ground-work of every other objection, that it so deals with the marvelous, relating supernatural events, that it must necessarily be relegated to the domain of mythos or fiction. A few words shall be said on each of these points. As to the first, it is the narratives of the creation and of the flood that chiefly are assailed. Geological research, it is said, disproves them; long ages must have elapsed before the appearance of man upon our globe, and a universal deluge could not have occurred. Then, again, a greater antiquity is claimed for man than the Scripture seems to allow; and some will not admit that all the races of the world have sprung from a single pair. Now, it is freely confessed that interpretations were heretofore put upon the Mosaic narrative which science has contradicted, just as it was thought in earlier days that the Scripture had decided against the motion of the earth round the sun. Better examination shows that Gen. i. does not limit creation from the first almighty fiat to the finished preparation of Eden for man's abode to the short space once imagined, so that there might very well intervene vast periods sufficient for geological changes, with no contradiction to the sacred text. And geologists of the first reputation have seen and maintained that the two records are in harmony.

But there are, further, said to be historical inaccuracies; indeed, yet stronger language has been used, and many of the recorded events, we are now plainly told, are impossible. One or two examples must be given. We are told that Israel could never have multiplied from a family into a populous nation within the period during which they were held in bondage by the Egyptians. But, first of all, this objection overlooks the fact that Jacob went down into Egypt with a very large establishment. We may well suppose that it was not from the family only, but from the family and the dependants, with whom there would be intermarriages, that the nation sprung. But setting this consideration apart, it has been sufficiently proved and confirmed by modern examples that it is quite possible that the recorded increase could have taken place within the specified time, more especially when the divine blessing was vouchsafed purposely for this multiplication. Again, it is maintained that the vast masses of Israel never could have lived, as we read they did, with their cattle, for many years in the desert. But to this there are two answers. Modern travelers declare that the wilderness is not, as men are ready to suppose, all a bare and naked waste. Amid arid plains there are extensive fertile tracts, abundantly watered, and in parts of the year, at least, covered with vegetation. And so far from its being impossible for large bodies of men to traverse it, at this day the caravans of the pilgrims to Mecca, often including many thousands, pass directly through the whole length of the most desert portion of the peninsula. Besides, it is a gratuitous assumption that the Arabian wilderness was always as inhospitable as it is at present. There is strong reason to believe that there were anciently cities where now there is a sandy waste, and there are still visible the traces of works, yielding full proof that the country was once far more fitted for the sojourn of nomadic tribes than it is now.

The grand objection, however, to the truthfulness of the Pentateuch is the supernatural character of many of the events related; and men professing to know accurately what their Maker can or will do have gravely pronounced his special interference in the government of the universe, the work of his fingers, the domain of his power, impossible. Objections of this kind have a larger scope than the credibility of the Pentateuch; they affect the whole of revealed religion. So far as they can be treated in this work, they are considered elsewhere. See MIRACLE and SCRIPTURE.

The direct evidence for the truthfulness of the Mosaic writings is, at least, as strong as it is for any historical document whatever. We find the leading facts of them alluded to or presupposed in almost all the later books of the Old Testament. And many of those facts are treated as literally true by our Lord and his apostles. Here, especially, Christ's authority before adverted to may properly come in. Would he have grounded his pretensions on a book which was not literally true? Besides, though profane history does not reach so far back as sacred, yet it does furnish innumerable weighty proofs of the credibility of Moses. Every book of travels in the East is an additional witness. The manners are still very much what Moses describes them. The natural productions, the face and structure of the country, unite their voice. The cities of Bashan which he mentions—it was once thought with exaggeration—as so mighty yet remain to corroborate his statements. And, above all, there is the present condition of his people. Their destiny, as foretold in the Pentateuch, our own eyes may see. They are a standing miracle, a testimony resounding through the world, that it was no forger, no pretender to divine communications, no mere guesser, that traced from its origin the house of Jacob, narrated its early and then the particular "city of Nahor" in it is specified. When the reader was once acquainted with the country and place, it was natural to employ generally the special appellation, Padan-aram. But in Deut. xxiii. Padan-aram would be inappropriate, because Balaam was of Mesopotamia indeed, but not from Haran. When, again, it is objected that different phrases for male and female are used by the two writers, the objectors are not even accurate. Both phrases occur in both. And, besides, the one distinguishes the sexes according to their physical constitution, the other according to their moral personality. Such arguments tell very little indeed for the theory they are produced to support.

Dr. Kurtz has carefully examined the structure of Genesis. He finds that, besides an introduction, Gen. i.-ii. 3 it comprises ten sections; as ten is the number of completeness, the author thereby perhaps intending to indicate the completeness of the work. These ten sections, moreover, have distinct and similar superscriptions: "These are the generations," or, "This is the book of the generations." Here is the list:

The generations of the heaven and the earth, Gen. ii. 4-iv. 26.

The generations of Adam, Gen. v. 1-vi. 8.

The generations of Noah, Gen. vi. 9-ix. 29.

The generations of the sons of Noah, Gen. x. 1-xi. 9.

The generations of Shem, Gen. xi. 10-26.

The generations of Terah, Gen. xi. 27-xxv. 11.

The generations of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 12-18.

The generations of Isaac, Gen. xxv. 19-xxxv. 29.

The generations of Jacob, Gen. xxxvii. 1-1. 26.

Moreover, there are certain similarities of arrangement frequently to be observed in these sections. Is it likely, then, it may be pertinently asked, if two or more hands in different ages had been employed upon it, that the work could have presented the regular structure in which we have it? The same observations may be extended to the entire Pentateuch. And in addition to what has been previously said, it may be noted that there is a chronological thread running through the whole, according to which events are placed in orderly succession, any minor departure from this being only for the better arranging and completing of the histories to be given.

It is also alleged that there are traces of a later date, that the composition shows by its very form that it was posterior to Moses, that it uses names and refers to events of later occurrence, that it speaks of Moses as no man would have spoken of himself, and that one division, the book of Deuteronomy, is so evidently diverse from the rest that it could not have been composed till long after. These allegations must be briefly sifted.

An argument is taken from the frequently-recurring phrase, "unto this day," which implies, it is said, that a considerable time must have elapsed between the event recorded and the recording of it. Now, the phrase appears in Gen. xix. 37, 38; xxii. 14; xxvi. 33; xxxii. 32; xxxv. 20; xlvi. 26. Everything here alluded to occurred long before Moses' birth; Moses might very well, therefore, have employed the words. In Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers they do not appear. But we have them in Deut. ii. 22; iii. 14; x. 8; xxix. 4; xxxiv. 6. Of these passages there is but one which presents a difficulty. A bare inspection of Deut. ii. 22; x. 8; xxix. 4 will show that Moses might well have penned them. And Deut. xxxiv. 6 is necessarily excluded from the investigation, because no man supposes that Moses chronicled his own death and burial. Well, then, there is but Deut. iii. 14; and on this it may be said that the phrase had very likely come to imply little more than our "still," which may mean a longer or shorter period, that it is confessedly used in both the Old and New Testaments, when the interval was very short, Josh. xxii. 3; Matt. xxviii. 15. And if this be not altogether satisfactory, it must be urged that the use of the phrase generally in the Pentateuch is what we might expect, on the

and subsequently given, as that of "the city of David" to Zion and to Bethiehem. There is nothing to surprise in the old names being resumed; modern examples of such a resumption might easily be produced. As to Dan, there seems to have been another place, Dan-jaan, 2 Sam. xxvi. 6, so called, besides that which took its name from the tribe, Josh. xix. 47, but we have scarcely information enough to decide. After all, though the text as it is may be satisfactorily defended, yet who shall say, as it is likely that the hands of inspired men subsequently arranged some of the holy books, that a name may not have been for perspicuity exchanged, or a slight explanatory addition have been made, like the notice of Moses' death, such as those which occur in ordinary works without impeachment of their authority or good faith? Such minute objections will not in any presumption of the Mosaic authorship, frequently in the history of events long passed, rarely in the history of contemporaneous events, and then only in addresses made by Moses to the people. It may be fairly added that if the author of the Pentateuch were posterior to Moses, instead of one case in which there is some difficulty, we should have found many.

But it is said that places are called in the Pentateuch by names which they did not bear till after the days of Moses. Bethel, Gen. xii. 8, Hebron, Gen. xiii. 18, and Dan, Gen. xiv. 14, are examples of the alleged anachronism. But really little stress need be laid on such objections. The title Bethel might not be generally adopted till the Israelites had occupied Canaan, but as so solemnly given by Jacob it is reasonable to believe that it was from his time used by his descendants. Hebron was probably the old name of the city to which the title Kirjath-arba, "town of Arba," was additionally reasonable man's mind cast doubt upon the Mosaic authorship.

One more point must be here adverted to. The writer of the Pentateuch applies the third person to Moses, and speaks of him, it is said, as he would not have spoken of himself. It is perhaps necessary to notice only that remarkable passage, Num. xii., which, as appearing to involve self-commendation, has created the chief difficulty. We must bear in mind that Moses shrank from the charge laid upon him. In his earlier life, indeed, fired with a sense of his people's wrongs, he had zealously stood forth as their defender, Ex. ii. 11-14. But afterward he repeatedly declined the offered mission, Ex. iii. 11; iv. 1-17; v. 22, 23; vi. 12, 28-30. And even after the deliverance from Egypt we find Moses desiring to be relieved from his burden and rejoicing when others were called to share it, Num. xi. 10-15, 28, 29. Who can doubt that such a man would really, if it had been per-him back with this commendatory letter. It has always been admired as a model of graceful and delicate pleading. After alluding to Philemon's well-earned reputation for Christian liberality and Christian love, he bespeaks the exercise of these graces in behalf of Onesimus, who was now returning, a slave indeed according to human law, but also a "brother beloved," an heir of the same hope which inspired Philemon himself. Who could resist such an application from "Paul the aged, and in bonds," Philem. 9, the spiritual father, too, of his correspondent? ver. 19. We may be sure that Philemon was, as the apostle anticipates, ver. 21, ready to do more than he was asked, and received Onesimus back to favor and confidence.

PHILETUS (fi-le'tus), 2 Tim. ii. 17, an apostate Christian mentioned by Paul in connection with HYMENEUS, which see.

PHILIP (fil'ip). 1. The celebrated king of Macedonia, father of Alexander the Great, 1 Macc. i. 1; vi. 2. 2. A favorite and foster-brother of Antiochus Epiphanes, appointed lieutenant of his realm and guardian of his son, 1 Macc. vi. 14, 15. 3. Philip V., another Macedonian king, defeated by the Romans, 1 Macc. viii. 5. He died 179 B. C., in the forty-second year of his reign, and was succeeded by Perseus. 4. A Phrygian officer of Antiochus, 2 Macc. v. 22; vi. 11; viii. 8, sometimes identified with No. 2.

PHILIP. 1. One of the twelve apostles. He was a native of Bethsaida, and probably already known to our Lord when he was called to follow him. It was he who brought Nathanael to Jesus, and with Bartholomew he is generally named in the lists of the apostles, once, however, with Thomas, occupying himself always the fifth place, Matt. x. 3; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13. A few notices of Philip are found in the gospel history which may seem to show that he was of an active, inquiring mind, John vi. 5-7; and it has been imagined that he was the disciple referred to in Matt. viii. 21, 22. Of the later life and labors of Philip nothing is certainly known. He is said to have preached in Phrygia and met his death at Hierapolis; but traditions differ in regard to him. 2. Philip, or Herod Philip, Matt. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17. See HERODIAN FAMILY, THE, 4. 3. Another Philip, or Herod Philip, Luke iii. 1. See HERODIAN FAMILY, THE, 5. 4. One of the seven appointed to minister to the poor, Acts vi. 5. This Philip was one of the first who gave the gospel a wider scope, in this respect a kind of precursor of St. Paul. He was very successful in preaching in Samaria and working miracles there. Philip afterward was commissioned to meet an Ethiopian eunuch, whom he instructed and baptized. He then went to Azotus, or Ashdod, and having preached in various cities, came to Cæsarea, Acts vi. 26-40. He was a married man, and had four daughters endued with the prophetic gift, Acts xxi. 8, 9. No more is certainly known of Philip.

PHILIP II., king of Spain, was born at Valladolid, in 1527. Of a cold and gloomy nature, he was educated by ecclesiastics, who did their best to make him both a bigot and a despot and his reign an inexorable crusade against political and religious freedom. In 1558 he began a terrible persecution of "heretics," and achieved the fatal success of crushing the Reformation in Spain in the bud. He was the pitiless spectator at an auto-da-fé at which forty persons perished at the stake. As the husband of Mary, daughter of Henry VIII., he encouraged her efforts to extirpate the promoters of the Reformed faith in England; and many of the great and good men who suffered in her reign were martyred by the heartless, bigoted policy which he pursued. The most momentous event of his reign was the revolt of the Netherlands, first excited by his edict against heretics, and his attempt to establish the Inquisition there in 1565, and resulting, after long years of war and desolation, in the establishment of the Dutch republic. In 1565 he persecuted the Christian Moors of Granada, and provoked a revolt, which began in 1569, and after the greatest atrocities on both sides ended by the flight or submission of the Moors, in 1571. Philip died at the Escorial after severe sufferings, the fruit of his debaucheries, September 13, 1598.

PHILIP, JOHN, D.D., was born in 1775, at Kirkaldy, in Scotland. In 1820 he sailed as a missionary to South Africa, and for twenty-five years he was pastor of the Union Chapel at Cape Town. He was eminent for intelligence, zeal and successful labor, and he has justly been called the "Elijah" of South Africa.

PHILIP, ROBERT, D.D., was one of the most eminent of the dissenting divines in London of the present time. Maberley Chapel was the sphere of his labors. As a writer of popular and useful religious books he has long been held in great esteem, and his name is associated especially with his "Guides" and "The Lady's Closet Library." "The Guide to the Perplexed," "The Guide to Experience," "The Guide to the Devotional," "Guide to the Thoughtful," "Guide to the Doubting," "Guide to the Conscientious," are among the number of his admirable works. He published upward of twenty volumes of such writings, and in 1858 he died, in his sixty-seventh year, after a life of ceaseless labor, beloved and regretted by all who knew him.

PHILIP, THE MAGNANIMOUS, landgrave of Hesse, was born in 1504. He was a man of singular ability and energy, and the most illustrious among the German princes who supported the Reformation. He visited Luther at the Diet of Worms, and became afterward the friend of Melancthon, through whose influence he heartily embraced the doctrines of Luther, in opposition to the wishes of his mother and the efforts of his father-in-law, Duke George of Saxony. He contributed to the defeat of the Anabaptist Munzer, demanded liberty of religious worship at the Diet of Spire, endeavored to mediate between Luther and Zwingli at the Conference of Marburg, signed the Confession of Augsburg and was one of the principal members of the famous League of Smalkald. Philip was a zealous friend to science and literature, and founded the university of Marburg.

PHILIPPI (fil-lip'pi) was a city of Macedonia, founded by Philip of Macedon, and subsequently endowed by Augustus with the rights and privileges of a Roman colony. It was on the borders of Thrace, thirty-three Roman miles north-east of Amphipolis, and about ten miles from Neapolis its port, where St. Paul landed. It is distinguished in Christian history as the place of Paul's first preaching in Europe, when, in opposition to his own plans, he had been specially directed by the Holy Spirit to "come over into Macedonia," Acts xvi. 6-12. The Jewish worshippers there, to whom, as usual, he first addressed himself, were few in number, and consisted chiefly of women. His labors evidently had some success, Acts xvi. 13-15, 40; but they were suddenly cut short by tumult and persecution, in which the Roman magistrates sided with the mob, Acts xvi. 16-40. But the seed that had been sown yielded a rich harvest; and a church sprang up, which Paul afterward visited more than once, Acts xx. 1, 2, 6.

PHILIPPIANS (fil-lip'pe-anz), EPISTLE TO THE. The immediate occasion of this Epistle appears to have been the return of Epaphroditus, who had brought from the Philippians a pecuniary contribution, and who, while assiduously ministering to the apostle, had been seized with a dangerous illness. It was evidently written while Paul was a prisoner at Rome, see ch. i. 12-14; iv. 22, but at a later time than his other Epistles of this period, for his condition and circumstances appear to be changed. His confinement has become closer; others rather than himself now preach the gospel at Rome, compare ch. i. 13-18 with Eph. vi. 19, 20. He is anticipating the speedy decision of his case, and its termination, either in death or, as he thinks most likely, in release, ch. i. 25, 27; ii. 23, 24. It appears also that there had been time for the Philippians to hear of his imprisonment, to raise and send contributions to him, to be informed of the illness of their messenger Epaphroditus at Rome; and further for Paul to receive tidings of their deep concern on that account, ch. iv. 10-18; ii. 25-30. So that the date of the Epistles can hardly be fixed before A. D. 63.

This Epistle differs from most others of the apostle Paul in not having any marked and definite object, either to combat error or establish truth, to vindicate his own authority or to reprove and correct individual or social irregularities and sins. It is rather the effusion of a heart overflowing with affection and confidence. The apostle takes occasion of the return of Epaphroditus to communicate comforting news respecting his own condition, to strengthen and encourage the Philippians under their heavy trials and persecutions, and at the same time to give them fatherly counsels and cautions, and to stimulate them in their efforts after the highest attainments in all Christian virtue. These various objects are more or less interwoven throughout, and come alternately into prominence as one or the other feeling arose in the apostle's mind.

The nature of this Epistle is such as to preclude any formal arrangement. But it may be divided into four parts.

I. Introduction, ch. i. 1-11.

II. Personal matters, intermixed with exhortations, ch. i. 12-ii. 30.

III. Cautions and admonitions, ch. iii. 1-iv. 9.

IV. Grateful acknowledgment of kindnesses, with salutations, ch. iv. 10-23.

PHILISTIA (fil-lis'ch'a) embraced the coast plain on the south-west of Palestine, extending from Joppa on the north to the valley of Gerar on the south, a distance of about forty miles, and from the shore of the Mediterranean on the west to the foot of the Judæan hills. See PALESTINA.

PHILISTINES (fil-lis'teenz). The origin of this celebrated people is involved in much obscurity. According to the genealogy of nations,

MARY, QUEEN OF ENGLAND, WIFE OF PHILIP II.—
See articles.

Gen. x. 13, 14, they were of the Mizraimite race (Hamites) from the Casluhim, probably increased from the Caphtorim. Abraham found the Philistines in what is called "the south country;" and they were then but an inconsiderable tribe, evidently of pastoral habits, Gen. xx. Indeed, Abimelech, their chief, seems to have regarded the patriarch, with his numerous tribe of dependents, as quite equal in power with himself, and was glad to make a treaty with him at Beer-sheba, Gen. xxi. 22-32. Nor were the Philistines more formidable in the days of Isaac, for the then Abimelech urged as a reason for pressing his departure from Gerar, "Thou art much mightier than we," and afterward renewed the treaty of Beer-sheba, Gen. xxvi. 12-33. In the time of Joshua, however, the Philistines had not only largely multiplied, but were also in possession of that most fertile plain, the Shefelah, lying along the coast, between the Mediterranean and the hill-country of Judah and Dan. It may be that from the peculiar advantages of this district, into which they had introduced themselves, the tribe had naturally increased as a nation, or they may have been reinforced by fresh settlers from Egypt.

The Philistine country lay within the limits of the promised land, Num. xxxiv. 5, 6, and the Israelites ought to have possessed themselves of it. Indeed, it was actually assigned (some of the principal towns being specified) to Judah and Dan, Josh. xv. 45-47; xix. 41-45. But the opportunity was neglected; and five lords of the Philistines remained in five chief towns, to be a scourge to Israel through almost the whole course of their existence, Gen. xiii. 3; Jud. iii. 3.

An outline only of Philistine history, as connected with that of Israel, can be given here. The tribe of Judah at first occupied three of their cities, Jud. i. 18, but did not hold them long. And in spite of the valor of different champions, such as Shamgar and Samson, Jud. iii. 31; xiv. xv., xvi., the Philistine power grew so much that in the time of the later judges they had completely broken the spirit of the Israelites, and kept them in degrading servitude, Jud. xv. 11; 1 Sam. xiii. 19-22.

An attempt by the Israelites at freeing themselves in the time of Eli was signally defeated, Jud. iv., and it was not till the administration of Samuel that any great advantage was gained, Jud. vii. 3-14. The result, however, of the day of Mizpeh was that the Philistines were for a time confined to their own country. In Samuel's later days and in the beginning of Saul's reign their power was again felt; and when Jonathan gave the signal for war by destroying a pillar or monument set up as a mark of Philistine superiority, the people were so far from responding to the call that they dispersed and hid themselves, leaving the new king almost defenceless, Jud. xiii. Afterward, however, by Jonathan's valor in attacking a Philistine stronghold, and in consequence of an earthquake, a great and decisive victory was obtained by the Israelites, Jud. xiv. 1-47, and for some time there was no further Philistine war. The next occasion on which we read of hostilities was when, just on the Philistine border, David slew Goliath, and Saul, with his commander-in-chief Abner, defeated their army, Jud. xvii. But though they were worsted in the field, the Philistines retained their own territory; and David found with Achish king of Gath a secure retreat from Saul's persecution, Jud. xxvii. And then, taking advantage of the state into which Israel had been brought by Saul's misgovernment, the Philistines raised a vast body of troops, fought a successful battle in the heart of the Hebrew country, slew Saul and his sons, and established themselves in various cities and strongholds, Jud. xxviii. 1-6; xxix. 1, 2; xxxi.

When David became king over united Israel, the Philistines repeatedly attacked him, but always unsuccessfully. Under Solomon, while retaining some of their petty chiefs, they were tributary, 1 Ki. ii. 39, 40. Gezer, at the extremity of the Philistine plain, was given to this king by Pharaoh, and he deemed it prudent to fortify it and some other border-towns, Jud. ix. 15-17. When the kingdom was divided, we find both states from time to time involved in hostilities with the Philistines, Jud. x. 27; 2 Chr. xxi. 16, 17. And though Jehoshaphat and Uzziah obtained advantages over them, Jud. xvii. 11; xxvi. 6, it was not till the reign of Hezekiah that they were entirely subdued, 2 Ki. xviii. 8. In the Assyrian invasions and wars with Egypt the Philistine plain was repeatedly traversed by armies; and some of their towns, being considered in a military point of view important places, underwent sieges, Isa. xx. 1; Jer. xlvi. 1. At the Babylonish captivity the old hatred against Israel broke out, Ezek. xxv. 15-17, but on the return alliances were made by the Jews with Philistine women, Neh. xiii. 23, 24. Alexander the Great traversed their country and took Gaza; and Philistia was involved in the fortunes of the Syrian, Egyptian and Maccabæan and subsequent Jewish wars. At last it fell under and was disposed of by the Roman power, 1 Macc. iii. 41; x. 69-89; xi. 60-62.

Of the Philistine language we know little; it is generally supposed to have been Shemitic. The mechanical arts must have been cultivated among this people, for they were able to fabricate weapons and defensive armor, 1 Sam. xiii. 20. They also worked in the precious metals, 1 Sam. vi. 4, and must have had considerable skill in architecture, Jud. xvi. 26-29. They appear to have traded in slaves, Joel iii. 3-6, and probably possessed ships. Their government was a kind of federal union. The five principal cities had districts with towns and villages dependent on them, Josh. xv. 45-47, but in war they acted in concert; those that are called the "lords" had considerable influence in affairs of state, controlling the "king," as he is designated, of Gath, Josh. xxix. 3-9. The gods they worshipped were specially Dagon, Jud. xvi. 23; Ashtaroth, 1 Sam. xxxi. 10; Baal-zebub, 2 Ki. i. 2, 3. They had priests and diviners, 1 Sam. vi. 2, and carried their images with them in their campaigns, 2 Sam. v. 21.

The Philistines are said to have been a tall, well-proportioned people, with regular features and complexion lighter than that of the Egyptians. They shaved the beard and whiskers entirely. Their arms and accoutrements were peculiar. Their head-dress presented an appearance like feathers set in a metal band, with a defence for the back of the head and the sides of the face. They wore corslets quilted with leather or plates of metal. These were supported by shoulder-straps, and the arms were left free. They wore a girdle round the waist, from which hung a quilted skirt. They had circular shields, javelins and spears as missile weapons, and poniards and long swords for close combat.

PHILLPOTS (fil'potz), HENRY, D.D., was born in 1777, at Gloucester, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In 1796 he became a Fellow of Magdalen. He was presented to the rich living of Stanhope, in Durham, in 1806, and along with it he held the deanery of Chester. In 1830 he was made bishop of Exeter. He was considered "the representative of the extreme High-Church party." He published so many charges, tracts, sermons and controversial pamphlets that a list of them fills sixteen pages of the new folio catalogue of the British Museum. He became famous for his refusal to admit the Rev. Mr. Gorham to a parish in the diocese because he did not receive the doctrine of "baptismal regeneration." The protracted suit which terminated the controversy was decided against the bishop; and in one of his "Letters" on the subject he went so far as to excommunicate the archbishop of Canterbury. In his Parliamentary duties he displayed the same vigor and energy as he did in his diocese, and this mental vigor continued until his death, in extreme old age, in the year 1869.

PHILO JUDÆUS (fi'lo ju-de'us), a learned Jewish writer of Alexandria who was one of the deputation sent by the Jews to lay their complaints against the Greeks of Alexandria before the emperor Caligula, A.D. 40. He describes himself at that time as advanced in years. He was probably about sixty years old; if so, he was born about B.C. 20, and was contemporary with the events of the New Testament. He wrote many works in Greek, the principal of which treat of the Holy Scriptures, and have an especial value as illustrating the phraseology of the New Testament. Philo was well versed in the philosophy of Plato, and strove to show its harmony with the books of Moses.

PHILOLOGUS (fi-lol'o-gus), a Christian at Rome to whom St. Paul sent salutation, Rom. xvi. 15.

PHILOMETOR (fi-lo-me'tor), 2 Macc. iv. 21, a surname of Ptolemy or Ptolemy VI., king of Egypt. See PTOLEMY.

PHILOSOPHER (fi-los'o-fer), PHILOSOPHY (fi-los'o-fe). St. Paul was encountered by philosophers at Athens, Acts xvii. 18. These are described as EPICUREANS and STOICS, which see.

The "philosophy" against which the apostle warns the Colossians was of a different cast, Col. ii. 8, 18-23. It would seem to have been a mixture of Jewish dogmas with Oriental principles, and was the incipient budding of that heresy which afterward, under the general name of Gnosticism, but in many divisions, was so detrimental to the Church. See GNOSTIC.

The Grecian philosophy, which was also held by the Romans, was divided into different sects, arising from the differences which lay at the basis of the first elements of science. Some denied all religion, as the Academics and Epicureans; others, as the Platonists, Aristotelians and Stoics, admitted religion, but clothed it in such obscurity as to conceal, instead of developing, the truth respecting God and the soul. The following were the chief sects:

The Academics maintained the uncertainty of the impressions on the senses, and consequently of all judgments founded on them; they therefore asserted the impossibility of arriving at truth; they doubted the existence of God and the immortality of the soul; and they questioned whether or not virtue was preferable to vice.

The Epicureans denied that God exercised any providence over the world, or that he had care for mankind. They held that the world arose from a confluence of atoms; they held that there was no resurrection, no punishment after death, and that nothing was good but what was pleasing to the senses.

The Stoics professed to believe that there were gods, and that they exercised some providence over the world. It is said they held the world to be a god, thus seemingly approaching pantheism. They believed in the eternity of matter, and that the supreme god was corporeal; but they attributed all human actions to inevitable fate. They derived their title from stōe, "a porch," the place where they originally met for study.

The Aristotelian philosophy, says Mosheim, "considered the nature of God as something like the principle that gives motion to a machine; it is a nature happy in the contemplation of itself and entirely regardless of human affairs; and as to the human soul, it is uncertain whether Aristotle believed in its immortality or not."

The Platonists taught the existence of a divine being who governed the universe, and also the immortality of the soul; but they limited the power of God and represented him as destitute of many perfections; they had many superstitions respecting the soul and demons; they taught the immutability of providence, but mixed up many fanciful and erroneous opinions with these important truths.

The Eclectics—a word derived from eklegō, "to select"—were a sect of Christians originating about the end of the second century who selected from all the various systems such tenets as they believed were true. They preferred the doctrines of Plato, believing his views in respect to God, the soul and the invisible world as most conformable to the genius of Christianity. Ammonius Saccas, who founded the Neo-Platonic school at Alexandria, was the most important leader, and indeed the father, of this sect. It had existed in a floating, unconsolidated state for many years previously, Philo Judæus, Origen and others having adopted many of the Platonic views.

The Oriental philosophy, which extended over Persia, Syria, Chaldæa, Egypt, and even among the Jews, assumed to be "the right way of knowing God;" hence it assumed the pompous name of Gnosticism (see GNOSTIC, GNOSTICISM), and its chief aim was to account for the existence of evil. Evil, the opponent of God, could not reside in the Deity; it must, therefore, be without him; and as matter is that alone which is without or beyond God, matter must be evil; and on this principle they affirmed the eternity of two opposing principles, this form of dualism being fundamental in the system, which spread from the East and for several centuries affected the theology of the Christian churches in Palestine, Asia Minor, Egypt, and even in Greece.

