ENTERED. ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS, IN THE YEAR ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-THREE, BY JOHN E. POTTER AND COMPANY, IN THE OFFICE OF THE LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS, AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

GANO, STEPHEN, a minister of the Baptist Church, was born in New York, December 27, 1762, and devoted the early portion of his life to the profession of medicine and surgery. Being impressed with the conviction that a more especial consecration to the work of his Master was a religious duty, he relinquished his profession, and was ordained to the work of the gospel ministry, August 2, 1786. He was successively in charge of various churches, and died, August 18, 1828, in the pastorate of the First Baptist Church, Providence, Rhode Island.

GAR, 1 Esd. v. 34.

GARASSE (ga-ras'se), FRANCIS, a Jesuit theologian, whose polemical writings exhibit undignified sarcasm and violent outbursts of passion, was born at Angoulême, in France, in 1585. He entered the society in 1600, and, after spending some time in teaching, took the vows of the order in 1618. Under assumed names, he wrote several controversial works, which abound in wholesale abuse of all whom he regarded as enemies of his order. His writings did not escape the censure of the Romanists themselves. His "Theological Summary," published in 1625, was condemned by the Sorbonne, and he was exiled to Poitiers, where he fell a victim to the plague, contracted in attendance upon the sick, in 1631.

GARCIA (gar'sh'a), D. FRANCISCO, a Portuguese Jesuit, entered the order at an early age, and embarked with fifty-eight other priests upon a Jesuit mission to the East Indies. A coadjutor of the archbishop during his residence at Goa and Cochin, he was, upon his death in 1641, elected to fill his place, and exerted great influence over the people by his knowledge of the native dialects. He died in 1659.

GARCIA, or GARZIA (gar'zh'a), GREGORIO, a Spanish Dominican, was born in Andalusia, toward the end of the 16th century. He was appointed missionary in Mexico and Peru, where, besides attending to the duties of his office successfully, he managed to accumulate much historical and traditional information connected with those countries. This was first published at Valencia in 1607, under the title, "Origin of the Indians of the New World," a work which has furnished subsequent historians with much information.

GARDEN (gar'd'n). If what Solomon spake concerning "trees, from the cedar to the hyssop," was consigned to writing, the work has long since perished; but it is impossible to read the Bible without perceiving that the Hebrews were a people who delighted in flowers and green fields, in groves and plantations, in orchards and gardens. The two hundred and fifty botanical terms occurring in the original of the Old Testament are enough to prove this. No collection of classical authors of the same extent, and not professedly treating on husbandry, could furnish so long a list; and it must be remembered that all these terms occur incidentally in their laws, their poetry, their history. Trees and flowers enhanced the enjoyment or relieved the gloom of almost every scene in Jewish life. Like the streets of modern Ispahan, like many of the towns of America and the Continent, their cities were sometimes adorned and shaded by trees growing beside the watercourses, Ecclus. xxiv. 12 (Vulgate). Even in towns the vine was trained along the walls of their houses; and as it clung to the trellis, or wound round the balustrade of the outside staircase, it was both a graceful and useful ornament, Ps. cxxviii. 3. The courts of their houses usually rejoiced in the shade of some spreading sycamore or terebinth; and except in the temple, where there was a special prohibition, the areas of the public buildings were usually planted. Gardens, and occasionally the shelter of a single tree, were a chosen scene of retirement and devotion, and it was in such cool and fragrant bowers that the rabbis loved to collect their disciples and deal forth their wisdom. The very rustics had a taste for flowers; and by way of bringing spring and autumn together, the grain newly heaped on the threshing-floor seems to have been occasionally crowned with lilies or some equally graceful garland, Cant. vii. 2. It is right, however, to mention that this passage is differently understood by many. According to some, the robe of the bride, with its amber or golden tint, and its

ing sepulchres" seems to have been to plant or strew flowers upon them. When Abraham bought the field at Machpelah for a burying-ground, besides the cave, special mention is made of the trees which surrounded it; and whether or not interment in gardens was common, by far the most memorable of earth's sepulchres was in the garden of a Jew.

But who can fail to recall that imagery from the grove and the garden, from the field and the forest, which over sacred poetry diffuses the glowing tints of Persian minstrelsy, the perfume of Arabian song? Not to quote the nobler and well-known examples supplied by the Psalms and the Canticles, the uninspired authors of Palestine will bear out the assertion. It is thus that Wisdom is described by the son of Sirach: "I was exalted like a cedar in Lebanon, and as a cypress upon the mountains of Hermon. I was erect like a palm in En-gedi, as a rose plant in Jericho, like a fair scarf of white or scarlet, is compared to a "sheaf" (not "heap") of wheat, with white or scarlet lilies girdle-wise surrounding it. Mr. Moody Stuart translates, "Thy bodice is a heap of wheat, about with lilies girdled;" while another learned critic renders it, "A heap of wheat in a bed of full-blown lilies." On high occasions the pathways of conquerors and distinguished personages were strewn with branches in blossom, or with the leaves of the palm. To their feasts a fresh charm was added by beautiful and fragrant flowers; and the apocryphal Solomon puts into the mouth of his voluptuary this truly Anacreontic ditty: "Come on, let us enjoy the good things that are present. Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments, and let no flower of the spring pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds before they be withered," Wis. ii. 6-8. Even to the grave this propensity followed them. The modern Egyptians deck the tombs of their kindred with palm leaves and the fragrant origanum; the Turks and the Syrians plant cypresses and myrtles in their cemeteries. So among the Jews one mode of "garnisholive in a pleasant field, and grew up as a plane tree by the water. I gave a sweet smell like cinnamon and asphaltus, and yielded a pleasant odor like myrrh, as galbanum, and onyx, and the fragrant storax, as the fume of frankincense in the tabernacle. As the fir tree I stretched out my branches, and my branches are the branches of grace. As the vine brought I forth pleasant savor, and my flowers are the fruit of honor and riches," Wis. xxiv. With still greater beauty, Simon the high-priest is described "as the morning-star in the midst of the cloud, as the rainbow among sunny clouds, as the flower of roses in the spring of the year, as lilies by the rivers of waters, and as the branches of the frankincense tree in the time of summer; as a fair olive tree budding forth fruit, as a cypress tree which groweth up to the clouds," Wis. i.

In its better days Palestine was "the garden of the Lord: a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates: a land of olive-oil and honey." For the sins of its people the land mourneth; but although its vines are blighted and many of its fountains are dried, the bee still murmurs on the cliffs of Carmel, the olive still matures its fruit in the solemn precincts of Gethsemane. The almond tree flourishes along the Jordan, as when its silvery or amethystine pennon, clear against the cloudless sky, proclaimed the approach of spring and invited forth to the fields and villages the youth of Judah. By the wayside grow sycamores, as when Zaccheus climbed into one to catch a glimpse of the illustrious Stranger, and under the terebinth the Bedouin sets up his tent, as when Abraham beneath the oak at Mamre received his angel visitors. As early as the days of Joshua, Jericho was the city of palm trees; with branches of the palm the jubilant procession strewed the road as they conducted the Son of David from Jericho to Jerusalem; and it is only in our living day that palms have disappeared from Jericho. The pine, cypress and myrtle still cast their shadow, although no feast of tabernacles returns, whose bowers they once adorned. If Sharon has lost its rose, Galilee still yields its lilies, descendants of those lovely flowers to which the divine Teacher pointed in his sermon, and bade his disciples "consider" them, with a feeling which an illustrious naturalist has characterized as "the highest honor ever done to the study of plants." Hasselquist was charmed with the jasmine of Palestine; another traveler speaks with rapture of the delicious odor which sprang at every step of his journey from Jerusalem to Jaffa, when the rain had revived the thyme, the balm and the rosemary; and in the glen of Lebanon, where Canobin lies embosomed, Maundrell well understood the allusion of Cant. iv. 11 and Hos. xiv. 6. This valley "is on both sides exceeding steep and high, clothed with fragrant greens from top to bottom, and everywhere refreshed with fountains falling down from the rocks in pleasant cascades, the ingenious work of nature," a description with which the language of a recent tourist entirely tallies: "Nothing can be conceived more delicious than the odors of these lower slopes of Lebanon. I do not know the name of half the trees and plants flowering round the path, some with pungent aromatic perfumes, others luscious, like the orange blossoms, and then again clumps of odoriferous pines, wild and pure, and under them growing the dwarf lavender in the crevices of the rocks."

No doubt where nature is most lavish it is often there that man is laziest; nor, even although the soil were more fertile than it is, and its productions more varied, could we safely infer the industrious habits of a former population. These rest on the testimony of their own writers; and whatsoever may have been their skill, it is manifest from both the Scriptures and the Talmudists that the Hebrews had a taste for horticulture.

For learning the art they had good opportunity during their sojourn on the banks of the Nile. To no nation of antiquity was the garden so essential as to the Egyptians. At their feasts each guest was presented with a flower or a nosegay, most usually a bud or full-blown flower of their exquisite lotus, the goblet was crowned with a garland, the choicest delicacies of the table were rare fruits, and the central ornament of the board was a vase of flowers kept fresh in water. In pots and vases flowers were distributed through the apartments, and they grew in the courts of the houses. Residences of the better sort were approached through an avenue of trees, and the villa was not complete without its garden and orchard. "Their pleasure-grounds were laid out in what used to be called the Dutch style; the flower-beds square and formal; the raised terraces running in straight lines; arbors of trellis-work at definite intervals, covered with vines and other creepers which it is difficult to identify. Some of the ponds are represented as stored with fish, others with water-fowl. Vegetables are depicted in great variety and abundance. It is indeed impossible to look at any representation of an Egyptian garden without feeling some sympathy for the complaints and murmurings of the Israelites in the desert. "The children of Israel wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers and the melons, and the leeks and the onions, and the garlic; but now our soul is dried away; there is nothing at all beside this manna before our eyes," Num. xi. 4-6." Judging from the paintings and sculptures brought to light by Rosellini, Wilkinson and recent explorers, the country mansion of an ancient Egyptian must have made a near approach to modern sumptuousness. When Pharaoh stepped forth from his palace, he found himself beneath an avenue of stately palms and sycamores, whilst the breeze from the river trembled through the light foliage of the one, and scarcely a ray of sunshine could penetrate the massive leaves of the other. If he went into his vineyard, he might walk under trellises from whose roofs and sides rich clusters depend, or through colonnades where, thyrsuswise, the vines twisted round gilded props or carved pillars. Thence passing into the wilderness or park, he and his courtiers might try their skill in archery, by shooting at a target, or might spend their arrows on the game preserved in the thickets; or if inclined for easier sport, the monarch might lounge in his barge and angle for fish, whilst slaves along the shore towed the pleasure-boat of their luxurious lord; or if he pleased, he might ascend to the upper and airiest apartment of his kiosk, and there, quaffing the juice of his grandsire's vintage, or the wine of his own dates, he might listen to the timbrel and harp of the minstrels, whilst every breath of air came laden with perfume, the water-fowl shook their wings and made rainbows in the pond, and the gardener's mischievous apprentices, the monkeys, played their antics in the pomegranates [from representations on the monuments, they seem to have been employed to collect the fruit in high trees, and sometimes helped themselves], the laborers all the while plying the shadoof and scooping up from the river a bountiful irrigation for the thirsty plats and parterres. Indeed, to the present day nothing is more characteristic of Egypt than its artificial irrigation by means of canals, and buckets hung upon levers and water-wheels—a feature in which the land of promise presented a striking contrast to the house of bondage: "The land, whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs: but the land, whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven. And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments, which I command you this day, to love the Lord your God, and to serve him with all your heart, and with all your soul, that I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain, and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil," Deut. xi. 10, 11, 13, 14.

At a later period of their history the Jews sojourned for two generations in Babylonia. There they must have seen that wonder of the world—

"Those airy gardens, which yon palace vast Spread round, and to the morning airs hang forth
Their golden fruits and dewy opening flowers;
While still the low mists creep in lazy folds O'er the house-tops beneath."—Milman.

It is possible that the "hanging gardens" of Babylon may have supplied some hints applicable to the terrace-culture so general on the hills of Palestine; and the reservoir at the summit, with the hydraulic contrivances for filling it, could not escape the notice of an observant people. But whatsoever practical use the Jews may have made of their Babylonian experiences, their sacred writings contain no admiring allusions to a country which they only recalled as the scene of an irksome and ignominious exile.

In Scripture we have indications of various enclosures which occasionally bear the general name of garden.

1. We read, Cant. vi. 11, of a "garden of nuts," which of course means a plantation of walnuts or almonds, or some other nut-bearing tree. In the same way the Jews had enclosures dedicated to the cultivation of the vine and the olive; so that we continually read of "vineyards" and "olive-yards," and, Cant. iv. 13, we find an "orchard of pomegranates."

2. Then there were orchards where trees of various sorts were reared together. Says the Preacher, "I made me orchards, and vineyards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruit," Eccles. ii. 5. Amongst the fruit trees cultivated in the Holy Land were the almond, the chestnut, the citron, the date-palm, the fig and the pomegranate, besides the vine and the olive. For the sake of a dense shade, however, the orchard sometimes contained trees more valued for their foliage than their fruit, "trees of emptiness," like the plane, the terebinth (or "oak"), the mulberry, etc.

3. One of the first times that we read of a "garden of herbs" is when the unscrupulous Ahab coveted the vineyard of Naboth, wishing to convert it into a kitchen garden, 1 Ki. xxi. 2. In every country such an enclosure contains the vegetables which suit the taste of the people, and which the climate allows to be cultivated. Amongst the culinary vegetables of the Hebrews were gourds, cucumbers and melons, which in sultry weather were delightful refrigerants, besides such aromatic herbs and carminatives as mint, anise, rue and coriander; nor were they likely to omit the onion and the garlic.

4. Like most Oriental nations, the Jews were fond of perfumes. Their clothing was often scented. Blind Isaac, "smelling the fragrance of Jacob's raiment, blessed him, saying, Behold, the fragrance of my son is as the fragrance of a field which the Lord hath blessed," Gen. xxvii. 27; and to the king's daughter the Psalmist says, "Myrrh, aloes, and cassia are all thy garments: from the palaces [or cabinets] of Armenian ivory they make thee gladsome," Ps. xlv. 8 (Walford's Translation). The box of precious ointment poured on the head of a guest was the mark of a distinguished reception, and, in later times at least, a garland of roses sometimes encircled the heads of the banqueters. We are therefore prepared to find the chief place occupied by odoriferous plants in the flower-garden of ancient Palestine. Thus in the impassioned address of the bride of Solomon:

"A garden art thou, filled with matchless sweets;
A garden walled, those matchless sweets to shield;
A spring enclosed, a fountain fresh and sealed:
A paradise of plants where all unite,
Dear to the smell, the palate or the sight;
Of rich pomegranates that at random blow;
Cypress and nard, in fragrant gales that flow;
Nard, saffron, cinnamon, the dulcet airs
Deep through its canes the calamus prepares;
The scented aloes, and each shrub that showers
Gums from its veins and spices from its flowers.
O pride of gardens! fount of endless sweets,
Well-spring of all in Lebanon that meets!"
Song Sol. iv. 12-15 (Good's Translation).

Solomon's own gardens have probably suggested the imagery, as he informs us himself, "I made me great works; I builded me houses; I planted me vineyards; I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits: I made me pools of water to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees," Eccles. ii. 4-6. Of these the traditional site near Bethlehem is certainly correct. No locality could in itself be more likely or more convenient for a royal retreat not far from the capital; and it is fully confirmed by the names which still linger, Wady Urtás, "The valley of the Garden" (Hortus Conclusus of the Romans), Gebel-el-Fureidis, "The hill of the little Paradise," besides "Fig Vale," "Peach Hill," "Walnut Walk," "Garden of Nuts," etc. Taking advantage of the water supplied by the fountain of Etham, a Christian Jew has within the last fourteen years converted a portion of this territory once more into a fruitful field. The brook, "clear as crystal," which creates its fertility, is thus described by Miss Bremer, who was there in March,

1859: "Everything on its banks seemed to rejoice over the lively running water; swarms of little gnats, which danced above them; the rose-red cyclamens, which shot up out of the hollows or cracks in the stones, and bowed their lovely little heads as if to reflect themselves in the clear water; the grass, which grew so abundantly on the banks as almost to conceal them. The almond trees were in blossom, and hundreds of little goldfinches, with red crests round their beaks, twittered and warbled in the trees, although most of them were yet without leaves." At the same season a few years previously Van de Velde expatiates in glowing terms on the scenery of "The Song," as reproduced on the very site of Solomon's pleasure-grounds—the flowers appearing, the singing of birds, the pomegranate budding, and then "the getting up early to the vineyards to see if the vine flourish, if the tender grape appear." And Bonar says, "It is one of the sweetest valleys into which the eye can look down; a well-watered orchard covered with every goodly fruit tree that Syria nourishes."

Owing to the density of the population and the wonderful fertility of the soil when duly watered, a greater proportion of Palestine was laid out in gardens and vineyards than of almost any land. This was especially the case in the neighborhood of cities. According to Josephus, the environs of Jerusalem were almost all garden together; but from the statements of the rabbis it would appear that, except a few plantations of roses which had existed since the days of the prophets, there were no gardens within the walls. For this sanitary reason is assigned, in the danger apprehended from the decomposition of vegetable matter.

Gardens were occasionally used as places of sepulture. Manassch, and Amon his son, were not buried in the royal vaults, but "in the garden of Manassch's own house, in the garden of Uzza," 2 Ki. xxi. 18, 26. And "in the place where Jesus was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid. There laid they Jesus therefore, because of the Jews' preparation-day; for the sepulchre was nigh at hand," John xix. 41, 42.

The existing gardens of the East are not calculated to give an exalted idea of Syrian husbandry. They are arranged with little taste and kept with little care; at the same time, their productions are for the greater part identical with those yielded in the palmy days of Palestine. Like the "garden of cucumbers," Isa. i. 8, any valuable plantation still needs a lodge for the watchman till once the crop is secured. Now that her "country is desolate," there could not be a more vivid emblem of the daughter of Zion; but the amazing capabilities of the soil, where industry and irrigation are brought to bear, not only help us to recall the past, but make it easy to believe that when the set time is come for the Lord to comfort Zion, "he will make her wilderness like Eden, her desert like the garden of the Lord," Isa. li. 3.

GARDEN-HOUSE, 2 Ki. ix. 27. See AHAZIAH, 2, BETH-HAGGAN.

GARDINER (gard'e-ner), JAMES, COLONEL, a Scotch military officer in the reign of George II., distinguished for his bravery and his piety. He was born in 1688, at Carriden, Linlithgowshire, entered the army when only fourteen, and obtained a commission in the Dutch service. He afterward entered the regular British army and distinguished himself at the battle of Ramillies. At the breaking out of the rebellion he commanded a regiment of dragoons, and fell at the battle of Preston-Pans, being cut down by a blow from a Lochaber-axe, in sight of his own house, September 21, 1745. Dr. Doddridge, his biographer, says that in his youth he was very gay and licentious, but the accidental perusal of a book entitled "Heaven taken by Storm" revived in his memory the teachings of his pious mother and made him serious, and from that time he became as distinguished for his piety as he had before been for the absence of all religion and a course of vice. It is also said that he received a supernatural intimation of his own approaching death. There is a passage in Dr. Alexander Carlyle's Autobiography, respecting Colonel Gardiner and Dr. Doddridge's narrative of his conversion, which excited an interesting discussion and throws doubt on the popular narrative.

GARDINER, STEPHEN, the English prelate and statesman, was born at Bury St. Edmunds, England, in 1483, and studied the classics and civil and canon law at Cambridge. He became secretary to Cardinal Wolsey, and while acting in this capacity won the favor of Henry VIII., and became notorious for the part he took in aiding and abetting him in procuring a divorce from Catherine of Aragon. He went to Rome to seek the consent of the pope to this iniquity, and to Cambridge to procure from that university a declaration in conformity with the king's desires. On his return he was made secretary of state, and, in 1531, bishop of Winchester, in reward for his devotion to the king's interest. He took part in the court which pronounced for the divorce. He was an implacable foe of the Protestant Reformers, and was the framer and enforcer of the "bloody statute of the six articles," popularly known as "the whip with six lashes," the cause of much bloodshedding and many tortures. He was instrumental in procuring the divorce of two other of Henry's wives, Anne of Cleves and Catherine Howard, and at the king's suggestion drew up articles of heresy against Catherine Parr, in order to get rid of her. Thus to the last he proved himself the base tool of a wicked man. He was kept in the Tower during Edward VI.'s reign, but released by Mary, who was crowned by him, and who made him her chancellor and prime minister, the influence and power of which posts he employed to light again the fires of persecution, in which Hooper, Latimer and Ridley suffered, along with many others. He died in 1555. Gardiner was a man of learning, but of no principle; he was destitute of every qualification for the office of a bishop, and was filled with a worldly spirit. Wily, vindictive, unscrupulous, he hesitated at no step which could gratify his revenge or promote his interests; ambition was his motive through life, and the object of that motive was the dignity of cardinal—an object in which he was disappointed. His whole life illustrates the fact that power over mankind was the object for which he lived.

GAREB (gah'reb). 1. The name of one of David's worthies, 2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chr. xi. 40. He is called "the Ithrite"—i. e., a native of Jathir. The rendering Jethrite, son of Jether, is opposed to the fact that in notices of this sort it is usually the birthplace, and not the descent, that is mentioned. The Syriac reads in the latter clause 'Arab from Lachish.

GAREB, the name of a hill near Jerusalem, Jer. xxxi. 39. As the root signifies to scratch, and the Syriac name is the name for leprosy, this hill is supposed to have been the place to which lepers were sent out of the city.

GARGOYLE (gar'goil), sometimes printed GARGYLLE and GURGOYLE, a term in mediæval architecture used to describe the species of water-spout which projected from the eaves of houses, usually made in some grotesque form resembling the figure of an animal or a caricature of some human subject.

GARISSOLES (gar-is-sole'), ANTOINE, a Protestant minister, was born at Montauban, in France, in 1587. In 1610 he was ordained and assumed a pastoral charge at Puy-laurens. Ten years after this he returned to Montauban, and in 1627 was made professor of theology at that place. At the meeting of the synod of Chaventon, 1645, he presided with signal ability, and distinguished himself by his determined resistance to the demands made by the government, which would have crushed the liberties of the Protestants. He boldly arraigned the theory of mediate imputation held by Placcæus; and when the Protestant schools were crippled in their resources, he remained at his post as professor of theology with no hope of remuneration for his services. He died at Montauban, July, 1651.

GARIZIM (gar'e-zim), 2 Macc. v. 23; vi. 2, a form of Gerizim.

GARLANDS (gar'lands), Acts xiv. 18. These were wreaths or chaplets made of branches, flowers, feathers and even precious stones. In heathen countries it was customary, at sacrifices, to decorate, not only the victims brought as offerings, but also the altars, priests, and the very doors of the houses with garlands or wreaths. These were usually selected with special reference to the supposed partiality of the gods to which they were devoted. In the Christian Church, in mediæval times, garlands were borne upon the heads of the assistant clergy, in the celebration of the mass, carried in the funeral procession before the corpse, placed before the altar, or used for the decoration of images. Guests at feasts were occasionally also crowned with flowers. According to Chrysostom, in the marriage ceremony in the earlier periods of the Church, they were used to crown the parties contracting marriage, in imitation of what was considered an innocent heathen ceremony. This custom still prevails in the Greek Church.

GARLIC (gar'lik), Hebrew shum, Num. xi. 5. Hasselquist, whilst mentioning that garlic (Allium sativum) is much used by the modern Egyptians, expresses a doubt whether it was known to the Israelites, "as it does not grow in Egypt, but is brought thither from islands in the archipelago." On this point, however, the inscription quoted by Herodotus may be held as conclusive. He expressly mentions garlic as one of the articles of food supplied to the builders of the pyramids, and with his statement tallies the latest and best authority. "Though garlic grows in Syria, that brought from Egypt is most esteemed. Till the name 'Syrian' was tabooed in Cairo, during the war, those who sold it in the streets cried, 'Tôm shâmee,' 'Syrian garlic,' it was then changed to 'Infa e' tôm,' 'garlic is useful.'" Even in the days of the Israelites imported varieties may have been preferred to those of native growth, but there can be little doubt that the pungent bulb was as popular in the streets of Noph and On, as it is now in Cairo and Damietta. Both the common garlic (Allium sativum) and its less rank congener, the shallot (A. Ascalonicum), are well-known bulbous-rooted plants, along with the hyacinth, the squill, the star of Bethlehem, forming a tribe in the beautiful order of the lilies. Besides other medicinal properties, garlic is said to have a considerable effect in quickening the circulation and stimulating the entire system.

GARMENT. See DRESS.

GARMITE (gar'mite). This appellation is given to Keilah, apparently the town, 1 Chr. iv. 19. Nothing can be affirmed with certainty of it.

GARNER (gar'ner). In the Authorized Version the Hebrew word otsar signifies a place where goods or treasures are deposited for safe keeping. The word "treasury," as in 2 Chr. xxxii. 27, and granary and barn, as in Matt. iii. 12 and Luke iii. 17, is of the same signification. Among the Egyptians granaries were large structures raised above ground, but among the Romans they were vast repositories dug in the earth, thoroughly defended on the sides from damp, and well covered. The granaries for army stores were of vast size and held great quantities of grain, which were often preserved in them for many years.

GARNET (gar'net), a precious stone. See SARDIUS.

GARNET, HENRY, born at Nottingham, England, about 1555, and became a convert to Romanism; he visited Rome in 1575 and joined the Jesuits, and in 1586 was made provincial of the order in England. He was implicated in the Gunpowder Plot, for which he was tried and condemned. He allowed that he was aware of the plot, but tried to take refuge for his silence behind the seal of confession. It is thought that the king would have spared his life had he not, in reply to some interrogatories, asserted the lawfulness of equivocation in cases where men were required to accuse themselves. He is enrolled among the Jesuits as a martyr.

GARNETT (gar'net), JOHN, D.D., successively Fellow of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and Lady Margaret's preacher, bishop of Ferns, 1752, bishop of Clogher, 1758. He died in 1782. His principal work is entitled "A Dissertation on the Book of Job, its nature, argument, age and author; wherein the celebrated text, ch. xix. 25, is occasionally considered and discussed; to which are added four sermons." In this work the author "contends that the Book of Job is an allegorical drama designed to represent the fall and restoration of a captive Jew, and with a view to recommend the virtue of patience. The author he supposes to have been Ezekiel, and the period of its production subsequent to the Babylonish captivity." The dissertation is ably written and ingeniously reasoned, but the hypothesis it is designed to support is a mere fancy, and the author adds nothing to our resources for understanding the book to which it relates.

GARNIER (garn-yeay'), CHARLES, a French Jesuit and missionary priest. The child of wealthy and noble parents, he was born in 1606, and when thirty years of age joined the mission which went out to Canada to convert the Indians. Its central point was Itonatiria, in Thunder Bay, on Lake Huron. The devoted men of this mission endured terrible hardships, and their missionary efforts were very successful among the Hurons. But the desolating Iroquois war of revenge broke out in 1641, the Huron tribe was exterminated, and the missionaries, forty-five in number, put to the most cruel deaths in 1650. Among those who perished thus in the Huron wilderness was Garnier.

GARNIER, JEAN, a learned Jesuit, was born in Paris, France, in the year 1612. He entered the order at the early age of fourteen, and soon displayed great aptness for study and imparting instruction. During a period of forty years he held with usefulness to the society various professorships of theology and literature, and wrote important works on the Pelagian controversy. He died at Bologna, October 16, 1681.

GARNISH (gar'nish) signifies, as in 2 Chr. iii. 8, to adorn or ornament with precious stones. The term is used in reference to attire of a gorgeous character, as in Rev. xxi. 19, and to the furniture of a house, as in Matt. xii. 44.

GARRETSON (gar'ret-son), FREEBORN, a distinguished American missionary and pioneer of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Maryland, August 15, 1752. He entered conference in 1775, the year of his conversion, and was ordained elder in 1784 by Dr. Coke and sent as a missionary to Nova Scotia. Four years after, with twelve young ministers, he commenced the work of evangelizing the western portion of the New England States and the eastern part of New York. His ministerial life was one of great earnestness and usefulness. One of the earliest pioneers of Methodism in the United States, his vigorous mind, decided character and unusual zeal and fervor contributed largely to the growth and prosperity of the Methodist Church in this country. For over fifty years he was one of the most laborious and useful ministers of his age, preaching the gospel in nearly all the New England and Atlantic States from Nova Scotia to the Gulf of Mexico. He died September 26, 1827.

GARRISON (gar'ri-son). The different Hebrew words so rendered are from the same root; but they do not all express the sense of our term "garrison." The translation is accurate in 1 Sam. xiii. 23; xiv. 1, 4, 6, 12, 15; 2 Sam. xxiii. 14; but in 1 Sam. x. 5; xiii. 3 probably a pillar or monument was meant, which the Philistines had set up to mark their superiority or some victory gained, and which Jonathan threw down. The same word designates the "pillar of salt" of Gen. xix. 26. Further, in 2 Sam. viii. 6, 14; 1 Chr. xviii. 13; 2 Chr. xvii. 2, officers rather than garrisons are intended; and in Ezek. xxvi. 11 pillars (perhaps those of the temple of the Tyrian Hercules) are meant.

GARVE (garv), KARL BERNARD, one of the best modern German hymn writers, was born near Hanover, January 4, 1763. He pursued his theological studies in the seminary of Barby, and subsequently became professor of history and philosophy at Niesky. After laboring successively at Amsterdam, Ebensdorf, Norden and Berlin, in the latter city especially with distinguished ability, he was placed at the head of the Moravian community at Neusals-on-the-Oder, and remained here until the increasing infirmities of age compelled him to resign in 1838. His religious poetry is characterized by deep religious feeling, rare beauty of language and smoothness of versification. He died June 22, 1841.

GASHMU (gash'mu), Neh. vi. 6, a form of the name Geshem.

GASSENDI (gas-sen'de), PIERRE, one of the most celebrated of the philosophers of France, was born in 1592 at Chantersier, in Provence. Before he was 20 years of age he became professor of philosophy at Aix, but he soon resigned the chair, and gave himself up wholly to his scientific pursuits. In 1645 he was appointed professor of mathematics in the college royal of Paris, and his lectures were exceedingly popular. In fact, he was distinguished as an astronomer, naturalist, theologian and mathematician. Gassendi combated the metaphysics of Descartes, and divided with that great man the philosophers of his time, almost all of whom were Cartesians or Gassendians. Gibbon calls him the most philosophic among the learned and the most learned among the philosophic of his age. He died in 1655. Gassendi's most important works are his "De Vita et Moribus Epicuri," "Syntagma Philosophiæ Epicuri," and "Syntagma Philosophicum."

In the first two he gives an account of the life and doctrines of Epicurus, with great learning clearing them of misrepresentation, and while controverting some of the speculative notions of Epicurus, vindicates and extols his moral teaching. In the last he expounds his own system. Among his other works are several astronomical treatises and "Lives of Tycho Brahe and Copernicus." Notwithstanding the estimate of Gibbon, it must be admitted that Gassendi was better fitted for science than philosophy. His expositions and defence of the principles of Epicurus failed, as they deserved to fail, to rejuvenate a system which, if adopted by society, would certainly eventuate in corruption, and which is beyond doubt opposed to the morals of Christianity. As certainly as pleasure is recognized as the chief good, even though it be proclaimed that by the term is meant the pleasure of the good man, an easy conscience will adopt a suitable rule, the appetites will be indulged, and personal ends and aims will rule. In metaphysics he was the precursor of Locke, as he held a sensational system, but he was not a materialist. He was really the founder of no philosophical sect, but he left his mark on the thought of his age, and his views served to stimulate the great minds of a later age. Dalton in chemistry, Hobbes, Locke, Barrow and Newton were all affected in their investigations by the suggestions of his powerful mind.

GASSNER (gas'ner), JOHANN JOSEPH, a Romish priest, was born at Brauz, August 20, 1727. After pursuing a course of study in theology at Innsbruck and Sprague, he was ordained priest and settled as pastor at Klosterle in 1758. After filling this position for several years, he professed himself able to cure diseases by exorcism, traveled much, and was favored with many remarkable cures. Lavater regarded many of these as the result of an extraordinary power of faith. Several bishops at length declared their disapprobation of his deeds and opinions, the emperor Joseph II. peremptorily forbade exorcisms, and Gassner died in retirement, April 4, 1779.

GASTRELL (gas'trel), FRANCIS, D.D., an English divine, eminent for his pulpit eloquence and his written apologies of Christianity. He was born at Slapton, Northamptonshire, in 1662, and became successively preacher at Lincoln's Inn, canon of Christ Church, Oxford, and bishop of Chester. He disputed with the archbishop of Canterbury the legality for ecclesiastic purposes of degrees conferred by him, for which he received the thanks of the university of Oxford; he spoke in the House of Lords against the sentence on Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, and wrote against both Collins' and Clarke's views on the Trinity. He died in 1725. His chief works were "The Certainty of the Christian Revelation," and "The Christian Institutes, or Sincere Word of God," the latter of which was often reprinted.

GATAKER (gat'a-ker), CHARLES, born at Rotherhithe, England, in 1614, a zealous controversialist and an eminent Calvinistic clergyman of the Church of England. He was register of Hoggeston for about thirty years. He wrote a number of religious works, among which the chief one was entitled "The Way of Truth and Peace." He also wrote "Animadversions" on the "Harmonia Apostolica" of Bishop Bull, to which the bishop replied with spirit. He died in 1680.

GATAKER, THOMAS, B.D. Gataker was born in London, England, September 4, 1574. In 1611 he was appointed to the rectory of Rotherhithe, having filled for ten years previously the office of preacher to the society of Lincoln's Inn. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and was held in high esteem by his contemporaries for his great learning. He died July 27, 1654. While at Lincoln's Inn he preached a series of sermons upon the use and abuse of lots, and upon the kindred topics of games of chance and divination. The substance of these he subsequently published under the title, "A Discourse of the Nature and Use of Lots, a treatise historical and theological." His more important literary labors were undertaken at a later period of his life, and after he had become incapacitated by illness for the discharge of his pastoral duties. Amongst these were—1. Annotations on Isaiah, Jeremiah and Lamentations, included in the so-called Assembly's annotations, and of which it is by far the most valuable portion. It forms nearly one-fourth of the entire work. 2. "De Novi Instrumenti Stylo Dissertatio," which is a defence of the views of the Hebraists against those of the Purists. Bound up with this volume is a translation into Latin of the Jerusalem Targum on the Pentateuch by Francis Tayler, which was published at Gataker's instigation, and has his commendation prefixed. 3. "Cinnus, or a Controversial Miscellany." This contains two only out of the six books which it was the author's intention to publish. A further portion was published after his death by his son Charles Gataker, and the nature of the work is sufficiently set forth in the title of this volume, "A Miscellany in which light is cast on many passages of Scripture by comparing them with others." The work is still of recognized value.

GATAM (ga'tam), one of the sons of Eliphaz, Esau's eldest son, reckoned among the "dukes" in Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 11, 16; 1 Chr. i. 36.

GATE, the common rendering of Hebrew shaar, from the root "to cut asunder," "to divide," and meaning originally "fissure," "aperture," then an "entrance," the entrance into a camp, a palace, a temple, etc., but especially a city. It first occurs in Gen. xxii. 17, in God's promise to Abraham that his posterity should possess the gates of his enemies, signifying that they should have power or dominion over them. The gate was the place for great assemblies of the people, Prov. i. 21; for reading the law and proclamations, 2 Chr. xxxii. 6; Neh. viii. 1, 3; for administering justice, Josh. xx. 4; Ruth iv. 1; of fortification and strength in war, Jud. v. 8; Ps. cxlvii. 13. The gate of the town was also a market-place, 2 Ki. vii. 1, apparently as now for country produce. The gate often signified the city, Gen. xxii. 17; xxiv. 60; Deut. xii. 12; Ps. lxxxvii. 2, or the people of the city, as it was necessarily the most public thoroughfare of the town, 2 Sam. xv. 2, and the chief place of concourse either for business or pleasure, where the people went to learn the news, Gen. xix. 1, and to gossip, Ps. lxix. 12; to prefer suits, or to attract the notice of the sovereign or dignitary at his going out or his coming in, Esth. ii. 19, 21; iii. 2. The priests and prophets seem to have delivered their discourses, admonitions and prophecies in the gates, Isa. xxix. 21; Amos v. 10; Jer. xvii. 19, 20; xxvi. 10. Jeremiah mentions that the heads of the people met under the new gate of the temple on the occasion of a disturbance amongst the people, ch. xxxvi. 10. Criminals were punished outside the gates, 1 Ki. xxi. 10, 13; Acts vii. 58; Heb. xiii. 12. The king of Ai was buried in the entrance of the gate, Josh. viii. 29. Pashur smote Jeremiah the prophet and put him in the stocks at the high gate of Benjamin, Jer. xx. 2. At Rome the executions took place outside the Porta Metia or Esquilina. The burial-places, as now, were beyond the gates. Gates of "death" or "hell" denoted the region of the departed, or the dominion which was conceived to belong to the region, Job xxxviii. 17; Ps. ix. 13; cvii. 18; Isa. xxxviii. 10; Matt. xvi. 18. The Mohammedans assign seven gates to hell. To exalt the gate, to exhibit vanity, Prov. xvii. 19.

Gates of cities, as places of security, were fortified, and had two valves, generally of wood or of wood covered with sheets of copper or iron, Ps. cvii. 16; Isa. xlv. 2; Acts xii. 10. There were often also two gates, an outer and an inner one, and they were further protected by outworks or walls in advance of the gates. The Assyrian sculptures contain frequent representations of double and even triple walls with fortified gates in each. Botta shows the fortified gate with the "chamber over the gate," 2 Sam. xviii. 24, 33, the windows being square, while the gates are arched. That the double valves of the gates were of wood is to be inferred from the repeated representations of setting fire to them by the besiegers. In the walls of Babylon were "100 gates of solid brass." The gates of the ancient cities of Greece and Etruria were flanked by towers. The entrances to the temples of Thebes in Egypt, to which, in all probability, Homer alludes in the epithet "hundred-gated," which he gives to that city, were all flanked by towers. For the numerous gates of Jerusalem, see under that heading. That the valves were of wood and burned with fire we learn from Neh. i. 3. Subsequently the six great gates were covered with iron. The gates of cities were opened at sunrise and closed at sunset, Neh. vii. 3. They were closed during warfare, comp. Josh. ii. 5; viii. 14, and "thrown wide open on festive occasions," Ps. xxiv. 7, 9.

Gates—i. e., valves of iron and brass—mentioned in Scripture are conjectured to have been wood plated with metal. The Greek and Latin poets Hesiod, Ovid and Virgil all speak of gates of iron. Maundrell describes the principal gates of the mosque at Damascus as being in his day covered with brass.

Gates of stone were, Isa. liv. 12, most probably formed of a single slab turning on pivots inserted into sockets above and below. The doors leading to the tombs of the kings near Jerusalem were each formed of a single stone seven inches thick, sculptured to resemble four panels, and turning on pivots. Similar doors are described by Dr. Clarke in the sepulchres at Telmessus, and likewise by Irby and Mangles in the sepulchres near Bysan (Bethshan). They are also found in the Hauran, beyond the Jordan and in Persia.

Gates of wood were usually of two valves, and secured by strong locks of brass, iron or wood, Dent. iii. 5; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7; 1 Ki. iv. 13; 2 Chr. viii. 5; Jer. xiv. 2; xlv. 31; Ps. cxlvii. 13; Nah. iii. 13. Faber surmises that the wooden gates had wickets to allow of passage without opening the large gate, Matt. vii. 13. Some of the passages in the Assyrian palaces appear to have been closed by a strong single valve, probably of wood, which was fastened by a wooden lock like those still used in the East, of which the key is as much as a man can conveniently carry, and by a bar which moved into a square hole in the wall. It is to a key of this description that the prophet probably alludes: "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder," Isa. xxii. 22; and it is remarkable that the word of the text for key in this passage of Scripture, maphthead, is the same in use all over the East at the present time, but pronounced mufiah. The key of an ordinary street door is commonly thirteen or fourteen inches long, and the key of the gate of a public building, or of a street, or of a quarter of a town, is two feet and more in length. The key has a certain number of iron pegs at one end, which correspond to so many holes in the wooden bar or bolt of the lock, which, when the door or gate is shut, cannot be opened until the key is inserted, and the impediment to the drawing back of the bolt removed by raising up so many iron pins that fall down into holes in the bar or bolt corresponding to the pegs in the key. The ancient Egyptian doors seem to have been secured by similar locks. The Egyptians also sealed their doors with clay, as we learn from the sculptures, from tombs at Thebes actually so closed, and from Herodotus. Seals of soft clay with a hole pierced in them, in which were the remains of charred string, have been found at Khorsabad, and were probably used as a means of knowing whether certain doors had been opened, Dan. vi. 17, according to the present practice in the East, where a clay seal is placed over the lock on goods in khans.

We are in ignorance as to the contrivance of the upper pivots of the Assyrian doors, whether they were inserted into the lintel, or whether certain copper rings in the British Museum were not fixed into the walls above the slabs for the purpose of receiving the pivots.

Portions of the law were written on the gates of towns and on the doors of houses, Deut. vi. 9; xi. 20; and a similar practice is still continued in the East, where the gates of both public and private Mohammedan buildings are inscribed with passages from the Koran, see the engravings on page 167. The ancient Romans also decorated their gates with figures and inscriptions.

The chief entrance to ancient Egyptian houses was sometimes through a porch of two or more columns, occasionally with a flight of steps. Above or on the lintel was painted the name of the owner, or a sentence of good omen, doubtless put up at the dedication of the house, a ceremony also in use among the Jews. The door was in the centre, or at a corner of the front, and turned on pivots, and was frequently painted with numerous devices. In order to strengthen the wall over a doorway, a beam of wood or stone was let into it, and the jambs were upright posts on which the lintel rested. Sometimes, besides the framework and flat beams, the doorway had a round log for its lintel. Over the lintel was the cornice with an overhanging curve like that of the roof, generally with the winged globe or other significant decorations, highly colored. The stone lintel and the floor behind the threshold of tombs and temples contained the holes in which the pivots turned, as well as those of the bolts and bars, and the recesses for receiving the opening valves. Some of the bronze pins have been discovered in the tombs. The folding doors had bolts in the centre above as well as below, and a bar was fixed across, from one wall to the other.

Gates as places of Punishment and Sepulture.—The Assyrian sculptures again most aptly illustrate these customs, for there are numerous examples of execution by impalement outside the city walls and of burying outside the gates. That the practice prevailed with the ancient Romans we have the evidence of the several avenues to Rome, which are lined with the ruins of ancient sepulchres, and of the Street of the Tombs at Pompeii. That it is still the custom in the East we may just refer to the multitude of beautiful structures outside the Bab e'Nasr, and the gate at the foot of the citadel of Cairo.

Gates as places of Jurisdiction and Judgment.—“Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates; and they shall judge the people with just judgment,” Deut. xvi. 18; xvii. 8; xxi. 19; xxv. 7. Not only the chief judges, but the inferior magistrates, Ps. xxxi. 23; Lam. v. 14; Jer. xxxvi. 10, and occasionally kings, held courts in the gates, 1 Ki. xxii. 10; 2 Sam. xix. 8; Jer. xxxviii. 7; xxxix. 3. The judges sat on chairs at an appointed place within or under the gates, 1 Ki. xxii. 10; the whole length of one side of the court, 1 Sam. xx. 25, in which case the master sits in one corner. The Assyrian sculptures also afford examples of the high seats without a back, such as the prophet Eli “fell from off backward by the side of the gate,” 1 Sam. iv. 18. The ancient Trojans assembled their elders in the gates of the town to determine causes. The Romans used the Porta Capena for this purpose. The custom of holding courts of justice in the gate of the capital town prevails throughout the East; the governor of every city, town or village sits in or near to the gate to settle the affairs of all within his jurisdiction. The very title of the Sultan, the Sublime Porte, is derived from the Italian porta, or gate; and the office of the Capugi Bashi of Constantinople (basha of the gate) must be analogous to that which Daniel held in Babylon.

The first transaction on record of a legal character is that of the purchase of a field by Abraham, which took place in the gate of the city of Hebron, then called Kirjath-arba, Gen. xxiii. 10, 18. Then the judgment between Boaz and a relation of Naomi's, Ruth iv. 1. That this custom of giving judgment at the gates of cities and royal abodes was universal in the ancient world we learn also from Egyptian, Assyrian and Greek sculptures. The metaphorical language, “And thy seed shall possess the gates of his enemies,” is derived from the custom of the king sitting at the gate of the city or palace to give audience or judgment, and in obedience to which ancient custom the statues of the Pharaohs and kings of Egypt are always placed at the gates of the temples. On Egyptian monuments, before the entrance of the mansion of the blessed, sits Harpocrates, the type of youth and new life, and a hideous monster, the prototype of Cerberus, sometimes called the devourer of the wicked—guards of the gates

2 Chr. xviii. 9. The sculptures found by Botta contain representations of an arm-chair or seat of judgment in which the king sat at the gate. A high seat, called kursi, exactly like this excepting in the decorations, is to be found in the court-yard of all respectable houses in Cairo, where the master sits to give judgment in domestic affairs. These seats are never wanting in the court-yard of the houses of sheiks, of heads of tribes, or of persons in authority. The seat is placed in some shady part of the court against a wall or column, exactly as described in Scripture, 1 Sam. i. 9, and in some houses it is converted into a high sofa continued of the Amenti or hades. In the sculptures on the sarcophagus in the Soane Museum, the weighing of the deeds of mankind, or the place of judgment, is at one of the many gates of Amenti, Tob. xxxviii. 17, which are always guarded by a great serpent. At Thebes there is a bas-relief representing the king giving audience at the door of his tent. The Assyrian sculptures show us Sennacherib at the door of his tent giving judgment in the case of the Jewish prisoners taken at Lachish. The gates and courts of judgment in the palaces themselves are sufficiently indicated by the subjects represented on the walls. The Ionic trophy monument excavated at Xanthos by Sir Charles Fellowes furnishes a representation of a Persian satrap sitting at the gate of the city under the shadow of an umbrella dictating terms to Greek ambassadors.

In the Assyrian palaces the gates were remarkable for many significant illustrations of Scripture. The principal gates were guarded by six symbolic figures, compounded of the man, the bull and the eagle, the elaborately-sculptured wings being extended over the back of the animal. These figures are built into the sides of the opening. We regard these symbolical combinations of the human-headed figure of a bull with eagles' wings as probably derived from traditional descriptions of the cherubim, handed down after the Deluge by the descendants of Noah; and to the same origin also may be attributed their situation as guardians of the principal entrances of the palaces of the Assyrian kings. In the Assyrian palaces such compound figures are never found, excepting as guardians of portals. Ordinarily, the entrances on each side of the central portal recede from the general line of the façade, and are guarded on each side of the doorway by winged divinities which turn their faces to the entrance and present the pine cone to those who enter, affording a remarkable similarity to Egyptian temples. In

Assyria he who was privileged to enter was met by the divinity presenting him with the fir cone, and in Egypt the king is represented receiving from the divinity in the same way the symbol which is understood to signify life. Another curious feature of the entrance to Assyrian palaces or temples is that the tile or brick pavement ceases at the threshold, and their place is supplied by a single large slab of gypsum, the width of the jamb, and covered with a cuneatic inscription divided into two columns. Before the three doors of the façade forming the porch are holes the size of one of the bricks forming the pavement, from eleven to thirteen inches square and about fourteen in depth. These holes are lined with tiles and have a ledge round the inside, so that they might be covered by one of the square bricks of the pavement without betraying the existence of the cavity. In these cavities Botta found small images of baked clay of frightful aspect, sometimes with lynx' head and human body, some with human head and lion's body, and others with the upper part human, but terminating in bulls' legs and tails. As we have no analogous contrivances in the temples of Egypt and Greece, we can only speculate on these peculiarities in the Assyrian structure. It may, however, be surmised, from the constant recurrence of the emblematic figures at the entrances, that this part of the palace or temple in the Assyrian mind was of the greatest importance, and connected with the religious opinions of the nation. Hence it was trebly guarded by divinities, inscriptions and hidden gods, from the approach of any subtle spirit or more palpable enemy. With respect to the clay images, they may be the "teraphim," a name given to certain images which Rachel had stolen from her father Laban, the Syrian, and "put them in the camel's furniture and sat upon them," Gen. xxi. 19, 30, 34, circumstances which favor the conclusion that the teraguages, and easily interchanging in many. These speculations are strongly supported by the existing characteristics and superstitions of Eastern nations; the pertinacity with which all Orientals adhere to ancient traditions and practices; the strongly implanted prejudices entertained in the court of Persia respecting the going out and coming in of the shah to his palace, and the belief in unseen agencies and the influence of the evil eye, which has prevailed in all countries, and still exists in some, especially in Asia and the South of Europe. The gates above described formed the side of a court, the size and decoration of which favored the conclusion that it was a court of reception—the place where offerings were presented and where justice was administered; the king's gate—the gate of judgment—the "porch for the throne where he might judge, even the porch of judgment," 1 Ki. vii. 7. In this court were wont to assemble the princes, governors, judges, treasurers, counselors, sheriffs, and all the rulers of provinces, Dan. iii. 2, 3, of Assyria. When the king gave audience, the porch or seat of judgment was on the southwestern or shady side of the court, and communicated immediately by the several entrances with the interior of the palace. It was in a court or a gate of this kind in the royal abode of Babylon that the prophet Daniel sat when Nebuchadnezzar had made him the "sultan" or ruler over the whole province of Babylon, Dan. ii. 48, 49; and it was in a similar court of the king's house in Shushan the palace, that Haman watched to speak unto the king to hang Mordecai, Esth. vi. 4.

GATE, THE BEAUTIFUL. See TEMPLE.

GATES, THE BEAUTIFUL, the designation of those ornamental doors which in Eastern churches stood between the narthex and the porch. Often there was an inner and an outer narthex. They were spaces in the western part of the church. The outer contained the porch and the area in the front, and the inner was the place where catechumens, penitents and sometimes schismatics and unbelievers were admitted. It was also the place for watches, funeral rites and sometimes baptisms.

GATH, one of the five royal cities of the Philistines, Josh. xiii. 3. It is first mentioned by Joshua as one of the few places in Palestine in which the giant race of Anak were left after the conquest of Palestine, xi. 22. Goliath, the champion of the Philistines, was a Gittite, and of the Anakim, 1 Sam. xvii. 18. Another remarkable man of the same race is mentioned in 2 Sam. xxi. 20–22. When the Philistines captured the Ark of the Covenant, they carried it first to the temple of Dagon at Ashdod, thence to Gath, and finally to Ekron, 1 Sam. v. Among the most singular episodes in the history of David was his adventure at Gath, whither he fled gin—a meaning analogous to doorway, the margin or boundary of a chamber. Thus both the Hebrew and Arabic afford significations immediately connected with the gods teraphim; and we have yet another illustration, furnished by the modern Persians, who call their talismans "telifin," really the same word, the l and r being the same in some lanfrom Saul. He thought he would not be recognized, and that as a refugee from the Israelitish court he would be welcomed. But he was at once recognized as the conqueror of Goliath, and his fate appeared to be sealed. However, "he feigned himself mad in their hands," and acted so successfully that he deceived Achish the king, and was dismissed, 1 Sam. xxi. 10, etc. To this romantic incident we owe one of the most beautiful odes in the Bible, the 56th Psalm. A few years later David returned to Gath, and was well received by prince and people, probably because they were now fully informed of the deadly hostility which existed between him and Saul, 1 Sam. xxvii. He appears to have succeeded in attaching so devotedly to his person and cause some of the brave Gittites, that they ever afterward constituted part of his body-guard, and were his staunchest friends, 2 Sam. vi. 10; xv. 18-22, etc. When David came to the throne he captured Gath; but it does not appear to have remained in possession of the Israelites, 1 Chron. xviii. 1; 1 Kings ii. 39. Gath was the scene of many a fierce contest during his reign and those of his two successors, 2 Sam. xxi. 20. It was captured by Hazael, king of Syria, during the reign of Jehoshaphat, B. C. 856. The most signal victory ever gained by the Israelites over the Philistines was under the youthful king Uzziah, who dismantled Gath with their other principal fortresses, 2 Chr. xxvi. 1-7. The city appears to have been in ruins in the time of Amos, vi. 2; and with the exception of an incidental allusion to it in a proverb, Mic. i. 10, we hear no more of it in history. It is not enumerated by the later prophets with the other royal cities of Philistia, Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5, 6.

The site of Gath has long been a subject of difficulty and controversy among sacred geographers. Its exact position is not indicated in Scripture. There are, however, some incidental references which point with tolerable definiteness to the district in which it must have stood. From its having been the scene of such frequent contests between the Israelites and Philistines, we conclude that it lay upon the border; that is, in the plain, close to the foot of the hills of Judah. This is corroborated by the words of 1 Sam. vii. 14: "The cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored from Ekron unto Gath." The former city we know was upon the north-east border of Philistia; and Gath was thus farther south, on the border also. Again, in 1 Chr. viii. 13 it is said that "Beriah and Shemah is mentioned in connection with Shochoh and Adullam, which were a few miles south of Bethshemesh. Josephus places Gath within the tribe of Dan, which did not extend much south of Bethshemesh, Josh. xx. 40. We may also infer that it lay on or near the road leading from Shochoh to Ekron; for when the Philistines fled on the death of Goliath, Saul pursued them by "the way of Sharaim, even unto Gath and unto Ekron"—the same way led to both cities, 1 Sam. xvii. 52.

These various notices point to one district as that in which Gath must have been situated—namely, to the confines of Philistia, lying north-west of Shochoh, and south-west of Bethshemesh. There is, however, one very distinct statement of Jerome, which would locate it on the extreme south of the Philistines' territory. Bonfrenius suggests that there were several places of the same name, and this may account for the discrepancies. Eusebius mentions a Gath, between Antipatris and Jamnia; and the Crusaders identified Gath with Jamnia. Thomson tries to show that Gath was the ancient name of Eleutheropolis.

Dr. Porter made a journey to Philistia in 1858, one object of which was to identify, if possible, the site of this ancient city. After a careful examination of the country, he was led to the conclusion that Gath stood upon the hill called by the Crusaders "Alba Specula," and now "Tell es-Safieh." Its position answers in every respect to the notices above referred to. It is about seven miles from Bethshemesh, eight from Shochoh toward Ekron, and six north of Eleutheropolis. The site is a most commanding one, and would form, when fortified, the key of Philistia. It is close to the mountains of Judah. The tell is about 200 feet high, with steep sides, now in part terraced for vineyards—Gath signifies a "wine-press." On the summit are the foundations of an old castle, probably that built, or rebuilt, by the Crusaders; and all round the hill are great quantities of old building stones. On the north-east is a projecting shoulder, and the declivities below it appear to have been scarped. Here stands the modern village. Its houses are all composed of ancient materials, and around it are ruins and fragments of columns. In the sides of the hill, especially toward the south, a great number of cisterns have been excavated in the limestone rock.

were the heads of the inhabitants of Aijalon, who drove away the inhabitants of Gath." Aijalon lay at the foot of the mountains near the north-east angle of Philistia; and it would seem that Gath was not far distant from it. In 2 Chr. xi. 8, Gath

They are generally large square chambers with circular openings about three feet in diameter. There can be little doubt that this is the site of the long lost city of Gath.

GATH-HEPHER (gath-hef'fer), a town on the north-eastern border of Zebulun, situated between Japhia and Ittah-kazin, Josh. xix. 13. There is only one other reference to it in Scripture, where Jonah the prophet is said to be "the son of Amittai, of Gath-hepher," 2 Ki. xiv. 25. A very clear topographical notice of Jerome in his preface to the book of Jonah, connected with a local tradition, enables us to identify this ancient town. About three miles north-east of Nazareth, and nearly the same distance east of Sepphoris, stands the little village of Mashhad. It is on the top of a rocky hill, and is divided by a wady from Kefr Kenna. Beside it is an old tomb, said by both Moslems and Christians to be that of Jonah the prophet. The name Mashhad is always given in Syria to the tomb or shrine of a saint or prophet, where people are accustomed to assemble for worship, and this may probably have supplanted the ancient name Gath-hepher.

GATH-RIMMON (gath-rim'mon). 1. A town of Dan, apparently situated in the northern part of the plain of Philistia. It was one of the cities allotted out of that tribe to the Levites, Josh. xix. 45; xxi. 24; 1 Chr. vi. 69. Both Eusebius and Jerome describe it as, in their day, a large village, twelve miles from Diospolis (Lydda), on the road to Eleutheropolis. Robinson suggests that it may be identified with the town of Geth, which Jerome places five miles from Eleutheropolis on the way to Diospolis, and with the modern village of Deir Dubban, where there are some remarkable caverns. Deir Dubban, however, is more than twenty miles from Lydda, and is consequently much too far south for either the notices of the Bible or the statement of Jerome. The site of Gath-Rimmon has not yet been discovered. It must be sought for near the base of the mountains east of Ramleh.

2. Another town of the same name, is mentioned in Josh. xxi. 25. It was assigned out of the tribe of Manasseh to the Levites. The parallel passage in 1 Chr. vi. 70 reads Bileam or Ibleam, instead of Gath-Rimmon; and some have hence inferred that the latter is an error, having crept into the text through oversight from the preceding verse. It is much more probable, however, that these were both names of one place. In a wine-producing country it was natural to give the name Gath, "wine-press," to a number of places. Bileam or Ibleam was situated in the plain of Esdraelon near Megiddo. See IBLEAM.

GAUBIL (go-beel'), ANTOINE, born at Gail-lac, France, in 1689; he joined the Jesuits, and was sent at the age of thirty-two as a missionary to China, where he continued till his death in 1759. He gained the affections of the Chinese by his gentle manners, and their respect and admiration by his astronomical knowledge, and the way in which he made himself thoroughly acquainted with their history and literature. He became such a master of the Chinese language that he was appointed interpreter at the court of Peking. He wrote a valuable history of Genghis Khan and the Mongolian dynasty, and translated the "Chou-king," a book ascribed to Confucius, and held in the highest veneration by the Chinese; this Gaubil enriched with notes.

GAUD (gawd) is the name of the tenth large bead which is found in a rosary, and when the person who is using the beads in prayer comes to a "gaud," a paternoster is repeated.

GAUDEN (gow'den), JOHN, was born at Mayland, Essex, England, in 1605. He was an unprincipled man, ambitious and worldly-minded. He was made dean of Bocking, Essex, in consequence of a sermon he preached before the House of Commons. In the revolution he took the side of the Parliament, and was named as one of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, but he strenuously opposed both the trial and execution of King Charles. It is his connection with this monarch that has rescued Gauden's name from oblivion, for he claimed the authorship of the book, "Eikon Basilike," which he published after the king's death. This claim is a subject of great dispute, but it would appear that Gauden possessed himself of the MS. of the king's meditations, and published them in the form which caused so great a sensation, that it is said that its appearance before the king's death would have prevented that tragedy. After the Restoration, he was made bishop of Exeter, and translated to Worcester; but failed to obtain the see of Winchester, which he greatly coveted.

GAUDENTIUS (gaw-den'sh'us), SAINT, bishop of Brescia, was much against his will forced to accept the appointment. He has left some writings of minor importance; but his name stands out in connection with a deputation which in 405 went to Constantinople to intercede with the emperor Arcadius for St. Chrysostom, patriarch of that see. He died in 427.

GAUDY-DAY, the term by which a church festival used to be designated, because of the fact that joy and gladness, as well as prayer, should characterize the season.

GAUL (gawl), the name by which, among the Romans, the region now called France was designated. Portions of it were early subjugated by the Roman arms, and the victories of Julius Cæsar in reducing the remainder and consolidating the different districts into an orderly province are among the most interesting and valuable lessons of ancient history. The proximity of Gaul to Italy, made the affairs of the adjacent province of more immediate importance than those of Hispania, as modern Spain was designated. The subjugation of Gaul and the adjoining Belgia opened the way for an incursion into Britain, and the prosperity of the rising towns in Gaul not only attracted a growing population, but served to bring great masses of people very rapidly under the influence of the early missionaries of Christianity. Hence the towns in the South and East of Gaul soon became important centres of Christian labor, as in the case of Irenæus at Lyons and other leaders who carried the gospel with great success to the north and the west.

GAULANITES (gaul'an-ites), a party among the Jews, the followers of Judas, a native of Gaulan in Galilee, who in A. D. 10 excited his countrymen to take up arms, rather than pay tribute to the Romans. They were also called Galileans and Gaulanists. They were speedily destroyed.

GAULANITIS (gawl-a-ne'tis). See GOLAN.

GAULTIER (go-tyay'), FRANCOIS DE, a Protestant author and divine, was born during the first half of the seventeenth century in the department of Gaul. He presided over the synod of Bas-Languedoc in 1681, and believing his safety in France compromised on account of his zeal in the Protestant cause, he retired to Switzerland, and afterward to Holland. He was held in high esteem by the Prince of Orange, sent by him on a confidential mission to the elector of Brandenburg, who received him at his court and made him his chaplain. He died at Berlin, 1703.

GAUME (gawm'), JEAN, a Romish theologian and writer of the Ultramontane school, who while vicar general of the diocese of Nevers, France, in 1852, excited a great controversy by the publication of a pamphlet in which he condemned the study of the Greek and Latin classics in a course of education, and proposed to substitute the reading of the Fathers of the Church. Falling under the censure of the bishop of Nevers, he resigned his office the same year. He died in 1869.

GAURS (gawrz). In different parts of the East there are persons known by this name who are supposed to be descendants of the ancient Parsees, who trace their faith and customs up to Zoroaster. The Mohammedans, who savagely treated the Zoroastrians in Persia when the followers of the "false prophet" overran Persia, describe the Gaurs as being monsters of cruelty and iniquity, but the testimony of travelers and residents in the East vouches for their simplicity and gentleness, though they are exceedingly ignorant and superstitious. As little is known of them, it cannot be affirmed that their tenets are those taught in the Zend (see ZOROASTER and ZEND AVESTA), or that they have received a number of Jewish tenets, and even certain doctrines of Christianity, which had been carried to the East. See MAGI.

GAUSSEN (go-song'), ETIENNE, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Nismes, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, wrote many works marked with considerable vigor and depth of thought, and was held in high estimation in the schools of Germany and Holland. He was at one time professor of philosophy in the Protestant academy at Saumur, and afterward succeeded Josue de la Place as professor of theology. He died in 1675.

a pastor at Satigny in 1816. It was his good fortune at this place to be greatly influenced by Cellerier, a man of simple faith and great Christian fidelity. With him he protested against an ordinance infringing upon Christian liberty, and republished the Helvetic Confession in French, with a preface setting forth the value and importance of such a confession of faith. For twelve years he labored here to re-inspire the national Church with new life and to sustain evangelical Christianity. His name became known throughout Switzerland, and his zeal and orthodoxy aroused the displeasure of the Romanists and involved him in controversy. Associated, however, with Merle D'Aubigné and Galland, he formed the "Evangelical Society" for the distribution of tracts, and permitted nothing to divert or drive him from the path of duty. In 1834 he accepted the professorship of theology in the new evangelical school of Geneva, and gave renewed evidence of his attachment to strictly orthodox doctrine. Several of his works have been translated into English. He died June 18, 1863.

GAUTAMA (gow'ta-ma). See SAKYA MUNI.

GAUTBERT (go-bay'r'), or GAUZBERT (go-bay'r'), a nephew of Archbishop Ebbs, and one of the earliest missionaries to Sweden, set out for that country in 834, and commenced to preach the gospel. He erected at Birks the first Christian church in Sweden, and gathered here a large number of converted pagans; but the pagan priests inciting the people to hostility against the missionaries, Nithard, his companion, was killed, and Gautbert narrowly escaped across the frontier. He died about 864.

GAY DE VERNON (gay-deh-ver'non), LEONARD, a French priest, born at Limousin, in 1748. He was curé of a village near Limoges when the French revolution broke out, and was the originator of the change of "Domine salvum fac regem" into "fac gentem." He was one of the most violent republicans, but got into trouble with the Directory, and was exiled. He returned in 1799, and signalized himself by his hatred of the papacy, for which he fell under ecclesiastical censure.

GAYLEY (gay'le), SAMUEL, an eminent minister of the American Presbyterian Church who gained a deservedly high character as an instructor of youth, and who did as much as any man of his day in fostering a taste for the accurate study of classical learning. He had fine intellectual powers of an analytical character, and he was therefore thoroughly qualified for grounding students in such elementary study as enabled them afterward to advance by themselves. He had more than a thousand young men under his care, from twenty States of the Union, from Canada, Cuba, Ireland, England, Mexico, Poland, Barbadoes and India. Having established the classical institute in Wilmington, he removed to Media, Pennsylvania, where he did a great work among the youth of this land. He was born in the county of Tyrone, Ireland, in the year 1802, and he died in 1862, greatly lamented by the heads and professors of colleges over the country, who esteemed him for his great intellectual and social worth.

GAZA (gah'zah), "strong," "fortified," one of the five princely cities of the Philistines, but which, unlike Gath, has withstood the desolations of many generations, and continues to the present time a comparatively thriving and well-peopled place.

It may be regarded as one of the oldest cities in the world, being mentioned in Gen. x. 19 as one of the border towns of the Canaanites. Like Gath it was also one of the seats of the giant race, the Anakims, that were prior even to the Canaanites, Josh. xi. 21, 22. It was included in the lot of Judah, and is said to have been taken by the tribe, along with Askelon and Ekron, Jud. i. 18; though it is clear they did not attempt to drive out the original inhabitants, nor interfere with the regular government, but were content with some nominal fealty. By and by it became the scene of Samson's mournful captivity and last triumph, Jud. xvi. Afterward it had its full share in the varying fortunes of the Philistine territory; and had ever and anon to endure sieges which frequently brought it to the brink of ruin. "To the Egyptians it was the key of Palestine, to the Syrians it was the key of Egypt," hence it was the scene of many a severe conflict. That it was a strongly fortified place, as its name imports, appears alone from the resistance it made to the arms of Alexander. So vigorously was it then defended by the forces under the command of the eunuch Batis, and of such massive strength were its walls, that the engineers of Alexander's army found themselves completely baffled in their attempts to effect a breach. They were obliged to erect an enormous mound 250 feet in height, and about a quarter of a mile in width, on the south side of the town; and even with this advantage, and the use also of the engines that had been employed at the siege of Tyre, the besiegers were frequently repulsed, and Alexander himself sustained no slight bodily injury. It was at last carried by escalade, and the garrison put to the sword. The town itself was not destroyed, but most of the inhabitants that remained were sold into slavery, and a fresh Arab population settled in their stead. During the Maccabean wars it was taken and retaken several times; on being taken by Simon it was strongly fortified, and peopled by Jews in place of its former idolatrous inhabitants; further on still it stood a whole twelvemonth's siege against Alexander Jannæus, and at last was carried only by treachery, etc. In the gospel age it appears to have been a place of some importance; it was among the cities given by Augustus to Herod, as a mark of the imperial favor; and after his death it was assigned to the province of Syria. Though not noticed among the places visited by the apostles in the early propagation of the Christian faith, it is known to have become the seat of a Christian church, whose bishop frequently appeared in the records of the ancient councils. There are evidences of idolatry having retained a hold of the place for centuries after the Christian era; as many as eight heathen temples are said to have existed in it at the beginning of the fifth century.

The present Arabic name of the city is Ghuzzeh, and its population is estimated by Robinson and by Serai, the great mosque, the government offices, and the houses of the chief citizens, all stone buildings, once substantial and in repair, though no one can tell how long ago. On the south-east is a large suburb more densely populated than the hill; on the south-west is a smaller one; and on the north is another still smaller. All these are of mud architecture, differing in nothing from the villages of the surrounding plain, except that here and there is a large mosque and minaret. The present town has no gates, no fortifications, no defences of any kind; and yet from its position one would think it had more need of them than any other place in Syria. It is not only a frontier town, but being situated on the borders of the desert it is open at any moment to a Bedawy raid. Yet it never suffers; and the secret of its safety is just this—the inhabitants are themselves half freebooters, half receivers, whom the Bedawin deem it more politic to conciliate than to plunder."

Porter at about 15,000 inhabitants, of whom only a few hundreds profess to be Christians; the rest are Mohammedans. It stands about three miles from the sea, and the farthest south of any of the towns on the Philistine coast. Some have supposed that the ancient town stood considerably nearer to the shore; but there is no certain evidence of this. Robinson says, "Between the city and the shore are hills and tracts of sand, on which are scattered a few trees and hedges. Around the city on the south, east and north are numerous gardens hedged with prickly pear, which forms an impenetrable barrier. The soil of these is exceedingly rich and productive. Apricots and mulberries were already ripe [21st May]; the former delicious and abundant. Many palm trees are scattered around the city, though they form no grove as in Egypt; while beyond the gardens, toward the north, lies the extensive olive-grove through which we had passed." "The town itself," says Porter, "looks like a collection of large villages that chance had placed near each other. The nucleus stands on a broad-topped hill, which constitutes a kind of west-end containing the

From what has been stated respecting Gaza, it will be evident that the expression in the message to the evangelist Philip, "Go toward the south unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem to Gaza, which is desert," Acts viii. 26, must have respect not to the city itself of Gaza, but to a part of the way leading to it. Even in the present day, Gaza could not with propriety be described as desert; and much less could it have been so in Philip's time. Coins still exist of Gaza that were struck in honor of Titus, Hadrian and some following emperors, showing it to have been a place of considerable importance both at and subsequent to the gospel era. But that portion of the road which lies between Eleutheropolis and Gaza passes through a region which is now, as it was probably then also, without villages, and might fitly be called desert.

GAZARA (gaz'a-rah), the name of a town of importance in the history of the wars of the Maccabees. Its site is placed near Azotus, 1 Macc. xiv. 34, and it is nearly always mentioned in connection with Joppa and Jamnia. The Gaza in 1 Macc. xiii. 43, and the Gadara in Josephus, should doubtless be read Gazara. It may perhaps be identified with the Gadaris of Strabo, also described by him as a town not far from Azotus. Gazara was the scene of many battles in the Maccabean period, and was alternately possessed by each of the opposing parties. When Gorgias, general of Antiochus Epiphanes, was defeated by Judas Maccabæus, his forces were pursued "unto Gazara, and unto the plains of Idumæa, and Azotus, and Jamnia." Nicanor was also defeated by Judas, and pursued from "Adasa to Gazara." After the defeat of the Idumæans, Judas went against Timotheus, who fled to Gazara for refuge. Judas, after several days' siege, took the city; many of its towers were burnt, and Timotheus himself killed. When Bacchides returned to Jerusalem, after the defeat of Jonathán, he fortified several cities, and among them Bethsura and Gazara, and the tower of Jerusalem; and it was again fortified by Simon, when it had been recovered by the Jews. Simon built himself a house at Gazara, and also made it the abode of his son John, the captain of all his hosts. It is described as being "a very strong hold." Gazara is mentioned with Joppa in the treaty of friendship between Hyrcanus and the Romans after the death of Antiochus VII.

It is mentioned by Eusebius, as being four miles from Nicopolis; but it was more probably nearer the sea-coast, as in the Maccabees and Josephus it is nearly always coupled with Joppa, Azotus and Jamnia; and again in distinct language as bordering upon Azotus. It appears to have been the same place with GAZER or GEZER, a town frequently mentioned in the Old Testament. As David chased the Philistines from Geba to Gazer, 2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chr. xiv. 16, so Judas defeated Gorgias at Emmaus and pursued him to Gazara, 1 Macc. iv. 15. Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon, took Gazer, 1 Ki. ix. 16, 17, then a Canaanitish city, burnt it, slew the Canaanites that were in it, and gave it in dowry to his daughter, Solomon's wife. This must have occurred during the reign of David, or early in that of Solomon, and it seems out of the question to suppose that Pharaoh, when the Israelite kingdom was so powerful, could have advanced far into the interior of the country. The site near the sea-coast is therefore confirmed by this circumstance.

Gazara may be identified with the modern village of Yazur, three miles and a half to the east of Joppa, though as a coast-town and a place of strength in the time of the Maccabees, it is unlikely that it should have so entirely lost its importance. It must however be remembered that names sometimes linger in the neighborhood of sites.

GAZARITES (gaz'ar-ites). In the twelfth century a number of the Albigenses strayed away to Gazare, in Dalmatia, so as to secure religious liberty. They were known by the term Gazarites. They were discovered and condemned by Pope Innocent III.

GAZATHITES (gaz'a-thites), the inhabitants of Gaza, Josh. xiii. 3, called also Gazites.

GAZEB (gaz'eb), GUILLAUME, a theologian and writer of ecclesiastical history, was born at Arras in 1554. He was canon of the collegiate church of St. Peter of Aive, curé of the parish of St. Marie Madeline, and professor of belles-lettres at Louvain. He was a diligent student, and author of a work on ecclesiastical history and numerous other publications. He died at Arras, August 25, 1611.

GAZELLE (ga-zel'). See ANTELOPE.

GAZER (ga'zer), 2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chr. xiv. 16. See GEZER and GAZARA.

GAZERA (gaz'e-rah). 1. 1 Esd. v. 31, probably a corruption of Gazzam, Ezra ii. 48. 2. 1 Macc. iv. 15; vii. 45, identical with Gazara.

GAZEZ (gaz'ez), the son of Haran and grandson of Caleb. He is first called the son of Caleb, and then more definitely the son of Haran, 1 Chr. ii. 46.

GAZITES (gaz'ites), the inhabitants of Gaza, Jud. xvi. 2, called also Gazathites.

GAZZAM (gaz'zam), one of the Nethinim, whose descendants returned from Babylon, Ezra ii. 48; Neh. vii. 51.

GEBÄ (ge'bah). Considerable confusion has arisen from the close similarity in the names of three towns of Benjamin; Geba, Gibeah and Gibeon. It would even appear that the names were regarded as interchangeable, for in Jud. xx. 10 and 33, we find Geba where Gibeah is meant, and in 1 Chr. xiv. 16, Gibeon is given instead of Geba, comp. 2 Sam. v. 25; 2 Ki. xxiii. 8. Still more confusion has been caused by a want of uniformity in our English Version. Thus the Hebrew is rendered in different passages Geba, Josh. xxi. 17, Gaba, xviii. 24, on account of the pause accent, and Gibeah, 1 Sam. xiii. 16; xiv. 5. Geba, Gibeah and Gibeon are shown to be distinct places in Isa. x. 29 and Josh. xviii. 24, 25.

The position of Geba is so clearly indicated in several passages of Scripture, that we have no difficulty in identifying it with the village of Jeba, which stands on the top of a rocky ridge overlooking the whole eastern declivities of the mountains of Benjamin. It is about six miles north of Jerusalem, and a mile south of Michmash. The latter occupies another ridge, and the wild glen of Suweinit separates it from Jeba. Jeba is a small village, and most of its houses are half ruined. A few remains of antiquity can be traced in the large hewn stones that appear in the foundations and walls of the modern houses.

The story of Geba is soon told. It was allotted to Benjamin and given to the priests, Josh. xviii. 24. It was held for a time by the Philistines; but Jonathan, the son of Saul, took it; and the Philistines soon afterward assembled in great force at Michmash, 1 Sam. xiii. 3, 16. The Israelites under Saul took up a strong position at Geba. The two armies were separated by the deep ravine called the "passage of Michmash." This difficult pass became the scene of Jonathan's daring and successful adventure. Accompanied only by his armor-bearer, he went down into the ravine, clambered up the northern cliff "on his hands and on his feet," and attacked the enemy. They were taken by surprise. The shock of an earthquake occurring at the moment increased their terror. Saul from the opposite ridge saw the turmoil, and heard the cries of distress. The Philistines fled in confusion, and were driven from the mountains, 1 Sam. xiii. 17-xiv. 23. Dr. Porter was greatly struck on visiting Jeba, and crossing the ravine to Michmash, with the minute topographical accuracy of the Scripture narrative. Geba lay on the northern border of the kingdom of Judah, and hence we can understand why it was fortified by Asa, 2 Ki. xxiii. 8; 1 Ki. xv. 22. It is one of those towns mentioned by Isaiah in describing the march of Sennacherib on Jerusalem, Isa. x. The topography of the district throws some light on that beautiful passage. When the army reached Michmash they left their baggage there; and the troops, thus disencumbered, were able to cross the ravine and bivouac on the heights of Geba. The town was occupied by the Benjamites after the captivity, Ezra ii. 26. It appears to have been unknown to Eusebius and Jerome.

GEBÄ, Judith iii. 10. This is probably the modern Jeba, a large village on the brow of a hill, three or four miles north-east of Samaria.

GEBÄL (ge'bal), a province only once mentioned in Scripture, and in connection with Moab, Amalek and the Hagarenes, Ps. lxxxiii. 7. This shows that it is distinct from the Gebal of Lebanon. It was evidently situated in the south-eastern border of Palestine; and there can be no doubt that it is identical with Gebalene, a district embracing the northern section of the mountains of Edom. Its name "gebal," "mountain," is descriptive of its character. The Jerusalem Talmud reads Mount Gabla, instead of Mount Seir; so also does the Samaritan in Deut. xxxiii. 2. Seir, however, was the ancient name of Edom; whereas Gebal was only a part of it. Josephus calls it Gobolitis, and Eusebius Gabalene. These writers, with Jerome and Stephen of Byzant, agree in locating it around or beside Petra.

To the accurate observations of Burckhardt and Robinson we are chiefly indebted for our knowledge of this ancient province. The latter says: "This tract of mountains south of the district of Kerak (the ancient country of Moab), and separated from it by the Wady el-Ahsy, is at the present day spoken of as divided into two districts. The northern bears the name of Gebäl, 'mountains,' beginning at Wady el-Ahsy, and terminating toward the south, according to Burckhardt, at Wady el-Shuweir. Yet the southern boundary would seem not to be very definitely assigned; for esh-Shobek, although it lies south of that wady, was sometimes spoken of to us as belonging to Jebal." The chief towns in Gebalene were Tophel, Bozrah, Arindela and Shobek, the Mons Regalis of the Crusaders.

GEBÄL, a very ancient city of Phœnicia, situated on the coast, at the foot of Lebanon, 24 Roman miles north of Beyroot, the inhabitants of which were called GIBLITES (gib'lites). Joshua speaks of "the land of the Giblites" in such a way as to show that the territory attached to the city was large, apparently including the ridge of Lebanon north of Sidon. The Giblites were celebrated for skill in architecture, and were employed by Solomon in building the temple, probably on the recommendation of Hiram, king of Tyre, whose subjects they were. In 1 Ki. v. 18, the word "The Giblites," is wrongly translated "stone-squarers." Ezekiel, in describing the glories of Tyre, says, "The ancients of Gebal, and the wise men thereof, were in thee thy calkers, xxvii. 9;" from which it appears that the Giblites were also famous as naval architects.

The Greeks changed the name Gebal into Byblos; hence the Septuagint give it in 1 Ki. v. 18, and Ezek. xxvii. 9. Among the heathen the town was noted as the birthplace and principal sanctuary of Adonis. In the time of Alexander the Great it possessed a fleet of war vessels. It continued to flourish for many centuries, and became the seat of a bishop in the early ages of Christianity. Under Arab rule it resumed its ancient name, but soon lost all its ancient power and splendor. The modern name Jebeil is the diminutive of the Hebrew Gebal.

Jebeil stands on a spur of Lebanon, close to the shore. Below it is the ancient harbor, now so choked up with sand and ruins as to be only capable of sheltering a few fishing-boats. The old ramparts are in ruins; but the castle or citadel is still an object of special interest. Its substructions are formed of massive beveled masonry, and afford one of the best specimens of mural architecture extant, well worthy the fame and skill of the ancient Giblites. Some of the stones are nearly 20 feet long. The traces of a Roman theatre remain; and great numbers of granite columns are strewn through the streets and ruins, and even over the surrounding fields, showing how splendid the city once was. Now a poor village, of some 600 inhabitants, is its only representative.

GEBER (ge'ber). 1. The name of one of the officers of Solomon who were set over distinct provinces for revenue or commissariat purposes, 1 Ki. iv. 19. 2. A Geber is also mentioned at ver. 13 as the father of another of these officers.

GEBHARD TRUCHSESS (gep'hart trook'sess), archbishop and elector of Cologne, was born near Waldburg, in 1547. He became a Protestant, and married Agnes, countess of Mansfield. Excommunicated by the pope and deposed, he applied to some of the Protestant princes of Germany to aid him; but the jealousy and disunion which characterized them, prevented his obtaining any succor. Being exiled, he went to England, and obtained from Queen Elizabeth some pecuniary relief.

GEBIM, a place apparently not far from Jerusalem on the north, the inhabitants of which are represented as preparing to flee on the approach of Sennacherib's army, Isa. x. 31.

GEBIROL (geb'e-rol). See IBN GEBIROL.

GED, WILLIAM, a practical goldsmith and artist of Edinburgh, Scotland, was born about 1690. He claims space here, on account of the fact that he was the originator (1725) of the method of printing from plates cast in plaster moulds. The printers met his efforts to introduce his invention with jealous opposition, and prevented him from making it a pecuniary success. He printed an edition of Salust, 1744, from plates cast according to his process. He died in 1749. Ged's invention was subsequently taken up and improved by M. Firmin Didot, who applied the term "stereotype" to the process.

GEDALIAH (ged-a-li'ah) occurs as the name of various persons, of whom otherwise we know nothing, Ezra x. 18; Zeph. i. 1; 1 Chr. xxv. 3, 9; and is of historical moment simply as the name of the governor who was appointed by Nebuchadnezzar, after the destruction of Jerusalem, to preside over the affairs of the feeble remnant that still survived in Judea, Jer. xxxviii.; 2 Ki. xxv. 22. As it was the mind of God that the king of Babylon should for a time have the ascendancy over the land and people of the Jews, so it was in conformity with his will that those who were left behind should submit themselves to Gedaliah, as Nebuchadnezzar's deputy. The prophet Jeremiah accordingly went to Mizpah and put himself under Gedaliah's protection, Jer. xl. 6; he used his influence also with the people in endeavoring to persuade them to the same peaceful course. But there was a party whose chafed spirits and blighted ambition would not suffer them to fall in with any arrangement which formally acknowledged the supremacy of the king of Babylon; and this party, headed by Ishmael, of the seed royal, who had taken refuge for a time among the Ammonites, entered into a conspiracy to slay Gedaliah. Information of the plot was secretly conveyed to Gedaliah, that he might take measures to have it defeated; but he refused to give credit to the intelligence, and so, in the midst of a repast, was treacherously murdered by Ishmael and his associates. This was done only about two months after the destruction of Jerusalem. The murderers made their escape to Egypt.

GEDALIAH, FAST OF. See FASTS.

GEDDES (ged'des), ALEXANDER, was born in the parish of Ruthven, Banffshire, Scotland, 1737. He was first educated in a private family at Aberdeen, and next at the Roman Catholic seminary of Scalau. At the Scotch college at Paris he studied six years, and returning to his native land, he became a priest at Dundee, and afterward in Banffshire. Being suspended by Bishop Hey for liberality, he left Scotland in disgust, and went to London, 1779. The university of Aberdeen, to its honor, conferred on him the title of LL.D. In London he found a generous and kind patron in Lord Petre. He died the 26th February, 1802, aged sixty-five.

Geddes published a translation of the Old Testament, containing the books from Genesis to Ruth.

In 1800 appeared the first volume of "Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures." Death prevented him from finishing what he had begun. His version of the Psalms, printed as far as Psalm cxviii. at his death, was not published till 1807.

The Bible, as edited by Geddes, contains a new translation, with a corrected text of the original, various readings, explanatory notes and critical observations. The work itself was preceded by a "Prospectus," by a supplement to the prospectus in the form of a letter to the lord bishop of London, by a general answer to the queries, counsels, etc., which had been offered to him, etc. An address to the public was issued, in consequence of the severe remarks made upon his works and himself. In 1794 he published a reply to the pastoral letter of the vicars apostolic who had condemned his translation, in the form of a letter to Bishop Douglas.

The work by which he is known shows great learning, taste and ingenuity. Besides being an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, as numerous publications attest, Geddes was familiar with the Italian, French, German and Spanish languages. He was well versed in Hebrew, knew the principles of Biblical criticism and was able to apply them. His character was that of a warm-hearted, independent, honest man, who followed truth, as far as he thought he saw it, with a fearless mind. It is matter of regret that he should have indulged here and there in remarks which betray a levity and skepticism calculated to wound the feelings of others. His own Church persecuted him as a heretic. Protestants looked upon him in the same light and stood aloof, or they attacked a man far their superior in attainments. His life was written by John Mason Good, 1803.

GEDDES, JANET. Chambers in his Cyclopedia records the traditional history of this celebrated Scotch woman, who took a prominent part in resisting the introduction of the liturgy or service-book into the Church of Scotland, in 1637. Sunday, 23d July, 1637, an immense crowd had filled the High Church of St. Giles, in Edinburgh. On the dean beginning to read, his voice was lost in a tumultuous shout, and an old woman, said to have been one "Jenny Geddes," who kept a vegetable stall in High street, bawling out, "Villain! dost thou say mass at my lug?" (that is, at my ear), launched her stool at the dean's head. Universal confusion ensued, and the dean, throwing off his surplice, fled to save his life. The bishop of Edinburgh, on attempting to appease the storm, was assailed by a volley of sticks, stones and other missiles, accompanied by cries and threats that effectually silenced him. This tumult proved the death-blow of the liturgy in Scotland. Still it has been doubted if any person of the name existed, and the exploit has been claimed for a woman named Barbara Hamilton, wife to John Mein, the postmaster of Edinburgh, who opposed the service-book of Archbishop Laud in the year 1637.

GEDDES, MICHAEL, born in Scotland, about 1640, attained the distinction of one of the four first Warner exhibitioners at Baliol College, Oxford. He was chaplain to the English factory at Lisbon for eight years, but was, at last, silenced by the Inquisition. He is known as an ecclesiastical historian, and as such is spoken well of by Southey, and by Burnet, whom he succeeded in the chancellorship of Sarum. He died in 1714 or 1715. He wrote a "History of the Church of Malabar," and "The Church History of Ethiopia," besides

"Miscellaneous Tracts," "Tracts against Popery," and numerous other works.

GEDDUR (ged'dur), 1 Esd. v. 30, perhaps a corrupt form of Gahar, Ezra ii. 47.

GEDEON (ged'e-on), Heb. xi. 32, the Greek form of GIDEON, which see.

GEDEON, one of the ancestors of Judith, Judith viii. 1.

GEDER, GEDERAH, GEDEROTH, GEDOR, all applied to a city in the territory of Judah, but whether they were all different cities cannot be ascertained. Nothing of historical interest is connected with the names, Josh. xii. 13; xv. 36, 41, 58; 2 Chr. xxvii. 18; 1 Chr. xii. 7. The last in the list, GEDOR, is commonly identified with a height in the mountains of Judah, having on it some ruins, and bearing the name of Jedûr. Gedor is thought, from 1 Chr. xii. 7, where mention is made of certain brethren of Saul, Benjamites, sons of Jeroham of Gedor, to have been also a town of Benjamin; and the allusion made to a Gedor in 1 Chr. iv. 39, in connection with the tribe of Simeon, seems to refer to some place on the boundary line between Judah and Mount Seir.

GEDERATHITE (ge-der'a-thite), a native or resident of Gederah, 1 Chr. xii. 4. Jozabad, so called, was a Benjamite, but he might have lived at Gederah.

GEDERITE (ged'er-ite), a native of Geder, or Gederah, 1 Chr. xxvii. 28.

GEDEROTH (ged'e-roth). 1. A city in the plain country of Judah, Josh. xv. 41, and one of those which the Philistines took from King Ahaz, 2 Chr. xxviii. 18. 2. A town of Judah in the Shephelah, but lying south of the preceding, and probably not far from Eleutheropolis. Jozabad the Gederathite was one of David's followers; but he was a Benjamite, and could scarcely be from this place, 1 Chr. xii. 4. The site is unknown.

GEDEROTHAIM (ged-e-ro-tha'im), a town in the low country of Judah, Josh. xv. 36. The Septuagint regard the word as connected with the preceding word Gederah. Winer looks on it as an ancient gloss, on the ground that the number of the cities is given as fourteen, whereas, if Gederothaim be reckoned one, the number will be fifteen; but the same discrepancy occurs elsewhere, and is best explained by supposing that some names were added by a later hand without a corresponding change being made in the number.

GEDOR (ge'dor). 1, 2. Two names, occurring among the genealogies of Judah; 1 Chr. iv. 4, 18; it is questionable whether persons are here meant, or a place. 3. A Benjamite mentioned in the genealogy of Saul, viii. 31, ix. 37.

GEGNÆSIUS (geg-nay'zh'us), TIMOTHEUS, a Paulician leader who flourished about the year A. D. 700. The sect at this time was divided into two parties, growing out of an antagonism between a Romanist and a Protestant principle. "Gegnæsius held that spiritual gifts were communicated by tradition, and connected with the regularity of succession." His brother Theodore refused to admit such a principle, and the controversy involving new charges against Gegnæsius, he was ordered under the reign of Leo the Isaurian to appear at the capital and undergo a trial. The examination was conducted by the patriarch, before whom Gegnæsius contrived to answer all the questions proposed to him respecting his orthodoxy in a satisfactory manner, attaching however quite a different sense from the true one to the formularies of Church orthodoxy. This trial having been reported to the emperor, Gegnæsius received from his sovereign a letter of protection securing him against all further complaints and persecutions.

GEHAZI (ge-hah'ze), the minister or attendant on the prophet Elisha. He it was that suggested that the Shunammite had no child, when the prophet had proposed to do something for her; and he, when the child that was given died, was sent to lay his master's staff upon its face, 2 Ki. iv. For his false and fraudulent conduct in regard to Naaman he was punished with incurable leprosy. He is once again heard of narrating to the king (Joram?) the wonderful deeds of Elisha, 2 Ki. viii. 4, 5.

GEHENNA (ge-hen'nah), the Greek form of gêhinnom, "the valley of Hinnom," Josh. xv. 8, a ravine to the south of Jerusalem, where the Jews offered their children to Moloch, and which was polluted by Josiah, 2 Ki. xxiii. 10. In consequence of its gloomy appearance, of the fires burning there, and of its being a receptacle for foul things, the word was used as symbolizing the place of eternal punishment, and translated "hell," Matt. v. 22, 29, 30; x. 28; xviii. 9; xxiii. 15, 33; Mark ix. 43, 45, 47; Luke xii. 5; James iii. 6. See HINNOM.

GEIER (gi'er), MARTIN, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Leipzig, April 24, 1614. He was educated at his native place, and at the universities of Strasburg, Jena and Wittenberg. In 1639 he became professor of Hebrew at Leipzig, and subsequently pastor, superintendent and professor of theology. In 1665 he reluctantly removed to Dresden as Oberhof-prediger and Kirchenrath. He died at Freyburg, August 22, 1681. Geier published a commentary on the Psalter, on Daniel, on Proverbs, and on Ecclesiastes. "De luctu Hebræorum" appeared at Leipzig.

GEIGER (gi'ger), ABRAHAM, born in 1810 at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, a German rabbi and Orientalist, and zealous Reformer among the Jews. He gained the prize offered at Bonn for a treatise on "The Hebrew Sources of the Koran," and with other learned Jews established a periodical in connection with Jewish theology.

GELASIUS (gel-ah'zh'us). 1. THE ELDER, was consecrated bishop of Cæsarea in 380, by his uncle Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem. He wrote several works, of which only some fragments explanatory of the Apostles' Creed, and of the traditions of the Church, remain. 2. OF CYZICUS (siz'e-kus), a bishop of Cæsarea, in 476, compiled a history of the Nicene Council, which Dupin and Cave agree in considering of little or no value.

3. [I.] BISHOP OF ROME in 492, and four following years. He had a sharp contention with Euphemius, patriarch of Constantinople. He is said to have held a council at Rome to determine on what books were canonical, but both council and decree are rejected by Cave. Asseman gives a "Missale Romanum Vetus," which bears the name of this Gelasius. 4. [II.] John Cajetan, a Benedictine monk of Monte Cassino, assumed the title of Gelasius II., when made pontiff. The emperor Henry V. set up Maurice Burdin as anti-pope, under the title of Gregory VIII. Gelasius had to fly from Rome, and died at Clugni, at the end of the first year of his pontificate. He left six epistles, and a life of Erasmus.

GELDENHAUER (gel-den-how'er or ghel-den-how'er), GERARD, born in 1480, at Nimeguen, and hence often called GERARD OF NIMEGUEN, was sent by Maximilian of Burgundy to Wittenberg to inquire into the state of the Reformed Church there, and was so impressed with what he saw and heard, that he himself forsook the popish religion. This led to a quarrel between him and Erasmus, whose friendship he had made at the university of Louvain, and who reviled him under the name of "Vulturius Neocomus."

GELILOTH (ge-li'loth), a place mentioned in describing the boundary of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 17; but when the same frontier is elsewhere described we find Gilgal, xv. 7. Geliloth was therefore either another name for Gilgal, or appears by a transcriber's error.

GELLATLY (gel-lat'le), ALEXANDER, a man of vigorous intellect and an earnest, faithful minister of the gospel in connection with the Associate Church, was born at Perth, Scotland, in 1720. After pursuing his theological studies in connection with the Antiburgher Synod of Scotland, he was sent out by that body in 1752 as a missionary to the inhabitants of Eastern Pennsylvania, who were chiefly composed of emigrants from Ireland and Scotland. Here, with the assistance of Rev. Andrew Arnot, he formed the Associate Presbytery of Pennsylvania. Mr. Gellatly was settled successively at Middle Octorara, Lancaster county, and at Oxford, Chester county, Pennsylvania, where he labored to the close of his life. He died March 12, 1761.

GELLERT (gel'ert), CHRISTIAN FURCHTEGOTT (furkh/te-kot), a distinguished and popular German author, born at Hainichen in Saxony, on the 4th of July, 1715, and died in December, 1769. As a moralist he is known by his "Fables," which have no superior in the German language, and as a poet by his divine songs.

GEMALLI (gemal'le), a descendant of Dan, whose son Ammiel was one of the selected spies, Num. xiii. 12.

GEMARA (gem'a-ra). See TALMUD.

GEMARIAH (gem-a-ri'ah), the name apparently of two persons in the time of Jeremiah—1, the one, the son of Hilkiah, who, along with Elash, was sent by Zedekiah on an embassy to Babylon, and was entrusted by Jeremiah with a letter to the captives already carried thither, Jer. xxxix. 1-3; 2, the other, called the son of Shaphan, the scribe, and one of the few men of influence who paid regard to the word of Jeremiah. It was in his chamber in the temple buildings that Baruch read the prophecies of Jeremiah in the audience of the people; and he interceded, though in vain, to prevent the burning of the roll that contained them, Jer. xxxvi. 10-25.

GEMARISTS (gem'ar-ists), the order of Jewish doctors who formed a school near Babylon, and compiled a Gemara or commentary on the text of the Talmud.

GEMINI (ge-mi'ni), Jud. iii. 15, marg. There can be little doubt but that Gera was a Benjamite.

GEMISTUS or GEMISTHUS PLETHO (gem-is'tus pleh'tho), GEORGIOS, philosopher and philologist, born at Constantinople, in 1390. He was a zealous defender of the Platonist phil-country, at the age of 101. His works are numerous, and embrace philosophy, history and theology.

GEMS. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

GENARCHES (gen'ar-chez), a term in Greek hierology or sacred literature which designates the first of a race, for example, Adam.

GENEALOGIES (gen-e-al'o-geez), formed of two Greek words, and signifying race accounts, or family registers, tracing the descent and ancestral relationships of particular tribes and families. The Jewish people, and the line of the human family out of which they sprung, from the remotest times paid special attention to the preservation of such registers. It had undoubtedly a divine authorization. The purpose of God in respect to the higher interests of mankind took from the first a specific family direction, and it was of importance that at least the more prominent links in the successive generations of those more nearly connected with the development of that purpose should be preserved to future times. The manifestations of the divine goodness were never indeed absolutely confined to any single branch of the human family, nor, even when they assumed most of a partial and restrictive aspect, were members of other tribes excluded from partaking in them, if only they showed themselves ready to fall in with the terms on which the way was laid open to the favor and fellowship of Heaven. But the imperfections that inevitably attached, in the earlier stages of the world's history, first to the organization of human society, and then to the means and agencies connected with the divine plan, led by a kind of necessity to the employment of particular races, through which, as the more select channels of working, the truth of God should be more especially dis-osophy against the Aristotelian, and of the Greek Church against that of Rome. At the Council of Florence, 1438, his zeal and eloquence gained him the admiration of all, and he made many converts. He contributed to the revival of Platonism, in Italy; and Cosmo de Medici, his constant auditor, founded at Florence an academy for the study of the Platonic philosophy. He died in his native closed and the testimony for it more faithfully maintained. It is the genealogy of mankind in its bearing on this higher interest, reaching from Adam through the line of Seth to Noah, then from Noah through the line of Shem to Abraham, then again from Abraham through the lines of Isaac, Jacob, Judah and David to Christ, over which the providence of God has most carefully watched, and which it has most fully exhibited in the historical records of Scripture. In other branches of the human family, and especially those more nearly related to the one in question, not a few genealogical tables are also given, but they have no more than a subsidiary place; and the chief interest and importance of the genealogical matter of Scripture hangs around the great central chain which connects Adam with Christ, and indeed with that more select portion of it which stretches from the call of Abraham to the birth of the Son of Mary. Nothing of spiritual moment now depends upon any question of genealogy except what lies along the track of this definite line.

It was different, however, under the old covenant. From the period of its establishment the people of God were obliged, not as a matter of family pride, or for the sake of a merely antiquarian interest, but for the determination of important questions of civil and religious polity, to keep with the utmost care and regularity their genealogical tables. It was these chiefly that preserved the landmarks between tribe and tribe, family and family, and regulated the succession to inheritances of land, so as usually to render unnecessary the specific destination of property or the framing of wills. It was on these, as connected with the family of Aaron, that the right of any individual or family turned to enter into the sacred and honorable functions of the priesthood; and when, as happened on the return from Babylon, any persons claiming this distinction were found unable to produce the proper register establishing their descent from Aaron they were "removed, as polluted, from the priesthood," Ezra ii. 62. The settlement of the kingdom in the house of David imposed of course a similar necessity for scrupulous exactness upon the members of that house, in order to secure their title to any participation in its honors. So in regard to the priesthood, that most exact tables of their descent and family connections had been kept from the time of their original appointment, and that not in Judea only, but in all the places of their sojourn, the members of the priesthood were at the utmost pains to have their family registers kept, so as to be above all suspicion. Josephus mentions these things respecting the families of the priesthood, because his own priestly origin and his immediate purpose in writing led him to refer more especially to them; but such exactness and careful preservation in respect to the priestly families necessarily implied a great degree of the same in respect to the families of the other tribes. As the keeping of correct genealogical tables had a national interest, so it may be said to have formed a national peculiarity.

A report, indeed, is mentioned, in a fragment of Africanus, preserved by Eusebius, that the public registers had been destroyed by Herod, who was conscious of the infelicity of his Idumean origin, and sought thereby to prevent the possibility of its detection. But Africanus himself seems to have been doubtful of the truth of this report, for, after noticing it, he adds the qualifying clause, "whether the matter actually stood thus or not;" and Valesius, the learned editor of Eusebius, in his notes on the passage, justly rejects the story as altogether at variance with the known facts of history. There can be no reasonable doubt that, down to the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, the genealogical registers of the Jews were kept with singular care, and with sufficient accuracy to determine all ordinary questions of relationship and descent, but after that event they cease to be heard of. The fearful catastrophe which finally destroyed the place and nation of the Jews, also scattered their genealogies to the winds—fused family and family, tribe and tribe together; so that it henceforth became impossible to tell, if there were an altar, who had a right to minister at it, or if a throne, who stood in the line of succession to its honors. The hand of God was as visibly in this as in the general overthrow of the old typical constitution of things; and if a judicial blindness were not upon the minds of the Jews, they would see, in the loss of their genealogies and the distinctions there-with connected, the clear sign of the abolition of their ancient polity, and the necessity of looking for a fulfillment of their prophecies of a different kind from what they had been expecting.

The relation of the genealogies of Scripture to questions of chronology is somewhat variable, and even where it seems most precise requires to be applied with caution. That some of the earlier lists have been framed with a reference to this use—those, for example, of Gen. v., and again of Gen. xi. 10-26—there can be no reasonable doubt; for, specifying, as they do, the exact year of each father's life when the son was born, through whom the line of descent was to be transmitted, they necessarily provide the materials of a chronological reckoning in respect to the priesthood, that most exact tables of their descent and family connections had been kept from the time of their original appointment, and that not in Judea only, but in all the places of their sojourn, the members of the priesthood were at the utmost pains to have their family registers kept, so as to be above all suspicion. Josephus mentions these things respecting the families of the priesthood, because his own priestly origin and his immediate purpose in writing led him to refer more especially to them; but such exactness and careful preservation in respect to the priestly families necessarily implied a great degree of the same in respect to the families of the other tribes. As the keeping of correct genealogical

ing. But in the great mass of genealogical registers this is not done; we have merely a certain number of generations given, and, on the supposition of there being no blanks in these, for the sake of brevity or any other purpose, we can only form an estimate of the entire period by striking an average for the successive generations. We cannot, however, be always sure that every link in the chain is given; and a degree of doubt or uncertainty as to the number, not less than the length, of the several generations must render chronological calculations founded on such a basis in many cases problematical. Thus, the register of Levi, in Ex. vi. 16-20, gives only two links between Levi and Moses—Levi, Kohath, Amram, Moses; and it has been frequently argued on this ground that the children of Israel could not have been in Egypt at the utmost above the half of the four hundred and thirty years mentioned in Ex. xii. 40, as the term of their sojourning. Such also is the

in perfect accordance with other known instances of abbreviation, as in the priestly register of Ezra, ch. vii. 1-5, compared with 1 Chr. vi. 4-15, there is only one Azariah given, where the other has two, and several intervening generations are dropped out. Genealogies of this description appear to have been formed, not so much with the view of furnishing definite measurements of time as of noting the ramifications of tribal and family relationships, and certifying them in a manner from one age to another. For not this, but the former, was the matter of chief moment, as regarded the purpose and arrangements of the old economy, and to apply such family registers to the determination of historical epochs in a chronological respect, especially if in doing so some violence has to be done to the facts recorded in the history, is to turn them to a purpose for which they were not immediately destined, and which they may be incapable of serving. We know for striking a probable average for each generation, the whole period from the settlement in Canaan to the commencement of David's reign is computed at 236 or 240 years—scarcely the half of the common reckoning from the historical data in the book of Judges. The chronology of the period is undoubtedly involved in some obscurity, and it is possible that the briefer period in question may be as near the actual time as the longer. But the genealogy of the house of David is a very narrow and uncertain basis on which to rest it, for here also several names may have been omitted—a supposition which appears quite probable, notwithstanding what Lord A. Hervey says to the contrary, by the much greater length of the genealogies of the house of Levi, which for much about the same period exhibit nearly double the number—seven between Phinehas and Zadok, and still more by the line of Gershom, 1 Chr. vi. It seems, therefore, rash to press a particular genealogy as alone entitled, in such a case, to be regarded, and still more so when this, of necessity, carries along with it a disparagement of the historical correctness of some of the narratives in Judges. See JUDGES, also JABIN.

Besides the tendency to practice abbreviation in the genealogical lists, the peculiar regard sometimes manifested in their construction to specific aims requires to be taken into account, in order to guard against improper deductions from them. No more is the strictly historical than the chronological element always made the ruling principle of their formation, for in not a few of them marked respect was had to the mishpachoth or family clans under which the offspring of each tribe ranged themselves, and in others a regard to specific numbers exercised a determining influence. For example, in the Levitical genealogy already referred to in Ex. vi., four sons of Kohath are mentioned—Amram, Izhar, Hebron, Uzziel; then follow the sons of three of these, while Hebron is dropped out, as if he had died without issue. But in 2 Chr. xxiii. we find no fewer than four sons ascribed to him; so that it must have been from some specific reason—in all probability because no distinct family sprung from him as its head—that Hebron has no offspring connected with his name in the earlier genealogy. An anomaly of nearly the reverse kind exists in the case of his brother Izhar, for while three sons are ascribed to him in Exodus, in the table of Chronicles there is only one, and he apparently different from any of the three. Such things clearly show that it was often not intended in particular genealogies to give a complete list of the descendants in that line, nor perhaps farther than was required to mark the formation of distinct families; whence calculations as to increase of population founded on those tables, and proceeding on the supposition of their including all the male offspring, are entitled to no confidence; they are based on insufficient data, and turn the genealogical registers to an account for which they were not framed. And the same doubtless may hold in other directions, as when they were constructed with a specific regard to the significance or convenience of certain numbers. A regard of this sort plays a prominent part, as will be more particularly noticed below, in our Lord's genealogy according to Matthew, affecting it in the way of what seems to us, viewing the matter in a simply historical aspect, arbitrary omissions and abridgments. It does so yet more peculiarly in the genealogy of Jacob's family in Gen. xvi., where, for the purpose of making out the seven times ten—the combined multiple of the symbols of sacred-view taken of the matter in this work in the article CHRONOLOGY. It is connected, however, as is there admitted, with serious difficulties; such, indeed, as appear almost insuperable, when placed alongside other things connected with the same table. Tiele, in his "Chronology of the Old Testament," thus states them: "According to Num. iii. 27, the Kohathites were divided in Moses' time into four families, Amramites, Jehezarites, Hebronites and Ussielites, which together composed 8600 men and boys (women and girls not being reckoned). The fourth part, or about 2150 men and boys, would fall to the Amramites. Moses himself had only two sons. If, therefore, Amram, the son of Kohath, the father of the Amramites, were identical with Amram the father of Moses, Moses must have had 2147 brothers and brothers' sons; but, as this is an impossible supposition, it must be admitted as proved that Amram the son of Kohath was not the father of Moses, but that between him and his descendant of the same name a considerable number of generations has been dropped out." Such, at least, is one solution of the difficulty, and one certain that the table noticed above in Ezra vii. would be misapplied if so used; we know also that such would be the case with the table in Matt. i., in which, though divided into three fourteens, the second certainly omits three names in order to exhibit the requisite number, and the third probably omits still more (as may be inferred by a comparison with the corresponding portion of St. Luke's table; see below). There is no reason known to us why it may not have been so in other instances.

What some have done with the genealogy of Levi in reference to the sojourn in Egypt, has been done by others—in particular by Lord Arthur Hervey, in his treatise (admirable in many respects) on the genealogies of our Lord—with that of Nachson, of the tribe of Judah, in the book of Ruth. Nachson was the representative of the tribe, in the line of Pharez, at the time of the exodus, and betwixt him and David, in the table referred to, Ruth iv. 18, 23, there are just four intervening links—Salmon (who married Rahab), Boaz, Obed, Jesse the father of David. Supposing this to be the entire line of succession, and ness and completeness—Jacob is counted among his own family (reckoned with the sons of Leah); and two grandsons of Judah (Hezron and Hamul), and all Benjamin's ten sons, are contemplated as among the original settlers with Jacob in Egypt, though neither the two former, nor many of the latter, could be born till some time after the descent thither. The persons mentioned, with only an exception or two, which probably arose from subsequent changes, became heads of families (computable in Num. xxvi.); and the settling down for the Egyptian sojourn only appeared complete when these came into existence and made up the ideal number seventy. They have therefore a place in the genealogy which, along with its general historic aim, coupled the specific design of preserving a memorial of the other circumstances referred to. Such a regard to numbers and family distinctions may appear to us unnatural; it may seem to want exactness, or, as has been recently alleged, to violate historical verity; but the real question is, whether it did not exist, having certain ends to serve for the time then being which might otherwise have been lost? For if so, then it is as much our duty to consider it, and make reasonable allowance for it, as to make account of the idioms of language and forms of expression which are peculiar to the original records of Scripture. It is only through such knowledge and consideration that we get at the real purport and proper bearing of their contents.

If the principles now briefly indicated respecting the Old Testament genealogies are rightly apprehended and applied, no difficulty need be experienced on the general subject, nor will hasty and groundless deductions be raised on them. For the individual peculiarities and occasional corruptions found in connection with some of them we must refer to the particular names in connection with which they occur, and to the work of Lord Arthur Hervey already mentioned.

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.—The question of chief moment, as regards the substance of the genealogies in relation generally to the interests of truth and righteousness, is the bearing they have upon the person of Jesus Christ, whether in reality he was, after the flesh, of the house and lineage of David. The word of prophecy declared he should be this; do the genealogies extant prove that he actually was so? On this point we have two genealogies to appeal to, preserved respectively by the evangelists Matthew and Luke, and each produced for the purpose of bearing evidence to the Davidic descent of our Lord's human nature; but this they accompany with certain marked peculiarities, and even some startling difficulties, which from an early period have exercised the ingenuity of interpreters and to unbelievers have often afforded occasions of assault.

1. One of these is common to both genealogies, and consists in this, that they both apparently give the descent of Jesus through Joseph, who was only his reputed father, not through Mary, who was his sole human parent. This has not always been admitted; and a very common, in itself plausible view of the subject, and one that, if it were fairly tenable, would afford a ready solution of several difficulties, has been to regard the one genealogy (Matthew's) as that of our Lord's legal connection with the house of David through Joseph, who in the eye of the law was his father, and the other (Luke's) as that of his real parentage and descent through Mary. But the words of the latter evangelist cannot by a natural construction be made to yield this sense. Their precise rendering is, "And Jesus himself was about thirty years of age, when beginning—viz. to appear in public, or to enter on his mission—being, as was supposed, the son of Joseph, who was the son of Heli," etc. The plain and natural meaning of the passage evidently is, that by the common reckoning Joseph was the father of Jesus, and that this Joseph was the son of Heli, and so on. The clause as was supposed, goes no further than to intimate that it was but a reputed connection, the filial relationship of Jesus to Joseph; it indicates nothing as to there being any other link of connection with the remoter progenitor Heli; for the Heli is manifestly in apposition with Joseph; and what Joseph was to Jesus, Heli also must have been, only a stage farther removed. Had the meaning been, that Jesus was the reputed son of Joseph, but in reality the son of Heli—namely, his grandson, through Mary the daughter of Heli—the construction in the original would have needed to be different. And in further proof of this, none of the ancients appear to have had the idea, that the words of St. Luke could have had any meaning but that given above; they never seem to have imagined that the evangelist meant to mark the relationship of Mary, and not of Joseph, to Heli.

This therefore must be regarded as one of the peculiarities in the two tables; while both evangelists record the miraculous conception of Jesus, and consequently disclaim the real parentage of Joseph; yet when exhibiting the genealogical connection of Jesus with the house of David, they deem it enough to present the lineage of Joseph. How should this have been? Did Christ's legal connection with Joseph, as the husband of Mary, of itself determine the question of his relationship to the house of David, and constitute him in truth a member of that house? So it may fairly seem to be indicated by the prominence which is given to the royal pedigree of Joseph. The evangelists not only content themselves with exhibiting Joseph's genealogy; but when the angel goes to Mary to announce the miraculous conception, he is represented as going to a "virgin espoused to a man, whose name was Joseph, of the house of David," Luke i. 27. When the same or another angel is sent to Joseph to instruct him to consummate his marriage with Mary, he is saluted "Joseph, thou son of David," Matt. i. 20; and, still again, when the circumstances are narrated which led to the confinement of Mary at Bethlehem, it is said that they went thither because, not she, but Joseph, was "of the house and lineage of David," Luke ii. 4. On this ground Augustine threw out the idea, that simply from Joseph's relation to Mary by the marriage-tie, he was Christ's father, Christ being born of his wife in a manner far more intimate than if he had been adopted from another family. "And on this account," he adds, "if any one should be able to prove that Mary had no blood-relationship to David, it was competent to hold that Christ was the son of David, for the very same reason that Joseph was entitled to be called his father." There is undoubtedly an element of truth in this view. Jesus was the fruit of Joseph's marriage with Mary, not indeed as the offspring of his body, but as God's special gift to him through his proper spouse. In every case, children are God's gifts to men; and if for high reasons God should dispense with the ordinary agency in bringing them forth, and substitute one extraordinary and miraculous, still the relationship in its essential characteristics would not be altered—the offspring being brought forth in the way of God's appointment, in lawful wedlock, would still be entitled to the proper filial relationship to the head of the family. Thus Jesus was God's gift to Joseph through his proper spouse; and Jesus being born in a Davidic family, the son by special dispensation of a Davidic person, he was in the eye both of human and divine law himself of the house of David.

Such, apparently, was the view taken of the matter by the evangelist Matthew, perhaps by both the evangelists. But it by no means excludes, it might possibly rather imply and take for granted, the relationship of Mary to the house of David. The Jews of the apostolic age, we can conceive, might admit her relationship, or make no question about it; but since the wife's tribal or family connection was properly determined by that of her husband, they might demand satisfaction as to Joseph's right to be reckoned of David's lineage. In truth, Mary's personal relationship to the same house is taken for granted by the angel who first announces to her the high destination of the son she was to be honored to bring forth, when he says, "And the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David," Luke i. 32; an announcement which was made before she could know that her betrothal to Joseph was to be carried into effect, and while still she alone could be thought of as supplying an earthly link of connection with a particular family. It is most probable that her genealogy coalesced at a comparatively short distance back with that of Joseph—a circumstance which, if it existed, could scarcely fail to be known generally at the time. At all events, the statements made upon the subject by the two evangelists seem to proceed upon the ground, that the relationship to the house of David belonged in common to Joseph and Mary, and there is no evidence that the fact was ever questioned by the Jews.

2. But other peculiarities, and, on the supposition of both evangelists having given the genealogical descent of Joseph, somewhat perplexing difficulties attach to the two tables. For they differ even in regard to one of the nearest links of the chain—the father of Joseph, who appears as Heli in Luke, and Jacob in Matthew. And in the whole period between Joseph and David they have but two or three names in common. This will be more readily seen from the following table, presenting this portion of the two genealogies:

MATTHEW.	LUKE.
1. Jeconiah.	1. Neri.
2. Salathiel.	2. Salathiel.
3. Zerubabel.	3. Zerubabel.
4. Abiud.	4. Rhesa.
5. Eliakim.	5. Joanna.
6. Azor.	6. Juda.
7. Sadoc.	7. Semei.
8. Achim.	8. Mattathias.
9. Eliud.	9. Maath.
10. Eleazar.	10. Nagge.
11. Matthan.	11. Esli.
12. Jacob.	12. Naum.
13. Joseph.	13. Amos.
14. Joseph.	14. Mattathias.
	15. Joseph.
	16. Janna.
	17. Melchi.
	18. Levi.
	19. Matthat.
	20. Heli.
	21. Joseph.
	22. Jesus.

Various schemes have been devised to account for this serious discrepancy, and reconcile it with the truth of things; but none was so readily adopted, or met with such general and continued acceptance, as that of Africanus, which proceeded on the principle that the table of Matthew indicates a stricter bond of relationship than that of Luke—that in announcing what son each father in succession begot, the former gives the real or natural descent; while the latter, in naming successively the son of such an one as his father, included sons by adoption or relatives of the second and third degree; that, consequently, in the first evangelist we have the actual descent of Jesus from David; in the third, only the legal succession. It is strange that this explanation should ever have appeared satisfactory, and especially that it should have so long held its place, since the principle on which it is based is manifestly not in accordance with the facts of the case. The Jews made no such distinction in their genealogies as is implied in the explanation. It was all one whether these took the form of representing what son a father begot, or who stood in the relation of father to a son. In both cases alike they were wont to include a more distant, as well as a nearer, degree of affinity. In the table itself of St. Matthew, we find no fewer than three links in the chain omitted: Joram is said to have begotten Ozias, or Uzziah, although in reality he begat Ahaziah; and Ahaziah begat Jehoash, and Jehoash begat Uzziah. And instances are found in the Old Testament genealogies of persons being said to have begotten whole races and districts of people, merely because these sprung from them, Gen. x. 13, 14; 1 Chr. ii. 50.

The proper solution of the difficulty under consideration appears to be that which was proposed by Calvin and some others about his time, but was first distinctly set forth and vindicated by Grotius. "For myself," he says, "guided, if I mistake not, by very clear and not fanciful grounds, I am fully convinced that Matthew has respect to the legal succession. For he recounts those who obtained the kingdom without the intermixture of a private name. Then, he says, Jeconiah begot Salathiel. But it was not doubtfully intimated by Jeremiah, under the command of God, that Jeconiah, on account of his sins, should die without children, ch. xxii. 30. Wherefore, since Luke assigns Neri as the father of the same Salathiel, a private man, while Matthew gives Jeconiah, the most obvious inference is, that Luke has respect to the right of consanguinity, Matthew to the right of succession, and especially the right to the throne—which right, since Jeconiah died without issue, devolved by legitimate order upon Salathiel, the head of the family of Nathan; for among the sons of David, Nathan came next to Solomon." On every account is but a variation of the Matthat of Luke, there can be little doubt. Here the representative of the lineal appears once more to have become also the representative of the legal succession. Then, on the supposition of Matthat and Matthan being substantially one, Jacob, the son of Matthan, and Heli, the son of Matthat, must have been brothers; and if Jacob, the elder, had daughters, but no son, then Heli's son would come to be Jacob's heir-atthis seems to be the natural and proper mode of explanation. It first of all presents a sufficient reason for the exhibition of a second genealogical table; for, as we plainly have the royal successions in Matthew's table, it could only be, if these did not in some instances accord with the actual parentage of the line which connected Jesus with David, that there could have been any temptation or conceivable reason for presenting another. Had Joseph's direct line of ancestors been all one with Solomon's direct or legal successors, this had been clearly the natural, as well as the most honorable, line of descent; no other had been needed, nor could it scarcely have been thought of. But if there were certain breaks in the line, then it came to be of some importance to know how the actual pedigree ran. It is also a confirmation of this view, that immediately after Jeconiah, when it is supposed Solomon's direct line was first broken, the two tables coincide—the names of Salathiel and Zerubabel, the two next in order, being found in both. These would naturally be brought in from Nathan's line to take the place of Solomon's, which had come to a close in Jeconiah, of whom it was declared that "he must be written childless; for no man of his seed should prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah." Whether Jeconiah might leave any children behind him or not, this authoritative utterance could scarcely be regarded otherwise than as a sentence of exclusion from all right to the honors of the kingdom; and Salathiel, the eldest in the next line of descent from David, would naturally be substituted by those who had the charge of the registers.

It would appear that after Zerubabel there was at least another break in the direct line of descent; so that the tables again diverge till we come to the third from Joseph; for that the Matthan of Matthew ated. It is wanting in the Vatican copy of the Septuagint, but is in the other extant copies, though omitted by the same copies in the corresponding tables of 1 Chronicles i. It is wanting also in the Samaritan Pentateuch, as well as the Hebrew, and seems to have been unknown to Josephus. Nor does it appear to have been in the copies of the Septuagint used by Theophilus of Antioch in the second century, by Africanus in the third, or by Eusebius in the fourth. Jerome, in his annotations on the chapter, takes no notice of it, but Augustine had it both in his copy of the Septuagint and his copy of St. Luke. There can be little doubt that the name has somehow crept in by mistake, but whether into the Septuagint first, and then into the copies of Luke, or vice versa, cannot be determined. The probability is that it first appeared in the Septuagint. See CAINAN.

4. A peculiarity in Matthew's table—its division into three fourteens—is in perfect accordance with a very common practice among the Jews respecting genealogies. They occasionally resorted to artificial arrangements for the purpose of aiding the memory. Lightfoot gives various instances in his "Hor. Heb." on Matt. i., and we have the following by Schoettgen from the Synopsis of Sohar: "From Abraham to Solomon there are fifteen generations, and at that time the moon was full; from Solomon to Zedekiah there are again fifteen generations, and at that time the moon was down, and Zedekiah's eyes were put out." Arrangements of this sort would naturally lead to abbreviations of some of the divisions; as here, in the second portion of Matthew's table, three links, as already noticed, are left out, to restrict the number to fourteen. It is very probable, also, that some were omitted in the last division, since for the fourteen of Matthew we have twenty-two in Luke. But such omissions were constantly made in the genealogical tables, even when there was no such purpose to be served by it, and was indeed rendered necessary by the inconvenient length to which the tables, when kept in full, often extended. It may be added, that to make out the second fourteen either David must be counted again, made the first of the second, as he had been the last of the first division, or after Josiah there must have dropped out a name, that of Jehoiakim. This name is given in a few MSS. in the form Jēōakeim, and whether it should be in the text or not, certainly Josiah did beget Jehoiakim, and Jehoiakim Jeconiah; so that, if the existing text is correct, we have again the intentional omission of a link in the chain.

5. A still further peculiarity may be noticed in the table of Matthew, which may be regarded as an additional proof of the respect had to system in its construction. It is the mention of certain female names in it, which are altogether five—Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Uriah's wife (Bathsheba), closing with Mary, the wife of Joseph; all, it will be observed, out of the usual course—abnormal as regards the production of a chosen seed, and striking monuments in their respective generations of the grace and power of God. By much the most illustrious instance of this was Mary, chosen, though a fallen, sinful woman, to be the mother of that holy One who should be called the Son of the Highest. And as types of the virgin mother in this respect—types of the more remarkable and significant kind—the evangelist brings into remembrance, as he passes along the line of preceding generations, those ancestral mothers in Israel, who, from their natural relationship or their previous history, might justly be regarded as wonders in Israel, and as such prognostics of the amazing phenomenon realized in the person of the Virgin. The consummating wonder might thus seem abated, as it had in part been anticipated, by what had gone before it.

GENEBRARD (zhay-nay-brar'), GILBERT, a learned French divine, born at Riom, in 1537, and in 1563, became professor of Hebrew in the Royal College of Paris. He was an earnest partisan of the league against Henry IV. In 1592, the pope made him archbishop of Aix. He was the author of a controversial treatise, in which he maintained that bishops should be elected by the clergy and people, instead of being nominated by the king. For this he was banished. He also published an edition of the works of Origen, a "Commentary on the Psalms," and some works on Hebrew, and made translations of various Rabbinical works, and of Josephus' History, to which he added notes and chronological tables. He died in 1597.

GENERAL (jen'e-ral), 1 Chr. xxiv. 34. See ARMY, CAPTAIN. The captain of the host or commander-in-chief is here intended.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY, the term used to designate the highest ecclesiastical court of the Presbyterian Church. Ministers and elders sit, deliberate and vote as members of the Assembly, and their numbers are regulated by the laws which obtain in the different churches.

GENERAL BAPTISTS, the name of those Baptists in England who hold the tenets of Arminius on redemption and grace. See BAPTISTS, FREEWILL, p. 274.

GENERAL CONFERENCE, the name of the highest judicature of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Below it are the Quarterly and Annual Conferences. The "General Conference" is composed of one member for every twenty-seven members of each Annual Conference, appointed either by seniority or discretion. It meets every four years, and has full power "to make rules and regulations for the Church," subject to certain limitations known as "constitutional restrictions."

GENERAL CONFESSION, the confession of sins made by a congregation or a number of persons assembled together, as in morning or evening prayer.

GENERAL COUNCIL. See COUNCIL.

GENERAL OF AN ORDER. In the Church of Rome the several communities, such as monasteries or other houses, are governed by their respective heads or rulers, and over them in their aggregated capacity there is a "general." 1. Individual communities are ruled over by abbots, priors or other officers. 2. Provincials have authority over the monasteries or convents of a province, and a "province" usually comprehends the "houses" in a nation. 3. The general has authority over all the members and all the officers of the order. The chapters of the different orders elect their generals, and the tenure of office is usually for three years, except in the case of the Jesuits, and among them the general rules for life. In all cases the person elected by the general chapter to the office of general of an order must be confirmed by the pope.

GENERATION (jen-e-ray'sh'un). This word is used in at least three shades of meaning in Scripture, which, however, are all closely related, and naturally grow out of each other. (1.) The radical meaning is that of the production of offspring, viewed objectively—offspring as produced, or related to the parent. In this sense it is applied to the offspring of an individual, or successions of offspring noted in a genealogical table. Such a table was called by the Hebrews sepher toledoth, or Greek biblos geneoseōs, book of generations, Gen. v. 1; xxxvii. 2; Matt. i. 1, 17, etc.—that is, lists of successive lines of descent from father to son. (2.) Then it is used as a mark of time, the successive lines of offspring being taken to represent so many stages in the world's history. Differing as the intervals do in this respect from one stage to another, generation could never be intended to mark a very definite period, and it must be understood with some latitude. But people in such cases readily come to strike a sort of average in their minds, and as so many successive generations are observed to fill up the interval between two or more notable points of history, so they take generation to signify much about that space of time. Thus Herodotus says, "Three generations of men make an hundred years." The term is commonly used more indefinitely in Scripture, much in the sense of time, or successive divisions of time, as in Acts xv. 21, "from ancient generations," or from times of old; xiv. 16, "in bygone generations," or times that have gone past; Luke i. 20, "to generations of generations," or to periods of periods, or one age after another. (3.) Finally, the word is sometimes taken more concretely to denote the persons actually constituting a specific generation as exponents of its state or character. In this sense our Lord speaks of "this generation," or "an adulterous and sinful generation," "an unbelieving generation," Matt. xi. 16; xii. 39; xvii. 17, etc., and the apostles of an "evil" or "froward generation," Acts ii. 40; Phil. ii. 15. In all such expressions the existing races are viewed, not in regard to their paternity, or in the light of offspring, nor as filling up a certain space of time, but as possessing and exhibiting distinctive marks of character; they are identified with their age or time as its concrete representatives. In the same sense our Lord speaks of the children of this world being "in respect to their own generation" (for so the words should be rendered, Luke xvi. 8), wiser than the children of light—i. e., in dealing with men of their own stamp and character they manifest a wisdom which is but rarely exhibited by God's people in regard to the higher interests with which they have more especially to do. It has been maintained by some, in particular by Stier, that in one passage—"Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled," Matt. xxiv. 34—our Lord identified generation with the Jewish race, and meant, in the passage referred to, that the Jews as a people should not be extinct, they should still have a separate and outstanding existence when the prophetic outline given by our Lord should have reached its complete fulfillment. But this is a very forced explanation, and not a single example can be produced of an entirely similar use of the word. Whatever difficulties may hang around the interpretation of that part of Christ's discourse, it is impossible to understand by the generation that was not to pass away anything but the existing race of men living at the time when the word was spoken.

GENESIS, THE BOOK OF. See PENTATEUCH.

GENESIUS (ge-ne'zh'us), SAINT, according to a marvelous but doubtful story, was a comedian in the time of Dioclesian, and while playing before the emperor the part of a candidate for Christian baptism, clothed in the robe of a catechumen, he was suddenly converted by the Holy Spirit. Neither the terrors of the scourge, nor the torture, could shake his faith, and he suffered decapitation in adherence to his convictions. His death took place, according to Tillemont and Ruinart, A. D. 286; according to Baronius and Fleury, A. D. 203. His day in the Romish calendar is August 25.

GENET (zheh-nay'), FRANÇOIS, a French theologian and casuist, born at Avignon, in 1640. At the desire of the bishop of Grenoble, he drew up a special system of morality. It received the approbation of the prelates of France and Italy, and was published under the title of "Moral Theology, or a Solution of Cases of Conscience, agreeably to the Bible, the Canons and the Holy Fathers." The pope made him bishop of Vaison, but he got into trouble with Louis XIV. with reference to a religious society the king wished to suppress, and was imprisoned. He escaped, and in attempting to cross a torrent, was drowned, 1707.

GENET (jen'et). The common genet is found in Africa, in the South of Europe, and generally in countries surrounding the Mediterranean. It frequents the borders of streams and rivers, especially near their source. It is naturally fierce, but it is easily domesticated; and when tamed, the genet is kept for destroying rats and mice. The animal is slim and graceful, the neck long, and the head narrow, with a pointed muzzle. The color is a grayish-yellow, with black lines on the back, and the long tail is banded with black and white.

GENEVA BIBLE. See VERSIONS.

GENEVE (zhen-ayv'), ROBERT DE, was the third son of Amadeas V. of Geneva, born in 1342. He embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and rose to the cardinalate in 1371. During the time of Gregory XI. he displayed great political and military ability, especially in compelling Northern Italy to submit to the States of the Church. On the death of Gregory, he was declared pope, under the title of Clement VII., in opposition to Prignani, who took the name of Urban VI. (See the notice, under CLEMENT, of the second anti-pope of this name.) In the conflict between these rivals most of the sovereigns of Europe ranged themselves on one side or the other. Nor did the death of Urban, in 1389, terminate the contest. At length a general council was called, to whose decision Robert was in vain solicited to submit, when his sudden death, in 1394, ended the scandal, and Pedro de Luna was elected to the papal chair as Benedict XIII.

GENEVIEVE (jen-eh-veev'; French, zhen-ve-ayv'), SAINT, the patron saint of the city of Paris. She was born at Nanterre, France, in 422. At the instance of St. Germanus (see GERMANUS, SAINT, OF AUXERRE), she devoted herself, from the early age of fifteen years, to a life of virginity and active benevolence. Various miracles are ascribed to her, but what elevated her to the patronage of Paris was her gift of prophecy. She incurred the rage of the inhabitants, who were scarcely restrained by Germanus from killing her, for having predicted the invasion of Gaul by the barbarians of Asia, as revealed to her in a vision. Two years after there came the startling news that Attila and the Huns were marching on Paris. The affrighted inhabitants were on the point of abandoning the city, when Genevieve interposed, exhorted them to remain firm and promised that Attila should never enter Paris. Whether struck with the determination of the people or not, the ravager did withdraw, and the inhabitants, spared from desolation, put themselves under the protection of St. Genevieve. It is claimed for her that she was the means of converting Clovis, king of the Franks, who, being a pagan, became a professed Christian in 496, though possibly his marriage with the good princess Clotilda had more to do with his conversion than St. Genevieve. It was not until 1852 that a church in Paris was dedicated to her. In Suffolk, England, the churches of Euston and Fornham bear her name.

GENEVIEVE, SAINT, DAUGHTERS OF. See NUNS.

GENEVIEVE, SAINT, CANONS OF. See MONKS.

GENNADIUS (gen-nah'de-us). 1. Patriarch of Constantinople in 458 to 471, an eloquent and wise prelate. He reformed the abuses which had crept in among his clergy, and held a synod, the object of which was to settle the disputes that divided the Eastern Church. His death, in 471, is said to have been caused by the appearance of a spirit announcing the devastation of the Church. 2. Patriarch of Constantinople, in 1453 to 1458, had acquired a great reputation as GEORGIUS SCHOLARIUS for his knowledge of philosophy and law, and corresponded with some of the learned men of Italy. He accompanied the emperor John Paleologus to the Council of Ferrara, where he delivered three eloquent orations in favor of union with the Western Church, though, under the influence of Mark of Ephesus, he changed sides, and wrote against the union. At the time of the council he was a layman, but twelve years after he embraced the ecclesiastical life, and entered a monastery. After the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, he was, in 1453, elected patriarch of that city. He was kindly treated by the sultan Mohammed, and delivered before him an apology for the Christian faith. He abdicated the patriarchate in 1458, and died in 1460.

3. OF MARSEILLES. A learned ecclesiastic and copious writer against heresies in general and the Nestorian and Pelagian in particular. The only works of his which we have are one on "Ecclesiastical Writers," which is a valuable sequel to St. Jerome's "Book of Illustrious Men," and a treatise on "Church Doctrines," which the Benedictines have, without authority, inserted among the works of St. Augustine. He died in 492.

GENNESAR (gen'ne-sar), THE WATER OF, 1 Macc. xi. 67, the Lake of Gennesaret.

GENNESARET (gen-nez'za-ret). See TIBERIAS.

GENNESARET, THE LAND OF (see TIBERIAS), a small district of Galilee lying on the western shore of the Lake of Tiberias, near Capernaum. Its situation is indicated by the narratives in John vi. 15-25 and Mark vi. 45-56. Jesus sent away the disciples from the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee to Capernaum. When on their passage he came up with them, walking on the sea. They land about dawn (the fourth watch) on the plain of Gennesaret; and that morning the multitudes follow him in boats to Capernaum, and find him there. Josephus gives so graphic a description of Gennesaret that we have no difficulty in identifying it, though the name has long disappeared: "Extending along the lake of Galilee, and bearing also its name, lies a tract of country admirable both for its natural properties and its beauty. Such is the fertility of the soil that it rejects no plant, and accordingly all are here cultivated by the husbandman, for so genial is the air that it suits every variety. The walnut grows luxuriantly, together with the palm; and here there are figs and olives. It produces the grape and the fig during ten months without intermission, while the other varieties ripen the year round; for besides being favored by the genial temperature of the air, it is irrigated by a highly fertilizing spring called Capernaum. The tract extending along the shore of the lake which bears its name is thirty furlongs in length and twenty in breadth."

On the west side of the Sea of Galilee is a crescent-shaped plain, extending along the shore from the cliffs at Ain-et-Tin, the site of Capernaum, upon the north, to the hill behind Mejdal, the ancient Magdala, on the south, a distance of about three geographical miles. Its greatest breadth is nearly two. It is shut in by a semicircle of steep and rugged hills. Its soil is of extraordinary fertility, but only small patches of it here and there are cultivated. The rest is covered with tangled thickets of lote trees, oleanders, dwarf palms and gigantic thistles and brambles. The melons and cucumbers grown on the plain are still the best and earliest in Palestine. They are always the first in the markets of Damascus, Acre and Beyrout. This may be accounted for by the great depression of the plain, it being almost on the level of the adjoining lake, and thus more than 600 feet below the ocean.

Various conjectures have been made regarding the origin of the name Gennesareth. Some affirm that it is a corruption of the ancient Hebrew Chinnareth, the ch being changed to g, and s inserted by the Chaldee paraphrasts. Others derive the name from gia, "a valley," and natzar, "a flower or shoot;" and it would thus signify "valley of flowers." Others again, and perhaps with more probability, derive it from geni and shar, "the gardens of the prince."

GENNEUS (gen-ne'us), 2 Macc. xii. 2.

GENOVESI (gen-o-vay'ze), ANTONIO, an Italian philosopher and metaphysician, was born at Castiglione in 1712. He read lectures in philosophy at Naples for some time, but at length was attacked by numerous enemies for publishing his work on metaphysics, in which he recommended the works of Galileo, Grotius and Newton, and was accused of substituting philosophic doubt for traditional belief. The king of Naples, however, protected him, and made him professor of political economy and moral philosophy in the Neapolitan University. He was the author of "Elements of Metaphysics," "Philosophical Meditations on Religion and Morality," a "System of Logic," and numerous other works. He died in 1769.

GENTILES (jen'tilez), strictly nations or peoples, but in Hebrew phraseology occupying relatively the same place that barbarians did with the Greeks, only that the distinction in the one case had respect more to religious, in the other to civil and political considerations. Gentiles were all the world besides the Jews, just as the barbarians were all the world besides the Greeks. What rendered the Jews, however, a distinct and honored class was simply their election of God to the place of his peculiar people, by which they became the recognized depositaries of his truth and the consecrated channels of his working among men. Other nations might well enough surpass them in numbers, in extent of territory, in height of civilization or variety of resources; nothing was implied in respect to such things; but in nearness to God, and those honors and advantages which are the more proper signs of his favor and blessing, the Gentiles, even in their most advanced state, stood at an immense distance from the Jews. Still, however, the distinction was only relative and temporary. Believing Gentiles in no age were excluded from sharing in the benefits conferred upon the Jews when they showed themselves willing to enter into the bond of the covenant. And in the very terms of the covenant, as originally made with Abraham and ultimately confirmed with Jacob, it was implied that the distinction was only for a time, that the good it more especially contemplated was for the Gentile as well as for the Jew, and that the Jew could only fulfill his calling by being made a blessing to the Gentile. Practically this came to be in a great measure lost sight of, and the relation between the two parties was chiefly known as one of mutual repugnance and antagonism—as if the interest of the one could only stand with the depression or downfall of the other. In this misunderstanding and perversion the Jews were, of course, chiefly to blame, as they alone had the means of fully apprehending the mind of God on the subject and giving due expression to it; and their carnal folly and infatuation drew along with it a fearful retribution, especially at the last, when, refusing to do the part it behoved them to do to the Gentiles, the Jews as a people were cast off, and the Gentiles brought into their place. By this relative exchange of places the Gentiles are warned to remember by what tenure they hold their position, and are also admonished to do with all zeal and fidelity for the Jews what the Jews have been so severely punished for refusing to do for them, Rom. xi.

GENTILES, COURT OF THE. See TEMPLE.

GENTILIS (jen-te'lis), GIOVANNI VAL-
LENTINO, a Neapolitan, born at Cosenza, in 1520. Having adopted the tenets of Socinus, he had to leave his country, and went to Geneva with the view of propagating his opinions. These, however, brought him into much trouble, and having broken an oath, by which he engaged not to leave without permission, and returning in 1566, he was seized, tried and condemned to be beheaded for having obstinately, and contrary to his oath, attacked the doctrine of the Trinity.

GENTILLET (zhen-te-lay'), INNOCENT, an eminent Protestant, who ably defended his views against both Socinians and Roman Catholics. Among his numerous works, the chief are his "Apology for the French Christians of the Reformed Religion," "A Consideration of the Council of Trent," and "Anti-Socinus."

GENUFLECTENTES (jen-u-flek-ten'tes), a class of catechumens in the early Church called "prostrati" or prostraters, because they were allowed to kneel in church during some part of the liturgy, and to receive the benediction with imposition of hands. Prayers were offered for them while they knelt, and forms of such prayers may be seen in the Apostolical Constitution. This class of pupils were permitted to enter the body of the church, and their place was near the ambo or reading-desk.

GENUFLECTION (jen-u-flek'shun), the bending of the knee in the exercise of prayer.

In the early Church adoration was rendered standing and prayer was offered kneeling, and in time this order was changed in different parts of the Church. Minute directions are given in the Romish Missal on the subject of kneeling at mass. In the Rubrics of the Church of England the people are warned that by kneeling at the communion "no adoration is intended, or ought to be done, either unto the sacramental bread and wine there bodily received, or unto any corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood."

GENUINENESS (jen'u-in-ness). A document is said to be genuine when its text remains as it left the author's hands. Genuineness is therefore lost by additions, omissions or mutilations.

GENUBATH (ge-nu'bath) [theft, if a Hebrew word, but possibly of Egyptian origin], the name of the son of Hadad, born to him in Egypt of his Egyptian wife, 1 Ki. xi. 20. The father left Egypt in order to prosecute his hostile designs against Solomon, but nothing is known of Genubath except that he was weaned by Tahpenes, the queen of Egypt, and brought up in the royal household, as if he had been a son of Pharaoh.

GEOFFREY (jef're). This is the Anglicized form of a name variously spelled in Latin and French, but which is readily recognized in the English. There have been five of the name who are more or less deserving of notice here.

1. [Geoffrey II.] OF ANJOU, who was surnamed MARTEL, a designation of a brave cavalier. He was born in 1007, and died in 1060. Like other princes of his time, he combined religious ardor with a martial spirit, and, moved by the former, founded the abbey of the Trinity at Vendôme, and became a member of it. For upward of six hundred years after his death, his tomb was the object of an annual procession of the canons of St. Laud, by whom he had been viewed as a benefactor.

2. OF AUXERRE (o-sayr'), born 1120, became a pupil of Abelard, was so impressed by hearing St. Bernard preaching that he followed him to the abbey of Clairvaux. For the next thirteen years he was the secretary and companion of St. Bernard, and on his death succeeded him as abbot of Clairvaux; but the brethren not liking his strict discipline, he soon withdrew. He tried to act as peacemaker between the pope and the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, and also between Henry II. of England and the primate Thomas à Becket. He died about 1180.

3. OF BEAULIEU (bo-lew'), a distinguished French hagiographer, a member of the order of Dominicans. For twenty years he filled the office of almoner and confessor to Louis IX. He accompanied him in his crusade, shared his captivity, returned with him to France and attended him on his deathbed. By the order of Gregory X. he wrote a life of this canonized king. It is written from a religious point of view, and is therefore interesting, but as an historical document is of no value. He died in 1271.

4. Known also by the nom de plume of COLLUM CERVI, bishop of Châlons. He was the personal friend of Abelard, whom he received in his abbey of St. Medard-de-Soissons, and treated with a kindness to which that philosopher was a stranger. Nevertheless, he took part in the Council of Sens, and adhered to the judgment it pronounced against Abelard. He died in 1143.

5. OF VENDÔME, Latinized into GEOF- FRIDUS VINDOCINENSIS (je-of-fre'dus vin-do-se-nen'sis), a powerful French cardinal, born at Angers, in what year is not known. He was one of the most stirring men of his age, and endowed with brilliant qualities, but very haughty. He was the close friend of the popes Urban II. and Paschal II., both of whom he received in his abbey of Vendôme. Kings, too, more than once deferred to his authority, and so he exercised considerable influence over the counsels of his time. Ultramontane though he was, he did not hesitate to rebuke Paschal when he yielded the right of investiture to Henry V. of Germany, telling him that "he had dishonored the papal chair." He died in 1132.

GEOFFREY PLANTAGENET was very greatly celebrated in the beginning of the twelfth century in the national affairs of France, Germany and England. Henry I. of England, who had managed to secure the English crown and eventually the rule of Normandy, thus excluding his brother Robert, had one daughter, Matilda, who in 1110 he betrothed to Henry V., the emperor of Germany, who died without issue, and in 1127, Matilda was married to Geoffrey, who was the son of Fulk, earl of Anjou. The name "Plantagenet" is derived from "Planta Genista," the Spanish broom plant, a sprig of which Geoffrey generally wore in his hat. Geoffrey was the father of the celebrated Henry II. of England, who received from Adrian IV. the authorization to invade Ireland, on condition of reducing not only the country politically, but especially ecclesiastically; and to collect from the people the well-known tax of "Peter's pence," and so securing that country to the spiritual sway of the pope. The Plantagenets reigned over England for more than three centuries. On the death of Richard II. they were divided into two branches, the Houses of York and of Lancaster, which were again united by the marriage of Henry VII. and his queen, whose son, Henry VIII., combined the claims of both Houses. The line closed on the death of Elizabeth. It was thus the son of Geoffrey who received from one pope authority to invade Ireland, and who in the controversy with Becket maintained a determined warfare with another pope on questions which involved the supremacy of the pope over the crown.

GEOGRAPHY (je-og'ra-fe). Every student of God's Word will acknowledge the importance of sacred geography. All the historic narratives of the Bible, and most of its doctrinal truths, are closely connected with the countries in which they were enacted and the places where they were revealed. Locality has given a peculiar tone and coloring to the whole literature and language of the Bible. Dr. Stanley has well said, that "from Genesis to the Apocalypse there are— even when not intending, nay, even when deprecating, any stress on the local associations of the events recorded—constant local allusions, such as are the natural result of a faithful and, as is often the case in the Biblical narrative, of a contemporary history." Nor is this all. Many statements are incidentally made in Scripture which appear to indicate that the authors were acquainted with the leading facts of geographical science, both physical and political. While, on the other hand, passages have been cited from Job, Isaiah, Psalms and Proverbs, which it has been thought betray a total ignorance of the simplest elements of geography. How are we to understand and how are we to reconcile these seemingly conflicting passages? What view are we to take of the geographical knowledge of the inspired writers, and by what canons are we to interpret their words? Are we to believe, as some affirm, that they were ignorant of even the elements of geographical science, and are we to interpret their statements accordingly? Or are we to believe, as others state, that, whatever may have been their own knowledge, they conformed in their writings to the popular opinions and fallacies of their age? Or are we to believe that, under the teaching of the Spirit, they embodied scientific truth sometimes in popular, sometimes in poetic and sometimes in highly figurative language? We shall best prepare the way for a satisfactory answer to these questions by laying down one or two general principles.

It must be borne in mind that no part of the Bible was ever intended to furnish a systematic treatise on any of the physical sciences. The object of revelation is to convey to mankind truths which they could not of themselves discover, and which are essential to their salvation. In revealing these truths, the facts of science are often alluded to. Thus, in showing that God is sole Creator, the history of creation is given; in showing the origin of sin, a description of Eden is given; in showing that God is a universal and just ruler, the history of the Deluge, of the dispersion of the human family, of the destruction of Sodom, and of the Exodus, is given. In illustration of the same truth, allusions are made to the motions of the heavenly bodies, to the changes of the seasons, to the formation of rain and dew, to the clouds, lightnings and tempests. Knowing the object of revelation, we should not expect such topics to be introduced in a purely scientific manner, or in strictly technical language; but, on the contrary, in a popular manner, and in such language as would be easily intelligible to those immediately addressed.

It must further be borne in mind that the Bible is from God, and that every sentence of it, when rightly interpreted, must be in absolute accordance with fact. We are warranted in concluding that wherever the heavenly bodies are spoken of, and wherever the structure, physical convulsions and topography of the earth are alluded to, perfect accuracy is observed. It will not do to say that because the first principles of astronomy and geography were unknown to the ancient Hebrews, the inspired writers adopted popular fallacies. It will not do to plead that false views on scientific matters were permitted in the Bible, because true views would have been unintelligible. It will not do to argue that the sacred writers were inspired on points of doctrine, but not on points of science. It is true they used popular language, just as scientific men use it now; and we must interpret such language in the Bible as we interpret it in popular treatises on astronomy, geography, or general subjects. It is true the ancient Hebrews may have attached to many passages meanings widely different from those the scholar attaches to them now—they may have thought that the sky was a solid vault, that the earth has foundations, that the sun rises and sets; but we are not concerned with the false interpretations of ignorant men; we have only to do with the ideas the Spirit of God intended to convey. It is well known that modern science has corrected the opinions of men in regard to many natural phenomena. The term which conveyed one idea in former times, conveys another and a widely different one now; and yet the term may be as proper and as definite now as it was then.

These principles afford the key to passages in Scripture often misunderstood and misrepresented. The statements in the Bible bearing upon science are not systematic or technical; they are incidental, fragmentary and popular. We can interpret them all in accordance with true systems of science; but we could not construct a complete system out of them. The sacred writers set forth incidentally some of the leading facts of geographical science.

1. The form of the Earth.—In one or two passages the true form of the earth appears to be indicated. Thus, in Isa. xl. 22, "He sitteth upon the circle of the earth," also Prov. viii. 27. Rosenmüller, Kalisch, Gesenius and others, have concluded from a collection of sublime images from the Hebrew poets, that they believed the earth to be circular, rising out of surrounding ocean, and having the heavens spread over it as a canopy. They have argued that, because the sacred writers speak of the "rising" and "setting" of the sun, the "foundations" of the

3. The division of the earth into land and sea.—This is indicated in Gen. i. 10. The ocean, containing great monsters, is often referred to; as in Ps. civ. 25, 26; Job xli. 1. Continents and islands are distinguished, Esth. x. 1; Gen. x. 5; Ps. lxxii. 10; Isa. lxvi. 19.

4. The great physical features of mountains, valleys and deserts.—The mountains of Ararat, Lebanon and Sinai, are specified; the valleys of Lebanon and the Jordan; the "great and terrible wilderness," Deut. i. 19.

what a clear and comprehensive view Moses obtained, under Divine teaching, of the political geography and history of the whole ancient world. The great advances recently made in ethnography and comparative philology, illustrate at once the completeness and the accuracy of the masterly sketch given by the Hebrew lawgiver. The seven families of the Japhethites who peopled Europe and Northern Asia have been identified. Ham is the ancestor of all the southern nations of the ancient world. earth, the "pillars" of heaven, of Jerusalem being in the midst of the nations, they could have known nothing of the very rudiments of geography. Such reasoning is opposed to all canons of sound criticism. If the writings of our own poets were dealt with in a similar manner, what would be the result?

2. The cardinal points.—Isaiah terms them "the four corners of the earth," xii. 11; Jeremiah, the "four quarters of the heaven," xlix. 36. The east is "before," or "in front of;" because the person is represented as facing the east. The west is then "behind," also "the sea;" because the sea was on the west of Palestine. The south was "the right," also "the dry." The north was "the left."

5. The difference of climates.—Job speaks of "cold out of the north," xxxvii. 9; and the heat of the south is alluded to by Job, xxxvii. 17, and by Luke, xii. 55.

6. The cradle of mankind was Central Asia.—The situation of Paradise is not known, but there can be no doubt as to the spot where the family of Noah settled after the flood. The ruins of Babylon still exist, Gen. xi.; and the seats of the great primeval kingdoms have recently been identified, Gen. x.

7. The division of mankind into three branches, and the colonization of the various countries of the earth by them.—The 10th chapter of Genesis shows him have found a name in history. The Shemites were concentrated in Western Asia, chiefly between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean.

In the whole compass of ancient literature there is nothing to be compared with the 10th chapter of Genesis. The most extensive research in the world's earliest history and among its earliest monuments, and the most scientific investigation of the peculiarities of its modern nations and languages, alike form illustrative commentaries upon that remarkable passage.

The Bible also abounds in topographical details regarding Palestine and the countries adjoining. These are, in many instances, minute and singularly graphic. Sacred geography may be said to embrace the whole world. It belongs, however, especially to Mesopotamia, Egypt, Asia Minor, Greece and Italy; while its main interest is concentrated on Palestine and the peninsula of Sinai. Those Oriental travelers and residents, such as Robinson, Wilson, Stanley, Thomson and others, who have had the fullest opportunities of judging, and who have become distinguished for their powers of accurate observation, have repeatedly testified to the faithfulness of Bible descriptions and the minute accuracy of Bible topography. Dr. Porter bears personal testimony to the same facts; and as he has visited nearly every known Scripture site in Syria and Palestine, and most of those in Asia Minor and Europe, he can speak with some degree of confidence. For fullness of detail in topography, for graphic sketches of scenery, for minute accuracy in the description of natural products, peculiarities of climate and manners and customs, no history, ancient or modern, can be compared with the Bible.

While geographical allusions are spread over the whole Bible, there are a few books which demand special notice. Genesis, in addition to the narrative of creation, sketches the establishment of the primeval empires and cities, and then the travels of the patriarchs in Canaan. In Numbers and Deuteronomy we have accounts of the peninsula of Sinai, Edom, Moab, Gilead and Bashan. Joshua is geographically one of the most remarkable books in the Bible. Stanley has well said, "Ten chapters of it are devoted to a description of Palestine, in which not only are its general features and boundaries carefully laid down, but the names and situations of its towns and villages enumerated with a precision of geographical terms which invites, and almost compels, a minute investigation." In Daniel we have a few notices of Babylon, and a prophetic allusion to the Babylonian, Persian, Grecian and Roman empires. The first three Gospels contain notices of the towns, people and products of Galilee. The topographical notices of John are confined chiefly to Judæa. The references in the Acts of the Apostles extend to Northern Syria, Asia Minor, Greece and Italy.

The Hebrews do not seem to have devoted any attention to geography as a science, though they were widely scattered at the commencement of our era, and occupied a distinguished place in literature. The Greeks probably led the way in systematic geography. The first map is said to have been constructed by Anaximander, about B. C. 600. Nearly a century later Hecateus of Miletus wrote a geographical work. These were followed by Strabo and Ptolemy. The Phoenicians and Egyptians were likewise distinguished as geographers. Ptolemy acknowledges that his great work was based on a treatise written by Marinus of Tyre. Pliny, the only Roman writer deserving of special mention in this place, was a mere compiler. As a geography his book is of little value. Sacred geography was not reduced to a system until a comparatively recent time. The "Onomasticon" of Eusebius and Jerome is an alphabetic list of places, with brief descriptions. The tract of Brocardus, written in the thirteenth century, is little more than an itinerary. To Samuel Bochart, a French Protestant minister (born 1599), belongs the honor of writing the first systematic work on Biblical geography. His "Geographia Sacra" is a storehouse of learning, from which all subsequent writers have drawn freely. Wells wrote his "Historical Geography of the Old and New Testaments" in the beginning of last century.

Reland's "Palæstina," published in 1714, remains to this day the standard classic work. Dr. Robinson's "Researches" opened a new era in Biblical geography. It, however, is neither complete nor systematic; it is only a book of travels, with most important historical and geographical illustrations. Ritter's "Palästina und Syrien" aims at system and completeness, but it is too diffuse. It gives a résumé of everything that has been written on Bible lands. A systematic and thorough treatise on Biblical geography is still a great desideratum.

GEOLOGY (je-ol'o-je) is that department of science which treats of the various strata that are found in the crust of the earth. It examines and describes these strata in their relation to each other, the minerals or substances of which they are composed and the fossils which are found in them. Observers of the kingdom of nature in different lands and ages have distinguished the leading characteristics of the mountainous and stony regions of the earth in the process of mining and other operations, but it is only in comparatively modern times that geology has assumed the position of a science. In this work it can only be referred to because of its connection with the cosmogony in the Mosaic record.

Among the ancients little attention was given to the examination of the earth's surface, for astronomy mainly claimed the attention of the students of nature in primitive times. When the mind of Europe awoke in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, organic remains were generally held to be mineral forms of peculiar shapes, and very absurd theories were put forth to account for their origin, even by men of learning. In the beginning of the seventeenth century it was asserted that minerals, especially of a marine form, were connected with the flood of Noah, and constituted decided proof for the fact of the Deluge. By the middle of the century a few thoughtful minds seem to have reached more rational views on the subject of fossils; and in 1688, Hook, in his work on earthquakes, describes their real character, and endeavors to prove that the upheavals and depressions of the crust of the earth which produced the phenomena of dislocations and other changes may have occurred between the era of the creation and the Deluge, as the Mosaic chronology was then understood. Burnet, in his celebrated "Sacred Theory of the Earth," produced a wonderful scheme of world making, and Whiston was equally wild and visionary, while Leibnitz held that the earth was an extinct sun; and the only portion of his system that was really worthy of his great name was his assertion that the sea must have covered all the land, as the prevalence of shells establishes this fact, and the existence of salts and fused matter in the earth proved that it had at one time been subjected to the influence of fire. Buffon, in 1749, gave forth a theory, and ere long the Sorbonne took him to task and compelled him to recant; and accordingly he retracted the position which, after many years of observation and reasoning, he had adopted, to the effect that the action of water had carried earth into the sea, that the retiring of the ocean had left dry land, and the action of water had produced similar results again and again.

Geological subjects became vastly attractive at the beginning of this century, and students of eminence endeavored by various theories to classify the facts which had been observed. Many of these systems were believed to be opposed to the Mosaic narrative, and alarm began to be felt by many at the assaults which they believed were made with a hostile design against the Word of God. In the agitation and anxiety which prevailed, it seemed to be forgotten that God has revealed himself by the book of his works and the book of his Word, and that as both are from him there can be no antagonism between them when they are correctly interpreted. It was a matter of fact that frequently there had been wrong views of Scripture adopted by expounders of the Word, and it was equally apparent that the diversities of views among geologists showed that a rational agreement should be effected among the students of nature before they could with any consistency urge their theories as physical evidences which set aside the teachings of the divine Word. Such agreement has not even yet been reached by scientists, but thoughtful minds of both classes are now very generally persuaded that a harmony does really exist between the record of the stony volume and the record in the inspired Word. It is very obvious that the narrative in the beginning of Genesis does not profess to be a scientific discussion. It states the order in which the creative acts were performed, and shows that there was a successive formation of the various organisms which have inhabited the earth; and these formative acts had reference to the successive production of the inhabitants of the water, the air and the earth, terminating with the mammals, of which the crown and the glory was man.

Turning to the geologic record, it is found that a similar order is apparent in the fossil organisms which attest the history of the past. However long the periods may have been during which the early inhabitants of the planet had lived, and however vast the ages may have been for the wearing away of the rocks and earthy regions into the beds of primeval oceans, to be consolidated with their remains and to be again upheaved as continents and rocky mountains, with their fossil records of a former time,—long and hoary as these ages may have been, there is really nothing in either record to measure their duration, and all evidence that is reliable attests the fact that the order of succession is the same in both.

In the leading geological writers there has been a remarkable tendency to adhere to a classification of the strata in which the upper formations have been denominated the tertiary, those immediately below, the secondary, and the lowest of all, the primary. These again have been subdivided. For instance, the primary rocks include granite, gneiss, hornblende and others, often called "Azoic," from the fact that they are wanting in such fossils as would indicate the existence of animal life. Some of the upper strata of the primary, and some of the lower secondary, have been called transition, and this includes the Cambrian, the silurian, and the old red sandstone. The coal measures overlie the old red, and superimposed above them is the new red sandstone, and higher still lime rocks and cretaceous formations. The secondary thus includes coal veins, trias, lias, oolite, Wealden clay, greensand and chalk. In the tertiary, it is common to reckon two divisions, the tertiary and the post-tertiary, including freestone, marl, drift, clay, sand and pebbles, and on the surface lies the soil, which belongs to the historical period, on which exists the race of man, for whose comfort and well-being the arrangements and transitions of ages have all tended. As by the Creator he was ordained to be the lord of that world in which he was to behold the glory of the infinite and eternal Lord of all, so mutations, vast and wonderful, were by the divine Hand the means of preparing his abode.

The study of geology is fraught with surpassing interest, but it demands a patient, cautious investigation by a logical mind. As astronomy carries the student out into immensity that he may behold the glory of God in the manifold orbs which roll in space illimitable, so geology leads the mind to see the glory of God as displayed in successive changes of time among the things which he has made, while both combine to show the existence of a Creator, a Ruler, a Sustainer, upholding according to law, and in all operations attesting the existence and presence of an infinite, eternal and omnipotent Author of all.

GEON (ge'on), Eccclus. xxiv. 27, the river of Eden, Gihon.

GEORGE (j'orj), SAINT, lived in the time of the emperor Diocletian. He entered the army, and rose to responsible posts in it; but when the persecution broke out against his fellow-Christians, he complained to the emperor of his severe and bloody edicts, and was himself imprisoned in Nicomedia, and, after many tortures, decapitated. Hence he was regarded in the Greek Church as a martyr, and was canonized by Pope Gelasius in 494. Being through his mother connected with Palestine, his relics were in time transported to Lydda, said to have been his native place; and a splendid church, magnificent ruins of which exist at the present day, was erected over them, according to William of Tyre, by Justinian, though other authorities, with more probability, ascribe it to Constantine. When the Crusaders, under Godfrey of Bouillon, reached Lydda in 1099, they found the church in ruins, but the sepulchre of St. George untouched. Here they celebrated a festival to St. George, and installed him as their patron saint, because a short time previously, at the siege of Antioch, he was supposed to have aided them at the head of a large army, carrying a red-cross banner. This is probably the cause of his being so much regarded in Europe, for he is the patron saint of Valencia, and Aragon, and Barcelona, of the city of Genoa and the Isle of Malta, of Russia and of England. It was at a synod of Oxford, in 1220, that he was first acknowledged as patron saint of England, superseding Edward the Confessor, who had been so regarded up to that time. The legend of his combat with the dragon, or, as it appears in a painting at Rhodes, with a crocodile, probably arose out of his supposed help of the Crusaders at Antioch, and was intended to typify the triumph of Christian chivalry over the Paynim.

GEORGE. There are several persons of this name of sufficient prominence to claim our notice.

1. OF ALEXANDRIA, an ecclesiastical writer who lived at the commencement of the seventh century. He wrote the life of St. Chrysostom, which is in the last volume of the Benedictine edition of his works. He is also supposed to have been the author of an anonymous but valuable work, the "Chronicon Alexandrinum," which extends from the Creation to A. D. 628.

2. PRINCE OF ANHALT and bishop of Merseburg, was born at Dessau, August 13, 1507. He was educated at Leipsic, and made cathedral-provost at Magdeburg, and such were his attainments that at the age of twenty-two he was chosen by Albert, elector of Mentz, to be one of his council, and secured his highest confidence. When the Reformation and the writings of Luther attracted public attention, Prince George was no idle or thoughtless spectator, prejudiced at first against the "novelties" of the Reformer, as they were called; he nevertheless gave the whole subject his prayerful investigation, embraced the doctrine of the Re-

Diet of Augsburg in the following year he also indorsed the Evangelic Confession, and declared his willingness rather to lose his head than renounce his religious convictions. An honored co-laborer in the work of the Reformation, he died December 17, 1543.

4. Surnamed THE CAPPADOCIAN (kap-pa-do'sh'an), was a famous heretic and intruder into the patriarchal chair of Alexandria when Athanasius was driven away from it in 356. He was filling the office of receiver of taxes at Constantinople when he was nominated by Constantius to the see of Alexandria. There he joined the Arian party, and persecuted the orthodox, while at the same time he insulted the pagans. These watched their opportunity, when Julian was on the throne, and having got the patriarch into their hands, put him to a cruel death, and then burned his body and cast the ashes into the sea, lest the Christians formation and renounced all connection with the Romish Church. In 1545, at the request of Luther, he gave himself entirely to the work of the ministry, and was made bishop of Merseburg. He lived near to God in his Christian life, and was eminently useful in the work of the Reformation. He died October 17, 1553.

3. ELECTOR OF BRANDENBURG-ANSPACH, was born at Onolzbach, March 4, 1484. He was surnamed the confessor or the pious on account of the valuable services rendered to Luther, having been one of the first German princes who embraced and defended the doctrines of the Reformation. In 1515 he became jointly with his brother regent of the province; and upon the death of his brother and father, he assumed the authority in his own name in 1527. Three years previous to this he had become acquainted with Luther, and adopted his religious views. He accompanied Luther to the Diet of Spire in 1529, and there, on the 19th of April, signed the renowned protest against the majority decision of the German princes. At the should honor them as relics of a martyr. It has suited Gibbon and others to identify this parasite embezzler and heretic with St. George, the patron saint of the Crusaders and of England, but there can be no question as to their being entirely different persons. A St. George, indeed, appears among the saints of the Church of the Abyssinians, and he is their patron; but seeing that that Church adopted the Arian heresy, it seems not improbable that their patron saint was the Arian George of Alexandria.

5. OF CYPRUS (si'prus), called also GREGORY, was selected by Andronicus Palæologus for the vacant see of Constantinople, while yet a layman, in 1283. By this appointment the emperor hoped to put an end to the troubles caused by the dissensions respecting the procession of the Holy Ghost. George quickly passed through the orders of priest and deacon, and was consecrated patriarch. The Armenians refused to acknowledge him, and appealed to the judgment of God. To obtain this it was agreed that each should write out a justification of their conduct, that the two documents should be thrown into the fire at the same time, and that the party whose writing was not burnt should gain the cause. Before the fire could decide the Armenians gave way, and received the holy communion at the hands of the patriarch. He abdicated the patriarchate in 1289, and died the following year.

6. OF LAODICÆA, prominent as one of the leaders in the semi-Arian controversy in the fourth century, was born at Alexandria. At the Council of Nicæa in 325 he was deposed from sacred offices in connection with the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople. He was one of the most elegant of the Byzantine poets, and the "Corpus Byzantinæ Historiæ" contains several of his works. Among his works is a poem of three thousand verses on the "Creation," and one much shorter on the "Resurrection."

8. OF POLENTZ, was born at Meissen in 1478. His theological course was pursued in Italy; and visiting Rome, he was made private secretary to Pope Julius II. Becoming a member of the order of Teutonic knights, he visited Prussia, 1471. Upon his elevation to power in his province in 1500, he manifested a persecuting spirit toward the adherents of Luther and the Reformation, and used his power and influence to crush the effort for mental and moral disenthralment. He accused Luther to his uncle, the elector of Saxony, and endeavored to prejudice him against the great Reformer. He attended the controversy at Leipsic between Eck and Luther, and also held discussions with Luther alternately at Dresden and Wittenberg. Toward the close of his life, however, his religious views underwent a change. He died April 17, 1539.

10. SCHOLARIUS (sko-lah're-us). See GEN-NADIUS.

11. Called THE SYNCELLUS (sin-sel'lus), as being the secretary of Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople. He was a wise and talented man, and well versed in chronology and history, and wrote a chronography from Adam to Diocletian. It forms the fifth volume of "Corpus Byzantinæ Historiæ."

12. OF SYRACUSE (sir'a-keus), patriarch of Constantinople in the seventh century. He was one of the elegant Byzantine writers of poetry, and enriched the hymnology of the Greek Church. He wrote some elegant Troparia, which form part of the "Menaæ," the breviary of the East. The precise years of his birth and death are not known.

GEORGE, KING OF TONGA, one of the Polynesian islands which have been converted to Christianity. King George, who was born at the beginning of the nineteenth century, was called after the king of England. He has exerted himself with rare energy to the improvement of his island. To the office of king he unites that of preacher. The clerical dress of the English Church, which he assumes on such occasions, presents a striking contrast to his hands, which, by the loss of their little fingers, proclaim that in former times he sacrificed to idols.

GEORGE, ENOCH, an eminent and useful minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Lancaster county, Virginia, in 1768. After many years of service as a pioneer Methodist preacher, characterized by untiring zeal and great success, he was elected bishop in 1816. He died at Staunton, Virginia, August 23, 1828.

GEORGI (j'or'je), CHRISTIAN SIEGMUND, born at Luckau in 1702, was professor of theology at Wittenberg, where he died September 2, 1771. He took a prominent part in the controversy between the Purists and the Hebraists, and published a considerable number of dissertations in support of the views maintained by the former party.

GEORGIAN LANGUAGE. The Georgian language, which is also spoken by the Mingralians, Lazians and the Suani, belongs to the Iberian family. The chief characteristics of it are as follows: Its alphabet consists of thirty-five letters, it has no articles, the substantives have eight cases and no genders, the adjectives, when associated with nouns, are indeclinable, but when they stand by themselves are declined, the comparative is formed by the prefix u and the suffix si, and cardinals are obtained by prefixing me to the ordinals. It possesses eight conjugations, with several minor subdivisions, and the different persons are indicated by terminations and personal prefixes; it has several forms for the preterite and the future tenses, and only one form for the present tense; three the office of a presbyter on account of his Arian opinions. Removing to Syria, he afterward became bishop of Laodicea. During the reign of Constantius II. he was held in considerable favor, and with Basil of Ancyra published and attempted a wide dissemination of his views. A synod assembled at Ancyra in 358, adopting his views, issued "a long and copious document" of a doctrinal and polemical character, in which the questions at issue were discussed and defended at large. This creed was adopted by Constantius, and also by the synod of Sirmium, A. D. 358.

and in 1518 he was appointed by Albrecht, margrave of Brandenburg, the grand master, bishop of Sambia. A pupil of Luther by the name of Brissman, who had formerly been a Franciscan, visited Königsberg, within his diocese, and was invited by the bishop to preach in his cathedral the first evangelical sermon, September 24, 1523. In a short time the bishop himself openly espoused the cause of Luther. He was the first Romish bishop who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and it was in his diocese that the cause first became strongly entrenched. He died April 28, 1550.

modes—viz., indicative, imperative and the participle—and supplies the place of the infinitive by a verbal noun; it has postpositions governing different cases, in addition to the prepositions, and can multiply verbs to any extent by the terminations eleba and ola, form abstracts from adjectives by the terminations oba and eba, as well as active personal nouns, adjectives, both active and passive, and diminutives, by various terminations and prefixes, and its construction allows many liberties. From the venerable old Georgian language a dialect developed itself, in the course of time, by the introduction into it of many Armenian, Greek, Turkish and other foreign words, and by the viciation of the pronunciation and spelling of many expressions. The two dialects have distinct alphabets; the alphabet in which the old Georgian is written is called Kuzuri—i. e., the sacred—and consists of the letters invented by Miesrob, and the alphabet of the modern Georgian is called Keduli, and is supposed to have been invented by the Georgians themselves in the fourteenth century. The old language is the ecclesiastical or literary, and is employed in all sacred and literary writings, whilst the modern is the civil dialect, or the dialect of common life.

GEORGIAN VERSION, THE, is one of the oldest versions of the Bible extant. See VERSIONS.

GERA (ge'ra) is given at Gen. xlvi. 21 as one of the sons of Benjamin. In the fresh table of Benjamin's offspring, given at Num. xxvi. 38, etc., Gera is not mentioned, which probably arose from the respect there evidently had to families, so that the descendants of Gera would be included among the Belaites. Again, in the table found at 1 Chr. viii. 1-5, there are two Geras, the second being probably a corruption in the text, and both sons of Bela, the eldest son of Benjamin. It is probable that Gera was actually the son of Bela and the grandson of Benjamin, and that in Genesis he is reckoned among the sons of Benjamin, as having ultimately become the head of a family of that tribe. Others seem to be mentioned there on the same account, not as being actually the immediate sons of Benjamin.

GERAH (ge'rah), the smallest Hebrew coin, the twentieth part of a shekel, equal to about three half-pence of our money. See WEIGHTS.

GERALDINI (jer-al-de'ne), ALESSANDRO, born in 1455, commenced public life as cup-bearer to Isabella, queen of Castile. He then took orders, and became tutor to the royal princesses. While thus occupied, Columbus made his proposal of a voyage of discovery, and Geraldini was largely instrumental in obtaining for him the help which he received. He subsequently went to England on the vain mission of reconciling Henry VIII. to Catherine of Aragon. Appointed bishop of Hispaniola in 1520, he sailed at once for his post, where he died in the midst of zealous labor in 1525.

GERANDO (zheh-rong-do'), JOSEPH MARIE, Baron de, a distinguished writer on philosophical subjects, was born at Lyons, 1772, and educated by the Oratorians. His "Comparative History of the Systems of Philosophy" (first published as a small tract, and gradually expanded till, in 1847, it extended to eight volumes) attracted the notice of Lucien Bonaparte, who made him secretary-general to the minister of the interior in 1804; and in 1805 he accompanied Napoleon to Italy, where he remained for some years. He died in 1842.

GERAR (ge'rar), a city and territory of the Philistines which had at a very early period a king named Abimelech, perhaps the regular title of its chiefs, Gen. x. 19; xx. 1, 2. It is possible that this district might be the birthplace of Isaac. Abraham sojourned here, as also Isaac, and both committed the sin of denying their wives in Gerar. Both, too, made a treaty with the reigning sovereign, after departing from Gerar, to dwell in Beersheba. Amid the simple habits of nomad life such pied along the sea-coast. The metropolis, to which Isaac first went, he admits may have been at Khirbet el-Gerar, three hours south-south-east of Gaza; but the "valley of Gerar," to which he retired at Abimelech's suggestion, he believes to be the modern Wady el-Jerár, much more to the south. There are indications here of fertility and ancient tillage.

GERARD (je-rard'). 1. ALEXANDER, a much esteemed minister of the Church of Scotland, and a professor in the university of Aberdeen. He was born at Garioch, in Aberdeenshire, in 1728, and educated at Marischal College and the university a repetition of events is not improbable, xx., xxi., 22-34; xxvi. Gerar was a fertile country, for there Isaac reaped a hundred-fold. The exact limits of its territory it is not possible to ascertain; but it lay to the south of Gaza, extending, it would seem, almost to Beersheba. It was the point to which Asa pursued the Ethiopians, and the expressions then used prove it to have been a rich pastoral country, 2 Chr. xiv. 12-15. The valley of Gerar has been thought to be the modern Wady es-Sheriah, and some travelers have found traces of an ancient city near. Mr. Wilton has investigated the matter with much care. He believes that the country of Gerar reached far to the south, as the settlements of the Philistines were certainly in earlier times to the south of the districts they subsequently occu-of Edinburgh. He was appointed to the chair of morals in Marischal College in 1750, and in 1760 he was transferred to the divinity chair. Eleven years afterward he removed to the theological professorship in King's College, which is associated with Marischal College in the university of Aberdeen. He distinguished himself by essays on taste, on genius, dissertations on the evidences of Christianity, the pastoral care, and he left two volumes of excellent sermons. He died in 1795.

2. BALTHAZAR, born in 1558, a Roman Catholic fanatic who, having obtained a place in the suite of the prince of Orange by representing himself a Protestant, assassinated him. His intention to do so was known to several French Jesuits and to the duke of Parma, from whom he received encouragement to carry it out. He was executed for the murder in 1585, and a few years afterward the king of Spain, who had offered rewards for the deed, ennobled his family. The Romanists have enrolled him among their martyrs, and the bishop of Antwerp wrote a Latin ode "in praise of Balthazar Gerard, the brave tyrannicide."

3. Known by the surnames THOM, TUM, TUNC, or TENQUE, was the founder and the first grand master of the celebrated order of St. John of Jerusalem. He was born in the island of Martigues, near the coast of Provence, in the year 1040. A Benedictine monastery had been erected near the holy sepulchre, which was visited by pilgrims in great numbers, for whose comfort an hospital was erected, and the abbot made Gerard the manager of this hospital. This was in the year 1080, and the hospital was dedicated to St. John. He afterward formed the idea of a new order uniting the religious and the military ele-

GERASA (ger'a-sa) is not found in the English Bible, but, as already mentioned under GADARA, the "country of the Gerasenes," is, according to the probably correct reading in Mark and Luke, given as the scene of one of the most remarkable cures wrought by our Lord from demoniacal possessions, Mark v. 1; Luke v. 26. There was a city of the name of Gerasa which attained to considerable note a century or two after the Christian era, and of which important remains still exist. It has been thought that the name of this place came in consequence to be substituted for that of Gadara, making the country of the Gerasenes, instead of the country of the Gadarenes. But this is extremely improbable, especially as this Gerasa lay altogether away from the immediate neighborhood of the Lake of Galilee, about 35 miles south-east even from its southern extremity. No one in the least acquainted with the locality could have imagined that the country anywhere on the eastern side of the lake demned to death on account of his crimes, and executed July, 1317.

GERBAIS (zher-bay'), JEAN, a doctor of the Sorbonne, professor of rhetoric at the Royal College of Paris, and principal of the college of Rheims, was born in Russois in 1629. He was the author of several works, and died in 1699.

GERBERON (zherb-'rong'), GABRIEL, a Benedictine of the reformed congregation of St. Maur, and an able writer in favor of Jansenism, born 1628 at St. Calais. On account of the active part he took in supporting the views of Jansenius, he was arrested by Louis XIV. Having escaped, he was seized by the bishop of Mechlin and thrown into the castle of Vincennes. But imprisonment not having the effect of making him change his opinions, he was released, and died in the abbey of St. Dennis. He died in 1711.

GERBERT (ger'bert), MARTIN, Baron von Hornau, a celebrated writer on music, born in the Austrian states in 1720. He was prince-abbot of St. Balaise, a Benedictine abbey in the Black Forest, and was eminent for his knowledge of and taste for the fine arts, particularly music. He traveled throughout the Continent for the materials of a work on the history of church music which he published in 1744. A still more valuable one appeared in 1784, entitled "Scriptores Ecclesiastici de Musica Sacra potissimum," a very valuable collection of the MSS. of Italian, French and German writers on church music. He died in 1793.

GERBILLON (zher-be-yong'), JEAN FRANÇOIS, a Jesuit missionary in China, born in 1654. He wrote "Observations on Great Tartary;" and an account of his travels is inserted in Du Halde's history of China. He was in great favor with the emperor, for whom he composed the "Elements of Geometry," and was his instructor in mathematics and philosophy. He was allowed to preach the Christian religion in China, and finally became superior-general of the Jesuit mission. He died at Pekin in 1707.

GERDIL (jer-deel'), GIANCINTO SIGISMONDO, born 1718, a Roman cardinal and prefect of the Propaganda possessed of considerable learning. He wrote a "Treatise on the Immateriality of the Soul," and also "Anti-Emile; or, Reflections on the Theory and Practice of Education against the Principles of J. J. Rousseau." He died in 1802.

GEREM (ger'em). See GANITE.

GERGESENES (ger'ge-seenz), Matt. viii. 28. According to several manuscripts, the right reading in this place is thought to be Gerasenes—i. e., inhabitants of Gerasa, a city not mentioned in Scripture, but yet known to be anciently of considerable importance. It was a town in Gilead, now termed Jerash, about twenty miles east of the Jordan, and five miles north of the Jabbok; the modern Zurka. The ruins are very beautiful and extensive; vast numbers of columns still remain, and huge masses of masonry. This place was too far from the Lake of Tiberias to be the scene of the miracle described; but as in its days of prosperity it had a large district attached to it, called by its name (possibly, too, superseding the name derived from Gadara), the spot where the possessed with devils were cured might be in the province. See GADARA.

ments, and in 1100 he began to collect his associates, who were called "hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem," who, besides the vows of chastity, poverty and obedience, bound themselves to relieve all Christians in distress. The order was approved and confirmed by Paschal II., and Gerard was recognized as the first grand master. Thus began that order which became so celebrated in history, when its members were known as the Knights of Rhodes, and afterward as that of the Knights of Malta. Gerard died in the year 1120.

GERARD, GILBERT, D.D., who was a son of Alexander Gerard, held the office of Greek professor in King's College after having preached for a short time at Amsterdam. In 1775 he was removed to the chair of divinity, and thus father and son held the same position in the same university. He died in 1815. He wrote "Institutes of Biblical Criticism," a work which has been greatly esteemed, and he also published a "Compendious View of the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion."

could have derived its name from that city. The remains of a town, however, have been discovered by Dr. Thomson, the American missionary, on the eastern shore of the lake, nearly opposite Capernaum, and to which the Arabs give the name of Gersa or Chersa, and identify it with the ancient Gergesa. "It is," he says, "within a few rods of the shore, and an immense mountain rises directly above it, in which are ancient tombs, out of which the two men possessed of the devils may have issued to meet Jesus. The lake (he further adds) is so near the base of the mountain that the swine, rushing madly down it, could not stop, but would be hurried on into the water and drowned." This seems quite probable; and it is also possible that "the country of the Gerasenes," or Gergesenes, may, as Dr. Thomson thinks, have been the original reading in all the three evangelists, the reference being to this town Gersa or Chersa.

GERHARD (ger'hard), JOHN, a learned Lutheran theologian of the sixteenth century, was born at Quedlinburg, Prussia, the 17th of October, 1582. After receiving much benefit from the spiritual instructions of John Arndt at a time of mental depression and bodily disease, he repaired to the university of Wittenberg in 1599, where he studied philosophy and attended theological lectures, but was afterward induced to study medicine, contrary to his own inclination. His decided bent toward theology, however, soon prevailed. From Wittenberg he went to Jena, and devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, the Fathers and Hebrew. Some time after, he repaired to Marburg, then the most famous university for Lutheran theology. Leaving Marburg, he returned to Jena, and was appointed superintendent of Heldburg in his twenty-fourth year. In 1615 he accepted a call to Jena, where he lived and labored as theological professor and author during the remainder of his life. Great was his theological activity, and distinguished the reputation he acquired. Kings, princes and dukes did him honor, consulting him on all matters, ecclesiastical and others. He received no fewer than twenty-four invitations to other places, but declined them all. His death took place on the 20th of August, 1637, when he was but fifty-five years of age. His health was never good, and he led a life of incessant activity, exercising great influence over the religious history of his own country. Gerhard was a modest, pious, peace-loving man, who had largely imbibed the spirit of his divine Master. His works on doctrinal and practical theology are very numerous. Of those belonging to the department of exegesis, the chief is his "Commentary on the Harmony of the Evangelical History of the Passion and Resurrection of Christ," a completion of the work begun by Chemnitz and continued by Lyser. He also published commentaries on the various books of the Bible, some of which were highly esteemed in their day.

GERHARD, SAINT, was an excellent specimen of a mediæval saint, and the incidents of his life show the ideas which in his age were entertained respecting holiness. He was born in the year 890 at Staves, near Namur. On a certain occasion he left his companions when hunting to pray in a chapel. Here he had a dream to the effect that he was to enlarge the buildings, and bring the bones of Eugene the martyr to the holy edifice. This he did, and he added a convent in the year 918. Subsequently he entered the abbey of St. Denis, and here he got the bones of St. Eugene and of other saints, as this establishment has as many bones as would have supplied all the convents in France. Of course miracles followed, and so great became the renown of Gerhard that he had to retire to a cell in order to procure retirement and rest. He aimed at removing abuses in convents, and after twenty-two years of such labor he died in 957.

GERHARDITES (ger'hard-ites). About the year 1160 a number of German heretics in England were known by this name. They were the followers of a man called Gerhard, and they were accused of rejecting the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and of disparaging the ordinance of marriage. They were condemned by a synod held at Oxford.

GERHARDT (ger'hart), PAUL, born in 1607 in Saxony, a German theologian and poet, known by his sacred songs, which unite with great felicity of expression true poetic feeling. They are the outpourings of a truly Christian heart. They were published, as corrected by himself, under the title of "Die Gesänge Paul Gerhardts." Some of them have been rendered into English by Miss Winkworth, in the "Lyra Germanica." He died in 1675.

GERIZIM (ger'e-zim), "mountain of the Gerzites, dwellers in a shorn or desert land," a mountain in close proximity to Shechem, and opposite to Mount Ebal. There is a Samaritan tradition that it was on Gerizim that Abraham was called to offer Isaac, and it is urged, in support of it, that to a traveler journeying from the Philistine plain, Gerizim would be seen afar much more conspicuously than Moriah at Jerusalem, and, further, that there was a Moreh near Shechem, Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 30. But those most competent to form an opinion are decidedly opposed to the supposition. Dr. Thomson does not believe that Abraham would traverse the Philistine plain on his route, and declares it impossible, the habits of the country considered, that the patriarch, starting from Beersheba or near Beersheba, could reach Gerizim the third morning. Besides, the site of the temple was specially called Mount Moriah, 2 Chr. iii. 1. See MORIAH. There is another tradition, still less trustworthy, that Melchizedek met Abraham on Gerizim. The only shadow of a reason in favor of it is that there is said to be a Shalem or Salem near Shechem, but the Salem of which Melchizedek was king was far more probably Jerusalem.

Passing from the region of conjecture to that of certainty, we find Moses directing that when Israel had passed into Canaan they should place a blessing upon Mount Gerizim, and a curse upon Mount Ebal, six tribes standing upon each, and all the people responding to what the Levites pronounced, an altar, too, being built on Ebal, or, according to the Samaritan Pentateuch, on Gerizim, on which the words were to be written, Deut. xi. 29, 30; xxvii. This was accordingly done, Josh. viii. 30-35. Some difficulty has been felt in regard to the topographical description of the two mountains as "in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal." But it is very probable that this Gilgal was not the place of the Israelites' early encampment after crossing the Jordan. See GILGAL. Besides, as Bishop Patrick observes in his note on Deut. xi. 30, "it is not said that the mountains were over against Gilgal, but the dwelling of the Canaanites (in whose country these mountains were) was over against it." See EBAL. It may be added that it was from Gerizim that Jotham addressed his parable to the men of Shechem, Jud. vii. 20.

Objections have been made to these statements, as if it were impossible for the human voice to be sufficiently heard. A late traveler, Mr. Mills, has effectually settled it. His tent was placed between the mountains, in a spot where he thinks the ark might have stood. He ascended Gerizim, while a friend stood on Ebal. Mr. Mills read out the blessings, and his voice was distinctly heard at the tent, and by his friend on Ebal, who then read the curses with a similar result.

After the captivity, Sanballat obtained leave from Darius Nothus to erect a temple on Gerizim; here, therefore, the Samaritans worshiped till their temple was destroyed by Hyrcanus. They still, however, had an altar here, and cherished a determined hatred against the Jews, John iv. 20, 21. Of the later history of Gerizim it must be sufficient to say that a Christian church was at one time built on it, that it is still highly venerated by the small remnant of Samaritans and called Jebel et-Tur.

Dr. Thomson believes the yet existing ruins to be those of the Samaritan temple; more probably they may be those of the Christian church. They are extensive, the main building being 241 feet from east to west and 255 from north to south. "The walls are about six feet thick, and from seven to fifteen feet high. There are no ornamental carvings on any of the stones, but they are well cut and beveled after the Jewish or Phœnician manner. On the north there is a lower terrace of the mountain, covered with ruins, as of a village, and west of the main edifice is a smooth plat, now used by the Samaritans for their tents when they go there to celebrate their feasts. For vastness and variety the prospect from this temple is not surpassed by any in Palestine."

The top of Gerizim is now covered with massive ruins, at one corner of which is a small Mohammedan wely, with a white dome, visible over a large section of Central Palestine. The ruins are evidently those of Justinian's fortress. The walls are thick, the masonry massive, and at the angles are square towers. In the foundations of the western wall there are some ten or twelve large stones, and beneath these tradition places the "twelve stones" brought up by the Israelites from the bed of the Jordan, Josh. iv. A little to the south of the ruins is a smooth surface of natural rock, oval-shaped and declining toward an excavated pit. This is the Samaritan "holy of holies," toward which they turn in prayer. The spot where they assemble to eat the passover is about 200 yards distant down the western slope of the mountain. Dr. Porter was present at their feast in 1858. The whole community were assembled. The lambs, previously selected, were killed. A deep circular pit, lined with rude masonry, was then heated with wood like an oven. The lambs were taken and suspended to a stick laid across the mouth of the pit. The whole was then covered over, and allowed to remain so till the flesh was roasted, Ex. xii. 9. All the Samaritans, men, women and children, except such as are ceremonially unclean, partake of the flesh. They eat it "in haste, with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet and their staves in their hand," ver. 11.

Elizabeth Church in the suburbs of that city; was advanced to be consistorialrath and domprediger in 1847, and died 24th of October, 1849. His energies were expended principally on the practical duties of his office, but he found time also for some literary effort. His most important work is "The Holy Bible, according to Luther's Translation, with Introduction and Explanatory Annotations," of which the fourth volume, concluding the Old Testament, is the production of Dr. Schmieder of Wittenberg. This work, intended chiefly for family use, has been extensively circulated in Germany, and a portion of it has been translated into English, "Commentary on the Pentateuch." He published also "A Full Selection of Luther's Principal Writings, with Introductions, Notes and Index."

GERLACH, STEPHAN, a German theologian, born at Württemberg in 1546, whose life was chiefly spent in theological controversy. He accompanied the ambassador of Maximilian II. to the court of the sultan Selim II., where he was for six years. During this time he obtained a great number of Greek MSS. for Crusius.

GERLE (zhärl), CHRISTOPHE ANTOINE, a French ecclesiastic, born in 1740, who in the states-general, in 1789, warmly adopted the popular cause. He subsequently advocated the pretensions of a would-be prophetess, named Suzanne, who proclaimed the political millennium; and in 1793 he was imprisoned as an accomplice of the pretended prophetess Catherine Theos, who called herself the mother of God, and was believed in and protected by Robespierre. Gerle died about 1805.

GERMAN (ger'man), BARTHELEMY, born 1663, died 1718, was, according to Moreri, a learned man who wrote very pure Latin, but put forward false principles of criticism. He was a Jesuit, and wrote against the views of the Benedictine fathers Mabillon and Constant respecting the deciphering of ancient characters. He was the author of a dissertation on the origin of the French nation.

GERMAN METHODISTS. This society, adopting mainly the doctrines and form of government of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, is composed chiefly of Germans and their descendants in the Middle and Western States. The proceedings of their deliberative bodies and the ordinary exercises of public worship are conducted in the German language. They include few men of especial prominence, but are an orderly and commendable organization for religious purposes. Their founder was at one time connected as a member, not as a minister, with the Moravian Church, and hence the sect is also known, though improperly, by the name of the United Brethren.

GERMANUS (jer-mah'nus), or GERMAIN (zher'möng), SAINT, of Paris, was born at Autun, A. D. 496, and became bishop of Paris in 555. He was remarkable for his charity to the poor, his interest in the redemption of slaves and the strictly ascetic life which he led. He died in 576, and was buried in the church in Paris that is now called by his name.

GERMANUS, or GERMAIN, SAINT, OF AUXERRE, born of illustrious parentage at Auxerre, France, in the year 380, was created duke of several provinces by Honorius. He tired of this sort of life and entered the Church, where he soon obtained preferment, becoming bishop of Auxerre in 418. He was sent by Pope Celestine to Britain to crush out the Pelagian heresy, and was very successful in his mission. He remained in Britain nearly eighteen years, during which, besides other services to the Church, he established a number of schools which became celebrated. It was on his way to Britain that he met with and blessed GENEVIEVE, which see. He died in 448 at Ravenna.

GERMANUS. There were three patriarchs of Constantinople of this name, who demand each a brief notice. 1. The first, Germanus I., negotiated the abdication of the emperor Theodosius III. in favor of Leo the Isaurian. During the latter part of his patriarchate he strenuously opposed the emperor, who sided with the Paulicians in their opposition to image-worship, and was at length deposed in 730, and died in 740 or about that year. Shortly after his death the patriarch was anathematized by the Greek Church, and was subsequently enrolled by both Latins and Greeks among their saints. 2. The second, surnamed THE YOUNGER, a monk of Propontis, was elected patriarch of Constantinople; but the city being in the possession of the Latins, he resided at Nice, in Bithynia. He was very desirous to promote a union between the Greek and Latin Churches, and prevailed on the emperor to assemble a council on the matter, but nothing was done, and he afterward wrote a tract against the Latins. He also wrote an "Exposition of the Greek Liturgy." He died in 1255. 3. The third, while bishop of Adrianople, was elected patriarch of Constantinople in 1267, at the instance of his friend Michael Palæologus; but he soon retired from the post into a monastery. As a deputy of the emperor, he attended the Council of Lyons in 1277, when the union of the two Churches, Latin and Greek, was agreed on, but it was only temporary.

GERRHENIANS (ger-rhe'ne-ans), 2 Macc. xiii. 24, the inhabitants of Gerar, Gezer, or possibly Gaza.

GERSHOM (ger'shom). 1. The eldest son of Moses by Zipporah, Ex. ii. 22; xviii. 3. The family of Moses were not elevated above the ordinary Levites, 1 Chr. xxiii. 14; hence we find his descendants filling subordinate posts. One of these was probably that Jonathan who was priest in Micah's house of images, and afterward at Dan, Jud. xviii. 30; for the "Manasseh" named as his ancestor is not unreasonably thought to be Moses. Another was Shebuel, treasurer in the reign of David, 1 Chr. xxiii. 15, 16; xxvi. 24. 2. The form in which the name of Gershon, the son of Levi, appears in several places, 1 Chr. vi. 16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71; xv. 7. 3. A priest who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem, Ezra viii. 2.

GERSHON (ger'shon), the eldest son of Levi, Gen. xlvi. 11; Ex. vi. 16, 17; 1 Chr. vi. 1. Gershon is repeatedly written Gershom. See GERSHOM, 2.

GERSHONITES (ger'shon-ites), one of the great families of the Levites, descendants of Gershon, Num. iii. 21, 23, 24; iv. 24, 27; xxvi. 57; Josh. xxi. 33; 1 Chr. xxiii. 7; 2 Chr. xxix. 12. When the census was taken in the wilderness, the number of their males above a month old was 7500, those between thirty and fifty, 2630, Num. iii. 22; iv. 40. The Gershonites appear to have held the middle rank of the three families of Levites. It was their duty, when the tabernacle was moved, to carry the coverings and hangings, Num. iii. 17-26; iv. 22-28, 38-41; vii. 7; x. 17; xxvi. 57. When they reached Canaan, thirteen cities were allotted to them out of the territory of Issachar, Asher, Naphtali and Eastern Manasseh, Josh. xxi. 6, 27-33. Several eminent men were in later times of this family, as Asaph, 1 Chr. vi. 39-43; and their service was duly arranged in the days of David, 1 Chr. xxiii. 7-11.

GERSON (ger'son), 1 Esd. viii. 29. Gershom, Ezra viii. 2.

GERSON (zher-sōng'), JOHN CHARLIER DE, one of the most celebrated men of the fifteenth century, and a great forerunner of the Reformation, was born December 14, 1363, at Gerson, a small village in the diocese of Rheims. He was the eldest of twelve children, and was brought up by his parents in strict piety. Three of his brothers and four of his sisters took monastic vows. His paternal name was Charlier; but having entered at fourteen the college of Navarre in Paris, he adopted the addition de Gerson, in memory of his birthplace and in token of the new life he embraced. He soon acquired distinction, and rose rapidly in the Church. In 1392 he received from Pierre d'Ailly the degree of doctor; in 1395 he was appointed bishop of Puy; in 1396 he became bishop of Cambrai, and subsequently chancellor of the university of Paris.

Gerson took an active part in most of the controversies of the troublous times on which he was cast, for the most part aiming at promoting peace and healing the divisions of the Church. He took a leading part in the Council of Constance, and the greatest blot on his character is the share he had in the condemnation of Huss. At the close of the Council, finding his efforts at reformation baffled, and disheartened by his repeated failures, Gerson retired as a pilgrim into Bavaria and the Tyrol, and finally visited Vienna, where Frederick of Austria made him a professor in the university. Here he wrote his treatise "On the Consolation of Religion," which has been often reprinted, and his "Monotessaron," a harmony of the Gospels. In 1419 he quitted Austria and returned to France, on the death of the duke of Burgundy, to seek an asylum in the monastery of the Celestines at Lyons. Here he wrote his "Commentaries on the Psalms," and spent his time in the education of young children, saying that it was with little children that the reformation of the Church should commence. He instructed them in the rudiments of Latin and the Gospels, and taught them to say in their prayers, "O Lord, have mercy on thy poor servant John Gerson." After completing a "Commentary on the Song of Songs," he died July 12, 1429, aged 66. Sursum corda, "His Affections (literally Hearts) [were] above," was engraved on his tomb. The De Imitatione Christi, "On the Imitation of Christ," has been ascribed to him from the fact of its first appearing appended to a manuscript of his "On the Consolation of Religion." It is still a matter of dispute, and France, Italy and Germany contend for the authorship of this famous work. Gerson was a noble character, eloquent, earnest and of deep piety. His great aim was the reformation of abuses, discipline and manners, and of the corruption of the clergy, the ignorance and venality of the prelates. The infallibility and inviolability of the pope were in his idea gross superstition. He believed that the power to bind and to loose belonged to a general council, not to the pope; he condemned the self-flagellation of fanatics, and strove to abolish annates and extirpate simony.

GERTRUDE (ger'trude), SAINT. There were two saints called Gertrude. One of them, who was born in 626, entered the nunnery of Nivelles, near Brussels. She was elected abbess when only twenty years of age, and she died in her nunnery in 659. The other was born at Eisleben, in Germany, and in 1294 she was chosen abbess of a house of Benedictines at Roberdorf. She appears to have shared in a fair amount of the education of the age, as she knew the Latin tongue, and she had some knowledge of the Scriptures. Her piety was of a mystical character, and the only work which she produced, and which was reprinted in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and rendered into French, shows the decided leaning of her mind to clouded emotional views. She died in 1334.

GERVASIUS (ger-vah'zh'us), or GERVAISE (jer'vas, or jer-vayz'), SAINT, of Canterbury, an English Benedictine monk and Anglo-Saxon historian of the twelfth century.

in Hanover, 3d of February, 1786, and died at Halle, 23d of October, 1842. From the gymnasium of his native town he passed to the university of Helmstadt, now defunct, and subsequently to that of Göttingen, where he studied theology. After fulfilling the functions of a privatdocent at Göttingen for three years, he was appointed in 1809 professor at the gymnasium of Heiligstadt; and in the following year he was elevated to a theological professorship at Halle, where he continued to the end of his life. He devoted himself with great zeal to the duties of his chair, and became the most popular teacher of Hebrew and Old Testament exegesis in Germany. He continued to prosecute with much diligence the study of Hebrew, and di-

GERZITES (gerz'ites), 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, marg. See GERZITES. A connection has been supposed between this tribe and Gerizim, as if they had once occupied the district around that mountain, and had afterward migrated southward. But there is no historical trace of this, only a presumption arising from the name.

GESEM (ge'sem), THE LAND OF, Judith i. 9, the land of Goshen.

GESENIUS (geh-se'ne-us), WILHELM, the eminent Hebrew scholar, was born at Nordhausen, rected his attention to the preparation of works adapted to promote familiarity with that language. His earliest aim was directed to the improvement of Hebrew lexicography. Before leaving Göttingen he had turned his mind to this subject, and he was no sooner settled in Halle than he set himself in earnest to accomplish what he had proposed. In 1810 appeared the first volume of his "Hebrew-German Dictionary of the Old Testament," which was followed by the second volume in 1812. This work, produced between the author's 22d and 26th year, he was accustomed himself to regard in later years as a juvenile performance, but it was such a performance as secured for him at once a foremost place among Hebrew philologists, and its appearance constitutes an era in the history of Shemitic learning. In this field Gesenius continued to labor to the last. In 1815 he issued his "New Hebrew-German Dictionary for Schools," of which new editions appeared in 1823, 1828 and 1834, under the title of "Hebrew and Chaldee Dictionary for the Old Testament," and in 1833 appeared his "Small Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon of the Old Testament;" but his great work in this department, and in which he was occupied at the time of his death, is the "Critical Philological Thesaurus of the Hebrew and Chaldee Dialects of the Old Testament," of which the first fasciculus appeared in 1829, the fifth in 1842, and which, completed by Rödiger, who added a sixth fasciculus (1853), occupies three volumes 4to. Of these works the first has been translated into English by Christopher Leo, the second by J. W. Gibbs, and the third, with corrections furnished by the author, by Dr. E. Robinson. To the improvement of the grammar of the Hebrew also Gesenius set himself with much diligence and perseverance, and in this department issued several important works. Gesenius was also they are confined exclusively to the Biblical Hebrew, and so still leave us without a complete Thesaurus of the Hebrew tongue. As an exegete Gesenius is strong only in philology and the other adjutorial branches of interpretation; he affords valuable help in reaching the meaning of the prophet's words, but often sadly fails in apprehending the significance of his thoughts. During his later years he gave much attention to palæography, and his contributions to this branch of inquiry are of first-rate excellence, and leave behind them all preceding works in the same department.

GESHAM (ge'sham), "filthy," a descendant of Judah, probably of the family of Caleb, 1 Chr. ii. 47. In several editions of the Bible it is more accurately called Geshan.

