GAB'BATHA (John xix. 13), an Aramaic word signifying "a hill, or elevated spot of ground." The Greek name, λιθόστρωτον, means "pavement;" and, as the two words occur together, we are probably to understand that Pilate's tribunal was erected in the open air, upon a rising ground, the top of which was laid with tessellated pavement. Ewald proposed to give to גַבְתָּא the same meaning as the Greek λιθόστρωτον, by deriving it from a root, גב, with the meaning of קָבַע (Aramaic, to insert). But, as Weiss in Meyer in loco says, "This is too precarious a derivation."

GABLER, Johann Philipp, one of the prominent rationalists of his day; b. at Francfort, June 4, 1753; d. at Jena, Feb. 17, 1826; professor of theology at Altorf 1785, and at Jena 1804. His principal work is his edition of Eichhorn's Urgeschichte, to which he wrote an introduction and notes, Altorf, 1790-93, 2 vols. As editor of various theological periodicals, he wrote a great number of minor essays, of which a selection was made by his sons, Ulm, 1831, in 2 vols. A memoir was written by W. SCHRÖTER, Jena, 1827. He was a man of ceaseless activity, stainless life, and profound piety. His rationalism was of a sober and reverential type, like that of Herder's. HENKE.

GABRIEL (man of God), the angel who explained to Daniel the vision of the ram and the he-goat, predicted concerning the Seventy Weeks (Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21), announced the births of John and Jesus (Luke i. 19, 26), and was, according to Enoch (chap. ix.), one of the four great archangels (Gabriel, Michael, Uriel, and Raphael). He figures prominently in post-biblical Jewish literature. Pseudo-Jonathan declares that he was the man who directed Joseph to his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 15), and also, with Michael, Uriel, Jophiel, Jephphiah, and the Metratron, buried Moses. The Targum on 2 Chron. xxxii. 21 names him as the angel who smote the host of Sennacherib. In the Koran he becomes the medium of divine revelation; and so Mohammedans call him the "Holy Spirit," and "Spirit of Truth." He is upon the calendar of the Greek, Coptic, and Armenian churches.

GABRIEL SIONITA, b. at Edden, a village on Mount Lebanon, 1577; d. in Paris, 1648; was educated in the Maronite college in Rome, and appointed professor of Oriental language at Collège de France in 1614; furnished the Syriac and Arabic versions to Le Jay's polyglot Bible, and wrote several works in Arabic, Latin, and Italian; as, for instance, Dottrina christiana ad uso de' fideli orientali (1668), and an Arabic grammar.

GAD, the name of a divinity only once mentioned in the Old Testament, in Isa. lxxv. 11 [in the A. V., Gad is translated "troop"]; but it was evidently adored in Canaan, as the name Baal-Gad (e.g., Josh. xi. 17) testifies, as do also allusions in the Mishna, in Jacob of Sarug, and Isaac Antiochenus. The Hebrew word gad meant "luck;" and, as it was connected with the divinity, the latter must have been considered a friend to man, and therefore prayed to for luck. Perhaps a trace of its general use, in the sense of "luck," is in the exclamation of Leah (Gen. xxx. 11) and in the name Gaddiel (Num. xiii. 10). Some would, upon insufficient grounds, identify Gad with the planet Jupiter; cf. Baudissin, Jahre et Moloch, 1874, pp. 36 sq. More probably Gad was related to the Syro-Phœnician divinity 'At. See P. SCHOLZ: Götzendienst u. Zauberwesen bei den alten Hebräern, Regensburg, 1877, pp. 409-411, and the art. Gad, in WINER'S, in SCHENKEL'S, and in RIEHM'S Bible Dictionaries. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

GAD'ARA, the fortified capital of Peræa, stood on a hill south of the river Hieromax, or Yarmūk, the present Sheri'at el-Mandhūr, and south-east of the southern end of the Sea of Galilee, sixty stadia from Tiberias. The great roads from Tiberias and Scythopolis, to the interior of Petræa and to Damascus, passed through it. After a siege of ten months, it was taken by Alexander Jannæus, but was restored by Pompey (Josephus, Antiqu., XIV. 4, 4, Bell. Jud., I. 7. 7). On numerous coins which have come down to us the years are counted from this restoration. It became the seat of one of the five sanhedrins established by Gabinius, and was by Augustus presented to Herod, after whose death it was incorporated with the Province of Syria, though without losing entirely its autonomy. It formed part of the so-called Decapolis (Matt. iv. 25; Mark v. 20, vii. 31); and March 4, 68, it was captured by Vespasian (Josephus, Bell. Jud., IV. 7, 3). Most of its inhabitants were heathens; and the gods principally worshipped were Zeus, Heracles, Astarte, and Athene. Afterwards it became the seat of a Christian bishopric. The date and cause of its destruction are unknown. Its site was identified with the present village Umm Keis, by Seetzen and Burckhardt. The hot sulphur-springs in the neighborhood, famous in antiquity under the name of Amatha (Eusebius, Onomasticon, Αἰμάθ), are still used. It may have been the scene of the miracle of our Lord healing the demoniac (Matt. viii. 28; Mark v. 1; Luke viii. 26); though the text is somewhat doubtful, varying between χώρα τῶν Γαδαρητῶν and Γερασητῶν and Γεργασσητῶν. As each of these readings has some weighty evidence in its favor, and a mistake either the one way or the other is easily explained, a final decision can hardly yet be pronounced. [Dr. William M. Thomson has clearly identified the biblical Gergesa with Chersa, or Khersa, on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, opposite Medjel, on the slope of a hill in Wady Samakh, within forty feet of the water's edge. The narrative of the evangelists corresponds precisely with the nature of the locality, while Gadara is too far distant from the sea. See W. M. THOMSON: The Land and the Book, II. pp. 34-38; and SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, p. 346.] RÜETSCHL.

GALATIA, a Roman province occupying the central portion of Asia Minor, and bounded north by Bithynia and Paphlagonia, east by Pontus, south by Cappadocia and Lycaonia, and west by Phrygia. It was inhabited by Celtic tribes, which in 279 B.C. were brought as mercenaries from Macedonia into Asia Minor by Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. Afterwards they made war on their own account, and devastated the country in all directions. The pushing northwards of the Romans had at that time put the Celtic masses in motion; and new swarms continued to pour into Asia Minor, until in 229 B.C. they were utterly defeated by Attalus, King of Pergamus, and compelled to settle down in peace in the region which then received its name from them,—Galatia, Gaul. There they lived in three distinct tribes,—the Trocmi with the capital Tavium, the Tectasages with the capital Ancyra, and the Tolistobogii with the capital Pessinus, but united first under a kind of republican constitution, afterwards under a king. Augustus made the country a Roman province (25 B.C.); and its boundaries were afterwards several times changed. But in Galatia proper the inhabitants retained the stamp of their Celtic origin, both in language and customs, down to the time of Jerome. Paul visited the country twice,—on his second and on his third missionary tour (Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23); and to the congregations founded there he addressed one of his most important epistles. See Introduction to the Commentaries on Galatians, by Meyer (6th ed. by Sieffert, 1880), Wieseler, Lightfoot, Schaff, especially Lightfoot.

GALATIANS, Epistle to the. See PAUL.

GALBANUM, one of the ingredients of the sacred perfume prescribed in Exod. xxx. 34. It is the resin of a plant growing in Abyssinia, Arabia, and Syria, obtained by an incision. It is fat, sticky, of bitter strong smell and taste: at first white, it becomes yellow with white spots. When burnt, it gives out a disagreeable smoke, by which snakes and vermin are driven away. It is uncertain from what plant it is produced. The presence of such an unpleasant substance amid the ingredients of the incense typified that sincere sorrowful confession of sin was a necessary part of all prevailing prayer.

W. PRESSEL.

GALE, Theophilus, a learned nonconformist divine; b. in 1628, at King's Teignmouth, Devonshire, where his father was vicar; d. at Newington, in March, 1678. He was a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and became minister at Winchester, but lost his place at the Restoration for refusing to submit to the Act of Uniformity. He went abroad as tutor to the son of Lord Wharton; on his return was elected assistant to Mr. Rowe, pastor of a dissenting congregation in Holborn. He left his theological library to Harvard College. Gale is known by a curious and learned work, The Court of the Gentiles (Oxford, 1669-77, 3 vols.), which attempted to prove that Pagan philosophy and theology were a distorted reproduction of biblical truth, or, to use his own words, that "Pythagoras' College, Plato's Academy, Aristotle's Peripatium, Zeno's Stoa, and Epicurus' Gardens were all watered with rivulets, which, though in themselves corrupt, were originally derived from the sacred fountain of Siloam." Among his other works were, The True Idea of

GALE, Thomas, D.D., an eminent classical scholar and divine; b. at Scruton, Yorkshire, 1636; fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; regius professor of Greek (1666); and Dean of York (1697), where he died April 8, 1702. His principal works were Opuscula, Mythol., ethica et physica, Gr. et Lat. (Camb., 1671), and Historiæ Britann., Saxon., Anglo-Dan. Scriptores XV. (Oxf., 1691), containing Gildas, Alcuin, etc.

GALL, The Monastery of St., was founded by St. Gall, an Irish monk, and pupil of St. Columban, on the Steinach, in Switzerland. He built his cell in the thick forest there about 613, and gathered around him a number of hermits, who lived together according to the rule of St. Columban; he died Oct. 16, 627, the date varies between 625 and 650. Under Otmar, who is considered the first abbot of St. Gall (720-759), the institution began to grow very rapidly. He substituted the rule of St. Benedict for that of St. Columban, erected a church in honor of St. Gall, founded a hospital for lepers, and organized the school, afterwards so famous; as early as 771 a monk of the monastery wrote a life of its patron. Under Gozbert (816-837) the monastery was exempted from the authority of the Bishop of Constance, and made a free, royal abbey, with right to elect its own abbot. He rebuilt the church, and parts of the monastery, in a magnificent style. Under Salomon III. (899-919) the prosperity of the institution reached its height. Under Notker Labeo and the Ekkehard the school became one of the great centres of learning and culture. The monks of St. Gall were especially famous as transcribers. The library was one of the greatest in the world. Many classical works have been preserved only through copies made by the monks of St. Gall; and in artistic respects their works were often masterpieces. They also excelled as musicians, probably started in both these directions by the Irish founders of the abbey. In 1413 the city of St. Gall, having acquired great industrial and commercial importance, revolted against the abbot, and obtained its freedom. The Reformation the abbey withstood without any great loss, but after that period its occupation was gone. In possession of enormous revenues, it lived on, quietly decaying, until the time of the Revolution, when in 1798 it was secularized: its estates were confiscated, and its territory formed into a bishopric. Sources to the history of St. Gall are found in the two first volumes of Monumenta Germaniæ, and in WATTENBACH, Deutsch. Geschichts-Quellen, I. See ILDEFONS VON ARX: Geschichte d. Kantons St. Gallen, 1810-13, 3 vols.; FRANZ WEIDMANN: Geschichte der Stiftsbibliothek St. Gallens, 1841.

GALLAND, Andrea, b. at Venice, Dec. 6, 1709; d. there Jan. 12, 1779; was abbot of the congregation of the Oratorians, and published Bibliotheca veterum Patrum. antiquorumque Scriptorum ecclesiasticorum, Venice, 1765-81, 14 vols. fol., containing the works of three hundred and eighty authors.

GALLAUDET, Thomas Hopkins, LL.D., the beginner of deaf-mute instruction in America; b. at Philadelphia, Dec. 10, 1787; d. at Hartford, Sept. 9, 1851. He was graduated at Yale College 1805, and at Andover 1814; became interested in deaf-mute instruction; superintended the organization of an institution at Hartford for the purpose, having visited Europe in 1815 to study existing methods. He began his instructions, with Laurent le Clerc (a deaf-mute taught by Abbé Sicard) as his assistant, April 15, 1817, with seven pupils, and labored assiduously on new lines, and successfully, receiving many honors, until 1830, when ill health compelled his retirement from the headship, although he continued to be one of the directors. He had the satisfaction of seeing similar institutions in different parts of the country, and the instruction greatly improved, owing to his investigations and those incited by him. From 1838 to his death he was chaplain of the Connecticut Retreat for the Insane at Hartford. Among his publications were six volumes of Annals of the Deaf and Dumb, Hartford. See his Biography by HEMAN HUMPHREY, N. Y., 1858. — Two of his sons, Thomas and Edward Miner, have also won an international reputation by their labors for deaf-mutes.

GALLICAN CONFESSION, The (Confessio Gallicana, La confession de foi des églises réformées de France, also called La confession de la Rochelle), was adopted by the first national synod of the Reformed Church of France, convened in Paris 1559, under the moderatorship of Chandieu, and is based on a draft sent by Calvin to François de Morel. It was printed in Geneva, and generally attached to the French Bible. In 1561, during the Conference of Poissy, it was officially presented to the king, Charles IX., by delegates from all the Reformed congregations in France. By the seventh national synod, convened at La Rochelle 1571, under the moderatorship of Beza, and at which were present Jeanne d'Albret, queen of Navarre, her son Henry of Béarn, the Prince of Condé, Admiral de Coligny, and others, it received its final ratification. Three copies of it were inscribed on parchment, and subscribed by all present, — one for Geneva, one for Béarn, and one for La Rochelle. It was the symbolical book of the French Reformed Church; and, up to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, every minister before entering his office, and every new member before entering the congregation, had to subscribe to it. The National Synod of 1872 did not restore its authority, but gave its general assent to it in a brief summary of the faith as now held by the Reformed Church of France. See SCHAFF: Creeeds of Christendom, vol. i. pp. 490 sqq.

GALLICANISM denotes that spirit of nationality, which, within the Church of France, developed a peculiar set of customs, privileges, maxims, and views, especially with respect to her relations to Rome. Not that there is any thing like a tendency towards heresy or schism in this spirit, not even towards independence in the sense of separation; but there is a feeling of freedom, a consciousness of individual development from an individual historical basis, which causes resistance to any attempt by Rome at absorption or amalgamation.

Started by Irenæus, there arose in Gaul, towards the close of the third century, a church community independent of Rome, but by no means indifferent to her authority, free, and yet in the most intimate connection with Rome. A number of great men distinguished for piety carried this development farther, in spite of the turbulence and barbarism of the times; and the monasteries with their flourishing schools aided the movement, until finally the Gallo-Frankish Church was moulded into perfect shape by the powerful hands of Charlemagne; and from that moment the independence of the French Church, meaning simply her national individuality, has been vindicated with energy and decision whenever an able king or parliament or bishop appeared upon the stage.

Very characteristic in this respect are the three decrees of Louis IX. (1226-70), issued 1229, 1239, and 1270. The first gives in its introductory part a general survey of the Libertés et Immunités de l'Église Gallicane; the second limits the bishop's power of excommunication, and places the clergy under the jurisdiction of the State in all civil affairs; the third, the pragmatic sanction, guarantees the independence of the episcopal authority against the encroachments of the Pope, secures the privilege of electing the bishop to the chapters and the diocesan clergy, and vindicates the right of the French Church to convene a French council. Still more precisely defined became the position of the Gallican Church by the controversy between Boniface VIII. and Philippe IV., the Fair, 1286-1314. The questions at issue were of the greatest importance, — to the nation, as Boniface VIII., in a public speech, declared France to be a dependency of the German Empire; to the state, as immense sums of money yearly crossed the Alps under the form of annats; to the king, as the Pope denied his right to tax the clergy for certain purposes of urgent necessity; and to the church in general, as the Pope attempted to introduce essential changes into the relation between the bishops and the curia. The moment for this controversy was very untimely chosen by the Pope. The king was most cordially supported, not only by his Parliament, but also by the clergy and the mass of the people, and he came out of the contest victorious. But though both the kings and the parliaments, the bishops and the universities, unanimously asserted that they would cling forever to the decrees of the Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basel (which, indeed, were the dictates of Gallicanism), the Roman curia never let pass by unused an opportunity to preach the opposite doctrines. Strife occurred every now and then, though always with the same issue, — defeat to Rome. When in 1455 the Bishop of Nantes ventured an appeal from a royal decree to the Roman curia, the Parliament of Paris stepped in, and accused and condemned him for offence against the constitutional laws and ecclesiastical privileges of France.

There is, however, a famous exception to this rule; namely, the abolition, in 1516, of the pragmatic sanction of Bourges of 1440 by the Lateran synod, in consequence of the concordat concluded between Leo X. and Francis I., 1515-47. The reasons of this concordat are well known. The king expected to be invested with the fief of Naples; and his chancellor, Duprat, expected to be adorned with a cardinal's hat. But, however great this change was theoretically considered, practically it did not amount to much. The decrees of the above-mentioned three councils continued to regulate the feeling of the nation, the teaching of the university, the proceedings of the clergy, the measures of parliament; and, when the decrees of the Council of Trent (1545-63) were promulgated (which, if accepted in toto, would, indeed, have annihilated Gallicanism), only such of them were accepted in France as agreed with the privileges of the French Crown, the maxims of the French State, and the customs and laws of the French Church. If there ever had reigned in the French mind any doubt or hesitancy with respect to the true relation between the papal see and the national church, Pierre Pithou caused it to disappear. Not to speak of his Corpus juris canonici, Codex canonum, and Gallie Ecclesie in schismate status, in his Libertés de l'Église gallicane (1594) he gave in eighty-three articles a representation of the whole case, so clear and precise, that everybody could comprehend it.

From another point of view, but with equal clearness and pithiness, Bossuet gave a representation of the principles of Gallicanism in the Déclaration du Clergé, issued in the name of the Assemblée du Clergé, 1682. It declares that St. Peter, his successors, and the whole Church, have power only in spiritual things; that, however great may be the power of the apostolic see in spiritual things, it cannot overthrow the decrees of the Council of Constance, which it has itself confirmed; that consequently the laws and rules and customs of the Gallican Church, recognized by that council, must remain intact; and, finally, that the decisions of the Pope are not unchangeable, unless the whole Church agrees with him. Alexander VIII. declared this declaration null and void, and addressed a long memoir to the French clergy; and at one moment, in 1691, when no less than thirty-five episcopal sees were vacant in France, because the Pope refused to confirm those appointed by the king, it seemed as if Louis XIV. was going to yield. But the haughtiness with which, in 1713, he compelled the Pope to confirm Abbé de Saint-Aignan as Bishop of Beauvais, showed his true meaning; and in 1718 the Conseil de Régence simply declared that the papal confirmation of a French bishop was unnecessary.

To a great extent, however, Gallicanism lost its hold on the sympathy of the people by the events which took place between 1790 and 1800: they were considered, not as a victory of the Gallican Church over Rome, but as a victory of the Revolution over Christianity. By the concordats of 1801 and 1813 very little regard was paid to the principles of Gallicanism. The former made the Church entirely dependent upon the State: the latter made concessions only to the Pope. The current of political re-action which set in with the Restoration was accompanied by a similar current of religious re-action, led by Joseph de Maistre, Louis de Bonald, François de Lamennais, etc. The connection between Rome and the French clergy became more and more intimate: the Jesuits returned; the Gallican Liturgy gave place to the Roman; the textbooks of the seminaries were changed; and, shortly after the middle of the present century, Ultramontanism had completely superseded Gallicanism.

GALLIENUS, Publius Licinius (Roman emperor 260-268), b. 218 or 219; associated with his father, 253; acknowledged by the senate, 254; abolished, immediately after his accession, the decrees of his father Valerian, against the Christians, and made Christianity, if not a religio licita, at least tolerated. For this reason he appears in Eusebius' Hist. Eccl. (VII. 23), in the words of Dionysius of Alexandria, as the "restorer of the empire;" and the prophecy of Isa. xliii. 19 is applied to him, the first instance of a favorable Old-Testament prophecy being applied to an emperor; while the profane historians describe him as a supercilious and frivolous trifler. The edict itself is not extant, and the causes of it are unknown.

GAL'LIO, a brother of Seneca the philosopher, was proconsul of Achaia when Paul first visited Corinth (Acts xviii. 12). His true name was Marcus Annæus Novatus: the name of Gallio he assumed after being adopted by the rhetorician, Junius Gallio. The date and manner of his death are uncertain: it is probable, though, that, like his brother, he was put to death by Nero.

GALLITZIN, Demetrius Augustine, b. at the Hague, where his father was minister plenipotentiary, Dec. 22, 1770; d. at Loretto, Cambria County, Penn., May 6, 1841. He was the son of a Russian prince, and was sent to America by Catharine II., in 1792, as an officer of the imperial Russian guard, not only to study American institutions, but also to overcome a natural timidity of disposition. But, instead of pursuing his profession, he gave himself to the Roman-Catholic priesthood, and March 18, 1795, was ordained in Baltimore. In 1799 he was sent, at his own request, to Cambria County, Pennsylvania, and began the great work of building up Roman-Catholic settlements upon land in that county given and purchased. He won fame by charity and zeal, as "Father Smith," by which name he was naturalized (1802). In 1809 he was allowed by a special act of the Legislature to take his family name. His difficulties and pecuniary embarrassments, arising from his failure to pay for the extensive tract he had bought in the expectation of receiving his Russian fortune, were numerous; but, by unwearied diligence and unsparing self-denial, they were largely overcome. He wrote several good books, particularly Defence of Catholic Principles (Pittsburg, 1816), and Letters to a Protestant Friend on the Scriptures (Pittsburg, 1818). See his Life, by Thomas Heyden (Baltimore, 1869), and by Sarah M. Brownson (New York, 1873).

GALLUS, C. Vibius Trebonianus (Roman emperor 251-254), put an end to the persecutions of the Christians which Decius had instituted. But was afterwards led, probably by a horrible plague which terrified the people in Italy and Northern Africa, to adopt harsh measures. Cyprian, in a letter of 253 (Ep. 59), speaks of an edict which ordered all to sacrifice to the Pagan gods. Cornelius, the Bishop of Rome, was banished, and so was his successor, Lucius.

GAMA'LIEL (God is a rewarder), a Pharisee and distinguished rabbi of the first half of the first century, invariably called "the Elder" in distinction from his grandson, Gamaliel of Jabneh. He was the grandson of Hillel. The Talmudists are loud in his praise, and said, that, "since Gamaliel the Elder is dead, there is no glory of the law left." They state that he was president of the Sanhedrin during the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius; but this is doubtful. He appears only as a simple member of that body in the Acts. In the New Testament, Gamaliel is known as Paul's preceptor (Acts xxii. 3), and tolerant above his contemporaries in his attitude towards the Christian religion (Acts v. 34, 39). He wisely counselled moderation on the ground, that, if the new doctrine were of God, man could not overthrow it, or, if it were of man, it would perish of itself. Christian tradition represents that he was the cousin of Nicodemus, and, becoming a convert to Christianity, was baptized by Peter and John (Clem., Recogn., I. 65; Photius, Cod., 171). This must be regarded as apocryphal, being entirely out of accord with the Talmud. See GRAUNIUS: Hist. Gamalielis, Vit., 1687; PALMER: Paulus u. Gamaliel, Giessen, 1806; SCHÜRER: N. T. Zeitgesch., p. 458 sq.; SMITH'S Bible Dict.

GAMALIEL OF JABNEH, or the Younger; d. about 115; was famous as a legislator, and head of the supreme judicial Jewish body which met at Jabneh. He visited Rome in 95; and the Talmud abounds in incidents of the journey. See DERENBOURG: Hist. de Palestine, chap. xx.

GAMES AMONG THE HEBREWS. The games enjoyed by the Hebrew youth were music, song, and dancing (cf. Ps. xxx. 11; Jer. xxxi. 13). Another amusement seems to have been the lifting of heavy stones (Zech. xii. 3), and target-shooting (1 Sam. xx. 20). After the exile, Grecian games were introduced in Jerusalem and in other cities of Palestine. Thus Herod created a theatre and amphitheatre at Jerusalem (Joseph., Ant., XV. 8, 1), as well as at Cæsarea (Ibid., XV. 9, 6; War, I. 21, 8); and even contests with wild beasts were celebrated. No wonder that the general body of the Jews hated him. In the Talmudic period other games were known; but in general gaming was interdicted, and a gambler's testimony was not admitted.

GANGRA, the metropolis of Paphlagonia, was the seat of a council which assembled there, at an uncertain date in the middle of the fourth century, against the Eustathians. This sect had pushed their asceticism to an extreme, rejecting marriage, not only for priests, but also for laymen, demanding complete abstinence from flesh, etc. They were condemned by the council; but as the council recommended marriage not only in general, but also for priests, it has caused great embarrassment to the Roman-Catholic Church in her propaganda for sacerdotal celibacy.

GARASSE, François, b. at Angoulême, 1585; d. at Poitiers, June 14, 1631; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1601, and made quite a sensation as a preacher by his smart allusions and the peculiar vivacity of his manner. To posterity, however, he is principally known as a polemical writer. He wrote, against the freethinkers of the age, La doctrine curieuse des beaux esprits de ce temps, 1623; against the Protestants, Élixir Calvinisticum, 1615, and Rabelais réformé, 1622, etc. But he lacks knowledge and dignity, often even truthfulness and simple decency. The Roman Catholics themselves were scandalized at his diatribes. SUDHOFF.

GARDINER, James, Col., was b. in Scotland, Jan. 10, 1688, and killed at the battle of Prestonpans, Sept. 21, 1745. The interest of his life centres in his remarkable conversion. He led a career of licentiousness until July, 1719. At a midnight hour, just before the time he had appointed for an assignation with a married woman, as he was listlessly looking through a book called The Christian Soldier, "an unusual blaze of light" suddenly illuminated its pages. Looking up, he saw a "visible representation of the Christ upon the cross, and heard a voice," etc. The consequence was that he forsook his old courses, and thereafter led an exemplary Christian life, each day being inaugurated with two hours spent in devotion. These facts are narrated in DODRIDGE'S Life of Col. Gardiner. The edition of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia, is convenient in size.

GARDINER, Stephen, Bishop of Winchester, a conspicuous actor in the opposition to the English Reformation; was b. at Bury St. Edmund's, 1483; d. Nov. 12, 1555. He was the illegitimate son of Dr. Woodville, Bishop of Salisbury, and brother of Elizabeth Woodville, Edward IV.'s queen. He was educated at Cambridge, and attained great proficiency in the departments of canonical and civil law. After acting as Wolsey's private secretary, he came into the service of the king. He took a prominent part in the negotiations for the divorce with Catherine, and was sent on missions to Pope Clement VII. In 1531 his services were rewarded with the bishopric of Winchester. He defended the supremacy of the king in an able tract, De Vera Obedientia. But he was not in sympathy with the reforming tendencies, and, but for the royal intervention, would have fastened charges of heresy on Cranmer. Under Edward VI. he was committed to prison for his opposition to the Reformation, where he remained, with the exception of a brief interval, for five years. The favor of Mary released him from prison, restored him to his bishopric, and made him lord-chancellor. He negotiated the marriage-treaty with Philip, for which he had, however, a personal repugnance. He was at first in sympathy with the persecution of the Protestants, but afterwards seems to have revolted from it, and retired, leaving the work to the more callous Bonner. Gardiner was an able man, as his influence in two administrations attests. He was probably neither so unscrupulous nor vindictive as some historians have contended.

GARISSOLES, Antoine, b. at Montauban, 1587; d. there 1651; was first pastor of Puylaurens, and then, after 1628, professor of theology in the academy of his native city. He presided at the national synod of Charenton (1645), and published in 1648 Decreti Synodici Carentonensis, setting forth with impartiality and moderation the reasons why the synod condemned the book by Placcæus. Among his other works are some sermons (La Voye de Salut, 1637), and some Latin poems in honor of Gustavus Adolphus and Queen Christina.

GARNET, Henry Highland, D.D., a prominent colored clergyman; b. in New Market, Kent County, Md., April 15, 1815; d. at Monrovia, Liberia, Feb. 13, 1882. His father was a slave in Maryland, and he was born in slavery; but his father's escape in 1834 to New York enabled him to get an education. He was graduated (1840) at the Oneida Institute, Whitetown, N.Y., a manual labor school; was licensed by the presbytery of Troy, 1842, and settled in Troy 1843. He had a distinguished career, being for many years a Presbyterian pastor in New York, where he was greatly esteemed for his high character, and abilities as a preacher and pastor and as a leader of the colored population there. He was the first colored man who on any occasion spoke in the National Capitol, where he preached on Sunday, Feb. 12, 1865, in the hall of the House of Representatives. In June, 1881, he was appointed United-States minister resident and consul to Liberia; and President Garfield's last official act (July 1) was to sign his commission. He staid, however, in this country, out of delicacy, until November, when, being a second time nominated and confirmed, he finally sailed Nov. 12, and arrived at his field of labor Dec. 28.

GARNIER, Jean, b. in Paris, 1612; d. at Bologna, Oct. 16, 1681; entered the order of Jesuits in 1628; was professor of theology at various colleges of the order, and produced a series of critical and historical works relating to the history of doctrines, which are still of great value: Juliani Eclanensis Libellus (1668), and Marii Mercatoris Opera (1673), editions with notes and introductions throwing new light on the history of Pelagianism; Liberatus Breviarium (1675), a valuable contribution to the history of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies; Liber diurnus Romanorum pontificum, and a supplement to Theodoret, edited, after his death, by Hardouin.

GARNIER, Julien, b. at Connerai about 1670; d. in Paris, June 3, 1725; entered the congregation of St. Maur in 1683, and was, on account of his comprehensive knowledge of the Greek language and literature, charged in 1701 by his order with the edition of the works of St. Basil. Twenty years later the first volume appeared of Sci Patris nostri Basilii Opera omnia, in folio, and the next year the second; but the third and last was edited by Prudent Maran, after the death of Garnier.

GARVE, Karl Bernhard, b. in the neighborhood of Hanover, Jan. 4, 1763; d. at Herrnhut, June 22, 1841; was educated by the Moravian Brethren, and was successively preacher to the congregations of Brethren at Zeyst, Amsterdam, Ebersdorf, Norden, Berlin (where he rendered great services during the period between 1810 and 1816), and Neusalz on the Oder, from which he retired in 1836 on account of old age. He published Christliche Gesänge, Görlitz, 1825, containing 303 hymns, and Brüdergesänge, Gnadau, 1827, containing 65 hymns, most of which are original, and occupying a prominent place in the hymnology of the present century on account of their clearness and tenderness. K. SUDHOFF.

GASPARIN, Agénor, Comte de, a distinguished layman of the French-Protestant Church; b. in Orange, France, July 12, 1810; d. at Geneva, May 8, 1871. In the early part of his life he took an active interest in French politics, and in 1842 represented Bastia in the House of Deputies. Religious subjects, however, engrossed a large share of his attention. In 1846 he published 2 vols. on Christianisme et Paganisme; and in 1848, at the synod of the Reformed Churches, he joined Frédéric Monod in advocating the necessity of a well-defined creed. The last twenty-three years of his life were spent in Switzerland, at Geneva. His eloquence did good service in the cause of evangelical religion and morality. He delivered lectures on many different subjects in the hall of the "Reformation," many of which were published. He was a pronounced enemy of slavery, and wrote, in advocacy of the Northern cause, two volumes, Un grand peuple qui se relève, 1861, and l'Amérique devant l'Europe, 1862 (Eng. trans., America before Europe, 3d ed., New York, 1862). A paper prepared by him on The Care of the Sick, for the Evangelical Alliance Conference, New York, 1873, was forwarded by his widow, and is published in its proceedings. He wrote also Schools of Doubt and Schools of Faith, Edinburgh, 1854. Madame Gasparin, his wife, was also a graceful author. Her Near and Heavenly Horizons (New York, 1864), and Human Sadness (Boston, 1864), have been translated. See A. NAVILLE: Le Comte Ag. de Gasparin, Genève, 1871; and BOREL: Le Comte Ag. de G., Paris, 1879 (Eng. trans., New York [1880]).

GATAKER, Thomas, a scholarly divine, and member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, was the son of the chaplain to Robert, Earl of Leicester; b. in London, Sept. 4, 1574; d. at Rotherhithe, July 27, 1654. In 1590 he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, and in 1599 was chosen fellow of the newly founded Sidney College. In 1601 he became preacher at Lincoln's-inn, and in 1611 removed to the living of Rotherhithe, Surrey. He outlived four wives. In 1643 he was called by Parliament to sit as a member of the Assembly of Divines. He was offered and refused the mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge. Gataker was a man of much learning, and the author of a number of works. His first book, Of the Nature and Use of Lots (London, 1619, pp. 360), grew out of sermons preached at Lincoln's-inn, and was designed to vindicate the lawfulness of "ludicrous lots" (games of chance), and to condemn "divinatory or consultory lots." This work led to a controversy, and drew forth from him two more books on the same subject in 1623 (pp. 275) and 1638 (in Latin, pp. 61). A Discussion of the Popish Doctrine of Transubstantiation, and A Short Catechism, appeared in 1624, two volumes of Sermons, 1637 sq.; and in 1645 (3d ed., 1657) he published English Annotations upon Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations (a part of the Assembly's Annotations). Gataker also sent forth valuable critical works, among which was the edition of Marcus Antoninus, which Hallam says "was the earliest edition of any classical writer published in England with original annotations." These last were edited by the learned Wirtius in a large volume, Opera Critica, Utrecht, 1698. See CLARKE's Genl. Martyrologie, Lond., 1677 (3d ed. pp. 248 sqq.); BROOKS: Lives of the Puritans, III. pp. 200-223.

GAUDEN, John, b. at Mayfield, in Essex, 1605; d. at Worcester, Sept. 20, 1662; educated at Cambridge; master of the Temple 1659; bishop of Exeter 1660, and of Worcester 1662. He claimed to have written the Eikon Basilike (Εἰκὼν Βασιλική, — The Pourtraicture of his Sacred Majestie in his Solitudes and Sufferings); but careful and protracted examination has decided against him, and in favor of Charles I., who was the king meant. The book itself appeared in 1648; was replied to by Milton (Eikonoclastes, 1649). It is a defence of the king's conduct, and an account of his misfortunes from the calling of the Long Parliament (1640) to his confinement in Carisbrooke Castle (1648), written throughout in the first person, divided into short sections, each of which is followed by a page or two of meditations and prayers; and at the end are more extended meditations upon death, and a proposed address to Parliament. The book is well written, and its piety is genuine. Gauden was a member of the Savoy Conference (see CONFERENCE, SAVOY); and according to Baxter, though he had a bitter pen, he was moderate in speech; "and, if all had been of his mind, we had been reconciled."

GAUDENTIUS, b. about 360; succeeded Philastrius as Bishop of Brixia (the present Brescia) in 387, and was still living in 410, in which year Rufinus dedicated to him his translation of the Recognitiones of Clement. A number of sermons by him, among which are ten dedicated to a certain Benevolus who by sickness was prevented from attending service in the church, are still extant, and are found in MIGNÉ: Patrol. Lat., XX.

GAUL. Of the Christianization of Gaul there is a double report by the école légendaire, or antigégorienne, and by the école historique, or gégorienne. According to the former, all the principal places of Gaul were Christianized by persons mentioned in the New Testament, or closely connected with it. Thus Lazarus and his two sisters and their servants were put in a small boat by the Jews, and abandoned to the winds and the waves. The boat drifted ashore in Southern Gaul; and Marseilles, Aix, Tarascon, etc., were Christianized by its crew. The three disciples of Paul (Trophimus, Crescens, and Sergius Paulus) preached at Arles, Vienne, and Narbonne. St. Aphrodisius, who for seven years rendered hospitality to the holy family in Egypt, founded Christianity at Béziers; Dionysius Areopagita, in Paris; Zacchæus the publican, at Cahors, etc. The only particle of historical foundation for all these legends is 2 Tim. iv. 10, where Paul says that Crescens had gone to Gaul; but the reading is uncertain. Tischendorf and the revised English translation have Galatia, instead of Gaul.

The école historique ascribes the conversion of Gaul to the energy of the papal see, and founds its view on the authority of Gregory of Tours, who certainly had the very best opportunity to learn the truth about it. In his Annales Francorum he says that in 250, under the reign of Decius, the Pope consecrated seven bishops, and sent them to Gaul; namely, Gatian to Tours, Trophimus to Arles, Paul to Narbonne, Saturnin or Sernin to Toulouse, Denis to Paris, Stremonius to Avernes, and Martial to Limousin. The progress of the undertaking was slow. At the opening of the fourth century there were very few Christians in the interior of the country; though at the beginning of the fifth century each of the hundred and twelve cities of Gaul enumerated in the Notitia provinciarum et civitatum Galliarum had its bishop. Gregory corroborates his narrative by quoting the acts of the martyr St. Sernin; and his statement has, in its general outline, been confirmed by later historical and archaeological investigations, though the story of the contemporaneous arrival of the seven bishops presents some difficulties, and shows a somewhat legendary coloring.

There is one point, however, at which safe historical ground is reached as early as 177; namely, Lyons. In his Hist. Eccl. (V. 1) Eusebius transcribes a letter sent by the congregations of Vienne and Lyons to the congregations of Asia and Phrygia, and narrating the martyrdom of Pothinus, Bishop of Lyons, and a number of other Christians. Another letter, addressed by the same congregations to Bishop Eleutherus of Rome, and recommending to him Irenæus, at that time presbyter at Lyons, is found in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., V. 4). It is certain that this church of Lyons was founded by Greek missionaries from Asia Minor. It is probable that they, on their passage through Viennois and Narbonnais, founded Christian communities also in those places, but it is doubtful how far Christianity spread; though the peculiar development of the Gallican Church, and more especially the differences between the Roman and the Gallican liturgies, indicates the existence in Gaul of a powerful influence different from that of Rome. The complete literature on this subject has been given by E. RUELLE: Bibliographie générale de la Gaule, 1879. See the articles on DIONYSIUS AREOPAGITA, IRENÆUS, GREGORY OF TOURS, etc.

GAUSSEN, Étienne, b. at Nîmes in the beginning of the seventeenth century; d. at Saumur, 1675; was professor there, first of philosophy (1651), and then of theology (1665). The school of Saumur represented at that time a more liberal conception of French Protestantism than that represented by the schools of Sedan and Montauban; and Gausсен contributed much to propagate those views. His works were frequently reprinted both in Holland and Germany; as, for instance, his De Utilitate Philosophiæ ad Theologiam, Saumur, 1670, last edition, Halle, 1727.

GAUSSEN, François Samuel Robert Louis, b. at Geneva, Aug. 25, 1790; d. there June 18, 1863; was appointed pastor of Satigny in 1816, but dismissed in 1834; and from 1836 till his death taught dogmatics in the theological school of Geneva, founded by the Evangelical Society in 1831. Under the influence of Cellérier (his predecessor at Satigny) and the remarkable Scotch layman Robert Haldane, he became an ardent champion of the strict orthodox Calvinism; and, though he was very far from being an agitator, he soon came in decided opposition to the rationalistic compagnie des pasteurs of Geneva. In 1827 the compagnie tried to compel him to introduce their rationalistic catechism in his church; but he absolutely refused. A compromise was effected, however; but when the Evangelical Society, one of whose founders he was, established a new theological school in direct opposition to the old one taught by the Rationalists, and Merle d'Aubigné and Hävernick were invited to Geneva, he left Satigny, and became a professor there. Of his works several have been translated into English; as, for instance, Théopneusty, 1842; 14th ed., 1850 (a defence of verbal inspiration); Geneva and Jerusalem, 1844; Geneva and Rome, 1844; Lessons for the Young, 1860; Canon of Holy Scripture, 1862, abridged by Rev. Dr. Kirk, Boston, n. d.

GAUTAMA. See BUDDHISM.

GA'ZA (strong), the present Guzzeh, a city on the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, near the boundary-line between Egypt and Palestine; was a flourishing centre of Canaanite civilization in the time of Abraham, and fell by the division of the country to the lot of Judah (Josh. xv. 47). It afterwards formed one of the members of the Philistine Pentapolis, and figures prominently in the history of Samson, Solomon, the Prophets, Alexander the Great, the Ptolemies, the Maccabees, Herod the Great, and the Romans. Taken and almost destroyed in A. D. 634 by the Arabs, it was restored by the crusaders, but was again conquered by Saladin in 1170. At present it has about sixteen thousand inhabitants.

GEHARD II. (Truchsess von Waldburg), b. at Waldburg, Nov. 10, 1547; d. at Strassburg, May 21, 1601; was elected Archbishop of Cologne, Dec. 5, 1577, and confirmed by the Pope, April 14, 1578. But a love-affair with Agnes of Mansfeld gave a sudden turn to his career in the service of the church. By an edict of Dec. 19, 1582, he established religious liberty and freedom of worship in his dominions; Jan. 16, 1583, he published a declaration acknowledging his own conversion to the Lutheran Church; and Feb. 2, 1583, he married Agnes of Mansfeld. But by a bull of April 1, 1583, Gregory XIII. deposed him, and declared the see of Cologne vacant; and May 22, 1583, Duke Ernst of Bavaria was elected archbishop by the chapter. The fight now began. Ernst held the metropolis of the diocese, but Gebhard was in possession of the strong fortress Bonn. The latter, however, did not receive the support he expected from the other Protestant princes of Germany. They had no sympathy for him. Toleration and religious liberty they hated and despised as heartily as did the Roman Catholics, and a suspicion of Calvinism hovered over the unfortunate Gebhard. In January, 1584, Bonn was taken, and thereby his cause was lost. He sought aid in Holland, in England, in Germany, but everywhere in vain, and retired finally to Strassburg, where he lived and died entirely forgotten.

GEDDES, Alexander, a Roman-Catholic scholar; b. at the farm of Arradoul, in the parish of Rathven, Banffshire, Scotland, Sept. 14, 1737; d. in London, Feb. 26, 1802. After studying in the Roman-Catholic seminary at Scalán, and later in Paris, he became chaplain to the Earl of Traquair (1765), pastor at Auchinhalrig (1769), deprived (1779) for attendance upon Protestant worship, after having been repeatedly blamed by his bishop for his intimacy with Protestants, and the next year he went with Lord Traquair to London. In 1792 he was able, through the munificence of Lord Petre, to publish the first volume (Genesis to Joshua) of a translation, with notes, of the Bible from the original text, and the second in 1797 (Judges to Ruth). The work was chiefly remarkable as that of a Roman-Catholic priest; for it boldly accepted the deductions of the critical school of Eichhorn, and unhesitatingly corrected the original text in accordance with the suggestions of Houbigant, Kennicott, and Michaelis. Neither Protestants nor Roman Catholics could approve the work. He was suspended, and "the faithful" were warned against his translation. Undismayed, he issued in 1800 his Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures, corresponding with a New Translation of the Bible, containing the Pentateuch, in which he reiterated previous statements. At the time of his death he was engaged upon a critical translation of the Psalms, and had reached the eleventh verse of the hundred and eighteenth. It was published, edited by Dr. Disney and Charles Butler, and completed by Dr. Geddes's corrections to Bishop Wilson's Bible, Lond., 1807. See Memoirs of his Life and Writings, by JOHN MASON GOOD, Lond., 1803.

GEDDES, Janet, or Jenny, a Scottish heroine. When it was proposed, in the reign of Charles I., by advice of Archbishop Laud, to introduce the English Liturgy into Scotland, it raised a storm of indignation. The dean of Edinburgh, however, made the experiment in the Cathedral Church of St. Giles, Sunday, July 23, 1637, in the presence of the privy council and the city magistrates. According to the usual story, an old herb-woman called Janet Geddes, hearing the archbishop direct the dean in finding the collect for the day (seventh Sunday after Trinity), confounded "cholic" and "collect," and exclaimed in indignation, "Villain, dost thou say mass at my lug?" (ear), and hurled the stool upon which she had been sitting at the dean's head. This was the signal for a riot in and about the cathedral. The people shouted through the streets, "A pope, a pope! Antichrist! the sword of the Lord and of Gideon!" the ultimate result of which was, because it was an outburst of popular feeling by no means confined to Edinburgh, the withdrawal of the Liturgy. Thus, as Stanley says, "The stool which was on that occasion flung at the head of the dean of Edinburgh extinguished the English Liturgy entirely in Scotland for the seventeenth century, to a great extent even till the nineteenth, and gave to the civil war in England an impulse which only ended in the overthrow of the Church and Monarchy." The disturbance was entirely unpremeditated. Some historians give Barbara Hamilton as the name of the heroine. Comp. GEHEN'NA is a word used in the New Testament for "hell." Comp. Matt. v. 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxiii. 15; Mark ix. 43, 45; Luke xii. 5; and James iii. 6. It is used in distinction from "hades" when either the torments of hell itself, or the idea of a hellish torment, is to be expressed. The passages of the New Testament show plainly that the word "gehenna" was a popular expression for "hell," of which Jesus and the apostles made use; but it would be erroneous to infer that Jesus and his apostles merely accommodated themselves to the popular expression, without believing in the actual state of the lost. The word "gehenna" is the Greek representative of a Hebrew word denoting the "Valley of Hinnom," or "of the son," or "children of Hinnom,"—a deep, narrow glen to the south of Jerusalem, where the Jews offered their children to Moloch (2 Kings xxiii. 10; Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2-6). In later times it served as the receptacle of all sorts of putrefying matter and all that defiled the holy city; and thus it became the image of the place of everlasting punishment, especially on account of its ever-burning fires; and to this fact the words of Christ refer when he says, "and the fire is not quenched."

GEIBEL, Johannes, b. at Hanau, April 1, 1776; d. at Lübeck, July 25, 1853; studied at Marburg, and became pastor of the Reformed Congregation in Lübeck 1797; which position he resigned in 1847. He was an eloquent and impressive preacher, an ardent adversary of the reigning rationalism, and exercised considerable influence also outside of the Reformed Congregation. One of his most remarkable writings, besides his sermons, is his Widerherstellung der ersten christlichen Gemeinde, Lübeck, 1840, published under the pseudonyme of Philalethes.

GEIGER, Abraham, Hebrew and Talmudical scholar; b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, May 24, 1810; d. at Berlin, Oct. 23, 1874. He was rabbi at Wiesbaden, Breslau, Frankfort, and Berlin; belonged to the Reformed Jews, and in their interest founded, with some others, the Zeitschrift für jüdische Theologie (1835). His principal publications were an essay upon the Jewish sources of the Koran (Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judenthum aufgenommen? 1833), monographs (Studien) upon Maimonides (1850) and other Jews of the middle age, Urschrift u. Uebersetzungen der Bibel in ihrer Abhängigkeit von der innern Entwicklung des Judenthums (1857), Die Sadducäer u. Pharisäer (1863), Das Judenthum und seine Geschichte (1864-71, Eng. trans. of vol. i., Lond., 1866). And posthumous are his Allgemeine Einleitung und Nachgelassene Schriften, 5 vols., edited by his son, 1875. Of these works that on the Urschrift was the chief, as it was the fruit of twenty years of study, and "marked a new departure in the methods of studying the records of Judaism."

GEIGER, Franz Tiburtius, b. at Harting, near Ratisbon, 1755; d. at Lucerne, May 8, 1843; entered the order of the Franciscans in 1772, and became professor of theology at Lucerne in 1792. Lucerne was the seat of the papal nuncios, and the centre of Roman-Catholic Switzerland, and from here Geiger exercised a considerable influence on the revival and consolidation of ultramontanist feelings and ideas, both by his lectures and by a great number of minor pamphlets, collected in eight volumes by RÄBER. See WIDMER: Franz Geiger, Lucerne, 1843.

GEILER, Johann, b. at Kaisersberg, near

Schaffhausen. March 16, 1445; d. at Strassburg, March 10, 1510; studied philosophy and the humanities at Freiburg, but was by Gerson's writings drawn towards theology; went to Basel in 1471, and became doctor theologiae there in 1475; returned to Freiburg as professor of theology, but removed in 1478 to Strassburg, where he spent the rest of his life as preacher at the cathedral. Towards the end of the fifteenth century a tendency became apparent almost everywhere among the preachers to throw off the yoke of scholasticism, and to give to the sermon a freer course, a greater life, a deeper impressiveness. This tendency did not originate among the Humanists. It sprang from a feeling which the rapid progress of the printing-press, and the effect it had on the people, awakened within the church itself, that it was necessary to establish a much more intimate relation between the pulpit and the mass of the people, if the former should not entirely lose its hold on the latter. One of the most remarkable representatives of this tendency is Geiler von Kaisersberg. He took his texts not from Scripture only, but also from Gerson's works, from Brant's Narrenschiff, from a barber's song, from everywhere; and the text chosen he applied directly, without finching, to the real life which presented itself before his pulpit, in form which our taste may now and then find somewhat coarse, but which on his time produced the deepest impression. His sermons were often taken down while he delivered them, then translated into Latin (often with omission of the faciæ which could not be translated), and then again into High German. Thus there exists a great number of collections of his sermons, more or less genuine; but all of them, even the tamest Latin renderings, show the same fundamental character. See works upon Geiler's life and writings by AMMON (Erlangen, 1826), AUGUST STOEBER (Strassburg, 1834), [DACHEUX (Paris, 1877), also by Dr. P. DE LORENZI, in his edition of GEILER'S Ausgewählte Schriften, vols. I., II., Trier, 1881.] C. SCHMIDT.

GELASIUS is the name of two popes. — Gelasius I. (March 1, 492–Nov. 19, 496) inherited the controversy with the Constantinopolitan see concerning Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, whom Pope Felix III. had excommunicated because he leaned towards Monophysitism, but whose name was still retained in the diptychs of the Constantinopolitan Church. In 495 Gelasius repeated the excommunication, and cursed all who did not accept it. The controversy became so much the more acrimonious as the real question at issue was one of precedence. It was not the orthodoxy of his predecessor, but the supremacy of his see, which Gelasius fought for; and, in the numerous letters he wrote during the controversy, he pushed his arrogance to an extreme, and set forth claims hitherto unheard of. He demanded the right to receive appeals from everywhere in the world, though he allowed no appeal from Rome to any other court; the right to confirm or cancel the decisions of other bishops, though none were allowed to question the decisions of Rome, etc. Besides his letters, he left several minor writings, of which the most remarkable is the Decretum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis, the first Index librorum prohibitorum.

Its genuineness is contested; but though it may have been begun by Damasus, and finished by Hormisdas, the bulk of the work seems, nevertheless, to belong to Gelasius. Among the books forbidden are the works of Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Arnobius, Lactantius, and Origen. His writings are found in AND. THIEL: Epist. Rom. Pontif., Brunsberg, 1867; his life, in Liber. Pontif., vol. i.; and in JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 53. — Gelasius II. (1118–Jan. 19, 1119) was seized, immediately after his election, by the faction of the Frangipani, and liberated only by the rising of the people of Rome. But he had hardly escaped the Frangipani before a still greater danger began to loom upon him. As soon as Henry V. heard that a new pope had been elected without his consent being asked for, he hastened to Italy, and March 2, 1118, he entered Rome. Afraid of being compelled to make a compromise similar to that which his predecessor Paschalis II. had made, Gelasius II. fled to Capua, and April 7, 1118, he excommunicated the emperor, and the antipope whom the emperor had got elected in Rome under the name of Gregory VIII. Shortly after, he returned to Rome, but was once more driven away by the Frangipani and the imperial party. He fled to France, and died on the way to Cluny. His life by, Pandulfus, is found in WATTERICH: Pont. Rom. Vite, Tom. II.; his letters, in MIGNE: Patrol. Latin., vol. 163; cf. JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., pp. 522 sq. R. ZÖPFEL.

GELASIUS OF CYZICUS lived about 475, and wrote a history of the first Council of Nicea, which was published by Robert Balfour, Paris, 1599, and is found in the collections of councils by Labbé, Harduin, and Mansi. The work is of very little value, however, consisting mostly of fictitious speeches, and of debates between heathen philosophers and Christian bishops.

GELLERT, Christian Fürchtgott, b. at Haynichen, Saxony, July 4, 1715; d. at Leipzig, Dec. 13, 1769; studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed professor extraordinary there in 1751. He wrote comedies, fables, essays on morals and æsthetics, and hymns. His Fables was one of the most popular books which the German literature produced in the eighteenth century, and it is still read. His hymns made almost an equal impression: they were translated into Dutch, Danish, Bohemian, Russian, etc., and were praised even by the Roman Catholics. It is true that they have been severely criticised; but no disparagement has been able to take Gellert out of the hearts of the people, nor his poems out of the church. [One of his hymns, "Jesus lives, and I with him," is found in many English hymn-books.] His collected works have been frequently reprinted, as in 10 vols. at Leipzig, 1867. His Life was written by J. A. Cramer, Leipzig, 1774. A Gellertbuch was published in Dresden, 1854. HAGENBACH.

GENEALOGY.¹ The matter of pedigree was deemed of great importance by the Hebrews and ancient peoples generally, as at present among the Arabs. Genealogical lists are interspersed all through the historical books of the Old Testament. They are called "the book of the generation of," etc. They answer, also, a spiritual purpose. They prove the faithfulness of God in favoring the increase of the race, in accordance with his command, in keeping his promise to Abraham and his seed, in raising up priests to minister in his sanctuary, and, finally, in sending, when the set time had come and all things were ready, his Son into the world. As far as the Bible is concerned, the preservation of these genealogical lists was for the authentication of Christ's descent. But the historical use is by no means to be ignored: indeed, in proportion as we grasp its value shall we attain conviction of the perfect reality of the earthly descent of Christ from the seed of David, according to prophecy. "The genealogies of Scripture," says Professor G. Rawlinson, "dry and forbidding as is their first aspect, will well repay a careful and scholarly study. They are like an arid range of bare and stony mountains, which, when minutely examined, reveals to the investigator mines of emerald or diamond. Only let the searcher bear in mind that where all is dark to him it may be reserved for future inquirers to let in upon the darkness a flood of light" (The Origin of Nations, p. 166).

The first biblical genealogy is Gen. iv. 16–24. It gives the descendants of Cain. The following chapter gives the family of Seth. The tenth and eleventh chapters, though the ordinary reader might pass them over because they seem to consist of mere unimportant names, are regarded by ethnologists as invaluable, since they contain a history of the dispersion of the nations in prehistoric times. The first eight chapters of 1 Chronicles are devoted to genealogical accounts, beginning with Adam, because, as it is stated, "all Israel were reckoned by genealogies" (1 Chron. ix. 1). It is, however, to be observed that these several lists are not in all cases records of direct descent; though perhaps, in the majority of instances, they are unbroken. Still they are not sufficient to determine the length of any period, since, in many cases, the list the writer has transcribed contains only prominent names. Women are named occasionally, when there is something remarkable about them, or when any right or property is transmitted through them (see Gen. xi. 29; Exod. vi. 23; 1 Chron. ii. 4; Luke i. 5, etc.). Another feature is, that these records especially concern the line of the chosen seed and the tribe and family from which our Lord sprung. Seth's family is more fully stated than Cain's, Abraham's than Lot's, Isaac's than Ishmael's, etc. The lists are both ascending and descending. For the former see 1 Chron. vi. 33–43, Ez. vii. 1–5; for the descending see Ruth iv. 18–22, 1 Chron. iii. The descending scale is likely to take in the collateral branches. There are many clerical errors in these lists.

But, notwithstanding these alterations and abridgments, it is capable of proof that the Bible presents us transcripts from certain official records. They bear the evidence of substantial truth. That such records existed is indicated rather than proved. Thus the assignments of the temple-service by David were genealogical. In the reign of Rehoboam, Iddo wrote a book on genealogies (2 Chron. xii. 15). From 2 Chron.

xxi. 16-19 we learn that in Hezekiah's day there existed genealogies of the priests, at all events. The lists in Ezra and Nehemiah prove that such lists and others survived the captivity. It is a monstrous assumption to say that they were forged. Lord Hervey (in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible) points out an incidental allusion to these lists at the time of Christ, in proof that the census went upon them as a basis; since Joseph went to Bethlehem because he was of the house of David. Manifestly Joseph had, in the genealogy of his family, good grounds for this belief. Probably "the registers of the Jewish tribes and families perished at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not before; although some partial records may have survived the event." When the temple fell, there was no longer any special need of these lists. The Aaronic priesthood was no more; the nation was dispersed in captivity; the Messiah was come.

BOCHART (Geographica sacra, 1646) is worth consultation by those who would make a thorough study of the subject.

Genealogy of Jesus Christ (Matt. i. 1-17; Luke iii. 23-38). This is the only genealogy given us in the New Testament. "We have two lists of the human ancestors of Christ. Matthew, writing for Jewish Christians, begins with Abraham; Luke, writing for Gentile Christians, goes back to Adam, the father of all men. According to his human nature, Christ was the descendant of Abraham, David, and Mary: according to his divine nature, he was the eternal and only-begotten Son of God, begotten from the essence of the Father. John (i. 1-18) begins his Gospel by setting forth his divine genealogy. In him, the God-man, all the ascending aspirations of human nature toward God, and all the descending revelations of God to man, meet in perfect harmony. Matthew begins at Abraham (1) to prove to Jewish Christians that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah, (2) to show the connection between the Old and New Testaments through a succession of living persons ending in Jesus Christ, who is the subject of the Gospel, and the object of the faith it requires. Christ is the fulfilment of all the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, the heir of all its blessings and promises, the dividing-line and connecting-link of ages, the end of the old and the beginning of the new history of mankind. In the long list of his human ancestors we have a cloud of witnesses, a compend of the history of preparation for the coming of Christ down to the Virgin Mary, in whom culminated the longing and hope of Israel for redemption. It is a history of divine promises and their fulfilment, of human faith and hope for the desire of all nations. In the list are named illustrious heroes of faith, but also obscure persons written in the secret book of God, as well as gross sinners redeemed by grace, which reaches the lowest depths, as well as the most exalted heights, of society. Matthew's table is divided into three parts, corresponding to three periods of preparation for the coming of Christ." — Schaff.

The differences between Matthew and Luke have been variously explained. They prove the independence of the two evangelists, who drew from different but equally trustworthy sources. Both lists are incomplete, and names must be supplied (there are only nine names for a period of eight hundred and thirty-three years). They coincide until David; when Matthew takes the reigning line through Solomon, Luke the younger and inferior line by David's son Nathan. A more serious difficulty is, that names do not appear in the same place in the two lists. Luke gives twenty-one names between David and Zerubbabel, Matthew only fifteen; and all the names except that of Shealtiel (Salathiel) are different. Luke gives seventeen names between Zerubbabel and Joseph, Matthew only nine; and all the names are different. The greatest difference is, that Matthew calls Joseph the son of Jacob, while Luke calls him the son of Heli, or Eli. He cannot have been naturally the son of both; and it is not likely that the two names are meant for one and the same person. Hence the following theories:—

1. The oldest explanation assumes one, or perhaps two, levirate marriages in the family of Joseph; i.e., a marriage of a man to the childless widow of his elder brother; the children of the second marriage being reckoned as the legal descendants of the first husband. Heli and Jacob may have been brothers, or half-brothers (sons of the same mother, but of different fathers), successively married to the mother of Joseph, who, according to law, was registered by Luke as the son of Heli, though naturally the son of Jacob, as recorded by Matthew. But this view involves inaccuracy in one or the other of the two genealogies.

2. Matthew gives the legal or royal genealogy of Joseph; Luke, the private line of Joseph. The one gives the heirship to the throne of David and Solomon (the jus successionis); the other, the actual descent, through Nathan and private persons, from a collateral line (the jus sanguinis). This is the prevailing view of English divines: but then Matthew could not have properly used the verb "begat;" for the line of Solomon failed in Jeconiah (Jer. xxii. 30).

3. Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph; Luke, the genealogy of Mary. Heli may have been the father of Mary and the father-in-law of Joseph, and consequently the grandfather of Jesus. Luke, writing for Gentiles, and proving that Christ was the seed of the woman, traces the natural or real pedigree of Jesus through his mother, Mary, in the line of Nathan, and indicates this by the parenthetical remark, "Jesus being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph [but in reality], the son of Heli," or his grandson by the mother's side. Mary is always called by the Jews "the daughter of Heli." Matthew, writing for Jews, gives the legal pedigree of Jesus (which was always reckoned in the male line) through Joseph, his legal father, in the line of Solomon. This explanation is the easiest, and has been adopted by Luther, Grotius, Bengel, Olshausen, Ebrard, Wieseler, Robinson, Gardiner, Lange, Plumptre, Weiss, Godet. It is supported by the fact that in Matthew's history of the infancy Joseph is most prominent; in Luke's account, Mary. The Davidic descent of Jesus is a mark of the Messiah, and is clearly taught in the prophecy, and also in Rom. i. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 8; Heb. vii. 14; John vii. 42; Acts xiii. 23. If we take this explanation, Jesus was in a double sense the son of David, — in law and in fact, from his reputed father, and from his natural mother.

GENESIS. See PENTATEUCH.

GENESIUS, a comedian, who, while acting the part of a candidate for Christian baptism, was suddenly converted, acknowledged his conviction, was put to torture, and beheaded (285), and then inscribed among the saints of the Roman Church. His festival falls on Aug. 25. See Act. Sanct., and BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, on date.

GENEVA (French, Genève; German, Genf), the largest city of Switzerland, numbering 68,165 inhabitants in 1876, and the capital of the canton of the same name; was, before the period of the Reformation, subject to the bishop of the diocese of Geneva, who, again, was an immediate fiefholder of the German emperor. There was, however, always dispute between the bishops and the counts of Geneva, later on between the bishops and the dukes of Savoy, concerning the possession of the city; and there was within the city itself, as within most mediæval towns of commercial and industrial consequence, a party which strove for liberty and independence. Backed by Freiburg and Bern, with which alliances were concluded respectively in 1519 and 1526, the party of liberty finally gained the ascendancy. The city constituted itself a republic, expelled the bishop, adopted the Reformation, and succeeded in vindicating its independence against the insidious attacks of the Duke of Savoy until 1798, when it was incorporated with France. In 1814, however, it regained its independence; and, its territory having been increased with some French and Savoy communities, it joined the Swiss confederacy as the twenty-second canton. The area of the canton comprises only 107 square miles, with 99,352 inhabitants in 1876.

The first seeds of the Reformation were sown in Geneva by the French translation of the Bible by Le Fèvre d'Étaples (Faber Stapulensis); and already in 1528 the bishop, the Duke of Savoy, and the Pope were busily engaged in punishing people who possessed or read le livre maudit: they were fined, or scourged, or beheaded. In September, 1532, Farel arrived at Geneva, preceded by Froment, followed by Viret; and in March, 1533, the Reformed doctrine was allowed to be preached and practised in the city. In July, same year, the bishop, Pierre de la Baume, removed his residence from Geneva to Annecy. A violent Roman-Catholic re-action took place in the following year; but it was of short duration. In 1535 the Reformation was adopted as the religion of the State; and in October, 1536, Calvin arrived. He soon found himself at the head of the whole movement, political as well as religious; and by his iron hand a theocracy of a very stern type was established. The Reformed doctrine became a civil duty, and dogmatical deviations were treated as treason. Ecclesiastical discipline was carried even into the routine of daily life, and a breach of its dictates was punished as a crime. The transition proved too sudden, however. A party was formed, not with any tendency towards Romanism, but for the purpose of sustaining a greater measure of liberty, and in 1538 Calvin was expelled. But it soon became apparent that his austere regimen was a necessity, if Geneva really should fulfil her mission as a frontier fortress against Rome. The city was crowded with refugees from Italy, Spain, France, and England. Each new-comer brought a new system of Protestantism along with him; and the liberty very soon degenerated into a laxity, which the Roman Catholics were not slow to avail themselves of. Calvin was recalled, and the severe order returned with the dictator. Under his rule, and, indeed, for a long time after his death, Geneva stood as the "Rome of Protestantism," the "moral capital of the half of Christendom," forming the strongest and loftiest characters, and sending forth the noblest and most vigorous impulses. It was not only a place of refuge to those who were persecuted, but also a centre of active labor. The English version, called the Geneva Bible, received its name from its being made in that city by English refugees. (See ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 735.)

Under such circumstances it was only natural that the Roman-Catholic Church should consider it one of her great objects to convert Geneva; and many attempts, insidious, daring, foolish attempts, were made, as, for instance, that by François de Sales. But none was more cunningly planned, and more patiently carried out, than that of which our own time has seen the issue. The inhabitants of the territory added to the city in 1814 in order to form the canton of Geneva were exclusively Roman Catholics, and the population of the whole canton was thus nearly equally divided between the two churches. Here was a chance for Rome, and she knew how to improve it. Disputes between the priests and the pastors were of frequent occurrence, and sometimes of great danger to the republic, as, after the fall of Napoleon, a strong current of re-action, both political and religious, had set in everywhere in Europe; and it proved easy for the Roman-Catholic party to bring the influence of France, Russia, and Austria, to bear against their Protestant adversaries. The dissolution of the Holy Alliance, however, and the revolution of 1830, gave the Protestants freer hands; but then the secret work of the Romanists in the social foundation of the State began to show its results. From the very day of the annexation of the rural territories, the Roman clergy exerted itself to prevent an amalgamation between the two denominations. Mixed marriages were prohibited; neighborly courtesy was discouraged; the two confessions seldom met each other, except when doing military service. At the same time a Roman-Catholic immigration was highly favored. Laborers, mechanics, retail dealers, etc., were imported in considerable numbers, and settled in the city, a propaganda at Lyons furnishing funds; and the Roman Church was soon able to take up the contest with the Protestant party in the political field. The fight actually began, stirred up by the priests. But in the course of a generation the march of affairs took an unexpected turn. The young voters were sent to the polls by their confessors, and to the political meetings. Discussions began between the two confessions; and confessional matters could, of course, not be excluded. The result was that suddenly there appeared within the pale of the Roman-Catholic community a decided opposition to the ultramontanists. This new party, the Liberal-Catholics, invited in 1873 Father Hyacinthe to preach at Geneva; and, as the Genevese laws grant to every congregation the right of electing its pastor itself, many Roman-Catholic congregations chose Old Catholic priests, who rejected the dogma of papal infallibility, and were married.

The history, however, of the Church of Geneva, is by no means confined to her duel with the Roman Church: on the contrary, considerable changes of organization and a significant doctrinal development have taken place. The organization of the sixteenth century remained unaltered for a long time, or underwent only minor modifications, until, in 1846, a radical change was effected, amounting almost to a revolution. Up to 1846 the pastors were chosen by the Vénérable Compagnie des Pasteurs, one of the institutions of Calvin, which also had in hand the administration of all religious affairs of the church, and exercised great influence on the academy and the schools. But from that year the authority of the compagnie was confined to questions of worship proper; while the other branches of the administration of the church were placed under the consistoire, composed of twenty-five lay-members and six pastors, and elected by the people; and the pastors were chosen by the congregations. At the same time began that doctrinal difference to develop, which finally led to the formation of the Evangelical Society, and the foundation of a new theological school; for which see the articles on GAUSSEN, MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ, SOCIÉTÉ ÉVANGÉLIQUE, etc.

GENEVÈVE, St., b. 419 or 425, at Nanterre; d. in Paris, Jan. 3, 512; became the patroness of Paris by averting the attack of the Huns, under Attila, from that city by her prayers; built the first church over the tomb of St. Denis; and lies buried in the Church of St. Geneviève, in Paris, which, however, twice (in 1792 and in 1830) has been for a time transformed into a national pantheon. The earliest life of her, written shortly after her death, was published in Paris, in 1687, by Charpentier. See Act. Sanct., and BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, Jan. 3.

GENEVÈVE, Canons of St. (also called Canons of the Congregation of France), a congregation of regular canons founded in 1614 by Charles Faure, from the abbey of St. Vincent de Senlis, who, by the Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld, was called to Paris, and successfully carried through a reform of the abby of St. Geneviève there. A female community of the order (the Daughters of St. Geneviève, or the Miramions) was founded in 1636 by Francisca de Blosset, and in 1660 united to the congregation founded by Marie de Miramion. See Constitutiones Canonicarum regularium Congregationis Gallicane, Paris, 1676.

GENNADIUS MASSILIENSIS lived, according to notices drawn from his own works, in Gaul during the time of Bishop Gelasius of Rome (492-496) and the Byzantine Emperor Anastatius (491-518), and was a presbyter, not a bishop, at Marseilles. He understood Greek, was well versed both in Eastern and Western ecclesiastical literature, translated several Greek works into Latin, and wrote original works on all heresies, — against Nestorius, against Pelagius, — an Epistola de fide mea, and a catalogue of ecclesiastical authors (De viris illustribus), a continuation of Jerome's work on the same subject. Only the two last-mentioned works have come down to us. The former, if identical with the Liber de ecclesiasticis dogmatibus, seems to have undergone various extensions in the course of time. It was first printed among the works of Augustine, but separately edited by Elmenhorst (Hamburg, 1614) and by Oehler, in Corp. Herescol., I. The De viris illustribus is valuable, both on account of the vast reading on which it is based, and on account of its impartiality. It was first printed in connection with the work of Jerome, and then edited separately by Fuchte (Helmstädt, 1612) and by S. E. Cyprian (Jena, 1703). Both works are found in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Latin., vol. 58. The dogmatical stand-point of the author is one of Semi-Pelagianism, such as this view prevailed in Gaul, and more especially at Marseilles, at his time.

WAGENMANN.

GENNADIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople (1453-59), was one of the most prolific philosophical and theological writers of his age, and the last representative of Byzantine learning. Of his personal life very little is known. He seems to have been born in Constantinople about 1400. His true name was Georgios Scholarios. Having entered the court-service, he was made an imperial councillor, and accompanied in 1438 the Emperor Johannes to the Council of Ferrara-Florence. As a layman, he could not take part in the discussions of the council; but he presented to it three elaborate speeches in favor of the projected union between the Greek and Latin churches, and addressed also his own countrymen in a separate work on the subject. After his return to Greece, however, he entirely changed his views of the union, and became one of its most decided adversaries, speaking and writing against it with passionate obstinacy. This change also disturbed his relations with the emperor; and in 1448 he retired to the monastery of Pantokrator, and became a monk, though still continuing his literary activity. As Mohammed II., after the capture of Constantinople, demanded that the vacant patriarchal chair should be filled, Georgios Scholarios, who as a monk had assumed the name of Gennadius, was unanimously elected, and was duly installed by the Sultan, as had formerly been the patriarchs by the emperors. He presented to the Sultan a kind of confession or exposition of the Christian faith, written with admirable clearness and precision, translated into Turkish by Achmad, Judge of Bœrea, and first printed by A. Brassicanus, Vienna, 1530; and he later on followed up the subject by a more elaborate disquisition, in the form of a dialogue between a Turk and a Christian, first printed by A. Brassicanus, Vienna, 1539. He found, however, the position as patriarch under a Turkish sultan so irksome, that in 1459 he abdicated, and retired to the monastery of John the Baptist, near Serræ, in Macedonia, where he died at an unknown date. The number of his works amounts to about a hundred; but most of them still remain in manuscript, and for many of them grave questions have been raised concerning their authenticity and integrity. What has been printed is found in MIGNÉ: Patrologia Græca, vol. 160. See GASS: Gennadius und Pletho, Berl., 1844; [SCHAFF: Creeeds of Christendom, I. 46 sqq.].

WAGENMANN.

GENNES'ARET is the name of a lake of Palestine, also called the "Sea of Galilee;" of a plain along the north-western shore of the lake, generally called the "Land of Gennesaret;" and of a town situated in the plain. The name is Chinneroth, or Chinnereth, in the Old Testament (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xi. 2; 1 Kings xv. 20), and Gennesar in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xi. 67), but Gennesaret in the New Testament (Matt. ix. 1; Mark vi. 53; Luke v. 1-11). The town was still in existence in the beginning of the fourteenth century. For the lake and the land, see PALESTINE.

GENOUDE, Eugène de, b. at Montélimart, 1792; d. in the Îles d'Hyères, 1849; played a part in the re-action, political and religious, after the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814, by the side of Chateaubriand, De Maistre, Bonald, and Lamennais; edited various political papers; was ordained a priest in 1835; published a translation of the Bible and of Thomas à Kempis' Imitation of Christ; and wrote La raison du christianisme (Paris, 1834-35, evidences drawn from all sources to the truth of Christianity, a huge compilation in 12 vols.), Sermons (1846), L'histoire d'une âme, a kind of confession, etc. A biography of him was published at Paris by a former colleague in journalism.

GENTILIS, Giovanni Valentino, b. at Cosenza, in Calabria, about 1520; beheaded at Bern, Sept. 10, 1566. He embraced the Reformation, fled from Italy, and settled at Geneva. Remembering the fate of Servetus, he signed the confession of faith which the magistrates demanded every member of the Italian community at Geneva to subscribe to, but continued, nevertheless, to propagate his antitrinitarian views. He was cited before the magistrates, and sentenced to do public penance. Shortly after, he fled from Geneva, and went to Poland, but returned once more to Switzerland, was seized at Bern, imprisoned for heresy, and beheaded. An account of his trial was published by Benedict Aretius. See TRÜBSSEL: Die protest. Antitrinitarier, Heidelberg, 1839-44, vol. ii. pp. 516 sqq.

GENTILLET, Innocent, was b. at Vienne in Dauphiné, but fled to Geneva on account of the persecutions against the Reformed. In 1576 he returned to France, and was at one time president of the Parliament of Grenoble; but in 1585 he was again compelled to flee, and died at Geneva at an unknown date. He wrote Apologia pro christianis Gallis religionis evangelicæ (1578), which is considered the best apology for the Reformation ever written, and Le bureau du concile de Trente (1586), an irrefragable argument against the Council of Trent. Both works have often been reprinted.

GENTILLY, Council of (787), was one of those mixed synods, composed of bishops and barons, which were frequently held by the Frankish kings. The occasion was an embassy from the Byzantine emperor, Constantine Copronymus, to King Pepin; and the subjects treated were, no doubt, the questions of image-worship and the procession of the Holy Spirit. But the acts of the council have not come down to us.

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH, a famous English chronicler; b. at Monmouth early in the twelfth century; created Bishop of St. Asaph, 1152; d. 1154. His fame rests upon a history of early Britain, entitled Chronicon sive Historia Britonum. The work has been a mine from which later chroniclers drew, and poets down to Tennyson. The first printed edition appeared at Paris, 1568. An English translation by A. THOMPSON, Lond., 1718, has been revised by J. A. GILES, Lond., 1842. See WRIGHT: Essays on Archæol. Subjects, Lond., 1861 (vol. 1).

GEORGE, St., descended from a distinguished family in Cappadocia; entered the Roman army, and rose rapidly, but left it with open protest when the persecution of Diocletian began; and was beheaded at Nicomedia, April 23, 303. According to some he was the person mentioned in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VIII. 5), who tore down the imperial proclamation, and was punished by being roasted over a slow fire. The acts of his martyrdom are evidently spurious. Baronius thinks that the Arians falsified them. Many features of the legends about him, as, for instance, the slaying of the dragon, show a decidedly mythical character, and indicate that they originated as symbols. For these reasons the very existence of St. George has been impugned, as, for instance, by Calvin and by Pegge in the eighteenth century. Nevertheless, the worship of him is very old, both in the Eastern and in the Western Church. In the Eastern Church he is first mentioned in an inscription in a church at Ezr'a or Edhr'a in Southern Syria, copied by Burckhardt and Porter, and explained by Hogg, who fixes its date at 346. In the Western Church he is first mentioned in the decrees of the Council of Rome (494), which condemned his acts as corrupted by heretics, though vindicating his honor as a true martyr of the church. The worship of him, however, is not only old, it is also extensive; and the legends grew luxuriantly, absorbing, as it would seem, very different elements. The story of St. George and the dragon occurs for the first time in a fully-developed form in the Historia Lombardica, or "Golden Legend," by Jacob de Voragine, Archbishop of Geneva 1280. At that time his connection with England was already firmly established. According to William of Malmesbury (Gesta Reg. Angl., II.), he appeared in the battle of Antioch (June 28, 1089), and aided the Franks to overthrow the Saracens. The Normans under Robert, the son of William the Conqueror, then adopted him as their patron. As he continued to appear in aid of the Norman crusaders, a Council of Oxford (1222) made his day a festival throughout England; and after the battle of Calais (1349) he came to be considered the patron saint of the country, and the order of the garter is said by some to have been instituted (1350) under his patronage. See HEYLYN: History of St. George of Cappadocia, Lond., 1631; MILNER: Inquiry into the History of St. George, 1792; J. HOGG: Notes on St. George the Martyr, Lond., 1862.

GEORGE III., Prince of Anhalt; b. at Dessau, Aug. 13, 1507; d. there Oct. 17, 1553. He studied at Leipzig; was ordained a priest in 1524, and appointed provost of Magdeburg in 1526. He was at that time a true son of the Roman Church, and considered the Reformation a mere innovation. But he considered it necessary to make a thorough study of the Bible and the history of the Church in order to meet successfully the "Lutheran sectarians;" and the result of this study was his conversion. In 1530 he subscribed to the Augsburg Confession; and in 1534 the Lutheran Church was established in the principality of Anhalt. At the instance of Duke Maurice, Prince George assumed in 1544 the administration of the diocese of Merseburg; and in the following year he was consecrated bishop by Luther. During the Smalcaldian war he defended himself in Merseburg; but, after the establishment of the Leipzig Interim, he retired to Dessau. See O. G. SCHMIDT: Georg von Anhalt, in MEURER: Leben der Ältesten d. luth. Kirche, which also gives information about the writings of George III. G. PLITT.

GEORGE, Margrave of Brandenburg-Ansbach; b. at Onolzbach, March 4, 1484; d. there Dec. 17, 1543; embraced early the Reformation, and maintained very intimate relations with Luther. In 1527 he became sole ruler of the margraviate, and immediately introduced the new doctrine in the country; and perhaps no other German prince contributed more than he to the success of the Reformation, partly by the boldness with which he spoke its cause in the diets, partly by the energy with which he labored for it under all circumstances. See SCHULINUS: Leben und Geschichte des Marg. G., Francfort, 1729, and Luther's Briefe an Marg. G.

GEORGE OF POLENTZ, b. in Saxony, 1478; d. at Balga, near Königsberg, April 28, 1550; studied canon law in Italy; was for some time secretary to Julius II.; entered the service of Maximilian I., and became acquainted with Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg, grand master of the Teutonic Order in the imperial camp at Padua, 1509; was made a member of the order, and was in 1519 appointed Bishop of Sambia by the margrave. He was the first bishop who openly embraced the Reformation. In the summer of 1523 he allowed the evangelical doctrines to be preached in the Cathedral of Königsberg; in September, same year, he appointed Johannes Briesmann, a pupil of Luther, regular preacher at the cathedral; and Christmas Eve he publicly declared himself a convert. In 1525 the territory of the order was transformed into a dukedom; and Duke Albrecht charged the Bishop of Sambia with the organization of the Lutheran Church in his country. Shortly before his death the bishop retired from public life on account of ill health. His life has been written by GEORG VON POLENZ, Halle, 1858.

GEORGE, Duke of Saxony; b. at Dresden, Aug. 24, 1471; d. there April 17, 1539; was as a younger son destined for the church, and in 1484 made canon of Meissen. His older brothers died, however; and in 1500 he succeeded to the throne. His education, and a rivalry which sprung up between him, the representative of the Albertine line, and his cousins, the representatives of the Ernestine line, made him an adversary of the Reformation; and after the disputation of Leipzig (1519) he decided to do every thing in his power to keep it out of his own country. But he labored in vain. Luther's translation of the Bible was the favorite reading of his subjects, the clergy of his country married, his own family embraced the evangelical doctrines, and he was left alone in utter lonesomeness. See SCHULZE: Georg und Luther, 1834.

GEORGE OF TREBIZOND, b. in Creta, 1396; d. at Naples, 1486; took his surname, not from his native island, but from the city of his ancestors; came in 1420 to Venice; taught rhetoric and grammar in Rome, but lost the favor of Nicholas V. by his ill-natured polemics against Bessarion, Pletho, and the Platonic school, and was rescued from starvation only by a small pension from King Alphonse. His two essays against the Greek Church are found in LEO ALLATIUS: Græcia Orthodoxa, Rome, 1652. His translations of Plato and Eusebius are inaccurate and unreliable.

GEORGE OF CAPPADOCIA, likewise called George the Fuller, was appointed Bishop of Alexandria in 356, after the banishment of Athanasius, and entered the city at the head of a military force. In 361 he was most savagely massacred by the Pagans. He was a rank Arian, a grasping and peremptory nature, a character by no means without blemish; but the picture which the orthodox writers give of him is very exaggerated, and sometimes even self-contradictory.

GEORGE THE PISIDIAN lived in the middle of the seventh century, and was a deacon at the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople. He wrote a number of long poems of historical, philosophical, and religious contents; but, though he was much appreciated by the later Byzantine writers, most of his productions remain in manuscript. The Hexæmeron and De vanitate vitæ were published, with a Latin translation, by Morel, Paris, 1584, and are found in Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1654, vol. XIV.

GEORGIAN VERSIONS. See BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 286.

GEORGIUS, Bishop of Laodicea in Phrygia, was born at Alexandria, and received orders there. In the controversy between Bishop Alexander of Alexandria and the Arians he tried to mediate, but was excommunicated by Alexander for Arianism. Made Bishop of Laodicea by the Arians, he could not agree with them, either, and became, together with Bishop Basil of Ancyra, founder of the Semi-Arian party. Under Constantius the doctrine of the Semi-Arians became the theology of the court; and when the third synod of Sirmium (358) confirmed this doctrine and the anathemas of the synod of Ancyra, the breach between the Arians and the Semi-Arians became complete. Among the works of Georgius are mentioned a life of Eusebius of Emesa, and an essay against the Manichæans.

GEORGIUS SYNCELLUS received his surname from his position as syncellus, or privy councillor, to Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the middle of the eighth century. He wrote a Chronographia, extending from Adam to the time of Diocletian, and valuable especially on account of the frequent extracts it gives from other writers. It was first edited by Goar, Paris, 1652, best by Dindorf, 1829, 2 vols.

GERBERON, Gabriel, b. at St. Calais, between Angers and Chartres, Aug. 12, 1628; d. at St. Denis, March 29, 1711; entered the congregation of St. Maur in 1649, and became not only one of the most prolific writers of that order (his works numbering a hundred and eleven), but also one of the most remarkable representatives of its critical tendency. He taught philosophy and theology in various schools, after 1675, at Corbie near Amiens. While there he published (in 1676, at Brussels) his Miroir de la piété chrétienne, which by several archbishops was considered a revival of the five condemned propositions of Jansen. On the instigation of the Jesuits an order was issued for his imprisonment; but he fled, first to the Netherlands, afterwards to Brussels, where he edited the works of Bajus, and Jansen's letters to St. Cyran. He was discovered, however, in 1703, and imprisoned in the citadel of Amiens till 1707, when he was brought to St. Denis, after having been compelled to recant, and sign the condemnation of the five propositions of Jansen. But he never yielded completely. Shortly before his death he dictated Le vain triomphe des Jésuites, whose publication was prevented, however, by his superiors.

GERBERT, Martin, b. at Horb, on the Neckar, Aug. 13, 1720; d. at Sanct Blasien, in the Black Forest, May 3, 1793; was educated in the Jesuit academy of Freiburg; entered the monastery of Sanct Blasien in 1737; was ordained priest in 1744, and elected abbot in 1764. From 1759 to 1762 he travelled in Germany, France, and Italy, and published a Latin description of his voyage, afterwards translated into German. He was a learned historian, and wrote, among other works, a Historia nigra sylvæ O. S. B., Cologne, 1783-88. But his specialty was sacred music, its history and theory: De cantu et musica sacra (2 vols., 1774); Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra (3 vols., 1784). He was a friend of Gluck.

GERDES, Daniel, b. at Bremen, April 19, 1698; d. at Gröningen, Feb. 11, 1765; studied at Utrecht; was appointed professor of theology at Duisburg 1726, and at Gröningen 1735. His principal work is his history of the Reformation.—Historia Reformationis, 4 vols., Gröningen, 1744-52. He wrote also specially about the Reformation in Italy, in the diocese of Salzburg, etc.

GERGESA. See GAD'ARA.

GERHARD, Johann, b. at Quedlinburg, Oct. 17, 1582; d. at Jena, Aug. 20, 1637; studied, first medicine at Wittenberg, then theology at Jena and Marburg; was appointed superintendent of Heldburg in 1606, but removed in 1615 to Jena as professor of theology. He was one of the heroes of Lutheran orthodoxy, unquestionably the most learned, and, among the scholars of his age, certainly the most amiable. It is especially as a dogmatist and by his two works, Doctrina catholica et evangelica (1634, 3 vols.) and Loci communes theologici (Jena, 1610-22, 9 vols., modern edition, Leipzig, 1863-76, 10 vols.), that he gained his great fame. The progress he made beyond his predecessors Chemnitz and Hutter consists partly in a more perfect systematization, partly in deeper and more speculative argumentation of the dogmas, but especially in the completeness and comprehensiveness of the treatment. Of his exegetical works, which are distinguished by their patristic learning, his Comm. in Harmoniam hist. ev. de passione et resurrectione Christi (1617) is the most important. His commentaries on the Old Testament, published after his death, are not so much read. Of his devotional books his Meditationes Sacræ appeared in 1606, and have been often reprinted and translated [3d ed. of German trans., Leipzig, 1876]; while his Schola Pietatis has fallen into oblivion. His Enchiridion Consolatorium was re-edited and translated into German by C. I. Böttcher, 1877. See E. R. FISCHER: Vita J. Gerhardi, Gotha, 1723.

GERHARD, St., b. at Staves (Stablecellä), in the diocese of Namur, 890; d. in the monastery of Brogne (Bronium), Oct. 3, 959; retired early from the gay service of the Count of Namur, on account of a vision which came to him in a dream; and, having built a new church and a monastery at Brogne (918), he entered the monastery of St. Denis, and became a monk. Ordained a presbyter in 928, he returned to Brogne, and spent the rest of his life in reforming monasteries. He was canonized by Innocent II. See Act. Sanct., Oct. 3, and P. GÜNTHER, Das Leben d. h. Gerhard de Brogne, Halle, 1877.

GERHARDT, Paul, b. at Gräfenhainichen, in the electorate of Saxony, March 12, 1607; d. at Lübben, June 7, 1676. He studied at Wittenberg; was made preacher at Mittenwalde in 1651, and at the Church of St. Nicolai, in Berlin, in 1657, but was dismissed in 1666, because he refused to subscribe to the edicts of June 2, 1662, and Sept. 16, 1664, considering them as attempts to unite the Lutheran and the Reformed churches. In 1667, however, he was made Archdeacon of Lübben. He is generally considered as the greatest hymn-writer Germany has produced. In his sweet songs, Christianity does not appear as something opposed to or in conflict with human nature, but, on the contrary, as the strongest, soundest, purest, and truest form of humanity. His form is often artistically perfect; and yet the expression comes so naturally, and the rhythm flows so easily, that his verses remain in the memory after the first hearing. The first collection of his hymns are those by Crüger (in his Praxis Pietatis Melica, 1648) and J. G. Ebeling (Berlin, 1666); the last and best those by Wackernagel (Stuttgart, 1843, last edition, Güterslohe, 1876) and C. F. Becker (Leipzig, 1851). These last-mentioned collections also contain good biographies of him. [See also editions by Karl Gödecke (Leipzig, 1877) and Karl Gerok (Stuttgart, 1878)], and Lives by WILDENHAHN

(Basel, 1844, 4th ed., 1877, 2 vols. [Eng. trans., Phila., 1881]), and by an anonymous writer (Hanover, 1876), and E. E. KOCH: Geschichte d. Kirchl. Lieders, Stuttgart, 3d ed., 1867, vol. iii. pp. 297-327.

[Many of Gerhardt's hymns have been incorporated in our collections of hymns or of devotional poetry; and one of them, O sacred Head, now wounded, is very widely known and frequently sung. Other familiar ones begin, Oh! how shall I receive thee; Commit thou all thy griefs, and Give to the winds thy fears. More than thirty of his hundred and twenty-three hymns are classical. His English translators include Rev. John Wesley, Miss C. Winkworth, Rev. Dr. James W. Alexander, and John Kelly. The latter has furnished a complete translation, Paul Gerhardt's Spiritual Songs, London, 1867.] PALMER.

GERHOCH, b. at Polling, in Bavaria, towards the end of the eleventh century; d. at Reichersberg, near Passau, 1169; frequented the schools of his native town, Mosburg, Freysing, and Hildesheim, and was appointed canon of Augsburg, and magister scholarum, but left this position, disgusted at the irregularities of the lives of the canons. He did not find the state of affairs better at Raitenbuch, whither he moved, and went to Rome, where Honorius II. officially charged him (1125) with the reform of the canonry. He had no opportunity, however, to try his own strength as a reformer as yet. In 1126 he entered the service of Bishop Kuno of Regensburg, and was ordained priest. But in 1132 Archbishop Conrad I. of Salzburg placed him at the head of the canonry of Reichersberg, and there he spent the rest of his life, an active and rigorous Reformer. As a writer he was strongly opposed to scholasticism, and accused even Peter Lombard of heresy. A list of his works he gives himself, in his Commentary on the Psalms; which work has been printed by B. Pez, in Thesaurus anecdotorum, 1728. Others of his writings have been edited by Scheibelberger, Vienna, 1871 and 1876. [See H. F. A. NOBBE: Gerhoch v. Reichersberg, Leipzig, 1881.] ALBRECHT VOGEL.

GER'IZIM, a mountain of Ephraim, opposite Ebal, with Shechem in the intervening valley; was one of the mountains on which Israel stood pronouncing blessings and curses (Deut. xi. 29; Josh. viii. 30-35). (See EBAL.) It is 2,895 feet above the level of the sea, and 800 feet above the bottom of the valley. It was the scene of the parable of the trees and the brambles (Judg. ix. 7-21), and the site of the Samaritan temple referred to by the woman at the well (John iv. 20). Samaritan tradition points it out as the place where Abraham offered Isaac; and the remnant of the Samaritan sect living at Nablus (Shechem) still performs the annual paschal sacrifices on its top according to the prescriptions of Exod. xii.

GERLACH, Otto von, b. in Berlin, April 12, 1801; d. there Oct. 24, 1849. He studied, first law at Heidelberg and Göttingen, then theology in his native city, and was appointed preacher at the Elizabeth Church there in 1834, and court chaplain in 1847. He and his equally distinguished brothers (Ludwig von Gerlach, a statesman, and Gen. von Gerlach, an aide-de-camp of King Frederick William IV.) were closely associated with Hengstenberg in the revival of orthodoxy and piety in Prussia. He translated Awake, thou that sleepest (by Wesley), the Reformed Pastor (by Baxter), and the Charity and the Church (by Chalmers), and wrote a very useful popular commentary on the Bible, of which a collected edition appeared in Berlin, 1847-53, 6 vols. RUD. KÖGEL.

GERLE, Christophe Antoine, b. in Auvergne, 1740; entered the order of the Carthusians; became prior of the convent of Port-Sainte-Marie; sat in the assembly of the States-generals (1789); became a follower of Robespierre, but was not beheaded after his fall. More remarkable, however, than his political career, was the part he played among the adherents of Catherine Théot, the old woman who pretended that she was about to bear the Word, etc. He occupies a prominent place in David's picture, Le Serment du Jeu de Paume. The date of his death is unknown. See MICHELET: Hist. de la Revolution française, vol. vii.

GERMAIN D'AUXERRE, St., b. at Auxerre, 380; d. at Ravenna, July 31, 448; was forced by the people of his native city to accept the nomination for bishop in 418; adopted immediately after the most rigorous ascetic practices; visited England in 429 to aid the orthodox against the Pelagians; and went in the year of his death to Ravenna to interfere in favor of the Armoricans. He enjoyed a great fame during his lifetime, and is still much revered in France. See Act. Sanct., July 31. G. PLITT.

GERMAIN DE PARIS, St., b. at Autun, 496; d. in Paris, May 28, 576; was made Abbot of St. Symphorian, near Autun, in 540, and Bishop of Paris in 550. He vindicated his episcopal authority with great intrepidity in this the worst period of Merovingian rule, and was greatly revered by the people. His life was written by his contemporary, Fortunatus Venantius. See Act. Sanct., May 28. G. PLITT.

GERMAN CATHOLICS (Deutsch Katholiken). Oct. 15, 1844, there appeared in the Sächsische Vaterlandsblätter an article in which the Bishop of Treves was openly accused of seducing his flock to idolatry by his exhibition of the holy coat; and an appeal was made to the lower clergy to leave a church in which such a thing could be done. The author of the article was an entirely obscure person, one Johannes Ronge, a Roman-Catholic priest, formerly a chaplain at Grottkau, in the county of Neisse, Saxony, but suspended on account of a previous article in the same paper, and now living at Lanrahütte, near the Polish frontier, teaching a children's school in a Protestant neighborhood. But the effect of the article was like that of a spark in a powder-mine. Fifty thousand copies of the article were immediately sold, and tokens of sympathy of every kind and description showered down upon the author.

Ronge's appeal of separation had already been anticipated and carried into effect in another place. At Schneidemühl, a small town on the northern frontier of Posen, one Czersky had formed a community, which on Oct. 19, 1844, broke off from the Roman Church, and constituted itself as an independent congregation, under the name of Christ Catholics, and with Czersky for their pastor. To lead these two currents into one common stream was a problem of the greatest importance, but not without peculiar difficulties.

The Christ Catholics rejected the celibacy of the clergy, the use of the Latin language in divine service, the doctrines of purgatory, transubstantiation, etc.; but they retained the seven sacraments, the Nicene Creed, etc. The German Catholics, who had formed their first independent congregation at Breslau, March 9, 1845, with Ronge as their pastor, went much farther in their deviation from Romanism, and had, for instance, made considerable changes in the Nicene Creed. A common council was held at Leipzig, Easter, 1845, and delegates were present from twenty-seven congregations. But at the council it soon became evident that the watch-cry of secession, "Away from Rome," was about the only thing common to all the seceders; and it was only by the highest degree of reciprocal forbearance that a very vague and very weak confession was agreed upon. The divinity of Christ was passed by in silence in this confession.

The work of the council was not received with enthusiasm by the constituencies. The congregation in Berlin protested against the rejection of the Apostolical Creed, dissolved its connection with the movement, and established itself as an independent congregation, July 15, 1846, under the name of Protest Catholics. The congregation of Schneidemühl was equally dissatisfied, but continued in outward communication with Ronge, on account of the weakness and timidity of its leader, Czersky. In other places the complaints went in the opposite direction. No confession was wanted at all; dogma in any form or shape should be avoided as a mere clog on the free movement of the church; irreligious and anti-Christian tendencies became apparent. From that moment, people of distinction and ability began to keep aloof from the affair, while recruits were enlisted from the ranks of the social and political radicals. The state-governments, having watched the movement all along with distrust and suspicion, now adopted energetic measures against it. Austria and Bavaria excluded the German Catholics altogether from their territories; Prussia, Saxony, and Baden, admitted them, but on conditions. This state of affairs was, of course, changed in 1848, and all interference from the side of the State ceased. But the impulse had already spent its force. In 1848 the German Catholics numbered about sixty thousand: in 1858 there were only about one hundred congregations still alive. In some districts they united with the Protestant free congregations; in others they clubbed together, even with the Reform Jews.

GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH. See REFORMED CHURCH, GERMAN.

GERMAN TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE. Many centuries elapsed after the Gothic version of Ulfilas, who d. in 381 (see BIBLE TRANSLATIONS), before the Bible was translated into High-German. In the eighth century the church began to put the German to use. (See R. v. Raumer, D. Einwirkung d. Christenth. auf d. althochd.

Sprache, Stuttgart, 1845.) In the manuscripts of that time there are many glosses in German; and German translations of single books of the Bible were attempted. Of the latter, there are preserved fragments of Matthew (eighth century, ed. Massmann, 1841), a translation of the harmony of the Gospels of Ammonius Alex. (ninth century, ed. Schmeller, Vienna, 1841), and a version of the Psalms in Low-German (ninth century, ed. Hagen, Breslau, 1816). A translation of the Psalms, with commentary, by Notker Labeo, who d. 1022 (ed. Heinzl u. Scherer, Strassburg, 1876), and of the Song of Solomon, by Willeram, Abbot at Ebersburg, Bavaria (ed. Hoffmann, Breslau, 1827), have also come down to us. In the centuries immediately following, the interest in the vernacular translation decreased, and the reading of the vernacular Scriptures was forbidden by the ecclesiastical authorities. (See Hegelmaier, Gesch. d. Bibelverbots, Ulm, 1783.)

The exact date of the translation of the whole German Bible cannot be ascertained; but it is certain that one was in existence at the beginning of the fifteenth century. Among the first publications of the printing-press were copies of it. Fourteen editions appeared before 1518, — at Mainz (by Fust and Schoeffer), 1462(?); Strassburg, 1466(?), 1485; Augsburg, 1470(?), 1475(?), 1477, 1478, 1480, 1487, 1490, 1507, 1518; and Nürnberg, 1470 (or Basel?), 1483. Four complete editions, but based upon the former, appeared in Low-German, — two at Cologne about 1480, one at Lübeck 1494, and one at Halberstadt 1522. In the two first the Song of Solomon is given in Latin to avoid any scandal among the young. This translation was made exclusively from the Vulgate, which in some instances was grossly misunderstood. It was quite literal, and made use of an older translation, of which we know nothing. The editions were small, and were not circulated among the people.

The great translator of the German Bible was Martin Luther. About the same time that he began the work of translation, others were engaged in the labor. Among them were Böschenstein (seven Psalms, and Ruth), Lange of Erfurt (Matthew, Mark, and Luke), Krumpach of Querfurt (John, Epistles of Peter, and the Pastoral Epistles), etc. Luther, who translated "not for scholars, but for the people," put forth in 1517 a version of the seven Penitential Psalms, with commentary, and before 1521 the Lord's Prayer, the prayer of Manasseh, the Ten Commandments, the Magnificat, etc. These were repeatedly reprinted. It was in the latter part of 1521 that he conceived the plan of translating the whole Bible into German, from the original languages. The year of his confinement at the Wartburg he spent upon the New Testament, which was printed, but without the name either of the printer or translator. Nor was the date given; but we know it was the year 1522, for a second edition, dated, appeared the same year. Luther at once began work on the Old Testament, which appeared in parts, — in 1523, part I. (Pentateuch); 1524, parts II. and III. (historical books and Hagiographa); 1526, Jonah and Habakkuk; 1528, Zechariah and Isaiah; 1530, Daniel; and in 1532 the remainder of the Prophets. The Apocrypha complete, "that is, books which are not of equal authority with the Holy Scriptures, but which it is useful and good to read," were first published in 1534. In subsequent editions Luther made many improvements in his version. The translation of the Psalms was much altered; so that he himself, in comparing the edition of 1531 with that of 1524, says the latter is nearer the Hebrew, the former the German. This is true of the version as a whole.

Luther lived to see ten original editions of his Bible, and, in order to make the work as perfect as possible, formed a committee on translation (collegium biblicum), consisting of Melancthon, Bugenhagen, Jonas, Cruciger, Aurogallus, and Rorarius, which met in his rooms one evening every week, for consultation. With the edition of 1544, 1545, Luther's work of emending came to an end.

Luther's Bible had a very extensive circulation. Between 1522 and 1533 it is almost certain that there were sixteen original editions of the New Testament; and the reprints amounted to fifty-four (fourteen in Augsburg, thirteen in Strassburg, twelve in Basel, etc.). Luther complained of the reprints; and in the edition of 1530, opposite the titlepage, is a warning against them as "careless and faulty" (unvleissig und falsch), and an appeal to others who wanted a German Testament "to make one of their own." Many changes were introduced into these reprints. The Old Testament was also frequently reprinted, — the Pentateuch twenty-two times (seven in Wittenberg), the historical books nineteen times, and the prophetic books fourteen times. Single books were also reprinted. The Psalter went through seventeen editions. Before the completion of Luther's Bible, in 1534, editions had appeared with all the books, — four such in Zürich between 1525 and 1531, one in Worms 1530, two in Strassburg 1530, and one in Frankfurt 1534. These were made up of Luther's translation, so far as it went, and the missing books supplied by Haetzer (on the prophets), Leo Judeus (on the Apocrypha), and others. The four last of these editions also contained the Epistle to the Laodiceans in the old German translation.

Luther translated directly from the original, using for the Old Testament the edition of Brescia, 1494, and for the New Testament the Erasmus text of the edition of 1519. Although he was not the best philological scholar of his day, he was sufficient of a scholar to be independent; and what he lacked in philological penetration he made up by his accurate exegetical intuition, and by his spiritual understanding of the Bible. There are mistakes, especially in the harder passages of Job and the Prophets; but as a whole his translations are accurate. In the Apocrypha he was not so careful, and translated from the Vulgate. So far as the German itself is concerned, Luther was eminently fitted for his task. He was a German through and through, and possessed to a remarkable degree the gift of strong and pithy speech. He avoided being a "literalist" (Buchstablist), and sought to "give the pure and clear German." His danger was to be too free; but his reverence for the letter of Scripture kept him from serious errors in this direction. Yet he does not at times shrink from adding to the text where he thinks the truth demands emphasis, as in Rom. iii. 28, where he adds alone, — "A man is justified by faith alone" (allein durch den Glauben). The language is clear, vivid and forcible, rich and melodious, noble and chaste. Often he sought diligently for the proper word. "We," he says, "that is, Melancthon, Aurogallus, and I, are working on Job, but so that sometimes we have been hardly able to finish three lines in four days."

Not only did Luther's Bible have an immense influence in extending the Reformation. It was a national work, and fixed the German language, making High-German the common dialect. Within a hundred years, through its influence, it had come into general use in the churches and schools, and Low-German had degenerated into the patois. But there were not wanting violent attacks upon it. One of his critics, Emser, in his Auss was grund und ursach Luther's dohmatschung dem gemeinen man billich verboten worden sey, Leipzig, 1523 ("For what cause and reason Luther's translation has been properly forbidden to the common people"), pronounced it to be full of heretical errors and lies. Wicelius (Annotationes, Leipzig, 1536) followed substantially in the same line, and the Roman Catholics (Traub 1578, Zanger 1605, etc.) Luther and his friends took little notice of these criticisms.

Luther's translation has never been regarded by the Lutheran Church as unsusceptible of improvement. Its need of revision cannot be questioned; but any revision must be accomplished in the spirit of Luther. Private revisions have been made by J. F. v. Meyer (3d ed., Frankfurt, 1855, revised by Stier, Bielef., 3d ed., 1867), Kraus (Tübingen, 1830), and Hopf (3d ed., Leipzig, 1854). The variations in the text of Luther finally led to a movement towards revision. It started at the meetings of the church diet at Stuttgart 1857, and Hamburg 1858; and in 1863 the meeting at Eisenach, at the advice of the church council (Oberkirchenrath) of Berlin, appointed a revision commission. They performed their labors, but did not attempt a thorough revision. The New Testament appeared at Halle, 1867.

The Roman Catholics could not remain idle spectators of the wonderful success of Luther's Bible. Beringer put forth an edition of Luther, with only a few changes (Speier, 1526), but was followed by Hieronymus Emser, "the scribbler of Dresden" (d. Sudler in Dresden), with a more extensively emended text (Dresden, 1527). It was often reprinted. Johann Eck also put forth a Bible (Ingolstadt, 1537), but it proved a failure. The New Testament was taken from Emser, and the Old Testament was a reprint of the pre-Luther version. Eck's German is beneath criticism. In 1534 appeared at Mainz the Bible of the Dominican Dr. Dietenberger, which is also not an original translation. It was afterwards revised by Ulenberg (Cologne, 1630) and the theologians of Mainz (Cologne, 1662), and has since, under the title Catholic Bible, been used by the German Catholics.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries new translations or revisions were attempted. Of these the best was the Belenburg Bible (1726-42). One of the best translations is that of De Wette (Heidelberg, 1809-14, 4th ed., 1858), who for a time had the co-operation of Augusti. He combined extraordinary skill of brief and pungent expression with exegetical tact. Of the translations of parts of the Old Testament, the Prophetic Books of Ewald (Stuttgart, 1840) and Hitzig (Leipzig, 1854), and the Poetical Books of Ewald (Göttingen, 1835) and E. Meier (Stuttgart, 1854), deserve special mention. Of the New Testament many translations have appeared. Some of those of the neological school of the last century are curiosities; for example, that of Bahrdt (Riga, 1773), who renders Matt. v. 4, "Blessed are they who prefer the sweet sorrows (d. süssen Melancholieen) of virtue to the intoxicating pleasures of vice; for they shall be abundantly comforted." Among the best of the translations of this century is that of Weizsäcker (Tübingen, 1875).

GERMANY, meaning the German Empire (constituted in 1871, after the brilliant victory over France), comprises an area of 208,000 square miles, with 42,727,360 inhabitants (according to the census of 1875), of whom 26,718,823 are Protestants, 15,371,227 Roman Catholics, 520,575 Jews, 100,608 Dissenters, and 16,127 of no religion stated. Thus about two-thirds (a little less) of the population of Germany are Protestant, and one-third (a little more) is Roman Catholic; and the relation between the two denominations was nearly the same two centuries ago, at the end of the Thirty-Years' War, in 1648. The Protestants have increased a little faster than the Roman Catholics; not on account of conversions, however, but because the population increases at a somewhat higher rate in the Protestant regions.

The location of the two denominations is also nearly the same now as two centuries ago. In Southern Germany the Roman Church prevails; in Northern, the Evangelical. Bavaria, Baden, and Alsace-Lorraine are predominantly Roman Catholic; Schleswig-Holstein, Mecklenburg, Hanover, Brandenburg, and Saxony are almost wholly Protestant.

In the Protestant Church attempts have been made to unite the Reformed and the Lutheran; and such a union was actually established in Prussia and Nassau 1817, in the Palatinate 1818, and in Baden 1822. Nevertheless, when, in 1866, Prussia annexed Hanover and Schleswig-Holstein, whose inhabitants are Lutheran, and Hesse, whose inhabitants are Reformed, the union was not introduced in those countries. The government of the Evangelical State Church of Prussia is consistorial: at the head of the whole church stands an ecclesiastical council (Oberkirchenrath), of each province a superintendent-general with a consistorial board, of each diocese a superintendent, of each parish a minister.

The Roman Church has six archbishoprics, — Breslau, Gnesen-Posen, Cologne, Freiburg, München-Freising, and Bamberg; and eighteen bishoprics, Ermeland, Kulm, Fulda, Hildesheim, Osnabrück, Paderborn, Münster, Limburg, Treves, Metz, Strassburg, Spire, Würzburg, Ratisbon, Passau, Eichstädt, Augsburg, and Rottenburg. An apostolic vicar resides in Dresden. The Jesuits were expelled in 1874. After the promulgation of the dogma of papal infallibility in 1871, the secession of the Old Catholics (see art.) took place. In 1878 they numbered about fifty-two thousand, divided into a hundred and twenty-two congregations. See Bühler, Der Altkatholicismus, Leiden, 1880, p. 49.

For further statistical details, and for the history of the Church in Germany, see the articles on the separate states (Bavaria, etc.), on the ancient tribes (Alemanni, Saxons, etc.), on the special periods, places, and sects (the Reformation, Cologne, Anabaptists, etc.) and, finally, biographies.

The German Empire is, like the government of the United States, a purely political union of the different German states, and has, as such, nothing to do with religion, which is left to the several states. But the emperor of Germany, who is at the same time king of Prussia, is at the head of the Evangelical Church of Prussia.

GERSON, Jean Charlier, a distinguished theologian, and one of the founders of Gallicanism, known as the Doctor Christianissimus ("Most Christian Doctor"); b. in the village of Gerson, in the diocese of Rheims, Dec. 14, 1363; d. at Lyons, July 12, 1429. His parents were peasants; his mother, according to his own statement, a "second Monica." In 1377 he entered the College of Navarre, Paris, and began, five years later, the study of theology, under Peter D'Ailli and Gilles des Champs. By 1387 he had attained so considerable a reputation as to be chosen by the university one of its representatives to plead before Pope Clement VII. for a sentence against the Dominican, John of Montson, who denied the immaculate conception of the Virgin. In 1392 he succeeded D'Ailli as chancellor of the University of Paris, then in the zenith of its fame. As a theologian, Gerson revolted against scholasticism, and in his many theological tracts uttered his voice against its untenable and useless subtleties. In his De Ref. Theol. ("The Reformation of Theology," 1400) he urged the study of the Bible and the Fathers. A nominalist in philosophy, he adopted a mystical type of theology. It was, however, not the German mysticism of the fourteenth century, which sought to lose the identity of the individual by a bold flight of the intellect in the Deity, and revelled in fanciful religious emotions. Following Hugo and Richard de St. Victor, he turned the gaze of the soul inward upon its own states, and sought in this way to derive a theory of its laws. He constructed a system consisting of two parts, — De Mys. Theol. Spec. ("Speculative Mysticism") and De Mys. Theol. Pract. ("Practical Mysticism"). The former is devoted principally to the discussion of questions in psychology, under the heads of vis cognitiva ("the intellect") and effectiva ("will and emotions"). Mystical theology is defined to be a theology of love. Love is the experimental apprehension of God (Experiment. Dei perceptio), and through the instrumentality of love the will becomes submissive to God's will, and lost in it. Among his many treatises on the mystical life, perhaps the most important is the De Monte Contemplat. ("The Mount of Contemplation").

But Gerson's main activity was his attempt to bring order and peace out of the ecclesiastical confusion of his day, and to define the relation of the Church to the Pope. In this latter regard he is the founder of Gallicanism, and the forerunner of Bossuet. The papal schism at one time oppressed him to such a degree, and attempts to heal it seemed to be so hopeless, that he retired from the office of chancellor and public life, and was only induced to return to Paris after five years of seclusion, about the time of the flight of Pope Benedict XIII. (1403). Gerson again devoted himself, by tracts and personal addresses before Benedict, to the task of healing the schism, and securing his submission to the laws of the Church. To his other labors he added those of preacher in 1408 as canon of one of the churches of Paris. At the Council of Pisa (1409) he and D'Ailli exerted a preponderant influence. Here, as well as at the Council of Constance (1414-18), he acted upon the principles laid down in some of his tracts, — that oecumenical councils are independent of the Pope, of superior authority, and may accuse and depose popes. He advised that the two rival popes should be cited before the body; but, as they refused to appear, the council deposed them both. In 1410 his work, De Modis Uniendi ac Ref. Eccles. in Conc. Gen. ("The Union and Reformation of the Church by a General Council"), appeared, in which are affirmed the superiority of the Church over the Pope, and the right, in case of his refusal, of the State or the Bishops to convene general councils. The Pope is indeed the vicar of Christ, but peccator et peccabilis ("a sinner, and liable to sin"), like all other Christians. At Constance, Gerson headed the French deputation. In an oration of great power he called upon the body to exercise its rightful authority as superior to the Pope. In his De Auferibilitate Papæ ab Ecclesia, written during the sessions, after re-asserting the authority of councils, he claims, that in matters of doctrine, as well as in other matters, appeal could be made to it, as the Pope was not infallible. A stain rests upon Gerson's record in the part he took in the condemnation of John Hus at this council. He was an active prosecutor, and presented the nineteen heretical propositions extracted from Hus's work. After the adjournment, he was precluded from returning to France by the bitter hostility of the Duke of Burgundy, and took refuge in Bavaria. He still continued active in authorship, and was called to the newly founded university in Vienna, but declined to go. At the death of the Duke of Burgundy (1419) he returned to his native land, and spent the last ten years of his life in Lyons. A gray-haired man, he devoted himself to the instruction of children, and, as his end approached, gathered them about him once again, that he might pray with them.

GERTRUDE is the name of several saintly women known to mediæval church-history, of which the most noticeable are, — St. Gertrude, also called "The Great Gertrude;" b. at Eisleben, Jan. 6, 1256. She entered the monastery of Helfta when she was only five years old, and studied the liberal arts with great eagerness. But Jan. 21, 1281, she had a vision which led her to the study of the Bible and the Fathers. She had afterwards many more visions, of which a kind of report has been given in the Insinuationes divine pietatis, first printed in 1662, and afterwards often reprinted. — St. Gertrudis, a daughter of Pippin of Landen (major domus to Clothaire II.) and Itta. After the death of Pippin, in 639, Itta built a large double monastery for male and female recluses at Niviale, the present Nivelles, and made her daughter abbess of it. St. Gertrudis died in 659 or 664, and is still honored in Flanders as the patroness of cats, travellers, and pilgrims. She is represented with rats and mice at her feet, or running up her pastoral staff, or on her dress. See Act. Sanct., March 17.

GERVAISE, François Armand, b. at Paris, 1660; d. there 1751; entered the order of the Barefooted Carmelites, but left them, not finding their rules severe enough, and joined the Trappists in 1695. In the following year he was made Abbot of La Trappe, but resigned in 1698. He was a prolific writer. Of his works the most noticeable is the Histoire générale de la réforme de l'ordre de Cîteaux en France, Avignon, 1746, which is a sharp attack on the Benedictines, and was much resented by them.

GERVASIUS and PROTASIUS, two brethren who were martyred at Ravenna during the reign of Nero, and then entirely forgotten until a vision revealed to St. Ambrose the whereabouts of their remains. This vision and the miracles which the relics immediately performed were used as proofs of orthodoxy by St. Ambrose in his contest with the Arians; but the latter had good reason to doubt, and instituted a line of criticism, which, in spite of the emphatic assertions of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, has found its followers down to our times. See Mosheim, Gibbon, Isaac Taylor (Ancient Christianity), and others. The fanciful legends of the two martyrs are found Act. Sanct., June 19.

GESENIUS, Justus, a Lutheran theologian; b. July 6, 1601, at Essbach; d. at Hanover, Sept. 18, 1673. He was court-preacher at Hanover. In 1648 (or 1647) he edited a hymn-book with Denicke, and was the first to change the text of German hymns. (See HYMNOLOGY.) He was the author of some hymns, one of which (Wenn meine Sünd'n mich kränken) is popular in Germany.

GESENIUS, Wilhelm, a celebrated Hebrew scholar; b. in Nordhausen, Feb. 3, 1785; d. at Halle, Oct. 23, 1842. He was educated at Helmstädt and Göttingen, where he received in Eichhorn's class-room the impulse to critical and philological studies. His public life began as docent at Göttingen, and in subsequent years he took pleasure in relating that Neander had been his first student in Hebrew. In 1810 he was called to Halle, where he continued during the remainder of his life, in spite of an invitation to become Eichhorn's successor at Göttingen. His lectures were very popular, more than four hundred students at one period crowding to hear them. He made two visits to England (1820, 1835) in the interest of his Oriental studies.

Gesenius' Hebrew Lexicon appeared in two volumes (1810-12). His Hebrew Thesaurus (3 vols.) began to be printed 1826, but was not finished till after his death, under the editorship of his pupil Rödiger. This great work is indeed a storehouse full of the richest materials in the department of the Hebrew of the Old Testament; but it is to be regretted, that, with his thorough Semitic erudition, he did not include the forms of post-biblical Hebrew. His Grammar appeared in 1813, his Gesch. d. heb. Sprache u. Schrift, 1815, and his Lehrgebäude d. heb. Sprache, 1817. These grammatical labors did not meet with the same general favor as the lexicographical. This was due both to the appearance of other works in this special line, and to the fact that the author did not pursue a strict and philosophical method in his treatment. In 1821 his Commentary on Isaiah appeared in three volumes. This was just at the close of the period during which the rationalistic mode of exposition had absolute sway. The work deserves to be regarded as one of the best products of that school, being distinguished for philological thoroughness, lucid presentation, and acquaintance with historical criticism, as well as for freedom from dogmatic and apologetic prepossessions. Gesenius belonged to the rationalistic school, but was no partisan. The philological element preponderates in his works. When rationalism began to wane at Halle, he was regarded, on account of his personal influence over the students and the fame of his scholarship, its chief representative. He was one of the principal persons aimed at in the attack against rationalistic teachers, which started in Berlin in 1830. But he held his position, and the complaints ceased. In addition to the works mentioned above, he published Versuch üb. d. maltesische Sprache (1810), De Pentateuchi Samarit. Origine, etc. (1815), De Samaritan. Theol. (1822), Carmina Samaritan. (1824), an Edition of Burckhardt's Travels (1823), Monumenta Phœnica (1837). Gesenius also made large contributions to ERSCH and GRUBER's Encyclopädie and to the Hallische Literaturzeitung. For a well-prepared sketch of his life, see GESENIUS: Eine Erinnerung für seine Freunde (by Haym), Berlin, 1842.

[The 8th ed. of Gesenius' Lexicon (Heb. u. Chal. Handb.) appeared Leipzig, 1878, ed. by Mühlau and Volck; the 23d ed. of his Grammar ed. by Kautzsch, Leipzig, 1881. There are English translations of earlier editions of the Lexicon by TREGELLES (1846-52) and EDWARD ROBINSON (Boston, 1855). A thoroughly revised edition of Robinson's translation, on the basis of the 8th ed. of the German original, is preparing by Professors BRIGGS and BROWN of the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City. There are English translations of Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, by MOSES STUART, Andover, 1826 (last ed., 1846), T. J. CONANT, Boston, 1839 (rev. ed., N. Y., 1855), and by B. DAVIES, London, 1869 (ed. by E. C. Mitchell, on the basis of the 22d of the original, Andover, 1881)].

ED. REUSS.

GESTA ROMANORUM (Deeds of the Romans), a Latin collection of anecdotes and tales intended primarily for preachers to introduce into their discourses. It was probably of monkish origin. It has great literary interest, because it contains the germs of many famous tales: for the theologian it has value as a revelation of the morals of the times. The various stories are excellent in their tone, and the piety and zeal of the authors are noticeable. The date of the collection may be set down as about the beginning of the fourteenth century: author and nativity are equally unknown. Critical editions of the Latin text have been produced by A. Keller (Stuttgart, 1842) and Asterley (Berlin, 1872). There is an English translation by Rev. C. Swan, published in Bohn's Antiquarian Library, London, 1877.

GETHSEMANE (oil-press), a place at the foot of Mount Olivet, noted as the scene of our Lord's agony (John xviii. 1; Mark xiv. 26; Luke xxii. 39), is, by a tradition dating back to the fourth century, located about one hundred yards east of the bridge over the Kedron. It consists of a quadrangular spot some seventy paces in circumference, and surrounded with a wall, and contains a flower-garden, with eight very old and venerable olive-trees. As the Latin Church has control of the place, the Greeks have set up a Gethsemane of their own farther up Mount Olivet.

GFROERER, August Friedrich, b. at Calw, in the Black Forest, March 5, 1803; d. at Carlsbad, July 10, 1861. He studied at Tübingen, and was appointed librarian at Stuttgart in 1830, and professor of history at Freiburg in 1846. His first works, Gustav Adolf (Stuttgart, 1835-37, 2 vols.) and Geschichte des Urchristenthums (Stuttgart, 1838, 3 vols.), represent an independent rationalism and a good deal of original research. But with his Allgemeine Kirchengeschichte (Stuttgart, 1841-46, 4 vols.) he entirely changed position, and, though he did not actually embrace Romanism until 1853, he was long before that time considered one of the leaders of ultramontaniam in Germany. To the latter period of his life belong his Geschichte der Karolinger, Freiburg, 1848, 2 vols.; Papst Gregorius und sein Zeitalter, Schaffhausen, 1859-61, 7 vols., etc.

GIANTS. Like all nations of antiquity, the Hebrews had also their stories about giants. The word "giants" has different representations in the Hebrew. Thus (Gen. vi. 4) they are called (1) Nephilim. (Gen. xiv. 5) we find (2) the Rephaim. Of his race was Og, King of Bashan, whose "bedstead was nine cubits in length and four cubits in breadth, according to the cubit of a man" (Deut. iii. 11). (3) The Anakim (Num. xiii. 28, 32, 33; Deut. ii. 10). They were destroyed by Joshua (Josh. xi. 22; Judg. i. 20). Another race of giants (4), the Emim, is mentioned in Deut. ii. 10, who dwelt in the country of the Moabites. Another race, known (5) as the Zamzummim, is described Deut. ii. 20, 21. In Job xvi. 14 the authorized version reads, "like a giant;" but the Hebrew word here used is elsewhere translated "a mighty man;" i. e., champion or hero. GIBSON, Edward, the author of The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; b. at Putney, Surrey, April 27, 1737; d. in London, Jan. 16, 1794. His early education was often interrupted by ill health. He entered Oxford University, 1752, but was expelled, after fourteen months, because of his (temporary) conversion to Roman Catholicism (June 8, 1753), due to reading Bossuet's Variations of Protestantism, when his mind had been unsettled by Middleton's Free Enquiry. Gibson was sent by his father to live with a Calvinistic minister (M. Pavilliard) at Lausanne, Switzerland. There he remained five years in diligent study, and became remarkably intimate with the classic Latin authors, and also acquired such familiarity with French, that, when he began to write his History, he seriously contemplated whether he should write it in that language. Two events occurred during this period which affected his whole life, — his renunciation of Romanism (1754) without being reconverted to Protestantism, and his love for Mlle. Susanne Curchod (1757), who afterwards married Jacques Necker (1764), the famous financier. The result of his change of religion seems to have been indifference to all religion; the result of his disappointment in love, his resolution never to marry. He returned home in 1758, obedient to his father's summons, and for many years led an aimless, though scholarly and laborious life. An episode had an important bearing upon his career. For two years (1760-62) he was a militia captain; and this experience gave him not only robust health, but a knowledge of military matters which stood him in good stead when he came to write his History. It was in Rome (Oct. 15, 1764), while sitting amidst the ruins of the Capitol, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started in his mind; but he did not really begin his immortal work until 1772. In February, 1776, the first volume appeared; on the night of June 27, 1787, he wrote in his garden at Lausanne, whither he had removed in 1783, the last words of his History; and the last volume appeared April 27, 1788. The original edition was in six quarto volumes. Its sale was remarkable, indeed unprecedented. The remainder of the historian's life was brief. He had nothing to live for, now that his life-work was done. The loss of intimate friends, and a physical malady, saddened the close of his days.

Of his History it is superfluous to speak. It has been put in the first rank by universal suffrage. The historians of every land unite in its praise. Later researches have confirmed its judgments, and corrected but few statements. It probably never will be antiquated. Its period extends from the middle of the second century to 1453. The only charge which has been successfully brought against it is that it betrays an unfriendly animus to Christianity. He had so little sympathy with the aims of the Church, that it was not to be expected that he would throw the mantle of charity over the foibles and failings of churchmen. In regard to the famous fifteenth and sixteenth chapters, which relate to the rise and spread of Christianity, wherein its success is explained by reference to secondary causes, and the severity of its early trials declared to have been over-estimated, it may be remarked, that Gibbon himself admitted that his array of secondary causes left the question of the divine origin of Christianity untouched; and, now that the smoke of the battle against this portion of the History has cleared away, church historians allow the substantial justness of his main positions. It was, of course, not Gibbon's intention to write a church history; but, in spite of himself, he has traversed the ground, and also, however unwilling he might be, it remains true, that, "in tracing the gradual decline and fall of imperial Rome, he has involuntarily become a witness to the gradual growth and triumph of the religion of the cross." See SCHAFF: Church History, revised ed., vol. i. p. 47.

The best edition of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire is that published by Murray of London, 1854 (again 1872), 8 vols. (reprinted by Harper and Brothers, New York, 1880, 6 vols.), edited by Dr. William Smith, who has incorporated the notes of Guizot, Wenck, and Milman. His Miscellaneous Works, with Memoirs of his Life and Writings, composed by himself, illustrated from his Letters, with occasional Notes and Narrative, appeared in new ed., 1837. His Autobiography, one of the best ever written, is prefixed to the editions of his History and Miscellanies mentioned above, and also published separately in the Choice Autobiographies, ed. by W. D. Howells, Boston, 1878.

GIBERTI, Giovanni Matteo, b. at Palermo, 1495; d. at Verona, 1543; was made bishop of the latter place in 1524. He was one of those Italian prelates, who, before the Council of Trent, showed a serious interest for the reform of the church, drawing his inspiration from Pietro Caraffa, and exercising considerable influence on Carlo Borromeo. His works (Constitutiones Giberline, Monitiones generales, Edicta selecta, etc.) were edited by Pietro Ballerini, who also wrote his life (Verona, 1733).

GIBSON, Edmund, D.D., b. at Bampton, in Westmoreland, 1669; d. at Bath, Sept. 6, 1748; was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln 1715, and of London 1723; ordered Dr. Mead's edition of Servetus' Restitutio Christianismi to be burnt 1723. He translated Camden's Britannia (1895), edited Sir Henry Spelman's posthumous works (1698), and compiled Corpus juris ecclesiastici Anglicani, or the statutes, constitution, canons, rubrics, and articles of the Church of England (1713, reprinted at Oxford, 1761, 2 vols. folio). He also compiled A preservative against Popery (1738, 3 vols. folio), consisting of writings on the subject by eminent English divines during James II.'s reign. Dr. John Cumming edited a revised edition, London, 1848-49, 18 vols., with supplement, 1849, 8 vols.

GICHEL, Johann Georg, b. at Regensburg, May 14, 1638; d. at Amsterdam, Jan. 21, 1710; studied law at Strassburg; settled at Spire, and began a brilliant career as an advocate, but was by his acquaintance, J. E. von Wetz, led astray into a mist of fantastic mysticism and ascetic theosophy, from which he never escaped. Expelled from his native city on account of an open letter to the preachers of Nuremberg and Regensburg, he spent most of his time at Zwoll with Friedrich Breckling, and in Amsterdam with Antoinette Bourignon and the Labadists. His writings have been collected in seven volumes, under the title of Theosophia practica.

GIDEON (גִּדְעוֹן, hewer), one of the more illustrious judges of Israel and of the tribe of Manasseh. His history is recorded in the sixth to the eighth chapters of Judges. The occasion of his public appearance as judge was the severity of the Midianitish oppression, which lasted seven years. He received a divine call under the terebinth in Ophrah (vi. 11), and built an altar there in commemoration of God's recollection of his people. He struck at idolatry by destroying the altar of Baal, for which he received the title of Jerubbaal, "Let Baal plead," etc. (vi. 32). His great achievement was the defeat of the Midianites, who had encamped in large numbers on the plain of Jezreel. The tribes of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali acknowledged him as leader. But Gideon first demanded a sign, and received the famous signs of the fleece, before undertaking the campaign (vi. 36-40). God was determined to show that it was His power which delivered Israel, and so reduced the army from thirty-two thousand to three hundred. The commander was encouraged by overhearing in the Midianite camp the story of the dream of the barley-cake (vii. 13); and the following night, by the stratagem of the trumpets and lamps, threw the enemy into a panic, and completely routed them. For similar instances see 2 Chron. xx. 23, Hag. ii. 22. In his pursuit of the flying army, the cities of Succoth and Penuel refused him provisions, for which, on his return, he severely punished them (Judg. viii. 13-17).

Of the subsequent forty years (Judg. viii. 28) of Gideon's official activity, little is recorded. He refused the title of king, but instituted a special worship at Ophrah (viii. 27). He was perhaps led to do this by the fact that the national place of worship was in the proud tribe of Ephraim. Gideon made an ephod, which he probably wore himself as priest. It proved a snare to his tribe and people, who were led thereby into an idolatrous worship (perhaps of the Urim and Thummim on the ephod). Gideon's heroism was long remembered after his death (Ps. lxxxiii. 9, 11; Isa. ix. 4, x. 26; Heb. xi. 32). [See the Commentaries on Judges, and Canon FARRAR's article in SMITH'S Bible Dict.]

OEHLER.

GIESELER, Johann Karl Ludwig, b. at Petershagen, near Minden, March 3, 1793; d. at Göttingen, July 8, 1854. He studied at Halle, fought in the war of liberation 1813, and was appointed director of the gymnasium of Cleve 1818, professor of theology at Bonn 1819, and at Göttingen 1831. His principal work is his Church-History, in its kind one of the most remarkable productions of German learning, distinguished by its immense erudition, accuracy, and careful selection of passages from the sources which constitute the body of the work in the form of footnotes, while the text is a meagre skeleton down to 1648. First volume appeared 1824; fifth and last (containing his lectures, and treating the period from 1814 to the present time) 1855, after his death. No less than three English translations have been published of this work,—one after the earlier editions, by Cunningham (Philadelphia, 1836, 3 vols.); and two after the last edition, by Davidson (Edinburgh, 1848-56, 5 vols.), and by H. B. Smith (New York, 1857-81, 5 vols.), completed by Miss Mary Robinson. Among his other works are, Dogmengeschichte (posthumous, 1855), Versuch über die Entstehung der schriftlichen Evangelien (his first book, 1818, and a death-blow to the theory of one primal gospel, Urevangelium); Unruhen in d. niederländ.-ref. Kirche (1840); Ueber die Lehninsche Weissagung (1840), etc. Redepenning wrote a Life of him in the last volume of the Church-History.

GIFTS, Spiritual (Charismata). The old Protestant theologians understood by this term the endowment to perform miraculous works,—such as the speaking with tongues, healing the sick, raising the dead,—and limited it to the primitive Church. This is still the view of the Protestant Church, which regards these gifts either as forfeited by the Church's guilt (Irvingism), or extinguished by God as no longer necessary. The Catholic Church regards the miracles of the saints as the result of their continuance. They are special endowments of the Holy Spirit, and not merely the characteristic faculties of the individual as they appear in various forms of activity subsequent to conversion, as Baur would have it.

Nothing definite as to the nature of the charismata is to be drawn from the etymology. The term outside of the Pauline Epistles is only used twice,—once by Philo (De Alleg. ii. 75), and once by Peter (1 Pet. iv. 10). It gets from charis (grace) the special meaning of a gracious gift in two cases, the pardon of sin (Rom. v. 15), and eternal life (Rom. vi. 23), or of the manifestations of divine grace in general (Rom. xi. 29). In all other cases the word signifies special gracious endowments of the Holy Spirit which exist in the believer as evidences and proofs of the experience of divine grace (1 Tim. iv. 14, etc.), and in such a way as to fit him for some special form of activity in which he can serve the Church (1 Cor. xii. 4). The capacity which each has to edify the Church is in consequence of a charisma which he must exercise, and in the exercise of which he exercises divine grace (1 Pet. iv. 10). These gifts are derived from the Holy Spirit, and are characteristic of the state of grace. Neander is right when he defines the charisma as a capacity in which the power and activity of the indwelling Spirit are revealed, be this capacity immediately imparted by the Spirit, or merely a natural capacity sanctified and enlarged by the principle of the new life. The comprehensive definition, then, would be as follows: charismata are capacities and aptitudes necessary for the edification of the Church, and produced by the Holy Spirit, in consequence of which individuals are enabled to use their natural endowments in the service of the Church, and are furnished with new powers to effect this end.

The charismata are the necessary preparation for the administration of offices in the Church; and Christians may themselves become charismata (1 Cor. xii. 28). Church offices are not something distinct from them (1 Cor. xii. 5), as Thiersch and others hold, but impossible without charismatic endowment. The question then arises, To what extent are the charismata permanent in the Church? Their number is as various as the needs of the church; and neither the enumeration of 1 Cor. xii., nor of Eph. iv., nor Rom. xiii. can be regarded as exhaustive. But those are permanent which are necessary for the government of the Church, and those temporary which had a miraculous element, as the miraculous gifts of the apostles. But among the latter is not to be included the "gift of proclaiming the gospel so as to produce faith" (Weiss). The apostolic charismata bear the same relation to those of the ministry, that the apostolic office does to the pastoral office, and consist in the power to lay the foundations of the Church. They are therefore not repeated, as the Irvingites hold, for there are no circumstances calling for their repetition. [The fullest list of the charismata, or spiritual gifts, is given in 1 Cor. xii.,—speaking with tongues, working miracles, gifts of healing, knowledge, etc.]. See DAVID SCHULTZ: D. Geistesgaben d. ersten Christen, Bresl., 1836; ENGELMANN: V. d. Charismen im Allgemeinen, etc., Regensb., 1848; The Histories of the Ap. Ch., by TRAUTMANN, Leip., 1848 [NEANDER and SCHAFF]. GIFTHEIL, Ludwig Friedrich, son of an abbot in Würtemberg, and noted for his fanatical declamations against the State Church. The date of his birth is not known; but his literary activity belongs to the period of the Thirty-Years' War; and he died in Amsterdam, 1661. He stood in connection with Breckling and other persons of the same description, published letters of warning to the king of England (1643-44) and to Cromwell, whom he styled "field-marshal of the devil, street-robber, thief, and murderer," and wrote in 1647 Deklaration aus Orient, etc. See BÖHME: Acht Bücher von der Reformation der Kirche in England, Altona, 1734. GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE (Gilbertus Porretanus), b. at Poitiers, 1070; d. there 1154; studied philosophy in the school of Chartres; was afterwards a teacher there, and became bishop of his native city in 1142. He was a virtuoso in dialectics, and wrote commentaries on Plato, Aristotle, and Boethius; but to the mystics he naturally appeared as the champion of a dangerous rationalism. Walter of St. Victor called him one of the "four labyrinths of France," Abelard, Pierre of Poitiers, and Petrus Lombardus, being the three others; and on account of his commentary on Boethius de Trinitate, printed in the Basel edition of Boethius' works (1570), Bernard of Clairveaux accused him of heresy. The case was tried at the councils of Paris and Rheims (1148), in the presence of Eugenius III.; but, though the Pope accepted Bernard's counter propositions against Gilbert, he did not officially confirm them, and Gilbert returned unmolested to his see. See LIPSIVS: Gilbertus Porretanus, in ERSCH UND GRUBER, Allg. Encyclopaedie; [HAURÉAU: Philosophie Scholastique, i. 296 sqq.]. PRESSEL.

GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM, founder of the order of the Gilbertines, or Sempringham canons (Ordo Gilbertinorum Canonicorum, or Ordo Sempringensis); b. about 1083, at Sempringham, Lincolnshire, of a Norman noble family; d. there Feb. 4, 1189. He was ordained a priest and pastor of Sempringham-Tirington, in 1123; in 1135 he built a convent for the shelter of seven destitute girls, and shortly after was called upon to establish others for women and for men in various parts of England. To the nuns he gave the Benedictine rule. In 1148 he was refused permission by Pope Eugenius III. to merge all these monasteries in the Cistercian order, and therefore they were per force independent. At the time of his death the order possessed eighteen hundred members (seven hundred males, eleven hundred females), thirteen double monasteries with hospitals, almshouses, and orphanages attached: when suppressed by Henry VIII., it possessed twenty-five monasteries. In the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 4, Gilbert appears as the author of the Gilbertinorum Statute and Exhortationes ad Fratres. He was canonized by Innocent III. 1202, and is commemorated Feb. 4. See HURTER: Gesch. des Innocenz III. u. seiner Zeitgenossen, Gotha, 1834-42, 4 vols. ZÖCKLER.

GIL'BOA (bubbling fountain), a mountain-range east of the plain of Jezreel, the present Jebel Fak'á, bleak and bare, 1,717 feet high, and for the most part very steep, running east south-east for about ten miles; was the place where Saul and his three sons were slain in battle against the Philistines the day after his visit to the witch of Endor (1 Sam. xxviii. 4; 1 Chron. x. 1; 2 Sam. i. 21).

GILDAS, the oldest and the only extant of the historians of the ancient Britons; wrote a Historia and an Epistola, in which he gives a record of the British history under the Romans, and from their withdrawal to his own time. Though these works have been quoted by Bede, Alcuin, William of Newbury, Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Giraldus Cambrensis, no reliable biographical notice of the author exists. The legends from the later middle ages are mere fiction. It seems, however, that he was born in 516, became a monk in the monastery of Bangor, and died 570. The best edition of his works is that by Stevenson, London, 1838. Translations have been made by Habington, London, 1638, and by Giles, London, 1841, republished, with additions, in Bohn's Six Old English Chronicles.

GIL'EAD. See TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

GILES, St. (the same as the Greek Alyidos; Latin, Ægidius; Italian, Egidio; Spanish, Gil; and French, Gilles), b. in Greece, 640; d. before 725, in a monastery on the Rhone. He came to the coast of Provence about 665, and lived a hermit's life till 670, when he went still deeper into the forest, where he was discovered by the king, Wamba (Flavius), under these circumstances: one day the hind upon whose milk the saint was nourished, wounded by an arrow, sought refuge from the king's dogs in the cavern occupied by the saint. The king on coming up was much struck by the sight of the saint kneeling, with the wounded animal by his side, and desired the holy man to attend upon him, at court. St. Giles obeyed, but did not stay long; for in 673 he was again in the forest, and founded a monastery which bore his name. His reputation for sanctity was extraordinary. Miracles were likewise attributed to him. He once refused treatment for an accidental lameness, in order that his pain and inconvenience might be a trial to his flesh, and is therefore honored as the patron saint of cripples. He has churches in all parts of Europe, many in Great Britain. In art he is portrayed as an old man, with a long white beard, on whose lap, or at whose feet, is a hind wounded by an arrow through its neck. He is commemorated Sept. 1. His relics are in St. Sermin's, Toulouse. See SMITH and WACE: Dict. Chr. Biog., art. Ægidius.

GILFILLAN, George, a popular writer of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland; b. at Comrie, Perthshire, Scotland, Jan. 30, 1813; d. Aug. 13, 1878. After study at Glasgow University, he was ordained pastor of a Secession congregation at Dundee, in March, 1836. Beginning with Five Discourses (1839), he issued many volumes of popular literary criticism, which have had a large circulation. His best work is Bards of the Bible (1851, 6th ed., 1874), which attempts to be "a poem on the Bible," with, however, questionable success; for he indulges too much in rhapsody, and lowers, while attempting to revivify, the heroes of the past. His life was laborious, spiritual, and useful. As a preacher and lecturer he was successful, not alone in attracting numbers, but in making a profound impression by his thrilling eloquence.

GILL, John, D.D., a learned Baptist divine and biblical expositor; b. Nov. 23, 1697, at Kettering, Northamptonshire, where his father preached to a mixed congregation of Dissenters; d. Oct. 14, 1771, at Camberwell. His school education was limited; but by private study he acquired much knowledge, and is said to have learned Hebrew without any assistance. After preaching for a time in Higham Ferrers, he was called in 1720 to the Baptist church at Horsleydown, near London. Dr. Gill was a profound theologian and a voluminous author. He was one of the leading advocates of his day of Hyper-Calvinism, but a vigorous opponent of infant-baptism (against Jonathan Dickinson and others). He published one of the ablest answers to Whitby's Five Points, under the title The Cause of God and Truth (4 vols., 1735-38). The same views are stated in his Body of Divinity, 2 vols., 1760 (new ed., Lond., 1839), to which he added a volume on Practical Divinity (1770). Like Dr. Dwight's Theology, it contained the substance of sermons preached from the pulpit. Of his advocacy of Calvinism, Toplady said, "Certainly no man has treated that momentous subject, the system of divine grace, in all its branches more closely, judiciously, and successfully." Dr. Gill's great work was his Exposition of the New Testament (1746-48, in 3 vols.) and of the Old Testament (1763-76, in 6 vols.). His first effort in this department was an Exposition of Solomon's Song, which he preached from the pulpit in 1724, and published in 1728. This commentary is enriched with the stores of rabbinical learning. Mr. Spurgeon calls it "invaluable in its own line of things." It is still useful for homiletic purposes, but pursues the allegorizing method to an extreme. The best edition of Gill's commentary is in 9 vols., Phila., 1811-19, with a full Memoir. RIPPON: Brief Memoir of the Life and Writings of J. Gill, Lond., 1838.

GILLESPIE, George, one of the four Scotch commissioners to the Westminster Assembly of Divines; was the son of a clergyman; b. at Kirkcaldy, Jan. 21, 1613; d. at Kirkcaldy, Dec. 17, 1648. He studied at St. Andrew's, and in 1638 was ordained pastor at Wemyss, whence in 1642 he was translated to Edinburgh. In 1643 he was chosen a member of the Westminster Assembly. He was the youngest member of that body, but proved himself to be one of its closest reasoners, and one of its readiest and most able debaters. He was always listened to with attention, and opposed at times, with success, even the great learning of Lightfoot and Selden. The story is told, that when the Assembly came to the question in the Shorter Catechism, "What is God?" all declined to give a definition except Gillespie, who was hit upon as being the youngest member. He reluctantly consented, but called upon the body to unite with him in prayer before attempting it. His very first words of invocation were taken down, and incorporated as the best possible human answer. In 1648 he was moderator of the General Assembly of Scotland. His brilliant and meteoric career was cut short at the early age of thirty-five. In 1637 he put forth The English Popish Ceremonies obtruded upon the Church of Scotland (a work which attracted much attention), and in 1641 Assertion of the Government of the Church of Scotland (in which he brings keenness of argument and able learning to bear against the "Independent Scheme"). His ablest work, Aaron's Rod blossoming, or the Divine Ordinance of Church-Government vindicated (pp. 590), appeared in London 1646, and was directed against Erastianism. The best edition of these and Gillespie's other works is by HETHRINGTON, 2 vols., Edinb., 1844-46, with a Memoir.

GILLESPIE, Thomas, b. in the parish of Duddingston, Midlothian, Scotland, in 1708; d. at Dunfermline, Jan. 19, 1774. In connection with Boston of Jedburgh, and Collier of Colinsburgh, he organized in 1761 the so-called "Presbytery of Relief" (i.e., "from the yoke of patronage and the tyranny of the church courts"), because, having been deposed for contumacy in refusing conscientiously to attend presbytery meetings called to ordain an unacceptable minister, his persistent efforts to be re-admitted were rejected. See Lives of the Fathers of the United Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh, 1849.

GILLETT, Ezra Hall, D.D., a distinguished American Presbyterian divine and historian; b. at Colchester, Conn., July 15, 1823; d. in New-York City, Sept. 2, 1875. After graduating at Yale College (1841) and Union Theological Seminary (1844), he became pastor of a Presbyterian church in Harlem (1845), which he left in 1868 to accept the chair of political economy, ethics, and history in the University of New York. Dr. Gillett was a man of great humility, and remarkable for his painstaking, patient research as an historian. His first large work was The Life and Times of John Huss (Boston, 1861, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1870). His Hist. of the Presbyterian Ch. in the United States of America (Phila., 1864, 2 vols., rev. ed., 1873), which he was selected by the New School branch of the Presbyterian Church to prepare, is the most comprehensive work on the subject. God in Human Thought (2 vols.) and the Moral System (New York, 1875), for the use of students, grew out of an attempt to prepare a historical and critical Introduction to Butler's Analogy, and are especially valuable for their treatment of English thought in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Dr. Gillett was also a frequent contributor to The Presbyterian Quarterly Review and to The New-York Evangelist.

GILPIN, Bernard (Apostle of the North), b. at Kentmere, Eng., 1517; d. at Houghton-le-Spring, to which he had been appointed about 1556, March 4, 1583. He was a fearless preacher against the clerical and lay vices of the times, and a practical philanthropist. "His life was a ceaseless round of benevolent activity. Strangers and travellers found a ready reception; and even their horses were treated with so much care that it was humorously said, that, if one were turned loose in any part of the country, it would immediately make its way to the rector of Houghton. He built and endowed a grammar-school at a cost of upwards of five hundred pounds, educated and maintained a large number of poor children at his own charge, and provided the more promising pupils with means of studying at the universities. Among his parishioners he was looked up to as a judge, and did great service in preventing lawsuits amongst them." See WILLIAM GILPIN: Life of Bernard Gilpin, with Introduction by Edward Irving, Glasgow, 1824.

GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS (Girald de Barri), b. at Meanon Pyrr about 1147; d. about 1220; studied theology and canon law in Paris, and was, after his return in 1172, sent by the Archbishop of Canterbury to St. David, to reform the Church of the diocese, and bring it into harmony with the Roman Church, by the introduction of celibacy, tithes, etc. It was the policy of the English crown at that moment to build up a support for itself in Wales and Ireland by establishing the Roman hierarchy there; and Giraldus' attempt in St. David was a brilliant success. Nevertheless, when in 1176 he was elected bishop of that diocese by the chapter, he failed to obtain the royal recognition, and went to Paris, where he lectured on canon law. In 1180 he returned to Wales, and was for several years administrator of St. David during the absence of the bishop. He once more gained the favor of the king, and accompanied Prince John on his campaign in Ireland 1185, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, when, in 1188, he went to Wales to preach a crusade. Nevertheless, when, in 1198, he a second time was elected Bishop of St. David, he again missed the goal by the opposition of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The rest of his life he spent in retirement. He was a very prolific writer; and his works — Topographia Hibernica, Itinerarium Cambriae, Speculum Ecclesiae, Expugnatio Hibernica, etc. — have their value, in spite of his credulity and vanity. They were best edited by Brewer and Dimack, Lond., 1860–77, in 7 vols. [Of his Itin. Camb. there is a translation, with a life of Giraldus, and notes, by R. C. Hoare, Lond., 1806, in 2 vols.] C. GIRDLE, among the Hebrews. One of the essential articles of dress in the East, worn alike both by men and women, was the girdle. There were different kinds of girdles, corresponding to their equivalents in the Hebrew. There was (1) the ezor, denoting something bound, which was worn by men of different states (comp. 2 Kings i. 8; Job xii. 18; Isa. v. 27; Jer. xiii. 1; Ezek. xxiii. 15); (2) the abnet, or the girdle of sacerdotal and state officers, especially worn by the priests about the close-fitting tunic (Exod. xxviii. 39, xxxix. 29); (3) the kishurim, mentioned Isa. iii. 20, which seems to have been a girdle worn by women. In general the girdle was made of leather (2 Kings i. 8; Matt. iii. 4). The nobles wore girdles of linen, four fingers broad, and embossed or studded with all kinds of precious stones, or pearls, or metals (Dan. x. 5). It was fastened by a clasp or buckle of gold or silver, or tied in a knot. Men wore the girdle about the loins; whilst the women, having generally their girdle looser than that of the men, wore it about the hips, except when they were actively engaged (Prov. xxxi. 17). The military girdle was worn about the waist: the sword or dagger was suspended from it (Judg. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xlv. 3). Here girding up the loins denotes preparation for battle (1 Kings xviii. 46; 2 Kings iv. 29); whilst to "loose the girdle" was to give way to repose and indolence (Isa. v. 27). It was a token of great confidence and affection to loose the girdle, and give it to another (1 Sam. xviii. 4). Girdles were used as a kind of purse (Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8); and inkhorns were also carried in them (Ezek. ix. 2). RÜETSCHL.

GLANVIL, Joseph, a philosophical divine of the Church of England; b. in Plymouth 1636; d. in Bath, Nov. 4, 1680. After graduation at Oxford he took orders, and was for a time chaplain to the king; in 1666 elected to the Royal Society, of which he was a vigorous defender, and in 1678 appointed a prebendary of Worcester. He was the leader of the philosophical sceptics, who "attacked all philosophy by denying the self-evident and authoritative character of its original categories and axioms, and resolved all trustworthy knowledge into the vague operations of experience, supplemented by the testimony of revelation, or into what could be verified by physical experiment." But his motive in favoring scepticism in science was to assure religion against all attacks. His principal work was Sceptis Scientifica, or Confest Ignorance the Way to Science, an Essay of the Vanity of Dogmatizing and Confident Opinion (Lond., 1665), which was an enlargement of his first work, The Vanity of Dogmatizing (1661). He believed in witches, and wrote Philosophical Considerations concerning the Existence of Sorcerers and Sorcery (1666), and Sadducimus Triumphans, or a Full and Plain Evidence concerning Witches and Apparitions (ed. by Dr. Henry More, who gave an account of his life and writings, 1681, 2d ed., 1682).

GLASS, John, b. in Fifeshire, Sept. 21, 1695; d. at Dundee, 1773; minister of the kirk at Tealing, 1719; deposed by the General Assembly in 1728, in consequence of his publication, in the previous year, of a book in which he maintained that an Established Church was contrary to the gospel. He gathered a sect called in Scotland Glassites, but in England and America SANDEMANIANS (which see). His works appeared at Edinburgh, 1761, 2d ed., Perth, 1782, 5 vols.

GLASSIUS, Salomo, b. at Sondershausen, 1593; d. at Gotha, July 27, 1656; studied theology, especially the Shemitic languages, at Jena and Wittenberg, and was made professor of theology at Jena in 1637, and superintendent-general of Saxe-Gotha in 1640. His principal work was his Philologia Sacra, a combination of a critical and historical introduction to the Bible and a biblical hermeneutics. It appeared in 1623, was much appreciated at its time, and often reprinted. The general theological stand-point of the author forms a transition from the old orthodoxy to the pietism of Spener. THOLUCK.

GLEBE (church land), most commonly the land belonging to a parish church, besides the tithes. There are several important statutes in relation to glebes, dating from the reign of Henry VIII. Originally every church had a house for the minister, and a glebe: indeed, there could be no consecration where these were not.

GLOSSES, Biblical. The word "gloss," which is derived from the Greek glossa, denotes not only tongue and language, but was also used among grammarians to denote any note appended to a word or phrase for the purpose of interpretation or illustration. Works containing such notes were called "glossaries," and comprised not only the wide range of philology, but also science, medicine, geography, etc., and even the sacred literature of the Bible. Notes on the latter were called "sacred glosses." Before, however, such glosses were noted down, the text of the Bible had been the subject of exegetical studies; and the word "glosses," which among the Greeks denoted "the word to be interpreted," was used among the Latins for the "explanation itself." In the latter sense it was used among the Christian writers of the middle ages, and is still used in our own days.

Almost as old as writing itself is the habit of placing annotations in the margin, either explanatory or otherwise, of the text. This was especially the case with the Bible; partly because it was read more than any other book, partly because it was read by such who needed an explanation, or believed themselves fit for making explanations. At first very brief, often confined to a single word, these glosses grew finally into more extended remarks. In the Hebrew codices these glosses were the source of not a few of the keri readings; and the glosses on the margins of the codices of the Septuagint and the New Testament have given rise to many of the various readings which exist in both of these, an elimination of which requires sound and cautious judgment. The more difficult the understanding of the sacred writings was regarded, the longer were the marginal annotations (glossæ marginales), which were especially made on the text of the Vulgate,—some grammatical, some historical, some theological, some allegorical and mystical. The most famous collection of these glossæ marginales is that of Walafrid Strabo, made in the ninth century, which became the great exegetical thesaurus of the middle ages, and was known as the Glossa Ordinaria. Besides notes being written in the margin, there were also such as were written between the lines (glossæ interlineares); and a collection of the latter was made by Anselm of Laon in the beginning of the twelfth century. Both works were often printed together. In the last century special attention was given to these glosses: such is the work of Ernesti, entitled Glossæ Sacræ, Leipzig, 1785. REUSS.

Glosses, or, as they are usually denominated, marginal notes, are found in English Bibles, in different versions. Those made by the Geneva translators particularly excited the dislike of King James, and made him ready to second Dr. Reynold's proposition for a new translation of the Bible on the second day of the Hampton Court Conference (Monday, Jan. 16, 1604). His objection to them was their alleged seditious and traitorous character, because they struck at the doctrine of the divine right of kings. The Bishop of London, therefore, proposed, that, in the new translation, there should be no marginal notes; to which the King said, "That caveat is well put in." Nevertheless the King James Version has such notes, although of very limited scope,—mere various readings, in most cases. There was some complaint at the omission of the Geneva annotations. See Fuller, Church Hist., Bk. X., Cent. xvii., Sects. 1, 2, and 3, ¶ 41, Nichol's ed., vol. iii., pp. 203 sqq., 276. The revised version of 1881 has also glosses, in which the various readings of ancient manuscripts are given. Many of the marginal readings of the British revisers should be substituted for those in the text, in the judgment of their American fellow-laborers.

GLOSSES and GLOSSATORES. After the overthrow of the West Roman Empire in Italy, Roman law gradually lost its authority in practical life, and, as a natural consequence thereof, also its theoretical interest as a study; until at the end of the eleventh, or the beginning of the twelfth, century, both were revived by the foundation of the law-school at Bologna by one Irnerius (Warnerius, Guarnerius). The fame of this school soon gathered a great number of pupils from all parts of Europe; and thereby was not only the scientific treatment of the Roman law advanced, but its practical application was at the same time inaugurated. The teachers, however, did not confine themselves to lecturing: a literary activity also developed. Explanations of single words or phrases, and illustrations of positive facts or relations, were put down in the form of short notes, glosses between the lines (interlinear glosses) or in the margin (marginal glosses); and, besides such short notes, the glossatores also produced summæ (or surveys of the contents of a chapter), casus (or fictitious cases illustrative of certain principles), questiones, distinctiones, etc. From the Roman law this method was transferred to canon law, and flourished among the canonists of the University of Paris no less than among the legists of Bologna. Several of the pupils of Gratian wrote glosses on his decretum: and in 1212 Johannes Teutonicus undertook to gather these glosses into a continuous commentary on the decretum, called an apparatus, or glossa ordinaria. Similar glossæ ordinariæ were also made to the decretals of Gregory IX., the Liber sextus, the Clementines, and Extravagantes, and are of great value, not only scientific, but also historical. See SARTI: De claris archigymnasii Bonon. professoribus, 1769. WASSERSCHLEBEN.

GLOUCESTER, capital city of the county of the same name; situated on the Severn, 106 miles north-west from London; population 18,330; founded by the Romans under the name of Aulus Plautius; called by the Saxons Gleauanceastre; is one of the most famous cities of England. Here was the favorite residence of Edward the Confessor and the Norman kings; here Charles I. was repulsed by the Earl of Essex; and here the Sunday school was instituted, the first one being held by Robert Raikes, 1781. Its cathedral dates from the eleventh century, and the diocese of Gloucester from 1541. Among its famous bishops may be mentioned Hooper (1550-55) and Warburton (1759-79). Since 1836 it has been consolidated with Bristol. The present episcopal income is five thousand pounds per annum, and the incumbent (1882) is Dr. Charles John Elliott, who was consecrated in 1863.

GNAPHÆUS, Wilhelmus (Fullonius), b. at The Hague, 1493; d. at Norden, Sept. 29, 1568; a noticeable Dutch humanist; was rector of the gymnasium of his native city, but joined the reformatory movement; was twice imprisoned by the Romanists, and finally compelled to flee the country. He went to Prussia, first as rector of a school in Elburg, then as director of the pedagogicum in Königsberg. But he found no more toleration among the Lutherans of Prussia than among the Romanists of his home. Though he was not a theologian, he was dragged from one theological disputation into another, condemned for heresy, as he belonged to the Reformed confession, excommunicated, and banished, 1547. He found a refuge in Friesland.

GNOSTICISM, an eclectic philosophy of the first Christian centuries, which constructed its systems out of Pagan, Jewish, and Christian elements, and clothed its ideas in mythological drapery. The term is originally derived from gnosis, or "knowledge," which Paul uses for a deep acquaintance with God's purpose in redemption (1 Cor. xiii. 21). The designation "Gnostics" was given, as Lipsius has shown, in a pre-eminent and special sense to the Ophites of Syrian origin. Irenæus states that the Carpocratians, who were of Alexandrian origin, assumed the name. This fact, and the early development of a Christian philosophy in Alexandria, lead us to the conclusion that it was used at a very early date in that city. Gnosis was used in contrast not only to pietis, or "faith," but also to the Pagan philosophia.

Gnosticism stands on the border-line between the Christian system and Paganism. It was the resultant of two processes, starting from different directions,—the contact of the Church, on the one side, with Pagan thought; and the attempt of philosophy, on the other, to harmonize Christian revelation with its own systems. It gave up the monotheism of the Scriptures, limited the canon, and allegorized away, in part or in whole, the great facts of Christ's work and person. Gnosticism drew largely from the Greek systems of Plato and the Stoics; but that which is characteristic was derived from Oriental religions. It incorporated their bald Dualism; while Greek philosophy, for the most part, favors the Pantheistic conception of the universe. As a rule, it represented individual life as the result of a process of emanation from the original essence; while Greek speculation taught a process of development by evolution in an ascending scale from chaos. Unlike Greek systems, its thought was not methodical, but poetical, and charged with Oriental imagery and freedom. The Gnostics, likewise, showed their preference for Oriental mythologies in the names of the angels. Parseeism with its fully-developed idea of God as light, Chaldean astrology (in Bardesanes and Saturninus), and Buddhism with its ascetic tendency,—all combined with the Syrian and Phœnician mythologies to give to Gnosticism its Oriental coloring.

The principal task which Gnosticism proposed for itself was to lead man by speculative knowledge to salvation. The chief questions which pressed upon it for solution were how the human spirit became imprisoned in matter, and how it might be emancipated. The former is almost synonymous with the question concerning the origin of evil; which Tertullian, with other polemical writers, regarded as the main subject of Gnostic thought. In the latter, the purification and deliverance of the soul, it agitated one of the profoundest thoughts of Christianity.

Influenced by Hellenic philosophy, the Gnostics subordinated the will to knowledge, and represented experimental Christianity as knowledge rather than faith, and made knowledge the standard of the moral condition. They would have changed the consecution of Christ's words in Matt. v. 8 to the statement, "They that see God are pure in heart." They were influenced by the aristocratic class-feeling of the Greek philosopher, who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes,—spiritual (πνευματικοί), psychic, and carnal (ψυχικοί, σαρκικοί, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instincts. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire: God and the spiritual nature (πνεῦμα) are unmoved by instinct and passion. The spiritual beings become aware of their kinship with God, and will be completely delivered. This is the source of moral duty, and the law of life for the spiritual class. They must seek to lift themselves up to the divine kingdom, and thus bring to development the seed within them.

Different writers have endeavored to derive the various phases of Gnosticism from a single leading principle. Baur finds it in the idea of the absolute religion of which it treats when it discusses the agreements and disagreements of Christianity on the one hand, and Paganism and Judaism on the other. Lipsius finds it in the distinction between knowledge and faith. Without denying this antithesis, Neander and Hilgenfeld represent the person of the World-Creator as the point of departure. This mythological figure is called by Valentinus (following Plato), Demiurge; by Basilides, Archon; and by Ophitic sects, Jaldabaoth, or Son of Chaos. This is, at any rate, the most characteristic figure in Gnostic systems, and concentrates in itself its most important ideas. The introduction of this being between God and the visible universe grows out of the antithesis of God and matter. This speculative Dualism leads to a religious Dualism, which sets the God of the New Testament in sharp contrast to the God of the Old Testament. The Demiurge is almost invariably represented as having a very subordinate activity, compared with God (and Justinus is the only one who even ascribes to him a spiritual or pneumatic nature), and then he is devoid of the foreknowledge of God. The spirits which proceed from God are high above him. He belongs to the world, and marks the chasm between it and God. The description of his creative work draws largely from the first chapters of Genesis. He is the God of the Jews. But his kingdom is broken into by the kingdom of Satan and by that of spiritual or pneumatic life.

The classification of Gnostic sects offers much difficulty. Since the discovery of Hippolytus, the difficulty has become greater on account of the additional systems he brings to our notice. He also has made it apparent that the Pantheistic conception also had some currency, as well as the Dualistic, among the Gnostics. Gieseler groups them into Alexandrian, in which Platonic influences are potent, and Syrian, in which there is a stronger Dualism. But, by his own confession, the system of the Syrian Marcion does not favor this division. The classification, on the basis of religious influence, which Hase makes into Oriental, Hellenic, Christian, and Jewish, is inexact. Lipsius, on the double basis of date of origin and characteristics, distinguishes three stadia: (1) Early Gnosticism, in which elements of Syrian mythologies were blended with the Judæo-Christian ideas; (2) Hellenic Gnosticism, beginning with the assumed transition of Basilides to Alexandria; (3) A stage in which speculation wanes, and the conflict of Gnosticism against faith ceases. Here belongs Marcion. The alleged transition from a Syrian to Hellenic Gnosticism in Basilides is not borne out by facts. The two developed contemporaneously. In Alexandria, Gnosticism was strong as early as the middle of the second century. Cerinthus began his career there; and, if we follow the account of Hippolytus, Basilides belonged there. Baur arranges the systems thus: (1) Such as combine Christianity with Judaism and Paganism (Basilides, Valentinus, the Ophites); (2) Such as oppose Christianity to both (Marcion); (3) Such as, identifying Judaism and Christianity, oppose them to Paganism (Clementine Homilies).

A better grouping than either of these is Neander's, who distinguishes two main classes, — the Judaizing and Anti-Judaistic. For ourselves we prefer a classification based upon historic development, and distinguish (1) The period of sporadic Gnosticism at the close of the first century, (2) The period of greatest fertility of speculation till the middle of the third, (3) The period of decay in which there is little of original thought (after the fifth century there are no new systems), (4) The revival of Gnostic ideas about the seventh century in the sect of the Cathari. We shall here concern ourselves only with the first two classes.

Gnosticism exerted a powerful reflex influence upon the Church. When the Church was about to sink into a stagnant literalism, and into formalism of life, the idealistic speculation of the Gnostics gave her an impulse towards thought, and a more comprehensive discussion of doctrine. The consequence was, that those points in which Christianity is distinguished from Judaism and Paganism were investigated and emphasized. The Alexandrian school of theologians, who more than equalled the Gnostics in depth of speculative thought, was one evidence of the new life. Not altogether free from the error of finding the essence of Christianity in knowledge, it was Christian in tone, both of doctrine and morality. It borrowed from the rich speculations of Greek philosophy, but held aloof from Oriental theosophy. The influence of Gnosticism was not only good in arousing the Church to a clearer definition of her fundamental doctrines; it gave also the stimulus to exegetical labors by itself leading the way. Basilides and Heracleon were the first to comment upon whole Gospels. The Gnostics also preceded in the department of religious poetry. Learning, as she did, from Gnosticism, the Church, on the other hand, gathered more closely about her bishops, and emphasized more strongly her distinctive doctrines, peculiar rites, and apostolic origin.

[Gnosticism was the Rationalism of the ancient Church. It was an effort of profound speculative thought to harmonize the Christian revelation with reason. It brought forward the distinguishing principles of Hellenic philosophy, Oriental theosophy, and the Jewish religion, and compared the great ideas of Christianity with them. Christianity was often clothed in fantastic drapery, and associated with grotesque images; but it was always declared superior to any thing that had preceded it. This movement of thought was perhaps inevitable; but the Gnosticism of the early Church is distinguished from the Rationalism of our century by having been confined to the speculations of scholars. Modern Gnosticism has gone among the people. The contrast may be accounted for by the circumstance that the people then saw more plainly the effects of non-Christian thought and life upon the world, and knew more clearly the superior merit and power of Christianity over all the systems that had preceded it.]

The first period of Gnosticism belongs to the close of the first century. The earliest proleptic signs of Gnosticism are to be looked for in Simon Magus. He was one of the numerous magicians of the East who pretended to have the power of working miracles. Judaistic Gnosticism is prefigured by the false teachers against whom Paul contends in his Epistle to the Colossians. Without denying the Messianic office of Christ, they seem to have had a well-developed doctrine of angels, who, perhaps, were regarded as having participated in the creation. There are also traces of Gnosticism in the Epistles to Timothy. The First Epistle of John opposes Docetism. At the close of the apostolic age, Cerinthus was active in that part of Asia Minor where John labored. He retained some doctrines of the Old Testament, but placed at the side of God a World-Creator, the God of the Jews, who is also the head of the lower angels. Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary. The Redeemer descended upon him at his baptism, and left him just before the passion.

The golden period of Gnosticism closed about the middle of the third century. After the first decades of the second century, Gnostic speculation was fruitful of systems to an extent of which there is no parallel in the history of philosophy, either ancient or modern. Starting from Egypt and Syria, they extended themselves to the remotest part of the Church, even as far as Edessa and Lyons. The distinctive Gnostic features are more clearly outlined, and the various schools stand in relations of antagonism or friendship. We pass now to a description of the Gnostic systems in detail.

I. Judaizing Gnostics. BASILIDES.—Two divergent accounts of the system of Basilides have come down to us. Irenæus and Epiphanius describe it as teaching a bold Dualism, and drawing very largely from Parseeism. Hippolytus and Clement of Alexandria, on the other hand, represent it as monistic, and largely under the influence of Greek philosophy, especially the Stoic. The latter is evidently the true representation. Irenæus was poorly informed, and does not even mention Isidore, the son and disciple of Basilides. Clement and Hippolytus, on the other hand, seem to have had access to the writings of both.

The following is an outline of the Basilidean system. God is the Unnamable, and, in contrast to all other beings, he may be called the Non-Existent One; for he is so high above us, that we cannot affirm of him any predicates. He discards the doctrine of emanation commonly held by the Gnostics. Matter is not eternal, but the product of divine creation. Far beneath his throne, God deposits the seed, out of which, as from an egg, the world bursts and develops. The expression, "seed of the world," is Stoic; and the illustration of the egg, originally Oriental, was adopted extensively in the cosmogonic poetry of the Greeks. This seed is conceived of as a chaotic mixture of the three elements in the world,—the spiritual or pneumatic, the psychic, and the hylic. The spiritual or pneumatic first detaches itself; and the most subtle and ethereal portion of it swings itself aloft, with the rapidity of thought, to God. To it belong the highest spirits,—Mind, Word, Intelligence, Wisdom, Power, Justice, Peace,—which, with the Father, constitute the great Ogdoad, the type of the lower spheres. The second class of pneumatic beings exist beneath these. Out of the psychic element went forth the architect and ruler of the world, the ARCHON, who, without being conscious of it, is governed by the divine laws. With the aid of astronomical forces he forms three hundred and sixty-five heavens, the lowest of which stretches from the moon downwards. A lower Archon presides over this sphere. God uses both Archons for his purposes. The lower Archon appropriates to himself the Jewish people, reveals himself in the Old Testament, and also to the heathen world. Prophecy begets a longing for deliverance from the fetters of matter. When the fulness of time had come, the Redeemer was born of the virgin. At the baptism he was endowed with new spiritual powers, and, after preaching the higher knowledge of salvation, was put to death. Christ died on account of the remainders of sin left in him, but also to deliver the children of God from the fetters of matter. The process of deliverance is now going on, and will be completed when all pneumatic beings are gathered to God. Basilides and his son Isidore, who wrote a work on ethics, taught a moderate asceticism. The former appeals to the apostle Mathias, and used the Gospel of John, for which, and the Epistles to the Corinthians, Ephesians, and Romans, he is the first witness. See art. BASILIDES.

VALENTINUS.—All that we know of the life of this teacher is, that he came to Rome in the days of Bishop Ilyginus (about 138), was at the height of his influence under Pius (about 155), and was teaching until the administration of Anicetus (about 166). It is certain that he hailed from the East. But Tertullian's statement, that he broke with the Church, and was repeatedly excommunicated, is suspicious. Valentinus was endowed with rich powers of mind. His system is the most artistic of all the Gnostic systems. It is an epic describing creation, apostasy, and redemption, in two spheres,—heaven and earth.

God is unfathomable profundity, and the most sufficient name for him is Abyss (βυθός). For endless ages he remains in silent, undisturbed contemplation of his own glory. His thought, denominated Ennoia ("conception"), or Sige ("silence"), is associated with him. From Bythos and Sige emanate pairs in a downward scale,—Nous ("mind") and Aletheia ("truth"), Logos ("word") and Zoe ("life"), Anthropos ("man") and Ecclesia ("church"). With eleven other pairs these four constitute the divine Pleroma, or fulness. These beings are called ÆONS. The further they are removed from the Bythos, or God, the greater the defect of divine life, and longing after it. The furthest off is Sophia ("wisdom"), which has a vehement desire to comprehend God. Her sinful passion disturbs the harmony in the Pleroma, and, being separated from herself, is placed outside of the Pleroma. This marks the transition to the world. Harmony is restored; and out of gratitude the ÆONS construct out of their best gifts the finest Æon of all,—the star in the divine fulness, the upper Christ, who is surrounded by hosts of angels. Valentinus seems not to be clear about matter. It is either identical with the expelled πάθος ("passion"), or exists, distinct from the Pleroma, as Kenoma, or the Void. But in Sophia matter is of one kind; in the world it is evil.