PHILOSTORGIUS (fi-lo-stor'je-us) was an Arian historian of whom Milner in his "Church History," referring to the decision in the Council of Nicæa, where the question of the Deity of Christ was determined as the faith of the Church, says: "The minority at first refused to subscribe; but being advised to yield, at length, through Constantia their patroness, the emperor's sister, they consented; but by the omission of a single letter they reserved to themselves their own sense, subscribing not that the Son is the same, but only of a like essence with the Father;" and in a note he says, "Not 'homoousios,' but 'homoiousios.'" It is remarkable that this duplicity of theirs is recorded by Philostorgius, the Arian historian.

PHILPOT (fil'pot), JOHN, a son of Sir Peter Philpot, was born in 1534, at Compton, and educated in New College, Oxford, where he became a Fellow. He was made archdeacon of Winchester, and he diligently promoted the Reformation. On the accession of Mary he was seized, examined before Bishop Bonner and others, and on December 18, 1555, he was burned at Smithfield. His writings consist of theological treatises and translations from Chrysostom, Calvin, Curio and others. He was a man of great learning and humility, but of religious convictions which no terrors could intimidate.

PHILUMENE (fil-u-me'ne) was a female philosopher who aided the heretic Appelles to mature his system, in which marriage, the resurrection and the essentials of Christianity were repudiated. She lived in the beginning of the third century.

PHINEES (fin'e-es). 1. 1 Esd. v. 5, Phinehas, the son of Aaron. 2. 1 Esd. v. 3, identical with Paseah, Ezra ii. 49. 3. 1 Esd. viii. 63, identical with Phinehas, Ezra viii. 33. 4. 2 Esd. i. 2, identical with Phinehas, the son of Eli. But this name is introduced by mistake.

PHINEHAS (fin'e-as). 1. The son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron, Ex. vi. 25. He distinguished himself for his godly zeal when an open act of licentiousness had been defiantly committed by a Simeonite chief with a Midianitish female of rank. Phinehas with his own hand inflicted on them both, while in the act of sin, the just punishment of the law they had outraged. For this it was promised him that the priesthood should continue in his family, Num. xxv. 6-15. Phinehas was afterward appointed to accompany the expedition against the Midianites, Num. xxxi. 6; and we hear of him again when the trans-Jordanic tribes had erected an altar in opposition, it was imagined, to the altar of the tabernacle, Josh. xxii.

13-34, and in the war of Israel with Benjamin, Jud. xx. 28. He may be supposed to have succeeded his father Eleazar as high-priest, Josh. xxiv. 33, though the high-priesthood was for a time in the line of Ithamar. It was restored to that of Phinehas in Zadok, and continued in his family till after the captivity. 2. A priest, the ungodly son of Eli, 1 Sam. i. 3. 3. The father of a person engaged in weighing the treasures Ezra brought from Babylon, Ezra viii. 33. But possibly the first Phinehas is meant, and the word "son" here means, generally, descendant.

PHLEGON (fle'gon), a Christian at Rome whom St. Paul saluted, Rom. xvi. 14.

PHOCAS (fo'kas), bishop of Pontus, a Christian martyr of the third century, under Trajan, for refusing to sacrifice to Neptune, was put to death by being first cast into a hot limekiln and afterward thrown into a scalding bath.

PHOROS (fo'ros), 1 Esd. v. 9, identical with Parosh, Ezra ii. 3; x. 25.

PHOTINIANS (fo-tin'e-anz), a sect in the fourth century, who denied the divinity of our Lord. They derive their name from Photinus, their founder, who was bishop of Sermium and a disciple of Marcellus. Photinus published in the year 343 his notions respecting the Deity, which were repugnant both to the orthodox and Arian systems. He asserted that Jesus Christ was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary; that a certain divine emanation, which he called the Word, descended upon him; and that, because of the union of the divine Word with his human nature, he was called the Son of God, and even God himself; and that the Holy Ghost was not a person, but merely a celestial virtue proceeding from the Deity.

PHOTIUS (fo'sh'us), a patriarch of Constantinople celebrated about the middle of the ninth century for the brilliancy of his talents and the depth of his erudition. He originally distinguished himself by his learning and ability as a layman; but having at length entered the Church, he was, on the expulsion of the patriarch Ignatius, consecrated to the vacant see, in 858. During the succeeding ten years a controversy was carried on with much acrimony between him and the bishop of Rome, each party excommunicating and anathematizing the other, the consequence of which was the complete separation of the Eastern and Western Churches. In 867 Photius was removed to make way for the restoration of his old enemy

Ignatius, and was forced to retire into banishment. In 878, having acquired the favor of the emperor, he was restored, and maintained himself in the patriarchal chair during the remainder of that reign, but was once more removed in 886, and sent into confinement in an Armenian monastery, where he died in 891.

PHRYGIA (frij'ya), an inland province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Bithynia and Galatia, on the east by Cappadocia and Lycania, on the south by Lycia, Pisidia and Isauria, and on the west by Caria, Lydia and Mysia. It is for the most part level, and very abundant in corn, fruit and wine. It had a peculiar and celebrated breed of cattle, and the fine raven-black wool of the sheep around Laodicea on the Lycus was in high repute. The Phrygians were a very ancient people, and are supposed to have formed, along with the Pelasgi, the aborigines of Asia Minor. Jews from Phrygia were present in Jerusalem at the Feast of Pentecost, Acts ii. 10, and the province was afterward twice traversed by St. Paul in his missionary journeys, Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23. The cities of Laodicea, Hierapolis and Colossæ, mentioned in the New Testament, belonged to Phrygia, and Antioch, in Pisidia, was also within its limits.

PHRYGIANS (frij'yanz), or CATA-PHRYGIANS (kat-a-frij'yanz), a sect in the second century, so called as being from Phrygia. They took Montanus for a prophet, and Priscilla and Maximilla for true prophetesses, to be consulted in everything relating to religion, holding that the Holy Spirit had abandoned the Church.

PHURAH (feu'rah), the servant or armor-bearer of Gideon, Jud. vii. 10, 11.

PHURIM (feu'rim), Esth. xi. 1, identical with Purim.

PHUT (fut), or PUT (put), a son of Ham, Gen. x. 6, progenitor of an African people of the same name, sometimes rendered LYBIA, which see.

PHYGELLUS. See HERMOGENES.

PHYLACTERY (fi-lak'te-re), Matt. xxiii. 5, a strip of parchment on which some verses of Scripture, such as Ex. xiii. 2-10, 11-16; Deut. vi. 4-9; xi. 13-21, were written. Such strips were enclosed in small leathern boxes and worn by men during the time of prayer on the forehead between the eyebrows, or on the left arm near the region of the heart, being attached by leathern straps. Their use was to remind the worshiper that the law must be in his head and in his heart, and they were supposed to be preservatives against the power of demons; hence the name phylacteries—i. e., safeguards. The practice was founded upon a literal interpretation of Ex. xiii. 9, 16; Deut. vi. 8; xi. 18, and is continued to the present day.

PHYSICIAN (fe-zish'an). It is probable that the Israelites learned something of the healing art from the Egyptians. There are allusions in Scripture to the physicians whom Joseph retained in his service, Gen. i. 2; these, however, were embalmers.

At an early period of the world some medical and surgical skill was attained. Thus, we have mention of midwives, Gen. xxxv. 17; xxxviii. 28; and the operation of circumcision must have required a careful hand, Gen. xvii. 10-14, 23-27. We frequently read of external applications, Ex. xxi. 19; 2 Ki. viii. Also we find internal and mental maladies treated, 1 Sam. xvi. 15, 16. In later ages the science of medicine seems to have been more cultivated and the skill of the physician recognized, Jer. viii. 22; Mark v. 26; Col. iv. 14; see also Ecclus. xxxviii. 1-15.

The term physician is sometimes applied figuratively. Sin is the disease of the soul, and he who cures that is the most skillful of physicians, Isa. i. 5; Jer. viii. 22; Matt. ix. 12; Rev. xxii. 2.

PIBESETH (pi-be'seth), a city of Egypt, Ezek. xxx. 17. It appears to have had its name from Pubasti, or Bubastis, an Egyptian goddess, whom Herodotus identified with Artemis or Diana, in whose honor a great festive pilgrimage was yearly made thither. It was on the western side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile; and though its walls were destroyed by the Persians, it continued to be a place of consideration under the Romans. The site of the ancient city is now called Tel Basta.

PICARDS (pik'ardz), a sect which arose in Bohemia in the fifteenth century. Picard, the author of this sect, from whom it derived its name, drew after him, as has been generally said, a number of men and women, pretending he would restore them to the primitive state of innocence wherein man was created; and accordingly he assumed the title of New Adam. With this pretence, he taught his followers to give themselves up to all impurity, saying that therein consisted the liberty of the sons of God, and all those not of their sect were in bondage. He first published his notions in Germany and the Low Countries, and persuaded many people to go naked, and gave them the name of Adamites. After this he seized on an island in the river Lausnec, some leagues from Thabor, the headquarters of Zisca, where he fixed himself and his followers. His enemies charged him and his followers with great licentiousness. At length, however, Zisca, general of the Hussites—famous for his victories over the emperor Sigismund—hurt at their abominations, marched against them, made himself master of their island, and put them all to death except two, whom he spared that he might learn their doctrine.

Such is the account which various writers, relying on the authorities of Æneas Sylvius and Varrillas, have given of the Picards. Some, however, doubt whether a sect of this denomination, chargeable with such wild principles and such licentious conduct, ever existed. It appears probable that the reproachful representations of the writers just mentioned were calumnies invented and propagated in order to disgrace the Picards, merely because they deserted the communion and protested against the errors of the Church of Rome. Lasitius informs us that Picard, together with forty other persons, besides women and children, settled in Bohemia in the year 1418. Balbinus, the Jesuit, in his "Epitome Rerum Bohemicarum," gives a similar account, and charges on the Picards none of the extravagances or crimes ascribed to them by Sylvius. Schlecta, secretary of Ladislaus, king of Bohemia, in his letters to Erasmus, in which he gives a particular account of the Picards, says that they considered the pope, cardinals and bishops of Rome as the true antichrists, and the adorers of the consecrated elements in the eucharist as downright idolaters; that they denied the corporeal presence of Christ in this ordinance; that they condemned the worship of saints, prayers for the dead, auricular confession, the penance imposed by priests, the feasts and vigils observed in the Romish Church; and that they confined themselves to the observance of the Sabbath and of the two great feasts of Christmas and Pentecost. From this account it appears that they were no other than the Vaudois that fled from persecution in their own country and sought refuge in Bohemia. M. de Beausobre has shown that they were both of the same sect, though under different denominations. Besides, it is certain that the Vaudois were settled in Bohemia in the year 1178, where some of them adopted the rites of the Greek and others those of the Latin Church. The former were pretty generally adhered to till the middle of the fourteenth century, when the establishment of the Latin rites caused great disturbance. On the commencement of the national troubles in Bohemia, on account of the opposition of the papal power, the Picards more publicly avowed and defended their religious opinions; and they formed a considerable body in an island by the river Lantitz, or Lausnez, in the district of Bechin, and recurring to arms, were defeated by Zisca.

PICKERING (pik'er-ing), GEORGE, was born in 1769, in Talbot county, Maryland. He entered the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Church in 1790, and for some years he preached in Maryland and Delaware. He was sent to New England, and after laboring earnestly in Connecticut and Massachusetts, he was made presiding elder of the New England district. He was a man of indomitable energy, thorough earnestness and great zeal. Though not remarkable for genius, his piety and self-consecration, his lofty conception of the ministerial office and his economical use of time enabled him to accomplish far more for the cause of God than the irregular or spasmodic efforts of more brilliant men are known to produce. His preaching was clear, earnest and sincere. He was remarkably prudent, and it is one of the best attributes of his character which enables a biographer to say of him that he was a fine specimen of the Methodist preacher of the old school. He labored faithfully until his death, in December, 1846.

PICTET (pik-tay'), BENEDICT, was born at Geneva, and after a thorough education in his native city, he traveled over England, Holland and other Continental countries. He declined the chair of theology at Leyden, preferring a similar place in Geneva; and here he labored with great honor and zeal to the end of his life. He died in Geneva, in 1724, aged sixty-nine, having maintained a high character for scholarship, benevolence and assiduity in the discharge of his duties. He was the author of "Christian Theology," three volumes, quarto, in Latin; "Christian Morality," in eight volumes, duodecimo; "History of the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries," two volumes, quarto; "Treatise against Religious Indifference," "Sermons," "Letters" and "Tracts."

PIE (pe'ay), the name of a book which contained the rule and directions to find the service for every day in the year in the old Roman offices. Different offices falling together make it difficult to know what to read. The book was so called from being printed in red and black; hence the pages were variegated like a magpie, though in different colors. The Greeks called it pinax—i. e., the index. It was also called the Directorium Sacerdotum, the "Directory of the Clergy."

PIER (peer). 1. The part of a wall between doors and windows. 2. A name for a pillar, but improperly.

PIER ARCH, an arch between piers.

PIERCE (peerse), JOHN, D.D., was born in 1773, at Dorchester, Massachusetts. He graduated at Harvard in 1793, and then entered Leicester Academy as a preceptor. He then began the study of theology, and in 1796 he became a tutor in Harvard. In 1797 he was ordained and installed in the First Church in Brookline, and he continued sole pastor of the church for upward of half a century. His long, energetic life closed in August, 1849, and his demise was greatly regretted. He had been a member of the Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers for fifty-two years, for thirty-three years he had acted as secretary to the board of overseers of Harvard College, and for several years he was president of the Massachusetts Bible Society. He was a valued friend to the Historical Society, and the manuscripts which he prepared for it are of great value. He had a good constitution, was temperate, regular in his habits and punctual in all matters of detail. He was fond of music, and altogether he was an estimable man. His associations were usually with Unitarians, and yet the theological tenets which at an early period he drew up, and which in 1830 he transcribed, are such that many would receive as orthodox and trinitarian; but the theologian will see that they are really capable of a Unitarian interpretation.

PIERPONT (peer'pont), JAMES, was born in 1661, at Roxbury, and educated at Harvard, where he graduated in 1681. He was descended from an English family of eminent standing, and his father was a representative in the General Court in 1672. In 1685 he settled as pastor in New Haven, and he was honored from the outset of his ministry with great success. In 1677 he fell in with the arrangement which transferred his support from the church to the town, and he felt gratified that all the inhabitants heartily united in the plan. An aged man who had passed under the name of James Davids was brought into the membership of the church. His history had been mysterious, but after his death it was found that his real name was John Dixwell, and that he had been one of the judges on the trial of Charles I. One individual in New Haven had recognized him, having seen him often in London, but he kept the secret faithfully until all danger was past.

In 1698 Mr. Pierpont and two other ministers concerted the plan of founding Yale College, and as a trustee he was long exceedingly active. He read lectures on moral philosophy to aid the college, in which he took a deep interest all his life. In 1708 he was a member of the famous synod held at Saybrook, and the "articles" which were adopted as the result of the synod, and which constitute the well-known "Saybrook Platform," are said to have been drawn up by him. A sermon preached in the pulpit of Cotton Mather, at Boston, in 1712, entitled "Sundry False Hopes of Heaven discovered and decryed," is his only publication. He was a distinguished preacher and a very eminent man. He died on November 14, 1714, at the age of fifty-five. His grave is covered by the church edifice of the first parish in New Haven.

PIERSON (peer'sun), ABRAHAM, was born in Yorkshire, England, and educated at Cambridge, where he graduated in 1632; was episcopally ordained, came to this country in 1639, and settled in Boston. He lived in Lynn for a short time, whence he removed to Long Island to form a settlement. He held, with John Davenport, that all power, civil and ecclesiastical, should be lodged in the Church. He removed to Branford, Connecticut, where as pastor he preached for twenty-three years. He was zealous in his efforts among the Indians, and his people esteemed him greatly. He prepared a catechism for the Indians, and he had a regular salary from the commissioners of the Indian Department for his labors among them. The contentions about jurisdiction in Connecticut led him to abandon Bradford, and he removed to

New Jersey, calling the place where they settled Newark; and here, in a third settlement, and under laws of his own making, he lived until the close of life, in 1678. Governor Winthrop called him "a godly, learned man." He had collected a large library, showing his thirst for learning and the influence of his early collegiate training.

PIETISTS (pi'e-tists), the specific appellation of a party of Reformers in the Lutheran Church who appeared in Germany in the close of the seventeenth century, and were often called the Methodists of that country. They cannot be strictly described as a sect, for they neither claimed nor desired any severance from the main body of the Lutherans, nor did they promulgate any special theological doctrines. They aimed at an increase of piety and at a reformation in life and manners, and to this end they sought to promote a more evangelical spirit and a more profound view of gospel truth than they found prevailing around them. The leader of the movement, Philipp Jakob Spener, who has been called the Fénelon of Germany, was born in 1635. He was educated in the Lutheran faith at Strasburg, in which city he became a pastor in 1662. Thence he went to Frankfort, where he became famous for his denouncing the views of Calvin and advocating those of Luther. At length he gave heed to the remonstrances of some Calvinists, and he gradually adopted the conviction that virtue and not polemical philippics were required for the age. It was thus in his endeavor to evangelize his congregation that he established those meetings which subsequently formed the distinguishing feature of Pietism. The meetings which he established at his own residence, and where he explained the difficulties of Scripture and enforced the importance of a spiritual life, were greatly esteemed. The poorer classes flocked to them, and the "collegia" or body of inquirers collected together became famous. A revivalist feeling spread rapidly through Germany, and as yet opposition had not been encountered. In 1686 he removed to Dresden, bringing a number of students with him who became the lights of the Pietist school. Some of these students removed to Leipsic, and here they awakened opposition by their criticism of Luther's translation of the Bible. Attention was also drawn to the dress and the ascetic manner of these Reformers, and in time the lecturers were accused of heresy, and an investigation was demanded. The learned Thomasius defended the accused, and Francke, who was chiefly assailed, was acquitted, but the lectures were stopped. The prosecution stimulated the party, and "collegia" and Pietism spread rapidly to Hamburg, Giessen, Frankfort, Gotha and the towns of Switzerland. The Pietists, however, were driven by the old party from the university by threats of personal violence.

The leaders of Pietism were men of learning, and from them the same danger did not arise as from the ignorance and zeal of persons of no breadth of mind who were likely to fall into fanaticism. Some of them went so far as to call the Lutheran Church Babylon, and to predict its downfall. Spener died in 1705, and, shortly after, commotions became so violent that the executive had to interfere. Finally the overt acts of Pietism were proscribed, and the organizing of the members into a sect was effectually destroyed. The "reforms" demanded were that systematic theology, metaphysics and philosophy should be expelled from the theological schools; that morals, and not doctrine, should be made the staple of preaching, and that none except those of pure lives should be admitted to teach. Some who had a quasi-connection with the movement were accused with violent doctrines. The tenets of Pietism have appeared in the Wolfian philosophy, and others even until the present day continue to display a leaning toward the views of these Reformers of a previous age.

PI-HAHIROTH (pi-ha-hi'roth), a spot before which the Israelites encamped on their departure from Egypt when Pharaoh's host overtook them, Ex. xiv. 2, 9. It must have been near the northern end of the western arm of the Red Sea, or Gulf of Suez, perhaps eastward of Baal-zephon.

PIKE, JOHN GREGORY, was a very voluminous writer of religious works which have been in great demand. In 1830 his "Persuasives to Early Piety" appeared, and it had a great circulation. He wrote consolations of gospel truth, on apostasy, on popery and Christianity, on religion and eternal life, "The Divine Origin of Christianity," "Guide to Young Disciples," "Emmanuel, the Christian's Joy," "Christian Liberty," "Anti-Christ Unmasked," "Motives for Perseverance," "True Happiness" and "Sermons." All his works are evangelical, tender, lucid and impressive, and they have been of great use in the religious world.

PIKE, SAMUEL, who was born in 1717, was a dissenting minister of note who succeeded the well-known preacher John Hill at the Three Cranes, London. He was an admirable writer, and a clear, earnest preacher of very unwonted power. He wrote on "Natural Philosophy," leaning to the views of Hutchinson, "Saving Faith," "Saving Grace," "Free Grace Indeed," "Nature and Evidence of Saving Faith," "A Hebrew Lexicon," and along with Samuel Hayward he wrote the well-known and exceedingly useful work "Religious Cases of Conscience." The names of these works show the peculiarly theological character of his mind. He died in 1777.

PILASTER (pi-las'ter). In architecture a pillar engaged in a wall, usually projecting not more than one-fifth or one-sixth of its width. Pilasters are subject to the same rules as to height, form of base and capital. The term is used profusely only in ancient architecture, as pilasters were used in Egyptian, Greek and Roman buildings. The equivalent in Gothic architecture is an engaged column, usually in semi-column, when an arch had to rise out of a wall it was common to support the end on a massive bracket.

PILATE (pi'lat). Pontius Pilate was, as usually reckoned, the sixth Roman procurator of Judæa. It was under his government that John the Baptist commenced his ministry, Luke iii. 1, and that our Lord was put to death. Pilate entered on his office at the end of 25 or beginning of 26 A. D., in the reign of Tiberius; he held it about ten years, till a short time before that emperor's death. He was unscrupulous in the exercise of his authority, and instances are recorded by Josephus of his contempt of the Jews, as bringing the Roman standards with the emperor's image into Jerusalem. An atrocity is also referred to by St. Luke, xiii. 1, which Josephus does not notice. His behavior was equally tyrannical toward the Samaritans, and on their complaint to Vitellius, president or prefect of Syria, Pilate was ordered to go to Rome to answer for his conduct before the emperor. His deposition must have occurred in 36 A. D., most probably prior to the Passover. Pilate is said to have been banished by Caligula to Vienne, in Gaul; according to Eusebius, he put an end to his own existence.

The crime in which Pilate, as our Lord's judge, was involved is so frightful that we are almost involuntarily led to charge more of its malignity upon him than upon a fair examination he would seem to deserve. The history is familiar to every reader, and need not be here repeated, Matt. xxvii.; Mark xv.; Luke xxiii.; John xviii. 28-40; xix. Pilate was sensible that Jesus was without blame, and would have released him had he thought it possible without peril to himself. He was alarmed at the political charge urged against Christ making himself a king, and believed with reason that if he spared one so accused the emperor's jealousy would be roused. He was perplexed at our Lord's behavior before him, utterly unlike that of an ordinary criminal, and at his being said to be the Son of God, and must have thought of the demigods of legendary story, and perhaps apprehended if he condemned such a man that the wrath of some deity would light upon him. He was further troubled by his wife's dream and message. He tried, therefore, to cast the responsibility on Herod. He scourged Jesus, hoping that that punishment would move to pity and be deemed sufficient. He proffered the people the choice between the Lord and Barabbas, trusting that they could never prefer the robber; and as a last miserable expedient he washed his hands in public, as a token that he was guiltless of the Saviour's blood. "He was," says Bishop Ellicott, "a thorough and complete type of the later Roman man of the world. Stern but not relentless, shrewd and world-worn, prompt and practical, haughtily just, and yet . . . self-seeking and cowardly, able to perceive what was right, but without moral strength to follow it out, the sixth procurator of Judæa stands forth a terrible instance of a man whom the fear of endangered self-interest drove not only to act against the deliberate convictions of his heart and his conscience, but further to commit an act of the utmost cruelty and injustice, even after those convictions had been deepened by warnings and strengthened by presentiments."

PILHAHA (pil'e-ha), one who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 24.

PILGRIM (pil'grim), one who travels through foreign countries to visit holy places and to pay his devotion to the relics of dead saints. The word is formed from the Flemish pelgrim, or Italian pelegrino, which signifies the same; and these originally from the Latin peregrinus, a stranger or traveler.

PILGRIMAGE (pil'grim-aj), a kind of religious discipline which consists in taking a journey to some holy place in order to adore the relics of some deceased saint. The earliest pilgrimage on record is, perhaps, that of Helena, the wife of Constantius, to the Holy Land; but pilgrimages became very general after the end of the eleventh century, when every one was for visiting places of devotion, not excepting kings and princes; and even bishops made no difficulty of being absent from their churches on the same account. The places most visited were Jerusalem, Rome, Tours and Compostella. As to the latter place, we find that in the year 1428, under the reign of Henry VI., abundance of licenses were granted by the crown of England to captains of English ships for carrying numbers of devout persons thither, to the shrine of St. James; provided, however, that those pilgrims should first take an oath not to convey anything prejudicial to England, nor to reveal any of its secrets, nor to carry out with them any more gold or silver than what would be sufficient for their reasonable expenses. In this year there went thither from England on the said pilgrimage the following number of persons: From London, 280; Bristol, 200; Weymouth, 122; Dartmouth, 90;

Yarmouth, 60; Jersey, 60; Plymouth, 40; Exeter, 30; Poole, 24; Ipswich, 20; in all, 926 persons. Of late years the greatest numbers have resorted to Loretto, to visit the chamber of the Blessed Virgin, in which she was born, and brought up her son Jesus till he was twelve years of age.

In almost every country where popery has been established pilgrimages have been common. In England the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket was the chief resort of the pious; and in Scotland, St. Andrews, where, as tradition informs us, was deposited a leg of the holy apostle. In Ireland they have been continued even down to modern times; for from the beginning of May till the middle of August every year crowds of popish penitents from all parts of that country were accustomed to resort to an island near the centre of Lough Fin, or White Lake, in the county of Donegal, to the number of three thousand or four thousand. These were mostly of the poorer sort, and many of them were proxies for those who were richer, some of whom, however, together with some of the priests and bishops on occasion, made their appearance there. Of late years this pilgrimage met with discouragement from the clergy.

There are, however, other parts of Ireland sacred to extraordinary worship and pilgrimage; and the number of holy wells and miraculous cures, etc., produced by them, is very great. That such things should exist in this enlightened age, and in a Protestant country, is indeed strange; but our wonder ceases when we reflect that it is among the lowest, and perhaps the most ignorant, class of the people.

Pilgrimage, however, is not peculiar to Roman Catholic countries; the Mohammedans place a great part of their religion in it. Mecca is the grand place to which they go; and this pilgrimage is so necessary a point of practice that, according to a tradition of Mohammed, he who dies without performing it may as well die a Jew or a Christian; and the same is expressly commanded in the Koran.

What is principally revered in this place, and gives sanctity to the whole, is a square stone building, called the Caaba. Before the time of Mohammed this temple was a place of worship for the idolatrous Arabs, and is said to have contained no less than three hundred and sixty different images, equaling in number the days of the Arabian year. They were all destroyed by Mohammed, who sanctified the Caaba, and appointed it to be the chief place of worship for all true believers. The Mussulmans pay so great a veneration to it that they believe a single sight of its sacred walls, without any particular act of devotion, is as meritorious in the sight of God as the most careful discharge of one's duty for the space of a whole year in any other temple.

To this temple every Mohammedan who has health and means sufficient ought once, at least, in his life to go on pilgrimage; nor are women excused from the performance of this duty. The pilgrims meet at different places near Mecca, according to the different parts from whence they come, during the months of Shawal and Dhu'lkaada, being obliged to be there by the beginning of Dhu'lhajja, which month, as its name imports, is peculiarly set apart for the celebration of the solemnity.

The men put on the ihram, or sacred habit, which consists only of two woolen wrappers, one wrapped about the middle and the other thrown over the shoulders, having their heads bare, and a kind of slippers which cover neither the heel nor the instep, and so enter the sacred territory in their way to Mecca. While they have this habit on they must neither hunt nor fowl (though they are allowed to fish); which precept is so punctually observed that they will not kill vermin if they find them on their bodies. There are some noxious animals, however, which they have permission to kill during the pilgrimage, as kites, ravens, scorpions, mice and dogs given to bite. During the pilgrimage it behooves a man to have a constant guard over his words and actions; to avoid all quarreling or ill language, all converse with women and all obscene discourse; and to apply his whole attention to the good work he is engaged in.

The pilgrims, having arrived at Mecca, immediately visit the temple, and then enter on the performance of the prescribed ceremonies, which consist chiefly in going in procession around the Caaba, in running between the mounts Safa and Meriva, in making the station on Mount Arafat and slaying the victims and shaving their heads in the valley of Mina.

In heathen countries the two most memorable places of resort are the temple of the grand lama in Thibet, the temple of Juggernaut at Orissa, and other celebrated temples of Hindoo worship in India.

Dr. Johnson gives us some observations on pilgrimage which are so much to the purpose that we shall here present them to the reader: "Pilgrimage, like many other acts of piety, may be reasonable or superstitious, according to the principles upon which it is performed. Long journeys in search of truth are not commanded; truth, such as is necessary to the regulation of life, is always found where it is honestly sought; change of place is no natural cause of the increase of piety, for it inevitably produces dissipation of mind. Yet, since men go every day to view the fields where great actions have been performed, and return with stronger impressions of the event, curiosity of the same kind may naturally dispose us to view that country whence our religion had its beginning. That the Supreme Being may be more easily propitiated in one place than in another is the dream of idle superstition; but that some places may operate upon our own minds in an uncommon manner is an opinion which hourly experience will justify. He who supposes that his vices may be more successfully combated in Palestine will, perhaps, find himself mistaken, yet he may go thither without folly; he who thinks they will be more freely pardoned, dishonors at once his reason and his religion."