GESHEM (ge'shem), the name of an inveterate enemy of the Jews in the time of Nehemiah, called an Arabian, Neh. ii. 19; vi. 1. He took

It is plain, however, from these notices that Geshur lay in that portion of Syria which was connected with or adjoined to the land of Gilead, and that the conquered but not expelled Geshurites probably dwelt in the rocky fastnesses of Argob. This region is supposed to be the same with what is now called the Lejah, and is remarkable for its singularly wild and rugged scenery. Burckhardt says, "In the interior parts of the Lejah the rocks are in many places cleft asunder, so that the whole hill appears shivered and in the act of falling down," etc. And Porter, after quoting Burckhardt, says, "No description can approach the reality. One cannot repress a shudder when he finds himself in such a den, surrounded by armed hordes, on whose faces the country seems to have stamped its own savage aspect. Ibrahim Pasha, flushed with victory and maddened by the obstinacy of a handful of Druses, attempted to follow them into this stronghold, but scarcely a soldier who entered returned. Every nook concealed an enemy. . . .

The Lejah has for ages been a sanctuary for outlaws, and not unfrequently a refuge for the oppressed."

It was the king of this wild and rocky district, Talmai, king of Geshur, whose daughter Maachah was taken by David for one of his wives, 2 Sam. iii. 3. She was probably a person of superior beauty, as she became the mother of the two handsomest of David's children, Absalom and Tamar. How David should have thought of getting a wife from such a quarter, or what prior link of connection between him and the king of Geshur might have led to such a result, is left unnoticed in the history. But possibly the Geshurites, who are mentioned among the tribes against whom David made incursions while he dwelt in Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, and who, from the name being once found in connection the author of several critical commentaries and other valuable works, besides many articles on Biblical subjects in the Encyclopædie of Ersch and Gruber.

Amongst those by whom service has been rendered to the cause of Old Testament philology, no name stands higher than that of Gesenius. All he has written bears marks of careful study, is characterized by sound judgment and good sense, and is presented in a style remarkably pellucid and simple. It may be objected to his grammatical system that it is too artificial, and presents rather the grammarian's device than a scheme of the actual phenomena of the language—his multiplication of the declensions, for instance, to nine, and his distinction between masculine and feminine declensions, is without support from the actual facts of the language; but there can be no doubt that his grammars are an immense improvement on all that preceded them, and have done more to facilitate and encourage the study of Hebrew than any that have appeared since. To his lexicographical works the only objection that can be offered is that part with Sanballat and Tobiah in endeavoring, first to obstruct the efforts of Nehemiah to repair the state of Jerusalem, and then to plot against his life. But in both respects their designs were frustrated. He is called Gashmu in Neh. vi. 6.

GESHUR (ge'shur), a place or district first associated with Aram or Syria as among the conquests of Jair, the son of Manasseh. After stating that he had three and twenty cities in the land of Gilead, it is said, Jair took "Geshur and Aram, with the towns of Jair, from them, with Kenath, and the towns thereof, three-score cities," 1 Chr. ii. 23. While these places were taken, they were held only as subject territories, still to a great extent occupied by their original inhabitants; for it is expressly stated in Josh. xiii. 13, that notwithstanding that the land of Gilead and the border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites and all Bashan had been subdued, yet "the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites; but the Geshurites and the Maachathites dwell among the Israelites until this day."

with the Philistines, Josh. xiii. 3, are generally supposed to have been a different tribe from the other, may after all have been the same. The Geshurites, very probably, from their fastnesses in Argob, were wont to sally forth, like the Amalekites, in occasional raids upon the districts to the south and east of Palestine without having any settled habitations there; and David might justly regard them (though located at some distance), equally with the Amalekites, who are mentioned along with them, as fair subjects for making reprisals upon. In that case he would be brought into close contact with Talmai first, indeed, as occupying a hostile relation to him, but not unnaturally afterward as wishing to form with him a bond of alliance. Amid the troubles and difficulties which encompassed David's access to the throne, a marriage into the family of the king of Geshur might seem to afford a prospect not to be slighted of strengthening his position. As it ultimately proved, this alliance became the source of one of his greatest dangers in giving birth to the fascinating but restless and aspiring Absalom. Any temporary advantage David might derive from being married to the daughter of such a king was nothing compared with the misfortune of having such a son. And in fleeing, as Absalom did, after committing the outrage on his brother Amnon, to the court of his maternal grandfather at Geshur, 2 Sam. xiii. 37, one can easily understand how secure a refuge he might find there, while he required to be in concealment, but at the same time how unlikely it was his ambition could remain long satisfied with its dreary aspect and dreadful seclusion.

GESHURI (ge-shoo're). 1. The inhabitants of Geshur, Deut. iii. 14. 2. A tribe bordering on the Philistines to the south, Josh. xiii. 2. The same word appears also as—

GESHURITES (ge-shoor'ites). 1. The people of Geshur, Josh. xii. 5; xiii. 11, 13. 2. A tribe of the desert to the south of Palestine, bordering on Arabia and the Philistines, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8.

Olives." St. John is the most specific, who says, "Jesus went forth with his disciples over the brook Kedron, where was a garden, into the which he entered with his disciples." Not even here, however, is the locality closely defined; and putting all together, we learn no more from the sacred penmen than that Gethsemane was a garden—by which is probably to be understood a sort of orchard—on the farther side of the brook Kedron, and somewhere about the foot of the Mount of Olives. The traditionary site—fixed on, it is supposed, at the visit of Helena, the mother of Constantine, in A. D. 326—places it a very little beyond the Kedron (145 feet), and quite near to the church of the Virgin Mary, alleged to have been built over her tomb. Maundrell describes it in his day (1697) as "an even plot of ground, not above fifty-seven yards square, lying between the foot of Mount Olivet and the brook Kedron. It is well planted with olive trees, and those of so old a growth that they are believed to be the same that stood there in our blessed Saviour's time, in virtue of which thoroughfare which must have been connected with the bridge and roads in the immediate neighborhood, that it seems to have been incapable of affording the secrecy indispensable to such a scene. Even the Armenian or Greek site appears too near for the purpose, and some place probably several hundred yards farther up the vale, and to the north-east of the church of St. Mary, is thought by the more judicious explorers to answer better to the requirements of the evangelical narrative. So, for example, Robinson, Thomson, partly also Stanley, Buchanan, etc. It is plain, however, that the materials are wanting for enabling any one to decide with absolute certainty upon the precise spot.

GEUEL (gu'el), a person of the tribe of Gad selected as one of the spies, Num. xiii. 15.

GEYSA, or GAYSA (gi'sah), a Hungarian prince who was at first noted for cruelty. Through the influence of his wife he was converted to Christianity, and became mild. He exerted himself to GESTANTES (jes-tan'tees), a name by which sponsors or godparents were called, from their bearing children in their arms to be baptized by the priest.

GESTATILE (jes'ta-teel), a name given to a portable altar, from the fact that it was movable and could be taken from place to place.

GETHER (ge'ther), one of the sons of Aram, Gen. x. 23; 1 Chr. i. 17. The tribes descended from him have not yet been ascertained.

GETHSEMANE (geth-sem'a-ne), probably compounded of gath, "press," shamna, "oil," "oil-press," a place where oil from the olives growing in the neighborhood was wont to be made; but in gospel history the place which has been rendered for ever sacred and memorable by the last sufferings of our Lord. The descriptions given by the evangelists of this spot are singularly brief and general. With St. Matthew it is merely "a place called Gethsemane;" so also St. Mark; in St. Luke it is "he went, as he was wont, to the Mount of persuasion the olives and olive stones and oil which they produce become an excellent commodity in Spain." That the antiquity of the olives was so very great Maundrell could not believe because of what is related in Josephus, that Titus cut down all the trees within a hundred furlongs of Jerusalem to supply himself with materials for prosecuting the siege. There can, indeed, be no certainty as to the precise age of the trees, but it is admitted by all travelers that the eight which still stand upon the spot in question bear the marks of a venerable antiquity, having gnarled trunks and a thin foliage. Some years ago the plot of ground was bought by the Latin Church; and having been enclosed by a wall, the interior is laid out in walks and flower-beds after the fashion of a modern European garden—a kind of garnishing which cannot be regarded as an improvement. The Armenian or Greek Church, however, denies that this is the actual site, and has fixed upon another as the proper one at some little distance to the north of it. It is doubtful if either is the actual scene of our Lord's agony. The Latin site, in particular, is so near to the city and so close upon the promote Christianity among his people, and to direct their attention to commerce rather than war. He was father of Stephen, the celebrated Magyar saint.

GEZELIUS (geh-zay'le-us), JOHANN and JOHANN G., father and son, successively bishops of Abo, in Finland. The former was born in 1615, became professor of theology at Dorpat, Livonia, and in 1664 was made bishop of Abo. He was eminent for ability and Christian zeal. He wrote several works, among them a Hebrew grammar, a Greek grammar and a Pentaglot dictionary, but his chief work was a Swedish version of the Bible with a commentary; this was an exceedingly valuable work. It was not quite completed when he died, in 1690, and his son, who succeeded him as bishop of Abo, made it his first labor to complete it. The latter also wrote "Nomenclator Adami" and other works. He died, aged 71, in 1718.

GEZER (ge'zer), "cut off," probably "isolated" or "precipitous," one of the ancient cities of Canaan which Joshua took, Josh. x. 33; xii. 12.

It lay upon the western border of the tribe of Ephraim, to whom it was given, but was not at once thoroughly subdued, xvi. 3, 10; Jud. i. 29; 1 Chr. vii. 28. Yet it was a Levitical city, Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Chr. vi. 67. It is named as the point to which David on one occasion pursued the Philistines, 2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chr. xiv. 16; and possibly having revolted, or still being held by the Canaanites, it was destroyed by Pharaoh, and given up to Solomon, who fortified it as an important post, 1 Ki. ix. 15-17. In Maccabean times it was known by the name of Gazera. Its site has not been exactly identified, but it is evident that it must have been beyond the lower Beth-horon toward the sea, Josh. xvi. 3. Once it is named as the same with Gob, 2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chr. xx. 4, and twice it is called Gazer, 2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chr. xiv. 16.

GEZRITES (gez'rites), according to the Masoretic correction and the English text, but more properly GIZRITES, were a tribe dwelling somewhere in the extreme south of the territory of Judah, and mentioned among those who suffered from the incursions of David while he dwelt in the country of the Philistines, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. Nothing further is known of them. Some would identify the name with Gerizim, but without any proper foundation.

GHAUTS (ghawtz), an East Indian term to designate the peculiarly-formed stairs and landing-places on the banks of rivers in Oriental cities. Nowhere in the East can a more remarkable scene be witnessed than the ghauts of Benares at present. A countless number of temples small and great, stone palaces of rajahs resembling fortresses rising above the river and above each other, in apparent confusion, with the ghauts covered with a ceaselessly-moving crowd of people in all the colors of Indian drapery, make up a most impressive picture.

GHAZZALI (gaz-zah'le), ABOU HAMID, Mohammed Ibn Ahmad, an eminent Mohammedan divine and philosopher, was born at Tus, in Khorassan, A. D. 1058. He received a liberal education for his age and country, being versed in law, polemics, philosophy and theology. He traveled extensively, lectured on science and religion and wrote ninety-nine books on various subjects. He died at Tus, his native place, in 1111.

GHETTO (ghet'to), the portion of a city, e. g. in Rome, which was set apart for Jews to live in. The term is derived from a Hebrew word which signifies "separation."

GHISLAIN (ghis'lain) was called the apostle of Belgian Gaul, to which he came in A. D. 633. He founded the convent of St. Ghislain, in the year 641, by the assistance of King Dagobert. There is a legendary tradition to the effect that his ecclesiastical vestments had been carried off by a bear, and an eagle led him to the place where they were found, and here the convent was erected. He also prevailed on a widow, named Waldetrude, to erect a convent at Castrilocus, afterward and at present known as the city of Mons. The tomb of Ghislain, who died in 687, was celebrated for the miraculous cures which were effected at it, especially in cases of epilepsy, which has been designated by the people of Belgium St. Ghislain's evil. Deharveng, an abbot of Bonne-Espérance, wrote a life of Ghislain, in the twelfth century. He was often called Saint Guillain, and he was believed to be a native of Athens, in Greece.

GHOST (gōst), the English form of the German geist, or spirit. Seldom used now in a religious sense except as the designation of the third person in the Trinity—the Holy Ghost. See HOLY GHOST.

GIACOMELLI (j'a-ko-mel'le), MICHEL ANGELO, was born at Pistoia, Italy, in 1495, and became one of the first Italian philologists and literati of his time. He left several proofs of his literary taste and information. Clement XIII. made him archbishop of Chalcedon, and he seemed in fair way of further promotion, when Clement XIV., "the Protestant pope," deprived him of his secretaryship on account of his support of the Jesuits.

GIAFAR (j'a'far), surnamed SADEK, or "the Just," a Mussulman imam, born in 700, acquired great repute amongst his coreligionists by his "Body of Traditions," which are regarded as only inferior to the Koran. He died in 764.

GIAH (ji'ah), a place named, 2 Sam. ii. 24, to indicate the position of the hill of Ammah.

GIANNONE (j'an-no'ne), PIETRO, born in 1676, an Italian historian, the author of "Istoria Civile del Regno di Napoli," a work to which he devoted twenty years. It gained him the applause of the learned, one of whom said that he had "circled his head with a crown, but it was a crown of thorns." And such he soon found true; for the attack which it contains upon the temporal power of Rome, indulgences and saint-worship drew down on the author such a clerical storm that he had to flee for his life and take refuge in Vienna, where he received the protection of Charles VI. But his enemies forced him thence, and persecuted him from city to city, until, entrapped by a false friend into their power, he was cast into prison, where he spent the latter years of his life. Another celebrated work of his is the "Tirregno," a work decidedly anti-papal. He died in 1748.

GIANTS (ji'ants). There are two words in Hebrew which are rendered by this term in English—nephilim and rephaim.

1. The nephilim are first mentioned in the antediluvian period of the world's history, and in connection with the deeds of violence which were the immediate precursors of the divine judgment. "The nephilim (giants) were in the earth in those days, and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they brought forth to them, the same (became) the mighty men which were from of old, men of renown," Gen. vi. 4. All the ancients concur in understanding by nephilim here giants, although the etymology of the word is somewhat doubtful. It is, however, most commonly derived from the causal form of the verb naphal, to fall, hence to make to fall, to fell, fellers—persons whose gigantic strength, coupled with their fierce dispositions, caused every one to fall before them. Those who understand by the sons of God, in the passage just quoted, the angels (such as, in the present day, Delitzsch, Hoffmann, Stier, Kurtz), regard the gigantic race whose heaven-daring exploits brought on the deluge as the offspring of the unnatural alliance between the angelic and human natures; so that the nephilim who are said to have existed in those days are only more particularly described by what follows respecting the alliances in question. This, however, is an opinion pressed into the text, rather than required by the sense of the words. Whatever might be the nature of the connections formed between the sons of God and the daughters of men (for which see SONS OF GOD), the heroes that sprung from them appear to be distinguished from the nephilim, who are mentioned as a class cognate to the other, yet rather superaddition and distinct than properly identical. And in proof of the nephilim being simply a race of men, not hybrids of a lower and higher sphere, though a race of gigantic proportions, we have the same word applied to a class of persons who lived after the Deluge and formed part of the original population of Palestine. The spies who brought back an evil report of the land of Canaan gave it as the climax of the difficulties it presented to their enterprise, "And there we saw the nephilim, sons of Anak, who are of the nephilim, and we were in our own eyes as grasshoppers, and so were we in their eyes," Num. xiii. 33. To say, with some of the authors above referred to, that the Anakim merely gave themselves out to be descendants of those semi-angelic semi-human beings who bore the name of nephilim before the flood, and that the Israelitish spies foolishly accredited the pretension, is again to press an opinion into the text which is rather sought for than actually found there. The whole that can be legitimately gathered from the words is that in the mind and judgment of the Israelitish spies sons of Anak were of the giant class denominated nephilim; and if this may not, in the circumstances, be deemed absolutely conclusive evidence, it still is the testimony of some of the leading members of the community of Israel, and is the best we are acquainted with.

The word nephilim never occurs again in Old Testament scripture, but the sons of Anak, or the Anakim, with whom the spies identified them, are occasionally noticed as a tall and powerful race, dwelling—though only, it would appear, in a few families—about Hebron and some other places, toward the south of the land of Canaan, at the period of the conquest, Deut. ii. 10, 21; ix. 2; Josh. xi. 21. And the whole that the testimony of Scripture amounts to, as regards giants in this most distinctive sense, and in connection with this somewhat peculiar name, is that they existed to a certain extent before the flood, having a share in the flagitious proceedings that precipitated the Deluge; and that they again appeared, or were held by common report to have appeared, in the giant race of the Anakim (the long-necked, as the name imports), who were found by the Israelites in the South of Canaan, and by them nearly extirpated. All else regarding them is but supposition or conjecture.

2. The other word identified with giants in Old Testament scripture, rephaim, seems to have been originally a proper name, and it has ever been matter of doubt whether it was ever used otherwise. In Gen. xiv. 5; xv. 20 the rephaim are mentioned as a distinct race or tribe, holding possessions, along with other tribes, in the land of Canaan. At the period of the conquest, Og, king of Bashan, is said to have remained alone (probably meaning to the east of Jordan) of the remnant of the rephaim, Deut. iii. 11; and then, in proof of this connection with the rephaim, mention is immediately made of his enormous bedstead, which was nine cubits long and four broad. The word was hence very naturally taken in a general sense for giants; and the Septuagint, though not in this passage of Deuteronomy, yet in those of Genesis, and also where the word occurs in Joshua, render it by the common word for giants, gigantes. But the descendants of the Philistine giants, who are elsewhere associated with the Anakim, were also called Rephaim, 2 Sam. xxi. 15-22; and so also were some, probably of the same stock, who dwelt about Mount Ephraim, Josh. xvii. 15. In these latter cases the word is probably used much as a general designation for giants, yet not without respect to their family connection with an ancient race, from which they inherited their vast proportions and their martial prowess. The name originally of a tribe that were peculiarly distinguished for such properties, the word came in the course of time to be applied to those who were remarkable for the properties, whether they were descended from that tribe or from some other similarly distinguished.

of a merely physical nature, are capable of being propagated from parent to child, and even of being nurtured by proper care and precautions into higher and higher degrees of eminence. And in those rude and comparatively unsettled times, when so much depended upon personal strength and valor, and might so often prove itself to be identical with right, there was the greatest inducement for those who possessed such properties in any marked degree to cultivate them to the uttermost, and render them as far as possible a hereditary distinction. In addition to the security furnished by the properties themselves, the very name they acquired for their possessors was itself a defence. But it could only be so while the ruder stages of society lasted. As art and skill, and mental resources of all kinds, increase, mere ani-

GIB, ADAM, a Scotch Presbyterian divine, born in 1714, was one of the founders of the Secession Church. He was nicknamed "Pope Gib," on account of his imperious dictation and intolerance. He remained loyal during the rebellion of 1745, and preached openly against it in Edinburgh, even when the Pretender was there. He was a leader of the Anti-Burgher party.

GIBBAR (gib'bar), one whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 20. In the corresponding list, Neh. vii. 25, the name is Gibeon. It is likely that the well-known city is meant.

Besides the Anakim and Rephaim, as originally distinct tribes or families that were accounted giants, we are told also of two others that belonged substantially to the same class—the Emim and the Zamzumim, Deut. ii. 10, 20. Tallness and strength are predicated of these families, such as assimilated them to the Anakim; so that they were also classed with the giant races.

Very little specific information is given us either of the races that thus distinctively bore the name of giants or of any individuals of their number. We know that they exceeded in stature and in robustness of frame the tribes or families that dwelt around them, but distinctions of this sort are always relative, and possibly the actual size and bodily strength of the giants of Scripture did not surpass what is often found in individuals, and even in whole families, in modern times. Qualities of this description, it is well known, like others mal strength and corporeal stature come to be relatively of less avail; and so it was only in the infancy of the world that the simply giant-races could maintain the ascendancy, and to that period accordingly the traditions connected with them properly belong. Their power and prestige necessarily gave way before the advance of knowledge and civilization; and nothing could more clearly show the inferiority of the one, as compared with the other's ground of stability and might, than the gradual decay and ultimate disappearance of the races that anciently hung around the borders of Canaan, and for a time spread far and wide the terror of their name. The settlement even of imperfectly organized communities reduced them to comparative insignificance; and the establishment afterward by God of a commonwealth founded in truth and righteousness left them ere long without a name or a possession in the land.

the tribe of Dan, Josh. xix. 14. So late as the times of Nadab and Baasha it still belonged to the Philistines, and it was while engaged there in a vigorous siege that Baasha, one of Nadab's officers, smote his master and took possession of the throne, 1 Ki. xv. 27; xvi. 15, and during a later siege that Zimri conspired against Elah, xvi. 8-17. Nothing is known of its exact site.

GIBBON (gib'bun), EDWARD, the celebrated historian, was born at Putney in 1737; sent to Westminster School, but soon transferred to a private tutor; then to Magdalen College, Oxford, where he became a convert to the Romish Church, and finally to Lausanne, where he renounced the Catholic faith without embracing any other, and became a confirmed skeptic. On returning to England, he entered upon the duties of active life, but read much and prepared himself for authorship.

In 1763 he went to Italy, and while sitting amidst the ruins of the Capitol at Rome he conceived the idea of writing the history of the decline and fall of that city. In the mean time, he joined M. Deyvurdun, a Swiss scholar, in publishing a journal called "Mémoires Littéraires de la Grand Brétagne," which met with no success. In 1770 he began his celebrated history of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," the first volume of which, in quarto, appeared in 1776, the second and third in 1781, and the concluding three volumes in 1788. Previous to this undertaking Mr. Gibbon was chosen member of Parliament for Liskeard; and when hostilities commenced between England and France, in 1778, he was employed to draw up the manifesto on that occasion, for which he was made commissioner of the Board of Trade, but lost the place on the change of administration in 1783. He then went to reside at Lausanne, where he continued till the French Revolution obliged him to return to England, and died in 1794. Mr. Gibbon's great history abounds with proofs of immense learning, of a mind penetrating and sagacious and of almost unrivaled talents for ridicule. Gibbon was an infidel, and on every occasion where he had to allude to Christianity his dislike and scorn appear. His cold, unsympathetic, sarcastic manner of treating Christianity and the history of the Church excited, not without reason, both anger and regret among religious men, and many attacks were made on him. His skepticism led him into mistakes which he would have avoided, only for the tendency of his moral state; and the replies of Milman have been acknowledged as most triumphant demonstrations on the side of religion. Christianity and the Church survive his ridicule, and the history outlives the invectives of its fierce critics. No other proof of the learning and splendor which pervade the "Decline and Fall" is needed than the fact, perhaps unparalleled, that, notwithstanding the very great advance made in historical studies and criticism during the present century, it still holds its place as the history of the period it embraces. It has been frequently reprinted, and is almost as well known in other European countries as in England. Gibbon was the author of various other works, but they need not be here particularized.

GIBBONS, THOMAS, D.D., a Congregational minister who presided over the church in Haberdasher's Hall, London. He was born at Reak, in Cambridgeshire, in the year 1720. He presided over his church from 1743 until 1785, when he died. Before his settlement in London he became acquainted with Dr. Watts, and their intimacy continued through life. He was the author of a work on rhetoric, "Lives of Pious Women," a "Memoir of Dr. Watts." Several volumes of sermons which he left behind him were published, and he was distinguished for his metrical powers, as several hymns of his composition are still in use in different churches.

GIBBS, JOSIAH D., LL.D., was born in Salem, Massachusetts, in the year 1790, and educated in Yale College, where he acted as tutor from 1811 until 1815. In Andover he devoted himself to the study of Biblical literature, including Hebrew, and his first appearance as an author was a translation of Storr's work, "The Historical Sense of the New Testament," which was followed by a translation of the "Hebrew Lexicon" of Gesenius. In 1824 he was made lecturer in sacred literature in Yale College, and in 1826 he was appointed professor of the same branch. He was a profound scholar and a frequent contributor to sacred literature, usually in the pages of leading journals, such as the Biblical Repository, the Christian Spectator, the American Journal of Science and the New Englander. Of these contributions several volumes were formed, under the titles of "Theological Studies" and "Teutonic Etymology." He died at New Haven in the year 1861.

GIBEA (gib'e-ah), a name in the genealogy of Judah, 1 Chr. ii. 49. It would seem to denote a place rather than a person; perhaps it was locally within the territory of Judah, but this is uncertain.

GIBEAH (gib'e-ah), "hill." 1. Of the places that bore this name, the most noted was called Gibeah of Benjamin, sometimes also Gibeah of Saul, 1 Sam. xi. 4; xiii. 2. It was the birthplace of Saul, and continued to be his residence after he became king, 1 Sam. x. 26; xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1. It was doubtless on this account that it was chosen as the scene of that mournful tragedy in which seven of Saul's sons were executed together, at the suit of the Gibeonites, for wrongs inflicted upon them by Saul's bloody house, and which drew forth a singularly touching manifestation of maternal tenderness on the part of Rizpah, the mother of two of the victims, 2 Sam. xxi. Stanley would rather identify this transaction with Gibeon, from its being said that the seven men were "hung in the hill before the Lord;" which seems to indicate the immediate neighborhood of the tabernacle then standing at Gibeon. But the expression might be used with reference to the Lord's judgment in the matter: it was done as in his presence, because of the respect it had to his manifested displeasure. Gibeah had been also the scene of tragedies of a still more mournful and distressing nature at an earlier period—first in respect to the atrocities perpetrated upon the concubine of the Levite who, on his way to Mount Ephraim, tarried there for the night, and then in respect to the bloody and destructive war which ensued between Benjamin and the other tribes, Jud. xix.-xxi. The account of the affair forms one of the darkest spots in the records of Israelitish history; and not only Gibeah, but the whole tribe of Benjamin, came by it to the very brink of destruction. By the time of Saul, however, Gibeah must have again attained to considerable prosperity and importance.

The comparative nearness of Gibeah to Jerusalem, and the notices respecting it in ancient writers as well as Scripture, have left little doubt as to the precise hill on which it was situated. It is now called Tuleil-el-Fül, the hill of the Beans. It is distinctly seen from Jerusalem, and lies nearly right north from it, at the distance of four or five miles, on the way to Ramah and Bethel. No remains, however, exist of the ancient city, unless a confused heap of earth and stones can be called such. Even in Jerome's day the city had become a ruin; for when giving a narrative of Paula's journey, and noticing that she stopped at Gabaa, and called to mind its ancient crime, and the concubine cut in pieces, he states that it was then leveled to the ground. The hill is so situated as to command extensive views of the surrounding country, especially in the direction of the Dead Sea and the mountains on its farther side.

2. GIBEAH, a town in Mount Ephraim where the high-priest Eleazar, son of Aaron, was buried by Phinehas his son, Josh. xxiv. 33. Our English version, however, translates Gibeah there, and says Eleazar "was buried in a hill." There was possibly no town on it at that time, but by and by there certainly appears to have been a town bearing the name; and in the Onomasticon it is set down as at five Roman miles from Gophna, on the road to Shechem. Dr. Robinson supposed it to have been in the Wady-el-Jib, a narrow valley about halfway between Shechem and Jerusalem. It was probably the same with what was called Gibeah-in-the-field, Jud. xxiv. 31.

3. GIBEAH. There appears to have been a town of this name in Judah, though only mentioned once, and with no indication of its precise locality, Josh. xv. 57. It is supposed to have been the same with the Gabbatha of Eusebius and Jerome, which they place at twelve miles on the way to Eleutheropolis.

4. The place where the house of Abinadab was, where the ark was left, 2 Sam. vi. 3, 4. But the word should have been translated, it was "the hill of Kirjath-jearim," where Abinadab's residence was. See GIBEATH.

There are some other places where the word Gibeah occurs in the original, but where our translators have rendered it into English "hill." In some of these perhaps it would have been better to treat it as a proper name.

GIBEAH-HAARALOTH (gib'e-ah-ha-ar'-a-loth), "hill of the foreskins," a place so called because the children of Israel were circumcised there, Josh. v. 3, marg. See GILGAL.

GIBEATH (gib'e-ath), a city enumerated among those allotted to the tribe of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 28. It is often supposed to be identical with Gibeah of Saul. If such were the case, it would have been grouped with Gibeon and Ramah, close to which places Gibeah stood, rather than with Jerusalem. It is rather Gibeah of Kirjath—i. e., the hill of Kirjath—afterward mentioned in connection with the preservation of the ark in Abinabab's house, 1 Sam. vii. 1; 2 Sam. vi. 3, 4. If, however, this be admitted, the number of cities (fourteen) assigned to Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 28, is not made up. But this is not a fatal objection.

GIBEATHITE (gib'e-ath-ite), an inhabitant of Gibeah, 1 Chr. xii. 3.

GIBEON (gib'e-on), one of the ancient royal cities of the Canaanites; a "great city" of the Hivites, who at an early stage of Joshua's conquests entered into a stratagem to get terms of peace for themselves. Taking old clothes on their persons and bread dry and mouldy in their bags, they professed to come from a far country; and having heard by report of the wonderful things done by Israel, they sought an alliance with them. So craftily did the Gibeonites play their part that the chiefs of the congregation of Israel had agreed to the proposal before they had any suspicion of the artifice used on the occasion. It was also resolved that the covenant entered into should be religiously preserved, but that, to mark the sense entertained of the conduct of the Gibeonites, a perpetual service should be laid upon them; they were to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the tabernacle of the Lord for ever, Josh. ix. Gibeon fell afterward to the lot of Benjamin, and stood a little to the west of Gibeah, about eight or ten miles from Jerusalem. It was also made a Levitical city, and the tabernacle was transferred thither from Nob after the slaughter of the priests, and remained for a considerable time, though without the ark, which was brought by David to Jerusalem and placed first in a new tabernacle, and ultimately in the temple, 1 Chr. xvi. 39; 2 Chr. i. 3, 4. Solomon, at the commencement of his reign, went to Gibeon and sacrificed a thousand burnt-offerings, where also in a dream by night he received from God an assurance of the great wisdom and prosperity that were to be given to him. We have no subsequent notice of Gibeon in Israelitish history, and almost the only earlier one we have, besides those already mentioned, is what is stated of the engagement by twelve chosen champions on each side, between the men of David and Abner, who all fell, each by the hand of his fellow. It was by the "Pool of Gibeon," of which remains are still said to appear, that the conflict took place, 2 Sam. ii.

Gibeon was a place of some importance from its being the key to the pass of Beth-horon, and it probably continued during all the better times of Israelitish history to be well fortified. It has been identified with the village El-Jib. "This village stands on the top of a little isolated hill, composed of horizontal layers of limestone, here and there forming regular steps, in some places steep and difficult of access, and everywhere capable of being strongly fortified. Round it is spread out one of the finest and richest plains in Central Palestine, meadow-like in its smoothness and verdure, dotted near the village with vineyards and olive groves, and sending out branches like the rays of a star-fish among the rocky acclivities that encircle it. The houses of El-Jib are scattered irregularly over the broad summit of the hill, whose sides, where not too steep, are covered with trees and terraced vineyards. They are almost all, in whole or in part, ancient, but in a sadly dilapidated state. One massive building still stands among them, and was probably a kind of citadel. The lower rooms of Saul that this atrocity was perpetrated, when, being forsaken of God and given up to the morbid and tortuous workings of an evil spirit, his zeal took the most arbitrary and capricious directions. And it might be partly on this account that the reign of Saul was allowed to close without any special account being taken of the crime, or any peculiar visitation of judgment being sent to chastise it. But other reasons must have led to its being called into remembrance and made the ground of a protracted famine, as it was, in the latter days of David's administration. This plainly implied that David's house and people needed to have their attention solemnly called to the matter, and had to receive from it a warning against incurring similar judgments in the time to come. Suffering under the rebuke of a three years' famine, David inquired of the Lord, and found that it was

are vaulted, the arches being semicircular and of admirable workmanship. On the western side of the hill, at the foot of a low cliff, is a fine fountain springing up in a cave excavated in the rock so as to form a large subterranean reservoir. Not far below it, among the venerable olive trees, are the remains of an open reservoir, similar to the large one at Hebron."

GIBEONITES (gib'e-on-ites). The remnants of the ancient inhabitants of Gibeon have acquired an unhappy notoriety from an incidental notice recorded of them in the history of the times of David. Saul, it is said, in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah, had sought to slay them, and had put many of them to death, though he did not succeed in utterly destroying them, 2 Sam. xxi. 2, violating, while he did so, the covenant and oath given to their forefathers at the time of the conquest. It was in all probability in the latter days

"for Saul and his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites." On learning this, David left it to the Gibeonites themselves to say what they would regard as a proper satisfaction; and they demanded that seven sons of the man who had consumed them, and who had even meditated their complete extermination, should be publicly executed. David acceded to their request; and it is said "the Lord was entreated for the land," ver. 14. There is not the slightest evidence for the allegation which has been sometimes made against David, that he purposely contrived or greedily fell in with this device, in order to weaken the house of Saul and place it under a darker stigma. On the contrary, David's conduct throughout to that house was in the highest degree generous and noble, and at the very time when this fresh public calamity befell it he took occasion to have the bones of Saul and Jonathan, along with the bones of the seven now publicly hanged, gathered together and honorably buried in the sepulchre of Kish. This was not like the procedure of a man who had a grudge to satisfy against the fallen, and secretly rejoiced over their deeper prostration. Indeed, David had no longer any need to be afraid of the house of Saul; the foes of his kingdom, as the rebellion of Absalom had too clearly shown, were to be found nearer home: they were those of his own house. And on this very account both he and they required to be admonished, by every available means of instruction, of the righteousness that ever characterizes God's administration, and which ought in a measure to be found also in that of the earthly king-what took place, both in perfect unison with the divine plan; and if we knew the circumstances more fully, even the details might admit of a reasonable explanation.

GIBERTI (je-ber'te), GIOVANNI MATTEO, a learned Italian prelate, bishop of Verona, born in 1495 at Palermo. He was one of the prelates who drew up the propositions submitted to the Council of Trent. He was the patron of learned men, and had in his palace a printing-press, from which issued a beautiful edition of St. Chrysostom's "Homilies on St. Paul's Epistles," besides the works of other Greek Fathers. He was held in high esteem for learning and piety. He died in 1543.

GIBIEUF (zhe-beuf'), GUILLAUME, a French theologian, doctor of the Sorbonne. He was one of the five founders of "The Fathers of Oratory of the Holy Jesus," not the Italian society of the same name, but a French brotherhood intended to oppose the Jesuits and to promote the knowledge of general literature. He was called the "Precursor of Jansenism," and yet he showed himself its firm opponent, and forbade its books being read.

GIBLITES (gib'lites), who plainly belonged to the Phœnician territory, are understood to have been the people of Byblus, a city of the Phœnicians between Tripoli and Berytus. The Hebrews seem to have called it Gebal. "The land of the Giblites" is coupled with "all Lebanon," as together belonging to the territory of the Israelites on the northern side. And in connection with the shipping and merchandise of Tyre, the prophet Ezekiel mentions "the ancients of Gebal" as furnishing calkers, or perhaps generally ship-carpenters, Ezek. xxvii. 9. The Giblites are not mentioned in immediate connection with the affairs of Israel.

If they did come into direct contact with these, it must have been for evil, and not for good, for Byblus was the seat of the worship of the Syrian Tammuz or Adonis—a worship which certainly found its way, among other corruptions, into the later idolatries of the Jewish people, Ezek. viii. 14; but whether directly from Byblus, or from other parts of Phœnicia, we have no means of ascertaining.

GIBSON (gib'son), EDMUND, born in 1669, an able and learned divine, successively bishop of Lincoln and of London. He lost the favor of the prime minister, Walpole, by his zealous support of the cause of the Church, and incurred the enmity of George II. by his denunciation of the profligacy of his court. Bishop Gibson was a great Saxon scholar, and at the age of twenty-two he published the "Chronicon Saxonicum," with a Latin translation, and also an English translation of Camden's "Britannia," accompanied with learned additions; but his great work was "Codex Juris Eccl. Anglicanæ," a methodical digest of the statutes, constitution, canons, rubrics and articles of the Church of England. Bishop Gibson was an active and thoughtful ruler in the Church, and was as good a Christian as a learned man. He died in 1748.

GIBSON, ROBERT, emigrated from Ireland with his parents to the United States in the year 1793. His father, the Rev. William Gibson, was pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian church of Ryegate, in the State of Vermont, and his son Robert, who was educated in Philadelphia, was ordained and settled at Beaver Dam, in 1819. He was removed to New York in 1831, when he was installed as pastor of the Second Reformed Presbyterian church of that city. He took a leading part in the discussions which terminated in the disruption of the Reformed Church, and wrote several pamphlets in support of his views. He died in 1837, greatly regretted by an attached people.

GICHTEL (gikh'tel), JOHANN GEORG, was a distinguished German lawyer who adopted the mystic principles of Jacob Böhme, and who devoted his life to their dissemination. He prepared the first edition of Böhme's works for publication; and having abandoned the law and given himself to the cause which he had adopted, he seems to have gone farther than his teacher. Few if any could understand the utterances of Böhme; but mystic as Gichtel was, he made it clear enough that he considered his own statements as being superior to Scripture. He was removed from the list of lawyers, cast into prison and ultimately banished. As all wild systems generally gain adherents, so he had followers in different parts of Holland. They were called Gichtelians or Brothers of the Angels. He was born in 1638 at Ratisbon, and died in Holland in 1710 in a state of poverty. As late as the beginning of the nineteenth century he had followers in Berlin, Altona, Halle and Magdeburg.

GIDDALTI (gid-dal'te), a Levite of the sons of Heman, the head of a division of singers, 1 Chr. xxv. 4, 29.

GIDDEL (gid'del), two persons whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon, Ezra ii. 47, 56; Neh. vii. 49, 58.

GIDDINGS (gid'dingz), ROCKWOOD, who rose to be president of the Baptist college of Georgetown, and who gained great celebrity for his financial ability and great success, was born in Plymouth, in New Hampshire, in the year 1812. He was educated in Waterville College, and he settled in Virginia and commenced to study medicine. In consequence of having felt what he believed to be a call to preach the gospel, he was ordained, and settled in the Baptist church at Shelbyville, Kentucky, from which place he was removed to the presidency of the college. He was a most effective officer, of great administrative talent; but his zeal and ceaseless labor brought on disease, under which he sunk, and he died in the year 1839, sincerely and deservedly lamented by all who had known him.

dom which more peculiarly represented it. If the latter failed in this respect, judgment must infallibly come, and it might even go down from one generation to another as a descending and entailed curse; for though passing into different hands, the kingdom in Israel, as imaging the character and government of God, was still in a sense one. It was especially for the purpose of teaching these truths, and by solemn transactions in history impressing them deeply on the mind, that the circumstances now referred to were appointed by God. All must know, and in particular the reigning house in Israel must know, that God required faithfulness to covenant-engagements, and that if they violated these their own measure must be meted back to them. This is the general principle and design of GIDEON (gid'e-on), "cutter down," "destroyer;" called also from an action in his life, Jerubbaal—i. e., "Baal-striver," one who contends or pleads against Baal—the fifth in order of the men whom the Lord successively raised up to deliver and judge Israel. He was the son of Joash, the least, as he himself said, meaning thereby perhaps the youngest, in his father's house, Jud. vi. 15. The house was of the tribe of Manasseh, and Joash himself, with his family, dwelt at Ophrah; but whether this lay in the territory of Manasseh to the east of Jordan, in the land of Gilead, or in that to the west, has not been conclusively determined. As, however, the chief scene of Gideon's great exploit with the Midianites was manifestly on the west of Jordan, and his future residence also on the same side, somewhere in the neighborhood of Shechem, the probabilities undoubtedly are in favor of the supposition that both Ophrah and the family of Gideon belonged to the western division of Manasseh. Mount Gilead, indeed, is named in connection with the movement of Gideon against Midian, but probably only as the first place of rendezvous for his army, Jud. vii. 3. For the sake of security he might be obliged to assemble the people on the mountainous lands to the east of Jordan. Stanley and others, without any authority from MSS., would substitute Gilboa for Gilead in the passage referred to. This is otherwise objectionable, as one does not see how thousands from Asher, Naphtali, about and beyond Esdraelon, could have been able to meet on Gilboa, with the Midianite host lying between.

Gideon appeared on the theatre of affairs in a time of general blacksliding, and when great oppression was exercised over Israel by the Midianites. So completely had this warlike Arabian race recovered from the terrible slaughter they sustained at the hand of the Israelites shortly before the death of Moses, Num. xxxi., that now, probably about 200 years later, they had come up in prodigious force and numbers, so as entirely to overpower the children of Israel. For the better accomplishment of their purpose they had entered into a league with the Amalekites and other tribes of the desert, and the united bands at last overspread the territory of Canaan with hordes of cattle and multitudes of camels to an extent which threatened to consume the whole produce of the land. The people of Israel fled wherever they could into dens and caves and strongholds. They durst scarcely venture into the light of day, even to provide themselves with the means necessary for their support; and the valiant Gideon, when threshing wheat for his family, had to carry on his operations beside the wine-press instead of on the open threshing-floor, in order to escape the notice of the Midianites. Such was the position and such the employment in which he was found by the angel of the Lord, who appeared to him and said, "Jehovah is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." It was a startling address, and one that seemed rather like a bitter irony when viewed in connection with the existing state of affairs than the words of soberness and truth. Therefore Gideon replied, "O my Lord, if Jehovah be with us, why then is all this befallen us? and where be all the miracles which our fathers told us of, saying, Did not Jehovah bring us up from Egypt? But now Jehovah hath forsaken us, and delivered us into the hands of the Midianites." The desponding tone of the reply was not unnatural in the circumstances, and what followed was designed to reassure his mind and brace him with energy and fortitude for the occasion. Jehovah, it is said—for instead of the angel of Jehovah, as formerly, it is now Jehovah himself—"Jehovah looked upon him, and said, Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites; have not I sent thee?" Gideon still expressed his fear of the result, mentioning his own comparative insignificance and that of his father's family, but was again met with a word of encouragement: "Surely, I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man."

Gideon's heart now began to take courage, but to make him sure that it really was a divine messenger he was dealing with and that the commission he had received was from the Lord, he requested a sign from heaven; and it was given him in connection with an offering, which he was allowed to present, of a kid and some unleavened cakes. These the angel touched with the tip of his staff, and a fire presently rose out of the rock and consumed them. Immediately the angel himself disappeared, though not till he had by a word of peace quieted the mind of Gideon, which had become agitated by the thought of having seen the face of the Lord. And now, as a preparation for the work of deliverance to which he was called, and to make it evident in whose name and might he was going to undertake it, he proceeded to do the part of a practical reformer in his father's house. The family of Joash also had fallen under the prevailing spirit of idolatry; images of Baal and Ashterah (improperly translated grove in ch. vi. 25, 28) were standing on his father's property; and these, in obedience to a vision granted him during the ensuing night, Gideon cut down, and in their stead reared an altar to Jehovah and offered on it a burnt-sacrifice. So strong was the spirit of idolatry in his father's household and among the people of Ophrah generally that he felt it necessary to accomplish this work of reform and sacrifice, with the help of a few chosen men, during the dead of night; and on the morrow, when they knew who had done it, they demanded of Joash the life of his son. But Joash, who had probably learned from Gideon the instruction on which he acted, refused to interfere; he boldly challenged them to take up the cause of Baal, and even called upon Baal to show his power, if he had any, by avenging it himself. This seems to have had the desired effect. Joash called his son Jerubbaal (Baal-striver), and was content to leave it to the decisions of Providence whether Gideon or Baal was to prevail in the conflict.

The matter was not long in coming to an issue. The Midianites and Amalekites, in a mighty host, had pitched in the splendid valley of Esdraelon, intending, no doubt, as heretofore, to feast themselves at pleasure on the fat of the land. But "the Spirit of the Lord came on Gideon," and he blew the trumpet through Abiezer first, then throughout Manasseh, Asher and Naphtali; and presently thousands responded to the call and gathered themselves around him. It might have seemed as if this were enough, and that he might now proceed with a dauntless spirit to the conflict with the enemy. But the weakness and backsliding of the past still lingered in the soul of Gideon, and, like an ill-omened apparition, rose up and shook his resolution when the moment for action arrived. He again, therefore, cast himself on the mercy of God, and craved, in addition to former assurances, a double sign—first, that dew might fall on a fleece, while the earth around remained dry, and next, that the earth might be wetted with dew, while none fell upon the fleece. Both signs were granted;

so that Gideon could no longer doubt he had the direction and support of Heaven on his side. But having thus tried God, he had himself in turn to be tried. Situated as Israel at the time was, too much appearance of preparation for the coming struggle was as much to be deprecated and feared as too little—more, indeed, as regarded the spiritual interests at stake. It was not simply victory that they needed, but such a victory as would display the finger of Jehovah, and so magnify his power in their eyes as to shame them out of their false confidence in Baal. Therefore, since so many had assembled around the standard of Gideon, lest they should vaunt themselves and imagine that their own hand might achieve for them a victory, Gideon was put upon measures that would reduce his effective force to a very limited number. He was first of all to proclaim that whosoever was of a fearful spirit should return; and two-thirds of the numbers who had rallied around him took advantage of the liberty which this proclamation gave them: twenty-two thousand left, and only ten remained. But even this force appeared much too great, and by another, apparently somewhat arbitrary, test, it was reduced from thousands to hundreds. Gideon was ordered to bring them down to the water (what water we are not told, and it is vain to conjecture), and to separate those who lapped of the water with the tongue, as a dog lappeth, from those who bent down on their knees to drink. The lapping is more particularly explained by the persons who took that method being said to put their hand to their mouth, ch. vii. 6. There were only three hundred of them who did so; and the Lord said to Gideon, "By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand." It was but a slight circumstance that marked the difference between them and the others, but still it indicated a specific quality; they were the persons that took the more expeditious method of quenching their thirst, and thereby gave proof of a nimbleness and alacrity which bespoke a fitness for executing quick movements in attacking or pursuing an enemy. This affords a perfectly sufficient and natural explanation, and there is no need for resorting, as many do, to peculiar usages in the East, and no one who knows anything of the manners of people in rural and highland districts can need to be told how common it is for them, when wishing to get a hasty refreshment at a running stream, to lift the water to their mouths in the palm of their hand, instead of leisurely bending down or laying themselves along to get a fuller draught.

The three hundred men, therefore, were given to Gideon as a select band with which he was to put to flight the congregated force of Midian and Amalek. The rest were not sent home, but kept in their tents, to be ready when occasion called for them. The three hundred were divided into three companies, and each, in addition to their swords, supplied with a trumpet, and an earthen pitcher containing a lamp. The pitcher merely served to conceal the lamp till it was necessary that this should be exhibited. It was arranged that in the dead of night they were to approach the enemy at three different points, and at one and the same moment, all following the example set by Gideon himself, were to break their pitchers, hold up their lamps in the one hand, and blow with their trumpets in the other, so as to create the impression of their being but the advance-guard of an immense attacking force. The manœuvre, employed as it was under the divine sanction, and after an encouraging visit paid to the Midianitish camp in the earlier part of the night by Gideon and his servant, had the desired effect; the enemy were struck with a sudden panic, and thrown into inextricable confusion, when thus they perceived so many lights flashing on them and heard so many trumpets, accompanied by the loud war-cry, "The sword of the Lord (Jehovah) and of Gideon." They fell by the sword, not merely of Gideon and his valiant little band, but also of one another, not being able in the terror of the moment and the darkness of night to distinguish friend from foe. And thus a dreadful slaughter and discomfiture ensued, which was followed up on the next and following days by a general rising of the people in the surrounding districts, who proved of great service in consummating the triumph, however disinclined they might be to face the enemy in his strength. No fewer than 120,000, it is said, fell in the conflict, Jud. viii. 10, besides what might afterward be slain of the 15,000 that escaped, in the first instance, with Zeba and Zalmunna, but were overtaken, and in a subsequent battle defeated by Gideon. "Thus," as the sacred historian remarks, "was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more," Jud. viii. 28. They never regained sufficient strength from the disaster to assume an attitude of hostility against Israel; and the references made in later writings to the victory of Gideon point to it as emphatically a day of Jehovah's right hand, in which he completely prostrated the strength of a most powerful enemy, Isa. ix. 4; x. 26; Hab. iii. 7; Ps. lxxxiii. 9. There were, however, certain abatements to the honors of the day. The Ephraimites were displeased at not having been called at the first by Gideon to take part in the enterprise, and were only quieted by his according to them the praise of having done more at the end for the common cause than he did at the beginning, Jud. viii. 1-3. They should, in truth, have needed no such soothing compliment, but should rather in thoughtful silence have marked how peculiarly the hand of God had ordered as well the circumstances that preceded as those that accompanied the conflict. The men of Succoth offended in a different way; they acted a cowardly part to the last, and refused to supply Gideon and his party with a few loaves of bread when faint with pursuing Zeba and Zalmunna, the two kings of Midian, who had managed to escape. Succoth lay to the east of Jordan, at no great distance from the border of the Midianitish territory, and the men of the place, no doubt, thought that in their case discretion was the better part of valor; that it was too much to ask them openly to befriend a pursuing force, so long as such powerful neighbors as Zeba and Zalmunna were still alive; nor would it seem at all likely to them that much success could attend Gideon's army in their attempt to carry the war into the native country of the Midianites. In this case, however, as so often happens in great emergencies, worldly wisdom proved a poor substitute for a humble and reliant faith; and by the chastisement inflicted on the men of Succoth, on Gideon's return, they were taught a salutary lesson, which, it may be hoped, was not without permanent advantage to them, Jud. viii. 13-16.

The results of the victory wrought by God through the instrumentality of Gideon were not such, at least in a spiritual respect, as might have been expected. External rest followed, and lasted, it is said, for forty years, to the close of Gideon's lifetime. But the spirit of idolatry was far from being subdued, and even in Gideon's own household sprung into efflorescence during that period of outward peace and prosperity. Gideon himself behaved nobly, having refused to take the place of supreme ruler or king when requested by the people; he said, No, "neither I nor my son shall rule over you; Jehovah shall rule over you," Jud. viii. 23. He would have no personal recompense for the services he had rendered his people, except that every one would give him the earrings of his prey; and even this, though amounting to 1700 shekels' weight of gold, he would not appropriate to his private use, but turned it into the form of an ephod—the more distinctive part of the priest's attire—and placed it in the town of Ophrah. He obviously meant it to serve as a sacred memorial of the Lord's goodness, and to point men's attentions away from himself, as the mere instrument, to Jehovah, by whose grace and counsel and might the work of deliverance had really been won. But the gross spirit of the times in great measure defeated this object. The golden ephod "became a snare to Gideon and to his house;" it was turned into a sort of idol. Success had also marred the simplicity of Gideon's manners, and by degrees introduced looseness and disorder into his family. He took to himself many wives and concubines, who brought him indeed a numerous offspring, there being no fewer than seventy sons; but it inevitably brought also the usual attendants of polygamy, a brood of domestic jealousies, corruptions and miseries. The moral influence of the family ceased apparently even before Gideon himself had finished his career; for as soon as he was gone the men of his very place and neighborhood were ripe for a general movement in favor of idolatry, and they agreed together to make Baal-berith—that is, Baal of the covenant—their God, Jud. viii. 33. The state of the case seems to have been that they concurred in setting up an idol to worship and erecting an idol temple; hence, in reference to the Shechemites, we read of the house of their god Berith, Jud. ix. 46. It implied that the Israelites made a compromise with the surrounding heathenism; the object of their common worship was to be a Baal, but Baal of the covenant; not, therefore, absolutely and formally different from Jehovah, but Jehovah under a special name and character, consequently worshiped in a manner that he could not regard. Can we wonder, after such a defection, that the spirit of evil should break out, as it so soon did, with the violence of a whirlwind, in Gideon's house and among the people of Abiezer? The family, on which the sun of divine favor had for a time shone so brightly, became in the next generation a plague and a ruin, itself receiving into its bosom the vial of Heaven's wrath, and in its calamitous course becoming the occasion of involving multitudes around it in the same—a most striking proof in its history both how righteousness exalts and how sin becomes the ruin of any people.

GIDEONI (gid-e-o'ne), the father of Abidan, prince of Benjamin in the wilderness, Num. i. 11; ii. 22; vii. 60, 65; x. 24.

GIDOM (gi'dum), a place to which the pursuit of the Benjamites extended after the battle of Gibeah, Jud. xx. 45.

GIER-EAGLE (geer-ea'g'l) [Heb. racham and rachamah]. This word occurs only in the enumeration of birds prohibited by the law of Moses as unclean; in the former form in Lev. xi. 18, in the latter in Deut. xiv. 17. The Septuagint have rendered it "swan" in the former case, and "hawk" in the latter. The Hebrew word ordinarily signifies bowels of compassion, and commentators have sought to establish an identity with one species or another founded on the distinctive habits of the bird, but with little success.

Bruce, however, has sufficiently shown that the bird must be the Egyptian vulture—Neophron percnopterus—which is abundant in the East, and is popularly called Pharaoh's chicken. But it is also well known by the name rachamah, which is literally the old Hebrew appellation. The traveler just cited considers that this name, alluding to the signification mentioned above, commemorates the fact that this vulture was sacred to Isis, and considered an emblem of parental affection. At present the bird, though horribly filthy and obscene in its habits, is held in such esteem in Egypt that a penalty attaches to any one who kills it near the great cities. This probably is only for its usefulness as a scavenger. The Neophron enjoys a wide geographical range, since it occurs over the whole of Asia, Europe and Africa. It has even been taken in England and Norway. It is rather a conspicuous bird, for the plumage is wholly white, except a band of black across each wing; the beak, naked face, legs and feet are yellow. The food, as with other vultures, is mainly carrion; but when this is scarce, it will prey upon snakes, lizards and frogs.

GIESELER (gees'ler), JOHANN KARL LUDWIG, stands in the front rank of Church historians. He was born in 1793 at Petershagen, near Minden. His father and his grandfather were both ministers in the Lutheran Church. His early instruction was gained at home, whence he was transferred to Halle, where in the orphan house he studied Latin, and his well-known scholarship afterward gained him a mastership in this institution. He served as a soldier for two years, and in 1815 he returned to his former place, whence he removed in 1817 to Minden. The following year he went to Cleves, and in 1819 he became professor of theology in the new university of Bonn. His name became famous because of his "Essay on the Origin and Earliest History of the Written Gospels" and his "Text-Book of Church History," the latter being published in 1824. He removed to Göttingen in 1831, and here he labored till his death. His reputation rests on his history, which is acknowledged to be a monument of research and a model of arrangement and accuracy. It has been called dry and lifeless. It is defective in warmth and coloring, but it is almost perfect as a text-book, which he intended it to be. The possessor of this work may consider that he owns a large library, for every statement made in the text is proved by accurate quotations from the words of the man or the decree of the council referred to. The words of Augustine, of Jerome, of Calvin and all whom he names in the text are given. The words of the decree of any council mentioned are given, and thus the reader can see for himself the accuracy of the statement of the author in the text. Such a plan would produce a book which might be considered cold, but it is obviously the mode in which entire accuracy may be secured, and want of accuracy is the grand defect of history, ecclesiastical and civil. His biographer, Redepenning, affirms that the charge of rationalism against him was unjust, for he held to the doctrine of justification by faith alone. He wrote on questions of his day in Germany, and he acted as one of the editors of the "Studien und Kritiken." The American is the best edition of his history. He died in 1854.

GIFFARD (gif'ard), WILLIAM, a Norman of high birth who was chancellor of William I., William II. and Henry I., was made bishop of Winchester by the latter king. He presided over his see for twenty-one years, during which time he introduced the Cistercian monks into England, founding for them an abbey at Waverley, in Surrey, in 1128. He erected a priory for Augustine canons at Taunton, and founded the priory of St. Mary's Overy, in Southwark, where he built a magnificent mansion, which was long the London residence of his successors.

GIFFORD (gif'ord), ANDREW, D.D., born in 1700. He was a Baptist minister in Nottingham and London, and also assistant librarian in the British Museum. He was devoted to archæology, and made collections of medals, manuscripts and curious books.

GIFFORD, RICHARD, a clergyman of the Church of England, born in 1725, was the author of a clever reply to Kennicott's dissertation on the "Tree of Life," and also of an answer to Dr. Priestley on "Spirit and Matter."

GIFT. Almost every transaction of Eastern life involves a gift. In public affairs and state ceremonies there must be gifts. In alliances, covenants, contracts, there must be the interchange of gifts. Family arrangements and friendly association imply gifts. Examples continually occur in Scripture, and various words are used in the original to distinguish the various kinds and occasions of the gifts. There were gifts from superiors to inferiors, as from sovereigns to the subjects they desired to honor, Esth. ii. 18. There were gifts from inferiors to those above them, as to monarchs, Jud. iii. 15; 1 Ki. x. 25. And not to bring a present when it was expected, as to a king on his inauguration, was the highest affront that could be offered, 1 Sam. x. 27. Gifts of this kind were almost taxes. Thus we find the tribute imposed on a conquered nation called "gifts," 2 Sam. viii. 2. There were gifts on marriages. The bridegroom gave a present besides the dowry, Gen. xxxiv. 12, and the bride's father made a gift to his daughter, 1 Ki. ix. 16. Gifts were interchanged among friends, especially in times of rejoicing, Neh. viii. 10, 12; Esth. ix. 19, 22. Gifts were offered at visits, especially if at all of a formal character. Thus Saul felt it necessary to make a present to Samuel when he went to consult him, 1 Sam. ix. 7, 8; comp. 2 Ki. viii. 8. Sometimes, indeed, these presents degenerated into bribes, by which significant word they were then stigmatized, and were strictly forbidden, Ex. xxiii. 8; Isa. i. 23; v. 23. Gifts were of every conceivable kind—jewels, spices, robes, money, etc.—e. g., Gen. xxiv. 22, 53; xliii. 11; 2 Ki. v. 22, 23; Job xlii. 11; and they were presented in the most respectful manner possible.

The blessings of the gospel are often termed gifts, as are the special powers communicated by the Spirit, 1 Cor. i. 7; xii. 4, 9, 28, 30, 31, and elsewhere. The term is properly applied, as they all proceed from the free mercy of God.

GIGER (gi'ger), GEORGE MUSGRAVE, D.D., was born in Philadelphia, June 6, 1822. He graduated with high honor in the college of New Jersey at Princeton, New Jersey, in 1841, pursued a course of theology in the theological seminary at the same place and soon after was chosen tutor in the college. In 1846 he was elected adjunct professor of mathematics, and the following year professor of Greek. In 1854 he was made professor of the Latin language and literature, which position he occupied until declining health compelled him to retire in 1865. He died October 11, 1865.

GIGGEO (gig-je'o), or GIG-GEIUS (gig-jay'us), ANTONIO, an Italian Orientalist, published, under the auspices of Cardinal F. Borromeo, his excellent "Thesaurus Linguae Arabicæ." He also translated into Latin Ben Ezra's and Ben Gerson's "Commentary on the Proverbs of Solomon." He died in 1632.

GIHON (gi'hon). 1. Originally occurs as the name of one of the four rivers of Paradise, and which is described as thereafter compassing the whole land of Ethiopia, Gen. ii. 13. Various efforts have been made to identify it with some known river on the present surface of the globe, but with no success. See PARADISE.

2. A place close by Jerusalem, where Solomon was anointed king, 1 Ki. i. 33, 38, 45. There must have been some reservoir of water there, for Hezekiah is said to have stopped the upper course of it, 2 Chr. xxxii. 30. It is further mentioned as indicating the position of the wall which Manasseh built round the city of David, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 14. There are two reservoirs still existing in the valley of Hinnom, called by the Arabs Birket Mammilla and Birket es-Sultan. The first is about 150 rods west of the city, at the head of the valley; it is 300 feet long, 200 wide and 20 deep, and is dry. The other is in the same valley, south of the Jaffa gate; it is 600 feet long, 250 broad and 40 deep. "The aqueduct from the pools of Solomon passed along west of it, round the north end, then down the east side, and so round Zion to the temple. At some former time a pipe led the water from the aqueduct to an artificial fountain on the top of the south wall of the pool, where it emptied into troughs made of old sarcophagi." These reservoirs are generally designated the upper and lower pools of Gihon. But Mr. Grove suggests that Gihon must have been at a low level, because persons are said to have gone "down" to it, that the word rendered "valley," in which it is said to stand, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 14, is that always used for the valley of Jehoshaphat, never for the valley of Hinnom, and that it is mentioned in conjunction with Ophel; so that it must rather be in the position of Siloam. See CONDUIT, JERUSALEM.

GIL, JUAN, one of the first converts to the Reformation in Spain, was born about the beginning of the sixteenth century at Olivera, in Aragon. He received his education in the university of Alcalá, where he devoted great attention to the study of scholastic theology. He became professor of theology at Sigüenza, and in 1550 was nominated by the emperor to the bishopric of Tortosa. His good fortune excited the malice of his enemies, and he was arrested, imprisoned by the Inquisition, tried for heresy and condemned to imprisonment. He died in 1555.

GILALAI (gil-a'li), a priest who played on musical instruments, Neh. xii. 36.

GILBERT (gil'burt), ANNE, born in 1782, was a sister of Isaac and Jeffrey Taylor, and niece of Charles Taylor, all known as eminent literary men. Like them, Anne was a person of genius, which was cultivated by education. She and her sister Jane were the authoresses of a very celebrated little work, "Original Poems for Infant Minds," which continue to retain their popularity. One of them, "My Mother," is universally known. She married, in 1818, the Rev. Joseph Gilbert, author of the "Christian Atonement." "The day-time of her life," says a writer in the "Athenæum,"

"was one of varied and useful labor, and an exercise of abounding hospitality in as pious and gay a home as ever illustrated the bright cheerfulness of a religious and intellectual life."

GILBERT, ELIPHALET WHEELER, D.D., was born at Lebanon, Columbia county, New York, December 19, 1793. Graduating at Union College, New York, in 1813, he afterward pursued a course of theology at Princeton Theological Seminary, was licensed to preach the gospel in 1817, and was sent on a mission to the West. He was subsequently pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Wilmington, Delaware, agent of the American Education Society, president of Delaware College and pastor of the Western Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. He died July 31, 1853.

GILBERT-FOLIOT (gil-bert-fo'le-o), bishop of London in the latter half of the twelfth century, distinguished himself as the dauntless antagonist of Becket. He was a good scholar, an ambitious Churchman and a man of pure, even austere, morals. After holding the office of abbot of Gloucester, he was named bishop of Hereford, which see he held at the time of Becket's advancement to the primacy. He was soon after (1162) made bishop of London. When Becket entered the king's hall bearing the cross, Foliot remonstrated with him, and even strove, with the aid of the bishop of Hereford, to take it from him. Foliot was one of the ambassadors sent by Henry II. to Pope Alexander at Sens. He was twice excommunicated, as one of the king's councilors, by Becket, but made light of it, and even asserted that the primacy belonged of right to the see of London. On occasion of the king's doing penance at the tomb of the murdered primate at Canterbury, in July, 1174, Bishop Foliot preached to the people, vindicating the king's innocence. He wrote a "Commentary on the Song of Solomon" and other works of temporary repute. He died in 1187.

GILBERT. 1. DE LA PORREE (deh-lap-or-ray'), Latin PORRETANUS (por-ray-tah'-nus), bishop of Poitiers, born in 1070, was a distinguished French scholar and philosopher, a dialectician, chief of the school of Realists, who maintained that general ideas are things that have real existence. Having spoken metaphysically of the divine nature before his two archdeacons, they accused him of blasphemy, and he was obliged to submit his opinions to the judgment of the pope and Council of Rheims in 1147.

2. SAINT, OF AUVERGNE, was considered one of the most brave and pious cavaliers of his time. He followed Louis, king of France, to the Holy Land. Grieved with the wickedness of the Crusaders, to which he attributed their defeats, he resolved to adopt a cloister life. He first built a convent for his wife and daughter, and then founded the monastery called after himself, in the diocese of Clermont, of which he became abbé. He died in 1152.

3. SAINT, OF SEMPRINGHAM (sem'pring-ham), founder of the order of Gilbertines, also called the order of Sempringham, was born in Lincolnshire about 1084. He was of an illustrious family and of a noble character. He entered the Church and was ordained priest, founded the order of Sempringham about 1148 or a little earlier, drew the statutes of his order partly from the rule of St. Augustine and partly from that of St. Benedict, was head of the monastery for some years, but resigned the government to one of his disciples, and died in 1189. He founded twelve monasteries besides that of Sempringham.

4. THE UNIVERSAL, so called on account of his great learning, lived in the first part of the twelfth century, and was a native of Brittany. He was teaching at Anvers, when Henry I. of England, with the consent of the archbishop of Canterbury and that of the people, chose him for the vacant see of London. He had so great reputation for learning in the Holy Scriptures and theology that it was said of him, "Cui in doctrina nemo in Europa par fuisse credebatur" ("No one in Europe was his equal in learning"); and Henry of Huntingdon says that his equal for knowledge was not to be met with from London to Rome.

GILBOA (gil-bo'ah), known only as the name of a mountain ridge, though the etymology of the word seems to point to some spring remarkable for its bubbling waters; and it is possible that from some such spring the mountain derived its name. And there is a large spring at the northern base of what is still regarded as Gilboa, called 'Ain Julûd, supposed to be the same with "the fountain of Jezreel," beside which Saul pitched with his army before the memorable battle in which he fell, 1 Sam. xxix. 1. Gilboa, however, is not so properly a mountain in the ordinary sense as a range of hills, bounding the fertile plain of Esdraclon on the north-east. "They are not particularly interesting in their general contour. They rise to no great height, and present but a small appearance either of natural pasturage or culture. Large bare patches and scarps of the common cretaceous rock of the country are more conspicuous on them than any clothing of verdure which they wear." What has chiefly invested Gilboa with interest is the victory gained there over Saul by the Philistines, and the pathetic lamentation by David over Saul himself and his son Jonathan. In that lamentation, it will also be observed, Gilboa is spoken of, not as a single mountain, but as a group or succession of heights—"mountains of Gilboa;" and another touch of truth may be perceived, as Mr. Stanley has remarked, in the poetical wish that henceforth there might be no rain nor dew upon them, nor fields of offerings—suggested doubtless by the aspect of the "bare, bleak and jagged ridge, with its one green strip of tableland, where probably the last struggle was fought, the more bare and bleak from its unusual contrast with the fertile plain from which it springs."

GILD, GILDING, Rev. xvii. 4, marg. See HANDICRAFT.

GILDAS (gil'das), SAINT, surnamed THE WISE, is the name given to the author of the ancient book, "De Excidio Britanniae," which belongs to the sixth century. But it would be very difficult to say what his name was, for Gildas was not a name, but an Irish title bestowed upon the religious and learned. It is said that one thousand persons bore it. Thus the "Historia Britonum," written by Nennius, is sometimes quoted as Gildas', Nennius having borne that title. Hence the confusion and mistakes connected with Gildas. There are opposite opinions respecting the "De Excidio," Mr. Wright regarding it as a worthless fabrication, while others esteem it a genuine production of some learned man bearing the title of Gildas, and valuable as testifying the time of the introduction of the gospel into Britain, and also the study of the Scriptures in the early British colleges.

GILEAD (gil'e-ad) [properly, "a hard, rocky region," but by a slight change in the punctuation, Galeed, it might signify "heap of witness," the name given by Jacob to the heap of stones erected by him on a memorable occasion, Gen. xxxi. 47]. 1. A district east of the Jordan, which included the towns of Ramoth, Jazer and Jabesh. Its limits cannot be, and probably never were, strictly defined, and the name seems sometimes to have been applied to the whole trans-Jordanic country, Num. xxxii. 29; Jud. xx. 1. Its mountains are to be seen from nearly all the hills and table-lands of Western Palestine, and seem to form an unbroken ridge bounding the view to the eastward. To the pilgrim at the sacred sites and the traveler in the Holy Land they are the limits of his knowledge—as the Mediterranean was to the Jews, as the Atlantic was to Europe in the Middle Ages, as the Libyan Hills are to the voyager on the Nile. But on approaching them the unbroken appearance of their outline vanishes; and when their summits (two thousand or three thousand feet above the Jordan valley) are reached, there opens out a wide table-land tossed about in wild confusion of undulating downs, clothed with rich grass and with magnificent forests of sycamore, beech, terebinth, ilex and enormous fig trees. These downs are broken by three deep defiles, through which there fall into the Jordan the three rivers of the Jarmuk, the Jabbok and the Arnon (the latter, however, is south of the limits of Gilead as generally understood). On the east they melt away into the vast red plain which, by a gradual descent, joins the level of the plain of the Haûran and of the Assyrian desert. The whole of this east country, being well adapted for pasture, was granted to the Reubenites, the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh, after it had been won from Sihon king of the Amorites and Og the king of Bashan, Num. xxi. 24, 32. Gilead, in its proper sense, fell partly to the lot of Gad, partly to Manasseh. Their boundary cannot be accurately laid down, further than that Gad seems to have dwelt to the south and west by the Jordan (as far north, however, as the Sea of Chinnereth, Josh. xiii. 27), and Manasseh to the north and east as far south as Mahanaim. The forests and pastures of Gilead seem to have kept alive in its inhabitants that wild and nomade character which was soon lost by the tribes to the west of the Jordan, while its exposure to the attacks of external enemies nurtured their warlike spirit, and its isolation from the rest of the Holy Land kept them in the background of the history of God's people. At different times two remarkable men suddenly appeared from its forests—Jephthah, the victorious captain, the performer of his rash vow; Elijah the Tishbite, the bold reprover of Ahab, the asserter of God's honor, the sole antagonist of Baal's four hundred prophets on Mount Carmel. The wildness of the region whence he came must have had a similar effect upon the western Israelites as had his strange appearance and the accounts they heard of his miraculous nourishment by ravens, of his raising the widow's son, and of his running before Ahab's chariot from Carmel to Jezreel. In his country, too, was Ramoth, the frontier town, so often taken and retaken by the Syrians, and at last the scene of Ahab's death, as foretold by the prophet.

At other times Gilead comes before us, for a moment as it were, in the sacred history. It was the scene of the crisis of Jacob's life, when, no longer an outcast and a slave, he returned the independent chieftain of a numerous and wealthy tribe to the land of his fathers. For here, on Mount Gilead, he finally parted with Laban, who had long deceived and oppressed him, and had pursued him hither from Padan-Aram. At Mahanaim he overlooked the inheritance of his descendants and meditated on his changed fortunes: "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands." Here also the angels of God met him, sent no doubt as a support in his trial, and as an earnest of the Almighty's protection. At Peniel took place that mysterious wrestling in prayer, when he received his new name of Israel, the wrestler of God, more suited to his altered prospects than Jacob, the supplanter; and thus by converse with God he prepared for the last trial of this period of his life, the dreaded meeting with Esau. At Succoth, where he built him a house and made booths for his cattle, we trace a further step in his history, the transition from the wandering to the settled agricultural life, Gen. xxxi., xxxii., xxxiii.

MOUNTAINS OF GILEAD.

On another occasion we are brought back to Gilead at the time of David's sorest trial, when he fled to Mahanaim from Absalom, who was defeated and slain in the neighboring forest of Ephraim. On two special occasions, also, did the trans-Jordanic hills afford a safe retreat to our Lord himself from his labors and dangers in Galilee and Judea. Thither he probably retired after his baptism; thither also, in the interval of danger which immediately preceded the end of his earthly course, John x. 39, 40. And these, too, were the mountains "whither, in obedience to their Master's prophetic bidding, the Christians fled from the siege of Jerusalem, and found at Pella a refuge from the calamities which befell their countrymen."

The balm of Gilead seems to have been valued for its medicinal properties from the earliest times. The Midianitish merchants to whom Joseph was sold were passing through the valley of Jezreel on their way from Gilead to Egypt, Gen. xxxvii. 17. Josephus often mentions this balm or balsam, but generally as the product of the rich plain of Jericho. For example: "Now, when Pompey had pitched his camp at Jericho (where the palm tree grows and that balsam which is an ointment of all the most precious, which, upon any incision being made in the wood with a sharp stone, distils out thence like a juice), he marched in the morning to Jerusalem." Dr. Thomson found in the plain of Jericho some thorn bushes called the zukum, "which is like the crab-apple tree, and bears a small nut, from which a kind of liquid balsam is made, and sold by the monks as balm of Gilead, so famous in ancient times;" and he supposes "that the balm which Jacob sent to Joseph, Gen. xlvii. 11, and that which Jeremiah, ch. viii. 22, refers to for its medicinal qualities, were the same which the trading Ishmaelites were transporting to Egypt, and that it was some resinous extract from the forest trees of Gilead."

2. The mention of Mount Gilead in Judges vii.

3 has created a difficulty, as if there were a mount of that name west of the Jordan. Some critics, therefore, would read Gilboa, but Winer has probably given the true interpretation. It was from Mount Gilead that the Midianites had passed over into Western Palestine; through Mount Gilead they would be driven back; the fearful, therefore, must depart from Mount Gilead as likely to be the theatre of war. See GIDEON.

3. A city so called, Hos. vi. 8, probably Ramoth-gilead. But it may be that the province is intended—"the whole land banded in one, as one city of evil-doers."

4. GILEAD. Three persons are mentioned as bearing this name—a son of Machir, Num. xxvi. 29; the father of Jephthah, Jud. xi. 1; and a Gadite, 1 Chr. v. 14.

GILEADITES (gil'e-ad-ites), a family of Manasseh, descendants of Gilead; also inhabitants of the territory Gilead, Num. xxvi. 29; Jud. x. 3; xi. 1, 40; xii. 7, and elsewhere.

GILES (jilez). 1. SAINT, whose Latin name was EGIDIUS (ay-gid'e-us), is one of the black-letter saints of the English calendar. He was by birth an Athenian, but having fled to France, lived as a hermit near Marseilles, and on the site of his hermitage the king built a monastery, of which he made him abbot. How he became connected with Great Britain does not appear, but he was the patron saint of Edinburgh, the chief parish church of which is dedicated to him, as are also one hundred and forty-six churches in England, Westmoreland and Cumberland being the only English counties which have none bearing his name. Having been lame, he is esteemed the patron of cripples, and as such the Church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, in London, is dedicated to him; it was the resort of cripples who used to solicit alms at the entrance of the city, London not then extending to its site.

2. SAINT, OF ROME, whose Latin name was ÆGIDIUS (ay-gid'e-us) ROMANUS, or DE COLUMNA, the latter surname showing his connection with the Colonna family of Rome, a celebrated scholastic philosopher and theologian, a pupil of Thomas Aquinas. He lectured on philosophy and theology at Paris, and was known by the title of "Doctor Fundatissimus," "the most profound doctor." He was made archbishop of Bourges in 1294, and died there in 1316. He left a great number of works on theology and philosophy, many of which have been printed, and the rest are preserved in manuscript in various libraries.

GILES, JOHN A., LL.D., a prominent historian and editor, was born in England in 1802. He manifested a fondness for historical pursuit and an unusual facility in communicating the result of his investigations. He wrote and edited many valuable works, among which may be mentioned an English and Greek Lexicon; "The Fathers of the English Church," in thirty-five volumes; "The Entire Works of the Venerable Bede," in twelve volumes; "Life and Letters of Thomas à Becket;" "The Life and Times of Alfred the Great," the most valuable and authentic biography of this remarkable man extant; besides many other works of a literary character.

GILFILLAN (gil-fil'lan), REV. GEORGE, was born at Canrie, Perthshire, Scotland, in 1813. He was educated at the college of Glasgow, and studied theology at the Hall of the United Presbyterian Church. He was ordained to the work of the ministry in 1836, and placed over the Schoolwyrd congregation, Dundee. A few years after this he commenced writing sketches of living characters for the Dumfries Herald. These were well received, and were published in book form as "The Gallery of Literary Portraits." They were followed by a second and third series of the same character. In 1850 appeared the "Bards of the Bible," and since that time he has given to the world a number of literary works. His "Heroes, Martyrs and Bards of the Scottish Covenant" is considered his best work.

GILGAL (gil'gal), "wheel," "rolling." 1. The place, whether town or, as is more probable, open space, on which Israel made their first encampment after crossing the Jordan, Josh. iv. 19, 20. It is simply described as being "in the east corner of Jericho." It is placed by Josephus at the distance of ten stadia, or a little more than a mile, from Jericho, and about five times as much to the west of the Jordan. It is expressly called a hill or rising ground, Josh. v. 3; and there, resting for a little, the host of Joshua performed the rite of circumcision and partook of the Passover before they entered on the work of conquest. It was in regard to the work of circumcision that the place obtained its future name: "And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day," Josh. v. 9. It has been made a question why the administration of circumcision should have been called rolling away the reproach of Egypt; whether the reproach had respect simply to their previous uncircumcised condition, or to their condition otherwise as connected with and indicated by the suspension of circumcision. The latter seems decidedly the preferable view. For, in the first place, the simple fact of circumcision having ceased to be administered during the wilderness sojourn could scarcely have been so generally known in Egypt as to become a matter of reproach there against Israel. The Egyptians had no means of knowing whether it was practiced or not. Then, even if it had been known, one does not see how it should have been, as a mere fact, turned into a reproach, because there is no evidence to show that the Egyptians as a people in any way identified their national honor with the rite, nor is it certain that the practice was ever by any means universal, except among the priesthood. Origen speaks of it as confined to them, and Clement of Alexandria merely adds those who sought admission to the mysteries. It is chiefly on a misunderstanding of the passage before us, coupled with a general statement of Herodotus as to the general practice of circumcision among the Egyptians, that the absolute and stringent universality of it there has been affirmed. Besides, if the simple disuse of the ordinance had lain so long upon Israel as a reproach, one must say it was very needlessly borne, since it could have been removed any time during the forty years; almost anywhere they could have halted long enough for the purpose. In reality it had been done once; for when the command to circumcise was now given to Joshua, it came as an order to "circumcise them again, the second time," Josh. v. 2. The former time would doubtless be when they lay encamped around Sinai, so that the forty years of discontinuance mentioned could not be absolutely forty. The term is used in a general way for the period of the wilderness sojourn. When leaving Sinai and marching toward Canaan, the administration of the ordinance required to be suspended for a time, on account of the incessant movings to and fro. But when, for their want of faith and frequent backslidings, the people were doomed to continue in the wilderness for nearly forty years longer, as this was a suspension of the covenant itself, so the ordinance, which was its more peculiar badge and seal, was fitly suspended too. Not from any external difficulty in practicing it, but as a sign of their humbled and dishonored condition, was it henceforth allowed to fall into abeyance by the lawgiver. Hence it is expressly connected here with their having disobeyed God's voice, and losing in consequence the fulfillment of the great promise of the covenant, ver. 6. This was emphatically the reproach of Egypt—viz., the reproach of having been led out of Egypt with high hopes of future aggrandizement, which had not been realized. It was precisely such a reproach which Moses dreaded, and which led him on one occasion to say, "Wherefore should the Egyptians speak and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth?" Ex. xxxii. 12, also Num. xiv. 13. But now that they had become again a circumcised people by the express command of God, the partial ban was taken off; they were acknowledged by him as in the proper sense his covenant people, in whose behalf he was ready to execute the word on which he had caused their fathers to hope. Thus, no longer should Egypt have occasion to taunt them with having been beguiled with false expectations and promises lying unfulfilled. The deed at Gilgal terminated the period of shame and commenced a brighter era.

2. GILGAL, from which Elijah and Elisha went down to Bethel, 2 Ki. ii. 2, was apparently a different place from that just noticed; for had it been meant, the passage from the one place to the other could never have been represented as a descent, Bethel being upward of 1000 feet above the banks of the Jordan. There must therefore have been a Gilgal somewhere in the district of Bethel, and at a higher elevation than it, of which the remains are supposed to have been found in certain ruins bearing the name of Jiljuleh or Jiljilieh, situated a few miles to the north of the ancient Bethel.

3. GILGAL, not far from Shechem, beside the plains of Moreh, Deut. xi. 30; Josh. xii. 23. This may, however, have been the same with the immediately preceding, but it is impossible to decide with certainty. The passage in Joshua speaks of the nations or peoples of Gilgal whose king fell under the hand of Joshua, implying that it was a place of some importance at the time of the conquest, and formed a centre to several tribes in the neighborhood.

GILL (gil), ALEXANDER, a learned English divine and critic, an eminent Latin scholar, born in 1564, became head-master of St. Paul's, in which post he was very successful. Among his scholars was the poet Milton, who was a great favorite with his son and namesake, at the time usher in the school. Upon the death of Mr. Gill, in 1635, he was succeeded by this son as master of St. Paul's, who, after five years, was dismissed for his severity, and falling under the anger of Laud for calling King James an old fool, was imprisoned for a short time.

GILL, JOHN, DOCTOR, was born at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, England, in 1697. He was educated at the grammar school in his native town, and though only eleven years old when he left it, was distinguished for his proficiency in classical learning. He acquired a knowledge of Hebrew by the help of Buxtorf's grammar and lexicon. In 1716 he joined the Baptist church at Kettering, and shortly after became assistant preacher. In 1719 he was chosen pastor of the church at Horsleydown, Southwark, and retained that office till his death, October 14, 1771. During the whole of his life he was an indefatigable student. His literary reputation is founded chiefly on his rabbinical learning, in which he had few equals. Among his works the most noteworthy are "An Exposition of the New Testament;" "An Exposition of the Prophets, with a Dissertation on the Apocryphal Writings;" "The Exposition from Genesis to Solomon's Song." He had previously published an exposition of Solomon's Song, with a translation of the Chaldee Paraphrase; "The Prophecies of the Old Testament respecting the Messiah," in answer to Collins; "A Dissertation concerning the Antiquity of the Hebrew Language, Letters, Vowel-points and Accents;" "A Dissertation on the Baptism of Jewish Proselytes," appended to his "Body of Divinity." His miscellaneous works, including sermons and several tracts relating to infant baptism, were republished after his death.

GILLES DE LEWES (zheel-deh-loo'ez), or, Latinized, ÆGIDEUS DE VALACRIA (ay-gid'e-us-day-val-ak're-a), was born in 1174, died 1237, a Dutchman and warrior-monk. He was a most successful preacher at Lewes, in Belgium, and obtained a great reputation for learning. At Brussels he prevailed on numbers to join the crusade, and accompanied them himself. He showed so many proofs of valor that he was called "Le Blanc Gendarme."

GILLES (zheel), PIERRE, a Swiss Protestant divine, born about 1570, is known chiefly as the author of "A History of the Church of the Vaudois."

GILLESPIE (gil-les'pe), GEORGE, a Scotch minister of distinguished abilities, born in 1612. He was one of the four commissioners to the Westminster Assembly in 1643, and his eloquence made a great impression. He died in 1648. He was a prolific writer; chief among his works were, "The Ark of the Testament Opened," "Aaron's Rod Blossoming" (a discussion on the government of the Church of Scotland), "Dispute upon the English Popish Ceremonies obtruded upon the Church of Scotland," etc.

GILLESPIE, THOMAS, a Scottish dissenting minister born in 1708. He was deposed by the General Assembly of the Scotch Kirk in 1752, and was the chief founder, in 1761, of the Synod of Relief, afterward merged in the United Presbyterian Church. He was a man of piety and learning, and a friend of Dr. Doddridge. He wrote some theological treatises, and died in 1774.

GILLY (jil'le), DAVID, born in 1648, a French Protestant minister who by his great eloquence made many converts. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes he abjured his religion; and having been accorded a handsome pension by the king and clergy, he was sent down to Languedoc to preach with the zeal of a neophyte against his former coreligionists.

GILLY (gil'le), WILLIAM STEPHEN, D.D., a clergyman of the Church of England, born in 1789. He was educated at Cambridge, and was successively rector of North Cambridge, in Essex, canon of Durham, and rector of St. Margaret's, Durham. In 1823 he became interested in the Vaudois Christians, and visited Piedmont, and the following year he published "Researches among the Vaudois Protestant Inhabitants of the Cottian Alps," a work which reached a fourth edition within three years—an unusual circumstance at that time. This work created great sympathy throughout England for the Waldenses, and led to a successful effort for the formation of a college for their benefit at La Tour. He wrote numerous other works, and died in 1855.

GILOH (gi'loh), a town of Judah, one of a group which lay on the declivities of the mountain range south of Hebron, Josh. xv. 51. It was the native place of Ahitophel. Absalom, when meditating rebellion, asked permission to go and sacrifice in Hebron. Whilst there he sent for Ahitophel the Gilonite, David's counselor, who had perhaps been banished for some cause from the court, and was now in disgrace at his own city, 2 Sam. xv. 7, etc. This would account for the otherwise inexplicable fact of a man so famed for his sagacity joining the wild adventure of the rebel son, and recommending such an abominable line of conduct, xvi. 21. Giloh was the scene of Ahitophel's miserable death. Its site is unknown.

GILPIN (gil'pin), BERNARD, one of the English Protestant Reformers, was born at Kentmire, in Westmoreland, in 1517, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford, of which he became Fellow; but he afterward removed to Christ Church, where, in searching the Scriptures to find arguments in support of his views, in replying to Hooper and Peter Martyr, he became convinced of the errors of Rome, and was led to embrace the principles of the Reformation. In 1556 he was presented by his uncle to the archdeaconry of Durham and the rectory of Easington, where he labored with truly apostolical zeal, and in his capacity of archdeacon made strict visitations, being a great enemy to non-residence and pluralities. He was next presented to the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, where his labors in promoting the Protestant faith were so remarkable that the sanguinary Bishop Bonner threatened to bring him to the stake in a fortnight, and sent a messenger into the north for that purpose. On the road, however, Mr. Gilpin broke his leg, and while he lay in the hands of the surgeon Queen Mary died; so that, instead of being carried to London, he returned to his parishioners. In the reign of Elizabeth he was offered the bishopric of Carlisle and the provostship of Queen's College, but refused both, contenting himself with Houghton, where he died, deeply lamented by his parishioners, in 1583. His piety, unwearied exertions and benevolence earned him the glorious titles of the Apostle of the North and the Father of the Poor.

GILPIN, WILLIAM, a divine of the Church of England and an elegant writer, was born in 1724, at Carlisle, and received his education at Queen's College, Oxford. For many years he kept a school at Cheam, in Surrey, and afterward became vicar of Boldre, in the New Forest, and prebendary of Salisbury. He died in 1804, aged eighty. Mr. Gilpin published the "Life of Bernard Gilpin," his ancestor above mentioned; Lives of Latimer, Wickliff, Huss and Archbishop Cranmer, an "Exposition of the New Testament," "Observations relative to Picturesque Beauty," "Remarks on Forest Scenery," etc. He left the profits of his publications for the endowment of a school at Boldre.

GILONITE (gi'lon-ite), an inhabitant of Giloh, the designation of Ahitophel, 2 Sam. xv. 12; xxiii. 34.

GILS (gilz), ANTONIUS VAN, D.D., was born at Tillburg, July 29, 1758. Graduating at Louvain with honor, he was consecrated at Antwerp and appointed to give instruction in theology. In 1790 he was made president of the college of Malden and canon of St. Peter. Shortly after this appointment he was taken prisoner by the Austrian troops, and experienced various fortunes in imprisonment and exile until the overthrow of Napoleon, when he was reinstated as president of the university of Louvain. He was the author of several works, and died June 10, 1834.

GIMZO (gim'zo), a city which, with the villages thereof, was seized by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz, 2 Chr. xxviii. 18. It is now a considerable village called Jimzû, about three miles south-west from Lydd.

FROM THE CATHEDRAL OF LYONS.—See Gothic ARCHITECTURE.

GIN, Isa. viii. 14; Amos iii. 5. In both these passages we find "gin" and "snare," but the Hebrew word translated "gin" in one is rendered "snare" in the other. The trap-net used consisted of two parts. The net was spread upon the ground, and so fastened with the trap-stick that if a bird or animal touched the stick the parts flew up and enclosed the bird in the net, or caught the foot of the animal. Thus the text in Amos may be rendered, "Doth a bird fall into a net upon the ground, when there is no trap-stick for her? doth the net spring up from the ground and take nothing at all?" Gesenius illustrates Ps. lxi. 22 from this. The table is the Oriental cloth or leather spread upon the ground like a net. "Gin" occurs in Job xl. 24, marg., where the word signifying the trap-stick is used. It must mean a ring or hook in the nostrils.

GINATH (gi'nath), the father of Tibni, who, after the death of Zimri, was Omri's rival for the throne of Israel, 1 Ki. xvi. 21, 22.

GINNETHO (gin'ne-tho), a priest who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel, Neh. xii. 4.

GINNETHON (gin'ne-thon), a priest who monk, a great fresco painter. There was such a celestial charm about his heads that he was surnamed "Angelico;" and being a very good man, he was frequently called "Fra Angelico," or "Beato Angelico da Fiesole." The pope offered Fra Angelico the archbishopric of Florence. He worked under the feeling that his hand was directed by Heaven, to which he prayed for guidance, and consequently he never altered a figure. His heads breathe forth candor and piety and show the faith which animated the artist. It is related of him that he never painted a Christ without being bathed in tears.

GIRALDI (jir-al'de), LILIO GREGORIO, an Italian poet and archæologist, born in 1479.

He was the tutor of Cardinal Rangone, whom he accompanied to Rome, in the sack of which city by the Germans he lost a valuable library. He left several works, which have been regarded as "monuments of his wisdom and his genius, as precious as gold." The chief of these is entitled "De Diis Gentium," "On the Gods of the Gentiles," being an able exposé of "False Gods." He also wrote a treatise "On the Reform of the Calendar," which attracted the attention of the universities of Europe, and preceded its reform by Gregory XIII. He died in 1552.

GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS (jir-al'dus kambren'sis), the Latin name of GERALD DE BARRI (bar're), an eminently learned English ecclesiastic and historian. Born 1146, of a noble Welsh family, in Pembrokeshire, he was educated by his uncle, David Fitzgerald, bishop of St. David's, and in his twentieth year went to the university of Paris, where he gained great reputation by his lectures on rhetoric and polite literature. Returning to England in 1172, he entered the Church, and was appointed archdeacon of Brecknock, and applied himself with great zeal to reform the lives of the clergy. On the death of his uncle, he was chosen by the chapter of St. David's as his successor, but Henry II. opposed his appointment, and he returned to Paris in 1176, where he remained studying civil and canon law till 1180, when he was made professor of canon law in the university. In 1185 he went to Ireland with Prince John, as his secretary and privy councilor, where he remained after the return of the prince till 1187. In 1189 he went with Henry to France. On the next vacancy of the see of St. David's, the chapter again elected him, but the archbishop of Canterbury refused to accept him, and he went to Rome to plead his cause, but the pope set his election aside. Disappointed in this great object of his life, for which he had refused bishoprics both in Ireland and Wales, Barri determined to devote the rest of his life to study and literature. He resigned his archdeaconry; and when the see of St. David's was once again offered to him, he declined it, though there would not have been any opposition to his appointment; and he continued till his death in studious retirement. He bears the character of an honest, painstaking, but too credulous, scholar, not without a more than average share of vanity. His writings, several of which are ecclesiastical, abound in curious and vivid pictures of his times. A complete edition of them, by Professor Brewer, under the direction of the master of the rolls, has recently appeared. Giraldus was living in 1218, but the date of his death is not known.

GIRDLE (gur'd'l), an article of both male and female attire. The common girdle was of leather, sometimes studded with metal bosses, 2 Ki. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4. Girdles of a finer kind were of linen, or perhaps cotton or silk, embroidered occasionally with gold, Jer. xiii. 1; Ezek. xvi. 10; Dan. x. 5; Rev. i. 13; xv. 6. The girdle was fastened with a clasp, or sometimes tied in a knot, the ends hanging down. It was worn about the loins, Isa. v. 27; xi. 5; hence to gird up the loins, confining the ordinary flowing dress, Job xxxviii. 3; Luke xii. 35; 1 Pet. i. 13, signifies to be ready for active service; and the loosening of the girdle, Isa. v. 27, implies remissness. The girdle of the women was worn more loosely than that of the men, and was generally more highly ornamented. The "headbands," iii. 20, were possibly girdles. The same word occurs rendered "attire"—that is, bridal attire—in Jer. ii. 32. Also the word translated "stomacher," Isa. iii. 24, has been thought to be a costly girdle, though other critics believe it an embroidered festive garment or mantle. In the military girdle the sword or dagger was suspended, Jud. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xlv. 3. Ink-horns also were carried in them, Ezek. ix. 2, and they were used as pockets or purses, Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8, where the original word is literally "girdle." The word is not unfrequently used with a symbolical meaning, Isa. xi. 5; Eph. vi. 14.

GIRGASHITES (gur'ga-shites), a tribe descended from Canaan, and repeatedly mentioned as one of the doomed nations of the country called after him, Gen. x. 16, where Girgashite; xv. 21; Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10; xxiv. 11; 1 Chr. i. 14; Neh. ix. 8. Their locality is nowhere distinctly indicated, but they are named in such a connection that we may suppose them to have inhabited the central part of Western Palestine.

GIRGASHITE (gur'ga-site), Gen. x. 16, the Girgashites.

GISBORNE (gis'born), THOMAS, prebendary of Durham, England, an eminent theological and miscellaneous writer, was born at Derby, 1758. He was educated at Harrow and Cambridge, where he greatly distinguished himself; and soon after entering holy orders, in 1792, he was made rector of Barton, in Staffordshire, and in the same year removed to Yoxall Lodge, near Barton, where he ever after resided. Many of the works which Mr. Gisborne gave to the world attained great popularity, among which are the "Principles of Moral Philosophy Investigated," etc., "An Inquiry into the Duties of the Female Sex," "A Familiar Survey of the Christian Religion and History," etc., sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 6. A representative of his in the time of Joiakim is also mentioned, xii. 16. He is probably the same with Ginnetho.

GIOBERTI (j'o-ber'te), VINCENZO, was chaplain of Charles Albert, and an eminent Italian statesman and patriot. He was implicated in a republican plot, and exiled. His "Prolegomina" brought on him the persecution of the Jesuits, when he wrote "Il Gesuita Moderno," a work the effect of which was the expulsion of that wily society from Rome and the rest of Italy. He died in 1851, at Paris, whither he had been sent as ambassador.

GIOVANNI (j'o-van'ne), DA FIESOLE, whose proper name was GUIDO SANTI TOSINI (to-se'ne), was born in 1387, a Dominican besides sermons and two volumes of poetry under the titles of "Walks in a Forest," and "Poems, Sacred and Moral." Died 1846.

GISPA (gis'pa), one of the rulers of the Nethinim after the return from captivity, Neh. xi. 21.

GITTAH-HEPHER (git'tah-hef'fer), Josh. xix. 13. See GATH-HEPHER.

GITTAIM (git'tah-im), a town probably in Benjamin, of which we are only told that the Beer-othites fled thither, 2 Sam. iv. 3, and that it was inhabited after the captivity, Neh. xi. 33.

GITTITES (git'tites), the inhabitants of Gath, Josh. xiii. 3; 2 Sam. xxi. 19; 1 Chr. xx. 5. The term is applied also to the 600 men who came with David back into Israel after his residence at Gath. Many of these were doubtless Hebrews, as 600 seems to have been the strength of David's little army before he went to Achish, 1 Sam. xxiii. 13; xxv. 13; xxvii. 2. But certainly some were natives of Gath, who must be supposed to have joined him there, for Ittai is addressed as a stranger and exile, 2 Sam. xv. 18-22; xviii. 2. Obed-edom, in whose house the ark was placed, is also called a Gittite, 2 Sam. vi. 10, 11; 1 Chr. xiii. 13. It seems improbable that the ark should be entrusted to a Philistine; it has been therefore imagined that Obed-edom belonged to Gittaim or Gath-hepher.

GITTITH (git'tith). This has been supposed to be a musical instrument brought from Gath. Another supposition is that it denoted a song sung at the time of vintage, this meaning being derived from the signification of the word Gath, which is a wine-press. It is impossible to speak with certainty, but probably an air light and joyous, rather than an instrument, is intended. The word is found in the titles of Psalms viii.; lxxxix.; lxxxiv.

GIUSTINIANI (j'ooos-tin'e-ah'ne), AGOSTINO, born in 1470, an Italian prelate who, after a dissipated youth, devoted himself to study, and became distinguished as an Oriental scholar. GJÖRANSON (jeh'ran-son), or GOERANSON (zho'ran-sōn), JOHAN, born in 1712, a Swedish pastor so very learned in antiquities that his neighbors looked upon him almost as supernatural. He held some extraordinary notions, as that the Swedish kings were descended from Jupiter, and that the "Edda" was written in the time of Moses. He wrote several learned works on the ancient inhabitants of Sweden and its Runic monuments.

GLANVILL (glan'vil), JOSEPH, an English philosopher and theologian, was born at Plymouth, in 1636. He graduated M.A. at Oxford, entered the Church and held several livings, among them the rectory of the Abbey Church, Bath, to which he was presented in 1666. About the same time he was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society—an honor awarded him for his remarkable work entitled "Scepis Scientifica." Glanvill wrote also a defence of the Royal Society, a work on the "Pre-existence of Souls," "Considerations on Witchcraft," and other works. He was popular as a preacher, and was a great admirer of the writings of Henry More. Died 1680.

GLASS. There remains no longer any doubt as to the remote antiquity of the manufacture of glass. It was beyond all question one of the arts practiced in ancient Egypt; and from the paintings of Beni Hassan, executed, it is supposed, during the reign of the first Osirtisen and his immediate successors—that is, from sixteen to fourteen hundred years before the Christian era—representations have been found of the subject.

There is other evidence, however, of the antiquity and bottles also, considered to be of a remote antiquity. Various glass articles have been exhumed from the ruins of Pompeii, though the glass, it is believed, had been of inferior quality, and adapted to few of the purposes to which it is now applied. This may have been so at Rome and in Europe generally, for it was in Egypt and Phœnicia, and more especially in Egypt, that the art was cultivated in early times, and brought in some of its branches to a very high degree of perfection. In Egypt they had the advantage not only of an earlier application to the art, but also of a peculiar earth, which appears to have been necessary to the production of some of the more valuable and brilliant kinds of glass; hence a great part of the glassware used at Rome about the Christian era and subsequently came from Alexandria; and the emperor Hadrian was presented by an Egyptian priest with some vases which were reckoned so fine that they were produced only on grand occasions. Winkelmann has given it as his opinion that "the ancients carried the art of glass-making to a higher degree of perfection than ourselves;" and Wilkinson states, respecting the Egyptians, "Such was their skill in the manufacture of glass, and in the mode of staining it of various hues, that they counterfeited with success the amethyst and other precious stones, and even arrived at an excellence in the art which their successors have been unable to retain, and which our European workmen, in spite of their improvements in other branches of this manufacture, are still unable to imitate. For not only do the colors of some Egyptian opaque glass offer the most varied devices on the exterior, distributed with the regularity of a studied design, but the same hue and the same devices pass in right lines directly through the substance; so that, in whatever part it is broken, or wherever a section may chance to be made of it, the same appearance, the same colors and the same device present themselves, without being found ever to deviate from the direction of a straight line, from the external surface to the interior."

The purposes to which the manufacture of glass was applied by the Egyptians and other ancient nations were of considerable diversity, including, besides the imitations just referred to of the precious stones, beads, figures of the gods, fancy figures of all sorts, bottles, cups, vases, jars, and occasionally even coffins. But it was rather colored than transparent glass which was the object of study in the ancient manufacture; absolute clearness or transparency seems to have been a quality very rarely attained; and the emperor Nero is reported to have paid an extravagant price for two small drinking cups with handles the chief excellence of which consisted in their being colorless. Hence in those passages, whether in ancient classical writers or in Scripture, which speak of things being clear or shining as glass, the probability is that it is either the mere glitter of glass when the sun shone on it, sometimes perhaps the brilliancy of the colors emitted by it, or some other glass-like substance, such as rock-crystal, that is meant. This supposition is strengthened by the comparison in Rev. iv. 4, "a sea of glass like unto crystal," the glass representing only the smooth, polished, glancing surface, and the crystal superadding the idea of perfect transparency. Hence, glass was not applied in ancient times to windows; when these were not, as they commonly were in the East, simply open apertures by day, with wooden doors placed on them by night, a kind of semi-transparent stone, a sort of talc, called lapis specularis, was generally used, and continued to be so for centuries after the Christian era. Nor was glass in ancient times, so far as we know, ever applied to the production of mirrors. See MIRROR; see the same in connection with the word glass as used in 1 Cor. xiii. 12, and similar passages.

GLASS, JOHN, a minister of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, of unspotted life. He was born in 1698. Not eminent as a scholar, he was a remarkably popular preacher, though his sermons were two hours long. He attacked the Solemn League, and published a book to prove that the civil establishment of religion is inconsistent with the gospel, on account of which he was deposed by the General Assembly. He then gathered round him a set of followers, who were designated Glassites and Sandemans.

celebrated German theologians of the seventeenth century. He was born at Sondershausen in 1593. He was professor of theology at Jena, and overseer of the schools and churches of Saxe-Gotha. Among his works the most noteworthy is "Philologia Sacra," which contains observations on the style and sense of Holy Scripture, a grammar of the Hebrew and Greek languages and remarks upon the figures used in the Bible.

GLASS-PAINTING, which has been greatly revived within the last few years, is supposed to have had its origin in Germany or France about the tenth century, and reached its highest perfection about the sixteenth. The mosaic style, in which glass of different colors are cut out and so arranged as to represent figures or scenery, prevailed till the fourteenth century. In enamel-painting colors are burnt in the glass. Mosaic-enamel is a combination of the two styles referred to.

GLEAN, GLEANING. The right of gleaning in corn-fields, vineyards and oliveyards was secured to the poor by the Hebrew law, Lev. xix. 9, 10; xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 19-21. But it does not appear that persons could insist on gleaning indifferently on any man's property. The power was reserved to the owner of determining whom he would admit. Poor relations and dependants were no doubt considered as having the first claim. Accordingly, we find Ruth soliciting leave to glean in the fields of Boaz, and special directions given thereupon by the master, Ruth ii. 2-9, 21, 22.

The custom of gleaning, which was thus secured by Jewish legislation to the poor, affords an admirable illustration of the humane character that pervaded the Mosaic civil economy. In view of the mutability of human affairs—the sickness, the losses, the influences of drought and unfavorable seasons—it necessarily came to pass that the property owned by heads of households might pass out of their hands. But the family relation was treated as being of the last importance to the welfare of the nation, and so, in order to its perpetuation, when the year of jubilee arrived, the families that for a time had been obliged to surrender their lands were permitted to return to them again. So a similar spirit dictated the arrangement on the subject of gleaning. Poor relatives and poor neighbors were thus brought into very tender relation with those who were able to aid them because of their greater affluence, and thus a feeling of gratitude and thankfulness on the one hand, and a recognition of the brotherhood of the high and the low, the rich and the poor, on the other hand, were ensured.

GLEDE (gleed) [Heb. raah], the name of some unclean bird prohibited in Deut. xiv. 13, the only passage in which the word occurs. In the parallel list in Lev. xi., the word daah appears in similar connection, which our version renders vulture. The great similarity between the letters γ (r) and γ (d) renders it highly probable that these two forms represent one and the same word. At all events the Septuagint and the Vulgate render both by the same term, the former by gyps, or gups, the vulture, the latter by milvus, the kite. Each term presents us with a good etymology, raah expressing vision, daah flight. The vultures and the kites are pre-eminent for fleetness of wing and for piercing sight; and we may be tolerably sure that one of these genera is intended. Under these circumstances there is no need to change the English rendering.

The kite (Milvus vulgaris) is spread over the whole of Europe, Western Asia and North Africa. In England it is still a well-known bird; in some districts it retains the old Saxon name of glede, which alludes to its smooth and gliding flight. This, owing to its great length of wing and deeply-forked tail, is performed with the slightest possible apparent exertion. "Occasionally it sails in circles, with its rudder-like tail, by its inclination, governing the curve, then stops and remains stationary for a time, the tail expanded widely, and with its long wings sustaining its light body, apparently from the extent of surface the bird is able to cover." Sir William Jardine describes it as everywhere a fine accessory to the landscape, one of the most harmonious appendages of the forest, its graceful flight and sailing gyrations heightening the effect of some dark and craggy forest scene in the Scottish Highlands, and breaking the quiet by its sudden and peculiarly shrill shriek.

The prey of the glede consists of small quadrupeds, birds and reptiles, and is generally taken on the ground by a sudden pounce.

GLOEIA PATRI (glo're-ah pat're), glory be to the Father, one of the doxologies of the early Church. "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost" became the standing form of doxology at the time of the Arian controversy, the Western Church adding, "As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end. Amen."

GLOEY (glo're) is, perhaps, more variously used in Scripture than in most other writings, yet its Scriptural meanings are not quite so manifold and arbitrary as they have sometimes been represented. For example, it has been supposed that this word, or its synonym in the original, has been occasionally used as a designation of the liver, the supposed seat of the emotions, especially of the more powerful emotions, anger and love. This meaning has been attributed to it as used by Jacob respecting Simeon and Levi: "With them, mine honor (glory), be not thou united," Gen. xlix. 6; and in some expressions of the Psalmist, such as, "My heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth," Psalm. xvi. 9. Others, in this last passage, and in Psalm lvii. 8, "Awake up, my glory;" Psalm cviii. 1, "I will sing and give praise, even with my glory," have understood it of the tongue, as the most honorable member of the body. But there is no ground for such explanations. The glory meant by the Psalmist is but another word for the heart or soul—the seat of intelligence, and feeling, and will, and as such the glory of man as a living and rational creature. Indeed, in all the applications of the word one can easily trace the fundamental idea involved in it. Properly, it is the exercise and display of what constitutes the distinctive excellence of the subject of which it is spoken; thus, in respect to God, his glory is the manifestation of his divine attributes and perfections, or such a visible effulgence as indicates the possession and presence of these, Ex. xxxiii. 18, 19; John i. 14; ii. 11; Ex. xvi. 7, 10; xl. 34; 2 Peter i. 17, etc.; in respect to man, his glory is found in the things which discover his honorable state and character, such as wisdom, righteousness, superiority to passion, or that outward magnificence which is expressive of what, in the lower sphere, bespeaks the high position of its possessor. So many examples occur of such applications of the word glory in Scripture that it is needless to point to individual cases. But it is also, and by a very natural extension, used for the property or possession itself which tends to throw around its subject a halo of glory, or in some respect to crown it with honor; as when the glory of man is identified with his soul, the glory of Lebanon with its trees, Isa. lx. 6, the glory of herbs with the beauty of their flower, Isa. xl. 6, the glory of God with his infinite perfections, and especially with his pure and unchanging righteousness, Isa. iii. 8; xlii. 8. In this last sense God is the glory of his people, Jer. ii. 11; Zech. ii. 5, because he is the living root and spring of all that distinguishes them for good; and they are his glory in the other sense, Jer. xiii. 11; lxii. 3, inasmuch as it is through their holy and blessed state, through the wonderful things done for them and by them, that his own glorious perfections are manifested before the eyes of men. There are no applications of the word in Scripture but what may without difficulty be reduced to the one or the other of those now indicated.

GLOSS, GLOSSARY. A gloss is a note appended to any word or phrase for the purpose of interpretation or illustration. Sacred glosses are such notes appended to words or phrases occurring in the Scriptures. A glossary is a collection of such explanatory notes properly arranged.

The word gloss is borrowed from the Greek glōssa. But in the sense above explained it has no support from classical usage. The process, however, by which the word passed from its original meaning to that in which it is now used, may be traced. The Greek word glōssa, meaning tongue or speech, came to be used by the Greek grammarians in the sense of a word requiring to be explained. In process of time words often become obsolete, or come to be used in senses different from those in which they were originally used; new words are introduced, and words have frequently special meanings attached to them of a professional or technical character, familiar only to a portion of the community. To the multitude such words need to be explained; and such words the Greek grammarians called glōssai. The next step was from calling a word needing explanation a gloss to apply this term to the explanation itself. These explanations at first consisted merely in adhibiting the word in common use to the obsolete and peculiar word; and thus the two, viewed as one whole, came to be called a gloss, and ultimately this name came to be given to that part which was of most interest to the reader, viz., the explanation.

These explanations constituted the beginnings of Greek lexicography. They did not continue, however, to be merely lexical; they often embraced historical, geographical, biographical and such-like notices. Nor were they arranged at first in an alphabetical order; nor did they embrace the whole range of the language, but only such parts of it as the glossographer was interested in.

GLYCAS (gli'kas), MICHAEL, one of the best of the Byzantine historians, belongs to the twelfth century. His "Biblos Chronike," which forms the eleventh volume of "Corpus Byzantinæ Historiæ," is divided into four parts: the first treats of the creation of the world, and the others severally of the three great historic periods marked out by the birth of Christ, Constantine the Great and the death of Alexis I.

GLYCON (gli'kon), an Athenian sculptor known to us only by the magnificent colossal statue in marble, the Farnese Hercules, which, discovered in the baths of Caracalla, was for some time in the Farnese Palace, and is now in the museum of Naples. This artist is supposed to have lived after the time of the emperor Titus. He is not mentioned by any ancient writer, but the Greek inscription on the rock which supported the statue says "Glycon, the Athenian, made it."

eminent Latin scholar, was born at The Hague in 1493. On account of his attachment to the principles of the Reformation he suffered great persecution and affliction. He lived, however, to see the great cause he had so ardently espoused make encouraging progress in his country and to share largely in the confidence and respect of his countrymen. He died in 1568.

GNAT (nat), a small two-winged fly only too well known in all climates for its venomous assaults on man and beast. There are many species, distinguished by the generic name Culex, but all having a similar conformation and similar habits. The species found in many countries are generally known as mosquitoes; indeed, the mosquito is a species of the gnat genus. It is the female alone that is noxious—the male, whose proboscis is feathered, has no power of sucking blood.

The gnat or mosquito is an intolerable plague, abounding chiefly in marshy regions and forests. Dr. Clarke, traveling in the Crimea, tells us that the bodies of himself and his companions, in spite of gloves, clothes and handkerchiefs, were rendered one entire wound, and the consequent irritation and swelling excited a considerable degree of fever. In a most sultry night, when not a breath of air was stirring, exhausted by fatigue, pain and heat, he sought shelter in his carriage, and, though almost suffocated, could not venture to open a window for fear of the mosquitoes. Swarms, nevertheless, found their way into his hiding-place, and in spite of the handkerchiefs with which he had bound up his head, filled his mouth, nostrils and ears. In the midst of his torment he succeeded in lighting a lamp, which was extinguished in a moment by such a prodigious number of these insects that their carcasses actually filled the glass chimney and formed a large conical heap over the burner. The noise they make in flying is to all that hear it a most fearful sound. A traveler in Morocco feelingly complains that, notwithstanding the weariness of a journey of fifty miles, he could take no repose for the terrible mosquitoes, and that his face and hands appeared, from their stings, as if he were suffering from the most virulent sort of small-pox. In Central and South America, Humboldt says the Indians are fain to pass the night buried in sand, the head only exposed, which they cover, though most ineffectually, with a cloth. In some sections of this country mosquitoes are very numerous and excessively venomous. The coldest climates are not exempt from these minute pests. In Lapland they are so numerous that the prodigious swarms are compared to snow-storms when the flakes fill the air, or to the clouds of dust raised by the wind. The miserable natives cannot take a mouthful of food or lie down to sleep in their huts except in an atmosphere of smoke that almost suffocates them as well as the mosquitoes. In the open air it is hardly possible to open the mouth without inhaling dozens of them, and meats and drinks are presently blackened with the alighting crowds.

In Palestine and the surrounding regions these insects are sufficiently numerous to be a great annoyance to the inhabitants. Herodotus tells us that the inhabitants of the lower parts of Egypt were accustomed to obtain a certain degree of immunity from them, by sleeping under the cover of a net used for fishing. Much doubt has been GNOSTIC (nōs'tik), GNOSTICISM (nōs'ti-sizm). The religion of Jesus Christ appearing as a divine message, in which is announced God's plan of reconciling sinners unto himself, necessarily assumes a position of exclusiveness. It is not one religion among the many, the religion of a nation or a class; it is the only religion which God will acknowledge, or by which men can be benefited, and as such it claims the submission of all men alike. Such pretensions unavoidably brought it, when it first appeared, into direct antagonism with all existing religious systems—with Judaism as well as with the various forms of heathen belief and worship. Between it and them there could be no peace—no righteous or stable compromise.

As often happens, however, though the fundamental and formative principles of the opposing systems were utterly incapable of reconciliation, the boundary-line between them came ere long to be somewhat obscurely defined, and a considerable extent of border territory, so to speak, arose, on which it was attempted to effect the compromise which the inherent antagonism of the systems rendered it hopeless to attempt in the interior. Thus, between Judaism and Christianity there lay a border land which was occupied by the Judaizing teachers, against whom the apostle Paul so frequently and energetically writes in his Epistles, and at a later period by the Nazarenes and Ebionites. The border land between Christianity and heathenism was chiefly occupied by the Gnostic sects.

data, the problem which it set itself to solve was to account for the phenomena of the universe, and especially for the place which evil holds in it. This problem it solved after the following fashion: The intermediate being reveals God, and so stands related to him; he also has contact with matter, and so becomes the dēmiurgos or world-creator. As the world thus created is the product of a good being, but is made out of the evil principle, hulē, it is necessarily a mixture of good with evil, and that under the condition of the good being imprisoned, cribbed, confined, by the evil from which it struggles to get free. This struggle suggests the idea of a deliverance by a higher power, and that of a redemption. Here again the agency of the intermediate being comes into request; but the difficulty occurs, If the Demiurge could not at first make a world free from evil, how can he extricate the good from the evil in the world which he has made? To meet this difficulty, the intermediate being, ceasing to be viewed as a monad, is conceived as an aggregate of beings, of which the Demiurge is the lowest, the least perfect, the feeblest; whilst a series of ascending beings, dunamis or ciōnēs, rise up to the logos and the nous, in whom are found the revelation of God and the redemption of the good from the evil, and especially of human spirits from the tyranny of the hulē. These general conceptions pervade all the Gnostic system, though they are very differently construed and compounded by different sects, according as emanistic or dualistic notions predominated, according to the temperament and genius of the founder of them, and according as he stood nearer to the heathen, the Jewish or the Christian point of view. With the Christian revelation, this system of speculation connected itself thus: it accepted the view given in the Bible of God as One, invisible, unsearchable, infinite, eternal, it regarded Satan as the source of evil embodied in the hulē, it represented the God of Judaism as the Demiurge by whom the world had been created, and it recognized in Jesus Christ the highest of the Æons, by whom, along with another Æon, the pneuma, the soul of man is redeemed and restored to unity with God, perfect light with perfect light. It is in the school of Valentinus that we find the most complete development of these notions. Those who accepted them boasted that they had found the true gnōsis which the Christ had left to his genuine followers, and by which they were enabled to penetrate into divine truth, far beyond the reach of those who abode by the mere pistis, or belief of the written word; and hence the name they assumed, Gnostics.

Christianity has its gnōsis as well as its pistis, but it is not of the sort in which these speculatists and dreamers prided themselves. By the careful and well-directed exploration of the meaning of Scripture, by the orderly classification of its doctrines, by the due development of the system of truth it unfolds, and by the reconciliation of this with the great moral truths which are anterior to all-written revelation, a real and legitimate Christian Gnosis may be evolved. But to attempt this by means of an incorporation of Scriptural truth with mere human theories or fancies, is to pursue a sure course toward a real agnōsia, a state of intellectual and religious confusion in which there can be nothing Christian but the name. Against such an attempt, presuming it to have been made in their day, we may be sure the apostles would direct their strenuous efforts. But was such an attempt made in their day? were such speculative perversions of Christian truth among the heresies thrown upon his meaning by those who could not conceive how the coarse meshes of a fishing-net could keep off insects so minute; but some curious observations of Mr. Spence, made in Italy, go to prove that, from whatever cause, certain flies will not pass through a window across which threads are placed, though far wider apart than the breadth of their own bodies. This is not the case, however, with the mosquitoes, at least in our experience.

Grats were placed by the law among unclean animals; and hence the custom of straining liquors to separate from them the bodies of such insects accidentally immersed. The Lord Jesus alludes, Matt. xxiii. 24, to the practice, in reproving the hypocrisy of those who, zealous about the minute punctilios of the law, neglected its weightier matters—judgment, mercy and faith: "Ye blind guides, which strain out [for so it should be, not strain at] a gnat and swallow a camel." They would take great pains to avoid transgressions as minute as a gnat, while they could swallow without scruple sins as vast as a camel. The reproof is not altogether obsolete even in our days.

GNOSIMACHI (no-sim'a-khe), the enemies of the Gnostics, a sect of the fourth century of the Christian era.

The aim of Gnosticism was to complete Christianity, so as to render it a perfect solution of the great world-problem, the relation of the finite to the infinite, of the relative and dependent to the absolute and self-existent. For this purpose its teachers borrowed partly from the speculations of the Western schools of philosophy, especially that of the later Platonists, and partly from the reveries of the Eastern theosophists; and these elements they sought to incorporate with Christianity, so as to work up a complete and congruous scheme of religio-philosophic speculation. The different sources from which these speculatists drew their materials determined their division into two great classes, the Alexandrian and the Syrian Gnostics, in the former of which the doctrines of the Grecian philosophy predominated; in the latter, those of the Parsee or Dualistic theosophy prevailed. Differences of a less general kind divided them into many subordinate sects. These differences rested on three fundamental data: 1. The existence of a supreme Being entirely unconnected with matter and incapable of being affected by it; 2. The existence of a primal matter, hulē, entirely independent of God, and at the same time, as the principle of evil, antithetic to him; 3. The existence of some being intermediate between these two. Given these of the apostolic age? This is the question which, in the interests of Biblical science, we propose now to consider.

That Gnostic sects, such as we find existing in the second century, existed in the days of the apostles, or that Gnosticism had under any form reached that point of systematic development which it exhibits in the system of Valentinus, or even in that of Basilides or Saturninus, are positions which are now universally abandoned as untenable. Nor is the opinion, that any of the New Testament books was written especially to refute Gnostic doctrines and prevent their growth in the Church, maintained by any who hold these to be the genuine productions of those whose names they bear. The question, however, still remains open whether there may not be in the sacred writings allusions to doctrines of the same kind as those which at a later period assumed a prominent place in the Gnostic systems.

In the outset, it may be remarked, that the occurrence of such allusions is not an improbable thing. We are unable to trace Gnosticism to its source, but the tendency which it represents is one which may be observed both in heathenism and in Judaism; and in all probability, speculations of this sort were rife in many quarters where Christianity was established in the days of the apostles. If so, it is not improbable that they might come with their pernicious influence across the sphere of the apostles' working, and by thereby attracting their attention call forth from them words of censure or warning.

When, however, we pass from preliminary probabilities to inquire into the actual facts of the case, it must be confessed that considerable doubt hangs over the position, that the New Testament writings contain any allusions to Gnostic speculations. On the testimony of Irenæus and Theodoret, we may believe that Cerinthus was a contemporary of St. John, and propagated his erroneous doctrines in Asia Minor; and though there is some doubt as to the story of their encounter in the public bath at Ephesus, it is not improbable that the apostle may have known Cerinthus, and may have encountered some that were affected by his doctrines. All this, however, will not prove that either in his Gospel or in his Epistles the apostle has directly referred to these doctrines. Nor can this be proved from the use by him of such terms as lógos, phōs, mōnōgēnēs, etc.—terms of great importance in the systems of the Gnostics; for these terms have their own proper significance in the apostle's writings; they are repeatedly used by him in a way not only different from, but opposed to, that in which the Gnostics used them—as, for instance, in the case of lógos and mōnōgēnēs, both of which terms St. John applies to Jesus, i. 18, whilst Cerinthus taught that God begot the Monogenes and the latter the Logos; and the use of some of them by the later Gnostics in a Johannine sense is much more probably to be traced to their having borrowed them from St. John than to his having taken them from them. The only legitimate proof of the existence of direct references to Gnostic views in the writings of the apostles is furnished by the adduction of passages which cannot be explained without supposing such a reference, or which are better explained on that hypothesis than on any other. The former gives the conclusion a very high, the latter a very considerable, degree of probability.

Applying this test to the so-called prologue to St. John's Gospel, the only part of that book where such allusions can be supposed to exist, and to his Epistles, we arrive at the conclusion that no allusion to sentiments properly Gnostic, as distinguished from such as are simply Docetic, can be substantiated as occurring in the writings of that apostle. In the Epistles some utterances are of such a kind as to constrain us to believe that the apostle had in his eye some who were seeking to spread Docetic views among the Christians. Compare 1 Eph. i. 1; ii. 22; iv. 2, 3; v. 6; 2 Eph. ver. 7. It cannot be proved, however, that the prologue to the gospel has any polemic reference. It is true that its statements stand opposed to many of the Gnostic doctrines; but they stand opposed no less to many doctrines which are not Gnostic, such as Arian and humanitarian representations of our Saviour's person; and it might, therefore, be as reasonably argued that St. John had the followers of Arius and the modern Unitarians in view when he wrote his prologue as that he had the Gnostics. The obvious truth is that all parts of Scripture which set forth divine verities must stand opposed to the doctrines of those by whom these are denied. In Holy Scripture, consequently, lies the confutation of all heresy; but it was not for this that it was for the most part written. Its primary design is to set forth the truth for the salvation of men and the edification of the Church; and if, in aiming at this end, its writers utter what is found to condemn opinions held by men, that may be the result merely of the essential oppugnancy of truth to error, and cannot of itself be held to prove that the writer had these opinions specially in his view when he wrote. In the case of St. John's Gospel, the number of errors its statements confute is such that there is hardly a heretical sect known to the ancients against which it has not been supposed to be directed.

Turning to the writings of St. Paul, we are met by several passages in those epistles which he wrote toward the end of his life, especially those to the Ephesians and the Colossians, and the pastoral epistles, which are supposed to contain direct allusions to Gnostic speculation. That the writer of these epistles had in view certain errorists by whom the Christians were in danger of being led astray, and that many of his statements were directed against these, cannot be called in question. But it is by no means clearly made out that their errors belonged to parties holding what may be called Gnostic views, in the sense of that term as commonly used. Still less is there any ground for the assumption on which some have sought to wield an argument against the genuineness of these epistles, that they contain sentiments borrowed from the Gnostic schools of the second century. The utter futility of this it needs only a glance at the passages adduced in support of it to show. In Eph. i. 21 and Col. i. 16 we have a series of existences intermediate between God and the world that bears some resemblance to the Gnostic representation of dunamis or aiōnēs. When more closely looked at, however, this enumeration will be found to have more of a Judaistic than of a Gnostic character, if, indeed, it be not a mere rhetorical amplification for the sake of emphasis. Comp. Rom. viii. 38, 39. That there is an angelic hierarchy is a Biblical doctrine older than the New Testament, and one, therefore, which may be referred to by the New Testament writers without supposing them to allude to extra-Christian sects or speculations. In Eph. ii. 7, iii. 21, the apostle uses the expression aiōnēs, but in a sense which has no connection whatever with the Gnostic doctrine of intermediate beings. In Eph. ii. 2 the aiōn is personified, and this is said to be a Gnostic representation; but is it more so there than in Rom. xii. 2, where we have exactly the same expression? or than in Luke xvi. 8, where aiōn is also spoken of as a person? or than in 1 Cor. ii. 6 and other passages? The use of plērōma, Eph. i. 23; Col. i. 19; ii. 9, has also been adduced as indicating allusion to Gnostic ideas; but plērōma is a genuine Greek word, which was as free to the apostle as to the Gnostics, and which he uses in these passages to express a purely Christian idea—viz., the possession by Jesus of the fullness or complement of the divine perfections; just as he uses it elsewhere in the former of these epistles, Eph. i. 23; iii. 19; iv. 13, to denote the relation of the Church to Christ or the completeness of the blessing which believers may expect through Christ. Another Gnostic allusion has been found in the relations of the sexes as set forth in Eph. v. 22, etc.; but there is nothing in this passage which may not be gathered from the whole teaching of Scripture on this head, and which is not substantially asserted in 1 Cor. xi. 3.

The chief of the alleged Gnostic references in the pastoral epistles are to be found in the máthoi and gēnēalōgiai of 1 Tim. i. 4; iv. 7; Tit. iii. 9; in the ascetic notions referred to 1 Tim. iv. 3; and in the declaration that the resurrection was past already, 2 Tim. ii. 18. That these refer to some speculative and theosophic notions by which the simplicity of the faith was endangered seems clear from the tone of the apostle's remarks, but it is not in any degree made certain by this that these were such as afterward distinguished the Gnostic schools.

Drawing our information from the epistles themselves as to the views and tendencies by which the false teachers (hēterōdidaskaloi) alluded to in them were characterized, it appears that they boasted of a philosophia, "philosophy" which the apostle stigmatizes as a kēnē apatē, an "empty cheat," Col. ii. 8, and a gnōsis, "knowledge," which he denounces with equal decisiveness as pseudonumōs, "falsely called," 1 Tim. vi. 20. This they pretended to have derived from tradition, Col. ii. 8, and presented in the form sometimes of myth, sometimes of speculative discussion, 1 Tim. vi. 3-5; Tit. iii. 9. They held by Jewish rites and ordinances, Col. ii. 11, 16; 1 Tim. i. 7, followed and enjoined ascetic courses, Col. ii. 20-23; 1 Tim. iv. 1-7, and propagated their errors under a specious guise of sanctity, Col. ii. 23; 1 Tim. iv. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 6. They pretended to a superior knowledge of God, Tit. i. 16; they held worship to be due to angels, and probably assigned to Christ, as the Logos, the place of an archaggēlos, an "archangel;" they taught that the resurrection was already past, 2 Tim. ii. 18; and they may also have held doctrines opposed to the absoluteness of the divine essence, the universality of the divine scheme of redemption, the reality of the person of Christ and the exclusiveness of his mediatorial office, and may have stigmatized childbearing as deriving a taint from standing connected with matter, the essentially evil; so as to lead the apostle to make such pointed statements as we have in 1 Tim. i. 17; ii. 4, 6, 15; iii. 16; iv. 10; vi. 15, 16, etc. Whether we conclude that they held an emanation doctrine similar to the Gnostic doctrine of Æons, will depend very much on the meaning we attach to the gēnēalogiai, "genealogies," to which they were addicted. By some these are held to be the Jewish family registers, by others gradations of existences, like the Æons. There are difficulties attaching to both views. In this uncertainty no help can be obtained from the application by the apostle of the epithet apērantoi to the gēnēalogiai of which he speaks, for whether we take this in the sense of limitless, endless, or in the sense of useless, profitless, it will apply equally well to the Jewish rolls or to the Gnostic æonology. On the whole, the preference seems due to the latter of the opinions above noticed.

It is impossible to overlook the predominant Jewish element in these doctrines. It is not, however, of the same type as the Judaism which the apostle opposes in other of his writings—the Epistle to the Galatians, for instance. There it was the Jewish ceremonial tradition which occupied the foreground; here it is philosophy and speculation. In the one case what the apostle resisted was the attempt to force upon Christianity the "beggarly elements" (ptōcha stoicheia) of a defunct economy; in the other, what he resisted was the attempt to mix up with the pure truth of the gospel the "worldly elements" (stoicheia tou kōsmou) of a purely human theosophy. In the latter there was undoubtedly a mingling of the ethnic with the Jewish speculation (gnōsis); and probably Neander has exactly determined the position of these heretics when he describes them as "a Judaizing sect, in which we see the germ of the Judaizing Gnosticism."

The conclusion to which this inquiry has brought us is that while there is no evidence that Gnosticism, as it appeared in the second century, was known to the apostles, and whilst the teachers of error against whom they had to contend came from the side of Judaism, there were in their doctrines the germs both of Docetic and Gnostic speculation; so that when these systems came into vogue the Christians found in the writings of the apostles the most suitable weapons with which to oppose them.

GOAD (gōd), an instrument used by ploughmen, still commonly to be seen in Palestine. It is a strong pole eight or ten feet long, with a pointed prick at one end to urge on the oxen, and a kind of chisel at the other to clear the plough-share from earth and weeds, and to cut the roots and thorns that catch or choke the plough. The Hebrew word in Judges (iii. 31) specially signifies the pole, and that in 1 Sam. xiii. 21; Eccles. xii. 11 the point. The author of Ecclesiastes calls the words of the wise "goads," because they keep in the right path, and stimulate the idle. There is a reference to the goad in Acts ix. 5; xxvi. 14. The idea is taken from an unruly ox, who, when pricked by the goad, kicks back, and receives a deeper wound. This kicking is against the instrument used to guide him rightly; it is more than folly, therefore, it is rebellion, to resist the hand that has a right to direct.

GOAD, JOHN, born at London in 1615, a clergyman of the Church of England, was headmaster of the Merchant Tailors' School for twenty years, during which time he turned out many pupils who were an honor to him. Being suspected of a tendency to popery, he was dismissed by the governors, whose act he shortly after justified by openly avowing himself a Romanist.

GOADBY (gōd'be), ROBERT, born in 1721, a printer and publisher at Sherborne, Dorsetshire. He was the author of a large work, "An Illustration of the Holy Scriptures," consisting partly of observations of other men, and in part of his own. It is thoroughly Arian throughout, and forms the subject of animadversion by the Rev. Walter Sellon.

GOAR (go-ar'), JACQUES, born at Paris 1601, a Dominican monk and a great Greek scholar. This led him to visit Greece, and to make himself acquainted with the life and customs of its modern inhabitants, and he afterward became apostolic missionary to the Isle of Chios. He was the author of a rare and valuable work, "Eucologion, or the Ritual of the Greeks."

GOAR, SAINT. The name of this saint is well known on the Rhine, where a church was dedicated to him in 1768. He was born in Aquitaine, in France, toward the close of the sixth century. Becoming a priest, he erected a chapel near Oberwessel, in Germany, and there he received pilgrims and travelers, many of whom he converted. He preferred his chapel and cell to a bishopric which was offered to him. By means of great miracles he is said to have refuted charges made against him. He died in 649.

GOAT, a well-known animal belonging to the family Capridæ, of the order Ruminantia. There are many varieties of the goat. Four may be mentioned as most likely to be known to the Hebrews: "1. The domestic Syrian long-eared breed, with horns rather small and variously bent; the ears longer than the head, and pendulous; hair long, often black. 2. The Angora, or rather Anadolia, breed of Asia Minor, with long hair, more or less fine. 3. The Egyptian breed, with small spiral horns, long brown hair and very long ears. 4. A breed from Upper Egypt, without horns, having the nasal bones singularly elevated, the nose contracted, with the lower jaw protruding the incisors. Hence several words are used in Hebrew for this animal, no doubt indicating different varieties. Goats possess singularly acute instinctive habits. Nothing seems to escape their observation; their senses, too, of taste and smell are delicate. They constituted a large part of Hebrew flocks, for the milk and the flesh were articles of food, Gen. xxvii. 9; 1 Sam. xxv. 2; Prov. xxvii. 27. As clean animals they were used in sacrifice, Ex. xii. 5; Heb. ix. 13, and their hair was manufactured into a thick cloth. Of this one of the coverings of the tabernacle was made, Ex. xxv. 4; xxvi. 7; and it was on this material that in all probability St. Paul was employed, Acts xviii. 3. It is not easy to decide what is the original stock of the common goat, Capra hircus, and the other varieties. Some would suppose it to be the agagrus, or wild Caucasian goat, others the ibex.

The word translated "devils" in Lev. xvii. 7 and 2 Chr. xi. 15 is one of the ordinary terms for a goat, signifying hairy. It may be observed, in connection with the practice forbidden, that in Lower Egypt the goat was considered sacred.

This animal is sometimes introduced in Scripture symbolically, as in Dan. viii. 5, 21; comp. Matt. xxv. 23, 33.

GOAT, SCAPE. See AZAZEL and SCAPEGOAT.

GOAT, WILD. As the Hebrew word y'elim, translated "wild goats," occurs in connection with lofty eminences and precipitous rocks, it is probable that the common interpretation is correct which refers it to the ibex. Several species have been described by naturalists as inhabiting the different mountain ranges of the East, all of them so slightly varying from the European form (Capra ibex) that they may possibly be but varieties of it, dependent on climate and other local peculiarities.

ROCK GOAT OR IBEX.

One of these is described by Burckhardt as inhabiting all the ranges and wadys south of the Arnon in large herds of forty or fifty. The people hold their flesh in high estimation, and make a profit out of the immense knotted horns, which they sell to the merchants of Hebron and Jerusalem, where they are wrought into handles for knives and daggers. Burckhardt himself saw a pair three feet in length. The hunters find it difficult to approach them within range, but they succeed by hiding themselves among the reeds on the borders of the streams in the valleys, and shooting them when they resort thither in the evening to drink. It is observable that the same story is rife there that is told of the Alpine ibex—that the animal when alarmed will throw itself from a precipice of fifty feet and upward in height, alighting on the horns, the elasticity of which preserves them from injury. Incredible as it seems, it is difficult to account for the wide prevalence of the belief without foundation, and the observations of uncultivated people on animals with which they are familiar must not be unhesitatingly rejected.

Among the Sinai mountains, as we learn on the authority of the same traveler, the ibex appears again. He supposes it to be the same species, and doubtless it is, especially as it bears the same name among the Arabs of both regions—viz., the beden. There the chase is pursued in much the same manner, and under much the same circumstances, as that of the chamois in the Alps and the Tyrol. The hunters exercise great vigilance and hardihood, taking vast circuits to get above their quarry, and especially aiming to surprise them at early day. Like most mountain quadrupeds that are gregarious, they have a leader, who acts as sentinel, and gives the alarm on the occurrence of any suspicious sight, sound or smell, when the whole flock makes off for a loftier peak. Their numbers are said to have much decreased of late years; for the Arabs report them so abundant fifty years ago that if a stranger sought hospitality at a Bedouin's tent, and the owner had no sheep to kill, he would without hesitation take his gun and go confidently to shoot a beden. The flesh is excellent, with a flavor similar to that of our venison. The Bedouins make water-bottles of their skins, as of those of the domestic goats, and rings of their horns, which they wear on their thumbs. Dogs easily catch them when surprised in the plains, but in the abrupt precipices and chasms of the rocks the ibex is said to elude pursuit by the tremendous leaps which it makes.

It is likely that this species is identical with that which bears the name of poseng (Caprus oegagrus), and which inhabits all the loftier ranges which traverse Asia, from the Taurus and Caucasus to China. It is very robust, and much larger than any domestic goat; its general color iron-gray, shaded with brown, with a black line down the back and across the withers, and a white patch on the crupper. The horns of the male are very large, compressed and slightly diverging as they arch over the back; their front side makes an obtuse edge, and is marked by a series of knobs with deep hollows between.

Cuvier and other zoologists have supposed the oegagrus to be the parent stock of the domestic goat. If this be true, our translators' rendering of "wild goats" for y'elim has a peculiar propriety.

GOATH (go'ath) is mentioned only Jer. xxxi. 39, where it apparently denotes some prominent object which served to mark in one direction the boundary of Jerusalem, but whether it was a hill or a valley or a pool, is altogether uncertain. Equally uncertain is the position of the place. The context seems to favor the conjecture that it was on the southern side of the city.

GOB (gob), a place mentioned in 2 Sam. xxi. 18 and 19, where battles were fought between the Philistines and Israelites. The Septuagint reads in one verse Gerth, and in the other Rhom, but the parallel passage in 1 Chr. xx. 4 reads GEZER, which see. The two places were probably close together, but the site is unknown.

GOBAT (go'bat), SAMUEL, D.D., bishop of the United Church of England and Ireland at Jerusalem, is a native of Switzerland, and was educated at the Church Missionary College of Islington. He was sent out by the Church Missionary Society to Malta, whence he proceeded as a missionary to Egypt and Abyssinia, in which latter country he resided for three years. Upon the death of Bishop Alexander, the appointment to the post of episcopal superintendent over the Anglican congregations in Syria and adjacent was appointed to the metropolitan see of Paris, to which he was installed by Talleyrand, bishop of Autun. Four years after, he resigned his office and abjured his religion, in order, as he said, to further the cause of "la liberté et l'égalité." A few months afterward he was condemned, with others, for endeavoring to lay the foundations of government upon atheism, and was consequently guillotined.

countries devolved upon the king of Prussia, who selected Mr. Gobat, and he was consecrated by the archbishop of Canterbury. The position which Bishop Gobat took up toward the orthodox Eastern Church led to a very decided and largely signed protest on the part of English Churchmen as being in contravention of the terms on which this bishopric was founded, and a very warm pamphlet discussion ensued.

GOBEL (go'bel), JEAN BAPTISTE, born 1727, died 1794. While bishop of Lydda in partibus, GOBLET (gob'let), Sol. Song vii. 2, a round vessel for liquor. The same word is translated "basins," Ex. xxiv. 6, and "cups," Isa. xxii. 24.

GOD, from the German Gott, which is allied with gut, good, is the common English name for the supreme Being, as the sole, independent, universal and all-perfect Lord of creation. It is used indifferently for two words in the Hebrew. (1.) The first and least comprehensive of these is EL, which has might or strength for its root-meaning, and was applied to God as emphatically the strong and mighty One, who can do in heaven and on earth what seems good to him. Being used for strength generally, and occasionally for men and other real or imaginary beings as possessed or appearing to be possessed of the quality of strength, it is very often coupled with some other epithets when applied to the true God, in order more distinctly and adequately to express his being and Godhead. Thus tains of God," "Lion of God," etc. As a designation of God, EL is more frequently used in poetry than in prose, probably on account of the might implied in and indicated by the term, rendering it more congenial to the excitation and energy of mind exhibited in poetry. (2.) The more distinctive synonym for God in Scripture is ELOAH in the singular, and in the plural ELOHIM. Hebrew philologists differ as to the etymology of the word, whether it should be held to come from a root signifying to be strong, or from one signifying to fear. Practically, the difference is not material, as in either case the word denoted God as the great object of homage and awe—in the one case more generally, in the other with special reference to his infinite power and resistless might. What, however, is chiefly remarkable is that the singular ELOAH is but rarely used—only, indeed, in the rapt style of poetry—while the plural ELOHIM was the common form of the designation both in poetry and prose. This usage of a plural term has given rise to a good deal of discussion, and has not unfrequently been connected with fanciful or superficial reasons. Many orthodox theologians have sought to find in it an indication of the Trinity; by others it has been regarded as what is called the plural of majesty or excellence, the common style of earthly sovereigns; and not a few rational theologians have been able to see nothing more in it than a remnant of polytheism, the term having been first, as they supposed, applied to a plurality of gods, while such were believed to exist, and still retained after the and Ewald) as an abstract—the Godhead, but (with Hengstenberg, Delitzsch, Keil, etc.) as the plural of magnitude. ELOHIM designates GOD as the infinitely great and glorious One, having in himself the fullness of divine perfections in their manifold variety of powers and operations. As a plural, it answers the same purpose which is accomplished elsewhere by an accumulation of the divine names, as in Josh. xxii. 22; the thrice holy in Isa. vi. 3, and the Lord of lords in Deut. x. 17. It awakens attention to the infinite riches and the inexhaustible fullness which are contained in the one divine Being; so that if men might even imagine innumerable gods, and invest them with perfections, these should still be all comprised in the one ELOHIM.

The view of God which according to this explanation is embodied in the word ELOHIM, while it cannot be said to teach directly the doctrine of the Trinity, is yet in perfect accordance with it, and presupposes that plenitude of life and blessing, and that diversity of operations in their distribution, which most fitly harmonize with the three-fold personality of Godhead. The doctrine itself has its distinct enunciation and development only in the later portions of Scripture, and in connection more especially with the great work of redemption. But its Scriptural exhibition belongs rather to what is said of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, as contradistinguished from the Father; for personal attributes and actions being ascribed to them, there necessarily arises the doctrinal conclusion of a three-foldness in the unity of God. In Old Testament scripture, however, though there are not wanting passages, especially in the prophetic writings, which more or less distinctly indicate this doctrine, it was necessary to maintain a certain reserve in regard to it. Had the doctrine of the Trinity been there formally exhibited, while still the work which was to constitute the objective ground of the representation, and give it practical weight and value to men's minds, lay under a veil, the effect would inevitably have been to encourage the tendency to polytheism and idolatry. So many things drew in this direction in ancient times that the unity of God required to be guarded with the utmost jealousy among the covenant people, and the most explicit as well as reiterated declarations made respecting it. Hence, sometimes, when using the plural word for God, occasion is taken to prevent the idea from entering that it implied any multiplicity in the heathen sense, as in Deut. vi. 4, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," or more literally and much more expressively, "Hear, O Israel, Jehovah (is) our Elohim, Jehovah one;" and again, ch. xxxii. 39, "Behold now I, I am he, and no Elohim with me," or as it is in Isa. xlv. 6, "Besides me there is no Elohim."

The word ELOHIM, however, as might be expected from its being the common designation of the supreme Being, is often applied to the objects of heathen worship, not as being actually divine, but as believed to be such by their votaries, and in popular language so called. In this case, however, the plural had its common force; the objects of worship referred to were elohim, or "gods," because they were contemplated as a multitude of personalities, each being supposed to have his individual characteristics and distinct sphere of operations. But that the language employed was taken simply as current coin, and implied nothing as to their proper existence, was obvious from the whole teaching of Scripture, and is often made the subject of express declarations; as when the idols of the nations are called gods, that yet are no gods, we have El-Shaddai, God almighty; El-Elohim, God of gods; El-Bethel, God of Bethel; also God-jealous, God most high, etc. It is also on account of this very general import and use of the word EL that we find it applied in the original—though in such cases translations commonly employ a paraphrase—to anything singularly great or mighty of its kind. Thus, arezē el, cedars of God, such as are peculiarly strong and lofty, standing as it were in a relation of their own to God for having planted or nourished them; and in like manner, "Mounbelief of one living and true God came in their place. The progress of investigation and the more thorough knowledge that has been obtained of the language and literature of the Bible have tended rather to discountenance each of these positions, and to favor, if not establish, the conviction that the plural in this case is used in accordance with a principle of which there are many other examples in the Hebrew—viz., for the purpose of enlarging and intensifying the idea expressed in the singular. It is not to be regarded (with Hofmann

Jer. xvi. 20; 2 Chr. xiii. 9, or the gods that have not made the heavens, Jer. x. 11; or when they are described as vanities, while Jehovah is the living and the true God, Deut. xxxii. 21; Jon. ii. 8; Acts xiv. 15; Deut. v. 26, etc. Besides this merely popular application of the term Elohim, in the sense of gods, there is also an occasional use of it in Scripture, according to which it includes what in appearance or character has in it something of the superhuman, the divine, as in Ps. viii. 6, where it is said of man, "Thou hast made him a little lower than (literally to want a little of) the Elohim;" and in Ps. xcvi. 7, "Worship him, all ye Elohim." In these passages the angels have very commonly been understood as the beings more particularly intended, and such was the rendering adopted by the Septuagint, which has also been very commonly followed in other versions. The term may certainly be regarded as including the angels, and perhaps more especially pointing to them, though it should rather be regarded as indicating whatever has most in it of a divine-like nature and dignity, and the angels, only as being the purest reflections known to us of the divine essence. In some passages it is even applied to those who have only that limited approximation to the divine which consists in bearing a portion of God's delegated authority—the rulers and judges of Israel, Ex. xxii. 9, 28. In allusion to this it is said in Ps. lxxxii. 1, "Elohim (God) judgeth among the elohim" (gods)—the supreme judge exercises judgment in the midst of subordinate ones, in order to secure that their judgment be in accordance with the great principles of his righteousness; and to show that the persons more immediately addressed were called gods only in this inferior sense, and were also unworthy of the designation, it is added in ver. 6, 7, "I have said ye are gods, but ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes." Hence also, as all true Israelites were called sons of God, the term might be applied in a qualified sense to them, as having in them something of a divine nature, and indeed is applied by our Lord in the extended use, John x. 35, he makes of the passage just referred to from Ps. lxxxii.

It will be perceived from what has been said that the Hebrew names for God, whether EL, ELOAH or ELOHIM, have a certain generalness about them. They point to God in his superhuman, uncreated, essentially divine and, as such, adorable essence, but do not indicate what he is in his special relation to the members of his covenant. The more peculiar designation of God in this respect is JEHOVAH, which throughout Old Testament scripture consequently appears more than the others as the strictly proper name. It is therefore in connection with it that the being and character of God, as the God of Revelation, will be most fitly considered. See JEHOVAH.

GODDARD (god'ard), JOSIAH, a Baptist missionary, was born at Wendell, Massachusetts, in 1813. He graduated at Brown University, finished his theological studies at Newton Theological Seminary in 1838, and was sent as a missionary to the Chinese in Siam. In addition to his labors here in preaching, he translated the Gospel of John into Chinese, compiled an Anglo-Chinese vocabulary and wrote several tracts on religious subjects. Suffering here from hemorrhage of the lungs, he removed to Ningpo, and though holding life by a very uncertain tenure, continued abundant in labors for six years, preaching the gospel, circuof Cardinal Richelieu by a paraphrase of the "Benedicite Omnia Opera," and was by him appointed to the see of Grasse, the duties of which he discharged in an exemplary manner. His pen was that of a ready writer, but his chief composition was "Histoire de l'Eglise," "History of the Church," which reaches from the creation to the end of the eighth century. It was the first ecclesiastical history written in the French language. Innocent X. gave him the see of Venice. He died in 1672.

GODFREY OF BOUILLON (god'fre of boo-yong'); French, GODEFROID or GODEFROI DE BOUILLON (go-deh-froah'-deh-boo-yong'); Latin, GODEFROIDUS (go-deh-froy'-dus) or GOTHOFREDUS (go-tho-fray'dus) BOLONIENSIS (bo-lo-ne-en'sis) or BULLONIENSIS (bool-lo-ne-en'sis).

This renowned crusader was the son of Eustace II., count of Boulogne and Lens, and on his mother's side was descended from Charlemagne. He was born, about 1058, at Baisy-thy, in Belgium, and at an early age gave proofs of his military courage and talent, and, becoming attached to the emperor Henry IV., served with great gallantry in his armies. On the eve of the battle of Malsen the emperor assembled his nobles, and having called on them to declare which of them they considered most worthy to bear the standard of the empire, Godfrey was unanimously selected. He justified their choice by his noble bearing the next day, giving a mortal wound to Rodolphe, the claimant of the crown. He was chiefly instrumental in the success of the imperial attack on Rome; but falling ill, and considering that act in the light of sacrilege, he vowed that if restored to health he would join the expedition to the Holy Land for the rescue of the Holy Sepulchre. After a few years, when Urban II. called all Christians to arms, and the first crusade was organized, Godfrey was chosen as leader, with his brothers, Eustace and Baldwin, as next in command. In 1096 he set out at the head of a mighty host. Encamping before Constantinople, he compelled the emperor Alexius Comnenus to allow him a free passage to the East. Resistance was met at every step, and Godfrey proved himself again and again peculiarly capable and brave. After much hard fighting, battles and sieges which cost thousands of lives, and the capture of Nicæa, Antioch, Edessa, Acre and many other towns, in which garrisons were left, the grand army arrived before Jerusalem on the 7th of June, 1099. The 300,000 men with which Godfrey set out had been reduced by famine, pesti-

lating tracts and completing his version of the New Testament. This last work was a valuable contribution to the Chinese translation of the Bible. He died in 1854.

GODDARD, WILLIAM GILES, LL.D., was born in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1793. He received his preparatory education in his native city, and graduated from Brown University in 1812. He was in 1825 elected to the chair of moral philosophy and metaphysics in his alma mater, which he held for seventeen years. He died February 16, 1846.

GODEAU (go-do'), ANTOINE, born in 1605, at Dreux, was an eminent French prelate, devoted to literature. He was one of the coterie which met at the house of M. Conrart to discuss philosophical subjects, and which led to the foundation of the French Academy, of which Godeau became one of the brightest ornaments. He attracted the attention lence and war to a little more than 20,000, while the Holy City was defended by double that number. But the enthusiasm of the crusaders recognized no disparity of numbers; the walls were attacked and carried, to the cry of "Dieu le veut," Godfrey being among the first to scale them. The crown of the newly-established Christian kingdom of Jerusalem was offered to the duc de Bouillon, but he declined to wear a crown of gold in that city where the King of kings had worn a crown of thorns. He contented himself with the title of Baron and Defender of the Holy Sepulchre, a post which he occupied but for a single year, dying in 1100. But during this time the sultan of Egypt, at the head of all his forces, attempted to dispossess him; Godfrey gave him battle in the plain of Ascalon, and 100,000 men were left dead on the field. He also repelled more than one Saracenic attack on the city, and he found time to draw up a code of laws known as the "Assises de Jérusalem." Godfrey was a man of singular virtue, valor and ability. He was regarded by his fellow-nobles as their model, by his soldiers as their father, by his people as their protector. His death filled Jerusalem with dismay, and when, at the moment of lowering his corpse into a grave at the foot of Calvary, the herald-at-arms proclaimed, "Le Roi Godefroid est mort," the Saracens themselves even mingled their tears with those of the Christians. Godfrey has been well called the Agamemnon and Achilles of the Christian Iliad; he forms the central figure in the immortal poem of Tasso which relates the rescue of the Holy Sepulchre. His tomb and his sword were long preserved in Jerusalem, but the former was destroyed in the fire which, in 1808, consumed the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. In 1848 Brussels reared a bronze equestrian statue to the greatest of the sons of Belgium.

GODHEAD (god'hed), the nature or essential being of God, Rom. i. 20; Acts xvii. 29; Col. ii. 9. See God.

GODLY (god'le), GODLINESS (god'leness). The general meaning of "godly," as a quality of any one, is pious, Ps. xii. 1; 2 Pet. ii. 9; and "godliness" is commonly "piety," 1 Tim. ii. 2.

GODS. So judges or rulers are sometimes called, Ex. xxii. 28; Ps. lxxxii. 6; John x. 34, 35, as being God's representatives on earth. Compare Ex. iv. 16; vii. 1; Rom. xiii. 1, 4. More generally the word means false gods, 1 Cor. vii. 5. See IDOL, IDOLATRY.

GODWIN, FRANCIS, bishop of Hereford, was born at Havington, in Northamptonshire, in 1561. He received his education at Christ Church College, Oxford, and assisted Camden in his topographical inquiries. In 1601 he was promoted to the see of Llandaff, and was translated to that of Hereford in 1617. He died in 1633. He was the author of "Annals of English Affairs in the Reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI. and Mary;"

eloquence, and subsequently gave him the bishopric of Bath and Wells; but he lost her favor by marrying a second time. He died in 1590.

GODWYN, THOMAS, D.D., was born in 1587, and entered as a student of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1602. He was for some years headmaster of the free school at Abingdon, Berks. He was subsequently presented to the rectory of Brightwell, near Wallingford, where he died March 20, 1643. His reputation rests upon the valuable aid which he rendered to the study of Hebrew antiquities. Two works upon this subject were published by him, the first entitled "A Synopsis of Hebrew Antiquities, needful for the Exposition of both Testaments;" the other, which is more generally known, has the title, "Moses and Aaron; Civil and Ecclesiastical Rites used by the Ancient Hebrews, observed, and at large opened, for the clearing of many obscure texts throughout the whole Scripture." This work passed rapidly through several editions, and was translated into Dutch and into Latin. It was very generally used as a text-book by teachers of theology; amongst others, by H. Witsius and by Jones of Tewkesbury, both of whom wrote annotations upon it. It also formed the basis of Carpzov's "Apparatus Historico-Criticus" and of Jennings' "Jewish Antiquities." The great learning and general accuracy of the work are sufficiently attested by these facts.

GOEPP (gep'), JEAN JACQUES, was born at Heiligenstein, Alsace, April 6, 1771. He had finished his theological studies and already entered upon his career as a minister at the commencement of the Revolution in France. Being drafted into the army, he served for some time, and upon his release he was appointed pastor of the French Protestant congregation at Strasburg. In 1808 he assumed the office of director of the seminary of St. Thomas, and in the following year he became pastor of the Lutheran church in Paris. He was created by the French government a member of the Legion of Honor in testimony of valuable services rendered to the nation, and died June 21, 1855.

GOERING (geh'ring), JACOB, a learned minister of the Lutheran denomination, was born at York, Pennsylvania, January 17, 1755. After pursuing a course of theology under Dr. Helmuth, he became pastor of the Lutheran church at York in 1786, which position he held until his death. He was a diligent student, a profound scholar, and also a catalogue of the English bishops, with notices of their lives—a work of great value. It obtained for him the see of Llandaff from Queen Elizabeth, and on account of a Latin edition of the same work James I. promoted him to the bishopric of Hereford.

GODWIN, THOMAS, was born in 1517. He became a Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and having embraced the principles of the Reformation, suffered persecution during Mary's reign. When Elizabeth came to the throne, she made him dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and then of Canterbury, being much struck with his in the pulpit an eloquent preacher. His writings comprise theological discussions, inquiries into Oriental languages and translations from the Arabic poets. He died in 1807.

GOERRES (geh'r'ez), JOHANN JOSEPH, was a German Roman Catholic writer of singular but eccentric ability. He was born at Coblenz in 1776, and educated at his native place. He threw himself into the French Revolution with all his heart, and he used all his power to disseminate its principles and doctrines. A sojourn in Paris produced a change in his views, and he became a professor of natural history in his native city. He fell into a kind of mysticism, in which he believed that he saw much to render the doctrines and principles of Romanism attractive, and he endeavored to show that all valuable inventions came necessarily from "Catholic" truth. He gained few disciples, as his style was so bad that he was often unintelligible. He died in 1848.

GOERTNER (gert'ner), JOHN PETER, was born at Canojoharie, New York, April 26, 1797, and graduated at Union College in 1822. After entering the ministry in 1824, he devoted himself to missionary labor among the destitute population in Northern New York and Canada for some time, and afterward was settled at Johnstown, New York. He died at the early age of thirty-two.

GOETHALS (geh'thals), HENRI, was born at Ghent in 1217. He was a learned ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic Church, on whom the Sorbonne conferred the title of Doctor Solennis. He wrote a treatise "On Illustrious Men," as a continuation of the similar works of St. Jerome and Sigebert. As archdeacon of Tournay he was very zealous in combating the errors of the people, and more than one of the charitable institutions of that town and of his native city was largely indebted to his liberality. He died in 1293.

GOETHE (geh'te), JOHN WOLFGANG, an eminent author and one of the greatest poets of Germany, was born August 28, 1749, at Frankfort-on-the-Main. His father spared no pains to develop the talents of which he exhibited early evidence. When only eight years old, he gave much thought to religion, but instead of receiving with a child's humility and faith the teachings of revealed religion, he struck out a system for himself, drew up a form of worship to the God of nature, and even went so far as to offer up burnt-sacrifice. This delusion influenced his whole life to such a degree that it appears impossible to reconcile his views and expressions with the teachings of Christianity. His belief seems never to have risen above the merest deism, if indeed he escaped the pantheism of Spinoza. After graduating at Leipsic he went, in 1776, to Weimar, where he passed many years of his life, loaded with honors, as privy-councilor and afterward prime-minister. The little court of Weimar in time became a distinguished focus of German literature, having among its residents, about the beginning of the present century, more than twenty writers of eminence, among whom may be mentioned Goethe, Schiller, Wieland, Herder and Kotzebue. He died March 22, 1832.

GOETZE (get'ze), GEORGE H., a voluminous German writer, was born August 11, 1667, at Leipsic, and educated at the university in that city. Entering the ministry, he became Protestant pastor of Bury, in the duchy of Magdeburg, in 1690, and in 1702 he assumed the superintendency of the churches of Lubec, which he held until his death. He wrote over one hundred and fifty volumes on literary, historical and theological subjects. He died April 25, 1828.

GOETZE, JOHANN MELCHIOR, was born in 1717, was a German Protestant divine and voluminous writer on polemical and other subjects. The last twenty years of his life were spent in opposing the philosophic views of Lessing and Goethe, theology under Dr. Messer, the president of the college. The views of the pupil became unsettled, and it was believed that Dr. Messer's influence had in some measure affected him. Further examination, however, confirmed him in the faith, and he was ordained and settled at Cavendish, in the State of Vermont. Few Baptist ministers in the State at that time had enjoyed a liberal training, and consequently he exercised great influence among them. In 1815 he was removed to Worcester, Massachusetts, where he labored with great success, being and defending the truths of revealed religion against the rationalistic school. He died in 1786.

GOG, as used by Ezekiel, ch. xxxviii., xxxix., where alone the name occurs in Old Testament scripture, is evidently formed from Magog, as a sort of root-word, to designate the prince or ideal head and representative of Magog. See MAGOG.

GOHL (göl). See GOLIUS.

GOING (go'ing), JONATHAN, D.D., was born in 1786, and educated at Brown University. He graduated in 1809, and continued the study of largely influential in building up the Newton Theological Institution. His attention was drawn to the destitution of the West in 1841, and he became an ardent supporter of the Baptist Home Missionary Society, which was founded in 1842, and of which society he was appointed corresponding secretary. Subsequently he became president of Granville College, now known as Denison University, where his energy and wisdom raised up a most prosperous institution. He died in 1844.

GOLAN (go'lan), an ancient city of Bashan, allotted to the Levites, and made one of the three cities of refuge east of the Jordan, Deut. iv. 43;

Josh. xx. 8; 1 Chr. vi. 71. The name does not occur in Bible history after the division of the country among the tribes. The site of Golan has not yet been determined.

The province of GAULANITIS took its name from this city, as is stated by Eusebius and Jerome. It appears that after the Greek conquest of Syria the kingdom of Bashan was divided into four provinces, Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Auranitis and Batanæa. The last three were only Greek forms of the names of ancient principalities, while Gaulanitis was the territory attached to the important city of Golan. The boundaries of Gaulanitis are not given by any ancient writer, but they may be ascertained from some incidental references of Josephus. On the south it was separated from Gadaris by the river Hieromax. The Jordan and Sea of Galilee formed its western border from the mouth of the Hieromax to Casarea Philippi. On the north it had Ituræa, and on the east Auranitis and Trachonitis. Gaulanitis was then the western province of Bashan; and it still retains its ancient name under the Arabic form Jaulân.

Gaulanitis or Jaulân is about 40 miles long from north to south, by 20 broad. The greater part is flat table-land, with a deep soil and luxuriant pastures. The western side, as seen from Tiberias, resembles the declivities of a mountain range, furrowed deeply by torrents and ravines. This is occasioned by the elevation of the plateau (about 2500 feet), and the depression of the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan valley. On the north-west a spur from the Hermon range runs across it some 15 miles, and terminates in a conical peak called Tell el-Faras. The scenery of this ridge is picturesque—graceful conical summits clothed with evergreen oaks, long winding glens filled with tangled copse, and little upland plains carpeted with green grass and spangled with wild flowers. The “oaks of Bashan,” of which prophets wrote and psalmists sung, are still here, Isa. ii. 13; Zech. xi. 2, and among those rich pastures roamed in ancient days the herds of cattle, the pride of the country—“strong bulls of Bashan,” Ps. xxii. 12. Flocks, too, wandered along the hill sides, and spread themselves over the green plateau—“rams and lambs, and goats, and bullocks, all of them fatlings of Bashan,” Ezek. xxxix. 18; Deut. xxxii. 14. The province was once densely peopled. The ruins of no less than 127 towns and large villages are known, only eleven of which have now any settled inhabitants. The whole country is overrun periodically by the wild Bedouins of the eastern desert, whose vast droves of camels and flocks of sheep devour the pastures, and too often trample down the few corn-fields of the peasants.

GOLD comes into very early notice in Scripture as one of the representatives of wealth, and among the precious metals the chief material of which ornaments of dress were made. It appears to have been known and prized in primeval times, as the land of Havilah, round which one of the rivers of paradise flowed, is said to have been distinguished for the excellent quality of its gold. Abraham is recorded to have been rich in gold as well as silver and cattle, Gen. xiii. 2; xxiv. 35; and golden earrings and bracelets were among the presents which he sent by his servant when commissioned to go in search of a wife for Isaac. Such facts show conclusively how very early gold came to be esteemed among the most valuable commodities a man could have, and how soon it was turned to use in the fine arts.

In subsequent times frequent mention is made of the employment of gold among the Israelites and those with whom they were brought into contact; but there is nothing peculiar in the notices, or that calls for any special remark, unless it be the large quantities in which at certain periods it is said to have existed, and the profuseness with which it appears to have been applied. For example, in the construction of the tabernacle twenty-nine talents of gold are said to have been expended. But this is as nothing compared with what was provided for the temple, David himself having prepared and offered toward its erection 3000 talents of gold, and the principal men of his kingdom 5000 more, 1 Chr. xxix. 4, 7. The exact worth, or even weight, indicated by these numbers cannot be determined with any certainty, for the word talent was used, in different countries, and in different ages of the same country, for weights very widely dissimilar. As used in Homer, the talent was unquestionably of much smaller weight than the later talent, which consisted of sixty minæ, equal to about eighty-two pounds avoirdupois; and even at a much later period, traces of the same small talent have been found in Greek writers. There is reason to believe that the Babylonian system of weight, or some other ancient Oriental system, exercised an important influence on the later Grecian mode of reckoning, and it is extremely probable that it did so likewise on that of the later Hebrew, in both cases alike rendering the talent much larger than it had been originally. See WEIGHTS. This supposition is favored by the consideration, in regard to the tabernacle, that there appears to have been no adequate reason, scarcely indeed room, for the employment about it of so many as twenty-nine talents of gold, if these talents weighed each eighty-two pounds. By much the greater proportion of what was used went to the construction of thin plates for covering the boards of the tabernacle and some parts of the furniture; and from the extreme ductility of gold, it is well known that a comparatively small quantity goes a long way in this employment. It is impossible, therefore, to say, with any approach to certainty, what precise quantities of gold may be indicated by the talents specified in the days of Moses, or even of David. But there can be no doubt that at both periods the proportion employed of this metal was relatively great, and especially that in the times of David and Solomon it existed in extraordinary profusion; so that, as it is said in particular respecting Solomon's time, “gold was nothing accounted of,” 1 Ki. x. 21.

It is right to notice, however, that this singular abundance of gold in early times was not confined to Palestine and the covenant people; it comes out also in the history of other Asiatic nations. Heeren has drawn attention to this as one of the peculiarities connected with ancient Asia, and as raising a question which is not quite easily solved as to the quarters whence such immense stores of this precious metal may have been derived. While various mountains in Western and Northern Asia are known to have yielded gold, he thinks that the immense supply of it which appears to have existed in so many countries of Central Asia can only be adequately accounted for by the commerce that was kept up with the gold-producing regions of Africa, as well as those of the South and East of Asia, in particular of India. But as to its plentifulness there can be no doubt. “It has been the constant taste,” he says, “of the Asiatics to employ their gold not so much in coinage as in ornaments of every sort and in embroidery. The thrones of their princes, the furniture of their palaces, and especially all that belongs to the service of the royal table, from the time of Solomon to the present day, have been fashioned of massive gold; their weapons have been also thus decorated, and dresses or carpets embroidered with gold have been at all times among the most valued commodities of the East. This splendor was not a prerogative confined to the Persian monarchs alone, as if they bought up the gold in every part of their dominions to dazzle the eyes of their subjects. The same practice prevailed through all the gradations of that system of despotism. The satraps were comparatively as wealthy as their master, and their inferior officers again in the like proportion. We meet also with occasional instances of private individuals possessed of immense wealth; and according to Herodotus, even a pastoral nation of Eastern Asia (the Massagetæ) had most of its utensils of gold.” It may be added, in further proof of this, and in illustration also of the disposition to devote large quantities of gold to sacred uses, that in the temple of Belus at Babylon there is reported to have been found a single statue of Belus, with a throne and table, which together weighed 800 talents of gold, and in the temple at large gold to the amount of more than 7000 talents. These talents undoubtedly were according to the large Babylonian standard.

The word gold is repeatedly used symbolically in Scripture to denote—1. The rich treasures of grace which Christ bestows on those who seek, Rev. iii. 18, and elsewhere; 2. The great value of God's word, Ps. xix. 10; 3. The peculiar excellences of tried saints, Job xxiii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 7; 4. The attractiveness and preciousness of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 13, etc.

In regard to the spiritual senses that have been attached to gold as used in sacred architecture, see TABERNAACLE.

GOLDEN BOWL, Eccles. xii. 6. Some interpret this of the skull, and the “silver cord” of the spinal marrow. Mendelssohn, however, more suitably refers the metaphor to the working of a wheel and the drawing of water, and supposes that the human heart, with its veins and arteries, is the thing signified.

GOLDEN GATE. See JERUSALEM.

GOLDEN LEGEND. About A. D. 1230 a Dominican monk, afterward archbishop of Genoa, named James de Voragine or Vragine, sometimes written Giacomo de Voragine, made a large collection of legendary traditions of saints. See JAMES DE VORAGINE. It was translated into different languages, and for a long time it commanded a great circulation, and like all accounts of wonders, it was very popular. It was known by the title of the “Golden Legend,” but it is of no historical value whatever.

GOLDEN ROSE. For many years the pope has been accustomed to send a golden rose ornamented with gems to such monarchs as he desired to honor. On the fourth Sunday in Lent the pope consecrates one every year. Urban V. introduced the custom by sending one to Joan, the queen of Sicily, in the year 1366. In 1868 a golden rose was sent to the queen of Spain before her abdication and flight from the country.

GOLDWELL (gold'well), BISHOP, was one of the most eminent men who occupied the see of Norwich, in England, and his great taste and energy are evident on the choir of the cathedral. In the year 1463 the roof and clere-story had been injured by lightning, and the bishop undertook the formidable task of a complete restoration, which included the vaulting of the choir as well as all the details of the clere-story. His work is of a light and exceedingly graceful character, and forms one of the most attractive portions of the cathedral. Like all such undertakings connected with the great cathedrals, the cost and time required for their execution were on a great scale, and the space of twenty-seven years was required to complete this great achievement. His tomb is placed on the second bay to the east of the transept and on the south side of the choir, and the engraving on page 749 will show the reader the style which prevailed in that age. It will be seen that the figure is enveloped, not in the ordinary chasuble, but in the "cappa pluvialis" or "processional cope"—that is, the cope used in processions—and this is the only monument erected to the memory of a bishop before the Reformation in which this style appears.

GOLGOTHA (gol'go-thah), Heb. gulgoleth, but in Chaldee gulgatha, a "skull," occurs in 2 Ki. ix. 25, where it is said of Jezebel, "They found no more of her than the skull." The only other passages where the word occurs are those in the Evangelists which describe the scene of our Lord's crucifixion: "When they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, A place of a skull," Matt. xxvii. 33. St. Luke uses the corresponding Greek word, kranion, for which the Latin calvaria, or Calvary, has been substituted in modern versions; and St. John says, Christ, "bearing his cross, went forth into a place called of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew Golgotha," ch. xix. 17. In that place, wherever it was, the Evangelists all testify our Lord was crucified, and also that he was buried; for in the same place where he was crucified the garden lay wherein was the new tomb to which Joseph of Arimathea committed the dead body. The question as to the site of Golgotha, therefore, virtually resolves itself into that which has been raised respecting the Holy Sepulchre. It will be observed, however, that no indication is given by the Evangelists of Golgotha or Calvary being a mount; it is simply spoken of as a place. The idea of a mount is supposed to have arisen from the mention of a rock, as that on which the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was built. No trace of a mount connected with the crucifixion is found in any writer down to the close of the fifth century, though the term rock is occasionally used. Afterward the pilgrims appear to have given currency to the notion, and it ultimately became common.

GOLIATH (go-li'ath), the name of the giant whose defeat and death threw such glory around the youthful career of David. He is known only as connected with that memorable occasion. See DAVID and GIANT.

GOLIUS (go'le-us), JAMES, an eminent Oriental scholar, was born at The Hague in 1596, educated at Leyden, and in 1622 went as interpreter to the Dutch embassy in Morocco. On his return he was appointed professor of Arabic at Leyden, and afterward also nominated professor of mathematics and interpreter of the Oriental languages to the United Provinces. His principal work is an "Arabic Lexicon," and an Arabic translation of the Liturgy and Catechism of the Reformed Confession. Golius published a Latin translation of the works of Geber, the great Arabian chemist. He died in 1667.

His brother PETER, who was also an excellent Orientalist, became a Catholic, and founded a Carmelite convent on Mount Libanus. He died in 1673, at Surat, in the East Indies, whither he had gone as a missionary.

GOMAR (go'mar), FRANCIS, celebrated in Church history as the leading opponent of Arminius, was born at Bruges, January 30, 1563, and died at Groningen, January 11, 1641. His theological education was carried on partly in England, where he attended the lectures of Dr. John Rainolds at Oxford, and of Dr. William Whittaker of Cambridge, and partly at Heidelberg. In 1594 he accepted one of the chairs of theology at Leyden, in which university James Arminius was also, in 1603, appointed a professor. Almost immediately a warm controversy arose between the two professors. On the death of Arminius, in 1609, the friends of Gomar being unsuccessful in their opposition to the appointment of Vorstius to the vacant chair, Gomar resigned his office and retired to Middleburg. In 1614 he became professor of theology at Saumur, and four years afterward accepted a similar appointment in the university of Groningen. Gomar was one of the members of the Synod of Dort (1618), and took an active part in its proceedings. He enjoyed a high reputation for his Hebrew scholarship, and in 1633 assisted at Leyden in the revision of the translation of the Old Testament. His collected works were published at Amsterdam in 1644. Those which relate to Biblical topics are the following: "An Unfolding of Passages from the Gospel of Matthew," "An Illustration of Select Passages from the Gospel of Luke," "An Illustration of Select Passages from the Gospel of John," "An Analysis and Unfolding of the Epistles of Paul to the Romans, the Galatians, the Philippians, the Colossians, Philemon, and the Hebrews," "An Unfolding of the Epistles of Peter, John and Jude," "An Unfolding of the First Five Chapters of the Apocalypse," "A Dissertation on the Language in which Matthew wrote his Gospel," etc., etc. The commentaries of Gomar are highly commended by R. Simon.

GOMELLI (go-mel'le). See WALDENSES.

GOMER (go'mur). 1. The eldest son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2, 3; 1 Chr. i. 5, 6. His descendants are generally supposed to be the ancient Cimmerians, the Cimbric of after times, whose name is yet to be traced in the Crimea—that great Celtic family of which we have in these islands the Gael of Ireland and Scotland and the Cymri of Wales. Their migrations are recorded in history. Pressed by the Scythians, the wave of their population flowed into the western part of Asia Minor; and thence, resisted and expelled by the Lydians, they turned to other quarters and found settlements in the north and west of Europe. Of them came the occupiers of Denmark, the German coast, Belgium and Britain. The name of Gomer occurs in Ezek. xxxviii. 6 as joining with his bands the army of Gog. See MAGOG.

2. Is also the name applied to the harlot whom Hosea in his vision is represented as taking for a wife, ch. i. 3. The name was probably intended to indicate her consummate wickedness, as one that had completed her course of transgressions. She is not to be understood as a real wife of the prophet; the transactions connected with her took place in vision. See HOSEA.

GOMORRAH (go-mor'rah), "submersion," one of the five cities of the plain, apparently next in importance to Sodom, Gen. x. 19; xiii. 10. It was, with the others, subdued and plundered by Chedorlaomer and delivered by Abram, xiv. 1-16. It shared the destruction of Sodom, as it had shared GONDULF (gon'dulf), born 1023, died 1108, a Norman prelate celebrated for his knowledge and eloquence. In fulfillment of a vow made when on his way back from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, he entered the abbey of Bec, of which Lanfranc was prior, and had Anselm for his fellow-pupil. When Lanfranc became archbishop of Canterbury, he obtained the assent of William I. to appoint Gondulf to the see of Rochester, which under his administration regained some of its previous splendor. His influence contributed much to obtain the crown for Henry when William Rufus died.

GONFALON (gon-fah'lon), or GONFANNON (gon-fah'non), is the name of a small flag attached to the pole of a lance. It differs from a banner in that, instead of being square and fastened to a bar, the gonfalon was fixed in a frame and made to turn round like a modern ship's vane, having two or three streamers or tails. The followers of great men used it to terrify the horses of their adversaries.

GONZAGE (gon'za-jay), HERMITS OF, an order founded by Hieron Regnini, and confirmed by Alexander VI. See HERMITS.

GONZO (gon'zo), a Buddhist monk born in 758, was highly esteemed in Japan for his knowledge of the "Fots-ke-gyó" and other Buddhist books, and for having been the first to fix the order of the wofa, or Japanese alphabet. He died in 827.

GOOD FRIDAY, the anniversary of the crucifixion of the Lord Jesus Christ. The crucifixion was commemorated by the Church in the earliest ages in a season set apart in remembrance of the death and the resurrection of the Saviour, and the terms of the observances of the season had reference to the passover, one being called the passover of the crucifixion, and the other the passover of the resurrection. The day commemorative of the crucifixion was observed as a fast; plaintive music alone was sung, and all joyous expressions were omitted. Although the Lord's Supper was celebrated, the consecration of the elements was done on the day previous. Bell ringing was omitted, and even the kiss of charity was dispensed with, in allusion to the treachery of Judas, who betrayed his Saviour with a kiss. All ornaments were removed, and every part of the service was made to indicate the great solemnity of the event that was thus commemorated.

In the Church of Rome "the altars are naked, except at the priests' communion, when the ornaments are black, and the crucifix is covered with a black veil till the prostration, after which it is left uncovered." Then again "the mass of the pre-sanctified" is said, and all the observances are intended to indicate the deep solemnity of the day.

In Protestant Churches the day is observed with fasting, and in the Church of England and other Protestant Episcopal Churches, among the Lutherans, the German Reformed and in some Methodist Churches, special services and prayers are arranged, and the season is held to be one of great solemnity, as it fixes the mind on the agony of Calvary.

GOOD FRIDAY BREAD, and GOOD FRIDAY BUNS. The bread was so called because it was baked on Good Friday and preserved as a remedy in cases of sickness. It is more than probable that the use of the buns is a relic of a pagan institution, and connected with the customs of heathen sacrifices. The buns in modern times are made sweet, and have the form of a cross stamped on the upper surface. The term "bun" is derived from the Saxon boun, which signifies a cake.

GOOD, JOHN MASON, M.D., was born in 1764, at Epping, where his father was pastor of a Congregational church, and died in 1827. He commenced practice as a surgeon at Sudbury in 1784, but removed to London in 1793, where he continued for the rest of his life. Dr. Good exercised the most indefatigable perseverance in the attainment of knowledge, without allowing his literary studies to interfere with the duties of his profession. It is stated of him that so incessant and multifarious were his labors in 1803 that he was finishing a translation of "Solomon's Song," carrying on his "Life of Dr. Geddes," walking from twelve to fourteen miles a day to see his patients—his business as a surgeon then producing upward of £1400 per annum—editing the "Critical Review," and supplying a column of matter weekly for the "Sunday Review," added to which he had, for a short period, the management of the "British Press Newspaper." Besides contributing largely to the literature of his profession, he produced several works of some value in the line of Biblical literature. Among these were his "Translation of the Song of Solomon, with Notes Critical and Explanatory;" "Translation of the Book of Job, with Notes Critical and Illustrative, and an Introductory Dissertation;" "Historical Outline of the Book of Psalms," edited by the Rev. J. M. Neale; and "The Book of Psalms: a new translation, with Notes Critical and Explanatory," edited by the Rev. Dr. Henderson. Dr. Good was a man of extensive knowledge and unusual attainments as a linguist.

GOODE, WILLIAM, an eminent clergyman of the Church of England, well known as one of the most devoted ministers of his day. He was born in 1801 and died in 1868. After a distinguished course in the university he entered the Church, and ere long he became known for his great zeal in the dissemination of evangelical views, and for his opposition to the Tractarian system. By many he was recognized as a leader in the evangelical branch of the Church. His writings, which are of a masterly character, gave him great prominence. Among his works, the chief are "The Extraordinary Works of the Holy Spirit," "The Established Church," "Church Rates," and his great treatise against the views of Dr. Pusey and the Tractarian party, called "The Divine Rule of Faith and Practice;" in a second edition this work increased to three volumes. He also published a Review of "Tract XC.," and "The Doctrine of the Church of England as to the Effects of Baptism," a treatise on the "Validity of the Orders in the Scotch and Foreign Non-episcopal Churches." Before his death he had been made dean of Ripon.

GOODELL (good'ell), WILLIAM, D.D., an eminent missionary and minister of the Congregational Church, was born February 14, 1792, at Templeton, Massachusetts. He entered Phillips Academy, Andover, at the age of fifteen, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1817. Having concluded his theological studies in the theological seminary of Andover, he devoted himself to the work of missions under the auspices of the American Board of Foreign Missions in 1820, and in 1822 sailed for Malta. After spending nine months here preaching the gospel, he departed for Beirut, where he arrived November 16, 1823. Pursuing the Arabic language here for some time, he visited Sidon in June, 1824, for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of the Armeno-Turkish language under Yakob Aga, an Armenian ex-bishop. In 1831 he repaired to Constantinople and commenced the mission to Turkey with special reference to the Arminians. He was a man remarkably endowed for the self-sacrificing and successful work of the missionary, doing good without offence and recommending personal religion to the unconverted. "In the future history of the kingdom of Christ in the lands which include the site of the garden that was planted in Eden and the scene of events most sacred to Christian hearts, the name of William Goodell will be precious to successive generations of sanctified souls even to the end of the world." He died in Philadelphia, February 18, 1867.

GOODRICH, CHAUNCEY ALLAN, D.D., born at New Haven, Connecticut, October, 1790. He was professor of rhetoric and oratory in Yale College, a man of great learning and a voluminous writer. Soon after his graduating, in 1810, he commenced to write educational works, which have been extensively used. He was appointed to the chair of pastoral theology in 1839.

At the time of his death, February 25, 1860, he was one of the "Committee on Versions" of the American Bible Society, and was busily employed on a new version of the English text.

GOODRICH, THOMAS, born in 1480, obtained the favor of Henry VIII. by the readiness he showed as one of the syndics to procure the king's divorce from Queen Catherine. He was made bishop of Ely, and was a zealous promoter of the Reformation. He was one of the revisors of the translation of the New Testament, and one of the compilers of the Common Prayer-Book of 1549, and likewise of "The Institution of a Christian Man," and of the "Reformatio Legum." In the reign of Edward he became lord chancellor, and was distinguished for his upright and impartial administration. He died in 1554.

GOODWIN (good'win), JOHN, an Arminian divine, was born in 1593, and educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. He became vicar of St. Stephen's Church, Sendon, in 1633; and refusing to administer baptism and the Lord's Supper promiscuously, he was ejected in 1745. He was a zealous Arminian in doctrine, and wrote a number of theological and controversial works. He died in 1665.

GOODWIN, THOMAS, D.D., a Calvinistic and Independent divine, of whom and of Owen Anthony à Wood says that they were "the two atlases and patriarchs of Independence." He was born at Rollesby, in Norfolk, England, in the year 1600, and from his childhood he had strong religious impressions, probably due to a pious mother. He graduated at the early age of sixteen at Christ's College, Cambridge, having acquired a reputation for learning far beyond his years, and in his twentieth year was chosen Fellow and lecturer of Catherine Hall, to which he had removed the year before. In 1626 he was appointed preacher of Gray's Inn, and afterward lecturer of Trinity Church; but being dissatisfied with the restrictions imposed upon him, he resigned his lectureship and fellowship, and removed from Cambridge in 1634. The severe measures against the Nonconformists forced him to Amsterdam, whence he removed to Arnheim, and returned to London upon the invitation of the Long Parliament, where he remained until 1650, when he was made president of Magdalen College, Oxford. During his residence in London he rose to great eminence as a preacher. The Restoration put an end to Goodwin's work at Oxford, which he left in 1660, respected and beloved by all with whom he was connected, however they might differ from him on theological questions. Removing to London, whither he was followed by great numbers, he there exercised his ministry as pastor of an Independent church until his death, February 23, 1679. His collected works published in London include an "Exposition on the First and Part of the Second Chapters of the Epistle to the Ephesians," and also an "Exposition on the Book of Revelation." The criticism of Calamy is fairly characteristic: "He was a considerable scholar and an eminent divine, and had a very happy faculty in descanting upon Scripture so as to bring forth surprising remarks, which yet generally tended to illustration." He was a great favorite with Oliver Cromwell, who made him one of the commissioners to license preachers, and he was also a member of the Westminster Assembly.

GOOSE. The wild and the tame goose were both known in Syria, and the Talmud mentions geese as a well-known article of luxury. At present tame geese are not very commonly seen in Syria, or in any other part of Western Asia, as they are not in demand among the Moslems, who very rarely eat them. Neither can we find clear evidence that they were used by the ancient Hebrews, though the pine, fir and cedar. Gopher signifies here, most likely, the cypress, which was in some parts of Asia exclusively used as the material of ships; in Athens for coffins; in Egypt for the mummy-cases, for which purpose it was peculiarly adapted, on account of its great durability and hardness."

GORDON (gor'don), ALEXANDER, a Scotch antiquary who lived many years in Italy and other parts of the Continent, and in 1736 was appointed secretary to the Society of Antiquaries. In 1741 he went to Carolina, where he held several offices and had some grants of land. He died about 1750. Among his works are the "Lives of Pope Alexander VI. and his son Cæsar Borgia."

GORDON, LORD GEORGE, a junior member of the ducal family of Gordon, born in 1750. He was noted as a captious member of the House of Commons when the Protestant Association was formed to resist the repeal of a very penal act against the Romanists. Lord George put himself at the head of the movement, and was leader in the no-papery riots which caused such turmoil and destruction in London. He endeavored to overawe the House by a fanatic mob which accompanied him there, but which was dispersed by the guards. He was tried on a charge of high treason, but acquitted. He was afterward excommunicated by the archbishop of Canterbury for an ecclesiastical offence. He died in prison, 1793.

they were known to them. Not being named, they were not interdicted, and no doubt the Hebrews used them. The Egyptian goose was of a peculiar and fine species, and it is abundantly figured in all their monuments.

GOPHER-WOOD (go'fer-wood), the material of which the ark was to be made, Gen. vi. 14. A variety of conjectures have been hazarded respecting this wood. "It is evidently a tree," says Kalisch, "which yields a resinous pitch-like substance, as

GORDON, JAMES, a Scottish Jesuit, born at or near Aberdeen in 1553. He was professor in the colleges of Toulouse and Bordeaux, and was the author of several works on history and chronology. He also published "The Holy Bible, with a Commentary," which, according to Walch, contains many things which may be read with profit. It is also commended by Dupin. He died in 1641.

GORGERIN (gor'ger-in), the neck of a capital, or more commonly the part forming the junction between the shaft and the capital, which is either a projecting fillet or moulding or a concave channel.

GORGET (gor'jet), 1 Sam. xvii. 6, marg. See ARMS.

GORGAS (gor'ge-as), one of the generals of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is called in 1 Macc. and in Josephus "a mighty man of the king's friends." He was chosen by Lysias, the general and minister of Antiochus Epiphanes, and at this time in sole command of the provinces from the Euphrates to the sea, to undertake an expedition in company with Ptolemy, the son of Dorymenes, and with Nicanor, against Judæa, B. C. 166, 1 Macc. iii. 38. These generals were, however, totally defeated near Emmaus by Judas Maccabæus, 1 Macc. iv. 1, etc. In B. C. 135, Joseph, the son of Zacharias, and Azarias, two captains in the service of Judas Maccabæus, anxious to get themselves a name, and acting without the orders of Judas, attacked the garrison of Jamnia. Gorgias, the governor of the forces at Jamnia, defeated them with great loss, 1 Macc. v. 56, etc.

GOOSE OF EGYPT.—See GOOSE.

The account of Gorgias in 2 Macc. is very confused. In one passage he is described simply as "a captain, who in matters of war had great experience," and therefore sent with Nicanor, the son of Patroclus, one of the special friends of Ptolemy, the governor of Coele-Syria and Phœnicia, to root out the whole nation of the Jews, 2 Macc. viii. 9. In another passage he is represented as "governor of the holds," 2 Macc. x. 14, and apparently of the holds of the Idumæans (?) (Acra-battene?), compare 1 Macc. v. 3. He is afterward, according to the present text, described as "governor of Idumæa," 2 Macc. xii. 32.

Grotius suggests that the reading "governor of Idumæa" is an error for "governor of Jamnia," as at 1 Macc. v. 58. Josephus warrants this correction. From the epithet applied to Gorgias, he seems to have been held in the highest detestation by the Jews ("that cursed man," he is called in 2 Macc. xii. 35). The description of his flight to Marisa and his defeat by Dositheus, one of Judas' generals, is given at some length, though in an obscure and confused manner, 2 Macc. xii. 34-38.

GORHAM (gor'ham), GEORGE, is known as the clergyman who instituted the suit against the bishop of Exeter for non-institution, which gave rise to the long and important controversy upon baptismal regeneration. The case was finally brought by appeal before the judicial committee of the privy council.

GORTON (gor'ton), SAMUEL, a man who boasted he "had never studied in the schools of human learning," and remarkable for his extravagant and fanatical ideas, was born in England about 1600. He came to the United States in 1636, visiting Boston, Pawtuxet, Rhode Island and other places in New England, followed by a few adherents called "Gortonians." Involved in civil litigation, trial for heresy, he was condemned at length to hard labor for an unlimited time, which was commuted into banishment. His sect soon became extinct. He died in 1677.

GORTYNA (gor-ti'nah), a city of Crete, and next to Cnossus the most important in the island for power and magnificence. At one time Gortyna and Cnossus in union held the whole of Crete in their power, excepting Lyttus. In later times they were in a continual state of warfare. Gortyna was founded by a colony from Gortys of Arcadia. It was of very considerable size, its walls being fifty stadia in circuit, whilst those of its rival, Cnossus, were not more than thirty. Homer bestows upon it the epithet "walled." It was situated on the south side of the island on the river Lethæus (Messara), and at a distance of ninety stadia from the Libyan Sea. As Cnossus declined Gortyna rose to eminence, and became the metropolis of Crete. About A. D. 200 a brother of Septimius Severus held at Gortyna the office of proconsul and quæstor of the united provinces of Crete and Cyrene. In the arrangement of the provinces by Constantine, Gortyna was still the metropolis of Crete.

The remains of Gortyna, near Aghius Dheka (the ten saints), and the cavern in the mountain have been described by Tournefort and Pococke, and the cavern more recently by Mr. Cockerell. The modern Gortynians hold this cavern to be the Labyrinth, thus claiming for themselves the honors of the myth of the Minotaur; but it does not appear from the Gortynian coins, which date from the time of the Persian war to that of Hadrian (and there are none later), that their ancestors ever entertained such an idea. The famous Labyrinth is represented on the coins of Cnossus, and Colonel Leake says that "it is difficult to reconcile this fact with the existence of the Labyrinth near Gortyna, for that the excavation near Aghius Dheka, at the foot of Mount Ida, is the renowned Cretan Labyrinth, cannot be doubted after the description of Tournefort, Pococke and Cockerell." This opinion is given notwithstanding the assertion of Pausanias. One of the coins of Cnossus bears, besides the Labyrinth on its reverse, the Minotaur on the obverse. It cannot be much later than the expedition of Xerxes, and thus affords evidence of the antiquity of the tradition of the Labyrinth, if not of its real existence; whereas Hoeck, relying on the silence of Hesiod and Herodotus and the assumed silence of Homer—though the Iliad contains what looks very like an allusion to the Cretan wonder—has supposed it to have been an invention of the later poets borrowed from Egypt. Mr. Falkener describes the cavern near Gortyna from Sieber, who spent three days in examining it, and says that certainly it had been nothing more than a quarry which probably supplied the stone for building the city. Hoeck seems to hold similar views.

The only Biblical interest attached to Gortyna is, that it is mentioned in the Apocrypha in the list of cities to which the Romans sent letters on behalf of the Jews, when Simon the Maccabee renewed the treaty which his brothers Judas and Jonathan had made with Rome, 1 Macc. xv. 23; viii. 1, etc.; xii. 1, etc. There is no doubt that the Jews were settled in great numbers in Crete, and Gortyna may have been their chief residence. Ptolemy Philometor, who treated the Jews kindly, and who had received a numerous body in Egypt when they were driven out of Judæa by the opposite party, rebuilt part of Gortyna. When St. Paul, as a prisoner, was on his voyage from Cæsarea to Rome, the ship, on account of a storm, was obliged to run under the lee of Crete, in the direction of Cape Salmone, and soon after came to a place called FAIR HAVENS (which see), which was near a city called LASÆA, Acts xxvii. 8. See CRETE. Lasæa is probably the Lasia of the Peutingerian Tables, and is there stated to be sixteen miles east of Gortyna. It is very uncertain how long the vessel was detained at Fair Havens, though "much time had been spent," Acts xxvii. 9, not since they had sailed from Cæsarea, but at the anchorage. Doubtless, the sailors, soldiers and prisoners had frequent intercourse with Lasæa, and perhaps Gortyna. St. Paul may then have preached the gospel at one or both of these places, but of this there is not the slightest proof.

GOSHEN (go'sh'n). 1. A district of Egypt assigned as the residence of Jacob and his family, and which the Israelites occupied till their deliverance from bondage, Gen. xlv. 10. We gather from the Scripture narrative several particulars concerning it. It was one of the best and most fertile parts of the country, xlvii. 6, 11, with excellent pasture-land, and therefore a most desirable abode for those whose trade had been about cattle, xlvii. 34; xlviii. 4. It must have lain to the east of the Nile, for the Israelites on their departure had no occasion to cross that river. But it may be probably supposed to border on the Nile or some branch of it, since the inhabitants of Goshen had an abundant supply of fish, Num. xi. 5. Then it could not have been far from the royal residence, for Jacob would there be near to Joseph, Gen. xlv. 10; and easy intercourse between the two is evidently implied, xlviii. 1, 2; Ex. v. 20. Again, Joseph is said to have gone up in his chariot to meet his father in Goshen, Gen. xlv. 29. Hence it must have been to the north-east of the metropolis, wherever that was. It was also called the land of Rameses, xlvii. 11; Ex. xii. 37, the towns Pithom and Raamses lying within its border, i. 11. From indications of this kind, a learned critic infers that Goshen must have been between the eastern part of the ancient Delta and the western borders of Palestine, that it was hardly a part of Egypt proper, and that it was probably identical with the modern Wady Tumeilat, the valley along which ran the canal of the Red Sea. Dr. Kalisch does not exactly agree with this identification. Goshen did not reach to the wilderness, Ex. xiii. 20, and was not, he believes, a frontier province. Such passages as viii. 21-23; ix. 25, 26, show, he thinks, that it was surrounded by other Egyptian districts, and properly belonged to Egypt. He supposes it impossible, therefore, to define its boundaries, and concludes that we must be satisfied with a more general idea of its position. The Israelites were not all confined to the land of Goshen, for the parents of Moses clearly lived in the capital, Ex. ii. 3, 5, 8. Neither were the inhabitants of Goshen exclusively Israelites; for Egyptians are described as their neighbors, iii. 22; xi. 2; xii. 35, 36; and that the houses of the two peoples were intermixed may be inferred from the necessity of marking off those of Israel with the blood of the paschal lamb, xii. 23. Moreover, Pharaoh's flocks and herds seem to have been pastured in Goshen, Gen. xlvii. 6. But it is probable that foreigners also lived there, for "a mixed multitude" accompanied the Israelites on their march, Ex. xii. 38. 2. A district in Palestine, apparently lying between Gaza and Gibeon, Josh. x. 41; xi. 16. It probably included some of the rich low country of Judah, and the Israelites may hence have given it its name. 3. A town in the mountains of Judah, xv. 51. It may have had some connection with the district just mentioned, but this is merely a conjecture.

GOSPEL (gos'p'l). This word is derived from the Anglo-Saxon god and spel, signifying good tidings. It is very appropriately used, therefore, to indicate that message of mercy which proclaims to mankind the mode of reconciliation with God through Jesus Christ. It is called "the gospel of the grace of God," Acts xx. 24, because it is the exhibition of God's free favor to sinful men; "the gospel of peace," Eph. vi. 15, because it peacefully unites God and man, those who stood before apart and alienated; "the gospel of salvation," i. 13, because by means of it the lost may be saved; "the gospel of the kingdom," Matt. iv. 23, because it announces the spiritual reign of Messiah; "the gospel of God concerning his Son," Rom. i. 1, 3, because it relates the history of all that Christ did for the procuring of our salvation. Hence it is taken for Christian doctrine or teaching, and sometimes more generally for that which only professes to be such, Gal. i. 6-9. The word is never used in Scripture for a written document or narrative; but at an early period it very naturally began to be applied to the books in which the personal history of Christ and his words are contained—i. e., to those four narratives respectively which are the text-books of our Lord's life and actions.

GOSPELLER (gos'pel-ler), an evangelist, a name given by the Romanists as an epithet of reproach to the followers of Wickliff, the eminent English Reformer, because they favored the general circulation of the Scriptures. The term was also applied in the period of the Reformation to certain Antinomians. In the service of the Church of England, the term designates the minister who reads the Gospel for the day, standing at the north side of the altar.

GOSPELS, the several books in which, as observed in the article GOSPEL, the personal history of Christ is recorded, the authors being termed Evangelists. Four such books have been transmitted to us, and to their early authority in the Church the whole current of ecclesiastical Christian literature gives evidence; for not only were they known independently, but as a collection the four were acknowledged and used in the second century, as we learn from Irenæus, Tertullian and other writers of the time. Reasons, not always very grave ones, were alleged why these histories should be just four, and fanciful comparisons have been devised to illustrate the propriety of such a number. Without discussing these, we may well be thankful that God has given us four independent witnesses to the truth of transactions most momentous in themselves and most necessary for our well-being. Each has its peculiar character; and they must be taken together if we would have a complete portrait of the divine Redeemer. He is delineated from different points of view; and, though each delineation is in itself faultless, conveying only truth, it does not from the nature of things convey the whole truth. For completeness we need them all.

The Gospels are ranged in order in the New Testament, as those of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John—two of them written by apostles and two by apostolical men, the friends and companions of apostles. They have the authority which the productions of mere contemporaries would not have. Many contemporaries, as we learn from the author of one of these records, Luke i. 1, 2, had committed to writing the events of the time, and their productions may have been valuable and curious; but these, the four, stand on much higher ground; they have flowed down, a precious heir-loom, from men whom the Holy Ghost influenced and guided in their work. As such we receive them on an equality with the sacred books of the earlier dispensation.

The most cursory reader must have observed that the fourth Gospel stands apart from the rest. Those of Matthew, Mark and Luke, usually called the Synoptic Gospels, bear a far closer mutual relation. They narrate the same leading events and they exhibit much verbal agreement, with at the same time remarkable variations. Critics have drawn out and classified the particulars of agreement and variation. Thus Archbishop Thomson, after giving some details, remarks: "The verbal and material agreement of the first three Evangelists is such as does not occur in any other authors who have written independently of one another. The verbal agreement is greater where the spoken words of others are cited than where facts are recorded, and greatest in quotations of the words of our Lord. But in some leading events, as in the call of the first four disciples, that of Matthew and the transfiguration, the agreement, even in expression, is remarkable. There are also narratives where there is no verbal harmony in the outset, but only in the crisis or emphatic part of the story, Matt. viii. 3; Mark i. 41; Luke v. 13; and Matt. xiv. 19, 20; Mark vi. 41-43; Luke ix. 16, 17. . . . The agreement in the narrative portions of the Gospels begins with the baptism of John, and reaches its highest point in the account of the passion of our Lord and the facts that preceded it; so that a direct ratio might almost be said to exist between the amount of agreement and the nearness of the facts related to the passion. . . . In quotations from the Old Testament the Evangelists, or two of them, sometimes exhibit a verbal agreement, although they differ from the Hebrew and from the Septuagint version." Mr. Westcott gives a yet fuller account of the coincidences and variations and remarks, quite in accordance with the archbishop: "In the distribution of the verbal coincidences a very simple law is observable. They occur most commonly in the recital of the words of our Lord or of others, and are comparatively rare in the simple narrative."

It has appeared exceedingly difficult to account for the phenomena which thus present themselves. If we suppose one Evangelist to have copied from another, his testimony as an independent witness is seriously impaired. And such a supposition would not solve the difficulty. It might account for the agreement of one or more writers; it would fail to explain the continually-occurring insignificant differences; for it is not likely that a transcriber would alter expressions unless he intended thereby to improve upon them or to supply further information. Elaborate hypotheses have, therefore, been devised, such as that there was some original common document, probably Aramaic, from which there were translations variously modified, and that one or more of these, in conjunction with the original and with other sources, were the materials made use of more or less by the different Evangelists. It cannot be denied that a passage before referred to, Luke i. 1, 2, gives some countenance to hypotheses of the kind. But then, in order to make them at all satisfactory, the documents have to be so multiplied and combined that it is hard indeed to imagine the toil which each Evangelist must have undergone to construct his book. Besides, it is extraordinary that all these supposed documents should have perished; especially that no ancient writer appears to have seen or known the original common record, which surely would have been highly prized by all who had access to it. Lists of these supposed documents are given by many Biblical critics.

It is far more easy to show the imperfection of the plans proposed by learned men than to devise a better mode of solving the difficulty. Any opinion must, therefore, be stated with modesty, and maintained only so far as it can be proved to rest on solid grounds.