The second part of the system descends to the formation of the visible world. The separated part, or πάθος, still has pneumatic life. She is the product of Sophia, and called Achamoth, from the Hebrew Chochmah ("wisdom"). From her proceed the fundamental elements of the world. She delegates the formation of the world and man to the Demiurge, who dwells in the seventh heaven. Man lives at first in paradise, the third heaven, but repeats the apostasy, and is cast down to earth. The Demiurge sends the Messiah, upon whom the Æon Christ descends. But only the human Messiah dies, the Æon leaving him before his passion. After the resurrection, the Messiah tarried eighteen months among the disciples, teaching them the mysteries of the divine Pleroma. All pneumatic beings will be completely delivered. The Demiurge, who humbled himself before the Æon Christ as he passed through his kingdom, will lift up the righteous psychic beings to a place where they will hear the jubilant echoes of the Pleroma. Then fire will consume matter and the psychic evil-doers. The most prominent representatives of this school were Heracleon of Alexandria, Ptolemy, and Marcus of Palestine. The correspondence of ideas makes it almost certain that Valentinus used the Gospel of John.

COLOBARSUS is inaccurately made by Irenæus the founder of a sect. The name is derived from the Hebrew kol arba, and designates the fourfold principle in which the original essence at first manifests itself.

BARDESANES, who gave the impulse to the Christian poet, Ephraem of Syria, enjoyed for a time the esteem of the Syrian Church, but was subsequently forced to emigrate. From the fragmentary notices that have come down to us, we gather that he drew largely from Valentinus and the Chaldæan astrology. But in his Docetic view of Christ is implied a bold Dualism. See art. BARDESANES.

II. Anti-Judaistic Gnostics. SATURNINUS, or SATURNILUS, of Antioch in Syria, flourished in the early part of the second century. He taught the sharp antagonism of the unknown God and matter, which is dominated by Satan. Judaism and Paganism are hostile to Christianity; and Christ was sent to destroy the God of the Jews, and to bring deliverance to the pneumatic beings.

MARCION was the son of the Bishop of Sinope. He was a man of earnest temperament, and retained much moral Christian force. Tertullian states that he was excommunicated several times. The probable reason for his leaving Syria, and going to Rome, was the hope of finding a purer form of Christianity. He was acquainted with Polycarp. Christianity he regarded as incomparably superior to Judaism and Paganism. But the Church apologetes opposed him with great vehemence; and Polycarp, at their meeting in Rome, treated him as the first-born of Satan. The tradition went, that he sought re-admission to the Church before his death.

The fundamental ideas in Marcion's system are the most high God, who is love; the Demiurge, whom he identifies with the God of the Old Testament, and represents as unmerciful; and Hyle, or matter, ruled by Satan. The Demiurge at first unites with Hyle to form the world and man, but, by deceiving her, appropriates man for himself. In revenge, Hyle fills the earth with polytheism and idolatry. The Demiurge continues to dominate in Judaism; but the history neither of Judaism nor of Paganism has any thing to do with the most high God. Taking pity upon man, God sends Christ. The Demiurge effects his crucifixion. Christ descends to Hades, and preaches redemption to the Jews condemned by the Demiurge and to the heathen idolaters of Hyle. He condemns the Demiurge himself to hell, and chooses Paul as his apostle. To him alone he imparts the pure gospel. Marcion accepted into his canon only ten Pauline Epistles and a mutilated Gospel of Luke. His most able followers were APelles, PREPON an Assyrian, and LUCANUS. The Marcionites were divided up into many sects, and in Epiphanius' time, by his own statement, were scattered from Persia to Rome. For the Docketists, who belong here, see art. DOKETISM.

III. Gnosticizing Paganism. CARPOCRATIANS. — Carpocrates was an Alexandrian, and taught in the first decades of the second century. His system was monistic. All life, by an ever-expanding procession, emanates from the monad. On the limits of the divine development is matter, wherein the spirits who are finally fallen away from God have their habitation. EPIPHANES his son, who wrote a work on Justice, followed closely his father's system. The Antinomianism of the Carpoctratians gave occasion to the heathen world for accusations against the Christians, with whom it identified them.

SIMON MAGUS (Acts viii. 9, 10) was, as early as the second century, denounced by the Church as the arch-heretic, and founder of Gnosticism. Although he professed to be a believer (Acts viii. 13), he gave himself out as "the Great Power of God." A sect in the second century derived their origin from him, regarding his authority as co-ordinate with that of the apostles. The tradition ran, that he purchased a harlot at Tyre. He allowed her to be worshipped as his first conception (Ennoia), who created the angels. These form the world; but she maddens them by her charms, so that they indulge in lust, to which the Homeric poems refer. Simon appears to deliver Ennoia; and, like her, all Gnostics will be delivered.

Clement of Alexandria mentions a number of sects which belong here, and which he describes merely on the side of their moral teachings. Pantheism was common to them all. The ANTI-FACTES hoped to attain salvation by defiance of the moral law, thereby defeating the Demiurge. So, also, the followers of PRODICUS, who proudly applied to themselves the name Gnostics. The Nicolaitans appealed to the deacon Nicolas (Acts vi. 5) as their authority, and likewise taught the freedom of the flesh. They have no connection with the sect of the same name in the Apocalypse.

IV. The Ophites. — This class of Gnostics — called by Hippolytus Ophites, by Clement of Alexandria Ophians — give a prominent place in their systems to the serpent, — a demon now of evil, now of good. In doing this they were in the line of the mythologies of ancient Babylon (in which the seven-headed serpent fights against the powers of light), of Persia, and of Egypt. The apocryphal literature of the Jews also refers frequently to the serpent. The Ophites drew largely, also, from Greek philosophy. The sharp antithesis in which they set Judaism and Christianity, and the preponderance of the Pagan element, precludes the theory that they were of Jewish origin.

JUSTINUS, whose system Hippolytus has noticed, was more largely influenced by Old-Testament ideas than any other of the Ophites. From an original good and male being there proceeded a female being, Edem, whose upper part was human, lower, serpent. The Demiurge (called Elohim) emanates from God. He has intercourse with Edem, and begets two kinds of beings corresponding to her twofold nature. Forsaken by him, Edem fills the earth with evils. Elohim seeks to draw men upwards, loves the Jews, and reveals himself through Baruch, one of the angels, to Moses and the prophets. These are, however, traduced by Edem. Elohim then turns to the prophets of the heathen world. They share the same fate. Baruch finally finds in Jesus, the Son of Mary and Joseph, a firm opponent of Edem. He resists all temptations of the serpent, and his crucifixion is brought about by it. This opens the way for the complete separation of the earthly and the heavenly; Christ's spirit having gone to Elohim, and the body to Edem.

The Ophites of Irenæus place Christianity in sharper antagonism to the Demiurge. Dualism is distinctly avowed. On the one side is Bythos, the divine being; on the other, matter, a desolate ocean, made up of water, darkness, chaos, and abyss. From the mingling of the light with matter proceeds Jaldabaoth, the Son of Chaos. He is the World-Creator. Looking down with grim hatred upon Hyle, his diabolic image is produced, — Ophiomorphus, or the "crooked serpent" (Isa. xxvii. 1). From him go forth all evil, sorrow, and death. He dominates Cain and the heathen; Jaldabaoth, the Jews, and inspires Moses and other prophets. But he crucifies Jesus, upon whom the heavenly Christ had descended, and does not share in the kingdom of light. But Christ brings salvation to all pneumatic beings.

The SETHIANI used a "Paraphrase of Seth," whence their name. Matter is an ocean, tempestuous, chaotic, dark. The light excites the serpent-soul in matter, which then becomes the Demiurge. The Logos descends from the light, deceives the Demiurge by assuming the form of a serpent, and lifts the soul up to the realm of light.

The NAASENI (serpent-worshippers) flourished in Phrygia. They taught that the serpent emanates from God, and is the soul of the world. Christ does not redeem men by his death, but by his gnosis and teaching.

The PERATÆ, as their name signifies, looked upon themselves as belonging to another world, and as only in a state of transition in this. They thrived about 150; for Clement of Alexandria mentions them. The Archon of matter is a hylic demon, and his companions are the poisonous serpents of the desert. The serpent, as the apostle of wisdom, frees Eve from the bondage of the Archon. To it belong Cain, Nimrod, and, none the less, Moses, who lifts up the serpent in the wilderness. Like the CAINITES, they regarded Judas as the true apostle. Thus the whole story of the Gospels was completely inverted, the serpent being regarded as the symbol of intellect, who first gave true knowledge to our first parents, and the very betrayer of Christ declared to be the highest apostle.

The various Gnostic sects described by Epiphanius — the PHIBIONITES, STRATIOTIKES, etc. — were distinguished by a moral rottenness which almost staggers belief. On the one hand, theology and apologetics had shown the vast superiority of Christianity to Gnosticism; on the other, Gnostic sects, once with noble aims, had so degenerated, that no doubt was left that its time was past.

GOAR, St., settled, during the reign of Childbert (511-558), on the Rhine, at the present village of St. Goar; built a chapel, and spent his life there, in spite of the persecutions of a certain Bishop Rusticus of Treves, in ascetic practices, exercising hospitality, and working many miracles. Thus the legend. But there never was a bishop of Treves of the name Rusticus, and the legend itself (Act. Sanct., Julii, Tom. II. 327-346) cannot well be older than the ninth century. It probably had a basis in fact. G. PLITT.

GOBAT, Samuel, D.D., Bishop of Jerusalem; b. at Crémone, Bern, Switzerland, Jan. 26, 1799; d. at Jerusalem, May 12, 1879. He entered the mission house at Basel in 1821; in 1823 proceeded to Paris and London, where he learned Arabic, Æthiopic, and Amharic; and in 1826 was sent by the (English) Church Missionary Society to Abyssinia, but, owing to the unsettled state of that country, could not begin operations until 1830, and left in 1832. He returned in 1834, but sickness prevented his working; and so, in September, 1835, he came back to Europe. From 1839 to 1842 he was in Malta, superintending the translation of the Bible into Arabic, and taking charge of the printing-press there. In 1845 he was appointed vice-principal of the Malta Protestant College, and in 1846 nominated, greatly to his surprise, by the king of Prussia (Frederick Wilhelm IV.) to the see of Jerusalem. He was consecrated at Lambeth, Sunday, July 5, 1846.

His work in the Holy City was very successful and vigorous. Particularly worthy of mention is the Diocesan School and the Orphanage on Mount Zion. In November, 1847, he began with nine children in the former: when he died, there were in Palestine, under his care, thirty-seven schools, with fourteen hundred children. He also had under him twelve native churches. He had an efficient helper in his wife. He wrote A Journey of Three Years in Abyssinia, London, 1847. See Men of the Times (ed. 1879), and particularly Mrs. PITMAN: Heroines of the Mission Field, pp. 67-80.

GOCH, Johannes, or properly Johannes Pupper; was b. at Goch, near Aix-la-Chapelle, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and probably educated in one of the establishments of the Brethren of Common Life. Studied in Paris, and founded the priory of Thabor, for canonesses of St. Augustine, in Mechlin, which he governed himself till his death, March, 1475. His life seems to have passed along quietly and unnoticed; but when his De libertate Christiana was published in 1521, by Coru-Grapheus, it attracted great attention, and its author was recognized as one of the true predecessors of the Reformation. See ULLMANN: Die Reformatoren vor der Reformation, I. p. 168.

GOD. I. NAME AND GENERAL IDEA. — Although the existence of God is the most certain of all facts for Christians and religious people generally, and although all moral and religious life depends upon him for its motives and aims, yet Christian theologians of every period have agreed that it is impossible to give an exhaustive definition of his being. This is due to the fact that God neither stands in a relation such as exists between genus and species, nor can be included in a class with other persons under a single genus. Yet all systems of religion have had positive notions of the Deity. Common to all has been the idea that he is a being superior to man and nature, and controls, to some extent, man's destiny. His will, which is regarded in the lowest religions as despotic and arbitrary, is defined in the higher religions as almighty, originating and controlling all things. Speculative thought takes a step higher when it represents this will, upon which all depends, as unconditioned by any thing outside of itself, and eternal. But it remains for the Christian revelation to add the most important feature; namely, that God is a moral being, absolutely good, and guiding the world to a perfect consummation. Of the two names for God which the Hebrews had in common with other Semitic peoples, El expresses the notion of power, and Elohim represents him as an object of awe and dread. But neither contains any allusion to God's redeeming love. Our God is not connected etymologically with good (Max Müller, 2d series, p. 148), but is probably derived from the Sanscrit jut or dyut, Gothic, gutha, meaning to shine. The same word is the root of the Latin Deus and the Greek Zeús.

II. GOD IN THE SCRIPTURES. — Characteristic of the Old-Testament revelation of God is the moral relation he sustains to the world. The Old Testament does not give theoretical definitions of the Divine Being, or arguments for his existence, but assumes the belief in him. The religious reverence and fear which are becoming in our relations to him are based upon his moral elevation, his absolute holiness, which cannot tolerate sin. Jehovah, the name which indicates God's covenant relation to Israel, designates the immutability and absoluteness of his being. God is a personal spirit, not a force of nature. He is separate from the world; yet his spirit is the creating and moving principle of all life (Ps. civ. 29 sqq., etc.), and particularly of man's life (Gen. ii. 7; Job xxxiii. 4, etc.). The earth is a monument revealing his glory (Num. xiv. 21, etc.). The plural form of the divine name Elohim points to his infinite fulness of life. Although the holiness of God is the predominant conception of the Old Testament, the thought of divine love and grace is not wanting. God in mercy chooses Israel to be his people, and desires to be called Father (Exod. iv. 22 sq.; Deut. xxxii. 6; Isa. lxiii. 16; Hos. xi. 1). He effaces guilt, purifies the heart, and imparts his spirit (Ezek. xxxvi. 22 sqq., etc.). It is this ethical and religious conception of God, and not the divine unity, or Monotheism, which is the distinguishing feature of the Old-Testament revelation.

The New Testament is characterized by the presentation of God as the Father of Jesus Christ and of those who belong to his kingdom. The relation is now strictly a personal one, the Old Testament representing God as the Father of a people. We are made God's children by a new birth (John i. 12; 1 John iii. 9). Thus, having become partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. i. 4), we shall at last be filled with "all the fulness of God" (Eph. iii. 19). God himself lives and works in them (Eph. iv. 6). He is in a peculiar sense the Father of Christ, who was begotten before the worlds (John i. 1 sqq.), and possesses the divine fulness (Col. ii. 9). In the name Father the principle of love is contained. "God is love" (1 John iv. 8), and this love controls his use of all the other attributes. It leads God to reveal himself in the gift of his Son (1 John iv. 10, etc.), and to take men into communion with himself. God is also light or holiness (1 John i. 5) and spirit (John iv. 24), and has eternal life (Rev. i. 4, 8). Man derives from God's works the knowledge of his invisible being and power (Rom. i. 20). As the God of love and light, he is revealed to us through Moses and the Prophets, and perfectly in the person of his own Son (John i. 18, xiv. 9). This knowledge which the believer has of God depends upon God's own special agency through the Spirit (Matt. xvi. 17; John vi. 44, etc.). Our present knowledge, however, is imperfect. "We see through a glass darkly" (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. v. 7, etc.). But in Christ, who is his image (2 Cor. iv. 4), we see God's dearest purpose revealed, and from him derive all the knowledge necessary for salvation and for consummate communion with God.

III. GOD IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY. — Theology cannot be entirely divorced from philosophy. And, fixed as the notion of God is which the Scriptures present, it was proper, as well as unavoidable, that it should be subjected to the scrutiny of reason. In its infancy Christian theology came in contact with the products of Greek philosophy, and was influenced by the definitions of Plato, the Neo-Platonists, and of Philo, who himself owed much, directly or indirectly, to Plato.

The general influence of these extra-Christian forces was in the direction of a negative and abstract conception of the Deity. In Gnosticism this abstractly conceived God is transformed into the dark background, which, according to Valentinus, is the first beginning and cause of all things, and has Silence (σιγή) for a consort. (See GNOSTICISM.) Within the Church, Justin Martyr and the apologetical writers who followed him, and especially the Alexandrine school, emphasized with Plato God's transcendence above nature; although the Scriptures always affirm, at the side of this, that he is a personal, holy, and loving Spirit. The more the influence of philosophy was felt, the more prominently did Christian theologians urge the negative and abstract element in God's nature. Origen defined him as simple being, without predicates, exalted above mind and matter, yet nevertheless as the Father, who eternally begets the Logos, and reveals himself through him. In contrast to this tendency was the anthropomorphic representation prevalent among the mass of Christians, which found its extreme expression in Tertullian, who associated a body with God. In this direction mention must be made of Dionysius Areopagita, whose theology was essentially Neo-Platonic. He taught that God's nature is absolutely undefinable, but at the same time speaks of a union with God which is nothing more than an ecstatic rapture, by which we become lost in the mystery of the Deity. The Areopagite's writings exerted an extensive influence upon the mysticism of after-periods in church history. Augustine was the first in the Western Church to concern himself with the scientific investigation of the divine nature. He laid stress, first of all, upon the self-conscious personality of God; but Platonic influence is evident in his further prosecution of the subject, when he defines God as the unity of all abstract perfections, as an absolutely simple essence, in which knowledge, volition, being, and all attributes, are one and the same.

The writings of Dionysius were given to the Western Church in the translation of Scotus Erigena. True being, says the latter, belongs only to God; so that whatever in finite things truly exists is nought else than God himself. This is Pantheism, from the charge of which he rescues himself by illogically teaching the doctrines of Creation and the Trinity. Scholasticism was under the immediate influence of Augustine, in its definition of God. Realism, if pressed, would have forced it to the conclusion that the Infinite only exists as it is found in the finite. But from this it held back. Thomas Aquinas and Albertus Magnus said God was not the essence of finite things; but their final cause and original moving principle. On the other hand, Duns Scotus insists that from the beginning God had will, and exercised volition; but this will was essentially absolute and arbitrary. Occam strongly emphasized this point; whence, from Abelard on, those protracted and subtle discussions whether any thing was impossible for him. In the fourteenth century, Eckhart, as the representative of mysticism, finds the aim of life to be to lose one's self in God. His views were extensively adopted in pious circles; but pantheistic heretics, the so-called Brothers of the Free Spirit, taught that God was every thing, and man was God, and deduced an immoral Antinomianism from the doctrine. The popular mind, in the Middle Ages, demanded mediators and intercessors in its approach to God; so that Luther afterwards complained that he was no longer regarded as a being full of love and compassion, but as a stern governor.

Avoiding the metaphysical subtleties of scholasticism, the Reformers emphasized the proposition that God is the God of redemption, who threatens the sinner with the curse and death, but subordinates every thing to his purpose of saving the lost. The dogmatic divergencies of the Lutheran and Reformed confessions point back to different conceptions of God's nature. The latter emphasized more strongly God's sovereignty, and the eternal decree by which he rejects a portion of the race. Against this the Lutheran theology guards. However, it must not be forgotten that Luther, in his earlier writings, predicates the same decree of God, and that he never subsequently, in a systematic way, contradicted this position. The theology of the next period enumerated the divine attributes under the heads "natural" and "moral," and affirmed, that, though our knowledge of God cannot be exhaustive, it is real, and sufficient for salvation. Socinianism presented God in the aspect of a Ruler endowed with consummate power and justice, whose knowledge of the future, however, is conditioned by the free will of man, which acts independently of him.

At the side of the traditional doctrine of the Church, philosophy now began to work out independent metaphysical systems. Spinoza's pantheism was condemned by theologians as palpably unchristian, yea, godless. But the philosophy of Leibnitz and Wolff enjoyed wide favor. It treated at length the arguments for God's existence, and defined God as the "most perfect Being." Kant's criticism shook to the very foundation the great arguments heretofore employed for God's existence, but replaced them by the moral argument, based upon the intuitive facts of the conscience and the moral law. Fichte gets no farther than a moral order in the universe; and the speculations of Schelling and Hegel substitute for God the idea of the Absolute, from which all the forms of thought and matter are derived. The descent from this proud Idealism to a bleak Materialism was startlingly rapid.

A new period begins with Schleiermacher, who built up his system of theology upon the facts of Christian experience, instead of metaphysical speculation. The theologians who agreed with him on this point sought to confirm the definition of God from Scripture, and contended against the pantheistic conception and for the divine personality; e.g., J. Müller and Rothe. Philosophers like J. H. Fichte, K. Ph. Fischer, Chalybaeus, Ulrici, and Lotze, have likewise stood forth as champions of God's personality. On the other hand, Biedermann still insists that God is an absolute spiritual but an impersonal essence; and Strauss in his last period took the final step over to materialism. In conclusion, it may be said that theology must always be ready to confess the imperfection of its definition of God. But this can never justify that school of thought which turns the living God into an abstraction, called the Absolute, which neither explains any thing, nor is itself intelligible.

GOD. I. ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF GOD. — The statement of St. Paul, that the "world by wisdom knew not God" (1 Cor. i. 21), is strictly true in the light of the history of religious systems. No heathen religion ever embodied the true conception of God: some of them had the most monstrous conceptions of him. The highest achievements of the best human systems of philosophy, such as Plato's, need to be supplemented by revelation. For Christians, sufficient proofs of the divine existence will always be the person, words, and works of Christ. So-called rational arguments have by some been considered impossible, on the ground that God is incomprehensible to rational thought (Jacobi). Others, from Arnobius down to Watson, the celebrated Methodist theologian (Theol. Institutes), have regarded them as either improper or superfluous. While they are in no wise essential to Christian piety, yet they have their place as attempts to show the accord of reason and revelation, and as a demonstration of the inadequacy of the former as compared with revelation. Before Kant sent forth his disparaging criticism, philosophy and theology dwelt extensively on the arguments: since that time, they have met with a varying fate. Schleiermacher's example in excluding them from his system of theology has been followed by not a few theologians (Thomasius, Philippi, etc.).

The arguments may be grouped in two classes, — those derived from a contemplation of ourselves, or the ontological and moral arguments; and those derived from a contemplation of the universe, or the cosmological and teleological arguments.

1. The Ontological Argument. — This proof argues from the pure intellectual idea of God up to the reality of his existence. The first to give definite form to it was Anselm. He reasons as follows: There is Something than which nothing greater can be conceived. Even the fool who says, "There is no God," has this idea; for he understands what is meant when he hears the proposition. But this "Something," etc., must exist in reality (in re), as well as in the intellect (in conceptu); for, if it exist only in the intellect, then something greater than it could be conceived, viz., that "Something" having objective existence; which is contradictory. Therefore that "Something," etc., exists in reality, as well as in the intellect. Clean as this argumentation seems to be, it is not free from serious logical error. It may be fairly questioned whether the first statement does not itself posit as having objective existence what it sets out to prove to exist. However, leaving this aside, the great objection lies in comparing that which has objective existence with a conception considered as having mere subjective existence, and declaring the former to be greater than the latter. A thing in real existence is exactly equal to its correspondent conception in the mind, neither less nor greater than it. A number written out on the slate is just equal to, and not greater than, the conception of that number. Not a single quality is added to the "Something," etc., as an objective reality, which it does not have as an idea. Kant was the first to apply this criticism. "Objective existence," he said, "is not a real predicate."

Descartes restated the argument: We have the conception of a most perfect Being. He must be an existent Being, he proceeded to argue, or we should have a most perfect Being imperfect. Leibnitz added a new element. It is absolutely necessary that something should exist whose existence inheres in its very essence. God is such a being; and such a being, if at all possible, exists. Wolff in Germany, Dr. Samuel Clarke in England, and others, have made able and elaborate statements of the argument. Dr. Clarke's argument starts with the proposition that something has existed from eternity, which, he says, "is so evident and undeniable, that no atheist in any age has ever presumed to assert the contrary." The ontological argument will always have a fascination for the mind. It does not prove God's existence; but, to use the language of Professor Flint (Theism, p. 285), it "has at least succeeded in showing, that unless there exists an eternal, infinite, and unconditioned Being, the human mind is in its ultimate principles self-contradictory and delusive."

2. The Cosmological Argument. — This proof starts from the sequences or effects in the universe. Aristotle among the ancients, and Thomas Aquinas and Leibnitz among Christian philosophers, have been its ablest exponents. Dr. Samuel Clarke, Kant, and others have denied its validity. Aquinas' argument was threefold. He argued back from motion to a first Mover, himself unmoved; from effects to a sufficient Cause; and from that which is only possible, and may cease to be, to a Being who exists necessarily. The validity of this argument hinges upon the answer to the question whether an endless retrogression of causes and effects is conceivable (regressus in infinitum). If the answer is, that it is impossible for the mind to conceive such a retrogression, then it follows necessarily that there exists an Absolute Essence, uncreated and eternal. But it may, according to Kant, with equal probability be asserted (on the basis of our experience), that such a retrogression is conceivable, and involves nothing contradictory to human experience. We know that every consequence has its antecedent, and every phenomenon its sufficient cause, so far as a phenomenon involves the idea of change. But the world itself may be regarded as an eternally existent essence, containing inherent in itself the germinating and begetting energy to which all phenomena are to be traced. The theory of evolution makes this no more probable

(as some have ventured hastily to assert), but, on the other hand, no less so. The world itself, then, with its germinating energy, is that absolute essence. The argument, then, by itself seems to be inconclusive.

3. The Teleological Argument.—This proof is the oldest of the arguments. In modern times Paley and the Bridgewater Treatises have ably stated and illustrated it. It finds order and arrangement in the universe, and the adaptation of means to ends. From these facts it draws the conclusion of a wise Intelligence as their only explanation. The "reign of law" (Duke of Argyll) has been abundantly illustrated and insisted upon; the marvellous order which reigns in the sidereal heavens, the wonderful adaptation of the members of the human body, as the eye and the hand, for the needs of man, the adaptation of the lower creation to supply his wants have been dwelt upon at length, and used to establish the conclusion that they betray Intelligent Design. This is known as the "physico-teleological," in opposition to the "historico-teleological" argument, which concerns itself with the facts and development of human history. Objections have been urged against the argument from design on two grounds: (1) That what is called design may as justly be called haphazard nature (the exact adjustment, for example, of the parts of the eye to vision, is indisputable; but this adjustment is conceivable as the blind combination of nature); (2) A broad class of facts is overlooked by the argument, and proves with equal force the want of design. Blights, famines, diseases, prevail, which interrupt the order of the universe, and interfere with the physical and mental happiness of man, and the life of other creatures. The world has malformations and monstrosities. Men are even born into the world crippled, so as to be unable to reach physical happiness. This class of objections has been ably stated by Mr. Mill, in his Three Essays on Theism. These objections may not be lightly set aside. It may be urged, in refutation of them, that there is an outlying purpose which even these exceptions must serve; that these inconsistencies and discordances are apparent, and not real. But this is a mere assumption, which no one can prove without Revelation. On the other hand, if it be granted that there is a preponderance of design or adaptation in the universe, this would fall short of proving that the world is the product of an omnipotent and intelligent Mind. Kant, who rejects the teleological argument, has well urged that at best it would bring us to an Architect of the world, not to a Creator. Even if it be agreed that the teleological argument does not establish the certainty of a supreme creative Intelligence, it cannot be denied that illustrations of design will always be powerful aids to faith for those already religiously disposed. The Scriptures frequently use them. "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see?" (Ps. xciv. 9, etc.).

4. The Moral Argument.—This proof starts from the facts of man's moral and spiritual nature. Kant, Sir William Hamilton, and others who reject the other arguments, grant the force of this one. It has been stated in different forms. (1) God is a necessary postulate of our whole spiritual nature. The idea of God seems to be germane to the race. From Cicero down, stress has been justly laid on the prevalence among all nations of a belief in a superior being. Again: without God our spiritual natures remain unsatisfied. The personal sense of dependence which expresses itself in prayer is universal. Worldliness and education may lead men to overcome or ignore it; but the natural impulse comes out in its power, when, in times of shipwreck or other peril, man cries aloud for help, and, be it observed, not to the forces of nature, but to a supreme Will who exists behind them. (2) The existence of the moral law within us can only be explained on the supposition of a Lawgiver. The sense of right and wrong is universal. Conscience declares them radically antagonistic and irreconcilable: it speaks in defiance of the will, even when that is set against hearing it, and determined to disobey it; and it commands and threatens with authority. Its word is ought, which Kant calls the categorical imperative. (3) Merit and happiness do not always go together in this world. Our sense of right demands that this should be the case, and forces us to believe in a just God, who in another world will rectify the inequalities of this.

The objections urged against the moral argument are two. The first asserts that conscience is a product of education. History proves the very opposite,—that the degeneracy of conscience is due to an indurating process, which Paul compares to searing with a hot iron (1 Tim. iv. 2). The second objection denies the assumption of a spiritual nature.

The general conclusions from a discussion of the arguments for God's existence are two. (1) That the mind of man is a hopeless enigma, and full of intuitive delusions; and that the universe is a cavernous mystery, if God do not exist. The beliefs of the great mass of mankind, as well as the confident assertion of the best philosophies, have alike been groundless, and the most ennobling counsels and the finest moral achievements been built upon a falsehood, unless he rule and govern. The human intellect shrinks from these awful inferences, and is forced, in spite of the apparent contradictions, to bow with Revelation before an omnipotent Governor of the universe. (2) The second thought is, that, although none of these arguments (except the moral argument) is by itself valid and convincing, each one contains elements, the combination of which makes the divine existence very probable, if not necessary for the mind. Professor Diman (Theistic Argument, p. 247) has put the case well in the following language: "The argument for the divine existence is complex and correlative. Not from one, but from many sources is the evidence derived; and its force lies in the whole, not in any of its parts."

II. ATTRIBUTES.—The attributes or properties of God are the modes in which we conceive of his nature. The distinction aids our finite minds in their attempts to understand God. But the attributes do not exist apart and separate from one another. Each is in itself the being of God, and identical with it. Three methods, mentioned for the first time by Dionysius the Areopagite, may be pursued to rise to a determination of the attributes; viz., denying to God all human imperfections (via negationis), affirming of him all proper human qualities in their consummate perfection (via eminentiæ), attributing to him all properties logically belonging to a First Cause (via causalitatis). Various classifications of the attributes have been made into positive and negative, natural and moral, absolute and relative, immanent and emanant, etc. An excellent summary is found in the definition of God in the Westminster Shorter Catechism: "God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth." They may be enumerated here as follows:—

1. Aseity. God has life in himself, undervived and inexhaustible (John v. 26). 2. Invisibility. God is Spirit (John iv. 24). No man hath seen God (John i. 18). His nature is immaterial. 3. Eternity, or God's infinity with regard to duration. He always has been, always will be (Ps. xc. 2; 1 Tim. i. 17, etc.). 4. Immutability. He changes not, in his nature (it does not grow or decrease), or in his purpose (Mal. iii. 6; Jas. i. 17). 5. Omnipresence. God is everywhere,—in heaven in a special manner, in hell, on earth, in the heart of the believer (Ps. cxxxix. 7; Isa. lvii. 15, etc.). 6. Omniscience. God is cognizant of all things. This knowledge is accurate and prescient (Matt. vi. 32). 7. Wisdom. God realizes the best designs by the use of the best means (Rom. xi. 33). It is manifest in the kingdoms of nature and grace. 8. Omnipotence. God has infinite power, and governs all things according to his will. He cannot deny himself by acting contrary to the laws of his own being. But in the truest sense nothing is impossible to God (Ps. xcvi. 3; Matt. xix. 26). 9. Holiness. God is absolute and stainless moral purity. Not only is sinning to him impossible, but also the toleration of sin (Deut. xxxii. 4; Hab. i. 13; 1 John i. 5). For this reason, God is absolutely reliable. 10. Justice. God demands of his creatures righteous action, and deals righteously toward them, according to the canons which he has laid down for the race. It is legislative, as implanting a moral nature and law, and judicial, as punishing the wicked (Rom. i. 32), and rewarding the good (Rom. ii. 7). 11. Love (1 John iv. 8). This is God's chiefest attribute, all the others being exercised in accordance with its dictates. It manifests itself as goodness towards all creation (Jas. i. 17), unmerited grace toward the sinner (Rom. iii. 24), mercy toward the suffering (2 Cor. i. 3), and long-suffering toward those who resist the calls of the Spirit (Rom. ii. 4). 12. Faithfulness. God is absolutely reliable. His words and promises will not fail (Num. xxiii. 19; Tit. i. 2).

GODEAU, Antoine, Bishop of Grasse (1636), and then of Vence; b. at Dreux, 1605; d. at Vence, April 21, 1672. He was a man of literary tastes and poetical gifts. Among his works were, Version expliquée du N. Testament (2 vols.), Les psaumes de David, traduits en vers français (some of which are sung in French Protestant churches), and Histoire de l'Église depuis le commencement du monde jusqu'à la fin du neuvième siècle (Paris, 1653-78). The last work is written in a more vivacious style than Fleury's, but less exact.

GODEHARD, St., b. at Ritenbach, Bavaria, 961; d. at Hildesheim, May 5, 1038; was educated at the court of the Archbishop of Salzburg, but entered the monastery of Nieder-Altach in 991, and became its abbot in 997. By Henry II. he was charged with reforming the monasteries of Hersfeld, Tegernsee, etc., and, having succeeded in this task, he was made Bishop of Hildesheim in 1022. As a bishop he developed a great building activity. He was also credited with having worked miracles; and in 1131 he was canonized by Innocent III. His life was written by a contemporary, Wolthere. See LEIBNITZ: Script. Rerum Brunsvic., I. 482, and Act. Sanct., Maji, Tom. I.

GODFREY OF BOUILLON (Duke of Lower Lorraine, and King of Jerusalem), the beloved leader of the first crusade; b. at Baisy, in Belgium, about 1060; d. in Jerusalem, July 15 or 18, 1100. He took the cross 1095, pawned his lordship of Bouillon to the church of Liege for thirteen hundred marks, collected eighty thousand infantry and ten thousand horsemen, and, after many adventures, arrived with the crusaders at Jerusalem, and took it, after a five-weeks' siege, July 15, 1099. "A Christian kingdom of Jerusalem was then founded, of which Godfrey was unanimously elected sovereign; but he refused to wear a crown of gold where his Lord had worn a crown of thorns, and accepted, instead of the kingly title, the humbler designation of 'Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre." His reign was very brief (only a single year), but full of brave deeds. He died lamented by both his Mohammedan and Christian subjects. Tasso has immortalized him in his Jerusalem Delivered; and history confirms his description of Godfrey as a pious, accomplished, and prudent knight. The only blot upon his record was his massacre of the Mohammedan defenders of Jerusalem; but even that is not inexcusable in view of the usages of the times and the circumstances of the siege.

GODWIN Francis, Bishop of Llandaff, and church historian; b. 1561, at Havington, Northamptonshire; d. April, 1633. He was the son of Thomas (d. 1590), Bishop of Bath and Wells, who fell into disgrace for marrying a second time. He studied at Christ Church, Oxford. His work, A Catalogue of the Bishops of England since the first planting of the Christian religion in this island (published 1601), secured for him a bishopric. Rerum Anglic. Henrico VIII., Eduardo VI., et Maria regnantibus, Annales, appeared 1616, and the posthumous work, The Man in the Moon, 1638, in which he advocates the Copernican system.

GODWIN, Thomas, a learned antiquarian; b. in Somersetshire, 1587; educated at Oxford; d. 1643. His work, Moses & Aaron; or the civil & ecclesiastical Rites used by the Ancient Hebrews, etc., Oxford, 1616 (12th ed., 1685), was a celebrated book for a century.

GOEPP, Jean Jacques, b. at Heiligenstein, Alsace, April 6, 1771; d. in Paris, June 21, 1855; studied at Strassburg; made a campaign in the republican army; and was appointed pastor of the French Protestant Congregation in Strassburg in 1802, and of the Lutheran Congregation in Paris in 1809. In Paris he developed a great and beneficial activity, gathering and organizing the Lutherans living in the city, establishing schools for their children, asylums and mutual insurance associations for their poor, a mission society, a Bible society, etc. He published a volume of sermons, and various pamphlets at special occasions.

GOERRES, Johann Joseph, b. at Coblenz, Jan. 25, 1776; d. at Munich, Jan. 27, 1848; one of the most conspicuous names in modern German literature, and, if not a man of great influence, at all events a character of much significance. He was an enthusiast. His first enthusiasm was the French Revolution. Hardly out of school, he established a paper (Das rotke Blatt) preaching liberty, equality, republicanism, and radicalism of the deepest dye. The paper was soon interdicted; but he immediately established another (Rübezahl im blauen Gewande), which also was interdicted. In 1799 he went to Paris on a political mission to the Directory; but the sight of Napoleon, who had just returned from Egypt, and overthrown the Directory, fell like a chill on his enthusiasm. He gave up politics, and returned to his studies. His second enthusiasm was the philosophy of Schelling, at that time rising in its morning glory; and, like the master, he wrote on every thing, — art, faith, and reason, physiology, mythology, etc., — and always brilliantly. But it proved easier to make a sensation than to get followers: his attempts to make a university career failed. His third enthusiasm was the liberation of the fatherland. In 1814 he returned to politics, and published the Rhei- nischer Merkur, — a paper whose leading idea is nationality rather than liberty, and which contains the soundest thoughts and most powerful expositions he ever produced. Napoleon called it the "fifth grand power." But it was interdicted in 1816 by a Prussian cabinet-order; and when, in 1820, his Deutschland und die Revolution was followed by another Prussian cabinet-order, this time for his arrest, he fled to Strassburg, despairing of ever seeing the world saved by politics. His fourth and last enthusiasm was the Roman-Catholic Church. He had always been a member of the Romantic school; and he now became the leader of the extreme left wing of that school, — those who were marching straightway to Rome. But he wrote with the same enthusiasm for this ghost of the past as he had formerly written for the ideals of the future. In 1827 he was appointed professor of history in Munich; and there he published, both large scientific works (Geschichte der christlichen Mystik, 1836-42, 4 vols.), and small polemical articles for the occasion, in Historisch-politische Blätter (1838). He was, indeed, the literary champion of Ultramontanism in Germany; but as literature is no fit weapon for Ultramontanism, as Ultramontanism likes best to avoid literature, with its arguments and its publicity, he could not help feeling that he was merely writing on running water.

LIT. — His collected works were published in Munich, 1854-60, 8 vols.; his letters, 1858-74, 3 vols. His life was written by MORITZ BRÜHL (Aix-la-Chapelle, 1854) and JOSEPH GALLAND (Freib., 1876). GOESCHEL, Karl Friedrich, b. at Langensalza, Oct. 7, 1784; d. at Naumburg, Sept. 22, 1861; was educated at Gotha; studied law at Leipzig; held appointments, first in the superior court of Naumburg (1819-34), then in the Department of the Interior in Berlin (1834-45), and was in 1845 made president of the consistory of the province of Saxony, with residence in Magdeburg, from which position he was forced to retire by the revolution (1848). He was a very prolific writer, and published about thirty volumes, besides about three hundred articles in periodicals. His great object was to work out a reconciliation between Christianity and modern culture as represented philosophically by Hegel, and poetically by Goethe, and to that end tend his principal works: Unterhaltungen zur Schilderung Göthescher Dicht- und Denkweise, Leipzig, 1834-38, 3 vols.; Ueber Nichtwissen und absolutes Wissen, 1829 (referring to Hegel as the former to Goethe); and Zerstreute Blätter aus den Hand- und Hilfs-acten eines Juristen, 1832-42, 4 vols. (relating to modern jurisprudence). H. E. SCHMIEDER.

GOETZE, Johann Melchior, b. at Halberstadt, Oct. 16, 1717; d. at Hamburg, May 19, 1786; studied at Halle, and was appointed pastor of the Church of the Holy Spirit at Magdeburg, 1750, and of the Church of St. Catharine in Hamburg, 1755. In 1777 he attacked Lessing on account of the publication of the Wolfenbüttel Fragments: and, of the many challengers who rose against him, Lessing selected Goetze for the combat, probably because he considered him the most important and the most dangerous. Goeze opened the controversy with an essay in the Freywilligen Beyträge, Dec. 17, 1777; then followed, in 1778, Etwas Vorläufiges gegen d. Herrn Hofrath Lessing, and Lessings Schwächen, in three parts. Lessing published in all eighteen pieces against Goeze, which are found in the collected editions of his works. See RÖPE: J. M. Goeze, eine Rettung, Hamburg, 1860; and A. BODEN: Lessing und Goeze, Leipzig, 1862.

CARL BERTHEAU.

GOG AND MAGOG. In Gen. x. 2 the second son of Japhet is called Magog, i.e., the name of a people living between Armenia and Media, somewhere on the shores of the Araxes. Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. is a prophecy against Gog, who is the king of the land of Magog, which evidently was then much farther north, across the Caucasus. Ezekiel's description of the inroad of Gog reminds us of that of the Scythians (B.C. 630), which had the same characteristics (cf. Herod., i. 103 sqq.), and probably the Scythians were in his mind as he wrote the prophecy; but they are not really described. Rather by Gog, King of Magog, is meant the leader of the movement of the great world-power against the kingdom of God,—the attack mentioned by other prophets of Israel (Ezek. xxxviii. 17), especially by Joel (iii. 9 sqq.), Micah (iv. 11 sqq.), Zachariah (xii. 2 sqq., xiv.). But the sentence of condemnation is already spoken, and the world-power is to be overthrown. The interpretation of this prophecy is simple. The overthrow of Magog has nothing to do with the overthrow of the Chaldeans: rather it means, that, after judgment has fallen upon all those peoples brought into contact with the Jews, there will be left a remnant from whom will come the impulse upon the world-power to incite it to oppose the kingdom, and by so doing to seal its own fate. In the Revelation (xx. 7 sqq.) Gog and Magog appear as two peoples, and, as in Ezekiel, are similarly overthrown. The names are also separated in Jewish theology (Targum to Num. xi. 27) and among the Mohammedans (Koran, 18, 93).

v. ORELLI.

The legendary interest in Gog and Magog is considerable. Thus in Astrakhan the story is told, that Alexander the Great overthrew these two great peoples, and drove them into the recesses of the Caucasus, where they are now in terror, because of the noise of twelve trumpets blown by the winds. But out of their captivity they are sure to come, and devastate the world. In Guild Hall, London, there are two effigies, fourteen feet high, of Gog and Magog, who, according to the legend, were the sole survivors of the race of giants descended from Diocletian's thirty-three bad daughters which Brute destroyed. These two were brought by him to London, and made porters at the royal palace's gate; and, when they died, their effigies took their place. The present figures were made in 1708; but similar ones can be proven to have existed as early as 1415, and probably much before. Geoffrey of Monmouth tells (Chron., i. 16) of a giant eighteen feet high, called Goëmagot (a corruption of Gog and Magog), who, with his brother Corineus, was the terror of Cornwall. See art. Gog and Magog, in Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., and BREWER'S Reader's Handbook.

COGERLY, Daniel John, a Wesleyan missionary, b. in London, August, 1792; d. Sept. 6, 1862.

In 1818 he was sent to Ceylon to take charge of the Wesleyan mission press at Colombo; and by devoting his great talents to Pali, the sacred language of the Buddhists, he achieved an acknowledged mastership. He was the author, in large part, of the Cingalese version of the Scriptures, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in that dialect issued Christiani Pragnyapti (Colombo, 1862), a treatise upon the evidences and doctrines of the Christian religion. Many of his studies appeared in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, of the Ceylon branch of which society he was the vice-president.

GOLDEN LEGEND (Legenda Aurea), a collection of legends of saints, without historical value, but very popular. It was compiled by the Dominican Jacobus de Voragine, in the thirteenth century, first edition, with date, but without place, 1474, seventy-one editions before 1500, new edition by Th. Graesse, Dresden, 1846. The book has great value for the student of middle-age superstition. See JACOBUS DE VORAGINE, and LEGEND.

GOLDEN NUMBER, the place of a given year in the lunar cycle, which cycle is equal to nineteen Julian years. The golden numbers were introduced into the calendar about 530, but arranged as if they had been introduced in 325 (the Council of Nicæa). They were usually marked in red or gold. But they are rejected from the Gregorian Calendar, as they fit only the Julian.

GOLDEN ROSE is made of wrought gold, and set with gems, blessed by the Pope on the fourth Sunday of Lent, and sent by him, as a token of his special regard, to some person, church, or community: if not sent, it is preserved in the Vatican. The first mention of the "rose" occurs in the eleventh century. Pope Urban V. decreed one should be sent every year. Among the recipients of this favor have been Joanna of Naples, Henry VIII. of England, Gonsalvo de Cordova, Napoleon III., Isabella II., Stephanie, Crown Princess of Austria (1882).

GOMARUS, Francis, b. at Bruges, Jan. 30, 1563; d. at Groningen, Jan. 11, 1641; studied at Strassburg, Neustadt, Cambridge, Oxford, and Heidelberg, and was in 1587 appointed pastor to the Flemish congregation at Francfort. In 1594 he was called to Leyden as professor of divinity, but resigned this position in 1611, because Vorstius was made the successor of Arminius. In 1614 he accepted an invitation to Saumur as professor of theology, and in 1618 he removed to Groningen. He was the leader of the severe Calvinistic party, and the declared adversary of Arminianism, which he opposed with virulence and intolerance, and finally caused to be condemned at the synod of Dort, 1618. His collected works, mostly polemical, appeared in one volume fol., in Amsterdam, 1645. See the art. ARMINIANISM.

GOMER (גֹּמֶר) Sept. Γαμέρ) is, in Gen. x. 2 and 1 Chron. i. 5, the name of the first-born son of Japheth. In Ezek. xxxviii. 6 it designates, together with Togarmah, a northern tribe, which, in alliance with Magog, fought the last battle against Israel.

The question, What nation or race is meant by this designation? has been differently answered at various times. Josephus (Antiq., I. 6, 1) derives the Galatians from Gomer; and a gloss on Syncellus reads Γαλῆρ, ἔξ ὧν Καππάδοκες. In the Targums, on the contrary (Jonath. and Jerush.), on Gen. x. 2, in the Targum on 1 Chron. i. 5, as well as in Breshit R., Gomer is explained by גרמניא ("Germania"), or אפריקא and אפריקא ("Africa"). As the ancestor of the Germanic race, the Targums specially designate the third son of Gomer, Togarmah; though later Jews also mention the first-born son, Ashkenaz. Africa — for אפריקא can hardly be explained by Phrygia, or some obscure place — they probably stumbled upon, because at one time a Germanic tribe, the Vandals, were settled there. Earlier Christian exegetes, as, for instance, Jerome, Nicholas of Lyra, and others, generally adopted the views of Josephus. Luther, however, arguing from Ezek. xxxviii. 6 and the striking similarity of names, explained Gomer by Cimmerians; and through Arias Montanus, J. A. Osiander (who identifies the Cimmerians with the Cimbrians), Calmet, and others, this view spread widely.

Which of these different interpretations is the true one is perhaps not so very difficult to decide. In spite of their various discrepancies, they all agree in the one point, — that Gomer designates a people native of Europe, living in the far-off north, and thence penetrating towards the south, even into Asia; and, if this the fundamental view is correct, the interpretation which explains Gomer by Cimmerians is the best. Nor is the view of Luther so completely at variance with that of Josephus. The Gauls, or Galatians, who, in the third century B.C., invaded, first Thracia and Greece, and then Asia Minor, resembled the Cimmerians so much on account of their European origin, wide-sweeping campaigns, and terrible savagery (Livy, 38, 37; 1 Macc. viii. 2; 2 Macc. viii. 20), that it was quite natural to consider the one a continuation or revival of the other: indeed, the two peoples were often identified with each other (Diod. Sic., 5, 32; Isid. Hispan. Etym., 9, 2, 26; Zonaras, Ann., 1, 5). That the above-mentioned Targums preferred to explain Gomer by Germania was the result of a simple wish to give a biblical origin and significance to this powerful race as soon as it had fairly entered the historical stage. How curiously historical events often affect ethnographical interpretations may be seen, for instance, from the explanation of Magog in the time of Jerome, as identical with the Goths.

GONDULF, b. near Rouen, 1023; d. at Rochester, 1108; became a monk in the monastery of Bec, 1059; accompanied Lanfranc to Caen, 1063, and to Canterbury, 1070, and became Bishop of Rochester 1077. He played an important part in the controversy between Lanfranc and William Rufus and Henry I.; but of his letters only two have been preserved. See his life in WHARTON: Anglia Sacra.

GONESIUS, Petrus, b. at Goniadz, 1525; began his public career in Krakau as a zealous adherent of the Roman Church, and was by the bishop and clergy of Samogitia sent to foreign countries for his further education, but returned from his visits to Wittenberg and Geneva, and from his study of the works of Servetus and the Moravian Anabaptist, not only a Protestant, but a champion of Antitrinitarian and Anabaptist views. He was condemned by the synods of Secemin (1556) and Brzesk (1558), but continued to labor for his ideas. Nevertheless, when a split actually took place in the Reformed Church of Poland (1565), between a Trinitarian and Unitarian party, Gonesius was not able to come to a thorough understanding with the latter. Of the later part of his life nothing is known. See SANDIUS: Biblioth. Antitrim., pp. 40 sqq.; LUBIENIECIUS: Hist. Ref. Pol., pp. 111 and 144; BOCK: Hist. Antitrim., vol. i. TRECHSEL.

GOOD FRIDAY, the anniversary of our Lord's passion and death. In the early Church it was also known as the "Festival of the Crucifixion" πίσχα σταυρώσιμον), the "Day of Salvation," etc. Its observance must date back to the earliest period of the Church. The early Church kept it as a rigorous fast and period of mourning; for, although the crucifixion was the last atoning act of Christ's life, yet it brought anguish to the Saviour, and removed him, for a time, from the disappointed disciples. The public services were conducted with deep solemnity and with the outward signs of sorrow. Constantine the Great (Euseb., Vita, I. 4) forbade the holding of judicial trials, markets, etc., on the day. In Spain they went so far as to close the churches, a procedure which the Council of Toledo (633) condemned. At the present day the Greek and Latin churches celebrate Good Friday with as strict severity as they do Easter with glad jubilation. The bells on the church-towers are silent, the light on the altars is extinguished, the altar furniture covered with black, and the usual communion omitted, the priest alone communicating. See EASTER.

GODELL, William, D.D., eminent missionary of the American Board; b. at Templeton, Mass., Feb. 14, 1792; d. in Philadelphia, Monday, Feb. 18, 1867. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1817, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1820. Already in 1818 he had determined to become a foreign missionary: so after graduation, he studied medicine for a while, and then spent a year in visiting the churches as agent of the American Board. He sailed for Beyrout, Dec. 9, 1822, where he arrived Nov. 16, 1823, having stopped for several months at Malta. He expected to proceed thence to Jerusalem; but the disturbed state of the country, in consequence of the Greek Revolution, prevented him. Finally (1828) all the missionaries in Beyrout were compelled to leave Syria, owing to the withdrawal of all consular protection, and went to Malta. In 1831 he received instructions from the Board to begin a new mission to the Armenians at Constantinople, and there arrived June 9; and until 1865 he labored with fidelity, enthusiasm, and success. He was rarely gifted, full of genial humor, sanguine, simple, courageous, modest, above all, holy. He won hearts, and moulded lives. One of his most important labors was the translation of the Bible into Armeno-Turkish, which was begun in Syria; the New Testament finished Jan. 8, 1830, and the Old Testament, Nov. 6, 1841. See E. D. G. PRIME: Forty Years in the Turkish Em- pire; or, Memoirs of Rev. William Goodell, D.D., New York, 1876, 6th ed., 1883.

GOODWIN, Charles Wycliffe, linguist; b. at King's Lynn, in Norfolk, Eng., in 1817; educated at Cambridge; d. at Shanghai, Jan. 17, 1878. Although his life was that of a lawyer, yet his tastes lay in the direction of philology. He edited the Anglo-Saxon Life of St. Guthlac, Anglo-Saxon Legends of St. Andrew and St. Veronica. He wrote, for the Cambridge Essays of 1858, an exhaustive essay upon Hieratic Papyri, and, for Essays and Reviews, upon Mosaic Cosmogony. He contributed to Lipsius' Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprache, and prepared translations of the Egyptian monuments for Records of the Past. In the judgment of competent critics he occupied a first place among Egyptian decipherers.

GOODWIN, John, an able Arminian divine and controversialist; b. in Norfolk, 1593; d. 1665. He was a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge; vicar of St. Stephen's, London, 1633; lost his vicarage (1545) by his literary efforts against the Presbyterians, and was restored by Cromwell, to whom he rendered services by his tracts, Right & Might well met (1648), a justification of the proceedings of the army against the Parliament in 1648, and The Obstructors of Justice (1649), vindicating the sentence of the High Court of Justice upon Charles I. At the Restoration, the latter tract, with several of Milton's, was publicly burned, and Goodwin himself declared incapable of holding any office, ecclesiastical or civil. Dr. Goodwin was an Arminian in theology, and has been called the Wiclif of Methodism. Mr. Wesley held his writings in high esteem, and published in an abridged form his Imputatio Fidei, or a treatise of Justification (Lond., 1642); and Watson, in his Theol. Institutes, quotes him extensively in chap. xiii., on Justification. His Redemption Redeemed, containing a thorough discussion of the great questions concerning election, reprobation, & the perseverance of the saints (Lond., 1651), is a monument of literary ability and diligence, and called forth replies from Dr. Kendall (1653), Robert Baillie (1656), and others, but especially Dr. Owen, in The Doctrine of the Saints' Perseverance (Oxf., 1654). Dr. Owen acknowledges his learning and controversial skill. In 1658 Goodwin replied to his critics in the Triumviri, etc. (pp. 500). See Christian Theology selected from Goodwin, by S. DUNN, Lond., 1836; Preface to Owen's Perseverance, etc.; and Life of Dr. Goodwin, by T. JACKSON, Lond., 1839.

GOODWIN, Thomas D.D., a "Patriarch and Atlas of Independency;" b. at Rollesby, Norfolk, Eng., Oct. 5, 1600; d. in London, Feb. 23, 1679. He was educated at the University of Cambridge, and was successively fellow and preacher and vicar of Christ Church; but, unable to stand Laud's interference, he resigned his preferments in 1634, left the university, and went to London, where he married. He lived in Holland as pastor of a small English congregation at Arnheim, 1639-41; but, when Laud was effectually silenced, he returned to London, and was one of the eminent Independent ministers there. From January, 1650, to the Restoration, he was president of Magdalen College, Oxford; afterwards he lived in London, preaching steadily, and writing voluminously. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly (1643-49), and one of the "Dissenting Brethren." Calamy thus estimates him: "He was a considerable scholar, and an eminent divine, and had a very happy faculty in descanting upon Scripture so as to bring forth surprising remarks, which yet generally tended to illustration." He is supposed to be the Puritan president described by Addison in No. 494 of the Spectator. His learning was very great, his spiritual experience profound, his theology rigidly Calvinistic. During his lifetime only sermons of his were published; but his Works appeared in London, 1681-1704, 5 vols. fol., and were reprinted at Edinburgh, 1861-66, 12 vols. 8vo, with Memoir by Robert Hall, D.D.

GORHAM CASE, a case involving the tenets of the Church of England on the question of baptismal regeneration. In 1847 the Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Henry Phillpotts, an energetic and bold High-Churchman, refused to institute Mr. Gorham as vicar of Bramford-Speke, to which he had been appointed by the lord-chancellor. The ground was, that Mr. Gorham denied spiritual regeneration to be conferred by the sacrament of baptism, or that infants were made thereby members of Christ. The case was taken into the courts, and decided against Mr. Gorham by the Court of Arches (1849), on the ground that baptismal regeneration was the doctrine of the Church of England. The case being appealed to the privy council, this decision was reversed; it being held that a difference of opinion had prevailed amongst the English Reformers, and ever since among prelates. Mr. Gorham was consequently admitted to the vicarage. See Gorham versus the Bishop of Exeter. The Arguments, with the Judgments verbatim, before the Committee of Privy Council, the Court of Queen's Bench, etc. To which is added the Bishop of Exeter's Protest, and Mr. Gorham's Formal Institution. 5th ed., Lond., 1850.

GORIUN, an Armenian scholar from the fifth century; was a pupil of Mesrop, and by him sent to Constantinople to study Greek, and gather Greek manuscripts; partook with Esnik in the translation of the Bible and some works of the Greek fathers; was made bishop of a Georgian diocese, and wrote a life of Mesrop, which has been published by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1833. See WELTE: Goriun's Lebensbeschr. d. h. Mesrop, Tübingen, 1844.

GORTON, Samuel, b. at Groton, Eng., about 1600; d. in Warwick, R.I., November or December, 1677. Before coming to America, he was in the employ of a linen-draper in London; but, desiring more religious liberty, he emigrated to Boston, 1636; removed to Plymouth because of religious troubles; was banished the Colony for heresy (winter of 1637, 1638); went to Aquidneck, R.I., with a few followers; was publicly whipped for calling the magistrates "just asses;" fled (1641) to Providence, but again got into difficulties, and went (September, 1642) to Shawomet, on the west side of Narragansett Bay, where he purchased land from the Indians. In 1643 Gorton and ten of his sect were tried in Boston for "damnable heresy," found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor in chains. In March, 1644, they were released, but ordered to leave the Colony in fourteen days. Gorton went to England, and returned (1648) with an order from the Earl of Warwick to the Massachusetts magistrates, that the Shawomet Colony should be free from interference; and so the last years of Gorton's life were peaceful. He named the Colony Warwick, out of gratitude to the earl. His sect, which quickly died out, was called the "Gortonians." Their belief has been thus given: "They contemned a clergy and all outward forms, held that by union with Christ believers partook of the perfection of God, that Christ is both human and divine, and that heaven and hell have no existence save in the mind." See Gorton's Simplicities Defence against seven-headed Policy (1640), reprinted in Rhode Island Historical Collections (1836), and in FORCE's Tracts (1846), vol. iv. no. 6; and Answer concerning Part of "New Englands Memoriall," reprinted in FORCE's Tracts (1846), vol. iv. no. 7; also J. GOSPEL and GOSPELS. I. MEANING OF THE WORD. — Gospel (Anglo-Saxon, "god-spell," "good spell," from spellian, "to tell") is the English equivalent for the Greek εὐαγγέλιον (from εὖ, "well," and ἀγγέλλω, "to bear message," εὐαγγέλιζω, "to announce good news"), and the Latin evangelium, which has passed into French, German, Italian, and other modern languages. The Greek means (1) Reward for good news, given to the messenger, or to God, and a thank-offering or sacrifice (so in Homer, Xenophon, Plutarch, etc., but always in the plural, εὐαγγέλια); (2) Good news, or glad tidings of any kind; (3) In the Christian sense, as used in the New Testament, good tidings of salvation by Jesus Christ; (4) In the ecclesiastical sense, the historical record of this salvation, or of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, or the gospel history, which we have in a fourfold form.

II. KINDS OF GOSPELS. — (1) Four Canonical Gospels, written by apostles and apostolic men, and recognized by the Christian Church as authentic and reliable. (2) A large number of Apocryphal Gospels, of later and obscure origin, and rejected as mere fictions. They serve, however, the good purpose of confirming the truth of the Canonical Gospels, and show, by their infinite inferiority and silliness, the utter incapacity of the human imagination to produce such a character as Jesus of Nazareth. They are counterfeits and caricatures of the inimitable original. See APOCRYPHA OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. We confine ourselves here to the Canonical Gospels.

III. GENERAL CHARACTER OF THE GOSPELS. — They are beyond all question the most important and the most popular books ever written. They contain the only authentic record of the history of all histories, which interests the whole world, and can never grow old. The very opposition to them, and the immense and ever-growing literature clustering around them, show their power and charm. And yet they were written by humble and unlearned fishermen of Galilee; but they were in the school of Christ, and filled with his Spirit. This, and this alone, explains the mystery. Without the miracle of Christ's person, the Gospels would be the most incredible of all miracles. They are properly only one and the same Gospel in its fourfold aspect and relation to the human race ("the fourfold Gospel," τετράμορφον εὐαγγέλιον, according to Irenæus): hence they are styled in ancient manuscripts the Gospel according to (not of) Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. The first and fourth are by apostles; the second and third, by pupils of the apostles, and thus indirectly apostolical. Mark is closely connected with Peter (as his "interpreter"), Luke with Paul (as his companion in missionary travel and work). The first three were written between A.D. 60 and 70, certainly before the destruction of Jerusalem, to which they point as a future event, though near at hand. "This generation [then living] shall not pass away till all be fulfilled." Had they been written after the terrible catastrophe of 70, they would have referred to it in some way. The attempt of the Tübingen school to assign them to a later date, even the second century, has utterly failed; and some of the most advanced critics of that school (as Hilgenfeld and Keim) have returned to the traditional view, at least as far as Matthew is concerned; while Mark has been vindicated by other unbiassed critics (Weisse, Wilke, Ewald, Meyer, Weiss) as the primitive Gospel, which faithfully records the oral preaching of Peter. The fourth Gospel was probably written towards the close of the first century, at Ephesus. Before the middle of the second century, all four were generally received and used in the churches as one collection. This is confirmed by the independent testimonies of the Ante-Nicene Fathers (Justin Martyr, Tatian, Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, etc.), by the Gnostics, and other heretics. They are not complete biographies of Jesus, but selections of characteristic features, as they seemed most important to each evangelist for his purpose. Justin Martyr (140) properly called them memoirs, or memorabilia (ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν ἀποστόλων). The common aim of the Gospels is to lead the reader to the faith that Jesus of Nazareth is the promised Messiah of the Jews, and the Saviour of all men (John xx. 30, 31).

IV. CHARACTERISTIC DIFFERENCES. — Each Gospel has a marked individuality, corresponding to the author's education, talent, taste, and mission. Matthew wrote in Palestine, and for Jews, to show them that Jesus is the fulfiller of prophecy, and the true King and Lawgiver of Israel; Mark, in Rome, for Roman readers, to exhibit Jesus as the mighty wonder-worker and Son of God; Luke, for Greeks and Gentiles, to set him forth as the merciful Saviour of all men; John, for Jewish and Gentile Christians combined, and for all future ages: Matthew (formerly a tax-gatherer, and accustomed to keeping accounts) follows the topical and rubrical order; Luke (an educated Hellenist and a physician), the chronological order; John (the trusted bosom-friend of Christ) combines both with an internal development of the growing antagonism between Christ and carnal Judaism; Mark gives (as from the first impressions of his master, the impulsive Peter) fresh, rapid, graphic sketches. The first three evangelists agree much in matter and language, and are consequently called "Synoptists;" their Gospels, the "Synoptic Gospels." John stands alone, as the ideal and spiritual evangelist, who introduces us into the holy of holies: his Gospel is the purest, deepest, and sublimest of all literary compositions, the Gospel of Gospels, "the one, true, tender, main Gospel," "the heart of Christ." Yet the first three are just as necessary, and give the historical basis, the divine humanity of Christ; while John, going back to the eternal Logos, presents to us the incarnate divinity of Christ. The poetry and pictorial art of the Church (since the time of Irenæus and Jerome) has represented the four Gospels under the four rivers of Paradise, and the four cherubic figures of Ezekiel (i. 15, x. 1, xi. 22), and the four living creatures (Zōa) of the Apocalypse (iv. 4-9, etc.), which reflect the Divine majesty and strength in the animal creation. To Matthew is assigned the figure of a man; to Mark, the lion; to Luke, the sacrificial ox; to John, the soaring eagle. Adam of St. Victor, the greatest Latin poet of the middle ages, has devoted two of his finest poems to this subject. His description of John is very musical and striking:—

"Volat avis sine meta
Quo nec vates, nec propheta Evolavit altius.
Tam implenda quam impleta,
Numquam vidit tot secreta
Purus homo purius."

V. CREDIBILITY OF THE GOSPELS. — They make upon every unsophisticated reader the impression of absolute honesty and trustworthiness. They cannot possibly be the mythical or legendary production of a pious fancy (as Strauss and Renan would fain make us believe), or of a calculating adaptation to certain religious tendencies (Baur and the Tübingen school). It would take more than a Jesus to invent a Jesus. The evangelists tell with the utmost frankness and simplicity the story of Christ, without note or comment, without mentioning their name, without concealment of the errors and failings of the disciples (themselves included), even the denial of their leader, and the treason of Judas. The discrepancies in details only heighten the credibility, and exclude the suspicion of collusion and conspiracy. They show the independence of their witness to the essential facts. The genuineness and truthfulness of these books rest on stronger evidence than that of any other historical records, ancient or modern. This has been acknowledged by eminent writers who are free from all doctrinal or sectarian bias. Goethe says, "I regard the Gospels as thoroughly genuine; for we see in them the reflection of a majesty which proceeded from the person of Christ, — a majesty which is as divine as any thing that ever appeared on earth." Rousseau remarks that "the gospel history can be no fiction, else the inventor would be greater than the hero" (l'inventeur en seroit plus étonnant que le héros). And yet the Jesus of the Gospels is admitted by all competent judges to be the purest character conceivable. If there is no truth and reality in him, it is nowhere to be found. Take away the historical Christ, the Life and Light of the world, and history is as dark as midnight; but with him it is a revelation of the infinite wisdom and love of God in the salvation of mankind. — For particulars, see arts. HARMONY, SYNOPTISTS, MATTHEW, MARK, LUKE, and JOHN.

VI. LIT. — This has immensely increased in the last thirty years, in connection with the numerous Lives of Jesus, by Schleiermacher, Strauss, Renan, Neander, Ewald, Lange, Keim, Ellicott, Andrews, Farrar, Pressensé, etc. We mention:—

(1) the critical introductions to the New Testament, by De Wette, Bleek, Davidson (2d ed., 1882), Reuss (5th ed., 1874), Hilgenfeld (1875).

(2) The general commentaries on the Gospels, by Olshausen, De Wette, Meyer, Lange, Nast, Keil, Alford, Wordsworth, also the Speaker's (with an able introduction to the Gospels, by Archbishop Thomson, 1878), and those by Ellicott, Schaff (International Revision Commentary, 1882).

(3) Special commentaries on Matthew and Mark, by Morison and Alexander; on Luke, by Godet; on John, by Lücke, Tholuck, Hengstenberg, Luthardt, Westcott (in Speaker's), Milligan and Moulton, Godet (3d ed., 1881), Weiss (6th ed. of Meyer, 1880).

(4) Critical discussions on the origin, genuineness, and inter-relationship of the Gospels began with Eichhorn, Marsh, and Schleiermacher, and were carried on chiefly by Gieseler, Baur, Hilgenfeld, Holtzmann, Ewald, Renan (Les Évangiles, 1877), Bleek, Wieseler, Ebrard, Weiss, Weizsäcker, the anonymous author of Supernatural Religion, reviewed and refuted by Lightfoot (in the Contemporary Review, 1875 sqq.).

(5) Special works on the Gospels. The most useful and accessible are THOLUCK: The Credibility of the Gospel History (against Strauss), Hamburg, 1838; DA COSTA: The Four Witnesses (also against Strauss), translated from the Dutch, London, 1851; TISCHENDORF: When were our Gospels written? 4th ed., Leipzig, 1866, translated into several languages; NORTON: The Evidences for the Genuineness of the Gospels, Boston, 1846-48, 3 vols., abridged ed., Boston, 1875; ROW: The Historical Character of the Gospels, London, 1865-67, The Jesus of the Evangelists, London, 1868; WESTCOTT: Introduction to the Gospels, London, 1860, 6th ed., 1881; SANDAY: The Gospels in the Second Century, London, 1876; D. S. GREGORY: Why Four Gospels? New York, 1877; HUIDEKOPER: Indirect Testimony of History to the Genuineness of the Gospels, New York, 2d ed., 1879; JOHN KENNEDY: The Four Gospels, their Origin and Authorship, London and Philadelphia, 1880 (American Sunday-School Union); FISHER: The Beginnings of Christianity, New York, 1877; EZRA ABBOT: The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, Boston, 1880. Of older works, LARDNER'S Credibility of the Gospel History (London, 1727-57) is still very valuable. The best synoptically arranged text is RUSHBROOKE'S Synopticon (Camb., 1880, 1881, 2 parts), where the differences in the narratives are marked by difference of type and color, which greatly facilitates the comparative study of the Gospels. PHILIP SCHAFF.

GOSPELLER, the word was formally used in four senses: (1) Of the followers of Wiclif, because they circulated the Scriptures; (2) Of evangelists; (3) Of the reader of the gospel at the altar during the communion service; (4) Of those in the sixteenth century, in the Church of England, who were given to Bible reading and preaching. These last, it would seem from the remarks of Latimer and Cranmer, were not always so pious as they pretended to be.

GOSSNER, Johannes Evangelista, b. at Hau-

sen, near Augsburg, Dec. 14, 1773; d. in Berlin, March 20, 1858; studied at Dillingen, where he, like Martin Boos and others, received the first strong impulse towards evangelical Christianity. Having been ordained priest in 1797, he was pastor of Dirlewang from 1804 to 1811, but changed this charge for a small benefice in Munich in order to gain leisure for literary pursuits. In 1817 he was dismissed, however, as his evangelical tendencies became more and more apparent, and in 1826 he actually left the Roman Church, and embraced Protestantism. From 1829 to 1846 he was minister at the Bethlehem Church in Berlin, and developed a great and beneficial activity, founding schools and asylums, and sending out missionaries to heathen lands. His institutions are continued. His preaching was very plain, popular, effective, and thoroughly evangelical. [The great church-historian, Neander, loved to hear him above all other preachers of Berlin.] His principal works, Schatzkästlein, Goldkörner, the Life of Boos, etc., were written just before his conversion was made public. His life was written by BETHMANN-HOLLWEG, Berlin, 1858, PROCHNOW, Berlin, 1864, and H. DALTON, Berlin, 2d ed., 1878. W. HOLLENBERG.

GOTHS, The, lived in the regions along the northern shore of the Black Sea, from the Danube to the Don, when, in the middle of the third century, it came to a sharp conflict between them and the Romans. They defeated and killed the Emperor Decius in 251. Ten years later on, they secured a fleet, conquered Trebizond, destroyed the Temple of Diana in Ephesus, and plundered Athens in 262. Again ten years passed, and, in spite of the severe reverses they had suffered in the mean time, they compelled (in 272) the Emperor Aurelian to cede to them the province of Dacia, situated between Mœsia and Sarmatia, and bounded by the Danube, the Theiss, the Carpathian Mountains, and the Black Sea. There they quietly remained for about a century, during which period a separation arose among the Ostrogoths, or East Goths, living to the east of the Pruth, and the Visigoths, or West Goths, living to the west of the Pruth. During this period they also became acquainted with Christianity.

They brought back from their campaigns in Mœsia, Thracia, and Asia Minor, Christian captives, and by those captives the first seeds of Christianity were sown among them. In a letter communicating the martyrdom of Sabas (Act. Sanct., April 12), the Christians among the Goths addressed the Cappadocian congregations as their mother-church; and what progress Christianity had made through this channel may be inferred from the fact that there was a Gothic bishop (Theophilus Gothiæ metropolis) present at the Council of Nicæa, 325. The complete conversion, however, of the Goths, was the work of Ulfilas (318-358); which article see. He labored among the Visigoths, but his influence reached also the Ostrogoths. But the Christianity which he established among the Goths was Arianism; and when, in the latter part of the fourth century, a great portion of the Visigoths, pushed beyond the Danube by the advancing Huns, came to settle within the boundaries of the Eastern Empire, conflicts arose with the Orthodox Church. The Emperor Theodosius (379-395) seems to have treated the matter with great delicacy. But his exertions to bring the Goths over to the Orthodox Church failed, and so did those of Chrysostom.

Immediately after the death of Theodosius the Visigoths arose, and began to wander. Under the leadership of Alaric they invaded Greece in 395, and took and sacked Athens. In 402 they broke into Italy, and in 410 they took and sacked Rome. But it was Paganism, and not Christianity, which suffered under this calamity. The Pagan inhabitants were scattered to the winds; while the Christians remained, and even enriched themselves by appropriating the Pagan temples, and transforming them into Christian churches. Alaric's son, Athaulf, married Placidia, sister to the Emperor Honorius, left Italy, and founded in Southern Gaul a Gothic empire, with Toulouse as his residence. Of the rulers of this empire Theodoric I. fought by the side of the Roman governor of Gaul, Aëtius, on the Catalaunian field (451), against Attila; and Theodoric II. invaded and conquered Spain (456). In the beginning the Arian Goths lived peaceably among the orthodox Romans and Romanized Celts in Gaul; but when their king, Euric (466-483), instituted persecutions, partly from religious and partly from political reasons, the orthodox made an alliance with the Frankish king, Clovis, who defeated the Goths at Vouglé, near Poitiers (507), and drove them beyond the Pyrenees. In Spain the Gothic Empire flourished until overthrown by the Saracens after the battle of Xeres de la Frontera (711). But in Spain the Goths were converted. At the Council of Toledo (581), the Arians under the king, Leovigild, and the Catholics under their metropolitan, Leander, met together, and a grand disputation was held, the result of which was, that, at the next Council of Toledo (589), King Reccared and most of his Gothic subjects abjured Arianism.

Meanwhile the Ostrogoths had first followed Attila, and fought with him against Aëtius and Theodoric; then, after Attila's death, they separated from the Huns, and settled in Pannonia; and finally, under their great king, Theodoric (475-526), they conquered Illyria and Thessalia from the Eastern Empire, defeated Odoacer several times in Northern Italy, captured Rome, and formed a great empire, bounded north-west and north by the Rhone and the Danube, and with Ravenna for its capital. The Ostrogoths were also Arians; but Theodoric's relations with the Catholic Church in Italy were most friendly. He protected and enriched it, which, perhaps, was due to the influence of his councillor, Cassiodorus. Only when the East-Roman emperor, Justin, issued edicts against the Arians among his subjects, and even raised persecutions against them, Theodoric was provoked, not to retaliation, but to a kind of self-defence. He sent the Bishop of Rome, John, to Constantinople, and, as this had no result, he felt suspicious of conspiracy; and the Pope was imprisoned, and the senators Symmachus, Albinus, and Boëthius were beheaded. But Theodoric died the very next year, and with his death began immediately the dissolution of the Ostrogothic Empire. During the next twenty-six years, or until the defeat of Tejas by Narses (552), the religious questions were completely at rest; and, with the death of Tejas, not only the Ostrogothic Empire, but the Ostrogoths themselves, disappeared from history.

GOTTSCHALK, a monk, and the originator of the predestination controversy in the ninth century; was, while yet a child, brought to the monastery of Fulda, but protested afterwards, when he grew up, that it had been done against his will. The synod of Mayence (829) declared in favor of releasing him from his vow; but his abbot, Rabanus, refused to do so, and Gottschalk was sent to the monastery of Orbais, in the diocese of Soissons, where he remained a monk. He studied with passionate energy, especially Augustine and Fulgentius; and the view he adopted or developed he took no pains to conceal. Already in 840 Bishop Noting of Verona told Rabanus, whom he met in the emperor's camp on the Lahn, of the confusion Gottschalk had caused on a visit to Italy by his views of predestination, according to which God was the author of evil, and forced the lost to sin. Afterwards, when Gottschalk visited Italy a second time, Rabanus, now Archbishop of Mayence, wrote to the Count of Friuli, and warned him against the heresies of the subtle monk. Gottschalk wandered, preaching, through Dalmatia and Pannonia, to Bavaria, and arrived at Mayence in the fall, while the general diet was sitting. Before a synod of German bishops, convened by Rabanus, he laid his confession of the double predestination, and accused Rabanus of Semi-Pelagianism. But his doctrines were condemned as heretical; and he was sent to Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims and his metropolitan superior, to be imprisoned and punished. In the spring of 849 Hincmar convened a synod of French bishops at Quiercy; and not only were the doctrines of Gottschalk condemned, but his papers were burnt, and he himself was cruelly whipped, and then shut up half dead in the dungeon of the monastery of Hautvilliers. He remained, however, firm to the last. On his death-bed (868) the sacrament was offered him on the condition that he should recant; but he refused.

GOTTSCHALK, ruler of the Wends, and martyr; was educated in the monastery of St. Michael at Lüneburg, but left the monks, and abandoned Christianity altogether, as soon as he heard that his father Ūto, ruler of the Wends, had been killed by a Saxon. For the sake of revenge he stirred up his countrymen to a frightful war against the Saxons; and, as Christianity was one of the most conspicuous institutions planted among the Wends by the Saxons, the war began with massacring the Christians, and destroying their churches.

But Gottschalk was finally defeated by Duke Bernard of Saxony, and taken prisoner, and in his captivity he returned to Christianity. After a stay of ten years at the court of Canute the Great, King of Denmark and England, he went back to Wendland, and by the aid of Canute he united (1047) Holstein, Mecklenburg, Pomerania, and the Brandenburg marches into one powerful Wendish empire. He became himself one of the most zealous missionaries Christianity ever had had in those regions. He translated the liturgical formulas into the Wendish tongue; he built schools, churches, and monasteries; and he preached himself to his subjects. But there was among the Wends an actual hatred to Christianity. It broke out once more; and June 7, 1066, Gottschalk was murdered by his Pagan countrymen.

GOUDIMEL, Claude, b. in Franche-Comté, 1510; killed in the Huguenot massacre at Lyons, 1572; lived in Rome as a music-teacher in 1540, when Palestrina studied there; kept a note-printing establishment in Paris, 1555; entered the Reformed Church in 1562, and composed the tunes to Clement Marot's and Beza's translations of the Psalms. It is often said that he was the composer of the Huguenot hymns, such as they are still sung this very day; but that is a mistake. They were composed by Louis Bourgeois and Maître Pierre, and Goudimel only added the accompaniment. See O. DOUEN: Clement Marot et le psautier huguenot.

GOUGE, Thomas, son of William; b. at Bow, Middlesex, Sept. 1, 1605; d. at London, Oct. 29, 1681. He was a fellow of King's College, Cambridge; obtained the living of St. Sepulchre's, London; was ejected at the Restoration for non-conformity (1662), after which time he devoted himself to charitable enterprises. He was particularly interested in evangelization and education in Wales, and travelled annually thither to preach, and visit the schools. Aided by friends, he had printed many Welsh Bibles and religious books for distribution gratuitously, or at a small price. He spent his fortune in good works. A collected edition of his Works, with a short account of his life, was published, London, 1706. His Surest and Safest Way of Thriving was reprinted, London, 1856, with biographical introduction by Thomas Binney.

GOUGE, William, D.D., b. in Stratford Bow, in Middlesex County, Eng., Nov. 1, 1575; educated in Paul's School, London, by his uncle Ezekiel Culverwell, a distinguished Puritan, and at Eton School prepared for King's College, Cambridge, which he entered in 1595, where he became fellow in three years, and subsequently lecturer of logic and philosophy. During his nine years at Cambridge he was never absent from morning prayers in the chapel, and was so strict and careful in all his life and studies as to earn the title "an Arch-Puritan." Reluctantly he was withdrawn from his studies to enter upon the active work of the ministry. He was ordained in June, 1608, in the parish of Blackfriars, where he remained until his death (Dec. 12, 1653), one of the most distinguished preachers and pastors of the metropolis, accounted "the father of the London divines, and the oracle of his time." In his early ministry he was brought into trouble with King James and the government by his publication of Henry Finch on The Calling of the Jewes (1621), and was thrown into prison. After nine weeks he was released, having given a statement of his own opinions, which were entirely orthodox. He took his degree of doctor of divinity in 1628. Several volumes of his sermons were issued, The Whole Armour of God (1616, 4to, pp. 523), Domestic Duties (1622, 3d ed., 1634, 4to, pp. 704), Guide to goe to God (1626, 4to, pp. 340), God's Three Arrows (1631, pp. 176), The Saint's Sacrifice (1632, pp. 290), and others. He was also distinguished for his method of catechising, which was first published without his knowledge, but afterwards revised and edited by himself in many editions; the eighth (1637, 4to) containing a larger and lesser catechism, with prayers. In 1643 he was made a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and took an active part in their proceedings, in 1647, taking the place of Herbert Palmer, lately deceased, as one of the assessors. He was on the committee for the ordination of ministers, and was chosen with others to write the Assembly's Annotations on the Bible, his part being from 1 Kings to Job. He assisted in the preparation of the Westminster Confession of Faith and in the conflict with the separatists of the day. He was chosen prolocutor of the first Provincial Assembly of London, May 3, 1647, and was a recognized leader of the London ministers, uniting with them in protesting against the murder of Charles I. and the usurpations of Cromwell. His last work was his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, which he barely lived to finish, and which was published after his death, by his son, in 1655 (2 vols. folio), — a very able and useful work of exposition, and of permanent value to the Church. For further information, see his Life by his son, in the Introduction to the folio edition of the Commentary on Hebrews; also in CLARK'S Lives of 32 English Divines, 3d ed., 1877; REID'S Mem. of Westminster Divines, 1811; BROOK'S Lives of Puritans, vol. GOULART, Simon, b. at Senlis, 1543; d. at Geneva, 1628; was pastor, and, after the death of Beza, president of the clergy of Geneva. He was a learned man and a prolific writer, though most of his works (of which a list is given in Senebier, Histoire littéraire de Genève, II. 72) are collections; as, for instance, Mémoires de la Ligne, Geneva, 1590-99, 6 vols., re-edited and augmented by Goujet, Amsterdam, 1758; Recueil des choses mémorables sous Henri II., 1598, etc.

GOZAN (Heb. גוזן; Assyr. Gu-za-na; LXX. Γοζάν) is mentioned in the following passages of the Old Testament: 2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11, xix. 12 (= Isa. xxxvii. 12); 1 Chron. v. 26. From these we learn that it was a place which Assyrian kings had subjugated, and that by the "river of Gozan" (= the Habor; Assyr. Habor) the conqueror of Samaria (Sargon), and Tiglath Pileser, or Pul, before him, had made settlements of Israelitish captives. The cuneiform inscriptions locate Gozan between the Tigris and the Euphrates. Its proximity to the Habor, a large eastern tributary of the Euphrates, and its mention (2 Kings xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12) in connection with the Mesopotamian names Haran, Rezep, and B'né Eden, are additional proofs of this location. Gozan was originally the name of a city, and always appears with the prefix "city" in the inscriptions: later the name seems to have been applied to a district. It is in all likelihood the Γαζιτις of Ptolemy (Geogr., V. 17 (18), ed. Wilberg.), lying in Northern Mesopotamia.

GRAAL, The Holy (also called "St. Grail," "Sangreal," etc., and incorrectly spelled "Grail"), is the name of the bowl out of which our Lord, on the night of his betrayal, ate the Paschal lamb. It was removed from the upper room by Joseph of Arimathea, and used by him to catch the blood from Christ's wounds as the body was taken down from the cross. Joseph carried it with him to Britain, whither he was sent by Philip the Evangelist. The Holy Graal figures largely in the Arthurian legends, and is the subject of one of Tennyson's idyls. It had miraculous qualities. By it Joseph was kept alive, without food, for forty-two years while imprisoned by the Jews; and by it he was spiritually enlightened. One of Joseph's descendants, to whom the keeping of the Holy Graal had come, proved unworthy, and the cup was lost. Arthur's knights endeavored to recover it; but all save Sir Galahad failed, because it could not be found by any one who was not a virgin in body. Several churches in France and Italy claimed to have it; and there is now in Genoa a cup brought by the Crusaders of 1101, which was at one time considered the Holy Graal. The explanation of all this is, that by the Holy Graal is meant the holy wafer which has been transmuted into the veritable body of Christ. The legend is, therefore, a legend of the Eucharist. The "quest of the Holy Graal" is the attempt to see the Saviour as he is revealed in the Eucharist.

"The word 'graal' is a corruption of gradale, or gradule, the Latin name for a liturgical collection of psalms, and texts of Scripture, so called because they are sung as the priest is passing from the epistle to the gospel side of the altar. The author of the Graal conception meant by graal, or gradale, not the sacred dish (escuelle), but the mysterious book revealed to the supposed hermit of 717, in which he finds the history of the escuelle." The author of the legend was probably Walter Map, a canon of Salisbury, in the twelfth century. From England it spread all over Europe. Besides the derivation already given, there are others, as from the Old French grasal ("the sacramental cup"), a corruption of sanguinis realis, corrupted to sangrasal, sangreal. GRABE, Johann Ernst, b. at Königsberg, July 10, 1666; d. in London, Nov. 13, 1711; went to England in 1697, and was made chaplain of Christ Church, Oxford, 1700. He is famous for his editions of the Septuagint (Oxford, 1707-20, 4 vols.), *Spicilegium SS. GRACE. The grace of God is the underlying principle and essential characteristic of the Christian religion. The doctrine has a place, and sheds a peculiar lustre, in all the five divisions of systematic theology. It is to a certain extent the crown of the divine attributes, appears in anthropology as the decree of salvation, is the fundamental idea of Christ's life and work, underlies the agency of the Spirit, and accomplishes its perfect work in the consummation of redemption in the life to come.

God shows himself gracious by hearing prayer (Exod. xxii. 27), foregoing wrath (xxxii. 12), and making his face to shine upon the good (Num. vi. 25). The Scriptures represent grace as the twin, now of truth (Ps. xcvi. 3; John i. 14), now of justice (Hos. ii. 19). John (i. 16), Paul (Rom. iii. 24), and Peter (1 Pet. i. 13) agree in defining the fundamental principle of Christianity by the one word "grace." Some of the older theologians connected it with the divine love; others, with the divine goodness. A distinction has been made between grace, mercy, and long-suffering in this way: grace is God's goodness to the sinner, who does not deserve it (Eph. ii. 5, 8); mercy, his goodness to the suffering (Ps. xxv. 2); and long-suffering, his goodness in delaying the punishment of sin, and affording the sinner further time to repent. Some of the modern theologians almost pass by grace in the discussion of the attributes; and Schleiermacher (§ 80) defines it as the power of the divine consciousness in the soul. Grace is the benevolence of God extended towards sinners, and overcoming their resistance by ethical means. It is its very nature to destroy the guilt of sin, and redeem the sinner. It was, however, not for the first time called into exercise at the fall, but was active in the eternal good pleasure (eudokia) and fore-ordination (prôgynosis) of God. It is the harmonious co-working of love and justice. The relation of grace to mercy is this: grace removes guilt, mercy removes misery from all creatures that suffer. But they not only remove, they make evil to work out the good. Grace transforms [imputed] guilt into a saving penalty; and mercy transforms death into the poison of death, or the effectual means of redemption.

But the grace of God is more than an attribute of his nature, it is the very soul of revelation. God's eternal decree of grace (Eph. i. 5) includes the foreknowledge and election of the sinner, and in its revelation founds the covenant of grace, and after the fall establishes the kingdom of grace. This distinction between the covenant of grace and the covenant of works has been most insisted upon by Reformed theologians, especially by Coccejus (Summa doct. de fædere et testamentis Dei, Lugd. Bat., 1648). The purpose of divine grace which lies at the basis of the O. T. dispensation (Gen. iii. 15) is fully realized in the life of Christ (Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4). Christ's very nature is grace (Rom. iii. 25); and hence his life was a continuous agency of grace, and its consummation the atonement for the sin of the world.

The doctrine of grace finds its full development in the work of the Spirit and the application of the benefits of the atonement. The operations of grace which are designed to apply salvation are the victories of the sin-destroying and redeeming spirit of Christ over the consciousness of guilt in the human heart. The Holy Spirit is the mediator of grace, convincing the world of sin, etc. (John xvi. 8), teaching it (2 Tim. iii. 16), guiding it into the way of all truth (John xvi. 13), and helping it (Rom. viii. 26), and uses means of grace, such as the sacraments, prayers, the word, etc. The distinction has been made of universal and saving grace. Saving grace has, in turn, been distinguished into prevenient, which acts upon the sinner before repentance; converting, which effects conversion; and co-operant, or indwelling, which operates upon the believer as a sanctifying power. According to Calvinism, grace is irresistible; but the Roman Catholics, Arminians, and Socinians allow a co-operation of the human will before conversion. The Lutheran Church, on the other hand, attempted to take a middle course between strict predestinarianism (to which Luther assents in the De servo arbitrio) and synergism. Differences also exist on the question of the possibility of falling from grace; the Arminian, and, less confidently, the Lutheran theologians, affirming, the Calvinistic denying it.

The grace of God in Christ has established a kingdom of grace which lies intermediate between the kingdoms of power and glory. This kingdom is the Christian Church, so far as Christ's word and spirit rule in her. Connected herewith is the idea of the duration of the period of grace. For the world, it is limited by the general judgment; for the individual, it reaches out through purgatory, according to the Roman-Catholic view: according to the Scriptures, however, it is measured by the obduracy of the sinner. But the Church properly regards the termination of the lives of the impenitent as a judgment, so long as this is not confused with the final judgment. The design of grace, however, is the perfection of man, and his glorification in heaven. The reward he will there receive will be in consequence of works of faith; but he will receive it upon the basis of grace, and from the hands of grace.

GRADUAL, a part of a psalm chanted in the mass between the epistle and the gospel; formerly called antiphonarium, or responsorium; received the name of "gradual" from its being sung from the steps (gradus) leading up to the altar.

GRAHAM, Isabella, an eminent Christian philanthropist; b. in Lanark, Scotland, July 29, 1742; d. in New York, July 27, 1814. She joined the Presbyterian Church at Paisley under Dr. Witherspoon, afterwards president of Princeton College. In 1765 she married Dr. Graham, a surgeon in the English army, with whom she went to Canada, and subsequently to Antigua, where he died (1774). Returning in poverty to Scotland, she taught school in Paisley and in Edinburgh. In 1789, at the advice of Dr. Witherspoon, she embarked for New York, where she established a successful seminary for young ladies.

Mrs. Graham was foremost among the women of her day, in New-York City, in all benevolent enterprises. She was a pioneer in "woman's work for woman" in America. In 1796 she formed the New-York missionary society for the Indians, and in 1797 helped to found the society for the relief of poor widows with small children, in 1806 presided at a meeting for the organization of the first asylum for orphan children in the city, and in 1811 of a Magdalene society. She was also widely known for her activity in the church (Dr. John Mason's) with which she was connected, and for distributing Bibles among the poor, long before the Bible Society was established. See Life and Letters, last edition, London, 1838; MASON (her pastor): Life of Isabella Graham, Tract Society, New York; Mrs. BETHUNE (mother of Dr. Bethune, and her daughter): Letters and Correspondence of Mrs. Graham, 1838.

GRAHAME, James, a religious poet; b. at Glasgow, April 22, 1765; d. at Sedgfield, Durham, Eng., Sept. 14, 1811. After practising law for many years, he took orders in the Church of England, and became curate of Shipton and Sedgfield successively. He is best known as the author of The Sabbath (1804), a poem in blank verse, descriptive of the sabbath of his native land, and "characterized by a fine vein of tender and devotional feeling, and by a happy delineation of Scottish scenery."

GRANDMONT, or GRAMMONT, Order of, one of the many religious orders arising in the latter part of the eleventh century; was founded in 1073 by Stephanus of Tigerno, whose life has been written by Gerhard, the seventh prior of Grandmont, and is found in MARTENE and DURAND (Ampliss. Collectio, VI. p. 1050). Born at Thiers (Tigerno), 1046, he was educated by Bishop Milo of Benevento, and returned to France in 1073, having obtained permission of Gregory VII. to found a religious order after the model of the Calabrian monks. He settled in Auvergne, at Muret, and found followers. After his death, Feb. 8, 1124, his disciples moved to the desert of Grandmont, after which they were called. The third successor of Stephen (Stephen of Lisias) put down the rules of the order in writing, and the eighth prior (Ademar of Frias) gave a new and still more rigorous set of rules. The order suffered very much from internal dissensions, and was finally dissolved during the revolution. See MABILLON: Annal. Ord. S. Bened., V.; and HELYOT: Histoire des orders monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols. (vii. pp. 470-493). ZÖCKLER.

GRANT, Asahel, M.D., an American missionary; b. in Marshall, N.Y., Aug. 17, 1807; d. at Mosul, Persia, April 24, 1844. He was practising medicine in Utica, when his interest was excited in missions, and he was commissioned in 1835 by the American Board to labor among the Nestorians of Persia. The chief seat of his labors was Oroomiah. He gained the confidence of the Persian officials, and, in the terrible war of the Khoords against the Nestorians, succeeded in mitigating the sufferings of the latter. Dr. Grant published The Nestorians, or the Lost Tribes, London, 1841, 3d ed., 1844. See LOTHROP: Memoir of A. Grant, M.D., New York, 1847; LAURIE:

Grant and the Mountain Nestorians, Boston, 3d ed., 1856.

GRATIAN, b. at Sirmium, 359; killed at Lyons, Aug. 25, 383; followed his father, Valentinian I., on the throne of the West-Roman Empire, 375, and his uncle Valens, on that of the East-Roman Empire, 376. In the last year he chose Theodosius as co-regent. The policy which he pursued with respect to the Church, and in which he was pushed still farther onward by Theodosius, was of decisive consequences. Religious liberty reigned; that is, Paganism, Arianism, and Catholicism were allowed to fight each other with what means they possessed. Under the influence of Ambrosius, Gratian made Catholicism not only the ruling, but the only tolerated Church. In 376 he forbade all heretics to assemble for any religious purpose, confiscated the property belonging to their churches, and transferred the buildings to the Catholics. In 377 he exempted all officers of the Catholic Church, down to the ostearius, from all municipal services and all personal taxes, and in 379 he even made the retail trade which the lower clergy was used to carry on in Illyria, Italy, and Gaul, free of duty. In 381 the Council of Constantinople spoke the anathema over all non-Nicæan denominations. After the accession of Theodosius, Paganism was treated with the same severity as heretical Christianity. In 381 apostates from Christianity to Paganism lost their right to make a will. In 382 all sacerdotal privileges, even those of the vestal virgins, and all state-support, were withdrawn from Paganism, and real estate belonging to the Pagan temples was confiscated. Edicts against sacrifices, haruspices, etc., followed. The altar of victory in the hall of the senate was removed; and the emblems of the office of Pontifex Maximus Gratian declined to accept, because they were to him, as a Christian, a scandal. Of course, for these measures, the Pagan historians compared him with Nero; while the Catholics almost deified him. ADOLF HARNACK.

GRATIAN, the composer of the Decretum Gratiani; was a monk, first in Closse, near Ravenna, afterwards in St. Felix, in Bologna; but the dates of his birth and death are unknown. About his work, which he finished in 1141 or 1151, see the art. on CANON LAW.

GRATRY, Father, b. at Lille, March 30, 1805; d. at Montreux, near Lausanne, Feb. 7, 1872; studied in Paris, but entered, after having determined to devote his life to the service of God, the convent of Buchenberg in the Vosges. After the revolution of 1830 the convent was dissolved, and Father Gratry was appointed teacher of theology and philosophy, first in the seminary of Strassburg (1830-42), afterwards in the Stanislas College, in Paris (1842-47). In 1852 he renewed the order of the Oratorians; and from 1868 he lectured on theology and philosophy in the Sorbonne. He followed a somewhat similar direction as that of Lamennais, Lacordaire, and Montalembert; but he was of a milder and more poetic disposition. During the Council of the Vatican he published four letters in opposition to the doctrine of papal infallibility; but, when the dogma was promulgated, he accepted it. Most of his works are half devotional, and half scientific, — La Connaissance de Dieu, Lettres sur la religion (against positivism), La Morale et la loi de l'histoire (an exposition of his social ideas), Meditations, etc.

GRAUL, Karl, b. at Wörlitz, in Anhalt-Dessau, Feb. 6, 1814; d. at Erlangen, Nov. 10, 1864; studied theology at Leipzig; lived for some time in Italy as tutor, and teacher of French in an English family; published in 1843 a translation of Dante's Inferno, with theological explanations; and was in 1844 appointed director of the missionary society in Dresden. This institution he gradually raised from a very subordinate to a very prominent position, making it the missionary organ of the whole Lutheran Church, instead of a mere appendix to the missionary society of Basel. In 1848 he had it removed to Leipzig in order to give the students the benefit of the university. The point upon which he concentrated the energy of the institution was the Tamils, a nation of about twelve millions of souls in Southern India; and the object was not simply to make converts, but to convert the whole people. From 1849 to 1853 he made a visit to the country himself, published a description of his journey (in five volumes, Leipzig, 1853-55), wrote a Tamil grammar, and brought back some of the principal monuments of Tamil literature, which he edited, partly with German, and partly with English translations (Bibliotheca Tamulica, Leipzig, 1854-56, 3 vols.). His views of the attitude which the missionary ought to assume with respect to the question of caste, differed radically from those entertained by the English missionaries; which occasioned him to publish an English pamphlet at Madras (1852), and a German at Leipzig (1861), in their defence. In 1860 his failing health compelled him to retire. Among his other works are Unterscheidungslehren (1845, 9th ed. by Harnack, 1872), Indische Sinnpflanzen (1864), etc. LUTHARDT.

GRAVES, Richard, D.D., b. at Kilfinnan, Ireland, Oct. 1, 1763; d. March 29, 1829; Dean of Ardagh, and Regius Professor of divinity, Trinity College, Dublin, 1813; author of the Donnellan Lectures for 1797-1801, On the Four Last Books of the Pentateuch, London, 1807, 2 vols. His whole works were collected (London, 1840, 4 vols.) with a biography by his son.

GREECE, The Kingdom of, such as its boundaries were fixed by the great powers of Europe, July 21, 1832, comprises an area of 19,353 square miles, and has (according to the census of 1879) 1,679,775 inhabitants, of whom an immense majority belong to the Orthodox Greek Church. By the treaty of Berlin, Thessaly has been added to the kingdom. In 1870 there were in Greece 12,585 Roman Catholics, 2,582 Jews, and 917 belonging to other religious communities. In 1879 there were 16,084 persons in the country not belonging to the State Church.

At the beginning of the Christian era those territories which now form the kingdom of Greece formed the Roman province of Achaia. The proconsul resided at Corinth, which, politically and commercially, was the most important city of the country. As a place, however, of learning and art, Athens still held the first rank. It was almost indispensable for a Roman youth who wanted to distinguish himself in life to go to Athens and study. Her schools of grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, and philosophy, were crowded; though they had lost all productivity, and labored only as educational institutions. Christianity was first planted in these regions by Paul, on his second voyage (51). He first visited Philippi (Acts xvi. 12), then Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, and Corinth (xvii., xviii.): only the last two cities belonged to Achaia. But, while the congregation of Corinth became one of Paul's most brilliant and most important foundations, very little is heard of the congregation of Athens. Paul's stay there was very brief; but his address on Mars' Hill was one of the most remarkable speeches in history, whether we consider the speaker, the audience, or the theme (xvii. 22-31). Dionysius the Areopagite, converted on this occasion, is said to have been its first bishop. The reason why the first city in the world, in intellectual respects, showed itself so singularly backward in its relation to Christianity, was, no doubt, the presence of the above-mentioned schools, which made it the very centre of Paganism. They were closed by Justinian, A.D. 529. In the interior of Peloponnesus, Pagans were found as late as the fourteenth century. Leo the Isaurian, in the beginning of the eighth century, laid Achaia under the authority of the Patriarch of Constantinople; and there it remained for more than a thousand years.

During the war of independence (1821-27) the connection between the Church of Greece and the Patriarch of Constantinople gradually loosened: he received no reverence from the country, and the ecclesiastics he appointed and sent thither were not accepted. Capodistrias favored the separation; and (July 23, 1833) the regency took the decisive step, and declared, on the instance of thirty-six metropolitans assembled at Nauplia, that the Orthodox Church of Greece was independent of any foreign authority. The new church organization was moulded after the model of the Russian Church; but the union of Church and State is not nearly so intimate, because the present king is a Protestant (Lutheran), from Denmark, while the Czar is actual head of the Church in Russia. At the head of the whole Church was placed a permanent synod, consisting of two royal officials and five ecclesiastics, chosen annually by the king. This synod, in whose discussions the royal officials have a right to participate, though without voting, has full authority in all purely spiritual matters; but in matters also presenting a civil aspect, such as marriage, divorce, excommunication of laymen, appointment of feasts and fasts, etc., it shares its authority with the civil government. At the same time the ecclesiastical division of the country was made to correspond with the political, and the number of monasteries was reduced; that of male monasteries from 400 to 82, that of female to three, — probably with an eye to the fact that in Greece are more men than women (a majority of 82,385 in 1879). The country is divided into eleven archbishoprics and thirteen bishoprics. An archbishop's salary is a hundred and eighty pounds; a bishop's, a hundred and forty-five pounds; they are paid by the State. The lower clergy is not paid at all, but lives by fees for prayers, exorcisms, consecrations, purifications, and other spiritual services. The total number of ecclesiastics was 5,102 in 1861. There were 1,600 monks and 1,500 nuns in 1879.

In Greece the Church forms the strongest band around the nation,—much stronger than either blood or speech. During the war of independence the Moslems of Crete and the Latins of Syros sided with the Turks, though they were of the purest Greek descent, and spoke the Greek language. Under such circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the missions which have been established in the country by the Protestant Church, by the Episcopal Church, by the American Board of Missions, and, lately, by the Danish Church, have had very little success. In 1836 the Archbishop of Attica excommunicated all the families which allowed their children to be educated in the English and American mission schools, though the religious instruction was given there by a member of the Orthodox Greek Church. It was hoped that the university established at Athens in 1837 would have an influence on this stubborn narrowness. But of its twelve hundred and forty-four students in 1872, only twenty-six studied theology. Besides the theological faculty of the university, there are four theological seminaries, one in Athens, and three in the provinces; but they had in 1872 only a hundred and fifteen students in all. The lower clergy in Greece receives no education at all. The Anglican Church maintains five chaplains in Athens, Syros, Patras, Corfu, and Zante, who stand under the Bishop of Gibraltar.

Protestant Missions in Athens.—These are not extensive. 1. The pioneer missionary was the Rev. John Henry Hill, D.D., LL.D., b. New York, Sept. 11, 1791; sailed with his wife for Athens, September, 1830; d. there July 1, 1882. He was careful to avoid collision with the Greek hierarchy; did not attempt to organize a church, but confined himself to teaching. His school of six hundred pupils is still kept up. The children are taught, besides the usual secular branches, Bible history, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the Nicene Creed in its original form (i.e., without the Filioque clause). This mission is supported by the (American) Church Missionary Society.

2. The Southern Presbyterian Church has two missionaries in Athens,—Rev. Mr. Sampson and Rev. Mr. Kalopathakes, M.D. They have a fine church at the foot of the Acropolis. In connection with this mission is a union depot of the British and the American Bible societies.

3. Near the Presbyterian Church is a Baptist mission in a private house, conducted by another Americanized Greek, Rev. Mr. Sakellarios.

The hero of Protestant missions in Greece is Rev. Dr. Jonas King, who died in 1869 (see art.) The Woman's Union Missionary Society had a girl's school in Athens; but the government closed it because the teachers refused to teach the Greek Catechism and to hang up a picture of the Virgin Mary for adoration.

GREEK CHURCH, The. I. NAME.—The proper name is the Eastern or Oriental Church, which designates its origin and geographical territory; also the Orthodox Church, which expresses its close adherence to the œcumenical system of doctrine and discipline as settled by the seven œcumenical councils before the separation from the Latin Church. On this title she lays the chief stress, and celebrates it on a special day called "Orthodoxy Sunday," in the beginning of Lent, when a dramatic representation of the old œcumenical councils is given in the churches, and anathemas are pronounced on all heresies. The full official title is the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Oriental Church (ἡ ἁγία ὀρθόδοξος καθολικὴ ἀποστολικὴ ἀνατολικὴ ἐκκλησία). The Roman Church claims all these titles, except "Oriental," for which she substitutes Roman, and claims them exclusively. The popular designation Greek Church, though not strictly correct, refers to the national origin and to the language in which most of its creeds, liturgies, canons, theological and ascetic literature, are composed, and its worship mainly conducted.

II. EXTENT.—The Eastern Church embraces the Greek, the Russian, and other Slavonic nationalities. It has its seat in Western Asia and Eastern Europe, chiefly in Turkey, Serbia, Roumania, Greece, Russia, and some parts of Austria. Bulgaria was long a bone of contention between Constantinople and Rome, and one of the causes of separation, but is now an independent branch of the "Orthodox" Church, ruled by an exarch. In Western Europe and America there are only a few isolated congregations of Greek merchants and colonists, or in connection with the Russian embassies (at Vienna, Trieste, Geneva, Paris, London, New York, San Francisco). The Eastern Church is one of the three great divisions of Christendom, and numbers (according to the estimate made in 1881) between eighty and ninety millions; while the Roman-Catholic Church is credited with a membership of over two hundred millions, and the Protestant churches with one hundred and thirty millions. In Europe the Greek Church numbers 71,405,000; in Asia, 9,402,000; in Africa, 3,200,000; in America, 10,000; total, 84,017,000. Its chief strength lies in the vast empire of Russia, which was Christianized in the ninth and tenth centuries by missionaries from Constantinople, and matrimonial connection with the Byzantine court.

III. DIVISION.—The Greek Church is divided into several great branches. 1. The Orthodox Church in Turkey, under the Patriarch of Constantinople, with the subordinate patriarchates of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch. Constantinople, the city of the first Christian emperor (New Rome), though now in the hands of the Turk, is still the natural centre of the whole Greek Church, and may become for the Eastern world at some future day, in Christian hands, what Gregory Nazianzen eloquently described it to be in the fourth century, "the eye of the world, the strongest by sea and land, the bond of union between East and West, to which the most distant extremes from all sides come together, and to which they look up as to a common centre and emporium of the faith."

2. The Orthodox Church in Russia, which was at first subject to the Patriarch of Constantinople, then under a special Patriarch of Moscow (since 1582), and now (since 1721) under the permanent holy synod of St. Petersburg and the Czar, whose dominion stretches in an unbroken line across the two Continents of Europe and Asia. The Czar is the personal, as Constantinople is the local, centre of the whole Greek Church; and he keeps a lustful eye upon the city of the Bosphorus as his future capital, where, at no distant day, there must be a tremendous reckoning with Mohammedanism.

3. The National Church of the kingdom of Greece, which since 1833 is governed likewise by a permanent holy synod, but less dependent upon the State than the Russian Church. See GREECE.

4. The Greek Church in the formerly Turkish provinces of Servia, Roumania, and Montenegro, are now independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and ruled by their metropolitans and synods, more or less under the influence of Russia.

5. Distinct from these, and belonging to the Roman Church, are the united Greeks, scattered through Turkey, Hungary, Galicia, Transylvania, and Russia, but chiefly in Austria and Poland, and numbering in all about four millions and a half. They acknowledge the authority of the Pope, and adopt the dogma of the double procession of the Holy Spirit, but are otherwise allowed to hold to their ancient discipline, marriage of the lower clergy, communion under both kinds (communio sub utraque), leavened bread, their liturgy, and the use of the Greek language.

6. The Greek, or rather Oriental Schismatics, Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians, Copts, and Abyssinians, are separated from the Greek and Latin Catholic Church, mostly on the dogma of Christ's person, and have independent organizations, which rise up, as the broken fragments of ancient national churches, from surrounding Mohammedanism and heathenism in Western Asia and Africa. The Maronites on Mount Lebanon were formerly schismatic, but were converted to the Roman Church during the middle ages. The Roman Church has made inroads also among the other Oriental sects, especially the Armenians. The dissenters from the Orthodox Church of Russia are divided into several sects: the chief of them are the Raskolniki, or Old Believers, who protest against all the innovations introduced by Patriarch Nikon and Peter the Great.

IV. HISTORICAL SURVEY.—The Greek Church has no continuous history, like the Latin or the Protestant. She has long periods of monotony and stagnation; she is isolated from the main current of progressive Christendom; her languages and literature are little known among Western scholars. Yet this Church is the oldest in Christendom, and for several centuries she was the chief bearer of our religion. She still occupies the sacred territory of primitive Christianity, and claims most of the apostolic sees, as Jerusalem, Antioch, and the churches founded by Paul and John in Asia Minor and Greece. All the apostles, with the exception of Peter and Paul, labored and died in the East. From the old Greeks she inherited the language and certain national traits of character, while she incorporated into herself also much of Jewish and Oriental piety. She produced the first Christian literature, apologies of the Christian faith, refutations of heretics, commentaries of the Bible, sermons, homilies, and ascetic treatises. The great majority of the early fathers, like the apostles themselves, used the Greek language. Polycarp, Ignatius, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Cyril of Alexandria, the first Christian emperors since Constantine the Great, together with a host of martyrs and confessors, belong to the Greek communion. She elaborated the œcumenical dogmas of the Trinity and Christology, and ruled the first seven œcumenical councils, which were all held in Constantinople or its immediate neighborhood (Nicaea, Chalcedon, Ephesus). Her palmy period during the first five centuries will ever claim the grateful respect of the whole Christian world; and her great teachers still live in their writings far beyond the confines, nay, even more outside of her communion, as the books of Moses and the prophets are more studied and better understood among Christians than among the Jews, for whom they wrote. But she never materially progressed beyond the stand-point occupied in the fifth and sixth centuries. She has no proper middle age, and no Reformation, like Western Christendom.

We may distinguish three periods in the history of the Greek Church:—

1. The classical or productive period, the first five or six centuries, which has just been characterized. The last great divine of the East is John of Damascus (about 750), who summed up the scattered results of the labors of the preceding fathers into a tolerably complete system of theology; but he is an isolated phenomenon. The process of degeneracy and stagnation had already set in; and the former life and vigor gave way to idle speculations, distracting controversies, dead formalism, and traditionalism.

2. The Byzantine period, corresponding to the middle ages of the Latin Church, from the rise of Mohammedanism to the fall of Constantinople (A.D. 650-1453). Here we have the gradual separation from the West and from all progressive movements; dependence on the imperial court at Constantinople; continuation of a certain literary activity; philological and biblical studies in slavish dependence on the fathers; commentaries of Œcumenius (A.D. 1000), Theophylact (d. 1107), Euthymius Zigabenus (d. about 1120); large literary collections, classical and Christian, of Photius (about 890), Balsamon, Zonaras, Suidas, and Simeon Metaphrastes; the liturgical works of Maximus, Sophronius, Simeon of Thessalonica; the Byzantine historians; the image controversy (726-842); inroads and conquests of Mohammedanism (since 630), in Syria, Persia, Egypt, North Africa; temporary suspension of the patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem; finally, the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks, and the extinction of the Greek Empire (1453), which led to the emigration of Greek scholars (Chalcondylas, Chrysoloras, Pletho, Michael Apostolius, Theodore Gaza, George of Trebizond, etc.) to the West, the revival of letters, the study of the Greek Testament, and, aided thereby, the preparation for the Reformation. Yet, during this period of decline in her original home, the Greek Church made a great conquest in the conversion of the Slavonians (namely, the Bulgarians and Russians, in the ninth and tenth centuries); while the Latin Church converted the Celtic and Teutonic races.

3. The modern period may be dated from the downfall of the Greek Empire (1453). It presents in Asia stagnation and slavery under the tyranny of the Turks, but with great tenacity and independence as to all internal affairs; in Europe, rapid external growth through the rising power of Russia, with some reforms in manners, customs, and the introduction of Western culture, protests against Romanizing and evangelical movements, the orthodox confession of Peter Mogilas (1642), the synod of Jerusalem (1672), the Russian Church, the patriarchate of Moscow, the reforms of Patriarch Nikon (d. 1681) and of the Czar Peter the Great (d. 1725), the reaction of the Old Believers (Raskolniki), the holy synod of St. Petersburg (since 1721), the New Greek Church in Hellas (since 1833), modern influences from the West, prospects for the future, depending chiefly on Russia.

V. RELATION TO THE LATIN CHURCH. — No two churches are so much alike in their creed, polity, and cultus, as the Greek and Roman; and yet no two are such irreconcilable rivals, perhaps for the very reason of their affinity. They agree much more than either agrees with any Protestant church. They were never organically united. They differed from the beginning in nationality, language, and genius, as the ancient Greeks differed from the Romans; yet they grew up together, and stood shoulder to shoulder in the ancient conflict with Paganism and heresy. They co-operated in the early œcumenical councils, and adopted their doctrinal and ritual decisions. But the development of the papal monarchy, and the establishment of a Western Empire in connection with it, laid the foundation of a schism which has not been healed to this day. The controversy culminated in the rivalry between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Pope of Rome. It first broke out under Photius and Nicolas I., who excommunicated each other (869 and 879). Photius, the greatest scholar of his age, whom Pope Nicolas refused to acknowledge as patriarch, charged, in a famous encyclical letter, the Roman Church with heresy, for the unauthorized insertion of the Filioque into the Nicene Creed, and with various corrupting practices. The controversy was renewed under the Patriarch Cerularius (1053), and became irreconcilable through the Venetian conquest of Constantinople (1204), and the establishment of a Latin Empire (1204-61), and Latin rival bishoprics in eastern sees, with the sanction of Pope Innocent III. Attempts at a re-union were made from time to time, especially in the Council of Lyons (1274) and the Council of Ferrara (1439), but all in vain. The compromise formula of the latter council was rejected with scorn in the East, as treason to the orthodox faith. With the fall of Constantinople (1453) the political motive for seeking a union with the West ceased; and the schism continues to this day, even with increased force, since the Vatican Council in 1870 intensified the chief cause of separation by declaring papal absolutism and papal infallibility an article of faith. Popery knows no compromise; and the Greek Church can never submit to its authority without committing suicide.

The points in which the Greek Church differs from the Roman are the following: the single procession of the Holy Spirit (against the Filioque); the equality of the patriarchs, and the rejection of the papacy as an antichristian innovation and usurpation; the right of the lower clergy (priests and deacons) to marry (though only once); the communion under both kinds (against the withdrawal of the cup from the laity); trine immersion as the only valid form of baptism; the use of the vernacular languages in worship; a number of minor ceremonies, as the use of common or leavened bread in the Eucharist, infant communion, the repetition of holy unction (εὐχέλαιον) in sickness, etc.

On the fruitless negotiations for union between the Lutheran and the Greek Church, and the Anglican and the Greek and Russian Church, see Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. I., pp. 50 sqq. and 74 sqq. The Reformation of the sixteenth century had no effect upon the Oriental Church. The reform movement of Cyril Lucar, who, as Patriarch of Constantinople, attempted to ingraft Calvinism upon the old trunk, failed completely: he was strangled to death, and his body thrown into the Bosphorus (1638); and his doctrines were condemned by several synods, in 1638, 1643, and 1672. (See Schaff, Creeds, I. 54 sqq.) In recent times, however, German universities are often frequented by Russian and Greek students; and the works of German divines have exerted some modifying influence. The Old Catholic movement was followed with interest; and the Old Catholic conferences in Bonn (1874 and 1875) were attended by several dignitaries from Greece and Russia. There has been also considerable intercourse between Greek and Anglican bishops. The Greek Church is not so strongly committed against Protestantism as the Roman, and may therefore learn something from it.

VI. CREED. — The Eastern Church holds fast to the decrees and canons of the seven œcumenical councils; i. e., of Nicæa (325), Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), Chalcedon (451), the second of Constantinople (553), the third of Constantinople (680), the second of Nicæa (787). Her proper creed is the Nicene Creed as enlarged at Constantinople (381), and indorsed at Chalcedon (451), without the Latin Filioque. This creed is the basis of all Greek catechisms and systems of theology, and a regular part of worship. The Greeks have never acknowledged in form the Apostles' Creed, which is of Western origin, nor the Athanasian Creed, which teaches the double procession, and is likewise of Western origin. Besides this œcumenical creed, the Eastern Church acknowledges three subordinate confessions, which define her position against Romanism and Protestantism; namely, (1) The Orthodox Confession of Peter Mogilas (metropolitan of Kieff), A.D. 1643, — a catechetical exposition of the Nicene Creed, the Lord's Prayer and Beatitudes, and the Decalogue; (2) The Eighteen Articles or Decrees of the Synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 1672; (3) The Longer Russian Catechism of Philaret (metropolitan of Moscow), adopted by the holy synod of St. Petersburg (1839), and published in all the languages of Russia. (See these creeds and con-

VII. THEOLOGY. — The Greek Church is in doctrine substantially agreed with the Roman, but, upon the whole, more simple and less developed, though in some respects more subtle and metaphysical. The only serious doctrinal difference is that on the Procession of the Holy Spirit (see FILIOQUE CONTROVERSY). She holds to the leading principles, but rejects many of the consequences or results, of Roman Catholicism. She adheres to the theology of the Greek fathers down to John of Damascus, and ignores the succeeding scholastic theology of the schoolmen, who completed the Roman system. The Eastern theology is not properly systematized: it remains rigidly in the fragmentary state of the old councils. The resistance to the Western clause, Filioque, implied a protest against all further progress both in truth and in error, and meant stagnation, as well as faithful adherence to the venerable Nicene symbol. The Greek theology is most full on the doctrine of God and of Christ, but very defective on the doctrine of man and the order of salvation. The East went into all sorts of theological and christological subtleties, especially during the long and tedious Monophysite controversies, which found little or no response in the West; but it ignored the Pelagian controversies, the development of the Augustinian and later evangelical theology. It took the most intense interest in the difference between ousia and hypostasis, the homousion and homoi-ousion, the relations of the persons in the Trinity, the agenesia of the Father, the eternal genesis of the Son, the eternal exporeusis or procession of the Spirit, the perichoresis, the relation of the two natures in Christ, the Nestorian, Eutychian, Monophysite, and Monothelite heresies, but was never seriously troubled with questions about predestination, vicarious atonement, justification and imputation, conversion and regeneration, faith and good works, merit and demerit, vital union to Christ, and cognate doctrines, which absorbed the attention of Western Christendom. The cause for this difference must be sought in the prevailing metaphysical, rhetorical, and objective character of the Eastern Church, — inherited partly from Asia, partly from Greece, — as distinct from the practical, logical, and subjective tendency of the Western churches, which is derived from the Roman and the Teutonic nationalities. The difference is illustrated already by the Nicene Creed, with its metaphysical terms about the Son, as compared with the more simple and popular Apostles' Creed, which originated in the West, and is very little used in the East.

VIII. GOVERNMENT. — The Greek Church is a patriarchal oligarchy, in distinction from the papal monarchy. The episcopal hierarchy is retained, the papacy rejected. The Vatican decrees of 1870 have intensified the separation. Centralization is unknown in the East. The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, are equal in rights, though the first has a primacy of honor. The Czar of Russia, however, exercises a sort of general protectorate, and may be regarded as a rival to the Pope of Rome, but has no authority in matters of doctrine, and can make no organic changes. The Eastern hierarchy resembles the Jewish type. The Greek priest within the veil of the sanctuary is concealed from the eyes of the people; but in social respects he is nearer the people than the Roman priest. He is allowed, and even compelled, to marry once, but forbidden to marry twice. Celibacy is confined to bishops and monks. Absolution is given only in the form of a prayer, "May the Lord absolve thee!" instead of the positive form, "I absolve thee." The confessional exists, but in a milder form, with less influence and abuse, than in Romanism. The laity are more independent; and the Russian Czar, like the Byzantine Emperor of old, is the head of the Church in his dominion. The unction of confirmation is made to symbolize the royal priesthood of every believer. The monastic orders, though including many clergy, are not clerical institutions. The community of Athos is a lay corporation with chaplains.

The administration of the churches as developed in the Byzantine Empire is most complicated, and involves, besides the regular clergy, an army of higher and lower ecclesiastical offices, from the first administrator of the church property (ὁ μέγας οἰκονόμος), the superintendent of the sacristy (ὁ σκευοφύλαξ), the chancellor or keeper of ecclesiastical archives (ὁ χαρτοφύλαξ), down to the cleaners of the lamps (οἱ λαμπαδάριοι), and the bearer of the images of saints (ὁ βασταγύριος). These half-clerical officers are divided into two groups, — one on the right, the other on the left: each is subdivided into three classes, and each class has again five persons. Leo Allatius and Heineccius enumerate fifteen officials of the right group, and even more of the left. But many of these offices have either ceased altogether, or retain only a nominal existence.

IX. The CULTUS is much like the Roman Catholic, with the celebration of the sacrifice of the mass as its centre, with an equal and even greater neglect of the sermon, and is addressed more to the senses and imagination than to the intellect and the heart. It is strongly Oriental, unintelligibly symbolical and mystical, and excessively ritualistic. The Greeks reject organs, musical instruments, and sculpture, and make less use of the fine arts in their churches than the Roman Catholics; but they have even a more complicated system of ceremonies, with gorgeous display, semi-barbaric pomp, and endless changes of sacerdotal dress, crossings, gestures, genuflections, prostrations, washings, processions, which so absorb the attention of the senses, that there is little room left for intellectual and spiritual worship. They use the liturgy of St. Chrysostom, which is an abridgment of that of St. Basil, yet very lengthy, and contains, with many old and venerable prayers (one of the finest is incorporated in the Anglican Liturgy under the name of Chrysostom), later additions from different sources to an excess of liturgical refinement. Stanley (Eastern Church, p. 32) characterizes the Greek worship as "a union of barbaric rudeness and elaborate ceremonialism."

The most characteristic features of Greek worship, as distinct from the Roman, are the three-fold immersion in baptism, with the repudiation of any other mode as essentially invalid; the simultaneous performance of the act of confirmation and the act of baptism, which in the West have been separated; the anointing with oil in cases of dangerous illness, which Rome has changed into extreme unction of the dying; infant communion, which the Latin Church has not only abandoned, but forbidden; the communion under two kinds (κατὰ τὰ δύο εἶδη, sub utraque); the use of leavened instead of unleavened bread in the Eucharist; the standing and eastward posture in prayer; the stricter separation of the sexes; the use of the screen or veil before the altar; and the withdrawal of the performance of the mysteries (sacraments) from the eyes of the people.

The worship of saints, relics, flat images, and the cross, is carried as far as, or even farther, than in the Roman Church; but statues, bas-reliefs, and crucifixes are forbidden. The ruder the art, the more intense is the superstition. In Russia especially the veneration for pictures of the Virgin Mary and the saints is carried to the utmost extent, and takes the place of the Protestant veneration for the Bible. The holy picture with the lamp burning before it is found and worshipped in the corner (the sacred place) of every room, in the street, over gateways, in offices, taverns, steamers, railway and telegraph stations, and carried in the knapsack of every soldier, not as a work of art, but as an emblem, a lesson of instruction, an aid to devotion. The vernacular languages are used in worship, — the Greek in Turkey and Greece, the Slavonic in Russia; but they have to a considerable extent become unintelligible to the people. The old Slavonic differs from the modern Russ about as much as Chaucer's English from our English. The Oriental sects hold to their native dialects, — the Syriac, Armenian, etc. The old Greek calendar, which is eleven days behind the new style introduced by Gregory XIII., is still retained in distinction from the Roman and Protestant churches.

X. As to Christian LIFE, it has the same general features as in the Roman-Catholic Church. The mass of the people are contented with an ordinary morality, while the monks aim at a higher degree of ascetic piety. The monastic system originated in the East (in Egypt), and continues to this day, but has not developed into great monastic orders, as in the West. There are three classes of monks, — the cenobites (κοινοβιτικοί), who live together in a monastery ruled by an archimandrite, who is often a bishop (ἀρχιμανδρίτης, ἡγούμενος); the anchorites (ἀναχωρηταί), who live in a cell apart from the other monks, or among the laity; and the ascetes (ἀσκηταί), or hermits. The monks usually follow the rule of St. Basil: some, the rule of St. Anthony. The bishops are taken from the monks. The principal convents are at Jerusalem, Mount Athos, Mount Sinai (where the celebrated Sinaitic manuscript of the Bible was kept for centuries, but not used by the inmates), and St. Saba, near the Dead Sea. Russia had in 1875 about six hundred convents and nunneries. The Greek monks are as a rule more ignorant and superstitious than the Roman-Catholic. The same may be said of the clergy. Many of them are merely mechanical functionaries. Religious life is supposed to originate in baptismal regeneration, and to be nourished chiefly by the sacraments. Prayer, fasting, and charitable deeds are the principal manifestations of piety. The observance of the Ten Commandments is strictly enjoined in all the Catechisms. The Greeks and Russians are very religious in outward observances and devotions, but know little of what Protestants mean by subjective experimental piety, and personal direct communion of the soul with the Saviour. They are liberal and deceitful in unmeaning compliments. The Greek Christians surpass their Mohammedan neighbors in chastity, but are behind them in honesty. What St. Paul says of the Cretans (Κρήτες αἰεὶ ψευδοί, Tit. i. 12) is still characteristic of the race, of course with very honorable exceptions. In Russia there is the same divorce between religion and morality. The towns are adorned with churches and convents. Every public event is celebrated by the building of a church. Every house has an altar and sacred pictures; every child, his guardian angel and baptismal cross. A Russian fasts every Wednesday and Friday, prays early and late, regularly attends mass, confesses his sins, pays devout respect to sacred places and things, makes pilgrimages to the tombs and shrines of saints, and has the phrase "Slava Boga!" ("Glory to God!") continually on his lips. And yet even the priests are grossly intemperate; and public officials, even to the highest dignitaries, are said to be open to bribery. The Nihilistic troubles, and the awful assassination of Alexander II., in 1881, reveal an abyss of corruption and danger beneath the glittering surface of Russian grandeur.

XI. THE GREEK CHURCH AND THE BIBLE. — Concerning the extent of the canon of the Scriptures the Eastern Church is not quite consistent, and stands midway between the Roman and the Protestant view concerning the Jewish Apocrypha. The Septuagint is used, which includes the Apocrypha. The Orthodox Confession repeatedly quotes the Apocrypha as authority; and the synod of Jerusalem (1672) mentions several apocryphal books (The Wisdom of Solomon, Judith, Tobit, the History of Bel and the Dragon, the History of Susanna, The Maccabees, and the Wisdom of Sirach) as parts of the Holy Scriptures. On the other hand, Metrophanes enumerates only twenty-two books of the Old Testament (according to the division of Josephus, who counts the twelve minor prophets as one, and combines several historical books), and eleven books of the New Testament (counting fourteen Epistles of Paul as one book, and so the two Epistles of Peter and the three of John), and then speaks of the Jewish Apocrypha as not being received by the Church among the canonical and authentic books, and hence not to be used in proof of dogmas. The Longer Catechism of Philaret likewise enumerates (with Josephus, St. Cyril, and St. Athanasius) only twenty-two books of the Old Testament and twenty-seven books of the New, and says that "the Wisdom of the Son of Sirach and certain other books" are ignored in the list of the books of the Old Testament, "because they do not exist in the Hebrew." The use of the apocryphal books is found in this, that "they have been appointed by the fathers to be read by proselytes who are preparing for admission into the church."

As to the circulation of the Scriptures among the laity, it is not encouraged; and certain portions, especially of the Old Testament, are declared to be unfit for general use. But the Greek Church has never expressly prohibited the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue to the people; and the Orthodox Church of Russia has always had a popular version of the Bible, first in the old Slavic, and now in modern Russ. Alexander I., by a ukase of Jan. 14, 1813, allowed even the British and Foreign Bible Society to establish a branch in St. Petersburg. Through the labors of this society nearly five hundred thousand copies of the New Testament and the Psalms were scattered, in thirty-two languages, all over the empire, and read with great avidity. A recent traveller says, "Except in New England and in Scotland, no people in the world, so far as they can read at all, are greater Bible-readers than the Russians" (HERWORTH DIXON, Free Russia, p. 290). A priest told him, "Love for the Bible and love for Russia go with us hand in hand. A patriotic government gives us the Bible: a monastic government (Nicholas) takes it away." But it should be remembered that not more than one out of ten Russians can read at all. The Bible drove the Jesuits from Russia, who opposed it with all their might. In 1825 Nicholas, under the influence of the monks, or the black clergy, placed the Bible under arrest, and replaced it by an official Book of Saints. Alexander II., the emancipator of the serfs, has also emancipated the Bible, and restored, in part at least, the liberty of the Bible Society, but restricted it to the Protestant population. The printing and circulating of the Bible in the Russian language and within the Orthodox Greek Church is under the exclusive control of the holy synod of St. Petersburg. Agents of the Bible Society were allowed to circulate the Scriptures in the army during the recent war with Turkey (1877).

XII. Missions.—The Eastern Church spreads, through Russian influence, in Siberia, the Aleutian Islands, and wherever the civil and military power of the Czar prepares the way; but, apart from the aid of government, she has little or no missionary spirit, and is content to keep her own. In Turkey she would not be permitted to approach the Moslems on the subject of religion. Her greatest mission-work was the conversion of Russia; and this was effected, not so much by preaching as by the marriage of a Byzantine princess and the despotic order of the ruler. In the midst of the Mohammedan East the Greek populations remain like islands in the barren sea; and the Bedouin tribes have wandered for twelve centuries round the Greek convent of Mount Sinai, probably without one instance of conversion to the creed of men whom they yet acknowledge with almost religious veneration as beings from a higher world (STANLEY, p. 34). If the Turks are ever to be converted to Christianity, it must be done by other churches. Mohammedans regard the Greek and Roman Christians as idolaters, and cannot but despise the monks who disgrace by their fights the traditional spot of the nativity and crucifixion, and have to be kept in order by Turkish soldiers.

The want of missionary spirit, however, accounts also for greater freedom from the curse of proselytism and persecuting intolerance. The history of the Greek Church is not disfigured by bloody tribunals of orthodoxy, like the Spanish Inquisition, or systematic and long-continued persecution, like the crusades against the Waldenses, Albigenses, Huguenots, with the infernal scenes of St. Bartholomew's Massacre. Yet the Greek Church of old has mercilessly expelled and exiled Arian, Nestorian, Eutychian, and other heretics, persecuted the Paulicians (835); and modern Russia rigidly prohibits secession from the orthodox national Church. Nobody can be converted in Russia from one religion or sect to another, except to the national orthodox Church; and all the children of mixed marriages, where one parent belongs to it, must be baptized and educated in it. The spirit of fanatical intolerance has manifested itself recently in the atrocious persecution of the Jews (1881), which excited the indignation of the civilized world; but it would be unfair to hold the Eastern Church responsible for these excesses. A church which has been wonderfully preserved through so many centuries, and allows the word of God to circulate among her people, justifies a hopeful view of its future mission and prospects.

LIT.—The chief sources are the acts of the first seven œcumenical synods; the writings of the Greek fathers, especially Athanasius, Chrysostom, John of Damascus, and Photius; the Confession of Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople (delivered to the Turkish Sultan, Mahomet II., 1453); the orthodox Confession of Peter Mogilas, metropolitan of Kiev (1643); the eighteen decrees of the synod of Jerusalem, or the Confession of Dositheus (1672, mainly directed against the Patriarch Cyril Lucar, and his attempt to Protestantize the Greek Church); the Russian catechisms of Platon, and especially of Philaret (metropolitan of Moscow, d. 1867). The Longer Catechism of Philaret, issued by authority of the holy synod of St. Petersburg, 1839, is used in all the churches and schools of the Russian Empire, and is by far the best modern exposition of the orthodox doctrine of the Eastern Church. It contains, in questions and answers, a Commentary of the Nicene Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Nine Beatitudes, and the Ten Commandments. GREEN, Ashbel, D.D., LL.D., an ecclesiastical leader in the Presbyterian Church of the United States, and president of Princeton College; b. at Hanover, N.J., July 6, 1762; d. at Philadelphia, May 19, 1848. He served as a sergeant in the Revolutionary war; graduated at Princeton 1783; and was successively tutor and professor at the college, and pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia from 1787 to 1812. He was one of the founders of Princeton Seminary, and president of the college 1812-22. He afterwards resided in Philadelphia, editing the Christian Advocate 1822-34. Dr. Green excelled as a leader, and was born to command. "In any sphere or calling he would have held a high rank. As a statesman, he would have shaped the policy of his party, if not of his country," etc. (Gillett, Hist. Presb. Ch., I. 566 sq.). He wielded great influence in the Presbyterian Church, and by his arraignment of Albert Barnes (first when the congregation appeared before the presbytery of Philadelphia, to get permission to present a call, in 1830) for holding fundamental errors, and by his subsequent course in the interest of purity of doctrine within the Church, contributed very largely to bring on the division in the Presbyterian body in 1837. He published a Hist. of Presb. Missions, Lectures on the Assembly's Catechism (2 vols.), and other works. His Life, begun by himself, was finished by J. H. JONES, and published New York, 1849.

GREEN, Joseph Henry, F.R.S., D.C.L., author of The Spiritual Philosophy; b. in London, Nov. 1, 1791; d. at the Mount, Hadley, Middlesex, Dec. 13, 1863. He was by profession a surgeon, and achieved the highest success; but he devoted much time to philosophical studies. In 1817 he made the acquaintance of Coleridge, and became at last his almost daily companion. Coleridge, who died July 25, 1834, made him his literary executor; and in 1836 Mr. Green resigned his professorship of surgery at King's College, London, retired from practice, and spent the rest of his life in studious seclusion. Shortly before his death he finished the work by which he will be remembered, — The Spiritual Philosophy, founded on the Teaching of the Late Samuel Taylor Coleridge (London, 1865, 2 vols.). The work was carried through the press by Mr. John Simon, who prefaced it with a brief Memoir. It is the best concatenated exposition of Coleridge's philosophy. Mr. Green was a man of lovely character.

GREENFIELD, William, a celebrated linguist; b. in London, April 1, 1799; d. there Nov. 5, 1831. He edited, for Bagster, the Comprehensive Bible (1826), the Syriac New Testament (1828, 1829), a Hebrew New Testament (1830), a lexicon of the Greek New Testament, and an abridgment of Schmidt's Greek Concordance. He was appointed in 1830 editor of foreign versions to the British and Foreign Bible Society.

was b. in Oxfordshire; entered Oxford 1604; became minister at Stepney before 1643; was cast out of his living by the Act of Uniformity; d. before 1677. His Exposition of Ezekiel, in five volumes (London, 1645-62, new edition by Sherman, London, 1839) of an average of 600 pages each, is one of the best Puritan commentaries. See REID: Memoirs of the Westminster Divines, 1811.

GREGG, John, D.D., b. at Cappa, County Clare, Ireland, Aug. 4, 1798; d. at Cork, Sunday, May 26, 1878. He was educated at the University of Dublin; after service in a country parish, was rector in Dublin, 1836-62; in 1857 was made Archdeacon of Kildare, and in 1862 Bishop of Cork. He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost. His ministry in Dublin was memorable by reason of his spirituality, eloquence, and fidelity; while as a bishop he was wise in counsel, kind in manner, and firm in rule. His Life was written by his son, Dublin, 1879.

GRÉGOIRE, Henri, b. at Veho, a village near Lunéville, Dec. 4, 1750; d. in Paris, May 28, 1831; was educated in the Jesuit college at Nancy, and became teacher in the Jesuit school of Pont-à-Mousson, pastor of Emberménil, and Bishop of Blois from 1791 to 1801; after 1814 he retired altogether from public life. Sent as a delegate to the assembly of the States-General in 1789, he played a prominent part during the whole revolution, advocating the most advanced views with respect to social reforms, but opposing, often with great courage, the reign of terror. He was the first French priest who took the oath on the constitution (Dec. 27, 1790). His episcopal office he resigned, in consequence of the concordat of 1801. During the Restoration he was much persecuted by the ultramontanists; and Guillon had to suffer considerably because he administered the sacrament to him on his deathbed. He wrote Sur la régénération des Juifs (Metz, 1789, translated into English, London, same year), De la littérature des Nègres (Paris, 1808, translated both into English and German), Histoire des sectes religieuses (Paris, 1828, 5 vols.), Mémoires de Grégoire (Paris, 1837, 2 vols.). His life was written by Gustav Krüger, Leip., 1838. See C. RENÉ GREGORY: Grégoire, the Priest and the Revolutionist, Leip., 1876. CASPAR RENÉ GREGORY.

GREGOR VON HEIMBURG was b. in the beginning of the fifteenth century, probably at Würzburg, and descended from a noble family in Franconia. After studying law at the university of his native city, and obtaining the degree of doctor utriusque (1430), he repaired immediately to Basel, at that time the centre of public attention as the seat of the œcumenical council. He staid there till 1435, when he was made syndic of Nuremberg, and became acquainted, even intimately, with Enca Silvio Piccolomini. In Nuremberg he remained till 1460; and as syndic of this free city of the empire he immediately entered upon that protracted and bitter but never-interrupted contest with the curia, which filled his whole life. To break the influence of the Italian papacy on Germany, and stop that drainage by Rome of the very heart-blood of his fatherland, were the great objects of his life. In 1446 Eugen IV. deposed Archbishop Theodoric of Cologne, and Archbishop Jacob of Treves, on account of the reformatory tendencies their government evinced. The electors of the empire immediately assembled at Francfort; and, supported by the Emperor Frederic III., they sent an embassy to Rome to move the Pope to cancel the depositions. Gregor stood at the head of this embassy; and, when nothing came out of the negotiations, he published his Admonitio de injustis usurpationibus paparum, etc. (GOLDAST, Monarchia, I. p. 557), burning with indignation. In 1458 his friend Enea Silvio ascended the papal throne under the name of Pius II.; and in the very next year Gregor had an opportunity to plead before him, as the representative of Duke Sigismund of Austria, at the congress of Mantua. But Gregor spoke against the Pope's plans, and the friendship turned into a deadly hatred. Shortly after, the duke was put under the ban, because he had imprisoned Nicholas of Cusa, Bishop of Brixen; and when Gregor, in behalf of his client, appealed to an œcumenical council, he, too, was put under the ban. He sought refuge, first with George Podiebrad, king of Bohemia, afterwards with the Duke of Saxony; and he continued to harass the curia with his scornful and defiant denunciations. After the accession, however, of Sixtus IV., the ban was abrogated; and he died (1472) reconciled with the Church.

LIT.—Besides those of his writings which are found in GOLDAST (Monarchia), there is a collection, Scripta nervosa, etc., Francfort, 1608. His life was written by BALLESTADIUS (Helmstädt, 1737) and CL. BROCKHAUS (Leipzig, 1861). See also VOIGT: Enea Silvio Piccolomini, 1858-63, 3 vols. P. TSCHACKERT.

GREGORIUS AGRIGENTINUS was Bishop of Agrigentum in the latter part of the sixth century, and wrote (in Greek) a commentary on Ecclesiastes, which, together with a life of him (also in Greek) by Leontius, was edited by Morcelli, Venice, 1791, with Latin translation and notes, and reproduced in Patrologia Græca, vol. 98. Though the sketch by Leontius is very full, the chronology of Gregorius' life is very uncertain.

GREGORIUS ANTIOCHENSIS, or THEOPOLITANUS, was first a monk in Constantinople, then abbot of the monastery of Mount Sinai, and finally patriarch of Antioch, or, as the city was then called, Theopolis (569-594). His life was very stormy. He was exceedingly unpopular in Antioch, and was compelled twice to defend himself against the most infamous accusations. A homily by him (In mulieres unquentiferas), and a speech he delivered to the rebellious soldiers on the Persian frontier, are still extant; GALLAND: Bibl. Patr., XII.

GREGORIUS NEO-CÆSARENSIS THAUMATURGUS, the enthusiastic disciple of Origen, and the apostle of Pontus; was b. at Neo-Cæsarea in Pontus, and destined for some kind of civil career, but happened to come to Cæsarea in Palestine, where Origen had settled down shortly before (in 231), and remained there, studying under his tutorship, for eight years. Before he returned home he wrote his panegyrics on his great teacher (specially edited by J. A. Bengel, 1722); and shortly after his arrival home he was consecrated bishop of his native city by Phædimus of Amisus. He found seventeen Christians in Neo-Cæsarea when he entered his office: there were only seventeen Pagans left when he died (about 270). Testimonies of the energy he developed and the influence he exercised are not only the legends which cluster around his name, but also the writings he left,—his so-called canonical letter on discipline, one of the most interesting documents of ancient Christianity; the confession he used for the catechumens of his church; his paraphrase of Ecclesiastes. They were edited by G. Voss, Mayence, 1604, in Paris, 1622; in GALLAND: Bibl. Patr., III.; and MIGNE: Patrol. Græca, X. His life was written by GREGORY OF NYSSA (utterly unreliable), PALLAVICINI (Rome, 1644), J. L. BOYE (Jena, 1703), and VICTOR RYSSSEL (Leipzig, 1880). W. MÖLLER.

GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR. See ARMENIA.

GREGORY NAZIANZEN, one of the three celebrated Cappadocians of the fourth century who defended the Nicene faith, and one of the most eloquent orators of the early Church. Compared with his two other fellow-countrymen, he was neither an ecclesiastical leader, like Basil, nor a deep thinker, like Gregory of Nyssa, but surpassed both in rhetorical skill, and possessed a combination of talents such as neither of them had. A romantic interest attaches to his career, which was a constant vacillation between an active participation in the ecclesiastical movements of the time, and complete retirement to the contemplative and literary diversions of a monk's life. Rich biographical notices are found in Gregory the Presbyter, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Rufinus, and Suidas. The most important sources of his life are, however, his own writings. He was b. 330, at Nazianzus in Cappadocia, or in Arianus, a village near by, and d. 389 or 390. His mother, Nounna, was a woman of ardent piety and devotion. Brought into the Church by her persuasions, his father was made Bishop of Nazianzus. Gregory visited, in turn, the two Cæsareas, Alexandria, and Athens; devoting himself in the latter city to the study of grammar, mathematics, rhetoric, etc. Among his fellow-students was Julian, afterwards Roman emperor. In 360 he returned to Cappadocia, and was baptized. At the invitation of his friend Basil he went to Pontus, and shared with him common studies and diversions. One result of these mutual studies was the Philocalia, a collection of excerpts from Origen. His father, yielding to the pressure of imperial and ecclesiastical influence, had affixed his signature to a semi-Arian document of the synod of Rimini. Hearing of this, Gregory hurried to Nazianzus, and prevailed on him to retract. On this visit his father, as was frequently the case in those days, suddenly and without previous intimation to his son, ordained him presbyter. Gregory shrank from the duties of the office, and fled to Basil, but was soon prevailed upon to return, and assist his father in his old age. When Basil was consecrated Bishop of Cæsarea some years afterward, he intrusted to his friend the bishopric of Sasima, a squalid village. The office was forced upon Gregory against his will; and, though he allowed himself to be consecrated, he refused to serve, and continued to assist his father as coadjutor till his death (374). In 379 he was called to Constantinople to lead the Nicene party, which was so inconsiderable that it did not even have a church to worship in. But Gregory's eloquence and devotion soon attracted crowds, who, under the spell of his words, forgot his smallness of stature and sickly emaciation of face. Even such scholars as Jerome desired to be his pupils; and the little congregation soon passed into a church, which, with reference to the revival of the true faith, received the name Anastasia. In 380 Theodosius consummated the defeat of the Arian party; and Gregory was led in triumph into the principal church of the city. He was elected Bishop of Constantinople, and consecrated by the order of the second œcumenical council (381). But the Macedonian and Egyptian bishops on their arrival pronounced the act a violation of the canons of Nice, which limited a bishop to one diocese. Gregory resigned, too noble to have recourse to intrigue, as was then so frequently the case, and yet not without some regret. He returned to Cappadocia, where for a time he devoted himself to ecclesiastical matters, and then retired to his paternal estate at Arianus.

Gregory's WRITINGS consist of orations, letters, and poems. In these he shows himself a skilful author: his diction is rich, and glowing with figures, his emotion ardent, his rhetorical gifts shedding a constant lustre. His letters, addressed to Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, etc., abound in beautiful thoughts. His poems contain some fine hymns, but are often wearisome and prolix. Most important are the orations, forty-five in number. Five are devoted to the exposition and defence of the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, and won for Gregory the title of the "Theologian." The others are devoted to public events, or to the memory of martyrs, friends, and kindred. No one of them is a pure treatment of a biblical subject. In christology Gregory opposed Arianism and Apollinarianism: in anthropology he teaches original sin, and derives the mortality of man from the fall. But he held to the ability of the human will to choose the good, and to the co-operation of man with God in salvation. In these particulars he shows the influence of Origen, as, in his views of the Trinity, the influence of Athanasius.

GREGORY OF NYSSA, one of the ablest defenders of the Nicene faith against Arianism and Apollinarianism, and a younger brother of Basil; was b. in Cappadocia about 332; d. about 395. He was indebted to his brother for his literary training. Under the influence of a dream he undertook the office of anagnost, or reader; but, the duties not being congenial to his tastes, he forsook it to become a teacher of rhetoric. Gregory Nazianzen remonstrating with him for seeming to prefer the fame of a rhetorician above the calling of a Christian, he returned to the service of the Church, and in 371 or 372 was made, by Basil, Bishop of Nyssa, an inconsiderable town of Cappadocia. Gregory was married to Theosebia, who was still living at the time of his promotion. The synod of Ancyra (375), convened by the Arian Demetrius, governor of Pontus, pronounced him, though unjustly, guilty of misuse of church-funds, and violation of the canons for the election of bishops. In the following year another synod deposed him from his bishopric. This was followed by his banishment by Valens. Crushed by these events, Gregory retired into solitude. The death of Valens (378) was the signal for his return to his diocese, which he entered amidst the acclamations of the people. The following year Basil died, and a few months later his sister Macrina, whom Gregory saw in her dying hours on his return from the synod of Antioch. In 381 we find him at the Council of Constantinople. At this meeting he read his work against Eunomius to Gregory Nazianzen and Jerome. Of the two discourses he pronounced during his stay in the city, — at the consecration of Gregory Nazianzen, Bishop of Constantinople, and at the death of Miletius of Antioch, — the latter only is preserved. The council appointed him, in conjunction with Helladius, overseer or patriarch of the churches of Pontus; but he seems to have been ignored by the latter. In obedience to an order of the synod of Antioch (or the Council of Constantinople), Gregory visited the church of Arabia (Babylon) in the interest of its reformation. He afterwards went to Jerusalem, where he found the church in a very unsatisfactory state. A result of this tour was the work De Euntibus Hierosolyma, which warns against the uselessness and evils of pilgrimages. He was in Constantinople in 383, and again in 385, when he delivered funeral orations over the young Princess Pulcheria and the Empress Placilla. We hear nothing more of him till 394, when he is in attendance at a synod of Constantinople, and delivered a sermon at the dedication of a church at Chalcedon.

Gregory of Nyssa was of a retiring disposition, and laid himself open, by his irresolute and pliant administration of his diocese, to the charge of weakness and incompetency from Basil. He lacked the practical gifts of a leader, which his brother possessed in an eminent degree, and was not endowed so richly with oratorical talents as Gregory Nazianzen; but he was a profounder theologian than either. In general, except on the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation, he leaned upon Origen. In his vindication of the Nicene articles he makes a clear distinction between essence (οὐσία) and person (ὑπόστασις). The simplicity of the divine essence excludes all subordination of persons in the Trinity. The Son is equal with the Father by reason of an eternal generation. Sin has interfered with the realization of man's design, which was to participate in the divine fulness, and has antagonized the world to God. To enable man to realize this design is the object of the Incarnation. Man still retains free will and a love for the good, which is indestructible. Sin, which is departure from God, is overcome by God's approach to man; i. e., the union of the divine with the human nature. Christ assumed all of human nature—body, soul, and spirit—in order to redeem all. As the second Adam he restores to man his original love and longing after God, and enables him by the gift of the Holy Spirit to attain in an ever-increasing measure to his likeness. "Christianity is the imitation of the divine nature" (χριστιανισμός ἐστὶ τῆς θείας φύσεως μίμησης). All will be ultimately restored, for all possess a remainder of the divine nature; and this could not be destroyed without destroying the very soul itself. This doctrine of the apokatastasis, or universal restoration, which he taught in common with Origen, has given great trouble to the Eastern Church, some of their scholars holding the passages teaching it to be insertions by the hand of heretics.

LIT. — The most important of Gregory's dogmatical works are his twelve Books against Eunomius, Antirrhet. adv. Apollinarem (the most valuable refutation of Apollinarianism), and Oratio Catechet. Magna. Of his exegetical works the most important are his De Hominis Opificio, Apolog. de Hexameron, the Life of Moses, expositions of Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, the Beatitudes, the Lord's Prayer, etc. To these must be added his epistles, funeral orations, and ascetic writings, such as De Virginitate, in which he represents celibacy as the perfection of life, from which, however, he laments that he is himself debarred. GREGORY OF TOURS, b. at Arverna, the present Clermont, the capital of Auvergne, 540; d. at Tours, Nov. 17, 594; descended from one of the most distinguished Roman families in Gaul. His true name was Georgius Florentius, which he changed in honor of his maternal great-grandfather, Bishop Gregory of Langres. Having been educated for the Church, he was chosen Bishop of Tours in 573, and governed his diocese with great ability under very difficult circumstances, the wars between Sigebert and Chilperic, or rather between Brunehild and Fredegund. He owes his great celebrity, however, principally to his authorship. Besides a work on miracles, which is hardly read any more, he wrote the Annales Francorum, which is the most important, if not the only, source to the history of Gaul in that period. It was first printed in Paris, 1511, and critically edited by Ruinart, Paris, 1699. There is a French translation of it by Claude Bonnet, 1610, and an excellent German translation by Giesebrecht, in Pertz, Geschichtsschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit, Berlin, 1851, 9th ed., 1873.

GREGORY OF UTRECHT, the son of Alberic, who, through his mother, Wastrade, was related to the royal family of the Merovingians; met in 722 with Boniface in the monastery of Pfalzel, near Treves, and became from that day his friend and companion. After the death of Boniface he was charged by the Pope with the conversion of the Frisians; and he labored with success for this object, both as a missionary, and as leader of the school of Utrecht. He died in the Church of St. Salvator, in Utrecht, Aug. 25, 775. His life, by his pupil, Liudger, is found in Act. Sanct., August V. G. PLITT.

GREGORY is the name of sixteen popes; namely, Gregory I., the Great (Sept. 3, 590—March 12, 604), descended from a distinguished senatorial family, probably the Anicians, and was b. in Rome between 540 and 550. Educated in conformity with his social state, he was instructed in dialectics and rhetoric, studied law, entered the civil service, gained the confidence of the Emperor Justin, and received (about 574) the dignity of a prætor urbis. But he also studied the Fathers of the Western Church, — Augustine, Ambrose, and Jerome. His family was markedly religious: his mother, Sylvia, and his two paternal aunts, have been canonized. The deepest instincts of his own nature revolted against the luxury and ambition of his office. He determined to flee from the world, and become a monk. He employed the immense wealth left to him by his father's death to found six Benedictine monasteries in Sicily, and a seventh in his own house in Rome. In the latter he became a monk himself; and so severe were the ascetic exercises he practised, that his health became impaired, and even his life was in danger. At this moment the Pope, Pelagius II., interfered, dragged him out of the monastery by ordaining him a deacon (579), and sent him to Constantinople as apocriarius. The mission he fulfilled with great ability; and while in Constantinople he began his celebrated work Expositio in Job or Moralium Libri XXXV. After his return to Rome (585) he continued to take a leading part in all the business of the curia; and after the death of Pelagius II. he was unanimously elected Pope, by the clergy, the senate, and the people, and compelled to accept.

The position of the Bishop of Rome was at that time by no means an easy one. Pressed on one side by the Arian and half-barbarian Lombards, he was not free on the other, but had to yield in many ways to the authority of the Byzantine emperor and his representative in Italy, the exarch of Ravenna. Nevertheless, the position was not without its opportunities; and Gregory knew how to utilize them. The Pope was the greatest landed proprietor in Italy. From his estates, not only in Campania, Apulia, Calabria, Sicily, and Sardinia, but also in Gaul, Dalmatia, and Northern Africa, immense sums flowed into his treasury; and Gregory proved an excellent administrator, strict, and with an eye for the minutest details. To this wealth was added a certain prestige not ecclesiastical. On account of the weakness and inability of the exarchs, the Pope became the real ruler of Rome; and this rôle was quite natural to Gregory, who had been prætor urbis before he became Pope. Thus he stood almost as an independent power, mediating between the Lombards and the Byzantines. Through Theodelinde, a Bavarian princess, belonging to the Orthodox Church, and the wife of King Agilulf, he exercised some influence on the Lombards; though at one time (593), just while he was delivering his homilies on Ezekiel, he had to buy off Agilulf from the gates of Rome with an immense sum of gold and silver. In Constantinople, too, he could give his voice some weight; though his relations with the Emperor Mauritius became more and more troubled, especially after the controversy with John Jejunator.

John IV., Patriarch of Constantinople, liked to call himself the "œcumenical patriarch." But he was neither the first to assume this title, nor the only one to whom it had been applied: his predecessor, Menas, had borne it 536; and it had been given to Leo I. by the Council of Chalcedon 451, to Hormisdas by the Syrian monks 517, and to Boniface II. by the metropolitan of Larissa in 531. Gregory, however, who called himself servus servorum Dei (not as a rebuke to the Constantinopolitan patriarch, but simply in imitation of Augustine), took umbrage at this title, complained of it to Mauritius (595), and attacked John IV. with a somewhat extraordinary vehemence. John died in the same year; but his successor, Cyriacus, continued the title, and Gregory became more and more irritated, especially as Mauritius declined to interfere. In November, 602, Mauritius was overthrown by Phocas; and not only was he himself beheaded, but also his wife, his five sons, and his three daughters. The new emperor, however, the usurper, the murderer, was hailed by the Pope with letters of congratulation, whose fulsomeness and flattery and adulation can be explained only on the supposition that Gregory, when he wrote the letters, was ignorant of the wanton cruelty which had accompanied the usurpation, — a supposition which, in view of the times, by no means is improbable.

In a similar way his relation to Brunehild must be explained. Brunehild was simply a monster. The crimes she committed during the reign of her son, Childebert II. (575-596), and her two grandsons, Theudebert II. and Theuderic II., earned for her the name of the "Frankish Fury," the "new Jezebel." And to this woman Gregory wrote letters full of praise and flattery. But what did he know of her? Probably nothing more than what he learnt from her own letters; and in these she simply asked for some relics for a church, or the pallium for St. Syagrius of Autun, or a privilege for some monastery, or a papal legate to a Frankish synod; while she promised to support the English mission, to build churches and monasteries, to abolish simony, to introduce celibacy, to refrain from giving ecclesiastical offices and benefices to laymen, etc. To him Brunehild may have looked as he described her, — a very pious woman.

The two brightest points, however, in Gregory's relations with foreign countries, are Spain and England. Through the influence of Bishop Leander of Seville, an intimate friend of Gregory since they first met in Constantinople, Reccared, King of the Visigoths, was led to abandon Arianism, and join the Catholics. In a letter dated 599, the king communicated his conversion to the Pope; and at the same time he sent a goblet of gold as a present to St. Peter. Gregory answered most graciously, and sent abbot Cyriacus to Spain with the pallium to Leander. The synod of Barcelona, held in the same year under the presidency of the metropolitan Asiaticus of Tarragona, and treating the questions of simony and laymen's investiture with ecclesiastical benefices, was probably connected with the sending of Cyriacus. England had already attracted the attention of Gregory while he was yet a monk. The sight of the Anglo-Saxon boys exhibited in the slave-markets of Rome had moved him to pity, and he determined to go to England as a missionary. He actually started on the way, but was recalled by the Pope. When he became Pope himself, he sent (596) Augustine and forty other monks to King Ethelbert of Kent; and already the next year Augustine could report the baptism of the king and ten thousand of his subjects. How great an interest Gregory took in the English mission appears from his letters to Augustine, which are full of the most detailed instructions.

However successful Gregory was in extending the influence and authority of the Roman see throughout the Western countries, that which he accomplished for the internal organization and consolidation of the Church was, nevertheless, of far greater importance. The delicate question of the dependence of the Western metropolitan sees on the see of Rome, he handled with great adroitness. In North Africa, whose clergy were extremely jealous of their independence, he acted with great caution, and in strict conformity with the canons of the Council of Sardica (347). Gennadius the exarch, and the two most prominent bishops in the province, Dominicus of Carthage, and Columbus of Numidia, were firm friends of his; and many appeals were made to the Roman see. But the parties were never summoned to Rome: the cases were treated in loco, and by papal legates. Quite otherwise in the diocese of Ravenna. He forbade the Archbishop John, in a rather sharp manner, to wear the pallium, except when celebrating mass; and when a conflict arose between John's successor, Marinianus, and a certain abbot, Claudius, he summoned both parties to Rome to plead their cause before him personally. He attempted the same in Illyria, on occasion of a contested episcopal election at Salona (593); but in that case the Emperor Mauritius interfered, and to his great chagrin and humiliation he was compelled to make a compromise.

Gregory's ideas of a papal supremacy may have been somewhat vague; but his instincts were strong, and pointed all towards the loftiest goal. Very characteristic in this respect were his exertions to separate the monks from the clergy proper. He had been a monk himself, and he knew to what temptations and illusions human nature is exposed by monastic life: consequently he fixed the term of the novitiate at two years, and for soldiers at three. He forbade youths under eighteen years to enter a monastery, and married men, unless with the consent of their wives. He ordered all ecclesiastical officials to seize those monks, who, often in great swarms, roamed about in the country, and really were neither more nor less than tramps of the most indolent and impertinent description, and to deliver them up to the nearest monastery for punishment. Thus he did much for the reform of the monks, but he did still more for their emancipation. One monastery after the other was exempted from the episcopal authority; and at the synod of Rome (601) the power of the bishop over the abbey was generally confined to the installation of the abbot. It was evidently his idea to form out of the monks a powerful instrument which might be wielded by the Pope independently of the clergy. On the other hand, he transferred some of the most marked characteristics of monastic life to the clergy, as, for instance, the celibacy, for whose introduction he was exceedingly anxious. For the clergy he wrote, shortly after his accession to the papal throne, his famous book, Regula Pastoralis, which for centuries was regarded as the moral code of the clergy. The Emperor Mauritius had it translated into Greek (Alfred the Great translated it himself into Anglo-Saxon), and Hincmar of Rheims states in 870 that every Frankish bishop took an oath on it at his consecration. Preaching he considered as the principal duty of the priest, and he gave in this respect a brilliant example himself. Besides the above-mentioned homilies on Ezekiel, forty homilies on the Gospels have come down to us.

As a theologian Gregory was without originality: nevertheless he exercised also in this field a beneficial influence by spreading the interest in Augustine. He is sometimes called the "inventor of purgatory;" but, though his doctrines of an intermediate state between death and doom are very explicit, they are hardly more than modifications of the ideas of Augustine. His dogmatical views he set forth in his Dialogorum de vita et miraculis patrum Italicorum et de æternitate animarum. Otherwise, with his influence on the ceremonial side of Christianity, it amounted at some points to a complete revolution. It is doubtful how much of the Sacramentarium Gregorianum really belongs to Gregory, and how much has been borrowed from the Sacramentarium of Gelasius I. The case is somewhat similar with respect to his Liber Antiphonarius. Nevertheless, it is beyond doubt that he founded a singing-school in Rome, the effect of which was that the Gregorian Chant, the cantus planus, with its grave, solemn rhythm, all tones having equal length, superseded the Ambrosian Chant, the cantus figuratus.

LIT.—The principal source is, of course, found in Gregory's own works, especially in his letters, numbering eight hundred and fifty. The best editions are those by Dom Denis de Ste. Marthe (Dionysius Sammarthanus, Paris, 1705, 4 vols. fol.) and by Galliciolli (Venice, 1768-76, 17 vols. 4to). Next in importance are the old vitæ.—(I.) in the Liber Pontificalis in MURATORI: Scrip. Rer. Ital., III.; (II.) in CANISIUS: Thes., Antwerp, 1725, II.; (III.) by PAULUS DIACONUS (eighth

Gregory II. (May 19, 715-Feb. 10, 731) was a Benedictine monk, and rebuilt Monte Cassino, which had been destroyed by the Lombards. He was the first Pope who addressed himself to the Franks for aid against the Lombards, but he did not succeed. His letters are found in JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. Roman., his life, in VIGNOLI: Lib. Pont., II.—Gregory III. (Feb. 11, 731-Nov. 28, 741) was a Syrian by birth. He, too, asked the Franks for aid against the Lombards, but with as little success as his predecessor. A work he wrote, according to Anastasius, on the legitimacy of image-worship, seems to have been lost.—

Gregory IV. (827-844) was, by his ambition to act as a divinely appointed arbiter, led to interfere in the dismal family troubles of the Frankish dynasty, and became, perhaps unwillingly and unwittingly, the tool with which Lothaire accomplished his treachery on the fields of Colmar. His life is found in VIGNOLI: Lib. Pont., III.—

Gregory V. (May 3, 996-Feb. 18, 999), a son of Duke Otho of Carinthia, and a near relative of Otho III.; was the first German pope. He was placed on the throne by Otho III.; but the emperor had hardly left Italy before the Roman nobility rose in rebellion, headed by Crescentius, and an antipope (John XVI.) was elected. But the emperor returned, the rebellion was quelled, Crescentius was beheaded, and John XVI. was dragged through the streets of Rome, mutilated, and imprisoned. JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Roman.—

Gregory VI. (1044-46) bought the papal crown from Benedict IX., and ruled for a year and a half with prudence and tolerable success. But he did not please the Roman nobility, and they allured Benedict IX. to return. The emperor, Henry III., was called in as arbiter; and Gregory VI. met him at Piacenza, and accompanied him to Sutri. There he openly confessed in the council that he had bought the papal dignity in order to save it; and, when all the bishops agreed in condemning such a measure, he laid aside the papal insignia, and went with the emperor to Germany, where he died at Cologne, 1048.—There was also an antipope of the name, Gregory VI., under Benedict VIII., but only for a short time. See THIETMARUS: Merseburg. Chron., in PERTZ: Mon. Germ. Script., III. G. VOIGT.

Gregory VII. (April 22, 1073-May 25, 1085). His true name was Hildebrand; and he was born of humble parentage, either at Saona or in Rome. He was chaplain to Gregory VI., accompanied him on his journey to Cologne, and entered, after his death, the monastery of Clugny. There Leo IX. became acquainted with him in the time of the synod of Rheims (1049). He returned to Italy, was made a deacon and cardinal, and soon he became the very soul of the papal government. A man of lofty spirit and inexhaustible energy, he knew how to avail himself of every chance in his favor, without ever deviating from his own plans on account of adverse circumstances. Though on many points the results of his labor did not show until years after his death, the ideas which in this period remodelled the Christian world sprung from his brain, and were set a-working by his hands.

He succeeded in breaking the influence of the Roman nobility and the German court on the papal election. When Stephen X. died (1058), the nobility chose Benedict X.; and the cardinals, headed by Hildebrand, Nicholas II. Aided by the Empress Agnes, Hildebrand got, by bribery and force, his candidate installed in Rome; and one of the first measures of Nicholas II. was a decree by which the papal election was put entirely into the hands of the cardinals and the German emperor, to the exclusion of the Roman nobility. Nicholas II. died in 1061. One party among the cardinals immediately sent the papal insignia to the Empress Agnes in order that she should appoint a new pope; while another party, headed by Hildebrand, assembled in a regular conclave, and chose Bishop Anselm of Lucca, who assumed the name of Alexander II., Oct. 1, 1061. The empress chose Bishop Cadalus of Parma, Oct. 21; and at the head of an imperial army he entered Rome. But in May, 1062, a revolution in Germany bereft the Empress Agnes of her power, and placed Archbishop Anno of Cologne at the head of the government during the minority of Henry IV. By the Councils of Augsburg (October, 1062) and Mantua (May, 1064), Alexander II. was recognized as the legitimate Pope.

Alexander II. died April 22, 1073; and the very same day Hildebrand was elected Pope. He assumed the name of Gregory VII., and was consecrated June 29, 1073. But the consent of the German emperor was not asked for: indeed, the relation between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. was from the very beginning strained, and fraught with danger to them both. The abbey of Reichenau, on the Lake of Constance, became vacant in 1071; and a monk (Robert of Bamberg) got himself appointed abbot by bribing the councillors of the King. But the monks of Reichenau denounced the new abbot in Rome, and Alexander II. put him under the ban. As now the royal councillors would not give up the estates they had received from Robert, they, too, were put under the ban; and, as the king would not dismiss his councillors, even he fell under the ban. Such was the state of affairs when Gregory VII. ascended the throne. By the mediation, however, of the Empress Agnes, a reconciliation was effected. Henry IV. humiliated himself, did penance, and was absolved; and peace reigned for some time while the contestants were gathering strength.

Gregory was very zealous for the establishment of celibacy. He saw the necessity of this measure for the consolidation of the Church in her contest with the State; and in 1074 he issued a decree that no layman should frequent the service, or receive the sacraments, when administered by a married priest: he even encouraged the laity to compel by force the priests to send away their wives. The decree was obeyed only with too much willingness; and in many places, especially in Southern Germany, the priests suffered unspeakably from the violence and wantonness of the knights and the rabble. But this extraordinary means of enforcing his authority over the clergy, by the aid of the laity, raised a great hatred against Gregory in the ranks of the lower clergy; and they addressed themselves to Henry IV. for aid. Among the king's most intimate friends was one of the Pope's bitterest enemies, Duke Gottfried of Lower Lorraine. In 1074 he had married Mathilde, the daughter of margravine Beatrice of Tuscany; but Mathilde refused to remain with him, and returned to her mother. On account of the intimate friendship which existed between Gregory on the one side and Beatrice and Mathilde on the other, and the absolute sway he bore over the minds of those two women, Duke Gottfried was not altogether wrong when he laid the blame of his disturbed marriage relations on the Pope: at all events, he hated him. Another cause of estrangement between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. was the law of investiture, which Gregory issued in 1075, though it was not generally enforced until 1078. According to this law, no prince or layman could make any appointment to an ecclesiastical office, nor could any ecclesiastical receive his office from a layman. The affairs of Milan finally brought the gathering storm to burst forth (1075). In 1071 the see of Milan became vacant, and in the same year Henry IV. appointed Gottfried, a priest of Milan, archbishop. In 1073 Gregory appointed Atto, another Milanese priest. Neither the one nor the other had any authority in the diocese; and, in order to put an end to the confusion, Henry IV. appointed a third archbishop, Tedald. But this measure was met by Gregory VII. with the most determined protest.