The influences which prompted to the practice of pilgrimages is still operative in the present day, as may be seen in France, in England and in the United States. Even among the educated Romanists in England it has become publicly recognized as a means of grace to go to places where the Virgin Mary is reported to have lately appeared; and from the United States the effort is being made to inaugurate the practice of visiting Rome in a pilgrimage to do honor to the head of the Church.

PILKINGTON (pil'king-tun), JAMES, a celebrated prelate of the English Church. He was born in 1520, at Rivington, in Lancashire, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became Master. On the accession of Mary he had to fly to Geneva, but on his return, in 1561, he was made bishop of Durham. He was an exceedingly learned man and a great theo-

PILMORE (pil'more), JOSEPH, D.D., was born in 1734, at Tadmouth, in Yorkshire, England. At an early age he became acquainted with John Wesley, who placed him in his famous school at Kingswood, where he acquired some knowledge of Latin, Greek and Hebrew. He then began to travel as a helper, but he was not ordained by Mr. Wesley. His personal appearance was fine, PIMENIOLA (pim-e-ne-o'la) was the wife of the celebrated Lupus, the bishop of Troyes. She was sister to Hilary, the bishop of Arles; and as Lupus was brother to the famous Vincentius Lirinensis, she was sister-in-law to the latter. He did not deserve such a wife, for seven years after his marriage he deserted her and his children to join Honoratus, who was engaged in laying the foundation of the convent at Lerins. Thus in the fifth century monkish asceticism had succeeded in leading men to false ideas of life, of family duty and of vows to God.

PIN, Jud. xvi. 14; Ezek. xv. 3. See NAIL, WEAVING.

PINE, PINE TREE. We find "pine," or "pine tree," only three times in our version of the Scripture, Neh. viii. 15; Isa. xli. 19; lx. 13, and in all these places the translation is erroneous. In the first-named the oil tree, the wild olive, or oleaster, is meant. In the two other passages, though Henderson renders "pine" and others propose elm and plane tree, Gesenius with more reason prefers hard oak, holm, ilex. The "ash," Isa. xli. 19, in all probability designates a pine. See ASH TREE.

PINNACLE (pin'na-k'l), a small spire-like ornament placed on the top of a buttress or gable. The spire is large, being the covering of a tower; a turret is of smaller dimensions, usually covering a winding staircase; and a pinnacle is still smaller, being merely an ornamental finish of a buttress or apex of a gable.

PINNACLE OF THE TEMPLE, some particular elevation or summit in the temple buildings, from which the tempter would have had our Lord to cast himself down, Matt. iv. 5; Luke iv. 9. In each of the Evangelists the article is used—the pinnacle or wingle of the temple—pointing to some well-known and elevated point. It is generally understood to be the summit of the southern portico, which not only itself rose to a great height, but impended over the valley of Jehoshaphat, rendering it in the strictest sense a giddy elevation.

PIOMIUS (pe-o'me-us) was an eminent martyr who suffered A. D. 169. At the same period Germanus bore a similar testimony for the truth.

PIOUS FRAUDS are those artifices which have been used to propagate religion and to advance the interests of the Church. In the Church of Rome such attempts, instead of being frowned upon and openly denounced as immoral, have very generally been tolerated. Thus, winking images of saints, supposed cures at holy wells, appearances of the Virgin Mary and other saints, have all been used to influence the ignorant and the credulous; but the practice and the name are both indefensible. No fraud can be pious, and to do evil that good may come is clearly denounced by Paul, Rom. iii. 8, as deserving condemnation.

gian, and he deserves especial notice because of the fact that he was one of the most earnest of the early promoters of the study of Greek literature in England. He wrote commentaries on Haggai, Obadiah, Nehemiah, Ecclesiastes, the Epistle to the Galatians and the Epistles of Peter. He also wrote a "Defence of the English Service." He died in 1575, leaving behind him the character of a great and good man.

PILL, PILLED, Gen. xxx. 37, 38. Peeled, stripped off.

PILLAR (pil'lar). Pillars are spoken of in Scripture as supporting a building, Jud. xvi. 26, 29, or placed for ornaments, 1 Ki. vii. 15-32. Pillars were sometimes set up as trophies or memorials, and with a religious purpose libations were poured upon them; they were also inscribed, Gen. xxviii. 18; 2 Sam. xviii. 18.

The word is often used in a symbolical sense, as to describe the columnar form in which the divine Presence was manifested, Ex. xliii. 21. "The plain of the pillar," Jud. ix. 6, is rather his voice exceedingly effective and his manners most pleasing; and hence the weight of his themes and his mode of address made him exceedingly popular. In 1769 he offered to go to the colonies as a lay-helper, and from Maine to Georgia he preached with marked ability. During the Revolutionary struggle the preachers in connection with Mr. Wesley held it prudent to desist, and at the close of the war Mr. Pilmore sought and obtained ordination from Bishop Seabury, of Connecticut. He was forthwith settled in the northern suburb of Philadelphia, and from 1789 until 1794 he was employed in St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia. He went to Christ Church, New York, in 1794, and in 1804 he returned to St. Paul's Church again; and here he labored until declining health rendered it needful that an assistant should be provided, and in 1821 he received the aid of the Rev. Benjamin Allen. He died in 1825, in the ninety-first year of his age. He was earnest and faithful to the last; and during his life he was greatly blessed among young men, and his communion seasons were felt by his large charge to be special times of spiritual refreshment.

PIRAM (pi'ram), the king of Jarmuth, one of the Amorite chiefs who leagued against Israel after the submission of Gibeon, Josh. x. 3.

PIRATHON (pir'a-thon), PIRATHONITES (pir'a-thon-ites), a place in the land of Ephraim, Jud. xii. 15. It is now called Ferata, six miles from Nablous.

PIRNENSIANS (pir-nen'zh'ans), a medieval sect, taking its name and origin from John Pirnensis, of Silesia, about A. D. 1341. His principles were illustrated especially in the Beghards and the Brethren of the Free Spirit.

PISCATOR (pis-ka'tor), JOHN FISCHER, was a celebrated professor of theology at Strasburg. Having subscribed to the creed of the Calvinists, he was obliged to remove from Strasburg to Herborn. He died A. D. 1546. He was the author of valuable commentaries on the Old and New Testaments, which are still sought after. He also left a work in quarto on religion, in which he treated with Vorstius on matters respecting which they differed.

PISCINA (pis-se'na), a stone basin with a drain from it, made in churches for the priest to wash his hands in during mass, or to cleanse the vessels after the service.

PISCIS (pis'sis). This is a Latin word signifying a fish. It is a symbol of our Lord, the Latin equivalent of the Greek word "Ichthys." See ICHTHYS. A window of a peculiar shape, called a "fish window," may be seen in many old churches, especially in edifices of the Old English period. It was a symbol, and its name was derived from its form, which was pointed at top and bottom, being made of two arcs of a circle.

PISE (peeze), CHARLES CONSTANTINE, D.D., was born in 1802, at Annapolis, Maryland. He studied theology at Rome, and on his return he taught rhetoric at Mount St. Mary, Emmetsburg. He entered the priesthood in 1825, and served at Fredericktown and Baltimore, Maryland. Here he wrote a "History of the Church to the Reformation" and "Father Rowland," a tale in reply to the well-known work "Father Clement." He again went to Rome, where the degree of doctor of divinity was conferred on him, and he was also made a knight of the Holy Roman empire. On his return he labored in Washington, and acted as chaplain to the Senate. From Washington he went to New York, where he held several churches, and in 1849 he removed to Brooklyn, where he died in 1866. He was a voluminous writer. He was the author of a poem entitled "The Acts of the Apostles," "Zenosius, or the Pilgrim Convert," "Indian Cottage," "Aletheia, or Letters on the Truth of the Catholic Doctrine," "Letters to Ada," "Christianity and the Church," "Lives of Ignatius and his First Companions," "Notes on a Protestant Catechism," "The Catholic Bride" and "Hore Vagabondæ," the latter being a sketch of Irish scenes and manners.

PISGAH (pis'gah), a ridge or summit in the mountains of Abarim, on the east of the Dead Sea, toward the wilderness. It was in the territory afterward assigned to Reuben, consequently to the north of the Arnon, Num. xxi. 20. The view from Pisgah must have been extensive, as it was to the point Nebo, probably the loftiest height of the ridge, that Moses was commanded to ascend in order to feast his eyes before closing them in death with the view of that delightful land which for his sin he was forbidden to enter.

PISIDIA (pis-sid'e-a), a province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Phrygia, on the west by Caria and Lycia, on the south by Pamphylia, and on the east by Cilicia and Isauria. It was a mountainous region; and it was probably among the defiles of Pisidia that the apostle Paul experienced some of those "perils of robbers" of which he speaks in 2 Cor. xi. 26; and perhaps fear of the bandits that inhabited them had something to do with John's abrupt departure from Paul and Barnabas just as they were about to enter Pisidia, Acts xiii. 13, 14.

bottom, as in Job ix. 31, where our translators render "ditch." It also signifies the grave, Job xxxiii. 24; Ps. xxx. 9, and thence death, or corruption the consequence of death, Ps. xvi. 10; xlix. 9. Shôl is often translated "pit," Num. xvi. 30, 33; it means the unseen world. See HELL.

PITCH. The more proper term for what goes by the name of pitch in Scripture is asphalt or bitumen, a dark, inflammable substance, which in certain places boils up from subterranean fountains, but hardens by exposure to the atmosphere, and in the liquid state is well adapted for use as a cement. There are no fewer than three Hebrew words employed as designations of it in three aspects: zepheth when liquid, hhemar in the solid state, and côpher in reference to its use in overlaying wood-work.

dise, which is said to have "compassed the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold," Gen. ii. 11. It has been vainly sought to be identified with various existing rivers, such as the Ganges, Indus, Phasis, etc. See EDEN.

PISPAH (pis'pah), a chieftain of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 38.

PIT. There are several Hebrew words which are more or less frequently rendered "pit" by our translators. Bôr is generally a cistern or tank constructed as a receptacle for rain-water. See CISTERN. And as these places when empty were used as dungeons, the word has the signification of a prison, Zech. ix. 11; it also denotes a grave or sepulchre hewn in the rock, Ps. xxviii. 1; Isa. xiv. 15, 19. The word mahâmôrôth occurs only once, Ps. cxl. 10; it means whirlpools, abysses of water. Shahhath properly is a sinking; hence a pit or chasm used for a pit-fall, Ezek. xiv. 4, 8, and figuratively for plots, treachery or peril, Ps. vii. 15; ix. 15; Prov. xxvi. 27. Sometimes the word denotes a hole or cistern with mire at the bottom, as in Job ix. 31, where our translators render "ditch." It also signifies the grave, Job xxxiii. 24; Ps. xxx. 9, and thence death, or corruption the consequence of death, Ps. xvi. 10; xlix. 9. Shôl is often translated "pit," Num. xvi. 30, 33; it means the unseen world. See HELL.

PITHOM (pi'thom), one of the "treasure-cities" which the Israelites built in the land of Goshen "for Pharaoh," Ex. i. 11. The site is by general consent identified with that of the Patumos of Herodotus, which was situated on the east side of the Pelusiac arm of the Nile, not far from the canal which unites the Nile with the Red Sea, in the Arabian part of Egypt.

PITHON (pi'thon), a descendant of King Saul, 1 Chr. viii. 35.

PITMAN (pit'man), CHARLES, D.D., was born in 1796, near Cookstown, New Jersey. He early manifested a serious disposition, and having united with the Methodist Church he was licensed to preach in 1815 in the New Mills circuit. In 1818 he was admitted as a minister on trial in the Philadelphia Conference, and he soon rose to great fame. In 1826-29 he was presiding elder in the laurin, on the Newtonian discoveries." Lord Jeffrey says of him: "He was certainly one of the best writers of his age, and we do not now recollect any one of his contemporaries who was so great a master of composition." He did much to sustain the high character of the university in the days of Dugald Stewart and the other men of note whose names have been so thoroughly associated with that great seat of learning.

PLEDGE (pledj), something deposited as security for an act to be done or a payment to be made. Thus Judah gave his signet to Tamar as security for the kid he promised to send her, Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18. The Mosaic law was very tender to the debtor in respect of pledges. If the raiment was taken, it was to be restored before sunset, Ex. xxii. 26, 27. Neither the upper nor the nether millstone was to be taken in pledge, because the want of it would interfere with the daily food of the household, Deut. xxiv. 6. The creditor, moreover, was not to enter a house for a pledge, but to wait at the door till the debtor brought it him, Deut. xxiv. 10, 11. Various other merciful regulations were made, Deut. xxiv. 12, 13, 14; and harshness in retaining pledges was often censured, Job xxii. 6; Ezek. xviii. 7, 12, 16.

PLEIADES (pli'a-deez). See ASTRONOMY.

PLENARY (ple'na-re) ABSOLUTION, the full forgiveness of sins to a penitent who has made a full and sincere confession. Some sins are reserved for the absolution of a higher authority than that of a priest; nevertheless, when death is imminent, a full absolution may be given.

PLEROMA (ple-ro'ma), a term among the Gnostics, who held that the Supreme Being resided in the mansions of light, and they were accustomed to call his abode "the pleroma," or the celestial regions where the æons or emanations of the deity dwelt.

PLOTINUS (plo-te'nus) was associated with Longinus, Herennius, Origen and Herocles as a pupil of Arminius Saccas in the school of the later Platonists at Alexandria in the third century. The school really view Christianity as a corruption of Platonism. Plotinus lived about A. D. 270. Later in the same school of thought was Porphyry, A. D. 304, and Jamblichus, A. D. 333.

PLOUGH. See AGRICULTURE.

the Society of the Jesuits, and became president of the Roman Catholic College at Stonyhurst, in Lancashire. He was an earnest advocate for introducing the Jesuits into England, and he defended his views against Charles Butler and the Rev. J. Berington, who dreaded their policy. His brother, Francis Plowden, LL.D., was an English barrister who practiced at the chancery bar, and became celebrated by his "Historical Review of the State of Ireland from the Invasion of that Country under Henry II. to its Union with Britain in 1801." This work was severely reviewed by Sir Richard Musgrave, and as earnestly defended by the author and other writers, especially by the Edinburgh Review. Francis Plowden, who wrote very extensively, died at Paris in 1829, and his brother Charles, who had gone to Rome, died at Jougue, in Franche-Compte, in 1821, on his way back to England.

PLOWMAN (plow'man), PIERS, whose proper name was ROBERT LANGELANE, LANGLAND or LONGLAND, was a secular priest, and one of the disciples of the Reformer Wycliff. He was a Fellow of Oriol College, Oxford, and the reputed author of the famous satire on Church and State, which appeared under the name of "The Vision and the Creed of Piers Ploughman." This most remarkable performance, which was completed about A. D. 1369, has never lost its interest; and along with the works of Chaucer, Spenser and the other early lights of English literature, it holds its place as a very prominent constellation.

PLUMB-LINE (plum'line), a well-known instrument by which exact perpendicularity is secured. It is symbolically used in Scripture to denote the strict line of justice according to which God would act toward those who provoked him, Amos vii. 7, 8; Isa. xxviii. 17.

PLUMPTRE (plum'tre), EDWARD HAYES, who has become one of the leading theologians in the Church of England in the present day, is professor of divinity in King's College, London. He is also prebendary in St. Paul's Cathedral. Like many others who distinguished themselves at the university, he has shown his knowledge of Greek by his translations, the tragedies of Sophocles and of Æschylus being his chief effort in this direction. His theological views have been given forth in the form of sermons, reaching to nearly a dozen issues. In 1866 he was the Boyle lecturer, the theme being "Christ and Christendom." In 1867 he competed with Ruskin for the chair of poetry at Oxford, and in the same year he showed his earnest study in the religions of the East by his "Essay on Sakya Mouni at Bodhimandra," in which he has reviewed the system of Buddhism in a most lucid manner.

PLURALITY (ploo-ral'i-te) means the holding of more offices than one. In the forty-first canon of the Church of England pluralism is forbidden, except in the case of those who "shall be thought very well worthy for their learning, and time in every year," and benefices must not be more than thirty miles apart if held by the same man. These laws are easily avoided, though the feeling in the Church has of late grown very decided against the abuses which had long been permitted in many parishes of the kingdom.

PLYMOUTH (plim'uth) BRETHREN. The name is taken from the fact that at Plymouth, in England, they first became conspicuous. In 1830 attention was drawn to their views. They object to national churches as being lax and worldly, and to many of the dissenters as being narrow, sectarian and bigoted. They recognize no order of ministers, and they profess an entire reliance on Christ, a desire to realize his presence in the soul, and to lead a life of great spirituality. They call themselves "Brethren." Their founder was a barrister named Darby, who had entered the ministry of the Church of England. They are much divided in their views, but generally they hold the pre-millennial view of the advent of Christ.

POCHERETH (po'ke-reth) OF ZEBAIM (ze-ba'im). It is probable that Pochereth-hatsebaim is one appellative, being the name of a person whose descendants, called Solomon's servants, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 57.

POCOCK (po'kok), EDWARD, D.D., was born in 1604, at Oxford, and educated at Magdalen Hall. He became a scholar of Corpus Christi and a Fellow of that learned house in 1628. Next year he was ordained, and he proceeded to Aleppo as chaplain of the English factory; and there he diligently prosecuted the study of Arabic and other Oriental languages. In 1636 he became first professor of Arabic at Oxford, and soon thereafter, at the instance of Laud, he went to Constantinople to collect manuscripts. In 1643 he became rector of Childrey, in Berkshire, and in 1648 he was made canon of Christ Church and professor of Hebrew. Two years after, he was ejected from the canonry, and in 1655 he was about to be removed from the professorship by the Parliamentary commissioners, but they were withstood by John Owen, Seth Ward, John Wilkins and John Wallis, who pointed out the "infinite contempt and reproach" which would rest on those who might be so unwise as to reject a man "whom all the learned, not of England only, but of all Europe, so justly admired for his vast knowledge." He was a voluminous writer, and he stood in the front rank of the learned men of his day. South has declared him to be "the greatest master of the Eastern languages and learning which this or any other age or nation has bred." He died in 1691.

POCOCKE (po'kok), RICHARD, D.D., LL.D., was born at Southampton, in 1704, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He traveled very extensively in the East, from 1737 until 1742. He was made precentor of Waterford, in Ireland, and in 1756 he was raised to the see of Ossory, whence he was translated, in 1765, to Meath. His travels in the East have been greatly esteemed, and the early editions brought almost fabulous prices. All his works were antiquarian in character. He died in 1765.

POET (po'et), POETRY (po'e-tre). It is "the poetical books," an appellation which was given them by a variety of ancient authors. These books, which are almost wholly metrical, are Job, the Psalms, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Canticles or Song of Solomon.

But they by no means contain the whole of Hebrew poetry. Large parts of the prophetic writings are in verse; and besides, there are to be found many detached poems and stanzas in the historical portions of the Bible, Gen. iv. 23, 24; Ex. xv. 1-21; Jud. v.; Luke i. 46-55, 68-79; ii. 29-32.

It was natural that poetry should be developed among the Hebrews. Israelitish history was specially calculated to kindle the poetic rapture. The chosen people were brought into communion with the Highest. The wonders that were wrought for them, the motives made to tell on them, the mysterious depths into which they might look, must have given them a loftiness of thought to which less favored nations could not reach; and when, besides, there was vouchsafed a marvelous afflatus, that indescribable influence which brought the human mind into near relation with the divine while the secrets of Deity were revealed to man, inspired poetry, it is evident, must be the noblest of all poetry. Truly, the harp of Zion was attuned to glorious themes; no wonder that its strains have sounded clear above the world's din through all the generations of the world's history. The grandeur of its thoughts, then, is the pre-eminent feature of Hebrew poetry. And because of that very grandeur it has not been solicitous about external form. Other nations have been more attentive to the harmony of expression. They have wrought it and polished it with a finished art to which the sublime conceptions of the Hebrew bards could not stoop. But though cultivated Hebrew poetry preserves a natural simplicity and freedom, it is not destitute of the characteristics of verse. Peculiar words and grammatical forms are introduced. Imagery is employed, borrowed from various sources; and there is an elevated tone and a majesty or tenderness of thought and diction observable generally in all poetical compositions.

One great characteristic of Hebrew poetry consists in the loftiness of its conceptions, and its mode of expression is found in what has been happily called "thought-rhythm." It is not the language which has been reduced to verse; it is the thought that arranges itself in a wonderful correspondence which, like the lights and shades of a picture, like the echo repeating the song of the swain, was prominent in those antithetic strains which celebrated their great deliverance, Ex. xv. 1, 21, and is the measure generally of the Hebrew poetical idea. There is a certain equality, resemblance or relationship visible between periods or verses—a rhythmus of propositions; so that thought in successive lines answers to thought, and things to things. Such is the general character of Hebrew versification; and this parallelism occurs in every part of Old Testament poetry. An example will best explain the meaning of parallelism. Take then the following:

Doth the ox low over his fodder?"—Job vi. 5.

Here there is an equality in the number of words with exact proportion of thought. Poetical parallelism may be taken to consist of four species:

1. Parallel lines cognate or gradational are those which correspond by expressing the same, or a similar sentiment in different but nearly equivalent terms. This species of parallelism is, perhaps, the most frequent of all. The following may be taken as an example:

Who hath not walked in the counsel of the ungodly,
And hath not stood in the way of sinners,
And hath not sat in the seat of the scornful."—Ps. i. 1.

2. Parallel lines antithetic are those which correspond by an opposition of terms with sentiments, the contrast being sometimes in expressions and sometimes only in sense. Many of the proverbs of Solomon assume this form, and owe to it much of their elegance and force.

Thus:

"A wise son rejoiceth his father;
But a foolish son is the grief of his mother."—Prov. x. 1.

3. Parallel lines, synthetic or constructive, are those in which there is a similar form of construction; when there is a correspondence between the different propositions, in respect of the shape and turn of the whole sentence and of the constituent parts, such as noun answering to noun, verb to verb, member to member, negative to negative, interrogative to interrogative. The variety of this form is great, the parallelism being more or less exact. The following may be taken as an example:

"The law of Jehovah is perfect, restoring the soul;
The testimony of Jehovah is sure, making wise the simple;
The precepts of Jehovah are right, rejoicing the heart:
The commandment of Jehovah is clear, enlightening the eyes;
The fear of Jehovah is pure, enduring for ever;
The judgments of Jehovah are truth, they are just altogether;
More desirable than gold, or than much fine gold,
And sweeter than honey, or the dropping of honey-combs."—Ps. xix. 7-10.

4. Stanzas are sometimes so constructed that the first line corresponds to the last, the second to the penultimate, or last but one, and so forth throughout. This is called the introverted parallelism. The following is an example:

"My son, if thy heart be wise,
My heart also shall rejoice;
Yea, my reins shall rejoice,
When thy lips speak right things."

We may discover in the Bible different kinds of poetical composition. 1. Lyric poems or odes are the most ancient. These were intended to be sung or accompanied by music. There are many noble examples of them in various parts of Scripture, as the song of Moses, Ex. xv. 1-19; that of Deborah, Jud. v.; very many of the Psalms, etc. 2. Elegiac poetry is in a mournful strain. Examples are the lament of David over Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 19-27, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah. 3. Didactic or moral poetry is intended to instruct. It is unimpassioned, earnest and sententious, often delivering sage maxims in elegant and pointed verse. 4. Dramatic poetry is characterized by an interchange of speakers. We find it in the book of Job and in the Song of Solomon. Other kinds of poetry can hardly be said to have been developed in the remains preserved to us of the Hebrew muse.

The prophets generally adopted poetry as the vehicle of their utterances. Many sublime odes are to be found in their writings, as well as pieces distinguished for solemn grandeur, when they threatened the impenitent with the approaching sore judgment of Jehovah's anger. Elegiac strains often occur, lamenting the sad fate of Ephraim or Judah; and the return of prosperity is described with pastoral images, presenting somewhat of the idyllic character. The poetic fire burns most brightly in the earlier prophets; the later ones, Ezekiel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, are more prosaic; much of what they penned is simple prose.

The highest excellence of Hebrew poetry consists (as above noted) in its religious character. It is stamped with a divine impress. A loftier element pervades it than can be found in the most noble productions of the heathen muse. This must be borne in mind by the interpreter. He must mark its Oriental form. He must acquaint himself with the modes of Eastern expression, its luxuriant imagery, its boldness of metaphor. And he must take care to distinguish what is symbolical from what is literally intended, lest he mistake the drapery for the substance of the composition. But while using all diligence in these respects, and observing many of the rules according to which poetry in general is expounded, the student of the poems of Scripture must never forget that they come from Him who is the holy and the true One. Their meaning must not be frittered away, as if it were but exaggeration and flourish. The poetry of Scripture was delivered "by holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," 2 Pet. i. 21.

POINTED ARCHITECTURE is the general term applied to the various styles which succeeded the Norman, which had round-topped or circular arches in the heads of the windows. The "pointed" arch came into use with the next style, the Early English, and it prevailed also in the Decorated and the Perpendicular, until at length the flattened or debased arch of the Tudor period showed that as a science architecture had begun to decline.

POISON. See GALL.

POLE, REGINALD, an eminent statesman, and archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Queen Mary, was descended from the blood-royal of England, and born at Stourton Castle, in Staffordshire, in 1500. He was educated at Sheen Monastery and Magdalen College, Oxford; and after obtaining preferment in the Church went to Italy, where he long resided. On his return to England he opposed the divorce of Henry VIII. from Catharine of Aragon, in such earnest terms that the king drove him from his presence and never saw him more. He again left England, was made a cardinal in December, 1536, and had the offer of the popedom on the death of Paul III.

POMEGRANATE FRUIT.

When Mary ascended the throne, Pole returned to England as legate, in which capacity he absolved the Parliament from the sin of heresy, and reconciled the nation to the holy see. The very day after the burning of Cranmer, the cardinal was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury; soon after which he was elected chancellor of both universities, survived the queen but one day, and died November 18, 1558.

POLHILL (pol'hil), EDWARD, was an eminent English Calvinistic theological writer in the seventeenth century. He resided at Burwash, in Sussex. In 1673 he published "The Divine Will considered in its Eternal Decrees." Then followed, in 1675, an "Answer to Dr. Sherlock;" and in the same year his greatly-admired treatise appeared, entitled "Precious Faith, considered in its Nature, Working and Growth," a work which is still sought after. Three years afterward he issued "View of Divine Truths;" and in 1680 he published "Mystical Union between Christ and Believers considered." In 1682 his "Preparation for Suffering in an Evil Day" appeared, which was followed by his "Discourse on Schism." Polhill was a layman, a justice of the peace, but a profound theologian, clear in his views, tender in his feelings, and one of the best examples of the Puritan writers.

POLLOK (pol'luk), ROBERT, a licentiate of the United Associate Presbytery of Edinburgh, was born in 1799, at Muirhouse, in Renfrewshire, and educated at the university of Glasgow. His fame as an author rests on the much appreciated work, "The Course of Time," which at first was published anonymously; but on its appearance the writer took rank as one of the leading poets of the age. His next work was "Helen of the Glen," which was followed by "The Persecuted Family" and "Ralph Gemmill." In 1868 the "Course of Time" had reached the enormous circulation of seventy-eight thousand copies. Professor Wilson characterized it as "a vast achievement" for so young a man. His health was so feeble that he was unable to officiate as a preacher, and he died in 1827, greatly regretted.

POLLUX, Acts xxviii. 11. See CASTOR.

tian martyr, who, according to tradition, was a disciple of the apostle John, and by him appointed bishop of Smyrna. He made many converts, enjoyed the friendship of Ignatius and opposed the heresies of Marcion and Valentinus; but during the persecution of the Christians under Marcus Aurelius he suffered martyrdom with the most heroic fortitude, A. D. 166. His short "Epistle to the Philippians" is the only one of his writings that has been preserved.

POMEGRANATE (pom-e-gran'et) is a native of Asia; and we may trace it from Syria, through Persia, even to the mountains of Northern India. It is common in Northern Africa, and was early cultivated in Egypt; hence the Israelites in the desert complain, Num. xx. 5, "It is no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates." The bright and dark-green foliage of the pomegranate, and its flowers conspicuous for the crimson color both of the calyx and petals, must have made it an object of desire in gardens, while its large reddish-colored fruit, filled with numerous seeds, each surrounded with juicy pleasant-tasted pulp, would make it still more valuable as a fruit in warm countries, Cant. viii. 2; vi. 7; xi. 12. That it was produced in Palestine at a very early age is evident from the spies bringing some back when sent into Canaan to see what kind of a land it was; for we are told that they "came unto the brook of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes," etc., "and they brought of the pomegranate and of the figs," Num. xiii. 23.

POMMEL (pom'mel), 2 Chr. iv. 12, 13, a projecting ornament belonging to the capital of a pillar; it is called a "bowl" in 1 Ki. vii. 41.