Mr. Westcott is inclined to believe rather in what may be called an "oral Gospel." He cannot approve of any artificial theory: "Such a combination of research and mechanical skill in composition as it involves is wholly alien from the circumstances of the apostolic age, and at variance with the prevailing power of a widespread tradition." He points out, therefore, how the work of the apostles was to instruct by preaching, narrating and insisting upon the things which they had seen and heard, Acts iv. 20; vi. 4. Their Master left them no written code; he taught them by his discourses; and in discourse to the people, in the synagogues, in the temple, before the rulers, exhorting, persuading, disputing, they would naturally make known their message. All was too perfectly in their minds and memories to require written documents. The Scriptures were to them the books of the ancient canon; and books to form a fresh supplementary canon were not the foundation but the result—not immediately necessary, and therefore not arrived at till a fresh stage of the Church—of apostolic teaching. "The hypothesis, then," says Mr. Westcott, "of an oral gospel is more consistent with the general habit of the Jews and the peculiar position of the apostles; . . . it is supported by the earliest direct testimony, and in some degree implied in the apostolic writings." Naturally, when each related some great gospel event which all had witnessed, he would describe it in terms similar to those which the rest used; and the all-important words of the Master, fixed deeply in every mind, would be repeated with little if any variation. A body of events, too, of chief moment, to be mainly dwelt on, would soon be collected; and these again and again set forth would assume an almost stereotyped form. So that, when at length the circumstances of the Church demanded it, an apostle or apostolic man, imbued with the common teaching, drawing at the same time from his own stores, would give, with some variety of circumstances and expression, his record of facts, while the nearer he drew to the weightiest matters of all, especially when relating the ever-to-be-remembered words of Christ, the more minute would be his verbal agreement with his fellows.

Yet, if we go no farther, a considerable difficulty yet remains. If we may suppose the apostles teaching in the language which Christ used, we can understand verbal coincidences, while we are not puzzled by various differences, especially of description; but it is hard to imagine them translating into another tongue independently and falling into so close a similitude, in many cases into an identity of renderings. But what if the language Christ generally used, what if the language in which the apostles for the most part taught, were the language in which they have written? Perhaps, if we come to examine, we shall find some reason to believe this. That Hebrew so called, more properly Syro-Chaldaic or Aramaean, was vernacularly spoken in Palestine in our Lord's time no one will deny; but it is very likely that concurrently with it there was Greek commonly understood and specially used in public addresses. Consider the Sermon on the Mount. The persons assembled to hear it were "from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan," Matt. iv. 25. Now, it is well known that the cities of Decapolis were generally what were called Greek cities; and certainly the mixed population beyond the Jordan were little likely to be familiar with Aramaean. Is not the probability strong, then, that our Lord delivered that memorable address in Greek? And when Peter, on the day of Pentecost, addressed a multitude gathered from far-distant countries, in which were various native dialects, would he have spoken in a tongue not common to them all? and was there any such common language at the time but Greek?

This question, however, cannot be argued in this place. But, if we admit it as a fact that Christ generally used Greek, and that the apostles in their teaching employed commonly the same language, the difficult question of the origin of the Gospels is exceedingly simplified, and we have a key to the verbal coincidences, and can understand the variations of narrative. It has been already observed that the chief agreement is in the recital of the words of others, specially of those of our Lord. What if there were no need to translate? what if the identical utterances, deep, as before said, in every mind, are given us in the gospel records? "Our Lord Jesus Christ spoke in Greek, and the Evangelists independently narrated his actions and reported his discourses in the same language which he had himself employed." Dogmatic assertion must not be ventured on such a subject, but it is believed that the explanation hence afforded is more satisfactory than the cumbersome hypotheses before noted; and it is not unlikely that it will ultimately receive the approval of Biblical critics best qualified to decide.

The remarks hitherto made have concerned the synoptic Gospels. That of St. John stands in a very peculiar relation to them. It is supplementary, for it assumes facts as known of which it gives no account, but which are found in them; it is also independent, presenting a different aspect of our Lord's character, while its points of coincidence with the others show the working of the "self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will," 1 Cor. xii. 11. It is in St. John's Gospel only that we find any detail of Christ's early Judæan ministry, the synoptists relating his works in Galilee.

Very admirably has Bishop Ellicott illustrated the distinctive characteristics of the four Gospels, from whom it may be allowed here to introduce a summary: "In regard of (1) the external features and characteristics, we are perhaps warranted in saying that (a) the point of view of the first Gospel is mainly Israelitic; of the second, Gentile; of the third, universal; of the fourth, Christian; that (b) the general aspect and, so to speak, physiognomy of the first is mainly Oriental; of the second, Roman; of the third, Greek; of the fourth, spiritual; that (c) the style of the first is stately and rhythmical; of the second terse and precise; of the third, calm and copious; of the fourth, artless and colloquial; that the most striking characteristic of the first is symmetry; of the second, compression; of the third, order; of the fourth, system; that (e) the thought and language of the first are both Hebraistic; of the third, both Hellenistic; while in the second the thought is often Occidental, though the language is Hebraistic; and in the fourth the language Hellenistic, but the thought Hebraistic. Again (2), in respect of subject-matter and contents, we may say perhaps (a) that in the first Gospel we have narrative; in the second, memoirs; in the third, history; in the fourth, dramatic portraiture; (b) that in the first we have often the record of events in their accomplishment; in the second, events in their detail; in the third, events in their connection; in the fourth, events in relation to the teaching springing from them; that thus (c) in the first we more often meet with the notice of impressions; in the second, of facts; in the third, of motives; in the fourth, of words spoken; and that, lastly (d), the record of the first is mainly collective, and often antithetical; of the second, graphic and circumstantial; of the third, didactic and reflective; of the fourth, selective and supplemental. We may (3) conclude by saying, that in respect of the portraiture of our Lord, the first Gospel presents him to us mainly as the Messiah; the second, mainly as the God-man; the third, as the Redeemer; the fourth, as the only-begotten Son of God.

It is evident that four different truthful pictures of the same person and events must agree, and that all the details, if properly combined, must exactly fit. But such a combination is not easy. Comprehensive as the Gospels taken together are, they yet do not give us the whole of what Jesus did and taught, John xxi. 25. There are interstices, therefore, which it is hard to fill up; so that those who have attempted to harmonize (as it is called) the Gospels have been in some respects unsuccessful, and are by no means in mutual harmony. As in every other department of literature, men have brought often their own prejudices to the construction of Harmonies, and have strained sometimes the sacred narratives in order to bend them to their own purpose. In everything human there is imperfection; but this work has been with many a labor of love, and their earnest study of the holy books has been of no mean service to the Church. See HARMONIES, and the articles under the names of the writers.

GOSPELS, SPURIOUS or APOCRYPHAL. See PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. The canon of the New Testament having been finally settled before the close of the fourth century, the rejected writings which bore the names of the apostles and Evangelists soon sunk into oblivion, and few, if any, have descended to our times in their original shape. From the decree of Gelasius and a few other sources, we have the names and a few detached notices of a good many of these productions. We shall first speak of those which are still extant.

THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH THE CARPENTER, which has been preserved in the East in an Arabic translation, was first made known in Europe in the commencement of the sixteenth century by Isidore de Isolanis. He observes that the "Catholics of the East" commemorate St. Joseph on the 19th of March, and read the legend of the saint, omitting certain parts which are not approved in the Roman Church. This work was first published in 1722, from an Arabic MS. of the thirteenth century, in the "Bibliothèque du Roi," accompanied with a Latin translation. It is also found in Coptic, Sahidic and Memphic. It is highly esteemed by the Copts. The former part, to chap. ix., appears to have been derived from an ancient "Gospel of the Infancy." The Latin was republished by Fabricius.

THE GOSPEL OF THE INFANCY was first published by Henry Sike, at Utrecht, in 1697, from an Arabic MS. Sike's Latin version was republished by Fabricius, who divided it into chapters. The narratives which it contains were current in the second century, and the account contained in this gospel respecting Christ's learning the alphabet is mentioned by Irenæus as a fabrication of the Marcosians. The "Gospel of the Infancy" is found in the catalogue of Gelasius, and it is especially remarkable from the fact that it was most probably this gospel which was known to Mohammed, who seems to have been unacquainted with any of the canonical Scriptures, and who has inserted some of its narrations in the Koran. The "Sepher Toldoth Jesu," a well-known publication of the Jews, contains similar fables with those in this gospel. This work was received as genuine by many of the Eastern Christians, especially the Nestorians and Monophysites. It was found to have been universally read by the Syrians of St. Thomas, in Travancore, and was condemned at the Synod of Diamper, in 1599, by Archbishop Menezes, who describes it as "the book called the 'Gospel of the Infancy,' already condemned by the ancients for its many blasphemous heresies and fabulous histories." The Persians and Copts received this gospel. The original language was probably Syriac. It is sometimes called the Gospel of Peter or of Thomas.

THE GOSPEL OF THOMAS THE ISRAELITE (Greek), a work which has flowed from the same source with the former, was first published by Cotelerius, from an imperfect MS. of the fifteenth century. It was republished and divided into chapters by Fabricius. It has been questioned whether this is the same work which is called the Gospel of Thomas by Origen, Ambrose, Bede and others. This gospel probably had its origin among the Gnostics, and found its way from them, through the Manichees, into the Church; but having been more generally received among the heretics, it was seldom copied by the monks, which accounts for the paucity of MSS. This pseudepigraphal work is probably the foundation of all the histories of Christ's infancy, but it is supposed to have been recast and interpolated.

THE PROTEVANGELION OF JAMES has descended to us in the original Greek, and was first published by Bibliander, at Basel, in 1552, in a Latin version by William Postell, who asserted that it was publicly read in the Greek churches, and maintained that it was a genuine work of the apostle James, and intended to be placed at the head of St. Mark's Gospel. These commendations provoked the wrath of the learned Henry Stephen, who insinuated that it was fabricated by Postell himself, whom he calls "a detestable monster." It was reprinted in the "Orthodoxographia" of J. Herold, and again in the "Orthodoxographia" of Jacob Grynæus, who entertained a very favorable opinion of it. Subsequent discoveries have proved that, notwithstanding the absurdity of Postell's high pretensions in favor of the authenticity of this gospel, Stephen's accusations against him were all ill-founded. There had, even at the time when Stephen wrote, been already a Greek translation by Neander, of which Stephen was probably not aware; it appeared among the Apocrypha annexed by Oporin to his edition of "Luther's Catechism." It was republished subsequently by Fabricius, who divided it into chapters, and by others. There were six Paris MSS., the oldest of which is of the tenth century. From the circumstance of these MSS. containing a Greek calendar or martyrology, and from other internal evidences, there seems little doubt that this gospel was formerly read in the Greek Church. There are also extant versions of the "Gospel of the Infancy" in the Arabic and other languages of the Eastern Churches, among which they appear to have possessed a high degree of authority.

Although this work is styled by Postell the "Protevangelium," there is no MS. authority for this title, nor for the fact of its being ascribed to St. James the apostle. It only appears that the author's name is James. The narrations of this gospel were known to Tertullian, Origen, Gregory Nyssen, Epiphanius, the author of the "Imperfect Work on Matthew," Chrysostom and many others among the ancients.

THE GOSPEL OF THE NATIVITY OF MARY (Latin). Although the Latins never evinced the same degree of credulity which was shown by the Greeks and Orientals in regard to these fabulous productions, and although they were generally rejected by the Fathers, they were again revived about the sixth century. Notwithstanding the contemptuous rejection of them by Augustine and Jerome, and their condemnation by Popes Innocent and Gelasius, they still found readers in abundance. Gelasius expressly condemns the book concerning the "Nativity of St. Mary and the Midwife."

The "Gospel of the Nativity of Mary," which most probably, in its present form, dates its origin from the sixth century, has been even recommended by the pretended authority of St. Jerome. There is a letter extant, said to have been written by the bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus to Jerome, requesting him to translate out of Hebrew into Latin the history of the "Birth of Mary" and of the "Birth and Infancy of Christ," in order to oppose the fabulous and heretical accounts of the same contained in the apocryphal books. To this Jerome accedes, observing at the same time that the real author of the book was not, as they supposed, the evangelist Matthew, but Seleucus the Manichee. Jerome observes that there is some truth in the accounts, of which he furnishes a translation from the original Hebrew. These pretended letters of Jerome are now universally acknowledged to be fabrications; but the apocryphal gospel itself, which is the same in substance with the "Protevangelion of James," is still extant in Jerome's pretended Latin version. It is from these "Gospels of the Infancy" that we have learned the names of the parents of the Virgin Mary, Joachim (although Bede reads Eli) and Anna. The narratives contained in these gospels were incorporated in the "Golden Legends," a work of the thirteenth century, which was translated into all the languages of Europe, and frequently printed. There are extant some metrical accounts of the same in German. These legends were, however, severely censured by some eminent divines of the Latin Church. Luther also inveighs against the readers of these books.

There were several editions of Jerome's pretended translation published in the fifteenth century. One of the chief objects of the writer of these gospels seems to be to assert the Davidical origin of the Virgin in opposition to the Manichees. An edition was published by Mr. Jones, who conceives that the first author of these legends was a Hellenistic Jew who lived in the second century, but that they were added to and interpolated by Seleucus at the end of the third, who became their reputed author, and that still further additions were made by the Nestorians, or some late Christians in India. Lardner so far differs from Mr. Jones as to believe the author not to have been a Jew.

The "Gospel of the Nativity of Mary" was received by many of the ancient heretics. The Gnostics and Manichees endeavored to found on its authority some of their peculiar opinions, such as that Christ was not the Son of God before his baptism, and that he was not of the tribe of Judah, but of that of Levi, as did also the Collyridians, who maintained that too much honor could not be paid to the Blessed Virgin, and that she was herself born of a virgin and ought to be worshiped with sacrifices.

GOSPEL OF MARCION, or rather that of St. Luke as corrupted by that heretic in the second century, is no longer extant, but Professor Hahn has endeavored to restore it from the extracts found in ancient writers, especially Tertullian and Epiphanius. This work has been published by Thilo.

There has also been published a collation of a corrupted Greek GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN, found in the archives of the Knights Templars in Paris. This work was first noticed (in 1828) by the Danish bishop Muentzer, as well as by Abbé Grégoire, ex-bishop of Blois. It is a vellum MS. in large 4to, said by persons skilled in palæography to have been executed in the thirteenth or fourteenth century, and to have been copied from a Mount Athos MS. of the twelfth. The writing is in gold letters. It is divided into nineteen sections which are called gospels, and is on this account supposed to have been designed for liturgical use. The omissions and interpolations (which latter are in barbarous Greek) represent the heresies and mysteries of the Knights Templars. Notwithstanding all this, Thilo considers it to be modern, and fabricated since the commencement of the eighteenth century.

THE GOSPEL OF NICODEMUS, OR ACTS OF PILATE, is one of the most curious of the apocryphal gospels. It is a kind of theological romance partly founded on the canonical Gospels. The first part, to the end of ch. xv, is little more than a paraphrastic account of the trial and death of Christ, embellished with fabulous additions. From that to the end, ch. xxviii., is a detailed account of Christ's descent into hell to liberate the spirits in prison, the history of which is said to have been obtained from Lenthius and Charinus, sons of Simeon, who were two of those "saints who slept," but were raised from the dead and came into the holy city after the resurrection. This part of the history is so far valuable that it throws some light upon the ancient ideas current among Christians on this subject. This gives the work its chief value. The subscription to this book states that it was found by the emperor Theodosius among the public records in Jerusalem, in the hall of Pontius Pilate, A. D. 380. We read in ch. xxvii. that Pilate himself wrote all the transactions from the relation of Nicodemus, who had taken them down in Hebrew; and we are informed by Epiphanius that the Quartadecimans appealed to the "Acts of Pilate" in favor of their opinions as to the proper time of keeping Easter. It was written in these "Acts" that our Saviour suffered on the eighth Kal. of April—a circumstance which is stated in the subscription to the present "Acts." It is uncertain, however, when this work was first called by the name of Nicodemus.

The two ancient apologists Justin Martyr and Tertullian both appeal in confirmation of our Saviour's miracles and crucifixion to the "Acts of Pilate." From this circumstance it has been generally held that such documents must have existed, although this fact has been called in question by Tanaquil Faber and Le Clerc. These appeals in all probability first furnished the idea of the present pious fraud. Mr. Jones supposes that this may have been done in order to silence those pagans who denied the existence of such "Acts."

We have already seen that a book entitled the "Acts of Pilate" existed among the Quartadecimans, a sect which originated at the close of the third century. We are informed by Eusebius that the heathens forged certain "Acts of Pilate" full of all sorts of blasphemy against Christ, which they procured (A. D. 303) to be dispersed through the 'Acts of Pilate,' to which the Christians opposed others, which were afterward in various ways amended. One of these improved versions was called afterward the 'Gospel of Nicodemus.'

Beausobre suspected that the latter part of the book (the descent into hell) was taken from the "Gospel of Peter," a work of Lucius Charinus now lost. The only Greek writer who cites it is the author of the "Synaxarion," and the first of the Latins who uses it is the celebrated Gregory of Tours.

empire, and that it was enjoined on schoolmasters to put them into the hands of children, who were to learn them by heart instead of their lessons. But the character of the "Gospel of Nicodemus," which contains no blasphemy of the kind, forbids us to identify it with those "Acts." This gospel probably had its origin in a later age. From the circumstance of its containing the names of Lenthius and Charinus, Mr. Jones conceives it to have been the work of the celebrated fabricator of gospels, Lucius Charinus, who flourished in the beginning of the fourth century. It is certainly not later than the fifth or sixth. "During the persecution under Maximin," says Gieseler, "the heathens first brought forward certain calumnious

The "Gospel of Nicodemus" (in Latin) was one of the earliest books printed, and there are subsequent editions in 1490, 1516, 1522 and 1533, and in 1569 in the "Orthographia" of Grynaeus. It was afterward published by Fabricius, who divided it into chapters. Fabricius gives us no information respecting the age or character of his MS., which is extremely defective and inaccurate. Mr. Jones republished this with an English version.

The esteem in which this work was held in the Middle Ages may be seen from the number of early versions which were in popular use, of which innumerable MSS. have descended to our times. Some of these are in the Bodleian and Canterbury libraries. That in the Bodleian is divided into thirty-four chapters. There are several MSS. of the English version in the Bodleian, one in Sion College, and one in English verse in Pepys' collection. It was also translated by Wickliff; and there were versions printed in London by Julian Notary and Wynkyn de Worde which ran through several editions. The regard, indeed, in which this book was held in England will be understood from the fact that, in 1524, Erasmus acquaints us that he saw the "Gospel of Nicodemus" affixed to one of the columns of the cathedral of Canterbury. Translations were also common in French, Italian, German and Swedish. In the French MSS. and editions it is united with the old romance of Perceforest, king of Great Britain. There was also a Welsh translation, and the work was known to the Eastern Christians.

Of the gospels no longer extant we know little more than that they once existed. We read in Irenæus, Epiphanius, Origen, Eusebius and other ecclesiastical writers of the gospels of Eve or of perfection, of Barnabas (ancient and modern), of Bartholomew, of Basilides, of Hesychius, of Judas Iscariot, of the Valentinians, of Apollon, of Cerintus, of the twelve apostles and several others. Some of these were derived from the Gnostics and other heretics; others, as the "Gospel of Matthias," are supposed by Mill, Grabe and most learned men to have been genuine gospels now lost. Those of which we have the fullest details are the "Gospel of the Egyptians," and the GOSPEL OF THE NAZARENES. This latter is most probably the same with that of the Hebrews, which was used by the Ebionites. It was supposed by St. Jerome to have been a genuine "Gospel of St. Matthew," who, he says, wrote it in the Hebrew language and letters. He copied it himself from the original in the library of Cæsarea, translated it into Greek and Latin, and has given many extracts from it. Grabe conceived this gospel to have been composed by Jewish converts soon after our Lord's ascension, before the composition of the canonical "Gospel of St. Matthew." Baronius, Grotius, Father Simon and Du Pin look upon it as the "Gospel of St. Matthew," interpolated, however, by the Nazarenes. Baronius and Grabe think that it was cited by Ignatius or the author of the Epistles ascribed to him. Others look upon it as a translation altered from the Greek of St. Matthew. Mr. Jones thinks that this gospel was referred to by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians. It is referred to by Hegesippus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen and Eusebius. Epiphanius acquaints us that it was held in great repute by the ancient Judaizing Christians, and that it began thus: "It came to pass in the days of Herod, king of Judæa, that John came baptizing with the baptism of repentance in the river Jordan," etc. It consequently wanted the genealogy and the first two chapters.

THE GOSPEL OF THE EGYPTIANS is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Ambrose, Jerome and Epiphanius. Grabe, Mill, Du Pin and Father Simon, who thought highly of this gospel, looked upon it as one of the works referred to by St. Luke in the commencement of his Gospel. Mill ascribes its origin to the Essenes, and supposes this and the former gospel to have been composed in or a little before A. D. 58. It is cited by the pseudo-Clement, who is generally supposed to have written not before the third century.

GOTH, BERTRAND DE, was born in 1624, and became archbishop of Bordeaux. Subsequently, in 1305, he became pope, assuming the title of Clement V. He owed his election to the influence of Philip the Fair upon the French party in the conclave. He made the papacy subservient to French policy, and transferred the pontifical chair to Avignon, where he resigned altogether, at least toward the house of Valois, those theocratic pretensions which had been so vigorously upheld by Boniface VIII. The order of the Templars was abolished under Clement V. He died in 1314.

GOTHIC ARCH, the pointed arch of the Middle Ages, a term first applied opprobriously to this style of architecture, but now, in general use as its distinctive appellation.

GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE, the style of architecture which prevailed in Germany, France, Spain and England from the twelfth till the sixteenth century. The essential features of the style are more fully developed in ecclesiastical buildings, but they are also seen in a modified form in castles, manor houses and domestic residences. Greek, Roman and Gothic architecture, as distinct styles, have very marked characteristics. Horizontalism prevails in the Greek, semi-circular arches in the Roman, and in the Gothic the arches are pointed, resting on columns which are lofty, without an entablature, thus presenting a vertical aspect. In the Greek the members carry the eye from side to side in a manner parallel to the horizon, because of the massive size of the entablature. In the Roman, when the eye rises along the curve of the semi-circular arch, it is carried downward again toward the ground, but in the Gothic the apex of the arch, the pointed windows, the finials tapering aloft and the other members all tend to carry the eye upward. Then, again, in the ecclesiastical structures of a first-class magnitude, the length of the nave and of the choir, the clustered columns bearing up the groined ceilings, which rise to an apex in the centre, produce an effect in which loftiness and elevation combined with great solemnity are experienced by all beholders. In the styles which preceded the development of the Gothic there were members which were continued in the later styles. Thus in the Classic, Byzantine, the Romanesque, and even the Saracenic, periods, there are forms which afterward appeared with modifications of arrangement in the Gothic.

The introduction of Byzantine or Oriental ornamentation by the Crusaders after their return from the East had a very marked influence, and contributed greatly to the change of style in England and France. This change began to creep in as early as the end of the eleventh century, and new ornamentation was often added to buildings previously constructed, without rebuilding them, especially in France, as at Bernay in Normandy, Rheims and many other instances. This Byzantine or Oriental ornamentation did not come into general use until the latter half of the twelfth century. A school of Greek or Oriental sculptors appears to have been formed at Toulouse and in Aquitaine at an earlier period, and to have gradually spread shire schools appear to have been in advance of others in Europe at that period. The choir of Lincoln is the earliest building of the pure Gothic style, free from any mixture of the Romanesque, that has been hitherto found in Europe or in the world. The Oriental styles are not Gothic, though they helped to lead to it, and the French Gothic has a strong mixture of the Romanesque, which continued long after the style of Lincoln had prevailed in England. northward, but there is no sculpture, properly so called, until late in the twelfth century. The union of this Oriental character with the Romanesque led by successive steps to the full development of the Gothic style. But this was also much influenced by the local schools of workmen, who acquired great skill by practice at home, though they were willing to receive fresh ideas from foreign countries. Each great monastery and each cathedral chapter had its own gang or school of workmen, rivaling each other and eager to catch new ideas to surpass its rivals. The Yorkshire and Lincolnecture have differed in their nomenclature of the different styles, and they have differed on the point as to whether or not the period usually termed Norman should be recognized as belonging to the Gothic style. In England, Norman prevailed during the reigns of William the Conqueror, William Rufus, Henry I. and Stephen, or from about A. D. 1066 until 1135. A modification became apparent during the reign of Henry II., and from 1154 till 1189 the Transition style appeared, and it led to the well-known and greatly admired Early English, which predominated during Richard I., John and Henry III., or from 1189 till 1272. In the close of the thirteenth century other changes took place, and in the reign of Edward I., or from 1272 until 1307, a transition was occurring from Early English to the Decorated, a style which, from the flowing character of its forms in the heads of windows and the beauty of its tracery, was recognized as the perfection of beauty in architecture. It held its sway over the former styles from 1307 till about 1377, or during the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III., when new forms were introduced. By this time windows had become wide and lofty, and builders began to dread that the pressure of the gables on the arches of the windows might crush the delicate tracery with which the windows were filled. Accordingly, during the last quarter of the fourteenth century, the mullions or perpendicular shafts in the windows began to be carried up above the springing of the arch; and by the beginning of the fifteenth century the Perpendicular style was fully developed. From 1399 until 1546, during the reigns of Henry IV., V., VI., Edward IV., V., Richard III., Henry VII. and Henry VIII., the Perpendicular period held sway. Few whole buildings of great size were erected in this style after the time of Henry VIII., for the decadence of architectural purity had set in. In additions and rebuildings the forms of the Perpendicular appear, but often in a debased style, although as late as the reign of James I. and Charles I. builders had not altogether abandoned the styles of the better ages of art, as may be seen in the university schools in Oxford, Wadham College and the chapels of Lincoln, Jesus and Oriel Colleges at Oxford, the chapel of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, the hall of the Inner Temple and the chapel of Lincoln's Inn, London. Churches also were erected in this style in some places, and specimens of them may be seen at Lowham in Somersetshire, Water Eaton in Oxfordshire and Apthorp in Northamptonshire.

This nomenclature and this classification of styles are alike confined to England and English work. The names First Pointed, Middle Pointed and Third Pointed are general in character, and were intended by their authors to be applied to all Europe. But the progress of the art was not simultaneous, even in any one country, and these names would mislead beginners in the study, for they would lead the student to attach too great importance to the form of the arch, as if it were the essential characteristic; whereas many good Gothic buildings have few pointed arches in them. Then, again, the First Pointed style in England is the style of the twelfth century, and in the South of France it is of the eleventh.

As already stated, leading authorities are found who hesitate to recognize Norman as the first of the Gothic styles. The general effect of a rich Norman church is very gorgeous, but it has a sort of barbaric splendor far removed from the chasteness and delicacy of the style which succeeded it. Nevertheless, it certainly prepared the way for and led to the adoption of the successive developments which characterized the architecture of the three hundred years which followed its decline. In the various periods of the Gothic the arch arose from the top of the column, and so it was with the Norman, although the form and the mouldings of the arches differed, as did all the other members. In Norman churches the buttresses were usually flat and without ornament. The towers were low, seldom rising more than a diameter above the apex of the roof. Porches generally had very little projection, but the thickness of the wall allowed the doorways to be deeply recessed. Turrets were not often met with in early specimens, and in Normandy round towers abounded. The earliest ceilings were vaulted, or of the barrel form, as in the chapel of the White Tower in London; and the apse is a very peculiar characteristic of this style.

When Norman gave place to the Early English, or the style which has usually been considered the first period of the true Gothic, the characteristics assumed very different forms. Mouldings in arches became very bold, and they were deeply cut, thus producing a strong effect of light and shade. A peculiar ornament was introduced in the hollow mouldings, which consisted of a small pyramid, more or less acute, cut into four leaves or petals meeting in the point, but separate below. When very acute and seen in profile, it was considered to be like a row of teeth; and hence it has been called "the dog-tooth ornament." It was often used with great profusion on arches, between clustered shafts or architraves and jambs of doors, windows, and indeed in every place where such ornament could be introduced. It was beginning to creep in during the later Norman, and it appeared in some examples of the Decorated, but it may be considered as a peculiarity of the Early English style. Crockets, so called from the curl as in the shepherd's staff, were also introduced, rich foliage on the capitals of columns, lofty, pointed arches, lancet windows, which at first had no ornament in the head of the window, pillars round or octagonal in small churches, and in larger with small columns clustered round and attached to the main shaft, were characteristic of this style. The vaulted ceilings were loftier than those of the Norman, and the buttresses were more projecting and much more ornamental. Usually in sides of churches the windows were single, but where more light was required two were placed side by side in the same bay, while three were introduced to give light in the gables at the east end of the edifice, the centre one of the three being higher than those on each side, and in very large buildings, such as the north transept of York Minster, even five windows were thus arranged.

The Decorated style is distinguished by its large windows divided by mullions, and the heads of the windows were filled with tracery in flowing lines, or forming circles, trefoils and other geometrical figures, and not running perpendicularly. The ornaments of this style are numerous and very delicately carved, more strictly faithful to nature and more essentially parts of the structure than in any other style. Rose windows or circular windows are common in this period, and they form the great glory of many French cathedrals. These members do not appear in the Perpendicular or next style. The mouldings in arches are not so deep and bold as in the Early English, but the doorways are very magnificent, and the foliage scattered over bosses or the cooping of ribs in ceilings is of an efflorescent character. In the groining of roofs the ribs are more plentiful than in the former style, and timber roofs are comparatively rare, while great variety prevails among the styles of the buttresses, some being quite plain and others rising into decorated pinnacles or small turrets ornamented with crockets.

In the Perpendicular the grand distinction is the upright form of the mullions carried straight into the head of the window. This course was adopted in consequence of the erroneous size to which the windows had attained, for it was felt that support was required to bear up the weight of the superimposed gable top. Once perpendicularity obtained in the windows, the same character began to prevail in paneling, in all forms of buttresses, parapets and pinnacles. Indeed, wherever any attempt was made at ornament, this feature became obvious. The arches of doorways became flatter, and they were often placed within a horizontal frame and a label over it, with foliage filling the angles. Porches were large, highly ornamented, and buttresses were paneled, while towers were made extremely rich and elaborately ornamented. The elaborate form known as fan-tracery was introduced in the vaulting of ceilings, and it harmonized with the ornaments of the tabernacle work below. The open timber roofs which were introduced into many churches in England belong almost entirely to this style, and the screens and lofts across the aisles, and the arches of the central towers also, as well as the rich medieval carved wood-work which remains to the present time, date from this period.

By the time of Henry VII. the purity of taste that had been displayed in the magnificent structures which had been erected during the preceding centuries began to decline. The debased forms of the Tudor age appeared; and when intercourse with Italy and the East began to increase, a revival of the Classic forms began to obtain an ascendancy. Gradually Greek and Roman members were introduced, and the style known as the Renaissance, so called by the French, began to appear. The Elizabethan style is a singular mixture of Gothic and Italian details; it is almost confined to domestic buildings, but in several places it appears in additions to churches, as at Sunningwell, in Berkshire. In England the vast mansions of the gentry erected in the reign of James I. and Charles I. present fine specimens of the Elizabethan manner, as they also show the style which the gentility, the luxury and the civilization of the age effected. After a long period, in which taste seemed to have utterly decayed, when structures of wondrous deformity were erected at great cost, when Greek temples were built for stables and Roman columns and arches were placed before houses two or three stories high, when a sense of congruity seemed to have departed, a revival at length began to appear, and the masters of architectural science have again been led to acknowledge the beauty and scientific character of the Gothic forms. The usages of this age will, however, demand a modification of the olden styles, and it is not to be doubted but that an architecture so pliant as the Gothic has shown itself to be will admit of such changes as will suit the requirements of this or of any age.

GOTTESCHALCHUS (got-te-shal'kus), or GOTSCHALK (got-shawk'), born in 806, a monk of Orbais, was a great propagator of predestinarian views. His persistent teaching on the subject brought him before Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, by whom he was most cruelly treated, being publicly flogged, and then incarcerated in the abbey of Hautvillers. Hincmar threatened him, when dying, with severe punishment if he would not sign a formulary of faith which was brought to him. He refused, and was, by Hincmar's order, deprived of the last sacraments and of ecclesiastical burial. He died 867.

GOUGE (gowj'), WILLIAM. This excellent divine was born in Stratford, England, in 1575, and educated at Cambridge. He early manifested devoted piety, entered the ministry at the age of thirty-one, richly furnished in mind and heart for its holy work, and was made minister of St. Ann's, Blackfriars, London. Here he remained for forty-five years, steadily refusing places of greater profit, and was regarded as the father of London ministry and the spiritual oracle of his time. He was in 1643 made a member of the assembly of divines, where he was held in great repute, and was frequently in the moderator's absence called to fill his chair. He was appointed one of the annotators on the Scriptures, and performed as his part from the beginning of 1 Kings to the book of Job in a manner that gained high approbation. He was the author of several religious works. He died December 12, 1653.

GOUGE, THOMAS, son of William, was born at Bow, Middlesex, in 1605. After pursuing his education at Cambridge, he was settled at St. Sepulchre's, London. He was a man of earnest and devoted piety and great learning, and was especially distinguished for his cheerful and unwearied diligence in acts of pious charity. He wrote several practical religious works which have been held in high esteem, and spent much of his time in going about doing good. He died October 29, 1681.

GOUGH (gof), JOHN B., a prominent and successful advocate of the cause of temperance in the United States and Great Britain, was born at Sandgate, in the county of Kent, England, August 22, 1817. A very limited education was received in the seminary of Mr. Davis of Folkestone, where he rendered assistance as soon as he was able in two classes in spelling and the rule of three in arithmetic. This school he left at the age of ten years, and with it all opportunity of education. At the age of twelve he emigrated with a friend of the family in his native village to America. Landed at New York, August 3, 1829, and proceeded to Ontario county, where he was employed on a farm for two years. He then visited New York city and entered the Methodist Book Concern as an apprentice to the book-binding business. Yielding to the influence of temptation, he gradually fell into a life of dissipation and extreme poverty until the latter part of the year 1842, when he signed the pledge of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, commenced a new life and gradually became one of the most popular and influential lecturers on the subject of temperance both in this country and Europe. Mr. Gough possesses in a remarkable degree the power of enlisting his audience in his cause, and his efforts in the cause of temperance have accomplished a vast amount of good.

GOULART (goo-lar'), SIMON, a Protestant theologian, was born at Senlis, October 20, 1543. Becoming a convert to the doctrines of the Reformation in 1565 he pursued a course of theology at Geneva, and was consecrated to the work of the ministry October 20, 1566. Preaching for some time in a rural congregation, he became in 1571 pastor of the parish of St. Jervais, in Geneva. Here he remained till his death, a bold and fearless speaker and a prolific writer, both of original works and translations. He died at Geneva, February 3, 1628.

GOULART, SIMON, son of the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1576. After serving the French Protestant church at Wesel as pastor, he was in 1601 called to the charge of the Walloon church in Amsterdam. A zealous Arminian, he here stirred up a controversy with his colleague, and he was finally ejected. In defence of his views he wrote two works which attracted attention, and he was chosen in 1718 by the Remonstrants as one of their defenders at the Synod of Dort. Being under interdict, he was, however, forbidden to appear. He afterward went to Antwerp and Calais, and finally to Frederickstadt, where a number of Remonstrants had sought refuge. He died March 19, 1628.

GOULBURN (gool'burn), EDWARD MEYERICK, born in 1818, a distinguished clergyman of the Church of England, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, where he took a first class in Literis Humanioribus. He was Bampton lecturer in 1850, and after holding the incumbency of St. John's, Paddington, he was appointed dean of Norwich in 1866. He has written some works, but the one with which his name will be chiefly connected is that on "Personal Religion."

GOULDING (gool'ding), THOMAS, D.D., a minister of the Presbyterian Church, was born at Midway, Liberty county, Georgia, March 14, 1786. After pursuing his education at Wadsworth, Connecticut, and studying law for some time, he turned his attention to theology, and was licensed to preach in 1813. He labored successfully at White Bluff for six years, removed to Lexington in 1822, and was afterward professor in the theological seminary of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia, where he rendered many years of laborious service in the departments of ecclesiastical history and Church government. He died June 26, 1848.

GOURD. On leaving Nineveh we read that Jonah "went and sat on the east side of the city, and there made him a booth, and sat under it in the shadow. . . . And the Lord God prepared a gourd [kikayon], and made it come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head," Jon. iv. 5, 6. This kikayon the Septuagint renders kolok- ynthē, with which agrees the Authorized Version "gourd." Nor could any plant be more suitable for the purpose. "It is very commonly used for trailing over temporary arbors. It grows with extraordinary rapidity. In a few days after it has fairly begun to run, the whole arbor is covered. It forms a shade absolutely impenetrable to the sun's rays even at noonday. It flourishes best in the very hottest part of summer. And lastly, when injured or cut, it withers away with equal rapidity."

At the same time, it is only right to mention that since the days of Jerome a very different plant has been generally accepted as the kikayon of Jonah.

That Father says: "It is the same as in the Syriac and Punic is called el-keroa; a shrub of upright growth, with broad leaves like a vine, and yielding a dense shadow. It springs up so rapidly that in the space of a few days, where you saw a tender herb you will be looking up to a little tree: intra paucos dies quam herbam videras, arbusculam suspicis." The keroa of Jerome is sufficiently ascertained to be the castor-oil plant, or Ricinus communis, which in every respect corresponds with the above description. Kimchi mentions that it was planted at the doors of houses for the sake of its grateful shadow. It is also a curious confirmation of Jerome's theory that the Egyptians called the plant kiki, a name almost identical with the Hebrew kikayon; and "the modern Jews of London use castor-oil, by the name of oil of kik, for their Sabbath lamps, it being one of the fine kinds of oil their traditions allow them to burn on these occasions." With allusion to the beautiful palmated leaves, resembling a hand with the fingers outspread, the Ricinus has long been known by the name "Palma Christi," which is the alternative rendering on the margins of our English Bible. It grows in Palestine. Among other trees in the valley of the Jordan, near Jericho, it is mentioned by Dr. Robinson as "of large size and having the character of a perennial tree."

Gourd, Wild.—During a time of dearth one of the sons of the prophets at Gilgal went out to gather "herbs," or such vegetables as could be found in the fields. He found a "wild vine," or creeping plant with tendrils, "and gathered thereof wild gourds (paktoth) his lap full, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage; for they knew them not." But such was the taste of the soup or pottage that they exclaimed to Elisha, "O thou man of God, there is death in the pot;" and it was not till he had cast in some meal that it became fit for use, 2 Ki. iv. 38-41.

One of the kindest gifts of the Creator to the warmer regions of the world is the cucurbitaceous tribe of plants. Even in our own temperate climate the melon and cucumber are prized, and "shred into the pot," or boiled entire; the pumpkin and vegetable marrow are largely used for culinary purposes. But we can have little conception of the important part performed in the torrid and sub-torrid zones by that widespread and most miscellaneous family, which, in bottles of various fantastic shapes, hoards up the precious moisture and keeps it cool in sandy wastes and burning deserts. Grateful, however, as is the juicy pulp of many species, the root of nearly all the perennial varieties contains a bitter acrid principle; and in such examples as the colocynth and the squirting-cucumber this bitter element ascends, and is found freely developed in the pulpy fruit. Indeed, it may be questioned if traces of it are not found in the most prized and popular sorts; for when too freely used, colocynthine indications are apt to follow, and sometimes common melons and cucumbers are so full of this bitter ingredient as to be quite uneatable. In his account of the melon of the Kalahari Desert Dr. Livingstone says: "In years when more than the usual quantity of rain falls, vast tracts of the country are literally covered with these melons (Cucumis caffer). Then animals of every sort and name, including man, rejoice in the rich supply. The elephantine lord of the forest revels in this fruit, and so do the different species of rhinoceros, although naturally so diverse in their choice of pasture. The various kinds of antelope feed on them with equal avidity, and lions, hyenas, jackals and mice all seem to know and appreciate the common blessing. These melons are not, however, all of them eatable; some are sweet, and others are so bitter that the whole are named by the boers 'the bitter water-melon.' The natives select them by striking one melon after another with a hatchet and applying the tongue to the gashes; they thus readily distinguish between the bitter and sweet. The bitter are deleterious, but the sweet are quite wholesome. This peculiarity of one species of plants bearing both sweet and bitter fruits occurs also in a red eatable cucumber often met with in the country. It is about four inches long and about an inch and a half in diameter. It is of a bright scarlet color when ripe. Many are bitter, others quite sweet. Even melons in a garden may be made bitter by a few bitter kengwe (C. caffer) in the vicinity. The bees convey the pollen from one to the other."

No doubt it was some harmless gourd, egg-plant, melon or cucumber which the purveyor for the college at Gilgal intended to gather, but unwittingly he brought home a lapful of paktoth. Whether these were squirting-cucumbers or colocynths, the intense bitterness would make it impossible to proceed with the pottage, and must at once have suggested the idea of poison: "There is death in the pot."

We have sometimes been inclined to fancy that the gourds in this instance belonged to an edible species in which the bitter principle this time happened to be present. The specific name, however, is in favor of some distinct and separate plant which an inexperienced collector had confounded with some well-known and wholesome esculent; just as amongst ourselves puff-balls and poisonous fungi are often mistaken for mushrooms. An etymologist would give his verdict in favor of the squirting-cucumber (Ecballium agreste), deriving paktoth from paka, "to split, or burst." This plant is of plentiful occurrence in Palestine. The fruit is not unlike a small cucumber covered with hairs. It is from an inch to two inches long, and when ripe projects its juice and seeds with considerable force through an opening at the base. The juice yields the principle known to pharmacy as elaterium, bitter and poisonous, and such an active purgative that, according to Dr. Thompson, it acts in doses of less than one-ninety-sixth of a grain! But considering its propensity to part with all its contents when handled, we do not think that even a novice would be so apt to bring home the squirting-cucumber as the fruit of the Citrullus colocynthis, or colocynth. Like the former, it is of frequent occurrence, and with its globular fruit and smooth, yellow rind, so closely resembling an orange, it has a plausible and prepossessing appearance; but its flavor will be sufficiently appreciated when we add that it yields the colocynthin of medicine.

Of many plants the unwholesome qualities may be lessened or destroyed by boiling or by treating them with acids which neutralize their noxious ingredients. Thus it is stated that at the Cape of Good Hope the colocynth is eaten, being rendered innocuous when properly pickled. But the means taken by Elisha had no natural fitness to counteract any poisonous properties, and the result can only be regarded as miraculous. In the same way there are some plants of rapid growth, but neither the "Palma Christi" nor any gourd could have sprouted with such amazing swiftness as in a few hours to extend a canopy over Jonah, or cover his booth with a leafy awning, except at the express command of Him who said in the beginning, "Let the earth bring forth the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind; and it was so."

GOUSSET (goo-say'), JACQUES, an eminent Hebrew scholar and divine, was born at Blois, October 7, 1635. Having pursued a theological course at Saumur, he became pastor of the church at Poitiers in 1662, where he remained until the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, declining thrice in the mean while the professorship of theology at Saumur. Having visited England, he next went to Holland, and in 1687 he became pastor of the Walloon church of Dort. In 1692 he accepted the professorship of Greek and theology at the university of Groningen, which position he held until his death. Gousset labored to effect some innovations in the system of Hebrew grammar as pursued in Holland, and the interpretation of the original text of Scriptures. He died November 4, 1704.

GOUTTES (goo'tay), JEAN LOUIS, was born at Tulle in 1740. In early life he entered the army, which he soon relinquished for the Church, and became curate of a place in the vicinity of Bordeaux, afterward at Argilliers. Acquiring considerable influence over the clergy of Béziers, he became their representative to the States-General in 1789. Here he favored the abolition of the usury laws, and seconded the motion of the bishop of Autun proposing the sale of the property of the clergy. In February, 1791, he was made the successor of Talleyrand-Périgord, bishop of Autun. Taking a stand, however, in opposition to some of the exactions of the Republicans, he was accused of reactionary sympathies, arrested, condemned, and executed March 26, 1794.

GOVAN, SAINT. Near Tenby, in Wales, there is a chapel situated in one of the wildest regions of the coast. It is a small, rude building, perched across a fissure in the side of the cliffs; and it cannot be seen from above. A long flight of steps well worn conducts to it. The roof is arched, a stone bench with a cushion of turf is ranged on either side, and out of one of the gables there is an entrance to a hole in the rock, in which persons used to stand and "wish" for some desired object. No doubt, some anchorite, mistaking the object of life, sought here, by mortification, to gain a title to heaven. As to the name, it is a corruption of St. Giovanni, to whom the chapel was dedicated.

GOVERNOR (guv'er-nor). This word is used in our Bibles with considerable latitude, as implying persons of rank, or those who exercised independent or delegated authority, civil or ecclesiastical, in a kingdom, a province, a town or a household. Various Hebrew terms are thus translated, some of them very nearly synonymous, and all implying one or other of the prerogatives or qualifications belonging to a ruler or chief. Accurately to define these several terms is the work rather of a lexicographer than of a compiler of such a book as the present. A writer has enumerated ten Hebrew and four Greek words translated "governor;" and he might have added to his list. It must be sufficient here to explain the term in those few cases in which, to the English reader, it may seem to require illustration.

Thus it is used to designate certain provincial officers of the Assyrian, Babylonian, Median and Persian empires. The original word is pehlah, probably akin to the modern pacha. Several of these governors presided over districts on the western side of the Euphrates, Neh. ii. 7, 9, and they were inferior to the satraps or king's lieutenants, Ezra viii. 36. Sheshbazzar, doubtless identical with Zerubbabel, is said to have been "governor," v. 14; vi. 7; Hag. i. 1. Nehemiah, too, was "governor," Neh. v. 14, 15, 18, both bearing also the title of "the Tirshatha," Ezra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 70; viii. 9; x. 1. The exact duties of these officers are not defined; they seem to have had a salary or allowance, Ezra iv. 14; Neh. v. 15, 17, 18, and were probably assisted by a council, Ezra iv. 7; vi. 6; Neh. iv. 14; vi. 10. It is the same officer who is mentioned in Mal. i. 8. Possibly Pahath-moab, Ezra ii. 6, should be translated chief or governor of Moab.

In the New Testament the Roman procurator of Judea is called the "governor"—e. g., Matt. xxvii. 2, 11, 14; a kindred word being used to describe the authority of Tiberius, Luke iii. 1, where, in our version, "reign." The "governor" of a marriage-feast was the bridegroom's friend, who took charge of the entertainment, John ii. 8, 9. The "governor" of Damascus would seem to have been the ethnarch who held the place as the king's lieutenant or vassal, 2 Cor. xi. 32. The "governors" of a minor were the trustees of his property, Gal. iv. 2. The "governor" of a ship was the steersman, James iii. 4.

GOVINDA (go-vin'da), SINGH, author of one of the sacred books of the sect of the Sikhs, and the tenth and last "guru," or teacher, was born at Patua, in Behar, in 1661. He immured himself in the mountains near Djemnah and passed twenty-five years in religious meditation, the study of the Hindoo books of devotion and the Koran. Afterward, claiming to be the special envoy of God, though still acknowledging his mortal nature, he undertook the reformation of the Sikhs. He gained many converts to the sect, became involved in war with the Mongols, whom he twice defeated; but his allies deserting him, he was compelled to withdraw into the interior of his states, and experiencing various fortunes in honor and adversity, died in the valley of the Godavey.

GOVONA (go-vo'nah), ROSA, an Italian lady, born in 1716, who, from a casual meeting with an orphan on the point of committing suicide through despair, was led to found first one and then by degrees a great number of homes of industry for young women in Turin and other towns. Each house had its specialty of work: one of silk and embroidery; another of ecclesiastical vestments; a third of military clothing; a fourth of clothes for the poor. These communities were called Rosinas after their benevolent foundress. She died in 1756.

GOWER (gow'er), JOHN, born about 1325, one of the early English poets, contemporary and friend of Chaucer. Little is known of his personal history, save that he graduated at Oxford, studied law in the Inner Temple, and is said even to have been a judge, and knighted. He was a man in easy circumstances, and thus able to devote his time to the cultivation of poetry, which he did much to refine and elevate. Dr. Wharton says that if Chaucer had not existed, the compositions of Gower would have been sufficient to rescue the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II. from the imputation of barbarism. His principal work consists of three parts, "Speculum Meditantis," "Vox Clamantis" and "Confessio Amantis." He died 1408.

GOWN (goun), the academic robe adopted from the monastic garb of the preaching friars, worn by professional men, as divines, professors and students. It is a long, loose, upper garment worn over other clothing, and made in different styles and colors, according to the literary rank of the wearer. Thus, there are gowns which are worn by undergraduate students; others are used by bachelors, and others again by masters in arts; while doctors of medicine, of music, of law and of divinity have each their special style and color. So also the gowns of different universities have peculiarities that distinguish them from each other, and the same is the case with the university hood, which in olden time was the substitute for the modern hat.

GOZAN (go'zan), generally believed to be a river of Media to the banks of which the captive Israelites were transported first by Tiglath-Pileser, and afterward by Shalmaneser, 1 Chr. v. 26; 2 Ki. xvii. 6. This river has lately been identified by Major Rennel, with the Kizzil Ozan, or the Golden River of Media. It rises in Kurdistan, a few miles to the south-west of Sennah, and after joining with some other streams merges into the Sifed Rood or White River, and falls into the Caspian Sea. Some, however, and among these Gesenius, understand by Gozan a district of Mesopotamia, and instead of reading, at 2 Ki. xvii. 6, "and placed them in Halah, and in Habor by the river of Gozan," substitute, "and placed them in Halah, and in Habor, a river of Gozan." But the passage in Chronicles, where Hera comes between Habor and Gozan, seems to favor the other view. Also Halah, a province, going before Habor, seems to imply that both are provinces; since one could hardly speak in close succession of putting them in a province and in a river, as if the same thing were meant in the two cases.

GRAAL (gra'al), a bowl-shaped vessel referred to in the poetry and legends of the Middle Ages, said to have been made of precious stone and endowed with wonderful virtues.

GRAAL, or GRAIL, HOLY, the chalice used at the sacrament. According to some legends, the cup used by our Saviour at the Last Supper, and according to others, the platter on which the Paschal lamb was served, were called by this name. Joseph of Arimathea was said to have received the blood which flowed from the wounds of Jesus in this cup, which he preserved, and which was afterward preserved by knights on the top of a mountain. If any but a holy person approached the cup, it vanished away, and this led to the quest of the Holy Grail by a knight who was eminent for chastity and virtue. The poet Tennyson refers to these legends in his "Sir Galahad." The derivation of the word is uncertain. "Graal" or "greal" in the Langue Romane signifies a cup. "Sangreal" may be a corruption of "sanguis realis," the real blood, and the further corruption of the word may have produced the term "grail."

GRABA (gra'bah), 1 Esdr. v. 29, a form of Hagabah, Ezra ii. 45.

GRABATARI (gra-ba-tar'e-e), a name given to those who deferred baptism until they reached their deathbed. This was not uncommonly done from supineness or fear of falling into sin after baptism. Constantine may have waited for one of these reasons, or, as has been affirmed, from a desire to be baptized in the Jordan.

GRABATI (gra-bah'te). The minor canons of Meissen, a town in Saxony, were so called.

GRABE (grahb), JOHN EARNEST, an eminent scholar and divine, was born at Königs-

CHAPEL OF ST. GOVAN, TENBY, WALES.

berg, July 10, 1666, and educated at the university of the same city, where his father was professor of divinity and history. Having devoted himself to the study of the Fathers, he was led to question the validity of the orders of the clergy of the Lutheran Church, and felt disposed to join the Church of Rome. Advised to visit England to have his doubts resolved, he was well received there by William III., who conferred a pension on him. He became a minister of the Church of England, and was made D.D. of the university of Oxford, 1706. He died 1711, in the forty-fifth year of his age. His theological views were of the Anglo-Catholic type. He was the author of many learned works, of which the chief are "Selections from the Holy Fathers," "The Old Testament in Greek according to the Septuagint Version, carefully compared with the most ancient MS., the Codex Alexandrinus, and corrected by other early MSS., and more especially by the Hexaplar of Origen." The whole of this latter work Dr. Grabe prepared for the press, but only lived to publish the first and fourth volumes. The second was published under the editorial supervision of Francis Lee, M.D., and the third under that of W. Wigan, LL.D. He also published a beautiful folio edition of Bishop Bull's works, besides several other original works of lesser though much value.

GRACE. This is the usual rendering of the Greek charis in New Testament Scripture, though sometimes favor, or good-will toward persons that appear fit objects of it, Luke ii. 40, 52; Acts ii. 47; and favor rendered back for favor received, gratitude, thanksgivings, Luke vi. 32; xvii. 9; 1 Tim. i. 12, etc., are the translations adopted. But both the original term, and the corresponding English word grace, in the great majority of cases, is employed to express the free undeserved mercy and favor of God to sinful men through Jesus Christ, as opposed to all demands of law and claims of merit. The gospel is hence peculiarly the revelation of God's grace; Christ himself is made known as full of grace; grace came by him as the law had come by Moses; and in the salutations of his apostles to the churches and individuals who owned their authority, grace ever took the precedence, John i. 14, 17; Rom. i. 7, etc. Hence, salvation is represented as being altogether of grace—"By grace ye are saved," Eph. ii. 8; Gal. v. 4—and believers now are not under the law, but under grace, Rom. vi. 14—that is, not formally placed under the enactments and covenant of law, but under the rich and plenteous provisions of grace. As their state of peace and privilege here, so their final blessedness and glory hereafter, is ascribed to the praise of divine grace, Eph. i. 6. It was a very natural extension of the meaning of the word to apply it, as is sometimes done, to the reflex acts and operations of the grace manifested from God to the sinner—to the exercised love, beneficence, spiritual joy, etc., which are at once the fruit and the evidence of imparted grace, 1 Cor. xvi. 3; 2 Cor. viii. 4, 6; Philem. 7. Considered, however, in what is undoubtedly its main aspect—as a quality in the divine administration—it cannot properly be discussed apart, but must be viewed, in order to be understood aright, in connection with the diverse purposes and acts which most peculiarly exemplify it, such as the atonement of Christ, election, etc.

GRADILIS (gra-de'lis) PAINS. Bread distributed to the poor at Constantinople has been so called.

GRADUAL (grad'eu-al) PSALMS, the Psalms from Psalm cxx. to cxxxiv., inclusive. They are also called the Songs of Degrees.

GRADUALE (grad-eu-ah'le), GRADUAL or GRAIL, the antiphon, or sentence in the communion office in the Romish Church sung after the epistle as the deacon ascends the steps of the altar. The name is also applied to the book containing the offices or "introits," "kyries," "gloria in excelsis," "alleluias" tracts, sequences, creeds, offertories; in fact, all the musical portions of the service at mass.

GRADUATE (grad'eu-ät), one who has been admitted to a degree in a college or university, or from some professional incorporated society; one whose honorable standing is defined by a diploma. These honors were given in the departments of arts, law, medicine, music and divinity. Differences of rank were recognized, the first being called bachelors, the second masters, and the third doctors.

GRADUS (grah'dus), the ambo, or part of the church where the gospel was sung and the Holy Scriptures read.

GRAEFFE (grayf), JOHANN FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH, was born at Göttingen, February 15, 1754, educated in the university of his native city; and devoting himself to the work of the ministry, he became pastor of the church at Obemjese in 1784, and eight years afterward was made pastor of a parish and professor of philosophy and catechetics at Göttingen. He was the author of several works on philosophy and theology, in which his preference is more or less evident for the system of Kant. He died October 27, 1816.

GRAFT. The well-known practice of grafting is resorted to to improve the quality of fruit yielded by a tree. The branch grafted in preserves its own character, and does not take that of the stock, though it may derive sap and nutriment through it. St. Paul refers to the custom of grafting, Rom. xi. 17-24, but reverses the natural process, for the better illustration of his meaning.

GRAFTON (graf'ton), JOSEPH, a Baptist minister, was born at Newport, Rhode Island, in 1757. At the early age of fourteen he was apprenticed to sail-making, the business of his father. In 1776 he commenced preaching, and in 1788 he was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church in Newton, Massachusetts. For nearly fifty years he was the laborious, diligent and successful pastor of this church, habitually active in every good work, and especially interested in missionary and benevolent undertakings. He died in 1836.

GRAHAM (gray'am), ISABELLA, MRS., a woman of distinguished piety and benevolence, the daughter of John Marshall, of Lanarkshire, Scotland, was born July 29, 1742. She was carefully educated, and at the age of seventeen she made a public profession of religion. In 1765 she was married to Dr. John Graham, and went with him to his regiment, then at Fort Niagara, Canada, and afterward to Antigua, where he died in 1774. Returning to Scotland, she supported her father and her four children for some time by teaching, and in 1789 she visited the city of New York and opened a seminary for young ladies, which she conducted successfully for many years. Heartily sympathizing with poverty and misfortune, she devoted a large portion of her time and influence to plans for the establishment of benevolent institutions and the education of the poor. The society instituted in New York in 1799 for the relief of widows with small children was planned in her house. The school for the instruction of orphans was taught by her pupils. In 1811 she became the president of a Magdalen society which was established in New York, and in 1814 she united with some ladies in forming a society for the promotion of industry among the poor. She was highly favored with unusual health during her life, and was enabled to accomplish a great amount of good. She died July 24, 1814, at the age of seventy-two years.

GRAHAM, MARY JANE, a lady of learning and piety and author of the "Test of Truth," was born in London in 1803. In her youth she was remarkable for her diligence in study and her acquisition of the knowledge of nearly all the modern languages, besides Greek, Latin and mathematics. In her eighteenth year she was greatly perplexed with infidel doubts, which she soon overcame, and wrote the "Test of Truth," in which she delineates her mental anxieties and her relief in the truth as it is in Jesus. She also wrote a work on the "Freeness and Sovereignty of God's Grace." After many years of suffering she died in great peace at Stoke, Fleming, December, 1830.

GRAIN. The Hebrews, like ourselves, had a generic word for all kinds of grain, including the cereals and their allies. The word "dagan" is nearly equivalent to the term "corn" as used in England, which includes millet, rye, oats, wheat, barley and all cereal products.

WHEAT was known to the Israelites in Egypt, Ex. ix. 32, and on their return to Canaan they no doubt found it still cultivated, as in the days of Reuben, Gen. xxx. 14. Most probably they were the same sorts which were used in both countries; but there were only a few districts of Palestine, such as the plain of Jezreel, which could compete with the fertile Delta of Egypt, the finest corn country of the ancient world. At present the wheat-crops of Palestine are very poor and light, and Dr. Tristram says, "One may ride and walk through the standing corn without the slightest objection made or harm done. No wonder it is thin, when white crops are raised from the same soil year after year, and no sort of manure put into the ground." Three varieties have come down from antiquity. They are all bearded, and they are still in common use. Throughout the country the wheat harvest is at its height in the end of May, and this fact defines a term often mentioned in Scripture, Gen. xxx. 14; Jud. xv. 1; 1 Sam. vi. 13; xii. 17.

SPELT.—There is a species of wheat called "spelt," which was well known and generally used by the ancients in the East, and it is cultivated at the present day. The probability is that the "kusemeth," which Ezekiel used, ch. iv. 9, in making bread, was "spelt," and not "fitches," as in the text. See FITCHES. From Herodotus we know that spelt was cultivated in ancient Egypt; and as its time of growth corresponds to that of wheat at the period of the great hail, it would be in the stage described in Ex. ix. 32. It grows in Spain and in all warm countries around the Mediterranean, while Pliny states that it is characteristic of Egypt and Syria. It differs little in appearance from bearded wheat; it is equally nutritious, and it is more hardy in its habits. There is an awnless variety which is perhaps the most naked of all the cereals, and it grows on a coarse soil, requiring little care in cultivation.

DOURRA.—This word does not occur in the Authorized Version, but the grain is well known in both Syria and Egypt, is cultivated so extensively in Egypt that wheat alone, and that but little, exceeds its produce; but Syria appears less favorable to its culture, and hence the amount raised there is not so large. Still, it is grown along the Jordan and its lakes and in the plains on both sides of that river—that is, wherever there are facilities for artificial irrigation, which this grain demands. There are several varieties of dourra. That mostly cultivated in Egypt, Arabia and Syria is of a good quality, and yields a fair white flour which is much used in making cakes, etc. The straw is also very useful, being applied as a covering to huts and cabins; and when the Arabs and peasants of Egypt wish to cross the Nile, a very common method is to support themselves on their bellies on a bundle of dourra straw. This is very safe, as the straw is light and peculiarly impervious to water.

MILLET is also largely cultivated in Egypt, Syria and Palestine. It rises with a reed-like channeled stalk, three or four feet high. The grain forms a useful article of human food in the countries favorable to its culture; the poultry are also very fond of it, while the cattle are partial to its straw. There can be no doubt of the antiquity of the cultivation of millet in both Syria and Egypt.

RICE is an article of large consumption in Syria and in other Asiatic countries; indeed, it forms the staple of the principal daily meal of the inhabitants. The name of this grain does not occur in the Bible, or at least no word in the original has been so rendered by the translators of the English version, and yet rice was probably very extensively cultivated in Bible times in Bible lands. Still, it is not certainly known when it was first introduced into Egypt. This grain is so generally known that an extended notice of it is not required here. It can only be cultivated where the summer heat is powerful, steady and long continued, and where it can obtain plenty of moisture, either by natural or artificial means, for heat and moisture it must have in liberal quantities. Though cultivated to a considerable extent in Syria, the demand far exceeds the home supply, and large quantities are annually imported from Egypt, where it is very extensively cultivated.

MAIZE.—It is almost certain that the Hebrews were acquainted with what we call Indian corn, the "Zea Mays" of Linnæus.

In 1817, Parmentier, founding on the silence of Varro, Columella, Pliny and the other agricultural and botanical writers of classical antiquity, concluded that maize was unknown till the discovery of America; and in 1834, Meyer asserted that "nothing in botanical geography is more certain than the New World derivation of maize." But since then, in his magnificent monograph, M. Bonafous, the director of the Royal Garden of agriculture at Turin, has shown that it is figured in a Chinese botanical work as old as the middle of the sixteenth century—a time when the discoveries of Columbus could scarcely have penetrated to the celestial empire; and what is more conclusive, in 1819, M. Rifaud discovered under the head of a mummy at Thebes not only grains but leaves of Indian corn. Nor is it at all impossible that the "Zea" of Homer and Theophrastus may include the plant in question. The wide diffusion of this corn through the Indian archipelago, and on the Indian continent itself, is in favor of the hypothesis which claims it as a native of the Old World; and if it was known to the Egyptians, nothing could be more natural than its early introduction into Palestine.

In his amusing and characteristic treatise on "Cobbett's Corn," remarking on the offering of "green ears of corn," Lev. ii. 14, the author says: "What a curious meat-offering, to parch green grains of wheat by the fire! Oh, no; this meat-offering was to consist of ears of green corn [maize]—that is to say, corn in the milky state, roasted before the fire; and no wonder that it was chosen for an offering, for the most delicious thing it is that ever delighted the palate of human being. The general way of cooking these 'green ears,' as the Americans call them, is to boil them, and to eat them as bread along with meat, or sometimes with butter. The context would add additional conviction, if any were wanted, for the fifteenth verse says, 'Thou shalt put oil upon it, and lay frankincense thereon.' Now, we, when we have roasted our ears of corn before the fire, put butter and salt thereon." If we were absolutely secure in assuming that the corn of the Bible may occasionally denote this plant, it would give additional expressiveness to the numerous passages which speak of "eating green ears," of "cutting off the tops of the ears of corn," and such presents as "full ears of corn in the husks thereof," Lev. xxiii. 14; Job xxiv. 24; Matt. xii. 1; 2 Ki. iv. 2. There is also force in what Cobbett says regarding the "seven ears of corn coming up on one stalk," in Pharaoh's dream, Gen. xli. 5. "The wheat root will send up sometimes, if it have room, from twenty to fifty stalks, but never more than one ear upon one stalk. Seven ears is a great number for a corn plant to have, but (and the fact is truly curious) the 'New York Evening Post' of the 26th of August 1873, records as a wonder a corn-stalk on the farm of a Mr. Dickerson, in Bedford county, having seven full ears upon it. And it happens, singularly enough, that one single corn plant in my field has on one stalk seven ears of corn."

BARLEY.—Of this well-known and widely-diffused cereal it is impossible to assign the native country. On the top of turf-walls and on thin soils there grows a little grass extremely like it—the wall-barley or mouse-barley; but even Lamarck would have found it difficult to transmute this Hordeum murinum into any of the cultivated varieties. The same thing may be said of wheat; and joining the two facts together—firstly, that these all-important grains are never found truly wild or native, and, secondly, that it is a process roundabout, and far from obvious, by which they are converted into cakes and loaves—we cannot help feeling that it is in a sense peculiarly emphatic that "our Father who is in heaven" has given us our "daily bread." In the world's infancy many things lay ready to the hand of the new-come tenant, and with unsophisticated senses it would not need much instruction to guide him to the use of such fruits as the pine-apple or ripe orange. But who gave the hint to the first miller? Who taught the first baker? How did it occur to any one to rub down into a powder the grains of a coarse grass, and then work this powder with water into paste, and then kindle a fire to bake it into bread? Were not the worshipers of Ceres pointing toward a truth through the darkness of their idolatry? May we not suppose that the use of corn is as ancient as the days when man, still un-fallen, received his lesson direct from God? And when he fell from this blessedness, and was driven forth to "eat bread in the sweat of his face," may not the exile have been in mercy allowed to carry with him into the house of his pilgrimage this "staff of life"?

Palestine was a "land of wheat and barley," Deut. viii. 8. Barley was given to horses and dromedaries, 1 Ki. iv. 28; but it was also converted into bread for the food of man, Ezek. iv. 12. In the multitude which surrounded the Saviour in the fields near Bethsaida the only supplies forthcoming were "five barley-loaves and two small fishes," John vi. 9. But if we may take as a criterion the expression, "A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny," Rev. vi. 6, the relative value of wheat was three-fold greater. There was the same preference for wheat in other lands. Amongst the Romans barley was the food of horses, and each cavalry soldier was allowed a certain sum by way of barley-money. It was a punishment to substitute barley for the usual rations of the men. Thus, when some of his cohorts had lost their standards, Claudius Marcellus ordered them to be reduced to barley. The same preference of wheaten bread manifests itself in almost every country which permits the choice, notwithstanding the superior sweetness of barley.

One great recommendation of barley is the rapidity with which it ripens. Even in Norway, with the help of the long midsummer sunshine, it is said that sometimes less than two months intervenes between reaping and seed-time. The consequence is that in some countries, such as Spain, they are able to procure two crops in one season. Some of their barley the Jews sowed or planted at the time of the autumnal rains, October or November, and some as soon as the depth of winter was past, so that the crop was ripe about the time of the Passover, or at Easter.

Among a rural population agricultural processes and the different stages of husbandry furnish a natural calendar, and "barley-harvest" was a great landmark of the Jewish farmer; and when such a man read in the sacred narrative that Saul's seven sons were put to death "in the beginning of 'barley-harvest,'" and that Rizpah watched over their bodies "from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven," 2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10—that is, until the commencement of the autumnal rains—the same idea was suggested to him as would be to us were we told that the poor mother kept her weary post from May till September.

RYE and OATS are not spoken of in Scripture, and to the present day the former is hardly known in Syria. In the Authorized Version "rye" is adopted in Exodus and Isaiah, but "fitches" are given in the text of Ezekiel, and "spelt" in the margin. It is well known that the greatest uncertainty exists regarding the native locality of rye, as of almost all the other cultivated cereals. The confusion of botanists has tended to make investigation worthless, for they have often not defined the species when speaking of localities. As a cultivated grain, rye is unknown in India. It was not cultivated in Egypt, nor by the Greeks, and it is almost certain that it was not known in Palestine, for it could only have been grown on the mountains in the north;

while oats also require a cooler climate than that of Syria.

It would seem that beans and lentiles, as well as spelt and millet, were used for bread.

GRAINVILLE (gran-veel'), JEAN BAPTISTE FRANÇOIS XAVIER COUSIN DE, born in 1746, was a French ecclesiastic, one of the most distinguished of the pupils of the abbé Sièyes, from whose philosophic views he afterward widely differed. He was very eloquent, but left the pulpit for the stage for some time. When the Revolution broke out, he opposed the atheistical opinions which became popular, and was thrown into prison, from whence he escaped by pretending to contract a civil marriage. He became a tutor; and vexed by the ill success of his poem, "Le Dernier Homme," he drowned himself in 1805.

GRAMBERG (gram'berg), KARL, P. W., a Biblical critic, was born at Seefeldt, in the duchy of Oldenburg, November 27, 1797. Having lost his father when he was but ten years of age, he was placed at Stoden, and afterward at Oldenburg, where he studied the classical and modern languages. Subsequently, with a view to preaching, he devoted himself to Hebrew and the Oriental tongues. The Old Testament became the chief subject of his examination. After being master of the school at Oldenburg, he became a professor of the first class at the royal institution of Züllichau, 1822. His death took place on the 29th March, 1830. His Biblical works are "A Sketch of the True Sources of the Book of Genesis," "A New Version of the Book of the Proverbs of Solomon," and a "Critical Commentary on the Creeds of the Old Testament." Gramberg was one of the free theologians of Germany. His critical abilities were not great, but he had a good knowledge of Hebrew, and occupied a respectable place among the critics of his day. Men like Gesenius and De Wette attached some importance to his opinions on the books of the Bible.

GRAMMA (gram'mah), GRAPHE (graph'ee). These were terms in the ancient Church, generally used to signify the Holy Scriptures, and sometimes applied to the Apostles' Creed, probably because it was entirely gathered from the Scriptures.

GRANADA (gra-nah'da), LUIS DE, born in 1505, was a Spanish Dominican prior, and obtained great renown as a preacher, which led to his going to Evora, in Portugal, on the invitation of its bishop. He was offered high promotion, but refused it, preferring to spend his life in the humble but zealous discharge of his duties as a Christian preacher. His devotional works are much valued by Roman Catholics. He died in 1588.

GRANARER (gran'a-rer), one who has charge of a granary, grange or barn of a monastery.

GRANARIUS (gran-ah're-us), the officer in a monastery who provided for the victualing of the house.

GRANARY (gran'a-re). See GRAIN.

GRANCRANELLE (gran-cran-el'le), an old French name for a certain antiphon in the office for the feast of the Virgin Mary.

GRANDIER (grong'dyay), URBAIN, curate and canon of Loudon, whose tragical end disgraced France in the seventeenth century, was born at Bouvère, near Sablé. On obtaining the living of Loudon, he became so popular as a preacher that the envy of the monks was excited against him. He was first accused of incontinency; but being acquitted, his enemies instigated some nuns to play the part of persons possessed, and in their convulsions to charge Grandier with being the cause of their visitation. This horrible though absurd charge was countenanced by Cardinal Richelieu, who had been persuaded that Grandier had satirized him; and he was tried, declared guilty and burnt alive, April 18, 1634.

GRANDMONT (grand'mont), ORDER OF, GRANDMONTINE (grand'mont-eeen), founded by Stephen of Auvergne, 1076, a mixed rule from the Benedictine regular canons and hermits. Habit, white tunic, black mantle and hood.

GRANGE, a barn or granary belonging to the lord of a manor or a monastery.

GRANT (grant), ASHBEL, M. D., an eminent American missionary, was born August 17, 1807, at Marshall, New York. In early life he studied medicine, married at the age of twenty, and settled at Braintrim, on the Susquehanna, but removed four years after to Utica, where as a physician he gained an extensive and lucrative practice. When the American Board of Foreign Missions met in this place in 1834, he became so deeply interested in the cause that he offered himself as a missionary to the Nestorians, and was directed to join Dr. Perkins, who was already on his way to Persia. He sailed from Boston May 11, 1835, and arrived at his future home, at Boonmiah, on the 27th of October. In studying the history of this interesting people he became impressed with the belief that the Nestorians were the remnants of the lost tribes of the children of Israel, and he entered upon the work of their restoration with great zeal. His character as a physician secured him the favor of the Persian governor, and the Nestorian bishop and priests received him with kindness. He opened a school, extended his work in every direction, visited the Nestorian patriarch Mar Shimon, and found on the sides of the rugged hills of Koordistan the "Waldenses of the East, the Protestants of Asia." He remained here five weeks, and gained what information he could, which was afterward considered sufficient to warrant the Board in establishing a mission among the mountains, of which he had the charge. Having made an extensive tour through the villages and district in 1842, and opened a school at Ashita in 1843, the mission was at length destroyed by the massacre of the Nestorians, led on by the barbarous Mohammed, pacha of Mosul, in alliance with the Koords. The missionaries fled for their lives, and Dr. Grant died at Mosul.

GRANTHAM (grant'am), THOMAS, a distinguished Baptist minister, was born in 1633. He was the person selected to present to King Charles II. the Confession of Faith drawn up by the Baptists, and also at a later period their remonstrance against persecution, both of which papers were favorably received by the king. In his disputations he displayed great logical skill, and he left behind him several religious works.

GRANVELLE (gran-vel'), ANTOINE PERRENOT, a distinguished cardinal and diplomatist of the sixteenth century, was born at Ornans, Burgundy, August 20, 1517. He pursued the study of law at Padua and theology at Louvain, became canon of Liege, bishop of Arras, went with his father to the Diet of Worms and Augsburg, and visited the Council of Trent, where he defended the rights of the emperor and attempted to array the council against France. In 1550 he became keeper of the great seal and counselor of state, and drew up the treaty of Passau in 1552. At the resignation of Charles V. he attached himself to his son Philip II., signed the treaty Chateau-Cambresis with France in 1559, and remained in the Netherlands as prime minister to Margaret of Parma, where he was active in persecuting the Protestants and aiding the Roman Catholics. He was finally created archbishop by the king and cardinal by the pope, and died at Madrid September 21, 1586. His letters and memoirs comprise eighty volumes.

GRASS, Heb. chazir, 1 Ki. xviii. 5; Job xl. 15; Ps. xxvii. 2; civ. 14, etc.; desha, the first shoots or tender spires, the soft young herbage, Deut. xxxii. 2; 2 Sam. xxiii. 4; Job vi. 5; Prov. xxvii. 25; lekesh, the grass which grows up after mowing, in some places still called "aftermath," or "fog," and in New England called "rowen," Amos vii. 1; chashash, dry grass; grass which has withered as it grew, for "hay" was not made in Palestine, Isa. v. 24; xxxiii. 11, A. V., "stubble;" in the New Testament, chortos, Matt. v. 30, etc.

As in Matt. vi. 30, where a lily is called "the grass of the field," it is evident that, like the Latin "gramen" and the English "grass," the Hebrew equivalent had a very extensive range, and was not restricted to the "grasses" (Gramineæ) of the botanist. These are themselves a very ample order, ranging from diminutive plants, like our own mouse-ear barley, to the bamboo which shoots up to a height of fifty or sixty feet in an Indian jungle, and including productions as various as the Arundo donax of Southern Europe, which furnishes the fisherman with his rod and the weaver with his "reed," the cereals which supply to all mankind the staff of life, and the sugar-cane which on the

But when we speak of grass we are usually thinking of the narrow blades, so thickset and tender, which form the sward on a meadow or the matchless turf on a lawn; or if we are thinking of a separate plant, it is a hollow glossy stem rising up from the midst of these spiry blades and throwing out similar leaves from its joints till it ends in blossoming spikelets, loose or more compact, which, when the flowering time is over, show the taper, corn-like seeds enclosed in the chaffy glumes, and which we destine as food for the cattle, even as we reserve the fruit of the cereal grasses as food for ourselves. The fescues, darnels and peas which clothe the meadows and build up the hayricks at home are pigmies, however, when compared with the grass "which grows for the cattle" of other lands; with the "tussac," for instance, whose enormous tufts form an inexhaustible supply to the herds, both amphibious and terrestrial, of the Falkland Isles, and the beautiful pampas-grass, under which the huntsman can ride and see high overhead its "plume of silvery feathers."

The imperfect enumeration which we possess of grasses native to Palestine is of less importance, as the Scriptural allusions may very well be understood without our being able to identify the species. The Psalmist wishes, Ps. cxxix. 6, that the haters of Zion may be "as the grass upon the house-tops, which withereth afore it groweth up;" or, as it should be rendered, "before it is plucked up;" and Isaiah, ch. xxxvii. 27, speaks of vanquished populations "as the grass of the field, as the grass on the house-tops, blasted before it be grown up." On the flat roofs, at the present day, any one may see grass which has sprung up in the rainy season withered away by the first weeks of sunshine.

"When I first came to reside in Jerusalem," says Dr. Thomson, "my house was connected with an ancient church, the roof of which was covered with a thick coat of grass. This being in the way of a man employed to repair my house, he actually set fire to it and burned it off; and I have seen others do the same thing without the slightest hesitation. Nor is there any danger; for it would require a large expense for fuel sufficient to burn the present city of Jerusalem." Indeed, nearer home we may often see grass, and even oats, springing up on the roof of a thatched cottage and a goat, peradventure, nibbling the herbage before it is withered. The dew "distilling" on the grass and the rain descending on the mown grass, or rather on the grass which has been close-browsed by the cattle, furnish the sacred poetry with a frequent and exquisite image, Deut. xxxii. 2; Ps. lxxii. 6; Prov. xix. 12; Mic. v. 7; and still more frequently does that emblem recur in which our fleeting generations are compared to the grass "which in the morning groweth up, and which in the evening is cut down and withereth," Ps. xc. 6, and elsewhere.

GRATIAN (gra'sh'an), or GRATIANUS (gra-she-ah'nus), son of Valentinian, was born in 359, and on the death of his father shared the empire of the West with his brother. He showed his valor in the defence he made against an incursion of the Allemans, and his noble generosity in selecting, as being the fittest person for the crisis, Theodosius the Spaniard, afterward the great, to be his colleague and emperor of the East, in room of his uncle Valens. Exchanging the duties of a military emperor for amusement, he lost the confidence of his people, and was murdered. Gratian gave the final blow to the paganism of the Roman empire, overthrowing its altars and confiscating its property. Though not a Christian, he was favorably disposed toward it, and was the friend of Ambrose, bishop of Milan. He died 383.

GRATIAN'S DECRETAL. Gratian was a Bolognese or Camaldulensian monk, born in the close of the eleventh century. In the convent of St. Felix he wrote his "Decretum," which he sent to the pope by the hands of a priest, who professed to be the author. The fraud having been ascertained, the pope made him bishop of Chinsi. His "Decretum" is the foundation of the canon law. It is divided into three parts, the first of which is devoted to the subjects and the authority of law, and bears on the appointment and ordering of the clergy. The second part discusses the application of law to practical cases, and the third part deals with the liturgy. Gratian did much to give currency to the false decretals, and he helped forward the papal claims and the demands of the clergy to be free from trial in civil courts for civil offences. Before the time of Gratian canon law was only incidentally taught in schools, but the manner in which he systematized his collection of decrees made his work a popular text-book. Pius IV. adopted means to verify the text of Gratian, and in 1580 the revision was completed. Various editions of the "Decretum" have been published, and it forms a valuable authority for the study of Romish ecclesiastical law.

GRAUL (grawl), CARL, D.D., a distinguished German divine and missionary, was born at Worlitz, near Dessau, February 6, 1814. He studied theology at Leipsic, was tutor to an English family residing in Italy, returned to Dessau, and was appointed director of the Missionary Society of Dresden in 1844. The period of his management here was one of unprecedented prosperity, and the society, from being a mere local organization, became the general Lutheran missionary society of Continental Europe. He was particularly interested in the Tamuls of South India, visited the country, studied their language and literature and published the result in three volumes, at Leipsic, in 1856. In opposition to the general views of missionaries, Graul was favorable to tolerating the differences of caste among the converts of Christianity, and published a defence of his views in English at Madras, and in German at Leipsic, in 1861. He died November 10, 1864.

cles of sand, but often intermixed with them. The word is used, Prov. xx. 17 and Lam. iii., etc., in this sense.

GRAVES, RICHARD, D.D., born in 1763, a very eminent Irish clergyman, distinguished for his ability, eloquence and piety. At an early age he obtained a Fellowship in Trinity College, Dublin, and after some years was appointed dean of Ardagh, and at the same time regius professor of divinity in his university. He is the author of "Lectures on the Four last Books of the Pentateuch, designed to show the Divine Origin of the Jewish Religion chiefly from Internal Evidence; in Three Parts," and "An Essay on the Character of the Apostles and Evangelists, designed to Prove that they were not Enthusiasts." The former of these may still be consulted with advantage, although on many points it is necessarily behind the requirements of the present day. He died in 1829. He also wrote a polemic treatise entitled "Calvinistic Predestination Repugnant to the Scriptures."

GRAVING (grav'ing). See ENGRAVING.

GRAY, JAMES, D.D., an eminent minister of the Associate Reformed Church, was born December 25, 1770, in Ireland. He graduated at the college of Glasgow in 1793, studied theology under Rev. John Rogers, and sailed for America in 1797.

After spending some time in preaching the gospel at Washington, New York, he was called to the Spruce Street Church in Philadelphia. His activity and influence aided greatly in establishing the theological seminary of the Associate Reformed Church in New York. He also took a prominent part in organizing the Philadelphia Bible Society in 1808, in which for a long time he discharged the duties of corresponding secretary. In connection with Dr. S. B. Wylie he was afterward interested in a classical academy which was held in high repute. He spent his last years in Baltimore, devoting his attention to certain points in theology, and died at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, September 20, 1824. His chief work was "The Mediatorial Reign of the Son of God."

GRAY, ROBERT, born in 1762, was bishop of Bristol during the great riots there in 1831, when the episcopal palace was burnt down, on which occasion he was conspicuous for his cool courage. He was the author of "A Key to the Old Testament and Apocrypha; or, An Account of their Several Books, their Contents and Authors, and of the Time in which they were Respectively Written;" "The Connection between the Sacred Writings and the Literature of Jewish and Heathen Authors, Particularly that of the Classical Ages, Illustrated Principally with a View to Evidence in Confirmation of the Truth of Revealed Religion." The former work had for many years a considerable reputation. He died in 1834.

GRAY, THOMAS, was born in 1716 in London, an English poet of high reputation. Carefully tended by an excellent mother, the youth was placed at Eton, where his maternal uncle was a teacher. There he formed the acquaintance of Horace Walpole, whose friendship was valuable to him through life. Took the degree of B.C.L. at Cambridge, where he settled permanently, giving himself up to literature, first at Petersburg, and then at Pembroke Hall. In 1751 appeared the poem which has made his name immortal, the "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard." Its popularity was immediate and universal, and Gray took his place among the great writers of the day, so that on the death of Cibber, in 1757, he was offered, but declined, the post of laureate. In 1768 he was appointed professor of modern history at Cambridge, the duties of which were partly discharged by proxy, and he resigned the chair in 1771. He was buried in the little churchyard at Stoke Pogis, and a monument was erected to his memory in the neighboring demesne. He died in 1771.

GREAT WEEK, holy week, or the last week in Lent; so called in the East.

GREATER ANTIPHONS, anthems sung before and after the Magnificat during the last nine days of Advent.

GREATER EXCOMMUNICATION, the shutting out of a person from the fellowship of the Church and the enjoyment of the sacraments. In the Romish Church this sentence falls on those who disobey the commands of the pope, or who refuse to submit to certain points of discipline. Before it can be executed the delinquent must receive three notices and a written sentence from a bishop, and is deprived of all advantages except hearing the word. Absolution can only be granted by the authority that inflicted the sentence. Formerly, in the days of papal power, excommunication of a sovereign freed the subjects from allegiance and obedience to his laws. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

GREAVES (greevz) [Hebrew mitzhal, Greek knemides, Latin ocrea]. All the ancient versions and Josephus agree in regarding the Hebrew term so translated in the Authorized Version, 1 Sam. xvii. 6, as a defensive armor for the leg. It is to be distinguished from seon, which was a sort of military shoe like the Roman caliga, and was probably similar to the knemis of the Greeks or the greaves of the Assyrians, as represented in their sculptures, which not only protected the leg, but covered the upper part of the foot, like our gaiters. See ARMS, ARMOR.

GREAVES, THOMAS, a great Oriental scholar. He printed observations upon the Persian version of the Pentateuch, and also notes on the Persian interpretation of the Gospels. At the time of his death he was engaged upon a refutation of Mohammedanism from the Koran, adducing arguments from the book itself. He died in 1676.

GREECE [Hellas in Greek, Javan in Hebrew]. Greece is sometimes described as a country containing the four provinces of Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia or Hellas and Peloponnesus, but more commonly the two latter alone are understood to be comprised in it. We will consider it as composed of Hellas and Peloponnesus, though there seems to be no question but that the four provinces were originally inhabited by people of similar language and origin, and whose religion and manners were alike. Except upon its northern boundary, it is surrounded on all sides by the sea, which intersects it in every direction, and naturally gives to its population seafaring habits. It is also a very mountainous country, abounding in eminences of great height, which branch out and intersect the land from its northern to its southern extremity, and form the natural limits of many of the provinces into which it is divided. At the isthmus of Corinth it is separated into its two great divisions, of which the northern was called Græcia extra Peloponnesum, and the southern the Peloponnesus, now called the Morea. The mountain and sea are thus the grand natural characteristics of Greece, and had a very considerable influence on the character of its inhabitants, as is evidenced in the religion, poetry, history and manners of the people. The country has been always famous for the temperature of its climate, the salubrity of its air and the fertility of its soil.

Of the history of Greece before the first recorded Olympiad, B. C. 776, little that can be depended on is known. There is no doubt but that from very remote periods of antiquity, long prior to this date, the country had been inhabited, but facts are so intermingled with legend and fable in the traditions which have come down to us of these ancient times, that it is impossible with certainty to distinguish the false from the true. The periods at which some of the noted settlements are said in profane writers to have been made in Greece are of a very remote date, while they presuppose still earlier settlements of the country by tribes whose names are wholly lost, and they derive very considerable confirmation from a chapter in the book of Genesis which gives us in a few verses more trustworthy information about the early distribution of the nations of the earth than we derive from any other sources. It is from Javan, Gen. x. 2, one of the sons of Japheth, that the Hebrew name of Greece is derived, Isa. lxvi. 19. This Javan had four sons, Elisha, Tarshish, Kittim and Dodanim, and by these we are told that "the isles of the Gentiles were divided in their lands," Gen. x. 4, 5. By the Hebrew word for "isles," 'im, is meant not merely what we call islands, but also those lands lying to the westward of Judæa which were reached by sea from that country. This description specially points out Greece, the first great land reached by sea from the coasts of Asia after penetrating through the archipelago of islands studding the Ægean Sea. This western migration of the grandsons of Noah with their families is further fixed by the circumstances related in Gen. xi. 1-8 as having taken place subsequently to the building of Babel and the confusion of languages. The building of Babel is usually placed from about B. C. 2230 to B. C. 2247, which agrees quite sufficiently with the early dates claimed for the first settlements in Greece. Henceforward we meet with no reference, even of a general kind, to Greece in the Bible until we find special allusions to it by name in the prophets as a slaveholding country intimately connected by commerce with Tyre, as destined after its conquest by Alexander to form the third of the four great monarchies of the ancient world, and as foreordained to receive from Jerusalem the blessedness of the new covenant which God was to establish with the Gentiles, Ezek. xxvii. 13; Dan. viii. 21; Isa. lxvi. 19.

The earliest accounts of the inhabitants of Greece represent them in a very barbarous state, little if at all superior to the condition of those whom we call savages at the present day. The usual causes produced this great degeneracy from the civilization which they left behind them in the part of Asia from which they migrated. Being, as the early settlers in most countries are, of a wild and adventurous character, cut off by the sea from any frequent communication with the old country, thrown upon a land which at first afforded abundance of food to the hunter, with little necessity for application to the laborious life of the husbandman, with a religion even then corrupted from the pure theism of Noah, it was not to be wondered at that the men who aided in the building of Babel, and who partook of the civilization of the world at the period subsequent to the Flood, degenerated into the wild hunters who forgot the arts of husbandry, and where hunting failed had recourse to the berries of the woods for their food. When their numbers increased, they would encroach upon each other's hunting-grounds, and hence tribal wars, such as we read of among the Indians of our western territories, would be the chronic state of the rude inhabitants of primitive Greece.

The East, from which they originally came, restored civilization to the degenerate inhabitants of Greece. From Asia Minor, Phœnicia and Egypt come laws and letters, and with them the forms of idolatrous worship into which the learned priesthood of these lands had perverted the monotheism of Noah. We now find great names arising, and preserved in the legendary history of Greece, in connection with whom it is impossible not to suppose that along with an admixture of fable there is a considerable amount of truth related. The Egyptian Inachus founds the kingdom of Argos about B. C. 1856. From the same country Cærops leads a colony, B. C. 1556, settles in a barren promontory, where he builds a city, called at first Cæropia, after him, but since known by the world-renowned name of Athens or Athens, from the Egyptian goddess Neith. At a later period from the same land comes Danaus, who expels the royal house of Argos, and gives his name to the inhabitants of Southern Greece. About B. C. 1550 the Phœnician Cadmus, in consequence, as is supposed, of political troubles in Palestine, occupied Bœotia, founded the celebrated city of Thebes, and gave to Greece those letters which the genius of her sons was afterward to make so renowned. And the Phrygian Pelops, about B. C. 1283, became monarch of the southern half of Greece, thence called after him the Peloponnesus. Amid the mist of legend and fable stand out these great names, some of the few historic standpoints in times when almost all is shadowy and fleeting, while all alike, legend and fable and history, have been depicted by the master hand of Homer. During this period of mingled legend and history, Greece would appear to have begun to exercise a foreign influence. The expedition of the Argonauts about B. C. 1263, and the siege of Troy about B. C. 1193, for both of which there would appear to be historical foundation, attest this. During these early periods, the Greeks exchanged monarchical for republican forms of government. With the first recorded Olympiad, B. C. 776, the period of real Grecian history, as distinguished from legend, begins. From this time until the end of that generation of men who accompanied Alexander to the Persian war—i. e., until B. C. 300—is the period during which Greece occupied a great leading position as a political power. Its history during this period has been well divided by Mr. Grote into six departments, the first of which may be looked upon as a period of preparation for the five following, which exhaust the free life of collective Hellas.

1. Period from 776 B. C. to 560 B. C., the accession of Peisistratus at Athens and of Croesus in Lydia.
2. From the accession of Peisistratus and Croesus to the repulse of Xerxes from Greece.
3. From the repulse of Xerxes to the close of the Peloponnesian war and overthrow of Athens.
4. From the close of the Peloponnesian war to the battle of Leuktra.
5. From the battle of Leuktra to that of Chœronea.
6. From the battle of Chœronea to the end of the generation of Alexander.

It is to this period that we find the greater number of the references to Greece in the Hebrew prophets to refer. The first historical notice of Greece, as the earliest mention of its settlement, is made in Scripture. The prophet Joel, about B. C. 800, speaks of Greece as a great slave-mart, to which the Tyrian merchants brought their captives from Judah and Jerusalem for sale, Joel iii. 6. This was the earliest introduction of the Jews to a people with whom, and with whose customs and language, they were afterward to be intimately connected through the conquest of Alexander and the establishment of the Grecian empire in Asia. We thus find Greece distinguished at its earliest historic period as a great slaveholding country. The reference to Greece in Ezekiel, somewhat over one hundred years later than that in Joel, brings forward Greece in conjunction with other countries as a trading country exchanging the merchandise of Tyre for slaves and brazen vessels, Ezek. xxvii. 13. In Joel we saw Greece purchasing Jewish slaves from Tyre; in Ezekiel we find Greece bringing in her own ships to Tyre slaves and brazen vessels, and receiving instead the merchandise of Tyre. Greek slaves were highly prized in the East; and reference may perhaps here be made to the workmanship of brass for which Corinth afterward at least was so famous. The reference in Daniel to Greece is prophetic, Dan. vii. 6; viii. 5, 21. During the reign of Belshazzar, king of Babylon, he sees his famous vision of the four great ancient monarchies, of which the first, or Babylonian, was then verging to its close. Four beasts represent the four kingdoms, of which the four-winged leopard represents Greece. In another dream he sees a fuller vision of the second and third of these kingdoms engaged in the deadly struggle which resulted in the overthrow of the Persian monarchy by the Grecian Alexander; in this a he-goat represents Greece. The representations in both these dreams are admirably descriptive of the rise of the Grecian empire. The four-winged leopard, the great he-goat from the West that touched not the ground, and ran upon the ram in the fury of his might, marvelously represent that wonderful power which under the fierce young Macedonian, with the rapid flight of the bird, the ferocity of the leopard and the strength of the horned goat, rushed from Europe upon the East, and within the short space of six years subdued the Medes and Persians, overran Babylon and Egypt, carried its victorious arms to the confines of India, and only ceased to conquer when there was no enemy left to subdue. It was indeed a prophecy worthy to be shown to Alexander, as Josephus tells us that it was. The political history of Greece from this period ceases to be of much interest. We next find Rome with her usual policy siding with Greece in her efforts to throw off the yoke of Macedon, delivering the power which invoked her assistance from the Macedonian yoke, only to bring her under her own; until, B. C. 146, Greece is declared a province of the all-embracing Roman empire, under the name of Achaia, and from thenceforward ceases to exercise any independent political action.

The influence of Greece upon the religious destinies of the human race was of the most important kind. It exercised this influence chiefly in two ways: first, in stirring up the human mind from barbarous stagnation and brutal ignorance, and disciplining and exercising the mental powers; secondly, in providing a language more capable of giving expression to thought than any other tongue of man, spreading this language over the surface of the civilized earth, and even into barbarous lands, affording thus a channel for the labors of the first Christian missionaries, a mode of communication between the scattered Christian churches, a depository for the inspired writings which were to be for all time the rule of faith to the Christian world. In this light the influence of Greece upon the Christian religion was of the most important kind. The Babylonian empire rose, conquered and fell, and left no impress upon the human mind; the Persian empire was much the same; the Grecian in turn rose, conquered and fell, but her living spirit survived the overthrow of the political body, and, as though freed from an encumbrance, worked more effectually, when under the dominion of Rome, upon the human intellect than she had done when at the zenith of her power. Judaism was meant for one nation, and the language which preserved its history and laws was confined to that nation, and died out even among them; the gospel was meant for all nations, it consequently required a universal language, and such a language Greece nursed and gave to the world.

The influence which had this most important effect upon the gospel of Jesus Christ was secured by Greece chiefly in these three ways—viz., the progress of her arms, the diffusion of her colonies and the power of her literature. The three combined to stamp Grecian intellect and the Grecian language upon the human race. The Persian invasion and its repulse first raised Greece into prominent political notice. The battles of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis and Platæa spread throughout the East the knowledge that a western state was able to compete successfully in arms with the masters of Asia. A century and a half elapses, and the same men of Greece who had repelled Xerxes from Europe cross the Hellespont into the heart of Persia, at Granicus, Issus and Arbela overthrow its armies, and pass onward, still in the flush of conquest, to the Indus. The Grecian empire in Asia is founded, and secures for Greece the influence which successful arms always procure for those who wield them. The political wisdom of the conquerors seems to have been as great as their discipline and courage in arms. No stronger proof can be given of this than the fact that during the twenty years of war which ensued among the generals of Alexander after his death—when, in the language of Daniel, the great horn was broken, and four lesser horns sprung up in its room—no attempt was made by the conquered nations to throw off the Grecian yoke. They acquiesced in it as though it had been a power established from ancient times.

The colonies of Greece were another means by which she spread her influence and language very wide. The overcrowding of a narrow country by an increasing population, political troubles at home, the spirit of enterprise and the facilities created by nautical pursuits and the commercial habit made Greece a great colonizing country for centuries before it was known as a military power of a first class. And the habits of the country made Grecian colonization to be of a peculiar kind, and of a kind which secured for the mother-country a permanent influence. The Greeks seldom went far inland with their colonies. Islands or the sea-coasts of continents were the localities which they chiefly selected. Keeping up by this means through their shipping a constant intercourse with each other and with Greece, they preserved a unity, though scattered, which vastly increased their influence, and they preserved their language very much in the same condition in which they brought it from Greece. Sicily is said to have been colonized from Greece so early as

B. C. 1293; somewhat later we have the Æolians colonizing the coasts of Asia from the Propontis to the river Hermus; about B. C. 804 we have Attica sending her surplus population to Chios and Samos and the coasts of Asia south of the Hermus, and founding great cities, such as Ephesus and Miletus; we have the Dorians and other Grecian people, at various times, colonizing Caria and Rhodes, the northern shores of the Ægean, the great island of Cyprus, Cyrene, and other great towns in Africa, and the greater part of the coast of Italy; and in B. C. 332 Alexander founded the city of Alexandria, which proved, as he anticipated it would, the commercial capital of the world.

But it was by her literature that Greece exercised her chief influence upon the human mind. Receiving at first her own recovered civilization and letters from the East, she matured and gave to the world a language of unequalled power and a literature which has to this day charmed the imagination and exercised the intellect of the most cultivated nations of the earth. With far greater truth than can be said of any other language, ancient or modern, the Greek may be said to have been in the days of the apostles a universal language. From the Adriatic to the Euphrates and the Nile men spoke and thought in the Grecian tongue. Asia was covered with Grecian cities, and where the armies of Alexander had marched, there they brought and left the knowledge of their majestic tongue. Throughout the Roman empire, while the Latin tongue was maintained in the administration of civil and military government, Greek was the natural idiom of science and letters. In Rome itself, the chief seat of the Latin tongue, the senate resounded with Greek debates, and Roman satirists complain that the Greek is more used than the Latin tongue. Even among the barbarous Gauls, unsubdued by Rome, Grecian letters had found their way, and the Macedonian speech was heard among the Indians and Persians. When St. Paul writes epistles for the information and edification of the Christian churches, it is in this tongue he writes. Every one would look for Greek in his letters to the cities of Corinth and Thessalonica, where it was their native tongue; but it is in the same language that he writes to Rome, Ephesus and Galatia. In this tongue Mark writes his Roman Gospel and Peter addresses the churches scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia, 1 Pet. i. 1, and James communicates with the twelve tribes scattered abroad, James i. 1. Among the foreign Jews of the Roman empire there can be little if any question that Greek was the spoken language. They consulted the oracles of God in the Septuagint version. How far the Greek language was used among the Jews in Palestine is still a question among learned men. Different opinions are held and ably maintained, with much show of evidence for each; but that the Grecian language was cultivated to a very considerable extent among them is denied by no competent scholar. Some think that throughout Judæa scarcely any language was heard except the Grecian. Some think that throughout the country both Hebrew (the Aramaic) and Greek were well understood and spoken by all classes of the people, the first being that preferred in familiar intercourse, while the latter was the language of literature, of instruction and of public life. Others again hold that the Hebrew was still the prevailing, most generally used and best-beloved language of the people of Palestine, formed the staple of their vernacular tongue, while the knowledge of Greek was chiefly confined to the higher and more educated classes. The opinion we are inclined to adopt is this: we should say that Hebrew was well understood, commonly used and most loved in Jerusalem and its neighborhood, while the knowledge of Greek was there also generally spread; while on the other hand Greek was probably the prevailing language among all classes in Samaria and Galilee, and Hebrew less generally understood and spoken. There are obvious causes for the distinction here suggested. Jerusalem was the headquarters of Judaism, where men would cling most strongly to its distinctive language; it was, besides, as a rule, peopled by inhabitants of unmixed Jewish descent. On the other hand, Samaria was peopled chiefly from districts wholly unacquainted with the Hebrew language, 2 Ki. xvii. 24, and ever prone to adopt foreign and Grecian customs in preference to those of the Jews. Galilee, too, was on every side surrounded and penetrated by a Gentile and Greek-speaking population, from which Judæa was in a great measure free, and which would almost inevitably, during a long course of centuries, make the prevailing Greek tongue familiar to all classes.

A GREEK TOMB.—See GREEK ARCHITECTURE.

That Hebrew was commonly spoken at Jerusalem is certain. The Galilean Peter, or, as some think, the writer of Acts, calls it "their proper tongue," Acts i. 19; when Paul addresses an audience at Jerusalem he gains the more attention because he speaks in the Hebrew tongue, Acts xxii. 2; and in the siege of Jerusalem by Titus the negotiations between the Romans and besieged are carried on through an interpreter, and the language in general use among the besieged seems to have been the Hebrew, as may be seen in Josephus. On the other hand, an audience at Jerusalem was capable of understanding Greek, for that addressed by Paul in Hebrew had expected to be addressed in Greek, Acts xxii. 2. But while Hebrew may be said to have been the prevailing language at Jerusalem, Greek may, we think, be allowed to have been much more the prevailing tongue in Samaria and Galilee. It is now generally allowed that the acquaintance of the apostles with the Greek tongue was not the effect of miracle, but was acquired in the usual way. We have four of them, Peter, James, John and Jude, writing in Greek in such a way as shows their perfect familiarity with the language. The only natural inference is that they had learned it as we all learn our native tongue, by hearing it generally spoken around them. But these apostles were Galileans, and men in a humble rank of life, and from this it would appear that Greek was commonly spoken by the humbler classes in Galilee. With this view of the ordinary language of the people of Galilee, and with the fact that a very large proportion of our Lord's hearers, when he delivered in Galilee the sermon on the mount, were either Galileans or belonged to cities and districts which spoke Greek and did not speak Hebrew, Matt. iv. 25, we have little reason to doubt but that this famous sermon was spoken in the Greek tongue. Spoken in Galilee, and with of course Galileans forming the majority of his hearers, if it were spoken in Greek it argues a familiar acquaintance with Greek on the part of the Galileans. Again, while we have seen in Josephus' narrative of the Jewish war strong evidence that Hebrew was the prevailing language at Jerusalem and that generally spoken, this, so far as we know, does not appear from his account of the war when it was waged in Galilee. Upon these various occasions we are not told of the Galileans using the Hebrew language or negotiating with the Romans through an interpreter, as we find repeatedly stated when the scene of the war changes to Jerusalem. The inference is that the Galileans and Romans had a common tongue, which could only be the Greek. We thus find the wide influence of Greece upon the human mind in her giving to men in the apostolic age a common tongue, one far more universally used than any other then or since.

In this Greek tongue men of Grecian birth gave to the world works which are to this day models in every branch of literature, and which had the most powerful effect in rousing, disciplining and maturing the faculties of the human mind. Greece, after its political overthrow, was the school of the human intellect—the subtle power which penetrated a stagnant, inert mass and sent through it the pulse of thought. When we enumerate in poetry and the drama the names of Hesiod, Homer, Alcæus, Sappho, Æschylus, Pindar, Euripides, Sophocles, Aristophanes; in history, the names of Herodotus, Thucydides and Xenophon; in legislation, the names of Lycurgus and Solon; in oratory, those of Isocrates, Demosthenes and Æschines; in philosophy, those of Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato and Aristotle,—we have mentioned the names of men whose works exercised an incalculable influence on the human mind in their own and in every succeeding time, who, in the words of Grote, overshot their own age and became the teachers of posterity. To their works, too, we owe the perfection and preservation of the Greek tongue, just as we owe the perfection and preservation of our English language to our great writers, above all to our translation of the Bible and the works of Shakespeare. Whoever wishes to see some of the notices which various Greek writers have taken of Jewish history will find an account of them in Josephus.

So widely prevailing in the apostles' days was Grecian influence and the Grecian language that Greeks in the New Testament becomes equivalent or almost so to "Gentiles" in the Old Testament. As the Jewish prophet divided mankind into Jews and Gentiles, so the Christian apostle divided it into Jews and Greeks. The name Greek is given not only to the inhabitants of the Grecian cities of Macedon or Achaia, but sometimes to the whole of mankind as distinguished from the Jews, and sometimes to civilized man as distinguished from barbarians. Thus, all the dwellers in Asia (Proconsular Asia) are divided into the two divisions of Jews and Greeks, Acts xix. 10; xx. 18-21. The multitudinous nations among whom the scattered Jews were dispersed in every land are all called Greeks by the Jews, John vii. 35. "Greeks" is used as synonymous with "ethnon," the Greek translation of the wide-embracing Hebrew term "goim," Acts xiv. 1, 2; xviii. 4, 6. In the matter of language mankind is divided into two divisions, Greeks and barbarians, Rom. i. 14. Greeks and Jews are said to compose all to whom Paul had preached up to the time when he wrote his Epistle to the Romans, Rom. i. 16; ii. 9, 10. When Paul would enumerate all the divisions into which mankind could be distinguished, he only adds the barbarian and Scythian to the Jew and the Greek, Col. iii. 11. In his Epistle to the Corinthians he makes the threefold division of mankind to be Jews, Greeks and believers, 1 Cor. x. 32; while elsewhere he makes the Jew and the Greek to embrace absolutely men over the whole face of the earth, Rom. iii. 9; x. 12; 1 Cor. i. 21-23.

The influence of Greece upon the propagation of the gospel was of the most important kind, but in its preparation of the human mind for the gospel that influence was of an indirect rather than of a direct kind. The idolatrous yet beautiful system of Grecian mythology, and even its philosophy, did not of themselves create a disposition to receive the doctrines of the gospel. St. Paul complains that the preaching of the cross was to the Greeks foolishness, as it was to the Jews a stumbling-block, 1 Cor. i. 23; and it required the grace and power of God accompanying the preaching of his word to overcome the one as well as the other, 1 Cor. i. 24. But in an indirect way the influence of Greece upon the world produced, under God's providence, results of the most important kind on the success of the gospel. We have already referred to its influence in quickening the intellectual faculties of the human mind, and taking away the dull, dead, uninquiring disposition which is one of the characteristics of barbarism, and which offers an inert opposition of the strongest kind to the reception of truth. The value of this may be estimated by the fact that, while the gospel had indeed its triumph among barbarous people, Rom. i. 14, it was among the more civilized communities that it had its greatest victories—in cities, rather than in the rural districts, Acts xiv. 1; xvii. 4, 12; xviii. 4. But it was more than all in its providing a universal medium of communication through at least the Roman world that Greece exercised an incalculable influence in the propagation of the gospel. The old theory of the gift of tongues, Acts ii. 4, being for the purpose of enabling the apostles to preach to men of various languages, is now very much given up by the most orthodox commentators. The places where we read chiefly of the gift of tongues were such as it was least required in for this purpose, Acts ii. 1-4; x. 46; xix. 6; 1 Cor. xiv. In none of these places are we told that the miraculous gift of tongues was for the purpose of instructing the hearers, but that it was a sign attesting the truth of the gospel. In some cases at least the speakers with tongues did not understand what they said, 1 Cor. xiv. 13, 19. The truth seems to be that God, who prefers ordinary methods to miracle where miracle is not required—though where it is required he works it with a lavish hand—had in the spread of the Greek tongue provided the necessary vehicle for the propagation of the gospel. Grecian colonization, victories and literature provided this required medium, as Roman authority and law had provided a great field through which the gospel took its free course. Accordingly, we find our Lord selecting as his apostles men whose use of the Greek language proves it to have been their mother-tongue, acquired according to the natural laws of lingual acquisition. From Greek-speaking Galilee the first Christian missionaries are chosen. And so we find through the book of Acts, and from the Epistles, that wherever these men and others like them went, they found a Greek-speaking population, to whom in Greek they preached the gospel, and to whom in Greek they addressed those letters which were for their instruction, Acts xiv. 1; xvii. 4; xviii. 4; xix. 17; the Epistles generally. The empires of the world unconsciously perform their part in bringing about God's will. Babylon and Persia both did theirs before Greece, Isa. x. 6, 7, but Greece performed a far more important part. It is no wonder, then, that before it arose on the political theatre it occupied a prominent place in the predicted plans of God, Isa. lxvi. 19; Dan. viii. 5-21; Zech. ix. 13. Its part was to raise the human mind into activity, and to provide a general medium of communication, and it did both. The importance of its work may, we think, be seen from this fact, that outside the circle of Grecian influence and the Grecian tongue the gospel of Christ did not prevail in the apostolic age. Beyond the Roman empire, through which we have seen that the Grecian language was known, the gospel did not take vigorous root. Doubtless many of the apostles and others went outside of the Roman empire and preached and won souls to Christ; traces of their work remain to this day in India and elsewhere; but they did not overthrow heathenism in those regions; it remained and remains unshaken.

GREEK ARCHITECTURE. It has been held that the wooden hut is the universal model from which all the different styles of architecture have been derived, but an analysis of styles will show that this could not have been the case. It is impossible to mistake the objects which served as the early models for Chinese buildings. In them the tent is the object of imitation, and this is quite in character with the primitive habits of the Chinese, who, like all the Tartars, were nomads, encamping with their flocks for many ages before they were gathered into cities. Even yet their cities present the appearance of a vast encampment, and the character of the buildings seems to indicate such a weakness of construction as will not allow a number of stories above each other. Nevertheless, the hut was the model of all the styles which prevailed in Egypt and Greece. The Greeks, working upon this, transferred to stone the forms of an assemblage of carpentry, a construction which gave birth to the members of the orders of architecture which are an ornament to our buildings to the present day. It has been held, and no doubt with justice, that the style originated when men were rural in their habits, and when timber was rudely driven into the earth to support those coverings which men required for protection from the elements. Trees were thicker toward the roots than at the top, and so columns diminished as they ascended. Bases were introduced, no doubt, as a means of preserving the timber from the effects of the earth and damp. The architrave or horizontal member obviously declares its origin, as it was the great beam placed horizontally to sustain the lower edge of the roof. The joists of the ceiling lay upon the architrave, the space in height which they occupied being called the frieze, and the ends of these joists, in the Doric order, were sculptured, and designated triglyphs, or channels, from the character of their ornamentation. The space between these rafters was left open for a long time, but in time they were filled up; and the rafters of the roof, by their projection, delivered the rain from the walls. The slope or elevation of the rafters made the pediment or the gable, which, of course, was regulated as to its height by the inclination of the roof.

It is perhaps impossible to ascertain with precision the date of the origin of architecture in Greece. In the age of Homer it does not appear that the different orders had been distinguished from each other. Progress in styles is usually slow, and utility and comfort are of more importance in the beginning than forms of beauty. It is beyond doubt, however, that the Doric is the oldest of the Grecian orders, but the date of its invention is unknown, and it is probable that the forms of this order became fixed into a definite style only in process of time. Popularly it has been attributed to Dorus, the son of Helen, and the king of Achaia and Peloponnesus. He built a temple to Juno at Argos, and the name may have been derived from the style adopted in that edifice; but others contend that it was in use among the Dorians, and from them it was carried over other parts of Greece. One fact, however, is certain, that by the time of Alexander the Great the three orders had been formally recognized as distinct from each other, and they had been brought to great perfection. Many causes had combined to bring this about. The love of liberty, of country, of education and ambition, had made Athens the home of science and art. There was a wonderful outgrowth of talent in Greece in the period preceding the Peloponnesian war. It was in this age that the Greeks commenced the rebuilding of the temples that had been destroyed during the Persian war; and after the flight of the general of Xerxes, and the victory of Themistocles, the fallen edifices began to rise in renewed beauty, and the city of Athens itself was rebuilt. The age was the period of a pure and grand style of architecture and of great advances in art, as may be seen by the remnants of sculpture which have been preserved to modern times, and which, as in the case of the Elgin marbles, present a beauty and perfection which modern genius seeks in vain to approach. It was then that the Parthenon was erected on its lofty seat at Athens, and it is unquestionably the finest specimen of Doric architecture, if all the details be considered, that science has ever produced. It was dedicated to Minerva as a testimony to her virgin purity, and the style was worthy of the idea that it symbolized. Much about the same time, the Ionic forms were reduced to order. It is uncertain whether the Ionic originated among the Greeks on the west of the Ægean Sea, and was carried over to Ionia, or among the Ionians themselves. At any rate, it is certain that in the climate of Ionia it assumed a form of rare delicacy, losing much of solidity, but becoming wondrously beautiful, slender and refined. As the Parthenon is the consummation of the Doric, so the temple of Minerva Polias at Athens is the embodiment of Ionic taste. In Egyptian architecture it may be seen that the capitals of the heavy columns which adorn the massive structures on the Nile are adorned with the leaves of the lotus plant. Callimachus is said to have substituted the leaves of the acanthus, and thus introduced the luxuriant forms of the Corinthian capital. The tale which records the reputed incident which led to the use of this capital is well known, but it is without a basis in history. A nurse who had carried a number of objects to the grave of a young virgin, because she esteemed them, had placed them in a basket covered by a tile. It happened that the basket had been left on an acanthus plant, and on the growth of the leaves they were observed to cover the basket in a graceful manner; and the angles of the tile being covered with the leaves in the manner of "volutes," the idea was caught by Callimachus, who, from the basket and the acanthus, constructed a capital which afterward took its place as a member of the order which, thus originating at Corinth, was called by this name. The lightness of the different members of the Corinthian order and the leafy forms of its capitals have rendered it peculiarly subject to the ravages of time. When the Romans laid their heavy hand on Greece, the beauty of the Corinthian temples attracted them, and their cupidity led them to commit great depredations in places which yielded to their arms. Few specimens of the Corinthian order date so far back as the time of Alexander the Great.

When the Greeks passed over into Sicily and Italy, they carried their architecture along with them, and the remains of the great Doric structures which they erected in Southern Italy remain to the present day—as at Paestum—to testify to the splendor of their conceptions and the energy of their power. The Pelasgi, in their western emigration, carried their architecture with them into Etruria; and as the Doric only prevailed at the time, the forms of the order appeared in the edifices of their new homes. Modifications were soon introduced, such as a base to the columns; and as the Romans took their architecture from the Tuscans, under their name, it is actually the case that the Roman Tuscan is really Doric, but changed from its original state and purity. To the Etrurians the Romans were indebted for all their early works of any magnitude, but their structures were rude and utterly wanting in the grace and finish which characterized the temples of Greece. Many of their palaces and temples were only covered with clay and straw, and it is a memorable fact that marble and slavery entered Rome together, under the rule of Augustus, who is complimented by Livy as the founder or restorer of temples. His patronage brought the most eminent Greeks of his day to Rome, and art soon progressed, and the city presented a new character. Under his reign Vitruvius wrote his work on architecture, and it is the only ancient text-book on that art which has come down to modern times. Under Agrippa, the son-in-law of Augustus, the Pantheon was built—one of the most magnificent specimens of Roman grandeur. He also constructed a number of baths, fountains and temples, but the style rapidly declined, and the Romans never succeeded in nationalizing the Greek forms in their purity. A gradual decay of style became apparent in the edifices after the time of Trajan and Hadrian, and when the seat of empire was removed to Byzantium, the decline was very rapid; and thus Rome continued until it fell a prey to the unrestrained fury of the Visigoths. The edifices which they afterward raised were constructed from the materials of buildings which they had destroyed; but the ignorance and confusion of the workmen introduced a period of barbarism in which entablatures were inverted, columns were used as piers of arcades; and some have held that in this manner the usage was commenced which was afterward many is considered the perfection of Grecian architecture, though wanting in the simplicity which is apparent in the early Doric style. It may be stated in closing that beauty combined with unity of the parts is the essential characteristic of the Grecian style, while loftiness, solemnity and awe, combined with great diversity, characterize the medieval structures of the so-called Gothic period.

Illustrations of Greek architecture, being too numerous to insert exclusively in connection with this article, will be found at the article ATHENS, and elsewhere in the work.

developed in the springing of the Gothic arch from the capital of a pillar, without the intervention of an entablature. The next great building in which art appeared was the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, under Justinian, in the sixth and seventh centuries.

Greek temples affect an elevation for their site, as the Gothic church, and even the cathedral, are at home in a vale or on the level land, where tall trees abound, to cover them with a mantle of light and shade. Horizontalism, low pediments, heavy entablatures, columns near to each other, to bear up the heavy superimposed weights, are Grecian characteristics, while Gothic edifices admitted of stones of any magnitude and arches of enormous size. An examination of the illustrations will show the peculiarities of the different orders, from the solid Doric to the lighter Ionic, with the volutes like twisted rams' horns in the capitals, to the still more lofty Corinthian with its leafy capital, its slender columns and rich adornments, which by Jersey. In youth, while engaged in teaching, he employed his leisure hours in preparation for a higher course of education, and in his twentieth year entered the college of New Jersey at Princeton, and graduated with high honors in 1784. The president of the college has recently been a distinguished member of Congress, and that body itself had been accommodated in the college, and now adjourned to attend commencement. Its members appeared on the stage in the old Princeton Church, with the French and Dutch ambassadors and General Washington, the commander-in-chief of the American armies. The valedictory oration had been assigned to young Green, and he concluded it with an allusion to General Washington, who colored as he was addressed. The next day, as the general was passing through the college, he met the young orator in one of the passages, stopped and took him by the hand and complimented him highly on his address. He was, upon his graduation, immediately appointed tutor in the college, and two years after professor of mathematics and natural philosophy. Having pursued a course of theology under Dr. Witherspoon, president of the college, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in February, 1786, and after declining a call from Charleston, South Carolina, he accepted one from the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, where he was installed as the colleague of Dr. Sproat in May, 1787. In 1787 he was elected a member of the American Philosophical Society, and in 1792 received the degree of D.D. from the university of Pennsylvania. The same year he was also appointed chaplain to Congress, which position he held for eight years. In 1802, upon the destruction of the college of New Jersey by fire, he was appointed president ad interim of the college while Dr. Smith was absent collecting funds for rebuilding. The establishment of a Presbyterian theological seminary being determined upon in the General Assembly of 1809, and a board of directors having been appointed in 1812, Dr. Green was elected their president, and held this office until his death. In 1812 he was elected president of the college of New Jersey, received the degree of LL.D. from the university of North Carolina and resigned his pastoral charge. After discharging the duties of this office for ten years, he resigned, took up his residence in Philadelphia, published the Christian Advocate for twelve years, employing his pen on religious subjects and frequently supplying the pulpits of his brethren in the ministry. He died May 19, 1848, leaving many valuable works.

GREEN, WILLIAM, rector of Hardingham, Norfolk, and fellow of Clare Hall, Cambridge. He took the degree of A.B. in 1737, and of A.M. in 1741. He died in 1794. As a writer he devoted himself chiefly to the translation of the poetical books of the Old Testament, and published successively the following works: 1. "The Song of Deborah reduced to Metre, with a Translation and Commentary;" 2. "A Translation of the Prayer of Habakkuk, the Prayer of Moses, and the 139th Psalm, with a Commentary;" 3. "A New Translation of the Psalms from the Hebrew Original, with Notes, Critical and Explanatory, to which is added a Dissertation on the Last Prophetic Words of Noah;" 4. "A New Translation of Isaiah vii. 13 to the end of liii., from the Original Hebrew, with Notes, Critical and Explanatory;" 5. "Poetical Parts of the Old Testament newly translated from the Hebrew, with Notes, Critical and Explanatory."

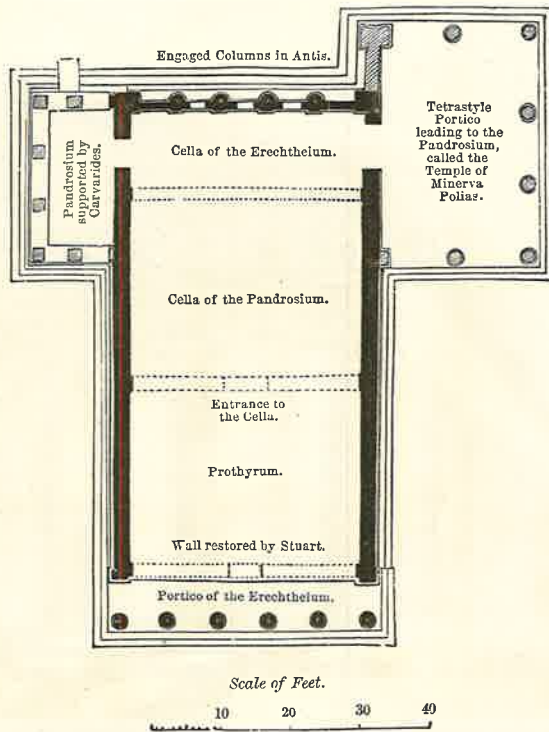

GREENE, DR. MAURICE, a musical composer, was a native of London, and brought up in the choir of St. Paul's, of which he became organist in 1718. He was afterward appointed to the same situation in the Chapel Royal, and in 1730 was chosen professor of music in the university of Cambridge, from which he had previously obtained his musical degree. Besides his anthems, which are much esteemed and still in use in England and to some extent in this country, he produced several excellent catches, duets, etc. Died in 1755.

GREENFIELD (green'feeld), WILLIAM, was born in London, 1st April, 1799. He received the elements of his education in Scotland, to which his family originally belonged, but in his thirteenth year he became apprenticed to a London bookseller. Whilst but a child his talent and desire for learning languages showed itself, and whilst engaged in his duties as a bookseller's apprentice he found means to gratify this tendency. Beginning with Hebrew, which he thoroughly mastered, he proceeded to the other Semitic dialects, from them to Greek and Latin, and then to French and other modern Western tongues. These acquirements were all made whilst he was laboring in his master's service from six in the morning till six, and sometimes eight, in the evening, with the interval of meal hours. In 1822 he submitted to an eminent publisher, Mr. Bagster, the prospectus of a Polyglot grammar of nearly thirty languages, on the principles of comparative grammar. This led to his being employed to edit the "Comprehensive Bible" issued by that firm in 1826. In 1828-29 he was engaged in carrying through the press an edition of the Syriac New Testament for their Polyglot series, and in 1830 he prepared his revised translation of the New Testament into He-this honor in compliment to his extensive Oriental acquirements.

GREENHILL (green'hil), WILLIAM, A.M., was born in 1581, and died 27th of September, 1671. He was educated at Oxford, and during the Commonwealth held the vicarage of Stepney, though at the same time pastor of a Congregational church which he had collected at Stepney Meeting-House. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly of divines, where he was one of "the dissenting brethren." After the execution of Charles I. he was appointed chaplain to the royal children—an office for which some earlier relations with the royal family and his own polished manners rendered him especially eligible. In 1654 he was appointed one of Cromwell's "triers." At the Restoration he was ejected from his vicarage, and from this time till his death lived in private, officiating as opportunity offered to his special flock at the meeting-house. His "Exposition on the first Twenty-eight Chapters of Ezekiel," which is his principal work, was delivered in lectures to his congregation, and appeared in five volumes 4to, published at different times. The first volume was issued in 1645, and is dedicated in courtly terms to the princess Elizabeth, with whom Greenhill seems to have been well acquainted; the fifth appeared in 1662. A new edition, in one volume imperial 8vo, was issued in 1843. This commentary is much prized by the lovers of Puritan theology and exposition. He published also several sermons and works on practical divinity.

brew. He now became regularly engaged in connection with Messrs. Bagster's Biblical publications; and besides editing several works for them, he prepared a lexicon of the Greek New Testament, followed by an abridgment of Schmidt's Greek Concordance. In 1830 he was appointed editor of foreign versions to the British and Foreign Bible Society—an appointment which exposed him to much obloquy on the part of some who sought to find occasion against the society by attacking the notes in the "Comprehensive Bible" as heretical and neologian. He defended himself by collecting and publishing in a consecutive form the notes and prefaces of the book, leaving them to speak for themselves; which they did to the full satisfaction of all competent judges. To the Bible Society his services were invaluable; but the excessive labor which these services and his devotion to literature imposed upon him overmastered his strength, and he sank into a premature grave on the 5th November, 1831. He was a member of the Royal Asiatic Society, having been elected to exclude him from the fellowship of the saints." He was the author of "Lives of the Apostles," "Chapel Liturgy," "Psalms and Hymns," "Sermons of Consolation," etc. He died August 2, 1843.

GREGOIRE (gray-gwar'), HENRI, COUNT, bishop of Blois, a French prelate, distinguished by his love of democracy, no less than by his inflexible integrity and active philanthropy, was born in 1750, near Lunéville. In 1789 he was nominated by the clergy of his province a member of the states-general, and in the constituent assembly he distinguished himself by the boldness of his opinions relative to civil and religious liberty. He was among the first of the clergy who swore fidelity to the constitution; but during the Reign of Terror, when the bishop of Paris abdicated his office, and several of the clergy abjured Christianity, the bishop of Blois stood forward as the undaunted supporter of the religion of his country. He also opposed the accession of the first consul to the throne of France, and he alone objected to the obsequious address of the Senate to the new sovereign. On the restoration of the Bourbons he was excluded from the institute, and deprived of his bishopric. He wrote "A Historical Essay on the Liberties of the Gallican Church," and many other works, in 1815, from which time the rest of his life was passed in sorrow and retirement. He died in 1831. In his last illness the archbishop of Paris refused him the sacraments, on account of the civic oath which he had taken to the constituent assembly, but the friendship of an abbé gave him that which episcopal bigotry would have forbidden, and he was buried amid manifestations of grief and respect.

GREGOR (greg'or), CHRISTIAN, an eminent bishop and hymnologist of the Moravian Church, was born at Dreisdorf, in Silesia, January 1, 1723. In the composition of the large German Moravian Hymn-Book he performed a most important part, furnishing more than three hundred hymns of his own composition. He also rendered valuable service in the Liturgy of the Church and in the collection of chorals and anthems, some of which are still in use. In 1770 he visited in an official capacity the churches of his denomination in America, exposing himself to the hardships and dangers of a pioneer life that they might have the benefit of his counsels and sympathy. He died in Saxony, November 6, 1801.

GREGORAS NICEPHORUS (greg-o'ras ni-sef'o-rus), born 1295, died 1360, a Byzantine historian, the author of a great number of works on history and philosophy, chief among which is his "Byzantine History," a valuable work, though not impartial. He was a favorite at the court of Andronicus. He engaged warmly in the great discussion of his day respecting the right mode of computing Easter, and proposed the reform of the calendar carried into effect three hundred years later.

GREGORIAN CALENDAR (gre-go're-an kal'in-dar), the regulation of the year according to the reformation introduced by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1582. The Gregorian year is the year now reckoned according to the Gregorian calendar. Thus every year which is divisible by 4, except those divisible by 100 and not by 400, has 366 days; all other years have 365 days. See YEAR.

GREGORIAN TONES, a collection of chants, compiled by Gregory the Great for use in churches. The eight tones as they are handed down to us were in time fixed by a royal mandate of Charlemagne. The number of the tones or chants came to be regulated thus: In church music that is perfect every mode or scale must possess a perfect fifth or perfect fourth, and the modes which contain a false fifth or fourth could not be used because of the dissonance of the character; the tones were reduced from fourteen to twelve, and four of these were merely transpositions; eight only were retained, and they were found to be sufficient for Church song.

GREGORY (greg'o-re). This was a favorite name among the popes of Rome, there having been no less than sixteen who held the chair under this appellation. I. Surnamed "THE GREAT," one of the popes of Rome, and the first of that name and a saint in the Romish calendar, was born at Rome about 540, was made pope in 590, and died in 604. He was descended from one of the highest patrician families of the city. He filled the office of prefect of the city for a time. On his father's death he gave this up, and devoted the large property which descended to him to the establishment of several monasteries. Into one of these, at Rome, he retired, and was ordained deacon. He was employed on important services by the pope Pelagius II., on whose death he was elected (against his wishes) to succeed him. Gregory's theological works are not of great importance to the interpretation of Scripture. They consist of—(1.) "A Commentary on Job," in which

Being menaced by the Lombards, he called in the aid of Charles Martel against them, sending him the keys of St. Peter's tomb and offering submission to him. He was a man of education and a lover of art. IV. (pope 827-844) had his pontificate marked by two events, the one the building of the town of Gregoriopolis, near Ostia, the other an attempt at effecting a reconciliation between Louis le Débonnaire of France and his son Lothario. He changed the feast of All Saints from the 1st of May to the 1st of November. V. (pope 997-999), the German BRUNO, nephew of the emperor Otho III., through whose influence he was elected pope. Crescentius raised the people of Rome against Gregory and forced him to fly, and set up an anti-pope; but Gregory, supported by Otho, regained his see, and imprisoned his rival, while he beheaded his enemy. VI. Succeeded on the resignation of Benedict IX. (1044), and found two anti-popes installed, the one at St. Peter's and we find the distinction between the historical or literal, the allegorical and the moral or spiritual interpretation; (2.) "Homilies on the Prophet Ezekiel," delivered to the people during the war with the Lombards; (3.) "Homilies on the Evangelists;" (4.) "Duties of Bishops;" (5.) "Dialogues." Besides these we have a valuable collection of his letters during fourteen years. He was the author, moreover, of great alterations in the ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church, and more especially of improvements in the music. The Gregorian chant derives its name from him. II. (pope 715-731) was remarkable for his disputes with the emperor Leo the iconoclast. When this emperor refused to revoke his decree against images, Gregory declared that he had rendered himself unworthy of the name and privileges of a true Christian. Northern Germany is indebted to him for their apostle Boniface, as Winfred was afterward called. III. (pope 731-741) carried on the contest respecting image-worship with Leo, toward whom he held a high hand, and had the iconoclasts anathematized by a council.

the other at St. Maria Maggiore, whom he bought off. He applied himself to set in order the affairs of the diocese, which were in a frightful state of disorder, and by a mixture of gentleness and firmness succeeded, to some extent. But the priests were annoyed, accused him of simony before the emperor Henry III., and maintained that his election was irregular. Wearied with the strife thus occasioned, Gregory resigned the pontifical throne in 1046 and retired to Germany, where he died. VII. was the title which HILDEBRAND assumed on being elevated to the pontificate. He was born in 1013. He was a man of obscure birth in Tuscany, became a monk of Clugni, and was appointed archdeacon of Rome. He held this post for some years during the time of Leo IX., whose acts he very much influenced, as well as those of the four succeeding popes, on the death of the last of whom, Alexander, Hildebrand was unanimously but somewhat irregularly elected his successor. He was a man of extraordinary abilities and sagacity, fired with the greatest ambition for the exaltation of the holy see, proud and impetuous, and devoid of any strong religious character. He is sometimes spoken of as the author of the "Dictates of Hildebrand," but they seem to have been compiled by another person from his writings and conversation. They claim the highest privileges and dignity for the Roman pontiff, whom they declare to be alone entitled to the style of universal bishop; and in these respects they are faithful representatives of Hildebrand's views and policy. He strove to subject the Church catholic to the will of the pope and to exempt clerics and church property from all civil control. He endeavored to make all kingdoms fiefs of the pontiffs, and to form an episcopal council to meet annually at Rome, which was to take charge of all the kings and peoples of the world. He was unable to succeed in this, owing to the opposition of William the Conqueror and Philip I. of France. But though he failed in this great attempt, he wrought a mighty change in the political state of Europe, abridging or annulling the rights of kings and emperors, among these latter that of the emperor's ratification of a pontiff's election, his own being the last that was ever submitted to an emperor's sanction. At this time the state of the Church was very corrupt. Simony prevailed among all classes, from kings downward, and the clergy, married as well as single, were living in a state of concubinage. Against both these great sins Gregory exerted all his power, but he raised a strong feeling against himself by the sweeping character of his decree, in which he classed all the clergy, the married and moral with the unmarried and licentious, prohibiting marriage. Many took the alternative which he allowed and abjured their orders rather than their wives. His attack upon the ring and staff and other modes of committing simony was even less successful, and led to a schism in the Church and a war in both Germany and Italy. He forced the emperor to sue for pardon, standing for three days bareheaded in the winter's cold, and with naked feet. Henry took up arms, and in return for his being excommunicated set up an anti-pope, with whom he marched to Rome, and there installed him in the chair of St. Peter. Upon this Gregory retreated to the castle of St. Angelo, where he was besieged by Henry; but Robert, duke of Apulia, with his Normans, rescued him and carried him off in safety to Salerno, where this most popish of the popes died in the following year, leaving a legacy of power temporal and spiritual to the Church of Rome which he was the first to conceive of as well as the one to gain. VIII. (pope 1187), the title of Cardinal ALBERT DE MORA when he succeeded to the papacy, which he enjoyed for little more than a month. He appears to have been a man of learning and piety, and is not to be confounded with Maurice Burdin, the anti-pope set up under the title of Gregory VIII. by the emperor Henry V. in 1118. IX. (pope 1227-1241), whose previous name was HUGOLINO, and who at the time of his election was bishop of Ostia, passed his whole reign in conflict with Frederick II., emperor of Germany, who endeavored to reduce the power and influence of the popes. Gregory excommunicated the emperor for not proceeding on his promised crusade; and when he went, he invaded his territory, but on his return made peace with him. Ten years after, he accused the emperor of having said "that the whole world had been deceived by three barrators (impostors), Jesus Christ, Moses and Mohammed," and excommunicated him; and when Frederick resumed hostilities in Italy, the pope summoned a general council to depose him, but the emperor captured the fleet which was conveying several of the prelates to the council and threw them into prison. This broke the old man's heart, and he died in his hundredth year. X. (pope 1271-1276) was archdeacon of Liège when he was elected pontiff, at which time he was at St. Jean d'Acre. As soon as he entered upon a choice, they should have but one plate at each meal, and after five days only bread with wine and water. Gregory died immediately on his return from this council. XI. (pope 1370), a French nobleman, one of the popes who resided at Avignon. He interfered in the affairs of more than one country in Europe, but as a peacemaker, with the view of defending the patrimony of St. Peter, devastated by the Florentines, he removed to Rome.

He was a weak man, and allowed himself to be influenced by a supposed prophetess. XII. (pope 1406-1409) had a troubled pontificate, Benedict XIII. being enthroned at Avignon as anti-pope. This led to a curious engagement among the cardinals previous to the election, that whoever was chosen should resign as soon as Benedict did so. A council was held at Fisa, when a third pope, Alexander V., was elected, and the other two were declared schismatics; and it was not till after the death of Alexander and the election of John XXIII. that, at the instance of the Council of Constance, Gregory resigned in 1409, and died after eight years of close retirement. XIII. (pope 1572), whose real name was HUGO BUONCOMPAGNO, was a man of easy life before his election, but on becoming pope applied himself with zeal to the discharge of his duties. He promoted the education of the clergy, favored the Jesuits, enlarged their college at Rome, restored the Collegium Germanicum, and founded and endowed the English college there, and likewise the Greek college. He is most generally known for the reform of the calendar, the mode of which was suggested by Luigi Lilio, a Calabrian, and after a close investigation by the learned of every university was adopted and promulgated by Gregory. He was very hostile to the Protestants, stirred up seditious movements in Ireland, and fostered the Spanish attack upon England. At home he oppressed the aristocracy to such an extent, confiscating their estates, that the greatest discontent ensued, and the country became completely disordered, bandits spreading all over it, and even infesting the capital, in the midst of which Gregory died. XIV. (pope 1590). Cardinal SPONDRATO was elected under this title after a fierce contest between the French and Spanish parties in the Sacred College. He was a man of the most profound devotion and of pure and spotless life. He supported with men and money Philip II. in his designs against Henri IV. of France, whom he excommunicated. XV. (pope 1621) was elected to the see of Rome when he was infirm with age and sickness, but his pontificate was a vigorous one, owing to his power being wielded by his nephew, Ludovico Ludovisio. He brought to maturity an idea of Gregory XIII. by founding the famous Propaganda, and he also canonized the Jesuit chiefs Ignatius and Xavier. XVI. (pope 1831), whose real name was MAURO CAPPELLARI, a prelate of theological attainments, but very illiberal and narrow-minded, the sturdy opponent of every discovery and invention of his time. His reign was marked by insurrectionary outbreaks which led to concessions from the pope, but which he retraced on the first opportunity, and visited the popular leaders with exile or death.

GREGORY. There were many other eminent men of this name who were distinguished in Biblical and ecclesiastical literature, prominent among whom were—on his office he convoked a general council to consult upon the state of the Christians in the Holy Land, the schism which divided East and West, and the abuses introduced into the Church. But the principal result of this council, held at Lyons, was the ordinance promoted by Gregory in remembrance of the three years which elapsed between the death of his predecessor and his own election, that on the death of a pope the cardinals at Rome should wait for ten days the arrival of those who were absent; that they should then be shut up in a room, and if, after three days, they had not agreed

1. SAINT, OF AGRIGENTUM, a Greek theologian born about A. D. 524, at or near Agrigentum. He studied at Jerusalem for five years, and was then made a deacon, his pious parents intending him for the priesthood. He visited Antioch and Constantinople, acquiring for himself at both places a high reputation for eloquence, learning and a holy life. After leaving Constantinople he went to Rome, where he was cordially received by the pope and made bishop of Agrigentum, in Sicily. A charge affecting his moral character having been made against him by two disappointed aspirants for the see to which he had been preferred, he went to Constantinople, and was there pronounced innocent by Justinian. He returned to Agrigentum, was the author of several works, and died November 23, 562.

2. OF ALEXANDRIA, is by some supposed to have been a Cappadocian, though his early history is not known with any degree of certainty. He was chosen patriarch of Alexandria by the Arian prelates in the Council of Antioch, A. D. 341, though the see was then really in possession of Athanasius, who was then in exile. He held this office for seven years. He was charged by his orthodox opponents with violent and oppressive abuse of authority, and the Council of Sardica, A. D. 347, denounced him as "not only not a bishop, but not a Christian." The period of his death is uncertain. It is supposed to have occurred a short time previous to the return of Athanasius from his second exile, A. D. 354.

3. OF ANTIOCH, was a Greek theologian of the sixth century, and was made patriarch of Antioch upon the deposition of Anastasius, A. D. 570, or, according to another authority, 573. He was first a monk at Constantinople, then abbot of a monastery on Mount Sinai, which, being besieged by the Arabs, he defended, and made peace with his foes. Wearied with contention with the people of Antioch, by whom he was charged with complicity in magic with Anatolius his friend, who was executed, and incest with his own sister, of both of which charges he was acquitted, he gave up the see to Anastasius, and died A. D. 594.

4. OF CÆSAREA, was a presbyter of the city of that name in Cappadocia in the tenth century, and the author of a "Life of Gregory of Nazianzus," which is given in a Latin version by Bellius in his edition of "Gregory of Nazianzus."

5. OF HEIMBURG, one of the boldest and most untiring opponents of papal encroachments in his day, was born in the first part of the fifteenth century at Warzburg, and was educated at the university in that city. He first attracted attention at the Council of Basle in company with Æneas Sylvius, who afterward became Pope Pius II., and who at this time made him his secretary. He entered warmly with him in opposition to papal encroachments upon temporal power. At first they mainly coincided in their views upon this subject, but as each rose higher in the Church they differed in a corresponding degree; and when Sylvius was advanced to the see of Rome, the former friends found themselves to be in complete opposition to each other. Heimburg had now retired to Nuremberg, where he had been elected syndic, and such was his reputation that all important questions in civil or ecclesiastical law were referred to him for decision. When Pope Pius II. ascended the papal chair, he proposed involving Germany in a crusade, and for this purpose called a meeting of the German princes at Mantua. Heimburg, as the representative of Sigismund, appeared in this assembly, and opposed the measure in such a manner as to be never forgotten by the pope. A conflict was thus commenced which was carried on with varying success through life, Heimburg displaying great boldness and ability, and showing himself a hero in the fight. His controversial writings set forth the usurpations of the papacy in the strongest terms, substantiating his censures by proofs from Scripture and history. He died August, 1472.

6. "THE ILLUMINATOR" (in Armenian, Cricor Dousavoritch), born 257, died 332, was consecrated the first bishop of Armenia in the fourth century. He received his appellation of "Illuminator" because he dispelled the clouds of darkness which overspread that country. He sent his son as deputy to the Council of Nice.

7. THE MONK, was a Greek writer of the first part of the tenth century, so called because he led an ascetic life, and not because he was connected with a monastery. He was the author of two memoirs of St. Basil the Younger, his spiritual guide, in which there is found some valuable historical matter among much that is worthless and absurd.

8. NAZIANZEN, was son of the bishop of Nazianzus, born 325, and became coadjutor to his father, having very unwillingly consented to be consecrated a bishop. He was a prelate of great eloquence and fertile imagination, and was so successful in preaching down the Arians that the emperor Theodosius constrained him to accept the patriarchal see of Constantinople, but which he resigned at once before he was enthroned. He was a friend of Basil the Great, and delivered a magnificent funeral oration over him.

9. OF NYSSA, was born at Cæsarea of Cappadocia in the year 331 or 332. He was ordained by his brother, Basil the Great, and became bishop of Nyssa about the year 372. He took a leading part in the controversy with the Arian party, to whose views he was very determinately opposed. The date of his death is uncertain, but probably it took place before the close of the century. His works consist of treatises on controversial and practical theology, homilies, orations and epistles. His principal work of an exegetical kind is his "Hexaëmeron sive de opera sex dierum," intended as a supplement to the work of his brother Basil on the same subject. He wrote, also, eight homilies on Ecclesiastes, an exposition of the Song of Songs, homilies on the Lord's Prayer and on some of the Psalms. As an expositor he follows the proper rather than the allegorical method of interpretation, though his desire to find the deeper sense of Scripture not unfrequently betrays him into undue spiritualizing of the text.

10. PATRIARCH OF THE BOHEMIAN BRETHREN, elected but never consecrated bishop of Prague, was the son of a Bohemian knight and lived in the fifteenth century, the time and place of his birth being unknown. Intent upon the reformation of the Church, and disappointed with his uncle Rokycan, who was a reformer rather in theory than practice, he retired with his friends to the barony of Litz, and there founded, in 1547, the Unitas Fratrum or Church of the Bohemian Brethren. He wrote and published many letters and treatises, both doctrinal and apologetic, in the interests of this new organization, and severely denounced the corruption of the Church. His doctrinal tendencies were largely derived from Peter Chelcicky, a Bohemian writer, and were unusually rigid. His great object was to restore the Church from its fearful degeneracy to its primitive simplicity and purity, and to preserve it unspotted from the contagion of the world. He died in 1473.

11. PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, was born about 1740. At an early age he was made metropolitan of Smyrna, and in 1795 appointed patriarch of Constantinople. When the invasion of Egypt by Napoleon I. took place, the Turks, suspecting Gregory of favoring the French, deposed him. Withdrawing himself to a convent, he improved his time in acquiring a knowledge of the art of printing and in writing on religious subjects. Upon his being restored to the office of patriarch, he set up a printing-office in his palace. In 1808 he was doomed to another deposition upon a charge of favoring Russia in the revolution of this year, but was the third time placed in the patriarchal chair. The invasion of the Danubian provinces by Ypsilanti followed immediately his third accession to power and led to a rising of the Greeks. Constantinople became the scene of a bloody conflict; and as the revolution was considered a religious one, the situation of the clergy became every day more serious. When the moment of imminent danger at length appeared, and the fate of Gregory became apparent, his friends advised him to fly, but without success. Having celebrated on Easter the religious festivities of the day with more than ordinary splendor, he was arrested on leaving the church, thrown into prison, and a few hours afterward hung in front of the church. His body, after being suspended three days, was thrown into the sea by the Jews, but afterward taken out and sent to Odessa, where it was buried with great honors, June 28, 1821.

12. Surnamed THAUMATURGUS, on account of the miracles he was supposed to have wrought, was born of heathen parents in the commencement of the third century. He was instructed and baptized by Origen, and after being with him for eight years he was made bishop of his native city, New Cæsarea, in Pontus. When appointed to his see, there were only seventeen Christians in it; when he died, there was scarce a pagan in it, so zealously did he labor. Among his genuine works the best are his "Eulogy on Origen," and a "Paraphrase on Ecclesiastes." He died about 270.

13. OF TOURS, Latinized into GEORGIUS FLORENTIUS GREGORIUS, born in 544, the father of French history, was of noble birth. Active and orthodox, he engaged often in theological disputes, but he was weak and credulous. His great work, "Annales Francorum," gives a summary of the world's history to the establishment of the kingdom of the Franks, and afterward a detailed history to the year 591. He died in 595.

GREGORY, JOHN, an English theologian, was born in Buckinghamshire, November 10, 1607. At the age of sixteen he went to Oxford with Sir William Drake, where he studied with great diligence. About 1631 he entered into orders in the Church. In 1638 he was appointed domestic chaplain to the bishop of Chichester, his patron, and was subsequently made a prebend. From his being a loyalist he was deprived of his benefices and reduced to great straits. He died of gout in an obscure ale-house near Oxford, March 13, 1646. Gregory was an excellent scholar, and was highly esteemed by some of the most learned and distinguished men of the age, belonging to all sects. He is the author of "Notes and Observations on some Passages of Scripture," 1646, 4to. These notes were reprinted four times, translated into Latin and inserted in the "Critici Sacri." His posthumous works, edited by Gurgany, appeared in one volume, quarto, 1650. Among them is "A Discourse" upon the Septuagint, and "A Disproof" of the second "Cainan" in Luke iii. 36, 37.

GREGORY, JOHN, born at Wotton, near Woodstock, and educated at Cambridge, where he became a Fellow of Trinity College, was subsequently master of Gloucester school and archdeacon of the diocese of Gloucester. At his death he left behind him a collection of scholia on the Greek New Testament, gathered from the writings of the Greek Fathers. These were published by his son along with the text from Fell's edition in one volume folio, Oxford, 1793. This is a splendid book, with head and tail pieces from the burin of Vandergucht and Gribelin. It is also a very useful book, containing in narrow compass the cream of what the Greek Fathers have offered for the elucidation of the New Testament. The editor was assisted in preparing it for, and carrying it through, the press by Dean Aldrich and J. E. Grabe. We regret that we have not been able to recover the dates of Gregory's life. All that we know for certain is that when he was ready to go to the university of Oxford he was prevented by the circumstance of that city being besieged by the Parliamentary forces, and that it was at the Restoration he settled at Gloucester. He was probably born about 1630, and died about 1700.

GREGORY, OLINTHUS, LL.D., was born at Yaxley, in Huntingdonshire, England, in 1774. He commenced his literary career at the age of nineteen. Besides numerous mathematical and scientific works, Dr. Gregory was the author of "Letters to a Friend on the Evidences, Doctrines and Duties of the Christian Religion," "Memoir of Robert Hall," and "Memoirs of the Life, Writings, etc., of the late John Mason Good, M. D." He died in 1841.

GRESWELL (gres'wel), EDWARD, one of the most learned English theologians of this century. He was born in the year 1797, at Manchester, England. After an academic course, he entered the university of Oxford, and gave early indications of his capabilities. He became a Fellow of Corpus Christi College, and here he distinguished himself by his great attainments. His "Exposition of the Parables," in five volumes, is one of the most exhaustive and profound works in modern theology, while his "Harmonia Evangelica," or "Gospel Harmony," is of great intrinsic value to every critical student of the New Testament Scriptures, and its great popularity was attested by the fact that it speedily ran through several editions. Then followed his "Dissertations on the Principles and Arrangement of a Harmony of the Gospels"—a work that was so prized that, in successive editions, it was enlarged from three to five volumes. The Harmony and Dissertations together form a work of great value to any student who desires to make himself master of the whole range of inquiry relating to the chronology of the gospel history and the structure and composition of the several Gospels. In 1852 Mr. Greswell issued his very learned "Fasti Temporis Catholici et Origenes Kalendaræ," or "Annals of the Catholic Age and the Early Calendar," in five volumes, with a volume in quarto of tables. Few men in any of the English universities have produced more sound and valuable works of a really useful character than Greswell, and they will continue to live for ages, a grand monument of his learning as well as of his zeal and devotion to Scripture study.

GRETSER (gret'sur), JACOB, a very voluminous German writer who employed his pen chiefly against Protestant authors, English and Continental, and in support of the order of the Jesuits, to which he belonged. He is highly esteemed by Romanists, but his works do not possess any great merit, being chiefly compilations made without much judgment. He was born in 1561, and died in 1625.

GREVILLE (greh-vil'), ROBERT KAYE, an eminent English philanthropist, born in 1794. Intended for the medical profession, he abandoned its study for botany, making extensive collections of plants as well as other objects of natural history. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, a member of the Royal Irish Academy, and of several other scientific societies of Europe. Dr. Greville afterward adopted landscape painting as a profession. He was a great philanthropist, and took an active part in temperance and other reforms. He died in 1866.

GREY (gray), WALTER DE, an English ecclesiastic, successively archdeacon of Totnes, bishop of Worcester and archbishop of York. He was also chancellor to King John. He went on a mission to Flanders for the king, and that monarch procured his election to the see of York, in opposition to Simon de Langton, but De Grey had to pay £10,000 for it to the papal treasury. He was munificent and charitable, and had a high character for wisdom, prudence and integrity. He died in 1255.

GRYHOUND (gray'hound). The phrase zarzir nothnaim, which occurs only in one passage, Prov. xx. 31, signifies "girt in the loins," and there is some uncertainty as to what is specifically intended by it. The English version gives in the margin not only the literal rendering, but the alternative of "a horse" as the meaning. To this Bochar, Gesenius and others assent. The Septuagint give, "a cock strutting around his hens."

A GROUP OF GREYHOUNDS.
From an ancient Egyptian sculpture.

The only attribute in the text is that which is predicated of this in common with three other objects, dignity or comeliness in action: "There be three things which go well, yea, four are comely in going: a lion, . . . a greyhound, an he-goat also, and a king, against whom there is no rising up."

We do not see why "a greyhound" may not be as good a rendering as any, particularly if we may comprehend elegance and swiftness of motion in the idea of "going well." The phrase used may have a double reference; first, to the slenderness of the lumbar regions of the body, as if tightly braced in, a description which is not very applicable to a horse, but is remarkably true of the dog in question; and secondly, by a metaphor, to the custom of girding up the loins when men would move with rapidity, and so to the fleetness of the greyhound, as if it had girded up its loins to run. The smooth-haired greyhound is unequalled for speed and endurance, and for symmetry; "every action is light, easy and elegant, yet firm and vigorous." It is certain that hounds with slender loins have been used in the chase in Persia, Arabia and Egypt from very ancient times; and among the Egyptian paintings lately disinterred there are representations of dogs used in coursing, and led in leash, which might have been drawn from the greyhound. The thin nose, the small ears, the length of body, the girt loins, the very curve of the tail and the gait are admirably represented, and are the exact counterpart.

GRIESBACH (grees'bach), JOHANN JAKOB, was born 4th of January, 1745, at Butzbach, a small town of Hesse Darmstadt, where his father was pastor. Having received his school education at Frankfort-on-the-Main, he studied theology at the universities of Tübingen, Halle and Leipsic. Whilst at Halle he came under the influence of Semler, whose methods, opinions and pursuits gave a powerful bias to the mind of the young student. Having finished his academical career at Leipsic, he returned to Halle; but before settling himself there, he, in 1769, commenced a literary tour for the purpose especially of examining the MSS. of the New Testament in the principal libraries of Germany, Holland, England and France. He returned to Halle in 1770 laden with materials, and set himself to make use of them for the emendation of the text of the New Testament. In 1773 he was appointed extraordinary professor of theology at Halle; and two years after, he became ordinary professor of theology at Jena. Here the rest of his useful and laborious life was spent, and here he died on the 24th of March, 1812.

Griesbach's name and fame stand connected with the textual criticism of the New Testament. On this principally he spent his time and his strength. In 1771, soon after his return from his extended tour, he submitted to the university of Halle a dissertation, "De codicibus quatuor Evangelistarum Origenianis." In 1774 he issued the first volume of his New Testament, containing the historical books, with the first three Gospels arranged synoptically; in 1775 appeared the second volume, containing the Epistles and the Apocalypse; and along with this a new edition of vol. i., but without the synoptic arrangement of the first Gospels. Between 1777 and 1794 he published a series of critical works on the text of the New Testament; and having thus prepared the way for his great work, he sent forth, in 1796, the first volume of a completely remodeled and carefully prepared edition of the New Testament, with copious apparatus and valuable prolegomena, followed, in 1806, by vol. ii. This edition was published both at Halle and London. A sumptuous edition in 4 vols. 4to, or small folio, with copper-plate illustrations, was issued in 1805-1807. Manual editions, containing the principal various readings, but without the authorities, appeared in 1805 and in 1825. A third edition of the larger work was commenced by Dr. D. Schulz, of which only the first volume appeared, Berol., 1827.

Griesbach's labors on the text of the New Testament commenced an era in Biblical criticism. Not only were his collections of various readings more extensive and more carefully sifted than those of any who had preceded him—not only did he carry out more thoroughly than any of his predecessors the principle of determining the value of a reading by its antiquity and its source—but he contributed more than any of them to place textual criticism on a scientific basis, and to furnish rules for the guidance of the critic in his work. His system of recensions may be unsound, and he may have been hampered or misled by it in some of his decisions; but there can be no doubt as to the important bearing, both of the facts he has collected and the theories he has offered to account for them, on the subsequent progress of Biblical criticism. Even where he had little to guide him but his own judgment, more recent investigations have generally shown that his conclusions were correct. He was the first, also, who ventured to print the text as the principles of his criticism determined, instead of retaining the "Textus Receptus," and treating the readings of the codices simply as departures from that. Griesbach's "Opuscula," which consist chiefly of academic programmes and addresses, are not of much value.

GRIFFIN (grif'fin), EDMUND DORR, an American divine and scholar, born at Wyoming, Pennsylvania, in 1804. He graduated at Columbia College, New York, in 1823, and was made a deacon in the Episcopal Church in 1826, and in due time was ordained presbyter. He visited Europe, and on his return in 1830 delivered a course of able lectures on Roman, Italian and English literature. A sudden illness the same year cut short a life of great promise. His literary remains, including poems, were edited by William Cullen Bryant.

GRIFFIN, EDWARD DORR, D.D., president of Williams College for fifteen years, an eminent Presbyterian divine and author, was born January 6, 1770, at East Haddam, Connecticut. He graduated at Yale College with honor in 1790, studied theology with Jonathan Edwards, and after preaching at New Salem and Farmington, he became pastor of the Congregational church at New Hartford in 1795. In 1801 he removed to Newark, New Jersey, as the associate pastor of Dr. McWhorter, whom he succeeded in 1807. He was elected to the Bartlett professorship in Andover Theological Seminary in 1809, and in 1811 took charge of the Parke Street Church, Boston. In 1815 he returned to Newark as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, and exercised an important influence in favor of the Africans, foreign missions and the American Bible Society. In 1821 he was elected president of Williams College, in which office he continued until 1836, when he resigned and retired to Newark, where he died November 8, 1837. He was the author of the "Causal Power of Regeneration," "Divine Efficiency," "The Extent of the Atonement," and a large number of lectures, orations, addresses, etc.

GRIFFITH (grif'fith), BENJAMIN, a minister of the Baptist Church, was born in 1688 in Cardigan, in South Wales. He emigrated to America in 1710 and settled in Pennsylvania, where he labored earnestly and with no small degree of success as a pioneer in the work of establishing churches and laying the foundation of the future prosperity of his denomination. He was the author of "Vindication of the Doctrine of the Resurrection," "A Treatise of Church Discipline," "An Answer to the Divine Right of Infant Baptism," etc.

GRIMSHAW (grim'shaw), WILLIAM, a minister of the Church of England and a devoted friend of Wesley, was born in 1708 in Lancashire, pursued his studies at Cambridge, and after officiating at Todmorden for some years, obtained the curacy of Haworth in 1742. Here he became intimately associated with Wesley, and a few years after discharged the duties of an assistant in the Haworth circuit, warmly espousing the cause of the Methodists, and publishing in 1749 a "Sermon in Defence of the Methodists." He was an orator of fine abilities, preached earnestly and eloquently, and in the language of Wesley, "carried the fire of the gospel wherever he went." He died in 1763.

GRIND, GRINDING. See MILL.

GRINDAL (grin'dal), EDMUND, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Hensingham, in Cumberland, in 1519. He was chaplain to Bishop Ridley at the time of the Marian persecution, and fled to Frankfort, where he worked with Knox in contending for the faith. Returning in 1559, he was chosen master of Pembroke Hall, and the same year preferred to the see of London. In 1570 he was translated to York, and in 1575 to Canterbury. Two years afterward he was suspended from his archiepiscopal functions for refusing to obey Queen Elizabeth's order to suppress prophesyings, or associations of the clergy to expound the Scriptures. At length his sequestration was taken off, though he never completely recovered the royal favor. He contributed to "Fox's Acts and Monuments," and founded the celebrated school of St. Bee's, in Cumberland. He was a man of great learning, piety and moderation, and an ornament to the Church of which he was a prelate. He died in 1583.

GRINDSTONE. When cutting instruments came into use, the necessity of sharpening them became apparent. When the Philistines disarmed the Israelites in the time of Saul, smiths were removed from the land, and the means of keeping tools or warlike weapons in order were taken from them. Saul and his son retained their spears and swords, but agriculturists had to go to the Philistines for the repair of their farming implements. All grindstones must necessarily have been like each other, the only difference being in the character of the stone and the leverage by which they were turned. See HANDICRAFT.

GRISLED, or GRIZZLED (griz'l'd), Gen. xxxi. 10, 12, spotted, spoken of goats; Zech. vi. 3, 6, piebald, spoken of horses.

GRISWOLD (griz'wuld), ALEXANDER VIETS, D.D., bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, distinguished for his evangelical spirit and devoted piety, was born in Simsbury, Connecticut, April 22, 1766. In early life he made some progress in the Greek and Latin languages, but unfavorable circumstances prevented him from pursuing a college course. In 1794 he offered himself as a candidate for holy orders, self-educated, but possessed of very respectable attainments. For nine years he labored in the three parishes of Litchfield, Plymouth and Harvinton, in his native State, and in 1804 removed to Bristol, Rhode Island, where he became rector of St. Michael's Church, and at the same time taught a school, still pursuing his literary studies until he justly took his place among the most eminent of his day. In 1810 the eastern diocese, including all the New England States but Connecticut, was organized, and the next year Dr. Griswold was consecrated as its first bishop. In the extensive revival of religion in 1812 Dr. Griswold took a deep interest, and published some articles on prayer-meetings, in which he vindicated them from the charges of disorder and delusion with which they were aspersed by their opponents. Yielding to a general desire to make his episcopal residence more central, in 1830 he removed to Salem, Massachusetts, and accepted the rectorship of St. Peter's Church, and a few years subsequently removed to Boston, entirely disencumbering himself from parish duties. Here he still wrote and published sermons, addresses, etc. In 1842 he was relieved of his episcopal duties by the appointment of an assistant bishop. He died February 15, 1843. He was a man of a vigorous and highly-cultivated mind, and characterized by great simplicity of manners and meekness.

GROCYN (gro'sin), WILLIAM, a distinguished classical scholar, born at Bristol, in 1442, and educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford. He went to Italy to study Greek, and afterward taught it publicly at Oxford. This was an alarming innovation, and excited much opposition. Grocyn was the friend of Dean Colet, the tutor of Erasmus, and godfather to Lilly the grammarian. A Latin epistle of his to Aldus Manutius is prefixed to Linacre's translation of "Proclus de Sphæra." Died in 1519.

GROCIN (groyn). This in architecture is the edge formed by the intersection of two vaults. In the Gothic period these were usually covered with mouldings or ribs; in the Romanesque they were left entirely plain.

GROENINGENISTS (gro-nin'je-nists), so called from the fact of their meeting at certain periods in the city of Groningen, the capital of a province of the same name in Netherlands, were a sect of Anabaptists. See ANABAPTISTS.

GROOT (groot), GERARD, or GERARD THE GREAT, was born at Deventer, Holland, in 1340. He was a theologian and reformer of some eminence, and was especially interested in forming associations of friars for the translation of the Scriptures. The chief society founded by him was called the Brethren of the Common Life, and was sanctioned by Pope Gregory XI. He died of the plague, August 20, 1384.

GROOT, HUGO DE. See GROTIUS.

GROPPER (grop'per), JOHANN, a Romish ecclesiastic of the more moderate kind who sought at the Reformation to avert the calamity of a separation by the employment of conciliatory measures, was born at Loest in 1501, and was made successively canon of Cologne, provost of Bonn and archdeacon and provost of St. Geron, Cologne. Influenced by the desire of effecting some reform in his Church, he convened a provincial synod in 1535, and afterward was the representative sent by Charles V. to the assembly at Regensburg in 1541. He is the reputed writer of the "Interim," which was there decided upon, and after its adoption labored zealously at Loest to bring up the churches to its requirements. At the reopening of the Council of Trent in 1551, he was called by the pope to Rome for the purpose of consultation. He died March 12, 1553.

GROSSETESTE (grös-tayt'), or GROS-HEAD (gröz'hed), ROBERT, or GREAT-HEAD (grate'hed), a celebrated English prelate and philosopher, was born about 1175 at Stradbroke, Suffolk, England. Though of humble birth, he secured by diligence and attention at Oxford and Paris a good education, acquiring a knowledge of law, physic and divinity, and making himself a proficient in the Greek language—a study which at that time received little attention. His undoubted talents and the intrinsic worth of his character opened the way to rapid promotion, and accordingly we find him occupying successively the archdeaconries of Wilts, Northampton and Leicester, and various other livings, including the prebend of Clifton at Lincoln. In 1235 he was made bishop of Lincoln, the largest and most populous diocese in the realm. His duties here were arduous, his position full of anxiety, and even danger, on account of the total want of discipline and obedience among the ecclesiastics subject to his authority, but he addressed himself to the work of bringing order out of confusion in the most earnest and systematic manner. He commenced episcopal visitations of the parishes, refused to confer benefices upon unworthy persons, attended councils, expostulated with kings, presented personally the work of reformation before the pope, expounded the reciprocal relations of the sacerdotal and kingly powers, and met with opposition, resistance and ingratitude as well as partial success. An attempt was made upon his life by poison; the anger of the pope was incurred, in consequence of which he was a short time suspended from his office, and finally in 1253 an affront was given to Pope Innocent IV. by an act consistent with his whole past private life, which secured the highest approbation and handed down his name to posterity. He rejected the pope's demand for a canonry for his nephew Frederic di Lavagna, severely criticising and condemning the papal procedure. This act threw the pope into a rage, and afforded the note of preparation for Edward III.'s "Statute of Provisors" in 1344. Grosseteste died October 9, 1253. He was a man of clear and vigorous intellect, great learning, pleasing manners and the highest excellency of character for the age in which he lived. The university of Oxford pronounced upon him this eulogy: "No one knew him to neglect any one good action appropriate to his office or his charge for fear of any man; he was ever ready for martyrdom if the sword of the executioner should present itself." Grosseteste was a voluminous writer, the number of his works being variously estimated, even up to two hundred and fifty, the list of his writings filling twenty-three quarto pages, but most of them have been lost or destroyed.

GROTEFEND (gro'te-fend), DR. GEORG FRIEDRICH, a distinguished antiquary and classical and Oriental scholar, was born at Munden, in Hanover, studied at Göttingen, and after holding various appointments as a teacher became the director of the Lyceum at Hanover, which office he held till his death. He was the author of many profound treatises on various branches of philology, but his chief title to fame rests on his being the first to decipher the Persepolitan cuneiform inscriptions, which have proved so ferquished for the study of theology, and in 1675 became pastor of a church at Lizy, where he remained seven years, went to Rouen for a short time, and then returned to Lizy until the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Being necessitated to leave France, he retired to England, and died in London in 1713.

GROTIUS (gro'sh'us), or DE GROOT, HUGO. This great man, prominent among the leading writers of the seventeenth century as a jurist, a scholar, a statesman and a theologian, was born at Delft, in Holland, April 10, 1583. He was so precocious that before he arrived at the age of sixteen he had published an edition of "Marcianus Capella." In 1598 he accompanied the famous Barneveldt on his embassy to the court of Henri IV., and won the esteem of that monarch. At the age of twenty-four he was made advocate-general, and in 1613 settled at Rotterdam. After the synod of Dort, having warmly espoused the views of the Arminians, he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Louvestein (June 6, 1619), where for a year and a half he suffered great hardships, till his wife enabled him to effect his escape in a book-chest. He retired to France, where he was well received, and had a pension assigned to him by Louis XIII. After spending eleven studious years in France, during which he still suffered persecutions from his unrelenting enemies, the Calvinists, he returned to Holland, from which he was once more driven by the violence of his theological opponents. In 1634 Christina, queen of Sweden, appointed him her ambassador to the French court, where he again resided for ten years. Being permitted to resign this appointment, he intended to return from Stockholm to his native country, but was shipwrecked, during his voyage, on the coast of Pomerania. He continued his journey by land, but died of fatigue and exposure at Rostock, August 28, 1645, and was buried at Delft. It is certain that he died in the faith of Christ, although the same furious malice which had embittered his life strove to blacken his memory by the assertion that he had died a Socinian. He was frequently accused both of popery and Socinianism, but it is probable, both from his own writings and from the facts adduced by J. Clericus at the end of his edition of the work on "Truth," that the Anglican Church, the liturgy of which he specially admired, received a larger share of his approval than any other.

As a theologian Grotius stands very high, and as a commentator on the Bible deserves the first rank among his contemporaries, although sectarian animosity caused his merits to be for a long time depreciated and almost ignored. He was particularly successful in illustrating the meaning of various passages from the classical parallels supplied by his immense learning. Simple explanation is always his main object, and he makes it chiefly depend on history and philology, in which method he was followed by Ernesti. He was one of the first to reject altogether the irregularities and mysticisms of patristic and medieval exegesis; and (in strong contrast to his fellow-countryman Cocceius) he always proceeds on the maxim that the inspired writers wrote with the intention of being understood. His clear judgment and strong good sense led him, on this ground, to acquiesce for the most part in the primary and obvious meaning which he learnedly elucidates by the ordinary canons of criticism. As long as keen acumen, moderation, liberality and learning are valued, so long will the commentaries of Grotius be read with a respectful appreciation, as having been among the first to recall the science of Biblical hermeneutics into the domain of erudition and common sense, and rescue it from the hands of superstitious, arbitrary and fanciful allegorists.

His chief theological works are "The Treatise on the Truth of the Christian Religion," which has been reproduced in a vast number of editions and translations, "A Defence of the Catholic Faith concerning the Satisfaction of Christ," and especially the "Annotations on the Old and New Testament," first published at Paris, and afterward republished by Vogel and Doederlein. The entire theological works of Grotius were published, under the title "Opera Theologica," at Amsterdam and Basle.

GROVE (grove). What is commonly understood by this, when used in connection with religion, is a wood of more or less extent set apart for the purposes of false worship, and most commonly abused to practices of the foulest kind. See HIGH-PLACES. But the word rendered thus in our English Bibles should rather have been retained in its untranslated form, ASHERAH or ASHTAROTH, for it is the name of the Syrian Astarte, or Venus, the female companion of Baal, with whom it is commonly associated. The precise sense of various passages in the Old Testament Scripture has by this mistake been somewhat lost to the English reader. See ASHTORETH. What, however, is sometimes rendered "plain" in our English version should rather be "grove," or more properly, perhaps, "oaks." Thus, at Gen. xiii. 18, Abraham dwelt among the oaks of Mamre; also ch. xiv. 13; xviii. 1. But trees of that sort were for shelter merely, and not for purposes of worship.

GROVE, HENRY, a distinguished Presbyterian divine, was born January 4, 1683, in Taunton in Somersetshire, England, and was descended by both of his parents from very respectable families in Devonshire and Wiltshire. He pursued a course of academical training at Taunton under Mr. Warren, studied theology in London, where his learning and abilities attracted the attention of Dr. Watts, and entered the ministry in 1705. The following year, in connection with Mr. James, he assumed the charge of the Taunton Academy, where he was usefully and successfully employed for eighteen years. During this time he took part in the theological discussions which arose between the Dissenters and the Established Church, wrote his essay on the terms of "Christian Communion," "The Immortality of the Soul" and other works. He died in 1707.

GRUNDTVIG (groot/vig), NICOLAI FREDERIK SEVERIN, a Danish ecclesiastic and poet, born in 1783. As a theologian he was decidedly opposed to rationalism, in consequence of which he was no favorite with his clerical brethren, and found difficulty in obtaining or holding any pastoral charge. His literary productions, however, are well received. They were first on heathen subjects; but influenced by his religious convictions, he abandoned this line, and in his subsequent writings religious sentiments predominate. He was at the head of a strong party which advocates the separation of Church and State and a return to primitive and catholic usages.

GRYNÆUS (gri-ne'us), SIMON, a learned Protestant theologian, son of a peasant of Swabia, was born at Veringen-Hohenzollern in 1493, embraced the doctrines of the Reformation at an early age and became intimately connected with Luther, Melancthon and Calvin in promoting its work, though this attachment exposed him to persecution and many dangers. He was professor of Greek at Vienna, afterward at Heidelberg, visited Tubingen under commission of Duke Ulrich of Wurtemberg to reform the churches, went to England, with strong recommendations from Erasmus, to confer with Henry VIII. about his divorce, was present at the diets of Spire and Worms, and settled at Basle in 1536. The German universities were greatly indebted to him for efforts to promote sound learning. He published Latin translations of the works of Plutarch, Aristotle and Chrysostom, and brought to light from a convent on the Rhine the last five books of Livy. He died in 1541.

2. JOHANN, a Protestant theologian of Switzerland, a celebrated divine and a man of great proficiency in the Oriental languages, was born at Basle in 1705. He was for seven years professor of theology at Basle, and wrote a valuable work on theology. He died April, 1744.

3. JOHANN JACOB, D. D., a Swiss Protestant divine and a voluminous writer on religious subjects, third son of Thomas Grynæus, was born at Berne October 1, 1540. Educated at Basle, he entered the ministry in 1559, and succeeded his father as pastor at Roteln. He was made professor of theology at Basle in 1577, which position he occupied until his removal to Heidelberg in 1584. He remained here but two years, returning to Basle, where, as head pastor of the city, he died in 1618. He published a number of works on theology, valuable in their day.

4. THOMAS, nephew of Simon the elder and a valuable and efficient laborer in the Reformation, was born at Veringen in 1512. He enjoyed the counsel and care of his uncle, was liberally educated, and subsequently was made professor of the ancient languages at Berne and Basle. He also held the office of ecclesiastical superintendent and pastor at Roteln by appointment of Charles, margrave of Baden, in which he continued until the close of his life. He died August, 1564.

5. SIMON, the younger, an eminent philologist and theologian, was born at Basle in 1725. He was an accomplished linguist, well versed in the French, English and Latin languages, a thorough classical scholar and a profound theologian. He published a translation of the Bible, at Basle, in 1775; also versions of Thomas à Kempis, the "Encomium Morie" of Erasmus, and several works in German against Deism, which are still in demand among his countrymen. He died in 1799.

GUADAGNOLI (gwa-dah-n'o'le), FILIPPO, an Italian Orientalist, born in 1596. He acquired such a knowledge of Arabic as to pronounce an oration in that language, and he was commissioned by the pope to make an Arabic translation of the Bible for the use of Christians in the East; it was published by the Propaganda. He also wrote in Latin an "Apology for the Christian Religion," in reply to objections by a Mussulman, Ahmet-bed-Zein, which is said to have had the effect of converting the objector, on which account Urban VIII. had the "Apology" printed in Arabic. He died in 1656.

GUALTER (gwal'ter), or GUALTHERUS (gwal-the'rus), RODOLPHUS TRIGURINUS, an eminent Swiss divine, born in 1529, the son-in-law of Zwingli and one of the earlier Reformers. He succeeded Bullinger as pastor at Zurich. He wrote some commentaries on parts of the New Testament, which are highly esteemed though rarely to be met with.

GUARD (gard). This is the translation of three different Hebrew words, expressing the different duties that were to be performed. The guard were sometimes executioners, Gen. xxxvii. 36; 2 Ki. xxv. 8; Dan. ii. 14; sometimes runners, 2 Ki. xi. 4; sometimes watchmen, Neh. iv. 23. These were not, however, necessarily different sets of men, as we occasionally find the runners called on to become executioners.

GUARIN (ga-rang'), PIERRE, a Hebrew scholar of some eminence, was born in Normandy in 1673. At eighteen years of age he entered the Benedictine order, and afterward became professor of Greek and Hebrew in the abbey of St. Germain de Près. He wrote a grammar of the Hebrew and Chaldee language, and made considerable progress in the compilation of a dictionary, which was left unfinished. He died in 1729.

GUASTALLINES (gwas'tal-leenz). See MONKS.

GUDGODAH (gud-go'dah), a station of the Israelites in the wilderness, Deut. x. 7. See HORHAGIDAD.

GUDULE (gu-dool'), or ERGOULE (er-gool'), SAINT, a Belgian virgin and the patroness of Brussels, is supposed to have been born about the year 650. She was educated by her god-mother, St. Gertrude of the convent of Nivelles, and upon her death led the life of an ascetic to such a degree that her good works secured to her the privilege, according to tradition, to perform miracles both during her life and after her death. She died in 712 and was buried in the church of St. Michael, in Brussels, which is now called, in honor of her, the Cathedral of St. Gudule.

GUEBRES (gweb'reez). See PARSEES.

GUEDIER (gwa-dyay') DE SAINT AUBIN, HENRI MICHEL, a French theologian and doctor of the Sorbonne, was born June 17, 1695, at Gournay-en-Bray, near Rouen, and was educated at Paris. He became professor in the Sorbonne in 1720, and was distinguished as a linguist and casuist. He was skilled in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, English, Italian and French languages, and for fourteen years decided all cases of conscience which were presented to the Sorbonne. He wrote the "Sacred History of the Two Covenants," which contains valuable disquisitions on the "Authenticity and Inspiration of the Old and New Testament Scriptures." He died September, 1742.

GUELPHERBYTANUS (gwel-fer-be-tah'-nus) CODEX. See MANUSCRIPTS.

GUELPHS (gwelfs) and Ghibellines (ghib'el-leenz) were two political parties that appeared in Italian history in the Middle Ages and distracted that country for a long time by their quarrels. The Guelphs derived their name from the great German house of Welfs or Guelfs, powerful dukes of Bavaria in the twelfth century, who were at enmity with the house of Hohenstauffen, from one of the castles of which, called Waiblingen, the name of Ghibellines is supposed to be derived. Frederick I., when the house of Hohenstauffen became the ruling power in Germany, invaded Italy in order to reassert the rights of the empire, and in this manner the names of these two political parties, of German origin, were transferred to that country. The popes and priests of Italy, who were the prominent opponents of the house of Hohenstauffen, thus became the leaders of the Guelph party. The ecclesiastical power becoming thus involved in a contest with an arm of civil authority, as the feud increased in bitterness the struggle became more and more distinctly marked in its character until the time of Frederic II., when the contention between him and successive popes became a conflict between the temporal and spiritual power. The latter secured the advantage mainly in the strife, though the Ghibellines still remained a party of considerable strength, especially in the northern part of Italy; and their power was greatly increased in the following century by the invasion of the emperor Henry of Luxemburg. The fortune of the two parties, however, frequently alternated until after the removal of the papal see to Avignon, in the fourteenth century, when the original principles of the parties appear to have been lost. Factions bearing the names, however, continued, and agitated the cities and governments of Italy down to the fifteenth century, or even a later period.

Herborn, and afterward professor of theology successively at Hanau and Bremen. He was the author of a work on theology, and died in 1711.

GUEST (gest). See HOSPITALITY.

GUERTLER (gert'ler), NICHOLAUS, D.D., a learned Protestant divine and professor of theology at Hanau, was born in 1654, at Basel, and was educated at the university in that city. In 1685 he became professor of philosophy and rhetoric at ing connected with a "religious" house in which hospitality is extended toward strangers.

GUIBERT (gi'bert), anti-pope, was archbishop of Ravenna when the disputes respecting investitures began between Pope Gregory VII. and the emperor Henry IV.; and after the excommunication of Henry and the election of a rival emperor, Rudolph, Guibert was elected pope by a council assembled by the emperor at Brixen, in 1080, and took the title of Clement III. In 1084 he crowned Henry at Rome, and was soon after driven away by Robert Guiscard, who came to the aid of Gregory. He retained the title of pope through the pontificates of Victor III. and Urban II., but in 1100 was pursued by the troops of Pascal II., and died the same year at Citta di Castello.

GUIDO D'AREZZO (ge'do da-rez'zo), the original inventor of the elements of modern counterpoint, born at Arezzo, at the close of the tenth century, flourished in the first half of the eleventh. He was a Benedictine monk, and resided chiefly in the monastery of Pomposa. He arranged the diatonic scale, deducing its characters from the initial syllables of the well-known hymn of St. John—

"Ut queant laxis Resonare fibris," etc.

He was also the first to write music in parts by points and other notes. He left a work under the title of "Micrologus," which is historically interesting, as giving an idea of the state of music in his day.

GUIDO DE BRES, a martyr and evangelist, was born at Mons in 1540, and indoctrinated in early life in the faith of the Romish Church. A study of the Scriptures soon led him to a knowledge of evangelical truth, and to escape persecution he fled to London and united with the Walloon Church, with a view of entering the ministry. Returning to his native land a short time afterward, he traveled as an evangelist, preaching the word with great zeal and earnestness. Meeting with persecution at Lille, he retired to Ghent and afterward to Geneva, where he became a devoted adherent of Calvin. Being determined to make another effort for the spiritual disenthralment of his country, he returned, and made the whole of Northern France and Southern Belgium the scene of a struggle for the truth. But his success awoke bitter opposition. Valenciennes, which had become strongly Protestant, was singled out for vengeance and stormed by Noircarmes in 1567. Guido was arrested, thrown into prison and a few weeks afterward hanged, May 31, 1567. Guido not only labored for the Reformation, but firmly believed in and confidently predicted its success, and the Dutch Church is greatly indebted to his labors and learning.

GUIGNES (geenye), CHRETIEN LOUIS JOSEPH DE, an Orientalist, was born August, 1759, at Paris, and was educated by his father with special attention to the Oriental languages. Receiving in 1784 the appointment of consul at Canton and French resident in China, he was also complimented with the honor of correspondent to the Academy of Sciences and the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres before he departed on his mission. He remained in China many years, wrote several useful papers for the academy and was connected with the compilation of a Chinese dictionary. He died March 9, 1845.

GUILD (gild), WILLIAM, a learned divine of the Church of Scotland and principal of King's College, Aberdeen, was born at Aberdeen in 1586. He studied at Marischal College, entered the ministry and became pastor of the parish of King Edward in the synod of Aberdeen. Bishop Andrews of Ely, who went with King James I. to Scotland, with the view of establishing episcopacy there, manifested great respect for Guild; and when he was promoted to the see of Winchester, Guild dedicated to him his new work, "Moses Unveiled." In 1640 Guild was made principal of King's College, but was removed by the Parliamentary commissioners in 1651, in consequence of his taking part with the monarchy. He was the author of several works against popery, besides "An Exposition of Solomon's Song," "An Exposition of the Apocalypse," and "An Exposition of Second Samuel." He died in 1657.

GUILDS were associations formed among mechanics and tradesmen in the Middle Ages to regulate the training of their apprentices, and to guard their respective privileges. Mutual benefit societies, fraternities, or religious clubs, embracing men and women established in parish churches, were given this title. They sometimes collected alms for the poor and afflicted, supported hospitals for invalid members and masses for their dead. A peculiar dress and the badge of their patron saint were worn at certain yearly feasts. Kings and nobles were sometimes admitted in the monasteries as lay members, and in the parish societies as honorary members. "The members promised fidelity to the guild rules and obedience to superiors."

GUILLEMINNE (guil'le-meen), or GUILLEMETTE (guil'le-met), a woman in the thirteenth century who professed to have the mission of saving Mohammedans, Jews, and Christians of questionable character. Leaving Bohemia, the place of her birth, she went to Milan, endeavoring to produce the impression that she was the daughter of Queen Constantia, conceived in a miraculous manner, like Jesus Christ. By her pretended visions and manner of living she gained a few adherents, who were accused of gross immorality in their mysteries. She died about 1300. A few years after her death the society was scattered, and the place of meeting became a convent of the Carmelites.

GUISE (gize). This is the name of a family which distinguished itself chiefly in the persecution of the Huguenots. 1. CLAUDE, count of Lorraine, first duke, was born in 1496, was a man of great courage and ambition. He married Antoinette de Bourbon, by whom he had several children, one of whom, Mary, married James V. of Scotland, and became the mother of Mary queen of Scots. 2. FRANÇOIS, born in 1519, second duke, for some years wielded sovereign power in France, and distinguished himself in battle with Charles V. As head of the Romish party, he was a bitter enemy of the Huguenots; and when they took up arms against their tyrants, he defeated them at Dreux, but he was shortly after assassinated by one of them. He it was who wrested Calais, the last of the French possessions, from the English. He died in 1563. 3. HENRI, the third duke, was surnamed "Balafré" (scarred) in consequence of a wound he received in the face at the siege of Boulogne, was born in 1550. He was a cruel-hearted, bloody-minded man, the ruthless foe of the Huguenots, against whom he fought in the field and plotted in the chamber. He favored the massacre of St. Bartholomew and ill-treated the murdered body of Coligny. He revolted against Henri III., who, weary of his overbearing insolence, had forbidden him the court, and whom he defeated. A reconciliation was effected, but Henry had determined on the death of the duke, and by his orders he was stabbed to death as he was entering the royal apartment. He died in 1588.

GUISE, CHARLES, born in 1524, cardinal of Lorraine, a powerful statesman, was archbishop of Rheims when fourteen years old. He took a leading part at the Council of Trent, where he declared that if the council was not recognized as superior to the pope, he and twenty-six other bishops would enter their protest. He was an eloquent and learned man, haughty and ambitious, destitute of sincerity, faith or religion. He died in 1574.

GUNDULF (gun'dulf), the founder of a sect in the northern part of France in the beginning of the eleventh century. Of his early history or career very little is known. He was probably a working man in some of the trades which were remunerative there at that time, and his disciples were very likely his fellow-workmen and others of the same condition in life, who called him master, in imitation of his disciples. Gerhard, bishop of Arras and Cambrai in 1025, caused the arrest of a number of the Gundulfians on a charge of holding heretical opinions. The bishop, with a view of becoming acquainted with their real sentiments, was himself initiated into the mysteries of their worship, and thus satisfied himself concerning their doctrines. They appear to have maintained the following among other tenets: "The holy Church is the community of the righteous, and is formed of persons chosen by election. Admission into it is signified by the imposition of hands after a confession of faith and the taking of certain vows. Besides the regular assemblies in the church, there are prayer-meetings, in which the disciples wash each other's feet. The apostles and martyrs are to be venerated, but saint worship is forbidden. The fulfillment of the law constitutes righteousness, which alone works salvation. Disobedience in the elect and disregard of their professional vows entail everlasting condemnation on them. Neither penitence nor conversion can afterward avail them." The bishop and synod condemned the heresy, excommunicated such of the originators as would not recant, and made the prisoners previous to release sign a summary of Romish doctrines on which they held heretical opinions. Very little is known of the sect afterward.

GUNDULF, bishop of Rochester in 1077, was one of the Norman ecclesiastics brought over by William the Conqueror. He was a celebrated architect, and built that part of the Tower of London called the White Tower. He also rebuilt Rochester Cathedral. Died 1108.

GUNI (geu'ni). 1. A son of Naphtali and head of the house of the Gunites, Gen. xlii. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 13. 2. A descendant of Gad and father of Abdiel, 1 Chr. v. 15. The words that follow, "chief of the house of their fathers," refer to Ahi, and not to Abdiel. The Gunites were the family of Naphtali descended from Guni.

GUNPOWDER PLOT, the name in English history of the celebrated conspiracy of certain disappointed Romanists to destroy King James and the two Houses of Parliament by gunpowder, in revenge for his course in reference to the Protestants. The combination consisted of thirteen persons, mostly men of birth and fortune, who planned and attempted to carry out this scheme, which was detected on the 4th of November, 1605. The plot was matured during the spring and summer of 1604. It was determined that a mine should be run below the hall in which the Parliament was to assemble, that the moment when the king was delivering his address to both Houses of Parliament should be selected for springing the mine, and thus by one blow cut off the king, lords, commons and all the other enemies of the Roman Catholic religion, then to spread a report that the Puritans were the perpetrators of the inhuman act, and to proclaim the princess Elizabeth queen, and to ask assistance from France, Spain and other powers if necessary, when the preliminary plan had been carried out. For this purpose a house adjoining the Houses of Parliament was hired by the conspirators, and as the necessities of the case required in the further progress of the nefarious undertaking, a cellar was rented under the Upper House of Parliament, which at the time was filled with sea-coal, that was awaiting sale, and the cellar had been advertised to be let. To this cellar thirty barrels of gunpowder which had been ordered from Holland and landed at Lambeth were secretly and gradually conveyed by night, and covered with stones, iron bars, a thousand billets and five hundred fagots, ready for the meeting of the Parliament on the 5th of November.

But a providential circumstance revealed the conspiracy and blasted all their prospects. One of the conspirators, having a desire to save Lord Monteagle, sent him a letter advising him to absent himself from the opening of Parliament, as he valued his safety. The noble lord, hesitating what action to take in the premises, and fearing the king's life might also be in danger, took the letter at midnight to the earl of Salisbury, who, being equally at a loss to understand its import, consulted with the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain. Certain expressions in the letter led the latter to conjecture what in the end proved to be the truth. The letter having been submitted to earls Nottingham, Worcester and Northampton, they awaited the arrival of the king from Royston on the 1st of November, and it was decided that a search should be made on the day preceding that designed for the meeting of Parliament.

Accordingly, on the afternoon and evening of the 4th of November a search was commenced with great prudence and caution by the lord chamberlain (whose duty it was to see that everything was in readiness), Lord Monteagle and others. And finally, about midnight, Sir Thomas Knyvet, steward of Westminster, met Guy Fawkes coming out of the cellar, booted and spurred, with a tinder-box and three matches in his pockets. Knyvet seized him without ceremony, and confirmed his suspicion by discovering the barrels of gunpowder. Fawkes, who was a hardened villain, confessed the truth, admitted that he had confederates in the crime, but refused to betray them. A number of the conspirators were, however, apprehended and executed. Lord Monteagle had a pension allowed him for life, and the anniversary of this providential deliverance was ordered to be for ever commemorated by prayer and thanksgiving. The observance has been discontinued.

GUR (ger), the name of an ascent where Ahasiah, king of Judah, was slain, 2 Ki. ix. 27. This ascent was at or near Iblean, a town of Western Manasseh. Neither place has been identified, but the steep pass of Gur must have been near Megiddo, and formed, probably, one of the ascents from the plain of Esdraelon to the higher grounds. Eusebius and Jerome mention a gai, which they simply describe as pharynx, "a craggy precipice."

xxvi. 7. The Targum makes it the well-known Gerar. This is probably correct, as the inhabitants of Gur-baal are mentioned along with the Maonim, who dwelt by Gerar, 1 Chr. iv. 41. See MAONITES.

GURLEY (gur'le), PHINEHAS D., D.D., a distinguished minister of the Presbyterian Church, was born at Hamilton, Madison county, New York, November 12, 1816. At an early age he made a profession of religion, graduated at Union College, New York, in 1837, with the highest honors of his class, entered the theological seminary at Princeton, New Jersey, the same year, and graduated in theology in 1840. He immediately accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis, Indiana, and labored there for nine years, greatly blessed with revivals and a large increase to his church. In 1840 he accepted the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Dayton, Ohio, where his ministry was attended with a like success for four years. In 1854 he was settled, at the solicitation of his brethren in the ministry, over the F street Presbyterian Church, Washington, District of Columbia, with which, in 1859, the Second Presbyterian Church was united, thus forming the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. Gurley remained pastor until his death, September 30, 1868. Dr. Gurley was elected chaplain to the United States Senate in 1859, was the pastor of several Presidents of the United States, and was present with President Lincoln in his dying hour. He was characterized with great earnestness and singleness of aim in life, and was signally blessed with success in the cause of his Master.

GURNAL (gur'nal), WILLIAM, an English clergyman and author of "The Christian in Complete Armor," was born in 1617. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and became rector of the church at Lavenham in 1644, where he remained for thirty-five years, and died in 1679. Besides the eminent and highly-prized work alluded to, he published a volume of sermons.

GURNEY (gur'ney), JOHN JOSEPH, a distinguished philanthropist, the brother of Elizabeth Fry, and her companion in her memorable visits to the prisons of Great Britain and the Continent, was born at Earham Hall, Norfolk, August 2, 1788. When four years of age he lost his mother, and his early education was entrusted to his three eldest sisters. At a later period he went to Oxford, where he enjoyed many advantages of the university without becoming a member or subscribing to the Thirty-nine Articles. His preference ultimately became settled in favor of the views and profession of the "Quakers," among whom he was born; and consistently with them he lived and died, by no means finding in them any barrier to the fullest and freest association with any other body of Christians. He became an earnest and most useful minister among the Friends, and in his great and loving zeal he traveled over several European countries, the United States and the West Indies. He was a voluminous writer on subjects of interest in his day, especially on the practical side of Christianity. He died in 1847, regretted by the great and the good on both sides of the ocean.

GURY (geu-re), JOSEPH PIERRE, a Romish theologian, was born January 23, 1801. He was admitted a member of the Society of Jesus in 1824, and became professor of moral theology at Vals, in France. He was the author of a work on moral theology, which acquired some notoriety on account of its defence of several very offensive doctrines. This and a work of kindred character, charged with inculcating principles inconsistent with, and antagonistic to, an orderly form of civil government, have passed through several editions, and have been used as text-books in seminaries of learning. He died April 18, 1866.

GUSTAVUS (gus-tah'vus). Two of the members of the line of Swedish kings of this name require brief notice here on account of the influence they exerted in the religious history of their country. 1. The first of the name, surnamed VASA, or more correctly called Gustavus ERICSON, was the son of Eric Vasa, duke of Gripsholm, and was born in 1490. Having formed the project of delivering his country from the yoke of Denmark, he was seized and imprisoned by Christian II. But he escaped; and notwithstanding great perils, he reached Dalecarlia, gradually roused the peasants against the foreign despot, took Upsal and other towns in 1521, and received the title of regent from the states. In 1523 he was proclaimed king, took Stockholm and expelled Christian. He did not at first, however, accept the title of king, and was not crowned till 1528. In a national council the following year he procured the abolition of the papal religion in Sweden, and established Protestantism. In 1544 the kingdom was declared hereditary in his family. He was an able ruler, and exercised almost absolute authority, rendering very great services to his country in its legislation, its manners, its education, its commerce, and especially in its religion. At his death, in 1560, he left his country at peace, the treasury full, and otherwise in a happy state. 2. The second of the name, Gustavus ADOLPHUS, grandson of the preceding, born in 1594, succeeded his father, Charles IX., in 1611, when only fifteen years of age. He soon acquired the appellation of THE GREAT by his valor and wisdom. Finding his country in the midst of a severe war with Denmark, Russia and Poland, this he brought to a speedy close, securing most advantageous and honorable terms for Sweden. In 1620 he married Eleanor, daughter of the elector of Brandenburg, who became the mother of the celebrated Christina, his successor on the throne, acquired subsequently great part of Livonia, and successfully routed Sigismund, king of Poland, who invaded Sweden, assisted by Russia, in support of his asserted claims to the crown. Once more at peace, he became interested in the distress of the Protestants of Germany; and led by his earnest regard for the Protestant faith and his sorrowful indignation at the cruel persecution under which they were suffering, he marched in 1630 to their aid, with a small force of 8000 men, which was afterward augmented by a body of English troops under the duke of Hamilton. From the isle of Rügen, of which he first made himself master, he advanced from point to point in Pomerania and Mecklenburg, victorious at every step. He took eighty fortified towns in eight months. At length the emperor sent his great general, Tilly, to oppose him, and Gustavus won a great victory over him at Leipsic on the 7th September, 1631. Saxony heartily supported Gustavus, who soon after took Mentz, and in April, 1632, defeated Tilly again at the passage of the Lech. The emperor, alarmed by the invasion of Bohemia, made Wallenstein commander-in-chief, who recovered Bohemia, and after holding a strong position near Nuremberg for many weeks met Gustavus on the field of Lützen on the 6th November, 1632. Victory was with the Swedes, but their heroic leader fell in the fight, not without suspicion of assassination, as he was found shot in the back, which he was never known to turn to an avowed enemy.

CHRISTINA OF SWEDEN.—See GUSTAVUS.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS SOCIETY, an association of members of the Evangelical Protestant Church of Germany formed for the purpose of aiding Protestants, both in and out of Germany, in times of persecution and suffering. It was first organized November 6, 1832, the anniversary of the battle of Lützen, in honor of Gustavus Adolphus, the champion of Protestantism, who won the victory by the sacrifice of his life, and designed to be a memorial to his name instead of a monument of stone or brass. Shortly after the organization of the first society another was formed at Dresden, and another at Leipsic, which in 1834 were united in one, and upon the anniversary of the Reformation in 1841 an appeal was issued to Protestants throughout the world to unite in the formation of a general society. As a preparatory step toward the accomplishment of this object, a meeting was held at Leipsic September 16, 1842, and "The Evangelical Society of the Gustavus Adolphus Institution" was formed; and upon the 21st day of September, 1843, a general assembly was convened at Frankfort, in which twenty-nine societies were represented. The object of the society, according to the rules here adopted, is "to succor all Protestants, either in or out of Germany, who stand in need of help, and who have given proof of their adherence to the principles of the Evangelical Church." There is a central association, consisting of twenty-four members (elected by the chief associations), which represents the whole union, manages the general fund and directs appropriations to the chief associations. In every state or province of large countries there is a chief association, which has its auxiliaries or local societies which furnish the means for the work of the central association. In the general assemblies, which are held in different cities of Germany, the business of the association is discussed, the accounts adjusted and questions of general interest settled. The society is rendering efficient aid and encouragement to a large number of Protestant congregations.

GUTBIR (goot'ber), GILES, born at Wirstensee, in Thuringia, 1617, studied at Rostock, Königsberg and Leyden, and after visiting Oxford and Lübeck became, in 1652, professor of Oriental languages at Hamburg. In 1660 the university of Giessen made him doctor in theology, after which he taught logic and philosophy as well as Eastern tongues. He is chiefly noted for his Syriac works. He printed himself, on a press of his own, the Peshito New Testament, with the vowels; also, a "Syriac Lexicon," containing all the words and particles of the New Testament; "Critical Notes on the Syriac New Testament," the "Nine Oriental Muses," "On the Angels," a "Discussion on Re-baptizing." He died in 1667.

GUTENBERG (goot'en-berg), JOHN or HENNE, inventor of printing with movable types, was born at or near Mentz about 1400. He was of a noble family, and was compelled, probably by civil dissensions, to retire to Strasburg, about 1424. He appears to have lived there for twenty years, and it is pretty certain that his great invention was perfected before his return to Mentz in 1443. Harassed by lawsuits and pecuniary difficulties, he entered in 1450 into a kind of partnership with John Faust, a rich goldsmith of Mentz, which was dissolved five years later, Faust thenceforth carrying on the business with Schöffer. Gutenberg is said to have established another press, and went on printing. In 1465 he was received among the courtiers of the elector of Mentz, and died in 1468. A festival was held at Mentz in 1837, on occasion of the erection there of a fine statue of Gutenberg.

GUTHRIE (guth're), THOMAS, D.D., was born at Brechin, in Forfarshire, Scotland, July 12, 1803. His father was a banker and merchant, belonging to the most influential family in his native town. His early education was conducted in Brechin, and at a proper age he entered the university of Edinburgh; and having passed through the undergraduate course and the long years of the theological training in the Divinity Hall which the law of the Church of Scotland requires, he was licensed to preach the gospel, and settled as the parish minister of Arbirlot in the presbytery of Arbroath. Here his remarkable pulpit power soon became known, and he was recognized as one of the most acceptable and powerful preachers in the Church of Scotland north of the Frith of Forth. The geniality and deep sympathy of his nature gave him a command over his audiences which was everywhere recognized, and his brethren saw that he was destined to take a high place in the ministry of his native land. After an effective pastorate of seven years in Arbirlot he was removed to Edinburgh in 1837, and settled in the Old Gray Friars' Church. He entered on this charge with great hesitation, as he knew the arduous nature of a pastorate in the capital of Scotland, where the education of the people is of such a high order, where theology is so profoundly studied and so well understood, and where so many intellects of a high order are found in the other pulpits of the city. His friends, who urged his settlement in Edinburgh, knew his powers better than he did himself, and they made no mistake, as the years of his ministry in that city abundantly testified. Like all great capitals, Edinburgh has a stratum of society which is affected by poverty, vice and wretchedness, and among the lowest and the most hopeless classes of his parish and of the city generally, he began one of the most valuable and effective of all his schemes for the reformation of the young. As the great patron and effective leader of Ragged Schools, his name will be associated with that cause, as that of Robert Raikes is with the system of Sunday-schools.

In the great warfare which resulted in the disruption of the Church of Scotland, he was ever found on the side of the rights and liberties of the Christian people, and he was one of the leaders in the noble band who in 1843 resigned their position in the Established Church, and laid down their temporal estate at the feet of the great Head of the Church, rather than sacrifice conscience and betray what they held to be the rights of Zion's King. He took a leading part in the formation of the Free Church of Scotland, and at once he gave himself with all the warmth of his heart, and the zeal of his ardent temperament, to the vast work of providing manses for his brethren all over Scotland. Few men have ever undertaken such a work, but through rain and snow, over moorlands and through mountain-gorges as well as in rural parishes, he toiled, and with an eloquence and power which in Scotland has never been exceeded, he persevered until his labors were crowned with success. Though endowed with a powerful frame and an iron constitution, this gigantic work was too much for him. His health failed him, and he was obliged to divide the labors of the parish with a colleague, and for many years his friend and brother, Dr. Hanna, was associated with him in the parish labor. In 1863 he was obliged to resign his charge, and afterwards until his death, on the 24th day of February, 1873, he devoted himself with great assiduity to literary work as editor of the Sunday Magazine, and in preparing for the press the numerous works which have made his name so well known on both sides of the Atlantic. His publications are very numerous, the principal ones being "The Gospel in Ezekiel;" "Christ the Inheritance of the Saints;" "The Way to Life;" "Ragged Schools—a Collection of Pleas;" "The City; its Sins and Sorrows;" "Early Piety;" "Man and the Gospel;" "Our Father's Business;" "Out of Harness;" "Speaking to the Heart;" "Studies of Character from the Old Testament, in two Series;" "The Angels' Song;" "The Parables read in the Light of the Present Day;" "Sundays on the Continent;" "Berridge's Christian World Unmasked;" and an edition of "Saving Knowledge," in which he was aided by Dr. Blaikie. He left an autobiography which reaches down to 1842. Such was the life of the great Scottish preacher and eminent philanthropist, whose power as an evangelical orator was second to none in his day and generation.