Henry IV. seems entirely to have miscalculated the strength of his adversary. Jan. 1, 1076, at Gosslar, he undertook to depose the Pope; and Jan. 24, a number of German bishops and priests signed at Worms a complaint that Gregory was not legitimately elected, since he had not the consent of the German emperor, which, according to the decree of Nicholas II., he should have. Gregory VII. answered simply by putting Henry IV. and his adherents under the ban. A number of the German princes at once withdrew their allegiance, and invited the Pope to be present at the diet of Augsburg (Feb. 2, 1077), to give judgment in the case. Henry, who understood that such a diet would not only be an humiliation and a danger to him, but complete ruin, hastened to Italy in December, 1076, found the Pope at Cannossa (one of the castles of Mathilde), presented himself, clad in sackcloth, with bare feet, and ashes on his head, in the courtyard, and was, after three days' waiting, admitted to the Pope's presence, and absolved. The German princes, fearing the revenge of Henry IV., chose an anti-king, March 15, 1077; and a war began which lasted till 1080. During these years, Gregory VII. constantly urged the convocation of a diet.

in which he himself would adjust matters; and, when he discovered that Henry never would consent to appear before such an assembly, he put him a second time under the ban, in the spring of 1080. But Oct. 15, in the battle on the Elster, he succeeded in defeating the anti-king, and suppressing the rebellion; and in the spring of 1081 he stood in Italy at the head of a great army, having in the mean time made Clement III. antipope. He besieged Rome four years in succession, occupied the Leonine part of the city, and shut the Pope up in the castle of St. Angelo; but he was finally driven away by Robert Guiscard, who rescued Gregory VII., and brought him to Salerno, where he died. Gregory VIII. (Oct. 21-Dec. 17, 1187). There was also an antipope of that name, Mauritius Burdinus, Archbishop of Braga, raised to the papal throne by Henry V., March 8, 1118, afterwards deserted by the emperor, deposed by Calixtus II., and dragged from one prison to another until his death, 1125. See Vita Burdini, in BALUZE: Miscellan., III.; and JAFFÉ: Regest. Pontif. — Gregory IX. (March 19, 1227-Aug. 22, 1241) was eighty years old when he ascended the papal throne, but proved a match for Frederic II. of Hohenstaufen, both in courage and energy. Frederic had vowed a crusade, but seemed inclined to make light of his vow. Admonished by the Pope, he embarked at Brindisi, but landed a few days afterwards at Otranto, on account of sickness, as he said. Sept. 29, 1227, the Pope put him under the ban; and though he succeeded in expelling Gregory from Rome, first to Viterbo, then to Perugia, the ban was not removed. June 28, 1228, he embarked a second time, reached the Holy Land, made a brilliant campaign, and was crowned king of Palestine in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; but the ban still pursued him. After his return, however, Hermann of Salza, the grand-master of the Teutonic order, brought about a reconciliation (Sept. 1, 1230), and the ban was removed. But when, in 1238, he experienced some military and political reverses in Upper Italy, Gregory IX. again placed himself at the head of his enemies, and the ban was renewed (1239). Frederic II. immediately advanced against Rome; and the old Pope was a prisoner in his own capital when he died. His decretals were collected by Raymandus de Pennaforte, and published in five books in 1234. Of his letters, 4,550 in number, 3,200 are found in POTTHAST: Regest. Pontif. Roman., I.; lives of him in MURATORI: Script. Rer. Ital., III. — Gregory X. (Sept. 1, 1271-Jan. 10, 1276) was elected after a vacancy of three years, caused by the contention between the French and Italian parties among the cardinals. He tried to reconcile the Guelphs and the Ghibellines for the sake of a new crusade; and at the second Council of Lyons (1274) he labored to effect a union between the Eastern and Western churches: but in both respects he failed. His life is found in MURATORI: Script. Rer. Ital., III.; his letters, in POTTHAST: Reg. Ponti. Rom., II. — Gregory XI. (Dec. 30, 1370-March 27, 1378) removed the papal residence from Avignon, and entered Rome, Jan. 27, 1377. Five lives of him are found in BALUZE: Vitæ Papar. Avenion., I. — Gregory XII. (Dec. 2, 1406) was deposed by the Council of Pisa, June 5, 1407, but protested; resigned before the Council of Constance, July 4, 1415; and died, as cardinal-bishop of Porto, Oct. 18, 1417. — Gregory XIII. (May 13, 1572-April 10, 1585) founded twenty-two Jesuit colleges; celebrated the Massacre of St. Bartholomew with processions and medals; supported Henry III. against the Huguenots, etc. In 1582 he finished that improvement of the Julian Calendar which the councils of Constance, Basel, and Trent, and many popes, had labored on; and in the same year he issued a new and improved edition in folio of the Corpus juris canonici. His works are found in EGGS: Pontific. doctum. His life was written by CIAPPI (1591), BOMPIANI (1655), MAFFEI (1742), DE VIDAILLAN (1840). — Gregory XIV. (Dec. 5, 1590-Oct. 15, 1591) was entirely in the hands of the Spanish party and the leaguers of France. His bulls are found in CHERUBINI: Bullar. Magn., II. — Gregory XV. (Feb. 9, 1621-July 8, 1623) was an old and sickly man, and left the business to his young and energetic nephew, Ludovico, who most heartily supported the Jesuits in their exertions to restore the Roman Church in Bohemia, Hungary, Austria, Bavaria, France, and the Netherlands. The congregatio de propaganda fide was founded, and some improvements were introduced in the organization of the conclave. His bulls are found in CHERUBINI: Bull. Magnum. II. G. VOIGT.

Gregory XVI. (Feb. 2, 1831-June 1, 1846) was an old monk when he ascended the throne; b. at Belluno, Sept. 18, 1765; since 1823 general of his order, the Camaldolensians; since 1826 prefect of the propaganda, and known as author of the Il trionfo della santa Sede, etc., 1799. He was very successful in his government of the church in general. Thirty new apostolic vicariates, fifteen new missionary bishoprics, and forty-three new colleges for the education of missionaries, were founded. Though in Portugal he took the side of Don Miguel, and in Spain that of Don Carlos, he knew how to change position before the critical moment came. In France, too, the power of the Roman Church and the influence of the Jesuits were steadily growing. But his government of the States of the Church was fatal. Rebellion broke out immediately after his accession, and was kept down only by a permanent occupation of Bologna by Austria, and of Ancona by France. The public debt increased to 38,000,000 scudi. A loan from the Rothschilds gave only 65 on 100. The annual deficit was about 500,000 scudi. One of the items of revenue was the lottery, which brought in 1,120,000, but cost 850,000 in management. See O. MEYER: Die Propaganda, Göttingen, 1853; DÖLLINGER: Kirche und Kirchen, p. 546; FR. NIELSEN: Den romerske Kirke i det 19th Aarhundrede, Copenhagen, 1876, translated into German, vol. i. GREGORY, Olinthus Gilbert, b. at Yaxley, Huntingdonshire, Eng., Jan. 29, 1774; became professor of mathematics at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, 1807, where he died, Feb. 2, 1841. He is noted religiously for his Lives of Robert Hall (prefixed to a collected edition of Hall's works, separately published 1833) and John Mason Good (1828), and for his Letters to a Friend on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion (1815, 2 vols., 9th ed., 1851, abridgment, 1853).

GRELLET, Stephen (Étienne de), b. at Limoges, France, Nov. 2, 1773; d. at Burlington, N.J., Nov. 16, 1855. Born in the French nobility, at seventeen he was one of the royal body-guard. After a variety of adventures, he landed in New York 1795, in which year he was converted, and joined the Society of Friends. His ministrations during the yellow-fever visitation in Philadelphia, 1798, revealed his rare qualities. He rose to great eminence, and acquired wealth. He felt called upon to preach, and to this end made long journeys through the United States, and even to Europe, which he visited several times. On one occasion, being presented to the Pope, he had the courage to preach even in such a presence; similarly he exhorted the Czar of Russia. See Memoirs of Stephen Grellet, by B. SEEBOHM, Philadelphia, 1860, 2 vols.

GRESWELL, Edward, chronologist; b. at Denton, near Manchester, Eng., 1797; d. at Oxford, June 29, 1869. He was fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, 1823, and at the time of his death vice-principal. His works are very valuable. Those on chronology are Fasti Temporis Catholici (1852), Origines Kalendarie Italice (1854, 4 vols.), Origines Kalendarie Hellenice (1862, 6 vols.). Those on the Bible are Dissertations on the Principles and Arrangement of a Harmony of the Gospels (1830, 2d ed., 1837, 4 vols., the 4th vol. in 2 parts), Harmonia Evangelica (1830, 5th ed., 1856), Exposition of the Parables (1834, 1835, 5 vols.), Prolegomena ad Harmoniam Evangelicam (1840), The Three Witnesses and the Threefold Cord (1862, a reply to Bishop Colenso on the Pentateuch).

GRETZER, Jakob, b. at Markdorf, near Constance, 1560; d. at Ingolstadt, Jan. 29, 1625; entered the Society of Jesu in 1577, and was appointed professor at the university of Ingolstadt, first in philosophy, then in morals, and finally in dogmatics. He was a learned man and a prolific writer. His works, of which a collected edition appeared at Ratisbon (1734-39, in 17 vols. fol.), number over one hundred and fifty. Some of them are valuable; as, for instance, De Sancta Cruce; also his Greek grammar was much used. But he acquired his great fame principally by his obstinate and somewhat rude opposition to Protestantism.

GRIESBACH, Johann Jakob, a distinguished textual critic of the New Testament; was b. at Butzbach, Hesse-Darmstadt, Jan. 4, 1745; d. at Jena, March 24, 1812. After studying in Tübingen, Halle, and Leipzig, he travelled extensively on the Continent and in England. In 1771 he settled at Halle as docent, residing with Semler, and two years afterwards was made professor. In 1775 a call attracted him to Jena, where, laden with titles and honors, he labored during the remainder of his life.

Griesbach's labors in the textual criticism of the Greek New Testament mark the beginning of a new period in that department. Bengel before him had introduced some changes into the Elzevir text from the Complutensian Polyglot; but all others he only placed in the margin. Griesbach was the first in Germany to edit a Greek Testament embodying in the text the results of critical study. Following, to some extent, the previous labors of Bengel and Semler, he grouped the manuscripts in three classes,—the Occidental, characterized by glosses; the Alexandrian, by grammatical corrections; and the Byzantine, combining the readings of the other two (a division recently adopted in Westcott and Hort's New Testament, Ed.). He only altered the Elzevir text when the arguments were imperative. His critical theory rested upon a combination of logical principles and historical facts; the agreement of Occidental and Alexandrian manuscripts being regarded as especially important, and frequently decisive. Griesbach's bold effort called forth violent criticisms from the advocates of the inviolability of the received text, among which may be mentioned a work by Hartmann, professor in Rostock, which appeared in 1775. But for once and all time, in Germany, he answered such objections in the second edition. The editions of Griesbach's text appeared in the following order: Libri N. T. Historici, Halle, 1774, 1775; principal edition, Halle and London, 1796, 1806, 2 vols., with extensive critical apparatus and important prolegomena; in elegant form, Leipzig, 1803-07, 4 vols.; small editions, Leipzig, 1805 and 1825; a new edition, by David Schulz, 1827, of which only the first part appeared. Other critical works by Griesbach: De Codd. Evv. Origenianis, 1771; Curæ in Hist. Textus Epp. Paul., 1777; Symbolæ Criticæ ad Supplendas et Corrigenendas Varias N. T. Lectiones, 1785-93; Commentarius critic. in Text. Gr., 1794 sqq., only includes Matthew and Mark. His other writings were edited by Gabler, Jena, 1825, 2 vols. In theology Griesbach took a position midway between the conservative and radical schools. See AUGUSTI: Ueber Griesbach's Verdienste, Breslau, 1812.

ED. REUSS.

GRIFFIN, Edward Dorr, a distinguished pulpit orator, and president of Williams College; b. Jan. 6, 1770, at East Haddam, Conn.; d. Nov. 8, 1837, at Newark, N.J. He graduated with the highest honors, at Yale, 1790, and studied theology under Dr. Edwards, afterwards president of Union College. In 1794 he accepted a call to the Congregational Church at Farmington; but the council having twice refused to ordain him, on account of alleged erroneous views on baptism and the doctrines of grace, he withdrew, with its consent, and in 1795 was installed pastor of a church in West Hartford. In 1801 he became colleague of Dr. McWhorter, in the First Presbyterian Church in Newark, and pastor in 1807. Here, as before in West Hartford, extensive revivals prevailed under his ministry. In 1809 he became the first incumbent of the chair of pulpit eloquence at Andover Seminary, which he exchanged for the pastorate of Park-street Church, Boston, in 1811. In 1815 he returned to Newark as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, and in 1821 was elected president of Williams College, holding the office till 1836.

The institution at that time had only forty-eight students, and was in a critical condition. A powerful revival occurred in 1824. Dr. Griffin succeeded in putting the college on a firm basis.

Dr. Griffin was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. To a commanding presence (he was six feet three inches tall) he added a vivid imagination and fine reasoning powers. His sermons are simple, fervid, and evangelical. In theology he opposed the "New Divinity," as it was called, of New Haven. He published Lectures delivered in Park-street Church, Boston, 1813; The Extent of the Atonement, New York, 1819. His Sermons, with Memoir of his Life, were edited by Dr. SPRAGUE, in 2 vols., Albany, 1838. See also COOKE: Recollections of E. D. Griffin, Boston, 1866.

GRINDAL, Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. at St. Bees about 1519; d. at Croyden, July 6, 1583. He was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge, of which Dr. Ridley was master. In 1552 he was appointed chaplain to Ridley, who had become Bishop of London, and prebendary of Westminster. The year following he took refuge on the Continent, spending his exile at Strassburg and Frankfurt. Part of his time was occupied in labors tributary to Foxe's Book of Martyrs. Returning to England, in 1558 he became master of Pembroke Hall, and, in 1560, Bishop of London. In 1570 he was, by Archbishop Parker's influence, raised to the see of York, from which he was transferred, in 1575, to that of Canterbury. Grindal corresponded with the Reformers on the Continent, and was in sympathy with Puritanism (Dean Hook), at least so far as to be unwilling to discourage it by measures in the interests of uniformity in ritual. His bold refusal to put down "prophesyings" brought upon him the wrath of Elizabeth, who at first determined to depose him from his archbishopric, but was satisfied with suspending him. A few months before his death she opened negotiations with him to resign his see. Grindal was a man of courteous and conciliatory spirit. His literary remains, which are unimportant, appeared in Cambridge, 1843, in the Parker Society Series. STRYPE: Life and Acts of Abp. Grindal, 1710, Oxford, 1821; NEAL: Hist. of Puritans, vol. I.; A Brief and True Account of Edm. Grindal, 1710; HOOK: Lives of Abpp. of Canterbury, vol. V.

GROEN VAN PRINSTERER, Guillaume, b. in The Hague, Aug. 21, 1801; d. there May 19, 1876; studied at Leyden; was appointed secretary to the king in 1827, and soon afterwards director of the royal archives; was, in the Dutch Parliament, the leader of the anti-revolutionary party, and opposed with great zeal the separation of State and Church, the emancipation of the school from the Church, etc. He was a Christian statesman, and occupied in Holland a position similar to that of Professor Stahl in Prussia. His idea that the Church ought to be the foundation and informing-power of the State is very apparent in his Handboek der Geschiedenis van het vaderland, Amsterdam, 1852. He also published Archives de la maison d'Orange-Nassau, 1840-55, 13 vols.; Maurice et Barneveldt, Utrecht, 1875.

GROOT, Geert. See BROTHERS OF THE COMMON LIFE.

GROPPER, Johann, b. at Soest, February,

1502; d. in Rome, March, 1559; studied theology and canon law at Cologne, and was appointed, first canon, then archdeacon there. He was a reform friend of the Erasmian type; represented the conciliatory element at the deputations of Hagenau, Worms, and Regensburg, and encouraged the archbishop Hermann von Wied in his plans of reform, as long as these touched only points of doctrine. But when Butzer began to preach in Cologne (1542), and the archbishop seemed inclined to undertake a re-organization of the hierarchical system, Gropper denounced them to the Pope and the emperor; and when Hermann von Wied was deposed, and Adolf von Schaumburg put in his place, Gropper became a decided opponent to ecclesiastical reform in any shape. His principal work is Institutio catholica, 1550.

GROSSETESTE, Robert, called also GREAT-HEAD, Bishop of Lincoln, one of the most independent and distinguished English prelates in the middle ages; b. about 1175; d. at Buckden, Oct. 9, 1253. He was famous as a scholar, and, in the administration of his see, as a reformer of ecclesiastical abuses; and although, during the greater part of his career, a loyal and submissive son of Rome, he broke away in the last period, and not only spoke out boldly against the corruption of the papal court, but refused to obey its commands. He was of humble birth. The first we know of him is as a student of Oxford, from which he passed to the University of Paris. Returning to England, he entered the service of the Bishop of Hereford, at whose death, shortly after, he went to Oxford as a teacher.

The first period of his public life dates from this point. It is the period of scholarly activity, extending over a number of years. He was master of the schools (rector scholarum), or chancellor, and, to quote the chronicler Trivet, was "a man of excellent wisdom, and of most lucid power of teaching," etc. His attainments included an acquaintance of Greek and Hebrew. With the assistance of others he put forth translations of Aristotle, the De Orthodoxa Fide of John of Damascus, and other works. He also wrote original works, such as the De Cessatione Legalium (a book designed for the conversion of the Jews), a collection of theological Dicta, and the French poem, Le Chastel d'Amour. He also enjoyed, according to Roger Bacon, a great reputation for scientific attainments. On the arrival of the Franciscan friars in Oxford (1224), Grosseteste was chosen as their instructor in divinity and homiletics. During the Oxford period he held several preferments, — two prebends in Lincoln, the archdeaconries of Wilts (1214) and Northampton (1221), etc. Ascetic enthusiasm, perhaps the result of a severe attack of fever, induced him to resign them all, except a prebend in Lincoln.

The second period begins with Grosseteste's elevation to the see of Lincoln, in 1235, by the vote of its dean and chapter. His episcopal administration was marked by great zeal in advancing its spiritual interests, and not seldom by the use of arbitrary and high-handed measures. From the first he attacked the corruption, and condemned the incompetency, of the clergy. He instituted a systematic visitation of his diocese, and a careful scrutiny of the religious houses. With the monastic institutions he was especially severe, not only condemning the unclerical amusements and immoral lives of the monks, but endeavoring to do away with the evils of "farming" by endowing parishes, that they might secure pastors who would care for the souls of the people. To this end he used the revenues of the monasteries. Grosseteste, however, was not a foe to religious orders, but only to their abuses. He sought zealously to raise the standard, and increase the efficiency, of the ministry, by refusing to appoint to livings those whose youth, worldliness, or illiteracy made them unfit, and by removing corrupt and incompetent incumbents. Within a short time after his consecration, he deposed seven abbots and four priors. This vigorous administration aroused opposition. The bishop's life was even attempted by poison. Some of the monasteries endeavored to evade his visitation; but he was equal to such emergencies, and, as in the case of Hertford, placed the whole town under interdict, or, as in the case of the abbot of Bardney, deposed him in spite of the sentence of excommunication against himself, pronounced by the Convent of Canterbury (the see being vacant), to which the abbot had appealed.

Grosseteste's hottest conflict of this kind was with the dean and chapter of Lincoln, who denied him the right of visitation. He suspended the dean, excommunicated the proctor, and finally went to Lyons (1245) to secure a papal decision of the case. The bishop displayed an overbearing temper in this affair; and the abbot of Leicester had ground for blaming him, in a letter, for having "a heart of iron, and one lacking pity." He secured a judgment in his favor from the Pope, but, as it would seem, at the expense of his own independence; for he appears as a servile agent of papal designs in the period immediately following. He lent his name to a scheme for laying the English dioceses under tribute (ten thousand marks) to pay off the debts of the see of Canterbury, whose occupant at this time was the unscrupulous Boniface of Savoy, and also declared himself in favor of levying a special tax for the Pope, and, on his return, instituted measures for carrying it out. The former action he afterwards bitterly regretted. He returned to England "thoroughly committed to the extreme papal obedience," etc. (Perry, p. 183). But his mind, in the years that immediately follow, underwent a complete change in its attitude towards the papal claims.

Grosseteste's relation to the State was one of independence. He rebuked ecclesiastics for holding civil offices, and asserted that to St. Peter belonged both swords, and that a bishop did not in any sense derive his authority from the civil power. He not only dared to refuse to execute the royal commands in his diocese, as the one regarding the legitimization of children, but fearlessly told the king the plainest truths, and on more than one occasion refused to install his appointees in office, threatening even to excommunicate the royal offender if he did not withdraw. He was, in fact, a formidable antagonist for the king to grapple with.

The last period in the bishop's life dates from about 1248, and is marked by opposition to Rome as bold and defiant as his former vassalage had been loyal and unquestioning. Deeply resenting the corruption of the papal tax-agents and the abuse of clerical exemptions, he started on another visit to the Pope to Lyons in 1250. Here his eyes were fully opened to the corruption of the papal court. With characteristic intrepidity he delivered a sermon in which he arraigned "the Roman pontiff and his court for being the fountain and origin of all the evils of the Church, not only in that it does not put them away, but that by its dispensations, provisions, etc., appoints men who are not pastors but destroyers of their flocks." He urged that the work of a pastor did not consist merely in "celebrating the mass, but in teaching the living truth." Returning to his diocese, he assailed the Italian ecclesiastics that were fleecing English parishes. He found by computation that their revenues amounted to seventy thousand marks,—more than three times those of the king. But the present temper of Grosseteste was signally shown in his absolute refusal to induct Frederick di Lavagna into a stall at Lincoln, to which the Pope, his uncle, had appointed him. In a very plain letter the bishop tells the pontiff that it is his duty to make appointments for the edification, and not for the destruction, of the Church. Matthew Paris reports that the Pope was in high dudgeon on receiving this letter, and was only pacified by the cardinals, who reminded him of the fearless courage, the power, and popularity of the English prelate.

Like Luther, previous to the diet of Worms, so Grosseteste had trusted in the Pope, and hoped for relief from Rome against the ecclesiastical corruption of England. Once undeceived, he was drifting rapidly away from all veneration for the pontiff, when death overtook him. In a conversation on his death-bed with the scholarly cleric and physician, John de St. Giles, he gave a definition of heresy, and asked whether the Pope did not fulfil it. To those around him he lamented the doleful condition of the Church. He died uttering protests against the avarice, simony, lust, and worldliness of the papal court. "He was the open rebuker of both the Pope and the king, censor of prelates, corrector of monks, instructor of clerks, an unwearied examiner of the books of Scripture, a crusher and despiser of the Romans," so says the chronicler Matthew Paris. He was buried in great pomp at Lincoln; the Archbishop of Canterbury and several bishops being present at the funeral. This seems to disprove the statement that the Pope had excommunicated him. Miracles were reported to be performed at his grave; but in vain did prelates and King Edward I. (1307) apply for Grosseteste's canonization. The popular veneration was shown in the legend that the bishop appeared to the Pope on the night of his death, with the words, "Aryse, wretch, and come to thy dome."

Grosseteste has been called a "harbinger of the Reformation." He certainly was a zealous reformer of ecclesiastical abuses in the diocese of Lincoln, and boldly protested against the corruptions of the papal court. In his large acquaintance with and constant appeal to the Scriptures he was in advance of his age. He was the first link in the chain of the Reformation in this sense, that Wiclif appealed to him, and quotes his protest against Rome, as, later, Luther quoted Hus, and Hus learned from Wiclif. In his impetuous and fearless temper he resembles Luther. Not only Wiclif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 384 sqq.).

GROTIUS, Hugo (Huig van Groot), a celebrated Dutch statesman, lawyer, and theologian; was b. at Delft, April 10, 1583; and d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1645. His career was intimately associated, and largely sympathized, with the fortunes of the Arminians. His contributions to exegetical and apologetic literature, to systematic theology and canon law, also give him an important place in the history of theological thought. His family was of noble extraction; his father a lawyer, who had occupied the positions of burgomaster and curator at the University of Leyden. Seldom has there been a more striking exhibition of precocity than that of Hugo. At nine he was making Latin verses; at sixteen he had edited Marcianus Capella; and at twenty-three was advocate-general of Holland. Joseph Scaliger was one of his professors. John of Barneveld early recognized his talents, and took him on a mission to France. Grotius devoted himself specially to the study of the law, but his tastes ran rather in the direction of literature. His earliest works, besides several editions of Latin authors, were three dramas (Christ Suffering, the Story of Joseph, and Adam Exiled), and a historical work on the Batavian republic (De Antiquitate Rep., Batavæ, 1610). But he soon became involved in the theological controversies which agitated Holland at that time. He espoused the cause of the Arminians. After the victory of the Gomarists (Calvinists), at the synod of Dort, he was condemned (1619) to perpetual imprisonment at Löwestein. During this imprisonment he composed several of his works. An ingenious artifice of his wife effected his escape. He concealed himself in a chest which had been frequently used to carry books and clothing to and from his cell. He was taken thus to the house of a friend, and escaped in the disguise of a mason to France. Louis XIII. granted him a pension of three thousand livres, and De Thou and others treated him kindly. The dislike of Richelieu obliged him to quit France, but the favor of Christina gave him a distinguished reception in Sweden. She sent him as ambassador to France, where he remained for ten years. He was recalled at his own request, intending to spend his remaining years in his native land. The vessel that bore him was driven out of its course by a storm. He became sick, got as far as Rostock on his journey, and there died, repeating the prayer,

"God be merciful to me a sinner." His body lies buried at Delft. — This is not the proper place to speak of the eminent services of Grotius as an expounder of the laws of nature and nations. He concerns us only as a theologian. His great exegetical work (Annotations upon the Old and New Testament) was for a considerable time unused, except by the Arminians. It became popular, however, on account of the author's manifest freedom from dogmatic prepossessions and his effort to get at the plain philological and historical sense. His apologetic work (De Veritate Rel. Christianæ) was projected in prison, but first published 1627. It was designed for seamen who came in contact with Mohammedans and heathens. It has been very popular down to a recent date, and was translated into French, English [Patrick; also by Clarke, reprinted, London, 1860], Chinese, Malay, Arabic (Pococke), and many other languages, as the best thing in its line. Grotius was an Arminian, but disclaimed Pelagianism, and, in his Defense of the Catholic Faith concerning the Satisfaction of Christ against Socinus (1617), denied any leanings toward Socinianism. Departing from the strict Anselmic theory, he substituted, in place of a real satisfaction on the part of Christ, a divine acquittal for Christ's sake. In Christ's death, which satisfied God's majesty, and exhibited his detestation of sin, he saw a terrible example of punishment designed to deter men from sin.

GROVES and TREES, Sacred. In the Hebrew Old Testament there is no mention of sacred groves, for the word so translated in the authorized version means properly an image to Asherah (see ASHERAH); but sacred trees are repeatedly mentioned. It will be only necessary to refer to the oak (A. V. "plain") at Moreh (Gen. xii. 6), at Mamre (xviii. 1), at Shechem, under which Jacob hid the "strange gods" of his family (xxxv. 4), at Bethel, under which Deborah was buried, and to the tree at Beersheba, which Abraham planted (xxi. 33), and where he and Isaac (xxvi. 25) and Jacob (xli. 1) worshipped, in order to prove that from patriarchal times certain trees were regarded as holy, so that it was appropriate to worship under them; while to be buried beneath their spreading boughs was to lie in consecrated ground. The same phenomenon is observable in the later Israelitish history. Joshua set up a memorial-stone under the oak at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26). The angel of the Lord appeared to Gideon under the oak at Ophrah (Judg. vi. 11), who built an altar there. Saul, under an oak (1 Sam. xiv. 2) and a tamarisk (xxii. 6), like Deborah under a palm-tree (Judg. iv. 5), held court. The inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead buried the ashes of Saul and his sons under the tamarisk-tree at Jabesh (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). Worship under trees was commonly idolatrous (Deut. xii. 2; 1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings xvi. 4; 2 Chron. xxviii. 4; Isa. lvii. 4; Jer. ii. 20).

The Hebrews shared their veneration for trees with other Semitic races. Among them, however, trees were sacred to female divinities only, because the latter were the agents in transmitting to the earth the reproductive power of the male divinities; and the moon, as the seat of these female divinities, was considered as a star which dispensed dew, and was therefore the great help to the plant-world. See WOLF BAUDISSLIN: Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, Leipzig, 1876-79, 3 pts., II., 143 sqq., and his art. Haine, in Herzog, 2d ed., vol. 5, pp. 550-552.

GRUNDTVIG, Nicolai Frederik Severin, b. at Udby, a village in the Island of Sealand, Sept. 8, 1783; d. in Copenhagen, Sept. 2, 1872; studied theology in the university of Copenhagen, and was tutor in a private family in the Island of Langeland 1805-08, teacher of history in a school in Copenhagen 1808-10, vicar to his father at Udby 1810-13, and again teacher in Copenhagen 1813-21. He lived like a monk during those years of his youth and early manhood. For twenty years he never slept in a bed, and he slept only two hours in the night. He was not monkish, though: on the contrary, practical influence on real life was one of the deepest cravings of his nature. His powers as a poet and historian were the earliest to develop. From 1809 (Northern Mythology, and the grand drama, Fall of Heathenism in the North) to 1822 (the translations of Saxo Grammaticus, Snorre Sturleson, and Beowulf's Drapa) he published a series of poetical and historical works, most of them referring to the heroic age of Scandinavian history, and all of them pregnant with a peculiarly stirring life. Meanwhile the other side of his nature, his religious genius, was not altogether without manifestation. His occasional sermons attracted great attention; and his View of the World's Chronicle (1812, in one volume, 1817, in three) ran out in a vehement denunciation of the frivolity with which the age had eliminated Christianity of its life.

In 1821 Grundtvig was appointed pastor in Præstoe (a small town in Sealand), and in the next year he was called to the chaplaincy at the Church of our Saviour in Copenhagen. There he soon gathered a circle of friends and pupils around his pulpit; and day by day his position in the Danish Church became more and more strongly marked. In 1825 H. N. Clausen, professor in the university, and the noble and learned representative of the reigning rationalism, published his Catholicism and Protestantism; and Grundtvig answered with Kirkens Gjenmæle, a violent protest, an outburst of glowing indignation, a kind of volcanic eruption. Not the Scriptures, he declared, still less the theological expositions of them, form the foundation of Christianity, but the Church itself, such as it was founded by Christ and his apostles, and such as it has lived on, since that time, through its martyrs, confessors, and witnesses. His peculiar doctrines of baptism as the true foundation of the Church, of the Apostles' Creed as the true conditions of salvation, of the "living word" as the true vehicle of the Holy Spirit, he set forth in the most uncompromising opposition to what rationalism had to say about the axioms of reason, philosophical criticism, and grammatico-historical exegesis. The controversy occasioned a civil suit; and Grundtvig was sentenced to pay a fine, and to publish nothing without permission of the royal censor. He was finally suspended; but from that day there was in the Danish Church a party called "Grundtvigians," and a platform called "Grundtvigianism."

From 1826 to 1839 Grundtvig lived in literary retirement in Copenhagen. He visited England, and gave by his words and his writings a powerful impulse to the Anglo-Saxon study there; edited a theological monthly, in which his ideas found their proper exposition and suitable application; published True Christianity, his principal theological work, and an ornament to modern apologetics; the Sunday-Book, a collection of sermons which has found a larger circulation in Scandinavia than any other book of the kind; the Hymn-Book, a collection of hymns, partly original, partly translated, which gave to song in the Danish churches a new and very original character. Meanwhile his influence spread far beyond the capital, throughout the whole kingdom, and even to the neighboring countries, especially Norway, everywhere causing a spiritual revival, in which religion and patriotism, Christianity and nationality, are most happily blended together. In 1839 he was made pastor of the Varton in Copenhagen; and there he remained till his death, the head of a strong and well-organized party, which, especially in 1848, made itself felt in the church, in the school, and in politics, always bringing life and progress and reform with it. See DENMARK. In 1853 he was made a bishop. He was three times married, and over seventy years old when he baptized his youngest son.

GRYNÆUS is the name of a Suabian family which settled at Basel, and during two centuries produced several celebrated theologians there. — Simon Grynæus, b. at Vehrigen, 1493; d. at Basel, Aug. 1, 1541; was educated in the school of Pforzheim; studied theology, first in Vienna, afterwards at Wittenberg; was professor of Greek at Heidelberg (1524-29), and was called to Basel when Erasmus left that city on account of the introduction there of the Reformation. In 1531 he was made professor of theology; in 1534 he established the Reformation in Wurtemberg; in 1540 he partook in the disputation of Worms. His letters and a list of his works were published by W. Th. Streuber, Basel, 1847. — Johann Jacob Grynæus, b. at Bern, Oct. 1, 1540; d. at Basel, Aug. 13, 1617; studied at Basel and Tübingen, and was appointed preacher at Röteln 1565, professor of the Old Testament at Basel 1575, at Heidelberg 1584, and professor of the New Testament at Basel 1586. Some of his letters were published by Scultetus 1612, others by Apinus 1720. A life of him, partly an autobiography, and containing a list of his numerous writings, appeared at Basel 1618.

GUALBERT, Giovanni, founded in the middle of the eleventh century the Cenobite order of Vallombrosa (vallis umbrosa), in the Apennines, near Florence, in the diocese of Fiesole. He was the first to introduce lay-brethren (fratres conversi) in the monasteries, in order that the religious brethren (properly speaking, the patres) might be able to devote themselves entirely to contemplation and prayer. He died 1093, and was canonized by Celestine III. 1193. His life is found in Act. Sanct. O. B., II.

GUDULE, St., popularly called Goule or Er-goule, was a daughter of Duke Thierry of Lorraine and St. Amalberge; devoted her life to the severest ascetic practices; d. Jan. 8, 712, and was soon after canonized on account of the miracles wrought at her tomb. She is the patroness of Brussels; and the cathedral of that city is dedicated to her. See Act. Sanct., Jan. 8.

QUELF and Ghibelline are the Italianized forms of the German Welf (the ducal house of Saxony) and Waiblingen (the native castle of the Hohenstaufens). The German names were first used, it is said, as battle-cries at Weinsberg (1140), and then became party designations, — on the one side, the princes with their aspirations of independence; on the other, the emperor with his demands of authority. Transferred to Italy, the names were applied to the adherents of the emperor (the Ghibellines) and the adherents of the Pope (the Guelfs): though many other and very different elements might be introduced into the platform; as, for instance, when two city-republics, Pisa and Genoa, Ferrara and Mantua, etc., vied with each other, and immediately became Guelf and Ghibelline; or even when the rivalry existed only between two families, as the Montecchi and Capuletti in Verona, the Lambertazj and Geremci in Bologna, etc.

QUÉNÉE, Antoine, b. at Étampes, Nov. 23, 1717; d. at Fontainebleau, Nov. 27, 1803; was successively professor of rhetoric, canon of Amiens, and tutor to the children of the Count of Artois; travelled much in Italy, Germany, and England; translated several books from English, and wrote, against Voltaire's attack on the Old Testament, Lettres de quelques Juifs, etc. (Paris, 1769, 4 vols.; republished six times in the lifetime of the editor, last edition, Paris, 1857; translated into English by Lefaun, Dublin, 1777), the only book of any account which the Roman-Catholic Church produced against the encyclopedists.

QUERICKE, Heinrich Ernst Ferdinand, b. at Wettin, Feb. 25, 1803; d. at Halle, Feb. 4, 1878; studied theology at Halle; was appointed professor there 1829, and wrote a biography of Francke 1827, a handbook of church history 1833 (9th ed., 1866; translated into English by W. G. T. Shedd, New York, 1857-63, 2 vols.), an Allg. christl. Symbolik 1839, etc. He was a very strict Lutheran, and opposed the exertions of the Prussian Government to effect a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, and founded, together with Rudelbach, the Zeitschrift f. luth. Theolog. und Kirche, 1840.

QUIBERT OF NOGENT, b. at Clermont, 1053; d. at Nogent, 1124; entered in 1064 the Benedictine monastery of Flay or St. Germer, where he came under the influence of Anselm, at that time prior of Bec, and a frequent visitor in Flay, and was in 1104 made abbot of Nogent-sous-Coucy, in the diocese of Laon. He was a man of great learning, and exercised considerable influence on the circle to which he belonged; but he knew it too well himself, and the impression which his writings make is not always so very agreeable, on account of his vanity and conceit. His works were edited by D'Achery (Paris, 1651), and reprinted in Migne (Patrol. Latin, 156 and 184). The most interesting of his works are: 1. De pignoribus sanctorum, occasioned by the exhibition, in the monastery of St. Medard, near Soissons, of one of Christ's teeth, and criticising with great frankness the worship of saints and relics which was the rage of the time; 2. Historia Hierosolymitana, a history of the first crusade, written about 1108, and a rich source of knowledge; 3. De vita sua sive Monachiorum Libri III., of which the first book contains an autobiography in imitation of Augustine's Confessiones, the second the history of the monastery of Nogent, and the third the history of the diocese of Laon. The two last works have been translated into French, in Guizot: Coll. de Memoires, Paris, 1825.

WAGENMANN.

QUIBERT OF PARMA was by the Empress Agnes made chancellor of the kingdom of Italy, and was thus by the very nature of his office placed in opposition to Hildebrand. It was due to him that Nicholas II., in his famous decree concerning papal elections, admitted the influence of the king of Germany; and when Alexander II. was elected Pope, without the consent of Henry IV. or his mother, the Empress Agnes, Guibert caused Bishop Cadalus of Parma to be elected antipope, under the name of Honorius II. The measure proved a complete failure; but, by the exertions of Agnes, Guibert was reconciled to Hildebrand, and in 1073 he was made Archbishop of Ravenna. His opposition, however, to Hildebrand's policy, was not merely the result of his office as chancellor. He hated that manner in which Gregory VII. used the monks, the Patarini, and the mass of the people, to enforce his authority over the clergy; and, as Archbishop of Ravenna, he resisted this policy in every way possible. In 1075 he was suspended, but he did not yield. In the contest between Henry IV. and Gregory VII. he sided with the former; and in 1080 he was elected antipope at Brixen by thirty bishops, and assumed the name of Clement III. In 1084 he crowned Henry Emperor in Rome. But, though Henry never abandoned him, he was never able to vindicate himself against the fury of the Hildebrand party. Not only Gregory VII., but also Victor III., Urban II., and Paschalis II., cursed and excommunicated him. He died at Ravenna, 1100; and, after the death of Henry IV., Paschalis II. ordered his bones to be dug up, and thrown into the water. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pontif. Roman., pp. 443-447.

ALBRECHT VOGEL.

GUIDO OF AREZZO, monk in the monastery of Pomposa, in the diocese of Ferrara; distinguished himself as a music-teacher, and made a number of improvements in the method which he saw introduced, not only in Italy, but also in France and Germany. His activity falls between 1024 and 1037, but the dates of his birth and death are unknown. His inventions he has described in his Micrologus de Disciplina Artis Musicae, and Argumentum novi Cantus.

GUIDO DE BRES, b. at Mons, 1540; d. at Valenciennes, 1567; was educated in the Roman Church, but converted by the reading of the Scriptures. Expelled from his native city, he went to London, where a Walloon congregation had been formed in the reign of Edward VI., and where he prepared himself for the office of a preacher. In 1563 he returned to Flanders, labored there as an itinerant preacher, and founded the first evangelical congregation at Lille. But in 1566 this congregation was dispersed by armed force, and Guido was again compelled to flee. He repaired to Geneva, became an ardent disciple of Calvin, returned once more to Flanders, formed congregations at Tournay, Lille, and Valenciennes, wrote the Belgic Confession (which article see), but was taken prisoner at the capture of Valenciennes, in 1567, and hanged. His life and some of his letters are found in Histoire des Martyrs, Geneva, 1617.

GUILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM. See GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM.

GUILDS, voluntary associations for the promotion of religious and moral objects within the pale of the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, are of recent origin. The prototypes of the modern institution were the guilds of the middle ages, the last vestiges of which in England were swept away by the Reformation. These were merchant, craft, and religious guilds; and their object was to advance the temporal and eternal welfare of their members by mutual protection, support, and prayer. After a long interval, the name was revived, and given to a new organization in 1851, — the Guild of St. Alban of Manchester. The ends this league proposed to itself were wholly religious, and the membership composed of communicants in the Church of England. Previously, in 1844, the Brotherhood of the Holy Trinity was organized at Oxford, which is sometimes, but wrongly, represented as the first guild. In 1861 two other guilds were organized, — the Society of the Love of Jesus, Plymouth, and the Sisterhood of St. Peter, Kilburn. Since that time, the idea and the name have become very popular; and the number of organizations has largely increased, not only in England and her colonies, but also in the Episcopal Church of the United States. In 1873 a union of the guilds of Great Britain was effected under the title of the Church Guilds' Union, which holds an annual meeting.

The primary object of the guilds is to carry on more effectually parish-work, by inducing each communicant to exercise his own natural talents, and by pointing out the work proper for each to do. The special objects vary, and are such as the visitation of the sick, inducing persons to be confirmed, caring for the poor, providing healthy amusements, etc. They are essentially lay societies, and designed to "impart dignity to the layman's work now wanting to it." They assist the parish priest; but some of the guildsmen would go so far as to exclude the parish clergyman from the offices of the society. The guilds may direct their energies to the general interests of the parish. But they are also organized for special objects; as the medical Guild of St. Luke, the missionary Guild of St. Savior, the Church and Stage Guild, All Souls' Guild for the reform of burial, etc. For a good account of the history and objects of guilds, see Guild Papers, contributed by Officers of Various Church Guilds, London.

GUILLOU, Marie Nicolas Sylvestre, b. in Paris, Jan. 1, 1760; d. at Montfermeil, Oct. 16, 1847; was almoner and librarian to the Princess Lamballe, but fled from Paris, after her execution in 1792, and lived for several years in the provinces under an assumed name (Pastel), practising medicine. Having returned to Paris in 1798, he served Napoleon, the Bourbons, and the Orleanists successively, and with equal ease; accompanied Cardinal Fesch to Rome, and was made professor of rhetoric in the Lycée Bonaparte; was almoner to the Princess of Orleans; and became canon of St. Denis, Bishop of Morocco (in partibus infidelium), Dean of the Sorbonne, etc. He was a very prolific writer, and some of his works (Collection des brefs du Pape Pie VI., Paris, 1798; Bibliothèque choisie des Pères grecs et latins, Paris, 1822, 26 vols.; a translation of Cyprian with notes, Paris, 1837, 2 vols., etc.) are valuable.

GUISE, The House of, formed a younger branch of the house of Lorraine, and was founded in the beginning of the sixteenth century by Claude, the second son of René II. In 1508 he received all the French possessions of the family, — Guise, Elbœuf, Aumale, Mayenne, Joinville, etc., — the archbishoprics of Rheims, the bishopric of Metz, etc., which were family benefices; and in 1527 he was made Duke of Guise, and governor of Champagne and Bourgoyne. He died in 1550; but in the next two generations his sons (Duke Francis of Guise, and Cardinal Charles of Lorraine) and his grandsons (Duke Henry of Guise, and Cardinal Louis of Lorraine) played the most prominent part in the history of France as leaders of the Roman-Catholic party, heads of the League, supporters of the Jesuit movement, and cruel suppressors of the Huguenots.

Duke Francis of Guise, b. Feb. 17, 1519; d. Feb. 24, 1563; was a valiant soldier. In 1552 he stopped Charles V. at Metz; in 1558 he took Calais from the English. When Francis II., who had married his niece, Mary, Queen of Scots, ascended the French throne in 1559, the whole military command of the realm was intrusted to him, just as the whole civil administration was put into the hands of his brother, Cardinal Charles of Lorraine. — Charles, b. Feb. 17, 1524; d. Dec. 26, 1574; was made Archbishop of Rheims when he was fourteen years old, and cardinal when he was twenty-three. He held ten bishoprics, besides a great number of abbey, and had an annual income of three hundred thousand crowns at a time when the total revenue of France was not more than five or six millions. He was supercilious and depraved, but cunning and eloquent. He began life as a pupil of the Renaissance and a friend of ecclesiastical reform; but, after his meeting with Cardinal Granvelle, he became a partisan of Philip II., and a champion of the Roman Church. A sudden turn took place in his fortunes and in those of his family by the unexpected death of Francis II. in 1560. He retired to Rheims, Francis to Guise; and the royal princes, the Bourbons, Condés, etc., returned to power. On the basis, however, of the defence of Romanism against Protestantism, Francis succeeded in forming an alliance at the court, and he was on his way to Paris when the massacre at Vossy occurred (1562),—the slaughter of a whole Protestant congregation, assembled at worship, by his retinue. The Huguenots arose, and the civil war began. Francis was placed at the head of the Roman-Catholic army, defeated the Huguenots at Dreux, and besieged their stronghold, Orléans, where he was shot dead by Poltrot de Méré. At the re-opening of the Council of Trent in 1560, the cardinal attempted to gather the whole opposition around himself, but he utterly failed; and he afterwards became very zealous for the introduction in France of the canons of the council. On his return, he was very coldly received by the court; but the particular friendship which Philip II. showed him, the brilliant military successes of his nephew, Duke Henry of Guise, and the lavish support he gave to literature and art, continued to give him a certain influence. He left a considerable debt when he died.

Duke Henry of Guise, b. Dec. 31, 1550; d. Dec. 23, 1588; a son of Duke Francis; inherited his father's valor and military ability, but exceeded him far in political ambition, and hatred to the Huguenots. If not the founder, he was at all events the head, of the League from its very beginning in 1576. He formed the closest alliances with Philip II. (who gave him an annual pension of two hundred thousand francs) and with the Pope, who, at his instance, excommunicated Henry of Navarre. After the death of the Duke of Anjou, in 1584, he actually aspired to the throne of France; and both the Pope and Philip II. considered it necessary to support him, if France should not become Calvinistic. But he seems to have lacked courage. He procrastinated; and when the king, Henry III., thoroughly understood the drift of affairs, he had him assassinated at Blois by his guardsmen, him and his brother, Cardinal Louis of Lorraine.—Louis, b. July 6, 1555; d. Dec. 23, 1588; was a wit, and played only a secondary rôle.

LIT.—Duke Francis left a kind of diary, which is found in MICHAUD ET PONJAULOT: Nouvelle Collection de Mémoires, Paris, 1839. The best account of the destinies of this famous family is Réné de Bouillie, Histoire des Ducs de Guise, Paris, 1853, 4 vols.

GUIZOT, François Pierre Guillaume, b. at Nîmes, Oct. 4, 1787; d. at Val-Richer, Sept. 12, 1874; descended from a family of Huguenot pastors; was educated at Geneva, and studied law, history, and philosophy in Paris. The first period of his life (1812–30) was principally literary. He was during that time alternately professor of history at the Sorbonne, secretary-general in the department of the interior, journalist, etc., and wrote his brilliant historical works, of which the History of Civilization in Europe (1828), and History of Civilization in France (1830, 5 vols., unfinished), are of great interest to the church historian. The second period (1830–48) was principally political. He was minister of public instruction 1832–36, and prime-minister 1840–48. As minister of public instruction he thoroughly reformed the educational system of France from top to bottom; and many improvements were introduced, especially in the primary schools and in the higher gymnasiums. In the third period, from 1848 till his death, religion came more and more to the foreground in his works. In 1852 he was chosen president of the consistory, and in his government of the Reformed Church he applied the same principle of "resistance" as he had formerly applied in the government of the State. He was orthodox, and clung tenaciously to the Calvinistic system of the sixteenth century; but just thereby he made the difference between the various branches of the Reformed Church in France more apparent and decisive. His principal religious works are, L'Église et la Société chrétienne (1861), and Méditations sur l'essence de la religion chrétienne (1864), Eng. trans., New York, 1865: of a more popular character Les Vies de quatre grands chrétiens français. I. St. Louis, II. Calvin (1868, all published), Eng. trans., St. Louis and Calvin, London, 1868. In 1826 he founded the Société Biblique, in 1833 the Société d'instruction primaire protestante, and in 1857 the Société d'histoire du protestantisme français. See M. Guizot in Private Life, by his daughter, Madame DE WITT, London and Boston, 1880.

GUNDULPH. Bishop Gerhard of Cambrai and Arras discovered in 1025 a heretical sect in his diocese, whose members professed to have received their peculiar tenets from one Gundulph, an Italian by birth. As the bishop was very zealous for the purity of the faith, he had the heretics seized, and placed before a synod assembled in the Church of Mary at Arras. The doctrines, however, which the accused were willing to recognize as theirs, turned out to be perfectly innocent; and the whole affair threatened to become a mere triviality, when the bishop arose, and proved that he knew more about the sect than the sect itself, ascribing to it a multitude of hideous and dangerous heresies. As the excitement of the assembly reached a very high pitch under the bishop's speech, the accused deemed it most advisable to submit to every thing, recant every thing, and subscribe to every thing: so they did; and the acts of this towering stupidity are still extant (D'Achery, Spicil., I.; Mansi, Concil. XIX.). But outside of those acts nothing is known either of Gundulph, or his doctrines, or his followers.

GUNPOWDER PLOT, a conspiracy (1604–05) of some Roman Catholics for blowing up Parliament House with gunpowder while Parliament was in session, and killing the king, and thus securing advantages for their Church. The Roman Catholics, who had been held down under Elizabeth, expected concessions from James I., but were disappointed. Robert Catesby and Guy Fawkes were the leading conspirators. A building was rented next to Parliament House in 1604, and work begun in boring through the walls, which were nine feet thick, when an opportunity was afforded them of renting the cellar of the Parliament House itself. The conspirators deposited thirty-six kegs of powder there, covering them with stones and fagots. The plot was to be consummated the 5th of November, 1605, the opening day of Parliament. Lord Monteagle, a Roman-Catholic member of the House of Lords, was apprised of the danger by letter, and immediately communicated the matter to the king. The powder was discovered, and Fawkes taken in the cellar. Severe tortures were employed to draw from him confessions implicating others, but without avail. With three others he was put to death Jan. 31, 1606. The day previous four had suffered for the same crime.

The discovery of this plot was very disastrous to the cause of the Roman Catholics in England. The 5th of November was ordered to be kept as a national holiday by an act which was not repealed for two hundred years. One of the popular festivities of the day has been to dress up a figure in rags, parade the streets, singing rhymes, and at night burning it. See the Histories of England.

GÜNTHER, Anton, b. at Lindenau, in Bohemia, Nov. 17, 1783; d. at Vienna, Feb. 24, 1863; studied first law, then theology; was ordained priest in 1820, and lived mostly in Vienna, as teacher of philosophy. His works, of which the principal are Vorschule zur speculativen Theologie (1828), Süd- und Nord-lichter (1832), Thomas a Scrupulis (1835), Die Juste-Milieus (1837), do not present a finished philosophical system, but are only an attack on the reigning monism, and an attempt at reconciling the Roman-Catholic dogma and modern science. They attracted much attention, however, and found, like those of Hermes, many ardent students; but in 1857 they were put on the Index. See P. KNOODT: Anton Günther, Wien, 1881, 2 vols.; J. FLEGEL: A. Günthers Dualismus von Geist u. Natur, Breslau, 1882, pp. 42.

GURNALL, William, author of a quaint and popular book, The Christian in Complete Armour; b. at Lynn, 1616; d. at Lavenham, October, 1679. He graduated at Cambridge; in 1644 became rector of Lavenham, and at the Restoration signed the Act of Uniformity. The Christian in Complete Armour, or a Treatise on the Saints' War with the Devil, etc., is a series of sermons on Eph. vi. 6-20, abounding in epigrammatic sayings, and displaying great skill in applying Scripture. It was published in three volumes in 1655, sixth edition, 1679, and many times since; new edition, London, 1865, in two volumes, with Introduction by Bishop Ryle.

GURNEY, Joseph John, an eminent philanthropist, and minister of the Society of Friends; b. at Earlham Hall, near Norwich, Aug. 2, 1788; d. Jan. 4, 1847. He attended lectures for a while at Oxford, and was recognized in 1818 as a minister by the Friends. The three years between 1837 and 1840 he spent in the United States and the West Indies, preaching. He was a man of rare piety and simplicity of character, and always foremost in enterprises of benevolence and humanity, using his large wealth with a liberal hand. He aided his sister, Mrs. Fry, in her measures for prison-reform, and was the associate with Clarkson, Wilberforce, and his brother-in-law, T. Fowell Buxton, in their efforts for the abolition of the slave-trade. The latter cause lay nearest to his heart. He was also a prominent advocate of total abstinence, having signed the pledge at Ipswich, April 8, 1843. His temperance tract, Water is Best, has been widely circulated.

Mr. Gurney issued quite a number of tracts and pamphlets, with some larger works. Of these the principal are, Essays on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Practical Operations of Christianity, Lond., 1827, trans. into Spanish and German; History, Authority, and Use of the Sabbath, Lond., 1831; Puseyism traced to its Root, 1845. These works passed through a number of editions. See Memoirs of J. J. Gurney, by BRAITHWAITE (Norwich and Phila., 1854, 2 vols., 8d ed., 1855) and HODGSON (Phila., 1856).

GURY, Joseph Pierre, b. Jan. 23, 1801; d. April 18, 1866; entered the Society of Jesus in 1824; taught moral theology in various schools of the Jesuits; and wrote Compendium theologiae moralis and Casus Conscientiæ, which, as specimens of the morals taught by the Jesuits, procured for their author an unenviable notoriety. See LINN: Das Handbuch Gury's und die christliche Ethik, Freiberg, 1869.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS. See THIRTY-YEARS' WAR.

GUSTAVUS-ADOLPHUS-ASSOCIATION. The idea of this association was first conceived by Dr. Grossmann of Leipzig in 1832, when the second centennial of the death of the great Protestant hero was celebrated at Lützen, Nov. 6. Not simply a monument of brass or stone should be raised in his honor, but a monument of living men, doing the same work as he had done,—aiding and supporting Protestant families and congregations whenever aid and support were needed. An association was formed; and Oct. 4, 1834, its statutes were confirmed by the Saxon king. In the beginning the success was very slender. Though 10,000 thalers were sent from Sweden, the total capital of the association in 1841 was only 12,850 thalers. But in the same year Legrand, pastor of Basel, and Karl Zimmermann, court-preacher at Darmstadt, made most effective appeals to the public, setting forth the religious privations, chicaneries, and dangers to which evangelical families and congregations are exposed when living in the midst of a Roman-Catholic population. Branch societies were formed in various places in Germany, as also in foreign countries, and were brought in connection with the mother association; and at the general assembly in Stuttgart, 1845, the accounts of the association showed an income of 42,000 thalers for the last year. Aid had been given to 62 congregations. In several countries, as, for instance, in Bavaria, the association met with strong opposition from the Roman-Catholic government; and during the revolutionary years of 1848 and 1849 the interest slackened,—the revenue sank down to 21,000 thalers. But in 1850 matters began to improve, and since that time progress has been made every year. The association, comprising 43 minor associations, with 1,160 branch societies, 8 students' and 371 women's associations, owns now a capital of 336,401 marks. Since its foundation it has distributed 14,183,798 marks, and has built 1,068 churches, 639 schoolhouses, 42 cemeteries, and 358 parsonages. See K. ZIMMERMANN: Geschichte des Gustav Adolf Vereins, Darmstadt, 1877; W. PRESSEL: Bausteine zur Geschichte d. G. A. Vereins, 1878, 2 vols., and Der G. A. Vereins und das Volk Israel, Tübing., 1879. GUTHLAC, St., presbyter, and hermit of Crowland; b. 674; d. 714. The child of nobles, he early showed martial prowess, and attacked, at the head of his band, the hereditary British foe; but, in his twenty-fourth year suddenly experiencing a change of heart, he gave up his wild life, repaired to a monastery, and then, full of enthusiasm for a solitary life, crossed over to Crowland, a desolate island off the extreme south coast of Lincolnshire, and there lived as a hermit. But his fame for piety attracted many admirers, and the hermit became a teacher of righteousness, while "men of divers conditions, nobles, bishops, abbots, poor, rich, from Mercia, and all Britain," made up his congregation. He was ordained a priest by Hedda, Bishop of Lichfield. At first in his solitude he was plagued by carnal temptations, and tormented by visions; but he resisted vigorously, and found in the cultivation of the soil, and in the giving of spiritual counsel, abundant distraction. One day he made this beautiful remark to a visitor, "Who hath led his life after God's will, the wild beasts and wild birds have become more intimate with him, and the man who will pass his life apart from worldly men, to him the angels approach nearer." On the site of his cell and oratory Ethelbald erected a monastery. See article in SMITH and WACE, Dict. Chr. Biog., vol. ii. pp. 823-826.

GUTHRIE, Thomas, D.D., Scottish preacher and editor; son of David Guthrie; b. at Brechin, July 12, 1803; d. at St. Leonard's-on-the-Sea, Feb. 23, 1873. He was educated first at the schools of his native place, then at the University of Edinburgh, which he attended from 1815 to 1826; studied medicine in Paris in 1827; and conducted a bank agency in Brechin from 1828 to 1830. He was licensed to preach in 1825; ordained minister of the parish of Arbirlot on May 13, 1830; translated to collegiate charge of old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, Sept. 16, 1837; and appointed minister of the new parish of St. John's, in the same city, Nov. 19, 1840. At the disruption he joined the Free Church, and became minister of the Church of Free St. John's, which charge he held until disabled by illness in 1864, when he became pastor emeritus. After this he became editor of the Sunday Magazine, in the pages of which most of his later works appeared. He obtained the degree of D.D. from the University of Edinburgh in 1849; and was moderator of the Free Church of Scotland in 1862.

He was greatly distinguished as a preacher, though his peculiarities were not those which have usually been associated with the Scottish pulpit. Discovering, through his intercourse with the members of his Bible-class at Arbirlot, how much an illustration did to assist the understandings and memories of his hearers, he cultivated the pictorial and illustrative in his discourses; and by the charm of his figures, the simplicity of his style, and the dramatic power of his manner, he rose to the front rank of pulpit orators. He wrote his sermons, and committed them to memory so fully, that he could give with ease that which he had prepared with elaboration. His delivery was at first slow and measured; and, though he waxed warmer as he proceeded, he never lost his self-possession. He had nothing of the whirlwind of Chalmers, and rarely became impassioned; but he was always dramatic. Occasionally the drapery of his illustration rather overlaid the truth which he desired to illustrate; but generally "the story, like the feathers of an arrow, made it strike, and, like the barb, made it stick."

Guthrie was eminent also as a philanthropist. His pastorate of St. John's took him down into the dens of the Edinburgh Cowgate, and stirred him up to do his utmost for the elevation of the depraved. Thus began his labors for Ragged Schools, with which his name will be always associated; for, though Sheriff Watson of Aberdeen was in that field before him, it was Guthrie's plea that first roused public attention to the need for such institutions. He was also prominent in the temperance cause, and for years was one of the foremost advocates of total abstinence. In the same line he took up Chalmers's territorial system, and was instrumental in rearing, on that principle, several churches in Edinburgh, which are now prosperous and self-supporting.

He was the means of raising a large sum of money for the erection of parsonages for the ministers of the Free Church; and every cause which had for its object the righting of wrong, or the alleviation of distress, or the restoration of the fallen, found in him a noble advocate.

His editorial labors, while sustaining fully, did not increase, his reputation; but they furnished him with an opportunity of showing, that, while he was steadfastly attached to his own religious belief, he could stretch a brother's hand to all classes of Christians; and so, when he died, there was no man more generally lamented by men of every denomination.

GUTZLAFF, Karl Friedrich August, b. at Stettin, 1802; d. at Victoria, Aug. 9, 1851; went in 1823 to Singapore as a missionary in the service of the Netherland Missionary Society, thence in 1828 to Siam, and in 1831 to China, where he remained as secretary to the British ambassador since 1834, though occupying most of his time with missionary work. He wrote Sketch of Chinese History, London, 1834, 2 vols., China (topography, literature, religion, jurisprudence, etc.), London, 1838, 2 vols., besides several papers on China and East-Indian matters in the journal of the Geographical Society in London.

GUYON, Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Mothe, a prominent representative of French mysticism; b. of noble and wealthy parents at Montargis, France, April 16, 1648; d. at Blois, June 9, 1717. Her childhood was spent in the Ursuline convent at Montargis and the Benedictine convent close by. She was of delicate constitution, and already in early childhood showed an inclination towards ascetic mysticism. The works of Francis de Sales and Madame de Chantal exercised a great influence on her mind. When she read that the latter had branded on her bosom the name of Jesus with a hot iron, she stitched a piece of paper bearing the same name, on the flesh of her own bosom, with a needle, and wore it there. Her parents thwarted her in her desire to take the veil, and in her sixteenth year (1664) espoused her to M. Guyon, who was then thirty-eight years old. Her married life was made wretched by the jealousy and severity of a mother-in-law. She bore her husband five children; but he had little sympathy with her religious enthusiasm. At this period she observed painful and prolonged ascetic practices, flagellating herself till the blood ran from the wounds, wearing a girdle studded with iron teeth, tearing her skin with thorns, walking with stones in her shoes, and depriving herself of food and sleep. The fashionable society in which her husband mingled she completely renounced.

In 1677 Madame Guyon was left a widow with three children, and, in spite of offers of marriage, remained a widow. A correspondence with Father La Combe, whom she had met in Montargis, and other circumstances, led her to devote herself to Christian activity in Gex, near Geneva. Thither she started secretly, in 1681, after securing the sympathy of D'Aranthon, Bishop of Geneva, then in Paris. At Gex she entered the institution for converts from Protestantism, and had La Combe for confessor. She, however, was not happy; and when the bishop proposed to her to become mother superior, and endow the institution with her wealth, she fled to the Ursuline convent at Thoune, where La Combe resided. Her life there was a series of visions, revelations, etc. When La Combe followed a call of the Bishop of Vercelli, in Piedmont, Madame Guyon went to Turin to visit the Marquis of Prunai. They took the journey in company,—a circumstance which gave occasion for scandal, as her removal to Thoune had done before. Soon after, La Combe ordered her to go to Paris, and accompanied her as far as Grenoble. While tarrying there, she began her commentary on the Scriptures, and wrote her Moyen court et très facile de faire oraison ("Short and easy method of prayer"), and Le Cantique des Cantiques ("The Song of Solomon"). Her mysticism, however, awakened opposition; and, leaving Grenoble, she journeyed over Marseilles and Nice, back to Turin. She was about to found a charitable institution there, when she was attacked by a violent fever.

In 1686 La Combe was cited by the general of the order of Barnabites to appear at Paris, and thither Madame Guyon accompanied him. The following year, at the instigation of her brother, Père de la Mothe, the former was charged with improper relations with Madame Guyon, and for being a follower of Michael Molinos, and thrown into the Bastille. Thenceforth, Madame Guyon's religious views were an object of suspicion, and she herself of harsh treatment.

In 1688 she was confined to the convent at Faubourg St. Antoine, but subsequently released through the influence of Madame de Maintenon. From 1688 to 1694 she lived mostly at Paris, and often went to Madame de Maintenon's training institute at St. Cyr, where she propagated her peculiar views, and became an object of admiration and reverence. There her first meeting with Fénelon occurred, which led to a cordial friendship. In 1694 a meeting was arranged between her and Bossuet, the most influential prelate of France at that time. The same year, in consequence of complaints, and at Madame Guyon's instance, a commission of three, consisting of Bossuet, Bishop Noailles, and Abbé Tronson, was appointed to examine her writings. Thirty articles were drawn from them, teaching errors, which Madame Guyon recanted, receiving, in return, a certificate from Bossuet of catholic orthodoxy. She continued to hold meetings in Paris for the advancement of the inner life, and was apprehended Dec. 28, 1695, and placed in confinement at Vincennes, and later in the Bastille, from which, by the intercession of Noailles, now Archbishop of Paris, she was removed to Vaugirard. But a letter of La Combe's (who died insane 1699), calling upon her to do penance for their mutual intimacy, falling into the hands of the king, led him to condemn her again to the Bastille. In 1699 Bossuet secured a complete victory over Fénelon by the condemnation of his Maximes des Saintes, in which he had given a defence of the views of Madame Guyon. The following year, a clerical council, under his presidency at St. Germain, pronounced the character of Madame Guyon above reproach. As a result, she was released from imprisonment, but directed to live at Diziers, near Blois, with her son. According to an eye-witness (De Labetterie), she lived there an exemplary Christian life until her death, fifteen years afterwards. No bitter word ever passed her lips. A constant sufferer, she heard mass daily from her bed, and took the communion every other day.

[Madame Guyon, and the school of Mystics or Quietists which she represented, laid great stress upon the inner life, and the union of the soul with God, and taught that our wills may be completely lost in the divine will, that we should strive after a disinterested love for him, and that entire sanctification is possible in this world. Outward exercises of devotion and prayer are a lower stage of Christian life; and the aim of every believer should be to rest entirely in God. It was the tendency of these views to disparage the external observances of religion, to substitute for the authority of the Church that of the individual, and thus to lead to Antinomianism, which aroused the opposition of Bossuet and others.]

Madame Guyon was a graceful writer; and, in addition to the writings already mentioned, she wrote Les torrents spirituels, Cologne, 1704 ("Spiritual streams"), in which she compares our souls seeking after God to streams of different degrees of rapidity, etc., flowing towards the ocean; Les livres de l'Ancien et de Nouveau Test. traduit, avec des explications et des reflexions qui regardent la vie intérieure, Cologne, 1713-15 ("The books of the Old and New Testament, translated with explanations and reflections concerning the inner life"). She also published religious poems (Recueil de Poésies spirituelles, Amsterdam, 1689), some of which were translated by Cowper, and are found in English hymn-books; as, "I would love thee, God and Father," and "My Lord, how full of sweet content." GUYSE, John, D.D., a dissenting minister; b. at Hertford, Eng., 1680; removed to London, as successor to Matthew Clarke, 1732; lost his sight toward the close of his life; d. Nov. 22, 1761. He is the author of The Practical Expositor, or an Exposition of the New Testament in the Form of a Paraphrase, with Occasional Notes, London, 1739-52, 3 vols., several times reprinted, formerly much esteemed, but now almost forgotten.

GYROVAGI is the name generally given to a kind of vagrant monks which was very numerous when monasticism was first introduced in Western Europe. They had no fixed domicile, but wandered from cell to cell, from hermitage to hermitage, from abbey to abbey, living on the hospitality of their brethren, but giving both to them and to the community at large a very bad example. Augustine and Cassianus wrote against them, and several synods in Gaul tried to suppress them; but they did not disappear until the time of Charlemagne and Louis the Pious, when the rules of Benedict became the rules of monasticism in general. HAAG (HAQUE) ASSOCIATION, for the Defence of the Christian Religion, The, or The Apologetical Society of the Hague, was founded in August, 1785, by a number of distinguished Dutch theologians. The occasion was the appearance, in 1782, of Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity; and the object of the society was to take a firm stand against the anti-Christian tendencies of the age. During the first period of its life (1785-1810) its stand-point was strictly orthodox and supranaturalistic. In its publications the accommodation theory of Semler was absolutely rejected; the doctrines of vicarious atonement, the divinity of Christ, the personality of the Holy Spirit, etc., were strongly emphasized; and the inspiration of the Scriptures was considered an indisputable fact. During the second period (1810-35) the exegetical element was made more prominent, and the stand-point may be characterized as biblico-evangelical. The biblical angelology, the miracles of Elijah and Elisha, were vindicated; the dogmatics and ethics of the Gospel of John were examined; and the biblical idea of revelation was maintained in opposition to the rationalists. The character of the third period (1835-60) was principally determined by the writings of D. F. Strauss and the Tübingen school. The contest raged around the very fundamentals of Christianity; and the principles which the society fought for were strongly conservative, though it carried on the fight in a free, scientific spirit. But, from this critico-historical platform, the society, after 1860, gradually glided into the ethico-religious field; and, in spite of the truth and beauty they contain, its publications on slavery, war, capital punishment, woman's emancipation, and other questions of a similar import, lie far out in the periphery of Christian apologetics.

HAB'AKKUK (חֲבַקּוּק, "embracing"), one of the Minor Prophets of the Old Testament. From the expression (iii. 19), "To the chief singer on my stringed instruments," the inference has with justice been drawn, that he was a Levite; for only Levites and priests could participate in the services of the temple. Nothing further is known of the prophet's life except what has been handed down by unreliable tradition. [The rabbins said he was the son of the Shunammite whom Elisha had restored. A "Habakkuk, son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi," is reported to have been the author of Bel and the Dragon. He carried food to Daniel in the lions' den, etc.]

Book of. The prophecy of Habbakuk contains (1) The prophet's complaint against the corrupt state of society (i. 2-4); (2) The divine answer, announcing an irruption of the Chaldæans (i. 5-11); (3) The prophet's complaint of the unscrupulous greed and fierceness of the Chaldæans (i. 12-17); (4) The divine answer, promising their destruction (ii. 4-20); and (5) The prophet's response to these two divine announcements in a magnificent ode commemorating the majesty of God (iii.).

The time of composition is not indicated by any positive statement in the book itself. De Wette, Ewald, and others refer it to the reign of Jehoiakim, and regard the invasion of the Chaldæans alluded to as beginning with the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.). This view is opposed by ch. i. 5, which represents that invasion as something incredible, and by the fact that Zephaniah (i. 7; comp. Hab. ii. 20) and Jeremiah (iv. 13, v. 6; comp. Hab. i. 8) draw from Habakkuk. Others place the prophet's activity under Manasseh. The third chapter, which presupposes the restoration of the old temple worship, makes against this view, and for a date after the twelfth year of Josiah's reign (630 B.C.), up to which time idolatry lasted. [This view is ably presented by Delitzsch in his Commentary.] The sentiments of ch. i. 2-4 are in accord with such a transition period to better things. The style of Habakkuk is classic. Expression and description are artistically rounded off, and less dependent upon older models than the other Minor Prophets. The author deserves a place among the greatest of the prophets; and the lyric poem of ch. iii. surpasses every thing of its kind in the Old Testament. It has with justice been said by Umbreit that he resembles Jeremiah in the combination of softness with lofty manliness, and Asaph in his lyric sensitiveness and warmth.

[With reference to the third chapter of Habakkuk, Isaac Taylor says (Hebrew Poetry, American edition, p. 255), "This anthem, unequalled in majesty and splendor of language and imagery, and which, in its closing verses, gives expression in terms the most affecting to an intense feeling, on this ground so fully embodies these religious sentiments as to satisfy Christian piety, even of the loftiest order." Of the same chapter Dean Stanley (Jewish Church, ii. 549) says, "The prophet seems to be transformed into the Psalmist; the ancient poetic fervor of Deborah is rekindled within him." Some of the most frequently quoted passages of Scripture are found in our prophet (i. 13, ii. 14, 15, 20, iii. 2, 18, etc.); and the great truth, "The just shall live by faith" (ii. 4), is used by Paul as the constructive doctrine of two of his Epistles (Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11). Daniel Webster somewhere says that the imagery of Habakkuk is not surpassed in all literature. To be convinced of its grandeur one has only to refer to the description of the invading Chaldæans, whose "horses are swifter than the leopards, and more fierce than the evening wolves" (i. 5-11), and whose greed is as insatiable as death and hell (ii. 5); or to the magnificent description of the power and glory of God (iii. 2-15).

HABERKORN, Peter, b. at Butzbach, 1604; d. at Giessen, 1676; was first professor at Marburg, then court-preacher at Darmstadt, and finally professor at Giessen. He was one of the lights of Protestant polemics in the seventeenth century, and wrote against Romanism and syncretism: Disputationes ante Walenburgicas (1658), Enodatio errorum Syncretisticorum (1665), etc.

HABERT, Isaac, d. at Pont de Salors, near Rodez, 1668; was b. in Paris; studied at the Sorbonne; was appointed canon at the church of Notre Dame, and became Bishop of Vabres in 1645. He was the first to attack the Jansenists, and is said to have done so at the instigation of Richelieu. His principal writings are, De consensu hierarchiæ et monarchiæ (1640), De primatu Patri (1645), De gratia (1646), etc.

HACKETT, John, D.D., Bishop of Lichfield; b. in London, September, 1592; d. at Lichfield, Oct. 21, 1670. He was educated at Cambridge; was chaplain to James I., and made bishop 1661. His best known work is the life of Archbishop Williams, under the whimsical title, Scrinia referata, a memorial offered to the great deservings of John Williams, D.D., Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and Archbishop of York, containing a series of the most remarkable occurrences and transactions of his life in relation both to Church and State, folio, London, 1693; abridged edition, 1715. Darling says this life is "one of the most curious pieces of biography in our language, of great historical value, and full of rare quotations and quaint illustrations."

HACKETT, Horatio Balch, D.D., LL.D., eminent Baptist scholar, and one of the best American exegetes; b. at Salisbury, Mass., Dec. 27, 1808; d. in Rochester, N.Y., Nov. 2, 1875. He was graduated at Amherst College (1830) and Andover Theological Seminary (1833); studied in Germany; was for four years professor of Latin in Brown University; in 1839 became professor of biblical literature in the Newton Theological Institution, and in 1870 professor of New-Testament Greek in Rochester Theological Seminary. As a teacher he was full of enthusiasm and full of learning: he loved his work even in its driest details. In private life he was simple, modest, and humble, warm in his affections, tender in his sympathies, and unaffected in his piety. He was a member of the New-Testament company of the American Bible Revision Committee, as he had previously been of the American Bible Union. His works are very valuable, and include an edition, with notes, of Plutarch's De Sera Numinis Vindicta (1844); a translation, with improvements, of Winer's Chaldee Grammar (1845); an original Hebrew Grammar, with a Chrestomathy (1847); Commentary on the Acts (1851; revised edition, 1858, and again 1877); Illustrations of Scripture, suggested by a Tour through the Holy Land (1855; revised edition, 1868; new edition, 1882); Philemon, new annotated translation (1860); Christian Memorials of the War (1864); translations, with additions, of Van Oosterzee's Commentary on Philemon (1868), and Braune's on Philippians and Philemon (1870), for the American edition of Lange; edition of Rawlinson's Historical Illustrations of the Old Testament (1873). In connection with Professor Ezra Abbot he edited the American edition of Smith's Bible Dictionary, New York, 1868-70, 4 vols., with many corrections and valuable additions.

HA'DAD (הַדָּד, also הַרַד), a word of doubtful etymology; was the name of a Syrian divinity. It was also the name of two Edomite kings (Gen. xxxv. 35, xxxvi. 39), — a son of Ishmael (1 Chron. i. 30), and a contemporary of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 14-22). The last-mentioned, who was of royal blood, fled as a child to Egypt at Joab's defeat of the Edomites. He married the daughter of Pharaoh, and at David's death made an attempt to reconquer his native land. The Hebrew text breaks off so suddenly at verse 22, and verse 25 is so evidently out of place, that we prefer to suppose that the conclusion of his history has, by an error of the copyist, been inserted in the wrong place, and to read at verse 25, with the LXX., "This is the evil that Hadad did, and he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Syria." He is not to be confounded with the HADADEZER (or Hadarezer) of 1 Kings xi. 23. The latter was king of Zoba in the time of David, and exercised considerable power, as is evident from the fact that kings are called his servants (2 Sam. x. 19). See the Bible dictionaries of WINER, SCHENKEL, RIEHM [and SMITH]. WOLF BAUDISSION.

HA'DAD-RIM'MON, or HA'DAR-RIM'MON (Zech. xii. 11), was either a person over whom the "mourning" was made, a locality at which the event bewailed occurred, or, as Hitzig and others hold, the name of a Syrian divinity, in which case the mourning would be a part of the worship offered to him. The best explanation refers the name to a locality which witnessed the death of Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 29 sqq.), whose memory was honored by songs of lamentation (2 Chron. xxxv. 25). Although the location has not been identified with certainty, it was probably at the site of the modern Rummane, in the plain of Jezreel, about two miles south of Ledschun (Legio), which is most probably the ancient Megiddo. The name of the town Hadad-Rimmon was, no doubt, originally the name of a deity; Hadad and Rimmon being both the names of gods. See the Commentaries on Zechariah, the works on Palestine by RELAND and ROBINSON, and the arts. in WINER, SCHENKEL, RIEHM [and SMITH]. WOLF BAUDISSION.

HADDAN, Arthur West, b. in England, 1816; d. at Barton-on-Heath in England, Feb. 8, 1873. After a distinguished career at the University of Oxford, where he was a fellow of Trinity, he retired (1857) to his quiet country parsonage at Barton-on-Heath, and passed the remainder of his days in pastoral and literary labor. He was a scholar of tireless industry; and besides a thorough monograph upon Apostolical Succession in the Church of England (1869), and numerous articles in Smith's Dictionaries of Christian Biography and of Antiquities, he edited for the Anglo-Catholic Library the works of Archbishop Bramhall (Oxford, 1842-45, 5 vols.), and also those of Herbert Thorndike (Oxford, 1844-56, 5 vols.), and, in connection with Professor Stubbs, the Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland (Oxford, 1869-78). See his Remains, edited by Bishop Forbes, London, 1876.

HA'DES (Greek, ᾠδης, or ἠδης, or, in the older Homeric form, Ἄϊδης, commonly derived from a privative and the verb ideiv, i.e., the unseen world) is used by Homer as a proper noun for Pluto, the god of the unseen or lower world, next brother to Zeus (hence tv or εις 'Αΐδου, sc., οίκου, or οίκου, "in" or "into the abode of Hades"). In later writers it signifies a place and state; viz., the unseen spirit-world, or the realm of the departed, the abode of the dead. It occurs in the following passages of the Greek Testament: Matt. xi. 23, xvi. 18; Luke x. 15, xvi. 23; Acts ii. 27, 31; Rev. i. 18, vi. 8, xx. 13, 14; 1 Cor. xv. 55 (but here the true reading is θάνατος, "death"). It is always closely connected with death. The rider on the pale horse in the Apocalypse (vi. 8) is Death; and "Hades follows with him;" and at the judgment, Death and Hades will give up the dead who are in them, and will be cast into the lake of fire (xx. 13, 14.)

1. The ancient GREEK view of Hades, and the ROMAN view of Orcus or Inferna, is that of a place for all the dead in the depth of the earth, dark, dreary, cheerless, and shut up, inaccessible to prayers and sacrifices, ruled over by Pluto. But a distinction was made between Elysium and Tartarus in this subterranean world of shadows. So Æschylus, Sophocles, Plato, Plutarch. See NÄGELSACH: Homerische Theologie, pp. 405 sqq.; PRELLER: Griechische Mythologie, 2d ed., I. 622; and Römische Mythologie, p. 452.

2. The HEBREW Sheol (שְׁאוֹל) is the equivalent for the Greek Hades, and is so translated in the Septuagint. It is likewise the subterranean abode of all the dead, but only the temporary abode till the final judgment, and is divided into two departments, called Paradise or Abraham's Bosom, for the good, and Gehenna or Hell, for the bad. In King James's Version, Sheol is variously rendered "hell," "grave," and "pit." In the rabbinical theology, Sheol seems to be nearly identical with Gehinnom, but with two distinct ends, — as a purgatorial fire for the Hebrews, and as a consuming fire for the heathen. See F. WEBER: System der altsynagogalen palæstinischen Theologie (1880), p. 327; also art. SHEOL.

3. In the NEW TESTAMENT, Hades does not differ essentially from the Hebrew Sheol; but Christ has broken the power of death, and dispelled the darkness of Hades, and revealed to believers the idea of heaven as the state and abode of bliss in immediate prospect after a holy life. The English (as also Luther's German) version translates Hades (which occurs ten times in the New Testament) and Gehenna (which occurs twelve times) by the same word, "hell" (except in 1 Cor. xv. 55, "grave"), and thus obliterates the important distinction between the realm of the dead (or nether-world, spirit-world) and the place of torment or eternal punishment; but in the Revision of 1881 the distinction is restored, and the term Hades introduced. Hades is a temporary jail or prison-house: heaven and hell are permanent and final. But Christ's descent into Hades no doubt created a revolution in that dreary abode. It is very different from what it was under the old dispensation. Christ has "the keys of Death and of Hades" (Rev. i. 18): they have lost their terrors for believers, who pass immediately into the presence of their Lord and Saviour after death (John xiv. 2, 3; Phil. i. 23).

4. In ECCLESIASTICAL THEOLOGY the idea of Hades has undergone several modifications. (a) In the ancient church, Hades was the transitory abode of all the departed between death and resurrection, except the martyrs, who pass directly into heaven. So Tertullian, Irenæus, Lactantius, Ambrose. The Gnostics taught a transplantation of the highest order (the pneumatics) into the world of the pleroma.

(b) In the Roman-Catholic Church, Hades has been, since Gregory I., transformed into the purgatory, or the abode of imperfect Christians, till they are pure enough to enter heaven. This purgatory is between heaven and hell, and takes the place of the limbus patrum in the old dispensation, which contained the Jewish saints waiting for Christ, and was emptied when he descended for their deliverance: so purgatory will be finally emptied at the day of judgment. Much pious superstition and fraud collected around this mediæval theory, which explains the radical re-action at the time of the Reformation. See PURGATORY.

(c) The Protestant churches rejected, with purgatory and its abuses, the whole idea of a middle state, and taught simply two states and places, — heaven for believers, and hell for unbelievers. Hades was identified with Gehenna, and hence both terms were translated alike in the Protestant versions. The same confusion gave rise also to misinterpretations of the article of Christ's descent in the Apostles' Creed, which was understood by Calvin (and the Heidelberg Catechism) figuratively, and identified with the sufferings on the cross; by the Westminster Catechism, as meaning simply that he continued in the state of death till he rose; by Luther, as a triumph over hell.

(d) In more recent times the idea of a middle state between death and resurrection, as distinct from the final state of heaven and hell, has been revived among Protestants, especially in Germany, though freed from the superstitions of the Roman purgatory, which has no foundation in the New Testament. To the believer (as to Lazarus in Abraham's bosom) this middle state is a state of beatitude in union with their Lord; to the unbeliever (as to the rich man in the parable) it is a state of punishment; to both a state of preparation for the final consummation at the day of judgment. Some assume a constant progress in that state in opposite directions, the good growing better, the bad worse, and both ripening for the final harvest. So Nitzsch, Lange, Rothe, Martensen, Rink. But all speculations on the future state beyond the limits of revelation are docta ignorantia.

HAD'RACH (הדרַח, probably the Pausal הדרַח) is mentioned only in Zech. ix. 1: "Utterance of the word of Jahve concerning the land of Hadrach, and Damascus is its [the word's] place of rest." The connection seems to indicate that it was the country in which Damascus was situated, or a neighboring locality. The following explanations have been suggested: It is (1) the name of a king (comp. Mic. v. 6; Neh. ix. 22); (2) of a god worshipped there (Hitzig, Ewald, Reuss); (3) a symbolical designation meaning strong-weak, and refers to God (Jerome, hence Holy Land) or the Medo-Persian kingdom (Hengstenberg); (4) a designation of Coëlyria, the word being taken as an adjective from הדרַח (Maurer); (5) the name of a country, and is, on the basis of Assyrian inscriptions, to be identified with Hatarika (a city named in connection with Damascus and Hamath), but rather, as I think, with Chatracharta, near Ptolemæus, which Strabo mentions (xvi. 1, 6) as the residence of Darius Hystaspis; and (6) a name of Hauranitis (v. Ortenberg, Olshausen), the word being corrected to הדרַח (Ezek. xlvii. 16, 18). See especially AUG. KÖHLER: D. Weissagungen Sacharjas, 1863, for the various older interpretations, and Hadrach, in the Bible Dicts. of WINKER, RIEHM [and SMITH].

HADRIAN, P. ÆLIUS, Roman emperor (117-138); was b. in Rome, Jan. 24, 76; of Spanish descent; a relative of Trajan, who adopted him on his death-bed. He was brilliantly gifted, and most carefully educated, a perfect soldier, ignorant of no art or science, possessed of a wonderful memory and a ready wit, handsome, and good-natured. But the elements of character were only loosely cemented; and, attracted in opposite directions, he finally lost himself in self-contradictions.

He began his reign with abandoning the conquests of Trajan, — Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, — a measure hitherto unheard of in the annals of Rome. But his policy was to consolidate, not to extend, the empire; and the first condition for the success of such a policy was to procure strong natural boundary-lines. The period from 121 to 134 he spent in travelling about, looking after every thing himself, restoring what was decaying, and starting new undertakings. The number of buildings erected during his reign was enormous; and his influence on Roman legislation, affecting the state of the slaves, military affairs, the methods of legal procedure, the administration, etc., is very remarkable. But he returned to Rome stricken by an incurable disease, and haunted by melancholy. He died at Baie, July 10, 138, a burden to himself and to his friends, and was entombed in the huge mausoleum, Moles Hadriani, the present castle of Angelo, which he had built for himself in Rome.

With respect to his relations to the Jews, see BAR-COCHBA, and ISRAEL, Post-biblical History. With respect to his relation to Christianity, some writers describe him as a bitter foe, and speak of a fourth so-called Hadrianic persecution: others consider him a friend, and make him out the originator of the first edict of toleration. Both parties are no doubt wrong. The stories of the martyrdom of Bishop Dionysius Areopagita of Athens, of Bishop Alexander, and Bishop Telesphorus of Rome, of St. Eustathius, St. Symphorosa, St. Cerealis, etc., are by no means reliable: in several cases the very existence of the person in question is doubtful. On the other hand, his rescript forbidding the execution of Christians on the mere demands of a tumultuous, frenzied Pagan mob, is very far from being an edict of toleration: it is simply the enforcement of the edict of Trajan, according to which no Christian could be executed except after legally instituted and conducted process. The truth seems to be, that Hadrian was ignorant of Christianity, and indifferent to it. In his letter to Servianus he identifies the Christians with the worshippers of Serapis. The two Christian apologies presented to him by Quadratus and Aristides would, no doubt, have thrown full light on this question if they had come down to us; but they are lost; and the praise which the apologists of the next generation lavished on his memory was probably merely intended to impress his successor.

Her pregnancy aroused the jealousy of her mistress, and became the occasion of such harsh treatment, that she fled into the wilderness of Shur. At the well Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. xvi. 14) she was induced by a theophany to return and submit. Hagar became the mother of Ishmael, but was again cast forth by Sarah, who in the mean time had given birth to Isaac (Gen. xxi. 9-11). She was again supernaturally visited in her distress (Gen. xxi. 11-21). Paul (Gal. iv. 24 sqq.), in an allegory, makes the slave Hagar the representative of the Law of Sinai, which "answereth to the Jerusalem that now is." Some, however, regard Hagar ("stone") in this passage to be simply a local name for Sinai, on which see Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 190-195.

HAGARITES, or HAGARENES, a people dwelling in Northern Arabia, with whom the trans-Jordanic tribes made war in the reign of Saul (1 Chron. v. 10 sqq.). They appear again in Ps. lxxxiii. 6 as an Arabic tribe hostile to Israel. They were probably descendants of Hagar (perhaps by another child than Ishmael), although they are distinguished from the Ishmaelites (Ps. lxxxiii. 6). See arts. in Smith's and Wiener's Dictionaries.

HAGENAU, Conference of, a politico-religious conference called by Charles V. to Spires, and convened at Hagenau on account of an epidemic raging in the former city; lasted from June 12 to July 16, 1540, but effected nothing with respect to the relation between Romanists and Protestants in Germany. The former were represented by Eck, Faber, and Cochläus; the latter by Oslander, Brenz, Capito, Cruciger, and Myconius. Only some preliminary questions were discussed, and a conference, to be held at Worms, was agreed upon.

HAGENBACH, Karl Rudolf, a distinguished theological professor and church historian; b. in Basel, March 4, 1801; d. in the same city, June 7, 1874. After spending a year at the university of Basel, he went to Bonn and Berlin, where Schleiermacher and Neander exerted a large influence upon him in fixing his theological opinions. Returning to Basel in 1823 through the persuasions of De Wette, he taught as docent, and was soon made professor. In 1873 he celebrated the fiftieth jubilee of his connection with the university. During these years, besides his professorial duties, he exerted a wide influence as a preacher. His sermons appeared in nine volumes (Basel, 1858-75). He also published two volumes of poems (2d ed., Basel, 1863), in which his mild and childlike disposition is reflected.

Hagenbach's special department was church history. He represented a school in theology (Vermittlungstheologie) occupying an intermediate position between the old supernaturalists and the rationalists. He gradually departed from the position of Schleiermacher, which he had occupied in his early career, laid an increasing stress upon the independent objective reality of Christian facts, and emphasized the confessions of the Church. His first important work was the Encyclopädie u. Methodologie d. theol. Wissenschaften, Leipzig, 1833 [10th ed. by Kautzsch, 1880], which still holds its place as the most useful work of its kind. The Lehrbuch d. Dogmengeschichte first appeared in 1840; 5th ed., 1867 [English translation by Buch, Edinburgh, revised and enlarged by Dr. H. B. Smith, New York, 1901, 2 vols.; new edition, with preface by Plumptre, Edinburgh, 1880, 3 vols.]. This is still the most popular work in its department. His largest work is the Kirchengesch. von d. ältesten Zeit bis z. 19ten Jahrhundert, Leipzig, 1869-72, 7 vols. It was in part a reconstruction of three earlier works, — Geschichte d. Reformation (1834-43), Geschichte d. alten Kirche (1853), and Geschichte d. Mittelalters (1860). [The work has appeared in partial translations, — History of the Reformation, by Miss E. Moore, 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1878, and History of the Church in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries, by Dr. Hurst, 2 vols., New York, 1869.] These historical labors are not so much distinguished for originality of treatment, or novelty of discovery, as for their comprehensive views, amiable spirit, and clear and attractive style. Among his other writings are Oekolampad u. Myconius, Elberfeld, 1859; Grundzüge d. Homiletik u. Liturgik, Leipzig, 1863. He also edited a Swiss Church Magazine from 1845 to 1868. [He was a prominent contributor to Herzog's Encyclopædia.] See Erinnerung an K. R. Hagenbach, Basel, 1874, which contains a short autobiographical sketch, with other matter. An extensive Autobiography exists only in manuscript. [EPPLER: Karl Rudolf Hagenbach, Gütersloh, 1875.] R. STAHELIN.

HAGGADAH (anecdote, legend) is a Talmudic and rabbinical term for traditional stories and legends illustrative of Scripture. Many of these stories are amusing, many are beautiful; but their critical value is small. See MIDRASH.

HAG'GAI (חַגַּי, festive), one of the three prophets of the post-exile period. He prophesied at Jerusalem in the second year of the reign of Darius, or 520 B.C. (I. 1), and aroused the people to complete the second temple (Ez. v. 1, vi. 14). Bleek, Ewald, Stanley, and others have supposed, on the ground of II. 3, that he had seen Solomon's temple, in which case he lived to a great age.

Book of. The Book of Haggai is an exhortation to complete the temple, work upon which had been begun in 534 B.C., but discontinued by a decree of Cyrus, and a prophecy of the blessing of the Lord which would follow its completion. It consists of four parts: the first (i. 1-15) attributes the curse resting upon the people to their listlessness in leaving the temple unfinished while they dwelt in "panelled houses," and exhorts them to begin work; the second (ii. 1-9) predicts for the new temple a glory greater than that of Solomon; the third prophecy (ii. 10-19) urges them to greater activity in view of the curse to be escaped, and the blessing to ensue; and the fourth (ii. 20-23) promises victory over the heathen, and an abiding glory to Zerubbabel.

Haggai, like Zechariah and Malachi, the two other prophets after the Captivity, does not equal the earlier prophets in language and poetry. He is not, however, deficient in enthusiasm and originality (De Wette). A prophet is not to be measured by his power of description, but by the inherent value of what he utters, and by the purpose he is to subserve. The prophecies of these three prophets are the grand voices of watchmen in the morning watch of the old covenant.

It was Haggai's special office to predict the connection of redemption with the second temple, and of the Davidic dominion with the house of Zerubbabel (ii. 23). God did "give peace in that place" (ii. 9), for Jesus walked and taught in its balls. Haggai prophesied of the new dispensation, and his words (ii. 9) are not applicable to a temple of stone. He was not a legalist; and the two legal questions (ii. 11-14) are put to bring out that the temple of stone does not exert any saving influence, and that it was the people that were sluggish in their work who corrupted every thing they touched. The period of Ezra and Nehemiah did not produce the law, but did inaugurate the discussion of it, which ultimately issued in the Talmud. The Old-Testament preparation for Christianity was negative, as well as positive. The legalism of the post-exile period was gradually transformed into Pharisaism, which brought death to Him whose advent the three post-exile prophets announced.

HAHN, August, b. at Grossosterhausen, in Prussian Saxony, March 27, 1792; d. at Breslau, May 13, 1863; studied theology and Oriental languages at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Königsberg 1819, at Leipzig 1826, at Breslau 1833, and superintendent-general of Silesia 1843. He was one of the last representatives of the old supranaturalism, and an ardent adversary of the reigning rationalism; but his works (Lehrbuch d. christl. Glaubens, 1827, etc.) are distinguished more by their warmth than by their acuteness. He also wrote on the Gnostics, De gnosi Marcionis (1820), Antitheses Marcionis (1823), De canone Marcionis (1826), etc.

HAHN, Johann Michael, was b. at Altdorf, in Würtemberg, Feb. 2, 1758, the son of a peasant. From early youth he received very deep religious impressions, and was given to meditations. He studied the Bible, also the works of Jacob Boehme, Oetinger, and others; but an education for the Church he declined. As he attracted great audiences whenever he spoke publicly, he was summoned before the consistory, but defended himself ably, and lived afterwards quietly and in peace on the estate of the Duchess Franzisca at Sindlingen, where he died in 1819. His writings were published at Tübingen, 12 vols., 1819 sqq. Many of his hymns have been incorporated with the hymn-book of the State Church. His followers, called "Michelians," are numerous in Würtemberg, and lay great stress on sanctification against an over-estimate of justification. They have never separated from the State Church, but live in scattered societies, and assemble now and then, mostly for purposes of charity. The colony of Kornthal, near Stuttgart, was organized after a plan of Hahn. [See PALMER: Vorlesungen ü. d. wirt. Sekten, 1880.] GRÜNEISEN.

HAIMO, or HAYMO, or AIMO, b. about 778; according to Trithemius, a German by descent; was monk in the monastery of Fulda, teacher in its school, and, from 840 to his death in 853, administrator of the bishopric of Halberstadt. His numerous writings (Expositio in Pauli Epis- tolas, Enarratio in 12 Prophetas minores, Historia sacra epitome, etc.) were published during the Reformation (1529-36) by the Romanists, but belong to a freer and less prejudiced age. He denies that the congregation of Rome was founded by Peter, rejects the doctrine of a universal episcopacy, and opposes the doctrine of transubstantiation, at least in the form given to it by Paschasius.

HAIR, among the Hebrews, was regarded as an ornament of the man, if not worn too long. From time to time it was clipped; but in consequence of a vow it was suffered to grow (Num. vi. 5). To pluck off the hair (Ez. ix. 3) and let it go dishevelled (Lev. x. 6 [A. V., "uncover your heads"]), or cut it off, was a sign of sorrow (Jer. vii. 29) and of captivity (Isa. vii. 20). A bald head was an object of mockery (2 Kings ii. 23). The young people curled their hair (Song of Solomon v. 11 [marg.]), or made it into locks (Judg. xvi. 13, 19). Both sexes anointed the hair profusely with ointments (Ps. xxiii. 5; Matt. vi. 17). For a woman to have her head shorn or shaven was regarded as a shame (1 Cor. xi. 6; cf. ver. 15). Gray hair was an ornament of the aged (Prov. xx. 29). RÜETSCHI.

HALACHAH (norm) is the traditional oral law, embodied in sententious form, contained in the Midrash; which see.

HALDANE, James Alexander, and Robert, brothers, eminent for Christian zeal. They studied at the High School and University of Edinburgh. — I. James was b. at Dundee, July 14, 1768; d. Feb. 8, 1851. In 1785 he entered the navy, but, becoming serious on the subject of religion, returned to Edinburgh. In 1797 and 1798 he travelled through Scotland and the Orkney Islands, preaching to large audiences, and with good results, and in 1799 was ordained pastor of a newly organized independent church in Edinburgh. In 1801 Robert built for the congregation a fine edifice, afterwards known as the Tabernacle. Here James labored for nearly fifty years with excellent success. In 1808 he made public avowal of his conversion to Baptist views. He wrote several tracts and an Exposition of Galatians, Edinburgh, 1848. — II. Robert was b. in London, Feb. 28, 1764; d. in Edinburgh, Dec. 12, 1842. He was in the navy from 1780 to 1783. Having inherited a large property, he settled in 1786 on his estate at Airthrey. From the year 1793, when he became deeply interested on the subject of religion, he was one of the most influential Christian philanthropists and writers of Scotland. Within fifteen years he distributed three hundred and fifty thousand dollars for charitable purposes, and during his life educated three hundred ministers at an expense of a hundred thousand dollars. The years 1816 and 1817 he spent in Geneva and Montauban. At Geneva he opened his parlors in the evening to the theological students of the University, and expounded the Epistle to the Romans. These meetings attracted large audiences of students; and such men as Merle d'Aubigné, Malan, Gausen, were led by them to adopt evangelical views. Mr. Haldane pursued the same course at Montauban. His lectures were embodied in his Comsur l'Épître aux Romains, which appeared in 1819. After his return to Scotland, Mr. Haldane con-continued to take a prominent part in church movements. In 1816 he published Evidence and Authority of Revelation, and 1828, On the Inspiration of Scripture. The Exposition of the Romans (a useful, and at one time very popular, practical commentary), an enlargement of the French Commentary, appeared in 3 vols., 1835-39; American ed., N.Y., 1853. See Memoirs of the Lives of Robert and J. A. Hallane by ALEXANDER HALDANE, Edinburgh, 1852, N.Y., 1854; and The Haldanes and their Friends, Philadelphia, 1858.

HALE, Matthew, Sir, Lord Chief Justice of England; b. at Alderley, Nov. 1, 1609; d. there Dec. 25, 1676. Graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, he was intending to enter the ministry, when he suddenly turned his attention to the study of law. He signed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines (1643). He sat in Parliament several times; was appointed judge by Cromwell, and was knighted immediately after the Restoration (in 1660). He was a man of prodigious industry in the study of law, and an upright judge. Baxter says of him that he "was most precisely just, inasmuch that I believe he would have lost all he had in the world rather than do an unjust act." His name has a place here on account of its bearer's belief in witchcraft. In 1665, at Bury St. Edmund's, he condemned two prisoners to death on this charge. He was on intimate terms with Baxter, Stillington, and other celebrated divines. His principal religious works are, Contemplations, Moral and Divine: Of the Nature of True Religion, 1684; Brief Abstract of the Christian Religion, 1688. An edition of his Moral and Religious Works, edited by THIRLWALL, appeared in London, 1805, 2 vols. (containing Bishop Burnet's Life). His Life was first written by Bishop BURNET, and since by J. B. WILLIAMS (Lond., 1835) and Lord CAMPBELL, in his Lives of the Chief Justices.

HALES, John, "the ever-memorable;" b. at Bath, April, 1584; d. at Eton, May 19, 1656. He was Greek professor at Oxford (1612), and canon of Windsor (1639). His works were posthumously published under the title Golden Remains, London, 1659, best ed., 1673, modern ed., 1765, 3 vols. They consist of sermons and miscellanies; but appended to the volume are his Letters from the Synod of Dort, 1618 (which he attended, and as the result of which he became an Arminian), together with the Acts of the Synod; so that the Appendix is of great historical value.

HALES, William, D.D., chronologist; d. as rector of Killeshandra, Ireland, Jan. 30, 1731. His New Analysis of Chronology appeared London, 1809-14, 4 vols., 2d ed., 1830, of which vols. 2 and 3 were occupied with Scripture chronology, in which department he is still an authority.

HALF-COMMUNION, when only the bread is given, as in the Roman-Catholic Church.

HALF-WAY COVENANT, an expedient adopted in New-England Congregational churches, between 1657 and 1662, of allowing baptized persons of moral life and orthodox belief to belong to the church so far as to receive baptism for their children, and all the privileges but that of the Lord's Supper for themselves. See CONGREGATIONALISM, p. 538.

HALL, Gordon, a Congregationalist, the first American missionary to Bombay; b. at West Granville (now Tolland), Mass., April 8, 1784; d. of cholera, Bombay, March 20, 1826. He was graduated from Williams College 1808, studied theology, was ordained as a missionary to India, and arrived at Bombay 1813. For thirteen years he prosecuted his labor with diligence and success. He had just finished the revision of the Mahratta version of the New Testament when he died. Besides a few pamphlets, he wrote, in connection with Samuel Newell, The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions, Andover, 1818. See his Memoir by H. Bardwell, And., 1834.

HALL, John Vine, b. at Diss, Norfolk, Eng., March 14, 1774; d. at Maidstone, Sept. 22, 1860. He was a prominent advocate of total abstinence, and the author of The Sinner's Friend (1821). He lived to see 290 editions of the tract printed in 23 languages, and comprising 1,268,000 copies. He distributed 60,000 copies. See his Autobiography edited by his son, Rev. Newman Hall of London (New York, 1865).

HALL, Joseph, a learned divine, and eloquent preacher of the Church of England; b. in Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, July 1, 1574; d. at Higham, near Norwich, Sept. 8, 1656. His mother was a pious woman, and dedicated him early to the ministry. Graduating at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, he was for two successive years lecturer on rhetoric, and became rector of Halsted, Suffolk, in 1601, from which he passed in 1612 to Waltham Holy Cross. In 1616 he accompanied the Earl of Carlisle on his mission to France, and in 1617 James I. to Scotland. Upon this monarch he lavished, like many of his contemporaries, the grossest adulation. In the sermon on the anniversary of the king's inauguration (March 24, 1613, and printed under the title A Holy Panegyric) he exhausted the English language for laudatory epithets. In 1617 he was made Dean of Worcester, and in 1618 was sent by James, as one of his commissioners, to the synod of Dort. The Latin sermon is still preserved which he preached before that body (Nov. 29, 1618). He was a moderate Calvinist, and sought for a mean between Calvinism and Arminianism, and published a tract (1622) on the subject Via media, the way of peace. In 1627 Dr. Hall was promoted to the see of Exeter, having previously (1624) declined that of Gloucester, and in 1641 was transferred to Norwich. Under Laud he was accused of puritanical leanings, and he was so stung by these accusations that he threatened "to cast up his rochet." He abundantly proved his full attachment to the Church of England in his Episcopacy by Divine Right Asserted (1640). In this work he advocates episcopacy as a form of government recommended by the apostles. Under the Long Parliament he seems to have suffered severely, and was one of the eleven bishops to be imprisoned in the Tower. He was released after a confinement of six months in 1642, but the following year suffered the sequestration of the revenues of his see; an allowance, however, being granted him by Parliament. He has given an account of his trials during this period in his Hard Measure (1647). The latter years of his life he spent in retirement at Higham.

Bishop Hall was a man of broad and tolerant sympathies, much piety, and in the pulpit has had few equals for eloquence among English preachers of the Established Church. Of his manner in the pulpit he says, "I never durst to climb into the pulpit to preach any sermon whereof I had not before, in my poor plain fashion, penned every word in the same order wherein I hoped to deliver it," etc. He was a prolific author, and began his literary career by a volume of Satires (1597, 1598), which are among the first in the English language. He wrote several controversial works, among which, in addition to the one on episcopacy mentioned above, was a treatise exposing the corruptions of the Church of Rome under the title The Old Religion (1628). His most valuable works, however, are of a devotional character, and have suggested to Mr. Hallam the propriety of a comparison between their author and Jeremy Taylor. The Contemplations upon the N. Test. (1612-15), Meditations and Voices (1624), and Explication of all the Hard Texts of the whole divine Scripture (1634), are his principal practical writings. Complete editions of his works by Rev. Josiah Pratt, London, 1808, 10 vols., and Rev. Peter Hall, Oxford, 1839, 12 vols. See Rev. JOHN JONES: Bishop Hall, his Life and Times, London, 1826, which contains the bishop's own Observations of some specialties of divine Providence in his life.

HALL, Robert, one of the most eloquent of modern preachers; b. May 2, 1764, at Arnsby, Leicestershire, where his father, known as the author of a work entitled Zion's Travellers, was pastor of a Baptist church; d. at Bristol, Feb. 21, 1831. He was the youngest of fourteen children; and, though at first of feeble frame, he very early showed his likings for severer studies than those common at such an age; for when he was nine years old he had made himself acquainted with Edwards On the Will, and Butler's Analogy. After attending some local schools, he was for eighteen months at Northampton, under the care of Dr. Ryland, and went in 1778 to the Baptist seminary in Bristol to prepare himself for the ministry. While still a student, he was ordained in 1780; and in 1781 he went to King's College, Aberdeen, where he studied for four years, and where, in 1785, he graduated as M.A. During the last two summer vacations of his Aberdeen course he acted as assistant pastor to Dr. Evans of Bristol; and on leaving the northern university he was appointed classical tutor in the Bristol seminary, an office which he held, in conjunction with his assistant pastorage, for five years. A misunderstanding between the two pastors decided him to resign both his positions in Bristol, and he accepted a call to the Baptist Church, Cambridge, in 1790. Here he remained for fifteen years, increasing in influence and reputation, and already recognized as one of the foremost preachers of his day. His first published sermon appeared in 1791, and was followed at intervals by others, which proved him to be not only an eloquent orator, but also an earnest advocate of liberty and education. But two attacks of insanity, with but a brief interval between them, caused him to leave Cambridge; and in 1806 he removed to Leicester, where he labored for twenty years, when, at the call of the Broadmead Church, he returned to Bristol to finish his ministry where it was begun, for there he died.

Throughout the greater part of his life Hall was a martyr to the severest physical suffering; and the spirit which he manifested under it, together with the work which he forced himself to do in spite of it, entitled him to be ranked among the heroes of his age. In theological opinion he was at first unsettled; but ultimately he became a Calvinist, after the type of Andrew Fuller, and was one of the ablest assailants of Socinianism. On the subject of communion he was opposed to Fuller, and his treatise on it is among the ablest of his works. He was an earnest supporter of the missionary enterprise; and through the pages of the Eclectic Review, as well as by his published sermons on Modern Infidelity, Popular Ignorance, and Christianity Consistent with a Love of Freedom, he did much to liberalize the opinions of his generation. He was eminent as a conversationalist; and some able men have left accounts of their interviews with him, which remind us a little of the talk of Johnson as reported by Boswell. But though he had all the quickness, and some of the roughness, of the gruff lexicographer, he had little of his self-sufficiency, and had now and then a pathos that was all his own. His special pre-eminence, however, was in the pulpit. He spoke without notes, but not without preparation; for he admitted that most of his great sermons were first worked out in thought, and then elaborated in the very words in which they were delivered. He could repeat them verbatim after the lapse of years; and though it was affirmed by many that his perorations were impromptu, he declared that they were the most carefully studied parts of his discourses. In his printed sermons his style is characterized by energy clothed in elegance, and moving on in a certain rhythmic stateliness; in his spoken discourse there was a severer simplicity; but in both there was perfect clearness. His manner was that of one who was entirely absorbed in his subject, and was quite unconscious of his mode of utterance. At first his voice was so low as to be scarcely audible, and there seemed to be a little hesitation; but, as he proceeded, that was overcome, and he poured forth with wonderful fluency, and unsurpassed command of language, a continuous stream of eloquence. Now it was description, now it was argument, now it was apostrophe, and now it was appeal; but it was always quiet, always clear, and always cogent. He had very little action. His usual attitude was to stand with his chest leaning against the cushion, and his left arm resting on the Bible, while his right was slightly raised. But such was the impression produced by his words, that, before he had spoken many minutes, all thought of the man and his manner disappeared from the hearer's mind, and he felt himself face to face with the subject alone. His fame, great while he lived, has become a cherished tradition among English-speaking Christians, and his works are among the classics of the modern pulpit.

HALLEL (praise). Psalms cxiii.-cxviii. are so named because each of them begins with Hallelujah; also called the Egyptian Hallel, because "it was chanted in the temple during the slaughter of the Passover lambs, according to the enactment first made in Egypt." They were sung, according to rabbinical enactment, on the first of the month, and at the feasts of Dedication, Tabernacles, Weeks, and the Passover. On the last occasion, Psalms cxiii. and cxiv., according to the school of Hillel (Psalm cxiii. only, according to the school of Shammai), were sung before the feast, and the others at the close, after the last cup. The "hymn" which our Lord and his disciples sang after the Last Supper (Matt. xxvi. 30) was the second part of the Hallel (Ps. cxv.-cxviii.).

HALLELU'JAH (הללויה, Ἀλληλοῦῖα, "Praise ye Jah"). It stands at the beginning, or close, or both, of many psalms in the Hebrew (e.g., civ. 35, cvi. 1, 48, cxvi. 19), and therefore naturally became a formula of praise, and was chanted as such on solemn days of rejoicing (cf. Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6). The psalms in which it occurs are all in the last book of the collection, and apparently were intended for temple use. Hallelujah passed over into the Christian Church as a doxology, the more readily since it was a word adapted to singing. It was used especially at Easter. In the Greek Church it is used "not only on days of gladness, but more constantly on occasions of mourning and fasting and burials." In the Book of Common Prayer it is translated, and uttered by the minister, "Praise ye the Lord;" to which the people reply, "The Lord's name be praised." See HALLEL.

HALLER, Albrecht von, b. at Bern, Oct. 16, 1708; d. there Dec. 17, 1777; was professor of anatomy and botany at Göttingen from 1736 to 1753, and one of the greatest physiologists and botanists of his age. He was also a very pious man, and his Briefe ü. d. wichtigsten Wahrheiten d. Offenbarung (1772) and Briefe z. Vertheidigung d. Offenbarung (1775-77) made a deep impression on his contemporaries. See GÜDER: Albrecht von Haller als Christ, Basel, 1878 (20 pp.).

HALLER, Berthold, b. at Aldingen, Württemberg, 1492; d. at Bern, Feb. 25, 1536; studied theology at Cologne, and became teacher at the gymnasium of Bern in 1513, assistant preacher at the Church of St. Vincent in 1515, and preacher in 1519, after Dr. Th. Wyttenbach. In 1521 he became acquainted with Zwingli; but even before that time he had begun to preach the Reformation in Bern, and continued so doing, in spite of the assiduous resistance of the Roman-Catholic party. In 1525 he ceased reading mass; in 1526 he partook in the conference of Basel, not altogether without success; and in 1528 he was the leading spirit in the conference of Bern, which resulted in the edict of Feb. 27, 1528, establishing the Reformation in that city. Some of his letters are found in Zwingli's Works, edited by Schuler and Schulkess, vols. vii. and viii.; but else he left no literary monuments. See KIRCHHOFFER: B. Haller, Zürich, 1828; PESTALOZZI: B. Haller, Elberfeldt, 1861. F. TRECHSEL.

HALLEY, Robert, a distinguished preacher and scholar among the Congregationalists of England; on his father's side of Scotch descent; b. at Blackheath, near London, Aug. 13, 1796; d. at Arundel, Surrey, Aug. 18, 1876. He received an excellent classical education at Bere Regis, afterwards at Greenwich, and concluded his theological instruction at Hamerton College, London. He was probably the last nonconformist minister who found it necessary, when preaching as a student, to receive a license from a magistrate under the provisions of the Toleration Act. He was ordained pastor of the church at "The Old Meeting," St. Neots, Huntingdonshire, June 11, 1822. Here he also taught a school. In 1826 he became classical tutor at Highbury College, London. While here he took active part in the antislavery movement and in the Unitarian controversy. His letter to Mr. Bates, entitled The Improved Version Truly Designated a Creed (London, 1834), led to his receiving the degree of D.D. from Princeton. In 1839 he was invited to succeed Dr. McAll as pastor of the Mosley-street Chapel, Manchester, whence, nine years later, he removed to the new building, which became necessary for the growth of the church, in Cavendish Street of the same city. In 1843 and 1850 he delivered his two courses of Congregational Lectures on the Sacraments,—a very able, learned, and candid work. In 1847 he published a small volume on Baptism. In 1857 he was invited to the chair of professor of theology, and the position of principal in New College, London, which he occupied for fifteen years. Here he published his History of Puritanism and Nonconformity in Lancashire,—one of the most graphic and interesting pictures of Puritan life. He retired from the college in 1872. He was one of the ablest platform-speakers of his time. Ardent, witty, exceedingly fair to opponents, he produced most wonderful effects upon general audiences. His eulogium upon Abraham Lincoln at a meeting of the Congregational Union of England and Wales was an extraordinary instance of oratorical power and polemical effect. LLEWELYN D. BEVAN.

HALLOCK, William Allen, b. in Plainfield, Mass., June 2, 1794; d. in New-York City, Saturday, Oct. 2, 1880. He was graduated at Williams College 1819, and at Andover Theological Seminary 1822; entered the service of the New-England Tract Society at Boston, and in 1825 took a prominent part in organizing the American Tract Society, of which he was the first secretary, and for forty-five years served the society in this capacity with rare fidelity and ability. Under his fostering care its publications year by year increased in number and usefulness. He edited the American Messenger for many years, and wrote Lives of Rev. Dr. Justin Edwards and Harlan Page, besides several excellent tracts. It has been calculated, that, of his own publications, nearly a million and a half copies have been circulated. See his Memorial, by Mrs. H. C. KNIGHT, New York, 1882.

HALSEY, Luther, D.D., LL.D., b. at Schenectady, N.Y., Jan. 1, 1794; d. at Norristown, Penn., Friday, Oct. 29, 1880. He was professor of theology in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Penn., 1829-37, and in the latter year went to the chair of ecclesiastical history and church polity in Auburn Theological Seminary, but resigned in 1844. From 1847 to 1850 he acted as professor of church history in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City. For several years before his death he lived in retirement.

HALYBURTON, Thomas, b. at Duplin, near Perth, Dec. 25, 1674; professor of divinity at St. Andrew's, 1710; d. there Sept. 23, 1712. He wrote, The Great Concern of Salvation (published by the Presbyterian Board, Philadelphia), Natural Religion Insufficient, etc., also an Autobiography (Edinburgh, 1715), which has been several times republished (e.g., London, 1824). See the edition of his works by Rev. Robert Burns, D.D., London, 1835.

HAMANN, Johann Georg, b. in Königsberg, Aug. 27, 1730; d. at Münster, June 20, 1788; received a somewhat desultory education; studied ancient literature and languages, philology and belles-lettres, at the university of his native city 1746-51; went to Courland as tutor in a private family; became acquainted with the great mercantile house of Berens in Riga, began to study national economy, and made, in the service of the house and for some mercantile purpose, a journey to England. In London he fell in with bad company, and was cheated of his money. In his destitution he took to the Bible; and a conversion followed, deep and complete. After a short visit to Riga, he settled in Königsberg 1759; held first a small office in the administration, afterwards a better one in the custom-house, and devoted himself to literature. His books (Biblische Betrachtungen, Gedanken ü. meinen Lebenslauf, Golgotha, und Scheblimini, etc.) are mostly small pamphlets; but they made a deep impression, and procured for him the name of the "Magus of the North." They are queer, dense obscurity and lightning-like clearness, fugitive allusions and powerful thoughts of universal import, alternating with each other; but they are full of stirring suggestiveness. His last years he spent in the circles of Jacobi and the Princess Galitzin. A collected edition of his works, in eight volumes, by F. Roth, appeared in Berlin, 1821-43. Selections from his works were made by A. W. Möller, Münster, 1826. See GILDEMEISTER: Hamanns Leben u. Schriften, 1857-68, 5 vols.; J. DISSELHOF: *Wegweiser zu J. G. HA'MATH (חַמָּת, "fortress," Ἐμάθ, now Hamah) has from the oldest times, and down to our days, been one of the most important cities of Syria. Situated among the northern spurs of the Libanon (Josh. xiii. 5; Judg. iii. 3), in the narrow but well-watered and exceedingly fertile valley of the Orontes, and having easy connections to the south with Damascus (Zech. ix. 2; Jer. xlix. 23), and the east with Zobah (1 Chron. xviii. 3, 9; 2 Chron. viii. 3), it very early formed one of the principal stations on the commercial and military road from Phœnicia to the Euphrates. It was originally a Canaanite colony (Gen. x. 18), but was afterwards taken by the Syrians. With a small territory comprising the city of Riblah (2 Kings xxiii. 33, xxv. 21), it formed an independent state under a king, and maintained at various periods various relations with the Jewish state. In the time of Hezekiah it was taken by the Assyrians (2 Kings xvii. 34, xix. 13; Isa. x. 9, xxxvi. 9); and "men from Hamath" were carried to Samaria, and settled there in place of the Israelites (2 Kings xvii. 24, 30). In the middle ages it was again the capital of a small independent state. The celebrated historian and geographer Abulfeda (d. 1331) lived there. At present it has about thirty thousand inhabitants. Not to be confounded with this Hamath is that belonging to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). Four stones covered with as yet undeciphered inscriptions were found at Hamah. The writing is probably Hittite. See HITTITES. RÜETSCHL.

HAMBURG, with a territory comprising an area of 138 square miles, contained, according to the census of 1877, a population of 406,014, of which about 89 per cent were Lutherans, 13,796 were Jews, 7,771 Roman Catholics, and 5,585 belonged to other evangelical denominations. When Hamburg, in 1529, adopted the Reformation, the church constitution excluded all who were not Lutherans from the city and its territory. In 1567 members of the Anglican Church, in 1605 members of the Dutch Reformed Church, and in 1648, by the peace of Westphalia, Roman Catholics, were allowed to live in the city; but they could not become citizens, nor could they celebrate worship in public. By the new civil constitution of Sept. 28, 1860, religious liberty was introduced, and all civil disqualifications from religious regard abolished. The Lutheran Church is governed by a synod consisting of fifty-three members; namely, thirty-five laymen, sixteen ecclesiastics, and two senators, and elected by the congregations. The ecclesiastical council, consisting of nine members, four laymen, three ecclesiastics, and two senators, and chosen by the synod, has the executive power, and carries on the whole administration.

HAMELMANN, Hermann, b. at Osnabrück, 1525; d. in Oldenburg, June 26, 1595; was educated in the Roman-Catholic religion, and curate of Camen, but embraced the Reformation 1552, and labored with great success for its progress as superintendent-general in Brunswick 1568-72, and Oldenburg 1572-95. Of his works (forty-five in number) his Opera genealogico-historica de Westphalia et Saxonia inferiori (edited by Wasserbach, Lemgo, 1711) are of great interest. His Life was written by RAUSCHENBVSCH, Schwelm, 1830, and CLEMEN: D. Einführung d. Ref. zu Lemgo, Lemgo, 1817.

HAMILTON, James, D.D., eminent Presbyterian divine; b. at Lonend, Paisley, Scotland, Nov. 27, 1814; came to London, 1841, as pastor of the National Scotch Church, Regent's Square; d. there Nov. 24, 1867. He was an acknowledged master of pulpit oratory, and author of some of the most widely circulated books of his day. Of his Life in Earnest (1844), sixty-four thousand had been sold before 1852, and of his Mount of Olives, sixty-four thousand before 1853. Besides these, he wrote The Royal Preacher (1851), an excellent homiletical commentary upon Ecclesiastes; The Lamp and the Lantern (1853), later title The Light upon the Path; The Prodigal Son (1866). A collected edition of his works was published, London, 1873, 6 vols.; his select works, New York, 1875, 4 vols. See his Life by WILLIAM ARNOT, New York, 4th ed., 1871.

HAMILTON, Patrick, the proto-martyr of the Scottish Reformation; b. about 1503-04, at Stanehouse, Lanark, or Kincavel, Linlithgow; burned at St. Andrew's on Feb. 29, 1528. His father was a natural son of the first Lord Hamilton, knighted for his bravery, and rewarded with the above lands and barony, by his sovereign, James IV. His mother was a daughter of Alexander, Duke of Albany, second son of James II.; so that he was closely connected with some of the highest families in the land. His cousins, John and James Hamilton, before the Reformation, rose to episcopal rank in the old church; and several others of his relatives attained high promotion. Destined himself for such promotion, Patrick was carefully educated, and, according to the corrupt custom of the times, was in his fourteenth year appointed to the abbacy of Ferne in Ross-shire, to enable him to maintain himself in comfort while studying abroad. Like many of his aristocratic countrymen at that period, he went first to the University of Paris, and probably to the College of Montaigu, where John Major, the great doctor of his country, was then teaching with so much éclat, and gathering round him, as he did afterwards at St. Andrew's, an ardent band of youthful admirers, who in the end were to advance beyond their preceptor, and to lend the influence of their learning and character to the side of the Reformers. Before the close of 1520 Patrick Hamilton took the degree of M.A. at Paris, and soon after left that university for Louvain, to avail himself of the facilities for linguistic study provided there, or to enjoy personal intercourse with Erasmus, the patron of the new learning. At this date he was probably more of an Erasmian than a Lutheran, though of that more earnest school who were ultimately to outgrow their teacher, and find their home in a new church. We know he made great progress in the languages and philosophy, and was specially drawn towards the system of Plato. With "the sophists of Louvain" he had no sympathy. But there were some there, as well as at Paris, whose hearts God had touched, to whom he could not fail to be drawn. He may even have met with the young Augustinian monks of Antwerp, whom, so soon after his departure, these sophists denounced, and forced to seal their testimony with their blood. In the course of 1522 he returned to Scotland, going first, we can hardly doubt, to visit his widowed mother and his relations, whom he loved so well, but proceeding soon to prosecute his studies at St. Andrew's. He matriculated there on June 9, 1523, the same day that his old preceptor Major was incorporated into the university and admitted as principal of the Pædagogium, or, as it came afterwards to be called, St. Mary's College. Probably he heard there those lectures on the Gospels which Major afterwards published in Paris. But his sympathies were more with the young canons of the Augustinian priory than with the old scholastic; and possibly it was that he might take a place among the teachers of their college of St. Leonards, that on Oct. 3, 1524, he was received as a member of the Faculty of Arts. He was a proficient, not only in the languages and philosophy, but also in the art of sacred music, which the canons and the alumni of their college were bound to cultivate. He composed "what the musicians call a mass, arranged in parts for nine voices," and acted himself as precentor of the choir when it was sung. He is said also to have taken on him the priesthood, that he "might be admitted to preach the word of God;" but Mr. David Laing questions if he was in holy orders at all, as no mention is made of his degradation before his martyrdom. In 1526, while James Beatoun, the primate, disguised as a shepherd, was tending a flock on the hills of Fife, the New Testament of Tyndale's translation was brought over from the Low Countries by the Scottish traders. A large proportion of the copies are said to have been taken to St. Andrew's, and circulated there. Hamilton seized the opportunity to commend the holy book and its long-forgotten truths to those over whom he had influence. His doings could not long escape the notice of the returned archbishop. He was not naturally cruel, or likely, after his recent misfortunes, to desire to embroil himself in a quarrel with the powerful Hamiltons. But he had those about him, particularly his nephew the future cardinal, who were more relentless, and less careful of consequences, and so far he yielded to their wishes. Still he was anxious to perform the ungrateful task in the least offensive way; and by issuing, or threatening to issue, a summons charging him with heresy, he got rid of the Reformer, for a time, without imbruing his hands in his blood. Hamilton, yielding to the counsels of friends and opponents, made his escape to the Continent. His original intention had been to visit Luther and Melancthon at Wittemberg, as well as Frith, Tyndale and Lambert, at Marburg. But Dr. Merle d'Aubigné says that the plague was then raging at Wittemberg, and that he went straight to the newly opened university of Marburg, over which Lambert presided, and that he publicly disputed there those theses as to the law and gospel which fully set forth the main doctrines which he taught, and for which at last he suffered. He had much profitable intercourse with Tyndale, as well as with Lambert, and was urged to remain in that quiet refuge. But he yearned over his native land, still in darkness and the shadow of death; and, late in the autumn of 1527, he returned to it, determined to brave death itself, rather than prove faithless to his Master where before he had shrunk from an ordeal so terrible. Nor was it long ere his resolution was put to the test. After he had labored for a very short time in his native district, gained over to the truth several of his relatives, and won the heart of a young lady of noble birth, to whom he united himself in marriage, he was invited by the archbishop to a conference with the chiefs of the church "on such points as might seem to stand in need of reform." At first all displayed a conciliatory spirit, and appeared to recognize the evils existing in the church: some even seemed, in some points, to share his sentiments, and for nearly a month all possible freedom in making known his views was allowed to him. At length the mask was thrown aside. On Feb. 28 he was seized, and on the 29th brought out for trial in the cathedral. Among the articles with which he was charged and the truth of which he maintained, the more important were, "that a man is not justified by works, but by faith; that faith, hope, and charity are so linked together, that he who hath one of them hath all, and he that lacketh one lacketh all; and that good works make not a good man, but a good man doeth good works." On being challenged by his accuser, he also affirmed it was not lawful to worship images, nor to pray to the saints; and that it was "lawful to all men that have souls to read the word of God; and that they are able to understand the same, and in particular the latter will and testament of Jesus Christ." These truths, which have been the source of life and strength to many, were then to him the cause of condemnation and death; and the same day the sentence was passed, it was remorselessly executed. But, through all his excruciating sufferings, the martyr held fast his confidence in God and in his Saviour; and the faith of many in the truths he taught was only the more confirmed by witnessing their mighty power on him. Nay, "the reek of Patrick Hamilton infected all on whom it did blow."

LIT. — The older authorities for the facts of Hamilton's life are the notices in the Commentary of ALESIUS on Ps. xxxvii., and in the Introduction to LAMBERT'S Commentary on the Apocalypse, in the Actes and Monuments of FOXE, in the Histories of KNOX, CALDERWOOD, SPOTTISWOODE, and in the Chronicle of LINDSAY of Pitscottie. The only formal biography of the martyr is that published in our own day by the late principal Lorimer, and intended to form the first of a series on the "Precursors of Knox." Its title is Patrick Hamilton, the First Preacher and Martyr of the Scottish Reformation: a Historical Biography, collected from original sources, etc., Edinburgh, 1857. The story of the martyr has since been told, in his own dramatic way, by Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, in vol. vi. of his Reformation in Europe in the Time of Calvin. Still more recently it has been made the subject of a veritable drama by Rev. T. P. Johnston, Patrick Hamilton, a Tragedy of the Reformation in Scotland, Edinburgh, 1882.

A. F. MITCHELL

(Professor of the University of St. Andrews).

HAMILTON, Sir William (Baronet), professor of logic and metaphysics, University of Edinburgh, was b. March 8, 1788, at the College of Glasgow, where his father was professor of anatomy and botany. He studied first in Glasgow University, afterwards in Edinburgh University, and finally in the University of Oxford. He at first devoted himself to medical studies; but during residence at Oxford he concentrated upon classics and philosophy, at which period he is described as a "solitary student" (Veitch's Life, p. 42). When passing his examination, he professed the whole works of Aristotle, and results showed that his study of the Stagirite had been careful and minute. Hamilton turned to the legal profession, passing for the Scotch bar in 1813. Shortly after, he established his claim to the baronetcy of Hamilton of Preston, and was thenceforth known as Sir William. He twice visited Germany during the years following, but does not seem by these visits to have made the acquaintance of any noted philosophers. In 1820 he became a candidate for the chair of moral philosophy in Edinburgh University, vacant by the death of Thomas Brown. He was supported in his candidature by Dugald Stewart, the senior professor, incapacitated for the active duties of the chair. John Wilson ("Christopher North" of literature) was, however, the successful candidate, and became professor of ethics; while Hamilton waited for the more congenial sphere of teacher of logic and metaphysics. In 1821 Hamilton was elected professor of history in the University of Edinburgh. From 1826 he gave himself for two or three years to the study of the functions of the brain, which resulted in pronounced antagonism to phrenology. For summary of results, see Lects. on Metaphysics, vol. I., Appendix, pp. 401-444. In 1829 appeared his celebrated article on The Philosophy of the Unconditioned (Edinburgh Review, No. 99, Hamilton's Discussions, p. 1). This was the first of a series of important articles which extended over a period of sixteen years. In 1836 he was elected to the chair of logic and metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh, which chair he held till his death, in 1856.

Hamilton was the learned and vigorous expounder of the Scotch philosophy of common sense, or knowledge of first principles common to all men, and incapable of being either proved or doubted. He was conspicuous as the defender and expounder of Thomas Reid, and was the first of the Scottish school who felt the influence of Kant, whose theory of knowledge he critically handled. Hamilton's contributions to philosophy may best be grouped under these heads: 1, His analysis of consciousness and his treatment of external perception in psychology; 2, His philosophy of the unconditioned in metaphysics; and, 3, His analytic of logical forms in pure logic. We must restrict here to a brief account of the two first named.

His treatment of consciousness (Lects. on Metaphysics, XI.-XVI., especially the first and two last) involves a contribution to philosophy of great value. It includes analysis of the act of consciousness, the relation of consciousness to the special faculties, the phenomena of external perception, and the ultimate facts of consciousness essential to its exercise. Excepting the debatable question of external perception, the whole discussion is of the first importance, involving much that is now universally accepted in mental philosophy. Under the last division great service is done for an intuitional theory, while he prepares much critical work for sensualists. Consciousness, he says, is the "essential element" or "necessary condition" of all experience, — "knowledge that I exist in some determinate state," "the recognition by the thinking subject of its own acts or affections." It is an immediate knowledge, involving discrimination, that is, judgment and memory, as its conditions. This detailed treatment of consciousness was a very marked advance on the work of Reid and Stewart, vindicating the fundamental position of Descartes, giving greater breadth and clearness of exposition to the Scotch philosophy, gaining the assent of the leaders of the experiential school, — such as J. S. Mill (Exam. of Hamilton's Philos., chap. VIII.)

and Herbert Spencer (First Principles, chap. IV., § 24),—and presenting an insuperable difficulty to the opponents of introspection. In the midst of the conflict connected with interpretation of consciousness, consciousness itself is certainty,—the province within which scepticism is impossible.

Hamilton's theory of external perception, in which he maintains that the external object is within consciousness, has not gained much support.

Hamilton's law of the conditioned, with correlative philosophy of the unconditioned, is that which comes into nearest relation with theology. His law of the conditioned is, "that all that is conceivable in thought lies between two extremes, which, as contradictory of each other, cannot both be true, but of which, as mutually contradictory, one must" (Metaph., II. 368, Lect. 38). "The law of the mind, that the conceivable is in every relation bounded by the inconceivable, I call the law of the conditioned" (p. 373). This involved his position as to the Infinite,—that the Infinite is "incognizable and inconceivable." This doctrine on its philosophic side is a protest against Kant's sceptical result affirming that reason lands in hopeless contradictions: on its theological side it proclaims the impossibility of knowing the Absolute Being. Only by taking first the philosophic aspect can we correctly interpret its theological relations. Kant had made a priori elements only forms of the mind; and accordingly the ideas of self, the universe, and God, became only regulative of our intellectual procedure, and in no sense guaranties of truth. Accordingly Kant has dwelt on "the self-contradiction of seemingly dogmatical cognitions (thesis cum antithesi) in none of which we can discover any decided superiority." These were that the world had a beginning, that it had not; that every composite substance consists of simple parts, that no composite thing does; that causality according to the laws of nature is not the only causality operating to originate the world, that there is no other causality; that there is an absolutely necessary being, that there is not any such being. Hamilton's object was to maintain that such contradictions are not the product of reason, but of an attempt to press reason beyond its proper limits. If, then, we allow that the conceivable is only of the relative and bounded, we recognize at once that the so-called antinomies of reason are the result of attempts to push reason beyond its own province, to make our conceptions the measure of existence, attempting to bring the incomprehensible within the limits of comprehension. Thus far a real service was rendered by Hamilton in criticising the sceptical side of Kant's Crítica of Pure Reason. He estimated this result so highly as to say of it, "If I have done any thing meritorious in philosophy, it is in the attempt to explain the phenomena of these contradictions" (Append. Metaph., I. p. 402). At this point Hamilton ranks Reid superior to Kant; the former ending in certainty, the latter in uncertainty. But there remains for Hamilton's philosophy the question, If we escape contradiction by refusing to attempt to draw the inconceivable within the limits of conception, what is the source of certainty as to the Infinite? how are knowledge and thought related to the existence and attributes of the Infinite Being? Here Hamilton is entangled in the perplexity of affirming that to be certain which is yet unknowable. That there is an Absolute Being, source of all finite existence, is, according to him, a certainty; but that we can have any knowledge of the fact is by him denied. Reid had maintained the existence of the Supreme Being as a necessary truth (Intell. Powers, Essay IV. chap. 3); and Hamilton affirms that the divine existence is at least a natural inference (Metaph., Lect. 3); but he nevertheless holds that the Deity cannot by us be known. This is with him an application of the law of the conditioned,—a conclusion inevitable under admission that all knowledge implies the relative, the antithesis of subject and object. This doctrine of ignorance was developed by Mansel (Limits of Religious Thought), and eagerly embraced by the experientialists, J. S. Mill (Exam. of Hamilton's Philos., chap. IV.) and Herbert Spencer (First Principles, Pt. I.; The Unknowable, chap. IV.; The Relativity of all Knowledge). This gave an impulse to agnosticism, the influence of which must be largely credited to Kant, who reduced the a priori to a form of mental procedure, and to Hamilton, who rejected Kant's view, yet regarded the absolute as incognizable. See Agnosticism. For an understanding of Hamilton's position the following references may suffice: "Mind rises to its highest dignity when viewed as the object through which, and through which alone, our unassisted reason can ascend to the knowledge of God" (Metaph., Lect. II.). "The notion of a God is not contained in the notion of a mere First Cause," nor is the notion completed by adding "the attribute of omnipotence." "Not until the two great attributes of intelligence and virtue are brought in" have we "the belief in a veritable Divinity;" to which statement it is added, by way of exposition, "that virtue involves liberty" (Ib.). "The assertion of theism" is "the assertion that the universe is created by intelligence, and governed not only by physical, but by moral laws" (Ib.). From these passages it is obvious, that, when Hamilton is discussing the rational explanation of the universe, he speaks unreservedly of "the knowledge of God," "mediately through his works," interchanging "knowledge" and "belief" in his statements. But when he treats of the limits of knowledge, the law of the conditioned, the inconceivability of the unconditioned, he denies the possibility of knowledge, and makes faith the only possible exercise. "The infinite God cannot by us, in the present limitation of our faculties, be comprehended or conceived" (Metaph., Lect. 38). He adds, however, "We know God according to the finitude of our faculties;" but "faith—belief—is the organ by which we apprehend what is beyond our knowledge." In judging of this, two things are to be noticed: that he reasons from conception to knowledge, not vice versa,—"The mind can conceive, and consequently can know, only the limited" (Discussions, Essay I.),—and that he makes faith a cognitive power.

HAMMOND, Henry, D.D., a learned divine; b. at Chertsey in Surrey, Eng., Aug. 26, 1605; d. at Westwood, Worcestershire, April 25, 1660. He was a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, 1625, rector of Peshurst 1633, D.D. 1639, canon of Christ Church 1645, and chaplain to Charles I. 1645-47, sub-dean of Christ Church 1648, but shortly expelled for his loyalty to the Stuarts, and imprisoned in Oxford, freed, and lived out his days in privacy. He was a man of the very highest character. Dr. Fell expatiates at great length, but very entertainingly, upon his many virtues. He never married, although, according to Dr. Fell, he twice felt strongly inclined that way. He was nominated one of the Westminster Assembly of divines, but never sat among them; and his nomination was soon afterwards revoked because of his loyalty to the king's cause. Among his works the best are A Practical Catechism (1644), Paraphrase and Annotations upon the New Testament (1653, reprinted Oxford, 1845, 4 vols.), upon the Book of Psalms (1659, reprinted Oxford, 1850, 2 vols.), and upon the Ten First Chapters of Proverbs. His Catechism appeared anonymously in a small edition at Oxford, and did not attract much notice until the appearance of the second edition (1646), when it suddenly leaped into such popularity that fifteen editions were printed before 1715: it covers 178 pages of the folio edition of Hammond's works. But of more importance is his Paraphrase, in which he reveals genuine exegetical tact and learning. That on the New Testament was translated into Latin, and annotated by LeClerc, Amsterdam, 1698. His Life was written by Bishop JOHN FELL, London, 1661. His complete Works were published London, 1674-84, 4 vols. folio; his Miscellaneous Theological Works, in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1847-50, 3 vols. 8vo. Both these editions of his Works contain Fell's Life.

HAMPDEN, Renn Dickson, an English prelate; b. in the Barbadoes, 1793; d. in London, April. 23, 1868. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford; became fellow there with Keble and Newman; filled, in succession, the curacies of Newton, Faringdon, and Hackney; was tutor in Oriel 1828, and principal of St. Mary's Hall 1833. In 1832 he delivered the Bampton Lectures, choosing for his subject The Scholastic Philosophy considered in its Relation to Christian Theology (3d ed., 1848). These lectures exposed him to the charge of Arianism; but in spite of this he was chosen Regius Professor of Divinity in 1836. In 1848 he was promoted to the see of Hereford, and consecrated, in spite of the remonstrance of thirteen bishops. The question of the bishop's orthodoxy was the subject of a heated pamphlet discussion, for the literature of which see ALLIBONE. Among Hampden's writings are Philosophical Evidence of Christianity (1827), Parochial Sermons (1826), The Fathers of the Greek Philosophy (Edinburgh, 1862).

HAMON, Jean, b. at Cherbourg, 1618; d. in Port-Royal, Feb. 22, 1687; studied medicine in Paris, and began to practise with great success, but sold in 1651 all his property, distributed the money among the poor, and became a hermit in Port-Royal. Of his numerous ascetic writings the principal are, Traité de piété, Pratique de la prière continuelle, an autobiography in imitation of Augustine's Confessiones, Lettres et opuscules, etc. The best life of him is found in BESOIGNE: Histoire de l'abbé de Port-Royal, vol. iv.

HANDEL, Georg Friedrich, b. in Halle, Prussia, Feb. 24, 1684; d. in London, April 13, 1759; received his musical education in his native city, Berlin, and Hamburg; visited Italy 1706-09, and was chapel-master to the elector of Hanover 1709-12, but settled in the latter year in England, and soon became thoroughly nationalized. His Italian operas, of which he produced about fifty, are now forgotten, with the exception of some detached arias; but, under the influence of the strong religious feeling of the English people, he composed about twenty oratorios, — Esther (1720), Israel in Egypt (1738), Messiah (1741), Judas Macabæus (1746), Jephthah (1751), — and thereby exercised an influence on English taste and English art which is paralleled only by that of Shakespeare's dramas.

HANDICRAFTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

That the first craftsman mentioned in Scripture, Tubal-Cain (Gen. iv. 22), was a worker in metals, indicates that metal-working was one of the earliest crafts among the Hebrews; and the circumstance becomes so much the more significant, as the general Hebrew expression for an artisan (שֹׁרֵט) primitively denotes a worker in metals, or, at least, a worker in some hard material. All such kinds of labor as required less strength and skill, and administered only to the necessities of every-day life (baking, weaving, tailoring, house-building, etc.), were in the oldest time performed by the householder, the women, and the slaves, and continued to be performed in that way even after each kind had developed into a specific trade (1 Sam. ii. 19; 2 Sam. xiii. 8; Prov. xxxi. 22; Acts ix. 39). Corporations organized in the form of castes, or monopolies belonging exclusively to certain families, did not exist among the Hebrews; and when we hear of a certain place where artisans of the tribe of Judah were working, or of certain occupations, such as byssus-weaving, which were inherited in certain families of the tribe of Judah, these are only insulated occurrences, probably incidental remembrances from the time the people lived in Egypt. Nevertheless, in the cities the members of the same trade generally lived together in the same neighborhood: there were in Jerusalem a bakers'-street (Jer. xxxvii. 21), a square near the gate leading into the valley of Ben-Hinnom, where the potters had their shops (Jer. xix. 2), a quarter occupied mainly by the noisy iron-industry and metal-works (Joseph., Bell. Jud., v. 8, 1), etc. When the Hebrews left Egypt, they had among them skilled workmen in gold, silver, brass, wood, leather, textile fabrics, cut stones, etc. But, when the generation of artists educated in Egypt died out in the desert, the development of the mechanical arts seemed to come to a standstill; and during the confusion of the period of the Judges, and under the heavy pressure of enemies, who often carried away as prisoners of war the artisans, especially the metal-workers, in order to weaken the conquered people (Judg. v. 8; 1 Sam. xiii. 19), many arts became lost among the Hebrews, or fell into decay. If a steady development had taken place from the exodus of Egypt to the period of the kings, David and Solomon would have needed no foreign masters. As it was, the Phoenicians became the teachers of the Hebrews (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Ez. xiv. 1, xxii. 15; 1 Kings v. 1 sqq., vii. 13 sqq.). A little later we find, especially in the larger cities, many kinds of work, which formerly were left to the domestic industry, organized into specific trades, such as baking, fulling, cheese-making, hair-cutting, etc. (Hos. vii. 4; Jer. xxxvii. 21; 2 Kings xviii. 17). To pursue a trade was, at least in later times, not considered degrading among the Jews: on the contrary, the Mishna censures the exclusive occupation with studies, and puts it down as a duty to learn a trade. "It is better to make the Sabbath a working-day than to be dependent on other people. Do the meanest work, if it can support you, and do it publicly, and without saying, 'I am a priest and a great man, for whom such work is unbecoming.'" Like Paul, the most celebrated rabbis earned their livelihood by some handicraft; Jochanan was a saddler; Isaac a smith; Abin a carpenter; Hillel is said to have earned his bread by cutting up wood. Some trades, however, such as had to deal with unclean things, or brought the workman in contact with women, were considered less honorable: the weaver, barber, tanner, fuller, etc., could not become king or high priest. With respect to wages, the law said that the day's work should be paid at the day's end (Lev. xix. 13; Deut. xxiv. 15). HAN'NAH (sweetness, a common female name among the Hebrews and Phoenicians, cf., in Virgil, Dido's sister Anna) was one of the wives of Elkanah of Ramathaim-Zophim (1 Sam. i. 1, 2). She was barren for many years; but, in answer to her earnest prayer, Jehovah sent her a son, whom she called Samuel (see art.). Her magnificent song of praise at his birth (1 Sam. ii. 1-10) is the prototype of the Magnificat, the song of Mary the mother of our Lord (Luke i. 46-55).

HANSIZ, Markus, b. at Völkermarkt, in Carinthia, April 23, 1683; d. in Vienna, Sept. 5, 1766; was educated in the Jesuit college of Eberndorf; studied at the university of Vienna; and was for many years a teacher of philosophy in the Jesuit college of Gratz. His ambition was to produce for Germany a Gallia Christiana, Anglica Sacra, or Italia Sacra; and in 1727 appeared the first volume of his Germania Sacra, devoted to the church of Lorch and the diocese of Passau; in 1729 the second (Salzburg); and from 1731 to 1754 the third (Ratisbon). But the freedom with which he treated local legends (on St. Rupert and others) roused such an opposition to him, that he felt compelled to renounce literary work. The work has been continued by Ussermann and others, but was never completed.

HAPHTARAH, plural HAPHTAROTH, were reading-lessons or paragraphs taken from the prophets for use in the synagogues on the Sabbath and feast-days, in connection with sections from the law. Cf. Acts iii. 15; and PARASHIOTH.

HAR'AN (the Greek and Latin Kappa, Carræ), a city and territory in Northern Mesopotamia, on the road from Ur of the Chaldees to Canaan. It was probably the fertility of the region which caused Terah and Nahor to stop there while Abraham and Lot pushed forwards to Canaan. To the Assyrians the place was of great importance as a military station when campaigns were made in Cilicia. Ezekiel (xxvii. 23) speaks of it as carrying on a considerable trade with Tyre. In Roman history it is famous as the scene of the defeat of Crassus and the assassination of Caracalla. It flourished also under the Arabs, but Abulfeda mentions it as lying in ruins. — Haran (Greek, 'Αρραβ) is the name of the youngest son of Terah (Gen. xi. 26).

HARBAUGH, Henry, D.D., a genial and scholarly divine of the German Reformed Church, and of Swiss descent; b. near Waynesborough, Penn., Oct. 28, 1817; d. in Mercersburg, Penn., Dec. 28, 1867. He worked on his father's farm till his nineteenth year, and then engaged in other employments until 1840, when he entered Franklin and Marshall College, Mercersburg, and, after spending three years there, was successively pastor of the Reformed Church, Lewisburg, Penn. (1843), Lancaster (1850), and Lebanon (1860). In 1863 he became the successor of Dr. Wolff in the chair of theology at Mercersburg. Dr. Harbaugh was a prominent representative of the Mercersburg school of theology. He possessed poetical gifts; wrote poems in the so-called "Pennsylvania German," which appeared in the Guardian, and after his death in a volume under the title Harbaugh's Harfe (Philadelphia, 1870), which enjoyed a wide popularity. He also wrote some hymns, one of which, Jesus, I live to thee, has passed into hymnological collections. Of his larger works the more important are, Heaven, or the Sainted Dead, 1848-53, 3 vols. (Heavenly Home, Heavenly Recognition, Future Life); Life of Michael Schlatter (German), 1857; and Fathers of the Reformed Church in Europe and America, Lancaster, 1857, 2 vols. He was for seventeen years editor of the Guardian, and the last year of his life of the Mercersburg Review.

HARDING, Stephen, English Cistercian monk; b. in Sherborne, Devonshire; abbot at Cîteaux 1109; received Bernard there 1113; d. there March 28, 1134. See his life by Mr. Dalgairns, in the Lives of the English Saints; also CISTERCIANS.

HARDWICK, Charles, b. at Slingsby, Yorkshire, Sept. 22, 1821; d. Aug. 18, 1859, while ascending the Pyrenees, near Bagnères de Luchon. He was successively fellow of St. Catharine's Hall, Cambridge, professor of theology in Queen's College, Birmingham (1853), divinity lecturer at Cambridge (1855), and archdeacon of Ely (1859). He is the author of several valuable works displaying thorough scholarship. These are, A History of the Articles of Religion, Camb., 1851, revised edition, 1859; A History of the Christian Church (I. Middle Age; II. Reformation), Camb., 1853-56, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1861-65, 3d ed., revised by W. Stubbs, Lond., 1872, 1878; and particularly the unfinished elaborate treatise, Christ and other Masters, an Historical Inquiry into some of the Chief Parallelisms and Contrasts between Christianity and the Religious Systems of the Ancient World, Lond., 1855-57, 4 parts, 3d ed., with prefatory memoir by Rev. F. Proctor, 1873, 1 vol.

HARDOUIN, Jean, b. at Quimper, in Brittany, 1646; d. in Paris, Sept. 3, 1729; entered early the order of the Jesuits, and devoted himself to literature. His editions of Themistius (Greek and Latin, Paris, 1684) and of Pliny (1685, in usum Delphini, 1723, complete in 3 vols. folio) are still considered the best ever made of those authors. His Conciliorum Collectio (Paris, 1715, 12 vols.) also enjoys a great reputation. But his own writings are full of whims and fancies. He held that the Æneid, the odes of Horace, etc., were written by some monks in the thirteenth century, that Christ and the apostles spoke Latin etc., and such paradoxes he defended with exorbitant arrogance and coarseness.

HARDY, Robert Spence, English Wesleyan missionary and Buddhist scholar; b. at Preston, Lancashire, July 1, 1803; d. at Headingly, Yorkshire, April 16, 1868. For twenty-three years he was a faithful missionary in Ceylon, and subsequently a preacher at home, but found time to become profoundly read in Pali, and to attain a very wide culture. His books are authoritative. He wrote The British Government and the Idolatry of Ceylon, 1841; Eastern Monachism, an Account of the Origin, Laws, Discipline, Sacred Writings, etc., of the Order of Mendicants, founded by Gotama Buddha, 1850; A Manual of Buddhism in its Modern Development, translated from Singhalese MSS., 1853, 2d ed., 1880; The Legends and Theories of the Buddhists compared with History and Science, 1867, 2d ed., 1881.

HARE, Augustus William, a devoted and model rural clergyman of the Church of England; b. in Rome, Nov. 17, 1792; d. there Feb. 19, 1834. After a distinguished career at New College, Oxford, of which he was a fellow, he became rector in 1829 of Alton-Barnes, a country parish, where his plain and fervent preaching and consecrated life not only won the hearts of the people, but came to be regarded as a model for a rural pastor's imitation. In company with his brother Julius he edited Guesses at Truth, and published Sermons to a Country Congregation, 6th ed., Lond., 1845, 2 vols. See Memorials of a Quiet Life, by A. J. C. HARE.

HARE, Julius Charles, one of the most influential of modern English theologians; b. Sept. 13, 1795, at Herstmonceux, Sussex, in the pale of the Episcopal Church; d. there Jan. 23, 1855. He was educated at the Charter House school, with Grote and Thirlwall, the distinguished historians of Greece. A considerable portion of his youth was spent on the Continent. In 1811 he visited the Wartburg, Luther's Patmos, and there, as he playfully remarked, he "saw the marks of Luther's ink upon the wall, and there took his first lesson in the art of throwing inkstands at the devil's head." In 1812 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and distinguished himself by thorough classical and general culture. In 1818 he was made fellow and tutor of Trinity, and gathered around him a number of admiring students, among them John Sterling, Archbishop Trench, and Frederick Maurice (subsequently his brother-in-law).

Hare's first introduction to the public was as joint translator, with Bishop Thirlwall, of Niebuhr's Roman history (1826). His love for German scholarship was intensified by his intimacy with Thomas Arnold of Rugby, and with Bunsen, as also by his study of Coleridge's works, whom he profoundly esteemed as a Christian philosopher. In 1832 he went to the Continent, and spent several months in Rome. This visit forms an epoch in his life. Rome, the seat of archæology, history, and art, had a powerful attraction for him; Rome, the centre of religious life and ecclesiastical institutions, repelled him, and confirmed him in his Protestant convictions, notwithstanding his romantic enthusiasm for the middle ages. In Rome he made the personal acquaintance of Dr. Bunsen, who was then ambassador of Prussia to the Vatican, afterwards to England.

On returning to England in 1834, he was made rector of Herstmonceux, and, later, archdeacon of Lewis in the diocese of Chichester, and chaplain to the Queen. In this village, not far from the southern coast of England, he labored until his death, surrounded by a large circle of friends, and held in universal esteem for his noble character and attainments. His last words were, "Upwards, upwards!"

Archdeacon Hare combined thorough scholarship, original thought, noble character, harmless wit, and manly piety. He was as familiar with Luther, Schleiermacher, Neander, Olshausen, Nitzsch, Tholuck, Lücke, etc., as with Cranmer, Hooker, Leighton, Pearson, and Tillotson. He collected one of the most valuable private libraries, of twelve thousand volumes, which completely occupied every wall in the house. He presented it to Trinity College in Cambridge. In the department of philosophy he was an independent disciple of Coleridge. In theology he had most sympathy with Dr. Arnold, but excelled him in the extent of his scholarship. He was one of the founders of the evangelical broad-church school, which seeks to liberalize the Anglican communion by keeping it in friendly intercourse with Continental thought and learning. He was a sturdy champion of Protestantism against the encroachments of Romanism and Tractarianism; but he never exposed himself to the charge of disloyalty to the Church, nor forgot the personal regard due to his opponents. He was especially pained at the transition of Archdeacon, now Cardinal, Manning, his former colleague and intimate friend, to Romanism.

As an author, Hare had some peculiarities of spelling (forst for forced, preacht for preached, etc.), and embodied the most valuable part of his works in notes, which occupy a much larger space than the text. His strength lay in his combination of theological attainments with purity of character, and in his talent for stimulating others to further study and investigation.

His ablest theological work is The Mission of the Comforter, with Notes, 3d ed., 1876 (republished in Boston). It contains five sermons preached at Cambridge from the words of our Lord (John xvi. 7-11) on the office of the Holy Spirit. More than the half of the work consists of learned notes and excursions. His defence of Dr. Luther, originally the tenth note of the above work, afterwards separately issued in an enlarged form shortly before his death, is the ablest vindication of the Reformer against the attacks of Bossuet, Hallam, Sir William Hamilton, and the Oxford Tractarians. "The breadth and energy of Luther's genius," says Stanley, "the depth and warmth of his heart, and the grandeur of his position and character, amidst whatever of inconsistencies or imperfections of expression, are brought out with a force and clearness which must often be as new to his admirers as to his detractors." Hare also contributed the text for the English edition of König's illustrations of the life of Luther. We must next mention The Victory of Faith, a series of most instructive and inspiring sermons on 1 John v. 5, 3d ed. by Plumptre, London, 1874. The sixth sermon contains the most eloquent description of the conquering power of faith in the English language (pp. 225 sqq.). The Contest with Rome (1842) is one of the most trenchant of the Anglican writings called forth by the controversy with Romanism and Puseyism. A collection of his Charges was published 1856, a year after his death. We conclude with a characteristic passage from a charge in the spring of 1850, where he addresses the two contending parties of his diocese as follows: "With both sides I feel that I have many bonds of common faith and love and duty; with both of them I heartily desire to work together in the service of our common Master. With each of the two parties on sundry points I differ in opinion more or less widely. But why should this cut me off from them, or why should it cut them off from me? May we not hold fast to that whereon we are agreed, and join hand to hand and heart to heart on that sure, unshakable ground, which cannot slip from under us, and wait until God shall reveal to us what we now see dimly and darkly? Shall the oak say to the elm, 'Depart from me, thou hast no place in God's forest, thou shalt not breathe his air, or drink in his sunshine'? Or shall the ash say to the birch, 'Avaunt! thou art not to stand by my side: cast thyself down and crawl away, and hide thyself in some outlandish thicket'? O my brethren! the spring is just about to clothe all the trees of the forest in their bright, fresh leaves, which will shine and sparkle rejoicingly and thankfully in the sun and rain. Shall it not also clothe our hearts anew in bright, hopeful garments of faith and love, diverse in form, in hue, in texture, but blending together into a beautiful harmonious unity beneath the light of the Sun of righteousness?"

HARLAY, François de, b. in Paris, Aug. 14, 1625; d. at Conflans, Aug. 6, 1695; was made Archbishop of Rouen in 1651, and of Paris in 1670. He was unprincipled and vain, frivolous and intolerant; and his influence at the court he used against the Huguenots. He was one of the principal promoters of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He edited the Synodicon Parisiense.

HARMER, Thomas, b. in Norwich, Eng., 1715; pastor of the Independent Church at Wottesfield, Suffolk, 1735; d. there Nov. 27, 1788. The work of his lifetime was Observations on Various Passages of Scripture, placing them in a new light, and ascertaining the meaning of several not determinable by the methods commonly made use of by the learned, compiled from relations incidentally mentioned in books of voyages and travels into the East, Lond., 1764, 2 vols., in 1787 2 additional vols., 4th ed. by Adam Clarke, LL.D., 1808, 4 vols., with large additions and a life of the author. Mr. Harmer also wrote Outlines of a New Commentary on the Book of Solomon's Song, London, 1768.

HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS. We shall consider in this article the relation of the Gospels to each other, both in point of form and their choice of matter, and whether it is possible to construct a harmony. At the very outset the striking difference between the Gospel of John and the other three Gospels must be noticed, both in respect to the choice of matter (John alone relating the visits of Jesus to the feasts in Jerusalem, and, on the other hand, describing few of the events which happened in Galilee) and in respect to the kind of matter; the discourses of our Lord which John gives having a peculiarly elevated character as compared with those of the other three Gospels. The first three or synoptic Gospels likewise often differ. Mark gives hardly any of our Lord's discourses, and contains an exceedingly small amount of matter not found in Matthew and Luke; while these two Gospels, when compared, are found to have much which is peculiar to each. Matthew gives sixteen miracles, Luke fifteen (eleven being common), and Mark fifteen, twelve of which are found in Matthew, and ten in Luke. Then, again, the consecution of the same discourses and events is different in the three synoptists; and while the descriptions of the same events often present remarkable agreements in language, even to striking and unusual words, they also present disagreements, not only in the language, but also in the matter, so as to sometimes even give the appearance of contradictory statements.

1. Choice and Arrangement of the Matter in the Synoptists.—Even if we had no patristic accounts of their origin, the study of the Gospels would convince us that their authors had not the least intention of giving a complete daily journal of the life of Christ. Of the first half of his public activity they confined themselves to only a few fragments, and by their own confession they passed over a great deal. Thus it appears from Matt. xi. 21 sqq. that Jesus performed many miracles in Chorazin; but the synoptists do not give a single detail of his activity there. Even the Introduction to Luke's Gospel does not militate with this statement; for he might well call his work "systematic and complete" in comparison with the sporadic attempts of other Christians, without its being arranged like a journal, but only giving that which was essential and important in systematic arrangement. But each synoptist had a plan of his own. Matthew wrote for Jews, and sought to prove that Jesus fulfilled the Messianic prophecies concerning the seed of Abraham (Matt. i. 1). Luke, who belonged to the Pauline circle, relates, for the most part, those events in the life of our Lord, and those discourses, which go to confirm the principle that all mankind, so far as it thirsts after salvation, shall participate in the benefits of it. For this reason he presents Christ as the second Adam (comp. Luke iii. 23-28). Mark, on the other hand, as John the Presbyter (Euseb., iii. 39) long ago said, follows no particular plan, but wrote down from memory what Peter related to him from time to time. None of the synoptists, then, follow a chronological arrangement. Luke arranges his Gospel according to the matter (x. 25-xiii., discourses; xiv.-xvii., parables; etc.); and so does Matthew (iii., iv., the beginning of his activity; v.-vii., laws of the kingdom; viii., ix., miracles; ix. 36-xi., the disciples; xiii., xiv., parables; etc.). Notwithstanding this general principle, however, they do often relate events in the order of their occurrence (comp. Matt. ix. 27, 32, xiii. 1, etc.; Mark i. 29, etc.; Luke iv. 38, etc.). The investigation of the extent of the agreements of the synoptists in these cases is one of the tasks of the harmonists.

Such labors were carried on from early times, at first with the purpose of forming a complete narrative of all the events and discourses of our Lord. (See DIATHESSARON.) In modern times they have been conducted for the purpose of constructing a chronology of Christ's life. Prominent amongst the workers in this department [see below] are Gerson (d. 1429), Calvin (d. 1564), Andreas Osiander (d. 1552), Chemnitz (d. 1586), and Bengel (d. 1751). Osiander (Harmonia Evangeliorum, Basel, 1537) is only to be mentioned for the curious circumstance, that, starting from the most irrational theory of inspiration, he adopted the principle that the evangelists, in order not to write that which was false, dared not depart from the chronological arrangement. To carry the principle out, he was obliged often to suppose that the very same event, occurring under the very same circumstances, was repeated two or three times. Peter's wife's mother, for example, was healed three times! Gerson (Concordia evangelistarum sive monotessaron, Col. c. 1471) proceeds on the theory that the synoptists did not intend to follow a chronological order; and so Calvin (Harmonia evangelistis tribus composita, Geneva, 1553), and especially Chemnitz (Harmonia evangelicæ, Frankfurt, 1593 sqq.), who makes such events and discourses to follow each other which are definitely placed in chronological order by the evangelists. It is as clear as sunlight that every healthy attempt in the direction of a harmony must proceed upon this principle. Bengel (Richtige Auffassung der Evangg., Tübingen, 1736) marks no progress; but he rightly recognized that Luke did not mean to follow a chronological arrangement. Wieseler, in his Chronological Synopsis [Hamburg, 1843], started from the principle that Luke follows a chronological order; but the writer of this article, in his Kritik d. evang. Geschichte, returned to the principles of Chemnitz, and believes he has proved that the sequence of single events of one Gospel never contradicts that of another, and that their statements enable us to restore a chronological harmony of the larger part of Christ's public career. The following case, which we choose because it is the most difficult and complicated, will serve as an illustration of our method. In Matt. ix. it is related, that, as Jesus on a certain day sat at meat, the Pharisees asked him why he did not fast. The exact day is not given; but it is definitely stated in ix. 18 that Jairus came to him "while he spake these things;" and in ix. 27, that, as "Jesus passed by from thence," two blind men followed him; and in ix. 32, that, "as they went forth," a dumb man was brought to him. Here the sequence of four events is given. The preceding section definitely gives the sequence of four other events (viii.-ix. 9), — the stilling of the tempest (viii. 23), the healing of the Gadarene (viii. 28), the cure of the paralytic (ix. 1), and the call of Matthew (ix. 9). Again, we have the following sequence: the healing of the blind and dumb man (xii. 22), the charge of collusion with Beelzebub (xii. 38), the announcement of his mother and brethren (xii. 46); and on the same day that these things occurred he spake many parables (xiii. 1). Mark, however, in the most emphatic way says that Jesus spake these parables at the seashore (iv. 1), on the same day stilled the tempest (iv. 35), then healed the Gadarene (v. 1), and, after his return to the western shore, met Jairus (v. 22). Thus the conclusion is forced upon us by Mark that the three groups of events which Matthew places in sections, where they properly belong in point of matter, belong together in point of time. While Jesus was staying at Capernaum, the blind and deaf man is brought, whose cure affords the occasion for the charge of collusion with Beelzebub. During the conversation the Pharisees demand a sign; and, while Jesus is replying, his mother arrives. Towards evening Jesus utters the parables on the seashore; then follows the stilling of the tempest. The following morning the Gadarene was healed. After his return, the question concerning fasting was put; and at the same hour Jairus came. As he left his house, the dumb man is brought, and (perhaps a day or two afterwards) the paralytic is healed. Mark got the events from Peter, an eye-witness of them, and had the sequence impressed upon his memory; but Matthew, who was called after their occurrence, heard them from several of the disciples; and he remembered most distinctly that the healing of Jairus' daughter was a special topic of conversation: hence he put it down immediately after the account of his call.

This example is a crucial test of the Chemnitzian principles; but attempts to find the original place of every sententious utterance of our Lord will fail. A great probability exists that Jesus repeated the same sayings at different times. Matthew has given us an unmistakable illustration of this (vii. 17, xii. 33). He even repeated a parable, but with changes in detail (Luke xix. 12 sqq.; Matt. xxv. 14 sqq.).

2. The Language. — The synoptists in their accounts of the same events often fully agree in the language, and again differ widely in this regard (comp. Matt. ix. 15, Mark ii. 20, Luke v. 35). But the points of agreement are far more numerous than the points of disagreement. According to Norton, one-sixth of Matthew's Gospel is in verbal agreement with the other synoptists, and seven-eighths of this are from discourses; one-sixth of Mark's Gospel agrees with the other synoptists, and nearly four-fifths of this are from the discourses; Luke only agrees to the extent of one-tenth with Matthew and Mark, but more than nineteen-twentieths of it is from the discourses. Various theories have been suggested to account for these agreements and disagreements in language, and they are as follows. (1) A primal or germ gospel (Urevangelium) from which the evangelists drew. It has been defined as an Aramaic Matthew (Corrodi, Schmidt), a "Hebrew Gospel" (Lessing, Niemeyer, Weber), or a record composed by a company of apostles (Eichhorn, Marsh); but all these various forms have been outlived. Holtzmann has advocated the hypothesis of a primal Mark and an original collection of discourses by Matthew; but that the logia (discourses), which Papias attributes to Matthew, included other matter, even Strauss granted. (2) The theory that one evangelist used the other, there being one original one. But it is comical to observe that each of the possible combinations has its zealous defenders. But why should men who had the best opportunities of getting details from the very eye-witnesses of Christ use each other's works? The theory, on the other hand, begets many difficulties, as, for example, Why did the evangelist who used his predecessor omit so much of his matter, alter the language of the Lord's discourses (often quoting half a verse word for word, and then suddenly breaking off), and alter the chronological sequences? (3) The evangelists drew from a common tradition. This is the theory of Gieseler (Hist.-krit. Versuch ti. d. Entstehung d. schriftl. Evangelien, Leipzig, 1818), and the only tenable one. In the repeated narration of the events of Christ's life, certain points were always emphasized, and these the evangelists have in common; the very expressions being impressed upon the memories of the hearers. But the individuality of the writers also asserted itself.

3. John's Gospel (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF) was written (96) at a time when the altered circumstances of the Church, and the first indications of Gnosticism, made a new point of view necessary. For this reason he supplemented the accounts of the synoptists both in respect to the outward details of Christ's life and his personality (in opposition to the false Gnosis).

This Gospel differs largely from the others, but not to the prejudice of the harmony. The more elevated style of the Lord's discourses which it records has furnished a difficulty to some; but as they "shine with a more than earthly glow and brilliancy" (as De Wette himself acknowledges), as it is improbable that the disciple should have surpassed the Master, and as the synoptists here and there rise to the same strain (Matt. xi. 25-30, xiii. 16, 17, etc.; Luke x. 21-23), the difficulty completely disappears for those who have an ear for the light-born excellency of Christ's words. The only real difficulty which John's Gospel offers to the harmonist is the date of the Last Supper. The discussion over this extremely complicated and prickly question is not yet closed. The apparent contradictions in the accounts of the resurrection are easily solved; John narrating what Mary Magdalene saw, the synoptists combining in one account her experiences and those of the other women. Mark indicates a difference between the two (xvi. 8, 9). EBRARD.

[Continuous narratives of the life of Christ, combining details of all the evangelists, are called in another and special sense Harmonies. The Diatessaron of Tatian, the apovvia of Ammonius, the German Heliand, and Otfried's Harmony, are the most important examples of these. For accounts of them see DIATESSARON, AMMONIUS, HELIAND, etc. Harmonies in addition to those mentioned in the body of the article have been published by STEPHENS (Paris, 1553), G. CALIXTUS (Halberst., 1624), T. CARTWRIGHT (Amst., 1627, 1647), LIGHTFOOT (Lond., 1644, and in English, Lond., 1655), CLERICUS (Amst., 1699), MACKNIGHT (Lond., 1756, and often), J. PRIESTLEY (in English, Lond., 1777), NEWCOME (Dublin, 1778, ed. by Dr. ROBINSON, Andover, 1814, 1834), TOWNSEND (Lond., 1825, Bost., 1837), ROBINSON (Bost., 1845, revised edition, 1851, and often), STROUD (Lond., 1853), STRONG (N.Y., 1854), GRESWELL (Oxon., 5th ed., 1856), GARDINER (Andover, 1876); Harmonies of the Synoptists by PLANCK (Götting., 1809), DE WETTE and LÜCKE (Berol., 1818, 1842), RÆDIGER (Halle, 1829, 1839), ANGER (Leip., 1852). HARMS, Claus, a powerful champion of the religion of faith in a rationalistic age; b. at Fahrstedt, Schleswig-Holstein, May 25, 1778; d. in Kiel, Feb. 1, 1855. Prevented, at first, by lack of means from securing a higher education, he labored in his father's mill until he was nineteen. After his father's death he entered a classical school, and subsequently passed into the university of Kiel. The teaching at the university was predominantly rationalistic; but, influenced thereto largely by the perusal of Schleiermacher's Discourses on Religion, Harms turned away from rationalism as vanity, and gave himself up to faith in Christ as the only hope of the sinner. In 1806 he became assistant pastor in Lunden, and in 1816 was transferred to Kiel, where he remained during the rest of his life, in spite of calls, as Schleiermacher's successor, to Trinity Church, Berlin, in 1834, and to other places. He was obliged in 1849 to give up his positions on account of blindness. In 1878 the hundredth anniversary of his birth was celebrated in Kiel, and a tablet placed on the house which he had occupied.

Harms exercised a very decided influence upon the religious faith of his day by his bold denunciation of rationalism. As a preacher he was much sought after, the university students flocking to hear him. After Twesten's advent in Kiel as professor, it was said, "Twesten converts his hearers, and Harms baptizes them." He was a man of the people, and his style was no less popular than it was fresh and trenchant. In 1817, at the three hundredth anniversary of the Reformation, Harms took occasion to speak out his mind against rationalism, and did it by publishing, side by side with Luther's theses, ninety-five of his own. He utters bold words against reason, which he calls the "pope of our time," and the religion of reason, which has "run mad in the Lutheran Church, dismisses Christ from the altar, throws God's Word from the pulpit, creates God, whereas God used to be regarded as having created man," etc. These theses went through Germany like a tempest. Rationalists railed against the author; and, as Von Ammon has said, they were indeed a bitter medicine for the then prevailing weakness of faith. They went, however, with his writings in their defence, with healing and converting power to homes throughout the entire land. Harms also wrote hymns, some of which have passed into German hymn-books.