POMPEIA (pom'pe-ah), or POMPEII (pom'pe-i), the name of a city of Campania, in the vicinity of Mount Vesuvius. It has become far more famous in modern times than it ever could have been in the days of its greatest prosperity. Tacitus records the fact that a part of it was destroyed by an earthquake. There is no record of the time when it was overwhelmed under the ashes of Vesuvius, but it is probable that the catastrophe took place in the time of Titus. In 1748 the ruins were accidentally discovered, and the proofs are abundant that the inhabitants were taken by surprise, and that escape was impossible. Accordingly, the uncovering and opening up of the streets and houses has presented to the modern eye all the arrangements of an old Roman town. About one-third of the town has been uncovered, and the antiquarian treasures which have been collected are most precious. The size, form and arrangement of houses are seen; household utensils and all the usages of Roman life are presented to the eye of the modern spectator after the repose of ages.

POMPEY (pom'pe). There were three eminent Romans of this name, chief of whom was the great general who came into collision with Julius Cæsar, and who was routed by him at the memorable battle of Pharsalia. In his effort to escape to Egypt he was treacherously murdered.

POND, ENOCH, D.D., was born in 1791, at Wrentham, Massachusetts. He was licensed to preach in 1814, and settled in 1815 as pastor of the Congregational church of Auburn, Massachusetts. He resigned in 1828, and went to Boston to conduct the monthly publication, "The Spirit of the Pilgrims;" and from 1832 until 1856 he acted as professor of theology in the seminary at Bangor. In that year he became president and professor of ecclesiastical history, and lecturer of pastoral duties. He has been a very prolific writer. He reviewed "Judson on Baptism;" in 1824 his "Monthly Concert Lectures" appeared; in 1827 his "Memoir of President Davies;" and in the same year his "Life of Count Zinzendorf" was published. "John Wickliffe," "Morning of the Reformation," "No Fellowship with Romanism," came out in succession. Then followed "The Mather Family," "The Young Pastor's Guide," "The World's Salvation," "Pope and Pagan," "A Review of Swedenborgianism," "Plato," "Life of Increase Mather," "The Church," "God in Christ," "Memoir of John Knox," "Lectures on Pastoral and on Christian Theology;" and other issues of solid worth appeared, showing the activity and wonderful energy of his mind. In 1867 his "Prize Essay on Congregationalism" was published, and in 1868 the "Christian Theology" completed his lectures. Dr. Pond was one of the most valuable of all the great men produced in New England in the present age.

PONTIFEX (pon'te-feks). This was the highest sacerdotal title in Rome. Numa chose four out of the rank of the patricians whom he constituted "pontifices;" and four plebeians were afterward added to their number. Sylla enlarged the number to fifteen, divided them into two classes, and the chief among them was called the "pontifex maximus." From this title the well-known designation of pontiff is derived, which has long been given to the pope of Rome.

PONTIFICATE (pon-tif'e-kate). This is a book of rites to be observed by bishops, such as in confirmation, the ordination of priests and deacons and the coronation of sovereigns. In Great Britain and the United States these rites are not published separately, but the offices used in these countries do really constitute that which is included in the "pontifical" or "pontificate."

frontier. That Jews had settled in Pontus previous to the time of Christ is evident from the fact that strangers from Pontus were among those assembled at Jerusalem at the Feast of Pentecost, Acts ii. 9. Christianity also became early known in this country, as the strangers "in Pontus" are among those to whom Peter addressed his first Epistle, 1 Pet. i. 1. Of this province Paul's friend Aquila was a native, Acts xviii. 2.

was therefore necessary to collect the water in cisterns and in ponds and pools, both for culinary uses and for the supply of cattle. The drying up of these pools was a grievous calamity, Isa. xlii. 15. We read of these large public reservoirs belonging to the towns of Gibeon, 2 Sam. ii. 13, Hebron, 2 Sam. iv. 12, Samaria, 1 Ki. xxii. 38, and Jerusalem; "the upper pool," 2 Ki. xviii. 17; "the lower pool," Isa. xxii. 9, 11; "Hezekiah's pool," 2 Ki. xx. 20; "the king's pool," Neh. ii. 14; and "the pool of Siloah," Neh. iii. 15, or "the old pool," Isa. xxii. 11. We read also, Eccles. ii. 6, of the "pools" or cisterns made by Solomon to irrigate his gardens. These are doubtless the famous "Solomon's pools" near Bethlehem. They are described as three immense tanks, partly excavated in the rocky bed of the valley, partly built up with huge stones, the bottom of the upper pool being above the top of the next, and so with the second and third. Their dimensions are respectively—length, three hundred and eighty, four hundred and twenty-three, five hundred and eighty-two feet; breadth, east end, two hundred and thirty-six, two hundred and thirty-six, two hundred and seven; west end, two hundred and twenty-nine, two hundred and twenty-nine, one hundred and forty-eight; depth, east end, twenty-five, thirty-nine, fifty feet. An aqueduct leads from them, which terminates in the area of the Haram, the site of the temple.

POOL, MATTHEW, a nonconformist minister, was born at York, in 1624. He studied at Cambridge, entered the Church, and was ejected from a London benefice under the Act of Uniformity. From that time he applied himself to writing. He took part in the controversies with the Romanists and the Socinians, and for his zeal against popery, according to the deposition of Titus Oates, his name was among those aimed at in the Popish Plot. He then went to Amsterdam, where he died in 1679. Besides "Sermons," he wrote "Annotations on the Bible;" but his greatest work was the "Synopsis" of criticism and commentary on the Holy Scripture, collected laboriously from the works of all preceding Biblical scholars, and now mournfully useless.

POOR. See ALMS.

POOR, DANIEL, D.D., was born in 1789, at Danvers, Massachusetts. His attention was drawn to the state of the heathen, and he offered himself as a missionary to the East, after having finished his education in Andover Seminary, in 1814. He sailed from Newburyport next year, and reached Colombo, in Ceylon, in March, 1816. He adopted the principle of educating the natives, and at Tillypally and Baricotta he established Christian seminaries. In 1836 he removed to Madeira, and in 1848 he visited his native land for the restoration of his health, and also to promote the cause of missions among the churches by the extension of knowledge concerning the condition of the East. In 1850 he returned to Ceylon, where he labored until his death, in 1855, at Jaffria, by cholera. His chief literary labors were confined to the preparation of books for the mission in Tamul and English.

POORE (poor), RICHARD, was one of the most eminent of all the great English episcopal church builders in the Middle Ages. His name is associated with two of the most important of the great cathedrals—that of Durham, over which he presided, and Salisbury, which he designed and founded. Bishop Herbert Poore had obtained the royal assent for the removal of the cathedral church from Old Sarum to Salisbury, and he fixed on the site, but it remained for Richard Poore to carry the magnificent plan into effect; and to the designs made under his inspection the whole merit of the building is certainly due. It was founded A. D. 1220, the fifth year of the reign of Henry III., and an inscription on a tomb in the church states that it was finished in the year 1260. It is distinguished as the most uniform structure, as well as being the most perfect and original example, in the whole series of magnificent edifices devoted to the choral service of the Church of England. The beautiful Pointed style had then been brought to perfection, and with the exception of Westminster Abbey Church, erected in the same reign, no comparison with that of Salisbury has ever been adduced; and from its magnitude, purity and unity of style this cathedral stands unrivaled. In Durham, Lincoln, Peterborough, east of the cloisters. The extreme length of the cathedral from west to east is four hundred and eighty feet, the length of the grand transept is two hundred and thirty-two feet, and the eastern transept extends one hundred and seventy-two feet. Unlike most of the old cathedrals, it is not closely surrounded by buildings. It stands in a noble "close" or lawn, with magnificent elms of enormous size and great luxuriance forming a border to the picture, while as to outline and dimensions a more splendid building can scarcely be imagined. The lofty spire, which for beauty has no equal, rises upward of four hundred feet from the floor, being the highest spire in Europe except that of Strasburg. The windows in the nave are double lancet, and in the clerestory they are triple lancet, the centre light rising higher than the other two. The cloisters, which are exceedingly fine, form an exact square of one hundred and eighty-one feet nine inches, and the chapter-house, which is octagonal in form and remarkably fine, is fifty-eight feet in diameter. It has been correctly said that for Winchester, Canterbury and others, there are portions erected in the Norman, the Early Pointed, the Decorated and the Perpendicular, thus indicating the successive ages when their parts were built; but in Salisbury, the nave, transepts, choir, aisles, cloisters, chapter-house and towers being all uniform, there is a harmony as well as a beauty which cannot be seen in any of the other great churches of England.

Five years after it was commenced a portion was in such a state that divine service could be celebrated in the choir, and the building was consecrated on Michaelmas day, 1225, by Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, and three days afterwards Bishop Poore was translated to Durham; but he committed the work to the care of Elias de Derham, who from the first had acted as architect, and who was still engaged in superintending the work.

The plan of the cathedral is that of the Greek cross, having a transept crossing the choir as well as the transept north and south of the central tower. The cloisters stand out from the nave, being entered from the western angle of the southern transept, and the chapter-house stands to the purity, simplicity and grandeur Salisbury Cathedral holds the same high rank in English ecclesiastical architecture that the Parthenon bears in the Grecian; and all students of taste and feeling in ecclesiastical styles will admit the correctness of this opinion.

A long list of eminent names are associated with this cathedral in addition to that of Poore, the founder, among whom may be mentioned Jewell, the author of the "Apology for the Church of England," who died in 1571, Davenant, Burnet and, in later times, Bampton, the founder of the Bampton Lectures. It is well known that the liturgies compiled for the church of Salisbury were used in York, Bangor, Lincoln and Hereford, and were considered as the standard texts for the performance of divine service in other cathedrals; and no other cathedral has supplied such a variety of books for its "use" or form of service as this important church has done.

POPE, a title derived from an Oriental word signifying father, and in very early times applied indiscriminately to all bishops, and in the East even to ministers. For many centuries the term

PORCELAIN (por'se-lan), a fine species of transparent earthenware, the chief component part of which is silic. It was made at a very early period in China, and believed to have reached its perfection there about A. D. 1000. Marco Polo describes its manufacture in the fourteenth century, but it was not generally introduced to Europe until the Portuguese traders, having doubled the Cape of Good Hope, commenced trading with China at the beginning of the sixteenth century. The name is derived from "Porcellanor," which was given to this ware by the Portuguese. Worcester-shire, in England, and Sevres, in France, are the great seats of porcelain manufacture in Europe.

PORCH, a vestibule, corridor, or entrance-passage. See HOUSE, TEMPLE.

PORCH, the name of a covering erected before the entrance of a church chapel or domestic building to shield persons who may not be able at once to enter. In mediæval structures porches were common because of the nature of the climate in Great Britain and in Western Continental Europe, and in design and ornamentation many of these structures were among the most attractive parts of the edifices to which they belonged.

PORCIUS FESTUS. See FESTUS.

PORCUPINE (pork'u-pine). This small quadruped, which in the Linnæan classification belongs to the genus Hystrix, is noted for the manner in which it can defend itself by the sharp quills which project from the back and sides, and which are sharp and strong. The animal can roll itself into a round ball, having these quills on the outside, and thus it is completely defended. The porcupine is found in Africa, Asia and Italy. It is longer in the body and legs than the hedgehog, which it resembles.

PORPHYRE (por'fe-re), or PORPHYRY (por'phy-re), Esth. i. 6, margin, probably white marble.

PORPHYRY (por'fe-re) was a native of Tyre, where he was born about A. D. 233. He was originally named "Meleck," which in Syriac means "king," and Latinized is "Malchus." He studied under Longinus, who has been characterized as "a living library and walking museum." He changed his pupil's name to Porphyry—i. e., purple. Having finished his course under Longinus, he went to Rome about 262, where he remained six years under Plotinus. He paid a visit to Sicily, and again he took up his abode in Rome. Porphyry is also called "Bataneotes" by Jerome and Chrysostom, but the reason is not known. He has been called a friend of Origen's, but this is doubtful. He wrote several works, among which the most remarkable were his treatise on philosophy or "History of Philosophers," in four books, and a work against the Christians, in fifteen books. In this he inveighs with great bitterness against the Christians. He aimed at setting aside the authority of Scripture by endeavoring to show that it contained numberless contradictory statements. He received his bias chiefly from Plotinus, and both of them were disciples of Ammonius Saccas. He has always been viewed, along with Julian the Apostate, as one of the chief opponents of Christianity in the early ages. He died about A. D. 302.

PORTER (por'ter). As used in the Authorized Version this word has always the sense of door- or gate-keeper. In the later books of the Old Testament, written after the erection of the temple, it is applied to those Levites who had charge of the several entrances, 1 Chr. ix. 17; xv. 18. In other parts of Scripture it is applied to gate-keepers generally, 2 Sam. xviii. 26; 2 Ki. vii. 10, 11; John x. 3.

PORTER, EBENEZER, D.D., was born in 1772, at Cornwall, Connecticut. After a thorough education, he was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Washington, Connecticut, from which he removed, in 1812, to Andover, to fill the chair of sacred rhetoric. He died at Andover, in 1834. He was the author of several works bearing on subjects connected with his chair. He also published "Lectures on Homiletics and Preaching," "Sermons and Addresses," and an abridgment of Owen on the one hundred and thirtieth Psalm.

PORTEUS (por'te-us), BELLBY, D.D., who was an eminently learned man, and who rose to be an English bishop, was born at York, in 1731, and educated at Cambridge. He entered as a sizar at Christ's College, in which he rose to be a Fellow. He was chaplain to Archbishop Secker, rector of Hunton, prebendary of Peterborough, rector of Lambeth, king's chaplain and master of St. Cross Hospital near Winchester. In 1776 he became bishop of Chester, at the express instance of Queen Charlotte; and in 1787 he was transferred to London, over which diocese he presided until his death, in 1808. His erudition and ability were very great. He wrote a "Life of Archbishop Secker," "Lectures on the Gospel of St. Matthew," and he published "Sermons," "Evidences of the Christian Religion," and a "Seatonian Prize Poem on Death." Like many of the greatest of the English prelates, he was an administrator and a man of action rather than a retired student and writer.

POSIDONIUS (po-si-do'ne-us), 2 Macc. xiv. 19, an envoy sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabæus.

POST. This name was applied to runners, swift of foot, employed to carry intelligence. See FOOTMAN. The word is sometimes found in another sense, for lintel, threshold, etc., Isa. vi. 4.

POST-COMMUNION, the title usually given to that part of the communion service which occurs after the consecration and the delivery of the elements in the Lord's Supper.

POSTILS (pos'tils). This name was given in former times to homilies or short sermons. The name originated from the fact that these addresses were delivered after the reading of the gospel, the Latin word "posted" signifying after, as the address followed the lesson. The word has also been applied to certain expositions or treatises of passages of Scripture, the text being given at length, and then the exposition coming afterward.

POT. See POTTER.

POTHINUS (po-the'nus) is eminently worthy of notice as being the first bishop of Lyons and Vienne, in Gaul. At the close of the second century he left Asia, in company with Irenæus and others, and settled in Gaul, where they labored with such zeal that several churches were established by them. Coming as these missionaries did from Asia, would in some measure account for the difference of custom which prevailed in the observance of Easter among the churches in the West which claimed an Eastern origin, from those that followed the order of Rome. Pothinus was a man of exemplary zeal and of undoubted piety. Lyons long held intercourse with the churches of Asia and Phrygia. Polycarp is supposed to have directed the mission to Gaul.

POPPY-HEADS.—See article.

POTIPHAR (pot'i-far), an officer of Pharaoh, probably the chief of his body-guard, Gen. xxxix. 1. Of the Midianitish merchants he purchased Joseph, whose treatment by him is described under that head. The keeper of the prison into which the son of Jacob was eventually cast treated him with kindness, and confided to him the management of the prison; and this confidence was afterward sanctioned by the "captain of the guard" himself, as the officer responsible for the safe custody of prisoners of state. It is sometimes denied, but more usually maintained, that this "captain of the guard" was the same with the Potiphar who is before designated by the same title. This "captain of the guard" and Joseph's master were the same person. It would be in accordance with Oriental usage that offenders against the court and the officers of the court should be in custody of the captain of the guard, and that Potiphar should have treated Joseph well after having cast him into prison is not irreconcilable with the facts of the case. After having imprisoned Joseph in the first transport of his choler he might possibly discover circumstances which led him to doubt his guilt, if not to be convinced of his innocence, and hence the mild treatment he experienced.

POTI-PHERAH (pot-i-fe'rah), the priest of On, or Heliopolis, whose daughter Asenath was given in marriage to Joseph, Gen. xli. 45, 50; xlv. 20.

POTSHERD (pot'sherd), a piece of common earthenware, so called in the original from the rough dry appearance presented by the kind of earthenware common in the East. The applications of it in Scripture have respect sometimes to the roughness characteristic of it, Job ii. 8; sometimes to the dryness, Ps. xxii. 15, and consequent brittleness, Isa. xlv. 9.

POTTAGE (pot'taj), Gen. xxv. 29-34. See LENTILES.

POTTER (pot'ter). The potter and the produce of his labors are often alluded to in the Scriptures. The fragility of his wares and the ease with which they are destroyed supply apt emblems of the facility with which human life and power may be broken and destroyed. It is in this figurative use that the potter's vessels are most frequently noticed in Scripture, Ps. ii. 9; Isa. xxx. 14; Rev. ii. 27. In one place the power of the potter to form with his clay, by the impulse of his will and hand, vessels either for honorable or for mean uses, is employed with great force by the apostle to illustrate the absolute power of God in moulding the destinies of men according to his pleasure, Rom. ix. 21. The first distinct mention of earthenware vessels is in the case of the pitchers in which Gideon's men concealed their lamps, and which they broke in pieces when they withdrew their lamps from them, Jud. vii. 16, 19.

The potter's wheel is mentioned only once in the Bible, Jer. xviii. 2, but it must have been in use among the Hebrews long before the time of that allusion, for we now know that it existed in Egypt before the Israelites took refuge in that country. The processes employed by the Hebrews were probably not in any way dissimilar to those of the Egyptians, from whom the use of the wheel may be supposed to have been adopted. There is the greater probability in this, as the materials, forms and manufacture of earthenware vessels are still very similar throughout Western Asia, and are also the same which were anciently in use. This we know from the comparison of ancient paintings and sculptures with modern manufactures, as well as from the vast quantities of broken pottery which are found upon the sites of ancient cities. The ancient potters frequently kneaded the clay with their feet, and after it had been properly worked up, they formed it into a mass of convenient size with the hand and placed it on the wheel, which, to judge from that represented in the paintings, was of very simple construction and turned with the hand. The various forms of the vases were made out by the finger during the revolution; the handles, if they had any, were afterward affixed to them; and the devices and other ornamental parts were traced with a wooden or metal instrument previously to their being baked. They were then suffered to dry, and for this purpose were placed on planks of wood; they were afterward arranged with great care on trays, and carried, by means of the usual yoke, borne on men's shoulders, to the oven.

POTTER, ALONZO, D.D., LL.D., was born in A.D. 1800, at La Grange, Dutchess County, New York. He was educated in Union College, where he became a tutor; and he held the professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy from 1821 until 1826. He was ordained a deacon in the Episcopal Church in 1821, a priest in 1824, and was chosen president of Geneva College in 1825; but this he declined. He was rector of St. Paul's Church, Boston, from 1826 until 1831; and from this church he retired to assume the duties of the moral philosophy chair in, and the vice-presidency of, Union College. In 1845 he was consecrated bishop of the diocese of Pennsylvania; and in this position he displayed great prudence and energy. His solid character gave him great influence in every part of the State, and he was largely influential in the establishing of the Hospital of the Episcopal Church and of the Divinity school, while his sagacity and diligence led to the formation of many new charges which, under his fostering care, grew into strong congregations. He was a very industrious and voluminous writer. In the Lowell Institute he delivered five courses of Lectures. He published works on "Political Economy," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," "Religious Philosophy," "Handbook for Readers and Students," besides editing several volumes of the "Family Library." All his productions showed the vigor of his mind and his solid, practical wisdom. He visited England with a view to the restoration of his health, without much benefit, and the Pacific coast was next suggested. He went to San Francisco, and died there in July, 1865, greatly regretted by the members of the Episcopal Church as one of their most efficient bishops, and by all classes of Christians as one of the most pious and godly of Christ's ministers.

POTTER, JOHN, D.D., who rose to be archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1674, at Wakefield, in Yorkshire. He was educated at the grammar-school of Wakefield, whence he passed to Oxford, entering University College. He became a Fellow of Lincoln; and in 1697 he published his great work, "Archæologia Græca, or the Antiquities of Greece," which has continued to appear in successive editions, and which has proved almost indispensable to classical students. In 1704 he was appointed chaplain to Archbishop Tenison; in 1708 he was made Regius professor of divinity at Oxford; and in 1715 he was raised to the see of Oxford. He ordained John Wesley in 1725. In 1737 he was raised to the primacy. He was a great promoter of classical learning, and he published several works, in addition to his "Antiquities" which were of much value. His chief ecclesiastical work is his "Discourse on Church Government, wherein the Rights of the Church and the Supremacy of Christian Princes are Vindicated and Adjusted." He edited the works of Clemens Alexandrinus, and his minor theological works extend to several volumes, including divinity lectures, sermons and charges. He was a laborious, energetic prelate, and his learning was exceedingly extensive. He died in 1747.

POYNET (poy'net), JOHN, an English prelate, was born in Kent, in 1516, and became successively bishop of Rochester and of Winchester. It was by Edward VI. that he was advanced to the episcopacy; and it was Poynt who drew up the catechism called King Edward's. On the accession of Mary he is said to have favored the rebellion of Wyatt, in consequence of which he withdrew to Strasburg; but it is obvious that, whether this was the case or not, as a prelate zealous for the Reformation, he could not have safely remained in England. He died in exile in 1556.

PRAYER (pray'r). The Hebrew idea of prayer was that of an invocation of God for help or blessing. The divine Being was regarded as accessible by men, Deut. iv. 29; as graciously inclined to listen to their cry, Ps. cxlv. 18, 19; as able and willing to supply all their need, Ps. lvii. 2; and as granting blessing in answer to prayer, Ps. l. 15. Hence the act of prayer is sometimes called "a seeking of the Lord," Deut. iv. 29; "an entreating of the face of the Lord," Ex. xxii. 11; "a pouring out of the heart or soul before him," or "before his face," Ps. lxviii. 8; "a crying or calling unto God," Ps. lv. 16, 17; "a beseeching of God," Ex. xxxii. 11; and prayer itself is called "a cry," 1 Ki. viii. 28; "a complaint," Ps. cxlii. 2; and "a roaring," Ps. xxii. 1. In the New Testament this idea of prayer as an approach of the soul unto God, with desire and request for help, is even more explicitly enunciated, Matt. vi. 5; Luke x. 2; John xiv. 13; Eph. vi. 18, 19; Phil. iv. 6; Col. iv. 2, 3; 2 Thess. i. 11; James i. 5-7. But in neither the Old Testament nor the New Testament is any explanation given of the rationale of prayer, or any attempt made to solve the speculative difficulties by which the subject is beset.

In the progress of spiritual degeneracy this idea of prayer perished out of the minds of the mass of the people, and for it was substituted a belief in the worth of the mere outward form as a mode of pleasing God, Tob. xii. 8, 9; Matt. vi. 7. With the carnal Pharisees of our Lord's time prayer was valued more as a means of securing the praise of men than as a means of obtaining blessing from God, Matt. vi. 5; Luke xi. 1.

The postures in prayer commonly used by the Hebrews were standing, 1 Sam. i. 26; Luke xviii. 11, or kneeling, 1 Ki. viii. 34; Dan. vi. 10; in both cases with the hands lifted up, Ps. xxviii. 2, or spread out toward heaven, Ezra ix. 5. See ATTITUDES.

As to seasons of prayer, nothing is prescribed in Scripture; nor in the earlier ages do there seem to have been any fixed times for prayer. David tells us that he prayed three times a day—morning, mid-day and evening, Ps. lv. 18; and Daniel followed the same usage, Dan. vi. 10. What was probably a voluntary habit on the part of pious Jews in the earlier times seems to have become at a later period matter of prescription; and the stated hours for prayer were the third, the sixth and the ninth, Acts ii. 15; x. 9; iii. 1; x. 30—i. e., according to our reckoning, at nine o'clock A. M. (the hour of the morning sacrifice), twelve o'clock noon and three o'clock P. M. (the hour of the evening sacrifice). The Jews were wont to offer prayer on extraordinary occasions, such as the dedication of the temple, 1 Ki. viii. 22; also when they were engaged or about to engage in battle, 1 Chr. v. 20; and generally before any important undertaking, Prov. iii. 6; Ps. xxxvii. 5. A thanksgiving prayer seems also to have been usually offered by them before eating or drinking, Matt. xv. 36.

For the synagogue service of prayer, see SYNAGOGUE.

PREACH, PREACHER, PREACHING.

These words are for the most part used in Scripture for the announcement of a message, doctrine or warning, rather than in the technical sense in which we now employ them. Thus Noah is said to have been "a preacher of righteousness," 2 Pet. ii. 5; the author of Ecclesiastes calls himself "the preacher," Eccles. i. 1, 2; Jonah's warning to the Ninevites is termed "preaching," Jon. iii. 2. Sometimes "preaching" is put for "doctrine" or mode of teaching, 1 Cor. i. 18; and sometimes to "preach" is equivalent to "assent" or "declare," Rom. ii. 21. Discourses or addresses delivered in a synagogue more nearly resembled preaching as now understood, Luke iv. 18-27; Acts xiii. 15-41. There are also instances of preaching in Christian assemblies, Acts xx. 7-12, in regard to which St. Paul gives sundry directions, 1 Cor. xiv.

PORCUPINE.—See article.

PREACHING FRIARS. 1. The name given first to the Dominicans. They were founded by St. Dominic, A. D. 1220. 2. Their rivals, the Franciscans, were also preaching brethren, and were founded by Francis of Assisi, about the same time.

PREBEND (preb'end), generally any payment or stipend, and specifically the stipend which is received by a prebendary from the revenues of the cathedral or collegiate church.

PREBENDARY (preb'en-da-re), a clergyman attached to a cathedral or collegiate church who enjoys a prebend in consideration of his officiating at stated times in the church.

PRECENTOR (pre-sen'tor), in cathedrals, the second dignitary, who is director of the music and ritual; in monasteries, the monk who presided over the conduct of the service, kept the books and settled the prayers to be said for departed brethren.

PRECIOUS STONES. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

PREDESTINATE (pre-des'te-nate), a word signifying the sovereign purpose of God as the Ruler of the universe, Rom. viii. 29, 30. The same word is sometimes rendered "determined before," Acts iv. 28, "ordained," 1 Cor. ii. 7. It would be, of course, beside the purpose of the present work to enter on the controversies which have been provoked on the subject of predestination. The following remarks may be cited from Dr. Alford: "It may suffice to say that, on the one hand, Scripture bears constant testimony to the fact that all believers are chosen and called by God, their whole spiritual life, in its origin, progress and completion, being from him; while, on the other hand, its testimony is no less precise that he willet all to be saved, and that none shall perish except by willful rejection of the truth. So that on the one side God's sovereignty, on the other man's freewill, is plainly declared to us. To receive, believe and act on both these is our duty and our wisdom."

PREPARATION, DAY OF THE. See PASSOVER.

PREROGATIVE (pre-rog'a-tiv) COURT. In England the two archbishops have each a court thus named, from which an appeal lies to the Privy Council in ecclesiastical affairs.

PRESBYTERIAN (prez-be-te're-an) CHURCH. Presbyterians do not admit—1. That all Church power rests in the clergy; 2. That the Apostolic office is perpetual; or, 3. That each individual Christian congregation is independent. On the other hand, they hold—1. That the people have a right to a substantive part in the government of the Church; 2. That Presbyters who minister in word and doctrine are the highest permanent officers of the Church, and all belong to the same order; and 3. That the outward and visible Church is, or should be, one, in the sense that a smaller part is subject to a larger, and a larger to the whole. It is not holding one of these principles that makes any one a Presbyterian, but his holding them all.

The first of these principles relates to the power and rights of the people. The Church is a spiritual body of which Jesus Christ is the head. All power is derived from him. His word is the written constitution of the Church, and all Church power can only properly be ministerial and administrative; for everything which he has revealed is to be believed and all that he has commanded is to be done as he has directed. The Church is thus distinct from the State, having its laws and its officers, and an administrative government of its own.

As to doctrine, the Church has no power to add to the truths which Jesus the Head of the Church has taught, but she has a right to set forth a declaration of the truths which she finds in the Revealed Word, which are to be acknowledged by all who may enter into her fold, and which may be known of all men. This involves the right and the duty to frame creeds or confessions of faith, as a testimony of the Church against error, and an exhibition of the sense in which she believes the Word of God is to be received. As to order, the Church has power to make rules for the due observance of public worship and for her administration of discipline, to receive into fellowship, and to exclude the profane and the disorderly from her communion.

The denial that all Church power vests in the clergy is not inconsistent with the doctrine that there is a divinely-appointed class of officers through whom that power is to be administered; and in the Presbyterian Church Courts there is full provision made for the voice of the whole Church being heard in all departments of her government. The Presbyters, or Teaching Elders, are associated with Ruling Elders who are chosen by the people to act in their name; and thus the influence of the laity is secured in the government of the Church. A representative is chosen by others to do in their name that which they might themselves lawfully do; just as the members of a State Legislature can only exercise those powers which are inherent in the people, so the Ruling Elders of the Presbyterian Church are chosen to exercise the powers which belong to the lay-members of the Church. They therefore sit in the same courts with the Clergy, or Teaching Elders, having an equal voice with them in all matters which may arise in the government of the Church.