GUTZLAFF (gootz'laf), KARL, the eminent linguist and missionary, was born at Stettin, Prussia, in 1803. He had a great natural talent for acquiring languages, and at first educated himself with a view to diplomatic life in the East. He gave up this design to devote himself to missionary labor in foreign parts. He volunteered to go to the Dutch settlements in the East, under the auspices of the "Netherlands Missionary Society." Before proceeding thither he went to England, where he became acquainted with many friends of missions, and especially with Dr. Morrison, then on a visit, after a long residence in China. This meeting with Dr. Morrison gave Gutzlaff a strong bias toward China. In 1823, being then only in his twenty-first year, he proceeded to Singapore; and such was his aptitude for languages that before he had been there two years he was able to converse fluently in, as well to read and write, five Eastern languages. In August, 1828, in company with Mr. Tomlin, an English missionary, Dr. Gutzlaff set out to visit the kingdom of Siam. They spent six months at Bangkok. Early in 1830 he returned alone to Siam, and in the spring of the following year went to China. At Bankok he had become naturalized as a subject of the Celestial Empire, by adoption into a particular clan or family. Having assumed a Chinese name, and wearing the Chinese dress, and conforming to their customs, he visited, along with the crew of the junk in which he sailed, a large tract of the coast without any molestation. After a six months' voyage he reached Macao safely, in December, 1831, when he had the satisfaction of being welcomed by his friend Dr. Morrison. In February of the following year he was appointed surgeon and interpreter to the English commission, and afterward secretary, the duties of which he discharged to the satisfaction of all parties, while at the same time he never lost sight of his character as a missionary, but took every opportunity of spreading the light of the gospel. He made a Chinese translation of the New Testament, besides publishing "A Journal of Three Voyages along the Coast of China, in 1831, 1832 and 1833," containing much interesting information, and full of the author's personal adventures. He afterward published two other works, "A History of China," and "China Opened," the last of which contains the most comprehensive and correct account up to that time given in English popular literature of the topography, history, customs, laws and literature of the Celestial Empire. He died in 1851.

GUY, THOMAS, the founder of Guy's Hospital, London, was the son of a bargeman, born in 1644, and commenced life as a small bookseller. In this capacity he made money by printing Bibles, first on his own account and then for the universities, and also by successful speculations in the South Sea scheme, and by the more questionable practice of purchasing seamen's prize-tickets. He amassed a fortune of nearly half a million pounds sterling, of which he spent about £200,000 in building and endowing the hospital in Southwark, London, which bears his name. He also erected almshouses at Tamworth, his mother's native place, which he represented in Parliament, besides making bequests to Christ's Hospital and various other charities, and leaving £80,000 to be divided among those who could prove any degree of relationship to him. He died in 1724, aged eighty.

GUYON (ge-ong'), JEANNE MARIE BOUVIER DE LA MOTHE, a French religious enthusiast, was born at Montargis in 1648. Of an ascetic disposition, she wished to enter a convent; her family opposing, she married. A few years afterward she became a widow, having two or three children; these she left to the care of others, believing she had a divine mission, and in 1681 journeyed over Piedmont and other places, propagating her doctrine of Quietism. She professed to be wholly guided by "divine impulses," and that she had made a complete renunciation of self and annihilated all earthly cares and emotions—a condition of silence of the soul, which has since obtained the name of quietism. Misled by her heated imagination, she imagined that Heaven destined her for an extraordinary mission, and for several years she wandered from place to place, preaching her doctrines and making converts; among her disciples was the celebrated Fénelon. She was much persecuted, and confined successively in a convent, the Bastille, and lastly in the castle of Vincennes, in 1695. After six years' confinement, she regained her liberty, but was exiled to Denziers, where she devoted herself to works of charity until her death, in 1717.

GUYSE (gize), JOHN, D.D., an eminent English dissenting preacher and writer, was born at Hertford in 1680. For many years he was pastor of the Independent church in his native town. In 1727 he removed to London, and was the first pastor of the church in New Broad street. Here he continued until his death, November 22, 1761. His chief work was a paraphrastic exposition of the New Testament, the first volume of which was entitled "A practical exposition of the four Evangelists, in the form of a paraphrase, with occasional notes in their proper places for further explication, and serious recollections at the close of every chapter." The second volume, with a similar title, included the Acts and the Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. The third volume included the remaining books of the New Testament. The work is inferior to Doddridge's, both for expository and devotional purposes.

GYMNASIUM (jim-nay'zh'um). The word is derived from the Greek, and in process of time has been applied to institutions very different from each other in character. For instance, it was used to designate a bath, and in medieval times it was frequently applied, but very improperly, to a monastery, and in more modern times it is used as the appellation of a school for boys. Originally it was a structure erected for games and physical exercises among the Greeks, as they attached great importance to the healthy condition of the body. Almost every Greek city had such an institution, and as Greek manners extended toward the East the Jews in the time of the Maccabees began to imitate the customs of the Western nation. The stricter classes in Judæa, however, who knew how their fathers had suffered in consequence of their adoption of customs from heathen countries, opposed their introduction, but gradually they increased in number, and one was even erected at Jerusalem.

GYMNOSOPHISTS (gym-no'sof-ists) were an ancient sect of Hindoo philosophers who believed in the doctrine of metempsychosis, discarded all clothing, and were infatuated with a mania of committing suicide by burning themselves to death in order to facilitate the development of their peculiar belief. They were divided into classes, the Garmans and Brachmans. They inculcated an utter disregard of all worldly goods and advantages, and believed ascetic practices and the mortification of carnal instincts to constitute the highest wisdom.

GYPSY (jip'se), or GYPSIES, corrupted from Egyptian, is the name of an idle, wandering race of people found in Europe and parts of Asia, Africa and America. They pass under different names and nicknames in different countries. Their original country, and the causes which have led to such a wide dispersion in various parts of the world, have been subjects of much speculation among the learned. Some writers have placed their remote ancestry on the lower Danube, others in Tartary, Nubia, Mesopotamia, Ethiopia, etc. An old legend revived in our day claims their descent from the Egyptians, while the opinion generally prevails that they came to Europe from Hindostan. This view is supported by the resemblance between the Gypsy and Hindostanee language, their physiological affinities and the similarity of modes of life adopted. In the fifteenth century the Gypsies are mentioned as spreading over Western Europe. They were at first regarded as Christian pilgrims, but their irregular life, and the deceptions practiced upon the communities through which they passed, soon caused them to be regarded in a very different light. Severe laws were enacted against them, and their diminution or destruction was seriously threatened. More humane views of them, however, soon prevailed, and plans were proposed and furthered for their mental and moral improvement with some degree of success. A school was established at Farnham in Dorsetshire, England, in 1832, in which Gypsy children were received, instructed in the ordinary branches of education and in a knowledge of the Scriptures, and trained to service and various trades. An increasing number is adopting settled modes of life. Simpson estimates the number of gypsies in Europe and America at 4,000,000. As a race they appear to be almost destitute of religious sentiments, their language containing none of those terms which convey the idea of God, immortal existence or the undying soul. Though the sacrifice of horses at a divorce ceremony involves a religious conception and suggests an affinity with Hindoo mythological ideas, their mental and moral degradation call loudly for Christian effort in their evangelization, and their consequent elevation to useful members of the community. Such a result would be one of the grandest victories of the gospel.

H.

HAAG (hahg), or HAGUE (hayg), APOLOGETICAL SOCIETY, organized in 1785 in Holland for the purpose of encouraging scientific works in defence of the principles of Christianity. A premium is annually offered for the best work upon a given subject.

HAAHASHTARI (ha-a-hash'ta-re), one of the descendants of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 6.

HAAK (hahk), THEODOR, a learned German who was born in 1605 and took up his residence in Oxford, where he studied for three years, but without taking a degree. He was employed by the Westminster Assembly of divines to translate into English the "Dutch Annotations upon the Bible, together with their own translation of the text, as both were ordered by the Synod of Dort." The Royal Society took its rise from weekly meetings which Haak and some friends held to discuss philosophical subjects, and he was one of the original members. He died in 1690.

HAAN (hahn), CHARLES DE, was born August 16, 1530 at Arnheim, in the Netherlands. Imbibing in early life the principles of the Reformation, he abandoned the Romish Church and his proposed profession for life, and became a student of theology under Calvin and Beza, and having entered the ministry, was settled in 1560 over the Reformed church at Deventer. Interrupted here in his work by persecution, he repaired to Havre, where, befriended by William, duke of Cleves, he labored for sixteen years, when the same necessity compelled him again to depart elsewhere. The stadtholder of Guelderland, Count Jan of Nassau, and his son Lodewij Willem, stadtholder of Friesland, next secured his labors in the work of reformation in these provinces. In 1587 he was appointed professor extraordinary of theology at Leyden, where he remained for four years. He was the author of a commentary on the book of Revelation, in Latin, and a work in Dutch against the Anabaptists. He died January 28, 1816.

HABAIHAH (hab-i'ah), a priest whose descendants returned from captivity; but their genealogy was defective, Ezra ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63.

HABAKKUK (hab'ak-kuk), a prophet of whose history we know literally nothing. He is described in the title to the book which bears his name simply as "the prophet," Hag. i. 1; see also iii. 1. There is thus a wide open field for conjecture, and various traditional guesses have been hazarded. It is useless to chronicle them here. Suffice it to say that the pseudo-Epiphanius calls him a native of Beth-zocher and of the tribe of Simeon. With very little more probability he has been supposed, from the subscription, iii. 19, a Levite. Nor does it add weight to the supposition that the Habakkuk of the apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon is said in the Septuagint of Origen's "Tetrapla" to have been the son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi.

There are, however, in this prophet's writings a few indications of the time when he lived. Thus, in i. 5, 6, a threat is uttered of the Chaldæan invasion, of which at the time no danger, obviously, was apprehended; and yet it is said that it should come in the days of that generation. This would point to the reign of Josiah. And as we can hardly imagine ii. 20; comp. iii. 19, written before the reformation or re-establishment of the temple-service, we may with some probability place Habakkuk's ministry in the later years of Josiah, see 2 Chr. xxxiv. Some have imagined, by comparing Hab. ii. 20 with Zeph. i. 7, that Habakkuk preceded Zephaniah, and further, by a comparison of Hab. i. 8 with Jer. iv. 13; v. 6, that he prophesied before Jeremiah—that is, before the thirteenth year of Josiah. But little stress can be laid on such deductions.

HABAKKUK, THE BOOK OF, 620-609 B. C. This book stands in our ordinary Bibles eighth among those of the minor prophets. It forms a complete whole, in three parts, corresponding to our division of chapters. 1. Describing an impending judgment. 2. The downfall of the enemy of God's Church. 3. The answer of that believing Church to the two-fold revelation, a magnificent one, expressing the fear which the threatened judgment inspired, and the consolatory hope imparted by the promised gracious retribution; the whole illustrated by the remembrance of God's great deeds in old time. More particularly, in i. 1-4, the prophet bewails the corruption of his people; in 5-11 the Lord threatens righteous punishment; in 12-17 we have the prophet's expostulation. In ii. 1 he expresses a determination to watch and wait for a reply; this he is told to make plain; a general denunciation follows; and then the various nations oppressed are represented as uttering woes upon the Chaldæans for their prominent vices—their ambition; their covetousness; their cruelty; their debauchery; their idolatry. Each stanza here (so to call it) commences with "woe," and concludes with a verse introduced by a word signifying "for" or "because." In the fifth stanza, however, there is an introductory verse. Chap. iii., though intimately connected with what precedes, is a complete poem in itself. This is unrivaled in its conception and in the sublimity of its thoughts. The entire prophecy must, indeed, be placed high among the remains of Hebrew poetry. The majesty of the ideas and the purity of the fiction are alike most perfect.

HABAMINIAH (hab-a-zin-i'ah), one of the Rechabites, Jer. xxxv. 3.

HABERGEON (ha-ber'j'un). This term occurs in our version as the rendering of three different Hebrew words. One of them is used, Ex. xxviii. 32; xxxix. 23, to illustrate the mode of making the priest's ephod. Gesenius describes it as a military garment, properly of linen, strong and thickly woven, furnished with mail round the neck and breast; the hole of the ephod was to be like the hole of this habergeon, with a binding, that it might not rend. In 2 Chr. xxvi. 14; Neh. iv. 16 the word so translated means corselet, coat-of-mail. But that in Job xli. 26 must intend rather an offensive weapon. Carey translates it "battle-axe."

HABERKORN (hab'er-korn), PETER, a distinguished polemic German divine whose learning and ability were especially called into requisition against the Romanists and Syncretists, was born in 1604 at Butzbach. He was made professor of theology at Giessen, and filled several other important positions. He died April, 1676.

HABERT (ha-bayr'), ISAAC, a learned French prelate and doctor of the Sorbonne distinguished by his writings on Grace, in which he opposes Jansenius. He translated the pontifical of the Greek Church, and besides many other works, left numerous poems and hymns. He died in 1668.

HABOR (hah'bor), a river, and apparently also a district, of Assyria, to which considerable interest is attached in connection with the first captivity. We read in 1 Chr. v. 26 that Tiglath-pileser carried away "the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, and brought them unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river Gozan." About seventeen years later, Shalmaneser, the successor of the former monarch, "took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor, the river of Gozan" (Authorized Version, "by the river Gozan," 2 Ki. xvii. 6; xviii. 11). There are two rivers still bearing this name, and geographers are not agreed as to which is here referred to.

A river called Khabûr rises in the central high-

The other and much more celebrated river, Khabûr, is called Aborrhâs by Strabo, Chaboras by Ptolemy and Pliny. "It rises about lat. 36° 40', long. 40°, flows only a little south of east to its junction near Koukab with the Jeruher or river of Nisibis, which comes down from Mons Masius. Both of these branches are formed by the union of a number of streams. Neither of them is fordable for some distance above their junction, and below it they constitute a river of such magnitude as to be navigable for a considerable distance by steamers. The entire length of the stream is not less than two hundred miles." Rawlinson and others maintain that this is the ancient Habor. There can be no doubt that Assyria proper was confined to the country lying along the banks of the upper Tigris Mesopotamia called Gauzanitis. It lay around the Khabûr, and was doubtless identical with Gozan, hence the phrase, "Habor the river of Gozan," 2 Ki. xvii. 6. Chalcitis, which appears to be identical with Halâh, mentioned in the same passage, adjoined Gauzanitis. It is a remarkable fact that down as late as the twelfth century there were large Jewish communities on the banks of the Khabûr. This appears to be the Habor of the Bible. The district along the banks probably took its name from the river, as would seem from a comparison with 1 Chr. v. 26. It seems doubtful whether Habor was identical with the river Chebar, on which Ezekiel saw his visions. The latter was perhaps farther south in Babylonia, Ezek. i. 3, etc.

HAGAR AND ISHMAEL IN THE WILDERNESS.

lands of Kurdistan, flows in a south-westerly direction, and falls into the Tigris about seventy miles above Mosul. Many suppose this to be the Habor of Scripture, for the following reasons: 1. It is within Assyria proper, which Ptolemy says was bounded on the west by the Tigris, vi. 1. 2. It is affirmed that the Assyrian monarch would place his captives in a central part of his kingdom, such as this is, and not in the outskirts. 3. Habor is termed "a river of Gozan," and Gozan is supposed to signify "pasture," and to be identical with the word Zozan, now applied by the Nestorians to the pasture-lands in the highlands of Assyria, where the Khabûr takes its rise. 4. Ptolemy mentions a mountain called Chabor, which divides Assyria from Media, and Bochart says the river Chabor has its source in that mountain. Some have supposed that the modern Nestorians are the descendants of the captive Jews.

and stretching eastward to Media. But its territory gradually expanded, so as to include Babylonia, Mesopotamia, and even the country westward to the confines of Cilicia and Phœnicia. At the time of the captivity the power of Assyria was at its height. The Jewish captives were as secure on the banks of the western as of the eastern Habor. The ruins of Assyrian towns are scattered over the whole of Northern Mesopotamia. "On the banks of the Lower Khabour are the remains of a royal palace, besides many other traces of the tract through which it runs having been permanently occupied by the Assyrian people. Even near Seruj, in the country between Haran and the Euphrates, some evidence has been found not only of conquest, but of occupation." There can be no doubt that the Khabûr was in Assyria, and near the centre of the kingdom, at the time of the captivity. Further, Ptolemy mentions a province in HACHALIAH (hak-a-li'ah), the father of Nehemiah, Neh. i. 1; x. 1.

HACHILAH (ha-ki'lah), a hill in the neighborhood of Ziph, facing the wilderness in the woody fastnesses of which David and his men were lurking when the Ziphites sent twice to inform Saul, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1. But their treachery was bootless. In the first case, Saul was diverted from the pursuit by the intelligence of an incursion of the Philistines; in the second, David and Abishai stole into Saul's camp by night and carried off the king's spear and cruse of water. Hachilah has not been identified.

HACHMONI (hak'mo-ne), of whom nothing is known except that he was the father or founder of a family, of whom were two of David's officers, Jashobeam and Jehiel, 1 Chr. xi. 11; xxvii. 32.

HACHMONITE (hak'mon-ite), the patronymic of the descendants of Hachmoni, 1 Chr. xi. 11. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 it is Tachmonite.

HACKET (hak'et), JOHN, D.D., an English prelate of eminence, was born in London, September 1, 1592. He pursued his early education at Westminster School, entered Trinity College, Cambridge in 1608, became Fellow and tutor afterward in this institution, and was afterward, on account of his great merit, made chaplain to the bishop of Lincoln, and subsequently to James I. He became successively prebendary in Lincoln, rector of Cheam in Surrey, and of St. Andrew's, Holborn. At the commencement of the Civil War he was one of the divines chosen to submit to the committee of the House of Lords a report on Church reforms. After the Restoration he declined the bishopric of Gloucester and accepted that of Lichfield and Coventry, repairing the cathedral of Lichfield in a munificent manner at his own expense. He died October 21, 1670.

HACKSPAN (hak'span), DIETRICH, or in the Latinized form of his name, THEODORICUS HACKSPANNUS, was born at Weimar in 1607. He early devoted himself to the study of sacred philology, and on this account became an earnest student of the Oriental languages. He studied for seven years in the theological and philosophical schools of Jena, then at Altorf under the Orientalist Schwenter, and subsequently at Helmstadt under G. Calixtus. In 1636 he returned to Altorf, and became professor of Oriental languages in that university, where he also held a chair of theology. He was reputed to be the first scholar of his age in Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee and Arabic. He died January 19, 1659. His most important Biblical works are, "A Treatise on the Use of Rabbinical Books," "A Collection of Disputations on Theology and Philosophy," "Rambling Interpretations," "Discussions on Sacred Terms and Phrases," "Observations on Certain Passages in the Arabic-Syriac Version of the Old and New Testament," "The Religion and Laws of Mohammed," "Two Books of Sacred Miscellanies," "A Treatise on the Jewish Cabbala," and "Philological and Theological Notes on Various Difficult Places in Scripture." Many of these works soon fell out of use, as they were not of a popular character, but Zeltner, quoted by Buddeus, speaks in the highest terms of Hackspan's skill in the exegesis of the Old Testament.

HADAD (ha'dad), of uncertain etymology, but of early use as a proper name. 1. A son of Ishmael, in the first genealogy given of his race, bore the name of Hadar, Gen. xxv. 15, but which is elsewhere read Hadad, 1 Chr. i. 30. And in the genealogy of Esau's descendants Hadad was the name of one of the early kings who reigned over the Edomites before there was a king in Israel, Gen. xxxvi. 35.

2. One so called, of the Edomite race, is mentioned as among the enemies of Solomon, 1 Ki. xi. 14. He belonged to the seed-royal, and when a mere child had escaped from the terrible slaughter inflicted by the army of David under Joab, by being carried into Egypt. He was there treated with much respect by the existing king, and was ultimately married to the sister of Tahpanhes, the queen. On hearing of the death of David he requested and obtained leave of Pharaoh to return to his own country, doubtless with the view of making an effort to regain for his family and kindred the ascendancy which they had lost; and though we have no particular account of his operations, yet, from being mentioned in particular as an adversary to King Solomon, and one whom the Lord stirred up against him, it is clear that he must have been a person of considerable energy, and that under him the scattered forces of Edom must have rallied so far as to prove a dangerous rival to Israel. Express mention is also made, when noticing another adversary of Solomon, of "the mischief which Hadad did," ver. 25, though the details are nowhere given.

3. This is understood to have been the name of a Syrian deity, or probably one of the names of the tutelary gods of Syria, though rarely mentioned under that name. It is understood to be this name which appears in the Latinized form of Adodus. In Scripture it is found only as a component element in some proper names, such as Hadadezer, Benhadad, Hadad-Rimmon.

HADADEZER (ha-dad-e'zer), or HADAD-REZER (ha-dad-re'zer), king of Zobah, a powerful monarch in the time of David, and the only one who seems to have been in a condition seriously to dispute with him the predominancy in South-western Asia. He was defeated by the Israelites in the first campaign (B. C. 1032), in the neighborhood of the Euphrates, with a great loss of men, war-chariots and horses, and was despoiled of many of his towns, 2 Sam. viii. 3; 1 Chr. xviii. 3. This check not only impaired but destroyed his power. A diversion highly serviceable to him was made by a king of Damascene-Syria (whom the Scripture does not name), who, coming to his succor, compelled David to turn his arms against him and abstain from reaping all the fruits of his victory, 2 Sam. x. 6, etc.; 1 Chr. xix. 6, etc. The breathing-time thus afforded Hadadezer was turned by him to such good account that he was able to accept the subsidies of Hanun, king of the Ammonites, and to take a leading part in the confederacy formed by that monarch against David. The first army brought into the field was beaten and put to flight by Abishai and Joab; but Hadadezer, not yet discouraged, went into the countries east of the Euphrates and got together the forces of all his allies and tributaries, which he placed under the command of Shophach, his general. To confront so formidable an adversary, David took the field in person, and in one great victory so completely broke the power of Hadadezer that all the small tributary princes seized the opportunity of throwing off his yoke, of abandoning the Ammonites to their fate and of submitting quietly to David, whose power was thus extended to the Euphrates.

HADAD-RIMMON (ha-dad-rim'mon), the names of two Syrian deities combined together so as to form the designation of a particular place or district in Palestine. In Scripture it is referred to only once, and that in a prophetic passage making allusion to the death of Josiah, Zech. xii. 11, not in the historical book which records the death itself. Speaking of a future mourning, the prophet says it should be like "the mourning of Hadad-Rimmon in the valley of Megiddon"—the mourning, namely, which took place there at the death of the good king Josiah. Jerome speaks of it as a city, and says it afterward went by the name of Maximianopolis, and was in the valley of Jezreel, but gives no further information about it. Modern research has failed to obtain any certain trace of the spot; nor is anything known as to the way in which it came to acquire a name of such marked Syrian origin.

HADAR (ha'dar), the same as HADAD.

HADAREZER (ha-dar-e'zer), the same as HADADEZER.

HADASHAH (had'a-shah), a city of Judah in the low country, Josh. xv. 37. Of this the Talmud says that it was the smallest city in Judah, and contained only fifty houses. It is in all probability the place which is called Adasa, 1 Macc. vii. 40, 45, and where Nicanor was slain by Judas Maccabæus. Josephus places this thirty stadia from Bethoron; and from the narrative it must have been to the west of this place toward Gezer. Eusebius calls it a village near Gouphnæ. By this he cannot mean Gophna, the modern Jifna, which lies to the north-east of Bethoron; and besides, Jerome corrects Eusebius for placing Adasa in Judah, saying it was in Ephraim. Both Eusebius and Jerome seem to have known the place, but it cannot now be identified.

HADASSAH (ha-das'sah). See ESTHER.

HADATTAH (ha-dat'tah), a city of the south of Judah, Josh. xv. 25. In 21-32 a number of places are enumerated, twenty-nine, it is said, in all. But there are thirty-eight names; it is probable, therefore, that some are compound, and that Hadattah may belong to the preceding Hazor, New Hazor, to distinguish it from other places of the name. Wilton identifies it with Kusr el-Adadah, a ruin of imposing appearance on the summit of a hill.

HADION (had'd'n), WALTER, a distinguished English scholar, professor of rhetoric and oratory in the university of Cambridge, born in 1516. He was a great promoter of the Reformation, and was appointed to succeed Gardiner as master of Trinity, and afterwards president of Magdalen, Oxford. He was highly esteemed by Queen Elizabeth.

HADES (ha'des) is a Greek term, signifying "That which is out of sight." It is used to designate the place of departed spirits, without determining either their happiness or their misery. In classical works the word was synonymous with "the infernal regions," or the place to which souls descended. See HELL and PURGATORY.

HADID (ha'did), a town mentioned with Lod and Ono, Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37; xi. 34. It was probably on the site of the modern village el-Haditheh, three miles east of Lydd or Lod.

HADJ (haj), "aspiration," a word used to denote a body of pilgrims on a visit to Mecca, also the pilgrimage itself. The solemnities of this Mohammedan sacred city are celebrated in the twelfth month of their year. When the male pilgrims arrive in the vicinity of Mecca, they robe themselves in the sacred habit, walk seven times around the Kaabah and visit Mount Arafat, twelve miles from Mecca, for religious instruction and prayer. They are required to spend the next night in devotion at Mogdalipha, visit upon the next day a monument erected upon the spot where Mohammed went to pray, and conclude the ceremonies with sacrifice.

celebrated Turkish historian and bibliographer, by the grand vizier, in consequence of his historical work, "Fedzlikeh," which extends from the creation to 1655. He was a highly-educated man and great linguist, and wrote several other works in Turkish, Arabic and Persian, chief among which was "A Universal Geography" and "A Biographical Dictionary and Encyclopædia."

HADORAM (ha-do'-ram). 1. A descendant, or more probably the name of a race of descendants, from Eber by his son Joktan, Gen. x. 27. They have been supposed to be the same with the Adramitæ or Atramitæ, who had their settlements in the south of Arabia. 2. The name given in 1 Chr. xviii. 10 to the son of Toi, king of Hamath, who was sent as ambassador from his father to congratulate David on his victory over Hadadezer. He elsewhere bears the name of Joram, 2 Sam. viii. 10, which, however, has an Israelitish aspect. 3. An alternative name of one of the officers of Rehoboam, who was over the administration of taxes, and lost his life on the occasion of the general revolt. His other name was Adoniram or Adoram, 2 Sam. xx. 24; 2 Chr. x. 18.

HADRACH (had'-rak) occurs only as a proper name in the heading of one of Zechariah's enigmatical prophecies, which stands thus, "The burden of the word of the Lord on the land of Hadrach, and Damascus is its rest," ch. ix. 1. It used to be regarded as the name of a city and region not very remote from Damascus, chiefly on the authority of R. Jose, quoted by Jarchi, and of Joseph Abbassi, given and supported by J. D. Michaelis. But Hengstenberg, in his remarks upon the passage in his "Christology," has shown that these persons confounded Hadrach with an Adraa in the Syrian desert, which is the same with the ancient Edrei. There is no historical notice of either a land or a city going by the name of Hadrach, and it is against all probability as well as prophetic usage that a strictly proper name should have been employed to designate the subject of a prophecy which was otherwise unknown. But it was by no means unusual to adopt symbolical names of regions on which the word of prophecy was to fall, as in Isaiah Jerusalem is designated

"Ariel" and "the valley of vision;" Babylon the "desert of the sea;" in Jeremiah also Babylon is prophesied against under the name of Sheshach, and in Ezekiel Jerusalem and Samaria under the names of Aholah and Aholibah. So here Zechariah, when about to describe the future overthrow of the Persian empire, especially in those

HADRIAN (ha'dre-an), HADRIANUS (ha-dre-ah'nus), son of Ælius Hadrianus, was born in A. D. 76. He became the fourteenth Roman emperor. Being cousin to Trajan, he was early brought into notice, and in a campaign against the Dacians he did much to gain the favor of his relative. He became tribune in 105 and provinces of its domain which lay in the neighborhood of Judæa, most probably called it by the symbolical name of Hadrach, strong in one respect, but weak in another, presenting the appearance of indomitable power and energy, but in the purpose of God destined to become a helpless prey in the hand of a mighty adversary. The prophecy had its fulfillment in the conquest of Alexander the Great.

prætor in 107, and he succeeded Trajan in the command of the army, by whom he was, in 117, proclaimed emperor at Antioch, and the senate readily confirmed the choice. Thoroughly understanding the condition of affairs in the East, he retired from Parthia, and gave up all the conquests of Trajan beyond the Euphrates. He built the celebrated wall from the Solway to the Tyne, to ward off the Picts and the Scots from the Britons. By remission of taxes, the founding of cities, the condensation and revision of laws, the patronage of literature and the production of several works in poetry and prose, he made himself justly celebrated as one of the wisest and best of all the men who swayed the imperial sceptre. He died 138.

HAEMSTEDE (hame'steed), ADRIAAN VAN, was born at Schouen, about the year 1525. His parents were among the first who embraced the principles of the Reformation in Zealand. He was educated in the Dutch and Latin languages, and used the former especially with great strength and clearness. In 1557 he was placed over the Reformed church in Antwerp, where his labors were greatly blessed. When the Protestants in France were persecuted, he wrote a letter, December 1, 1557, to Henry the Second of France, remonstrating with him and pleading for mercy. In 1558 the storm of persecution reached his own church; his two faithful helpers, Gillis and Verdikt, were burnt at Brussels, and a price was set upon his own head. He sought refuge at Oest Friesland, then at Groningen and afterward in England, taking charge of the Reformed church in London. Espousing certain doctrines of the Anabaptists, he was called to trial by Bishop Grindall of London, and banished from the kingdom. He died in Friesland in 1562.

HAEWANG (ha-e-wang'), a Chinese mandarin of the latter part of the eighteenth century, minister of state for European affairs and grand officer of the palace of the emperors. He is celebrated for his connection with and protection of the Christian missionaries in the reign of Khienloun.

HAFITZ (ha'fitz), MOHAMMED, surnamed SCHEMS-ED-DIN, a celebrated Persian poet well versed in theology and jurisprudence. He aimed at magnifying the unity of God and exalting the Prophet, yet an influential party regarded him as an outcast. He died in 1388.

HAFTORAH (haf'to-ra). See SYNAGOGUE.

HAGAB (ha'gab), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from Babylon, Ezra ii. 46.

HAGABA, or HAGABAH (ha-gah'bah), one of the Nethinim, whose descendants returned after the captivity, Ezra ii. 45; Neh. vii. 48.

HAGAR (ha'gar), a native of Egypt, and servant of Abraham, but how or when she became an inmate of his family we are not informed. The name Hagar, which is pure Hebrew, signifying stranger, having been probably given her after her arrival, and being the one by which she continued to be designated in the patriarch's household, seems to imply that her connection with it did not take place till long after this family had emigrated to Canaan. The presumption is that she was one of the female slaves presented to Abraham by Pharaoh during his visit to Egypt, Gen. xii. 16. But some suppose the name to have been applied to her from a remarkable incident in her life, to be afterward mentioned; just as the Mohammedans call the flight of Mohammed by the collateral term "Hegira." Whatever were her origin and previous history, her servile condition in the family of Abraham must have prevented her from being ever known beyond the limits of her humble sphere, had not her name, by a spontaneous act of her mistress, become indissolubly linked with the patriarch's history. The long-continued sterility of Sarah suggested to her the idea, not uncommon in the East, of becoming a mother by proxy, through her handmaid, whom, with that view, she gave to Abraham as a secondary wife. See ABRAHAM.

The honor of such an alliance and elevation was too great and unexpected for the weak and ill-regulated mind of Hagar; and no sooner did she find herself in a situation which made her, in the prospect of becoming a mother, an object of increasing interest and importance to Abraham than she openly indulged in triumph over her less favored mistress, and showed by her altered behavior a growing habit of disrespect and insolence. The feelings of Sarah were severely wounded, and she broke out to her husband in loud complaints. In all Oriental states where concubinage is legalized the principal wife has authority over the rest; the secondary one, if a slave, retains her former condition unchanged, and society thus presents the strange anomaly of a woman being at once the menial of her master and the partner of his bed. In like manner, Hagar, though taken into the relation of concubine to Abraham, continued still, being a dotal maid-servant, under the absolute power of her mistress, who, after her husband had left her to take her own way in vindication of her dignity as the principal wife, was neither reluctant nor sparing in making the minion reap the fruits of her insolence. Sarah, indeed, not content with the simple exertion of her authority, seems to have resorted even to corporeal chastisement. But whether she actually inflicted blows or merely threw out menaces to that effect cannot be determined, as the two renderings, "Sarah afflicted" and "would afflict" her, have received equal support from respectable lexicographers and versions. Sensible, at length, of the hopelessness of getting the better of her mistress, Hagar determined on flight; and having seemingly formed the purpose of returning to her relations in Egypt, she took the direction of that country, which led her to what was afterward called Shur, through a long tract of sandy, uninhabited country, lying on the west of Arabia Petræa, to the extent of 150 miles between Palestine and Egypt. In that lonely region she was sitting by a fountain to replenish her skin-bottle or recruit her wearied limbs, when the angel of the Lord, whose language on this occasion bespeaks him to have been more than a created being, appeared, and in the kindest manner remonstrated with her on the course she was pursuing, and encouraged her to return by the promise that she would ere long have a son whom Providence destined to become a great man, and whose wild and irregular features of character would be indelibly impressed on the mighty nation that should spring from him. Obedient to the heavenly visitor, and having distinguished the place by the name of Beer-lahai-roi, "the well of the visible God," Hagar retraced her steps to the tent of Abraham, where in due time she had a son; and having probably narrated this remarkable interview to Abraham, that patriarch, as directed by the angel, called the name of the child Ishmael, "God hath heard."

Fourteen years had elapsed after the birth of Ishmael when an event occurred in the family of Abraham, by the appearance of the long-promised heir, which entirely changed the prospects of that young man, though nothing materially affecting him took place till the weaning of Isaac, which, as is generally thought, was at the end of his third year. Ishmael was then a lad of seventeen years of age; and being fully capable of understanding his altered relations to the inheritance, as well as having felt, perhaps, a sensible diminution of Sarah's affection toward him, it is not wonderful that a disappointed youth should inconsiderately give vent to his feelings on a festive occasion, when the newly-weaned child, clad according to custom with the sacred symbolic robe which was the badge of the birthright, was formally installed heir of the tribe. Our feelings of justice naturally lead us to take part with Ishmael, as hardly dealt with in being so unexpectedly superseded after having been so long the acknowledged heir. But the procedure of Abraham in awarding the claim to the inheritance to Isaac in preference to his elder son was guided by the special command of God; and it may be remarked, moreover, that it was in harmony with the immemorial practice of the East, where the son of a slave or secondary wife is always supplanted by that of a free woman, even if born long after. The harmony of the weaning feast was disturbed by Ishmael being discovered mocking. The Hebrew word, though properly signifying "to laugh," is frequently used to express strong derision, as in Gen. xix. 14; Neh. ii. 19; iv. 1; Ezek. xxiii. 32; accompanied, as is probable on some of the occasions referred to in these passages, with violent gestures; and in accordance with this idea the Chaldee and Septuagint versions render it by "I play," which is used by the latter in 2 Sam. ii. 15-17, as synonymous with boxing, whence it might very justly be characterized as persecution, Gal. iv. 29. This conduct gave mortal offence to Sarah, who from that moment would be satisfied with nothing short of his irrevocable expulsion from the family; and as his mother also was included in the same condemnation, there is ground to believe that she had been repeating her former insolence as well as instigating her son to his improprieties of behavior. So harsh a measure was extremely painful to the affectionate heart of Abraham, but his scruples were removed by the timely appearance of his divine Counselor, who said, "Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad and because of thy bondswoman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee hearken unto her voice," "for," adds the Targum of Jonathan, "she is a prophetess." Accordingly, what she said is called the Scripture, Gal. iv. 30, and the incident affords a very remarkable instance of an overruling Providence in making this family feud in the tent of a pastoral chief four thousand years ago the occasion of separating two mighty peoples, who, according to the prophecy, have ever since occupied an important chapter in the history of man. Hagar and Ishmael departed early on the day fixed for their removal, Abraham furnishing them with the necessary supply of traveling provisions. The Septuagint, which our translators have followed, appears to represent Ishmael as a child, placed along with the traveling-bags on the heavily-loaded shoulders of Hagar. But a little change in the punctuation, the observance of the parenthetical clause, and the construction of the word "child" with the verb "took," remove the whole difficulty, and the passage will then stand thus: "And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water (and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder), and the child, and sent her away."

In spite of their instructions for threading the desert, the two exiles missed their way. Overcome by fatigue and thirst, increasing at every step under the unmitigated rays of a vertical sun, the strength of the young Ishmael, as was natural, first gave way, and his mother laid him down in complete exhaustion under one of the stunted shrubs of this arid region, in the hope of his obtaining some momentary relief from smelling the damp in the shade. The burning fever, however, continued unabated, and the poor woman, forgetting her own sorrow, destitute and alone in the midst of a wilderness, and absorbed in the fate of her son, withdrew to a little distance, unable to witness his lingering sufferings; and there "she lifted up her voice and wept." In this distressing situation the angel of the Lord appeared for the purpose of comforting her, and directed her to a fountain, which, concealed by the brushwood, had escaped her notice, and from which she drew a refreshing draught that had the effect of reviving the almost lifeless Ishmael. This well, according to the tradition of the Arabs, who pay great honor to the memory of Hagar, is Zemzem, near Mecca. See ISHMAEL.

The only additional fact recorded of Hagar is that she took a wife for her son, with whom she had settled in Paran, Gen. xxi. 21. The apostle Paul, Gal. iv. 22, etc., allegorizes the story of Hagar, to elucidate the relation of the Jewish to the Christian dispensation. Hagar he compares to the former and Sarah to the latter, and to strengthen or give point to his allusions he lays hold of the fact that Hagar is the Arabian name of Sinai.

HAGARITES (ha'gar-ites), or HAGARENES (ha'gar-enes), a wandering Arab tribe who seem to have had their usual haunts to the east of Jordan, near the territories of the covenant people, for they are mentioned as having in the days of Saul come into collision with the tribe of Reuben, and fallen by their hand. They appear, however, to have in some degree recovered, for at a later period, probably in the time of Jehoshaphat, they are named along with the Moabites and various other Arabian tribes among the enemies who entered into a formidable conspiracy against Judah, Ps. lxxxiii. 6. Nothing further is heard or known of them. Some have supposed them to have derived their name from the mother of Ishmael, which is not very probable, considering that Ishmael was her only son, and that he was regarded as the real founder of the race that sprung from Abraham's connection with Hagar.

HAGENAU (hag'e-naw), CONFERENCE OF, a religious assembly convened July 12, 1540, by the German emperor, originally at Worms, but transferred to Hagenau in consequence of an epidemic prevailing at Worms. Its object was to discuss and settle the differences of opinion on matters of faith and practice between the Protestants and Romanists, and to bring about a reunion. It accomplished but little, and ended in an agreement to convene another conference composed of an equal number of representatives of both parties at Worms, for further negotiation. The Protestants were represented by Osiander, Capito, Brenz, Myconius and Cruciger; the Romanists by Faber, Eck and Cochläus. Melancthon fell sick on the way thither, and it was thought not best to send Luther there.

HAGENBACH (hag'en-bokh), KARL RUDOLF, a Swiss Protestant divine, professor of theology at Basle, was born in 1801. He has written a great number of works, chiefly historical and dogmatical, which have a wide circulation among his coreligionists.

HAGERITE (hag'er-ite). Jaziz, the superintendent of David's flocks, is thus designated, 1 Chr. xxvii. 31.

HAGGAI (hag'ga-i), one of the later minor prophets, and the first in order of the three who flourished after the return from Babylon. The short book of Haggai throws no light on the personal history of its writer, and authentic Jewish history is equally silent. Rabbinical tradition represents him as having been born in Babylon, and having joined the first band of exiles who, on the issue of the decree of Cyrus, B. C. 536, returned to their old possessions. It also asserts him to have been buried among the priests at Jerusalem, in which case he must have belonged to the family of Aaron. He is also said to have been a member of the Great Synagogue. Ewald believes that Haggai had seen the former temple (see Hag. ii. 3); if so, he must have lived to an advanced age, as his prophecy is dated 68 years after the destruction of Solomon's temple. The traditional accounts, so far, may be regarded as perfectly credible, though they cannot be pronounced certain; but further notices from the same source respecting Haggai deserve no particular notice.

HAGGAI, THE BOOK OF. This book consists of four distinct prophetic addresses—two in the first and two in the second chapter—and the dates of each are given with remarkable precision. The first address was delivered in the second year of Darius—i. e., B. C. 520—in the sixth month and on the first day of the month; therefore, on the feast of the new moon, ch. i. 1-11. The second, which was a mere assurance of the Lord's gracious presence and blessing, now that the people gave themselves to the Lord's work, was only twenty-four days later. The third belongs to the twenty-first day of the seventh month, ch. ii. 1-9; and the last, consisting of two parts, has for its date the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month. So that the whole prophetic agency of Haggai, so far as it has found a record in the book that bears his name, was limited to the short space of between three and four months. And it has respect throughout to one theme—the building of the second temple; although, with the comprehensive eye of the true prophet, it glances at various other points in the present and the future which stood in a moral relation to the work more immediately in hand.

When the Samaritan opposition had acquired such power as to arrest the rebuilding of the temple and city, the prophet Haggai was sent to arouse the people. His first word, however, was one rather of reproof than of encouragement; it charges upon the people's lukewarmness and love of fleshly indulgence the cessation that had taken place in the work, and points to the manifest judgments of the Lord upon them as clear signs of his displeasure at their conduct, ch. i. 3-11. We are not from this to suppose that he attributed nothing to the envious opposition of the Samaritans, but merely that this of itself was not enough, that the people latterly had rather been taking excuse from it to prosecute their own interests than absolutely hindered from minding God's, and had become quite content to let the walls of the Lord's house lie in their unfinished and forlorn state. For the external work, therefore, to which they were now called, there was needed a preparatory one of repentance and spiritual devotedness. To this Haggai first earnestly called them; and the moment he saw that the call had begun to be responded to, he cheered their hearts with the assurance that the Lord was with them, ch. i. 13.

But as the people still appeared depressed, and to lack heart for the work, Haggai speaks in tones of encouragement, ch. ii. 1-9. They were not, he assured them, like men left to their own resources; the Lord was with them, "the word that I established with you when ye came out of Egypt, and my spirit abode in the midst of you, Fear not" (so the words should be rendered). The meaning is that the word the Lord spake to them when they came out of Egypt, and when his Spirit wrought so marvelously for their good, he repeated now; in both cases alike his message was "Fear not," comp. Ex. xx. 20. Many changes, it is true, were to take place—all things in heaven and earth were to be shaken; but so far from interfering with that which constituted the real glory of their temple and nation, the things destined to take place would rather tend to promote it, for the world with its wealth and honor would yet come to pay homage to them, and there—in connection with that very house—would the Lord give peace and blessing to the world. The promise is a most comprehensive one; it stretches from the day of the prophet onward through all coming time, but reaches its culmination in the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom and the voluntary surrender of the kingdoms of the earth to his power and authority. It does not speak directly of the person of Christ, as has been very commonly supposed from the mistranslation of ver. 6, "The desire of all nations shall come," as if this pointed to the general and longing expectation of Messiah which prevailed before his advent. There no doubt was a certain measure of that, but the passage cannot properly indicate it, for the word rendered "desire" really means "beauty," and is here coupled with a verb in the plural, which clearly shows it to be used as a collective noun equivalent to "the beautiful or glorious things" of the heathen. The passage is substantially parallel to Isa. lx. 9-13, and tells of a coming exaltation of the divine kingdom (which had its centre in the temple and was represented by it) above all that had gone before.

The subject of this portion of Haggai's prophecy is resumed in the last two verses of his book, with a special reference to Zerubbabel, and for the purpose of showing that little and despised as the ruling power in Judah was, yet because it was a power under the protection, and connected with the covenant-faithfulness, of Jehovah, a distinction should be made between it and the powers of the heathen. The former would be kept by God as a sort of signet-ring, an emblem of perpetual care and fidelity, while the others should be all shaken to their base, and ultimately overthrown.

The message in ch. ii. 10-19 is to some extent a resumption of that contained in the first chapter. It warned the people that mere outward advantages and formal oblations could not secure for them the blessing of heaven; if their persons were not accepted and their hearts were unfaithful to God, the flesh of holy offerings could impart no purity; everything they touched would be defiled; while, on the other hand, if themselves in a state of sincere and hearty surrender to the Lord's work, the blessing of the righteous man—"whatsoever he doeth shall prosper"—should become theirs.

There is nothing very remarkable in the style of Haggai. His addresses approach nearer to prose than most of the prophetic writings; and speaking as he did to a people in depressed circumstances and compassed about with fears and misgivings, he is particularly frequent in the use of the formula, "Thus saith the Lord." He sought thereby to recall them from human hopes and calculations to implicit confidence in the word and purpose of Jehovah. In a few sentences, where he points more distinctly to the better future which he saw to be in prospect, his language rises to a higher strain, and in fervor and energy assumes somewhat of a poetic impress. But the passages are too brief to admit of being formed into a distinctive class.

HAGGEDOLIM (hag-ge-do'lim), Neh. xi. 14, marg. The word is translated in the text. De Wette renders it as a proper name, Gedolim.

HAGGERI (hag'ge-re). Mibhar, one of David's warriors, is said to be the son of Haggeri, 1 Chr. xi. 38; but in the margin he is called the HAGGERITE (hag'ger-ite); perhaps it is meant that he was an Ishmaelite, one of the descendants of Hagar, but this can only be conjectured.

HAGGI (hag'gi), one of the sons of Gad, Gen. xli. 16; Num. xxvi. 15.

HAGGIAH (hag-gi'ah), a Levite of the family of Merari, 1 Chr. vi. 30.

HAGGITES (hag'gites), the family descended from Haggi, the son of Gad, Num. xxvi. 15.

HAGGITH (hag'gith), one of the wives of David, and the mother of ADONIJAH, 2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Ki. i. 5, 11; ii. 13; 1 Chr. iii. 2.

HAGIA (ha'ge-a), 1 Esd. v. 34, perhaps a perverted form of Hattil, Ezra ii. 57.

HAGIOGRAPHA (hag-e-og'ra-fa), "sacred writings," is a name sometimes applied to a portion of Scripture. It comprehends all the sacred writings of the Hebrew Bible, except those included in the law and the prophets. Among the prophets, however, the rabbinical Jews class a number of the historical books—Joshua, Judges, the two books of Samuel and the two of Kings. These were regarded as the productions of the earlier prophets, and the later ones were those of the prophets distinctively so called. So that the Hagiographa, according to this division, would consist of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah; Esther and the book of Daniel were also assigned to it. But the division was so manifestly arbitrary that it was never accepted as a proper one by the Church. In the New Testament all the books of the Old Testament go by the name of the writings or Scriptures (corresponding to the ketubim among the Jews), or the sacred Scriptures; and a division so far is recognized in certain passages that they are spoken of under the names of the law and the prophets; and once, "Moses, the prophets and the Psalms," Luke xxiv. 44, but there is no recognition in this division of a superior authority in certain books of the Old Testament over others to decide matters of faith.

HAHN (hahn), AUGUST, a celebrated Orientalist and opponent of rationalism, was born March 27, 1792, near Querfurt in Prussian Saxony. Losing his father by death at an early age, his pastor, Stossen, generously assumed the preparatory education of the orphan for the gymnasium of Eisleben. From this he was transferred to the university of Leipzig in 1810, where he lost the influences of a pious mother's teaching and embraced the prevailing rationalism of his time. After pursuing the course of study here with special proficiency in the Oriental languages, particularly Syriac and Arabic, he engaged in teaching. Subsequently entering the theological school at Wittenberg under more auspicious influences, he was led back in mind to his former faith and hope, and was afterward active in making known his conviction to others. He was made professor extraordinary in 1819, and in 1821 professor of theology in the university of Königsberg. In 1826 he was appointed professor of theology in the university of Leipzig. In 1833 he went to Breslau as professor and consistorial counselor—a position of great ecclesiastical importance. And in 1844 he received the appointment of general superintendent of Silesia, which office he held until his death, May 26, 1863. His writings are largely of a controversial character, maintaining the necessity of a supernatural revelation and denying the assumption of rationalists as Christian teachers.

HAHN, HEINRICH AUGUST, eldest son of the preceding, was born June 19, 1821, at Königsberg, was educated at Breslau and Berlin and devoted himself to theology. In 1846 he was appointed professor ad interim on the death of Hävernich at Königsberg, and in 1860 he succeeded Rosegarten as professor at Griefswald. He died December 1, 1861. He was a man of great purity of character, and the author of several works of a religious character.

HAHN, MICHAEL, was born at Altdorf, Wurtemberg, February 2, 1758. In early life he became deeply interested in the works of Bernea and Oetinger, prominent theosophists. He claimed to receive special revelations from heaven, believed in the final restoration of all things, and wrote a complete system of speculative philosophy. He died in 1819.

HAI, another form of what is more commonly written ai, Gen. xii. 8; xiii. 3. See AI.

HAI, or HAJA, GAON B. SHERIRA GAON, was the last rector of the renowned college at Pumbedita in Babylon. This celebrated Talmudist, jurist, poet and commentator was born at Pumbedita A. D. 969, and displayed at a very early period such extraordinary talents that he was made president of the college of law at Pumbedita, at the age of 18, and at 30 was elevated to the dignity of spiritual head of the Jewish community in Babylon. The liberality of mind and frankness which he manifested in his expositions of Scripture have hardly ever been surpassed. If we bear in mind the extraordinary esteem in which he was held by Jews throughout Babylon and elsewhere, who called him by the distinguished title "the father of Israel," the salutary influence which this liberal example of Hai must have exercised upon the development of Biblical exegesis will easily be understood. Hai died 28th of March, 1038, after holding the highest office among the Jews for 39 years.

HAIL, HAIL-STONES. Besides the literal meaning of hail—and fearful hail-storms are recorded in the Scriptures, Ex. ix. 18-35—the word is symbolically used to denote the terrible judgments which the divine hand showers down upon ungodly nations, Isa. xxviii. 2, 17; Rev. viii. 7; xi. 19; xvi. 21.

HAIR. There is nothing in which the usages of different countries, and even of the same country at one period as compared with another, have exhibited more variety and caprice, than in respect to the cultivation or neglect of the hair. Of the more ancient nations, the Egyptians appear to have been the most uniform in their habits regarding it, and in some respects, also, the most peculiar. We learn from Herodotus that they let the hair of their head and beard grow only when they were in mourning, and that they shaved it at other times. Even in the case of young children they were wont to shave the head, leaving only a few locks on the front, sides and back. "So particular were they," says Wilkinson, "on this point that to have neglected it was a subject of reproach and ridicule; and whenever they intended to convey the idea of a man of low condition or a slovenly person, the artists represented him with a beard." Slaves also, when brought from foreign countries, having beards on them at their arrival, "were obliged to conform to the cleanly habits of their masters; their beards and heads were shaved, and they adopted a close cap." This universal practice among the Egyptians explains the incidental notice in the life of Joseph that before going in before Pharaoh he shaved himself, Gen. xli. 14; in most other places he would have combed his hair, and trimmed his beard, but on no account have shaved

it. It is singular, however, and seems to indicate that notions of cleanliness did not alone regulate the practice, that the women still wore their natural hair, long and plaited, often reaching down in the form of strings to the bottom of the shoulder-blades. Many of the female mummies have been found with the hair thus plaited and in good preservation.

The precisely opposite practice, as regards men, would seem to have prevailed among the ancient Assyrians, and indeed among the Asiatics generally. In the Assyrian sculptures the hair always appears long, combed closely down upon the head, and shedding itself in a mass of curls on the shoulders. "The beard also was allowed to grow to its full length, and descending low on the breast, was divided into two or three rows of curls. The moustache was also carefully trimmed and curled at the ends." Herodotus likewise testifies that the Babylonians wore their hair long.

Among the ancient Greeks the general practice was to wear the hair long; hence the epithet so often occurring in Homer of "well-combed Greeks," and the saying, which passed current among the people, that hair was the cheapest of ornaments. But the practice varied. While the

A PILGRIM WITH HAIR-SHIRT.—See HAIR-SHIRT.

Spartans in earlier times wore the hair long, and men as well as women were wont to have it tied in a knot over the crown of the head, at a later period they were accustomed to wear it short. Among the Athenians also it is understood the later practice varied somewhat from the earlier, though the information is less specific. The Romans passed through similar changes; in more ancient times the hair of the head and beard was allowed to grow, but about three centuries before the Christian era barbers began to be introduced, and men usually wore the hair short. Shaving also was customary, and a long beard was regarded as a mark of slovenliness.

This latter practice must have been quite general in the gospel age, so far as the head is concerned, among the countries which witnessed the labors of the apostle Paul, since in his First Epistle to the Corinthians he refers to it as an acknowledged and nearly universal fact. "Doth not even nature itself teach you," he asked, "that if a man have long hair it is a shame to him? But if a woman have long hair it is a glory to her; for her hair is given her for a covering," 1 Cor. xi. 14, 15. To have the possession of long and luxuriant hair is allowed by Paul an essential attribute of the sex, a graceful and modest covering provided by nature; and yet the same apostle elsewhere, 1 Tim. ii. 9, concurs with Peter, 1 Pet. iii. 3, in guarding women professing godliness against the pride and passionate fondness often displayed in the elaborate decorations of the head-dress. As the hair was pre-eminently the "instrument of their pride," Ezek. xvi. 39, marg., all the resources of ingenuity and art were exhausted to set it off to advantage and load it with the most dazzling finery, and many when they died caused their longest locks to be cut off and placed separately in an urn, to be deposited in their tomb as the most precious and valued relics. In the daily use of cosmetics they bestowed the most astonishing pains in arranging their long hair, sometimes twisting it round on the crown of the head, where, and at the temples, by the aid of gum, which they knew as well as the modern belles, they wrought it into a variety of elegant and fanciful devices, figures of coronets, harps, wreaths, diadems, emblems of public temples and conquered cities being formed by the mimic skill of the ancient friseur, or else plaiting it into an incredible number of tresses which hung down the back, and which, when necessary, were lengthened by ribbons, so as to reach to the ground, and were kept at full stretch by the weight of various wreaths of pearls and gold fastened at intervals down to the extremity.

HAKEWILL (hayk'wil), GEORGE, an English theologian, was born in 1579 at Exeter, graduated at Alban Hall, Oxford, and entered holy orders in 1611. He was appointed chaplain to Charles I., and afterward to the archdeacon of Surrey. He was among the first to accept the note making it obligatory upon members of the university of Oxford to pledge obedience to Parliament. He wrote "An Apology or Declaration of the Power and Providence of God in the Government of God," etc. He died in 1649.

HAKIM (hah'kim), BEN ALLAH, surnamed THE VEILED, lived in the latter part of the eighth century. A soldier in early life, he lost an eye by an arrow shot, and wore a veil to conceal his disfigured countenance. His followers, however, took advantage of this circumstance to declare that the covering upon his face was to prevent its great brightness from overpowering the beholder. By legerdemain and extravagant pretensions he attracted a number of deluded men and seized several strong places. The sultan Mahadi marched against him, captured his stronghold, and found the evidences of a body destroyed by a burning acid, his wish having been to convey the impression that he had ascended to heaven without seeing death. Moore's "Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" is a romance upon his life.

HAKKATAN (hak'ka-tan), one of the children of Azgad, whose son Johanan returned with Ezra, Ezra viii. 12.

HAKKOZ (hak'koz), the head of one of the courses of the priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 10. See KOZ.

HAKUPHA (hak'u-pha), one whose children, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53.

HALAH (ha'lah), a place in Assyria to which the ten tribes were carried captive, 2 Ki. xvii. 6; xviii. 11; 1 Chr. v. 26. Halah is probably the Chalchitis of Ptolemy, and is thought to be the modern Gla, a mound on the Upper Khabour above its junction with the Jerujer.

HALAK (ha'lak), the name of a mountain mentioned as the southern limit of Joshua's conquests, Josh. xi. 17; xii. 7. It was in the direction of Seir, but has not been identified by any modern traveler.

HALDANE (hal'dane), ROBERT, and JAMES ALEXANDER, theologians and philanthropists, two brothers who exercised great influence on the times in which they lived, were the sons of Captain James Haldane, representative of the old barons of Gleneagles in Perthshire, who occupied a prominent place in Scottish history. Their mother was sister of Admiral Duncan, Viscount Camperdown. In early life they both entered the navy, and distinguished themselves by gallantry and good conduct. Robert Haldane was midshipman on board the "Foudroyant" under Captain Sir John Jervis, in 1781, in the celebrated night action with the "Pégase," which was the foundation of Lord St. Vincent's great fame. When yet only twenty-five years of age, James had risen to the command of one of the East India Company's ships, in those days manned and armed like ships of war, and often engaged in important service. But led by various circumstances, and influenced doubtless by early impressions received from a pious mother, both brothers left the naval service and dedicated their time, labor and wealth to works of piety and usefulness. The first scheme in which Robert Haldane took deep interest was the introduction of Christianity among the natives of India. This was in 1795. His was no sentimental philanthropy, for he had himself resolved to go as one of the first missionaries, and he sold his estate of Airthrey in order to provide funds for the undertaking. But his designs were for the time frustrated, and the Indian mission proceeded under the direction of Dr. Carey and his coadjutors. Meanwhile, James Haldane entered the ministry in Scotland, devoting himself to the same kind of work which Wesley and Whitefield had at an earlier period undertaken in England. He traveled over the whole country, from the Solway Frith to the Orkneys, preaching everywhere to large audiences, and producing much good effect, in spite of violent opposition both from the clergy and magistrates. Suffice it to say that in all the great measures of Christian philanthropy which marked the first half of the present century, the Haldanes took a zealous and prominent part. The great religious awakening which took place at Geneva and which brought Malan, Merle D'Aubigné and others into the field, was largely owing to the labors of Robert Haldane in that venerable city. Robert Haldane died in 1842, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. James died in 1851. Both of the Haldanes were authors of various works, the most important of which in theological literature are—"A Treatise on the Doctrine of the Atonement," by James Haldane; and by Robert Haldane, "An Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans," "On the Evidence and Authority of Divine Revelation," and "On the Inspiration of Scripture." These works have been widely circulated on the Continent as well as in England and this country. An interesting memoir of their lives has been published.

HALE, SIR MATTHEW, an eminent English judge, was born at Alderley, in Gloucestershire, in 1609, educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and removed to Lincoln's Inn, where he studied the law with great diligence, and overcame the loose and dissipated habits in which he had previously indulged. He rose to eminence at the bar, and succeeded in preserving a singular neutrality through the momentous crisis of the civil war. He acted as counsel for Strafford, Laud, Hamilton, and even for Charles himself, yet Cromwell prevailed upon him to become one of the justices of the Common Bench; but it is said that he never formally acknowledged the authority of Cromwell, and he at length refused to try any more criminal causes. In the Parliament which recalled the king he sat for his native county, and soon after the Restoration was made chief baron of the exchequer, from which he was advanced to the chief-justiceship of the King's Bench. He resigned his office in 1675, and died the following year. He was a learned man, an upright judge and an exemplary Christian. His belief in witchcraft, avowed on occasion of the trial of two women, whom he sentenced to death, and his preference of personal ease to honest participation in the great political conflict of his age, are symptoms of a certain feebleness of character, and detract somewhat from his otherwise fair fame. His writings are numerous on theological, philosophical and legal subjects. The principal are—"Contemplations, Moral and Divine," "An Abstract of the Christian Religion," "A Discourse of Religion," "The Knowledge of Christ Crucified," and numerous smaller works, all of real worth. He also wrote various legal, mathematical and philosophical works, and left a valuable collection of manuscripts relating to history and jurisprudence, which are preserved in the library of Lincoln's Inn.

HALE, WILLIAM, archdeacon of London, master of the Charter-house, was born in 1795. He has written an account of the Charter-house and of Christ's Hospital, and along with Bishop Lonsdale published an annotated edition of the four Gospels. He is also the author of several other works.

HALES, ALEXANDER OF. See ALEXANDER OF HALES.

HALES, SIR JAMES, was son of Sir John Hales, baron of the exchequer, and was called to the bar from Gray's Inn. In 1544 he was made one of the king's sergeants, and a knight of the Bath at the coronation of Edward VI. Being a staunch Protestant, he was promoted to a seat in the common pleas, and was one of the judges who pronounced sentence of deprivation against Bishop Gardiner. Yet he was too upright to join in changing the succession, though it would have placed the crown on a Protestant, while he showed equal firmness in resisting the attempts against nonconformists in Mary's reign. Gardiner now took his revenge, and committed Hales to prison, where, partly by threats and partly by persuasion, he was induced to profess the popish religion. This act so affected his mind that he attempted to kill himself with a penknife. He was released in 1554, and soon after drowned himself in a fit of despondency. He died in 1554.

HALES, JOHN, a good scholar, well versed in muniments and antiquities. Being a Protestant, he fled from England on Mary's accession, and exerted himself to compose the differences among his fellow-exiles. He addressed an ode to Elizabeth on her accession, but fell under her displeasure by publishing a treatise in favor of the Suffolk right of succession, and was imprisoned for a short time. He died in 1572.

HALES, JOHN, usually distinguished as "the ever-memorable," was born at Bath in 1584, was a clergyman of great attainments and accompanied the British ambassador to The Hague, where, as his chaplain, he had admission to the Synod of Dort. His attendance there had the effect of bringing him round from Calvinism to Arminianism. During the Commonwealth he suffered great privation as a "malignant," and had to sell a great part of his valuable library to procure the means of subsistence. He died in great distress. He was an excellent Grecian, and Saville made much use of him in his Greek edition of St. Chrysostom's works. He died in 1656.

HALES, WILLIAM, A.M., and afterward D.D. of Trinity College, Dublin, of which he was also sometime Fellow, as well as professor of Oriental languages in the university, was born about the middle of the last century, and died A. D. 1831, at his rectory of Killesandra, in the county of Cavan and diocese of Kilmore, Ireland. He was an accomplished scholar of very various learning. His earlier publications related almost entirely to mathematical science, and were written in Latin; among them occur, "On the Doctrine of Sounds by Sir Isaac Newton," and "A Dissertation on the Motion of the Heavenly Bodies according to the Newtonian Theory." Besides these, he was the author of sundry works connected more or less with religious politics, such as a treatise "On the Political Influence of the Pope's Supremacy." In the year 1807 he issued his "Prospectus of an Analysis of Ancient Chronology," the harbinger of a work which he had been some time preparing, and for the reputation of which he deserves a place in this Bible Encyclopedia. In the interim, however, between the issuing of this prospectus and the appearance of the work itself, Dr. Hales, in the year 1808, published his "Dissertations on the Principal Prophecies respecting the Divine and Human Character of our Lord Jesus Christ." The next year appeared the first installment of his "New Analysis of Chronology;" the three succeeding volumes, completing the work, were published respectively in the years 1811, 1812 and 1814. Dr. Hales' system is a revision of the longer Biblical chronology, based upon the Septuagint, in opposition to the usually received system of Archbishop Ussher, which was founded upon the Masoretic text. In accomplishing his scheme the author relied with greater confidence than is deemed safe on the aid of Josephus, many of whose leading dates, adulterated as he thought by early editors, in order to make them correspond with the Jewish system, he corrected and modified. Inherent defects, arising from the author's system, as well as the changes which subsequent discoveries have occasioned in chronological literature, have considerably modified critical opinions respecting the great work of Dr. Hales. Its title in full runs thus: "A New Analysis of Chronology and Geography, History and Prophecy, in which their elements are attempted to be explained, harmonized and vindicated upon Scriptural and scientific principles; tending to remove the imperfection and discordance of preceding systems, and to obviate the cavils of skeptics, Jews and infidels." It is in the evolution of this ambitious complexity of purpose that the author's work is most valuable to the general student; for using all the resources of his undoubtedly great learning, he has thrown much light upon many parts of Holy Scripture. Thus, as in the case of many other useful writers, Dr. Hales has produced a work which will be more valued for its collateral subjects than for the success with which it has accomplished its direct purpose. The geographical portion of the work was designed by the author "to remedy the imperfection or incorrectness of the explanations of sacred geography, as given by Wells, Celarius, Reland, etc., in several material points;" and it must be admitted that he accomplished his object not only with learning and great resources of illustration, but with an agreeable luminousness of style which will long secure for his elaborate treatise the favorable attention and respect of the Biblical student.

HALF COMMUNION, communion in one element only, by withholding the cup from the laity in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This practice was first authorized in the Romish Church by Innocent III., and made obligatory by the Council of Constance. It grew out of the doctrine of transubstantiation, and one motive for its innovation appears to have been the exaltation of the priesthood in extending to them exclusive privileges. It is evidently, however, a mutilation of the impressive gospel ordinance as instituted by Christ and practiced by his disciples. This perversion of the ordinance was one of the reasons which led the Hussites to resist the usurpations of the Romish Church.

HALF-WAY COVENANT, a device for extending beyond the pale of actual communicants the privileges of infant baptism and church membership, as adopted by the Congregationalists of New England. It was opposed by Jonathan Edwards, and justified by Stoddard of Northampton. It is now abandoned.

HALHUL (hal'hul), a town of Judah, mentioned in a group of six lying on the north of Hebron, among which are Gedor and Bethzur, Josh. xv. 58. Jerome describes it as, in his day, a village belonging to the region of Ælia (Jerusalem), near Hebron, and called Abuda. Four miles north of Hebron, and about a mile east of the road leading to Jerusalem, an old mosque, dedicated to Neby Yernas (Prophet Jonah), stands on the top of a hill, and just below it, on the eastern slope, is the village of Halhul, encompassed by fields and fine vineyards. This is unquestionably the ancient Halhul, and both Bethzur and Gedor are within a few miles of it, to the north-west.

HALI (ha'li), a border town of Asher, Josh. xix. 25.

HALICARNASSUS (hal-e-kar-nas'sus), 1 Macc. xv. 23, a renowned city of Caria, the birth-place of Herodotus and of Dionysius the historian. It was here that, in early times, the Carian kings resided; and here was the famous mausoleum erected by Artemisia. Many Jews settled here, and had license to hold their assemblies for prayer by the sea-side. The modern name is Bodru.

HALL (haw). This word occurs in the Authorized Version of the New Testament three times; twice, Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16, in reference to the pretorium, or residence of the Roman governor at Jerusalem, which was either the palace built by the elder Herod or the tower of Antonia; his usual abode was at Caesarea, Acts xxiii. 23. Mark uses the word aulē, "hall," but adds, as he is wont in other cases, an explanatory phrase. In Luke xxii. 55 it means the open court or quadrangle belonging to the high-priest's house, such as was common to Oriental dwellings. It has the same meaning in Matt. xxvi. 69 and Mark xiv. 66, and in both passages is incorrectly rendered palace in the Authorized Version, as the adverbs plainly distinguish the aulē from the oikos, "house," to which it was attached, Luke xxii. 54. The aulē was entered from the street by a vestibule through a portal in which was a wicket.

HALL, GORDON, a zealous and successful missionary in India, was born in Granville, Massachusetts, April 8, 1781. He was educated at Williams College, whence he graduated in 1808 with the highest honors. Having pursued a course of theological study at Andover under the Rev. Ebenezer Porter, afterward professor in the theological seminary of that place, he entered the ministry, and early determined to devote his life to the work of a missionary. Accordingly, he was ordained at Salem, Massachusetts, February 6, 1812, and sailed from Philadelphia for Calcutta on the 17th of June, with Messrs. Nott and Rice as companions. The East India Company having refused Nott and Rice the privilege of laboring at Calcutta, they proceeded to Bombay; but Mr. Hall prevailed upon the governor to permit him to remain, and he continued zealously engaged in the work of his Master till his death, March 20, 1826.

HALL, JOSEPH, D.D., a most eminent prelate of the English Church, born in 1574. He was incumbent of Waltham twenty-two years. While there he was sent by the king on different missions, and to the Synod of Dort. The greater part of his celebrated "Contemplations" was written at this time, besides several other works. In 1624 he refused the see of Gloucester, but shortly after accepted that of Exeter. When the Scottish Church abjured Episcopacy, Archbishop Laud entrusted to Bishop Hall the defence of their order, which he undertook in a work, "Episcopacy by Divine Right Asserted." This treatise he defended against the attacks of Smectymnus, the pseudonym under which a body of Presbyterians controverted it. In 1641 he was translated from Exeter to Norwich, but "took the Tower on his way thither," being sent there on a charge of high treason, along with other bishops who protested against the proceedings of the House of Lords. While there he employed himself in preaching and writing. On his release he proceeded to Norwich. Driven from his palace by the Puritans, he retired to the adjacent hamlet of Heigham, where he lived for eight years, and there he wrote some of his most delightful works, as "Songs in the Night," "Farewell to Earth," "Select Thoughts," etc. He died in 1656.

HALL, PETER, a distinguished English theological author and divine, was born December 13, 1803. He entered Brazenose College, Oxford, in 1820, was ordained in 1828, and became rector of St. Edmund's, Salisbury, Millston Wilts, and minister of Favistock, Drury Lane, London, and St. Thomas', Walcot. He devoted much of his time to authorship, and was especially distinguished for the variety and extent of his bibliographical inquiries and his contributions to this department of learning. He wrote "Documents Connected with the Liturgy of the Church of England," Congregational Reforms" and "Sermons," and edited over a dozen biographical works, among which may be enumerated the "Life of Bishop Hall," "Bishop Lowth," "Bishop Jewell," etc. He died in the midst of his usefulness September 10, 1849.

HALL, RICHARD, a Roman Catholic priest, chiefly known as the writer of the valuable and interesting "Life of Bishop Fisher," which was ascribed to Bailey, who, having possessed himself of it, published it without giving the name of the author. He died in 1604.

HALL, ROBERT, a celebrated English Baptist preacher and theological writer, was born at Arnsby, in Leicestershire, in 1764. His father, who was also a Baptist minister, in 1773 placed him under the instruction of Dr. John Ryland of obliged him to suspend his pulpit labors; and on his recovery he removed to Leicester, where he remained as pastor of the Baptist congregation upward of twenty years. On the death of Dr. Ryland, in 1826, he succeeded to the presidency of the Bristol academy, and the pastorate of Broadmead Chapel, and there he continued till his death, which took place in 1831. Mr. Hall was gifted with a powerful and persuasive eloquence, and to great talents and learning he united a benevolent disposition and a truly liberal mind. Dr. Parr, who was his intimate friend, says of him in his last will and testament, "Mr. Hall has, like Jeremy Taylor, the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the subtlety of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher and the piety of a saint." His works have been collected and published since his death.

Northampton. At fifteen years of age he became a student in the Baptist college at Bristol, and at eighteen he entered King's College, Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M.A. He was chosen as colleague with Dr. Caleb Evans in the ministry at Bristol, and adjunct professor in the institution. Here he attained great popularity, but he was obliged to retire from this situation in consequence of symptoms of approaching mental derangement. By judicious treatment during a long seclusion from the world, his powerful mind regained its vigor; and in 1791 he removed to Cambridge, being chosen successor to the celebrated preacher Robert Robinson. He now appeared as the author of a pamphlet entitled "Christianity not Inconsistent with the Love of Freedom." This was shortly after followed by his "Vindication of the Freedom of the Press," which passed through several editions. But it was his "Sermon on Modern Infidelity" that established his fame as a divine. In 1802 Mr. Hall's mind again received a shock, which HALLEL (hal-lel'), the designation of a particular part of the hymnal service of the Hebrews chanted in the temple and in the family on certain festivals. It is now impossible to ascertain precisely when this service was first instituted. Some of the Talmudists affirm that it was instituted by Moses; others say that Joshua introduced it; others derive it from Deborah, David, Hezekiah or Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah. From 2 Chr. xxxv. 15 we see that the practice of the Levites chanting the Hallel while the Paschal lambs were being slain was already in vogue in the days of Josiah, and it is not at all improbable that it was customary to do so at a much earlier period.

The name Hallel, which signifies "praise," is given to this distinct portion of the hymnal service because it consists of Psalms cxiii.-cxviii., which are Psalms of "praise," and because this group of Psalms begins with "Hallelujah." It is also called the Egyptian Hallel, because it was chanted in the temple whilst the Passover lambs, which were first enjoined in Egypt, were being slain.

This hymnal service, or Egyptian Hallel, was chanted at the sacrifice of the first and second Pesach, after the daily sacrifice on the first day of Passover, after the morning sacrifice on the Feast of Pentecost, the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles and the eight days of the Feast of Dedication, making in all twenty days in the year. "On twelve days out of the twenty, viz., at the sacrifice of the first and second Pesach, of the first day of Pesach, of the Feast of Pentecost and of the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles, the flute was played before the altar when the Hallel was chanted," whilst after the morning sacrifice during the eight days of the Feast of Dedication the Hallel was chanted without this accompaniment of the flute. The manner in which these hymns of praise were offered must have been very imposing and impressive. The Levites who could be spared from assisting at the slaying of the sacrifices took their stand before the altar and chanted the Hallel verse by verse; the people responsively repeated every verse or burst forth in solemn and intoned "Hallelujahs" at every pause, whilst the slaves of the priests, the Levites and the respectable lay people assisted in playing the flute. No representatives of the people were required to be present at the temple at the morning sacrifices on the days when the Hallel was chanted.

The Egyptian Hallel was also chanted in private families at the celebration of the Passover on the first evening of this feast. On this occasion the Hallel was divided into two parts; the part comprising Ps. cxiii. and cxiv. was chanted during the partaking of the second cup, whilst the second part, comprising Ps. cxv. and cxvi., was chanted over the fourth and finishing cup; and it is supposed that the singing of the hymn by our Saviour and his disciples at the conclusion of the Passover supper, Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26, refers to the last part of this Hallel. In Babylon there was an ancient custom, which can be traced as far back as the second century of the Christian era, to recite this Hallel on every festival of the new moon, omitting, however, Ps. cxv. 1-11 and cxvi. 1-11.

The great Hallel was recited on the first evening at the Passover supper by those who wished to have a fifth cup—i. e., one above the enjoined number. It was also recited on occasions of great joy as an expression of thanksgiving to God for special mercies.

The Jews to the present day recite the Egyptian Hallel at the morning prayer immediately after the eighteen benedictions on all the festivals of the year except New Year and the Day of Atonement, omitting Ps. cxv. 1-11 and cxvi. 1-11 on the last six days of the Feast of Passover and on the new moon. Before the Hallel is recited they pronounce the following benediction: "Blessed art thou, Lord our God, King of the world, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments and enjoined upon us to recite the Hallel." At the Passover supper, on the first two evenings of the festival, both the Egyptian Hallel and the Great Hallel are now recited.

HALLELUJAH (hal-le-lu'yah), or ALLELUIA (al-le-lu'yah), a word which stands at the beginning of many of the Psalms. From its frequent occurrence in this position it grew into a formula of praise, and was chanted as such on solemn days of rejoicing. This is intimated by the Apocryphal book of Tobit, xiii. 18, when speaking of the rebuilding of Jerusalem: "And all her (Jerusalem's) streets shall sing Alleluia." Comp. Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6. This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the Church. The ancient Church retained the Hebrew word when praise was rendered, and it was also retained in the first English liturgy, but it has given place to the phrase "Praise ye the Lord," the people responding "The Lord's name be praised."

HALLER (hal'ler), BERTHOLD, a native of Suabia, born in 1492, became one of the leaders of the Reformation in Switzerland. It found him the parish priest of Berne; and when he accepted its principles, his position enabled him to advocate its cause with authority, to which his own gentleness of manner added force. He had a principal share in the important conference of Berne, which so much promoted the Reformation in Switzerland. He died in 1536.

HALLETT (hal'let), JOSEPH, a learned English nonconformist minister, born at Exeter in the year 1692. He was the son of Joseph Hallett, one of the pastors of the Presbyterian congregation in Exeter, and was the grandson of another Joseph Hallett who was ejected from Chesleborough, in Somersetshire, by the Act of Uniformity. He was educated for the Christian ministry at a seminary conducted by his father and his father's colleague, J. Pierce; and when, in the year 1716, Messrs. Hallett and Pierce were removed from their pastoral charge in consequence of the avowal of Arian opinions, young Hallett was appointed co-pastor with Pierce over the new congregation assembling in what was called James'

Meeting. He died in 1744. He was an excellent writer, and two of his works deserve to be mentioned here: "A Free and Impartial Study of the Holy Scriptures recommended; being Notes on some Peculiar Texts, with Discourses and Observations," etc. Besides the notes on various texts of Scripture and some discussions on doctrinal and practical topics, these volumes contain dissertations on the quotations from the Old Testament in the Apocrypha; on the Septuagint version; on the errors in the present Hebrew copies of the Old Testament; on the original meaning of the ten commandments; and on the Agapæ or love-feasts; also "A Paraphrase, and Notes on the Three Last Chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews." This was designed to be a supplement to Pierce's paraphrase and notes on this Epistle—a work which had been published in an unfinished state in consequence of the death of its author. Prefixed are two introductory dissertations, one on the authorship and the other on the language of the Epistle. The former supports the Pauline authorship, and is still valuable for its trustworthy array of historical testimonies, the author having, as he tells us, "trusted to no second-hand quotations, but taken every passage immediately from the original authors themselves." In the second dissertation he advocates the opinion of a Hebrew or Syriac original, the translation into Greek being made probably by Luke.

HALLOHESH (hal-lo'hesh), "the enchanter," one who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 24.

HALLOW (hal'lo), HALLOWED (hal'lo-ed). See HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION.

HALO (hay'lo), in religious art, is a luminous nebula, supposed to emanate from and surround divine persons. When it is limited to the head only, it is termed a "nimbus," and when it envelops the whole body, it is called an "aureola." This distinction is of importance where symbolism is appreciated, for ignorance or neglect may lead to great confusion. The nimbus is of pagan origin; the Romans ornamented the statues of their divinities and emperors with radiated crowns. In process of time the halo or nimbus was introduced into Christian art, and its introduction at first met with determined opposition, which gradually became weaker as the tendency to symbolism increased. After the eleventh century it was very generally used to distinguish the Saviour, the Virgin Mary, angels, apostles, saints and martyrs, by painters in Southern Europe, and attempts were made to identify different characters by the arrangements of the rays. Hence the nimbus was of various forms, the most frequent being a circular halo with different internal enrichments. In that of Christ it contains a cross more or less enriched; the nimbus of the Virgin Mary is usually a circlet of small stars; while angels wear a circle of small rays surrounded by another circle of greater foils, like roses interspersed with pearls. Those for saints were distinguished by the name round the circumference. Even the eternal Father had a nimbus of rays, which diverged in a triangular direction. When the nimbus is of a square form, it indicates that the person was alive when delineated. The aureola is of a limited usage, and was generally confined to representations of the Almighty and of Jesus, and rarely it was applied to the Virgin Mary. The variations in the form depended on the position of the person represented. A "glory" combined the two, as there was then a nimbus or halo round the head and an aureola encircling the person.

HALOHESH (ha-lo'hesh), "the enchanter," a person whose son helped to repair the walls of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 12. The name is identical with Hallohesh.

HALYBURTON (hal-e-bur'ton), THOMAS, professor of theology in the university of St. Andrew's, was born near Perth, December 25, 1664. In early life he was perplexed with doubts in reference to revealed religion. An excellent minister by the name of Donaldson, on a visit to his mother, directed him to seek relief from his doubts in prayer, which ultimately brought him relief; and he wrote an "Inquiry into the Principles of Modern Deists," which is still held in estimation. In 1696 he became chaplain in a nobleman's family, and in 1700 he was made minister of Ceres parish, where he remained for eleven years. In 1711 he was elected professor of divinity in the university of St. Andrew's, where he remained till his death, in 1712. His "Works" contain, "The Great Concern of Salvation;" "Natural Religion Insufficient;" "Essay on the Nature of Faith;" "Inquiry on Justification;" and a sketch of his life. Halyburton's Memoirs have been issued many times both in Great Britain and America.

HALO, OR GLORY.
1. Symbol of the Saviour. 2. The eternal Father. 3 and 6. Disc over the head, the latter ornamented, the fifth and twelfth centuries. 4, 5. Hand of the eternal Father in the act of blessing. 7. Nimbus of saints then living. 8. The Beast in the Apocalypse, a symbol of power.

HALYMOTE (ha'le-mote), a church court. The word is the olden form of "holy," with the Saxon termination "mote," an assembly for legislative or judicial purposes.

HAM, the youngest of the three sons of Noah. Of his personal history one disgraceful incident is recorded, which was the occasion of a prophetic curse upon one of the large and wicked families of Ham's descendants, Gen. ix. 20-27.

Four great branches of the posterity of Ham are enumerated, Cush, Mizraim, Phut and Canaan; and from these, speaking generally, the southern tribes of the globe proceed. See EARTH, CUSH, MIZRAIM, PHUT, CANAAN. The Hamite nations, so far as we can trace their early history, attained considerable prosperity; they formed powerful kingdoms, cultivated commercial intercourse with other peoples, were rich, and have left remarkable traces of their enterprise and perseverance in their massive buildings. But in almost every case they have been sooner or later subjected to the sons of Shem and Japhet, and mingled with the descendants of other stocks. Whether the languages which prevailed among them can be referred to a single trunk, and of what nature such a trunk would be, with what derivative dialects, are questions on which philologists are not at present agreed.

It is remarkable that Egypt is repeatedly called in Hebrew poetry "the land of Ham," Ps. lxxviii. 51; cv. 23, 27; cvi. 22. To no special district are the names of the other two sons of Noah given. It might almost be inferred that Egypt was the region where Ham himself settled. And it is a fact that in the ancient Egyptian language a nearly similar word, said to imply blackness or heat, denoted that country. It occurs many times in the Rosetta inscription as chemé.

A Hamite, perhaps an Egyptian, clan would seem to have been settled near Gedor, whom the Simeonites attacked and destroyed, 1 Chr. iv. 40.

HAM, the principal town of the Zuzim, Gen. xiv. 5. Its locality can only be guessed at; maybe it was in or near the country of Ammon.

HAMAKER (ham'a-ker), H. A., one of the first Orientalists of his time, was born at Amsterdam, Holland, 25th of February, 1789. Destined by his parents for the profession of a merchant, his tastes led him early to learning; and the counsels of Willmet strengthened him in his ardent attachment to erudite studies, especially to the Arabic language, in which he made great progress. In 1815 he was appointed professor of the Oriental languages in the atheneum at Franeker. In 1817 he was called to Leyden as professor extraordinary of Oriental languages, and in 1822 he became ordinary professor. Here he died on the 10th of October, 1837, at the early age of 47, having undermined his health by excessive study. His literary ambition was too active, hurrying him from one language to another and injuring his reputation. Instead of being contented with the knowledge of five Semitic tongues, besides the Arabic, he devoted himself without relaxation to the study of all the ancient and modern languages of Asia and Africa—a task to which human strength is unequal. The range of his Oriental erudition was great; it would have been of a profounder character if he had confined himself to fewer subjects. His works are numerous, but none bears directly on Biblical science. All are of the Oriental-literary or historical type.

HAMAN (ha'man), etymology uncertain, a person of high rank in the kingdom of Persia, and for a time prime minister of the king who espoused Esther. The circumstances connected with the history of this remarkable and unhappy man form one of the most extraordinary examples on record of the unreasonable lengths to which a principle of personal ambition may carry one, the frightful crimes it may lead him to commit in order to reach the end he aims at, and the overwhelming retribution in providence it may bring down upon his own head. He is called in Esther, Haman the Agagite, which the Jews have from early times regarded as substantially one with Haman the Amalekite. This, if it were certain, would afford a natural enough explanation of what otherwise looks like a species of insanity—the determination on the part of Haman to extinguish a whole race in revenge for the stiff and unyielding firmness of a single individual. The Amalekites were from early times among the most implacable enemies of the Jews, and had been all but extirpated by the superior might and warlike prowess of their rivals. One can readily suppose that a deep spirit of revenge would lurk in the bosoms of the scattered members of the Amalekite race which survived, and that any one of them, having what might seem a just occasion and a fit opportunity, would eagerly snatch at it to secure the long wished-for triumph. It is quite possible, also, that Haman may have belonged to this Amalekite race, and by some of those curious revolutions of fortune which degree, and who could not afford to suffer any derogation from the customary forms of regard. Yet with so many things in favor of this supposition, one cannot hold it to be more than probable. For there is no other passage in Old Testament Scripture in which Agagite is put for Amalekite; and as there is reason to believe that the name Agag thet. But the fact of Haman's Amalekite descent is problematical; and if advanced at all, it should only be as an ancient opinion which has certain probabilities on its side, and which would afford a ready explanation of some of the circumstances.

HAMATH (ha'math), an ancient city and province of Syria, in existence at the time of the conquest of Canaan, Num. xiii. 21, and in later times of such importance that it is called "Hamath the Great," Amos vi. 2. The city was situated on the Orontes, at the northern extremity of the Lebanon range, about 76 miles north-east of Tripoli, and 81 south from Aleppo. Not Hamath itself, but rather the "entering in of Hamath," is often mentioned as the boundary on the north of the dominion of Israel, Num. xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5, etc. There is some difference of opinion as to the point indicated by this expression. The entering into Hamath is naturally understood as given from the Palestinian point of view, therefore on the south of the land of Hamath, probably about Diblah, a place about 30 miles beyond Baalbec, and a place where the two Lebanon ranges terminate, opening on the wide plain which belonged to Hamath. This appears the remotest point to which the spies could possibly extend their personal inquiries, Num. xiii. 21, and seems to accord with the general conditions of the geographical problem. In David's time Hamath appears to have formed the seat of an independent kingdom, for Toi the king of Hamath is mentioned among those who entered into friendly relations with David, 2 Sam. viii. 9, etc. In the age of Solomon it appears to have formed part of the extensive dominion of Israel, as he is spoken of as having built store-cities in it, 2 Chr. viii. 4; and long afterward the second Jeroboam is said to have conquered it, 2 Ki. xiv. 28. Along with the whole of that part of Syria, it fell shortly afterward under the sway of the king of Assyria, Isa. xxxvii. 12, and then under that of the king of Babylon. After the period of the Alexandrian conquest it bore the name of Epiphania; but the old name has again supplanted this, and among the native population the latter probably never took root. Hamath has become one of the larger cities of the Turkish empire, and is supposed to contain about 30,000 inhabitants, of which 2500 belong to the Greek Church. Dr. Porter says that the modern town is built in the narrow valley of the Orontes and on both sides of the river, whose banks are fringed with poplars. Four bridges span the river, and a number of huge wheels, turned are not unusual in arbitrary states, where the greatest changes often turn on the whimsical freaks of a moment, may have been elevated to the highest place of power at the Persian court. The extreme jealousy he evinced in regard to the marks paid him of outward homage and respect so far confirms this that he appears to indicate a want of native nobility of rank; it bespeaks the temper of one who had sprung from comparatively low had much the same origin and use among the Amalekites that Pharaoh had among the Egyptians, and Abimelech among the Philistines [see AGAG], it would have been strange and unnatural for any of the Amalekite race to have turned it into a family designation. No doubt there are caprices in names as well as other things; and it is not impossible that a use not in itself natural or likely may have been made of this particular epi-lative population the latter probably never took root. Hamath has become one of the larger cities of the Turkish empire, and is supposed to contain about 30,000 inhabitants, of which 2500 belong to the Greek Church. Dr. Porter says that the modern town is built in the narrow valley of the Orontes and on both sides of the river, whose banks are fringed with poplars. Four bridges span the river, and a number of huge wheels, turned by the current, raise the water into aqueducts, which convey it to the houses and mosques of the town. There are no antiquities in it. The mound on which the castle stood is in the midst of the town, but the castle itself, materials and all, has completely disappeared. The houses are built in the Damascus style, of sun-dried bricks and wood. Though plain and poor enough externally, some of them have splendid interiors. The city carries on a considerable trade with the Bedouins.

HAMATHITE (ha-math'-ite), one of the families descended from Canaan, Gen. x. 18; 1 Chr. i. 16. They were most likely those who settled at Hamath.

HAMATH-ZOBAB (zo'-bah). In 2 Chr. viii. 3 it is recorded that "Solomon went to Hamath-Zobah, and prevailed against it." Zobah was a place in the same district as Hamath. See ZOBAB. The conjunction of the two names here probably indicates nothing more than that the whole country round Hamath was brought by Solomon under the power of Judah. The possessions of David extended to Hamath, and included Zobah, 1 Chr. xviii. 3, and Solomon probably added Hamath also to his empire; certain it is that he had possessions in that district, and that part of it at least was included in his dominion, 1 Ki. ix. 19. There is not the least ground for the supposition that Hamath-Zobah is the name of a different Hamath from that above noted.

HAMBROECK (ham'-brek), ANTON, surnamed the DUTCH REGULUS, was born in the beginning of the seventeenth century, and was sent as a missionary to the East Indies, making the island of Formosa, then an important missionary station of the Dutch, his field of labor. He was successful in the conversion of a large number of the natives, when the Chinese pirate Coxinga landed in Formosa, April, 1661, and with 25,000 men laid siege to Tai-Ouan. With his wife and children Hambroeck was made prisoner, and he was sent by Coxinga as ambassador to the commandant of the town, with the view of inducing him to surrender it to his enemy. An act so repugnant to his patriotism and self-respect he refused to perform, and advised the commandant accordingly to defend the town. With a bravery that challenges admiration, he returned to Coxinga, notwithstanding the entreaties of his friends and the prayers of his daughters, and informed him what he had done. Coxinga, exasperated at his boldness and daring, caused him and a number of Dutch prisoners to be beheaded.

HAMELMANN (ham'el-man), HERMANN, a German Protestant theologian and historian, born in 1525, and died in 1595. He had received orders in the Roman Catholic Church, but em-broke out, and he was detained a prisoner in France, where he supported himself by teaching the Sanscrit language. On his return to England he was made professor of that language in the college of Haileybury, and published a grammar of it.

braced the doctrines of Luther and devoted himself to their propagation. Most of the latter portion of his life was passed at Oldenburg as spiritual superintendent of the Protestants.

HAMILTON (ham'il-ton), ALEXANDER, a learned Sanscrit scholar, born in 1765, and died in 1824. He was in Paris, examining the Indian manuscripts of the Imperial Library, when war clergyman, rector of Killermogh in Ireland. He was a good Hebraist and a laborious scholar. His first work was entitled "A General Introduction to the Study of the Hebrew Scriptures, with a Critical History of the Greek and Latin Versions of the Samaritan Pentateuch and of the Chaldee Paraphrases." On each of the subjects indicated in the title this work will be found to offer much important information, conveyed in a condensed and yet clear and pleasing style. His other work is entitled "Codex Criticus of the Hebrew Bible, wherein Vander Hooght's Text is corrected from the Hebrew Manuscripts collated by Kennicott and De Rossi, and from the Ancient Versions, being an Attempt to form a Standard Text of the Old Testament"—a work of much learning, and a praiseworthy effort toward a corrected text of the Hebrew Scriptures. His criticisms, though not such as to give satisfaction in every case, are yet in most instances so well considered and reasonable as to invest his work with a permanent value to every student of the Hebrew Bible. The following is also deserving of being noted here: "A Letter to the Rev. Solomon Herschell, D.D., Chief Rabbi of the German and Polish Jews in London, showing that the Resurrection of Jesus from the Dead is as credible a Fact as the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt; and that the Account of the Resurrection in the Tract entitled 'Toldoth Jesu' is no more worthy of Credit than that which Tacitus has given of the Exodus."

HAMILTON, JAMES, D.D., an eloquent and distinguished Presbyterian divine and author, was born in 1814, in Strathblane, Scotland. Soon after entering the ministry he was called to the charge of a church in Edinburgh, and in 1841 he became pastor of the National Scotch Church, Regent Square, London. Here he was eminently successful in his ministry, gaining for himself a reputation as one of the most eloquent and able pulpit orators in the metropolis, and extending his fame and usefulness wherever the English language is read by his numerous popular and widely-circulated works on subjects of experimental and practical religion. His "Life in Earnest" and "Mount of Olives" have reached immense editions. The language in which the great truths of religion and the deep feelings of the soul are clothed in his works is singularly beautiful. A complete edition of his works is accessible to the American reader. He was enrolled in the membership of the most important literary societies of the kingdom, and his fame as a naturalist was well deserved. He was unfeignedly beloved by the great and the good of all denominations, and few have been more regretted than he when death removed him from his labors. He died in London, November 24, 1867.

HAMILTON, PATRICK, one of the first of Scotland's Reformers and a martyr to his convictions of religious duty, was born in 1502. After pursuing a course of study at St. Andrew's, he visited Germany, and there espoused the principles of the Reformation as preached by Luther. He became a professor at Marburg for a season, and on his return to his native country he was advanced by James V., to whom he was related, to be abbot of Ferne, in Rossshire, where his zeal in preaching the doctrines of the Reformation stirred up the enmity of the Romish clergy to such a degree that they caused him to be arrested and sent to Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's. Here he was tried as a heretic and condemned to the flames. He received the sentence with the most remarkable fortitude, and perished at the stake opposite St. Salvador's College in St. Andrew's, March 1, 1527, at the early age of 24. He was a man of considerable learning, elegant manners and devout piety. When about to be executed, he gave his raiment to his servant, saying, "These are the last things you can receive of me; nor have I anything now to leave you but the example of my death, which I pray you to bear in mind; for though it be bitter to the flesh, and fearful before men, yet it is the entrance into eternal life, which none shall inherit who deny Jesus Christ before this wicked generation." The execution produced a profound sensation in the country. "The smoke of Mr. Patrick Hamilton," said a Romanist, "infected as many as it blew upon." In the history of the Scottish Church he deservedly occupies a prominent place.

HAMILTON, RICHARD WINTER, D.D., LL.D., an English Dissenting minister, was born at Pentonville July 6, 1794. He was educated at Hoxton College, where his talents at an early age attracted attention. Soon after leaving college he was invited to the pastorate of the Independent Congregation at Leeds, where he remained to the close of his life. He was a man of great literary industry, an eloquent and effective speaker (though often defective in taste), quick in argument and apt in illustration. He was the author of "The Little Sanctuary," a devotional work; "The Institutions of Popular Education," "The Revealed Doctrine of Rewards and Punishments," "Missions," "The Sabbath," etc. He died in July, 1848.

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM, Bart., a distinguished metaphysician, was born at Glasgow in 1788, studied first at the university of his native city, and secondly at Oxford, where he obtained first-class honors. When he entered for his degree, he amazed the university examiners by the number of Latin, Greek and other works in which he desired to be tested, and the list of works on logic, metaphysics and ethics which he presented included Arabian, Italian, Spanish, French, German, Greek and British names in such profusion that the range of his acquirements seemed to be unlimited. In 1813 he was called to the Scottish bar, and in 1821 he was appointed professor of universal history in the university of Edinburgh; but this chair was little more than an honorary appointment, and in 1836 he obtained the office for which his tastes and his studies pre-eminently qualified him—the chair of logic and metaphysics—which he filled with such lustre as to have regained for Scotland its former distinction in the field of metaphysics. In 1852 he published a volume under the title of "Discussions in Philosophy," consisting of essays reprinted chiefly from the Edinburgh Review, and which on their appearance had attracted attention both at home and abroad. His edition of the works of Dr. Thomas Reid, published in 1846, displays vast erudition and profound thought; and a similar award must be given to his collected edition of the works of Dugald Stewart, the publication of which began in 1854. His "Lectures on Metaphysics" have been published since his death, and these abundantly evince that whatever differences may hereafter agitate the schools as to the success or failure of some of his speculations, his comprehensive grasp, his inexorable analysis, his prodigious learning, truth and honesty of dealing with the adherents of every system, will secure a universal and lasting homage. The prominent results of his labors in philosophy reduce themselves to three heads—his profound vindication of the doctrine of common sense, his elaborate discussion of the theory of perception in relation to our belief in an external world, and his enunciation of the law of the conditioned as bearing on our knowledge of the absolute and infinite. The two first are in the direct line of the Scottish school, the last is more original, or colored with German influences; and the impulsion which he has given under this third head, if less marked by agreement amongst his followers, is more powerful, and is likely to be the next starting-point of British philosophy. He died in 1856. A very formidable assault on Sir William Hamilton's system has been made by Mr. J. S. Mill in his "Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy, and of the principal Philosophical Questions discussed in his Writings." Mr. J. H. Stirling has also published a work entitled "Sir William Hamilton; being the Philosophy of Perception: an Analysis."

HAMILTON, WILLIAM HENRY, an English gentleman of refined literary tastes. As private secretary he accompanied Lord Elgin to Constantinople, and assisted him in bringing home the collector of antique marbles which are known as the Elgin Marbles. To him the British Museum owes the possession of the famous Rosetta Stone, which he discovered stowed away on board a French transport; and Italy is indebted to him for the restoration, at the peace of Paris, of her spoliated treasures. Mr. Hamilton was for many years secretary of state for foreign affairs, after which he went to Naples as minister plenipotentiary. He published a valuable work on Egypt, a country at the time little known, and was one of the founders of the Royal Geographical Society. He died in 1859.

HAMLIN (ham'line), LEONIDAS LENT, a bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born May 10, 1797, at Burlington, Connecticut. He at first devoted his attention to the study of law, was admitted to practice, married and settled at Zanesville, Ohio. In 1828 his thoughts were directed to the subject of personal religion by the death of a little child, and he united with the Methodist Church; during the same year was licensed to exhort and the next year to preach. He filled appointments successively in Granville Circuit, Ohio, Athens Circuit, and in 1835 at Wesley Chapel, Cincinnati. In 1844 he was elected a bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church, which office he held with credit to himself and advantage to the Church for eight years. He was a man of eloquence, ability and exalted piety, the subject of much affliction, and yet possessed of great patience and resignation. He died in the year 1867.

HAMMATH (ham'math), a city assigned to the tribe of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 35. There is every reason to believe that this place, so called from its "springs," was close to Tiberias, and was the Emmaus mentioned by Josephus as in the immediate neighborhood. These springs still exist, just by the ruins of the ancient city. The water has a disagreeable sulphurous smell, and is too nauseous to be drunk; but, as it has a high reputation for medicinal properties, it is used for baths. "The accommodations for bathing," says Dr. Thomson, "are everything but satisfactory, and the entire establishment is filthy and offensive in the extreme; and yet it is always crowded with the lame, the halt, the withered and the leprous." The heat of the water ranges from 136° to 144°. At the earthquake in 1837, the temperature rose, and more water than usual was for a short time thrown out, but the buildings were not injured.

HAMEDATHA (ham-med'a-thah), the father of Haman, Esth. iii. 1, 10; viii. 5; ix. 10, 24.

HAMMELECH (ham-me'lek), the father of Jerahmeel and Malchiah, Jer. xxxvi. 26; xxxviii.

6. Very probably this is not a proper name, and these two persons were of the royal family.

HAMMER (ham'mer). Two or three Hebrew words are used for this tool, one which implies striking, Isa. xli. 7; another, hollowing, 1 Ki. vi. 7. There is a third, Jud. v. 26; it also is connected with striking. The term hammer is employed symbolically for mighty force, Jer. xxiii. 29; 1. 23.

HAMMERLIN (ham'mer-lin), or HAMMERLEIN (ham'mer-line), FELIX, a Swiss theologian and member of the Council of Basle, was born at Zurich in 1789. He was appointed canon of Erfurt in 1421, and provost of Solthurn in 1422. He devoted great attention to study, and

HAMMOND (ham'mond), HENRY, D.D., one of the most learned English divines of the seventeenth century, was born at Chertsey, 18th August, 1605, and educated at Eton and Magdalen colleges, Oxford, of which latter he became a Fellow in 1625. He was named after Henry prince of Wales, his godfather, to whom Dr. John Hammond, his father, was physician. It is said Robert Sidney, earl of Leicester, was so much impressed with a sermon he heard him preach that he gave him the rectory of Penshurst, 1633. He received the degree of D.D. in 1639, and the following year was a member of convocation. In 1643 he was made archdeacon of Chichester. Hammond was a confirmed royalist, and took part in the fruitless attempt in favor of the king at Tunbridge, when attended the Council of Basle, where he took an active part in attempted ecclesiastical reform. This step of his made him many enemies, and an attempt was made upon his life in 1439; he escaped assassination, but was dangerously wounded. In 1454, at Zurich, on the occasion of the carnival, he was seized by his enemies and thrown into prison at Constance. He was sentenced to imprisonment in a convent of barefooted monks, and died, a martyr to his zeal for the truth, in 1457. He was the author of several works on monkish discipline, corruptions of the clergy, etc.

HAMON-GOG (ha'mon-gog), THE VALLEY OF, or THE VALLEY OF THE PASSENGERS, Ezek. xxxix. 11. The Targum indicates that this valley was near the Sea of Genesareth, and the expression "the valley of the passengers," probably arises from its being the great road by which the merchants and traders of Syria and other Eastern countries went to and from Egypt.

a reward of £100 was offered to the person who should apprehend him. He retired to Oxford in consequence, and resided there while the city was held by the king. He became canon of Christ Church, and public orator in 1645, and accompanied Charles I. as chaplain to Woburn, Hampton Court and Carisbrook, till the dismissal of his attendants in 1647, whereupon he once more retired to Oxford and became sub-dean of Christ Church. The latter part of his life was passed at Westwood, Worcestershire, the seat of Sir John Parkwood, where he died 25th April, 1660. He wrote "A Paraphrase and Annotations on the New Testament," which was in great request, and was translated into Latin by Leclerc; "A Paraphrase and Annotations upon the Book of Psalms;" "A Practical Catechism," etc. Hammond's miscellaneous theological works have been well edited in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology.

The name Hamon-Gog signifies "the multitude of Gog," and was applied to this valley because it was designed as the burial-place of the multitudes of Gog. It no doubt lay in the district of the Hauran to the south of Damascus. Before and after the time of Solomon, the caravans that rested on their march in the locality rendered famous by the city of Palmyra, must have passed to the south-east of the Lake of Galilee before reaching Western Palestine, as the range of the mountains of Lebanon must have deflected their course in that direction. The Targum is, therefore, no doubt correct in its localizing of the valley. See MAGOG.

HAMOR (ha'mor), a Hivite chief, prince of the district lying around Shechem and father of Shechem, whose assault upon Dinah led to the destruction of himself, his father, and their city, by the sons of Jacob. From Hamor Jacob bought a piece of land in the vicinity of Shechem, a transaction of a perfectly peaceable kind, but which seems to have been interposed amid passages of a more hostile nature between the patriarch and his neighbors. This he left as a special inheritance to the family of Joseph, and here Joseph's bones were interred, Josh. xxiv. 32. Hamor gave his name to the tribe of which he was chief; they are called Benei-Hamor, Gen. xxxiii. 19, and he himself is called Hamor Abi-Shechem, Josh. xxiv. 32; Jud. ix. 28; Acts vii. 16, with reference to his having the seat of his rule at Shechem.

HAMPDEN (hamp'den), RENN DICKSON, D.D., a descendant of John Hampden, the celebrated Cromwellian leader, was born in 1792, in the island of Barbadoes, where the family had settled in 1670. He received his education at Oriel College, Oxford, where he became a Fellow, then a tutor, and subsequently, in 1829 and 1831, public examiner in classics. Being chosen Bampton Lecturer in 1832, he took for his subject "The Scholastic Philosophy considered in its Relation to Christian Theology." In 1833 he was appointed head of St. Mary's Hall, and the following year was elected White's professor of moral philosophy in Oxford. About this time he published "Observations on Religious Dissent." In 1836 Lord Melbourne, the premier, appointed Hampden regius professor of theology in Oxford, but a violent opposition was made to his confirmation, based, ostensibly, on opinions expressed in his Bampton Lecture and in the pamphlet "Observations" alluded to above, but really upon political and Church party grounds, his opponents being Tories and Tractarians, prominent among the latter being Dr. Pusey and the notorious John Henry Newman, who not long after openly avowed himself a Papist. In 1847 Dr. Hampden was appointed bishop of Hereford, and this was the signal for a renewal of the assault upon him with even greater fury. The government declining to set aside his appointment, Dr. Hampden was duly installed, after which his enemies gradually ceased their assaults upon him, and left him in peace to prosecute his episcopal duties. He died April 23, 1868. He wrote, in addition to the works above mentioned, "Lectures on Moral Philosophy," "A Lecture on Tradition," "Philosophical Evidences of Christianity," several volumes of sermons, etc.

HAMUEL (ham'u-el), a descendant of Simeon through Shaul and Mishma, and from whom all the families of Simeon located in Palestine seem to have descended, 1 Chr. iv. 26.

HAMUL (ham'ul), the younger son of Pharez, the son of Judah by Tamar, Gen. xlvi. 12; 1 Chr. ii. 5. Whether he was born in Canaan, or after the descent into Egypt, is a point not settled among chronologists. From him descended the clan of the Hamulites, Num. xxvi. 21.

HAMUTAL (ham'u-tal), the daughter of Jeremiah, to whom, before the siege of Jerusalem, he sold a field which he possessed in Anathoth, a town of the Levites, Jer. xxxii. 6-12. If this field belonged to Hanameel as a Levite, the sale of it would imply that an ancient law had fallen into disuse, Lev. xxv. 34, but it is possible that it may have been the property of Hanameel in right of his mother. The transaction was conducted with all the forms of legal transfer, and was intended to evince the certainty of restoration from the approaching exile, by showing that possessions which could be established by documents would yet be of future value to the possessor.

HANAMEEL (ha-nam'e-el), a kinsman of Jeremiah, to whom, before the siege of Jerusalem, he sold a field which he possessed in Anathoth, a town of the Levites, Jer. xxxii. 6-12. If this field belonged to Hanameel as a Levite, the sale of it would imply that an ancient law had fallen into disuse, Lev. xxv. 34, but it is possible that it may have been the property of Hanameel in right of his mother. The transaction was conducted with all the forms of legal transfer, and was intended to evince the certainty of restoration from the approaching exile, by showing that possessions which could be established by documents would yet be of future value to the possessor.

HANAN (ha'nan). 1. A Benjamite chief, 1 Chr. viii. 23. 2. A descendant of Saul, 1 Chr. viii. 38; ix. 44. 3. One of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 43. 4. One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 46; Neh. vii. 49. 5. A Levite, who with others expounded the law which Ezra read, Neh. viii. 7; it was probably he who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 10. 6, 7. Two other persons who sealed, Neh. x. 22, 26. 8. One of the treasurers for the tithes, Neh. xiii. 13. 9. A person whose sons had a chamber in the temple, Jer. xxxv. 4.

HANANEEL (ha-nan'e-el), THE TOWER OF, one of the towers forming part of the wall of Jerusalem; first mentioned in Neh. iii. 1, where its position with respect to the sheep-gate in particular, situated on the east side of the city, is indicated. The other passages in which the name occurs, Neh. xii. 39; Jer. xxx. 38; Zech. xiv. 10, with no special reference worthy of note, pretty clearly determine the situation mentioned as correct. It was obviously near the sheep-gate, and from the direction in which the boundary line of the city is now described, on the north side of that gate, and consequently was near the north-east corner of the city, and probably faced the east. The tower, it is not unlikely, derived its name from the builder.

HANANI (ha-nah'ne). 1. A prophet under the reign of Asa, king of Judah, by whom he was seized and imprisoned for announcing that he had lost, from want of due trust in God, an advantage which he might have gained over the king of Syria, 2 Chr. xvi. 7. The precise occasion of this declaration is not known. This Hanani is supposed to be the same who was father of another prophet, named Jehu, 1 Ki. xvi. 7; but circumstances of time and place seem adverse to this conclusion. 2. A brother of Nehemiah, Neh. i. 2, who went from Jerusalem to Shushan, being sent most probably by Ezra, and brought that information respecting the miserable condition of the returned Jews which led to the mission of Nehemiah. Hanani came back to Judæa, probably along with his brother, and together with one Hananiah was appointed to take charge of the gates of Jerusalem, and see that they were opened in the morning and closed in the evening at the appointed time. The circumstances of the time and place rendered this an important and responsible duty, not unattended with some danger, Neh. vii. 2, 3, B. C. 455.

Three other persons of this name are mentioned, 1 Chr. xxv. 4, 25; Neh. xii. 36.

HANANIAH (ha-na-ni'ah). 1. One of He-man's sons, and head of one of the twenty-four courses into which the singers were divided by David, 1 Chr. xxv. 4, 23. 2. A captain in the army of Uzziah, 2 Chr. xxvi. 11. 3. A prince in the time of Jeremiah, and father of Zedekiah, Jer. xxxv. 12. 4. A false prophet from Gibeon, who also lived in the time of Jeremiah, and delivered counter-messages to those uttered by that prophet. He was denounced by Jeremiah as an impostor, and his judicial death predicted, Jer. xxviii. 5. The original and proper name of one of the three Hebrew youths, who acted so noble a part at Babylon, better known by the Chaldean name of Shadrach, Dan. i. 6. Many others bore the name, of whom nothing particular is known, Jer. xxxv. i. 13; 1 Chr. viii. 24; iii. 19; Ezra x. 28; Neh. :ii. 12; vii. 5, etc.

HAND. With one exception, there is nothing very peculiar in the reference made to the hand in Scripture. Being the member of the body which is chiefly employed in doing active service, it is used in Scripture, as well as other writings, in a great variety of applications, founded upon and suggested by this natural employment: such as "the strength of his hand" for the possession of power generally, "the cunning or skill of the hand" for any natural accomplishment, "putting things into one's hand" for committing them to one's oversight and control, etc. The right hand being also, for the most part, the organ most used, and in consequence most skilled in the execution of work, a variety of figurative applications quite naturally arise out of this fact, having respect to the right hand as the more, to the left as the less, honorable and efficient of the two; hence such expressions as "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth," "a wise man's heart is at his right hand, but a fool's heart is at his left hand," "sitting at the right hand of power," "the man of thy right hand," etc. Such forms of expression are so common in all languages, and at all times, that they require no special explanation; nature itself furnishes a ready interpretation of them even to the most unlearned.

HAND, or HANDS, LAYING ON or IMPOSITION OF THE. This forms a sort of exception to the general similarity between the Scriptural allusions to the hand or hands and those in common use; it may be regarded as a strictly Scriptural usage, though it no doubt also had its foundation in nature, and may to some extent have been used in some of the nature-religions of antiquity. It occurs at a very early period in Scripture as a patriarchal usage, appropriate and becoming, perhaps, rather than strictly religious. Jacob laid his hands upon the heads of Joseph's children when about to bestow upon them his peculiar blessing, Gen. xlviii. 14, precisely as in later times our Lord laid his hands on the little children when they were presented to him for his blessing, Matt. xix. 15. In like manner, and with a nearer approach to a religious service, Moses was instructed, before his departure, to lay his hand upon Joshua; and the reason of the action is at the same time given: "Take thee Joshua the son of Nun, a man in whom is the Spirit, and lay thine hand upon him. . . . And thou shalt put some of thine honor upon him, that all the congregation of the children of Israel may be obedient," Num. xxvii. 18-20. And so again, after the death of Moses, it is said, "And Joshua, the son of Nun, was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him," Deut. xxxiv. 9. So that there was a conveyance in the matter of gifts from one who had to one who had not; and the laying on of the hand of him who imparted was the symbol of the conveyance, the hand being the usual instrument of communication from one to another in what pertains to giving and receiving. So also in regard to guilt; the people who heard the blasphemy of the son of the Israelitish woman in the wilderness had to lay their hands on his head, to signify that the guilt, which through him had been brought into the congregation, was solemnly transferred to him to whom it properly belonged. In this sense, undoubtedly, the action was used in the gospel age in connection with the bestowal of the supernatural gifts, or the miraculous effects of the Holy Spirit; the apostles laid their hands on sick folks and healed them, Matt. ix. 18; Mark vi. 5, etc.; and at times also they laid their hands on the baptized, that they might receive the special gifts of the Spirit, Acts viii. 15-18; xix. 6. It was a quite natural extension of the same practice, to apply it to those who were set apart to sacred office in the Church—the men already possessed of delegated power and authority in the Church, thereby proceeding, like Moses in respect to Joshua, to put some of their own honor upon those who were raised to a share in the same responsible and dignified position, Acts xvii. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 14. Not that the mere act could confer it, but it was employed as a fit and appropriate symbol to denote their full and formal consent to the bestowal of the gift, and being accompanied by prayer to Him who alone could really bestow it, might ordinarily be regarded as a sign that the communication had actually taken place. On this account the action has been retained in most communions as a becoming service in the ordination of qualified persons to the ministry. See ORDINATION. And in those churches which retain confirmation as a distinct service, imposition of hands is also retained as an appropriate part of the service.

In Old Testament times the imposition of hands formed an essential part of the ritual of animal sacrifice. It is expressly mentioned in respect to all the kinds of offering by blood, Lev. i. 4; iii. 2; iv. 4-15; xvi. 21, with the exception alone of the trespass-offering; and it was doubtless omitted in regard to it on account of the affinity between it and the sin-offering, as it would be readily understood that the prescription on this point established for the one would equally apply to the other. The Jewish authorities held it as a fixed principle that "in all sacrifices, whether offered by express enactment, or of free-will, the offerer had to lay his hands on the victim while still alive, with the exception only of the first-fruits, tithes and the paschal lamb." It was the formal act, by which the offerer identified himself with his victim, transferring, as it were, from himself to the victim the qualities or feelings in which that victim was to represent him, and be his substitute on the altar of God. In respect to the one great annual sin-offering it is thus explained, "Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live-goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat," Lev. xvi. 21. Here plainly the one thing conveyed by the hands of the offering high-priest to the goat was the collective guilt of the people—that guilt, however, as already atoned for by the slain goat, the other part of the offering, and now to be borne away into everlasting forgetfulness by the live goat, as graciously forgiven by God. In all sin and trespass-offerings which expressly brought to remembrance the transgressions of the offerer, and had for their object the atonement of his guilt, this guilt was undoubtedly the thing transferred by the action of the laying on of hands; it was the sad burden of the worshiper, which he sought to have removed from himself and laid upon the victim, which by divine appointment was to bear for him its appointed doom. And in all offerings of blood there must have been something of this transference of guilt; for the blood, which bore in it the life of the animal, had in every case this significance—it was given to make atonement for sin; and in all approaches to God the worshiper could only come with acceptance, if he came with confession of sin, and relying on the presentation of sacrificial blood as the appointed medium of forgiveness. But in the burnt-offerings and in the peace or thank-offerings, as there were other feelings expressed on the part of the worshiper, so there were other things symbolically transferred to his victim by the imposition of hands, according to the nature of the sacrifice presented, and the occasion that called it forth. In every case the rite is to be viewed as retaining its native import, as the act of a symbolical transference of that in the offerer, for which he brought his victim, and in respect to which he wished it to be taken as his representative before God.

HANDBREADTH (hand'breadth), Ex. xxv. 25; xxxvii. 12; 1 Ki. vii. 26; 2 Chr. iv. 5; Ps. xxxix. 5; Ezek. xl. 5, 43. See MEASURES.

HANDEL (han'del), GEORGE FREDERICK, one of the greatest of all the famous masters of music in Germany, was born at Halle in 1684. In Berlin the king offered to send him to Italy for his education, but his father refused the offer. He went to Hamburg, where he was engaged in the orchestra, and shortly afterward went to Florence, where he resided for some time. Here and in other parts of Italy he produced several of his remarkable works. Removing to England, he was received with great favor, especially by the queen and the court. He was made director of the Royal Academy of Music. Meeting with great trouble because of the strife between the Italian school, then rising in England, and the German, he left the department of opera for that of oratorio, in which for a time he had but indifferent success. In Dublin he was received with acclamation, and here his "Messiah" produced a greater effect than he had ever witnessed in connection with any of his other works. On his return to London he met with great favor. He became blind in his later years, but he still continued to compose by the aid of an amanuensis, and he was able to preside in public at the organ. He died in 1759, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a splendid monument was erected over his grave. In 1784 a grand musical display was held by order of George III. in the abbey to commemorate his birth; and even it was far outdone in the number of performers and in that of the audience by the festival in the Crystal Palace on the centenary of his death.

HANDICRAFT (han'de-kraft). In the early periods to which the Scriptural history refers the entire circle of achievement which man had effected in the natural world was too immediately and too obviously connected with the labor of the hands, which is, in truth, the great primary source of wealth, for any feeling regarding it to prevail but one of high estimation. When hand-laborers were seen on every side and found in every grade of life, and when the products of their skill and industry were the chief, if not the sole, advantages which civilization gave, handicraftsmen, as they were among the great benefactors, so were they among the chief favorites of human kind. Accordingly, even the creation of the world is spoken of as the work of God's hands, and the firmament is said to show his handiwork, Ps. viii. 3; xix. 1; Gen. ii. 2; Job xxxiv. 19. The primitive history, too, which the Bible presents is the history of hand-laborers. Adam dressed the garden in which God had placed him, Gen. ii. 15, Abel was a keeper of sheep, Cain a tiller of the ground, Gen. iv. 3, Tubal-Cain a smith, Gen. iv. 22. These references prove how soon men gave themselves to the labors of the hand; and these and similar passages serve to show what were the earliest employments, did not the nature of the case suffice to assure us that the most necessary arts would be first cultivated. The general nature of this article does not require any extensive or detailed inquiry into the hand-labors which the Israelites practiced before their descent into Egypt; but the high and varied culture which they found there declares that any history of hand-labor must be very defective the sources of which are found exclusively in the Bible. The shepherd-life which the patriarchs previously led in their own pasture-grounds was not favorable to the cultivation of the practical arts of life, much less of those arts by which it is embellished. Egypt, in consequence, must have presented to Joseph and his father not only a land of wonders, but a source of rich and attractive knowledge. And though the herdsman-sort of life which the Hebrews continued to lead would not be conducive to their advancement in either science or art, yet it cannot be doubted that they derived in no slight degree those advantages which have always been reaped by a less cultured people when brought into proximity or contact with a high state of civilization.

Another source of knowledge to the Hebrews of handicrafts were the maritime and commercial Phœnicians. Commerce and navigation imply great skill in art and science, and the pursuits to which they lead largely increase the skill whence they emanate. It is not, therefore, surprising that the origin of so many arts has been referred to the north-eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea, nor is there any difficulty in understanding how arts and letters should be propagated from the coast to the interior, conferring high advantages on the inhabitants of Syria in general, as well before as after the settlement of the Hebrew tribes in the land of promise. At first the division of labor was only very partial. The master of the family himself exercised such arts as were found of absolute necessity. Among these may be reckoned not only those which pasturage and tillage required, but most of those which were of that rough and severe nature which demand strength as well as skill; such, for instance, as the preparation of wood-work for the dwelling, the slaying of animals for food, which every householder understood, together with the art of extracting the blood from the entire carcass. The lighter labors of the hand fell to the share of the housewife; such as baking bread, 2 Sam. xiii. 8—for it was only in large towns that baking was carried on as a trade; such, also, as cooking in general, supplying the house with water—no very easy office, as the fountains often lay at a considerable distance from the dwelling; moreover, weaving, making of clothes, working in wool, flax, hemp, cotton, tapestry, richly-colored hangings, etc., were carried on within the precincts of the house by the mistress and her maidens. See page 525.

The skill of the Hebrews during their wanderings in the desert does not appear to have been inconsiderable. In Exodus, xxxv. 30-35, a passage occurs which may serve to specify many arts that were practiced among the Israelites, though it seems also to intimate that at the time to which it refers artificers of the description referred to were not numerous: "See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel, and hath filled him with the spirit of God, in knowledge and all manner of workmanship, and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work; and he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he and Aboliab; them hath he filled with wisdom of heart to work all manner of work of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer in blue and in purple, in scarlet and in fine linen, and of the weaver."

From the ensuing chapter, ver. 34, it appears that gilding was known before the settlement in Canaan. The ark, Ex. xxxvii. 2, was overlaid with pure gold within and without. The cherubim were wrought ("beaten," Ex. xxxvii. 7) in gold. The candlestick was of beaten gold, vs. 17, 22. Wire-drawing was probably understood, Ex. xxxviii. 4; xxxix. 3. Covering with brass, Ex. xxxviii. 2, and with silver, Prov. xxvi. 23, was practiced; but the pursuits of war and the entire absorption of the energies of the nation in the one great work of gaining the land which had been given to them may have led to their falling off in the arts of peace; and from a passage in 1 Sam. xiii. 20 it would appear that not long after they had taken possession of the country they were in a low condition as to the instruments of handicraft. A comparatively settled state of society, however, soon led to the revival of skill by the encouragement of industry. A more minute division of labor ensued. Trades, strictly so called, arose, carried on by persons exclusively devoted to one pursuit.

Thus, in Jud. xvii. 4 and Jer. x. 14, "the founder" is mentioned, a trade which implies a practical knowledge of metallurgy; the smelting and working of metals were well known to the Hebrews, Job xxxvii. 18; brass was in use before iron; arms and instruments of husbandry were made of iron. Architecture and the kindred arts do not appear to have made much progress till the days of Solomon, who employed an immense number of persons to procure timber, 1 Ki. v. 13, etc.; but the men of skill for building his temple he obtained from Hiram, king of Tyre, 1 Ki. v. 6, etc.; 1 Chr. xiv. 1; 2 Chr. ii. 7. Without pursuing the subject into all its details, we remark that the intercourse which the Babylonish captivity gave the Jews seems to have greatly improved their knowledge and skill in both the practical and the fine arts, and to have led them to hold them in very high estimation. The arts were even carried on by persons of learning, who took a title of honor from their trade.

In the Apocrypha and New Testament there are mentioned tanners, Acts ix. 43, tent-makers, Acts xviii. 3; in Josephus, cheese-makers, barbers; in the Talmud, with others, we find tailors, shoemakers, blood-letters, glaziers, goldsmiths, plasterers. Certain handicraftsmen could never rise to the rank of high-priest—such as weavers, barbers, fullers, perfumers, cuppers, tanners; which pursuits, especially the last, were held in disesteem.

In large cities specific localities were set apart for particular trades, as is the case in the East to the present day. Thus, in Jer. xxxvii. 21 we read of "the bakers' street." So in the Talmud mention is made of a flesh-market; in Josephus, of a cheese-market; and in the New Testament, probably, John v. 2, we read of a sheep-market.

To the above general statements we add a few more minute particulars respecting the different trades practiced among the Jews.

1. Carpenters, 2 Sam. v. 11; 2 Ki. xii. 12; Isa. li. 7; Mark vi. 3; Matt. xiii. 55. The work of the carpenter belongs to the earliest efforts of men to provide themselves with the ordinary conveniences and comforts of life. Though, therefore, the workmen employed by David and Solomon in their great buildings were chiefly Phœnicians, we must believe that the carpenter's art, at least in its ordinary applications, was familiar to the Hebrews. It would even appear that there were persons among them at both an early and a later period who could execute the finer parts of wood-carving, Ex. xxxv. 33; Isa. xli. 7; xlii. 13. The implements used by the carpenter were the axe, Ps. lxxiv. 5; Jer. xlvi. 22; Deut. xix. 5; Isa. x. 15; the measuring-line, Isa. xlii. 13; the chisel or carving tool, Isa. xlii. 13; the compass; the stylus or graver.

2. Masons, Hebrew, literally wallers, 2 Ki. xii. 12, workers of wall-stone, 2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chr. xxii. 15; stone-cutters or hewers, "workers of stone," 1 Chr. xxii. 2, 15; Ezra iii. 7, etc. The "builders," 2 Ki. xii. 12, were probably master-masons. In the time of Solomon the most skilled of these handicraftsmen came from the territories of Hiram, king of Tyre. For the squaring of the stones a saw was used, 1 Ki. vii. 9. As they also prepared the stone by hewing, 1 Chr. xxii. 2, they must have used the chisel and the mallet, 1 Ki. vi. 7, though no mention of the former occurs in Scripture. They used also the plumb-line, Amos vii. 7, the measuring-reed, Ezek. xl. 5, the measuring-line, Job xxxviii. 5; Zech. i. 16, and the axe, 1 Ki. vi. 7.

3. Workers in metals.—These were copper-smiths, 1 Ki. vii. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 14; iron-smiths, Isa. xlii. 12; 1 Sam. xiii. 19; and silver-smiths or gold-smiths, Jud. xvii. 4; Prov. xxv. 4; Isa. xl. 19; Mal. iii. 2, 3; Acts xix. 24; the last of whom seem to have formed a guild, Neh. iii. 8. Weapons and cooking-utensils were made of copper, which was simply beat out, Num. xvii. 4, or cast into a mould, 1 Ki. vii. 46; Job xxxvii. 18, and polished, 1 Ki. vii. 45.

EGYPTIAN CARPENTERS AT WORK.

Workers in the precious metals also used the same methods of preparing their articles; they seem, also, to have understood the art of gilding and of filagree work, Isa. xl. 19; xli. 7; xlii. 12. The implements they used were of the simplest kind—the anvil, Isa. xli. 7; the hammer; the tongs, Isa. vi. 6; the bellows, Jer. vi. 29.

4. Workers in Earth and Clay. See BRICK, POTTER, GLASS and BOTTLE.

5. The preparation of skins and works in leather of various sorts must have engaged the attention of the Hebrews, but we possess no precise information on this subject. See LEATHER, BOTTLE and SANDALS.

6. The art of setting and engraving precious stones was known to the Israelites from a very early period, Ex. xxviii. 9. See STONES, PRECIOUS. Works in alabaster were also common among them—smelling-boxes or boxes of perfume. Comp. Matt. xxvi. 7, etc. See ALABASTER. They also adorned their houses and vessels with ivory, 1 Ki. xxii. 39; Amos iii. 15; vi. 4; Song Sol. v. 14. See IVORY.

7. Textile Arts.—Among the Egyptians these flourished, and from them probably the Hebrews acquired the knowledge and skill which they from an early period displayed in these arts, Gen. xli. 42; Ex. ix. 31; Isa. xix. 9. Weaving was usually the work of women, Ex. xxxv. 25; 1 Sam. ii. 19; 2 Ki. xxiii. 7; Prov. xxxi. 10; Acts ix. 39. That it was not confined to females, however, is evident from 1 Chr. iv. 21; comp. Isa. xix. 9. See WEAVING. Besides the ordinary stuffs prepared by weaving, they had stuffs prepared by interweaving gold and silver threads with the body of the material and by needlework. See NEEDLEWORK and EMBROIDER. After being woven the cloth passed through the hands of the fuller and the dyer. See FULLER and COLORS.

8. The use of perfumes and perfumed unguents led to persons devoting themselves to the preparation of such among the Hebrews, Ex. xxx. 25, 35; Neh. iii. 8, "apothecary," Authorized Version; 1 Sam. viii. 13, "confectionery," Authorized Version. See ANOINTING and PERFUMES. From Nehemiah's calling Hananiah "the son of the perfumers," it is supposed they formed a guild or corporation, the members of which built a portion of the wall under his superintendence, as did the goldsmiths under that of Uzziel.

9. Among more domestic arts may be ranked that of the baker, Gen. xl. 1; Jer. xxxvii. 21; Hos. vii. 4 (see BREAD), and of the barber, Ezek. v. 1. The office of the barber among the Israelites was of considerable importance. That men recognized it as a distinct department of work may be seen by referring to Ezek. v. 1. For the differences of custom and taste between the Israelites and other nations see the articles on BREAD and HAIR.

10. In the art of shipbuilding the Hebrews were the pupils of the Phœnicians, 1 Ki. ix. 27; comp. xxii. 49, though it is hardly supposable that they had not some vessels for navigating the internal lakes and seas of their country long before the time of Solomon, Jud. v. 17. The shipmen were, a sailor, Jon. i. 6; Ezek. xxvii. 8, 27-29; Acts xxvii. 30; Rev. xviii. 17; shipmaster, Jon. i. 6; Acts xxvii. 11; mariner, Ezek. xxvii. 9, etc.; Jon. i. 5.

Labor was held in honor among the Hebrews, and therefore handicrafts were exclusively pursued by freemen. Often the same person followed more than one occupation, Ex. xxxi. 1; 2 Chr. ii. 14, etc.

HANDKERCHIEF (hand'ker-chif), or NAPKIN (nap'kin), Luke xix. 20; John xi. 44; xx. 7; Acts xix. 12. The Greek word soudarion is adopted from the Latin sudarium, and probably, at first, had the same meaning with it, and which, being derived from sudo, to "perspire," corresponds to our word (pocket-) handkerchief. It is natural to expect that a foreign word introduced into any language should be applied by those who borrow it in a looser sense than they do from whom it is obtained. Hence, although the Latin word is generally restricted to the forementioned meaning, yet in the Greek and Syriac languages it signifies, chiefly, napkin, wrapper, etc. These observations prepare us for the different uses of the word in Scripture. In the first instance, Luke xix. 20, it means a wrapper, in which the "wicked servant" had laid up the pound entrusted to him by his master. In the second instance, John xi. 44, it appears as a kerchief or cloth attached to the head of a corpse. It was, perhaps, brought around the forehead and under the chin. In many Egyptian mummies it does not cover the face, while in ancient times, among the Greeks, it did. Maimonides, in his comparatively recent times, describes the whole face as being covered, and gives a reason for the custom. The next instance is that of the soudarion which had been "about the head" of our Lord, but which, after his resurrection, was found rolled up, as if deliberately, and put in a place separately from the linen clothes. The last instance of the Biblical use of the word occurs in the account of "the special miracles" wrought by the hands of Paul, Acts xix. 11; "so that 'soudaria' (handkerchiefs, napkins, wrappers, shawls, etc.) were brought from his body to the sick, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them." The Ephesians had not unreasonably inferred that the apostle's miraculous power could be communicated by such a mode of contact; and certainly cures thus received by parties at a distance, among a people famed for their addictedness to "curious arts"—i. e., magical skill, etc.—would serve to convince them of the truth of the gospel by a mode well suited to interest their minds. The apostle is not recorded to have expressed any opinion respecting the reality of this intermediate means of working miracles. He had doubtless sufficiently explained that these and all the other miracles "wrought by his hands"—i. e., by his means—were really wrought by God in attestation of the mission of Jesus. If he himself did not entertain exactly the same ideas upon the subject as they did, he may be considered as conceding to, or rather not disturbing unnecessarily, popular notions, rendered harmless by his previous explanation, and affording a very convenient medium for achieving much higher purposes. If the connection between the secondary cause and the effect was real, it reminds us of our Saviour's expression, "I perceive that virtue is gone out of me," Luke viii. 46, which is, however, regarded by many critics as a popular mode of saying that he knew that a miracle had been wrought by his power and efficacy—a mode of speaking in unison at least with the belief of the woman that she should be healed if she could but touch the hem of his garment unperceived by him, and perhaps even conceded to, in accordance with the miracles wrought through the medium of contact related in the Old Testament, 1 Ki. xvii. 21; 2 Ki. iv. 29, etc., and in order by a superior display, in regard both to speed and extensiveness, to demonstrate his supremacy by a mode through which the Jews were best prepared to perceive it, Luke vi. 19.

HANDMAID, Gen. xvi. 1; xxix. 24, 29. See SERVANT.

HAND-STAVES (hand'stavz), Ezek. xxxix. 9, darts or javelins.

HANDWRITING (hand-ri'ting), Col. ii. 14. "The handwriting that was against us in ordinances" may require explanation. It is the condemnation of the law we have broken, which is blotted out by the Grace of the gospel.

HANES (ha'nez), a city of Egypt mentioned only once, Isa. xxx. 4. It has been generally identified with the Heracleopolis (Heracles city) of the Greeks in Middle Egypt, on the west of the Nile, called in Coptic hnes, or ehnes. But the Chaldee paraphrase reads Tahpanhes, and there are reasons for believing that this was the place really meant, for which Hanes might be a transcriber's error or an abbreviation. See TAHPANHES.

HANIEL (han'e-el), a chieftain of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 39.

HÄNLEIN (han'line), HEINRICH KARL ALEXANDER, a German theologian, was born at Ansbach in 1762. He was professor of theology at Erlangen, and afterward consistorialrath in Ansbach. In 1805 he was appointed at Oberkirchenrath in Munich, and subsequently became oberconsistorial-direktor. He died in 1829. Hänlein is best known by an "Introduction to the New Testament." Here the results which had been already reached are given in a brief, lucid and compact form. Hänlein added little of his own, but his judgment was good, and he did not follow either Michaelis or Eichhorn slavishly. His own mind appears throughout the work.

HANMER (han'mer), MEREDITH, D.D., was born in Shropshire, England, in 1543. He obtained the chaplaincy of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and was afterward made rector of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch. Having offended his parishioners here by the alleged sale of decorations upon the graves of his church, he resigned in 1693, and went to Ireland, where he was afterward made treasurer of Trinity Church, Dublin. He was a fine Greek scholar, and wrote "Translation of the Ancient Ecclesiastical Histories of the First Six Hundred Years after Christ, originally written by Eusebius, Socrates and Evagrius;" "The Lives of the Prophets and Apostles, by Dorotheus, Bishop of Tyre;" "The Ephemeris of the Saints of Ireland." He died in 1604.

HANNA (han'na), SAMUEL, D.D., an eminent minister of the Irish Presbyterian Church, long and favorably known as professor of theology and Church history in the Royal College at Belfast. He was born at Kellswater, Antrim county, in 1772. He was educated in the university of Glasgow, which afterward conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity in recognition of the great range of his theological acquirements. In 1795 he was ordained and settled in the church of Drumbo, near Belfast, where he soon became known as a solid, wonderfully learned and powerful preacher. In 1799 he was removed to the more important charge in Rosemary street, Belfast, which he held until declining strength and increasing years obliged him to retire. In 1817 he was appointed to the chair of divinity and Church history, which he held until his death. He was a profound theologian, and his work in the preparation of Irish ministers was signally acknowledged by the Head of the Church. He filled the chair of moderator of his own synod; and when the union took place in 1840 of the long-separated branches of the Irish Church, he was unanimously appointed moderator. He was well known and greatly beloved at London, where he appeared at the "May meetings" on behalf of missions. The first of his publications was his sermons on behalf of the London Missionary Society. He died in 1852, leaving behind him a great course of divinity and a large collection of valuable dissertations on ecclesiastical history from the days of the apostles.

HANNA, WILLIAM, D.D., LL.D., son of the preceding, was born at Belfast in the year 1808. After a full course of training in the Royal College of that town, he passed through the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and in 1835 he was ordained as parish minister of East Kilbride, whence he was removed in 1837 to the parish of Skirling. In 1850 he became associate pastor of Free St. John's Church, Edinburgh, along with the Rev. Dr. Guthrie, which charge he resigned in 1867. He has been a very prolific author, and he is deservedly known as one of the most cultured scholars and highly-educated churchmen of the day. His name rose at once into fame by his life of his father-in-law Dr. Chalmers, which appeared in four volumes. Then followed the posthumous works of Dr. Chalmers, and next "Our Lord's Life on Earth," in six volumes. Subsequently, he published "The Wars of the Huguenots," and "The Resurrection of the Dead;" and for several years past he has held a prominent place in the "North British Review," "Good Words," "Sunday Magazine," "The Bible Educator," and other leading journals. As a preacher Dr. Hanna has held a front rank because of the richness of his matter, the purity and graces of his style and the fullness of his doctrines, and the tenderness and sympathy which his matter and manner have always produced, especially on refined audiences.

HANNAH (han'nah), wife of a Levite named Elkanah and the mother of Samuel. Being childless, she was much aggrieved by the taunts of Peninnah, the other wife of Elkanah, who was blessed with children. Sensitive to her situation, she declined to take part in the festivities after sacrifice, upon the occasion of one of her visits with her husband to Shiloh. She prayed to the Lord to take away her reproach, and vowed to devote to God the son she so earnestly desired if her prayer should be granted. Before the end of that year Hannah became the rejoicing mother of a son, to whom the name of Samuel was given, and who was from his birth placed under the obligations of that condition of Nazaritship to which his mother had vowed him.

Hannah went no more to Shiloh till her child was old enough to dispense with her maternal services, when she took him up with her to leave him there, as it appears was the custom when one already a Levite was placed under the additional obligations of Nazaritship. When he was presented in due form to the high-priest, the mother took occasion to remind him of the former transaction: "For this child," she said, "I prayed, and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of him," 1 Sam. i. 27. Hannah's gladness afterward found vent in an exulting chant, which furnishes a remarkable specimen of the early lyric poetry of the Hebrews, and of which many of the ideas and images were in after times repeated by the Virgin Mary on a somewhat similar occasion.

After this Hannah failed not to visit Shiloh every year, bringing a new dress for her son, who remained under the eye and near the person of the high-priest.

HANNAH, JOHN, D.D., a prominent and useful Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born November 3, 1792, at Lincoln, England, and entered the ministry in 1814. He filled various appointments on circuits until 1834, when he became theological tutor in the Wesleyan Training Institution at Hoxton. In 1842 he was transferred to the college at Didsbury, in the same capacity, where he remained until relieved as a supernumerary. For one third of a century he was entrusted with the principal training of the young Wesleyan ministry; and the men who grew up under his instruction bear abundant testimony to his salutary influence and example. His ministry extended through a period of over fifty years, and was earnest and very successful. He is estimated to have been one of the greatest blessings that Wesleyan Methodism enjoyed in his generation. He died December 29, 1867.

HANNATHON (han'na-thon), a town on the northern border of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 14.

HANNIEL (han'ne-el), a chief of Manasseh, chosen to assist in the allotment of Canaan, Num. xxxiv. 23.

HANCCH (han'ok). 1. One of the sons of Midian, Gen. xxv. 4. He is also called Henoch, 1 Chr. i. 33. 2. A son of Reuben, Gen. xlvi. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 5; 1 Chr. v. 3.

HANCCHITES (han'ok-ites), a family of Reuben descended from Hanoah, Num. xxvi. 5.

HANS SACHS (hahns sakhs), the most noted of the German master-singers of the sixteenth century, was born at Nürnberg in 1494. He was the son of a tailor, and was bred to the trade of a shoemaker. He had a taste for poetry and music, learned the mystery of versing from one Nunnebeck, a weaver, and became a member of the guild of singers in his native town. To see the wonders of the world, he set out in 1511 on a tour, visiting the chief cities of Germany, fighting manfully against evil passions and temptations to a frivolous life, and after several years' absence returned and settled at Nürnberg. He was quick to recognize and embrace the doctrines of his great contemporary, Luther, who made hearty acknowledgment of the service rendered to the truth by his numerous religious songs, which were household words throughout Germany. The quantity of his productions is amazing. He wrote above 6000 poetical pieces, of which 308 were tragedies and comedies. With impaired sight and hearing, he withdrew from society, and in study and meditation spent tranquillity his last years. "Not without genius and a shrewd irony," says Carlyle of him, "and, above all, the most gay, childlike, yet devout and solid character; a singular product, and a still legible symbol and clear mirror of the time and country where he lived." He died at Nürnberg in 1578.

HANUN (ha'nun), son and successor of Nahash, king of the Ammonites. David, who had in his troubles been befriended by Nahash, sent, with the kindest intentions, an embassy to condole with him on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his own accession. The rash young king, however, was led to misapprehend the motives of this embassy, and to treat with gross and inexpiable indignity the honorable personages whom David had charged with this mission. David vowed vengeance upon Hanun for the insult; and Hanun himself, looking for nothing less than war as the consequence of his conduct, subsidized Hadaezer and other Syrian princes to assist him with their armies. The power of the Syrians was broken in two campaigns, and the Ammonites were left to their fate, which was severe even beyond the usual severities of war in that remote age.

HANWAY (han'way), JONAS, a man distinguished for his zeal and efficiency as a promoter of philanthropic schemes and Sunday-schools, was born in Portsmouth, England, in 1712. In early life he was engaged in mercantile business, first in Lisbon and afterward in St. Petersburg. Retiring from business, he settled in London and employed his great wealth in devising and carrying forward various enterprises of a benevolent character. The Magdalen Charity and Marine Society in particular owe their existence mainly to his exertions. His services in the cause of philanthropy were so marked and honorable that a number of British merchants petitioned the government to distinguish him by some mark of public favor and appreciation of his noble deeds; and he was accordingly appointed commissioner of the navy. He published "The Importance of the Lord's Supper," "Reflections on Life and Religion," travels through Russia, Persia, Germany and Holland, and a large number of other works. He died in 1786, and several thousand pounds were immediately contributed for a monument to a man who had shown himself a pattern of benevolence and virtue.

HAPHRAIM (haf-ra'im), a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 19. Mr. Grove suggests that the present village of el-'Afulah, near Solam, the ancient Shunem, may mark its site.

HAPHTARA (haf'ta-ra). See SYNAGOGUE.

HARA (hah'ra), a place or district to which some of the Israelitish captives were carried, 1 Chr. v. 26. It may be the same with Haran or Charran in Mesopotamia. If not, it seems impossible to identify the place intended.

HARADAH (har'a-dah), a station of Israel in the wilderness, Num. xxxiii. 24, 25.

HARAN (hah'ran). 1. The brother of Abraham. He was the father of Lot, Micah and Iscah, and died before his father Terah, in Ur of the Chaldees, Gen. xi. 27-31. This is all that is certainly known of him; the Jews have added some traditional stories to his known history. 2. A Levite of the family of Gershon, 1 Chr. xxiii. 9. 3. A son of the eminent Caleb, 1 Chr. ii. 46.

HARAN, the city to which Abraham and his family migrated when they left Ur of the Chaldees. And still, when Abraham proceeded into Canaan, his brother Nahor remained at Haran, and his descendants established themselves here; so that it was sometimes described as the city of Nahor, Gen. xxiv. 10. Here Terah died, and here Jacob sojourned with Laban, Gen. xi. 31, 32; xii. 4, 5; xxvii. 43; xxviii. 10; xxix. 4; 2 Ki. xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12; Ezek. xxvii. 23. It is called Charran in Acts vii. 2, 4. Haran was situated in Mesopotamia, more exactly in Padan-aram, a plain bounded by hills. It was famous for being close to the scene of the defeat of Crassus, and is generally believed to be the modern Harrân on the Belilk, which flows into the Euphrates. It is but a village now, inhabited by Arabs.

But this conclusion is liable to doubt, so far at least as concerns the Haran in which members of the Abrahamic family were settled. It has been proposed, therefore, to identify the Mesopotamia of the early Scripture writers, Aram-naharain, "Aram of the two rivers," with Aram of Damascus, where certainly there were two noted streams, Abana and Pharpar, and to look for the city of Haran in that neighborhood. It is clear that there must have been some connection between Abraham and Damascus, for Eliezer, "born in his house," is denominated "of Damascus," Gen. xv. 2, 3. Still further, Jacob, traveling of necessity, on account of his cattle, slowly, reached Mount Gilead in ten days after leaving Padan-aram. The distance is between three and four hundred miles, if the usual theory be adopted; it is, therefore, physically impossible that the journey could have been accomplished within the specified time, Gen. xxxi.

22, 23. Moreover, it is not easy to understand how a pillar on Mount Gilead could be a boundary mark between Jacob and Laban, if the latter lived far away beyond the Euphrates. There is, therefore, a high probability that the Haran in question is a place of the name near Damascus, visited in 1861 by Dr. Beke.

HARALD KLAAK (hah'rald kla'ak) was sovereign of Jutland in the ninth century. He was expelled from his kingdom, but was reinstated by Lewis the Meek, on condition that he would embrace Christianity and admit teachers of the Christian religion into his country. Accordingly, he was baptized at Mayence, and returned to his kingdom with two monks, Ansgarius and Autbert, and through their joint exertions the gospel spread through Jutland and Cimbria.

HARARITE (har'a-rite), a designation given to three of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 11, 33; 1 Chr. xi. 34, 35.

EFFIGY OF LADY HARCOURT IN WORCESTER CATHEDRAL, ENGLAND.

HARBAUGH (har'baw), HENRY, D.D., was born near Waynesborough, Pennsylvania, October 28, 1817. His father was an elder in the German Reformed Church, and his son grew up attached to its doctrines and polity. Cherishing a desire in early life to enter the ministry which his father was unwilling to gratify, he directed his attention first to the trade of a carpenter and afterward engaged in teaching in a common school. The money saved by strict economy in these employments enabled him to enter Marshall College at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, in 1840, then under the presidency of Dr. Nevin, where he pursued such a course of literary and theological studies as his limited means would permit. In 1843 he was settled as pastor of a congregation in Lewisburg, which he resigned for a pastoral charge in Lancaster in 1850, where he remained for ten years. In 1860 he was called to the church in Lebanon, and in 1863 he was elected by the synod professor of theology in the seminary of Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, where he remained until his death, December 28, 1867. In theological views Harbaugh was among those in his Church "who emphasized the efficacy of the sacraments and the priestly character of the ministry." He was the author of several valuable works and many contributions to the religious literature of his day. He wrote "Heaven, or the Sainted Dead," "Heavenly Home," "The Heavenly Recognition," "The Golden Censer," "Union with the Church," "Life of T. D. Fischer," "Life of Michael Schlatter, a pioneer of the German Reformed Church in America," "The Glory of Woman," a volume of poems, and "The Fathers of the German Reformed Church in America." He was also editor of the "Child's Treasury" and the "Guardian."

HARBONA, or HARBONAH (har-bo'-nah), one of the chamberlains or eunuchs of Ahasuerus, Esth. i. 10; vii. 9.

HARCOURT (har'ko'rt). Among the noble families of England whose members distinguished themselves by their deeds of piety and benevolence the Harcourts are eminent, and the effigy or statue in Worcester Cathedral erected to the memory of one of the most worthy of her sex displays the esteem in which her life and services were held. The style of the dress and general expression of the figure give an admirable illustration of the taste of her age. Of this family was HARRIET EUSEBIA HARCOURT, born at Richmond, in Yorkshire, who established a monastery for women on her Yorkshire estates, and another similar in character in the Western Isles of Scotland. They were not governed by rules of austerity, and on her death in 1745 they were dissolved.

HARDENBERG (har'den-berg), ALBERT, born at Overyssele in 1510, was one of the first to embrace the Reformation. He was theological professor at Bremen, which city he was compelled to leave in consequence of his opposition to one of the Lutheran dogmas. In the controversy which he held on the subject, he testified that Luther regretted the extreme language he had used on the subject of the Lord's Supper, and was anxious that Melancthon should draw up some statement calculated to allay the differences between their respective followers. He died in 1574. See LUTHER and MELANCTHON.

HARDING (har'ding), STEPHEN, the real founder of the Cistercian order, was an English monk of Sherborne in Dorsetshire, who, not finding his spiritual cravings satisfied there, went as a pilgrim to Rome. Still longing for a more austere life and a higher strain of devotion, he settled for a time at the recently founded monastery of Molesme in Burgundy; and at last, unsatisfied, sought with six others of the brethren a more dismal and desolate seclusion at Citeaux. There he became abbot in 1109, and died in 1134. The great St. Bernard, with his kindred and followers, entered the monastery of Stephen Harding in 1113.

HARDING, THOMAS, an English divine, born at Combe-Martin, Devonshire, in 1512. He was educated in the Romish faith at Winchester and New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1542 he was chosen Hebrew professor, and conformed to the Established religion during that reign and the next. He was also tutor to Lady Jane Grey, whom he instructed in the Protestant faith. But on the accession of Mary he apostatized, for which his excellent pupil remonstrated with him, as appears by an admirable letter of hers preserved by Fox. In 1554 he took his doctor's degree, and was made prebendary of Winchester and treasurer of Salisbury. When Elizabeth came to the crown, Harding went to Louvain, where he carried on a long controversy with Bishop Jewell. Died 1572.

HARDOUIN (har-doo-ang'), JEAN, a French Jesuit remarkable for his great learning and his whimsical notions, was born at Quimper in 1646. He was a linguist, historian and numismatist, and attempted to prove from coins and medals that the works of Cicero, Horace and Pliny and Virgil's "Georgics" were the only genuine classics extant—that all others were forgeries of monks of the thirteenth century. He published several treatises on this subject which made a great noise, and he was compelled by the Jesuits to retract his statements, though his opinions remained unchanged. He edited "The Councils," in twelve volumes, but the work was suppressed. He died in 1729.

SYRIAN HARE.

HARDT (hart), HERMANN VON DER, a learned theologian and Orientalist, was born at Melle, in Westphalia, in the duchy of Osnabruck, 15th November, 1660. After receiving his early education at Herfort and Osnabruck, he repaired to Koburg in his seventeenth year, and thence to the university of Jena, where he devoted himself to the study of theology and the Oriental languages. He then spent a year at Hamburg under the learned Edzard, and returned to Jena in 1681, where, after a time, he began to give private lectures. In 1686 he repaired to Leipzig and commenced as a private tutor. In 1690 he became ordinary professor of Oriental languages at Helmstadt. Here he led a life of unwearied literary activity, lecturing on the Oriental tongues, the exegesis of the Old and New Testament, Hebrew and ecclesiastical antiquities, Bible science, etc. He died, at the age of eighty-six, in 1746, 28th February. He was a very learned man, but full of paradoxes, eager after new views, rash and peculiar. His writings are numerous, exceeding three hundred, and of a miscellaneous nature, grammatical, exegetical and historical. Among them, his "Review of the Commentaries of Raschi, Aben Ezra, Kimchi, et al.," "Elements of Universal Exegesis," "Literary History of the Reformation" and "Enigmas of the Primeval World," especially deserve mention.

HARDWICK (hard'wik), CHARLES, a divine and theologian of the Church of England, was born September 22, 1821, at Slingsby, in Yorkshire. After pursuing an elementary course of education at Thornton grammar school, he entered the university of Cambridge in 1840, and graduated in 1844. After enjoying the honor and advantages of a fellowship here for six years, he was in 1851 made Cambridge preacher at the chapel royal, Whitehall. In 1855 he was appointed lecturer on divinity in King's College, Cambridge, and Christian advocate. He was a man of thorough scholarship and great literary activity, and his sudden death in the prime of his life blasted many bright hopes that were entertained of his usefulness. He died from a fall during a summer tour in the Pyrenees, August 18, 1859. He was the author of a work of great value on comparative theology, under the title of "Christ, and other Masters, an Historical Inquiry into some of the Chief Parallels and Contrasts between Christianity and the Religious Systems of the Ancient World," "A History of the Thirty-Nine Articles," "A History of the Christian Church in the Middle Ages," "A History of the Christian Church during the Reformation," "Twenty Sermons for Town Congregations," etc.

HARDY (har'de), ROBERT SPENCER, an author and missionary of the English Methodist Church, was born July 1, 1803, at Preston, in Lancashire. He commenced life as a printer and bookseller, but in 1825 was admitted into the British Conference and sent as a missionary to Ceylon, where he labored with great diligence for more than twenty years. To the extraordinary literary activity and zeal of Mr. Hardy and his colleague Gogerly the Christian world is largely indebted for its knowledge of Buddhism in Ceylon. His acquaintance with the Pali and Sanscrit, as well as with the Portuguese, French, Hebrew, Greek and Latin languages, was extensive and accurate. He was the author of "A Manual of Buddhism in its Modern Development, translated from Singalese MSS.," "The Legends and Theories of Buddhists compared with History and Science," "Eastern Monachism, an account of the Origin, Laws, Discipline, Sacred Writings, etc., of the Order of Mendicants, founded by Gotama Buddha," "Christianity and Buddhism Compared." He died April 16, 1868.

HARDY, SAMUEL, an English author and divine, was born in 1720. He received his education at Emanuel College, Cambridge, entered into holy orders, and was for many years rector of Blakenham, Suffolk. He wrote "Nature and Ends of the Eucharist," "Principal Prophecies of the Old and New Testaments Compared and Explained," "The New Testament in Greek, with Annotations from Poole's Synopsis." He died in 1793.

HARE (hare) occurs in Lev. xi. 6 and Deut. xiv. 7, and in both instances the animal is prohibited from being used as food, because, although it chews the cud, it has not the hoof divided. But the hare belongs to an order of mammals totally distinct from the Ruminantia, which are all, without exception, bisulca, the camel's hoof alone affording a partial modification. They have all four stomachs, incisor teeth, with again some slight modifications in the camel, solely in the lower jaw, molars made for grinding and the lower jaw-bone articulated, so as to admit of the circular action required for that purpose, when the food already swallowed is forced up to be thoroughly triturated. All these characters and faculties are wanting in the hare, which belongs to the order rodentia, or in common with porcupines, squirrels, beavers and rats, it has incisor teeth above and below, set like chisels, and calculated for gnawing, cutting and nibbling. The stomach of rodents is single, and the motion of the mouth, excepting when they masticate some small portion of food reserved in the hollow of the cheek, is more than of the lips; when in a state of repose, the animals are engaged in working the incisor teeth upon each other. This practice is a necessary condition of existence, for the friction keeps them fit for the purpose of nibbling and prevents their growing beyond a proper length. It is a provision of nature in the whole order of rodents; and if by any accident the four cutting teeth be rendered inefficient by not closing upon each other at the exact line of contact, they grow rapidly beyond serviceable use, exceed the opening of the mouth, and impede feeding till the animal perishes from want. As hares do not subsist on hard substances, like most of the genera of the order, but on tender shoots and grasses, they have more cause, and therefore a more constant craving, to abrade their teeth; and this they do in a manner which, combined with the slight trituration of the occasional contents of the cheeks, even modern writers not zoologists have mistaken for real rumination. In the German versions the expression wiederkauen, "to chew again," is much more correct than the English phrase "to chew the cud," because this last implies a faculty which re-chewing does not, and which the hare does not possess.

Investigation having fully determined these questions, it follows that both with regard to the hyrax [see CONEY] and the hare we should understand the original in the above passages, rendered "chewing the cud," as merely implying a second mastication, more or less complete, and not necessarily that faculty of true ruminants which derives its name from a power to draw up aliment, after deglutition, when worked into a ball, from the first stomach into the mouth, and there to submit it to a second grinding process. The act of "chewing the cud" and "re-chewing" being considered identical by the Hebrews, the sacred lawgiver, not being occupied with the doctrines of science, no doubt used the expression in the sense in which it was then understood. It may be added that a similar opinion, and consequent rejection of the hare as food, pervaded many nations of antiquity, who derived their origin, or their doctrines, from a Semitic source; and that among others it existed among the British Celtæ, probably even before they had any intercourse with Phœnician merchants.

There are two distinct species of hare in Syria—one, Lepus Syriacus, or Syrian hare, nearly equal in size to the common European, having the fur ochry buff, and Lepus Sinaiticus, or hare of the desert, smaller and brownish. They reside in the localities indicated by their trivial names, and are distinguished from the common hare by a greater length of ears and a black tail with white fringe. There is found in Egypt, and higher up the Nile, a third species, represented in the outline paintings on ancient monuments, but not colored with that delicacy of tint required for distinguishing it from the others, excepting that it appears to be marked with the black speckles which characterize the existing species.

HARE, EDWARD, an English Methodist minister, was born September 19, 1774, at Hull. In early life he became a sailor, and while in this capacity at sea he was converted, in 1793, and conducted religious services among the sailors. In 1798, after having been twice a prisoner during the French war, he entered the ministry of the Wesleyan Church and devoted his subsequent life with great acceptance and earnestness to the duties of his profession. He was the author of several works of a controversial and apologetical nature on the doctrines of Methodism, written in a clear and forcible manner. The most important of these, perhaps, is "A Treatise on the Scriptural Doctrine of Justification." He died in 1818.

HARE, FRANCIS, D.D., successively dean of Worcester, dean of St. Paul's, bishop of St. Asaph and bishop of Chichester. The deanery of St. Paul's he held with each of his episcopal appointments to his death in 1740. He was at one time a friend of Dr. Bentley, who dedicated to him, in 1713, his celebrated "Remarks on the Essay on Freethinking," in acknowledgment of which Hare published his letter entitled "A Clergyman's thanks to Philelutherus Lipsiensis for his Remarks, etc." Before his elevation to the see of St. Asaph, Dr. Hare took part against Hoadley in the Bangorian controversy; amongst his published works was a sermon on this subject—"Concio ad Synodum," on Titus ii. 8. Bishop Hare was the author of several political tracts, an edition of Terence and a volume of sermons, but the only work worthy of special mention in this Encyclopedia was his "Book of Psalms in the Hebrew, put into the original Poetical Metre," published in 1736. "We learn," says Bishop Jebb, "from George Psalmanazar's memoirs, that his lordship printed but five hundred copies of his Hebrew Psalter, one-half of which he presented to his learned friends at home and abroad; the remaining copies sold but slackly, and the work was never separately republished. Although this ingenious treatise was so soon superseded by Bishop Lowth's metrical system, it was unquestionably the first publication of any note that had appeared in England on the subject of Hebrew metre. The learned author's negative merits were not inconsiderable; he saw with clearness and exposed with convincing arguments the faults of his predecessors; yet he fell into some of the same as well as other errors. See LOWTH, ROBERT. Still, Bishop Hare's work gave unmistakable proof of the author's learning and generally good judgment. Bishop Hare was grandfather of the eminent archdeacon of Lewes, noticed below.

HARE, JULIUS CHARLES, the venerable archdeacon, was born in 1795, at Hurstmonceux, in Sussex, of which parish his father was vicar, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1832 he was instituted to the rectory of Hurstmonceux, the advowson of which was in his family, and in this sphere he labored till his death. His name was first brought before the world as translator, in conjunction with Dr. Thirlwall, of the first two volumes of Niebuhr's "History of Rome." The next production of his pen was "Guesses at Truth," a volume of miscellaneous essays and fragments, published in conjunction with his brother, Augustus William Hare. These writings were the first fruits of his intercourse with that little band who looked up to Samuel Taylor Coleridge as their guide and teacher. His subsequent works were chiefly on theological subjects. He was generally considered as the leader of that party in the Church of England to which the name of "Broad Church" has been given. In "The Mission of the Comforter," a volume of sermons with an appendix twice the bulk of the text, replete with minute learning, classified by a master-hand, he made an attempt to lay down a form of belief on this subject. His other theological works consist chiefly of sermons and charges, which, it has been observed, form a complete history of the times, in their bearing on the interests of the litical geography at the Carolinum of Brunswick. He was soon after nominated overseer of the monastery of St. Laurence, near Schœningen, where he died 12th of November, 1774. Harenberg's works are numerous, and mostly on Biblical subjects; but however useful at the time when they appeared, they are almost forgotten now.

HAREPH (har'ef), a son of Caleb, 1 Chr. ii. 51.

HARETH (har'eth), a forest in the territory of Judah, 1 Sam. xxii. 5.

HARHAIHAH (har-hi'ah), the father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, said to be "of the goldsmiths," Neh. iii. 8.

HARHAS (har'has), an ancestor of Shallum, husband of the prophetess Huldah, 2 Ki. xxii. 12. He is called Hasrah in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 22.

Church. In 1848 he edited the "Remains of John Sterling," for seven months his curate at Hurstmonceux; and in 1852 he published the "Contest with Rome," an answer to Dr. Newman's lectures on the position of Romanists in England. He died in 1855.

HAREL (har'el), a name given to the altar of burnt-offering, Ezek. xliv. 15, marg.

HAREM (har'em). See HOUSE.

HARENBERG (har'en-berg), JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a Lutheran theologian and historian, was born in 1696 at Langenholzen in the duchy of Hildesheim. In 1715 he went to Helmstadt and studied theology, history and the belles-lettres. In 1720 he became rector of the school belonging to the chapter at Gandersheim. In 1733 he was appointed inspector-general of the schools in the duchy of Wolfenbittel. In 1738 he was admitted into the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin, and from 1745 he taught ecclesiastical history and po-

HARHUR (har'hur), one whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53.

HARID, Ezra ii. 33, marg. See HADID.

HARIM (har'im). 1. A head of one of the courses of the priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 8. His descendants in considerable numbers returned with Zerubbabel from captivity, Ezra ii. 39; Neh. vii. 42. Some of them had married foreign wives, Ezra x. 21, and their name is mentioned as having sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 5. The representative of the course or family in the days of Joiakim was Adneh, Neh. xii. 15; but elsewhere (3) for Harim we find Rehun. 2. One whose son helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 11. 3. Another, not a priest, whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 32; Neh. vii. 35. Some of these also had married foreign wives, Ezra x. 31, and they sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 27.

HARIPH (har'if), one whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, Neh. vii.

24, called Jorah in Ezra ii. 18. The name, probably, of their representative, is among those who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 19.

HARIRI (ha-ri're), CASSEM AL, was born in 1055, received the best education which Bassorah could afford, and became, next to Mohammed, the most popular of Arabian writers. His principal work is the "Macamas," a series of fifty dramatic recitals setting forth the way to enjoy life. They are written in the purest Arabic, and have the proverbs of the East and the choicest expressions so largely introduced that they form a complete repertory of the Arabic language, and as such are most highly esteemed. The celebrated Zamakshari, himself an eminent writer, regarded this work with admiration, and testified "by God and his miracles, by the holy ground of Mecca and the duties of pilgrimage, that Hariri deserves to have his 'Macamas' written in letters of purest gold." He died in 1122.

HARLOT (har'lot). This class of persons evidently existed in very early times, and were distinguished, as afterward, by publicly exposing themselves and by their dress, Gen. xxxviii. 14, MODERN ORIENTAL WINDING OFF YARN FOR WEAVING.—See HANDICRAFT, 7.

15; comp. Prov. vii. 10, 11. Rahab is a somewhat later example, Josh. ii. 1. It has, indeed, been maintained that she was merely an inn-keeper; but knowing what we do of the morals of the Canaanites, Lev. xviii. 27, we may easily conclude that women keeping houses of entertainment were little likely to be chaste. Besides, New Testament evidence is against Rahab, Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25, where the attempts to explain away the word used are futile. The Mosaic law utterly discountenanced unchastity, Lev. xix. 29; Deut. xxiii. 17. The term employed in the last named place properly means consecrated, there being doubtless a reference to the foul rites of heathen deities, to whom, as to Ashtoreth or Astarte, young females were devoted for prostitution. The severe law enacted against a priest's daughter, Lev. xxi. 9, was probably intended to brand this kind of worship, as well as to indicate that the whole family of one who ministered before the Lord should give example of purity in morals. Another word primarily signifying "stranger," frequently occurs in the sense of harlot—e. g., Prov. vi. 24. It was likely then, as we find it now, that foreigners would swell the class of harlots, more especially as the Hebrews lived often in close contact with the heathen and had constant intercourse with them. The manners and allurements of this class are frequently described in Scripture, 1 Ki. iii. 16, 17; Prov. vi.

24–26; vii. 6–27; xxiii. 27, 28; Isa. xxiii. 16. Their gains were sometimes considerable, Ezek. xvi. 33, 39, but no gift arising from such iniquity was to be received in the sanctuary, Deut. xxiii. 18. Repeated mention of them occurs in the New Testament, where publicans are classed with them, and it was made a charge against our Lord that he extended mercy to these outcasts, Matt. xxi. 31, 32; Luke vii. 34, 37–48. Unchastity is frequently censured by the apostles, 1 Cor. vi. 15, 16; 1 Thess. iv. 3; 1 Tim. i. 10. The children born of a harlot lay under disabilities, Deut. xxiii. 2; Jud. xi. 1, 2, being distinguished from those of the concubine or secondary wife.

The term "harlot" is frequently used in a figurative sense, implying communion with idols, Isa. i. 21; Nah. iii. 4; Rev. xvii. 5. Jehovah had condescended to illustrate his kindness to his people by the marriage-tie; virgin purity, therefore, fitly signified his spiritual worship, and departure from him was foul fornication or adultery. See ADULTERY.

HARMER (har'mer), THOMAS, a learned Congregational minister, was born at Norwich in 1715, educated under Mr. Eames, F.R.S., tutor of a dissenting academy in London, and ordained in his twentieth year as pastor of the Congregational church at Wätesfield, in Suffolk, where he continued beloved and useful till his death, in 1788, aged seventy-three. His works entitled to a notice here are: 1. "Observations on divers Passages of Scriptures, placing many of them in a light altogether new, . . . by means of Circumstances mentioned in Books of Voyages and Travels into the East." Here Harmer broke new ground, and led the way in the application of Oriental travel to the elucidation of Scripture, in which he has been since successfully followed by many others. 2. "Outlines of a new Commentary on Solomon's Song, drawn by the Help of Instructions from the East," etc. This work has been much esteemed by some, but pronounced "singularly confused" by others. According to the author, the essence of the Song is the marriage of Solomon with an Egyptian princess, which greatly displeases Shulamith, his Hebrew queen, the whole transaction being typical of the marriage of the Messiah with the Gentile Church, and the displeasure of the Jewish Church thereat. 3. "An Account of the Jewish Doctrine of the Resurrection from the Dead."

HARMONIES (har'mo-nez). The object of harmonies is to arrange the Scriptures in chronological order, so that the mutual agreement of the several parts may be rendered apparent, and the true succession of events clearly understood. With this view various scholars have compiled harmonies of the Old Testament, of the New and of particular portions of both. Harmonies of the Old Testament exhibit the books disposed in chronological order; as is done by Lightfoot in his "Chronicle of the Times, and the Order of the Texts of the Old Testament," and by Townsend in his "Old Testament arranged in Historical and Chronological Order." Harmonies of the New Testament present the Gospels and Epistles distributed in like order, the latter being interspersed among the Acts of the Apostles. In this way Townsend has proceeded in his valuable work entitled "The New Testament arranged in Chronological and Historical Order." Books, however, of this kind are so few in number that usage has almost appropriated the term "harmony" to the Gospels. It is this part of the New Testament which has chiefly occupied the attention of those inquirers whose object is to arrange the Scriptures in their true order. The memoirs of our Lord written by the four Evangelists have chiefly engaged the thoughts of those who wish to show that all agree and mutually authenticate one another. Accordingly, such compositions are exceedingly numerous. The four Gospels narrate some of the events connected with our Lord's abode on earth from his birth to his ascension. There must, therefore, be a general resemblance between them, though that of John contains little in common with the others, being apparently supplementary to them. Yet there are considerable diversities, both in the order in which facts are narrated and in the facts themselves. Hence the difficulty of weaving the accounts of the four into a continuous and chronological history. Those portions of the Gospels that relate to the resurrection of the Saviour have always presented the greatest obstacles to the compilers of harmonies, and it must be candidly admitted that they are not easily reconciled. Here the labors of West and Townson, especially the latter, have served to remove some contradictions. In addition to them may be mentioned Greswell, Robinson and Stroud, who have tried the same problem with greater success.

In connection with harmonies, the term Diatessaron frequently occurs. It denotes a continued narrative selected out of the four Gospels, in which all repetitions of the same or similar words are avoided. It is thus the result of a harmony, since the latter, properly speaking, exhibits the entire texts of the four Evangelists, arranged in corresponding columns. In popular language the two are often used synonymously.

The following questions relative to harmonies demand attention:

1. Have all or any of the Evangelists observed chronological arrangement in their narratives?

2. What was the duration of our Lord's ministry?

1. It was the opinion of Osiander and his followers that all the Evangelists record the facts of the Saviour's history in their true order. When, therefore, the same transactions are placed in a different order by the writers, they were supposed to have happened more than once. It was assumed that they took place as often as they were differently arranged. This principle is too improbable to require refutation. Instead of endeavoring to solve difficulties, it boldly meets them with a clumsy expedient. Improbable, however, as it is, it has been adopted by Macknight. It is our decided conviction that the Evangelists have not followed chronological arrangement.

The question then arises, Have all neglected the order of time? Newcome and many others espouse this view. "Chronological order," says this writer, "is not precisely observed by any of the Evangelists; St. John and St. Mark observe it most, and St. Matthew neglects it most." Bishop Marsh supposes that Matthew probably adhered to the order of time, because he was for the most part an eye-witness of the facts. The others, he thinks, neglected the succession of events. The reason assigned by this learned prelate in favor of Matthew's order proves too much, because John was also an eye-witness, yet his order differs from Matthew's. The fact of one being an eye-witness has no conclusive relation to the arrangement of written materials.

A close inspection of Matthew's Gospel will show that he did not intend to mark the true succession of events. He gives us no definite expressions to assist in arranging his materials in their proper order. Very frequently he passes from one occurrence to another without note of time. See MATTHEW, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.

Mark, again, is still more indefinite than Matthew. Even the general expressions found in the first Gospel are wanting in his. Facts themselves, not their true succession, were the object of his attention. Chronological order is not observed in his Gospel, as is now generally admitted. See MARK, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.

With regard to Luke, some infer from the use of the word kathēxēs, "in order," at the beginning of his Gospel, that he intended to arrange everything in its true chronological place. Such was the opinion of Beza, adopted by Olshausen. But an examination of the work itself, which is unconnected and unchronological, shows another object. His expressions of time are indeterminate. Indeed, he frequently passes from one transaction to another without any note of time. All that can be fairly deduced from the word kathēxēs is that Luke designed to pursue a systematic plan, connecting events together according to the predominating idea with which he set out, which was not the chronological principle. See LUKE, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.

John's Gospel has so little in common with the rest that it cannot be conveniently drawn into a harmony with them. It is obvious that his arrangement is not chronological. In general, however, he carefully notes whether one, two or three days elapsed between certain events. See JOHN, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.

The Gospels are fragmentary. They do not profess to record all the sayings and doings of Jesus, but give a selection from the materials of his life. A spiritual idea, not the principle of accurate sequence, guided and controlled both their selection of materials and the form it assumed in their hands. Each Evangelist had his own plan and object. Matthew had Jews and Jewish Christians in view, and therefore he places the facts of the Gospel in connection with the revelation of the Old Testament. Mark designed to give prominent facts in the life of Jesus, accompanied by minute and vivid details. Luke, who had become acquainted with the Pauline circle and type of ideas, meant to present such particulars as should show most convincingly that the man Jesus came to give light to mankind, and not merely to Israel after the flesh. Thus each Evangelist had his peculiar purpose and method. The outward sequence of events was always subordinate to a higher idea. Of John this may be said pre-eminently.

Existing data are insufficient to enable the inquirer to compose a harmony in chronological order. As times and places have been left indeterminate, it is hopeless to conceive of a diatessaron accurate in all particulars. The problem may continue to exercise the ingenuity of critics, without furnishing an adequate reward for the time and labor bestowed on it. Diversity in unity pervades the Gospels, and all that can be properly done is to illustrate both. If it can be demonstrated that the Evangelical memoirs do not contradict one another in any important particular, but that they present the same facts and discourses in a different light, according to the object the writers had in view, we may be satisfied with the conclusion. The attempts of ill-judging advocates to force them into agreement in every minute point cannot be reprobated too much; for a degree of discrepancy, while violating no rational theory of inspiration, shows independence and veracity. We do not believe that all variations between them can be fairly reconciled, but that circumstance does not weaken our faith in the credibility of the narratives.

2. What was the duration of our Lord's ministry?

This is a question upon which the opinions of the learned have been much divided, and which cannot be settled with conclusive certainty. In order to resolve it, it is necessary to mark the different Passovers which Christ attended. Looking to the Gospels by Matthew, Mark and Luke, we should infer that he was present at no more than two—the first at the time of his baptism, the second immediately before his crucifixion. But in John's Gospel three Passovers at least are named during the period of our Lord's ministry, John ii. 13; vi. 4; xi. 55. It is true that some writers have endeavored to adapt the Gospel of John to the other Lange, Maier, Meyer. Cocceius, followed by Kaiser, Krafft and Ebrard, referred it to the feast of Tabernacles.

The choice lies between the Passover and the feast of Purim. But the arguments advanced on behalf of either are scarcely conclusive. It appears to us probable that Purim may be meant. From John iv. 35 it follows that it was then in the end of November or December, and from John vi. 4 that the Passover was approaching. Hence John v. 1 agrees well with the feast of Purim, which was in March. Robinson's three reasons from Hengstenberg against this interpretation of eortē are neither powerful nor conclusive. That the Jews were not required by their law to go up to Jerusalem at Purim argues nothing against Jesus' going up at that time that he might exercise his ministry in the city.

We are inclined to believe that only three Passovers are named during our Lord's ministry at three, by reducing the Passovers mentioned in the former to two. In order to accomplish this, it was conjectured that pascha, "passover," in ch. vi. 4, is an interpolation, and then that eortē, "feast," denotes some other Jewish festival. Bishop Pearce went so far as to conjecture that the entire verse has been interpolated. For these rash speculations there is no authority. The received reading must here be followed. In addition to these passages, it has been thought by many that another Passover is referred to in John v. 1, but this is a subject of dispute. Irenæus is the oldest authority for explaining it of the Passover. Many have adopted the same opinion, as Luther, Calovius, Grotius, Jansen, Scaliger, Cornelius a Lapide, Lightfoot, Lampe, Paulus, Kinnoel, Süsskind, Klee, Ammon, Greswell, Hengstenberg, Robinson. Cyril and Chrysostom refer it to the feast of Pentecost, as do also Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, Maldonatus and Bengel. Keppler seems to have been the first who thought that it means the feast of Purim. He was followed by Petau, Lamy, D'Outrein, Hug, Olshausen, Wieseler, Neander, Clausen, Krabbe, which he attended. The fourth, in the passage we have been considering, is more than doubtful. If we are correct, his ministry lasted about two years and a half. A fourth would add another year, and that is a very common, perhaps the most prevailing, opinion on the subject.

It has been well remarked by Bishop Marsh that the Gospel of John presents almost insuperable obstacles to the opinion of those who confine Christ's ministry to one year. Yet it was commonly believed during the first three centuries that Christ's ministry lasted but a year, or a year and some months. Such was the opinion of Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen. Eusebius thought that it continued for above three years—an opinion which became general. In interweaving the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke with that of John, the intervals between the Passovers are filled up by various transactions. Were the number of these feasts determinate and precise, there would be a general agreement in the filling up of the times between them, but in consequence of the uncertainty attaching to the subject harmonies are found materially to differ in their modes of arrangement. One thing is evident—that the moderns in their endeavors after a chronological disposition of the Gospels adopt a far more rational course than the ancients. The latter strangely supposed that the first six chapters of John's Gospel relate to a period of Christ's ministry prior to that with which the other three evangelists begin their accounts of the miracles. Thus John alone was supposed to narrate the events belonging to the earlier part of his ministry, while Matthew, Mark and Luke related the transactions of the last year.

The most ancient "Harmony of the Gospels" of which we have any account was composed by Tatian of Syria in the second century, but it is lost. In the third century, Ammonius was the author of a harmony supposed to be still extant. Eusebius of Caesarea also composed a "Harmony of the Gospels" about A. D. 315. Ancient harmonies, however, differ in character from such as belong to modern times. They are summaries of the life of Christ, or indexes to the four Gospels, rather than a chronological arrangement of different facts, accompanied by a reconciliation of apparent contradictions. In modern times, Andreas Osiander published his "Harmony of the Gospels" in 1537. He adopted the principle that the evangelists constantly wrote in chronological order. Since then, Jansen, Stephens, Calvin, Cluver, Calov, Sandhagen and Bunting produced harmonies, and prepared the way for the great work of Chemnitz which appeared in 1593; and since that time no less than forty of the most eminent Biblical critics and interpreters have constructed and published harmonies.

In connection with Greswell's "Harmonia Evangelica," the same author's "Dissertation upon the Principles and Arrangement of a Harmony of the Gospels" are exceedingly elaborate and worthy of patient perusal. The learned writer has greatly distinguished himself as the most laborious of modern harmonists. His work is the most copious that has appeared, at least since the days of Chemnitz's folios. Some of his fundamental principles, however, are questionable. Rather than admit considerable diversity in the writers' narrations of the same events or discourses, he has recourse to the expedient of making two out of one and placing them at different times. To adopt any harmony implicitly is more than the enlightened inquirer can do.

HARMONISTS (har'mo-nists). See RAPP, GEORGE.

HARMS (harmz), CLAUS, a celebrated German preacher and reformer, was born May 25, 1778, at Fahrenstedt in Holstien. At the age of eighteen he entered the university of Kiel, and at twenty-two passed his examination in theology and entered upon the active duties of the ministry. His deep and devotional piety, united with unusual talent and faithfulness in the discharge of the duties of his profession, soon gave him a decided reputation. In 1816 he was appointed archdeacon of St. Nicholas at Kiel, where he was at the first held in very high estimation, but was afterward assailed on account of his pietism, as it was called. Harms interpreted this opposition of the people to a lack of vital religion, as an evidence which was becoming daily more apparent that Germany was relinquishing the principles of the Reformation and the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures. He therefore determined upon the public discussion of Luther's ninety-five theses with ninety-five theses additional of his own, and challenged any one of dissenting views to assail his position. His first point was, "When our Lord Jesus Christ says 'repent,' he means that we should conform to his precepts, and not that his precepts should be conformed to us," was a bold attack upon the error and religious indifference of his country, and in the exciting discussion that ensued produced a great awakening in the Church. In 1841 he was named "oberconsistorialrath," and died February 1, 1855. His religious publications included "Sermons," showing his theological views, "Christian Belief," "Our Father," "Doctrines of the Lutheran Church," etc. He also wrote many beautiful hymns.

HARMS, LOUIS, better known as Pastor Harms, was born about the year 1809 at Hermansberg, in Hanover. His father was pastor of the church in Hermansberg. Harms received his preparatory education at the gymnasium of Celle, and entered the university of Gottingen in 1827, where he pursued his studies with great honor and success. Soon after leaving the university he experienced a thorough change in his religious views and feelings, devoted himself to the study of theology, and entered the ministry as an assistant of his father in 1844. A remarkable interest was soon manifested in the young minister. His preaching was attended by almost the entire neighborhood. Rationalism and dead orthodoxy were dissipated by his apostolic fervor and zeal, and in their place the devout observance of the Sabbath, regular attendance upon public worship and the maintenance of family prayer evidenced a change in favor of vital piety which was destined to be widely felt. Not content with the spiritual benefit which had been conferred upon a region of ten miles square of which he was virtually the pastor, Harms felt that the claims of the whole world were resting upon him. He devised a great missionary enterprise, built a college with funds furnished in answer to prayer, filled it with young men anxious to engage in the Master's service, and when trained for their work sent them out to Africa, Australia, the East Indies and to our Western States. He also established a journal of missionary intelligence, and created a wonderful interest in the work of evangelizing the world. He was the author of a large number of books and contributions to his missionary magazine, and sent away annually about three thousand letters, mostly to missionaries. His life was doubtless shortened by the incessant nature and multiplicity of his labors. He died November 4, 1866.

HARNEPHER (har'ne-fer), a chieftain of Asher, 1 Chron. vii. 36.

HARNESS, HARNESSED (har'nessed), Ex. xiii. 18. Various explanations have been given of the original word. It has been interpreted to mean in five divisions—i. e., a centre, two wings, a vanguard and a rearguard; but probably Gesenius' translation is preferable, "fierce," "eager." Harness is used for a corselet or coat of mail, 1 Ki. xxii. 34, "between the jointings and the corselet," or possibly, "between the arm-pits and the corselet." The ancient harness, in the ordinary sense of the trappings of a horse, was often richly decorated, Jer. xlvi. 4, as existing Assyrian monuments show.

HAROD (har'rod), a spring by which Gideon encamped, and where, probably, the trial of the army by their mode of drinking was made, Jud. vii.; perhaps the same with the fountain of Jezreel, 1 Sam. xxix. 1. It is likely that the modern Ain-Jabal is the spring of Harod.

HARODITE (har'od-ite), the designation given to two of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 25, derived perhaps from Harod just mentioned. But one is called a Harorite in 1 Chron. xi. 27.

HARODEH (har'o-ch), a name in the genealogical lists of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 52. Perhaps he is the same with Reaiah, iv. 2.

HARORITE (har'or-ite), 1 Chron. xi. 27. See HARODITE.

HAROSHETH (ha-ro'sheth), the place where Sisera, the captain of Jabin's host, dwelt, Jud. iv. 2, 13, 16. From Harosheth, Sisera had to march up to Tabor to attack Barak, and after the defeat the pursuit continued to Harosheth back again, till the proud army of Jabin was destroyed. Its site has been identified. About eight miles from Megiddo, at the entrance of the pass to Esdraelon from the plain of Acre, is an enormous double mound called Harothieh. This tell is situated just below the point where the Kishon in one of its turns bears against the rocky base of Carmel, leaving no room even for a footpath. A castle there effectually commands the pass up the vale of the Kishon into Esdraelon, and such a castle there was on this immense double tell of Harothieh. It is still covered with the remains of old walls and buildings. Perhaps the place was called Harosheth of the Gentiles because it belonged to those tribes which Israel could not subdue. See BARAK.

HAROUN AL RASHID (ha-roon'al-ra'-shid), a celebrated caliph of the Saracens, ascended the throne in 786, and was the most potent prince of his race, ruling over territories extending from Egypt to Khorassan. He gained many splendid victories over the Greek emperors, and obtained immense renown for his bravery, magnificence and love of letters, but he was cruel and tyrannical. Haroun al Rashid was the contemporary of Charles the Great, emperor of the West, and sent an embassy to his court with a present of a beautiful clepsydra or water-clock. He died in 809.

HARP (harp). See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

HARPHIUS (har'fe-us), HENRICUS, a Flemish mystic, the time of whose birth is unknown, but he died in 1478. He was a member of the order of St. Francis, and distinguished himself by his wisdom and piety. He wrote "Theologia Mystica" and some contemplative books, but his works are condemned by Bossuet, who regards him as a visionary.

HARPOCRATION (har-po-kra'sh'un), VALERIUS, whose epoch is uncertain, was the author of a very important Greek lexicon, of which subsequent lexicographers have made great use. It is a lexicon of the words of ten Attic orators, and contains considerable information upon the civil and political legislation of Athens, as well as its antiquities, history and literature.

HARPSFIELD (harps'feeld), JOHN and NICHOLAS, brothers in blood and in spirit. The former, born in 1510 and died in 1578, was a Romish controversialist, chaplain of Bishop Bonner, of whose persecuting spirit he largely partook. His zeal against the Reformers obtained for him from Queen Mary the deanery of Norwich, but he soon exchanged this for the Fleet Prison when Elizabeth succeeded. The latter, born about 1512 and died in 1583, was, as a zealous Roman Catholic, made archdeacon of Canterbury by Queen Mary, but dispossessed by Queen Elizabeth, who imprisoned him for several years. He wrote, while in prison, a "History of the English Church," a learned and laborious work, in which he was assisted by Archbishop Parker, who had custody of him. He was regius professor of Greek in Oxford, and Leland speaks of him as "Atticæ linguæ interpretres facillis, disertus, aptus."

HARRIS (har'ris), HOWELL, the name of one of the most eminent preachers in the Welsh Church; and his influence in the principality among the poor, although he remained a layman all his life, was immensely greater than that of any of the regularly-ordained clergy. He was born in 1714 at Trevecca; and desiring to enter the ministry, he went to Oxford, where he became so disgusted by the infidelity and profligacy which he witnessed that he soon left the place. On his return to Wales he began a system of cottage services among the poor; and when Wesley reached Wales, in 1739, he had formed about thirty organizations. Although he never left the Church, his associations all went off into dissent, owing to the fact that he was always refused ordination by the bishops to whom he often applied; and the clergy steadfastly opposed what they called his irregular proceedings. For many years he preached two or three times daily. He often suffered from mobs, who grievously assailed him, but his zeal never abated. As his years increased he settled at Trevecca, where he erected a chapel and gathered a community to which he ministered until his death, in 1773. In 1715 there were only thirty chapels of Dissenters in Wales, but in 1860 there were no fewer than 2000, so great was the impulse of Harris and the men who, along with him, like Whitfield, Wesley and others, aroused the population who had been left by carelessness to irreligion and ignorance. Howell Harris was eminently dramatic and pictorial in his style. He painted scenes, detailed long conversations, and even conducted controversies in his discourses, and thus he impressed the common mind in a most powerful manner, and produced results that a more subdued and classic style would never have effected.

HARRIS, JAMES, an eminent English scholar and author, was born in 1709. After pursuing a preparatory course of study at the grammar of God," "The Wickedness of the Pretence of Treason and Rebellion for God's sake," sermons, etc. He died in 1719.

HARRIS, JOHN, an eminent dissenting English divine, was born in Devonshire about 1803. He was educated at the dissenting college at Hoxton, afterward was removed to Highbury, and was pastor for some years of an Independent congregation at Epsom. He first came into public notice as author of the prize essay entitled "Mammon," published in 1836, and which had an immense popularity. In the following year he became professor of theology at Cheshunt College, and in 1850, on the union, in one of the several Independent colleges in London, he was named principal of the New College. His first work, and one of his best, was "The Great Teacher," which only became popular after "Mammon" had school, he entered Wadham College, Oxford, but took no degree. In 1763 he was made one of the lords of the admiralty, but was soon afterward transferred to the treasury. In 1774 he received the appointment of secretary and comptroller to the queen, in which position he remained during his life. He was the author of "Philosophical Arrangements and Philosophical Inquiries," "Hermes, or a Philosophical Inquiry concerning Universal Grammar," "The Characteristics, three Treatises concerning Art, Music, Painting, Poetry and Happiness." He died December 21, 1780.

HARRIS, JOHN, D.D., F.R.S., an English divine and mathematician, was born about 1667. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and became rector of St. Mildred's, London, curate of Stroud, prebendary of Rochester and secretary and vice-president of the Royal Society. He published the first "Dictionary of Arts and Sciences" in England. He wrote a "Refutation of the Atheistical Objections against the Being and Attributes made its author famous. Dr. Harris was an eloquent preacher, and as author he further distinguished himself by the publication of "The Pre-Adamite Earth," "Man Primeval" and "Patriarchy," all of which are rich in thought and attractive by their grace of style. He died at New College, December 21, 1856.

HARRIS, ROBERT, D.D., was a learned Puritan divine, though he lived and died in the communion of the Church of England. He was a native of Gloucestershire, England, and educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. He settled in Oxfordshire, in the parish of Hanwell, near the celebrated town of Banbury. Here he became known as a great expositor of the Scriptures, but on the commencement of the Civil War he removed to London. He appears to have kept aloof from politics and warlike strife, confining his labors to the church of St. Botolph, in Bishopsgate street; and it would appear that he had no love for public display of any kind, for he was appointed a member of the "Assembly of Divines," yet he took little or no share in their deliberations. In 1648 he was made president of Trinity College, which office he held until his death, in 1658. His works were published in a large folio, and they include "The Way to True Happiness," a "Treatise on the New Covenant," and a few other minor productions. "The Way to Happiness" is a collection of sermons on the Beatitudes.

HARRIS, SAMUEL, D.D., was born in the county of Middlesex about the year 1683. He was educated in Merchant Taylors' school, of which he was head boy in 1697, and was admitted a pensioner of Peter House, Cambridge, May 15, 1700. Upon the foundation of the chair of modern history in the university of Cambridge by George I. in 1724, Harris was appointed the first professor. He died December 21, 1733. He was the author of, 1. "Scripture Knowledge promoted by Catechising." 2. "A Commentary on the Fifty-third Chapter of Isaiah, with an Appendix of Queries concerning divers Ancient Religious Traditions and Practices, and the Sense of many Texts of Scripture which seem to allude to or express them." In some copies this work has a different title-page, namely, "Observations Critical and Miscellaneous on several Remarkable Texts of the Old Testament, to which is added a Commentary," etc. Prefixed are three dissertations—1. On a gnozer or advocate; 2. On a dour or generation; and 3. On the ancient method of propounding important points by way of question. This work was published shortly after the death of the author by his widow. It exhibits much curious learning, and is several times referred to by Doddridge in his letters.

HARRIS, THADDEUS MASON, D.D., a Unitarian divine and librarian of the Massachusetts Historical Society, was born in 1768 at Charlestown, Massachusetts. He graduated at Harvard in 1787, and became pastor of the church at Dorchester in 1793. From 1791 to 1793 he was librarian of Harvard, and afterward of the Massachusetts Historical Society until his death. He was the author of a "Natural History of the Bible," which was republished in London in 1824, with additions, under the title of "Dictionary of the Natural History of the Bible," and held in high reputation for accuracy and usefulness. He also wrote "Memoirs of the First Church in Dorchester," "Cyclopedia of Popular Literature," in four volumes, "Memoirs of Oglethorpe, the Founder of Georgia," beside various pamphlets and contributions to the current literature of the day. He died at Boston April 3, 1842.

HARRIS, WALTER, D.D., was born in Lebanon, Connecticut, in 1761. He was educated at Dartmouth College, graduating in 1787, and entering the ministry, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Dunbarton, New Hampshire, in 1789. Having pursued his theological studies with Dr. Emmons, he imbibed his peculiar views and maintained them throughout his life. He published an address before the pastoral convention of New Hampshire, and a number of sermons. He died December 25, 1843.

HARRIS, WILLIAM, D.D., a dissenting English divine and author, was born in London about the year 1675, and became pastor of the church at Crutched Friars, London, in 1698. He is represented as a clear, nervous writer, with good judgment and a lively imagination. He is especially noteworthy as one of the continuators of Matthew Henry's "Commentary," having written the books of Philippians and Colossians. He was also the author of "A Practical Illustration of the Book of Esther," "Life and Character of Dr. Thomas Manton," "Funeral Discourses in two parts: (1) Consolations on the Death of our Friends, (2) Preparation for our own Death."

HARRIS, WILLIAM, D.D., president of Columbia College, New York, was born in Springfield, Massachusetts, April 29, 1760, and graduated at Harvard University in 1786. In 1791 he was ordained deacon and afterward priest in the Episcopal Church, and placed over St. Michael's, Marblehead. In 1802 he removed to New York city, assumed the rectorship of St. Mark's Church and opened a classical school. Upon the resignation of Bishop Moore in 1811, he was elected to the presidency of Columbia College, which office he held, in connection with the rectorship of St. Mark's, until 1816, when his relation to the church was dissolved, and his entire attention devoted to the interests and prosperity of the college. He published several sermons, and died October 18, 1829.

HARRISON (har'ri-sun), WILLIAM HENRY, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in Frederick county, Maryland, January 12, 1819. Manifesting in early life a disposition for study and literary investigation, he was afforded the opportunity of a liberal education, and graduated at Pennsylvania College at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, in 1843, with honor. Upon the completion of his theological studies in the seminary at the same place, he entered the ministry, and was elected in 1845 assistant professor of ancient languages in his alma mater. In 1846 he accepted the pastorate of the English Lutheran church of Cincinnati, Ohio. Here he labored faithfully and successfully until his death by Asiatic cholera, November 3, 1866.

HARROW (har'ro). It is very questionable whether the Hebrews used a harrow in our sense of the term. In Job xxxix. 10; Isa. xxviii. 24;

Hos. x. 11, breaking the clods is alluded to, but this was before sowing the seed, just to level the ground. The word translated "harrow" in 2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chr. xx. 3 means a sharp threshing-sledge. See AGRICULTURE.

HARSHA (har'sha), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from the captivity, Ezra ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54.

HARSNET (hars'net), SAMUEL, born in 1561, bishop, first of Chichester, then of Norwich, and finally archbishop of York, was the son of a baker at Colchester. He was much attacked by the Puritans, who had him up before the last Parliament of King James, but he successfully defended himself against their imputations. He published two small books, "A Discovery of the Fraudulent Practices of John Darrell," and "A Declaration of Popish Impostures," both against the supposed power of casting out devils.

HART (hart). This was one of the clean animals which might be used for food, Deut. xii. 15; xiv. 5; xv. 22; 1 Ki. iv. 23. The species intended was probably the Cervus elephus, the European stag, or the Cervus barbarus, the Barbary deer. A variety of illustrations are drawn from the hart and its female, the hind. We have the activity of the hart, Isa. xxxv. 6, and its earnest longing for water, Ps. xlii. 1, the affection of the hind, Prov. v. 19, etc. Naph-tali, too, was likened to a hind, Gen. xlix. 21; so that in Barak's victory, Jud. iv., with a simile frequently employed in Hebrew poetry for the achievements of strength and endurance, they (the tribe) were compared with the graceful hind, which, light-footed and swift, easily eludes its persecutors on the mountain heights.

HART, LEVI, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Southington, Connecticut, April 10, 1738. He received his education at Yale College, graduating in 1760, and afterward studied theology under Dr. Bellamy. His first settlement in the ministry was at Griswold, Connecticut, where he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational church, November 4, 1762, and in which charge he labored until his death, October 27, 1808. He exercised during his long pastorate an unusually beneficial influence, and trained many young men for the ministry. He published several occasional discourses, and died October 27, 1808.

HART, OLIVER, a prominent Baptist minister of Charleston, South Carolina, was born at Warminster, Pennsylvania, in 1723. He was a self-educated man, of refined taste, strong mental powers and possessed of a fund of useful classical and theological knowledge. In 1749 he entered the ministry, and was ordained as pastor of the Baptist church in Charleston, South Carolina, where he remained with eminent success for thirty years. During the American Revolution he espoused the cause of our country with much zeal, and his usefulness exposed him to the dislike of the British to such a degree that he was compelled to leave Charleston to avoid falling into their hands. He removed to Hopewell, New Jersey, where he remained as pastor of the Baptist church until his death, December 31, 1795. He was the author of a "Gospel Church Portrayed," "The Christian Temple," etc.

HART, WILLIAM, a clergyman of Saybrook, Connecticut, graduated at Yale College in 1732, and was ordained to the work of the ministry in 1736. He was the first who applied the name Hopkintonian to certain errors which he opposed. He was the author of a work on "The Nature of Regeneration," "Dangerous Errors," against the Hopkinsians, "Remarks on Edward's Dissertation on the Nature of Virtue," and "A Treatise on Qualification for the Sacraments." There is no record of his birth and death known to us.

HARTLEY (hart'le), DAVID, born in 1705, a physician of considerable eminence, and author of the well-known metaphysical work "Observations on Man," which is an attempt to explain all states of mind by association. He was the friend of several eminent prelates, and was a man of genial spirit, literary pursuits and calm, unworldly temper. He died in 1757.

HARTMANN (hart'man), ANTHONY THEODORE, a German Orientalist and theologian, was born at Dusseldorf on the 25th of June, 1774. Having studied the classics at the gymnasia of Osnabruck and Dortmund, he devoted himself to theology at Gottingen. In 1797 he was appointed co-rector of the gymnasium at Soest; in 1799 pro-rector of that at Herfort; and in 1804 a professor in the gymnasium of Oldenburg. In 1811 he became professor of theology in the university of Rostock, where also in 1818 he received the charge of the cabinet of medals. He died there 21st of April, 1838. Hartmann was a good Orientalist, but his knowledge of theology was not profound. His acquaintance with the literature and antiquities of the Hebrews was extensive. He was a voluminous author. Among his works the chief are—"Supplement to the Lexicons of Buxtorf and Gesenius," and "Thesaurus of the Hebrew Language."

HARTSHORNE (harts'horn), CHARLES HENRY, an English archaeologist, was born at Broseley in 1802. He was educated at Shrewsbury school and the university of Cambridge, graduating A.M. in 1826, was ordained priest in the Church of England two years later, held several curacies in succession, and in 1838 became rector of Cogenhoe in Northamptonshire. In 1850 he was presented by the queen to the rectory of Holdenby in the same county, which he held till his death. He was an enthusiastic and accomplished antiquary and a prolific writer; his works are valuable, but chiefly local in their interest.

HARTWIG (hart'wig), JOHN CHRISTOPHER, emigrated to America during the French war as chaplain to a German regiment, and was settled over a charge in Hunterdon county, New Jersey. He afterward removed to the State of New York, where he was engaged in the work of the ministry until his death, in 1796. Forty years before his death he received an impression in a dream that he would expire at a certain hour of a certain day. On the day preceding the completion of this time, he went to the house of the Hon. J. R. Livingstone and informed him that he had come there to die. During the evening and the morning of the following day he appeared to be in his usual health and spirits. Just before the hour designated, however, he asked to retire to his room, and at precisely eleven o'clock he expired. He bequeathed a tract of land for the establishment in Otsego county, N. Y., of an institution for the preparation of young men for the Lutheran ministry and the education of Indians for missionaries among their own tribes.

HARUM (har'um), a descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 8.

HARUMAPH (har-u'maf), one whose son helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 10.

HARUPHITE (har-u'fite), the designation of Shephatiah, a Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 5.

HARUZ (har'uz), the father of Meshullemeth, mother of King Amon, 2 Ki. xxi. 19.

HARVARD (har'vard), JOHN, founder of Harvard College, Cambridge, Massachusetts, was probably born near London, in England, and was educated at Emmanuel College, in the university of Cambridge. The following is a copy of memoranda of his admission to that college:

*1627. Joh: Harvard, P. Dec. 19—Mid.—A. M. 35.
1628. Joh: Harvard, P. A. B. 31. M. 35.*

The probable meaning is that John Harvard was admitted a pensioner in 1627, took his bachelor's degree in 1631, and his master's degree in 1635.

HAWK.—See HAWK.

"Mid." possibly refers to the county (Middlesex) from which he came. After receiving the degree of master of arts he was settled as a minister in his native country; but taking his position among the dissenters, he came over to America, as is supposed in 1637, and was admitted a freeman of the colony on the 2d of November in that year. He preached for a short time at Charlestown, but he was already suffering from consumption, and died in 1638, on the 14th of September, corresponding in the new style to the 26th of September. He left a widow without children. By his will he gave £779 17s. 2d., being one half his estate, toward the erection of a college. To this bequest, which was a large sum at that period, he added his library of 320 volumes. A catalogue of this library is preserved among the archives of the college, and indicates not only the professional studies of the giver, but also his general scholarship. Besides a formidable array of veteran champions of the ancient church militant, there are works of a more general literary character, and the classical department of the library is very rich and select. The colonists received these munificent gifts of money and books with prayer and thanksgiving, and immediately began the erection of a college, to which they gave the name of Harvard, thus acknowledging him as its founder. His contemporaries had few opportunities to become acquainted with his character, as he had been but a year in this country when the disease from which he suffered carried him to his grave. But the faithful chroniclers of the time apply to him the epithets of "reverend," "godly," "a lover of learning." On the 26th of September, 1828, the alumni of Harvard University erected a monument to his memory over the spot where his remains were buried in Charlestown. "While the college which he founded," said the eulogist of that occasion, "shall continue to the latest posterity a monument not unworthy of the most honored name, and while it guides the dutiful votary to the spot where his ashes are deposited, will teach to those who survey it the supremacy of intellectual and moral desert, and encourage them, too, by a like munificence, to aspire to a name as bright as that which stands engraven on its shaft:

'clarum et venerabilis nomen
Gentibus, et multum nostræ quod proderat urbi.'