LIT. — Among his volumes of sermons are Winterpostille, 1808; Sommerpost., 1811, 6th ed. of both, Leipzig, 1846; Neue Winterpost., 1824; Neue Sommerpost., 1827; D. heil. Passion, 1857; D. Vater Unser, 1838; Bergpredigt, 1841; D. Bibel., 1842; D. Offenb. Johanns, 1844; Trostpredigten, 1852. He also wrote a Life of Henrik von Züphen den Bloottigen für unsern Globen (1817), in Low-German, and Pastoraltheologie (Kiel, 1830, 3d ed., 1878), a book which ought to be on every pastor's table. See Autobiography, 2d ed., Kiel, 1852; Dr. M. BAUMGARTEN: Ein Denkmal f. C. Harms, Braunsch., 1855 [and memorials by G. BACHMANN, LÜDEMANN, and NEELSEN, all Kiel, 1878, and the volume Die Gedächtnissfeier für Claus Harms an seinem hundertsten Geburtstag, Kiel, 1878].

HARMS, Georg Ludwig Detlev Theodor (commonly known as LUDWIG HARMS), a most original and successful German Lutheran pastor; b. May 5, 1808, in Walsrode, Lüneburg; d. at Hermannsburg, Nov. 14, 1865. After studying at the university of Göttingen, and spending several years as private tutor, he became in 1844 his father's assistant as pastor of the church at Hermannsburg, a town of thirty-five hundred inhabitants, near Hanover. His father belonged to the rationalistic school, but was a man of strong and robust character. Ludwig, on the other hand, had undergone a thorough conversion at the university. He labored at Hermannsburg as few have done, not only in the pulpit, the services filling up the entire Sabbath, but as a pastor among the people. His popular and winning manners, his sympathy with the poor and the sorrowing, secured for him the love of all. On Sunday afternoons he held a catechetical class, which lasted three hours, and was attended by a thousand people. These labors led to a religious awakening such as North Germany had never witnessed before. Harms's chief source of power was his sermons. He understood as few, if any, since Luther have understood, how to preach to the people. His manner was, before every thing else, popular. His sermons were simple; his thoughts expressed in terse language and concretely. He followed out the advice which he gave to a brother minister in these words: "Call every thing by its right name, so that others may grasp with their hands what you mean, and present truth as concretely as possible, so that it may not pass away over people's heads." [Professor Park, in a very interesting article on Harms, in The Congregationalist (Feb. 23, 1866), says in this connection, "He preferred the concrete to the abstract, did not speak of holiness so often as of God, nor of sin so often as the devil. He was terrific in his denunciations of popular sins, and exhibited the tenderest concern for his people," etc.] Harms drew his sermons from every-day life, and preached to life. The interest of his immediate hearers, the Lüneburg peasants, was to him matter of supreme concern. He spoke their dialect. His themes were the necessity of a thorough conversion, justification by faith, and the evidence of faith in a consistent life. He denounced sin unsparingly, so that there was no back-door left for the sinner, and in vivid realness painted the condemnation of the ungodly and the blessedness of the believer. He dealt not in general delineations and exhortations, but pictured before his hearers each specific step and duty.

But in the mere gifts of body Harms was sadly lacking. His voice was shrill, his manner in the pulpit somewhat stiff; and his bodily strength, which was never great, in his last years seemed hardly sufficient to carry him through a sermon. But with all these defects he riveted the attention of his hearers, and gave the impression of absolute sincerity.

Under these labors the life of the community underwent a radical change. Sunday was strictly observed, and family prayer regularly maintained. Swearing and excessive drinking were given up. No beggar was known in the place; and the yearly contributions of the church to benevolent objects were very large, amounting in 1854 to twenty-four thousand marks for missions alone. [Professor Park relates the following incident: "I met a carpenter going to his day-labor. 'How do you do?' I asked. 'I cannot but be well,' he replied, 'having so many religious privileges as I enjoy here,'" etc.]

But these were not the extent of Harms's enterprises. After his father's death (in 1849), he organized a seminary for the training of missionaries, and was led to it by the frequent applications by young people who wished to become missionaries. This institution was very successful, and, besides sending out missionaries to different parts of the world, colonized the town of Hermannsburg in Africa. [The funds for erecting the buildings, as well as the funds for other enterprises, were regarded by Harms as direct answers to prayer. In 1854 he established a missionary journal, which became very popular in Germany. As characteristic of his independence, Professor Park relates the following incident: "On one occasion, when Harms was in Hannover, the king despatched one of his officers with the state carriage to bring him to the palace. 'Give my regards to the king,' said Harms, 'and say that I would obey his order if my duty allowed; but I must go home and attend to my parish.'"]

Harms published a number of volumes of sermons, which are among the most widely circulated in Germany. Among these are Evangelienpredigten, Hermannsburg, 8th ed., 1877; Epistelpredigten, 2d ed., 1872; Ausleg., d. Psalmen, 2d ed., 1870. See his Life by his brother, THEODORE HARMS, Hermannsburg, 4th ed., 1874 [and his Briefe, edited by the same, Hermannsb., 1879]. UHLHORN.

HARRIS, Howel, a Welsh revivalist; b. at Trevecca, 1714; d. there July 21, 1773. He was "the first lay preacher in the great Methodist movement."—a year and a half ahead of Whitefield and Wesley. He had to encounter great opposition, but persevered. With the Wesleys he held life-long intimacy. He was a layman, and all his repeated efforts to obtain ordination were vain. His success in preaching was wonderful. See Tyerman's Wesley.

HARRIS, John, independent minister; b. at Ugborough, Devonshire, March 8, 1802; became principal and professor of theology, New College, Cheshunt, 1850; d. there Dec. 21, 1858. He was the author of the widely circulated and able prize essays, Mammon (1836), of which more than a hundred thousand copies have been sold, and The Great Commission (1842); also of The Great Teacher (1835), The Pre-Adamite Earth (1847), Man Primæval (1849).

HARRIS, Samuel, the "Apostle of Virginia;" b. in Hanover County, Jan. 12, 1724; date of his death is uncertain. For many years he was a soldier; but after his conversion (in 1758) he devoted more and more time and strength to religious duties, until in 1769 he was ordained, and then left all secular occupations. In 1774 the General Association of Separate Baptists chose him "apostle," and ordained him by the laying-on of the hands of every minister in that body. He was much persecuted.

HARVARD, John. See HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY. 1. Constitution.—At present Harvard University comprehends the following departments: Harvard College, the Divinity School, the Law School, the Medical School, the Dental School, the Lawrence Scientific School, the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy, the Bussey Institution (a school of agriculture), the College Library, and the Astronomical Observatory. The Peabody Museum of American Archaeology and Ethnology is a constituent part of the university; but its relations to the university are affected by peculiar provisions. The university has grown out of Harvard College, which was founded in 1636 (six years after the settlement of Boston, and sixteen after the landing of the Pilgrims), by a vote of the General Court of Massachusetts, which appropriated "towards a school or college" the sum of four hundred pounds, "equal to a year's rate of the whole Colony." The next year the General Court fixed the site of the college at Newton (lying across the Charles River from Boston), the name of which place was changed to Cambridge in commemoration of the English university, where many of the first emigrants received their literary training; and in 1638 the college took its present name from John Harvard (who was born in England, graduated at Cambridge University, and died in Charlestown, Mass., Sept. 24, 1638), a clergyman of Charlestown, who left it a large bequest in money (about eight hundred pounds) and books (about two hundred and sixty volumes). The same year the first class was formed under two instructors. In 1640 the proper career of the college began, with the appointment of a president (Rev. Henry Dunster); and in 1642 the General Court established the Board of Overseers, composed of the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Colony, the magistrates of the jurisdiction, and the teaching elders of Cambridge and the adjoining towns, with full governmental powers over the college. This body being found to be unwieldy, the charter of 1650 assigned the control of the college (disposition of money and other property, election of officers, and establishment of laws and rules) to a self-perpetuating "corporation," consisting of the president, five fellows, and a treasurer, to be responsible to the overseers. The charter of 1650 was re-affirmed by the Massachusetts State Legislature, and made a part of the State Constitution in 1780, and remains in force at the present day (1882); and the corporation, whose legal style is "The President and Fellows of Harvard College," is the governing power of the whole university, and not of the college alone. The overseers (thirty in number), who exercise a general supervision over the acts of the corporation, are now elected, without restriction of place, profession, or creed, by those persons who have received from the college a degree of bachelor of arts, or master of arts, or any honorary degree. In each department of the university the internal affairs (discipline, studies, degrees) are administered by the faculty of the department (consisting of all its instructors, at whose head is a dean, or director). The control of general university matters, particularly of the degrees of master of arts and doctor of philosophy, is in the hands of the Academic Council, composed of all the professors and assistant professors of the university. The only honorary degrees conferred are doctor of divinity, and doctor of laws. The conferring power in all cases is the corporation, with the consent of the overseers. Officers of instruction are of various classes,—professors, appointed by corporation and overseers, for life; assistant professors, instructors, tutors, appointed for definite periods; instructors and lecturers, appointed annually; and demonstrators and assistants, appointed by the corporation for various terms. During the two first periods of its existence—the colonial (1636-92) and the provincial (1692-1780)—the college was under the control of the State, and so remained to some extent after the Revolution, up to 1865, when the last bonds of union were severed; and the university is now absolutely independent of the State. Among the eminent men who have been instructors in Harvard may be mentioned John Winthrop, John Quincy Adams, Henry Ware, Andrews Norton, J. G. Palfrey, James Walker, E. T. Channing, Jared Sparks, Joseph Story, Simon Greenleaf, Theophilus Parsons, Edward Everett, George Ticknor, H. W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Benjamin Peirce, Jacob Bigelow, J. T. Cogswell, Louis Agassiz, Jeffries Wyman, Asa Gray, John C. Warren, James Jackson, Benjamin Waterhouse, C. C. Felton, and W. C. Bond.

2. Instruction.—Beginning as a seminary for preachers, with a limited academical course, Harvard has become a university, in which all branches of science are represented, and the libertas docendi exists in its fullest extent. During its first century the instruction was given by the president and several tutors. The first professorship (one of divinity) was established by Thomas Hollis, an English Baptist layman, in 1721, who also endowed the second chair (of mathematics and natural philosophy) in 1726; and in 1764 was created the first professorship endowed by a native New-Englander, — that of Hebrew and other Oriental languages, by Thomas Hancock. The college now advanced rapidly to university proportions. The Medical School was begun in 1783, the Botanic Garden in 1805, the Divinity School in 1815, the Law School in 1817, the Astronomical Observatory in 1846, the Agassiz Museum of Comparative Zoology in 1859, the Peabody Museum in 1866, the Dental School in 1868, and the Bussey Institution in 1871 (to which was added in 1872 the Arnold Arboretum, for the open-air culture of trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants). During the past thirteen years (administration of President C. W. Eliot) there has been a marked expansion in the instruction, both in the teaching force and in the general apparatus (buildings, etc.). The course for the degree of bachelor of arts extends over four years, in the first of which the studies are prescribed; in the others, elective. In the three upper classes (in which about a hundred and seventy courses are offered by over fifty instructors) the student may select for his degree any studies in which the class-instruction amounts on an average to not less than twelve hours a week. The elective system, with its specializing tendencies, has grown steadily in favor; and prescribed studies seem likely soon to disappear altogether. Here, as in the discipline, the theory of the college is that the largest possible liberty is to be given to the student, and the appeal made to his sense of responsibility. In the professional schools the courses for degrees are fixed. In all departments, except the Medical School, special students not candidates for degrees are admitted without examination, may take such studies as they choose, receive certificates for what work they do, and are subject to the same regulations as regular students.

3. Religious Character. — The university is now wholly unsectarian. Sectarian control of its general government had practically ceased by the middle of the last century. In the movement which divided the Congregationalists of Massachusetts at the beginning of the present century, the greater part of the prominent friends of Harvard sided with the Unitarians, and the college was popularly identified with that body. But, if any sectarian coloring then attached to the direction of the academic instruction, it has now entirely disappeared. Officers of instruction and government are chosen without regard to their religious creeds. The Sunday services and morning prayers in the college chapel are this year (1882) conducted by different clergymen, belonging to various ecclesiastical communions. The students are distributed among a number of religious bodies. According to the latest calculation the Episcopalians come first in point of numbers, next the Unitarians, then the Congregationalists, Baptists, and several others. In the Divinity School the chairs were, up to a year or two ago, all filled by Unitarians; but since that time, men belonging to other bodies have been elected to professorships. A series of lectures on theology has been delivered by a Trinitarian cler-gyman, and it is announced, that, so soon as the funds permit, a Trinitarian professor of dogmatic theology is to be appointed. The theological professors sign no articles, and are under no doctrinal restraint in respect to creed or instruction. The college has retained up to this time the old system of official religious exercises. All students are required to attend morning prayers, and all but members of the senior class to attend one service Sunday (the place being selected by them). A strong party in the faculty favor the abrogation of this enforced attendance on religious exercises, on the ground that it is not promotive of, but unfavorable to, the growth of religious life. They would have services maintained, if necessary, by the college, but better by voluntary subscriptions of persons interested, and attendance voluntary. Among the students several private organizations devoted to the cultivation of piety are maintained. As might be supposed in so large a body of men, there exists a great variety of philosophical and religious opinions among the instructors. The perfect liberty of thought and utterance that prevails secures a hearing for all sides, and the university cannot be put into any one category or school of thought: it may be said to represent all the philosophical and religious tendencies of the times. In the department of theology and biblical criticism, the publications of instructors have generally been marked by a conservative tone; as, for example, the works of Professors Norton, Hedge, and Abbot; and the same thing may be said of the department of philosophy (publications of Professors Walker, Bowen, and James).

4. Funds and Collections. — The invested funds of the university amount to about four million dollars, and the property in lands, houses, etc., not paying interest, to about two million. The number of books in all the libraries of the university is over two hundred and fifty thousand, and there is about an equal number of pamphlets. The Museum of Comparative Zoology is reckoned among the greatest natural-history collections of the world: it is especially rich in insects. The botanical collection ranks high in some departments, especially the compositæ. The Museum of American Archæology, though young, has a respectable collection of antiquities, and other departments are similarly well represented. The number of instructors in the university is over a hundred and fifty; the number of students, over thirteen hundred and fifty.

HARVEST AMONG THE HEBREWS. The season of gathering grain or fruits generally commenced about the middle of April (John iv. 35). In some parts, as in Jericho, it commenced a little earlier. On the second day of the Passover feast (i. e., on the sixteenth day of the first month, Abid, or Nisan) a sheaf of the first-fruits was brought unto the priest (Lev. xxiii. 10); and thus the harvest season was inaugurated. The beginning was made with barley and with the Passover festival (Lev. xxiii. 9-14; 2 Sam. xxi. 9; Ruth i. 22), and with the wheat and the Feast of Ingathering (Exod. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22) it was concluded. The reapers were mostly hired men, over whom a servant was set (Ruth ii. 5). The maidens generally put the sheaves in bundles; but the owner, together with his children, assisted the reapers, especially in carrying away the sheaves (Gen. xxxvii. 7). The passers-by saluted the reapers (Ruth ii. 4). Refreshments, especially drink, were provided for the reapers (Ruth ii. 9). The harvest was a season of great rejoicing, especially when the crops had been plentiful (Isa. ix. 3; Ps. cxxvi. 6). The corners of the field were not reaped, but left to the poor; and so also any sheaf that was forgotten in the field belonged to the poor and the stranger (Lev. xix. 9, xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 19).

RÜETSCHI.

HASENKAMP is the name of three brothers, who, belonging to the same circle as Lavater, Jung-Stilling, Tersteegen, and Kollenbusch, spoke with great energy and impressiveness for the idea of a divine revelation, and against the flat rationalism prevailing in Germany during the latter half of the eighteenth century. — Johann Gerhard, b. July 12, 1736; d. June 10, 1777; was appointed rector at Duisburg in 1766, but was several times, both before and after his appointment, forbidden to preach on account of the mental excitement under which he suffered. His Life, begun by himself and finished by his son, is an interesting and instructive book, and gives the list of his works, mostly of a polemical and apologetical description. — Friedrich Arnold, b. Jan. 11, 1747; d. 1795; succeeded his brother as rector of Duisburg, and wrote Ueber die verdunkelnde Aufklärung, 1789, Briefe über wichtige Wahrheiten der Religion, 1794, 2 vols., etc. — Johann Heinrich, b. Sept. 19, 1750; d. June 17, 1814; was pastor of Dahle, near Altona, from 1779. His Christl. Schriften, 3 vols., were published after his death by his nephew.

HASSE, Friedrich Rudolf, b. at Dresden, June 29, 1808; d. at Bonn, Oct. 14, 1862. He studied at Leipzig and Berlin; was successively privat-docent at the latter university (1834), professor extraordinary of church history at Griefswald (1836) and then at Bonn (1841), and professor ordinary (1843). His fame rests upon his masterpiece, Anselm von Canterbury, Leipzig, 1843, 1852, 2 vols. He began his studies upon Anselm as early as 1832, when he chose him as the subject of his dissertation. Up to that time the scholastic period of church history had been very little studied. Hasse developed extraordinary gifts in exploring it. His dissertation was upon the Anselmic conception of the divine image, and proved the presence of a master historian. This impression was confirmed by his lectures on church history. In Bonn he completed (1843) the first volume of his monograph upon Anselm of Canterbury, containing the life. This was the fruit of the most thorough work, and answers every demand of a monograph; for Anselm stands forth in all his individuality, and at the same time in his relation to the movements of his age. In 1852 Hasse issued his second volume, the theology of Anselm, presented in a form at once complete, objective, and clear. One is able to follow the development of the theology step by step to its rounded whole.

Hasse possessed great ability as a teacher, and was held in high esteem for his solidity of character, his childlike piety, and his great modesty, which led him not only to think little of himself, but to rejoice in the success of others. He took an intelligent interest in church matters, and especially in foreign missions. Besides his masterpiece, Anselm von Canterbury, he is the author of two posthumous volumes of lectures, Geschichte des alten Bundes, Leipzig, 1863, and Kirchengeschichte, Leipzig, 1864, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1872. See W. KRAFFT: Dr. F. R. Hasse, eine Lebensskizze, Bonn, 1865.

W. KRAFFT.

HATTEMISTS, a Dutch sect founded by Pontianus van Hattem, who was pastor in Zealand, but was deposed in 1683. He was a disciple of Spinoza; and his doctrines rest on a mystical pantheism, in which the moral distinction between good and bad disappears. The sect was never of great consequence, and soon vanished.

HATTO, Bishop of Basel; b. in 763; was educated in the monastery of Reichenau; became director of its school, and abbot, 806; was made Bishop of Basel in 807, by Charlemagne, and in 811 sent as ambassador to the Emperor Nicephorus; resigned his position as abbot and bishop in 823, and died as simple monk in Reichenau 836. Two works by him have come down to us, — Visio Wettini, a description of a walk through heaven, hell, and purgatory, which made a deep impression on his contemporaries, and was put into Latin verses by Walafrid Strabo; and Capitulare Hattonis, twenty-five statutes which he issued as bishop. Both works are found in MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., vol. 105.

WAGENMANN.

HATTO, Archbishop of Mayence; b. in the middle of the ninth century, probably in Suabia; d. May 15, 913; was educated at Ellwangen, or Fulda; became Abbot of Reichenau 888, and of Ellwangen 889, and Archbishop of Mayence 891. Twice he accompanied King Arnulph to Italy (894 and 896), and received the pallium from Pope Formosus. After the death of Arnulph, during the reign of Louis the Child (900–911), he and his friend, Bishop Adalbero of Augsburg, the tutor of the young king, actually governed the realm; and his influence did not essentially decrease when Conrad I. ascended the throne. As in that period the unity of the German Empire mainly rested on the Christian episcopacy, in which the kings found their best support against their vassals' revolts, and attempts of independence, it is quite natural that so powerful a representative of this tendency as Hatto should be very variously judged by his contemporaries; and, indeed, while some extolled him as a prudent and patriotic statesman, others told how Satan himself came to fetch him, and threw him down into the crater of Ætna. See J. FR. BÖHMER: Regesta archiepiscoporum Maguntinensium, edited by C. Will, Innsbruck, 1877.

HAUG, Martin, famous Orientalist; b. at Ost-dorf in Württemberg, Jan. 30, 1827; d. at Ragatz, Switzerland, June 3, 1876. He studied at Tübingen, Göttingen, and Bonn, for three years (1856–59); assisted Bunsen on his Bibelwerk; was professor of Sanscrit in Poona college (1859–63); made a successful journey under British appointment through the province of Guzerat, for the purpose of collecting manuscripts of Zend and Sanscrit; returned to Germany in 1866; and from 1868 till his death he was professor of Sanscrit and comparative grammar at the university of Munich. His large collection of Zend, Hebrew, Sanscrit, and Persian manuscripts, was purchased by the Bavarian Government, and is in the Royal Library at Munich. His best known work is Essays on the Sacred Language of the Parsees, Bombay, 1862, 2d ed., revised and enlarged, London, 1878.

HAUGE, Hans Nielsen, a powerful lay preacher and revivalist in Norway; was b. on the Hauge farm, in the county of Smaalenene, April 3, 1771; and d. on the Bredtvedt farm, in Aker County, March 29, 1824. He received only the common peasant education, but he was from early youth a zealous student of the Bible. In 1796 he began his missionary work, walking from place to place, and often preaching twice or thrice a day. He made a deep impression; but as he spoke rather slightly of ordination, creed, etc., he stirred up the hatred of the rationalistic clergy, and in 1804 he was arrested. He was kept in prison till 1811; and in 1814 he was finally sentenced to two years' hard labor for having held conventicles, and spoken disrespectfully of the Established Church. His followers, very numerous, spread over the whole country, and known under the name of "Haugians," or "Readers," did not separate from the State Church: they simply kept aloof until finally the rationalistic ice itself began to thaw. HAUSMANN, Nicolaus, one of Luther's dearest friends; b. at Freiburg, 1479; d. there 1538. He introduced the Reformation into Zwickau (1521), and subsequently into the duchy of Anhalt (1532). Luther heard of his death on Nov. 6, 1538, and lamented him greatly. He praised him for his exemplary piety, which did so much to commend the Reformation. "What we teach, he lives," he said of him. See O. G. SCHMIDT: Nicolaus Hausmann, der Freund Luthers, Leipzig, 1860.

HAVELOCK, Henry, Sir, a distinguished English general and Christian layman; b. April 5, 1795, at Bishop-Wearmouth, Sunderland, where his father was a rich ship-builder; d. Nov. 25, 1857, at Lucknow, India. He studied law under Chitty, but, preferring a soldier's life, entered the army as second lieutenant (1815), and after eight years of service in Great Britain went to India in 1823. In 1829 he married the daughter of the eminent missionary, Dr. Marshman, and soon after united with the Baptist denomination. He proved himself a brave commander, and gradually rose in command. He served with honor in the Afghan war (1840-42), the record of which he preserved in the Memoirs of the Afghan Campaign, the Sikh Campaign, etc., and was made adjutant-general in 1854. In the Sepoy rebellion (1857) he commanded a column, and won a series of brilliant victories. He equally showed his military skill by moderation and prudence. Gen. Outram, his superior in command, arriving before Lucknow was taken, chivalrously left to Havelock the supreme command. Lucknow was taken by a daring and gallant assault; but the victor, known subsequently as the "hero of Lucknow," died three days afterwards, of dysentery brought on by the excessive exertions of the campaign. He was created major-general and baronet by Parliament, and a pension settled on him of a thousand pounds; but the news did not reach India till after his death. Havelock stands out in the annals of the modern English army, as Commodore Goodenough does in those of the navy, as one of the finest specimens of a Christian soldier. He was scrupulous about his conduct, and practised two hours of devotion every morning, whether in the camp or on a campaign. His exemplary Christian character is the best illustration that Christian devotion is not incompatible with warlike bravery. See MARSHMAN (his father-in-law): Memoirs of Sir Henry Havelock, London, 1868.

HAVEN, Erastus Otis, D.D., LL.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1820; d. at Salem, Oregon, Tuesday, Aug. 2, 1881. He was graduated at the Wesleyan University 1842; took up the profession of teaching; was ordained 1848, and, after holding various positions, was professor in the University of Michigan 1853-56; editor of Zion's Herald, Boston, 1856-63; president of the University of Michigan 1863-69, of the North-western University, Evanston, Ill., 1869-72; corresponding secretary of the board of education of the Methodist-Episcopal Church 1872-74; chancellor of the Syracuse University 1874; elected bishop 1880. His best known publication is Rhetoric for Schools, Colleges, and Private Study, New York, 1869.

HAVEN, Gilbert, D.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. near Boston, Sept. 19, 1821; d. at Malden, Mass., Jan. 8, 1880. After graduation at the Wesleyan University (1846), he taught for several years. In 1851 he joined the New-England Conference of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. In 1861 he was appointed chaplain of the Eighth Massachusetts Regiment, the first commissioned chaplain after the breaking-out of hostilities; but he only was one year in service. He was editor of Zion's Herald 1867-72, when he was elected bishop. He was a vigorous advocate of the cause of the colored people, and also of Protestantism. He was quite an extensive traveler; and his journey to Mexico he recorded in an interesting volume, Our Next-Door Neighbor; recent Sketches of Mexico, N.Y., 1874.

HAVERGAL, Frances Ridley, a beloved and gifted religious writer; b. at Astley, Worcestershire, Eng., Dec. 14, 1836; d. at Caswell Bay, Swansea, South Wales, June 3, 1879. She was the daughter of a clergyman of the Church of England, and was carefully educated. Her own love of study led her to take up unusual lines; and so she acquired some acquaintance with Greek and Hebrew, in order that she might read the Bible in the original. She was a devoted Christian woman, neglecting no opportunity to speak for the Saviour. She issued many volumes of prose and poetry, which have been blessed to many hearts. Of these perhaps the best known are the three collections of her poetry under the titles, Ministry of Song, Under the Surface, and Under His Shadow; and in prose Morning Bells and Little Pillows (devotions for children, published 1874), My King (1877), Kept for the Master's Use (1879), and Swiss Letters (1882). See her interesting Memorials, by her sister, London and New York, 1880.

HAVERNICK, Heinrich Andreas Christoph, b. at Kroplin, Mecklenburg, Germany, 1805; d. at Neu-Strelitz, 1846; a learned member of the school of Hengstenberg, and author of commentaries upon Daniel (Hamb., 1832) and upon Ezekiel (Erlangen, 1843), Handbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Erlangen, Parts I. u. II., 1836-39; 2d ed. of Part I. by Keil, Frankfurt, 1854-56; Part III. edited by Keil, 1849. HAWES, Joel, D.D., b. Medway, Mass., Dec. 22, 1789; d. at Gilead, Conn., June 5, 1867. He was graduated from Brown University 1813; studied at Andover; and from 1818 till his death was pastor of the First Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn. He wrote several religious works, of which the best known is Lectures to Young Men on the Formation of Character, Hartford, 1828; repeatedly reprinted, and widely circulated, in the United States and Great Britain.

HAWKER, Robert, D.D., an "evangelical;" b. at Exeter, Eng., 1753; educated at Oxford; vicar of Charles-the-Martyr in Plymouth for fifty years; d. in that town April 6, 1827. He was a popular divine, and author of The Poor Man's Commentary, covering the entire Bible (London, 1816-22, 10 vols.), and The Poor Man's Morning and Evening Portion, which passed through many editions. An edition of his Works, mostly sermons, exclusive of his Commentary, appeared in 10 vols., London, 1831. Rev. Dr. John Williams prefaced the edition by a brief memoir.

HAWKER, Robert Stephen, the grandson of the preceding; b. at Stoke Damerel, Eng., Dec. 3, 1804; d. at Plymouth, Monday, Aug. 16, 1875. After education at Oxford, in 1834 he was presented by the Bishop of Exeter to the vicarage of Morwenstow, on the north-west coast of Cornwall, in "a wild district, which with its ecclesiastical remains, its traditions, its scanty untaught peasantry, and its wreckers, was well adapted to the independent, eccentric, and mystical character of Mr. Hawker." He was passionately fond of animals, and numerous stories are told of his strange doings with them, — how he had a pet pig which accompanied him on his walks; how he conducted service while his nine cats careered about the chancel; how he drove his cows on the cliffs, etc. As a poet he is likely to have a place in English literature. The best known of his collections of poetry are Ecclesia (1841), Quest of the Sangreal (1864), Cornish Ballads (1869). He had a stroke of paralysis, Aug. 9, 1875; and, while thus incapacitated for mental action, he was received, apparently without any conscious personal co-operation, into the Church of Rome. His biography was written by Rev. S. Baring-Gould (London, 1876, American reprint, N.Y., 3d ed., 1882), and also by Rev. F. G. Lee, D.C.L. (London, 1876).

HAWKS, Francis Lister, D.D., LL.D., b. at Newbern, N.C., June 10, 1798; d. in New-York City, Sept. 26, 1866. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina 1815; practised law for a while with great success, but in 1827 entered the ministry of the Protestant-Episcopal Church; served churches in New Haven, Philadelphia, New York (1831-43, 1849-62, 1865-66), and New Orleans (1844-49). In 1835 he was appointed historiographer of his denomination, and prepared Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of the United States (embracing Virginia and Maryland), New York, 1836-39; Documentary History of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in Connecticut, New York, 1863, 1864, 2 vols. He was a brilliant and impressive pulpit orator, and was three times elected to the episcopate, first as missionary bishop of the South-West (1835), then as bishop of Mississippi (1844), and finally as bishop of Rhode Island (1852). But he declined these positions.

HAWLEY, Gideon, missionary to the Indians; b. at Stratford (now Bridgeport), Conn., Nov. 5, 1727; d. in Mashpee, Mass., Oct. 3, 1807. He was graduated at Yale College (1749), and conducted missions among the Mohawk, Oneida, Tuscarora, and Iroquois. He had great influence among these tribes.

HAYDN, Joseph, b. at Rohran, on the frontier between Austria and Hungary, March 31, 1732; d. in Vienna, May 31, 1809; received his musical education at Haimburg and Vienna, and was in 1760 appointed chapel-master to Prince Esterhazy. He twice visited London (1790-92 and 1794, 1795); and the result of these visits to the land of Handel was his grand oratorio, The Creation (1790). In the history of music, however, it is his hundred and eighteen symphonies to which he owes his fame.

HAZ' AEL (חֲזַאֵל, חֲזַאֵל, "God has seen"), king, for at least forty-five years, of Damascene Syria in the first half of the ninth century B.C. Sent by King Benhadad to consult Elisha concerning his cure from sickness, he received the announcement from the prophet of the king's death, and his own elevation to the throne. The day after his return, Benhadad died a violent death (perhaps drowned in his bath), and, as it would seem, by Hazael's hand (though Ewald calls this in question). Joram, king of Israel, and Ahaziah of Judah, leagued themselves against him, but were defeated (2 Kings viii. 28, ix. 15); and from Jehu, Joram's murderer and successor, Hazael took all his trans-Jordanic provinces, and treated the inhabitants with ferocious cruelty (Amos i. 3 sqq.); nor did he spare Judah, and was only diverted from marching against Jerusalem by a handsome tribute (2 Kings xii. 18). Hazael is mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions as having been twice attacked by Shalmaneser II. See the Bible Dicts. of WINER, RIEHM [and SMITH], and EWALD'S Hist. of Israel (iii.). HEAVEN is (1) the upper part of the created world, which is mentioned before the earth, on account of its being nobler and more capacious than it (Gen. i. 1). The name is of divine origin, and designates the firmament which God set between the upper and the lower waters; that is, the space which extends above the earth (Gen. i. 6-8). It has been supposed by Delitzsch (Com. on Genesis) that the stars of the fourth day of creation were developed out of the upper waters, just as the solid earth was developed out of the lower waters; and the facts of astronomy seem to favor this view, the density of Jupiter being no greater than that of water, and the density of Saturn being only half as great. But it is opposed by other representations (Gen. vii. 11; Ps. cxlviii. 4), according to which the "waters" still continue to exist above the heavens. We are not, therefore, surprised to be told, that, like the earth, so the created heavens will pass away (Matt. xxiv. 29, 35; Mark xiii. 25, 31; 2 Pet. iii. 10).

(2) Heaven also designates the place where God specially manifests his glory. It is his throne (Isa. lxvi. 1). "The heaven of heavens is the Lord's: the earth he has given to the children of men" (Ps. cxv. 16). After the flood, sacrifices ascended to it (Gen. viii. 20). Heaven is in this case supermundane, as well as superterrene, distinct from the earth, and high above all created objects. God has revealed himself from heaven, since the time of Noah, through a covenant of grace, whose ultimate aim is the union of heaven and earth. In time the Hebrew nation was chosen as the representative of God's kingdom on the earth, and the temple erected at Jerusalem which contained the mercy-seat, where the invisible God was always present. But these were only shadows of good things to come (1 Heb. x. 1). When the fulness of time was come, God revealed himself in Christ, who descended from heaven (John iii. 13), and announced the establishment of the kingdom of heaven amongst men. He made repentance the condition of membership in it, and taught men to pray to the heavenly Father that this kingdom might come, and so God's will be done on earth as in heaven.

(3) The Epistle to the Hebrews gives us a deeper insight into the mystery of heaven. The "holy place" into which Christ entered when he ascended from the earth (Heb. ix. 11, 12) is nothing else than the holy of holies of heaven, the place of the glorious presence of God. This is heaven in its fullest, its real sense (Heb. ix. 24, "heaven itself"). There Christ, as the eternal high priest, is always advocating our cause, but in such a way that he makes the world the scene of his saving presence (Eph. i. 23). He himself sits on the throne, whence such language as that "he was made higher than the heavens" (Heb. vii. 26), and "hath passed through the heavens" (Heb. iv. 14). "When the departure of Jesus from the world was in question, it was sufficient to say 'into heaven;' but when the idea was to be expressed that all earthly limitation was removed, and every possible barrier between Jesus and God taken away, then the expression is used, 'far above all the heavens' (ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν), or one like it" (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, ii. 1, p. 535). It is this superspatial heaven, above the cloudy and the stellar heavens, both of which are transient, to which Paul refers when he speaks of the "third heaven" (2 Cor. xii. 2).

Those who partake of the benefits of Christ's death and resurrection have their citizenship in heaven (Phil. iii. 20); and, on the other hand, those who are already in heaven continue to have an interest in the progress of Christ's kingdom on the earth (Luke xv. 7, etc.). But the created heavens (Gen. i. 1) and earth will pass away, and be replaced by new heavens and a new earth (2 Pet. iii. 13). Upon this new earth the heavenly Jerusalem will be let down (Rev. xxi.), which will be distinguished for holiness, and will be resplendent with glory (Rev. xxi. 11 sqq.).

The doctrine of heaven offers a large field for the fancy; and a spiritualistic tendency is to be avoided, which resolves the heavenly realities into mere ideas and unreal ideals, as well as a gross realism such as is represented by Swedenborg and Oberlin, and in works like Uranographie oder Beschreibung d. unsichtbaren Welt (Uranography, or a Description of the Invisible World, Ludwigsburg, 1856). It must be admitted that there is something real to correspond to the figures, and the one bears a relation to the other similar to that which exists between the glorified and natural body. HEBER, Reginald, a distinguished bishop and hymn-writer; b. at Malpas, Chester, April 21, 1783; d. at Trichinopoly, India, April 3, 1826. He was delicate in constitution, but precocious in intellect, at an early age writing poems (Ishmael, etc.) which were retained side by side with his maturer compositions. In 1800 he went to Oxford, and three years afterwards produced the prize-poem, Palestine, which takes highest rank among productions of its kind, and was set to music by Dr. Crotch. In 1804 he was fellow of All Souls. After travelling through Northern Europe he became rector, in 1807, of Hodnet. His kind and charitable disposition won the affections of his people. In 1815 he delivered the Bampton Lectures on the Personality and Office of the Christian Comforter. In 1817 he was made canon of St. Asaph, and, 1822, preacher at Lincoln's Inn. Soon after, the see of Calcutta was offered to Heber. After much hesitation, he accepted the position, and was consecrated at Lambeth, June 16, 1823. At that time Calcutta was the only diocese in India. Heber threw himself eagerly into the work which had been begun by his predecessor, Dr. Middleton. He sought to build up educational institutions, as well as increase the mission-stations. His excessive and useful labors were brought to a sudden termination by his death, from apoplexy, while taking a bath.

Bishop Heber continues to be known, not only as the laborious and devoted prelate of India, but also as the author of some of our most polished and devout hymns. Among these are "Brightest and best of the sons of the morning," "Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty;" and of all missionary hymns his "From Greenland's icy mountains" is the most inspiring and oecumenical. Heber was a High-Churchman, and held to the doctrine of apostolical succession. He carried out these views in India strictly, and yet he was recognized as a man of catholic and liberal spirit. Upon the Thirty-nine Articles he put an Arminian interpretation. He combined learning, and refinement of manners, with humility, and consecration to his work.

HEBREW LANGUAGE, The, is the language of the Hebrews, the descendants of Eber, or Heber, the ancestor of Abraham (Gen. xi. 14). In the Old Testament they called themselves "The Children of Israel," "Israel," "The House of Jacob," "Jacob;" but by the non-Israelites they were called "Hebrews" (Gen. xxxix. 14, xl. 12; Exod. i. 16, ii. 6; 1 Sam. iv. 6, xiii. 19), and so they called themselves in contradistinction to non-Israelites (Gen. xl. 15, xliii. 32; Exod. i. 15, 19). Apparent exceptions are 1 Sam. xiii. 3, 7, xiv. 21; but here the text may be corrupt, for the Septuagint reads, "Let the slaves revolt." "And those that crossed, crossed the Jordan," in the first two cases respectively. We are therefore naturally led to suppose that the designation "Hebrew" for the speech of the Israelites came from the non-Israelites, or from Greek-speaking Jews, since the expression ἑβραῖοι occurs first in the Apocrypha and in the Prologue to Sirach (i.e., about 130 B.C.), to describe not only the old Hebrew language, but that of the later popular Aramaic of the Jews. The same phrase occurs in the New Testament (John v. 2, xix. 13, 17; cf. ἑβραῖς ὁμιλίαντος Acts xxi. 40, xxii. 2, xxvi. 14). The Old Testament never applies the term "Hebrew" to the language: on the contrary, in Isa. xix. 18 it is called the "language of Canaan" when distinguished from that of the Egyptians, — an expression which indicates that it was the speech not only of the Israelites, but also of the other inhabitants of Canaan as well. In 2 Kings xviii. 26, 28, Isa. xxxvi. 11, 13, Neh. xiii. 24, the speech of the Judaites is called "Jewish," in distinction to the Aramaic.

As the Hebrews belonged to a family of nations, so their tongue was a member of a widely spread family of languages, usually denominated, since Eichhorn, "Shemitic." It is impossible to describe exactly its boundaries; but suffice it to say, its northern limit was the table-lands of Armenia, its eastern was the Tigris, its southern the Persian Gulf, and its western the Mediterranean Sea. [For the relations of the languages within these limits, see SEMITIC LANGUAGES.]

The Hebrew occupied a middle position between the Aramaic and the North Arabic, and displayed the linguistic peculiarities of such a position. If it lacked the richness of expressions, the variety of forms, the completer vocalization, and the fulness of inflections, of the North Arabic, and displayed in many particulars the poverty of the Aramaic, it still had, on the other hand, a rich possession which the Aramaic had lost by attrition. At the time when Hebrew comes to our knowledge in literature, it was the oldest of the Shemitic languages, Aramaic was next, and North Arabic last. But this does not imply that the Shemitic family passed through three stages to be so denominated: rather, these three tongues existed side by side. The age of the literature and that of the literary language is not the same as the age of the language. It does not, therefore, follow, from the great age of the Hebrew literature, that the language itself is the provably most original form of the Shemitic; for this conclusion could only be reached when the development of the other languages of this family had proceeded under the same conditions and influences, and, above all, in the same time. But so far is this from the case, that it is certain that Aramaic, in less time than Hebrew, became a more degenerate language; that Hebrew in many respects resembles Aramaic, and more and more as we trace its influence in the successive books of the Old Testament; that Arabic presents really the oldest form of the language in spite of its late literature; and, finally, that Hebrew had already declined when its earliest books were written.

When and where Hebrew arose is unknown. Two conjectures are admissible, — Hebrew was the language of Abraham, brought with him from "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi. 31), i.e., Mugheir, south of Babylon, on the right bank of the Euphrates; or it was the language of the original inhabitants of Canaan. In favor of the latter is the distinction between Hebrew and Aramaic, which dates from patriarchal times (Gen. xxxi. 47).

Since the proper names of the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, are Hebrew, and since Old-Testament tradition declares these peoples to be closely related to the Israelites, these must have spoken Hebrew, as is strikingly shown by the Moabite stone, which dates from the first half of the ninth century B.C. (see art.). Differences of pronunciation and expression in different parts of Palestine are proven by the Shibboleth incident (Judg. xii. 6) and by Deborah's ode (Judg. v.). Dialectical differences are alluded to in Neh. xiii. 23, 24, and Matt. xxvi. 73.

It stands to reason that the Hebrew language must have undergone changes during the more than twelve centuries we are acquainted with it by books, inscriptions, and coins; yet the proof of this fact is difficult, and the result of all investigations to this end most meagre, for the following reasons. 1. No one period is fully represented; only fragments of its literature remain, as is proved by allusions in the books themselves: hence what is set down as peculiar to the age may be only a peculiarity of a writer. 2. It follows that it is impossible to decide certainly how old any particular book or other writing is, and therefore there can be no strict chronological arrangement. 3. In one book there may be quotations, more or less altered, from older books. In proof, compare the parallel passages in Kings and Chronicles. 4. From the time of Moses to the seventh century B.C., so secluded, and in the main peaceful, was the life of Israel, that their language would naturally undergo little change. Even when under tribute to Assyria, the Hebrews were not as a people molested. 5. In linguistic changes the vowels suffer most; but the fact that in Hebrew writing only consonants are employed renders it well-nigh impossible to discover these vowel changes. The present Hebrew points are of comparatively late origin, and, although preservative of an old tradition, are uniformly applied to all portions of the earlier and the later Old Testament alike.

Aramaic exercised a decided influence upon Hebrew from the end of the seventh century B.C. Its presence, therefore, is one note of time. Accordingly, in the history of Hebrew, it is customary to make the exile the dividing line. The first period extends to the exile. Attempts have been made to prove the greater age of the Pentateuch, as compared, e.g., with the other historical books, principally by citing the use in the former of the pronoun היא for the feminine היא (which also occurs in eleven places in the Pentateuch), the word בֶּעַר in the sense of "young one" and "girl," the word הַאֵלֶּה for הָאֵלֶּה (found only in the Pentateuch and in Chronicles). But, as these cannot be proven to be archaisms, they do not prove the antiquity of the language of the Pentateuch. Equally indecisive are the so-called antique forms in these books; because it would be easy, from any other number of books having the same number of words, to pick out an equal number of unusual forms, which with equal reason might be called "antique." As to the words and word-forms which occur only in the Pentateuch, or, if outside, only sporadically, it should be remembered that the Pentateuch constitutes one quarter of the whole Old Testament, and of each other quarter precisely the same thing is true; and, further, that the Pentateuch deals with matters not treated of in the remaining books. In the words peculiar to the Pentateuch there is not such a number of grammatical peculiarities as to prove the words archaic, or from which to argue the age of the writing. So much depends upon the individuality of the writer, upon his methods of work, upon his subject and his purpose, that it is impossible to trace a development of the language in this period from age to age by a study of words. Thus, within the books and within sections of the same book, a mere increase in liveliness of tone leads to the introduction of poetic words; e.g., in the Pentateuch are sections which in this way differ from other sections and from other books, yet are they not on that account proven to belong to a different time. The same is the case in the historical books. The historic, the poetic, and the prophetic books have quite distinct purposes, and, in consequence, different vocabularies. The poets, further, were compelled, by their mode of writing by parallels, to make use of out-of-the-way expressions, because they needed a larger stock of expressions than, say, the historians, who found the ordinary speech ready to their hand, and ample for their wants. The prophets used longer sentences, and these had a freer swing than the poets': otherwise, they have linguistically much in common. But, in spite of these differences, the laws of the language remained throughout the same.

The second period extends from the exile to the present day. It is characterized by the introduction of Aramaisms. In the time of Hezekiah

Aramaic was a foreign tongue (Isa. xxxvi.). In 720 B.C. the Northern Kingdom fell under the Assyrians; and, as the result of its troubles, Aramaic corrupted the language there. The Kingdom of Judah, until the end of the seventh century, remained linguistically Hebrew; yet Aramaic idioms were found, as Jeremiah and Ezekiel testify. It was not, indeed, until the end of the exile, that Hebrew lost its pristine purity and vigor. Then came a great change. The returned exiles naturally used Persian names for their rulers; by marrying "strange women," they further corrupted their speech; and, exposed as they were to inroads of strangers, it is not wonderful that their language was no longer pure Hebrew. Ezra and Nehemiah tried to stem the tide; they ordered that the sacred book of the law should be read in Hebrew (Neh. viii. 8); and Nehemiah was particularly indignant with those Jews who spoke the speech of Ashdod (Neh. xiii. 23 sqq.). These two wrote Hebrew, which does not differ substantially from that of Kings. But by the downfall of the language is meant rather the downfall of the literature; for certain writings of this period, in point of purity, resemble those of the pre-exilic period. These proceeded from the strict Jews, who jealously guarded their diction. The mass of the people quickly came to speak Aramaic. But still Hebrew did not become exactly a dead language, nor one understood only by the learned. On the contrary, the reading of the original holy writings in the synagogues, and their explanation, trained the Jews generally in Hebrew. Hence it came, that, when the learned had occasion to use writing to instruct their fellow-believers, they wrote in Hebrew. In the Mishna (about the second century A.D.) and in other Jewish compositions of a somewhat later date, we find Hebrew which is no servile imitation of the old speech, but a genuine development in the path struck in the later biblical books.

Quite different is the Hebrew written since the eleventh century, generally called the rabbinic. This is pedantic, imitative, a book-language, yet full of words, technical expressions, and particles, which are partly Aramaic, and partly borrowed from the language of the country in which the writer lived. E. BERTHEAU.

HISTORY. — The history of the critical study of the Hebrew begins with the Jewish grammarians and scribes, the Talmudists, and Masoretes, who carefully collected all that pertains to the text of the Hebrew Scriptures. The Christian fathers, with the exception of Origen, Epiphanius, and especially Jerome (who learned the language from a Jewish rabbi, and utilized it for his translation of the Vulgate), were ignorant of the Hebrew language, and derived their knowledge of the Old Testament from the Greek Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate. During the middle ages the Hebrew was almost exclusively cultivated by learned Jews, especially in Spain during the Moorish rule, such as Eben Ezra (d. 1170), David Kimchi, Moses Maimonides (d. 1204). Even the greatest scholastic divines knew nothing of Hebrew. After the revival of letters, some Christians began to learn it from Jewish rabbis. Reuchlin (d. 1522), the uncle of Melancthon, is the father of modern Hebrew learning in the Christian Church. He wrote a Hebrew grammar (1505), coined most of the technical terms which have since been in use in Hebrew grammars (status absolutus, affirmum, verba quiescentia, etc.), and introduced the pronunciation that prevails in Germany. The Reformers cultivated and highly recommended the study of Hebrew; and the Protestant translations of the Bible were made directly from the original languages, and not from the Vulgate. During the seventeenth century, Buxtorf (father and son) of Basel, Louis Cappel of Saumur, and Salomon Glassius of Jena, were the most prominent Hebrew and Talmudic scholars. In the present century, Wilhelm Gesenius, professor in Halle (1786-1842), and Heinrich Ewald, professor in Göttingen (1803-73), created a new epoch in the study of Hebrew. Rödiger, Hupfeld, Hitzig, Fürst, Delitzsch, and others are prominent in this department of learning. In our own country, Moses Stuart of Andover (d. 1852), Edward Robinson of Union Seminary, New York (d. 1863), James Addison Alexander of Princeton (d. 1859), Bush, Conant, and Green deserve special mention as Hebrew scholars. HEBREW POETRY will be considered in this article in three aspects,—the national, biblical, and technical. The first two have to do with the contents, character, and history of Hebrew poetry; the last with its form.

I. NATIONAL.—As with other peoples, so among the Hebrews, poetry precedes prose. In the Bible we have record of many events which previously were embodied in popular songs. In this way the national heart was fired by the stories of Samson and the Philistines (Judg. xv. 16) and of David and Goliath (1 Sam. xviii. 7). But there were longer poems which described battles and victories, such as Num. xxi. 27-30, and, above all, Deborah's ode (Judg. v.), the crown of the patriotic poetry of Israel, and the oldest long Hebrew poem which has come down to us. Domestic histories furnished descriptive poems: so the sad fate of Jephthah's daughter was commemorated by the virgins of Gilead (Judg. xi.), the rape of the Benjaminites by the virgins of Shiloh (Judg. xxi.). The finding of a fountain was the occasion of a new song (Num. xxi. 17). Abandoned women used singing to promote their ends (Isa. xxxiii. 15). Singing, and playing upon instruments of music, formed prominent parts of public worship (2 Sam. vi. 15; Ps. lxxviii. 25). The art of poetry was taught in the schools, and the orators and prophets were poets. Thus all times and occasions—love and beauty in peace, skill and daring in war—yielded materials to the poet, and naturally told their tale in verse. When the history of Hebrew literature comes to be written, the many beautiful poems will be properly estimated.

Many attempts have been made to divide Hebrew poetry into varieties, according to its peculiarities; but all such attempts must necessarily be uncertain, because we have but a single species in sufficient quantity to be a standard, and the judgment can never be general. Still less successful must ever be the attempt to subject Hebrew poetry to the classifications usual with classic and modern poetry. The chief characteristics of Hebrew (or, more generally, of Shemitic) poetry are these. 1. Subjectivity. The Hebrew poet deals only with what concerns him personally: hence there is no epic or drama, because these require objectivity. 2. Sententiousness. There is properly no beginning or end, no progress; so that the stanzas might be arranged differently without affecting the meaning of the poem in any way. 3. Sensuousness. In proof recall the imagery from the animal world,—the symbolism, the personifications, the very anthropomorphisms, which we find at times offensive, but which were innate with the Hebrew. Hebrew poetry was at first, of course, composed and repeated without recourse to writing; but after a time anthologies were compiled. Two such collections must have been very early made; for we find in Num. xxi. 14 an allusion to the "Book of the wars of Jehovah," and in Josh. x. 13 one to the "Book of Jasher." Cf. 2 Sam. i. 18.

II. BIBLICAL. — It is grossly wrong to call the Old Testament a "codex of Hebrew national literature;" but it is certainly a reading and school book of religion, compiled with this design from the extant literature. In the collection, Jewish scholars name three books as poetical, — Job, Psalms, and Proverbs, and have given these a peculiar accentuation. But, besides these, the Song of Solomon and Lamentations should be so designated; and in the other books are frequent passages of poetry; e.g., Gen. xlix.; Judg. v.; Isa. xxxviii. 10 sqq. [This fact is obscured from the reader of the Authorized Version by the faulty method of printing. See the proper method in the Cambridge Bible or the Revised English Bible, published by Eyre and Spottiswoode.]

Hebrew poetry is of two kinds, the lyric and the didactic, called by the words שיר and משל respectively. The first is a song, joined inseparably therefore with music: but it is impossible for us, in our profound ignorance of Hebrew music, to tell how any of the Bible lyrics were sung; and the blind directions found in the headings to many of the Psalms do not help us a particle. These lyrics are written in every key, and run the gamut of feeling. Joy and sorrow, defeat and victory, personal and national emotions, find in them expression. Often, however, the lyric shades off into the didactic; e.g., in Job and in many of the Psalms. Other lyrics, e.g., the Song of Deborah, appear to be attempts at an epic. It lies in the very nature of a lyric to be individual, — the ego in song; and the Hebrews, judging from the specimens preserved, took the lead in antiquity as respects tenderness, depth, and nobility: in grace, however, they came short.

The word משל, which we translate "didactic poetry," comes from a root meaning "to compare." Hence משל is primarily a comparison of any sort. It designates in the Bible (1) a fable (Judg. ix. 7 sqq.; 2 Kings xiv. 9 sq.). (2) A parable (2 Sam. xii. 1 sqq.; Isa. v. 1 sqq.), and also an allegory (Ezek. xvii. 2 sqq., xxiv. 3 sqq.). (3) An apothegm, maxim, and proverb, three species which the Hebrews did not clearly distinguish. In the majority of cases, there are in these real comparisons expressed in parallel clauses: for this phenomenon in regard even to proverbs, see 1 Sam. x. 12; Ezek. xviii. 2. (4) A riddle which rests upon a comparison. (5) A satire (Isa. xiv. 4 [cf. marg.]; Hab. ii. 6). (6) A didactic poem proper (cf. Ps. xlix. 4, lxxviii. 2). To this last classification belong many of the Psalms which treat of personal and national events in a meditative rather than lyrical fashion, and which therefore are to be read rather than sung. So, also, the first part of Proverbs, as well as Job and Ecclesiastes. In regard to Job it should be said, that it is in outline an epic, in form a dialogue

(not a drama). In poetic beauty it rivals the best Hebrew lyrics; but in intention it is a didactic poem, wherein a private history is related, whose teachings are brought out. Ecclesiastes has far less claim to be called poetical on account of its proverbial character.

III. TECHNICAL. — Hebrew poetry, as was to be expected, contains many words not found in prose, but is distinguished from the latter chiefly, of course, by its structure. 1. Modern Jewish poetry proves the capacity of Hebrew for rhyme; but there are no rhymes, properly speaking, in the Hebrew Scriptures: what appear to be such (cf. Gen. iv. 23 sqq.; Ps. viii. 5; Isa. xxxiii. 32) are not intentionally so. It is, however, to be remarked in this connection, that assonance is an occasional feature of Hebrew poetry (cf. Ps. cxxiv.; Jer. v.), but no law of the poetry any more than alliteration, which is also found (cf. Isa. v. 7, xxi. 2, xxix. 6; Hos. viii. 7; Nah. ii. 11).

2. The text of the poetry is divided into short sections (verses) and longer sections (strophes). The verses are independent parts of speech, and the chief characteristics of Hebrew poetry. They are regularly two lines, occasionally three. Several verses make up the strophe. Homogeneity in form and number of verses is essential to a strophe's construction. Externally it is simply marked by the refrain, or the repetition of the concluding verse (cf. Ps. xlii.-xliii. 57; Isa. ix. 7 sqq.; Amos i. 2); or the alphabetical beginning, which is, however, not exactly technic, so that either verse and strophe fall together (Ps. xxv. 34, cxlv.; Prov. xxxi. 10 sqq.; Lam. i. 2, 4), or not (Ps. ix.-x. 37); or inside the strophe the alphabetic order is repeated (Ps. cxix.), or even within the verse (Ps. cxi., cxii.; Lam. iii.). Internally, however, the strophe rounds itself off with the thought, and by means of the mutual reference of the particular parts of the poem (Exod. xv.; Ps. ii. 68, civ. 114).

3. Parallelism, or the regular placing side by side of symmetrically constructed clauses, is not so much a feature of Hebrew poetry as its very nature. The symmetry is, however, ideal rather than external, lying in the relation of the expression to the thought; so that the last furnishes in its various applications additional matter for versification. The same thought is repeated several times synonymously in different words, or else antithetically by two opposite sentences. So each line of verse forms either a sentence in all its members parallel to the one set over against it, or the doubling relates only to one or two elements of the sentence, while the remainder are divided upon the two lines without parallel. The parallelism also extends to two or three lines in the last case, either three times synonymously (cf. Ps. i. 1), or only twice, and then completes the thought with an introductory or concluding line. It can, however, include four members, if the repetition be simple and fourfold, although this is seldom the case, and by carrying it too far (cf. Ps. xix. 8 sq.) it becomes tedious; or it may found, as is more frequent, in connecting the lines two and two, a-b-c-d (Isa. xliii. 4), or, more elegantly, a-c-b-d (cf. Ps. xxxiii. 13). Antithetic parallelism is seldom met with, and generally consists of two members, sometimes of four, and intricate (comp. Canticles, i. 5). All these otherwise infinitely diversified forms are interchanged in most poems, and are arbitrarily mingled, and it is just this mingling which contributes to the poetic gradation. In the first four elegies of Jeremiah's Lamentations, and in many of the later Psalms, the elaborate structure is best seen.

Hebrew poetry does not admit of scanning, and the assertion of Josephus that it was written in metre was wide of the truth. There was, however, more to it than parallelisms and strophes; viz., rhythm. But, as we have no knowledge of the ancient Hebrew pronunciation, we cannot read Hebrew poetry rhythmically.

HEBREWS, Name and History. See ISRAEL. HEBREWS, Epistle to the. Title.—This simple name, which does not signify much, must always serve as the designation of one of the most important doctrinal writings of the New Testament. Neither the tradition of the early Church, nor the results of critical investigation, are of such a nature as to justify us in ascribing it with certainty to any definite author. Nor has there come down any notice of the circle of readers for whom it was written, which is worthy of much consideration beyond the superscription and closing designation πρὸς Ἑβραίους ("to the Hebrews"). This title dates back to the time of its first circulation in connection with the other books of the New Testament; and about the year 200 it was used equally by churches which held different views about its authorship and its relation to the canon; as, for example, by the Alexandrine Church and the African Church (Tertullian, De pudic., 20). The assertion has been made that the Epistle sometimes bore the title πρὸς Λαοδικάσας ("to the Laodiceans"). It is based upon the very insufficient ground, that, in the Codex Bezaerianus, the text breaks off at the close of Philemon with the words, "Here begins the Epistle to the Laodiceans." Philaster, who states that an Epistle to the Laodiceans was ascribed to Paul, has been appealed to for this view, but wrongly; for he distinctly says that the Church read thirteen epistles by Paul, and at times the Epistle to the Hebrews. The supposition that in the West the Epistle to the Hebrews was regarded as identical with the Epistle to the Laodiceans, is made all the more improbable by the fact that the Western Church did not regard the former as of Pauline origin, and, on the other hand, possessed an Epistle to the Laodiceans, under the name of Paul. It has also been regarded by some as being identical with the Epistle to the Alexandrians, mentioned in the Muratorian canon; but the erroneousness of this view has been fully exposed by Heise (D. muratorian. Fragment, pp. 201-222). The title πρὸς Ἑβραίους ("to the Hebrews") is therefore to be looked upon as having been associated with the Epistle from the very earliest times.

Readers, and Date of Composition.—The term "Hebrews" does not limit the persons addressed to Hebrew-speaking Jews, in contrast to Hellenists, or the Jews that spoke Greek. The fact that the Epistle was written in Greek is evidence against this view; but the persons addressed were evidently of Hebrew birth. It is probable that it was not directed to the whole body of Jewish Christians, but to a particular congregation living in a definite locality; and the fact that the title refers, not to a place, but to the nationality of the readers, is to be explained by a distinction between the Hebrew and Gentile Christians in the locality where the persons addressed lived.

The opinion that the Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians does not rest upon such passages as i. 1 (comp. 1 Cor. x. 1) or ii. 16 (comp. Rom. iv. 11-18), but upon the circumstance that the author regards his readers as the successors of pre-Christian Israel (iv. 1-9, vi. 12 sqq., viii. 7 sqq.), and that, while recognizing the universal efficacy of Christ's death (ii. 9, 15), he speaks only of its atoning power for sins left unatoned for under the old covenant (ix. 15, xiii. 12). This also follows from the exhortation to the Jews in xiii. 13, and, above all, from the opinions and tendencies which the whole Epistle combats. Its aim is not to present the "advantages of Christianity over Judaism" (Reuss, etc.), but to serve as a practical exhortation (xiii. 22). This design becomes apparent in the solemn warning of ii. 1-4, which is based upon the doctrinal discussion of chap. i. Throughout the Epistle the doctrinal treatment is merely made the basis of practical exhortations. The readers who are in danger of a complete apostasy from the Christian faith are warned against the destruction which would follow upon a disregard of the proclamation of salvation (ii. 1-3, xii. 25), and exhorted to hold fast to the profession of their faith (iii. 1, iv. 14) and to the hope of the final glory (iii. 6, etc.). Those Israelites who believed in Jesus gain incomparably more than they lose by giving up Judaism; for Christ does perfectly, by his death and ascension, the work which the high priests of the Old Testament only typified (iv. 14-x. 18). The opinion which regards the readers as still taking part in the ordinances of the temple, and believing these were necessary to the forgiveness of sins (Bleek, Lünemann, Riehm), is at variance with the assertion that they had proved their faith by sufferings and works of charity (iii. 14, vi. 10, x. 22, 32). If this were true, and the author had wished to divert them from the observances of the Mosaic ritual, he would not have spoken of the original purity of their faith (xiii. 7), but have emphasized the necessity of a departure from the temple ritual, which he does not do, not even in xiii. 13. There is no trace of evidence in the Epistle for the view that the readers were observing the temple ritual, or were in danger of falling back again into such observance.

As regards the locality in which the readers resided, four places have been specially thought of,—Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome. The following considerations tell against the first three suppositions, and in favor of the last. The Epistle could not have been written to the Church in Jerusalem, for it had been from the beginning the teacher of others (Acts viii. 4, xi. 19; Rom. xv. 27); but of these "Hebrews" this is particularly denied (v. 12). Nor did the Christians of Jerusalem "minister unto the saints" by works of charity (vi. 10), but, on the contrary, were the recipients of charity. The "Hebrews," then, of the Epistle, were such as aided the Church of Jerusalem by contributions. The hypothesis of an Alexandrine circle of readers has been vigorously defended by Wieseler, who has attempted to show that the temple at Leontopolis satisfied the descriptions of the temple ritual as given in the Epistle, even in those points where they seem to be inconsistent with the ritual of the temple at Jerusalem. These inconsistencies, such as the high priest's offering up of daily sacrifices (vii. 27), are assumed, but cannot be made out. But the main support of the hypothesis is based upon the assumption that Philo gives an account of the schismatic temple services at Leontopolis. But this is not only at variance with his known reverence for the temple at Jerusalem, but with the fact that he describes in enthusiastic language the ritual of the temple prescribed by the law, as being observed in his day. On the other hand, the Epistle itself (viii. 5, ix. 1-8) speaks of the ritual of Moses, but not of a temple and ritual existing and observed at the time of composition. The Antioch hypothesis has been revived by Hofmann, and is based upon historical coincidences (ii. 3, v. 12, vi. 10; comp. Acts xi. 19 sqq., xii. 25, xiii. 1). But it cannot be shown that a Hebrew Christianity existed there within sixty years after Paul's triumphant conflicts with Jewish assailants, and such as is described in our Epistle.

The most probable theory was first proposed by Wetstein, and places the readers of the Epistle in Italy, or, more definitely, in Rome. The expression, "they of Italy salute you" (xiii. 24), is not a proof of the author's having written from Italy (comp. Pseuloign. ad Her., 8, in my edition, p. 270, 12), but is entirely consistent with the other supposition that he was not in Italy when he wrote. It is hardly probable that an exclusively Jewish congregation existed in Italy; but there must have been a large number of Hebrew Christians in the Roman Church (comp. Col. iv. 11; Phil. i. 14 sqq.), to whom the title "Hebrews" might properly be applied. The supposition that the Epistle was addressed to this smaller circle explains the double use of the word "all" in xiii. 24. Rom. xiv. is directed against substantially the same tendencies as Heb. xiii. 9; and in Rom. ix. 1-11 views are controverted which might easily develop into such as are brought to our notice in the Epistle to the Hebrews. This theory agrees well with the fact that the oldest Christian authors of Rome, as Clement and Hermas (comp. my Hirt des Hermas, pp. 439 sqq.), were largely influenced by the perusal of our Epistle. The readers themselves are described as having passed through a "great conflict of sufferings" (x. 32); which refers to the persecution of Nero (54-68), and not to that of Domitian (98-117). In the latter case, the composition of the Epistle would fall far down in the second century ("former days," x. 32),—a date utterly inconsistent with the use Clement and Hermas made of it, and with its theological character. But if the letter was written to the Hebrew Christians of Rome, and the persecution of x. 33 is identical with that of the year 64, the date cannot, on account of the expression "former days" (x. 32), be placed before 70, but may with tolerable accuracy be set down in 80. The use of the present tense in referring to the temple ritual (v. 1 sqq., viii. 4, ix. 6 sq., etc.) proves nothing, as it was natural to use this tense for a theoretical description of the temple, based upon the description of the law, and as it is used in the same connection by Josephus, Clement of Rome (ad Cor., 40, 41), and in the Talmud. The consideration which has been frequently urged, that, had the author written after the destruction of Jerusalem, he would have used that event as an argument in viii. 13, would only be of value if it were proved that the readers were in danger of reverting to Judaism.

[Those who hold that the Epistle was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, in the year 70, emphasize, and justly, the constant use of the present tense in referring to the temple (v. 1, viii. 4, ix. 6, etc.) as still standing, and its ritual as being still observed. The past tense is otherwise frequently employed when the contrast is between the law and Christ (vii. 19, ix. 1, 18, etc.). The date is placed by Lardner, Davidson, and Schaff, in 63; Lange (Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, 1st ed.), Stuart, Tholuck, and Wieseler, in 64; Dr. Kay (Speaker's Commentary), in 65; De Wette, Riehm, and Ewald, in 65-67; Conybeare and Howson, in 68 or 69.]

Author.—Less can be determined definitely about the author than about the persons addressed. All that can be derived from the Epistle itself is that the writer was a Hebrew convert to Christianity, who was indebted for his conversion to the disciples of Jesus (ii. 3), was associated with Timothy (xiii. 23), and spoke with the authority of a teacher to a congregation among whom he had resided for a while (xiii. 14). The tradition about the authorship is not uniform. According to the Alexandrine tradition, reaching back to the second century, Paul was the writer; and Clement of Alexandria attempts to explain his reasons for not introducing himself to his readers, as was his usual custom. Origen likewise assumes the Pauline authorship; but he recognizes that only a few churches besides the Alexandrine accepted this view. Irenæus (Eus., v. 26) and his pupil Hippolytus (Phot. Cod., 232, comp. 121), and the whole Church of the West, until after the beginning of the fourth century, denied the Pauline authorship. The tradition of the African Church (also reaching back to the second century) was that Barnabas was the author; and this view is expressly advocated by Tertullian (Exstat enim et Barnabæ titulus ad Hebræos, etc.; De Pudic., 20).

In view of these differences, the opinion widely prevails that the name of the author was early lost, and that the names of Paul and Barnabas were mere conjectures. For this reason, Luther, Bleek, Lünemann, Hilgenfeld, and [Alford] have associated Apollos with the Epistle; but the latter is purely conjectural, and has far less in its favor than the names of Barnabas or Paul. Of these two Barnabas is to be preferred, and for the following reasons. (1) The hypothesis that Paul was the author was as easy for the Church of Alexandria as that of Barnabas was difficult for the Church of Africa. As the name of Paul had been inserted before the Epistles from πρὸς Ρωμαίους to πρὸς Φιλιππονα ("to the Romans," "to Philemon"), it was natural to insert it after the next Epistle, which was πρὸς Ἑβραίους ("to the Hebrews"). Clement's second Epistle to the Corinthians experienced a similar fate. (2) The Barnabas tradition might have been more easily lost in the other parts of the Church than in the African, especially in the Alexandrine Church, which possessed a letter of similar import, which wrongly went under the name of Barnabas. This latter fact may easily be explained if we assume that there still remained a dim recollection of the tradition that Barnabas was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. (3) The style, the statement in ii. 3, 4, where the author speaks of himself as having heard the gospel of salvation from the disciples of Jesus (cf. Gal. i. 7; Rom. xvi. 25), and the absence of the usual salutation, all are against the Pauline hypothesis. (4) If the Epistle itself was addressed to Rome, then the Occidental tradition is to be preferred, and the supposition becomes probable that the African Church, always dependent upon the Roman as regards tradition, received the opinion that Barnabas was the author, from Rome itself. It becomes probable that Barnabas visited Rome (comp. Heb. xiii. 19), not only from the statement in the Clementine Recognitions (i. 7-11), but especially from the fact that Paul found Mark in Rome (Col. iv. 10), whither Barnabas may have accompanied him from Cyprus (Acts xv. 39).

HE'BRON (friendship), a town of Palestine, situated about midway between Jerusalem and Beersheba, at an elevation of about three thousand feet above the sea, is one of the oldest cities in the world, built seven years before Tanis in Egypt (Num. xiii. 22). It is often mentioned in Old-Testament history, from the time of Abraham to the period of the Maccabees. By the Romans it was destroyed, but rebuilt during the middle ages, and the seat of a Christian bishop from 1167 to 1187, when it fell into the hands of Saladin. At present it numbers about ten thousand inhabitants, and is a hotbed of Mohammedan fanaticism. Its mosque stands over the cave of Machpelah, the burial-place of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but it is closed against non-Mohammedans. There is not a Christian family in the town, but about five hundred Jews.

HECKEWELDER, John Gottlieb Ernestus, Moravian missionary; b. in Bedford, Eng., March 12, 1743; d. in Bethlehem, Penn., Jan. 31, 1823. He emigrated to America, 1754, and labored for many years among the Indians in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan, in connection with David Zeisberger (see art.). From 1788 till 1810 he was agent of the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen. From 1810 till his death he lived quietly in Bethlehem, preparing his two books, An Account of the History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania and the Neighboring States (Phila., 1818), and A Narrative of the United Brethren among the Delaware and Mohican Indians (1740-1808, Phila., 1820). HEDIO, Kaspar, b. at Ettlingen, in Baden, 1494; d. at Strassburg, Oct. 17, 1553; studied at Freiburg and Basel, and was appointed court-preacher to the elector of Mayence in 1520, and in 1523 preacher at the Cathedral of Strassburg, where he labored assiduously for the introduction of the Reformation. He translated Eusebius and parts of Ambrosius, Augustine, etc.; edited the Chronicon Urspergense, and continued it from 1230 to 1537; and wrote a Chronicon Germanicum till 1545. His proper name was Heid.

HEDWIG, St., the wife of Duke Henry of Silesia and Poland, to whom she bore six children, devoted the last forty years of her life to the severest asceticism, and entered, after the death of her husband (in 1238), the convent of Trebnitz, where she died Oct. 15, 1243. She was canonized in 1266, and her festival is celebrated in the Roman Church on Oct. 17.

HEERBRAND, Jakob, b. at Giengen, in Suabia, Aug. 12, 1521; d. at Tübingen, May 22, 1600; studied at Ulm and Wittenberg, and was appointed preacher in Tübingen, 1544, but discharged in 1548, as he refused to accept the Interim. In 1550 he was made superintendent of Herrenberg, and in 1557 professor of theology at Tübingen. His principal work is his Compendium Theologicum (Tübingen, 1573), which was widely used in Germany as a text-book, and translated into Greek on account of the negotiations then going on between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the University of Tübingen.

HEERMANN, Johann, b. at Ranten, Silesia, Oct. 11, 1585; d. at Köben, Feb. 17, 1647; a Protestant pastor, who in 1630 published a volume of hymns (Devoti Musica Cordis), of which many are still in use in Germany, and some have been translated into English in Miss Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, and Schaff's Christ in Song, New York, 1869.

HEGEL, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, b. at Stuttgart, Aug. 27, 1770; d. in Berlin, Nov. 14, 1831. He studied theology at Tübingen 1788-93; and lived as a private tutor, first at Bern 1793-96, then at Frankfurt 1797-1801. In 1801 he settled at Jena as lecturer on philosophy in the university, and Schelling's co-editor of the Kritische Journal der Philosophie. He was at that time fully agreed with Schelling. Their journal, of which he wrote the larger part, was the organ of the system of identity, — a philosophy which attempted to represent matter and mind, nature and spirit, world and God, as identical. But a closer acquaintance showed him, that, in the system of Schelling, this identity was a play of the imagination rather than a logical ratiocination, "shot from a pistol," rather than developed with spontaneous necessity; and when Schelling went to Würzburg in 1803, and the charm of the personal intercourse faded away, Hegel left the track and chose his own way, though the general direction of his thought continued the same. After the battle of Jena (1806), he removed to Bamberg, where for some time he edited the Bamberger Zeitung. The occupation was exceedingly modest, but at the same time he published his Phänomenologie des Geistes, a book which in wealth of ideas has no equal. From 1808 to 1816 he was a schoolmaster, director of the Aegidien gymnasium at Nuremberg, and there he married in 1810, and published his Philosophische Propädeutik and Wissenschaft der Logik; which latter work forms the foundation of his whole system, and is as deep and as forbidding as any cellar can be. In 1816 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, and in 1818 he was removed to Berlin; but in Berlin he published only his Philosophie des Rechts (his weakest work) and essays in the Jahrbücher für wissenschaftliche Kritik. After his death, his works were edited, in eighteen large volumes, by an association of friends, after his own notes and those of his hearers. Translated into English are The Subjective Logic (by Sloman and Wallon, 1855), Philosophy of History (by Sibree, 1857), the Logic, from the Encyclopädie (1874), large selections from his works in the Journal of Speculative Philosophy (edited by W. T. Harris, I.-V., St. Louis, 1867-71). His masterpieces are Phenomenology of Spirit, Science of Logic, Aesthetics, and History of Philosophy; in second line stand Natural Philosophy, Philosophy of Right, Philosophy of History, and Philosophy of Religion.

The impression which Hegel made in Germany was at one time almost overpowering. His philosophy swept away all other philosophies as if they were mere dust, and before he died it began to make itself felt as an actual power both in State and Church. Nevertheless, immediately after his death a split took place in the school he had formed; the two divisions (the right represented by Gabler, Erdmann, Gans, Rosenkranz; the left, by Feuerbach, Bruno Bauer, Michelet, and Arnold Ruge) moving in diametrically opposite directions both in politics and religion. The fact is surprising, but not inexplicable. There was in Hegel personally a fund of religious, moral, and poetical sentiment, as rich as his power of intellect was grand. In his system of strongly pronounced pantheism, both these elements are perfectly fused together into one mass; but it was not to be wondered at, that, by further development, they should separate, each pursuing its own course. The method offered no resistance. Formally Hegel defined truth as the mediation between two opposites. His thought always moves from thesis, through antithesis, to synthesis, from the positive, through the negative, to the absolute. But this method is as acceptable to ecstatic mysticism as to radical rationalism. In the dispute which was caused by the split, the style came to play a curious but significant part. Hegel's style is an almost noiseless, almost colorless stream of molten steel, dangerous to touch. Racy expressions, pithy sayings, even bursts of lofty eloquence, occur; but they have no value as quotations. The word which stands for an idea, and not merely runs an errand in the sentence, never means the same in Hegel's writings as it means in other people's writings. Hegel said himself, "If you will understand my ideas, you must first understand my system." In the same sense it may be said, that while in other people's writings the reader begins by understanding the words, and thence reaches to the understanding of the book, in Hegel's writing you must understand the book before you can understand the words. Hence the reason why no amount of interpretation and explanation has been able to decide any thing with respect to what Hegel really meant. The whole dispute between the two fractions of his school has been a mere waste, more liable to confound the student than capable of illustrating the author.

The right wing of the Hegelian school is in theology represented by Daub, Marheineke, Göschel, Martensen; the left, by D. F. Strauss, F. C. Baur, Schweigler. Religion, Hegel defines as truth, but in the lowest form in which truth can be held by the human mind. In Christianity this form of truth has found its highest, its absolute expression, having passed through the stages of one-sided objectivity and one-sided subjectivity in the ante-Christian religions. On the first stage God is considered an object, a part of nature, a natural being (Lamaism, Buddhism, Braminism); on the second he is considered as subject, wholly distinguished from nature (Judaism, Greek and Roman polytheism); but only in Christianity he becomes true spirit. The Hegelian idea, however, of God as spirit, is somewhat ambiguous (for instance, with respect to the question of personality); and the specifically Christian question, whether the appearance of Christ in the history of mankind is a natural event, to be explained like any other event, or whether it is a miracle, the divine incarnation by which creation is saved, is left unanswered. Both views have been developed from Hegelian premises; and the great boast of Hegel's earliest pupils, that in his philosophy faith and science had become fully reconciled, proved empty as soon as the actual application began. It is a very characteristic circumstance, that his Philosophy of Religion has been twice edited; first by Marheineke, and then by Bruno Bauer, that is, first as evidence of the author's conservative orthodoxy, and then as proof of his revolutionary radicalism.

HEGESIPPUS, an ecclesiastical writer of the second century, of whose work, Πέντε ὑπομήματα, fragments have come down to us in Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., 2, 23; 3, 11. 16. 19; 20, 32; 4, 8, 22) and in Stephanus Gobarus in Photius (Bibl., c. 232) and in fragments have been collected in Grabe (Spicilegium, I.), Routh (Rel. Sacr., I.), and Schulthess (Symbolæ ad internam criticam lib. can., I., Turin, 1833).

Eusebius says nothing about the country and birthplace of Hegesippus; but from the circumstance that the latter in his book gives extracts from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, inserts Syriac and Hebrew phrases in his text, and quotes from an oral Jewish tradition, he infers that he was born a Jew; and he must have resided in the Orient, since he went to Rome by sea, making a visit by the way to Corinth. With respect to the time of his life, Eusebius fixes three points, — the reigns of Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius; and these three points fit well together with the notices by Jerome that he was born not long after the apostolic age, and, in the Chron. Pasch., that he died during the reign of Commodus.

As all the fragments which have come down to us are of a historical character, some have inferred that the work itself was a kind of church history; but as the death of James is told in the fifth and last book, what can the preceding four books have contained? and where was the history after the death of James to be told? Others have supposed that the work gave ecclesiastical statistics; others, again, that it was a sort of itinerary. With respect, however, to the general purpose of the book, there can be no doubt it was polemical against the Gnostics; and a closer examination of the fragments themselves, as well as the notices which Eusebius gives of the general subjects of the paragraphs from which he quotes, points to a book of polemico-apologetical description.

Still greater differences of opinion have arisen with respect to the true spiritual bearing of those fragments. Eusebius thinks that Hegesippus was a converted Jew, and his opinion may be right; but on the basis of this assumed Jewish descent, and certain assumed Judaizing tendencies in the narrative about Simeon and James, Hegesippus has been set forth as the representative of a Christianity not only Judaizing, but Jewish.

9—II

From a notice in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., 4, 22) it has been inferred that he considered the Mosaic law as an indispensable part of Christianity. From another notice in Photius (Bibl., c. 232) it has been inferred that he did not recognize the apostle Paul; and from these inferences still further and very far-reaching inferences have been drawn by Schwegler, and, in a more considerate way, by Hilgenfeld, with respect to the Jewish character of the primitive Christian Church. But these propositions are untenable. The first notice does not speak of the Mosaic law in particular, but of the general unity of the Old and New Testament revelation. The second notice does not speak of the apostle Paul, but of a whole party; viz. the Gnostics. To recognize the congregation of Corinth and the Epistle of Clement in the manner in which Hegesippus recognized them, and then reject the apostle Paul, would be an unexplainable self-contradiction.

HEIDANUS, Abraham, b. at Frankenthal, in the Palatinate, Aug. 10, 1597; d. at Leyden, Oct. 15, 1678; studied at Amsterdam and Leyden, and was appointed pastor in the latter city in 1627, and professor in 1647. He was an adherent of Cartesius, who, in spite of his great caution and circumspection, escaped the censure of the Reformed Church as little as the papal index. From the appearance of his Meditationes (in 1642) an opposition began to form against him in Leyden, and Heidanus finally became its victim. He was discharged in 1675.

HEIDEGGER, Johann Heinrich, b. at Bärentschweil, in the canton of Zürich, July 1, 1633; d. at Zürich, Jan. 18, 1698; studied at Marburg and Heidelberg, and was professor of theology, first at Heidelberg, then at Steinfurt (1659), and finally at Zürich (1665). He drew up the Formula Consensus, which was adopted by the city of Zürich, March 13, 1675; and besides his Corpus Theologicæ Christianæ, which was several times reprinted, he published a number of polemical works, Anatome Concilii Tridentini (1672), Historia Papatus (1684), etc.

HEIDELBERG. See UNIVERSITIES, GERMAN. HEIDELBERG CATECHISM. The Reformation was rather slow in penetrating into the Palatinate. In 1546 service was celebrated for the first time according to the Lutheran ritual, in the Church of the Holy Spirit at Heidelberg. But in 1522 Otto Heinrich, who was intimately connected with Melancthon, issued a decree which at once put an end to all papal superstitions. The confession of Augsburg was established as the norm of faith; but the forms of worship were regulated after the Reformed rather than the Lutheran type. Under his successor, Friedrich III. (1559-76), one of the noblest princes of that period, a complete and consistent reform was carried out; and, as the basis of the new organization, the Heidelberg Catechism was adopted.

Zacharias Ursinus and Caspar Olevianus were charged by the elector with drawing up the catechism. The former was professor of systematic theology at the university, the latter preacher at the electoral court of Heidelberg; but both had lived in Geneva and Zürich, and were strongly influenced by the Swiss reformation. As basis for their work they used the catechisms of Calvin (edition of 1541), of Lasky (1548), of Monheim (1560), and of Bullinger (1559); though of the last mentioned only very little is utilized. Towards the close of 1562 the draft was laid before the Heidelberg synod, or, more correctly, before the convention of superintendents assembled at Kaiserslautern. It was unanimously adopted, and immediately printed, accompanied with an introduction by Friedrich III. himself, dated Jan. 19, 1563, and serving as an edict of promulgation. The Latin translation done by Joseph Lagus and Lambert Pithopous, but far inferior to the German original in pithiness and vigor, was published at the same time.

Outside of the Palatinate, the catechism met with many bitter adversaries. Maximilian II. immediately remonstrated against it (April 25, 1563) as an infringement of the peace of Augsburg. On May 4 followed a joint address from the count-palatine, Wolfgang of Zweibrücken, Duke Christof of Würtemberg, and Margrave Karl II. of Baden, accompanied with a piece of sharp criticism inscribed Verzeichniss d. Mängel. Meanwhile the elector issued a second edition of the catechism with the addition of the famous eightieth question, "What is the difference between the papal mass and the Lord's Supper as instituted by Christ himself?" And on Sept. 14, 1563, followed his answer, probably written by Bullinger, to the Verzeichniss d. Mängel. The three princes assembled Oct. 4 at Ettlingen, and proposed to Friedrich III. to arrange a theological conference; but he declined. After the appearance, however, of the attacks of Flacius, Hesshusen, Laur. Albertus, Fr. Baldwin, Brenz, Andrea, and others, and the answers by Ursinus (Gründlicher Bericht vom heil. Abendmal) against Flacius, and (Antwort auf etlicher Theologen Censur) against Brenz and Andrea, and by Olevianus (Pre-digten), the elector decided to accept the invitation; and the conference took place at Maulbronn, April 10-15, 1564. The last attack on the catechism was directed against the elector personally at the diet of Augsburg, 1566. He was even threatened with deposition; but he defended himself with such a nobleness, that the matter was dropped.

Having gone through this ordeal, the success of the book began. It was introduced in Jülich, Cleve, Berg, and the Mark, where, from 1580, every ecclesiastic was compelled to take the oath on it. It was also introduced in Hesse, Anhalt, Brandenburg, and Bremen; but its home it found in the Netherlands, where it was formally adopted in 1588. The Reformed Churches of Hungary, Transylvania, and Poland, also adopted it; and in 1619 the synod of Dort officially declared it one of the symbolical books of the Reformed Church in general. From Holland, and afterwards also from Germany, it was brought to America, and so recently as 1870 the Presbyterian Church of the United States authorized its use. It has been translated into all European languages, also into Hebrew, Arabic, Malay, Singalese, and others. It is one of the three historic and most widely used catechisms of Protestantism (the other two being the Smaller Catechism of Luther and the shorter Westminster Catechism). A tercentenary celebration was held by the German Reformed Church in the United States at Philadelphia, 1863, and in several places in Germany and Holland.

LIT. — The text of the catechism is found in the collections of symbolical books by Niemeyer (Leipzig, 1840), Heppe (Elberfeld, 1860), and Philip Schaff (New York, 1877). Special additions have been published by Philip Schaff: D. Heidelberg Katech. nach d. ersten Ausg. von 1563 (of which only two copies are known to exist), Philadelphia, 1863 (2d ed., 1866), accompanied with critical notes and an historical survey; *The Heidelberg Catechism in German, Latin, and English, with an Hist. HELENA, St., the wife of Constantius Chlorus, and the mother of Constantine the Great. Very little is known with certainty of her life. Gloucester in England, Naissus in Upper Moesia, and Drepanum on the Gulf of Nicomedia, claim to be her birthplace. A church in Rome, another in Venice, and the monastery of Hautvilliers, near Rheims, claim to possess her remains. Some say she was a British princess; others, a servant-girl in a wayside inn. She was repudiated for political reasons by her husband, but held in great honor by her son. She was a Christian; and the study of the legends (see CROSS, INVENTION OF) which have clustered around her name forms an interesting parallel to the history of the worship of Mary. See *Act. HELIAND, sometimes known as the "Old Saxon Harmony of the Gospels," is a poetical life of Christ, composed in the first half of the ninth century, apparently at the request of Louis the Pious, who desired to effect the peaceable conversion of the Old Saxons by substituting religious poems for the warlike lays previously in vogue. It may be described as a Christian epic, containing nearly six thousand lines, and based on the Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Gospels, compiled by Tatianus, and to a less degree upon the commentaries of Hraban, Bede, and Alcuin. Though the author, whose name is unknown, must have been a man of learning, and in all probability an ecclesiastic, the composition is distinctly popular in tone; and its rendering of the gospel history, while adhering closely to the statements of the evangelists, is strongly colored by the Teutonic imagination. Christ is represented as a beneficent ruler, to whom his apostles stand in the relation of thanes, or earls, to their king: he possesses the titles, and discharges the functions, of the ideal Germanic chieftain; and it is through his person, as the central figure who occupies our attention from the beginning to the close, that the stamp of unity is impressed upon the poem. The style is vigorous, at times picturesque, and always abounding in the formulæ and epithets of the older poetry.

The Heliand may be but a fragment of a larger whole, comprising extended portions of the Old and New Testaments, paraphrastically rendered into alliterative verse; and indeed Professor Sievers of Jena has advanced strong arguments to prove that vers. 235-851 of the Genesis attributed to Cædmon are nothing but a translation from an old Saxon original by the author of the Heliand.

However that may be, the Heliand has much in common with the Anglo-Saxon religious poetry. The Anglo-Saxon missionaries who labored on the Continent doubtless disseminated a knowledge of Cædmon's poems among their converts and ecclesiastical brethren; and it would be unavoidable, that, when one of the latter undertook the composition of a religious epic, he should respect not only the poetical traditions of his own country, but those current among his teachers and spiritual guides.

In this connection it is significant that of the two manuscripts, one of which is preserved in the British Museum and the other in the Munich Library, the former is believed to have been copied by an Anglo-Saxon scribe.

LIT. — The poem was first published by J. A. SCHMELLER, Munich, 1830; and his edition is still of great value: other editions are by KÖNE (Münster, 1855), HEYNE (2d ed., Paderborn, 1873), RÜCKERT (Leipzig, 1876), and SIEVERS (Halle, 1878). There are translations into German by SIMROCK (3d ed., Berlin, 1882) and GREIN, improved ed., Cassel, 1869. Among the essays of most interest may be mentioned the following: H. HELIODORUS, minister of the Syrian king, Seleucus IV. Philopator, 187-175 B.C.; was sent to Jerusalem to enforce the surrender of the temple-treasure. In spite of warning given, he entered the temple, but was, according to 2 Macc. iii. 6-40, thrown to the ground by a fearful apparition, and restored only on the intercession of the high priest Onias. 2 Macc. iv. 4, which narrates the same event, mentions Apollonius, Syrian governor of Coele Syria, instead of Heliodorus.

HELIODORUS, Bishop of Tricca in Thessaly, originated, according to Socrates (Hist. Eccl., 5, 22), the custom, prevailing in Thessaly, of deposing any ecclesiastic, who, after receiving consecration, did not abstain from his wife. He was also the author of the celebrated Greek romance Æthiopia (comp. E. Rohde: Der griechische Roman, 1876); and Nicephorus adds (in his Hist. Eccl., 12, 34), that a provincial synod, taking offence of this authorship, gave Heliodorus the choice between condemning his book, or resigning his position as a bishop. He preferred the last. It is not certain when he lived; probably before the fifth century.

HELIOGABALUS, Roman emperor 218-222; was probably b. in 201; a son of the senator Varius Marcellus. His true name was Varius Avitus Bassianus. He was educated at Emesa in Syria; and by his mother, Julia Soëmis, and grandmother, Julia Mæsa, initiated in all the religious fanaticism of the Orient. Elected high priest of the sun-god of Emesa, he assumed his name (Elagabal, אֱלִיגַבָּל); and by his beauty, his magnificence, and his supposed sonship to Caracalla, he made a deep impression in the Roman camp. By the intrigues of his mother he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers, and in 219 he entered Rome. But such an accumulation of debauchery, cruelty, fanaticism (every passion having been stimulated into frenzy), Rome had never seen; and in 222 he and his mother were thrown into the Tiber by the Prætorian guard. During his reign the Christian Church had peace; for his idea of establishing a one-god worship, of mingling all the deities of the Roman Empire together in the worship of the one god El-gabal (God the Creator), — an idea very characteristic of the religious condition of the age, — he had not time to carry out. The principal sources to his life are Dio Cassius, Lampridius, and Herodian.

HELL. 1. In the Old Testament. — The Hebrew word for "hell" is sheol (see art.), to which "Hades" (see art.) in the New Testament corresponds. Our modern word "hell" is not the equivalent for sheol; for, while we associate with "hell" endless suffering, the Hebrew associated with sheol merely ideas of terror and repulsiveness, arising mainly from the mystery and uncertainty which attended the life after death (cf. Job xi. 8; Prov. i. 12; Isa. xxxviii. 10).

2. In the New Testament.—"Hell" is the translation in the authorized version of three words in Greek,—Hades, Gehenna, and Tartarus. Hades has been already considered. Gehenna was properly the "hell" of Hebrew conception, and is uniformly so rendered in the revised version. The rebellious angels, and the finally impenitent of men, are cast into it (Matt. v. 22; Luke xii. 5). Once the word "Tartarus" is employed (2 Pet. ii. 4), and also rendered "hell." It is noticeable that neither Paul nor John uses either Hades, Gehenna, or Tartarus, and also, that, of the twelve recurrences of Gehenna, eleven are in our Lord's speeches. Scripture mercifully hides the condition of the lost, and by example forbids prurient curiosity. The way of life is luminous from earth to heaven: the way of death is lost in darkness. See GEHENNA; HADES; SHEOL; PUNISHMENT, FUTURE.

HELL, Christ's Descent into (κατάβασις εἰς ᾗδου), one of the clauses in the Apostles' Creed, was treated as a doctrine of the Church in the East as early as Marcion's time, and is found in the formula of the fourth synod of Sirmium (359). Towards the latter part of the fourth century it formed, according to the testimony of Rufinus (Expos. Aquilej., 18), a part of the baptismal confession of the Church of Aquileja. But, in the great majority of the baptismal formulas until the sixth century, it was wanting. By the eighth, however, it was universally accepted. Its insertion, therefore, into the creed, was a matter of gradual development. The Greek Church regards the descent into hell as a voluntary passage of Christ's human soul into Hades in order to offer through the preaching of the gospel, redemption to such as were held under the dominion of Satan on account of original sin, and to transfer believers to paradise, especially the saints of the Old Testament (Conf. orth., I. 49). The Roman-Catholic Church holds that the whole divine-human personality of Christ descended to the Limbus patrum, or the place where the saints of Israel were detained, in order to deliver them into the full enjoyment of blessedness (Cat. Rom., § 100-105). According to the Lutheran theology, Christ descended with body and soul on the early morning of the resurrection, just before his appearance as the risen one on the earth. The interval between the crucifixion and that time he had spent in paradise. He went to the realm of the damned, not to preach the gospel, but to proclaim the legal sentence upon sin (Form. Conc., I. II. 9). The Reformed theologians taught that Christ spent the three days following the crucifixion in paradise, and regarded the descent into hell as a figurative expression for the unutterable sufferings of his human soul, which he endured in the last moments of his vicarious dying (Calvin, Inst., II. 16, 8-12). It was therefore a part of his humiliation; while, according to the Lutheran view, it was the first stage of his exalted state (status exaltationis), proving his victory over death and the devil. [The Westminster Catechism (q. 50), however, explains the expression, "He descended into hell," as simply meaning his death, and continuance in that state for three days.] At the side of these views other views have been held concerning the meaning of the clause. It was only another way of saying that Christ was buried (Beza, Drusius, etc.), or denoted the state of death regarded as an ignominious one for the Prince of life (Piscator, Arminius, Limborch, etc.). In more recent times it has been explained of Christ's life on earth amongst the demons who had taken up their temporary abode here (Marheineke, Ackermann), of the universal efficacy of redemption (De Wette, Hase), or the doctrine has been entirely given up as without biblical foundation (Schleiermacher, A. Schweizer). Long before, Wesley had for the same reason omitted it from the articles of faith of the Methodist Church.

The following may be regarded as the teaching of the New Testament on the subject. (1) Christ appeared among the departed in hades, while his body was lying in the grave. This is presupposed by Paul in Rom. x. 6-8 (Meyer), and implied in Christ's own words to the thief on the cross (Luke xxiii. 43). (2) Christ went as spirit (πνεῦμα) to the realm of the dead (1 Pet. iii. 18 sq., cf. Acts ii. 27), and (3) there preached the gospel (1 Pet. iii. 19) (4) to all the dead, and with the more particular purpose of awakening spiritual life (1 Pet. iv. 6). It is true that Christ's preaching to the contemporaries of Noah has been explained to refer to an activity before he became flesh (Augustine, Beza, A. Schweizer); but the representation of these persons as being spirits in prison as well as other considerations, render this view improbable. If it be true that man spends the interval between death and the final resurrection in the intermediate state, hades, it follows as a necessary consequence from the real humanity of Christ, that he also participated in this lot. This descent into hades was, therefore, a distinct stage in the final process through which the theanthropic personality of Christ passed to the glorified body (σῶμα τῆς δόξης). Christ appeared in hades in his own special character of redeemer, and imparted the saving vital energy of God to those who were lifted into communion with himself by faith: of the results of this activity, we know nothing certainly. But the analogy of this world leads us to expect that he was there the savor of life unto life to some, and of death unto death to others, as hades consists of two domains,—paradise, or Abraham's bosom, and the place of torment. [The second part of the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, which belongs probably to the fourth century, is known also by the title Descent of Christ to the Underworld, and contains a most curious and fantastic account of Christ's experiences in hades. Hades is represented as resisting the entrance of Christ; but the news of Christ's coming produces a joyful commotion among the inhabitants of his realm. These cry out, with David and Isaiah among them, in the language of Ps. xxiv., to Hades to lift up the gates of his kingdom. The bright light from the advancing Son of man then strangely floods the realm of death. He calls his saints to him, and followed by them, Adam being in the number, he ascends from the underworld. Arrived at the gates of paradise, he gives them over to the hand of Michael, who introduces them to its glorious fellowship.] See HADES.

HELL, Punishments of. See PUNISHMENT.

HELLENISTIC IDIOM is the prevailing designation of that mode of speech in use among those Jews who lived among the Greeks, or that peculiar form of the Greek language which it took in the thought and mouth of the Semitic Orient when the two spheres of life began to act upon each other. The former of these definitions, though narrow and historically insufficient, suits our purpose, since we know of the matter only as related to the Jews, and this relation is the point of interest. The interest of the subject is not purely philological nor psychological. Similar phenomena can be found elsewhere to instruct in these directions. The influence of religious ideas upon a language unprepared for them may be noticed again and again in the history of Christianity. This particular combination of Jewish thought and Greek language created the form in which the gospel has been made known to the world at large. Thus it is connected with the highest and holiest treasures of human knowledge in a manner which gives it a theological significance, and secures it greater attention than is usually accorded to what is in itself so external.

In the next article [HELLENISTS] it will be shown that the acquaintance of the Jews with the Greek language was not gained through education or literary study, as was the case, e.g., among the Romans, but resulted from immediate contact in practical life, especially in trade. The main object of those thus learning is not to know the peculiar spirit of the foreign tongue, but to gather such a vocabulary as serves their practical purpose of making themselves intelligible in conversing about material and social matters. They seek to obtain readiness in speech, and are more concerned to express themselves definitely than to use correctness of form. Nor should it be forgotten that those who have this aim are not likely to be well educated, and hence are quite content with the imperfect form of their means of communication. Two other weighty circumstances must be noticed. Not only did the Jews rapidly learn the new language, but at the same time they, at least in foreign countries, as quickly forgot their own, and ceased to use it even in the household. In a few generations at most, the Greek language was learned, not from the Greeks, but in the Jewish families, as if it had been the mother-tongue. Thus the imperfections, to a certain extent, became parts of this form of Greek, taught by Jews to their children. In later times, learned Jews, such as Philo and Josephus, sought to adopt the classic forms; but we should not class these, or some of the Christian authors of the first century, with the representatives of the Hellenistic idiom, properly so called.

A point often misunderstood in this discussion is the state of the Greek language itself at the time when the Jews adopted it. It was, in consequence of the conquests of Alexander and their results, in process of change; so much so, that attention was aroused, and studies fostered, out of which the science of philology arose. The mass of foreign words introduced in consequence of the geographical extension of the language, affected it very little. Such things rarely do. But the new political organizations, which threw into the background the limited forms of Greece, had also the effect of fusing the provincial dialects into one common universal Greek language, which always occurs when national life triumphs over narrower separating tendencies. In Greece itself the common people still used their own dialect, as in Germany to-day; but in the newer cities, where the population was not of the same origin, the so-called common (ἡ κοινή) dialect prevailed. The basis of this was the Attic. But a common dialect is of necessity a mixed speech, retaining much that is of local origin, and adding much that is new. The old grammarians have collected for us all these phenomena; and the results are given in our better lexicons, especially those of the New Testament. A Macedonian element is also discoverable: at least, we find certain things appearing in the language for the first time during the Macedonian supremacy.

But the influence of Alexandria on this form of the Greek language was most potent. In that city were combined social culture, trade, art, science, literature, so as to found an intellectual supremacy which continued for centuries. Hence we may speak of an Alexandrian dialect, which belonged not only to literature, but to social life in general. This is known to us from the manuscripts of the New Testament prepared there, and is held by many of the modern critics to be the very form of speech used by the apostles in composing their writings. From this it would follow that the printed Greek text of modern times is of more recent origin in its forms. But into this discussion we cannot enter.

The chief matter to be considered is what the Greek language became in the hands of these Orientals, especially in its application to religious thought. As is well known, the Pentateuch was translated into Greek at Alexandria, during the reign of the second Ptolemy; that is, at a time when a race of Jews flourished whose fathers had been the first to whom the use of the Greek language became a necessity. Despite the fables which have been attached to the story of this version, we may be confident that it originated in an ecclesiastical necessity which was already felt, and not on the literary whim of a prince, as is generally represented. Grecian literati would have been engaged upon it, if the latter view were correct. In fact, the fables alluded to point to an origin deemed sacred, rather than to one of interest mainly to learned librarians. The king's name can be regarded as that of the patron saluted by the Jews and their rabbins; and a dedication copy was naturally placed in the royal library by these faithful subjects. Be this as it may, the first glance shows with how little knowledge of the Greek this translation was attempted. Even the parts made after an interval, the length of which cannot be exactly determined, show in general the same character. Aside from blunders due to faulty hermeneutics or a corrupt text, we find numberless examples of the misuse of Greek terms, of Hebraistic constructions, such as could be fully understood only by those who thought in Hebrew. It is true that adequate Greek expressions were wanting for many ideas of religion and ritual; for others, these unread translators knew of none among the linguistic material collected in the market and the shop. They chose the nearest equivalent, without reference to usage, just as beginners in a foreign tongue are wont to do. We are familiar with such Hebraisms; what must a Greek have thought when he heard them for the first time? Of course it was intelligible to the Jew. He knew the ideas: the form of speech concerned him little. The particles were almost entirely Hebrew; the oath took the form of an elliptical hypothesis; the "construct state" served its common Hebrew purposes; and the entire complex of Greek syntax was smoothed out into the clear, simple, naïve Old Testament structure of clauses. But, despite all this, such a theory and practice of translation was for Judaism itself an inestimable benefit not yet sufficiently recognized. We affirm that the formation of this Judæo-Grecian Bible language was the first and most indispensable prerequisite for the maintenance of the religion of the people. The Hebrew spirit so completely dominated the Greek form, that to-day we are often compelled to seek the Hebrew original to understand the Septuagint.

What was done without purpose became an effective agent for important results. The Septuagint had its influence on all Hellenistic literature, which was mainly religious. It was, to a certain extent, for the Hellenists what Luther's Bible has been for the Germans. But there were variations in this literature, the causes of which we must indicate. The chief cause is, that not all of the authors possessed the same linguistic training. Some were more gifted than others, and the difference in the style of the books composing the so called Old-Testament Apocrypha is very great, although all of them have the Hellenistic coloring. The same difference exists in the New Testament also. Compare the style of the Epistle to the Hebrews and that of the Apocrypha, which is Hebraistic through and through.

But another cause must be named. The frame of a language is the words which form it. A change of vocabulary was continually going on in Hellenistic usage. On one side it kept pace with the transformation of the newer Hebrew, and on the other it was enriched from purely Greek sources. Of the latter fact we have abundant evidence in the New Testament, in which words occur that were unknown to the Alexandrian translators, and these are often used with more Hellenic than Hebraistic signification. But the influence of the language of Palestine was constant. There the classical Hebrew had given place to an Aramaic form of speech, which not only had its grammatical peculiarities, but included expressions and figures not found in the Old Testament. A large number of these occur in the New Testament, and they must have been familiar to the Hellenists. So, too, old words received new forms and new senses. But the greatest influence in producing this change was that of Christianity itself. It demanded expressions for its new ideas and their manifold applications, and sought them in the Greek vocabulary. Hundreds of significant terms and phrases now naturalized in all modern languages received the stamp of the first disciples who spoke Greek. Among these are some of the most important of our theological terms. To sum up: in the Jewish period the Hellenistic idiom slavishly translated, in the Christian it freely formed, a speech, without, however, denying its cradle.

It is evident that the authors of the New Testament differ in their use of the art of speech. John, for example, does not represent the coarser Hellenism in his choice of words; but how entirely Hebraistic is his syntax! The sentences follow each other, the connection appearing, not from grammatical analysis, but from theological reflection. This reiteration of "and" and "then" is not Greek. On the other hand, what rhetorical periods are found in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the preface of Luke, in some of the discourses in the latter part of the Book of the Acts! In Paul's language we plainly see two partially antagonistic tendencies,—that of the Jewish dialectics, with its incomplete syllogisms, its interjected quotations, producing obscurity and harshness; and by the side of this that transporting rhetoric of the heart, the true issue of a new fountain of life, representing wealth of feeling in a corresponding wealth of synonymes and figures.

The discussions of the Hellenistic idiom have been confined too much to lexical and grammatical questions, and have failed to recognize the profound connection between it and the mental history of the people who produced it. The hints given in this article will enable the reader, with the help of the Bible in his own tongue, to understand the matter from a psychological and historical point of view.

The details of grammar and lexicography do not belong to an encyclopædia, but we conclude with some critical and historical remarks on these topics.

At the time of the Reformation, philological learning had not reached an accurate knowledge of the Hellenistic idiom and its history. H. Stephanus and Beza took the right view; but their investigations were too imperfect to guide public opinion. In the middle of the seventeenth century there began an interminable squabble over the Hebraisms of the New Testament, the point at issue being a dogmatic one; namely, what kind of a style might be ascribed to the Holy Spirit, whether it could be deemed less pure than the classic style of profane authors. The discussion was mechanical and unscientific on both sides, but lasted for more than a century. (See the Introduction to Winer's Grammar of the New Testament). Fortunately during this century a truer method has been adopted; and the lexical and grammatical results are not only accessible, but have influenced all the recent commentaries on the New Testament, irrespective of theological opinion. But comparatively little has been done in the study of the Hellenistic literature which preceded Christianity.

The complete literature on this subject will be found in the author's Geschichte des Neuen Testaments, 5th ed., § 41, etc. ED. REUSS.

The phrase "Hellenistic Diction" is frequently substituted by English and American scholars for "Hellenistic Idiom;" since the latter is in English applied to single peculiarities of speech, rather than to a collection of such peculiarities having an organic character. In the main the positions of Professor Reuss are now generally accepted. Too little emphasis is laid by some authors on the providential aspect of the subject. On the theory that Christ is the centre of history, a main task of all the nations about the Eastern Mediterranean was to assist in the preparation of this form of Greek, as best adapted to express the universal revelation. Properly held, this view stimulates the study of the historical and psychological causes which resulted in the formation of Hellenistic Greek. To recognize God in history does not hinder investigation.

The lexical questions have in recent years been treated from a philological and historical point of view, and the a priori dogmatic method lost ground. Many of the results are contained in the larger commentaries, and in special essays on words. The American edition of Lange's Commentary is a thesaurus in this respect. (See the Index in vol. X., New Testament.) The New-Testament lexicons of Wahl, Bretschneider, and Robinson, have all served a useful purpose. That of WILKE (rewritten by C. L. W. GRIMM, Leipzig, 1868; last ed., 1877-78) will shortly appear in an English translation by Professor J. H. Thayer, Andover. A special lexicon on New-Testament theological terms is that of H. CREMER, Gotha, 1866-68, 2d ed., 1872, 3d ed., 1882; translated into English, Edinburgh, 1869, 3d ed., 1880. On synonyms of the New Testament see TRITTMANN and TRENCH (the latter originally appearing in two parts; a new edition in one volume, London, 1865).

Of New-Testament grammars, that of WINER has long been the standard. The first accurate English translation was that of Professor Thayer, 1869 (from the seventh German); also one by Professor W. F. Moulton (Edinburgh, 1870), containing numerous additions. A. BUTTMANN'S (Berlin, 1869) has also been translated by Thayer, with numerous corrections and additions by the author (Andover, 1876). In England the New-Testament grammar of T. S. GREEN (London, 1862; 1st ed., 1842), and Syntax and Synonymes of the Greek Testament, WILLIAM WEBSTER (London, 1864), deserve mention. The former is very convenient and suggestive. The progress made in the knowledge of Greek grammar in general has contributed greatly to the excellence of modern helps for study in this special field.

The most valuable list of works bearing on the Hellenistic diction will be found in the supplementary volume of Lange's Commentary on the Old-Testament Apocrypha, by Professor E. C. BISSELL. The volume itself is among the most valuable American contributions in this field.

Much remains to be done in two directions: first, in securing for the LXX. proper recognition as the basis of the peculiarities of the Hellenistic diction; secondly, in giving proper place to New-Testament stylistics and rhetoric. The latter subject has been discussed and rediscussed in connection with the questions of the genuineness of the various books of the New Testament; but very little has been done from any point of view other than the polemic one. The rhetoric of the Pauline Epistles deserves more thorough treatment.

The numerous works which have appeared in recent years on the life of Christ, on the history of the New-Testament times, have made great use of the material which belongs to a thorough discussion of the Hellenistic diction; and the same remark holds true of the treatises on New-Testament hermeneutics. For a general discussion of the language of the Greek Testament and the idiosyncrasies of the evangelists and apostolic writers, we refer to the first chapter of SCHAFF'S Companion to the Study of the Greek Testament, New York, 1882. M. B. RIDDLE.

HELLENISTS was the name applied by the Greeks to those foreigners who became like themselves in habits or speech. The term had a special application to those Jews who were brought under Greek influences, and is of importance in connection with the early history of Christianity. The usual view of the word is not incorrect, but too often superficial.

In the time of Alexander the Hellenizing of foreign nations, which until then had been limited, began to be extensive. His successors, the Seleucidæ and the Ptolemies, advanced it, sometimes by force. Even more than the sword was this influence the defence of the new dynasties.

The tendency to emigrate, and engage in foreign trade, was not, however, confined to the Greeks. About the time of the spread of Hellenic civilization in the East, various political causes fostered among the Jews the same tendency, which has now become, so to speak, the ground tone of their life as a people. The two streams, Hellenic and Hebrew, met at first in the young Macedonian cities. Soon the Jews were found everywhere manifesting the same commercial spirit, the same fondness for portable salable property, which is to-day the most obvious trait of their character. But the two streams did not mix. The Mosaic law had sought to fasten the Jewish people to the soil of Palestine. From this external regulation they now broke away; but the same law had stamped upon them, not only a higher religious and ethical culture, but also a personal abhorrence of foreigners. All that pertained to their religious belief made between them and the Greeks an impassable gulf, thus guarding their religion from every danger and temptation, maintaining their peculiar type of morality, while at the same time all the evil passions which can divide races were permitted to arise and to operate. We are to inquire, How far, under these conditions, did the Jewish element yield to or withstand the foreign influence it encountered? In other words, What spheres of public and private life, what phases of national character, were affected or unaffected by this Hellenizing tendency?

With household life we need not here concern ourselves. In art and science the foreigners might have furnished a welcome instructor to the Jews, so far as these troubled themselves about such things. The warlike spirit was gone, or what little remained was connected with religious ideas in a way to remove it from the usual political spheres. Moreover, trade is essentially cosmopolitan; and every advance in this direction was at bottom a removal from the spirit of the law and the prophets, all the more so because the Jews did not recognize it as such. The two opposing dynasties on either side of Palestine sought at the same time to obtain entrance into the law and the heart of the Jewish people. Assuring them of material advantage, encouraging their love of money, these rulers succeeded in dulling entirely the conservative national feeling, though without winning any affection in return. Without the mighty restraint of their religion, the Jewish people would at once, and more rapidly than any, have given way to Hellenism. The strongest proof of this, aside from the affectation of adopting Greek names, is to be found in the fact that they sacrificed what is most precious and peculiar to a people, — their language, and this with an unexampled readiness and rapidity. This remarkable revolution in speech has been discussed in the preceding article [HELLENISTIC IDIOM].

But, though the language of their fathers was forgotten, their religious faith remained, as it still remains. This conserved their nationality; and one cannot fail to admire not only the reorganization after the return from Babylon, with its effect upon the people, but also the Pharisaism, which, with its separatism, contributed so largely to the maintenance of the undying national feeling. An edifice that has lasted for thousands of years, that has proved stronger than the Roman Empire, itself praises the builders. However far removed from home, among the Jews apostasy was a rare exception. Wherever they went, they soon established synagogues (now Grecian) as fortresses of the national spirit, and targets of foreign antipathy, — in both directions the upholders of Judaism in its peculiar position.

Here is that phase of our subject which is of most importance for the history of Christianity; here the providential ordering of the relations of peoples is most evident. The transformation of Hebrew Jews into Hellenists is of more than statistical and philological interest: its results were far-reaching. It was more than the acceptance of the Greek language and customs on the part of the Jews: it brought the Jewish faith and life close to the Greek population, and that, too, at the very time when heathenism was moving toward a remediless catastrophe. Its power was broken: in some cases a tasteless, unpoetic, foreign superstition had taken its place. Here and there were individual souls that could not find satisfaction, either in the intoxication of sense, the abstractions of philosophy, or the prevalent mysteries and occult sciences. These often found their way to the synagogue, and learned to know the God of Israel, and to join in the worship of him. Especially was this true of the women. No one was hindered from sharing these privileges. The relations of commercial and social life favored the custom. Certain general rules of a religious and domestic character were observed in the introduction of these proselytes [see PROSELYTES]: otherwise the fellowship was without hindrance from either side.

But an important counter-influence was thus exerted upon the Hellenistic Jews. It could not be otherwise. The Greek-speaking Jews were brought into the closest contact with the Greeks, and inevitably they learned to judge the aliens less unfavorably, to recognize what was common to humanity, and, while holding fast to their monotheism as their most precious possession, to cease to identify it with all the details of their religious forms. Their worship, it should be remembered, was, insensibly to them, less and less associated in their thoughts with the temple at Jerusalem and its sacrificial rites. The Hellenist, without wishing or knowing it, was more and more released from the bonds of the Leviticopharisaical institutions. He had preachers, but no priest. This change was not caused by antagonism or indifference, but was the natural result of circumstances. All of the Greek-speaking Jews did not become less exclusive; the Book of the Acts furnishes proof to the contrary: but the same history shows how greatly the circumstances sketched above prepared the way for the gospel. Those things made prominent by the gospel, that, too, by Jesus himself, — the distinction between what was essential and unessential in religion, the recognition of true faith outside of Israel, and of salvation designed for all nations, — these things, to say the least, were intelligible to the Hellenistic ear, if not at once acceptable. In Palestine, where the Jew wished to be master, the foreigner was doubly unwelcome, was called sinner, godless, unrighteous, because he was a foreigner. These national prejudices helped to create antagonism to the gospel. But elsewhere the Jew was the foreigner. He soon felt that there was room in the world for many kinds of people, and this feeling had its influence within the sphere of Christianity. In Jerusalem many would not hear of a gospel that they should have in common with the uncircumcised. In Antioch, not only the market, but the synagogue, to a certain extent, had been occupied together with the latter class. The depth of the gulf between these two elements of the Jewish people at the time of the establishment of the Church may be learned from the first mention of them in the Book of the Acts (chap. vi.). The unfriendly collusion was occasioned, it is true, by a trivial external matter; but the true cause was the national division. The further application of the positions here taken belongs more properly to exegesis.

HELVETIC CONFESSIONS. I. First Helvetic Confession (Confessio Helvetica Prior, also called Second Confession of Basel, Confessio Basiliensis Posterior). Though in the fourth decade of the sixteenth century the Reformed churches of Switzerland could point to the writings of Zwingli and the first confession of Basel (1534) as expressions of their beliefs, a common confession, formally adopted, was still lacking. For the purpose of drawing up such an instrument, delegates from Zürich, Bern, Basel, Schaffhausen, St. Gall, Mühlhausen, and Biel, assembled at Basel, Jan. 30, 1536. Bullinger and Leo Judæ from Zürich were present, Megander from Bern, Myconius and Grynæus from Basel, and others. Soon after, Butzer and Capito from Strassburg arrived; for there were also other motives at work. The moment was considered favorable for the effecting of a union between the Reformed and the Lutheran churches, and such a union was the great idea of Butzer's life. Nor was the council called by Paul III. to Mantua left out of view. It was the intention of the Swiss Reformed churches to lay their confession before that council. The instrument was first drawn up in Latin, and then translated by Leo Judæ into German. The German version was immediately adopted by all the delegates; but the Latin encountered some difficulties from the side of the Zürich delegates, who found the phraseology approaching the Lutheran too closely. It was revised and altered by Myconius and Grynæus; and both versions, the German and the Latin, were then formally adopted on Feb. 26, 1536.

II. The Second Helvetic Confession (Confessio Helvetica Posterior) is the work of Bullinger. The first sketch of it he made in 1532. During the plague, in 1564, he revised and elaborated this sketch, and laid it beside his will, to be presented, in case of his death, to the magistrates of Zürich, as a testimony of his faith. An incident brought it before the public. Maximilian II. called a diet at Augsburg, Jan. 14, 1566. As the elector-palatine, Friedrich III., who had seceded from the Lutheran, and joined the Reformed Church, was afraid, that, for this very reason, he should be put under the ban of the realm, he addressed himself to Bullinger (after the death of Martyr and Calvin, unquestionably the first theologian of the Reformed Church), and asked him to draw up a confession showing that the Reformed Church in no point differed from the true apostolical doctrine. Bullinger sent him the above-mentioned memoir; and it pleased him so much that he asked permission to have it translated into German, and published. The interest which Bullinger's work thus awakened naturally attracted the attention of the Swiss to it. They had for some time felt the need of such a confession as a bond of union. The first Helvetic confession was too short, and was suspected of having yielded somewhat to a Lutheran influence. Bullinger's, on the contrary, seemed satisfactory in every respect; and in the course of 1566 it was adopted by Zürich, Geneva, Bern, Schaffhausen, Mülhausen, Biel, St. Gallen, the Grisons, Glarus, Appenzell, Thurgau, and elsewhere. In the same year it was adopted in Scotland, in 1567 in Hungary, in 1571 in France, in 1578 in Poland. It is also the creed of the Reformed Church in Bohemia. The first edition of the Latin text appeared at Zürich 1566; at the same time appeared also a German translation by Bullinger, and a French by Beza. It is, next to the Heidelberg Catechism, the most generally recognized confession of the Reformed Church.

HELVETIC CONSENSUS, Formula Consensus Ecclesiarum Helveticarum. The severity with which the synod of Dort (1618-19) defined the doctrines of absolute election and reprobation gave rise to a re-action in France, where the Protestants lived surrounded by Roman Catholics. Saumur, the home of Amyraut, Cappel, and Placæus, became the centre of this movement. Amyraut taught a hypothetical or conditioned universalism; Cappel denied the verbal inspiration of the Hebrew text of the Old Testament; Placæus rejected the immediate imputation of Adam's sin as arbitrary and unjust. These ideas found much favor, both in France and in Switzerland; but in the latter country they also met with a very decided opposition. F. Spanheim wrote against Amyraut: the city of Zürich called her sons home from Saumur, and sent them to study at the orthodox Montauban. In 1649 A. Morus, the successor of Spanheim, but suspected of belonging to the liberal party, was compelled by the magistrates of Geneva to subscribe to a series of articles, in the form of theses and antitheses, the first germ of the Formula Consensus. As the movement continued to spread, the idea naturally occurred to stop the further invasion of such novelties by the establishment of a formula obligatory to all teachers and preachers. After considerable discussion between Gernler of Basel, Hummel of Bern, Ott of Schaffhausen, Heidegger of Zürich, and others, the last-mentioned was charged with drawing up the formula. In the beginning of 1675 it was laid before the ministers of Zürich; and in the course of the year it was adopted, not only by Zürich, but also by Basel, St. Gall, Glarus, Appenzell, Mülhausen, Neuenburg, the Grisons, etc. It consists of a preface and twenty-six canons, and gives a clear statement of the difference between strict Calvinism and the school of Saumur. Though a product of the reigning scholasticism, and hence styled a "symbolical afterbirth," it is by no means so exclusive as might be suspected: it disapproves the ideas of the school of Saumur, but does not directly declare them to be heretical. Outside of Switzerland it never acquired authority; and, even in Switzerland itself, it gradually dropped out of use in the course of half a century. In 1722 Prussia and England applied to the respective magistracies of the Swiss cantons for the abolition of the formula for the sake of the unity and peace of the Protestant churches. The reply was somewhat evasive; but, though the formula was never formally abolished, it gradually fell entirely into disuse.

LIT. — The formula was first printed as an appendix to the Second Helvetic Confession at Zürich 1714, then 1718, 1722, etc., and in NIEMEYER: Coll. Conf., pp. 729-739. F. TRECHSEL.

HELVETIUS, Claude Adrien, b. at Paris, January, 1715; d. there Dec. 26, 1771; was the son of a farmer-general; a farmer-general himself, a rich man, and an idler, solely occupied with the idea of making a sensation. He succeeded. His book, De l'esprit (Paris, 1758), was burnt by the hangman of Paris on the instance of the Roman-Catholic clergy, translated into all European languages, and read more than any other book of its time. It has interest, however, only as having reached the nethermost bottom of atheistic materialism, the point where stupidity turns into perversity. The Pagan virtues the author describes as conventionalities; the Christian, as vicious fancies.

HELVICUS, Christoph, b. at Sprendlingen, Hesse, Dec. 26, 1581; d. at Giessen, Sept. 10, 1617; studied at Marburg; and was appointed professor of Hebrew at Giessen in 1605, and of theology in 1610. He held a disputation in Hebrew with the rabbis of Francfort, and wrote Chronologiae Systema Novum, 1610, which was translated into English.

HELVIDIUS, a layman, living in Rome in the time of Bishop Damasus, 366-384; published about 380 a book against the spreading Mariolatry and the ascetic over-estimation of the celibacy. Jerome wrote against him Adversus Helvidium (comp. his letters to Pammachius, to Eustochium, and Contra Jovin., I. 495), but in an excited tone, and with forced sophistical argumentation. Gennadius, who recognizes his piety and good intention, but criticises his lack of erudition, states that Helvidius was a pupil of the Arian Auxentius from Milan, and an imitator of the Pagan rhetor Symmachus. Of his book nothing is left but quotations in Jerome.

HELLOT, Pierre, b. in Paris, 1660; entered the third Franciscan order (1683) in the convent of Picpus, Paris, under the name of Pere Hippolyte, and d. there Jan. 5, 1716. He immortalized himself by writing a Histoire des ordres monastiques, religieux, et militaires, et des congrégations seculières de l'un et de l'autre sexe, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols. The idea of the work occurred to him while in Rome on business of his order. In its composition he was assisted by such eminent scholars as Hardouin, Mabillon, and Ruinart: the last three volumes were edited by Maximilien Bulloz. This great work has been repeatedly reprinted, notably with large additions, as part of Migne's Encyclopédie théologique, in 5 vols., Paris, 1847.

HEMMERLIN, Felix, b. at Zürich, 1389; d. in the dungeon of the Franciscan monastery at Lucerne, 1457; studied at Bologna; was present at the Council of Constance; visited Rome, and was appointed provost of St. Ursus at Soleure 1421, and cantor at the cathedral of Zürich 1427. He was a bright and learned man; and his writings, numbering thirty-nine, most of which, however, are only pamphlets, give a very vivid picture of ecclesiastical affairs in his time. But he was a critic only, not a reformer, and his criticism made him many enemies. By his De nobilitate he became mixed up with politics, was imprisoned (1454), and never released. He is not, however, to be classed among the martyrs to the cause of the Reformation. See B. REBER: Felix Hemmerlin, Zürich, 1846.

HEMMINGSEN, Niels (Nicholaus Hemmingius), b. in the Danish island of Lolland, 1513; d. at Helsingore, 1600; studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor of theology in Copenhagen, but was dismissed in 1579, on suspicion of Crypto-Calvinism. His works, Opuscula (Geneva, 1583), have of late attracted considerable attention both in Denmark and Germany, especially his book against J. Andreae, on the doctrine of ubiquity, not published until after his death, 1615.

HENDERSON, Alexander, b. in the parish of Creich, Fifeshire, in 1583; d. in Edinburgh, Aug. 19, 1646. He entered St. Salvator's College, St. Andrew's, in December, 1599, and took the degree of M.A. in 1603. He taught philosophy in St. Andrew's University till early in 1612, when he was presented to the church of Leuchars. So unpopular was his settlement there, that the people fastened the church-doors on the day of his ordination, and he had literally to enter by the window. A year or two afterwards he went, perhaps out of curiosity, to hear Robert Bruce preach in the adjoining parish of Forgan. In order to be hid, he sat in a dark corner of the church; and there the sharp arrows of the King pierced his heart as Bruce read for his text, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber." Soon after this he gave up Episcopacy for Presbytery, and in 1618 opposed "the five articles" in Perth Assembly. Next year he was summoned, with other two ministers, before the High Commission; but they answered for themselves so wisely, that they were dismissed with threatenings. He seems to have spent the next eighteen years in Leuchars in comparative peace, storing his mind with useful knowledge, doing good work among his people, and educating young men boarding with him. Many of those in the neighborhood who loved "the good old way" resorted to his ministry; and the Presbyterial meetings he attended were precious and refreshing, and helped to unite the faithful ministers. He bought a house and some land, which, with a thousand pounds scots, he gave as an educational endowment to the parish. To the school of his native parish he bequeathed two thousand merks.

Instigated by Laud, Charles I. sent down to Scotland in 1636 a book of ecclesiastical canons and a book of ordination, which were followed by the Book of Common Prayer for the Church of Scotland. The arbitrary manner in which it was sought to impose these on the Scottish Church was perhaps even more offensive than their matter. Most of the bishops raised letters of horning, charging the ministers in their diocese to buy two copies of the Book of Common Prayer for the use of their parishes within fifteen days; but the ministers supplicated the Privy Council to suspend the charge. Henderson's petition was much esteemed by the people. Soon the body of the nation was embarked in the cause; and four committees were appointed to represent the noblemen, gentlemen, burgesses, and ministers. These committees, each of which contained four members, were called "The Tables," and met in the Parliament House. On their meetings being prohibited by royal proclamation, they resolved to renew the National Covenant. Henderson wrote the bond, adapting it to the time; and Warriston prepared the portion known as "the legal warrant." On the 28th of February, 1638, it was sworn and subscribed by thousands in the Greyfriars Church and Churchyard, Edinburgh. This was a day, as Henderson said, in which the people offered themselves in multitudes to the service of Heaven, like the dewdrops in the morning, wherein the arm of the Lord was revealed, and the princes of the people assembled to swear allegiance to the King of kings. Copies were circulated through the country; and almost everywhere it was sworn with zeal and alacrity by all ranks and classes. All the shires subscribed by their commissioners, and all the towns but Aberdeen, St. Andrew's, and Crail. Henderson preached at St. Andrew's, and gained it, not a burghess refusing to sign, though no threatenings were used, except of the deserved judgment of God, nor force, except the force of reason. Henderson, Dickson, and Cant were sent to the north, and preached to great crowds in the open air at Aberdeen, securing several hundreds of subscriptions. But with the doctors of divinity they had only a fruitless controversy. The king had to call a General Assembly and Parliament to consider the national grievances. Henderson was unanimously chosen moderator of the former, which met on the 21st of November, 1638, in the High Church or Cathedral of Glasgow. Though the royal commissioner dissolved it in the king's name, it continued its sittings, condemned the spurious assemblies from 1606 to 1618, as well as the Service Book, excommunicated eight of the bishops, deposed the other six, and prohibited episcopacy and the articles of Perth. Despite his arduous duties by day, Henderson spent the greater part of the night in prayer and conference. At its close, on the 20th of December, he said, "We have now cast down the walls of Jericho: let him that rebuildeth them beware of the curse of Hiel the Bethelite." Though anxious to remain in Leuchars, Henderson was translated by this assembly to Edinburgh, and was inducted into the Greyfriars Church on the 10th of January, 1639.

The Remonstrance of the Nobility, etc., which Henderson drafted, strongly impressed the English with the justice of the covenanted cause. He accompanied the Scotch army to Dunse Law, and took part in the treaty at Birks in June, 1639. Next year he was appointed rector of Edinburgh University. On the king refusing to carry out the stipulations of the pacification, denouncing the Covenanters as rebels, and preparing again to invade the country, the Scotch army entered England in August, 1640, and the king was fain to treat a second time. For this treaty Henderson was appointed a commissioner. While in London, he wrote several pamphlets, held service according to the Scottish form, and preached in St. Antholine's Church to crowded audiences, and heartily concurred with William Castell's petition to the English Parliament for propagating the gospel in America as "most pious, Christian, and charitable." Toward the end of July, 1641, he returned to Edinburgh, and was chosen moderator of the assembly then sitting. The king having come to Scotland to preside in Parliament, Henderson was appointed royal chaplain, and dean of the Chapel Royal. By his exertions the revenues of the bishopric of Edinburgh were secured for the university of that city, and probably he helped to secure for the university of St.

Andrew's a grant of a thousand pounds per annum from the revenues of the archbishopric. In January, 1642, he was translated to the East Kirk, and the same year gave "willingly and of his own accord a thousand pounds scots for perfecting the house appointed for the library" of St. Andrew's university. As he was anxious to reconcile the king and the English Parliament, he was sent with the Scotch commissioners to Oxford. There he perceived that there was no hope of accommodation consistent with the liberties of England. On his return he had a conference with Montrose, and, seeing that he was determined to support the king, cautioned his friends against him. He was moderator of the General Assembly in 1643, when commissioners were present from the English Parliament; and he drafted the Solemn League and Covenant, which was cordially adopted by the Assembly and Convention of Estates. The assembly renewed the commission's appointment of members to assist at the Westminster Assembly. Henderson accordingly sailed from Leith for London on the 30th of August. He addressed the English House of Commons and the Westminster Assembly, when met in St. Margaret's Church to swear the Solemn League and Covenant on the 25th of September. He was of great service in Westminster Assembly, and often took a leading part in its debates. Early in 1645 he was appointed to assist the commissioners of both Parliaments in their treaty with the king at Uxbridge. On this treaty being broken off without success, he returned to his duties at Westminster, though his health was now failing him.

In the spring of 1646 the king threw himself into the Scottish army, who retired with him to Newcastle. The Independents were now supreme in the English army, which had crushed his forces; and his only hope lay in speedily coming to terms with the Presbyterians. He sent for Henderson as the fittest man to remove the difficulties of his mind. Though unfit for the journey, he complied, and reached Newcastle in May. But he soon found that there was little hope of Charles agreeing to abolish prelacy in England. It was arranged that the conscientious scruples of Charles should be discussed in a series of papers between him and Henderson. Of these there are eight, five being by the king. Henderson prepared four; but, perhaps to let the king have the last word, only three have been printed. The object of Charles seems to have been to gain time; and, as the discussion lasted fully six weeks, he was not altogether unsuccessful. As Henderson's health had grown much worse, he returned to Scotland, arriving in Edinburgh on the 11th of August, sick and exhausted. To Sir James Stewart, provost of Edinburgh, he said, "I am near the end of my race: in a few days I am going home, and I am as glad of it as a schoolboy when sent home from the school to his father's house." Eight days after his arrival he entered into his rest. When dying, he opened his eyes, and looked up with a pleasant smile. The company were amazed, for his eyes shone and sparkled like stars; and immediately he expired. He was undoubtedly, after Knox, the greatest of Scottish ecclesiastics, and has been held in universal honor for his tact, statesmanship, and patriotism, as well as for his attachment to the faith and polity of the Reformed Church.

LIT. — Life, in M'CRIE'S Miscellaneous Writings, and Life and Times by AITON, Edin., 8vo, 1836. Most of the principal public papers of the Presbyterians from 1637 to 1646 were drafted or polished by Henderson. In 1641 he published The Order and Government of the Church of Scotland, 4to, preface of 5 leaves, and 68 pp. The Platforme of the Presbyterian Government, published by authority in 1644, is substantially the same without the preface. He seems to have published a pamphlet against Episcopacy and another against Independency. Several of his sermons have been printed separately; and a volume of Sermons, Prayers, and Pulpit Addresses, from the notes of a hearer, was issued in 1867, 8vo, 529 pp. His speech before the Solemn League and Covenant was sworn at Westminster is in the Appendix to REID'S Memoirs of the Westminster Divines. The papers which passed between him and the king are in AITON'S Appendix, and are printed with Charles's Works.

D. HAY FLEMING (of St. Andrew's, Scotland).

HENDERSON, Ebenezer, D.D., b. Nov. 17, 1784; d. May 16, 1858; an eminent linguist and biblical scholar, and a devoted Christian missionary, whose labors in this capacity were carried on chiefly in connection with the British and Foreign Bible Society. He was the son of humble parents; and his birth took place, as his youth was passed, in the landward part of the parish of Dunfermline, in Fifeshire, Scotland, where, owing to distance from schools, he had few educational advantages; most of his scholarship, which, besides the classical languages, is said to have included Hebrew, Syriac, Ethiopic, Russian, Arabic, Tartar, Persian, Turkish, Armenian, Manchoo, Mongolian, and Coptic, having been acquired in the midst of the engrossing duties of a singularly active professional life. He was originally intended for a mechanical trade, and apprenticed to a watchmaker; but more suitable prospects opened up for him. Though his parents were members of the Scottish Secession Church, which had indeed found its birthplace in the immediate neighborhood of his native parish, it was not in connection with that dissenting body, but with the communion which numbered among its members James and Robert Haldane, — names well known in the religious annals of Scotland in the beginning of the nineteenth century, — that young Henderson received those decided religious impressions which led to his choice of the ministry as a profession; and it was in the seminary in Edinburgh, instituted and supported by one of these brothers, that he received his theological training. The course extended over only two years, and appears to have been every way inadequate. Before he had completed his studies at this theological seminary, his future work was determined; and in the year 1806 he left Scotland in company with the Rev. John Patterson, with whom he continued to be associated in missionary labor and in friendship for a great part of his life. His original destination was the East Indies; but difficulties connected with the then existing policy of the East India Company led Mr. Henderson, who with his colleague Mr. Patterson had gone to Denmark with the view of a passage to India in a Danish ship, to alter his plans, and confine his future labors to the northern countries of Europe, including Denmark, Sweden, and portions of the Empire of Russia. Iceland and Finland, where, for various reasons, Christianity, or at all events the Bible, had almost ceased to exist, especially engaged his attention. His linguistic powers were of great use to him in his work, both in the publication of new versions of the Bible, and also in preaching the gospel among men whose languages were scarcely known, even by name, outside their own territories.

Mr. Henderson was led, chiefly by family reasons, to return to England in the year 1823, from which time he exchanged directly missionary labor for the not less important duty of training missionaries for the same work in which he had himself so long engaged, and in which he never ceased to take a lively interest. Thirty years of usefulness in academical labor at home followed his twenty years of foreign service. His first home employment was the theological tutorship in the seminary for the training of missionaries at Hoxton, which he held for five years with much acceptance. In 1830 he was appointed to the theological lectureship at Highbury. In 1850 he practically retired from public life, though still discharging occasional duties in connection with his profession as a minister of the gospel, till his powers failed him, and the end came. In addition to a number of popular reprints which appeared under his editorship, the works of Mr. Henderson (who in 1840 had received the degree of D.D. from the University of Copenhagen) comprise the following: Translation of Roos on the Prophecies of Daniel, Edin., 1811; Two Dissertations on Hans Mikkelsen's (Danish) Translation of the New Testament, Copenhagen, 1813; Iceland, or the Journal of a Residence in that Isle in 1814, 1815, Edin., 1818; Biblical Researches, and Travels in Russia, Lond., 1826; The Great Mystery of Godliness, 1813; An Appeal to the Members of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 1824; The Turkish New Testament Incapable of Defence, 1825; Divine Inspiration, 1836; Translation of Isaiah, with Commentary, 1840; Translation of Ezekiel, 1855; Translation of Jeremiah and Lamentations, 1851; and Translations of Minor Prophets, 1858. HENGSTENBERG, Ernst Wilhelm, a distinguished German theologian; b. Oct. 20, 1802, at Fröndenbergr, where his father was pastor of the Young Ladies' Institute; d. in Berlin, May 28, 1869. He was of delicate constitution, and educated in his father's house till 1819, when he entered the University of Bonn. He there devoted himself more particularly to the study of Aristotle under Brandis, and Arabic under Freytag. Fruits of these studies were an edition of the Arabic Moallakah of Amru'l Kais (Amrulkasi Moallakah cum scholiis, etc.), Bonn, 1823, which won the prize in philosophy, and a German translation of Aristotle's Metaphysics, Bonn, 1824. Lack of means preventing him from carrying out a desire to sit under Neander and Tholuck, he went to Basel in the capacity of tutor to J. J. Stähelin, afterwards professor of Oriental languages at the University of Basel. The death of his mother, and the comfort which he received from the Scripture in his bodily sufferings and mental gloom, awoke in him a strong faith in the gospel, and determined him to study theology, an intention which he once had had, but subsequently, at least in part, relinquished. He belonged to the Reformed Church; but, finding in the Augsburg Confession the best expression of his own views, he united with the Lutheran Church.

In 1824 he was teaching as privat-docent at the University of Berlin. From the very start he advocated the truth of the Old and New Testaments, and entered a protest against rationalism, especially in its attitude toward the Old Testament. These views brought him into disfavor with the ministry of worship, which endeavored, but in vain, to tempt him away from Berlin with offers of extraordinary professorships at Königsberg (1826) and Bonn (1828). In 1828 he became ordinary professor in Berlin; and his influence for nearly half a century over his students, as teacher and adviser, was exceeded only by that of Tholuck. He was married in 1829, and his home life was very pleasant; but all his children and his wife preceded him to the grave.

In 1827 Hengstenberg became editor of the Evangelische Kirchen-Zeitung ("Evang. Church Journal"), through which he perhaps exerted even a greater influence upon the theology and religious opinion of the age than through his critical and exegetical works. The plan of this journal was conceived by Le Coq, who communicated it to the brothers Von Gerlach. They selected Hengstenberg for editor, and for forty-two years he continued to edit the paper in the interest of evangelical truth, with fearless daring, and undaunted by the attacks of critics. Hardly a man of the century has been the object of so much bitter opposition and vituperation as he. He was accused of pietism, dead orthodoxy, fanaticism, Jesuitism, on the one hand, and of demagogism and servility to the State on the other. The main foe against which the paper contended was rationalism, "the born and sworn enemy of Christ and his Church." Without fear it condemned it as the "theology of the natural man," and held up its teachings and legitimate consequences before the people. One instance was its sharp and unsparing participation in the agitation for the removal of Wegscheider and Gesenius, professors in Halle, and rationalists, in 1830. "God's Word and the Confession of the Church" was its motto; and every real or supposed principle subversive thereof was condemned.

No less prominently did Hengstenberg stand forth as the champion of evangelical Christianity and as the opponent of rationalism in his critical and exegetical works. Of these the first was D. Christologie d. A. T. ("Christology of the Old Testament"), 3 vols., 1829-35, 2d ed., 1854-57 (English translation by Keith, 1835-39, and in Clarke's For. Theol. Lib., 1854-58). In this work the author proposes "to restore to the Old Testament its ancient and well established rights;" and according to Delitzsch he is acknowledged to have been "the one who again for the first time, and with a truly heroic enthusiasm of faith, uttered the word of the Lord over the Old Testament, which had been cut up into parts by a despiritualizing rationalism and a critical school bent on destruction, and viindi-cated for the Old Testament an exegesis from the Church's stand-point, without denying a real progress under divine leadership." Although he did not distinguish sharply enough between the Old and the New Testaments, and often carried spiritualizing too far, there can be no doubt, as Kahnis has said, that the work contributed largely to revive the recognition of the divine revelation of the Old Testament.

Hengstenberg's next most important exegetical work was his Commentary on the Psalms, 4 vols., 1842-47, 2d ed., 1849-52 (English translation, Edinburgh, 1844-48): In this department he also published Gesch. Bileams u. s. Weissagungen ("History of Balaam and his Prophecies," Edinburgh, 1848), Berlin, 1842; D. Hohelied Salomonis ("Song of Songs"), Berlin, 1855; D. Prediger Salomo ("Ecclesiastes," English translation, Philadelphia, 1860), Berlin, 1859; Weissagungen d. P. Ezechiel ("Ezekiel"), 2 parts, Berlin, 1867, 1868; D. Buch Hiob ("Job"), Berlin and Leipzig, 2 parts, 1870-75; Offenb. Johannis ("Revelation") 2 vols., 1849-51, 2d ed., 1862; Evang. Joh. ("Gospel of John"), 3 vols., 1861-63, 2d ed., 1867; Vorlesungen u. d. Leidengesch. ("Lectures on the Passion"), Leipzig, 1875. His historical-critical works are Beiträge z. Einl. ins A. T. ("Contributions to the Introduction of the Old Testament," English translation, Edinburgh, 1847, 1848), 3 vols., Berlin, 1831-39, in which he vindicates the Messianic character of Daniel's and Zechariah's prophecies, and the authenticity of the Pentateuch; Gesch. d. Reiches Gottes u. d. A. B. ("History of the Kingdom of God under the Old Covenant"), Berlin, 1869-71; D. Bücher Moses u. Aegypten ("The Books of Moses and Egypt"), Berlin, 1841, which Diestel calls his most meritorious work. He also published a number of smaller treatises (Freemasonry, 1854; Duelling, 1856, etc.), some of which had before appeared in the Church Journal. See BACHMANN: Hengstenberg n. s. Leben u. Wirken, 2 vols., Gütersloh, 1876-79. BACHMANN.

HENHÖFER, Aloys, b. at Völkersbach, Baden, July 11, 1789; d. at Spöck, near Carlsruhe, Dec. 5, 1862; was educated in the school of Rashatt; studied in the university of Freiburg and the seminary of Meersburg; received the lower orders by Dalberg, the higher by Hohenlohe; and was appointed pastor at Mühlhausen in 1818. Suspected of heresy, he was tried, convicted, and excommunicated from the Roman-Catholic Church in 1822: but the larger part of his congregation entered with him the evangelical church; and in 1823 he was appointed minister at Spöck, where he labored for the rest of his life with great effect. Of his numerous works, polemical against Romanism and rationalism, the principal are Christliches Glaubensbekenntniss und Der Kampf des Unglaubens mit Aberglauben und Glauben. His life was written by K. F. Ledderhose (Heidelberg, 1863) and by E. Frommel (Karlsruhe, 1865).

HENKE, Heinrich Philipp Konrad, b. at Hehlen in Brunswick, July 3, 1752; d. at Helmstädt, May 2, 1809; studied at Helmstädt; and was appointed professor there in philosophy (1777) and in theology (1780). He was a pupil and representative of the rationalism of his time; and even his best work (Allgemeine Geschichte der christlichen Kirche, Brunswick, 1799-1808, 6 vols.) has lost its interest. His life was written by Bollmann and Wolff, Helmstädt, 1816. — His son, Ernst Ludwig Theodor Henke, b. at Helmstädt, Feb. 22, 1804; d. at Marburg, Dec. 1, 1872; studied at Göttingen and Jena; was professor of theology at Marburg from 1839 to his death; wrote Georg Calixtus und seine Zeit, Halle, 1853–60, 2 vols., and published, together with Lindenkohl, the first complete edition of Abelard's Sic et Non, Marburg, 1851. His Neuere Kirchengeschichte (1874, 1878, and 1880, 3 vols.) and Nachgelassene Vorlesungen über Liturgie u. Homiletik (1876) were published in Halle. See MANGOLD: Ernst Ludwig Henke, Marburg, 1879. MANGOLD.

HENOTIKON, The, a "decree of union" or "instrument of union," probably drawn up by Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and issued by the Emperor Zeno (482), for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysite and Orthodox divisions of the Church. Neither party was satisfied with it, however. The Monophysites demanded a more explicit condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon, while the Orthodox were scandalized at the least shadow of disparagement. In the East, however, the Henotikon was made obligatory on all bishops and teachers. In the West it was anathematized by Felix II., and a schism of forty years followed, until the death of Anastasius (518); his successor, Justin, belonging to the Orthodox side, and suffering the Henotikon to fall into disuse without formally repealing it.

HENRY OF GHENT (Henricus de Gandavo), b. at Muyden, a suburb of Ghent, 1217; d. as archdeacon of Tournay, June 29, 1293; was a pupil of Albertus Magnus; taught philosophy and theology in Paris; obtained the surname of doctor solemnis, but formed no school, as he followed Plato in a time completely ruled by Aristotle. His principal works are Summa questionum ordinariarum and Quodlibeta theologica, a commentary on the metaphysics of Aristotle. See K. WERNER: Heinrich von Gent als Repräsentant des christlichen Platonismus im 13. Jahrhundert, Berlin, 1878. G. PLITT.

HENRY OF GORCUM (Henricus Gorcomius), b. at Gorcum, Holland, in the beginning of the fifteenth century; was vice-chancellor of Cologne; and wrote De ceremoniis ecclesiasticis, Commentaries on Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas, etc., besides several works (Contra Hussitas, etc.) which still remain in manuscript.

HENRY OF HUNTINGDON, canon of Lincoln, afterwards archdeacon of Huntingdon, wrote in the middle of the twelfth century a Historia Anglorum, from Cæsar to 1154, printed in Savile's Scriptores post Bedam, London, 1596, and translated into English by T. Forester, London, 1583. In D'Achery, Spicilegium, is found a Libellus de contemptu mundi, by him.

HENRY OF LANGENSTEIN (Henricus de Hassia), b. in Hesse, 1325; d. in Vienna, 1397; studied in Paris, where he afterwards taught philosophy, theology, astronomy, and mathematics, and was one of the leaders of the opposition to the prevailing materialism; and went in 1390 to Vienna as rector of the newly founded university. His principal works are Consilium pacis de unione ecclesie, in Hardt's Magnum Oecum. Const. Consil., T. II., and Secreta sacerdotum, in Fabricius: Bibliotheca mediæ et infimæ latinitatis. See HARTWIG: Heinrich von Langenstein, Marburg, 1858.

HENRY OF LAUSANNE, also called HENRY OF CLUGNY, was born in Switzerland or Italy towards the close of the eleventh century, and became a monk in Clugny, but left the monastery, put off the cowl, and began, starting from Lausanne, to wander from place to place, barefooted, carrying a cross in his hands, and preaching penitence, with singular effect. In 1116 he came to Mans, and was received with enthusiasm. But his attacks on the corruption of the Church and the depravity of the clergy caused a tremendous popular excitement; and Bishop Hildebert drew him away. For some time he wandered together with Peter of Bruys, whose heretical opinions, however, he did not share. But Peter was burnt at the stake; and in 1134 Henry was arrested by the Bishop of Arles, and brought before the Council of Pisa. The details of his trial are not known; but he was soon set free, and repaired to Southern France, where he continued his reformatory labor with great success. Whole congregations left their churches, and joined him; and in 1148 Pope Eugene III. sent Bernard of Clairvaux to Toulouse, to preach against him. He was again arrested, and condemned to lifelong imprisonment, but seems to have died shortly after. About his doctrines, only very little is found in the Acta Episcoporum Cenomannensium (Mabillon: Veterum Analectorum, T. III.); and what the letters of St. Bernard contain bears so strong an imprint of passion that it cannot be accepted without restrictions. See NEANDER: Der hl. Bernhard und sein Zeitalter, Berlin, 1813. DIBELIUS.

HENRY IV., king of France (1589–1610), was b. at Pau, in Béarn, Dec. 15, 1553; a son of Antoine de Bourbon-Vendôme and Jeanne d'Albret, Queen of Navarre, and was educated in the Reformed faith. From early youth he stood as the acknowledged head of the Huguenot party in France, not only on account of his high rank, but also on account of his brilliant military talent. On the death of his mother he ascended the throne of Navarre (1572), and in the same year he married Marguerite of Valois. But he escaped from the Massacre of St. Bartholomew only by abjuring his faith; and, during the three next years which he spent at the court of Catherine of Medicis, he seemed to have become entirely lost to the Protestant cause. Suddenly, however, he left the court (1576), re-entered the Calvinist Church, took the lead of the Huguenot party; and then followed a long series of inextricable intrigues, violent feuds, and regular campaigns, until at the death of Henry III. (in 1589), he found himself, according to the Salic law, the legitimate heir of the French crown. In order to gain the Roman Catholics, who formed the great majority of his subjects, he abjured a second time the Reformed faith, and solemnly entered the Roman Church, July 23, 1593. In order to satisfy the Protestants, his old friends and comrades, he signed the Edict of Nantes April 15, 1598; and from that time he reigned in peace and with great success.

That the conversion of Henry IV. was sincere, it is impossible to believe: he was one of the clearest heads of his age, and he was educated a Protestant. It was simply a political measure, an act of shrewdness, a stage-trick set in scene with all the circumstantiality which the intended effect demanded. More than once he confessed, with his usual incurable open-mouthedness, that he had joined Rome only to make sure of the French crown. But, even if his words had been silent, his acts would have told the truth. His internal policy was conciliatory, tolerably impartial, though rather in favor of the Roman Catholics. But his foreign policy was from the first to the last moment, in its highest aims and in its smallest details, so invariably, so steadily, so decidedly, set against Rome, Spain, the Catholic League in Germany, and for England, the Netherlands, the Protestant Union of Germany, that it soon became evident to the opposite party that there was only one means of preventing France from placing herself at the head of Protestant Europe against the Pope; namely, the death of the king. Consequently he was assassinated in his carriage in the streets of Paris, May 14, 1610, by Francis Ravallac, a former Jesuit.

HENRY VIII. OF ENGLAND. See ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.

HENRY, Matthew, a distinguished nonconformist divine and biblical commentator; b. Oct. 28, 1662, at Broad Oak, Flintshire; d. June 22, 1714, at Nantwich. He received his education under his father's (Rev. Philip Henry) roof, and in an academy at Islington. On account of the severe laws against the nonconformists, he began the study of law in London, 1685. It was, however, his strong desire to enter the ministry, and he preached from time to time, while pursuing the study of law, until 1687, when, toleration being granted to the nonconformists, he was ordained, and became pastor at Chester. In 1712 he accepted a call to Hackney, near London. The first Sunday of his settlement he expounded in the morning Gen. i., and in the afternoon Matt. i., intending to take up the whole Bible, chapter by chapter. On the return journey from a visit to Chester, he was seized with apoplexy, and died.

Mr. Henry is said to have been a good preacher; but his reputation rests upon his celebrated commentary, The Exposition of the Old and New Testaments. It was begun in 1704, and the Pentateuch was published 1706. He lived to complete it only as far as to the end of the Acts. This work is justly celebrated as the best of the English commentaries for devotional purposes. The author betrays a remarkable fertility of practical suggestion; and, although the work at first sight seems diffuse, it will be found on closer study to contain rich stores of tersely spoken truths, which hold the attention by their quaint freshness and aptness, and feed the spiritual life by their scriptural unction. It has no critical value; and Mr. Henry in the Preface expressly says, that, in this department, he leaves the reader to Poole's Synopsis. His object is thus stated in the Preface: "Some complain, after the stone is rolled away from the well, that the well is deep, and they have nothing to draw with. . . . Some such, perhaps, may find a bucket here, or water drawn to their hands; and pleased enough shall I be with this office of the Gibeonites to draw water for the congregation out of those wells of salvation." It is commendation enough for Henry's Commentary, to remember that three of the greatest preachers have used it incessantly, and commended it heartily, — Robert Hall, Whitefield, and Mr. Spurgeon. Whitefield read it through four times, the last time on his knees. Mr. Spurgeon says (Commenting and Commentaries, p. 3), "Every minister ought to read it entirely and carefully through once at least." The work has been republished many times since its author's death. The most accessible editions are Carter's, New York, in five and nine volumes, with Prefatory Remarks by ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER and Rev. EDWARD BICKERSTETH.

Mr. Henry published other works, such as a Life of Rev. Philip Henry (1696), Catechism for Children, and Scripture Catechism in the Method of the Assembly's (1702), etc. These are published in two volumes, under the title Miscellaneous Works of M. Henry, New York, 1855. His life has been written by TONG, London, 1716, Sir JOHN B. WILLIAMS, London, 1850. See also Memoir in Carter's edition.

HENRY, Paul Emile, b. at Potsdam, March 22, 1792; was pastor of the French Huguenot Church at Berlin; d. there Nov. 24, 1853. He wrote Das Leben Johann Calvin's, Berlin, 1844, 3 vols., afterwards abridged in 1 vol. (1846). It is rather a valuable collection of materials for a life than a good biography.

HENRY, Philip, a Presbyterian divine of much holiness of life, and father of Matthew Henry; b. at Whitehall, London, Aug. 24, 1631; d. at Broad Oak, June 24, 1696. He was educated at Westminster school, under Dr. Busby, graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1659 was presented with the living of Worthenbury. He refused to conform in 1662, and fell under the Five Mile Act (1665). He is remembered for the purity and exemplariness of his life. Bishop Wordsworth says he "could nowhere find nonconformity united with more Christian graces than in him." His Memoir was written by his son, MATTHEW HENRY, and is printed in the latter's Miscellaneous Works (New York, 1855, 2 vols.), and separately by the Tract Society, New York. See also Diaries and Letters of Philip Henry, edited by Matthew Henry Lee, London, 1882.

HENSCHEN, Gottfried, the associate of Bolland in the preparation of the famous Acta Sanctorum; b. at Venrad, in Flanders, Jan. 21, 1600; d. at Antwerp, 1681. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1619: in 1635, Bolland, whose pupil he had been, summoned him to his aid; and upon the Acta Henschen gladly spent the rest of his life. The present scope of the work was his idea, for Bolland had contemplated one much less elaborate. See the art. BOLLANDISTS; also, in Wetzler u. Welter (ed. I., vol. xii. 554, 555), art. Henschen, Gottfried.

HEPPE, Heinrich Ludwig Julius, Reformed theologian; b. in Cassel, March 30, 1820; d. at Marburg, July 25, 1879. He studied at the university of Marburg, 1839-43, in which, in 1850, he became professor extraordinary, and 1864 professor ordinary, of theology. Although not a man of first-class ability, he produced a number of useful works, which evince great industry and competent scholarship. His writings may be thus classified: Theological. — Die Dogmatik des Protestantismus im 16. Jahrhundert, Gotha, 1857, 8 vols.; Ursprung u. Geschichte d. Bezeichnungen "reformirte" u. "lutherische" Kirche, Gotha, 1859; Die Dogmatik d. evangelisch-reformirten Kirche, Elberfeld, 1860. Historical. — Geschichte d. hessischen Generalsynoden von 1568-82, Cassel, 1847, 2 vols.; Geschichte d. deutschen Protestantismus in d. Jahren 1555-85, Marburg, 1852-59, 4 vols., 2d ed., Frankfurt-a.-M., 1865, 1866; Zur Geschichte d. evangelischen Kirche Rheinlands u. Westphalens, Iserlohn, 1867; Geschichte d. theologischen Facultät zu Marburg, Marburg, 1873; Geschichte d. quietistischen Mystik in d. katholischen Kirche, Berlin, 1875; Kirchengeschichte beider Hessen, Marburg, 1876-78, 2 vols. Miscellaneous. — Gebetbüchlein, Marburg, 1852, 4th ed., 1876; Die confessionelle Entwicklung der hessischen Kirche, Frankfurt-a.-M., 1853; Die confessionelle Entwicklung d. alt. protestantischen Kirche Deutschlands, Marburg, 1854; Die Bekenntnisschriften d. reformirten Kirchen Deutschlands, Elberfeld, 1860; Philipp Melancthon, Marburg, 1860, 2d ed., 1867; Theodor Beza, Elberfeld, 1861; Die presbyteriale Synodalverfassung d. evangel. Kirche in Norddeutschland, Iserlohn, 1868, 2d ed., 1874; Die Verfassung d. evang. Kirche im ehem. Kurhessen, Marburg, 1869; Christliche Ethik und Christliche Sittenlehre, both Elberfeld, 1882.

HERACLAS, Bishop of Alexandria (232-247); was a Pagan by birth; studied philosophy under Ammonius Saccas; was converted to Christianity by Origen, whom he succeeded as director of the catechetical school. His stand-point was probably identical with that of Origen; but he was adroit enough to avoid giving offence, and after the death of Demetrius he was chosen bishop. He left no literary monuments.

HERACLEON. See GNOSTICISM.

HERBERGER, Valerius, b. at Fraustadt, Prussian Poland, April 21, 1562; d. there May 18, 1627; was school-teacher in his native city since 1584, and pastor of the evangelical church since 1598, and acquired a great name as a preacher. He published several collections of sermons, and his Postille is still read. See S. F. LAUTERBACH: Vita, Fama et Fata V. H., 1708.

HERBELOT, Barthelémy d', Orientalist; b. in Paris, Dec. 4, 1625; d. there Dec. 8, 1695. His life was spent upon the composition of his invaluable thesaurus of Oriental learning, — Bibliothèque orientale, ou dictionnaire universel contenant généralement tout ce qui regarde la connaissance de peuples de l'Orient, edited by A. Galland, Paris, 1697. It is mainly an abridged translation of the immense biographical and bibliographical cyclopædia of Hajji Khalfa, but enlarged from various sources. In spite of its occasional inaccuracies and inconsistencies, it is "the one available source for much information to others than Oriental scholars; and as such it retains its importance." It was reprinted, unaltered, Maestricht, 1776, and, with additions by Galand, The Hague, 1777-79, 4 vols.; reprinted in Maestricht, 1780; German translation, Halle, 1785-90, 4 vols.

HERBERT, Edward. See DEISM.

HERBERT, George, one of the quaintest but holiest poets of England; b. at Montgomery, Wales, April 3, 1593; d. at Bemerton, Eng., February, 1633. He was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge (1615), and public orator of the university (1619-27), in which capacity he came in contact with King James, and was for a time more or less a courtier; but in 1625 he took holy orders, and was in 1630 made rector of Bemerton. His life as a minister was so exemplary and so devoted, that he was called "Holy George Herbert." His fame rests upon his poems, The Temple, Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations, Cambridge, 1633. They abound in oddities of expression, but breathe so pure and holy a spirit that they are religious classics, and give Herbert claim to be, with Keble, the poet of Anglican theology. Herbert's prose-work, The Priest to the Temple, or the Character of a Country Parson, is an excellent treatise upon pastoral theology. It has doubtless helped Herbert's reputation that Izaak Walton was his biographer (1670). There are many editions of Herbert. Perhaps the best is that by Professor Nichol, London, 1863. Coleridge edited his complete works, London, 1846.

HERDER, Johann Gottfried, b. Aug. 25, 1744, at Mohrungen, East Prussia; d. at Weimar, Dec. 18, 1803; studied theology, philosophy, languages, and literature, at Königsberg, where he acquired the friendship of Kant and Hamann, and was in 1764 appointed teacher in the cathedral-school of Riga, and in 1767 afternoon-preacher in one of the suburban churches. In Riga he first distinguished himself as a pulpit-orator, drawing larger and larger audiences; and at the same time he also attracted the attention of literary Germany by his Fragmente über die deutsche Literatur and Kritische Wälder. In 1769 he left Riga, accompanied the Prince of Holstein-Eutin for some time, made in Strassburg the acquaintance of Goethe and Jung-Stilling, and was in 1771 appointed court-preacher and superintendent at Bückeberg. To this period of his life belong, of his theological writings, the Provinzialblätter, Älteste Urkunde des Menschengeschlechts, Erläuterungen aus einer neueröffneten morgenländischen Quelle, and Briefe zweier Brüder Jesu, which made a deep impression, and established it as an axiom in biblical exegesis, that the Bible is not simply a doctrinal code, a dogmatical system, but a whole literature, which must be viewed in the light of its time, its place, and its historical surroundings, in order to be fully understood. In 1776 he moved to Weimar as court-preacher and superintendent-general, and there published the ripest and most important of his works, philosophical as well as theological. To the former class belong his Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte, Gott, etc.; to the latter, his Lieder der Liebe (1778), half a paraphrase of, half a commentary on, the Canticles, Vom Geist hebräischer Poesie (1782), which remodelled the whole conception, popular and scientific, of Hebrew poetry, and especially his so-called Christliche Schriften, which gave the first impulse to that immense literature generally known under the name of The Life of Christ. Not belonging to any special theological school, Herder formed no school himself; but, by his wide historical horizon and vivid psychological intuition, he exercised an elevating and ennobling influence on almost all departments of theological science and Christian life. Of the common edition of his collected works, his theological writings occupy the first twelve volumes.

HEREFORD, an English bishopric, the cathedral of which is situated in the town of this name. The see was detached from Lichfield in 673. Hereford is situated on the left bank of the Wye, has a population of nineteen thousand. The cathedral was founded 825, rebuilt 1030, burnt by the Welsh 1055, again rebuilt 1079-1115: the great western tower fell 1786. There have been two modern restorations, — 1842 and 1863. The cathedral is three hundred and forty-two feet long. "But for the fall of the western tower, the consequent curtailment of the nave, and other solecisms, few cathedrals could offer so complete a field of progressive architecture, from Early Norman to latest Perpendicular." The present (1882) incumbent of the see of Hereford is John Atlay, D.D., and the income is forty-two hundred pounds.

HERESY (αἵρεσις, "a selection") designates in the New Testament a party or school; and the Pharisees (Acts xv. 5, xxvi. 5), the Sadducees (Acts v. 17), and even the Christians (Acts xxiv. 14, xxviii. 22), are called "heresies." The use of the term, however, in connection with schisms, proves that it did not exclusively designate dissent in matters of doctrine (1 Cor. xi. 19; Gal. v. 20). At a later period the term was employed principally in the sense of doctrinal departures from revealed truth, or erroneous views (Tit. iii. 10; 2 Pet. ii. 1).

The apostles treated very seriously all departures from their doctrine. We need only think of such expressions as "grievous wolves" (Acts xx. 29), "dogs" (Phil. iii. 2), and the terms in which Paul speaks of the Judaizing teachers in the Galatian Church, and of the Gnostic teachers referred to in the Epistle to the Colossians and the Pastoral Letters. With no less severity did the fathers of the first three centuries treat departures from the catholic doctrine. Polycarp regarded Marcion as the first-born of the Devil. Ignatius sees in heretics poisonous plants, or animals in human form. Justin and Tertullian condemn their errors as inspirations of the Evil One;

Theophilus compares them to barren and rocky islands on which ships are wrecked; and Origen says, that as pirates place lights on cliffs to allure and destroy vessels in quest of refuge, so the Prince of this world lights the fires of false knowledge in order to destroy men. [Jerome calls the congregations of the heretics synagogues of Satan (Ep. 123), and says their communion is to be avoided like that of vipers and scorpions (Ep. 130)]. They included under heresy all dissent from the fundamental doctrines of salvation, attributed it to insubordination to the apostolic faith, and regarded pride and ambition as its ultimate causes.

The apostles and fathers could not have tolerated all possible construction of its doctrine without being guilty of treason toward the Church of Christ. The same is true, in a smaller measure, of the Reformation period. Luther could not have tolerated the Zwinglian view of the Lord's Supper without doing violence to his own convictions of the meaning of Scripture [?]. But, while the fathers were justified in insisting upon the fundamental truths of Christianity, it ought not to be overlooked that they knew how to distinguish between doctrines subversive of Christianity (such as Ebionism, Gnosticism, and Manichæism) and dissent in unessentials (as in the case of the Montanists, Novatians, Donatists, etc.). The baptism of Novatians, Donatists, Arians, etc., was recognized as valid (Augustine, De Bapt., I. 13, etc.). Heresy disturbed the unity of doctrine and of fellowship in the early Church. The Church was, therefore, forced to exclude heretics from its communion. Once excluded, they formed societies of their own. This was the case with the Novatians, Gnostics, Manichæans, Donatists, Nestorians, etc. But, relatively justified as the Donatists and others were, all these heretical organizations lacked vital power, and soon succumbed to disintegration, or dragged out a lingering existence. On the other hand, the Church was represented by such figures as "the pillar of truth," "the body of Christ." "No one can have God as a father, who does not accept the Church as his mother," says Cyprian; or "Christ for head, who does not belong to the Church as the body," says Augustine. Notwithstanding this sharp distinction, Augustine and the early Church generally regarded only such false doctrine heresy which is persistent, and prompted by animosity to the Church (perinacis animositate).

In the middle ages the Latin Church pronounced the Eastern Church schismatic, and itself the catholic or universal Church. The procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son (Filioque), adopted as a doctrine at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), has never been accepted by the Eastern Communion. But the Latin Church has never pronounced the Greek doctrine heretical. The dualistic errors of the Cathari, however, it did; and, when the Reformation came, it pursued the new sects with fire and sword.

If the visible Church be the body of those who confess Christ, then the Latin, Eastern, and Protestant churches are parts of the one Church. The Latin Church, however, appropriating to itself the appellation "catholic," calls the Greeks "schismatics," and the Protestants "heretics." If it be the Church, then the congregations outside of its pale do not belong to the Church, or participate in salvation; for the Church is the channel of salvation. Roman-Catholic theologians have avoided this conclusion by distinguishing between two kinds of heretics, — material heretics, or those who hold to error in ignorance, and are free from guilt, and formal heretics, or those who wittingly and resolutely put themselves in antagonism to the Church (Perrone, Prælectiones, § 265). The Protestant Church does not pretend to be the Church, but only a part of it. Its confessions never declared either the Roman or the Eastern Church heretical, nor did the Lutheran Church call the Reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper a heresy.

What, then, is the fundamental idea of heresy? Heresy is erroneous doctrine which has grown up in the Church, but denies its essential teachings as they were formulated by early Christianity. If that which is peculiar to and essential in Christianity is the confession in the Apostles' Creed of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, — three persons in a unity of essence, — then Tritheism, Ebionism, Monarchism, and Arianism are heresies. If Christ is the God-Man, then Docetists, Samositians, Monophysites, and Nestorians are heretics; and if it be the office of the Holy Spirit alone to apply the benefits of redemption, and to regenerate, then the Pelagians belong in the same category.

Among the mistakes of the visible Church, which for many centuries disturbed the spiritual vision of Christians, and led to horrible crimes in the name of religion, must be counted the delusion that heresy ought to be punished by the civil power. While Luther raised his voice in indignation at the blood of the first heretic, Augustine found in the words of our Lord (Luke xiv. 23), "compel them to come in," a justification of the interference of the State to check the growth of heresy. Could he have read the commentary which the persecutions of the Albigenes, the holocausts of the Inquisition, and the St. Bartholomew's Night, wrote to his words, he would not have been content, as he was, with simply saying that he did not desire that heretics should be put to death. But even Protestants have been guilty of holding the doctrine that heretics should be put to death. Not only was Servetus burned at Geneva, but Calvin defended the right of the civil power to punish heretics with death by the sword in a tract published 1544: Defensio orthodoxæ fidei . . . ubi ostenditur hæreticos jure gladii coerendos esse, etc. ("A defence of the orthodox faith . . . wherein is shown that heretics should be coerced by the punishment of the sword," etc.). Luther's words speak the truth: "To burn heretics is contrary to the will of the Holy Ghost" (Grund u. Ursache aller Artikel, so durch d. röm. Bulle un-rechtlich verdammt worden, 1520). For a discussion of the treatment of heretics see INQUISITION.

HERIGER, b. in Flanders, in the first half of the tenth century; came in 965 to Lobbes or Lobach, a monastery situated on the Sambre in Hainaux, and at that period the seat of a famous school; became teacher in the school, and in 990 abbot of the monastery, and died there Oct. 31, 1007. Besides some historical works (Gesta episcoporum Tungrensium, etc.), and a mathematical work (Regula de abaco), he wrote a work in defence of Paschasius Radbertus, from which it appears that the doctrine of transubstantiation had not yet become generally adopted by the Church. HERLE, Charles, b. at Prideaux Herle, Cornwall, Eng., 1598; d. Winwick, Lancashire, September, 1659. He entered Exeter College, Oxford, in 1612, and took his master's degree in 1618. He settled as a minister, at first in Devonshire, but soon after became rector of Winwick in Lancashire, where he remained until his death. He was appointed one of the Westminster Assembly of Divines in 1643, and, after the death of Dr. Twisse, as prolocutor of the same; in which position he continued to the close. He was a generous-minded Puritan and Presbyterian, with an irenic spirit, and took an active part in the organization of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire, and in providing a learned and faithful ministry for the churches, and excluding the scandalous and ignorant, for which he received much ill-deserved reproach. His principal works are of a practical character: Contemplations and Devotions, pp. 546, London, 1631; Independency on Scriptures of the Independency of the Churches, 4to, pp. 44, London, 1643 (irenic towards the Independents); Wisdom's Tripos, London, 1655, in which he shows the excellency of Christian wisdom above that of worldly policy and moral prudence. He also delivered several sermons before Parliament, of which we would mention A Pair of Compasses for Church and State, November, 1642, and David's Song, June, 1643. HERMAN, Nicolaus, one of the earliest evangelical hymn-writers; was cantor at Joachimsthal in Bohemia, and died there May 3, 1561. His hymns, intended for the school and the home, rather than for the church, appeared originally single on fly-leaves, and then in two collections, 1560 and 1562. Some of them are still in use. His "Mine hour appointed is at hand," was translated by Massie, and was sung at the funeral of Prince Albert in 1861. His life was written by

K. F. Ledderhose, Halle, 1855, and by E. Pfeifer, Berlin, 1858.

HERMANN or HERIMANN CONTRACTUS (the lame), b., of noble descent, July 18, 1013; entered, when he was only seven years old, the monastery of Reichenau, situated on an island in Lake Constance; took the vows when he was thirty; and d. in 1054. He was a man of vast learning and varied authorship; but his principal work is his chronicle, from the birth of Christ till 1054, and specially valuable for the time of Henry III. It was first printed at Basel, 1529, afterwards often. See PERTZ: Monum., V.; HANS JACOB: Herman der Lahme, Mainz, 1875.