The recognition of the unity of the Church is exhibited in the system of courts which rise above each other, from "the Session" of a particular Church or Congregation, which is composed of a body of Elders and the Ministers of the charge, to the Presbytery, which includes a number of adjoining Churches, and higher still to the Synod, which is composed of a number of Presbyteries, and finally to the General Assembly, which is composed of Ministers and Elders, delegated, in a certain ratio, from all the Presbyteries of the Church. This subordination of Church Courts is an essential principle of Presbyterianism, and the decision of questions that reach the highest court is held to be the voice of the Church on that question, and to be received as such through the length and breadth of the Church. In this manner controverted points and cases of discipline are closed when they are decided by the highest court of the Church.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—Christianity was introduced into Scotland at a very early period, but that country, as well as England, suffered from the devastations of the heathen Saxons. When the influence of the Scots under Columba and his fellow-laborers began to spread the Gospel from Iona over the mainland, the system of Church order which they propagated was exceedingly simple. In the lapse of time, however, and very speedily after the celebrated synod at Whitby, the forms which Augustine had brought with him from Rome into England spread not only over England, but also into Scotland; and, long before the Reformation, the order and the doctrinal system of the Romish Church held full sway in Scotland. At the Reformation there came a total change. In that land the object was not to lop off a number of excrescences or to remove some glaring evils which were admitted to be wrong. On the other hand, the Scottish Reformers began at the foundation, resolved to admit nothing in the doctrine and discipline of the Reformed Church which was not distinctly authorized in the Word of God. Among the leaders of the great movement, John Knox stands pre-eminent. This man, eminent for his mental energy, had learned much at Geneva and in other places on the Continent of Europe, and under his influence the work of reform made rapid progress when he returned to his native land. Against the most formidable opposition, and often with almost no prospect of success, the work of reform was carried on, until the whole kingdom received the system which has received the name of Presbyterian, and the Church of Scotland has long been acknowledged as the Mother Church of nearly all those professing the Presbyterian name who speak the English language. The Church of Scotland is recognized by the State, and is invested with the remains of the Church property which had not been wasted or seized on by grasping laymen after the storms of the Reformation period.

The affairs of the Church are managed by Kirk Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods and the General Assembly; and every part of the country and the adjacent islands is included in one or other of these Presbyteries, and therefore is governed by the General Assembly. The Assembly is composed of delegates from the Presbyteries; and it presents a peculiar feature not to be seen elsewhere in any Presbyterian Church. Theoretically the provinces of the Church and the State are distinct, each supreme in its own department; and both being from God, it is the duty of the one to acknowledge the other, and yet not to intrude into its jurisdiction. Accordingly, as the sword belongs to the State, and as the State should protect the citizens lawfully assembled, so the sovereign sends a "Commissioner" yearly to the General Assembly, with a royal gift for the promotion of education, and with assurances of protection and royal favor. He takes his place behind the Moderator's chair, but he does not interfere with deliberations or in any way attempt to control the decision of the Assembly.

The Doctrinal Standards of the Church are contained in the well-known Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechisms. These standards were adopted by the Church, and no person can be admitted or can continue to be a minister or a preacher in the Church who does not hold to this Confession. By the Act of Union between England and Scotland, in 1707, all "Professors, Principals, Regents, Masters and others bearing office" in any of the four universities of Scotland are called on to sign and signify their reception of these Standards. The Westminster Confession and Catechisms set forth the Calvinistic doctrine, and they are very distinct in their teaching on the subjects of the Trinity, the Fall of Man, the Atonement, the Inspiration of Scripture, Justification, Faith and the other doctrines which are usually included in an evangelical system. Two Sacraments only, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, are admitted, and all the branches of the Presbyterian Church are in harmony with the Church of Scotland in so far as the doctrines of these Standards are concerned. Neither the Church of Scotland, nor any of the churches descended from it, have a liturgy or any set form to be used in public worship. There is a Directory, in which certain descriptions are given of the manner in which the different portions of the service should be conducted, and these are usually observed, but the ministry are permitted to exercise their gifts in prayer, and in reading the Word and in preaching it is expected that an educated, pious clergy will, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, be directed to conduct such services so as to edify the people of God. The Church of Scotland has always held a high character as an educator of the people. Its ministers have been well educated, tenacious of the faith, and holding steadfastly to the form of Church order which has so long prevailed in their country; and the great field of India has specially received the attention of the Assembly in its missionary operations, and it is happily true, that at the present day an active, zealous and prayerful spirit pervades the ministry and the members of the Church of Scotland.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

—About the beginning of the eighteenth century very decided differences on doctrinal matters began to appear among influential ministers of the Church. A work had been reprinted in Scotland and commended by certain ministers as very valuable, against which others took exception. The work was known as "The Marrow of Modern Divinity," and the "Marrow Controversy" was the term by which the dispute was afterward designated. The opponents of the book charged it and its promoters with Antinomianism, and they in return were characterized with "legality" and preaching a doctrine which amounted to a mixing of human merit with the merit of the Saviour. Certain operations of the law of Patronage in the settlement of Ministers intensified the controversy; and the friends of "the Marrow" took the side of the people, and held that they had a constitutional right to have effect given to their objections against an obnoxious "presentee" to a parish. Eventually a settlement was effected by military force, and a number of ministers had to suffer a modified form of deposition because they refused to carry out these high-handed settlements; and thus, in 1733, the "First Secession Church" came into existence. The cause of these fathers of the secession grew rapidly; their congregations increased in numbers, and as attempts at reconciliation failed, the Secession became firmly established.

In 1750, another serious case arose in connection with the grievance of Patronage, and again a minister was intruded into a parish by the military force, and, as might have been expected, another crisis arose, which ended in a second secession; and thus in 1752 the "Relief Church" originated.

Very early in the history of the Secession Church a controversy arose respecting the lawfulness of the oath which was prescribed for councilors in burgh towns, some holding that it was lawful, and others that it was unlawful, as all who took it admitted the lawfulness of the actual condition of affairs in the Church. This was denied by the other side, but the controversy was continued, and issued in the disruption of the body in 1747 into the "Burghers" and the "Anti-burghers;" and not until 1820 did the brethren come together again, when the breach was happily healed, and the united bodies took the name of the "United Secession Church." Still further, in 1847, after mature thought and earnest deliberation, the United Secession and the Relief coalesced and formed "The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland." The ministers and members of this Church hold to the Westminster standard in doctrinal matters, but they deny that the State should have any share in contributing to the support of the Church, or in any way be permitted to touch the Church's affairs.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—About the year 1830 a very keen discussion arose in Scotland respecting the lawfulness of an Established Church, in which members of the Secession Church took the negative, and pointed to the law of Patronage, which they held enslaved the Ministers of the Church. In reply it was urged that while the Patron might present, the people and the Church Courts might, if they assigned due reasons, reject, the "presentee." This controversy led the friends of liberty in the Established Church to carry such measures in the Assembly as enabled the members of a Parish to veto the nominee of a Patron. This right being exercised, the case was carried into the civil courts, where it was decided against the supporters of the "veto;" and rather than submit to carry out the decisions of a civil court in opposition to what was held to be the spiritual rights of the members of the Church, a large number of the most distinguished members of the Church of Scotland, with Dr. Chalmers at their head, withdrew from the Assembly and formed the "Free Church of Scotland." It receives no support from the civil government, is entirely free from State control, rules itself according to Presbyterian principles, and by the liberal contributions of its members sustains its ministers and carries on a great system of missionary and educational operations that indicate a remarkable amount of intellectual and religious energy. By means of a central fund known as "The Sustentation Fund," provision is made for all the Ministers in such a manner that all are secured a competent, though not an excessive, support. In India, in all the British colonies and among the Jews this Church is exceedingly active; and in educational matters, by means of colleges and seminaries in Edinburgh, Glasgow and Aberdeen, as well as by local and parochial schools, the Free Church of Scotland has done much for the land.

COVENANTERS, OR CAMERONIANS.—During the reigns of Charles II. and James II. there were several parties who held that the terms of the National and the Solemn League and Covenant were binding on the Church and nation; and when matters were not settled on the accession of William III. to their satisfaction, they repudiated the terms, and in time they formed a Church organization, and they have since been known as the Covenanters. They have also been called Cameronians, from Richard Cameron, a celebrated leader in the contests with the civil power. In Ulster this body had representatives, and the cause extended also to the United States and the British Colonies. In the United States a division took place owing to a difference of view on the lawfulness of swearing allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the Country, and this division continues to the present day.

IRISH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—In the reigns of James I. and his son Charles I. settlers from Scotland were planted in Ulster, and Scottish ministers who accompanied the regiments brought to Ireland in 1641 and the following years organized the Church in Ireland, which has grown steadily, and which adheres very faithfully to the Standards of the Mother Church. From the time of Charles II. the Crown was accustomed to make an annual grant to the ministers of this Church, but no attempt was ever made to influence them in doctrine or discipline. A change has taken place a few years ago, and the Irish branch of the Church supports its ministers in a manner which resembles the plan of the Free Church of Scotland. In India, in the Colonies and among the Jews and in several nations on the Continent of Europe, the Irish Church is laboring with great zeal and much success. Great attention is paid to the education of the ministry, and the Church is in a state of great activity, and earnestly laboring in the work of the Lord.

ENGLISH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—During the reign of Queen Mary many of the Reformers fled to the Continent. At Frankfort and elsewhere they imbibed Presbyterian principles, and on their return they sought such changes in the service-book and the order of the Church as they held they were warranted to do by the Word of God. Gradually a difference of judgment became decided among the nonconformists, many of them adopting Congregational views, but eventually a Presbyterian place of worship was opened at Wandsworth, in Surrey, near London, and a Presbytery was also formed. Churches were organized in other counties, and in a short time it is held that one hundred thousand members were thus enrolled. The famous Westminster Assembly showed the power of the Presbyterian element in England, but the restoration of Charles II. restored the Episcopal Church to power again. The tendency to latitudinarianism in doctrine which prevailed in the reign of Anne affected many of the nonconformists, and those ministers of Presbyterian Churches who fell into Arianism had no love for the exercise of Presbyterian care and oversight. Gradually they became Congregational in their practice; and when their preaching became distasteful to any of their flocks, the remedy adopted was to join a more evangelical nonconformist Church, thus leaving the Churches and the endowments that had originally been Presbyterian and Trinitarian to fall into the hands of Arians and Socinians. In this way more than one hundred and seventy chapels have come into the hands of the present generation of Socinians, who, in order to retain them, most disingenuously call themselves Presbyterians, though they carry out no Presbyterian discipline whatever, and they use the funds in their hands to enable them to oppose the doctrines which were held by the founders of their Churches. What with these endowments, and what with charities which have been similarly alienated from their original purpose, the Socinians have in their hands an annual amount of at least seven thousand pounds sterling, besides the proceeds of fifty thousand pounds left by the Rev. Dr. Williams for the support of orthodox views. Nevertheless, these funds, so procured and held, are unable to maintain in vigor the Socinian cause, which is gradually declining, and which is obliged to yield to the influence of a freezing infidelity or the warmth and earnestness of a living evangelical faith.

Notwithstanding this defect, the cause of true Presbyterianism in England was maintained. In the northern counties, in London, and elsewhere, churches were kept alive, and settlers from Scotland and Ireland added to their strength. For some time these churches held a connection with the Church of Scotland, to indicate their Trinitarian and Evangelical faith, but at the time of the Disruption, in 1843, the majority of them avowed their sympathy with the views of the Free Church; but recognizing their number, their strength and their position, they declared themselves to be a separate Church, independent of, but in harmony and in fellowship with, the Irish Church and the Free Church of Scotland. This Presbyterian Church in England has displayed great vigor in every department of Church work, and in London and the large cities of the kingdom its growth has been most remarkable. China is the sphere of its operations among the heathen, and it devotes a great amount of energy to the conversion of the Jews.

In all the British Colonies Presbyterianism flourishes. In New Zealand, Australia, Tasmania, Natal, South Africa, the West Indies and the Provinces of the Dominion of Canada there are effective organizations, all holding to the standards of the mother Church, and all very actively engaged in every department of spiritual work which should engage the efforts of the people of God.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.—This is one of the largest and most effective of all the Churches which have descended from the Scottish fountain of Church order. After the accession of William and Mary, many settlers of the Presbyterian faith began to seek a home in the colonies, and the names of Francis Makemie and John Hampton stand out as the first of the ministers who crossed the Atlantic to preach to their brethren in their new home. Makemie was from Donegal, in the North of Ireland, but the nativity of Hampton is unknown. They came in 1699, and fixed their residence on the eastern shore of Virginia, near the borders of Maryland, and they extended their labors in all directions among the settlers, wherever opportunity was given to them to preach the Word. Owing to the liberality displayed in Pennsylvania and Maryland toward the members of different denominations, the Presbyterians from Ireland and Scotland sought a home in these colonies when they fled from oppression in their native land.

So far as is now known, the first Presbyterian Church that was organized and furnished with a regular place of worship in the American colonies was in the city of Philadelphia. In the year 1704 a Presbytery was formed under the title of the Presbytery of Philadelphia; and by this time Churches had been gathered at Snow Hill in Maryland, Newcastle in Delaware, and Charleston in South Carolina. The growth of the denomination stow, in Cornwall, in the year 1648, and after his education at Christ Church, Oxford, he became successively rector of St. Clement's, Oxford, prebendary of Norwich, rector of Bladen, Oxfordshire, vicar of Saham, Norfolk, archdeacon of Suffolk, vicar of Trowse, Norfolk, and in 1702 dean of Norwich. It is said that it was owing to ill-health alone that he was not raised to the episcopal dignity. In passing through his various offices he published, from time to time, many well-known works, which proved him to possess great classical attainments, as well as theological knowledge and polemical divinity, and the more special acquisition of ecclesiastical law. The great work which secures him lasting reputation is his "Connection of the Old and New Testaments." This admirable work, notwithstanding the increased knowledge of recent discoveries in Oriental literature, is not likely to be supplanted, so thoroughly has the author illustrated his subject with all sorts of suitable learning—Greek, Latin, Hebrew and Rabbinic. Dean Prideaux died in the year 1724.

kind of right to the first-born. No trace was yet visible of a sacerdotal body or caste.

It pleased God, however, after the giving of the law, to select one family of Israel to be his priests, Ex. xxviii. 1; Heb. v. 1-4, the family of Aaron, of the tribe of Levi. This selection did not pass without question. There was at one time a combined opposition from members of the tribe to whom by right of primogeniture the priesthood might seem to have belonged, and from Levites who were displeased that the high office should be entrusted to a single family and not shared generally among their tribe. This opposition was quelled by the supernatural interference of God himself, Num. xvi., xvii. At what precise period it occurred we can but conjecture; perhaps it was not till after some years' sojourn in the wilderness.

Some of the highest functions were reserved for the high-priest, under whose authority the ordinary members of the sacerdotal class would seem to have been placed. But it may be generally said that these were to conduct the customary services of the sanctuary, to prepare and offer the daily, weekly and monthly sacrifices, and those which from time to time were brought by individuals, on special occasions, or at the great annual festivals; they were to officiate at purifications, and pronounce judgment in cases of alleged or apprehended leprosy; they were to have charge of the holy vessels, watching the sacred fire and feeding the golden lamp, covering also the sanctuary and its furniture when the camp was moving;

they were to conduct the trial of jealousy, and to estimate the redemption-money for a vow; they were to preserve and teach the law, and to bless the people; they were employed as judges and magistrates, and in war they carried the ark of the covenant, sounded the holy trumpets and animated the people to combat. But in the more laborious duties connected with their office they were to be assisted by the Levites, Ex. xxvii. 20, 21; xxx. 7, 8, 18-21; Lev. i.-vii.; x. 8-11; xii.-xiv.; xxiv. 1-9; xxvii.; Num. iv. 5-16; v. 11-vi.; x. 1-10; Deut. xvii. 8-13; xxi. 1-9; xxxi. 9-13; xxxiii. 10.

The descendants of Aaron were priests by hereditary right. But there were certain blemishes and imperfections which, if they were found in any man, disqualified him from performing the functions of his office, though he might partake of the sacred food which belonged to the order. These blemishes are specified in the law, Lev. xxi. 16-24. There were certain regulations, too, to which a priest must conform. He must not mourn or defile himself at the death of any except his nearest relatives—the high-priest defiling himself for no one, how tings and shavings which were common among the heathen; he must not marry a woman of bad character or divorced—the high-priest was to marry only a virgin of his own people—and his family were to be pure in conduct, Lev. xxi. 1-15. He and his household were to eat of the sacred things, save when disqualified by uncleanness; his daughter, if she married a stranger, must not touch this hallowed food; but if as a widow she returned to her father's house, she might partake of it, as in her youth, Lev. xxii. 1-13. All these rules had a pregnant meaning; they bore witness to the purity of Jehovah, and read the lesson that they that approach the holy God must not be defiled with evil.

The priests were to have a special consecration. The ceremonies were carefully prescribed to Moses, and were accurately carried out by him at the consecration of Aaron and his sons. They consisted in certain sacrifices, washings, the putting on of the holy garments, the sprinkling of blood and the anointing with oil, and lasted for seven days, Ex. xxix. 1-37; Lev. viii., ix. Higher rites as well as more beautiful garments were prescribed for Aaron than for his sons, and most likely he alone was anointed. Provision, too, was made for the inauguration of succeeding high-priests by the solemn putting on of the pontifical robes seven days and receiving unction in them, compare Num. xx. 25-28; but it is very doubtful whether at the succession of ordinary priests there was any kind of consecration repeated.

Particular vestments were appropriated to them. These were—1. Linen drawers, Ex. xxviii. 42. 2. A white linen tunic, fitting closely to the body and reaching from the neck down to the ankles; it had tight sleeves, and appears to have been woven without seam. 3. This was confined by a linen girdle, curiously embroidered with blue, purple and scarlet. 4. A tiara or bonnet, composed of several folds of linen, said to have been originally of a pointed shape, but afterward almost globular, Ex. xxviii. 40; xxix. 9; xxxix. 27-29. It has been thought that other garments were prescribed for priests, which were called "clothes of service," Ex. xxxi. 10; xxxix. 1, 4; but these were much more likely those cloths which were used for covering the sacred furniture, Num. iv. 6-13. That the holy vestments were worn only while the priests were ministering in the sanctuary is indeed very probable, Ezek. xlii. 14; and it is said that they were never washed when soiled, but used to make wicks for the lamps of the temple. There is no mention of shoes or sandals; we may therefore conclude that the priests ministered barefooted. "A linen ephod" was also worn by the priests generally, 1 Sam. xxii. 18.

The maintenance of the priests was provided on at least a fair, probably an ample, scale. Very likely, amid the degeneracy of the nation and disregard of the law which so often recurred, the priesthood did not receive all to which they were entitled, and there are occasional indications of their suffering from poverty, 1 Sam. ii. 36; there are also on the other hand indications of grasping wealth and power, 1 Sam. ii. 13-16; Jer. v. 31, which drew down on the offenders deserved and terrible threatenings. Thirteen out of the forty-eight Levitical cities were assigned for their residence. Besides, they had tithes and first-fruits, redemption-money and portions of many of the sacrifices. The tenth of the produce of the land was assigned to the Levites generally, and of this a tenth, the best, was to be the priests', Num. xviii.

EGYPTIAN PRIESTS.

PRIEST (preest). This word is the representative of khôhen in the Old Testament and of hieruus in the New. Critics are not exactly agreed on the ground-meaning of the Hebrew word. Gesenius imagines that it implies the notion of presaging or divining, hence one who communicates the divine will to men. Saalschutz prefers the idea of ministering or serving. It is sometimes used of secular functionaries apart from any sacerdotal office. In the New Testament hieruus is applied not to the Christian ministry, but to the Hebrew and heathen priesthood.

From the beginning the necessity of presenting some acceptable service to God was understood, and sacrifices appear to have been the earliest mode of worship. It was a natural step to establish what might be termed a household priesthood, in which the most honorable of the family drew near to God in the name and as the representative of the rest, and offered for all that victim which it was hoped would propitiate the divine favor. So we find the patriarchs, Noah, Abraham and others, officiating as the priests of their households, Gen. viii. 20; xii. 8, and the tithe every third year, Deut. xiv. 28; xxvi. 12, the tenth of which we may probably suppose was also given to the priests. The first-fruits are prescribed in Ex. xxiii. 19; Lev. ii. 14; Deut. xxvi. 1-10; those offered to the Lord became the portion of the priests. The redemption-money was levied on account of persons, animals or things devoted to God, Lev. xxvii., and for the first-born of men and beasts, Num. xviii. 14-18. The shew-bread, too, and the flesh of offerings belonged to the priests, and formed their ordinary diet, Lev. vi. 26, 29; Num. xviii. 8-13. These seem to have been the regular sources of the priests' subsistence; sometimes there would be the dedicated portion of the spoils of war, of which there is a notable example in the conquest of the Midianites, Num. xxxi. 25-47. It is probable also that they might like other persons acquire and hold private property, Jer. xxxii. 1-15. The high-priest, no doubt, received a greater proportion from the different sources of income than the inferior priests.

David divided the whole number of priests into twenty-four courses, so that they might minister in rotation, 1 Chr. xxiv. 1-19. It would seem that these courses changed every Sabbath, 2 Chr. xxiii. 8, and that the special functions of individual priests were assigned by lot, Luke i. 9. According to this arrangement, each course would be in ordinary attendance at the sanctuary about twice in the year; the rest of the time they could spend in their cities.

David's distribution of the priests was preserved through succeeding reigns. Of course they adhered to the kingdom of Judah, their cities being in the southern division of the land. And there can be little doubt that the priests partook of the degeneracy of later times. Among so large a body many must have been of an inferior class, ignorant very likely and demoralized. As a body they ought to have had and must have had great influence. And yet we seldom hear of their acting in a body or in masses; and in times of reformation, instead of taking the lead, they were rather behind the Levites and others. Neither did they make the bold stand they ought to have made against the idolatry of the kings; rather they helped on their evil courses, 2 Ki. xvi. 10, 11, 15, 16. No wonder, therefore, that we find in the prophets repeated denunciations against the unworthy priests, Jer. i. 18; Lam. iv. 13; Ezek. xxii. 26.

There was still occasion after the return from captivity to complain of the irreverent conduct of the priests, Mal. i. 10; ii. 1-10. And it may be added that there were those who claimed the priesthood, but who, because they could not prove their line of descent, were not admitted to the function, Ezra ii. 61-63; Neh. vii. 63-65.

In New Testament times some of the priests were of distinguished piety; such were Zacharias and John the Baptist; but the mass appear to have been formalists and worldly men. Accordingly, we always find the priests forward among those that resisted Christ, Matt. xvi. 21; xxvii. 1, 6, 12, 20, 41, 62; xxviii. 11. The men of the greatest influence among them, called chief priests, those who were heads of the courses, with such as had borne the office of the high-priest, were the leaders of the body. The dignity of high-priest was no longer for life in regular descent, but was transferred from one to another by the violence of faction and at the will of their foreign masters. Next to him it may be observed was the second priest, 2 Ki. xxv. 18, called by the Jews the sagan. After our Lord's ascension, when his disciples began to preach the gospel, we find the same general temper among the priests. And so the decay of Israel became "the riches of the Gentiles," Rom. xi. 12, and a larger platform was prepared for God's wonderful dealings. True, "a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith," Acts vi. 7; but, so far as we know, none was distinguished as a Christian leader or preacher. Corruption went on among the remnant; fearful acts were done in the very temple; till at last the day of vengeance came; Jerusalem was destroyed; and now, though claims have been made, there is, perhaps, no man who can satisfactorily prove that he is a descendant of Aaron.

It matters not. We have a great High Priest who, having offered a perfect sacrifice with his own blood, hath entered into the holiest, even into heaven itself. He "hath an unchangeable priesthood," and "ever liveth to make intercession for those that come to God by him," Heb. ii. 17. And just as everything, their freedom from blemish, their beautiful garments, betokened holiness in the Levitical priesthood, so was Christ "holy, harmless, undefiled;" as the Hebrew priest was anointed at his consecration, so was Christ ordained, the Spirit without measure being poured upon him, made with the high sanction of an oath; as the priesthood of the law was the only means of access to God, so by a new and living way through Christ alone can sinners approach the Father. Far more effectual is the offering of Christ's blood than the blood of bulls and of goats sacrificed under the law, Heb. ix. 11-14. And as the ancient priest had nearness of access to God and bore the names of Israel on his breast, so does Christ as our representative enter the very heavenly presence for us, bearing ever the cause of his people in his heart when he gives them boldness to come to the throne of grace by him. While the Levitical priesthood typified Christ, it fell far short in its presignifications—as far, indeed, as "the law of a carnal commandment" falls short of "the power of an endless life." Christ, then, was made a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek, the glory and dignity of his person being indicated thereby, as the nature of his work was by the similitude of the order of Aaron. And as his people are vitally united to Christ, so they have according to their measure the gifts and dignity which have been bestowed on the Mediator, Rev. i. 5, 6. They are priests, and offer up spiritual sacrifices; they are kings, and have even now the Spirit of power. And eventually, when Christ's work in them is brought to its proper consummation, they shall, as kings and priests, share with him in the glories of his everlasting kingdom.

HIGH-PRIEST.—Aaron, the elder brother of Moses, was with his family specially appointed to the priesthood, Ex. xxviii. 1, the father being the chief, to be succeeded in his supremacy in a regular order throughout their generations.

It is not possible to trace with certainty the descent of the high-priesthood. Ordinarily it was hereditary; and we may suppose that the rule was for the elder son to succeed the father, but there are examples of its being held in the younger line.

Some of the garments worn by the high-priest were common to the whole body of the priests; but there were others peculiar to the chief—the robe of the ephod, the ephod with its curious girdle, the breastplate and the mitre. Of these a brief description shall be given here: 1. The robe of the ephod was of woven work, all blue. It had no sleeves, but there was a hole through which the head passed; and around this there was a binding of woven-work to prevent tearing. It is not agreed what length it was; longer undoubtedly than the ephod, and perhaps as long as the brodered coat or tunic over which it was worn. On the hem of this vestment were small golden bells, alternating with a kind of tassel of blue, purple and scarlet, in the shape of a pomegranate. The sound of the bells was to be heard as the priest entered and quitted the sanctuary, "that he die not," Ex. xxviii. 21-35; xxxix. 22-26. Perhaps one use of the bells was to give notice to the people without of the movements of the priest. 2. The ephod was a short robe covering the shoulders, the breast and upper part of the body, the back and front portions of it being united by shoulder-pieces, on which were onyx-stones set in golden sockets. On these stones were engraven the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. 3. The breastplate, like the ephod, was to be "of cunning work" of "gold, blue, purple, scarlet and fine twined linen." It was to be doubled, and then it would be four-square, a span every way. And then there were to be twelve precious stones upon it in four rows, set in gold sockets, and on these stones were to be graven the names of the twelve tribes, that they might be upon the high-priest's heart. This "breastplate of judgment," as it was called, was to be secured by wreathen chains of gold, uniting the onyx-stones on the shoulders of the ephod to two gold rings on the top of the breastplate, and below by a lace of blue fastening two other rings to two corresponding rings on the ephod, so that the breastplate might be kept above the curious girdle of the ephod. And then in "the breastplate of judgment" the Urim and Thummim were to be put, Ex. xxviii. 15-30; xxxix. 8-21. 4. The mitre was similar to the "bonnets" or turbans of the ordinary priests, save that, according to Josephus, on the top was another turban of blue; encircling this was a triple golden crown, out of which rose a cup of gold resembling the inverted calyx of the herb hyoscyamus. The crown just described was perhaps added to the mitre when, as in the Asmonean family, the civil authority was united to the ecclesiastical. There was also a gold plate fastened by a blue lace to the fore-front, bearing upon it the inscription "Holiness to the Lord," Ex. xxviii. 36-38; xxxix. 30, 31.

The high-priest was to be a person especially sacred. Hence any bodily imperfection or blemish excluded him from the office. The victims offered to the Lord were, it was repeatedly said, to be free from blemish; much more, therefore, must this rule hold in respect to the offering priest. A variety of physical disqualifications are enumerated in the law, Lev. xxi. 19-23. Akin to these physical blemishes there were various restrictions laid upon the high-priest, all indicating the purity of person and character which befitted such an office. He was not to rend his clothes or uncover his head, to defile himself at the death of even his father or mother; and he could marry only a virgin, Lev. x. 6, 7; xxi. 10-15; compare Ezek. xliv. 22.

The inauguration of Aaron is particularly described, Ex. xxix. 1-30; xl. 12-16; Lev. viii. The holy garments were put upon him, and he was sprinkled with the blood of a victim and anointed with holy oil, the whole process of consecration lasting seven days. A special difference herein between the chief and the ordinary priests was that the former had the anointing oil poured upon his head; some, however, imagine that it was only the greater abundance of this anointing which distinguished the high-priest. Hence he is peculiarly called the anointed one, Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16; Ps. cxxxiii. 2. So a successor was to wear the garments seven days and be anointed in them, Ex. xxix. 29, 30.