HARVEST (har'vest). See AGRICULTURE. SEASONS. Sometimes the word is used figuratively, as in one our Lord's parables. Matt. xiii. 39.

HARWOOD (har'wood), EDWARD, D.D., a Unitarian minister of considerable attainments, but whose moral reputation was far from unblemished. He was born in 1729. After residing in Bristol and other places as a classical teacher and a preacher, he removed to London, where he died in 1794 in very reduced circumstances. Besides a small volume on the various editions of the Greek and Roman classics, which passed through four editions in his lifetime, he published two works in connection with Biblical literature: 1. "A Liberal Translation of the New Testament;" 2. "A New Introduction to the Study and Knowledge of the New Testament." 2 vols. The object of the first work was to translate the New Testament with as much elegance, freedom and spirit as has been displayed in the versions of the Greek and Latin classics. The absurd travesty of the sacred volume which he produced by his puerile verbosity may be seen by a few quotations. The indication of the Messiah by John the Baptist is thus given: "Behold, yonder is the amiable object of the divine love, who is appointed to reform mankind," John i. 29. The injunction "He that hath ears to hear let him hear" is politely rendered, "Let every one who is endowed with the powers of reason and understanding employ them in the diligent study of truth and virtue," Mark iv. 9. And the parable of the prodigal son begins with, "A gentleman of a splendid family and opulent fortune had two sons," Luke xv. 11.

HASADIAH (has-a-di'ah), a descendant of the royal line of Judah, 1 Chr. iii. 20.

HASAN BEN SABBAH (has-san-ben-sab'-bah), the first Sheik el Djebal, or Old Man of the Mountain, founder of the Mohammedan sect of the Haschischin, commonly called "Assassins." After occupying the highest posts near the sultan Malek-Schah, he was driven from court for endeavoring to supplant the prime minister, who had been his friend and benefactor. He joined the Ismaelians, a Mussulman sect, and spread through Persia their system, which consists in the nega-tion of external worship and the allegorical explanation of all religion. He thus gathered round him a large band of fanatic followers, at whose head he seized the fortress of Alamont in the Kurdistan, and declared his independence. He drugged these men with a beverage called haschisch, under the influence of which they went forth to commit the murders he ordered. During five and thirty years Hasan never left the fortress in which he had established himself, but from thence exercised an influence and authority which ensured the strictest obedience and made himself and his subjects objects of widespread terror.

HASCALL (has'kal), DANIEL, a Baptist minister, and founder of Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution, now Madison University, New York, was born at Bennington, Vermont, February 24, 1782. He was educated at Middlebury College, graduating in 1806, and afterward pursued a course in theology while engaged in teaching in Pittsfield, Massachusetts. In 1808 he was invited to the pastorate of the Baptist church at Elizabethtown, Essex county, New Jersey, where he was ordained September 7th. In 1813 he removed to Hamilton, New York, as pastor of the Baptist church in that place, and two years afterward commenced a course of theological instruction to young men preparing for the ministry, and after establishing the Baptist Education Society of New York, his school, in 1820, became the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution (now Madison University), which was opened under his charge, and to which he afterward devoted his entire attention, relinquishing his pastoral office. In 1825 he assumed the charge of an academy at Florence, Oneida county, New York, which had been previously established through his influence. In 1848 he became pastor of the Baptist church at Lebanon, New York. He died June 28, 1852. He was the author of "Elements of Theology," "Caution against False Philosophy," and "Definitions of the Greek, Bapto, Baptizo, etc."

HASENKAMP (has'en-kamp). There were three eminent German theologians of this name. 1. JOHN GERHARD was born at Wechte, Prussia, June 12, 1736, and educated at the academy of Lingin, where he distinguished himself by great industry in the pursuit of knowledge and unusual religious activity. After several years' suspension for preaching without license he was, in 1766, made principal of Duisburg gymnasium, and immediately directed all his energies to the restoration of this institution to its former usefulness. In religion he favored the necessity of deep Christian experience, and was suspended the second time as a mystic, but afterward restored. He died July 10, 1771. His autobiography was published by his son. 2. FRIEDRICH ARNOLD, a half brother of the above, was born January 11, 1747. He shared the religious views of John, and wrote several pamphlets defending them. The rationalists suffered also from the severity of his invective. He succeeded John as rector of Duisburg, and died in 1795. He wrote "Notes upon the Prophets." 3. JOHN HEINRICH, also a brother, was born September 19, 1750. In 1776 he became rector at Emmerich, where he remained three years, and then removed near Altona, where he became pastor of a small congregation, in the quietude and retirement of which he spent the last thirty-five years of his life. He died July 17, 1814. He published the "Christliche Schriften."

HASENUAH (has-en-u'ah), a Benjamite, 1 Chron. ix. 7.

HASHABIAH (ha-sha-bi'ah). 1. A Levite of the family of Merari, 1 Chr. vi. 45. 2. Another Levite of the same family, ix. 14; Neh. xi. 15. The lists in these two places are evidently the same, though some critics have imagined that in Chronicles to refer to David's time, not observing that Hilkiah, the high-priest in Josiah's reign, and his descendants are mentioned. 3. A Levite singer, son of Jeduthun. He was head of one of the courses of the singers, 1 Chr. xxv. 3, 19. 4. A Kohathite Levite descended from Hebron, Kohath's son, xxvi. 30. 5. A chief of the Levites in David's reign, xxvii. 17, perhaps identical with No. 4. 6. A chief Levite in Josiah's time, 2 Chr. xxxv. 9. 7. A Levite or priest who accompanied Ezra, Ezra viii. 19, 24. In 19, Hashabiah and Sherebiah seem distinguished from those who were sons of Merari. If they be included among them, they cannot be identical with the Sherebiah and Hashabiah of 24. 8. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 17. 9. A Levite who sealed the covenant, x. 11; possibly the same with that in xii. 24. 10. One from whom the overseer of the Levites after the captivity was descended, xi. 22. 11. A priest in the days of Joiakim, xii. 21.

HASHABNAH (hash'ab-nah), one who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 25.

HASHABNIAH (hash-ab'ni-ah). 1. The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 10. 2. A Levite who took part in a solemn service, Neh. ix. 5.

HASHBADANA (hash-ba'da-na), one who stood with Ezra at the solemn reading of the law, Neh. viii. 4.

HASHEM (hay'shem), one called a Gizonite, whose sons were among David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 34. The corresponding list, 2 Sam. xxiii. 32, differs; there the name is Jashen.

HASEMONAH (hash-mo'nah), a station of the Israelites in the wilderness, Num. xxxiii. 29, 30. Mr. Wilton is disposed to identify it with Heshmon Josh. xv. 27, now probably 'Ain Hasb.

HASEUB (hash'ub). 1. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 11. 2. Another who also helped to repair the wall, Neh. iii. 23. 3. One who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 23. It is very possible that these three may be the same person. 4. A Levite, Neh. xi. 15. He is called Hasshub in 1 Chr. ix. 14, the two names being identical.

HASEUBAH (hash-u'bah), one of David's descendants, 1 Chr. iii. 20.

HASEUM (hash'um). 1. One whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 19; Neh. vii. 52. Several of these had married foreign wives, Ezra x. 33. It was perhaps the representative of this family or clan who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 18. 2. One who assisted when Ezra read the law, Neh. viii. 4.

HASHUPHA (hash-u'fa), one whose descendants, Nethanim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, Neh. vii. 46. In Ezra ii. 43 the name appears more accurately Hasupha.

HASKELL (has'kel), DANIEL, a Congregational clergyman and president of the university of Vermont, was born June, 1784, at Preston, Connecticut. He studied at Yale College and graduated in 1802. In 1810 he was installed pastor of the Congregational church at Burlington, Vermont, which position he occupied until he was promoted to the presidency of the university of Vermont, in 1821. In 1824 he resigned this office, and died August 9, 1848. He wrote a "Chronological View of the World," edited "McCulloch's Geographical Dictionary," and in connection with J. C. Smith published a "Gazetteer of the United States."

HASMAAH (has'ma-ah), 1 Chr. xii. 3, marg. See SHEMAAH.

HASRAH, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 22. See HARHAS.

HASSAN (has'san), the son of Ali and grandson of Mohammed, was the fifth caliph, and born in 625. He accepted the dignity with regret, and was opposed by Moawiah. On marching against the usurper his troops rose against him, on which he abdicated in favor of his rival, an ample allowance being guaranteed to him. This he spent in works of charity, being a most devoted Mussulman. The Shiites, or followers of Ali, consider him as the second of their twelve imans. He died in 669.

HASSE (has'seh), FRIEDRICH RUDOLF, a celebrated German theologian, was born June 29, 1808, at Dresden, educated at Leipsic and Berlin. After spending two years at the university of the latter city as private teacher, he was made professor-extraordinary of Church history in the university of Greifswald in 1836, and ordinary professor at Bonn in 1841. He was also afterward named consistorial counselor. He was the author of "Anselm of Canterbury," a work that exercised no small influence in a more scientific treatment of the history of scholasticism. He also wrote a course of lectures and a Church history, which was published after his death. He died in 1862.

HASSELQUIST (has-sel-kwist'), FREDERICK, a Swedish naturalist, and one of the most celebrated pupils of Linnæus, was born in 1722. Having formed the scheme of making researches into the natural history of Palestine, he embarked for Smyrna in August, 1749, went to Egypt, remained some time at Jerusalem, and afterward visited other parts of the country. Returning to Smyrna, he brought with him an admirable collection of plants, minerals, fishes, reptiles, insects and other natural objects. His memoirs and careful observations formed the material from which his friend and master Linnæus compiled and published the work entitled "Iter Palæstinum." Died at Smyrna, 1752.

HASSENAAH (has-se-na'ah). This is probably the name of a town, Senaah, see Ezra ii. 35; Neh. vii. 38, with the definite article prefixed. The men of this place built the fish-gate at Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 3.

HASSHUB (has'shub), a Merarite Levite, 1 Chr. ix. 14. He is called Hashub in Neh. xi. 15.

HASTINGS (häst'ings), Lady ELIZABETH, daughter of Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon, was born in 1682. She remained single through life, and distinguished herself by works of piety and benevolence. She erected schools, built churches, supported many indigent families, and founded five scholarships in Queen's College, Oxford. Died, 1739.

HASUPHA, Ezra ii. 43. See HASHUPHA.

HAT. See DRESS, subhead HEAD-DRESS.

HATACH (hah'tak), one of the eunuchs or chamberlains at the court of Ahasuerus, Esth. iv. 5, 6, 9, 10.

HATE. The word in its ordinary sense means strong dislike, Jer. xlv. 4. But it is sometimes used in a way of comparison, to signify the liking of one thing less than another, Deut. xxi. 15; Mal. i. 2, 3; Luke xiv. 26; Rom. ix. 13.

HATFIELD (hat'feeld), THOMAS, bishop of Durham, was the especial favorite of Edward III., at whose desire he was elected to the bishopric in 1345. He distinguished himself soon after his consecration by repelling the Scots, who had invaded the principality, and were defeated by Lord Percy and the bishop in person, at the head of their respective forces. On this occasion the king of Scotland fell into the hands of the victors, and was afterward ransomed. He was a munificent prelate, and was the founder of Trinity College, Oxford, which was at first called Durham House; and he founded a Carmelite friary at Northallerton, in Yorkshire. He also built a palace in London, which he bequeathed to the occupants of his see. The Adelphi, in the Strand, now occupies its site. He died in 1381, and was buried in his cathedral, where his effigy is still to be seen.

HATHATH, the son of Othniel, 1 Chr. iv. 13.

HATIPHA (hat'e-fa), one whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 54; Neh. vii. 56.

HATITA (hat'e-ta), a person whose children, porters, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45.

HATSI-HAMMENCHOTH (hat'se-hamme-nu'koth). Perhaps this may be the proper name of a man, 1 Chr. ii. 52; then the word in verse 54, rendered "half the Manahethites," may be the patronymic and mean his descendants.

HATTEMISTS (hat'te-mists), a sect in Holland so named from Pontian von Hattem, a minister in Zeeland. They arose in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and were nearly allied to the Veseorists, though Van Hattem tried in vain to unite the latter with his followers. Mosheim says: "If I understand correctly the not very lucid account given us of their doctrines, the founders of both sects in the first place inferred from the Reformed doctrine of the absolute decrees of God this principle, that whatever takes place, necessarily and unavoidably takes place. Assuming this as true, they denied that men are by nature wicked or corrupt, and that human actions are some of them good and others bad. Hence they concluded that men need not trouble themselves about a change of heart, nor be solicitous to obey the divine law; that religion does not consist in acting, but in suffering; and that Jesus Christ inculcated this only, that we patiently and cheerfully endure whatever by the good pleasure of God occurs or befalls us, striving only to keep our minds tranquil. Hattem in particular taught that Jesus Christ did not by his death appease divine justice nor expiate the sins of men, but that he signified to us that there was nothing in us which could offend God, and in this way he made us just." Though these opinions appear to be inimical to all virtue, it is believed they were not intended to encourage unrestrained indulgence in sin, as it was a favorite maxim with them that God punishes men by their sins, and not for them.

HATTIL (hat'til), one of Solomon's servants, whose descendants returned from the captivity, Ezra ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59.

HATTO (hat'to), bishop of Basal, was born in 763, and was sent by Charlemagne on a mission to Nicophorus, the Greek emperor, to settle the boundaries of the two empires. In 805 he was made bishop, and in 806 he was named abbot of Reichanau. His "Visions of Wittin" "on those suffering in Purgatory," and "on the glory of saints," have descended to the present time. He died in 836.

HATTO, a famous archbishop of Mayence, subject of the famous legend of the "Rat Tower." The chroniclers of Magdeburg relate that Hatto was eaten alive by rats, in punishment of his extreme avarice, and because, in a great famine, he had compared the poor to those vermin. He died in 970.

HATTUSH (hat'tush). 1. One of the descendants of David, 1 Chr. iii. 22; possibly the same who returned from Babylon with Ezra, Ezra viii. 2. 2. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 10. 3. A priest who accompanied Zerubbabel to Jerusalem, xii. 2; he or the representative of his family sealed the covenant, x. 4.

HAUGE (how'geh), HANS NIELSEN, the founder of the sect of HAUGIANS, was born in Norway, April, 1771. In early youth he was subject to deep religious impressions and a gloomy state of mind, but at the age of twenty-four he passed through a change which entirely dissipated his dejection and filled his heart with Christian hope and cheerfulness. He devoted himself to preaching, traveled in Denmark and Norway, established a printing-office at Christiansand, and wrote tracts to give publicity to his opinions. He exercised a strong influence on the public mind and attached to himself a number of followers. He differed from Evangelical Protestants in but few points. He regarded the ministry as a common duty obligatory upon all; that a ministry specially ordained and set apart to the work is unnecessary; and that confessions of faith and creeds are of little use. His labors tended greatly to the revival of religion, and his sect is still numerous in Norway, contending against formalism and rationalism, and exercises no small influence among the people. He died in 1824.

HAUKAL (hau'kahl), ABUL KASEM MOHAMMED BEN, an Arabian traveler and geographer of the tenth century, was a native of Bagdad, whence he set out, about A. D. 940, for the purpose of visiting other countries. He traveled in Syria, Mesopotamia, Persia and Africa, and gave the results of his studies and observations in a work entitled "A Book of Roads and Kingdoms," a geographical description of the country where the worship of Mohammed prevails. A Persian work, translated into English by Major Ouseley, in 1800, was erroneously supposed to be a translation of Haukal's book. Haukal was living in 975.

HAURAN (how'rah), a district mentioned by Ezekiel as the frontier of the Holy Land, Ezek. xlvii. 16, 18. It appears to have constituted part of the ancient kingdom of Bashan, and to have been afterward known as Auranitis, being sometimes comprehended with Batanea in "the region of Trachonitis." It probably took its name from the caves with which it still abounds; and its original appellation, the Haurân, it now retains. This name, however, is at present applied, Dr. Porter tells us, by those at a distance to the whole country east of Jaulân (Gaulanitis) and Jeidûr (Iturea). But by the people of that country it is used in a much more restricted sense, and is given only to the fertile plain on the south of the Lejâh, with the narrow strip on the west. The whole of this district is perfectly flat, with little conical hills at intervals. The soil is the most fertile in Syria, and admirably adapted to the production of wheat. Not a tree is anywhere seen. There are many inhabited villages, and many more in ruins. The walls of these are of vast thickness, and evidently of remote antiquity.

HAUSMANN (hows'man), NICOLAUS, the Reformer of the city Zwickau and the duchy of Anhalt, and a man to whom Luther was greatly attached, was born at Freiburg in 1479. He was engaged in many controversies with the adherents of Thomas Munzer. Upon the recommendation of Luther in 1532, he was made pastor of Dessau, and in 1538 superintendent of his native town of Freiburg, where he died suddenly of apoplexy, November 6, 1538, while preaching his first sermon. His loss was deeply felt by Luther. The opinions of Hausmann on the Reformation in Zwickau have been published.

HAUTEFAGE (hôt'fazh), JEAN, a French Romish theologian, was born in 1735 at Puy Morin near Toulouse. He received his education as a Jesuit, but afterward deserted them and became a Jansenist. After his ordination to the priesthood he became vicar of a country church in the diocese of Toulouse; but his doctrinal views being suspected, he was suspended. He was in 1766 made sub-rector of the college of Auxerre and canon of that city, but his Jansenistic opinions again brought persecution upon him, and in 1773 he was sentenced to be branded, whipped and imprisoned for life. He, however, found means to escape, and traveled through Southern Europe disseminating his views. He died February 18, 1816. Among his publications may be mentioned: "The Works of Antoine Arnauld," "New Ecclesiastics."

HÄVERNICK, or HAEVERNICK (hay'ver-nik), HEIN. ANDR. CHRIST., was born in 1805, at Kröplin in Mecklenburg, and died at Königsberg in 1845. He studied theology first at Halle; but having been involved in the troubles which disturbed that university in consequence of the prosecution for anti-Christianism brought against Wegscheider and Gesenius, the evidence in support of which was chiefly supplied from the notes of Havernick and Rehrkorn, he left Halle and completed his course at Berlin, where he attached himself closely to Hengstenberg. In 1833 he became a teacher in the theological school at Geneva; in 1834 he went to Rostock, where he taught theology first as a private teacher, afterward as one of the extraordinary professors; and in 1840 he was appointed ordinary professor at Königsberg. He was a great scholar, who never tired in the pursuit of knowledge, and wore himself out prematurely by his excessive labor as a student, a teacher and a writer. He was withal one of the honestest of men—a little too open and outspoken, perhaps, for his own personal ease, but impressing all who came near him with a sense of his sincerity, earnestness and zeal for truth. His services to the cause of evangelical truth in Germany were great, and his works will long remain a storehouse of sound learning and candid reasoning, to attest his eminent abilities and attainments, and to suggest what might have been expected from his diligence, learning and scientific precision had his life been prolonged. He wrote a "Commentary upon the Book of Daniel," a "Commentary upon Ezekiel," "General Introduction to the Old Testament," "Introduction to the Pentateuch," "Lectures upon the Theology of the Old Testament," etc.

HAVILAH (hav'e-lah) appears first as the name of a region in the primeval earth, distinguished for its possession of gold and precious stones, also compassed by the river Pison, Gen. ii. 11, 12; then as the name of a grandson of Ham by his eldest son Cush; also of a son of Eber by Joktan, Gen. x. 7, 29, each of whom probably gave their name to, or were themselves called from, a region occupied by their offspring, the one in Ethiopia, the other in Arabia; finally, as the name of a tract or place in the way between Canaan and Egypt on the line of Shur, 1 Sam. xv. 7, which is also mentioned in connection with the history of the Ishmaelites, Gen. xxv. 18. It is impossible that all these applications of the word can be understood of one and the same place; even in the post-diluvian times there must have been at least two places known by the name—one at no great distance from the land of Canaan, and another in the southern parts of Arabia, or the parts of Africa over against it. Many conjectures have been made as to the precise localities of each, but nothing very definite or certain has been obtained. Niebuhr found in Yemen alone two districts bearing the name of Haulau, which is probably but a modification of Havilah. In regard to the antediluvian Havilah it has been already stated under Eden that nothing certain can be known. But the probability is that it lay more toward India than Arabia.

HAVILAH. 1. One of the sons of Cush, Gen. x. 7; 1 Chr. i. 9. 2. A son of Joktan, Gen. x. 29; 1 Chr. i. 23.

HAVOTH-JAIR (ha'voth-ja'ir), the name given to a certain number of little towns in the land of Gilead, the possession of Jair, a descendant of Manasseh. They formed a portion of the country of Bashan, and were hence called in one place, BASHAN-HAVOTH-JAIR, Deut. iii. 14. The accounts referring to them are involved in some obscurity, but are quite explicable when the facts respecting Jair are correctly given. See JAIR.

HAWES (haw'wis), THOMAS, an English divine, was born in 1734, at Truro. He pursued a course of study at Christ College, Cambridge, entered the ministry and became assistant-chaplain at Locke Hospital. He was afterward made rector of All Saints, Northamptonshire, and was much favored by the countess of Huntingdon, who placed in his charge several chapels which she erected and made him head of her theological seminary. He was also a director of the London Missionary Society at its organization. He was the author of several practical works, among which may be enumerated, "History of the Church," "State of the Evangelical Religion throughout the World," "The Evangelical Expositor, a Comment on the Bible," "New Translation of the New Testament," "Communicant's Companion," etc. He died in 1820.

HAWES (hawz), JOEL, D.D., pastor of the First Congregational Church at Hartford, Connecticut, for more than forty years, was born December 22, 1789 at Medway, Massachusetts. The son of parents in limited circumstances in life, he had many difficulties to contend with in obtaining a liberal education. With the means procured by his own industry, he entered Brown University in 1809 and supported himself during his college course. He graduated with honor in 1813, and after completing a course in theology at Andover, Massachusetts, he was settled over the First Congregational Church in Hartford, Connecticut, where he discharged in an eminently successful manner the duties of pastor from 1818 until 1862, when he resigned and was elected pastor emeritus by his congregation. He was prominently associated with the great religious enterprises of the day. Home and foreign missions, Bible, tract and education causes received his cordial and earnest co-operation. He published "Lectures to Young Men," "Tribute to the Pilgrims," "Character Everything for the Young," "The Religion of the East," "Memoir of Norman Smith," etc. He died June 5, 1867.

HAWES, WILLIAM, an English physician, and founder of the Humane Society, was born at Islington in 1736; studied medicine and followed the profession of an apothecary until 1780, when he took his degree as a physician. Before this, however, he had become deservedly popular by his zealous exertions in the establishment of the Humane Society, founded in 1774, to which institution he may truly be said to have devoted the best part of his life. He wrote several useful tracts, and among others, "An Examination of the Rev. John Wesley's Primitive Physic," being at once an ironical and serious exposure of the absurdities of that production. This benevolent physician died in 1808.

HAWK (hawk), one of the birds pronounced unclean, Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15. The original word, implying swift motion, seems to include various species of the Falconidae, more especially as in the passages referred to "the kind" or family is mentioned. The hawk, though not migratory in this country, is so in parts of Asia and Southern Europe. This seems to be alluded to in Job xxxix. 26. Dr. Thomson notices a remarkable illustration of this passage: "I have often seen them returning south during the latter part of September, but never saw them migrating northward. I can only account for this by supposing that in going they straggle along in single pairs, and at no particular time, or else by some distant interior route, but that when their young are grown they come back southward in flocks; but even then they do not fly in groups, as do cranes, geese and storks, but keep passing for days in straggling lines, like scattered ranks of a routed army. Here and there, as far as the eye can reach, they come, flying every one apart, but all going steadily to the south." These birds are common in Syria, where many species occur—the merlin, the kestrel, the gerfalcon, etc.

The "night-hawk" is also an unclean bird, Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15. It is questioned what bird is here meant; according to Bochart, the male ostrich. It is more probable, however, that some kind of owl, perhaps the Strix flammea, or white owl, is intended.

HAWKER (hawk'er), ROBERT, an Evangelical clergyman of some note, who for half a century was vicar of the parish of Charles the Martyr, at Plymouth. He was born at Exeter, in England, in 1753, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. In doctrine he was a Calvinist, and he has often been represented as holding Antinomian views. He wrote a large work, which was issued in three volumes quarto, called "The Poor Man's Commentary on the Old and New Testament," and he also published "Sermons," "Meditations" and "Lectures." He died in 1827.

HAWKINS (hawk'inz), WILLIAM, an English clergyman, and the author of "Discourses on Scripture Mysteries" (Bampton Lectures for 1787), was born in 1722. He studied at Pembroke College, Oxford, where he became Fellow, and in 1750 professor of poetry. He was subsequently made prebendary of Wells, rector of Casterton and vicar of White Church, in Dorsetshire. He was the author of occasional sermons, in addition to the above-named discourses, and died in 1801.

HAWKS (hawks), CICERO STEPHEN, D.D., bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in 1812, at Newbern, North Carolina. After graduating at the university of North Carolina in 1830, he studied law. In 1834, having relinquished law for the ministry, he was ordained deacon and presbyter in 1835. He was first settled at Trinity Church, Saugerties, New York, in 1836, and subsequently at Buffalo, New York, and St. Louis, Missouri. He was made bishop of the diocese of Missouri in 1844, where he labored till his death, April 19, 1868.

HAWKS, FRANCIS LISTER, D.D., LL.D., one of the most distinguished pulpit orators of the Episcopal Church in America, was born at Newbern, North Carolina, in 1798. After graduating at the university of North Carolina, he pursued the study of law, was admitted to the bar at the age of twenty-one and practiced successfully for several years. He entered actively into political Mississippi. In 1844 he was elected bishop of Mississippi, but declined and accepted a call to Christ Church, New Orleans, where he remained until 1849. During a portion of this time he was also president of the university of Louisiana. To an invitation from the church of the Mediator to return to New York he responded favorably, and assumed the rectorship of the church, which he held for thirteen years. In 1862 he was elected bishop of Rhode Island, but declined. He died September 26, 1866. He was the author of "Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of the United States," a valuable work; "Commentary on the Constitution and Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States," "Egypt and its Monuments," "Documentary History of the Protestant Episcopal Church," "Auricular Confession," besides many contributions to the "Church Record," "New York Review," etc.

life, was elected a member of the legislature of his native State and gave promise of great eloquence as a public speaker. In the full tide of success he directed his attention to the ministry, pursued a course of theology under doctor, afterward bishop, Green, at Hillsboro'. In 1827 he was ordained a deacon, and in 1829 he was called as assistant to Dr. Croswell, rector of Trinity Church, New Haven, Connecticut. During the same year he became assistant of Bishop White, then rector of the church of St. James, Philadelphia. In 1830 he was chosen professor of divinity in Washington, now Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut, and in 1831 he went to New York as rector of St. Stephen's, where he was at once recognized as one of the most eloquent preachers of the city. During the same year he was called to the rectorship of St. Thomas' Church, New York, and in 1835 was chosen missionary bishop of the South-west, which he declined. In 1839 he opened a school at Flushing, Long Island, with expensive buildings, grounds, etc., and involved himself in financial embarrassment, and the school proved a failure. He resigned his church and went to Holly Springs, tional minister and distinguished missionary among the Indians, was born in Bridgeport, Connecticut, November 5, 1727 (O.S.). He received his education at Yale College, graduating in 1749, and having entered the ministry, commenced those self-denying labors to which he devoted so many years, and for which he was so well qualified. In 1752 he visited the Indians at Stockbridge, and in May of the following year, in company with Timothy Woodbridge, he pushed his way through the wilderness to the Susquehanna River at Onohoghgwage, where he located a mission, but was soon compelled to abandon it in consequence of the French War, May, 1756. He next went as a chaplain in the army detailed for operations against Crown Point under Colonel Gridley, and in 1758 he took up his abode among the Marshpee Indians, among whom he labored until the close of his life, October 3, 1807, at the advanced age of 80 years.

HAY, Prov. xxvii. 25; Isa. xv. 6; comp. Ps. lxxii. 6; Amos vii. 1. "Mowings" are spoken of; but hay, in our full sense of it, was not made in Palestine. See GRASS.

HAYDN (hayd'n), FRANZ JOSEPH, one of the most distinguished musical composers of Germany, was born in Rohrau, March 31, 1732. His father was a village blacksmith and organist of the parish church of Rohrau. Like other eminent composers, he manifested in early life a decided taste for music. A relative on a visit to the family was struck with the evidence of genius in the child, and offered to take charge of his musical education. The offer was accepted, and for three years he dwelt at Hamburg with Frank, who proved a severe but an efficient master; and at the early age of eight years the pupil sang with great taste, and had commenced to play upon the violin and other instruments. At this time, Reuter, the kapellmeister of St. Stephen's, Vienna, came to Hamburg, and was so pleased with the boy's voice and with the facility with which he read music that he took him with him to Vienna as a member of his choir. Here he distinguished himself by his passionate ardor for music, and soon made the acquaintance of the Venetian ambassador, Porpora, the Neapolitan composer, the countess of Thun and Baron Furnberg, the count of Mortzin, for whom he composed his first symphony in "Re." Subsequently, Prince Esterhazy was so delighted with his talents that he took him into his own service. For him he composed his fifth symphony in "Ut," which completely ravished the prince, who, on the death of Werner, entrusted Haydn with the direction of his music. For thirty years he lived in the court of Hungarian magnates in great peace and enjoyment, devoting himself to the composition of music, during which time his fame spread throughout Europe. In 1791 he visited London as manager of the Hanover square concerts. For these he wrote six symphonies. In 1793 he returned to London, where he was received with great enthusiasm. The university of Oxford bestowed upon him an honorary degree of doctor of music, and publishers gave him large sums for his smallest contributions. His great work, the "Oratorio of the Creation," was composed in a villa in the faubourgs of Vienna, occupying two years. It was produced in 1798, and in every capital of Europe it quickly became known and admired. Haydn was a deeply pious man, and gave to God the glory of all his works. He died May 31, 1809, at the age of seventy-seven years.

HAYES (hayz), CHARLES, an English gentleman of extensive scientific and literary attainments, was born in the year 1678. In his early life he devoted himself principally to scientific studies, and was the author of the first treatise on fluxions published in the English language. Subsequently, he gave himself to the study of ancient history, with especial reference to the history contained in the Scriptures, and his various works bear testimony to a vast amount of learned research. He had a knowledge of Latin, Greek and Hebrew, and also of several modern languages. He died, at the advanced age of eighty-two, December 18, 1760. The following Biblical works were all published anonymously, but their authorship is attested by a writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine," December, 1761, in whose hands Hayes' papers had been placed: "A Vindication of the History of the Septuagint," "A Critical Examination of the Holy Gospels according to St. Matthew and St. Luke, with regard to the History of the Birth and Infancy of our Lord Jesus Christ," "A Dissertation upon the Chronology of the Septuagint, with an Appendix showing that the Chaldean and Egyptian Antiquities, hitherto esteemed fabulous, are perfectly consistent with the computations of that most ancient Version of the Holy Scriptures." In this work he enters at length into an examination of the variations in the ages of the patriarchs as given in the Hebrew, the Septuagint and Josephus, and offers some suggestions in defence of the integrity of the Hebrew and Greek texts. He also published an extensive prospectus (itself a valuable work) of a large work on Asiatic and Egyptian chronology, from the creation of the world unto the birth of Christ, which, although completed, has never been published.

HAYES, WILLIAM, musical composer, was originally organist of St. Mary's, Shrewsbury, from whence he removed to Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his degrees in music, and was elected professor in that faculty. He published a collection of English ballads, but is best known by his Church compositions, not a few of which are still in use and popular in England and in this country. He defended Handel against Avison with some asperity. He was born in 1708, and died in 1777.

HAYMO, or HAIMO (hi'mo), or AIMO (i'mo), a theologian eminent in the ninth century, supposed to have been born about the year 778. He was successively teacher in the abbey of Fulda, abbot of Hirschfeld, and in 841 bishop of Halberstadt in Saxony. He attended the council of Mentz in 847, and died March 23, 853. Among his writings, which are chiefly compilations from the Fathers, may be named "A Compend of Ecclesiastical History," "Concerning the Body and Blood of Christ," "Explanation of the Apocalypse," and commentaries on various books of the Old Testament.

HAYNES (haynz), LEMUEL, a Congregational minister, was born July 18, 1753, at West Hartford, Connecticut, and was educated at Granville, Massachusetts. He was a mulatto. After entering the ministry he preached at Granville for five years very acceptably, then removed to Farmington, Connecticut, afterward to Rutland, Vermont. He read Greek and Latin with critical accuracy, possessed a quick and subtle intellect and a great thirst for knowledge. In Vermont he was quite influential in his opposition to infidelity. He died September, 1834.

HAZAEEL (haz'a-el), first the general of the forces of Benhadad, king of Syria, and subsequently his successor. He appears to have been a man of great military skill and resolute spirit, but of lawless ambition and unscrupulous character. Without any previous notice of him, or any reason assigned for the elevation he was destined to occupy, his name was mentioned to Elijah at Horeb as that of the person he was to anoint king over Syria, 1 Ki. xix. 15; but from what afterward occurred, there can be no doubt that the main reason of the appointment was that, from his determined and ferocious character, he might act the part of a severer scourge to Israel than Benhadad had done. The wars of Benhadad with Ahab had meanwhile ended in his own humiliation and the defeat of his projects against Israel, but this was no ground, Elijah was given to understand, for supposing danger to have ceased in the Syrian direction. A more formidable adversary than Benhadad was in store to be placed upon the throne, whom in due season God would use as his rod of correction. The purpose, however, though announced then, was kept for a time in suspense. There were re-lentings on the part of Ahab and his impious wife, and the forbearance of God allowed the elevation of Hazael to the throne to remain in abeyance for years to come. The prophet doubtless understood that this was the mind of God, as no step appears to have been taken by him to promote Hazael to the throne. The matter seems to have been committed by Elijah to his successor, Elisha, as was that also of the appointment of Jehu to the throne of Israel; and when Elisha afterward came into contact with Hazael, he simply intimated to him his destination to occupy the throne of Syria. Benhadad in his illness had sent Hazael to inquire of the prophet whether he should recover of his disease. The prophet intimated that Benhadad's malady should not in itself be fatal, but that nevertheless the king would die and he become his successor on the Syrian throne. Elisha then burst into tears, and when Hazael questioned him as to the cause of his weeping said, "Because I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel; their strongholds wilt thou set on fire and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child," 2 Ki. viii. 12. Hazael appears to have been not only astonished, but actually shocked and incredulous, exclaiming with indignant warmth, "But what! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" The prophet does not even reply to this, but dismisses him with the quiet answer, "The Lord hath showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria." Forthwith Hazael enters on his downward career, if the usual interpretation of 2 Ki. viii. 15 be correct, by murdering Benhadad. Dr. Geddes and other learned critics, however, refer the pronoun in the clause, "he took a thick cloth," etc., to Benhadad, and believe that he unintentionally killed himself. Be this as it may, Hazael immediately usurped the throne, and proceeded to fulfill the words of prophecy in oppressing Israel. His reign, with the exception of the time when he was called on to defend himself against the Assyrian power, was occupied with continual wars upon Israel, and even against Judah, 2 Ki. viii. 7-15, 28, 29; ix. 14, 15; x. 32, 33; xii. 17, 18; xiii. 3; 2 Chr. xxii. 5, 6. Hazael is supposed to have reigned about forty-six years 886-840 B. C. He was succeeded by his son Benhadad, 2 Ki. xiii. 22-25; Amos i. 4.

HAZAIAH (ha-za'yah), a descendant of Judah, Neh. xi. 8.

HAZAR-ADDAR (ha'zar-ad'dar), a place on the southern frontier of Palestine, Num. xxxiv. 4. It seems to be identical with Adar, the south boundary of Judah, Josh. xv. 3, and is possibly Ain el Fudeirat or Adeirat, to the west of Kadesh-barnea.

HAZAR-ENAN (-e'nan), a place on the north-east frontier of Palestine, Num. xxxiv. 9, 10. It is also mentioned as a boundary-place in Ezek. xlvii. 17; xlviii. 1. Porter supposes it the modern Kuryetein, Ene of Damascus, where are large fountains.

HAZAR-GADDAH (-gad'dah), a town in the extreme south of Judah, Josh. xv. 27. Perhaps this may be identified with Wady Mubughik, where there are extensive ruins of great antiquity.

HAZAR-HATTICON (-hat'te-kon), specified by Ezekiel, xlv. i. 16, as one of the boundaries of the land. It is said to be on the border of Hauran.

HAZAR-MAVETH (-ma'veth), one of the sons of Joktan, Gen. x. 26; 1 Chr. i. 20. His descendants were the Chatramotitæ, who settled in the south of Arabia, and the name is preserved in the modern Hadramaut. This district is said to be very unhealthy; but it is cultivated, and the inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in frankincense, myrrh, gum and other products. Their language is a dialect materially differing from that spoken in Yemen.

HAZAR-SHUAL (-shoo'al), a place in the south of Palestine, originally in the territory of Judah, afterward allotted to Simeon, Josh. xv. 28; xix. 3; 1 Chr. iv. 28. It is mentioned as inhabited after the captivity, Neh. xi. 27. Wilton would identify it with Beni-Shail, not far from Gaza.

HAZAR-SUSAH (-soo'sah) or HAZAR-SUSIM (-soo'seem), a town in the territory of Simeon, Josh. xix. 5; 1 Chr. iv. 31. It might be, like Bethmarcaboth, "the chariot-station," a dépôt for horses, such as those which in Solomon's time went to and fro between Egypt and Palestine. It is probably identical with Sansannah, which Wilton believes to have been in the modern Wady es-Suny, or Sunieh, not far from Gaza, on the caravan-road between that place and Sinai.

HAZAZON-TAMAR (ha'za-zon-ta'mar), 2 Chr. xx. 2. See EN-GEDI, HAZEZON-TAMAR.

HAZEL (ha'zel). The Hebrew word luz, rendered "hazel," occurs as the name of a tree only in one place in the Bible, Gen. xxx. 37, where it indicates one of the kinds of rod from which Jacob peeled the bark, and which he placed in the water-troughs of the cattle. Luz is translated hazel in the Authorized Version, as well as in several others; in some it is rendered by words equivalent to "walnut," but "almond" appears to be its true meaning. For in the Arabic we have louz, which is indeed the same word, and which denotes the almond. Thus Abu'l Fadli, as quoted by Celsius, says: "The louz is a well-known tree, and superb, with tender leaves; there are two species, the cultivated and the wild; of the cultivated there are likewise two sorts, the sweet and the bitter;" where reference is evidently made to the sweet and bitter almond. Other Arab authors also describe it under the name of louz. But this name was known to the Hebrews as indicating the almond; R. Saadias remarks: "The luz is the almond, for so the Arabians designate it; since these two languages—i. e., the Hebrew and the Arabic—and the Syriac are of the same family." See ALMOND.

HAZELEL-PONI (haz'e-l-el-po'nee), a daughter of the house of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 3. The original has the article prefixed, as if it were the name of a family rather than that of an individual.

HAZELIUS (ha-ze'li-us), ERNEST LEWIS, D.D., descended from a long line of Lutheran clergymen, was born September 6, 1777, at Neusalz, in Prussia. He received his theological education at Niesky, a Moravian institution in charge of Bishop Anders. In 1800 he was offered a position as classical teacher in the Moravian seminary at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and immediately emigrated to America. He remained in the institution for eight years, and was advanced to the position of teacher of theology. In 1809 he took up his residence in Philadelphia, in charge of a private school. In 1815, having previously attached himself to the Lutheran Church, he was chosen professor of theology in Hartwick seminary and principal of the classical department. In 1830 he was elected professor of Biblical and Oriental literature and of the German language in the seminary at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, and in 1834 he was made professor in the theological seminary of the synod of South Carolina. He published a "Life of Luther," "History of the Christian Church," "History of the American Lutheran Church," "Augsburg Confession, with Annotations," etc. He died February 20, 1853.

HAZER (ha'zer). This is the same with Hazar. It is not found alone as a proper name, but the two following are forms of its plural.

HAZERIM (ha-ze'rim). The Avims are said to have dwelt here, Deut. ii. 23. Instead of the name of a definite place, the meaning probably is that this nomad people had their villages, tent-villages or encampments in the district.

THE REMAINS OF DRYBURGH ABBEY, SCOTLAND

HAZEROTH (ha-ze'roth), one of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness, Num. xi. 35; xii. 16; xxxiii. 17, 18; Deut. i. 1. It is thought to be at 'Ain el-Hudhera, about eighteen hours from Sinai.

HAZEZON-TAMAR (ha'ze-zon-ta'mar), the ancient name of Engedi, Gen. xiv. 7. In 2 Chr. xx. 2 it is Hazazon-tamar. See ENGEDI.

HAZIEL (ha'zi-el), a Levite in the time of David, 1 Chr. xxiii. 9.

HAZO (ha'zo), one of the sons of Nahor, Gen. xxii. 22.

HAZOR (ha'zor). 1. A town which lay within the bounds of the tribe of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 36, but which occupied relatively a much higher place under the old masters of Canaan than it ever did under the Israelites. At the time of the conquest it was the capital of a king or chieftain (Jabin) who headed one of the strongest combinations of the native forces with which Joshua had to contend. The multitudes that assembled under his leadership are said to have been "like the sand that is upon the sea-shore, with horses and chariots very many." It is said, also, that they pitched together at the waters of Merom, Josh. xi. 1-5. These waters of Merom are what now goes by the name of the lake Hulah; and somewhere in its neighborhood Hazor is understood to have been placed, but the exact site has not been ascertained. After defeating those assembled forces, Joshua returned and smote Hazor, and burned it with fire. It partially recovered, however, from this disaster, for in the time of the Judges we find another Jabin, called king of Canaan, "who reigned at Hazor, Jud. iv. 2, and who, like his predecessor, headed a most formidable combination of the heathen princes, and drew together an immense force, that for a time appalled the people of Israel. But he was defeated by the efforts of Deborah and Barak. Hazor is mentioned at a later period as one of the cities which Solomon fortified, 1 Ki. ix. 15, and still later as one of the larger places taken by the king of Assyria, 2 Ki. xv. 29. Its position on the northern borders of Palestine naturally rendered it a place of some importance, as well for the possessors of Canaan as for those who had designs of conquest respecting it. 2. A city in the south of Judah, Josh. xv. 23; it should, probably, be united with the succeeding name. See ITHNAN. 3, 4. Two more towns of Judah, Hezron and Hazor-Hadattah, or "new" Hazor. See HEZRON and HADATTAH. 5. A place, probably to the north of Jerusalem, inhabited by the Benjamites, after their return from Babylon, Neh. xi. 33. 6. A district of Arabia, Jer. xlix. 28, 30, 33.

HEAD. As the head is the topmost part of the human body, it came derivatively to signify that which is highest, chief, the highest in position locally being regarded as highest in office, rank or dignity; whence, as the head is the centre of the nervous system, holds the brain and stands above all the other parts, it has generally been considered as the abode of the intellect or intelligence by which man is enlightened and his walk in life directed; while the heart, or the parts placed near it, have been accounted the place where the affections lie, Gen. iii. 15; Ps. iii. 3; Eccles. ii. 14. The head and the heart are sometimes taken for the entire person, Isa. i. 5. Even the head alone, as being the chief member, frequently stands for the man, Prov. x. 6. The head also denotes sovereignty, 1 Cor. xi. 3. Covering the head and cutting off the hair were signs of mourning and tokens of distress, which were enhanced by throwing ashes on the head, together with sackcloth, Amos viii. 10; Job i. 20; Lev. xxi. 5; Deut. xiv. 1; 2 Sam. xiii. 19; Esth. iv. 1; while anointing the head was practiced on festive occasions, and considered an emblem of felicity, Eccles. ix. 8; Ps. xxiii. 5; Luke vii. 46. It was usual to swear by the head, Matt. v. 36.

HEAD-BANDS, and HEAD-DRESS. See DRESS, sub-head HEAD-DRESS.

HEAD OF THE CHURCH. See JESUS CHRIST; also, see PAPACY.

HEAL (heel), HEALING (heel'ing). See PHYSICIAN. There is a peculiar expression in Mal. iv. 2, which may be explained here. A fresh metal bars was constructed, so as to protect them and yet leave the statue visible, and this framework was called a "herse." See CATAFALQUE.

HEART (hart). The Hebrews regarded the heart as the seat not only of the passions and emotions, such as love, hatred, pleasure, sorrow, etc., but also of the intellectual faculties, 1 Ki. x. 24. We often, therefore, find the word "heart" where, according to our present mode of expression, the "mind" or "understanding" would be used.

HEARTH (harth), Gen. xviii. 6. There is no Hebrew word here separately to express "hearth." That for "cakes" means round cakes which were baked, as at present, under hot ashes, when haste was required, comp. 1 Ki. xix. 6, "a cake baked upon hot stones." In Ps. cii. 3 the exact meaning of the original word used is "fuel." A different form of the same root occurs in Isa. xxx. 14—"from the burning mass." In Jer. xxxvi. 22, 23, we find another word; it means a brazier or stove. Such braziers are frequently now used. They are shaped like a large pitcher, and placed in a cavity of the prince. Thus, in the lofty metaphorical language of the Hebrews, the elements are described as "angels" or "messengers" of Jehovah going forth at his command to execute his will.

HEATH (heeth), Jer. xvii. 6; xlviii. 6. It is doubtful whether any plant or tree is intended. Gesenius proposes to render "like one forlorn," or "ruins," as in Ps. cii. 17, where the same word is rendered "deserted." Henderson believes that it must be a tree, and supposes that some species of juniper is meant.

HEATE, NICHOLAS, a prominent English prelate, born in London about 1500. He was a graduate of Cambridge, and a Fellow of Clare Hall. It is said that he at first favored the Reformed doctrines, and was maintained at college by Anne Boleyn. He took holy orders in 1531, and in 1539 was made archdeacon of Stafford and almoner of Henry VIII., who promoted him to the see of Rochester in the following year. In 1543 he was translated to Worcester, and was appointed one of the commissioners for carrying into gale is said to blow, in some parts of the Levant, at sunrise, from the sea across the land. This, from its salubrious effects, is called "The Doctor." Now, we find "the wings of the wind" mentioned, Ps. xviii. 10; civ. 3; comp. cxxxix. 9; we may, therefore, suppose this natural circumstance alluded to for illustrating the spiritual refreshment which attends and proceeds from the rising of "the Sun of righteousness" with healthful beams.

HEARERS (heer'erz), a name given to a class of catechumens in the early Church who were permitted to "hear" certain portions of the service, as the sermon and reading of the Scriptures, but not the prayers. They assembled in the narthex, or ante-temple.

HEARSE, or HERSE (hurs). This term, which is now used to designate a carriage for conveying a dead body to the grave, had formerly a much more extensive signification. The word "herse" is derived from the Low Latin "hercia," and is equivalent to the Italian "catafalco," which is an ornamental framework placed over a coffin previous to interment. When reclining or horizontal statues were placed on tombs, a grating of in the floor. When the fire has burnt down, a kind of frame is placed over the brazier and covered with a carpet, and persons warm themselves, as they sit on the floor around, by thrusting their legs under the carpet. In Zech. xii. 6 the original word means "a fire-pan."

HEAT (heet). This term has been applied both to the sensation experienced on touching a hot body and to the cause of that sensation. Besides its ordinary meaning, it has in Scripture some peculiar uses. It is most likely that the burning wind of the desert was the instrument with which the army of Sennacherib was destroyed, 2 Ki. xix. 7, 35. Such a wind is mentioned by Thevenot which in 1658 caused the death of 20,000 men in one night; and upon another occasion, in 1655, 4000 persons were slain at once. Its effect is to fill the air with poisonous and suffocating vapors which become almost intolerable. The most violent storms of Judea were from the desert; "Out of the south," says Job, "cometh the whirlwind." The hot wind, when used as a symbol, indicated persecution or the infliction of devastating war. A gentle heat, according to the Oriental interpretation, meant the favor and bounty effect the Prayer-Book of Edward VI. Refusing to sign the form for the consecration of bishops, he was deprived of his see, thrown into the Fleet Prison, and afterward confined in the house of Bishop Ridley. When Mary came to the throne, he was restored to his see, made president of Wales, and archbishop of York in 1555, and lord-chancellor in 1556, which he continued to be till the queen's death. He refused to assist at the coronation of Elizabeth or to take the oath of supremacy, and was deprived of his see, imprisoned and excommunicated in 1560. After some months he was liberated, and retired to his estate at Chobham, Surrey, where he died, in 1579.

HEATH, THOMAS, a learned layman of the Church of England, sometime resident at Exeter, the author of a work entitled "An Essay toward a New English Version of the Book of Job from the Original Hebrew, with a Commentary and some Account of his Life." This version of Job is in prose, and on the whole is a correct and forcible rendering of the original. The notes are learned, and discover considerable acquaintance with the literature of the subject. The author believes Job to have been a real person, but the poem he thinks was written long subsequent to Job's decease, and by a person wholly unacquainted with the doctrines of a future state and the resurrection of the body. These and cognate matters are discussed with special reference to the great controversy of the time, originating in the views promulgated by Bishop Warburton in his work on the divine legation of Moses.

HEATHCOTE (heeth'cote), RALPH, D.D., a clergyman of the Church of England, who was the projector of the General Biographical Dictionary, was born in 1721. After receiving his education at Jesus College, Cambridge, he entered holy orders, and was in 1748 made vicar of Barky near Leicester and in 1753 assistant-preacher of Lincoln's Inn. In 1755 he became vicar of Silsby, in 1768 prebend in the collegiate church, Southwell, and in 1788 vicar-general of Southwell church. He died May 28, 1795. Among his works may be named "The Use of Reason in Matters of Religion," "General Biographical Dictionary" (projected and edited by himself), "Lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy," "Animadversions upon Jews with somewhat of a contemptuous meaning, as Kafir, corrupted to Giaour among the Moham-medans, to designate persons not of their race, and therefore not entitled to their privileges.

The Greek word ethnos is in its signification nearly similar. It is true that it occurs, John xi. 50-52, for the Jewish people, but it has besides a larger sense, Acts xvii. 26; Gal. iii. 14, and also is expressly contrasted with the seed of Jacob or the circumcision, Luke ii. 32; Acts x. 45. We find, too, the idea of an ungodly person or idolater or one out of the covenant of grace implied in it, Matt. vi. 7; xviii. 17. It is used in an extended sense in those passages which so emphatically inculcate the duty of the Christian Church to the world, xxviii. 19; Luke xxiv. 47.

HEAVEN (hev'en). A critical examination of the precise meaning of the Hebrew word so rendered in our version is obviously out of place in the present work. For such, lexicons must be consulted. But it may be observed that the term in most frequent use implies height, and that other terms imply either height or extension. The earth which later science has revealed. But still the same threefold use of the term may be observed in Scripture, Gen. i. 20; xv. 5; Ps. xi. 4, xviii. 11; Jer. viii. 7, and elsewhere. Sometimes the expression "heaven of heavens" is used for God's abode, Deut. x. 14; 1 Ki. viii. 27; Neh. ix. 6. It is possible that St. Paul may speak of the third heaven, 2 Cor. xii. 2, with reference to this triple division, or, apart from this, he may mean simply the highest heaven. It has indeed been questioned whether there is sufficient authority for believing that the ancient Jews recognized the threefold distribution, and certainly rabbinical legends say rather that there were seven heavens. But surely we may well imagine that the Jews would adopt that mode of using the word heavens, which is so reasonable and natural to ourselves, and we need not require more explicit proof than the texts just referred to furnish.

Heaven, theologically, is understood to mean the state and place of blessedness which the saints attain after the present life. Scripture has revealed little on this subject to gratify men's curiosity, but quite enough to call out their better desires for such the Middletonian Controversy in General," and "Discourse on the Being of God, against Atheists."

HEATHEN (heeth'en). The terms so rendered in our translation are occasionally represented by other words, as "nations" or "Gentiles." And the signification intended must have varied at different periods of the world's history. God made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, Acts xvii. 26; one word, therefore, goi, plural goim, included all the people of the earth. And so we find it employed in Gen. x. 5, 20, 31, 32, where once it is in our version "Gentiles," the other times "nations." When, however, a single family was selected to expand into a people who were specially to be the depository of divine truth, and to become God's peculiar inheritance, then the word began to have a specific meaning, and to designate those who were not Israelites, even though they might locally inhabit Canaan, 2 Ki. xvii. 41. And as just said, because among the Hebrews alone there was the knowledge of the true God, the word had a moral and religious sense, as nearly equivalent with ungodly or idolaters—e. g., Ps. ix. 5, 15, 17, where in the last-named verse "nations." It is still used among the question what the Hebrews understood by the "heaven" or "heavens" has been keenly debated. Grave writers there are who seem really to imagine that the ancient Israelites believed there was a solid vault no great distance overhead, which was sustained by pillars and provided with windows and doors, and in which the glittering stars were stuck. It is very possible that some children even among ourselves may entertain fancies of the kind, but few grown men in any age or country, with any measure of intelligence or cultivation of the mind, could seriously accept a theory the falsehood of which would be demonstrated by a journey of a few miles from home. The poetical expressions we meet with in Scripture in reference to heaven must not be literally understood. See FIRMAMENT.

We ordinarily give three different senses to the word "heaven." We use it for the atmosphere immediately around in which the birds fly and the clouds float; also for that immeasurable space in which other worlds, suns or planets, have their positions or their motions; and further, for the glorious abode of the great King and Creator of the universe. Doubtless the ancients were not aware of the vast distances of the stars from the inheritance. The prominent features of this blessed life are its holiness, its happiness and the presence of the Lord in it. Various terms are used and various illustrations introduced to describe these. Into the heavenly city "there shall in no wise enter anything that defileth," Rev. xxi. 27. Nor shall any abide in God's tabernacle, or dwell in his holy place, but they that walk uprightly and work righteousness, Ps. xv. 1, 2. Those, therefore, that are before the throne of God must "have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," Rev. vii. 14, 15. The unutterable joy they partake is further noted: "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes," Rev. vii. 16, 17. The happiness shall be perfect in its degree and eternal in its duration, Matt. xxv. 46; Rev. iii. 12. And he who hath now entered into the heavens, both as the priestly intercessor for his people and as their fore-runner, will receive them into his intimate communion, John xiv. 2, 3; Phil. i. 23; Heb. vi. 20; xii. 22-24. But in truth we can form little idea at present either of the state of the place. And Scripture itself can hardly do more than describe it by negatives, 1 John iii. 2.

It may be added that the term "heavens" is sometimes adopted for the Deity, the God of heaven, Dan. iv. 26.

HEAVEN, THE KINGDOM OF, a phrase frequently used. Several equivalents occur, as "kingdom of God," "kingdom of Christ," "kingdom of Christ and God," "kingdom of David," and simply "the kingdom." They all mean the kingdom of grace here, developing itself into the kingdom of glory hereafter. The grand idea implied is the theocracy, that formal establishment of Jehovah's lordship in which he revealed himself as the King of his chosen people, all their earthly leaders being avowedly but his lieutenants. The picture of it in the Hebrew state and polity was the type of a far more glorious supremacy repeatedly predicted by the ancient prophets, Ps. ii. 6-12; cx.; Isa. ix. 7, 8; xi. 1-9; xxxii. 1; Dan. ii. 44; vii. 27. The HEBE, the goddess of youth, was the daughter of Jupiter and Juno. The "Iliad" furnishes no delineation of her parentage. Homer mentions that Ganymede was carried off by the gods as a cup-bearer, and afterward mentions Hebe as serving in this capacity. Her position upon Mount Olympus appears to have been that of a waiting-maid at the banquets of the gods, without any degree of servility or degradation, however, attached to it. When Hercules was carried to the skies, Hebe was given to him in marriage, thus uniting the venerated sun-god to immortal youth. Hebe is represented in the arts as a charming young girl, crowned with a wreath of flowers, her dress adorned with roses, and holding in her hand the cup in which she presents the nectar to the gods. An eagle is sometimes represented as standing by her side and receiving her caresses.

rabbinical writers seem generally to have understood the Jewish religion by this phrase; but certainly in our Lord's time it must have been taken to indicate the establishment of Messiah's rule, Luke xix. 11; Acts i. 6, which was ordinarily conceived to be a temporal dominion. Christ checked this notion, and frequently demonstrated the spiritual character of his kingdom, Luke xvii. 21; John xviii. 36, but the error remained in the minds even of his disciples till the promised outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Then, indeed, they understood its internal power, and proclaimed it as "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost," Rom. xiv. 17. Some expositors deny that the phrase can mean the Church or the religion of Christ here, but the kingdom of Messiah to be revealed hereafter, that kingdom which "adventists" expect shall be established by Christ when he shall return for his millennial reign. But this is clearly inconsistent with the sense of many of the places where the expression occurs.

HEAVE-OFFERING, HEAVE-SHOULDER. See OFFERINGS.

HEBER (he'ber). In the Authorized Version this word represents two distinct Hebrew names, the first meaning "a region beyond," the second, "society," "fellowship." Those called by the former, more correctly EBER [which see], are—1. The patriarch Eber, Gen. x. 24, 25; xi. 14-16, the father of Peleg, and ancestor of Abraham. 2. A priest, Neh. xii. 20. 3. A Gadite, 1 Chr. v. 13. 4, 5. Two Benjamites, 1 Chr. viii. 12, 22. But the names of 2, 3, 4, 5, are doubtful, the Septuagint giving Abēd as the name of 2, and Obēd as the name of the other three. It is not certain, therefore, that the name Eber was borne by any except the patriarch. Those designated by the latter are—1. A grandson of Asher, Gen. xlvi. 17; Num. xxvi. 45 (Septuagint Chobor, Chober). 2. A Jew, 1 Chr. iv. 18 (Septuagint Aber). 3. A Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 17 (Septuagint Abar). But the best known is 4. Heber the Kenite, Jud. iv. 11, 17; v. 24 (Septuagint Chaber), the husband of Jael, immortalized in the song of Deborah. See JAEL.

HEBER, REGINALD, the great and good bishop of Calcutta, was the son of a Yorkshire clergyman, born at Malpas, Cheshire, April 21, 1783. His career at Oxford was very distinguished. He gained in 1802, the university prize for his Latin poem, "Carmen Seculare." The next year his "Palestine" obtained the prize for an English poem, and he was also successful with his English essay entitled "Sense of Honor." On completing his Oxford course, he made an extended tour of Europe, and was meditating a collection of all the information which the ancients have given of Scythia, when he entered into holy orders and relinquished the idea. He was appointed to the living of Hodnet in 1809, and married a daughter of Dean Shipley. While zealously discharging his ministerial duties he did not neglect literature. He was one of the principal writers for the "Quarterly Review," commenced a "Dictionary of the Bible" and published a small volume of "Poems and Translations for Weekly Church Service." In 1819 he edited the works of Bishop Jeremy Taylor, accompanied by a life of the author, and a few years afterward was offered the bishopric of Calcutta, which, after some hesitation and refusals, he finally accepted; and having been consecrated, he at once set sail, and in 1823 reached Calcutta. The work which lay before him was enormous, and beyond the reach of any man's power. His diocese included not only the whole of India, but Ceylon, the Mauritius and Australia; but he faced the difficulties with courage and discharged his duties with unflagging zeal, setting in order the things that were wanting, preaching, confirming, guiding, counseling, controlling, building up the church of which he was chief pastor. He was on one of his visitation tours, and had reached Trichinopoly, when the Church in India was deprived of his loving counsels and zealous labors. He had been preaching with his usual earnest eloquence to the native Christians there, after which he entered a bath, and was found dead in it when his servant went in. April 3, 1826. He was buried amid the deep regrets of the native Christians, whose hearts he had won by kindness and condescension, and who crowded around his grave in expression of their respect and affection. Besides the works above mentioned, he wrote "Sermons, in four volumes," "Poetical Works," and "Bampton Lectures." His poems include some hymns that have become familiar as household words to the children of God of all evangelical communions; and Heber's missionary hymn, "From Greenland's icy mountains," etc., will live on Christian lips and in Christian hearts till earthly hymns are merged in those of heaven.

HEBER, RICHARD, half brother of Bishop Heber and a distinguished classical scholar, was born January 5, 1773. He was a member of the university of Oxford, and manifested an especial zeal in collecting rare books. He left immense collections of these in various languages. He had two large libraries at Westminster, one at Oxford, one at Hodnet in Yorkshire, one at Paris, one at Antwerp, one at Brussels, one at Ghent and several at other places on the Continent of Europe.

HEBERTES, a family of Asher, descendants of Heber, Num. xxvi. 45.

HEBREW (he'broo), HEBREWS (he'brooz). The following are the points of distinction between the names Hebrew and Israelite:

1. Hebrew is a name of wider import, at least in its earlier use. Every Israelite was a Hebrew, but every Hebrew was not an Israelite. This is evident from the very first passage in which the word is met with, Gen. xiv. 13, where Abram the Hebrew is mentioned along with Mamre the Amorite, and also from Gen. xxxix. 14; xl. 15; xli. 12, where Joseph is spoken of as a Hebrew and the land of Palestine is called the land of the Hebrews. From these passages we naturally conclude that the Hebrew element in the population of Palestine could not have been confined to the family of Jacob. Also, in Gen. x. 21, Shem is called the "father of all the children of Eber," or Hebrews; and in Num. xxiv. 24 it is not probable that by Eber, which is mentioned along with Asshur, the children of Israel, and they alone, are meant. But after the conquest of Palestine by the Israelites the name Hebrew was no longer used with its original latitude, and Israelite and Hebrew became synonymous, though not by any means employed interchangeably by the sacred writers. For,

2. When the name Hebrew is used in preference to Israelite, there is always a reference to the foreign relations of Israel. It is used (1) by foreigners, Ex. i. 16; ii. 6; 1 Sam. iv. 6, 9; xiv. 11, etc.; or (2) by Israelites when addressing foreigners, Ex. ii. 7; iii. 18, etc.; Jon. i. 9; or (3) when Israelites are opposed to foreign nations, Gen. xliii. 32; Ex. ii. 11; xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12; Jer. xxxiv. 9, 14. A possibly exceptional passage is 1 Sam. xiii. 3, "And Saul blew the trumpet throughout all the land, saying, Let the Hebrews hear." Even if the exception be allowed, it cannot affect the conclusion to which all the other passages point, viz., that Hebrew was the international designation, Israel the local and domestic name—the family name, if we may so speak, surrounded with all the sacredness of home associations, and thus capable of having attached to it a spiritual import which never was and never could be associated with the name Hebrew. Quite in harmony with this conclusion is the fact that the Greek and Roman writers seem to have known nothing of the name Israelite; Hebrew and Jew are the names they employed. Even in the Old Testament the name Hebrew is comparatively rare, being found only thirty-two times. In what we call the Hebrew poetry the word Hebrew never occurs. In the prophetic writings Hebrew is found only in the story of Jonah, i. 9, and in Jer. xxxiv. 9, 14, where the Pentateuch is quoted, comp. Ex. xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12. In the Hebrew history also the name Hebrew is not met with after the accession of David. It is found more frequently in Genesis and Exodus than in all the other books of the Old Testament. The reason is obvious: Hebrew is the name which linked the descendants of Jacob with the nations; Israel the name which separated them from the nations. We cannot wonder that after the legislation of Sinai the former name should fall almost entirely into disuse. In later times, toward the commencement of our era, the use of the name Hebrew, as an ancient and venerable name, was revived. Compare Acts vi. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5.

As to the origin of the name, there is great diversity of opinion. (1.) By some it has been regarded as a patronymic from Eber or Heber. Though we can assign no reason why the descendants of Jacob should bear the name of Eber rather than that of any other of their patriarchal ancestors, yet the close connection of "sons of Eber," Gen. x. 21, with "Eber," in verses 24, 25, of the same chapter, and the use of Eber as a national name in Num. xxiv. 24, give to this opinion a certain measure of probability. (2.) By others it has been regarded as an appellative from the primitive Hebrew word signifying "beyond," denoting either "an immigrant from beyond"—i. e., an immigrant into Canaan from beyond the river Euphrates, compare Josh. xxiv. 2—or an emigrant beyond or across the Euphrates westward from Mesopotamia. In the Chaldee portion of the book of Ezra "beyond the river" occurs frequently as a geographical designation of the region west of the Euphrates, Ezra iv. 10, 11, 20, etc., that region being beyond the river with reference to the seat of empire in the east; and the Samaritan antagonists of the Jews designate themselves "the men beyond the river," no doubt with reference to their compatriots in Babylon, Elam and the other eastern regions from whence they had been translated into Samaria, Ezra iv. 10, 11. For the same reason the Hebrews may have been so called with reference to the cradle of their race east of the Euphrates. It is not necessary, on this hypothesis, to suppose that the name Hebrew originated with the Canaanites. The name may have been assumed by the Hebrews themselves while there remained with them a vivid consciousness that they were strangers in a strange land, and that beyond the Euphrates lay the land to which they were bound by the strongest ties—the land of their fathers and their kindred, Gen. xii. 1; xxiv. 4; xxviii. 2. This view is favored by the Septuagint, in which Gen. xiv. 13 is rendered "Abraham who had crossed the river," and the objections of its antagonists, such as that the Hebrew word is nowhere rendered "beyond the river," do not appear of sufficient importance to outweigh the evidence in its favor.

If required to make choice between the two opinions just stated, our decision would be given in favor of the latter. But it does not appear by any means certain that the two opinions are incompatible, and that the adoption of the one involves the rejection of the other. The name Eber, like Peleg and many other of the early patriarchal names, may have been prophetic, and may include a pre-intimation of the migratory tendencies and life of his posterity.

HEBREW BIBLE. See SCRIPTURES and MANUSCRIPTS.

HEBREW LANGUAGE, the language of the Hebrew people and of the Old Testament Scriptures, with the exception of the few chapters written in Chaldee. See ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, subhead I. In the Bible this language is nowhere designated by the name Hebrew. But this is not surprising when we consider how rarely that name is employed to designate the nation. See HEBREW. In Isa. xix. 18 it is called "the language of Canaan," as distinguished from that of Egypt, and in 2 Ki. xviii. 26, 28, it is called "the Jewish language," as distinguished from the Aramaic. It is in the introduction to the book of Ecclesiasticus that we find the earliest mention of a Hebrew language, but it is by no means certain that the language there so named is the language which we call Hebrew, and not the Chaldee or Syro-Chaldee, which, having superseded the ancient language of the Hebrew people, was therefore called "the Hebrew language," the name which it bears in the New Testament.

But passing from the name, let us examine the language itself, which, by whatever name known in ancient times, has come down to us hallowed by the most sacred and venerable associations—the language of a people who "alone of all Eastern nations were privileged to write for the entire world."

The Hebrew language belongs to the class of languages called Semitic or Shemitic. See ARAMAIC LANGUAGE and SHEMAITIC LANGUAGES. The Sanscrit, Persian, Greek, Latin, with the Germanic and Celtic languages, are the principal members of another large class or group of languages, to which have been affixed the various names of Japhetic, Indo-European, Indo-Germanic and Aryan. This class embraces most of the languages of Europe, including of course the English. The student, therefore, who besides mastering his own language has passed through a course of Greek, Latin, French and German (and few of our students, except with a professional view, extend their linguistic studies farther), has not after all his labor got beyond the limits of the same class of languages to which his mother tongue belongs, and of which it forms one of the most important members. But when he passes to the study of the Hebrew language, he enters a new field, he observes new phenomena, he traces the operation of new laws.

I. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HEBREW LANGUAGE.—Those characteristics which mark the Hebrew in common with the Shemitic languages will be more fully treated of under the family name. Here we shall speak of those features which distinguish it from its sister dialects, and allude also to those which it has in a greater degree than the others.

The first characteristics to be noted are in the sounds of its letters. 1. The learner of the Hebrew tongue would be struck at the very threshold in studying the alphabet with the predominance of guttural sounds. The Hebrew has four, or we may say five, guttural sounds, rising from the slender and scarcely perceptible throat-breathing represented by the first letter of the alphabet, aleph, to the strong rough ghain and chet. To these we must add the Shemitic r, which partakes largely of the guttural character. And these sounds were not sparingly employed; on the contrary, they were in more frequent use than any other class of letters. In the Hebrew dictionary the four gutturals occupy considerably more than a fourth part of the whole volume, the remaining eighteen letters occupying considerably less than three-fourths. This predominance of guttural sounds must have given a very marked character to the ancient Hebrew, as it does still to the modern Arabic.

2. The use of the very strong letters teth, tsade, koph, which may be represented by tt, ss (or ts), kk, in pronouncing which the organ is more compressed and the sound given forth with greater vehemence. These letters, especially the last two, are also in frequent use. When the Greeks borrowed their alphabet from the Phœnicians, they softened or dropped these strong letters, and changed the guttural letters into the vowels a, e, i, o.

3. The Hebrew language does not admit, like the Indo-European, of an accumulation or grouping of consonants around a single vowel sound. In such words as craft, crush, grind, strong, stretch, we find four, five and six consonants clustering around a single vowel. All the Shemitic languages reject such groupings, usually interposing a vowel sound more or less distinct after each consonant. In this respect there is a gradation in the different Shemitic languages, the Arabic being richest in vowels, the Aramean poorest and the Hebrew and Ethiopic holding a middle place. It is only at the end of a word that two consonants may stand together without any intermediate vowel sound; the sole exception is the word shtoyim, "two;" and even at the end of a word various expedients are employed to dispense with a combination which is evidently not in accordance with the genius of the language.

4. The vowels, though thus copiously introduced, are nevertheless kept in strict subordination to the consonants—so much so that it is only in rare and exceptional cases that any word or syllable begins with a vowel. In Hebrew we have no such syllables as ab, ag, ad, in which the initial sound is a pure vowel, but only ba, ga, da, though Hebrew words and syllables beginning with aleph, may be said virtually to begin with a vowel, as the sound of aleph is not perceptible by our ears. If Sir H. Rawlinson is correct, it would appear that the Assyrian language differed from the other Shemitic languages in this particular. In his syllabic alphabet a considerable number of the syllables begin with a vowel.

If we endeavor to calculate the effect of the foregoing peculiarities on the character of the language, we cannot avoid the conclusion that the Shemitic languages are of a more primitive type than the European—much less matured, polished, compacted—the natural utterance of a mind vehement and passionate, impulsive rather than calmly deliberative.

The prevalence of three-letter roots and the structure of the words must be chiefly treated under SHEMITIC LANGUAGES, but there are some features connected with the formation of the words that may be noticed here, as the student of the sacred volume cannot fail to note their effects even in the English version, and they possess sufficient interest to demand remark in the consideration of the Hebrew branch of the Shemitic family of dialects.

The influence of the imagination on the structure of the Shemitic languages, and notably in the Hebrew, is disclosed in the view which they present of nature and of time. To these languages a neuter gender is unknown. All nature, viewed by the Shemitic eye, appears instinct with life. The heavens declare God's glory; the earth showeth his handiwork. The trees of the field clap their hands and sing for joy. This, though the impassioned utterance of the Hebrew poet, expresses a common national feeling which finds embodiment even in the structure of the national language. Of inanimate nature the Hebrew knows nothing; he sees life everywhere. His language, therefore, rejects the neuter gender, and classes all objects, even those which we regard as inanimate, as masculine or feminine, according as they appear to his imagination to be endowed with male or female attributes.

And as his imagination thus endowed the lower forms of nature with living properties, so, on the other hand, under the same influence, he clothed with material and sensible form the abstract, the spiritual, even the divine. In Hebrew the abstract is constantly expressed by the concrete—the mental quality by the bodily member which was regarded as its fittest representative. Thus hand or arm stands for "strength," nostril means also "anger," the shining of the face stands for "favor" and "acceptance," the falling of the face for "displeasure." So also to say often means to "think," to speak with one mouth stands for to "be of the same sentiment." The verb to go is employed to describe mental as well as bodily progress. One's course of life is his "way," "the path of his feet."

And not only in its description of nature, but also in its mode of indicating time, do we observe the same predominant influence. The Shemitic tense system, especially as it appears in Hebrew, is extremely simple and primitive. It is not threefold like ours, distributing time into past, present and future, but twofold. The two so-called tenses or rather states of the verb correspond to the division of nouns into abstract and concrete. The verbal idea is conceived of either in its realization or in its non-realization, whether actual or ideal. That which lies before the mind as realized, whether in the actual past, present or future, the Hebrew describes by means of the so-called preterite tense; that which he conceives of as yet to be realized or in process of realization, whether in the actual past, present or future, he describes by means of the so-called future tense. Hence the use of the future in certain combinations as a historical tense, and of the so-called preterite in certain combinations as a prophetic tense.

The influence of the imagination upon the structure of the language may also be traced in the absence of many grammatical forms which we find in other languages. Much that is definitely expressed in more highly developed languages is left in the Shemitic languages, and especially in the Hebrew, to be caught up by the hearer or reader. In this respect there is an analogy between the language itself and the mode in which it was represented in writing. Of the language as originally written the vowel sounds formed no part. The reader must supply these mentally as he goes along. So with the language itself. It has not a separate and distinct expression for every shade and turn of thought. Much is left to be filled in by the hearer or the reader, and this usually without occasioning any serious inconvenience or difficulty. The Shemitic languages, however, do not all stand on the same level in this respect. In the Syriac, and still more in the Arabic, the expression of thought is usually more complete and precise than in Hebrew, though often for that very reason less animated and impressive. A principal defect in these languages, and especially in the Hebrew, is the fewness of the particles. And also the extreme simplicity of the verbal formation occasions to the student difficulties which can be surmounted only by a very careful study of the principles by which the verb usages are governed.

In this respect the Hebrew occupies a middle position between those languages which consist almost entirely of roots with a very scanty grammatical development and the Indo-European class of languages in which the attempt is made to give definite expression even to the most delicate shades of thought. The Greek, says Paul, seeks after wisdom; he reasons, compares, analyzes. The Jew requires a sign—something to strike the imagination and carry conviction to the heart at once without any formal and lengthened argument. The Greek language, therefore, in its most perfect form, was the offspring of reason and taste, the Hebrew of imagination and intuition. The Shemites have been the quarriers whose great rough blocks the Japhethites have cut and polished and fitted one to another. The former, therefore, are the teachers of the world in religion, the latter in philosophy. This peculiar character of the Shemitic mind is very strongly impressed upon the language.

A national language being an embodiment and picture of the national mind, there is thus thrown around the otherwise laborious and uninteresting study of grammar, even in its earliest stages, an attractive power and value which would not otherwise belong to it. It was the same mind that found expression in the Hebrew language which gave birth, under the influence of divine inspiration, to the sublime revelations of the Old Testament Scriptures. And it would be easy to trace an analogy between these revelations and the language in which they have been conveyed to us. It is curious to find that even the divinest thoughts and names of the Old Testament connect themselves with questions in Hebrew grammar. Thus, when we investigate the nature and use of the Hebrew plural, and discover from a multitude of examples that it is employed not only to denote plurality, but likewise extension, whether in space or time, as in the Hebrew words for "life," "youth," "old age," etc., and also whatever bulks largely before the mind, we are unwittingly led on to one of the most important questions in the criticism of the Old Testament—viz., the origin of the plural form of the divine name Elohim, in our version rendered "God." Or, again, when we study the difficult question of the tenses, and endeavor to determine the exact import and force of each, we speedily discover that the grammatical investigation we are pursuing is one of unspeakable moment, for it involves the right apprehension of that most sacred name of God which the Jew still refuses to take upon his lips, the four-letter name יהוה, Jahveh or Jehovah.

The foregoing remarks on the influence of imagination in the formation of words apply also to the syntax and general construction of phrases and sentences. In this respect the Hebrew language exhibits even a more simple and primitive type than its sister tongues. The simplicity of the Hebrew composition is very obvious even to the reader of the English Bible, or to the scholar who compares the Greek Testament, the style of which is formed on the model of the Old Testament, with the classical Greek writers. We observe at once that there is no such thing as the building up of a lengthened period, consisting of several propositions duly subordinated and compacted so as to form a harmonious and impressive whole. Hebrew composition consists rather of a succession of coordinate propositions, each of which is for the moment uppermost in the view of the speaker or writer, until it is superseded by that which follows. This results at once from the character of the Shemitic mind, which was more remarkable for rapid movements and vivid glances than for large and comprehensive grasp. Such a mind would give forth its thoughts in a rapid succession of independent utterances rather than in sustained and elaborated composition. It is a consequence of the same mental peculiarity that the highest poetry of the Shemitic nations is lyrical.

The Hebrew composition is also extremely pictorial in its character—not the poetry only, but also the prose. In the history the past is not described, it is painted. It is not the ear that hears, it is rather the eye that sees. The course of events is made to pass before the eye, the transactions are all acted over again. The past is not a fixed landscape, but a moving panorama. The reader of the English Bible must have remarked the constant use of the word behold! which indicates that the writer is himself, and wishes to make his reader also, a spectator of the transactions he describes. The use of the tenses in the Hebrew historical writings is specially remarkable. To the young student of Hebrew the constant use of the future tense in the description of the past appears perhaps the most striking peculiarity of the language. But the singular phenomenon admits of an easy explanation. It was because the Hebrew viewed and described the transactions of the past, not as all past and done, but as in actual process and progress of evolution, that he makes such frequent use of the so-called future. In imagination he quits his own point of time and lives over the past. With his reader he sails down the stream of time, and traces with open eye the winding course of history. It is impossible to reproduce in English this peculiarity of the Hebrew Bible.

Further, in writing even of the commonest actions, as that one went, spoke, saw, etc., the Hebrew is not usually satisfied with the simple statement that the thing was done, he must describe also the process of doing. We are so familiar with the style of our English Bibles that we do not at once perceive the pictorial character of such expressions as these, recurring in every page: "he arose and went," "he opened his lips and spake," "he put forth his hand and took," "he lifted up his eyes and saw," "he lifted up his voice and wept," etc. But what we do not consciously perceive we often unconsciously feel; and doubtless it is this painting of events which is the source of part at least of the charm with which the Scripture narrative is invested to all pure and simple minds.

The same effect is also produced by the symbolical way of representing mental states and processes which distinguishes the Hebrew writers. Such expressions as to bend or incline the ear for "to hear attentively," to stiffen the neck for "to be stubborn and rebellious," to uncover the ear for "to reveal," are in frequent use. Even the acts of the divine Mind are depicted in a similar way. And in the study especially of the Old Testament we must keep this carefully in view, lest we should err by giving to a symbolical expression a literal interpretation. Thus when we read, Ex. xxxiii. 11, that "the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend," we must remember that it was a Hebrew who wrote these words, one who was accustomed to depict to himself and others the spiritual under material symbols, and thus we shall be guarded against irreverently attaching to them a meaning which they were never intended to bear. But though such modes of expression are open to misapprehension by us whose minds are formed in so very different a mould, nevertheless, when rightly understood, they have the effect of giving us a more clear and vivid impression of the spiritual ideas which they embody than could be conveyed to us by any other mode of representation or expression.

The simplicity and naturalness of the language further appears in the prominence which is constantly given to the word or words embodying the leading idea in a sentence or period. Thus the noun stands before the adjective, the predicate stands before the subject, unless the latter be specially emphatic, in which case it is not only put first, but may stand by itself as a nominative absolute without any syntactical connection with the rest of the sentence. So, also, the Hebrew historian does not usually inform us that such and such a person said such and such things; he actually, as it were, produces the parties and makes them speak for themselves. And to this device, if it may be so called, the Bible history owes much of its freshness and power of exciting and sustaining the interest of its readers. No other history could be so often read without losing its power to interest and charm.

Lastly, in a primitive language, formed under the predominating influence of imagination and emotion, we may expect to meet with many elliptical expressions and also with many redundancies. Not a little which we think it necessary formally to express in words the Hebrew allowed to be gathered from the context; and, conversely, the Hebrew gave expression to not a little which we omit. For example, nothing is more common in Hebrew than the omission of the verb to be in its various forms; and on the other hand, a very striking characteristic of the Hebrew style is the constant use of the forms vay'hi, v'haya, "and it came to pass," "and it shall come to pass," which, in translating into English, may be altogether omitted without any serious loss. In the Hebrew prose, also, we often meet with traces of that echoing of thought and expression which forms one of the principal characteristics of the poetic style, as in Gen. vi. 22, "And Noah did according to all that God commanded him—so did he;" and similar passages, in which we seem to have two different forms of recording the same fact combined into one, thus:

And Noah did according to all that God commanded him;
According to all that the Lord commanded him, so did he.

II. HISTORY OF THE HEBREW LANGUAGE.—Under this head are embraced three important topics, which we must glance at: 1. The origin of the language; 2. The nature and effects of the various influences which modified the form of the language, so long as it continued a living language; and, 3. The date at which it ceased to be a living language.

1. Origin of the Hebrew Language.—The primeval seat of the Hebrew language, so far as can be gathered from extant historical notices, was Palestine. These notices carry us back to the age of Abraham, but no farther. Whether Hebrew was the language of paradise, as the older critics and theologians fondly imagined, is a question for the solution of which we have no historical data. The Hebrew may have been the primeval language, but there is no decisive historical evidence that it was. So far as history informs us, Palestine was the earliest seat of the Hebrew language; and, what is somewhat surprising, when we do first meet with it, it is not confined to the families of the patriarchs, but appears to be the common language of the numerous tribes by which Palestine was then occupied. There is no doubt that a language substantially the same as the Hebrew was the language of Canaan in the days of the patriarchs. The immigrants from beyond the Euphrates and the tribes among whom they sojourned, and with whom they maintained frequent intercourse, spoke the same language. This fact at once suggests an important question for solution, viz., Was Hebrew the language of Abraham previous to his entrance into Canaan? or did Abraham, after his entrance into Canaan, acquire and transmit to his descendants the language of his adopted country? This is a question to which it is impossible at present to give a decisive reply, in consequence of our ignorance of the earlier history of the Phœnician and Canaanitish tribes and the relations subsisting between them and the Shemitic nations to whom by their language they were so closely allied. Still, we must confess that the balance of probability appears to us to incline to the latter alternative. The evidence is scanty, but not without weight. (1.) In Deut. xxvi. 5 Abraham is called a Syrian or Aramean; from which we naturally conclude that Syriac was his mother-tongue, especially when we find (2), from Gen. xxxi. 47, that Syriac or Chaldee was the language spoken by Laban, the grandson of Nahor, Abraham's brother. Moreover, it has been remarked (3) that in Isa. xix. 18 the Hebrew is actually called the "language of Canaan"; and (4) that the language itself furnishes ered from extant historical notices, was Palestine. These notices carry us back to the age of Abraham, but no farther. Whether Hebrew was the language of paradise, as the older critics and theologians fondly imagined, is a question for the solution of which we have no historical data. The Hebrew may have been the primeval language, but there is no decisive historical evidence that it was.

So far as history informs us, Palestine was the earliest seat of the Hebrew language; and, what is somewhat surprising, when we do first meet with it, it is not confined to the families of the patriarchs, but appears to be the common language of the numerous tribes by which Palestine was then occupied. There is no doubt that a language substantially the same as the Hebrew was the language of Canaan in the days of the patriarchs. The immigrants from beyond the Euphrates and the tribes among whom they sojourned, and with whom they maintained frequent intercourse, spoke the same language. This fact at once suggests an important question for solution, viz., Was Hebrew the language of Abraham previous to his entrance into internal evidence of its Palestinian origin in the word yam, "sea," which means also "the west," and has this meaning in the very earliest documents. And (5) finally, Jewish tradition, whatever weight may be attached to it, points to the same conclusion.

If we inquire further how it was that the Canaanites, of the race of Ham, spoke a language so closely allied to the languages spoken by the principal members of the Shemitic family of nations, we shall soon discover that the solution of this difficulty is impossible with our present means of information; it lies beyond the historic period. It may be that long before the migration of Abraham a Shemitic race occupied Palestine, and that, as Abraham adopted the language of the Canaanites, so the Canaanites themselves had in like manner adopted the language of that earlier race whom they gradually dispossessed, and eventually extirpated or absorbed. However this may be, leaving speculation for fact, is it not possible to discover a wise purpose in the selection of the language of Tyre and Sidon—the great commercial cities of antiquity—as the language in which was to be embodied the most wonderful revelation of himself and of his law which God made to the ancient world? When we remember the constant intercourse which was maintained by the Phœnicians with the most distant regions both of the East and of the West, it is impossible to doubt that the sacred books of the Hebrews, written in a language almost identical with the Phœnician, must have exercised a more important influence on the Gentile world than is usually acknowledged.

Of course the Canaanitish language, when adopted by the Hebrews, did not remain unchanged. Having become the instrument of the Hebrew mind, and being employed in the expression of new and very peculiar ideas, it must have been modified considerably thereby. How far may yet be ascertained, should accident or the zeal of some explorer bring to light the more ancient monuments of the Phœnician nation which may still have survived the entombment of centuries.

2. Influences modifying the Form of the Hebrew Language and the Style of the Hebrew Writings.—These influences are (1) time, (2) place, (3) the individual peculiarities of the Hebrew writers, and (4) the character and subject-matter of their compositions. Only the first two of these will we consider in the present article; the others belong rather to the articles on the respective books.

(1.) Time.—The extant classical Hebrew writings embrace a period of more than a thousand years, from the era of Moses to the date of the composition of the books of Chronicles, which stand last in the Hebrew Bible; and we naturally might expect that the language of the earlier books should differ considerably from that of the later. Nay, we might expect to be able to trace a gradual change in the form of the language, becoming more and more decided as century followed century and new influences were brought to bear upon it. This expectation, however, is not realized. There is, indeed, to be observed a very decided difference in language and style between the earliest and the very latest Hebrew writings, but this difference was the result, not of a gradual process of change, extending over centuries, but of a very sudden and rapid revolution. Hence the extant Hebrew writings, when classified with respect to language, have usually been arranged in two great divisions, the former including those of a date earlier than the Babylonish captivity, the latter including those of a subsequent date. In passing from the book of Genesis to the books of Samuel and Kings we do not mark any very striking difference in the language. Doubtless there is a difference, but not such a difference as we might expect to find in writings separated from one another in date by so considerable a period; not such a difference as we do actually find when we take up an English author of the seventeenth century, or even later, and compare his language with the English of our own day. Here, then, is a very remarkable phenomenon which requires explanation. Now this explanation is not to be found in the rejection of the traditional belief as to the age and authorship of the Pentateuch. Even those critics who endeavor to bring down the Pentateuch, as a whole, to a comparatively late date, allow that a portion at least of its contents is to be assigned to the age of Moses; and thus, unless it can be shown that this most ancient portion bears in its language and style the stamp of high antiquity, and is distinguished in a very marked manner from the other portions of the Pentateuch (which has not been shown), the phenomenon still remains unexplained. But, indeed, the phenomenon is by no means unexampled. It is well known that the written Arabic of the present day does not differ greatly from that of the first centuries after Mohammed. It is probable that the language was, as it were, stereotyped by becoming the language of books held in the highest esteem and reverence, diligently studied by the learned, frequently committed to memory and adopted as a model of style by succeeding writers. Now, may not the sacred writings of the Mosaic age have had a similar influence on the written Hebrew of the following ages, which continued undisturbed till the captivity, or even later? We know how greatly the translations of the Bible into English and German have affected the language and literature of England and Germany ever since they were given to the world. But among a people like the ancient Hebrews, living to a certain extent apart from other nations, with a literature of no great extent and a learned class specially engaged in the study and transcription of the sacred writings, we may well suppose that the influence of these writings upon the form of the national language must have been much more decided and permanent. The learned men would naturally adopt in their compositions the language of the books which had been their study from youth, and large portions of which they were probably able to repeat from memory. Thus the language of these old books, though it might differ in some respects from that spoken by the common people, would naturally become the language of the learned and of books, especially of books on sacred subjects, such as have alone come down to us from ancient Israel. We shall only further observe that, in explanation of the fact under discussion, appeal has also been made (a) to the permanence of Eastern customs, and (b) to the simple structure of the Hebrew language, which rendered it less liable to change than other more largely-developed languages. It has also been remarked that some of the peculiarities of the early writings may be concealed from view by the uniformity of the system of punctuation adopted and applied to the Scriptures by the Hebrew grammarians.

The writings which belong to the second age—that subsequent to the Babylonish captivity—differ very considerably from those which belong to the first, the influence of the Chaldee language acquired by the Jewish exiles in the land of their captivity having gradually corrupted the national tongue. The historical books belonging to this age are the books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah and Esther. In the prophets who prophesied during and after the captivity, with the exception of Daniel, the Chaldee impress is by no means so strong as we might anticipate, they having evidently formed their style on that of the older prophets. It is important, however, to observe that the presence of what appeared to be a Chaldaism is not always the indication of a later age. Chaldee words and forms occasionally appear even in the most ancient Hebrew compositions, especially the poetical, the poet delighting in archaic and rare words, and substituting these for the more usual and commonplace. But between the Chaldaic archaisms and the Chaldaisms of the later Scriptures there is this marked distinction—that the former are only occasional and lie scattered on the surface, the latter are frequent and give a peculiar color and character to the whole language.

A still more corrupt form of the language appears in the Mishna and other later Jewish writings in which the foreign element is much more decided and prominent.

2. Place.—Under this head is embraced the question whether the Hebrew language, as spoken by the several tribes of Israel, was uniform, or did it branch out into various dialects corresponding to the leading divisions of the nation? In attempting to answer this question there is no direct historical testimony of which we can avail ourselves. From Neh. xiii. 23, 24, we learn nothing more than that the language of Ashdod differed from that of the Jews after their return from captivity, which is only what we might have anticipated; and the notices in Jud. xii. 6 and xviii. 3, which are more to the purpose, refer rather to a difference in pronunciation than in the form of the language. Notwithstanding, it seems probable (a) that the language of the trans-Jordanic tribes was in course of time modified to a greater or less extent by the close contact of these tribes with the Syrians of the north and the Arab tribes of the great eastern desert; and (b) that a similar dialectic difference would be gradually developed in the language of Ephraim and the other northern tribes to the west of the Jordan, especially after the political separation of these tribes from the tribe of Judah and the family of David. Possibly in the Jewish language of 2 Ki. xviii. 28 we may discover the trace of some such difference of dialect, as we can scarcely suppose the name Jewish to have been introduced in the very brief period which intervened between the taking of Samaria and the transaction in the record of which it occurs; and if in use before the taking of Samaria and the captivity of the ten tribes, it must have been restricted to the form of the Hebrew language prevailing in Judea, which, being thus distinguished in name from the language of the northern tribes, was probably distinguished in other respects also. It is not improbable that some of the linguistic peculiarities of the separate books of Scripture are to be accounted for on this hypothesis.

3. When the Hebrew language ceased to be a living language.—The Jewish tradition is to the effect that the Hebrew language ceased to be spoken by the body of the people during their captivity in Babylon, and this is the opinion of many Christian scholars also. There can be no doubt that the Hebrew was never spoken in its purity after the return from captivity, but that it ceased altogether to be the language of the people after that period, and was retained only as the language of books and of the learned, has not been established. The principal evidence relied on by those who hold this opinion is derived from Neh. vii. 8: "So they read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading." "Distinctly," m'phorash—i. e., says Hengstenberg, "with the addition of a translation." But though this gloss has some support in Jewish tradition, it is at variance both with Hebrew and with Chaldee usage. M'phorash means "made clear" or "distinct," as is evident from Num. xv. 34, and vayikr'u m'phorash can scarcely be otherwise rendered than "they read distinctly." This indeed is evident from the context; for if we should render, with Hengstenberg, "they read with the addition of a translation," to what purpose the clause which follows, "and gave the sense," etc.? At the same time, though this passage does not furnish sufficient evidence to prove that, in the time of Nehemiah, Hebrew had ceased to be the language of every-day life, it does seem to point to the conclusion that at that time it had considerably degenerated from its ancient purity, so that the common people had some difficulty in understanding the language of their ancient sacred books.

At what time Chaldee became the dominant element in the national language it is impossible to determine. All political influences favored its ascendancy, and with these concurred the influence of that large portion of the nation still resident in the East, and maintaining constant intercourse with a Chaldee-speaking population. To these influences we cannot wonder that the Hebrew, notwithstanding the sacred associations connected with it, in time succumbed. On the coins of the Maccabees, indeed, the ancient language still appears; but we cannot conclude from this circumstance that it maintained its position as a living language down to the Maccabæan period. The fragments of the popular language which we find in the New Testament are all Aramæan, and ever since the Hebrew has been preserved and cultivated as the language of the learned and of books, and not of common life.

III. THE WRITTEN HEBREW.—The Shemitic nations have been the teachers of the world in religion; by their development of the alphabet they may likewise lay claim to the honor of having laid the foundation of the world's literature.

The Hebrew alphabet has no signs for the pure vowel sounds. All the letters are consonants; some, however, are so weak as easily to pass into vowels, and these letters we accordingly find in use, especially in the later Scriptures, as vowel marks.

Two interesting questions here present themselves: 1. As to the age and origin of the characters or letters which appear in all extant Hebrew MSS. and in our printed Hebrew Bibles, and 2. As to the origin and authority of the punctuation by which the vowel sounds are indicated.

1. On the former of these questions there are two conclusions which may be relied on as certain. (1.) That the present square characters were not in use among the Jews previous to the Babylonish captivity. The Jewish tradition is that they were introduced or reintroduced by Ezra. (2.) That the square characters have been in use since the beginning of our era. But between these two limits several centuries intervene; is it not possible to approximate more closely to the date of their introduction? The only fact to which appeal can be made, with this view, is this—that on the coins of the Maccabees the square characters do not appear; but whether we are entitled to conclude from this that these characters had not then come into use in Judæa is very doubtful. The probability is that the introduction of these characters, called by the Jewish doctors Assyrian, and generally admitted to be of Aramæan origin, had some connection with the introduction of the Aramaic language, and that the change from the ancient written characters, like that from the ancient language, was not accomplished at once, but gradually. It is possible that in the intensity of national feeling awakened during the Maccabæan struggle there was a reaction in favor of the ancient language and writing. The characters in use before the Babylonish exile have been preserved by the Samaritans even to the present day without material change.

2. As to the origin and authority of the punctuation, the controversy which raged so fiercely in the seventeenth century may be said now to have ceased, and the views of Ludovicus Cappellus, from the adoption of which the Buxtorfs anticipated the most dangerous consequences ("pessimas et periculosas consequentias"), now meet with almost universal acquiescence. The two following conclusions may now be regarded as established: (1.) That the present punctuation did not form an original part of the inspired record, but was introduced by the Jewish doctors long after that record had been closed, for the purpose of preserving, so far as possible, the true pronunciation of the language; and (2.) That the present pointed text, notwithstanding its comparatively recent date, presents us with the closest possible approximation to the language which the sacred writers actually used. It would be foreign to the scope of this Encyclopedia to go over the evidence by which these positions are established. Those who wish to do so will find the fullest information in the great work of Ludovicus Cappellus, entitled "Arcanum Punctuationis Revelatum," with the reply of the younger Buxtorf.

In concluding this article, we cannot refrain from expressing our surprise that so few study the Hebrew language. It is replete with beauty, and so intensely interesting in its peculiarities, to say nothing of its antiquity or its sacred associations, that none who pursue it far enough to fathom its characteristics will weary of it or give over the study willingly, until they shall have mastered it.

HEBRON, NEAR VIEW, ON APPROACHING FROM THE NORTH-EAST.

HEBREWS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. By whom, to whom and in what language was it written? Was the writer specifically inspired by the Holy Ghost in its composition, and is it thus entitled to the reverence and authority of an inspired book? These questions have received the most careful study, the most searching investigation, the most learned discussion, of theologians of the highest rank in the Church. The question of its authorship is still undecided, and possibly ever will be, although volumes of all sizes and innumerable have been and will continue to be devoted to its discussion. The questions to whom and in what language have been settled to the satisfaction of nearly all critics, while that of its inspiration is no longer an open one, all branches of the Church having declared in the affirmative. All that we feel called upon to offer here is a statement of the facts established in the discussion, with a brief outline of the argument by which the conclusions have been reached.

I. ITS AUTHORSHIP.—Among those who deny or question the prevailing belief that the apostle Paul was the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, Clemens Romanus, Titus, Luke, Mark, Silvanus, Barnabas, Aquila and Apollos have their respective advocates; the last mentioned, originally suggested by Luther, seems at present to be the favorite. Barnabas may boast the sole authority of Tertullian, but the author of the epistle which goes under his name could by no possibility have produced a work like that to the Hebrews. Apollos, from his birth, culture and Biblical knowledge, Acts xviii. 24, may be supposed capable of such an effort, but his claims rest upon pure conjecture; not a particle of real testimony has been adduced in his favor. On the other hand, while the opponents of the Pauline authorship are not without apparently weighty arguments, the testimony in favor of the belief that he was the author is strong, if not convincing. Let us glance first at the internal and then at the external evidences.

1. Internal Evidences.—So far as the Epistle itself betrays its author, the evidence on either side is nearly balanced. The closing verses agree well with the supposition that St. Paul wrote the Epistle at the close of his first captivity at Rome. The author seems deprived of liberty, ch. xiii. 19; he hopes to be speedily restored to it; he mentions Timothy as his companion and (apparently) sometime fellow-prisoner; he sends salutations from "them of Italy," vers. 23, 24; compare Phil. ii. 19, 25; Philem. 22. Whether with some we take the word, ver. 23, to signify "sent on a journey," or, with the majority of critics, "freed from captivity," is immaterial; either event may have happened to Timothy. That no mention is found in the book of Acts of such a captivity of Timothy does not prove that it may not have occurred. To whom but the great apostle do these various circumstances point? No one else so likely meets us in the inspired history. Is it probable that, during Paul's lifetime, Timothy would be found in such close connection with any other teacher? The improbability of this has led to the ungrounded hypothesis that the Timothy here mentioned must be a different person from the well-known fellow-laborer of the apostle.

On the other hand, from early times ch. ii. 3 has been a stumbling-block in the way of those who suppose Paul to have been the author. Nothing is more characteristic of the apostle than his references to the direct revelation of Christ as the source of his mission and his Christian knowledge, see Gal. i. 1, 11, 16; 2 Cor. ii. 5, yet here the writer seems to imply that he had been instructed "by those who heard" the Lord. Euthalius, Theophylact and Eucumenius in ancient times, Luther and Calvin in more modern, have—especially the two Reformers—considered this as most decisive against the claims of Paul. Still, it may be replied that under the term "us" the writer does not intend to include himself, or not necessarily so, but employs the rhetorical figure, as in the passage, "neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed," 1 Cor. x. 8, and in numerous other places, where the writer obviously has in his eye rather those to whom he writes than himself.

The sentiments of the Epistle are entirely such as we should expect from the apostle of the Gentiles. This is conceded by the strongest opponents of the Pauline authorship. Origen pronounces the thoughts to be those of Paul, whatever peculiarities he discovers in the style. The following are some of the points of resemblance in the matter of doctrine between the acknowledged epistles of Paul and that to the Hebrews: 1. The representation of Christ as the image of God, and the actual agent in the creation and upholding of the universe, Heb. i. 2, 3; comp. Col. i. 15-17; 2 Cor. iv. 4. 2. The humiliation of Christ, and his consequent exaltation, Heb. ii. 4-9; comp. Phil. ii. 8, 9. 3. Christ has abolished death and its consequences, Heb. ii. 14, 15; comp. 1 Cor. xv. 26, 54. 4. The death of Christ is a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the world, and this sacrifice is not to be repeated, Heb. ix. 26, 28; comp. Rom. vi. 9, 10. 5. Christ is the one Mediator between God and man—our great "High-priest," Heb. ix. 10; comp. Eph. ii. 18; Rom. viii. 34. 6. Christ reigns at the right hand of God until all his enemies be subdued, Heb. x. 12, 13; comp. 1 Cor. xv. 25. 7. He will come again to judgment, Heb. x. 27, 28; comp. 2 Cor. v. 10; 1 Thess. iv. 16-18. 8. The relation of the old to the new dispensation is that of body to spirit, shadow to substance, Heb. vii. 15-19; ix. 9-14; viii. 8-13; comp. Gal. iii. 24-26; iv. 1-6. 9. The old dispensation, having fulfilled its purpose, awaits its abolition, Heb. viii. 13; comp. 2 Cor. iii. 13. Here certainly is a most remarkable coincidence of favorite topics, and such as exists in its integrity between no other writers of the New Testament. At the same time, some points upon which St. Paul is wont to enlarge are not found in this Epistle; such are, the resurrection of Christ, with its place and import in the Christian scheme, and the free admission of the Gentiles to the privileges of the gospel. Others are presented under a somewhat different aspect: the idea of the Mediator as a High-priest is peculiar to the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the "faith" of the latter seems to have a more extended signification than is usual with St. Paul, see Heb. xi. Still, these discrepancies weigh but little against the far more numerous points of agreement above mentioned.

The language and style were the original grounds of the doubts entertained by some of the early Fathers, and to this day they present the most formidable difficulties to the Biblical student. Origen was the first to remark how much purer the Greek of this Epistle is than that of the rest of the New Testament; the only portion, indeed, which admits of comparison with it is the latter half of the Acts of the Apostles. At the same time Hebraisms, both in single words and in grammatical construction, occur in sufficient numbers to prove that the author was a Jew, but not so frequently as to lead us to reverse the judgment of Origen. As regards peculiar expressions which some writers have collected from the Epistle, we assign little weight to this kind of argument. Mechanical comparisons are foreign from the spirit of philosophic criticism. Before we can estimate the importance of peculiar expressions we must examine whether a great part of them be not owing to peculiar thoughts which give them birth. The unusual expressions, undoubtedly to be found in the Epistle, are to be explained by the style which the writer adopts, viz., the rhetorical; and here lies the real difficulty. If the Epistle be Paul's, it must be admitted that it is the only one in which he has adopted this style, with its peculiarities; a dialectic tone pervades all his others. The rhetorical character of the Epistle appears in the choice of dignified and poetical expressions; in the harmonious flow of the sentences; in the freer use of the Greek participle; and in the grammatical finish of the sentences; whereas, in St. Paul's acknowledged epistles, breaks in the sequence are very frequent.

In addition to the general character of the style of this Epistle, critics have remarked minor peculiarities, which, some of them claim, distinguish this from the epistles acknowledged to be Paul's. Whereas Paul, in his citations from the Old Testament, does not hesitate to abandon the Septuagint version where it does not correctly represent the sense of the Hebrew, the writer of this Epistle adheres most closely to that version, even where it is manifestly incorrect, of which the most notable example, perhaps, is the citation in ch. x. 1-5, from Ps. xl., where, instead of "mine ears hast thou opened," the writer follows the Greek, "a body hast thou prepared me." Again, Paul, in quoting the Septuagint, usually follows the readings of the Vatican MS., whereas in the Epistle to the Hebrews those of the "Cod. Alex." seem to have been familiar to the writer. There is a difference, too, in the mode of introducing quotations, St. Paul commonly prefacing them with the formula "as it is written," or "as the Scripture saith," or "as David says," while in this Epistle the Holy Spirit is for the most part introduced as speaking, see chap. i. 6-8; iv. 4, 7; x. 30.

2. External Evidence.—Under this head we must first allude to the sole passage of Scripture, outside of the Epistle itself, which has been cited as bearing upon this question.

St. Peter, in his Second Epistle, iii. 15, speaks of what "our beloved brother Paul wrote" concerning certain things. Some have connected this with Heb. x. 25, and from the supposed connection have sought to prove at once the authorship and canonicity of this Epistle. But the allusion is not sufficiently clear to warrant dependence upon it as proof.

Some critics have also with more judgment pointed to the superscription, "The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews." Now, while this by itself would not establish the claim that Paul did write the Epistle, it cannot be denied great weight as showing that very shortly after the actual day of the apostles he was recognized as the author, and its force is strengthened when we find that it appears on every manuscript extant, with a single exception.

But we pass to the testimony of the early Church, and here the case may be thus stated: All ancient writers who ascribe the Epistle to St. Paul hold it to be canonical, but not all who place it among the acknowledged books of Scripture deem it a work of the apostle, or, at any rate, his own composition. Let us, then, briefly cite the testimony of the early Fathers of the Church. Right at the threshold of the Church there meets us in the first century a witness of unquestioned authority, Clement of Rome, probably the "fellow-laborer" of whom St. Paul makes mention in Phil. iv. 3. Clement's First Epistle to the Corinthians, the latest date assigned to which is A. D. 96, is one of the most valuable and important relics of that age; at one time it possessed almost canonical authority. Now, there is no writing of the canon which, in thought and expression, Clement has so entirely incorporated in his own epistle as the Epistle to the Hebrews. This was a subject of remark in ancient times. "Clement," writes Eusebius, "transfers into his first epistle many of the ideas of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and even adopts several of its expressions." It is true that he does not quote the Epistle as a work of St. Paul's; it is not his custom to name the writers of the books from which he quotes. His epistle is full of citations from Paul's epistles, yet he only once alludes to him by name—viz., in connection with a passage from 1 Cor. i. 15. Now, Clement cites this Epistle exactly as he does the other epistles of Paul, and clearly believed the writer to have been Paul.

Allusions to this Epistle are only faintly traceable in the other apostolical Fathers, and hence we can obtain little light here as to the authorship.

The Fathers of the Alexandrian Church are uniformly in favor of the Pauline authorship. Pantænus (A. D. 180), Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen entertain no doubt of Paul's being directly or remotely the author. Nevertheless, these Fathers, particularly the last named, notice, as differing from Paul's usual manner, the anonymous character of the Epistle and its style. The solution of Pantænus is that Paul does not describe himself to the Hebrews as an apostle, partly out of reverence to our Lord, the true "minister of the circumcision," and partly because he was peculiarly the apostle of the Gentiles: that of Clement, that the Epistle was originally written in Hebrew, and afterwards translated by Luke, whence the similarity between its style and that of the book of Acts. Clement further argues that Paul did not affix his name to it, because, he being obnoxious to the Hebrews, his name might prejudice their minds. Origen speaks more fully. His opinion is that the language of the Epistle belongs to some one expounding the apostle's sentiments. "If any Church, therefore, hold it to be a production of Paul, let it on this account receive commendation, for not without reason have the ancients handed it down as an epistle of Paul. Who the amanuensis was God knows; some say Luke, others Clement." And as Origen was born A. D. 185, his "ancients" must have been the contemporaries or immediate successors of the apostles. In another remarkable passage, Origen observes that, while the matter of the Epistle is in every respect worthy of the apostle Paul, the style differs from that of his acknowledged epistles, whence he infers that possibly the ideas belong to Paul, though some friend or fellow-laborer, as Clement of Rome or Luke, actually composed it. After Origen, the Alexandrian Church exhibits no difference of opinion on this point.

Of the other branches of the Eastern Church the testimony is more scanty until we arrive at Eusebius. Lardner, however, discovers a probable allusion to Heb. xii. 1 in Methodius (A. D. 290), bishop of Olympus, in Lycia, involving the apostolical authorship of the Epistle. And an explicit testimony to this effect exists in the address of the synod assembled at Antioch to Paul of Samosata, in which Heb. xi. 26 is quoted as from the same hand as 1 Cor. x. 4. Eusebius, our principal authority upon questions of this kind, speaks of the "fourteen epistles of Paul as well known to all;" though at the same time he mentions the scruples which individuals entertained respecting that to the Hebrews. From the remarks occurring in various parts of his works we gather that, even in the East, there were persons (not churches or parties) who doubted whether the Epistle were Paul's, and who, in support of their hesitation, appealed to the Roman Church, but that his own opinion was decisive in favor of the common tradition: "fourteen epistles are clearly and certainly Paul's." It is to be remarked that those who entertained doubts upon the point were compelled to fortify themselves by the judgment of the Roman Church, evidently in the lack of an Oriental tradition in their favor. Writers subsequent to Eusebius need not to be quoted; they all ascribe the Epistle to Paul.

In the Western Church, however, the Epistle was for a time rejected from the canon, and this rejection necessarily involved a denial of its apostolic origin. Irenæus declared the Epistle not to be one of Paul's; and it is very probable that the unfavorable judgment of this influential Father was the primary source of the doubts entertained for a long time by the Latins. Tertullian ascribed the Epistle to Barnabas. Jerome and Augustine revolutionized the sentiment of the Western Church both as to the canonicity and the authorship. The former says most emphatically in his epistle to Dardanus, "This must be said to our communion (the Latins), that the Epistle to the Hebrews is received as an Epistle of St. Paul, not only by the churches of the East, but by all the Greek writers, though most think it the work of Clement or Barnabas." In its actual writing Jerome must mean; yet even in this sense it is difficult to explain the term plerique which he uses. Augustine is equally decided. In a well-known passage, he enumerates the canonical books, and among those of the New Testament reckons fourteen epistles of Paul. The fifth Carthaginian synod (A. D. 419), at which Augustine was present, in its canon formally adopts this number, and thenceforward there seems to have been no difference of opinion upon the subject. How far the decision of this synod may have influenced the Roman Church is uncertain, but in an epistle of Innocent I., A. D. 405, to Exsuperius, bishop of Toulouse, fourteen epistles are ascribed to St. Paul, from which it may be inferred that either the conclusions of the African synods or the authority of Jerome and Augustine had materially influenced opinion in the metropolis of Christendom. Traces of the old doubts are found as late as the seventh century, but after that time they disappear.

The question, thus set at rest, slumbered until the dawn of the Reformation, when a Romish cardinal was the first to revive it. He not only disputed the received opinion as to the authorship of the Epistle, but pronounced it unworthy of an apostle; so that he was not unreasonably charged with disparaging its canonicity. In the former, but not in the latter, particular he was followed by Erasmus. All discussion, however, on the part of Romish theologians was speedily cut short by the decisions of the Council of Trent; and since that time the question of canonicity has been discussed not with a view of disputing it, but simply as an interesting theme of Biblical criticism, while the authorship has been the subject of question, chiefly in some portions of the Protestant communions.

Thus, then, the matter stands. Whatever ecclesiastical tradition (the period of the Roman skepticism excepted) exists upon the subject is in favor of the Pauline authorship; while internal evidence seems to militate against that hypothesis, or at least is not clearly in its favor. We cannot hesitate in permitting the former to outweigh the latter. It seems to us that the very difficulties which the style, phraseology, etc., of the Epistle present enhance the force of the external testimony; for nothing, surely, but well-known and thoroughly authentic testimony could have maintained itself against these difficulties.

Thus much may at least be affirmed—that if St. Paul be not the author it must ever remain a problem who was. The theories of those who advocate the claims of others appear to us but theories unsupported by substantial evidence. To conclude on this point, we hold that the subject is one on which men may safely differ; it is really a matter books," and those "of inferior authority." The latter class comprised the Epistle to the Hebrews, those of James and Jude and the Apocalypse; these therefore he places after the rest. Following his lead, the Lutheran Church long held this view, or at least a considerable number of its writers advocated it, while some of them went so far as to call those books "apocryphal" in the sense in which Jerome speaks of apocryphal books of the Old Testament, as fit "for example of life," but not for the "establishing of doctrine." About the middle of the seventeenth century this mode of speaking begins to be discouraged. John Gerhard (1625) disapproves of the term apocryphal, as applied to these books, and properly observes that the doubts of the early Church related rather to the human composer (auctor secundarius) than to their canonical authority, and that with the same justice the book of Judges, the author of which is unknown, might be termed apocryphal. He, therefore, for his part, prefers the title "Deutero-canonici"—a word, we cannot but think, of ill sound. He of interest, but of no vital importance, who was the human author, so long as the divine Author is recognized—as Beza strongly puts it, "What avails it to dispute concerning the name of the author, which he himself wished concealed? Let it suffice that the Epistle was truly dictated by the Holy Spirit."

And this brings us to a brief examination of a far more important matter—the one vital question which for centuries agitated the Church, but has been fully and conclusively set at rest; we allude to—

II. ITS CANONICITY.—As before intimated, this subject has been satisfactorily settled. The whole Church receives the Epistle as inspired, and consequently acknowledges its right to a place in the sacred canon. But the subject still possesses great interest to Bible students as a historical matter of the first importance. Those who have no question as to the inspiration and canonicity of a book yet naturally desire to know the grounds upon which it holds its rank. We shall endeavor concisely to state these, but first we must allude to a singular theory, advanced first by the great Luther. In his edition of the New Testament, Luther divided the books into two classes, "the genuine principal did not succeed in establishing his new term, and before the close of the century all our present books came to be received by the Lutheran Church as of equal authority. The position was never worthy of much weight. For either a book is canonical or it is not; and if canonical, it cannot be inferior in rank or authority. We do not subordinate the Gospels of St. Mark or St. Luke to those of St. Matthew or St. John because the writers of the former were not apostles, nor the Epistle to the Hebrews to that of the Romans merely because the author was Luke or Apollos, should either supposition be the true one. In human compositions the authorship is an important element in determining their value or weight, but in an inspired book it matters little who is the chosen writer. The Holy Spirit did not confine himself to apostles in selecting the organs of his special inspiration, nor did he intimate a discrimination in the degree of his guidance.

But to come to the main question. We shall confine ourselves to the external evidences, for the internal speak for themselves. Origen declared the work to be worthy of an apostle, but it is more—not only as a whole, but in its integral parts, it compares favorably with any of the inspired books, and its sublime teachings and tone throughout clearly indicate the divine Author. After what we have said, under the head of authorship, of the estimate of this Epistle clearly held by Clement of Rome, it is needless to quote him here as an authority in favor of its canonicity. The simple fact there mentioned of his citing it so largely shows that he had no question of its inspiration. There is no fact more remarkable than the abstinence of the early Christian writers from the use of the Christian apocryphal writings; even those books the apostolical origin of which they doubted are seldom quoted by them. Speaking of the Epistle of James, Eusebius, after mentioning that by some it was thought spurious, adds, "Not many, at least, of the ancients quote it;" the fact being, in his opinion, evidence of the suspicion which they entertained respecting it. If so ancient and conspicuous a writer as Clement intersperses his principal work with copious extracts from this Epistle, in what light must he have regarded it? We may go further, and claim that since Clement writes in the name of the Roman Church, he furnishes indirect proof of the estimation in which, at that early period, the Epistle was held by that important Christian community. We have remarked that but faint allusions to this Epistle are found in the apostolical Fathers, but these all clearly indicate their acceptance of it. Justin Martyr recognizes its authority, while Irenæus and Hippolytus denied the Pauline authorship, but not its inspiration.

It is not necessary to allude by name to the Fathers of the Alexandrian Church and of the Eastern Church generally, as throughout the whole Eastern Church the Epistle was received as canonical. It is found in the Peshito version, and even in the old Latin (A. D. 170), though probably in the latter it was inserted as an epistle of Barnabas, from the doubts entertained respecting its author. All the great writers of the Alexandrian school, commencing with its founder, Pantænus, and comprising the distinguished names of Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Dionysius and Alexander, place it upon the same level as the other writings of the inspired volume. Some of them, indeed, among whom Origen is the principal, take notice of the difficulties which the Pauline authorship involves; still, there is not a hint of its inferiority, on that account, to the other books of Scripture. In all the catalogues of the Alexandrian writers the Epistle occupies a place. To state the facts with regard to the East in a single sentence—throughout the East, including Egypt, a firm, historical tradition existed from the first in favor of the canonicity of the Epistle, though here and there particular persons seem to have called it in question. When, however, we turn to the West, a very different state of things is found to prevail. It cannot be denied that for a considerable period the Western Church did not share the conviction of the Eastern. The chain of tradition so clearly commenced by Clement was interrupted for several centuries. Various hypotheses have been proposed to account for the fact, but none of them very satisfactory. The most plausible is that it was the opposition of the Roman Church to the Montanists, and their followers the Novatians, that first led the writers of that communion to depreciate the authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews. These sectaries, it appears, eagerly availed themselves of the passage, Heb. vi. 4-6, in support of their severe treatment of the lapses. Their opponents, unable to refute their interpretation of the passage, adopted, it is conceived, the hazardous expedient of undermining the canonicity of the book in which it occurs. But however ingenious this theory may be, it is hardly credible that such an extreme measure as throwing doubts upon an acknowledged book of Scripture would for any purpose be resorted to by the writers of an orthodox communion. In the absence of any better solution we may suppose that after the destruction of Jerusalem, the intercourse between the Latin churches and those of the East becoming more or less interrupted, the traditions of the latter passed out of the recollection of the former, or had some difficulty in propagating themselves beyond their original seat. However it may be accounted for, the fact remains. Irenæus, in none of his extant remains, cites this Epistle, though Eusebius tells us that he does so freely in a work, since lost, entitled "Book of Remarkable Discourses." Tertullian (A. D. 218), who may be regarded as the representative of ecclesiastical opinion in proconsular Africa, only once alludes to the Epistle to the Hebrews, and then ascribes it to Barnabas, but casts no doubt on its canonicity. From this time the Epistle was generally rejected in the Roman Church until about the middle of the fourth century, when it began to recover credit with the Latin writers. Hilary (A. D. 368), Ambrose, Philastrius, Gaudentius and others cite it as Scripture. The Latin Church seems to have been led finally to abandon its scruples by the weighty authority of its great leaders, Jerome and Augustine. The former distinctly asserts the Pauline authorship, as we have seen, and adds, "Furthermore, that it is of no consequence who the author was, since the book is daily read in the churches. But if the Latins do not reckon it among the canonical Scriptures, the Greeks, on the other hand, reject the Apocalypse of St. John. We nevertheless receive both, following not modern custom, but the authority of the old writers, who cite both as canonical books." Accordingly, he makes frequent use of it. Augustine ably supports the same position. From this time forward there were few in the Latin Church who questioned the canonicity of this Epistle. All traces of doubt ceased in the seventh century, and the Epistle appears to have been received without cavil in the whole Church till Cardinal Cajetan revived the opposition to it about the dawn of the Reformation. The Council of Trent, however, settled the question finally for the Roman Church by declaring it a canonical book.

The Reformed Churches have never questioned the canonicity of the Epistle, though Luther, followed by some others of the German critics, has, as we have seen, attempted to lower its status, or depreciate its authority.

At the present time all Christian Churches are unanimous in their reception of this Epistle on an equal footing with the other books of the canon.

ORIGINAL LANGUAGE.—In order to account for the difference of style between this and the acknowledged Epistles of Paul, several ancient writers, holding that it is to be ascribed to the apostle, supposed that it was originally written in Aramaic and translated into Greek. But no historical tradition exists in favor of this opinion, and it is contradicted by the whole structure of the Epistle. The comparative purity of the Greek (being so pure that its purity has been a strong ground of denying the Pauline authorship), the periodic style, so foreign from the Hebrew and its dialects, the use of Greek expressions which can only be rendered in Hebrew by a periphrasis, the frequent paronomasia, ch. vi. 8; xiii. 14, and the constant use of the Septuagint version,—all prove that our present text is the original one. Besides, no trace of any other exists.

There is scarcely any considerable dissent now from the belief that the Greek is the original.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—The Epistle itself enables us to place a limit of time later than which it cannot have been written. The temple and the temple services were manifestly in existence; the Epistle therefore must have been composed before A. D. 70, the year of the final destruction of the city. If it be admitted to be a production of Paul, the passages at the close agree best with the supposition that it was written during or shortly after the close of his first captivity at Rome; if the latter, from some place in Italy. The particular place remains an unsolved problem, and this whether Paul, or Apollos, or another, be the author.

THE PERSONS TO WHOM THE EPISTLE WAS ADDRESSED.—Who these were seems very plain. The whole structure of the Epistle shows that it was addressed to Christians of Jewish descent, and, moreover, to those of a certain locality, not, like the Epistles of Peter and James, to the nation at large. Now, the intimate acquaintance with and strong attachment to the Levitical ritual, which the Epistle throughout supposes, indicate Jewish believers who lived in the immediate vicinity of the temple; we infer therefore, that it was addressed to the Christian congregations of Jerusalem. To the same conclusion we are led by the inscription "To the Hebrews," which may be from the author's hand. This term in the apostolic age is more frequently found as a description of the Jews of Palestine, as distinguished from those who resided in other countries. It is remarkable too that throughout the Epistle no allusion occurs to the admission of heathens to the Church, and no directions how the Jewish believers were to conduct themselves toward their uncircumcised brethren. These are topics which, in writing to a mixed church, St. Paul, or any one who had imbibed his sentiments, could hardly have failed to introduce; their absence must be accounted for by the supposition that the original readers comprised no Christians of heathen descent.

The opinion of the early Church, as expressed by Clement, Eusebius, Jerome and Theodoret, is decisive in favor of this conclusion; and it is not worth while to mention the others that have been advanced.

CONTENTS.—This Epistle is hortatory rather than argumentative in character; and though dogmatical as well as practical, the doctrinal portion is so intermingled with the practical that we can scarcely separate the two. The readers are supposed to be wavering in their allegiance to Christ; they appear to be in imminent danger of apostatizing and falling back into Judaism, both from the persecutions to which they are exposed and from the attractions of the ancient religion, with its venerable associations and its magnificent rites. To fortify their minds against this danger was one chief object of this Epistle. But beyond that, it was evidently the writer's aim to wean them from their attachment to the Mosaic institutions, and to carry them forward in the knowledge of the gospel. Many amongst the Jewish believers were yet far from understanding that the kingdom of Christ was designed, not to modify the Mosaic establishment, but to supersede and abolish it. They had been hitherto indulged with the permission to observe the peculiarities of the law, so long as they did not seek to be justified by it or to impose it upon the Gentile converts. But this temporary concession appears rather to have fostered their undue regard for the law, Acts xv.; xxi. 20, 21, hindering their progress in Christian knowledge, Heb. v. 12-14, endangering their allegiance to Christ, and keeping the way open for their return to Judaism. In these circumstances, the writer sets before them the supreme authority, the peculiar sanctions and the transcendent glory of the Christian dispensation, as concurring to render unbelief the more inexcusable and apostasy the more criminal and fatal.

It is worthy of observation how admirably the whole course of reasoning is adapted to those for whom it was written. Addressing Jews, the writer exhibits with due prominence all that they justly venerated, and draws all his illustrations, Heb. xii. 16-21; xiii. 2, 10, 12, 14, and examples of what is noble and excellent, Heb. xi., from their own records and history. When about to make a statement at variance with Jewish views and feelings, he cautiously prepares their minds for it, Heb. v. 11; and he constantly reasons upon their own principles. Knowing that they especially gloried in possessing a divine revelation, given by the ministry of the angels, and appointing Moses and the prophets as the messengers of God to man, and the race of Aaron as the priests and all the Levitical institutions as the medium of access to God, he does not overlook all this, but accommodates to it his line of proof, and shows that the Christian faith is but the completion of their own.

The Epistle consists of two principal parts, the first chiefly doctrinal, i.-x. 18, and the second chiefly practical, x. 19-xiii.

1. In the first part the supreme authority and glory of the Christian dispensation is proved by the superiority of its Mediator, the eternal Son of God, to the mediators of the old covenant, whether (spiritual) angels or (earthly) Moses; and it is shown that his sufferings and death, so far from diminishing his mediatorial glory, were the very means of accomplishing his work of expiation and redemption, i.-iv. 13. The comparison of Christ with Moses is then followed by another with Aaron. He is shown first to be, like Aaron, a true priest, appointed by God, and a real representative of man, and then far to surpass Aaron, as exercising a royal and eternal priesthood, of which that of the priest-king Melchisedec was a type. The new economy, of which he is the head, is proved from the Old Testament itself to supersede and abrogate the old; and the intrinsic and perpetual efficacy of his one sacrifice, as a full and perfect propitiation for sin, is contrasted with the typical and ceremonial virtue of the oft-repeated sacrifices which were now passing away, iv. 14-x. 18.

2. Upon the foregoing doctrinal argument are founded exhortations to a continuance in patient endurance and cheerful confidence amidst present trials and sufferings. Faith is shown to be essential to a participation in God's promised blessings; its operation and triumphant efficacy are exhibited in a long line of heroes, martyrs and confessors, ending in Jesus, the great exemplar; and the Hebrew Christians are encouraged to endure similar trials as fatherly chastisement adapted to promote their highest good. The glorious privileges of the new covenant are used to set forth the awful peril of apostasy, x. 19-xii., and the Epistle is concluded with exhortations to special duties and virtues, and with a few personal notices and salutations and a benediction, xiii.

HEBRON (he'brun), "alliance." 1. A son of Kohath, the son of Levi. He was the ancestor of one of the Levitical families often referred to in the sacred history, Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19; 1 Chron. vi. 2, 18; xv. 9; xxiii. 12, 19, comp.

xxiv. 23, where the word is supplied. 2. The name occurs in the genealogical lists of Judah, ii. 42, 43, but it is not clear whether a person or a place is intended.

HEBRON, from the same root-word as the preceding, a city of Palestine of great antiquity, and celebrated in history. It is reckoned as one of the earliest of cities, antedating Zoan in Egypt by seven years, Num. xiii. 22. In Gen. xxiii. 2, Josh. xiv. 15 and Jud. i. 10 it is designated Kirjath-Arba, "the city of Arba," probably because it was the residence of Arba, the progenitor of the Anakim. Which was the earlier of the two names is uncertain. Unless Arba was the builder, Kirjath-arba could not well have been the original. Some critics indeed assume that the city was not called Hebron till the Israelites had entered Canaan. They consequently infer that Moses was not the writer of a history in which the under Joshua as general-in-chief, succeeded in exterminating these giants, and hence to Caleb Hebron was given for an inheritance. It was subsequently made over to the priests, and constituted a city of refuge, the surrounding fields and villages being reserved for Caleb, see Gen. xxxvii. 14; xli. 1; Josh. x., xiv., xv., xx., xxi.; Judg. i.; 2 Sam. iv. 12.

We hear little more of Hebron till the time of David, who, on becoming king of Judah, made Hebron his royal residence. Here he reigned seven years and a half, here most of his sons were born, and here he was anointed king over all Israel. On the extension of his kingdom, Hebron ceased to be sufficiently central, and Jerusalem then became the capital. It is possible that this step excited a degree of discontent in Hebron which afterward encouraged Absalom to raise in that city the standard of rebellion against his father, and his position here seems to have been name Hebron occurs. But this conclusion is by no means just. There are instances in which cities and countries known by one name have had another put upon them, and have afterward resumed the original appellation. It appears to have also been called Mamre, probably from the name of Abraham's Amoritish ally, Gen. xxiii. 19; xxxv. 27; comp. xiv. 13, 28. The ancient city lay in a valley, and the two remaining pools, one of which at least existed in the time of David, serve, with other circumstances, to identify the modern with the ancient site. Much of the lifetime of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob was spent in this neighborhood, where they all were entombed in the cave of Machpelah, and it was from hence that the patriarchal family departed for Egypt by way of Beersheba. After the return of the Israelites and the conquest of Canaan, Hebron was assigned to the tribe of Judah, and is described as being in the mountains. The Amorite king had been conquered and the city taken by Joshua, but it would seem that the sons of Anak still occupied the position in force. It is therefore further related that Caleb, so strong that David was at once compelled to flee from Jerusalem. Subsequently, Hebron was one of the places fortified by Rehoboam, and after the exile the Jews who returned to Palestine occupied Hebron and the surrounding villages, see 2 Sam. ii., v., xv.; 1 Ki. ii.; 2 Chr. xi. and Neh. xi.

Hebron is not named by the prophets nor in the New Testament, but we learn from the first book of Maccabees, v., and from Josephus, that it came into the power of the Edomites, who had taken possession of the south of Judah, and was recovered from them by Judas Maccabæus. During the great war Hebron was seized by the rebel Simon Gioridies, but was recaptured and burnt by Cerialis, an officer of Vespasian. Josephus describes the tombs of the patriarchs as existing in his day, and both Eusebius and Jerome, and all subsequent writers who mention Hebron down to the time of the Crusades, speak of the place chiefly as containing these sepulchres. In the course of time the remarkable structure enclosing the tombs of Abraham and the other patriarchs was called the "Castle of Abraham," and by an easy transition this name came to be applied to the city itself, till in the time of the Crusades the names of Hebron and the Castle of Abraham were used interchangeably. Hence, as Abraham is also distinguished among the Moslems by the appellation of el Khulil, "the Friend" (of God), this latter epithet became among them the name of the city; and they now know Hebron only as el Khulil.

The modern town of Hebron, or el Khulil, lies low down on the sloping sides of a narrow valley of Mamre, chiefly on the eastern side, but on the southern part stretches across also to the western side. It contains a population of about 8000, of whom 700 are Jews. There are no Christians in the town or district. The houses are all of stone, high and well built, with windows and flat roofs, and on these roofs are small domes, sometimes two or three to a house. This mode of building is common in the countries farther east where wood is scarce. The streets are narrow, seldom more than two or three yards in width; the pavement, where one exists, is rough and difficult. The bazaars are to a considerable extent covered, either by some kind of awning or by arches springing from the tops of the houses and spanning the street. The goods in them are thus secured from the effects of the sun and rain, but the streets are rendered gloomy as well as damp. The shops are well furnished, better indeed than those of towns of the same class in Egypt, and the commodities are of a very similar description. The only display of local manufactures is the produce of the glass-works, for which the place has long been celebrated. The articles manufactured consist almost exclusively of glass lamps, many of which are exported to Egypt, and rings of colored glass, worn on the arms by females. Gates are placed not only at the entrance of the city, but in different parts of the interior, and are closed at night for the better preservation of order, as well as to prevent communication between the different quarters. This is a rude contrivance much resorted to in Eastern towns from the want of an efficient night-watch.

There are nine mosques in Hebron, none of which possess any architectural or other interest, with the exception of the massive structure which is built over the tombs of the patriarchs and known as El Haran. This is esteemed by the Moslems one of their holiest places, and Christians are rigorously excluded from it. Up to a recent date, the only Europeans who had found their way to the interior were Ali Bey and Giovanni Finati, the Italian servant of Mr. Bankes. See MACHPELAH.

Bartlett gives a glowing description of his approach to Hebron, from which we insert an extract: "On gaining the summit of a rocky hill Hebron burst suddenly upon us with its smiling region of corn, olive-groves and vineyards—the vineyards of Eshcol. . . . On a sloping hillside, rising above the valley, is the quadrangle of massive and ancient stone-work which encloses the building said to contain the cave of Machpelah. At its foot, occupying the valley and side of the opposite hill, lies the town itself, divided into three groups of flat-roofed and domed dwellings. The valley and its enclosing hills, winding into far perspective toward the desert-frontier, in the luxuriance of their Eastern mode of cultivation, and covered with thymy pasturages, justify the description of a land flowing with milk and honey. Afar, beyond the unseen caldron of the Dead Sea, the long range of the Moab mountains shuts in the extensive area."

There are two ancient pools outside the town which still supply the inhabitants with water. It may be that one of these is the "pool in Hebron" over which the hands and feet of the murderers of Ishbosheth were hung up by David's orders, 1 Sam. iv. 12. At some distance down the valley is a widespread evergreen oak, called "Abraham's oak," under which the patriarch is said to have pitched his tent. It is a fine tree, and stands well in the plain, but is of no remarkable antiquity. The whole valley is rich with vineyards (the vine, according to Jewish tradition, being indigenous at Hebron), in each of which is a watch-tower occupied by the owner at the time of vintage. The inhabitants being Moslems, no wine is made of these grapes, but they are dried into raisins, or their juice is boiled down into a sort of mast or molasses and exported into Egypt. This is probably the same as the Hebrew debash mentioned in Gen. xliii. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17, and translated honey in the English Version. See HONEY. These grapes of the vale of Hebron cannot but recall to the thoughtful traveler the cluster borne by two of the spies from Eshcol, which tradition places in this neighborhood, Num. xiii. 23.

HEBRON, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 28. Probably it is identical with ABDON, which see. This word Hebron is from a different Hebrew original, supposed to mean "passage."

HEBRONITES (he'bron-ites), a family of Levites, descendants of Hebron, Num. iii. 27; xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23, 30, 31.

HECKEWELDER (hek'wel-der), JOHN GOTTLIEB ERNESTUS, a very eminent missionary who labored among the North American Indians in the eighteenth century. His father had fled from Moravia to England to escape persecution, and the future missionary was born at Bedford in 1743. In 1754 the family emigrated to America, and in 1762 he gave himself to the work of converting the Indians and commenced his labors in the Tuscarawas Valley, Ohio. He failed in accomplishing any great results, and he next joined in a mission with Zeisberger on the river Susquehanna. For several years he traveled from one mission station to another, extending his tours through Pennsylvania, Ohio and Michigan. The failing health of his wife obliged him to retire from the mission, and he accepted an agency on behalf of the society of the United Brethren. In 1792 the disturbed state of the Western regions prevented the missionaries from regular work, and he labored with great zeal as a commissioner of the United States, but ineffectually, in the interests of peace, for the strife continued until the tribes were subdued. Finally, he retired to Bethlehem, where he remained until his death, in 1823. He wrote two works, one on "The Manners of the Indians," and another on "The History of the Missions of the United Brethren among the Delaware and the Mohegan Indians."

HEDDA (hed'dah), an Anglo-Saxon bishop who ruled over the district known as "Licitfield," now Lichfield, about A. D. 690. The erection of the first cathedral church at Lichfield, which was dedicated in January, 700, was owing to his energy. Offa, the king of the Mercians, labored diligently to exalt this see, but he failed, owing to the dread of the friends of Canterbury that the metropolitan chair should suffer. The name of Coventry was associated with Lichfield in consequence of Robert de Limesey removing the see to that place; but in 1128 Roger de Clinton restored the see to Lichfield, but holding both the names in the title. He was a great benefactor, and he is credited with the rebuilding of the cathedral, but much of the present structure is later than his time. Walter de Langton is the next great builder, followed by Roger de Norburg and Bishop Heyworth, who completed the cathedral; so that it includes the styles which prevailed from 1266 to 1420. During the Civil War it suffered more than any cathedral in England. It was fortified, besieged, taken several times, and it is said that 2000 cannon-shot and 1508 hand-grenades were discharged against it. The central spire, the western spires, the roof, the statuary and the windows were destroyed, and in 1661, when Bishop Hacket came into possession, it was nearly ruined. Through his wonderful energy it was restored, and reconsecrated in December, 1669.

The cathedral is not one of the first magnitude, but it is possessed of many beauties and great attractions. It is the only cathedral in England which has three spires, and it is the only one which stands so isolated that it can be viewed from a distance on all sides. The western façade, with its towers and spires, its ornamentation to the apex of the central gable in Transition Early English, is exceedingly beautiful and effective. Standing opposite the central entrance, the three spires are visible, the effect is really grand, and the spectator will admit that there is nothing in England superior to it. The chief defect of the building is want of elevation. The stone is soft; and the color being a dusky red, the shade is entirely different from that presented by York, Salisbury, Durham or Winchester.

HEDDING (hed'ding), ELIJAH, D.D., was one of the most eminent, laborious and successful bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. He was born at White Plains, New York, in the year 1780. His family were of English origin. Under his mother's care he received some instruction in religious truth, and in the year 1789 he, his mother, grandmother and other relatives were brought under deep impressions by the preaching of Benjamin Abbott, but it appears that his impressions passed off after a few weeks. His parents removed to Vermont, and there the young man fell under the influence of infidel companions, and he became careless and openly wicked. He began to study different systems with care, and he found Deism and Atheism both untenable, while he soon became convinced that Universalism was at war with the statements of the Bible. A pious family, by means of religious books, produced some impression on him, and they directed him toward the Methodist system of doctrine. An appeal made to him by a pious woman, and a sermon by Joseph Mitchell, appear to have been the means of truly awakening him and bringing him to the Saviour. In December, 1798, his name was enrolled on the list of probationers in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Ere long his voice was heard in public prayer and exhortation. He dreaded the idea of entering the ministry because of his want of preparation, but from time to time he became more prominent in meetings, and in 1799, when Lorenzo Dow removed from the Essex district, he was induced to take his place. In the autumn of 1800 he commenced to itinerate, having been licensed as a local preacher. In 1801 the New York Annual Conference appointed him to the Plattsburg circuit, whence he was removed in the following year to the Fletcher circuit. For some time his health failed him, and on his restoration he labored in New Hampshire and Vermont, being appointed in 1807 presiding elder in the New Hampshire district. At the General Conference in Baltimore, in 1808, he greatly distinguished himself, and thus with untiring zeal he served his Master in these districts until his settlement in Boston, in the year 1811, and the connection with Massachusetts thus formed continued until he was appointed bishop, in 1824.

During the remaining twenty-eight years of his life Bishop Hedding brought to his office an amount of zeal, devotion and indomitable strength of purpose that indicated the entire dedication of his life and of all his powers to the Saviour whom he loved. His great prudence, his knowledge of forms and of the constitution of his Church, enabled him to act with great success as presiding officer in the conferences. When subjects of a perplexing character were introduced, he always displayed a forbearing and conciliatory spirit, and yet he still displayed a firm but temperate adherence to the course which he believed to be right. He resided at Lynn until 1837. Two years he spent at Saratoga Springs in expectation of improved health, and in 1844 he removed to Poughkeepsie, where he declined in strength, and after protracted illness he was removed by death in April, 1852. Bishop Hedding served fifty-one years as an itinerant minister and twenty-eight years as a bishop, leaving a record behind him of wisdom, zeal, piety and efficiency in the work of the ministry that deservedly raises his name to an elevated place in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

HEDELIN (hed'e-lin), FRANÇOIS, better known, perhaps, as the ABBÉ D'AUBIGNAC, was born at Paris in the year 1604. Brought up to the legal profession, he abandoned it for the ecclesiastical; and becoming preceptor to the duc de Fronsac, nephew of Richelieu, he obtained the abbacy of Aubignac and a pension from his pupil. One of the most indefatigable writers of his day, and a man of great learning, the abbé soon gained a great notoriety and set himself up as an autocrat in literature. He wrote tragedies, comedies, romances, poems, criticisms, and assailed many of the writers of the day, especially Corneille. Toward the end of his life he instituted a lawsuit against the family of his pupil, and lost his annuity; upon which he retired to Nemours in disgust, where he died in 1676. He was one of the first who maintained that Homer was an ideal person.

HEDGE (hēj). There are two words which are translated "hedge" in our version; one simply means an enclosure, of whatever material, the other a tangled hedge formed of some prickly shrub. They both occur in Isa. v. 5—the fence, of loose stones or mud; the hedge, of thorns. Enclosures of any kind are rare in Palestine. Only gardens, vineyards, etc., are so protected. The prickly-pear, a kind of cactus, is used for the purpose, well illustrating Prov. xv. 19; and the stone walls of sheepfolds are now often topped with thorns.

HEDGE, LEVI, LL.D., was an eminent professor in Harvard University, where he graduated in 1792. He became a tutor in Harvard in 1795, and in 1810 the chair of logic and metaphysics was assigned to him, which he held until 1827, when he was removed to the chair of moral philosophy and civil polity, which he held until 1830, when he resigned because of ill health. He died in 1844, having spent nearly all his life in connection with the university. His "System of Logic" is well known, and has been extensively used. His son, Frederick Henry Hedge, D.D., is also connected with Harvard. He spent several years in Germany, and on his return he settled in Bangor, in Maine, and in 1856 he removed to Brookline, near Boston. In 1858 he was placed in the chair of ecclesiastical history in the theological school connected with Harvard University. He has been a prolific writer of sermons and essays, and one of the most important of his works is a condensed "Account of the Lives and Writings of German Authors from Martin Luthor to Chamisso," which has been recognized on both sides of the Atlantic as a work of sterling value.

HEDIO (hed'e-o), GASPAR, or CASPAR, well known as the coadjutor of Bucer and Capito at Strasburg, was born in 1494 in Baden. He was educated at Freiburg and Basle, where he greatly distinguished himself, especially by a number of theses which he produced on the "Divine Attributes" and on "Predestination." His tendency to the Reformers was obvious in the matter of his writings, and he commenced a correspondence with Luther which confirmed him in his views. Being offered the pulpit in the cathedral in Strasburg, the bishop refused to admit him, except on the condition that he would confine his preaching to the word of God; and thus he had an opportunity given him of expounding the actual teaching of Scripture. He was greatly admired because his sermons were so full of Scripture exposition; and it was more by his exhibition of divine truth than by controversy, for which he was unfitted, that he advanced the cause of the gospel. He made several translations of theological works into German, and among the number he got credit for translations of Eusebius, Hegesippus and Josephus. In 1551 he took part in the deliberations with the German theologians about the Confession of Faith. He died at Strasburg in 1552.

HEDSCHRA (hed'skra). See HEGIRA, MOHAMMED and MECCA.

HEDWIG (hed'wig), SAINT, was a nun in the Cistercian convent near Trebnitz, in which she resided without taking the veil. She was the daughter of Berthold, duke of Carinthia, and she had married Henry, the duke of Poland and Silesia. The husband and the wife agreed to separate, he becoming a priest and she entering a convent, leaving three sons and three daughters to be cared for by their relatives. He became a bishop, and she died in the convent, and in 1267 she was canonized for her virtues by Clement IV.

HEEL. To lift the heel against any one, Ps. xli. 9, was an act of insolent aggression; to make bare the heels of a female, Jer. xiii. 22, was to disgrace her, the heels of a modest woman being covered by her train. In Ps. xlix. 5, for "heels" liers-in-wait or trackers must be understood. As to the sentence upon the serpent, Gen. iii. 15, the heel of the woman's seed would be the part most exposed to injury from his bite while the victor's foot was on his head; but the injury would not be on a vital part, trifling compared with the crushing of the head, typifying the victory of the Saviour over Satan.

HEERBRAND (he'er-brand), JACOB, was a very eminent Lutheran minister and professor of the sixteenth century. He was born in 1521, educated at Ulm and Wittenberg and settled at Tübingen. He attended the Council of Trent as a theological delegate, and in 1560 he was made professor of theology at Tübingen, where he remained till his death, in 1600. His chief work is "A Compendium of Theology," which was used for many years as a text-book, and it was even translated into Greek for use at Constantinople. His great energy and his tendency to controversy led his enemies to call him by the soubriquet "Höllbrand," or "Hell-fire."

HEERMANN (he'er-man), JOHANN, who is well known as a hymn-writer, was a Protestant pastor in Silesia. He was born in 1585, and in 1611 he settled at Köben as pastor. He suffered severely during the Thirty Years' War, and yet in the midst of his cares and trials he published a volume of his hymns. They display a deep emotional spirit combined with great spirituality of character. Many of them have been rendered into English, and his hymns are still appreciated and generally used in evangelical German churches. He died in 1647.

HEGAI (he'gi), Hebrew, Hegai; Septuagint, Gai, an officer of the court of King Ahasuerus, to whom was entrusted the care of the young women who were in training to become concubines to the king, Esth. ii. 8, 15. After they had been presented to the king they passed under the charge and here he prepared his first philosophical work, in which he defended the views of Schelling against those of Fichte on the subject of Identity. He also took part with him in the management of the "Critical Journal of Science," and on the departure of Schelling from Jena he took his place, and began to display a divergence from the views of his former associate. His second work was still more pronounced, and it was exceedingly profound, dealing with matters connected with consciousness and perception. He became president of the Gymnasium at Nürnberg in 1808, and four years afterward he published his "Logic," thus completing, as he held, the whole range of mental science. His "Logic" attracted very general attention, and raised his name to such an elevation that in 1817 he was appointed to a chair at Heidelberg. Here his fame spread abroad, and in spite of the great difficulty which many experi-

Tennenan's "Manual of the History of Philosophy."

The realism and skepticism of Hume was followed by the transcendental idealism of Kant, which was still further developed in the pure and absolute idealism of Fichte, which in turn gave place to the intellectual intuitions of Schelling; and Hegel modified this system to some extent, but really Hegel and Schelling both base their views on the same principle, the absolute ideality of thought and being. His system was seen at once to bear directly on Christianity, and efforts were made by his followers which attempted to show that his principles were not antagonistic to religion; while others, such as Michelet and Strauss, insisted that the pantheistic idea of God was the only true result of the Hegelian philosophy, in which God was set forth as the universal substance of the eternal universe, and that this first becomes conscious of itself in humanity. There can be little doubt but that, as Fisher has said in his "Essays on the Supernatural," "A philosophy which denies the distinct personality of God, and consequently must regard prayer as an absurdity, can by no legerdemain be identified with Christian doctrine. The appearance of the 'Life of Christ' by Strauss, and the subsequent productions of Baur and his school, through the applications which they made of the Hegelian tenets to the New Testament history and the teachings of the apostles, placed this conclusion beyond a doubt." And yet there are some who maintain that the system of Hegel is neither pantheistic nor anti-Christian in its tendency. The "Journal of Speculative Philosophy" demands the careful study of the system, and the views of this journal, as set forth by a writer in the "American Quarterly Church Review," are to the effect that the system is "not pantheistical, but that it is the widest and deepest system of thought yet offered to mankind, and that, too, in full harmony with the Christian system;" and also that Hegel holds that "God has revealed himself—that is, he has given us to understand what he is; and the possibility of knowing him thus afforded us renders such knowledge a duty;" and the conclusion drawn is that pantheism receives a flat contradiction by Hegel's principles. The dispute, therefore, lies between the school of Strauss and Michelet on the one hand and those who imagine that they comprehend the system of the great German metaphysician better than his own countrymen did who had abundant opportunities of understanding his views.

of another officer, who in this narrative bears the name of Sha'ushgaz, though the Septuagint gives here the same name as before, Gai. The Authorized Version, too, gives Hegai. In vers. 3 and 15 the name is omitted by the Septuagint altogether. Origen supplies Gogaios. In ver. 3 the name appears under the form Hege.

HEGEL (he'gel), GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH, who is universally recognized as the most eminent of all the metaphysicians of Germany, was born in the year 1770, at Stuttgart. He studied in his native city and at Tubingen, where he enjoyed the companionship of Schelling. After he had graduated he accepted the position of a private tutor in Switzerland, and after a residence at Frankfort-on-the-Main he removed to Jena, where he was now able to live, as he had succeeded to a small estate on the death of his father. Jena had peculiar attractions for him, as it brought him into contact again with Schelling;

and here he prepared his first philosophical work, in which he defended the views of Schelling against those of Fichte on the subject of Identity. He also took part with him in the management of the "Critical Journal of Science," and on the departure of Schelling from Jena he took his place, and began to display a divergence from the views of his former associate. His second work was still more pronounced, and it was exceedingly profound, dealing with matters connected with consciousness and perception. He became president of the Gymnasium at Nürnberg in 1808, and four years afterward he published his "Logic," thus completing, as he held, the whole range of mental science. His "Logic" attracted very general attention, and raised his name to such an elevation that in 1817 he was appointed to a chair at Heidelberg. Here his fame spread abroad, and in spite of the great difficulty which many experienced in comprehending his meaning, caused by the profound and abstract nature of his conceptions and the terms which he used to express his ideas, he was followed by vast numbers of admiring students. No successor had been appointed to Fichte in Berlin, and the government of Prussia, as a recognition of the great eminence of Hegel, appointed him to the vacant chair. His "Encyclopedia of Philosophical Sciences" and his "Philosophy of Jurisprudence" were the great works to which he chiefly dedicated his life. He died of cholera in 1831.

To do justice to Hegel as a metaphysician would involve a lengthened comparison of his system with that of Hume and his successors in the Scottish school, with that of Hobbes, Locke and Berkeley of the English school, with that of Descartes, Condillac, Malebranche and Bouffier of the French school, and more especially with the views of Kant, Fichte and Schelling among his own countrymen. A condensed view of his system may be found in HEGESIPPUS (he-geh-sip'pus), an ecclesiastical historian, who lived in the second century. Eusebius, who made use of his work, "The History of the Preaching of the Apostles," says that he was among the most illustrious of the defenders of the truth who combated falsehood as well by their writings as by their words. Only "Fragments" of Hegesippus have been preserved, and they are given by Routh, and in the "Spicilegium" of Grabe. The value of his history consisted in the fact that it recorded events of Church history from the birth of Christ to the time of Eleutherus, bishop of Rome, A. D. 170.

HEGIRA (hej'i-ra). This is an Arabic word signifying "flight;" more properly it is "hejra" or "hedschra," and it designates the epoch of the flight of Mohammed from Mecca, Friday, July 10, 622, to Medina. The Mohammedan year is of 354 days, and is found by subtracting 622 from the year A. D., multiplying by 365.52 and then dividing by 354.

HEGIUS (he'ge-us), ALEXANDER, the founder of the celebrated college at Deventer, Holland, which he established in 1498, was born about the year 1455 at Münster. Hallam justly says that this college was one of three that in Western Europe first created and cultivated a taste for classical literature. He had Erasmus and Murmelius among his pupils, and he was himself a pupil of Thomas à Kempis. He produced little in theology, but in grammar and philosophy he wrote works which told on his age, and aided the progress of learning.

HEIDANUS (hi'da-nus), ABRAHAM, was a native of the Palatinate, where he was born in 1597. He received his education in the city of Amsterdam, and subsequently he studied at Leyden, where in 1627 he became a pastor, and after twenty years' residence and active labor he was made a professor of the university of that place. He was a disciple of Descartes in philosophy, and his views on the Calvinistic and Arminian controversy were not very decided. He was reluctantly led into controversy, and in his old age he was dismissed from his chair, which he had held for more than a quarter of a century. He died at Leyden in 1678, leaving a "Body of Christian Theology" behind him, which appeared as a posthumous work.

HEIDEGGER (hi'deg-ger), JOHANN HEINRICH, a Swiss theologian, was born July 1, 1633, near Zurich. The son of a Protestant pastor, he began his studies in his native land, and went to prosecute them at Marburg and Heidelberg, under men like Hottinger and Spanheim. In 1656 he was chosen professor extraordinary of the Hebrew language in the university of Heidelberg. In 1659 he was called to Steinfurt as professor of theology and ecclesiastical history. In 1666 he was compelled to leave the place by war, and returned to Zurich, where he received the chair of theology, which he held till his death, January 28, 1698. Heidegger was a man of great influence and activity. He took part in most of the ecclesiastical controversies of his time, and obtained a wide reputation. He was benevolent and patriotic, a defender of the refugees of France and Piedmont who found an asylum in Switzerland from the persecutions of the Romanists on account of their religion. He was the principal author of the noted "Formula Consensus," which was adopted by the Synod of Zurich, held in 1675. His chief Biblical works are—"Select Writings concerning the Sacred History of the Patriarchs," "A Concise Biblical Manual," "The Mystery of Babylon, or Discourses on the Prophecy concerning Babylon the Great, in the Apocalypse of John the Divine," "A Body of Christian Theology," "The Vital Part of Christian Theology," and commentaries on several books of the Bible. Many of his writings were directed against Romanists and the proceedings of the Council of Trent.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM (hi'del-berg kat'e-kizm). When Protestantism was introduced into the Palatinate in 1546, a very protracted controversy arose between the followers of Luther and Calvin. On the accession of Frederick III. he favored the Calvinistic side; and having reorganized the Sapienz College, he placed the celebrated Ursinus, a friend and pupil of Melancthon, at its head. With a view to quiet the religious strife that prevailed, he associated Ursinus and Olevianus in the compilation of a Confession or Catechism. Olevianus had been a professor in the university of Heidelberg, and he was then preacher at the court of Frederick. In drawing up their Catechism, they made free use of the existing catechisms of Calvin and John A. Lasco. The work was completed under careful aid of Frederick, both the theologians acting together. Dr. Schaff says, "Ursinus has always been regarded as the principal author, as he was afterward the chief defender, of the Catechism; still, it would appear that the nervous German style, the division into three parts (as distinguished from the five parts in the catechism of Calvin and the previous draft of Ursinus) and the genial warmth and unction of the whole work are chiefly due to Olevianus."

Such were the circumstances under which this great Protestant symbol was prepared. It took its name from the city in which it was drawn up and first printed. Frederick laid it before a synod of the superintendents of the Palatinate in the year 1562, and it was approved of by the synod, and the first edition was issued in 1563, with a preface which runs in the name of the elector Frederick, who probably wrote it. A Latin version was prepared, but the German one is the authentic standard. The proceedings of the Council of Trent on the mass led to the introduction of the eightieth question on the Lord's Supper. The first edition was lost for a time, but it was recovered in the year 1864, which settled all disputes which had taken place about intervening editions. This Catechism has been translated into different languages, and has been reprinted to the extent of millions of copies. Like the Bible, "The Pilgrim's Progress," "The Westminster Catechism," "The Heidelberg Catechism" has spread abroad, and it is extensively known in many countries.

HEIDENHEIM (hi'den-hime), WOLF B. SIMSON, a distinguished grammarian, Massorite and typographer, who immortalized Rödelheim, near Frankfort-on-the-Main, in the annals of Hebrew literature, by the splendid Hebrew printing-office which he established in it, and from which he issued some of the most beautiful and correctly printed editions of the Pentateuch, as well as grammatical and philological works. The works for which Hebrew philology and Biblical exegesis are indebted to Heidenheim are as follows: "On the Laws of the Accents," in this most valuable treatise, which is highly prized by grammarians, Heidenheim has largely availed himself of the works of Ben Asher, Ibn Balaam, Chajug and other ancient philologists. "The Understanding of the Scriptures," a Hebrew Commentary on the Pentateuch, with the Hebrew Text and the Commentary of Rashi. "The Eye of the Scribe," being annotations on the Pentateuch, with the Hebrew text and the Massoretic glosses of Jeh. Pisa. A German translation of the Pentateuch, with the Hebrew text. Heidenheim died February 26, 1832, and left behind him, in manuscript, many valuable works on philology.

of three years old, Gen. xv. 9, as used for ploughing, Jud. xiv. 18, as giving milk, Isa. vii. 21, 22, in our version "a young cow," as treading out corn, Hos. x. 11, also as untamed and willful, Jer. l. 11; Hos. iv. 16. It may be in the same sense that the term is applied to Moab, Isa. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34, to denote independent self-confidence. Some critics, however, prefer regarding the words as a proper name, Eglath-Shelishiyah, one of the places to which the fugitives would wander.

There was a remarkable ordinance prescribed in the Mosaic law, that a red unblemished heifer, never touched by the yoke, was to be slain (perhaps) by the priest, the blood being sprinkled before the tabernacle; and then the whole carcass was to be burned, cedar-wood, hyssop and scarlet being also cast into the fire. The ashes were afterward to be gathered and laid up. These ashes, mixed with running water, were applied to purify those who had contracted uncleanness by touching a dead body, or a bone, or a grave; the tent, too, and the vessels in it, where a person had died, Num. xix.; Heb. ix. 13. It may be asked why pollution should be thus communicated. Death, we may reply, is the penalty of sin. He, then, that touched a corpse touched that guilty thing on which the penalty had been executed, and contracted ceremonial defilement. The polluting character of sin was thus remarkably exemplified, and the need of some purification from it.

HEILMANN (hīl'man), JOHANN DAVID, was born in 1727 at Osnabruck, Hanover. He was educated at Halle, and after a pastorate at Hameln he settled as professor at Gottingen in 1754, where he died in 1764. He is entitled to a place in this work because of his "Parallel between the Spirit of Modern Irreligion and the Ancient Adversaries of Christianity," his "Compend of Dogmatic Theology," and his "Illustrations of the New Testament."

HEILPRIN (hīl'prin), JECHIEL, was an eminent Jewish writer in the early part of the eighteenth century. He wrote a "History of the Jews," in which he treats of leading events from the creation down to his own time. He also published a work on "The Mishnaic and Talmudic Doctors," an "Index of Jewish Literary Celebrities," and a "Rabbinic Dictionary." The latter is expository of the Cabbala, and has received much praise. He was said to have been born at Minsk, but the time of his death is unknown.

HEINECCIUS (hi-nek'se-us), JOHANN MICHAEL, a learned and laborious Lutheran theologian, was born in 1674 at Eisenberg, Germany. He resorted to Jena, Frankfurt and Giessen for his education; and having spent some time at Helmstadt as a tutor, he settled as a pastor in Halle in the year 1709. He wrote against "The French Prophets" and on "The Terminist Controversy," but his great work, which was published in 1811 at Leipsic, was an "Historical Treatise on the Doctrines, Government, Liturgy and Morals of the Greek Church, both Ancient and Modern." Modern scholars continue to recognize the value of this storehouse of learning.

HEINICKE (hi'nik-ch), SAMUEL, extensively known through Europe for his great success as a teacher of the deaf and dumb, was born near Weissenfels, in Prussia, in 1729. After acting as a farmer and serving in the army he entered the university of Jena. For several years he taught as a tutor in a noble family at Hamburg, whence he removed to Eppendorf. Here he began to instruct a deaf and dumb child, and ere long others were attracted to him; and under the patronage of the elector of Saxony he was led to establish the institution in Leipsic for deaf-mutes, which was founded in 1772. This was the first school of the kind opened in Europe, and it is continued to the present time. The "method of instruction was by articulation and reading on the lip." Heinicke was considered harsh among his pupils, and he had little or no patience with those who differed from his views as to the value of his system. He wrote several works on his favorite subject, in one of which he argued that deaf-mutes should even be taught to speak as well as to read and write. He also dabbled in philosophy, and a work is attributed to him on Kant's metaphysical system. He died in 1790 at Leipsic.

HEINRICHS (hīn'rikhs), JOHANN HEINRICH, a German theologian, was born at Hanover, April 10, 1765, where he prosecuted his studies for some time, and afterward at Gottingen. In 1789 he became repetent in theology at the university of Gottingen; and after remaining there three years he went to Hanover, and gave public lectures in mathematics. In 1794 he became pastor at Quickborn. In 1799 he became archdeacon in Dannenberg, in 1806 superintendent at Klotze, and in 1810 superintendent at Burgdorf. He died March 17, 1850. His chief works are portions of Koppe's "Greek Testament," viz., "The Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles to the Colossians, to the Philippians, to Timothy, to Titus, to Philemon and to the Hebrews, and the Book of Revelations;" also a work in German, entitled "Contributions to promote Knowledge of Theology, more especially of the New Testament." His other writings, which are not numerous, relate for the most part to pastoral duties and preaching. Heinrichs possessed little originality or learning.

HEINSIUS (hīn'sh'us), DANIEL, one of the most learned men of his time, was born at Ghent, 1580 or 1581. He was sent by his father, at the age of fourteen, to study law at Franeker, but, contrary to parental wishes, resolved to devote himself to ancient literature, and accordingly left Franeker, and prosecuted the study of the classics under Joseph Scaliger at Leyden, where, at the age of eighteen, he explained the Latin classics, and where also, seven years afterward, he was appointed professor of history and politics. In 1607 he was appointed librarian and secretary of the university. He held also the office of historian to the states of Holland, with a handsome salary. He acted as secretary to the Synod of Dort in 1618. His fame was European. He died February 3, 1665, at the age of seventy-five. His works are very numerous and learned. Those of them which claim for him a notice here are—"Sacred Aristarchus (Searching Critic), or Criticisms of a Monk on the Different Translations in John," and "Religious Studies on the New Testament."

HEIR. See BIRTHRIGHT, FIRST-BORN, and INHERITANCE.

HELAH (he'lah), one of the wives of Ashur, the father of Tekoah, 1 Chron. iv. 5, 7.

HELAM (he'lam), the place where David defeated the Syrians under Hadarezer; it is described in Samuel as "beyond the river," by which is meant the west side of the river Euphrates, 2 Sam. x. 16, 17. The word is variously written both in the Hebrew and the Sept. The exact locality of Helam is unknown. Ewald, however, with some probability, supposes it to have been identical with the Alamatha of Ptolemy, a town near Nicephorim, and situate on the west bank of Euphrates.

HELBAH (hel'bah), a town in the territory of Asher, Jud. i. 31.

HELBON (hel'bon), a city mentioned only by Ezekiel, as one of the places which supplied Tyre with articles of merchandise, "the wine of Helbon and white wool," xxvii. 18. Its wine was renowned at a much later period than that of Ezekiel, for Strabo notices it among the luxuries of the kings of Persia that they required to have Chalybonian wine from Syria. The same fact is also reported by Atheneus. Until recently this place was supposed to be the same with the Greek Chalybon and the modern Aleppo. But recent investigation has led to another and apparently more correct view. The Helbon of Ezekiel is celebrated for its wine, and is also in the prophet immediately connected with Damascus; but as Robinson justly states, "Aleppo produces no wine of any reputation, nor is Damascus the natural channel of commerce between Aleppo and Tyre." He therefore thinks the missionaries are right in fixing on a place that still bears the name of Helbon—a valley about three and a half hours distant on the north from Damascus. Of this sweet valley Porter says, "It is a winding glen through a gravelly torrent bed, shut in by the mountains that rise in steep white acclivities 1000 feet or more, here and there crowned with cliffs that look in the distance like Gothic castles. The banks of the winter torrent are lined with vineyards, fig trees, pomegranates and a few walnuts, whose dark-green foliage contrasts well with the snowy limestone. The terraced vineyards run away up the mountain sides, clinging to spots where one would think no human foot could rest. . . . Its trade with the shepherd Bedawin made, and still makes, a wool dépôt, and this article also it supplied in the markets of Tyre. The wine of Helbon was another of its exports. Here is that wine-producing Helbon. The Koran lays a veto on the manufacture, but the grapes are as famous as ever, and the "infidels" of Damascus still make their best wine from them.

HELCEIAH, HELCHIAS (hel-ki'ah, hel-ki'as), 1 Esd. viii. 1; 2 Esd. i. 1, Greek forms of HELKIAH.

HELDAI (hel'di). 1. The Netophathite, one of the captains, the twelfth of the monthly courses in the temple service, 1 Chr. xxvii. 15. 2. An Israelite from whom Zechariah was commanded to take materials for making memorial crowns, Zech. vi. 10, for Joshua, the high-priest. Heldai and his companion seem to have been a deputation from Babylon sent with contributions to aid the work in which their people were engaged.

HELEB (he'leb), one of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 29.

HELEB (he'led), also one of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 36. He is probably identical with Heleb; possibly also with Heldai, 1.

HELEK (he'lek), a descendant of Manasseh, Num. xxvi. 30; Josh. xvii. 2.

HELEKITES (he'lek-ites), the family of Manasseh descended from Helek, Num. xxvi. 30.

HELEM (he'lem). 1. A man named in the list of the descendants of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 35. It is supposed by some that he was the third son of Heber, ver. 32, and that of the names Helem and Hotham one arose out of the other through the mistake of a transcriber, though which is the original name is uncertain. If so, the mistake must be very ancient, as it is followed by the Septuagint. 2. One of those to whom the memorial crowns were to be assigned, Zech. vi. 14, in all probability the same who is called Heldai in ver. 10.

HELENA (hel-e'na), SAINT, mother of Constantine the Great, was of mean birth, and was the wife of Constantius Chlorus, who discarded her when he assumed the purple. Upon the accession of her son, she came forth from the retirement in which she had long lived, and spent in works of charity the large sums of money which her son placed at her disposal. In 311 she became a Christian, and in 325 she made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and is said to have discovered outside of Jerusalem the cross on which the Redeemer of mankind suffered. Here a splendid church was built at her instigation by Constantine, while she erected one over the scene of the nativity in Bethlehem, and one on the Mount of Olives.

HELEPH (he'lef), a place on the northern boundaries of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 33. Van de Velde would identify it with Beit Lif. But Beit Lif lies toward what must have been the western boundary of Naphtali, between that tribe and Asher, whereas the expression "the out-goings thereof were at Jordan," and also in ver. 34 the southern boundary is drawn from the Jordan, prove that it is intended to show the northern boundary line of Naphtali, drawn from the west or from Asher.

HELEZ (he'lez), one of David's heroes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 27; xxvii. 10. In the first-named place he is called the Paltite, in the last two the Pelonite. 2. One of Judah's posterity, ii. 39.

HELFFENSTEIN (hel'fen-stine). There are three persons of this name who deserve a place in this work—viz., JOHN CONRAD ALBERT, CHARLES and JONATHAN. The two latter were sons of the first-named, who was born at Moszbach in the Palatinate in 1748. He was one of the fathers of the German Reformed Church in America. He studied at Heidelberg and was sent out as a missionary, arriving at New York in 1772. He settled at Germantown, Pennsylvania, where, after a faithful pastorate, he died in 1790. Several volumes of his sermons have been published. His son Charles, who was also a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in 1781. He held several charges in different parts of Pennsylvania until his death, in 1842. His repeated changes from one charge to another may have arisen from certain innocent eccentricities which his friends recognized, but he was an eminently godly and excellent man. His brother Jonathan was born in 1784. He was ordained in 1807, and he served as pastor in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and in Frederick, Maryland, until his death, in 1829. He was famed for his ability as a preacher, and he was an excellent pastor and a deeply pious man.

HELFFERICH (helf'fe-rikh). There were two excellent ministers of this name, father and son, who held prominent places in the German Reformed Church in the United States. JOHN HENRY was born in the Palatinate at Moszbach in the year 1739. He had entered the ministry and labored for some time in his native land before he was sent as a missionary to America. He landed in New York along with J. C. A. Helffenstein in the month of January, 1772. He undertook the service of seven churches in Lehigh county, Pennsylvania, and here he labored until his death, in 1810. It is testified of this self-denying man, who was the father of the church in that region, that "though that part of the church did not escape the general stagnation of a later period through German rationalism and indifference, yet the vantage-ground upon which it was placed by means of his labors has been a blessing to it down to our day." His son JOHN was born in Lehigh county in 1795. He was educated in Philadelphia. He became pastor in the same district where his father had labored for so many years. His industry in the ministry was ceaseless. He is said to have baptized 4591 persons, and to have admitted into the church the vast number of upward of 2000 souls. His sermons were all delivered in the German language.

HELI (he'li) does not occur in this form in the Authorized Version of the Old Testament. According, however, to the Septuagint and the Vulgate, the well-known name of the aged high-priest ELI is the same word. His name is rendered by the Septuagint Hēli (Alexandrian, Hēlei), and by the Vulgate Heli, in no less than thirty passages. This is, no doubt, a more correct rendering of the name than the Eli of the Authorized Version.

In the Apocryphal book 2 Esd. i. 2, Heli occurs as one of the ancestors of Esdras or Ezra. In the genealogy, however, of the canonical book, Ezra vii. 2, 3, the name is omitted, as well as two others, between Ahitub and Amariah.

In Luke iii. 23, Heli occupies a prominent place in the ancestry of our Lord, owing to the discussion of the question which the proximity of his name to that of JESUS has occasioned, how was he the grandfather of Christ? According to the letter of the gospel in the Authorized Version, Heli was the father of Joseph, the reputed father of the Saviour, and this relationship has been stoutly defended of late. It is impossible, however, on a strict comparison of the originals of the two ancestral tables of Jesus Christ, as given in Matthew and Luke, to avoid the natural conclusion that Joseph the carpenter was the real son of Jacob, and the son-in-law of Heli, through his espoused wife, the Virgin Mary. The passages in the Greek text are, Matt. i. 16 and Luke iii. 23. The former, "Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary," plainly predicates a literal and natural paternity of Jacob to Mary's husband Joseph, while the second only vaguely connects Joseph with Heli—"Joseph of Heli;" so that on the simple assumption which the entire nature of the case forces on us, that Heli was actually the Virgin's father, we need only insert the phrase "son-in-law" between the two names ("Joseph, who was the son-in-law of Heli"), and the two passages will become compatible, and our Lord's natural descent from King David as the "fruit of his loins," Acts ii. 30, will be avouched to the satisfaction of so many prophecies and strong assertions of Holy Scripture. While Joseph, the legal father of Christ, was only a link in law between the Saviour and his royal ancestor David, through Solomon, from whom Joseph was lineally descended through his father Jacob, Heli, the maternal grandfather of our Lord, connected him by natural line with King David through his son Nathan, Solomon's elder brother.

HELIIAS (he-li'as), 2 Esd. vii. 39, a Greek form of the name ELIJAH.

HELIODORUS (he-le-o-do'rus), the treasurer of Seleucus Philopator. This king, being impoverished by his annual tribute of one thousand talents to the Romans, and tempted by false accounts of the enormous wealth stored up in the Jewish temple, sent Heliodorus to plunder these treasures. The attempt threw the people of Jerusalem, and especially the high-priest Onias III., into great anguish of mind; and in consequence of their prayers the sacrilege of Heliodorus was prevented by a "great apparition" of a horse "with a terrible rider upon him, who had complete harness of gold," and was accompanied by two strong and lovely youths, who scourged Heliodorus "with many sore stripes," while the horse "ran fiercely and smote at him with his fore feet," 2 Macc. iii. 8-27. Heliodorus desisted from the attempt, and testified to Seleucus that the temple was defended by "an especial power of God," v. 38. The story of the vision of Heliodorus, familiar to all from Raphael's great picture in the Vatican, receives no support either from Josephus or from the author of the "fourth book of Maccabees." This writer tells the story of Apollonius, but with different details. Jahn finds a supposed allusion to the story in a passage of Polybius, quoted by Josephus. Heliodorus afterward poisoned Seleucus, and aimed at seizing the crown, but was suppressed by Antiochus Epiphanes, with the assistance of Eumenes and Attalus of Pergamos, B. C. 175. See Dan. xi. 20; 2 Macc. iii. and 4 Macc.

HELIODORUS, son of Theodosius, was born at Emesa, in Syria, about A. D. 365. He became bishop of Tricca in Thessaly, and strictly enforced celibacy on his priests. He is the author of an admirable Greek romance called "Æthiopia," of which Nicephorus says that, being required to suppress the book or lay down his bishopric, on the ground that the story injured the morals of the young, he chose the latter alternative. But the story is almost certainly false, for the "Æthiopia" (or "Charideia," as it was sometimes called) was the most moral of Greek novels.

HELIOGABALUS (he-le-o-ga-bah'lus), who rose to be emperor of Rome, was born in the beginning of the third century, at Emesa. He received his name from the fact that he was made a priest of the Syro-Phœnician sun-god El-Gabal, and he abandoned his old patronymic, Varius Avitus Bassanius. By the devices of his mother and the aid of the army, which was the influential power in settling the succession, he became emperor in May, 218. He did not hold the sceptre four years, and his reign was a scene of cruelty and abominable licentiousness. He prohibited all worship except that of the sun-god. And yet the Christians were not persecuted by him; as he was introducing a new religion, so he bore with others who were similarly engaged. His enormities became intolerable, and accordingly the Prætorian guards slew him, A. D. 222.

Helkath in the list of Levitical towns, probably through some error of the transcriber. That the Hukkok of Josh. xix. 34 cannot be intended is evident from the fact that this town was not on the boundary of Asher, but toward Issachar. Helkath has not been identified. In the "Onomasticon" it is simply mentioned, by Eusebius as Ethai, by Jerome as Elcath; but neither seems to have known it. Van de Velde proposes to identify it with Ukkrith or Ikkirith, a town with ancient ruins on the high land between Wady el-Ayûn and Wady el-Kurn, but this seems a mere random conjecture, sustained neither by the locality nor the name.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM (-haz-zu'rim), a place where twelve of the servants of David and twelve Benjamites who adhered to Ishbosheth engaged in single combat and were all slaughtered, 2 Sam. ii. 16. It was near GIBEON, which see.

Ewald approves the reading which the Septuagint seem to have followed as that which alone gives a suitable meaning to the name. Gesenius renders by "the field of swords," which can hardly be admitted; for though tsur is used in the sense of an "edge," it is never used simply for "sword." Several other attempts have been made to define the latter part of this name, but they require no mention.

HELKIAS (hel-ki'as), 1 Esd. i. 8, HILKIAH, the high-priest.

HELL. In the Old and New Testaments there are three words used to designate the state and condition of departed spirits. They are "sheol" in the Hebrew, and "Hades" and "Gehenna" in the Greek. "Sheol" is found sixty-five times in the Old Testament, while in the New "Gehenna" is used twelve times and "Hades" occurs eleven times, and there is one passage where, according to Tischendorf, the word is uncertain.

The translators of the common English version render "sheol" as often "grave" as by the general word "hell," but it is well to note the fact that of the ancient versions of the Scriptures none of them appear to render "sheol" by any expression which means "grave" as a place of sepulture. Still, while this must be admitted, there is a general sense in which the idea which "sheol" conveys is properly exhibited by the adoption of such a rendering; for as Archbishop Ussher says, "When 'sheol' is said to signify the 'grave,' the term 'grave' must be taken in as large a sense as it is in our Saviour's speech in John v. 28 and in Isa. xxvi. 19, according to the Septuagint reading, upon which passage Origen thus: 'Here and in many other places the graves of the dead are to be understood, not such only as we see are builded for the receiving of men's bodies, either cut out in stones or digged down in the earth, but every place wherein a man's body lieth either entire or in part, . . . otherwise they which are not committed to burial nor laid in graves, but have ended their lives in shipwrecks, deserts and such-like ways, should not seem to be reckoned among those which are said to be raised from the grave.'"

In the Old Testament "sheol" is applied to all who have passed out of this life, and it refers to their state, either of happiness or misery, and to the locality which they occupy. The following references will serve as an illustration of the passages in which "sheol" is used to describe the disembodied condition of all who die: Prov. xxi. 16; Isa. xiv. 9; Ps. lxxxix. 47, 48; Isa. xxxviii. 18, 19. The condition of the wicked who have departed this life is set forth in such expressions as these: Num. xvi. 33; Job xxiv. 19; Ps. ix. 17, 18; Prov. v. 5; ix. 18, and the condition of the blessed is intimated in Ps. xvi. 10, compared with Acts ii. 27, 31; Ps. xxx. 3, 4; xlix. 15, 16; lxxxvi. 13; Job iii. 17-19; Hos. xiii. 14. The locality or place of the dead is pointed out by such figurative expressions as the following, viz.: "Sheol" is very deep, Job xi. 8, and dark, Job x. 21, 22. It is beneath us, Num. xvi. 30, 33; Ezek. xxxi. 15, 16, 17, and is very deep, Ps. lxxxvi. 13; Prov. ix. 18; while it is enclosed with bars, Job xvii. 16, and entered by gates, Isa. xxxviii. 10.

The Greek term "Hades" is used in the New Testament to describe the condition of the dead, whether in happiness or in misery. Indeed, the expressions connected with "Hades" are very similar to those which are associated in the Old Testament with the word "sheol." It is represented as a prison, 1 Pet. iii. 19. It also has gates and bars, Matt. xvi. 18; Acts ii. 27, 31; Rev. i. 18; and its situation is downward, Matt. xi. 23; Luke x. 15. Still, there is no want of passages to mark the difference of the estate of the saved from that of the lost. The blessed are in paradise, Luke xxiii. 43; 2 Cor. xii. 4 and Rev. ii. 7, although it may be admitted that the condition to which Paul refers on the occasion of his vision may have been different from that which is indicated in Rev. ii. 7. Still, they both point to a state of happiness, just as the allusion in the parable, Luke xvi. 22, intimates a state of bliss by the term "Abraham's bosom."

When the Authorized Version of the Scriptures was made, the word "hell" then used corresponded more exactly to "Hades," being derived from the Saxon helan, to cover, and signifying merely the covered or invisible place—the habitation of those who have gone from this visible terrestrial region to the world of spirits. But it has been so long appropriated in common usage to the place of future punishment for the wicked that its earlier meaning has been lost sight of. The distinctive term for this place in Scripture is "Gehenna." But "Gehenna" is not properly a Greek word, nor does it ever occur in the Greek translation of the Old Testament; it is simply the abbreviated form of two Hebrew terms, ge-hinnom, the valley of Hinnom, or, as it is also put, the valley of the son of Hinnom. The origin of the name is lost in a remote antiquity, and it occurs in Joshua as already in current use, Josh. xv. 8. But only in the later times of the Jewish commonwealth did the name acquire a sinister meaning. The valley lay in the immediate vicinity of Jerusalem, and was indeed but a continuation of the lengthened valley of Jehoshaphat, forming that portion of it which lay on the south of Jerusalem, and became the chief burying-ground of the inhabitants. What chiefly, however, gave it a name of infamy was the use made of it by Manasseh, as the place in which he caused his children to pass through the fire to Moloch, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 6. Josiah afterward, among his reforming measures, defiled the place, "that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Moloch," 2 Ki. xxiii. 10. The exact spot where this desecration took place was called Tophet, supposed to be derived from the sounding of the drums (toph meaning drum) which had been employed to drown the cries of the sacrificed children. And the prophets, in denouncing the judgments of Heaven upon the wickedness of the people, declared that this Tophet, or valley of Hinnom, would be turned into a valley of slaughter, where the carcasses of the slain should be laid, and where the fire of God's wrath should consume them, Isa. xxx. 33; xlvi. 24; Jer. vii. 32. Having thus associated with it the consummation of man's wickedness on the one hand, and the consummation of God's judgments on the other, it became the appropriate earthly type of the place of eternal misery—the place where the fire of God's wrath should for ever burn against those who had left this world in a state of final impenitency. In course of time, also, the name passed into current use as the common designation of this place of torment.

Our Lord simply adopted on this point the current language of the time, and gave also the sanction of his authority to the leading ideas involved in it. "Gehenna," or "hell," is with him the place of final torment, and of torment especially as represented by the action of consuming fire; in several places he uses the complex phrase, "hell of fire," Matt. v. 22; xviii. 19; and in some also he adds the fearfully descriptive clause, "Where the fire is not quenched," or thus, "into 'hell,' into the fire unquenchable," Mark ix. 43, 48. In at least one of the passages, though in more according to the received text, there is the additional element of "their worm dieth not," but the prevailing form of representation, both among Jewish authorities and in the New Testament, is that of penal, unquenchable fire. Hence, the frequent representation in the Apocalypse of "the lake of fire, burning with brimstone," Rev. xix. 20; xx. 10, etc.; and also the figurative use of "Gehenna" in James iii. 6, the only passage of the New Testament, save in our Lord's discourses, where the word occurs, and where the unruly tongue is spoken of as being "set on fire of 'hell,'" the fiery element being in this case regarded, not as an instrument of torture, but as the ever-active and turbulent source of mischief. Fire, therefore, it would seem, in its connection with "hell," is to be regarded as an emblem rather than as a reality; the various applications made of it, and its connection with a gnawing worm, as well as with brimstone, seem to show that we have here, as indeed generally in things pertaining to eternity, not the very form, but only an expressive emblem, of the reality.

There will be no more an actual fire in "hell," or burning brimstone, or a gnawing worm, than in heaven there will be thrones of gold, amaranthine crowns, rivers of pleasure or repasts of material enjoyment. But in either case the most correct and living idea we can now get of the reality is by conceiving of it under those significant emblems. Let the immediate sources of pain be what they may, the representations given in Scripture leave no room to doubt that there is a place for the finally impenitent where pain shall for ever urge them—pain not less intense and awful, than if the unhappy victims were cast into a lake of fire, or had a worm perpetually gnawing at the vitals of their being. And if anything could add to the certainty and horror of such a fearful looking for of judgment, it would be the circumstance that the strongest announcements respecting it came directly from the lips of the merciful Redeemer and from the pen of his most gentle and loving disciple. Nothing but the stern realities of truth could have drawn such revelations of the coming eternity from hearts so liable to be touched with the finer feelings and susceptibilities of nature. Love itself—love in its highest exercise—could here do nothing more than forewarn of the coming evil and provide the way of escape from it.

HELL, GATES OF, Matt. xvi. 18, the power of the kingdom of death.

HENRY II. OF ENGLAND.
From the tomb at Fontevrault, France.

HELLENISTS (hel-le'nists). There is much division of opinion as to whom the parties called in the New Testament Grecians are. They are contradistinguished from those called Hebrews, Acts vi., and the difference usually supposed to exist between them is that the Grecians or Hellenists were the Grecian Jews, or those who spoke Greek as their ordinary language and used the Septuagint version, while the Hebrews were those Jews who spoke the Hebrew or Syro-Chaldaic language, and used the Hebrew Scriptures. To this view is generally added that the Hellenists lived out of Palestine and the Hebrews in Palestine. Fabricius gives us no fewer than seven opinions on this question. The first is that the Hellenites mean the Gentiles; the second, that they were Jews who adhered to the Romans or lived in their pay; the third, that the term was not significant of nation or language alone, but also of faction or party; the fourth, that they were Jews of the second dispersion living in the Grecian provinces; the fifth, that they were Jews living out of Palestine, ignorant of Hebrew, and speaking the language of the land they lived in; the sixth, that they were proselytes from the Greeks; the seventh, that they were Jews living out of Judæa and speaking the Greek tongue. To these opinions Mr. Roberts has added another—that the term is not significant at all of a difference as to language or country, but that the Hellenists and Hebrews formed two parties among the Jews both at home and abroad, who differed from each other in religious principles, the Hellenists being distinguished by a liberal spirit, while the Hebrews were the rigid adherents to Judaism. A brief view of the passages where these terms occur will bring us to a satisfactory view as to who the Hellenists really were. We will first attend to the term Hebrews.

The infant church of Jerusalem was composed of Hebrews and Hellenists, Acts vi. 1. Of these the Hebrews were the most influential and powerful, and we may therefore suppose that the Hebrews were far more numerous in Jerusalem than the Hellenists. Again, we gather from 2 Cor. xi. 22 and Phil. iii. 5 that Hebrews signified a smaller section of the Jewish people than Israelite did; the latter phrase probably embraced all the natural descendants of Jacob, the former a portion of them only. Again, we gather from Phil. iii. 5 that Hebrews was not a term distinctive of a peculiar school of Jewish theology, of the school of rigid Judaism, as distinguished from a more liberal school; for when Paul would indicate that he had belonged to this rigid school of Judaism, he adds that "as touching the law he was a Pharisee," an intimation wholly superfluous if by Hebrews were meant the rigid school of Jewish opinion. Again, we gather from the fact that Paul was a Hebrew that the phrase has no reference to birth. Paul was born in the foreign city of Tarsus, and yet he was a Hebrew; he was educated at Jerusalem, but he was born abroad, Acts xxii. 3. Once more, from Paul's being a Hebrew we gather that the phrase is not distinctive of language, for Paul was equally acquainted with Greek and Hebrew; and besides, the knowledge of both these languages was common in Jerusalem. See GREECE. We gather accordingly from these passages that Hebrews in St. Paul's time meant those Jews who, whether born at home or abroad, had received their education and training in the schools of Judæa, and especially in Jerusalem. The phrase was distinctive, not of nation or language or opinion, but of the place of education. On this view, few foreign Jews would be Hebrews, while most of the home-born Jews would be designated by the term.

We now turn to the Hellenists. As contradistinguished from Hebrews, these would signify such Jews as, whether born in Palestine or not, had received their education and religious training in foreign lands. On this view, most of the Jews born abroad would be Hellenists, while few of the home-born Jews would be included in the term. We will find the notices of Scripture to agree with this view. The infant church of Jerusalem was composed of Hebrews and Hellenists, Acts vi. 1. While the Hellenists were the weaker and less numerous party, they were at the same time by no means without influence, and seem to have constituted a strong minority in the church. According to our views, these were Jews who had received a foreign education, and of such, we learn from Acts ii. 5, that there were great numbers then dwelling at Jerusalem—men who had remained up to the time of manhood in some foreign land, the knowledge of whose tongue they brought with them, but who had for some reason come afterward to live at Jerusalem. We further gather from Acts ii. 6, 41, that many of these foreign educated Jews were converted to Christianity, and thus formed that powerful minority whose murmurs against the yet stronger Hebrews we read of in Acts vi. 1. We learn somewhat more about the Hellenists in Acts ix. 29. It was with them that Paul came chiefly into controversy on his first visit to Jerusalem. They were here evidently a powerful body, for it was to guard Paul's life from them that he was sent away on this occasion from Jerusalem, ver. 30. They seem also to have prided themselves on their powers of reasoning, and as clever disputants to have stood forth as the best champions of Judaism, and were probably those same men who, Acts vi. 9, had before disputed with Stephen and brought about his death, and on which occasion Paul had himself sided with them, Acts vii. 60. This would make them more eager against the convert, and would also dispose him to meet them. . It accords also with the view that the Hellenists were foreign educated Jews, of whom great numbers resided at Jerusalem. We find only one other mention of the Hellenists in the New Testament, not, however, at Jerusalem, but at Antioch, Acts xi. 20. The passage presents two readings, one having Hellenistas, the other Hellenas. The external evidence is chiefly in favor of the former, and the internal evidence appears to us also to lead to the same conclusion. In ver. 19 we are told that they who were scattered on Stephen's death came to Phenice and Cyprus and Antioch, preaching to none but the Jews only; ver. 20 describes particularly the preaching of some of these just spoken of at Antioch. As they preached to none at Antioch but Jews only, the reading of ver. 20 must be Hellenistas. Their mention here, then, shows us that Hellenists is an equivalent term, or very nearly so, for Jews dwelling in the foreign city of Antioch, the Jews of ver. 19 being the Hellenists of ver. 20. While we have no doubt as to the proper reading of this verse, it is right to add that scholars of the highest name prefer the reading Hellenas. They rest their preference partly on a certain amount of external evidence, which, however, they allow to be inferior to that for the other reading, but chiefly on a contrast between vers. 19 and 20 which is said to be indicated by the use of the particle de at the beginning of the latter verse. But while this particle is commonly used in an adversative sense, it also serves frequently merely to pass from one thing to another, and by an easy transition to denote something like the connection of cause and effect. It is thus we understand it here. Having, in verse 19, mentioned in general terms the preaching of all those who were scattered from Jerusalem on Stephen's persecution, the historian seems here to take up what some of them did in following out the common course of proceeding. If, however, any are disposed to think that the particle de indicates a contrast between what was done by those spoken of in ver. 19 and those spoken of in ver. 20, it bears with this sense most powerfully in favor of believing Greeks being meant, and not Jewish Christians.

HELLER (hel'ler), YOMTOV LIPMAN BEN NATHAN, was an eminent Jewish rabbi of the sixteenth century. He was born in the duchy of Wallenstein in Germany, A. D. 1579. He belonged to the Polish school, and held positions in Vienna, Prague and Cracow. During his residence in Prague the government charged him with an assault on Christianity in a work on the Talmud, and the result of the prosecution was a fine of 10,000 florins and imprisonment. Having gained his liberty, he settled in Cracow, where he died in 1654. In addition to an autobiography, he wrote "Glossaries on the Mishna," which are esteemed by Oriental scholars.

HELMET (hel'met). See ARMS, ARMOR.

HELMONT (hel'mont), FRANCIS MERCURE, BARON VON, was a well-known character, of versatile attainments, in the early part of the seventeenth century. He was born in 1618, at Vilvorde. After a course of medicine, he applied himself to the study of alchemy, and his early leaning to such a subject indicates the tendency of his mind. Next he is found wandering over Europe with a band of gypsies, and in 1662 he turns up in Italy, where he falls into the hands of the Inquisition and is cast into prison. Shortly after, he is working with Sulzbach and Knorr on the Kabbala; and thus being attracted to Jewish literature, he published a work on "The Primitive Tongue," as he considered Hebrew to be the first language, and he held that the different letters all indicated the modulation of the lips when uttering them. In his day many believed in the possibility of discovering a panacea or universal medicine; and notwithstanding his professional knowledge, he seems to have been so credulous as to entertain such a strange idea; and he adopted some views of the Easterns, among them the belief in the transmigration of the soul. He published a work on "Ancient and Modern Philosophy," "Thoughts on the First Four Chapters of the First Book of Moses," and a work on "The Divine Attributes." After visiting England, he returned to the Continent of Europe, and died at Berlin or at Cologne, in the year 1699.

HELMORE (hel'more), THOMAS, a clergyman of the Church of England, son of a dissenting minister, was born in 1811. He is chiefly known as the author of "The Psalter Noted," "The Hymnal Noted," "The Manual of Plain Song," and much other sacred music popular in the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was priest in ordinary of her Majesty's chapels royal and choir-master of the chapel royal of St. James.

HELMUTH (hel'muth), JUSTUS CHRISTIAN HENRY, D.D., an eminent, very devoted and learned German minister, whose early life was invested with much interest, as his future course was crowned with abundant blessings. He was born in 1745, at Helmstadt, in the duchy of Brunswick. Under a sense of annoyance because God had not answered his prayer to spare his father's life, he deserted his home, and was found by a nobleman, who took charge of him and had him educated at the Orphan House at Halle. Here he commenced his preaching, and the celebrated Bogatzky, the author of "The Golden Treasury," was present at his first sermon. He was ordained and sent to America in 1769. After ten years' labor in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, he removed to Philadelphia, where he preached as long as health and strength permitted him. His great attainments attracted the attention of the trustees of the university of Pennsylvania to him, and for eighteen years he held the position of professor of German and Oriental languages in that institution, from which also he received the degree of doctor of divinity. As a preacher he was extensively known. His tenderness and unction were quite unusual, and accordingly the results which he produced were very striking. His piety rested on a solid basis, and hence he was equal to any emergency in duty. When yellow-fever prevailed in the city as a pestilence, he attended the sick and the dying most diligently, and it is on record that he buried upward of six hundred persons connected with his church. He was associated with Dr. Schmidt in the management of a seminary for training Lutheran ministers, and he labored in that institution for many years. He produced several books for the young, one on "Baptism and the Scriptures," and one on "Communion with God." His services in the "Evangelical Magazine," also, were of great value for some years. He died in his eightieth year, in February, 1824.

HELCOISE, or ELOISE (a-lo-eez), celebrated for her beauty and wit, but still more on account of her love for Abelard, was born at Paris in 1101, and died in 1164. Cruelly separated from her illustrious lover, she first became prioress of the convent of Argenteuil, and afterward abbess of the Paraclete, where she founded a new convent and lived in exemplary piety. See ABELARD.

HELCON (he'lon), a Zebulunite, whose son Eliab was the chief of his tribe, Num. i. 9; ii. 7; vii. 24, 25; x. 16.

HELFS, the designation employed for a class of official ministrations in the primitive Church, 1 Cor. xi. 28, but the precise nature of which is nowhere particularly described, and has been most variously understood. It has been supposed to mean prophetic gifts; the gift of interpreting tongues; offices of service by way of baptizing such as had been converted by the apostles, and going where they could not come; diaconal ministrations toward the sick, etc., according to the fancy of individual writers. It is surely better to leave undetermined what Scripture itself has not exactly defined. The natural import of the word seems to point to some sort of subsidiary services that were performed by persons who were not deemed qualified for the higher and more directly spiritual offices of the Church, but what these might be cannot now with any certainty be determined.

HELVETIC (hel-vet'ik) CONFESSIONS is the title applied to the later confessions of the Reformed Swiss Churches. In January, 1536, a number of learned theologians met at Basle, among whom were Bullinger of Zurich, Alexander of Erne, Grynæus and Myconius of Basle, and they addressed themselves with great earnestness to the preparation of a confession. Bucer and Capito, who had sorrowed over the separation of the Lutherans and the Calvinists, also attended, and their influence was felt in the deliberations of these theologians. The symbol was drawn up by Myconius, Grynæus and Bullinger, and in March of the same year it was adopted as a standard of doctrine. This, which was the first Helvetic Confession, was called the Second Confession of Basle, because a confession had already been drawn up at that place, and adopted at Mülhausen also, after which place it was often called. The Second Confession of Basle is Calvinistic, with a leaning toward the views of Zwingle.

In 1566 another Helvetic Confession was prepared, because the former had not given universal satisfaction, as it was held that a Lutheran influence prevailed among the members who drew it up. At the request of the elector Frederick III.,

Bullinger, assisted by Beza and Gualtier, revised it, and he succeeded in having it adopted in his dominions in the year 1565. In the diet at Augsburg, in 1566, he used it in the discussions with the Lutherans. In 1578 it had been so extensively known and approved of that all the Swiss cantons, together with the churches in Poland, Hungary, France and Scotland, had agreed to adopt it. On the disputed questions about the Lord's Supper it adopts the views of Calvin, and the Augustinian doctrine of election, though stated, is set forth in milder terms than those of Calvin. On this point and on predestination the phraseology is such that Calvinists and Arminians have often disputed as to what side its teaching really leans toward.

HELVETIC CONSENSUS (consen'sus). The doctrines of Amyraldus and of the Saumur divines were displeasing to the more earnestly Calvinistic theologians in the Swiss churches, and at their instance J. G. Heidegger was induced to draw up a confession in which these views would be opposed. Turretin, Hottinger and other Swiss divines took part in the work. It took very high ground on the subject of inspiration, holding that in the Old Testament not only the words, but the consonants, the vowels, and even the points, were divinely inspired. Great decision is manifest on the subjects of sin, grace, atonement and predestination. It was adopted by the magistrates in Berne, Zurich and Basle in 1675, and in 1679 it was received by Geneva; and finally it was made authoritative over ministers, teachers and all professors. In 1706 it began to lose its hold on Geneva, and in 1740 it had fallen into disuse. The younger Turretin advocated its removal, and it has often been described as a manifesto of a party rather than a creed.

HELVETIUS (hel-vay'sh'us), CLAUDE ADRIEN, a French philosopher, was born at Paris, in 1715. After receiving a good education, he went to Caen, where he learnt from an uncle the system of finance. Through the influence of the queen, Marie Leczinska, who was attached to his parents, he obtained a situation, at the age of twenty-three, as farmer-general. This he resigned after thirteen years' enjoyment of it, in order that he might study philosophy, having conceived the ambition of obtaining literary distinction. He was partly influenced by the flattery of Voltaire, who praised his verses and called him Atticus. He wrote a philosophical work, "De l'Esprit," which was pronounced by the doctors of the Sorbonne to be a repertory of all the wicked things that had ever been printed. It degraded the nature of man to that of mere animals, removed the restraints of vice and the incitements of virtue, set up selfishness as man's guiding star, and offended even Voltaire. Though Helvetius retracted it, it was condemned by the Parliament of Paris to be publicly burned. A posthumous work, entitled "De l'Homme," is a continuation of the former treatise, and contains a fuller development of the doctrines laid down in it, but at the same time many new ones, particularly relating to education. With all his vanity and selfish ambition, Helvetius united warmth of heart and generosity of soul; he was most liberal with his money and was happy in domestic life, having married the beautiful Mlle. de Ligneville. He died at Voré, in 1771.

HELVICUS (hel-ve'kus), CHRISTOPH, a celebrated Hebraist, was born in Darmstadt in the year 1581. He was educated at Marburg, where he made astonishing progress, being able to teach Hebrew at twenty years of age. He had mastered the language so thoroughly that he spoke it as fluently as his native tongue. He became a professor in the new university at Giessen in 1605, and in 1610 he was removed from the Greek and Hebrew studies to that of divinity. His most remarkable work was on "Chronology." It has been translated into English, and it still holds its place in libraries. He died in 1617.

HELVIDIUS (hel-vid'e-us), a celebrated controversialist of the fourth century, who, in consequence of his views, was called a heretic. He outer garment, which was quadrangular, there was to be a narrow blue riband, the same color that the high-priest wore on his breastplate and mitre; and it is supposed that these fringes or borders were designed to indicate that the wearers were consecrated to God. They were in process of time enlarged; and it was one part of the hypocrisy of the Pharisees so to enlarge them as to attract special notice, Matt. xxiii. 5. Hence there was a kind of sacredness attributed to the hem of the garment; and this seems to have been the reason why diseased persons specially desired to touch the hem of Christ's garment, Matt. ix. 20; xiv. 36; Luke viii. 44.

HEMAN. 1. A person remarkable for his wisdom, 1 Ki. iv. 31. Possibly he may be the same person as the one mentioned of the posterity of Judah, in the line of Zerach, 1 Chr. ii. 6; and this last, though called the "son" of Zerach, may be, according to the ordinary usage of the word, a more distant descendant. 2. An eminent Levite in David's time, grandson of Samuel the prophet. He had fourteen sons and three daughters, and was one of those who took a leading part in the administration of the sacred services; he is also called (as Asaph and Jeduthun) "the king's seer in the matters of God," 1 Chr. vi. 33; xv. 17, 19; vi. 41, 42; xxv. 1, 4, 5, 6; 2 Chr. v. 12; xxix. 14; xxxv. 15. His sons continued to hold the position in which their family was placed by David. 3. One of the psalms is ascribed to Heman the Ezrahite—i. e., the descendant of Zerach, Ps. lxxxviii., title. Whether this Heman was identical with No. 1 must be uncertain.

HEMAN, Gen. xxxvi. 22. See HOMAM.

HEMANS, FELICIA DOROTHEA, whose maiden name was Browne, an amiable and accomplished poetess, was born at Liverpool in 1794, of respectable parents, who subsequently took up their residence near St. Asaph, Wales. She married young, but her marriage was unhappy, and after the birth of five children a permanent separation between herself and her husband took place. From childhood she had an ardent thirst for knowledge, and her reading was extensive and varied. It has been truly said that, of all the sex, "few have written so much and so well as Felicia Hemans." Although her writings possess an energy equal to their beauty, yet are they so pure and so refined that not a line of them would delicacy blot from her pages. Her imagination was rich, chaste and glowing, and in her social intercourse she was no less amiable than vivacious. After her establishment at St. Asaph was broken up, she retired to Wavertree, near Liverpool, but remained but three years only, when she settled in Dublin, where she died, on the 16th of May, 1835, in the forty-first year of her age, leaving five sons to bewail her loss. Mrs. Hemans enjoyed the friendship of Heber, Campbell, Wordsworth, Walter Scott and Archbishop Whately. Her works, consisting for the most part of lyrical compositions, have been collected and published in seven volumes. Among resisted the superstitious tendencies of the Church, especially toward clerical celibacy and the worship of the Virgin. He defended his opposition to the latter practice by citing the authority of Tertullian and Victorinus as well as the New Testament to the effect that Mary had other children besides Jesus, but maintained that his views in no manner detracted from the honor of Mary. Jerome wrote a treatise against him which contained some passages from his writings.

HELİYOT (hay-le-o'), PIERRE, a learned Franciscan monk, known as Father Hypolitus, born at Paris in 1660. He wrote a "History of Religious and Military Monastic Orders," the materials for which he collected during his travels through France and Italy on business of his order. He died in 1716, while the work was in course of publication, and it was completed by Bullot.

them may be named the "Vespers of Palermo," "The Forest Sanctuary," "Records of Women," "Songs of the Affections," "National Lyrics and Songs for Music," etc.