HERMANN OF FRITZLAR, a mystic from the middle of the fourteenth century; was probably a rich layman, who, after travelling in France, Italy, and Germany, retired from the world, and devoted himself to study and authorship. His Die Blume der Schauung is lost; but his Heiligenleben, a compilation from sources now mostly lost, is printed in PFEIFFER: Deutsche Mystiker d. 14. Jahrhunderts, I.

HERMANN VON DER HARDT, b. at Melle, Westphalia, Nov. 15, 1660; d. at Helmstädt, Feb. 28, 1746; studied at Jena; became in 1686 a member of the Collegium Philobiblicum in Leipzig; staid for some time in Dresden in the house of Spener; and was in 1690 appointed professor of Oriental languages at Helmstädt. There he developed a very comprehensive literary activity, his writings numbering about three hundred; but he entirely abandoned his pietistic tendency, and pursued a strongly pronounced rationalistic course until in 1727, on account of his Ænigmata Prisci Orbis he was dismissed from his office, and forbidden to publish any thing without special permit. His principal works are Authographa Lutheri (1690), Magnum Œcumenicum Constantiense Concilium (1697-1700), Historia literaria Reformationis (1717), etc.,—all more or less unreliable on account of the author's passion for the paradoxical. P. TSCHACKERT.

HERMANN VON WIED, or HERMANN V., b. Jan. 15, 1477; d. Aug. 15, 1552; was elected Archbishop of Cologne by the chapter in 1515, and confirmed by Leo X. In 1536 he convened a provincial synod, and introduced a number of reforms in his diocese, though without causing any conflict with Rome. But in 1542 he invited Butzer from Strassburg to preach the Reformed faith in the cathedral of Bonn; and at once began the attacks of the Roman curia and the opposition of his own chapter. When the contest became critical, the emperor, Charles V., stepped in; and, as the Protestant princes were unwilling to interfere, the archbishop was deposed, and retired to his estates at Wied. See C. VARRENTRAPP: Hermann v. Wied u. sein Reformationsversuch in Köln, Leipzig, 1878.

HERMAS [“the Pilgrim's Progress of the Church of the second century,” Dean Stanley], a name under which a book has come down to us, called the Shepherd (pastor, ποιμήν), and held in high esteem by the early Church [quoted by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, etc.]. The title Shepherd evidently was derived from the first words of the angel to the author, “I am the shepherd” (Ἐγώ εἰμι ὁ ποιμήν).

Text.—We are now in possession of two Greek copies,—the one in the Sinaitic manuscript, discovered 1859 (not complete); the other in the Leipzig manuscript, together with three pages found on Mount Athos. Editions appeared at Leipzig by RUD. ANGER (1856), TISCHENDORF (1856), DRESSEL (1863), HILGENFELD (1866), [2d ed. 1881]. There are two Latin translations,—the Vulgata and the Palatina (in the Vatican Library). The Vulgata was first edited by Faber Stapulensis, Paris, 1513; since then many times. Hilgenfeld's edition (Leipzig, 1873) is critical. D'Abbadie issued an Ethiopic translation, Leipzig, 1860. Its probable date is 543. The edition of Gebhardt and Harnack (Patres Apost., Leipzig, 1877), based upon the Sinaitic manuscript, is the best.

Contents.—The book contains a number of visions accorded to Hermas. Their intent is to arouse Hermas, and the Church through him, to repentance. The time of repentance is limited, and will soon be at an end. The uniformity of style stamps the whole as one composition. The author divides the book into two parts; an aged woman explaining the visions of the first part, an angel those of the second. The visions contain revelations, commandments (to believe in the one God, practise alms, avoid falsehood and fornication, etc.), and similitudes. Hermas was neither a Judaizing Christian (Schwegler, Lipsius), nor an intense Paulinian, but a member of the orthodox church of his day.

Authorship.—The opinions may be reduced to four: (1) Relying upon the testimony of the Muratorian canon, a real Hermas, the brother of Bishop Pius (139-154), was author (Heyne, Gebhardt, Harnack); (2) Relying upon the statement in the book itself (Vis. II. 4, 3), that Hermas delivered the book to Clement, assumed to be Clement of Rome, the author is regarded as having been his contemporary (Gaab, Caspari, Alzog, Zahn); (3) Hermas wrote his book under Pius, but gave himself out for a contemporary of Clement, or for the Hermas of Rom. xvi. 14 (Behm, Ewald, Credner, Ritschl, Hefele, Dorner, Thiersch); (4) an unknown author of the second century who simulated the old Hermas (Schwegler, Lechler, Hilgenfeld, Lange, Donaldson). We hold to the first view, on the ground of the explicit statement in the Muratorian canon. The Clement referred to in the book is not necessarily Clement of Rome. The condition of the Church represented is that of the first half of the second century, with its Gnostic errors and its hypocrites. The work was probably written about 130, for we are not shut up to the period between 139-154, which, according to Lipsius, was the term of Pius' administration. Pius was not bishop in our sense, but a prominent presbyter. The book of Hermas speaks only of presbyters in the Roman Church (comp. Vis. II. 2, 6; III. 8, etc.).

HERMENEUTICS, Biblical. I. DEFINITION.

—The term "hermeneutics" is derived from ἑρμηνεία (from Ἑρμῆς, the messenger of the gods), and allied with εἰρω ("to inquire"), and has the broader meaning of explaining the thoughts of another (Xen., Mem., I. 2, 52; Thuc., II. 60), and the narrower meaning of translation (John i. 38, etc.). Hermeneutics differs from exegesis as the theory differs from practice, and has for its object the definition of the laws by which the meaning of the Scriptures is to be ascertained and communicated. Augustine spoke long ago of two qualifications of an interpreter of Scripture, — the capacity to find out the author's meaning, and the capacity to express it ("Modus inveniendi quæ intelligenda sunt et modus proferendi, quæ intellecta sunt," — De Doct. Chr., I. 1); and Ernesti speaks in the same way ("Subtilitas intelligendi et explicandi").

II. PLACE. — There was an exegesis of the Bible before there was a science of exegesis; and hermeneutics cannot make an exegete, any more than homiletics can make a preacher, or rhetoric an orator. Notwithstanding this, however, hermeneutics has its own place, and trains up the natural talent, and lays down laws for its exercise. "The same considerations," as Landerer has said, "which make theology, or the science of the true religion, necessary, make also hermeneutics necessary as a special theological discipline." It is a branch of historical theology, or more especially of exegetical theology, which investigates the historical origin of Christianity, and expounds its records. It regards the canon as fixed, and rests upon the shoulders of the science of biblical introduction, as well as upon those of biblical criticism, which is concerned with the integrity of the text. But on the other side, without the aid of hermeneutics, the occasion of the biblical writings and their design cannot be fully known; and even textual criticism depends to some extent upon the exposition of the text. The relation of hermeneutics, therefore, and biblical criticism and introduction, is one of mutual dependence.

III. METHOD. — The method which hermeneutics pursues is twofold, — the ascertainment of the meaning of Scripture, and its communication. The ascertainment of the author's thoughts is conditioned upon the accurate study of the language in which he has clothed them. The laws of grammar are to be strictly followed, and all the results of lexicographical learning to be applied. But it must not be forgotten that the man himself is the style, and that the thoughts of the author regulate the language; so that the letter of the grammar is by no means an infallible guide. In the interpretation of the Psalms and the Epistle to the Philippians, for example, it is necessary that the mood of the writer, and his peculiar environments, should be taken into consideration. Schleiermacher well says, "No biblical book can be perfectly understood, except as it is studied with reference to the whole environment out of which it grew, and in connection with the position of author and readers" (Kurze Darstell., § 140). There is also a subjective qualification; namely, that the interpreter is able to enter into the thoughts of the author, and is willing to do it. Experience teaches that only kindred souls can understand each other; or, as Luther says, "He only understands Virgil's Eclogues who has lived with the shepherds; and he who will understand a poet must travel to the poet's country." The interpreter must have religious feeling, but under no circumstances approach his work with dogmatic prepossessions. Bengel says, "A living faith is the first qualification of a biblical interpreter;" and Landerer says, "The interpreter must be led by the spirit of truth which rules in the Bible." Absolute freedom from prepossessions is as impossible as it is uncalled for. Indifferent to the truth of the Scripture he can not and ought not to be.

The communication of the meaning of the biblical writer may be effected in three ways, — by simple translation, by paraphrase, and by commentary. Paraphrases have their justification in the pregnancy and fullness of Scripture. As for the commentator, he should not merely give grammatical criticisms, but give a clear insight into the organism and aim of the book upon which he is commenting.

IV. PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION. — Departures from the true method of interpretation result from a failure to appreciate all the requirements of the exegete, and from a purpose, voluntary or involuntary, to put into the author's words a meaning which is not there. The first in point of historical origin is the allegorical method. The word comes from ἀλληγορεῖν, which means to say something else than is expressed in the language. The allegorist therefore seeks to uncover a meaning which is not apparent on the surface; the presumption being, that the Spirit has concealed a sense behind the words, of which the human writers were not even conscious. According to this principle, there is a simple meaning, but also another, which the interpreter is to detect. This method was carried to ridiculous extremes in the ancient church and during the middle ages; and Luther says, "When I was a monk, I allegorized every thing; but now I have given up allegorizing, and my first and best art is to explain the Scriptures according to the simple sense (simplici sensu); for it is in the literal sense that power, doctrine, and art reside." The dogmatic method led to about the same results as the allegorical. The interpreter approaches the Bible with a rule of faith which is the norm of interpretation. In a special sense is this true of Roman-Catholic interpreters, who may not depart from the ecclesiastical tradition and the decrees of councils. Löhnis well expresses it, when he says (p. 151), "As a diplomat must explain and look at every thing in the spirit, and with an eye to the interest, of his prince . . . so must the Catholic expositor follow the instructions, and interpret in the spirit, of the Catholic Church." Interpretation is thus made in a true sense of the word impossible.

The so-called rational method, according to which the interpreter is to approach the Bible with a mind absolutely devoid of prepossessions, did the very thing which its advocates professed to deprecate. The last method is the so-called emphatic method, by which the meaning of every special word is emphasized, and, as far as possible, enlarged.

V. HISTORY. — The interpretation of Scripture flourished long before hermeneutics was reduced to a science, just as preaching was practised before there was a science of homiletics. Not only the rabbins, but also Christ and the apostles, interpreted the Old Testament; the only difference being that the latter nowhere prove a religious and ethical principle which is false (Landerer). The rabbins and Philo both practised the allegorizing method; the former using it as a bridge to the ceremonial laws and false Messianic hopes which we meet in Christ's time; the latter, to Neo-Platonism. The apostolic fathers likewise applied it to extract from the Old Testament that which was specifically Christian. This was the case with Clement of Rome, Barnabas, and Justin Martyr, who speaks of the gift of interpretation as a special grace, but derives the capacity to allegorize from this. The real home of this method was Alexandria. Clement, who spoke of all Scripture as being uttered, as it were, in a parable (Strom., V. 575), was followed by Origen, who vigorously pursued this method, and found three senses in Scripture, corresponding to the three divisions of man's nature, — body, soul, and spirit. Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) carried allegorizing to a great excess in his commentaries on the Old Testament.

The Antiochian school was the birthplace of a principle of interpretation opposed to that of Origen. It sought to do justice to the literal sense, and to the historical environment of the biblical authors, and found its principal advocate in Theodore, Bishop of Mopsuestia (d. 429). His somewhat jejune method did not pass over to Chrysostom (d. 407), who, however, practised allegorizing in moderation, and more moderately than Theodoret (d. 457), in his commentaries on the Old Testament.

The contemporary exegetical productions of the Western Church were neither as extensive nor as important as those of the East. Jerome (d. 420) deserves the first mention, on account of his philological attainments. He not only advocates the triple sense of Origen, but even speaks of a "forest of senses" (silva sensuum, Ep. 64). Augustine (d. 430), in his rules for the treatment of the Scriptures (De Doctr. Christ., III.), gives some valuable hints, and emphasizes the importance of the literal sense. Gregory the Great (d. 604), in his exposition of Job, does almost every thing else but explain the literal meaning of the text. Isidore of Seville (d. 636) only made a collection from the works of his predecessors. Walafrid Strabo's (d. 849) Glosses (Glossa ordinaria in biblia) continued to be used for a long time, and were cited by Petrus Lombardus (d. 1164) as the authority (auctoritas dicit). More valuable contributions were offered in the Orient by Eucumenius (tenth century), Theophylact (d. 1107), and Euthymius Zigabenus (twelfth century). Nicolaus of Lyra in Normandy (d. 1340) dealt more honestly with the text in his Postilla Perpetua, but shows the influence of the humanism which later affected Laurentius Valla (d. 1457), Faber Stapulensis (d. 1536), and especially Erasmus (d. 1536), in their Annotationes.

The Reformation marks a new period in the history of biblical interpretation. Luther and Melancthon only cursorily give hints of their exegetical principles; but both wrote extensive commentaries, and avoid the allegorical method except where it may serve the purpose of illustration. Zwingli also wrote commentaries, and made it his main end to get at the grammatical sense. But the great commentator of the Reformation was John Calvin, whose principles of interpretation are enlarged upon in his Prefaces to the Psalms and Romans. He was strongly opposed to allegorizing, and sought to reproduce the author's train of thought.

Hermeneutics was first treated as a special science in the Lutheran Church by Flacius, in his Clavis Sac. Script. (Basel, 1567), Franz, in his Tract. philol. de interpr. Sac. Script. (Wit., 1619), and especially by Glassius, Philol. Sacra (Jena, 1629, ed. Buddeus, 1727). The intense dogmatism which followed in the Lutheran Church was opposed by the historical method which the Arminian Grotius (d. 1645) pursued in his Annotationes on the whole Bible. But of more influence upon exegesis was the Pietism of the latter part of the seventeenth century, which regarded it more as an exercise of worship than a work of science. Spener (d. 1705) interpreted several of the New-Testament writings under the influence of this theory; but Bengel (d. 1752) followed with the keen and suggestive notes of his Gnomon (Tüb., 1742); and a few years later Ernesti (d. 1781) became the eloquent champion of a strictly philological and grammatical exegesis in his Institutio interpretis N. T. (Lips., 1761, 5th ed., 1809, Eng. trans. by Terrot, 1843). Without denying its divine character, he held that the Bible should be interpreted by the same rules as any other book. Semler (d. 1791), on the other hand, advocated the so-called historical method, according to which the interpreter places himself in the environment of the writers. Ernesti's principles were followed by Beck (Monogrammata herm. libr. N. T., Lips., 1803) and Keil (Lehrb. d. Herm. d. N. T., Leip., 1810); Semler's, by Bretschneider (Hist.-dogm. Ausleg. d. N. T., Leip., 1806), and, to a greater or less extent, by the exegetes of the rationalistic period, — Paulus (d. 1851), and others. In this century criticism has seen itself forced by the works of Strauss, and the historical investigations of the Tübingen school, to pursue a strictly historical method. But in the mean time Winer, by his Grammar (Leip., 1822), had laid the "sure foundation of New-Testament exegesis." Thus the exegesis of the last two generations has been built up on a grammatical-historical foundation. See EXEGESIS and INTRODUCTION.

HERMES and the HERMESIANS. Georg Hermes, b. at Dreyerwalde, Westphalia, April 22, 1775; d. at Bonn, May 26, 1831; studied theology and philosophy in the academy of Münster; was ordained priest in 1799, and in 1819 appointed professor of theology at Bonn. His writings are few (Ueber die innere Wahrheit des Christenthums, 1805; Einleitung in die christkatholische Theologie, I. 1819, II. 1829; Christkatholische Dogmatik, edited after his death by his pupil, J. H. Achterfeld, 1834); but the influence he exercised personally and as a teacher was both wide and deep. Not only the theological faculty of Bonn — Achterfeld, professor in morals and practical theology; Braun, in church history and exegesis; Vogel-sang, in dogmatics; and Müller, in exegesis — was wholly devoted to his ideas, but also the episcopal seminaries throughout the whole Rhine region; and in many places, as, for instance, in the diocese of Cologne, as long as Spiegel was archbishop, his pupils were openly and avowedly preferred. Nevertheless, as his power and influence increased, his relation to the Roman-Catholic Church was questioned. There was no dogma which he did not accept fully and without qualification; but his assertion, that, even if the dogmas of the Roman-Catholic Church had no other authority, reason would, when rightly applied, be compelled by itself to accept them, indicated a principle of speculation incompatible with the maxims of the Roman-Catholic Church; and the bold application of this principle to the development of their dogmatic system naturally appeared very dangerous in the eyes of the hierarchy. In September, 1835, a papal brief suddenly and unexpectedly met the movement with a detailed and unconditional condemnation. The Hermesians tried to avoid the blow by declaring that the views condemned by the papal brief were indeed abominable, but they were not theirs, nor were they to be found in the writings of Hermes; and two of the most prominent pupils of Hermes — Braun of Bonn, and Elvenich of Breslau — repaired to Rome to urge a new investigation. In this they failed, however; and at home a strong re-action set in against the Hermesians, especially in the diocese of Cologne, where Droste-Vischering had succeeded Spiegel. In a short time the movement died out, or was suppressed.

HERMIAS, the author of a satire on Greek philosophy (διασυρμος των έξω φιλοσόφων), written from a Christian stand-point, not without wit and adroitness, though without scientific interest, and probably belonging to the close of the second or the beginning of the third century. Neither the book nor the author is mentioned in ancient literature. The book was edited by Seiler (Zürich, 1553), Dommerich (Halle, 1764), and Otto in Corpus Apolog., vol. IX. (Jena, 1872, with ample introductions. WAGENMANN.

HERMOGENES, an African heretic, a painter by profession, and probably a resident of Carthage, against whom Tertullian wrote his Adversus Hermogenem, between 199 and 207 (cf. BONWETSCH: Die Schriften Tertullians, Bonn, 1878). His principal tenet, the root of all his errors, was the eternity of matter. He seems to have written books, and he had pupils; but he formed no school. Theodoret, Origen, and Theophilus of Antioch, also wrote against him; but the notices of him found outside of Tertullian are often difficult to reconcile with each other. G. UHLHORN.

HER'MON (peak), the present Jebel-esh-Sheikh (the chief mountain), the highest point of Anti-Lebanon, situated forty miles north-east of the Sea of Galilee, and thirty miles south-west of Damascus; rises 9,053 feet above the Mediterranean, and about 11,000 feet above the valley of the Jordan. It consists of three distinct peaks, and is covered with ice and snow all the year round, though in summer time only in the ravines. It formed the north-eastern boundary of Israel (Deut. iii. 8; Josh. xii. 1), and is often mentioned in the Old Testament. In the New Testament it is not mentioned, unless it be the scene of the transfiguration (Matt. xvii.; Mark ix.). In many points it fits the narrative of the Gospels better than Tabor.

HER'OD. — [1. The Herodian Family, a family which for a century played a most conspicuous part in Jewish history, and witnessed the birth and career of Jesus of Nazareth, and the progress of the Apostolic Church; came in conflict with, used, intermarried with, and finally exterminated, the once noble Asmonean family (see MACCABEES); catered at any cost to the Roman power, and in more than one instance won the warmest friendship of its emperors; ascended the throne of Judæa, rebuilt the temple, and gave to the kingdom an external glory and importance which were never excelled, except in the reigns of David and Solomon. It gave birth to men of fine intellects, strong wills, and unusual talent for ruling, — a talent, which, as exhibited in Herod the Great, as has been well said, might, with other environments, have won for him a name amongst the great rulers of nations. But, with these natural endowments of intellect, they combined an unscrupulousness in securing the ends of their ambition, and a licentiousness, which have seldom been equalled in history. Herod the Great's throne was bathed in the blood of his relations; and the intermarriages within the family were so numerous, that their genealogy becomes a problem no less complicated than astounding. But in the now violent, now loathsome deaths of some of their number, one may be permitted to see the nemesis of defied law.

The founder of the family was Antipap, an

Idumean (Joseph., Antiq., XIV. 1, 3), who was made governor (στανάρχος) of Idumea by Alexander Jannæus (d. 78). He was succeeded in this position by his son Antipater (d. 43), the father of Herod the Great. He was an ambitious man, and saw in the weak will of the Asmonean prince, Hyrcanus II., a handle for his plans. When the latter was forced by his brother Aristobulus (in 69) to renounce his royal claims and high priestly office, Antipater's artifice succeeded in inducing him to escape from Jerusalem, and assert his rights. The close friendship between them continued. They together espoused Pompey's cause (64 B.C.), and, after the battle of Pharsalus, Cæsar's (48 B.C.). Cæsar rewarded both, confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, but made the wily Idumean procurator of Judæa (47). The object of his ambition was probably gratified. It remained for his son to win the name and dignities of the royal office.]

2. Herod the Great, king of Judæa from 37 to 4 B.C.; of Idumean descent, and second son of Antipater. He was a man of restless ambition, strong will, and keen intellect, but cruel and unscrupulous. When, in 47 B.C., Antipater was rewarded for his services to Cæsar with Roman citizenship and the procuratorship of Judæa, Herod, who was then twenty-five (the πέντε καὶ δέκα of Josephus, Antiq., XIV. 9, 2 is probably a mistake of the copyist), was intrusted with the governorship of Galilee, and soon afterwards with the procuratorship of Coele Syria. He soon displayed his ability by ridding the territory of dangerous bands of robbers, and winning, by a rapid collection of tribute-money, the favor of Cassius (after Cæsar's assassination 44 B.C.). In order to secure the confidence of his Jewish subjects, he put away his wife Doris, and married Mariamne, the grand-daughter of the high priest Hyrcanus. In 41 B.C. he was appointed tetrarch by Anthony, whose favor he had purchased with rich gifts. Forced the following year, by an irruption of the Parthians, to abandon Jerusalem, he fled to Rome. By a generous use of money he secured the favor of Anthony and Augustus, and through their influence was named king of Judæa by the senate. This, however, did not relieve him of the necessity of winning his kingdom by arms. After defeating Antigonus, the Asmonean king of Judæa, in a pitched battle in Galilee, he besieged Jerusalem, and took it in 37 B.C.

Herod's reign divides itself into three periods. During the first period, stretching from 37 to 28 B.C., he firmly establishes his throne; the second, from 28 to 14 B.C., is marked by a brilliant patronage of architecture, and close intimacy with the Roman government; the third, from 14 to 4 B.C., is the period of domestic troubles, cruelty, and growing melancholy.

The First Period (37-28 B.C.). — With great shrewdness and boldness Herod proceeded to remove the influences hostile to his power. Antigonus was executed, and forty-five of his more eminent supporters. Hyrcanus, who was living at Babylon, was recalled, that he might be under his eye. A Jewish priest of Babylon was appointed high priest; but, to appease his step-mother Alexandra, Herod soon after substituted in his stead her son Aristobulus, then seventeen years old. His Maccabean descent and popularity aroused the king's suspicion, and paid the forfeit of a violent death by drowning. Herod simulated sorrow before the Jewish people, but, being summoned to answer for the crime before Anthony, was acquitted. Before setting out to meet Anthony, he provided that Mariamne should be killed, in case of his being found guilty. His plea was, that she might not come into the embraces of Anthony. But her love for her husband was from thenceforth changed into hatred. Another of Herod's enemies was Cleopatra. Anthony, whom she was then ruling by her charms, compelled Herod to surrender the territory of Jericho into her hands, and to institute a campaign against the Arabian king to compel him to pay the tribute he owed her. In 31 B.C. he ordered the execution of Hyrcanus, and, after Anthony's defeat at Actium, went to meet the victor Augustus at Rhodes, and had his royal title confirmed. His brilliant hospitality to Augustus at Ptolemæus (30 B.C.), and his generous treatment of his army on its way to Egypt, were rewarded by the addition of Gadara, Gaza, Samaria, and other cities, to his kingdom. In 28 Mariamne was accused by Herod of infidelity, and executed. He vainly endeavored to drown his remorse, and forget his passionate love in a tumult of lust. He was only aroused from his depression by the suspicion of plots against his throne. Alexandra was murdered, and the sons of Babas, who were of Maccabæan descent.

The Second Period (28-14 B.C.). — Once firmly established on his throne, Herod inaugurated a period of architectural splendor and munificence. He erected a theatre in Jerusalem, and an amphitheatre outside of its walls, introducing the Greek games in honor of Augustus. He built fortresses in Galilee and Peræa, and also in Jerusalem. The old city of Samaria he reconstructed, calling it Sebaste, and erected the new city of Casarea on the site of Straton's tower. Twelve years were consumed in this last work: a theatre and an amphitheatre, with a temple dedicated to Augustus, and overlooking the city, were among its more magnificent buildings. The introduction of heathen games, and the construction of heathen temples, enraged the Jews to the highest pitch. They plotted the king's death; but the plot was betrayed, and the guilty parties, executed. Herod endeavored to win their affection by munificent charities and by politic accommodation to their religious prejudices. In the year 25 B.C. his generous gifts alleviated the misery of a widespread famine; and five years afterwards he began the reconstruction of the temple. It was built with a lavish outlay; and, in deference to Jewish scruples, a thousand priests were employed as workmen upon the temple proper.

In the mean time Herod was winning more and more favor with the Roman emperor by timely aid to the army of the proconsul of Egypt in 24 B.C., and other evidences of loyalty. He sent his sons Alexander and Aristobulus to Rome to be educated. Augustus invited them to his palace, added to the king's dominion Trachonitis, Batanea, and Auranitis, and regarded Herod as his best friend after Agrippa.

The Third Period (14-4 B.C.). — The last years of Herod's life were darkened by suspicion, and made wretched by domestic troubles. His activity in building extends over into this period. He built Antipatris on the site of the Kapharsaba, the fortresses of Cypros and Phasaelis near Jericho, and beyond the confines of Palestine he adorned Ascalon, Tyre, Sidon, Damascus, Tripoli, Ptolemais, and other cities, and even Athens and Lacedæmon. The activity, however, which made him famous outside of his kingdom, imbibited his own subjects, the Jews, against him.

Herod's court, with his many wives and eunuchs and hætæræ, was a scene of jealousy and plots. The first to be struck by the tempest were Herod's two sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus, whom he sentenced to be executed 7 B.C. It was their murder which drew from Augustus the remark that he would rather be Herod's hog than his son. Then followed suspicion against Antipater, Herod's son by Doris, whom his father recalled from Rome, and executed. The restless discontent of the Jews, breaking out in continual acts of violence, added to the unhappiness of the monarch. A loathsome disease set in, his feet swelling, and his bowels being afflicted with ulcers. He went to the baths of Callirrhoe, at Jericho, for relief; and there he died, suffering great pains, but not before he had ordered the elders of the chief cities of the land to be confined in the amphitheatre, and to be executed at his death, that there might be some tears over his grave. This order the officers dared to disobey.

Herod was a man of fine physical powers, rare force of intellect and will, keen insight, calm presence of mind in the midst of difficulties, and daring courage. The combination of these qualities fitted him to be a general and a ruler. Nor did he lack generosity and noble magnanimity. But a bad environment and a passionate nature turned him into a heartless, despotic, and suspicious tyrant.

[It was in Herod's reign that Christ was born. The adroit invitation to the Wise Men from the East to return to Jerusalem and tell about the whereabouts of the child Jesus, under the plea of desiring to go and worship him, is in exact accord with Herod's shrewd cunning, as the destruction of the children of Bethlehem was in harmony with the otherwise suspicious and cruel policy of his last years.] SIEFFERT.

3. Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa (Luke iii. 1) from 4 B.C. to 39 A.D., and son of Herod the Great, by his fourth wife, Malthace. Like his father, he was ambitious, and lavished large sums on public buildings. He built Tiberias, which he named in honor of the emperor. His first wife was the daughter of King Aretas; but he put her away, in order to marry Herodias, the wife of Herod Philip, his brother (not the tetrarch Philip, who married Salome). Instigated by Herodias, he went to Rome, to secure the title of king. Her ambition was his ruin. He was charged with crimes by the emissaries of Agrippa, and banished by Caligula to Lyons. Antipas is mentioned several times in the New Testament. He was openly rebuked by John the Baptist for adultery, and, at the instigation of his enraged wife Herodias, put the prophet to death (Mark vi. 16-28). Jesus was sent to Antipas by Pilate, at his trial, on the ground that he belonged to his jurisdiction.

5. Philip, tetrarch of Gaulonitis, Auranitis, etc. (4 B.C.-34 A.D.), and son of Herod the Great, by his fifth wife, Cleopatra. Unlike the rest of the Herodian family, he was distinguished for moderation and justice, and seems to have kept aloof from the intrigues of his house. He married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip. He is mentioned Luke iii. 1.

6. Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon. He occupied a private station. His wife was Herodias, whom Antipas seduced. In Mark vi. 17 he is called simply Philip.

HERODIANS are mentioned in association with the Pharisees as enemies of Jesus (Matt. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6, xii. 13), and were probably followers of Herod Antipas, or the Herodian family generally. As such, they favored the Roman Government, and opposed the Jews, who were hostile to the Roman Government. Some of the fathers represent them as a separate Jewish sect (the fourth), whose peculiarity consisted in this, that they regarded Herod the Great as the Messiah (Epiphanius, Har., XX.; Tertullian, De præscriptis. Append.). But, as neither Josephus nor Philo mentions such a sect, we are justified in regarding this view as based upon a misunderstanding of the name, which confused a school of political opinion with a religious sect. HERODIAS, the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, through his son Aristobulus and Berenice, the daughter of Herod's sister, Salome. Following the wish of her grandfather, she married his son Herod (Matt. xiv. 3; called Philip in Mark vi. 17), who lived as a private man. Herod Antipas, on a visit to her husband and his brother at Rome, was enamoured of her, and seduced her to become his wife, putting away his former wife, the daughter of King Aretas. This relation was denounced by John the Baptist as adultery; and the latter was put to death by the offended jealousy of Herodias (Mark vi. 25). Her ambition precipitated her husband's deposition, but she followed him into exile. SIEFFERT.

HERRNHUT, a town of Saxony, about fifty miles from Dresden, at the foot of Mount Hutberg; was founded by Zinzendorf in 1722 for the Moravian Brethren, who are sometimes called Herrnhutters, after it.

HERVÆUS, b. in Maine; entered, about 1100, the Benedictine monastery of Bourg-Dieu in Berry, and wrote commentaries, of which those on Isaiah and the Epistles of Paul have been printed (the former in 1721, the latter in 1544) among the works of Anselm, both in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Lat., vol. 181.

HERVÆUS, Natalis (Hervé de Nedellec), b. at Brittany, whence surnamed Brito; entered the Dominican order; studied in Paris, and lectured there on theology 1307-09; became general of his order in 1318, and died at Narbonne 1323. His Quodlibeta were printed in Venice, 1486; his tractate, De potestate ecclesiæ et papali, in Paris, 1500; and his commentaries on Petrus Lombardus, in Venice, 1505.

HERVEY, James, popular religious writer; b. at Hardingstone, near Northampton, Feb. 26, 1714; d. rector of Weston-Favell, Dec. 25, 1758. He was educated at Oxford, there came under the influence of John Wesley, and was for a time inclined to follow him, but finally adopted a strongly Calvinistic creed. He is remembered for his Meditations among the Tombs, a treatise nowadays often quoted by title, but seldom read. This, with others of a similar character, was printed under the caption Meditations and Contemplations, London, 1746, 1747, 2 vols. Once these volumes were side by side with Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and the Whole Duty of Man, constituting the entire library of many a cottage in Great Britain. An edition of his works with Memoir was published in London, 1797, 7 vols. See TYERMANN: Oxford Methodists, New York, 1873.

HESS, Johann Jakob, b. at Zürich, Oct. 21, 1741; d. there May 29, 1828; was appointed preacher in his native city 1777, and antistes (that is, president of the clergy of the canton) in 1795. He was a very prolific writer, but his most remarkable works are his Geschichte der drei letzten Lebensjahre Jesu (Zürich, 1768-73, 6 vols.), and Jugendgeschichte Jesu (Zürich, 1773), which he afterwards combined and condensed into his Leben Jesu, Zürich, 1781, 2 vols. He also wrote Die Apostelgeschichte (Zürich, 1775, 3 vols.), and Die Geschichte der Israeliten (Zürich, 1776-88, 12 vols.), etc. He was a man of solid though not brilliant talents, a pillar of the church of his native canton for thirty-three years, universally esteemed, and a champion of historical and scriptural Christianity. His life has been written by Dr. H. Escher (Zürich, 1837), Gessner (1829), and Zimmermann (1878). JUSTUS HEER.

HESSE. On account of the great and frequent changes which have taken place, not only in the political organization of the country, but also in its boundary-lines, especially in 1803, 1805, 1815, and 1866, the history of the Hessian Church cannot be told, unless a great number of details are set forth which have no general interest. The state-church is evangelical, and according to the census of Dec. 1, 1875, it contains 602,850 members, divided into 418 congregations, with 445 ministers. It was organized by law of April 23, 1875, and is an imitation of the Prussian Church establishment. The Roman-Catholic inhabitants, numbering 250,130, divided into 146 parishes, belong under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Mayence. The relation between the Roman curia and the Hessian government was established by the bulls Provida solersque (1821) and Ad dominici gregis custodiam (1827), and the edicts of Oct. 2, 1829 and Jan. 30, 1830, but proved unsatisfactory to both parties. A secret convention was made in 1854 with Bishop Ketteler of Mayence, but repudiated by the curia. Since 1866 all ecclesiastical relations have been arranged by secular legislation, to which the Roman curia, of course, has opposed its Non possumus. See MÜNSCHER: Geschichte d. Hess. ref. Kirche, Cassel, 1850; VILMAR: Geschichte d. Confessions-bestandes in Hessen, Marburg, 1860. [H. HEPPE: Kircheng. beider Hessen, Marburg, 1876.] K. KOEHLER.

HESSHUSEN, Tilemann, b. at Wesel, in the duchy of Cleve, Nov. 3, 1527; d. at Helmstädt, Sept. 25, 1588; studied theology at Wittenberg; travelled in England and France; and was in 1553 appointed superintendent and pastor primarius at Goslar. That office he resigned in 1556. 1557 he was expelled from Rostock, where he had become professor in the university, and pastor of the Church of St. James. 1559 he was discharged as professor at Heidelberg, and superintendent-general of the Palatinate. 1562 he was by an armed force driven out of Magdeburg, where he had been appointed first preacher at the Church of St. John. 1569 he resigned his position as court-preacher at Neuburg. 1573 he fled from Jena, where he had become professor of theology. 1577 he was deposed as bishop of Samland. Fate had overtaken him. He who triumphantly had represented Flacius as teaching that the Devil was a creator as well as God, was now proved to teach that there were two divine beings, both omnipotent. Defending himself, the old gladiator retreated from the episcopal see of Samland to a professor's chair at Helmstädt; and, though wounded, he succeeded in raising new whirlwinds of strife. He could hold peace with none. Censure, condemnation, excommunication, persecution, were, if not his heart's desire, his conception of duty; and in his will he accuses himself of having been too lenient in denunciation, too slow to attack. Nevertheless, Heppe's judgment of him is too hard, calling him "one of the most odious Lutheran popes of the time, overbearing to one side, and crouching to the other, — a zealot and a weather-cock." He was a consistent representative of that stand-point which makes no distinction between Christianity and theology, between the purity of faith and denominational loyalty, between church discipline and police discipline.

HESYCHASTS, The, a mystic and quietistic sect which originated in the Greek Church, among the monks of Mount Athos, in the fourteenth century, and caused the last great doctrinal controversy, within the Byzantine period, of that church. At the time when Mount Athos had reached the very acme of its fame and influence, during the reign of Andronicus the Younger, when Symeon was abbot, the monks began to speak of a divine light, uncreated, and yet capable of being communicated, — the same as surrounded the Lord on Mount Thabor, but approachable by a process of complete seclusion from the world, and persistent introspection; whence the name of the sect, ἡσυχασταί, "quietists." Such ideas were by no means strange among the Greek monks. Pseudo-Dionysius speaks of some extraordinary means of devotion by which men are drawn nearer, intellectually, to God. Similar hints may be found in the writings of Maximus. Most probably the movement started on Mount Athos would have run its course unnoticed, if it had not been mixed up with the political and politico-ecclesiastical fermentation of the time, especially with the question of union with Rome. At the head of the Hesychasts stood Palamas, afterwards archbishop of Thessalonica. Their great adversary was Barlaam, a learned monk, who, during the reign of Andronicus the Elder, had come from Calabria to Constantinople. Barlaam protested that the divine light which the Hesychasts felt diffused through them when they sat quietly in a secluded corner and looked at their navel (whence their name, ομαλόψυχοι) must belong to the essence of God, if it is uncreated, and cannot without blasphemy be said to be communicable, if it belongs to the essence of God. Palamas explained that a distinction must be made between the essence of God (οὐσία) and the activity of God (ἐνεργεῖν); that the activity of God as a mere movement of his essence cannot be said to be created, and yet it is most certainly communicable. But Barlaam rejoined that this was simply to teach the existence of two gods; and now the case went before the "first" synod of Constantinople (1341), presided over by the Emperor Andronicus himself. Barlaam, however, got frightened when he stood before the assembly. People suspected him of being willing to sacrifice something of the famous Greek orthodoxy for the sake of his unionistic aspirations, and he felt that they suspected him. He recanted, and returned to Italy. A friend of him, Gregorius Acindynus, continued the controversy, but was condemned by the "second" synod. On the "third" synod the course seemed to have turned: the Barlaamites succeeded in condemning and deposing the Patriarch John. But the "fourth" synod, presided over by the Emperor Cantacuzenus (1351), finally settled the matter in favor of the Hesychasts.

HESYCHIUS is a name of frequent occurrence in the history of ancient ecclesiastical literature. We notice: (1) The editor or reviser of the Greek text of the Bible, that is the Septuagint and the New Testament, mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VIII. 13) as bishop of Egypt, and martyred under Maximinus. Jerome knew his work, but rejected it. Historically, however, it has some interest to notice that a revision of the text of the New Testament should have been deemed necessary already in the third century. (2) The presbyter of Jerusalem who died 428 or 433, and of whose writings some have been published in Greek or Latin version (Explanaciones in Leviticum, Basel, 1527, etc.), while others still remain in manuscript. (3) The else unknown grammarian of Alexandria, who, probably in the fourth century, wrote the famous Greek dictionary, invaluable to the philologists, and also of some use to theologians, though the biblical glossæ are mostly later interpolations. Last and best edition by Schmidt, Jena, 1858-68, 5 vols. quarto. See WACHSMUTH: De fontibus Suidæ, Leipzig, 1863. GASS.

HETÆRIÆ denotes, in the terminology of the Roman jurisprudence from the time of the emperors, any association or assembly for purposes not recognized by law; and it was as heterie that the Christian assemblies were first interfered with by the Roman authorities. See PLINIUS: Epist. X.

HETHERINGTON, William M., D.D., LL.D., b. near Dumfries, Scotland, June 4, 1803; d. at Glasgow, May 23, 1865. Educated at Edinburgh, ordained in the Church of Scotland, he joined the Free Church, and died as professor of apologetics and systematic theology in the Free Church College, Glasgow. He is favorably known by his History of the Church of Scotland, Edinburgh, 1841, last ed., 1853, 2 vols. (reprinted in 1 vol., N.Y.), and his History of the Westminster Assembly, Edinburgh, 1843. Dr. Alexander Duff edited a course of his Lectures, and prefaced it with a biographical sketch. Apologetics of the Christian Faith, Edinburgh, 1867.

HEUMANN, Christoph August, b. at Alstädt, Thuringia, Aug. 3, 1681; d. at Göttingen, May 1, 1764; studied at Jena; travelled in Germany, Holland, and France, and was appointed inspector of the theological seminary of Eisenach in 1709, inspector of the gymnasium of Göttingen in 1717, and professor of theology at the university of Göttingen in 1754, from which position he retired in 1758. He was an extremely prolific writer on historical, theological, and philosophical topics. Of his theological writings, the principal are his translation of the New Testament (Hanover, 1748), his commentary to the New Testament (Hanover, 1750-63, 12 vols.), and his Erweiss dass die Lehre der reformirten Kirche von dem heil-Abendmale die rechte sei, published after his death.

HEUSSER, Mrs. Meta, the best female songwriter and hymnist in the German language; b. April 6, 1797; d. Jan. 2, 1876. She was the fourth daughter of pastor Diethelm Schweizer, a relative and friend of Lavater, and spent her quiet life in Hirzel, a beautiful Swiss mountain village, in sight of Mount Righi and the Lake of Luzerne. She married Dr. Heusser, an eminent physician, and became the mother of a large family. But her household duties did not prevent her from singing, "as the bird sings among the branches," to express her love of Nature and Nature's God, and the joys and sorrows of her heart. She never dreamed that her lays would be given to the world; but her friends, after many vain efforts, obtained her consent to publish anonymously some of them in Albert Knapp's Christoterpe (1834). They made a deep impression, and passed into many collections and German hymn-books of Europe and America, especially the Easter hymn, Lamm das gelitten, und Löwe der siegreich gerungen, and the Jesus hymn, O Jesus Christ, mein Leben. In 1857 Albert Knapp edited a volume of her poems, under the title Lieder einer Verborgenen. It was followed by a second series (Leipzig, 1867), under her real name, which at last became generally known. A selection from both volumes was translated into English by Miss Jane Borthwick of Scotland (well known as the translator of Hymns from the Land of Luther), under the title Alpine Lyrics (Edinburgh and London, 1875). Mrs. Heusser was a woman of rare genius, piety, and loveliness of character. Her memory was stored with the choicest poetry, secular and religious. Knapp says that her "tender, spiritual lays far surpass those of former German poetesses;" and Koch, in his History of German Hymnology (3d ed.), calls her "the most eminent and noble among all the female poets of the whole Evangelical Church. Her poems flow freely from the fresh fountain of a heart in constant, holy communion with God." Mrs. Heusser wrote, at the request of her children, a chronicle of her family, but strictly forbade its publication. PHILIP SCHAFF.

HEWIT, Nathaniel, b. at New London, Conn., Aug. 28, 1788; d. at Bridgeport, Conn., Feb. 3, 1867. He was graduated at Yale College 1808, and pastor of the Old School (Presbyterian) Church, Bridgeport, 1853-67. He took a leading part in the early temperance agitation.

HEYLYN, Peter, church historian; b. at Burford, near Oxford, Nov. 29, 1600; d. in London, May 8, 1662, and buried in Westminster Abbey. He graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and lectured there on geography. These lectures were published in 1621, passed through eight editions, and appeared in an enlarged form, under the title Cosmography, 1662. He was appointed chaplain to the king in 1629, at the recommendation of Laud; in 1631 prebend of Westminster, and afterwards subdean; and was presented with several other livings. In 1631 appeared his History of St. George. He was a high Anglican, and very bitter against the Puritans. At the accusation of Prynne, whose Histriomastix he had analyzed for Charles, he was deprived by the Long Parliament of his livings, worth eight hundred pounds. He afterwards was plundered of his library, and obliged to go about in disguise to save himself from further hardships. At the restoration he preached a jubilant sermon to a large audience in Westminster Abbey. Heylyn was a patient investigator of history, and his learning was held in high esteem by Charles I.; but his writings display violent prejudices and controversial rancor. The Presbyterians were the special objects of his spleen; but even the witty churchman, Thomas Fuller, at the publication of his Church History of Britain (1655), did not escape his attacks. The latter, in an elegant epistle, however, quaintly asked, "Why should Peter fall out with Thomas, both being disciples of the same Lord and Master?" The Aërius Redivivus, or History of the Presbyterians, containing the Beginnings and Successes of that Active Sect, their Opposition to Monarchical and Episcopal Government, etc. (from 1536 to 1647), 2d ed., 1672, is a violent arraignment of the Presbyterians for being actuated with the spirit of the Devil, and the promoters of sedition, murder, and other crimes. In 1660 appeared his Historia Quinquarticularis, or a Historical Declaration of the Judgment of Western Churches, and more particularly of the Church of England, in the Five Controverted Points reproached with the Name of Arminianism, reprinted (1681) in the work named below. Of his many other writings, the best is Eccles. Restaurata, The History of the Reformation of the Church of England (from Edward VI. to 1566), 1661, reprinted in 2 vols. by the Ecclesiastical History Society, Cambridge, 1849. This work is written in a good style, and, in spite of Bishop Burnet's disparaging criticisms (Preface to Hist. of the Reformation), is in the main reliable, although strongly biased in the direction of High Anglicanism. In London, 1681, there appeared a reprint of several of his Historical and Miscellaneous Tracts. To this volume was prefixed his Life, written by his son-in-law, Dr. BARNARD, London, 1681, reprinted in the Cambridge edition, 1849,—a quaint and bombastic work. The alleged mistakes of this Life led to the preparation of another by VERNON, 1682. On pp. ccviii sqq. of the Cambridge edition will be found a list of Heylyn's writings.

HEYNLIN DE LAPIDE, Johannes, one of the last eminent representatives of scholasticism; a native of Germany; studied at Leipzig, Basel, and Paris, and settled in 1473 at Basel, as teacher of philosophy and theology. He was a decided realist, and caused, first in Basel, afterwards at Tübingen, whither he moved in 1477, so violent a contest between realism and nominalism, that he finally determined to retire altogether from the world. From 1487 till his death in 1496 he lived in a Carthusian monastery in Basel. His commentary on Aristotle was written during his stay in Paris, but not published until many years later, by his pupil, Amerbach. See his Life, by F. Fischer, Basel, 1851.

HEZEKIAH (חֶזְקִיָּהוּ, חֶזְקִיָּהוּ, or abbreviated חֶזְקִיָּה, חֶזְקִיָּה, "Jehovah strengthens"), son of Ahaz, and at the age of twenty-five his successor on the throne of Judah; reigned twenty-nine years, or, according to the usual chronology, from 725 to 696 B.C. But he seems to have begun his reign before 725; for the fall of Samaria (in 722) happened in its sixth year (2 Kings xviii. 10). The biblical sources of his life are 2 Kings xviii.—xx., Isa. xxxv.—xxxix., 2 Chron. xxix.—xxxii., and the contemporary utterances of Isaiah, and the Book of Micah, which was written in the first six years of Hezekiah's reign. He had no sooner ascended the throne than he entered upon a two-fold policy; on the one side seeking to elevate his subjects by abolishing idolatry, and restoring the theocratic worship, and on the other to re-establish the independence of the kingdom by shaking off the yoke of Assyria. He began his reformatory activity by cleansing the temple, destroying the high places, and breaking in pieces the brazen serpent "that Moses had made" (2 Kings xviii. 4). Then followed the restoration of the worship of Jehovah. A great passover was celebrated, to which all the members of the remaining tribes living in Palestine were invited. It was celebrated at an unusual but not illegal time (Num. ix. 10-14), and lasted fourteen days. Idolatry continued to be prevalent in Judah during the first year of the reign, and was never wholly abolished by Hezekiah (2 Kings xxiii. 13; Isa. xxx. 22, xxxi. 7); but, by the irrefutable testimony of Isaiah (xxxvi. 7; comp. 2 Chron. xxx. 14, xxxi. 1), it was he, and not Josiah, who centralized the worship at Jerusalem, and destroyed the high places.

A great injury to the state was done by the aristocratic party, which perpetuated the unhealthy policy of Ahaz, and instead of bearing with resignation the Assyrian yoke, as Isaiah advised (x. 24, 27, xxx. 15 sqq.), clamored for an Egyptian alliance, which would enable them to shake off the Assyrian power. It was formerly thought that an alliance with Egypt was made soon after the beginning of Sennacherib's reign; and it would seem, from Isa. xxxvi. 1, that he combined with his campaign against Egypt one against Judah in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign. But monumental records have shown that Sennacherib did not ascend the throne till 705 B.C.; so that his campaign against Egypt and Judah did not occur till the last period of Hezekiah's reign; and the false date of Isa. xxxvi. 1 is to be attributed to a wrong arrangement of the four incidents in Isa. xxxvi.—xxxix. Hezekiah purchased, as he thought, a permanent peace by the payment of an immense tribute (2 Kings xviii. 13 sqq.), but wrongly; for the king, after receiving the money, broke his word, and continued his march against Jerusalem. The city seemed to be hopelessly doomed (Isa. xxxvii. 1-3); but Isaiah predicted supernatural succor, which came in the descent of "the angel of the Lord, who smote the camp of the Assyrians" (Isa. xxxvii. 36). In the monumental records of Sennacherib's campaign against Hezekiah, this terrible calamity is not referred to; but a striking gap occurs in the account. After stating, "I shut him up in Jerusalem, the place of his residence, like a bird in a cage. I raised up walls against him, and closed up the exits of his city door," it suddenly breaks off, and does not speak of the city's having been taken. Herodotus (ii. 141) relates the remarkable story, that, when Sennacherib advanced upon Egypt, armies of mice, in answer to the prayer of the Egyptian king, Sethon, invaded the Assyrian camp by night, and gnawed away the quivers, bows, and the handles of the shields of the Assyrians, so that they fled the next morning in terror. He also mentions a stone statue of Sethon holding a mouse in his hand, which was preserved in the temple of Hephæstos. Ewald refers these two records to two different calamities, and supposes, with Josephus, that the angel of the Lord spread a virulent plague in the Assyrian army. However, the account of Herodotus points to this very thing (for mice were symbolical of plagues: 1 Sam. vi. 4), and is to be regarded as based upon a false reproduction of the causes of Sennacherib's disaster in Judah. The profound impression which this calamity made is seen in Ps. xlvi., lxxv., lxxvi., and in the honor in which Hezekiah was held by surrounding nations (2 Chron. xxxii. 23). The miraculous deliverance is also referred to in 1 Macc. vii. 41; 2 Macc. viii. 13; 3 Macc. vi. 5.

Hezekiah was taken ill after this event; but fifteen years were added to his life in answer to prayer (Isa. xxxviii. 5). The meaning of the sign on the sun-dial, which vouched for Hezekiah's recovery, is clear (Isa. xxxviii. 8). The life of the king, which was regarded as being at an end, was, as it were, put back fifteen years. As in the case of the sun standing still over Gibeon, there was, in this instance, no change of the usual relations of the sun and the earth. As at Gibeon the reference is only to an extraordinary continuance of the daylight, so here the reference is to a remarkable shining of the sun's rays, which stood in a relation of cause and effect to the prophet's knowledge and desire.

Hezekiah was one of the restorers of the שירי (that is, the instrumental and vocal music of the Levites), and revived the use of David's and Asaph's psalms. He also appointed a commission to edit the second collection of the Solomonic proverbs. HICKS, ELIAS, a prominent minister of the society of Friends; b. at Hempstead, L.I., March 19, 1748; d. in Jericho, L.I., Feb. 27, 1830. He was a mechanic in the early part of his life, but later devoted himself to agriculture. When he was twenty-seven, to use his own words, he began to have "openings leading to the ministry," and subsequently became a noted preacher, and travelled extensively among the Yearly Meetings of American Friends, preaching. When the more liberal element of the society of Friends, in the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia in 1827, broke off from the more conservative wing, they were called Hicksites. They became Unitarians; but, although Mr. Hicks used ambiguous language concerning the Trinity, it can hardly be made out that he promulgated views subversive of the doctrine. He published Observations on Slavery, (N.Y., 1811), Extemporaneous Discourses (Phila., 1825), Journal of Religious Life and Labors (N.Y., 5th ed., 1832). See art. FRIENDS, etc.

HIERAPOLIS (Ἱεράπολις, "holy city"), a city of Phrygia, situated a few miles north of Laodicea, in the basin of Mæander, owed its name to its thermal springs. It received Christianity at the same time as Laodicea and Colosse, and is mentioned by Paul (Col. iv. 13). A council was held there in 173, under presidency of Apollinarius, its bishop; and the Cataphryges, a Montanist sect, were condemned.

HIERARCHY (from ἱερός, "sacred," and ἄρχων, "ruler") denotes a form of government in which the governing body claims to hold its power by divine injunction, and to transmit it through a sacramental act. The Roman Church probably presents the most perfect instance of a hierarchy which history ever saw, organized monarchically, the whole power centring in the Pope, and most minutely graded, both with respect to orders, — bishops, priests, deacons (the ordines juris divini), and subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, lectors, doorkeepers, etc. (the ordines juris ecclesiastici), and with respect to jurisdiction, — archbishops, metropolitans, exarchs, patriarchs, deans, vicars, cardinals, legates, etc. In the Greek Church the hierarchical organization is oligarchical: above the several patriarchs there is no pope. In the evangelical churches, where the State rules the Church, more or less of the hierarchical apparatus may be retained, as may be noticed by comparing the Church of England and the Prussian Church; while, when the Church is established on the principle of universal priesthood, and the congregation rules itself, as in the American churches and many free churches in Europe, all hierarchy disappears. See CHURCH, CLERGY, JURISDICTION.

HIERACAS, or HIERAX, was born about 275 A.D.; lived at Leontopolis as a copyist; acquired a vast knowledge of Greek and Egyptian lore, medicine, the exact sciences, philosophy, literature, etc.; wrote commentaries on the Old and New Testaments in Greek and Egyptian, and a work on the creation in six days; formed an association of pupils or friends, which combined study with ascetic exercises, and seclusion from the world, and exercised thereby a considerable influence on the development of monasticism. He is known, however, only from EPIPHANIUS: Hær., 67. ADOLF HARNACK.

HIEROCLES, governor of Bithynia 303, of Alexandria 306, and afterwards of Syria and Phœnicia; took an active part in Diocletian's persecution of the Christians, and wrote a work against Christianity, which has become lost, but is tolerably known to us through Eusebius' answer, Contra Hieroclem. According to Eusebius, the only thing new and original in the book was a parallel drawn between Christ and Apollonius of Tyana; else the work was only an imitation of Celsus and Porphyry. Not to be confounded with this Hierocles is the Neo-Platonist philosopher of the same name, but of a much later date.

HIEROGLYPHICS (from the Greek ἱερός, "sacred," and γράφειν, "to carve") are pictures of animate or inanimate objects which are intended to convey ideas and words. They are found in all parts of the world, but the term usually relates to the Egyptian variety. For many years these latter hieroglyphics were a puzzle to the curious, but now they are perfectly intelligible. The key to them was the Rosetta Stone, now in the British Museum. One of Napoleon's officers discovered it in 1798 among the ruins of Fort St. Julien, near the mouth of the Rosetta branch of the Nile; but by the treaty of Alexandria it was given up to the English (1802). It has upon it a decree in honor of Ptolemy V. (B.C. 195), written in Greek, hieroglyphic and demotic. The first clew was the discovery, that the name Ptolemy occurred in the Greek, and that, in a corresponding part of the hieroglyphics, there were characters enclosed in a ring, and these, it was conjectured, might be the hieroglyphics for Ptolemy. De Sacy announced the phonetic character of the name; Young and Champollion simultaneously (1817) announced the union in the characters of ideographic and phonetic elements. The Egyptian hieroglyphics are for the most part engraved: in old temples they are found in high relief. They are generally written from right to left, but are read either vertically or horizontally. They ceased to be written about 300 A.D. See for their decipherment, etc., the elaborate article by R. S. Poole, in the ninth edition of Encycl. Brit., vol. xi. 794-809. The great dictionary of Egyptian hieroglyphics is by HEINRICH BRUGSCH: Hieroglyphisch-demotisches Wörterbuch, Leipzig, 1867-82, 7 vols.

HIERONYMITES, or HERMITS OF ST. JEROME, is the name of several independent orders which chose St. Jerome for their patron saint, and flourished in Spain, Portugal, and Italy. The most remarkable of those orders was that founded in 1370, in the diocese of Toledo, by Vasco and Ferdinand Pecha, chamberlains to Peter the Cruel of Castile. It was confirmed by Gregory XI., and spread in Spain, Portugal, and America. It had its principal seats at Guadaloupe, St. Just, whither Charles V. retired, and the Escorial in Spain, and at Belem in Brazil. It is now extinct. As a branch of this order, Lupus Olivetus, the third general, or, according to others, Lupus d'Almeda from Seville, founded the Congregation of St. Jerome of Lombardy, which was confirmed by Martin V. in 1426, and still has some monasteries in Lombardy. See HOLSTEN-BROCKIE: Cod. reg. monast., Tom. VI. and Tom. III.; REINKENS: Die Einsiedler des heiligen Hieronymus, Schaffhausen, 1864.

HIGH CHURCH is the designation of a school in the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, which lays stress upon the apostolic origin of ministerial orders, and the sacerdotal view of the sacraments, and the propriety of an elaborate ritual in worship. These views were not represented among the Reformers of England, and did not show themselves among the theologians of the Anglican Church until after the controversy with the Puritans in the mid part of Elizabeth's reign. Their highest representative was Archbishop Laud (1633-45). The distinction became more sharp and definite in the early part of the present century. The tendency culminated in the so-called Tractarian movement, which carried Dr. Newman and a number of the best spirits of the Anglican communion over to the Church of Rome. Keble and Dr. Pusey, who still survives, were among the leaders of this movement. A wing of the High-Church party is known as the Ritualists. While High-Churchmen differ among themselves, they hold, in general, to baptismal regeneration, a real sacramental though not necessarily a corporeal presence in the Eucharist, and to the apostolic succession of the bishops, and the sole validity of episcopal ordination. They practise an elaborate ritual, and often introduce into the service articles (as candles and crucifixes) and practices (as the confessional) which the majority of the Reformers of the Elizabethan period condemned. The High-Church party in England includes at the present time much piety, and has displayed an extraordinary amount of zeal in introducing daily services, building churches and charitable institutions. The late Dr. Pusey, Regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford, was long their leader. In the U. S. the party has grown rapidly within the last twenty years. The late eloquent Dr. De Koven of Racine College was its most advanced advocate. See BLUNT: Dict. of Sects, etc., and LOW CHURCH.

HIGH PLACES is the usual translation in the Old Testament of the Hebrew bamah (בָּמָה see Ezek. xx. 29). I. MEANING. — Bamah was at first a designation of any eminence, and is used of the "heights of the clouds" (Isa. xiv. 14), the "waves of the sea" (Job ix. 8, see margin), but especially of hills and mountains (Deut. xxxii. 13; 2 Sam. i. 19, 25; Ps. xviii. 33; Isa. lviii. 14, etc.). The term came to be applied in a technical and limited sense to eminences on which worship and sacrifices were offered both to idols (Num. xxii. 41, etc.) and to Jehovah (1 Sam. ix. 12, etc.). There was still another step in the progress of the meaning of the term. It became the specific designation of a sanctuary, or any place where sacrifice was offered. The idea of elevation was perhaps still retained, but attached to the altar rather than the ground. Altars of sacrifice in the valley, as those of Baal in the Valley of Hinnom, were called "High Places" (Jer. vii. 31, xix. 5, 6, xxxii. 35, etc.), as also altars in cities (2 Kings xvii. 9; 2 Chron. xiv. 5, etc.). The high places were of the nature of buildings, and are described as having been built (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3), removed (2 Kings xviii. 4), thrown down (2 Chron. xxxi. 1), broken down (2 Kings xxiii. 8), and burned (2 Kings xxiii. 15). These activities point to elaborate structures; and express mention is made of the "houses," on the high places (1 Kings xii. 31, xiii. 32; 2 Kings xxiii. 19). From the isolated notice in Ezek. xvi. 16, it is to be inferred that in some cases they were richly furnished. Altars seem to have been invariably associated with the high places (2 Chron. xxxi. 1, etc.), and frequently groves also (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3, etc.). The worship at the high places seems to have consisted mainly of sacrifice (1 Sam. ix. 12) and the burning of incense (2 Kings xiv. 4, etc.). They were served by priests, who were, for the most part at least, not Levites (1 Kings xii. 31; 2 Chron. xi. 15).

II. HISTORY OF THE WORSHIP ON THE HIGH PLACES. 1. From Abraham to Solomon. — It was a natural and at first an innocent impulse which led men to resort to the hills for worship. There the worshippers were brought near to the heavens, and the separation of those retired eminences from the scenes of the usual routine of daily occupation suggested the idea of sacredness. The Trajans sacrificed to Jupiter on Mount Ida. The Greeks placed the habitation of the gods on Mount Olympus, and the Persians on Alborzsch. The custom prevailed to a large extent among the neighbors of Israel, — the Moabites (Isa. xvi. 12, etc.) and the Canaanites (Deut. xii. 2, etc.). The Moabites set apart special hills or mountains for the worship of Baal. To these high places of Baal, Balak conducted Balaam (Num. xxii. 41). Baal-Peor was a mountain sacred to him (Num. xxiii. 28, 29). Nebo was probably also sacred to the divinity of that name (Isa. xlvi. 1).

The patriarchs built altars wherever they pitched their tents (Gen. xxvi. 25, xxviii. 18), but they seem also to have frequently chosen eminences. Abraham went to a mountain in the land of Moriah to sacrifice Isaac (Gen. xxii. 2), and Jacob offered sacrifice on Mount Gilead (Gen. xxxi. 54). At a later period Mount Sinai was regarded as especially sacred; and Moses invested Eleazar with the garments of the high priesthood on Mount Hor (Num. xx. 25). It is altogether likely that the Hebrews were strongly influenced by the example of the Moabites and Canaanites, and adopted some of the sites of their religious observances (comp. Judg. vi. 25); but they were commanded to "pluck up" the high places of these peoples, as they were seats of idolatry (Num. xxxiii. 52; Deut. xii. 2, xxxiii. 29). At the entrance to the Holy Land an altar was erected on Mount Ebal (Deut. xxvii. 5; Josh. viii. 30). Of the period prior to Samuel, the term "bamah" is only used three times of high places where worship was offered, and only six times in all. Only in one of these cases is there reference to their use by the Hebrews (Lev. xxvi. 30). The words in this verse "I will destroy your high places," are proleptic, and announce the punishment to follow upon disobedience. In the time of the judges the high places are not once mentioned by name. In that period of anarchy, sacrifices were not confined to the tabernacle (Judg. ii. 5, vi. 26, xiii. 19): the more primitive custom of the patriarchs still prevailed. It was a period of transition; and, although the tabernacle was no doubt held in honor, the tribes were isolated from it by the constant warfare of the times. In the time of Samuel one high place is made prominent as a place of sacrifice (1 Sam. ix. 12, 19, 25). It is to be particularly noticed that only a single high place is referred to, and also that the prophets, as it would seem, had their dwelling-place there (1 Sam. x. 5). Of the reign of David, the term is not used; but it is evident that David worshipped on Mount Olivet (2 Sam. xv. 32), and offered sacrifices at local altars (1 Chron. xxi. 26). The survey of the history of Israel from Moses to the time of Solomon shows that the notices of high places are remarkably few: in fact, there is reference only to a single high place as being used for worship, and that under the rule of Samuel, if we leave out the isolated passage Lev. xxvi. 30, whose meaning is doubtful.

2. From Solomon to Hezekiah. — In the reign of Solomon we are suddenly confronted by an unusual development of the worship on high places. It was accounted as one of the sins of this king, that he burnt sacrifices on high places (1 Kings iii. 3). The "great high place" was at Gibeon (1 Kings iii. 4), where, however, the tabernacle was also deposited (1 Chron. xvi. 39; 2 Chron. i. 3). Bethel was another of the principal of these sanctuaries (1 Kings xii. 32). In order to satisfy his foreign wives, Solomon built high places for "Ashtoreth, the abomination of the Zidonians, for Chemosh, the abomination of the Moabites, and for Milcom, the abomination of the children of Ammon" (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xviii. 19 sqq.). Both Asa (1 Kings xv. 14) and Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 43) allowed some of the high places to remain (presumably those on which sacrifice was offered to Jehovah), but destroyed the idolatrous shrines (2 Chron. xv. 17, comp. xiv. 5; xx. 33, comp. xviii. 6). Under Jehoash (2 Kings xii. 3), Amaziah (2 Kings xiv. 4), Azariah (2 Kings xv. 4), and Jotham (2 Kings xv. 35) it is also stated that they were allowed to remain untouched; but in each of these cases the fact is stated as derogating from their religious reputation. The number of these shrines greatly increased in "every city" (2 Kings xvii. 9-11;

2 Chron. xxviii. 25); and the people very generally participated in the worship. It is very difficult to determine how far this worship was idolatrous (1 Kings xviii.; 2 Kings xvii. 9-11), and how far it was rendered to Jehovah. The notices refer now to the one, now to the other, but leave the impression that the high places were regarded (after the construction of the temple) as illegitimate (1 Kings iii. 2-4), and the result of foreign and heathenish innovation (2 Kings xvii. 11, xxiii. 13, etc.).

3. From Hezekiah to Ezra. — With Hezekiah a new period begins in the history of the worship on high places. This king, so zealous in the cause of ecclesiastical reformation, sought to centralize the sacrifices of Israel at one altar. He declared war against the local shrines on high places (2 Kings xviii. 4, 22; 2 Chron. xxxii. 12; Isa. xxxvi. 7), which had tended so much to detract from the honor of the temple, and to make popular idolatrous rites. He was only partially successful. Under his successor, Manasseh, his policy was overthrown, and the worship on high places was again in full swing. But the fatal blow had been given. Hezekiah had acted out the determined voice of the prophets (Isa. lvii. 7; Jer. vii. 13; Ezek. vi. 3; Hos. x. 8, etc.); and it only remained for Josiah, under the pious impulse which the discovery of the book of the law had inspired (2 Kings xxiii. 2), to complete the work his great predecessor had inaugurated (2 Kings xxiii. 8). After the exile, the high places were not revived; and the need of having some places of worship subordinate to the one single altar of sacrifice was later supplied by the synagogues (Riehm).

III. RELATION OF THE HIGH PLACES TO THE TEMPLE. — It has been urged that there is no place in the Pentateuch for any other place of worship than the one central altar of sacrifice (tabernacle and temple). Such worship, however, was practised not only on the high places (bamoth), but at Bochim (Judg. ii. 5), upon a rock by Manoah (Judg. xiii. 19), at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii. 10) and Bethlehem (1 Sam. xvi. 23) by Samuel, on the threshing-floor of Ornan by David (1 Chron. xxi. 26), by the priest of Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 2 sqq.), on Carmel (1 Kings xviii. 30, 38), and at other places of which we have distinct notice. On the basis of the prevalency and apparent legitimacy of such worship, and the prior assumption that the Law permits only one altar, the conclusion has been confidently drawn, that parts of the Pentateuch (Deuteronomy and the so-called priestly Torah) must belong to Josiah's reign, or a later date (Wellhausen, Professor W. R. Smith, Baudissin, etc.). The discussion of the bearing of this fact upon the date of the Pentateuch does not belong here (the supposition of a late origin of the Pentateuch makes it difficult to understand why the references to Hebrew worship on high places are confined to a solitary passage); but it is the place to consider the relation of these local shrines to the pentateuchal commandments and to the central altar of sacrifice. The above survey indicates that the state of the case after the construction of the temple, and before that event, when the tabernacle was shifted from place to place, is not the same, and the two periods must be discussed separately.

It has been urged that the worship at the local altars was practised in ignorance of the commandment in Deut. xii. 1-11, enjoining one central altar, or in deliberate disobedience of it, or out of a misunderstanding of its meaning. The rabbis supposed that the rule was superseded by a special divine intimation. But none of these considerations sufficiently present the case as it existed before the erection of the temple; and none of them are necessary for the explanation of the apparent anomaly.

1. It is quite doubtful whether the Mosaic ordinance (Deut. xii. 10, etc.) was meant to absolutely exclude all other places of worship (De Wette, Riehm, etc.). In Exod. xx. 24 a plurality of altars is presupposed, and the mode of erecting them definitely defined by Moses. These altars, so far as they were erected to Jehovah, were not necessarily a breach of the Mosaic law (Professor Smith, chap. ix.) before the erection of the temple (1 Kings iii. 2).

2. The necessities of the case demanded local shrines. The history of the times, as well as special events, is in favor of this view. The anarchy of the period of the Judges, the rivalries between the tribes, and the constant instability of affairs to the time of Solomon, made it impossible for the tribes to go up regularly to the tabernacle. An altar was erected on Ebal by Joshua (Josh. viii. 30), while the tabernacle was close by at Gilgal, and it was not felt to be an anomaly. Local shrines were a necessity of the case, and as natural to the instincts of the people as they were consistent with the Jehovah-worship. The whole land was the sanctuary of Jehovah (Riehm).

3. The commandment centralizing worship and sacrifice at one altar was prospective (Lev. xvii. 3-9; Deut. xii. 10), and not to be enforced till a later date (Farrar, Riehm, etc.). The law was proleptic; and the menace of Lev. xxvi. 30 had an eye to the Moabite idolatries, as is evident from the connection. The people were to be trained up to that idea, and principally by the subsequent construction of the temple itself; and the absence of notices of the principle of a single shrine in the time of the Judges argues as little against the priority of the injunction in Deuteronomy and the "Priestly Torah," as the absence of all notices of the Sabbath argues against its previous institution, or the almost complete ignorance of the Bible among the people in the dark ages against its existence. Nor may it be forgotten that the tabernacle held a conspicuous place in the eyes of the nation, and became more conspicuous as the affairs of Israel became settled, and the troublous anarchy of the period of the Judges was composed.

4. It is hard at this time to distinguish how far the sacrifices at local altars were genuine Jehovah-worship, and how far the practices followed the fashions of the surrounding nations. The people not only did not fully obey the command of Moses and Joshua to destroy the altars of the Canaanites (Judg. ii. 2, etc.), but adopted the idolatries of their neighbors (Judg. ii. 11, 12, etc.).

5. The principle of the local worship of Jehovah was preserved, long after the high places were destroyed, in the synagogues.

Of the continuance of the high places and their altars of sacrifice after the construction of the temple, the following is to be said. (1) The worship on high places increased enormously under Solomon, and was largely the result of contact with foreign nations. Solomon increased the shrines in proportion to the diffusion of his affections. The people, always inclined to idolatry, were not slow in following their king's example. (2) Under the worst kings (Rehoboam, Jeroboam, Ahaz) the high places were most numerous. Later and better kings seem to have made a distinction between idolatrous and Jehovistic shrines; but it is said of at least five of them (see above), to their disparagement, that they allowed them still to stand. (3) It is plain, that, after the temple was built, the worship at the high places was largely idolatrous. In proportion as the temple was forgotten, the sacrifices on local altars increased, and the people did "as the heathen did" (2 Kings xvii. 11, xxiii. 13, etc.). (4) It is evident that there must have been some development in the minds of the people in favor of the central temple, and against all high places, before Hezekiah's reign. (5) In general, the ritual and worship at these local altars, after Solomon's accession, must be regarded as having degenerated from the old and better standard. It has been said that the "temple of Solomon never stands contrasted with the popular high places as the seat of the Levitical system" (Professor Smith, chap. ix.). But the very construction and existence of the temple were a protest against the local worship. The statement also ignores the fact that the priests at the local shrines were, for the most part at least, not Levites, and stood in antagonism to the priesthood of the temple (1 Kings xii. 31; 2 Kings xxiii. 9; 2 Chron. xi. 15). They seem to have been a distinct order. Moreover, the same books of the Kings and Chronicles give the account of the temple, its building and furniture, which describe the development and flourishing condition of the worship on the high places; so that violent injustice must be done to the narrative as a whole in order to evade the conclusion that the temple was meant to be the central shrine, and that the sacrificial worship at the local altars was thenceforth illegitimate.

As in the case of so many other truths of divine revelation, the people in this one likewise failed for a while to comprehend its spirit, and to obey the letter, but afterwards were led to fall in with the providential design. Not only was the temple ignored by the erection of many local altars, but the very temple itself was despoiled by kings heathen in practice, like Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 24 sq.), and made the receptacle for heathen altars and heathen rites.

HIGH PRIEST. The high priest was the spiritual head and representative of the theocratic people before Jehovah. In him was concentrated the mediatorship between God and people; and in him the people could draw nigh to God. As in his person the people was represented, his sin offering and that of the congregation, which was to be brought for certain sins, as prescribed Lev. iv., were the same. His sin was the people's sin (Lev. iv. 3), and God's good will towards the high priest also belonged to the people. The high priest was in the midst of a holy people, "the saint of the Lord" (Ps. cvi. 16). In him the highest degree of purity had to be found, and only in exceptional cases (Lev. xxi. 1-6) could he defile himself, otherwise he had to avoid every thing whereby he could be defiled. He had even to keep away from his dead father or mother (xxi. 10-12). His wife was to be a virgin of his own people (xxi. 14). Aaron's consecration to the priesthood was in connection with that of his sons and the priests generally (Exod. xxix.; Lev. viii.). The ritual commenced by washing Aaron and his sons before the tabernacle of the congregation. Aaron was then invested with the sacred garments, and anointed with the holy oil, which was prepared according to Exod. xxx. 22-25. Aaron's successor was not anointed, but received only the high priest's garments. Without these garments, the high priest was only a private person, who could not represent the people, and incurred the penalty of death by appearing before Jehovah without them (Exod. xxviii. 35). His dress was peculiar, and passed to his successor at his death. The articles of his dress consisted of the following parts: (1) The breeches, or drawers, of linen, covering the loins and thighs; (2) The coat, a tunic or long shirt; (3) The girdle, also of linen: these three articles he had in common with the other priests. Over these parts he wore (4) the robe, or the ephod, being all of blue. The skirt of his robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately. The bells were to give a sound when the high priest went in and came out of the holy place (Exod. xxviii. 35). Over the robe came (5) the ephod, one part of which covered the back, and the other the front: upon it was placed (6) the breastplate. The covering of the head was (7) the mitre, or upper turban, which was different from (8) the bonnet. The mitre had a gold plate, engraved with "Holiness to the Lord," fastened to it by a ribbon of blue. For the functions to be performed annually on the day of atonement, dresses of white linen were prescribed (Lev. xvi. 4). The office of the Old-Testament priesthood was twofold,—that of mediatorship and that of a teacher or messenger of the Lord (Mal. ii. 7). The functions of the high priest were the same as those of the common priests. He had oversight over the service of the temple and the temple treasury (2 Kings xxii. 4 sq.). The succession in the high priesthood was probably regulated in the manner of the right of succession,—that the first son, provided there were no legal difficulties, succeeded his father; and, in case he had died already, his oldest son followed. The number of high priests from Aaron to Phannias was, according to Josephus (Antt., XX. 10) eighty-three: viz., from Aaron to Solomon, thirteen; during the temple of Solomon, eighteen; and fifty-two in the time of the second temple. Aaron was succeeded by Eleazar (Num. xx. 28), who was followed by Phinehas (Judg. xx. 28). Who the successors of Phinehas were till the time of Eli, we do not know. To enter into the different theories of who they were, or were not, is not our object. From Shallum, the father of Hilkiah, the high priest in Josiah's reign, we can again follow up the succession of high priests. According to Josephus, Hilkiah was followed by Seraiah, who was killed by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kings xxv. 18 sq.). His son was Jehozadak, who went into the captivity (1 Chron. v. 41; A. V., vi. 15), and who was the father of Jeshua, who opens the series of high priests in Neh. xii., which ends with Jaddua, who was high priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Jaddua was followed by Onias I. his son, and he again by Simon I., the Just; then followed Onias II., Simon II., Onias III. The last high priest was Phannias, who was appointed by lot by the Zealots (Josephus, War, IV. 3, 8). With him the Old-Testament high priesthood ignominiously ended. DELITZSCH.

HILARION, St., b. at Thebathar, near Guza, 290; d. in the Island of Cyprus, 371; studied in Alexandria; embraced Christianity; visited St. Anthony; gave away all his wealth to the poor on his return to his native place in 307; retired to the desert near Magum to live as a hermit; gathered a great number of pupils, whom he settled in various places, and became thus the founder of monasticism in Palestine. He also visited Libya, Sicily, and Dalmatia; and, according to legend, he everywhere performed a great number of miracles. His life was written by St. Jerome. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on Oct. 21.

HILARY OF ARLES (Hilarius Arelatensis), St., b. 403; d. 449; entered very early the monastery of Lerinum, where his uncle, Honoratus, was abbot. Honoratus afterwards became Bishop of Arles; and on his death (429) Hilarius succeeded him in the episcopal chair. He was very enthusiastic for the ideas of monasticism, and lived together with the clergy of his church as monks in a monastery. In spite, however, of his personal humility, he was rather haughty when exercising his official authority. As Bishop of Arles he was metropolitan of the provinces of Viennensis and Narbonnensis; and as such he came into conflict with Leo I., who, however, compelled him to yield. He wrote a Vita S. Honorati, a poem on the creation, etc., which have been edited by Salinas, Rome, 1731, who, however, ascribes several works to him which are not by him, and are found in Mar. Bibl. Patrum, T. VIII. See BÄHR: Christlich-römische Litteratur. HERZOG.

HILARY THE DEACON (Hilarius Diaconus), a deacon of the Church of Rome; lived about 380; partook in the schism of Lucifer of Cagliari, and wrote, according to Jerome, a work in defence of his opinions on heretical baptism. The so-called Ambrosiaster and the Quæstiones V. et N. Test., in the works of Augustine, are also often ascribed to him. See RICHARD SIMON: Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N. T., p. 232.

HILARY (Hilarius), Bishop of Rome 461-468; the successor of Leo I.; was a native of Sardinia; and was present at the Robber Synod of Ephesus (449) as papal legate. As pope he showed himself very zealous for the maintenance of the metropolitan system, for the establishment of annual provincial synods, etc.

HILARY, Bishop of Poitiers (Pictavium), the place of his birth, was b. early in the fourth century; d. 366. He shone like a clear star alongside of the great champions of the Nicene Creed, — Athanasius, Basil, and the two Gregories. Among the teachers of the West of his day he was beyond dispute the first, and bore a strong resemblance to Tertullian, both in disposition and scientific method. He employed an elegant Latin style. His parents were Pagans, and of high social standing. Hilary enjoyed fine facilities for education. In the introduction to his treatise on the Trinity he describes the stages a Pagan passes through in reaching the knowledge of God, which heathen philosophy reveals dimly, Christianity clearly. This description evidently depicts his own experience. He had reached the years of manhood when he professed Christianity. A statement of uncertain value speaks of his wife and daughter as following him. About the year 350 the popular voice called him to the bishopric of Poitiers.

The times were times of conflict. The Emperor Constantius determined to make Arianism the prevailing creed of the West, as it had become of the East. This end he endeavored to secure by intimidating the bishops. Hilary placed himself in antagonism to the emperor, and devoted all his energies to resist the spread of Arianism. His persuasions induced a number of the Gallic bishops to refuse communion with the Arian bishop of Arles, — Saturninus; and in a letter to the emperor (355) he calls upon him to desist from his policy of coercion. At the Council of Beziers (356), presided over by Saturninus, the Arians were in the majority, and silenced Hilary by their tumult when he arose to defend the Nicene faith. A few months afterward he was banished to Phrygia, where his leisure was employed in studies of the Greek language and literature, and in making himself acquainted with the parties and doctrines of the Eastern Church. In 359 he wrote his work on synods (De Synodis), — an historical survey of the confessions of the Eastern Church, with a definition of his own position. The best product of the exile (359 or 360) was a treatise on the Trinity (Lib. XII. de Trinitate). Aroused by the Arian decrees of the Council of Constantino-ple (360), he wrote a second letter to Constantius, offering to defend his faith publicly before him and a synod. The court did not grant his proposal, but, deeming that he was doing more mischief in the East than he could do in Gaul, ordered him back to Poitiers.

On his return, Hilary was regarded as the champion of the Nicene faith. The Council of Paris (361), under his lead, excommunicated Saturninus. He now sought to clear Italy of Arianism, and appeared suddenly at Milan, to prefer charges against its bishop, Auxentius. The latter, however, stood in high favor with the emperor; and Hilary was driven out of the city. He explained his course in this matter in a work against Auxentius (365). According to Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 45), he died the following year.

Hilary was one of the most conspicuous and original characters of early Christianity. His distinguishing characteristics were fidelity to the church creed, acuteness in argument, and resolution in action. He knew no fear. He wielded a keen sword when he defended apostolic truth against heretics, or vindicated the prerogatives of the Church against the encroachments of the civil power. Yet, when the differences concerned non-essentials, he displayed a conciliatory disposition. His power lay essentially in his thorough acquaintance with the Scriptures. His earliest literary labor was a Commentary on Matthew, and one of the latest an Exposition of the Psalms. His other exegetical works are lost. Much to be regretted is the loss of his collection of hymns which the Spanish churches used.

His work on the Trinity is a scriptural confirmation of the philosophic doctrine of the divinity of Christ, and is of permanent value. It was not a mere restatement of traditional orthodoxy, but a fresh and living utterance of his own experience and study. In the discussion of the co-essentiality of the Son, Hilary lays emphasis on the Scripture titles and affirmations, and especially on his birth from the Father, which he insists involves identity of essence. In the elaboration of the divine-human personality of Christ, he is more original and profound. The incarnation was a movement of the Logos towards humanity in order to lift humanity up to participation in the divine nature. It consisted in a self-emptying of himself, and the assumption of human nature. In this process he lost none of his divine nature; and, even during the humiliation, he continued to reign everywhere in heaven and on earth. Christ assumed body, soul, and spirit, and passed through all stages of human growth, his body being really subject to pain and death. Redemption is the result of Christ's voluntary substitution of himself, out of love, in our stead. Between the God-man and the believer there is a vital communion. As the Logos is in the Father, by reason of his divine birth, so we are in him, and become partakers of his nature, by regeneration and the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper.

The christology of Hilary is full of fresh and inspiring thoughts, which deserve to be better known than they are. He was created a doctor of the Catholic Church by Pius IX., at the synod of Bordeaux, 1851.

HILDA, St., a grand-niece of Edwin, king of Northumbria; b. about 617; devoted herself to a religious life from her thirteenth year; became abbess of Heorta (now Hartlepool) in 650, and founded the celebrated abbey of Whitby, where she died 680. HILDEBERT, b. at Lavardin, in the department of Loir-et-Cher, 1055; d. at Tours, Dec. 18, 1134; was, according to some, a pupil of Berenger; according to others, a monk of Clugny; superintended the cathedral-school of Le Mans from 1079 to 1092, and was in 1096 or 1098 chosen bishop of that diocese. In this position he encountered much trouble from his own chapter, from William Rufus of England, from the revival preacher Henry of Lausanne, and others. At one time he even went to Rome, demanding to be relieved from his duties; but Paschalis II. would not give his consent. In 1125 he was chosen Archbishop of Tours; and there, too, he met with difficulties, though in the mean time he had raised himself to one of the foremost places among the ecclesiastics of his time. His works were first edited by A. Beaugendre (Paris, 1708), and then by J. J. Bourassé, in MIGNÉ: Pat., 171. They consist of Epistolæ to Bernard of Clairvaux, Anselm, William of Champeaux, and others, Diplomata, Sermones (a hundred and forty-three in Migné), Opuscula (among which are Libellus de quatuor virtutibus, strongly influenced by Cicero, and Tractatus theologicus, probably nothing but a fragment of the summa of Hugo of St. Victor), and finally Poemata. His life was written by Hebert-Duperron (1858) and Deservillers (1877). Full information as to the literature is found in CHEVALIER: Repertoire, 1878. WAGENMANN.

HILDEGARDE, St., b. in the castle of Böckelheim, 1098; was educated in the Benedictine nunnery of Disibodenberg, by Jutta von Sponheim, whom she succeeded as abbess in 1136; and founded in 1147 the monastery of Rupertsberg, where she died in 1178. She received prophetic visions; and, as these were recognized by the Church, she came gradually to occupy a very exceptional position, and to exercise a very extraordinary influence, in the German Church. She is commemorated on Sept. 17, but she was never canonized. Her writings, Scivias (first printed in Paris, 1513, and Cologne, 1628), Liber Divinorum Operum, Explanatio Regulæ S. Benedicti, Physica (nine books), Letters, etc., are found in MIGNÉ: Patrol., T. 197. Her life was written by STILTING, in A. S. Boll. at 17 Sept., and by DAHL, Mayence, 1832. HILL, Rowland, an eccentric and popular English preacher; b. at Hawkestone, Aug. 23, 1744; d. in London, April 11, 1833. In 1764 he entered St. John's College, Cambridge; and during his university course he came under the influence of Mr. Whitefield and the Methodists. He aroused opposition by preaching without a license, and by following the methods of the Methodists, and only secured ordination after six bishops had refused to perform the service. In 1773 he obtained the parish of Kingston, Somersetshire, but continued to indulge his favorite taste for open-air preaching. In 1783 he built Surrey Chapel, London, having fallen heir to a considerable fortune. He continued to preach almost up to the very day of his death, attracting immense audiences wherever he went. In the summer months he went off on preaching-tours through Great Britain. He was an eccentric man, and gifted with wit, and rare powers of drollery, which he used in the service of religion. Sheridan used to say, "I go to hear Rowland Hill, because his ideas come red-hot from the heart." In the Arminian controversy he espoused the Calvinistic side, and wrote some bitter pamphlets against John Wesley, the tone of which he afterwards regretted. His principal work was the collection of Village Dialogues (1810, 34th ed., 1839), in which he treats of current religious abuses, and general religious topics, in a homely and familiar, but terse and often sarcastic way. See Life, by SIDNEY, London, 1833 (4th ed., 1844); Memoirs, by Rev. W. JONES, London, 2d ed., 1840; and Memoirs, by SHERMAN, London, 1851.

HILLEL, the most distinguished rabbi of the century just preceding the Christian era, was the son of a poor Jewish family living in Babylon; d. in Jerusalem late in the reign of Herod the Great,—according to Delitzsch, about 4 B.C. Our knowledge of his life is drawn exclusively from the Talmud, which gives an admiring picture of his acuteness of mind, and suavity of disposition. The whole narrative is exaggerated, but, according to Delitzsch, is to be accepted in its general outline. In many cases it is evidently unreliable; and such statements as that Hillel reached the age of Moses (a hundred and twenty), etc., will be received, in spite of the Jewish writer Geiger, with some grains of allowance by a critical age.

At an early age Hillel went to Jerusalem, where he worked as a day-laborer, using half of his wages, a victoriat (twelve cents), for the support of his family, and the other half to gain admission to the Beth-ha-Midrash, where Shemaiah and Abtalion were teaching. On one occasion, unable to pay the admission-fee, he clambered up to a window, where he sat the night through, listening to the discussions, and unmindful of the snow, which was falling, and gradually covered him up. There he was espied the next morning by the teachers within. This incident opened to the day-laborer the way to fame; and he became the founder of a school which was rather more liberal than that of his contemporary, Shammai. Hillel's memory has been only recently rescued from oblivion. He was no doubt a pure moralist; but the little we know of him is wholly inconsistent with the claim which has been made for him as the teacher and peer, and even the superior, of Christ. Geiger says, "Hillel presents us with the picture of a genuine reformer. Jesus uttered no new thought." And Renan, in his Life of Christ, calls Hillel "Christ's real teacher, from whose example Christ had learned to bear poverty with patience, and to oppose priests and hypocrites."

It only requires, however, a careful reading of the stories handed down of Hillel's mental acuteness, to become convinced that he moved in the circle of Pharisaism, and never got beyond the narrow prejudices of his class. He was simply a rabbi (perhaps the best and purest of his order), a man of the school, following precedent; but he was in no sense a reformer for the race, nor do any of his sayings live as sources of power and influence in the world. Over his tomb the words were uttered, "Oh the gentle, the pious, the scholar of Ezra!" They were no doubt appropriate, but it would be preposterous to apply them to Christ. He is the author of the saying, "What is unpleasant to thyself, do not to thy neighbor. This is the whole law, and all the rest is commentary upon it." This has been highly praised, and it is no detraction of its beauty to say that Jesus gave a better summary of the law when he made a statement of its positive requirements (Mark xii. 30). The Talmudic illustrations of Hillel's intellectual adroitness betray, if not a want of veracity, at least the spirit of rabbinism and hair-splitting casuistry which Jesus so fearlessly rebuked. Of those incidents which place him in an unenviable light, the most striking, perhaps, is the one which relates how, at the sacrifice, he passed off an ox for a cow by swinging the animal's tail to and fro, and so concealing its gender.

The centuries have judged both the Jewish rabbi and the world's Redeemer. Hillel, says Delitzsch, "is dead, and has his place as the representative of a system of outlived ceremonies of the past: Jesus lives, and all the progress of civilization is the advancing victory of the light that goes out from him."

In 1751 he lost his voice; and, being thus excluded from the pulpit, he devoted himself to hymn-writing. He wrote more than a thousand hymns and religious songs, of which many are still living in the German Church. A complete collection, together with a life by C. Ehmman, appeared at Reutlingen, 1844. HINCKS, Edward, D.D., b. in Cork, Ireland, August, 1792; d. at Killeleagh, County Down, Dec. 3, 1866. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1826 became rector of Killeleagh. His father was T. D. Hincks, LL.D., professor of Oriental languages in the Belfast Academical Institution, and he inherited a great fondness for languages. He occupies an honored place among the early scholars of Egyptology and Assyriology, and to him much of the brilliant progress in these directions is owing. His success is the more remarkable as his straitened means precluded the purchase of many books, or residence at the centres of such studies.

HINCMAR OF LAON was made Bishop of Laon in 858 by the aid of his uncle, Hincmar of Rheims; but opposing the king in the most wilful manner, refusing obedience to his metropolitan, and finally excommunicating his own chapter, he governed his diocese with such an arbitrariness, that he was deposed by the synod of Douzi (871), presided over by his own uncle. The king took him prisoner, and had him blinded. Adrian II. interfered in vain, in his behalf. John VIII. gave him permission in 871 to read mass. He died in 882. A few of his letters have come down to us, and are found in Sirmond's edition of the works of Hincmar of Rheims.

HINCMAR OF RHEIMS, b. about 806; d. at Epernay, Dec. 21, 882; was educated in the monasteries of St. Denis and Corwey; came to the court during the reign of the Emperor Louis, and formed the most intimate relation with his son, King Charles the Bald. At the synod of Verneuil (844), the king recommended him for the archiepiscopal see of Rheims, which had stood vacant since the deposition of Ebo in 835, and in the following year he was regularly elected and consecrated. He ruled his diocese with great firmness, and was generally successful in maintaining his metropolitan authority over his suffragan bishops, even in the face of the Pope; but, though he actually was the most prominent representative of the French Church, he failed in securing for himself the primacy of France; this dignity being conferred on Archbishop Ansegisus of Sens. Very remarkable is the use which Hincmar made of the Pseudo-Isidorean decretals in his administration. He evidently considered them fraudulent, and strongly opposed the introduction of this new law in the church, except in cases in which the law spoke in his favor; then he appealed to it himself. In the theological movements of his time Hincmar also played a conspicuous part, though as a theologian he was without originality. In the predestination controversy with Gotschalck (which article see) he stood alone. Rabanus left him in the lurch. John Scotus Erigena, Ratramnus, Prudentius, Servatus Lupus, and others, declared against him. But he never gave in. In the transubstantiation controversy he sided with Paschasius Radbertus. One of his best literary performances is his Annals of Rheims continued by Flodoard. Shortly before his death he was driven away from Rheims by the Normans.

HINDS, Samuel, b. in the Island of Barbadoes, 1793; d. at Notting Hill, London, Feb. 7, 1872. After graduation at Oxford, he went (1819) as missionary to Barbadoes, but returned to England, and became successively vice-principal of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford (1827), vicar of Yardley, Hertfordshire (1834), chaplain to Archbishop Whately, and rector and prebendary of Castleknock, Dublin Cathedral (1843), dean of Carlisle (1848), and bishop of Norwich (1849). He resigned his bishopric in 1858. His principal works are The History of the Early Rise and Progress of Christianity, London, 1829, 3d ed., 1850; An Inquiry into the Proofs, Nature, and Extent of Inspiration, and into the Authority of Scripture, Oxford, 1831.

HINTON, John Howard, b. at Oxford, March 24, 1791; d. at Bristol, Dec. 17, 1873. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; entered the Baptist ministry, and was for many years one of the most intellectual preachers of London. "He shared with Binney the honor of the designation 'the students' preachers.'" His best known work was History and Topography of the United States (1832, American edition, enlarged, N. Y., 1853). Among his theological works may be mentioned The Harmony of Religious Truth and Human Reason (1832), Treatise on Man's Responsibility (1840). There is a complete edition of his works, in seven volumes. — James Hinton, son of the preceding; b. at Reading, 1822; d. at St. Michael, Dec. 16, 1875. He was the foremost aural surgeon in London; at the same time he was greatly interested in philosophy, and wrote those remarkable works, Man and his Dwelling-place (1858), Life in Nature (1871, 2d ed., 1875), The Mystery of Pain, Philosophy and Religion (1882). See his Life and Letters, London, 1878, 4th ed., 1881.

HIPPO (the present Bona), a Roman colony on the northern coast of Africa; was the seat of two councils (393 and 426), of which the former is interesting, because it gave the first express definition of the New-Testament canon, in the form in which it has ever since been retained. Augustine was bishop there from 396 to 430. See PETIT: Voyage à Hippone au commencement du V^e siècle, 6th ed., Paris, 1876.

HIPPOLYTUS, a distinguished ecclesiastical writer; b. in the second half of the second century; d. about the year 240. Greek was his native tongue; and, although this may point to an Oriental birth, he was in Rome at an early age. He heard Irenæus lecture (Photius). The vivid minuteness with which he relates the fortunes of Callistus leads to the conclusion that he was in Rome under Victor (189-199). At the beginning of the third century he was a presbyter, conspicuous for learning, eloquence, zeal, and moral earnestness. He dissented, in matters of doctrine, from Victor's successors (Zephyrinus and Callistus), holding the view that heretics should not be received back into the Church, and favoring the subordination theory of the Trinity; while they were inclined to Patripassianism. He seems to refer to himself as bishop, and stood at the head of a schismatic body in Rome (so also Prudentius). Thus much is extracted from the author's own work, the Philosophoumena. The other notices of his life are few. Eusebius (Hist., vi. 20, 26) calls him bishop, and puts his life in the reign of Alexander Severus (222-235); and Prudentius (400) designates his bishopric as Portus, the port of Rome. Jerome (Cat. Vir. Illustr., 61) gives nothing more about him than a few of his writings. An ancient catalogue of Roman bishops, which Mommsen puts in 354, states that Yppolitus presbyter, with the Roman Bishop Pontianus, was banished by Severus to the unhealthy Island of Sardinia (about 235). It does not say that he died there; and so the account of his death by Prudentius can be harmonized with this statement, but is not corroborated by any other testimony. He says Hippolytus was regarded as a martyr by the Roman Church, and suffered martyrdom at Portus, being torn to pieces by horses. The authenticity of this account is justly denied by Dollinger, on the ground that this mode of punishment was not practised by the Romans. In 1551 a marble statue was exhumed at Portus, which represents Hippolytus in a sitting posture, with beard and high forehead. On the chair are inscribed the titles of his works.

Writings. — In 1842 a learned Greek, Minoides Minas, employed by the French Government, found at Mount Athos, and brought to Paris, a number of manuscripts. Among these was one which E. Miller published at Oxford in 1851, under the title Origen's Philosophoumena; or, Refutation of all Heresies. The first book of this work was known before, and was generally ascribed to Origen. Of the original ten books, the second, third, and a part of the fourth, are still wanting. It is almost universally agreed by critics that this work is by the hand of Hippolytus, and not Origen. Baur (Theol. Jahrb., 1853) regarded the presbyter Caius as the author; but he has no followers in this opinion.

Hippolytus displays in this work wise judgment, large information, a wide acquaintance with the writings of philosophers, and acuteness in bringing out the relation of the ancient philosophies to the Christian heresies. He was as harsh and uncompromising a foe of philosophy as Tertullian. The Refutation of all Heresies (κατὰ πασῶν αἰρέσεων ἐλεγχος) is a polemical work whose main object is to refute the doctrines (and especially the secret doctrines) of the Gnostics, and to abash heretics by showing that their views were taken from Pagan philosophy and Oriental theosophy. Book i. gives a summary of the Greek, Druid, and Indian philosophies. Books ii. and iii. are lost. Book iv. begins in the middle of an account of Chaldean astrology, and gives an account of the magic practised at that time, etc. Books v.-x. contain the account of the heresies. In v. the Ophites (Naaseni, Peraticæ, Sethites, Justinus) are treated; in vi., the followers of Simon Magus, and Valentinus and his disciples; in vii., Basilides (whose views appear to us in an altogether new phase) and Marcion; in viii., the Doketæ, an Arabian Monoïmos, the Quartodecimani, and the Montanists; in ix., Patripassianism, the author giving a valuable picture of the congregation in Rome at that time; and in x. he summarizes the contents of books i. and iv.-ix. It was from this summary that Theodoret drew. From the fact that Hippolytus looks back upon the administration of Callistus (217-222) as belonging to the past, the date of composition may be assigned pretty confidently to the year 234.

Other writings of Hippolytus are mentioned on the statue discovered at Pontus, to the number of thirteen. The greater number of these are entirely lost, and only fragments of others remain. Other works ascribed to him (as the κατὰ Βήρωνα καὶ Ἡλίου, πρὸς Ἰουδαίους, etc.) are so different in style from the Refutation as hardly to be genuine. The same is true in regard to the exegetical works which are ascribed to him on the basis of notices in the fathers, manuscripts, etc. The fragments on Daniel, however, edited by Bardenhewer (D. heil. Hippol. Commentar z. Buch Daniel, Freiburg, 1877), we may confidently regard as genuine.

HIRSCHAU, or HIRSAU, a Benedictine monastery, now destroyed, but once very famous, in the diocese of Spire, was founded in 830 by Count Erlafried of Calw, and his son Bishop Notting of Vercelli. The first monks, numbering fifteen, and the first abbot, Lindebert, came from Fulda; and the traditions of that flourishing seat of learning seemed to take root at Hirschau. But about a thousand internal dissensions, the avarice of the counts of Calw and the plague, completely ruined the institution. For half a century the monastery stood empty, until Leo IX., in 1049, compelled the counts of Calw to repair the buildings, and revive the institution. By its new abbot, Wilhelm der Selige (1069-91), it was brought into a very flourishing condition; and through his Constitutiones Hirsauenses, a close imitation of the Constitutiones Cluniacenses, it exercised a great influence on other German monasteries. During the Reformation it was transformed into a theological seminary, and in 1692 it was destroyed by the French. Its history has been written by Johann Trittenheim, abbot of Spanheim (d. 1516), whose Chronicon H. was printed, Basel, 1559, and the Annales H., at St. Gall, 1690.

HIRSCHER, Johann Baptist, b. at Altermgarten, Württemberg, Jan. 20, 1788; d. at Freiburg, Sept. 4, 1865; was appointed professor of morals and practical theology at Tübingen 1817, and at Freiburg 1837, but retired into private life 1863. In spite of a certain innate, aristocratic conservatism, which prevented him from adopting a truly liberal platform, he belonged to the reform party within the Roman-Catholic Church, and took an active part in public life both before and after 1848. Several of his books, as, for instance, On the Mass (1821), Die kirchlichen Zustände der Gegenwart (1849), etc., were put on the Index, and he submitted.

HITCHCOCK, Edward, D.D., LL.D., b. at Deerfield, Mass., May 24, 1793; d. at Amherst, Feb. 27, 1864. He was an eminent scientist, and from 1825 to 1854 was professor in Amherst College, during the last ten of which years he was its president. By his geological labors he won great fame; but his scientific attainments served as proofs of Christianity, and he delighted to present science as the handmaid of religion. Besides strictly professional works, he wrote The Religion of Geology and its Connected Sciences (1851), and Religious Truths Illustrated from Science (1857).

HITTITES, The. Sons of Heth, the second son of Canaan. Only scattered references to the Hittites (Ἰτιται) occur in the Old Testament, from which we could not at all gather a true idea of them at the time of their power. Generally, it is only scattered families that are mentioned, like those of Ephron, Ahimelech, or Uriah; or small communities, such as may have led to their being included in the lists so often repeated of the Canaanite tribes. Of these were the families of Elon and Beeri, with whom Esau intermarried. In Judg. i. 26, however, the land of the Hittites is at a distance from Palestine; and the same is the case in the history from the time of David. His census extended as far as the Hittites at Kadesh (if we may so correct "Tahtim-Hodshi," 2 Sam. xxiv. 6, as suggested by the LXX. Alex.). Solomon married Hittite women (1 Kings xi. 1); and the kings of the Hittites are mentioned (1 Kings x. 29; 2 Chron. i. 17; 2 Kings vii. 6) as parallel with the kings of Egypt and of Syria. They are the same as the "kings on this side Euphrates" (1 Kings iv. 24).

From the Hebrew Scriptures we could only gather, then, that the Hittites were of a Hamitic race, and regarded as aliens; that, from the time of Abraham to David, they had communities or families in Palestine; and that, from the time of Solomon, they had kings and territory to the north-east of Palestine. Here the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, with those of the Hittites themselves, discovered within the last few years, greatly add to our knowledge.

The Egyptians called the Hittites "Khita." They appear in the reign of Thothmes III., about 1500 B.C. (Rawlinson), as inhabiting a "great land," but only as one among other peoples. Later they became predominant, and were the chief enemy met by Seti I. and Rameses II.; the former of whom captured their western capital, Kadesh, on the Orontes, and the latter of whom gained a victory over them at the same place (about 1350 B.C.), entered then into a treaty with them, and married the daughter of Khitasar, their king, as described in the poem of Pentaur. The allies of the Hittites are mentioned by Pentaur; and De Rougé identified them with tribes as distant as the extreme west of Asia Minor. This is not now credited; although we do know that their influence and arms must have extended, at one time, as far as Smyrna.

The Assyrians knew the Hittites as "Khatti." Like the Egyptians, they found them their chief rivals and most dangerous enemies. They are mentioned by the Babylonian Sargon in the sixteenth century B.C., before the Assyrian Empire had risen. Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1120) found the Hittites inhabiting the region extending westward and southward from Carchemish, and exercising a wide suzerainty north, almost, if not quite, to the Euxine Sea. His successors engaged in constant wars with them, until Sargon extinguished the Hittite power by the capture of Carchemish (717 B.C.), and its incorporation into the Assyrian Empire. The Khatti are mentioned by Sennacherib and Esarhaddon; but their name is merely applied to all the peoples of Syria and Phœnicia.

The monuments of the Hittites themselves have been identified since 1876, chiefly by the labors of Professor A. H. Sayce. The first known were four hieroglyphic inscriptions from Hamath, first faithfully copied in the Second Statement of the American Palestine Exploration Society in 1873. Since that time Hittite monuments with inscriptions have been found at Carchemish on the east, at Aleppo, at Ibreez in Lycaonia, at Marash, at Boghaz Keui, and Eyuk in the Valley of the Halys, and as far east as Karabel, between Smyrna and Sardis. The inscriptions have not yet been deciphered; although a hopeful key has been found in a silver boss, which contains the figure of a king, with his name of "Tarrik-timme, king of the land of Erne," in cuneiform characters of the date of Sargon, and with presumably the same legend in Hittite characters. As yet, however, no well-verified identification of any character with its sound or meaning has been made, unless it be in the case of one character used as an ideograph for "a god." The characters are, with the probable exception of a few determinatives, almost certainly syllabic, but have not wholly lost the hieroglyphic form. They are written in bootstrapedon manner, with the syllables of a word one above another, and the characters raised, instead of incised. The monuments accompanying the inscriptions show a people generally beardless, with the pointed hat, a loose tunic, and boots turned up at the toes. They prove that the Hittites penetrated and conquered the whole of Asia Minor at a period before any history known to us of that region, and that they possessed a high civilization, such as could construct the famous statue of "Niobe," or Cybele, in Mount Sipylus. It is probable that from them, quite as much as from the Phœnicians, the Greeks drew the rudiments of their art; while the Cypriote and Lycian letters, and so the supplemental letters of the Greek alphabet, came very probably from the Hittites. Theirs was the primitive civilization, so far as we know, of Syria, and of Asia Minor from Smyrna to Lake Van.

Their language is not yet certainly known, as their writing is still undeciphered. They were almost certainly not Shemitic, as the hundreds of names that have come to us, except a few in the Bible which were easily borrowed from their Phœnician and Hebrew neighbors, do not easily yield a Shemitic etymology. Such Scripture names as Ephron, Zohar, Joram, Uriah, Elon, Beer, Judith, and Basemath, are plainly Shemitic, and may be either adopted or translated names; but such names as Khita-sar and Khilip-sar (king of Khita and king of Helbon?), with the word "sar" (if it means king; which is a loan word, and not originally Shemitic) following its noun, show a non-Shemitic construction. It is, besides, difficult to see how a really inflecting language could invent or use syllabic characters. It is probable that the Hittites had their origin in the mountainous region of Central and Eastern Asia Minor, and spoke a Proto-Armenian or Alarodian language.

Of their religion we know little. Ashima is mentioned (2 Kings xvii. 30) as a god of Hamath. At Ibreez we have a figure of the great Hittite god, Sandan, — a god of agriculture. At Boghaz Keui are found nearly twenty figures of male and female deities. The Syrian god Adad, or Hadad, may have been originally Hittite. With the softened aspirate we seem to have the name in Hadoram, son of King Toi of Hamath, another form of whose name is given (2 Sam. viii. 10) as Joram; the writer in 1 Chron. xviii. 10 choosing a form meaning Adad is exalted, rather than one meaning Jehovah is exalted. It is remarkable, however, that, on the Assyrian monuments, the element Jehovah enters into the name of the King Jau-bihid, who is also called Ilu-bihid. This, however, belongs to a late period, when the Syrians were replacing the Hittites.

HITZIG, Ferdinand, a learned and bold exegete and critic of the Old Testament; the son of a rationalistic preacher; was b. at Hauingen in Baden, June 23, 1807; d. at Heidelberg, Jan. 22, 1875. He pursued the study of theology at Heidelberg under Paulus, at Halle under Gesenius, and at Göttingen under Ewald, to whom he afterwards dedicated his Isaiah as the "founder of a new science of the Hebrew language and Old-Testament exegesis." In 1830 he became docent at Heidelberg; and in 1832 was called to Zurich, where he remained till 1861, when he was chosen as Umbreit's successor in Heidelberg. At Zurich Hitzig publicly announced himself in favor of calling Strauss. He was a man on the one hand without fear or hypocrisy, and on the other of a polemic temperament and caustic wit, which seemed to exclude personal piety and gentleness. Notwithstanding this, however, he was of pious nature, and not only loved the Old Testament, but sought to serve the kingdom of God by his investigations. He enjoyed the esteem of his colleagues and friends. We can adopt the words of Keim, in the dedication of his History of Jesus (January, 1873, 2d ed., etc.): "To the memory of F. Hitzig, the honest man without fear, the faithful friend without deceit, the pride of Zurich and Heidelberg, the bold, restless architect of biblical science."

As an exegete and critic Hitzig was distinguished by untiring industry, acute penetration, uncorruptible love of truth, and thorough scholarship. He often succeeded, as in the department of textual criticism; but the number of confident but untenable assertions preponderate. The Commentary on Isaiah is his best work. We agree with Hupfeld, that the translation shows the hand of a master, but with him must regret the author's failure "to understand the religious spirit of the prophet, and his apparent resolution to detect the most improbable, and to overlook the most natural sense." This is especially true of the second part of The Psalms (Heidelberg, new and enlarged edition, 1863-65), wherein the author, in all earnestness, not only puts the larger number of the psalms in the century just before Christ, but gives the circumstances under which each was written as exactly as though he could hear the grass growing under his feet (Bleek: Eint. ins A. T., p. 619). In 1869-70 the History of the People of Israel appeared (Leipzig). It comes down to 72 B.C.; but it was not the author's intention to give a history of the religion of Israel. Its assumptions are, as might be expected, numerous and arbitrary. The sojourn in the wilderness, for example, is put down at four years. He hazarded many conjectures where none were needed. In 1855 Ewald espied in his old pupil a real intellectual brother of Hengstenberg.

It was a want of what the English call common sense which prevented this gifted and truth-loving investigator to such a remarkable degree from becoming an exemplary exegete and a trustworthy historian. Ewald was fully justified when he complained that Hitzig made that which was beautiful and tender in Solomon's Song disagreeable and repulsive; that he, in an almost incredible manner, declared the first nine chapters of the Proverbs to have been the last composed, etc. But, in spite of this, he will always have a place of prominence among his contemporaries, and his works will for a long time remain a fountain of quickening to many.

LIT. — Besides the works already mentioned Hitzig wrote Begriff d. Kritik, aus A. T. praktisch erörtert (Heidelberg, 1831), Commentaries on Jeremiah (1841, 2d ed., 1866), Ezekiel (1847), Ecclesiastes (1847), Daniel (1850), Song of Solomon (1855), Proverbs (Zürich, 1858), Minor Prophets (3d ed., 1863), Job (Heidelberg, 1874). Also on the New Testament, Joh. Markus u. s. Schriften, Zürich, 1843; Zur Kritik paulinischer Briefe, Leipzig, 1870; Ostern u. Pfingsten. Zur Zeitbestim. im A. u. N. T., Heidelberg, 1838; Grabschrift d. Darius, Zürich, 1840; and d. Eschumnezar, Leipzig, 1855; Bibl. Theologie und messian. Weissag., ed. J. J. KNEUCKER, Karlsruhe, 1880, etc. Hitzig was also a contributor to SCHENKEL'S Bibel-Lexikon and many periodicals. KAMPHAUSEN.

HOADLY, Benjamin, a distinguished Low

Church divine and controversial writer of the Church of England; b. at Westerham, Kent, Nov. 14, 1676; d. at Winchester, April 17, 1761. He was a student and fellow of Catherine College, Cambridge; became rector of St. Peter-le-Poor, London, 1704, and Streatham, 1710; Bishop of Bangor, 1715; was soon translated to Hereford, to Salisbury (1723), and to Winchester (1734). Hoadly was one of the most able and influential prelates of the eighteenth century, and one of the earliest representatives of the principle of ecclesiastical toleration in the Church of England after the Restoration (1660). He was a typical Broad or Low Churchman. His name is more intimately associated than any other with the so-called "Bangorian Controversy," which engaged the pens of fifty writers, some of them, like Law and Sherlock, among the ablest of their day, and produced an intense excitement among all classes. It arose from a sermon preached by Hoadly in 1717 from John xviii. 36 ("My kingdom is not of this world"); in which he declared for political toleration irrespective of church connection, and asserted, as against the crown and clergy, that Christ was the only authoritative lawgiver, etc., in the Church. He deprecated in the strongest language "men's suffering in their temporal rights upon account of any differences in those points in which the reason of mankind permits them to differ" (Preface to The Common Rights of Subjects). This sermon was brought up for consideration in convocation (1717); and its discussion threatened to lead to such disastrous consequences, that the body was prorogued by the crown, and did not sit again till 1852. Hoadly's chief work on this controversy was his Common Rights of Subjects defended, and the Nature of the Sacramental Test considered: an Answer to Dr. Sherlock's Vindication of the Corporation and Test Acts, London, 1719. Among his other writings were an Essay on Miracles (1702), A Brief Vindication of the Ancient Prophets (1709), and Sermons (2 vols., 1754-55). Collected edition of his works, with a Life, in 3 vols., London, 1773. See also STOUGH-TON: Religion in England, v. 412 sqq.

HOBART, John Henry, Protestant-Episcopal Bishop of New York; b. in Philadelphia, Sept. 14, 1775; d. at Auburn, Sept. 10, 1830. He graduated at Princeton 1793, and was tutor there from 1796 to 1798. After holding several parishes, he became assistant minister of Trinity, New York, assistant bishop of the diocese of New York 1811, and bishop in 1816. He took a deep interest in the General Theological Seminary, New-York City, and was made professor of pastoral theology and pulpit eloquence in 1821. In 1823 he travelled in Europe on account of his health, and was one of the first Protestants to preach in Rome. He was a zealous advocate of episcopal ordination, and engaged in a controversy with Dr. John M. Mason (Presbyterian) of New York on that subject. Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., preserves in its name the memory of the bishop. Among Dr. Hobart's writings were Companion to the Altar, New York, 1804, 13th ed., 1840; Apology for Apost. Order, New York, 1807, new ed., 1844; Sermons on Redemption, 2 vols., London and New York, 1824. See Posthumous Works, with a Memoir by Dr. BERRIAN (New York, 1833, 3 vols.), and Memoir of Bishop Hobart by SCHROEDER (New York, 1833).

HOBBS, Thomas, b. at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, April 5, 1588; d. at Hardwick Hall, in Devonshire, Dec. 4, 1679. He was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and spent the first part of his life, up to 1637, as tutor in various noble families, often travelling on the Continent with his pupils, and the last, after 1637, in a comprehensive and vigorous literary activity, first in Paris (1641-52), then in London, or in the country with the Hardwick family. His principal works are Elementa Philosophica de Cive (1642), Human Nature and De Corpore Politico (1650), Leviathan (1651, new ed., Oxford, 1881, London, 1882), Liberty and Necessity (1654), etc. His moral and political works were first collected in 1750; all his works in 1839-45, by Molesworth. The Vite Hobbiane Auctorium gives full information concerning early editions, translations, etc. The philosophical stand-point of Hobbes may be described as an application to the study of man of the method and principles of the study of nature; and the results of this process were a psychology and a morals utterly antagonistic, not only to Christianity, but to religion in general. On account of the merely preliminary stage which the science of nature had reached in the time of Hobbes, his conception is premature; but he carried it out with great vigor; and it happens, not unfrequently, that the materialistic psychology and utilitarian morals of to-day return to his writings, and adopt some modification of his paradoxes. There is no comprehensive monograph on Hobbes. See the art. by G. CROOM ROBERTSON, in Encyclopædia Britannica.

HOCHMANN, Ernst Christof, surnamed Hoch-enau, b. 1670; d. 1721; studied law at Halle, but was relegated from the university on account of his participation in the extravagances of the Pietists. In 1697 he entered into relation with Arnold and Dippel, and repaired to Francfort with the aim of converting the Jews. But riots arose; and he retired to the estates of Count Wittgenstein, the refuge of all separatists and mystics. From 1700 to 1721 he wandered about, preaching in public, conducting worship in private, denouncing the lukewarmness of the clergy, etc. He was often arrested,—at Detmold 1702, Hanover 1703, Nuremberg 1708-09, Halle 1711, etc.; but he found also many adherents, especially at Crefeld, Duisburg, Mühlheim, Wesel, Emmerich, and other places in the Rhine-region. Full account of his views, influence, writings, etc., is found in M. GÖBEL: Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rhein-westfäl. Kirche, Coblenz, 1852, vol. ii. HAGENBACH.

HODGE, Charles, D.D., LL.D., of Scotch-Irish ancestry on his father's side, and through his mother related to the French Huguenots; b. Dec. 18, 1797, in Philadelphia, where his grandfather, a Christian merchant from the north of Ireland, had settled in 1735, and where his father, a godly physician, died when the subject of this sketch was only six months old; d. in Princeton, N.J., June 19, 1878. He matriculated at the College of New Jersey in 1812, and after graduation entered in 1816 the theological seminary in Princeton, having among his classmates his two life-long friends, — John Johns, afterwards bishop of Virginia, and Charles P. McIlvaine, afterwards bishop of Ohio. In 1822 he was appointed by the General Assembly professor of biblical and Oriental literature. In 1822 he married Sarah Bache, great-grand-daughter of Benjamin Franklin. Soon after, he went abroad (1826-28) to prosecute special studies, and in Paris, Halle, and Berlin attended the lectures of De Sacy, Tholuck, Hengstenberg, and Neander. In 1825 he founded the Biblical Repository and Princeton Review, and during forty years was its editor, and the principal contributor to its pages. He received the degree of D.D. from Rutgers College in 1834, and that of LL.D. from Washington College, Pennsylvania, in 1864. In 1840 Dr. Hodge was transferred to the chair of didactic theology, retaining still, however, the department of New Testament exegesis, the duties of which he continued to discharge until his death. He was moderator of the General Assembly in 1846. Fifty years of his professoriate were completed in 1872, and the event was most impressively celebrated on the 23d of April. A large concourse, including four hundred of his own pupils, assembled to do him honor. Representatives from various theological institutes, at home and abroad, mingled their congratulations with those of his colleagues; and letters expressing deepest sympathy with the occasion came from distinguished men in all quarters of the land and from across the sea. Dr. Hodge enjoyed what President Woolsey, at the jubilee just referred to, hoped he might enjoy, — "a sweet old age." He lived in the midst of his children and grandchildren; and, when the last moment came, they gathered round him. "Dearest," he said to a beloved daughter, "don't weep. To be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord. To be with the Lord is to see him. To see the Lord is to be like him." Of the children who survive him, three are ministers of the gospel; and two of these succeed him in the faculty of Princeton Theological Seminary, — Dr. C. W. Hodge, in the department of exegetical theology, and Dr. A. A. Hodge, in that of dogmatics. The latter wrote his father's biography (1880).

Dr. Hodge was a voluminous writer, and from the beginning to the end of his theological career his pen was never idle. In 1835 he published his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, his greatest exegetical work, and one of the most masterly commentaries on this Epistle that has ever been written. Other works followed at intervals of longer or shorter duration, — Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, 1840; Way of Life, 1841, republished in England, translated into other languages, and circulated to the extent of thirty-five thousand copies in America; Commentary on Ephesians, 1856; on First Corinthians, 1857; on Second Corinthians, 1859. His magnum opus is the Systematic Theology (1871-73), of 3 vols. 8vo, and extending to 2260 pages. His last book, What is Darwinism? appeared in 1874. In addition to all this, it must be remembered that he contributed upwards of one hundred and thirty articles to the Princeton Review, many of which, besides exerting a powerful influence at the time of their publication, have since been gathered into volumes, and as Princeton Essays, Hodge's Essays (1857), and Hodge's Discussions in Church Polity (ed. Rev. William Durant, 1878), have taken a permanent place in our theological literature.

This record of Dr. Hodge's literary life is suggestive of the great influence that he exerted. But, if we would properly estimate that influence, we must remember that three thousand ministers of the gospel passed under his instruction, and that to him was accorded the rare privilege, during the course of a long life, of achieving distinction as a teacher, exegete, preacher, controversialist, ecclesiastic, and systematic theologian. As a teacher he had few equals; and, if he did not display popular gifts in the pulpit, he revealed homiletical powers of a high order in the "conferences" on sabbath afternoons, where he spoke with his accustomed clearness and logical precision, but with great spontaneity, and amazing tenderness and unction.

Dr. Hodge's literary powers were seen at their best in his contributions to the Princeton Review, many of which are acknowledged masterpieces of controversial writing. They cover a wide range of topics, from the apologetic questions that concern our common Christianity, to questions of ecclesiastical administration, in which only Presbyterians have been supposed to take interest. But the questions in debate among American theologians during the period covered by Dr. Hodge's life, belonged, for the most part, to the departments of anthropology and soteriology; and it was upon these, accordingly, that his polemic powers were mainly employed.

Though always honorable in debate, we should nevertheless not be likely to have a correct idea of his character, if we judged him only by the polemic relations in which his writings reveal him. Controversy does not emphasize the amiable side of a man's nature. Dr. Hodge was a man of warm affection, of generous impulses, and of John-like piety. Devotion to Christ was the salient characteristic of his experience, and it was the test by which he judged the experience of others. Hence, though a Presbyterian and a Calvinist, his sympathies went far beyond the boundaries of sect. He refused to entertain the narrow views of church polity which some of his brethren advocated. He repudiated the unhistorical position of those who denied the validity of Roman-Catholic baptism. He gave his sympathy to all good agencies. He was conservative by nature, and his life was spent in defending the Reformed theology as set forth in the Westminster symbols. He was fond of saying that Princeton had never originated a new idea; but this meant no more than that Princeton was the advocate of historical Calvinism in opposition to the modified and provincial Calvinism of a later day. And it is true that Dr. Hodge must be classed among the great defenders of the faith, rather than among the great constructive minds of the Church. He had no ambition to be epoch-making by marking the era of a new departure. But he has earned a higher title to fame, in that he was the champion of his Church's faith during a long and active life, her trusted leader in time of trial, and for more than half a century the most conspicuous teacher of her ministry. The garnered wisdom of his life is given us in his Systematic Theology, the greatest system of dogmatics in our language. FRANCIS L. PATTON.

HODY, Humphrey, b. at Odcombe, Somersetshire, Jan. 1, 1659; d. at Oxford, Jan. 20, 1706. In 1684 he became fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, in 1698 Regius Professor of Greek, and in 1704 archdeacon of Oxford. In reward of his support of the ruling party in their treatment of the bishops, who had been deprived for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, he was appointed (1693) chaplain to Archbishop Tillotson and Tenison successively. But he lives as author of a classic work, De bibliorum textibus originalibus versionibus Græcis et Latina Vulgata, libri iv., Oxford, 1705.

HOE VON HOHENEGG, b. at Vienna, 1580; d. at Dresden, 1645; studied at Wittenberg; and was appointed third preacher to the electoral court of Saxony 1602, superintendent of Plauen 1603, and first court-preacher at Dresden 1612. In this position he exercised an almost absolute influence on the elector's relations with Gustavus Adolphus and the emperor. But his hatred of the Calvinists made him a friend of the Roman Catholics; and he lent a willing hand to the machinations of the Jesuits in Bohemia, simply out of rancor against the Reformed creed. Besides some polemical essays, he wrote Commentar. in Apocalypsin, 1610-40, 2 vols. THOLUCK.

HOFACKER, Ludwig and Wilhelm G., two brothers of rare piety and ministerial usefulness. Their father was pastor and dekan in Stuttgart. Ludwig was b. at Wildbad, April 15, 1798; was vicar in Stuttgart, and d. Nov. 18, 1828, as pastor in Rielingshausen, Württemberg, after a short ministry of four years, and with the words "Saviour, Saviour!" Wilhelm was b. in Gärtringen, Feb. 16, 1805; pastor at Waiblingen 1833, and of St. Leonard's Church, Stuttgart, 1835, where he d. Aug. 10, 1843, "a prince of God, with words of eternal life on his lips." Thousands flocked to hear both the brothers. The former appealed directly to the conscience; destroying the sinner's confidence in the righteousness of works, and presenting the atonement by Christ's blood as the only hope of the soul. He said, "I attack souls as with the approach of a storm." He was a popular orator, who is sometimes startling, but always rugged, positive, and powerful. Wilhelm likewise preached only on the fundamental themes of grace and guilt, but his rhetoric was more artistic and finished than his brother's. The former, those would prefer who would rather drink from a fresh, rushing, forest-brook; the latter, those who would rather kneel at the clear, placid, deep waters of a lovely lake. The Hofackers exerted a lasting influence upon the religious life of Württemberg, and thousands of copies of their sermons have been distributed.

HOFFMANN, Andreas Gottlieb, b. at Welbsleten, near Magdeburg, April 13, 1796; d. at Jena, March 16, 1864; studied theology at Halle, more especially Oriental languages, under Gesenius, and was appointed professor of theology at Jena in 1821. His principal works are Grammatica Syriaca, Halle, 1827, twice translated into English by Day and Harris Cowper; and Entwurf d. hebräischen Alterthümer, Weimar, 1832.

HOFFMANN, Daniel, b. at Halle, 1540; d. at Wolfenbüttel, 1611; studied theology at Jena; and was appointed professor at Helmstädt in 1576, but dismissed in 1601. The occasion of his dismissal was a controversy with his colleague, Caselius, which brought much disturbance into the working of the university. Hoffmann was a pupil of Ramus, and held that there were two kinds of truth, — the philosophical and the theological; that the former absolutely contradicted the latter; that philosophy could not be studied without great harm to the student, etc. Caselius was a humanist, and protested that there were not two kinds of truth, but only two means of grasping it, — reason and revelation; that philosophy and theology were perfectly agreed when truly understood; that philosophy was an indispensable aid to the study of theology, etc. In the heat of the controversy Hoffmann was led to make more than one doubtful assertion; and the theologians of the strict Lutheran school, who probably held the same views as he, left him alone in the field, provoked as they were by his previous attacks on the doctrine of ubiquity. The principal questions were, nevertheless, well put and well debated; and the controversy has some interest for the study of the relation between philosophy and theology. HOFFMANN, Ludwig Friedrich Wilhelm, court-preacher in Berlin, and general-superintendent of Brandenburg; b. Oct. 30, 1806, in Leonberg, Württemberg, the birthplace of Schelling and Paulus; d. of heart-disease, Aug. 28, 1873, in Berlin. His father was a thoughtful pietist, and founder of the religious colony of Kornthal (1819). His brother Christoph was the originator of a movement for the colonization of Palestine. After passing through a theological course at Tübingen, where he had David Strauss for a fellow-student, he became vicar of Heumaden, and in 1834 pastor in Stuttgart. In 1839 he was made superintendent of the Institution for Missions in Basel. There he remained for twelve years, giving himself up with great enthusiasm to his duties and the study of the history of missions. During this period he published a number of works on missions, as Missionsstunden u. Vorträge ("Missionary Talks and Discourses"), Stuttgart, 1847, 1851, 1853; D. Epochen d. Kirchengesch. Indiens ("Epochs in the Church History of India"), 1853, etc. From Basel he passed to Tübingen as professor; and from there, in 1852, he followed the call of Frederick William IV. as court-preacher to Berlin. He exerted a greater influence over the king of Prussia than any other man, in favor of ecclesiastical union. He was strongly in favor of a union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches on the basis of the Augsburg Confession, so that there might be "one evangelical Protestant Church with two confessional types." Hoffmann was an indefatigable worker, and exerted a powerful influence as an evangelical preacher who sympathized with the theology of Bengel. But more attractive and imposing than his literary attainments was the frank and magnanimous personality of the man. [He was chosen a delegate to the conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York in 1873, but died before it met.] He published a number of volumes of sermons under the titles Ruf zum Herrn (Berlin, 1854–58), D. Posaune Deutschlands (1861–63), etc. See Leben u. Wirken d. Dr. Hoffmann, by his son, Berlin, 1878–80, 2 vols. RUDOLF KÖGEL.

HOFFMANN, Melchior, one of the most prominent Anabaptist leaders, a furrier by trade; was b. at Hall in Suabia; worked in Livonia when the Reformation reached those regions; threw himself with the native enthusiasm of his character into the movement; began to preach, met with great opposition; repaired to Wittenberg (1525), and returned with recommendations from Luther; caused great excitement in Dorpat and Reval, and was finally expelled from the country. On his return to Germany he was very coldly received by the Reformers, but obtained, nevertheless, an appointment as preacher at Kiel, in Holstein, 1527. Soon after, however, he began an attack on Luther's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. A commission was formed to investigate matters; and he was convicted of heresy, and expelled from Holstein 1529. His divergence from Luther made him at first well received at Strassburg, but it soon became apparent that he inclined towards the Anabaptists. He began to publish prophecies, and soon placed himself openly at the head of the party. In Emden he caused sore disturbances in 1536; and on his return to Strassburg he was arrested, and kept in prison for the rest of his life. He probably died in 1542. See HERRMANN: Essai sur la vie et les écrits de M. Hoffmann, Strassb., 1852. CUNITZ.

HÖFLING, Johann Wilhelm Friedrich, b. at Drossenfeld, near Bayreuth, 1802; d. in Munich, April 5, 1853; studied theology at Erlangen, 1819–23, and was appointed pastor of St. Jobst, near Nuremberg, 1827; professor of theology at Erlangen, 1833; and member of the consistory in Munich, 1852. His principal works are Das Sakrament der Taufe (1846–48, 2 vols.) and Grundsätze evangelisch-lutherischer Kirchenverfassung (1850), occasioned by the movement of 1848, which also called forth a debate of the question of church constitution. His Liturgisches Urkundenbuch (1854) was published after his death, by Thomasius and Harnack. HERZOG.

HOFMANN, Johann Chr. Karl, afterwards honored by Bavaria with the title von Hofmann; was b. Dec. 21, 1810, in Nürnberg, where, under the tutelage of a poor but pious mother, he was trained up in profound respect for religion; d. Dec. 20, 1877, in Erlangen. In 1827 he went to the university of Erlangen, and in 1829 to Berlin, walking on foot. Hegel, Schleiermacher, Neander, and Hengstenberg were lecturing side by side at the time. But Hofmann gave himself up almost exclusively to historical studies, under Ranke and Von Raumer. After teaching several years at the gymnasium in Erlangen, he became repetent at the university, and in 1835 writes: "The more I occupy myself with Scripture exegesis, the more powerfully am I convinced of the certainty that the divine Word is one single work, and the more am I stimulated with the glad hope that our generation will witness the victory of the truth of inspiration. . . . It is a sheer impossibility that the prophecies of the prophets and apostles are false, while their doctrines are true; for here form and contents, fact and doctrine, are one; and this is the distinguishing characteristic of revealed truth. . . . I pray God to permit me to see the Christ, now crucified by his enemies, lifted up by Himself, that I may place my hands in the print of the nails, and may know him, in the glory of his victory, whom I have heretofore loved in the humility of his conflict and suffering." In 1841 he was made professor at Erlangen; the year following, accepted a call to Rostock, exchanging a lecture-room with one hundred hearers, for one with only three; and returned in 1845 to Erlangen, a new period of prosperity for the university dating from that time. While at Rostock he took a deep interest in ecclesiastical matters, laboring zealously with Karsten, Wichern, and others, in the interest of missions. He was also interested in political affairs, and represented Erlangen and Fürth at several sessions of the Bavarian Parliament.

Among Hofmann's first publications were two historical works, — Gesch. d. Aufruhrs in d. Siebenen (1837) and Weltgesch. f. Gymnasien (1839, 2d ed., 1843). His first effort in theology was D. 70 Jahre d. Jeremias u. d. 70 Jahrwochen d. Daniel (1836). The 70 weeks of Daniel he counts in the order 62+1+7 (see DANIEL). The 62 extend from 605 to 171 B.C.; the single week, from 171 to 164. The other 7 mark the intervening period before Christ's coming. Weissagung u. Erfüllung im A. u. N. Test. (1841-44) appeared at a time when two views of prophecy prevailed. Hengstenberg petrified it into simple prediction; speculative criticism dissipated it into presentiment, and placed the prophecies after events. Hofmann brought prophecy into closest connection with history, and treated it as an organic whole. History itself is prophecy; and each period contains the germ of the future, and prefigures it. The entire scriptural history is a prophecy of the final and eternal relation between God and man. The incarnation marks the beginning of the essential fulfilment; for Christ is the new man, the antitype of the old; but it marks only the beginning of this fulfilment; for the head is only the realization of the intended perfect communion with God, when it is joined with the body of believers. Prophecy in the Old Testament becomes ever richer and richer in its forms, but points only to one goal,—the God-man. He is then, in turn, the starting-point for new prophecy and hope; his appearance being the prefigurement of the final glorification of the church of believers. The permanent worth of this work consists in the proof that the Old and New Testaments are parts of a single history of salvation; displaying the gradual realization, by divine interpositions, of redemption for the race.

Hofmann's second great work, D. Schriftbeweis (1852-56, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1857-60), is an attempt to prove the authenticity and divine origin of Christianity from its records. He lamented the usual method of doing this from single passages of Scripture; and himself sought to use the biblical record in its entirety, as one organic whole. He started from the idea, that, to understand Christianity, it was not necessary to describe religious experiences, nor rehearse the doctrines of the Scriptures and the Church, but to develop the simple fact that makes us Christians, or the communion of God with man, mediated by Christ. Herein he differs fundamentally from Schleiermacher, who starts out from the sense of absolute dependence in the Christian's experience. Hofmann starts with the new birth. The results at which they arrive in their systems are likewise different. With Hofmann, all is historical; with Schleiermacher, nothing. This work aroused opposition. The author had denied the doctrine of vicarious atonement, and the charge was made against him of denying the atonement altogether. To this he replied in Schutzschriften (1856-59).

Hofmann's other works were D. heil. Schrift. N. T.'s (1862-81, 9 parts), Theol. Ethik (1878), Vermischte Aufsätze (Erlangen, 1878), Encyclopädie der Theologie (1879), and Biblische Hermeneutik (1880), both published in Nördlingen. [See GRAU: Erinnerungen an J. C. K. v. Hofmann, Gütersloh, 1879.] ALBERT HAUCK.

HOFMEISTER, Sebastian, whose true name was Wagner, hence his learned colleagues called him sometimes Economus (a translation of the first-mentioned name), or Carpentarius (a translation of the last); was b. at Schaffhausen, 1476; studied in Paris, under Faber Stapulensis, and was, after his return to Switzerland, appointed lecturer in the Franciscan convent at Zürich. Having adopted the ideas of the Reformation, he was soon removed from Zürich to Lucern; but, as he caused great disturbance there too, he returned in 1522 to his native city. In Schaffhausen he found a better reception; and, after the two conferences at Zürich (January and December, 1523), the Reformation was introduced, and he was made pastor of St. John. He was suspected, however, of inclining towards Anabaptism, and was in 1525 sent by the magistrate to Basel, to have his orthodoxy examined and verified. As the examination did not result in the certificate needed, Hofmeister went to Zürich, where he became Zwingli's trusted collaborator, and pastor of the Fraumünster. In 1528 he went for a short time to Berne, as professor of Hebrew, and was finally appointed preacher at Zofingen, where he died 1533. See M. KIRCHHOFER: S. Wagner, genannt Hofmeister, Zürich, 1808.

HOGE, Moses, b. at Cedar Creek, Va., Feb. 15, 1752; d. in Philadelphia, July 5, 1820. He was ordained in the Presbyterian Church 1782, president of Hampden-Sidney College 1807-20, and professor in the seminary there 1812-20. He was much admired as a preacher. By his widely circulated Christian Panoply (1799), in reply to Paine's Age of Reason, he exerted a great influence. A volume of his sermons appeared in 1821.

HOHENLOHE-WALDENBURG-SCHILLINGSFÜRST, Alexander Leopold Franz Emerich, Prince of, b. at Kupferzell, near Waldenburg, Aug. 17, 1794; d. at Vöslau, near Baden, Nov. 17, 1849; received a very desultory education at Vienna, Berne, and the seminaries of Tyrnau and Ellwangen; was ordained priest in 1816; visited Rome, and then settled in Bavaria, where he labored in Munich, Bamberg, and Würzburg, preaching and writing. After making the acquaintance of Martin Michl, a peasant who cured sick people by prayers, the prince also began to work miraculous cures. The sensation he produced was enormous; but the police interfered, and the Pope dared not recognize the miracles. In 1825 he quietly retired to a canonry in Grosswardein in Hungary. In 1844 he was made bishop in partibus. In 1848 he was expelled from Hungary by the revolutionists. See his life by A. FEUERBACH and by SCHAROLD, treating at length the question of the miraculous cures, the one pro, the other contra.

HOLBACH, Paul Heinrich Dietrich, Baron d', b. at Heidelberg, in the Palatinate, 1723; d. at his estate of Grandval, Jan. 21, 1789; lived mostly in Paris, and acquired a kind of celebrity by gathering around his table the "philosophers" of that time, and by writing, or causing to be written, some of the most characteristic books of the age. As those books were printed in foreign countries, and published anonymously, the authorship is in many cases doubtful. The most remarkable of them is the Système de la nature (London, 1770), which found nothing, either in nature or in history, but matter and motion. Le bon sens (1782) is a popularization of the Système de la nature, and did much harm by penetrating into the lower social classes. Le christianisme dévoilé, L'imposture sacerdotale, L'esprit du clergé, etc., are of less importance. WAGENMANN.

HOLINESS. See SANCTIFICATION.

HOLINESS OF GOD is, as Quenstedt substantially defined it, God's perfect and essential purity, and freedom from all defect and blemish (summa omnique tabis expers in Deo puritas). The Hebrew word קדש ("holy," to "make holy") etymologically referred, not to the moral but the material nature; but there are no instances of its use in the latter sense. It was only used in the department of religion among the Hebrews; and, although the application of the term to the external relations of persons and things to religious purposes is the oldest, it is undeniable that the word derived its meaning alone from the idea of God which prevails in the Old Testament. The term seems to come from קדש, which suggests the notion of separation, and especially separation of that which is defective or diseased. The latter is the meaning of the Assyrian kadištu. This word is found in an Assyrian oath (see Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, II. p. 17) at the side of its Sumerian equivalent nugig, which is compounded of nu ("not") and gig ("diseased").

The central idea of holiness is not unapproachableness, or exaltation above the earth, as Schultz thinks (A. T. Theologie, p. 517); nor is it an æsthetic quality, and synonymous with the glory which surrounds Jehovah in his revelation to Israel (Dumm, Theol. d. Propheten, pp. 169 sqq.). God is glorious because he is holy (Exod. xv. 11); and his glory is only the outward expression, as it were, of his holiness. Holiness is absolute freedom from evil and all defect, absolute perfection of life, especially of ethical life (Oehler). God is said to be holy, not in such a way as to exclude all other beings from holiness, but because he is so in a peculiar manner (1 Sam. ii. 2). Absolute holiness is an essential attribute of his nature. It is from this centre that the ideas of his unapproachableness, incomparableness, and glory irradiate.

Special objects and rites were by the law of Sinai invested with the quality of holiness. God likewise desires men to be holy, and is himself approachable for all such as he calls and sanctifies (1 Sam. vi. 20; Ps. xxiv. 3, etc.): his holiness is no barrier to them. His Spirit is called holy, because its work is to awaken and promote religious life in the soul (Ps. cxliii. 10); and the fallen and penitent man of God beseeches that it may not be taken away from him (Ps. li. 11). Human holiness in the New Testament is represented as starting at the centre of man's being,—his heart,—and as extending outwards to his acts and words. The representation of the Old Testament represents it as starting at the surface (Deut. xiv. 21), and penetrating inwards to the heart. That of the Old Testament is more ceremonial, but by no means exclusively so. The law also made the holiness of Israel conditional on obedience to the divine will (Exod. xix. 5 sq.; Lev. xx. 7 sq.), that is, upon a moral qualification; and the exhortations of the Old Testament are everywhere based upon moral considerations and a moral aim. See the Theologies of the Old Testament, of SCHULTZ and OEHLER [and the discussion of the subject under Attributes, in the works on systematic theology]. DELITZSCH.

HOLLAND. The inhabitants possess full religious liberty. All the adherents of the different creeds have equal civil and political rights and privileges, and enjoy entire freedom of administration in every thing relating to their religion and its exercise. The various denominations, save those who decline to receive such aid, are subsidized by the State. The total thus expended in 1877 was about three hundred thousand dollars. In the north-east the Protestants preponderate; in the south, the Roman Catholics; while in the central provinces both are fairly represented. In the last fifty years there has been amid the entire population a slight but steady increase in the proportion of Protestants and Jews, and a corresponding decrease of Roman Catholics.

The census which follows is that of the year 1869; but in some of the following paragraphs, figures of a later date have been obtained, and are so stated.

By the authorities the population is classified thus as regards religion:—

I. THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES. (a) The Netherlandish Reformed.—In 1617 Carleton, the English ambassador, stated, that, in Olden Barne-veldt's opinion, the greater part of the inhabitants of the United Provinces, and especially of the Province of Holland, were Roman Catholics. Yet in 1648, when the eighty-years' war was concluded by the Peace of Westphalia, the Reformed Confession alone was acknowledged as rightful. Its adherents, therefore, became the State Church, and so continued to be until the revolution of 1795, when all confessions were put on an equality. This relation to the State led to the formation of many Reformed churches, and that even in places where the small number of Protestants forbade the hope of a permanent organization. To this is due the fact, that many of these churches, especially in North Brabant, Zeeland, and Guelderland, ceased to exist when the connection with the State was broken off; and that the number of parishes, notwithstanding an increase in certain places after 1815, on the whole made small progress during the last hundred years. In the year 1784 there were about fifteen hundred congregations. Through the fall of the State Church these were reduced, in 1815, to about fourteen hundred and fifty; while now they have recovered, and number fifteen hundred and eighty-one. In the places where almost the whole population became Protestant, we observe a pretty regular increase, as, for example, in Friesland, which in 1604 had a hundred and eighty congregations, in 1784 two hundred and ten, and now has two hundred and thirty-six.

When the Church became free from the State, it felt the lack of a proper independent organization; and all efforts to remedy this evil fell through amidst the troubles of the times. In the year 1816 King William I., who went back not only to the traditions of the earlier period, but even beyond them, gave a constitution to the Church just as if it still, even in its inner working, was under governmental direction. In the general joy at the termination of the long period of confusion, this measure met with no opposition except in the classis of Amsterdam; and it is still to-day the basis of the existing church order, since it gave shape to "the general regulations of the Reformed Church" made in 1852. But, while these gave to the body greater independence than it had in 1816 (e.g., in relation to the choice of officers), they obtained the royal sanction, which at that time was indispensable, only under "eleven conditions," which, however, so far as they had not already become invalid, were withdrawn by the royal decree of July 22, 1870.

The body now forms one whole; and instead of being called, as of old, "The Reformed churches," its legal name is "The Reformed Church." It embraces all the reformed in the Netherlands, not only the Low-Dutch, but also the Walloons, the English Presbyterians, and the Scotch. The Walloon or French congregations are mainly composed of the refugees driven by persecution from France and Flanders. As the descendants of these gradually blended with the Netherlanders, their numbers as a distinct body decreased. In 1784 they had more than sixty ministers, in 1815 forty-seven ministers, with thirty-five congregations, but now have only seventeen congregations, with twenty-six ministers. The Presbyterian-English churches were formed only in those places where commercial intercourse, or the presence of an English garrison during the eighty-years' war, gave occasion for them. At present there exist only the one at Amsterdam, and that of the united Middleburg-Vlissingen. The only Scotch Church now remaining is that of Rotterdam, founded in 1643.

The Reformed Church (1881) numbers 1,346 congregations, with 1,609 ministers. Twenty years ago there were about two hundred candidates for the ministry at command for vacant charges; while now candidates are lacking for more than two hundred vacancies. The congregations are divided into a hundred and thirty-eight smaller circles, or "Ringe," and into forty-four larger circles, or "Classes." These classes constitute ten provincial bodies, to which is added an eleventh, called the "Walloon Commission." The organization culminates in the synod, which consists of nineteen members, thirteen ministers, and six elders, who are named by the provincial authorities, who, in turn, are chosen by the classes. The classical assemblies are the characteristic feature of the organism. They meet yearly for the election of officers and the consideration of such matters as are laid before them by the synod; and while, in the other assemblies, the ministers are twice as many as the elders, the classes are composed of all the ministers in their bounds, and an equal number of elders. The local congregation is governed by the consistory, which consists of an equal number of elders and deacons. Since 1867, in most cases, these, as well as the minister, are chosen by a college of representatives; these representatives being themselves chosen by the whole body of adult members, excepting such as are supported by the poor-funds of the church. This direct participation of the people in elections has in most of the churches, especially in the large cities, placed the power in the hands of the orthodox.

The management of the church property was in like manner directed by decrees of King William I., issued in 1819 and 1823; but these were reversed in October, 1869; and since that time most of the congregations have placed themselves under a general "Committee of Control," while the rest are altogether autonomous, and enjoy a so-called free administration.

From the beginning of the Reformation, the ministers were trained at the State universities, where theological faculties had been formed for this purpose. Although almost all candidates for the ministry took this method of preparation, it was not positively obligatory. The most recent law concerning the universities (in 1877) has released the professors from the duty of teaching the theology of the confessions; while in each university two professors, named by the synod of the Reformed Church, are charged with the duty of lecturing on dogmatic and practical theology. In 1877 the three State universities (Leyden, Utrecht, and Groningen), and that of the city of Amsterdam, together contained two hundred and forty students of theology.

Neither foreign nor domestic missions are carried on by the Church or its officers as such. And although the work finds little sympathy amid the growing materialism of the people, still, in later years, it has shown considerable activity, notwithstanding the divisions that prevail; which divisions, however, prevent the possibility of complete and accurate statistics. Besides the Moravian Society, which labored in the West Indies, there was until 1859 only the Netherlandish Missionary Society, which was founded in 1797. Now there are ten societies which send missionaries to the heathen and the Mohammedans, and one which confines itself to the Jews. In the year 1877 the receipts of these amounted to three hundred thousand gulden; and they employed a hundred and fifty-two missionaries, of whom sixty-six belonged to the Moravians, and twenty-five to the Rhenish union. The church-members are about a hundred thousand, and two hundred schools are attended by fourteen thousand scholars.

The public schools are "confessionless;" but there are hundreds of private schools, supported by Roman Catholics and Protestants, which base their teaching on Christianity. There are two considerable associations formed—one in 1860, the other in 1877—for the purpose of supporting and extending these schools.

Evangelistic work is carried on by several associations of believers, who together have forty-five evangelists in the field. Activity in this direction, as well as in work for lost children, fallen women, the blind, etc., is ever on the increase; although confessional differences hinder the desired co-operation among those who are of the same faith.

(b) The Christian Reformed.—In the third and fourth decades of this century there arose a reaction against the tendency to strip off from Christian faith all the peculiarities of the old confessions. This was supported by such men as DaCosta and Groen van Prinsterer, who never forsook the old church. In 1834 the first departure took place; but it was embarrassed by the law which forbade more than twenty persons to assemble for worship. In 1836 a royal decree, which was renewed in 1841, confirmed the law, but pointed out a way in which new congregations could be legally constituted. The first one thus formed was at Utrecht in 1839. But new decrees in 1849, 1852, and 1868, abrogated all restrictions; and the "Separatist Church" stood before the law like all the others, save that it drew no support from the treasury. In 1869 the synod at Middleburg united this body with certain other scattered congregations of like tendency, who had taken the name of "Churches under the Cross;" and henceforth the whole was known as the "Christian Reformed Church." It adheres in all essential points to the polity of the synod of Dort. Their general synod meets biennially. The ministers are trained at the theological seminary in Kampen, which has six professors and eighty-three students. The number of churches rose from two hundred and twenty-six in 1860 to three hundred and sixty-two in 1877. The body has exerted a very happy influence upon the church from which they separated, by developing the power of the old faith, even when deprived of all support from the State.

(c) The Lutheran Church.—The Reformation entered the Netherlands under the form of Lutheranism. But this was soon supplanted, at first by the Baptists, and then by the Reformed; so that, from the middle of the sixteenth century, it has been of subordinate importance. The first congregation was formed at Woerden, and in the year 1566 it adopted the Augsburg Confession; but there was no bond between it and other like assemblies, until in 1605 seven ministers agreed upon a system of faith and worship. This ripened in 1612 into the so-called "Brotherhood," which had a synod which met at first at indefinite intervals, and afterwards every five years. The last one under the republic sat in 1696. In 1818 King William I. gave a new organization to the "Evangelical Lutheran Church," which, however, was modified in 1855 and 1859, so as to render the Church independent of the State. Since 1819 the synod meets yearly, consisting of fifteen members, of whom eight are ministers. The local church is governed by the consistory. During the past century the increase of the body has been slow. In 1784 there were forty-five churches and fifty-seven ministers; in 1815 forty-six churches and sixty ministers; in 1877 fifty churches and nine chapels, with sixty-two ministers. At first, ministers were educated abroad; but in 1816 a seminary was founded at Amsterdam, which now has two professors and six students.

Like all other Protestant bodies, this one felt the influence of rationalism. A re-action against this tendency appeared, in Amsterdam and elsewhere, in 1791, and led ultimately to an open break between the great majority and those who insisted upon maintaining the Augsburg Confession, Liturgy, etc. The latter, being excluded from the "Brotherhood," formed what was called the "Old Lutheran Church," which obtained legal sanction in 1835, and again in 1866. Its concerns are directed by a General Ecclesiastical Assembly, which consists of seventeen persons, of whom nine are clergymen. Candidates for the ministry were formerly educated at different schools in Amsterdam, but, since 1877, in the university, where one of the Lutheran ministers teaches dogmatics. The Old Lutherans now number eight churches and eleven ministers against four churches and seven ministers in 1815.

In course of time the sharp differences between the two bodies gradually became modified; and in 1874 the barriers which hindered the call of a minister of one church to a vacant pulpit in the other were done away.

(d) The Baptists.—These are often called "Menonites," from the famous Menno Simons, who died in 1561. They were distinguished from other Protestants, not only by the rejection of infant baptism, but also by the lack of any central organization. Hence the stringent discipline introduced by Menno led to various divisions, known as "Waterlanders" and "Flandrians," from the districts in which they lived; but these were finally adjusted in 1650. Not long afterwards, doctrinal differences produced a new division, in which the orthodox took the name of "Zonists," and the liberals that of "Lamists;" both being derived from the armorial bearings of their respective localities. In 1801 both bodies were re-united, and the old party names passed out of use. The great peculiarity of the church is its confessional freedom. There is no common standard of doctrine. Whoever makes sincere confession of sin, and engages to lead a holy life, is admitted to membership, without regard to his views of the person and work of Christ. As a rule, only educated persons were from the beginning chosen to the ministry; but, in cases of necessity, men without any theological training were allowed, to serve, taking the name of liefliepreekers, or exhorters. This custom was gradually abandoned in later years, and now the instances of its occurrence are rare. In 1811 they all united in forming a general society for the encouragement of theological education and the maintenance of the ministry among the poorer congregations. At the same time they enlarged the support and the curriculum of the theological seminary which had been established at Amsterdam in 1731 by the Lamists. Their members are found chiefly in Friesland, North Holland, Gröningen, and Overijssel. In each province there are assemblies, usually called "rings," or circles. The local church is governed by the minister or ministers with the wardens, the latter being chosen by the male members, although in some cases the females have a vote. In few congregations there are also deaconesses. The seminary contains fifteen students, and its two active professors belong to the university of Amsterdam.

(c) The Remonstrants. — This body dates its existence and its name from the early portion of the seventeenth century, when a number of ministers of the Reformed Church, in a paper called a Remonstrance, demanded a revision of the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism. After long preparation, a national synod was called to consider the matter, which met in 1618, 1619, and was attended by delegates from various foreign churches. This body decided the points at issue by issuing the well-known canons of Dort, maintaining Calvinistic views. All ministers who did not accept these articles were deprived of their office, and, in case they refused to subscribe a promise of obedience to the ecclesiastical authorities, were banished. But after the death of Maurice, Prince of Orange, in 1625, they began gradually to return; and a few years later a decree authorized them to build churches and schools. A system of government and discipline sketched by Uitenbogaard was adopted, and in 1634 a theological seminary was established at Amsterdam. In their church order they stated that they steadfastly adhered to the Holy Scripture, and that they held fast to their confession (drawn up by Episcopius in 1621) not as a rule of faith, but as an explanation of their views. But in the course of time a great alteration ensued. In 1861 they described themselves as a community in which the gospel of Jesus Christ, according to the Scriptures, was confessed and proclaimed with all freedom and toleration; and in 1879 the revised regulations set forth the aim of the society to be, to further the Christian life on the basis of the gospel, while at the same time holding fast to freedom and toleration. The control of the body is vested in the Great Assembly, which meets yearly, and is composed of the professors, all the ministers, delegates from all the congregations, and some other persons. A permanent committee of five members cares for the execution of the assembly's resolutions, and supervises the administration. The body is declining. In 1809 they had thirty-four congregations, with forty preachers; but in 1881 only about twenty-three congregations, with twenty-three preachers. The largest society of Remonstrants is in Rotterdam, and numbers about six hundred members.

II. THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH. — At the commencement of the Reformation the greater part of what is now the Netherlands was attached to the bishopric of Utrecht, which in 1559 was made an archbishopric. But the Roman curia, supposing that the spread of the Reformation had put an end to episcopal government, after the death of the last archbishop (Fred. Schenk van Toutenburg) in 1580, administered ecclesiastical affairs by apostolic vicars, who, despite their episcopal character, were never deemed literal bishops of the province of Utrecht. After 1717 papal legates took the control. These were called "vice-superiors," were appointed with the co-operation of the chapter, and dwelt at Cologne or at Brussels. Afterwards other vicariates were constituted; but in 1840 these were reduced to three, so that from that time the direction of affairs was under a papal internuncius at The Hague, and apostolic vicars at Herzogenbush, Breda, and Limbursch. The fall of the State Church in 1796 led to new activity among the Roman Catholics; and the re-establishment of the hierarchy by Pio Nono in 1853 was followed by a great increase of priests. In 1784 there were 350 parishes with 400 priests; in 1815, 613 parishes with 979 priests; in 1877, 985 parishes with 2,093 priests, including those occupied in schools and in the administration.

In the reconstituted hierarchy the kingdom forms one province, which contains five dioceses; viz., the archbishopric of Utrecht with the suffragans of Haarlem, Herzogenbush, Breda, and Roermond. Each diocese has a chapter, consisting of a dean and eight canons, who are the bishop's council, and meet monthly. In case of a vacancy they name three persons, from whom the Pope selects the successor. Each diocese has a seminary for priests under the bishop, who names all the professors. The dioceses are divided into deaneries, the presiding officers of which are the connecting link between the bishop and the lower clergy. The temporal affairs of each parish are under the direction of a board named by the bishop. Notwithstanding the relative decline previously noticed, it is evident, that, under the new arrangement of affairs, there has been a considerable increase in the schools and charitable foundations, as well as in the social and political influence of the body.

The Old-Catholic Church. — This body owes its existence to the conviction that the canon law forbade the suspension of the hierarchy at the time of the Reformation; and therefore the apostolic vicars appointed after 1580 were legitimate archbishops of Utrecht, although the state of the times did not allow them to bear the title. The authority of these officers rests not upon their appointment by the Pope, but upon the choice of the chapter. It is well known what a ferment was produced in matters of doctrine, and Gallicanism in relation to the independence of national churches. When this agitation was at its height, the Pope cited to Rome the vicar Petrus (odde (who was suspected of Jansenism), and of his own motion appointed Theodor de Kock in his place. A great number of the clergy rose in opposition, and as many as three hundred priests ranged themselves on the side of Codde. But the new vicar introduced many new priests, and the opposing party began to weaken. At last the chapter chose another archbishop, Cornelius Steenoven, who was consecrated by Varlet, bishop of Babylon in partibus, and thus preserved the succession. Excommunication followed; but the province maintained its position, and to this day has filled each vacancy made by death with a new election. In 1742 a suffragan bishop for Haarlem was appointed, and 1757 one for Deventer. The Old-Catholic, or, as it is popularly called, Jansenist Church, acknowledges the authority of the general councils and of the Tridentine decrees, but rejects the Vatican Council, with the dogmas of the immaculate conception and the papal infallibility.

III. THE JEWS. — All that is certainly known of the condition of these prior to the sixteenth century is that there were found here and there some from Southern Europe who had become Christians to escape persecution, and others from Middle Europe who still held their old faith. But the number largely increased when the close of the eighty-years' war made the Netherlands a place of refuge for all victims of persecution. They were of two classes, — one called Portuguese, the other German, — whose mutual relations were not very friendly. The former, though fewer in number, were richer and more cultivated; the latter were, for the most part, poor and ignorant, and there was but little intercourse. But this soon changed; since the Germans steadily grew in property and culture, while the others stood still, if they did not retrograde. Some differences in ceremonial, and especially in the pronunciation of the Hebrew, have prevented a complete fusion of the two; although from 1811 to 1870 they were joined in a common organization, and a rabbinical vacancy in one division could be filled by a person called from the other. The increase of the numbers from 32,000 in 1815 to 68,000 in 1867 shows the effect of this reunion.

(a) German Jews. — These incorporated with themselves their brethren already domiciled in the Netherlands, and subsequently the refugees from Poland and Lithuania, and now form the "Netherlandish-Israelite Society." They began to enter the country about the year 1615; although they were neither so much esteemed, nor enjoyed so many privileges, as the Portuguese. The congregation at Maarssen is considered the oldest, but the date of its origin is unknown. The one organized at Amsterdam in 1636 soon became the central point of all the rest. Permission to build a public synagogue was refused in 1648; but after an influx of Polish refugees in 1654, and an immigration of three thousand Lithuanians in 1656, there came finally in 1671 the erection of the still existing Great Synagogue in Amsterdam, in which all parties gradually united to form one congregation. Political equality was not attained until 1796. The first decree respecting the conduct of their affairs was issued in 1808. This established one supreme consistory for the Hollandish-German Israelites. When the country became a French province in 1813, the Jews were made subordinate to the central consistory in Paris; but the next year King William I. appointed a "General Commission of Advice" for all the Jews in the kingdom. From 1862 a strenuous endeavor was made to attain a definite organization, which, however, did not succeed until 1870; since which time the direction of the Netherlandish-Israelite Society, which is no longer united with the Portuguese, is in the hands of a central board, which meets yearly, while a permanent committee of three, sitting in Amsterdam, attends to the current business of the society. The whole body consists of a hundred and seventy-three congregations, which are divided into various circles and branches. Each local society is autonomous; and its spiritual interests are controlled by rabbis, instructors, and teachers. These are trained in a seminary which was founded for this purpose at Amsterdam in 1741, and was reorganized in 1862.

(b) Portuguese. — In 1492 the Jews were banished from Spain, after they had become wealthy and refined. Many fled to Portugal, where they were again persecuted, especially after the introduction of the Inquisition, in 1532. When Brielle fell into the hands of the Prince of Orange (1572), many of the refugees from Portugal were attracted toward North Netherland, and, becoming esteemed for their activity and success in trade, found little difficulty in settling there. They increased in number in Amsterdam until 1597, when they secured their first synagogue, which was soon followed by many others. In The Hague, also, there was early formed a synagogue of rich and influential Israelites. In 1639 they established at Amsterdam a school, from which proceeded the rabbinical seminary of to-day. Since 1870 affairs are managed by a central board. The society at The Hague has one rabbin, while that at Amsterdam has a college of three associates. J. A. GERTH VAN WIJK, T. W. CHAMBERS.

HOLLAZ, David, a Lutheran theologian; b. at Wulkow, Pomerania, 1618; studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg; successively pastor in Pützelin, Stargard, Colberg, and Jakobshagen, where he died 1713. He is specially known by his work on systematic theology, Examen theologicum acro-maticum univrsam theologiam theticopolemicam complectens, 1707 (7th ed. by Teller, 1750). The great popularity of this work was not due to its originality of thought, but to the clearness and terseness of its definitions, and especially to the genial and irenic tone and the living scriptural character of its theology. He is the last of the strict Lutheran theologians, but in that period of transition took an intermediate position between Lutheran orthodoxy and pietism; the latter, though it is not mentioned by name, exerting a subtle influence upon his views. In his explanation of the so-called "theology of the unregenerate" he shows its influence; in the distinction between fundamentals and non-fundamentals, that of Calixtus.

HOLMES, Robert, D.D., b. in Hampshire, 1749; d. at Oxford, 1805. He was educated at Oxford, took holy orders; became Dean of Winchester 1804. His great service to biblical literature was Vetus Testamentum Græcum cum Variis Lectionibus, Oxford, 1798-27, 5 vols., edited after his death by Rev. J. Parsons, B.D. See the description in the Bibliographical Appendix to HORNE'S Introduction.

HOLSTE, or HOLSTENIUS, Lucas, b. in Hamburg, 1596; d. in Rome, Feb. 2, 1661; studied at Leyden; visited England; settled in Paris, 1624, as librarian to President de Mesmes; was converted to Romanism; accompanied Cardinal Barberini, in 1627, to Rome, where he was made librarian of the Vatican, member of the Congregation of the Index, etc. Most of his works were left unfinished; but his labors were, nevertheless, of great importance for the Liber pontificalis, Liber diurnus pontif. Rom., the martyrologies, etc. His collection of monastic rules (Codex Regularum) appeared first in Rome, 1661, afterwards, much enlarged, at Augsburg, 1759, 6 vols. folio. His letters were published by J. F. Boissonade, Paris, 1817.

HOLY FIRE, a ceremony symbolizing the resurrection of Christ, of very old date, and still observed in the Greek and Roman churches on Holy Saturday. On Good Friday all the lights and lamps of the church are extinguished, and the following day they are re-lit at a new fire kindled by sparks from a flint. In the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, where a Greek and an Armenian bishop officiate in unison on that day, the priests claim that the new fire is brought miraculously from heaven; and the fraud gives rise to much scandal. See SCHAFF: Through Bible-Lands, p. 241. The spiritual significance of the pretended miracle is, however, beautiful; for the holy fire, the symbol of the Spirit, proceeds from the sepulchre of Christ, and is carried by disciples to the ends of the earth.

HOLY LEAGUE. I. An alliance concluded between Philip II. of Spain, the Pope, the Guises, and the Parliament of Paris, in 1576, for the purpose of destroying the Reformation in France. II. The Holy League of Nuremberg, concluded between Charles V., the archbishops of Mayence and Salzburg, and the dukes of Bavaria, Saxony, and Brunswick, in 1538, for the purpose of counteracting the League of Smalcald.

HOLY SEPULCHRE, The. According to John (xix. 41) there was a garden close by the spot where our Lord was crucified; and in the garden was a new sepulchre, in which he was laid, because it was nigh at hand, and it was the Jews' preparation-day. Otherwise the locality of the tomb is not indicated in the Gospels; nor is Golgotha, the spot where the crucifixion took place, located with any more definiteness. From Matt. xxvii. 32, John xix. 17, and Mark xv. 29, and more especially from Heb. xiii. 12, it is apparent that it lay outside the city; and from Matt. xxvii. 39, and Mark xv. 29, it may be inferred that a public road ran by it: indeed, the Romans used to select such localities for places of execution in order to make the punishment more impressive to the people. But this is all. The name gives no certain clew. The Hebrew Golgotha has by some—Jerome in old times, Krafft and Hengstenberg in modern times—been translated the "Hill of Death," the name denoting a public place of execution; but both linguistic and archaeological reasons speak against this derivation. The evangelists translate the "place of a skull"

(John xix. 17; Matt. xxvii. 33; Mark xv. 22), or simply the "skull" (Luke xxiii. 33), probably referring to some topographical feature,—a rock protruding through the soil in the form of a skull, or bare as a skull. Whether Golgotha was a slight elevation, or a hill, or a mountain, they leave undecided, and so does Eusebius. The pilgrim of Bordeaux, however, and Rufinus, speak of Monticulus Golgotha, or Golgothana Rupes, whence the Mount Calvary of so frequent occurrence in the Roman-Catholic Church; that is, a hill with a chapel on its top, to which leads a pilgrim's path, with stations indicative of the various events of the passion.

In direct contradiction, as it would seem, to the above passages (Matt. xxvii. 32; John xix. 17; Mark xv. 20; and Heb. xiii. 12), the places which tradition points out for the crucifixion and sepulchre of our Lord lie a good distance within the wall of the present city. From the tower of David, at the Jaffa gate, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is descried, situated to the north-north-east, and rising on a hill between two minarets. But as early as in the eighth century, and again in the thirteenth, doubts were felt about the identity of the locality; and in the middle of the eighteenth century the tradition was formally rejected by Korte, Reise nach dem gelobten Lande, Altona, 1741, with three supplements, Halle, 1746. He was followed by Clarke (Travels in Palestine, London, 1811), Robinson (Biblical Researches, Boston, 1841, and Topography of Jerusalem, in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1846), Tobler (Golgotha, St. Gall, 1851), Wilson (The Lands of the Bible, London, 1847), and Schaff (Through Bible Lands, New York, 1879). The tradition has been defended by Chateaubriand (Itinéraire de Paris à Jerusalem, Paris, 1811), Scholz (Comm. de Golgothæ situ, Bonn, 1825), Williams (The Holy City, London, 1845; 2d ed., 1849), Schultz (Jerusalem, Berlin, 1845), Krafft (Die Topographie Jerusalems, Bonn, 1846), Lord Nugent (Lands Classical and Sacred, London, 1845), Tischendorf (Reise in den Orient, Leipzig, 1846), George Finlay (On the Site of the Holy Sepulchre, London, 1847), Schaffter (Die echte Lage des heiligen Grabes, Bern, 1849), De Vogué (Les Églises de la Terre-Sainte, Paris, 1860), Sepp (Jerusalem, 2d ed., 1873), Clermont-Ganneau (L'Authenticité du Saint-Sépulcre, Paris, 1877).

It would not be altogether impossible, however, to reconcile the Gospels and the tradition, as the site of the city-wall was so considerably altered by Hadrian that many places formerly outside of it came to lie inside of it, and vice versa. But new difficulties arise from the circumstance that the tradition gives no perfect certainty with respect to the identity of the localities it points out. Of course the first Christians knew the places where Christ was crucified and buried; but they evidently did not give much attention, or ascribe much value, to such externalities. Then, when the Jewish war broke out, towards the close of 67, the Christians left Jerusalem for Pella; and when they, later on, returned, the capture and destruction of the city must have wrought such changes as to make the identification of special localities of no strongly marked external distinction very difficult. Then, again, when Hadrian rebuilt the city on an entirely new plan, and with the avowed purpose of obliterating the distinctive character of the old city, new changes took place, which must have made the tradition less and less reliable. It has been argued that the unbroken list of bishops of Jerusalem which Eusebius gives from James, the brother of the Lord, to Macarius, is a guaranty of the continuity of the tradition living in the congregation; but Eusebius says himself (Hist. Eccl., 4, 5) that the list is not based on documents: he had it from hearsay. It has also been argued that the frequent pilgrimages to the holy places of Jerusalem, which, according to Cyril (Catech., 17, 16), were made from the time of the apostles, testify in favor of the tradition; but the earliest visitors to Jerusalem — Alexander of Flavius, in Cappadocia, and Origen — do not give the impression that at their time the holy places were specially frequented for the sake of devotion.

The first who thought of architecturally adorning the Holy Sepulchre was Constantine the Great. He erected a rotunda over the grave, and close by, on the spot of the crucifixion, a magnificent basilica, consecrated in 336. Those buildings stood till 614, when, during the invasion of Chosroes II., they were burnt down. Two years later on (616) the abbot Modestus, of the monastery of Theodosius, began the erection of new buildings. The Patriarch of Alexandria, Johannes Eleeman, supported the undertaking by sending a thousand workmen and a large sum of money to Jerusalem. In 626 the new buildings, consisting of three separate churches, were finished. Modesta's churches were burnt down by the Mohammedans in 936, and not restored until 1048, when the cathedral was built into which the crusaders, in 1099, made their entrance on bare feet, and singing hymns of praise. The buildings were then partly rebuilt, partly extended; and the structures thus reared stood, though often partially disturbed by the Mohammedans, till the great conflagration of 1808. In 1810 the erection of the present buildings was begun. The Greeks and the Armenians gave the money; Komnenos Kalfa, a Greek architect in Constantinople, the plan.