The duties of the high-priest as chief ecclesiastical dignitary were great and responsible. He especially represented the people. It was he, therefore, who was to officiate on the great day of atonement. Others, the inferior priests, might offer the ordinary sacrifices, but the chief alone must enter into the holiest with the blood of sprinkling, Lev. xvi. 1-28; Heb. ix. 7. The high-priest also, it is likely, officiated on various great and solemn occasions, when more than ordinary pomp was required. He frequently presided in councils, Matt. xxvi. 57, 62, 65, 66; Acts xxiii. 2; and it was at the death of the high-priest that the manslayer who had fled to a city of refuge was free to return to his own home, Num. xxxv. 25, 28, 32. The chief's maintenance must have been amply provided from the offerings allotted to the priestly body. He appears to have had a deputy, or one in office immediately next to him, called the sagan. Hence it has been supposed that while Abiathar was high-priest, Zadok was sagan. Some uncertainty rests on this; and in later times, when high-priests were set up and deposed at the will of the Roman government, there were several contemporary pontifical men who had borne the supreme office, and who consequently retained the title and enjoyed great consideration.

The typical character of the high-priest, as foreshadowing Him whose sacrifice was the only really efficient propitiation for sin, is dwelt on and opened up with great clearness in the Epistle to the Hebrews, Heb. iii. 1; ix. 7-14.

PRIEST. In the Romish and Protestant Episcopal Churches this term is used to designate the second order or grade of the ministry. The word is formed by changing the Greek presbuteros, and ending with an English termination. As the Church of Rome holds that in the mass there is a sacrifice offered to God, there is a sense of propriety in retaining the word priest; but as Protestants hold that the all-perfect sacrifice was offered on Calvary, and that in the eucharist there is only a commemoration of Christ's death, the retention of the word priest has been held by many as unwise. By others it has been defended on the ground Revolution, and during a visit to Paris was made a member of the Convention. In consequence, his house at Birmingham was sacked by a mob, and he was compelled to move to London, from whence he came to America. During the ten years he was in this country he wrote much in support of his theological opinions; but his works on this subject are of little value, while those he wrote on various subjects of natural philosophy are highly esteemed. He was the discoverer of nitrous gas, muriatic gas and oxygen, and he demonstrated the effect of respiration on the blood. His death occurred in 1804.

PRIMACY (pri'ma-se), the highest post in the Church. The Romanists contend that St. Peter, by our Lord's appointment, had a primacy or sovereign authority and jurisdiction over the apostles. This, however, is denied by the Protestants on many grounds, such as the following. As to a primacy importing a superiority in command, power or jurisdiction, this we deny upon the following considerations: 1. For such a power it was needful that a commission from God, its founder, should be granted in absolute and perspicuous terms, but no such commission is extant in Scripture. 2. If so illustrious an office was instituted by our Saviour, it is strange that nowhere in the evangelical or apostolical history there should be any express mention of that institution. 3. If St. Peter had been instituted sovereign of the apostolical senate, his office and state had been in nature and kind very distinct from the common office of the other apostles, as the office of a king from the office of any subject, and probably would have been signified by some distinct name, as that of arch-apostle, arch-pastor, the vicar of Christ, or the like; but no such name or title was assumed by him, or was by the rest attributed to him. 4. There was no office above that of an apostle known to the apostles or primitive Church, Eph. iv. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 28. 5. Our Lord himself declared against this kind of primacy, prohibiting his apostles to affect, to seek, to assume or admit a superiority of power, one above another, Luke xxii. 14, 24; Mark ix. 35. 6. We do not find any peculiar administration committed to St. Peter, nor any privilege conferred on him which was not also granted to the other apostles, John xx. 23; Mark xvi. 15. 7. In neither of Peter's two catholic epistles does there appear any intimation of any pretence to this arch-apostolical power. 8. In all relations which occur in Scripture about controversies of doctrine or practice, there is no appeal made to St. Peter's judgment, or allegation of it as decisive, and no argument is built on his authority. 9. St. Peter nowhere appears intermeddling as a judge or governor paramount in such cases; yet where he does himself deal with heretics and disorderly persons, he proceeds not as a pope decreeing, but that formerly prayers and all parts of divine services were "sacrifices" in the sense of being offered up to God; and in this sense the word was used and may be retained.

PRIESTLEY (preest'le), JOSEPH, F.R.S., born in 1733, was the minister of a Unitarian congregation at Leeds, in England. He received a good education among the dissenters, and had a great philosophical turn of mind, which he showed by his valuable works on electricity, on light and on air. But he was chiefly known as the able advocate of Socinianism and the author of "History of Early Opinions concerning the Person of Christ," a book which was ably refuted by Horsley and others. He was an admirer of the French as an apostle, warning, arguing and persuading against them. 10. The consideration of the apostles' proceeding in the conversion of people, in the foundation of churches and in administration of their spiritual affairs will exclude any probability of St. Peter's jurisdiction over them. They went about their business, not by order or license from St. Peter, but according to special direction of God's Spirit. 11. The nature of the apostolical ministry, the apostles not being fixed in one place of residence, but continually moving about the world, the state of things at that time and the manner of St. Peter's life render it unlikely that he had such a jurisdiction over the apostles as some assign him. 12. It was indeed most requisite that every apostle should have a complete, absolute, independent authority in managing the duties and concerns of the office, that he might not in any wise be obstructed in the discharge of them, not clogged with a need to consult others, not hampered with orders from those who were at a distance. 13. The discourse and behavior of St. Paul toward St. Peter doth evidence that he did not acknowledge any dependence on him or any subjection to him, Gal. ii. 11-14. If St. Peter had been appointed sovereign of the Church, it seems that it should have been requisite that he should have outlived all the apostles, for otherwise the Church would have wanted a head, or there must have been an inextricable controversy who that head was. But St. Peter died long before St. John, as all agree, and perhaps before divers others of the apostles.

From these arguments we must evidently see what little ground the Church of Rome has to derive the supremacy of the pope from the supposed primacy of St. Peter.

PRIME, NATHANIEL SCUDDER, D.D., was born in 1785, at Huntingdon, Long Island, and educated at Princeton College, where he graduated in 1804. After preaching for some time at Sag Harbor and other places in the east of Long Island, he became pastor of the Presbyterian church of Cambridge, New York, where he greatly distinguished himself. He had much of the literary taste which seems inherent in the family of the Primes ever since their settlement in America, which was displayed in Ebenezer Prime, an eminent ancestor, in his son, Dr. Benjamin Young Prime, who was famed for his attainments in ancient and modern languages and in the exact sciences, and which is so characteristic of his sons, the Rev. Samuel Irenæus Prime, D.D., and William Cowper Prime, who have long held a deservedly prominent place in American literature. Dr. Spring has justly said that Nathaniel Scudder Prime "had a mind of uncommon force and discrimination, a noble, generous spirit, simple and engaging manners, an invincible firmness in holding to his own convictions, an excellent talent for the pulpit, great tact in public business and an earnest devotion to the best interests of his fellow-men." He died in 1856.

PRIMITIVE (prim'i-tiv) CHURCH. The Church before the first Council of Nice, A. D. 325, is called primitive. Persecution ceased about this time, in consequence of the Roman emperors professing Christianity, and laxity in discipline and doctrine soon began to prevail. It has been customary with many to appeal to the tradition of the ages before the council of A. D. 325 for the settlement of doctrinal matters, but the result has always been demonstrative of the fact that the inspired Word of God can alone speak with authority in matters of faith and practice.

PRIMITIVE FATHERS. The leading writers and eminent rulers in the Church who flourished before A. D. 325 are so called.

PRIMITIVE METHODISTS. See METHODIST CHURCH.

PRINCE. This word is used in our translation with considerable latitude of meaning, and as the representative of more than one original term. Thus Abraham is called "a mighty prince," Gen. xxiii. 6, the Hebrew word ndsî signifying an exalted person, and being applied sometimes to kings, 1 Ki. xi. 34; also to the heads of the tribes of Israel, Num. i. 44, and to Ishmael, Gen. xvii. 20. Another Hebrew word, sar, "one having dominion," is applied to the principal rulers of a nation under the sovereign, 1 Sam. xxix. 3, the chief officers or ministers of state, 1 Ki. iv. 2, and local governors or magistrates, 1 Ki. xx. 14. It designates the merchants of Tyre, who were wealthy as princes, Isa. xxiii. 8, the priests or "princes of the sanctuary," Isa. xliiii. 28, the foremost angels, Dan. x. 13, 20, 21. And this word is applied to the Deity, as "Prince of princes," Dan. viii. 25, and to Messiah "the Prince of peace," Isa. ix. 6. In the feminine it is princesses, ladies, 1 Ki. xi. 3. Another word, nâgîd, "the foremost," is used for kings, 1 Sam. ix. 16, nobles, Ps. lxxvi. 12, Messiah, Dan. ix. 25, "the prince of the covenant," Dan. xi. 22. Other words are used, as in Dan. vi. 1, where the "princes" corresponded to the satraps afterward appointed through the Persian empire. In the New Testament a word

"prince." Thus, Christ is the "Prince of life," Acts iii. 15, "the Prince of the kings of the earth," Rev. i. 5; and Satan is "the prince of this world," John xii. 31, "the prince of the power of the air," Eph. ii. 2.

PRINCIPALITIES (prin-se-pal'i-teez), Rom. viii. 38. See ANGEL. Tit. iii. 1, magistrates.

PRINGLE (pring'g'l), FRANCIS, was born in 1747, at Path-Head, near Kircaldy, in Scotland, and educated for the ministry in the Associate Presbyterian Church. He was licensed, and sent to preach in the vacant church of Gilnahirk, near Belfast, in which he became pastor, and where he had great success. In 1798, after twenty-two years of faithful labor, the relation between pastor and people was broken up, because of the troubles resulting from the fact that members of his congregation had become engaged in the projects of the "United Irishmen." In the autumn of that year he determined on emigrating, and he reached New York in September, 1799. He was settled at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, where his character as a pious, earnest and faithful pastor endeared him to all who knew him. His knowledge of Scripture was most remarkable, and few men had a greater aptitude for reaching even the roughest men by his tender, prudent and impressive manner. Two of his sons entered the ministry, but they were early removed by death, after having given great promise of usefulness. He died in 1833, in the eighty-fifth year of his age and the sixty-fourth year of his ministry.

PRINTING. The history of the origin of printing is involved in great mystery. Some writers maintain that the art was practiced as far back as the building of Babylon, and that the characters impressed on the bricks found on the side of that city are literally printed. Metal stamps are found with the words engraved in relief which the Romans used to mark their various articles. Antiquaries are familiar with inscriptions in cameo and intaglio, and Mr. Douce, a collector, had a stamp engraved on stone which was used by a Roman oculist to mark his medicines. According to Du Halde and the missionaries, the art of printing from engraved blocks of wood was practiced in China nearly fifty years before the Christian Venetians came to understand and practice the art, which was specially used in making playing-cards and religious pictures.

About 1450, owing to the expense of making so many separate blocks as were needed to meet the demands of the age, the idea was adopted of using separate metal types instead of the large solid wooden blocks. Haarlem and Mentz have been the chief cities which have claimed the honor of this adaptation. In 1440 the "Speculum Humane Salvationis" (The Mirror of Human Salvation) was printed by Coster at Haarlem; but the celebrated "Mentz Bible without date" is the first important specimen of printing with metal types, and it was executed by Guttenberg and Faust between the years 1450 and 1455, and was the occasion of the secret being divulged of producing books by mechanical means. Then followed the "Psalter of 1457" by Faust and Schœffer, and both these works are executed in a style of wondrous perfection.

The knowledge of the art spread so rapidly that before 1500 there were printing-offices in upward of two hundred and twenty places—in Austria, Bavaria, Bohemia, Calabria, Denmark, England, Flanders, France, Geneva, Genoa, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Italy, Lombardy, Saxony, Sicily, Spain, Turkey, and indeed in nearly every prominent place in Europe.

William Caxton is generally regarded as the first who introduced the art of printing into England, and practiced it at Westminster; but a vigorous claim is put in for an edition of a work at Oxford printed by a foreigner, who was arrested in his proceedings. One copy of this work is in the Bodleian Library, at Oxford, another is in the public library at Cambridge, and a third is in the British Museum, while the earl of Pembroke and All Souls' College claim to have copies also. Caxton learned the art on the Continent of Europe when engaged on political missions in the reign of Henry VII., and on his return to England he opened an office in Westminster, near the Abbey. Here he issued a great number of works.

The first work in which Greek types were used was "Cicero's Offices;" it was printed in 1465, and the characters are exceedingly imperfect; but now, owing to the progress of learning, the advancement of commerce and the results of missionary labors ing-presses of London are able to use proper characters for Arabic, Armenian, Chinese, Coptic, Domesday, Engrossing, Ethiopic, Etruscan, German, Greek, Alexandrian-Greek, Gothic, Hebrew, Irish, Malabaric, Malayan, Persian, Runic, Russian, Samaritan, Sanscrit, Saxon, Tamul, Telugu, Turkish, Tamoul, and almost all the dialects of India and the Indian Archipelago, as well as the languages of Africa and the isles of the ocean.

Printing has thus become one of the most effective agencies which our race has ever enjoyed for the diffusion of learning, as by means of the printing-press the knowledge of all ages and of all lands can be speedily and cheaply transmitted from place to place. It has been the handmaid of civilization, the powerful stimulus to commerce, and by means of its peculiar power it has multiplied the labors of the gospel missionary, so that the truth may be carried to the ends of the earth from the pens of men who have never left their native land. The influence of missionary zeal in translating and printing the Bible, and in preparing and issuing a valuable literature for nations which are being elevated in the scale of civilization, is beginning to be understood, and the world is learning that religion and the best temporal interests of humanity can never be profitably separated.

PRIOR (pri'or). 1. The monk next in order after the abbot in a monastery. 2. The head of a monastery of lower rank than an abbey. 3. The head of a principal house of Hospitallers.

PRIORESS (pri'or-ess). 1. The second in dignity in a convent of nuns. 2. The superior of a dependent convent.

PRIORY See MONASTERY.

PRISCA (pris'kah), 2 Tim. iv. 19, or PRISCILLA (pris-sil'lah), Acts xviii. 2, the excellent and active wife of Aquila.

PRISCILLIAN (pris-sil'e-an), a heretic of the fourth century, was a native of Spain. He is said to have united in his system the errors of the Gnostics, the Manichæans, the Arians and the Sabellians; to which he added dogmas of his own—viz., that the children of promise were born of their mothers by the operation of the Holy Ghost, whence he inferred that marriage was an abomination; that souls were of the substance of God; and that they were sent to inhabit bodies on earth as a punishment for sins committed in heaven. The Priscillianists are charged with infamous practices, resulting from these opinions; and it is stated that no tortures availed to produce a confession of their errors. At the Council of Saragossa, in Spain, in 380, Priscillian was condemned as a heretic; his party, however, was sufficiently powerful to make him bishop of Avila; but he was, with some of his followers, put to death in 387.

PRISCILLIANISTS (pris-sil'yan-ists), the followers of Priscillian, in the fourth century. It appears from authentic records that the difference between their doctrines and that of the Manichæans was not very considerable; for they denied the reality of Christ's birth and incarnation, maintained that the visible universe was not the production of the supreme Deity, but of some demon or malignant principle, adopted the doctrine of æons or emanations from the divine nature, considered human bodies as prisons formed by the demned marriage and disbelieved the resurrection of the body. Their rule of life and manners was rigid and severe; the accounts, therefore, which many have given of their lasciviousness and intemperance deserve not the least credit, as they are totally destitute of evidence and authority. That the Priscillianists were guilty of dissimulation upon some occasions, and deceived their adversaries by cunning stratagems, is true; but that they held it as a maxim that lying and perjury were lawful is a most notorious falsehood, without even the least shadow of probability.

PRISON. See PUNISHMENT.

PRIVATE (pri'vat) BAPTISM. When an infant or adult is in danger of dying, and when sponsors are not engaged, in some denominations the ordinance is administered, and it is then called private baptism.

PRIVATE MASS, mass said without a public congregation.

PRIVILEGED ALTAR, an altar to which special privileges were granted, as, for instance, to say masses for the dead at forbidden seasons. Their date is not much earlier than the pontificate of Gregory XIII., 1572-1585.

PRIZE (prize), 1 Cor. ix. 24, the reward, a chaplet or crown, bestowed by the judges in the ancient GAMES, which see.

PROBABILISTS (prob'a-b'l-ists), those who hold, in cases of conscience, that we may take the less probable side, in opposition to those who hold that we must take the more probable. Jansenists took the last view, Jesuits the first.

PRO-CATHEDRAL (pro-kath-e'dral), a church which serves for a cathedral.

PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST. See HOLY GHOST and FILIOQUE.

PROCESSIONAL (pro-sesh'un-al), the name of a book which contains the services relating to the processions at mass and vespers, and likewise those for special days.

PROCESSIONAL CROSS, a cross borne at the head of processions. Originally, processional crosses were merely ornamental; subsequently, the crucifix was introduced.

PROCESSIONS (pro-sesh'unz), an old term for litanies, which were said in processions, and not kneeling. Processions were very common in the large cathedrals, which, because of their length, enabled the clergy and their attendants to chant lengthened litanies in presence of the audiences who were present as spectators.

Processions are said to be of Pagan origin. The Romans, when the empire was distressed or after some victory, used constantly to order processions, for several days together, to be made to the temples, to beg the assistance of the gods or to return them thanks.

The first processions mentioned in ecclesiastical history are those set on foot at Constantinople by St. Chrysostom. The Arians of that city, being forced to hold their meetings without the town, went thither night and morning, singing anthems. Chrysostom, to prevent their perverting the Catholics, set up counter-processions, in which the clergy and people marched by night, singing prayers and hymns, and carrying crosses and flambeaux. From this period the custom of processions was introduced among the Greeks, and afterward among the Latins; but they have subsisted longer and been more frequently used in the Western than in the Eastern Church.

PROCHORUS (prok'o-rus), one of the seven appointed to distribute the alms of the Church, Acts vi. 5.

PROCONSUL (pro-kon'sul), PROCURATOR (prok-u-ra'tor), the designations of two Roman provincial officers, usually given in our version as "deputy" and "governor." See DEPUTY, GOVERNOR.

PROCTOR (proc'-tor). 1. An officer who represents others, especially in legal matters.

2. A representative of the clergy in convocation.
3. An officer in universities whose office is to preserve order, and to present candidates for degrees.
4. An officer in the English ecclesiastical and admiralty courts, of the same standing as an attorney in other courts.

PROCURATOR (prok-u-ra'tor). 1. One who administers and defends the goods of a church. Thus the procurator of the Church of Scotland is the officer who attends to the legal interests of the clergy and of the immunities of the courts of the Church. 2. One of four officers in the university of Paris who, with others, formed a standing council.

PROGNOSTICATORS (prog-nos-te-ka'-tors), MONTHLY, Isa. xlvii. 13. See DIVINATION.

PROLOCUTOR (pro-lok'u-tor), in England the ecclesiastic who presides in the lower house of Convocation. His duties are to act as chairman, to communicate the conclusion of the lower house to the upper. He is chosen for the entire continuance of a Convocation.

PROMISE (prom'is), as understood in Scripture, a declaration or assurance of the divine will in which God signifies the particular blessings he will bestow, or evils he will remove. Promises are opposed to threatenings, the former being declarations of good, the latter, denunciations of evil. The promises of Scripture have been divided into classes. We may note promises of the Messiah flowing from God's mere mercy, and made the ground of all subsequent promise and blessing. These promises are nearly allied to predictions, Gen. iii. 15; xxii. 18. There are also promises that God would give his Son a people, that his mediatorial work should be effectual to the building up of a Church, his own purchased possession, Ps. ii. 7, 8; Isa. liii. 11, 12. Further, there are promises to the Church, promises of acceptance to those who come to God on the ground of his covenant, promises of blessing both temporal and spiritual, encouraging to the exercise of those graces and the fulfillment of those duties which go to constitute the Christian character. Such are the promises of answer to prayer, Ps. l. 15; Luke xi. 9-13, of grace to the humble, 1 Pet. v. 5, of everlasting life to the believer, John iii. 14, 15, of larger talents to him who has improved those already given, Matt. xxv. 29, etc. Those promises which are made in one case may be applied to other similar cases, consistently with the analogy of faith. Thus the promise given to Joshua, Josh. i. 5, is applied to the believing Hebrews, Heb. xiii. 5, it being in its nature of a comprehensive character; but those which were made to individuals under special circumstances are not to be taken as intended generally, Mark xvi. 17, 18. God has suited his promises to his precepts, compare Deut. x. 16 with xxx. 6, and to the necessities of his people, it being always remembered that where anything is promised to obedience, the contrary is implied to disobedience.

PROMOTER (pro-mo'ter), one who in popular and penal actions prosecutes offenders in his own name and that of the Crown, and is entitled to part of the fines and penalties for so doing.

PRONAOS (pro-na'os), the vestibule of a temple or a church.

PROPAGANDA (prop-a-gan'dah), a religious society founded in 1622 by Pope Gregory XV. at Rome, for educating missionaries to spread the faith abroad or in infidel countries.

PROPER PREFACE. The prefaces in the mass for the season are so called. The Sarum missal had one for Epiphany and seven days after, one for Ash-Wednesday and ferial days in Lent, one for festivals of apostles and Evangelists, and one for those of the Virgin Mary. The Eastern Church has but one. The English Church has but five.

PROPHECY (prof'e-se). Prophecy is not only the predicting of future events; it had the larger office of receiving and communicating generally the will and purposes of God. And men are termed prophets—Abraham, for example, Gen. xx. 7—of whom it is nowhere recorded that they uttered a single prophecy, in the common acceptation of the word. Christ, moreover, in whom the promise of Deut. xviii. 15-19 was to have its ultimate and complete fulfillment, and who was to be the great Prophet of the Church, performed that office, not so much by actual prediction as by teaching all that it was needful the world should know, as the depository and the channel of divine wisdom, dispensing the riches thereof, that the mystery of God might be fully apprehended. The way, too, in which prophecy is spoken of in the apostolic writings goes to establish the same fact. It is described as touching the heart and conscience, convicting, instructing, edifying, comforting, 1 Cor. xiv. 1, 3, 24, 25.

Prophecy was manifested in every phase of its comprehensive character from the very earliest times. When the priesthood was defined in Israel by Moses, there was another ministry connected with it. The law by itself would have left men stationary; they would not have seen through its shadows the substance it was intended to prefigure. But the prophetic ministry, opening out its spiritual meaning and ever tending forward, carried on the education of the elder Church and trained men to look for redemption in Jerusalem.

So that the gospel when it came was not altogether new; it was the bright day which had been preceded by the dawn. And Christ could appeal to the Old Testament scriptures as testifying of him, in whom all that was "written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms" should be fulfilled, Luke xxiv. 44.

With regard to the modes of divine communication little need be said. There were some which might be called official, as the voice which spoke from out of the Shechinah or clouded presence resting on the mercy-seat, Ex. xxv. 22, and the responses by Urim and Thummim, Ex. xxviii. 30. But to the prophets God's will was made known by dreams or visions, by internal impression on the mind, by angelic message, or by audible voice.

Of prophetic dreams we have an example in that of Nebuchadnezzar, in which, as interpreted by Daniel, also from a dream, the destiny of four successive earthly kingdoms was depicted, Dan. ii. In vision, again, Isaiah, when he received his prophetic commission, saw the glory of the divine Lord, Isa. vi.; and the visions of God were vouchsafed to Ezekiel on the banks of Chebar, Ezek. i. It has, indeed, been questioned whether these visions were real, or whether they were but the dress in which the prophets clothed their conceptions. It is of no great moment to decide; but certainly John xii. 41 seems to show that the spiritual forms actually shaped themselves to the mental eye, communicating ideas transcending human experience, and which could not be embodied in human language.

Prophetic communication was also made by the suggestion of ideas to the understanding without the kind of representation implied by visions. We continually find narratives in Scripture of such suggestion, often suddenly produced, as in the case of the old prophet of Beth-el, who while sitting at meat with the man of God that came from Judah had the message of the Lord imparted to him, 1 Ki. xiii. 20-22. And then there was the word brought by an angel, as to Daniel, Dan. ix. 20-27; x. 4-14; and, further, sometimes the articulate divine voice was heard, as when in the still night it echoed through the chambers at Shiloh and summoned the youthful Samuel to listen to the heavy woe that was denounced against the family of Eli, 1 Sam. iii.

In regard to predictions of future events, there are two particulars which must be noted. They bear a certain relation to the mode in which the images of the future were presented to the prophet's mind, but a more immediate one to the mode in which they were placed on record. Thus, first, the way in which remote events are presented is remarkable. The prophet stands like a watchman on some high hill or lofty tower scanning the distant horizon, and tells what meets his gaze. To one who so looks out the far and the near lie apparently in contact; the foreground has a distincter outline and its colors are more vivid, but a multitude of things are blended together, and the haze through which the distant objects are seen obscures their figure and relative proportions. The prophet describing what is so placed before him describes as he sees, and therefore not in historical or chronological order; so that it is hard before the accomplishment to distinguish which of the events is near at hand and which more re-later, and the later exhibiting, only with higher combinations and in a more perfect form, that which had appeared before. It was convenient, then, to describe the future in language borrowed from the past. Thus Messiah is said to renew the rule of David; the final triumphs of the Church are colored with the imagery of the fall of Baby-

1. It must be the first business to arrive at the just understanding of the words and sentences in which the prophetic declarations are conveyed. In many respects prophecy has a language of its own. Symbolic terms are employed (which must be consistent through the same prophecy); as when a beast denotes a power and a candlestick a Christian church. These must be carefully noted, that it may be understood whether the expressions are to be construed literally or figuratively. The figurative character of prophetic speech is not capricious, not just to be ascribed to the cast of the Oriental mind, but is definite in its measure, and results from the principles already laid down of prophetic communication by vision, and the clothing of the future in forms taken from the past. And so the past is frequently used in speaking of the future, and described as done when it is to be done, because the prophet looking on with prescient eye beheld it within his horizon. Hence, too, the succession of events in relation to each other, rather than as arranged according to chronological order. Nor must the poetical cast of prophetic diction be overlooked. Careful examination there should be, the comparison of one part of Scripture with another, the laying over against the prediction of the fulfillment it has received, if it should have already been fulfilled, guided by the declarations of our Lord and his apostles, who pour a flood of light upon the utterances of the ancient seers.

2. The historical relations must also be ascertained, under what circumstances a prophecy was delivered, by whom and on what occasion. The condition of the covenant-people among whom the prophet stood, the events on which he was commissioned to speak; the sins he was to reprove, the judgments that were impending, the fears he was to soothe and the position of surrounding nations, whose deeds and whose history had an influence on God's Church and people, should be scrutinized, else an interpreter might readily apply to one time or event the predictions which were clearly directed to another. The historical portions of the Scripture should be paralleled with those that are prophetical.

3. And then there is the doctrinal aspect to be known. This is based on the covenant relationship of God to Israel. Sin is viewed both as treason to a sovereign and as unfaithfulness to a husband. The desperate guilt of it, and the greatness of the mercy that remits it, are thus most largely illustrated. And prophecy, in accordance with this type, while denouncing sin and predicting judgment, runs on to the fulfillment of the divine purpose, the highest development of the covenant relation, when the faithless spouse, polluted no more, shall be reinstated in the love she had outraged; when the rebellious subjects, disloyalty purged out for ever, shall be gathered in peace and prosperity beneath the beneficent sceptre of the universal King.

These observations are but outlines; they may serve, however, to point out the true mode of prophetic interpretation. It is necessary now to direct attention to the accomplishment of prophecy.

Perhaps it will be best in the space here allotted to point out some of those general features which distinguish prophetic accomplishment, leaving it to the reader to examine for himself more minutely the details. Prophecies have been variously classed. The simplest and commonest ar-note. This is called the "perspective" character of prophecy, and illustrates the juxtaposition in the prophetic writings of utterances to be immediately fulfilled with those before the fulfillment of which ages must roll by. An example may be given from Zech. ix. First, the prophet sees the triumphant march of Alexander, Zech. ix. 1-8; he then beholds Messiah in the distant future, Zech.

lon; and the full blessedness of God's people is represented as a return from captivity into the peaceful possession of the land of Canaan.

That there is great difficulty in the interpretation of prophecy the fact that interpretations are so discordant sufficiently proves. Yet it is not impossible to clear away many difficulties, if we are disposed to use the necessary means. By

ix. 9, 10, and afterward reverts to the age of the Maccabees, Zech. ix. 11-17. On the same principle our Lord's discourse, Matt. xxiv., may be interpreted, as also those passages in which the apostles seem to describe the final close of all things as to occur in their days.

The other point which was to be noted is the reproduction of past events. There is an organic unity in God's plans, the earlier being the type of diligent reading and meditation, comparing scripture with scripture, the writings of the Old Testament with those of the New, and pre-eminently by earnest prayer for the guidance of God's Spirit, a great knowledge may be obtained of the meaning and object of prophecy. A complete system of rules cannot here be given; it must suffice to point out some general principles. And if these be thoroughly apprehended, the application of

I. The nations in contact with Israel, and from time to time their conquerors or oppressors, are threatened. Edom and Tyre and Babylon and Egypt have their future delineated, their fate distinctly announced.