HEMATH (he'math). This name, so spelt in 1 Chr. xiii. 5 and in many copies of our version of Amos vi. 14, is identical with HĀMATH, which see.

HEMATH (hem'ath), the father of the house of Rechab, 1 Chr. ii. 55.

HEMDAN (hem'dan), one of the descendants of Seir the Horite, Gen. xxxvi. 26. His posterity probably were some of the tribes of Arabia Petræa. In 1 Chr. i. 41 he is called Amram.

HEMERO-BAPTISTÆ (hem'ay-ro-bap-tis'-tay), a heretical sect of the Jews mentioned by Eusebius and Epiphanius; so named from their washing themselves daily as a religious rite, which practice they held to be necessary to salvation.

HEMLOCK (hem'lok), Hos. x. 4; Amos vi. 12. The word thus rendered in these places is elsewhere translated "gall." See GALL.

HEMMENWAY (hem'men-way), MOSES, D.D., born at Framingham, Massachusetts, in 1735. He was a graduate of Harvard College, and until his death, in 1811, labored as a Congregational minister in Wells, Massachusetts. He published a number of controversial tracts and sermons, among which are "A Discourse on the Divine Institution of Water Baptism as a standing Ordinance of the Gospel," and "Remarks on the Rev. Dr. Emmons' Dissertation on the Scriptural Qualifications for Admission and Access to the Christian Sacraments, and on his Strictures on a Discourse concerning the Church."

HEMMERLIN (hem'mer-lin), or HÄMMERLEIN (hem'mer-line), FELIX, a Swiss theologian, born at Zurich in 1389. He studied the canon law at the university of Erfurt, and held successively the offices of canon at Zoffingen and provost of Saint Ursus, in Soleure. He bore a conspicuous part in the Council of Basle; and in consequence of his zeal in reproving the licentiousness of the clergy, he incurred their bitter resentment, which led to an attempt upon his life in which he was seriously wounded. This did not deter him, however, from his attempts at ecclesiastical reform, and through the influence of his colleagues at Zurich he was deprived of all his emoluments. His troubles were increased by the enmity aroused by his published denunciation of the Swiss confederates who attacked the city of Zurich in 1444. During the Carnival held there in 1454 he was seized by some of his enemies, and refusing to retract, was doomed to perpetual imprisonment. He died in 1457, in a monastery of barefooted monks at Lucerne.

HEMMINGÆ (hem-ming'geh), NICOLAUS, D.D., a learned Danish divine, was born in 1513 in the isle of Laland. He was educated at the university of Wittenberg, where for five years he was the sedulous disciple of Melancthon. He became professor of Hebrew and of divinity, and minister of the church of the Holy Ghost in Copenhagen. He was suspected, unjustly it would appear, of an inclination to one of the many phases of Calvinism, and in consequence lost his appointments. In 1579 he was made canon of Roeskilde, where he died in 1600. He left a few unimportant writings.

HEMSEN (hem'sen), JOHANN TYCHSEN, a German theologian, was born at Boldixum, October 15, 1792. After studying at Copenhagen and Gottingen, he became doctor of philosophy in 1821 at the university of the latter place, where he was appointed professor extraordinary of theology in 1823. He died May 14, 1830. His chief works are—"The Authenticity of the Writings of John the Evangelist," "The Apostle Paul, his Life, Labors and Writings," published after his death, under the superintendence of Lucke and Goeschen, in 1830. Hemsen was an amiable and pious man, but of very moderate abilities.

HEN. This familiar bird is alluded to only in our Lord's touching simile when lamenting the perverseness of Jerusalem, Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 34, comp. 2 Esd. i. 30. It is remarkable that a bird which must have been so common in Palestine should not be more frequently mentioned.

HEN, a person to whom, with others, certain crowns were to be given as memorials, Zech. vi. 14. He is possibly the same as Josiah, ver. 10, but some critics do not suppose that the word is here a proper name.

HENA (hen'a), twice mentioned in Scripture, 2 Ki. xix. 13; Isa. xxxvii. 13, and one of a number of cities taken and destroyed by some of the kings of Assyria previous to the invasion of Judæa by Sennacherib. What are believed to be the ruins and traces of these cities are still found on the banks of the Euphrates. Travelers are divided as to the exact situation of Hena, but the balance of probability favors the site near to Sepharvaim or Sippara, now Mosaib, where an ancient town of the name of Ana still exists, with the ruins of what appears to have been an immense city in its immediate neighborhood.

HENADAD (hen-a'dad), the head of a Levitical family distinguished for the share they had in the rebuilding of the temple, Ezra iii. 9. It is the same person apparently who is mentioned as the father of Bavai and Binnui, who assisted in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 18, 24, and the latter of whom signed the covenant for his family, x. 9.

HENDEL (hen'del), WILLIAM, D.D., a German Reformed minister of eminent pulpit talents, born in the Palatinate in the early part of the eighteenth century. After completing his theological preparation, he emigrated to America in 1764, and had charge successively of the German Reformed congregations of Lancaster and Tulpehocken, Pennsylvania. He subsequently removed to Philadelphia, where he died in 1798 of yellow-fever during the prevalence of the epidemic, which broke out shortly after his arrival.

HENDERSON (hen'der-son), ALEXANDER, one of the most eminent of the ministers of the Church of Scotland, was born in Fifeshire about 1583. He graduated at St. Andrew's, in which he afterward held the chair of philosophy. About 1615 he was appointed to the parish of Leuchars by Archbishop Gladstones, but the people manifested their hostility to the Episcopal government by closing the doors against him. It was not long, however, before Henderson himself joined in the strife against episcopacy. He was one of those who, in 1637, resisted the use of the Episcopal liturgy in Scotland, and in all the subsequent movements which led to the firm establishment of the Scottish Church he bore a leading part, its constitution being framed chiefly by him. He presided at the memorable General Assembly of 1638, the same year in which the renowned "League and Covenant" was solemnly sworn to at Gray-Friers Church, Edinburgh, and was selected to pronounce the sentence of deposition against the bishops. In 1643 he again presided at the General Assembly, and in the same year was one of the commissioners from the Church of Scotland to the Westminster Assembly. He also took part in the conference between the Parliament and Charles I., at Uxbridge, in 1645, and at Newcastle in the following year. His active life allowed but little time for literary production, but in his various documents and pamphlets pertaining to the controversy in which he was so prominent he displayed rare learning and ability, particularly in his papers on episcopacy. The Rev. Dr. Alton, speaking of Henderson, justly says, "So long as the purity of our Presbyterian establishment remains, as often as the General Assembly of our Church is permitted to convene, while the Confession of Faith and Catechisms, Larger and Shorter, hold a place in our estimation second to the Scriptures alone, and till the history of the revolution during the reign of Charles I. is forgotten, the memory of Alexander Henderson will be respected, and every Presbyterian patriot in Scotland will continue grateful for the second reformation of our Church, which Henderson was so instrumental in effecting." He died in 1646 at Edinburgh.

HENDERSON, EBENEZER, D.D., was born at Dunfermline, November 17, 1784, and died at Mortlake in Surrey, May 16, 1858. Having devoted himself to the work of a missionary to the heathen, he set out with a view of proceeding to India by way of Denmark, direct access to the British possessions in India not being then permitted to any but the servants of the company. Whilst at Copenhagen circumstances occurred which led to his relinquishing his intention of going to the East, and to his devoting himself to

Bible circulation in the north of Europe. In this work he was engaged from 1805 to 1825, and in pursuance of it traveled through most of the northern countries and through the south of Russia. In 1818 he published his "Travels in Iceland," and in 1826 his "Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia," both works of deep and lasting interest. While engaged in circulating the Scriptures, he was at the same time a laborious student of their contents, making himself familiar with the Oriental languages and with all the helps which the scholarship of the Continent afforded to the exploration of their meaning. His well-known attainments in this department led to his being appointed in 1826 president of the Mission College connected with the London Missionary Society at Hoxton, and in 1830 he became professor of theology and Biblical literature in Highbury College. Declining strength obliged him to resign this office in 1850, when he retired to Mortlake. Here he officiated for some time as pastor of a small congregation at East Sheen, but this duty, too, he was obliged to relinquish some years before his death. Besides the works above mentioned, he published a translation of the "Exposition of the Prophecies of Daniel," by M. F. Roos, "The Great Mystery of Godliness Incontrovertible," a dissertation on 1 Tim. iii. 16, "Divine Inspiration," being the congregational lecture for 1835, "The Book of the Prophet Isaiah, translated from the Original Hebrew, with a commentary Critical, Philological and Exegetical, etc.," "The Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets, translated with a Commentary, etc.," "The Book of the Prophet Jeremiah and that of Lamentations, etc.," "The Book of the Prophet Ezekiel, etc.," besides new editions of "Buck's Theological Dictionary" and "Gutbir's Syriac Lexicon," and many minor works. Dr. Henderson was a scholar of varied and extensive attainments, especially in Oriental learning, and his contributions to Biblical literature are among the most valuable the age has produced, especially his lectures on inspiration and his commentaries on Isaiah and the minor prophets. He received the honorary degree of D.D. simultaneously from Amherst College, United States, and from the university of Copenhagen, a spontaneous tribute to his learning, diligence and worth.

HENDERSON, JOHN, born at Barrow-stanes, Scotland, in 1782, was a successful merchant, who contributed largely of his wealth for the promotion of missionary enterprises and various works of benevolence. His religious zeal was conspicuous. He labored earnestly in the cause of Sabbath observance, and bore an active part by personal effort and by pecuniary aid in the promotion of the Evangelical Alliance. He died near Glasgow in 1867.

HENGSTENBERG (heng'sten-berg), ERNST WILHELM, an eminent German commentator, was born in 1802 in Frondenberg, Westphalia. He was educated at Bonn; and having studied Oriental languages, he made his debut as an author by translating an Arabic work. Shortly after he qualified as teacher of theology, of which he became professor. In conjunction with Tholuck, he established the Evangelical Church Times, which has done good service against the rationalism of Germany. His "Christology" is a standard work, and his commentaries on various books of the Bible are fine examples of sound German hermeneutics. He died in 1869.

HENHOFER (hen'ha-fer), ALOYS, born in 1789 at Volkersbach, near Ettingen, in Baden. He was trained for the Roman Catholic priesthood, but while pastor at Muhlhausen his religious convictions underwent a radical change, and he was led to feel the need of a more spiritual personal religion. Having publicly avowed his dissent from the Romish doctrines of the mass, he was excommunicated, and shortly afterward published "Christian Confession of Faith of Pastor Henhofer." His preaching soon attracted throngs of hearers. His converts were numerous, and they speedily organized an Evangelical Protestant church, of which he became pastor. He afterward labored with great zeal at Spöck, near Carlsruhe, until his death, in 1862, exerting, during his pastorate of thirty-five years, a marked influence on the cause of evangelical religion throughout Baden.

HENKE (heng'keh), HEINRICH PHILIPP KONRAD, a theologian of the rationalistic school. He was born in 1752 at Hehlen, in Brunswick. He studied at Helmstadt, where he was successively professor of philosophy and of theology, after which he was made principal of the Carolinum, Brunswick. As a philologist and theologian he showed proficiency very early in his career, but his writings show a spirit of malignant hostility to ecclesiastical authority. The work by which he is best known is the "Universal History of the Christian Church." He died in 1809.

HENKEL (heng'kel). There were several American Lutheran divines of this name, two of whom demand notice. 1. PAUL, born in 1754, in Rowan county, North Carolina. Becoming converted under the preaching of Whitefield, he studied for the ministry, and began his labors at New Market, Virginia, traveling also through the counties adjacent, instructing the young, and gathering together the scattered members of the church. He returned to his native county for a brief season, but renewed his ministry in his first field of labor. He traveled frequently through Western Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio. His mode of life was unostentatious, and his preaching was singularly powerful. He published a book of hymns, mostly of his own composition, and also a poem in German entitled "Pastime," a satire upon the vices of the day. He died in 1825. 2. CHARLES, a son of PAUL, was born in 1798 in New Market, Virginia. He pursued his theological studies under the direction of his father, and began his ministry in Mason county, whence he removed in 1820 to Ohio, and preached successively in Columbus and Somerset. He died in 1841.

HENLEY (hen'le), JOHN, born 1692, died 1756 (better known as "Orator Henley"), an eccentric clergyman. After holding a curacy and conducting the school of Melton for some time, he went to London, where he was soon regarded as a popular preacher, not so much on account of his matter as of his manner, which seems to have resembled that of the French clergy. He had been presented to a small living in the country; and being desired by his bishop to reside, he declined, and separated himself from the Church. He established an oratory for himself, which he filled with the lowest of the people by his eccentricities and his arrogant laudations of himself. Pope places him in the "Dunciad."

HENNEPIN (hen'ne-pin), LOUIS, a missionary of the Recollect order of Franciscan monks, born about 1640 in Flanders. He was one of the companions of Lasalle in his tour along the Great Lakes in 1679. He was sent upon several missionary enterprises among the Indians, and in searching for the sources of the Mississippi he ascended the river to the Falls of St. Anthony, where he was held prisoner by the Sioux for eight months. Returning to Europe, he was keeper of the convent of Renty, in Artois, and subsequently went to Holland, where he spent the remainder of his life. The date of his death is not known. Among his works is a "Description of Louisiana, etc., with the map of the country, the habits and mode of life of the savages."

HENOTICON (hen-ot'e-kon), the decree issued in A. D. 482 by Zeno, emperor of Constantinople, uniting the Monophysites and the orthodox in one profession of faith. The Nicene and Constantinopolitan Creeds were recognized in it, but the decrees of Chalcedon were ignored, and the orthodox were thus denied the advantages they had secured at the latter council. The decree was issued at the instance of Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, but in the next year was condemned by the Roman patriarch, Felix II., and finally suppressed in 518. See MONOPHYSITES.

HENRY (hen're). There have been a large number of ecclesiastics and divines of this name, among the most eminent of whom are:

1. DE BLOIS (blwah), bishop of Winchester, nephew of William Rufus, and brother of King Stephen, was an active prelate and a bold, ambitious and enterprising statesman. When England was invaded by the partisans of the empress Matilda, he at first joined her standard, but subsequently deserted it, and became her most determined enemy. The empress queen and her followers having taken refuge in the castle of Winchester, he laid siege to it, set the city on fire and consumed twenty churches, a number of religious houses and many other buildings, so little respect did he pay to the capital of his diocese when he had an ulterior object in view. Yet after this he formed a project for erecting it into an archbishopric, and had actually arranged the business with Pope Lucius II., but the sudden death of the pontiff prevented its completion. He died in 1171. He is now remembered chiefly as the founder of the hospital and church of St. Cross, near Winchester, one of the most interesting establishments in England. It never was a monastery, and yet the arrangements of the buildings, the dress of the aged inmates, their long black cloaks, with belt and cross, the style of the church edifice,—all carry the mind of the visitor back to the twelfth century. Few places in the kingdom present a more melancholy evidence of the manner in which endowments may be perverted, and the benevolence and liberality of noble minds directed to most selfish uses. The church is universally regarded as a specimen of singular beauty. In style it is Norman, with many members running into Early English forms.

2. Surnamed the CARDINAL, born in 1512, was the third son of Emmanuel, king of Portugal. He entered the Church, and under royal patronage became archbishop of Evora in 1540. Yielding to the spirit of the age, he admitted the Inquisition into his diocese. King Sebastian, his nephew, died in 1578, leaving him as next heir to the throne, and hence Portugal was ruled over by a bishop-king. He was pious according to the light which he had. He died in 1580, after reigning only two years.

3. OF GHENT (g'ant), a French philosopher and theologian, was born in 1217 at Ghent, and graduated at the university of Paris. He was lecturer on philosophy and theology at the Sorbonne, where he rapidly achieved distinction as a successful teacher. In his philosophy he belonged to the school of the Realists. He originated some new theories in psychology, and exposed many errors in philosophy, but proposed no remedies for them. He was made canon and afterward archbishop of Tournay. He died in 1293.

4. OF GORCUM (gor'kum), a philosopher and theologian of the fifteenth century, was born at Gorcum in Holland, and rose to be vice-chancellor of the academy of Cologne. Among his writings were a "Tractate on Ecclesiastical Ceremonies," a treatise "On the Observance of the Festivals," and one "Against the Hussites," besides commentaries on Aristotle, Peter Lombard and Aquinas.

5. OF HUNTINGDON, archdeacon of Huntingdon and Hertfordshire, was born toward the close of the eleventh century, and attained the archdiaconate about 1123. He is known only as the author of one of the earliest English histories, written at the request of Bishop Alexander of London, and embracing the period from the Roman invasion to the accession of Henry II., A. D. 1154. The earlier part of it is largely compiled and translated from the Saxon chronicles. Henry was also a poet of no mean pretensions, some of his poems being superior to the general standard of his time.

6. OF LAUSANNE (lo-zan'), a reformer of the twelfth century, and founder of the sect of "Henricians." Having been, it is said, a monk of the order of Clugny, he became disgusted with the prevailing corruptions, and forsaking his order, vigorously preached the gospel of repentance throughout the South of France, and gained wide celebrity for his eloquence and pious zeal. He warned the people against the vices of the clergy and exposed their errors in doctrine. His preaching is said to have been of more than ordinary power. Multitudes were awakened by his sermons, and such were their effects that the people were led to regard him as an inspired prophet. He was arrested by the archbishop of Arles, and being declared a heretic by the Council of Pisa in 1134, was confined in a cell, from which he was afterward released only to labor yet more zealously against the domination of the clergy. His influence was great with the lower classes and with the nobles, so that Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, complained that even the priests had joined themselves to the "Henricians," and publicly lamented the widespread increase of the new sect. Henry was finally arrested by order of Pope Eugene III., and condemned to imprisonment for life. He died in 1149.

7. OF ST. IGNATIUS, a Flemish theologian of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, a native of Ath in Belgium, was a member of the Carmelites and a teacher of theology in their schools. After visiting Rome, where he won the favor of Pope Clement XI., he attracted much notice as a controversialist, writing several treatises in opposition to the Jesuits and favoring the Jansenists, and a very severe letter on the "Necessity of Reforming the Society of Jesus."

8. DE SPENCER, bishop of Norwich from 1370, was distinguished for his warlike qualities rather than Christian spirit. He was a partisan of Pope Urban VI. in his contest with Pope Clement VII., and took part with Richard II. against the French king. He was also conspicuous for his severity in the persecution of the Lollards.

HENRY. The name of eight of the kings of England. I. began his reign in 1100, usurping the throne on the death of William Rufus, the rightful heir, Robert, his elder brother, being absent in foreign travel. He married Matilda, a Scotch princess, and their daughter, having married Geoffrey Plantagenet, became the mother of Henry II. Shortly after his accession he granted a charter re-establishing the laws of the Confessor, and pledged himself not to seize the revenues of any see or abbey during a vacancy. In the following year began the quarrel between the king and ANSELM, archbishop of Canterbury, respecting investitures in ecclesiastical benefices. Anselm had refused to do homage to the king, and Pascal II., who filled the papal throne in Henry's reign, supported Anselm in his refusal, and threatened to excommunicate the king for persisting in his demands. But Henry had established his power so firmly that the pope consented to a compromise, by which he allowed the bishops to do homage for their temporal properties and privileges. Henry was a monarch of great ability, and by his attainments in literature he acquired the surname of BEAUCLERC, or "the scholar." He died in Normandy, December 1, 1135. II., was the son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, and the first monarch of the house of the Plantagenets who reigned over England. He began his reign in 1154, having two years before married Eleanor, duchess of Guienne. In 1162 THOMAS À BECKET was elected archbishop of Canterbury, and then began the long and memorable struggle between the civil and ecclesiastical powers which resulted in the constitutions of Clarendon, the exile and murder of à Becket, war with France, the king's penance at à Becket's tomb and the repeal of the constitutions. The later years of his reign were embittered by the numerous revolts of his sons instigated by their mother, and by their quarrels with one another. He died of a lingering fever, at the castle of Chinon, near Saumur, July 6, 1189. III., became king in 1216, when only ten years of age, the earl of Pembroke being appointed regent. In 1236 he married Eleanor, daughter of Raymond, count of Provence. His reign covered a period of fifty-six years, but was remarkable for nothing else, or at least for nothing good. IV., surnamed BOLINGBROKE, from the place of his birth, was declared king in 1399. His reign was disturbed by frequent insurrections and plots against his life. Henry persecuted the Lollards, and obtained the passage of a law that any heretic who refused to abjure his opinions should be committed to the flames by the civil magistrate before the whole people. The great popularity which Henry enjoyed before he attained the crown was entirely lost many years before the end of his reign, and he governed his people more by terror than by affection. He died at Westminster, March 20, 1413. V., reigned from 1413 to 1422, but there is no event of his reign calling for notice in this work. VI. was the son of Henry V. and Catherine of France; was born in 1421, and succeeded his father the following year, when only nine months old, the duke of Gloucester, his uncle, being appointed regent. His reign was remarkable for no event of ecclesiastical interest, except that he founded King's College, Cambridge, and Eton College, at Eton, near Windsor. VII., the founder of the Tudor dynasty, was the son of Edmond Tudor, earl of Richmond (connecting him with the royal family of France), and Margaret Beaufort, a lineal descendant of John of Gaunt, the founder of the English house of Lancaster. He was born in 1456, succeeded Richard III. in 1485, and died in 1509, being succeeded by his son Henry VIII.

HENRY VIII. was born in 1491, at Greenwich. A few months after his accession, being then in his nineteenth year, he married Catherine of Aragon, with whom he lived for eighteen years, when, her beauty being faded, and he being enamored of one of her maids of honor, Anne Boleyn, Henry's conscience awoke to the illegality of his marriage with her, and he sought to obtain a decision of its nullity. The pope had never pronounced the marriage of Henry valid, and it required little to influence his judgment when his passions were aroused. By the advice of Cranmer, application was made to the universities of Europe, and Bologna, Padua, Orleans, Angiers, Bourges, Toulouse,

Oxford and Cambridge declared the marriage invalid. The pope seemed willing to annul the marriage, but owing to political influences he held back his decision, and at length the tergiversation of the pope drove Henry to decide on adopting the course suggested by Cranmer, who pronounced the desired decree in favor of a divorce; and Henry at once took as his second queen Anne Boleyn, whom he had married privately while waiting impatiently for the divorce. At this time men's minds were agitated by the throes of the Reformation, and the king himself had, by his Latin treatise on the "Seven Sacraments," against Luther, earned from the pope the title of "Defender of the Faith." But this affair of the divorce threw the king on the side of the Reformation. Catherine was a Roman Catholic, and the court of Rome held back from furthering the king's wishes. On the other hand, Anne Boleyn was a strenuous supporter of the Reformation, and so were all her adherents. Henry resolved to act in defiance of the pope, and lent himself to those who were desirous of promoting the Reformation. Their views fell in with his own ambition and desires. Henry caused himself to be declared supreme head of the Church, and for refusing to acknowledge his supremacy he beheaded several of the Carthusians and Sir Thomas More, and threatened to send his daughter, Lady Mary, to the Tower. He further advanced the Reformation by the suppression of the convents. But Queen Anne, who had done much to favor every step which could assist the great ecclesiastical revolution, fell out of favor with the king, and the thorough hardness of his heart was shown when he declared his marriage with her void, and, having had her beheaded upon a false charge of adultery and incest, married Jane Seymour the next day. The ecclesiastical measures which Henry had taken led to outbreaks in various parts of the kingdom, but Henry marched in person against the insurgents and awed them into submission, though with much difficulty. These outbreaks only urged him on in his steps for the suppression of the religious houses, the property of which was divided among his favorites, or gambled away by himself, his conscience being salved by erecting a few additional bishoprics with part of the confiscations. Queen Jane, having died in giving birth to a son (Edward VI.), was succeeded by Anne of Cleves, whom he put away six months after, the subservient Parliament and Convocation readily pronouncing the marriage null. All this time Henry was dealing with ruthless hand against all opponents. The Protestants, who went beyond the limits he had marked, and the Papists, who denied his supremacy, he sent together to Smithfield to be burnt; his own will was the only measure of law and justice. He did not, however, relinquish the character of a suitor. Soon after his divorce of Anne he married Catherine Howard, and in six months she too was divorced, on the allegation of adultery. For two years Henry remained without a wife, and then married Catherine Parr, who managed by consummate prudence to avoid angering the ill-tempered and imperious king. His health had now become very bad, his temper grew worse, and he was ready to wreak his anger on any one who opposed him. Conceiving suspicions against the earl of Norfolk, he had him arrested and thrown into the Tower. A bill of attainder against him was passed by the House of Lords, and Henry, finding his end approaching, urged its speedy passage through the Commons, and gave orders for the earl's execution, but the night before it was to be carried out the king passed to his final account. In his will, revised a month before his death, he expressed repentance for his detestable life; and when Cranmer, for whom he had sent, asked him for a sign that he put his trust in God through Jesus Christ, he, being speechless, pressed his hand very earnestly, and so expired, January 23, 1547. The most eminent apologist for this king is Mr. Froude, the distinguished historian. It must be allowed that Henry had some good points. He was possessed of a vigorous understanding, and gave undeniable proofs of learning, ability and diligence. "Had he died," says Southey, "before his mind was depraved and his heart hardened by sensuality and the possession of absolute power, his death would have been regretted as a national calamity." He was the munificent patron of literature and the arts, and it is to the example which he set of giving his daughters as well as his son a liberal education that England is indebted for the enlightened women and men of the Elizabethan age.

HENRY. There were several French kings of this name, but the only one who figured to any extent in religious affairs is Henry IV., son of Antoine de Bourbon and Jeanne d'Albret. He was born at Pau, in Bearn, December 15, 1553. His mother brought him up in the Reformed religion, and Admiral Coligny taught him the art of war. He only escaped being one of the victims of the St. Bartholemew massacre by professing himself a Romanist, but he soon returned to his real faith, and placed himself at the head of the Huguenots. He soon gained a great name by some brilliant victories, and by the noble generosity he displayed after them. On the assassination of Henry III., he was acknowledged king by part of the army; but the Romanist section did not allow his accession to the throne in peace, and he had to secure his claim by hard fighting and by a profession of the Catholic faith. When he did this, all France acknowledged him. In 1598 Henry published the celebrated Edict of Nantes [see NANTES], and in the same year signed the treaty of Vervins with Spain. From that time he devoted himself to the internal affairs of the kingdom, and had succeeded in raising France to a degree of happiness it had long been a stranger to, when he was assassinated by Ravaillac, May 14, 1610. He earned for himself the title of "The Great and Good King," but his private life was stained by the licentious excesses of the age. Henry had a great appreciation for literature, and did much for the intellectual culture of the nation. He was fond of the society of scholars, and treated them more as a friend and equal than as a superior. His verses to Gabrielle have always excited the enthusiasm of his countrymen.

HENRY, CALEB SPRAGUE, D.D., a well-known American clergyman and professor, was born in 1804 at Rutland, Massachusetts. He became a Congregational minister, but in 1835 he entered the Protestant Episcopal Church. In the same year he was made professor of intellectual and moral philosophy in Bristol College. He removed to New York, where he established "The New York Review," which he edited until 1840, when he resigned its management to Dr. Cogswell. He was chosen professor of philosophy, history and belles lettres in the university of the city of New York, from which position he retired in 1852. During this time he also served as rector of St. Clement's Church, New York. He was a voluminous writer on philosophy, psychology, history and antiquities.

HENRY, MATTHEW, the great commentator, second son of the Rev. Philip Henry, noticed below, was born at Broadoak, on the confines of Shropshire and Flintshire, Wales, 18th October, 1662. Early in life he evinced an inclination for the ministry. Having received his preliminary education under his father and a Mr. Turner, he was removed to the academy at Islington, whence he proceeded to become a student of law at Gray's Inn. His legal studies, however, had not proceeded far when he relinquished them for theology, to which he thenceforth devoted himself. After preaching for about a year at Nantwich, when James II. suspended the penal laws against dissenters, in 1687, he became minister of a Presbyterian congregation at Chester, where he remained twenty-five years. From this he removed, in 1712, to Hackney, where he was permitted only a short term of labor. His death occurred in 1714, whilst on a preaching tour in the vicinity of his first charge. He was an exceedingly voluminous writer, and his writings are all excellent, but his great work is his "Exposition of the Old and New Testaments," which he had completed as far as the end of the Acts when his hand was arrested by death, on June 12, 1714. The work was finished by others. As a popular commentary on the Scriptures this work has not yet been surpassed. Without pretending to be elaborately exegetical, it yet throws a continuous stream of light on the meaning of the sacred writers; the author's analysis of the train of thought is generally satisfactory, and nothing can be more felicitous than his practical applications of the truths he educes. If the work does not show deep learning, it displays unflinching good sense, discriminating thought, sterling piety and a constant sympathy with the sacred writers, which is often of more avail for the discovery of their meaning than the profoundest learning.

HENRY, PAUL EMILIE, born in 1792, at Potsdam. He was educated at the French College in Berlin, and after studying Hebrew was consecrated minister at Neufchatel. Returning to Berlin, he was successively catechist of the Orphan Asylum, pastor of the church of Frederickstadt, and director of the French Seminary. His chief work is "The Life of John Calvin." He died in 1853.

HENRY, PHILIP, a dissenting minister of England, born in 1631, was the father of Matthew Henry. He pursued his studies at Westminster School and at Christ Church, Oxford. He commenced his ministry at Worthenbury, Flintshire, but by the Act of Uniformity in 1662 he was driven out of his church, and the Conventicle and Five-mile acts compelled him to leave his own house and conceal himself. When, in 1687, King James released the dissenters from the penalties of the Act of Uniformity, Mr. Henry fitted up a portion of his dwelling for public worship and held services daily throughout the adjacent country. He died in 1696.

HENRY, ROBERT, D.D., was born in 1718 at Muirtown, in Scotland. After leaving college he became a "licentiate," and preached at Carlisle, in Cumberland, from 1748 to 1760. Leaving England, he settled in Edinburgh in 1768 as minister of the New Gray-Friars Church, and afterward he became the collegiate pastor of the Old Gray-Friars. He is well known as the author of the "History of Great Britain," a large and valuable work which gave a great impulse in a right direction to writers of history. Instead of a mere enumeration of accessions and demises of sovereigns, of battles and sieges, he adopted the plan of producing a history of the nation and of the progress of society. He therefore treated of the manners and customs of the people, of religion and other matters, as well as of politics; and thus he prepared the way for those modern histories in which his principle is carried out in an attractive style. His history, which is learned and faithful, was much prized by Hume. He died in 1790.

HENRY, THOMAS CHARLTON, D.D., was born in 1790, in Philadelphia. He graduated at Middlebury College, Vermont, studied divinity at Princeton, was pastor of a Presbyterian church in Columbia, South Carolina, and afterward in Charleston. Among his works are "A Plea for the West," and "An Inquiry into the Consistency of Popular Amusements with Christianity." He died in 1827.

HENSHAW (hen'shaw), JOHN PRENTICE KEWLEY, D.D., born in 1792, in Middletown, Connecticut. He graduated at Middlebury College. He was originally a Congregationalist, but joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, was appointed a lay-reader, and labored zealously in establishing congregations throughout Vermont. Having been ordained, he became rector of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, and subsequently of St. Peter's, Baltimore. In 1843 he was made bishop of Rhode Island, and rector of Grace Church, Providence, where his ministry was attended with marked success. He wrote "Henshaw's Sheridan," "Theology for the People of Baltimore," "An Inquiry concerning the Second Advent," and other works. He died in 1852.

HEPBURN (hep'burn), JAMES BONAVENTURA, an eminent Scotch Orientalist, was born at Hamstocks, in Haddingtonshire, in 1573. He was bred in the Protestant religion by his father, who was a Presbyterian minister; but after studying at St. Andrew's, he embraced the Romish faith and went to Italy. He next traveled through Turkey, Persia, Palestine and most of the countries of the East; and it is asserted that he became master of so many languages that there was scarcely a region of the globe with whose inhabitants he could not converse in their own tongue. On his return he entered into the order of Minims; but the fame of his acquisitions having reached the ears of Pope Paul V., he invited him to quit his retirement, and made him keeper of Oriental books and manuscripts in the Vatican. He is supposed to have died at Venice about 1620. He published a Hebrew and Chaldaic Dictionary, and an Arabic Grammar.

HEPHER (he'fer). 1. The founder of the family of the Hephherites. He was the son of Gilead, in the line of Manasseh, who was the first of the sons of Joseph, by his wife Asenath, Num. xxvi. 32. 2. The second of the sons of Asbur by his wife Naarah, 1 Chr. iv. 6. 3. The Mecherathite, and one of "the valiant men of the armies" of David, 1 Chr. xi. 26, 36. His name is omitted in the list of David's mighty men given in 2 Sam. xxiii. 34. Kennicott is of opinion that the name as occurring in 1 Chr. xi. 36 is a corruption; and the supposition is by no means improbable, if he is right in regarding the catalogue in Samuel as the original of the two. 4. The name of a territory in Palestine whose king or petty chief was destroyed by Joshua, Josh. xii. 17. It formed part of one of Solomon's commissariat districts, 1 Ki. iv. 10.

HEPHERITES (hef'er'ites), a family of Manasseh descended from Hephher, Num. xxvi. 32.

HEPHZIBAH (hef'zi-bah). 1. The wife of HERCULES.—See the article.

Hezekiah, and mother of Manasseh, 2 Ki. xxi. 1, 2. The name is symbolically used to designate Jerusalem restored and sanctified, Isa. lxii. 4. Professor Blunt observes on this that "it is not improbable that the royal nuptials of Hezekiah occurred about the time of this prophecy, and that Isaiah, after the manner of the prophets in general, availed himself of the passing event, and of the name of the bride, as a vehicle for the tidings which he had to communicate." He considers this as illustrating the trustworthiness of the sacred record.

HERACLAS (her'a-klas), SAINT, patriarch of Alexandria, was originally a heathen, but was converted to Christianity under the teaching of Origen, at Alexandria, with whom he was afterward associated as a catechist; and when Origen left Egypt, he continued in charge of the theological school of Alexandria until he became patriarch. He died in 246.

HERACLITUS (her-a-kle'tus), of Ephesus, a Greek philosopher by birth belonging to the Ionian school, flourished about B. C. 500. He was a profound thinker, well acquainted with the systems of preceding philosophers, traveled in his youth, and by his melancholy temperament and unsocial habits acquired the title of the Weeping Philosopher. He was also called the Obscure Philosopher on account of the difficulty of understanding his writings. Disgusted with society, he withdrew at last to a mountain solitude, and lived on herbs, but when seized with illness returned to Ephesus and died there. He founded a philosophical sect named after him, but his system, originally remarkable for its obscurity, is now imperfectly known. His fundamental principle was that fire was the first element of all things and the universal agent. Plato and the Stoics adopted many of the acute and original views of Heraclitus.

HERACLIUS (her-ak'le-us), emperor of the East, was born about A. D. 575. After distinguishing himself in military affairs, he visited Jerusalem, and thenceforth he became theologian instead of soldier, adopting the so-called Monothelite heresy, and published an edict—his "Ecthesis," or exposition—in favor of it. Meanwhile, the great Khaled, "Sword of God," was overrunning the empire and conquering Syria and Palestine, Amrou also invading Egypt. Tradition says that he recovered the true cross from the island of Syros and brought it to Jerusalem. He died in 641.

HERALD (her'ald). This word occurs but once in the Scriptures, Dan. iii. 4. In the New Testament the idea is familiar, and the word "herald" might sometimes be well substituted for "preacher," 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 5.

HERB (erb). See GRASS.

HERBART (her'bart), JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a German philosopher, was born at Oldenburg in 1776. He studied at the university of Jena, where he became a disciple of Fichte, whose system, however, he soon abandoned. Soon after, he was introduced to Pestalozzi, whose influence confirmed his own tendency to the practical in philosophy. He was professor of philosophy at Göttingen, afterward at Königsberg, and was superintendent of the high schools in East Prussia. In 1833 he was again appointed to the chair of philosophy at Göttingen, which he held till his death. Herbart developed peculiar opinions in opposition to most of the existing systems of philosophy, rejecting the method of psychology, aiming at a science of mind based on mathematics, and maintaining that philosophy is not a science or explanation of any one subject, but a certain method of treating any subject—a development and elaboration of notions or conceptions. But his views are sometimes left in obscurity from the brevity with which he states them. He wrote several works on education in the earlier part of his career, and expounded his philosophical views in the following, among other, works: "Studies in Philosophy," and "Short Encyclopædia of Philosophy." He died at Göttingen, in 1841.

HERBELOT (er-be-lo'), BARTHELEMY D', a profound Orientalist, was born at Paris in 1625. He early acquired an intimate knowledge of the languages of the East. He passed a long time in Italy consulting natives of various Eastern countries who were to be met in its marts of merchandise and inspecting manuscripts. At Florence he was much noticed by the grand duke, who presented him with many valuable Oriental manuscripts. He returned to France, was made interpreter of Oriental languages, professor of Syriac and pensioned. He then employed his time on his "Bibliothèque Orientale," a work which shows immense erudition, and contains valuable information on all which concerns the people of the East. He died in 1695.

HERBERT OF NORWICH, known as HERBERT DE LOSING, or LOZING, one of the most eminent of the ancient bishops of Norwich. He is deservedly recognized as the founder of the cathedral. Herbert came to England with William Rufus, and purchased the bishopric for the enormous sum of £1900. He also bought the dignity of the abbot of Winchester for his father, at the cost of £1000; but such scandalous simony caused him to be cited to Rome before the pope in 1090. He lost his pastoral staff and ring, and was commanded to build several churches and monasteries as a penance for his sins. Being restored, he removed the see from Thetford to Norwich, when he laid the foundation of the cathedral, in 1096, and soon after it was constituted the mother-church of all Norfolk and Suffolk. The oldest parts of the cathedral and the palace exhibit their Norman origin, and they, no doubt, are the work of Herbert, who is justly credited with the erection of the choir, the transept and the central tower. He died on the 22d of July, 1119. Eborard, who succeeded Herbert, completed the cathedral by erecting the nave with its side-aisles. This cathedral justly holds the character of a church of the first magnitude, and it ranks along with York, Lincoln, Salisbury, Peterborough and Winchester. It is on a low site, and therefore it does not present an imposing appearance from any distant point. The whole structure bore the style of the Norman age, but frequent changes and alterations had to be made because of great fires at different times, and hence the forms of later styles appear in different parts of the edifice. Thus John de Oxford in 1197, Walter de Suffield 1244 to 1257, Ralph de Walpole 1295, Percy 1361, Lyart 1463 and the celebrated Bishop Goldwell (see GOLDWELL), all left the impress of their ages on different parts of this cathedral. The windows in the clere-story of the choir are Transition Decorated, the choir in all its parts being most imposing in character. The great west window is Perpendicular, and yet the arches on the external walls of the side-aisles are Norman, and the doors underneath are Norman also, but the great central doorway is Pointed and Perpendicular. The following measurement will show the vast dimensions of this great edifice: From the great western door to the end of the eastern apse, 412 feet; the transept is 177 feet long, and the height of the central tower and spire is 313 feet.

HERBERT, EDWARD and GEORGE, brothers, alike eminent for intellectual endowments and as accomplished writers, but differing widely as the poles in their theological views. They were descended from the very ancient Pembroke family. The former, Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, was born at Montgomery Castle, in Shropshire, on the border of Wales, in 1581, and educated at University College, Oxford. He entered the army, and served with distinction under the prince of Orange, and subsequently equally distinguished himself as a diplomat. James I. showed his appreciation of him by creating him a peer, first of Ireland and then of England. He wrote a "History of the Reign of Henry VIII." and numerous other works of more or less merit, but he is notorious as the author of two works which have won for him the unenviable title of "the father of English Deists." These works, designated respectively "De Veritate" and "De Religione Gentilium," show Lord Herbert to have been a learned and a keen writer, but not only destitute of, but absolutely inimical to, all positive religion. A remarkable feature of "De Veritate," and one that does not add to the author's reputation as an honest, or at least as a consistent, writer, is that, while he totally rejects the Scriptures as a revelation from God, he yet claims that he received a revelation from Heaven to encourage the preparation and publication of his work. He tells us seriously, as if he expected the reader to believe the absurdity, that he "asked for a sign," and was answered by "a loud, though yet gentle, noise from heaven." A revelation to disprove Revelation! Lord Herbert's theories and arguments have been overwhelmingly refuted by Gassendi, Baxter, Locke, Halyburton, Leland, Kortholt, Van Mildert and numerous other able writers. See article on his contemporary, THOMAS HOBBS.

George Herbert, the author and prototype of "The Country Parson," was a younger brother of Edward, and is even more conspicuous for fervent, enlightened piety and earnest godliness of thought and life than the elder is for the opposite characteristics. He was born at Montgomery Castle, Wales, April 3, 1593. Naturally endowed with great gifts of mind, these were carefully cultivated under his pious mother's fostering care. At twelve years of age he was sent to Westminster. From Westminster he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was elected scholar, and in due time became Fellow and public orator. In the discharge of his duty in the latter capacity, on the occasion of James I.'s presentation to the university of his book, "Basilikon Doron," he attracted the attention and favor of that scholarly king. From that time he was much in the monarch's presence, who pronounced his "learning and wisdom much above his age and wit." He was highly esteemed for his knowledge, as well as his gentle bearing, by Sir F. Bacon and Bishop Andrews. Thus he had formed a natural pride of his intellectual powers, and he became animated with strong worldly ambition. The object he aimed at was to become a secretary of state, which he hoped to attain through the marked favor of the king toward him; and the better to qualify himself for the post, he studied modern languages. But all his hopes were blasted by the death of the king and of other influential patrons. At this juncture he went into retreat to his brother's house in Kent, there to take counsel with himself and God. During these past years he had, under God, kept his soul alive by his fondness for and practice of music, of which he was in the habit of saying that "it did relieve his drooping spirits, compose his distracted thoughts and raise his weary soul far above the earth." The struggle he had in his retreat was fierce; the pomps and pleasures of a court wooed him back to his former life; the secret promptings of his regenerate nature pointed to a different one. He came forth from the ordeal a visibly changed man; all human ambition was laid aside—he was clothed in the Christian robe of humility; and he was resolved to devote his great talents to the service of the sanctuary. He was shortly after made deacon by the bishop of Lincoln, and prebendary of Layton Ecclesia, in the diocese of Lincoln, by Archbishop Williams; in 1630, having been ordained to priest's orders, he was presented by Charles I. to the living of Bemerton, in the diocese of Salisbury. On tolling himself into possession of that benefice, he prostrated himself for a long time before the altar of the church, and there resolved upon the rules of life for a humble priest which he religiously adhered to till his death, which removed him from the scene of his devoted labors at the early age of thirty-nine years. George Herbert, in his short life, produced a large number of works, both in prose and verse; the best known is his "A Priest to the Temple; or, The Country Parson, his Character and Rule of Holy Life." Though this has not escaped the censorious pens of some hypercritics, it has been and ever will be admired by earnest and devout Christians of all lands, and will outlive the criticisms of its self-constituted censors. Were it the only evidence within our reach, it would be ample to substantiate the high praise of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who calls him "that model of a man, a gentleman and a clergyman." Among his poetical works, the chief is "The Temple," a collection of divine songs which ranks him among the poets of England. Coleridge has spoken in the strongest terms of Herbert's valuable contributions to sacred poetry, and comparing them with recent versifiers, says "that while they in most fantastic language convey the most trivial thoughts, Herbert and his school convey the most fantastic thoughts in the most correct and natural language. The former is a riddle of words, the latter an enigma of thoughts." Herbert's poetry has been unfavorably criticised by some; but if we were doubtful of our own fitness to form an opinion, we should feel fully sustained in our high estimate of its merits by the fact that, besides Coleridge, such distinguished judges as Henry Vaughan, Baxter, Dryden, Cowper and others not less eminent, were among its admirers.

HERBERT, WILLIAM, D.C.L., dean of Manchester, was the third son of Henry, earl of Carnarvon, and grandson on the maternal side of Charles, earl of Egremont. He was born at Highclere Castle, Bucks, in 1778, and educated first at Eton, then at Christ Church and Merton College, Oxford, where he graduated A. M. in 1802, and became a Fellow in 1808. He first entered Doctor's Commons and distinguished himself, then served with distinction in Parliament, but in 1814 relinquished his legal and political career, and determined to enter holy orders. He was ordained, and became rector of Spofforth, York, where he labored for twenty-six years, and in 1840 was appointed dean of Manchester. He was a voluminous and often brilliant writer in prose and verse on a variety of subjects, but his great work was "Attila, King of the Huns; or, the Triumph of Christianity," a work which an eminent critic well says "displays a union of acuteness and erudition, with great poetical talents." He died in 1847.

HERCULANEUM. See POMPEII.

HERCULES (her'ku-leez), Greek Hēraklēs, is mentioned in 2 Macc. iv. 19, as the Tyrian god to whom the Jewish high-priest Jason sent a religious embassy with the offering of 300 drachmæ of silver. That the Tyrian Hercules is the same as the Tyrian Baal is evident from a bilingual Phœnician inscription found at Malta (described by Gesenius), in which the Phœnician words, "To our lord, to Melkarth, the Baal of Tyre," are represented by the Greek Hēraklei, Archēgēte. Moreover, Hercules and Astarte are mentioned together by Josephus, just in the same manner as Baal and Ashtoreth are in the Old Testament. The further identity of this Tyrian Baal with the Baal whom the idolatrous Israelites worshiped is evinced by the following arguments, as stated chiefly by Movers. The worship of Baal, which prevailed in the time of the Judges, was put down by Samuel, and the effects of that suppression appear to have lasted through the next few centuries, as Baal is not enumerated among the idols of Solomon, nor among those worshiped in Judah or in Samaria, where we only read of the golden calves of Jeroboam. That worship of Baal which prevailed in the reign of Ahab cannot, therefore, be regarded as a mere continuation or revival of the old Canaanite idolatry (although there is no reason to doubt the essential identity of both Baals), but was introduced directly from Phœnicia by Ahab's marriage with the Sidonian princess Jezebel. In like manner, the establishment of this idolatry in Judah is ascribed to the marriage of the king with a daughter of Jezebel, 1 Sam. vii. 4; 1 Ki. xi. 5-8; xii. 28; xv. 26; xvi. 31; 2 Ki. xxiii. 12, 13.

The power of nature, which was worshiped under the form of the Tyrian Hercules, Melkarth, Baal, Adonis, Moloch and whatever his other names are, was that which originates, sustains and destroys life. These functions of the Deity, according to the Phœnicians, were represented, although not exclusively, by the sun, the influence of which both animates vegetation by its genial warmth and scorches it up by its fervor.

Almost all that we know of the worship of the Tyrian Hercules is preserved by the classical writers, and relates chiefly to the Phœnician colonies, and not to the mother-state. The eagle, the lion and the thunny-fish were sacred to him, and are often found on Phœnician coins. Pliny expressly testifies that human sacrifices were offered up every year to the Carthaginian Hercules, which coincides with what is stated of Baal in Jer. xix. 5, and with the acknowledged worship of Moloch.

Movers endeavors to show that Herakles and Hercules are not merely Greek and Latin synonyms for this god, but that they are actually derived from his true Phœnician name.

HERD, HERDMAN, HERDSMAN. A considerable part of the riches of the patriarchs consisted in their flocks and herds—that is, their smaller and their larger cattle, kine forming the greatest and most valuable portion of the herds. Oxen were bred in Egypt, and Jacob and his family carried theirs down with them when they went thither. The land of Goshen, which was assigned them, was favorable for breeding and pasturing cattle; and though shepherds and herdsmen were little regarded ("an abomination") among the Egyptians, yet it was not thought unfitting for some of Joseph's brethren to be placed over Pharaoh's cattle. When the Israelites left Egypt, they took their flocks and herds with them; it is emphatically said, "very much cattle." It would seem probable that they multiplied in the wilderness, many parts of it supplying pasture; for we find the tribes of Reuben and Gad specially mentioned as possessing abundant herds, and on that account desiring to have their inheritance in the country on the east of the Jordan, which was "a place for cattle." Half the tribe of Manasseh, too, was located in Bashan, also well adapted for breeding cattle. This increase of the herds was partly due to the expedition against the Midianites; and we read that afterward their cattle increased in Gilead, and that other similar booty was obtained. Indeed, generally speaking, cattle were the prize of the victors in war; the prohibition against appropriating the flocks and herds of the Amalekites was peculiar, and it was ill obeyed by the people. We find oxen almost always mentioned if any man's property is spoken of, Ex. xx. 17; xxiii. 4; 1 Sam. xi. 7; 2 Chr. xxvi. 10. It was not considered any degradation among the Hebrews personally to tend the cattle; Saul, Elisha and others are mentioned in connection with them; and the chief of the herdsmen seem to have been persons of importance. But it was not customary, nor is it now, in the East to eat much flesh-meat, especially of oxen, Num. xi. 22; calves, however, were killed for food, Gen. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24; Luke xv. 23; and the herds yielded milk, butter and cheese, Deut. xxxii. 14; 2 Sam. xvii. 29. Oxen were employed in agriculture, and were common victims in sacrifice, 1 Ki. viii. 63; generally when young, Ex. xxix. 1; Num. vii. 15. At seasons when pasturage failed oxen were kept in stalls; there they were fed with straw chopped small, and "fodder" or "provender," which seems to have been a mixture of different kinds of grain.

Although the Israelites did not use the flesh of the ox so generally as the inhabitants of Great Britain and America are accustomed to do, still, oxen were held in high esteem because of their value in different departments of labor. They were used very generally as draught cattle, and in the labor of the farm, such as threshing grain, ploughing and other agricultural operations. Indeed, the word "baker," which is a general term, and includes male and female, ox and cow, is a generic word, implying the notion of ploughing. Besides, the Levitical law, by its enactments enjoining sacrifice, rendered oxen of great value to all the Jewish people. The wild ox is enumerated among the animals which were clean, whose flesh might be eaten, Deut. xiv. 5. The same Hebrew word occurs in Isa. li. 20, where it is rendered a "wild bull;" it implies swiftness, and denotes a species of antelope. Delineations of it are common on the ancient monuments of Egypt and Nubia.

HERDER (her'der), JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON. This truly great man, great as a poet, a philosopher, a scholar, a historian and a divine, was born at Mohrungen, August 25, 1744. His father kept a school for girls, and the young Herder was allowed no books except a Bible and a hymn-book. At the age of fifteen he became an amanuensis to Trescho, the pastor of Mohrungen, who discovered his genius and encouraged his industry. Prevented by his keen sensitiveness from becoming a surgeon, he studied at Königsberg, and was allowed to attend Kant's lecture gratis. In 1764 he became a teacher in the school at Riga, and in 1767 began to obtain some celebrity as a preacher, and made his first début in literature. In 1769 he traveled as tutor to the prince of Holstein, and after various promotions and successes was appointed general superintendent at Weimar. At this town he long lived in the zenith of his fame and prosperity, mingling on equal terms with such men as Wieland, Schiller, Goethe and Jean Paul, and exercising a great and admirable influence both as court preacher and director of education. In 1801 he became president of the higher consistory, and was soon after ennobled. He died at Weimar, December 18, 1803. At the moment when he died he was writing a hymn to the Deity, and his pen was found on the unfinished line.

Herder's literary greatness is universally recognized, and it is admitted by all that his writings had no mean share in the work of stimulating the intellect of his countrymen, and giving that mighty impulse to the thoughtful activity of Germany which has produced such grand results. But it has been the fashion to depreciate his direct merits as a theologian, which are of the most important kind. He rendered to modern theology an inestimable service—a service the effects of which it is almost impossible to overrate—by making philosophy bear directly upon religion, and by infusing a genial and poetic spirit into inquiries which he enriched with an encyclopædic range of knowledge. Gentle, fresh, clear-sighted, tolerant, liberal, he was at the same time full of firm faith and deep reverence. The light of a pure and lofty genius, the expansiveness of a glowing heart and the charm of an eloquent and lucid style give a value even to those of his works which are critically weak or theologically questionable. He has been called "the prophetic forerunner of modern theology;" and Jean Paul Richter beautifully observes that in his works "you walk as it were amid moonshine into which the red dawn is already falling, but one hidden sun is the painter of them both."

Even Herder's philosophical and literary works had an influence on theology, especially his "Ideas upon the Philosophy of the History of the Human Race," and his poems are deeply religious in tone and spirit. His directly exegetical works are "Annotations on the New Testament," and short books on the Revelation and the Epistles of James and Jude. These are perhaps the least valuable of his writings, as those on the Old Testament are the most valuable. The latter are "Oldest Record of the Human Race," an explanation of the earlier part of Genesis from a far wiser and truer standpoint than the one usually adopted, and "Spirit of Hebrew Poetry," a work into which he threw his whole heart, and of which he wrote to Hamann that "he had cherished the idea in his heart since childhood," and to Muller, "that he loved it like a child." This is his greatest theological work, and is no less valuable than Lowth's "De Sacri Poesi," and produced a wider effect in raising the poetry of the Bible from the contempt which it had incurred from the supercilious ignorance of shallow classicists, so that both these books opened a new path and mark a great epoch in the history of Bible exegesis.

Herder's theological works were published in twelve volumes, at Vienna, in 1823, and edited with a biography by his friend, J. G. Muller, at Tubingen, 1805-1820. His "Christliche Schriften" contains papers on the "Gift of Tongues," "The Resurrection," "The Redeemer," "The Son of God," "The Spirit of Christianity" and on "Religion." Besides the books already mentioned, he published Luther's Catechism, with an explanation for the use of schools, a hymn-book, and a number of other more or less valuable works. Several of his works have been translated into English.

HERES (he'rez). 1. A mount, Jud. i. 35, near to or identical with IR-SHEMESH, which see. 2. Isa. xix. 18, marg. See IRHA-HERES.

HERESH, a Levite, 1 Chr. ix. 15.

HERESY (her'e-se), as used in the New Testament, means a sect or party. In this sense it is used of the Pharisees and Sadducees as religious parties among the Jews, Acts v. 17; xv. 5; xxvi. 5; xxviii. 22; and it is in the same sense applied by them to the Christians, "sect of the Nazarenes," Acts xxiv. 5, 14. This is in accordance with the common usage of the Greek, for not only does Josephus speak of the three sects of the Jews, the Pharisees, the Sadducees and the Essenes, as the "three heresies of the Jews," but the Greeks commonly used this term to describe the schools into which their philosophers were divided.

The word itself properly means choice, or the taking of one thing in preference to another; and from this by an easy transition it passed to designate the party or body which was constituted through choosing a certain dogma or set of dogmas in preference to others. But as all such choosing implies the assertion of a right to choose, the word may come to have a bad meaning attached to it when the choice is exercised where such a right does not exist; and further, when by the exercise of such choice a small party separates itself from the great body of those who profess the same aims and the same pursuits, the application to them of the title "heresy," may involve a censure of them as so separating themselves. Hence we find in the New Testament, that the word "heresy" came to be applied within the Church to divisions among the brethren arising from arbitrary and self-willed preferences on the part of some, 1 Cor. xi. 19; Gal. v. 20; 2 Pet. ii. 1—divisions to be censured and shunned. A still further departure was made in the Church from the primitive usage of the word in the ages which succeeded the apostolic. From designating the section or body of persons making the lawless or wrong choice, it came to be used of the dogma or opinion by the choice of which they were distinguished; and as the standard set up was the assumed consent of the Church, a "heresy" came to mean any opinion in religion which was a departure from this standard. The same change passed on the cognate adjective "heretic." In the New Testament this means one who makes a party in a Church, and thereby produces division, Tit. iii. 10; in subsequent ecclesiastical usage it means a man who adopts an opinion not in accordance with the assumed Catholic belief. This usage of the term is purely ecclesiastical. The Christian writers are the first in which we find the word used without qualification. Instances, however, occur in which the Christian Fathers use the word in its original sense. They use it also sometimes of opinions which do not pretend to be Christian; but this is a rare and improper use of the term.

HERIGER (her'ig-ur). See LOBBES.

HERIOT (her'e-ot), GEORGE, a very eminent Scotchman who rose to great wealth by his diligence and integrity in business. He was goldsmith to James VI., and on settling his estate he devoted a large amount to found the well-known institution in Edinburgh known as Heriot's Hospital. It is a home for the support and education of boys. The management has been exceedingly effective, and the numerous sub-institutions established in the city are a great blessing to the Scottish capital. The date of Heriot's birth is uncertain, but 1563 is usually given, and his death is known to have taken place in 1624. The hospital was finished and opened in 1659.

HERMANN (her'mann). There have been several German theologians of this name, three of whom are of sufficient importance to be noticed here.

1. OF COLOGNE (ko-lone'), was educated in the Roman Catholic Church, and in 1515, was confirmed by Pope Leo X. as archbishop of Cologne. He early caught the spirit of the Reformation; and having attempted in vain to effect a Roman Catholic reform, he boldly avowed himself a Protestant and invited the co-operation of Bucer and Melancthon. He was in consequence excommunicated by the pope, and resigned his office in 1547, without having fully succeeded in his plans. The English "Book of Common Prayer" was framed partly upon his "Form of Service." He died in 1552.

2. OF FRITZLAR (fritz'lar), a Mystic of the fourteenth century, so named from the place of his birth in Fritzlar, Hesse. Little is known concerning him, but he was probably a rich layman who lived secluded from the world and spent his time in reading and composing works on theology. He wrote an extensive work entitled "The Holy Life."

3. OF LEHNIN (lay'nin), a monk who lived probably near the close of the thirteenth century. He is supposed to have composed a Latin poem concerning the convent of Lehnin and the house of Brandenburg, which, according to a legend, was found in one of the old walls, in the seventeenth century, when the elector intended to build a palace on the ruins of the convent. The existence of this poem, however, cannot be traced with any certainty farther back than 1693.

HERMANN, NIKOLAUS, a hymnologist of the sixteenth century. His compositions breathe a genuine Christian spirit, and many of them are still in general use.

HERMAS (her'mas), one of the Christians at Rome to whom Paul addressed special salutations in his Epistle, Rom. xvi. 14. Of his history and station in life nothing is known. By several writers, ancient and modern, he has been reputed to be the author of a work entitled "The Shepherd of Hermas," which, from its high antiquity and the supposed connection of the writer with St. Paul, has been usually classed with the epistles of the so-called Apostolic Fathers. A Latin version has come down to us from the time of Tertullian. Of the original Greek, till very recently, only a few fragments have been known as quotations in other ancient authors. But in 1859 the first part of the original, being nearly one-fourth of the whole, was discovered by Tischendorf at the end of the "Codex Sinaiticus." A mediæval Greek retranslation of the Latin version according to Tischendorf was published by Dressel in his edition of the Apostolic Fathers. It has been divided by modern editors (for in the manuscript copies there is no such division) into three books, the first consisting of four visions, the second of twelve commands and the third of ten similitudes. It is called the "Shepherd," because the "Angel of Repentance," at whose dictation Hermas professes that he wrote the second and third books, appeared in the garb of a shepherd. It is frequently quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus, by the author's name, though he does not expressly identify him as the Hermas in Rom. xvi. Eusebius is more definite. He says, "The apostle, in the salutations at the end of his Epistle to the Romans, makes mention among others of Hermas, who, it is said, wrote the book called the Shepherd; it is to be noted that this book is called in question, so that it cannot be ranked among the books received as canonical. By others it is judged to be a most necessary book for elementary instruction. And we know that it is publicly read in the churches, and that some very ancient writers make use of it." Elsewhere he says, "Among the spurious are to be placed the Acts of Paul, the book called the Shepherd and the Revelation of Peter;" and in giving an account of the opinions of Irenæus he remarks, "The book of the Shepherd he not only knew, but received with approbation, saying, Well spake the book which says, 'First of all believe that there is one God.'" This passage has been adduced, but perhaps improperly, to prove that Irenæus regarded the "Shepherd" as canonical; the word graphe, by some here translated "Scripture," may mean simply "the book" or "writing." Origen often quotes the "Shepherd," speaks of it as useful, and in his opinion inspired. Elsewhere he describes it as "a book circulated in the Church, but not universally acknowledged to be divine." Jerome also states that "it was publicly read in some of the churches of Greece, though among the Latins it was almost unknown." Tertullian classes it with apocryphal and spurious writings. If it be admitted that the "Shepherd" was written by the Hermas of St. Paul, its date must be fixed toward the end of the first century. Some eminent critics, however, ascribe it to Hermas, a brother of Pius, who was bishop of Rome about A. D. 141. Mosheim argues at some length in favor of this opinion, but the only authorities he adduces on its behalf are some lines in a poem against the Marcionites, falsely attributed to Tertullian, the fragment of an anonymous work on the canon, published by Muratori in his "Antiquitates Ital. Med. Ævi," and a passage in the "Liber Pontificalis" respecting Easter, there said to be from a book called the "Shepherd," written by Hermas, the brother of Pius, but not found in the work that has come down to us under that title. The same opinion is advocated by Hefele. Neander, while he allows that it may be doubted whether the "Shepherd" was written by the Hermas of St. Paul, seems to consider the other supposition still more questionable, since we cannot determine what credit is due to the authorities adduced in its favor, and it is difficult to reconcile with the later origination of the work the high esteem in which it was held in the age of Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria.

"The Shepherd of Hermas" was first published at Paris in 1513, and is included in the editions of the Apostolic Fathers by Cotelerius, Galland, Dressel and Hefele. Fabricius also published it in his "Codex Apocryphus." Archbishop Wake's translation is well known.

HERMENEUTÆ (her-me-neu'tay), interpreters appointed by the primitive Church to translate one language into another—an office rendered specially necessary in those countries where the people spoke different tongues, in order that they might properly understand the Scriptures as they were read to them.

HERMENEUTICS (her-me-neu'tiks). The science of theology is separable into different departments, each contemplating a distinct sphere of thought—hermeneutics, exegesis, introduction, interpretation and commentary. The exegete is a person who uses certain rules and principles in attempting to determine the meaning of a work which is given him to decipher. These rules and principles are prepared for him by the student of hermeneutics. Introduction, so far as the Bible is concerned, has to do with the arguments which go to prove its inspiration, its authenticity and divine authority. Interpretation aims at unfolding the meaning, difficulties or obscure passages, and in a general sense giving the accurate meaning of the author; and commentary, which is more diffuse, aims also at exhibiting the meaning of the text, but in a wider sense, for it arranges into system the doctrinal teaching, it enforces duties, sets forth encouragements, warns transgressors and sets forth the way of salvation. There is, therefore, in the commentary more of the style of the sermon. To hermeneutics and exegesis, therefore, belongs the interpretation of the text or the setting forth of its true meaning. See COMMENTARY and INTERPRETATION.

HERMES (her'meez), the name of a disciple mentioned Rom. xvi. 14. In the Greek Church his festival is kept on April 8. According to them, he was one of the seventy disciples, and afterward bishop of Dalmatia.

HERMES, the Greek name of Mercurius or Mercury. See MERCURY.

HERMES, GEORG, an eminent German Roman Catholic theologian, was born in Westphalia in 1775. He was educated at the academy of Münster, where, in 1807, he was appointed professor of theology. In 1819 he was called to fill the same chair at the new university of Bonn, which he occupied till his death. He was very popular as a teacher, and his views, his ability and his kindly disposition and manners drew a large number of students to him from all parts of Germany, and even from the Netherlands. While remaining perfectly orthodox and holding the doctrines of the Catholic Church, he sought a basis in reason and philosophy for the creed of the Church, and substantially maintained the right of private judgment in matters of theology. After the publication, in 1831, of a second edition of his "Introduction to the Christian Catholic Theology," it was denounced to the pope, Peronne taking a zealous part against Hermes, and in 1835 his principles were formally condemned by a papal brief. The archbishop of Cologne, his personal enemy, executed the brief with great rigor, and a hot controversy raged for some time respecting Hermetianism. Hermes died at Bonn, highly honored and beloved, in 1831.

HERMIANS (her'me-anz), a heretical sect of the second century, mentioned by Augustine and Clemens Alexandrinus. They maintained that Christ did not institute baptism by water; and in support of their opinion referred to John the Baptist's declaration, "I baptize you with water; but he that cometh after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." One of their practices was, after baptizing men with water, to touch their ears with fire; thus, as they thought, joining the one mode of baptism with the other.

HERMIAS (her'me-as), believed to have lived in the second century, was the author of "A Satirizing of the Heathen Philosophers," written after the manner of Lucian and in dialogue form, in which he reviews the various theories of philosophers concerning God and his relations to the universe, and proves their insufficiency. The work has no special merit, and is only interesting for the light it throws upon ancient philosophy.

HERMIT (her'mit), one who retires from the world for religious meditation. See MONK.

HERMOGENES (her-moj'e-neez), the name of a man mentioned by Paul in the latest of the pastoral epistles, 2 Tim. i. 15, who, with Phygellus, deserted him when "all they which are in Asia," or perhaps "they of or from Asia," had "turned away from him." The "all in Asia" cannot imply a general desertion, but only those of whom Paul had had trial. Whether Hermogenes and Phygellus had forsaken St. Paul because they were ashamed of him when in bonds, 2 Tim. iv. 16, or whether, like Hymeneus and Philetus, they had "erred concerning the truth," 2 Tim. ii. 18, is not stated. In the Roman breviary the conversion of Hermogenes is attributed to James the Great, and in the legendary history of Abdias, the so-called bishop of Babylon, Hermogenes is represented as first practicing magic, and converted, with Philetus, by the same apostle. Grotius, apparently misled by the circumstance that the historian or geographer Hermogenes, mentioned by the scholiast of Apollonius Rhodius, wrote on primitive history, and incidentally (?) speaks of Nannacus or Anacus—and may therefore probably be the same as the Hermogenes whom Josephus mentioned as having treated on Jewish history—suggests that he may be the person mentioned by Paul. This, however, is not likely. Nothing more is known of the Hermogenes in question, and he cannot be identified either with Hermogenes of Tarsus, a historian of the time of Domitian, who was put to death by that emperor, nor with Hermogenes the painter, against whom Tertullian wrote, nor with the saints of the Byzantine Church, commemorated on January 24 and September 1.

HERMOGENES, a native of Africa, lived in the second century, and was a painter, philosopher and heretic, the upholder of matter as the first principle and of idea as the mother of all the elements. He was opposed by Tertullian.

HERMON (her'mon), the southernmost and highest mountain of Anti-Libanus. It formed the north-eastern border of the promised land, Deut. iii. 8. Besides the common name Hermon, Josh. xi. 17; xiii. 5, etc., it is also called in Scripture Sion (siyon, Deut. iv. 48, quite different from the Sion or Zion of Jerusalem, ziyon), the exalted or lofty; and among the Amorites it appears to have borne the name of Sheir, Deut. iii. 9; Ezra xxvii. 5, while the Sidonians called it Sirion, Ps. xxix. 6, both of which words signify a breastplate, and probably refer to the snow on its broad summit shining in the sun, but in 1 Chr. v. 53 and Song Sol. iv. 8, Mount Hermon and Senir seem to be spoken of as distinct mountains. In modern times it is called Jebel-esh-Shiekh, which is sometimes explained as the "mountain of the old man," from the likeness of its white summit to a hoary head, but far more probably signifies the "chief of mountains." Another Arabic name is Jebel-eth-Thaly, or the "mountain of snow." Van de Velde suggests that this variety of names is explained by the fact that "it is not a conical mountain, like Tabor, with one high summit and a base distinctly marked, but a whole cluster of mountains, many days' journey in circumference, with a broad ridge of summits, the highest in the Holy Land." These summits are three in number, of nearly equal height, and at equal distances from each other, not situated in a straight line, as they appear from some points of view, but at the angles of an equilateral triangle. One of them is occupied by the ruins of an ancient temple, probably that mentioned by Jerome, which probably gave rise to the name Baal-Hermon, by which the mountain is called in Jud. iii. 3; 1 Chr. v. 23.

Hermon is a conspicuous object from all parts of the Holy Land. Its hoary top may plainly be seen from the mountains of Samaria, from the maritime plain of Tyre, from the valley of Esdrael, from the summit of Tabor, and even from the depths of the valley of the Dead Sea. Its summit as most commonly seen has the form of a massive truncated cone, and until late in the summer is entirely covered with snow, which then melts on the exposed portion of the mountain, and remains only in the gorges and ravines, giving the appearance of radiant stripes or of the thin white locks of an old man. Hermon is the limit of the geographical ideas of the Israelites to the north, as the great desert was to the south, the Mediterranean to the west and the Euphrates to the east. It is mentioned in three passages of the Psalms, all of which are worthy of notice.

1. "Therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites from the hill Mizar," Ps. xlii. 6. Perhaps it would be better to read "Hermons," which is generally understood to refer to the three peaks mentioned above. Hengstenberg considers the plural to have been used because the mountain was taken as the representative of its species, and so the word was intended to include all the mountains on the eastern side of the Jordan. But this appears somewhat fanciful, as the explanation given above, and suggested by the appearance of the mountain itself, is quite natural, and satisfies all the conditions of the passage. The last clause has been mistranslated in the Vulgate (Hermoni a monte modico), followed by the English prayer-book version, "the little hill of Hermon," and in consequence the name of Little Hermon has been given by monks and travelers to a hill on the plain of Esdrael, near Mount Tabor, called Jebel-el-Duhy, so as the better to agree with Ps. lxxxix. 12. See JEZREEL.

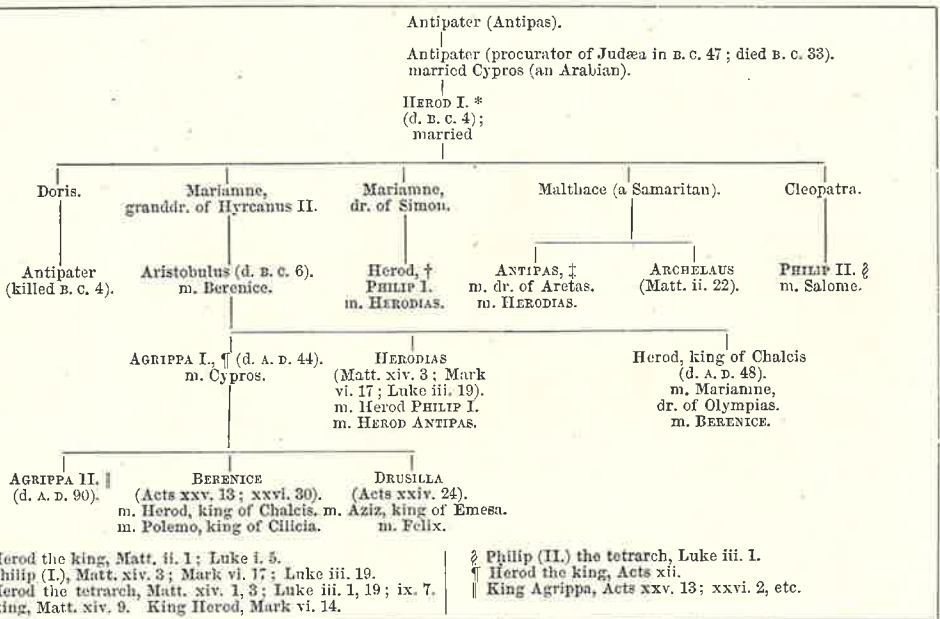

2. "The north and the south thou hast created them, Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name," Ps. lxxxix. 12. Porter supposes that Hermon here stands for the north; and if this be the case, Tabor and Hermon should correspond in the poetical antithesis to south and north. But it is far more probable that Tabor and Hermon are put for west and east in this passage, the one being the great mountain of Eastern Palestine, and the other the most noted and conspicuous hill west of the Jordan.

3. "As the dew of Hermon that descended upon the mountains of Zion," Ps. cxxxiii. 3. The abundance of the dews of Hermon arising from its perpetual snows cannot fail to be noticed by any one who visits its neighborhood. The closing words of this passage, "for there the Lord promised his blessing, even life for evermore," together with the fact that this Psalm is a song of degrees, forbids the supposition that Zion is to be understood of any other place than the well-known mount of that name in Jerusalem, and is to be identified with the name sometimes applied to Hermon itself or one of its peaks. It is rather to be regarded as a poetical allusion to the mighty influence of Hermon in promoting the formation of dew; so that, as the oil poured on Aaron's head flowed to the extreme borders of his garments, the cool breezes and refreshing mists of snowy Hermon might be said in blissful times to reach even to the seat and centre of the kingdom. So Olshausen: "The refreshing dew of Zion is derived by the Psalmist from the cool mountain which bounds the land on the north." This seems more natural and simple than the view of Hengstenberg, who would understand by Hermon's dew such as was of peculiarly fine quality—dew of the best and most refreshing nature; so that, as the goodness of the oil was rod I. This Antipater, or Antipas, son of an Idumæan of the same name, had embraced the Jewish religion when Idumæa was taken by John Hyrcanus. Afterward, disputes arising between Hyrcanus II. and his brother Aristobulus, the competing princes produced their case before Pompey. In B. C. 63 Pompey took Jerusalem, and Aristobulus was deposed; and in B. C. 47, when Cæsar came to Syria, he appointed Antipater governor of Judæa.

According to Nicolaus of Damascus, Antipater was of the stock of the principal Jews who came out of Babylon into Judæa. Various other accounts are given of his ancestry, but none are worthy of notice here. Josephus himself in several passages says that Antipater was of Idumæan descent, and that Antigonus, the adversary of Herod, publicly proclaimed that the Romans would not do justly if they gave the kingdom to Herod, who was an Idumæan—i. e., a half-Jew. The latter expression shows that he was of a proselyte family. In other passages he says that Antipater was of the same race as the Jews, and that Herod was by birth a Jew. It seems, therefore, nearly heightened by the dignity of the person who was anointed with it, the dew of Zion was ennobled by being associated with the name of the hill that was most remarkable for its production. It would be to the inhabitants of Zion as if they shared in the copious dews of Hermon.

The height of Hermon is variously estimated. Van de Velde states that the survey of Major Scott and Robe in 1840 gives a height of 9376 feet. Stanley reckons it at 10,000 feet; while Dr. Kitto calculates that it cannot be less than 12,000 feet, 11,000 feet being the level of perpetual snow in that latitude.

HERMONITES (her'mon-ites), Ps. xlii. 6. This is an incorrect rendering. The mountain had three summits, and is therefore spoken of in the plural as "the Hermons." See above.

HERODIAN (he-ro'de-an) FAMILY. We are principally indebted to Josephus for the information respecting the Herodian family, though incidental notices occur in the classical writers, especially in Strabo. It will be sufficient for our purpose to commence our consideration of their origin from Antipater the Idumæan, father of He-certain that the Herodian family were of Idumæan descent.

The splendor and magnificence of the reign of Herod shed a dazzling lustre around his government, though he was really dependent upon the empire, and wisely saw the policy, which was followed by all the members of his family, of courting his Roman masters, no doubt with the idea of forming at some time an independent Eastern monarchy. He was the first who shook the foundation of the ancient form of Jewish government as constituted by the law. He appointed the high-priests and removed them at pleasure, often filling the sacred office with men of low birth. In this he was followed by Archelaus, and afterward by the Romans, so that there were in all twenty-eight high-priests from the days of Herod to the taking of the temple by Titus, a period of 107 years.

Herod the Great had ten wives; of two of them the names have not been preserved. Accounts of the family of Herod and the combinations of relationship between the descendants of the different wives may be found in Josephus. The table accompanying this article shows the relationship between the members of the Herodian family mentioned in the New Testament.

1. HEROD I., surnamed THE GREAT, was the second son of Antipater and Cypros, an Arabian lady of noble descent. In B. C. 47, Julius Cæsar made Antipater procurator of Judæa, and the latter divided his territories among his four sons, assigning the district of Galilee to Herod. At the time when he was invested with the government he was fifteen years of age, according to Josephus, but it must be a mistake. Herod died, aged sixty-nine, in B. C. 4, consequently he must have been twenty-six or twenty-five in the year B. C. 47, when he was made governor of Galilee. One of his first acts was to repress the brigands who were infesting his provinces, and to put many of their leaders to death upon his own authority. This was made known to Hyrcanus, and Herod was summoned to take his trial before the Sanhedrim for his deeds of violence. Herod, instead of appearing before the Sanhedrim clothed in mourning, came in purple, attended by armed guards, and bearing in his hand a letter from the Roman commander, Sextus Cæsar, for his acquittal. This overawed the assembly, but Sameas, a just man, stepped forward, and boldly addressing the assembly, predicted that should the offender escape punishment he would live to kill all those who were his judges, and would not grant the pardon which the assembly seemed inclined to extend to him. He, however, escaped, and took refuge with Sextus Cæsar, who soon appointed him governor of Cœle-Syria. He then determined to march against Jerusalem, and would have done so had not his father Antipater and his family restrained him from committing any fresh acts of violence. In B. C. 44, after Cæsar's death, Cassius took the government of Syria. Herod and his father Antipater willingly assisted Cassius in obtaining the taxes levied upon the Jews for the support of the troops. For this Herod was confirmed in the government of Cœle-Syria. In B. C. 41, Antony came to Syria, and Herod, by making him valuable presents, soon formed with him a close personal intimacy. Hyrcanus, to whose beautiful granddaughter, Mariamne, Herod was betrothed, induced Antony to make Herod and his brother Phasael tetrarchs of Judæa. The invasion of the Parthians, who sided with Antigonus the Asmonæan, compelled Herod to give up Judæa and fly to Rome. Antony was then in great power, and took Herod under his protection, and seeing that he might prove useful to him, obtained a decree of the senate appointing him king of Judæa, to the extinction of all the living Asmonæan princes. These events took place in B. C. 40, and Herod, only staying seven days at Rome, returned speedily to Jerusalem within three months from the time he had first fled.

It was not, however, so easy for Herod to obtain possession of Jerusalem or to establish himself as king of Judæa as it had been to obtain this title from the Romans. The Jews still held firmly to Antigonus as the representative of the Asmonæan line, and it was not for several years that Herod made any material advance whatever. With the assistance of the Romans, Herod made preparations to take Jerusalem. He had endeavored to conciliate the people by marrying Mariamne, thinking that by so doing the attachment of the Jews to the Asmonæan family would be extended to him. After six months' siege the Romans entered the city (B. C. 37), and to revenge the obstinate resistance they had received began to ransack and plunder, and it was no easy task for Herod to purchase from the conquerors the freedom from pillage of some part of his capital. Antigonus was taken and conveyed to Antioch, where, having been previously beaten, he was ignominiously executed with the axe by the order of Antony—a mode of treatment which the Romans had never before used to a king. Thus ended the government of the Asmonæans, 126 years after it was first set up. Immediately on ascending the throne, Herod put to death all the members of the Sanhedrim, excepting Pollio and Sameas (these two are the famous Hillel and Shammai of the rabbinical writers, the founders of the two schools of doctrine), the latter of whom had predicted this act, and also all the adherents of Antigonus who could be found. Having confiscated their property, he sent presents to An-bloodshed. Hyrcanus, the grandfather of his wife Mariamne, was put to death before his visit to Octavius, and Mariamne, to whom he was passionately attached, fell a victim to his jealousy soon after his return. His remorse for the deed is well described by Josephus, who says that Herod commanded his attendants always to speak of her as alive. In B. C. 20, when Augustus visited Judæa in person, another extensive addition was made to his territories. The district of Paneas was taken away from its ruler Zenodorus for leaguings himself with the Arabs, and given to Herod. In return Herod adorned this place by erecting a temple, which he dedicated to Augustus. Not long after this, the death of his wife was followed by other atrocities. Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Mariamne, were put to death, and at last, in B. C. 4, Herod ordered his eldest son, Antipater, to be killed. Herod's painful disease no doubt maddened him in his later years, and in anticipation of his own death he gave orders that the principal Jews, whom he had shut up in the Hippodrome at Jericho, should immediately after his decease be put to death, that mourners might not be wanting at his funeral. On his deathbed, too, he must have ordered the murder of the infants at Bethlehem, as recorded in St. Matthew, ii. 16-18. Josephus has passed this over unnoticed; yet it is worthy of remark that he has given an account of a massacre by Herod of all the members of his family who had consented to what the Pharisees foretold, viz., that Herod's government should cease and his posterity be deprived of the kingdom. A confused account of the massacre of the children and the murder of Antipater is given in Macrobius, who lived in the fifth century (A. D. 420). Herod died in the thirty-seventh year of his reign (dating from his being made king by Antony) and in the seventieth year of his age, B. C. 4. His body was conveyed by his son Archelaus from Jericho, where he died, to Herodium, a city and fortress 200 stadia distant, and he was there buried with great pomp.

On the extirpation of the Asmonæan family, finding that there was then no one who could interfere with him, Herod had introduced heathenish customs, such as plays, shows and chariot-races, which the Jews condemned as contrary to the laws of Moses; and on the completion of the building of Cæsarea he also introduced Olympic games and consecrated them to Cæsar, ordering them to be celebrated every fifth year. Notwithstanding that he thus alienated his subjects from him, he greatly improved his country by the number of fine towns and magnificent public buildings which he erected. He built a temple at Samaria and converted it into a Roman city, under the name of Sebaste. He also built Gaba in Galilee and Heshbonitis in Peræa, besides several other towns, which he called by the names of different members of his family—as Antipatris, from the name of his father Antipater, and Phasael's, in the plains of Jericho, after his brother Phasael. On many other towns in Syria and Greece he bestowed money, but his grandest undertaking was the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem. It was commenced in the eighteenth year of his reign (B. C. 20), and the work was carried on with such vigor that the temple itself was finished in a year and a half. The cloisters and outer buildings were finished in eight years. Additions and repairs were continually being made, and it was not till the reign of Herod Agrippa II. (A. D. 65) that the temple was completed. Hence the Jews said to our Lord, "Forty-and-six years was this temple in building, and is not even yet completed, and wilt thou raise it up in three days?" John ii. 20. This took place in A. D. 27, just after our Lord's baptism, who "was about thirty years of age," Luke iii. 23, and who was born a few months before the death of Herod, in B. C. 4, according to the usual chronology, which places the nativity four years before the Vulgar era. This beautiful temple, though built in honor of the God of Israel, did not win the hearts of the people, as is proved by the revolt which took place shortly before Herod's death, when the Jews tore down the golden eagle which he had fastened to the temple and broke it in pieces.

The diversity of Herod's nature is remarkable. On regarding his magnificence and the benefits he bestowed upon his people one cannot deny that he had a very beneficent disposition; but when we read of his cruelties, not only to his subjects, but even to his own relations, one is forced to allow that he was brutish and a stranger to humanity. His servility to Rome is amply shown by the manner in which he transgressed the customs of his nation and set aside many of their laws, building cities and erecting temples in foreign countries, for the Jews did not permit him so to do in Judæa, even though they were under so tyrannical a government as that of Herod. His confessed apology was that he was acting to please Cæsar and the Romans; and so through all his reign he was a Jewish prince only in name, with a Hellenistic disposition. Josephus gives Herod I. the surname of Great. It is best to suppose that the title in Josephus is merely a distinguishing epithet, and not meant to express greatness of character or achievements.

2. HEROD ANTIPAS was the son of Herod the Great, by Malthace, a Samaritan. His father had already given him the kingdom in his first will, but in the final arrangement left him the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa, Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1; iii. 19; ix. 1; Acts xiii. 1, which brought him the yearly revenue of 200 talents. On his way to Rome he visited his brother Philip; and commencing an intrigue with his wife Herodias, daughter of Aristobulus, the son of Mariamne, he afterward incestuously married her. He had been previously married to a daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, who avenged this insult by invading his dominions, and defeated him with great loss. Josephus says that the opinion of the Jews was that the defeat was a punishment for his having imprisoned John the Baptist on account of his popularity and afterward put him to death, but does not mention the reproof that John gave him, nor that it was at the instigation of Herodias that he was killed, as recorded in the Gospels, Matt. xiv. 1-11; Mark vi. 14-16; Luke iii. 19; ix. 7-9. The evangelists evidently give the true version. In A. D. 38, after the death of Tiberius, he was persuaded to go to Rome to procure for himself the royal title. Agrippa, who was high in the favor of Caius, opposed this with such success that Antipas was condemned to perpetual banishment at Lyons, a city of Gaul, and eventually died in Spain, whither his wife Herodias had voluntarily followed him. He is called king by Matthew, xiv. 9, and by Mark, vi. 14.

Herod Antipas was in high favor with Tiberius. Hence he gave the name of Tiberias to the city he built on the lake of Gennesareth. He enlarged and improved several cities of his dominions, and also built a wall about Sepphoris, and around Betharamphtha, which latter town, according to Josephus, he named Julius, in honor of the wife of the emperor.

[If Josephus means Augustus, his wife Livia did not receive the name of Julia till after the emperor's death, A. D. 14, and it seems very improbable that Antipas should have renamed the city at so late a date as the death of Augustus. If he means Tiberius, his wife Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was not living with him when he came to the throne. Eusebius and Jerome state that Herod I. had given it the name of Libias in honor of the wife of Augustus. Julius (Betharamphtha) must not be confounded with the Julias (Bethsaida), enlarged by Herod Philip II., and named after the daughter of Augustus.]

It was before Herod Antipas that our Lord was sent for examination when Pilate heard that he was a Galilean, as Pilate had already had several disputes with the Galileans, and was not at this time on very good terms with Herod, Luke xiii. 1; xxiii. 6, 7, and on the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together, Luke xxiii., comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 5. The name of Herod Antipas is coupled with that of Pilate in the prayer of the apostles mentioned in the Acts, iv. 24-30. His personal character is little touched upon by either Josephus or the evangelists, yet from his consenting to the death of John the Baptist to gratify the malice of a wicked woman, though for a time he had "heard him gladly," Mark vi. 20, we perceive his cowardice, his want of spirit and his fear of ridicule. His wicked oath was not binding on him, for Herod was bound by the law of God not to commit murder. He was in any case desirous to see Jesus, and "hoped to have seen a miracle from him," Luke xxiii. 8. His artifice and cunning are specially alluded to by our Lord: "Go ye and tell that fox," Luke xiii. 32. Coins of Herod Antipas bear the title tetrarch.

3. HEROD ARCHELAUS, son of Herod the Great and Malthace, uterine and younger brother of Herod Antipas. His father had disinherited him in consequence of the false accusations of his eldest brother Antipater, the son of Doris; but Herod, on making a new will, altered his mind, and gave him "the kingdom," which had been before left to Antipas. He was saluted as king by the army, but refused to accept that title till it should be confirmed by Augustus. Shortly after this a sedition was raised against him, which he quelled by killing 3000 persons, and he then set sail with his brother Antipas to Rome. Upon this the Jews sent an embassy to Augustus to request that they might be allowed to live according to their own laws under a Roman governor. Our Lord seems to allude to this circumstance in the parable of the nobleman going into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom. "But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us," Luke xix. 12-27. While he was at Rome, Jerusalem was under the care of Sabinus, the Roman procurator, and a quarrel ensued in consequence of the manner in which the Jews were treated. Quiet was again established through the intervention of Varus, the president of Syria, and the authors of the sedition were punished. Augustus, however, ratified the main points of Herod's will, and gave Judæa, Samaria and Idumæa to Archelaus, with the cities of Cæsarea,

Sebaste, Joppa and Jerusalem, the title of ethnarch, and a promise that he should have the royal dignity, hereafter, if he governed virtuously. [Archelaus never really had the title of king, though at first called so by the people; yet we cannot object to the word in St. Matthew, for Archelaus regarded himself as king, and Josephus speaks of the province of Lysanias, which was only a tetrarchy, as "the kingdom." Herod Antipas, the tetrarch, is also called "the king," Matt. xiv. 9; Mark vi. 14.] When Archelaus returned to Judæa, he rebuilt the royal palace of Jericho and established a village, naming it, after himself, Archelais. It was evidently the alteration of Herod's will that caused Joseph to return into Galilee, which was under the milder government of Antipas, Matt. ii. 22. Shortly after Archelaus' return he violated the Mosaic law by marrying

Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia; and the Jews complaining again loudly of his tyranny, Augustus summoned him to Rome, and finally, A. D. 6, sent him into exile at Vienna in Gaul, where he probably died, and his dominions were attached to the Roman empire. Jerome, however, relates that he was shown the tomb of Archelaus near Bethlehem. Coins with the title ethnarch belong to Archelaus.

4. HEROD PHILIP I. was the son of Herod the Great by a second Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-priest, and must be distinguished from Philip the tetrarch. He was the husband of Herodias, by whom he had a daughter, Salome. Herodias, however, contrary to the laws of her country, divorced herself from him and married her uncle Antipas, Matt. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17; Luke iii. 19. He was omitted in the will of Herod in consequence of the discovery that Mariamne was implicated in the plots of Antipater.

5. HEROD PHILIP II. was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, and was, with his half-brothers Archelaus and Antipas, brought up at Rome. [Josephus, in one passage, calls Philip own brother of Archelaus; in other passages he gives their descent correctly.] He received as his share of the empire the tetrarchy of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis and certain parts about Jamnia, with a revenue of 100 talents. He is only mentioned once in the New Testament, Luke iii. 1. He was married to Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip I. and Herodias, but left no children. He reigned over his dominions for thirty-seven years (B. C. 4 to A. D. 34), during which time he showed himself to be a person of moderation and quietness in the conduct of his life and government. He built the city of Paneas and named it Cæsarea, more commonly known as Cæsarea Philippi, Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27, and also advanced to the dignity of a city the village Betsaida, calling it reckless extravagance, but ultimately obtained the appointment of governor of the city of Tiberias through the instigation of his sister Herodias and his wife Cypros, the daughter of Phasael, brother of Herod the Great. In an unguarded moment he expressed the wish that Caius might soon succeed to the throne, which being reported to Tiberius, he was arrested and thrown into prison, where he remained till the accession of Caius in A. D. 37. Caius shortly after gave him the tetrarchy of Philip, the iron chain with which he had been fastened to a soldier being exchanged for a gold one. He then started to take possession of his kingdom, and at Alexandria was insulted by the people, who dressed up an idiot, and bore him in mock triumph through the streets to deride the new king of the Jews. After the exile of his uncle Antipas, he received from Caius the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa; and in A. D. 41, for having greatly assisted Claudius, he received his whole of Berytus. In A. D. 44 Agrippa celebrated games at Cæsarea in honor of the emperor, and to make vows for his safety. At this festival a number of the principal persons, and such as were of dignity in the province attended. [Josephus does not mention those of Tyre and Sidon, as recorded in the Acts, xii. 20. Though Agrippa was "highly displeased," it does not appear that any rupture worthy of notice had taken place.] On the second day Agrippa appeared in the theatre in a garment interwoven with silver. On closing his address to the people, they saluted him as a god, for which he did not rebuke them, and he was immediately seized with violent internal pains, and died five days after.

The fuller account of Josephus agrees substantially with that in the Acts. The owl which, according to Josephus, on this occasion appeared to Agrippa as the messenger of ill tidings, though on a former one it had appeared to him, according to the same authority, as a messenger of good news, is converted by Eusebius, who professes to quote Josephus, into the angel of the Acts, Acts xii. 23.

7. HEROD AGRIPPA II. was the son of Herod Agrippa I. and Cypros. At the time of his father's death (A. D. 44) he was only seventeen years of age, and the emperor Claudius, thinking him too young to govern the kingdom, sent Cuspius Fadus as procurator, and thus made it again a Roman province. After the death of his uncle Herod, in A. D. 48, Claudius bestowed upon him the small kingdom of Chalcis, and four years after took it away from him, giving him instead the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, with the title of king, Acts xxv. 13; xxvi. 2, 7. In A. D. 55, Nero gave him the cities of Tiberias and Taricheæ in Galilee, and Julias, a city of Peræa, with fourteen villages near it.

Agrippa II. exhibited the Herodian partiality for building. He much enlarged the city of Cæsarea Philippi, and in honor of Nero called it Neronias. He also supplied large sums of money toward beautifying Jerusalem and Berytus, transferring almost everything that was ornamental from his own kingdom to this latter place. These acts rendered him most unpopular. In A. D. 60, King Agrippa and Berenice, his sister, concerning the nature of whose equivocal intercourse with each other here had been much grave conversation, and who in consequence persuaded Polemo, king of Cilicia, to marry her, came to Cæsarea, Acts xxv. 13. It was before him and his sister that the apostle Paul made his defence, and "almost persuaded him to be a Christian."

The famous speech which Agrippa made to the Jews, to dissuade them from waging war with the Romans, is recorded by Josephus. At the commencement of the war he sided with the Romans, and was wounded by a sling-stone at the siege of Gamala. After the fall of Jerusalem he retired with his sister Berenice to Rome, and there died in the seventieth year of his age, and in the third year of Trajan, A. D. 100. He was on intimate terms with Josephus, who gives two of his letters, and he was the last Jewish prince of the Herodian line.

HERODIANS (her-o'de-anz). This was the designation of a party among the Jews and a party very keenly opposed to the claims of Jesus, but of which no explicit information is given by any of the evangelists. Several hypotheses have consequently been propounded respecting them, which, by the name of Julias, in honor of the daughter of Augustus. [This is not the Betsaida of Galilee, but that mentioned in Luke ix. 10, where Christ fed the 5000, and in Mark viii. 22. It was in Lower Gaulonitis. Its situation is described by Josephus, where he says that the Jordan just passes by the city Julias, and then through the middle of the Lake of Gennesareth.] He died at Julias, and was buried in the monument he had there built. Leaving no children, his dominions were annexed to the Roman province of Syria. Coins of Philip II. bear the title tetrarch.

6. HEROD AGRIPPA I. was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice and grandson of Herod the Great. He is called "Agrippa the Great" by Josephus. A short time before the death of Herod the Great he was living at Rome, and was brought up with Drusus, the son of Tiberius, and with Antonia, the wife of Drusus. He was only one year older than Claudius, who was born in B. C. 10, and they were bred up together in the closest intimacy. He, however, soon exhausted all his funds by his paternal kingdom (Judea and Samaria), and in addition the tetrarchy of Lysanias II., Luke iii. 1. [Josephus says, in one passage, that Caius gave him this tetrarchy, but afterward, in two places, that Claudius gave it to him; Caius probably promised it, and Claudius actually conferred it.] Agrippa now possessed the entire kingdom of Herod the Great. At this time he begged of Claudius the kingdom of Chalcis for his brother Herod. He loved to live at Jerusalem, and was a strict observer of the laws of his country, which will account for his persecuting the Christians, who were hated by the Jews. Thus influenced by a strong desire for popularity rather than from innate cruelty, "he stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the Church." He put to death James the elder, son of Zebedee, and cast Peter into prison, no doubt with the intention of killing him also. This was frustrated by his miraculous deliverance from his jailers by the angel of the Lord, Acts xii. 1-19.

Agrippa I., like his grandfather, displayed great taste in building, and especially adorned the city however, it is needless to recount. The name clearly bespeaks their origin and leading aim. They were undoubtedly the adherents of the Herodian interest, and whether possessing or not any recognized connection with the government of Herod, were at least pledged to support it, and watchfully observant of everything that might seem to interfere with its rights or interests. Thus it is evident they constituted a political rather than a religious sect. This is enough to account for the part they are represented as acting in the gospel history, since, from the current belief respecting Christ's aspirations toward the throne of Judæa, they would naturally infer the contrariety of his interest to that of the Herodian family. Hence their opposition, in so far as it comes into view, took the form of a determination to have Jesus handed over to the temporal power for summary justice. It was so even on the first of the two occasions that mention is made of them, when, after having witnessed some miracles performed by our Lord on the Sabbath, and heard his views upon the subject, the Pharisees, it is said, "went forth, and straightway took counsel with the Herodians against him, how they might destroy him," Mark iii. 6—that is, the professedly religious joined hands with the adherents of the civic or ruling party to lay violent hands on Jesus as a person dangerous to the commonwealth.

There was the same coalition, with the same object, near the close of his career, Matt. xxii. 16; Mark xii. 13; and the fuller exposition of the matter in St. Luke's Gospel makes the nature and objects of the Herodians quite plain, for they are manifestly the party more especially referred to in xx. 20 "who watched him and sent forth spies, which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor." It was quite in accordance with the Herodians to act the part of spies in the interest of the ruling powers,

Herods rested. It does not follow, however, from the fact of some of them being found ready to act the part of spies, that the whole party were such, or that spying in the interest of government was their common employment. They might naturally and it would matter nothing whether the governor—i. e., the Roman governor of Judæa—or Herod (Antipas of Galilee) might be the authority before whom the accusation was to be lodged; for the Herodians, while deriving their name from Herod's family, must also have been staunch supporters of Roman supremacy, on which that of the

HERODIAS (her-o'-de-as) was the daughter of Aristobulus, one of the sons of Herod I. by the first Mariamne, and of Berenice, the daughter of Salome, Herod's sister, and was consequently sister of Herod Agrippa I. She was first married to her uncle Herod Philip I, the son of Herod I. and the second Mariamne, by whom she had a daughter Salome, probably the one that danced and pleased Herod Antipas, and who afterward married her uncle Philip II. Herodias soon divorced herself from him, and married Herod Antipas, who was also her uncle, being the son of Herod I. and Malthace, and who agreed for her sake to put away his own wife, the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia. John the Baptist reproved her for her crimes in thus living in adultery and incest, and she took the first opportunity to cause him to be put to death, thus adding thereto the crime of murder. Her marriage was unlawful for three reasons: first, her husband Philip was still alive; secondly, Antipas' wife was still alive; and thirdly, by her first marriage with Philip she became the sister-in-law of Antipas, who was forbidden by the Jewish law to marry his brother's wife, Lev. xviii. 16; xx. 21, comp. Matt. xiv. 4. When Antipas was condemned by Caius to perpetual banishment, Herodias was offered a pardon, and the emperor made her a present of money, telling her that it was her brother Agrippa I, who prevented her being involved in the same calamity as her husband. The best trait of her character is shown when, in true Jewish spirit, she refused this offer, and voluntarily chose to share the exile of her husband.

HERODION (her-o'de-on), the name of an early Christian, a kinsman of the apostle Paul, and at the time he wrote his Epistle to the Romans a resident at Rome, Rom. xvi. 11. Tradition reports him to have afterward become a bishop, but of this there is no proper evidence.

HERODIUM (her-o'de-um), a fortress or town mentioned by Josephus and Pliny, and named after Herod the Great, by whom it was built. It stood in a commanding position, probably the site anciently occupied by Beth-Haccerrum, Jer. vi. 1; Neh. iii. 14, between Tekoa and Jerusalem, and now called the "Frank Mountain." Here Herod was buried. See HERODIAN FAMILY, subhead 1.

HERODOTUS (her-od'o-tus), a celebrated Greek historian, was born at Halicarnassus in B. C. 484. He traveled through the ancient seats of civilization, acquainting himself with the countries and peoples respecting whom he intended to write. Retiring to the isle of Samos, he digested and classified his materials, and then wrote that history which has immortalized his name. When it was finished, he brought it to the banks of the Alpheus, and there recited it to the vast multitude assembled from every town for the Olympic games. He wrote in the Ionic dialect, and in a way that pleased Cicero exceedingly, who says that his style is free from all harshness, and flows along like the waters of a still river. He calls him the "Father of History," because, if not the first historian, he was the first who brought history to that degree of perfection; and Quintilian compares him with Thucydides, giving the one the palm for narrative, the other for orations. He died in B. C. 408.

HEROLD (hay'rölt), JOHANN, born in 1511 at Hochstadt, Suabia. Nothing is known of his history till 1539, when he appeared in Bâle as a champion of the Protestant Reformation. For several years he had charge of a parish near Bâle. The latter portion of his life was spent solely in literary labors. Among his writings is "The Heathen World and the Original Source of their Gods." He died about 1570.

HERON (her'on), Hebrew anaphah, one of those appellations of which we have little clue to the specific meaning. It is found but twice, and the two occurrences are but the reduplication of one, and here merely as a name. It is, however, in the enumeration of unclean animals in Lev. xi. and Dent. xiv., and in such company, that we gather it to be a bird, probably of the order Grallæ, being placed between the stork and the gallinule. The lexicographers derive the word from anaph, "to snort," always rendered "to be angry;" but little help is thus given to the zoologist. The Septuagint translate the word in both passages by charadrios, the Greek name for some bird (not necessarily a plover, to which genus Linnæus appropriated it) of a yellow color, remarkable for its voracity, and frequenting quagmires or beds of mountain torrents.

All these indications warrant the rendering of our English version. The herons are wading-birds, peculiarly irritable, remarkable for their voracity, frequenting marshes and oozy rivers and spread over the regions of the East. Most of the species enumerated in our native ornithology have been recognized in the vicinity of Palestine, and we may include all these under the term in question—"the anaphah after his kind." With respect to the charadrios of the Septuagint, it is observable that one of the commonest species in Asia is Ardea russata, which is beautifully adorned with plumage partly white and partly of a rich orange-yellow, while the beak, legs and all the naked parts of the skin are yellow. Its height is about seventeen inches. This is the caboga or cow-heron so abundant in India. The Night-heron, the form of which is displayed in the illustration, is widely spread over Asia, Africa and Southern Europe. In its habits it resembles the common heron, breeding in society, roosting during the day in the recesses of woods, and visiting swamps in quest of prey at the approach of twilight.

HERRING (her'ring), THOMAS, who arose to be archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Walsoke in Norfolk in the year 1693. He entered Jesus College, Cambridge, and in time became a Fellow of Corpus Christi College. He was made bishop of Bangor in 1737, and six years afterward he was translated to York. After the disaster at Preston Pans, he applied himself with great zeal to awaken a spirit of active patriotism in the country. He raised the large sum of £40,000 for the service of the government, and his efforts on the side of the Hanoverian cause were so conspicuous that the wits of the day usually designated him the "red lerring." He was appointed to Canterbury in 1747. He died in 1756, having held the primacy for nine years. He was recognized through life as a powerful preacher and a laborious, energetic and good man.

HERRNHUT (hern'hoot). See MORAVIANS.

HERRON (her'ron), FRANCIS, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, born in 1774, near Shippensburg, Pennsylvania. He graduated at Dickinson College, and studied theology under the direction of Robert Cooper, D.D. After a few years of missionary labor in the backwoods of Ohio, he was called to the pastorate of Rocky Spring Church, and was afterward pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg. Mainly through his efforts the Western Theological Seminary was located at Alleghany City, and much of its success is due to his ceaseless exertions in its behalf. In 1827 he was moderator of the General Assembly held in Philadelphia. His ministry was greatly blessed by gracious seasons of revival, and his character and talents were held in affectionate esteem by his fellow-citizens. He died in 1860.

HERSE (herss). See HEARSE.

HERULI (her-u'le), a barbarous tribe from the shores of the Black Sea, who with the Goths made frequent incursions in the Roman dominions. They afterward became an independent nation; and joining themselves with the Turones, Scythians and Rugii, with Odoacer as their leader, they took Rome. About 495 the Lombards defeated them in a memorable battle, and a part of the nation established themselves first at the mouth of the Danube and then in the Eastern Roman empire. They were converted to Christianity during the reign of Justinian I., and gradually became civilized.

HERVÆUS (her-vay'us), NATALIS, a Dominican friar, born in Brittany during the thirteenth century. He was a philosopher and theologian of the school of Thomas Aquinas, and professor of theology in the university of Paris. He left numerous manuscripts, a few of which have been published. He died in 1323.

HERVEY (her've) OF ELY was really the founder of the diocese of Ely. In 1107 he was driven from Bangor, where he had been the first bishop of that see, and he became abbot of Ely. After two years he succeeded in raising Ely to be a bishopric, and he secured his own appointment to the episcopal chair. He next prevailed on the bishop of Lincoln to cede his rights in Cambridgeshire and part of Huntingdon, and in 1108 he secured the royal approval of this arrangement; and the pope having added his sanction, the bishopric was thus constituted, and the abbey church of Ely was recognized as the cathedral of the diocese. For notice of the cathedral itself, see SIMEON OF ELY.

HERVEY, FREDERICK, was born in 1730, and in due time entered the Church as a minister. Generally he spent his time in traveling on the Continent of Europe. His brother, when lord-lieutenant of Ireland, appointed him to the vacant see of Cloyne, and he was subsequently removed to the wealthy see of Derry. On the death of his brother he became fourth earl of Bristol. He was a great patron of art, and the persons whom he assembled at his residence when he was in Ireland, their habits and Continental usages, were so utterly different from the primitive lives of the people around, that they were often amazed at the sight of a bishop setting such an example as he did. In politics he was a Liberal, and his beneficence toward his poor clergy was very remarkable. He removed to Italy, where he cultivated his taste for art, and he resided there until his death. A late Irish novelist has taken this earl-bishop and his mansion as the theme of a popular novel.

HERVEY, JAMES, a well-known English divine and theological writer, was born at Hardingstone, near Northampton, in 1714. He was well known in Oxford for his classical attainments, and he was one of the band who, with John and Charles Wesley, Whitefield and others, became celebrated as the Oxford Methodists. In 1736 he became curate of Dummer, whence he went to Bideford in 1738. In the early years of his religious life he passed through protracted seasons of great anxiety, longing for peace and seeking after acceptance with God. By varied forms of discipline and religious observances he strove to gain his object, but not until he was enabled to comprehend the all-sufficient character of the atonement of Christ as a work wrought out for us and offered in the gospel as the ground of our acceptance with God did any degree of peace prevail in his soul. As John Wesley accepted Arminianism, Hervey and Whitefield adopted Calvinistic views. The contests between Wesley and Hervey were long continued and earnest; and even when Hervey died, he left "Eleven Letters to John Wesley" behind him in manuscript. These letters were edited by Cudworth, who was unjustly charged with Antinomianism, and their appearance and Wesley's reply kept up the controversy, which continued with much asperity for a time. Hervey succeeded his father at Weston and Collingtree, but his excessive physical weakness interfered with his pastoral work. Through life he had been delicate, and for a long time before his death he daily awaited his dissolution, which took place in 1758. After he entered the ministry, he published "Meditations and Contemplations," and in 1748 he gave the world his "Contemplations on the Night and Starry Heavens," which had a wonderful circulation, turgid and bombastic as its florid style is. In 1753 he wrote against Lord Bolingbroke's letters on the study of history, and two years afterward he published his "Letters on Theron and Aspasia." This brought out Robert Sanderman of Edinburgh, who assailed him for his views on justifying faith, and John Wesley, who reviewed it. Hervey was eminently pious and spiritually-minded. A protracted sufferer, he was meek and gentle in life and conversation, though firm in the maintenance of his views. His "Meditations" had their place as a household work with Bunyan's "Pilgrim," Boston's "Fourfold State" and Baxter's "Saint's Rest," and it is still held in reverent estimation, but the style is such that in the present day few attempt to read through it. His "Theron and Aspasia" deserves a place in all theological libraries.

HESED (he'sed). His son, Ben-hesed, was one of Solomon's commissariat officers, 1 Ki. iv. 10.

HESER (hay'zur), GEORGE, a Jesuit, born in 1609, at Weyern, near Passau, Austria. He was professor of rhetoric and dialectics at Munich and Ingolstadt, and afterward preacher at Augsburg and Ingolstadt. He is chiefly known for his attempts to trace the authorship of the "Imitation of Christ" to Thomas à Kempis. The date of his death is unknown.

HESHBON (hesh'bon), a city on the east of Jordan, from which it was about twenty miles distant, and stood between the brooks Jabbok and Arnon. It seems to have been the capital of Sihon, as he is called the king of Heshbon as well as king of the Amorites, Num. xxi. 26, etc. It was afterward made a Levitical city, and is mentioned in connection both with the tribe of Reuben and with the same with the Azmon mentioned Num. xxxiv. 4, it may be objected that not only does this change the initiatory guttural, but it supposes a repetition of a name already mentioned in the boundary line (see ver. 4), and probably more to the west. Wiltson would connect it with the Edomite king Husam, Gen. xxxvi. 34, 35, and identifies it with Ain Hasb. He also thinks that it is the same with Hashmonah, one of the stations in the wanderings of Israel, Num. xxxiii. 29, 30.

HESIOD (he'zh'd), one of the earliest Greek poets, who is usually supposed to have lived in the eighth century B. C. He was a native of Ascra, in Bœotia, but almost nothing is known of his life. A family dispute drove him from Ascra, and he settled at Orchomenos. The works attributed to him are the poems entitled "Works and Days," "Theogony," "Shield of Hercules" and the lost "Catalogue of Women." The poetry of the that of Gad, Josh. xxi. 39; Num. xxxii. 37; 1 Chr. vi. 81. It appears, however, to have again fallen into the hands of the Moabites, as it is repeatedly mentioned by the prophets in their denunciations against the land of Moab, Isa. xv. 4; Jer. xlvi. 2. In later times the Maccabees held it under their sway; and the ruins of Heshbon have been identified as those of the ancient city by modern travelers. The ruins lie on the summit of a hill which commands an extensive prospect. They are more than a mile in circuit, but are themselves uninteresting, and contain not one entire building. Among the heaps of rubbish, however, there are many cisterns, and toward the south, a few minutes from the base of the hill, is a large ancient reservoir, which may call to mind the passage in the Song of Solomon, "Thine eyes are like the fish-pools in Heshbon, by the gate of Beth-rabbin," ch. vii. 4.

HESHMON (hesh'mon), a town on the southern boundary of Palestine, Josh. xv. 27. It has not been identified. To the suggestion that it is

"Works and Days" is of a homely and didactic character, dealing with the practical interests of common life. It is "a faithful transcript," says Ottfried Müller, "of the whole condition of Bœotian life." The "Theogony," however, is of a different character—an attempt to present a systematic view of the origin and powers of the gods and of the order of nature.

HESRON (hes'ron), HESRONITES (hes'ron-ites). In some copies of our version Hezron and Hezronites are thus spelt in Num. xxvi. 6.

HESS, JOHANN, born about 1490, in Nuremberg. After pursuing his studies at Leipzig and at Wittenberg he served as secretary to Turzo, bishop of Breslau. Going to Wittenberg in 1529, he became acquainted with Luther and Melancthon; and thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the Reformation, he returned to Breslau, where he labored zealously in reforming the Church and the schools. He died in 1547.

HESS (hess), JOHANN JAKOB, born in 1741, at Zurich, where he studied theology with his uncle, the pastor of Neftenbach, and afterward served as his assistant. He was subsequently pastor of the church of Notre Dame in Zurich, and in 1795 was honored with the office of president of the clergy of the canton. Among his works are—"History of the Last Three Years of the Life of Jesus," "History of the Israelites before the Time of Jesus," and "History of David and Solomon." He died in 1828.

fessor of theology at Heidelberg, superintendent of the palatinate, president of the Church council, bishop of Sameland and leading professor of theology of the university of Helmstadt, but his peculiarities of temper brought him in continual conflict with the authorities and prevented long continuance in any one post. He was a violent controversialist, maintaining extreme Lutheranism in opposition to the Synergists, and was engaged in many bitter controversies. His work entitled "Difference between the True Catholic Doctrine of the Church and the Errors of the Papists and

The controversy was afterward renewed, the cause being taken up by another monk, George Acyndinus; but a synod at Constantinople in 1351 approved the HANN, a German hymn writer, born in 1487, at Nuremberg. He pursued his theological studies at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and while in Italy he became a priest; but returning to Germany, he became intimately associated with Luther. His hymns are characterized by deep Christian feeling, and many of them are still sung in the churches of Germany.

HESSEHUSEN (hes-hoo'sen), TILEMANN, a Lutheran divine, born in 1527, at Wesel, in Prussia. After graduating at Wittenberg, he was appointed pastor at Goslar, and speedily distinguished himself as a preacher. He was proposed by Barlaam, afterward bishop of Gerace, who accused them of indulging in fanatical and absurd means of seeking a supernatural light not promised in Scripture. They were as stoutly defended by Palamas, afterward bishop of Thessalonica; and in 1341 the whole matter was brought before a council at Constantinople, in which the monks, with Palamas at their head, were victorious; whereupon Barlaam retreated to Italy. HESYCHASTS (hez'e-kasts), a party of monks who dwelt on Mount Athos during the fourteenth century. They professed to seek the extinction of evil passions by devout contemplation, introversion and ascetic practices. They claimed that, as the result of such contemplation, a divine light, like that which shone at the transfiguration, was diffused through their souls. Their peculiar usages and doctrines were vigorously op-tenets of the Hesychasts, and excommunicated Acyndinus and Barlaam.

HESYCHIUS (he-zeek'e-us). There have been two eminent men of this name.

1. An Egyptian bishop, mentioned by Eusebius. He revised the text of the Septuagint and published an edition of the New Testament. He was one of the victims of the Diocletian persecution, about A. D. 311.

2. OF JERUSALEM, a Greek ecclesiastical writer, of whom little is certainly known except that he was consecrated priest against his wishes by the patriarch of Constantinople, and the remainder of his life was spent in that city. He died about A. D. 434.

HETÆRIÆ (het-ay're-ay), secret societies of the Romans, which the emperor Trajan forbade by an edict issued soon after his accession, A. D. 90. In pursuance of this edict, Piny took severe measures against the assemblies of Christians about A. D. 105.

ating at the university of Edinburgh, he began his ministry at Hamilton, as assistant to Dr. Meek, whose daughter he married. He afterward preached at Torphicken and at Saint Andrew's. At the "disruption" he identified himself with the Free Church, and became minister of Free St. Paul's Church, Edinburgh. From 1857 he was professor of apologetics and systematic theology in the Free Church College, Glasgow. He was editor of the "Free Church Magazine," contributed to the "Presbyterian Review" and "North British Review," and wrote, among other works, these passages with Num. xxxiv. 8 warrants us in concluding that "the way of Hethlon" was identical with "the entrance of Hamath." It was thus the name of the great opening between the northern extremity of Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh Mountains. This pass forms the only "entrance" to the plain of Hamath from the western coast.

HETH, one of the sons of Canaan, of the family of Ham. He was the progenitor of the people called first the sons and daughters of Heth, but afterward known as Hittites, Gen. x. 15; xxiii. 3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 18, 20; xxv. 10; xxvii. 46; xlix. 32; 1 Chr. i. 13. See HITTITES.

HETHERINGTON (heth'er-ing-ton), WILLIAM M., a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, born in 1803, near Dumfries. After gradu-

"The Fullness of Time," "History of the Church of Scotland" and "History of the Westminster Assembly." He died in 1865.

HETHLON (heth'lon). "The way of Hethlon" is twice mentioned by Ezekiel when describing the northern border of the land of Israel. In one passage it is spoken of as "the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad," Ezek. xlvi. 15; in the other, "the way of Hethlon, as one goeth to Hamath," Ezek. xlviii. 1. This "way" was manifestly some noted road or pass leading from the sea-coast on the west to the kingdom of Hamath, in which Zedad was situated. See ZEDAD. A comparison of LUDWIG, a Swiss theologian, born in the canton Thurgau. A tract against images which he published in 1523 was widely circulated, and greatly stirred the popular mind. The next year he went to Augsburg, highly recommended by Zwingli, who admired his talents and expected great results from his activity in the Reformation; but having, in a controversy with Urbanus Rhegius, maintained Anabaptist views, he was obliged to leave Augsburg, and returned to Zurich, from which he was soon afterward expelled for preaching the new doctrine. According to the testimony of Zwingli and some others, he led an immoral life; and for the crime of adultery he was brought to trial and beheaded at Constance, in 1529. Equally credible writers maintain, however, that his life was one of genuine piety, and that he was a martyr to his Baptist principles. Besides the work already noticed, he published a translation of the "Prophets of the Old Testament," which, though largely circulated at the time, is now exceedingly scarce.

HEUBNER (hoib'ner), HEINRICH LEONHARDT, a German theologian, born in 1780, at the death of the latter he succeeded as pastor. He was subsequently minister of the Regent Place Church, Glasgow. He was a faithful pastor, an eloquent preacher and an active friend of all benevolent enterprises. He wrote "The Importance of Early Piety" and "State of Religion in Geneva and Belgium." He died in 1846.

HEUMANN (hoy'man), CHRISTOPH AUGUST, a German theologian, was born in 1681, at Altstädt, in the duchy of Weimar. After com-as in Abyssinia and by Djezzar, the notorious pacha of Acre, comp. Dan. ii. 5; iii. 29.

HEWIT (heu'it), NATHANIEL, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1788, at New London, Connecticut. Originally intending to adopt the profession of the law, he relinquished his studies for theology; and after preaching a short time in Vermont he completed his preparation for the ministry at Andover. He was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Plattsburg, New York, and after-

Lauterbach, Saxony. He was educated at the theological seminary at Wittenberg, where he was successively professor extraordinary of theology, third director and first director, serving in the latter office until his death, in 1853. His chief works are—"Practical Exposition of the New Testament," "Sermons on the Catechism," and an enlarged and revised edition of Büchner's "Biblical Concordance."

HEUGH (hewh), HUGH, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian minister, was born in 1782, at Stirling. After graduating at the college of Edinburgh, he became colleague to his father at Stirling, and on pleting his theological studies at Jena, he made a tour of Holland and Germany, and on his return was appointed inspector of the college of Göttingen, and afterward professor of theology in the university of that city. His principal works are—"German Translation of the New Testament" and "Exposition of the New Testament." He died in 1764.

HEWING IN PIECES. This mode of punishment is said to have been inflicted by Samuel on Agag, king of the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 33). It was not a Hebrew form of putting to death; but there have been instances of its being employed, ward in Fairfield, Connecticut. While at the latter place he became noted for his earnest advocacy of the temperance reformation. He resigned his pastorate to become agent of the newly organized American Temperance Society; and under his impassioned eloquence, it is said, the reform made rapid headway, enlisting all classes in the movement. In 1831 he visited England in the interests of the temperance cause, and excited attention by his great powers of eloquence. After his return home he labored as pastor in Bridgeport, Connecticut. He died in 1867.

HEXFAM (hex'am). See ROGER OF.

HEY (hay), JOHN, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1734. He was educated at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, where he was afterward Norris professor of divinity. He was pastor of Passenham and of Calverton. Among his writings are "Lectures in Divinity" and "Thoughts on the Athanasian Creed." He died in 1815.

HEYDENREICH (hi'den-rikh), AUGUST LUDWIG CHRISTIAN, a Protestant theologian, was born at Wiesbaden, 25th of July, 1773. His first little talent and moderate learning. His time was devoted to the work of a preacher or pastor rather than that of a scholar.

HEYDENREICH, KARL HEINRICH, a German philosopher, was born in 1764, at Stolpen, in Saxony. He was professor of philosophy at the university of Leipsic. At first he was an adherent of the system of Spinoza, but afterward embraced that of Kant. He wrote "Nature and God according to Spinoza," "Philosophy donsire, and a prebend of Westminster, to which was added the living of Houghton, in the bishopric of Durham. Other church preferment followed; but becoming obnoxious to the parliamentarians, he was soon ejected, and his private property was also sequestered. After this he went to Oxford, and published a weekly paper, called "Mercurius Aulicus." Heylin was a churchman of the school of Laud, and wrote his life, also a history of the Reformation of the Church of England, and several treatises in defence of the Church and its institucharge was in Usingen; in 1797 he became rector and preacher in Wiesbaden; in 1800 stadtpfarrer in Usingen; in 1809 second stadtpfarrer in Wiesbaden; in 1813 inspector at Dotzheim; in 1818 kirchenrath, professor and preacher in Herborn. Subsequently he became evangelical rural bishop in Wiesbaden. He died in 1856 (?). Most of his works are homiletic and practical. The exegetical are—"A Commentary on the First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians," "A Brief Pastoral Exposition" and a work on "Mysticism in the New Testament and in Christianity." Heydenreich was a dull, flat writer, who contributed nothing to the interpretation of the New Testament. He had but

HEYLIN (hay'lin), PETER, D.D., an English divine, was born at Burford, in Oxfordshire, in 1600. He became a student of Hart Hall, Oxford, but afterward obtained a fellowship in Magdalen College, which he resigned in 1629, on being appointed chaplain to Charles I. Heylin lectured at Oxford on cosmography, and published the substance of his lectures in the work entitled "Microcosmus," which became very popular. In 1631 he published his "History of St. George," for which the king gave him the rectory of Hemmingford, in Hunting-tions. He died in 1662, having shortly before been reinstated in all his former appointments by Charles II.

HEYLYN (hay'lin), JOHN, D.D., an English divine, and prebendary of Westminster, who, from his being deeply versed in the mystic divines, was popularly called "the mystic doctor." He wrote "Theological Lectures at Westminster Abbey." He died about 1760.

HEYRICK (hay'rik) RICHARD, who held the office of warden in the collegiate church in Manchester, in the reign of Charles I., became deservedly famous for his ardent struggles in the cause of truth. In his time a determined attempt was made to introduce Romanism into the establishment over which he presided, and which he successfully resisted. In 1635 the college had been refounded by Charles I., and the papal party, founding their hopes on the influence of the queen, attempted to advance their cause in Manchester; but owing to the vigilance and energy of Heyrick, they signally failed. He died in 1667, and was buried in the choir of the collegiate church. See THOMAS DE LA WARRE.

HEYWOOD (hay'wood), OLIVER, an English nonconformist, was born in 1629, at Bolton. He graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was rector at Halifax until the Restoration. During the years that followed he suffered much from poverty, and died in 1702.

HEYWORTH (hay'wurth), an eminent bishop of Lichfield, consecrated in 1420. Fuller gives him credit for completing the cathedral, but this statement can only be true of some minor repairs and details, and not of the main body of the fabric itself, for the style indicates an earlier age. The work of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries remained until the devastations of the civil wars

HEZEKI, a Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 17.

HEZEKIAH (hez-e-ki'ah). 1. The son and successor of Ahaz, king of Judah, twenty-five years old when he ascended the throne. His reign lasted twenty-nine years, 725-696 B. C., 2 Ki. xviii. 1, 2; 2 Chr. xxix. 1. If the present text be accurate, Hezekiah must have been born in his father's eleventh year, for Ahaz died when he was thirty-six, 2 Ki. xvii. 2. Instances of pater- nity as early as this have been produced by various writers; so that the case, though extraordinary, is by no means unparalleled. But some critics have supposed an error in the numbers, and that either Hezekiah was but twenty at his accession, or Ahaz twenty-five at his. This last supposition has some countenance from ancient versions.

Hezekiah was one of the most godly of the sovereigns of Judah. His first acts were to re-open, repair and cleanse the temple, celebrating the occasion by solemn offerings to the Lord. He also removed the high-places, forbidding sacrifice even to the true God in them. And he broke in pieces the brazen serpent which Moses had made in the wilderness, because the people paid a superstitious reverence to it, calling it by a contemptuous name—"a piece of brass," 2 Ki. xviii. 3-6; 2 Chr. xxix. 2-36; Isa. xxxvi. 7. These proceedings, we may easily conclude, did not pass unquestioned. The evil counselors of Ahaz would strive to maintain their influence in the new reign. So much, perhaps, we may gather from the reproofs of Isaiah, Isa. viii. 9-13; xxviii. 14-18. But the king had the inestimable advantage of the counsels of this great prophet, to whose divinely inspired messages he appears to have given diligent heed. If, therefore, he encountered opposition, it did not turn him from his purpose. Subsequently, the passover was kept, as it had not been for many generations, with a great concourse of people, not only from Judah, but from the tribes of Israel. It has been thought that this passover was held after the fall of Samaria, for the remnant are addressed that were "escaped out of the hand of the king of Assyria." If so, it could not have been earlier than Hezekiah's sixth year. But the matter is uncertain; and it is worth noticing that Hezekiah's invitations were responded to rather by the northern section of the tribes, Manasseh, Zebulun and Asher, than by the people immediately around Samaria, 2 Chr. xxx. The celebration of this feast was the signal for fresh measures of reformation, extending into the Samaritan kingdom, while the services of the temple and the rites of the law were yet more diligently observed in the king of Judah's own dominions, 2 Chr. xxxi.

As Hezekiah honored God, so God honored him with temporal prosperity. He subdued the Philistines, and according to the annals of Sennacherib, kept Padiya, king of the Ekronites, a prisoner in Jerusalem. He prospered also in other enterprises, and renounced his allegiance to the Assyrian monarch, 2 Ki. xviii. 7, 8. In the fourteenth year of his reign, however, he was obliged to purchase forgiveness for this by the payment of a large fine, for which he had to take some of the gold of the temple. For Sennacherib's forces had overrun the country; the fortified towns were taken, 2 Ki. xviii. 13-16; 2 Chr. xxxii. 1-8; Isa. xxxvi. 1, the Assyrian march toward Jerusalem being perhaps that described in 2 Chr. x. 28-32.

The tribute thus yielded saved Jerusalem, and Sennacherib turned his arms elsewhere. It must have been at this time that Hezekiah was visited with that fatal sickness (supposed by some to be the plague) which he was warned would be unto death. At his earnest prayer, however, a prolongation of his life was granted for, as he was informed, fifteen years; a plaster of figs was by Isaiah's direction laid upon the boil; a miraculous sign was given, and a promise added of deliverance from the Assyrian power. Hezekiah recovered, and composed a plaintive elegy on the occasion. And then came the great fault of his life. Ambassadors from Babylon arrived to inquire of the wondrous retrocession of the sun. To these the king vaingloriously displayed his treasures, and was rebuked and told that his children should be made eunuchs in that Babylon from which envoys were now courting his alliance, 2 Ki. xx.; 2 Chr. xxxii. 24-26, 31; Isa. xxxviii.; xxxix.

It is not easy to settle the chronology of this king's reign. Very many critics have believed that but a single Assyrian invasion occurred, and consequently that the destruction of Sennacherib's army took place about the time of Hezekiah's sickness. But we may with more probability suppose that there were two invasions—one that already noticed, the other so fatal for the Assyrian king some few years subsequently. See for some further details the article on SENNACHERIB.

If this supposition be well founded, the narrative of 2 Ki. xviii. 17-37; xix.; 2 Chr. xxxii. 9-23; Isa. xxxvi. 2-22; xxxvii., must describe the later invasion. The king of Assyria, who was besieging Lachish, sent Rabshakeh with an insulting and blasphemous message to Jerusalem. Afterward, when alarmed by the news of the approach of the Ethiopian king, he reiterated his demands in a letter to Hezekiah. The Jewish monarch sought help where alone it could effectually be obtained. He asked the prayers and advice of Isaiah, and spread the Assyrian letter in humble supplication before the Lord. Speedily he had an encouraging reply; the Lord would interpose. The king of Assyria "shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shields, nor cast a bank against it. By the way that he came, by the same shall he return, and shall not come into this city, saith the Lord. For I will defend this city to save it, for mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake." And the infliction of the judgment is related with awful brevity: "The angel of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred and four-core and five thousand; and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses." Whether it was the simoom of the desert, or whether "the pestilence that walketh in darkness," that was employed as a secondary cause we know not. The work was God's own justly inflicted vengeance.

Probably Hezekiah did not long survive this event. He was succeeded by his son Manasseh, born twelve years before his father's decease, of Hephzibah, 2 Ki. xx. 21; xxi. 2, to whom Professor Blunt supposes an allusion in Isa. lxii. 4. And on Hezekiah's decease the bright light of God's favor to Judah was clouded again, and the nation, under their new king, sunk once more into foul idolatry.

That Hezekiah was a sovereign who displayed much taste and energy in matters pertaining to the architecture of the capital and the well-being of the population is evident from the brief record of his reign which is given in the sacred narrative. The temple was the great central figure in Jerusalem to which all eyes were directed; and like a pious ruler, he bestowed upon it much of his regard. In 2 Ki. xviii. 16 the fact is mentioned that he had overlaid the doors and the pillars in the temple with gold, which in an evil day he had again to remove. So also his care for the population and his regard for their comfort and wants in the trying climate of Palestine is displayed, 2 Ki. xx. 20, by his construction of a pool and of a conduit to supply the city with water, indicating the mind of a sovereign who recognized that matters of permanent social utility, the honor of God and the care of his house were duties that belonged to him as the head and guardian of the people.

2. A descendant of the royal line of David, 1 Chr. iii. 23. 3. Ezra ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21.

HEZEL (hez'el), J. W. F., a German Orientalist and theologian, was born at Königsberg, May 16, 1754. Having received his first instruction from his father, who was a Protestant pastor, he subsequently repaired to the university of Jena, 1772. In 1786 he was appointed professor of the Oriental languages at Giessen, and in 1800 keeper of the university library there. In 1801 he was called to the university of Dorpat, where he filled the chair of Oriental literature till 1820, in which year he requested permission to retire, which was granted. He died February 1, 1829, at the age of seventy-five. Hezel's works are many, but they are little read at the present day. Among them was a new translation and explanation of the Song of Solomon. He also published a small treatise on the fall, the sacrifices of Cain and Abel and Enoch's translation, and a dissertation on the sources of the early history in the Pentateuch.

HEZION (he'zi-on), the grandfather of Benhadad I., king of Syria, 1 Kings xv. 18. It has been conjectured that he was the same with Rezon, xi. 23; this is, however, but a conjecture.

HEZIR (he'zer). 1. The head of one of the courses of the priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 15. 2. One who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 20.

HEZRAI (hez'ra-i), one of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 35. He is also called HEZRO (hez'ro), 1 Chron. xi. 37.

HEZRON (hez'ron). 1. One of the sons of Reuben, Gen. xli. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 6; 1 Chr. v. 3. 2. A son of Pharez and grandson of Judah, Gen. xli. 12; Ruth iv. 18, 19; 1 Chr. ii. 5, 9, 18, 21, 24, 25; iv. 1.

HEZRON, a city in the south of Judah, called also HAZOR, Josh. xv. 25. Wilton would unite the preceding name Kerieth with Hezron, and would translate "Kerieth-hezron, which is HAZOR-AMAN," believing that we have here both the name which the city bore at the time, and that which it had previously to its conquest by the Anakim. It was originally, he thinks, a pastoral settlement of the Horites, one of whose chiefs was Heman or Homan, Gen. xxxvi. 22; 1 Chr. i. 39. It was afterward taken and fortified by the Anakim, and eventually conquered by the tribe of Judah, who attached to it the name of one of their distinguished worthies. He would identify it with el-Kuryetein, where are some considerable ruins.

HEZRONITES (hez'ron-ites). 1, 2. Two families in Reuben and Judah, Num. xxvi. 6, 21.

HIDDAI (hid'da-i), one of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 30. In 1 Chr. xi. 32 he is called Hurai.

HIDDEKEL (hid'de-kel), the third river of Eden, described in Gen. ii. 14 as flowing "to the east of Assyria," or it may be translated "toward the east of Assyria." It is also mentioned by Daniel, who saw one of his wondrous visions as he stood "by the side of the great river, which is Hiddekel," Gen. x. 4. The translators of the Septuagint identify this river with the Tigris, and so also does Jerome. There can be no doubt that they are correct. The name suggests the identity. The Aramaean name of the Tigris is Digla, which was easily transformed by the Greeks into Tigris; or perhaps the latter was the Persian form, derived from the word Tigra, "an arrow." Pliny says, "As soon as this river begins to flow, though with a slow current, it has the name Diglito. When its course becomes more rapid, it assumes the name Tigris, given to it on account of its swiftness, that word signifying 'an arrow' in the Median language." To the same effect Strabo writes. Josephus states that the word "Tigris, or Diglath, signifies what is swift, with narrowness." The great rapidity of the current appears to have suggested the name.

The Tigris is often mentioned by classic writers. Pliny gives the fullest description, but the notices of Herodotus, Strabo and Xenophon supply some important details. The river has several sources among the mountains of Armenia. Those of the eastern branch were discovered by Layard, south of Lake Van; the highest source of the western branch is only a few miles distant from the Euphrates. The Tigris flows at first eastward, then gradually turns to the south-east, and after a tortuous course of more than 200 miles through a wild mountainous region, it passes by a sublime ravine into the plain of Assyria. It then sweeps past the great mounds of Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah and other primeval cities, still retaining its rapidity, and frequently breaking over rocky barriers and artificial dams. At length, near the old town of Tekrit, 100 miles below Mosul, it enters the low plain of Mesopotamia. Here its waters were formerly drawn off by canals for irrigation. The stream is now sluggish, and the banks are fringed with thick jungles. It flows on through the palm groves of Bagdad, laving the walls of the decaying city. It is here only about 30 miles from the

with the exiled king for the appointment of bishops, in the English Church, for their party. He returned from this dangerous mission in the following year, and was himself shortly after consecrated bishop of Thetford. Dr. Hickes was a profound scholar, particularly in Saxon lore, but in theological matters it is to be lamented that he employed his great powers in controversial pamphlets which are forgotten as soon as read. His principal productions are "Thesaurus of Ancient Northern Literature" and "Institutes of Anglo-Saxon Grammar," in both of which he displayed profound scholarship and an extensive knowledge of early Christian literature. He died in 1715.

HICKS (hiks), ELIAS, from whom the sect of Hicksites derives its name, was born in 1748, at Jericho, Long Island. Early in life he became a preacher in the Society of Friends. He held Socinian doctrines concerning the Trinity and the Atonement; and though their advocacy received at first but little sympathy from his brethren, yet by degrees he won large numbers to his views, and in 1827 they set up a separate association, but still Euphrates. The two sister rivers run parallel for 100 miles or more, and then the Tigris sweeps round to the eastward, through the marshy plains of Elam, and turning south, unites with the Euphrates at Kornah. The river formed by the junction is called Shât el-Arab. It flows in a south-eastern course, through swamps and desolate plains, to Busrah and the Persian Gulf.

HIBBERD (hib'berd), BILLY, an eccentric and witty minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1771, at Norwich, Connecticut. He entered the New York Conference in 1798, and during a ministry of forty-six years was abundantly successful in his labors. He died in 1844.

HICKES (hiks), GEORGE, an eminent divine and learned antiquary of the seventeenth century, was born at Newsham, in Yorkshire, in 1642, and educated at Oxford. In 1681 he was appointed one of the king's chaplains, and soon after made dean of Worcester. At the Revolution he refused to take the oath to William III., and was deprived of all his benefices. In 1693 he was sent by the non-juring clergy to St. Germain's, to concert measures

HIERAPOLIS (hi-e-rap'o-lis), COUNCIL OF, held about A. D. 197. At this council Montanus, Maximilian and Theodotus were excommunicated.

HIERAPOLIS, a city of Phrygia Magna, east of Colosse, and about six Roman miles north of Laodicea. It was celebrated for mineral springs and a cave where a stifling vapor was evolved; these springs still exist, and there are considerable ruins of the ancient town. Christianity was most probably introduced here at the same time as at Colosse, Col. iv. 13. The modern name is Pambouk-Kalassi.

HIERARCHY (hi'e-rark-e), a term applied to the apostolic order of the ministry below as well as in the Church above. The system of government in the Church by patriarchs, metropolitans, archbishops, bishops and, in an inferior degree, priests is thus named.

HIERAX (hi'er-aks), or HIERACAS (hi'er'a-kas), an eccentric Egyptian philosopher who fleurished during the third century. He had numerous followers called Abstinentes, from his dogma that Christ, in promulgating a law to supersede that of Moses, had prohibited the use of flesh, wine and everything gratifying to the senses. He was remarkable for his learning on almost every subject, but his poetic spirit led him, in the interpretation of the Scriptures, to obscure the sacred volume with allegorical exegesis. He denied the fall and the resurrection, distinguished the substance of the Son from that of the Father, and taught that Melchizedek was the Holy Ghost.

HIEROCLES (hi'er'o-kleez), 1, lived in the beginning of the fourth century, was governor of Bithynia, and a chief instigator of the persecution of Diocletian. He endeavored to pervert the faithful by a book called "Truth-loving Words to the Christians," which was answered by Eusebius and Lactantius. 2. A platonic philosopher who flourished at Alexandria in the beginning of the fifth century. He was author of a "Commentary on the Golden Verses of Pythagoras."

HIEROGLYPHICS (hi-e-ro-gli-f'iks), a word which is derived from two Greek terms signifying "sacred carvings," is the title given to the peculiar kind of writing which prevailed among the ancient Egyptians. Instead, however, of writing by means of letters such as we have in our modern alphabets, or as the Greeks, the Romans, the Hebrews, Samaritans and the Phœnicians had, the Egyptians used a number of figures, pictures of birds and other objects, and by attaching ideas to these signs all who were instructed in their symbolic meaning could decipher the hieroglyphic writing, just as in modern times educated persons can read a printed page. Two modes were adopted by the Egyptians in order to record the information which they desired to hand down to posterity. By engraving on their monuments, on the columns, and other portions of their temples and public edifices, the figures of their alphabet, they were able to record on them such historical incidents and matters of personal and public interest as they desired to hand down to future ages. The enduring character of these vast temples, with their massive columns, built, as they were, to stand during all time, when covered with engravings cut into the solid stone, presented an obvious mode not only of making the record public and spreading the information abroad, which was thus published before all men, but also guaranteed the preservation of the record, so that as long as the figures were permitted to remain the information would not be lost, if only the key to the alphabet would also be preserved. These figures, when indented on their stony bed, were made ornamental by means of color, and hence a vast edifice, such as an Egyptian temple was, when covered with hieroglyphic forms and symbols all set forth in glowing colors, must have presented a wondrously gorgeous and peculiar character. The Egyptian climate, with its freedom from moisture, leaving as it did the sharpest outlines of all figures untouched for ages, must have been favorable for the preservation of all such productions; and thus it has come to pass that the portions of these Egyptian monuments which war, the barbarism of man and the incursions of the sands from the desert have spared are much in the same state now as they were when they left the hands of the ancient Egyptian carver.

Then, again, the Egyptians were accustomed to trace these figures on the papyrus, or the paper which was prepared from the plant of that name, on wood or on slabs or movable stones. Records were thus made for general purposes, and the explorer of the Egyptian tombs who is now able to decipher the meaning of these symbols may read on the coverings of the enclosed bodies very much of their history while they lived; indeed, so minutely and so fully did the old Egyptians go into detail that not only did they record the actions of their sovereigns and the leading events of the land, but even the histories of their people were laid up with their remains in the tomb.

When the figures of this alphabet were decorated with divers colors, they are known as polychrome, and when only one tone or color is used the style is monochrome. On coffins and other objects the form of the figures appears to have been first traced out, and the color was afterward filled in; while on papyri and more perishable things the forms were merely sketched in outline; and these are known as linear hieroglyphics. The figures were arranged in perpendicular columns, separated from each other by lines, and a very marked peculiarity is at once perceptible—that all the animals, birds or figures face in the same direction, and they usually look toward any object with which they may be associated. In other cases, however, the arrangement is horizontal, and not perpendicular, and in some illustrations the writing is scattered in an irregular manner over the picture which is described.

The use of hieroglyphics among the Egyptians was very ancient, and its invention was attributed to the god "Thoth," who was called the scribe of the gods and lord of the hieroglyphs. In such an early age, when the masses of the people were neglected, their education must have been of a low order, and few, if any, of them could understand the writing which was known to the sacerdotal and instructed classes. To foreign nations they were altogether unintelligible. Among the Hebrews, during their sojourn in Egypt, it is probable that some knowledge of this writing may have been attained by their chief men. At any rate, Moses was learned in the literature of Egypt. The intercourse of Joseph with his brethren through interpreters, Gen. xlii. 23, merely refers to the spoken language, and does not bear on the subject. The Greeks settled on the coast of Africa, and came into contact with Egyptian affairs in the sixth century before Christ, and they appear only to have had a knowledge of colloquial discourse. About the middle of this century Solon studied Egyptian affairs at Heliopolis and elsewhere in the country, and Pythagoras must have derived his doctrines, which were of Egyptian origin, from some amount of knowledge of this mode of writing. About the middle of this century also Herodotus traveled in Egypt, and the knowledge which he gained of Egyptian affairs must have been derived from this source. When Alexander subjugated Egypt, the rulers whom he left behind him began to study the language and literature of the country with greater diligence, and Eratosthenes, the keeper of the museum at Alexandria, and Manetho, the high-priest at Sebennyus, drew up chronological details, which could only have been derived from hieroglyphical sources. Coming down to a later period, Charsson, who kept the library of the Serapeum in the time of Augustus, drew up a dictionary of the hieroglyphics, while considerable attention was evidently paid to them by others, as they are referred to by Diodorus and Strabo; and later still Tacitus gives an account of the monuments of Thebes as translated by the Egyptian priests. But after his time it is evident that attention to Egyptian antiquities and literature rapidly declined.

Ammianus Marcellinus refers to them in the third century A. D. Clement of Alexandria, A. D. 211, also alludes to the symbolic form of writing, which he designates the "cyriologic nature of hieroglyphics." Later still, Porphyry, A. D. 304, divides them into phonetic and symbolic, and about A. D. 500, Horus Apollus, in two books of confused writing, described them, and referred to their esoteric meaning. After this writer all knowledge of hieroglyphic literature appears to have died out, and not until the sixteenth century was the attention of the learned world drawn to the subject again. The Jesuit Kircher attempted to decipher their meaning, without success, and a limited advance was made by the theory of Zoega at the close of the eighteenth century, who suggested that certain of the signs were intended to express sounds. At length the key was found when the celebrated Rosetta Stone was discovered by the French savans near the mouth of the Rosetta branch of the Nile. See ROSETTA STONE. Copies of the inscriptions on this stone are now very widely distributed, and by means of the information which they convey it has become comparatively easy for Egyptologists to make steady and accurate progress in deciphering the symbolic writings of the ancient dwellers on the banks of the Nile. The literature in this department of antiquities has become extensive, and it is easily accessible, while it is very attractive because of its connection with the records of Old Testament times.

HIEROPHANT (hi-er'o-fant), or MYSTAGOGUS (mis-ta-go'gus). 1. The high-priest who, in ancient Greece, conducted the mysteries of the annual festival in honor of the goddess Demeter, or Ceres, and who initiated the candidates. The hierophant held his office for life, and was chosen with regard to his physical frame and the possession of a sonorous voice suited to the dignity and high character of the office. His person was held in great reverence; he was the only authorized interpreter of the unwritten laws, and the mention of his name to the uninitiated was prohibited. 2. In the Greek Church the term is applied to the head of a convent or monastery.

HIESTER (his'ter), WILLIAM, an American divine of the German Reformed Church, was born October 11, 1770, in Berks county, Pennsylvania. He pursued his studies under the instruction of Rev. Samuel Wagner, of York, Pennsylvania. After being licensed and ordained, he labored with great zeal in Lancaster county, and afterward in Lebanon, Pennsylvania, preaching both in the English and in the German language. He is gratefully remembered for his active exertions in the establishment of the theological seminary of his denomination. He died February 8, 1828.

HIGDEN (hig'den), RANULPH or RALPH, an English chronicler of the fourteenth century, and a Benedictine monk of St. Werberg at Chester. His "Polychronicon," written in Latin, was a universal history, in seven books, embracing the period from the creation to 1357. John de Trevisa's English translation, completed in 1387, is chiefly interesting as having been printed in 1482 by Caxton, who added an eighth book, bringing down the narrative to the year 1460. Some authorities ascribe to Higden the "Chester Mysteries," performed in 1328. He died at a great age, in the latter part of the fourteenth century, but the date of his death is not positively determined.

HIGGAION (hig-gah'yone), one of the words occurring in the book of Psalms, which have most probably a technical meaning. We find it used occasionally in the sense of meditation, thought, device; so it is rendered in our version of Ps. xix. 14; Lam. iii. 62. Elsewhere it has obviously a different sense. What that sense is critics are not agreed; but looking at the derivation of the word, its root being used for the deep sound of thunder, Job xxxvii. 2, and for the growl of the lion, Isa. xxxi. 4, we may most probably conclude that it means a deep solemn sound; so our version of Ps. xcii. 3. In ix. 16 it is joined with Selah and left untranslated.

HIGH MASS. See MASS.

HIGH-PLACES and GROVES. I. HIGH-PLACES.—The word rendered "high-place" in the Authorized Version is bamah, "a natural height." Upon such heights in Palestine altars were raised and temples built, the latter called

"houses of high-places." When used in relation to religion, whether idolatrous or not, this word may signify the sacred height itself, or the altar or temple upon it. At a late period high-places seem to have been often slight artificial elevations, and thus the name may have come to be applied to altars. It is needless to show the motives which led mankind to worship upon heights, or to instance different forms of this practice. Our inquiry must be as to the character of the worship at the high-places of Palestine—(1) before the conquest of the country; (2) in the time of the judges, and until the temple was built; and (3) after the building of the temple. See ALTAR.

1. This practice was probably of great antiquity in Palestine. Upon the summit of lofty Hermon are the remains of "a small and very ancient temple," toward which faced a circle of temples surrounding the mountain. That a temple should have been built on a summit of bare rock perpetually covered with snow shows a strong religious motive, and the position of the temples around the mountain indicates a belief in the sanctity of Hermon itself. This inference is supported by a passage in the treaty of Rameses II. with the Hittites of Syria, in which, besides gods and goddesses, the mountains and the rivers, both of the land of the Hittites and of Egypt, and the winds, are mentioned, in a list of Hittite and Egyptian divinities. The Egyptian divinities are spoken of from a Hittite point of view, for the expression, "the mountains and the rivers of the land of Egypt," is only half applicable to the Egyptian nature-worship, which had, in Egypt at least, but one sacred river. That Hermon was worshiped in connection with Baal is probable from the name Mount Baal-Hermon, Judg. iii. 3, Baal-Hermon, 1 Chr. v. 23, being apparently given to it, Baal being, as the Egyptian monuments indicate, the chief god of the Hittites. See HITTITES. That there was such a belief in the sanctity of mountains and hills seems evident from the great number of high-places of the old inhabitants, which is clearly indicated in the prohibition of their worship as compared with the statement of the disobedience of the Israelites. The command enjoined the destruction of all the idolatrous places "upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree," Deut. xii. 2; and it is related that the Israelites set up idolatrous objects "in every high hill and under every green tree," high-places being spoken of in connection with this worship and as belonging to the system of the natives of Canaan, 2 Ki. xvii. 9-11. There is no distinct mention of the exact character of any idolatrous worship at high-places in the narrative portions of Scripture relating to the period before the conquest of Canaan, but no doubt there is an indication in the name "high-places of Baal," applied to one of the heights whence Balaam saw Israel and where he sacrificed. But Balaam here, as elsewhere, had altars built for the sacrifices, Num. xxii. 41; xxiii. 1. There is no evidence that the believing Hebrews before the law followed this practice. Those who endeavor to discover it, cite the passage describing Abraham's arrival at "a mountain" between Bethel and Ai, and there building an altar, Gen. xii. 8, but this is very insufficient. The mountain, as the Hebrew term allows, must have been a slight eminence, and it is mentioned in connection with Abraham's pitching his tent, rather than his building the altar. It is most unlikely that Abraham would have chosen a place that would have been chosen by the heathen; had he done so in this case, we should probably have had some additional evidence from another instance.

2. The Israelites, on occupying Canaan, must have found the land covered with the places of idolatrous worship. During the troubled period of the Judges they were mainly confined to the three mountainous tracts separated by the plain of Esdraelon and the Jordan valley, the territory of the northern tribes, three of which rose at the call of Barak; that of which Judah and Ephraim formed the great rallying points; and, beyond Jordan, hilly Gilead. The plain of Esdraelon was held by the Canaanites, the coast of the Mediterranean by the Phœnicians and the Philistines, the great pasture-lands on the east of Jordan mainly by wandering tribes of Abrahamic descent. Thus confined to the hilly parts of the country, the Israelites lived where the associations of the old idolatry were strongest. Worship at high-places was thus adopted by them, and in their subsequent history we find it practiced among them, both by believers, up to a certain period, and by idolaters. It was, perhaps, on this account that the servants of Benhadad counseled him to fight Israel in the plain, arguing: "Their gods [are] gods of the hills, therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they," 1 Ki. xx. 23. See PHOENICIA.

In the law it was distinctly commanded that no sacrifices should be offered except at the one place of worship. It is indeed said that the offerings were to be brought to this place after the people had rest from their enemies, Deut. xii. 10, 11, but this injunction seems to refer to the rest after the first conquest, and certainly does not allow of the use of other altars. That this law was clearly understood at the first is evident from the history of the altar of witness built by the two tribes and a half when they departed to their inheritance, Josh. xxii. 10-34. Nothing can be more explicit than the words of these tribes: "God forbid that we should rebel against the Lord, and turn this day from following the Lord, to build an altar for burnt-offerings, for meat-offerings or for sacrifices, beside the altar of the Lord our God that [is] before his tabernacle," ver. 29. There is therefore no possibility of admitting the theory that the prohibition was not to come into force until the temple had been built, when it was thus understood in the lifetime of Phinehas.

Not long after this, the custom of sacrificing elsewhere than at Shiloh appears to have commenced, for we read how, evidently in the earliest days of the occupation of Canaan, the people were reproved by an angel at Bochim, and "sacrificed there unto the Lord," Jud. ii. 5. It is still more remarkable to read that Gideon built an altar to the Lord, and afterward that he was commanded to destroy the altar of Baal and build an altar to the Lord, Jud. vi. 24, 25, 26. So, too, Manoah sacrificed where the angel appeared, Jud. xiii. 19. This worship seems to have been occasioned by the disturbed state of the country and the difficulty of uniting in journeys to Shiloh for the great feasts, and it may perhaps have been permitted as a recurrence to the patriarchal system. The local idolatrous worship adopted from the heathen was carried on at the same time. We hear, however, nothing of high-places until the time of Samuel, when the sacrificing and worship in high-places seems to have been usual, and was sanctioned by the practice and approval of the priest-judge, 1 Sam. ix. 12; x. 5, 13. In the time of Solomon this worship still obtained, for it is said of the beginning of his reign, "Only the people sacrificed in high-places, because there was no house built unto the name of the Lord, until those days," 1 Ki. iii. 2. Solomon accordingly "went to Gibeon to sacrifice there, for that [was] the great high-place," ver. 4. That his sacrificing was not disapproved is evident from the dream which God there granted him. At this time the tabernacle was at Gibeon, though David had removed the ark to Jerusalem, 2 Chr. i. 3-6, comp. 1 Chr. xvi. 37-40. The separation of the ark from the tabernacle, and the pitching the latter at a high-place, are very remarkable points.

3. After the completion of the temple there must have been no excuse for worship at high-places, and it was probably for a time discontinued. When they are again mentioned, it is in connection with idolatry. Solomon made a high-place, or high-places, for the idols of Moab and Ammon, 1 Ki. xi. 7. Jeroboam, to prevent his subjects from going to Jerusalem, established a series of high-places. At Dan and Bethel he raised houses of high-places, and throughout his kingdom, 1 Ki. xii. 26-31; xiii. 32. The system set up by Jeroboam was partly an imitation of the national religion, partly of the idolatry of Egypt and Canaan. See IDOLATRY. From this time we find high-places used either for idolatrous worship, or apparently for an independent and unlawful practice of the national rites. In general, the former use seems to have obtained in Judah and the latter in Israel, though this rule cannot be strictly applied in either case. Already in Rehoboam's time the people of Judah had set up idolatrous high-places, 1 Ki. xiv.

23. Later we find it recorded as a flaw in the reigns of pious kings of Judah that the high-places yet remained in use, the people still sacrificing and burning incense at them. It is said of Asa that he took away the high-places, 2 Chr. xiv. 5, but it appears that this reform was not successfully accomplished, at least in Israel, 2 Chr. xv. 17; 1 Ki. xv. 14, of which he held cities, 2 Chr. xv. 8; xvii. 2. Jehoshaphat, again, is said to have taken away "the high-places and groves out of Judah," ver. 6, comp. 2 Chr. xix. 3; but it seems that he was not fully successful, for we read in a later place that "the high-places were not taken away," 2 Chr. xx. 33; 1 Ki. xxii. 43. Hezekiah appears, however, at the commencement of his reign to have successfully suppressed the high-places. They were destroyed not only in Judah and Benjamin, but also in Ephraim and Manasseh. This work, so far as it concerned the Israelite territory, may have been spontaneously executed by the believing people, as seems implied in the account in the Chronicles, but it is also possible that in the broken state of the Israelite monarchy Hezekiah held a large portion of its more southern territories, 2 Ki. xviii. 4, comp. 2 Chr. xxxi. 1. But even this reform was not final, and after the relapse into idolatry of Manasseh and Amon, there was another suppression of the high-places by Josiah, apparently the first which was thorough, as may be seen by referring to 2 Ki. xxiii. 5, 8, 13, 15, 16, 19, 20; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 3-7.

Worship at altars not at Jerusalem seems to have been occasionally practiced by believers after the building of the temple, as in the remarkable instance of Elijah on Mount Carmel, where "he repaired the altar of the Lord [that was] broken down," building it of twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, a circumstance which seems to make its much older origin probable, 1 Ki. xviii. 30-32. Elijah also complained at Horeb that God's altars were overthrown, 1 Ki. xix. 10. Yet we have no ground for supposing that any general deviation from the worship at the one sanctuary was allowed after the temple had been built. A prophet might have been commanded to sacrifice at an altar away from Jerusalem on a special occasion. But a general practice, tending to a neglect of the feasts and their sacrifices, and to the formation of an unlawful priesthood, was evidently forbidden as wrong and dangerous.

The passages relating to the high-places furnish us with several interesting particulars. Jeroboam not only set up the calves as objects of worship at the houses of the high-places of Bethel and Dan, but, as we have seen, he made a priesthood of the lowest of the people, not Levites, and he also fixed an annual feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, 1 Ki. xii. 28-33. It was when Jeroboam stood by the altar at Bethel that the prophet who came out of Judah foretold its overthrow, 1 Ki. xiii. 1-3. It was at Bethel, in the time of the second Jeroboam, that Amos predicted the ruin of the high-places, and was complained of to the king by Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, Amos vii. 9-13. The remarkable passage, "And the high-places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste," ver. 9, is explained by a comparison with a previous enumeration of high-places: "Seek not Bethel, nor enter into Gilgal, and pass not to Beersheba," ver. 5. The high-places of Isaac would refer to Beersheba, and the sanctuaries of Israel to Bethel; Gilgal was a place of worship at the time of Samuel, 1 Sam. xi. 15. Hosea, like Amos a prophet especially sent to Israel, like him condemns the worship at high-places. We have no means of forming any idea of the character of the temples attached to the high-places, but it is evident that they must have been too numerous to have been large, except perhaps those at Dan and Bethel. Probably the high-place had frequently nothing on its summit but an altar, and this would account for the difficulty of destroying this worship. So long as the site was considered sacred, it little mattered that a fresh altar was to be built. Josiah's way of dealing with this practice was evidently effectual.

II. GROVES.—"The grove," or "the groves," as the word Asherah and its plural are rendered in the Authorized Version, are constantly mentioned with high-places. At first sight the common Septuagint rendering, followed by our version, seems to carry conviction with it, from the connection of high-places with worship under the trees, and the prevalence of nature-worship in Palestine, but a closer examination shows that something of the character of an image must be intended. In a previous article [see ASHTORETH] this conclusion has been stated, and it has been proposed to adopt the theory which makes Asherah a name for Ashtoreth, as the goddess of good fortune. It is especially noticed, in favor of this identification, that the grove or groves occur with Baal like Ashtoreth; that the Septuagint renders Asherah by Astarte in 2 Chr. xv. 16, as does the Vulgate in Jud. iii. 7, and conversely Ashtoreth by groves in 1 Sam. vii. 3. And it must be remembered that the grove is constantly connected with Baal. On the ancient Egyptian monuments, the figure of Khem, the god of productiveness, is constantly accompanied by the representation of one or more trees or plants. In the plates of Sir Gardner Wilkinson's "Ancient Egyptians" we observe the following variations in these objects. A shrine, from which rises a double flower like two blossoms of the lotus, behind Khem (here as AMEN-RA KA-MUT-EEF, "Amen-ra, who is male and female"); a shrine, from which rise a flower and two trees, behind Khem; a great nosegay in effigy, carried before, and another behind, an image of Khem; behind the same image, a sacred chest adorned with rosettes, upon which are five representations of trees; and behind an image of Khem a flower and two other objects. It is quite evident that all these trees and flowers are imitations, on account of their dimensions, and in some cases the manner in which they are attached to shrines or the like. From their forms and size, compared, in the latter particular, with their being portable, it is equally certain that they must have been generally, if not always, of wood. It is not necessary to prove how completely they agree with the idolatrous objects rendered "groves" in the Authorized Version. Are we to suppose that the Septuagint translators adopted the meaning in consequence of their observing objects in Egyptian idolatry which aptly corresponded, letting alone the signification "grove" as probably not derivable from the Hebrew to the idolatrous objects connected with the worship of Baal and Ashtoreth; and, further, that the groves of Egypt and Palestine were identical? The former question seems easily answered affirmatively, the latter suggests several curious inquiries. We have to determine how far Baal and Ashtoreth were identical with Khem, whether the worship of groves is to be traced to Egypt, and what is the etymology of the name Asherah. Khem is the Egyptian personification of the productiveness of nature; hence the connection of these vegetable objects with his worship is easily understood. Baal is sometimes connected with productiveness, and Ashtoreth has certainly this relation. Perhaps they may be reasonably supposed to represent the two ideas that are expressed in the title of Khem, "who is male and female." But it is to be observed that the name of Baal is found on the Egyptian monuments as equivalent to that of Set or Sutekh, the personification of physical evil. The idea conveyed by the latter is so opposed to that of Baal that we may reasonably conjecture that the identification was founded upon something different from a comparison of the supposed characteristics of these idols. It seems reasonable

HILALI (he-la'le), or HELALI CODEX, one of the most ancient and most celebrated codices of the Hebrew Scriptures, which derived its name from the fact that it was written at Hilla, a town built near the ruins of ancient Babel. Others, however, maintain that it was called "Hilali" because the name of the man who wrote it was "Hillel." But whatever uncertainty there may be about the derivation of its name, there can hardly be any doubt that it was written A. D. 600, for Sakkuto

HILARIA (hil-lah're-a), an ancient Roman festival in honor of the goddess Cybele, celebrated in the Kalends April 8, or on March 25. The occasion was one of great rejoicing. Masquerades and other disguises were freely indulged in, and the multitudes marched through the streets bearing the statue of Cybele. The preceding day was kept as a day of mourning. The reason for this being that, as Cybele represented the earth, which at that season passed from winter to summer, so this sudden transition from sorrow to rejoicing was emblematical of the vicissitudes of the seasons.

Being brought before the Roman pro-consul, the child nobly replied to the threats which were made against him, "Do what you please; I am a Christian."

2. Q. JULIUS, whose name also appears as HILARIO, was an ecclesiastical writer of the fourth century, about whose life nothing certain is known. He is the reputed author of "The Duration of the World, or the Course of Time."

HILARION (hil-lah're-on), SAINT, the principal founder of monachism in Palestine, was born near Gaza, about A. D. 292. Sent to study at Alexandria, he was there converted to Christianity, and the fame of St. Anthony attracted him to the desert and made him a monk. He then returned to Palestine, gave away his property and retired, still very young, into the desert. He founded several monasteries, lived the most austere life and gained the highest reputation for sanctity, and even for miraculous powers. He afterward visited the deserts of Egypt, Sicily and Dalmatia, and died in the isle of Cyprus, about 372. His remains were brought back to Palestine by Hesy chius, and were buried near Magum. His life was written by St. Jerome.

HILARY (hil'a-re), or HILARIUS (hil-lah're-us), SAINT. There have been several eminent ecclesiastics bearing this name, among whom the following demand notice:

1. ARELATENSIS, archbishop of Arles, was born about 401 to 403, of a noble family. He was wealthy, but after his elevation to the archiepiscopal office devoted all his riches to charity; indeed, it is said he so impoverished himself that he had to resort to manual work for means of support. He was a humble Christian man, but somewhat stern as a prelate. This was exemplified in his deposing one of his bishops, and refusing to recognize the pope's right to interfere in the matter. This brought him into collision with the pope Leo, and the breach was not healed even by Hilary's walking barefoot to Rome to effect a reconciliation. The object was defeated by the honest sternness of the latter, who would not acknowledge that he had done wrong, even to secure the to trace it to some such idea as that the personification of physical evil would be the protector of the warlike enemies of Egypt. Khem, if the name be correctly read, was probably introduced from the East, and perhaps from Palestine. Ash-toreth, like Baal, is mentioned on the Egyptian monuments. She is worshiped as a foreign divinity, and is connected with Set. The worship of groves may have been common from a remote period to Egypt and Palestine, or it may have been derived from Egypt. This question depends for its resolution very much upon the degree of completeness which the worship of Khem may be supposed to have attained at the time of its first introduction into Egypt, if introduced into that country. HIGUERRA (hig-gwer'ra), HIERONYMUS ROMANUS DE LA, a Spanish Jesuit, who attained some notoriety by the fabrication of sup-tells us most distinctly that when he saw the remainder of it (about 1500) the Codex was 900 years old. His words are: "In the year 4956, on the 28th of Ab (1196, better 1197), there was a great persecution of the Jews in the kingdom of Leon from the two kingdoms that came to besiege it. It was there that the twenty-four sacred books which were written long ago, about the year 600, by R. Moses b. Hillel (on which account the Codex was called Hilali), in an exceedingly correct manner, and after which all the copies were corrected, were taken away. I saw the remaining two portions of it—viz., the earlier and later prophets—written in large and beautiful characters, which were brought to Portugal and sold in Africa, where they still are, having been written 900 years ago. Kimchi, in his 'Grammar on Num. xv. 4,' says that the Pentateuch of this Codex was extant in Toleti." The Codex had the Tiberian vowels and accents, Mas-sora and Nikud glosses, and it served up to A. D. 1500 as a model from which copies were made. This Codex, which Haja had in Babylon about pope's favor, much as he desired it. Dr. Waterland conjectures that this Hilary, who, before his appointment to Arles, had been abbot of Lerins, drew up the creed called the Athanasian for the use of the Gallican clergy. Most of his works have been lost. He died in 449.

2. CRISPIN, succeeded Leo I. as bishop of Rome. He was deputed by Leo to represent him at the Council of Ephesus in 449, and made a firm stand against the Eutychians. When he was elected bishop, he excommunicated Eutyches and Nestorius. He was zealous in the administration of the affairs of his diocese, and enriched the churches and monasteries which had been despoiled by the Vandals. He died in 467 at Rome.

3. DIACONUS, was a native of Sardinia and a deacon of the church at Rome. He flourished in the middle of the 4th century. To him are ascribed the "Questions on the Old and New Testaments," usually printed with Augustine's works, and the "Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul," which appear among those of Ambrose.

4. PICTANIENSIS, a native and subsequently bishop of Poitiers, who flourished in the fourth century, was especially distinguished as a zealous champion of the faith and opponent of heresy, chiefly Arianism. He was of noble parentage, and a heathen. He and his wife and daughter were converted and baptized, and in 350 he was made bishop of Poitiers, although a married man. He drew on himself the anger of Constantius by a manly defence of Athanasius, and was banished to Phrygia. This did not cause any abatement in his zeal for the truth. Indeed, his fearless opposition to the Arian heresy won for him the title of Malleus Arianorum. In 359 he attended the council called by Constantius at Seleucia, in Isauria, and warmly defended the doctrine of the Trinity in the face of an overwhelming Arian majority. After the council he even asked of the emperor permission to argue in his presence the questions at issue, and being denied and driven from the court, he wrote a powerful invective against Constantius, denouncing him as anti-Christ, and declaring that he had espoused Christianity with the view to deny Christ. On the accession of Julian, Hilary assembled councils and traveled extensively to restore the faith and purify the Church from the Arian heresy. He died at Poitiers in 367. He wrote a large number of valuable works, but the one that takes the very front rank is his great treatise on the "Doctrine of the Trinity," which was the first great controversial treatise on this doctrine in the Western Church. His "Commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew" is repeatedly quoted by Jerome and Augustine. He also wrote an excellent "Commentary on the Psalms," besides a small work giving an account of his conversion, and three epistles to Constantius, in which he defines and defends his views, and in the third he makes the violent attack alluded to above on the emperor.

HILDA (hil'da), SAINT, the renowned abbess of Whitby, was born in 617, in Northumbria, of which her grand-uncle Edwin was king. She was distinguished from early childhood for devout piety. The Northumbrians relapsing into idolatry after the death of King Edwin, she left the kingdom, but returned when Oswald became king, and founded a small nunnery on the Wear, thenceforth devoting herself to a life of celibacy. On the decease of King Oswald, his brother Oswy contended for the throne against the pagan Penda, king of Mercia, and while marching against him made a vow that if the Lord granted him the victory he would devote his infant daughter Elfreda to his service in holy virginity. Oswald defeated and slew the formidable Penda in a great battle near Leeds. He accordingly, in fulfillment of his vow, committed the infant princess to the care of Hilda. Not long after, Hilda erected a monastery at Whitby, which, on account of its great wealth and the high religious character of Hilda, became one of the most celebrated in England. Here she took up her abode as abbess, and here were nurtured HILDEBRAND (hil'de-brand), born near Loana, in Tuscany, about 1013, of humble parentage, his father being, it is said, a carpenter. Entering ecclesiastical life, he rose rapidly from his obscurity until, in 1073, he became pope of Rome, assuming the title of Gregory VII.; and as pope he made the papal chair supreme over the mightiest monarchs of his day. See GREGORY VII.

HILDEGARDE (hil-de-gard'), or HILDEGARDIS, a noted abbess of St. Rupert's Mount, on the Rhine, was born in 1098, in Böckelheim, in Germany. Her notoriety is chiefly due to her pretended supernatural revelations, which were believed in by Bernard and others, and were even some of the most eminent men in England, among whom were Hedda, Wilfrid and Cædmon. She died in November, 680.

HILDEBERT (hil'de-bert) OF TOURS, or HILDEBERTUS TURONENSIS, was born at Lavardin, about 1055. He studied under Berengarius, and was successively bishop of Mans and archbishop of Tours. He was eminent as a poet, a philosopher and a theologian. He wrote with great severity against the vices of the court of Rome. His works, which show much learning, were published by the Benedictines, and include two admirable treatises, respectively entitled "Tractatus Philosophicus" and "Moralis Philosophia," which hold rank as the first essays toward a systematic theology. He died in 1134.

countenanced by Pope Eugenius III. and his three immediate successors, besides many prelates. She died in 1180. She wrote "Life of St. Robert," "Three Books of Revelations" and "An Exposition of St. Benedict's Rule."

HILDEGONDE (hil-de-gon'deh), a female saint of the Romish Church, was born near the middle of the twelfth century, probably at Nuitz, in the diocese of Cologne. She visited the Holy Land dressed in male attire, under the name of Joseph; and returning to Cologne, she entered a Cistercian convent near Heidelberg, where she was known to the other monks as "Brother Joseph," her sex not being discovered till after her death, which took place April 20, 1188. Such were the ideas of saintship which then prevailed.

HILDERSHAM (hil'ders-ham), ARTHUR, an English Puritan minister, was born October 6, 1563, at Stechworth, Cambridgeshire. He was of a papist family, but while at Christ's College, Cambridge, he avowed himself a Protestant, in consequence of which he was disowned by his father, and his education was completed through the patronage of his kinsman, the earl of Huntingdon. His ministerial labors were conducted chiefly in Leicestershire, where he was universally beloved. He was repeatedly persecuted through the High Commission, but he maintained through all his sufferings a consistent Christian character. He wrote "A Treatise on the Doctrine of the Lord's Supper," besides several volumes of sermons. He died March 4, 1631.

HILDESLEY (hil'dez-le), MARK, an English divine, was born at Murson, Kent, in 1698. After graduating at Trinity College, Cambridge, he was, after serving in several minor positions, rector of Holwell, Bedfordshire, and afterward bishop of Sodor and Man. He aided in the translation of the Bible into the Manx language. He died September 7, 1772.

HILDRETH (hil'dreth), HOSEA, a Congregational minister, was born January 2, 1782, in Massachusetts. After graduating at Harvard College, he became professor of mathematics in Phillips' Exeter Academy. Having studied divinity in the mean time, he was afterward installed minister of First Parish, Gloucester, Massachusetts. He was also a zealous advocate of the temperance cause. He died in 1835.

HILEN (hi'len), a city of Judah allotted to the priests, 1 Chr. vi. 58. In Josh. xv. 51; xxi. 15, it is called HOLON, which see.

HILKIAH (hil-ki'ah). 1. The father of Eliakim, one of Hezekiah's officers, 2 Ki. xviii. 18, 26, 37; Isa. xxii. 20; xxxvi. 3, 22. 2. The high-priest in the reign of Josiah, 1 Chr. vi. 13; ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11, probably Ezra's great-grandfather, Ezra vii. 1. The chief event which distinguished his administration was the finding of the book of the law in the temple while the sacred pile was being repaired in Josiah's reformation. This book Hilkiah delivered to Shaphan the scribe, who carried it to the king and read it to him. The king, alarmed at what he heard, sent to inquire of the prophetess Huldah, and received her reply that for the wickedness of the people the threatenings of that book should be executed, 2 Ki. xxii. 8-20; xxiii. 4, 24; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8-33; xxxv. 8. Questions have been raised in regard to the book so discovered. There is some reason to believe that it was the original autograph, for that was to be deposited by the side of the ark of the covenant in the most holy place, Deut. xxxi. 26. But even if the original did not survive so long, the book must have been a standard, the temple copy, kept in some place not generally accessible, for it was found by the high-priest himself. It is doubted whether it contained the whole Pentateuch. Lord A. Hervey maintains that it was only the book of Deuteronomy; but his arguments are not conclusive, and there is no clear proof that the fivefold division of the law had been at that time made; the probability, therefore, is that the whole formed but a single roll. Even De Wette seems to acknowledge that the book in question was the entire Pentateuch, for he considers the narrative as affording "the first certain trace of the existence of our present Pentateuch." Lord A. Hervey thinks it probable that neither Josiah nor Hilkiah could read, but this supposition is groundless; for how should Hilkiah, if unable to read, have discovered what the book was which he had found? as he must have done, for he announced it to Shaphan when he delivered it to him. And as for Josiah, he appears to have taken at least a part in the solemn reading in the temple, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 30. There is no need to suppose that this law-book was the only existing copy; it is most likely that some were preserved by devout men in various parts of the land, though the evil reigns of Manasseh and Amon might have swept them from Jerusalem. But even if it was the sole remaining copy, instances are not wanting in which a book has long been lost, and when at length one single copy has been discovered no difficulty has been found in identifying it. To imagine that Josiah and Hilkiah concocted this book of the law and palmed it on the people would be to make them most accomplished hypocrites; and Huldah the prophetess must necessarily have joined in the fraud. He must be credulous indeed who could believe that. 3, 4. Two Levites of the family of Merari, 1 Chr. vi. 45; xxvi. 11. 5. One who stood with Ezra at the solemn reading of the law, Neh. viii. 4. 6. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel, xii. 7, 21. 7. The father of the prophet Jeremiah, Jer. i. 1. 8. The father of one of Zedekiah's ambassadors to Nebuchadnezzar, xxix. 3.

HILL, HILLS, HILL-COUNTRY. Palestine may be considered generally as a hilly country. There are also plains and valleys; so that occasionally we have the mountains or hill-country contrasted with the lowlands, Josh. xv. 33, 48. The hills specially named in Scripture are noticed under their respective names.

There is a want of precision in our ordinary language in regard to the use of the terms "hill" and "mountain." Properly, they convey distinct ideas. But yet it is almost as common for us to speak of the "highland hills" as of the "Scottish mountains." This want of precision sometimes produces confusion in our version of the Scriptures. Thus, "the hill-country" of Luke i. 39, 65, is "the mountains" of Josh. xv. 48. So "the mountain of Josh. xv. 8 is "the hill" of the succeeding verse; and the same eminence is termed "mountain," Luke ix. 28, and "hill" in the 37th verse of the same chapter. There are two Hebrew words, one signifying a rounded hill, the other a mountain or mountain-chain, which are frequently thus confounded. There are also two Greek words in the New Testament of distinctly different meaning, and it is to be regretted that the distinction is not indicated in the translation.

HILL, GEORGE, D.D., a Scottish divine, was born in 1748, at Saint Andrews. After graduating at the university of Saint Andrews, he held the professorship of Greek and then of divinity. He was afterward principal of St. Mary's College; and while here he delivered his "Lectures in Divinity," regarded as his greatest work, and it has been used for many years as a text-book in theological seminaries in Scotland and elsewhere. He was long a distinguished ornament of the Church of Scotland. His doctrinal views were Calvinistic, in harmony with the standards of his Church. Besides the work already noticed, he wrote "Theological Institutes" and "Lectures on portions of the Old Testament, Illustrative of the Jewish History." He died in 1819.

HILL, GREEN, one of the pioneers of Methodism in Tennessee, was born in 1741, in North Carolina. During the Revolution he served as colonel in the patriot army. He died in 1825.

HILL, SIR RICHARD, a dissenting minister and zealous promoter of Methodism, was born in 1733, at Hawkestone, England. He received his education at Westminster School and Magdalen College, Oxford. In his youth he experienced deep religious impressions, which he tried to dissipate by a roving life on the Continent, but they only became more firmly fixed, and on his return to England he was converted. Throughout his subsequent life he was an earnest and useful Christian, and preached occasionally in dissenting chapels. He wrote a number of pamphlets which attracted attention in their day, among them "Pietas Oxoniensis: a full Account of the Expulsion of Six Students from St. Edmund's Hall;" a rebuke of the expulsion of the "Methodist Students" from Oxford; "An Apology for Brotherly Love, against Danberry's Guide;" and "A Letter to Mr. Milan on his Defence of Polygamy." He died in 1808.

HILL, ROWLAND, the founder, and for forty years the minister, of Surrey Chapel, was a younger brother of Sir Richard Hill, noticed above, and was born at Hawkestone, near Shrewsbury, in 1744. He received his education at Eton, and at St. John's College, Cambridge. At the time he quitted the university, George Whitfield was in the zenith of his popularity, and so congenial to his nature was that extraordinary preacher's manner and doctrine, that he quickly adopted both, and became his zealous disciple; preaching in the streets of Bristol, on the quays or among the colliers of Kingswood—wherever, in fact, he could gain an audience. It was with the greatest difficulty, and only through family influence, that he succeeded in obtaining admission into the Church, six bishops in succession having refused to ordain him. In 1773 he was appointed to the parish of Kingston, Somerset, but continued his itineracy, attracting thousands of eager listeners wherever he preached. His father dying in 1782, he inherited considerable wealth, with which he built Surrey Chapel, London, aided in the undertaking by his numerous friends. Here, for many years, his earnestness, wit and eccentricity drew vast crowds. Hill took a conspicuous part in the controversy between the Armenian and Calvinistic Methodists, strenuously upholding the principles of the latter. The influence of his ministry in London has continued to the present time. Among the pamphlets which he wrote were "Imposture Detected" and "Full Answer to John Wesley." He died April 11, 1833.

HILL, WILLIAM, D.D., a Presbyterian clergyman, was born March 3, 1769, in Cumberland county, Virginia. He graduated at Hampden-Sydney College. While at college he embraced religion, and determined to engage in the ministry. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Hanover, and preached successively in Berkeley, Winchester and Prince Edward county. He began the preparation of a "History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States," which was interrupted by his death, which took place November 16, 1852, in Winchester.

HILLEL (hil'lel), the father of Abdon the judge, Jud. xii. 13, 15.

HILLEL I., HA-SAKEN, or the GREAT B. SIMON. This extraordinary rabbi, the second Ezra, or the restorer of the law, as he is called, under whose presidency Christ was born, and who, by his self-denying and holy life, as well as by his great wisdom and learning, exercised so remarkable an influence both upon the theology and literature of the Jewish nation, and prepared the way for the advent of the Saviour, was born in Babylon about 75 B. C., of the royal family of David. He settled in Jerusalem about 36 B. C., where, notwithstanding his renowned lineage, he had to support himself by the labor of his hands, and attended at the same time the lectures of Shemaja and Abtalion, who were the heads of the Sanhedrim. So great was his thirst after knowledge that he gave daily of his scanty earnings to the doorkeeper of the college in order to be admitted to the lectures; and when the janitor would not admit him one day because he had no money to pay, this zealous scholar, rather than lose the day's instruction, climbed up to the window, and there sat outside on a bitterly cold winter's day, attentively listening till he was completely covered with snow and rendered insensible by the cold. When he was discovered, though it was on the Sabbath, the students, disregarding the sanctity of the day, procured the necessary remedies, and to their joy restored him to life, and from that day looked up to him as their future guide. He succeeded to the presidency of the Sanhedrim about 30 B. C. His zeal for the law of God and his modest honesty, would not however, allow him to be seated on the presidential throne without plainly telling the spiritual guides of Jerusalem that it was their negligence in studying the law which necessitated them to elect him. "What," said he to them, in godly sincerity, "has led to it that I, insignificant Babylonian, must become president of the Sanhedrim? Your negligence in attending to the teaching of Shemaja and Abtalion." He had no less than 1000 pupils, 80 of whom had more especially distinguished themselves, Jonathan ben Uziel, the translator of the prophets into Chaldee, being the chief, and Jochanan b. Zakkai the least, amongst them. As most of these disciples became the spiritual guides of the nation at the advent of Christ, it is most important to give some of the lessons which they were taught by their great master Hillel, and which they again imparted to the people, in order to see how far these lessons agree with those of the Saviour, and how they prepared the minds of the people to receive the teachings of the gospel. His cardinal doctrine and aim of life were "to be gentle, showing all meekness to all men," and "when reviled not to revile again;" and of this he gave a signal illustration on one occasion when one laid a wager that he would provoke the rabbi to anger. He went to Hillel and teased him with a number of foolish questions; and seeing that he bore it meekly and patiently, the man began to insult him, but Hillel answered him with uniform kindness, mildness and forbearance, and uttered not an angry word in reply to the insulting language (comp. Tit. iii. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 20, 23; iii. 9). A heathen appealed to him to tell him one sentence which embodies the whole law, to which Hillel replied, "Whatsoever thou wouldst not that a man should do to thee do not thou to him: this is the whole law" (comp. Matt. vii. 12; Mark vi. 31). Let a few more of his maxims suffice: "Say not, I will repent when I have leisure, lest the leisure should never be thine." "If I do not care for my soul, who can do it for me? If I only care for my own soul, what am I? If not now, when then?" (comp. James iv. 13, 14): "Do not separate thyself from the congregation, and have no confidence in thyself till the day of death" (comp. 1 Cor. x. 12). "Judge not thy neighbor till thou art in his situation" (comp. Gal. vi. 1. 4). "Be of the disciples of Aaron; love peace and

II., who favored the Pharisees. Now Hillel tried to reconcile these opposite parties. He endeavored to show the Sadducees, who rejected every law which was not expressly laid down in the word of God, that the traditional law naturally flows from the written law, through the medium of the following seven rules of interpretation:

1. Inference from minor to the major, e. g., Ex. xxii. 13, does not say whether the borrower of a thing is responsible for theft. In vers. 9-11, however, it is declared that the depository who can free himself from making restitution in cases of death or accident must make restitution when the animal is stolen; whilst in ver. 13, the borrower is even obliged to make restitution in cases of death or accident. Hence the inference made from the minor (i. e., the depository) to the major (i. e., the borrower) that he (in xxii. 13) is all the more responsible for theft. This exegetical law is employed by Christ and the apostles (comp. Matt. vii. 11; x. 29-31; Rom. v. 8; viii. 32-34; Heb. iii. 3).

2. The analogy of ideas, or analogous inferences.

DRUID HIGH-PLACE AT OLD SARUM (SALISBURY), ENGLAND.—See HIGH-PLACES and DRUIDS.

pursue it; be kindly affectioned to all men, and thus commend the law of God" (comp. Rom. xiii. 10). "Whosoever shall exalt his name, shall abase it; whosoever does not strive to the knowledge of the law is not worthy of life; whosoever does not increase his knowledge decreases it; whosoever turns the crown of knowledge into filthy lucre shall perish" (comp. Matt. xxiii. 12).

Hillel was the first who laid down definite hermeneutical rules for the interpretation of the Bible. Just as at the commencement of the Reformation England was distracted by the vacillation of Henry VIII., who one day became a defender of the Roman Catholic faith and another day espoused the cause of Protestantism; by the alternate powers of More, Fisher, and Gardiner, and Cromwell, and Cranmer; by Mary, who succeeded to the throne, and then again the good Protestant Edward VI. who followed her; so Judæa was perplexed by the Sadducean and Pharisean princes who alternately followed each other. Alexander Janai, a Sadducee, was succeeded by Queen Salome, whose sympathies were with the Pharisees; she, again, was succeeded by Aristobulus II., a Sadducee; and he, again, was followed by his brother, Hyrcanus

This rule was employed by Hillel himself on a very extraordinary occasion. In his days the evening of the Passover happened to fall on a Sabbath, which is of very rare occurrence, and the question was hotly contested whether or not the Paschal lamb might be slain on the Sabbath. Hillel said that it may be slain, and argued it thus: It is said respecting the daily sacrifice, "to offer it in its time," Num. xxviii. 2; and it is also said, respecting the Paschal lamb, "let the children of Israel keep it in its time," Num. ix. 2. Now, with regard to the daily sacrifice, it is distinctly ordered that it should be offered on the Sabbath, Num. xxviii. 9; the expression in its time does not, therefore, denote the day, but that the offering is to be observed at the appointed time; and as the expression is also used of the Passover lamb, hence it must be offered irrespective of the day, and, therefore, also irrespective of the Sabbath.

3. Analogy of two objects in one verse. Thus Lev. xv. 4 mentions two objects, viz., the bed and the chair, which, though belonging to two different classes, have the common quality of serving for repose. And as these are declared to be unclean when touched by him who has an issue, and to have the power of defiling both men and garments through contact, it is inferred that all things which serve for resting may be rendered unclean by him who has an issue, and then defile both men and garments.

4. Analogy of two objects in two verses. E. g., though the command to light the lamps in the sanctuary, Lev. xxiv. 4, is different from the command "to put out of the camp every leper," Num. v. 2, inasmuch as in the former case the injunction is described as binding for ever or for all times, Lev. xxiv. 3, whilst in the latter the speedy carrying out of it is especially spoken of, Num. v. 4; yet because they have that in common that they are both alike commands, and that the word command is used with regard to both of them, hence it is concluded that every law with regard to which the expression command is used must at once and for ever be obeyed.

5. General and special. Thus, wherever a special statement follows a general one, the definition of the special is to be applied to the general one, because it is always the only valid meaning—e. g., it is said in Lev. i. 2, "If any man of you bring an offering to the Lord, from cattle, from oxen and from sheep." Here cattle is a general expression, and may denote different kinds of animals. Oxen and sheep is the special whereby the general is defined, and therewith it is rendered coextensive. Hence it is inferred that only oxen and small cattle may be brought as sacrifices, but not beasts.

6. Analogy of another passage. This is an extension of rules 3 and 4.

7. The connection. Thus the prohibition, "Ye shall not steal," in Lev. xix. 11, is explained to refer to stealing money and not human beings, comp. Ex. xxii. 16, because the whole connection treats upon money matters.

These hermeneutical rules, which are most important to the understanding of the ancient versions, were afterward extended by R. Ishmael and others. Hillel also simplified the accumulated mass of the traditional explanations of the Pentateuch, which had been divided into six or seven hundred sections, by classifying its materials under six orders—the basis of the present arrangement of the Mishna. Hillel's liberality of mind did not suit his colleague, the rigid Shammai; the latter, therefore, founded a separate school, of which he became the head. The one is well known as the school of Hillel and the other as the school of Shammai.

After occupying the presidential throne for about forty years, the learned, godly, humane, meek, self-denying Hillel died when Jesus of Nazareth, the Redeemer of the world, was about ten years old. The presidency became hereditary in Hillel's family for fifteen generations.

HILLEL II., BEN JEHUDAH III., succeeded to the presidential throne about A. D. 330, which he occupied about thirty-five years. He immortalized his name by the introduction of the calendar which is followed by the Jews to the present day. Up to his time the beginning of the month was fixed in Palestine upon the testimony of two witnesses, who appeared before the Sanhedrim and declared that they had seen the new moon. The new month was then proclaimed and celebrated, and the festivals which happened to occur during the month were fixed. As all the Jews who lived away from Jerusalem depended upon the authorities in the metropolis for their information about the time when the new moon began, it was arranged that if it be fixed that the closing month should have twenty-nine days, torches should be lighted on the mountain near Jerusalem, and thus, as if by telegraph, communicate the light, and with it the information, from mountain to mountain throughout the land and beyond Judea. If these lights did not appear, it was understood that the new month begins on the thirty-first of the closing month, so that the last month had thirty days, and the festivals which happened to occur during the new month were arranged accordingly. When, however, the Samaritans, out of spite, kindled torches at improper times, and thereby led the Jews at a distance to begin their festivals at an improper time, the authorities in Jerusalem discarded the lights, and resolved henceforth to communicate the information through authorized messengers. But this, too, was attended with difficulties, as the messengers could not reach on the same day the places which were at a distance from Jerusalem, and hence led to the institution that those Jews who lived out of Palestine were to double the festival days, because they could not know at once whether the closing month was to have twenty-nine days or thirty. Now, Hillel, by the introduction of his calendar, rendered the Jews, dispersed through so many lands, independent of all such decisions. The calculations of his calendar are so simple and certain that they, with a little improvement, are adopted by the Jews to the present day. According to this calendar, the difference between the solar and lunar year, upon which the cycle of the Jewish festival depends, is yearly made up; the length of the month is made to approximate to the astronomical course of the moon; and attention is also paid in it to the Halachic matters connected with the Jewish festivals. It is based upon the cycle of nineteen years introduced by the Greek astronomer Meton, in which occur seven intercalary years. Each year has ten unchangeable months of alternately twenty-nine and thirty days; the two autumnal months, Cheshvan and Kislev, which follow the important month, Tishri, are left changeable, because they depend upon certain astronomical phenomena and the following points of Jewish law: 1. That the month of Tishri is never to begin with the day which, to a great extent, belongs to the former month. 2. The Day of Atonement is not to fall on the day before or after Sabbath; and 3. That the Hosanna Day is not to be on a Sabbath. It is impossible now to say with certainty how much of this calendar is Hillel's own, and how much he took from the national traditions, since it is beyond question that some astronomical rules were handed down by the presidents. This calendar Hillel introduced A. D. 359. That he convened a synod who fixed the epoch of the creation at the vernal equinox, 3761 years before the birth of Christ, which is the Jewish chronology of the present day, is simply conjecture. As to the story, recorded by Epiphanius, of his having embraced Christianity and been baptized on his death-bed by a neighboring bishop, who ostensibly came to visit him in a medical capacity, and of there having been found in his coffer a Hebrew translation of the Gospel according to John, of the Acts of the Apostles and of the Lord's genealogy as recorded by Matthew, the incidents are entirely unknown to the Jews of Hillel's time, who, if they had actually taken place, would have execrated his name. It is, however, an interesting fact connected with Biblical literature to know that a Hebrew translation of many portions of the New Testament existed at so early a period of Christianity.

HILLEL or HILLA (hil'la) CODEX. See HILALI CODEX.

HILLER (hil'ler), MATTHIAS, an eminent Protestant theologian of Germany, was born February 15, 1646, at Stuttgart. He was professor of logic and metaphysics, then of Oriental languages and theology, at Tübingen, and resigned these offices for the priory of Königsborn. His works on philology and hermeneutics gained for him a wide reputation. His principal works are—"Outline of Hebrew Grammar," "Elements of the Sacred Language," "On the Secret of Keri and Kethub," and "Onomasticon Sacrum, or Name-Book of Places in the Holy Land." He died February 11, 1725.

HILLER, PHILIP FREDERICK, a minister of the Evangelical Church of Southern Germany, and a famous hymn writer, was born in 1699, at Muhlhausen. After preaching in a few small villages, he was finally settled as pastor at Steinheim. Retiring from the pulpit in consequence of the loss of his voice, he employed himself in sacred poetry, and composed over one thousand hymns, many of which are still widely used in Germany. He died in 1769.

HILLHOUSE (hil'hous), AUGUSTUS L., was born about 1792, at New Haven, Connecticut. He was a brother of James A. Hillhouse, the poet, and composed the beautiful hymn, "Trembling before thine awful throne." He died March 14, 1859, at Paris.

HILLIARD (hil'yard), TIMOTHY, a Congregational divine, was born at Kensington, New Hampshire, in 1746. After graduating at Harvard College, he was appointed tutor, and in 1771 was ordained pastor at Barnstable. He was subsequently co-pastor at Cambridge, where he died May 9, 1790. He published "A Dudleian Lecture at Harvard College," and sermons on various subjects.

HILLYER (hil'yer), ASA, D.D., a minister of the Presbyterian Church, was born April 6, 1763, at Sheffield, Massachusetts. After graduating at Yale College, he was appointed as a licentiate of the Suffolk, Long Island, Presbytery, to the churches at Connecticut Farms and Battle Hill (now Madison), New Jersey, where, in the following year, he was ordained and installed as pastor. In 1801 he was called to the church in Orange, where his ministry for more than thirty years was crowned with abundant success. Alleghany College honored him with the degree of D.D. in 1818. In the contest that resulted in the division of the Presbyterian Church, Dr. Hillyer's sympathies were with the New School, but the harmony of his relations with his brethren who took an opposite course was never disturbed in the least. He maintained an active interest in the Princeton Theological Seminary, having been one of its first directors, and was a trustee of the college of New Jersey from 1811 to his death.

HIMYARITES (him'yar-ites), a tribe in the southern part of Arabia who established a powerful kingdom in that region and built some flourishing cities, one of which, Saba, is mentioned in the Bible. They gradually extended their sway over nearly the whole southern coast of Africa. During the reign of Constantine the Great they embraced Christianity, but were obliged to renounce their faith by the Ethiopians, who conquered them in 529. A century later they were subjected to the Mohammedans and embraced Islamism. They were named after Himyar, a grandson of Saba, one of the mythical fathers of the Arabians, from whom they claimed descent, and who is said to have been an Arabian prince three thousand years before Mohammed's time. They had a distinct language of their own.

HIN (hin), a Hebrew liquid measure equal to about ten English pints. See MEASURES.

HINCKELMANN (hink'el-mahn), ABRAHAM, an eminent Orientalist and theologian of Germany, was born May 2, 1652, at Doebeln, near Hamburg. He graduated at the university of Wittenberg, and after serving in several minor positions, he received the appointment of honorary professor at the university of Giessen and court preacher to the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt. He held these positions, however, only a year; and on returning to Hamburg, he was charged with sympathizing with Pietists and Millenarians, which so affected him in mind and body as to hasten his death, which took place February 11, 1695. Besides other works of note, he published "Alcoran," virtually the first edition of the Koran, that of Paganini having been almost entirely destroyed by order of the pope.

HINCKS (hinks), EDWARD, D.D., an eminent clergyman and a profound Assyrian scholar, was born at Cork, in 1795. He was educated in Trinity College, Dublin, where he gained a Fellowship before he was twenty-one years of age. He retired to a college living, and for forty-one years in the village of Killyleagh he devoted himself to parochial duties and the prosecution of Oriental studies. He was early recognized as one of the most eminent philologists in Europe, and on the subject of Egyptian hieroglyphics and the cuneiform letters of Assyria, his contributions to the Royal Irish Academy, the Royal Society of Literature, the Asiatic Society and the British Association, are of the utmost value. "His talent," as a London journal has well said, "for deciphering texts in unknown characters and languages was wonderful. In the field of Egyptian hieroglyphics and Assyrian inscriptions, he labored with great perseverance and success; having been the first to ascertain the numeral system and the power and form of its signs, by means of the inscriptions at Van. He was one of the chief restorers of Assyrian learning, throwing great light on the linguistic character and grammatical structure of the languages represented on the Assyrian monuments." His labors in the same field with Rawlinson have advanced the knowledge of Oriental antiquities in a vast degree. He died in 1866.

HINCMAR (hink'mar). 1. Archbishop of Rheims, was born of a noble family in France, about A. D. 809. He assisted in reforming the rules of the abbey of St. Denis, was appointed abbot of Compiègne, and in 845 archbishop of Rheims. He distinguished himself three years later by his rigorous treatment of the monk Gottschalk, who for his writings on predestination was condemned, deprived, flogged and imprisoned. In subsequent disputes with Pope Nicholas I. and the emperor Lewis III., he showed himself the fearless defender of the liberties of the Gallican Church. Hincmar presided at the council of Soissons in 862, and at that of Douzi in 871. He wrote numerous works, especially two treatises on Predestination, in opposition to the views of GOTTESCHALCHUS (which see), in which he maintained that "God wills the salvation of all men; that some will be saved through the gift of divine grace; that others are lost, owing to their demerit; Christ suffered for all; whoever does not appropriate these sufferings has himself to blame." He died A. D. 882.

2. A nephew of the foregoing, who became bishop of Laon in 858, through the influence of his uncle, though under the prescribed age. He was a man of violent conduct, and insubordinate to both pope and king. He was deposed, imprisoned and had his eyes put out. He was afterward restored to the dignity of a bishop by Pope John VIII. He died in 880.

HIND, female of the hart or stag, doe being the female of the fallow-deer, and roe being sometimes used for that of the roebuck. All the females, with the exception of the reindeer, are hornless. It may be remarked on Ps. xviii. 33 and Hab. iii. 19, where the Lord is said to cause the feet to stand firm like those of a hind on high places, that this representation is in perfect harmony with the habits of mountain stags, but the version of Prov. v. 19, "Let the wife of thy bosom be as the beloved hind and favorite roe," seems to indicate that here the words are generalized so as to include under roe monogamous species of antelopes, whose affections and consortship are permanent and strong, for stags are polygamous. The passage "Naphtali is a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words," may be rendered "Naphtali is a spreading tree, shooting forth beautiful branches," by a small change in the points of the Hebrew original; and perhaps it would afford a more consistent meaning, and certainly would agree better with the Septuagint, the Chaldee paraphrase and the Arabic version.

HINDOOISM (hin'du-ism) is the general name applied to all the forms of worship which are derived from Brahminic sources. In India, Ceylon and the adjoining countries it is the religion of the people in one form or other. As Buddhism, which extends over Ceylon, in India, Burmah and China, is in reality only a modification of Hindooism, this great system is received by nearly one-half of the human race. In India and in all the lands lying to the north-east and east, different sects and parties have arisen from time to time, and they have become so numerous, and they are so interlaced with each other, that it is necessary in a comprehensive article to avoid details, and to aim only at such a description of the leading characteristics of the Hindoo religion, as will enable the reader to understand its essential principles and general characteristics.

There are three periods or states of Hindooism, which may be viewed as successive, and to a brief statement of the leading features of each the remainder of this article shall be dedicated. They are the Vedic, the Epic and the Puranic, and they shall be taken in order.

1. The Vedic period. The term Veda is the name by which the Hindoos designate the collective body of their sacred books or Scriptures. There are four of these Vedas—the Rig, the Yajur, the Saman and the Atharvan; and according to the orthodox faith, they were revealed by Brahma. The subdivisions of these Vedas are so numerous that several Indian scholars are disposed to admit a fifth Veda, or at least to make a different classification. The arrangement of the Vedas is attributed to Vyasa, of whom nothing can be learned of any importance or certainty. The Vedas consist of prayers, maxims, tales and precepts, and the sentiments in the Vedic hymns are altogether different from the debasing teachings of the common Hindoo idolaters. Their antiquity has been a matter of great dispute among Western scholars. Popularly, in India, they are believed to date before the supposed incarnation of Vishnu as Krishna and Rama, under which titles he is now worshiped by the Hindoos. The celebrated Orientalists Sir William Jones and Mr. Colebrooke assign them an antiquity of about 3000 years. An examination of the Vedic hymns will show, that when they were composed their authors were passing into the second of those stages through which the mind of man proceeds when, in its departure from the knowledge of the uncreated eternal God, the self-existent spiritual author of creation, it descends to the condition in which the creature is adored and served. At first, when the mind looks out on the kingdom of nature, there are agencies perceived which are evidently in operation, and important results are seen to follow from their influence. This is especially obvious in the case of the sun, the moon and the elements. The influence of the sun, the power of light on the natural productions of the earth, appeal to the senses, and gradually the power that is perceived in the evolutions of nature are admitted as worthy of regard and wonder. By and by they come to be objects of reverence. They are then personified, and emblems are devised in their honor. Thus the downward process of the mind tends to the grosser darkness, in which, eventually, through images that symbolize the powers of nature, these powers are adored. When the Vedic hymns were composed, the elements were recognized as deities, and as such they were served. The heat of the sun and lightning was adored as "Agni," the firmament as "Indra," the wind as "Maruts," the sun itself as "Surya," the dawn as "Ushas," and other personifications were added until nearly every element in nature was recognized as a kind of god. It has been well observed by Dr. Wilson that in the services of these deities, temporal blessings, riches, life, posterity and such objects as shortsighted man usually desires, constituted the chief portion of the supplications which are offered to them; for it is one of the most marked features in all heathen prayers, that pardon for guilt, or deliverance from moral evil, or the bestowment of moral blessing, seldom appears. A modern writer on the great religions of the world, in giving illustrations of the service offered to these gods, has quoted from the Vedas such specimens as indicate their character: "We proclaim eagerly (Maruts) your ancient greatness, for the sake of inducing your prompt appearance, as the indication of the showerer of benefits." Again: "Offer your nutritious viands to the great hero (Indra), who is pleased by praise, and to Vishnu (one of the forms of the sun), the two invincible deities who ride upon the radiant summit of the clouds as upon a well-trained steed. The devout worshiper glorifies the radiant approach of you two, who are the granters of desires, and who bestow upon the mortal who worships you an immediately receivable reward, through the distribution of that fire which is the scatterer of desired blessings." Such is the strain of Vedic worship. Appeals are made for temporal things, but spiritual desires have no place in this worship. It is true there is a recognition of shortcoming, inasmuch as the persons are censured who do not thus serve these deities; but in all this there is no feeling of moral guilt, such as in the Christian system attaches to the transgression of the divine law. It is worthy of note also, that in Vedic worship there was no command for sacrificial offerings as evidencing a fear of the future and a desire to avert deserved judgment. Above all, there is no evidence that human sacrifices were then offered. Offerings were made, but usually of such things as tended, in the view of the worshiper, to gratify the appetite or the desires of the god. Fermented juice of the goma, an exciting beverage which would please the deity by its elevating effect, was often tendered in worship. Butter also was cast on the fire, and the flame as it rose was held to be espe-

clearly laid down in them that there is a difference between right and wrong, that God punishes sin and rewards virtue, and yet that he is merciful and forgiving; for though he is a judge, he is also a father. According to Muller, the doctrine of metempsychosis does not appear in the Vedas, and yet this has long been thought to be a fundamental principle of the Brahminic system. On the other hand, personal immortality is taught, and personal responsibility after death is proclaimed, and this fact is adduced to refute the idea that the doctrine of immortality originated in Persia. Still further, and with a strange inconsistency, the wicked are described as going to a place of punishment. A pit is mentioned into which the lawless are said to be hurled down, and into which Indra casts those who offer no sacrifices; and those who break the commandments of Varuna, and who speak lies, are born for that deep place, while the dead are rewarded for their good deeds—that they leave or cast off all evil, and, glorified, take their new bodies. Such, in brief, is a view of the system of the Vedic hymns.