FR. W. SCHULTZ.

HOLY SPIRIT, the third person of the Trinity, is also known in Scripture as the Spirit (Matt. iv. 1), the Spirit of God (1 Sam. x. 10), the Spirit of Christ (1 Pet. i. 11), the Spirit of grace (Heb. x. 29), the Spirit of truth (John xvi. 13), the Paraclete, or Comforter (John xv. 26), etc. The trinitarian relation of the Spirit is discussed under TRINITY, and the Procession of the Spirit under FILIOQUE. Here we shall briefly consider the personality and work of the Spirit.

1. Personality. — Although there was some indistinctness in the teachings of Justin Martyr and others of the early fathers concerning the Spirit, his personality has been generally accepted, except amongst the Sabellians, Arians, and the Socinians. The Socinians represent the Spirit as an energy or power of God. The personality is proved by the following considerations. (1) The personal pronoun he is used of him, as in John xvi. 13: "When he (ἐκεῖνος) the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide," etc. (2) He is expressly distinguished from God (the Father). He is sent by the Father (John xiv. 26), and "searcheth the deep things of God" (1 Cor. ii. 10).

(3) Acts of will and intelligence are attributed to him, such as belong only to a personal agent, as guiding into all truth (John xvi. 13), testifying (John xv. 26), convincing (John xvi. 8), interceding (Rom. viii. 26), speaking (Acts xiii. 2), etc. (4) He is directly contrasted with Satan (Acts v. 3), and may be the object of blasphemy (Matt. xii. 31), falsehood (Acts v. 3), and grievance (Eph. iv. 30). (5) He occupies a position in the formula of baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19) and the apostolic benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14), at the side of the Father and the Son, and is distinguished from them. He is also distinguished from the Son as the "other (ἄλλος) Comforter" (John xiv. 16).

2. Office and Work. — The Apostles' Creed contented itself in the doctrine of the Holy Spirit with the article, "I believe in the Holy Ghost;" but the Creed of Constantinople (381) contains the fuller statement, "And [we believe] in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father, and with the Father and the Son is to be adored and glorified, who spake by the holy prophets." As of the Father and the Son, so of the Spirit, we cannot think of a time when he was not active. He appears as the executive of God at all times, but is brought forward prominently in the New Dispensation as the efficient agent in the renewal of the soul and its advancement in holiness. In the Old Testament he seems to have been active from the moment of creation, when the "Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" (Gen. i. 2), and God said that his "Spirit should not always strive with man" (Gen. vi. 3). He is said to have fallen upon God's agents (1 Sam. x. 10). He was the author of the light which the Old-Testament prophets had of Christ (1 Pet. i. 11), and of their inspiration (2 Pet. i. 21). In many of the cases in the Old Testament, it is doubtful whether a distinct person is meant by the designation "Spirit," or merely the power of God. But in the New Testament the uncertainty vanishes; and not only is his distinct personality made prominent, but a definite work assigned to him. He had a part in the life of Christ, was active in his generation (Luke i. 35), descended upon him at the baptism (Matt. iii. 16), and led him into the desert of temptation (Matt. iv. 1).

In his last discourses our Lord referred repeatedly to him, and made the promise that he should come upon the disciples (John xvi. 7; Acts i. 8, etc.). In these passages the Holy Spirit is declared to be the representative of Christ after his removal from the earth, and the dispenser of the benefits of Christ's life to the souls of believers. He was the "other Comforter" (Paraclete), who should take the place of Christ in leading the disciples into the way of all truth (John xiv. 16, xv. 26, xvi. 13). He is the permanent companion and guide of the Church, in contrast to the earthly Christ, who dwelt only temporarily on the earth (John xiv. 16). The Spirit is called the Spirit of Christ (Rom. viii. 9), because he holds the relation of a dispenser to the benefits of Christ's salvation. The Spirit, therefore, has a relation to Christ similar to that which the Son has to the Father. As the Son reveals the Father to the world (John

i. 18), so the Spirit reveals the grace and meritorious atonement and promises of Christ to the heart of the believer (John xvi. 15).

This special work in the history of redemption was inaugurated ten days after the Lord's ascension, on the Day of Pentecost, when the disciples were endued with power, and spoke in unknown tongues. As the historic birth-night of Christ was celebrated by attendant supernatural phenomena, such as the anthems of the angels, and the heavenly glory, so the historical birthday of the Holy Spirit in the Church was accompanied by strange external manifestations, — tongues like as of fire, and a sound from heaven as of the rushing of a mighty wind (Acts ii. 2, 3). Since that time he has been active in the Church, the source of all spiritual enlightenment, and without whose agency man neither knows Christ as his Saviour, nor can call him Lord (1 Cor. xii. 3). He is the originator of convictions of sin, that is, of the sinfulness of refusing to believe in Christ (John xvi. 9), and the author of regeneration (John iii. 5). He promotes the sanctification of the soul (1 Cor. vi. 11), and imparts to the Church his special gifts (1 Cor. xii. 4). The agency of the Spirit is, however, not completed with this activity, but extends to assuring the believer of his union with Christ, and participation in the promises of eternal life (Rom. viii. 16). All spiritual blessings, righteousness, peace, and joy, come to the believer by reason of his reception of the Holy Spirit (Rom. xiv. 17; Eph. ii. 18). For this reason the unbeliever is warned against rejecting the knowledge and convictions of the Spirit, which is called "grieving" (Eph. iv. 30), "quenching" (1 Thess. v. 19), and "doing despite unto" the Spirit (Heb. x. 29). All kinds and degrees of sin may be forgiven, except the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt. xii. 31, 32). This sin is absolutely unpardonable, because it is the final rejection of him without whom a saving knowledge of Christ and regeneration are impossible.

This dispensation has been called the dispensation of the Spirit. The designation is true so far as it brings out the promineny of the Spirit's agency, and differentiates his work, from the Day of Pentecost on, as of a kind which he did not perform under the old dispensation. But the Spirit's work is in no sense an atoning work, or a substitute for that of Christ. It is mediatorial between the Saviour and the saved, and makes concrete in the lives and experiences of individuals the salvation which was achieved through Bethlehem, Golgotha, and the open tomb. The manifestation of the Spirit on Pentecost was a manifestation of power (Acts i. 8), — the power of a new life and a spiritual energy, and continues to be so. The early apostles and Christians were full "of faith and the Holy Ghost" (Acts iv. 8, vi. 5), and in the power of this endowment spake in council-halls, wrote epistles, and suffered violent deaths, in hope and amidst rejoicing. There is nothing in the New Testament to indicate that this manifestation of power was to be confined to apostolic times, although it is not unreasonable to suppose that the methods of his manifestation may be different in kind at different epochs.

HOLY WATER, the use of, i.e., water blessed by a priest or bishop for religious purposes, is an old Oriental, more especially Jewish, custom, which was adopted by the Christian Church, and is still retained in the Greek and Roman Church. In the Greek Church pure water is used; in the Roman, a little salt is added, which by the Greek is considered a scandalous and dangerous novelty. In both churches the practice has given rise to much superstition.

HOLY WEEK (Hebdomas Magna, or Sancta or Nigra), the last week of Lent, commencing at midnight on Palm Sunday, and ending at cock-crow on Easter Day, including, besides Palm Sunday and Holy Saturday, Maunday Thursday, the anniversary of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and Good Friday, the anniversary of the Crucifixion. The earliest mention of the celebration of Holy Week, as generally prevailing throughout the Church, occurs in the Apostolical constitutions, and in the writings of Dionysius of Alexandria, from the middle of the third century. The whole week was kept as a strict fast; that is, the diet was restricted to bread, salt, vegetables, and water, and total abstinence was practised on Friday and Saturday, or at least on the last day. At the time of Theodosius, all private and public business was suspended, even the courts were closed. Prisoners for debt or minor misdemeanors were released, slaves were manumitted, etc. All work was, so far as possible, laid aside; and special opportunities of instruction in the elements of faith were offered. The history of the Passion was recited on successive days, beginning with the narrative of St. Matthew, on Palm Sunday, and ending with that of St. John, on Good Friday. In the Roman-Catholic Church, Holy Week is still celebrated by rigorous penitence (fast and almsgiving), by suspension of work in the family, by increased solemnity of the services (no instrumental music, veiling of the statues and pictures, etc.), and by special services (the consecration of the chrism, the blessing of the fire by which the paschal light is lighted, etc.). Several Protestant churches, such as the Church of England and the Lutheran churches in Scandinavia, also commemorate Holy Week. HOMER, William Bradford, b. in Boston, Jan. 31, 1817; d. at South Berwick, Me., March 7, 1841. His father was a merchant, distinguished for Christian philanthropy. His mother was a lineal descendant of William Bradford, a passenger in "The Mayflower," and the second governor of Plymouth Colony. At the age of five years, young Homer began to attend school; and, from that time until six months before his death, he was a constant attendant at schools of different gradations. In 1827 he became a member of the Mount Pleasant Classical Institution at Amherst, Mass. Here he remained three years. Under the instruction of Mr. Gregory Perdicari he acquired such familiarity with the modern Greek that he was able to speak as well as read it with facility. He passed the year 1831-32 as a member of Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass. He was the youngest member of his class, but was selected to deliver the valedictory addresses at his graduation. He was also, perhaps, the youngest member of his class at Amherst College; and, although his class was noted for scholarship and general excellence, yet at his graduation in 1836 he received the valedictory honors. At the age of nineteen he entered the Theological Seminary at Andover. Here he remained four years. Leaving the institution in 1840, he accepted a call from the Congregational Church in South Berwick, Me., to become its pastor. He was ordained Nov. 11, 1840. He won the esteem and affection of his people to an unusual degree. His love for the ministerial work was a passion; still he was intending, should Providence permit, to spend his life as a professor of the Greek language. Before his ordination he had written many articles for the press, and collected materials for three courses of lectures on the Iliad, Odyssey, and the Orations of Demosthenes. From his early childhood to the hour of his death he was noted for the purity of his character and for his enthusiasm in study. About four months after his ordination, he died, at the age of twenty-four years. An impressive sermon was preached at his funeral, by Professor B. B. Edwards of Andover Theological Seminary. Fourteen of Mr. Homer's sermons, and two of his literary addresses, were published in 1842, in a duodecimo volume of four hundred and twenty pages. To these sermons was prefixed a Memoir, containing one hundred and thirty-six pages, by E. A. Park, who edited the volume. A second edition of it was published in 1848. EDWARDS A. PARK.

HOMILETICS (from the German Point of view). I. NAME AND SCOPE. — The definition of homiletics depends, to some extent, upon the meaning of "homily." Homily (ὁμιλία, from ὁμοί, "together," and εἶλη, "company," 1 Cor. xv. 33; comp. Luke xxiv. 14, 15; Acts xx. 11; etc.) designated in the early Church the addresses at private gatherings for Christian worship, and especially the exhortation with which the leader followed the Scripture-reading (Justin, Ap. Maj., lxvii.). At a later period, when these addresses had taken on a more elaborate form, it was applied to public discourses addressed to believers, in distinction from the public proclamation of the gospel to the unconverted (κήρυγμα). The plain and homely structure of the homily distinguished it from the finished rhetorical productions of classical antiquity.

In the Western Church the terms "sermon" and "homily" were at first used interchangeably; but in time each came to designate a special kind of discourse. The sermon was a discourse developing a definite theme; as, for example, Augustine's discourse on the "Love of God and the Love of the World" (De amore Dei et amore sæculi). The homily pursued the analytical method, and expounded a paragraph or verse of Scripture; as, for example, Augustine's discourses with the heading De eo quod scriptum est. Abiding by this radical idea of the homily, we shall be forced to define homiletics as the science of preaching to believers. In this narrower sense the subject has been treated by Schleiermacher, Schweizer, Palmer, Harnack, Oosterzee, and others. For this reason some have treated evangelistics, or missionary preaching, as a separate department; while others, in order to avoid the separate discussion, have discarded the term "homiletics" altogether, and substituted in its stead, as more comprehensive, "keristics" (from κηρύσσει, "to preach," Acts viii. 5), or "halieutics" (from ἀλιεύω, "to fish," John xxi. 3). Both of these designations are objectionable, because they take into consideration mainly those unacquainted with the gospel.

The scope of the science of homiletics is found in the New-Testament idea of bearing witness for Christ (μαρτυρεῖν, Matt. xxiv. 14; Acts i. 8, 22; etc.). This expression includes both classes as the subjects of preaching, — believers and non-believers. Homiletics is, therefore, to be regarded as having a scope larger than the strict etymology and historical use of the term "homily" would warrant. It is the scientific treatment of preaching considered as a witnessing for Christ in public worship. This definition does not include missionary preaching; that is, preaching to those who have never heard the gospel. The use of the term "homiletics" dates from the latter half of the seventeenth century (BAIER, Comp. Theol. Homil., 1677; KROMHOLZ: Comp. Homil., 1699).

II. HOMILETICS AND RHETORIC. — The first Christian preachers did not trouble themselves about the rules of classical rhetoric, and cared little for the "enticing words of man's wisdom" (1 Cor. ii. 4, 5). But, as preaching became more studied and elaborate, the pulpit could not ignore the rules of Greek and Roman eloquence. The time came when the most prominent pulpit orators — like Basil, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, and Augustine — were those who had themselves been teachers of rhetoric. The result has been, that from that time to this, to a greater or less extent, sacred oratory has been regarded as a branch or species of general rhetoric. Erasmus, Melancthon, Herder, Theremin, Vinet, are among those who represent this view. Others, however, like the Pietists of the eighteenth century (Spener, etc.) and Stier, in this demand the absolute divorce of the pulpit from the rules of rhetoric, opposing all union with "the strange woman that speaks smooth words," and all accommodation to aesthetic prejudices. No such divorce can be admitted; and yet the higher sphere to which the pulpit belongs, and the nature of the topics discussed, make it necessary for homiletics to treat of the preparation and delivery of the sermon as subjects peculiar to itself. There is much that sacred and forensic eloquence have in common. A mind charged with the subject, dialectic training, lucid arrangement, fluency of utterance, keen psychological perception, lively imagination, — such qualities as these all constitute the spring from which both kinds of eloquence alike flow, as is proved from the lives of sacred orators from Basil and Chrysostom down to Krummacher and Spurgeon. Likewise, in the structure of the discourse, the same logical and aesthetic rules of grouping, the use of oratorical figures, etc., apply to both. But the features in which they differ are more numerous than those in which they agree. Sacred eloquence is distinguished by its subject-matter, its definite moral and religious purpose, and the means proper to be used to secure conviction. Forensic rhetoric seeks to secure objects confined to this life, whether personal or disinterested. The aim of preaching reaches out beyond the confines of this world, and concerns the soul's eternal blessedness and God's glory. Again: the sacred orator may never resort to artificial devices; nor may he place reliance, in his efforts to convince the soul, upon his manner, or diction, or argumentation. He must depend upon the vitalizing power of the truth (Isa. lv. 11; John vi. 63; Heb. iv. 12, etc.) and the direct influence of the Holy Spirit; for, as Luther says, "the speaker convinces no man to believe aright: it is the word of God itself that must lead him to accept the truth to be the word of God" (Op., xiii.). Rhetoric has, therefore, no place in preaching as an end in itself. It may only be used as a means for the effective presentation of the gospel which is laid upon the preacher. And all artistic structure of the sermon is to be discarded which prejudices the simplicity and power of the Word. In this connection it is well to remember that preachers, as they grow in experience of the truth, discard the rhetorical arts which they practised when they began to preach, and use a more direct and plain mode of utterance.

III. DESIGN OF PREACHING. — The most important designations in the New Testament for preaching determine its character as the joyous proclamation of salvation through Christ. In κηρύσσειν ("to preach," Matt. iv. 23, etc.) the emphasis is upon the novelty of the message; in εὐαγγελίζεσθαι ("to preach the gospel," Matt. xi. 5, etc.), upon its joyous contents; and in διδάσκειν ("to teach," Matt. xi. 1, etc.), the reference is to its lucid explanation. All these elements are combined in μαρτυρεῖν ("to bear witness," Acts i. 8, etc.), where the emphasis is upon the vouching for the truth on the ground of personal experience. The object of preaching, then, is none other than to direct the world to the way of blessedness, to call the unconverted to repentance, and to confirm believers in their faith. To secure this result, the most essential thing is the energizing power of the word of God itself. The next, but a less important, factor is the power of a personal witness filled with the Holy Ghost. The matter of preaching everywhere and at all times must be salvation through Christ. But, while this is true, the distinction must not be overlooked between the preaching addressed to believing congregations on the one hand, and apostolic and missionary preaching on the other. The apostles limited themselves to the demonstration that prophecy had been fulfilled in Christ. Missionary preaching is designed to convince and convert alone. Preaching addressed to congregations of believers, however, analyzes and explains passages of Scripture, and seeks in this way to edify and enlarge the experience of divine things. This is its main object. However, in the present mixed condition of our congregations, the preacher must combine with the edificatory element the effort to reach unbelievers.

There have been other theories of preaching. The rhetorical theory of Theremin and others transforms the preacher into an orator. The didactic theory (Nitzsch, etc.) lays an undue stress upon the preacher's relation as a public teacher, who instructs the intellect, but has nothing to do with the affections and wills, of his hearers. The evangelistic theory (Stier) treats all listeners, even believers, as sinners, and addresses its message to the natural man exclusively. Then there is the edification theory, which, making a sharp distinction between evangelistic preaching and preaching addressed to congregations in Christian communities, regards preaching as designed exclusively to edify. According to it, the sermon should be a finished production, presenting a delineation of Christian truth, but designed, in the first instance, neither to instruct nor to convert. All these theories are one-sided: neither of them presents more than one aspect of the ideal preacher. The design of preaching is at once evangelistic and edificatory, and becomes so by being didactic, and in some cases rhetorical. The most efficient preachers have always aimed to arouse as well as edify, and, never satisfied with merely presenting the truth, have sought to enforce it, that it might become a living, energizing force in the lives of their hearers. If Germany wishes to avert the catastrophe which befell the Anglican Church a hundred years ago, in the loss of so many of its members to the Methodists, it must hasten to realize this ideal of preaching. [Dr. Christlieb has here in mind the evangelistic efforts of the Methodists and of other foreign denominations in Germany.]

IV. HISTORY OF HOMILETICS. 1. The Fathers. — A few scattered directions for preaching are given by Origen, Cyprian, Lactantius, and Arnobius. Chrysostom and Augustine were the first to go elaborately into the subject. Both drew upon their own personal experiences as rhetoricians and preachers. In his work the Priesthood (De Sacerdotio, books iv., v.), Chrysostom defines as some of the personal qualifications of the preacher, eloquence, dialectic skill in the use of Scripture, readiness in the defence of the faith, diligence in preparation, and regard for the praise of God rather than man. For similar rules, see also Basil (Sermo Ascetica de Fide) and Gregory of Nazianzus (Carmen de Episcopis). Augustine, in his Christian Truth (De Doct. Christ., iv.), which might almost be called a treatise on homiletics, makes a sharp distinction between the design of preaching and the rhetoric of Rome and Greece. In the fourth book of this work he discusses the subject under two heads, — the matter of preaching, and the manner of its presentation. He does not deny that eloquence may be used to advantage, but insists that the preacher must derive his wisdom, and the very form of his utterance, from the Scriptures. He urges Cicero's threefold purpose of public speech, — to instruct (docere), to please (delectare), and to persuade (flectere), laying, however, special emphasis upon the last. He also urges the necessity of an accord between the preacher's life and words, of prayer as a preparation for the sermon, etc.

2. The Middle Ages magnified liturgical forms and ordinances as constituent parts of worship, to the prejudice of the sermon, which in time was almost entirely neglected. In the first half of this period there are three writers on the general subject. Rhabanus Maurus (De Clericorum Institutione) directs attention again to Augustine's rules. Guibert of Nogent (d. 1124; Liber quo ordine sermo fieri debeat) insists that no more should be put into a sermon than can be carried away in the memory; that the pulpit should practise the textual rather than the allegorical method of interpretation, and seek to lift men up to better lives, rather than indulge in the refinements of the theological discussion. The third, Alanus of Ryssel (twelfth century), wrote a work entitled Summa de Arte Prædicatoria. In the second half of this period we meet first with Bonaventura's work Ars Concionandi. He was followed by Humbert de Romanis (d. 1277; Tract. de Erudit. Concionatorum). But the period furnishes nothing of importance till near its close, when Reuchlin (Liber Congestorum de Arte Prædicandi, 1504) seeks to revive pulpit oratory, which had fallen into almost total neglect, by insisting upon the presentation of proper and practical subjects, and the rules of rhetoric.

3. The Period since the Reformation. — During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries homiletics was built up into a science, but placed in the closest relations to the rhetoric of antiquity. The revival of preaching by the Reformers led naturally to a fresh and more profound study of the nature and purpose of preaching. The systematic development of the science of homiletics followed. The Ecclesiastes, sive Concionator Evangelicus of Erasmus forms the link between the older treatises and Protestant homiletics. The keen satirist of the vain and vague platitudes of the preaching of his day (Laus Stultitiæ) here exalts the calling of the preacher above that of the priest and monk. In book i. he lays down the personal qualifications of the preacher, — knowledge of the Scriptures and the Fathers, faith, fluency of speech, etc. In book ii. he adduces illustrations from Pagan and Christian writers, bearing on pulpit oratory, and passes over in book iii. to apply the rules of dialectics and rhetoric to the structure of the sermon, concluding in book iv. by discussing the preacher's material. Melancthon, in his De Rhetorica (1519) and De Officiis Concionatoris (1535), follows Erasmus very closely in urging the rules of classic rhetoric. He exerted a profound influence upon the writers who followed him. The pulpit of the succeeding period, following his precepts rather than the example of Luther, pursued the synthetic method, preaching upon themes, in contrast to analyzing a text. The principal contributor, however, to the science of homiletics in the Reformation period, was Hyperius, professor at Marburg. His work De Formandis Concionibus Sacris (1553) distinguishes him above Erasmus, as the founder of the science of homiletics. He discusses more sharply and elaborately than had ever been done before the relation of homiletics to rhetoric, and adopts as applicable to the former only the second, third, and fourth of the five classic divisions (inventio, dispositio, elocutio, memoria, pronuntiatio). He distributes sermons under the six heads of doctrine, instruction, reproof, correction, consolation, and mixed, and treats of their division into exordium, statement of subject, proof, refutation of objections, and conclusion. Important as this work was, the writers who followed, such as Chytræus, M. Chemnitz (Methodus Concionandi, 1583), and others, almost without an exception, leaned upon Melancthon's De Rhetorica, and insisted upon the rules of rhetoric and a formal structure. In vain did Osiander (Ratio Concionandi, 1584) and Andreæ (Method. Concionandi, 1595) urge greater fidelity to Scripture, and more regard for the spiritual needs of the people, in the choice of subjects and mode of expression. The pulpit became in the seventeenth century an arena for theological disputation; and homiletics was shrivelled up into a mere discussion of the form and structure of the sermon, while the question of the subject matter was almost entirely overlooked.

A new period (1700-1830) opens in the eighteenth century, when, under the influence of the Pietistic movement, homiletics began to be emancipated from rhetoric and the tyranny of artificial refinements. This was, however, followed by a philosophical re-action. Spener introduced the revolt against the artificial method, and insisted that the pulpit should present the verities of faith, and present them in direct and simple statement. Other writers, like Rambach, in his Præcepta Homiletica, a work which deserves still to be used, follow Spener's leadership, and insist upon spiritual preparation for the sermon, prayer, the unction of the spirit, the simple delineation of the truth, etc. Contemporary authors in other lands — Gaussen, professor at Saumur (De Ratione Concionandi, 1678), Claude (Traité de la Composition d'un sermon, 1688), and Vitringa (Animadv. ad Method. homil. Eccles., 1712) — emphasized the personal qualifications of the preacher, the independence of sacred rhetoric, and the analytic over against the synthetic method. But, by the middle of the eighteenth century, philosophy arose in revolt against the exclusive treatment of such themes as regeneration and repentance, and asserted a place for itself in the pulpit. Mosheim's work, Anweis., erbaulich zu predigen (1763), marks the transition. He shows the influence of English and French infidelity by insisting upon the use in the pulpit of the historical evidences for Christianity. Preaching was from this on to be addressed more particularly to the understanding; and even the spiritually minded Fénelon, in his Dialogues sur l'Eloquence (1718), defines the most essential quality of a sermon to be that it should "give instruction" (d'être instructif). The new philosophizing method excluded more and more biblical matter from sermons. The pulpit ceased its efforts to convert: it sought alone to instruct. It resorted no longer to Scripture for proofs: it found them in "rational ideas." The things of eternity gave way to the things of time. Spalding (Die Nützbarkeit d. Predigants, 1772) and other writers excluded from preaching all that did not contribute to immediate well being in this world; and Marezoll (Bestimmung d. Kanzelredners, 1793) lays down the proposition that the pulpit should discuss, not what Christ once taught, but what he would teach if he were now on earth. The protests of believing theologians like Bengel and Oetinger against this intellectual assumption found only a small audience. At the close of the century the Kantian philosophy re-deemed the pulpit from the bald utilitarianism into which it was fast sinking. Schulderoff (Kritik d. Homiletik, 1797) again demanded for the sermon the character of a discourse on religion, but not necessarily on the Christian religion. A new tendency appeared early in this century, and the old question of the relation of preaching to rhetoric again came into the foreground. Among the many treatises, those of Theremin (D. Beredtsamkeit, eine Tugend, 1814) and Schott (Theorie d. Beredtsamkeit, etc., 1828-32) are the most important. But all agreed in making preaching a branch of general rhetoric. The very term "homiletics" was in danger of being discarded for "pulpit eloquence." With Schleiermacher and Claus Harms a new period begins, which is marked by the treatment of homiletics as a department of practical theology. Marheinecke's work on homiletics (1811) contends for the introduction of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity into the pulpit, and, with Schleiermacher, insists upon edification as the aim of preaching. Claus Harms followed with his essay on Speaking with Tongues, which fell like a bombshell under the lamps of those students who were seeking to copy after strictly logical and rhetorical models. With great freshness and originality he declared war against the artificial pulpit productions of the schools. Stier, in his Keryktik (1830), and to some extent Sichel (Italicistik, 1829), insist upon the biblical character of preaching. The most important works since then are PALMER: Homiletik, 1842, 5th ed., 1867; G. BAUR: Grundzüge d. Homiletik, 1848; GAUPP: Homiletik, 1852; HARNACK: Prakt. Theol., 1878. HOMILETICS (from the Anglo-American point of view) may be defined as the application of the general principles of rhetoric to the specific department of preaching. It is the science which treats of the analysis, classification, preparation, composition, and delivery of sermons, viewed as addressed to the popular mind, on subjects suggested by the word of God, and designed for the conversion of sinners and the edification of believers. Hence it has been sometimes styled "sacred rhetoric;" and it bears to rhetoric in general the same relation which rhetoric itself, according to Whateley, bears to logic. One must approach it, therefore, through both of these other sciences, and carry with him all which they have taught him; so that he may apply it all, and utilize it all, in the particular work of preaching. It gives directions for the choice of subjects, and the relation of these to texts of Scripture, as the passages by which they are suggested, or in which they are implied. It analyzes the sermon founded on such a text into its different parts, — of introduction, proposition, argument, division, and application or conclusion, — and lays down rules regarding each of these, so that they may be natural, simple, proportionate, and effective. In particular it insists that the discourse should be a unit, aiming at one result, and rising by climactic stages toward its attainment. It classifies sermons under different heads, as expository, hortatory, doctrinal, practical, and occasional; though it ought not to be forgotten that the ideal discourse should be all of these in one, as founded on biblical exposition, illustrative of scriptural doctrine, and devoted to the enforcement of some practical duty, which needs at the time to be insisted upon. It has much to say also on the formation of a pulpit style which should be characterized by clearness, purity, precision, and energy; and it gives important counsels as to the choice of arguments and the use of illustrations. It has to do, besides, with the delivery of sermons, and brings the rules of elocution to bear upon the work of the pulpit, so that the words of the preacher may not be marred, but rather made more effective, by the manner of their utterance. In all these departments it seeks to illustrate the value of its rules from the history of preaching in ancient, mediæval, and modern times, and to discuss the questions regarding them on which different views have been maintained. Thus, for example, in almost every treatise on homiletics, one expects to find an examination of such inquiries as these, — whether the division of a subject should be announced beforehand; whether the proposition mainly enforced should be formulated at the beginning, or at the end, of the discourse; whether a sermon should be read from manuscript, or delivered memoriter, or preached extemporaneously, etc. On these and kindred questions, the opinions maintained depend on the predilections or practices of the authors; and the fact that such differences exist may be taken as a proof that a definite course regarding them is not essential to homiletic efficiency; and every preacher may be left to do regarding them that which he has found he can do most successfully.

As a science, there can be no doubt whatever of its helpfulness to those who are engaged in the work of the ministry; but, unless two or three cautions are observed, it is exceedingly apt to become a hindrance, rather than an assistance.

1. It should be so thoroughly mastered before entering upon the practical work of the pulpit, that its rules shall be unconsciously observed. Whatever takes the attention of the preacher away from the main purpose of his sermon to some technical detail does thereby inevitably mar the sermon itself. Hence all such things as style and structure must be acquired so thoroughly, that no attention is abstracted by them from the thought. In like manner, every thing that in the pulpit draws the mind of the preacher away from that which he is saying, and the object which he has in view in saying it, to the manner in which he says it, takes just so much away from the force of his utterance. It does not follow, however, that no attention should be given at any time by him to these things. On the contrary, the correct inference is, that he should have so mastered them, that he can use them without thinking of them, just as one has so mastered spelling, that he is not conscious of any such act when he is writing. The moment one hesitates in spelling, and becomes conscious that he has to spell, he is very apt to make a mistake; and that simple illustration may help to show the importance of the caution which we are now giving. Rules are valuable; but their highest value is when we have ceased to be conscious that they are rules, and act upon them spontaneously. To do that, however, we must give early attention to them, and master them fully, before we need to practise them in public. The place of homiletics in learning to preach is thus analogous to that of spelling in learning to write. It should come at the very beginning, and it should be mastered so completely, that we act upon its maxims without thinking of them.

2. The preacher must never let himself be tempted to make the sermon an end in itself. It must be confessed, that, after one has studied the rules of homiletics, he is strongly tempted to think that his work is to consist in making good sermons that shall stand the test of the strictest homiletic scrutiny. But the object of the preacher is to convert sinners, to edify believers, and in general to help his fellow-men to live lives of faith and joy in Christ. The sermon ought to be designed for that. By all means let it be according to rule; but let the observance of the rules be made subservient, and kept subservient, to the main purpose. The surgeon seeks to save the patient; and, if he put the brilliancy of the operation above that, he is no true surgeon. In like manner, the preacher's great design ought to be to help men unto Christ and up to Christ; and, if he degenerate into the sermon-maker or the pulpiteer, he has lost the true ideal of his office. Whenever the producing of great sermons becomes an aim in and of itself, the production may be what many people will congratulate the preacher for making, — a splendid effort; but it is not a sermon in the right use of the word, inasmuch as that seeks something else than the admiration of the hearers, even their salvation and edification. Every student of homiletics, therefore, must be on his guard against allowing himself to think of the sermon as an end in itself.

3. The observance of rules will not of itself make an effective sermon. One man may keep every regulation laid down regarding the preparation and delivery of a discourse, and yet be only "faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null." Another may break many of the rules, and yet be most successful in converting, strengthening, and stimulating his hearers. The man is greater than the sermon; and the touch of his individuality thrills his hearers, though his division should be faulty, and his style uncouth. Even the heathen orator said that one must be a good man to be really eloquent; and so the personality of the preacher has more to do with his efficiency in the pulpit than the perfection of his sermon. He must be seen to be sincere. He must have "the accent of conviction." He must be earnest, — not with the earnestness of rant or roaring, but with that of fervid incandescence. He must know the hearts of other men through his acquaintance with his own. He must be familiar with their "businesses," as well as with their "bosoms," and preach to them, not because the Sabbath comes round, and he must say something to them, but because he has something which he must say to them at that particular time, and which mightily concerns their welfare. It is this "I cannot but" speak in the preacher himself which is the secret, next to the agency of the Holy Ghost, of pulpit-power; and no homiletic rules, however faithfully observed, will compensate for its absence. But if that be in him, and he has mastered the rules of this science so that he can obey them automatically, he will be the ideal preacher, and men will gladly listen to his words.

LIT. — In recent years there has been increased attention given to homiletics, owing to the formation of such lectureships as the "Lyman Beecher" course at Yale; and many valuable works have appeared upon the subject. In addition to those named by Dr. Christlieb, the following works are all of value, and deserve mention. WILLIAM G. BLAIKIE: For the Work of the Ministry, London, 1873; WILLIAM S. PLUMER: Hints and Helps in Pastoral Theology, New York, 1874; PATRICK FAIRBAIRN: Pastoral Theology, Edinburgh, 1875; WILLIAM ARTHUR: The Tongue of Fire, New York, 1880; JOHN A. HOMILIARIUM denoted, from the beginning of the middle ages, collections of homiliae and sermones for the whole ecclesiastical year, from the works of the fathers, made by private persons for reading in the church on Sundays and holidays, or introduced by official authority among the clergy as models of the art of preaching. Such collections existed before the time of Charlemagne, both in the Gallican and in the Anglo-Saxon Church; but the most celebrated and the most widely used collection of the kind was the homiliarium of Charlemagne. The unsuitableness of many of the selections from the fathers, and, still more, the frequent mistakes and corruptions which occurred in the common collection, caused Charlemagne to charge Paulus Diaconus with the composition of a new homiliarium, under the superintendence of Alcuin. Between 776 and 781 the work was finished. Manuscript copies of it are found in the libraries of Heidelberg, Darmstadt, Frankfurt, Giessen, Cassel, Fulda, etc. The first printed edition, without title, date, or place, was probably made at Cologne, 1470. A comparison between the various editions shows that the contents of the book increased with the increasing number of festivals and saints' days. New sermons by later teachers — Alcuin, Haimo, Andbertus, Hericus, Bernard, and others — were added. The bulk, however, of the contents, as well as the original plan of the arrangement, was retained. On the development of the art of preaching, and on the final establishment of the system of pericopes, this collection has exercised a great influence; and it was, no doubt, instrumental in carrying the Roman system of pericopes into the evangelical churches. The Book of Homilies of the Church of England is the nearest approach in the Protestant Church to the homiliarium. CHRISTLIEB.

HOMILY. See HOMILETICS.

HOMOLOGOU MENA (generally accepted) and ANTILEGOMENA (disputed) are the two terms which Eusebius applies to the authorship of the books of the New Testament, placing the four Gospels, the Acts, the fourteen Epistles of Paul, the first Epistle of Peter, and the first Epistle of John, under the former, and the Epistle of James, the second Epistle of Peter, the second and third Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude, under the latter. The Apocalypse he gives a place by itself, though, according to his own definition, it belonged to the Antilegomena. See CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

HOMIOUSIAN (of similar substance) and HOMOUSIAN (of the same substance) are the two terms on which the whole Arian controversy turned; the former representing the semi-Arian view; the latter, the orthodox. The term of Arius was heteroousian ("of different substance"). See ARIANISM.

HONE, William, b. at Bath, June 3, 1780; d. at Tottenham, Nov. 8, 1842; was a bookseller and miscellaneous writer in London, and is mentioned here for his Apocryphal New Testament (1820) and Ancient Mysteries (1823). These works were suggested in the course of his researches for his own successful defence against a charge of libel, Dec. 18–20, 1817. In the latter part of his life he frequently preached in Weigh-House Chapel, Eastcheap, London.

HONORIUS, Roman emperor from 395 to 423; was only ten years old, when, under the tutorship of Stilicho, he succeeded his father, Theodosius I., in the Western Empire, while his brother Arcadius inherited the Eastern. Honorius was a weak character. He made the laws of Theodosius against Paganism still harder. In 399 he ordered all Pagan temples to be destroyed at once; but he was unable to enforce such a law. In North Africa, where, in many places, the Pagans outnumbered the Christians, the Christians were made to suffer for the laws against Paganism. In 409 the emperor suddenly changed his mind, and a decree placed the Pagans on an equal footing with the Christians; but in 416 they were again excluded from all offices in the army and in the administration. Somewhat more consistent he showed himself in his relations with the Donatists, whom he pursued with steadily increasing severity. But he never succeeded in suppressing the heresy: he only drove the heretics into the wildest fanaticism. See DONATISTS.

HONORIUS is the name of four popes and an antipope. — Honorius I. (625–638) sided, in the monothelitic controversy, with the emperor and the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, that is, with the Monothelites, and set forth his views in two letters, still extant, to the Patriarch of Constantinople. In consequence he was anathematized by the sixth œcumenical council (Constantinople, 680), together with the other leaders of the Monothelites; and the verdict, which was given with the assent of the papal legates, was confirmed by his successor, Leo II. This grim fact, that the papal infallibility has once been in the possession of a heretic, was in the middle ages generally passed over in silence by Roman writers; and when, afterwards, Rome was reminded of it by the Greek Church, the most audacious shifts were attempted to deny it, or to cover it out of sight. Baronius and Gretser declared that the acts of the council were false; Bellarmin and Assemani, that the verdict was a mistake by the council; Garnier and Pagi, that the condemnation touched only the policy of the Pope, not the doctrine. When, in 1870, the papal infallibility was established as a dogma of the Church, the literature on the question swelled into a library. See HEFELE: Causa Honorii Pape, Naples, 1870; MARGERIE: Le pape Honor., Paris, 1870; J. PENNACHI: De Honorii I. causa, Rome, 1870; RUCKGABER: Die Irrlehre d. II., Stuttgart, 1871; [E. F. WILLIS: Pope Honorius and the New Roman Dogma, London, 1879]. — Honorius II. (Cadalus, antipope 1061–64) was Bishop of Parma when Nicholas II. died, and was elected Pope by the Lombard bishops (Basel, 1061), under the influence of the Empress Agnes, in opposition to Alexander II. The German bishops, however, sided, not with the empress and her candidate, but with Hildebrand and Alexander II.; and May 31, 1064, a council was convened at Milan to decide upon the double election. Alexander II. appeared before the council, but not Honorius II., who was formally deposed. He did not give up, however, his claim upon the papal crown, though it was recognized only by the Lombard bishops. He died 1073. See WATTERICH: Pontif. Rom. Vita, T. I. — Honorius II. (Dec. 16, 1124–Feb. 14, 1130) concluded, while still Cardinal-Bishop Lambert of Ostia, the concordat of Worms with Henry V., and was raised to the papal throne chiefly by the influence of the Frangipani, on account of his peaceable character. He failed in his policy towards Duke Roger of Sicily, to whom he was compelled to give Apulia as a fief. See JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 549; WATTERICH: Pont. Rom. Vita, T. II. p. 157. — Honorius III. (July 18, 1216–March 18, 1227) confirmed the order of the Dominicans in 1216, and that of the Franciscans in 1223, and crowned Pierre de Courtenay emperor of Constantinople, and Friedrich II. emperor of Rome. In his relations with the latter he was very yielding and obliging, while he showed himself extraordinarily hard against Count Raymond of Toulouse. His Opera omnia are found in HOROY: Med. Æv. Bib. Patr. (Paris, 1879, T. I.), and his letters in BOUGNET, Recueil des Historiens de Gaules et de la France, XIX. p. 610. See the works on Friedrich II. by KESTNER (Göttingen, 1873) and O. LORENZ (Berlin, 1876). — Honorius IV. (April 2, 1285–April 3, 1287) showed himself, in spite of his age and bodily debility, very energetic, both in internal administration and in foreign policy. See MURATORI: Rev. Ital. Script., III. p. 6115.

HONTER, Johann, b. at Cronstadt, Transylvania, 1498; d. there Jan. 23, 1549; studied at Vienna; was a teacher at Cracow and Basel, and returned to his native city in 1533, bringing with him the Renaissance and the Reformation. From the printing-press which he established in his house, he issued a number of books of education, and was instrumental in the foundation of the gymnasium of Cronstadt. But of still greater importance were his Formula reformationis ecclesie Coronensis (1542), and his Apologia reformationis, (1543). In 1544 he became the minister of an evangelical congregation in Cronstadt. See G. D. TEUTSCH: Ueber Honterus und Kronstadt zu seiner Zeit, Hermannstadt, 1876.

HONTHEIM, Johann Nicolaus von, b. at Treves, Jan. 27, 1701; d. there Sept. 2, 1790; studied history and canon law in his native city, at Louvain, and Leyden; visited Rome 1726; entered the service of the Church, and was appointed suffragan bishop of Treves in 1748. He wrote Historia Trevirensis (Augsburg, 1750, 3 vols. fol.) and Prodomus Historie Trevirensis (Augsburg, 1737, 2 vols. fol.), — two works of unquestionable merit. But his most remarkable literary performance was his De statu Ecclesie et legitima potestate Romani Pontificis (Frankfort, 1763), — a bold and almost unanswerable criticism on the Roman curia, and the position which it has usurped in the Christian Church. The book ran through many editions, and made a tremendous sensation. As it was published under the pseudonyme Justinus Febronius, Febronianism became the name of the views which it sustained. It was, of course, immediately put on the Index; and, when the real author was discovered, persecutions began which finally compelled him to recant. Hontheim's correspondence with the elector Clemens Wenzeslaus of Treves was published at Francfort, 1813. See MÜLLER-MASSIS: Disquisit. de J. N. H., Treves, 1863.

HOOCHT, Eberhard van der, Reformed minister in Nieuwendam, Holland; d. 1716; is celebrated as the editor of a widely used edition of the Hebrew Bible, which first appeared in Amsterdam and Utrecht (1705), and has been reprinted very frequently; e.g., by Tauchnitz, Leipzig, since 1835. He wrote several books on Hebrew and Greek studies.

HOOCHSTRATEN, Jacob van, b. at Hoogstraten, near Antwerp, 1454; d. at Cologne, Jan. 21, 1527; studied at Louvain; entered the Dominican order; was made prior of the Dominican convent of Cologne, and inquisitor of the provinces of Mayence, Treves, and Cologne, and became noted by his attacks on Erasmus, Reuchlin, and Luther. He was a full-blooded specimen of the monkish obscurantism and fanaticism of his time. When he lost his case against Reuchlin, the Pope himself could not compel him to keep silent. His works appeared at Cologne, 1526. See REUCHLIN.

HOOK, Walter Farquhar, D.D., F.R.S., b. in London, March 13, 1798; d. at Chichester, Wednesday, Oct. 20, 1875. He was educated at Oxford; took holy orders; was vicar of Leeds from 1837 to 1859, when he was appointed dean of Chichester. He was a sober High-Churchman. His long service in Leeds was singularly successful; for he was instrumental in erecting twenty-one churches, thirty-two parsonages, sixty schools, besides rebuilding the parish church at a cost of twenty-eight thousand pounds. In the midst of engrossing labors he found time to prepare a number of volumes, of which may be mentioned A Church Dictionary (8th ed., 1859), An Ecclesiastical Biography (1845–52, 8 vols.), Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury (1860–76, 12 vols.).

HOOKER, Richard, an eminent divine of the Church of England, and its most distinguished writer on ecclesiastical polity; b. near Exeter, about 1553; d. at Bishopsborne, Nov. 2, 1600. He was the son of poor parents, was educated by an uncle, and while at Oxford received aid from Bishop Jewel. An interesting incident in his life is his last meeting with the bishop. The latter lent Hooker his horse to carry him to Exeter, and gave him money for the journey. He acted as tutor at his university, in 1579 was appointed to deliver the Hebrew lecture, and in 1581 took orders. In his marriage, which occurred about this time, he was unfortunate. With characteristic lack of worldly wisdom, he confided to a Mrs. Churchman of London the care, which she had solicited, of selecting for him a wife. "Fearing no guile," says Walton, "Hooker did give her such a power as Eleazer was trusted with (you may read it in the Book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac," etc. We may not blame Mrs. Churchman for hitting upon her daughter Joan; but we shall pity Hooker none the less for that. He was appointed to the living of Drayton Beauchamp, in the diocese of Lincoln, 1584, and the following year, at the recommendation of Archbishop Sandys, to whose son Hooker had acted as tutor at Oxford, master of the Temple, London. He shared the pulpit with Travers, a Genevan divine. Of the preaching of the two, Fuller says, "The congregation at the Temple ebbed in the forenoon [when Hooker preached], and flowed in the afternoon." He, however, suggests that Mr. Hooker "was too wise to take exception at such trifles." In 1591 Hooker went to Boscombe, and was made a minor prebend of Salisbury, and in 1595 was transferred to Bishopsborne, three miles from Canterbury, where he died.

Hooker was rather a tedious preacher, having an embarrassed manner, and his sentences being too prolix, and sometimes involved, for the pulpit. Yet Fuller quaintly says, "He may be said to have made good music with his fiddle and stick alone, without any rosin, having neither pronunciation nor gesture to grace his matter."

Hooker's great reputation rests upon his Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. It consists of eight books, four of which were written in Boscombe, and published 1594, and the fifth in 1597. The last three books have an interesting history, which is given in full by Keble (pp. xii-xxv). Hooker's widow was accused of having burned the manuscript; but, whether justly or not, it was irrecoverably gone (Keble). The rough draughts, however, were preserved. The sixth and eighth were published in 1648, and the seventh in 1662. Of these the sixth is, according to Keble, probably not genuine. The other two contain the substance of what Hooker wrote. The immediate occasion of the Ecclesiastical Polity seems to have been an attack of Travers upon Hooker for extending salvation to Roman Catholics, and his lack of sympathy with Calvinism. With Jewel's Apology it is the most important original contribution to English ecclesiastical literature of the sixteenth century, and the first great ecclesiastical work written in English. Its style has been highly praised; and Green (History English People, iii. 30) speaks of "its grandeur and stateliness, which raised its author to the highest rank among English prose-writers." Written in a temperate spirit, and with vigor of thought, it is free from the multitudinous and often unsifted quotations which deface the pages of the theological works of the period; e.g., Jewel's Apology.

The contents are rather more philosophical than theological, and the work more valuable for its broad and fundamental principles than for exactness of definition, or clearness of argument. It is in effect an answer to Puritanism, which had been bitterly attacking the episcopal system through a generation. Conceived in an admirable temper, and free from the heat and vituperation which characterized the controversial writings of the period, it makes no attempt to discredit the Presbyterian system. Its object is to assert the right of a broad liberty on the basis of Scripture and reason. He expressly denies that the practice of the apostles is a rule to be invariably followed, but that a change of circumstances warrants a departure from the governmental policy and discipline of the early church. He seeks to prove that things not commanded in Scripture may still be lawful, and he does it by appealing to the practice of the Puritans themselves (as in the case of the wafer which they used in common with the Roman Catholics, etc.). The assertion of this fundamental prerogative of reason is one of the most valuable contributions of the work. Hooker has been claimed as a champion of the High-Anglican doctrine of episcopacy, and, hardly less confidently, by the other side as the advocate of the view that church government is a matter of expediency. Isolated expressions can be found in favor of both, as even Keble qualifiedly admits (p. xxxviii). But neither view is true. Hooker holds a position intermediate between the school of the English Reformers, Archbishop Grindal (d. 1583) and most of Elizabeth's bishops, and the school which grew up in the contest with Puritanism, and had its extreme representative in Archbishop Laud (1633-45). Had he been more exact in his definitions, it might be possible to place him more confidently on the one side or on the other. As it is, he stands as the representative of toleration in the sphere of ecclesiastical polity and the advocate of the claims of reason against that narrow scripturalism which assumes to tolerate nothing which the Scriptures do not expressly command.

Besides the Ecclesiastical Polity, we are in possession of several of Hooker's Sermons. The first complete edition of his Works was by GAUDEN, London, 1662; the best is by KEBLE, Oxford, 1836, 4 vols., and often since. It contains an Introduction and valuable Notes by the editor, and the genial Life of Hooker by IZAAK WALTON, which first appeared in 1665 to correct the errors in GAUDEN's Life (1662). D. S. SCHAFF.

HOOPER, John, bishop and martyr, b. in Somersetshire, 1495; d. at the stake Feb. 9, 1555, in Gloucester. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, and entered the Cistercian order. A diligent study of the Scriptures and the works of Zwingli and Bullinger on the Pauline Epistles, convinced him of the errors of the Papal Church, and made him an ardent advocate of the Reformation. When, in 1539, the VI. or (so called) Bloody Articles were enforced, he retired to the Continent, meeting at Strassburg the lady he subsequently married. Returning to England to secure funds from his father, he went back again in 1547 to the Continent, tarrying at Zurich, where he was received by Bullinger, and carried on a correspondence with Bucer, concerning the sacraments.

In 1549 Hooper returned to England, and immediately threw himself into an arduous activity, preaching at least once every day, and with great power. Foxe says of him, "In his sermons he corrected sin, and sharply inveighed against the iniquity of the world and the corrupt abuses of the church. The people in great flocks and companies came daily to hear him, insomuch that the church would oftentimes be so full, that none could enter further than the doors. In his doctrine he was earnest, in tongue eloquent, in Scripture perfect, in pains indefatigable." In 1550 he preached before the king once every week during Lent, and soon after was nominated to the see of Gloucester. But unexpected impediments interfered with his acceptance. Hooper had fully imbibed the spirit of the Continental Reformation, so that Canon Perry feels justified in calling him the "first Puritan confessor" (History of the Church of England, ii. 205). He had a strong aversion to clerical vestments, which he described as Aaronical and superstitious, and absolutely refused to take the oath of consecration, in which the candidate had to swear by the saints. The king removed the latter obstacle by erasing with his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Cranmer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper was so denunciatory from the pulpit against those who used vestments, that he was sent to the Fleet. Bucer and Peter Martyr were both appealed to on the subject by both parties. They recommended Hooper to submit. Following their advice, he was consecrated March 8, 1551. It was prescribed that he should wear the vestments on public occasions, but at other times might use his own discretion.

In the administration of his episcopal office, Hooper was so indefatigable in preaching and visitation as to call forth the friendly council of Bullinger and other friends to practise a prudent moderation. Foxe calls him "a spectacle (patern) to all bishops." In 1552 he was appointed Bishop of Worcester in commendam.

Hooper and Rogers were the first to be cited under Mary. On Aug. 29, 1553, the former was thrown into prison, where he received harsh treatment, and contracted sciatica. In January, 1555, he was condemned on three charges, — for maintaining the lawfulness of clerical marriage, for defending divorce, and for denying transubstantiation. He called the mass "the iniquity of the Devil." He was sentenced to die at the stake in Gloucester, whither he was conveyed. He met his death firmly and cheerfully. To a friend bewailing his lot, the martyr replied in the oft-quoted words, "Death is bitter, and life is sweet, but alas! consider that death to come is more bitter, and life to come is more sweet." In another conversation, he said, "I am well, thank God; and death to me for Christ's sake is welcome." His martyrdom was witnessed by a large throng of people. The martyr was forbidden to address the crowd. A real or pretended pardon being promised if he would recant, he spurned it away, saying, "If you love my soul, away with it." His agony was greatly prolonged and increased by the slow progress of the fire on account of the green fagots, which had to be rekindled three times before they did their work.

LIT. — Hooper's works have been edited by the Parker Society (with a biography) in two volumes, Cambridge, 1843-52, and by the Religious Tract Society in one volume. The more important are A Brief and Clear Confession of the Christian Faith: A Declaration of Christ and his Office; A Declaration of the Ten Commandments. Seven Sermons on Jonah; and An Answer to Bishop Gardiner, being a Detection of the Devil's Sophistry wherewith he robeth the unlearned people of the true belief in the most blessed Sacrament of the Altar. FOXE, in the Book of Martyrs, gives a minute and impressive account of Hooper's life, and dwells at length upon his martyrdom.

HOORNBECK, Johannes, b. at Harlem, 1617; d. at Leyden, 1666; was appointed minister at Utrecht 1644. and professor of theology at Leyden 1654, and wrote Socianismus confutatus (1650), Examen bulle papalis, etc. (1652), Epistola de Independentismo (1659), etc.

HÔPITAL (Hospital), Michel de L', b. at Aigueperse, in Auvergne, 1505; d. on his estate of Vignay, near Étampes, March 13, 1573; studied law at Padua, and was successively auditor of the Rota, French plenipotentiary at the Council of Bologna, chancellor to the Duchess of Berry, and finally Chancellor of France (1560-70), in which position he exercised a great and beneficial influence. Although he remained a member of the Roman Church, his great aim was to find a modus vivendi at once acceptable to the Romanists and the Reformed; and in the pursuit of this aim he arranged the conferences of Poissy (1561) and St. Germain (1562), drew up the January edict (1562), mediated the peace of Amboise (1563), labored for the rejection of the canons of the Council of Trent, negotiated the peace of Longjumeau (1568), etc. His letters were published at Liège, 1585; his Latin poems, in Amsterdam, 1732; his collected works, in Paris, 1824-26, 5 vols. See the sketch of his life, by VILLEMMAIN, in Études d'Histoire moderne, Paris, 1862; GEUER: Die Kirchenpolitik M. d. L'H., Duisburg, 1877.

HOPKINS, Albert, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., July 14, 1807; was graduated at Williams College 1826; became a tutor in the college 1827, professor of mathematics and natural philosophy 1829-38, and of natural philosophy and astronomy 1838, till his death; d. in Williamstown, May 24, 1872. The events of his life were of a wholly ordinary grade; and leave no record behind them. His character only was extraordinary. In 1832 he established in college a noon prayer-meeting of a half-hour, held on four days of the week; and he maintained it for forty years. Although licensed to preach the gospel in 1838, and preaching frequently since, it was not until Dec. 26, 1869, that he was formally ordained. His last days were largely devoted to pastoral work, but not to the neglect of his college duties. His monument is the Church of Christ in the White Oaks (a district in the north-east part of Williamstown), which was the result of his efforts, and which was organized Dec. 20, 1868; but previously he had led the way to, and efficiently aided in, the erection of a chapel there, which was dedicated Oct. 25, 1866. Acquaintance with Professor Hopkins was a means of grace. He was pre-eminently a man of faith, and impressed all he met by his unworldly life. At the same time he was an excellent teacher, and a man of enterprise and push. See his Life by ALBERT C. SEWALL, New York [1879].

HOPKINS, John Henry, D.D., D.C.L. (Oxford). Protestant-Episcopal Bishop of Vermont; b. in Dublin, Jan. 30, 1792; came to this country when he was eight years old; d. at Rock Point, Vt., Jan. 9, 1868. In 1817 he was admitted to the bar, but in 1823 entered the ministry, and became rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, the year following. In 1831 he went to Boston, and in 1832 was elected Bishop of Vermont, accepting at the same time the rectorship of St. Paul's, Burlington. Bishop Hopkins was a zealous High-Churchman, and refused to sign a protest of the majority of the American bishops against Romanizing tendencies: He was an advocate of slavery, and in 1863 published Vindication of Slavery. Among his other many writings are History of the Confessionals (New York, 1850), and Refutation of Milner's End of Controversy, in a Series of Letters to the Roman Archbishop of Baltimore (Kenrick), 2 vols., 1854.

HOPKINS, Samuel, D.D., b. in Waterbury, Conn., Sept. 17, 1721; d. in Newport, R.I., Dec. 20, 1803, in the eighty-third year of his life, and the sixty-second of his ministry. As a child he was remarkable for his purity and ingenuousness. He entered Yale College in September, 1737. Here he devoted himself specially to logic and mathematics. Here he began his Christian life, during the religious interest attending the services of Whitefield and Gilbert Tennent at New Haven. In 1741 he commenced his theological studies, under the care and in the family of President Edwards, then of Northampton, Mass. He was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Great Barrington, Mass., Dec. 28, 1743. When he was ordained, the church consisted of only five members: a hundred and sixteen joined it during his pastorate. After a ministry of twenty-five years, he was dismissed Jan. 18, 1769. His ministry was sometimes interrupted by the French and Indian wars, which compelled him to flee with his family to other towns for safety. He preached often to the Housatonic Indians in his neighborhood. His hundred and sixtieth written sermon to them is still preserved in manuscript. He was so successful in his ministry among them, that he was invited to become their missionary. With all his fondness for study, he was never happier than when preaching to the poor. While at Great Barrington, he remained intimate with President Edwards so long as Edwards was at Northampton, and became still more intimate with him when Edwards removed to Stockbridge. At this time he was better acquainted than any other man with the peculiar views of Edwards. He also held frequent and fraternal intercourse with Dr. Bellamy of Bethlehem, Conn. He exerted a marked influence on several men who afterwards became eminent; as on Dr. Jonathan Edwards, the son of the president, and on Dr. Stephen West of Stockbridge, Mass. He spent commonly fourteen, and occasionally eighteen, hours a day at his study-table. So thorough was his theological training that he was named as a candidate for a professorship of divinity in Princeton College, and afterward for the presidency of the college.

He was installed pastor of the First Congregational Church in Newport, R.I., April 11, 1770, and continued in this pastorate thirty-three years. Soon after his installation he was gratified with a visit from his friend, George Whitefield. As the French and Indian wars had interfered with his parochial success in Great Barrington, so the Revolutionary War interfered with it in Newport. The town was captured by the British in 1786, and remained in their possession more than three years. During these years the church of Dr. Hopkins was impoverished, the church edifice was nearly ruined, and he himself was compelled to seek refuge in other towns. He spent the years of this banishment in supplying destitute churches in Connecticut, and in assisting his friend and pupil, Dr. Samuel Spring in Newburyport. Here he gained a noticeable influence over Moses Brown, Esq., and Hon. William Bartlett, parishioners of Dr. Spring. He made frequent visits to his brother, Dr. Daniel Hopkins of Salem, Mass.; and here he gained a noticeable influence over Hon. John Norris, a parishioner of that brother. These three laymen cherished through life a deep reverence for Dr. Samuel Hopkins; and it is interesting to reflect that they became founders, as Dr. Spring became a father, of the Andover Theological Seminary. (See ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.) On returning to Newport in 1780, Dr. Hopkins resumed a work which had already exposed him to severe persecution. Newport had been a principal slave-mart of North America. As early as 1770 Hopkins began to preach against the slave system. He afterward published numerous essays against it in the newspapers of Newport, Providence, Boston, Hartford. From 1780 onward he wrote elaborate letters on the subject to men of wealth and influence in this country, and to John Erskine, Granville Sharp, Zachary Macaulay, and other abolitionists in Great Britain. As early as 1773 he had united with his friend Dr. Ezra Stiles of Newport, in issuing a circular plea for aid in educating two colored men for an African mission. In 1776 he had united with Dr. Stiles in a second circular for the same object. Some time after 1780 he formed a more comprehensive plan for colonizing American slaves. His plan was followed by visible results. Two liberated negroes, who in their youth had been affected by his colonizing scheme, retained for about forty years their desire to go as colonists and missionaries to their native land; and in January, 1826, they sailed from Boston to Liberia with sixteen other Africans, all formed into a church, of which these two aged men were deacons. The merits of Dr. Hopkins as a pioneer in the cause of African emancipation and colonization will be more fully recognized hereafter than they are at present. Dr. William E. Channing, who was in early life a friend and admirer of Hopkins, has rendered a fitting tribute to his philanthropy. The poet Whittier and other eminent laymen have done the same. (See Memoir of Hopkins prefixed to his works, vol. i. pp. 112-165.)

Dr. Hopkins was a very unattractive speaker: he was more successful as a writer. By his love of investigation, his patient and unremitting thought, the independence, strength, and comprehensiveness of his mind, by his honesty, humility, benevolence, his deferential study of the Bible, and his habit of communion with God, he was eminently fitted to be a theologian. He left his theological system with just those faults which might be expected from an original thinker, with just those faults which might be expected from a positive thinker. His faults were a want of completeness and symmetry, also a bold and positive style where caution and reserve were more apposite. His system was essentially Calvinistic, but was distinguished by the epithet "Hopkinsian." (See HOPKINSIANISM.)

He is said to have spent six years in studying the writings of President Edwards, all of whose manuscripts, by the president's request, were committed to the care of Hopkins. He superintended the publication of Edwards's Treatise on Original Sin, 1758. He edited and published seventeen of Edwards's Sermons (1764), the two dissertations on The End for which God created the World and on The Nature of True Virtue (1765); and he prepared for the press several other of the president's works. The theological writings of Hopkins himself were (titles abbreviated), The Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin (1759), An Inquiry concerning the Promises of the Gospel (1765), The True State and Character of the Unregenerate (1769), Animadversions on Mr. Hart's late Dialogue, which was in opposition to Dr. Hopkins's writings (1770), An Inquiry into the Nature of True Holiness (1773), An Inquiry concerning the Future State of those who die in their Sins (1783), A System of Doctrines contained in Divine Revelation (2 vols. 8vo, 1793), A Dialogue between a Calvinist and a Semi-Calvinist (1805), published after the author's death. Among his printed sermons were one on The Divinity of Christ (1768), two on Law and Regeneration (1768), a Volume of Twenty-one Sermons, edited by Dr. Daniel Hopkins (1803). The biographies published by Hopkins were The Life and Character of President Edwards, prefixed to Edwards's seventeen sermons (1764), The Life and Character of Miss Susanna Anthony (1796), Memoirs of the Life of Mrs. Sarah Osborn (1799). His political writings were chiefly anonymous. In 1766 he published his noted Dialogue concerning the Slavery of the Africans, together with his Address to Slaveholders. It is estimated, that if his essays and letters on African emancipation, and his elaborate letters to Andrew Fuller, John Ryland, Drs. Davies and Bellamy on religious themes, were printed, they would form a large volume. Many of his printed works were republished in 1854 by the Doctrinal Tract and Book Society (now Congregational Board of Publication) at Boston, in three octavo volumes, containing over two thousand pages. In 1805 appeared the Autobiography of Dr. Hopkins with an Introduction by Dr. Stephen West; in 1830, a Memoir of Dr. Hopkins by Rev. John Ferguson; in 1843, Reminiscences of Dr. Hopkins by Rev. Dr. William Patten; in 1854, a Memoir, containing 266 pages, 8vo, by the undersigned.

HOPKINSIANISM. The roots of this theological system lie embedded in the published and unpublished writings of the elder Jonathan Edwards: hence it has been called the "Edwardean Divinity." The main principles of it are either taught or implied in the writings of Dr. Samuel Hopkins of Newport, R.I., the earliest of whose publications were sanctioned by the elder Edwards and Dr. Bellamy. Those principles which are merely implied in his system have been unfolded and somewhat modified by his three friends, Dr. Stephen West, Dr. Nathanael Emmons, and Dr. Samuel Spring. As logically connected with each other, and as understood by the majority of its advocates, the system contains the following principles. (1) Every moral agent choosing right has the natural power to choose wrong, and choosing wrong has the natural power to choose right. (2) He is under no obligation to perform an act, unless he has the natural ability to perform it. (3) Although in the act of choosing, every man is as free as any moral agent can be, yet he is acted upon while he acts freely, and the divine providence, as well as decree, extends to all his wrong as really as to his right volitions. (4) All sin is so overruled by God as to become the occasion of good to the universe. (5) The holiness and the sinfulness of every moral agent belong to him personally and exclusively, and cannot be imputed in a literal sense to any other agent. (6) As the holiness and the sin of man are exercises of his will, there is neither holiness nor sin in his nature viewed as distinct from these exercises. (7) As all his moral acts before regeneration are certain to be entirely sinful, no promise of regenerating grace is made to any of them. (8) The impenitent sinner is obligated, and should be exhorted, to cease from all impenitent acts, and to begin a holy life at once. His moral inability to obey this exhortation is not a literal inability, but is a mere certainty, that, while left to himself, he will sin; and this certainty is no reason for his not being required and urged to abstain immediately from all sin. (9) Every impenitent sinner should be willing to suffer the punishment which God wills to inflict upon him. In whatever sense he should submit to the divine justice punishing other sinners, in that sense he should submit to the divine justice punishing himself. In whatever sense the punishment of the finally obdurate promotes the highest good of the universe, in that sense he should be submissive to the divine will in punishing himself, if finally obdurate. This principle is founded mainly on the two following. (10) All holiness consists in the elective preference of the greater above the smaller, and all sin consists in the elective preference of the smaller above the greater, good of sentient beings. (11) All the moral attributes of God are comprehended in general benevolence, which is essentially the same with general justice, and includes simple, complacential, and composite benevolence; legislative, retributive, and public justice. (12) The atonement of Christ consists not in his enduring the punishment threatened by the law, nor in his performing the duties required by the law, but in his manifesting and honoring by his pains, and especially by his death, all the divine attributes which would have been manifested in the same and no higher degree by the punishment of the redeemed. (13) The atonement was made for all men, the non-elect as really as the elect.

The epithet "Hopkinsian" was invented in 1769 or 1770 by Rev. William Hart of Saybrook, Conn., and was applied, not to the whole system of Dr. Hopkins, but to the principles marked 7 and 8 above. As a whole, Hopkinsianism has been distinguished by the prominence which it gives to the sterner class of truths; as the decrees and sovereignty of God, the eternity of future punishment, etc. It has prepared the way for giving this prominence by introducing a different class of principles; as the equity of God in adapting his law to the natural ability of men, his infinite worthiness in making benevolence the sum of all his moral attributes, the beauty of holiness as consisting in the choice of the greater above the smaller good of the universe, etc. On account of the prominence which it gives to the former class of principles, it has been criticised as Hyper-Calvinism: on account of its adopting the latter class, it has been criticised since 1772 as Arminian and Pelagian. By combining the two classes, and developing their consistency with each other and with the uses of the pulpit, it has claimed the title of "Consistent Calvinism." The substance of it has been now incorporated with what is termed "New-England Theology" (see art.).

HOR, Mount (the mountain). There are two mountains of this name in Scripture. The first, called by the Arabs Jebel Neby Harun ("the mountain of the prophet Aaron"), is on the boundary-line of Edom (Num. xx. 23), midway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah, and is forty-eight hundred feet high. It has two peaks; and on one of these, or, as some suppose, on the level space between them, from whence he could be seen by all the people, Aaron died (Num. xx. 27, 28). The tomb (Kabr Harûn) now shown to travellers as his is a small building twenty-eight by thirty-three feet, surmounted by a white dome,—the usual mark of a saint's resting-place. The interior of the tomb consists of two rooms, one above the other. The upper one has in it a stone sarcophagus: the ceiling is supported by four pillars. The lower room is reached by a flight of steps, and is perfectly dark. At one end, through a grating, is shown what purports to be the real tomb.

The second Mount Hor (Num. xxxiv. 7, 8) was between the Mediterranean and the "entrance of Hamath," but has not been further identified.

HORBE, Johann Heinrich, b. at Colmar, in Alsace, June 11, 1645; d. at Steinbeck, near Hamburg, Jan. 26, 1695; studied theology at Strassburg, where, among others, he also had Spener for his teacher; visited afterwards the universities of Jena, Leipzig, Wittenberg, Helmstädt, and Kiel; travelled in Holland, England, and France, and was in 1671 appointed pastor at Trarbach on the Mosel. The boldness with which he expounded and carried out into practice his pietistic views brought him into collision with his colleagues, and in 1678 he was dismissed. In the following year he was appointed pastor of Windsheim in Franconia, and in 1684 pastor of St. Nicholas in Hamburg. In the latter place he found many adherents, but also many adversaries; and the distribution of Die Klugheit der Gerechten, a translation of a pamphlet by the French mystic Pierre Poiret, raised such a storm against him that he was dismissed November, 1693. He retired to Steinbeck, where he died. A list of his writings is found in J. MÖLLER: Cimbria litterata, II. pp. 355-372. See also J. GEFFCKEN: Johann Winckler und die Hamburgische Kirche, Hamburg, 1861.

HORCHE, Heinrich, b. at Eschwege, Dec. 12, 1652; d. at Kirchhain, Aug. 5, 1729; studied at Marburg, and was appointed court-preacher at Kreuznach 1685, and pastor of Herborn 1690, from which latter position he was dismissed in 1698. Gradually his pietism developed into separatism, his enthusiasm into insanity. The last part of his life he spent wandering about, preaching in public, and holding conventicles. He was several times arrested, and twice detained in a lunatic-asylum. But his relations with all the separatists and enthusiasts of his time continued to the last. See H. HOCHHUTH: H. H. und die philadelphischen Gemeinden in Hesse, Gütersloh, 1876.

HORMISDAS (Pope July 20, 514-Aug. 6, 523) demanded, as a condition of the re-establishment of union between the Eastern and Western churches, the formal acknowledgment of the anathema spoken by the Bishop of Rome over Anasias. The Emperor Anastasius refused the demand, but his successor, Justin I., complied with it; and in 519 the schism, which had lasted for thirty-five years, was healed. Hormisdas' letters are found in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Lat., 63; his life, in JAFFÉ, Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 65.

HORNE, George, an eminent English divine and commentator; b. at Otham, Kent, Nov. 1, 1730; d. at Bath, Jan. 17, 1792. He was educated at University College, Oxford, and made fellow of Magdalen, 1749. He rose to very high distinction as a scholar, became president of Magdalen in 1768, vice-chancellor of the university 1776, dean of Canterbury 1781, and was consecrated Bishop of Norwich June 7, 1790. He enjoyed the friendship and esteem of Dr. Johnson. Bishop Horne was an evangelical divine, a polished preacher, and a genial writer. He early entered into a controversy with Dr. Kennicott, who proposed to make a collation of Hebrew manuscripts, fearing the results, or at least denying the claims, of a scientific criticism of the Bible. His Commentary on the Psalms (2 vols., 1776) has passed through many editions, and is his best work. It is characterized by unction and fertility of devotional counsel. Editions have appeared with an excellent Introductory Essay by Edward Irving. Among his other works was a volume of Letters on Infidelity (1784), in which he criticises Hume's arguments. See The Works of B. Horne, with his Life, by WILLIAM JONES, London, 1795-99, 6 vols., and 1831, 4 vols.

HORNE, Thomas Hartwell, b. in London, Oct. 20, 1780; d. there Jan. 27, 1862. He was educated at Christ's Hospital (1789-95), and then was a barrister's clerk; but in 1809 he became sub-librarian to the Surrey Institution, in 1814 librarian; was admitted to holy orders 1819; was senior assistant librarian in the British Museum 1824-60, made B.D. by Cambridge 1829, prebendary of St. Paul's 1831, and in 1833 was appointed rector of the united parishes of St. Edmund the King, and St. Nicolas Acons, in London. He gave early evidence of his literary ability in his Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Religion (1800, 2d ed., 1802), and wrote very many pamphlets and volumes; but the work by which he is remembered is An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, London, 1818, 3 vols., 10th ed., vol. 2 revised by Rev. Samuel Davidson, D.D., and vol. 4 by Samuel Prideaux Tregelles, LL.D., 1856, 4 vols. in 5. But Dr. Davidson's "rationalism" led to the rejection of his work, and the substitution of the revision of vol. 2 by Rev. John Ayre. The fourteenth edition of the work appeared 1877: there is also an American reprint of a former edition. Horne's Introduction is the most famous book of its class. It covers the entire field of biblical learning,—not only general and special introduction proper, but hermeneutics, apologetics, biblical geography, natural history, etc. It has been of incalculable value in the Church, and the means of turning many persons unto profound Bible study. The Bibliographical Appendix to the Introduction is the best thing of its kind as yet published in English.

HORNEY, or HORNEJUS, Conrad, b. at Brunswick, Nov. 25, 1590; d. at Helmstädt, Sept. 26, 1649; studied philosophy and theology, first in his native place, afterwards at Helmstädt, where he was appointed professor of philosophy in 1619, and of theology in 1628. His Compendium dialecticæ (1623), Philosophiæ moralis (1624), Theologiæ, and Hist. Eccles. (the two last published after his death), were much used as text-books, not only at Helmstädt, but also in other universities.

HOROLOGIUM (ὠρολόγιον, "a dial"), an office-book of the Greek Church, corresponding to the Latin breviary, and containing the office for the day and night hours of the Church, from matin to compline, with the variable antiphons and hymns, and various short offices, prayers, and canons, for occasional use.

HORSLEY, Samuel, a learned and eloquent prelate of the Church of England; b. in London, 1733; d. at Brighton, Oct. 4, 1806. His father was a minister, and personally supervised his education till he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated LL.B. in 1758. His first charge in the ministry was Newington in Surrey. In 1767 he was elected to the Royal Society, and was secretary of that body from 1773 to 1784, when he resigned his membership, on account of difficulties with the president. He was an able classical scholar and mathematician, published works in both departments, and edited the Works of Sir Isaac Newton, in 5 vols., 1779-85. His ministerial career was a brilliant one. After filling other positions, he was appointed in 1781 archdeacon of St. Alban's. Whilst holding this position, he entered (1783) upon his famous controversy with Dr. Priestley. His Letters (see Horsley's Tracts in Controversy with Dr. Priestley, with Notes by Rev. H. Horsley, 3d ed., Dundee, 1812) on this subject are full of learning and keen argument. In clear and solid reasoning he was more than a match for his opponent; and Gibbon describes his achievements by saying that "his spear pierced the Socinian's shield." The dispute was carried on with great heat, and not a little acrimony on both sides. For his services in stopping the tide of Socinianism, he was rewarded by Thurlow with a prebend's stall in Gloucester, and with the see of St. David's, in 1788. In Parliament, Bishop Horsley was an energetic supporter of Mr. Pitt. In 1793 he was translated to the see of Rochester, and rewarded with the deanery of Westminster for a famous sermon preached there on the anniversary of the execution of Charles I., and a few days after Louis XVI. was guillotined. In 1802 he was transferred to the see of St. Asaph.

Bishop Horsley was a man of overbearing temper, but a keen reasoner, sound scholar, and eloquent orator. His sermons are among the very best specimens of English pulpit eloquence. Among his works not already referred to may be mentioned a Commentary on Hosea (1801, 2d ed., 1804), the posthumous work on the Psalms translated from the Hebrew, etc. (1815, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1845), Biblical Criticism of Fourteen Historical Books of the Old Testament, etc. (1820, 4 vols., 2d ed., 1844, 2 vols.), a collected edition of Horsley's Theological Works (London, 1830, 9 vols.), and his Sermons, complete in 1 vol. (London, 1839). See STANLEY: Memorials of Westminster Abbey; and STOUGHTON: Religion in England, vi., 179 sqq.

HOSE'A (עֹשֶׂה, "help"), a Hebrew prophet, was the son of Beeri. Of his life nothing further is known than what may be inferred from his prophecy. Tradition is singularly reticent concerning him. The prophet was married, and had three children. His marriage is not to be explained as an allegory [some of the fathers, Horsley, Pusey, etc.], nor resolved into a vision [Hengstenberg, etc.]. He belonged to the kingdom of Israel, as is evident from vii. 5, where he calls the king of Israel "our king," and from the contents of the prophecy, which display a familiar acquaintance with the affairs of the Northern Kingdom.

The Book of Hosea is divided into two parts, — i.-iii. and iv.-xiv. In chapter i. it is told how, in obedience to the divine command, the prophet married a "wife of whoredoms" (Gomer), who bore him a daughter ("Not having obtained Mercy") and two sons ("Jezreel" and "Not my People"). These three names are plainly symbolical of God's displeasure. Chapter ii. promises reconciliation with the people, notwithstanding their alienation from him. The new and pleasanter names are substituted, — "My People," and "Having obtained Mercy." But between the displeasure and reconciliation a period was to intervene (iii.) in which Israel should be punished for its spiritual adultery, and be led by sorrows to seek again the Lord.

The second part (iv.-xiv.) contains a series of punitive and threatening discourses. The first of these (iv.) describes the deep moral fall of the land, in which the leaders and priests were also involved. In the second (v.-vi. 3), the prophet urges the responsibility of the priests for the spiritual declension and the divine punishment, in spite of the help sought from foreign nations, and closes with the scene of the people's returning wounded to the Lord for healing. This section belongs to the reign of Shallum, which lasted only one month (v. 7). If this be granted, then the former section belongs to the reign of Zachariah. The third discourse (vi. 4-vii. 16) contains a reproof of Ephraim, who is unstable, wanders off from God, and seeks aid from Egypt and Assyria. As Hitzig has rightly pointed out, vii. 7 enables us to fix the time of this discourse pretty accurately in the reign of Menahem. The fourth discourse (viii. 1-ix. 9) again lays bare the spiritual adultery of Israel, and lifts a warning voice. It evidently belongs to the reign of Menahem, who leaned upon Assyria (viii. 4). The fifth discourse (ix. 10-xi. 11) three times shows how Israel had returned God's goodness by turning to idols. If, as is very probable, x. 14 refers to Shalmaneser, then this prophecy was spoken under King Hoshea. The last discourse (xii. 1-xiv. 9), which closes with an earnest exhortation to the people to repent, and the announcement of a divine promise, belongs also to the reign of Hoshea, and before the fall of the Northern Kingdom.

To sum up, we have here a series of prophecies reaching from the last years of Jeroboam II., king of Israel, into the reign of Hoshea; so that there is no good reason for denying the genuineness of the superscription (i. 1), as some have done [or from about 784 to 726 B.C.]. That the prophecies of Hoshea have been handed down to us in their integrity, has with reason been emphasized by Ewald.

Hoshea is closely related to Amos, his older contemporary, as is evident by a comparison of Hos. iv. 3, and Amos viii. 8; Hos. iv. 15, and Amos v. 5; Hos. v. 7, and Amos vii. 4, etc. But, closely related as the prophets are, the differences in their language and manner of representation are marked. Hoshea's style is full of rare words (ii. 4, 12, viii. 6, etc.), verbal forms and expressions (iv. 4, ix. 1, etc.). In other respects, also, they differ. Amos is more gentle, Hoshea more robust. His mind, as Umbreit says, "moves, profoundly agitated, under the burden, divinely imposed, of preaching against the sins of his people, and announcing their fall. Hence the abruptness of his discourse, the disconnectedness of the sentences, and the peculiar character of the figures, which follow each other rapidly, and without being rounded out; so that Jerome was right when he said Hoshea was concise, and spoke, as it were, in detached, unconnected sentences (commaticus est et quasi per sententias loquens). Notwithstanding, however, the dark flood of ire which the book reveals to our gaze, it also unveils a light of reconciling love of surpassing beauty, which ever and anon shines upon the adulterous people. And in this combination lies the peculiar splendor of our prophet."

Hoshea is referred to three times in the New Testament, — Rom. ix. 25, 26, 1 Cor. xv. 55, and Matt. ii. 15.

HOSHE'A (God is help), the son of Elah, and the last and best of the kings of Israel, headed a conspiracy against Pekah, slew him, and seized the throne (2 Kings xv. 30). But he was unable to stay the fall of his kingdom. At the very beginning of his reign he was compelled to pay tribute to Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 3); and in his ninth year he was invaded by the Assyrian king, because he had attempted an alliance with Egypt. Samaria was taken, after a three-years' siege, and a large part of the people carried away to Assyria (xvii. 6), and their land was newly peopled (xvii. 24, cf. Hos. xiii. 16, Mic. i. 6). It would seem that the king who began the siege of Samaria was Shalmaneser; the king who took it was Sargon; the Egyptian king, who is called So, was Sevechus, the second king of the twenty-fifth Æthiopian dynasty. RÜETSCHL.

HOSIUS, generally called Osius by Latin writers; b. 256; d. 359; was Bishop of Corduba (Cordova), in Spain, for over fifty years. He was present at the synod of Elvira (305 or 306), and agreed in its severe canons concerning the lapsi, the marriage of ecclesiastics, and other points of discipline. Some years later on he appears at the court of Constantine the Great as a man of great influence. He brought personally the emperor's letter to Bishop Alexander of Alexandria, and Arius, exhorting them to refrain from disturbing the Church by their disputes; and he was, no doubt, instrumental in the convention of the first œcumenical council of Nicæa (325), where he played a prominent part. Of the details of his administration of his diocese, nothing is known: but he remained the firm friend of Athanasius and his cause in the Western Church; and when Constantius, in 353, endeavored to establish peace in the Church by openly favoring the Arians, Hosius refused not only to condemn Athanasius, but also to enter into communion with the Arians. The demand was made by the emperor; and Hosius refused again in a dignified letter, reminding the emperor, that, though the realm belonged to him, the Church belonged to the bishops. Hosius was then banished to Sirmium; and, by a synod held there in 357, he was induced to subscribe the second Sirmian formula, involving communion with the Arians, but not the condemnation of Athanasius. After his return to Corduba, he retracted, however. Of his writings, only the above-mentioned letter has come down to us. ATHANASIUS: Ad Monach.; DALE: Synod of Elvira, 1882. W. MÖLLER.

HOSIUS, Stanislaus, b. in Cracow, May 5, 1504; d. at Capranica, near Rome, Aug. 5, 1579; studied law at Padua and Bologna; entered the service of the Church, and was made Bishop of Culm 1549, Bishop of Ermeland, 1551, and cardinal 1561. He was a most decided and energetic enemy of the Reformation, intimately connected with the Jesuits, rejoicing over the murder of Coligny, and anxious that Poland also should have its Massacre of St. Bartholomew. He drew up the Confessio fidei christiana catholica, adopted by the synod of Petrikau 1551, and founded in 1565 the college and seminary of Braunsberg, which for centuries formed the centre of the Roman-Catholic mission among the Protestants. He was not a great theologian. The Bible he considered the "property of the Roman Church;" and, that one quality left out of view, it had, he thought, no more worth than the fables of Æsop. His writings, passionately polemical, are full of theological blunders. But he was a great administrator and a great diplomatist, and successfully carried through many very difficult negotiations. A collected edition of his works appeared at Cologne, 1584. See KRASINSKI: The Reform. in Poland, Lond., 1838—40, 2 vols.; and his life written by RESCIUS and A. EICHHORN, Mainz, 1855, 2 vols. SUDHOFF.

HOSPINIAN, Rudolph, b. at Altorf, Nov. 7, 1547; studied at Marburg and Heidelberg, and was appointed, first director of the gymnasium, then pastor at Zürich, where he died March 11, 1626. He was a very prolific writer, mostly polemical. The principal of his works are De ori- gine et progressu rituum (1585), De templis (1587), De monachis (1588), Historia sacramentaria (1603), Concordia discors (1617), which was vehemently attacked by Hutter, Historia Jesuitica (1619). A collected edition of his works appeared at Geneva, 1681, 7 vols. folio, with life by J. H. Heidegger.

HOSPITALITY AMONG THE HEBREWS.

This virtue was practised and held in the highest esteem among Israel and throughout the East. When a stranger appeared, he was invited into the house or tent. As soon as he arrived, he was furnished with water to wash his feet, received a supply of needful food for himself and his beast, and enjoyed courtesy and protection from his host (Gen. xviii. 2 sq., xix. 1 sq., xxiv. 25, 31 sq.; Exod. ii. 20; Judg. xiii. 15, xix. 20 sq., 23). To leave a stranger outside in the street was a disgrace to the whole community (Judg. xix. 15), and to refuse him admittance was considered discreditable (Job xxxi. 32). The religious hatred existing between Jews and Samaritans destroyed the mutual relations of hospitality (Luke ix. 53; John iv. 9); and only in the greatest extremity would the Jew partake of Samaritan food, and if possible he avoided passing through Samaria on his journeys. On his departure, the traveller was not allowed to go alone or empty handed (Gen. xviii. 16). Where modern tourists have not spoiled the East, this custom of hospitality is still prevailing.

HOSPITALLERS, or HOSPITAL BRETHERN, is the common name of all those associations of laymen, monks, canons, and knights, which devoted themselves to nursing the sick and the poor in the hospitals, while at the same time observing certain monastic practices, generally according to the rule of Augustine. Most of those brotherhoods were connected with some regular monastic order, and stood under the authority of the bishop. When they were large, they had a general of their own; but even the smaller ones had their superior or major, and a steward to take care of the finances. Some of them, as, for instance, the Hospitalers of St. Jean de Dieu in France, were exempted from episcopal authority, and stood immediately under the Pope. Only a few of them took the regular monastic vows.

The first of this kind of brotherhood was formed in Italy in the ninth century. During the crusades their number increased immensely, and they spread over all Europe. The religious orders of knights, as, for instance, the Knights of St. John and the Teutonic Knights, originated from the same movement. One of the oldest associations bearing the name of Hospitalers was that of the Hospital Brethren of the Holy Spirit, founded in 1190 at Montpellier, by Count Guido, and confirmed in 1198 by Innocent III.: it had its mother-house in the Hospitale S. Spiritus in Saxia in Rome. Then followed the Hospitalers of Burgos (1212), the Frères de la Charité de la bienheureuse Marie (founded at Boucheraumont in the diocese of Chalons 1280, and having its mother-house in the hospital Les Billets in Paris), the Brethren of Love, the Good Brethren, etc.

There were also hospital sisters; and the female associations originating in the twelfth century achieved a still greater success than the male ones. They united to the duty of nursing the sick and the poor, also that of educating young girls, especially orphans, and rescuing fallen women. The principal sisterhoods were those of St. Gervasius (1171), St. Catharine in Paris (1222), St. Martha of Pontarlier (1687), etc. See HELYOT: Histoire d. ord. mon., Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols. ZÖCKLER.

HOSPITALS. The idea of honoring and serving Christ in the person of the unfortunate and diseased has manifestly deeply impressed the Church. From the beginning, Christians have been proverbial for the care they have displayed for the weak. The deacons and deaconesses of the early Church visited the sick in their homes, but not they alone; and, even in times of persecution and of pestilence, all Christians joined in such pious duties. Care of the sick was unremitting. When the ban of the State was lifted from the Church, then buildings for the reception of the sick, the needy, and the stranger, began to be erected in all parts of the empire. And these came directly under the care of the bishops, who, of course, employed others to manage the details. Indeed, the Code of Justinian made their employment of superintendents obligatory. Basil the Great (330-379) seems to have built the most complete institution of the kind. In it there were accommodations even for lepers. The Emperor Julian was stirred up by the example of the Christians to provide on a generous scale for the sick. Later Placilla, the wife of Theodosius the Great, is mentioned by Theodoret (Hist. Eccl., v. 19) as devoting much time to hospital service, doing even menial duties. The first person to build a hospital in Rome was Fabiola, one of Jerome's converts, who, out of penitence for a constructive sin (a second marriage after divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, which was contrary to church law), gave all her property to charitable uses. Jerome himself had previously built a hospital in Bethlehem. There is notice of hospitals in Gaul in the fifth century; in Germany in the eighth or ninth century. The Irish missionaries of the latter period built them in different parts of Northern Europe in connection with their monasteries: hence they were called "Hospitalia Scotorum;" i.e., Irish Hospitals.

It is a striking fact, mentioned by Martigny, that "hospitals were in ancient times commonly dedicated to the Holy Spirit, which was represented under the form of a dove, either on the façade, or on some other conspicuous part of the building." The principal hospital in Rome bears this designation, and has borne it from a very remote period.

HOSSBACH, Peter Wilhelm, b. at Wusterhausen, in the province of Prussia, Feb. 20, 1784; studied theology at Halle and Francfort-on-the-Oder, and was appointed pastor, first of Plänitz, near his native town, then at the military academy, and finally at the Church of Jerusalem, in Berlin, where he died April 7, 1846. Besides several collections of sermons (1822-48), he published Das Leben J. V. Andreäs (1819) and Spener und seine Zeit (1828), both of which hold a high rank among historical monographs.

HOTTENTOTS, Christian Missions among the, were begun by George Schmidt, a Moravian missionary, who arrived at Cape Town in 1737. Although he spoke through an interpreter, his success was great, and therefore the colonial government interfered. In 1744 he returned to Europe in order to have his grievances removed; but in this he was not only unsuccessful, but the Dutch East India Company, which governed the colony, did not even allow him to return. It was not until 1792 that the mission was resumed by three other Moravian missionaries, and, until 1795, carried on amid formidable opposition on the part of the colonists. Since 1806 the colony has been under British government; and the mission has not been disturbed, and is now in a flourishing condition. But the Moravians have not been alone upon the field. The London Missionary Society, in 1798, sent thither two missionaries, — Dr. Vanderkemp and Mr. Edmonds. The Wesleyan Missionary Society began operations in 1814; and other societies have since come in. The success of their work refutes the Portuguese notion that the Hottentots were a race of apes, incapable of Christianization. Low as they are in the scale of civilization, they are still soil for the gospel-seed, and bear precious increase. The gospel of Christ makes of the Hottentot a hero and a saint. For a full account of the language, history, and geographic and ethnographic relations of the Hottentots, see art. in Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. xii. 309–313. For their religion, see T. HAHN: Tsuni ||Goam, the Supreme Being of the Khoi-Khoi, London, 1882.

HÖTTINGER is the name of a Swiss family which has produced several notable theologians. — Johann Heinrich Hottinger, b. in Zürich, March 10, 1620; d. there June 5, 1667; studied theology and Oriental languages in Geneva, Gröningen, and Leyden; was appointed professor of theology in his native city 1641; and wrote, among other works, Exercitationes Anti-Moniane de Pentateucho Samaritano (1644), and Historia Eccles. Novi Test. (1651–67, 9 vols.). — Johann Jacob Hottinger, son of the preceding; b. in Zürich, Dec. 1, 1652; d. there Dec. 18, 1735; studied in Basel and Geneva; was appointed professor of theology in his native city in 1698, and wrote Helvetische Kirchengesch. (1698–1729, 4 vols. quarto). — Johann Jacob Hottinger, a relative of the preceding; b. in Zürich, May 18, 1783; was professor of history there, and died there May 18, 1860. He continued Johann von Müller's work on the history of Switzerland, and gave a valuable representation of the introduction of the Reformation in Switzerland.

HOUBIGANT, Charles François, b. in Paris, 1686; d. there 1783; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1704; served as teacher in various colleges, but retired in 1722 on account of complete deafness, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. His principal works are Racines Hébraïques (1732), in mnemonic verses, and Biblica Hebraica, with a Latin translation and critical notes (1753, 4 vols.), published at the expense of the Oratory.

HOUSE AMONG THE HEBREWS. See ARCHITECTURE, HEBREW.

HOUSE-COMMUNION, or PRIVATE COMMUNION, particularly in the case of the sick, cannot claim apostolic precedent, but came in very early; for the deacons were accustomed to carry the consecrated elements immediately after service to the sick, to prisoners, and to strangers. Tertullian, in the third century, testifies to the practice of private communion on the part of well persons (Ad ux., 2, 5, de or., 19 [Eng. trans. in Ante-Nicene Library, Tert., vol. i. pp. 193, 298]). In Greek churches there was private communion under both kinds. In Tertullian's time it would seem the bread alone was used at home, and eaten in the family-circle at morning-prayer. Later on, we find consecrated bread carried upon journeys, and used as an amulet; so much so, that councils protested against the practice. On the development of the doctrine of transubstantiation, the cup was withdrawn from the laity, and the present form of communion for the sick introduced.

The Reformed and the Lutheran churches differ upon this point of private communion; the former repressing, and the latter freely allowing it. The Protestant pastor is oft-times confronted with practical difficulties when asked to dispense communion to the sick, and should therefore act cautiously, inquiring carefully into the condition of the sick person, so as to be assured that the service is intelligently and reverently participated in, and not superstitiously as a preservative against future woe.

ROBERT KÜBEL.

HOWARD, John, the eminent apostle of prison-reform; b. at Hackney, near London, Sept. 2, 1726; d. at Cherson, on the Black Sea, Jan. 20, 1790. He was apprenticed to a grocer; but falling heir at the age of nineteen, by his father's death, to an ample fortune, he turned his back on commercial pursuits, and started on a tour to the Continent. On his return he was married to a lady much older than himself, who, however, lived only a few years after the event. In 1756 he took passage to Lisbon; but the vessel was captured by a French privateer, and Howard cast into a dungeon at Brest. The accommodations were wretched, and the provisions scant and ill-served, the meat being thrown in amongst the prisoners for them to tear it to pieces as best they could. He was transferred to Morlaix, but, released on parole, returned to England. The same year (1756) he was made fellow of the Royal Society for some communications on meteorology. About this time he married again, and spent a quiet life at his seat in Cardington (where he instituted laudable measures for the improvement of the condition of his tenants) until his wife's death, in 1765. He was a member of the Baptist Church of Bedford. In 1769 he made an extensive tour through Italy and other countries of the Continent, and, returning, was elected sheriff of the county of Bedford in 1773.

A new period of Howard's life dates from this time. He now began a series of investigations into the condition of prisons, which extended over a number of years, led him to travel through every country in Europe, and to pursue with a perseverance and consecration rarely equalled in any department of life his inquiries in the prisons of almost every city of considerable size on the Continent or Great Britain. These unselfish labors brought him into the presence of crowned heads and parliaments, and have won for his name a place, with those of Wilberforce and Mrs. Fry, among the noblest philanthropists of his country. The office of sheriff was the occasion of his visiting the jails of Bedford County; and the state of his mind in regard to them is summed up in his own words: "I beheld scenes of calamity which I grew daily more and more anxious to alleviate." Not only were the accommodations miserable, but the prisoners exposed to the mercy of unsalaried jailers, who drew their support from the fees of their wards, and had power to detain them till these were paid. In November, 1773, he began visiting the jails of the adjoining counties in order to find a precedent for putting the jailers of Bedford upon salaries, — a measure which he strenuously urged upon the authorities. These investigations, which were gradually pushed further and further, till he had visited the most of the county jails in England and in Ireland and Scotland (1775), strengthened in his mind the conviction of the urgent call for remedial measures. The rooms were, in part, underground and damp, and, as a rule, gloomy and filthy; in one case the common sewer of the city running directly under one of the prisons, and uncovered. The bedding, if any, was usually confined to straw, and the rations unhealthy and insufficient. Jail-fever, and small-pox in its most virulent form, were common diseases. In 1774 he was called to testify before the committee of the House of Commons. That body passed a resolution "recognizing the humanity and zeal which had led him to visit the several jails in this kingdom," and the same year passed two bills for the better treatment of prisoners, and care of jails. In the spring of 1775 Howard visited Paris, where, after much perseverance, he succeeded in getting admission to the jails, which he describes as "beyond imagination horrid and dreadful." He also travelled through Switzerland, Germany, Belgium, and Holland, finding in the last two countries the prison accommodations in a comparatively good state. On his return to England he published a work on the State of the Prisons in England and Wales, with Preliminary Observations, etc. In the years which immediately followed, he extended his visits to Sweden, Russia, Hungary, and every other country in Europe, everywhere pursuing the one philanthropic passion of his life.

The last five years of Howard's life were spent in measures for the mitigation of the horrors of the plague. With this design he visited, in 1785, the lazarettos of various cities of Italy, went as far as Smyrna, and travelled unknown on vessels infected with the plague in order to be able the better to find out the character of the treatment of the disease, and the nature of the quarantine regulations. In 1789, on his last sojourn in England, he published an Account of the Principal Lazarettos in Europe, etc. These latter years were saddened by the wild course of an only son, who lost his reason; but once again he started on a journey to the Continent, reached Cherson on the Black Sea, caught the plague from a lady whom he tried to cure, and died. A monument to his memory was placed in St. Paul's Cathedral, containing a well-deserved eulogy. To his efforts are due the improved system of prison accommodation and that discipline which seeks to reform the criminal, not only in Great Britain, but, to some extent, throughout a large part of Europe. Of the animating principle of his career, Dr. Stoughton has said that "religious principle developed in simple and unostentatious, almost puritanical, forms, constituted the strength and inspiration of Howard's world-known character." Mr. Howard's Life has been written by AIKEN (London, 1792), BROWN (London, 1818), HERWORTH DIXON (London, 5th ed., 1854), TAYLOR (London, 1836), JOHN FIELD (London, 1850), STOUGHTON (London, 1853), and his Correspondence edited by FIELD (London, 1855).

HOWE, John, an eminent Puritan divine and author; b. May 17, 1630, at Loughborough, Leicestershire, where his father was minister; d. April 2, 1705, in London. The elder Howe was thrust out of his position by Laud for espousing the cause of the Puritans, and went to Ireland when the subject of this sketch was five years old. He afterwards returned to England, and settled in Lancaster. John Howe was educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and made fellow of Magdalen College in the latter university, of which Dr. Thomas Goodwin was at the time the president. About 1652 he became pastor at Great Torrington in Devonshire. In this place, according to his own statement, the order of his services on fast-days was as follows: Beginning at nine in the morning, he made an invocation a quarter of an hour in length, spent three-quarters of an hour in expounding a chapter, prayed for an hour, preached for an hour, then prayed again for half an hour. Here followed a recess, in which Mr. Howe took some refreshment. Returning in a quarter of an hour (the people singing all the while), the services were resumed with a prayer of an hour, continued with a sermon of another hour, and concluded at four in the afternoon with a final prayer "of about a half an hour or more." Mr. Howe was a successful pastor; but his biographer, Edmund Calamy, without doubt has the sympathy of the present age when he closes this description by exclaiming, "A sort of service that few could have gone through without inexpressible weariness, both to themselves and their auditors."

In 1654 Howe went on a visit to London, and was an auditor in the chapel at Whitehall, when he was espied, and recognized from his garb, by Cromwell, to be a country minister. Attracted by his fine appearance, the Protector despatched a messenger after him at the conclusion of the services, and pressed him so hard to remain over the following Sabbath and preach before him, that in vain he pleaded one excuse after another. The result was that Howe, much against his private preferences, became one of Cromwell's chaplains. Elevated to this position, he showed a tolerant spirit, and helped more than one of the Episcopalian clergymen, as, notably, Thomas Fuller and Dr. Ward, afterwards Bishop of Exeter. Upon Richard's deposition, he returned to his former parish at Torrington. When the Act of Uniformity was passed, he quitted his church, but continued for some time in the neighborhood, preaching in private houses. In this period he was called to Exeter to see the bishop, who proposed to him to be re-ordained. Howe answered, "The thought is shocking, my lord: it hurts my understanding. It is an absurdity, for nothing can have two beginnings. I am sure I am a minister of Christ, and I can't begin again to be a minister." In common with Dr. Bates and others, he accepted the Five-Mile Act, which was passed in 1665, with the limiting clause, "so far as the laws of man are agreeable to the Word of God." In 1671, having preached privately at houses in the mean while, he accepted an invitation to Antrim, Ireland, as chaplain to Lord Massarene. In 1675 he accepted a call to London, and was allowed to preach by the king's indulgence. He was several times approached by persons high in position, in the hope that he might be led to conform. In 1685, on account of the greater severity shown to the dissenters, he accepted an invitation to accompany Lord Wharton to the Continent, and the year following settled at Utrecht. When James II. issued his declaration for liberty of conscience (in 1687), Howe returned to his old position in London. From this time till his death he took an active interest in the theological discussions of the day (as that on the Trinity), and preserved the respect of all parties.

Mr. Howe is described as tall in person, graceful in manner, and of a piercing but pleasant eye. He was a ready offhand preacher, and never used notes. He was conciliatory in disposition, catholic in spirit, anxious to promote Christian unity, and more than once put his opponents in controversy to the blush by his moderation and fairness.

Howe's works, in spite of being somewhat prolix and tedious, are among the most suggestive and profound of the Puritan writings. "I have learned more from John Howe than from any author I ever read," said Robert Hall. "There is an astonishing magnificence about his conceptions" (edition of his works, Lond., 1853, vi. 120). His principal works are the treatise, Delighting in God, 1674; The Living Temple, 1st part, 1676, 2d part, 1702, in which he discusses the questions naturally suggested by the idea that man is the temple of God; The Redeemer's Tears over Lost Souls, 1684. His Complete Works were first issued (with a Life by EDMUND CALAMY) Lond., 1724, 2 vols., then by HUNT, Lond., 1810-22, 7 vols. The most accessible edition (containing the Life by Calamy), N.Y., 1869, 2 vols. See also ROGERS: Life of John Howe, Lond., 1836.

HOWIE, John, a Scotch Presbyterian layman; b. at Lochgoin, Nov. 14, 1735; d. there September, 1791. He wrote that famous book, The Scots Worthies, or, as the full title reads, Bibliotheca Scoticana; or a brief historical account of the most eminent Scots worthies, etc., 1503-1688, Glasgow, 1774 and often; new ed., revised, corrected, and enlarged, with a preface and notes by William McGavin, Edinburgh and New York, 1853. The book is still in print, and read.

HOYLE, Joshua, D.D., b. at Sorby, near Halifax, Yorkshire, Eng.; d. Dec. 6, 1654. He was educated in Magdalen Hall, Oxford, but became fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and took his degrees of divinity, and became professor of divinity, in that university. He devoted himself to biblical studies and the Roman-Catholic controversy, and was a friend and warm admirer of Archbishop Usher. He fled from the Irish massacre and returned to England, and became vicar of Stepney near London. In 1643 he was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. He labored on the committee on the Confession of Faith. In 1648 he was appointed master of University College, Oxford, and Kings Professor of Divinity in the university. His two published works are, A rejoinder to Mr. Malone, Jesuit, his reply concerning Real Presence (4to, pp. 662, Dublin, 1641), and Jehoiadah's justice against Mattan, Baal's Priest, a sermon (London, 1645). HROSWITHA, a nun of the convent of Gandersheim in the duchy of Saxony; wrote, in the latter part of the tenth century, a series of legends in leonine verses (Maria, Ascensio Domini, Passio S. Gongolft, etc.), an epic (Gesta Oddonis), and six religious comedies (Gallicanus, Duleitius, Calimachus, Abraham, Pafnutius, and Sapientia), to counteract the influence of Terence on the students of the cloister-schools. Her works were edited by K. Barach, Nuremberg, 1858. See KOEPKE: Hrotsuit von Gandersheim, Berlin, 1869.

HUBER, Johannes Nepomuk, b. in Munich, Aug. 18, 1830; d. there, March 20, 1879. He was extraordinary professor of philosophy (1859), and then ordinary professor (1864), in the university of Munich, one of the most fearless opponents of Ultramontanism, and later a leader in the Old Catholic movement. His principal writings are Philosophie der Kirchenväter (München, 1859, put on the Index in 1860), Johann Scotus Erigena (1859), Das Papstthum u. d. Staat (1870), Geschichte des Jesuitenordens (1873). He also took part in the composition of Janus (1869), and wrote Quirinus (1870). See his Life by ZIRNGIEBL, München, 1881.

HUBER, Samuel, b. at Burgdorf, near Berne, 1547; d. at Osterwiek, in Hanover, March 23, 1624; studied theology, and was appointed pastor of his native parish. He inclined very strongly toward Lutheranism; and, being of a very combative temperament, he caught at every opportunity of attacking Beza, Musculus, and the other leaders of the Reformed Church, especially on the question of predestination. The result was, that he was deposed from his office, and banished from the country, June 28, 1588. At Tübingen, whither he repaired, he openly embraced Lutheranism; and in 1592 he was made professor of theology at Wittenberg. But there, too, he fell out with his colleagues. He would make no distinction between dilectio and electio, but taught a universalism which scandalized the Lutherans. Jan. 18, 1595, he was once more deposed, and banished from the country. The rest of his life he spent wandering from place to place, in very depressed circumstances. A complete list of his works, among which his Anti-Bellarminus (1607) occupies the principal place, is found in J. A. SCHMID: Dissert. de S. H., Helmstädt, 1708. See also Acta Huberiana, Tübingen, 1597, and Acta Huberiana, ed. Götze, Lübeck, 1707.

HUBERINUS, Caspar, b. at Wilsbach, Bavaria, Dec. 21, 1500; d. at Oehringen, Oct. 6, 1553; was a monk, when in 1525 he began to preach the Reformation in Augsburg, and became evangelical pastor there in 1528, and in 1544 superintendent at Oehringen. He published several collections of sermons.

HUBERT, St., son of Bertrand, Duke of Guienne, and a passionate hunter; was converted by meeting a stag which bore a cross between his antlers, and became bishop of Liège in 708. He died in 727; and his remains were afterwards deposited in the monastery of Audoin, which bears his name. See GRANGES: Vie de saint Hubert, Moulins, 1873.

HÜBMAIER, or, as he used to write the name himself, HÜBMÖR, Balthasar, b. at Friedberg, near Augsburg, 1480; d. in Vienna (burnt at the stake) March 10, 1528; studied theology and philosophy at Freiburg under Eck, and was appointed professor of theology at Ingolstadt in 1512, and preacher at the cathedral of Ratisbon in 1519. From the latter position he was removed in 1522, suspected of favoring the Reformation; and, as soon as he had become settled as preacher of Waldshut, he entered into communication with Zwingli, and openly embraced the reformed faith. At the same time he made the acquaintance of Th. Münzer; and when, in 1525, he published his Von dem christlichen Tauf der Gläubigen, it became apparent that he had adopted the Anabaptist views. Expelled from Waldshut by the Austrians, he fled to Zürich, but was imprisoned there, and compelled to recant April 6, 1526. He afterwards retracted the recantation, and settled in Moravia, where he found many adherents, and developed a great activity, preaching and writing; but when, after the death of King Lewis of Hungary, Moravia fell to Ferdinand of Austria, Hübmaier was dragged to Vienna, and executed. Calvary, in his Mit. aus dem Antiquariate (vol. i., Berlin, 1870), gives a picture of the man and a complete list of his works. CUNITZ.

HUC, Evariste Régis, b. at Toulouse, Aug. 1, 1813; d. in Paris, March 31, 1860; entered the Congregation of St. Lazarus, and went in 1839 to China as a missionary. In 1849 he returned, and published Voyage dans la Tartarie, le Thibet et la Chine (Paris, 1850; translated into English, London, 1851, New York, 1853), L'Empire Chinois (Paris, 1854; translated into English, New York, 1855), and Le Christianisme en Chine, en Tartarie, et au Thibet (Paris, 1857).

HUCBALD, b. in the middle of the ninth century; d. 930; was director first of the cloister-school of St. Amand in Flanders, then of the cathedral-school of Rheims. He wrote two treatises on music, which occupy a prominent place in the history of music, some biographies of saints, which are of historical value, and a poem. See G. NISARD: Hucbald, Paris, 1867.

HUET, François, b. at Villeau, in the department of Eure-et-Loir, Dec. 26, 1814; d. in Paris, July 1, 1869; was for several years professor of philosophy at Ghent, but lost that position by the persecutions of the Ultramontanists; became tutor to Prince Milan of Serbia, and published Recherches sur la vie et les ouvrages d'Henri de Gaud, 1838; Le Cartésianisme, 1843, 2 vols.; Le règne social du Christianisme, 1853; Essais de réforme catholique, 1856, in connection with Bordas-Demoulin; La Révolution religieuse au 19me siècle, 1866.

HUET, Pierre Daniel, b. at Caen, Feb. 8, 1630; d. in Paris, Jan. 26, 1721; was one of the teachers of the young dauphin, and was in 1689 made bishop of Avranches, but resigned in 1699, and devoted himself for the rest of his life exclusively to literature. He published a celebrated edition of Origen, 2 vols. folio, 1668. Of his original works, the principal are Demonstratio evangelica, 1679; Censura philosophia cartesiana, 1689; Quæstiones Aluctanae, 1690; etc. See BARTHOLMESS: Huet, ou le scepticisme théologique, 1850.

HUG, Johann Leonard, Roman-Catholic biblical scholar; b. at Constanz, June 1, 1765; d. at Freiburg, South Germany, March 11, 1846. After a brilliant career in the university of Freiburg, he became (1787) superintendent of the studies in the seminary for the training of priests in connection with the university, and in 1791 professor of the Oriental languages of the Old Testament, and (1792) of the New Testament. The remainder of his life was laboriously spent in the service of his beloved university; although his great reputation induced calls to Breslau, Cologne, Tübingen, and Bonn (three times). It was Hug's great service to oppose the Semler school of New Testament, particularly of gospel, interpretation. Hug held firmly to the historicity of the New-Testament writings, and on this basis vigorously defended them. He is chiefly remembered by his Einleitung in die Schriften des neuen Testaments, Stuttgart u. Tübingen, 1808, 2 vols., later editions, 1821, 1826, 1847, French (partial) translation by J. E. Cellerier, Geneva, 1823, English translation by Wait, London, 1827, and by Fosdick, with notes by Moses Stuart, Andover, 1836. In this work he advocates the theory, that up to the middle of the third century the New-Testament text existed only in a common edition (κοινὴ ἔκδοσις), which was subsequently revised by Hesychius, Lucian of Antioch, and by Origen. (See the discussion of this theory by Tregelles, in Horne's Introduction, 14th ed., vol. iv. pp. 78-87, and by Scrivener, Introduction, 2d ed., pp. 458-460.) Among other noteworthy writings by Hug is his new interpretation of the Canticles, given in Das hohe Lied in einer noch unversuchten Deutung (Freiburg, 1813) and Schutzschrift für seine Deutung des hohen Liedes und derselben weitere Erläuterung (Freiburg, 1818). According to him, the bride is of the kingdom of the ten tribes; the bridegroom is King Hezekiah; the brothers of Shulamith are a party in the house of Judah; the whole is "a representation, clothed in idyllic form, of the longing felt by the kingdom of the ten tribes for re-union with Judah, but which those 'brothers' opposed." (See Zöckler, in Lange's Commentary, American edition, Introduction to the Song of Solomon, p. 32.) For a full account of Hug, see AD. MAIER: Gedächtnissrede auf Hug, Freiburg, 1847.

HUGHES, John, first archbishop of New York; b. at Annalaghan, Ireland, June 24, 1797; d. in New-York City, Jan. 3, 1864. He emigrated in 1817; entered the Mount St. Mary's Catholic College at Emmitsburg, Frederick County, Md., 1820; ordained priest 1826, and settled in Philadelphia, where he remained until 1837, when he was appointed co-adjutor bishop of New York, and consecrated Jan. 7, 1838. In 1842, on the death of Bishop Dubois, he became titular bishop; in 1850 the see of New York was raised to metropolitan rank, and he went to Rome to receive the pallium at the hands of the Pope. In 1847 he delivered before both houses of Congress, and at their request, a discourse upon Christianity, the only source of moral, social, and political regeneration. On Aug. 5, 1855, he laid the corner-stone of the cathedral on Fifth Avenue, which was dedicated May 25, 1879. In November, 1861, in company with Mr. Thurlow Weed, he made a semi-official journey to Europe, at the request of Secretary Seward, in order to secure the friendly neutrality of European nations, especially of France. In July, 1863, he addressed, as he supposed, the rioters, from the balcony of his house, Madison Avenue, corner 36th Street; but the great crowd which had collected, although Roman Catholic and Irish, was probably not riotous. Bishop Hughes played a more prominent part in America than any other Roman Catholic of his day, and enjoyed a great deal of general respect and popularity. He was, however, a determined Romanist, bent upon securing the destruction of the public schools and the support by the public money of Roman-Catholic schools. He was ever ready to defend himself and his church. He had memorable encounters with Dr. John Breckinridge in 1833 and 1835 (subsequently published, Philadelphia, 1833 and 1836), before the Common Council of New-York City (1839), in 1847-48 with Dr. Nicolas Murray (Kirwan), whose letters were published and widely circulated in several languages, and with Erastus Brooks, editor of the New York Express, 1855. One of his acts as bishop was to remove the lay trustees of church property, and to secure the titles in his own name. In this way he stopped litigation, which had brought Romanists into disrepute. He established (1841) St. John's College at Fordham, Westchester County, N. Y. See his Works, edited by L. Kehoe, New York, 1864-65, and his Life by J. K. G. Hassard, New York, 1866.

HUGHES, Joseph, D.D., a Baptist minister, b. in London, Jan. 1, 1769; d. there Oct. 12, 1833. He proceeded M.A. at Aberdeen, 1790; he participated in the formation of the Religious Tract Society (1799), and of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804); was the first secretary to each of these organizations, and faithfully and ably discharged his duties. See his Memoir, by LEIFCHILD, London, 1834, and BIBLE SOCIETIES, p. 260.

HUGO OF AMIENS, b. at Amiens, towards the close of the eleventh century; d. at Rouen, Nov. 11, 1164; entered the monastery of Cluny in 1113; was elected Archbishop of Rouen in 1129; took a prominent part in political and ecclesiastical life, and wrote Dialogi Theologici (printed in MARTENE, Thesaurus, vol. ii.), and Contra Hæreticas, printed as an appendix to the works of Guibert de Nogent, in the edition of D'Achery.

HUGO OF LINCOLN, b. about 1135, at Avalon, Burgundy; d. in London, Nov. 19, 1200; entered the monastery of the Grande Chartreuse; was afterwards invited to England by Henry II. to establish the first Carthusian monastery in England, at Witham, and was made Archbishop of Lincoln in 1186. He was canonized about twenty years after his death. See PERRY: Life of St. Hugh of Avalon, 1879.

HUGO OF ST. CHER (De Sancto Caro), also called Hugo de St. Theodorico, was b. at St. Cher, a suburb of Vienne in Dauphiné; studied theology and canon law in Paris; entered the Dominican order in 1224; was made a cardinal by Innocent IV. in 1245; and d. at Orvieto in 1263. He was a learned man, took an active part in the controversy between William of St. Amour and the mendicant orders, and was a member of the committee formed to examine the Introductorius in Evangelium æternum by Gerhard. His own works, however, are those of a collector rather than those of an author. His Postilla in universa Biblia gives short explanations—literal, allegorical, mystical, and moral—of the single words, and contains many curious things. But his Sacrorum Bibliorum Concordantia, also called Concordantia S. Jacobi (because he was aided by monks from the Dominican monastery of St. Jacob), or Concordantia Anglicana (because the quotations were afterwards written out by English monks residing in Paris), became the model for all following works of the kind. Many works bearing his name are still extant in manuscript; but it is doubtful whether they belong to him. See QUÉTIF ET ECHARD: Scriptores ordinis prædicatorum, l. 194 sq.

HUGO OF ST. VICTOR, with his contemporaries Abelard and Bernard, one of the most influential theologians of the twelfth century; was b. about 1097; d. Feb. 11, 1141. He gave himself up to a contemplative conventual life, and shone in consequence of piety and speculative thought, rather than of active participation in the ecclesiastical affairs of his day. He must be regarded as the real founder of the mediæval mysticism of France, for Bernard of Clairvaux is dependent upon him for the essential features of his mystical speculations. The same may be affirmed of Peter Lombard. After-generations gave him the title of Didascalus ("teacher"), or Alter Augustinus ("the second Augustine"). Two localities claim the honor of being Hugo's birthplace,—the vicinage of Ypres in Flanders, and Saxony. The Benedictines, in vol. xii. of the Hist. littér. de la France, bring forward three testimonies from old authors in favor of the former. But there are weightier testimonies for Saxony. His tombstone declared Hugo to be of Saxon birth (origine Saxo). This view easily explains his attendance upon the cloistral school of Hamersleben in 1115. To these must be added the testimonies of early Saxon writers who speak of Hugo as belonging to the families of Von Blankenburg and Regenstein in the Hartz Mountains. After passing through the school at Hamersleben, he went with his uncle, archdeacon Hugo of Halberstadt, to France, and entered the famous cloistral institution of St. Victor, near Paris. Fifteen years afterward he was made preceptor of the school,—a position which he continued to fill for eight years. Among his scholars were the afterwards celebrated Adam and Richard of St. Victor. Hugo stood in intimate relations with Bernard, but took no prominent part in the public affairs of Church and State. He was of delicate and sickly constitution.

Hugo's writings are quite numerous. Those of a more mystical tendency belong to his earlier period. Among these are the three tracts,—De Arca Morali, De Arca Mystica, and De Vanitate Mundi,—in which he compares Noah's ark with the church, the soul in this world with the soul at peace with God, etc. His exegetical works are confined to no single period of his life. They have only a homiletical interest, and are the least original of his writings. They include a short Introduction to the Scriptures, Commentaries on the Pentateuch, and the other historical books of the Old Testament, on the Psalms and Lamentations, and nineteen Homilies on Ecclesiastes. The other commentaries ascribed to him (Luke, John, etc.) are of very doubtful authenticity. To the last period of Hugo's life belong his three most valuable works. The Eruditio Didascalica is encyclopedic, and treats in three books of the natural sciences, and in an equal number gives a sort of introduction to church history and the Scriptures. Leaning upon the authority of Jerome, he distinguishes in this second section sharply between the canon and the Apocrypha, but nevertheless seems to give to the writings of the church fathers an equal authority with the canonical books.

The other two works of the last period (the Summa Sententiarum and the De Sacramentis Christ. Fidei) give the outline of Hugo's theological views. In the latter he defines his relation to Abelard, to whom, and Anselm, he is under obligations for some of his speculations. The works of God he treats under Works of Creation, and Works of Restoration. He discusses the Trinity and the three fundamental divine attributes, — power, wisdom, and love. In the treatment of the origin of evil, he is far from the superfluous subtleties of the scholastics of a later period. Original sin he agrees, with Melancthon, to consist in ignorance and concupiscence. He mentions five sacraments, — baptism, the Eucharist, confirmation, extreme unction, and marriage. They confer grace. In the three sections on eschatology he commends prayers to the saints.

HUGUENOTS, a designation given to the Reformed, or Calvinists, of France. The origin of the word is involved in great obscurity. The French Protestants received at different times a variety of names, applied, for the most part, in derision; such as Lutherans, Sacramentarians, Christaudins, Parpaillots, "those of the pretended reformed religion," or simply "those of the religion," "religionnaires," etc. It was not until the time of the Tumult of Amboise, 1560, that the term "Huguenot" came into general use. Among the many explanations of the word that have been offered, only three need be mentioned. It has been derived from the German Eidgenossen ("confederates"), — a designation borne by the patriotic party in Geneva a quarter of a century earlier. This view was naturally a favorite one with those writers who represented the Huguenots as secret conspirators against the crown. Against it may be urged the difficulty of accounting for the transfer of the name from Geneva to the Valley of the Loire, the length of time that elapsed before the alleged re-appearance of the word, and the preference given by Beza, in the history written by him or under his supervision, in Geneva, for another derivation. Less plausible is the explanation offered by some of the Reformed themselves, who maintained that they were called Huguenots because they loyally advocated the cause of the descendants of Hugh (Hugues) Capet, as against the pretensions of the Guises, who claimed descent from Charlemagne. A sufficient answer to this is that the word "Huguenot" was unquestionably, in its origin, a term of reproach, the application of which was resented as a gross insult, and that the king was petitioned to forbid its use. A third explanation is given by Etienne Pasquier, in one of whose letters the word first occurs, and who may be regarded as our best authority. It arose, he says, in Tours, from a popular superstition that a hobgoblin, known as le roy Hugon, or Hugon, nightly roamed the streets of the city; whence the Protestants, who, from fear of persecution, dared not to meet save under cover of the darkness, came to be called Huguenots. It is an additional point in favor of this interpretation, that Pasquier affirms that he heard the Protestants called Huguenots, by certain friends of his living at Tours, eight or nine years before the Tumult of Amboise.

The history of the Huguenots in the kingdom of France may be considered under five periods: the period of persecution under the forms of law until the first recognition of the Reformed religion in the edict of January (1562); the civil wars under Charles IX., culminating in the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day (1572); the struggle to secure full toleration in the reigns of Henry III. and Henry IV., down to the proclamation of the Edict of Nantes (1598); the period that closes with the disastrous revocation of that edict by Louis XIV. (1685); and the period of the entire proscription of Protestantism, ending with the publication of the Edict of Toleration by Louis XVI. (1787), just before the first French Revolution.

I. THE PERIOD OF PERSECUTION UNDER THE FORMS OF LAW (1512-62). — The Reformation in France may be regarded as dating from 1512, when a professor in the University of Paris, the learned Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples, in a Latin commentary upon the Epistles of St. Paul, clearly enunciated the doctrine of justification by faith. In 1516 William Briçonnet, a patron of letters and an advocate of a moderate reformation, was appointed Bishop of Meaux. He soon gathered about him a group of scholars, including Lefèvre and his pupil William Farel, Martial Mazurier, Gérard Roussel, and others, by whom the gospel was preached with much fervor in the churches of his diocese. In 1523 Lefèvre published a French translation of the New Testament, and in 1528 a translation of the Old Testament. This version, made from the Latin Vulgate, served as a basis of the subsequent version of Olivetanus, the first French translation from the original Greek and Hebrew. The resolution of Bishop Briçonnet having given way before threats of persecution, the open reformatory movement of Meaux was brought to an end by the dispersion of the teachers whom he had invited, although the seeds of truth they had scattered lost none of their vitality.

At first, under the influence of his sister, the cultivated Margaret, Duchess of Angoulême, Francis I. showed a disposition to favor the Reformation. This arose, however, rather from a taste for learning, and ambition to earn distinction as a patron of the revival of letters, than from any hearty sympathy with the doctrinal views of the reformers. Moreover, the immense ecclesiastical patronage which he secured by means of the concordat entered into with Leo X., made it important to his material interests that he should remain on good terms with the Papacy. The active participation of Francis I. in the persecution of the Protestants dates from the "affair of the placards" (1534), when a violent handbill against the papal mass was found posted upon the door of the king's bed-chamber in the Castle of Amboise. In connection with the great expiatory procession, soon after instituted (January, 1535), six Protestants were burned alive before the king's eyes, and Francis declared his purpose to extirpate heresy from his dominions. He would, he said, cut off his own arm were it infected with this poison.

The executions that followed for some months were the first serious attempt at persecution; although some distinguished victims, such as the learned and noble Louis de Berquin, had suffered earlier. Legislation became more systematically severe. In 1545 took place the Massacre of Mérindol and Cabrières. Twenty-two towns and villages on the River Durance, inhabited by French Waldenses of the same stock with the Waldenses of Piedmont, were destroyed by an armed expedition fitted out at Aix with the sanction of the Parliament of Provence. The next year witnessed the martyrdom of the "Fourteen of Meaux."

During the reign of Henry II., the bigoted and licentious son of Francis (1547-59), Protestantism grew steadily, despite the most earnest attempts to destroy it. The centre of the reformatory movement was Geneva, whence John Calvin exerted, by means of his books and his immense correspondence, as well as indirectly through his former pupils, an influence that was almost incredible. Stringent laws against the importation of any books from Geneva accomplished nothing. In 1555 an attempt to introduce the Spanish Inquisition failed in consequence of the enlightened and determined resistance of the Parliament of Paris, with President Séguier at its head. In the same year an expedition, under the patronage of Admiral Coligny, set sail for Brazil, where it was hoped that a home for the persecuted might be found; but the scheme failed through the treachery of Villegagnon.

The Protestants increased greatly in numbers during the last years of Henry's life. Of this fact a proof was given in the public psalm-singing by great crowds in Paris itself. One of the chief motives of the king in concluding a disgraceful peace with Spain was avowedly that Henry might have leisure to devote himself to the extermination of the Protestants. Six weeks before the fatal tournament in which the monarch lost his life, the first national synod of the French Reformed churches met secretly in Paris (May 26, 1559). It adopted a confession of faith which was thereafter the standard of the Protestant French-speaking communities. It also established, in its "ecclesiastical discipline," a representative form of church government, with its courts, consistory, provincial colloquy or synod, and national synod. During the succeeding hundred years twenty-eight more national synods were held. After 1659, the government refused to permit any further national synods to be convened.

The brief reign of Francis II., a youth of only sixteen years of age (1559-60), was eventful. The execution of Anne du Bourg, a counsellor of Parliament, distinguished for ability and for singular purity of character, contributed more to advance Protestantism in France, and to exasperate liberal-minded men with the prevailing tyranny, than any previous acts of cruelty. Through the pusillanimity of Antoine of Bourbon, King of Navarre, the first prince of the blood, the entire control of affairs had been suffered to fall into the hands of the two uncles of the young Queen of France, Mary of Scots,—Charles, Cardinal of Lorraine; and Francis, Duke of Guise. The Protestants had borne persecution with exemplary patience, so long as it was inflicted by their legitimate sovereign. They were less inclined to submit to the usurped power of the Guises, who abused the authority of a king as immature in mind as he was feeble in body. Their impatience was shared by a large number of patriotic Frenchmen, not Protestants, who refused to bear the rule of a family regarded by them as foreign. The Tumult of Amboise (1560) was the result of an attempt to seize the obnoxious ministers, and to give the king more constitutional advisers. The Prince of Condé, youngest brother of the King of Navarre, was the secret head of the movement, which, though unsuccessful, led the Guises, in the terror of the moment, to consent (March, 1560) to an edict of amnesty for the past, with no provision for the toleration of Protestantism in future. At the assembly of notables at Fontainebleau (August, 1560), Admiral Coligny presented, in behalf of the Huguenots, petitions for liberty of worship; and two prelates, Archbishop Marillac and Bishop Montluc, openly advocated the assembling of a national council to heal the malady of the church.

The opportune death of Francis II. (December, 1560) not only saved the life of the Prince of Condé, whom the Guises had succeeded in enticing to Orleans, and who had been tried by a commission, and sentenced to be beheaded, but frustrated a larger plot for the extermination of the Huguenots. Under Charles IX., a boy of ten, the tolerant policy of Chancellor L'Hôpital for a time prevailed. The Colloquy of Poissy was held (September, 1561), at which the Huguenots for the first time enjoyed the opportunity of vindicating their religious views in the presence of the king. Theodore Beza and Peter Martyr were the chief speakers on the Protestant side, and the Cardinal of Lorraine was the most prominent advocate of the Roman Catholics. On the 17th of January, 1562, the famous edict known as the "Edict of January" was published. It embodied the first formal recognition of the Protestant religion, to whose adherents it conceded the liberty to meet for worship, without arms, in all places outside of the walled towns.

The Edict of January was the Magna Charta of Huguenot rights. Its violation was the fruitful source of a long period of civil commotion: for a whole generation the exertions of the Huguenots were directed almost solely to the maintenance or recovery of its provisions.

II. THE CIVIL WARS UNDER CHARLES IX., AND THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY (1562-74).— Scarcely had the edict been signed, when the unprovoked Massacre of Vassy, perpetrated by the Duke of Guise upon an assembly of Protestant worshippers, gave the signal for the first civil war (1562-63). Admiral Coligny and the Prince of Condé were the Huguenot leaders: Constable Montmorency, the Duke of Guise, and Marshal Saint André were the principal Roman-Catholic generals. The war raged over a great part of France, with various successes on both sides. Both Montmorency and Condé were taken prisoners; and St. André was killed at the battle of Dreux, where the Huguenots met with defeat. The murder of Duke Francis of Guise, by a fanatic named Poltrot, was closely followed by the conclusion of the Peace of Amboise. Instead of unrestricted worship outside of town-walls throughout France, the Huguenots were now allowed to meet in the suburbs of a single town in every bailiwick, and in certain cities that remained in their possession at the conclusion of the peace. A few noblemen had the right to have service in their own castles.

In 1565 the Conference of Bayonne was held between Catharine de' Medici, and the king her son, on the one side, and the Duke of Alva on the other. At this meeting it has been generally, but erroneously, supposed that the plan of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day, executed seven years later, was traced or even agreed upon. A second civil war (1567-68) soon broke out, but it was of short duration. The third civil war (1568-70) was a more sanguinary struggle. The Huguenots were defeated in the two pitched battles of Jarnac and Moncontour, in the former of which, Louis, Prince of Condé, was killed. But the admirable generalship of Coligny not only saved the Huguenots from destruction, but enabled them to secure favorable terms of peace.

Two years of quiet followed, and there seemed to be a fair prospect that the wounds inflicted by the internecine contest might soon heal. Henry, King of Navarre, was married to Margaret of Valois, youngest sister of Charles IX. In the midst of the festivities attending the occasion, Coligny was wounded by an assassin. This event was followed within forty-eight hours by the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day (Sunday, Aug. 24, 1572). By this blow the attempt was made to annihilate the Huguenots, whom their enemies had been unable to destroy in honorable combat. Coligny and many of the most distinguished leaders, together with multitudes of their brethren in the faith, were mercilessly butchered. The number of victims in Paris and throughout the rest of the kingdom has been estimated variously at from twenty thousand to one hundred thousand. (See BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, MASSACRE OF ST.)

defended La Rochelle with success against the king, but obtained honorable terms of peace.

III. THE STRUGGLE TO SECURE FULL TOLERATION, IN THE REIGNS OF HENRY III. AND HENRY IV., TO THE EDICT OF NANTES (1574-98).— A fifth civil war, begun a few weeks before the accession of Henry III., lasted until the new king became convinced that it was a hopeless undertaking to reduce his Protestant subjects, re-enforced as they were by a strong German auxiliary army. The peace now conceded, commonly known as "La Paix de Monsieur" (Edict of Beaulieu, May, 1576), was ostensibly more advantageous than any previously granted to the Huguenots; since it authorized the celebration of their worship everywhere in France outside of Paris, without exception as to time or place, unless the nobleman upon whose lands it was proposed to hold it should object.

The very liberality of the new pacification led to its speedy overthrow. At the instigation of the Roman-Catholic clergy and of the Guises, the Holy and Christian League sprang up in various parts of France, having for its avowed object the extirpation of heresy. At the meeting of the States-General at Blois, the king was induced to proclaim himself head of the league. Hence arose the sixth civil war, which lasted only a few months, since the king found the states unwilling to supply him the means of carrying on hostilities. The new peace (Edict of Poitiers, September, 1577) re-introduced discriminations as to the cities wherein Protestant worship might be held, and the noblemen entitled to have services in their castles. As in the previous peace, eight cities were placed in Protestant hands as pledges of its faithful execution, and mixed courts were instituted to adjudicate cases in which the parties belonged to different religions.

For eight years, with the exception of a few months covered by the unimportant seventh civil war, otherwise known as "La Guerre des Amoureux" (1580), the peace was unbroken; although there was no lack of surprises of cities and other infractions of the treaty.

In 1584 the king's only brother died. As Henry III. was childless, Henry of Bourbon, the Huguenot King of Navarre, became heir to the throne of France. The prospect that a "heretic" might succeed gave new life to the league. The Guises, with the support of Philip II., made war upon Henry III., and after a struggle, in which the Huguenots took no part, compelled the reluctant monarch to proscribe the Protestant religion by the Edict of Nemours (July, 1585).

The eighth civil war followed (1585-89). The most noted action was the battle of Coutras (1587), in which the Roman Catholics, under the Duke of Joyeuse, were defeated by the Huguenot troops of Henry of Navarre; the duke himself being killed in the engagement. This was the first pitched battle ever won by the Huguenots; and it made so deep an impression upon their enemies, that the very sight of the Protestant soldiers kneeling before joining battle, as they had done at Coutras, struck terror into the hearts of the Roman-Catholic soldiers in subsequent engagements. The murder of Henry, Duke of Guise, and of his brother, the Cardinal of Guise, at the second States of Blois (December, 1588), was followed, a few months subsequently, by a truce between Henry III. and Henry of Navarre. The assassination of Henry III. (August, 1589) brought Henry of Navarre, a Protestant prince, to the throne of France, under the title of Henry IV.

In the wars in which this king was engaged for years against the League, backed by the money and troops of Philip II., he enjoyed the hearty support of the Huguenots. After his insincere abjuration in 1593 (see HENRY IV.), their position was in some respects less favorable than it had been under the Valois kings; since they had lost their nominal leader and the "protector" of their churches. After a long and vexatious delay, the king fulfilled his promise, and undertook to determine the civil status of the Protestants by a law which was declared to be "perpetual and irrevocable." The Edict of Nantes (April, 1598) secured freedom of conscience throughout the kingdom, and recognized the right of the Protestants to meet for worship on the lands of noblemen entitled to exercise haute justice (there were about thirty-five hundred such), and in the places where Protestant worship had been conceded by the edict of 1577 and subsequent interpretative declarations. These and other concessions respecting the admission of the Reformed to civil offices, and to universities and schools, on equal terms with the Roman Catholics, the establishment of mixed courts, etc., made the edict the most important bulwark of Protestant rights.

IV. THE PERIOD FROM THE PUBLICATION TO THE REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES (1598-1685). — The edict of Henry IV. was, after his assassination (1610), solemnly confirmed by the successive declarations of the regent, Marie de' Medici, of Louis XIII. and Louis XIV. None the less had the Huguenots soon reason to complain of infractions of a vexatious character, for which no satisfaction could be obtained. The ruin of the Protestant churches of Bearn (1620), whither Louis XIII. proceeded in person, and violently re-established the supremacy of the Roman-Catholic hierarchy, led to a Huguenot uprising. This was of brief duration; but in 1625 hostilities were renewed. The Protestants being no match for the forces of the king, the fall of La Rochelle (1628), after a vigorous siege conducted by Cardinal Richelieu, marked the close of the war and the end of the political importance of the Huguenots as a power in the State.

Meantime never were the Huguenots intellectually more active. Their worship in the neighborhood of Paris, after having been fixed at the village of Ablon, a spot both distant, and difficult of access (see ABLON), had been brought to the nearer and more convenient Charenton. This place became the centre of a powerful religious and philosophical influence that made itself felt in the capital of the kingdom and at the royal court. The number of eminent writers and preachers was great. In different parts of the kingdom not less than six theological seminaries, or "academies," had been instituted, of which those of Saumur, Montauban, and Sedan, were the most important.

Although the violations of the spirit and even the letter of the Edict of Nantes had been frequent, it was not until after the death of Cardinal Mazarin (1661), that the process of restriction, whose logical conclusion could only be the complete repeal of Henry IV.'s ordinance, may be said distinctly to have begun. From this time forward, the Huguenots, although they had been highly praised by the monarch himself more than once for their loyalty to the crown at the time of the troubles of the "Fronde," were allowed little rest. Vexatious regulations successively deprived them of their places of worship, excluded them from one employment after another, or, under the forms of law, robbed them of their property, and even the possession of their children. As the time for the last act approached, the terrible dragonnades were set on foot to compel the abjuration of those whose constancy rational persuasion had been powerless to shake. At length (October, 1685), on the pretence that his measures had proved successful, and that the reformed religion no longer existed in his dominions, Louis XIV. signed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. No exercise of the Protestant religion was to be tolerated in France. All ministers of the gospel were to leave the kingdom within a fortnight. No other persons could emigrate, under penalty of the galleys for men, of imprisonment and confiscation of property for women. More cruel than the infamous "League" itself, the Edict of Revocation shut up the French Protestants as in a prison, punishing inexorably all attempts at escape.

V. FROM THE REVOCATION TO THE EDICT OF TOLERATION (1685-1787). — In spite of the prohibition contained in the Edict of Revocation, the immediate effect was a great increase in the number of French Protestants that fled into foreign lands. The total number cannot be definitely ascertained. It has been estimated as high as eight hundred thousand; but this figure is undoubtedly excessive, the number probably not being over three hundred thousand to four hundred thousand. The exodus included the most industrious and thrifty part of the population. For a hundred years the Protestants that remained in France enjoyed only such rare and precarious means of edification as were afforded by the so-called "Assemblies of the Desert," — meetings in secluded spots remote from the towns, or in the bleak region of the Cevennes Mountains. Attendance on these gatherings was a grave offence; and the venturesome minister incurred, if apprehended, the punishment of being broken upon the wheel. So late as Feb. 19, 1762, a minister named Rochette was beheaded, by authority of the Parliament of Toulouse, for the sole crime of having preached, performed marriages, and administered the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. In 1767, for the same offence, another minister, Berenger, was condemned to death, and executed in effigy.

The episode of the war of the Camisards, which lasted from 1702-5, has been treated elsewhere. (See CAMISARDS.)

At length, yielding to the force of public opinion, Louis XVI. published (November, 1787) the Edict of Toleration. This document still declared that "the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion alone shall continue to enjoy public worship." But it authorized the registry of Protestant births, marriages, and deaths, and forbade that the Protestants should in any way be disturbed because of their faith.

The National Assembly, in 1790, took steps for the restoration of the confiscated property of Protestant refugees. The law of the eighteenth Germinal Year X. (1802) organized the Reformed and Lutheran churches, whose pastors were henceforth paid by the State.

The Huguenot Refugees. The Huguenots, driven from France by persecution, were welcomed by all the countries to which they turned their steps. All the Protestant lands of Europe were glad to enrich their trade and manufactures by the accession of the most intelligent and industrious class of the French population. The very name "Huguenot," having acquired an honorable association, became a passport to favor.

Switzerland, "destined by Providence to be a land of refuge," had been the resort of persecuted Frenchmen from the beginning of the Reformation. The Huguenot fugitives increased greatly after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day; while the persecution culminating in the Revocation brought in so large a number, that the resources of the hospitable cantons were taxed to the utmost to provide for their sustenance. Many of the fugitives from the earlier persecutions returned to France when the storm had partially spent its fury: others, particularly after the Revocation, made Switzerland only the first stage in their retreat. These passed on, after a time, to Württemberg, Hesse, Brandenburg, and other parts of Germany, whose rulers saw in the Huguenot peasants and artisans the very persons whom they needed for the regions depopulated by the Thirty-Years' War.

In the very month in which Louis XIV. signed at Fontainebleau the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the elector, Frederick William of Brandenburg, signed at Potsdam an edict by which not only was warm sympathy expressed, but great inducements were held forth to all Huguenots that might desire to settle in his dominions. Provision was made both for the safety and for the expenses of the refugees in reaching their destination. Despite strenuous efforts on the part of the French Government to suppress or discredit it, copies of the Potsdam edict were circulated in every part of France, and crowds of Huguenots found their way to Frankfort-on-the-Main. Here they were met by agents of the elector, and were generously helped on their way. An important French colony sprang up in Berlin, which still maintains a distinctive existence. Many families of Huguenot origin have, however, become thoroughly German in character, even the names having been translated or modified to suit the German ear. It has been remarked, that, in the Franco-German war of 1870-71, many of the officers of the victorious army of invasion were descendants of those whom the intolerant policy of Louis XIV. compelled to expatriate themselves.

In Holland the Huguenot refugees were treated with great kindness. Not only was a public fast instituted when the tidings of the Revocation came, but valuable political concessions were made. Utrecht conferred on the refugees the freedom of the city, and exemption from imposts for twelve years. Middleburg in Zealand relieved them of the burden of taxation for ten years.

General collections were made for their relief, in which Lutherans, Anabaptists, and even Roman Catholics, took part. The exiled pastors, two hundred and fifty in number, were specially cared for. Military men secured positions in the army, with ample pay, and promise of promotion. But all the fugitives were not poor. Some brought to their adopted country large fortunes; for as early as the last months of 1685 it was reported that twenty million livres had been carried out of France by those who were regarded as among the wealthiest merchants of the land. Holland was greatly enriched intellectually, as well as in a material point of view. Basnage, Benoit, DuBosc, and Martin were among the scholars she gained from France. The refugees settling on Dutch soil alone were estimated by Caveyrac at fifty-five thousand, and another Roman-Catholic source places them at seventy-five thousand, in the first year after the Revocation. In 1709, the same year that Queen Anne gave letters of naturalization to all the refugees in England, the States of Holland and West Friesland took the same step. Other provinces followed the example, and in 1715 the States-General extended the same blessing to all the republic.

Northern Europe opened its doors to the fugitives. Despite the strong Lutheran sentiments of Denmark, the king, on hearing of the cruel dragonnades, in 1681 published a declaration offering the French refugees an asylum, the right to build churches, exemption from taxation for eight years, etc. In 1685 a new edict conferred upon French noble refugees the same distinctions that they had enjoyed at home, to officers a corresponding rank, and great inducements to manufacturers. Several flourishing colonies were established at different points. Sweden was less hospitable; but in Russia a ukase, signed by Peter and Ivan (1688), opened to the refugees all the provinces of the empire, and gave to officers employment in the army. Voltaire maintains that one-third of the regiment of twelve thousand formed by the Genevise Lefort for Peter was composed of French refugees.

While all the countries mentioned received a great accession of wealth from the industries brought with them by the fugitive Huguenots, it was England that profited most by the ill-judged act of Louis XIV. From the time of the pious Edward VI., the monarchs of that country, with the single exception of Mary, had been their allies and protectors. The French Church of London owed its origin (1550) to the kind offices of the Duke of Somerset and Archbishop Cranmer. In 1561, under Queen Elizabeth, a French church was founded at Canterbury for the Walloons, meeting in the crypts of the cathedral, as it continues to do to the present day. In 1676 it had a membership of twenty-five hundred communicants. Soon after, the French refugees proper went off and formed a new church. Before the Revocation, there had also arisen French churches at Sandwich, Norwich, Southampton, Glastonbury, Rye, and six or seven other places; while the old French church at the capital had been re-enforced by the Savoy, Marylebone, and Castle-street churches.

On the outbreak of the dragonnades, Charles II. issued (July 28, 1681) the proclamation of Hampton Court, welcoming the Huguenot refugees, promising to them letters of naturalization, and privileges for carrying on trade and manufactures. After the Revocation, James II. extended to them a similar invitation. M. Weiss estimates the number of Huguenots that fled to England, during the decade in which the Revocation fell, at eighty thousand persons, of whom about one-third settled in London. To the five earlier French churches of the metropolis there were added twenty-six new churches, almost all during the reigns of William and Mary, of Anne, and of George I. Eleven or twelve more sprang up in other parts of England. An order of council enjoined a general collection in favor of the refugees, from which a fund of about two hundred thousand pounds resulted. Nor were the services rendered by the Huguenots slight. In the army of William of Orange, when he marched against his father-in-law, there were three regiments of foot and a squadron of horse, composed exclusively of French Protestant refugees. To these troops, and to a strong element of French officers, — veterans of Condé and Turenne, seven hundred and thirty-six in number, — scattered through the rest of the army, the overthrow of the last Stuart king was in great part due. Schomberg, Ruvigny, and others distinguished themselves in the fresh warfare to which they were called, and both honored and benefited their adopted country. More important and lasting was the service done by the introduction of a number of new manufactures, until then but little known in England. For the first time, thanks to the Huguenots, the finer kinds of paper, of hats, and of glass, were made on British soil. Silks and satins were produced north of the Channel such as had previously come only from the looms of Lyons: in a word, the manufactures of England were built up at the expense of France. Even in an intellectual point of view, the influence of the refugees was great. We need only mention the names of Denis Papin, the first investigator of the principles of steam, and Rapin-Thoyras, whose History of England was without a rival until the appearance of the work of David Hume. Although, with the lapse of time, the refugees have become thoroughly merged in the population of the United Kingdom, there remain many historic traces of interest; such as the Hospital for Poor French Protestants and their Descendants residing in Great Britain, whose new and elegant building attracts the eye of the visitor.

The Huguenots in the United States. — The unfortunate attempt at colonization in Brazil has already been referred to. Equally fruitless was the undertaking, under the patronage of Admiral Coligny, to found a French Protestant settlement in Florida (1562). Greater success attended the subsequent emigration of the Huguenots, which, if it did not lead to the acquisition by France of an American empire, added much to the prosperity of the English colonial system. The Dutch in America were the first to profit by it. Long before the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the stream of Huguenot emigration set in toward New Netherland. The first band of settlers sent over (1623) by the Dutch West India Company consisted of thirty families, chiefly Walloons. These were the founders of the city of New Amsterdam (New York), where French was spoken, and the Huguenot faith was professed from the outset. Other Walloons and French settled at an early day on Long Island and Staten Island, and upon the banks of the Delaware, and in 1660 founded New Paltz on the Hudson. As the severities visited upon the Protestants in France increased, large numbers of refugees came to this country, establishing themselves in New York, in Boston, in Maryland, and Virginia, and in Charleston, S.C. Detachments from these bodies of immigrants settled in Oxford, Mass., Kingston, R.I., New Rochelle, N.Y., and on the Cooper and Santee Rivers, South Carolina. In all these places churches were organized, and ministers of the French Reformed Church officiated. The French settlements in Oxford, Mass., and Kingston, R.I., were soon broken up: the others continued for several generations to maintain a distinct character. The French church in Boston lasted until the year 1748, having for its pastors Pierre Daillé (1696–1715) and André Le Mercier (1716–48). The French congregation in New York, long flourishing and influential, had a succession of Reformed pastors, the last of whom submitted to Episcopal ordination in 1806, when the church adopted the Episcopal rite, and took the name of "L'Église du Saint Esprit." In New Rochelle, N.Y., two churches were maintained almost until the outbreak of the American Revolution, — the French Reformed Church, founded in 1688, and a French Episcopal Church, organized in 1709. In New Paltz the Dutch language superseded the French in public worship about the year 1735. Three of the four Huguenot congregations of South Carolina went out of existence, or became merged with neighboring English-speaking churches: the French church in Charleston alone survives to the present day, and uses an excellent liturgy.

No precise statement can be ventured as to the numbers of Huguenots that came to America; but it is certain that they must have reached several thousands. The influence of this element in moulding the character of the American people has been considerable, and out of all proportion to the extent of the immigration; and the prominence of Huguenot names in the roll of patriots, statesmen, philanthropists, ministers of the gospel, men of note in every calling in the United States, is a noticeable and significant fact.

HULSE, John, Rev., b. at Middlewich, Cheshire, Eng., 1708; d. there Dec. 14, 1790. He was educated at Cambridge, and bequeathed all his property to that university for the purpose of founding two scholarships, a Prize Essay, and the offices of Christian Advocate and Christian Preacher, or Hulsean Lecturer. The latter's duties, according to Mr. Hulse's will, were to deliver and print twenty sermons yearly, either upon the evidences of Christianity, or upon the difficulties of the Bible. But several changes have been made in the execution of this will. The Hulsean professorship was by statute substituted in 1860 for the Christian advocateship; in 1830 the number of annual lecture-sermons was reduced to eight, and again, still later, to four; and of the annual revenue (between eight hundred and nine hundred pounds) eight-tenths goes to the Hulsean professor, and one-tenth to the Hulsean prize man and lecturer respectively. See, for list of lectures, the art. LECTURES in the APPENDIX.

HULSEMANN, Johann, b. in Ostfriesland, 1602; d. at Leipzig, 1661; was appointed professor of theology at Wittenberg, 1629, and at Leipzig, 1646. His principal works are Calvinismus irconciliabilis, 1646, and Breviarium theologiae (which appeared in an enlarged form in 1655, — Extensio breviarii theologiae), and gives an interesting representation of orthodox Lutheran dogmatics.

HUMANIST, a term derived from the Ciceronian expression litera humaniores, was adopted as a name in the sixteenth century, and probably not without a side-glance to such terms as scholasticism, scientia sacra, etc., by those who, in the field of literature proper, represented the powerful movement of the Renaissance. Bursting forth everywhere, this movement produced everywhere a revolution. A new poetry, a new art, new methods of science, new maxims of morals, new political tendencies, followed in its steps; but its influence was, perhaps, nowhere more strikingly apparent than in the sphere of belles-lettres.

The humanists were literati, not theologians; teachers, not priests. The task with which they originally started was simply to restore the Latin language. Under the hands of the Roman-Catholic Church, and treated as badly by the barbarous subtlety of the schoolmen as by the barbarian ignorance of the monks, the Latin language had become a thing unspeakable; and it was as much indignation at its pitiful state, as enthusiasm for its former glory, which fired the Italians to attempt its restoration. The attempt succeeded; but, though other and quite different tasks presented themselves, the humanists never lost the character of being the philologists, grammarians, exegetes, and critics of their age; and their best work lies in that line. They made the study of Greek an indispensable element of scholarly education; they introduced the study of Hebrew: yea, even the development of the vernacular tongues received a powerful impulse from them. The Italian language was first written by its Latin scholars. Lebrija wrote the first Spanish grammar. In the schools of the Brethren of the Common Life and in the preaching of the German mystics, that language grew up which Luther fixed as the German. The inventor of the French style, Rabelais, was a humanist.

So far, no antagonism arose between the Church and the humanists, though it could not be long concealed that their greatest philological achievements—the Complutensian polyglot, the printing of the Greek text of the New Testament, etc.—were seized upon by the adversaries of Rome, and used as weapons against her. But after the language followed the authors, and after the authors their ideas. Gradually the humanist grew from a philologist into an historian, and from an historian into a philosopher. He studied not only classical language and literature, but also classical life and spirit. He claimed to know what belongs to man by nature (his faculties and his failings) and what concerns man by nature (his rights and his duties). His criticism of words became criticism of facts; and Laurentius Valla laughed at the donation of Constantine. His knowledge of history became political demands, and Reuchlin could not be made to submit to the Inquisition. A spirit got abroad extremely dangerous to the Roman Church, if not directly antagonistic.

Not to overrate, however, the influence which the humanists have exercised on the history of the Church, it must be noticed, that though they furnished the Reformers with arms, and seemed personally very favorably disposed to the Reformation, only few of them actually took part in the work. Erasmus retreated before the task; and, even with Melancthon in full sight, it is safe to say that the humanists would never have made the Reformation.

HUMANITARIANS, a name applied both to that school of Unitarians, or those anti-Trinitarians in general, who consider Christ a mere man (homo), and to such parties as profess the "religion of humanity," whose fundamental dogma is the spontaneous perfectibility of the human race without any superhuman aid.

HUME, David, b. at Edinburgh, April 26, 1711; d. there Aug. 26, 1776. He was the son of a member of the Faculty of Advocates, who passed his life as a country gentleman at the family-seat of Ninewells in the border country of Scotland. He entered Edinburgh University before he was twelve years of age, and was introduced to studies beyond the powers of one so young. He tells us, "I was seized very early with a passion for literature, which has been the ruling passion of my life." We have admirable accounts of his life: the one, My Own Life, calm as philosophy itself; the other by Mr. Hill Burton, who had access to the papers collected by Baron Hume, and deposited with the Royal Society of Edinburgh. The latter has published a remarkable letter written to an eminent physician by the young man at the very crisis of his being. It appears, that, for a time, he labored to find security and peace in philosophy. "Having read many books of morality, such as Cicero, Seneca, and Plutarch, and being smit with their beautiful representations of virtue and philosophy, I undertook the improvement of my temper and will, along with my reason and understanding. I was continually fortifying myself with reflections against death and poverty, and shame and pain, and all the other calamities of life." But in this attempt he utterly broke down.

Hating the study of law, to which he was destined by his friends, he was sent to Bristol to engage in business; but, finding the employment unsuitable to him, he went, at the age of twenty-three, to France, to engage in the observation of mankind and in the study of his favorite subjects. After living there for three years, he brought back with him his Treatise of Human Nature, the two first volumes of which were published in London in the end of 1738. "Never literary attempt was more unfortunate than my Treatise of Human Nature. It fell dead-born from the press, without reaching such distinction as even to create a murmur among zealots." But with indomitable perseverance, which was one of his most marked characteristics, he persevered in his life-work. Next year he published the third volume of his treatise, that on ethics, with no better success. In 1748 he cast the first part of his unfortunate treatise in a new form, Inquiry concerning Human Understanding. He now broke down his great work into smaller essays, which in due time commanded attention, such as his Essays, Moral and Political, and in 1752 his Political Discourses, which immediately attracted much attention, and his Inquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals, which he regarded as likely to be the most influential of all his works. [Our space does not admit of our giving a detailed account of his further life.] He held for five years the office of librarian to the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh, and here he commenced writing his History of England. In 1763 he was sent on the English embassy to Paris, where he was received with acclamation by the highest circles, literary and fashionable. He afterwards settled in Edinburgh, where he passed his remaining days, the centre of an eminent literary circle, and everywhere showing good nature. He left a posthumous work (Dialogues on Natural Religion), undermining all religion, natural and revealed.

He is usually called Hume the sceptic or atheist: had the word been coined in his day, he would have been called an agnostic. He does not avowedly deny any thing; he simply shows that we have no proof of its existence. It will be necessary to give a compend of his whole philosophy, as his scepticism can be met only by exposing it throughout. He thus opens his Treatise of Human Nature: "All the perceptions of the human mind resolve themselves into two distinct kinds, which I call impressions and ideas. The difference betwixt them consists in the degrees of force and liveliness with which they strike upon mind, and make their way into our thought or consciousness. Those perceptions which enter with most force and violence we may name impressions; and under this name I comprehend all our sensations, passions, and emotions, as they make their first appearance in the soul. By ideas I mean the faint images of these in thinking and reasoning: such, for instance, are all the perceptions exerted by the present discourse, excepting only the immediate pleasure or uneasiness they may occasion." In assuming these impressions, he does not assume a perceiving mind, or a thing perceived. Hume is to be met as Reid met him at this early stage. "I never catch myself at any time without a perception, and never can observe any thing but the perception." This very language implies more. He speaks of "mind" and "soul," and of the perceptions "striking on the mind," and of catching himself. What is this self which he catches? We never do observe a perception alone: we always observe it as perceiving. We should maintain that we are cognizant of a self perceiving and a thing perceived. He next treats of memory, in which the impressions come forth in their original order and position, and are now ideas. But in memory we have more than a mere reproduction of a sensation: we recognize it as having been before us in time past, and have thus a knowledge of ourselves in the past and the present, and an idea of time as a reality. He has a subtle discussion as to our ideas of space and time, and of points, lines, and surfaces, and argues that they have no objective reality. There follows a criticism of existence and knowledge; and he maintains that it is "impossible for us so much as to conceive or form an idea of any thing specifically different from ideas or impressions." He reaches the conclusion that we know nothing but phenomena or appearances, a conclusion unfortunately allowed by Kant. He is to be met by showing that we know not mere appearances, but things appearing.

He has an admirable sevenfold classification of relations, which he says may be divided into two classes, — into such as depend entirely on the ideas which we compare, and such as may be changed without any change in the ideas. In the first he places resemblance, contrariety, degree, quantity, which can never go beyond our impressions. The other three, identity, space and time, cause and effect, may seem to carry us farther; but this is an illusion. In identity, and in time and space, we can never go beyond what is immediately present to the senses, and so can never discover the real existence of the relation of objects; and so "tis only causation which produces such a connection as to give us assurance from the existence or action of one object that was followed or preceded by any other existence or action." He devotes the whole energy of his mind to showing that we know nothing of the relation of cause and effect; that we know their conjunction and not their connection. The relation is merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence within our experience, and might have no place in other worlds, or in regard to world-making, of which we have no experience. In this way he undermined the proof of the existence of God. He is to be met by showing, that, looking at the nature of things, we are led to believe that every effect must have a cause, and that there is power in the object acting as the cause to produce the effect.

In these discussions he started the questions which have ever since been agitated as to belief, which he says "joins no new ideas to those which compose the idea of the object;" and argues that the only difference between belief and incredulity consists in the liveliness of belief which constitutes its essence. But surely we have at times imaginations as lively as our beliefs; and in all cases of belief we have a conviction, whether right or wrong, to be determined by evidence of the existence of an object. He uses this theory to account for our belief in the existence of mind and matter. "What we call mind is nothing but a heap or collection of different impressions, united together by certain relations, and supposed, though falsely, to be endowed with a perfect simplicity and identity. Again: as to matter we can never, on the mere ground of a conjunction which we have witnessed, argue from our perceptions to the existence of external continued objects." He thus undermines the usual arguments for the immateriality and immortality of the soul. "Identity is merely a quality which we ascribe to perceptions, because of ideas in the imagination; and the identity which we ascribe to the mind is merely a fictitious one." He is to be answered by showing that I know myself to be the same person to-day that I was at any other time remembered by me.

In his Essay on Miracles he assails supernatural revelation, — not its possibility, but the evidence of it. He shows that there has been an invariable experience in favor of the uniformity of nature; and that a miracle, being "a violation of the laws of nature," cannot be established by as strong proof as that which can be advanced against it. He exerts his ingenuity in disparaging the evidence usually advanced in favor of miraculous occurrences, by showing how apt mankind are to be swayed on these subjects by fear, wonder, fancy, and the like. I allow, that, in the present advanced state of science, there is ample proof that there is a uniformity in nature; but let us place alongside of this the counterpart fact, that there is sufficient evidence of there being a supernatural system. Let the cumulative proofs, external and internal, in behalf of Christianity, be adduced, — those derived from testimony and from prophecy; those drawn from the adaptation of the revelation to our nature, from the character of Jesus and from the unity of the doctrine and morality, — and we shall find in their consistency and congruity evidence of equal value to that which establishes the existence of system in nature.

People commonly shrink from Hume's negations on the subject of natural religion; but he has had a large following in his utilitarian theory of morals. He holds that the mind has an original instinct, which tends to unite itself with the good and the evil. He maintains that virtue consists in the agreeable and the useful: "Vice and virtue may be compared to sound, color, heat, which, according to modern philosophy, are not qualities of objects, but perceptions of the mind." Virtue is distinguished by the pleasure, and vice by the pain, that any action, sentiment, or character gives us by the mere view and contemplation. He is to be opposed by showing, first that the moral power in man is more than an instinct, that it is a cognitive power, and it perceives and knows the distinction between good and evil; and, secondly, that the good, say piety, or justice, or benevolence, is perceived to be good in itself. It is to be shown specially that the conscience claims supremacy over all our voluntary states, and that the good implies obligation to perform it.

Hume's Treatise of Human Nature contains the substance of all his philosophy. The publication of it (1738-39) constitutes an era in the history of philosophy. He tore down the old and venerable edifice, and henceforth men have had to build anew, and from the foundation. His earliest opponents were Thomas Reid (1763-64) and Immanuel Kant (1781). As his principles undermined all religion, natural and revealed, theologians have to examine them.

There is an edition of Hume's Philosophical Works, in 4 vols., Edinburgh, 1826 (A. Black), and an edition of his Treatise of Human Nature, by T. H. GREEN and T. H. GROSE, with Dissertations and Notes on the principles of Hegel, London, 1878. I may be permitted to add that I have an article on Hume in my Scottish Philosophy.

HUMERALE. See VESTMENTS.

HUMILIATI was the name of an association formed by some Milanese noblemen, on their return from German captivity, in the eleventh or twelfth century. In the middle of this laymen's association a religious order grew up, bearing the same name, and confirmed by Innocent III. in 1201. The members of the lay association afterwards fell in with the Arnoldists and the Waldenses, and the religious order also degenerated. In 1569 Cardinal Borromeo attempted to reform it, but nearly fell a victim to the violence of the monks; after which Pius V. dissolved the order, in 1571. A female order of Humiliati, also called the "Nuns of Blassoni," was founded by Clara Blassoni of Milan in 1150, and still exists. See HIERONYMUS TIERABOSCHI: Vetera Humiliatorum monumenta, Milan, 1786-68, T. III. ZÖCKLER.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST. See CHRISTOLOGY.

HUMILITY, a virtue opposed to pride and self-conceit, by reason of which a man thinks of himself no more highly than he ought to think (Rom. xii. 3), and places himself in subjection to him to whom he owes subjection. This person is primarily God; so that humility is, first of all, the sense of absolute dependence upon him. In the strict sense of the term, humility is proper only in man's relations to God, and modesty in man's relations to man (De Wette). It is not merely the sense of God's infinitude over against human limitation, but of God's holiness over against man's moral deficiency and guilt. Sophocles came nearest to the true conception of humility in classical antiquity. It runs like a thread through all the piety of the Old Testament (Gen. xvii. 1; Mic. vi. 8) down to John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 2). Christ, although without sin, was imbued with childlike humility (Matt. xix. 17; John v. 30), and made it a condition of entrance into the kingdom of heaven (Matt. v. 3, xviii. 2). It must actuate the Christian at all times, and remind him to work out his salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. ii. 12). Love, which is the pulse-beat of the Christian life, is influenced by it, and held back from the errors of mysticism and quietism, and converts it into adoring reverence for God, trust in and obedience to him, even in sufferings (1 Pet. v. 6). A sham humility betrays itself in its behavior to mankind (Luke xviii. 13 sqq.). It is free from all vain self-conceit, but at the same time is conscious of man's dignity in the sight of God, and may be said to ascend upwards on the six steps of patience, meekness, kindness, friendliness, peaceableness, and placability (Arndt),—virtues which the apostles so urgently insist upon. See the various works on Christian ethics.

HUMPHREY, Heman, D.D., b. in West Simsbury, Conn., March 26, 1779; d. at Pittsfield in 1859. He graduated at Yale College in 1805; was a Congregational pastor at Fairfield, Conn., at Pittsfield, Mass.; then president of Amherst College for twenty-three years (1823-45). He was one of the best and weightiest men of his day, and exerted a wide influence in shaping its religious movements, especially in the Congregational and Presbyterian churches. He contributed largely to the religious press, wrote able pamphlets against intemperance and slavery, and was the author of a number of books, among them a Tour in France, Great Britain, and Belgium, in two volumes. (See TYLER'S History of Amherst College.) Zephaniah Moore, D.D., son of the preceding; b. at Amherst, Mass., Aug. 30, 1824; d. in Cincinnati, Nov. 13, 1881; graduated at Amherst College and at Andover Theological Seminary; pastor of churches at Racine and Milwaukee, Wis., 1850-59, of First Presbyterian Church, Chicago, 1859-63, of Calvary Church, Philadelphia, 1868-75; professor of ecclesiastical history and church polity in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, 1875-81; and moderator of the General Assembly at Chicago in 1871. He was a gifted preacher, and a faithful servant of Christ.

HUNDESHAGEN, Karl Bernhard, b. in Friedewald, Hesse, Jan. 10, 1810; d. in Bonn, June 2, 1873; was one of the most prominent and original theologians which the Reformed Church of Germany has given in this century to the service of the Evangelical Church. His peculiar importance consisted in this, that in his own way he showed how certain features of the Reformed Church might be advantageously applied to the living Christianity of the day. He emphasized the ethical principle in Protestantism over against a mere dogmatic or critical intellectualism, and laid stress upon the social element in the Church, which was languishing by reason of its amalgamation with the State. He entered the University of Giessen at fifteen, and passed from there to Halle, where he became a favorite pupil of Ullmann. In 1830 he went back to Giessen as repentant, and in 1834 accepted a call to a professorship in the newly founded university of Bern. In 1846 his anonymous work, D. deutsche Protestantismus, s. Vergangenheit u. s. heutigen Lebensfragen, etc., appeared, and fell like a flash of lightning in that troubled period. Two more editions were called for in 1847 and 1850. With an intense earnestness of tone, here and there relieved by flashes of humor, the author showed the intimate connection of the religious and national condition of Germany, and held up the central act of the Reformation as an act, not of science, but of conscience, and as calling for imitation. From this he passed over to the ecclesiastical questions of the day. This work made Hundeshagen's reputation, and he was at once called to the chair of New-Testament exegesis and church history at Heidelberg, where he continued to labor for twenty years (1847-67). In 1864 he published his great contribution to the literature of the relations of the State to the Church, — Beiträge zur Kirchenverfassung u. Kirchenpolitik, insbesondere d. Protestantismus. But the last years of his stay in Heidelberg were made unpleasant by the relations of the Church to the government of Baden, which were entirely at discord with his own views, and by the isolated position of the faculty in which Umbreit's death left him. He gladly accepted a call to Bonn in 1867, where he spent his last years in peaceful and friendly relations with his colleagues, although a great sufferer in body. He rejoiced in the restoration of the German Empire in 1870, and greeted the hour of his departure with Christian fortitude and joyfulness. A collection of his shorter writings was edited in 2 vols. by Dr. Christlieb, Gotha, 1874. See CHRISTLIEB: K. B. Hundeshagen, Eine Lebensskizze, Gotha, 1873.

WILLIBALD BEYSCHLAG.

HUNGARY, The Kingdom of, consists of Hungary Proper, the principality of Transylvania, the provinces of Croatia, Slavonia, and the Military Frontier, and comprises an area of 124,234 square miles, with 15,509,455 inhabitants, of whom 7,558,558 are Roman Catholics; 1,599,628, Greek Catholics; 5,133, Armenian Catholics; 2,589,319 belong to the Greek Church; 1,113,508 are Lutherans; 2,031,243, Calvinists; 54,822, Unitarians; 553,641, Jews, etc.

When the Magyars first crossed the Carpathian range, and settled in the plains of the Danube and the Theiss, they were still heathens. They believed in a greatest god, who had created heaven and earth, and whom they worshipped in groves under the open sky. They had no idols, no temples, no priests. Sacrifices, especially of horses, were presented at certain occasions. The oath was sacred to them, and marriage was accomplished with religious ceremonies. A century later (972) they became acquainted with Christianity, when their duke, Geyza, married a Christian princess, Sarolta, a daughter of the Transylvanian prince Giula, who had been converted to Christianity during a stay in Constantinople. It was, however, not the Greek, but the Roman Church, which finally converted the Magyars. The lively political relations which soon sprang up between the Magyar duke and the German emperor made it easier for the German missionary to penetrate into the country; and it was Adalbert of Prague who in 994 baptized Geyza's son Voik, and gave him the name of Stephen. Stephen, afterwards known as St. Stephen of Hungary, changed the constitution from a tribal union to a kingdom, and accomplished the christianization of the people, travelling from one end of the country to the other, preaching, baptizing, building churches and monasteries, founding schools, organizing governments, and establishing authorities. From Pope Sylvester II. he received a golden crown and the title of apostolic king; and in 1000 he was solemnly crowned by the Archbishop of Gran. At a diet held shortly after, he made the clergy the first state of the people, gave the bishops rich donations, introduced the tithe, enforced the celebration of Sunday, the Friday fast, etc. In no other country the Roman Church attained such a power and such a wealth as in Hungary. A curious testimony of her influence is found in the circumstance that the Latin language became the official language, not only of the church, the university, and the school, but also of the government, the administration, and the court, and continued so till the beginning of the present century.

When the Reformation arose in Germany, and became known in Hungary through the writings of the Reformers, the Hungarian Church seemed to be singularly well prepared for the encounter. A diet of 1523 decreed that Protestantism should be stamped out; that all Lutherans, and even their abettors, should be seized and burnt, etc. But Aug. 29, 1526, the battle of Mohacz was fought. The King, Louis II., fell, the last scion of the native dynasty, and around him most of the chiefs of the great families. The Turks occupied one part of the country; and two pretenders, Zapolya, and Ferdinand of Austria, fought about the other. Under such circumstances the religious affairs were for some time entirely lost sight of; and the Reformation was allowed to spread, as it caused no disturbance. It quietly took possession of the ground, priest and congregation compromising with each other; and when, in 1549, Leonhard Stöckel drew up the new confession, King Ferdinand accepted it, and confirmed it. The first forebodings of coming troubles appeared within the Protestant camp itself. The Lutherans and Calvinists hated each other worse than they hated the Romanists; and when Rudolph I. ascended the throne in 1577, and the Jesuits were recalled, and formally installed at Thuróc, intrigues, violence, and soon actual persecution, began. The Protestants rose in revolt, led by Prince Bocskaj of Transylvania, and compelled the king to the so-called "peace of Vienna" (1606), which granted freedom of conscience, and liberty of worship. The articles of this treaty were incorporated with the laws of the land by the Diet of Pressburg (1608), in spite of the protest of the Roman-Catholic bishops; and, when Rudolph made an attempt at cancelling the whole treaty, he was deposed, and his brother Matthias raised on the throne. In Peter Pazmáni, however, who, though born of Protestant parents, entered the order of the Jesuits, and finally became Archbishop of Gran, the Roman-Catholic Church found the right tool to work with. More than fifty noble families he succeeded in bringing back to the Roman faith; and with the magnates followed their whole retinues. Thus re-enforced, and strongly supported by the court, the Roman Church began a warfare of open attack. The Protestants were deprived of their church-buildings, prevented from making complaints at the diets, compelled to pay for the support of the Roman clergy, forced to participate in processions in honor of the Virgin and the saints, accused of the most horrible crimes, — conspiracy with the Turks, seditions against the king, etc. Twice they rose in open rebellion, under the lead of the Rákoczys, father and son; and both times they were successful. By the peace of Linz (1645), and by that of Szathmár (1711), the rights which they had obtained by the peace of Vienna were recognized and confirmed. But the treaties were made only to be broken; and the state of the evangelical churches in Hungary was very precarious, when the Edict of Toleration of Joseph II.