EPHOD AND GIRDLE OF EGYPTIAN PRIEST.—See PRIEST.

Now, there is a marvelous diversity perceptible. Sagacious men, looking at the natural causes which tend to the ruin of states, or to the local reasons why one should exalt itself above its neighbors, have often been able to anticipate the aggrandizement of the first, the misfortune of the other. But observe the distinguishing peculiarity of Scripture prophecy. Edom should cease to be a people, Ezek. xxv. 12-14; Tyre should be brought low, should in a great measure recover, but should ultimately be a mere desolate rock, a place on which fishermen were to spread their nets, Isa. xxiii.; Ezek. xxvi. 13, 14; Babylon was to be no more inhabited, Isa. xiii. 19-22; Egypt was to be humbled, yet not destroyed; the nation would survive, but be the basest of the kingdoms, Ezek. xxix. 15. Now, the course of events has shown the extraordinary truthfulness of these prophecies. The Idumæans literally ceased to be a people; so thoroughly subdued by John Hyrcanus as to be obliged to conform to the law of Moses, and to be, to the entire loss of their nationality, absorbed by the Jews. In this is a more complete fulfillment of prediction than in the desolate ruins of the country which once was theirs—ruins which belonged to a later age. Tyre, again, is little more than a fishing-village now, and the plains of Babylonia lie waste, their teeming population gone, while Egypt, still a busy land, has for two thousand years lost its independence, and, "a base kingdom," has borne a foreign yoke. Now, it may be asked, How could natural sagacity have calculated these results? What quick-sighted eye of man could have foreseen the different fates of Babylonia and of Egypt?—total subversion in the one case, perpetual depression in the other?

II. The prophecies in regard to the Hebrew nation have the same speciality. It was not extinction as against Babylon that was predicted, it was not subjugation as for Egypt, but a scattering throughout the earth without absorption by the nations among whom they should be mingled, the national existence and identity being still preserved. The predictions of the Pentateuch, Lev. xxvi.; Deut. xxvi., xxix., draw the accurate outline of this, to which the declarations of later prophets give additional body and coloring. The fulfillment is a patent fact. Every attempt to explain it by natural causes has merely served to account for the event itself, but not for its coincidence with what had been foretold many hundred years before. The preternatural character of the fact consists altogether in the correspondence and coincidence between ancient predictions and the present condition of the Jewish people—a condition which one scarcely knows how distinctly to express but in the words of prophetic account of it, "Thou shalt become an astonishment, a proverb and a byword among all nations, whither the Lord shall lead thee," Deut. xxviii. 37. Supernatural foresight there must have been, then, in the old prophets; now let us see its bearing on Christianity.

III. There is the same noticeable peculiarity in the prophetic promise of Messiah. It is quite different from what natural or national prepossessions would have imagined. We might suppose the dim ideal of a future conqueror and king, with an anticipation that the destiny of Israel would have its highest prosperity under his sway. And prophecy accordingly describes the glories which should encompass One whose throne should be established in righteousness, and whose rule should comprehend the kings of the earth. But along with such a description there runs continually a darker augury; from the very first intimation of a Seed of the woman, the bruising of his heel is prognosticated, Gen. iii. 15; and there is the constant witness to mysterious blood-shedding, and foreshadowings of unutterable sorrow to be endured, and shame and rejection and death; so that those who most anxiously looked for the fulfillment of the nation's, of the world's, hope were most reluctant to admit that such humiliation could touch the promised One; and even in the anticipation of his reign they had shaped out a far different sovereignty, unconscious of the great principle on which future spiritual glories are delineated in language taken from the earthly fortunes of their royal house. Now, here is a whole system of prophetic declaration, foretelling what human thought would have been least likely to conceive; while the fulfillment came in a form so marvelously strange as to contradict all foregone conclusions, and yet so satisfactory as to engage men for the truth of it to resign all they would naturally covet, and seal their belief of it with their blood.

IV. Our Lord's own prophecy was of the same type. While his enemies were proudly presuming on some worldly material deliverance, and while his followers expected him to restore the kingdom to Israel, his eye looked sadly on to the time when the holy house of Jerusalem should be desolate, Matt. xxiii. 37, 38; Luke xix. 41-44. To foresee such results, and with such a tone of assurance announce them so long beforehand, was not to speak in the manner of men; and no one who looks calmly into the circumstances can ever find an explanation that will be satisfactory to his own mind, by the help merely of some unusual degree of shrewdness on the part of Jesus, or of a certain peculiar combination of circumstances in Providence.

Little can here be added. But it is admitted to the candid reader that after all the deductions which reasonably can be made, after every allowance that can be fairly claimed, prophecy, as exercised among the chosen people and recorded in their sacred books, stands widely distinguished from and far above the pretensions of any ordinary sages. It is a moral wonder that cannot be paralleled elsewhere. If, then, effects have their adequate causes, surely the conclusion to be arrived at here is that "holy men of old spoke"—not according to their own notions, not as evincing mere human sagacity, but—"as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," 2 Pet. i. 21. And we must take this not as an isolated proof that the Bible is from God, but as one among several as weighty departments of evidence, all converging to the same point, to have an adequate notion of the force of proof that is thus supplied.

PROPHECYINGS (prof'e-si-ingz), religious exercises of the clergy in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who met for the purpose of explaining Holy Scripture under a president called a moderator. They were restrained by Canon 72.

PROPHET (prof'et). The Hebrew prophets were, as Augustine has well said, the philosophers, divines, instructors and guides of the people in piety. They were selected according to God's sovereign pleasure, who imparts his spiritual gifts as he will, 1 Cor. xii. 11, sending his message occasionally even by unworthy messengers. Whether there was any special inauguration of a prophet may be doubted. Some have imagined that prophets were anointed, but this notion has hardly any other ground than a misinterpretation of a single text, Ps. cv. 15. In the case of Elisha the word appears to have been used figuratively, 1 Ki. xix. 16, 19.

But though there was no special inauguration to the prophetic office, yet there were schools in which those called "sons of the prophets" were trained under the eye of some experienced man of God; and from persons so instructed God did, it seems, often choose his messengers. We hear of these establishments first in the time of Samuel. But perhaps they were not then permanently organized. Able critics have maintained that it was not till the disruption of the kingdom, and the want caused in the northern state by the departure of the priests and Levites into Judah, that these schools were really founded, in order to the perpetuation of a theocratic spirit in Israel. For this purpose they were admirably suited. They were located in various towns, and there must probably have been some collegiate building where the young men lived in a community. They were in structed, doubtless, in the sacred law and in psalmody, prophesying, it is said, with psalteries and other instruments of music. Samuel and Elijah and Elisha, if not always resident in such establishments, yet exercised careful superintendence over them, 1 Sam. x. 5, 10; 2 Ki. ii. 3, 5, 15.

With regard to the ordinary mode of life of the prophets, we may no doubt say that they studied to live above the world, and to set examples of simplicity and purity of conduct. But this they would do not merely as prophets, but as faithful servants of the Most High. Much has been written about their asceticism, their poverty and privations, and critics have culled out passages from Scripture history descriptive of periods of famine, war or other calamity, and then, because the prophets living at the time were sufferers, they have very unreasonably inferred that they were in their ordinary life similarly pinched and distressed. It would be as reasonable to conclude, because King Joram wore sackcloth and suffered privation at the siege of Samaria, 2 Ki. vi. 27, 30, that Hebrew kings were generally so clothed and oned. Leaving out those so called in the earlier times, we may divide them into (1) prophets under the law and (2) prophets in the New Testament times.

Of the former we have those in the wilderness, as Moses, Aaron, Miriam and the seventy elders, Num. xi. 16, 17, 24-30. After the entrance into Canaan there have been reckoned Joshua, an anonymous prophet, Jud. vi. 8-10; Deborah and Hannah, prophetesses; one who denounced God's judgments on Eli's house, 1 Sam. ii. 27-36; Samuel, Nathan, Gad, David, Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun, Solomon, Ahijah the Shilonite, 1 Ki. xi. 29-39; xiv. 1-18; Shemaiah, 1 Ki. xii. 22-24; 2 Chr. xi. 2-4; xii. 5-8, 15; the man of God who went from Judah and the old prophet of Bethel, 1 Ki. xiii.; Iddo, 2 Chr. ix. 29; xii. 15; xiii. 22; Jehu the son of Hanani, 1 Ki. xvi. 1-4, 7; 2 Chr. xix. 2, 3; Azariah, the son of Oded, and Oded, 2 Chr. xv. 1-8; Hanani, 2 Chr. xvi. 7; Elijah, the hundred prophets whom Obadiah hid from Jezebel's fury in a cave, 1 Ki. xviii. 4, 13; two, probably three, anonymous prophets who delivered messages to

Ahab, 1 Ki. xx. 13, 22, 28, 35-43; Micaiah, the son of Imlah, 1 Ki. xxii. 8, 9, 13-28; Jahaziel, the son of Zechariah, 2 Chr. xx. 14-17; Eliezer, the son of Dodavah, 2 Chr. xx. 37; Elisha, the prophet, who anointed Jehu, 2 Ki. ix. 1-10; Zechariah, the son of Jehoida, 2 Chr. xxiv. 20-22; a prophet who dissuaded Amaziah from employing an army of Israelites, 2 Chr. xxv. 7-9; another who rebuked there where most of all depravation of religion had been manifested, and where the legal services had been interrupted.

Many great prophets did not commit their predictions to writing for the future advantage of the Church. Such predictions referred to their own times, and did not extend to distant ages. And we may well enough allow that very possibly all the inspired words of those whose books we have were not preserved. Not that any portion of Scripture has been lost, but that the wisdom of God did not design that other utterances, whether of prophets or apostles, should form a part of that great standard of his oracles which it was needful that the Church should have to study, to be her guide and counselor until her militant state was ended. Isaiah, doubtless, uttered other holy words, but God did not intend their memorial to last. St. Paul, no question, wrote other epistles; they served a temporary purpose, and have passed away with no detriment to the Church.

PROSELYTE (pros'e-lite). The Hebrew nation was regarded as God's peculiar people; but yet from the very first a way was open to men of another race by which they might attain to the privileges of the divine covenant. Thus Abraham was directed to circumcise "all the men of his house, born in the house and bought with money of the stranger," Gen. xvii. 12, 13, 23, 27. When the law was given, we find repeated mention of strangers, of their duties and disabilities; and a difference is made according to the native country of foreigners in regard to their being admitted earlier or later into "the congregation of the Lord," Deut. xxiii. 3, 4, 7, 8.

Foreigners, merely by residing in the land, became, as was natural in some degree, subject to the Israelitish law. They were to observe the Sabbath, Ex. xx. 10; they were punishable for Molech-worship and for blasphemy, Lev. xx. 2; xxiv. 16. They enjoyed, too, some immunities. They were to be kindly treated, Deut. x. 18, 19, and they had the protection, in case of need, of the cities of refuge, Num. xxxv. 15. But if they wished really to share the privileges of the chosen people, they must be circumcised. They then might eat the passover, Ex. xii. 48, 49, of which no uncircumcised stranger was allowed to partake.

In later times persons of other nations and other religions embraced the Jewish faith in large numbers, Esth. viii. 17. The Jews were more widely dispersed through the world, and had their synagogues in which Moses was read continually in numberless heathen cities. Devout minds would be attracted by the purity of the divine law, and there would be a fulfillment of that prophecy, hereafter, it may be, to be still more emphatically fulfilled, which declared that "many people and strong nations" should "come to seek the Lord of hosts in Jerusalem," Zech. viii. 20-23.

We are prepared, after what has been said, to find proselytes spoken of in the New Testament generally so impoverished. The position and circumstances of prophets varied, like those of other men, with the times. By ungodly princes they were often persecuted; but they often held high office and discharged the functions of (as we should say) privy-councilors. Even in the reign of such a man as Joram, Elisha possessed powerful influence, 2 Ki. iv. 13. Titles of high respect were given them, 1 Ki. xviii. 7, 13; 2 Ki. ii. 19; xiii. 14. And as to their domestic habits, it is true that they probably wore some distinctive plain garment, 1 Ki. i. 8; Zech. xiii. 4; but Elijah had his attendant even in his hasty flight from Jezreel to Beersheba, 1 Ki. xix. 3; presents were made them, which, though sometimes they deemed it proper to decline, they at other times accepted, 2 Ki. iv. 42; v. 15, 16; viii. 9. And some of them were Levites and priests, and received, no doubt, the usual offerings and advantages, while those of higher station lived, we may well suppose, as befitted that station. The pulse on which Daniel was for a while sustained, Dan. i. 8, 16, was preferred by him, not from any principle of asceticism, but in order to observe the law while at a heathen court.

the same king for idolatry, 2 Chr. xxv. 15, 16; Oded, 2 Chr. xxviii. 9-11; Joel, Jonah, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, Obadiah, the prophetess Huldah, 2 Ki. xxii. 14-20; Urijah, the son of Shemaiah, Jer. xxvi. 20-23. During the captivity Ezekiel and Daniel prophesied, and after the return from Babylon, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. And then the prophetic spirit ceased.

In New Testament times the divine power was again manifested; and both prior to and after Christ, the great Prophet of the Church, there must be enumerated Zacharias, Simeon, the prophetess Anna, John the Baptist, Agabus, Acts xi. 28; xxi. 10, 11, the evangelist Philip's four daughters, Acts xxi. 9, several of the apostles, as Paul, Peter, Jude, John, besides those spoken of in 1 Cor. xii. 28; xv. 29-32; Eph. iii. 5; iv. 11.

It will be observed that from the time of Samuel down to the return from Babylon there was an almost uninterrupted line of prophetic men; and many of the most distinguished of these were after the disruption in the kingdom of the ten tribes, God raising up a company to maintain his truth

Many of them, we are told, were gathered at Jerusalem on the great day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 5, 9-11; and when the seven officers were appointed for the daily ministration of church-goods, one was a proselyte, Acts vi. 5.

The Jewish writers say that there were two classes of proselytes—proselytes of the gate (from the Old Testament phrase, the “stranger that is within thy gates,” Ex. xx. 10) and proselytes of righteousness. Of the former the observance of the seven Noachian precepts—as they are called—was required. These were prohibitions against, (1) blasphemy, (2) idolatry, (3) murder, (4) incest, (5) theft, (6) disobedience to authority, (7) the eating of flesh with the blood. But these proselytes were under sundry disabilities, and were not even allowed to study the law. Such proselytes, it is alleged, were the Roman centurions, Luke vii. 5; Acts x. 1, 2, and the “devout” persons occasionally mentioned, Luke xvii. 4. The proselytes of righteousness were those who were actually incorporated into the Jewish Church. These were circumcised; they were afterward baptized, solemnly promising to keep the law; and then they made an offering, two turtle-doves or pigeons, taking, when the temple was destroyed, an oath to offer when it should be rebuilt. In the case of women the baptism and the oblation were sufficient.

But there have been serious doubts entertained on some of these points. Many have questioned whether there were really two classes such as have been described. The baptism of the proselytes, too, is involved in much uncertainty. It is said to have been of equal importance with circumcision. And yet we find no trace of it in the Old Testament, no mention of it by Josephus, Philo and the old Targums. Yet from the fact of John’s baptism not appearing to be a new ceremony, the chief question being whether he had authority to baptize, John i. 25, and from the predilection of the Jews for divers washings, Mark vii. 4; see also John iii. 5, there is a considerable presumption that a baptism might be used on such an occasion. And when baptism had become the initiatory rite of Christianity, we may believe that the use of it would grow among the Jews.

PROTESTANTS (prot'est-ants), a name originally given to a party in Germany which protested, in the year 1529, against a decree of the Diet of Spire respecting religion. It was afterward assumed by Lutherans and Calvinists in general to distinguish themselves from Roman Catholics. It would appear that the name was not cordially accepted by some of the English Reformers, as Bishop Ridley wrote in the year 1555, “Call me a Protestant who listeth I pass not thereof.” This feeling was displayed in convocation in 1689, as the lower house objected to the expression which thanked William III. for the zeal which he showed “for the Protestant religion in general and the Church of England in particular.” In modern times a large number of High Churchmen object to the term as being (1) too negative to express at all justly the principle of “catholic” resistance to the “uncatholic” pretensions and practices of Rome; and (2) as being a name which is used by so many sects as to be inclusive even of heresy.

Gallican Confession, which was drawn up privately at first, A. D. 1561, and since 1566 has been recognized as the Confession of Faith of the French Protestant Church. 6. Confession of Heidelberg, or Palatine Confession, A. D. 1575, was received by the Protestants along with the catechism drawn up in 1573 by Ursinus. 7. The Scottish Confession, A. D. 1560, was drawn up by Knox and his associates and ratified by Parliament. 8. The Tetrapolitan, or Argentine Confession, A. D. 1531, was drawn up by the Zwinglian party, who were dissatisfied with parts of the Augsburg Confession. 9. The Westminster Confession, A. D. 1643. 10. The Saxon Confession, drawn up every reason to believe that the whole of the book of Proverbs, excepting the last two chapters, was either written by Solomon or adopted by him, but the various titles, see ch. i. 1; x. 1; xxii. 17; xxv. 1, and the repetition of some of the proverbs, compare ch. xviii. 8 with xxvi. 22; xix. 24 with xxvi. 15; xx. 16 with xxvii. 13; xxi. 9 with xxv. 24; and xxii. 3 with xxvii. 12, make it evident that it was brought to its present form by the labors of different persons at different times.

PROVERB (prov'erb), a short, sententious saying which has become popular from its apposite illustration of men and manners. Proverbial expressions are greatly in use among Oriental nations, and teachers of morals have often enforced and embellished their instructions by such pithy maxims. Besides the book of Proverbs, in which a multitude of these excellent moral maxims are contained, we find many others, either entire sentences or proverbial phrases, scattered throughout Scripture. Thus, the reader may refer to the following places: Gen. x. 9; 1 Sam. x. 12; 1 Ki. xx. 11; Job vi. 5; Jer. xiii. 23; Luke iv. 23. “Proverb” is sometimes put for parable, or a metaphorical form of expression, John xvi. 29, the ordinary word for parable not being in St. John.

The religious teachings of this book are peculiarly clear and spiritual. Jehovah is set forth as the Creator and Governor of the universe, and the Disposer of human destinies, ch. iii. 19; viii. 22-29, etc., incomprehensible alike in his nature and his works, ch. xxv. 2; xxx. 3, 4. His providence is represented as ever active and universal, ch. v. 21; xv. 3, controlling not only the outward fortunes, ch. x. 22, but the minds, ch. xxi. 1, of men. He is declared to be holy and just, loving, commending and rewarding piety and virtue, and abhorring and punishing all sin, ch. iii. 33; x. 3, 29; xii. 2, not only in this life, but also in a future state, ch. xii. 23.

The necessity of religion, "the fear of the Lord," is inculcated in this book, in strong and emphatic language, as the "beginning of wisdom," ch. i. 7, and the fountain of happiness, ch. xiv. 27; xix. 23. Trust in God, ch. iii. 5, 6; xvi. 3, 20; xviii. 10; reverence for him, ch. iii. 34; x. 27; xxiii. 17; cheerful submission to his paternal chastisements, ch. iii. 11, 12; the love of our fellow-men, ch. xi. 17; xiv. 21; justice, ch. xi. 1; kindness, ch. iii. 27, 28; xix. 17; gentleness of spirit and demeanor, ch. xv. 1; charity, ch. x. 12; prudence, ch. xiv. 15; xxii. 3; active diligence, ch. x. 4; xii. 24; xxii. 29; purity of heart, ch. iv. 23; humility, ch. viii. 13; xv. 33; modesty, xxv. 6, 7; temperance, xxiii. 20, 21; and in short, all those things which make men happy in themselves and create a happy state of society, are here exhibited and urged in the most forcible manner; and after all the light which the gospel has shed upon us, we are still thankful to resort to this book for guidance, encouragement and warning.

II. A collection of unconnected maxims on various subjects, ch. x.-xxii. 16.

III. Short discourses on a variety of subjects, ch. xxii. 17; xxiv. 22; with a brief appendix of maxims, ch. xxiv. 23-34.

IV. A second collection of Solomon's Proverbs made in the time of Hezekiah, ch. xxv.-xxix.

V. The remainder of the book, ch. xxx., xxxi., contains precepts delivered by Agur, admonitions given to King Lemuel by his mother, and a description of the excellences of a virtuous wife. The thirtieth chapter affords examples of a species of writing closely allied to the proverb and equally in favor among the Orientals—namely, a kind of riddles or enigmas designed to exercise the ingenuity of the hearer, as well as to impart instruction.

PROVIDENCE (prov'i-dens). This word occurs but once in our version, Acts xxiv. 2, and there with no reference to the Deity. As ordinarstance, minute ingredients, go to make up a given result, and all must be cared for. But though there is a watchful Providence administering the world, persons must beware how they let their conduct be guided by what they call the leadings of Providence. These may be only the leadings of their own inclinations, or the facilities which Satan offers. The rule of life is to be, not God's supposed secret purpose, but his plainly-declared law.

PROVINCIAL (pro-vin'sh'al), the official appointed by the head of a religious order who acts as the visitor of the branch-houses in a particular province.

PROVINCIAL COUNCIL, a council composed of the metropolitan and bishops of a province.

PROVOOST (pro-voost'), SAMUEL, D.D., was born in 1742, at New York, and educated at Cambridge, in England, and was ordained and married before his return to his native place. In 1766 he became an assistant in Trinity Church, New York, a position which he resigned on the breaking out of the Revolution, as he was a warm defender of the cause of the colonies. After the close of the struggle he became rector of Trinity Church, and in 1786, at the first general convocation of the Church, he was elected bishop. He was consecrated at Lambeth, in 1787. In 1785 he acted as chaplain to the Continental Congress, and in 1789 he served as chaplain in the Senate. In 1800 he resigned his rectorship, and his bishopric in the following year. He died at New York, in 1815.

PROVOST (pro-vo'). 1. An officer who acts as an overseer of estates. 2. The title of the head of certain colleges and collegiate churches. Thus, Trinity College in Dublin, Worcester, Queen's and Oriel Colleges in Oxford, are presided over by an officer called the provost.

PRUDENTIUS (pru-den'sh'us), a learned bishop who was born in Spain, but who resided in France and became bishop of Troyes, about A. D. 846. He defended Godeschalus on the subject of predestination against Erigena, but the influence of Hincmar so far prevailed that Godeschalus was condemned as a heretic in 849, and imprisoned for life. Prudentius died A. D. 861.

PRUNING-HOOK (proo'ning-hook), an implement used by vine-dressers. It appears that the Hebrews were accustomed regularly to prune their vines, Lev. xxv. 3; and there is a beautiful allusion by our Lord to the practice, John xv. 2; the barren branches of the symbolical vine are altogether cast away; those that bear fruit are cleansed by cutting off the unsound parts and shortening the too luxuriant shoots. So dressed, the fruit will be more abundant and will ripen better.

PSALMODY (sam'o-de), the art or act of singing psalms. Psalmody was always esteemed a considerable part of devotion, and usually performed in the standing posture; and as to the manner of pronunciation, the plain song was sometimes used, being a gentle inflection of the voice, not much different from reading, like the chant in cathedrals; at other times more artificial compositions were used, like our anthems.

As to the persons concerned in singing, sometimes a single person sung alone; sometimes the

AN EARLY DUTCH PRINTING OFFICE.—See PRINTING.

The very nature of the book of Proverbs is such that it has a direct application to people of all times, all conditions and all countries. It says very little about the sacrifices and offerings, and other ceremonial institutions of the Mosaic economy, but is almost wholly occupied with the substantial duties of morality and religion; and it is so comprehensive that all ranks and classes have here their "word in season."

As we may judge, to some extent, of the social, moral and religious culture and condition of a nation by its proverbial lore, we must surely place the Hebrews in the highest rank among the nations of former times. A people amongst whom such maxims as these were brought into popular use must have made great advance in civil and social life.

This book may be divided into five distinct parts:

I. A series of discourses on the excellency and advantages of wisdom, and the hatefulness and mischievous consequences of sin. They are addressed chiefly to the young, and are marked by peculiar earnestness, beauty and tenderness.

ily understood, it means the care which God takes of the universe, the administrative rule he exercises over his dominions for the good of his Church and people, of which an eminent example is the training of Israel for their inheritance in Canaan. It cannot be reasonably supposed that he leaves events to themselves. The whole current of Scripture teaching is opposed to such a notion. His eye is described as everywhere present, Ps. xxxiii. 18; cxxxix. 2; his ear as open to every voice of his creatures, Ps. xciv. 9; Isa. lix. 1; his hand as that which gives effect to every work, 1 Cor. iii. 7. God's providence does not constrain men, who act according to their dispositions and wishes, Isa. x. 7; nevertheless, he so rules as that their doings fulfill his purposes, Acts ii. 23; Eph. i. 11. It is sometimes said that, though God's providence may rule in great things, small events must be beneath his notice. Our Lord expressly contradicts such a notion, Matt. x. 29, 30. Besides, the smallest link in the chain is as necessary as the greatest; its failure would disarrange and dislocate the whole. Time place and circum-

whole assembly joined together, which was the most ancient and general practice. At other times the psalms were sung alternately, the congregation dividing themselves into two parts and singing verse about in their turns. There was also a fourth way of singing, pretty common in the fourth century, which was when a single person began the verse, and the people joined with him in the close; this was often used for variety in the same service with alternate psalmody. See SINGING.

PSALMS (sâms), THE BOOK OF. The book of Psalms is entitled in the Hebrew Bible "The Book of Praises," because many of these beautiful compositions are songs of praise intended to be used in divine worship. They derive the name of "Psalms" from the Greek translation, being so designated on account of their adaptation to instrumental music, to which many of the superscriptions refer.

They are commonly called "The Psalms of David," because he was the largest and most eminent contributor to the collection. It is probable that he also brought together many of those which were extant in his time and formed them into a book for use in public worship. This volume and another compiled by Asaph appear to be referred to in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Chr. xxix. 30. But many of the Psalms were written after these dates, and fresh collections were added to those already made, down to the period when the Old Testament canon of Scripture was completed. They thus formed five books, each concluding with a doxology, and comprising respectively (1) Psalms i.-xli., (2) xlii.-lxxii., (3) lxxiii.-lxxxix., (4) xc.-cvi., (5) cvii.-cl., but they were collected into one volume, and are referred to as such in the New Testament, Luke xx. 42; Acts i. 20.

The contents of the Psalms are very various. Some of them are utterances of praise and adoration, celebrating the majesty, power, wisdom, goodness and faithfulness of God. Others are songs of thanksgiving for divine favors. Many are prayers for pardoning mercy or sanctifying grace, or for deliverance from danger or affliction, while in others intercession is made for the Church and for the world. Others are didactic, describing the excellency of God's law, the characters of good and bad men and the results of their respective courses, both in this world and the next. Not a few are records of religious experience, relating the trials and vicissitudes of the inward life, with its hopes and fears, its conflicts and victories; sometimes penitential and mournful, at others triumphant and joyous, and often passing quickly from sorrowful prayer to grateful praise. Some of the Psalms are historical, preserving the remembrance of the principal events which befell the Jewish nation; and as these events foreshadowed God's dealings with his Church in subsequent ages, these historical Psalms have frequently a predictive bearing. And lastly, some are more directly and entirely prophetic, containing many important predictions concerning our Lord Jesus Christ and the blessings which he bestows. These were among the earliest intimations of the exalted nature and dignity of the promised Messiah. The great promise which had been made to the patriarchs in earlier times, Gen. xxii. 18, etc., spoke rather of the magnitude of the benefit than of the personal and official glory of the Benefactor. But the Psalms made known the King set upon the holy hill of Zion; the promulgation of his law; his triumphs over the vain opposition of earthly potentates; his sceptre of righteousness; his everlasting priesthood; his exalted nature; his divine Sonship; his death and early resurrection; and his ultimately universal reign. See especially Psalms ii., xiv., lxxii., cx. The lyrical form in which these revelations were delivered, and the place which they held in both public and private worship among the Jews through successive ages, were eminently adapted to keep them in the people's minds and to make them useful in the maintenance of faith and piety.

The Psalms throw much light on the religious views and hopes of good men under the ancient dispensation. If we would know what insight they had into the signification of their ceremonial institutions, the way of acceptance with God and the privileges of his people, we cannot ascertain it better than from the expressions which they used when pouring out their hearts to God in prayer and thanksgiving and when meditating upon his works and ways. We see also from what evils and dangers they asked for deliverance, for what special benefits they gave thanks, what tian life. They have gladdened the hearts, elevated the hopes and strengthened the faith of unnumbered thousands of every land, and will continue to maintain their hold on the sanctified affections of believers till time shall be no more.

No book in the Old Testament is so frequently cited in the New as the Psalms, which are quoted or referred to by our Lord and his apostles more than fifty times. In such estimation were they held in the early ages of the Christian Church that the whole book was frequently learned by heart. In the language of this divine book the prayers and praises of the people of God have been offered up to the throne of grace from age to age. Even He who had the Spirit "not by measure," in whom were hidden "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," and who "spake as never man spake," found here the fittest expression of his feelings in his greatest agony, Ps. xxii. 1; Matt. xxvii. 46, and at last breathed out his soul in the Psalmist's words, Ps. xxxi. 5; Luke xxiii. 46.