The Epic period was one of development. The popular worship aimed at doing all honor to the imaginary gods, while the thoughtful minds among the Hindoos endeavored to construct a philosophy which may be studied in the "Sankhya" and "Vedanta" systems. It has been held that the metaphysical views of the Vedanta approached those of Plato and Pyrrho, and the system which in more modern times held that matter had no existence independent of mental perception, but the philosophy of the Epic period of Hindooism leaned rather to theology than to metaphysics. It aimed at solving the problem how the human soul might be united with the supreme spirit, and it took in hand to point out how penances, fastings, prayers and such like would aid in the accomplishment of the result. When the doctrine was admitted that the human soul, before it can be united with the source whence it proceeded, must be freed from all impurity, as the life of man was felt to be too short for such an achievement, the Hindoo philosopher grasped at the conclusion that the soul must be born again, and thus proceed through different conditions of being until the desired end was attained. Such is the doctrine of "metempsychosis," which, in a system that knows nothing of salvation by atonement and grace, is a logical result from the position that the human soul is of the same nature as the absolute God. In the Upanishads, the treatises where creation and the soul are treated of, there are foreshadowings of this doctrine, but it was in the Epic period when it became systematized and popularized in the religious life of the people.

The gods of the Epic period are the same as those of the Vedic, with certain differences. In the Vedic period, Vishnu and Siva stand out prominently, and Brahman begins to disappear and become merged into the philosophical Brahma. In the Epic system, Vishnu evidently predominates, but on one point of prime magnitude there is a marked distinction. The gods during the Vedic period are always viewed as being immortal. Offerings are made to cheer and delight them, but never to preserve them from dissolution. In process of time, however, a change of view becomes evident. The juice of the "Soma" plant and the offerings of clarified butter are recognized as contributing to their immortality, and in the Epic period instruction is given how to procure the beverage of immortality, so as to preserve them in being. Such views have only to be stated in and as such they were served. The heat of the sun and lightning was adored as "Agni," the firmament as "Indra," the wind as "Maruts," the sun itself as "Surya," the dawn as "Ushas," and other personifications were added until nearly every element in nature was recognized as a kind of god. It has been well observed by Dr. Wilson that in the services of these deities, temporal blessings, riches, life, posterity and such objects as shortsighted man usually desires, constituted the chief portion of the supplications which are offered to them; for it is one of the most marked features in all heathen prayers, that pardon for guilt, or deliverance from moral evil, or the bestowment of moral blessing, seldom appears. A modern writer on the great religions of the world, in giving illustrations of the service offered to these gods, has quoted from the Vedas such specimens as indicate their character: "We proclaim eagerly (Maruts) your ancient greatness, for the sake of inducing your prompt appearance, as the indication of the showerer of benefits." Again: "Offer your nutritious viands to the great hero (Indra), who is pleased by praise, and to Vishnu (one of the forms of the sun), the two invincible deities who ride upon the radiant summit of the clouds as upon a well-trained steed. The devout worshiper gloriously pleasing; but in all these services there is an absence of any desire to avert calamity because of the demerit of sin.

There is, however, in the midst of all this deification of the elements, an appearance of an effort to rise to a higher sphere and to reach the idea of a great first cause of all things. Some gods are placed above others; thus the god of the firmament is sometimes considered as a ruler, and again, in other cases, Surya, or the sun, is endowed with the pre-eminence, but in the midst of all these efforts the weakness of the mind, untaught by revelation is apparent, as no solution of the great problem is ever attained. The questions which bear on creation, the existence of a supreme being apart from matter, and the relation of man to such a being, have their fullest treatment in the Upanishads, and there the deities of the Vedic hymns are referred to with a view to illustrate the nature of unknown being. The soul of man is held to be of the same nature of this great being, and its ultimate destination is a reunion with it which is to be effected not by any atonement or sacrifice, but by attaining to the clear knowledge of itself and of the great "world soul."

According to M. Muller, who has for many years been engaged in translating the Vedas and other sacred books of the Hindoos, the doctrine is order to see that a system so childish could not long hold an influence over reflecting minds; and accordingly the worship of Vishnu and Siva became supreme, and the other gods descended into the condition resembling the personages that figure in poetry, rather than the beings of actual life.

The Puranic period of Hindooism marked its decline. The same gods were still acknowledged in the Hindoo Triad. Brahma, Vishnu and Siva hold their place, but even in the Triad there has come a change. This Triad, which has been erroneously confounded with the Christian doctrine of the Trinity, differs from it, inasmuch as there was a development in the idea of the Triad, Vishnu was not and yet began to be, and so with Siva, whereas in the Christian doctrine the relation which subsists between the persons of the Godhead is eternal, essential, and not the result of development. Now, in the Vedic and Epic periods, there was an entire harmony and freedom from discord in the Triad, but all is changed in the Puranic period. Strife and contention now appear, and the popular worship is mainly directed to Vishnu and Siva. The legends of the gods become greatly changed, and a lower tone pervades the mass of Hindoo worshippers. The poetry of the Vedic period gives place to the degrading worship of Siva and his wife Durga; the change which thus took place prepared the way for the varied forms of demoralizing idolatry as practiced by the millions of India. Among the ignorant people the idea still prevails that their religion is that of the olden time; and if education were extended so as to reach the masses, and if the religious books were made accessible to the popular mind, there would be no difficulty in showing that the Hindooism of the present day is a debasing system when compared with the faith of the olden time. The philosophical creed of this period is derived from the system of the Vedanta tenets. It is based on the belief of one supreme being, which is invested with all the perfections conceivable by the human mind, but the true nature of which is declared to be beyond the reach of human thought, and which on this ground is defined as not possessing any of the qualities by which the human mind is able to comprehend intellectual or material entity.

HINDOO DEITIES.—As already stated, the elements, when personified, were worshiped as gods, and at an early age the deities rapidly increased in number. The inferior deities are said to have reached the enormous number of 330,000,000. In addition to the great Triad, and the gods mentioned in the Vedic period, there were several influential ones introduced into the pantheon, such as the god of wisdom, "Ganesa;" the god of love, "Kamas;" and the celebrated "Ganga," the deity who presided over the river Ganges, the most sacred stream in India. The arts and the sciences had their deities, and almost every place and thing had a presiding god. Then, again, the wives of the gods play an important part in the Hindoo pantheon. The wife of Vishnu is the dispenser of blessings, but the worship of Durga, the wife of Siva, which prevails all over India, is the most demoralizing. So also the worship of Kali, the goddess of destruction, is general, and it is also most degrading. Animals also, such as the cow, the monkey and the snake, are revered, and the banyan is the most sacred of all trees.

The sects among the Hindoos are so numerous that only a few of them can be mentioned. Each sect is devoted to the serving of a particular god, who is held to possess all the attributes of the deity. The worshippers of Vishnu abstain from animal food, and being subdivided into numerous parties, agree in the belief that Vishnu is Brahma—that is, the deity. The followers of Siva are more numerous than any of the other sects. They are known by three lines marked horizontally on the forehead, made by ashes taken from a sacred fire. According to some critics, the principles of this sect agree with the dualism of the Phœnicians in recognizing two eternal causes, good and evil in their nature. The Saktas are known by their personification of the powers of the deity, and hence they view them as possessing sexual relations. The sun and wisdom have their followers among the "Sauras" and the "Ganapalyas." Lying beyond these, and now really outside of the Hindoo system, are the Buddhists (see SAKYA MUNI) and the Sikhs. The latter profess a theistic faith united with a great number of Hindoo and Mohammedan fables. They reject the system of caste, the Vedas and the other sacred books of the Hindoos, and they abhor the Mussulman population. It may be observed that a broad line of distinction is drawn between the ignorant masses of the lower classes the rule of a chief. In some of the temples in India, as many as 3000 Brahmins have been engaged in their services—offering sacrifices, reading the sacred books and attending to the routine of the daily worship, in which songs and dances formed a part.

HINDOO LITERATURE. See SANSKRIT LITERATURE.

HINDOO PHILOSOPHY. As the Vedas contain the early views of the Hindoos on religious matters, and the great epic work "Mahâbhârata" belongs to the second period, so the "Bhâgavata" in the Puranic age displays the religious condition of the Hindoo mind in the present day. Now, there are philosophical principles which continually appear in all these ages, and they have been classified as follows, viz.: the "Nyaya," "Vai-sheshika," "Sankhya," "Yoga," "Mimansa," and "Vedanta." All these recognize the eternity of matter, and they maintain the eternity of the soul's existence, or that human souls never had a commencement, and that they shall exist for ever.

in India, who grovel in idolatrous rites and degrading worship, and the educated classes. Among them pantheism prevails, and little importance is attached to religious services. The ritual of the Brahmins is very minute. Their prayers, ablutions and services require the utmost regularity. Sins of omission and commission can be removed by such penances as are prescribed in the sacred books. Bloody sacrifices are offered to Kali and Siva, but to Vishnu the offerings are of water, butter, fruits or flowers. Hermits and ascetics abound among the Hindoos, and in many respects the system that prevails among them resembles the monachism of the Middle Ages in the Church of Rome.

The images of the Hindoo deities are generally absurd and ridiculous in their appearance. Several heads and arms are given to them, to indicate knowledge, watchfulness and power. They are represented as strangling snakes, and almost every form of symbolism is introduced to indicate their respective characters. In early times the temples were mere grottoes, but gradually enormous structures were raised, in which the general character was pyramidal with fanciful turrets and spires rising up toward the heavens. The inner courts of these temples are considered peculiarly sacred, and they were reserved for the Brahmins, under

That absorption into the deity is the final consummation of bliss, and that transmigration must continue until this absorption is achieved, is also maintained. Souls exist in "bondage" because of ignorance, and so long as this bondage continues transmigration must go on; and "right apprehension," or a clear knowledge of the soul by itself, as distinct from everything else, is the only way to bring this transmigration to an end. The study of the Shastras, or the sacred books, along with pilgrimages, almsgiving and such pious exercises, are the means to be used to secure this "right apprehension," and so hasten the absorption of the soul and terminate the individuality of being by eternal union with the absolute eternal source of happiness, the uncreated source and cause of all things. Such are the essential principles that pervade the leading systems of Hindoo philosophy.

HINDOOS, MODERN. About sixty years ago an attempt was made by Rammohun Roy to reform Hindooism. He proceeded with great earnestness to set forth the principles of the Vedas, which he held were purely theistic. He adopted portions of Christian truth, rejecting the doctrine of the Trinity and admitting the system as held by advanced Socinians. He rejected idolatry, transmigration and caste. He was favorably received in England by Unitarians who hoped for his success. He succeeded in establishing associations in the different presidencies, but his work declined after his death. A few years ago a similar movement has been commenced in Calcutta under the leadership of Chunder Sen. The effort which he and his friends have been making contemplates the spread over India of a pure theism. He recognizes the evils of Hindooism, and yet, being unwilling to receive the leading doctrines of Christianity, the members of the new sect contemplate the extension of the theistic and moral tenets of the old Aryan race along with the moral teachings of the Christian Scriptures.

HINDOSTAN, or HINDOOSTAN. See INDIA and HINDOOISM.

HINDS, SAMUEL, bishop of Norwich, was born on the isle of Barbadoes, about 1798. He was educated in England, and graduated at the cause of Christian education. After graduating he was appointed principal of Newburg Seminary, Vermont. He was afterward principal of the Wesleyan seminary at Albion, Michigan, and in 1853 became president of the North-western University. His labors in behalf of the latter institution were unremitting, and completely broke down his constitution. Throughout his whole life, even from boyhood, he displayed conspicuous capacity and energy. His piety was fervent, his attainments extensive, in the pulpit he was earnest and eloquent, and as an educator of youth he had few equals. He died October 21, 1854.

HINNOM (hin'nūm), or VALLEY OF THE SONS OF HINNOM, is described in Josh. xviii. 16 as on the south side of Jebusi—that is, Mount Zion—on which the ancient stronghold of the Jebusites stood. The border of the tribe of Benjamin ran along this valley, from En-Rogel to the top of the mountain "that lieth before the valley westward," at the north end of the plain of Rephaim, university of Oxford. In 1849 he became bishop of Norwich, and was subsequently vice-principal of Saint Alban's Hall, Oxford. Among his works are "Inspiration and Authority of Scripture," "The Three Temples of the True God Contrasted," "Catechist's Manual." He died in 1870.

HINGE. Two words are used in the original which we translate "hinge." One occurs in 1 Ki. vii. 50, conveying the idea of insertion. Now it is common in the East to have doors hung, not on hinges, but on pivots inserted in sockets, both above and below. Ancient doors of the kind may yet be seen in the Hauran, and such are modern Egyptian doors. But there is another word which implies turning, and this it is which we find in Prov. xxvi. 14. How appositely it is used is at once apparent.

HINMAN (hin'man), CLARK F., D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born August 3, 1819, at Kortwright, Delaware county, New York. He pursued his studies at the Wesleyan University, and devoted his life to the Josh. xv. 8. The topographical notice is here singularly minute and accurate. The valley of Hinnom, still called by its ancient name, commences in a broad depression in the rocky ridge or plateau west of Jerusalem. It runs in a southeasterly direction for about 700 yards toward the Yafa gate, where it turns due south along the base of Mount Zion; still keeping close to the base of the mount, it sweeps round to the eastward and joins the Kidron at En-Rogel. Its total length is about a mile and a half. Its banks have at first an easy slope, but they soon contract and become steep and rocky. South of Zion the right bank rises in broken, irregular cliffs of naked limestone, filled with excavated tombs, and having a few gnarled olives clinging to the rocks here and there. On the side of the ravine, overhanging the point of junction with the CEDRON, is ACELDAMA.

The origin of the name Hinnom is unknown; it may have been derived from some of its ancient possessors. The valley obtained wide notoriety as the scene of the heathenish rites introduced by Solomon and maintained till the pious king Josiah, who "defiled" it by strewing it with human bones, see 1 Ki. xi. 7, etc., and 2 Ki. xxiii. 10, etc. The place thus became ceremonially unclean; no Jew could enter it. It was afterward a public cemetery; and the traveler who now stands in the bottom of this valley and looks up at the multitude of tombs in the cliffs above and around him, and which thickly dot the side of Olivet, will be able to see with what wondrous accuracy the prophetic curse of Jeremiah has been fulfilled, see Jer. vii.

We learn from Josephus that the last terrible struggle between the Jews and Romans took place here, and here too, it appears, the dead bodies were thrown out of the city after the siege.

The inhuman rites anciently practiced in the valley of Hinnom caused the latter Jews to regard it with feelings of horror and detestation. The Rabbins suppose it to be the gate of hell, and the Jews applied the name given to the valley in some passages of the Septuagint to the place of eternal torment. See HELL and TOPHET.

HINTON (hin'tun), ISAAC TAYLOR, a Baptist preacher, was born in 1799, at Oxford, England. He was educated by his father, who was a successful school-teacher. At fifteen he was apprenticed to the trade of printing; and when he came of age, he set up on his own account, editing and publishing the "Sunday Scholar's Magazine." It was in the year following that he was converted and baptized. Shortly after, he was licensed to preach, and about the same time removed his business to London. In conjunction with his brother, John Howard Hinton, he prepared an illustrated "History of the United States," and while thus engaged his republican feelings were so aroused that he determined upon emigrating to America. Shortly after his arrival he became pastor of the First Baptist Church in Richmond, Virginia, though he had originally resolved to locate in the West. The circumstance of the church having a large colored membership caused him some embarrassment, and he removed to Chicago in 1835. While in the latter city he delivered a course of lectures on the prophecies, which attracted large congregations and produced a profound impression. In 1841 he went to St. Louis, where his ministry was attended with large success. He afterward removed to New Orleans, but his career of usefulness was cut short by the fatal yellow fever. He died in 1847. In his public ministrations he was fervid and impressive, and the genial qualities of his character caused him to be loved in every circle he entered. His lectures on prophecy were published under the title, "The Prophecies of Daniel and John illustrated by the Events of History." He also wrote "History of Baptism, from Inspired and Uninspired Sources."

HIOUEN-THSANG (yoo'en-tsang), a celebrated Buddhist traveler and philosopher, was born in 603. At an early age he became distinguished as a student and interpreter of the sacred books of Buddhism. He traveled through Asia to learn wisdom from all the sages he could meet with, and in India collected upward of 600 books. These he commenced rendering into Chinese in the quiet of a convent, to which he retired on his return home despite the solicitations of the emperor, who wished to make him one of his ministers. This Buddhist pilgrim was one of the greatest personages of his age and the most venerated in China, and gave a great impulse to Buddhism. An account was written in Sanscrit and Chinese of the 138 kingdoms which he visited in his pilgrimage; this work has been translated into French, and also abridged, and is a valuable record of those countries. He died in 664.

HIP, in architecture, is a piece of timber forming the angle of a hip-roof. A hip-roof is one in which the end slopes back and is joined with the two sides, instead of finishing with a gable.

HIPPICUS (hip'pe-kus), the most western of the three towers described by Josephus as being along the first wall of Jerusalem, and at its junction with the third wall. Josephus states that this tower was twenty-five cubits—about forty-five feet—square and thirty cubits high. It has been identified with the site of the present citadel or castle of David, at the north-west corner of Zion. This is probably the tower at the valley gate mentioned in 2 Chr. xxvi. 9.

HIPPO (hip'po), COUNCIL OF, was held in 390 at Hippo, now called Bona, in Africa. At this council, over which Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, presided, Augustine delivered a discourse concerning faith and the creed, and denounced the doctrines of the Manichæans. It was here, also, that the first express definition of the New Testament canon, in the form in which it has since been universally retained, was fixed. A second council was held at Hippo in 426, in which Augustine appointed Eradius as his successor.

HIPPOLYTUS (hip-pol'e-tus), BROTHERS OF THE CHRISTIAN LOVE OF, a monastic order of the Romish Church, established in Mexico for hospital service by Bernardin Alvarez in 1585. It received the sanction of Popes Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. The name is derived from the patron saint of the city of Mexico, in commemoration of the capture of the city by the Christians, and the consequent downfall of paganism, on the day of Saint Hippolytus, August 13. The order never extended beyond Spanish America.

HIPPOLYTUS, SAINT, surnamed PORTUENSIS, a bishop of Portus during the early part of the third century. The facts of his life are few and uncertain, and we shall mainly confine ourselves to giving the results which may now be considered as generally accepted. Eusebius mentions Hippolytus as a bishop and eminent ecclesiastical author in the times of Zephyrinus, but does not mention his diocese, which Jerome also says that "he could not learn." As Eusebius names him with Beryllus of Bostra, Le Moyne unfortunately conjectured that he was bishop of Aden (Portus Romanus) in Arabia, and Cave supposed him to have been an Arabian by birth. But, on the other hand, the "Chronicon Paschale," our earliest authority, makes him "bishop of the so-called Portus near Rome;" and as this statement is supported by the authority of Cyril, Zonaras, Anastasius, Nicephorus and Syncellus, and as Prudentius describes his martyrdom as having taken place at Ostia, close by Portus, we may regard this point as finally settled. His mastery of the Greek language would render him peculiarly fit to be a "bishop of the nations" who frequented the harbor of Rome in multitudes. In spite of Jacobi's assertion of the contrary, there seems to be no reason why he should not at the same time have been head of a party at Rome. We know, further, that he was a disciple of Irenæus, and was engaged in some warm disputes with Callistus on points of doctrine and discipline, which are graphically described in his recovered book, "Refutation of all the Heresies." From the confused and sometimes contradictory accounts of the martyrdom, we may glean the following probabilities: That in the year of the death of Alexander Severus he was banished to Sardinia, B. C. 235; that he returned the following year and was martyred at Ostia. The mode of his martyrdom is wholly conjectural, for the story of Prudentius is obviously derived from the painting on the walls of the chapel built in honor of St. Hippolytus at Rome, and can hardly be otherwise than a mere legendary confusion. The day set apart to his memory was August 13. One statement of Prudentius—that before his martyrdom the saint recanted his approval of the Novation schism—is very perplexing, because, on the one hand, such a particular could not have been invented, and, on the other hand, Novation belongs to a later period (A. D. 245). The explanation seems to be that Hippolytus strongly opposed the Noetianism of Callistus, and was therefore in later times considered as a Novation.

HINDOO TEMPLE AT RAMISSERAM, HINDOOSTAN.—See HINDOOISM.

In 1551 an old and unique statue of Hippolytus was dug up on the site of his chapel, at the back of which was inscribed a list of his works, and among others a "Confession of Faith." Now, this book is claimed by the author of the "Refutation," and on this and other irrefragable grounds that remarkable treatise is now universally considered to have been the work of Hippolytus. This book was formerly ascribed to Origen. Having been brought from Mount Athos with other manuscripts in 1842, it attracted the attention of M. Emmanuel Miller, under whose direction it was published at the Oxford press in 1851, and ascribed to Origen, but all European scholars now admit that it could not have been written by Origen, and that Hippolytus is the only author to whom it can be attributed. It is a work of great value and interest, and although it refutes thirty-two heresies, is mainly directed against Gnosticism. Hippolytus is a calm, acute and learned writer. Most of his other works have either perished or only remain to us in fragments. These have been published by J. A. Fabricius. Among them are parts of various commentaries on books of Scripture. Jerome calls him "Vir disertissimus," and a Greek author says he is "gentle and sweet in tone." He was a worthy disciple of Irenæus, and the free use he made of great pagan authors—e. g., Heraclitus—gives additional value to his writings. Besides this, "he was the first preacher of note whom the Church of Rome ever produced."

HIPPOTAMUS (hip-po-pot'a-mus), a large animal inhabiting the banks and beds of great African rivers and lakes. At present it is found in the upper Nile; anciently there is reason to believe it haunted also the lower part of that stream. It also frequents the sea-shore. The hippopotamus is little inferior in bulk to the elephant, though lower in stature, on account of the shortness of its legs. The head is large and the mouth is wide, the lips are studded with bristles, the nostrils open on the top of the muzzle, and the small eyes are high in the head. Hence, raising only a small part of its head above the water, the animal can breathe and look round. The hide is thick, of a dusky brownish red. The hippopotamus generally remains in the water during the day, rising every five or six minutes to breathe. At night it comes to the land, and feeds on vegetables and green crops. Its strength is great; and when attacked, it becomes very furious. There can be little doubt that it is the Behemoth of Scripture, Job xl. 15-24.

HIPPOS (hip'pos), a city of Palestine frequently mentioned by Josephus. It was one of the Decapolis, and was situated about four miles from Tiberias.

HIRAH (hi'ra), an Adullamite, the friend of Judah, Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12, 20.

HIRAM (hi'ram) or HURAM. 1. A king of Tyre whose name appears as that of the friend and ally both of David and Solomon, to the former of whom he sent artificers, who built for him a palace, and to the latter of whom he sent both materials and artificers for the erection of the temple. In return Solomon gave Hiram twenty cities in Galilee, which, however, seemed to Hiram so unworthy a return that he applied to them a term of contempt (see CABUL), and restored them to the Jewish king, see 2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Ki. v. 1, etc.; ix. 11; 1 Chr. xiv. 1; 2 Chr. ii. 3, etc.; viii. 2.

It is not easy to determine whether it was the same Hiram who was the friend of both David and Solomon, or whether different princes of the same name had relations with these two monarchs successively. The latter is on the whole the more probable solution. The chronological difficulties of the former supposition seem insuperable. The Hiram who was the friend of Solomon is said by Menander to have reigned thirty-three years. Now, we know he was alive and on the throne in the twentieth year of Solomon's reign, 1 Ki. ix. 10-13, so that he could not at the farthest have been king for more than thirteen years before David's death. How, then, could he be the Hiram who assisted David to build his house more than thirty years before? This difficulty is aggravated if we accept the statement of Josephus that the Hiram who assisted Solomon had only been eleven years on the throne when the temple began to be built in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, for this would allow only seven years for his being king before David's death. It will hardly do to resort to the supposition that, though the building of David's house is mentioned in the history of the early part of his reign, it was not really commenced till near the close of it, for not only is this improbable in itself—improbable that David should have been content without a fitting house so long, improbable that had he wanted one so long he would have begun to build one at the close of his life (his sixty-third year if we take the statement of Josephus)—but we must deal in the most arbitrary manner with the narrative to make it accord with this supposition; as, for instance, we must suppose the “king's house,” mentioned 2 Sam. xi. 2, to be not the house said to have been built for the king in 2 Sam. v. 11, unless we would place David's affair with Bathsheba in his extreme old age, and make Solomon little more than an infant at the time of his father's death. These difficulties may, indeed, be avoided by rejecting the statement of Menander that Hiram reigned thirty-three years, and supposing that his reign extended from the commencement of David's reign over Israel to the fifteenth year of Solomon's reign, a period of nearly fifty years. But so long a reign is in itself improbable, and the testimony of Menander seems, from the minuteness of some of his details, to have rested on authentic documents. On the whole, it appears better to suppose two Hiram. But in what relation did they stand to each other? The natural supposition is that they were father and son. But here the testimony of Menander again interposes a difficulty, for he says that Hiram the friend of Solomon was the son of Abibal. This has led some to conjecture that the later Hiram was the grandson of the earlier, while others suggest that Abibal was the distinctive honorary name of the former, whose proper name was Hiram. This latter suggestion is rendered probable by the fact that other persons of the name of Hiram occur in the series of kings of Tyre. Tatian says, on the authority of Phœnician historians, that Solomon married Hiram's daughter. He was succeeded by his son Balezar.

2. Called in the margin, 1 Ki. vii. 40, Hiram, a skillful artificer sent by the king of the same name to execute the principal works of the interior of the temple, and the various utensils required for the sacred services. We recognize in the enumeration of this man's talents by the king of Tyre a character common in the industrial history of the ancients, namely, a skillful artificer, knowing all the arts, or at least many of those arts which we practice in their different branches. See HANDICRAFT. His mother was of the tribe of Dan, and his father a Tyrian. It is probable that he was selected for this purpose by the king from among others equally gifted, in the notion that his half Hebrew blood would render him the more acceptable at Jerusalem.

HIRCANUS or HYRCANUS

(her-kah'nus), a son of Tobias, a man of great dignity, 2 Macc. iii. 11. At the time when Heliodorus, the treasurer of Seleucus IV. Philopator, was ordered to seize the riches which had been placed in the temple of Jerusalem, Hircanus owned a large treasure there deposited for safety, 2 Macc. iii. 8, etc. Nothing more is mentioned in 2 Macc. than that he was a son of Tobias, but Josephus gives an account of some “children of Tobias” who took part with the high-priest Menelaus (Onias) against Jason (Jesus), who had been deprived of the high-priesthood by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. This Tobias had among his children a son named Joseph, who married as a second wife the daughter of his brother Solymius, and by her had a son whose name was Hircanus. Hircanus, from this statement, would not be the son, but the grandson, of Tobias. Grotius, Calmet, Prideaux and others have supposed that the Hircanus of Josephus is the same person as the Hircanus of 2 Macc., and that the words rendered “Hircanus the son of Tobias” should be translated “Hircanus, grandson of Tobias.” It is, however, worthy of notice that the story in 2 Macc. respecting the sending of Heliodorus by Seleucus to rob the treasures at Jerusalem, his miraculous punishment and his recovery from death at the prayer of Onias, is rendered very suspicious by the silence of Josephus, and that, though Hircanus is represented both in 2 Macc. and Josephus as being connected by blood with Tobias, yet it is not recorded in Josephus, as it is in 2 Macc., that he had any treasure in the temple.

It seems hardly probable that the Hyrcanus whose history is given by Josephus at some length can be identified with the son of Tobias of 2 Macc. The Hircanus in question may have been one of the sons of Tobias mentioned above as assisting in the sedition of the two high-priests.

The name of Hircanus occurs at a later period under the Maccabees. It has been thought that it was adopted on account of a victory gained by John, the son and successor of Simon Maccabæus, over the Hircanians. Josephus informs us that Hircanus accompanied Antiochus VII. Sidetes into Parthia, and Nicolaus of Damascus says that a trophy was erected at the river Lycus to commemorate the victory over the Parthian general. The Hircanians were a nation whose territory was bounded on the north by the Caspian Sea, and would thus be at no great distance from Parthia, where John Hircanus had gained the victory. It is remarkable that the different statements agree in the position of the countries, Hircania, Parthia and the river Lycus (of Assyria) being contiguous. As Josephus, however, does not give any explanation of the name, and the son of Simon is nowhere called Hircanus in 1 Macc., the reason for its assumption is uncertain. See MACCABEES.

HIRELING (hire'ling), one who was employed on stipulated wages for a limited time, Job vii. 1, 2; xiv. 6. A laborer thus hired was by the Mosaic law to be paid when his work was completed, Lev. xix. 13; Mal. iii. 5. But serving merely for gain, and with no permanent interest, he could often have little real concern for anything he was set to keep. Hence our Lord's contrast between the good shepherd and the hireling, John x. 11-13.

HIRNEIM, or HIRNHAYM (hern'hime), HIERONYMUS, a distinguished Austrian theologian of the Romish Church, was born in 1635, at Troppau in Silesia. After completing his studies at Prague, he was teacher of philosophy in Norbertin College, and was successively abbé of Mount Sion and general vicar of Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia and Austria. He was a most malignant enemy of Protestantism, and unscrupulous in his methods of controversy. He is generally regarded as a skeptic, his works having been placed in the Index Expurgatorius. He died August 27, 1699.

HIRSCHAU (her'show), or HIRSAU (her'sow), a monastery of Speier, in Germany, founded probably about 830. It was long celebrated as the abode of monks distinguished for their scholarship, among whom were authors and others highly honored by their Church. After the Reformation it was a Protestant seminary, and so continued till it was destroyed by the French in 1692.

HIRSCHER (her'sher), JOHANN BAPTIST VON, a celebrated theologian of the Romish Church, was born January 20, 1788, at Alt-Ergarten, Wurtemberg. He graduated at the university of Freiberg. After teaching philosophy and theology in several institutions, he became professor of ethical and pastoral theology in the university of Tubingen, and afterward at Freiberg. As a theologian he ranked as a representative man of the Roman Catholic Church. He first urged liberal reforms within the Church, but gradually became a zealous advocate of the Romish tenets, in opposition to Protestantism, and promulgated his views with great ability in the “Theological Quarterly,” of which he was the founder and co-editor. He was a vigorous opponent of Ultramontanism, and was therefore severely attacked by Ultramontane writers. He provided several houses of refuge for out-cast children, and throughout his life took an active interest in that class of children. His best known works are—"History of Jesus Christ," "Christian Morality," "Sorrow for the Morally Neglected Children." He died September 4, 1865.

HIRT (hert), JOHANN FRIEDRICH, one of the first theologians and Orientalists in Germany, was born August 14, 1719, at Apolda, in Thuringia. After graduating at the university of Jena, he was appointed extraordinary professor of philosophy, which department he changed for that of theology, and was afterward professor of theology at Wittenberg. He is best known by the impulse which he gave to the systems of Altling and Danz on the Hebrew language. His best works are—"Analytical Hebrew Bible," "Philologic and Exegetical Discussion of Psalm xv. 14, 15," and "Institutes of the Arabic Language." He died July 29, 1784.

HISS (hiss). The original word, "sharak," is, like our words "hiss," "whistle," onomatopoeitic, expressive of its own meaning. It implies sometimes to summon by a hiss or whistle, as bee-keepers are said to do, Isa. v. 26; vii. 18; sometimes to hiss at in scorn, Job xxvii. 23; Jer. xviii. 16; Mic. vi. 16.

HISTOPEDES (his-top'e-deez), the name of a heretical sect who baptized the upper portion of the body only, with the head down and heels raised.

HISTORIES (his'tor-eez), a term used to designate anthems composed on the basis of Scripture narratives or lives of saints.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH. The sphere of any record of ecclesiastical matters must be limited by the idea that is attached to the term church. If the word be used so as to include the body of the professed people of God in all ages, then the events which are mentioned in the Old Testament, the incidents in the life of our Lord and in the ministry of the apostles, as well as all the occurrences in the different ages and nations where Christianity has existed, must be set forth in a History of the Church. Usually, however, there is a distinction made between Biblical and ecclesiastical history, the first being occupied with the events which transpired in Old Testament times, and the second being occupied with the events in the Christian Church from its establishment in Judæa until the present time. Then, again, in the method of treating these subjects, there has been a great difference, some writers merely aiming at setting forth the events which are mentioned in the Old Testament, stating them in their chronological order, while others aim at connecting the historical incidents mentioned in the sacred text with the great movements which occurred in those lands that adjoined Palestine, because the intercourse with these nations was influential in moulding the condition of the Jewish people. Then in treating of ecclesiastical times different methods have been adopted. Some writers consider that the life of Christ should stand apart, and occupy a prominent place as an introduction to the History of Christianity, and that Church History should be devoted to the consideration of the subsequent events connected with the spread of the gospel, recording its contests with opposing elements and its victories, the rise of heresies, the contending of witnesses for the truth, and their triumphs amidst persecutions and all forms of repressive powers. One of the most valuable of modern histories—that of Neander—deals with the "Life of Christ" as a separate treatise. Succeeding that, he treats "The Planting and Training of Christianity by the Apostles," and then he follows these preparatory treatises by his "Church History," in which he states and reviews the spread and condition of the Church in succeeding ages. One of the most learned of the modern English ecclesiastical writers—Dr. Hinds—prepares his readers for the study of Church History by leading them over a condensed introduction, in which he treats of the religion of the Jews, the Samaritans and the other nationalities around Judæa. Then he reviews the ministry of Christ. Next he discusses the Apostolic Age, and afterward he reviews the Apostolic Fathers. Dr. Schaff, an eminently clear and evangelical writer, makes "The Church under the Apostles" the first part of his

of the Church stand out prominently, so as to justify the use of the title.

Among the early writers of Church History there was no attempt whatever at philosophical writing. They were rather chroniclers of events, and they told what they knew or believed in a bold, unadorned style, without any regard to method. So it was with Eusebius, with Socrates, Sozomen, Evagrius and others of the earliest ages. We have to come down to the period after the Reformation before we find any work of value that is worthy of the name of History, classified and arranged. The honor of preparing such a work belongs to the "Magdeburg Centuriators," as they have been called. See CENTURIES OF MAGDEBURG. Matthias Flacius Illyricus, with a band of learned assistants, produced this great storehouse of learning, which is arranged under the general heading of "Centuries," while each "Century" is subdivided into sixteen sub-heads, in which the external state of the Church, Doctrines, Rites, work, and in his review of the apostolical work he points out the character of Judaism and heathenism as the opposing systems with which the apostles had to contend. It must be admitted, however, with Dean Stanley, that any Church History will be found unsatisfactory that confines itself to a mere detail of ecclesiastical events, for all History of the Church that has any value must recognize the incidents of a civil character which took place in the lands where Christianity was planted. These affected the Church, and the Church reacted and influenced the nations, and to a great extent they are inseparable. Gibbon, in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," did not mean to write an Ecclesiastical History, but to all intents and purposes his great work is a narrative of the rise and progress of the Church, written by the pen of an infidel. A later work than "The Decline," which has deservedly become a standard in modern literature—"Latin Christianity," by Milman—is as much a condensed view of the condition and successive changes of the Western nations as it is a history of the rise and progress of the Romish Church, but in the work the movements

Polity, Schisms, Councils, Martyrs, Miracles and other important subjects are discussed. As the work was replete with learning, it is no wonder that it held its ground for two hundred years, and that still it has an honored place in the libraries of the learned. To counteract the influence of this work, Baronius undertook his celebrated "Annals," and it still stands at the head of the historical treatises in the interest of the Church of Rome. Baronius carried his work down to the year 1183, and Raynaldus, Spondanus, and lately Theiner, have continued the "Annals." A very masterly refutation of the part of the "Annals" by Baronius was given to the world by Spanheim. Following the plan of the "Centuriators," Mosheim produced his well-known History, which has served as a text-book in Great Britain and America until the present day.

The sources of Old Testament history are obvious. The incidents in the life of our Lord, and in the early Apostolic Church, are to be found in the New Testament part of the inspired volume. Passing the age when the New Testament closes, the sources, as Kurtz has said, "are partly primary, such as monuments and original documents, partly secondary, among which we reckon traditions, and reported researches of original sources which have since been lost. Monuments, such as ecclesiastical buildings, pictures and inscriptions, are commonly only of very subordinate use in Church history. But archives, preserved and handed down, are of the very greatest importance. To this class also belong the acts and decrees of ecclesiastical councils; the official decrees and acts of the popes, bishops; the laws issuing from imperial chancelleries, so far as these refer to ecclesiastical affairs; the rules of monastic orders, liturgies, confessions of faith, letters of personages influential in Church or State; reports of eye-witnesses; sermons and doctrinal treatises of acknowledged theologians, etc. If the documents in existence are found insufficient, we must have recourse to earlier or later traditions, and to the historical investigations of those who had access to original documents which are now no longer extant."

The literature of Germany abounds with most valuable treatises on this department. The English universities have also contributed abundant and most precious stores, and the learning of younger America displays a research and an energy among her theologians and educated men which do honor to our land; and the great progress which of late years has been made among our students in the languages of continental Europe, as well as the more thorough culture in classical study which now obtains in all our prominent colleges, is a guarantee that the study of a branch so important as that of the history of the Church shall be prosecuted with commensurate industry and success.

HISTORY OF DOCTRINE. See THEOLOGY.

HISTRIOMASTIX (his-tre-o-mas'tix), the title of a book written in England shortly after the Restoration by William Prynne, a Puritan barrister, against the unbridled licentiousness of the court. The author was unsparing in his denunciations of the conduct of the royal household, and of the prelates who countenanced the profligacy of the time. He was arraigned before the Star Chamber, and sentenced to have his book burned by the common hangman, to be excluded from the bar and from the society of Lincoln's Inn, to stand in the pillory at Westminster and Cheapside, to have his ears chopped off, to pay a fine of five thousand pounds and to suffer perpetual imprisonment. The book appeared in 1663.

HITCHCOCK (hitch'kok) EDWARD, D.D., an eminent American geologist, was born at Deerfield, Massachusetts, in 1793. In 1816 he became principal in the academy of his native place, and was ordained, after which he was appointed to the chair of chemistry and natural history in Amherst College, rising to the presidency in 1844. During this period he published several excellent works on geology and other subjects. The work by which he is best known is his "Religion of Geology and its Connected Sciences," which embodied the fruits of thirty years' study and reflection, and had a wide circulation both in America and Europe. Dr. Hitchcock was appointed in 1830 to make a geological survey of the State of Massachusetts, and in 1850 was sent to Europe to visit the agricultural schools there. He resigned his presidency in 1854, but still continued in the chair of geology. He died February 27, 1864.

HITCHCOCK, ENOS, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in 1767, at Springfield, Massachusetts. He was a graduate of Harvard College, and began his ministry as pastor of the Second Congregational Church of Beverly. During the Revolution he was an army chaplain, and after its close had charge of a church in Providence, Rhode Island. He died in 1803, and bequeathed twenty-five hundred dollars for the support of the ministry.

HITCHCOCK, GAD, D.D., a Unitarian minister of Massachusetts, was born February 12, 1718, or 1719, at Springfield. He graduated at Harvard, and was ordained and installed in Pembroke, now Hanson, Massachusetts. He served as chaplain in the Revolutionary army. He died August 8, 1803.

HITCHCOCK, HENRY L., D.D., was born at Burton, Ohio, in 1813, and his life has been identified with the social progress and religious growth of his native State. His father was an eminent lawyer, and rapidly rose to distinction until he was appointed chief-justice of Ohio. The son was educated at Yale College, graduating in 1832. He pursued his theological studies at Lane Seminary, and in 1837 was settled at Morgan. In 1840 he was called to the charge of the Second Presbyterian Church of Columbus, where his labors were crowned with eminent success. In 1855 he was chosen president of Western Reserve College. His established reputation, and the universal confidence which his name inspired, designated him as the man for the post. He found the college in a depressed condition. Its friends regarded its future with deep anxiety. But it was not long before their fears gave place to hope. Dr. Hitchcock entered upon his work with enthusiastic energy. The college needed funds; and assuming, in addition to his other duties, the burden of raising them, he accomplished a task under which many would have been crushed. He increased the endowment of the institution by securing contributions from those who were or whom he made its friends to the amount of $170,000, thus placing it on a solid financial basis, and fitting it to become a permanent blessing to the Church and the world. After an energetic and successful presidency, he died in 1873, regretted as a public benefactor lost to the community.

HITTITES (hit-tites'), the descendants of HETH, the second son of Canaan, and constituting one of the tribes that possessed the land of Canaan at the time of the conquest. Their chief settlements seem to have been in the south, in the neighborhood of Hebron, Gen. xxiii. 3-18, extending toward Beer-sheba, since Esau married Hittite wives, and Isaac and Rebekah feared that Jacob might follow his example, xxvi. 34; xxvii. 46; xxviii. 10. Hittites, evidently, therefore, were in the neighborhood; they were subsequently in the mountainous region near the Amorites and Jebusites, Num. xiii. 29; Josh. xi. 3, and were, perhaps, some of the original inhabitants of Jerusalem, Ezek. xvi. 3, 45, as well as in the neighborhood of Beth-el, Jud. i. 22-26. Indeed, they had spread so extensively that Canaan, or at least the northern part of it, was called "the land of the Hittites," Josh. i. 4. A learned writer includes under the term "Hittites," used generally, all the junior branches of the two great Canaanitish stocks, descendants of Zidon and Heth, though more particularly she thinks it denotes but the elder tribe of the children of Heth. Some suppose them to have been a commercial people, Gen. xxiii. 16. This is, however, questionable, for they took fully their part in resisting Joshua, Josh. ix. 1, 2. In subsequent times we find two Hittites among David's warriors, Ahimelech, 1 Sam. xxvi. 6, and Uriah, 2 Sam. xi. 3. Solomon rendered those that yet remained in Palestine tributary, 1 Ki. ix. 20; and they are mentioned after the captivity, Ezra ix. 1.

But there are some remarkable notices of tribes of Hittites, Jud. i. 26; 1 Ki. x. 29; 2 Ki. vii. 6; 2 Chr. i. 17, which seem to point to a people, a branch of the great family or the descendants of those expelled from Palestine, who were settled independently beyond Lebanon, and it may be on the south-eastern frontier toward Arabia. And Egyptian annals speak of a war with Hittites, and Egyptian pictures are believed to represent Hittites. These representations may be taken not unfairly to figure the old Hittites of Canaan. We have them in both civil and warlike attire. The complexion given to them by the Egyptian artists is, though dark, rather florid than sallow, with black hair, regular features, with a very prominent and somewhat hooked nose. The civil dress is a plain bright-colored tunic, with a deep edging of lace or embroidery, gathered into a knot on the left shoulder, so as to leave the right arm at freedom. Under this was worn a kind of kilt or skirt, of similar color and pattern, but reaching only to the knees. They shaved not only the beard and mustaches, but even the eyebrows, as did many others of the nations of Canaan; besides which the Hittites had an almost peculiar custom of their own, of shaving a square place just above the ear, leaving the hair on the side of the face and whiskers hanging down in a long-plaited lock. This frightful custom, and other eccentric dealings of the nations with their hair, throw some light upon the injunctions to avoid such customs which we find in the books of the law. If we want to know what is meant by "marring the corners of the beard," Lev. xix. 27, a look at such pictures will satisfy us. The war-dress of the Hittites consisted of a helmet skull-cap extending down the neck, cut away high and square above the ear, so as to expose that bald place, which they seem to have regarded as peculiarly charming. It was fastened by a strong band or cheek-string, probably, like the helmet, of metal. The badges of distinction were one or two ostrich feathers worn drooping.

They wore a kind of cape or short mantle, tied close in front, either by the two ends of the cloth or by a cord with tassels at the end. Over this was the girdle, which was broad and thick, and hung down in front with a long end, terminating in a ball and tassel. It was long enough to pass around the neck, across the breast, and thus formed a species of defensive armor, illustrative of the military use of the girdle so often mentioned in Scripture. The only weapon assigned to the Hittites by the Egyptian artists is the arrow.

HIVITES (hiv'ites), the name of a tribe descended from Ham by his son Canaan, Gen. x. 17; 1 Chr. i. 15. They are enumerated among the nations of Canaan whom the Israelites were to dispossess, Ex. iii. 8, 17; xiii. 5. They appear to have gathered around two principal centres, in the middle of Palestine and toward the north. We first meet with them in Jacob's history, occupying Shechem, and very ready to be induced by what appeared worldly advantages to intermarry with the Hebrews at the cost of personal pain, Gen. xxxiv. 2, 20-24. Esau is also said to have taken a Hivite wife. The inhabitants of Gibeon and the neighboring towns were Hivites, Josh. ix. 7, 17; and in the deception they practiced upon Joshua we may see somewhat of the same crafty, calculating spirit which had distinguished this tribe at Shechem. As, however, these Hivites were not very powerful, and possibly because they were intermingled with others, they seem to have been sometimes termed Amorites, Gen. xlviii. 22; 2 Sam. xxi. 2. There was a large division of this tribe in the north, in Lebanon, under Mount Hermon, Josh. xi. 3; and these were left in a measure unsubdued by Israel, Jud. iii. 3. There were Hivite cities here at the time of David's census, 2 Sam. xxiv. 7. The remnant of them were brought under tribute by Solomon, 1 Ki. ix. 20; 2 Chr. viii. 7.

A learned writer has advanced a theory that is interesting, though not clearly proven; it is that Seir was originally a Hivite chieftain of the Lebanon, and that he emigrated before Abraham settled in Canaan into the south, where Mount Hor took its name from the northern Hor, and various Hivite cities were founded, from which the settlers were subsequently ejected by the Edomites. These Hivites were also called Horites, from, as the writer conjectures, their Mount Hor.

HIZKIAH (hiz-ki'ah), an ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet, Zeph. i. 1. The name is the same with that of Hezekiah, king of Judah, and it is very probable that that monarch was the person intended.

HIZKIJAH (hiz-ki'jah), a name among those who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 17. Possibly it should be joined with Ater, which precedes.

HIZKLIAHU (hizk-li-a'hu), 1 Chr. iii. 23, marg., a form of the name HEZEKIAH.

HIZR (hiz'r), the founder of a monastic order of Mohammedans known as Hizrevites. He was buried at Brusa, and many visits are yet made to his grave by the Mohammedans.

HOADLEY (hōd'le), BENJAMIN, who rose to be one of the most eminent of the English bishops in the first half of the eighteenth century, was born in 1676, at Westerham, in Kent. He was a student of Catherine Hall, Cambridge; he graduated in 1699. He entered the Church as "Lecturer" in St. Mildred's, in London, and thereafter he held the rectory of St. Peter-le-Poor. Very early in his career he became famous as a defender and two years afterward he preached his famous sermon before the king, which led to one of the most keenly contested battles on the relation of the Church to the State which has ever been waged in England. The text of Hoadley's sermon was the declaration of our Lord, "My kingdom is not of this world," from which Hoadley deduced the conclusion that in doctrine and discipline the Church was and ought to be free from the intrusion and dictation of the State in spiritual things; and such a sentiment, uttered in the year 1717, was received with great surprise and indignation. The famous Law and the chiefs of the non-jurors were specially violent in their opposition. At least fifty pamphlets were published during the contest, and the storm became so violent in the lower House of Convocation that the government felt called on to prorogue it, and ever since it has been prohibited from issuing any authoritative decisions. It was considered a monstrous offence by the High-Church men of the day that a bishop should hold that "the Church is Christ's kingdom; that he alone is Lawgiver, and that he has left behind him no visible human authority, no vicegerents, who can properly be said to supply his place; no interpreters upon whom his subjects are absolutely to depend; no judges over the consciences and religion of his people." Holding as he did to the lawfulness of the "orders" in the English Church, he made a strong appeal to the dissenters in his work on the "Reasonableness of Conformity to the Church of England." He also wrote on "Miracles," against the non-jurors, on the "Lord's Supper," on "Episcopal Ordination," and he published sermons. He has justly been considered latitudinarian in his doctrinal statements. From Bangor he was removed in 1721 to Hereford, and two years afterward he was translated to Salisbury, where he remained until 1734; and his last removal in this great career of promotion was to Winchester, where he died in 1761.

HOADLEY, JOHN, LL.D., youngest son of Bishop Hoadley, was born in 1711. He graduated at Cambridge, and commenced to study for the bar, but took holy orders, and had no less than nine valuable preferments bestowed on him by his father when bishop of Winchester, seven of which he retained till his death. He edited the works of his father, to which he prefixed a brief biography. He also wrote several dramas, and was the friend of Garrick and Hogarth. He died in 1776.

HOAR (ho'r), LEONARD, one of the first presidents of Harvard College, was born about 1630. Shortly after graduating at Harvard he entered Cambridge University, England, and there continued his studies. While in England he entered the ministry, and preached at Wensted, in Sussex, until after the Restoration, when he was deposed for nonconformity. He soon after returned to Massachusetts, and was appointed assistant to Dr. Thatcher, in Boston. In 1672 he became president of Harvard College, but held the position less than three years.

of civil and religious liberty against the assumptions of the High-Church party and the asserters of slavish obedience to civil rulers. His great opponent at this time was Atterbury, the non-juror, and the value of Hoadley's services was felt to be of such importance to the cause of freedom that they were recognized by the House of Commons, and forthwith his advancement became rapid. He was made rector of Streatham; and when George I. ascended the throne, he became court chaplain. In 1715 he was appointed to the see of Bangor, uated at Oxford, and was afterward rector of Moreton, Essex. Toward the close of his life he renounced his Calvinistic views and ardently embraced the Arminian doctrine. He died in 1657. Among his works are "God's Love to Mankind" and "The Church's Authority asserted."

HOARE (ho'r), CHARLES JAMES, an eminent minister of the Church of England. The date of his birth is not certainly known. He graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he was elected Fellow. He held successively the offices of vicar of Blanford Forum, Dorsetshire, and of Godstone; archdeacon, and then canon, of Winchester. During the later years of his life he was an archdeacon of Surrey, but in 1860 resigned on account of his greatly advanced age. He was a prolific and able writer. His most important works are "Course of Divine Judgments" and "Sermons on the Christian Character." He died January 15, 1864.

HOBAB (ho'bab), the father-in-law of Moses, who visited him in the desert after the departure from Egypt, and whom Moses invited to accompany Israel into their land, with a promise of good. Hobab, it would seem, at first declined the offer, and returned to his own habitation; but afterward he or his children must have complied, as we find descendants of theirs located in Palestine, Num. x. 29-32; Jud. iv. 11. Hobab was called also JETHRO, which see.

HOBAB (ho'bah), the place to which Abram pursued the confederate kings, Gen. xiv. 15. It was to the north of Damascus. The village of Jobar, where the Jews have a synagogue dedicated to Elijah, is said by them to be the ancient Hobah.

HOBART (ho'bart), JOHN HENRY, D.D., bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the diocese of New York, was born September 14, 1775. His collegiate preparation was begun in the college of Philadelphia, but he afterward entered the college of New Jersey, where he graduated in 1793. He entered upon the ministry in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, where he had charge of two suburban churches. He afterward removed to New Brunswick, thence to Hempstead, Long Island, and then was appointed assistant of Trinity Church, New York. In 1811 he was elected assistant-bishop, and was afterward made rector of Trinity Church and diocesan of New York. The establishment of the General Theological Seminary is due, in a great measure, to his efforts, and for a time he held the professorship of pastoral theology and pulpit eloquence. In 1823 he visited Europe for the benefit of his health, and made a tour of the Italian States and preached in Rome, where Protestant worship was then scarcely tolerated. While abroad he prepared for publication his "Discourses preached in America," which elicited the highest commendation from the leading journals. After two years he returned to America, and with redoubled zeal devoted himself to his ministerial labors, taking a special interest in the cause of the Indians. Among his published writings are, "Festivals and Fasts," "Apology for Apostolic Order" and "The State of Departed Spirits." He died September 10, 1830, at Auburn.

HOBBES (hobz), THOMAS, a distinguished English philosopher and writer on government, was born in 1588, at Malmesbury, Wilts. He was educated at Oxford, and in 1608 became tutor to the son of the earl of Devonshire, with whom he made a continental tour. He had afterward the advantage of the society and friendship of many of the most eminent men of his day, both in France and England, among whom were Bacon, Ben Jonson, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, who took an exactly opposite course in philosophy to Hobbes, Gassendi, Father Mersenne and Descartes. He also became acquainted with Galileo. In 1631 he accepted the office of tutor to the young earl of Devonshire, and traveled with him in France and Italy. He was appointed mathematical tutor to the prince of Wales in 1647, and won his sincere esteem, which was testified at the Restoration by the grant of a pension out of the king's privy purse. Hobbes spent the latter years of his life at Chatsworth, the seat of his former pupil, the earl of Devonshire. He holds an important place in the history of the growth and development of free thought in Europe, but endeavored to give his speculations a practical direction. He did not openly oppose Christianity, but his principles were antagonistic to religion, and almost every form of infidelity since his day can be traced to the principles which he laid down. He was one of the first great English writers on government, and his views have exposed him to severe animadversion. He conceived the state of nature as a state of war, and government as the result of a compact suggested by self-love or reason for the sake of peace. He advocated absolute monarchy as the best form of government. His principal works are—the treatise "De Cive," "Leviathan," both of which were censured by Parliament in 1666, "Human Nature," "De Corpore Politico," "De Libertate, Necessitate, et Casu" and "Behemoth," a history of the civil war. He also published a metrical translation of the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey," which did not add to his reputation. A complete edition of the works of Hobbes was published between 1839-45, under the direction and at the cost of Sir W. Molesworth. A portrait of Hobbes, by an unknown artist, is in the national portrait gallery. He died in 1679.

HOC or HOKE DAY, the day, November 13, of the massacre of the Danes by Ethelred, afterward commemorated on Whitsun Tuesday.

HOCHIN, or HOSSEIN (hōs'sine), BEN-MANSOUR, ABOU'L MOGHITS, a Mohamedan mystic of Persia, was born toward the close of the ninth century. After studying under several eminent philosophers, he traveled as far as China, and preached during his journey thither. He made some converts; but as his principles did not harmonize with each other, nor with his own practice, he was by many deemed an impostor. He led a life, however, of simplicity and his moral character was unexceptionable. At Bagdad he was condemned to death, and while undergoing torture he prayed for his tormentors. His body, after being burnt, was thrown into the Tigris.

HOCH (hok), or ÆPINUS (e-pe'nus), JOHANNES, an eloquent advocate of the Reformation, was born in Brandenburg, in 1499. He graduated at Wittenberg, and it was during his residence there that he embraced the principles of the Reformation. He was pastor at Hamburg for many years, and both by voice and pen ably promoted the cause of the Reformation. He wrote a work on "Purgatory." He died in 1553.

HOCHHEISEN (hōkh'i-zen), JOHANN GEORG, a German theologian, was born in 1677, at Ulm. He pursued his studies at the university of his native city, and at Tübingen and Wittenberg. At Hamburg he became acquainted with Fabricius, and under his influence turned his attention to the thorough mastery of Greek and Hebrew. In 1705 he delivered a course of lectures at Wittenberg, where he was appointed adjunct professor of philosophy. He was afterward professor of Hebrew in the gymnasium at Breslau. He died in 1712.

HOCHMANN (hōkh'mahn), ERNST CHRISTOPH, a German mystic, was born in 1661, at Hoehenau. He pursued his studies at Halle University, and while there obtained considerable notoriety by his efforts to convert the Jews to Christianity. He seems to have been a man of sincere piety and great boldness. During a journey through Germany he not only held devotional meetings in private dwellings, but publicly rebuked the clergy for their lukewarmness, often entering the pulpit during public service for that purpose. He died in 1721.

HOCHSTETTER (hōkh'stet-ter), ANDREAS ADAM, an eminent Lutheran minister of Germany, was born at Tübingen, July 13, 1668. After graduating at the university of Tübingen, he visited the principal universities of Holland and England, as well as of his native country, where he met with many distinguished scholars. He made considerable proficiency in the English language, from which he translated several works into Latin. He devoted much attention, also, to Hebrew. Returning to Tübingen, he received the appointment of professor extraordinary at the university, and was afterward regular professor of theology. At the same time he was appointed city preacher of Tübingen, and a few years later was made court preacher and counselor of the consistory at Stuttgart. A few years before his death he resumed his professorship at the university. He died April 27, 1718.

HOCHSTRATEN (hōkh/'strah-ten), or HOOGSTRATEN (hoog/'strah-ten), JACOB VAN, a violent opponent of the Reformation, was born in 1454, at Brabant. He graduated at the university of Cologne, but made no great progress in his studies. What he lacked in proficiency of intellectual attainments, however, he made up in the virulence of his enmity to Protestantism, and he was rewarded with the office of inquisitor at Louvain, besides being appointed to the chair of theology at the university of Cologne, though but poorly qualified for the latter. Among the Reformers whom he summoned before him was Reuchlin, the coadjutor of Erasmus. As the latter lived in another state, Hochstraten transcended his jurisdiction thereby; and the chapter of Mentz having also taken cognizance of Reuchlin's case, Pope Leo X. commissioned Bishop George of Speer to decide between the contestants. Hochstraten, in default of appearance, not only lost his case, but was required to pay the costs. Refusing to obey the sentence, he was summoned to Rome. The matter being brought before Leo X., he declined to take a course which would offend the adherents either of Reuchlin or of Hochstraten, and issued a "mandatum de supersedendo." He died January 21, 1527, at Cologne.

HOD, a chieftain of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 37.

HODIAH (ho-di'ah), one of the descendants of David, 1 Chr. iii. 24.

HODAVIAH (ho-da-vi'ah). 1. A chief of Manasseh, east of Jordan, 1 Chr. v. 24. 2. A Benjamite, 1 Chr. ix. 7. 3. A Levite whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel, Ezra ii. 40. He seems to be the Judah of Ezra iii. 9, and is called Hodevah in Neh. vii. 43.

HODEGETICS. See METHODOLOGY.

HODEGETRIA (ho-deh-ge't-re-ah), or the "guide," the Greek name of a painting inscribed to St. Luke which was carried in advance of the army of Michael Palæologus when he entered Constantinople after defeating the Latins. It is also the name under which the Sicilians worship the Virgin Mary.

HODESH (ho'desh), the wife of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 9. Possibly she may be identical with Baara.

HODEVAH, Neh. vii. 43. See HODAVIAH.

HODGE (hoj), CHARLES, D.D., LL.D., who has long held a distinguished position in the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. On his father's side he is of Scotch Irish extraction, and on his mother's of Huguenot descent. His father served as a physician in the Revolutionary army and his youngest son Charles was born in Philadelphia in 1797. He commenced his classical studies at twelve years of age under Dr. Boyer, and at fourteen he went to Princeton to prepare more thoroughly for entering college, which he did next year. At this time Dr. Ashbel Green had been made president of Nassau Hall, and Dr. Alexander was then distinguishing himself in the theological seminary. In 1816 he began the study of theology; and after a three years' course, Dr. Alexander advised him not to accept a pastoral charge, as he desired to secure his services as a theological teacher, and he was appointed assistant instructor in the seminary in 1820 by the General Assembly. In 1822 he was made a full professor, and in 1826 he went to Germany, where, at Halle and Berlin, he prosecuted his theological studies, becoming intimate with Tholuck and other emi-

HODGES (hoj'ez), WALTER, D.D., a divine of the Hutchinsonian school and provost of Oriel College, Oxford, flourished about the middle of the eighteenth century. He is the author of a book entitled "Elihu; or, An Inquiry into the Principal Scope and Design of the Book of Job." In this curious work the author endeavors to show that Elihu is intended to represent the Son of God. The discovery is one on which he lays great stress, and he has interpreted the whole book in accordance with this supposition. Another curious work by the same author is entitled "The Christian Plan," in which the whole meaning and extent of the Christian plan is represented as embodied, according to his interpretation in the Hebrew "Elohim." The latter book also contains remarks on the historical account of the life of David and on "Sheol." On the latter his remarks are described as a dissertation concerning the place of departed souls between the time of their dissolution and the general resurrection.

HODGSON (hoj'sun), BERNARD, LL.D., principal of Hertford College, England, author of "Solomon's Song, translated from the Hebrew." His chief design in this translation has been to give as literal a rendering of the original as possible. He has done something also toward illustrating its poetical beauties. He considers it an epithalamium. In chapter viii. 2 he interprets Talmadin to mean the bride's mother, and the "chariots of Amminadib," chap. vi. 12, he renders the "chariots of my loyal people." He is the author also of "The Proverbs of Solomon, translated from the Hebrew, with notes," "Ecclesiastes, a New Translation from the Original Hebrew." Both translations are directed to the literal rendering of the original; and considering the difficulties encountered in such an undertaking, especially when helps were fewer than they are now, Dr. Hodgson's success is deserving of commendation. He rarely deviates from the common version, and when he does assigns reasons which in most instances are convincing and satisfactory. The notes, of which there are not many, are principally devoted to verbal criticism.

HODHEILIDS (hōd-hi'lidz), a Mohammedan sect who hold the belief that the condition of the saints in Paradise is one of undisturbed repose.

HODIAH (ho-di'ah), the wife of Ezra and the mother of Jered and Heber and Jekuthiel, 1 Chr. iv. 18, 19, called Jehudijah in the preceding verse. The name is identical with Hodijah, 1.

HODIJAH (ho-di'jah). 1. One of the Levites who explained the law to the people on the memorable occasion when Ezra solemnly read it in the congregation, Neh. viii. 7; 1 Esd. ix. 48. It is probably the same who is referred to in Neh. ix. 5; x. 10; Heb. ii. 2. Another Levite mentioned in the list of those who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 13.

nent literary men since well known on both sides of the Atlantic. In 1822 he married Sarah Bache, daughter of Dr. William Bache and granddaughter of Benjamin Franklin, and two of his sons became professors of theology, one of them in Alleghany Seminary and another at Princeton. He has filled the exegetical chair and the chair of theology, and his works are numerous and of the greatest value. His "Way of Life" has been greatly blessed. His commentaries on the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians and Ephesians are of rare importance, and they have commanded a great circulation. He wrote a history of the Presbyterian Church, but his great life-work is his "Systematic Theology," in four volumes, which is acknowledged to take rank with any treatise on divinity ever published in any age of the Church. His labors as editor of and contributor to the Princeton Review occupied a large portion of his literary life, and many of his essays which originally appeared in that journal have been published in separate form. Dr. Hodge's eminence as a theologian is acknowledged on both sides of the Atlantic by those who belong to other portions of the Christian Church as freely as by the members of his own denomination, and the masterly character of his works must necessarily perpetuate his name.

3. One of the chiefs of the people mentioned in the same list, Neh. x. 18.

HODY (ho'de), HUMPHREY, D.D., an eminent English divine, was born January 1, 1659, at Oldcombe, Somersetshire, and was educated at Oxford University. He was elected a Fellow of Wadham College in 1684. He became greatly distinguished in the non-juring controversy, in which he published several works on the adverse side. For his services in this cause he was rewarded by being made domestic chaplain to Archbishop Tillotson, presented to a living in London, and appointed regius professor of Greek in the university of Oxford, 1698, and archdeacon of Oxford in 1704. He founded ten scholarships in Wadham College to promote the study of the Greek and Hebrew languages. He died January 20, 1706. His principal works are "Dissertation against Aristeas' History of the Septuagint," and "The Original Text, Greek and Vulgate Latin Versions of the Bible." The former of these works was rudely assailed by Isaac Vossius; but Hody, instead of replying to his antagonist, applied himself to his second great work, which occupied him nearly twenty years. It is divided into four books. The first contains his dissertation against Aristeas, with improvements, strengthening his former positions. The second treats of the true authors of the Septuagint version — of the time when, and the reasons why, it was undertaken, and of the manner in which it was performed. The third book contains a history of the original Hebrew text, of the Septuagint and of the Vulgate Latin version. The fourth book gives an account of the other ancient Greek versions. It still maintains its high rank as the classical work on the Septuagint.

HOE (ho), MATTHIAS DE HOHENEGG, a zealous Lutheran divine, was born at Vienna in 1580. He was preacher and spiritual guide to the elector of Saxony, over whom he exercised a very baneful influence. Besides a "Commentary on the Apocalypse," he wrote several controversial works against the Calvinists and Romanists, whom he strongly hated. He died in 1645.

HOEFLING, or HÖFLING (høf'ling), JOHANN WILHELM FRIEDRICH, a distinguished German divine of the Lutheran Church, was born in 1802, in Drossenfeld, near Baireuth. After graduating at the university of Erlangen, he was pastor at Wurtburg, and afterward at Jost, near Nuremberg. During his residence at the university he had been deeply influenced in his views of Christianity by the lectures of Schelling, and while at Jost he put forth two pamphlets against Rationalism, then making rapid advances. Probably in recognition of the ability of his defence of positive Christianity, he was appointed to the chair of practical theology at Erlangen. He was an able and prolific writer, especially on practical theology, worship and related dogmas. His most important work is "The Sacrament of Baptism." He also wrote "Principles of the Evangelical Lutheran Church." He died April 5, 1853.

HOEVEN (hoov'n), ABRAHAM VAN DER, a well-known preacher of Holland, was born in 1793, at Rotterdam. He was professor at the Arminian seminary at Amsterdam, and afterward at Utrecht. He died July, 1855.

HOFACKER (høf'e-ker), LUDWIG and WILHELM, two brothers, both celebrated preachers of Germany. Ludwig, the elder, pronounced by F. W. Krummacher to be the most powerful preacher in the Suabian land, was born April 15, 1798, at Wildbad. While at the university of Tübingen he displayed remarkable religious zeal, and was specially active in the formation of Bible-classes among his fellow-students. He also preached quite frequently, and with marked effect. He was assistant to his father, who was preacher at Saint Leonard's, in Stuttgart, until the death of the latter, when he went to Rielingshausen, near Marbach. His preaching gained him a wide celebrity, strangers coming from long distances to hear the far-famed young preacher. His sermons have been published, and have reached the extraordinary circulation of more than one hundred thousand copies, having been translated into English, French, Danish and other languages. He died suddenly November 18, 1828, in the height of his fame and usefulness, at the early age of thirty years. Wilhelm, his younger brother, was born February 16, 1805. He was assistant to Ludwig while the latter was winning golden opinions at Rielingshausen, and after his untimely death made a literary tour through Northern Germany. He pursued a course of study at the university of Tübingen, meanwhile delivering a course of lectures on dogmatics. In 1853 he was preacher at Waiblingen, and later at Saint Leonard's, in Stuttgart, the scene of his father's and brother's former labors. He contributed to the various theological periodicals, and earnestly defended the doctrine of the divinity of Christ against the speculative philosophy of Hegel and Strauss, maintaining that the orthodox doctrine is fully borne out by modern science. He also published "Drops from the Fountain of Life" and "Sermons for Sundays and Holy Days." He died August 10, 1848.

HOFER (ho'fer), JOSEPH ANTON, a Roman Catholic priest of Germany, was born May 19, 1742, at Kastelruth. He graduated at the university of Innsbruck. He was prefect of the gymnasium at Brix, where he also taught rhetoric, and was afterward professor of ecclesiastical law. Besides his sermons on various subjects, and contributions to periodical literature, he published "A View of Ecclesiastical Law." He died in 1820.

HOFFBAUER (høf'bow-er), CLEMENS MARIA, a Roman Catholic of Germany, a distinguished member of the monastic order of Redemptorists, was born September 26, 1751, at Tasswitz, in Moravia. He established several monasteries, and is said to have made numerous converts. He died March 25, 1820. See REDEMPTORISTS.

HOFFEDITZ (høf'fe-ditz), THEODORE L., D.D., a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born December 16, 1783, near Carshaven, on the Weser, in Germany. In 1807 he came to America; and after having engaged some time in school-teaching, he studied theology with Dr. Helfenstein of Philadelphia. He was pastor of German Reformed congregations in Northampton county, Virginia, and organized several congregations in adjoining counties. In 1843, in conjunction with Rev. Dr. Schneck, he bore a call from the Synod of the German Reformed Church to Dr. Krummacher to become professor of theology in the Mercersburg theological seminary, and visited Germany for that purpose, but the great preacher did not see his way clear to leave Elberfeldt. He died July 10, 1858.

HOFFMAN (høf'e-mahn), ANDREAS GOTTLIEB, an eminent German theologian and Oriental scholar, was born at Weltsleben near Magdeburg, April 13, 1796. He graduated at the university of Halle, where he thoroughly studied the Shemitic languages. He afterward delivered a course of lectures there on the Arabic language. He then removed to Jena, where he devoted special attention to the philological branch of theology, and lectured on Hebrew Antiquities, Church History, Isagogics, Exegesis of the Old Testament, and the Shemitic and Oriental languages. He contributed to the theological and philological periodicals, was one of the editors of the Encyclopedia of Ersch and Gruben, and published, among other works, "Syriac Grammar" and "Outline of Hebrew Antiquities." He died March 16, 1864.

HOFFMAN, DANIEL, a German theologian of the Lutheran Church, was born in 1540, at Halle. After graduating at the university of Jena, he was appointed to the chair of theology in the university of Helmstadt. He was an opponent to the Calvinistic doctrines concerning the sacraments and predestination, as well as the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity. For his denunciation of philosophy as hurtful to the cause of religion, in which he defended his position by quotations from the Epistles of Paul and the writings of Luther, he was taken to task by Caselius and Martini, the great Aristotelian philosophers, and at their instance the duke of Brunswick obliged him to retract his opinions and leave the university. He died in 1611, at Wolfenbüttele.

HOFFMANN, GOTTFRIED, a popular hymnologist, was born in 1678, at Plagwitz, in Silesia, and died in 1712.

HOFFMANN, HEINRICH, one of the translators of the Bible into the Finnish language, was a German preacher in Finland during the seventeenth century.

HOFFMANN, IMMANUEL, was born at Tübingen, April 16, 1710. In 1741 he was appointed to the archdiaconate of Tübingen, and in 1756 professor of Greek in the university of that city. He died in 1772. Of his various dissertations published during his lifetime the following are the most important: "Dissertation on the Style of Paul's Epistles," "Dissertation on the Parallel Passages, 2 Pet. ii. 4-17, Jude 5-13," "Commentary on 1 Cor. i. 19-21." He was also the author of a posthumous work, entitled "Evangelical Demonstration of the Agreement between Scripture Passages quoted from the Old Testament into the New." Of this work T. G. Hegelmaier was editor, and prefixed to it an excursus on the method of interpreting the quotations made from the Old Testament in the New. It is described by Orme as "full of learning, and in general very judicious."

HOFFMANN, JOHANN, a theologian of Germany, and one of the founders of the university of Leipzig, was born at Schweidnitz, but the precise date of his birth is unknown. For a time he held the professorship of theology at Prague, and was afterward bishop of Meissen, where he died in 1481.

HOFFMANN, or HOFMANN, MELCHIOR, a celebrated Anabaptist, was a native of Hall, in Suabia. He was brought up to the furrier trade; but going to Livonia when the Reformation was making rapid progress, he became an enthusiastic Protestant, and began preaching at Wolmar, where he met with bitter opposition, as also at Dorpat, whither he went in the hope of avoiding persecution. He went to the length of urging the people to destroy the monasteries and the paintings in the churches—a course which was disapproved even by his own friends. He went thence to Reval and to Stockholm, and in 1527 he was appointed preacher at Kiel by the king of Denmark; but here he again stirred up opposition among the followers of Luther by his persistence in interpreting the Scriptures apocalyptically, and deviating from the Lutheran doctrine of the sacraments; and a conference having been appointed to examine his doctrines, he was condemned for heresy, and obliged to leave the country. Going to Strasburg and thence to Emden, he soon became one of the leaders of the Anabaptists, and so infatuated were his followers that they regarded him as the prophet Elias and proclaimed the judgment day as at hand. Finally, in 1533, in consequence of the disturbances provoked by him, a synod was called, and condemned him to imprisonment. He died in 1542. Hoffmann maintained, in common with many other Anabaptists, that the birth of Christ was a mere phantom—that the Logos not merely took our nature, but actually became flesh. Regarding the Eucharist, he denied the real presence of Christ, and held that the bread is merely a sign or token in memory of the body, but that the body is partaken of by faith in the preaching of the word, thus retaining the idea of the real spiritual presence of Christ. For some time after Hoffmann's death his disciples flourished in Lower Germany, but soon allied themselves to the other sects of the Anabaptists. Some of them went to England, where they were persecuted, and finally banished from the country.

HOFFMIER (hof'me'r), JOHN HENRY, a German Reformed minister, was born March 17, 1760, at Anhalt-Cöthen, in Germany. After graduating at the university of Halle, and engaging for a short time in teaching, he began preaching at Bremen, and then came to America, where he had charge of several congregations in Northampton county, Pennsylvania. He subsequently preached in Lancaster; but experiencing considerable embarrassment from his inability to use the English language, he retired from active duty. He died March 18, 1838.

HOFMANN, JOHANNGEORG, a theologian of Germany, was born in October, 1724, at Windsheim. He pursued his studies at Erlangen and Leipzig. He delivered lectures on philosophy at Leipzig, where he was afterward professor; and he was successively professor of Oriental languages at Giessen, professor of theology at Altorf, and then archdeacon. He died May 10, 1772.

HOFMANN, KARL GOTTLÖB, D.D., a distinguished theologian of Germany, was born at Schneeberg, October 1, 1703, and died at Wittenberg, where he was professor of theology and general superintendent, September 19, 1774. Besides editing and greatly enlarging the "Introduction to J. G. Pritius's Version of the New Testament," he wrote "Introduction to Paul's Epistles to the Galatians and Colossians," and a collection of minor works under the title of "Varia Sacra." He was an eminent preacher as well as writer.

HÖFLING, JOHANN WILHELM FRIEDRICH. See HOEFLING.

HOFSTEDE DE GROOT (hofs'tede de groot), PETER, an eminent theologian of Holland, was born in 1720 at Rotterdam. He graduated at Groningen, and was appointed professor of theology at Rotterdam. He was one of the leaders of the "Groningen School" of theology, the doctrines of which are a sort of spiritual Arianism, according to which there is implanted in our human nature a divine element which must be developed before we reach our ultimate destiny of conformity to God. This problem has been solved by Christianity in a higher and purer manner than by all other religions which have preceded it. God prepared mankind for salvation by sending Christ, who is the embodiment of perfection. To know him aright an exegetical study of the Old Testament is necessary, of which the New Testament is only the fulfillment. It is denied that sin is a deep-seated evil; for since all sinners will ultimately be happy, it is merely a temporary inconvenience. The infallibility of the Scripture writers is also denied. Hofstede strenuously opposed Lutheranism, and by a work entitled "Ecclesiastical Affairs of India" uttered a loud protest against the establishment of a Lutheran church in 1779 at the Cape of Good Hope. He died November 27, 1803.

HOG. The animal is now found on the Syrian hills, and no doubt it existed in ancient times, for the allusions in Scripture to swine are manifold. In the later period of Jewish history swine were raised for sale to the Roman garrisons, and were therefore known where Roman soldiers were stationed. Swine were used in heathen sacrifices, and no doubt the flesh was eaten by the votaries, but the flesh of the hog was forbidden to the Jews who held it as an abomination.

HOGGE, JAMES, D.D., a Presbyterian clergyman, was born in 1784, at Moorfield, Virginia. His education was mainly conducted by his father. After his ordination he was sent as a missionary to Ohio, where he organized a congregation in Franklinton, and was afterward pastor of the First Church at Columbus. In the latter charge he remained during a period of fifty-one years, until his advanced age made it necessary for him to resign, in 1858. He was greatly beloved, and exerted a wide influence throughout his denomination. Many of the benevolent institutions in the State are much indebted to his untiring exertions in their behalf. He died September 22, 1863.

HOGLAH (hog'lah), one of the daughters of Zelophehad, in whose favor certain regulations were made as to the descent of property to a female, Num. xxvi. 33; xxvii. 1; xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3.

HOGMANARY (hog-ma'na-re), a name given in Scotland to the last day of the year.

HOHAM (ho'ham), a king of Hebron who joined a confederacy to resist the Israelites after the cession of Gibeon. He and his allies were signally defeated, Josh. x. 3, 5, 16-27.

HOHENBURG (ho'hen-burg). A monastery of this name, situated on the Rhine, in Germany, was long celebrated for the devotion of its members to learning. Odilia, who died in A. D. 720, was the first abbess; her father, Duke Ethicot, founded the establishment, and she caused another building to be erected at the base of the eminence for the reception of weary travelers. That learning was cultivated in Hohenburg is evidenced by the "Garden of Delights," a work prepared by one of the abbesses, which treats of Biblical history and theological doctrines.

HOHENLOHE (ho-hen-lo'heh), ALEXANDER LEOPOLD, prince of, a Hungarian Roman Catholic bishop, was born August 17, 1794, at Kupferzell. Destined from his infancy for the Church, he passed through his educational course at Vienna, Berne and Ellwangen. In 1816 he entered into holy orders at Olmutz; and after a journey to Rome, where he lived chiefly with the Jesuits, he discharged ecclesiastical duties at Bamberg and Munich to the satisfaction of all the members of his church. In 1820, having been struck with the cures which the prayers of a Badenese peasant were said to have effected on many distinguished invalids, Prince Hohenlohe was induced to have recourse to similar means; and having healed some nervous patients, he was soon surrounded by a host of invalids eager to test the spiritual powers of one whose fame had been noised abroad as having effected cures which had baffled all ordinary medical skill. As in most similar cases, rumor was far in advance of the truth; but the prince was the dupe of his own credulity, and it was not until a thorough exposure of the whole proceedings was given to the world by the burgomaster of Bamberg that he abandoned his supernatural pretensions. He wrote several tracts and sermons, and died at Grosswaradin, in Hungary, in 1849.

HOHENSTAUFEN (ho-hen-stauf'en). See GUELPHS and Ghibellines.

HOLJER (ho'e-yer), BENJAMIN CARL HENRIK, a Swedish philosopher, born in Dalecarlia, in 1767. He was educated at Upsal, distinguished himself among the party who strongly sympathized with the principles of the French Revolution, and soon after coolly defended arbitrary power. After many disappointments he became professor of philosophy at Upsal in 1800, and obtained considerable reputation by his lectures and writings on metaphysics and the fine arts. He died in 1812.

HOLBACH (hōl'bakh), PAUL HENRY THIRY, who was one of the most influential of the French infidels of the eighteenth century, was born in 1723, at Heidesheim, in Baden. As Baron d'Holbach he succeeded to a large fortune on the death of his father, and at Paris he surrounded himself with all the eminent freethinkers and unbelievers in the capital. In their social reunions they elaborated their views, which afterward appeared in the celebrated "Encyclopedie," under Diderot. So far did Holbach carry his views that such men as Rousseau, D'Alembert and Buffon had to leave him, as he opposed every form of positive religion. His "Christianity Unveiled" was exceedingly bitter, and his associates confessed that in virulence it exceeded any book hitherto published. This was followed by "The Spirit of the Clergy" and "Sacerdotal Imposture," both of which appeared in 1767; and in the same year army; and his talents and piety becoming evident, he was ordained and settled over the church at Pike Creek, South Carolina. He became so prominent here that he was appointed a delegate in the convention of his State to ratify the Constitution of the United States. After preaching in other places, he removed in 1799 to Savannah, aided in forming the female asylum, in conducting the "Georgia Analytical Repository" and in originating the Mount Enon Academy. Brown University recognized his great worth by an honorary degree in divinity, and in 1812 he removed to Philadelphia, where he remained until his death, in 1824.

HOLCOMBE, HOSEA, a native of South Carolina, where he was born in 1780, was also a Baptist minister. He held a charge in North Carolina, whence he went to Alabama, where he died, in Jefferson county, in 1818. He wrote extensively on baptism, published a collection of hymns, and prepared a "History of the Alabama Baptists." He was an excellent and laborious minister.

his most carefully-prepared work, the "System of Nature," was issued. It bore the title "Mirabaud, Perpetual Secretary of the French Academy;" and so rabid was this book that even Voltaire assailed it in his "Philosophical Dictionary." A popular edition was published, in which materialism and atheism were openly proclaimed, and again Voltaire opposed him. He died at Paris in 1789, regretted by his associates, who represented him as a kind, benevolent man.

HOLBERG (hol'berg), LUDWIG VON, who was an eminent Danish divine, was born in 1684, at Bergen. He received his education in Copenhagen, and became a professor in the university in that capital, and afterward rector and treasurer. So eminent were his literary services that in 1747 he was created a baron by the king. To him above all others has Denmark been indebted for the awakening of the popular mind on literary subjects, and indeed he may be considered as the creator of the modern literature of that kingdom. He died in 1754.

HOLCOMBE (hol'kom), HENRY, D.D., an influential Baptist minister who was born in Virginia in 1762. In his youth he served in the HOLCOT (hol'kot), ROBERT, was a scholastic doctor of the Dominican order of the fourteenth century. He was educated at Oxford, and he became celebrated for his interpretations of Scripture. One of his works, "On the study of Scripture," was published at Venice, another appeared at Paris on the Proverbs of Solomon, and another at Venice on the Song of Solomon. The Dominicans have attributed many works of uncertain authorship to him.

HOLDA (hold'a). See HULDA.

HOLDEN (hold'en), HENRY, D.D., was a celebrated English Romanist, born in 1596. He was educated at Douai and at Paris, where he graduated as doctor in divinity. He became famous as a theologian and a controversialist. He wrote on "Predestination" in opposition to Arnauld, and he edited a "New Testament, with Notes," but his greatest work was an "Analysis of Faith," which appeared at Paris in 1665, in which year he died.

HOLDER (hold'er), WILHELM, who belonged to the order of the Minorites, was born in 1542, at Marbach. He devoted himself to philosophy and theology. He wrote against the scholasticism of his age, and he also issued a work on the mass and baptism. He turned his attention to cases of conscience also, and published a work on "Difficulties and the Resolution of Serious Doubts in Religion." He died in 1609.

HOLDHEIM (hōld'hīm), SAMUEL, who became one of the most influential of all the modern reformers among the Jews, was born in 1806, in Prussia. He studied at Prague and Berlin, devoting much attention to the Talmud. He settled at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, whence he was removed to Mecklenburg-Schwerin as chief rabbi. He labored here assiduously for the reform of the Jewish ritual, dealing freely with circumcision, marriage and other matters of weighty moment in Jewish law and practice. He was removed to Berlin in 1847 by the reform party in that city, where he continued to disseminate his views until his death, in 1860. He has been aptly characterized by a brother rabbi as "the great master in Israel, the high-priest of Jewish theological science and the lion in the contest for light and truth."

HOLDSWORTH (hōldz'wūth), OLDSWORTH, or OLDISWORTH, RICHARD, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in 1590. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he afterward became a Fellow. He was subsequently professor of divinity at Gresham College, archdeacon of Huntingdon and master of Emmanuel College. He was a very popular preacher, and was much followed by the Puritans; but when the rebellion broke out, he adhered to the cause of Charles I., and on account of his loyalty was sent to the Tower, where he died of grief after the king's execution, in 1649.

HOLE, MATHEW, D.D., Fellow of Exeter College and prebendary of Wells, was born in 1640. He was the author of some of the best sermons in the language on the liturgy and on general subjects. He died in 1730.

HOLGATE (hol'gate), who rose to be archbishop of York under the reign of the young reforming king Edward VI., was seized and imprisoned in the Tower under Mary, who had previously silenced him. He escaped more easily than his friends anticipated, for he was only held from October 4, 1553, until January 18, 1554, when he was pardoned and set at liberty.

HOLINESS (ho'le-ness), the perfectly pure rectitude of God, being that excellent attribute of his which is opposed to evil or sin. In created beings holiness may be regarded as such a conformity to the nature and will of God as evidences itself in purity of conduct. Holiness is predicated of the Deity, Ps. xxii. 3; cxiv. 17; Isa. lvii. 15, and distributively of the Father, John xvii. 11; of the Son, Luke i. 35; Acts ii. 27; iii. 14; iv. 30; of the Spirit, i. 2. 5; 2 Cor. xiii. 14. So angels are called holy, Matt. xxv. 31, and their holiness is a perfect holiness. Holiness is ascribed to men, to such as are sanctified by the Holy Ghost, their hearts being renewed and cleansed, Heb. iii. 1, comp. Gal. v. 22-25; and though perfect holiness is not attained in this sinful world, it is set before the believer as the privileged state to which he is called, 1 Thess. iv. 7; 1 Pet. ii. 9, as the end to which he is to aspire, i. 15, 16. So prophets are called holy, Luke i. 70; also apostles, Eph. iii. 5, and the brethren generally, 1 Thess. v. 27. The term is descriptive of persons and things dedicated to God, Ex. xxx. 25, 35; Luke ii. 23; 1 Cor. vii. 14. It denotes, therefore, sometimes what men ought to be, rather than what they are, Num. xvi. 3; and in the sense of dedication or consecration to a holy purpose, or as a means of worshiping God or leading men to him, the word is applied to a multitude of things—to the Scriptures, Rom. i. 3, the Sabbath, Ex. xvi. 23, the ark of the covenant, 2 Chr. xxxv. 3, the furniture of the tabernacle and temple, 1 Ki. viii. 4, the city of Jerusalem, Matt. xxvii. 53, the temple, Jon. ii. 4, etc. And specially the inner part of the tabernacle and temple was regarded as holy, and that beyond the inner veil as the holy of holies, Heb. ix. 2, 3, 24. The name of God, too, was peculiarly holy, Ps. cxi. 9. Sometimes the term means pure, chaste, undefiled, 1 Sam. xxi. 5; Rom. xvi. 16. Several words, especially in the New Testament, are used which present different shades of meaning, but in which holiness is the fundamental idea. Holiness of heart and life is inculcated upon Christians, whom God would have to be "holy and without blame before him," Eph. i. 4.

HOLLAND (hol'land), GUIDO, a Jesuit and Roman Catholic missionary of England, was born about 1587, in Lincoln. After graduating at the university of Cambridge, he pursued a course of theology in Spain, where he also became a Jesuit, and returned to his native country as a Romish missionary. He wrote "Prærogativa naturæ humanæ," a treatise on the immortality of the soul. He died November 26, 1660.

HOLLAND, THOMAS, a learned divine of England, was born in 1539, at Ludlow, in Shropshire. He graduated at Exeter College, Oxford, and was afterward honored by the appointment of regius professor—a position in which he notably displayed that broad and profound scholarship for which he was universally esteemed. He was zealous in the cause of Protestantism, and labored assiduously to rid the university of all papists and their sympathizers—a task which in that early period of Protestantism was by no means easy. He died March 17, 1612.

HOLLAZ (hol'laz), DAVID, a German divine of the Lutheran Church, was born in 1648, at Wulkow, near Stargard. After graduating at the university of Wittenberg, he was successively pastor of Putzerkin, near Stargard, co-rector of Stargard, rector of Colberg, and provost and pastor of Jakobshagen. Among his numerous writings, that which enjoyed the greatest popularity is entitled "A Theological Examination of Polemical Divinity." This work is characterized by a most liberal spirit, and its orthodoxy is unquestionable. He died in 1713.

HOLLEBECK (hol'le-bek), EWALD, a theologian of Holland, was born in 1719 at Hamstede. He graduated at the university of Leyden, where he afterward held the chair of theology. He specially deserves notice here as the first to do away with the old exegetical mode of preaching, substituting in its stead the more acceptable and profitable mode now generally adopted, of making the sermon a means of doing practical good to the people. As a recognition of his efforts he was made rector of his university. He died October 24, 1796.

HOLLESHOW (hol'le-show), JOHANN VON, a monk of the Benedictine order who chiefly contributed to the execution of John Huss, was born in 1366, at Holleshow, in Bohemia. The Hussites afterward retaliated for the part he had taken by destroying the monastery to which he belonged. He died in 1436.

HOLLMAN (höl'man), SAMUEL CHRISTIAN, a theologian of eminence in Germany, was born December 3, 1696, at Stettin. He graduated at the university of Wittenberg, in which he was a short time after professor of philosophy, and was then called to the university of Göttingen. His life was spent chiefly in philosophical studies, and he wrote several works, the most important of which are "Harmony between Mental and Bodily Excellence," "Institutes of Philosophy," "Institutes of Pneumatology and Natural Theology." He died in 1787.

HOLM (hōm), PETER, JR., a Danish theologian, was born June 6, 1706, at Moun, Norway. After graduating at the university of Copenhagen, he became professor of theology and philosophy, giving instruction, at the same time, in Hebrew and Greek, and assisting in revising the Danish version of the Bible. He died June 9, 1777.

HOLMES (hōmz), ABIEL, D.D., an American Congregational minister, was born December 24, 1763, in Woodstock, Connecticut. He graduated at Yale College, and began his ministry in Midway, Georgia, whence he removed to Cambridge, Massachusetts, where he continued as pastor of the First Church until 1831. His best known publications are "Life of President Stiles," "American Annals," "Historical Sketch of the English Translations of the Bible." He died June 4, 1837.

HOLMES, ROBERT, D.D., a learned divine, was born in Hampshire in 1749, and educated at Winchester school and New College, Oxford. In 1790 he succeeded Thomas Warton as professor of poetry in that university. He became rector of Staunton, canon of Salisbury, canon of Christ Church, and in 1804 dean of Winchester. He died in 1805 at Oxford. He published "The Resurrection of the Body deduced from the Resurrection of Christ," "Alfred, an Ode," in imitation of Gray's style, the Bampton lectures "On the Prophecies and Testimony of John the Baptist and the parallel Prophecies of Jesus Christ," four tracts on the "Principles of Religion as a Test of Divine Authority," on the "Principles of Redemption," on the "Angelical Message of the Virgin Mary," and on the "Resurrection of the Body, with a Discourse on Humility." The great work on which his reputation depends is his collation of the Septuagint. As early as 1788 he had published at Oxford proposals for a collation of all the known manuscripts of the Septuagint—a labor which had never yet been undertaken on an extensive scale, and the want of which had long been felt among Biblical scholars. His undertaking was promoted by the delegates of the Clarendon Press. In addition to the learned editor's own labors, literary men were engaged in different parts of the Continent for the business of collation, and Dr. Holmes annually published an account of the progress which was made. In 1798 he published at Oxford the book of Genesis, which was successively followed by the other books of the Pentateuch, making together one folio volume, with one title-page and one general preface. From this preface it appears that eleven Greek manuscripts in uncial letters and more than one hundred manuscripts in cursive writing—containing either the whole or parts of the Pentateuch—were collated for this edition. The text of this edition being a copy of the Roman edition of 1587, the deviations from it which occur in three other cardinal editions—the Complutensian, the Aldine and Græbe's—are constantly noted. The quotations found in the works of the Greek Fathers are likewise alleged, and finally the various readings of the ancient versions which were made from the Septuagint. The plan of this edition thus bore a close resemblance to what had been already applied by Mill, Wetstein and Griesbach to the criticism of the Greek Testament, and the execution of it has been highly commended as displaying uncommon industry and apparently great accuracy. The learned editor died in the midst of his honorable labor in the year 1806, but shortly before his death he published the book of Daniel both according to the Septuagint version and that of Theodotion, the latter having only been printed in former editions because the Septuagint translation of this book is not contained in the common manuscripts, and was unknown till it was printed in 1772 from a manuscript belonging to Cardinal Chigi. The work was continued by the Rev. J. Parsons, B.D., and completed on the original editor's plan in the year 1827. Notwithstanding the high opinion which contemporary critics formed of this edition of the Septuagint, Tischendorf complains of the work having been done in a careless and inaccurate manner.

HOLMPATRICK (hōm-pat'rik), COUNCIL OF, was held in 1148, at Holmpatrick, an island near the eastern coast of Ireland. It was called to deliberate upon granting the pall to the archbishops of Armagh and Cashel. After meeting for four days, a petition to the pope was adopted in favor of the proposed grant.

HOLM TREE, Hist. Susan., ver. 58, probably a species of oak, the Quercus coccifera.

HOLOBOLUS (ho-lo-bo'lus), MANUEL, a Byzantine prelate of the third century who, having declaimed against the cruelties inflicted on John Lascaris by the emperor Michael Paleologus, had his nose and lips cut off by order of the latter. Retiring to a monastery, he there became so eminent for his learning that the patriarch of Constantinople obtained his pardon; but having opposed the views of the emperor respecting the union of the Greek and Latin Churches, he was led through the streets of the city with a cord round his neck.

HOLOCAUST (ho'lo-kaust). See SACRIFICE.

HOLOFERNES (hol-o-fer'nez). This name occurs only in the Apocrypha, Judith ii. 4. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Nineveh, having resolved to avenge himself on all the earth, appointed Holofernes general of the expedition intended for this purpose. Holofernes marched westward and southward, carrying devastation everywhere he came. Having reached Esdraelon, he encamped between Geba and Scythopolis a whole month to collect his forces. The Jews, however, resolved to resist him, and fortified all the mountain passes. Dissuaded by Achior, captain of the sons of Ammon, from attacking the Jews, he resented the advice, and delivered Achior into the hands of the Jews in Bethulia, from whom, however, he met with a kind reception. Holofernes proceeded against Bethulia, where he was brought to bay, and instead of attacking it, seized upon two wells on which the city depended for water, and sat down before it to take it by siege. While here, he fell a victim to the treachery of Judith, a beautiful Jewish widow, who artfully managed to be brought into his presence, and who, by playing the hypocrite, secured his favor and confidence. Having invited her to a banquet, he drank freely, and having fallen asleep, fell beneath the arm of his fair guest, who cut off his head with his own sword, and escaped with her bloody trophy to her own people in Bethulia. The Jews immediately fell on their enemies, who, finding their general dead in his tent, fled in confusion. Such is the story. It is scarcely necessary to add that it is wholly unhistorical.

HOLOMERIANS. See SPIRITUALISM.

HOLON (ho'lon), a town the name of which occurs in the enumeration of the places set apart as "the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Judah according to their families," Josh. xv. 20, and one of a number of towns in the mountains of Judah, Josh. xv. 51. In 1 Chr. vi. 58 the name is written Hilen. 2. Also one of a number of cities in "the plain country" or level districts of Moab, east of the Jordan. Jeremiah mentions it as one of the cities on which judgment had come, Jer. xlviii. 21. Both localities are now unknown.

HOLY CANDLE, the candle used in the Romish form of blessing the dying and the dead.

HOLY CITY. See JERUSALEM.

HOLY CROSS, INVENTION OF, the feast which commemorates the day on which the cross was said to have been discovered by St. Helena—i. e., May 3d, A. D. 326. The term "invention" has its original signification of "found" or "discovered."

HOLY DOORS, the doors which separate the choir from the sanctuary of an Eastern church.

HOLY FAMILY. When art was used to depict Scriptural subjects, the family at Nazareth was felt to be a most attractive one. At first, when the object was to stimulate devotion, the Virgin and Child only were represented. "At a later period," as has been said by an art critic, "Joseph, Elizabeth, St. Anna (the mother of the Virgin) and John the Baptist were included. Some of the old German painters added the apostles as playfellows of the infant Christ, as well as their mothers, as stated in the legends. The Italian school, with its fine feeling for composition, was the first to recognize how many figures the group must comprise if the interest is to be concentrated on the Madonna or Child."

HOLY GHOST. The distinctive name of the third Person of the blessed Trinity, called also the "Holy Spirit," the "Spirit of God," the "Comforter," and with various attributive additions to the word Spirit, as the "Spirit of adoption," etc.

The name Spirit is given to this divine Person not simply as if he alone of the Sacred Three were a spirit, but as specially indicating his relation to the Father and the Son, from whom he is breathed forth, emanates, eternally proceeds, and as being the Agent of divine operation upon men, the breath of grace, John xx. 22, like the wind, blowing where it listeth, communicating the heavenly gift. He is called "holy," both as in himself essentially holy and also as the worker of holiness in men, the sanctifier of God's Church.

The personality and the Deity of the Holy Ghost are abundantly proved in Scripture; for just as the Father and the Son are known to be persons by the operations and the power ascribed to them, so is the Holy Ghost distinctly said to work, to be sent, to come, to will, to have a mind that is known of God, etc., John xvi. 7-15; Rom. viii. 26, 27; 1 Cor. xii. 11. Such expressions would be improper and unintelligible if the Holy Ghost were but a quality. See also Matt. iii. 16, 17. Again, he speaks by the prophets, Acts xxviii. 25; 1 Tim. iv. 1; he teaches, Luke xii. 12; he may be grieved, Eph. iv. 30; and he is joined with, and yet distinguished from, the Father and the Son in the form prescribed of Christian baptism, Matt. xxviii. 19. This last text alone would prove that if the Father and Son are persons, so is the Holy Ghost. As to his Deity, he is called "God," Acts v. 3, 4; and the body of the believer is called the "temple of God" because the Holy Ghost dwells therein, 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; vi. 10; 2 Cor. vi. 15. This last argument Augustine thinks very convincing, and says that if we were commanded to build him a temple, like Solomon, of wood and stone, it would show that we were to pay him divine worship; but far more must this be when we do not make him a temple, but are his temple. Still further, he may be sinned against; and sin against the Holy Ghost hath no forgiveness, Matt. xii. 31, 32. From this his essential Deity is easily concluded. Sin against the Holy Ghost, it may be added, is so fatal because it is sin against Him who alone communicates spiritual life; it is a refusal, therefore, of the means of salvation, a rejection of that gracious agency by which men are brought to avail themselves of the precious blood-shedding of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is not that coming to Christ they are refused, but that they will not come to him. See BLASPHEMY.

The Holy Ghost is said to proceed from the Father and the Son. He is distinctly said to proceed from the Father, John xv. 26, and as distinctly is termed the Spirit of the Son, Gal. iv. 6.

On this point there has been a difference in the teaching of the Eastern and Western Churches.

In the Western Church the clause which declares in the creed that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son appears to have been first used in Spain (see FILIOQUE), as it was not contained in the early creed. In A. D. 381 the Council of Constantinople added to the old formula, "We believe also in the Holy Ghost," the expression "who proceedeth from the Father." The Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451, left the clause as thus enlarged, and only when the Council of Toledo, in A. D. 447, sanctioned the addition "and from the Son," which had been in use in Spain for some years, was there any formal authority given, even in the Western Church, for the clause as it now stands in the creed. The Western Church objected to the usage, and in the seventh and ninth centuries the controversies between the East and West on this point were of the most violent character. At length, in the eleventh century, an entire separation took place, and among the causes which led to it this was one of the most influential.

The reason for the admission of the clause as it appears in the creed of the Western Church may be briefly given. In Scripture it is clearly taught that Christ is divine, or the Son by an eternal filiation; so the Holy Ghost, who proceedeth from the Father, must also proceed from the Son, for the Son sendeth him, John xv. 26. On this point Bishop Pearson has well said: "Though it be not expressly spoken in the Scripture that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son, yet the substance of the same truth is contained there; because those very expressions which are spoken of the Holy Spirit in relation to the Father, for the very reason that he proceedeth from the Father, are also spoken of the same Spirit in relation to the Son; therefore there must be the same reason presupposed in reference to the Son which is expressed in reference to the Father. Because the Spirit proceedeth from the Father, it is therefore called 'the Spirit of God' and 'the Spirit of the Father,' Matt. x. 20; 1 Cor. ii. 11, 12. Now, the same Spirit is also called 'the Spirit of the Son,' Gal. iv. 6; 'the Spirit of Christ,' Rom. viii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 11; Phil. i. 19. If, then, the Holy Ghost be called 'the Spirit of the Father' because he proceedeth from the Father, it followeth that, being called also 'the Spirit of the Son,' he proceedeth also from the Son. . . . The Father is never sent by the Son, because he received not the Godhead from him; but the Father sendeth the Son, because he communicated the Godhead to him; in the same manner, neither the Father nor the Son is ever sent by the Holy Spirit, because neither of them received the divine nature from the Holy Spirit; but both the Father and the Son send the Holy Ghost, because the divine nature common to the Father and the Son was communicated by them both to the Holy Ghost. As, therefore, the Scriptures declare expressly that the Spirit proceedeth from the Father, so do they also virtually teach that he proceedeth from the Son."

The relation of the Spirit's work to the Son's, as unfolded in New Testament Scripture, may readily be inferred from the places they respectively occupy in the progressive evolution of the divine plan. The one, in point of time, takes precedence of the other, while without this other to follow it up and turn it to practical account, the former would remain disappointed of its aim. Christ's work provides the materials of salvation, or lays open the sources of life and blessing; the Spirit's work applies what is provided to the souls of men, and renders it effectual in their experience. Hence, in so far as the Spirit works to saving purposes, "he takes of Christ's and shows it unto men," John xvi. 15. He has nothing of his own to bring, for all is already Christ's, even all that is the Father's, and the salvation he effects consists simply and exclusively in making men sincerely responsive to the call of Christ, and participant of the benefits secured for them by his obedience unto death. The Holy Ghost, therefore, was not and could not be given (namely, after the way and measure of New Testament times) till Christ had finished his work on earth and entered into his glory, John vii. 39. But on the other hand, from the time that Christ's glorification commenced the Holy Ghost could not fail to be given; the materials were now all prepared for his peculiar agency, and to have left them without the saving application for which they were intended would have been to mar the glory of Christ. It is henceforth the dispensation of the Spirit, 2 Cor. iii. 8, 17, as contradistinguished not only from the ministration or covenant of law in former times, but also from the personal ministration of Christ in the days of his flesh, and doing for his people the work of a servant. On this account the Fathers sometimes called the Acts of the Apostles "the gospel of the Holy Ghost"—indicating, even under a wrong title, a right feeling as to the relation of the Spirit's work to Christ's. He only who has received the gift of the Spirit, and with the baptism thereof has been born again to God, has a right to a place in the household of faith, Acts xix. 1-5; 1 Cor. xii. 3, 13; for he alone knows spiritually the things of God, and has the standing, the life, the liberty, of his children, 1 Cor. ii. 12-15; Rom. viii. 9; 2 Cor. iii. 17. The immediate relation of such a one to the Godhead is through the Spirit—"he lives in the Spirit and walks in the Spirit;" he is himself "an habitation of God through the Spirit," or, as it is otherwise expressed, "his body is the temple of the Holy Ghost," Gal. v. 25; Eph. ii. 22; 1 Cor. vi. 19. And to the operation of the Spirit in his soul are to be ascribed all the gifts and graces which distinguish his character and adorn his life; so that while they are his in possession and exercise, as to efficacious working and moral worth they are the Spirit's, 1 Cor. xii. 11; Gal. v. 22; Phil. ii. 13.

It is, however, to be carefully borne in mind that the distinction belonging in this respect to New Testament times is relative only, and not absolute. As prior to the appearance of Christ his work was anticipated in the efficacy that was imputed through the divine foreknowledge to services that were of no intrinsic value in themselves, and the pardon that was granted to believers, Rom. iii. 25; Heb. ix. 15, 26; xi. 40; so also was it with the work of the Spirit. Wherever there was a true believer there was a work of the Spirit, though imperfectly developed and carried on as in a mystery. Neither was all law in former times, nor now is all Spirit. The same elements belong to both, but the relations of the two have changed with the advance in the divine dispensations; the law formerly occupied the foreground, the Spirit the background, in the believer's condition, while now it is the reverse—the Spirit is in the foreground, the law in the background. But there is no contrariety, for in scope and character law and Spirit are one—alike "holy, just and good." And the men who were pre-eminently the law's representatives, expounders and advocates—the prophets of the old dispensation—were also the men who were most replenished with the Holy Spirit; simply as moved and guided by him they saw the visions and uttered the words of God, 2 Sam. xxiii. 2; Isa. lxi. 1; Ezek. viii. 3; 2 Pet. i. 21, etc.

HOLY OFFICE, a title of the Inquisition.

HOLY OIL, oil blessed and brought from Jerusalem to Europe. It was carried in cotton within small vials, and distributed among the faithful.

As the superstitious regard for relics increased oil blessed at the tombs of saints began to be appreciated; and oil taken from lamps which burned before the graves of martyrs in the catacombs was also called "holy oil."

HOLY ORDER. In the Romish Church the ordination of priests has been counted among the five lesser sacraments of the Church. The "character" which is given in ordination is held to be indelible. This Church has seven degrees of orders, priests, deacons and sub-deacons being esteemed holy orders, the rest minor orders. The Sundays following the four ember seasons [see EMBER WEEKS] are appointed for ordinations.

HOLY ROOD, the name of the large cross often raised in churches. In cathedrals and large churches it stood on the "rood loft," which was usually over the entrance to the choir, on the top of the choir-screen, and thus it was visible to all who stood in the nave.

HOLY SEPULCHRE. The place of the Crucifixion, according to Luke, was called Calvary. Matthew, Mark and John call it Golgotha, and John says: "Now, in the place where he was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre wherein was never man laid; there they laid Jesus therefore because of the Jews' preparation day, for the sepulchre was nigh at hand," John xix. 41, 42. We are further told, Heb. xiii. 12, that Jesus was crucified "without the gate" of Jerusalem, "nigh to the city," John xix. 20, and apparently near some public thoroughfare, Matt. xxvii. 39, and that the sepulchre in the garden where his body was laid was hewn out of a rock, Mark xv. 46. Such is all the information which the New Testament presents respecting the locality in which the Crucifixion and Burial of Jesus took place. The modern traveler on reaching Jerusalem, when he finds the "Holy Sepulchre" in a church, not "nigh" but actually a considerable distance within the city, is at once prepared to receive with caution the statements that are made by the guardians of the "holy" places respecting all the localities which are grouped together in a very remarkable proximity. That the Crucifixion took place without the second wall, in a locality where people could easily assemble in numbers and witness an execution, is undoubted, and that the place is apparently toward the north-west of the city is also admitted. The place on which the Church of the Holy Sepulchre now stands lies far within the range of the third wall, which was built by Agrippa only eleven years subsequent to the Crucifixion, and this wall enclosed a large suburb which had extended beyond the second wall of the city, but any person acquainted with the manner in which suburbs extend, will admit that there may have been a space lying outside the second wall on which the Crucifixion took place, and which, eleven years afterward, was enclosed by the wall of Agrippa. The real difficulty lies in the fact that the range of the second wall cannot be accurately determined. The modern city does not actually cover the site of the old city. Much of Zion on the south has been deserted, and the streets and houses have been carried farther to the north-west. That the second wall commenced at the gate Gennath in the northern wall of Zion, and that this gate was near the tower of Hippicus, and that it ran so as to include the pool of Hezekiah, is known, but still the actual range of the wall cannot be determined. Ancient foundations are found within the present wall at the Damascus gate, and also near the Latin convent: and if these belonged to the second wall, then the present Church of the Sepulchre could not include the place of Christ's crucifixion or his burial. On one side of this controversy, the "Holy City" by Williams, and "Jerusalem" by D. Vogue, present the arguments, which in a most forcible manner go to show, that the present Church of the Sepulchre is erected on the place of the Crucifixion, and the "Researches" of Dr. Robinson, and the various works of Fergusson, may be read on the other side.

No one will deny that the apostles, and their early followers who dwelt at Jerusalem, knew the place where their Master was crucified and the place where he was buried, but there is no evidence that in the apostolic age any idea of sanctity was attached to these localities. The whole teaching of the apostles tended to withdraw men from reverencing times, places and physical objects, and to lead them to worship God in spirit and in truth. Thus it was with Paul, and John, who wrote his Gospel toward the close of the first century, or from sixty to seventy years after the Crucifixion, only alludes to the Sepulchre in general terms. As yet it is evident that no honor was given to "holy" places. In A. D. 70 the city was captured and all destroyed, with the exception of a section of the wall of Zion. The Christians fled over the Jordan to Pella, and when they returned is uncertain. In A. D. 132 Hadrian rebuilt the city, and shortly afterward, in a rebellion, it was captured by the Jews, but in A. D. 135 it was retaken, fortified and adorned with temples by the Romans. During all this time the Christians only lived on sufferance, and all the localities around the ancient walls must have been greatly changed in their appearance.

Not until the fourth century, or about three hundred years after the Crucifixion, do we find any reference in history to the site of the Holy Sepulchre. Eusebius informs us "that impious men, or rather the whole race of demons through the agency of impious men, had labored to deliver over that illustrious monument of immortality (the Holy Sepulchre) to darkness and oblivion." They had covered the Sepulchre, it seems, with earth brought from other places, and had erected over it a temple of Venus. Jerome, who wrote toward the close of the fourth century, says that this temple was built by Hadrian, that a marble statue of the goddess was set up on the Rock of the Cross, and an image of Jupiter over the place of the Resurrection. Socrates, who wrote fifty years later, is still more explicit, for he says, "Those who followed the faith of Christ after his death rendered to that monument (the Sepulchre) the highest honor;" and Sozomen, a still later authority, states that the enemies of Christianity set up this statue of Venus in order that Christians who came to worship at the Sepulchre might have the appearance of worshiping that goddess. These statements evidently show that a spirit had arisen in the Church of a different character from that of the apostolic age, and that a critical examination of evidence and an earnest demand for indubitable proof was not likely to prevail against those who sought to gratify the taste of inquirers after sacred scenes.

In his life of Constantine, Eusebius tells us that the emperor, "not without a divine admonition, the Saviour himself prompting him," became desirous of performing "a glorious work" in Palestine by beautifying and rendering sacred the place of the Resurrection of our Lord. He caused the sanctuary of Venus to be removed, the earth and stone to be cast aside, and the holy cave laid bare. It was then purified and adorned with splendid buildings. The emperor, in his letter to Macarius, speaks of the discovery of "the sign of the Saviour's most sacred Passion, which had so long been hidden below the ground," as "a miracle beyond the capacity of man sufficiently to celebrate, or even to comprehend." The buildings were completed and dedicated in the thirtieth year of his reign, A. D. 335. A council of bishops was held at Tyre by order of the emperor, and they assembled from all the provinces. They adjourned to Jerusalem, and Eusebius himself, who was in the council, delivered several public discourses in connection with the dedication. So Eusebius, who was an eye-witness, and who took part in the proceedings, has recorded, and yet succeeding historians give an entirely different version of the facts and incidents. The writers of the next century all state that it was Helena, the mother of Constantine, who was directed to search for and find the Holy Sepulchre, the True Cross and the different minute localities connected with our Lord's Crucifixion and Burial. After a tedious, difficult search she discovered the Sepulchre, and by its side three crosses, with the tablet bearing the inscription. In order to discover the real Cross of Christ, they were all taken, by the advice of Macarius the bishop, to a lady in Jerusalem who was sick of an incurable disease. Two of the crosses were presented to her without any effect; but when the third was brought near, she opened her eyes, recovered her strength and sprang from her bed in the enjoyment of health. Thus it was Helena, according to later writers, and not Constantine, who caused the church to be erected and the holy places adorned.

That a sepulchre was found and a church was erected at this time is undoubted. The buildings are described by Eusebius. An open paved area with cloisters appears to have been around the tomb, and on the east stood a great basilica, oblong, and having double aisles on each side of the nave or main body of the church. A vaulted apse, supported by twelve columns having silver capitals, occupied the centre of the western end, and opposite, or at the east, was a triple doorway. The interior was adorned with marbles, and the church, as it stood on the place of our Lord's Passion, was called the "Martyrion," and the chapel at the Sepulchre was called the "Anastasis" or "Resurrection." The Martyrion was destroyed by the Persians A. D. 614.

In about sixteen years new buildings were erected on a plan which differed considerably from the former structure, one object being to gratify a desire to include additional "holy places," which were now found around the Sepulchre. Areulf, who visited Jerusalem in the seventh century, describes these buildings, and it is evident that by his time the work of discovery and invention had rapidly advanced. In 1010 Hakim destroyed these buildings, and about forty years subsequently they were rebuilt. In the twelfth century Sæwulf, an English monk who had accompanied the Crusaders, describes them, and he also shows that the work of discovering additional "holy places" was still going on. For instance, the prison where our Lord was confined, the place where he was stripped, where the purple robe was put on him, where the soldiers cast lots, the rent made in the rock by the earthquake, where Adam was raised from the dead, where the Body was wrapped in the linen clothes, where he indicated with his own hand the centre of the world, where he appeared to Mary Magdalene and where the Virgin stood during the Crucifixion, were now all "invented" and shown.

The Crusaders, who took Jerusalem in 1099, remodeled the buildings and added several new shrines. Thus changed and enlarged, they continued as the Crusaders left them until they were considerably injured by fire in 1808. Permission was obtained from the porte with great difficulty to restore the church, and under Comenes, a Greek architect, the work was finished and the church consecrated in 1810.

The church itself, in external appearance and internal arrangements, is altogether different from edifices designed for general religious services. A large part is held by the Greeks. The Latins or the members of the Romish Church have a part which they own. So also the Syrians, the Copts and the Armenians. In addition to the "chapels" of these branches of the church, there are chapels of the Angel, of Longinus, of Helena, of the Mocking, of Notre Dame des Douleurs, of Adam, of the Invention of the Cross, of Golgotha, of the Elevation of the Cross and of the Crucifixion, and even a place is found for the tomb of Melchizedek. The place shown as the Holy Sepulchre is in a large dome at the western end of the great church. The sepulchre is covered by a building twenty-six feet long by eighteen feet broad. It is cased in yellow and white stone, ornamented with semi-columns and pilasters, and surmounted by a dome resembling a crown. The entrance is on the east, where a low door opens into the first apartment, called the Chapel of the Angel; for it is said that here the angel sat on the stone which had been rolled away from the door of the sepulchre. A fragment of this stone is placed on a pedestal in the middle of the floor, but it is asserted that the Armenians stole the real stone, and that it is in the chapel of the palace of Caiaphas, outside of the Zion gate. Through a door on the western side of this antechamber visitors enter the "Sepulchre," a small quadrangular vault about six by seven feet, covered with a dome roof upheld by short marble pillars. On the right side of the entrance is the couch, about two feet above the floor, and covered with a slab of white marble, which is cracked and worn by the lips of pilgrims. The slab is used as an altar, and it is ornamented with pictures. There are forty-three lamps of silver and gold kept burning over this shrine. The vault is said to have been hewn in the rock, but no vestige of rock is now visible, as tomb, walls and all around are marble, and incense, long burned in the place, has blackened the upper part and made it invisible. Such is the Sepulchre.

Want of space will prevent a detailed criticism of the claims which have been put forth by the "inventors" and managers of these "sacred places," and even an enumeration of the glaring absurdities which have been associated with this place cannot be attempted. One "miracle," however, cannot be passed by. It is affirmed that on Easter eve of each returning year a flame descends from heaven into the Holy Sepulchre, kindling all the lamps and candles there, as it did of yore Elijah's sacrifice on Carmel. At the prescribed time the Greek patriarch enters the tomb alone, and the fire, soon appearing, is given out to the expectant and excited multitude through a hole in the wall.

All the churches originally were engaged about this holy fire, but one by one they have fallen away. When the Roman Catholics were expelled by the Greeks, they denounced it as an imposture, and the Armenians likewise gave it up as a fraud. It is now believed that the Greeks would abandon it if they knew how to avoid the shock which their followers would experience at the cessation of a miracle which has continued for a thousand years. The effect of the imposture is most degrading. It makes the clergy, high and low, deliberate impostors, and it tends to convert that system of pure religion which Christ came to establish into a fraudulent, debasing superstition.

The Turks are obliged to maintain an armed guard at the sepulchre to preserve the peace among the rival sects who contend for mastery here. Frequently scenes of bloodshed and loss of life occur. At a fearful struggle which took place in 1834, which is described by Curzon in his "Monasteries of the Levant," 400 persons lost their lives, and it is fully time for one or other of the enlightened nations of the world to interfere and put an end to these enormities, which are a disgrace to the Christian name.

HOLY SYNOD is the title usually claimed and given to the highest governing body in the Greek Church.

HOLY TABLE. A distinction between this term and altar is thus made by Romanists—when the Eucharist is viewed as a sacrament, it is called the holy table, and an altar when it is viewed as a sacrifice.

HOLY THURSDAY, called ASCENSION DAY, as it is observed in commemoration of our Lord's Ascension. In the Romish calendar it is the thirty-ninth day after Easter Sunday.

HOLY WATER, water blessed by a priest and placed at the entrance of churches. Before high mass it is customary to sprinkle it over the people. It is used in the Romish, Greek and Eastern Churches. It was originally introduced and used as an emblem of purity in the early Church, but it was also considered efficacious in exorcising devils and evil spirits. The canon law orders salt to be put in the water. At present it is held in high esteem by Romanists, who often carry it to their homes for special uses in the most superstitious manner. The Greeks do not put salt into their holy water, as they are contented with the consecration of the element by the bishop, and the Armenians make their water holy by plunging a cross into it on Epiphany day, at which time they make large offerings to their clergy.

HOLY WEEK. The last week in Lent has been thus called. It has also been called PASSION WEEK. In the usages of the Romish Church the services assume a peculiarly solemn character. Ornaments are removed from altars, instrumental music is dispensed with, pictures and images are covered, and all festivals which fall in that week are deferred until after Easter. The important days of this week are Palm Sunday, Spy Wednesday, Holy or Maundy Thursday, Good Friday and Holy Saturday. Maundy or Holy Thursday is set apart as the day of commemoration of the institution of the Lord's Supper. On all these days services of a symbolical character are observed.

HOMILETICS (hom-il-et'ics) is a term which has come into use in theological language, and which is applied to that department of study which is connected with preaching. It is derived from a Greek word which means "conversation or address," and the word is of more general use in the United States than in Great Britain. As theology became the subject of critical study, the leading branches soon received special names. Thus to apologetics, or the argument on behalf of revelation and the authenticity and inspiration of the text, together with the history of the canon, was assigned a distinct place. Dogmatics, or the exposition of the doctrines of revelation, in their actual matter and relations, was also marked out, hermeneutics or the department of textual criticism, and polemics or the literature of controversial theology, were distinguished from each other. To the department of homiletics belong such matters as bear on preparation for all forms of pulpit addresses, sermons, lectures and the ministration of the word. A course on homiletics would include a history of the pulpit—the pulpit of different lands and ages—the construction of sermons and the most effective means of reaching the masses in the preaching of the gospel.

HOMILIARE (ho-mil'e-a'r), or HOMILIARIUS (ho-mil-e-ah're-us), a collection of homilies of the Fathers which were read on Sunday and on holy days.

HOMILIARIUM. See HOMILY.

HOMILY is the name given to a class of pulpit address or sermon in which the chief aim is the discussion or opening up of the meaning of a text or passage. It resembles the address which is known by the term "lecture" more than the discourse which is called a "sermon." The sermon is more formal, more logical in arrangement, is expository of a topic, doctrine, duty or principle, and it is closed with an application. Among the Jews, when the Scriptures were read in their synagogues, it was customary to invite persons who were present, and especially any important strangers, to comment on the lesson which had been read. Jesus availed himself of such opportunities, and Paul, Peter and Stephen also used this privilege. Such addresses did not assume the form of a modern sermon. In the early Greek Church addresses adhered to the homiletic class rather than to the sermonizing form, and in the use of language the fact that many of the preachers came from different philosophical heathen schools is obvious. The form of address in the early Latin Church was modeled after the Greek, and the want of education among many of the clergy told on the style of their addresses. In England, during Anglo-Saxon times, there were many of the clergy who knew no Latin, and for their use homilies were constructed by those who had some learning. Alfric, the archbishop of Canterbury toward the close of the tenth century, prepared eighty homilies for such use; and there is an especial value in these and other homilies of the Anglo-Saxon period for the evidence that they afford to prove that the peculiar doctrines of Romanism were then resisted as their propagators sought to spread them abroad. Many manuscripts lately recovered show that this was the case, and in repeated instances parts are found to have been cut out by monks of a later age when the homily bore against a doctrine or a practice which had been denounced as obnoxious. In the English Church, at the Reformation, it was found that, in consequence of the widespread ignorance of the clergy, it was absolutely required that some helps should be prepared for general use where the people were left without instruction from the Word of God. A number of short discourses were prepared accordingly, and Cranmer is credited with their authorship, assisted by Ridley and Latimer. The first volume was issued in the early part of the reign of Edward VI., and the second appeared in 1563, under Elizabeth, although it was written during Edward's reign. The subjects of these discourses are as follows, viz.: 1. Of the Right Use of the Church; 2. Against Peril of Idolatry; 3. Of Repairing and Keeping Clean of Churches; 4. Of Good Works; first of Fasting; 5. Against Gluttony and Drunkenness; 6. Against Excess of Apparel; 7. Of Prayer; 8. Of Time and Place of Prayer; 9. That Common Prayers and Sacraments ought to be ministered in a Known Tongue; 10. Of the Reverend Estimation of God's Word; 11. Of Alms-doing; 12. Of the Nativity of Christ; 13. Of the Passion of Christ; 14. Of the Resurrection of Christ; 15. Of the Worthy Receiving of the Body and Blood of Christ; 16. Of the Gifts of the Holy Ghost; 17. For the Rogation Days; 18. Of the State of Matrimony; 19. Of Repentance; 20. Against Idleness; 21. Against Rebellion.

HOMINES INTELLIGENTIÆ (hom'e-nayz-in-tel-le-jen'sh'ay), "men of understanding," a heretical sect founded by Ægidius Cantor, which flourished in the Netherlands in the beginning of the fifteenth century. They denied the Resurrection, and held that there was an immediate translation to heaven. They also regarded sensual pleasures as foretastes of celestial joys, and therefore not to be prohibited. The sect was dissolved upon Hildernissen, one of their leaders, having recanted.

HOMOLOGUMENA (ho-mo-lo-goo'me-na), the name under which Eusebius includes the four Gospels, the Epistles of Paul and the First Epistles of Peter and John, which were universally recognized by the Church as having canonical authority.

HOMOIOUSIAN (ho-mo-oo'zh'an), the term applied to the doctrine concerning the Person of Christ which was established by the Council of Nice in opposition to the opinions of Arius and his fellow-heretics. See ARIANISM.

HOMPESCH (hom'pesh), FERDINAND, BARON DE, was the last invested grand master of the Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem. He was born in 1744, was of noble pedigree, and was page to the grand master Rohan, who raised him to the dignity of grand cross, and on the death of the latter he was named grand master through the influence of Austria. When, however, Bonaparte, on his way to Egypt, appeared before Malta, Hompesch made no resistance to him, though he afterward protested against the seizure, and abdicated in favor of Paul I., emperor of Russia, who paid him a pension for some years. On the withdrawal of it he fell into great indigence, and had to appeal, successfully, to the French government for help. He died in 1803.

HONE, WILLIAM, an English author, born at Bath in 1799. Bound to an attorney, he set up as a bookseller in 1800; struggled on for some years; attempted to establish a savings-bank; essayed social reforms; published unsuccessfully; was twice bankrupt; took to writing political squibs; travestied the prayer-book; was three times tried for blasphemy and acquitted. He died in 1842. Amongst his best known works are—"The Apocryphal New Testament," "Ancient Mysteries," "Every-day Book," "Table Book" and "Year Book," all of considerable value as repertoires of curious and antiquarian matter.

HONERT (hon'ert), JOHANN VAN DEN, an eminent preacher of Holland, was born December 1, 1693, near Dortrecht. He was bred a soldier, but afterward determined upon literary pursuits, and studied at the university of Leyden, in which his father was a professor. In 1718 he was pastor at Catwick, on the Rhine, afterward at Enkhuysen and at Haarlem. Later he occupied the chair of theology in the university of Utrecht, and a few years after was appointed professor of Church history. He removed thence to Leyden, where he was professor of theology and homiletics. Honert was an accomplished scholar and wrote several theological works, most of which are now out of date. He died April 7, 1758.

HONEY (hun'e). Canaan is frequently described as a land "flowing with milk and honey," Ex. iii. 8, 17; xiii. 5, and travelers now speak of the immense swarms of bees found in some rocky parts of the country. Several Hebrew words are in our version rendered "honey." Ya'ar, or ya'arav, is honey from the bee, 1 Sam. xiv. 27; Song Sol. v. 1, flowing from the combs. Nopheth is also honey dropping from the combs, and is often joined with a word signifying comb, Ps. xix. 10; Prov. v. 3; xxiv. 13; xxvii. 7; Song Sol. iv. 11. There is another term of wider signification, debash, meaning sometimes bee-honey, Deut. xxiii. 13; Prov. xvi. 24, and sometimes honey of grapes, syrup—that is, the newly-expressed juice of grapes boiled down to the half or third part. This, called dibs, is still prepared in many parts of Syria and Palestine, especially in the neighborhood of Hebron, and is in great quantities exported into Egypt. Diluted with a little water, it is frequently used instead of sugar, or as a substitute for butter, and sometimes it is applied to wounds instead of wine. The same product is likewise mentioned together with balm, Ezek. xxvii. 17, and is stated to have been sent from the land of Israel to the markets of Tyre. As Egypt abounds in excellent bee-honey, but was perhaps unacquainted with the preparation of grape jelly, the latter was appropriately chosen as a part of Jacob's present, Gen. xliii. 11. There is a vegetable honey distilling from trees found in the peninsula of Sinai. Some have supposed this the "wild honey" John Baptist ate, Matt. iii. 4, but his food was more probably the honey of wild bees. There was, still farther, a kind of honey-syrup obtained from dates. Honey was forbidden as an offering, Lev. ii. 11, most likely because it fermented. It is often joined with milk, both being natural products, and "honey and milk" are sometimes figuratively put for pleasant discourse, Song Sol. iv. 11.

prise, did not our knowledge of its divine origin permit us to suppose that even the style and mode of expression were so far controlled as to exclude what in other ages and countries might excite pain and offence, and prove an obstacle to the reception of divine truth. Nor is the usage of hyperbole of modern growth. We find it in the oldest Eastern writings which now exist, and the earlier rabbinical writings attest that, in times approaching near to those in which the writers of the New Testament flourished, the Jewish imagination had run riot in this direction, and had left hyperboles as frequent and outrageous as any which Persia or India can produce.

The strongest hyperbole in all Scripture is that with which the Gospel of John concludes: "There are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that the world itself could not contain all the books that should be written." This has so much pained many commentators that they have been disposed to regard it as an unauthorized addition to the sacred text, and to reject it accordingly. Now, this is always a dangerous process, and not to be adopted but on such overwhelming authority of collated manuscripts as does not exist in the present case. How much more natural and becoming is it to regard the verse simply as a hyperbole, so perfectly conformable to Oriental modes of expression, and to some other hyperboles which may be found interspersed in the sacred books, that the sole wonder really is that this one should be rare enough to afford ground for objection and remark!

This view of the matter might be illustrated by many examples in which we find hyperboles of the like kind and signification. In Num. xiii. 33 the spies who had returned from searching the land of Canaan say that they saw "giants there of such a prodigious-size that they were in their own sight as grasshoppers." In Deut. i. 28 cities with high walls about them are said to be walled up to heaven. In Dan. iv. 7 mention is made of a tree whereof "the height reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof unto the end of all the earth;" and the author of Ecclesiasticus, xlvii. 15, speaking of Solomon's wisdom, says, "Thy soul covered the whole earth, and thou filledst it with parables." As the world is here said to be filled with Solomon's parables, so in John xxi. 25, by one degree more of hyperbole, it is said that the world could not contain all the books that should be written concerning Jesus's miracles if a particular account of every one of them were given.

HYPERDULIA (hi-per-du'le-a), the adoration paid to the Virgin Mary in the Romish Church.

HYPERIUS (hi-pe're-us), ANDREW GERHARD, an eminent Protestant theologian, was born May 16, 1511, at Yperu, Belgium, in which city he commenced his studies. In 1532 he began to attend a course of theology; but dissatisfied with the dry scholasticism of the Sorbonne, he read in private the Fathers, especially Augustine, and made himself well acquainted with Church history and the canon law. At the conclusion of his studies he went through the Netherlands and the North of Germany, as well as Hesse and Saxony, and made the acquaintance of the Protestant theologians in Marburg, Erfurt, Wittenberg and Leipzig. Soon after, he openly joined the Reformers, and declined a lucrative post in the papal court which his friends, without his knowledge, had obtained for him. He ultimately became professor of theology at Marburg, where he died, February 1, 1564. Besides several works in theology, he prepared a commentary on the epistles of Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews, which was published after his death. This, though comparatively but little known, is one of the most valuable of the exegetical remains of the Reformers. Hyperius pursues the grammatico-historical method of interpretation, examining the meaning of the words, carefully tracing the connection of the passage, taking note of the analogy of Scripture, and so arriving at the true sense of the place. Not until he has thus done justice to the exegesis does he proceed to the dogmatical or practical use of the passage. He also frequently gives citations from the Fathers to show the agreement of his conclusions with the understanding of the ancient Church. In his "Minor Works" are to be found also some exegetical treatises.

HYPOCRITE (hip'o-krit), one who merely acts a part—that is, a dissembler in religion who has the form without the power of godliness. There are many severe censures upon hypocrites in our Lord's addresses, Matt. vi. 2, 5, 16, and elsewhere. The word rendered "hypocrite" in Job viii. 13; xiii. 16, and elsewhere, is more properly goddess, profane.

HYPOSTASIS (hi-po-stah'sis), a term applied by the Greek Fathers to signify the distinct personality of the three persons of the Godhead.

HYRCANUS. See HIRCANUS.

HYSSOP (his'sop). Until very lately it was generally agreed that this plant must be a member of the labiate family. To this extensive order, so named from its tubular lipped corolla, belong plants like thyme, lavender, rosemary, mint, sage, etc., many of them remarkable for their agreeable perfume, all of them harmless, and some of them noted for their healing properties. The hyssop "that springeth out of the wall," 1 Ki. iv. 33, would be very well represented by the common hyssop, which, besides, with its numerous small, pointed, downy leaves, is admirably adapted for sprinkling. Maimonides and those who follow Jewish tradition say that the hyssop of the Bible is an origanum (or marjoram), of common occurrence in the desert of Sinai, and with a strong straight stalk, downy leaves and white blossoms, growing freely on stony soil, dust-hills and similar places.

But for the last few years there has been a general acquiescence in the conclusion arrived at by Dr. Forbes Royle. Finding that aszef or asuf is one of the names given by the Arabs to the caper plant, it struck him that this might be identical with the esobh or esof of Scripture, and in a paper read before the Royal Asiatic Society he has brought together a great mass of ingenious evidence in support of this conclusion. Besides the apparent identity of name, the arguments in favor of the caper may be reduced to these three: 1. It occurs in Egypt, in the desert of Sinai and in Palestine. 2. By the ancients cleansing or healing properties were ascribed to it. 3. Its trailing stem would easily furnish a rod sufficiently long to convey to the lips of the dying Redeemer the restorative mentioned, John xix. 29. To these the learned author might have added that its sprawling, creeping habit, so like the bramble, makes the caper a good antithesis to the cedar: "Solomon spake of trees from the cedar to the esobh," suggesting a similar contrast in Jotham's parable: "Let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon," Jud. ix. 15.

At the same time, after carefully pondering the arguments of this able botanist, we own that we are by no means satisfied. It is true that with its bright green foliage the caper plant springs from the rocky clefts in the desert; and its thorns notwithstanding, it might suit tolerably well for a sprinkler. But would not a fragrant plant answer the purpose still better? and one, like the origanum, also a native of the same regions, which with its straight twigs could readily be formed into a "bunch," Ex. xii. 22, and the slightly villous leaves of which are excellently adapted for both taking up and freely scattering a fluid? Nor do we attach much importance to the healing or cleansing properties which are ascribed to the caper, for it would be easy to make out a still stronger case for the mints, sages and hyssops which still retain a chief place in popular pharmacy. As for the difficulty founded on John xix. 29, other evangelists mention that the sponge was affixed to a reed (calamo), Matt. xxvii. 48; Mark xv. 36. As Rosenmüller says: "The plain reason why the soldiers presented to the Redeemer a sponge dipped into vinegar, along with some hyssop, seems to be this—that sucking the vinegar from the sponge was to quench the thirst of which he complained, and the aromatic scent of the hyssop was to refresh and to strengthen him;" and the sponge with the hyssop around it was affixed to a cane or reed—not a caper stalk, but a calamus. If we accept the statement of Gesenius, there need be no difficulty: "Under this name, esobh, the Hebrews appear to have comprised, not only the common hyssop of the shops, but also other aromatic plants, especially mint, wild marjoram," etc. If so, whether in the desert or at Jerusalem, it would at all times be possible to procure the suitable herb from which to make a sprinkler. From its being associated, Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 51; Num. xix. 18, with the fragrant cedar-wood, there is an additional presumption in favor of its being some sweet-scented plant like the hyssop of the Greeks and the origanum of Jewish tradition.

HYSTASPES (his-tas'pes), a work of probably heathen origin which circulated among the early Christians, so called from its reputed author's name. The precise contents of the book are not now certainly known, but it is believed to have contained prophecies relating to Christ and his kingdom.

work of a liturgical character which answers to the Breviary in the Roman Church.

The hymnology of the Latin Church is much more limited in quantity than that of the Greek Church, but it is wonderfully more precious and useful. The best Latin hymns have come through the Roman Breviary into general use, and through translations and reproductions have become naturalized in Protestant Churches.

The authorship of most of the ancient hymns cannot be determined, and to Ambrose and others hymns are attributed which it is doubtful that they really composed. This is specially the case with the celebrated "Te Deum Laudamus" and the "Gloria in Excelsis," which he was reputed to have composed for the baptism of Augustine, but all reliable evidence goes to establish the fact that these most precious hymns were the product of a later age.

Ambrose, Hilary of Poitiers, Augustine, Damasus of Rome, Prudentius of Spain, Paulinus of Nola, Sedulius, Enodius and Fortunatus have been recognized as among the most eminent Latin hymnologists. Gregory the Great has justly become celebrated for his influence on the music of the Church. The Gregorian Tones or Chants are attributed to him, and their influence on Church song extended very rapidly over the empire. Charlemagne introduced the Gregorian Tones into France, where in the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth centuries hymn-writing was sedulously cultivated. It was in the middle of the thirteenth century that the memorable "Dies Iræ" of the Franciscan Thomas of Celano was composed—a hymn which has attracted as much attention as has been devoted to any uninspired poetical composition.

English hymnology really dates from the revival of religion in the last century. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries religious poems were produced, such as "Mary at the Cross" and "The Mourning Disciple," and in the reign of Elizabeth their numbers greatly increased, as Parker, Spenser, Drayton, Sidney, Donne, countess of Pembroke and Raleigh, must all be included in the list of writers of devotional poetry. Then followed Quarles with his "Sion's Elegies," "Divine Poems," "Divine Fancies," "Emblems," the last being still known and recognized as one of the most interesting quaint collections of sacred verse in the language; and to Quarles succeeded George Herbert, a younger brother of the celebrated skeptic. The genius of Milton led him to produce in stately measures his shorter sacred verses, but in all these nothing can be found that resembles a "hymn." The emotional fervor which must needs break out in a short utterance of the soul's joys, its sorrows or its wants, with rapturous hallelujah to the Lord, seemed to be foreign to the spirit of those ages. It is true Bishop Ken, in the latter part of the century, gave forth his precious "Morning and Evening Hymns," and he endowed the Church with his magnificent doxology which is known all over Christendom, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." The verses of Addison, beginning "When all thy mercies, O my God," can scarcely be considered as a hymn, as they rather belong to the class of sacred poems, and Dr. Watts must certainly be placed at the head of English hymn-writers. Montgomery truly says, "Dr. Watts may almost be called the inventor of hymns in our language, for he so far departed from all precedent that few of his compositions resemble those of his forerunners, while he so far established a precedent to all his successors that none have departed from it otherwise than according to the peculiar turn of mind of the writer and the style of expressing Christian truth employed by the denomination to which he belonged." Very speedily his hymns found their way into the ritual of different denominations, and many thousands of English-speaking Christians have been familiar with his words without knowing the author of the sweet strains which they have been using in the sanctuary. In how many households have tender children become familiar with the words "Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber"! in how many assemblies of God's people has not devotion been kindled by the invitation "Come, let us join our cheerful songs," and "Come, ye that love the Lord"! There is a peculiar interest attaching to the well-known incident that developed his poetical power. To his father, who was a deacon in an independent church at Southampton, he had complained of the bald and tasteless character of the hymns in use. "Give us something better, young man," he replied. The young man made the effort, and forthwith he produced "Behold the glories of the Lamb." So, also, as his residence overlooked the Southampton water, and the picturesque scenery of the New Forest beyond, the view became suggestive, and his meditations took the form of the precious lyric, "There is a land of pure delight," etc.

Philip Doddridge succeeded the immortal Watts, and he endowed the Church with many gems of rare and precious value, such as "Grace, 'tis a charming sound," "Thine earthly Sabbaths, Lord, we love," "Hark the glad sound, the Saviour's come," which have been dear to the hearts of God's people, and which still continue to live in their affections. Then came both John and Charles Wesley, the former the preacher, revivalist and organizer of the Church, the latter its celebrated hymn-writer. Allusion can only here be made to a few of the great body of hymns which Charles Wesley produced, such as the well-known "Hark, the herald angels sing," "Jesus, lover of my soul," "Come, let us join our friends above." On the rugged promontory of the Land's End, where the south-western coast beats back the surge of the ocean, he stood on the wild rock and wrote "Lo! on a narrow neck of land." Then arose Toplady to sing "Rock of ages," and Cennick to give the Church "Lo! he comes with clouds descending," and Beddome, Harveis and the countess of Huntingdon. The strain was prolonged by Berridge and Anna Steele, the latter of whom produced, among others, the precious devotional gems "Come, ye that love the Saviour's name" and "Father, what'er of earthly bliss." In 1779 the Olney hymns appeared, of which Cowper wrote sixty-two and Newton supplied two hundred and eighty-six. Robinson, Ryland, Medley and Henry Kirke White in England and Logan in Scotland still produced new treasures, which were vastly increased by James Montgomery, and from his time the strain of sacred song has never been silent, as may be evidenced by the lyrics of Lyte, Sarah F. Adams, Trench, Keble, Millman and Bonar, the latter of whom has done much for sacred poetry in Scotland.

In America, Dr. Dwight gave a great impulse to the cultivation of sacred poetry, and among the clergy there have been many who have contributed largely to sacred verse. The names of Doane, Muhlenbergh, Coxe, James Alexander, George Bethune, Gause and Ray Palmer will live in the sacred literature of the country, and the last-mentioned name can never be dissociated from the powerfully emotional hymn, "My faith looks up to thee." In the Unitarian body several hymn-writers have appeared; and as in England female writers have taken a high place in the preparation of sacred song, so in this country also Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Phoebe H. Brown, the sisters Phoebe and Alice Cary and Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe have produced a number of attractive and exceedingly sweet specimens of devotional poetry.

HYPATIA (hi-pa'she-a), a female philosopher of Alexandria, was born in 370. She early exhibited extraordinary genius, and became a teacher in the school in which Hierocles and other celebrated philosophers had presided. Her beauty and erudition made her house the resort of all the learned in Alexandria, among whom was Orestes, the governor. This roused the jealousy of Cyril, the patriarch of Alexandria, and his monkish partisans conspired against Hypatia's life; and a furious band of assassins seizing her as she was returning home from the schools, they dragged her through the streets, murdered her in the most barbarous manner and threw her mangled limbs into the flames in the year 415.

HYPERBOLE (ai-per'bo-le). Any one who carefully examines the Bible must be surprised at the very few hyperbolic expressions which it contains, considering that it is an Oriental Book. Some of these few have occasioned so much difficulty to sincere men that we have reason to bless God that the scene of those great events which comprise the history of man's Salvation was laid in Western and not in Eastern Asia, where the genius of hyperbole reigns without limit or control. In Eastern Asia the tone of composition is pitched so high as to be scarcely intelligible to the sober intellect of Europe, while in Western Asia a medium seems to have been struck between the ultra-extravagance of the far East and the frigid exactness of the far West.

But, even regarded as a Book of Western Asia, the Bible is, as compared with almost any other Western Asiatic book, so singularly free from hyperbolic expressions as might well excite our sur-ing race eventually entered Egypt; and as they came from the east, whence marauders had long made incursions into Egypt, it was no wonder that all such invaders were abhorred. Even yet the Arabs are disliked in Egypt. Another event is referred to by Josephus, in which the narrative of Manetho seems to allude to the Israelites, who are spoken of as a people who settled on the east of the Nile, and whose ruler gave them laws forbidding them to worship the gods of the Egyptians; that these settlers sent for auxiliaries to Jerusalem, and having received aid to the number of 200,000 men, they were eventually driven out and forced to the confines of Syria. Lysimachus and Diodorus also describe the exodus of the Israelites in similar terms, showing the influence of the Jewish records on surrounding nations.

HYLE (hi'le). The ancient Manichæans held that two opposing principles held sway in the universe—good and evil, or light and darkness. Good they held to be the lord of the world of light, who was happy, wise and just. The lord of darkness, called "Hyle," or in Greek hulē, was miserable in himself, and he desired to see others wretched and unhappy. These were eternal in their being, and they were also unchangeable, yet there was a superiority on the part of the god of light. Such were the essential principles of Manichæism, by which an attempt was made to account for the introduction of moral evil into the universe.

HYLOZOISM (hi-lo-zo'izm), a philosophical term used to state the theory that life is inseparable from matter. One form of this philosophy asserted that life inhered in every ultimate particle of matter, and at the head of that school stood Strato of Lampsacus. The Stoics maintained that the universe, as a whole, had a soul or principle of life; and later still, Spinoza held that all things were alive in different degrees. Touching these theories, it has been well observed that the confusion arose from mistaking force for life, the latter being always associated with organization, while attraction, repulsion and chemical affinity affect unorganized forms.

HYMENEUS (hi-me-ne'us), one who is said to have erred from the faith, and in conjunction with Philetus to have taught that the resurrection was past, 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. He is elsewhere coupled with Alexander, and was, we are told, delivered to Satan—that is, excommunicated, 1 Tim. i. 20. But probably this intends something more than mere exclusion from the church. There was a special power for remedying disorders with which the apostles were invested, 2 Cor. x. 8; xiii. 10, and some peculiar exercise of this may be meant.

HYMN (him). Our Lord is said to have sung a hymn with his disciples on the night of his passion, just before he went out to the Mount of Olives, Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26. Critics are not altogether agreed what this hymn was. Many suppose it to have been a part of what the Jews called the great Hallel—that is, Ps. cxiii.—cxviii., of which Ps. cxiii., cxiv., were sung before the rest after the passover feast. Hymns are generally distinguished from psalms in the New Testament, Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16; and the term may probably have been applied first to some of those sacred compositions, apart from psalms which are preserved in Scripture, such as the songs of Moses, of Hannah, of Zecharias, of the Virgin, of Simeon, etc., and also to those praises which spiritual persons had the gift of uttering, 1 Cor. xiv. 26. In this last named place, however, it is observable that the composition is called a psalm. Paul and Silas perhaps sang hymns in the Philippian prison, Acts xvi. 25; and no doubt the grateful joy of the first believers would soon find vent in hymns of praise of which the doxology, the angelical and cherubical hymns in the communion office are examples.

HYMNOLOGY (him-nol'o-je). A hymn is a religious song in which expression is given emotional feeling. In a hymn feelings of gratitude and praise are uttered, and references to historical matters, to deliverances and mercies may be made as incentives to devotion. As Dr. Schaff has well said, "Poetry and its twin sister Music are the most sublime and spiritual arts, and are much more akin to the genius of Christianity, and minister far more copiously to the purposes of devotion and edification, than architecture, painting and sculpture. They employ word and tone, and can speak thereby more directly to the spirit than the plastic arts by stone and color, and give more adequate expression to the whole wealth of the world of thought and feeling. In the Old Testament, as is well known, they were essential parts of divine worship; and so they have been in all ages, and almost all branches of the Christian Church. Of the various species of religious poetry, the hymn is the earliest and most important. It has a rich history, in which the deepest experiences of Christian life are stored. But it attained its full bloom in the evangelical Church of the German and English tongue, where it, like the Bible, became for the first time truly the possession of the people, instead of being restricted to priest or choir." Although the idea of a hymn is altogether foreign to that of mere didactic or theological poetry, still, doctrine may be taught in the most emphatic manner by means of hymns. The fervid utterance of truths in poetic forms affects the heart more powerfully than the more staid and sober teachings of prose, and this fact has been recognized by errorists as well as by the great preachers and defenders of the truth. The heretic Bardesanes "diffused his Gnostic hymns;" and till that language ceased to be the living organ of thought, the Syrian Fathers adopted this mode of inculcating truth in metrical compositions. The hymns of Arius were great favorites, and contributed to spread his peculiar doctrines. Chrysostom found the hymns of Arian worship so attractive that he took care to counteract the effect of them as much as possible by providing the Catholic Church with metrical compositions. Augustine also composed a hymn in order to check the errors of the Donatists, whom he represents as making great use of newly-composed hymns for the propagation of their opinions. The writings of Ephraem Syrus of the fourth century contain hymns on various topics, relating chiefly to the religious questions of the day which agitated the Church. To be effective a hymn must be lyrical in form, pure and spiritual in sentiment, and powerfully expressive of the inward heartfelt experiences of the life.

Controversies arose in the early Church on the propriety of using any lyrical matter in the service of the sanctuary except such poetry as was found in the psalms, or as might be produced from other parts of the Divine Word. As early as A. D. 563 a Council at Braga restricted public praise to the psalms and paraphrases of Scripture. Bingham has said that no objection was made against the psalmody of the Church, that sometimes psalms and hymns of human composition were used besides those of the sacred and inspired writers, and he refers to the fact that St. Augustine reflects on the Donatists for their psalms of human composition, "yet it was not merely because they were human, but because they preferred them to the divine hymns of Scripture, and their indecent way of chanting them to the grave and sober method of the Church. St. Augustine made a psalm of many parts in imitation of the 119th Psalm; and this he did for the use of his people, to preserve them from the errors of Donatus. A full disquisition on this subject would include a chapter on ancient hymns, including—1. Oriental and Greek. 2. Those of the Latin Church. Modern hymnology, comprehending the hymns of the Reformation period. English hymns of the seventeenth century. German and English hymns of the present age, and the extensive and very fertile field occupied by the sacred writers of America.

Of the very ancient lyrical compositions a few have been preserved. Coleman, in his "Ancient Christianity," states that "Basil cites an evening hymn from an unknown author, which he describes as in his time (fourth century) very ancient, handed down from the Fathers, and in use among the people. Dr. J. Pye Smith considers it the oldest hymn extant. The following is his translation of it: 'Jesus Christ, joyful Light of the Holy! Glory of the Eternal, Heavenly, Holy, Blessed Father! Having now come to the setting of the sun, beholding the evening light, we praise the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit of God. Thou art worthy to be praised of sacred voices, at all seasons, O Son of God, who givest life. Wherefore the universe glorifieth thee.'" That psalms and hymns were common in the worship of the earliest age of the Church is shown by the letter of Pliny to Trajan in the beginning of the second century, in which it is stated that the Christians sung hymns to Christ as to God. A specimen of these hymns has been preserved both in Greek and Latin, and its interest is increased by the fact that it is the production of Clemens Alexandrinus. A critical analysis of ancient hymns shows that until the middle of the seventh century writers were gradually freeing themselves from the trammels of the classical writers, and adopting an ecclesiastical style and form. Then followed a period in which hymn-writing attained to great excellence, but from A. D. 850 to A. D. 1400 there is a marked decline. The hymns of the Eastern Church are comprehended in a very voluminous ran away, persuaded that he could better serve God and man than by being a monk. He traveled over Europe, served in the Austrian army, was head of the league formed to oppose the monkish persecutors of the great Hebraist Reuchlin, and had the chief hand in the powerful satire entitled "Epistolæ Obscurum Virorum." In 1517 he was knighted by the emperor Maximilian, who also gave him the laurel crown and the title of imperial poet and orator. He soon after published several satires against the papacy, and to escape the storm raised against him he retired to one of the castles of his friend Franz von Sickingen, from which he sent forth frequent letters, orations and poems. After the death of Sickingen, Hutten went to Switzerland; and after visiting Basel, Mulhausen and Zurich, and meeting Zwingli at the latter, he spent his last days in the little island of Uffnau, in the Lake of Zurich. Courage and hope did not fail him, and in the autumn of 1523 he died. No monument has been raised to him, and his burial-place now belongs to the monks of Einsiedeln.

HUTTER (hut'ter), ELIAS, a German linguist, was born in 1554, at Gortitz. He was a zealous student and teacher of Hebrew and the cognate languages. Having formed the scheme of an edition of the Hebrew text on a peculiar plan, accompanied with a series of translations in different tongues, he procured a printing-press for the purpose, and devoted himself to this object. In 1596 he brought out at Hamburg the first of his Polyglot Bibles, in which the Hebrew text of the Old Testament appears with three versions. In 1599 he issued at Nurnberg the New Testament in twelve different languages; and in 1602 appeared his "Harmony of the New Testament in Hebrew, Greek, Latin and German." These works are now more curious than useful. Hutten aimed at more than he could accomplish, and ruined himself in the attempt. He died in 1605.

HUZ, the eldest son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, Gen. xxii. 21. The original word is that elsewhere rendered Uz. See Uz.

HUZZAB (huz'zab) appears in the English Bible as the name of a queen of Nineveh, Nah. ii. 7. And so certain authorities, both Jewish and Christian, have held. But it is not a probable opinion, as it is against the usage to bring into a prophetic description the name of any one, especially of a woman, otherwise unknown. It is better, therefore, to take the word as a participle, and to render perhaps, with Gesenius, who joins it to the preceding clause, thus: "The palace shall be dissolved and melt away." But the passage is certainly obscure.

HYACINTH (hi'a-sinth). See JACINTH.

HYÆNA (hi-e'na). This word occurs in our version only in the Apocrypha, Ecclus. xiii. 18. But some critics believe that the hyæna is meant in Jer. xii. 9, rather than "speckled bird." This ferocious animal is common to the present day, and no doubt existed formerly in Palestine; but the great difficulty of such a rendering is that a word is adjoined in the passage in question which wherever else it occurs implies a bird. Perhaps, therefore, it is better to adhere to the reading of our translation.

HYDASPES (hi-das'pez), a river only once mentioned in the Bible, Jud. i. 6. It is doubtful whether we may identify it with the river of the same name mentioned by Arrian and Strabo, which flowed westward into the Indus, is now called Jelum, and is one of the five streams which give the name Panjab to the district. Some suppose it more probable that the Choaspes or Eulœus is meant, which was called Hydaspes by the Romans.

HYDE (hide), THOMAS, D.D., a learned English divine and Orientalist, was born in 1636, at Billingsley, in Shropshire, and studied at King's College, Cambridge. He assisted Walton in preparing his great Polyglot Bible, and in 1658 he went to Oxford, where he became successively Hebrew reader and keeper of the Bodleian Library. He was next promoted to a prebend in Salisbury Cathedral, and afterward appointed regius professor of Hebrew and canon of Christ Church, Oxford. He died in 1703. His "History of the Religion of the Ancient Persians" is his most important work.

HYDRIA (hid're-a), a word of Greek origin which signifies a vessel to hold water, as our common word hydrant designates an instrument for drawing water. The Greeks and Romans had vessels in their household economy thus named, and among the wealthy they were made of silver. It was also common to place a hydria on the tomb of a person of rank, and the illustration in the text shows one which was found on the tomb of a Scythian queen in the Crimea. It is of silver-gilt, twenty-seven and a half inches high and fifteen and a quarter inches in diameter. Its style shows that it may have been manufactured about the fourth century before Christ.

HYGDEN (hig'den), JOHN, D.D., holds a distinguished place in connection with the largest college in Oxford. When Wolsey formed the plan of the great institution which he called Cardinal College, he called Hygden to the position of dean, and the canons were selected from the different colleges connected with the university. Hygden had been president of Magdalen, but before Wolsey's ideas were carried out he forfeited the favor of Henry, and in 1529 incurred the penalty of a "præmunire," arresting the perfecting of the scheme, which was not resumed until 1532, when Peckwater Inn and Canterbury College were united with Cardinal College, under the name of King Henry the Eighth's College. See WOLSEY.

HYGINUS (hig-i'nus), bishop of Rome, who held that office from A. D. 137 to 141. Very little is known of his previous life, but it is believed that he was born in Athens and taught philosophy there.

HYKSOS (hik'sos), the name of a race greatly celebrated in history who invaded Egypt and constituted several dynasties of the rulers of that kingdom. In Manetho, where reference is made to this people, it is said: "In the reign of King Timaus there came up from the east men of an ignoble race who had the confidence to invade our country, and easily subdued it without a battle, burning the cities, demolishing the temples, slaying the men and reducing the women and children to slavery." One of them ascended the throne and reigned at Memphis, over Upper and Lower Egypt. It was believed that in the eighteenth dynasty the Shepherd Kings, who belonged to this race, were expelled, that they left Egypt in great numbers; and according to Manetho, they "marched through the desert toward Syria, and built the city of Jerusalem," evidently showing that they were confounded with the Israelites; whereas the fact is almost certain that they were Phœnicians. In the days of Joseph and Jacob the term shepherd was an abomination to the Egyptians, showing that the "shepherd" invasion had preceded their time. No doubt this invasion from the east was occasioned by the pressure of a growing people who, finding the deserts of Arabia and of the regions lying east of Palestine so inhospitable, were led to cast their eyes on the fertile valley of the Nile, and in their advance to the west, the settlers of many districts fled from before them. Hence, the onward mov-bigotry have few more grievous sins to answer for than the martyrdom of Huss. Well might Erasmus say, "Joannes Huss exustus non convictus;" "John Huss was burned, not convicted." In a few months Jerome, his companion, met a similar fate.

Huss in early life came under the influence of Matthias Janow, a Bohemian, who awakened his mind to the prevailing errors of the age, and the writings of Wycliffe, which had reached Bohemia, carried him still farther on his way toward clearer views of the gospel. Still, his aim was in the main to reform the Church, purify the clergy and reform the age. He differed from Luther, in that the latter went down to the foundation, and began with gospel doctrine, which he insisted should be drawn from the Word of God. He made gospel doctrine and gospel principles the mainsprings of life, and hence his reformation lived, whereas Huss and his followers, aiming so much as they did at externals, failed in effecting a great and permanent reform.

HUSSITES (huss'ites), the name for the followers of John Huss, who adopted the views which he had taught in Bohemia. After his martyrdom disturbances soon began in Bohemia, and the followers of the martyr soon found themselves in trouble when 452 of their number were cited to appear before the council for signing a protest against the murder of Huss. Speedily, however, a serious division appeared in their ranks. One section became known as the "Calixtines," so called from "calix," chalice, because they demanded the cup for the laity in the eucharist, and a party who went much farther in their views of reform were designated "Taborites," from a mountain (Tabor) where Huss had preached, and where they had been accustomed to meet. The Calixtines held the doctrine of purgatory, they prayed for the dead and used holy water, but they sought many reforms, though they differed greatly from the Taborites, who aimed at purifying churches, removing images and repressing luxury. In 1418 Martin V. issued a bull of a most determined character, calling for chastisement on all the followers of Huss and Wycliffe, and thereafter, under the great leader Zisca, the troubles of Bohemia began. In 1420 the pope invited a crusade against them, offering plenary pardon of their sins and eternal life even to those who died on their way to the war of massacre, and full remission of all their sins to all and sundry who in any way aided the cause. The imperial army of 140,000 men threw themselves against the Hussites, and were signally defeated at the memorable battle of Witkow, and the war went on with varied fortunes until the death of Zisca, in 1424, when he had attained the highest point of his fortunes. Three papal crusades were directed against these sternly determined people, and all in vain. Army after army was hurled back in ignominious defeat by their prowess. Treachery did its utmost, and thus through varied scenes the struggle went on, until their numbers decreased, and they became known as the United Brethren. An influence from Germany passed over a part of Bohemia, and many of the descendants of the Hussites fell into the Lutheran Church. Then came the Thirty Years War, and not until the time of Joseph II. did the Calixtines really gain religious liberty. That any portion of a race so warlike as the Taborites were should pass over into a communion so entirely different as that of the United Brethren, can only be accounted for by the fact that, notwithstanding all the warlike struggles of their leaders, their people must have had in their hearts a loving regard for the word of God, and a willingness to frame their lives, when permitted, by its precepts.

HUTCHESON (huch'e-sun), FRANCIS, LL.D., philosopher, sometimes considered as the founder of the Scottish school, was the son of a Presbyterian minister in Ireland. He was born in 1694, studied at Glasgow, and on his return to Ireland officiated in a Presbyterian congregation for some time in the northern part of that kingdom, but in 1729 he was elected professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow. He had previously published "An Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue," and a "Treatise on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions." In 1755 his son, Dr. Francis Hutcheson, a physician of Glasgow, printed from his father's papers, "A System of Moral Philosophy," 2 vols. 4to, to which is prefixed an account of the author. Died in 1747.

HUTCHESON, GEORGE. Very few facts are known in regard to the personal history of this able expositor. He was minister first at Colmonell, and then at Edinburgh. In early life he held Arminian views, which he afterward abandoned. In 1650 he was one of the Scotch commissioners sent to treat with Charles II. at Breda. He was ejected from his charge in Edinburgh for nonconformity; and although he was noted for his steady refusal to comply with the Episcopal liturgy, he availed himself of one of the indulgences, and accepted a charge in Irvine in 1669. His death took place from apoplexy in 1678. The works which he has left behind him are all of an expository character: "A Brief Exposition of the Twelve Small Prophets;" "An Exposition of the Gospel of Jesus Christ according to John;" "An Exposition upon Job, being the Sum of Three Hundred and Sixteen Lectures;" "Forty-five Sermons upon the 130th Psalm."

HUTCHINS, JOHN, an English divine and topographer, was born in Dorsetshire, in 1696, and died in 1773. He was the author of the "History and Antiquities of the County of Dorset," 2 vols.

HUTCHINS, THOMAS, geographer-general to the United States of America, was born in New Jersey, about 1730. He served in the army against the Indians in Florida, was imprisoned in England in 1779, on the charge of having corresponded with Dr. Franklin, then American agent in France, afterward joined the army of General Greene, and died at Pittsburg in 1789. He published several topographical and historical works of considerable interest.

HUTCHINSON (huch'in-sun), JOHN, a theologian and natural philosopher, was born at Spennithorne, Yorkshire, in 1674. He is best known as the originator of the peculiar system of Biblical interpretation usually denominated, from its author, "Hutchinsonianism." He maintained that the Hebrew language was formed by God, and is, therefore, perfect; that the Old Testament contains a complete system of philosophy as well as theology, beyond which the human mind can never get; that Newton's principles are anti-Scriptural and false, and Newton himself no philosopher; that the whole of Christianity is contained in the Old Testament, so that the Jews understood it as well as we; and that a knowledge of Hebrew is essential to a right understanding of the New Testament, because the latter is written in the language of the Gentiles. He wrote numerous treatises in exposition and defence of his views, the most important of which are—"Moses' Principia, part i.;" "An Essay Toward a Natural History of the Bible—Moses' Principia, part ii.;" "A New Account of the Confusion of Tongues;" "The Covenant in the Cherubim."

Hutchinson had many followers, although he formed no sect. His style is rambling and obscure, his dogmatism unbounded, and his language toward opponents often rude and offensive. His works are worth examining, although the task of reading them is difficult. He died August 28, 1737.

HUTCHINSON, JOHN (Colonel Hutchinson), governor of Nottingham Castle in the civil war of the seventeenth century, was born at Nottingham in 1616. He was son of Sir Thomas Hutchinson of Owthorpe, a member of the Long Parliament, was educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, studied law for a short time at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1638 married Lucy, daughter of Sir Allen Apsley, lieutenant of the Tower of London. He settled at Owthorpe in 1641, was soon known for his sympathies with the popular party, became a lieutenant-colonel in the Parliamentary army in 1642, and in the following year was appointed governor of Nottingham Castle. In 1645 he was chosen member of Parliament for Nottingham, acted with the Independents, had several interviews with Cromwell, was member of the High Court of Justice for the trial of Charles I., and afterward of the Council of State. He was a true patriot, honest and earnest in his endeavors to serve the best interests of his country, an uncompromising republican, thoroughly brave, high-minded and unaffectedly pious. He was discharged from Parliament at the Restoration, and from all offices of state for ever, and retired to Owthorpe. In October, 1663, he was arrested and imprisoned at Newark, thence carried to the Tower, and in the next year removed to Sandown Castle, where he fell ill and died, September 11, 1664. His noble wife was refused permission to share his confinement. She wrote the memoirs of his life, which form one of the most charming volumes of biography in our literature. It was first published in 1806.

HUTTEN (hut'ten), ULRICH VON, a German knight and reformer, was born at the castle of Steckleberg, in Franconia, in 1488. After spending five years at the monastic school of Fulda, he dresses, in "The Whole Works of John Hurrion." He died in 1731.

HURTER (hur'ter), FRIEDRICH EMANUEL VON, a Swiss theologian, was born March 19, 1787, at Schaffhausen. He graduated at the university of Göttingen, took orders in the Reformed Church, and after preaching a few years to a country congregation became first pastor of his native city. His intimacy with Roman Catholics led to a suspicion of his orthodoxy, and he was requested to make a declaration of his views, which not being deemed satisfactory by his colleagues, he resigned his position, and soon after made open profession of his adherence to the Roman Catholic Church. In 1845 he was appointed imperial historiographer at Vienna. Included in his published works are "History of Pope Innocent III.," "Birth and Regeneration," "History of Ferdinand II." He died August 27, 1865.

HURWITZ (hur'witz), HYMAN, a learned Jewish scholar. Scarcely anything is known concerning his early life or education. For many years he was professor of Hebrew in the University College, London. The work which established his reputation is entitled "A Defence of the Hebrew Scriptures." It was succeeded by a volume of "Hebrew Tales," compiled in the main part from the Talmud. He rendered an essential service to the study of the Hebrew language by a series of text-books which have not been excelled in the English language. He died about 1850.

HUSHAH (hush'ah), a name found in the genealogies of Judah; it may designate a person, but more probably a place, 1 Chr. iv. 4.

HUSHAI (hush'i), a person styled David's friend, whom the king desired to stay in Jerusalem during Absalom's rebellion that he might defeat the sagacious counsel of Ahithophel. Hushai was completely successful, 2 Sam. xv. 32-37; xvi. 16-18; xvii. 5-16; 1 Ki. iv. 16; 1 Chr. xxvii. 33. He is called the ARCHITE, which see.

HUSHAM (hush'am), one of the early kings of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 34, 35; 1 Chr. i. 45, 46. Mr. Wilton supposes him connected with Heshmon, a town of Judah.

HUSHATHITE (hush'ath-ite). This designation is given to Sibbechai, one of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 29; xx. 4; xxvii. 11; in the last-cited passage he is said to be of the Zarhites—i. e., of the descendants of Zerah, the son of Judah. See HUSHAH.

HUSHIM (hush'eem). 1. The son of Dan, Gen. xlii. 23, called also Shuham, Num. xxvi. 42. 2. A descendant of Benjamin, 1 Chr. vii. 12. 3. One of the wives of Shahraraim, a Benjamite, 1 Chr. viii. 8, 11.

HUSK. The "husk" of Num. vi. 4 is the translucent skin of the grape. By the word rendered "husk" in 2 Ki. iv. 42 Gesenius understands a sack or bag, see marginal rendering. We once more meet with "husks," Luke xv. 16. "These," says Dr. Trench, "are not the husks or pods of some other fruit," as of peas or beans, "but themselves the fruit of the carob tree. . . . They are in shape something like a bean-pod, though larger and curved more, . . . thence called little horn (the literal meaning of the Greek word). . . . They have a hard dark outside and a dull sweet taste." The shell or pod alone is eaten.

HUSS, JOHN, one of the Reformers before the Reformation, was born at Hussinatz, in Bohemia, about 1375. He was of a poor family, but through the kindness of a wealthy seigneur was sent to study at the university of Prague, where he graduated master of arts, and became a profes-boldly condemned the pope, was again cited to Rome, and at last, in 1414, to the Council of Constance, where a general council had been summoned to meet on November 1, 1414, under the protection of Sigismund, who was designated emperor. Thither, trusting to the safe-conduct given by the emperor Sigismund, who pledged himself to grant a safe-conduct, and to send him back in safety even if he did not feel warranted in submitting to the decision of the council, he went, with an earnest desire to assert his principles and maintain the faith of the gospel. He reached Constance on the 3d of November, having preached and expounded his views as he journeyed through Bohemia and Germany. After a few days of rest and retirement he was seized and thrown into the dungeon of the Dominican monastery; and now the effort was commenced to persuade the emperor that it would be wrong to keep faith with a heretic. Three months afterward he was sent to a wretched den in the sor, dean of the theological faculty, and eventually, in 1409, he was made rector, and soon began propagating the doctrines of Wycliffe. In his bold course he was encouraged by King Wenceslaus and his queen, Sophia, to whom he was confessor. He was soon after suspended from his office of priest, through the influence of Zbyněk, the archbishop of Prague, because of the zeal that Huss displayed in support of the Reformed doctrines and his energy in denouncing the immorality of the clergy. Continuing to preach in the fields and in houses against the pope, the authority of tradition, indulgences, etc., he was denounced at the court of Rome, and on his failing to answer the charges made against him was excommunicated by Alexander V., and in order to root out heresy more than 200 copies of the writings of Wycliffe were discovered and burnt. Tumults occurring in Prague between the followers of Huss and the Romish party, Huss retired for a time to his native village. When Pope John XXIII. proclaimed a crusade against Ladislaus, king of Naples, Huss castle of Gottlieben, where, in a cell so low that he could not stand upright, with his feet fastened to a block by means of heavy irons, and at night with his right hand chained to a wall, he was kept by men who said that they were ambassadors of the Lord of life and of mercy. From March until June, in spite of all the efforts of his friends and the reclamations of the Bohemian people, he was subjected to these tortures, and at length, on the 5th day of June, he was brought before the council. On the 7th and the 8th he was taken to the council, where the scenes were of a stormy, furious character, abounding in invective against him, without any opportunity being given him to explain and defend his views. Finally, on the 6th day of July he was again brought out, degraded from the priesthood, condemned and handed over to the secular arm for execution. Forthwith he was hurried out of the city, and about the hour of ten o'clock he was burned alive at the stake, while the members of the council were at the same time engaged with their proceedings. Lev. xvii. 13, 14. Herod the Great, we are told by Josephus, was a keen sportsman. He kept a regular hunting establishment, and was often very successful. Hunting was a favorite pastime in Egypt and Assyria, and hunting-scenes are represented on the monuments.

Terms connected with hunting and fowling are often figuratively used to indicate the wiles of treacherous enemies and the dangers to which men are exposed, Ps. ix. 16; lvii. 6; xci. 3; Prov. xxvi. 27; Is. xxiv. 17; xlii. 22; Jer. v. 26; xvi. 17; xlviii. 44; Amos iii. 5.

HUNTINGDON (hunt'ing-dun), SELINA, countess of, the second daughter of Washington Shirley, earl of Ferrers, was born in 1707, and married in 1728 to Theophilus Hastings, earl of Huntingdon. After she became a widow, in 1746, she espoused the principles of the Calvinistic Methodists, and patronized the famous George Whitfield, whom she made her chaplain. She cast her fortune and influence into the cause of religion, and her exertions for the spread of the gospel by the erection of chapels, the support of preachers, and her schemes to teach the upper as well as the lower classes, were continued with great system during her life. She adopted the views of Whitfield in preference to those of Wesley, and after her death the congregations which had been collected in her chapels were known as "Lady Huntingdon's Connection." She was a lady of fine mental powers, of great spirituality and decision of character, and her zeal for religion was productive of great good among all classes of society. She died in 1791.

HUNTINGDON, WILLIAM, a noted religious enthusiast, was born in 1744. After indulging in vice and dissipation for several years, he was converted, and became a preacher among the Calvinistic Methodists. He was compelled at one time to earn his bread as a coal-heaver at Thames Ditton. He soon engaged in religious controversies, published a vast number of tracts and was regarded as the head of a sect. His publications are very numerous, and some of them contain curious details relative to his personal history and religious experience. After the death of his first wife, he married the wealthy relict of Sir James Sanderson, a London alderman, and passed the latter part of his life in affluence. After his conversion, he generally appended to his name the mystical letters, S.S., or "Sinner Saved." He died at Tunbridge Wells in 1813. His portrait, by Pellegrini, is in the national portrait gallery.

HUNTINGFORD (hunt'ing-ford), GEORGE ISAAC, bishop of Hereford, a distinguished classical scholar, was born at Winchester in 1748, received his education there and at New College, Oxford, and subsequently became an assistant under Dr. Joseph Wharton in the seminary in which he had been educated, and over which he afterward presided as warden for a period of forty years. Through the patronage of Lord Sidmouth, who had been his pupil at Winchester, he obtained the see of Gloucester in 1802, and that of Hereford in 1815. This venerable prelate was the author of "Greek Monostrophics," "A Call for Union with the Established Church," "Thoughts on the Trinity," etc. With a profound knowledge of Greek literature and a truly poetical taste, he possessed the more desirable qualities of Christian piety and humility united with an independent mind and a spirit of pure benevolence. He died in 1832.

HUNTINGTON (hunt'ing-tun), JOHN, B.D., who lived in the fifteenth century, held the office of rectory of Ashton-under-Line, from which place he was transferred to Manchester, and made first warden of the institution in that city, which was afterward incorporated with a view to provide a church commensurate with the necessities of the place, and also the erection and management of a common dwelling for the clergy. Huntington, who entered on his office in 1422, had a fair share of the learning of his age, and he was recognized as one of the worthies of his day. He held his appointment thirty-seven years, and on his death, in 1453, he was buried in the choir which he had himself constructed. The collegiate church thus founded became afterward the cathedral of the see of Manchester. See THOMAS DE LA WARRE.

HUNTINGTON, ROBERT, an Oriental traveler and linguist, was born in Gloucestershire, in 1636, and educated at Oxford. He spent eleven years in the East, as chaplain at Aleppo; and during that period he traveled in Palestine, Egypt and Cyprus, chiefly for the purpose of procuring Oriental manuscripts, of which he obtained a very large number, which are now in the Bodleian library. After his return he was provost of Trinity College, Dublin; then held a rectory in Essex; and shortly before his death was appointed bishop of Raphoe, in Ireland, where he died in 1701.

HUPFELD (hup'feld), HERMANN, D.D., an eminent theologian and Hebrew scholar, was born at Marburg, in Germany, March 31, 1796. He graduated at the university of his native city, and after a few years spent in teaching, he went to the university of Halle and there completed his theological preparation. In 1825 he was called to the department of theology in the university of Marburg, and a few years later the department of Oriental languages was added. In 1843 he succeeded Gesenius at the university of Halle. In theology, Hupfeld held what has been termed "liberal" views; for example, he maintained that only some parts of the Bible are inspired. As a scholar he had few equals in his generation. In his religious life he was devout, though but little acquainted with devotional methods and exercises. Among his works may be named, "On the Notion and Method of Biblical Introduction," "The Psalms, Translated and Explained," "Modern Theosophical and Mythological Theology and Exegesis." He died April 24, 1866.

HUPHAM (hu'fam), one of the children of Benjamin, Num. xxvi. 39. He is called Huppim in Gen. xlv. 21; 1 Chr. vii. 12.

HUPHAMITES (hu'fam-ites), a family of Benjamin, Num. xxvi. 39.

HUPPAH (hup'pah), a priest, the head of one of the courses, 1 Chr. xxiv. 13.

HUPPIM (hup'peem), a son or descendant of Benjamin, Gen. xlv. 21; 1 Chr. vii. 12, 15. He is called Hupham in Num. xxvi. 39.

HUR. 1. A person evidently of some note in the camp of Israel, as he was chosen along with Aaron to hold up the hands of Moses during the war with Amalek, Ex. xvii. 10-12. He is again mentioned in connection with Aaron, and as having a joint share in the oversight of the people during the period of Moses' absence on Mount Sinai, Ex. xxiv. 14. No further notice is taken of him; but the apparent intimacy of his relation to Moses and Aaron probably gave rise to the tradition that he was the husband of Miriam, and which is stated by Josephus as a fact. The same authority reports him to have been the Hur who was the grandfather of Bezaleel, which is quite probable, though, in the absence of any specific intimation of Scripture, we cannot hold it for certain. 2. One of the five kings of Midian slain at the close of the sojourn in the wilderness bore the name of Hur, kings in this case being equal to princes or leaders, Num. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21. 3. Two others are mentioned in later times of the name of Hur, but without any particular marks of distinction, 1 Ki. iv. 8; Neh. iii. 9.

HURAI (hu'ri), one of David's warriors, 1 Chr. xi. 32. He is also called Hiddai, 2 Sam. xxiii. 30.

HURD, RICHARD, D.D., a distinguished English prelate, was born at Congreve, in Staffordshire, in 1720. He was educated first at Brewood Grammar School, and then at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. In 1750, on the recommendation of Bishop Warburton, he was appointed Whitehall preacher, and in 1767 was promoted to the archdeaconry of Gloucester. The next year he took his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and was appointed to open the lecture founded by Warburton for the illustration of the prophetic Scriptures; his twelve discourses he published in 1772, under the title of "An Introduction to the Study of the Prophecies concerning the Christian Church, and in particular concerning the Church of Papal Rome." This was the first of the "Warburtonian Lectures." Notwithstanding the polemical cast of some of these sermons, the clear exposition of the general principles of prophecy and of the claims which this portion of the Sacred Scriptures has on the serious and unprejudiced attention of thoughtful readers, conveyed in perspicuous and even elegant language, has secured a large amount of popularity for the work even up to recent times. Hurd, who was promoted to the see of Lichfield and Coventry in 1775, and six years afterward was translated to the bishopric of Worcester, was pressed by the king to accept the primacy, which he declined. He died in 1808.

HURDIS (hur'dis), JAMES, D.D., an English divine, was born at Bishopstone, Sussex, in 1763, and was educated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. He was elected a Fellow of Magdalene College, 1782, and presented to the living of Bishopstone in 1791. In 1793 he was elected to the professorship of poetry in the university of Oxford. He died in 1801. His works of Biblical interest are the following: "Select Critical Remarks upon the English Version of the First Ten Chapters of Genesis," and "Twelve Dissertations on the Nature and Occasion of Psalm and Prophecy."

HURI (hu're), a descendant of Gad, 1 Chr. v. 14.

HURRION (hur're-on), JOHN, an Independent minister of England, was born about 1675. At the age of twenty-one he began his ministry as pastor of a church in Denton, Norfolk, from which he removed to a congregation in London. He published "Treatise on the Holy Spirit," which was afterward included, together with a number of miscellaneous sermons and ad-

HUNGARIAN CONFESSION, the Confession of Faith adopted in 1558 by the Synod of Czenger, for the Reformed Church of Hungary. The Reformed churches of Poland refused to accept it in consequence of its strongly Calvinistic doctrines, particularly on the subject of the Lord's Supper.

HUNNIUS (hoon'ne-us), ÆGIDIUS, an eminent Lutheran Reformer, was born in 1550, at Winenden, in Wurtemberg. He enjoys the unhappy distinction of having materially promoted in every way the disunion of the Protestants. He drew up the well-known test articles which are used in the Saxon Church to the present day. He died in 1603.

HUNS, a nation of Asiatic origin, probably identical with the Scythians, who made incursions into the Roman empire during the fifth century. Their ancient seat was near the boundaries of China, upon the vast plains north of the Great Wall, which was built in order to prevent their continual aggressions. After this they broke up into two separate camps, one of which went to the south, and the other traveled westward to the Volga, and invaded the territory of the Alani, whom they defeated. After the lapse of two centuries they crossed the Bosphorus and invaded Rome under their leader Attila, after whose death their power was utterly broken. Numbers of them joined the Avars and other northern tribes, and were hence called Hunnavares. When, in the eighth century, they were reduced to slavery, they first became acquainted with Christianity, but resisted its advances. In 799 Charlemagne completely overpowered them, and subsequent Christian princes took special interest in their conversion, founding monasteries among them, and peopling their territory with Germans, till they were gradually amalgamated with the latter race.

HUNT, ABSALOM, a popular preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born December 4, 1773, in Virginia. He began his ministry as a local preacher, but afterward joined the Kentucky Conference, and, though comparatively uneducated, preached with most useful results, and was acceptable even to the learned and refined. He died February 21, 1841.

HUNT, THOMAS, D.D., an eminent English Hebrew scholar, was born in 1696, and educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow. He was first elected the regius professor of Hebrew, next Laudian professor of Arabic, and canon of Christ Church in 1747. He died in 1774.

He is noticed here for his work entitled "Observations on several Passages in the Book of Proverbs, with two Sermons." This work embraces some twenty-six passages of the book of Proverbs. His proposed emendations of the translation are generally important, and throw much light on some of the more difficult passages of the book. Dr. Hunt was the author also of a Latin dissertation "On the Use of the Oriental Dialects" in the interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures.

HUNTER (hun'ter), HENRY, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian divine, was born at Culross, in Perth-shire, in 1741, was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and became tutor to the sons of Lord Dundonald. He was subsequently pastor of the Scottish Church, London Wall, and was elected secretary to the corresponding board of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in the Highlands. He was the author of "Sacred Biography," and translated Sonnini's Travels, St. Pierre's Studies of Nature, Lavater's Physiognomy, and other French works. He died in 1802.

HUNTING (hun'ing). We read of hunters in the early ages of the world, as Nimrod, Gen. x. 9, Ishmael, xxi. 20, Esau, xxv. 27. There were savage beasts in Palestine, Ex. xxiii. 29, lions, Jud. xiv. 5; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Ki. xiii. 24; xx. 36; 2 Ki. xvii. 25; Jer. xlix. 19, wild boars, Ps.

HUNTER, HUMPHREY, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Londonderry, Ireland, where he was born May 14, 1755. He came to this country during his infancy. He fought gallantly in the patriot cause during the Revolution, and after the close of the war he was ordained and installed as pastor of Steele Creek Church, North Carolina. He died August 21, 1827.

In consequence of the publication of this work he lost the friendship of many of his former associates, who even went to the length of presenting charges against him. He afterward published "The Reunion of Christians into a Single Confession of Faith," which was condemned by the synod of Anjou, who refused to allow him to explain his views. Emigrating to England after his deposition from the priesthood, he was reinstated without retracting his views. He died in England in 1690.

HUKKOK (huk'kok). 1. A border-place of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 34. On its site is the modern village Yakuk to the west of the northern end of the sea of Galilee. 2. A Levitical city of Asher, 1 Chr. vi. 75. For this we find Helkath in Josh. xxi. 31.

Jeremiah had begun to prophesy before this time, and it has been questioned why the king did not apply to him; but he was young, and was, it is most likely, still residing at Anathoth.

HULSE, JOHN, the founder of the Hulsean lectures, was born in 1708, at Middlewich. He was a clergyman of the Church of England and member of St. John's College, Cambridge. He bequeathed landed estates to found an annual prize essay, and the offices of "Christian Advocate" and "Christian Preacher," whose duties were to deliver in the year twenty sermons on either the evidences of Christianity or the difficulties of Scripture. This bequest accumulated for thirty years, and subsequently the number of Hulsean lectures was reduced to six. The office has been held by eminent members of the university, such as the well-known writers Blunt, Archbishop Trench, Dean Alford, Wordsworth, Darling and Farrar.

HULSEMANN (hool'seh-man), JOHANN, a distinguished Lutheran divine, was born in 1602, in Ostfriesland. After completing his studies at the universities of Wittenberg and Leipzig, he held the chair of theology in the former institution, and some years later in the latter. He was a thoroughly able theologian, and was strongly opposed to Calvinism, presenting his views in a work entitled "Calvinism Irreconcilable." His chief work was an "Abstract of Theology." He died in 1661.

HUMANISTS (hu'man-ists), the designation given to a party, during the sixteenth century, who devoted themselves to the study of belles lettres, and at first arraying themselves against the prevailing systems of the schools, soon extended their controversies into the field of philosophy and theology, under the leadership of Erasmus and Reuchlin.

HUMANITARIANS (hu-man-e-tay're-anz). 1. A term applied to those who deny the divinity of Christ and assert that he was merely human. They must not be confounded, however, with the Arian sects, for these latter at least admit the pre-existence of Christ. The earliest known author of Humanitarianism is generally believed to have been Theodotus of Byzantium, who flourished during the second century. 2. The name is also sometimes given to those who totally deny the need of supernatural aid, and rely solely upon the all-sufficiency of human nature to attain perfection.

HUMBERT (hung-bayr'), an eminent Benedictine, a native of France, was born in the latter part of the tenth century. He was made archbishop of Sicily, and afterward cardinal bishop of Silva Candida, probably the first Frenchman who ever received the latter honor. He was held in high esteem by Pope Leo IX., and by several of his successors. He was sent upon an embassy to Constantinople, with a view to effecting a union with the Eastern Church. Pope Victor III. honored him with the appointment of chancellor and librarian at the Vatican, and he continued in these offices for many years. He died about 1603. Among his works are two treatises against the Eastern Church, and one against the Simonians.

HUME, DAVID, the English historian and philosopher, was born in 1711, at Edinburgh. He produced his first work, "Treatise of Human Nature," during a lengthened sojourn in France. Though in it he vigorously attacked the existing systems of philosophy, he did not attract any general attention until the appearance, five years after, of his "Essays, Moral and Political," but even this was but little noticed. An appointment as tutor to a young Scotch nobleman of weak intellect relieved Hume from the embarrassment of small means. Soon after, he obtained the more congenial post of secretary to General St. Clair, whom he accompanied to the courts of Vienna and Turin. His next work was an "Inquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals," shortly after the appearance of which he took up his residence in Edinburgh, where he was appointed to a librarianship. Here he composed the first part of his "History of Great Britain," which was received with an outburst of reprobation from men of all classes and parties. The appearance of the second part, however, not only met with a better reception, but was the means of commending the previous one to the public. Between the appearance of these two he published his "Natural History of Religion," which was violently assailed by Hurd. What Hume had now written was of sufficient power to bring him under the notice of influential men, and in 1763 he accompanied Lord Hertford to Paris in the capacity of secretary of the British embassy. There he formed an intimacy with the philosophers and literati who crowded the salons, and among these were Rousseau, whose alliance became the cause of much annoyance. Returning to London, he became under-secretary of state, and the next and last ten years of his life were passed in the enjoyment of the society of men of letters, and in a state of luxurious ease, which formed a strong contrast to the exigencies of his earlier days. Hume's philosophy is of a thoroughly infidel character; it denies the existence of Providence and the truth of miracles, and of the religion which is built upon them, and reduces everything to a hazy idealism and nihilism; and though his history is incomparable as respects its composition, it is often inaccurate in its facts and partial in its judgments.

HUMERALE (hu-mer-ah'lay), a square piece of linen worn by the priests of the Roman Catholic Church in going to and from the altar and the sacristy, and at high mass when the priests seat themselves. It is placed first on the head, and then allowed to fall on the neck. The humerale symbolizes the humanity which conceals the divinity of our Lord, and the cloth with which his face was covered and the helmet of salvation.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST.

HUMILITY (hu-mil'i-te), a Christian grace, the opposite of pride and self-confidence. This grace it was, perhaps, which could least be understood by the heathen, words exactly to express the idea not existing in the Greek and Latin languages, and, so far as it was comprehended, it was contemned by proud and vain-glorious men. Humility is impressed on believers both by the example of Christ, John xiii. 2-15; Phil. ii. 5-8, and by precept, 1 Pet. v. 5, 6. It was the fruit of the Spirit, and cautions were given against a false humility, Col. ii. 18.

A special use of a kindred word may be here noted: To "humble" a woman is to have unjustifiable carnal connection with her, Gen. xxxiv. 2, marg.; Deut. xxi. 14; Ezek. xxii. 10.

HUMPHREY (hum'fre), LAURENCE, a learned English divine, was born at Newport-Pagnel, in Buckinghamshire, about the year 1527. He studied at Oxford, where he became Regius professor of divinity, and Fellow and president of Magdalen College. He was successively dean of Gloucester and Winchester, and might have been a bishop but for his puritanical principles. He died in 1590, leaving several scholarly works, among which is a "Life of Bishop Jewel."

HUMPHREYS, PELHAM, an English musician of the time of Charles II., by whom he was patronized. He was celebrated for his anthems. He died in 1674.

the scenes enacted among the Vaudois in Provence showed the utterly heartless policy of the party in power; and yet while murder stalked abroad the cause of Reform advanced, and men of learning, of rank and influence threw themselves into the struggle on behalf of the Reformed cause. "The heads of the house of Bourbon, Antoine, duke of Vendôme, and Louis, prince of Condé, declared themselves in its favor. The former became the husband of the celebrated Jeanne d'Albret, queen of Navarre, daughter of the Protestant Margaret of Valois, and the latter became the recognized leader of the Huguenots. The head of the Coligny family took the same side. The Montmorencies were equally divided, the constable halting between the two opinions, waiting to see which should prove the stronger, while others of the family openly sided with the Reformed. Indeed, it seemed at one time as if France were on the point of turning Protestant." Such an appearance was presented by a synod which the Huguenots held in 1559 as led De Sainte-Croix to write to the pope, that "the kingdom is already half Huguenot." To stir up Henry II. to vigorous measures the policy was adopted of making him believe that he was in personal danger, and to bring matters to a crisis, he was assured by the cardinal of Lorraine that, "if the secular arm failed in its duty, all the malcontents would throw themselves into this detestable sect;" and the result was another terrible storm of persecution. Confiscation, banishment and death became the order of the day; and when Henry was succeeded by Francis II., the atrocities not only continued, but they became so intolerable that the suffering people were obliged to rise in self-defence. Such conduct was denounced as revolt and rebellion; and the plans which had been laid to set aside the Guises, remove the king and make the prince of Condé governor of the kingdom being betrayed, the Huguenots who had taken arms were easily captured, and as many as 1200 of them were executed. During the minority of Charles IX. the policy of Catherine de Medicis aimed at balancing the parties against each other, and a proposal for a conference was agreed to, which led to a discussion between the cardinal of Lorraine on the one side, and Beza on the other side, in which the cardinal suffered a signal defeat. This meeting, known in the history of the French Church as the "Conference of Poissy," encouraged the Protestants, and they proceeded to adopt the Calvinistic Confession as the standard of their Church, and their prospects became apparently much brighter in consequence of a royal edict being issued in January, 1562, in which they were secured in the liberty of their worship. Believing in the honesty of the party in power, the Protestants now met publicly in great numbers, as many as 3000 having assembled at Vassy for the dispensation of the Lord's Supper. The bishop of Châlons interfered to prohibit such assemblages; but a few months afterward, when 1200 persons had met in the same place for worship, they were attacked by the duke of Guise and massacred. Such a barbarous outrage, instead of filling the land with horror, only stimulated the virulence of the leaders of the Romish party; the work of butchery went on, and the result was that such a convulsion took place as led to the struggle known as the first Huguenot war, which continued until the dread of English interference led to a settlement, known as the peace of Amboise, concluded in 1563. Utterly faithless, the court fell from its engagements, and one act of cruelty and treachery after another, led to the second Huguenot war, which began in September, 1567. At St. Denis 2700 Huguenots withstood the assault of 20,000 royal troops, and the victory was undecided; and Condé, being reinforced, advanced and threatened Paris, whereupon a treaty of peace was concluded by Catherine, who had become greatly alarmed. No regard, however, was paid to the terms of the treaty, for in less than three months more than 3000 Protestants were mercilessly butchered. Thus fraud, violence and murder continued to oppress the Protestants, and eventually, the policy of the court and the Romish leaders having arranged a grand concerted plan, the bloody tragedy of St. Bartholomew was enacted, in which, according to Romish historians, no less than 100,000 persons, in different places in France, were massacred. This butchery weakened the Protestant cause. "In the Cevennes, Dauphiny and other quarters they betook themselves to the mountains for refuge. In the plains of the South fifty towns closed their gates against the royal troops. Wherever resistance was possible, it showed itself;" and so the fourth Huguenot war began, which closed in 1573 by concessions being made to the Protest-desire to escape from such a devoted land became general. Crowds of fugitives managed to flee, and ere long Holland, England, Ireland and the British colonies were replenished by multitudes of the best citizens of France, who carried with them into their new homes, the knowledge of the arts and manufactures which made these new settlers a blessing to the lands which fostered them; while their loss to France was beyond all calculation. These Huguenot emigrants who fled for conscience's sake made their mark in all places where they settled. In Belfast and other places in Ireland, in New York and Carolina, in Northumberland and other places in the North of England, and in Spitalfields in London, where a large colony settled, the names of the people, and even the forms of the houses, showed the influence of the Huguenot settlements. At the present time, in the United States, the old forms and the liturgy of the old Calvinistic Church are only to be found in the Huguenot Church in Charleston, South Carolina; elsewhere the influence of intermarriages and social usages have prevailed to modify the ritual of the olden times. When Louis XV. ascended the ants, and certain towns in the South being given to them, together with freedom of conscience. Thus, from time to time, the treacherous and bloody policy continued, the sufferings of the people becoming more and more intolerable, until at length they were obliged to have recourse to arms. A fifth, a sixth, a seventh and an eighth war showed the tenacity of the fell purpose that existed, to root Protestantism out of the land, and the magnanimity of the people who held to their faith in the midst of such wasting of human life and the sufferings which seemed to be perennial. When Henry IV., who abjured Protestantism for the sake of the crown, ascended to power, a measure of security was vouchsafed to his former coreligionists, and on April 15, 1598, their privileges were guaranteed by the celebrated Edict of Nantes. See NANTES. After his death their trials began, and under Louis XIII., by the policy of Richelieu, they were deprived of many of their privileges, and the plan was projected for crushing them altogether; but it remained for Louis XIV., by his "revocation of the Edict of Nantes" and the steadfast adherence to the plan of extermination when begun under his reign, to fill the hearts of a noble people with feelings of despair. Amidst the proscriptions and murders which now commenced, the throne, the Jesuits again made another movement to evil entreat the Protestants who remained, but the nation seemed to have had enough of blood, and in the provinces a measure of toleration was vouchsafed to them. When the Revolution broke out, in 1793, a resolution was carried in the General Assembly to admit the Protestants to equal rights, and the "Code Napoleon" placed them on the same footing as the members of other churches. For matters which bear on the present condition of their descendants in their native land, see FRENCH REFORMED CHURCH.

HUISE (heu'ish), ALEXANDER, a distinguished scholar and divine of the Church of England, lived during the seventeenth century. He assisted Bishop Walton in the preparation of his "Polyglot Bible," and published "Lectures on the Lord's Prayer."

HUISSEAU (wis'so), JACQUES D', a distinguished French theologian of the seventeenth century. His fame chiefly rests upon a work published by him while professor of theology at Saumur. It is entitled "The Disciple of the Reformed Church of France, with a Collection of Observations and Inquiries respecting the towers, for magnitude, proportion and style, would be worthy to hold the place of a central tower in any cathedral. The edifice itself stretches from west to east considerably above five hundred feet, the western transept is two hundred and twenty-five feet long, while the eye is at once arrested by the splendid central tower, rising up, with a breadth of fifty feet, to the enormous elevation of two hundred and thirty-eight feet, with a stateliness and dignity such as can be seen in no other tower of any cathedral of England, France or perhaps any other country. The chapter-house, which is decagonal in form, is wondrously beautiful, and the rose windows in the transepts are most imposing, because of their magnitude and delicate tracery. Altogether, Lincoln Cathedral stands out as a splendid monument of the talent, energy and liberality of the men who raised this gorgeous pile. He died in 1200, and was canonized in 1221.

2. DE WELLS was a very celebrated bishop of the diocese of Lincoln, England, in the thirteenth century. He was famed for his liberality and profuse use of the great wealth which he commanded. He persevered in carrying out the tenure of church property, then vested in lay trustees; and by his superior administrative talent he was enabled to accumulate an immense property, which he used in extending the denominational schools and institutions of his Church. Having purchased property at Fordham, in West Chester county, and organized the St. John's College and the theological seminary of St. Joseph, he became involved in a controversy on the subject with a prominent daily journal of New York. He has been severely reprobated for the part he took in the movement made by the Roman Catholics to secure a modification of the public school system in their favor. Archbishop Hughes possessed considerable political influence in the United States, and was held in high esteem by all sects and parties. In 1847, by invitation of Congress, he delivered in the Representatives' Hall a lecture on "Christianity the only Source of Moral, Social and Political Regeneration." At the opening of the rebellion, in 1861, he was selected by the Secretary of State to go to Europe to counteract the plottings of rebel agents. The discussions already alluded to have been collected in book form, and the Latin Vulgate. Hugo was also the author of a "Concordance to the Holy Bible." It is the earliest Scriptural concordance—understanding by this term an alphabetical index to the words of Scripture. In addition to these works he was the author of a commentary on the entire Scriptures, written on the principle of discovering a fourfold sense in every passage—literal, allegorical, moral and mystical.

3. OF NONANT, an English prelate, was a native of Nonant, in Normandy, where he was born in the early part of the twelfth century. He graduated at Oxford, and was made archdeacon of Lisieux, and then bishop of Coventry. Through his influence the bishops of Durham and Ely were removed in 1191. He himself was expelled in 1194, and only allowed to return on payment of a heavy fine. He died in 1198.

4. OF RHEIMS, noted as having been elected archbishop before he was five years of age, lived during the tenth century. Contentions afterward arose, when a successor was appointed; but Hugo having obtained favor with the pope, he continued as incumbent of the see until some years later, when a national synod deposed him.

5. OF ST. VICTORE was born at Ypres in 1097, and educated in the monastery of Hamersleben. In 1115 he went to Paris and entered the monastery of St. Victor. He next became the head of the school, and here he labored with great success during the remainder of a secluded but useful life. He died in 1141. His great success in expounding the theology of Augustine procured him the name of "The mouth of Augustine," or "Augustine the Second." The aim of the illustrious school of theology to which he belonged was to unite and harmoniously to reconcile the scholastic and mystic tendencies, the light and warmth, which had appeared more in opposition in Abelard and Bernard; nor would it be easy to exaggerate the influence for good which went forth from this institution during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries upon the whole Church. In Biblical interpretation he gave precedence to the historical sense, but admits, as was usual in his time, the allegorical and tropological.

plans of Hugh de Grenoble in perfecting the cathedral, directing his efforts to the nave, as his predecessor had erected the choir, and thus the energy of these two men produced an ecclesiastical structure which for magnitude, grandeur of effect and loftiness of conception has recorded their fame for more than six hundred years. Hugh de Wells occupied the chair of Lincoln from 1209 to 1235.

HUGHES (hewz), JOHN, a distinguished American Roman Catholic prelate, was a native of the North of Ireland, where he was born in 1798. At the age of nineteen he came to America, and engaged himself to a florist, but subsequently studied at the theological seminary of St. Mary's at Emmitsburg, Maryland, and was ordained at Philadelphia, where he preached several years. He thence removed to New York, where he was made assistant bishop and then bishop. In 1850, when New York was created an archbishopric, he made a voyage to Rome and received the pallium from the pope. Archbishop Hughes gained some notoriety by two celebrated controversies, one with Dr. John Breckenridge, and the other with Dr. Nicholas Murray, "Kirwan," who had vigorously denounced the Romish Church. As archbishop, he early directed his attention to a change in the HUGO (heu'go). 1. OF AMIENS, or OF ROUEN, an eminent Roman Catholic divine, was born at Amiens, France, toward the close of the eleventh century. He was prior of the monastery at Lewes, in England, and afterward abbot of Reading. From this he was promoted to the archbishopric of Rouen, but quarreling with his patron, Henry I., retired into Italy until the king's death, when he returned and took part in the coronation of Henry II. at Westminster.

2. DE SANCTO CARO (deh sangk'to cah'ro), sometimes called HUGO DE S. THEODORICO (the-or-do-re'ko), a distinguished French theologian, was born at St. Cher, near Vienne, toward the close of the twelfth century. He studied in the university of Paris, where he subsequently held one of the chairs of theology. In 1225 he was received into the order of the Dominicans, and in 1227 was appointed provincial of this order in France. He was made cardinal by Innocent IV. in 1244. He died at Orvieto, March 19, 1263, and was buried at Lyons. At the request of the Chapter-General of the Dominicans, he undertook the revision of the text of HUGUENOTS (heu'ge-not), a name given in the sixteenth century to the Protestants of France; but the origin of the word is very uncertain; it has been derived from the German "eidgenossen," signifying the "Swiss confederates." The Reformed in France looked to Geneva and the Swiss who defended themselves against Charles III., duke of Savoy, and they were called "Eignots." In Touraine, where the Protestants had to assemble at night for their services, the word "hugon" means a night- or street-walker; and this has been held as accounting for the term; while the support given by the Protestants to Henry IV., the descendant of "Hugues" Capet, is held by others to have led to the nickname.

When the Reformation spread over Germany, it soon began to affect France. As early as 1523 Melchior Wolmar preached extensively in the south of France, and the favor which Margaret of Navarre showed to the Reformers encouraged them in their work. Great numbers of the New Testament were scattered over the southern part of the kingdom, and multitudes cast off their allegiance to the Romish faith. In Paris, Calvin labored with great success in 1533, and the result was the awakening of the higher ranks of the clergy to a sense of their danger, and forthwith the work of persecution began. The horrors of Huber strongly advocated the Lutheran doctrine respecting the eucharist and vigorously opposed the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, presenting his views in public discussions at Wittenberg and Regensburg. He died March 25, 1624. Among his works the best known is "Christ suffered Death for the Sins of all Men."