(Oct. 29, 1781) at once effected a radical change. The Protestants were in all essential points placed on an equal footing with the Roman Catholics; and in this arrangement the legislation of Joseph's successor, Leopold, especially the law of 1791, made no material alterations.

At present the Roman-Catholic Church has seventeen bishops in Hungary, and four archbishops, — Zagrab (Agram), Eger (Erlau), Kalocsa, and Esztergom (Gran), of whom the last is the primate of the whole Church, and bears the title of prince. The Greek Catholic Church (Greek in confession and rite, but under Roman jurisdiction) has six bishops; the Armenian Catholic Church two. The Greek Church has a metropolitan at Carlowitz with five suffragan bishops, and an archbishop at Nagyzeben (Hermannstadt) with two. In the evangelical churches each congregation elects its own eldership, which appoints the pastor, and governs all the affairs of the congregation. Several congregations form a seniorate; several seniorates, a superintendency. There are five Lutheran and five Calvinist superintendencies. Of the forty-five theological institutions, which in 1878 labored with 284 professors and 1,334 students, twenty-five belonged to the Roman-Catholic Church, four to the Greek Catholic, three to the Greek Church, seven to the Lutheran, and five to the Calvinist. See Geschichte d. evang. Kirche in Ungarn, Berlin, 1854.

HUNNIUS, Ægidius, b. at Winnenden, Württemberg, Dec. 21, 1550; d. at Wittenberg, April 4, 1603; studied at Tübingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Marburg 1576, and at Wittenberg 1592. He was a staunch champion of Lutheran orthodoxy. During his stay in Marburg he opposed, in preaching and writing, the reigning Calvinistic tendency, and succeeded in forming a party which finally effected an ecclesiastical split between Upper and Lower Hesse. In Wittenberg he was a member of the Committee on Visitation, and contributed much to suppress all Phillipistic traditions. A collected edition of his Latin works, among which are De persona Christi, Calvinus judaizans, etc., appeared at Wittenberg, 1607-09, in 3 vols. fol.

HUNNIUS, Nicolaus, b. at Marburg, July 11, 1585; d. at Lübeck, April 12, 1643; studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed superintendent of Eilenburg 1612, professor of theology at Wittenberg 1617, and pastor of the Church of St. Mary in Lübeck 1622. He followed the same theological direction as his father, inherited his temper and talent as a polemist, and was, like him, possessed of great learning. He wrote against the Roman Church, Demonstratio Ministerii Lutherani and Capistrum Hunnio paratum, etc., 1617; against the Photinians, Examen errorum Photinianorum, 1620; and, against the enthusiasts of his time, Christliche Betrachtung, 1622; Ausführlicher Bericht von der neuen Propheten, 1634; etc. In Lübeck he revived the Ministerium tripolitanum, an association between the clergy of Lübeck, Hamburg, and Lüneburg; and by his Consultatio (1632) he gave the idea of a Collegium irenicum, or Collegium Hunnium, which was intended to form a kind of supreme court for all theological controversies. His biography was written by HELLER, Lübeck, 1843.

HUNTING AMONG THE HEBREWS. In the Bible we find hunting connected with royalty as early as in the days of Nimrod, who "was a mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. x. 9). The patriarchs were rather herdsmen than hunters: only Ishmael was an archer (Gen. xxi. 20), and Esau a cunning hunter (Gen. xxv. 27). That beasts of the chase were plentiful in the land of promise we see from Exod. xxiii. 29. From the provision made in Lev. xvii. 13, it is manifest that hunting was practised after the settlement in Canaan, and was pursued with the view of obtaining food (Deut. xii. 22). That birds were also shot we may infer from 1 Sam. xxvi. 20; but the law provided for their protection (Deut. xxii. 6 sq.). Quiver and bow (Gen. xxvii. 3) were generally used as hunting utensils. Various missiles, pitfalls, snares, and gins were made use of in hunting (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ps. xci. 3; Amos iii. 5). That hunting continued to be followed till toward the end of the Jewish state we see from Josephus, War, I. 21, 13. LEYRER.

HUNTINGDON, Selina, Countess of, a distinguished supporter of evangelical piety and the Methodist movement; b. Aug. 24, 1707, at Stanton Harold in Leicestershire; d. June 17, 1791, in London. She was the second daughter of Washington Shirley, Earl of Ferrers, and in 1728 married the Earl of Huntingdon. Under the influence of the earl's sisters and a severe illness, she became deeply interested in religion, and with her husband attended the meetings of the Methodist Society in Fetterlane, London, from its organization, in 1738. She lost all her children, and in 1746 the earl died. From this time on, Lady Huntingdon devoted herself uninterruptedly to the advancement of religion. Among her friends in the ministry were Doddridge, John Wesley, and Fletcher; and Whitefield and Romaine acted as her chaplains. Her house in Park Street, London, she opened for preaching-services, to which her social connections, and the estimation in which she was held, drew many persons of high rank, among whom were Bolingbroke and Chesterfield. She built numerous chapels, — the expenses of the first, at Brighton (1761), being met by the sale of her jewels, amounting to seven hundred pounds, — and in 1768 founded the theological seminary of Trevecca in Southern Wales, which, after her death, was removed to Chestnut Herts. When the breach occurred between Wesley and Whitefield, Lady Huntingdon took sides with the latter, and at his death (1777) became sole trustee of his institutions in Georgia. But she did not leave the Church of England till 1779, and then she was forced to it in order to avoid the injunction against her chaplains' preaching in the Pantheon. Lady Huntingdon superintended her chapels in person, and at the time of her death there were sixty-four belonging to what was called "the Countess of Huntingdon Connexion." These congregations were in polity Congregationalist, in doctrine Calvinistic, and in worship used the Book of Common Prayer. According to Whitaker's Almanac for 1882, the "Connexion" now only has thirty-four chapels. See Life and Times of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon, London, 1840, 2 vols.; A. H. NEW: The Coronet and the Cross, or Memorials of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon, London, 1857.

HUPFELD, Hermann (Christian Karl Friedrich),

a scholar of the first rank among the exegetes of the Old Testament, and son of an evangelical pastor; b. March 31, 1796, at Marburg; d. April 24, 1866, at Halle. He studied theology at Marburg, and, soon after completing his course, became assistant to one of the pastors in that city. After a brief service in this capacity, he was appointed teacher in the gymnasium at Hanau, where he remained three years. Returning to his home with the intention of devoting his life to the ministry, his feelings suddenly underwent a change, and determined him in favor of an academic career. In 1824 he placed himself under Gesenius at Halle, "habilitated" in philosophy, and began lecturing on Hebrew grammar. In 1825 he was appointed professor of theology in Marburg, and published his Exercitationes Æthiopicae (Leipzig), which placed him at the side of the ablest investigators of the day. In 1843 he became Gesenius' successor at Halle. As a teacher, Hupfeld's manner was not attractive; but he interested his hearers deeply by clearness of presentation, thoroughness of treatment, and his love of truth. In 1865 he was accused by certain theologians, before the minister of worship, of disparaging the divine element in the Old Testament. But he easily disproved the charge; and all his colleagues, Julius Müller and Tholuck included, rose up in his defence. He did not belong to the strict evangelical school (Vermittlungs-theologie); but he was the friend of a living biblical Christianity, the foe of all impiety, and a strict lover of truth and justice. Tholuck pronounced his funeral oration.

Hupfeld once said of himself, that his literary activity had diffused itself over too wide a range, and lacked a well-defined plan. His writings are very valuable, but appeared, for the most part, in periodicals and religious journals. His greatest work was the translation and Commentary on the Psalms, Gotha, 1855-61, 4 vols., 2d ed. by Riehm, 1867-71. The translation is prosaic, but in textual criticism it is unsurpassed among the works on that portion of Scripture. Die Quellen d. Genesis u. d. Art ihrer Zusammensetzung, von neuem untersucht (Berlin, 1853) has also a permanent value, [and analyzes Genesis into an original Elohist and a Jehovistic editor]. Hupfeld began in 1828 the publication of an Ausführliche Hebr. Grammatik, which he never completed. His contributions to periodicals were frequent and valuable; nor did he confine himself to theology, but took also a deep interest in the political agitations of his day, which often exercised his pen. This pious scholar could well say of himself, "To be true, that has always been my endeavor; and to remain an honorable man in the face of the grimaces of this world, that has seemed to me to be the highest praise." For further particulars of Hupfeld's life, and an admirable criticism of his professorial and literary activity, see the justly appreciative biography by RIEHM, Halle, 1867. KAMPHAUSEN.

HURD, Richard, Bishop of Worcester; b. of humble parents at Congreve, Staffordshire, Jan. 13, 1720; d. May 28, 1808; in 1739 graduated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was elected fellow 1742. He became rector of Thurcaston 1757, preacher of Lincoln's Inn 1766, archdeacon of Gloucester 1767, and bishop of Lichfield and Coventry 1774, from which he was translated in 1781 to the see of Worcester. In 1783 he was offered the see of Canterbury, which he declined on the ground of its being a "charge not suited to his temper and talents, and much too heavy for him to sustain, especially at this time." Bishop Hurd was a man of much polish and elegance of manner, and was pronounced by George III. "the most naturally polite man he had ever known." He kept up a sumptuous retinue, but with these tastes combined literary ambitions. Among his other works are a Commentary on Horace's Ars Poetica, 1749, 4th ed., 1763; a volume of Moral and Political Dialogues (sincerity, retirement, etc.), 1759; 3 vols. of Sermons, 1776-80. He edited the Works of Warburton, 7 vols., 1788. His most ambitious theological work was Introduction to the Study of the Prophecies, 1772 (1778, 2 vols.). His collected Works with an Autobiography appeared in 8 vols., 1811. See KILVERT: Life and Writings of Bishop Hurd, London, 1860.

HURTER, Friedrich Emanuel von, b. at Schaffhausen, Switzerland, of Protestant parents, March 19, 1787; d. at Graz, Aug. 27, 1865. He studied theology in Göttingen; in 1824 was chief pastor in Schaffhausen, and in 1835 dean of the synod, but was converted to Roman Catholicism through his historical studies, and in 1844 entered that church. He was called to Vienna in 1845 as imperial counsellor and historiographer, and in 1851 ennobled under the title Von Amann. Besides controversial writings, he was the author of the famous Geschichte d. Papstes Innocenz III. u. seiner Zeitgenossen, Hamburg, 1834-42, 4 vols.; and an account of his conversion, which is said to be one of the best books of its class: Geburt u. Wiedergeburt, Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben u. Blicke auf die Kirche, Schaffhausen, 1845, 4 vols., 4th ed., 1867, 2 vols. His life was written by one of his sons, Graz, 1876, 2 vols. Two of his sons have taken prominent places in the Roman Church.

HUS, John, Bohemian reformer and martyr; b. in 1369 [according to Gillett, July 6, 1373], at Hussinetz, Bohemia, not far from the Bavarian line; d. at the stake, in Constance, Switzerland, July 6, 1415. Hus is an abbreviation of Hussinetz, and was used by him from 1396. His parents were Czechs, in comfortable circumstances. John studied at Prague, taking the degree of Bachelor of Theology in 1394, and Master of Arts 1396. In 1398 he delivered his first lectures, in 1401 was made dean of the philosophical faculty, and in 1403 rector of the university. He was a constant student of Wiclif's works; and it is altogether likely, that in following the rule that a bachelor might only lecture upon the treatises of a Prague, Parisian, or Oxford master, Hus took up Wiclif. It is, at any rate, a noticeable coincidence that five manuscripts of Wiclif's philosophical writings, preserved at Stockholm, were written by Hus in 1398.

In 1402 Hus was made pastor of the Bethlehem Church, which was founded (1391) to afford preaching for the Czechs. This position brought him into close contact with the common people, and stimulated him to a closer study of Scripture, as well as to the study of Wiclif's theological works.

In the period from 1402 to 1410 Hus hoped to effect a religious reformation, with the aid of his ecclesiastical superiors. A disputation of the year 1408 led the authorities to forbid the promulgation of the forty-five theses of Wiclif at the university; but, five years later, the interdiction was confirmed only to the extent that no one should give to them an heretical construction. Hus had the full confidence of the archbishop, Dr. Sbynko, and was appointed synodical preacher by him. At the opening of the provincial synod, he repeatedly took occasion to lay bare the errors, and denounce the sins, of the clergy. With two others, he was appointed by the archbishop to investigate the alleged miracles performed by the blood of Christ in the church at Wilsnack. They were pronounced a deception, and formed the occasion of Hus's pamphlet, All the Blood of Christ is Glorified. He here bids Christians seek, not for signs and miracles, but search the Scriptures. But his relations to the archbishop changed, and in 1408 he was prohibited from exercising priestly functions within the diocese. The complete rupture was still to come.

In 1409 the University of Prague lost all its foreign students in consequence of a royal decree giving the Bohemian students three votes to their one. Leipzig University was founded; but in Prague an intense national spirit henceforth prevailed, which demanded ecclesiastical reforms. Hus was made rector, and was very popular, not only among the students, but at court. This freedom of inquiry excited the apprehension of the archbishop, who accused Hus to the Pope, apprising him, at the same time, of the wide prevalence of the doctrines of Wiclif. A papal bull of Dec. 20, 1409, prohibited the use of the English Reformer's writings, and forbade preaching at places where the practice was not an ancient one. When the bull was announced (March 9, 1410), it aroused much opposition; but the archbishop executed it, burning on July 16 two hundred volumes of Wiclif, in spite of the adverse decision of the university. But Hus continued to preach, and the opposition increased. Verses lampooning the archbishop were sung on the streets, and even the lives of the priests menaced. Hus and his friends openly defended Wiclif's writings at the university; while the archbishop, in a synodical edict, condemned them as heretical. The congregations at the Bethlehem Church grew to a vast size. Hus became bolder and more outspoken; and his audiences frequently showed their approval by applause. On March 15, 1411, he was excommunicated by the archbishop, and the city laid under an interdict. Both sentences were ignored; and the prelate was attempting to arrange a compromise, when death overtook him (Sept. 28).

In 1412 Hus and his sympathizers were roused to indignation by the preaching of a crusade against Naples, and of indulgences commanded by Pope John XXIII., and commended by the king. The university was divided; but in a public disputation (June 7, 1412) it was emphatically affirmed that neither Pope nor bishop had the right to draw the sword, for it was said to Peter, "Put up thy sword." As for indulgences, it was declared that not money, but true repentance, was the condition of forgiveness. The Pope does not know who are the elect, and they only can be saved; and the doctrine that he cannot err is blasphemous.

The populace sympathized with these utterances of the university, went in contemptuous procession in front of the archbishop's palace, and made a bonfire of the papal bulls in the market-place. The king, Wenceslaus, forbade all popular insult to the Pope, and executed three young men who declared the indulgences to be a humbug. But Hus, attended by a number of students, took up their bodies, and buried them in the Bethlehem Church. Cardinal Peter of St. Angelo now determined to use more decisive measures, interdicted Hus's place of residence, and threatened him with the civil ban. This was effective. At the king's request he left the city (December, 1412), but not until he had written a work (the Appellatio), in which he appeals from the Roman curia to Christ the righteous Judge. He passed his exile at Kozihradek and Krakowetz, a short distance south of Prague, preaching to large concourses of people, and writing his principal work, De Ecclesia ("The Church").

The religious agitation of Bohemia had become matter of European notoriety, and King Sigismund (of Hungary) decided that the case ought to be brought before the General Council about to be assembled at Constance. Hus cheerfully agreed to appear: three of the Bohemian nobility (at the king's command) and two personal friends attended him, starting on their journey Oct. 11, 1414. The party was well received on the way, and arrived Nov. 3 at Constance. Four weeks afterwards the cardinals trumped up a charge of attempted flight, and placed him in confinement in a Dominican convent. A commission of three bishops made the preliminary investigation; the accused being denied a hearing. The articles of accusation were concerned principally with Hus's errors about the Church. Only later was the distribution of both the elements at communion added.

The flight of John XXIII. rendered the work of his commission invalid; and the council appointed another, of four members, including d'Ailly. They were to sit in judgment upon Wiclif's doctrines, as well as upon those of the Bohemian reformer, for both were set in the same key. On May 4, 1415, the council adopted their report so far as it concerned Wiclif, damning his person, his writings, and his doctrines.

On the 5th of June, Hus had his first public hearing in the Franciscan convent. The heretical articles extracted from his writings were read; but his attempt to vindicate them was interrupted by tumultuous cries. The second public hearing occurred on June 7. Sigismund himself was present. The question was upon his relation to Wiclif and his book on the Church. He boldly affirmed his esteem for the English Reformer as a pious man, but denied that he had adopted his views against transubstantiation. At the third session (June 8) he defended some of the articles drawn from his work on the Church.

The condemnation of Hus to the stake was a foregone conclusion. He himself knew it. His letters bear the stamp of approaching death. During the four weeks that followed, efforts were made to induce him to retract, but in vain. On Saturday, July 6, 1415, the sentence of the council was pronounced in the cathedral, condemning him as a heretic, and condemning his books to be burned. Hus fell on his knees, and, lifting up his hands, appealed to Heaven, and prayed for his enemies. Thereupon followed his degradation from the priestly office, and all cried out together, "Thy soul we deliver up to the Devil." Hus answered, "And I commend it to the holy Lord Jesus." Then a paper cap a yard high was placed on his head, with the writing, "Heresiarcha!" He was then led forth to the judgment-square, his neck bound by a chain to a stake. As the flames rose around him, he refused again to recant, and died singing, "Christ, thou Son of the living God, have mercy upon me." His ashes were thrown into the Rhine.

Valid ground for the sentence of condemnation, even according to the canons of that day, there was none. Hus denied holding to Wiclif's views against transubstantiation, and his views upon the Church he founded upon Augustine. He then died because he based his reform of the Church upon conscience and Scripture, and not upon ecclesiastical authority. Judged by the canons of law then prevailing, Hus's death was a judicial murder.

Hus regarded the Scriptures as an infallible authority and the supreme standard of conduct. The other main subject of his teaching was the nature of the true Church, which, with Wiclif, he defined to be the body of the elect. Church-membership or ecclesiastical dignities were no infallible sign of election. He distributed the communion under both kinds to the laity, but did not oppose the doctrine of transubstantiation as was charged by the council.

John Hus was not an original, creative mind. As a thinker, he had neither speculative talent nor constructive faculty. In comparison with Wiclif, he is a star of second magnitude. Nor was he by nature a strong character, twice hardened, and keen as steel. Rather was he a feeble and tender spirit, more sensitive than designed for heroic deed. But with his tenderness there was combined moral tenacity, indomitable constancy, and inflexible firmness. If we add to these characteristics his purity and humility, his manly fear of God, and tender conscientiousness, we have in Hus a man to love and admire. Seldom have the power of conscience and the imperial strength of a faith rooted in Christ asserted themselves in so commanding and heroic a manner.

HUSSITES, the Bohemian followers of John Hus. The execution of Hus excited intense feeling in Bohemia and Moravia; and it was no wonder that some of the reformer's enemies among the priests were stabbed, or thrown into the Moldau, and that the archbishop himself barely escaped the wrath of the infuriated populace. The king, Wenceslaus, tried to maintain a neutral attitude between both parties. But in September, 1415, a large assembly was held, at which four hundred and fifty-two of the nobility signed a protest to the Council of Constance, and approved the doctrines of Hus. On the 5th they formed a league for mutual aid in religious concerns, binding themselves to protect the free preaching of God's Word on their estates, and to recognize the edicts of prelates only so far as they accorded with the Scriptures.

The ecclesiastical party entered into a counter league; and the Council of Constance cited the nobles to appear before it, and even threatened (Feb. 24, 1416) Bohemia with a crusade. But the Hussites could not be so easily intimidated. Pope Martin V. inaugurated more energetic measures, and, after dissolving the council (April 22, 1418), determined to destroy the Bohemian heresy root and branch. Wenceslaus was persuaded in 1419 to move against it, and the Hussites at court were obliged to leave. On Aug. 16 the king died, but civil war had already begun.

What was the character of this Bohemian movement? First of all we are struck with the intense veneration for Hus. His followers, however, disavowed the name "Hussites," and wanted to be known as Catholic Christians. They were unanimous in regarding the Scriptures as the supreme authority in doctrine and life, but they split into two parties in the application of this principle. The radical wing, accepting only that which was expressly commanded in Scripture, rejected the doctrines of purgatory, the worship of saints, the use of a foreign tongue in public services, etc. The moderate wing accepted all ecclesiastical customs the Scriptures did not expressly forbid. They put forth the famous Four Prague Articles in Latin, Czech, and German, in July, 1420. These called for (1) the free preaching of God's Word, (2) the distribution of the sacrament under two kinds, (3) the deprivation of the clergy of secular power and possessions which they used to the injury of their office and the state, and (4) the repression of mortal sins and public scandals. The moderate party was called the Praguer, and, later, Calixtines (from caliz, "cup"), or Utraquist. They had at their head Baron Czenko of Wartenberg. The radicals acknowledged Nicholas of Pistua and John Zizka as leaders, and were called Taborites, from the fortress of Tabor, sixty miles south of Prague, which they occupied.

From 1420 to 1425, Catholic Germany marched in crusades against the Hussites; but the latter were victorious, and, from 1427 on, took the offensive against their enemies under the generalship of Procopius the Great. Cardinal Julian Cesarini, after the ignominious defeat of the last crusade, which he led Aug. 14, 1431, concluded, as president of the Basel Council, that the only way to put down the heresy was by conciliatory treatment. In October the council invited the Bohemians to appear before it. They refused until the delegates had conceded their main conditions at Eger. This was the first instance in the whole history of the Church for a council to treat upon an equal footing with a party demanding reforms. On Nov. 30, 1433, articles were agreed upon fully granting the administration of the communion in both kinds, and conceding the other points of the Prague Articles, but in a somewhat illusory manner.

The moderate party was satisfied, the Taborites not. Civil war broke out afresh; and the army of the latter was defeated in a decisive battle May 30, 1434. The Taborites gradually disappeared, or were lost, a generation or two later, in the Bohemian Brethren.

The articles of the Basel Council were confirmed by the National Bohemian Assembly at Iglau, July 5, 1436. But Pope Pius II., on March 31, 1462, declared them void, threatening with excommunication all who administered the cup to the laity. The Utraquist party was not intimidated. In 1485 the king signed an agreement confirming the articles of Basel, and in 1512 the Bohemian Parliament granted to the Utraquists equal rights with the Catholics.

The Utraquists sent words of cheer to Luther (July 16, 1519), and with them Hus's works, in which he was surprised to find his own doctrines taught. A portion only of the party fell in with the Reformation. In 1575 the Bohemian Parliament passed the Confessio Bohemica on the basis of the Augsburg Confession.

HUTCHINSON, Anne, a religious enthusiast of New England; was b. in Lincolnshire, Eng., 1591; emigrated to Boston 1634, and murdered by the Indians in Westchester County, New York, in August, 1643. She was a member of Dr. Cotton's church; but, holding some peculiar doctrines of her own, she "set up weekly meetings at her house, whereto three or four score people would resort" (Mather), and at which she criticised Dr. Cotton's sermons. "It was wonderful to see," continues Mather, "with what a speedy and spreading fascination these doctrines did bewitch the minds of the people," etc. She was excommunicated from Dr. Cotton's church for antinomian errors; and, the court ordering her to leave the Colony, she went first to Rhode Island, and then to Hebgate (probably Hell-Gate) Westchester County, N.Y. Cotton Mather uses very strong language against her doctrinal errors. See his Magnalia, vii. 3 (vol. ii. pp. 516 sq.), and SPARKS: American Biography, vol. vi.

HUTCHINSON, John, a layman who represented peculiar views concerning biblical interpretation; b. in Spennithorne, Yorkshire, 1674; d. Aug. 28, 1727. He was steward in several families, and last to the Duke of Somerset, who procured for him a sinecure appointment worth two hundred pounds. In 1724 he published part i., and in 1727 part ii., of his Moses' Principia, — a work in which he attacked Newton's theory of gravitation. He held that the Hebrew Scriptures contained the elements of all rational philosophy, natural history, and true religion. He laid great stress upon the typical sense, and held that all parts of our Saviour's character and work are symbolized in the Old Testament. His views were adopted by such men as Bishop Horne, Jones of Nayland, etc. His collected works were edited in 12 vols. by SPEARMAN and BATE, 1748: An Abstract from the Works of J. Hutchinson, containing a Summary of his Discoveries in Philosophy and Divinity, London, 1753. See Life by SPEARMAN in the edition of 1765.

HUTTEN, Ulrich von, b. at Steckelberg, in Hesse-Cassel, April 22, 1488; d. in the Island of Ufnau, in the Lake of Zürich, Aug. 19, 1523; descended from a noble Franconian family, and was, when eleven years old, placed in the monastery of Fulda. But monastic life was very much against his nature. In his sixteenth year he fled from Fulda, and began, aided by some friends of his family, to study humaniora at Erfurt, scholasticism at Cologne, and philology and belles-lettres at Francfort-on-the-Oder. After some wild adventures at Greifswald and Rostock, he visited Wittenberg in 1510, and Vienna in 1512. In order to be reconciled to his father, he went in the latter year to Italy, and began to study law at Pavia and Bologna. But the principal result of his Italian journey was a satirical poem. He returned to Germany in 1517 as a common soldier in the army of Maximilian. An incident suddenly brought him into prominence. The Duke of Württemberg, stirred up by an adulterous passion, assassinated Hans von Hutten, his equerry, and the head of the Hutten family; and Ulrich then stepped forth as the avenger of the family, and depicted in a number of satirical pamphlets the duke as a monster of a tyrant. The satires were good. The educated world became attentive; and as the books contained numerous social and political allusions, all pointing in the direction of freedom and nationality, the author became at once very popular. The great aim of Hutten's life was to free Germany from the yoke under which it was held by Rome, by the Pope and the curia; and for this cause he wrote and fought with great valor. The Epistolæ obscurorum virorum are, at least in part, his work. His Römische Dreifaltigkeit (1519) contains a more direct attack. At the diet of Augsburg (1518) and the crowning of Charles V. (1520) he spoke openly of a union between the German princes against the Pope. But the motive-power in this plan was political and social, rather than religious. Though often working in unison with the Reformers, Ulrich von Hutten was not a Reformer himself: he was only a humorist and a knight-errant. When it proved impossible to bring about such a union between the German princes against the Pope, he formed an idea of uniting the German nobility and free cities against the princes, calculating that the emperor hardly would oppose such a movement with any great vigor. He joined Franz von Sickingen, and the latter began a feud against the elector of Treves. But the undertaking miscarried completely. Hutten fled to Switzerland, suffering frightfully from a disease he had contracted in his early youth. Erasmus refused to see him. The magistrates of Zürich forbade him the city. Only by Zwingli's mediation he was allowed to go and die in peace in the house of an evangelical minister.

HUTTER, Elias, b. at Görlitz, 1554; d. at Augsburg or Francfort, 1605; studied at Jena, and taught Oriental languages at Rostock, Lübeck, Hamburg, Nürnberg, and other places, always occupied with the publication of some polyglot Bible. — the Hamburg polyglot in four languages, the Nürnberg polyglot in six languages, a New Testament in twelve languages, — a kind of work for which he had neither sufficient knowledge nor sufficient means. HUTTER, Leonhard, b. at Nellingen, near Ulm, in January, 1563; d. at Wittenberg, Oct. 23, 1616; studied philology, philosophy, and afterwards theology, at Strassburg, 1581-91; visited also the universities of Leipzig, Heidelberg, and Jena, and was in 1596 appointed professor of theology at Wittenberg. He was a typical representative of Lutheran orthodoxy in its older form, before its scholastic development, while it still confined itself to reproduction and polemics; and his Compendium locorum theologicorum (1610), written at the instance of the Elector Christian II. of Saxony, and destined to supersede the Loci of Melancthon, ran through many editions, and was translated into German and Swedish. It has recently been republished by Twesten (Berlin, 1855 and 1863), and brought into fresh attention by Hase's Hutterus redivivus. The Loci communes theologici, published after Hutter's death (1619), is simply a further elaboration of the Compendium. No less distinction he gained as a polemist, chiefly directing his attacks against the Calvinists: Calvinista aulico-politicus, 1610; Calvinista aulico-politicus alter, 1614; Concordia concors, 1614; Irenicum, 1614; etc. A Life of him, and a complete list of his Works by Ambros. HYDE, Thomas, Orientalist; b. at Billingsley, Yorkshire, Eng., June 29, 1636; d. at Oxford, Jan. 18, 1703. His taste for languages was so carefully nurtured by his father, that he made extraordinary progress, as is evinced by his assisting Walton upon his Polyglot when only seventeen years old. He became successively Hebrew reader at Oxford (1658), under-keeper of the Bodleian Library (1659), prebendary of Salisbury (1660), principal Bodleian librarian (1665-1701), archdeacon of Gloucester (1678), doctor of divinity (1682), Laudian Professor of Arabic (1691), Regius Professor of Hebrew, and Canon of Christ Church (1697). He was a master of Turkish, Arabic, Syriac, Persian, Hebrew, and Malay; he even studied Chinese. His principal work is Historia religionis veterum Persarum eorumque Magorum, Oxford, 1700, reprinted by Hunt and Costard, 1760. His miscellanies (Latin) under the title Syntagma dissertationum quas olim . . . T. Hyde sep. edidit appeared in 2 vols., Oxford, 1767, with a Life of Hyde prefixed.

HYGINUS was, according to Irenæus, the successor of Telesphorus, and reigned, according to Jaffé, from 139 to 142, — the eighth or ninth pope. The martyrologies give the 10th or 11th January as the date of his death. During his reign, the gnostics Cerdon, Valentine, and Marcion, appeared in Rome. See MURATORI: Her. Ital. Ser. iii.; JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 3; Act. Sanct., Jan. 11.

HYMNOLOGY. Definition. — A hymn is a spiritual meditation in rhythmical prose or verse. Its chief constituents are praise and prayer to God. The definition of Augustine is too narrow for our modern conception, when he says a "hymn must contain praise, must praise God, and be sung" (oportet, ut sit hymnus, habeat hæc tria, laudem et Dei et canticum: Ps. lxxii.). On the other hand, the definition of the Greek and Latin churches is too comprehensive when it includes praises to saints among hymns. The writers of the New Testament use three terms (Eph. v. 19, etc.) for Christian songs, — psalm (ψαλμός), hymn (ὑμνος), and spiritual ode (ὠδή πνευματικῆ). The word "hymn" was a common one among the Greeks, who with the Romans sang songs to their divinities and in honor of famous men. Such "hymns" are found in the poems of Homer, and Hesiod begins his Works and Days by invoking the Muses to sing "hymns" to Zeus, and speaks of them in his Theogony as singing "hymns to all the gods." Pindar expressly calls his odes "hymns." Paul, in his sermon on Mars Hill, quotes the words (Acts xvii. 28), "For we are his offspring," from a "hymn" of Aratus of Cilicia (third century B.C.). The Christian hymns differ from the hymns of heathen antiquity in their spirit and the object of worship, but not necessarily in form. It is addressed to God, or one of the three persons in the Trinity, and admits nothing unchaste. It is the communion of the soul with God.

Hymns have from the earliest times entered as an important element into the services of the sanctuary, and have contributed at all periods to the piety of the Church. At the creation "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy" (Job xxxviii. 7). Heaven itself is choral with anthems; and the angelic host sings, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory" (Isa. vi. 3). The best periods of Hebrew history were vocal with sacred song; and the fresh fervor of the early Christians found vent in singing. From the sixth century to this day, in the Greek and Latin churches, with some recent exceptions, the singing of hymns in the church has been restricted to the choir and clergy. The Flagellants of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries on the Continent (hymnos in latina vel vulgari lingua, "they sung hymns in the Latin or vulgar tongue," Summa hist., Antoninus Florentinus (d. 1450), and others), the Lollards of the fourteenth in England, and also the Hussites of Bohemia in the fifteenth, revived the use of sacred songs amongst the people. The Protestant Reformation, under the lead of Luther, himself a devoted singer and vigorous hymnist, vindicated the right of the people to the use of hymns, and again identified congregational song with the exercises of worship. The second Reformation in England in the last century was marked by great fertility in the production of hymns, in which the members of the Establishment (Toplady, Newton, etc.) vied with the leaders of the Methodist movement. Hymns, as Bishop Nicetius of Treves (c. 563) said (De Psalmodiæ bono), "have consoled the sad, checked the joyful, subdued the enraged, refreshed the poor." They have been on the tongues of believers in the first ardor of their faith, and have ascended as the last fervid utterances of martyrs at the stake, from Polycarp (Martyr. Polyc., § 14) to Hus, and Jerome of Prague, and are chanted by the church triumphant in the presence of the Redeemer (Rev. v. 9, xiv. 3, etc.). They are the common heritage of all believers, and bind together all ages. In them denominational distinctions are lost sight of; and it is made plain that Christian faith, hope, and love exist, in their purity, in all communions of the Church. The hymns of Ambrose, and John of Damascus, Luther and Tersteegen, Wesley and Toplady, Muhlenberg and John Henry Newman, stand side by side in our hymn-books, and are consentient in praise to the one God, and love for the one Saviour.

Hebrew Hymns. — From very early times the Hebrews sang hymns commemorating the might and excellency of Jehovah. The songs of Miriam (Exod. xv. 21), Moses (Exod. xv. 1-19; Deut. xxxii. 1-43), Deborah (Judg. v. 1 sqq.), and Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1-9), are sacred hymns, full of sublime imagery, and inflamed with a fervid devotion to Jehovah. The Book of Psalms is the oldest hymn-book in existence. Although sung by the shepherd of Bethlehem and other Psalmists, many centuries before Christ, it has been in all ages of the Christian Church, and continues to be, a fresh and living fountain of devotion and praise. Even in captivity the Hebrew people did not forget to sing, but mingled praises with their laments, although it was hard to sing "the Lord's song in a strange land" (Ps. cxxxvii. 4). The Psalms were sung to musical accompaniment (1 Chron. vi. 31; 2 Chron. xx. 21, etc.). Under David, and subsequently, the Jews had organized choirs; and there returned with Zerubabel more than two hundred "singing-men and singing-women" (Ez. ii. 65; Neh. vii. 67). See art. PSALMS.

Early Christian Hymns. — At the threshold of the Christian dispensation we have the sublime songs of Mary, called the Magnificat, from the first word of the Latin translation (Luke i. 46-55); of Zacharias, called the Benedictus, likewise from the Latin translation of the first word "blessed" (Luke i. 68-79); of the angels, called the Gloria in Excelsis, "Glory in the highest" (Luke ii. 18); and of Simon, called the Nunc Dimitis, "Now lettest" (Luke ii. 29-32). Other portions of the New Testament have so much the form of hymns as to give the impression that they are actually fragments of hymns (Acts iv. 24-30; Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16, vi. 16; Jas. i.

17; Rev. xv. 3, etc.). The Saviour, at the conclusion of the last passover, sang a hymn (a part of the Hallel, Ps. cxv.-cxviii.) with his disciples (Matt. xxvi. 30). The early Christians used hymns as a means of edification (1 Cor. xiv. 26; Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16), and interrupted the monotony, and checked the depression, of imprisonment by alternating prayer with song (Acts xvi. 25). It seems probable that the hymn in the public assembly was, like the prophecy and the discourse, sometimes the spontaneous product of the moment (1 Cor. xiv. 26).

There is evidence from heathen as well as Christian sources, that singing formed an important part of the Christian services in the post-apostolic age. Early in the second century, Pliny writes to Trajan that the Christians were in the habit of meeting before daylight, and of singing songs to Christ as God among themselves alternately (stato die ante lucem convenire carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem). Lord Selborne finds in the last words a reference to responsive singing. None of the hymns of the second century have been preserved. The hymn Light of Gladness, Beam Divine (φῶς ἰλαρόν), which is still sung in the Greek Church, has been attributed to Athenagenes (d. 169), but without sufficient reason. Basil (d. 379) refers to it as an ancient composition, but denies that Athenagenes was the author. The oldest Christian hymn in existence is Shepherd of Tender Youth (σὸμρον πῶλον), which Dr. Schaff, in Christ in Song, p. 547, characterizes as a "sublime but somewhat turgid song of praise to Christ." It is a free transfusion of a hymn of Clement of Alexandria, composed about the year 200. After the third century, it is convenient to distinguish between the hymnody of the Eastern and Latin churches.

Hymns of the Eastern Church. — So general and popular was the custom of singing hymns in the third century, that one of the charges put forth by the second council of Antioch (269), in its letter to the Bishops of Rome and Alexandria against Paul of Samosata, was that he had put a stop to it. In the fourth century, according to Theodoret (H. E., ii. 24), antiphonal singing was introduced into Constantinople, which in this respect followed the lead of the church of Antioch. While Chrysostom (d. 407) was archbishop of Constantinople, the Trinitarian party was accustomed to gather in the open spaces of the city, and marched in midnight processions, singing sacred music as an effective means of defeating the Arians, who had hymns of their own. According to Cardinal Pitra, the number of Greek hymns is very large; and, if those that have been published were collected, they would fill fifteen or twenty volumes, while the number that exist only in manuscripts is equally large.

Ephraem Syrus (d. about 378) is the father of Christian hymnody in the Syrian Church. He wrote in Syriac, and seems to have gotten the impulse to write hymns from the religious songs of the Gnostic poet, Bardesanes. He was a fertile writer. Theodoret speaks of Ephraem's hymns as sweet, and contributing much to the solemnity of festal occasions in his day. They commemorated some of the great facts in the Saviour's life from the nativity to the ascension, — the deaths of pious persons and the lives of martyrs.

Gregory Nazianzen (d. 390) and Anatolius (d. 458) are the two greatest hymn-writers of the period of formation (as Dr. Neale calls it) in Greek sacred poetry. From the latter we have the solemn hymn in three stanzas, beginning Fierce was the wild billow (Ζοερός τροχυμίας). The best hymns of the Eastern Church were produced in the next period, which Dr. Neale dates from 726 to 820. Among its hymn-writers were Romanus (d. about 720), to whom Cardinal Pitra ascribes twenty-five hymns, which excel in originality and vigor of expression; Cosmas (d. 780), surnamed the "Melodist;" John of Damascus (d. before 787), the great theologian of the Eastern Church, whose 'Tis the Day of Resurrection (ἀναστάσεως ἡμέρα) has passed into many English hymn-books; and Stephen of St. Sabas (d. 794), a convent in Palestine, near the Dead Sea, whose Art thou weary, art thou languid (κόπον τε καὶ κάματον) is the most simple and restful lyric in any language upon the words of Christ, "Come unto me, all ye that labor," etc. Still later than these are three other writers, whose names have made the convent of the Studium in Constantinople famous for all time. Theodore of the Studium (d. 826) and Joseph (d. about 830) are the most voluminous of all the Greek hymnists. A good specimen of the hymns of Theodore is the judgment-hymn, That Fearful Day, that Day of Dread (τὴν ἡμέραν τὴν φοβερὴν), and of Joseph, the hymn to Christ, Jesus, Lord of Life Eternal (Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ζωοδότης). The third, Theoctistus of the Studium (d. about 890), is best known by the hymn, Jesu, Name all Names above (Ἰησοῦ ὑψίστατε).

Hymns of the Latin Church.—The founders of Latin hymnology were Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers (d. 366), and Ambrose, Bishop of Milan (d. 397). Hilary was banished from Gaul to Asia Minor on account of his energetic advocacy of Trinitarian doctrines. He came into close contact with the Eastern Church, and on his return to his diocese was fitted to make the Book of Hymns, of which Jerome (d. 420) speaks. Daniel gives six hymns under his name, but it is doubtful whether a single one by him is in our possession. In the church at Milan, of which Ambrose was bishop, the singing of hymns was very popular. Augustine, speaking of the church music in that city, exclaims, "How have I wept at thy [Ambrose] hymns and canticles, bitterly moved by the voices sweetly resounding through thy church! Those strains flowed into my ears, and the truth distilled in my heart. My feelings of piety were enkindled, and tears fell from my eyes," etc. Ninety hymns are attributed to the Ambrosian school. At least twelve of these are by Ambrose himself. They combine vigor with simplicity, and tersely render the great facts and doctrines of Christianity. Good specimens are, Redeemer of all Nations, come (Veni, Redemptor), and Maker of all Things, Glorious God (Deus Creator).

Hymn-writing also flourished in Spain in the fifth century; and some of the finest Latin hymns are by Prudentius, a Spanish layman, who died in 405. His hymns, about fifteen in number, are taken from larger poems, and, according to Lord Selborne, are "full of fervor and sweetness." That on the birth of Christ, Bethlehem of Noblest Cities (O sola magnarum urbium) is one of the most finished and chaste on that event; and the hymn on the martyrs of Bethlehem, Hail, Infant Martyrs (Salvete flores martyrum), is justly admired. Sedulius, a native of Scotland or Ireland, of the fifth century, also wrote some fine hymns.

Gregory, Bishop of Rome (d. 604), and Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers (d. 609), mark the transition to the mediæval period of Latin hymnody. The Ambrosian music, which had held undisputed sway for two centuries, was supplanted by the Gregorian. The recitative was introduced, and public song in the church restricted to the choir of priests, the congregation being limited to the responses. The two best hymns of Fortunatus are, The Royal Banner is unfurled (Vexilla Regis), and Sing, my Tongue, the Saviour's Battle (Pange, lingua).

The hymns of the middle ages have their own peculiar characteristics. The joyful, jubilant tone of the Ambrosian and Prudentian hymns is no longer so prominent: they are set in the key of mystic fervor. Begotten in the cloister, they ring with the soft and subdued but ardent tones of contemplative devotion. The singers linger near the cross, and gaze upon the suffering agonies of its scenes, rather than breathe the clear air of the resurrection morning, or celebrate the triumphant exaltation and reign of Christ. Some of these hymns were by the most subtle theologians and devout saints, and, with some of the great theological ideas of Anselm, are the most precious legacies of the mediæval Church. Some of them have never been surpassed.

Amongst others we pass by, with simple mention, the Venerable Bede, the monk of Yarrow (d. 735), who was not only the father of English learning, but the first English hymn-writer; and Notker of St. Gall (d. 912), who was led by the sound of a mill-wheel to compose a new kind of hymns known as "sequences." One of the sweetest hymns of this period is ascribed to Robert, king of France (d. 1031), and has been appropriated by all hymn-books,—Come, Holy Ghost, in Love (Veni, Sancte Spiritus). Adam of St. Victor (d. 1172), whom Archbishop Trench and Dr. Neale agree in pronouncing "the greatest of mediæval poets," made the monastery of St. Victor, just outside the city of Paris, no less famous by his hymns, than his teacher, Hugo of St. Victor (d. 1135), had done by his writings, which founded the mysticism of mediæval France. In the judgment of Dr. Neale, his best hymn is Be the Cross our Theme and Story (Laudes crucis). Two other mediæval convents will always be associated with church hymnody. Clairvaux, through Bernard (d. 1153), the greatest man of his age, and one of the purest saints of any age, gave to the Church the hymn Hail, thou Head, so bruised and wounded (Salve, Caput cruentatum), and a poem of two hundred lines, from which have been taken the three hymns,—Jesus, the very Thought of thee (Jesu, dulcis memoria), Jesus, thou Joy of Loving Hearts (Jesu, dulcedo cordium), and

O Jesus, King most Wonderful (Jesu, rex admirabilis). Cluny, through another Bernard, gave to the Church a long poem of three thousand lines, from which have been extracted several hymns breathing an ardent longing for the heavenly country, of which Jerusalem, the Golden (Urbs Syon aurea) is the most familiar.

The grandest hymn of the middle ages, and perhaps of all ages, is the Dies Iræ of Thomas of Celano (d. about 1250), the friend and biographer of Francis d'Assisi. It has never been equalled as a sublime and reverential description of the awe and terror of the last judgment, and has exercised the skill of many translators. Walter Scott, without translating the letter, has preserved the spirit, of the original in the three verses beginning,—

"That day of wrath, that dreadful day,
When heaven and earth shall pass away!"

Dr. Schaff says (Christ in Song, p. 290), "This marvellous hymn is the acknowledged masterpiece of Latin poetry, and the most sublime of all uninspired hymns. It is one of those rare productions which can never die, but which increase in value as the ages advance. The secret of its irresistible power lies in the awful grandeur of the theme, the intense earnestness and pathos of the poet, the simple majesty and solemn music of its language," etc. If the Dies Iræ excels all other hymns in grandeur, then another hymn of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater ("At the Cross her station keeping") of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow charms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages the greatest are Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and Bonaventura (d. 1274). To the former belong four sacramental hymns,—Sing, my Tongue, the Mystery telling (Pange, lingua gloriosi), etc.; to the latter, Jesus, thy Holy Cross and Dying (Recordare sanctæ crucis). To this class of hymns, though later in time, belong the hymns of Francis Xavier (d. 1552), the famous missionary to China (Jesus, I love thee, not because), and of Saint Theresa (d. 1582); and in general it may be said that the best hymns of the Roman-Catholic Church since, like those of Madame Guyon, the Lead, Kindly Light of John Henry Newman, and the hymns of Faber, are set in the key of mediæval hymnody.

German Hymns.—Germany possesses not only a more voluminous but a richer hymnology than any other country. In 1786 Ludwig von Hardenberg prepared a list of 72,732 German hymns, arranged in alphabetical order. The number now cannot be far from a hundred thousand; and among these are many of the choicest pieces of religious poetry, overflowing with devotion, and praise to the Redeemer. The introduction of hymns and congregational singing into the public services was one of the first results of the Reformation in Germany, and that country had a fine supply of hymns long before any were composed in English.

The father of German hymnody, as of German church music, was Martin Luther (d. 1546). Among the works of Hus (d. 1415) which the Bohemian Brethren sent to Luther were that martyr's hymns; and he subsequently made a free translation of Hus's Jesus Christus, nostra Salus. In 1523 Luther published eight hymns of his own, which had increased to a hundred and twenty-five in 1545. These hymns were carried by travelling singers from village to village, and sung into the hearts of the German people. Coleridge's statement was exaggerated, namely that "Luther did as much for the Reformation by his hymns as by his translation of the Bible;" but his hymns were effective agencies for spreading the Reformation. The Roman-Catholic theologian Conzenius (1620) wrote that the "hymns of Luther have destroyed more souls than his writings and sermons."

Luther's hymns were joyful and confident outbursts of a manly and unwavering trust in God. His whole personality breathes through Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, translated by Carlyle "A safe Stronghold our God is still." It was the triumphant trumpet-blast of the Reformation, and bade defiance to satanic and human foes. It is as much the great popular song of the German nation as Luther himself is the hero and typical representative of German life. His other hymns are pregnant with Christian thought and joyfulness; as, Nun freut euch, liebe Christeng'mein ("Dear Christian people, now rejoice"). Luther had co-laborers in this field. Among these were Justus Jonas, Eber, and Michael Weiss (d. 1540). The latter, in 1531, edited German translations of the hymns of the Bohemian Brethren, to which he added some of his own.

The Lutheran Church was not only in advance of the Reformed Church of Germany in the department of hymnody, but its contributions have continued to be much the more numerous. The best hymn-writer of the sixteenth century was Philip Nicolai (d. 1608), a pious preacher. During a violent pestilence in 1597, he wrote one of the grandest and also one of the sweetest hymns in the German or any other language, Wachet auf! ruft uns die Stimme ("Wake! the startling watch-cry pealeth"), and Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern ("How lovely shines the Morning Star!"),—two hymns which rise up side by side like twin peaks. The period of the Thirty-years' War (1618–48) was fruitful in fine hymns, among which are the battle-song of Gustav Adolph (d. 1632), before the fatal day of Lützen, Verzage nicht, du Häuflein klein ("Fear not, O little flock, the foe"), and the very rugged thanksgiving hymn of Rink-art (d. 1649), which is so popular in Germany, Nun danket alle Gott ("Now thank we all our God"), and has been called the national Te Deum. Among the most fertile hymn-writers of this period was Johann Heermann (d. 1647), a pastor who hardly knew what it was to have a day free from pain, and whose hymns are the products of a rich Christian experience. The hymns of Scheffler (d. 1677), better known as Angelus Silesius, from his native province, Silesia, are full of pathos, and devotion to the Master, which his transition to the Catholic Church (in 1661) did not change. One of his sweetest hymns is Ich will dich lieben, meine Stärke ("Thee will I love, my Strength, my Tower").

German hymnology reached its culminating point in Paul Gerhardt, a Lutheran pastor (d. 1676). Knapp calls him "beyond dispute, the first of German church poets." More than thirty of his hundred and twenty-three hymns are classical. Among his finest are O Haupt voll Blut u. Wunden ("O sacred Head now wounded"), Wie soll ich dich empfangen ("Oh! how shall I receive Thee"), and Befehl du deine Wege ("Give the winds thy fears"); but it is difficult to make a selection where so many are so uniformly excellent.

The first hymn-writer of the Reformed Church was Joachim Neander (d. 1680), who died, as pastor in Bremen, at the early age of thirty. He came under the influence of Spener. His hymns are "full of spiritual depth and unction." His Lobe den Herren den mächtigen König der Ehren ("Praise to Jehovah! the Almighty King of Creation") is a jubilant song of thanksgiving, and one of the most popular in Germany. The school of Pietists, of the latter part of this and the beginning of the eighteenth century, was fertile in the production of hymns: Spener (d. 1705), Franke (1727), and Freylinghausen (d. 1739) were the most prominent. Schmolke (d. 1737), a pastor in Silesia, was a copious author of hymns. They are pervaded with Christian warmth and devotion, and some of them are of perpetual value. His Mein Jesu wie du wilt has passed into many English collections in the translation, "My Jesus, as Thou wilt." One of the most voluminous writers of hymns in this century was Hiller (d. 1769), a pastor in Württemberg. Albert Knapp, who gives twice as many (two hundred and sixty-four) of his hymns as of any other author, speaks with enthusiasm of the powerful influence which they have exercised upon the spiritual life of Southern Germany.

Allied in devotional, almost mystical fervor, are the hymns of Count Zinzendorf (d. 1760) and Tersteegen (d. 1769.) The former was the founder of the Moravian community at Herrnhut, and produced many fine hymns, two hundred and five of which have passed into the Moravian hymn-book in the English language. Wesley translated and freely transfused some of them. Christi Blut und Gerechtigkeit ("Jesus, thy Blood and Righteousness") is a good example of his style. Tersteegen was a layman in the Reformed Church, and published a hundred and eleven hymns, some of which are very fine and very popular. Gott ist gegenwärtig, lasset uns anbeten ("Lo, God is here, let us adore"), is one of the best. Novalis, whose real name was Hardenberg, died prema-turally, at the age of twenty-nine (1801), but left behind him some glowing hymns, of which the best are Ich sage jedem dass er lebt ("I say to all men far and near"), and Wenn ich ihn nur habe ("If I only have Thee"). Lavater, who died the same year, also left behind some excellent hymns, of which Jesus Christ, wachst du in mir ("Jesus Christ, grow thou in me"), is much sung.

The early part of the present century witnessed a great revival of interest in church hymnody in Germany. It was led by Schleiermacher, Claus Harms, Arndt (c. Wort u. Kirchenlied, 1819), and others, and was contemporary with, if not a product of, the great national Luther tri-centennial of 1817. The hymns of the old writers had been subjected to ruthless treatment at the hands of the rationalists and literati of the eighteenth century. Even such a man as Schlegel felt justified, in order to avoid the elision, to alter the first line of Luther's great hymn to "Ein starker Schutz." This movement was inaugurated by Justus Gesenius in his hymnological collection (1647). The better taste of the early part of the present century demanded the restoration of hymns to their original form. In this direction Bunsen, Stier, Daniel, Knapp, and others did good service by their hymnological collections.

Many fine hymns have been added during the present century to the already rich and well-filled stores of Germany. Arndt (d. 1860), Friedrich Rückert (d. 1867), Meta Heusser (d. 1876), a Swiss poetess, and others, have made their offerings. But the two most copious contributors have been Spitta (d. 1859) and Albert Knapp (d. 1864). The former's Psalter und Harfe ("Psalter and Harp"), a collection of sacred lyrics, had a very wide circulation, and contains some very fine hymns. One of his best is Alles schwindet; Herzen brechen ("All is dying, hearts are breaking"). One of the best of Knapp's is Eines wünsch ich mir vor allem andern ("More than all, one thing my heart is craving"). The first living hymnist of Germany is Prälat Karl Gerok, formerly court-preacher to the king of Württemberg, and author of some choice collections of sacred lyrics.

French Hymns. — Calvin, like Luther, advocated congregational singing; and quite recently a hymn by him was found in an old Genevese prayer-book. It was printed in 1868. The opening line is Je Te salue, mon certain Rédempteur ("I greet Thee, who my sure Redeemer art.") See Christ in Song, p. 549. While Calvin was at Strassburg he came into possession of some of Clement Marot's versions of the Psalms without knowing they were his, and had them set to music. These with five original versions of Ps. xxv., xxxvi., xlvi., xci., cxxxviii., the Apostles' Creed, and the Song of Simeon, and the Decalogue in verse (by his own hand), he published at Strassburg, 1539, under the title Aulcuns Pseaumes et Cantiques mys en chant. This book, consisting of twenty-one pieces, with the tune at the beginning of each psalm, but without preface or the name of the author, was the first collection of psalms in the French Reformed Church. Marot (d. at Turin, 1544) in 1541 received permission to publish the Trente Psaumes ("Thirty Psalms"), which appeared the following year with a dedication to Charles V. In 1543 he published Cinquante Psaumes ("Fifty Psalms"). After Marot's death, Beza added translations of other psalms; but it was not till 1562 that a complete collection of the whole Psalter appeared. Marot's versions are felicitous, and with few changes continue to be sung to the present day in the French churches. Claude Goudimel set them to music.

The hymnology of the French churches is meagre. To César Malan (d. 1864), according to Vinet, belongs the honor of restoring the hymn to them. In connection with Bost (d. 1874) he published in 1824 a collection of French hymns, under the title Chants de Sion, which appeared in an improved form in 1841, under the title Chants Chrétiens. Malan wrote more than a thousand hymns. The hymn for the dying, Non, ce n'est pas mourir ("No, no, it is not dying"), is familiar to English ears. The Chants chrétiens has incorporated some fine hymns and psalms from Roman-Catholic writers, as Bishop Godeau (d. 1672), who published a collection of elegant translations of the Psalms (Les psaumes de David traduits en vers français), Corneille (d. 1684), Racine (d. 1699), Madame Guyon (d. 1717), and others. Madame Guyon's hymns are distinguished by graceful composition and devotional fervor. A number of them were translated by Cowper, who could fully sympathize with the mystical temper of their author, and some are found in English hymn-books.

HYMNOLOGY, English and American. Notwithstanding the great antiquity of religious poetry, English hymnology is one of the latest fruits of the English mind. A hymn is defined in the dictionaries to be a sacred lyric, or a song of praise to God; but this would include psalms, which are now distinguished from hymns proper. The word "psalm" does not differ materially in its etymological signification from the word "hymn," each meaning "a sacred song or hymn." But by a psalm we now mean, either one of the Psalms of David, or a version of one; while a Christian hymn is a song of praise to God, generally based upon some thought or form of words found in the Bible. The propriety of using in Christian worship any metrical compositions except versions of the Psalms of David, was not readily conceded by our conservative forefathers; and a century, almost, had elapsed after the Reformation before hymns were looked upon with favor.

By far the greatest portion of the most ancient English literature was founded upon the Bible, and at a very early date large portions of the Scriptures were put into a metrical form. There is no evidence that these compositions were intended to be used in worship, though as late as the reign of Edward VI. it was contended that all Scripture should be versified and sung; and the first fourteen chapters of the Acts of the Apostles were actually so used in the royal chapel, and the Books of Genesis and Kings were done into metre with a like intent.

In the same reign a zealous reformer, Thomas Sternhold, who had been groom of the robes to Henry VIII., and held the same office under Edward, "became so scandalized at the amorous and obscene songs used in the court, that he, forsooth, turned into English metre fifty-one of David's Psalms, and caused musical notes to be set to them, thinking thereby that the courtiers would sing them, instead of their sonnets; but they did not, only some few excepted" (WOOD: Athenæ Oxonienses).

This was the beginning of the version of the Psalms still known under the names of Sternhold and Hopkins. The first edition (1548 or 1549) comprised but nineteen psalms; but others were added in successive editions, until in 1562 all the Psalms had been translated, and annexed to the prayer-book.

The year after this publication, Sir Philip Sidney was born. His name is associated with a metrical version of the Psalms made in connection with his sister, the Countess of Pembroke; but it remained in manuscript until the present century. The version of Sternhold and Hopkins stood the test of use for nearly a hundred years: but, at about the middle of the seventeenth century, complaint was made of its "obsolescence;" and in 1646 there appeared a new version, printed under authority of the House of Commons, by Francis Rous, a member of Parliament, who afterwards became one of Cromwell's privy council, and was privileged to sit in the Westminster Assembly among the few laymen there.

A half-century later the version of Tate and Brady appeared. In the mean time a number of singers had enriched the religious literature of our tongue. Herbert and Vaughan, Southwell and Milton, Jeremy Taylor, and Richard Baxter, all wrote elevating poetry, which has not yet lost its power to lift up the spiritual mind; but their productions can hardly be called hymns. In 1683 John Mason, grandfather of the author of the Treatise on Self-knowledge, published thirty-three Songs of Praise, which obtained some popularity, and were, perhaps, the first hymns actually used in public worship. That none of these writers had succeeded in firmly establishing this use of hymns is evident from the fact, that, when Isaac Watts presented his hymns to the public, he entered into a long prefatory argument, as a "bold and determined innovator," in favor of the right to found hymns on "any portion" of Scripture. The practice of doing this was, however, an ancient one. The old Latin and Greek hymns, largely produced during the so-called "dark ages," have of late come back into use, to the great enrichment of our collections; and they, we know, were used in public worship. Still, so strong was the attachment of the people to psalmody, that they were unwilling to countenance the use of words, though expressing scriptural thoughts and aspirations, which were not also simple versions of the psalms used in the service of the Jewish temple.

To Watts — the orthodox dissenter, though overflowing with Christian love for members of all denominations — it was given substantially to create English hymnology. Bishop Ken had preceded him, and had fixed his Doxology in English hymn-books forever; the persecuted Romanist, John Austin, had given the church the hymn, Hark, my Soul, how Every thing; Joseph Addison had written, The Spacious Firmament on High, and other hymns now found in our hymnals; and John Byrom had written his then unpublished hymns: but none of these had made any determined attempt to supersede the Psalter. English hymnology may, therefore, be said to have begun in the year 1707, when Isaac Watts published his first hymns, — hymns that were so much superior to all that had gone before them as to force their way into acceptance, and to live to the present day among those most loved and most often used.

Watts was followed by imitators, many of whom produced hymns that are still found in all collections. Among these were Simon Browne, who wrote Come, Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove; Thomas Gibbons, author of Now let our Souls, on Wings sublime; Benjamin Beddome, who wrote Did Christ o'er Sinners weep? John Fawcett, author of Blest be the Tie that binds; Thomas Haweis, author of From the Cross uplifted high; Thomas Stennett, who wrote Majestic Sweetness sits Enthroned, Thomas Scott, author of Angels, roll the Rock away, and others.

Before the peaceful life of Dr. Watts had closed, the next great leader in English hymnology had arisen. He was an outgrowth of the stirring scenes in the midst of which grew up the Wesleyan body. There had been meetings at Oxford in 1729, meetings in Savannah (Ga.) in 1736, and in 1739 the formation of the United Society of Methodists. There had been spiritual struggles, opposition to the apathy that the members of the new reform saw in the Established Church, protests against the want of enthusiasm in religious life which marked the times; and the new hymnology reflected all of it. A body of Christians so enthusiastic as the early Methodists could not live without the service of song, and they needed more stirring lyrics than those of Watts and his school. The demand insured the supply. All of the Wesleys were able to give metrical utterance to feeling; but the singer among them was Charles, who produced seven thousand hymns.

The first were published in 1739, and the last after the writer's death. They illustrate his experience, and for that reason appeal to all hearts. The hymn Glory to God, and Praise and Love (usually beginning "Oh for a thousand tongues to sing") was written in commemoration of Wesley's "witness of adoption," which occurred, he states, on Whitsunday, May 21, 1737. Among Charles Wesley's hymns are, Come, Thou Almighty King; Hark, How all the Welkin rings! Thou God of Glorious Majesty (usually beginning "Lo, on a narrow neck of land"); Love Divine all Love excelling; Blow ye the Trumpet, blow; and Jesus, Lover of my Soul.

Wesley was followed by Thomas Olivers, author of The God of Abraham praise; John Cennick, who wrote Children of the Heavenly King; Augustus Montague Toplady, the doctrinal opponent, though the poetical child, of Wesley, who wrote A Living and Dying Prayer for the Holiest Believer in the World (which begins "Rock of Ages, cleft for me"), and Your Harps, ye Trembling Saints.

Among the hymn-writers who followed, before the present century, were William Hammond (Awake, and sing the Song of Moses and the Lamb), Joseph Hart (Come, ye Sinners, Poor and Wretched), William Cowper (What Various Hindrances we meet), Samuel Medley (Mortals, awake, with Angels join), William Williams (Guide me, O thou Great Jehovah), John Ryland (Sovereign Ruler of the Skies), Joseph Griggs (Behold! a Stranger's at the Door), Edward Perronet (All hail the Power of Jesus' Name), Robert Seagrave (Rise, my Soul, and stretch thy Wings), and Robert Robinson (Come, thou Fount of every Blessing). Philip Doddridge was one of the most successful hymn-writers of the period. He was a warm friend of Dr. Watts, though much his junior. He wrote nearly four hundred hymns, among which were To-morrow, Lord, is Thine; Do not I love thee, O my Lord? Ye Servants of the Lord; Hark! the Glad Sound, the Saviour comes; Grace, 'tis a Charming Sound; and Awake, my Soul, stretch every Nerve.

Two women who lived in the latter half of the last century — Mrs. Barbauld and Anne Steele — mark the beginning of the line of hymn-writers of the gentler sex that has so greatly enriched English hymnology during the present century. Mrs. Barbauld is known as a writer of considerable repute beyond her hymns, but Miss Steele was a hymn-writer only. She wrote from experience gained in a life of suffering and bereavement; and it has been said that no woman, and but few men, have written so many hymns that have had general acceptance in the Church. Of her productions (a hundred and forty-four in number) the following are familiar: Father, whate'er of Earthly Bliss; He lives, the Great Redeemer lives; Father of Mercies, in thy Word; and Far from these Narrow Scenes of Night. Among the hymns of Mrs. Barbauld are, Come, said Jesus' Sacred Voice; Praise to God, Immortal Praise; and How blest the Righteous when he dies!

To this period belongs Henry Kirke White, the youthful genius in whom Southey was so much interested. His When marshalled on the Nightly Plain, Oft in Danger, oft in Woe, and Through Sorrow's Night and Danger's Path, reflect his personal experience, and hold a prominent place in many hymn-books. The last to be mentioned in this period is John Newton, whose remarkable experience was much more phenomenal than that of White, and has left its mark on his hymns. Among his productions that are well known are, By Faith in Christ I walk with God; One there is above all Others; How Sweet the Name of Jesus sounds! Safely through another Week; Amazing Grace, how Sweet the Sound! Come, my Soul, thy Suit prepare; Approach, my Soul, the Mercy-seat; and Glorious Things of thee are spoken, Zion, City of our God. Few hymns are more explicitly records of experience (and the writer said plainly that they were such) than those of Newton.

English hymnology has been enriched during the present century from two chief sources besides natural growth. The so-called "Oxford" movement, and the contributions of writers belonging, like Edward Caswall, J. H. Newman, and Frederick W. Faber, to the Roman-Catholic communion, have both given us many hymns that are accepted by Christians of every name as true outpourings of the pious heart. John Keble, the poetical leader in the Oxford movement, published in 1827 the most extensively circulated book of religious poetry of modern times,—The Christian Year. J. H. Newman wrote, Lead, kindly Light. John Mason Neale, a practical philanthropist, as well as a scholar and a poet, opened to modern Christians the wealth of mediæval Greek and Latin hymnology, and enriched our collections with such translations as Fierce was the Wild Billow; The Royal Banners forward go; Safe Home, Safe Home, in Port; The World is very Evil; Jerusalem the golden; and a number of others that the Church will not willingly let die. We mention also Earl Nelson (O Wisdom, spreading mightily), Sir Henry Williams Baker (How Welcome was the Call), John S. B. Monsell (Birds have their Quiet Nest, Soon and Forever, such Promise our Trust), William Chatterton Dix (As with Gladness Men of Old), Francis Turner Palgrave (Star of Morn and Even), Dean Henry Alford (Saviour of them that trust in thee), Mrs. Cecil Frances Alexander (When wounded sore, the Stricken Soul), Christopher Wordsworth (O Day of Rest and Gladness).

The Moravian, James Montgomery, was one of the early hymn-writers of the century; and, though he was a poet of but mediocre talent, he has fixed his name in the collections by certain hymns, such as Songs of Praise the Angels sang; Go to Dark Gethsemane; Oh! where shall Rest be found? Hark! the Song of Jubilee; Forever with the Lord; and What are these in Bright Array? In spite of their want of poetic fire, these hymns have proved, as the author himself says, "acceptable vehicles of expression of the experience of his fellow-creatures during the pilgrimage of the Christian life."

There remain to be mentioned among the women of the present century Harriet Auber (Our Blessed Redeemer, ere he breathed his Last Farewell), Charlotte Elliott (Just as I am, without one Plea), Sarah Flower Adams (Nearer, my God, to thee), and Frances Ridley Havergal (I gave my Life for thee).

Reginald Heber, the saintly bishop of Calcutta (d. 1826), was author of Brightest and Best of the Sons of the Morning; By Cool Siloam's Shady Rill; Thou art gone to the Grave, but we will not deplore thee; and other hymns of merit. Later in the century the number of hymn-writers greatly increased. Among them were Henry Francis Lyte, who wrote Jesus, I my Cross have taken, and that almost faultless hymn, Abide with me, fast falls the Eventide. Sir John Bowring (1792-1872) was author of some of the best hymns of our day, among which are God is Love, his Mercy brightens; In the Cross of Christ I glory; and Watchman, tell us of the Night. Sir Robert Grant (1785-1838) wrote Oh! worship the King, all Glorious above; When Gathering Clouds around I view; and Saviour, when in Dust to Thee,—showing a deep spirituality that marked his character while he was involved in the responsibility of public affairs. Among the later writers of this century are Josiah Conder (1789-1855), a friend of Montgomery and Chalmers (The Lord is King, lift up thy Voice), James Edmeston, 1791-1867 (Saviour, breathe an Evening Blessing), a London architect, Thomas Toke Lynch, 1818-71 (Gracious Spirit, dwell with me), Joseph Anstice, 1808-36 (When came in Flesh the Incarnate Word), Horatius Bonar, b. 1808 (I heard the Voice of Jesus say), and Thomas Hornblower Gill, b. 1819 (Father, thine Elect who lovest). Of the last, Professor F. M. Bird, the hymnologist, has said that his hymns were destined to a long life, though they were scarcely less innovations at the time they appeared than those of Wesley were in 1739.

Hymnology has not developed in America as it has in England, chiefly, perhaps, because we have had the riches of the mother-country to make choice from, and needed only such lyrics as a few different circumstances rendered necessary; still, American poets have made considerable contributions to this department of letters. Timothy Dwight (1752-1817), president of Yale College from 1795 to 1800, wrote I love thy Kingdom, Lord, and other hymns that still live. James Waddell Alexander (1804-59) translated from the German of Gerhardt the hymn which the latter had derived from the Latin of St. Bernard, O Sacred Head, now wounded. Bishop George W. Doane (1799-1859) wrote Softly now the Light of Day. Bishop Henry Ustick Onderdonk (1789-1858) wrote The Spirit in our Hearts, and When, Lord, to this our Western Land. The saintly William Augustus Muhlenberg (1796-1877) wrote Like Noah's Weary Dove, and I would not live away. The poets, William Cullen Bryant (1794-1879), John Pierpont (1785-1866), and Phœbe Cary (1824-71) wrote respectively, Oh, deem not they are blest alone; The Winds are hushed, the Peaceful Moon; and One Sweetly Solemn Thought. Samuel Davies (1724-61) wrote at an earlier period, Lord, I am Thine, entirely Thine; and Edward Hamilton Sears (1810-76), Calm on the Listening Ear of Night, and It came upon the Midnight Clear, that Glorious Song of Old. Among the latest American hymn-writers are Bishop Arthur Cleveland Coxe, b. 1818 (Oh! where are Kings and Empires now?), Ray Palmer, b. 1808 (My Faith looks up to Thee), and Oliver Wendell Holmes, b. 1809, who wrote O Love Divine, that stooped to share, and Lord of all Being, throned afar.

The progress of English hymnology has been from rugged style and gross conceptions to elegance and strength of style, and spirituality of conception. The hymns of the present day are superior in almost every respect to those that satisfied our ancestors, though we cull from earlier compositions many a gem to adorn our books of sacred lyrics, and often sing their rugged psalms, and read their sacred poems, to arouse our sometimes dull spirituality. The best hymn-books of to-day unite the mediæval productions of the Greek and Latin Church with the hymns of Watts and Wesley, and the sweet expressions of the experience of a Lyte or a Muhlenburg. There has been a steady growth; but we cannot leave the past behind, with its rich experiences and consecrated expression of a living Christianity.

HYPATIA, b. in Alexandria, about the middle of the fourth century; a daughter of the philosopher and mathematician Théon; stood, in the beginning of the fifth century, as the recognized head of the Neo-Platonic school; attracted large audiences to her lectures in Athens and Alexandria by her learning and eloquence; and was generally beloved and esteemed in her native city on account of her beauty and virtue. One day she was assailed in the streets by a Christian mob, which dragged her from her chariot into a neighboring church, cut her into pieces by oyster-shells, and burnt her. According to Socrates (Hist. Eccl., vii. 15), the fury of the mob was due to the fanaticism of the Nitrian monks; according to Suidas, to the intrigues of Cyril. A Latin letter addressed to Cyril, and found in Baluze (Concil., i. 216), is ascribed to her; but it is spurious. Several letters, however, addressed to her by Synesius, once her disciple, and afterwards bishop of Ptolemais, are still extant. Traces of her life re-appear in the legend of St. Catharine, according to Mrs. JAMESON: Sacred and Legendary Art. She forms the subject of a kind of historical romance: Hypatia, by CHARLES KINGSLEY, London, 1853.

HYPERIUS, Andreas Gerhard, b. at Ypres (whence Hyperius), May 16, 1511; d. at Marburg, Feb. 1, 1564; studied in Paris 1528-35; travelled in Germany; embraced the Reformation; visited England 1537-41; and was in 1542 appointed professor of theology at Marburg. He was a man of a mild and conciliatory temper,—a representative of that school of theology which endeavored to mediate between the different Protestant parties, and soften down the theological ire. On the formation of the evangelical theology he exercised a considerable influence. He is the father of homiletics; and his De formandis concionibus sacris (1553) and Topica theologica (1561) were extensively used, even by Roman-Catholic preachers. His exegetical works, partly published among his Opuscula (two collections, 1570 and 1580), and partly edited independently by I. Mylius (1592-84), are among the best productions of the kind which the time presented. His Methodus theologice remained unfinished. HYPOSTASIS (ὑπόστασις, substantia, or subsistentia), a term occurring in the Trinitarian controversies, and used in various dialectical combinations with οὐσία (essentia) and πρόσωπον (persona). The Council of Alexandria, however (362), finally defined hypostasis as synonymous with person.

HYPSTARIANS, a religious sect living in Cappadocia in the fourth century. It was a singular mixture of Paganism and Judaism. It retained the worship of fire and light, but rejected all image-worship. It retained the Sabbath, the regulations of diet, etc., but rejected the circumcision. All we know of this sect is derived from Gregory Nazianzen (Orat., xviii. 5), who belonged to it before his conversion to Christianity, and Gregory of Nyssa (Adv. Eunomium, 2, 2). See ULLMANN: De Hyss., Heidelberg, 1833; and BÖHMNER: De Hyss., Berlin, 1834.

HYRCANUS I., John, a member of the Asmonæan family; king and high priest of the Jews; d. 105 B.C. He was a son of Simon Maccabæus, and, at the murder of his father and two brothers, fell heir to the two highest dignities of his nation (135 B.C.). The same Ptolemy who had murdered his father intended to put him out of the way likewise; but Hyrcanus escaped, and afterwards established himself firmly in the possession of his power by arms against Ptolemy, and by a tribute of five hundred talents to Antiochus VII. After the latter's death (128 B.C.) he extended his kingdom over Samaria and Idumea, and strengthened his throne by a treaty with the Romans. In the latter part of his reign the antagonism between the Pharisees and Sadducees began to show itself. Hyrcanus followed the traditions of his house, and favored the former party (Joseph., Antiq., xiii. 10, 5), until they clamored for his resignation of the high priestly office, when he went over to the Sadducees. Schürer says of his reign, that "it was the most glorious Israel had seen since the days of Solomon." See WERNER: Johann Hyrcan, Wernigerode, 1877; SCHÜRER: N. T.liche Zeitgeschichte, pp. 107-117, Leipzig, 1874; EWALD: History of Israel, vol. iv.; STANLEY: History of the Jewish Church, iii.

HYRCANUS II., grandson of Hyrcanus I., and high priest of the Jews; was executed 30 B.C. He was a weak character, easily deceived, and the dupe or tool of others for forty years. At the death of his mother Alexandra (69 B.C.), who had succeeded to the throne at her husband's death (78 B.C.), his younger brother disputed his rightful accession to power by arms, defeated him, and forced him not only to renounce the kingly office, but even the high priestly dignity, to which he had been elevated at his father's death. He was, however, induced by the artifice and ambition of Antipater, the founder of the Herodian family, to repent his action, and, escaping from Jerusalem by night, fled to Petra. When Pompey advanced upon Damascus (in 64 B.C.), he sought his favor, and the year following was restored by him to the high priesthood. In this office he was confirmed by Cæsar (47 B.C.), and received a nominal civil jurisdiction at the side of Antipater, the procurator of Judæa. When the Parthians overran the land, and plundered Jerusalem (40 B.C.), they took Hyrcanus prisoner, cut off his ears in order to unfit him forever for the high priesthood, placed his son Antigonus in that office, and took him into captivity. He returned to Jerusalem in 36 B.C., but was put to death by Herod the Great, who had married his beautiful daughter Mariamne in order to avoid the possibility of his royal claims being recognized by the Romans, and to annihilate the influence of the name "Asmonæan" upon the Jews, his subjects. See SCHÜRER: N. Tliche Zeitgesch., pp. 173-183; EWALD: Hist. of Israel, iv.; STANLEY: History of the Jewish Church, iii., pp. 453-475; art. MACCABEES.

HYSTASPES, or HYDASPES. Among the Christians of the first century, there circulated a prophetic-apocalyptic book, pretending to be the work of the Persian or Median wise man and king, Hystaspes, and to contain prophecies of Christ and his kingdom. It was one of those pseudepigraphous compositions which at that time were made in great number, and of various forms, for apologetic purposes. Generally they were ascribed to some person of the old covenant; but, as soon as Christianity penetrated into the Pagan world, the attempt was made, not only to interpret real dicta of elder Pagan seers and poets with a Christian intention, but also to manufacture heathen prophecies of Christianity. The most remarkable productions of this kind were the so-called "Sibylline books," much used by the apologists and fathers from the second to the fourth century; and they found their Oriental counterpart in the Vaticinia Hystaspis.

The book is spoken of by three of the fathers, — Justin (Apolog., i. 20 and 44), Clement of Alexandria (Strom., v. 6, § 43), and Lactantius (Instit. div., vii. 15, 18; Epitom., T. ii. p. 69). Of the author, Justin and Clement say nothing; but Lactantius adds that he was an ancient Median king, living before the Trojan war. In spite of the chronological confusion, it is probable that Lactantius here thinks of the father of King Darius I., of whom Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiii. 6) tells us that he had learnt much wisdom and many secret arts from the Brahmins of India, and again taught them to the magians. Cyathius, a Byzantine historian from the sixth century, speaks (Hist., ii. 24) of a Hystaspes, a contemporary of Zoroaster, without deciding whether or not he was identical with the father of Darius. It is evident that we here meet with traces of the Persian myths about the Bactrian king Vistaspa, or Gustasp, a contemporary of Zoroaster; and we may safely assume that the Vaticinia Hystaspis were founded on Persian reminiscences, though the scanty notices of the book which have come down to us do not allow us to form any explicit opinion of its form, contents, or tendency.

IBAS succeeded Rabulas as bishop of Edessa in 435, though he had previously opposed him very strenuously in his endeavors to have the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia condemned as heretical. But when he undertook, in connection with two other residents of Edessa (Cumas and Probus), to translate these writings into Syriac, he was accused, by the patriarch Proclus and Emperor Theodosius II., of propagating the Nestorian heresies, and was deposed by the Robber Synod of Ephesus, Aug. 22, 449. He was reinstated, however, by the synod of Chalcedon (451), and died Oct. 28, 457. Parts of his epistle to Mares of Beth-Hardashir (Seleucia) on the Tigris, of great interest as an authentic document from the very time of the Nestorian controversy, have been preserved in a Greek translation among the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, and are found in MANSI: Concil., VII. He is not recognized by the Jacobites. See ASSEMANI: Bib. Orient., I. p. 200. E. NESTLE.

ICELAND, an island belonging to Denmark, situated in the North Atlantic Ocean, just south of the polar circle, 130 miles south-east of Greenland, and 850 miles west of Norway, comprises an area of 39,200 square miles, with about 70,000 inhabitants. In the latter part of the eighth century the country was visited by Celtic monks from Ireland: in the middle of the ninth century it was settled by Norwegian emigrants. The settlers were Pagans; but, through their intercourse with the mother-country, they became acquainted with Christianity during the tenth century, and in 1000 Christianity was officially established as the religion of the country. In 1055 an episcopal see was founded at Skalholt, and in 1106 another at Holar. The tithe was introduced in 1096, and an ecclesiastical code was promulgated in 1125. The country belonged first to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen, then to that of Lund (1106), and finally to that of Nidaros (1237); but the connection was rather loose, as the bishops were elected by the people. In 1550 the Reformation was introduced with armed force by the Danish king, though without effecting any great change in the religious state of the people. In 1801 the bishopric of Holar was abolished, and in 1825 the whole island was laid under the authority of the episcopal see of Reykyawick. See G. J. THORKELIN: Jus ecclesiasticum, etc., Copenhagen, 1776; HARBOW: Om Reformationen i Island, Copenhagen, 1843.

ICHTHYS (Greek ἰχθύς, "a fish;" the acrostic of the sentence Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ Υἱός, Σωτήρ, "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Saviour") forms one of the earliest and most frequently used Christian symbols. The name "ichthys," or the picture of a fish, is often found on rings, gems, utensils, tombstones, etc.; and numerous metaphorical expressions or elaborate allegories in the writings of the Fathers were occasioned by this acrostic. Clement of Alexandria (Pædag., III. 11) mentions the fish as one of the Christian symbols, though without making any allusion to its origin. The first who, in speaking of the symbol, also thinks of the acrostic, is Tertullian (De Baptismo, I.). See F. BECKER: D. Darstellung J. C. unter d. Bilde d. Fisches, Leipzig, 1866, 2d ed., 1876.

ICO'NIUM, the present Koniyyeh, a city of Asia Minor, at the foot of Mount Taurus, on the road from Antioch in Pisidia to Derbe, was at one time the capital of Lycaonia, and through many centuries a flourishing place. Paul visited it three times (Acts xiii. 51, xiv. 1, 19, 21, xvi. 2), and it is the scene of the legend of Paul and Thecla.

ICONOCLAST, "image-breaker," and ICONODULIST, "image-server" (from εἰκών, "an image," and κλάζειν, "to break," or δουλεῖν, "to serve"), are the Greek names of the two opposite parties in the great controversy concerning IMAGE-WORSHIP; which article see. In modern usage, the word "iconoclast" is applied to one who destroys shams or impositions of any kind.

ICONOSTASIS, a piece of furniture in the Eastern Church, corresponding, not to our rood-screen, which separates the choir from the nave, but to our altar-rails, forming a holiest of the holy. It developed, indeed, from the simple, open altar-rails which were in use in the Christian churches from the earliest date, into a solid panel, completely concealing the altar by degrees, as the service in the Greek Church assumed the character of a great liturgical drama. Its name it received from its being highly ornamented with pictures (εἰκών), and it probably reached its present form in the eighth century.

IDOL and IDOLATRY. In classical Greek the word εἶδωλον is used of any kind of representation, bodily or ideal, pictorial, sculptural, or mimical; and it has no reference at all to the question whether the representation is to be recognized as an object of worship, or simply looked at as a product of art. The idea of an idol did not exist in the Greek civilization. It originated among the Jews, under the first covenant: and, though the Septuagint uses εἶδωλον to translate no less than sixteen different Hebrew words, it applies it, nevertheless, exclusively to such representations as are destined for worship, leaving entirely out of consideration whether the subject of the representation be the true God or a false one; as, according to the Second Commandment, any bodily representation of any deity, when worshipped, is an idol.

The word εἰδωλολατρεία is of Christian origin, and occurs for the first time in the writings of the New Testament (1 Cor. x. 14; Gal. v. 20; 1 Pet. iv. 3; Col. iii. 5). As at the time of Christ the Jews had ceased long ago to use any bodily representation of God in their service, while all the Pagan religions found within the boundaries of the Roman Empire worshipped their gods under some kind of bodily representation, it was quite natural that the apostolic writers, and after them the Fathers, should apply the word in a general way as meaning simply the worship of false gods. But in course of time, when the worship of false gods had been stamped out (a law of 392 declared sacrifice and divination treason, and punishable with death), it was discovered that idolatry might be found also in the worship of the true God, as it really means the worship of any bodily representation of any deity. See IMAGE-WORSHIP.

IGNATIAN EPISTLES. See IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH.

IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH. The only sources from which any information can be drawn about this celebrated person are the epistles circulating under his name. Eusebius knows nothing more of him than what can be extracted from the epistles, with the exception of a few short notices by Irenæus (Adv. Hæres., V. 28, 4) and by Origen (prologue to the Canticles, and in Hom. 6, on Luke), which he also knows. But the list he gives of the bishops of Antioch is doubtful with respect to its chronology. Compare A. HARNACK: Die Zeit des Ignatius, Leipzig, 1878. He places Ignatius as the second bishop after Peter. As nobody knew any thing about the intervening Euodius, he gradually dropped out of attention, and a new tradition formed, placing Ignatius immediately after Peter (Chrysostom, the Paschal Chronicle, Theodoret). Between these two traditions the Const. Ap. (VII. 46) tries to mediate by making Peter consecrate, first Euodius, and then Ignatius. What tradition else has preserved concerning Ignatius—the story that he was the child spoken of in Matt. xviii. 5, and other fictions by Simeon Metaphrastes and Vincentius—is completely worthless. Nor are the various Acta Martyrii of any historical value. We have two which are completely independent of each other. I. Martyrium Colbertinum, first published by Ussher, 1647, in a barbarous but literal translation, then in a Greek version by Ruinart, in Act. Mart., 1689, and finally in a Syriac translation by Mösinger, in Supplem. Corp. Ign., Innsbruck, 1872. II. Martyrium Vaticanum, edited by Dressel, in Patr. Apost., p. 368. The Latin Vita Ignatii, in Act. Sanct. Feb., I., 29, the Armenian Martyrium, edited by Petermann, and the Vita, by Symeon Metaphrastes, may be considered as mere compilations from the two first mentioned. This whole literature has been collected and edited by Zahn, in Patr. Ap. Oper., Leipzig, 1876, [and better by F. X. Funk, Opera Patrum Apostolicorum, vol. ii., Tübingen, 1881]. But all these Acta Martyrii are spurious: they contradict the epistles; they swarm with unhistorical statements; they were not known to any old writer, not even to Eusebius; they date, probably, from the fifth century. Thus the epistles are the only source of information left to us. They claim to have been written by Ignatius, on his journey from Antioch (where he had been condemned to death) to Rome, where he was to suffer the punishment of being torn to pieces by wild beasts.

The total number of epistles bearing the name of Ignatius is fifteen, but they are of very different date and worth. Seven of them, namely, those Ad Ephesios, Magnesios, Trallianos, Romanos, Philadelphenos, Smyrnæos, and Polycarpum, are extant in a double Greek version,—a shorter and a longer. The latter contains five more epistles; namely, those Ad Mariam Cassobolitam, Tarsenses, Antiochenos, Heronem, and Philippenses: and finally we have three more epistles, but only in a Latin translation; namely, two Ad S. Joannem, and one Ad S. Mariam Virginem, to which is added a Responsio B. Mariæ V. ad Ignatium. The three last-mentioned letters were probably originally written in Latin, and are completely worthless. They are found in ZAHN l. c. Of the shorter Greek version, G¹, we have two manuscripts,—Codex Mediceo-Laurentianus, and Codex Casanatensis, of which, however, the latter is a transcription of the former. There also exist a Latin translation, first published by Ussher, 1644, a Syriac translation, extant only in fragments, and a complete Armenian translation of the Syriac translation, published by the Armenian Bishop Menas of Constantinople, 1783. The epistle Ad Romanos is also found in the Codex Colbertinus, and has been published by Mösinger l. c. The whole shorter version was first published by Ussher in Latin, 1644, and then in Greek by Isaac Vossius. Later editions are very numerous, the best by Zahn l. c. Of the longer Greek version, G², containing twelve epistles, there exist nine manuscripts, and a Latin translation. The above-mentioned Armenian translation also contains the five additional epistles of the longer version. The whole longer version was first edited by Pacæus, 1557, then by And. Gessner, 1559, and afterwards often, best by Zahn l. c. Lately the three epistles Ad Ephesios, Smyrnæos, and Polycarpum, have been discovered in a version still shorter than G¹. This version, however, exists only in a Syriac translation. It has been published by Cureton, The Ancient Syriac Version of the Epistles of S. Ignatius, London, 1845, and still better in Corpus Ignatianum, Berlin, 1849. A very rich collection of materials belonging to the subject, especially of Oriental versions, is found in PETERMANN: S. Ignatii Epistolæ, Leipzig, 1849.

On account of the great importance which the epistles of Ignatius have for the older church history, the question about their genuineness gave rise to a very lively debate, the more as a preliminary question about the authenticity of the versions had to be settled in advance. The history of the debate falls into three periods. The first period ends with the discovery of the shorter version, G¹; and its principal result was the general recognition of the spuriousness of those three epistles Ad S. Joannem and S. Mariam Virginem, which exist only in a Latin translation: even Baronius gave them up. With respect to the remaining twelve epistles, most Roman-Catholic theologians (Hartung, Baronius, Bellarmin) accepted them; while most Protestant theologians (the Magdeburg Centuries, Calvin) rejected them. Among the former, however, Martialis Mastræus acknowledged that the text was interpolated; and among the latter Nic. Vedelius recognized the only seven epistles mentioned by Eusebius. With the publication of the shorter version, G¹, the second period opens. The version G¹ was soon generally accepted as authentic, and the version G² rejected as interpolated; and lately Zahn has fixed the date of this interpolation to the latter half of the second century (Ignatius von Antiochia, Gotha, 1873). The question of the authenticity of the text thus settled, the question of the authorship was again taken up. The five epistles not mentioned by Eusebius, and not contained in the shorter version (Ad Mariam Cassobolitam, Tarsenses, Antiochenos, Heronem, and Philippenses), were immediately excluded as spurious. With respect to the remaining seven epistles, the question was answered in the affirmative by Rothe, Huther, Düsterdieck, and others; in the negative, especially by Baur, who fixes their date at the middle of the second century. The third period begins with the discovery of the shortest Syrian version, S, of the three epistles Ad Romanos, Ephesios, and Polycarpum. Cureton, who first edited this version, asserted without hesitation that the original and genuine epistles of Ignatius had now been found; that the versions G¹ and G² were nothing but interpolations and expansions in support of a later state of ecclesiastical development; that the four epistles Ad Magnesios, Smyrncos, Philadelphenos, and Trallianos, were mere fictitious compositions, etc. Bunsen exerted himself much to introduce these views in Germany (D. drei echten u. vier unechten Briefe d. Ignatius, Hamburg, 1847, and Ignatius von Antiochien u. s. Zeit, Hamburg, 1847). They found also many adherents (Ritschl, Weiss, Böhringer, and Lipsius); but they met with still stronger opposition, both among those who rejected the Ignatian epistles in any version, such as Baur (Die ignatianischen Briefe und ihr neuester Kritiker, Tübingen, 1848), and among those who accepted them in version G¹, such as Denzinger (Ueber d. Aechtheit d. bisherigen Textes d. ignatianischen Briefe, Würzburg, 1849), Uhlhorn (Zeitschrift f. d. hist. Theol., 1855, I.-II.), Petermann, Merx (Meletemata Ignatiana, 1861), and Zahn. In the course of the debate, conclusive evidence was produced, partly from a logical analysis of the contents of the epistles, partly from a comparison of the various Syrian translations, that S is nothing more than an extract from G¹. Some of the staunchest champions of S, as, for instance, Lipsius and Lightfoot, fell off; and the whole period passed off as an episode, leaving the debate at the old dilemma: either we have the genuine epistles of Ignatius in the version G¹, or we have no epistles at all by Ignatius, but only spurious compositions bearing his name.

A decision in the matter has not yet been reached, though it may not be so very far off. The objections to the genuineness of the epistles are: (1) That the fact on which they rest is unhistorical. When, however, the fact is read out of the epistles themselves, and not, as Baur did, out of the spurious Acta Martyrii, it fits in very well with the actual state of affairs. That Christians suffered martyrdom under Trajan is well known; and it need cause no hesitation that Ignatius was condemned ad bestias by the governor of Antioch, as instances of such condemnations occur even in Hermas, and soon after become very frequent. Nor is it strange that he should be brought to Rome to be executed. The law forbidding the governor to send convicts from one province to another dates from the time of Severus and Antoninus; and the law regulating the transference of such prisoners to Rome is still later. The route of the journey has nothing improbable about it, as little as the circumstance, that, on the road, Ignatius was at liberty to converse with the congregations, and write letters. Similar instances occur in Lucian (De morte peregrini), and in the acts of Perpetua and Felicitas. The whole situation, finally, presupposed by the Epistle Ad Romanos, the anxiety of Ignatius that the Romans might take some step in order to secure his liberation, is easily explained by the legal right which any one concerned had to appeal in behalf of another, even against his will. (2) When next it has been said (by Baur) that the character of Ignatius, such as it appears in the epistles, looks more like a fiction than a reality, that his forced humility and strained heroism are downright offensive, etc., the mere subjectivity of this objection, and consequently its insufficiency as an argument, is proved by the circumstance that others (e.g., Rothe) find a strong evidence of the genuineness of the epistles in the picture they give of the character of Ignatius. (3) Of much more weight is the objection that the heresies attacked in the epistles belong to a later period than the beginning of the second century. It has been doubted whether the epistles speak of two distinct heresies, — a gnosticodocetic and a judaizing, — or only of one, combining both these elements; and it has been asserted that such a combination would be an impossibility. But we know too little of the earlier stages of Gnosticism to make such an assertion; and a cautious criticism must, no doubt, arrive at the conclusion that the epistles were written before Gnosticism reached that form under which it presents itself between 130 and 140. A decision with respect to the genuineness of the epistles cannot be reached on this point; and, should from some other point an irrefragable evidence of their genuineness be produced, we would have to change our ideas of the historical development of Gnosticism. (4) It has also been alleged that the church constitution mirrored by the epistles, especially the episcopacy, belongs to a later time. It is true that the epistles distinguish sharply between the bishop, the presbyter, and the deacon; that they represent the episcopate as superior to the presbytery; that they never weary of extolling the bishop, and exhorting the faithful to rally around him as the visible representative of the unity of the congregation, etc. But, though the epistles doubtless show an advance beyond Clemens Romanus and Hermas, they certainly fall behind Irenæus. Ignatius knows nothing about an apostolical establishment of the episcopate, nor does he connect with it those ideas of a priesthood which afterwards were borrowed from the Old Testament. The episcopate is to him an office in the congregation, not an office in the church. The bishop is to him not the successor of the apostles, nor is he the bearer of the doctrinal tradition. To sum up the whole, though not every difficulty presented by the above objections can be said to have been successfully solved, the collective mass of internal evidence against the genuineness of the epistles would, nevertheless, be insufficient to counterbalance the testimony in its favor of one single external witness; and there is such a testimony in the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians. He who will prove the epistles of Ignatius to be spurious must begin by proving the Epistle of Polycarp to be spurious, or at least very heavily interpolated; but such an undertaking will hardly ever succeed. IGNATIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, b. in 790 or 796; a son of the emperor Michael I.; was seized, mutilated, and shut up in a monastery by the usurper, Leo V., the Armenian, but rose gradually in the service of the Church, and was made Patriarch of Constantinople in 847. He could not agree, however, with the emperor, Michael III.; and by the intrigues of his uncle, Cæsar Bardas, he was deposed in 858, and banished to the Island of Terebinthus. Photius was put in his place. But Ignatius could not be made to give up his claims, and thus a schism arose. The Pope, Nicholas I., was called in as a mediator; but he came as a judge, and his verdict went against Photius. Photius, however, succeeded in vindicating himself in the patriarchal chair until 867, when Michael III. was dethroned and murdered by Basilus Macedo. Basilus recalled Ignatius, who remained in possession of his office to his death in (878). Between Ignatius and Adrian II., the successor of Nicholas I., there arose a vehement controversy concerning Bulgaria, which each bishop demanded as belonging to his diocese. See MANSI: Concil. Coll. xvii., p. 62. Besides his letters, also a Vita Tarasii by Ignatius has come down to us. See PHOTIUS.

IGNATIUS LOYOLA (Don Inigo Lopez de Recalde), b. in the Castle of Loyola, Guipuzcoa, Spain, 1491; d. in Rome, July 31, 1556; was educated at the court of Ferdinand the Catholic, — a knight in the full romantic sense of the word. In 1521, when defending the fortress of Pamplona against the French, he received an extremely painful wound in the foot, and was brought to the paternal castle to be nursed. While on his sick-bed, he asked for books; and as his favorite reading, the fantastic and voluptuous romances of chivalry, could not be procured, he plunged himself into the legends of the Church, — the lives of the saints. The effect was most wonderful, — a complete conversion, an unquenchable passion. From the sick-bed he immediately repaired to the monastery of Montserrat, hung up his armor before the image of the Virgin, exchanged his gay and splendid attire for the rags of a beggar, and retired to a cavern at Manresa, where he spent some time practising the severest ascetic exercises, but also visited and comforted by glorious visions. At Manresa he drew up the first sketch of his famous Exercitia Spiritualia, which, by the members of the order he founded, is considered a work of divine inspiration.

In 1523 he made a pilgrimage to Palestine; and on his return he began to study, first grammar at Barcelona, and then philosophy at Alcalá. While studying, he lived on alms; and at the same time he devoted himself to the nursing of the sick. But as he also appeared among the students and in the hospitals, as a curer of souls, he became suspected of belonging to the Alombrosos. Though acquitted when placed before the Inquisition, he was continually watched; and when, at Salamanca, he was condemned to keep silent for four years on all topics of theology, he left Spain (1528), and went to Paris. In Paris he succeeded, by his innate power of attracting and commanding men, and by the instrumentality of his Exercitia Spiritualia, in gathering a small circle around himself, consisting of Pierre Favre the Savoyard, Simon Rodriguez the Portuguese, and the Spaniards, Francis Xavier, Alphons Salmeron, Jacob Lainez, and Nicolaus Bobadilla. Aug. 15, 1534, these men met in the Church of Montmartre, formed an association, took the vows of chastity and poverty, and promised furthermore, that, after finishing their studies, they would either go to Jerusalem and devote themselves to missionary work, and work in the hospitals, or place themselves unconditionally at the disposal of the Pope, — a characteristic alternative.

In 1537 the association, increased by three new members, met in Venice; but the war between the republic and the Turks prevented them from continuing the journey to Jerusalem. While laboring in the hospitals, they met with the Theatines, and the meeting was pregnant with great consequences to them. They were all ordained priests, and started for Rome, preaching along the road, in the public squares, in the universities, in the hospitals, etc., and preaching with great effect, though they could speak only broken Italian. In Rome they soon acquired the confidence of the Pope, and were intrusted with important missions to Parma, Piacenza, Calabria, and other places. Ignatius had new visions; and on March 14, 1543, Paul III. confirmed the association under the name of Societas Jesu. Ignatius was unanimously elected general of the new order; and, when he died, the order counted thirteen provinces, — seven in Spain and Portugal, three in Italy, two in Germany, and one in France. Only a short time elapsed before the eminent usefulness of the new instrument became quite apparent; and on March 13, 1623, Gregory XV. canonized its founder, together with Francis Xavier.

For its external organization the order is, in some respects, as deeply indebted to its second as to its first general; but its informing spirit it received from Ignatius Loyola, and in his Exercitia Spiritualia that spirit found a most characteristic expression. The book may be described as the personal experience of the author transformed into rules, which the reader must follow in order to reach the same goal as he reached. And what is that goal? To be able, through prayers and fasts, through ascetic and spiritual exercises of the severest description, through absolute seclusion from the world and concentrated meditation, to take an irrevocable vow of obedience, — the obedience of the dead body, which has no will and no motion of its own, — the obedience of the stick, which one may take, or leave standing, just as one pleases. The obedience goes from the members to the general, and from the general to the Pope; and when the Pope says that black is white, and white black, it is the great moral glory of the order that it is able to repeat the lie (Regula ad sentiendum cum Ecclesia). IGNORANTINES (Fratres Ignorantiæ, Frères ignorantins, Frères des écoles chrétiennes) is the name of the members of an institution founded in the beginning of the eighteenth century, in France, by the abbot Baptiste de la Salle, and energetically supported by the Jesuits. Its purpose was to give free instruction to people, not only in religion, but also in the elements of secular education, and thereby prevent any idea inimical to the Roman Church entering or taking possession of the young mind. It developed a great activity in France, and represented, so to speak, the Jesuits, when (in 1764) that order was banished from the country. In 1790, when the institution was dissolved by the revolutionary government, it numbered no less than a hundred and twenty-one schools and colleges. Its members sought refuge in Italy, and were recalled in 1806 by Napoleon, who acknowledged their usefulness for popular education. [In 1878 they numbered 9,818, teaching in 1,064 public schools and in 385 free schools.]

I. H. S., an inscription dating far back in the history of the Christian Church, but whose interpretation is somewhat doubtful. Some explain it as In Hoc Signo, scilicet, vinces ("with this token thou shalt be victorious"), the words accompanying the vision of the radiant cross appearing to Constantine and his army: others, as Jesus Hominum Salvator ("Jesus, Men's Saviour"), the motto of the Jesuits. The most probable explanation, however, is that which derives the inscription simply from the Greek ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ("Jesus"), as the transformation of the Σ into the Latin S presents no difficulties. ILDEFONSUS, St., b. at Toledo, 607; d. there Jan. 23, 667; was a pupil of Isidore of Sevilla; entered the monastery of Agli, against his father's will; became a monk, and afterwards abbot; founded a nunnery near Toledo, and was made archbishop of his native city in 657. According to the testimony of Julian, his successor, he was a prolific writer, though he left most of his works in an unfinished state. Still extant are Libellus de virginitate S. Mariæ, first edited by Carranza, 1556, and found in MIGNE, Bib. Patr., 96, the first impulse to that enthusiastic worship of the Virgin which characterized the early Spanish Church; Annotationes de cognitione baptismi et de itinere deserti (Migne l. c.), a complete domestic and moral system, but probably only an imitation of an older Spanish work; two letters (Migne l. c.); and his continuation of Isidore's work De viris illustribus, often published with an appendix by Julian, Vita Illd. Tolet. (Migne l. c.), and containing the lives of Gregory the Great and fourteen Spanish churchmen. The Adoptionists of the eighth century claimed him as one of their forerunners. His life was written by Carranza (1556), Salazar de Mendoza (1618), Mayans y Siscar (1727). See also Act. Sanct., Jan. 23;

ILLGEN, Christian Friedrich, b. at Chemnitz, Sept. 16, 1786; d. at Leipzig, Aug. 4, 1844; studied in the University of Leipzig, and was appointed professor there of philosophy in 1818, and of theology in 1823. Besides other works, he wrote Lilius Socinus' Leben, Leipzig, 1814, and founded the Historisch-Theol. Gesellschaft in 1814, and the Zeitschrift f. hist. Theol., 1832, which was afterwards continued by Niedner and by Kahnis, and contains many valuable contributions to the clearing up of obscure points of church history.

ILLUMINATI was the name adopted by the members of a secret society of half-political and half-religious character, which was founded May 1, 1776, at Ingolstadt, by Adam Weishaupt, professor in the university. The founder's object was simply to form a tool for the gratification of his own ambition; and the model after which he worked was the Society of Jesu. Aided by the singular passion for secret societies which characterized the rationalism of the eighteenth century, he succeeded in forming classes of novices in Ingolstadt, Freising, Munich, in Tyrol, Westphalia, Saxony; and by means of an inexhaustible talent for charlatanry, and a well-planned system of espionage, he also succeeded in keeping his novices in due submission. But what about the further development and final organization of the society? Weishaupt was near his wit's end, and confessed that he really did not know what to do with his novices, when Baron Adolf von Knigge entered the society in 1780, and brought speed and order in its development. A firm connection was established with the Freemasons of Munich, Freising, Francfort, etc. Three classes were formed,—one of novices or minervals, one of Freemasons or Scotch Knights, and one of the pupils of the small and great Mysteries; and the society spread so widely that even the greatest names in Germany were mentioned as members. But in 1784 Weishaupt and Knigge fell out with each other, both wanting to become the Magus or Rex of the society; and in the same year a decree was issued in Bavaria, forbidding all secret societies. The Illuminati felt safe, possessed as they were of a considerable political, social, and moral power; but they overlooked that the manner in which they wielded that power had already made them many enemies; and in 1785 began a sharp persecution, which, within a year or two, brought the whole institution to collapse. [They do not appear ever to have numbered more than two thousand.] The literature of the affair is enormous. As the principal documents may be considered the writings of WEISHAUP: Gesch. d. Verfolgung d. Illuminaten, 1786; Apologie der Illuminaten, 1787; D. verbesserte System, 1787, Kurze Rechtfertigung, 1787, etc.

IMAGE OF GOD. The conception of the image of God is a fundamental one in the department of Christian anthropology. Man is declared (Gen. i. 26) to have been created in God's image (אֱלֹהִים, tselem) and after his likeness (כְּדָמוֹ, d'muth). There is no other difference between these two terms than the difference between a concrete and abstract designation (comp. Gen. v. 3, ix. 6). The use of different prepositions, however, indicates that the former was inalienable: the latter might be lost. The dominion over the creatures which is ascribed to man in Gen. i. 28 is not to be regarded as of the essence of the image of God, but as a consequence of it. In the New Testament, sinful man is on the one hand recognized as still possessing the image of God, as in Luke iii. 38 (where Adam, as the founder of the race, is called the son of God); 1 Cor. xi. 7; Jas. iii. 9, etc.: on the other, he is urged to put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge (Col. iii. 10), righteousness, and holiness (Eph. iv. 24), after the divine image. Christ is the perfect image of God (2 Cor. iv. 4; Col. i. 15); and we become renewed after the image of God when we become conformed to the image of Christ (Rom. viii. 29).

We find a variety of utterances in the fathers on this subject. They agree, however, in ascribing the divine image to qualities differentiating man from the rest of the creation, and define them as reason and freedom (GREG. NYSSA, De hom. opif., iv., v). Irenæus, Tertullian, and Melito of Sardis included under it a physical similarity to God, which the Alexandrians and Augustine denied. The fathers also referred it to the moral nature, and defined it as righteousness. The scholastics made a sharp distinction between imago ("image") and similitudo ("likeness"); including under the former the intellectual powers of reason and freedom, and under the latter moral righteousness, which was lost at the Fall. This distinction is preserved by the theologians of the Roman-Catholic Church, who declare man's original righteousness (justitia orig.) to have been a superadded gift. The Protestant Church, ignoring this distinction, places the image of God in the religious and moral nature, and defines it as the original righteousness with which man was created. Socinianism defined it as man's dominion over the animal creation.

In order to rightly understand the meaning of the divine image, we must start from the nature of God, who created man for communion with Himself, and the world for man's well-being. Man alone received the spirit of life, and is a spiritual being, a personal soul. Man as a person is the image of God, and in the totality of his being (body and soul). This may be termed the essential element in the image of God in man, and is indestructible. To it corresponds the habitual element. Man as the creature of God is designed for a life of love, which manifests itself in the intellect as knowledge and wisdom, and in the will as freedom and holiness. The likeness to God further shows itself in the immortality of the body and the dominion over nature. This habitual element was lost at the Fall, when love for God was displaced by selfishness. The Son of God in the flesh was the concrete personal restoration of the divine image; and through his vicarious death and victorious resurrection we become partakers of his righteousness, and by the Holy Spirit poured out in our hearts are restored to the divine image.

IMAGE-WORSHIP. I. IN THE EASTERN CHURCH.—The greatest difficulties which the Emperor Leo III., the Isaurian (717-741), experienced in his endeavors to make the Church co-extensive with the State, and perfectly uniform, arose from the image-worship, which, since the fifth century, had become general among the Christians. Especially the Mohammedans hated the practice as a Pagan abomination; and Leo himself looked upon it as idolatry. From regard, however, for the Patriarch Germanus, the emperor proceeded with caution in his attempt to destroy it. The edict of 726 simply forbade prostration before the images, and ordered them to be hung so high on the walls that people could not reach and kiss them. But to some bishops this manner of proceeding was too slow: on their own account they removed the images from the churches. A great fermentation immediately took place, and dangerous riots occurred in various places. Pope Gregory II. and John of Damascus, the most celebrated theologian of the Greek Church, declared against the emperor, and in favor of the images. Leo did not yield, however. An edict of 730 ordered all images to be removed from the churches, or painted over. The refractory patriarch was deposed; and, as an answer to the synod which Gregory III. convened against the iconoclasts, the papal revenues from Sicily and Calabria were confiscated, and Illyria was incorporated with the patriarchate of Constantinople. Leo's son, Constantine V., Copronymus (741-775), inherited his father's views of image-worship. In 754 he convened an œcumenical synod in Constantinople. The three hundred and thirty-eight bishops assembled—none of the patriarchs were present, nor had the Pope sent any delegates—ascribed the re-introduction of idols and idol-worship among men to the influence of the Devil, and decided, on the basis of the first six œcumenical synods, that he who painted or worshipped an image of Christ must be either a Nestorian or an Eutychian; that the Eucharist is the only legitimate image of Christ, as it alone contains the whole Christ, both according to his human and according to his divine nature; that image-worship is forbidden by Scripture (John iv. 24, xx. 29; Deut. v. 8, 9; Rom. i. 23; 2 Cor. v. 7; Rom. x. 17), and by the fathers (Epiphanius, Gregory Nazianzen, Chrysostom, Eusebius of Cæsarea, and others); that, consequently, any one who makes or worships images shall be excommunicated and cursed, etc. All the clergy were compelled to subscribe these decisions, and the monks who refused were cruelly persecuted. A conspiracy was suppressed by the emperor with fearful severity: even the Patriarch of Constantinople was decapitated. The popes, however, rejected the canons of 754, and a synod of the Lateran condemned the iconoclasts in 769. Under Irene, who after the death of her husband, Leo IV. Chazarus (780), was made regent during the minority of her son (Constantine VI.), a change took place in the policy of the imperial government. Images were tolerated. The monks, iconodulists by profession, again stepped forward; and their zeal and influence increased rapidly, as did their number. An œcumenical council was thought of as the proper means of carrying out a reversal of the legislation of 754. But the Oriental patriarchs refused to be present, from a regard to the Saracens; and Pope Adrian I. demanded, as a conditio sine qua non, the immediate surrender of the revenues of which Leo III. had despoiled him. A common council was then resorted to, convened in Constantinople 786. But the number of iconoclastic bishops was too great, and the attitude of the army (the soldiers being iconoclasts by training since the days of Leo III.) was too dangerous: nothing could be done. Next year, however, a well-managed Council of Nicæa (787) proved successful. A shrewd distinction was made between the full worship (ἁγία λατρεία), which ought to be offered to God alone, and the tokens of honor and veneration (ἱσπασμός καὶ τιμητικὴ προσκύνησις) which are due to the holy images; and on the basis of this distinction the iconoclasts were condemned. In the West the decisions of 787 were refuted by the Libri Carolini, and rejected by the Council of Frankfurt (794); but in the East they were enforced without causing any disturbance, as, indeed, they represented the views of the great mass of the people. But when, in 813, Leo V., the Armenian, ascended the throne, the soldiers again got the ascendancy over the monks; and on their peremptory demand the emperor issued a decree against image-worship in 814. The patriarch and the monks, who labored secretly and openly against the emperor, were punished. A new patriarch, presiding over a council in Constantinople (815), cancelled the canons of 787; and Theodore, abbot of the monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and the head of the iconodulists, was banished. Leo's successor, however, Michael II., Balbus (820-829), again yielded to the iconodulists, and allowed image-worship in private; and though his son (Theophilus, 829-842) forbade people to have images in their houses, and persecuted the monks with cruelty, his wife Theodora was a zealous image-worshipper; and when she became regent, during the minority of her son (Michael III.), the laws of 787 were once more enforced, and the iconoclasts were persecuted. On Feb. 19, 842, the orthodox, that is the image-worshippers, celebrated their victory with a great festival, and the images were solemnly brought back into the churches. The iconoclasts never more came into power, and thus image-worship continued an orthodox doctrine of the Greek Church [though only flat pictures are worshipped, while raised images are forbidden. See art. GREEK CHURCH, p. 902]. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

II. IN THE WESTERN CHURCH.—The Roman-Catholic Church has a peculiar talent for denying in principle what she admits in practice. She does not forbid people to read the Bible, but she prevents them from doing it. She does not deny that it is the merit of Christ which makes man's works meritorious, but she inculcates that it is his own works which save a man. She does not teach image-worship, but she allows it. The Council of Trent (Sessio XXV. de invocatione Sanctorum) says that images of Christ, the Virgin, and the saints, ought to be retained in the churches, and shown the honor and veneration due to them . . . not because they are themselves the harbingers of any divine power to which man can pray, or in which he can confide . . . but because they image forth to man such a divine power, and because the honor and veneration which he shows them refer to the reality they represent. But history shows both how utterly unable the great mass of the people are to make such a distinction, and how very little the Roman-Catholic Church cares about having it made. Indeed, the very same arguments which she once rejected when the Pagans presented them in favor of their idol-worship, she now urges in favor of her own image-worship. The primitive Christians condemned all use of images in the church. (See the acts of the synod of Elvira, 305, c. 36.) They evidently feared that somehow the representation might be taken for the reality. But when, in the fourth and fifth centuries, the whole uneducated mass of the people was admitted into the congregations, the images began to invade the churches, and the common plea for them was their power of teaching. Gregory the Great, in a letter to Bishop Serenus of Marseille (Lib. IX., Ep. 105), recommends their use in the churches, on the ground that they enable those who know not their letters to read on the wall what they cannot read in the books. But the danger connected with the use of images is apparent from the very same letter; for the reason why Serenus had destroyed a number of images was just that his congregation adored them. When the Council of Nicæa (787) legitimized not only the use, but the worship, of images, the Libri Carolini appeared as a refutation; and the author emphasizes the fact (III. 16), that though images might be used as memorials of the great events of the history of the Church, and as adornment of the walls, without harm to the educated, who worship only the reality behind the representations, they cannot help seducing the uneducated, who worship only what they see. The Frankish Church was strongly opposed to the introduction of images. The synod of Frankfurt (794) rejected the decisions of the Second Council of Nicæa (though the Pope, Adrian I., had accepted them), and condemned the iconoclasts. The opposition was continued through the ninth century. A synod of Paris (825) repeated the rejection of the decisions of the Pope and the Council of Nicæa in a rather emphatic manner; and Claudius of Turin, Agobard, Jonas of Orleans, and other bishops, were decided enemies of images. At last, however, Rome prevailed; and the peculiar tendency the Roman-Catholic Church has to ascribe divine character to the various mediators she places between God and man, showed itself also in this field. What Thomas Aquinas teaches concerning images and their use is, to say the least, somewhat equivocal (Summa Quest. 23, art. 4, 5), and so are the expositions of Bonaventura. But Belarmin is completely unequivocal. Without any remonstrance from the side of the Church, he teaches, in his De Imaginibus Sanctorum, that images of Christ and the saints shall be worshipped in the proper sense of the word, so that the devotion does not stretch beyond the image towards the object which it represents, but remains at rest in the image itself, such as it is. Thus the difference between the honor due to God and the honor due to the image is one of degree only, not of kind; one of quantity only, not of quality.

IMAM, the priest who leads the prayers of a Mohammedan congregation, and in Turkey also performs the rites of circumcision, marriage, and burial. The name comes from the Koran (Sura II., "The Cow," v. 118: "When his Lord made trial of Abraham, by commands which he fulfilled, he said, 'I am about to make thee an Imam [priest] to mankind"). The title "Imam" is borne by the caliphs, or successors of Mohammed, and thus has the secondary meaning of "the head of the faith." The present Osmanli dynasty of Turkish sultans arrogates the title on the ground that the last legitimate caliph, El Mutawakkel, in 1517 ceded his right to it to Selim I., the first sultan, and his heirs. But the Shiah, or Shiites, the so-called heretical Mohammedans, deny the right of the sultan to this title, and limit it to twelve persons. Eleven Imams have already appeared; the twelfth is announced. Indeed, they look for his appearance at any time.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION OF THE VIRGIN MARY, a modern dogma of the Roman Church, which exempts the Virgin Mary from all personal contact with sin, and in this respect puts her above all other descendants of Adam, and on the same scale of sinless purity as Christ. It was proclaimed by Pope Pius IX., on the Feast of the Conception, Dec. 8, 1854, in the Church of St. Peter and in the presence of more than two hundred cardinals, bishops, and other dignitaries, in these words: "That the most blessed Virgin Mary, in the first moment of her conception, by a special grace and privilege of Almighty God, in virtue of the merits of Christ, was preserved immaculate from all stain of original sin" (ab omni originalis culpæ labe preservatam immunem). This the papal bull Ineffabilis Deus declares to be a divinely revealed fact and dogma, which must hereafter be constantly believed by all Catholics, on pain of excommunication. The dogma was not sanctioned by any œcumenical council; but since the Vatican Council of 1870 declared the Pope infallible, independent of a council, the decree of 1854 must be received as an infallible utterance, and cannot be changed. Pius IX. had previously, by an encyclical of Feb. 2, 1849, invited the opinion of the Catholic bishops on the subject, and received more than six hundred affirmative answers. Only four dissented from the Pope's view; and fifty-two, while agreeing with him in the dogma itself, deemed it inopportune to define and proclaim it.

This shows that the tendency of the Roman Church was strongly in this direction. The dogma of the immaculate conception, and the Vatican dogma of papal infallibility, are the characteristic features of modern Romanism, as distinct from the Romanism of the Council of Trent, and widen the breach between it and the Greek and Protestant churches. By the decree of 1854 the Virgin Mary is taken out of the family of the redeemed, and declared absolutely free from all complication with the fall of Adam and its consequences. The definition of such a dogma presupposes a divine revelation; for God omniscient alone knows the fact of the immaculate conception; and, as the Bible nowhere informs us of it, God must have revealed it to Pius IX. in 1854, either directly, or through the voice of the six hundred bishops assenting to his view. But, if he was really infallible, he did not need the advice of others.

From the Roman standpoint, this dogma completes the Mariology and Mariolatry, which, step by step, proceeded from the perpetual virginity of Mary to her freedom from actual sin after the conception of the Saviour, then to freedom from sin after her birth, and at last to her freedom from original or hereditary sin. The only thing left now is to proclaim the dogma of her assumption to heaven, which has long since been a pious opinion in the Roman Church. To this corresponds the progress in the worship of Mary, and the multiplication of her festivals. Her worship even overshadows the worship of Christ. She, the tender, compassionate, lovely woman, is invoked for her powerful intercession, rather than her divine Son. She is made the fountain of all grace, the mediatrix between Christ and the believer, and is virtually put in the place of the Holy Ghost. There is scarcely an epithet of Christ which devout Roman Catholics do not apply to the Virgin (see St. Liguori's Glories of Mary); and Pope Pius IX., who was himself an intense worshipper of Mary, sanctioned the false interpretation of Gen. iii. 15, that she (not Christ) "crushed the head of the serpent."

As to the history of the dogma, no passage in its favor can be found in the Old or New Testament; for the interpretation of the Protævangeliûm just alluded to is clearly ruled out by the Hebrew text. On the contrary, the Bible declares all men to be sinners, and in need of redemption, and exempts Christ alone, the sinless Redeemer, from this universal rule. Mary herself calls God her Saviour (Luke i. 47), and thereby includes herself in the number of the saved; which implies her sense of personal sin and guilt. With this corresponds also the predicate given her by the angel (i. 28), — "endued with grace, highly favored" (κεχαριτωμένη, which the Vulgate has mischievously changed into the active gratia plena, "full of grace"). The Christian fathers, though many of them (even St. Augustine) exempted Mary from actual transgression, know nothing of her freedom from original sin, but always imply, and often expressly teach, the contrary. Some (as Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, and Chrysostom) interpret Christ's words at the wedding of Cana (John ii. 4) as a rebuke of her unseasonable haste and immoderate ambition. The origin of the dogma must be sought in the Apocryphal Gospels, which substituted mythology for real history, and nourished superstition rather than rational faith.

The doctrine crept into theology through the door of worship. The first clear trace of it is found in the twelfth century, in the south of France, when the canons of Lyons introduced the festival of the conception of the immaculate Mary, Dec. 8, 1139. This proves that the belief then existed as a pious opinion, but by no means as a dogma. On the contrary, St. Bernard, the greatest doctor and saint of his age, opposed the new festival as an unauthorized innovation, derogatory to the dignity of Christ, the only sinless being in the world. He asked the canons of Lyons whence they discovered such a hidden fact. On the same ground they might appoint festivals for the conception of the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of Mary, and so back to the beginning. The same ground is taken essentially by the greatest schoolmen, as Anselm, Bonaventura, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas. But during the fourteenth century, through the influence chiefly of Duns Scotus, "the subtle doctor," the doctrine of the immaculate conception became a part of the theology of the Franciscans or Scotists, and was a bone of contention between them and the Dominicans or Thomists. They charged each other with heresy, for holding the one view or the other. The Council of Trent did not settle the question, but rather leaned towards the Franciscan side. Soon afterwards the Jesuits took up the same side, and defended it against the Jansenists. To their zeal and perseverance, and their influence over Pope Pius IX., the recent triumph of the dogma is chiefly due. The whole Roman-Catholic world quietly acquiesced until the Vatican Council roused the "Old Catholic" opposition against papal infallibility, which extended also to the dogma of the immaculate conception.

IMMANUEL, a Hebrew word meaning "God with us," occurring in the prophecy spoken by Isaiah to Ahaz concerning the speedy downfall of Syria (Isa. vii. 14). But the Holy Spirit has taught us (in Matt. i. 23) to see, in the "virgin" who bore Immanuel in the days of Ahaz, the type of the Virgin Mary, who miraculously bore Jesus the Messiah, the Son of God. See the commentaries upon Isa. vii. 14 and Matt. i. 23.

IMMORTALITY. The motives for belief in immortality, which are to be found in men's hopes and fears, are of a subjective nature; and there lies in such motives doubt of the truth of immortality: hence, from of old, men have sought for purely objective grounds for this belief. Christian faith finds them in the resurrection of Christ. But this belief possesses objective worth only to those who stand in the Christian faith. Moreover, belief in immortality is a great help and support to, if not one of the conditions of, Christian faith: hence not only ancient, but also Christian, philosophy searches for objective grounds for belief in immortality without the religious province. Such ground is sometimes supposed to be found in the nature of the soul, in the difference between psychical and physical appearances, in the opposition of body and soul as two distinct substances. But this would only show that the soul may continue in existence, not that it must. To prove from the nature of the soul its necessary existence, it must be assumed that the soul is a simple substance, immaterial and indivisible, and therefore not to be dissolved, like the body, into its elements. But Kant objected, that, even though the soul appears to be one and simple, it cannot, therefore, be assumed that it is so. No psychology, at least, has succeeded in reducing the different activities of the soul to one simple power. The soul may be a unity; but it cannot be conceived as a simple substance which should exclude all inherent manifoldness of powers. The separation between the material and the immaterial should not in our conceptions be carried so far as to threaten to tear body and soul apart, and to make their union an incomprehensible miracle. Nothing is gained by referring to the self-conscious activity of the soul as evidence of an indestructible power. Self-consciousness may be lost through disturbances of the brain, and narcotics; but the reason, according to its nature and idea, may be thought to require its own continuance and lordship. It is unreasonable to suppose the loss of reason, its dissolution in unreason. But the continued existence of the individual is not secured by the dominion of reason in general. Finally, it has been affirmed that the soul could not form the ideas of eternity and infinity, the idea of truth, and the true ideas (axioms, etc.), which it holds to be eternally true, absolutely unchangeable, if the soul did not carry eternity within itself; for the temporal cannot possibly conceive the eternal, the finite the infinite. We must, alas! deny to this argument all validity; for these ideas are, upon their part, controverted conceptions. And, moreover, all conscious conception involves the distinction of the object from the subject, and by no means involves the possession by the soul of all that it can conceive. We see, then, that the question concerning the relation of soul and body in respect to self-consciousness presses into the foreground of the examination, and must be answered before we can come to any result. Besides, it is the whole man, the whole being of man only, from which objective reasons for belief in immortality can be derived. In this relation it stands physiologically and psychologically fast, that, until now at least, it seems impossible to derive psychological phenomena from the general physical and chemical powers of nature. But every power appears united to some substance. Upon what substance, then, is the psychical power bound?—upon the body, or some special substance? Nothing prevents us from supposing that the soul is a centre of those particular powers which lie at the ground of psychical appearances; i.e., that these powers are not bound up with the atoms of the body, but form a centre for themselves; and they are united with the substances and powers of the body only in an intimate relation of action and re-action. The unity of consciousness is the pledge of the unity of the soul; i.e., the unity of psychical powers in one centre. The hypothesis that this centre of the soul is a single atom is contradicted by the facts, and is no longer tenable. There is no trace in the brain of that centralization of elements and activities which is the indisputable characteristic of the soul; and it follows, therefore, from the science of the human body, that the soul is not a simple function of the brain, but a special centre of special powers, and therefore is to be regarded as a peculiar existence distinct from the body. It does not follow, from the fact of the constant co-working of body and soul, that consciousness is a product simply of the nervous system: as certainly as the physical appearances in general can be explained only from the working of special physical powers, so consciousness in itself can be only a product of the soul. But since the soul does not produce consciousness, or individual sensations, perceptions, etc., independently by itself alone; since, rather, both the origin and continuance of consciousness, as of particular perceptions, etc., appear to be conditioned through the co-working of the nervous system,—we must, therefore, admit absolutely, in view of scientific facts, that a continued existence of self-consciousness without a bodily organism cannot be considered. Natural science is therefore right when it steadfastly denies immortality as an isolated continuance of the soul separated from all embodiment. But this is not the only possible or generally believed form of immortality.

Christianity affirms not only the continuance of the soul, but also the resurrection of the body, i.e., the restoration of the body, or the re-union of the soul with a new, similar (more perfect) embodiment. This Christian faith is not contradicted by physical or psychical facts: on the contrary, it seems to be required even by them. Consciousness is restored after interruptions of it through bodily injuries, and with its previous contents unchanged: in like manner, not only may consciousness be restored after separation of the soul and body; but it must be restored so soon as the soul enters into union with the same or a similar organization. Absolutely the same body cannot be restored. The only question, then, is whether the re-union of the soul with a new, equal, or similar body, is physiologically conceivable. We affirm that it is not only tenable, but is required, because it lies wholly in the consequence of the principles which rule nature, and are proved by natural science; for nature everywhere tends to give to conditioned forces the possibility also of their exercise, the sphere for their activity. All powers of nature find without themselves continually the means and conditions under which to manifest their activity. In this consists the very order and regularity of nature. Consequently natural science must suppose, that, for the soul also, there shall be preserved room, not only for the temporary and passing play of its powers, but also for their enduring activity; that the force of consciousness, although temporarily robbed of its power of manifestation, is destined to make itself availing again in re-union with a body corresponding to it. According to analogies of natural science, this process may be regarded as constantly repeating itself, and, with that, natural science may stop. But it cannot deny the possibility that this process may come to an end in a last act through the union of the soul with a body no more separable from it; and reason demands such a conclusion, because an endless, aimless circling is unreasonable.

Therefore real science cannot conflict with the belief in immortality; but, in consistency, it must allow it, and affirm, if not its truth, at least its probability. Now, after we have won such objective grounds for this belief, it receives higher importance from religious, natural, and moral motives. It is a postulate of the ethical belief in God as love. Reason leads to the same result; for reason which obtains throughout the creation requires the conception of the highest end, and, therefore, the passing from temporal becoming into eternal being. So, also, the ethical ideas of the true, good, and beautiful, lead to the same conclusion. These are ideals whose perfect realization involves immortality.

[The scientific argument for the probability of immortality has recently been presented with much force by Professors Tait and Balfour Stewart, in a volume entitled the Unseen Universe, published in London in 1875. They argue that immortality is the natural consequence of modern ideas of the conservation of force and the principle of continuity. The moral argument receives additional force when immortality is conceived of as the necessary perfection of society. All the reasons for the continued life of the individual are enhanced when taken up into the hope of social immortality, or the perfection of the kingdom of God.]

IMMUNITY. Canon law makes a distinction between immunitas ecclesie, which simply means the right of asylum once enjoyed by the Church, and immunitas ecclesiastica, which denotes a general exemption from civil obligations. When the Church was recognized by the Roman State, great privileges were conferred upon her by the emperors. The clergy was exempted from assuming office, either in the State or in the commune,—at that time the heaviest duty of a Roman citizen,—the ruin of the rich, the perdition of the honest. They were furthermore exempted from public taxation, drafting, quartering, and every kind of menial service. These immunities the Church succeeded in vindicating for herself, also, when she became established among the barbarians. She carried the Roman law along with her into Germany, into France, into every country whither she went, and its ecclesiastical part she developed more and more in her own favor. Ecclesiastical persons were gradually exempted from the common law, and subjected only to their own special courts; ecclesiastical property was gradually based on other claims, and held on other conditions, than secular property; finally, the principle of immunity was declared a divine ordination, and acknowledged as such, for instance, by the emperor Frederic II. in his Authentica (Pertz: Mon., 4, 243). These advantages were not gained, however, without contest with the secular powers; and the whole church organization began to weaken in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The victories of former days were sorely reversed. It was in vain that the Council of Trent (Sess. 25, c. 20) undertook to defend the principle of immunity, that the bull In cœna Domini excommunicated any one who should infringe upon the immunities of the church, that Urban VIII. in 1626 established a special department of the curia as Congregatio Jurisdictionis et Immunitatis Ecclesiasticæ. The absolute State was by its own principle compelled to destroy such privileges and particular rights, and the constitutional State followed in its track. While the syllabus of Dec. 8, 1864, still clings to the principle of ecclesiastical immunity as a divine ordination, the military laws of Germany and France (1871-73) grant only a partial exemption from military service to the clergy. [See F. CHAMARD: De l'immunité ecclésiastique et monastique, Paris, 1878.] MEJER.

IMPANATIO (from in and panis, "bread") denotes one of the many modifications of the doctrine of the real presence of the flesh and blood of Christ in the Eucharist, which arose in opposition to the doctrine of transubstantiation. Ruprecht of Deutz, who died in 1135, is the father of this idea. In his Comm. in Exod., ii. 10 (Opera, i. p. 267, Cologne, 1602) he explains how God connects the real flesh and blood of Christ with the real bread and wine in the Eucharist, without disturbing the substance of either, just as, in the womb of the Virgin, he connected the Word and the human nature without changing the character of the latter. The word impanatio, however, is first used by a contemporary of his, Alger of Liège, who died in 1131, and wrote against him, in defence of transubstantiation, In pane Christum impanatum, sicut Deum in carne personaliter incarnatum. In the period of the Reformation Carlstadt accused Osiander of holding the view of impanation; and the same accusation was preferred by the Romanists in general against Luther, who denied it. L. PELT.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS (impositio manuum, χειροτονια). This custom is as old as the race, and rests upon the significance of the human hand in the bodily organism and in social life. Thus we speak of the hand of peace, the hand of war, the helping, protecting, needy, cruel hand, and distinguish between laying hands on, laying hands upon, raising hands over, raising hands to, a person. The biblical custom of laying on of hands rests upon the conception of the hand as the organ of mediation and of transference. So the priest laid his hand upon the head of the bullock or the goat to indicate that he had transferred to it his guilt or the guilt of the people (Lev. i. 4, iii. 2, viii. 14, xvi. 21, 24). The Old-Testament imposition of hands can be divided into three stages, — the patriarchal (typical and benedictory), the prophecy of the continuance of the hereditary blessing (cf. Gen. xviii. 14); the legal (symbolical and officially consecrating), an investiture of the authority of office, and promise of the blessing attached (cf. Exod. xxix. 10; Num. xxvii. 18); and the prophetic (dynamic and healing), a miraculous power to heal and to restore life (cf. 2 Kings iv. 34). The New-Testament instances do really what the Old Testament's do only typically, and admit of a similar classification into the spiritual-patriarchal laying-on of hands by Christ and his apostles, the spiritual-legal and official by the Church, and the prophetic-healing, a New-Testament charisma, of a mysterious character. Our Lord healed at first by laying on of hands (Mark vi. 5; Luke iv. 41), but gradually passed over to the exclusive use of the word of power in order that he might not encourage the popular idea that there was a necessary connection between the laying-on of hands and the cure. He transferred his spirit to his disciples, when he raised his hands in blessing over them as he ascended (Luke xxiv. 50). This act, in connection with the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, is the source of the apostolic laying-on of hands. With the withdrawal of the miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost, ordination was developed as a legal and symbolical form out of the ecclesiastico-official laying-on of hands. But in the Roman Church the latter continues as a practice, in connection with the consecrating of catechumens, the preparation for baptism, confirmation, and particularly ordination, where the laying-on of hands constitutes the specific visible sign of the sacrament. See ORDINATION. J. P. LANGE.

IMPOSTORIBUS, De Tribus. In his encyclica (May 21—July 1, 1239) Gregory IX. accused Frederic II. of having said that the world had been deceived by three impostors, — Jesus, Moses, and Mohammed; that he who thought that God, the Creator of the world, could be born of a woman, was a fool; that nothing ought to be believed but that which is self-evident, or can be proved, etc. The emperor peremptorily denied ever to have used such expressions; but when we remember how well he liked to be called the precursor of the Antichrist, how infatuated he was by Arab philosophy, and how anticlerical was the whole atmosphere of the Hohenstaufen court, it seems not improbable that he may have entertained very sceptical views, though there is no direct proof. So much for the origin of the phrase. With respect to the book having this or a similar phrase for its title, there circulated in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the most singular and contradictory rumors concerning its date and author, and even concerning its contents; for the book itself seemed to have disappeared. See GENTHE: De impostura religionum, Leipzig, 1833. The text edited by E. Weller in 1846, and again in 1876, is derived from a copy found in the Royal Library of Dresden, and dated 1598. But there must have been earlier editions, as the book is mentioned by Wilhelm Postel in 1563; and Campanella, who was accused of being its author, says that it was published thirty years before he was born, consequently in 1538. The contents of the book are sceptical throughout: even the ideas of the existence of God and the necessity of worshipping him are undermined. But the argumentation shows often a glaring lack of religious sense and theological knowledge, and has probably never led any one astray. W. MÖLLER.

IMPUTATION OF SIN AND OF RIGHT-EOUSNESS. I. THE WORD IN ITS SCRIPTURAL USAGE. — It is represented in the Old Testament

by the Hebrew חָשַׁב , and in the Septuagint and New Testament by the Greek word λογίζομαι . These words occur frequently in Scripture, and are variously translated in the authorized version; e.g., to think (Job xxxv. 2; Rom. ii. 3), to regard (Isa. xxxiii. 8), to esteem (Isa. xxix. 16, 17; Rom. xiv. 14), to reckon (2 Sam. iv. 2), to be reckoned for or among (Rom. iv. 4, Luke xxii. 37), to impute (Lev. vii. 18; Rom. iv. 6-8), to lay to one's charge (2 Tim. iv. 16), to count (Rom. iv. 5). Liddell and Scott define λογίζομαι equivalent to "to count, deem, consider that any thing is." Cremer (Bib. Theo. Lex. of New-Testament Greek) says, $\text{λογίζεσθαι τί τιμι}$ is equivalent to "to reckon any thing to a person; to put to his account, either in his favor, or as to what he must be answerable for."

II. THE DOCTRINE OF THE IMPUTATION OF ADAM'S FIRST SIN TO HIS DESCENDANTS. — The foregoing citations make it plain that the "imputation of sin" cannot be a physical act, or the making any one subjectively sinful, but that it is always a forensic act, or a charging to one the guilt of any sin as a ground of punishment. To "impute sin" is punitatively to lay it to one's charge (2 Tim. iv. 16): "not to impute sin" is to remit the punishment, or to acquit or to justify the person.

The entire historical church from the first has equally repudiated the two antithetic heresies of Manichæism and Pelagianism. In denying Manichæism, or the doctrine that sin is a substance, eternal and self-existent, the whole church has maintained that sin could have originated only in an apostatizing self-decision of an intelligent and free creature. In denying Pelagianism she has uniformly held that all infants come into the world with their moral natures depraved and guilty, and therefore needing redemption before they have individually done either good or evil. This problem involves, therefore, three distinct though related questions. (1) If all men, except the first, come into existence with natures morally corrupt anterior to personal agency of whatever kind, then how can Manichæism be avoided, and their sin be shown to originate in an act of personal self-decision? (2) How can God be justified in bringing (whether directly or mediately through natural law, it makes no difference) this root of all evils upon new-created creatures at the beginning of their careers? (3) How can this natural depravity be regarded as guilt, and not as disease and misfortune?

Origen, followed only by a few individuals, has answered all these questions at once by maintaining that all human souls had a personal probation in a pre-existing state; that the sinful character of each infant is a righteously imposed penal consequence of his own personal apostasy in that state (De Principiis, II., IX.). Dr. Julius Müller (Christian Doctrine of Sin, vol. ii. p. 157) in like manner refers this natural depravity to a transcendental and timeless personal self-decision of each soul.

But the historical church in all its branches has answered these three questions at once by teaching that this natural depravity, which infects each human soul from birth, is, in every case, a penal consequence of Adam's apostatizing act. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, lib. xiii. c. 3 and 14; Op. imperf. c. Jul. lib. iv. § 104); Dr. G. F. Wiggers (Augustinianism and Pelagianism, chap. 5, 2, § 2); Anselm (Cur Deus Homo? lib. ii. cap. 8; De Conceptu Virg. et Orig. Pec., caput x.); Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theo., i. quæ. 100, and ii. quæ. 81 and 82); Council of Trent (Sess. v. 1 and 2); Bellarmin (Amiss. Grat., iii. 1); Philip Melancthon (Apol. Aug. Conf., 46, 47; Expli. Symb. Nicen., in Corp. Refor., xxiii. 403, 583; Formula Concordiæ, Pars II. 1; De Pec. Orig. 27); Quenstedt (Quæ. Theo. Dict., Pol. I. 994); Calvin (Insti. Theol., bk. ii. chap. 1, §§ 4-7; Second Helvetic Conf., cap. viii. § 1); Zacharias Ursinus (Summe of Christian Religion; Lectures on Heidelberg Catechism; Origin of Sin; What are the Causes of Sin?); Amesius (Medul. Theol., lib. i. cap. 17); H. Witsius (Eccon. of Coven., bk. i. chap. 8, §§ 33, 34); J. Arminius (Public Disputations, Disp. 7, and Private Disputations, Disp. 31); Robert Watson (Institutes of Theology, pt. ii. chap. xviii.); President Witherspoon (Works, vol. iv. p. 96).

But, while the entire church has been thus far agreed, different schools have widely differed as to the true answer to the question, On what ground the descendants of Adam are held legally responsible for, i.e., punishable on account of, his first sin? The tendency at the first was to ascribe it to the natural relation of Adam alone, and sin was regarded as propagated ex traduce. Thus Tertullian taught that Adam is pons generis et princeps, and his soul matrix omnium (Dorner's System of Christian Doctrine, pt. ii. § 74). This obviously accounts for the fact of innate pollution, but not of guilt: it shows how sin descends, but not how the permission that it should thus descend consists with the justice of God. Therefore Augustine strove to introduce a moral ground for our sharing in the penal consequences of Adam's sin by showing that our wills were in some way represented in his will. "Omnes enim fuimus in illo, quando omnes fuimus ille unus" (De Civ. Dei, lib. xiii. cap. xiv.).

This conception of Augustine was repeated in various forms, but with virtual identity, until the appearance of the "federal theory," about the age of the Reformation. Sometimes it has been illustrated and re-enforced by realistic philosophy, but oftener it has stood alone as a revealed fact; or as a necessary inference from revealed facts. The federal view presupposes the natural headship of Adam as the progenitor of the entire human race, and builds upon it the further idea of moral representation under the analogy of a covenant, including all mankind in their first parent. Dr. Charles P. Krauth says, "The technicalities of the federal idea are late in appearing; but the essential idea itself comes in from the beginning in our (the Lutheran) theology." It was first prominently advanced by Catharinus in the Council of Trent (F. Paul Sarpi's History of Council of Trent, translated by Sir N. Brent, London, 1676, pp. 162-166), and by Hyperius, Olevianus, and Raphael Eglin (Dorner's History of Protestant Theology, vol. ii. pp. 31-45). Melancthon said (Expli. Symb. Nicen., in the Corp. Refor., xxiii. 403 and 583), "Adam and Eve merited guilt and depravity for their posterity, and in this trial they represented the whole human race."

This view was generally adopted among all the churches, Arminian as well as Reformed, and has prevailed almost universally until the appearance of the modern school of German speculative theologians. The "federal theology," as a method of exhibiting the whole plan of God's dealings with men in creation and redemption, under the forms of the two covenants of works and of grace, is generally attributed to Coccejus, professor in Leyden (d. 1669); but it is certain that this conception had taken hold of the British Reformed churches from the first. This is proved from the Method of the Christian Religion, compiled by Ussher in the second decade of the seventeenth century; from N. Byfield's (father of the clerk of the Westminster Assembly) Principles, or the Pattern of Wholesome Words, first edition, 1618; from Treatise of the Covenant of Grace, by J. Ball, published 1645, after his death; and from the Mysterium et Medulla Bibliorum, by Francis Roberts, London, 1657, a complete system of divinity on the method of covenants.

III. THE DOCTRINE OF THE IMPUTATION OF CHRIST'S RIGHTEOUSNESS TO HIS PEOPLE.

—As Adam's apostatizing act is the guilty ground of the condemnation, alienation, and consequent depravity of the race, so the obedience and sufferings of Christ in their stead is the meritorious ground of the justification, reconciliation, and consequent regeneration of the beneficiaries of his redemption. This has virtually been the faith of the historical church from the beginning; although, from the prevalent confusion of the ideas of justification and sanctification, the ground of justification in imputed righteousness was not explicitly set forth before the Reformation, yet it was in essence involved in what the better schoolmen (as Anselm and Thomas Aquinas, etc.) taught as to the nature of the atonement, as to the headship of Christ, and as to the distinction between satisfaction and merit (Summa, pt. iii. quæ. 48, 49). While the thought of Luther is fully expressed in the language of St. Bernard (Tract. c. err. Abelardi, cap. vi. 15), the most evangelical of the schoolmen, "ut videlicet satisfactio unius omnibus imputetur, sicut omnium peccata unus ille portavit." This doctrine, in its strictest definition, was the characteristic of all the Reformers, and of the confessions and classical theology which has proceeded from them (Apol. Aug. Conf. de Justif.; Form. Concord, pt. ii. 9, 17; Calvin's Institutes, bk. iii. chap. 11, § 2; Heidelberg Catechism, Ques. 60; Westminster Confession, chap. xi.).

A. A. HODGE.

INABILITY in theology means want of power to do God's will. It may be natural, when the cause is extrinsic to the will; moral, when the cause is inherent in the will. The New School Calvinistic theologians contended that man has not natural, but merely moral, inability: consequently he can serve God if he will. The Old School denied him ability of any kind. The Arminians do the same, but affirm gracious ability, whereby man is enabled to be saved. See A. A. HODGE: Outlines, chap. xx.; C. HODGE: Sys. Theol., ii. 257-277.

INCAPACITY, as an ecclesiastical term, denotes absolute unfitness for ordination. The Roman-Catholic Church has established two cases of incapacity: women cannot be ordained, and men who are not baptized. In the latter case the incapacity is self-evident: in the former it is based on 1 Tim. ii. 12, 1 Cor. xiv. 34-35, and has never been doubted by the Church. The Protestant churches followed originally the same rules as the Roman Church, until lately some exceptions have been made with respect to women's incapacity.

INCARNATION. The doctrine of the incarnation, in its biblical elements and historical development, has already been treated in the art. CHRISTOLOGY. Its present relation and importance, in view of modern conceptions of the creation, require distinct mention. Three points should be noticed as specially significant.

1. The present tendency among many theologians is to lay increased stress upon the ethical necessity of the incarnation. It is to be conceived of as an immanent necessity of the love of God, and as involved in the purpose of the best possible creation. It is necessary to the complete self-revelation and self-impartment of God to the creation, and also for the perfection and consummation of the creation. The incarnation is that full and final outgoing of God into his creation which satisfies God's own moral perfection. It is, therefore, ideally necessary, involved, that is, in the idea of a perfect God and a perfect creation. The purpose of creation may be said, therefore, to include the purpose of incarnation; and the incarnation may be regarded as an eternal counsel of God, irrespective of the contingency of sin, and purpose of redemption. This conception of an incarnation as the consummation of the creation, even had there been no sin, is not to be confounded with the conception of a pantheistic self-development of the divine nature. There was no metaphysical necessity, but a purely ethical necessity, of incarnation for the perfect God. Therefore this view of it does not diminish the glory of free grace; rather redemption through the Son of God is seen to be no afterthought, or expedient of grace, but to be provided for, and made possible, in the eternal purpose of creation. Not only in the divine idea of creation was sin rendered possible, but also redemption through Him who is the completion and goal of the creation. The world was made capable of redemption in the same thought and purpose by which it was made capable of sinning. The incarnation, then, becomes a central and essential fact in our theodicy. All God's ways from the beginning lead up to Christ.

2. More stress is laid in recent theology upon the cosmical relations of the incarnation. The old truth of the natural headship of Christ receives new significance in view of modern theories of the origin and unity of the creation. If a theistic evolution be assumed, the Christ is not dethroned, but exalted, as the goal of the whole ascent of life, the end and completion of all conceivable development, the perfect Man beyond whom there can be none higher, the Head over all, in whom humanity is raised to the throne of divinity, the second Man, who is the Lord from heaven. The whole universe is thus seen to be created for Christ, through whom all things shall at last be made subject unto the Father, that God may be all, and in all.

3. These conceptions and tendencies of modern theology are proving themselves helpful, also, in relation to the problem of the two natures in the person of Christ. This has been, from the beginning of Christian theology, its great transcendent problem; and no thought of man can be great enough to comprehend the mystery of God in Christ. But any conception which brings this miracle of history into new light, or more apparent harmony with reason, is a welcome contribution to theology. So far as any progress in this doctrine has been made since the Protestant confessions were worked out, it has been by applying to the incarnation the idea of development (as Professor Dorner has done); so that the incarnation may be conceived as a process of union of two natures in one person. "The Word became flesh." This becoming flesh was real at the nativity. The birth of Jesus was the first moment of an actual, real incarnation. But it was not completed in the manger: the union of the two natures required the mediation of a life, as well as birth. It was a process begun at the nativity, and completed in the ascension of the Christ to the right hand of the Majesty on high. Room is thus found in this conception for the growth of the human nature, the coming to itself of the human soul; and, as far and as fast as the growth of the human nature permitted, it was made one in immutable union with the higher nature of the second man, the Lord from heaven. Christ was made perfect through suffering, and the life of Jesus was necessary to the perfection of the person of the Redeemer. Modern theology may be able to bring in this manner the fact of the incarnation into more hopeful relation to modern tendencies of thought; but imperfect as any conception of the mode of it must be, inadequate as are all human definitions of the method of God's love in the incarnation, the fact of it is the key to the creation and to history. This is the mystery of God, in whose light other mysteries are made plain. The incarnation, itself transcending reason, is the one sufficient, rational explanation of the universe. NEWMAN SMYTH.

INCENSE. The burning of incense entered, as a symbolical act, very largely into the religious rituals of Judaism and Græco-Roman Paganism. The Christian Church at first rejected the custom. See Tertullian: Apolog., 30; De cor. milit., 10; Athenagoras: Legat. pro Christ., 13; Arnobius: Adv. Gent., 7, 25. Later on, however, the Church adopted it. In the very minute descriptions of the administration of the Lord's Supper, in the Catecheses of Cyril and the Apostolical Constitutions, it is not mentioned. It occurs for the first time in the Apostolical Canons (can., iii.). Evagrius (sixth century, Hist. Eccl., vi. 21) speaks of a golden θυμιατήριον, or censer, presented to the Church of Jerusalem by Chosroes. At that time it had become common in the Eastern Church to fume with incense the elements of the Lord's Supper,—a ceremony which is found at the beginning of the middle ages in the Frankish Church. See Capitul. i. 6, in Harduin: Conc. Coll., v. In the evangelical churches the custom was never adopted. See FRANKINCENSE. G. E. STEITZ.

INCEST means carnal intercourse between persons within the degrees of relationship forbidden by law. Canon law followed in this field in the track of the Roman law, though with various modifications. Thus it distinguishes between incestus juris divini and incestus juris humani; the former being an offence against the precepts of Lev. xviii. and xx., the latter an offence against the precepts of some other law. It furthermore ascribes the same effect to relationship by affinity as to that of consanguinity, and it establishes an entirely new description of relationship by the so-called spiritual affinity, the effect of having been baptized or confirmed together. The incestæ conjunctiones are specially treated by Concilium Aurelianense, iii. (538) c. 10, and Turonicum, ii. (567), c. 20. See also the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals (c. 4, C. III. q. 4; c. 2, C. XXXV. q. 2; c. 12, C. VI. q. 1). During the middle ages incest was cognizable only in the ecclesiastical courts, which had the power to annul incestuous marriages, and compel the offender to do penance. MEJER.

INCHOFER, Melchior, b. 1584, in Vienna, or, according to others, at Günz in Hungary; d. at Milan, Sept. 28, 1648; entered the Society of Jesus in 1607; taught philosophy and theology at Messina till 1636; lived for ten years in Rome, an intimate friend of Leo Allatius, and member of the Congregation of the Index; and was in 1646 appointed professor of the college of Macerata. Of his Epistolæ B. Mariæ V. ad Messanenses veritas vindicata (1629), the first edition was put on the Index, and suppressed. In his Historia sacræ latinitatis (1635) he makes Latin the language of the blessed in the kingdom of heaven. In his Annales ecclesiastici regni Hungariæ (1644) he has invented a bull to prove the dependence of Hungary on Rome. He was at one time considered the author of the remarkable satire on the Jesuits, Monarchia Solipsorum, which, however, Audin has proved to belong to Scotti.

IN CENA DOMINI, the famous bull fulminating curses and excommunications, not only over all heretics and those who in any way support them, but also over all who oppose or wrong the church by taxing the clergy, appealing to a general council, etc., was the work of several popes, and was, with various modification, published every year on Holy Thursday or Easter Monday, from the fourteenth century till 1770, when Clement XIV. discontinued the publication from a regard to the temporal powers, which could not help feeling offended by the tone and spirit of that document.

INCORPORATION of an ecclesiastical benefice means that some ecclesiastical corporation, for instance, a monastery, takes possession of the benefice, enjoying its revenues, but also performing the spiritual duties for the sake of which it originally was founded. From the ninth century such incorporations became very frequent as a means by which the ecclesiastical corporations endeavored to increase their revenues. But, as they were always connected with more or less glaring abuses, the councils tried to regulate the proceedings (see Conc. Trid. sess., 7, c. 7); and, when the monasteries and other ecclesiastical institutions were secularized, they ceased altogether.

INDEPENDENTS. See CONGREGATIONALISM.
INDEX LIBRORUM PROHIBITORUM is a list of books which the Roman-Catholic Church forbids its members to read, under penalty of excommunication. As a formally established institution, the Index dates back only to the sixteenth century; but the practice of forbidding the reading of books antagonistic to the interests of the Church is very old. The books of Arius were condemned and burnt; and, in the course of the fifth century, condemnations, with accompanying conflagrations of books deemed heretical, became very common. A Council of Carthage (400) even went so far as to forbid the reading of Pagan books. It was, however, not so much the purity of the doctrines which the Roman Church meant to defend by those proceedings, as her position as a power in the world. Consequently, when, by reading the Bible, people became aware of the huge discrepancy between the ideal and the actual church, the Bible itself was made a forbidden book; translations into the vernacular tongues were prohibited; and a Council of Toledo (1229) forbade laymen to have in their possession any of the books of the Old or New Testament. With the Reformation and the invention of the printing-press, the number of dangerous books attacking the Church, both her doctrines and her practices, increased in such a degree that a systematization of the old measures of prohibiting and forbidding became necessary; and in 1557 Paul IV. published in Rome the first official Index. In its eighteenth session the Council of Trent took the question under consideration, and a special committee was formed; but in its twenty-fifth session the council determined to place the whole affair under the direct authority of the Pope; and in 1564 Pius IV. issued a new Index, generally known as Index Tridentinus. Sixtus V. finally organized a special congregation of the Index, which is still in operation, and which, besides the Index librorum prohibitorum, also prepares an Index librorum expurgandorum; that is, a list of books which may be read after being expurgated, and freed from certain offensive passages. See Index librorum prohibitorum sanctissimi domini nostri Pii IX., editio novissima, Rome, 1876.

INDIA, Religions of. See BRAHMANISM, BRAHMO SOMAJ, BUDDHISM.

INDIA, or Hindustan, is one of the most extensive empires of the world, possesses an august history, has given birth to two of the most prevalent religions of mankind, has preserved venerable works of literature and art, and for the last two generations has furnished the most violent opposition to, as well as enjoyed the most earnest labors of, Christian missionary endeavor.

COUNTRY.—India comprises an area of 1,474,000 square miles. Lying between the Himalayas on the north—the most sublime mountain peaks in the world, rising, at their highest elevation (Mount Everest), twenty-nine thousand feet above the sea—and the Bay of Bengal and the Indian Ocean on the south, it possesses a great variety of climate and scenery. The country, for the most part, is poorly watered; but the Brahmaputra and Ganges are two mighty rivers, the latter more than thirteen hundred miles in length. The present population is two hundred and forty millions, of whom a hundred and twenty-one thousand are Europeans. There are eighteen cities with a population of over one hundred thousand; and of these Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, and Lucknow are the largest.

PEOPLE.—The people are of mixed descent. The old aboriginal races, which inhabited the country before the time of Alexander the Great, still preserve their identity. The most ancient is the so-called Dravidian stock, which includes those speaking the Tamil, Telugu, Malayalam, etc. These natives are dusky in complexion. With them have been intermingled the conquering races from the north, the more noble Aryans (who have imposed their literature upon the country), and the Mahometans, coming from Persia, Arabia, and other Asiatic countries. The most recent intermixture has come from Europe, and more especially through the English, who approached India from the sea, and are now the dominant factor in Indian society, although insignificant in point of numbers. The population is divided, as to religion, amongst various forms of worship. Brahmanism, or Hinduism, is the most venerable in point of age, and goes back several centuries before the advent of Christ. Buddhism came next in point of time, threatened to efface the Brahman worship, but was itself almost exterminated by the revolt of the Brahmans. Then came Mahometanism, and finally Christianity, which is the youngest and last. See BUDDHISM and BRAHMANISM. The people are divided as follows:—

Hindus	139,000,000
Mahometans	40,000,000
Buddhists	3,000,000
Sikhs	1,000,000
Christians	900,000

The people speak nearly a hundred languages, of which the principal are the Hindustani (and Hindi, which is, strictly speaking, the proper term for the modern dialect), Bengali, Mahratta, Telugu, Tamil, Punjabi.

HISTORY.—The history of India reaches far back into dim antiquity, and has its chief interest to us as a history of invasions and the domination, in turn, of the foreign invaders over the native populations. Alexander the Great crossed the Indus in 327 B.C., but was forced, by the discontent of his troops, to forego the ambition of waving his victorious sword over the peninsula. In 664 the first invasion of the followers of Mahomet occurred. The invaders were repelled, but returned in greater force in 711, and subdued the Hindus of Sindh, but were driven back again. The great Mahometan invasion is connected with the famous name of Sultan Mahmud of Ghazni (997-1030), fourteen of whose descendants sat on the throne of India. The name of that fierce warrior Timur (Tamerlane) also has a place in Indian history. He was crowned at Delhi in 1398. Of Indian sovereigns, the greatest has been Akbar the Great, whose reign lasted from 1556 to 1605. He ruled over a large part of India, and his name is famous as that of a conqueror and an administrator.

The connection of modern Europe with India dates from the latter part of the fifteenth century. The history of the land is closely connected with the Portuguese, Dutch, and English, and also, to some extent, with the French. Columbus, when he set sail from Europe in 1492, steered his vessels, as he thought, towards India, or the East Indies as the country was then called. In 1498 Vasco da Gama cast anchor off the Indian city of Calicut; and the Portuguese at once began to establish trading-posts, and continued to have a monopoly of the trade during the whole of the sixteenth century. In 1509 the Portuguese governor, Albuquerque, seized Goa, which has ever since been the capital of the Portuguese possessions in India. The avowed object of the Portuguese was to promote the spread of Christianity, and conquer the land. They retain control of only a thousand and eighty-six square miles, with a population of four hundred thousand. In 1602 the Dutch East-India Company was organized. The Dutch were the first to disturb the undisputed possession of the Portuguese. During the sixteenth century, vessels from Holland had traded with Indian ports; and, in the first half of the seventeenth, the Dutch rapidly extended their possessions, expelling the Portuguese before them.

The first foundation of British empire in India was laid by the English East-India Company, which received a charter in 1600 from Queen Elizabeth. Its capital stock amounted then only to the modest sum of seventy thousand pounds. The wealth of this corporation grew with astonishing rapidity, and its power almost kept pace with its wealth. Lord Clive and Warren Hastings may be said to have been the architects of the British empire in India, which is usually dated from the battle of Plassey (June 23, 1757), in which Clive won a decisive victory. The influence of the Portuguese, Dutch, and French, henceforth waned before the dominant power of the English. He was appointed, in 1758, first governor of all the company's settlements in Bengal; and, after a visit to England, he filled the office for a second time,—from 1665 to 1667. Warren Hastings arrived in India in 1772, and organized the administrative government of the empire which Clive had founded. From that time on, till the present, the British dominions in India have been extending, until, at the present time, there are eight provinces under the administration of England, stretching from the waters of Cape Comorin to the shadows of the Himalayas. The British power has since been seriously threatened only once (in 1857), by the Indian mutiny, which, spreading from an apparently insignificant cause, but really rooted in the aversion to the rulers, spread rapidly among the people, and entailed a series of quick and thrilling horrors upon the English residents. Until 1858 the East India Company, under various restrictions, exercised supreme sway over India, its power culminating in the "governor-general in council." In this year it was abolished, and India was placed under the immediate administration of the English Government. Its highest officer is called "viceroy," and a secretary for India sits in the cabinet. The Earl of Ripon has been viceroy since 1880. On Jan. 1, 1877, the Queen of England was proclaimed Empress of India.

During the century great changes have been effected in the condition of the population of India. It is not possible to separate these reforms from the direct influence of the missionaries. But there have been distinguished Christian governors-general of India, such as Lord Bentinck (1828-35), the Earl of Dalhousie (1848-56), and others, whose enlightened statesmanship has effected permanent and most salutary reforms in the administration of the courts, the abolition of revolting social customs, the promotion of education, and the extension of commercial benefits, such as the construction of railways, of which there were 8,215 miles in operation in 1878. To Lord Bentinck is due the honor of having suppressed the suttee, or the practice of burning widows alive on the graves of their husbands. In 1817 no less than seven hundred widows were committed to the flames in Bengal alone. By the decree of 1829 all who abetted suttee were declared guilty of "culpable homicide." It was this same enlightened administrator who suppressed the Thugs, a large and secret association of assassins, who spread terror through the land. To the government are also due measures for the suppression of infanticide, which once was practised to an enormous extent; female infants being particularly chosen as the victims.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS. — India has been the chief seat of missionary endeavor for the last two generations. Nearly all the missionary organizations of Europe and America have made it a basis of operations; and with it will always be associated some of the purest names in the proud annals of modern missions,—Ziegenbalg, Schwartz, Henry Martyn, Carey, Marshman, Reginald Heber, and others. There Christianity was struggling through trials and discouragements, while the islands of the South Seas were rapidly emerging from darkness into the light. But, although the results were slow in showing themselves, the recent current towards Christianity has been strong, and has surpassed the most sanguine expectations. Although the proportion of Christians to the whole population is still small (one-half of one per cent), it must be remembered that the influence of the gospel cannot be accurately measured by numbers. Christian influences are, by the testimony of all parties, gradually undermining superstitious practices, and working a reform in the social life. "Missions," said Lord Lawrence, "have done more to benefit India than all other agencies combined." Sir Bartle Frere said, "Missions have worked changes more extraordinary for India than any thing witnessed in modern Europe." Other testimonies from civilians, to the same import, might be added if necessary. An ancient tradition represents that St. Thomas planted Christianity in India. We come to solid ground when Francis Xavier (d. 1552) was sent out as a missionary by the king of Portugal. In 1534 Goa was made the first (Catholic) bishopric of India. One of the professed objects of the Portuguese occupation of India was the spread of the gospel. After various vicissitudes, Roman Catholicism continues to flourish; but its influence in elevating the tone of the moral and social life of the people is hardly perceptible. The earliest Protestant mission to India was founded by Frederick IV. of Denmark in 1705; and in 1706 Ziegenbalg arrived at Tranquebar, and began his devoted labors. The translation of the Scriptures into Tamil was begun by him. This Danish mission passed, in 1825, over to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. In 1751 Christian Friedrich Schwartz (venerabile et præclarum nomen), having been ordained at Copenhagen, arrived at the mission. He died in 1793, but had lived long enough to win the confidence of the native princes, and to secure for his name an undying fame. At the present time, thirty-five Protestant societies have missionaries in India. There are six hundred and eighty-nine ordained European and American ministers, two hundred and forty-four of whom are from England. It will be possible here only to give a brief account of the labors of the principal of these societies, and we shall arrange them according to the date of their beginning operations.

The English Baptist Missionary Society began its work in India in 1793, when William Carey arrived (Nov. 7) in Bengal. He established himself thirty miles from Calcutta; then at Mudnabatty, two hundred and sixty miles north of Calcutta, where he opened a school (1798), and put up a printing-press; and finally at Serampore, which became a distinguished centre of light for all India, and from whose printing-presses issued translations of the Scriptures into many of the languages of the land. In 1799 this mission was re-enforced by those devoted laborers, Ward and Marshman. In 1800 the first part of the New Testament had been translated into Bengalee; and on Feb. 7, 1801, the entire New Testament was finished. In 1809 the translation of the entire Bible into Bengalee, and of the New Testament into Sanscrit, was completed. Carey died June 9, 1834. His example, heroism, and missionary devotion will ever stamp him as one of the apostles of India. Statistics of 1881: English missionaries, 37; evangelists, 131; native communicants, 3,467; day schools, 104; scholars, 2,225.

The London Missionary Society sent three missionaries to India in 1804, who established themselves at Vizagapatam, five hundred and fifty miles south-west of Calcutta. In 1819 its agents had translated the whole New Testament into the Telinga language. In 1805 it established itself at Madras; in 1806, in Travancore; 1816, at Calcutta, etc. Statistics of 1882: 48 English missionaries, 271 native ordained ministers and preachers, 5,210 communicants, 378 schools, 5,928 scholars.

The American Board began its labors in India in 1812, when Judson, Rice, Nott, Newell, and Hall sailed for there. The opposition of the government forced them all to retire. Hall and Nott went to Bombay, but were not fairly settled in their work till 1814. The following year they were sufficiently proficient in the Mahratta language to begin preaching. In March, 1816, they introduced the first printing-press in Bombay, and at once set to work to translate and print the New Testament. In 1818 there were eleven schools under the care of the Board, with an attendance of six hundred scholars. On May 12, 1823, the chapel was dedicated in Madras, "the first Christian temple on the western side of the Indian peninsula." In 1821 Newell died, Hall following him in 1826. In 1831 occurred the first Christian marriage of a Brahman. The missionaries established a native temperance society in 1832, binding its members to abstain from strong drink, opium, and tobacco. In 1839 there was strong opposition against the missionaries on account of their success; and a legal process was instituted to force them to abstain from the work of making converts, but in vain. In 1843 the opposition took the form of printing native books and papers at Bombay, and refuting Christianity from the writings of Paine, Voltaire, and other infidel authors. The translation of the entire Scriptures into Mahratta was completed in 1847, the New Testament having been finished in 1826. The American Board has two centres of missions in India Proper, — Maratha in Western India, and Madura in Southern India; and in 1881 employed 52 missionaries and assistant missionaries, and 563 native helpers. Its churches had 3,931 members, and 5,669 scholars in its schools. In Ceylon it employs 16 missionaries, 172 native helpers, and has 972 church-members, and 8,981 scholars.

The Church Missionary Society (English) began its labors in India at Agra in 1813, and at Madras in 1815. It had encouraged the Danish missions before. It directed its efforts at the first mainly to Tranquebar and Tinnevely. In 1853 it had 5,815 communicants, and 17,000 scholars in its schools. Statistics of 1882: 103 European and 121 native missionaries, 20,439 communicants, 1,157 schools with 32,853 boy and 11,452 girl scholars. In Ceylon it employs 18 European and 14 native missionaries, and has 1,636 communicants.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (English) began its Indian mission in 1816, at Calcutta. In 1853 it had 48 missions, with 166 assistants, 4,629 communicants, and 5,500 scholars. Its missions in the Punjab and Sindh in Northern India are making rapid progress. Since 1877 the accessions of this society in Tinnevely alone amount to 20,000, and it has 60,000 adherents in that district. These two societies of the Church of England have the largest number of adherents in India. The Church of England has at present four Indian episcopal sees, — Calcutta (Metropolitan), Bombay, Madras, and Lahore, with six bishops, Drs. Sargent and Caldwell being assistants to the Bishop of Madras.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society (English) began its work, through the Rev. Mr. Lynch, in Madras, in 1817. In 1830 the number of missionaries was nine, and of schools twenty-five. Mysore and Calcutta have been their two most important strategic centres. In the former place their schools are in a very prosperous condition. The society in 1881 had 100 missionaries in India.

129 schools, 9,148 scholars, 1,497 communicants, and 3,081 communicants in Ceylon.

The Church of Scotland sent out its first missionary to India in 1829, in the person of Dr. Duff, who arrived in Calcutta in 1830. During his long and eminently useful career he secured the respect of all classes; and his eloquent voice on his visits to Scotland and the United States aroused the deepest interest in the general cause of missions. He established a collegiate institute in Calcutta, which has been attended by hundreds of Hindus. Dr. John Wilson, about the same time, inaugurated the work of the Church of Scotland at Bombay. The disruption of 1843 in the Scotch Church led to a division of the work in India; and both the Established and Free churches support their own missionary force. Narayan Sheshadri, the converted Brahman who has made two visits to America (in 1873 and 1880), is connected with the Free Church. In 1882 it had 142 schools, 10,444 scholars, 1,286 communicants.

The American Presbyterian Mission in India was started in 1834 by the arrival of William Read and John C. Lowrie. These missionaries chose as the scene of their labors the northern provinces, whither no missionaries had, up to that time, penetrated. Lodiana was the first centre of operations (1834). The Gospel of John was translated, in 1840, into the Punjabi, the language of the Sikhs. The mission has been very successful. In 1842 three presbyteries were constituted. — Lodiana, Furrukhabad, and Allahabad; and in 1845 the first meeting of the synod of Northern India convened at Futtehgurh. Kola-poor is now a fourth centre of missionary operations. According to the report of 1882, the mission has 5,870 boys and 2,341 girls in its schools, and carries on its work through 30 American, 15 native preachers, and 52 American female, and 171 native lay missionaries. The number of communicants connected with the mission is 1,019, and its annual expenditure $102,982.

The Basel Missionary Society opened a mission on the west coast of India in 1834. In 1850 it had 28 missionaries and the same number of native assistants, with 487 communicants. It now has 1,100 communicants.

The American Baptist Mission was begun in 1835; is interested more especially in the Telugus, of whom there are 15,000,000, whose district lies on the eastern coast, and stretches nearly eight hundred miles, — from the northern borders of the Carnatic to Orissa. In 1854 this society had one station, two missionaries, nine communicants, and two schools, with sixty-three pupils. The history of this mission is one of the most inspiring single episodes in recent church history. Twenty-seven years ago it was proposed, at the anniversary meeting of the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society in Albany, to abandon the mission among the Telugus as a hopeless enterprise. It was called the "Lone Star Mission." After a protracted discussion, it was decided to continue the work; and a hymn which Dr. F. S. Smith had retired to compose was read, containing the verse which now seems like a prophecy: —

"Shine on, 'Lone Star!' the day draws near
When none shall shine more fair than thou:
Thou, born and nursed in doubt and fear,
Wilt glitter on Immanuel's brow."

In 1879 a remarkable movement took place among the people, which would have justified even more patience than the missionaries had exercised. 8,691 were baptized in Nellore in two months, and 2,222 in a single day. Statistics of 1882: American missionaries, 29; native, 94; communicants, 18,992.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist-Episcopal Church (American) began operations in Northern India in 1856, and in Southern India in 1872. The North India Conference was organized in 1866, and consists of the Rohilkund, Oudh, and Kumaon districts. According to the report of 1882, the Conference employs 21 foreign missionaries and 16 assistants, has 19 ordained native preachers and 68 unordained native preachers, with 1,916 church-members and 1,307 probationers. Its day schools number 242, with an attendance of 8,500 scholars. The Conference of South India was organized in 1876, and is composed of four districts, — Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, and Allahabad. In 1881 it employed 27 foreign missionaries and 38 native preachers. The total number of communicants was 1,253, and of probationers 726. It carries on 14 day schools, with an attendance of 600.