Most of the Psalms have titles prefixed to them, blessings they most earnestly sought and what pleas they urged in support of their petitions. We see further how closely many of them walked with God; how they acknowledged him in all their ways and delighted in his service. We meet with many indications of filial confidence and love and holy joy in God, great steadfastness of faith in the midst of trials and many expressions of tender and holy feeling. And the contemplation of these proofs of their eminently devotional spirit and habits may well stir us up to emulate their attainments according to superior light and privileges.

The Psalms are adapted to every age and condition of the Church; for whilst they contain many allusions to the circumstances of the former dispensation, in which they originated, they are yet so accordant with the spirit of the later and more glorious economy that they are still loved and used with the greatest profit by the most established Christians. To us, as to pious men of old, they are of unspeakable value as a guide and directory to communion with God, affording us divinely-approved examples of acceptable prayer and praise and utterances of holy thought and feeling suitable to all the vicissitudes of the Chris-concerning the import of which expositors are by no means agreed. These inscriptions are undoubtedly very ancient, for they existed when the Septuagint version was made, about 280 B. C.; but they are not to be regarded as of equal authority with the text. Some of them are evidently not correct, but others are confirmed by internal evidence. In some instances they specify either the author, the subject or the occasion of the Psalm; in others they appear to refer to the style of poetry or of music, or to the class of singers to whom they were allotted in the temple service; and in these cases, through the knowledge of the temple music having been lost, it is almost impossible to determine the meaning of all the terms employed. Our translators have generally retained the Hebrew words.

PSALMS, GRADUAL. The Psalms from the one hundred and twentieth to the one hundred and thirty-fourth, inclusive, have been thus called because, according to some, they were sung on the fifteenth step of the temple, or because the singers raised their voices by degrees from first to last; or because they were chanted by the Jews on their return to Palestine.

PSATYRIANS (sa-tir'yanz), a sect of Arians who, in the Council of Antioch, held in the year 360, maintained that the Son was not like the Father as to will; that he was taken from nothing, or made of nothing; and that in God generation was not to be distinguished from creation.

PTOLEMAIS (tol-e-ma'is), Acts xxi. 7. See ACCHO. It is frequently mentioned in the Maccabean wars.

PTOLEMY (tol'e-me). There were several kings of Egypt of this name. 1. LAGUS, or SOTER, the founder of the dynasty of the Lagidae, was a Macedonian, supposed to be a natural son of Philip II. He became a favorite general of Alexander the Great. He saved Rhodes when besieged by Demetrius, promoted the arts and sciences, and laid the foundation of the celebrated library and museum at Alexandria. In B. C. 285 he resigned the crown of Egypt to his son. 2. PHILADELPHUS, who had a long and peaceful reign. He finished the great library, and according to tradition it was by his order that the Old Testament was translated into the Greek tongue. 3. EUERGETES was brother to Berenice, who in revenge for her wrongs carried his armies over Palestine and as far as Babylon. At Jerusalem he made presents to the temple and offered sacrifices. 4. EPIPHANES was the son of (5.) PHILOPATOR and grandson of Philadelphus. During his reign the foreign possessions of Egypt were lost, and he died by poison, B. C. 181. 6. PHILOMETOR was the son of the preceding. His life was a scene of discomfiture, but eventually he was aided by the Romans, who thus consolidated their power in Egypt. He was killed in battle near Antioch, B. C. 146. Other members of the Ptolemæan family are mentioned in Rest of Esth. xi.; 1 Macc. i. 18; iii. 38; xvi. 11-21; 2 Macc. viii. 8

A celebrated astronomer named PTOLEMÆUS CLAUDIUS flourished in Alexandria, A. D. 140-160. He was the author of the great work the "Almagest," so called by Arabian scholars, which held its ground till the time of Copernicus.

PUA, PUAH. See PHUVAH.

PUBLICAN (pub'li-kan), a person who farmed the taxes and public revenues—i. e., who paid a stipulated sum to the government, what he collected being then his own. The publicans were especially odious to the Jews. Some classes as the Galileans—i. e., the followers of Judas of Galilee—deemed it unlawful to pay tribute to a foreign power, and by all it was felt to be a mark of subjection and degradation. The publicans, moreover, knowing the estimation in which they were held, were not careful about their modes of proceeding. They were often rapacious and extortionate. And hence the very name became one of reproach, Matt. v. 46, 47; and it was made a matter of complaint against our Lord that he associated with "publicans and sinners," Matt. ix. 11; xi. 19; Luke xix. 7. It is said that Jews who were publicans were laid under various disabilities. They were repelled from public worship and from judicial posts. A religious man, according to the rabbins, who became a publican was to be ejected from the religious society.

PUBLIUS (pub'li-us), governor of Melita at the time of Paul's shipwreck on that island, Acts xxviii. 7, 8. Paul, having healed his father, probably enjoyed his hospitality during the three months of his stay in the island.

PUDENS (pu'denz), a Christian at Rome whose salutation St. Paul sent to Timothy, 2 Tim. iv. 21. He is supposed to be the husband of Claudia mentioned in the same place; and she was, it is likely, of British birth.

Pugin, who was born in France, but who resided nearly all his life in England. His works attracted great attention, and the "Literary Gazette" has truthfully said of his "Gothic Examples" that they are by far the most important of all his valuable works, and he has effected more for the practitioner in Gothic architecture than all his predecessors together." He died in London, in 1832. 2. His son, Augustus Northmore Welby Pugin, was still more eminent. He became a member of the Church of Rome in order that he might enjoy full liberty to carry out all his views of mediæval forms and members in the structures which he engaged to superintend. He was a perfect enthusiast in his art; and having devoted himself to the interests of his Church, he lived for the extension of such kinds of religious "houses" and ecclesiastical structures as would display his taste and advance the faith which he had embraced. He was the author of fifteen remarkable works which have had a great circulation among professional men, which are found in all leading libraries and in the hands of men of taste who delight in the various ecclesiastical works of mediæval times. He died at Ramsgate, in 1852.

PUHITES (pu'hites), a patronymic given to some of Judah's posterity, 1 Chr. ii. 53; it is not known on what account.

PUL, an Assyrian monarch who invaded the kingdom of Israel and made Menahem tributary, 2 Ki. xv. 19, 20. Hence resulted the captivity of the trans-Jordanic tribes, 1 Chr. v. 26. Pul was the first Assyrian conqueror who is mentioned in Scripture. He possibly commenced his reign 774 B. C., but great uncertainty exists respecting him. Some imagine him the Greek Sardanapalus; and it would certainly seem that his reign was closed by a catastrophe, and that Tiglath-pileser, his successor, dethroned him. His wife Sammuramit survived him, and is believed to have gone to Babylon, being the wife or mother of Nabonassar.

PUL, a region but once mentioned, Isa. lxvii. 19. Henderson, following Bochart, supposed it the island of Philæ, and the surrounding region on the Nile to the south of Elephantine.

PULLEN (pool'en), or PULLUS (pool'us), ROBERT, an English cardinal of the twelfth century, is supposed to have been a native of Oxfordshire. He studied at Paris, and in 1130 he returned to England, where he contributed to the restoration of the university of Oxford, which had been ravaged by the Danes. He spared no pains for the diffusion of learning among the British youth, and for five years he publicly read the Scriptures, which had been neglected in England, and in reward he was presented to the archdeaconry of Rochester. After this he returned to Paris, and became professor of divinity; but he was recalled by his metropolitan, and the revenues of his benefice sequestered until he obeyed the summons; but on appealing to the see of Rome he gained a decision in his favor. He was invited to Rome, and was created cardinal by Celestine II., and afterward chancellor of the Roman Church by Pope Lucius II. He died about 1150.

PULPIT (pul'pit), Neh. viii. 4, an elevated stage or scaffold, compare Neh. ix. 4.

PULSE. This word, occurring in Dan. i. 12, 16, denotes seed-herbs, greens or vegetables, in contradistinction to meats and more delicate kinds of food. "Pulse" is also introduced into our translation of 2 Sam. xvii. 28. Various kinds of grain are parched. The ears are plucked with the stalk, when not quite ripe, and held in bunches in a flame, and then the grains are rubbed out. This is still a favorite article of food.

PUNISHMENTS (pun'ish-ments). This subject is properly restricted to the penalty imposed on the commission of some crime or offence against law. It is thus distinguished from private retaliation or revenge. Human punishments are such as are inflicted immediately on the person of the offender, or indirectly upon his goods. Capital punishment is usually supposed to have been instituted at the deluge, Gen. ix. 5, 6: "At the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man: whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man." Arnheim, however, contends that "his kinsmen" is the proper rendering, and thus explains the precept: if one stranger slay another, the kinsman of the murdered man are the avengers of blood; but if he be slain by one of his own kindred, the other kinsmen must not spare the murderer; for if they do, then divine providence will require the blood—that is, will avenge it. Certainly capital punishment for murder was not inflicted on Cain, who was purposely preserved from death by divine interposition, Gen. iv. 14, 15, and was simply doomed to banishment from the scene of his crime to a distant country, to a total disappointment in agricultural labor, and to the life of a fugitive and a vagabond, far from the manifested presence of the Lord, Gen. iv. 11, 14, although the same reason existed in equal force in his case, namely, the creation of man in the image of God.

The punishment of death appears among the legal powers of Judah, as the head of his family, and he ordered his daughter-in-law Tamar to be burnt, Gen. xxxviii. 24. It is denounced by the king of the Philistines, Abimelech, against those of his people who should injure or insult Isaac or his wife, Gen. xxvi. 11, 29. Similar power seems to have been possessed by the reigning Pharaoh in the time of Joseph, Gen. xli. 13.

In proceeding to consider the punishments enacted by Moses, reference will be made to the Scriptures only, because the explanation of the laws of Moses is not to be sought in the Jewish commentators. Nor will it be necessary to specify the punishments ordered by him for different offences, which will be found under their respective names. See ADULTERY, IDOLATRY, etc. The extensive prescription of capital punishment by the Mosaic law, which we cannot consider as a dead letter, may be accounted for by the peculiar circumstances of the people. They were a nation of newly-emancipated slaves, and were by nature perhaps more than commonly intractable; and we must infer that they had imbibed all the degenerating influences of slavery among heathens. Their wanderings and isolation did not admit of penal settlements or remedial punishments. They were placed under immediate divine government and surveillance. Hence, willful offences evinced an incorrigibility which rendered death the only means of ridding the community of such transgressors, and which was ultimately resorted to in regard to all individuals above a certain age, in order that a better class might enter Canaan, Num. xiv. 29, 32, 35.

The mode of capital punishment was probably as humane as the circumstances of Moses admitted. It was probably restricted to stoning, which, by skillful management, might produce instantaneous death. It was an Egyptian custom, Ex. viii. 26. The public effusion of blood by decapitation cannot be proved to have been a Mosaic punishment, nor even an Egyptian; for, in the instance of Pharaoh's chief baker, Gen. xl. 19, "Pharaoh shall lift up thine head from off thee," the marginal rendering seems preferable, "shall reckon thine head as if it were severed from thee."

The appearance of decapitation, "slaying by the sword," in later times, 2 Sam. iv. 8; 2 Ki. x. 6-8, has no more relation to the Mosaic law than the decapitation of John the Baptist by Herod, Matt. xiv. 8-12, or than the hewing to pieces of Agag before the Lord by Samuel, as a punishment in kind, 1 Sam. xv. 33, or than the office of the Cherethites, 2 Sam. viii. 18; whereas execution was ordered by Moses to be begun first by the witnesses, a regulation which constituted a tremendous appeal to their moral feelings, and afterward to be completed by the people, Deut. xiii. 10; Josh. vii. 25; John viii. 7. It was a later innovation that immediate execution should be done by some personal attendant, by whom the office was probably considered as an honor, 2 Sam. i. 15. Stoning, therefore, was probably the only capital punishment ordered by Moses. It is observable that neither this nor any other punishment was, according to his law, attended with insult or torture, compare 2 Macc. vii. Nor did his laws admit of those horrible mutilations practiced by other nations.

It will shortly be seen that the lex talionis, "an eye for an eye," etc., was adopted by Moses as the principle, but not the mode, of punishment. He seems also to have understood the true end of punishment, which is not to gratify the antipathy of society against crime, nor moral vengeance, which belongs to God alone, but prevention. "All the people shall hear and fear, and do no more presumptuously," Deut. xvii. 13; xix. 20.

Various punishments were introduced among the Jews, or became known to them by their intercourse with other nations, viz., precipitation, or throwing or causing to leap from the top of a rock, to which ten thousand Idumæans were condemned by Amaziah, king of Judah, 2 Chr. xxv. 12. The inhabitants of Nazareth intended a similar fate for our Lord, Luke iv. 29. This punishment resembles that of the Tarpeian rock among the Romans. Dichotomy, or cutting asunder, appears to have been a Babylonian custom, Dan. ii. 5; Luke xii. 46; Matt. xxiv. 51, but the passages in the Gospels admit of the milder interpretation of scourging with severity, discarding from office, etc. Beating to death was a Greek punishment for slaves. It was inflicted on a wooden frame, which probably derived its name from resembling a drum or timbrel in form, on which the criminal was bound and beaten to death, 2 Macc. vi. 19, 28. Fighting with wild beasts was a Roman punishment to which criminals and captives in war were sometimes condemned, 2 Tim. iv. 17; compare 1 Cor. xv. 32. Drowning with a heavy weight around the neck was a Syrian, Greek and Roman punishment. This, therefore, being the custom of the enemies of the Jews, was introduced by our Lord to heighten his admonitions, Matt. xviii. 6. The lion's den was a Babylonian punishment, Dan. vi., and is still customary in Fez and Morocco. Bruising and pounding to death in a mortar is alluded to in Prov. xxvii. 22.

Posthumous insults offered to the dead bodies of criminals, though common in other nations, were very sparingly allowed by Moses. He permitted only hanging on a tree or gibbet, but the exposure was limited to a day, and burial of the body at night was commanded, Deut. xxi. 22. Such persons were esteemed "cursed of God," compare Job iii. 20, x. 28, 2 Sam. ix. 12, etc.

law which the later Jews extended to crucifixion, John xix. 31, etc.; Gal. iii. 13. Hanging alive may have been a Canaanitish punishment, since it was practiced by the Gibeonites on the sons of Saul, 2 Sam. xxi. 9. Another posthumous insult in later times consisted in heaping stones on the body or grave of the executed criminal, Josh. vii. 25, 26. To "make heaps" of houses or cities is a phrase denoting complete and ignominious destruction, Isa. xxv. 2; Jer. ix. 11. Burning the dead body seems to have been a very ancient posthumous insult. It was denounced by Judah against his daughter-in-law Tamar when informed that she was with child, Gen. xxxviii. 24.

Moses retained this ancient ignominy for two offences only, which from the nature of things must have been comparatively rare, viz., for bigamy with a mother and her daughter, Lev. xx. 14, and for the case of a priest's daughter who committed whoredom, Lev. xxi. 9. Though "burning" only be specified in these cases, it may be safely inferred that the previous death of the criminals, probably by stoning, is to be understood, compare Josh. vii. 25.

Among the minor corporal punishments ordered by Moses was scourging, or the infliction of blows on the back of an offender with a rod. It was limited by him to forty stripes—a number which the Jews in later times were so careful not to exceed that they inflicted but thirty-nine, 2 Cor. xi. 24. It was to be inflicted on the offender lying on the ground, in the presence of a judge, Lev. xix. 20. We have abundant evidence that it was an ancient Egyptian punishment. Nor was it unusual for Egyptian superintendents to stimulate laborers to their work by the persuasive powers of the stick. Women received the stripes on the back, while sitting, from the hand of a man; and boys also, sometimes with their hands tied behind them. Corporal punishment of this kind was allowed by Moses, by masters to servants or slaves of both sexes, Ex. xxi. 20. Scourging was common in after times among the Jews, who associated with it no disgrace or inconvenience beyond the physical pain it occasioned, and from which no station was exempt, Prov. xvii. 26. Hence it became the symbol for correction in general, Ps. lxxxix. 32. Solomon is a zealous advocate for its use in education, Prov. xiii. 24; xxiii. 13, 14. In his opinion "the blueness of a wound cleanseth away evil, and stripes the inward parts of the belly," Prov. xx. 30. It was inflicted for ecclesiastical offences in the synagogue, Matt. x. 17; Acts xxvi. 11. The Mosaic law however rethe word is found. The Septuagint, the Vulgate and the English Version give the same rendering. Pliny tells us that the animal was a species of antelope, and that it abounded in the district of Libya and the regions north of the African desert. The Hebrew word has an affinity with a term which signifies to tread out (corn), and may express somewhat of a bovine character.

PYLE (pile), THOMAS, a learned and able polemic of England, was born at Stodey, in Norfolk, in 1674, was ordained in 1698 to a curacy at King's Lynn, where he became greatly distinguished himself in the famous Bangorian controversy, which arose out of a sermon preached by Hoadley, bishop of Bangor, before George I., on the text, "My kingdom is not of this world," to prove that the clergy ought to have no temporal jurisdiction. He sided with the bishop, who rewarded him with the gift of a canonry in Salisbury cathedral when he was himself translated to that see. His views of Christian doctrine, like those of Hoadley, were strongly tainted with Socinianism—so much so as to be a bar to that advancement in the Church which his talents and political principles might otherwise have gained for him. Among his Biblical works were—"A Paraphrase, with Notes on the Acts of the Apostles and Epistles" and "The Scripture Preservative against Popery." His death occurred in 1755.

PYM (pim), JOHN, who was one of the most distinguished statesmen of the Commonwealth, was born in Somersetshire, in 1584. He was educated at Oxford, studied law, was called to the bar and entered Parliament. He was one of the great band of English lawyers who, from age to age, have been raised up as the advocate of the people's liberties and the opponent of absolute measures. He resisted the arbitrary course of James I., aided in the impeachment of the duke of Buckingham and in the attack on Mainwaring, attempted to emigrate, but was prevented in 1637 by royal proclamation. He procured and aided in the impeachment of Strafford, was illegally arrested by Charles I., and being delivered, he was carried in procession to Westminster. In 1643 he was made lieutenant of the ordnance, and in December, 1643, one month after his appointment, he died. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, and the whole House of Commons attended his funeral. Pym was one of the most able, devoted and indefatigable of the popular leaders. He was a great commoner, but not a demagogue. Cautious, well versed in the usages and privileges of Parliament, a master of eloquence, bold and independent, and nicknamed "King Pym" by his opponents of the royal party, he was the author of most of the measures of his day which secured liberty in England, and which afterward matured in the colonies on the American continent.

PYRAMID (pir'a-mid). The name is supposed to be from the Greek word pur, "fire," from the resemblance of the form to a spire or elevation of flame rising to a centre, but this is mere fancy. In geometry it is a solid contained by a plane polygonal base, and other planes rising from it, and meeting in a point, which is called the vertex, and the planes which meet in the vertex are called the sides, which are necessarily triangles. Pyramids are denominated from the figures of their bases, being triangular, quadrangular, pentagonal, etc., according as the base is a triangle, a quadrangle or a pentagon.

PYRAMIDS OF EGYPT.—These celebrated struc-

tions till they terminate in a point, but so that the width of the base always exceeds the perpendicular height. The pyramids commence on the west side of the Nile, immediately south of Cairo, from which they may be seen on the other side of the river, and they extend in an uninterrupted range for many miles in a southerly direction and parallel with the course of the stream.

The three largest are situated in the vicinity of Jizeh—sometimes written Ghizeh—and of these the loftiest is the pyramid of Cheops, from the prince by whom it is supposed to have been erected. The sides of its base, which are in the lines of the four cardinal points, measure at the foundation seven hundred and sixty-three feet four inches, so that it covers a space of more than thirteen acres. Its perpendicular height is four hundred and eighty feet, being consequently forty-three feet higher than St. Peter's at Rome, and one hundred and thirty-six feet higher than St. Paul's in London. This huge fabric consists of successive tiers of vast blocks of calcareous stone rising above each other in the form of steps. The thickness of the stones decreases as the altitude of the pyramid increases, the greatest being 4.628 feet, and the least 1.686. The mean breadth of the steps is about one foot nine inches, and authorities agree in estimating the number of steps at two hundred and three.

According to the information communicated to Herodotus by the Egyptian priests, one hundred thousand men were employed for twenty years in the construction of this prodigious edifice, and ten years were employed in constructing a causeway by which to convey the stones to the place, and in their conveyance. Although the second pyramid is inferior in size to that of Cheops, still it is a pile of vast magnitude. The base is six hundred and eighty-four feet long on each side, the central line from the apex to the middle of the base is five hundred and sixty-eight feet, and the height of the pyramid from the base to the apex is three hundred and fifty-six feet. It would appear that the work of finishing the second pyramid with a smooth coating, so as to conceal the steps, had been commenced, but it was never completed. It was begun at the top and carried down for the distance of one hundred and forty feet; but there is no evidence that such a design had been contemplated in the case of the pyramid of Cheops. The other pyramids are of inferior dimensions, but they are of enormous size; and while stone is the ordinary material, some of them are constructed of brick. Egypt is the country in which the pyramid stands out as the great national feature; but in Nubia and the regions south of Egypt there are specimens of considerable magnitude, which show that the motives which led to the construction of these great structures were felt in the adjoining countries. Specimens of these southern pyramids may be seen in the illustrations of this work.

Many learned dissertations have been written and many fanciful and ingenious conjectures have been made to account for the original use and object of these vast and imperishable structures. In some of the latest of these speculations the founders of the pyramids have been credited with an amount of astronomical knowledge which, if they had really possessed, would show that in some unaccountable manner the Egyptians had not only lost, but that they had left no record of, such knowledge in the hieroglyphical monuments; and further, that surrounding nations had never been satisfactory conclusion has as yet been reached. Even in the remotest antiquity it is certain, from the testimony of Pliny, that their origin was a matter of doubt, and that nothing certain was known with respect to them or their founders. They may have been connected with the religion of the ancient Egyptians, but that they were intended also to serve as tombs for certain of the monarchs is beyond all question. This is established by the exploration of their interior chambers; but it must be admitted that while they were used as places of sepulture, it does not follow that they were intended to subserve no other purpose.

It was customary to regard the pyramids as monuments merely of the power, the folly or the ambition of the monarchs by whom they were raised, and of the thralldom in which the great body of the people were held. This, however, seems to be a very superficial view of the subject, and with equal justice a similar statement might be made respecting the great cathedrals of France and England. The varying magnitude of the pyramids, the fact of their being scattered over a space of about seventy miles, and their extraordinary number, appear to show pretty conclusively that they must have been constructed from a sense of utility or duty, and not altogether out of caprice or a vain desire to perpetuate the names or the celebrity of the founders. There is no doubt, however, but that they were constructed on scientific principles; and they establish the fact that their builders had a certain knowledge of astronomy, for their sides duly face the four cardinal points. The doubts which at one time existed respecting the sepulchral uses of the pyramids have been removed by the successful explorations which have been made in their interiors. For ages the sands of the desert had been drifting around them, and their bases were covered to a considerable height, and thus the surrounding surface was quite changed from the time when they were erected. The entrances to the interior chambers and passages had been closed up, and it required no ordinary amount of skill and effort even to find them. At length the pyramid of Cheops was penetrated, and in 1763 Mr. Davison, the British consul at Algiers, in company with Mr. Wortley Montague, diligently explored it; and having descended three successive wells to a depth of one hundred and fifty-five feet, they discovered a room which had before been unknown. Caviglia subsequently followed the oblique passage for the distance of two hundred feet farther than it had been known, and he was rewarded by the discovery of a spacious room sixty-six feet long by twenty-seven feet broad, under the centre of the pyramid. This room is thirty feet above the level of the Nile. It had no sarcophagus in it; but an upper chamber, thirty-five feet six inches long by seventeen feet three inches wide and eighteen feet nine inches high, still contains a sarcophagus. Thus three chambers have been discovered, rising above each other in such a manner that the roof of the one serves as the floor of the one above it. According to Colonel Vyse, who is one of the most thoughtful and learned Egyptologists, these chambers were constructed mainly to serve the purpose of producing hollow spaces in the interior of the mass; but the presence of the sarcophagus, and the fact that a passage from the outside led to these chambers, clearly shows that they were intended to subserve additional objects. No doubt they aided in reducing the amount of labor, and they also lessened the weight of the superimposed mass.

As to the astronomical uses of the pyramids, it should be stated that six of them have been opened, and the chief passage in them all has an inclination of twenty-six degrees to the horizon, thus being directed to the polar-star. It is well known by astronomers that the star now known as the polar-star, or A. Ursæ minoris, was not visible in the inclined passage of the great pyramid at the time rewarded for a diligent search by discovering the entrance. After immense labor, he succeeded in finding numerous passages cut out of the solid rock, and an apartment forty-six feet three inches long by sixteen feet three inches wide and twenty-three feet six inches high. This chamber had a sarcophagus which was surrounded by blocks of

of its erection, and that, as the great pyramid is supposed to have been built 2123 B. C., the pole of the heavens at that time must have been at the star known as A. Draconis, which would have been in the line of sight of an observer placed in the descending passage. In fact, the passage as granite. The labor of opening the sarcophagus was very great, and it was discovered that the bones which it contained were those of an ox; but human bones were also found, and they all mouldered down on being touched. A remarkable fact likewise became apparent, inasmuch as an Arabic constructed did then really point to the star which was polar at that time, as it now points to the star which is polar in our day.

The labors of Belzoni in connection with the second pyramid deserve a brief notice. He discovered the foundations of a temple on the east side of the pyramid, and he cleared away much rubbish around the base without finding any opening; but judging from the fact that in the great inscription on the walls of the chamber showed that Mohammed Ahmed, Othman and the Alij Mohammed, supposed to have been Mohammed I. who reigned in the fifteenth century, had entered the chamber and left a record of the fact behind them. It has been concluded that these structures were raised before hieroglyphics came into use, because no writing is found in the chambers or on the sarcophagi found in them. Much has been written concerning their build ers, but, as has already been stated, nothing is certainly known. In the Old Testament the slavery of the Jews in Egypt is distinctly recorded, and it is well known that the great works of antiquity were often raised by the labors of those who were held in bondage. Josephus mentions the tradition

Diodorus there is much that is curious respecting the names "Amasis," "Amosis," "Inaron," as if the names of the Hebrew lawgiver and high-priest were held by the Egyptians to have been the designations of the men who raised these structures, but this is beyond doubt the mere play of fancy in a late age.

that the Hebrews were engaged on the pyramids, and the time of their captivity agrees with the supposed date of these great monuments. That Cheops was a tyrant is well known; that Chephrenes, who succeeded him, was similar in character, and they were so hated by the Egyptians that their names were never pronounced, is also beyond doubt. According to Herodotus, the Egyptians attributed the pyramids to a person named Philistis, who "kept his cattle in those parts," and thus there is an allusion in this tradition not only to a foreign influence, but even to Philistia, the land from which the stranger was supposed to come. And yet the tradition amounts no more than to the likelihood that this Philistis was only the engineer or workman who superintended the works under Cheops and Chephrenes, as it is evident from Herodotus that these kings have always been held to have been the actual founders of these enduring monuments. In the time of Diodorus the same tradition prevailed, but in the absence of reliable history, and especially the want of names on these monuments to indicate their builders, there is a mystery over their origin that seems likely to prevail. In ander the Great, and while there obtained a knowledge of the doctrines of the Brahmins, Gymnosophists, Magi and other Eastern sages. On the return of Pyrrho to Greece the inhabitants of Elea made him their high-priest, and the Athenians gave him the rights of citizenship. He died B. C. 288.

PYTHAGORAS (pith-ag'o-ras), the celebrated Greek philosopher, was born in Samos, probably about B. C. 580. So many legends have gathered about his history that it is almost impossible to trace its details. He was a disciple of Pherecydes. He traveled extensively, especially in Egypt, and was initiated in the most ancient Greek mysteries. After his return from the East he quitted the island of Samos, and ultimately settled at Crotona, one of the Greek cities of South Italy. There he set himself to carry out the purpose of instituting a society through which he might to lished and the ultimate objects of the society are wrapped in mystery. As he was a strenuous political reformist, and urged the inhabitants of Crotona and other places to resist the encroachments of their rulers, he raised a powerful opposition against himself, which ultimately led to his destruction. Among the doctrines of this extraordinary man are the following: that numbers are the principles of all things; that the universe is a harmonious whole, the heavenly bodies by their motions causing sounds; that the soul is immortal, and passes successively into many bodies; and that the highest aim and blessedness of man is likeness to the Deity. Pythagoras is said to have been the first who took the title of philosopher, and the first who applied the term kosmos to the universe. He shares with Thales and Xenophanes the high distinction of starting the problems of physical science—the study and interpretation of nature as an object governed by unchanging laws, instead of a variety of personal agencies, as conceived by the religious faith of earlier generations.

said to have had "a spirit of divination, or "of Python," Acts xvi. 16, margin. This name was given to Apollo, who delivered oracles, because, it is generally said, he had killed a serpent so called. Hence an oracular or familiar spirit was termed Python.