HUBERINUS (hu-ber-e'nus), or HUBER, KASPAR, an active leader of the Reformation, was born in the latter part of the fifteenth century, in Bavaria. He was at first a monk; but afterward embracing Protestantism, he was appointed pastor of a church at Augsburg. He was a zealous advocate of the Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and engaged vigorously in opposition to the Anabaptists. In 1552, having alone of all the Augsburg preachers accepted the Interim issued by Charles V., he was compelled to leave that city, and he died in the following year, at Oehringen.

HUBERT (heu-bert), or HUBERTUS (hubert'us), SAINT, was a nobleman of the court of the king of the Franks. He engaged in all the pleasures of the court, and was especially fond of the chase. There is a tradition that while hunting one day there spoke to him a milk-white stag, with a crucifix between his antlers, who warned him against continuing his wicked career. He forsook his sinful pleasures, became a priest, and at length was made bishop of Lüttich in 708. He died in 727. A century after his death the Benedictines of Ardennes had his body removed to their convent.

HUBERTINE ANALIST, an anonymous writer of the eleventh century who wrote the chronicles of St. Hubert's monastery, in imitation of the style of Sallust.

HUC (huke), EVARISTE REGIS, an eminent French abbé and missionary to the Chinese, was born at Toulouse in 1813. He published "Recollections of a Voyage to Tartary, Thibet and China," and as a continuation of this, "The Chinese Empire." These were followed by "Christianity in China." He died in Paris in 1860.

HUESCA (hues'ca), COUNCIL OF. Of this council, held in 598, at Huesca, Spain, only two canons now exist; one prescribes an annual meeting of the diocesan synods, at which the clergy are to be exhorted by the bishop respecting the duties of frugality and chastity; the other requires the bishop to inform himself whether the law of chastity is observed by the clergy.

HUESCA, DURANDO DE, the founder of a community called the "Poor Catholics," in the thirteenth century. He had been a member of the Albigenses, but returned to Romanism, and from Innocent III. received remission of his "heresy."

HUET (hu'et), PETER DANIEL, bishop of Avranches, was born at Caen, in Normandy, February 8, 1630, and was left an orphan when scarcely six years old. His education began in the Jesuits' College of Caen, and for eight years he pursued his studies there with an insatiable voracity for knowledge that became the ruling passion of his life. He accompanied Bochart in his visit to Sweden, where he met with a manuscript of Origen's commentary on Matthew and his treatise on

Prayer, which suggested to him the publication of the works of that Father—a task he partially accomplished fifteen years afterward. In 1670 he was appointed tutor of the dauphin, and superintended the Delphin edition of Latin authors. In his forty-sixth year he took orders, and was made abbot of Aulnar; in the same year, 1685, he was nominated to the see of Soissons, which, seven years after, he exchanged for that of Avranches. In 1699, owing to the state of his health, he resigned his bishopric and received in lieu of it the abbacy of Fontenai, two miles from Caen. He died January 26, 1721, within eleven days of the completion of his ninety-first year. Only three years before his death he wrote and published an interesting but brief autobiography. After his duties as preceptor to the dauphin had ceased he renewed his application to the Hebrew language, to which he added the Syriac and Arabic. For the space of thirty-one years he suffered no day to pass without devoting two or three hours to Oriental literature, and during that period read through the original text of the Old Testament twenty-four times. Of his various works the most important are—lyceum of his native place, afterward at the university of Freiburg. In 1789 he became a priest; in 1791 he was appointed professor of theology at Freiburg, where he remained till his death, March 11, 1846. He is the author of an "Introduction to the New Testament," a work of great ability and learning, though containing much that is adverse to the recent results of criticism. He is also the author of a "Critique on Strauss' Life of Jesus." Hug contributed to the criticism of the New Testament, especially in the department of ancient versions, which is his strongest side. In the region of manuscripts he was less successful, though always suggestive and ingenious.

HUGH DE GRENOBLE (heu deh gren'o-b'l), who was also called THE BURGUNDIAN, was a Carthusian monk for some time, and by Henry II. he was made the sixth bishop of the see of Lincoln. He occupies a prominent place in the thirteenth century as the builder of a great part of the magnificent cathedral, which takes rank among the most famous of all the first-class ecclesiastical edifices of Europe. HUFNAGEL (huf'na-gel), WILHELM FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian, was born at Hall, in Swabia, June 15, 1754. Having studied at the universities of Altorf and Erlangen, he became professor extraordinary of philosophy at the latter place in 1779, and in 1782 ordinary professor of theology. In 1788 he received the pastorate of the academical church, and was also appointed overseer of the seminary for preachers. In 1791 he was called to Frankfort-on-the-Main as counselor of the consistory and preacher in one of the old churches there. He died February 7, 1830. Hufnagel was a learned theologian, and was especially versed in the Shemitic languages. Most of his writings are sermons, or bear upon the conduct of life. Though of great repute in his day, Hufnagel is almost forgotten at the present time. None of his printed works had the element of permanence or immortality.

HUG, JOHN LEONHARD, a Roman Catholic theologian and linguist, was born at Constance, June 1, 1765, and educated at the gymnasium and see, had managed to complete a cathedral in the year 1092, which was dedicated by his successor. The third bishop made repairs, but an earthquake in 1185 ruined the edifice; and as Bishop Hugh succeeded in 1186, he had the great work of re-edification before him. He took down at least one-half of the cathedral, and built the present east transept with its chapels, the whole of the choir, chapter-house and east side of the west transept, with part of the additions to the original west front.

The cathedral as it now stands is of vast magnitude, of varied aspect in consequence of the two transepts crossing the main building, the great number of chapels attached, the galilee, the gorgeous chapter-house and the cloisters with the library over. Its situation is most commanding, and the first view of it from any point, however distant, is most imposing; it stands on a lofty eminence surrounded by an immense extent of level country. It looks down not only on the modern city at the base, and creeping up the side of the hill, but also upon a great part of this still too extensive diocese. Some idea of the effective character of this vast edifice may be comprehended by a consideration of the size and beauty of the different parts. The western façade extends one hundred and seventy-five feet, each of the western Harvard, and settled as a Congregational pastor at Hopkinton in 1791. This was his only charge, and he labored faithfully in it until his death, in 1827. His chief work was a reply to Dr. Baldwin, in which he endeavored to prove that John's baptism was not gospel baptism.

HOWELL (how'el), LAWRENCE, who became famous as one of the non-jurors, was born about 1660. He was educated at Cambridge, and ordained by Dr. Hickeys, who claimed to be the titular bishop of Thetford. A pamphlet which Howell published on "Schism in the Church of England" led to his arrest, and he was convicted and sentenced to be whipped, condemned to three years' imprisonment and to pay a fine of £500. The fine was remitted, but he died in Newgate in 1720, suffering the grievous sentence imposed on him. He was thoroughly educated, exceedingly honest, and his sufferings bore evidence to the ideas of civil and religious liberty which then prevailed.

HOWGILL (how'gil), FRANCIS, who became famous as a preacher among the "Friends," was a native of Westmoreland, England, where he was born in 1638. He forsook the Established Church, attached himself to George Fox, and in 1654 he set out with two friends as preacher. He applied for protection to Cromwell, and so long as he remained in London he was comparatively free from annoyance. In Bristol they met with much opposition, and on visiting the north-west he was arrested at Kendal, and committed to prison on his refusal to take the oath of allegiance. He remained in prison until he died, in 1688. His chief employment while confined was in preparing a work against oaths.

HOWIE (how'ee), JOHN, was one of the most famous of all the writers which the struggles and contentings for religion in Scotland has produced. He is known as "Howie of Loch Goin." He was born in 1735, at Loch Goin, and he early devoted himself to the study of Church history, and especially to the biography of eminent men of Scotland who had taken part in the struggles for religious liberty which made that country celebrated. In 1767 he entered on his great life-work, the preparation of "The Scotch Worthies," which appeared in 1774, and at once it became a household book in the homes of Scotland. It displays a wonderful amount of research, and the subjects of the biographies are dealt with in a manner that displays a tender regard for their character amounting to veneration. It will never be displaced in Scottish literature so long as any regard remains for the contentings of the men who lived and labored and suffered for a Covenanted Reformation. He published several other works; among which the chief are on "Witness-bearing," "Faithful Contentings" and the "Proper Mode of Celebrating the Lord's Supper;" but the "Scotch Worthies" was his great work. He died in 1791. The sanctity of his character aided largely in giving tone and influence to his works.

HOWLEY (how'le), WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Ropely, in Hampshire, in 1765. He was educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford, passing through the various grades of the university with honor and success, till in 1809 he was appointed regius professor of divinity. In 1813 he was nominated bishop of London, and in 1823 translated to the primacy, the onerous duties of which he discharged with zeal and fidelity for twenty years. As archbishop of Canterbury he vehemently opposed the Catholic emancipation bill in 1829 as dangerous to the Church, and the reform bill in 1831 as no less dangerous to the constitution. Dr. Howley enjoyed a high reputation for scholarship, and the sermons and charges which he gave to the world showed him to be possessed of good sense, good feeling and sincere piety. He died in 1848.

HOWSON (how'sun), JOHN, who held several distinguished places in the English Church, was born in London in 1556, and educated at Oxford. In 1619 he became bishop of Oxford, and he held the office of vice chancellor of the university. Nine years afterward he was removed to Durham, where he exerted himself against the Puritans, who "scrupled at the ceremonies; but he turned with still more zeal to the controversy against the Romish claims, and at the instigation of James I. a number of his sermons were published on the supremacy of St. Peter, the object of the king being to free Howson from the suspicion of being a papist. He died in 1631.

HOYER (hoi'er), ANNA, a German mystic and Anabaptist, was born in 1584, at Goldenbuttel, near Eiderstadt, in Schleswig. After the death of her husband, a nobleman, she devoted herself to polite literature. From an alchemist who attended her during her illness she imbibed mystic views, and afterward became an enthusiastic Anabaptist. Believing herself inspired, she threw her soul into the work of making converts till she had nearly lost her entire fortune, when she retired to Sweden and passed the remainder of her life on an estate presented to her by the queen. She died in 1656.

HU (hu), written also HEUS and HESUS, has been held to be a founder of Druidism. He was recognized in the somewhat odd connection as being the god of agriculture and of war. Much of the instruction of the Druids consisted in delineating the character of their gods, such as Teutates, the god of manufacture and trade, Tavann, the god of heaven, and Belen, the son of god, who gives power to plants and the forms of vegetable life. See DRUIDS.

HUARTE (oo-ar-tay'), JUAN, a philosopher of the Spanish school, was born in France about 1530. He pursued his studies at the university of Huesca, in Spain. His reputation chiefly rests upon a psychological work which has been translated into English under the title "Trial of the Wits." In this work an attempt has been made to show what various talents are found in man and the special kind of study adapted to each; and the author claims that the attentive reader of this curious book will be able for himself to select that particular science for which his genius is best adapted. He has been censured for publishing as authentic a spurious epistle of Publius Lentulus, a Roman officer in Palestine, describing Christ's personal appearance. He died in the latter part of the sixteenth century.

HUBBARD (hub'bard), AUSTIN OSGOOD, a Congregational minister, was born August 9, 1800, at Sunderland, Massachusetts. He graduated at Yale College; and after a preliminary course of theological study, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Baltimore. He completed his theological preparation at Princeton, where, in the absence of Dr. Alexander in Europe, he was assistant professor of Biblical literature. After performing missionary work in Melbourne, C. E., for five years, he preached successively at Hardwick, Barnet and Craftesbury, Vermont. In 1857 the death of his wife occasioned mental and physical prostration, and he died August 24, 1858, in the Vermont insane asylum.

HUBBARD, JOHN, an English Independent divine, was born about 1692. He began preaching in Stepney, and was afterward pastor of a church in Deptford. After preaching there for twenty-two years, he became professor of divinity at the academy of the Independents at London, but his career of usefulness was cut short by his death in three years after, July, 1743.

HUBBARD, WILLIAM, an eminent Congregational minister, was a native of England, where he was born in 1621, but accompanied his parents to America while yet a child. After graduating at Harvard and completing a theological course, he became assistant in a church at Ipswich, of which he was afterward pastor. In 1703, on account of his advanced age, he retired from active ministerial duty, and died in the following year. Among his published works is a "Narrative of the Troubles with the Indians from 1607-1677, with a Discourse." He also left an unpublished work which has afforded assistance to American historians.

HUBBERTHORN (hub'ber-thorn), RICHARD, a preacher in the parliamentary army, and afterward a Quaker, suffered imprisonment for his belief, and died in Newgate, June 17, 1662.

HUBER (heu'ber), MARIA, a noted mystic of Geneva, was born in 1694. She passed many years of her life in retirement and contemplation, and afterward became a Roman Catholic. She died in 1759. Her chief work is "Letters upon Religion Essential to Man," in which she regards all religion as growing out of the moral necessities of man, and holds revelation to be merely a means of interpreting natural theology.

HUBER, SAMUEL, a distinguished controversialist, was born in 1547, at Berne. His theological studies were pursued in Germany, where he was pastor at Burgdorf. He persistently attacked the doctrines of the Reformed Church, for which he was imprisoned and afterward banished. At Tübingen he joined the Lutheran Church, was pastor at Doredingen and professor clearly and correctly written analysis of their works and thoughts." In 1742 he was made perpetual secretary to the "French Academy," and he died in the same year.

HOVEY (huv'e), JONATHAN P., D.D., a native of Waybridge, Vermont, was born in 1810, and educated at Jacksonville, Illinois, and Auburn Seminary. He entered the Presbyterian Church, and was ordained in 1837. He held different charges in Virginia and the State of New York, and he distinguished himself as a military chaplain. He finally settled in New York city, where he died in 1863.

HOW, SAMUEL, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born in 1788, and educated at the university of Pennsylvania. Having passed through his theological course at Princeton, he was settled at Salisbury, Pennsylvania, whence he removed to Trenton, New Jersey, and afterward to New Brunswick, whence he was transferred to Savannah, Georgia. In 1830 he became president of Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pennsylvania. In all these positions he greatly distinguished himself by his ripe scholarship and his devotion to duty. In 1855 he had a controversy on the subject of slavery with the Rev. H. D. Gause and others, which excited great attention. He died in 1868.

HOWARD (how'ard), BEZALEEL, D.D., a Unitarian minister, born in Massachusetts in 1753. He was educated at Harvard, where he became a tutor, and afterward he settled in Springfield, Massachusetts, as minister of the First Church, in 1785. In 1809 he retired from this church on account of his health, and ten years afterward he began to labor in a new charge in Springfield, where he remained until his death. A biographer says of him that in his latest years he believed in "the sole supremacy of the Father. He, however, held to the doctrine of the atonement, in the sense of propitiation or expiation, with the utmost tenacity, and he regarded the rejection of it as a rejection of Christianity. His views of the character of the Saviour were not, perhaps, very accurately defined; he seemed to regard him as an eternal emanation from Deity; not a creature in the strict sense on the one hand, nor yet the supreme God on the other." He died in 1837.

HOWARD, HENRY, a descendant of the earl of Surrey, was born in 1757. He raised and commanded the volunteer corps called "The Cumberland Rangers," and was the author of a book written to correct the "erroneous opinions respecting the Roman Catholic religion," of which he was an adherent, and also of a laborious work, "Memorials of the Howard Family." He died in 1842.

HOWARD, JOHN, a distinguished Christian philanthropist, was born in 1726, at Hackney, near London. He was the son of a London tradesman, from whom he inherited an independent fortune. He was twice married, and the death of his second wife, at his country-seat at Cardington, Bedfordshire, so preyed upon him that he took no longer the pleasure he had felt in the improvement of his estate and the condition of his tenants. In earlier life he had been detained a prisoner in France, and the hardships he suffered and witnessed first roused his attention to the subject of his future labors. When, in 1773, as high-sheriff of Bedfordshire, it became his duty to visit the country prisons, what he then officially saw, stirred him up to the great work of prison reform, with which his name will be for ever connected. The details of his work in this cause would fill a volume. He made many journeys through the United Kingdom, inspecting every prison, and collecting a vast mass of information, with which he startled the nation when he laid it before the House of Commons. Though something was then done to improve prisons and ameliorate the condition of their inmates, Howard did not relax in his efforts. Not only did he make a tour of the prisons at home, minister, was born in North Carolina of Roman Catholic ancestry, in 1792. He entered the ministry in 1818, and labored in South Carolina and Augusta. He had remarkable success in his ministry in Augusta, Savannah and Charleston; and after having effected great good over an extensive region in the South, he died in 1836, deeply regretted.

HOWARD, SIMEON, D.D., was a Congregationalist minister of Unitarian views, a native of Maine, being born in 1733 at Bridgewater. He was educated at Harvard; and a call being tendered to him from a church in Nova Scotia, he removed to that province, from which he returned in 1765 to Cambridge and became a tutor in Harvard. He was settled as pastor of the West Church in Boston. During the revolutionary struggle he removed again to Nova Scotia, and ultimately returned to Boston, where he remained until his death, in 1804. He held the office of an overseer and Fellow of Harvard, and the university of Edinburgh, in recognition of his literary standing, conferred on him an honorary degree in divinity.

HOWE (how), JOHN, one of the most distinguished of the Puritan divines, was born in 1630, at Loughborough, in Leicestershire. He began his collegiate course at Cambridge, where he came under the influence of Cudworth, Henry More and John Smith, profound thinkers and disciples of Plato. He afterward went to Oxford, where he graduated, and after having been ordained by a nonconformist divine, he was settled as minister of Great Torrington, in Devonshire. In 1657 Cromwell called him to Whitehall as his chaplain. There he remained till the resignation of Richard Cromwell, and then returned to Torrington. But the Act of Uniformity, 1662, drove him from his living, and for years he was a fugitive and wanderer. In 1671 he became chaplain to Lord Massarene, of Antrim castle, Ireland, where he spent five peaceful years, and wrote the first part of his chief work, "The Living Temple." He returned to London, avoided controversy, and escaped persecution till 1685, when he went on the Continent with Philip Lord Wharton, and remained at Utrecht till the revolution. He took part in the attempts to unite the Presbyterians and Congregationalists, and in the Antinomian and "occasional conformity" controversies. After long-suffering from decaying health, he died in April, 1705. He was a voluminous writer, but his works are now little read, though they are rich in thought and contain many specimens of genuine eloquence. In general, however, his style is faulty, although much of the difficulty found in reading his works must be attributed to the character of their editing. Howe is recognized as one of the most philosophical and profound of all the Puritan divines.

but he visited those of Europe, his disinterested charity unlocking the gates in the most jealous capitals. A third time he repeated this philanthropic mission, inspecting the Rasp Houses of Holland, and extending his scrutiny into the condition of hospitals. The result of each journey was published by him, and a record made in no vainglorious spirit of his exertions in behalf of the criminal and suffering classes; and as he was now over sixty years of age, he might well have rested from his labor of Christian love. But he knew the value of experience respecting prisons, and he resolved in the same way to acquire a knowledge of the best way of guarding against and treating infectious diseases. He therefore set off on a round of the lazaretto of the Mediterranean, and performed quarantine at Venice. From this he returned safe, and published "An Account of the Principal Lazarettos in Europe, with Papers Relating to the Plague," etc. In a subsequent journey to the East for a similar purpose he died in the Crimea, in 1790, of fever. His grave was honored by the Russians with the like respect with which all men greeted him when living.

materials of such tenements are mud or sun-dried brick; they are therefore easily swept away by violent rains or floods, Matt. vii. 26, 27. In some districts stone is used. Caves, too, are sometimes still occupied as dwellings, of which indeed there are many examples in Western Europe.

The materials of the better class of houses were stone, marble and other costly kinds, perhaps porphyry, basalt, etc., 1 Chr. xxix. 2, carefully squared, paneled and fitted, Amos v. 11, cemented in Babylonia with bitumen, Gen. xi. 3, with clay, or mortar composed of lime, ashes and sand, straw being sometimes added. Inferior materials, and want of proper mixing, would make this mortar liable to crumble, Ezek. xiii. 10-15, in rainy weather. Sometimes stones were fastened together with iron clamps or lead. Bricks, kiln-burnt, were probably also used. Other materials were timber, such as cedar, shittim (acacia), sycamore, olive, and in palaces algum and cypress, Ex. xxvi. 15; 1 Ki. vi. 15, 16, 32-34; vii. 8, 12; x. 12; Isa. ix. 10. The precious metals and ivory were also employed for overlaying wood-work, etc., 1 Ki. vi. 35; xxii. 39; Amos iii. 15.

The general plan of an Eastern house presents a dead wall to the street, and one or more inner courts. There is a low entrance door with an inscription from the Koran, and over it a latticed window, sometimes projecting like our antique bay-windows. A passage from the outer door leads into the first or outer court, but is so contrived that the entrance to the court is not exactly opposite to the external door, so that no view of the court is obtained from the street, nor any of the street from the court. The principal apartments look into this court, and some of them are open to it. It is occasionally shaded by an awning, and on the floor or pavement of it carpets are spread on festive occasions, while in the centre there is often a fountain. Around this court, or part of it, a verandah runs, and over this, when the house has more than one story, there is probably another balustraded gallery. In the corner of the court are the stairs to the upper apartments. Immediately opposite the side of entrance is the principal reception-room, open to the court. It has a raised terrace or platform, and is richly fitted up with sofas or "divans," round three sides, and probably with a fountain in the centre. Here the master of the house receives his visitors, his place being the corner of the divan, and each person taking off his shoes before he steps upon the raised portion of the apartment. On another side of the court, but separated by lattice-work from it, filled with colored glass, is generally another large apartment like the reception-room, and used for it in winter, or appropriated to some visitor of rank. There are other smaller rooms for visitors and retainers on this first floor, while beneath, on what may be called the basement, are servants' offices and store-places. If there be but one court, the apartments for the females are in the upper part of the house; if there be two courts, the innermost one is theirs; if more than two, the master occupies the second, and sees there those of his family whom he chooses to summon from the third court, in which they live, Esth. iv. 11. The entrance to the second court is usually at the corner of the first, by a door and passage similar to that from the street into the first.

The interior or women's court is usually larger than the first; it is paved, except in the middle, where is a tank for bathing, 2 Sam. xi. 2, and where a few trees, seldom more than two, and shrubs are planted. To the harem or women's apartment the master alone, besides the occupants, has access; here he can repose undisturbed, for no man, however intimate a friend, is admitted. Hebrew ladies were not subjected to the restraint at present customary in the East, nevertheless we find notices of a specially private part of a house—the women's apartment—sometimes resorted to as a secure hiding-place, Jud. xv. 1; 1 Ki. vii. 8; xx. 30; xxii. 25. The arrangements of the inner court are similar to those of the outer. There are galleries or verandahs; in the centre of the principal front, a large open room, and other larger or smaller apartments, closed ordinarily with curtains instead of doors. The roof of a house is flat, except where domes are introduced. Twigs, matting and earth are laid upon the rafters, trodden down and covered with a compost, hard when it is dry. But it is necessary carefully to roll it after rain. On such roofs weeds often grow, but are speedily dried up and wither, Ps. cxxix. 6, 7; Isa. xxxvii. 27. These roofs were to be carefully protected by a battlement or parapet, lest accidents should occur, Deut. xxii. 8. This toward the street is a wall, toward the interior court usually a balustrade. It may have been through this that Ahaziah fell, 2 Ki. i. 2. The roof is reached by an external staircase, so that it is not necessary to traverse any of the rooms in ascending or descending, Matt. xxiv. 17.

Ceilings were made of cedar, and artistically colored, Jer. xxii. 14, 15; Hag. i. 4. There were no chimneys; that so called, Hos. xiii. 3, was but a hole; indeed, there were ordinarily no fires except in a kitchen, where, on a kind of brick platform, places were provided for cooking. Apartments were warmed when needed by fire-pans, or fires were kindled in the court, Mark xiv. 54; Luke xxii. 55; John xviii. 18. Different rooms, too, as already mentioned in modern practice, were used in summer-time and in winter-time, Amos iii. 15; and whereas those for use in warm weather were open to the court, those for colder seasons were closed in with lattice-work and curtains, and, probably for want of glass in the windows, with shutters. There were no rooms specially appropriated as bed-rooms, just as it is common at the present day to sleep on the divan in the ordinary apartments. Hence the assassins would have easier access to Ishbosheth, 2 Sam. iv. 5-7.

The various notices we meet with in Scripture will be easily understood if the previous descriptions be borne in mind. The chamber on the wall designed for Elisha, 2 Ki. iv. 10, was probably the room over the gate with the projecting window. The "guest-chamber" where our Lord commanded his disciples to prepare for the last supper, Luke xxii. 11, 12, was one of the large reception-rooms in an upper story. It was in such a room, but on the first floor, in the palace of the high-priest, that Christ was examined, whence he could look down upon Peter at the fire in the court. The "upper room" where the disciples assembled after the ascension, Acts i. 13, was similar to the "guest-chamber" mentioned above. Similar also was that in which Paul was preaching, Acts xx. 8, 9. Eutyclus sat by the latticed window and fell through it into the court below, whither Paul went down to him. The circumstances attending the cure of the paralytic, Mark ii. 2-4; Luke v. 18, 19, may hence also be explained. Our Lord was perhaps in the verandah, while the people crowded the court and impeded the passage from the street. The bearers therefore went to the roof, and taking away part of the covering of the verandah, let the sick man down. Or it might be that Christ was in a small house with a single room, and that the friends, having mounted to the top by a ladder, either breaking through the battlement let down the sick man by the side of the house, or actually uncovering the roof passed the bed through the hole. Either of these modes was very practicable according to the circumstances, and will satisfy the terms of the narrative.

The house or temple which Samson destroyed at his death by pulling down the central pillars, Jud. xvi. 26-30, may be supposed to have had tiers of balconies, in which the spectators were accommodated. The cross-beams, loaded with an unusual weight, would probably break, the side-walls be forced out and the roof fall, the whole structure thus becoming a ruin.

HOUSE OF BISHOPS and HOUSE OF CLERICAL AND LAY DEPUTIES.

The first is the name given to the assembly of the bishops in convocation; also called the upper house, to distinguish it from the lower house, in which the lower orders of the clergy are represented; also the name applied in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States to the upper house in the General Convention. The latter is the title by which, in the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, the lower house of the General Convention is designated. In the diocesan conventions the lower house is called the House of Lay Deputies, the clergy forming the upper house, although the separation only exists when the canonical law requires a separate vote.

HOUSTA (hoos'tah), BAUDOIN DE, a French monk of the eighteenth century, was born at Toubise. In 1733 he published his chief literary work in the form of an elaborate criticism of Fleury's "Ecclesiastical History." Any one who occupied the position of Houstah, and who wrote from his stand-point, would accuse either Fleury or any other historian of infidelity because of the non-recognition of the authority of the Church, and such was his course, charging Fleury as being an infidel. He died in 1760.

HOUTEVILLE (hoot'vil), ALEXANDER CLAUDE F., who became known to the world as secretary of Cardinal Dubois, was born in 1688, at Paris. He attained to great celebrity by his first work on the "Truth of the Christian Religion as established by Facts." Six years afterward he published a "Philosophical Essay on Providence." In 1740 he prepared and issued a second edition of his "Truth of Christianity," in which he introduced a "Dissertation on Apollonius Tyanæus." A late critic says of this work: "It contains little information concerning authors or events, but a HOTHAM (ho'tham), a chieftain of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 32.

HOTHAN (ho'than), the father of two of David's worthies, 1 Chr. xi. 44. The name Hothan is doubtless an error for Hotham.

HOTHIR (ho'ther), a son of Heman, one of the chiefs of the musicians, 1 Chr. xxv. 4, 28.

HOTTINGER (hot'tin-ger), JOHN HENRY, a very learned Biblical scholar, was born at Zurich, March 10, 1620. After being educated in his native city, he went to Geneva, thence to France and the Netherlands. In the last mentioned country he studied at Groningen under Gomar and Altling, imbibing a taste for Oriental studies. He subsequently repaired to Leyden, and lived in the house of the celebrated Golius as domestic tutor. In 1641 he was called to Zurich as professor of ecclesiastical history. Before entering on this office he went to England, where he became acquainted with such men as Ussher, Pococke, Selden and Whelock. Returning through France, he enjoyed the friendship of Grotius. In 1643 he became professor of Hebrew in the Carolinum. In 1653 two new offices were assigned to him, the professorships of logic and rhetoric, and also of the Old Testament. In 1655 he went to Heidelberg, where he was professor of the Old Testament and Oriental languages, and in the following year he was made rector of the university. In 1664 he went as ambassador to the Netherlands. In 1666 he received a call to Leyden University. He was drowned in the Limmat, June 5, 1667, along with his son, two daughters and a friend. Thus he was but forty-seven years of age when death suddenly overtook him. Hottinger was a most laborious author, and contributed much to promote a better interpretation of the Bible, following the grammatical and historical method, to which the doctrinal element was subordinated. He seldom appeared as an exegetical writer; where he did he showed tolerable freedom from prejudice. His great merit lies in laying a good foundation for a fundamental knowledge of the Old Testament by the study of the Oriental languages. Hottinger was an excellent Shemitic scholar. Among his works connected with Biblical literature are—"Grammar of the Sacred Languages," "Grammar of Syrio-Chaldee," "Bibliotheca Orientalis," "Oriental Etymology," "Hebrew Landmarks," "Oriental Archaeology," "Ecclesiastical History of the New Testament." His manuscript collections and papers fill fifty-two volumes, and are in the Zurich library.

HOUGH (huf), JOHN, D.D., was a very prominent divine of the Church of England in the seventeenth century. He was born in 1651, and educated in Magdalen College, Oxford. He was elected president of his college, and he and the authorities refused to obey the mandate of James II., who sought to have Anthony Farmer, and afterward Parker, the bishop of Oxford, placed in the office, as they were both Romanists. Hough, together with twenty-six of the twenty-eight Fellows, magnanimously stood on their rights, and refused to deliver the keys of the college on the king's order. By main force Parker was intruded, and the protest of Hough was received everywhere as a masterly production. James saw his error, withdrew Parker and endeavored to conciliate Hough, who was reinstated in his office. After the revolution he was made bishop of Oxford, and in 1699 he was removed to the see of Lichfield and Coventry. He declined the see of Canterbury, not wishing to accept the primacy of the Church of England; and in 1717 he was transferred to Worcester, which see he held until his death, in 1743. Sermons and charges were the only works of any importance which he left behind him.

HOUGH, JOHN, D.D., was born in 1783, in Stamford, Connecticut, and educated at Yale College. In 1806 he was sent as a missionary of the Congregational body to Vermont, where he was ordained in 1807, at Vergennes. He became a professor in Middlebury College, Vermont, in 1812, being appointed to the chair of languages. After twenty-seven years' service in the college, he went to Ohio, where he settled as pastor at Windham in 1841. His eyesight failing, he was obliged to resign. He died in the year 1861. His writings were chiefly confined to the "Advertiser or Vermont Evangelical Magazine."

HOUGHTON (hō'tun), ADAM, was one of the most celebrated of the bishops of St. David's before the Reformation. He followed the example of several of his predecessors in the see as a great builder and a patron of learning. Thomas Betee, elected in 1280, had founded two colleges, one of them for twenty-two prebendaries and another for thirteen, and Houghton founded St. Mary's College, near the cathedral, and provided for seven Fellows. In accordance with the practice of the age, he held the office of chancellor of England. In 1361 he was consecrated to the see, and died in 1388.

HOUSE. The habitations of the early races of mankind were very simple. Clusters of them would, however, naturally be gathered for mutual help and security. Hence we find Cain mentioned as having built a city, Gen. iv. 17. The advantages of a locality would of course invite permanent occupation, while the allurements of the chase, the necessity of finding sufficient pasturage for cattle, and probably the change of seasons, would foster roving habits. So that various tribes, dwellers in tents, which could be easily removed, were soon distinguished from those who inhabited cities. Such movable habitations were constructed with a view to mere temporary convenience, and ornament would have been wasted on them. The fathers of the Israelitish nation for the most part dwelt in tents. They were pilgrims in a land which should be given as a settled home to their posterity, wholesome lessons being thus taught them, and their example being to be afterward quoted for the confirmation of the faith of the Church, Acts vii. 4, 5; Heb. xi. 8-10. Jacob indeed is said to have "built him a house at Succoth," Gen. xxxiii. 17, but the original word so rendered is of vague signification, and comprises almost every kind of erection, from the humblest hut, or even tent, to the gorgeous palace or sacred temple. After leaving Egypt, the Israelites inhabited tents in the wilderness, so that it was not till they occupied Canaan that they were domiciled in houses properly so called. In the cities which they took (the few excepted which they were commanded to destroy) they found houses ready to their hand, Deut. vi. 10, 11; Josh. xxiv. 13. See ARGOB, BASHAN, CITIES, HAURAN.

It is probable that the houses generally of the ancient Israelites differed little from those inhabited by modern Oriental nations. We may well, therefore, derive our illustrations of such as are mentioned in the Bible from usages of the present day.

The houses of the poor are commonly rude huts of a single story, and often comprise but a single apartment, shared by the cattle with the family, who are sometimes exalted upon a kind of platform. But occasionally a narrow court for the cattle is attached. The windows are small holes, sometimes with wooden bars, high up in the wall. The roofs, of hardened mud, are usually flat, and are common sleeping-places in summer. The ma-

HOSPITAL (hos'pe-tal) is the name given to any charitable institution for the relief of distress, and sometimes to places of instruction and entertainment. At present the name is generally applied to establishments for the medical and surgical treatment of the sick and afflicted. In the apostolical age liberal provision was made for the poor and needy, and even the enemies of Christianity recognize this fact. When the laws of the empire recognized Christianity, establishments were soon formed to meet the wants of the necessitous, and orphans, travelers and the sick were cared for in appropriate places. To the bishops belonged the duty of seeing that due provision was made, and the poor and afflicted soon fell into the hands of the clergy as their natural care-takers. After the time of Constantine these institutions spread from one province to another, but in one respect they differed from our modern hospitals, which are on a large scale, and in which various classes of sufferers are cared for. In the early ages the edifices were small, separated from each other, and one class only was treated in a particular place. So also the sexes were separated, and due attention was paid by the clergy to the spiritual care of the inmates. In the West these institutions were so closely connected with the dwellings of the clergy that it is reported of Augustine that he dined at the same table with the sick under his care. The revolutions of the eleventh and twelfth centuries produced great changes in these institutions, but the epidemics which spread over Europe in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries led to the opening of many houses for the relief of the sick and suffering poor. Now, as in former times, the clergy had to bear an important part in their management and support. The progress of society has greatly modified the details of hospital management, and the great advancement made in medical knowledge of late years has produced the most beneficent effects, especially in cities, where ample means are found to meet the wants of those who are the subjects of pain and all the varied forms of disease.

In England the term hospital is still used in many places to designate certain old establishments or "foundations," where aged men or women and orphans are cared for by means of an endowment.

HOSPITAL, or HOPITAL, MICHEL DE L'. See L'HOPITAL, MICHEL DE.

HOSPITALITY (hos-pe-tal'i-te) is very strongly commended in Scripture, both by example and by precept. The patriarchs of early times are set forth as eminent patterns of it, and believers in the apostolic age are exhorted to tread in this respect in their footsteps. Those raised to the higher offices in the Christian Church were required, among other qualifications, to be "given to hospitality," to be known even as "lovers" of it, 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8; and the members generally of the Christian community were enjoined to "use hospitality one to another without grudging;" or, as it is again put, to be "not forgetful to entertain strangers," 1 Pet. iv. 9; Heb. xiii. 2. Hospitality is a virtue which will always more or less distinguish men of humane minds and charitable dispositions; but the extent to which it requires to be exercised and the place it may be said to hold among the relative and social virtues will necessarily depend upon circumstances. It will vary according to the state of society in general and the actual position of individual members of it. In the ruder states of society, when communication is slow, and the public means of accommodation provided for persons moving from one region to another are scanty and insufficient, the rites and claims of hospitality assume a kind of primary place; society can hardly exist without them, and any flagrant violation of them cannot fail to be regarded as a great social enormity. Hence even the wild and predatory Arabs cultivate hospitality, and the stranger among them counts himself safe when he has been admitted to the privileges of a guest. In every village there is a public room devoted to the entertainment of strangers. The guest lodges in this room, and his food is supplied by the families to whose circle it belongs. Sometimes they take turns in his entertainment; at other times it is left to those who offer themselves, or rather who claim the privilege. If the guest be a person of consequence, it is a matter of course that a sheep or goat or lamb is killed for him. The guest gives nothing as a remuneration when he leaves. To offer money would be taken as an insult, and to receive it would be a great disgrace. Such is universally the manner of entertainment in the villages throughout the provinces of Jerusalem and Hebron, as well as in other parts of Syria. But as civilization advances and the speed and conveniences of travel increase other arrangements, to a large extent, take the place that in ruder times is supplied by the rites of hospitality. Without incommencing private families, people can usually get at a moderate expense the temporary accommodation and refreshment they need; and as the general comfort and well-being of society very materially depend on these, it becomes a duty one owes to society, as well as a matter of personal convenience, to avail one's self of them. Still, opportunities will often occur in which Christian kindness and liberality can be fitly exercised by the hospitable entertainment of strangers; and in particular localities, as well as on special occasions, believers may sometimes find themselves so situated that the duties of hospitality assume nearly the same importance which belonged to them in earlier times. But such cases must now be regarded as somewhat exceptional.

HOSPITALLER (hos'pe-tal-ler) was the name of a monk in a monastery who purchased the food, furniture and fuel for the guest-house of the establishment.

HOSPITALLERS is the name given to certain brotherhoods in which, while the members entered a particular order, they gave themselves to minister to the sick and the poor in hospitals. Very generally the hospital was under the care of a bishop, and then the Hospitallers were subject to the bishop, but in other cases they only recognized the authority of the pope. Among these brotherhoods the most eminent were "The Brethren of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem," "The Brethren of the Hospital of the Order of the Holy Ghost," "The Hospitallers of St. Anthony," "The Hospitallers of the Order of St. John of God," "The Order of Teutonic Knights," "The Hospitallers of our Lady of Christian Charity," and "The Hospitallers of Burgos." In view of their systematic duties, they adopted an arrangement in which they were divided into knights, priests and serving men. Several of these brotherhoods accumulated enormous property and rose to eminence and great power. The dress of the Hospitaller was a cloak, and on the breast a white cross with eight points, as symbolical of the virtues.

HOSPITIUM (hos-pish'e-um). See HOSPICE.

HOSSEIN. See HOCEIN.

HOST, HOSTS. See ARMY.

HOST OF HEAVEN. This expression is used in different senses. It sometimes means the angels, 1 Ki. xxii. 19; 2 Chr. xviii. 18; comp. Luke ii. 13. Hence the Lord is called "Jehovah (God) of hosts"—that is, of the celestial armies. Sometimes the sun, moon and stars are intended, the visible host or multitude of heavenly bodies, for example, Deut. iv. 19; Jer. viii. 2, whom the heathen worshiped. Sometimes also the expression is employed figuratively to designate rulers, perhaps especially ecclesiastical rulers, Dan. viii. 10; comp. Isa. xxiv. 21.

HOSTAGE (host'aj). It was common to give pledges as security for a debt. But there is no mention of persons being so detained till the victory of Jehoash, king of Israel, over Amaziah, king of Judah, 2 Ki. xiv. 14; 2 Chr. xxv. 24, when hostages were taken for the liberation of Amaziah.

HOSTEL (hos'tel), an inn or lodging-house. These hostels were common in Oxford for the accommodation of the crowds of students who flocked to the place for education. Gradually they were absorbed by the various colleges as they arose around the university, as the colleges provided residences as well as instruction. In the same way, the great number of "halls" which at with the Israelitish localities, etc. But these are of no weight, and one critic tells us that, after having completed his mission in Israel, Hosea retired into Judah to compose his book. There is no evidence in regard to this, either one way or the other.

Hosea occupies the first place of the minor prophets in our Bibles. His ministry extended over a long period of time, being exercised in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in that of Jeroboam II., king of Israel. The chronology of Uzziah and Jeroboam is somewhat confused, and it is difficult to say how long the two monarchs were contemporary on their respective thrones. Possibly the death of Jeroboam was about 783 B. C., and an interregnum occurred before the short reign of his son Zechariah. The prediction in Hos. i. 4 was apparently delivered under Jeroboam. Perhaps, therefore, the prophet's ministry commenced 784 B. C.; and if we suppose that it closed before the full accomplishment of the threatenings against Samaria, which was taken in the sixth year of Hezekiah, 721 B. C.—else surely he would have noticed it—we may believe that it extended over full sixty years. There is no improbability in this to outweigh the evidence furnished.

HOSEA, THE BOOK OF (784-723 B.C.), and the eleven which follow, were anciently collected together under the title of "The Book of the Twelve Prophets." These were called the minor or lesser prophets simply because their writings were shorter than those of the other four. They are not placed in chronological order, but Hosea stands first, probably because his book is the longest of those which were written before the captivity. Nine of them prophesied before the exile, three after the Jews returned from Babylon, and some of the former were as early, or earlier, than the prophet Isaiah.

Hosea was contemporary with Isaiah, Joel, Micah and Amos, and like the last directed his prophecies chiefly to the kingdom of the ten tribes, whom he addressed by the names of Israel and Ephraim.

When Hosea's ministry began, the kingdom of Israel was apparently strong and wealthy, under the vigorous and successful treatment of Jeroboam II., but it rapidly passed into a state of anarchy and ruin. Four successive kings were assassinated by conspirators, and one military chief after another took possession of the throne.

The moral and religious condition of the Israelites at this time was very corrupt. Every description of crime prevailed, chap. iv. 2. The kings and princes were murderers and profligates, chap. vii. 3-7; the idolatrous priests had spread their shameful festivals and their deceitful oracles all over the land, chap. iv. 12-14; xiii. 2; the great parties in the state resorted for help sometimes to Assyria, at other times to Egypt, 2 Ki. xv. 19; xvii. 4; while the whole nation relied entirely upon an arm of flesh, chap. v. 13; vii. 8-12; viii. 9, 10; x. 13, etc. Worldly and sinful objects were pursued with the same eagerness by Ephraim as by Canaan, chap. xii. 7, 8. A listless security blinded all minds, chap. v. 5; xiii. 6, giving place in the moment of danger to a repentance merely of the lips, chap. vii. 13, and, what was the root of all the other evils, God and his word were forgotten, chap. iv. 1-6; viii. 12.

Considering the long period through which the ministry of Hosea extended, it may appear surprising that his prophetic writings are comprised within so small a compass. But it must be remembered that there is no reason to suppose that this or any other of the prophetic books contains all the divine messages of the prophets whose names they bear. Such portions only of their inspired communications are recorded as the Holy Spirit saw fit to preserve for the benefit of their own and of future ages.

The language of Hosea is to us obscure and difficult to be understood. His style is very concise, sententious and abrupt, abounding with figures and metaphors, which are often much intermixed, and the transitions from one subject and one figure to another are frequent and sudden. But some parts of his prophecies are peculiarly pathetic, animated and sublime. The particular occasions on which they were delivered are not specified, nor are they in themselves very obvious from any internal evidence.

The principal subjects of this, as of most of the other prophetic books, are God's choice of the Hebrews from among the nations, that he might make with them an everlasting covenant; the chastisements which they brought upon themselves by their rebellions, ending in their captivity and temporary rejection; the mercy to be manifested in their wonderful deliverance, and the blessings which God designed to bestow upon them and upon the whole world in future times.

The book may be divided into two parts, comprising, I. Symbolical representations, chap. i.-iii., and, II. Prophetic discourses, chap. iv.-xiv.

I. The first part gives a figurative representation of the past, present and future history of the people of God. It describes their privileges, their shameful infidelity to God, their chastisement and rejection, the conversion of the Gentiles and the future repentance and restoration of Israel. These three chapters are an abridgment of the whole book, and the gracious promises which they contain, and which are not noticed in the seven following chapters, reappear in the eleventh, and close the book.

II. In the second part, containing several prophetic discourses delivered at different times, the things which have been before revealed under a symbolical form are further illustrated and enforced. It begins with rebukes and threatenings, which present to view in the foreground approaching calamities, but by degrees the horizon becomes clear, and the glory of the latter time shines forth with unclouded lustre.

HOSSEN (ho'zen), Dan. iii. 21, undergarments, tunics. See DRESS.

HOSHAI AH (ho-sha-i'ah). 1. One who led half the princes of Judah at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh. xii. 32. 2. A Maachathite, father of Jezebel, Jaazaniah or Azariah, which are most probably the varying names of one person, 2 Ki. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8; xlii. 1; xliii. 2.

HOSHAMA (ho'sha-ma), a descendant of the house of David, 1 Chr. iii. 18.

HOSHEA (ho-she'a). 1. Deut. xxxii. 44. See JOSHUA. 2. The son of Elah; he conspired against Pekah, king of Israel, and slew him, and after some time established himself as his successor, 2 Ki. xv. 30; xvii. 1. The conspiracy against Pekah was in the twentieth year after Jotham's sole reign began—that is, in the fourth year of Ahaz; and the acknowledgment of Hoshea's rule, to be understood by the phrase "began to reign," was in the twelfth of Ahaz. Hoshea reigned nine years, 729-721 B. C.

He was not a godly king, but he was less wicked than his predecessors. Now, however, the cup of Israel's iniquity was full. Shalmaneser invaded the land, and made Hoshea tributary. Endeavoring to evade his engagements by the help of So, king of Egypt, he was again attacked by the Assyrian, who besieged Samaria, which was taken in the third year and the tribes carried away captive. Hoshea was made a prisoner, whether before or after the siege is not clear, xvii. 2-6; xviii. 1, 9, 10; nor is his death recorded; he disappeared, "cut off as the foam upon the water," Hos. x. 7. 3. The ruler of Ephraim in David's time, 1 Chr. xxvii. 20. 4. One who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 23.

HOSIUS (ho'zh'us), BISHOP. See OSRUS.

HOSIUS, STANISLAUS, a noted Polish theologian of the Roman Catholic Church, was born May 5, 1504, at Cracow. He pursued his studies at Padua and Bologna; and after serving in some minor offices, he was appointed to the bishopric of Culm, to which that of Ermeland was afterward added, in consideration of important services, in connection with missions, to the emperors Charles V. and Ferdinand I. He was still further honored with the office of cardinal, as a reward for writing his "Catholic Confession of Faith," in opposition to the Augsburg Confession. He was a violent opponent of Lutheranism, and a resolute champion of the Jesuits. He died August 15, 1579.

HOSPICE (hos'pess), the name used to designate the places of refuge or entertainment for travelers established in the Alps, and kept by monks who receive and hospitably care for wayfarers. Of these the great St. Bernard hospice is the oldest, having been founded by Bernard de Menthon in the tenth century.

HOSPINIAN (hos-pin'yan), RUDOLPH, a Protestant theologian of Switzerland, was born November 7, 1547, at Aldorf, near Zurich. He pursued his theological studies at Marburg and Heidelberg, and began to preach in Zurich in 1568. He was afterward rector, then archdeacon, and in 1594 became pastor of the church of the Abbey. Hospinian's writings are chiefly directed against the Romish Church. The most important are, "The Origin and Progress of Ecclesiastical Rit-

HORSE. This most valuable animal is thought to be a native of the deserts north of India and Persia. It was first domesticated in the East, and was probably brought by those who emigrated westward from Asia into Arabia and Egypt.

No mention is made of horses as forming any part of the possessions of the patriarchs, nor are any noticed among the presents Abraham received from the kings of Egypt and Gerar, Gen. xii. 16; xx. 14. The fact appears to be that the horse was not in those early times used except for military purposes; indeed, we find scarcely an allusion in Scripture to its employment for the farm or any ordinary domestic service. Once the horse is said to tread out some species of corn, Isa. xxviii. 28, but it is as a war-horse, strong and fierce, that he is specially noted and commended, Job xxxix. 19-25. In armies, horses were introduced as mounting cavalry, and also as drawing the formidable war-chariots. But the Israelites employed them in neither of these ways, and a positive command forbade them to multiply horses, Deut. xvii. 16; so that long afterward David contrasts the dependence placed by foreign potentates on chariots and horsemen with the simple trust that Israel without either reposed in the Lord their God, Ps. xx. 7. David, however, was induced to form a chariot force, 2 Sam. viii. 4, and from that time we find repeated mention of them in Israelitish history. Absalom had chariots and horses for the purpose of display, 2 Sam. xv. 1, and Solomon possessed large numbers of chariot- and riding-horses, which he kept partly at Jerusalem and partly in certain appointed cities, 1 Ki. iv. 26; 2 Chr. ix. 25. The number, it may be observed, in the first named of these places, is incorrect, no doubt by error of transcription; 4000 horses will suit better with the number of Solomon's chariots—1400, 1 Ki. x. 26. This monarch also appears to have established a regular trade in horses with Egypt, for the supply of both himself and other nations, 1 Ki. x. 28, 29. After this horses were freely used in Israel, 1 Ki. xxii. 4; 2 Ki. iii. 7; ix. 21, 33; xi. 16; Isa. ii. 7; and the Jews possessed some on their return from captivity, Ezra ii. 66; Neh. vii. 68. Among other nations they had been used from a very early period. There were horses in Egypt in Joseph's time, Gen. xlvii. 17; xlix. 17; l. 9. They were in the armies of Egypt, Ex. xiv. 7; 2 Chr. xii. 3, of the Canaanites, Jud. iv. 3, of the Philistines, 1 Sam. xiii. 5, of the Syrians, 2 Sam. viii. 4, of the Ethiopians (Cushites), 2 Chr. xiv. 9, etc. Among the Persians we find swift horses used for posts, Esth. viii. 10; and horses are mentioned as articles of trade between the Tyrians and the house of Togarmah, Ezek. xxvii. 14.

The furniture of the horse among the Hebrews appears to have been simple—a bridle, probably a mere slip-knot, Isa. xxx. 28, and a curb, Ps. xxxii. 9. Saddles were not used, only a cloth, or afterward a pad. Nor were horses shod; hence it was desirable that their hoofs should be hard, Isa. v. 28. But the harness of Assyrian horses was decorated, Ezek. xxiii. 6, 12, also of those of Persia, Esth. vi. 8, 9. The Assyrian sculptures prove this. Furniture for chariots is among the merchandise of Tyre, Ezek. xxvii. 20.

HORSE-GATE, one of the gates of Jerusalem near the temple, 2 Chr. xxiii. 15; Neh. iii. 28; Jer. xxxi. 40. See JERUSALEM.

HORSE-LEECH. The leech is mentioned once only, Prov. xxx. 15, where in our version the sense is weakened by the insertion of "crying." "Give, give," are the two daughters. Dr. Thomson speaks of "countless millions of leeches" in the Birket Ram, Lake Phiala. The medicinal leech, the horse-leech and other species are all found in Palestine.

HORSE-SHOE ARCH is the technical name of the arch which is common in Arabian and Saracenic architecture. It is formed from a centre which is above the impost; it contains the full semicircle at the top, and the lines descend on either side, giving the form resembling a horse-shoe, whence the name. See ARCH.

HORSLEY (hors'le), SAMUEL, LL.D., was one of the greatest of all the intellectual giants who flourished in the Church of England during the last century. His father held several livings in the Church, and among them St. Martin's in the Fields, London. The future divine and champion of the Church was born in London in 1733; and after passing through Westminster school, he entered Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He received the rectory of Newington from his father in 1759. Eight years afterward he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1773 he was appointed the secretary. During these years he had devoted much time to scientific matters, being chiefly engaged on an edition of Newton's works, which he completed in 1785, when the last of five quarto volumes appeared. One favor after another was conferred on him in the Church in recognition of his great learning, and in 1781 he became archdeacon of St. Alban's. His real power became apparent in his memorable controversy with Dr. Priestley, who had shown great acuteness in his works on materialism, philosophical necessity and Unitarianism. It was on the subject of free agency that in 1778 Horsley first assailed his opponent, and in a charge delivered in 1783 he disputed Dr. Priestley's "History of the Corruptions of Christianity." To the reply of Priestley he issued "Seventeen Letters to Dr. Priestley," and the force of this production was recognized all over England. It was considered to be a masterly refutation of Socinianism as avowed by one of the boldest and acutest defenders of the system in modern times. The lord chancellor made him bishop of St. David's in 1788, playfully saying that "those who defended the Church ought to be supported by the Church." In Parliament he greatly distinguished himself; and as he became a favorite with the king, he was removed from St. David's to Rochester in 1783, and finally in 1802 he was placed in St. Asaph's, in Wales. Few divines in modern times have displayed greater learning, more acuteness and such a thorough mastery of ecclesiastical history and the varied shades of opinion as enabled him to become irresistible against any opponent who appealed to antiquity. Even Gibbon admitted that Horsley had overthrown his adversary. His works fill six volumes octavo, and comprehend sermons, criticism of the Old Testament, treatises on the Psalms, Isaiah and Hosea, in addition to the controversial works already alluded to. He belonged to the school of Warburton; and dying in 1806, he left no one to grasp the standard which he laid down. He was buried in the parish church of St. Mary, Newington, and the inscription on his monument was written by himself.

HORTON (hor'tun), ABBOT, a celebrated ecclesiastic of the fourteenth century whose name is associated with the cathedral of Gloucester. Every cathedral in England has some peculiar feature of special importance, and the visitor to Gloucester will speedily be attracted to the extraordinary beauty of the cloisters which are situated on the north side of the north aisle of the nave. These cloisters were commenced by Horton about the year 1375. They are exceedingly rich, and sumptuous and elegant to an unparalleled degree. They are also remarkable for their extent, breadth and height. The fan tracery of the vaulting and the feathered paneling of the walls produce together a superb effect. These cloisters form a quadrangle of 146 by 145 feet.

HOSAH (ho'sa), a Levite of the family of Merari, appointed one of the porters or door-keepers before the ark, 1 Chr. xvi. 38; xxvi. 10.

HOSAH, a city of Asher, a border-place toward Tyre, Josh. xix. 29.

HOSAI (ho'si), 2 Chr. xxxiii. 19, marg. In the text this word is translated "the seers." Gesenius is inclined to believe it the proper name of an individual.

HOSANNA (ho-zan'na) is composed of two Hebrew words occurring in Ps. cxviii. 25, signifying "save," and "pray" or "now." The Psalm was sung on joyful occasions, and particularly at the feast of tabernacles, which was the solemnity observed with the greatest demonstrations of joy. Verses 25 and 26 were sung with loud acclamations, and the feast itself was sometimes called the Hosanna. Applied to the Messiah, as it is in Matt. xxi. 9, "Hosanna to the Son of David," it simply means, All blessing and prosperity attend him; let salvation be his!

HOSEA (ho-ze'ah). Hosea is stated, Hos. i. 1, to be the son of Beeri, whom some would erroneously confound with Beerah, prince of the Reubenites, 1 Chr. v. 9, but we have no further certain information of the prophet's family or life. It is, however, reasonable to suppose that he was an Israelite, for his predictions have to do mainly with the kingdom of the ten tribes; and had he been sent from Judah to utter them, it is not unlikely that, as in the analogous cases of 1 Ki. xiii.; Amos i. 1; vii., the fact would have been stated. Corroboration has been found in his rough Aramaizing diction, which seems to indicate the north as his residence. Ingenious men have amused themselves with imagining further reasons, taken from a supposed special acquaintance HORN being the chief instrument of power, whether for defence or attack, by many animals, it came to acquire several derivative meanings, some of which are connected with the illustration and right understanding of holy writ. As horns are hollow and easily polished, they have in ancient and modern times been used for drinking-vessels and for military purposes; and as they are the chief source of strength for attack and defence with the animals to which God has given them, they serve in Scripture as emblems of power, dominion, glory and fierceness, Dan. viii. 5, 9; 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 Ki. i. 39; Josh. vi. 4, 5; 1 Sam. ii. 1; Ps. lxxv. 5, 10; Jer. xlviii. 25; Ezek. xxix. 21; Amos vi. 13. Hence to defile the horn in the dust, Job xvi. 15, is to lower and degrade one's self; and, on the contrary, to lift up, to exalt the horn, Ps. lxxv. 4; lxxix. 17; cxlviii. 14, is poetically to raise one's self to eminent honor or prosperity, to bear one's self proudly. In the East, at present, horns are used as an ornament for the head and as a token of eminent rank. The women among the Druses on Mount Lebanon wear on their heads silver horns of native make, which are the distinguishing badge of wifehood.

By an easy transition horn came to denote an elevation or hill, Isa. v. 1; in Switzerland mountains still bear this name, thus, Schreckhorn,

The altar of burnt-offerings, Ex. xxvii. 2, and the altar of incense, Ex. xxx. 2, had each at the four corners four horns of shittim wood, the first being overlaid with brass, the second with gold, Ex. xxxvii. 25; xxxviii. 2; Jer. xvii. 1; Amos iii. 14. Upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offerings was to be smeared with the finger the blood of the slain bullock, Ex. xxix. 12; Lev. iv. 7-18; viii. 15; ix. 9; xvi. 18; Ezek. xlili. 20. By laying hold of these horns of the altar of burnt-offering, the criminal found an asylum and safety, 1 Ki. i. 50; ii. 28. These horns served for binding the animal destined for sacrifice, Ps. cxviii. 27.

HORNE (horn), GEORGE, D.D., a very eminent bishop of Norwich, and a well-known writer, was born in 1730, at Oatham, in Kent. While a student at University College, Oxford, he distinguished himself by his devotion to Hebrew. In 1749 he was elected a Fellow of Magdalen College, of which house he became president in 1768. His high standing secured his election in 1776 to the vice-chancellorship of the university. Five years afterward he was made dean of Canterbury, and in 1789 he was placed in the see of Norwich. During all these years he was recognized as one of the attractive preachers in the kingdom. In philosophy he was a follower of Hutchinson, whose views he defended in several tracts, but he is now known by his "Commentary on the Psalms," a work which still holds its place in theological literature and general use. He also published discourses and sermons which filled four volumes octavo. Bishop Horne died in 1792, having borne the character of an exemplary Christian, a profound scholar, an impressive preacher, a faithful bishop and an excellent man.

HORNE, JOHN, who was a distinguished theological writer and a nonconformist divine of marked celebrity, was born in 1615, and educated at Cambridge. He held the living of All-Hallows in London and of Lynn-Regis. He held Arminian views, and was ejected in 1662 for nonconformity. His principal works were "The Open Door for Man's Approach to God," "The Brazen Serpent" and a treatise of Jude 20, 21, called "The Best Exercise for Christians in the Worst of Times, in Order to their Security against Profaneness and Apostasy." He died in 1676.

HORNE, MELVILLE, whose name will never be forgotten by those who love the cause of missions, was born in England in the latter part of the last century. He became a lay preacher in the Methodist body; and acting on the advice of his brethren, he accepted ordination in the Episcopal Church, and proceeded to Sierra Leone as a missionary. He returned to England and settled as vicar at Olney, whence he removed to Macclesfield, and afterward to the parish of West Thurrock, in Essex. He wrote on "Justifying Faith" and published sermons, but his name will specially be associated with his thrilling, powerful "Letters on Missions," which produced a great impression on the ministers of Great Britain, and which it is generally believed prompted the first counsels that led to the formation of the London Missionary Society. These letters were published in 1794. He died in 1811.

HORNE, THOMAS HARTWELL, D.D., was a man who as a Biblical scholar stood in the front rank of the most learned Englishmen of the present age. He was born in the year 1780; and after passing through the school of Christ's Hospital, London, he entered the office of a lawyer as his clerk. The fruit of his leisure hours appeared in 1818 under the title, "Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures." At once this was recognized as a work of great importance, and the repeated editions through which it has passed attest the high estimate in which it is still held. The last edition has reached the number of five volumes; and as the work has been diligently revised as each edition appeared, it necessarily commands a great circulation. In consequence of the great learning which the author displayed in this work he was admitted to holy orders without a university degree, and the university of Cambridge* conferred on him the degree of bachelor of arts, and two American colleges did themselves the honor of conferring on this great scholar the honorary degree of doctor in divinity. In 1824 he was appointed to a position in the library of the British Museum, where the value of his great learning was recognized. The archbishop of Canterbury admitted him in the year 1833 to the rectories of St. Edmund and St. Nicholas in London, but the emolument of this preferment would not have sufficed for his living, and this was all the support that the Church vouchsafed to a man of such acquirements and world-wide fame. He was a voluminous writer, producing works on Deism, Romanism, the Trinity, Psalmody, and an Analysis of the great work by which he will continue to be known. He held his position in the Museum and in his churches until his death, in 1862.

HORNET (hor'net). The Hebrew name for this insect signifies striking—i. e., when it stings. God promised that he would send hornets before the Israelites to drive out the nations of Canaan from before them, Ex. xxiii. 28; Deut. vii. 20; Josh. xxiv. 12. It is questionable whether these declarations are not to be understood as implying the dreaded effect of the invading forces as they approach the land. The Canaanites, however, resisted and fought vigorously for their homes; and it is better, it would seem, to take the promise literally. That horns abounded in Palestine is well known, and that armies have been compelled to fly from these insects is testified by Ælian, who records their venomous power.

HOROLOGION (hor-o-log'e-on) is the name of an "office-book" in the orthodox Eastern Church. It contains different formularies, and among them the daily hours of prayer.

HORONAIM (ho-ro-na'im), a city in Moab, Isa. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 3, 5-34. It was probably situated near the north east end of the Dead Sea. Possibly, Sanballat, the "Horonite," was a native of this place.

HORONITE (hor'on-ite), a designation of Sanballat, the enemy of the Jews, Neh. ii. 10, 19; xiii. 28. Probably derived from Beth-Horon.

HORBERY (hor'ber-re), MATTHEW, D.D., a Fellow of Magdalen College who became eminent as an able and learned divine, was born in 1707, at Haxay, in Lincolnshire, and died in 1773. He was Fellow of Magdalen, then vicar of Eccles-hall, canon of Lichfield, vicar of Hanbury, and finally rector of Stanlake. He wrote an important essay on the eternity of future punishment, and was the author of sermons which won strong praise from Dr. Johnson. They were marked by a nervous force of manner, and by much sweetness and simplicity. Van Mildert says they are among the best compositions of English divines. Two hundred of them in MS. were sold after his death for 600 guineas. His essay and sermons were published at Oxford in 1828. They are still valued for their great clearness as well as the important matter which they contain.

HORCH (horkh), HEINRICH, S. T. D., a German Mystic philosopher, was born in 1652, at HOREM (ho'rem), one of the fenced cities of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 38. Van de Velde says that it is possibly the same with Hurah, a low tell with ruins at the entrance of Wady el-Ain, in the midst of the mountains west of Lake Meron.

HOR-HAGIDGAD (hor-hag-id'gad), one of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness, Num. xxxiii. 32, 33. It is in all probability the same with Gudgodah, Deut. x. 7. It is true that the order of the stations is different, but in the one case the direction of the journey is upward, Num. xxxiii. 31, then downward, 32-35, while in the other, Deut. x. 6, 7, it is altogether downward.

Mr. Wilton is inclined to regard the visit to Hor-hagidgad, Num. xxxiii. 32, as distinct from the journey to Gudgodah, Deut. x. 7, so that the two places are not absolutely identical. Gudgodah he considers the wady or valley, and Hor-hagidgad a mountain near. Now, Dr. Robinson describes here "a lone conical mountain, which forms Eschwege, Hesse. He studied at the university of Marburg, and while there he became an adherent of Mystic doctrines. After preaching successively at Heidelberg, Kreuznach and Frankfort, he was appointed to the chair of theology in the university of Herborn, but lost the latter position in consequence of his peculiar theological views. He then began a sort of itinerant ministry, preaching in public places, often entering churches in defiance of the ministers, for which conduct he was arrested, and he became temporarily insane. He held that divine relations still continue, and that neither baptism nor the eucharist is essential; he advocated celibacy and second reformation of the Church. His best known work is the "Mystic and Prophetic Bible." He died August 5, 1729.

a conspicuous landmark for the traveler." This, now called Jebel Araif en-Nakah, may be Hor-hagidgad.

HORI (ho'ri). 1. A son of Lotan and grandson of Seir, Gen. xxxvi. 22; 1 Chr. i. 39. Hori in Gen. xxxvi. 30 should be rendered "the Horites," as in 29. 2. A man of the tribe of Simeon, father of Shaphat, who was one of those sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan, Num. xiii. 5.

HORITES (hor'ites), the original inhabitants of Mount Seir, Gen. xiv. 6. They were smitten by Chedor-laomer and his confederates, and afterward entirely dispossessed by the descendants of Esau, Deut. ii. 12, 22. Their genealogy is given in Gen. xxxvi. 20-30; 1 Chr. i. 38-42, but nothing further is recorded of them. They are probably designated more according to their mode of life than their specific race. See HIVITES.

HORMAH (hor'mah), a place lying somewhere to the south or desert side of the mountain-range which forms the southern border of the land of Canaan. There, when on their first approach to the land of Canaan, but after the rebellion raised by the spies, the Israelites suffered a defeat from the Canaanites that dwelt upon the hill, Num. xiv. 45. The Israelites had gone up to the mountain from the south, but were driven back with slaughter. And in the parallel passage of Deut. i. 44 it is said, with a clearer definition of the locality, "The Amorites which dwelt in that mountain came out against you, and chased you, as bees do, and destroyed you in Seir, even unto Hormah." So that Hormah did not properly belong to Canaan, but lay rather within the boundary of Seir. At a much later period, when the children of Israel again approached the borders of Canaan, though still at a little distance from it, the same Amorites or Canaanites, under Arad, made an assault upon them and took a few of them prisoners. Then Israel made a vow that if the Lord would deliver that tribe into their hands they would utterly destroy or make an anathema of their cities. The Lord did so, it is said, and they called the name of the place Hormah, Num. xxi. 1-3. A still further notice occurs at a considerably later period, when it is said, Jud. i. 17, "And Judah went with Simeon his brother, and they slew the Canaanites that inhabited Zephath, and utterly destroyed it; and the name of the city was called Hormah." The explanation, however, is this: the city was known to the Canaanites by the name of Zephath; but from the vow recorded in Num. xxi. 2, the name stamped upon it by the Israelites was Hormah, and by this name it is called proleptically in the earlier notice at Num. xiv. 45. In Joshua's time it was partially made a Hormah, or "destruction;" for the king of Hormah appears among the list of those whom he vanquished, Josh. xii. 14. But the conquest was not complete, and the place still retained the name of Zephath. But by and by the combined forces of Judah and Simeon completely fulfilled the vow, and turned Zephath permanently into a Hormah. The assailants of the Pentateuch have often endeavored to exhibit these passages as at variance with each other, but when rightly viewed they are perfectly consistent.

HORMISDAS (hor-mis'das), Pope, was born at Frosinone, near Rome. In 514 he succeeded Symmachus as bishop of Rome. In the following year, at the request of Anastasius, emperor of Constantinople, he sent an embassy to a council held at Heraclia for the purpose of reconciling the differences between the Church of Rome and the Eastern Church; but Hormisdas refusing to make any concessions, the emperor discontinued all relations with him. The two Churches were temporarily united, however, during the reign of the emperor Justinus, after a separation of thirty-five years. Hormisdas was also noted for his zeal against the Eutychians. He died August 6, 523. Several of his letters have been published by Labbe.

HORMISDAS IV., king of Persia in the sixth century, was one of the dynasty of the Sassanides, and the last of his name. He was a great favorer of the Christians, and treated the Nestorian patriarchs with distinction. For some time he proved an able governor, but he became involved with Tiberius, emperor of the East, was vanquished by his generals, and lost all the conquests made by his father, Chosroes the Great. He was dethroned by his subjects, had his eyes put out and was then murdered.

Slaveholders," he directed the attention of prominent men throughout the land, as well as the members of the Continental Congress, to the evils of the traffic; and when the Federal Constitution was framed, he lifted up his warning voice against the clause recognizing slavery in the United States.

Dr. Hopkins was most zealous in the discharge of his parochial duties, and labored with undeviating fidelity and self-sacrifice for the spiritual interests of his people. He was a man of remarkable powers of application, frequently spending from fourteen to eighteen hours daily in close study. He died December 20, 1803.

His theological opinions have occasioned much controversy. He wrote a number of treatises on divinity, which gave rise to the application of the name "Hopkinsian" to the peculiar system advocated by him. He considered himself a follower of Edwards, with whom he spent much time in intimate intercourse, and with whose original speculations he was more familiar than any other man. The tenets of Hopkinsianism embrace most of the Calvinistic doctrines. The fundamental doctrine is that all true holiness consists in disinterested benevolence, and that all sin consists in selfishness—the self-love which leads a man to give his chief regard even to his own eternal welfare being condemned as sinful. The adherents of the system also reject the doctrine of imputation, both the imputation of Adam's sin and of Christ's righteousness—that is, men are accountable only for their personal sins, and Christ's righteousness is not transferred to them, and that repentance is before faith in Christ.

HOPTON (hop'tun), JOHN, who rose to be bishop of Norwich in the reign of Mary, was a man of stern resolution and bold in the assertion of his principles. He was a devoted adherent to the Romish system, and the Protestants in the reign of Mary suffered cruel persecutions at his hands.

HOPTON, SUSANNAH, was a native of Staffordshire, in England. She was born in 1627, and early indicated a pious disposition. For a time she conformed to the Church of Rome; but not finding the rest and peace in that communion which had been promised to her, she returned to the Protestant faith. She became the wife of Richard Hopton, who held the office of a judge in Wales. She was the authoress of "Daily Devotions," a work which ran through several editions, and of "Hexameron, or Meditations on the Six Days of Creation." She died in 1709.

HOR (hor), mountain. 1. A noted mountain on the frontier of Edom, Num. xx. 23; xxxiii. 37. The Israelites reached it on their march from Kadesh, their next station being Zalmonah, on their way round the Edomitish territory. xx. 22; xxi. 4; xxxiii. 37, 41. It was while they were encamped by Hor that the divine command was issued for Aaron, who, on account of his disobedience at the water of Meribah, was not to enter Canaan, to go up and die there. Moses and Eleazar accompanied the aged priest to his death, the eyes of the congregation being fixed on them as they ascended. The sacerdotal garments were taken from him and put upon Eleazar his son. So Aaron died, and Moses and Eleazar returned, and the people mourned for him thirty days, xx. 24-29; xxxiii. 38, 39; Deut. xxxii. 50. It is true that Mosera is elsewhere named as the place of Aaron's death, x. 6, but Mosera was close by the mountain. Mount Hor is on the eastern side of the Arabah, a conspicuous object in the Edomitish chain, rising just to the west of the city of Petra, 4800 feet above the sea level. It is entirely of sandstone, and has a double top. In the little hollow between the peaks it has been supposed that Aaron died. On the highest, the northernmost, is a small building 28 feet by 33 inside. It consists of two apartments, one below the other; in the undermost is a recess regarded as Aaron's tomb. This may be ancient; the structure above is modern. Mount Hor is now called Jebel Neby Harad. The view from it on which Aaron's eyes must have rested just before he closed them on the world for ever, is thus described by Dr. Stanley: "He looked over the valley of the Arabah, countersected by its hundred watercourses, and beyond over the white mountains of the wilderness they had so long traversed, and at the northern edge of it there must have been visible the height through which the Israelites had vainly attempted to force their way into the promised land. This was the western view. Close around him on the east were the rugged mountains of Edom, and far along the horizon the wild downs of Mount Seir, through which the passage had been denied by the wild tribes of Esau, who hunted over their long slopes. . . . A dreary . . . scene—such it must have seemed to the aged priest. . . . The peculiarity of the view is the combination of wide extension with the scarcity of marked features. Petra is shut out by intervening rocks, but the survey of the desert on one side and the mountains of Edom on the other is complete; and of these last the great feature is the mass of red bald-headed sandstone rocks, intersected, not by valleys, but by deep seams."

But the traditional site of Mount Hor, that hitherto described, is rejected by Mr. Wilton in his excellent book, the "Negeb." He thinks it highly improbable that a mountain by which the Israelites were encamped, and where the solemn close of Aaron's life occurred, could be in the heart of Edom, hard by the capital of a nation whose territories the Hebrews were not to touch, and from which they are said just before to turn, Num. xx. 21, 22. He therefore supposes that the Jebel Moderah, some distance to the north-east, on the opposite side of the Arabah, is the veritable Hor. He thinks that the locality suits much better with the history of the attack of the king of Arad, shortly after the high-priest's death, xxi. 1-3. The striking appearance of Jebel Moderah quite justifies the appellation of "Hor the mountain"—i. e., the remarkable mountain, for such is the definite meaning of the original; and it is just "by the coast," or "on the edge of the land of Edom," xx. 23; xxxiii. 37, and is so situated that any transaction on its summit would be in full view, "in the sight of the congregation," xx. 27, encamped on the plain below.

2. Mount Hor is mentioned as the northern border of Palestine, Num. xxxiv. 7, 8; possibly, some part of the Lebanon range. The name is nowhere else applied to a northern height. See HIVITES.

HORAM (ho'ram), the king of Gezer who, coming to help Lachish, was destroyed by Joshua, Josh. x. 33.

HORAPOLLO (ho-ra-pol'lo), or HORUS APOLLO (ho'rus ap-pol'lo), is the name given the author of the earliest book we have on the interpretation of hieroglyphics. It was written in Egyptian in the fifth century, and translated into Greek in the fifteenth century by one Philip, of whom we know no more than the name. It is questioned whether Horapollo be merely Horus, the son of Osiris, to whom such a work would naturally be ascribed by the priests, or the name of a man. There was, however, a grammarian of that name who was a teacher, first at Constantinople and then at Alexandria, in the reign of Theodosius, and there was another Horapollo, a native of Egypt, who lived in the reign of the emperor Zeno. The book, whosoever was the author, was of great use to Champollion when he undertook deciphering the anaglyphics and hieroglyphics of the Egyptian monuments, and is still of great value to the student of such subjects.

HORB (horb), JOHANN HEINRICH, a German pietist of considerable note, was born June 11, 1645, at Colmar, in Alsace. After pursuing his studies at the universities of Strasburg, Jena, Wittenberg and Cologne, he was minister at Birkenfeld and at Trarbach, but was compelled to resign from the latter position in consequence of the boldness with which he advanced his pietetic doctrines. He afterward preached at Windsheim and at Hamburg, where he continued his teachings until the excitement became so great that he was formally suspended, when he retired to Steinbeck, and died in the following year, 1695. Among his theological publications are "History of the Manichees" and "History of the Unitarian Heresy."

sanctity of his life. He had just completed the last book of his "Polity," when he was seized with his last sickness. It continued for some time, terminating on the 2d of November, 1600. The day before his death, being asked by his friend, Dr. Saravia, who was constantly with him, what were his present thoughts, he replied that he was "meditating the number and nature of angels, and their blessed obedience and order." Izaak Walton's charming "Life of Hooker" will repay the reader.

HOOKER, THOMAS, a Congregational preacher, was born at Marfield, England, in 1586. He graduated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, and was afterward professor at his alma mater. He preached for a few years in London and in Chelmsford; but having been summoned before the Court of High Commission for nonconformity, he escaped to Holland, and a few years after emigrated to Boston, where he was ordained first pastor of the church in Cambridge. Subsequently, he settled at Hartford, where he died, July 7, 1647. He was a prolific writer. The following are among his works: "The Soul's Preparation for Christ," "The Soul's Vocation; or, Effectual Calling to Christ," "The Soul's Possession of Christ."

HOOPER (hoop'er), GEORGE, D.D., an English prelate, was born in 1640, in Worcestershire. He graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, and after holding several minor positions, he was appointed dean of Canterbury, and afterward bishop of St. Asaph, from which he was shortly afterward transferred to the bishopric of Bath and Wells. Among his published writings are—"A Fair and Methodical Discussion of the First and Great Controversy between the Church of England and the Church of Rome concerning the Infallible Guide." He died in September, 1727, at Barkley, Somersetshire.

HOOPER (hoop'er), JOHN, was one of the most famous of all the martyrs in England who suffered, at the hands of Romish persecution, for the cause of gospel truth. He was born about the year 1495, in Somersetshire, and educated in Merton College, Oxford. His trials commenced very early, for he had to leave Oxford because of his religious views, and in 1540 he had to fly from England to Switzerland. In 1547, on the accession of Edward VI., he returned to London, where he distinguished himself as a preacher. The bishopric of Gloucester was offered to him; but having adopted decided views on the Continent respecting ecclesiastical vestments, he hesitated about accepting the dignity, and his consecration was delayed for a considerable time. In 1552 the see of Worcester was added to his charge, and he held it "in commendam," but in the following year, when Mary had reached the throne, he was seized, tried as a heretic and condemned to be burned at the stake. He refused to recant, and the death scene was characterized by horrible barbarity. The wood used on the occasion was green, and the torments of the aged bishop were protracted and agonizing, but at length the spirit was freed from the flames and the hands of relentless persecutors. He died on the 9th day of February, 1555. The works which he left behind him embrace sermons, and controversial treatises on the doctrines of the gospel and the claims of the Church of Rome. He wrote also on the offices of Christ, the Incarnation, and on the Creed. Several editions of his works have been published lately in England, and they are of great value, as they show the arguments which then prevailed against the claims of the papacy.

HOPE, the reasonable expectation of good to be enjoyed, based on sufficient grounds, and encouraging to patient perseverance in the proper means for the attainment of it. It is reckoned as one of the three chief Christian graces, 1 Cor. xiii. 3, and its excellences are frequently described. It is lively, 1 Pet. i. 3; it is invigorating, Tit. i. 2; it is joyful, Rom. v. 2; xii. 12; it tends to sanctification, 1 John iii. 3. The Christian hope is sure, Heb. iii. 6; vii. 11, whereas the hope of the ungodly shall perish, Job viii. 13. Indeed, the wicked are characterized as "having no hope," Eph. ii. 12—that is, no well-grounded hope, or hope of salvation. Sometimes hope is put for the thing hoped for, Tit. ii. 13, or the person in whom we hope. Thus Christ is called the "hope" of his people, 1 Tim. i. 1.

HOPE, MATTHEW B., an eminent minister of the Presbyterian Church, was born in 1812, in Pennsylvania. After graduating at Jefferson College, he completed his theological studies at Princeton, and afterward studied medicine at the university of Pennsylvania, his design being to fit himself more completely for missionary work. After being ordained, he was stationed at Singapore, India, but failing health compelled a speedy return, and he became assistant secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Education. From 1846 until his death he was connected with the College of New Jersey, first as professor of belles-lettres and then in the department of political economy. He was one of the contributors to the Princeton Review, and wrote a "Treatise on Rhetoric" for the use of his college classes. He died December 17, 1859.

HOPHNI (hof'ni), one of the sons of Eli, whose licentious conduct brought down judgment upon their family. They were both slain in a battle with the Philistines when the ark of God was taken, 1 Sam. i. 3; ii. 34; iv. 4, 11, 17.

HOPHRA (hof'rah). See PHARAOH.

HOPKINS (hop'kinz), JOHN HENRY, Protestant Episcopal bishop of Vermont, was of English parentage, but born in Dublin, Ireland, January 30, 1792. In his boyhood he emigrated with his parents to America. His early education was conducted at home, under the fostering care of his mother. At the age of twenty-five he was admitted to the bar, and after practicing for six years he relinquished that profession and entered the ministry, being ordained as rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburg. A few years later he was before the synod of Pennsylvania as a candidate for the office of assistant bishop; but as the choice finally depended upon his own vote, he cast it for Dr. H. U. Onderdonk, the opposing candidate. In 1831 he removed to Boston, where he remained about a year as assistant minister of Trinity Church and professor of divinity in the Episcopal Theological Seminary. In the following year he was consecrated bishop of Vermont, and became rector of St. Paul's Church, Burlington. At his own expense he conducted a boys' school, and employed indigent clergymen and theological students as teachers; but becoming embarrassed by the expenses incident to the enterprise, he relinquished it, and soon after established the Vermont Episcopal Institute. In 1867 he attended the Pan-Anglican Synod at Lambeth, and figured conspicuously in its deliberations, resolutely adhering to the principles of the High Church party in opposition to the majority of the American bishops, who presented a protest against Romanizing tendencies in the Anglican Church. Bishop Hopkins was a most industrious student of theology, and his attainments embraced a wide range of learning. Of his numerous works the most important are—"The Primitive Church compared with the Protestant Episcopal Church," "Causes, Principles and Results of the British Reformation," "Refutation of Milner's End of Controversy" and "Scriptural, Ecclesiastical and Historical Views of Slavery." He died January 9, 1868.

HOPKINS, MATTHEW, a professional witchfinder of the seventeenth century who achieved infamy by his barbarous cruelty in the practice of his profession. He finally came to grief: his net laid privily for others caught himself. His own test of trying whether a witch could be drowned was effectually tried on him.

HOPKINS, SAMUEL, D.D., a celebrated Calvinistic divine and founder of the "Hopkinsian" system of theology, was born September 17, 1721, at Waterbury, Connecticut. He graduated at Yale College; and having been converted during his college course under the powerful preaching of Whitefield and Gilbert Tennent, he resolved to enter the ministry, and studied theology under President Edwards. He began preaching at the age of twenty, and two years after was ordained pastor of a church in Housatonic, now Great Barrington, Massachusetts, which, during his pastorate of twenty-five years, in spite of frequent interruptions caused by the French-and-Indian War, increased in numbers from five to one hundred and sixteen members. His strongly Calvinistic teachings gave offence to many of his parishioners, and some refused to contribute to his support, while others were too poor to do so. In 1770 he removed to Newport, Rhode Island, where he continued till the town came into possession of the British, in 1776, when he was obliged to flee. Meanwhile he assisted Dr. Samuel Spring, at Newburyport, and ministered to destitute churches in Connecticut. He returned to Newport in 1779 to find his congregation scattered and his church edifice nearly destroyed. With pecuniary assistance received from Boston and Newburyport he rebuilt his meeting-house, and continued faithful to his congregation without regular salary, though liberal offers were sent him from other places.

Dr. Hopkins may be regarded as the pioneer in the anti-slavery movement in the United States. At a very early period of his ministry in Newport he began to preach against the slave-trade, though many of the wealthiest of his congregation were slave-traders and slave-owners. In 1776, through his "Dialogue Concerning the Slavery of the Africans" and his "Address to HONORATUS (hon-or'a-tus), SAINT, the name of two prelates of the early Church.

1. ARCHBISHOP OF ARLES, was born in the latter part of the fourth century in Belgian Gaul, of pagan parents, but became a Christian, and with his brother Venantius left his country and founded a monastery on Serino Island, from which came some of the most celebrated theologians and prelates of the fifth and sixth centuries. He died in 429.

2. BISHOP OF MARSEILLES, was born in the early part of the fifth century. He succeeded Tillemont in the office of bishop, but of the events of his life little is known. He died about 492.

HONORIUS (ho-no're-us), the title assumed by four popes and one anti-pope. I. Chiefly known in connection with Augustine's mission among the Anglo-Saxons, and the Monothelite controversy in the Eastern Church about the unity of will in Christ's twofold nature. He was accused of having shown himself favorable to that sect. II. This name was first assumed by the anti-pope Cadalous in 1061; then, legitimately, by Lambert, bishop of Ostia, who was elected pope in 1124. He is recorded in history as having unsuccessfully disputed with Roger the Norman the possession of Southern Italy. III. His name was Cencio de Savelli, a noble family of Rome, the successor of Innocent III. in 1216, and a fanatical supporter of the crusade against the Albigenses. Immediately on his election he wrote to John of Brienne, king of Jerusalem, to assure him of his support, and to the emperor of Constantinople, to promise him assistance against the schismatics. He was also at war with the people of Rome, who repeatedly revolted against his temporal rule. IV. Of the same family, elected 1285. Following the policy of his predecessors, he lent his influence to the consolidation of the Anjou dynasty at Naples. In his spiritual character he repressed the ultra-ascetic tendency which had been fomented by the mendicant orders, and issued a bull against the so-called apostolicals and other religious sects of that time.

HONTHEIM (hont'ime), JOHN NICOLAS VON, was one of the most remarkable of the Romish ecclesiastics of the eighteenth century. He was born in 1701, at Treves, and educated in the Jesuits' College and University of that place, and he rose to be archbishop of the city.

HOOD, a tiara or turban as wound or folded round the head, or a sash of fine linen round the bottom of the tiara.

HOOK, HOOKS. The word frequently occurs in Scripture as the translation of various Hebrew terms. Thus there were hooks or pins from which the curtains of the tabernacle were suspended, Ex. xxvi. 33, 37. There were also flesh-hooks, with which flesh was taken from the pot, Ex. xxvii. 3; Num. iv. 14; 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14; these seem to have had three teeth. There were hooks, or rather rings, sometimes put through the noses of wild beasts by which to lead them. Captives were similarly treated, 2 Ki. xix. 28; Ezek. xxix. 4—a practice illustrated by some of the Assyrian monuments. Such a ring was used to secure a fish or marine animal, a cord being attached, so that it might be preserved alive without being able to escape, Job xli. 2. Further, there were "pruning-hooks," Isa. ii. 4; xviii. 5, "fish-hooks," Amos iv. 2, and "hooks," Ezek. xl. 43; with regard to which some uncertainty exists. Perhaps there might be forked projecting pins in the part of the court where the victims were killed, on which those victims were suspended in order to take off the skin.

HOOK, JAMES, LL.D., a learned divine of the Church of England, was born in 1771, in London. He graduated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, and was archdeacon of Huntingdon and dean of Worcester. He published "Anguis in Herba," a true sketch of the Church of England and her clergy. He died in 1828.

HOOKER (hook'er), HERMAN, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in 1804, at Poulney, Vermont. He graduated at Middlebury College, completed his theological studies at Princeton, and after having been licensed as a Presbyterian, he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church; but having partially lost his sight and his voice, he retired from the ministry and engaged in the publishing and bookselling trade in Philadelphia, without, however, relinquishing his theological pursuits. He wrote several books of considerable merit, among which are "Popular Infidelity," "The Uses of Adversity and the Provisions of Consolation," and "The Christian Life a Fight of Faith." Dr. Hooker was highly esteemed as a man of devout piety, whose Christian character was illustrated by many acts of benevolence. The Nashotah Seminary was made by him the recipient, as residuary legatee, of nearly ten thousand dollars. He died September 26, 1865, at Philadelphia.

HOOKER, RICHARD, who arose to great eminence as a profoundly learned divine and author of the Church of England, was born at Heavitree, Exeter, in 1533, and was the son of parents of very humble circumstances, who with difficulty sent him to school. One of his uncles was chamberlain of the city of Exeter, and at the instance of the tradesman to which Richard had been indentured, he made application to Jewell, bishop of Salisbury, to send the lad to college, and save such eminent parts as he possessed from being buried beneath a tradesman's calling. The good bishop readily responded to this request after an interview with him, and sent him at fifteen years of age, with a pension, to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, the journey thither being performed on foot. The death of the bishop seemed to cut off all hope of further progress, but he found new friends raised up for him in Dr. Cole, the president of his college, and in Sandys, at the time bishop of London, who had heard of him from Bishop Jewell. The latter sent his son Edwin to him as pupil, with whom he had also George Cranmer.

With these he passed a happy and useful time at the university, remarkable as a student and as a humble Christian—ungainly, indeed, in body, but with a soul richly adorned, and a capacious mind, which he sedulously fed. He became scholar and Fellow of his college and in due time took holy orders, and soon after was appointed to preach at St. Paul's Cross. He lodged in the apartments provided for the preacher, which were called the Shunamite's house. He fell under the influence of a widow, who induced him to marry her daughter, Joan Churchman, who brought him neither beauty, money nor happiness. By this step he lost his Fellowship, but was presented to the living of Drayton-Beauchamp, and in 1855 was appointed master of the Temple. In this new position he found nothing but trouble. One Travers, afternoon lecturer at the Temple, who expected to have been made master, revenged his disappointment by bringing charges of false doctrine against Hooker. Archbishop Whitgift took the side of Hooker and silenced Travers. The latter published his "Supplication," and this obliged Hooker to reply in an answer which was the germ of "The Ecclesiastical Polity." Desirous of expanding this, and not finding the Temple a place for study, he resigned the mastership and went to Boscombe, from which, after four years, he was promoted by Queen Elizabeth to Bishopsbourne, where he continued till his death. At the former living he wrote the first and at the latter the remaining four books of his work, which attracted immediate attention. Its profound philosophical groundwork, its vast learning and dignity and eloquence of style have given it a place among the masterpieces of English prose literature. King James had such a reverence for the author of it that he always spoke of him as the learned or judicious Mr. Hooker. And Clement VIII., having read a part of it, which was for him rendered into Latin, said, "There is no learning that this man hath not searched into, nothing too hard for his understanding. His books will get revered by age, for there are in them such seeds of eternity that, if the rest be like this, they shall last till the last fire shall consume all learning." As a parish priest Hooker was most laborious and zealous, and distinguished for the self-denial and IBAS (i'bas), bishop of Edessa, in Syria. He was deposed for Nestorianism in 449, but was restored in 451. After his death he was again condemned as a Nestorian heretic. He died about 457.

IBBOT (ib'bot), BENJAMIN, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in 1630 at Beachamwell, Norfolk. He was educated at Cambridge, and became librarian to Archbishop Tenison. His patron afterward gave him the post of treasurer to the cathedral of Wells, together with a living in London. In 1713-14 Ibbot delivered the Boyle lectures, afterward published. He was made royal chaplain in 1716, and in 1724 prebendary of Westminster. He died in 1725.

IBHAR (ib'har), one of the sons of David, 2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chr. iii. 6; xiv. 5.

IBIS (i'bis), a very well-known member of the family of Egyptian sacred birds. The "Ibis falcinellus," or the glossy ibis, was probably the black ibis of Herodotus, and celebrated for destroying snakes. It is migratory in its habits, and in the range of its extensive journeys it annually visits the Danube, Poland, Hungary, and even distant Siberia. It is found very commonly in Asia and Africa, and its remains are found among the mummies of the Egyptian catacombs. The glossy ibis lives in societies, and its migrations are always by companies. It feeds on reptiles, worms, insects and aquatic plants, which it gathers on the banks of streams and sluggish waters. Its general color is a greenish glossy black, with the under parts a bright chestnut. A naked green skin extends from the bill to the eyes, and the legs as well as the bill are of a greenish hue.

The "Ibis religiosa," or sacred ibis, as described by Herodotus, was white all over except the head, the neck, the tips of the wings and the rump, which are quite black. Bruce, the celebrated traveler, established the identity of this species with the sacred species of the ancient Egyptians. This ibis is not common in Egypt, but it prevails in Senegal, although, being migratory, it visits Egypt when the Nile rises. As the waters rise the ibis retires, still searching for food about the margin of the stream. It utters a loud, hoarse cry as it flies. The centre of Africa would seem to be the great home of this species. Much that Herodotus has recorded of the feats of the ibis in killing snakes must be apocryphal.

IBLEAM (ib'le-am), a city belonging to Manasseh, but territorially within the district of another tribe, Josh. xvii. 11; Jud. i. 27; 2 Ki. ix. 27. It is perhaps identical with Bileam, 1 Chr. vi. 70.

IBN ADONIA. See JACOB BEN-SHAJEM.

IBN AKNIN (ib'n ak'nin), JOSEPH BEN-JEHUDAH, a distinguished Jewish philosopher and commentator, was born at Ceuta, in Arabia, about 1160. He fled from his native place about 1185, and for a time settled in Alexandria, where he became a disciple and intimate friend of Maimonides. He then went to Syria, and thence to Bagdad, where he founded a rabbinic college, and also practiced medicine. Besides his poetical, ethical, medical and metaphysical works, he wrote a "Commentary on the Song of Songs," now to be found in the Bodleian library, Oxford. He espouses the notion of the Talmud that the Song of Songs is the most sacred of all the twenty-four canonical books of the Old Testament, and accordingly explains it allegorically as representing the relationship of God to his people Israel.

THE SACRED IBIS OF EGYPT.—See IBIS.

IBN BALAAM (ba'lām), JEHUDAH, one of the most distinguished philologists and commentators of the Spanish school, was born in Seville before 1050. He wrote several works on the accents of the Hebrew of the Bible, and a number of commentaries on specific books; the principal of these are—"A Commentary on the Pentateuch," written in Arabic, though this work has long been known through Ibn Ezra, who quotes it in his commentary, yet it is only lately that a manuscript has been discovered in the Bodleian library containing the commentary on Numbers and Deuteronomy; "A Commentary on the Psalms," quoted by Ibn Ezra; "A Commentary on the Song of Songs," which, according to Ibn Aknin, who quotes it, gives a literal exposition of this book; "A Commentary on Isaiah," from which it appears that Ibn Balaam, contrary to the generally received opinion, explains away the Messianic prophecies, and interprets Isa. xi. as referring to Hezekiah. Ibn Balaam is one of the most liberal interpreters, and quotes Christian commentators and the Koran in his expositions.

IBN BARUCH (ba'rook), BARUCH, a distinguished Jewish philosopher and commentator, flourished in the sixteenth century at Venice. He published a twofold commentary on Ecclesiastes, called by the double name of "The Congregation of Jacob" and "Holy Israel," the first of which is discursive and diffuse, and the second exegetical and brief. Based upon the first verse, "the words of Coheleth, son of David, king in Jerusalem," he maintains that two persons are speaking in its book, a skeptic named Coheleth, and a believer called Ben-David, and accordingly treats the whole as a dialogue, in which these two characters discuss the most important problems of moral philosophy. This commentary is most important to the understanding of the Jewish philosophy.

IBN CASPI or CASPE (kas'pe), JOSEPH BEN-ABBA MARI BEN-JOSEPH BEN-JACOB. This remarkable Jewish philosopher, poet, lexicographer and commentator was born about A. D. 1280, at Argentiere, in France. His brilliant powers and fondness for Biblical exegesis he evinced at the early age of seventeen, when he published the masterly commentaries upon Ibn Ezra's exposition of the Pentateuch. In his thirtieth year he devoted himself to the study of logic and the speculative sciences, as well as to the interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures. He was a most voluminous writer; besides a number of philosophical and ethical productions, he wrote a number of commentaries on grammatical and kindred subjects, besides expositions of different books of Scripture, and reviews of Ibn Ezra, and a valuable Hebrew lexicon. The most important of his works are—A Hebrew lexicon. He starts from the principle that every root has only one general idea at its basis, and logically deduces from it all the other shades of meaning. "A Commentary on Ibn Ezra's Exposition of the Pentateuch." "Rules about Most of the Mysteries of the Pentateuch, and Explanations of its Apparently Superfluous Statements." "A Commentary on the Pentateuch," in the introduction to which he gives an analysis of its tendency and parts. "A Collection of those Expositions of the Pentateuch, in which Ibn Caspi Differs from Maimonides and Ibn Ezra." "A Commentary on Eight Prophets." In his criticisms on Isaiah (lii.-liv.), Ibn Caspi is very severe upon those who explain these prophecies as referring to the Messiah. "An Exposition of the Psalms." "A Commentary on Proverbs, the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes," which is one of Ibn Caspi's most valuable contributions to Biblical exegesis. "A Commentary on Job." "An Exposition of Ruth and Lamentations." "A Commentary on Esther." One "On Daniel." "An Exposition of Ezra and Chronicles." "A Commentary on all the Passages Found in the Pentateuch and in the Prophets which Refer to the Creation." One "On the Miracles and other Mysteries Found in the Pentateuch, Prophets and Hagiography." "One Hundred Profound Questions in Connection with the Pentateuch and Prophets."

The principles of interpretation by which Ibn Caspi was guided in explaining the Bible are thus stated by himself: "The sacred Scriptures must be explained according to their plain and literal sense, and a recondite meaning can as little be introduced into them as into Aristotle's writings on logic and natural history. Only where the literal meaning is not sufficient, and reason rejects it, a deeper sense must be resorted to. If we once attempt to allegorize a simple and intelligible passage, then we might just as well do it with the whole contents of the Bible. . . . The logical division of sentences is the most indispensable and best auxiliary to the right understanding of the Bible, and the criterion to the proper order of the words are the Massora and the accents." We see from this extract that this writer of the Middle Ages anticipated the hermeneutical rules of modern criticism at a time when the schoolmen and the depositaries of Christian learning were engaged in hair-splitting and in allegorizing every fact of the Bible. He died about 1340.

IBN CHAJIM (ka'yim), AARON, the Jewish commentator, was born at Fez, about 1570. He wrote (1) a "Commentary on Joshua," and (2) another "on Judges," giving first the verbal explanation, and then an exposition of the text; (3) "A Commentary on Sifra," or the traditional explanation of Leviticus, published under the title of "The Oblation of Aaron;" (4) A treatise on R. Ishmael's thirteen rules for interpreting the Scriptures, called "The Rules of Aaron."

IBN DANAN (da'nan), SAADIA B. MAIMON, a Jewish poet, lexicographer and commentator of the Spanish school, was born about 1450. His exegetical works are—a "Commentary on Isaiah lli. 13," in which he tells us that Ibn Caspi regards those who interpret this of the Messiah to be as greatly in error as those who refer it to Jesus of Nazareth, but Ibn Saadia adds to this remark, "May God have mercy upon him"—i. e., upon Ibn Caspi; and a "Hebrew Lexicon," written in Arabic. He died about 1502.

IBN DAUD (da'ood), JEHUDAH. See CHAJUG.

IBN DJANAH. See IBN GANACH.

IBNEIAH (ib-ne'yah), a Benjamite who dwelt at Jerusalem, 1 Chr. ix. 8.

IBN EZRA (ib'n ez'rah), ABRAHAM BEN MEIER, one of the most remarkable of the Jewish literati of the Middle Ages, who commanded the whole cycle of knowledge of his time, was born in Toledo, in 1088-89, and very soon distinguished himself as a mathematician, astronomer, philosopher, poet, physician, traveler, theologian, grammarian and commentator. It is, however, with his labors as a Biblical commentator and grammarian that we have to deal. Upon those labors he first entered in the "Eternal City," where he published, in his fiftieth year, "Commentaries on the Five Megilloth"—viz., The Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Coheleth and Esther—which were immediately followed by "An Exposition of Job," and two grammatical treatises on the language of the sacred Scriptures. These were succeeded by another Hebrew grammar, which he published whilst in Mantua in 1145. From Mantua this erratic genius emigrated to Lucca, where he wrote his masterly commentaries on Isaiah and the Pentateuch, as well as two grammatical treatises. We then find him issuing commentaries on "Daniel, the Psalms and the Minor Prophets" in Rhodes, then publishing an energetic defence of the Sabbath in London, and then again in Rhodes, where he issued a second edition of his commentary on the Pentateuch, and another grammatical work. He now determined to return to Spain, at the advanced age of seventy-eight, but died on his journey when he arrived at Calahorra, on the borders of Navarre and Aragon, in 1176.

The contradictions of which human nature is composed appear more glaringly in the commentaries of Ibn Ezra than in the writings of the majority of great men. His keen and daring researches brought him to the very verge of Pantheism, yet his faith in revelation was at times perfectly fanatical. He questioned the genuineness of many portions of the Pentateuch, as well as the latter part of Isaiah, regarded the history of Jonah as a dream and charged the chronicles with a blunder, Ex. xxv. 29, yet he anathematized Itzhaki for doing the same thing and denounced free inquiry as heretical. His confidence in God and resignation to the gracious dealings of Providence were almost unbounded, yet he fully believed in the irresistible influence of the stars on human actions. He traced every phenomenon in the Bible to a natural origin, yet he propounded a mystical theory, according to which all things are wrapped up in profound darkness. Notwithstanding these contradictions, Ibn Ezra was born a commentator, and was the first who raised Biblical exegesis to a science, interpreting the text according to the laws of language. His ingenious criticisms of the text deserve the greatest attention of the Biblical student and Hebrew grammarian. Having traveled in Italy, Provence, England, Rhodes, Palestine, Africa and India, this shrewd observer and profound scholar frequently illustrates the manners and customs mentioned in the Bible by those of other nations with whom he mixed, and also makes some valuable remarks on Biblical geography. His knowledge of the Hebrew Bible was truly wonderful. Though living at a time when no concordances existed, yet he knew whether a word or a certain form of a word was unique or not. Equal to this marvelous knowledge of the Scripture was his extensive acquaintance with the best grammatical, lexical and exegetical works of his predecessors and contemporaries, which he constantly quotes. His commentaries were a complete triumph over the allegorical and trifling manner in which the Bible was expounded both by the synagogue and the Church, and even the great luminary Maimonides charged his son, in his last will and testament, not to study any other commentaries than those of Ibn Ezra, "which are exceedingly good and cannot be consulted without profit, and which, for beauty of thought, clearness of wisdom and clearness of perception, are unlike any other writings." Ibn Ezra's style is very concise and sometimes very obscure, which is to be ascribed to the fact that he formed a technical phraseology of his own, that the good humor with which he exposes the expositions of his opponents is often expressed in plays upon words, and that he not unfrequently veiled his skepticism about the Mosaic authorship of certain portions of the Pentateuch in ambiguous and laconic phrases. Thus, for instance, upon Gen. xii. 6 he remarks, "There is a mystery here, but the wise man will be quiet."

IBN GANACH (ga'nakh), or DJANAH JONAH (dya'nah jo'nah), or ABULVALID MERVAN (ab-ool-valid mer'van), a famous grammarian and lexicographer [quoted in Jewish writings as "Rabbi Jonah," "R. Jonah the Grammarian," "R. Jonah the Spaniard," "R. Jonah the Physician," "R. Jonah the Physician, Ibn Ganach," and, chiefly by Ibn Ezra, as "Rabbi Marinus," or "Merinus"], was born at Cordova, about A. D. 995. When quite a youth, Ibn Ganach evinced his skill in the sacred language by writing Hebrew poetry. This, however, he soon gave up for the more solid and arduous studies of Hebrew grammar and lexicography and medicine. But his studies and domestic peace were soon interrupted, as he, like many of his coreligionists, had to quit Cordova in consequence of the sufferings which were inflicted upon the inhabitants of that devoted city after its capture in the year 1013. He went to Saragossa, where he settled down when about twenty years of age, practiced medicine for a maintenance, and devoted all his spare time to the prosecution of his researches in sacred philology and hermeneutics, which were the chief aim of his life; and his achievements in these departments are truly marvelous. Independent in his researches, and sincerely believing that whatever tends to evolve the true sense of the inspired text ought to be publicly made known, though it might be contrary to venerated opinions and against one's own interests, Ibn Ganach published the first installment of his labors in Arabic, in the form of additions to and correction of Chajug's grammatical treatise on "The Quiescent Letters," under the title of "Supplement," or "Strictures," which is a very important contribution to Biblical exegesis. But notwithstanding the excellency of his criticisms and the meek and gentle spirit of their author, these strictures upon so celebrated a man provoked a rejoinder from one of the disciples of Chajug, to which Ibn Ganach replied in a treatise, entitled "The Book of Reproach or Correction," which, like its predecessor, contains very valuable grammatical and exegetical remarks. He then published a polemical work called "The Book of Recollections," another called "The Book of Approximation and Rectification," and another entitled "The Book of Reconciliation." He also wrote a Commentary on the Song of Songs, which, according to Ibn Aknin, who quotes it, gives a literal exposition of this book. Whilst engaged in his polemical works, Ibn Ganach prepared himself for his crowning work, called "The Critic," which he divided into two parts, the one being a treatise on grammar as connected with exegesis, entitled "The Book of Embroidery," and the other a lexicon, entitled "The Book of Roots." This gigantic work is the most important philological production in the Jewish literature of the Middle Ages. The mastery of the science of the Hebrew language in all its delicate points which Ibn Ganach therein displays, the lucid manner in which he explains every grammatical difficulty and the sound exegetical rules which he therein propounds have few parallels up to the present day. He was not only the creator of the Hebrew syntax, but almost brought it to perfection. He was the first who pointed out the ellipses and the transposition of letters, words and verses in the Hebrew Bible.

THE SACRED IBIS OF EGYPT.—See IBIS.

He explained, in a simple and natural manner, more than two hundred obscure passages in the Bible, which had up to his time greatly perplexed all interpreters, by showing that the sacred writers used abnormal for normal expressions. Though his faith in the inspiration of the Hebrew Scriptures was absolute, yet he maintained that, being addressed to men, they are subject to the laws of language, and hence urged that the abnormal expressions and forms in the Bible are not to be ascribed to the ignorance of transcribers and punctuators, nor to willful corruption, but are owing to the fact that the sacred writers, being human, paid the tribute of humanity. Notwithstanding the opposition he met with during his life, no philologist has exercised directly and indirectly such an influence both upon Jewish and Christian grammarians and commentators as Ibn Ganach. All his works were written in Arabic. He died about 1050.

IBN GEBIROL (geb'e-role), or GABIROL (gab'e-role), SOLOMON BEN JEHUDAH, a distinguished Jewish philosopher, commentator, grammarian and a most celebrated hymnologist, was born in Malaga, about A. D. 1021. To this sweet singer of Israel versification in the sacred language was so easy that he wrote a Hebrew grammar in rhyme when nineteen years of age, and by his charming style imparted life to the otherwise dry rules. At the age of twenty-four he wrote in Arabic an ethico-philosophical work, in which he propounds a peculiar theory of the human temperament and passions, enumerates twenty propensities corresponding to the four dispositions multiplied by the five senses, and shows how the leaning of the soul to the one side may be brought to the moral equipoise by observing the declarations of Scripture and ethical sayings of the Talmud, which he largely quotes. In consequence of some personal allusions which he made in this work, Ibn Gebirol was obliged to quit Saragossa in 1046. After wandering about Spain for some time, he wrote in Arabic his grand philosophical work, called "The Fountain of Life." Ibn Gebirol's works form an important part in the history of Jewish philosophy, inasmuch as he was the first philosopher of the Middle Ages in Europe, and as his philosophical treatises were used by many celebrated schoolmen of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. From Ibn Ezra's quotations it appears that Ibn Gebirol also wrote expositions of the Scriptures. It must be added that his hymn entitled "The Royal Diadem," which is a beautiful and pathetic poetical composition of profound philosophical sentiments and great devotion, forms an important part of the divine service on the evening preceding the great day of atonement with the devout Jews to the present day. He died in 1070.

IBN GIATH (ge'ath), ISAAC BEN JEHUDAH, was born about 1030 of a very distinguished family who resided in Lucena, not far from Cordova, and afterward became the spiritual head of the Jewish community in that place. He wrote a "Commentary on Ecclesiastes," which, as appears from the frequent quotations from it by the best interpreters and lexicographers, contains important contributions to the critical exposition of this difficult book. It also appears that Ibn Giath wrote some other exegetical and grammatical treatises, and that he materially aided the development of Biblical exegesis. He also distinguished himself as a hymnologist, and his devotional poetry is used in the Jewish service to the present day. He died in 1089.

IBNIJAH, a Benjamite, 1 Chr. ix. 8.

IBN JACHJA (yakh'ya), JOSEPH BEN DAVID, a distinguished Jewish commentator, was born in 1494, at Florence, whither his parents had fled from Portugal in consequence of the religious persecutions which were heaped upon the Jews. He was educated first at Verona, then at Imola and Padua, and he spent the remainder of his life at Imola. He wrote "A Commentary on the Five Megilloth,"—viz., the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes and Esther; "A Commentary on the Psalms," "A Commentary on Proverbs" and "A Commentary on Daniel." Ibn Jachja died in 1539, having undermined his constitution with excessive literary labor; his remains were conveyed ten years after his death to Safet, where they were deposited with great honor. The merits of his commentaries chiefly consist in the fact that they give a digest of the traditional interpretation of the Bible, and that the student of historico-critical exegesis finds in them ready at hand the Midrashic lore for which he would otherwise have to search in many an ancient volume.

IBN KASTOR (kas'tor). See ITZCHAKI.

IBN KOREISH (ko'rish), JEHUDAH, one of the earliest Jewish lexicographers, flourished during the latter part of the ninth century in Tahart or Tahort, in Africa, and may be regarded as the first who wrote on comparative philology. He wrote "A Hebrew Lexicon," "A Hebrew Grammar" and "An Epistle" addressed to the Jewish community at Fez, in which he rebukes his brethren for neglecting to study the Chaldee paraphrases of the Old Testament, and tries to show that it is impossible to understand some portions of the Bible without the help of the cognate Shemitic idioms. The work is an important contribution to Hebrew grammar and lexicography, and is quoted by the best grammarians and interpreters.

IBN SAKTAR (sak'tar). See ITZCHAKI.

IBN SHOEIB (sho'ib), JOEL, flourished

THE SACRED IBIS OF EGYPT.—See IBIS.

during the latter part of the fifteenth century at Tudela. He wrote "A Commentary on the Pentateuch," "A Commentary on the Psalms," "A Commentary on the Song of Songs" and "An Exposition of Lamentations." His liberality of mind in expounding the Hebrew Scriptures may be judged of from the fact that at the very time when his coreligionists were suffering most bitterly from the Christian nations of those days, Ibn Shoeib maintained in his "Commentary on the Psalms" that pious Gentiles will have a portion in the world to come.

IBRI, a descendant of Merari, 1 Chr. xxiv. 27.

IBZAN (ib'zan), the tenth judge of Israel. He was of Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem of Zebulun, and not of Judah. He governed seven years. The prosperity of Ibazan is marked by the great number of his children (thirty sons and thirty daughters), and by his wealth by their marriages, for they were all married. Some have held, but without the least probability, that Ibazan was the same with Boaz, B. C. 1182, Jud. xii. 8.

ICARD (e-kar'), CHARLES, a French Protestant divine, was born in 1636, at St. Hyppolyte, Languedoc. After completing his theological studies at Geneva, he was ordained and became pastor of La Norville, whence he was called to Nîmes. He was one of the central committee organized during the persecutions under Louis XIV. for the protection of the Protestant interests, and along with a number of his colleagues was condemned to death. He escaped, however, first to Geneva and then to Neufchatel, where he was pastor for several years. He subsequently preached to a French congregation at Bremen. He died in 1715.

ICE, or congealed water, is repeatedly mentioned in Scripture, usually as giving point to an illustration, Job vi. 16; xxxviii. 29. Perhaps the Hebrews cooled their drinks with ice or snow, Prov. xxv. 13. In Ps. cxlvii. 17 it is put poetically for hail.

ICHABOD (ik'a-bod), "where is the glory," the son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli, no further distinguished than as having been born at the time when the ark of the Lord fell into the hands of the Philistines. This calamity, with the news of her husband's death, fell like a thunderbolt on the afflicted mother, and broke her heart. In her last moments she gave the name of Ichabod to her child, in commemoration of the disasters which had befallen her house and country, 1 Sam. iv. 19-22.

THE PARADOXURE.—See ICHNEUMON.

ICHNEUMON (ik'nu-mon), the name of a well-known small Egyptian animal with which the Israelites must have been familiar. In form and habit the ichneumon approaches the ferret in character and size, being celebrated for destroying birds, reptiles and small mammalia. They are beautiful, cleanly and easily domesticated, and of great use in households, though dangerous in the poultry yard. They were deified by the Egyptians because of their utility. The Indian species is much smaller than the Egyptian, and there is also another, the paradoxure, found in India, of similar habits. It is somewhat larger than a common cat.

ICHTHYS (ikh'this), one of the earliest symbols of Christ. It is the Greek word for "fish," and is composed of the initial letters of "Iēsous Christos, Theou Huios, Soter," the translation of which is, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour. This anagram of the name of Jesus is found in many ancient inscriptions and upon works of art.

ICONIUM (i-ko'ne-nm), a considerable city of Asia Minor, generally considered as belonging to Lyconia. It lay in a fertile plain at the foot of Tarsus, on the great line of communication between Ephesus and the more eastern cities of Tarsus and Antioch and the Euphrates. St. Paul first visited Iconium with Barnabas from Antioch in Pisidia, a town to the west, and their preaching and miracles were made effectual to the conversion of many; but a persecution being stirred up by the Jews, the apostles fled to Lystra and Derbe. They visited Iconium again, however, before returning to the Syrian Antioch, Acts xiii. 50, 51; xiv.; 2 Tim. iii. 11. St. Paul must have been at Iconium in his next journey with Silas, Acts xvi. 1-6, and very possibly at a later period, xviii. 23. It was well suited for a centre of missionary operations.

ICONOCLASTS (i-kon'o-klasts), the title given to the reformers who, in the Middle Ages, destroyed the images used for worship in the Christian churches. The Iconoclastic struggle was particularly violent during the reigns of the Byzantine emperor Leo III. and his son Constantine Capronymus, and lasted from 726 to 795.

ICONOGRAPHY (i-ko-nog'ra-fe), strictly speaking, is a description of paintings, images and sculptured objects found in churches and their apertures, and all other buildings devoted to ecclesiastical purposes. It embraces all objects connected with Christian art during the Middle Ages.

ICTINUS (ik-te'nus), a celebrated Greek architect of the fifth century B. C. His greatest works were the Parthenon at Athens, the Temple of Ceres at Eleusis, and the Temple of Apollo Epicurius, near Phigaleia.

IDA (i'da), a woman of remarkable theological skill and learning, was abbess of the convent of Argensoles during the early part of the thirteenth century. She died in 1226.

IDACIUS (i-da'sh'us) or IDATHIUS (i-da'the-us), surnamed CLARUS, bishop of Emerida in Spain, flourished during the fourth century. He is particularly known by his severity toward the Priscillianists. He died about 392.

IDALAH (i-da'lah), a town of Zebulun, apparently lying between Shimron and Bethlehem, Josh. xix. 15. It is only once mentioned in Scripture, and does not occur in any other writer. Its site is unknown.

IDBASH (id'bash), a descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. iv. 3.

IDDO (id'do). 1. The father of one of Solomon's commissariat officers, 1 Ki. iv. 14. 2. A Gershonite Levite, 1 Chr. vi. 21, called also Adajah, ver. 41. 3. The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah, a priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon, Ezra v. 1; vi. 14; Neh. xii. 4, 16; Zech. i. 1, 7. 4. The ruler in David's time of Manasseh east of the Jordan, 1 Chr. xxvii. 21. 5. A seer whose "visions against Jeroboam, the son of Nebat," and book "concerning genealogies," and "story" or chronicle of the acts of Abijah, are referred to by the author of Chronicles, 2 Chr. ix. 29; xii. 15; xiii. 22. There is a Jewish tradition that he was the disobedient prophet of 1 Ki. xiii. 6. A chief of the Nethinim at Casiphia, to whom Ezra sent for Levites to join his caravan, Ezra viii. 17. Thirty-eight Levites and two hundred and twenty Nethinim responded to the call, v. 18-20.

IDEALISM (i-dee'al-izm), a term used to indicate a philosophical school, which has different subdivisions, according to the meaning attached to the word "idea." This word, in the usage of modern philosophers, has quite changed its signification from the time that Plato used it in his speculations. As Reid in his "Intellectual Powers" has said, "Plato agreed with the rest of the ancient philosophers in this, that all things consist of matter and form, and that the matter of which all things were made existed from eternity without form; but he likewise believed that there are eternal forms of all possible things which exist without matter, and to those eternal immaterial forms he gave the name of ideas. In the Platonic sense, then, 'ideas' were the patterns according to which the Deity fashioned the phenomenal or ectypal world." The change which took place in the meaning of the word in modern philosophy has usually been attributed to Descartes, but it is almost certain that he only followed the example set by a Scottish metaphysician who had preceded him, who was the first thinker of any eminence who used the term idea in its present acceptation. It has been well observed by Sir William Hamilton that "the fortune of this word is curious. Employed by Plato to express the real forms of the intelligible world, in lofty contrast with the unreal images of the sensible, it was lowered by Descartes, who extended it to the objects of our consciousness in general. When, after Gassendi, the school of Condillac had analyzed our highest faculties into our lowest, the 'idea' was still more deeply degraded from its high original. Like a fallen angel, it was relegated from the sphere of the divine intelligence to the atmosphere of human sense, till at last 'ideologie' (more correctly 'idealogie'), a word which could only properly suggest an 'a priori' scheme, deducing our knowledge from the intellect has in France become the name peculiarly distinctive of that philosophy of mind which exclusively derives our knowledge from the senses." Descartes was followed in his use of the word by Leibnitz in Germany and Locke in England, who applied the term to mental conceptions, instead of to the eternal and immaterial forms in the divine mind, after the pattern of which material existences were fashioned or made. To Bishop Berkeley, however, belongs the mastery of the present school of idealism. With him it was a fundamental principle that "the qualities of supposed objects cannot be perceived distinct from the mind that perceives them; and these qualities, it will be allowed, are all that we can know of such objects. If, therefore, there were external bodies, it is impossible we should ever know it; and if there were not, we should have exactly the same reason for believing there were as we now have. All, therefore, which really exists is spirit, or 'the thinking principle'—ourselves, our fellow-men and God. What we call ideas are presented to us by God in a certain order of succession, which order of successive presentation is what we mean by the laws of nature." Hence, the tendency of a system which seemed to cast doubt on the evidence of our senses and to overturn the universal belief of all mankind was to infuse doubt and lead to skepticism. Berkeley was followed by Hume, who carried the principle out to its legitimate extent, denying as he did not only the existence of all perceptible objects, but also the existence of a perceiving mind, and holding that all that could be consistently predicated of our mental state, was that a succession of mental consciousnesses existed of a fleeting character, that we have no knowledge of cause as producing any effect, and that all we can know is the succession of conscious feelings. In fact, the philosophy of Hume may be summed up in the statement that nothing can be known. In Germany there has been a tendency to return to the Platonic use of the term "idea," but even Hegel does not agree with the great leaders of German thought who preceded him. The likelihood is that among mental philosophers the word idea shall continue to stand for all those mental conceptions which we have of material objects when they are not present in perception, and to conceptions of moral feelings or objects of thought about which we discriminate or judge in our ordinary thinking life.

IDLE (i'd'l). The word "idle" does not often occur in our version, and generally is at once intelligible. But in Matt. xii. 36 the meaning of an "idle word" has been questioned. It may be best taken as indicating the empty, insincere language of a man who carelessly says one thing and means another.

IDOL (i'dol), a representation of some principle or being to whom worship was paid. It was intended to convey through the external senses a more vivid notion of the object adored, and thus to be simply a medium, as the Israelites meant to honor Jehovah by means of their calf-like image, Ex. xxxii. 5. But grosser ideas naturally prevailed; and men, having regarded the representation as sacred to the deity, came very often to consider it the deity itself, or at least to offer it worship, as if the senseless stone or piece of metal could hear and help them. Sometimes living creatures, animals or reptiles, were objects of adoration; sometimes idols were molten or graven images formed "by art and man's device." All such are equally prohibited in Scripture. Our word "idol," it may be observed, is from the Greek eidolon, an image, spectre or shade. The forms of idols were and are multifarious, from a shapeless block of wood or stone to the elaborately-figured and ornamented human or bestial representation. Idols had temples, where they were set up and fastened, Isa. xli. 7; Jer. x. 4, and priests appointed for the rites of their worship. Here as trophies the arms of defeated foes were hung, 1 Sam. xxxi. 10. And sometimes idols were carried out to battle, 2 Sam. v. 21. But they were essentially an affront and detestation to the holy Lord of heaven and earth, 2 Chr. xv. 16, marg., whether they were literal material idols, or whether merely some object or pursuit, incompatible with his service, to which the heart was given.

IDOLATRY (i-dol'a-tre), the worship of other objects and beings than the one true God. This must have arisen from the neglect and deprivation of that knowledge of himself which the great Creator communicated to the common father of the human family.

Probably the heavenly bodies were among the earliest objects of idolatrous reverence. Their glorious splendor, and the influence which they exercised upon mundane things, naturally impressed the minds of men, who, with indistinct notions of the mighty Former, transferred to them the honor due to him. This kind of idolatry is noticed in the book of Job, Job xxxi. 26-28. But a more subtle principle was introduced, regulating and intertwined with this worship. The power of nature was deified, that generative power according to which life was communicated and forms of existence were continually reproduced. And this power was separated into active and passive, male and female, the one after the highest notion, the source of spiritual, the other of physical, life. These powers were personified, sometimes separately, and sometimes in combination. Thus the sun and moon, the Baal and Astarte of Phœnician worship, were regarded as embodying these active and passive principles respectively. And the idol deities of other nations bore similar characters. It is easy to see how such worship would be tainted by licentiousness of thought, and that the rites of it would be immoral and obscene. Unnatural lusts would be indulged, till the frightful picture drawn by the apostle Paul of heathenism was abundantly realized among even the most refined nations of antiquity, Rom. i. 18-32. It was in order to guard the Israelites against such abominable things that many of the enactments of the Mosaic law were directed, for instance, Deut. xxii. 5.

There are indications of idolatrous worship among the early patriarchs—relics, it is likely, of that from which God withdrew Abraham, intending to raise from him in his seed a covenant people, Josh. xxiv. 2. Thus Laban had images, which Rachel purloined. And some such images continued in Jacob's family, Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, 32-35; xxxv. 2, 4. That the symbolic idolatry of Egypt made an impression on the Israelites may be concluded from the form of the image manufactured when Moses was in the mount, Ex. xxxii. 4. Also that there was some kind of star-worship practiced in the wilderness we may conclude from Amos v. 26; Acts vii. 43. Be this, however, as it may, we see at a late period of their wanderings the licentious worship of Baal-peor, contracted from the Moabites and Midianites, Num. xxv. It was so fearfully punished that the Hebrews, when they entered Canaan, kept themselves pure from idolatry; and this faithful conduct lasted during Joshua's life and that of the elders of that generation who survived him, Josh. xxiv. 31. Afterward the slackness of the people to take possession of the whole country, and their living in proximity to so many of the original possessors, and their habits of intercourse with them, produced a very natural effect. Again and again during the rule of the judges they served Baal and Ashtaroth, until, warned by chastisement, they returned to the God of their fathers, Jud. ii. 10-19. From all the idolatrous nations that were on their borders, east as well as west, they borrowed deities—from the Phœnicians and Philistines, from the Syrians, from Moab and from Ammon, Jud. x. 6. It was not till the days of Samuel that anything like a complete reformation was effected, 1 Sam. vii. 3-6. But after this, through the reigns of the first kings, idolatry seems to have disappeared in Israel, till the miserable folly of Solomon, who was perverted in his old age by his foreign wives, led him to build shrines for the false gods of Moab and Ammon and Phœnicia just in front of his own glorious temple, in unnatural rivalry with Jehovah, who had deigned to dwell there, 1 Ki. xi. 1-8. After the schism of the kingdom idolatry prevailed very generally among the ten tribes. The device of Jeroboam to prevent his subjects from worshipping at Jerusalem led easily to worse practices; and the alliance formed by Ahab with Jezebel wellnigh made Baal-worship the established religion of the land, 1 Ki. xii. 26, 27; xvi. 31-33. This received a check, indeed, from Elijah, 1 Ki. xviii. 40, and was eradicated by Jehu, 2 Ki. x. 18-28; still other forms of idolatrous worship were substituted, and at length God removed Israel by the hand of the Assyrian kings to distant exile, 2 Ki. xvii. 6-18. Colonists from the east occupied their cities; and a mixed religion then prevailed, a certain fear of Jehovah combined with the worship of the idols of the respective peoples who had been introduced, v. 24-41. Judah did not escape infection. Rehoboam copied the worst part of his father's doings, 1 Ki. xiv. 21-24. And though Asa and Jehoshaphat promoted reformation, 1 Ki. xv. 11-13; xxii. 43, yet the alliance with the house of Ahab, 2 Ki. viii. 18, produced the worst consequences; and even the better-disposed kings, by leaving the high-places, supplied opportunities for renewed apostasy. Hezekiah's reformation was more thorough, 2 Ki. xviii. 4-6, and so was Josiah's subsequently, 2 Ki. xxiii. 1-20; but the work of these pious sovereigns passed away with them, and the last days of Jerusalem were her worst, Jer. ii. 28; vii. 17, 18; xi. 13; and Judah too was carried into captivity.

The severe chastisement of the captivity in a great measure did its work; and though after the return there was much lukewarmness shown, and alliances were afresh made with ungodly nations, and false prophets appeared, Ezra ix. 1, 2; Neh. vi. 14, yet, so far as we can judge by the national covenant, Neh. x., and the general strain of the post-exilian prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, idolatry scarcely, if at all, existed. And subsequently, when Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to force idolatry upon the Jews, though some through fear complied, 1 Macc. i. 43-50, 54, yet the heart of the nation was sound, and his tyrannical attempt roused that spirit of resistance which led to the Maccabæan victories, ii., iii., etc.; and the general establishment of synagogues in which the sacred books were publicly read contributed to preserve the purity of the faith.

In the New Testament the Christians, who were continually brought into contact with idolaters through the extent of the Roman empire, were cautioned as to their behavior. Not only were they to abhor idol-worship itself, but they were also to abstain from meats which had been offered to idols, Acts xv. 29. It was true that the meat itself was not thereby defiled, for an idol was nothing, and therefore Christians need not be too particular in inquiring into the history of what was set before them. But if any one apprised them that it had been so presented, they were not to eat, lest an occasion of offence should be given to a brother or to a censorious heathen, 1 Cor. viii. 4-13; x. 25-32.

Sometimes, it would seem, idolatry is used in a figurative sense. God ought to have the whole heart. If a man sets it on any created object, he defrauds God of his right, and really pays worship to something else; and so his conduct is stigmatized as idolatry, Eph. v. 5; Col. iii. 5, and perhaps 1 John v. 21.

IDUEL (id'u-el), 1 Esd. viii. 43, one of the Jews whom Ezra sent to obtain the aid of the priests in the return from exile; probably identical with Ariel, Ezra viii. 16.

IDUMEA (id-u-me'a), Isa. xxxiv. 5, 6; Ezek. xxxv. 15; xxxvi. 5; Mark iii. 8. See EDOM.

IDUMEANS (id-u-me'anz), 2 Macc. x. 15, 16, the inhabitants of Idumea or Edom. See EDOM.

IGAL (i'gal). 1. One of the twelve spies sent by Moses to explore the land of Canaan, Num. xiii. 7. 2. One of David's mighty men, said in 2 Sam. xxiii. 36 to be the son of Nathan of Zobah.

IGDALIAH (ig-da'le-a), the son of Hanan, into whose chamber in the temple Jeremiah took the Rechabites, Jer. xxxv. 4.

IGEAL (ig'e-al), the same name in the original as Igal, but belonging to a remote descendant of David, the son of Shemaiah, 1 Chron. iii. 22.

IGNATIUS (ig-nah'sh'us). 1. SAINT, OF ANTIOCH, was one of the apostolical Fathers. Very few reliable facts about his early life are known. According to one account, he was born at Nura, in Cappadocia, but later investigation shows that there is no real ground for the statement. The work known as "The Martyrdom of Ignatius" and Eusebius are the chief sources of information respecting Ignatius; but the first is at least interpolated, and its genuineness has been justly called in question. In the "Martyrdom" he is described as having been a hearer of St. John, and Chrysostom affirms that he was ordained as bishop of Antioch by the apostles. Now, if Eusebius be correct in dating his ordination at A. D. 69, there must be great uncertainty about this statement as well as about his succession of Evodius, who followed St. Paul; and the confusion becomes greater when it is asserted in the "Apostolical Constitutions" that Ignatius and Evodius were contemporary, the former holding under Paul and the latter under Peter; whereas another version makes the latter the bishop of the Jewish converts and Ignatius the bishop of the Gentile Christians. He is represented as always displaying an earnest solicitude respecting the members of the flock, guarding and sustaining them, lest they should renounce their profession because of persecution. When Trajan was at Antioch, on his march to the eastern frontier to engage in the war with the Armenians and the Parthians, Ignatius offered himself to the emperor as a victim, rather than see his flock destroyed. The incidents in the conference are recorded in the "Martyrdom," and the result was an order that he should be sent to Rome and cast to the wild beasts. His journey was long and tedious, and opportunity was given to him to confirm the faithful at his different resting-places; and he sent several epistles to his beloved flock at Antioch, exhorting them to stand fast in their love to Christ, and not to weep for him; but rather rejoice that he was counted worthy to suffer for his Lord. "When at last he was brought into the dreadful arena, and just before the lions were let loose upon him, he looked up into the faces of the vast multitude that filled the amphitheatre and calmly said: 'Romans, spectators of this present scene, I am here not because of any crime, nor to absolve myself from any charge of wickedness, but to follow God, by the love of whom I am impelled, and whom I long for irrepressibly; for I am his wheat, and must be ground by the teeth of beasts, that I may become his pure bread.' Such portions of his mortal frame as remained were collected by his friends and removed to Antioch." As Trajan's march to the East was made A. D. 114, the martyrdom of Ignatius could not have taken place before the following year.

The epistles of Ignatius have proved a fertile source of controversy. Fifteen epistles have been attributed to him, seven of them having been written on his way to Rome. Jerome and Eusebius mention these. They are the epistles to the Ephesians, the Magnesians, the Trallians, the Romans, the Philadelphians, the Smyrnians and one to Polycarp. Two versions of these are extant, one of them acknowledged to be greatly interpolated. The controversy respecting his epistles began at an early date. The Magdeburg centuriators expressed great doubt of them; Calvin was more decided, declaring as he did in his "Institutions" that "nothing could be more silly than the stuff" ("nænia," trifles) "which had been brought out under the name of Ignatius, and rendered the impudence of those persons more insufferable who had set themselves to deceive the people by such phantoms." Usher and Pearson in England, and Dailé in France, entered fully into the controversy, but Cureton, a canon of Westminster in the year 1833, found entire copies of three epistles in a monastery in the desert of Nitria, and as soon as they appeared the controversy was opened again. In his "Corpus Ignatianum" he holds that the three epistles which he found are the only genuine remains of Ignatius. Opposed to this view was the argument of Uhlhorn, who held that the seven letters in short Greek recension are genuine. In 1859 Lepsius enters at great length into an examination of both sides of the controversy, and finally leans to the decision of Cureton, namely, that the epistles to Polycarp, to the Ephesians and the Romans, as they are found in the Syriac recension, are the only genuine remains. The celebrated Bunsen adopted the same view, but Professor Killen, in his "Ancient Church," repudiates these epistles, as well as all the others, as utterly worthless. He says: "It is no mean proof of the sagacity of the great Calvin that upward of three hundred years ago he passed a sweeping condemnation on these Ignatian epistles. At the time many were startled by the boldness of his language, and it was thought that he was somewhat precipitate in pronouncing such a judgment. . . . There is a far more intimate connection than many are disposed to believe between sound theology and sound criticism, for a right knowledge of the word of God strengthens the intellectual vision and assists in the detection of error wherever it may reveal itself. . . . Calvin knew that an apostolic man must have been acquainted with apostolic doctrine, and he saw that these letters must have been the production of an age when the pure light of Christianity was obscured." It may be observed that the "Martyrdom" professes to have been written by a companion of his voyage to Rome, but it is now admitted to be greatly interpolated.

2. SAINT, patriarch of Constantinople, was son of the emperor Michael Curopalates, and was born about 799. At the age of fourteen he became a monk, and was afterward ordained priest. In 846, on the death of Methodius, he was chosen to the dignity of patriarch. In consequence of his rebuke and excommunication of Bardas, brother of the empress Theodora, he was, in 857, deprived of his chair, but was reinstated. He died in 878.

IGNORANTINES (ig-no-ran'teenz), a Roman Catholic association established in France in 1724 by the abbe de la Salle for the free instruction of poor children in secular and religious knowledge. They are now generally known as the "Brothers of the Christian Schools," and have introduced their ecclesiastical establishments not only into the countries of Europe, but also into America.

IHRE (ih're), JOHANN VON, professor of rhetoric at Upsala, was born March 3, 1707, at Lund, and died at Upsala, November 26, 1780. He is chiefly remarkable for his labors on the Gothic version of Ulfilas, the results of which are given in a collection of tracts, containing, among other valuable matter, a series of critical observations on the readings of the Codex Argentinus, to which is prefixed a preface, in which the author endeavors to prove that the letters of the Codex were produced by an encaustic process, the surface of the parchment having been covered with wax, on which silver leaf was laid, and the form of the letter stamped thereon with a hot iron. As only one hundred and thirty-one copies of this collection were printed for subscribers, it is now extremely rare. Besides the tracts contained in this volume, Ihre wrote several others devoted to the same department of inquiry. His contributions to the Gothic literature are of the highest importance.

I. H. S. Among the many monograms which have come down from an early age this is one of the most common, and it appears to have been of early use. Different accounts are given of the origin of the symbol. According to one version, they are the first letters of three words which were on the luminous cross that appeared to Constantine, "In Hoc Signo Vinctes" (under this sign thou shalt conquer), while another finds their origin in the phrase, "Jesus Hominum Salvator" (Jesus the Saviour of Men), while there are others who hold that they are the first three letters of the Greek name of Jesus, for which opinion they give as a reason the fact that the early symbols were written in the Greek language, and that the motto which Constantine caused to be inscribed on his standard was in Greek. The Jesuits use this symbol with the figure of a cross placed on the middle of the horizontal line of the letter H.

IIM (i'im). 1. One of the stations of the Israelites, Num. xxxiii. 45; it is identical with Ije-

Abarim. 2. A town in the extreme south of Judah, Josh. xv. 29. 3. Isa. xiii. 22, marg. This word is rendered in the text "wild beasts of the islands." It is doubtless jackals, from a word signifying a wailing cry. In Isa. xxxiv. 14, marg., it is Ijim.

IJE-ABARIM (i-je-ab'a-rim), a place on the eastern frontier of Moab where the Israelites encamped before crossing the valley of Zared, Num. xxi. 11; xxxiii. 44. The site is unknown, and, indeed, the region in which it is situated has not as yet been explored. In Num. xxxiii. 45 the place is called simply Iim.

IJIM (i'jim). See IIM, 3.

IJON (i'jon), a city belonging to Naphtali, in the North of Palestine. It was taken by Ben-hadad, king of Syria, at the instance of King Asa, 1 Ki. xv. 20; 2 Chron. xvi. 4, and afterward by Tiglath-pileser in the reign of Pekah. Its site has been identified. To the south of Lebanon there is a pretty plain, six miles long and two broad, called Merj Aiyun. At its north end is a great mound, the top of which is covered with the rubbish of the ancient city.

IKEN (i'ken), KONRAD, D.D., was born at Bremen, December 25, 1689, and died June 30, 1753. He was professor of theology at the gymnasium and first minister of St. Stephen's Church at Bremen. He wrote "Hebrew Antiquities," "Theologico-Philological Treasures," and other works.

IKKESH (ik'kesh), the father of one of David's warriors, 2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chron. xi. 28; xxvii. 9.

IKRITI (ik're-ti), SHEMARIA BEN ELIAH, a distinguished Jewish philosopher, philologist and most voluminous commentator, originally from the island of Crete, whence he derived his name, flourished about 1290-1320 at Negropont. He was at the court of the king of Naples, for whom Ikrity wrote commentaries on the whole of the Old Testament, with the exception of Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy. The chief aim of Ikrity was to reconcile in his expositions the conflicting opinions of the rabbinic and the Karaite Jews, as well as to allay the contest of the followers of Maimonides with the old orthodox school. His commentaries are very diffuse, and contain much valuable criticism. It is to be regretted that they have not as yet been published.

ILAI (il'i), one of David's heroes, 1 Chron. xi. 29. He is called Zalmon in 2 Sam. xxiii. 28.

ILDEFONSUS (il-de-fon'sus), SAINTE, a distinguished ecclesiastic of Spain, was born at Toledo, in 607. He was one of the first Benedictines in Spain; and after serving some years as abbot of the convent of Agli, he became archbishop of Toledo. He died in 667. His chief work was one in which he labored to prove the perpetual virginity of the Virgin Mary.

ILGEN (il'gen), KARL DAVID, D.D., a distinguished theologian, was born at Burgholzhausen, in 1768. He was successively rector of the burgh school at Naumburg, professor of Oriental literature at Jena, rector at Schulpforte and ober-consistorialrath. In consequence of failing health he resigned the latter office in 1830, and retired to Berlin, where he died September 17, 1834. He wrote "The Documents of the First Book of Moses in their Original Form," etc.

ILIVE (i'liv-eh), JACOB, a noted infidel printer of England, was born in 1710. He was the author of a number of works, among which was "Modest Remarks on Bishop Sherlock's Sermons," for which he was imprisoned two years. He also printed the "Book of Jasher," which he pretended to have translated from Alcuin. He died in 1763.

ILLESCAS (il-les'kas), JACOB DE, a learned Jewish commentator, flourished in the fourteenth century, at Illescas, not far from Madrid, whence his family derived their name. He wrote allegorical, cabalistic and grammatical commentaries on the Pentateuch, which contain explanations of many difficult and obscure passages.

ILLYRICA (il-lir'e-ka), COUNCIL OF, met in the year 375, and confirmed the Nicene doctrine of the homousiastical trinity, decreeing that it should be taught in the churches throughout Asia.

ILLYRICUM (il-lir'e-kum), a country lying along the north-east coast of the Adriatic. It is only once mentioned in the New Testament, and that simply as the extreme limit to which, in the direction toward Rome, St. Paul at a particular period had carried the preaching of the gospel, Rom. xv. 19. It was then a Roman province, and the inhabitants consisted of a number of wild tribes.

ILLYRICUS, MATTHIAS. See FLACH.

IMAD-ED-DIN (im'ad-ed-din'), MOHAMMED, was born at Ispahan, in 1125. He was the private secretary of the great Saladin, and wrote histories of his conquests in Syria and of the capture of Jerusalem; also a history of the dynasty of the Seljoukides and a history of the Mussulman poets. He died at Damascus, in 1201.

IMAGE (im'aj). See IDOL.

IMAGE OF GOD. Man was at first created after God's "image," in his "likeness," Gen. i. 26, 27. By this must be understood both a natural and a moral similitude to the Creator. The first consisted in the intellectual power by which man stands altogether above the brute creation; the other in that purity of heart in which his will was in unison with the holy will of God. By transgression this was lost, and perhaps the high faculties of the mind were also deteriorated; so that now men bear "the image of the earthy," and it needs the great power of God's Spirit to assimilate the descendants of "the first man Adam" to "the last Adam." They must be renewed in the spirit of their mind ere they can "bear the image of the heavenly," John iii. 6; Rom. viii. 9; 1 Cor. xv. 45, 49. See ADAM.

IMAGE OF JEALOUSY, Ezek. viii. 3, 5. If any particular idol be here meant, it may have been Baal or Ashtoreth. But as the Lord is described as a "jealous God," who will not bear the estrangement of his people, more probably the phrase is used generally, applying to all the abominations which the prophet afterward witnessed.

IMAGERY (im'aj-er-e), CHAMBERS OF. In one of the visions of Ezekiel, the prophet, having seen the various idolatries committed at Jerusalem, broke through a wall in the court of the temple and discovered a secret chamber, which was closed against the sunlight, but no doubt illumined by lamps. On the walls of this he found portrayed beasts and reptiles of every kind, and before them were seventy elders of Israel, each man with a censer in hand, burning incense to the honor of these abominable things. No wonder that the wrath of God was kindled against those who worshiped in such "chambers of imagery," Ezek. viii. 7-12.

The description applies exactly to the inner chambers and sanctuaries of the Egyptian cells and tombs and temples, and the idolatrous worship depicted is founded upon that of the Egyptians. "The walls," says Dr. Kitto, "are covered with representations, sculptured or painted in vivid colors, of sacred animals, and of gods represented in the human form, and under various circumstances, or in various monstrous combinations of the animal and human forms."

IMAGE WORSHIP. In the article on IDOLATRY it is shown that among the ancient heathen images were made and revered as representatives of the powers in nature and of the different beings who were acknowledged as gods. There has always been a strong tendency in the human mind to embody in a visible form the objects of religious veneration, and in the downward tendency the degraded condition is soon reached when the utterly ignorant classes worship the image as a god.

Among the Jews the law of Moses was definite and express. No image was to be made of the divine Being, but the tendency to fall into the customs of the surrounding nations was displayed from age to age, and brought on the degenerate people the severe visitations of God.

In the early Christian Church images were unknown. Indeed, the heathen were accustomed to urge the want of images in Christian churches and households as an objection to Christianity, whereas on the Continent of Europe among the Jews a modern objection is urged against Romish usages, that the idolatry and image service which abound, show decidedly that Christianity must be untrue. So decided was the judgment in the early Church on the sinfulness of any usage of images that many of the Fathers, such as Tertullian, Origen, Clemens Alexandrinus and others, held that even painting and engraving of figures were unlawful. The use of emblems, however, became common. The fish, the anchor, the dove, were made to symbolize certain religious ideas, and then followed the introduction of painting. In time, under the plea of instructing the unlettered, instead of teaching them to read, figures, which had been used in households, were introduced into churches, and in the sixth century images were freely revered in the Eastern Church.

In the Romish Church the usage of images and pictures abounds, but the charge of worshipping them is denied by Romish theologians. As with prayers to the Virgin Mary and saints a distinction is insisted on between adoration and worship, so the same distinction is made in the case of images. The Council of Trent decreed in the twenty-fifth session "that the images of Christ and of the ever virgin mother of God, and in like manner of other saints, are to be kept and retained, and that 'due honor and veneration' is to be awarded to them. Not that it is believed that any divinity or power resides in them on account of which they are to be worshiped, or that any benefit is to be sought from them, or any confidence placed in images, as was formerly done by the Gentiles, who fixed their hope in idols. But the honor with which they are regarded is referred to those who are represented by them, so that we adore Christ and venerate the saints whose likenesses these images bear when we kiss them, uncover our heads in their presence and prostrate ourselves." It thus appears that in the Romish Church, by the authority of a council, a usage is sanctioned which was abhorrent to the mind of the early Church, and which was denounced and contended against by the early Fathers, who felt assured that in the second commandment God had forbidden the introduction of any visible figure, statue or image to be introduced into divine worship, and proclaimed that it was a sin to bow down to them or serve them.

IMAUM, or IMAM (i'mawm), one of the priestly body among the Mohammedans who performs religious service, but is not consecrated or ordained. See MOHAMMEDANISM.

IMLA, or IMLAH (im'lah), the father of the prophet Micaiah, 1 Ki. xxii. 8, 9; 2 Chr. xviii. 7, 8.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION OF THE VIRGIN MARY. There are evidences that early in the Church men arose who aimed at exalting the mother of our Lord by holding that she as well as the Saviour was born without the taint of original sin. The tenet became a subject of violent dispute in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The celebrated Bernard opposed it, and wrote against the canons adopted at Lyons, but Duns Scotus, the great Franciscan monk, defended the doctrine with all the power of his acute intellect. On the other hand, Thomas Aquinas, the "Angelical Doctor," threw himself with all his might against the doctrine, contending that as the Virgin Mary needed redemption, like any other mortal, she could not be without original sin. The controversy thus inaugurated raged with great violence between the Franciscans and the Dominicans, the Scotists defending and the Thomists denying it. In the fifteenth century Sixtus IV., who was of the Franciscan order, favored toleration on the subject; and when the Council of Trent dealt with it, the deliverance was made that the conception of all men in sin did not include that of the Virgin Mary. Later still the controversy raged with such extreme violence in Spain that military orders pledged themselves to uphold it. In the beginning of the eighteenth century Clement XI. ordained a festival to be held in honor of the Immaculate Conception, but the dogma had not yet been affirmed as of infallible truth. It remained for Pope Pius IX. to promulgate the faith of the Church on this long controverted subject. In 1849, when he was an exile at Gaeta, he sent forth a famous encyclical to the patriarchs, primates, archbishops and bishops of the whole Church, intimating how intensely the desire prevailed in the Church that a decision should be reached in honor of the sacred mother of God, and the Cardinal Fornarini was made president of a commission to receive and arrange the returns which might be made of the opinions of the clergy whose judgments had been sought. It appeared that 602 bishops favored the doctrine, and 52 doubted the propriety of a decision under the circumstances in which the Church was placed. In November, 1854, a consistory was held for consultation, at which 54 cardinals attended, together with 46 archbishops and 400 bishops. This assembly was not a general council, but on a vote of the members it appeared that 576 decided on the adoption of the doctrine and only 4 opposed it, whereupon, on the 8th day of December, 1854, in the church of St. Peter, and in the presence of more than 200 dignitaries, the pope, in answer to a petition from the college of cardinals, proclaimed with a tremulous voice in Latin the following decree: "We declare, pronounce and define that the doctrine which holds that the blessed Virgin Mary, at the first instant of her conception, by a singular privilege and grace of the omnipotent God, in virtue of the merits of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of mankind, was preserved immaculate from all stain of original sin, has been revealed by God, and therefore should firmly and constantly be believed by the faithful." On this occasion Rome presented the appearance of a city intoxicated with joy. The bells were rung, the cannon of St. Angelo thundered, the church of St. Peter was illuminated, and festival rites acknowledged the deliverance of "an infallible decree." In the fifth century Mary had been decreed to be the mother of God at the third general Council of Ephesus, and now she was proclaimed to have been conceived as free from original sin, thus ending the controversies which had torn the Church for seven centuries, and so laying a sure foundation for that worship which has made "mariolatry" to stand out the great devotion of the Romish Church.

IMMANENT ACTIVITY OF GOD. See PANTHEISM.

IMMANUEL (im-man'u-el), or EMMANUEL (em-man'u-el), the name imposed on the prospective child which the Lord by Isaiah declared he would give as a sign to the house of David, Isa. vii. 14. It has been a long-agitated question whether the child meant was the Messiah or a child born in the time of the prophet, perhaps to himself, typical of the birth at some future time of the Messiah, or, finally, of such a child simply, with nothing more than a name and accompaniments that admitted of being accommodated to Messiah's person and birth. It is the former alone of these opinions that we believe to be justified by the use made by the evangelist Matthew, ch. i. 22, 23, and even by the original passage itself, when closely examined and viewed in all its parts.

IMMANUEL (im-man'u-el), BEN SALOMON ROMI, a distinguished poet and commentator, was born in Rome, about 1265, and by diligent study and his natural endowments he became master of the whole cycle of Biblical and Talmudic literature, as well as of the productions of ancient and modern Greece and Rome. Immanuel wrote commentaries on the whole Old Testament, with the exception of the minor prophets and Ezra, giving not only a grammatical and archæological explanation of the text, but making also some of the most valuable remarks upon the nature and spirit of the poetical books. He died about 1330.

IMMATERIALITY (im-ma-te-re-al'e-te), an attribute not only of the divine nature, but likewise of the human soul. As applied to God, it is that quality wherein he forms a total contrast to matter and its properties. He is thus entirely free from all the limitations, of whatsoever kind, to which matter is subject. The same may be said, but in an inferior degree, of the immateriality of the human soul, which, though free from all the properties which pertain to matter, is yet limited by the physical conditions under which it is placed, through the necessity of having the body for a necessary organ of its life.

IMMENSITY OF GOD. Applied to material things, the term "immensity" denotes vastness in extent or bulk. As one of the divine attributes, it signifies that God is, as Dr. J. Pye Smith aptly says, "universally and immediately present, not as a body, but as a spirit; not by motion, or penetration, or filling, as would be predicated of a diffused fluid, or in any way as if the infinity of God were composed of a countless number of finite parts, but in a way peculiar to his own spiritual and perfect nature, and of which we can form no conception."

IMMER (im'mer). 1. The father of Pashur, who was chief governor of the temple in the time of Jeremiah, and the head of a priestly family, Ezra ii. 47, from which the sixteenth order or course was formed, 1 Chr. xxiv. 14. 2. The name of a place in Babylonia, Ezra ii. 59, from which several persons returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem who could not prove their nationality.

IMMERSION (im-mer'sh'un). See BAPTISM.

IMMOLATION (im-mo-la'sh'un), a ceremony performed by the Romans in their sacrifices. It was their custom to throw frankincense, wine and a species of cake called "mola" on the head of the victim to be sacrificed.

IMMORTALITY (im-mor-tal'e-te), a state of exemption from death. God is said alone to possess it, 1 Tim. vi. 16, because it is of his own essence, not derived from or held at another's will, as is the case with beings who are made immortal, as the risen dead shall be, 1 Cor. xv. 53. In 2 Tim. i. 10 Christ is said to have brought life and immortality to life through the gospel. But the original word here differs from that before used. It is better expressed by "incorruptibility." The Lord Jesus disclosed, uncovered from the original gloom, that new and glorious life of the Spirit which, undecaying, is like a light that shines more and more unto the perfect day.

IMMOVABLE FEASTS are those which are celebrated always on the same day of the year, such as Christmas, Epiphany, etc. Movable feasts, on the contrary, are not confined to the same day of each year—the principal of these is Easter.

IMMUNITIES OF THE CLERGY. Peculiar privileges have been recognized as belonging to the clergy in all ages. Very early in the Christian Church they were freed from taxes and from menial service. No doubt many of the privileges which Christian ministers enjoyed were assigned to them because of the customs which had obtained among the heathen; for when Constantine legalized Christianity, he proceeded to endow the ministers with many favors. A distinction must be made between the privileges assigned to churches and the immunities of the clergy. Very soon the Church gained the right of collecting the taxes and managing the property which was permitted to the clergy for ecclesiastical purposes, and so far did the movement go in dealing with temporalities that at length ecclesiastical principalities were formed and armies were collected in the cause of the Church. The bishop of Durham was a prince palatine, and on the Continent of Europe many of the higher clergy rose to be the equal of lay barons. In the tenth, eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth centuries the great question which distracted England and other European lands was the settlement of the question as to the province of the Church and the province of the State. So far had the Church gone in the claim of immunity that the right of the State to try and punish a cleric for civil offences was denied (see CLARENDON, CONSTITUTIONS OF); and even at the Council of Trent it was one of the most difficult subjects where to draw the line between the civil and the spiritual. At present, in most lands, the clergy are free from military service, and churches usually enjoy the immunity which is awarded to government buildings and state edifices.

IMPOSTORS (im-pos'torz), THE THREE. As far back as the tenth century it was believed that a book had appeared which assailed Judaism, Mohammedanism and Christianity as being all untrue. Three centuries afterward the statements became rife that such a book existed, and many efforts were made to procure copies of it; and in the sixteenth century a similar anxiety prevailed. Kings, philosophers, chemists, poets and others were held to be the writers, and by this time several works appeared claiming to be the original. Of the number four were singled out for special notice. Of these, one was attributed to Oliver Cromwell, Julius Mazarinus and Thomas Aniello; while another was credited to Spinoza, Hobbes and Lord Herbert of Cherbury. In 1716 a person called Haag asserted that he possessed a copy of the original, which really contained the views of Frederick II., and that it was written in the twelfth century. In the same century a Latin work was published bearing the date of 1598; and as it is in poor Latin, it shows that the author, who is unknown, could not have been educated. The object of the work is to assail Moses, Christ and Mohammed, and by perversions and illogical arguments to attempt to prove that the religions which are connected with these names could not be from a holy, righteous God.

IMMUTABILITY (im-mu-ta-bil'i-te). This attribute of God is closely connected with his immensity, and is a natural consequence of it. As a self-existent and infinite Being, he is beyond the possibility of change, and so can neither be greater nor less in his essence or in his attributes. Some of the Scriptural statements of this attribute are—James i. 17; Ps. xxxiii. 11; Mal. iii. 6; Prov. xix. 21.

IMNA, a chieftain of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 35.

IMNAH (im'nah). 1. The eldest son of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 30. He is also called Jimna and Jimnah, Gen. xlv. 17. 2. A Levite, 2 Chr. xxxi. 14.

IMPANATION (im-pa-na'sh'un), one of the many modifications of the doctrine of the substantial union of the body and blood of Christ with the elements of the eucharist, without a change in their nature. The doctrine was first propagated in the twelfth century, and during the period of the Reformation the Romanists charged Luther with having revived this old error.

IMPECCABLES (im-pek-kab'i-leez), the name applied to certain heretics in the early Church who claimed to be exempt from the possibility of sinning.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS, the practice of laying on the hands in the ceremony of ordination, confirmation and other religious rites. This symbolical act is employed by nearly all churches.

EGYPTIAN IDOLS.—See IDOL and IDOLATRY.

By the Romish Church it is held to be essential in the sacraments of holy orders and confirmation. By the Church of England and Protestant Episcopal Church it is used in confirmation and ordination; and by the Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian and Congregational churches it is used only in ordination.

IMPRECATION (im-pre-ka'sh'un), IMPRECATORY (im'pre-ka-to-re) PSALMS. See PSALMS.

IMPRISONMENT. See PERSECUTION, PUNISHMENT.

IMPROPRIATION (im-pro-pre-a'sh'un), a term in the ecclesiastical language of Great Britain applied to such parsonages or livings as are held by laymen. The word is now confounded with "appropriation," which was properly used to designate such livings or lands as were held by bishops or colleges.

IMPURITY. See LAW, CEREMONIAL.

IMPUTE (im-peut'). This word is used in reference to Abraham's faith. He believed God, and it was counted to him (imputed, reckoned) for righteousness, Gen. xv. 6; and this is propounded as the pattern of our justification, Rom. iv. 11, 23, 24. It is not that faith is meritorious, but as Abraham, believing the revelation made to him, grasped the promise, and had therein the blessing, so those who now accept by faith the offer of free pardon made to them in Jesus Christ are no longer treated and condemned as sinners. They are "made the righteousness of God in Christ," 2 Cor. v. 21. See JUSTIFICATION.

IMRAH, a chieftain of Asher, 1 Chr. vii. 36.

IMRI (im're). 1. A descendant of Judah, 1 Chr. ix. 4. 2. A person whose son helped to build the walls of Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 4.

INA, king of Wessex from 688 to 725. His reign was one of the most glorious and most prosperous of the Anglo-Saxon princes. He is entitled to mention here for his piety of life and generosity to the Church. As a legislator he was in advance of his time, having been the first in that part of England to recognize the Christian religion in the enactment of his laws. He founded the monasteries of Abingdon and Glastonbury, and voluntarily resigned his kingly dignity to retire to Rome, where he spent the last years of his life.

INABILITY. See ELECTION, GRACE and WILL.

IN ANTIS, an architectural term applied to a temple with two columns in the façade which stand detached, while at the angles of the façade are two antæ, and thus the pediment rests on the angles of the flank walls and the two columns which stand under the middle of the architrave, thus dividing the architrave into three equal parts, and allowing three entrances under the pediment.

INCANTATION (in-can-ta'sh'un), the chanting of a formula of words of supposed magic power, in connection with superstitious rites. See DIVINATION, ENCHANTMENT and MAGIC.

INCAPACITY (in-ca'pa-ci-te), an ecclesiastical term denoting unfitness for ordination. The early Church held that not only unbaptized persons, but women also, were incapacitated from ordination; and this view has long been held by the Evangelical Churches, although in late years there have been several instances in which females have been regularly installed as pastors.

INCARNATION. See JESUS CHRIST.

INCENSE (in'sens), a fragrant composition burnt according to the Jewish ritual upon an altar before the Lord. The composition of it is minutely described by Moses, Ex. xxx. 34-36. There was a special prohibition added that no man should make the like for private use, 37, 38. According to Jewish writers, there were other ingredients the use of which was perhaps introduced at a later time.

Incense was to be burnt by the priests on the altar specially appropriated for the purpose twice a day, in the morning, when the lamps were dressed, and also when they were lighted in the evening. There was another solemn burning of incense, and this was the high-priest's peculiar office, on the great day of atonement, Lev. xvi. 13.

Jewish writers have said that the incense was to counteract the unpleasant smell which might arise from the carcasses of victims, but it had a higher purpose. The Psalmist, Ps. cxli. 2. indicates this, his words implying that prayer was in reality what incense was in the symbol; and it may be remarked that as the odors of the plants and flowers used in incense are the sweet breath which they exhale, so prayer can hardly be more suitably regarded than as the breath of the divine life in the soul. It is certain that incense was not used in the early Christian Church, and its use considered a mark of heathenism, as it was always held that in times of persecution a Christian had apostatized if he honored the pagan god by casting a few grains of incense on the altar. Such early writers as Tertullian, Lactantius and Arnobius declare that Christians do not use incense, and a law of Theodosius confiscated houses where it could be proved that it had been used. Probably it was introduced to purify infected houses, but it has long been used in Romish services, and a mystical signification is attached to it. In several ritualistic churches in the Church of England it has been introduced also. The incense is cast on coals in a metal pot suspended by three chains, and to swing the censer, as the pot is called, so as to diffuse the smoke, and yet not to throw out the coals, requires rather delicate manipulation.

INCEST (in'cest), a violation of Levitical law, which prohibited marriage or sexual commerce within certain degrees of consanguinity. See AFFINITY.

IN CENA DOMINI. See JULIUS II.

INCHOFER (in-cho'fer), MELCHIOR, a German Jesuit, eminent for his learning, was born at Vienna, in 1584. He was for many years professor of theology and mathematics at Messina, and afterward directed the Jesuit College at Macerata. He wrote "Ecclesiastical History of Hungary," and other works. He died at Milan, in 1648.

INCOMPREHENSIBLE (in-com-pre-hen'si-b'l). This word when introduced into the English Prayer-book had a meaning quite different from that which is attached to it by modern usage. When it is said "The Father Incomprehensible," it must be understood to mean a Being not to be comprised or "comprehended" within the limits of space.

INCUMBENT (in-kum'bent), in the Church of England, a clergyman in present occupancy of a benefice.

INDEPENDENTS (in-de-pen'dents), a large and influential Christian sect in England, so called because they hold that every separate congregation, when properly constituted, forms an independent organization, competent to perform all the functions of government within its own body. See CONGREGATIONALISTS.

INDEX (in'dex), in the Romish Church, a catalogue published by authority of the pope of books the reading of which is wholly prohibited to members of that Church, or which may be read after certain obnoxious passages have been expunged. The former kind is called "Index Librorum Prohibitorum," and the latter "Index Expurgatorius."

INDIA (in'dya). This word occurs in Esth. i. 1; viii. 9. It is evident that India as here mentioned did not include the peninsula of Hindoostan, but the districts around the Indus, the Punjab and, it may be, Scinde. India, in the same sense, occurs in the Apocrypha, 1 Esd. iii. 2; Rest of Esth. xiii. 1; xvi. 1. Though, however, India proper is not named in the Scripture, yet it is very likely that Solomon and the Tyrians carried on an Indian trade; and at a later period natives of that country seem to have been employed in guiding the elephants which were used in war, 1 Macc. vi. 37.

INDIAN CASTE (kast). The population of India is divided into hereditary classes, the origin of which cannot be satisfactorily explained. The general classification is as follows: 1. The Brahmins or priests, who are far exalted above the rest in honor and privilege, and seldom engage in secular pursuits. 2. The Kshatriyas, or military class. 3. The Vaishyas, or commercial class. 4. The Sudras, or laboring class, who are deeply degraded below all the above classes, and are not even allowed to read the Vedas or sacred books. 5. The Pariahs, who are considered as mere outcasts from humanity. The loss of caste is regarded as one of the greatest calamities that can befall a Hindoo.

INDICTION (in-dik'shun), a term which, according to Dr. Walcott, "designates a chronological system, including a circle of fifteen years: 1. The Cæsarean, used long in France and Germany, beginning on September 24; 2. The Constantinopolitan, used in the East from the time of Anastasius, and beginning September 1st; and 3. The Papal, reckoned from January 1, 313. The Council of Antioch, 341, first gives a documentary date, the fourteenth indiction. The computation prevailed in Syria in the fifth century, and is mentioned by Ambrose as existing at Rome. It is, however, asserted that in the West, the East and Egypt, with the exception of Africa, the indictions, until the sixteenth century, were reckoned from September 1, 312, and that they commenced in Egypt in the time of Constantine."

INDIFFERENTISM (in-dif'er-ent-izm), that state of mind which regards all religions, no matter how widely different, as equally important or equally worthless, according as they harmonize with natural religion. The word is also applied to that species of infidelity which maintains that man has no control over his belief and is not accountable for his opinions.

INDRA (in'drah), one of the Hindu divinities of the Vedic period, representing the firmament.

INDUCTION (in-duk'shun), the formal act by which, in the Church of England, a clergyman is placed in actual possession of a benefice.

INDULGENCES (in-dul'jen-sez), a power claimed by the Romish Church of granting remission, either on earth or in purgatory, of the penalty incurred by sin. Its origin may be traced back as early as the third century, when the power of mitigating the severity of penances prescribed to excommunicants seeking readmission into the Church naturally gave rise to an analogous power with reference to all delinquents within the pale of the Church. Sometimes the person doing penance was allowed to exchange it for a less severe kind, or to employ a substitute in his stead, or even to perform some service for the good of the Church in lieu of the penance inflicted. Gradually pecuniary gifts were accepted, and during the Middle Ages the abuses of the system had become so flagrant that the indulgences of the Church were publicly sold and made a matter of pecuniary speculation in order to replenish the coffers of the papal treasury. It was this shameless practice against which Luther first directed his attacks, and which, as much as any other cause, led to the Reformation. The practice of indulgences still exists, and, especially in countries where the Romish Church holds political power, the abuses are as flagrant as ever.

INDWELLING SIN. See SIN.

INFALLIBILITY (in-fal-li-bil'i-te) is the quality of being free from error. A man who is infallible does not err, cannot err. A Church that is infallible must know and profess all true doctrine, and cannot err. For many ages a claim has been put forth by the theologians of the Church of Rome for the infallibility of that Church, but the difficult questions of deciding where the seat of that infallibility was placed, and how the infallible deliverance was to be obtained, were disputed questions for centuries. By some it was held that this infallibility was diffused through the whole Church—that is, through the clergy. A second theory placed it in a council of all the bishops when lawfully assembled. A third required the pope to be at the head of such a council, with modifications, such as the pope calling the council, sanctioning the decree of the council, and the decree being then accepted by the whole Church. The fourth theory placed infallibility in the pope as the Church's head, and this was also subdivided by contending authorities, one placing it in the pope when he decided officially, a second if aided by a number of bishops, a third when the deliverance of the pope was accepted by the whole Church, and a fourth when the pope and a number of bishops decided, and the decision was received and accepted by the whole Church. The literature on this subject is so extensive that in this work it would be out of place even to attempt a synopsis of the controversies that have taken place in the Church of Rome among her opposing theologians, while it would be equally impossible to adduce the arguments by which Protestant writers since the sixteenth century have met and set aside the claims of the supporters of the papacy. It has proved to be one of the most prolific of all subjects connected with the assumptions of the Romish Church. After long centuries of strife the doctrine of infallibility has at length been settled in a manner so undoubted that all difficulties respecting the seat of this infallibility and the circumstances under which the truth may be learned are swept away, and every Romanist who submits himself to the teaching of his Church must believe that the pope is the sole fountain and seat of this attribute.

Bellarmino had greatly helped to carry the judgment of theologians in this direction, but still the French, Spanish and German bishops and scholars held to the supremacy of an œcumenical council, and it was notorious that from century to century there had been so many contradictory decisions on doctrinal and other matters that the utmost delicacy was required in the handling of this subject if harm instead of good would not be done to the cause of papal power. Great caution was therefore exercised in December, 1869, when a council was called by Pius IX. to determine the question by a definition, and it soon became apparent that the rules which were given to the council by which they were to be governed were such as to prohibit all free discussion, and the advocates of the party who ultimately carried out their views were so placed that they were from the outset made masters of the situation. When a petition was drawn up in favor of a deliverance on the subject, it was opposed by 162 bishops, of whom 20 were from America, 46 from France, 37 from Germany and Austria, 2 from Portugal, 11 from Hungary, 3 from England, 15 from Italy, and 19 were Orientals. In the proceedings all important positions were assigned to the decided advocates of the dogma, and at length, when, on the 18th day of July, A. D. 1870, the final vote was taken, 534 bishops voted "Placet" ("it is pleasing"), 2 voted "non Placet" ("not pleasing"), and 106 were absent, some being unwell and others unwilling to vote. After the vote, Pius IX., "by virtue of his apostolic authority, with the approval of the sacred council," defined, confirmed and approved the canons just read. The only portion of the decree that need be quoted here is the clause which contains the actual definition: "Wherefore, faithfully adhering to the tradition handed down from the commencement of the Christian faith, for the glory of God our Saviour, the exaltation of the Catholic religion and the salvation of Christian peoples, with the approbation of the sacred council, we teach and define it to be a doctrine divinely revealed, that when the Roman pontiff speaks 'ex cathedra'—that is, when in the exercise of his office of pastor and teacher of all Christians, and in virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he defines that a doctrine of faith or morals is to be held by the universal Church—he possesses through the divine assistance promised to him in the blessed Peter that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed his Church to be endowed, in defining a doctrine in faith and morals; and therefore that such definitions of the Roman pontiff are irrefragable of themselves, and not by force of the consent of the Church thereto. And if any one shall presume, which God forbid, to contradict this our definition, let him be anathema." Thus, in the Vatican Basilica, at Rome, on the 18th day of July, A. D. 1870, was the pope of Rome declared to be personally invested with an attribute of God. It was expected that the bishops who very manfully resisted this decision in the council would have held to their convictions and refused to promulgate a doctrine which they pronounced to be untrue, but the expectation was not realized. They submitted, and they even obliged their dioceses to accept the decree against which they had openly declaimed. Thus, according to the judgment of the ablest theologians in the Romish Church, a new doctrine is added to the creed which radically alters the character of the theology of the Church. Nevertheless, the opposition to this decree continues to gain ground in Germany, in Switzerland and elsewhere, and the secession from the Church of "Old Catholics" is an index that the question as settled has not quieted the Church.

INFANTICIDE (in-fant'e-side) prevailed very generally among the ancients, and still exists to an alarming extent throughout the South Sea Islands and among barbaric tribes. Among the ancients the father was authorized to decide whether an infant should be permitted to live.

INFERIOR CLERGY, in the ancient churches, were unordained assistants to the priesthood, corresponding to the modern offices of churchwarden, vergers, sextons and pew-openers. In the Church of England the term denotes those classes of the clergy who are below the rank of those distinguished as "dignitaries" of the Church.

INFIDELITY (in-fi-del'i-te), in its several forms, may be conveniently embraced under the following heads: Rationalism, or the system which unduly exalts the office of reason in matters of religion; this spirit selects out of Revelation that which is agreeable to reason, and rejects that which is presumed to be inconsistent therewith. Spiritualism, which is based upon the theory that there is a revelation made to the inner consciousness of man. Naturalism, which rejects the evidence of miracles as being contrary to the laws of soon affected almost everything used in divine service. For instance, the bishop's mitre became forked to symbolize the cloven tongues of fire on the day of Pentecost, and this form has obtained for centuries. An infula is one of the lappets attached to the mitre, as shown in the illustration.

INGATHERING, FEAST OF. See FESTIVALS.

INGHAM (ing'ham), BENJAMIN, a celebrated Methodist preacher, and founder of the "Inghamite" societies, was born June 11, 1712, at Ossett, Yorkshire. After graduating at Queen's College, Oxford, where he fell in with John and Charles Wesley, he was ordained, and then made a brief visit to America in company with Mr. Wesley, with whom, also, he afterward went to Herrnhutt, and became strongly attached to the Moravians there. He traveled throughout Yorkshire, and established, with the assistance of his Moravian companions, what may be regarded as a Moravian form of Methodism, the number of his societies reaching as high as eighty-four. His labors were not confined, however, to Yorkshire, but embraced all the surrounding country. Discontents afterward broke out among the societies, and their number was reduced to thirteen, some of whom joined the Wesleyans and others went over to the Daleites. Ingham died in 1772.

INGLIS (ing'glis), CHARLES, a Church of England divine, was a native of Ireland, where he was born in 1733. He emigrated to America, and at first engaged in school-teaching, but was afterward ordained and appointed to missionary work in Kent county, Delaware. In 1765 he was appointed assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York, which post he held until the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, when, owing to his intense Tory sympathies, he closed his church and retired to Flushing. In 1777 he was chosen rector of Trinity Church, but political differences obliged him, a few years later, to leave the country. In 1787 he was appointed bishop of Nova Scotia. He died in 1816.

INGLIS, JAMES, a minister of Edinburgh who has greatly distinguished himself in his labors for the education of the blind. His father was one of the earliest laborers in that field, and after great effort he succeeded in perfecting an alphabet differing from the Roman, in that the forms of the letters were more angular, so as to sharply impress the fingers of the pupil by the form of the outline. He succeeded in having copies of the New Testament printed in great numbers and in advancing the cause of Scriptural education among the blind of Scotland. He was followed in this work by his son with great zeal, who also threw himself with great energy into the work of preparing books and lessons of recognized value for the use of Sunday-schools. He is the author of an exceedingly valuable work, "The Bible Text Cyclopaedia," which has been greatly prized in Great Britain, and which is much sought after in the United States because of its practical worth.

INGRAHAM (ing'ra-ham), IRA, a Congregational minister, was born December 1, 1791, at nature. Deism, which admits the being and operations of God, but rejects the Bible as a Divine Revelation. Pantheism, or the theory which makes God and the universe identical; and Atheism, which totally denies the existence of God.

INFULE.

INFULA (in'fu-la). When the principle of symbolism obtained a hold on the Church, it

Cornwall, Vermont. He completed his studies at Middlebury College, and after engaging in school-teaching in the South for a brief period, he became pastor of the Congregational church in Orvill. He was afterward pastor successively at West Bradford, Massachusetts, Brandon, Vermont, and Lyons, New York. He also acted as agent of the Presbyterian Education Society, the Vermont Domestic Missionary Society, and the Society for the Promotion of Collegiate and Theological Education at the West. He died April 9, 1864.

INGULPHUS (in-gul'fus), a celebrated English chronicler, was born in London about 1030. He was educated at Westminster and Oxford, and afterward became secretary to Duke William of Normandy. In 1064 he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. On his return he became a monk, and in 1076 was made abbot of Croyland by William the Conqueror. Ingulphus was high in the favor of the court, and exercised much influence. His "History of the Monastery of Croyland" is one of the most remarkable of the old chronicles which have come down to us from mediæval times. It opens up to us the inner life of the great religious houses, shows how the members were occupied, their jealousies and difficulties, the relation of these houses to each other, and thus it is invested with great interest. The genuineness of the book as a whole has been doubted, and Sir Francis Palgrave has held that it was probably the composition of a monk of the thirteenth or fourteenth century.

INHERITANCE (in-her'it-ance). In the earlier ages inheritance seems to have been mainly at the will of the father, Gen. xxv. 5, 6. Afterward, when the land of Canaan had been divided among the several tribes of Israel, that division was to be preserved—land was not to pass from tribe to tribe. Hence, when a man's daughter was an heiress, she was to marry only within her own tribe, Num. xxxvi. The children inherited the possessions of the father, the first-born having a double portion, Dent. xxi. 15-17. But according to the principle just noted, provision was made that they should not be alienated altogether from the family, nor from their due distribution among the various branches of the family. For if a married person died without children and left a widow, his brother was to take his wife to raise up seed to his brother, and the first-born of such an union would succeed to the name and inheritance of the dead, Dent. xxv. 5, 6. Again, there was a regular succession prescribed. In failure of sons daughters inherited; if there were no daughters, the brothers of the dead man; if he had no brothers, his father's brothers; and failing these, the next of kin, Num. xxvii. 8-11. Besides, if any one alienated or mortgaged his inheritance, it could be only for a term of years. The land was Jehovah's, as sovereign Lord, and as held under him it must descend in the course he prescribed, Lev. xxv. 23. In the year of jubilee, therefore, every possession returned to the line of its original owner. So that land could be mortgaged only till the next jubilee, and the value was greater or less according to the distance of the time of general release. There were some exceptions made, as that houses in walled towns could not be redeemed after a year, and did not return at the jubilee. The Levites, however, might redeem houses at any time, and their houses did return to them at the jubilee. But they were forbidden to sell "the field of the suburbs of their cities," v. 24-34. We see from all this why Naboth refused to sell Ahab his vineyard, 1 Ki. xxi. 3. Wills, under such legal dispositions, were little needed, and we do not read of them in the Old Testament.

It may be added that the heavenly inheritance is illustrated by what we know of the Mosaic regulations, 1 Pet. i. 4; Eph. i. 11; Col. i. 12.

INHIBITION (in-hi-bish'un), a writ issued by a higher ecclesiastical authority to restrain the proceedings of a lower.

INIQUITY (in-ik'we-te), that which is done against or regardless of the law of God. To "bear iniquity" is a phrase used both of one who suffers for his own sin, Num. xiv. 34, and of one who makes expiation for the sin of another, Ex. xxviii. 38. And so it was predicted of Messiah that he should bear men's iniquities—that is, suffer the punishment which they had merited, Isa. liii. 4, 6, 11, 12.

INITIATION (in-ish-e-a'shun), the term in common use in the early Christian Church to designate the instructions given the baptized concerning the mysteries of the Christian religion.

INK is referred to in but a few passages in Scripture, and simply as the fluid used in writing. That it was usually black we know from other sources and from the remains of antiquity that have descended to modern times. It was differently composed from that now in current use, being formed sometimes of the finest soot of lamps, sometimes of the black liquor found in the cuttle-fish and other substances, together with a certain intermixture of gums and acids, which produced a composition that was remarkably durable, even more so than modern ink, but was thicker and less adapted for speedy execution. For ornamental purposes, however, other kinds of ink were employed by the ancients, and of various colors—red, blue, purple and of gold and silver tints. See WRITING.

INN. This word occurs altogether five times in our English Bibles, but scarcely in any of them can it be said to be a proper rendering of the original, as inns, in our sense of the term, had no existence in ancient Palestine and the adjacent countries. The earliest mention of an inn is in connection with the history of Jacob's family, Gen. xlii. 27. On their return homeward his sons stopped to give their asses provender in the "inn"—literally the lodging-place where travelers were wont to make a halt in their journey. So again it occurs at Ex. iv. 24, in the account of the return of Moses from Midian to Egypt. At the threshold of the New Testament history it meets us in connection with the birth of our Lord at Bethlehem, who was laid in a manger (or stall), because, it is said, "there was no room for them in the inn." The word here employed means a loosing-place, where travelers ungirded their beasts of burden and rested for the night or curing the heat of the day. But there can be no doubt that the word is used with some latitude in the Greek translations of the Old Testament Scripture, and that it also denoted any place for rest or refreshment, such as a couch or tent or settled abode, 1 Sam. ix. 9; Ex. xv. 13; Jer. xxv. 38. So that the mere use of the word at the beginning of the gospel history would not of itself determine to what class of buildings the birthplace of Jesus belonged; for this we are thrown upon the general manners and customs of the East; and these still retain so much of their ancient type that there is no great difficulty in sketching what was at least the probable state and aspect of things.

By the inn, then, we are to understand the khan or caravanserai so often described by those who have visited the East, and which, unlike the inns of our own country, are entirely unfurnished. It is a kind of building intended merely to afford convenient shelter and lodging-room for travelers, usually constructed in the form of a quadrangle surrounding an open court, the entrance to which is by an archway closed by a strong gate. The walls are generally lofty and strong, and sometimes provided with means of defence. The compass of this court and the number as well as character of the apartments which surround it differ materially, according to the position and plan of the building. Almost invariably, however, there is a well in the centre of the court; and if there are no stalls for the cattle, then these, after being unburdened of their load, are left to repose in the enclosure or to browse on what herbage they can find in the immediate neighborhood; but commonly there are openings in the surrounding wall into a number of recesses, which contain chambers both for the traveler and his beast. The floor of these receding apartments rises two or three feet above the central court, and consists of a platform or bank of earth faced with masonry; then stalls are attached; these usually run in covered avenues behind the separate apartments, but on a somewhat lower level, in which case the more elevated floor of the apartment is made to project behind into the stable, so as to form a bench, toward which the head of the horse or camel is turned, and on which the nose-bag is allowed to rest. It was in a place of this sort that the Virgin Mary brought forth the blessed Redeemer. The khan at Bethlehem had cells or apartments for the travelers as well as stalls for the cattle, but the former were already preoccupied before the holy family arrived, and they had nothing for it but to betake to one of the outer stalls destined for beasts of burden. There the Saviour of the world was born, and on the projecting ledge, which had its appropriate use in supporting the nose-bags of horses and camels, did he find his first humble bed.

Manifestly different from the ordinary khan was the inn mentioned by our Lord in the parable of the good Samaritan, Luke x. 34. As a host was connected with it, it presents a nearer approach than the other to what is now known as an inn. But the probability is that it is rather to be understood of a lodging-house than a place of public entertainment. That houses of that description existed in towns there can be no doubt, although we possess little specific information concerning them, and find them occasionally associated with persons of loose character, Josh. ii. 1. There is no reason, however, to suppose that they may not also have sometimes been kept by persons of good repute.

INNOCENT (in'no-sent). There have been thirteen popes of this name. 1. The first succeeded Anastasius in 402. He vigorously asserted the primacy of the Roman see, and took part against the Donatists and Pelagians. He died in 417. 2. The second was elected pope in 1130. His career was marked by numerous contests with his opponents, and with the Roman senate; the condemnation of Abelard; and the contest with the Normans of Sicily and with Louis VII. of France. He died in 1143. 3. The third was born in 1161, and became pope in 1198. He was the most strenuous champion of papal authority after Gregory VII. Under him the Franciscan and the Dominican orders first rose. He died in 1216. 4. The fourth was of a noble family, and became pope in 1243. He excommunicated the emperor Frederick II., and after the death of the latter he carried on the hostilities against his successors. He died in 1254. 5. The fifth was born in 1225, and was elected pope in 1276. He aimed at the pacification of Italy, and the reunion of the Eastern with the Western Church. His pontificate was of very short duration, he having died the same year in which he became pope. 6. The sixth was a learned canonist, who chiefly applied his authority to the reform of ecclesiastical discipline. He was pope from 1352 to 1362. 7. The seventh was born in 1336. In 1406 he was elected, in competition with Benedict XIII., during the great schism of the Western Church. He was a learned man, and a liberal patron of the Roman university. 8. The eighth, a Genoese noble, was born in 1432, and died in 1492. He succeeded Sixtus IV. as pope in 1484. He endeavored, with but little success, to confederate the states of Europe against the Turks. His internal policy was selfish and disgraceful. 9. The ninth was born in 1519, became pope in 1591, and died the same year. He was a learned ecclesiastic, of a kind and pious nature. 10. The tenth, a Roman patrician, was born in 1572. He was elected in 1644; and though greatly advanced in years, he showed himself a man of great resolution. He firmly withstood European interference in his quarrel with the duke of Parma about the bishop of Castro, and condemned the doctrines of Jansenius. He died in 1655. 11. The eleventh, who was born in 1611, and was elected in 1676, turned all his thoughts to the correction of abuses in the Church and the assertion of papal rights. He also condemned Molinos, the founder of Quietism. He died in 1689. 12. The twelfth was born in 1615, and became pope in 1691. He resisted the emperor Leopold I. in the matter of investiture, and obtained from the French clergy a virtual recantation of the four articles of the Gallican Church. He died in 1700. 13. The thirteenth was born in 1655, and succeeded Clement XI. in 1721. He showed great firmness in the support of papal claims over Parma, and in the dispute about the bull "Unigenitus." He died in 1724.

INNOCENTS' DAY is observed by the Greek, Roman and English Churches as a special holiday to commemorate the massacre of the children by Herod after the birth of Jesus. These murdered infants were regarded with especial homage by the early Fathers as being the first Christian martyrs. The day is celebrated on December 28 by the Western Church, and on the following day by the Eastern Church.

IN PARTIBUS INFIDELIUM, EPISCOPUS, a bishop of the Romish Church appointed to the title of a diocese which has passed from papal rule. It has long been the policy of the Roman Catholic Church never to give up any place where it has once held sway, and bishops appointed as above are used as assistants to regularly located bishops.

INQUISITION (in-que-zish'un) is the name of a court in the Church of Rome which existed for several centuries, and which has been armed with extensive authority in dealing with persons who have forsaken the faith of the Church. It is probable that the enormous powers with which the Inquisition became invested grew out of a perverted view of Church discipline as it existed in the early Church. In primitive times it was the duty of the clergy to see that Church members held to the faith; and if any lapsed from the faith, they were brought under discipline, the severest form being exclusion from the Church by excommunication. In process of time, however, apostasy was viewed as being so criminal that the person who lapsed into heresy became unfit for Christian society as well as for Church membership, and expulsion from the community or banishment was attempted to be carried out against such offenders.

INNOCENT XII.

The effect of persecution was to make the clergy watchful against all apostates, lest brethren should suffer at their hands; and in the fourth century, when the desire to exterminate Manichæanism became intense, legal enactments were framed by means of which offenders even suffered death. Under Theodosius and Justinian the civil laws were applied to apostates and persons who embraced heresies, and the clergy were invested with civil authority to deal with those who had gone astray. The Church, thus invested with the power of dealing with spiritual offences as with civil crimes, rapidly established its power in different countries; and from the eighth until the twelfth century the popular mind became accustomed to view heresy as a civil crime, and to acknowledge the legitimacy of the claim put forth by the Church that heretics were unfit to live. In the twelfth century the Inquisition became a formally recognized institution of the Church. In the South of France so many of the population had been led away from the Church by the Albigenses, the Cathari and the Waldenses that the authorities at Rome became alarmed. The Synod of Verona, in 1184, had seriously debated the question how bishops were to deal with heretics; and in 1198 Innocent III. despatched legates into the South of France to hasten the bishops in bringing the most stringent measures to bear against all who had shown any defection from the Church; and this effort was followed up by Innocent with all his great energy, and he speedily made the Inquisition a permanent institution to deal with all spiritual offenders and to labor in subduing and keeping the souls of all men under its sovereign will. The Lateran Council joyfully aided in the work by making the persecution of dissenters from the Romish Church the chief business of synodal courts; and the Council of Toulouse not only sanctioned the Lateran decree, but even went so far as to enact a number of decrees which confirmed the inquisitorial power of the bishops. Forthwith all over the South of France agents of this terrible power were appointed to scrutinize every district, to pry into every household, to adopt all means for detecting errorists and hand them over to the bishops for punishment. Savage cruelty accompanied the footsteps of these emissaries; houses of suspected persons were to be destroyed, and the sick, if found to be heretics, were debarred the benefit of physicians. Further still, lest the zeal of the bishops should not prove adequate to the task, appointments were made of persons who were set apart to the sole work of being inquisitors, and the bishops were also subordinated to them.

Then, in order that the work of exterminating heretics might be systematically and successfully carried on, Gregory IX., by a master stroke of policy, conferred on the Dominicans the honor of prosecuting this enterprise. He constituted the members of the order permanent inquisitors, and in 1232 they were empowered to enter on their bloody work in Germany and in Austria. Next year they were commissioned in the South of France and in Lombardy. Of these servants of the Church it has been well said by Shoberl, "The solitude and retirement of which these monks made profession, but of which, as it appeared in the sequel, they soon began to tire, afforded them leisure to attend incessantly to this new calling. The meanness of their dress, the poverty of their monasteries and, above all, the public mendicity and humility to which they bound themselves could not fail to make the office of inquisitors one that flattered any relic of natural ambition which might yet lurk within their minds. The general renunciation which they made, even of the names of the families from which they sprang, must have gone a great way toward stifling those sentiments which the ties of kindred and civil connections generally inspire. Besides, the austerity of their rules, and the severity which they were continually practicing on themselves, were not likely to allow them to have much feeling for others. Lastly, they were zealous, as all professors of newly-established religions commonly are; and they were learned after the fashion of the times—that is to say, well versed in scholastic quibbles and in the new canon law. Moreover, they had a particular interest in the suppression of heretics, who were incessantly declaiming against them, and who spared no pains to discredit them in the minds of the people. On these monks, therefore, the pope conferred the office of inquisitors of the faith, and they acquitted themselves in such a manner as not to disappoint his expectations!"

As soon as the system was fully organized and brought into practical operation its tremendous character was speedily displayed. Crimes of various hues, as well as lapses from the faith, were proclaimed as coming under the jurisdiction of these holy men, who, by fine, imprisonment, sequestration of goods, and death, were empowered to persecute at will, they themselves being the judges. As Milman has correctly described the proceedings of this tribunal in the thirteenth century as a ferocious system, of which "the worst of the pagan emperors might have shuddered at as iniquitous, in which the sole act deserving of mercy might seem to be the Judas-like betrayal of the dearest and most familiar friend, of the kinsman, the parent, the child. . . . No falsehood was too false, no craft too crafty, no trick too base, for this calm, systematic, moral torture, which was to wring further confession against the heretic, denunciation against others. If the rack, the pulleys, the thumbscrew and the boots were not yet invented or applied, it was not in mercy. . . . Nothing that the sternest or most passionate historian has revealed, nothing that the most impressive romance-writer could have imagined, can surpass the cold, systematic treachery and cruelty of these so-called judicial formularies." It is no wonder that the people in the South of France rose up against the robberies and inhuman atrocities which were inflicted on them by men who claimed to be the followers of the merciful Saviour. In Toulouse and Narbonne the inquisitors were expelled in 1235, and the pope was obliged to suppress the tribunal in Toulouse; and when it was re-established, sixty years afterward, the civil authorities were warned to be cautious about carrying out all the savage orders of the inquisitors. The work of persecution went on until the change in the political condition of France led to the bloody scenes of the St. Bartholomew day and the atrocities connected with and following the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

As soon as the Inquisition was firmly settled in France the same agency was introduced into Germany and Italy. Conrad of Marburg enjoys the bad eminence of having been the first German inquisitor, and in 1231 the bloody work began in determined earnest. Though Ferdinand II. sanctioned the relentless decrees of the "Holy Office," the energy of the German people soon made the inquisitors understand that there was a spirit in the land that would not be suppressed. Conrad was slain in the streets of Strasburg, and the people with the nobles for a time seemed to set at defiance the policy which consigned them to prisons and to death. In the fourteenth century, however, the Inquisition had made such progress that, under Urban V. and the emperor Charles IV., the Dominicans succeeded in enacting a repetition of the scenes which had been carried on in France, but the progress of the Reformation opposed such a barrier in their way that, although aided by the Jesuits, the people in Germany never suffered such wholesale plundering and murdering as the French victims had to endure.

In Italy the Inquisition was securely established in 1235 under Gregory IX., although the Dominicans had commenced operations in the country eleven years before. The work went on in the face of great opposition, and efforts were made to hold the power of imprisonment, fine and corporal punishment in the secular hand; but at length Paul III., in 1534, established the "Congregation of the Holy Office" in Rome, with Cardinal Caraffa at its head, with the avowed object of saving Italy from being overrun with heresy. The six cardinals, along with Caraffa, were authorized "to try all causes of heresy, with the power of apprehending and incarcerating suspected persons and their abettors, of whatsoever estate, rank or order, of nominating officers under them, and appointing inferior tribunals in all places with the same or with limited powers." From that time until 1808, when Napoleon swept it away, this "Holy Office" did its work of cruelty and blood with relentless energy, and the heart sickens at the record of the deeds which, in the name of religion, were perpetrated by men who professed themselves to be actuated by the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Spain under Gregory IX. had the "Holy Office" introduced in the year 1242, when it was established in Aragon. The fires of persecution in the South of France had constrained many of the Albigenses to flee, and they had sought refuge in Spain, and the efforts of the Dominicans to free the kingdom of these and all other heretics were commenced with thorough determination. In no country in Europe did the Inquisition find so congenial a home as in Spain. Under Ferdinand and Isabella, under Torquemada the grand inquisitor and his successors, the power of the Inquisition was supreme. Ferdinand, the so-called saint, heaped the blazing fagots with his own hand on the pile of agonizing martyrs. John the Second hunted the persecuted in Biscay like wild beasts in the wilderness, and the spectacles at the "autos da fé" made the population familiar with murder in the interest of the cause of God. At length this fearful court, under the administration of Gonzalez de Mendoza, Ximenes, who became a cardinal, and Torquemada, as McCrie has said, "stretched its iron arms over a whole nation, upon which it lay like a monstrous incubus, paralyzing its exertions, crushing its energies, and extinguishing every other feeling but a sense of weakness and terror." Eventually this horrid court was swept away by Joseph Napoleon in 1808. According to Llorente, the Inquisition in Spain had condemned 341,021 persons from 1481 till 1808. Of these no fewer than 31,912 persons were burned alive, and 291,456 others were severely punished. Ferdinand VII., on his accession, endeavored to re-establish the "Holy Office," but in the revolution of 1820 the palace of the Inquisition was destroyed, and the institution was abolished. In Spain, as elsewhere, the Inquisition has shown itself to be the firmest and most solid support of the temporal and spiritual power of the papacy.

In Portugal the proceedings of the "Holy Office" were similar to those in Spain. In 1557 it was actively engaged in its exterminating work, and the office of the tribunal was established at Lisbon. In the eighteenth century its operations were circumscribed; and when the Jesuits were expelled, the civil courts forbade the "auto da fé," but it was as late as 1826 before the court was finally suppressed.

So long as the Netherlands were under the control of Spain, the Inquisition reigned in the Spanish provinces. In the movements of the Reformation, savage atrocities were perpetrated by the Carmelite Nicolas of Egmont under the authority of Charles V., but the Reformation spread nevertheless. Under Philip II. the full fury of persecution was let loose, and the butcheries under Alva, though effectual to slay the population by thousands, failed of their effect, and the Inquisition as well as the authority of Spain was set at defiance by a people resolved to be free.

On the literature of this extensive subject much may be gathered from Dr. McCrie's "Histories of the Suppression of the Reformation in Spain and Italy," Llorente's "History of the Inquisition," Ranke's "History of the Papacy," Sarpi "On the Origin of the Office of the Inquisition" and Motley's "History of the Dutch Republic."

I. N. R. I., an inscription composed of the initial letters of the Latin translation of the superscription on the cross, Jesus Nazarenus Rex Judæorum, "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews."

INSCRIPTION (in-skrip'shun). It is sometimes objected that the inscription placed upon our Lord's cross is variously given by the different Evangelists, Matt. xxvii. 37; Mark xv. 26; Luke xxiii. 38; John xix. 19. As it was thrice repeated, in three languages, it is likely that there would be differences. It is probable that St. John records the very words written by Pilate, and that the three other Evangelists have preserved the inscription in the three languages, Matthew in Hebrew, Mark in Latin, Luke in Greek. There could have been but a narrow space upon the cross, and yet the writing was to be fully legible. Now, if "Jesus of Nazareth" were placed separately above the rest, and also larger, and if the three lines below declared the crucified to be "the King of the Jews," all the expressions would fall naturally into order:

JESUS OF NAZARETH.

THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

THE KING OF THE JEWS.

With this interpretation, every word and particle of the accounts given by all the four Evangelists agree both with each other and with probability, the first three announcing the derisive yet true proclamation of their Lord to those three great nations, the fourth relating those words which visibly on the cross, no less than really in their sense, belonged alike to all.

INSCRIPTIONS on stone have been used by all nations, especially in the earlier ages of the world, for recording memorable events, and most of our knowledge of ancient history is derived from this source. The oldest inscriptions extant, next after the Chinese, are the Egyptian, which date back as early as B. C. 2000, and are to be found on many monumental remains, as well as on ancient tombs and palaces. Of these the Rosetta Stone is the most celebrated. See HIEROGLYPHICS. Next in point of interest and antiquity are the Assyrian inscriptions, both cuneiform and pictorial, found on slabs which anciently lined the interior walls of the palaces, and contain historical representations of the events of the several reigns. After these follow the Phœnician records, somewhat similar in appearance to the ancient Hebrew.

A curious and interesting collection of inscriptions is found on the high cliffs of the wady Mokatteb and the adjoining wadys in the Sinaitic region, and which are known as the Sinaitic inscriptions. They are written in a variety of characters, difficult to decipher, and various suppositions have been held concerning their authorship as well as their antiquity. More than one learned writer believed that they were cut by the Israelites during their sojourn in the wilderness; some have held that Phœnician miners, who had excavated ore in the mountains, had cut the letters, many of which resemble Phœnician characters, while others fix their date as late as the sixth century, and attribute them to pilgrims who visited Sinai and other sanctuaries. But the most plausible opinion seems to be that they are the work of a commercial colony who inhabited the peninsula about the beginning of the Christian era.

The early Christians made frequent use of inscriptions, especially upon tombstones—a practice which they copied from the Greeks and Romans.

These inscriptions, more than the voluminous writings of the Fathers, reveal much of the spirit and life of the early Church. They are, many of them, of a pictorial character; the cross is frequently represented, accompanied with various symbolic devices, as also the fish and its Greek name, "ichthys," a very general Christian emblem. The olive branch, dove, lamb and anchor are frequently to be seen also in the early Christian inscriptions.

INSECT (in'sekt). The following are the names of the various insects mentioned in the Scriptures, viz., spider, Job viii. 14; Prov. xxx. 28; scorpion, Deut. viii. 15; Luke xi. 12; locust, Ex. x. 4; Lev. xi. 22; gad-fly, called "swarms" in Ex. viii. 21-31; moth, Isa. l. 9; Matt. vi. 19; grasshopper, Lev. xi. 22; Job xxxix. 20; ant, Prov. vi. 6; beetle, Lev. xi. 22; bee, Deut. i. 44; palmer-worm, Amos iv. 9; lice, viii., 16, 17, 18; worm, Ex. xvi. 20; gnat, Matt. xxiii. 24; flea, 1 Sam. xxiv. 14; bald-locust, Lev. xi. 22; hornet, Ex. xxiii. 28; canker-worm, Joel i. 4; ii. 25; caterpillar, Joel ii. 25; fly, Eccles. x. 1. In several of these passages there is an uncertainty as to the actual insect which is meant; for instance, there are seven Hebrew words, all of which are in different places rendered either locust, grasshopper or canker-worm, and so also different words are rendered fly.

INSPIRATION (in-spi-ra'shun), in its special sense, is the supernatural agency by which the revelation of the divine will is communicated in sacred Scripture, 2 Tim. iii. 16. This extraordinary divine agency was so exerted upon the sacred writers that, under the direction of the Holy Spirit, they were taught what and how they should write.

To prove that the Scriptures are divinely inspired, we might with propriety refer to the excellence of the doctrines, precepts and promises, and other instructions which they contain, especially to the full discovery they make of man's fallen and ruined state, and the way of salvation through a Redeemer, together with their power to enlighten and sanctify the heart, and the accompanying witness of the Spirit in believers. But the more direct and conclusive evidence is found in the testimony of the writers themselves; and as the writers did, by working miracles and in other ways, sufficiently authenticate their divine commission and establish their authority and infallibility as teachers of divine truth, their testimony in regard to their own inspiration is entitled to our full confidence. With regard to the inspiration and divine authority of the Old Testament writings, the strongest and most satisfactory proof is found in the testimony of Christ and the apostles.

The Lord Jesus Christ came to bear witness to the truth. His works proved that he was what he declared himself to be—the Messiah, the great Prophet, the infallible Teacher. How, then, did he regard the Scriptures? Every one who carefully attends to the four Gospels will find that Christ everywhere spoke of that collection of writings called the Scripture as the word of God, that he regarded the whole in this light, that he treated the Scripture and every part of it as infallibly true, and as clothed with divine authority, thus distinguishing it from every mere human production. Nothing written by man can be entitled to the respect which Christ showed to the Scriptures. This, to all Christians, is direct and incontrovertible evidence of the divine origin of the Scriptures, and is by itself perfectly conclusive.

But there is clear concurrent evidence, still more specific, in the writings of the apostles. In two texts in particular divine inspiration is positively asserted. In the first, 2 Tim. iii. 16, Paul lays it down as the characteristic of "all Scripture" that it "is given by inspiration of God," and from this results its profitableness. The other text, 2 Pet. i. 21, teaches us that "prophecy came not by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." This passage may be considered as explanatory of what is intended by inspiration.

The various texts in which Christ and the apostles speak of Scripture as "the word of God," and as invested with authority to decide all questions of truth and duty, fully correspond with the texts above considered.

As the Christian dispensation surpasses the former in all spiritual privileges and gifts, it is reasonable to presume that the New Testament was no mistakes either as to the matter or manner of their instructions.

Again, the writers of the New Testament manifestly considered themselves to be under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and their instructions, whether oral or written, to be clothed with divine authority as the word of God. "We speak," they say, "as of God." Again, "Which things we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but in words which the Holy Ghost teacheth." They declared what they taught to be the "word of God," and the things they wrote to be "the commandments of God." Now, the apostles, being honest, unassuming, humble men, would never have spoken of themselves and their writings in such a manner had they not known themselves to be under the unerring guidance of the Holy Spirit, and their instructions perfectly in accordance with the mind of God.

But inspiration was concerned not only in mak-written under at least an equal degree of divine influence with the Old, and that it comes recommended to us by equal characteristics of infallible truth. But of this there is clear positive evidence from the New Testament itself.

In the first place, Jesus Christ, the great unerring Teacher, gave commission to his apostles to act in his stead, and to carry out the work of instruction which he had begun, confirming their authority by investing them with power to perform miracles. But how could such a commission have answered the end proposed had not the divine Spirit so guided the apostles as to render them infallible and perfect teachers of divine truth?

But in addition to this, Jesus expressly promised to give them the Holy Spirit to abide with them continually, and to guide them into all the truth. If these promises were not fulfilled, then Jesus was not a true prophet. If they were fulfilled, as they certainly were, then the apostles had the constant assistance of the Holy Spirit, and whether engaged in speaking or writing were under divine guidance, and of course were liable to ing known the will of God to prophets and apostles, but also in giving them direction in writing the sacred books. They wrote "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Sometimes the Spirit of God moved and guided his servants to write things which they could not know by natural means, such as new doctrines or precepts or predictions of future events. Sometimes he moved and guided them to write the history of events which were wholly or partly known to them by tradition, or by the testimony of their contemporaries, or by their own observation or experience. In all these cases the divine Spirit effectually preserved them from all error, and influenced them to write just so much and in such a manner as God saw to be best.

Did the work of the divine Spirit in the sacred penmen relate to the language they used or their manner of expressing their ideas? The doctrine of a plenary inspiration of all Scripture in regard to the language employed, as well as the thoughts communicated, is so obviously important, and so consonant to the feelings of sincere piety, that among evangelical Christians there appears to be little or no ground for controversy on this point.