The Gossner (1838), Berlin (1843), and Leipzig (1853) societies also carry on an important work in India. The Quakers (four missions), General Baptists (1827), Freewill Baptists (1836), Irish Presbyterians (1841), American Lutherans, Moravians, Scotch and American United Presbyterians, the Reformed Church in America, and other denominations, have missions.

Turning away from the missionary agencies, it remains to present a general view of the difficulties of missionary effort in India, and the results which have been secured.

The first missionaries to India not only had the opposition from the native population to contend against, but also the hostility of the East-India Company, which at one time absolutely forbade all missionary effort, prohibited Judson and the other missionaries from laboring at Calcutta, and for many years greatly restricted the freedom of the missionaries. But in 1813 a resolution by the English Parliament was passed, by which the company was forced to accord to all British subjects the right to establish schools and missions in India; and in 1833, at the renewal of its charter, full liberty of missionary operations was granted, and the privilege accorded to foreigners to settle in India. These privileges were immediately taken advantage of by several American societies. For the character of the religions which the natives of India profess, it must suffice to refer the reader to the arts. BRAHMANISM, BUDDHISM, and MOHAMMEDANISM.

One of the peculiar obstacles, as well as one of the most serious ones, to the success of missions in India, has been the system of caste. By it the people are divided off into classes, of which the Brahmans are the highest. These classes are fixed; and the dignity of the one, and the degradation of the other, pass down from generation to generation unalterably. Opposed to one of the fundamental ideas of the New Testament, that "God is no respecter of persons," the missionaries have almost unanimously and uniformly refused to acknowledge any such distinction among the converts. But this principle is deeply rooted in the Brahman's mind. "It is difficult for us Europeans," said Professor Monier Williams of Oxford, in 1879, "to understand how the pride of caste as a divine ordinance interpenetrates the whole being of a Hindu. He looks upon caste as his veritable god; and those caste-rules which we believe to be a hinderance to his adoption of the true religion, are to him the very essence of all religion; for they influence his whole life and conduct." Henry Martyn said, "If I ever see a Hindu Brahman converted to Jesus Christ, I shall see something more nearly approaching the resurrection of a dead body than any thing I have ever yet seen." Up to the year 1849 converts were subjected, not only to exclusion from the society of the caste, but to confiscations of property. But in that year a law was established, giving equal rights to all subjects, and protecting converts against confiscations. Not a few Brahmans are active and influential Christians; but the great mass of the converts have been, as was to be expected, from the lower classes. The other obstacles to missionary progress have been of the same general character as those met with in other lands.

The progress of the gospel in India for the first fifty years was slow, when we look at the number of native baptisms; but within the whole period remarkable changes have been effected in the habits of thought and social condition of the people; and, within the last few years, evidence has been furnished, in the large accessions to the churches, that the patient and faithful labors of the missionaries had been laying deep and permanent foundations. In 1851 there were 17,000 baptized and 128,000 native nominal Christians in India, with 357 foreign missionaries. In 1861 the number had increased to 48,000 baptized and 213,000 nominal Christians; in 1871, to 78,000 baptized and 318,000 nominal Christians. In 1882 there were not less than 800,000 or 900,000 nominal Christians, with 689 foreign missionaries, and many self-supporting native churches. The additions to the churches within the last several years have been exceedingly numerous. The great famine which prevailed in 1879, and which, according to the London Times, carried off 3,000,000 in the province of Madras alone, afforded an occasion for the display of Christian charity. The bountiful distributions of aid won the hearts of the natives, who flocked to the churches; and 16,000 were added in Tinnevely alone. In this period (1877-79) the number of converts under the care of the five Lutheran societies rose from 3,000 to 42,000. The ten Presbyterian missions of Scotland, Ireland, America, and England, from 1850 to 1878, increased their native constituency from 800 to 10,000; the London Missionary Society, from 20,000 to 48,000; and the Church Missionary Society and Propagation Society, from 61,000 to 164,000 (Christlieb: Foreign Missions, p. 153). The early progress was amidst discouragements, but the recent accretions more than atone for them. In 1850 there were four baptized converts among the Kohls; and for five years six German missionaries (Gossner Society) had labored among them with only one convert, and five of their own number falling at their post. There are now at least 4,000 baptized converts under the care of the English and German societies. The London and Propagation Societies labored for thirty years at Cuddapah in the Telugu district, with only 200 converts, and now they have 11,000. These, with the case of the American Telugu mission above referred to, are but illustrations of the discouragements and encouragements of the work.

The beneficent influence of missions is apparent in the abolition of superstitious and cruel customs, the increase of intelligence, the diffusion of a literature in almost all the native languages, and in a general leavening process, which has affected a large part of the Indian society of the upper classes. In the work of suppressing superstitious and cruel customs, the government has done much; but even this activity can be clearly traced to the influence of missions in India. The abolition of the suttee by Lord Bentinck has already been referred to; and to this same class of reforms belong the suppression of the annual holocausts under Juggernaut's car, and the practice of infanticide, and the throwing of infants into the Ganges, as a religious service. On the other hand, the change which is slowly taking place in the position of woman is due entirely to the missionaries, especially to the efforts of female missionaries. These gain admittance to the seclusion of the zenanas, and give instruction to the superstitious and unfortunate women of India. The government does not directly give the weight of its influence on the side of missions; but rather, on the contrary, it impedes the progress of the gospel by the rigid exclusion of religious instruction from the government schools. The printing-press has been introduced by missionary enterprise into almost every large centre of influence. The first newspaper established was the Sámáchar Durpun at Serampore, in 1818, by the Baptist mission. Not only have the papers under the control of the missionaries and the English multiplied greatly, but a native periodical literature has grown up, which owes its origin to a feeling of the necessity of combating Christianity in this way. The Bible has been translated entire into many of the languages, and ponderous libraries have already been printed in them.

The promotion of education as a means of reaching the people has been vigorously pushed. It may be a fair question whether the missionaries have not devoted relatively too much time to the schoolroom. Be that as it may, however, there is to-day a cordon of schools in the cities and larger towns of the Indian Empire. The government now conducts an extensive plan of education; but it got the impetus from the large advantages which it was apparent were accruing from the mission schools (art. India in Encyc. Britan.). In 1854 it established universities in Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay. The government schools are divorced from religion. The mission schools directly or indirectly teach the gospel. The education of women has progressed slowly. In 1861 there were 60,600 boys and 16,008 girls in the mission schools of India. In 1871 the numbers had risen to 95,500 boys and 26,600 girls. The writer in the Encyclopædia Britannica (p. 775), above referred to, says, "In a few exceptional places, e.g., Tinnevely, Madras, and the Kháit hills of Assam, female education has a real existence; for in these places the missionaries have influence enough to overcome the prejudices of the people." In 1878 there were 66,600 girls attending schools for girls, and 90,900 boys and girls attending the mixed schools.

The power of Christian missions in India has been further demonstrated by the new religious movements which have been begun to check its progress, or at any rate to find a mean between the superstitious of the native religions and the supernatural element of Christianity. The Brahmo Somaj (see art.) inaugurated by Keshub Chunder Sen is the principal of this class. These movements betray the unrest of the people, their growing discontent with their native religions, and longing for something purer and more rational to supply their place, and to counteract the advance of Christianity. But as Dr. Christlieb (p. 188) says, "The Hindus themselves feel and know that the downfall of their faith is inevitable. The dissolution of the Brahmo Somaj has already begun; and Keshub Chunder Sen was obliged long ago to acknowledge that 'native society is being roused, enlightened, and reformed under the influence of Christianity.'" In a public speech at Calcutta he has said, "Our hearts are touched, conquered, overcome, by a higher power; and this power is Christ. Christ, not the British Government, rules India. No one but Christ has deserved the precious diadem of the Indian crown, and he will have it." These words of this remarkable man may be regarded as prophetic of the issue of the movement which was begun by Schwartz, Carey, and Martyn. Christianity—which rings the death-knell to caste, suppresses infanticide, abolishes child-marriages, takes woman out of the degrading seclusion of the zenana, promotes culture, and builds up homes—has commended itself as the power for the regeneration of the land by the testimony of English civilians and native scholars, as well as in its fruits in the changed lives of its converts, and will prevail.

INDUCTION denotes, as the term is used in the Church of England, the formal installation, in accordance with the mandate of the bishop, of a clerk, already instituted, in possession of a benefice. The act is generally performed by the deacon, who accompanies the clerk to the church, places his hand on the key or the ring of the church-door, and says to him, "By virtue of this mandate I do induct you into the real, actual, and corporal possessions of this church of Christ, with all the rights, profits, and appurtenances thereto belonging." The clerk then opens the door, enters the church, and tolls a bell, to make his induction known to the parishioners, after which the inductor indorses the certificate of induction on the mandate of the bishop.

INDULGENCES (Indulgentia), an institution peculiar to the Roman Church, originated from confession. In order to make the absolution effective, the sacrament of confession must comprise, besides contritio cordis and confessio oris, also satisfactio; and this satisfaction consists chiefly in so-called good works,—penances, by which the wrongs done are paid for. In the old church the amount of satisfactio was measured by the time alone during which the state of penitence should last. But gradually the custom grew up of substituting specific good works, such as pilgrimages, alms, etc., for the general state of penitence; and an elaborate scheme of accounts was drawn up, by which the penances were transformed into money-payments, varying according to the wealth or poverty of the sinner. On the basis of this practice the scholastic theology developed its doctrine of indulgentia: it was completed by Thomas Aquinas, and retained unchanged by the Council of Trent.

With respect to the natural consequences of sin, such as disease, infamy, etc., the Roman Church does not pretend to possess any power; but with respect to those punishments which God inflicts on sinners, either in this world or in purgatory, she claims to have absolute jurisdiction conferred upon her by Christ, with the power of the keys; and the Council of Trent fulminated its anathema against any one who should venture on a denial. If, now, the Church should remit those punishments from mere mercy, and without any satisfactio, she would violate the divine justice, which demands that every sin shall be balanced by a good work. But how, then, does the indulgentia of the Church enter into the transaction? Partly through the doctrine of good works as opera operata, that is, as values which can be transferred from one to another; and partly through the doctrine of communio sanctorum, or the co-ownership of the Church in the inexhaustible fund of good works which Christ and the saints have left, and of which they have no need themselves. The trustee of these funds—this thesaurus meritorum, thesaurus supererogationis perfectorum—is the Pope; and he can give or sell from these funds to any one just such an amount of good work as is necessary to counterbalance a certain quantity of sin. See ALEXANDER HALESIUS: Summa, p. 4, quæst. 23, art. 2, number 5; and THOMAS AQUINAS: Summa supplement, p. 3, quæst. 25, c. 28 X.

As a reminiscence of the discipline of the ancient Church, indulgences are still granted for days, months, and years. They are either complete (indulgentia plenaria) or partial (indulgentia minus plena): either general, for the whole church; or particular, for a special diocese. The most general indulgence granted by the Roman Church is that of her jubilee. The whole department of indulgences is administered by a special congregation of cardinals; but the Questiones Eleemosynarum, or travelling agents, have been abolished.

It was the sale of indulgences in Germany, by Tetzel, which first roused the indignation of Luther, and opened the Reformation. See LUTHER, REFORMATION, TETZEL. See AMORT: De Origine, Progressu, etc., Indulgentiarum, Augsburg, 1735; and I. B. HIRSCHER: D. Lehre vom Ablass, Tübingen, 1844.

INFALLIBILIST, one who believes in and defends the official infallibility of the Pope of Rome, or his freedom from error when giving a decision on matters of faith or morals. The term is of scholastic or recent origin, from the Latin infallibilis, which is likewise modern, and found neither in classical nor patristic writers. Lewis and Short, in Harpers' Latin Dictionary, wrongly quote Augustine (Præd. Sanct., 15, 2) for infallibiliter: the word there used is ineffabiliter. The designation was prominently brought into use in 1870, during the Vatican Council, which was at first divided between infallibilists and anti-infallibilists, but at last decided in favor of infallibility. The anti-infallibilists were divided again into two parties, — those who opposed the doctrine of papal infallibility from principle, as false (Bishops Hefelee, Maret, Kenrick, Darboy, Strossmeyer), and those who opposed it only from expediency, deeming it inopportune, or untimely and unwise, to define and to declare the dogma: hence the latter were called also *inopportunist*s, as distinct from the *opportunist*s. See INFALLIBILITY and VATICAN COUNCIL. PHILIP SCHAFF.

INFALLIBILITY OF THE POPE, the doctrine that the Bishop of Rome in his official character, i.e., whenever he speaks ex cathedrâ on a question of Catholic doctrine or morals, is free from error, and that his decisions must be accepted as final, without needing confirmation by an œcumenical council. Personally the Pope may be a heretic and a bad man, or an ignoramus; but as the head of the Church he is supposed to be divinely protected from error. The fathers, the ancient creeds and councils, know nothing of this doctrine; and the Greek Church rejects it as a blasphemous assumption. It arose in the middle ages, in connection with the pseudo-Isidorian decretals, and was defended by able schoolmen (even Thomas Aquinas), but stoutly denied by the reformatory councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basle, which asserted the superiority of a council over the Pope. After the Council of Trent, it became a bone of contention between the Gallicans and the Jesuits. The latter triumphed in the Vatican Council, which brought the controversy to a close, and formulated the new article of faith by the decree of July 18, 1870, in these words: "Therefore, faithfully adhering to the tradition received from the beginning of the Christian faith, for the glory of God our Saviour, the exaltation of the Catholic religion, and the salvation of Christian people, the Sacred Council approving, we teach and define that it is a dogma divinely revealed, that the Roman pontiff when he speaks ex cathedrâ — that is, when, in discharge of the office of pastor and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals to be held by the universal church, by the divine assistance promised to him in blessed Peter (Luke xxii. 32) — is possessed of that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed that his Church should be endowed for defining doctrine regarding faith or morals; and that therefore such definitions of the Roman pontiff are irreformable of themselves, and not from the consent of the Church. But if any one — which may God avert! — presume to contradict this our definition, let him be anathema."

Papal infallibility was the chief topic of the Vatican Council: it was discussed under powerful opposition for several months. When the vote was first taken in secret session (July 13, 1870), six hundred and one members being present, four hundred and fifty-one bishops voted in the affirmative (placet), eighty-eight in the negative (non placet), sixty-two voted with a qualification (placet juxta modum), and over eighty, though present in Rome, abstained from voting. On the evening of the same day the minority, which included the ablest and most influential prelates (as Darboy of Paris, Schwarzenberg of Prague, Rauscher of Vienna, Dupanloup of Orléans, Förster of Breslau, Ketteler of Mayence, Strossmeyer of Bosnia, Hefelee of Rottenburg, Kenrick of St. Louis), sent a deputation to the Pope, and begged him on their knees to modify the proposed decree, and to make some concession for the peace and unity of the Church. But Pius IX. surprised the deputation with the assurance that the Church had always believed in the unconditional infallibility of the Pope ("I am the tradition"). In the secret session of July 16, on motion of some Spanish bishop, an addition was inserted, declaring the Pope infallible before and without the consent of the Church (non autem ex consensu ecclesiæ). On the 17th of July, fifty-six bishops, opposed to the dogma, sent a written protest to the Pope, declaring their firm adherence to their conviction, but also their reluctance to vote against him on a matter affecting him personally, and asking leave to return home. On the evening of the same day, the signers of this protest, and sixty additional members of the opposition, left Rome (taking advantage of the rumors of war), and thus gave an easy victory to the majority. In the public session, held July 18, there were but five hundred and thirty-five members present, and all voted placet except two (Bishop Riccio of Sicily, and Bishop Fitzgerald of Little Rock, Ark., who dared to protest against the Big Rock of Rome); but these two changed their vote before the close of the session. After the vote, the Pope, amidst a fearful thunderstorm and flashes of lightning, read by candlelight, in St. Peter's Cathedral, the decree of his own infallibility. The day after, Napoleon III., his chief political support, declared war against Germany. This war in a few weeks swept away both his throne and that of the Pope, and resulted in the unification of Italy, with Rome for its capital, and the establishment of the German Empire under the lead of Protestant Prussia. The proclamation of this new dogma is the cause of the secession of the "Old Catholics," under the lead of Dollinger (heretofore the pride of the Roman Church in Germany) and other eminent Catholic scholars. It is also the cause of the renewal of the serious conflict between the Pope and the Emperor (the Culturkampf, the Falk-Laws, Bismarck's refusal to go to Canossa, etc.), and of a similar conflict between the Pope and the French Republic, which arose on the ruins of the empire.

The Vatican dogma is the apex of the pyramid of the Roman hierarchy. Logically it is more consistent than the Gallican theory, as an absolute monarchy is more consistent than a constitutional monarchy. It teaches an unbroken and ever-active infallibility; while Gallicanism secures only a periodic and intermittent infallibility, which never reveals itself except in an œcumenical council. But neither theory can stand the test of history, and is a mere pretension. The sixth œcumenical council (held in Constantinople 680) condemned and excommunicated Pope Honorius I. (625-638) "as a heretic (Monothelite), who, with the help of the old serpent, had scattered deadly error." This anathema was solemnly repeated by the seventh and by the eighth œcumenical councils (787 and 869), and even by the popes themselves, who, down to the eleventh century, in a solemn oath at their accession, indorsed the sixth œcumenical council, and pronounced "an eternal anathema" on the authors of the Monothelite heresy, together with Pope Honorius, "because he had given aid and comfort to the perverse doctrines of the heretics." This papal oath was probably prescribed by Gregory II. at the beginning of the eighth century, and was found in the Liber diurnus and Liber pontificalis down to the eleventh century. Even the editions of the Roman Breviary, before the sixteenth century, reiterated the charge of heresy against Honorius. Pope Leo II. strongly confirmed the decree of the council against his predecessor Honorius, and denounced him as one who "endeavored by profane treason to overthrow the immaculate faith of the Roman Church" (qui hanc apostolicam ecclesiam non apostolicæ traditionis doctrina lustravit, sed profana prodicione immaculatam fidem subvertere conatus est). See Mansi, Concilia, Tom. XI. p. 731. Now, either the council, or the Pope, or both, must have erred. The stubborn case of Honorius, which alone is sufficient to upset the dogma (for si falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus), was strongly urged before the passage of the decree by learned members of the council, as Bishops Hefele and Kenrick; and their arguments have never been refuted. But a dogma triumphed over history. If facts are against opinion (it was said by the infallibilists), all the worse for the facts.

History knows of other heretical popes. Zephyrinus (201-219) and Callistus (219-223) were Patripassians; Liberius (358) signed an Arian creed, and condemned Athanasius, "the father of orthodoxy," who mentions the fact with indignation; Felix II. was a decided Arian; Zosimus (417) at first indorsed the heresy of Pelagius and Coelestius, whom his predecessor, Innocent I., had condemned; Vigilius (538-555) vacillated between two opposite decisions during the Three Chapter Controversy, and thereby produced a long schism in the West; John XXII. (d. 1334) denounced a certain opinion of Nicholas III. and Clement V. as heretical; several popes taught the universal depravity of men in a manner that clearly includes the Virgin Mary, and is irreconcilable with the recent dogma of the immaculate conception; Sixtus V. issued an edition of the Latin Bible with innumerable blunders, partly of his own making, and declared it the only true authentic text. Bellarmine, the great Roman controversialist and infallibilist, could not deny the facts, and advised the printing of a new edition with the bold statement in the preface, charging the errors of the infallible Pope upon the fallible printer, though the Pope had himself corrected the proofs. Pius IX., who proclaimed his own infallibility, started out as a political reformer, and advocate of Italian unity, but afterwards detested and condemned it as the worst enemy of Christianity. But since 1870 Gallicanism is dead, and the Roman Church must sink or swim with an infallible pope.

INFANT BAPTISM. See BAPTISM OF INFANTS.

INFANT COMMUNION, or the dispensing of the elements to actual babes and to very young children. The first trace of this custom is found in Cyprian (third century), who, in his treatise On the Lapsed, represents infants as saying, on the day of judgment, "We have not forsaken the Lord's bread and cup" (De lapsis, c. ix.); and in the same book he tells a striking story, how an infant refused the cup, and, when the deacon forced some of the wine down her throat, she was seized with vomiting. The explanation was, that the child, unknown to her parents, had previously, while under the care of her nurse, eaten bread soaked in wine which had been poured out at an idolatrous ceremony (De lapsis, c. xxv.). The custom of infant communion was indeed universal at that time: communion followed baptism. The so-called Liturgy of St. Clement, in the Constit. Apost., viii. 13, prescribes, in the order of communicants, the place of the little children (παιδιά). Augustine (fifth century) uses this language: "They are infants; but they are made partakers of His table that they may have life in themselves (Serm. 74, § 7). Again: he argues, that, if infants were not born in sin, Christ's words, "Except ye eat the flesh," etc. (John vi. 53), would not be true of them (Contra duas epp. Pelag. i. xxii. § 40). The practice is also proved by regulations respecting its execution; e.g., Gennadius of Marseilles (495), in his De Eccl. dogm., c. 22. The sixth canon of the Council of Macon (585) decrees that the remnants of the consecrated bread, moistened with wine, be distributed every Wednesday or Friday to innocent children, who must receive it fasting (see Hefele: Concilgesch., iii. 36); and the Gregorian Liturgy, in its earliest form, enjoins, "If the bishop be present, it is fit that the infant be forthwith confirmed with chrism, and, after that, communicated. And, if the bishop be not present, let him be communicated by the presbyter" (Liturgia Rom. Vet., Murat., Tom. ii. col. 158). The Ordo Romanus prescribes, that, where possible, the infant be not suckled from the time of its baptism to its communion, i.e., when the two rites were performed on the same day; and the Capitularies of the Frankish kings (i. 161), of Walter of Orleans (ninth century, c. 7), and of Regino, demanded that the priest should be provided at all times with the holy bread, so that no child might die without the sacrament. The sacrament was dispensed in both kinds, though "there is little clear evidence to that effect." One of the most striking proofs is in can. 14 of the Council of Toledo (675), which, "after mentioning the occasional rejection of one element by the sick, 'because, except the draught of the Lord's cup, they could not swallow the Eucharist delivered to them,' proceeds to the case of others 'who do such things in the time of infancy.'" The inference appears good that the Eucharist was offered to both, in bread as well as wine" (Smith and Cheetham, Dict. Chr. Antiq., vol. i. p. 837).

The early practice in the East, of giving the consecrated elements to blameless young persons, was paralleled in the West by the distribution of the so-called eulogiae, i.e., that portion of the Eucharist which was conveyed by the hands of the deacons to those who were absent, and, later on, by the practice of giving children the bread and wine before consecration. The custom of infant communion died out in the West; and the Council of Trent, in its twenty-first session, declared, "Little children are not by any necessity obliged to the sacramental communion of the Eucharist. . . . Not therefore, however, is antiquity to be condemned, if, in some places, it at one time observed that custom; for, as those most holy fathers had a probable cause for what they did in respect of their times, so, assuredly, is it to be believed, without controversy, that they did this without any necessity thereof unto salvation" (see Schaff, Creeds, vol. ii. p. 174). The Roman Church has now abandoned both infant communion and its shadow,—the giving of the unconsecrated elements to children. The Greek Church to-day, and also the Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians, and Maronites, persist in the practice, using generally only the wine, and giving it either by a spoon or by the finger. All Protestant churches unite in rejecting infant communion.

INFANT JESUS, The Congregation of the Daughters of the, was founded in Rome, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, by Anna Moroni, as an institution in which poor girls received free instruction in some useful arts, and shortly after transformed into a regular order of the Church by Pope Clement X. The novitiate lasts three years; and the novice, when entering the order, takes the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. They wear a dark-brown dress with a white hood.

INFANT SALVATION, or the salvation of those who die in infancy. The doctrines of infant damnation and of non-elect infants were unknown to the early Church. The fact that the baptism of infants was so commonly postponed to Easter Week proves that it was even not considered any loss to the child to die unbaptized. But, as sacerdotal and ecclesiastical ideas spread in the Church, baptism was more and more emphasized, until Gregory of Nazianzus and Ambrose (fourth century) could say that unbaptized children could not be saved. The first, however, argued, that since they had suffered, and not caused, the loss of baptism, the righteous Judge would not punish them; and Ambrose, while claiming that there could be no exception made for them on account of their infancy, yet thought they would be free from pain. It was left to Augustine to teach the damnation of infants. But their sufferings, though eternal, are bearable, being of the mildest character (De pecc. merit., i. c. xvi.). He also opposed the idea of an intermediate state in which these infants were. Pelagius, whom Augustine so vigorously opposed, expressed no decided opinion upon this point, but said, "Whither they may not go, I know: whither they may go, I do not know." Their punishment must, he thought, be of the mildest sort, since they had not committed any actual transgression, and had no original sin: indeed, he was ready to confess it seemed to him doubtful whether they were punished at all. The Roman Church, accepting Augustine's conceptions of the necessity of baptism to salvation, and of the mildness of the punishment of those infants who died unbaptized, agreed with him that they were sent to hell, and assigned to them a separate place in it, the limbus infantum, or puerorum. (See Thomas Aquinas's Sum. Theol., pt. iii. q. lxxviii. 2; Suppl., q. lxxi. 7; also Dante: Inferno, canto iv.). There is, however, a difference of opinion in this Church as to the character of their sufferings, whether it is actual (pœna sensus), or only a deprivation of the vision of God (carentia visionis Dei). In the Council of Trent the Dominicans and Franciscans contradicted each other. The former held that these lost infants were in a dark subterranean region without fire; the latter, that they were above the earth and in the light. Others spoke yet more cheerfully of their condition, supposing them to be occupied with the study of nature, and to be occasionally recipients of the visits of angels and saints. The council refused to commit itself to a decision, though affirming the necessity of baptism (Sess. v. 4); and, since then, some theologians have followed Peter Lombard in the supposition that they suffer some sort of misery in punishment of original sin (Bellarmine: De amiss. grat., 6, 6). Others, like Cardinal Sfondrani (Nodus prædest. dissol., 1, 1, 23), have maintained that they enjoy as much happiness as they are capable of. Perrone represents, probably, the prevalent view when he says (5, 275) that they suffer only the lack of the beatific vision: they are in "a condition of pure nature." And, further, Roman-Catholic theologians teach that the desire for baptism, even on the part of unborn children, is accepted for the baptism itself: therefore, there need be no fears for children of Christians who die in infancy.

The first one to enter the lists against the Roman theory of the necessity of baptism to infant salvation was Zwingli. He taught that all elect children who die in infancy are saved, whether they are baptized or not, whether Pagan or Christian; and, further, that all who die in infancy are elect, since their early death is a token of God's peculiar mercy, and therefore of their salvation. Luther, on the other hand, taught the necessity of baptism to salvation; and this doctrine is part of the Lutheran creed, involving baptismal regeneration. Calvin held to election in regard to infants, and speaks thus:—

"As to infants, they seem to perish, not by their own fault, but by the fault of another. But there is a double solution. Though sin does not yet appear in them, yet it is latent; for they bear corruption shut up in the soul, so that before God they are damnable." "That infants who are to be saved (as, certainly, out of that age some are saved) must be previously regenerated by the Lord is clear."—Institut., iv., xvi. 17.

We find this doctrine of infant salvation through election expressed in the Calvinistic symbols. The Canons of the Synod of Dort (1619) declare:—

"Since we are to judge of the will of God from his word (which testifies that the children of believers are holy, not by nature, but in virtue of the covenant of grace, in which they, together with the parents, are comprehended), godly parents have no reason to doubt of the election and salvation of their children whom it pleaseth God to call out of this life in their infancy."—First Head of Doctrine, art. XVII.

And the Westminster Confession:—

"The grace promised [in baptism] is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred, by the Holy Ghost, to such (whether of age or infants) as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time."—XXVIII., vi.

And

"Elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the Spirit, who worketh when and where and how he pleaseth."—X. iii.

But, in the Second Scotch Confession (1580), it says,—

"We abhor and detest the cruel judgment against infants dying without baptism."—See SCHAFF: Creeeds, vol. iii. p. 482.

Since Calvinists distinguish between elect and non-elect infants, it is not strange that some of their theologians have spoken of elect and reprobate infants. Thus Musculus says,—

"Since, therefore, this discrimination of elect and reprobate in new-born infants is hidden from our judgment, it is not fitting that we should inquire into it, lest by ignorance we reject vessels of grace."—Loci Communes, 336.

And the Swiss theologians at the Synod of Dort said,— "That there is an election and reprobation of infants, no less than of adults, we cannot deny in the face of God, who loves and hates unborn children."—Acta Synod. Dort. Judic., 40.

A proof of the existence of this stern view in Calvinistic New England in the seventeenth century is the passage in that curious poem, The Day of Doom, written by Rev. Michael Wigglesworth, which was published in 1662, ran through many editions, and was reprinted as a curiosity, New York, 1867. Among the classes of sinners who make their plea for mercy are the "reprobate infants" who died in infancy,

"And never had or good or bad effected pers'nally;
But from the womb unto the tomb were straightway carried (Or at the least ere they transgress'd)."

But they are answered like the rest. However, in recognition of their innocence, they are allowed "the easiest room in hell." Calvinism, by its doctrine of election, rids itself of the stigma of infant damnation; for surely it is allowable to hope, at least, that the grace of election extends to all who die in infancy.

In the seventeenth century, the Arminians resumed Zwingli's position, and, consistently with their theory that original sin was not punishable apart from actual transgression, taught the general salvation of infants: so do the Methodists and Baptists to-day. On the other hand, the Lutherans, and all others who teach baptismal regeneration, are logically shut up to the view that all who die unbaptized are lost. Also the Rev. John Henry Blunt, in his Dict. Doc. Theol., p. 346, note, speaking, doubtless, for High-churchmen generally, says,—

"It can hardly, I think, be doubted that they do sustain a loss, of whatever kind. In the Institutions of a Christian Man, the Church of England declares, 'Insomuch as infants, and children dying in their infancy, shall undoubtedly be saved thereby (i.e., by baptism), else not.' In the last revision of the Prayer-book we read, 'It is certain, by God's word, that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved: in other words, we are certain of the future happiness of the baptized, but have no assurance of the salvation of the unbaptized, infant. The question must thus be left in obscurity, as we have no sufficient warrant to go beyond the cautious statement of our Church.'"

But the heart is stronger than logic. The tendency is towards milder views; and it may well be questioned if there be a single living Lutheran theologian of high standing who confines the grace of salvation to baptized infants. So, also, the Calvinists speak. Thus Dr. Charles Hodge, whose orthodoxy is unquestioned, teaches emphatically the salvation of all infants who die in infancy, and asserts that this is the "common doctrine of evangelical Protestants" (Systematic Theology, i. 26).

It will thus be seen, from this review of opinions upon this subject, that there has been recent progress. We now believe that God's grace has been extended to all lands, and are ready to say that infants of heathens, no less than of Christians, enter heaven through the blood of Christ. Surely, He who said, "Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven," shuts the kingdom of heaven in no infant's face.

INFANTICIDE, the practice of murdering newborn children, has been known from early times, and amongst cultivated as well as barbarous nations. It has taken the form of a religious custom, as among the worshippers of Moloch, "horrid king," who threw their children as sacrifices into his molten arms, and the Hindus, who cast their children into the Ganges. We first meet with the practice of abnormal or murderous infanticide at Sparta, where it was enjoined by the laws of Lycurgus. Weakly or deformed infants were exposed to die on Mount Taygetos, on the ground that they would never be of service to the State. In Rome the practice prevailed to a large degree during the imperial period, when the marriage-vow was not regarded as binding, and Roman ladies counted their years by the number of their divorces (Seneca). Some of the first men of antiquity commended the practice, as Aristotle (Repub., vii. 16) and Pliny the elder. Seneca and other Roman satirists bear witness to the wide extent of its prevalence. The custom has also prevailed among the peoples of Hindustan, the Chinese, the Society and other groups of islands in the Pacific, some of the Indian tribes (Alaska), and in other parts of the world. The Mahometans also practise the custom of murdering girls at their birth. The motives which have impelled parents to murder their children have been considerations of civil obligation (Sparta), shame, disinclination to rear children, and poverty.

Christianity early set itself against the practice; and Christian emperors, beginning with Constantine, provided statutes looking to the care of children exposed by their parents to death. In the fifth century the custom was in vogue of laying such children at the church-doors (Conc. Arles II. can. 51, 451). By the eighth century, asylums were established in Trèves, Milan, and other cities, for the care and training of deserted children; and the Church granted to them hypothetical baptism (Si non es baptizatus, etc., "If thou art not baptized," etc.). At a much later period in the seventeenth century, St. Vincent de Paul directed his energies to the relief of this class of persons, with great zeal. The last century and the early part of this have witnessed the establishment of many foundling asylums in the different countries of Europe. In England severe laws have been passed, punishing with penal servitude and other penalties the murder of children after and before their birth. In France a great increase in the number of foundlings is supposed to have followed upon the use of the tour, or revolving box, which was so arranged that the depositor might leave the infant in the box without himself becoming exposed. By a simple turn of the box from within, the child was drawn inside the building. In 1833 this arrangement was abolished, and the number of foundlings decreased from thirty-five thousand in 1832 to twenty-six thousand in 1838. A hospital in Dublin, also, used a box of this description till 1826, when it was ordered removed by Parliament. All the nations of Southern Europe, except Greece, and including Austria, have permitted the use of the box. According to Von Oettingen (Moralstatistik) the number of foundling asylums in France is a hundred and one, Spain forty-nine, Austria thirty-six, etc. In the United States such asylums are comparatively rare. The principal Roman-Catholic institution of the kind is the New-York Foundling Asylum, at the corner of Lexington Avenue and Sixty-eighth Street, New-York City. There are two Protestant (undenominational) institutions in New-York City, — the New York Infant Asylum, and the Infants' Home and Day Nursery (established 1854). Both of these institutions give shelter to the mothers during their confinement, and urge them to remain for a period with their children. The results have been satisfactory, both in saving the mothers from a continued life of shame, and in preserving the lives of the children (about eighty per cent).

INFIDELITY. In this article, infidelity is used to denote the denial of the claims of Christianity as a divine revelation. In this sense it is not quite the same with unbelief; for unbelief equally takes in other negative positions, such as atheism: and it is not quite the same with scepticism, as this involves the deeper philosophical principle that nothing is or can be known. Still, unbelief may be used to include infidelity, all the more that negative views as to God's existence, or personality, or character, also tend to cut off faith in a revelation of his will; and in like manner scepticism, having the same result, may with proper distinction be used as a synonyme. It is to be added that the word "infidelity" carries with it a shade of censure. It is not ignorance, or simple non-acceptance of Christianity, that is asserted, but rejection; which the Christian Church holds to be sinful. As faith is a duty, and as those nominal Christians who come short of it, in not personally accepting Christ as a Saviour, are condemned, so those who carry their repulsion farther, even to denial of his mission and of the authority of his word, must be still more blameworthy.

The causes of infidelity, though manifold and subtle, may be briefly indicated. They are of two kinds, — subjective and objective. The former lies in the prejudices against Christianity that are found within; the latter, in the scandals and hindrances that come from without. Of prejudices, the chief are moral, being found in the lusts and passions which the gospel condemns, or, where these do not rule, in the pride and self-righteousness which cannot be renounced, or in the want of that loving and tender spirit without which Christianity is only a name; so that even the better class of unbelievers find uncongenial to them the lofty devotion to the glory of God, and the humbling sense of sin, in which the very soul of Christianity consists. With these moral prejudices intellectual ones may concur, such as a sceptical temper, or a philosophy that excludes the supernatural, or a bias against some cardinal doctrine of Christianity, — such as the trinity, or the atonement, or the influence of the Holy Spirit. Under the head of scandals fall all the misrepresentations of Christianity which exist in doctrine and life, — the corruptions and divisions of churches, the sins of Christian nations, the slow progress and limited success of the gospel through the fault of its supporters, and even the mistakes of Christians in dealing with infidelity itself. With these causes at work amidst a race, which, as Christians believe, is ungodly and fallen, it is not wonderful, that, as there has been always so much practical unbelief in the world, a portion of this should take the form of open denial of the divine character and claims of Christianity.

In sketching the history of infidelity, it will be necessary to divide it into two great periods, the ancient and the modern, which are found to differ not only in time, but in character. The ancient infidelity meets the Christian religion at its birth, and continues till the fall of Paganism, opposing the gospel from the ground of false religion, or professed revelation of some kind or other; whereas the modern infidelity has more and more detached itself, since the Reformation, from all belief in the supernatural, or at least in any revelation of which the claims can be upheld against Christianity. This classification, indeed, is not strictly correct; for there were earlier opponents of Christianity, like Lucian, who anticipated the more negative and anti-supernaturalist style of more recent centuries, as, indeed, this necessarily followed from the sceptical and Epicurean philosophy. But the most influential antagonists of Christianity all wrote in the interests of the popular religion, however spiritualized, and did not reject Christianity because it was a revelation, but because it set aside other and better-warranted revelations, like those of Paganism. It is only on the mission-field that Christianity now finds similar resistance; but this is hardly called infidelity. The only form of opposition which is the same all through is that of the Jews; Justin Martyr encountering Trypho in the second century; and Limborch, Orbio, in the seventeenth in the same way, each upholding one revelation against another as professed. But, as the Jewish controversy hardly belongs to infidelity, this exception may be also disregarded.

Without entering into the whole field of ancient apologetics, it is sufficient to notice the principal writers on the unbelieving side. We need not dwell on Lucian, who satirizes the credulity of the Christians, which laid them open to impostors like the adventurer Peregrinus; nor the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, who, in his Meditations (XI. 3), condemns their martyr-spirit as "mere obstinacy." But there are four writers between the second and fourth century who bring out the whole spirit of early infidelity, and in the replies to them by leading Christians (though in some cases most of the attack or defence has perished) the controversy is exhausted. These are Celsus, Porphyry, Hierocles, and Julian. Of these by far the most important is the first, Celsus. He is probably to be placed in the last thirty years of the second century; and his work was entitled The True Word (ἀληθὴς λόγος). We know it almost entirely from the reply of Origen, the masterpiece of ancient apologetics, which, however, was not written till seventy or eighty years later. The value of the work of Celsus is very great, not so much from the ability and learning of its author, though these are considerable, as from the fulness with which it reflects early hostility to Christ, and from the confirmation which it gives to the early reception of the Christian books, and to the truth of the Christian history. It is not easy to reduce Celsus to any category; and, though he is repeatedly charged by Origen with being an Epicurean, there are large Platonic elements in his philosophy. He assumes even the tone of a Jew, and under that character reproaches, in the beginning of his work, first Christ, and then those Jews who had gone over to Christianity. He is, however, most at home as a Pagan, accepting in the gross the polytheism of his age, without seeking much to spiritualize it, and inculcating adherence to tradition, faith in demons, and worship of images. He has, to begin with, a very low idea of human destiny, as little distinguishable from that of the beasts, which makes him resent the pretensions of Christians, and ridicule their hopes of the resurrection as the "hopes of worms." His philosophical pride makes him recoil from their blind faith; and his self-righteousness leads him to repel a sect that opened the door to "sinners." His greatest stumbling-block is the incarnation of Christ, to which he perpetually returns, with the humiliation of the Saviour's life and death; and it is curious to see, that, while attacking the Jews, he has all the contempt of the Jew for the absence of signs, and of the Greek for the neglect of wisdom. There is also the offence in Christianity, beyond Judaism, of a larger spirit, averse to national ties, of a more enthusiastic hope, and of a proselytism strong enough, with all its alleged childish weakness, to shake the empire, and to turn contempt into anger and fear. The more special doctrines of Christianity, such as the atonement and the new birth, Celsus hardly sees, and therefore he hardly assails them. It is still to him the exitiabilis superstitio of Tacitus, brought a good deal nearer, and in proportion more hateful. Still it is wonderful, within his own range, that Celsus sees so much, and has anticipated so much, of the coarser style of attack on Christianity. The contradictions of Scripture, and its plagiarisms from Plato and the philosophers; the divisions and strifes of Christians; the want of patriotism and public spirit, with a general ridiculous narrowness and fanaticism,—these are his characteristic contribution to the reproaches of ages. Nor has he made one single concession, or written one redeeming sentence; so that his great services to Christian apologetics, in his admissions as to the dates of sacred books, and other facts, are wholly involuntary. It has been the function of Christianity to train even its opponents to seize something of its own point of view. But to this Celsus is the ideal opposite; and the contrast is most complete in his great antagonist Origen, who, in meeting Celsus, has met the best who have followed him, and has made this first still the most fruitful and suggestive of all apologetic controversies.

Porphyry, though a much abler man than Celsus, and a more voluminous writer against Christianity, exists in much scantier fragments; so that little is added from him to the stock of argument. He was a native of Tyre, born about 233 A.D., and was the companion, biographer, and expositor of Plotinus, the founder of the Neo-Platonic philosophy. In him and in his party this system of mystic idealism, opposed to Christianity by its radical exclusion of the incarnation, was further bent into hostility by its effort to spiritualize the current Paganism, and maintain its influence. This, doubtless, lent a color to the elaborate work of Porphyry against the Christians (κατὰ χριστιανῶν), in fifteen books, which was written about the year 270. But as the lengthened replies to this work, including that of Eusebius the church historian, have perished, we cannot trace its sequence, or even its characteristic features. He seems more than Celsus to have gone into detailed criticism of the Old and New Testament Scriptures; and hence the attacks on the prophecies of Daniel, as written after the event, which are replied to by Jerome and other writers; and also on Paul, whom Celsus does not notice. As an example of his more philosophical manner, there is the question, why the gospel was not sent earlier to nations like the Britons, that so greatly needed it. But altogether the materials for an account of Porphyry's polemic against the Christians are disappointingly meagre; and the difficulties are increased by his work on The Philosophy of Oracles, in which, though after Eusebius generally accepted, there is much not easy to reconcile with the more spiritualizing strain of his philosophy; e.g., in the oracle on Christ, as eminent in piety, and admitted to heaven, which is not such as would have been expected from an author who passed as one of the most strenuous opponents of Christianity.

Hierocles was Governor of Bithynia during the last persecution, which began under Diocletian, in 303. In a work addressed to Christians, with other attacks he drew a parallel, to the disadvantage of Christ, between his life and miracles and those of Apollonius of Tyana. This Pagan hero, half philosopher, half magician, had lived from the days of Nero to those of Domitian, and wandered over much of the world. His life had been written a century after his death by Philostratus, a rhetorician of Lemnos; and now Hierocles turned this biography into a weapon of invidious contrast. Eusebius, in a very able reply, shows how loose the historical foundation was, how ludicrous or ill-attested the miracles were (professedly wrought in Ephesus, Rome, and elsewhere), and how void the whole career was of moral greatness and significance. The attempt of Hierocles is only interesting as a type of similar efforts, even to our own day, to meet the claims of Christ by a general naturalist theory of hero-worship or of founders in religion; but the modern theories, though far more refined and extended, are even more helpless, as they wholly deny the supernatural, and so reduce the possible dimensions of the hero, that Christ, if at all drawn after the Gospels, still leaves every parallel behind.

The last name, Julian, is more important as a figure in history than as a writer against Christianity. His public career does not need to be noticed here. The admirable sketch of Gibbon, supplemented on its religious side by that of Neander, meets all necessities. It is only requisite to notice his work against the Christians, written in the winter of 362, in Antioch. Of this we have numerous fragments preserved in the interesting reply of Cyril of Alexandria, in ten books, who, though inferior to Origen, meets Julian with a Greek learning and dialectical skill worthy of his cause and his opponent. Of this work of Julian a large part was occupied with charges against the Old Testament, which he endeavored to show that Christians had no authority for relaxing in any of its ordinances, while at the same time he took the side of the Jews against them; and similar attacks were made on the New Testament, as, for example, that John alone had asserted the Saviour's deity. None of the concessions which Julian had practically made to Christianity in borrowing from it are hinted at in this treatise; but the whole strain is satirical and derisive, as towards a religion which boasted such great things, and yet shut itself up in a corner of the world.

From the fall of Paganism to the Reformation the conflict with infidelity ceases, or is only prolonged by other weapons than those of controversy. Mohammedanism comes on the scene, retorting on its opponents the reproach of being infidels; but this leads to no collision of argument, but of sterner combat. At length the Reformation in the Western Church appears, and this, from a Roman-Catholic point of view, might be regarded as unbelief; but Protestantism disowns the name, and though cut off from the Christian pale, yet, by its witness for the Bible and for the authority of Christ, hinders even Rome from branding its career as the same with that of infidelity. It is not till a century after the Reformation, that in lands professedly Christian, whether Catholic or Protestant, a phenomenon truly entitled to the name of infidelity arises, and that with such new features as to stand distinct from the Pagan unbelief of the early centuries. Of this, as already stated, the marked feature, though it comes slowly and hesitatingly to light, is the denial of all revelation, and the confinement of whatever religion is still retained, be it much or little, to reason as its origin and sovereign rule. This, accordingly, — the modern infidelity from the seventeenth century to our own days, — has now to be sketched.

In its earlier shapes this unbelief is less national; afterwards it concentrates itself in different lands, and passes through successive national phases. To the earliest period belong Herbert and Hobbes, who, though English, have by education and character a cosmopolitan element; Spinoza, who as a Jew belongs to all literature; and Bayle, whose wandering life, and studies in universal criticism, abate his otherwise French individuality. It is only in the nineteenth century that unbelief, after the national phases of the eighteenth, — deism, encyclopedism, rationalism, — has returned to its earlier type.

Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1581-1648), whose life as that of a soldier-philosopher is a kind of reduced image of Descartes, holds, like him, to spiritualism, and, though unhappily never recovered to the faith of his brother George the poet, still retains many Christian elements, and in his five principles — God, worship, repentance, rewards and punishments — advances nothing hostile to Christianity, though he ignores it. His De Veritate (1624) was followed after his death by his De Religione Gentilium (1663), which fails to establish these principles as the sum of Paganism, though it begins, amid much awkwardness, modern inquiries into comparative religion in a spirit out of sympathy with Christianity.

Hobbes (1588-1679) is even less an avowed unbeliever than Herbert; and his scheme might in strictness be called heresy rather than infidelity. He seeks in his other works, and especially in the Leviathan, to build up a system that may support his political philosophy as one of despotism, from the Bible. But the foundations of materialism, selfishness, and agnosticism, on which the whole rests, are such that the walls of the structure are pressed out of their place, even had the style of Bible interpretation not been so arbitrary and paradoxical as to forfeit identity in the structure with all ordinary Christianity. A Christ whose other offices are subordinated to his kingly, and whose kingly office is practically absorbed in that of the civil magistrate, is about all of Christianity that Hobbes, with his elaborate deductions and expositions, retains.

Spinoza (1632-77) departs entirely from Herbert in renouncing theism, and resting on a pantheistic basis (Ethica, 1677); but, so long as he professed theism (Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, 1670), he recalls Hobbes at least in his founding of right on power, and in his free and rationalizing strain of Scripture criticism. Many of Spinoza's hypotheses in excluding the miraculous are as arbitrary as those of Hobbes; and it was certainly uncandid for him to argue against miracles as a theist, while keeping his pantheism in reserve; but his schemes and theories have been still more influential, and are to this day widely current. His pantheism does not require to be here noticed, as lying beyond our definition of infidelity. It is important, however, to consider how much there is of lingering sympathy with the Christian view of the exalted character of Christ, all the more remarkable as coming from a Jew, though the radical pantheism and anti-supernaturalism of his system bar the just influence of this tendency.

The sceptical side of this early period is represented by Bayle (1647-1706), whose Huguenot extraction, and temporary conversion to Romanism, so far determine the type of his hostility to Christian faith. A professor in Protestant seminaries like Sedan and Rotterdam, void of all sympathy with the Reformed creed, save on the side of culture and liberty, his life becomes one long critical process without earnestness or fruit, save only as the debates of all systems with each other are recorded. This is the work of his Dictionary, published in 1697, and for the next century a storehouse of negative criticism and a forerunner of the French Encyclopédie; only that Bayle is more fair in dealing out doubts and difficulties all round, so that orthodoxy merely shares in the general weakness of the human mind.

It is apparent that this earliest period of modern doubt contained all the internal conflicts and discords that were afterwards to be developed, and which have made it strong for attack on Christianity, but feeble in supplying its place. All comes more to light in the next century, when infidelity gains more full expression and power. This brings with it the three national and mutually related movements in England, France, and Germany.

English deism springs up on the soil of religious decay and latitude and of political freedom, not without help from the Socinian tendency which had clung as a shade to the Reformation, and with its waning light gained in influence. The deistic movement stands out as the first combined protest of educated thought in Europe against Christianity; and therefore its history is all the more instructive, and its failure confirmatory of faith. It fills up the space from the Revolution to the rise of Methodism and the reawakening of religious life in England. Its earlier struggles are more desultory and miscellaneous; its later, more concentrated and definite.

To the former belongs Charles Blount, whose Oracles of Reason, published in 1695, after his death, discloses the fact that the name "Deists" had been taken by the party which traced itself to Herbert, and who, in an earlier work (1680) on Apollonius of Tyana, had, apparently without knowing it, renewed the effort of Hierocles to account on natural principles for the career of Jesus Christ. Another miscellaneous writer, of Irish birth, is Toland (1670-1722), who, in his Christianity not Mysterious, touches without real depth the nature of mysteries, then maintains in his Amyntor the looseness of the canon, drawing forth the masterly work of Lardner, and after other fugitive pieces, still professing something of Christianity, ends in 1720 by publishing anonymously a confession of pantheism in his Pantheisticon, though balanced by another work of a contrary tenor in the same year. We may perhaps include here also Lord Shaftesbury, whose Characteristics (1711) contain strictures on the moral aspects of Christianity hardly consistent with his profession of belief, and certainly Anthony Collins (1678-1729), whose first appearance in connection with this controversy, in his Discourse on Freethinking (1713), is little more than a clever burlesque, designed, without any scientific method, to put Christians on the same ground of ultimate dependence on reason with the rising sect of free-thinkers, though this manifesto more than met its match in the learning, argument, and wit of Bentley.

The most important period in the deistic movement, that which deals more with definite topics, falls under the Hanoverian dynasty; and this is led in by Collins, whose work on prophecy, The Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion (1724), is more solid and serious than his first, though marked also by a one-sidedness and controversial art above which he never rose. The aim of this treatise was to show that prophecy had only been meant, and only fulfilled, allegorically, that is, not at all; and the conflict between him and Bishop Chandler and his many other opponents turned on the criticism of texts, and the evidence of their accomplishment. He replied to the bishop in his Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered (1727), but somewhat changed his ground without acknowledging it. He has anticipated modern criticism as to Daniel, but is out of harmony with it in denying all early Messianic hopes and traditions.

The discussion on prophecy gave birth to that on miracles, which was conducted by Thomas Woolston, an ex-fellow of Sidney College, Cambridge (1667-1733). As Collins had reduced prophecy, so Woolston reduced miracle, to allegory, and denied the literal facts. His Discourses on the Miracles of our Saviour (1727-30), though reaching a sale of thirty thousand copies, are now generally discredited for their violent and uncritical spirit, which may be judged of by his asserting a compact between the disciples and Jewish rulers, which the former violated by stealing the Saviour's body. It would have been well had Woolston been replied to only in works like Bishop Sherlock's Trial of the Witnesses; but, unhappily, he was fined and imprisoned, and died in some degree of restraint.

The central passage of this controversy was the debate on the possibility and credibility of revelation. This arose with Matthew Tindal (1656-1733), an ex-fellow of All Souls', Oxford, who had in his youth gone over to Popery, and then recoiled to a different extreme. His work, Christianity as Old as the Creation (1730), was mainly designed to set aside revelation by building on the law of nature, or equal relation of God to his creatures at all times. This was answered best of all by Conybeare (1732), that the law of nature left room for the progressive light of nature, and that, especially where sin had entered, this might take the form of revelation, and attest itself to the inward eye, without being absolutely the same with natural data. To this writer also, more than to any other, Butler, in his Analogy (1736), replied, without naming him, by showing that objections to the limited area or defective evidence of revelation struck equally at natural religion. With the defeat of Tindal, the deistic conflict slackened, and no equal work appeared.

Salisbury, with considerable force of untrained faculties, mingled repeatedly in the controversy, though at first more as a Socinian, till in his last work he assails the morality of the New Testament, and seems to give up all Christ's historic claims. With his assault on morality in its Christian shape might seem to agree the work published in 1737, The Moral Philosopher, known to be by Thomas Morgan, a dispossessed dissenting minister, who died in 1743. But Morgan only assails the Old Testament, allows the sinlessness of Christ, and acknowledges the greatness of Paul; though, like the Tübingen school, he separates between him and the Jewish apostles, and even regards the Apocalypse as a protest against him. Morgan's antipathy to the Old Testament has been supposed to have called forth Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses; but this was meditated and partly written before.

The English deism, as Lechler has well shown, had a tendency to scepticism, though he is probably wrong in supposing that our next writer created any epoch. This was Henry Dodwell, the son of the celebrated non-juror of that name, whose Christianity not Founded on Argument (1742) is a pretended defence of the gospel as resting on inward light; which, however, is pushed so far as to be caricatured. The necessary limitation, and the vindication of the self-evidencing power of Christianity, was ably given by Philip Doddridge.

A still more sceptical writer, though a professed theist, was Lord Bolingbroke (1678-1751). This eminent statesman had no radical principles in theology; and, without any theory of scepticism, his views as to the divine attributes are radically contradictory, and change whenever Christianity is to be assailed. His posthumous book, in 5 vols. (Philosophical Works, 1754), which is largely an attempt to trace Christianity to Platonism, of which he has a dark idea, is a total failure from want of learning (the Platonic authorities being quoted in Latin) and of fairness; and his attacks on the Old Testament are equally violent. There is here the origin of much in Voltaire; but no intelligent opponent could now write in this strain.

The greatest name on the sceptical side, beyond all question, is that of Hume (1711-76). But Hume's scepticism, if more, as he said himself, than a play of the intellect, would not be fair; and Theism and Christianity might still be as practical as the necessary biases of human motive and character. Hume has not thus held the balance even; and his famous argument on miracles (1748) would, as Mill has conceded, be recalled by restoring the idea of God, not to mention, that, in seeming to argue against the credibility of testimony, he has argued equally against the credibility of sense, and so far begged the question, that miracles are only matters of testimony, and never of experience. Other exceptions are taken, in the best reply to Hume,—that by Campbell, On Miracles (1762); and Hume has not been generally followed, except by those who deny miracles, not merely as incognizable, but as impossible.

With Hume, though lying outside of the deistic controversy, we may rank his great, even greater, fellow-historian, Gibbon (1737-94). Gibbon, like Bayle, loses all the earnestness of belief with his return from Romanism; and his Decline and Fall shows how deeply insensible he was to the divine power of Christianity. Yet the work is an involuntary tribute to its greatness; and the attempt, far beyond any thing in deism, to account for it by secondary causes, is an anticipation of more recent efforts, while recognizing its world-historical importance, to bring it within the laws of natural development. Gibbon, however, here lies beyond even the position of French encyclopedism, of which he was a sympathetic witness, and of this we must now speak.

The national unbelief of France in the last century has been called, from its Encyclopédie (1751-65), "Encyclopedism;" but to Voltaire (1694-1778), more than to any other writer in that work, it is due. The way had been prepared by the immense abuses and corruptions in Church and State, by the quarrels between Jesuitism and Jansenism in the bosom of Rome, and by the absence of Bible knowledge and of living piety. Voltaire, borrowing his materials from England, where he had resided from 1726 to 1728, and favored by high influence with great personages, like Frederick the Great (at whose court he resided from 1750 to 1753), gave, by his dexterity and wit, to unbelief a European prominence, to which also his struggles for toleration, as in the case of Calas (1762), contributed. But there is in Voltaire no accurate learning, or sustained argument, or even consistent scheme of natural religion; and his criticisms on the Bible, as on Shakspeare and Milton, have been set aside as superficial and inadequate. Yet his works, issued from his retreat at Ferney, and those of his associates (like D'Alembert, one of the editors of the Encyclopédie), while those of others (like the still more important editor, Diderot) went on to atheism, produced a universal agitation, and undoubtedly contributed much to the French Revolution, with its temporary overthrow of Christianity.

In this work of antichristian propagandism it has been common to unite with the name of Voltaire that of Rousseau (1712-78); but this has been shown by more careful inquiries to be a mistake. The Swiss writer, no doubt, in his Contrat Social (1762), had struck a democratic note deeper than any thing in Voltaire; and in his Émile (1762) he had, in the "Profession of Faith" put into the mouth of a Swiss vicar, seemed to share the prevailing doubts as to the evidences of revelation. But, though these and other facts linked Rousseau with revolution, there was a discord with Voltaire more than personal. He eloquently protested against the atheism by which Voltaire suffered himself to be surrounded, strove to explain his own liberties in harmony with belief in Christianity, and in his tributes to the Bible and to the character of Christ, however unhappy the tenor of his life, separated himself from every writer of that school. As it was, the encyclopedic movement was only powerful for destruction; and infidelity, in submitting to the return even of Romanism to fresh ascendancy, had openly to confess its own weakness.

The movement in Germany called rationalism was largely derived from English and French sources, but probably as much from the decay of Christian faith and life among the German people. The revival, under Spener and Francke, in the beginning of the century, had failed to arrest the downward course of all the old churches of the Reformation; and a cold and scholastic orthodoxy gave way to doubt and negation, as carrying with them apparently more of freshness and interest. A threefold tendency has been here remarked: First, The popular philosophy movement, which, no longer met by the speculative element (as in Leibnitz, and less strictly in Wolff), reduced philosophy to empiricism, and religion to naturalism. Of this school an exaggerated example was C. F. Bahrtdt (1741-92). Secondly, The critical school, which, developing the concessions of Baumgarten, Ernesti, and J. D. Michaelis, passed—in the hands of Semler in Halle, Eichhorn in Göttingen, and Paulus in Heidelberg, with many others—to a denial of all distinctive inspiration in the sacred books, and of all special Christian doctrine in their contents, while still exalting Christ as a great Example and Teacher. In one who belonged partly to the popular and partly to the critical school—Reimarus (1694-1768), teacher in the Gymnasium of Hamburg—this minimum of doctrine was not retained; and in his work, published after his death by Lessing as Fragments from the Library of Wolfenbüttel (1774-78), the Saviour, though not without excellent morality, is treated as a political enthusiast who failed in setting up by his triumphant entry a temporal kingdom, and his disciples as schemers who adapted their theology to the altered circumstances, and stole the body of Jesus to countenance the fraud of a resurrection. Lessing, in publishing these fragments, disclaimed all sympathy with them, as, indeed, his Education of the Human Race (1777-80) is based upon a different principle; but in his replies to Pastor Goetze of Hamburg, and others, who resented his act, he showed himself so much an apologist of Reimarus, and an assailant of the letter of the gospel history, while professing to uphold its spirit, that his relation to Christianity is rendered uncertain. The third school is that of ethical rationalism, represented by Kant and his followers, which finds expression in that philosopher's Religion within the Limits of Mere Reason (1792). Here the weakness of Kant's philosophy, in making the infinite and absolute mere regulative ideas that could not come within the grasp of the finite, is seen; for the incarnation, the keystone of Christianity, is misunderstood, and the historical Christ becomes the mere ultimatum of ethical teaching, whose so-called offices are to be idealized into subjective processes in the heart of the individual, while also connected with a society in which moral results can alone be achieved, but who stands upon the footing of reason and moral law, rather than of redemption and grace in the ordinary Christian sense of these terms. Hence, while Kant is the highest summit of rationalism, and even so far the prophet of a return to faith, including in a sinless Christ miracle and the basis of incarnation, it remained for another century, under Schleiermacher and his followers, not without their own inconsistencies, to escape from mere nature, and to restore an historical Christianity to its true place.

Such was unbelief at the end of the last century; and, as the present advanced, the demonstrated failure of scepticism to organize revolution, with the re-action in favor of belief, compelled it to assume a more respectful attitude towards Christianity, and at the same time to attempt more earnestly, on naturalist principles, to solve its origin and history. To this latter task the movement in philosophy and science also urged; and hence unbelief has grappled with this problem under one or other of the reigning tendencies that have divided the century: first, speculative pantheism, and, secondly, materialistic or evolutionist agnosticism. These types appear successively in the most prominent unbeliever of the nineteenth century, David Friedrich Strauss: in others they are more or less traceable. Strauss passes through three periods, publishing the first edition of his Leben Jesu in 1835, in which he gathers up the hints of earlier critics, like Eichhorn and Gabler, as to a mythical element in the life of Jesus, and explains the facts as stated in the Gospels as unhistorical reflections of the disciples' love and admiration, fashioning their Christ after Messianic traditions and their own fancies, the only truth being the embodiment in him of the Hegelian idea that God and man are one; then, in his recast of this work in 1864, dropping altogether the Hegelian frame, and in the old deistic way treating Jesus as a great personality who realizes the fatherhood of God, while from the school of Baur tendency is called in to help out the myth; then, lastly, in his Old and New Faith of 1873, not long before his death, going over to the theory of evolutionism in its atheistic shape, and striking out many of his concessions to the character of Jesus; for which, indeed, the way was prepared by his admiring biographies of Reimarus (in 1862) and of Voltaire (in 1872). Such a career refutes itself, notwithstanding the great acuteness of the criticism of this author; for the only thing common to its successive philosophic schemes is the unbounded confidence with which each is upheld.

Similar is the failure of Ernest Renan, whose Vie de Jésus (1863) reveals less of a philosophic and theologic basis; the chief thing of this kind being an immoral deism, which builds the universe upon the mixture of good and evil, and makes the spurious miracles of Jesus necessary to his success. Here there are less of the critical dissections of Strauss, and more of pictorial efforts to give the career of Jesus a lifelike reality, which, however, break down through the moral incongruities blended in the character, and the deviation of the history from its professed sources. Renan, in conformity with the tendency of recent criticism, even that of the Tübingen school, has in his work on the origin of Christianity, of which the life of Jesus is the first part, carried up the date of the gospels, much higher than Strauss, believing as he does that time was not needed for the transformation of history; and, though this must be denied, the admission as to these dates and facts of authorship is valuable on the side of Christian faith.

These works probably exhaust the struggles of Continental unbelief to deal with the Christian problem; the schemes of Schenkel in his Charakterbild (1869), and of Keim in his Jesus von Nazara (1873), belonging to the history of Unitarianism rather than of infidelity. Nor in England has much been added; the work of Mr. W. R. Greg (Creed of Christendom, 1850, new ed., 1877) relying largely on dates of Strauss and others, which have now been abandoned, and presenting no coherent image of Christ's life and death; Supernatural Religion (1877, 7th ed.) being mainly a reproduction of Tübingen criticism as to the late reception of the Gospels, with arguments against the supernatural, rather than any positive system of the life of Jesus; and Mill's posthumous Three Essays on Religion, while leaving room for the supernatural as a possibility and a hope, not going fully into the question of the origin of Christ's character and greatness, though granting him a transcendent place in history, and allowing that "religion cannot be said to have made a bad choice in pitching on this man as the ideal representative and guide of humanity." Even the evolutionist philosophy has not in England openly flung itself, in any of its representatives, into the same abyss with Strauss. The agnosticism of Herbert Spencer has not led him to any attempted solution of Christ's development in history; and the work of Huxley on Hume (1879), while reproducing his argument on miracles, does not go beyond his (Hume's) own silence on the difficulty thus arising as to the career and influence of the Founder of Christianity.

It is remarkable that American literature has not produced any material addition to European unbelief, but either imported or slightly recast it. The Age of Reason of Thomas Paine, written in Paris in 1793, under the ægis of American citizenship, and addressed to the protection of the United States, was but the repetition of English deism in its lowest form, which he had brought from his own country, and exalted by the boastful strain of France, which now contrasts with the oblivion into which the work has fallen. The extremes of Theodore Parker and other writers from the left side of Unitarianism are but the exaggerations of German criticism and negative theory. America has been more productive on the side of excesses of faith than of denials of it; and the progress of Christianity, from the formation of the republic onward, in an age, when, as everywhere, unbelief was so wide-spread, to the present day, when, however still existing and active, it is comparatively so outmatched and restrained, is a hopeful augury, that, on the Western Continent, the time will come, when, through the preventive and healing influence of the gospel, the struggles of the Old World against infidelity may be less and less reproduced. JOHN CAIRNS.

INFRALAPSARIANISM (from infra, "after," and lapsus, "a fall") is the doctrine, that God for his own glory determined (1) to create the world, (2) to permit the fall of man, (3) to elect from the mass of fallen men an innumerable multitude as "vessels of mercy," (4) to send his Son for their redemption, (5) to leave the residue of mankind to suffer the just punishment of their sins. This is the common doctrine of Augustinians, and is taught in the Calvinistic symbolical books. It is to be distinguished from supralapsarianism, the theory of a party among the Calvinists, and sublapsarianism; which articles see.

INFULA means, in classical Latin, the band of red and white stripes which the priest and the victim wore around the brow at a Pagan sacrifice: hence it was quite early introduced into Christian usage, and applied to the priest's head-dress, afterwards to that of the bishop.

INGHAM, Benjamin ("the Yorkshire Evangelist"), b. at Osset, in Yorkshire, Eng., June 11, 1712; d. at Aberford in 1772. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he was one of the "Holy Club." On June 1, 1735, he was ordained by Bishop Potter, and soon after went on a sort of ecclesiastical itinerancy of great usefulness among the villages about London, and then settled down as curate in Matching, Essex; but scarcely three months elapsed (Oct. 14) before he was induced to accompany John Wesley and others on his expedition to Georgia. He landed there Feb. 5, 1736; re-embarked for England, Feb. 26, 1737, in order to obtain help for the colonists, having accomplished almost nothing, except the composition, in Dr. Byrom's shorthand, of a list of half the words in an Indian language. On his outward voyage he had been brought in contact with Moravian bishops, and thus his life was affected. He and Wesley joined their London Society in Fetter Lane; and in 1738 he accompanied Wesley on his journey of inspection to Herrnhut, and was freely admitted to communion. On his return he preached in Yorkshire with singular effect; and, when prohibited (June 6, 1739) from the pulpits of the Established Church, he imitated John Wesley, and preached in the fields, barns, anywhere he could, and so successfully, that in 1740 he could say that fifty societies had been formed, and that he had two thousand hearers. In 1740 Wesley was expelled from the Fetter Lane Moravian Society; but Ingham remained in it, and thus virtually seceded from the Church of England, and became the head of the Yorkshire Moravians. On Nov. 12, 1741, he married in London, Lady Margaret Hastings, sister of the Earl of Huntingdon. On July 30, 1742, he formally transferred his Yorkshire and Lancashire societies to the Moravians, and immediately began forming others; for his special work was that of an evangelist at large. In 1744 he gave up open-air preaching. In 1753, owing to the state of the Moravians in England, he withdrew from them, and established a sect of his own. Members were received by laying on of hands. They had elders, and the love-feast and the Lord's Supper monthly. The chief governing power was in the hands of the general overseer, who was chosen and appointed by the trustees, with the consent of the societies. In 1755 Ingham was admitted to Wesley's conference at Leeds, although there is no clear evidence that he wished to unite his societies with Wesley's. After Ingham had been made general overseer, or, as Lady Huntingdon used to call him, "bishop," of his own sect, he ordained two of his fellow-laborers. In 1759 Ingham became in theology a Sandemanian (see art.) by reading Sandeman's Letters on Theron and Aspasio (Edinburgh, 1757), — a reply to the work of that name by James Hervey (London, 1755, 3 vols.), — and also Glas's The Testimony of the King of Martyrs concerning His Kingdom (Perth, 1727). He sent two of his assistants to Scotland to see the leaders, and the result of their mission was their conversion to the Sandemanian tenets. A split in the Ingham sect followed. Out of the eighty societies so energetically gathered and ruled, only thirteen remained faithful to him. Many of them became Wesleyans, or dissenters: others joined the Daleites, or Scotch Independents, — a small sect established in Glasgow by David Dale, a wealthy cotton manufacturer, whose views, in general, were Sandemanian, only they were not so strict upon the question of intercourse with other denominations, and laid more stress upon practical holiness. The Inghamites never recovered the ground they lost. Sorrow over the defection probably hastened Ingham's death. The only publication of his known to Tyerman is A Discourse on the Faith and Hope of the Gospel, Leeds, 1763, which contains his doctrinal views. His sect still survives, but in 1873 numbered only six societies. See TYERMAN: The Oxford Methodists, New York, 1873, pp. 57-154.

INGLIS, David, D.D., LL.D., b. at Greenlaw, Berwickshire, Scotland, June 8, 1824; d. in Brooklyn, N.Y., Dec. 15, 1877. He was graduated from the university of Edinburgh 1841; entered the Presbyterian ministry; emigrated to America 1846, and was pastor of several churches in the United States; called to Montreal 1852, and thence to Hamilton, Ont., 1855. From 1871 to 1872 he was professor of systematic theology in Knox College, Toronto. In the latter year he became pastor of the Reformed (Dutch) Church on the Heights, Brooklyn, L.I. Dr. Inglis was of commanding presence, and a remarkably fine preacher, riveting the attention, notwithstanding the monotony of his delivery, and his incessant pacing back and forth in the pulpit.

INGULPHUS, or INGULF, abbot of Crowland, or Croyland; b. in London, 1030 (?); d. at Crowland, Lincolnshire, Eng., Dec. 16, 1109. In 1051 he became secretary to William of Normandy; in 1064 he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and on his return entered the monastery of Fontenelle in Normandy; but in 1076 was made abbot of Crowland by his former patron, who had meanwhile become king of England, and through whom he secured many privileges for the abbey, besides the enlargement and adornment of the building itself. His name has long been famous for his supposed authorship of the Historia monasterii corylandensis, from the reign of Penda (d. 655) to 1091. A continuation of the History to 1117 was issued by Peter of Blois, archdeacon of Bath, who died 1220; and by three other continuations it was brought down to 1486. Fulman printed the work, as continued by Peter of Blois, in the first volume of Reverum anglicarum scriptores veteres, Oxford, 1684. But the History is now pronounced by competent judges, especially since Sir Francis Palgrave attacked it in the Quarterly Review, September, 1826, to be so largely interpolated, that it is without much historical authority. The Charters in it are plainly forgeries of a later date than Ingulf. The continuations have more value. The original work was probably of monkish origin, and dates from the thirteenth or fourteenth century. A translation of it by H. T. Riley forms a volume of Bohn's Antiquarian Librarg. See HARDY'S Reverum Britannicarum mediæ ævi scriptores, vol. ii. (1865).

INHERITANCE AMONG THE HEBREWS. Jehovah was acknowledged to be the owner of the land of Israel; and therefore, although it was formally divided among the twelve tribes, it was understood that the right to dispose finally of the property was vested in him (Lev. xxv. 23). Accordingly, there could be no irrevocable parting with the birthright. The Year of Jubilee restored all property to its original owner or his heirs (Lev. xxv. 10). This fact explains Naboth's refusal to part with his vineyard, even to the king (1 Kings xxi. 3 sq.). Along with real estate, other things, such as slaves, came, at the death of the father, to his sons by his wife or wives. The sons by concubines received only presents (Gen. xxv. 5 sq.), while the sons of harlots got nothing (Judg. xi. 2). The first-born son received a double portion of the entire inheritance, even in cases where a son of a favorite wife had the father's preference (Deut. xxi. 15-17). The cases of Esau and Reuben show that this right of primogeniture might be forfeited (Gen. xxv. 31 sqq., xlviii. 17, xlix. 3). Daughters inherited only when there were no sons; and in these cases they must marry in their own tribe, lest the patrimony be alienated (Num. xxvii. 1-11, xxxvi.). In cases where there were no children, the brother, the paternal uncle, or the nearest kinsman, inherited (Num. xxvii. 9 sqq.). Sometimes a faithful slave inherited his master's property in cases where he had married the daughter (1 Chron. ii. 34, 35), or had been adopted (Gen. xv. 2, 3), or was guardian of an imbecile son (Prov. xvii. 2), [or even in case of misconduct of the heir (2 Sam. xvi. 4)]. The Mosaic law so exactly defined the deposition of estates, that wills, in our sense of the term, were plainly superfluous; and so the word does not occur in the Hebrew Bible. The phrase "to set one's house in order" (in 2 Sam. xvii. 23 and Isa. xxxviii. 1) refers to household affairs merely. But wills necessarily became common among the Jews of the Dispersion, and they are referred to in the New Testament (Gal. iii. 15; Heb. ix. 17). The Hebrew word for them was commonly קְטָוָה, a transliteration of δαθήκη; but the rabbis used instead the non-biblical פְּקֻדָּה, from פָּקַד, "to command." Occasionally there was a partial ante mortem distribution of property (cf. Luke xv. 12); and sometimes, at least, as might be expected, property occasioned disputes (cf. Luke xii. 13 sq.).

RÜETSCHL.

INNER MISSION, The, an agency for promoting the spiritual and bodily welfare of the destitute and spiritually indifferent in Germany. Its ultimate object is to evangelize the classes that have fallen away from Christian truth and faith. The movement developed out of the conviction that the Protestant Church of Germany was not accomplishing all it might. Fliedner was the first to embody this conviction in practical institutions; and the various charities he organized and carried out into successful operation at Kaiserswerth have done much towards the revival of Christian benevolence throughout the land. But it remained for Wichern to determine the character, and secure the success, of the work of the Inner Mission. The very name is due to him, although Dr. Lücke of Göttingen had previously used it in a publication printed in Hamburg, 1843. It occurred to Dr. Wichern, that a movement was necessary, within the limits of Germany, as well as among the heathen, to stem the tide of irreligion, and to build up the kingdom of God. It was this conviction which led him to refuse the appeal of some friends to turn the Rauhe Haus at Hamburg [which he had founded in 1833] into an institution for training missionaries for the heathen. There was a sufficiently large field at home, and the two agencies were of sufficient importance to be kept separate. The term "Inner Mission" became the universal designation for this peculiar domestic work after Wichern's stirring appeal to the Protestant Church at the Kirchentag [a voluntary ecclesiastical synod: see art.], held in Wittenberg, 1848.

The Inner Mission directs itself to those classes which have become indifferent to Christ, or, out of ignorance, have remained far from him. [The term and work of the Inner Mission are more comprehensive than Home Missions, and include, not only efforts to spread the gospel by preaching, but also various other agencies for the spiritual, as well as physical, welfare of the destitute.] It employs as its means the preaching of the gospel and efforts to relieve the victims of disease, and those who have been led astray. The Inner Mission is not a combination of a variety of associations and institutions devoted to different forms of benevolent Christian work. It uses such agencies, but is itself a force behind them, which also works through the instrumentality of individuals. Nor is it a mere philanthropic agency, but a distinctly evangelistic agency, whose ultimate aim is to win men to the gospel.

Since the organization of the movement at the Wittenberg Kirchentag, in 1848, the necessity for its existence has been made more apparent by the socialism, nihilism, humanitarian culture, and other evils, of the land. At that conference was formed the Central Committee of the Inner Mission of the German-Protestant Church. Its design was not to control the work, but to give suggestions and impulses for the organization of efforts in different parts of the land. It originated a conference which has had twenty-two meetings, the last being held at Bremen, in September, 1881. The movement passed through a period of much opposition, but gradually won the sympathies of a large constituency from all schools of Christian thought and activity. Since 1848 the sphere of effort has become more comprehensive, and now includes schools for children and cripples, houses of refuge, the care of the sick and poor, the conduct of Sunday schools, the organization of Young Men's Christian Associations, the training of servants, the various forms of city missionary activity, the promotion of sabbath observance, and other forms of Christian work. There are central committees in different parts of the land, and under their influence a body of specially trained evangelists, colportors, and other officers, has been educated. To these specific agencies of the Inner Mission must be added the Institution of Deaconesses [which was founded by Theodore Fliedner, in Kaiserswerth, 1836], which now numbers nearly four thousand sisters. [The work of the Inner Mission is not dependent upon State control. It is not an organization, but an impulse or movement, which, working itself out in various channels and parts of the land, seeks to advance the cause of true religion. The various institutions representing the idea are supported by voluntary contributions. There is no central power upon which they are dependent.]

INNOCENT I., Pope A.D. 402–417. According to Jerome, he was the son of his predecessor, Anastasius I., on whose death he was elected to the papal chair (in 402). A fundamental principle it was with him never to neglect an opportunity for extending the authority of the Roman see. On sending to Victricius, Bishop of Rouen, rules of discipline for use throughout Gaul, he inserts the injunction, “Si majores causæ in medium fuerint devolvæ, ad sedem apostolicam, sicut synodus statuit, et beata consuetudo exigit; post judicium episcopale referantur.” If the reference here is to the edict of the Council of Sardica (344) on the subject, he certainly goes far beyond the somewhat general concessions here made; since he insists that all bishops in all weightier matters should report to Rome. Exuperius, Bishop of Toulouse, he highly compliments (405) for referring his inquiries to the Roman chair, without first attempting to decide them for himself. The Macedonian bishops he severely rebukes (414) for daring to consult him the second time on a point on which he had already given a decision. To Alexander of Antioch he explains (415) that the prerogatives yielded to his see were not on account of the greatness of Antioch, but simply because that city had been, though but for a brief while, the first seat of Peter; while at Rome, on the contrary, Peter had dwelt until his death. Yearly his claims for power grew more and more exorbitant. In 416 he writes to Bishop Decentius, “Who does not know that what has been handed down to the Roman Church by Peter, the prince of the apostles, must be held fast by all, especially since all the churches throughout Gaul, Spain, Italy, and Africa, owe their existence to priests ordained by Peter and his successors?” A particularly favorable occasion presented itself for expatiating on the plenary authority of Rome, when in 417 he confirmed by letter the resolutions against the Pelagian heresy, adopted and sent to him for sanction by the synod of Carthage.

It was in accordance with these lofty conceptions of papal prerogative, that Innocent conducted himself in the case of Chrysostom, when that famous man was persecuted by Theophilus of Alexandria. After his deposition, Chrysostom appealed to the Bishop of Rome (for his words addressed to Innocent can be understood in no other light), and invoked the papal interference as that of a higher court. And even Theophilus shows his deference to the Pope by reporting to him the course which Chrysostom's case had taken, and seeking to enlist him on his own side, though it was only to be coolly told that the Pope would continue to recognize Chrysostom as bishop until convicted by a regular tribunal. Failing, however, in his efforts to have the cause adjudicated before him in a council composed of Eastern and Western bishops, the Pope renounced fellowship with Theophilus and his associates. To the afflicted Chrysostom in his exile, the conduct of the Pope was full of consolation and support, as he gratefully testifies.

Trying days befell Innocent when Alaric besieged Rome. Pending the negotiations with this invader, he went, by order of the senate, to Honorius, at Ravenna, to induce him to accept the proposals of the Goth. By this journey he was spared the sight of the cruelties inflicted on Rome. In 410 Alaric sacked the city.

Among the dogmatic decisions of Innocent I. must be mentioned his condemnation of Pelagius, and his order to the synod of Mileve (417), that Pelagius and Celestius be excommunicated until they delivered themselves from the snares of Satan. Inasmuch as these men had grossly maltreated Jerome at Bethlehem, and John, Bishop of Jerusalem, had taken no steps against the criminals, Innocent sent Jerome a consoling letter, but to John a vigorous remonstrance. Especially strenuous was he in enforcing the ordinance of Siricius, forbidding the married clergy all marital intercourse, and deposing such as should beget children as unworthy of the sacred office. Innocent died March 12, 417, and was reckoned among the saints of the Catholic Church.

INNOCENT II. (Gregorio de' Papi, or Papareschi), Pope 1130–43. Having taken orders from Guibert of Ravenna, and afterwards filled important positions under Popes Paschal II., Gelasius II., and Calixtus II., we find him in 1123, in company with his after-opponent, Cardinal Peter Pierleoni, as papal legate in France.

While Pope Honorius lay dying, Gregory's practical tact, his friendly relation to the imperial court, and his pure life, attracted to him the favorable notice of those of the cardinals who were under the lead of the chancellor, Haimericus; and these, at most fifteen in number, ere yet the Pope had been interred, and without information of his decease having been sent to the absent cardinals, hurriedly elected Gregory to the chair (Feb. 14, 1130). But his dread of the Roman nobles, who were mostly hostile to him, forced him to take refuge in a cloister occupied in common by the troops of the Cenci and Frangipani, his chief friends in the city. Meanwhile Peter Pierleoni was chosen as his rival in an orderly election by a majority of the cardinals who were entitled to vote, and mounted the papal throne under the name of Anacletus II. (see art.). Impelled now by fear, Innocent II. fled to Pisa, and thence to Genoa, where Bernard had prepared for his reception by influencing the French court and clergy in his favor. Also, at the synod of Etampes, this same all-powerful champion secured the rejection of Anacletus II. and the formal recognition of Innocent II. Then followed a long conflict between the partisans on both sides. In October, 1130, a synod held at Würzburg declared for Innocent; and a stately embassy was sent to inform him of his recognition by the German sovereign, Lothair, and the German bishops. In January, 1131, Henry of England, at a personal interview, presented him with a thousand marks of silver. Encouraged by this support, Innocent demanded of Lothair that he march to Rome in force, expel his rival, and put him in his seat. In return, Lothair asked the surrender of those privileges which had been extorted by the Concordat of Worms, and was only dissuaded from insisting on his request, by the eloquent appeal of Bernard. In August, 1133, Lothair marched to Italy; and, after some futile attempts at negotiation by Anacletus, he compelled the latter to shut himself in St. Peter's Church, and had himself crowned emperor in June, at the Lateran, by his chosen pope. As a requital for such success, Lothair once more pressed on the Pope his former request, but was again dissuaded from it, this time by Norbert; and he was obliged to content himself with some small concessions. During the festivities of the coronation, the Pope invested the emperor with the goods of Mathilda of Tuscany, on condition of an annuity of a hundred marks of silver. From this act was afterwards deduced the right of regarding the emperor as the vassal of the Roman see. On leaving Rome, Lothair committed his pope to the care of the Frangipani: but, distrusting his guardians, Innocent removed (1133) to Pisa; and there (in 1135) assembling a numerous council, he hurled excommunication afresh against Anacletus and his party. Though inclined at first to scorn the impotent decree, the latter soon learned his full danger when Bernard went to Milan, and in a few days drew over to Innocent's side the whole population of the city, which had been hitherto devoted to him. His last prop was removed when Roger of Sicily was expelled from Italy by Lothair, who died, however, on his return from the expedition, without completing the full establishment of his ward in St. Peter's chair. But Innocent still possessed in Bernard an ally mightier than the emperor's sword. Then, just as this support, too, seemed likely to fail, Anacletus died, leaving him master of the situation. The peace of the church thus effected was proclaimed in the Lateran Council (1139), and Roger of Sicily put under the ban. Thereupon Innocent led an army in person against the king, but, falling into an ambush, was captured. The result was the purchase of his freedom by recognizing Roger as king. On his return to Rome, he undertook to heal the wounds which the long schism had inflicted upon the Church and people, and to restore the authority of Rome over the smaller states which had formerly been under its rule. The result was a long war with Tivoli, concluded by a peace favorable, indeed, to the Church, but exasperating to the Romans, who desired the utter demolition of the city. In consequence, the Romans renounced obedience to the Pope, chose their own rulers, and called into life again the old republican senate. In addition to this misfortune, the good understanding had with Louis of France was ruptured, because of the king's refusal to accept a candidate whom the Pope had recommended to the bishopric of Bruges. The strife proceeded so far, that the Pope is said to have suspended an interdict over the kingdom. In the midst of these contentions Innocent died (Sept. 23, 1143). The most notable of his dogmatic decisions was his condemnation of the doctrines of Abelard and of Arnold of Brescia (see those arts.).

INNOCENT III., Antipope to Alexander III. from 1179 to 1180; by name Landus of Sezza; from one of the oldest Lombard families, and not from the Frangipani. He was chosen pope by the Roman nobles, and those of the clergy who were hostile to Alexander, on Sept. 29, 1179 (not 1178). The relatives of Octavian (Victor IV.), the first antipope, supported him; and Octavian's brother received him into a stronghold between Palombara and Rome. By bribery Alexander succeeded in getting him into his hands, and sent him to the convent of La Cava, January, 1180. See MURATORI: Rer. Ital. scr. VII. p. 874.

INNOCENT III. (Lothair, or, in full, Giovanni Lotario Conti), Pope 1198-1216; a member of the distinguished family of the Scotti; b. 1160. His education, begun in Rome, was completed at Paris and Bologna. Returning to Rome, he was made canon of St. Peter, and, by the aid of his relatives among the cardinals, rapidly mounted the ecclesiastical stairs. Appointed a sub-deacon by Gregory VIII., he in 1190 exchanged this position for that of cardinal-deacon at the wish of his uncle, Clement III., in order, that, as the Pope's nephew, he might act a distinguished part among the cardinals, while as yet not thirty years old. Owing, probably, to family jealousies, he was, under Celestine III., seldom called to the business of the curia. The leisure thus afforded he employed in composing various treatises, — one in three books (De contemptu mundi, sive de miseria humanæ conditionis), another in six books (Mysteriorum evangelicæ legis ac sacramenti eucharistæ), another, on ecclesiastical law (De quadrupartita specie nuptiarum). The first two only are extant.

At the death of Celestine III. (Jan. 8, 1198) Lothair was elected pope, in the thirty-seventh year of his life; then, rapidly passing through priestly and episcopal orders, he was crowned

Feb. 22. Before entering on the world-wide problems of his position, it devolved on him to restore the papal seat to Rome, secure the respect of the Italians, induce the city prefect to recognize his superiority, and secure the resignation of the senator chosen by the people, and hitherto independent of papal authority. He then stepped forth as the deliverer of Italy from the dominion of the German princes appointed by Henry VI. He plundered Spoleto, subjected Perugia, took a commanding position in Tuscany, placed his rectors in patrimonies, and soon became the acknowledged defender of national independence. Sicily, too, contributed to his good fortune. Here ruled Constance, the widow of Henry VI., as guardian of her minor son Frederic. Pressed by contending factions, she renounced the privileges of the Norman rule in relation to the Church, and took the oath of allegiance to Innocent as his feudatory. Dying in 1198, she by will named Innocent regent of the kingdom, and protector of her son. At once the Pope entered with zeal upon his new duties, subjecting the German princes to his young ward, and taking care of his education.

In Germany affairs were most favorable for the extension of the papal power there. Two claimants were contending for the imperial crown, — Philip of Swabia, and Otto IV. The latter at once sought the favor of Innocent by renouncing the rights of the empire in Italy, and surrendering the exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, and the kingdom of Spoleto. Philip's followers, on the contrary, showed a strong suspicion of the Pope. While promising him due respect as the head of the Church, they at the same time begged him not to interfere with the rights of the empire. Though naturally inclined to prefer the Guelph to the Hohenstaufen, yet, in a letter of reply to the German princes, the Pope assumed the appearance of an impartial umpire, desirous of preserving the independence of the electoral college, and fearful only, lest, by the choice of Philip, Germany became the hereditary possession of a ruling house. His hope was, that both claimants would submit their pretensions to a tribunal composed of German princes, and that Otto would be elected. In this he was disappointed. His next step was to issue a memorial on the subject, setting forth the superior claims of Otto as descended from a family long devoted to the Roman see, and a friend to the Church. On this ground Guido of Preneste was instructed to go to Germany as legate, and operate. In March, Innocent, by letter, recognized Otto as emperor, and in July secured the excommunication of all members of the opposing faction at an assembly of Otto's partisans. But this was done only after a renewed pledge given by the Guelph, dated Neuss, June 8, 1201, to concede to the Roman chair all the territories belonging to it, both those "which it now holds and which it may yet hold, and to assist it in obtaining those which it does not now occupy." The significance of this document is evident, furnishing as it did a foundation for the wider extension of the Church state. In the fortune of arms Otto was at first successful; and Philip was induced to try negotiations with the Pope, but on terms which could not be granted. In 1204–05, however, affairs took a decided turn. Several of the strongest partisans of Otto deserted to Philip.

The king of France, too, as Philip's ally, vanquished King John of England, Otto's confederate, in battle. Thus put in the ascendant, Philip directed a letter to Innocent, offering to submit the matters in debate to a tribunal composed of cardinals, and princes of the empire. The Pope was forced to take account of the changed condition of affairs, and bade Otto resign. But, as the latter remained unmoved, Innocent urged the victorious Hohenstaufen to accede to a tribunal to be constituted by himself at Rome, assuring him at the same time of a decision in his favor. To this both rivals at last yielded; and the consummate statesmanship of Innocent triumphed at last in having the contest referred to Rome. Whether the tribunal was ever held, is uncertain. One thing, however, is known: in spite of all his political shrewdness, the Pope was prevailed upon to pledge the restoration to the empire of all possessions unjustly obtained in Central Italy, provided Philip's daughter should be given in marriage to his nephew, and the latter, as Philip's son-in-law, should be made Duke of Tuscany. Even the great Innocent could not withstand the temptation to nepotism. Just at this juncture, Philip was assassinated by Otto of Wittenbach (June 21, 1208), and Otto became the undisputed sovereign of Germany. Innocent again dexterously shifted his tactics. He held up before Otto the imperial crown, and wrote him, "We demand of thee, dearest son, the thing which thou canst not but grant, because it accords with thy view, and serves for thy soul's salvation." Otto replied, outdoing all his former pledges. He acknowledged the bounds of the States of the Church as drawn by Innocent, promised help in rooting out heresy, renounced interference in church elections, and, in short, surrendered every thing which had been secured to the empire by the Concordat of Worms. At such a price did Otto purchase his coronation as emperor. In the summer of 1209 he began his march over the Alps with a mighty host, and met the Pope at Viterbo. The interview was one which hardly sustained the Pope's first greeting, "This is my beloved son, in whom my soul is well pleased." Yet he deemed it not prudent to postpone the coronation, which took place at St. Peter's, Oct. 4, 1209. Once crowned, Otto ignored all his promises and obligations, and proceeded to deal as best he could for his own and the empire's advantage. He declared war against the Pope's protégé, Frederic of Sicily, and seized a part of the patrimony of Peter, and for these acts of violence was put under the papal ban. Nor was Innocent content with anathema alone. He proceeded to stir up against his quondam pet the Italian nobles and German princes, and treated with the king of France for his dethronement. In these measures he was so far successful as not only to rescue his ward, Frederic, from imminent peril, but also eventually to see him elected to the German throne by the princes of the empire (1212), in place of Otto, and crowned at Mainz. On July 12, 1213, the emperor elect guaranteed to his protector and benefactor, the Pope, all the realms, rights, and concessions which Otto had formerly pledged. On July 27, 1214, the great battle of Bouvines was fought, which ended in the utter defeat of Otto, and decided the conflict in Frederic's favor; and in an imposing council held at Rome in 1215, he was duly proclaimed emperor elect, and his rival once more anathematized. Death spared the Pope the discovery of the enormous blunder, which, from an ecclesiastical point of view, he had committed in thus exalting Frederick II. to the throne.

A worthier triumph was achieved by Innocent, over Philip (II.) Augustus of France, in forcing him to the correct maintenance of his marriage relations. Under the pretext of a too close connection in blood, but really on the ground of a conceived aversion, this princè had obtained from his bishops a divorce from his wife Ingeburga, and had married Agnes, daughter of Duke Berthold III. Against such proceedings Celestine III. had already entered his protest, and now Innocent took up the cause of the rejected queen. His remonstrance being unheeded, he put the whole of France under interdict, stirred up against the king a large portion of the clergy, the nobles, and the common people, and at last, on Sept. 7, 1200, compelled Philip to pledge the restoration of Ingeburga to her position as queen and wife. It was, however, to little purpose. The separation which the king could not effect by law, he sought to accomplish by subjecting his wife to constant vexations and humiliations, which might eventually compel her to leave him of her own accord. In all these trials the Pope remained her friend; and though he relaxed somewhat in the energy of his measures for her relief, when the aid of the king was needed in some of his projects, yet he persevered in refusing his consent to the divorce, and had the satisfaction of knowing at last that the queen, who for seventeen years had been watched and harassed as a prisoner, was received back into full honor by her penitent husband. With like success the Pope interfered in the domestic affairs of Alphonso IX. of Leon, whose wife he constrained to depart from him by the force of an interdict, because of a too close consanguinity; and also in those of Peter of Aragon, whose contemplated espousal of Bianca of Aragon he prevented for the same reason; and then, when, after Peter's marriage with Maria of Montpellier, the royal libertine wished to put her away, and scorned the papal prohibition of that act, Innocent, by ecclesiastical weapons alone, soon brought the offender to terms, and humbled him even to the surrender of his kingdom, which he accepted back as a papal fief. King Sancho of Portugal, also, he compelled to pay the tribute promised to the papal see by his father, though much against his will; and Ladislaus of Poland, when guilty of robbing the church and bishops of goods and rights, he soon subjected to his requirements. The extent to which Innocent asserted to himself the sole right of putting princes under ban, and of releasing them from it, may be seen in his dealings with Hakon of Sweden. When this king, upon atonement made for his father's wrongs, was released from the ban which had been put on the kingdom by Archbishop Eric, the Pope wrote to Eric that he had imitated him ape-fashion, and reminded him that such release was valid only when granted by the vicar of St. Peter. In 1204 Innocent succeeded in uniting the Bulgarians, who formerly belonged to the Greek Church, with the Church of Rome by consenting to Prince John's request for coronation, who desired it for the sake of papal protection against foreign and domestic foes.

But it was in his treatment of John Lackland, the king of England, that Innocent's assumption of universal power as the "vicar of Christ" fully culminated. The quarrel was occasioned by the king's interference in the election of a superior over the monks of Canterbury. The Pope, refusing to sanction his choice, made a countermove by convening some members of the convent, who happened to be at Rome, and securing, through them, election of Stephen Langton, a cardinal priest, to the contested position. This step enraged the king. When threatened with an interdict, he swore, "by God's teeth," that he would hunt every ecclesiastic who dared to proclaim it, out of the land. The interdict fell, and John sought to make good his oath. A ban followed; and, in spite of all John's efforts to hinder its publication, it became known. The nobles, who hated his tyranny, rose against him; and fierce the conflict grew, until at last Innocent declared the throne vacant, and instigated Philip Augustus of France to take possession of it, promising to all who engaged in the attempt the title and privilege of crusaders. This extreme measure frightened the king into abject submission; and on May 13, 1213, he concluded a convention with ten papal plenipotentiaries at Dover, pledging the acknowledgment of Stephen Langton as archbishop, and the restoration to the church of all its property which had been seized, and also of all exiles to their homes. Nor was this humiliation sufficient. To secure himself against the threatened invasion of Philip, although under the pretext of atoning for his sins, on May 18 John surrendered his realms "to God and the Pope," and received them back as a papal feudatory, bound to an annual payment of seven hundred marks for England, and three hundred for Ireland. Then it was, when prostrate in the dust at the feet of the archbishop as a suppliant for mercy, that he was released from the ban. The interdict was not lifted until July 2, 1214, on the fulfilment of the conditions pledged. But, though now reconciled with the Pope, the quarrel with the barons went on, until by force of arms they extorted from the king the famous Magna Charta, and thus laid the foundation of the English political constitution. No sooner did Innocent learn of these transactions than he pronounced the terms of the charter null and void. It touched too closely upon the royal prerogatives, and indirectly upon the feudal sovereignty of the Pope. But neither declaration nor excommunication had any effect on the nation. One only who took part in the uprising of the barons fell a sacrifice under the power of the Pope: this was Langton. By reason of his refusal to put the insurgents under the ban, he was, while attending a council at Rome in 1215, suspended from his archbishopric. But nothing so damaged the papal cause in England as this opposition of Innocent to the Magna Charta. Here it was where the Pope had at last fully realized his ideal of the true relations between Church and State, and here it was where the papacy began to encounter its most effective opposition.

What Innocent's ideal was may be learned from what he wrote to King John: "Jesus Christ wills that the kingdom should be priestly, and the priesthood kingly. Over all, he has set me as his vicar upon earth, so that, as before Jesus 'every knee shall bow,' in like manner to his vicar all shall be obedient, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd. Pondering this truth, thou, as a secular prince, hast subjected thy realm to Him to whom all is spiritually subject." Accordingly, in entertaining this view of his position, Innocent naturally felt, when defending the rights of the Roman chair before princes and peoples, that whatsoever he did was wrought in and through the influence of Him whose vicar he was. Moreover, he applied to himself the word of Jesus: "All power is given unto me in heaven and earth." Peter's miraculous walk upon the sea was to him a sign of how the nations of the earth were to be subdued under the feet of himself and his successors. Like Melchizedek, the Pope, he conceived, united in one person the offices of king and high priest. And as, in the ark of the covenant, the rod was placed beside the tables of the law, so he considered, that, in the heart of the Pope, there resided together both the fearful power of destruction and the right to bestow grace. The parallel already drawn by Gregory VII., comparing the Church and State to the sun and moon severally, Innocent expanded into an illustration for showing how the State was actually dependent on the Church for its true lustre and glory. A frequent declaration of his was it, that the priesthood alone (i.e., the Church) sprang from the divine appointment, while the State originated "from human extortions." Hence, in all cases where a heinous sin was in question, he claimed the right to test the decisions of the secular tribunals, and if necessary to quash them. Both the secular and the spiritual swords, he affirmed, belonged to the Pope; and, while he reserved to himself the latter, the former he gave over to the princes.

In discharging his duty as the vicar of Christ, Innocent now, as at the beginning of his pontificate, felt it obligatory on him to summon the kings and peoples of the earth to a holy war for the recovery of Palestine. In this movement he was largely aided by the rare eloquence of two men, — Fulk of Neuilly, who wrought effectually among the French nobles, and Abbot Martin, who was no less influential with those of South Germany. But the crusading host encamping near Venice was early turned aside from its undertaking by the craft of the Doge Dandolo, who employed it for the recovery of Zara from the king of Hungary. In vain did Innocent use warning and threatening to divert them from this attempt. The doge's work was done. Hardly was this difficulty adjusted, when the crusaders engaged in another enterprise, equally foreign to their original purpose, and no less contrary to the will of the Pope. Influenced by the persuasions of Philip of Germany, they lent their assistance to his brother-in-law, Alexius Angelus, in his project of regaining his ancestral inheritance from the usurper, Alexis III. Constantinople was captured. But by this event the relations between the Greeks and Latins became so disturbed, that, in a popular insurrection, Alexius was caught, imprisoned, and finally strangled. Thereupon the crusaders took possession of the city, and set up there a Latin empire. On May 16, 1204, Baldwin of Flanders was crowned emperor. This event, opening as it did to the Pope a prospect of uniting the Greek and Latin churches, reconciled him to the course pursued by the crusaders; and in a letter to them he expressed the joyful hope that henceforth there would be but one fold and one shepherd. And now was vouchsafed to him that which his predecessors had sighed for in vain; viz., the nomination of a Catholic patriarch for Constantinople.

On Oct. 12, 1204, Innocent issued a bull for raising a crusading expedition into Livonia. The leader of the several enterprises which followed was Albert, Bishop of Livonia, who succeeded in baptizing the Livonians in 1206, and also the neighboring Letti in 1208, and subjecting both to the chair of Peter. In reward for this, Albert was released from the control of his metropolitan at Bremen, and made, in a measure, independent. But, on his becoming involved in a conflict with the "Knighthood of Christ in Livonia," Innocent sought to adjust the difficulty by a compromise, the conflicting terms of which soon made it evident how impracticable it was for a church power centralized at Rome to manage wisely the conditions and relations of remote ecclesiastical provinces.

It is not so creditable to Innocent, that he first employed the crusades for the extermination of heresy. In 1207 he enjoined on the French king the duty of annihilating the heretics of Toulouse. The cruelties inflicted on the Albigenses, in consequence, are not to be charged so much on Innocent himself as on his system, which may be traced back to Augustine (see art. CATHARI). The orders of the Pope against heretics were approved at the twelfth general synod (1215), and incorporated in the canon law. They were, in substance, that all rulers should be exhorted to tolerate no heretics in their domains: if a ruler refused to clear his land of heretics at the demand of the Church, and should persist in his refusal, he should be deprived of his authority, and even ejected from it by force: to every one who joined in the expeditions against heretics, like favors should be granted as were granted to crusaders. At the same council the severest enactments were issued against the Jews. Rulers were forbidden to trust them with public offices. In order to be known as Jews, they were to clothe themselves with a peculiar garb. During Holy Week they were not to appear on the streets, lest, in that season of sorrow, Christians should be scandalized by their decorated attire. At this council, also, condemnation was pronounced upon the doctrine of Amalrich of Bena (see art.), and on a treatise against Peter Lombard by Joachim of Flore (see art.). Moreover, the formation of new monastic orders was discouraged; and alike on Dominic and on Francis, both of whom prayed to have their orders confirmed, was the command of the council imposed, that they should subject their societies to existing rules. The last deliverance of the council was to summon Christendom to a new crusade to the Holy Land, in 1217. At this council, held near the close of Innocent's pontificate, the Pope showed himself as the unlimited ruler of the great ones of the world and of the church. Emperors, kings, and princes had sent to it their plenipotentiaries; and fifteen hundred archbishops, bishops, and abbots took part in its transactions, or, rather, were present to listen to and record the decrees of Innocent. Deliberations, properly speaking, there were none. Consent followed at once on the reading of the Pope's decree. But, while the ecclesiastics thus exalted their superior, they virtually voted their own abdication. None of Innocent's predecessors had so cut down the privileges of bishops and metropolitans as he had done, and none had so largely assumed the right of patronage belonging to local church officers. He was the first to assert the Pope's right to grant benefices; and he issued countless commissions in order to secure a productive living for the papal servants and the Romish clergy, and even to his own relatives and intimates. And he did this at the cost of the country clergy, and to the disparagement of the authority of the bishops in the regions where these commissions were executed. This centralization of power was still furthered by a claim laid to the bishops' chairs, in case any overstepped canonical regulations and privileges. The right to depose bishops was also declared to belong to the Pope alone, who, as the vicar of Christ, had the sole power to annul the marriage between the bishop and his congregation. Large as all these claims were, they were sustained, on the part of Innocent, by rare discernment and profound knowledge. Even during his reign, his bulls and decretals were collected and published at three several times; and a fourth collection, comprising those of the last six years, was issued shortly after his death. But, though thus crowded with work, this Pope found leisure for literary labors. We have from his pen an exposition of the seven penitential Psalms, evincing a tone of sincere piety. Moreover, he preached frequently, not only at Rome, but also upon his journeys; and those of his sermons which have come down to us bear testimony to his earnest piety and deep humility. Once and again did he utter a sigh for rest from occupations which wore out body and soul. And this rest he found in death (July 16, 1216) at Perugia. Pride can hardly be said to be the ruling element of his character. When he burns, excommunicates, binds, and loosens, he is not seeking his own honor, but the honor of Him whose vicegerent he believed himself to be. The high office of the Papacy, so repugnant to Protestant feeling, he spiritualized and ennobled. In his blameless walk, his brotherly love, his readiness for self-sacrifice, he showed the devoted Christian. We can hardly call him covetous, since he devoted his whole income to the good of the Church. The only spot that stains his name is that he did once and again endow his relatives and trusted servants with ecclesiastical livings; but this is a spot which cleaves almost to the entire Papacy.

INNOCENT IV. (Senibaldi de Fieschi), Pope 1243-54. Celestine IV. died suddenly, and was followed, June 25, 1243, after the interval of a year and a half, by Innocent IV., whose choice was secured through the influence of the emperor. The new pontiff was an eminent jurist belonging to one of the first families of Genoa; and it was hoped that his election would terminate the long strife which had been waged between the Church and the emperor, inasmuch as the new Pope, while cardinal, had been the constant friend of the latter. To this end a settlement was proposed, highly advantageous to the Pope, but which failed of success by reason of the mutual distrust entertained by the parties. The Pope, pending negotiations, fled suddenly to Lyons, whither he called a general council, for the ostensible purpose of correcting abuses in the Church, of carrying aid to the Eastern Christians, and of settling the difficulties between the Church and the empire. The emperor, on the other hand, issued, in his own interest, a letter to the princes of Christendom, unveiling the real purpose of the Pope, and promising to organize a crusade, provided Innocent would remove the ban that had been put on him, and would quiet the rebellion in Lombardy. But, at the third session of the papal council, Frederick II. was deposed and excommunicated, and the electoral princes called upon to choose a new emperor. Notwithstanding the mediation of Louis IX., and the orthodox confession made by the emperor before the Bishop of Palermo, the Pope remained obdurate, and the strife waxed bitter. Innocent fomented rebellion in Sicily, and had Henry Raspé, landgrave of Turingia, proclaimed emperor of Germany. The princes of the empire, however, for the most part remained true to Frederick; and his rival soon fell, fighting against the imperial forces, led by Conrad, son of Frederick. His death left Frederick's influence in Germany paramount. The Pope could find no one willing to accept the gift of the crown, save Count William of Holland, whose supporters had to be bought with gold. Frederick died Dec. 13, 1247, transmitting his feud with the Pope to his son Conrad, whose hereditary crown of Sicily Innocent had bestowed upon the English prince, Edmund. Sudden death, which so often had favored the popes, carried off Conrad while in the act of asserting his rights. His infant heir, the ten-year-old Conradin, was left under the guardianship of Manfred, natural son of Frederick, who made terms with the pontiff, on condition that the claims of his ward to the Sicilian crown should be respected. The Pope proving faithless, Manfred took the field, and succeeded in compelling the entire papal army to surrender. Innocent died five days later, at Naples, where he lies buried in the cathedral. In the midst of a busy and stormy life Innocent found time for grand missionary enterprises to the East. He ceded to Conrad, Grand Master of the German order, his proprietary right over Prussia, which he had divided into four bishoprics. To him, also, is due the custom of decorating cardinals with the red hat. He is, moreover, the author of a work entitled Apparatus in quinque libros decretalium, highly prized as an authority on canon law, and also A Defence of the Papal Prerogative against Peter de Vineis, the chancellor of Frederick II. He died at Naples, Dec. 7, 1254.

INNOCENT V. (Pietro de Tarantasia), Pope 1276, was chosen to succeed Gregory X. Jan. 21, 1276. He had been Archbishop of Lyons, Cardinal Bishop of Ostia, and grand confessor. His first aim was to reconcile the warring factions of the Guelph and Ghibelline, which had embroiled the Italian states; and he succeeded so far as to bring Lucca and Pisa into friendly relation, and give peace to Tuscany. Whilst preparing to send a numerous embassy to the Greek emperor, Michael Palæologus, in the interest of the union of the two churches east and west (to which the Greek ambassadors at Lyons had previously consented), Innocent died (June 22), after a brief pontificate of five months. He was a voluminous writer. Besides his postils and quodlibets, he composed a number of philosophic and other works, most noteworthy of which were commentaries on the Pauline Epistles and on the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard. A hundred propositions drawn from his writings, and condemned by learned contemporaries, were defended by Thomas Aquinas.

INNOCENT VI. (Etienne d'Albert), Pope 1352-62. On the death of Clement VI. the cardinals assembled, and, before making choice of his successor, proceeded to limit the prerogatives of the papal chair as follows: (1) The Pope shall appoint no new cardinals until the existing number shall have been reduced to sixteen. The whole number shall never exceed twenty, and none shall be appointed without the consent of at least two-thirds of the cardinals. (2) The Pope shall not imprison, depose, place under the ban, or suspend a cardinal, without the consent of all his peers. (3) The Pope shall neither alienate the lands of the Church, nor invest any one with the same, without the consent of two-thirds of the cardinals. (4) The revenues of the Church shall be equally divided; one half going to the support of the Pope, the other to the cardinals. (5) No relative of the Pope shall be appointed governor of any of the provinces of the Church. (6) The Pope shall not receive tithes of ecclesiastical livings, nor any subsidies, without consent of two-thirds of the cardinals. These propositions the cardinals were compelled to subscribe under oath, some doing so with the reservation "Si jure niterentur." Thereupon the votes were taken; and the choice fell upon Stephen Albert, Bishop of Ostia, Dec. 18, 1362. He took the title of Innocent VI., and his first act was to declare the propositions which he subscribed with the reservation above specified null and void. Deeply versed in canon law, and severe in morals, he at once set about correcting abuses. Unlawful grants were recalled; grievous taxes were abolished; the clergy who had flocked to Avignon on the occasion of his coronation, in the hope of preferment, were ordered to return within five days to their benefices, on the pain of excommunication; and by precept and example the luxurious living of the cardinals was rebuked. That the judges of the Rota might be the more impartial, they were assigned a competent support. Charles IV., who was crowned at Rome April 5, 1355, was compelled by the Pope to leave for Germany that selfsame day. Bologna was wrested from Bernardo Visconti, the powerful and unscrupulous ruler of Milan. The new Pope, moreover, sought to mediate between Edward of England, and John of France, and to unite the Venetians and Genoese, then at war with each other, against the Turks. He also put Peter of Castile under the ban for poisoning his wife, and undertook to fortify Avignon against the hordes of mercenaries which were plundering the south of France; but, ere he could complete the latter work, the city was invested, and the withdrawal of the besiegers had to be purchased by a large sum of money and a plenary pardon. At the instance of Charles IV. the festival of the Sacred Lance was instituted, to be celebrated yearly, on the Friday following Easter, throughout Germany and Bohemia. The Mendicant Friars, whose reputation for sanctity had greatly suffered in the popular estimation, found a powerful champion in Innocent, who restored them to all former privileges. He died Sept. 12, 1362, leaving behind him the reputation of a just and upright man. Of his writings there have come down to us only a few letters and some bulls. See E. WERUNSKY: Italienische Politik Papst Innocent VI. u. König Karl IV. in J. 1353, 1354, Wien, 1878.

INNOCENT VII. (Cosimo de Migliorati), Pope 1404-06. On the death of Boniface IX., the cardinals bound themselves by oath to do their utmost to secure the healing of the great Western schism, mutually pledging their willingness to resign even the papal chair, in case such a step should be deemed necessary to the furtherance of an end so desirable. The new Pope (elected Oct. 17, 1404) was distinguished alike for the purity of his character and the extent of his learning, particularly in the provinces of civil and canon law. He had been previously appointed to several responsible positions, and employed in a number of delicate missions, by Urban VI.; nominated also chamberlain of the Church and cardinal by Boniface IX.; and was sixty-five years old when elected Pope. He assumed the title of Innocent VII. Shortly after his accession, a tumult broke out in Rome between the Guelphs and Ghibellines; a nephew of Innocent heading the former. In it a number of citizens were slain, and the Pope was compelled to flee the city. His exile, however, was brief. The people, as soon as they were convinced of his freedom from all complicity in the murderous act, restored him in triumph. Since the party opposed to the Pope was openly encouraged by Ladislaus, king of Naples, and Neapolitan troops were employed by it in attacks upon the city, and raids into the country, Innocent was compelled to put the king under the ban, and declare his kingdom forfeited. The king, however, fearing an attack from his rival, the Duke of Anjou, soon submitted to the conditions of the Pope. About this time the antipope, Benedict XIII., came as far as Genoa, desiring safe conduct from Innocent to Rome, under the pretext of holding conference with him in reference to harmonizing the Church. The wily request of Benedict was denied, and the conduct of each in the matter gave occasion for mutual reproach and recrimination. Innocent died suddenly of apoplexy (Nov. 6, 1406), giving rise to the groundless suspicion of having been poisoned. This Pope, otherwise simple, genial, and ingenuous, cannot wholly escape the charge of nepotism. His relatives were advanced to the most considerable places, and loaded with riches. His sole literary relic is a speech, of little merit, on the re-union of the Eastern and Western churches.

INNOCENT VIII. (Giovanni Battista Cibo), Pope 1484-92; chosen Aug. 29, 1484. He sprang from a Genoese family of Greek origin. We find him first as a youth at the Neapolitan court, then at Rome, in the service of Cardinal Philip of Bologna. After having held successively the bishoprics of Savona and Melfi, he was made cardinal 1473: on his accession he vainly sought to unite the princes of Christendom in a crusade against the Turks. He became involved in war with Ferdinand of Naples, whose crown he offered to Renaldus, Duke of Lorraine. A peace favorable to the Pope was effected Aug. 12, 1486. It was, however, shortly after violated by Ferdinand, who was excommunicated, and kept under the ban until peace was declared (1492). While urging the princes and people to arm against the Turk, the Pope shamelessly entered into treaty with the Sultan Bajazet, according to which he agreed — for the sum of forty thousand ducats per year, and the gift of the sacred spear which was said to have pierced our Saviour's side — to keep Zezim, a brother of the sultan, and a pretender to his throne, who had fallen into his hands, a close prisoner. Thus he thriftily turned to advantage his relations to both Christian and Pagan. The reputed wizards, witches, and soothsayers with which Germany was at this time filled, were by him prosecuted with great severity. The processes which his judges employed against these wretched creatures have been preserved in a book, which is remarkable alike for its learning, superstition, and vulgarity (see Witches and Processes against Witches). He strove also to arrest the progress of the Hussites in Bohemia, canonized the Margrave Leopold of Austria, and passed the closing years of his reign in creating new places, that by their sale he might enrich his treasury. Innocent died July 25, 1492. His sixteen children bear witness to the fidelity with which he kept his vow of chastity. These he was constantly and shamelessly seeking to enrich and advance. One of the eight cardinals he created was the son of Lorenzo de Medicis, whom he elevated to the office before he had passed his thirteenth year.

INNOCENT IX. (Giovanni Antonio Facchinetti), Pope 1591; elected Oct. 30, 1591. He was b. at Bologna 1519. Previous to his elevation to the papal chair, he had held, together with other dignities, the office of patriarch of Jerusalem, president of the Inquisition, and cardinal. His pontificate lasted two months, and was distinguished by a number of judicious and laudable enterprises undertaken by him. He forbade the alienation of church property, interdicted debt, and reduced burdensome taxation. He also improved the harbor of Ancona, and dug a canal in the neighborhood of St. Angelo to protect Rome from the overflow of the Tiber. Dying Dec. 30, 1591, he left behind him a considerable number of writings (as yet unprinted) and the character of a true and ingenuous man.

INNOCENT X. (Giovanni Battista Pamphili), Pope 1644-55; was chosen Pope (Sept. 15, 1644) in his seventy-second year, chiefly because he had said little and accomplished less. He owed alike his ill fortune and ill fame to Donna Olimpia Maidalchini, his brother's widow, with whom, even during the life of her husband, he held questionable relations. On the sudden death of the husband, she became the absolute mistress of the prelate, and the inspiration of his whole life; so that caricaturists were in the habit of representing the vicegerent of Christ as arrayed in a frock, styling him another Johanna, with the keys of St. Peter. Though he owed his elevation to the family of the Barberini, he was no sooner seated than he called upon them to give an account of their stewardship, in hopes of transferring their vast wealth into his own hands. Fleeing to France, they succeeded in enlisting the French king in their cause, which led to a rupture with the Pope, and a seizure, by the French, of Piombino and Portolongano. The result was a restoration of the Barberini to their offices and estates. The Duke of Parma, having, in defiance of the Pope, invested a certain infamous Theatine monk with the bishopric of Castro, the papal authorities took possession of the bishopric and earldom, and razed the fortifications of the city. The Peace of Westphalia, concluded in opposition to the vigorous and repeated protests of the papal nuncio (October, 1648), seriously impaired the papal prerogative. In anticipation of the Pope's bull, declaring the articles of peace null and void, it was stipulated that no spiritual or secular rights, nor decree of council, privilege or indulgence, edict or inhibition, no papal concordat, dispensation, absolution, or remonstrance, made in contravention of the treaty, or of any of its separate provisions, would either be heard or entertained. The papal protest, however, was not to be without its significance in the future. For the present, its only influence was to damage the prestige of the Pope. The papal nuncio, having boldly published the pontiff's bull at Vienna, was expelled from the city with a scurrilous message to his Holiness. Innocent's zeal for the purity of doctrine was shown in his formal condemnation (1653) of five propositions taken from the works of Jansenius. Guided by the counsel of Donna Olimpia, he succeeded in devising means for enriching the papal coffers, which he had found burdened with a debt of eight million scudi. The most shameful system of bribery and corruption prevailed in every rank of the papal hierarchy: offices were openly bought and sold. Two thousand of the smaller cloisters were closed, and their revenues sequestered. Amongst the more extraordinary measures taken to bring money to Rome was the Pope's letter, Universales maximique jubilæi, 1650. The most injurious was the monopoly of the corn-trade by the papal exchequer, by means of which flour was retailed to the baker at an increase of one-third in price, and a reduction of one-third in measure, resulting, as is alleged, in the ruin of agriculture in Italy. Innocent died Jan. 5, 1655. His pontificate covers a period of deep degeneracy in the Church, marked by a commingling of things profane and sacred, and by the domination of parasites and mistresses, the Church all the while contending for her ancient prerogatives in all their fulness. See ROSSTENSCHER: Hist. Innoc. X., Wittenberg, 1674; and RANKE: Hist. of the Popes.

INNOCENT XI. (Benedetto Odeschalchi), Pope 1676-89. He was b. at Como, May 16, 1611; educated by the Jesuits; and studied law at Genoa, Naples, and Rome. After having distinguished himself for his integrity and ability in various high positions, he was created cardinal (1647) through the influence of Donna Olimpia, and subsequently nominated legate of Ferrara, and Bishop of Novara. He owed his elevation, Sept. 21, 1676, to the French party in the College of Cardinals. On his accession, he set about the furtherance of a stricter morality in Church and State. He rebuked by his example the prevailing extravagance, rigidly limiting his own expenses, and abolishing all cardinalships and benefices whose services could be dispensed with; revived the stringent laws regulating the examination of candidates for consecration; enjoined upon the clergy the leading of holy lives, the catechising of the children, and the opening of schools for their instruction; forbade the use of dialectic sophistries and fables in the pulpit, bidding the priest proclaim only the crucified Christ; dismissed the eunuchs from the papal chapel; interdicted the luxurious habits of dress prevalent amongst the women, forbidding them the study of music; condemned the morality of the Jesuits in his bull March 2, 1679; and came into collision with France on account of the so-called "Privilege of Asylum" claimed by foreign ambassadors for criminals, not only within their palaces, but also in the precincts adjacent. This privilege Louis XIV. would not consent to have abrogated; and his ambassador De Lavardin, who entered Rome with a retinue of a thousand soldiers and servants, was accordingly put under the ban. Neither party would yield, and the question remained open until after the death of the Pope. It was finally settled in his favor. The so-called "Regal Right" was another apple of discord between the Pope and the French king. Louis had insisted upon appropriating the revenues of certain vacant churches and benefices, even in cases where they had not been planted by the crown. This attempt was resisted by the bishops; and the Pope sustained them, even to the extent of threatening the king with the extreme censure of the Church. As a countermove, the latter called a council of the French clergy (Nov. 9, 1681), who not only confirmed the disputed claims of the throne, but made a solemn deliverance consisting of four fundamental propositions (Quatuor propositiones Cleri Gallicani). A copy of these, by order of the Pope, was openly burnt at the hands of the public executioner, and confirmation refused to all such as were nominated to livings. In consequence, at his death, the bishops of no less than thirty dioceses were without papal consecration. Though the cruel persecution of the Jesuits, and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, by the French king, subsequently drew from the Pope the very highest commendation of the king, he never, to the day of his death, halted in his opposition to the so-called "Regal Right, or Freedom of Quarters." Innocent died Aug. 12, 1689. The French king and the Jesuits alike sought to blacken his memory after death; and his canonization, urged by Philip II., encountered opposition chiefly from these quarters. Without doubt he was an ecclesiastical prince of pure and noble virtues, and one of the most illustrious men that had ever filled the chair of St. Peter. He was compelled by the Inquisition to condemn, by a bull, the writings of Molinos (Nov. 20, 1687), although he was very friendly to Molinos. The efforts of James II. to convert England to Catholicism were, by Innocent, not only considered rash, but as calculated to increase the power of the king and lead to an alliance with France, rather than to advance the Church. The fall of James was therefore not mourned; and his plea for the papal help was answered by a cool rejection, on the ground of the Pope's absorption in his struggle with France. See GÉRIN: Le pape Innocent XI. et la révolution anglaise de 1688, Paris, 1876 [also BIGELOW: Molinos the Quietist, N.Y., 1882, which gives, pp. 113-127, a translation of Innocent's bull, and MOLINOS].

INNOCENT XII. (Antonio Pignatelli), Pope 1691-1700, was chosen Feb. 12, 1691, after a five-months' conclave. Born March 13, 1615, he was in his seventy-seventh year when elected. He entered public life early. After holding many important offices, was made cardinal bishop of Faenza, and archbishop of Naples by Innocent XI., whose title he took, and whose example he strove to imitate. He had no sooner taken his seat than he set his face sternly against nepotism. The poor were his beneficiaries; the Lateran, his hospital. He declared it unlawful for any pope in the future to invest his relatives with any of the offices or revenues of the Church. He sought to reform cloister discipline and the lives of the secular clergy; interdicted the lottery; brought to a close the controversy with the French king, on the condition of limiting the exercise of "Regal Right" to vacant benefices lying within the territory of Old France. The Pope was several times involved in controversy with Leopold I. of Germany in reference to questions of precedence; but, through mutual concessions, these, as they arose, were amicably settled. Friendly relations with Charles II. of Spain were interrupted by a question concerning the Inquisition in Naples. Pending its solution, both king and pope died; the latter Sept. 27, 1700. In the controversy between Bossuet and Fénelon, the Pope decided for the former, condemning some twenty-three propositions, which he affected to find in Fénelon's writings, as contrary to good morals and sound doctrine. He bequeathed a large sum of money to a hospital which he had founded, and ordered that the money accruing from the sale of his personal effects should be given to the poor. His reputation is that of a just, charitable, unselfish, and beneficent man.

INNOCENT XIII. (Michel Angelo Conti), Pope 1721-24. He was born May 13, 1665. Alexander VIII. had made him a member of his court family, and Clement XI., cardinal. He was elected May 8, 1721, after a stormy session of the conclave, during which the cardinals came to blows, and inkstands were hurled. His accession was hailed as promising rest to the Church, and peace to Christendom. His nomination of his brother as cardinal aroused fears of nepotism, which, happily, proved groundless. Italy prospered under his reign. Like his predecessor, he espoused the cause of the Pretender to the British throne under the title of James III. Charles VI. of Germany he invested with the kingdom of Naples. He also wrested Castel Palo, on the Mediterranean, from its unwilling proprietor, and, under French influences, clothed a contemptible profligate with the office of cardinal. These two last acts are spots on a character otherwise fair. When Malta was invested by the Turks, after issuing a call to Christendom, he himself hastened to the rescue with men and money. He had serious thoughts of abolishing the order of the Jesuits on account of their opposition to the Chinese mission, and took under his protection the so-called "Constitutio Unigenitus," which had been wrung from his predecessor. His death occurred March 7, 1724.

INNOCENTS' DAY, a church festival in honor of the children slain by Herod in Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 16), and who thus were in a sense the first Christian martyrs. It was very early celebrated; for it is mentioned by Irenæus and Cyprian, at first, in connection with Epiphany. Later, in the Western Church, Innocents' Day came on Dec. 28; in the Eastern Church, on Dec. 29. It is not known when the festivals were given different days. Peter of Ravenna (Chrysologus), a bishop of the fifth century, has left two sermons upon the Massacre of the Innocents, considered quite apart from the Epiphany; and the fact would seem to indicate that the separation was made in his day. At present, in the Roman, Anglican, and Episcopal churches, Innocents' Day is Dec. 28. The Roman priest celebrates the mass on this day in a blue gown. The Armeno-Gregorian calendar gives the number of infants slain by Herod at fourteen thousand: the true number was probably less than thirty.

INNS AMONG THE HEBREWS. In one sense of the term, inns did not exist in antiquity; but there were enclosures which afforded some protection, and in which there was a fountain. In later times there were built "khans," or "caravanserais," which are large square buildings containing rooms enclosing an open court (Jer. ix. 2). But no food for man or beast was provided, as the traveller was expected to carry it with him. In the parable of the Good Samaritan, mention is made (Luke x. 34) of another sort of caravanserai, which had a keeper, and where personal care, besides food, could be obtained. The "inn" to which Joseph and Mary went (Luke ii. 7) was probably a caravanserai. RÜETSCHL.

INQUISITION (Inquisitio hæreticæ pravitatis), or the "Holy Office" (Sanctum Officium), is the name of the spiritual court of the Roman-Catholic Church, for the detection and punishment of those whose opinions differed from the doctrines of the Church. It was the abnormal outgrowth of the ancient ecclesiastical discipline which charged the bishops with the duty of searching out the heresies in their dioceses, and stemming the progress of error. [The Church fathers treated all departures from the creed of the Church with great severity, and the early councils forbade all relations of the members of the Church with heretics.] From the reign of Constantine the Great the laws against heretics became more and more rigorous. [In 316 Constantine issued an edict condemning the Donatists to the loss of their goods.] But the first Christian emperor to pronounce the sentence of death against them was Theodosius, who, in 382, condemned the Manichæans. Eminent Church fathers, however, like Chrysostom (Homil. 29, 46, in Matth.) and Augustine (Ep. 93 ad Vicentium, etc.), pronounced against the death penalty; but Jerome (Ep. 37 ad Riparium) found a justification of it in Deut. xiii. 6 sqq., and Leo the Great openly advocated it (Ep. 15 ad Turribrium). The civil arm executed the penalty, but bishops and clergy were often lukewarm in searching out heresies. The see of Rome was not content with decrees of councils, or the capitularies of Charlemagne commanding the bishops to check error, and gave full powers into the hands of legates, who, backed by the edicts of councils (Toulouse, 1119; Oxford, 1160; Tours, 1163; the Third Lateran, 1179; Verona, 1184), relentlessly pursued the Cathari and the Poor Men of Lyons in Southern France, and the Catari in Northern Italy. Finally it was Innocent III. [1198-1216] who developed the organization for the detection and punishment of heretics which for several centuries conducted the Inquisition, in the technical sense of the term. By the Fourth Lateran Council every bishop was instructed to visit his see in person, or to appoint visitors of irreproachable character to do it, and, where the exigencies of the case demanded it, to take an oath of the inhabitants to inform against heretics, and to reveal their places of meeting. The refusal to take the oath was regarded as an evidence of heresy.

The measures of Innocent III. were revised by the Council of Toulouse (1229). It passed forty-five articles, instructing the bishops to bind by an oath a priest in every parish, and two or more laymen, to search out and apprehend heretics and those who sheltered them. Heresy was to be punished with the loss of property, and the house in which a heretic was found was to be burned. Heretics who repented were to wear two crosses, — one on their back, and one on their chest. But if the repentance seemed to be a result of the fear of death, the guilty person was to be shut up in a convent. Every two years, males from fourteen years upwards, and females from twelve years upwards, were obligated to repeat an oath to inform against heretics. The neglect of the annual confession was a sufficient ground of suspicion, as also the possession by laymen of the Scriptures, especially in translations. In spite of these measures and the rigorous execution of them, especially in Southern France, the desired result was not secured. The bishops were accused of apathy, and were themselves made subject to the Inquisition by the papal chair. In 1232 and 1233 Gregory IX. appointed the Dominicans a standing commission of inquisitors in Austria, Germany, Aragon, Lombardy, and Southern France. At the same period was organized the so-called "soldiery of Jesus Christ against heretics." Louis the Pious, in his famous edict of 1228 (ad cives Narbonnæ) made it the special duty of the civil power to root out heresy, and to punish without delay those who were condemned. The suspicion of heresy was made a sufficient ground for apprehension; and, by a bull of Innocent IV., in 1252 (ad exstirpanda), resort was to be had, if necessary, to torture, to extract a confession.

The notion of heresy was enlarged so as to comprehend not only the slightest deviation from the creed of the Church, but also usury, sorcery, contempt of the cross and clergy, dealings with Jews, etc. [The case of Galileo Galilei shows how heresy was understood. This distinguished astronomer (b. Pisa, Feb. 18, 1564; d. in the Villa Martellini, at Arceti, near Florence, Jan. 8, 1642) was tried by the Inquisition in Rome (June 21, 1633). The charge against him was, that he held the Copernican theory, and had written in advocacy of its doctrines condemned in the decree of 1616; viz., that the sun is fixed in the centre of the world, and that the earth rotates. In reply, he said, that, since the Congregation of the Index had condemned it, he had not held the Copernican theory. The published documents of the trial do not sustain the charge that he was tortured. He made public recantation the next day. The famous legend, that, on rising from his knees after his recantation, he exclaimed, "E pur si muove!" ("And yet it does move!") seems to have no adequate foundation. See WOHLWILL: Ist Galilei gefoltert worden? (Leipzig, 1877); GEBLER: Galileo (Stuttgart, 1876, 77, 2 vols.); DE L'ÉPINOIS: Les pièces du procès de Galilée (Rome, 1877); REUSCH: D. Prozess Galileis u. d. Jesuiten (Bonn, 1879)]. The punishments were loss of civil and ecclesiastical privileges; rigorous confinement; and death, either by a simple execution, or by incarceration and the flames, often preceded by cruel tortures. The property of the condemned party fell to the Inquisition, from whose sentence there was no appeal.

The people in many places rose up against the inquisitors, as in Albi, and Narbonne (1234), and Toulouse; and in France, where the Inquisition had first been put in force, it was first abolished. In Germany, the Dominican Konrad Droso, and especially Konrad of Marburg (1231-33), were the most active agents of the Inquisition; but both were murdered, the latter at Marburg. The Emperor Frederick II., as a means of clearing himself of the charge of heresy, issued from Ravenna, in 1232, orders for carrying out the regulations of the Inquisition; but so determined was the resistance of the people, that its power was felt only in a few rare cases in the century that followed. About the middle of the fourteenth century, Urban appointed inquisitors to proceed against the Beghards in Constance, Speier, Erfurt, and Magdeburg. In 1372 Gregory XI. placed the number at five for all Germany, and in 1399 Boniface IX. appointed six for Northern Germany alone. Many were put to death, even during the progress of the Reformation, in consequence of the famous Malleus maleficarum ("The Witches' Hammer," Cologne, 1489), which was put forth by the Pope at the instance of two inquisitors (Heinrich Kramers and Jacob Sprenger). The Jesuits sought to restore the Inquisition in Bavaria (1599), and during the Thirty-Years' War it found an occasional victim; but Maria Theresa abolished it in her kingdom, and it soon afterwards disappeared in Germany.

The Inquisition had no hold in England, Sweden, Norway, or Denmark; but in Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands it enjoyed a luxuriant growth. In the thirteenth century it was introduced into Aragon against the Moors and Jews. Nicolaus Eymericus (d. 1399) was inquisitor-general for forty-four years, and wrote the Inquisitor's Manual (Directorium Inquisitorum), which states with appalling distinctness the rules regulating the methods of procedure. They were first put into full practice by Cardinal Ximenes, at the union of Castile and Aragon by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella. Hefele, in his Life of Ximenes, and in the art. Inquisition, in Wetzer and Welte, has shown that the methods of the Inquisition were in some respects less cruel than those of the criminal courts of the day; but he fails to prove that the Spanish Inquisition originated with the State rather than with the Church. The one to give complete organization to the movement in Spain was the bloody Domingo de Torquemada, who [in 1483] was appointed inquisitor-general. His associates received the most definite instructions, and surrounded themselves with spies, the so-called "Familiars of the Holy Office." The most noble in the land offered themselves for this service in order to secure their own persons. The terror which the horrible punishments of the Inquisition produced was the occasion of revolts and occasional assassinations of the inquisitors; but it continued to rage, the king himself using it to extend his authority, and fill his treasury. In 1492 all the Jews who refused to become Christians were compelled to emigrate; and a similar edict was passed upon the Moors under Torquemada's successor, Diego Deza (1499-1506). Under the third inquisitor-general, Ximenes (1507-17), according to Llorente, 2,536 were put to death, 1,368 burned in effigy, and 47,263 punished in other ways. Each tribunal consisted of three inquisitors, besides assessors, secretaries, familiars, and other officers. The place of meeting was called the "holy house" (casa santa). If the accused appeared, he was carefully examined, and placed in a dark prison. His head was shorn; his property, especially his books, inventoried; his income usually confiscated; and so terrible was the fear the tribunal inspired, that not even the accused's nearest friends dared to appear in his defence. Immediate avowal and renunciation of heresy secured to the party immunity from the sentence of death, but seldom averted the loss of property and confinement. In spite of his renunciation, the accused was obliged, for a certain period, to wear the San benito (a shirt without sleeves, and bearing a red St. Andrew's cross on the back and on the breast). On the other hand, the denial of the charge of heresy seldom secured the release of the prisoner; and extreme tortures were applied to extort a confession. If these failed, artifice was used to entrap the accused; and, where all means were exhausted, the victim was put to death at once, or condemned to a miserable life in prison. The sentence of death was enforced by the civil arm, and the accused was usually burnt alive. He was taken, in a solemn procession, to the public square, where the Auto da fé (act of faith) was consummated.

Under Charles I. the Cortes sought for a modification of the laws of the Inquisition; but under Philip II. the flames burned brightly again, at first in Seville and Valladolid (1559 sq.). But by the end of the seventeenth century all vestiges of the Reformation were effaced, and the activity of the Inquisition became limited to the destruction of prohibited books, of which an Index had been prepared in 1558. Under Charles III., in 1770, an edict was passed, securing an accused party from arbitrary imprisonment; and other regulations were passed, curtailing the powers of the Inquisition, until, in 1808, Joseph Napoleon abolished it entirely. In 1814 Ferdinand VII. restored it; but the popular rage in 1820 destroyed the inquisitor's palace at Madrid, and the Cortes again abolished it. But in 1825, by the efforts of the clergy, another inquisitorial commission was appointed. It continued till 1834, when it was finally abolished, and its property applied to the payment of the public debt. But it may be a long while before the country will revive from the effects of the court, which, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, extinguished her active literary life, and placed this nation, so richly endowed, almost outside of the circle of European civilization. Spain, it is true, remained free from heresies and religious wars; but her rest was the rest of the grave, so far as religious vitality was concerned.

The fortunes of the Inquisition in Portugal were similar to those which it had in Spain. In the reign of John VI. (1818-26) it was finally abolished. The last relics of the Italian Inquisition disappeared at the unification of the nation. The Congregation of the Inquisition at Rome, appointed by Sixtus V. in 1587, is all that remains of it. In its day it likewise had crushed out the Reformation, and had raged the most fearfully in Venice; but there its activity seems to have ceased in 1781, and in 1808 Napoleon abolished it. Restored under Pius VII. in 1814, it directed its energies to prevent the diffusion of the Italian Bible, and to check the introduction of evangelical truth. In the Netherlands, where the Inquisition was first introduced in the thirteenth century, it became a terrible weapon in the time of the Reformation. In 1521 Charles V. passed a rigorous edict against heretics, and appointed Franz van der Hulst inquisitor-general. In 1525 three inquisitors-general were appointed, in 1537 the number was increased to four, and in 1545 one was appointed for each of the provinces. According to Grotius, a hundred thousand victims died under Charles V.; according to the Prince of Orange, fifty thousand. Both computations are probably too large. Under Philip II. the inquisitors developed the most zeal; and the Duke of Alva, in 1567, appointed the Bloody Council, which proceeded with unheard-of cruelty against those whose wealth excited their avarice, or whose heresy aroused their suspicion. In 1573 Alva was recalled; and three years later the provinces concluded the League of Ghent, whose fifth article abolished the edicts against heresy.

INSPIRATION designates the influence of the Holy Ghost upon the writers of the Scriptures, by which they have become the expression of God's will to us. The term comes from the Vulgate translation of 2 Tim. iii. 16: Omnis scriptura divinitus inspirata ("All scripture divinely inspired"). The Greek word θεόπνευστος, of which "inspired" is the translation, does not occur in classical or profane Greek, — its occurrence in Plutarch (De placit. phil. 5, 2) being in all probability an error of the copyist, — but seems to have been used for the first time, in writing, in 2 Tim. iii. 16. The word sometimes had the passive meaning of "endowed with God's Spirit" (Sibyll. 5, 406; Vita Sabæ, 16); but here, after the analogy of ἀπνευστος ("breathing ill"), etc., the meaning seems to be "breathing the divine Spirit," and not, with the Vulgate, "given by the divine Spirit." The latter interpretation has in its favor that the word has that meaning when joined with ἄνθρωπος ("man"); but the former suits better with the context "profitable for instruction," etc. (v. 15), and the usual mode of speaking of the Scripture as the word of the Holy Ghost (Acts xxviii. 25, etc.). Origen seems to have understood it in this sense when he said the "holy volumes breathe the fulness of the Spirit" (sacra volumina spiritus plenitudinem spirant, Hom. 21 in Jerem.). The Peshito, on the other hand, and the Ethiopic versions, understand it as meaning "inspired by God," the former translating it, "Every scripture which is written in the Spirit" (ἐν πνεύματι).

tion. The earliest views on inspiration in the Church leaned upon the Alexandrian theology much more than upon the Jewish. The Talmudic and Alexandrian Judaism agreed in ascribing a peculiar authority to the Old Testament. The former held that the Thorah, or Law, was of immediate divine origin. God wrote it with his own hand, or dictated it to Moses as his amanuensis. Although some teachers were inclined to regard Joshua as the author of the account of Moses' death (Deut. xxxiv. 5), others held that Moses was the author, and wrote it with tears. The other writers of the Old Testament were not inspired in the same degree; and the Jewish theologians of the middle ages taught that the prophetic books were written by the spirit of prophecy, and the Hagiographa by the spirit of holiness, and that the writers of the latter exercised their individuality to a larger extent than the former. Josephus held that the canonical books were all written before the close of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, 425 B.C. (c. Ap. 1, 8); but both he and Philo speak of a continuance of the gift of prophecy, the latter ascribing it to every pious and wise man. All the writers of the Old Testament were prophets, and, as such, interpreters of the divine will, and unconscious of what they spoke. They were in an ecstatic condition, or trance (θεοφόρητος μανία), both when they spoke and wrote, and were simply the passive organs of the Spirit of God.

The Scriptures recognize an ecstatic condition; but it is something different from the ecstasy of Philo, except, perhaps, in the case of Balaam, who prophesied against his will. It is not, as Augustine has rightly said, a suspension of the mental faculties (alienatio a mente), but an "alienation of the mind from physical sense-perception" (alienatio mentis a sensibus corporis). The Hellenistic or Philonic theory, therefore, was not derived either from Scripture or from Jewish theology proper, but rather from heathen sources. Heathenism alone knew of an ecstasy (θεοφόρητος μανία), as Philo defined it. He got it, undoubtedly, from Plato, who regarded a divine enthusiasm (ἐνθουσιασμός) or ecstasy as the primal fount of philosophy where the inspiration was drawn, but differed from Plato in holding that the individual consciousness was entirely lost.

These are the views we meet with in the writings of the early Church. The apostolic fathers presupposed the fact of inspiration; but the apologetic writers of the second century, such as Justin Martyr (Coh. ad Græc. 8, 10; Apol. I. 36) and Athenagoras (Leg. 9, 42), emphasized the divine origin of the Scriptures, and give the impression that they held not merely to the mechanical, but to the mantic theory. This view was advocated by the Montanists; and it is to the opposition of the Church to them that we are indebted for the prevalence of sounder views of inspiration. Miltiades, an apologetic writer, wrote a work against Montanism, opposing the view that the prophets spoke in an ecstatic condition, or trance (περὶ τοῦ μὴ δεῖν προφήτην ἐν ἐκστασει λαλεῖν, Euseb., H. E., 5, 17); and Clement of Alexandria regarded such a condition as an evidence of false prophets and an evil spirit (Strom. 1, 311). After Origen, the Church teachers emphatically denied that the prophets were in a state of unconsciousness when they spoke. They did not limit the influence of the Holy Spirit upon the biblical authors, but admitted their independence, to which more than form and style are attributed. But they did not attempt to reconcile the divine and human factors; and both Irenæus (Adv. hæc. III. 16, 2) and Augustine (De cons. evv. II., 12), while speaking of the apostles as writing down what they remembered, at the same time compared them to the hands which wrote down what Christ dictated. Jerome discovers solecisms in Scripture (Ep. ad Eph. II. ad 3, 1); and Origen goes farther, when he distinguishes between the contents of Scripture, which are always true, and its language, in which the writers, who carefully elaborated their style, sometimes made mistakes. Origen gave more attention to the discussion of the nature of inspiration than any of the other fathers; and, according to him, it included an elevated activity of the human faculties and the activity of the Spirit calling the former forth. In the Church of Antioch the human side was made prominent; and Theodore of Mopsuestia held that Job was a poem which had sprung up on heathen soil: but in the Western Church the councils, as well as the Church itself, came to be regarded as being in a certain sense inspired. At a later period, when Agobard of Lyons (d. 840) affirmed that the biblical writers did not always observe the laws of grammar, the abbot Fredegis of Tours went so far in his reply as to say that the Holy Ghost formed the very words themselves in the ears of the apostles (etiam ipsa corporalia verba extrinsecus in ore apostolorum).

Scholasticism manifested no special interest in the doctrine of inspiration, although Anselm laid awake many nights, meditating how the prophets could look upon the future as though it were the present; and Thomas of Aquinas made a distinction between revelation and inspiration. The latter recognized different grades of inspiration among the prophets of the Old Testament; so that David knew more than Moses. The principle was, that, the nearer they lived to the advent of Christ, the greater was their illumination. The Holy Spirit used the tongue of the speaker, but did not destroy his independent activity. The authority of the Scriptures was universally acknowledged; and only Abelard thought of asserting that the prophets and apostles were not always free from error, quoting Gal. ii. 11 sqq. in support of the assertion.

The Reformation emphasized the authority, and encouraged the use, of the Scriptures. No one thought of denying their authority. The only question was as to their meaning and application. This explains the absence of all discussion of the nature of inspiration by the Reformers. Luther, on the one hand, regarded the Bible as a book on "a letter or title of which more hung than upon heaven and earth," but, on the other hand, speaks of it as containing hay, straw, and stubble, of an insufficiency in Paul's argument (Gal. iv. 22 sqq.), etc. He regarded the Holy Spirit as the author of Scripture, but recognized the writers by their peculiar characteristics, and asserts that they poured out their whole heart into their words. Calvin held the same views. In the Scriptures we hear, as it were, the very voice of God; but he does not shrink from speaking of inaccuracies (as in Matt. xxvii. 9). The Confessions emphasized the supreme authority of Scripture; but did not investigate the nature of inspiration; nor did Gerhard (d. 1637), even in his rich chapter De script. sacra. Calovius was the author of the theory which is usually denominated the Orthodox Protestant theory. According to him, inspiration is the form which revelation assumes, and nothing exists in the Scriptures which was not divinely suggested and inspired (divinitus suggestum et inspiratum). Quenstedt, Baier, Hollaz, and others followed, affirming that the writers were dependent upon the Spirit for their very words, and denying that there were any solecisms in the New Testament. The Buxtorfs extended inspiration to the vowel-points of the Old Testament. This view was adopted in the Formula Cons. Helv., and Gisbert Voëtius extended inspiration to the very punctuation. This doctrine was an absolute novelty. The Pietists, especially Spener, in the interest of the direct influence of the Holy Spirit upon the heart, denied that the biblical writers were absolutely passive. The theology of the Church gradually assumed a more liberal form, and the divine contents of the Bible were sought for in vain by the rationalists; while the supernaturalists, lowering the theory of inspiration to that of a divine superintendency, held that only to be inspired which the ordinary reason could not discover.

The more recent development of the doctrine of inspiration has proceeded, in part, upon the principles of Schleiermacher, and in part upon those of the school of Bengel. The former, pursuing an original treatment, ascribed inspiration to the spirit pervading the Church (Gemeingeist der Kirche), and made it to consist of two essential elements — a receptivity and an activity — awakened by Christ. It therefore extends, not only to the writings, but to the entire activity, of the apostles. The Old Testament proceeded from the spirit of the Israelitish Church, and therefore has not the dignity of the New Testament. He laid the principal stress upon the human factors in the composition, who are, by reason of their relation to Christ, the accredited and trustworthy witnesses of Christian truth. The spirit which controls them is not the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity. Far as he departed from the theory of inspiration which prevailed in the seventeenth century, it is Schleiermacher's merit to have emphasized the human element in the composition of the Scriptures. Twisten renewed the supernatural theory of the seventeenth century, without its exaggerations; and Beck regarded it as an essential element in the "organism of Revelation," and not to be confounded with revelation. Both he and Philippi conceived of it as illumination; the latter defining it as "that influence of the Spirit by which the mind is wholly transferred into the sphere of revelation, and is fitted to report the special subject exactly, or as that communion of the human mind with the mind of the Spirit by which the revelation of the latter becomes, without adulteration, the thought of the former." Rothe defined inspiration as the momentary condition of the soul by which it is enabled to understand and to infallibly interpret revelation. The inspiration of the apostles was only the increased measure of the Spirit indwelling in them, and the Scriptures are simply the outflowing of the divine life of their authors.

As we said at the beginning, inspiration means something different from the Greek θεόπνευστος ("breathing the divine Spirit"). It refers to the origination, the latter to the contents, of the Bible. But, if the Bible breathes the Spirit of God, then it must have received this characteristic from God. If it breathes his Spirit in a peculiar manner, then it must have received it in a peculiar way. We are therefore justified in speaking of a special influence of the Spirit upon the authors of the Scriptures. For this idea the Church has coined the term "inspiration." The first question is, whether the Scriptures do really breathe the Holy Spirit in a peculiar manner. This is a matter of experience (an experience of faith), just as God's nature is a matter of experience; but this experience must be of the nature of a universal one for all religiously disposed persons, and such we find it to be. It is and has been the experience of the Church with reference to the Scriptures as a whole; and the Church has regarded them as the infallible standard of a religious life, and the absolutely pure spring of all religious convictions derived from them. The Scriptures, however, contain the revelation of salvation: their authors, therefore, must have stood in peculiar relations to the Holy Spirit. Of what nature this relation was can only be ascertained from the history of salvation as it is found in the Scriptures themselves. This relation varies at different times, and is modified by the relative nearness of the parties to God. The distinction between the inspiration of the Old and New Testaments is brought out by the words used in the two cases. It is uniformly said of the prophets, that the "word of the Lord came to," or the "word of the Lord which . . . saw" (Isa. ii. 1; Amos i. 1, etc.). In the New Testament the word of the Lord was revealed through Christ (Acts x. 36; Rom. x. 5-8; Tit. i. 3, etc.). Here, in order to apprehend the revelation of God in Christ, only a relation of faith to Christ is necessary (Luke x. 24; 1 Pet. i. 10; Matt. xi. 25, xvi. 17). The preparation to be a witness for Christ is a fruit of a personal relation to him (Matt. x. 27; John xv. 15).

The attestation of the gospel is conditioned upon the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the witness; but it is a special calling, and, like every ecclesiastical service, requires a special preparation by the Holy Spirit. Every one who is regenerated is not inspired, but every one who is inspired is regenerated. Inspiration, therefore, is the charism which fitted the apostles, in spite of their personal imperfections (comp. Gal. ii. with 1 Cor. ix. 16 sqq.), to announce authoritatively, and for all time, the facts of salvation and their meaning. If a special preparation was necessary under the new dispensation, much more so was it under the old. Here the influence of inspiration might be exerted upon persons in whom the Spirit did not dwell as a vital and constant principle. Again: the inspiration, at least of the prophets, was a temporary endowment; that of the apostles, an abiding one; and the former suffered from the same defects of spiritual experience as their contemporaries (John vii. 39; 1 Pet. i. 10, 11). Under the old covenant the writers had to be prepared to interpret the meaning of history with reference to salvation. The knowledge of historical facts they got in the usual way; and if it be true that the preparation of the Spirit extended only to the interpretation, and not to the acquisition, of historical facts, then we can easily explain their divergences in matters of chronological sequence, the attendant circumstances, etc.

The activity of the Holy Spirit is, therefore, neither limited nor made impossible by the independence and peculiarities of the biblical writers, as was thought in the seventeenth century, but made possible and advanced by it. Inspiration is the very opposite of a suspension of human independence. It rather confirms and sanctifies it. The gift of inspiration does not stand out of relation to the facts of Christian experience, but belongs among the charisms of the Church; was a preparation for giving the testimony of the gospel, and not merely for writing the Scriptures; and was confined to the earliest period of the Church.

HERMANN CREMER.

In view of the great importance of the subject discussed in this article, it is desirable, without repeating what has already been said, to bring out some of its aspects a little more sharply, and to emphasize some further considerations. In general, it may be said that the theory of the mode and degree (as distinct from the fact) of inspiration, although of great importance, is "not fundamental to the truth of Christianity" (Professor A. A. HODGE: Presb. Rev. for 1881, p. 227).

I. Inspiration and the Canon. — Our present canon does not necessarily measure the extent of inspiration. Both must be determined by the same process, upon the basis of the contents of the books, the statements of their authors, their relation to Christ (in the New Testament), and the judgment of the Church. It is evident that a book belonging to our present canon may not be inspired. Seven books of the New Testament were disputed in the Church of the first four centuries, and are hence called Antilegomena by Eusebius, as distinct from the Homologumena, which were universally accepted as canonical. The Roman-Catholic canon of the Old Testament still includes the Apocrypha, which are rejected by Protestants. Luther doubted the inspiration of Esther (see art.), and held an unfavorable view of the Epistle of James and the Apocalypse. Calvin expressed doubts about 2 Peter. The Bible is an organism; and, though to one part inspiration be denied, the inspiration of the whole is not thereby of necessity affected. The question of the inspiration of the Gospel of John, for example, may be independent of the proof that the Books of the Chronicles are inspired.

II. Theories. — Canon Farrar (Bible Educator) has grouped the theories of inspiration held in the Christian Church under five heads. Morell, Westcott, A. S. Farrar (Crit. Hist. of Free Thought, p. 475 sqq.), Dorner, and others include all the views under two heads, — the mechanical ("docetic," Dorner) and the dynamical. Against this division is the serious objection, that under the former head are placed all who hold to verbal inspiration; while many of the advocates of this view (Dr. Charles Hodge, Shedd, etc.) expressly deny that the writers of the Scriptures forfeited their individuality, and became mere machines. The most popular distinction is that of plenary and partial, or verbal and partial. These terms are apt to be misleading, unless it is carefully borne in mind to what the inspiration is applied. One, for example, may hold to the plenary inspiration of the authors, and yet deny the verbal inspiration of their writings. The following classification will represent the different views: —

1. The writers of Scripture had the immediate influence of the Spirit to such an extent, that they could not err in any point. Every statement of Scripture is accurate and infallible. "Inspiration extends to all the contents of the several books, whether religious, scientific, historical, or geographical" (CHARLES HODGE: Theology, i. p. 163). "They were preserved from error of fact, doctrine, and judgment" (PATTON: Inspiration, p. 92). In the seventeenth century this view was held in such a way, that inspiration became synonymous with dictation, and the writers were compared to pens (calami Spiritus S. dictantis), or to a flute (Carpzov, Quenstedt, etc.). Others, while denying this mechanical view, hold to the plenary verbal inspiration theory (Gausson, Dr. Charles Hodge, Shedd, Patton, Given, etc.). The very words are the words of the Spirit, because "the thoughts are in the words, and the two are inseparable" (HODGE: Theol., i. p. 164). Inspiration has also been described as an influence of superintendence. This word, first used by Doddridge in this connection, has recently been made prominent by Drs. Hodge and Warfield (Presb. Rev.), who say, "The essence of inspiration was superintendence" (p. 226). "The Holy Spirit elevated and directed the faculties of the writers, when need be, and thus secured the errorless expression in language of the thought designed by God" (p. 231). They admit, however, that there may be errors in Scripture as we now possess it, and assert infallibility "only for the original autographic text" (p. 245).

This class of views has in its favor (1) the difficulty of conceiving how the thought could be suggested by the Spirit without the language; and (2) the support it gives to the authority of the Scripture as a system of truth and a guide of action. Against this class of views the following objections are urged: (1) It is hard, on this general theory, to account for the individual peculiarities of the writings. The style of Milton in Paradise Lost is the same, whether he dictates to one daughter or to another. But in the Scriptures there is a marked difference between the style of Hosea and Isaiah, John and Paul, although the same Spirit suggested the language of each. It is urged, however, that the Spirit accommodated himself to the peculiarities of the writers. (2) There are differences of statement in the Scriptures concerning the same facts. To instance a single case, Paul says twenty-three thousand died in the plague (1 Cor. x. 8) in which Moses reports twenty-four thousand to have died (Num. xxv. 9). (3) It is hard to explain the divergences (not contradictions) in the Gospels when the narratives refer to the same facts or to the same discourses of our Lord. Compare, for example, the four forms in which the superscription on the cross is given, or the words of our Lord to the disciples on the lake. Matthew (viii. 25-27) reports the latter as, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" Mark (iv. 39-41), "Why are ye fearful? have ye not yet faith?" The force of this consideration led Osiander (Harm. Evv., Basel, 1537), who held a high theory of inspiration, to assume that Peter's wife's mother was healed of the fever three times! (4) It is very difficult to understand why the New-Testament writers usually quote the Septuagint translation, and not the original Hebrew of the Old Testament (comp. Acts. ii. 16-21, etc.). In many cases the divergence from the Hebrew text is great; as in the quotation which James made at the Council of Jerusalem, in other passages of the Acts, and in many passages of the Epistle to the Hebrews (which always quotes from the Septuagint). (5) The autographs of the sacred writers are lost. For the Hebrew Scriptures we have to depend upon Jewish manuscripts not older than the eighth century. In the Greek New Testament we have an ever increasing number of variations (now exceeding a hundred thousand), which, indeed, do not affect any doctrine or precept, yet seem to be inconsistent with this theory; for, if a literal inspiration were necessary for the Church, God (so we should expect) would have provided for the errorless preservation of the original text. Moreover, the great mass of Christians has to depend upon vernacular translations, for none of which infallible accuracy is claimed.

2. The second general theory of inspiration is, that the writers of Scripture enjoyed the influence of the Spirit to such an extent, that it is the Word, and contains the will, of God. This view is the prevailing view to-day, and has been held by Luther, Calvin, Baxter, Doddridge, Wm. Lowth, Baumgarten, Neander, Tholuck, Stier, Lange, Hare, Alford, Van Oosterzee, Plumptre (Com. on Acts, ch. vii.), F. W. Farrar, Dörner, etc. It admits mistakes (or at least the possibility of mistakes) in historical and geographical statements, but denies any error in matters of faith or morals. Baxter said, "We may doubt some of the words of the Old Testament and circumstances of the New, and yet have no reason to doubt the Christian religion" (Cat. of Families). Our conviction of the truth of Scripture "is not shattered, if the holy men could err in things about which it was not necessary to receive certainty, and certainty in regard to which is unimportant from a religious point of view. It is sufficient that they received unadulterated, and present without error, the infallible spiritual truth, to witness which to mankind they were appointed," etc. (DÖRNER: Glaubenslehre, i. 635). This view lays stress upon the sense of Scripture as a revelation of God's will, and leaves room for the full play of human agency in the composition. It preserves the spiritual marrow, and does not imperil the whole by an appeal to our ignorance to explain unessential variations.

This theory (1) admits of the highest respect for the Scriptures as the Word of God. Luther accused Paul in one instance of false logic, and spoke disparagingly of Esther; but no one has ever magnified Paul or the Scriptures more than he. The fine word of Athanasius (ad Marc.) would still hold, ἔστι γὰρ ἐν τοῖς τῶν γραφῶν ῥήμασιν ὁ κύριος ("The Lord is in the words of Scripture"). (2) It helps us to understand the divergences in the accounts of our Lord's life, and the inconsistencies in historical statement of different parts of the Bible. An instance is found, in the report of Stephen's speech, where it is stated that "Abraham purchased the field from the sons of Hamor in Shechem" (Acts vii. 16). In Genesis, Jacob is reported to have purchased the field. (3) This theory is more in accordance with the method of the Spirit's working in general. The apostles were not perfect in their conduct and judgment as rulers and teachers of the Church (Acts xv. 39; xxiii. 3; Gal. ii. 12; 1 Cor. xiii. 12; Phil. iii. 12). The grace of God was in them as earthen vessels. The same may be said of the Scriptures. They are a human vase in which the divine revelation is contained. They are God's book, and yet man's composition; and the subtle inter-relation of the human and divine elements is as difficult of explanation as that of God and man in the work of salvation (Phil. ii. 12, 13), or that of the soul and the body. (4) It removes a hinderance out of the way of many who would gladly believe the Bible to contain the word of God, if it were not necessary to give their assent to all its historical statements. (See excellent remarks by Morell, p. 169.) Many can believe the discourses of our Lord in John (xii. sqq.) to be divine who cannot so regard the list of the Dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 15-43), or all the tables of the Books of Chronicles, or the exact number killed for looking into the ark, — 50,070 (1 Sam. vi. 19). It may be said that we would thus be embarrassed to know what is and what is not inspired. The objection is to some extent well founded; but in this case, as in men's individual relations to Christ, they are left to exercise their judgment, guided by the Holy Spirit. (5) This view makes the absence of an absolutely pure text intelligible. The autographs of the apostles do not exist; and we may speak reverently in saying that this might have been expected, if the letter of Scripture were the work of the Spirit.

III. Proofs of Inspiration.—The passage "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" (2 Tim. iii. 16) is often quoted as a proof of the inspiration of all the canonical books. The meaning of the term θεόπνευστος has been discussed above. Here it is sufficient to say that the passage has reference to the books of the Old Testament, and that the translation making it a dogmatic statement is probably incorrect. The Revised Version gives the true rendering: "Every scripture inspired of God is," etc. The proofs of inspiration are as follows: (1) The statements of Scripture itself. In the Old Testament the authors testify to the divine origin of their message by such expressions as the "word of the Lord came," or the "Lord spake by his servant." The prophets were specially called (Jer. i. 9, etc.). The inspiration of the writers of the Old Testament is also proved by the terms applied to their writings in the New Testament (Rom. i. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 16, etc.), the explicit statements of our Lord (Matt. iv. 4, xxii. 29; Luke x. 26) and his apostles (Heb. i. 2), their frequent quotations from it, and our Lord's proof of his claims from its utterances (John v. 39; Luke xxiv. 27, etc.). The inspiration of the New Testament is likewise proved by its own testimony, the apostles insisting upon the infallibility of their words (1 Cor. ii.

13; 1 Thess. ii. 13; 2 Thess. ii. 13), and by the Lord's promise to them of a special endowment of the Spirit (John xiv. 26, xvi. 13; comp. 1 Cor. vii. 40, etc.), and a supernatural supply of wisdom and words (Matt. x. 20; Luke xxi. 15). Christ, it is true, did not appoint scribes; but he appointed witnesses, and promised to them a miraculous presence and power. (2) The nature of the contents. The inherent excellences of Scripture (as in the case of the person of Christ) are sufficient witnesses to its heavenly origin. The unity of the book, unfolding a single purpose; its elevated tone; the faultless character of Christ; the nature of the facts revealed of God, the soul, and the future, — all stamp it as a work of more than ordinary human genius or insight. This testimony is, for most minds, the strongest of all. It is the testimony of the Holy Spirit in the experience. "The more familiar," says Doddridge, "one becomes with these books, the more will one be struck with this evidence;" and Van Oosterzee well says, "He who will acknowledge in Scripture no higher than a purely human character comes into collision, not only with our Lord's word and that of his witnesses, but also with the Christian consciousness of all ages," etc. (Dogmatics, p. 199). (3) The à priori proof. This argument is hardly less strong than the previous ones, for minds which hold that God has given to men a revelation of his will. If God has made such a revelation, he would make special provision for its infallible communication.

INSPIRED, The, is the name of a sect which was formed in Germany about 1700, under the influence of the prophets of the Camisards. Driven out of France, those enthusiasts went first to England, then to the Netherlands, and finally to Germany, where they found many adherents, not only among the French refugés, but soon also among the natives. Congregations were formed in Halle (1713) and Berlin (1714); and a number of German prophets arose, the most prominent among whom were E. L. Gruber and J. F. Rock. Especially in the neighborhood of Wetterau, Wittgenstein, and Wied, where the country swarmed with separatists of all kinds, the movement gained strength; and in the second decade of the eighteenth century congregations of the Inspired were found in Hesse, the Palatinate, Würtemberg, and Saxony. In doctrine they differed not so very much from the evangelical churches, though they believed in continuous inspiration; but their ideas of discipline and organization separated them completely from any established church. In their congregations there was no office of teacher or preacher. Their service consisted of free prayers, singing, and recital of Gruber's Die 24 Regeln der wahren Gottseligkeit und heiligen Wandels, and prophecies, if any were given. Rock was the last medium of inspiration among them; and after his death, in 1749, they lived very quietly until the second decade of the present century, when new prophets arose among them. The Hessian and Prussian governments, however, saw fit to interfere with the prophets; and in 1841 a considerable emigration (about eight hundred souls) took place. The emigrants went to America, where they formed a flourishing colony at Ebenezer, in the State of New York. They afterwards left that place, and settled in Iowa. See M. GOEBEL: Gesch. d. wahren Inspirationsgemeinden, in Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol., 1854, II., III.; 1855, I., III.

INSTALLATION denotes generally the ceremonial act by which a person ordained and appointed is formally put into possession of an ecclesiastical benefice, but is in the English Church sometimes applied specially to the office of a canon or prebendary, or the enthronization of a bishop, and the induction of a minister.

INSTITUTION, in canon law, denotes the final act by which a person elected by the chapter, or nominated by the government, is appointed by the proper authority to an ecclesiastical benefice, more especially a bishopric.

INTERCESSION, the act of one who endeavors to reconcile persons at variance, or of one who pleads for another. The act is often performed among men, and constitutes one of the good traits of our fallen humanity. But theologically it is used of the work of Christ, and improperly of deceased saints. Christ is set forth in Scripture as our intercessor. It is his function as high priest; and therefore, in his wondrous prayer before his death, he remembers us all (John xvii. 11, 20). He appears in the presence of God for us (Heb. ix. 24), and makes intercession for us (Rom. viii. 34; Heb. vii. 25): he is therefore denominated our advocate (1 John ii. 1). The ground of his intercession is his atoning work. He pleads the shedding of his blood, and thus obtains the pardon of our sins. His intercession is "authoritative (he intercedes not without right: John xvii. 24), wise (he understands the nature of his work and the wants of his people: John ii. 25), righteous (for it is founded upon justice and truth: 1 John iii. 5), compassionate (Heb. ii. 17, v. 8), unique (he is the only intercessor: 1 Tim. ii. 5), perpetual (Heb. vii. 25), efficacious (1 John ii. 1, 2)." It follows, from the above, that there is no such thing as the supposed intercession of saints. The arguments against such erroneous teaching may be thus stated: (1) It supposes the existence of a class of beings who do not exist, — canonized departed spirits, who have been officially declared to be such by the Church. (2) It leads to practical idolatry. The saints, and particularly the Virgin Mary, are prayed to, instead of God. (3) It is derogatory to Christ. It makes him share the work of intercession with others, as if he were incompetent to do it alone. (4) It supposes that some have sufficient merit of their own to have a claim upon God. (5) It is superstitious, because there is no evidence in Scripture of any such intercession; and degrading, because it calls the attention of the worshipper from God to a creature, and teaches him to lean upon an arm of flesh. See HODGE, Systematic Theology, ii. 592-595. See MEDIATOR.

INTERDICT, a punishment which the Roman-Catholic Church inflicts upon its members, forbidding the celebration of service, the administration of the sacraments, the performance of ecclesiastical burial, etc., developed from the excommunication, and occurs under a triple form, — personal, local, and mixed. The first traces of it are met with in the times of Gregory of Tours; but it did not develop into a well-defined institution in the practice of the Church until the eleventh century. During the middle ages it was often used with great effect. Innocent III., in 1208, put England under an interdict. The last instance of a local interdict occurred in 1606, pronounced by Paul V. over the republic of Venice; though a milder form of it (the so-called cessatio in divinis, by which the Church is put into a state of mourning, and no bells or organs are used) was pronounced in the diocese of Posen-Gnesen in 1839. The right of pronouncing an interdict devolves upon the Pope, the councils, and the bishops: the right of revoking it devolves upon him who has pronounced it, or his superior. See KOBER, in Archiv f. kath. Kirchen., vol. xxi. SCHEURL.

INTERIM, a provisional establishment, or modus vivendi, imposed upon the German reformers by Charles V., until a general council should have decided between them and the Pope. There were three such interims, named after the places where they were issued; namely, RATISBON, AUGSBURG, and LEIPZIG, which see.

INTERSTITIA TEMPORUM. Canon 18 of the Council of Sardica (347) demands that a clerk shall remain for some time in each order; so that a certain interstitium temporis elapses before he is promoted from a lower to a higher order. As long as the lower orders were still connected with clerical functions, the above maxim was applied also to them; but when, in course of time, they became merely preparatory steps towards the higher orders, it became customary to confer them all in one day. The Council of Trent (Sess. 28, can. 17) attempted to correct this practice, but in vain. For the higher orders it decided that the interstitium should comprise a whole year. The bishops obtained, however, a certain power of dispensation. WASSERSCHLEBEN.

INTINCTION denotes the peculiar mode in which, in the Greek Church, the Eucharist is administered to the laity; the consecrated bread being broken into the consecrated wine, and both elements given together in a spoon. Greek writers on liturgy claim that this custom dates back to the time of Chrysostom. In the Western Church it never gained foothold. It was forbidden by Julius I. (337-352) as unscriptural.

INTONATION, the modulation of the voice, in the act of reading a liturgical service, so as to produce a musical accentuation and tone. It is practised in the Greek and Roman churches, and in some Episcopal churches. It adds to the impressiveness of the service, if it be really finely done; but it mars its intelligibility.

INTRODUCTION. I. Old Testament. — Widely different opinions exist respecting the idea and treatment of this branch of theological study. On the one hand, J. G. Carpov (Introductio, Leipzig, 1721), and at a much later date De Wette, even in the last edition of his Introduction, which he edited (7th edition, Berlin, 1852), maintained that it properly concerned all that helped to make the Scriptures intelligible. On the other hand, Reusch (R. C.) includes under the term only the origin of the several books, their collection (canon), inspiration, and preservation; and Keil defines Old-Testament Introduction as the knowledge of those underlying historico-critical principles of the Old-Testament canon which explain and justify its theological use by Jew and Christian. Franz Kaulen (R. C.), in the logical wake of Keil, assigns Introduction to dogmatic theology as a branch of apologetics. Richard Simon expressed the right idea in his Histoire critique du vieux testament (Paris, 1678), that it was an historical science, and accordingly he treats of the history of the text, etc.; but unhappily he was not faithful to his own principles. Hupfeld (1844) suggested making Introduction a history of the Old-Testament writings. Such a history would not necessarily be the same as a biblical Hebrew literary history, although Hupfeld, J. J. Stahelin, and Delitzsch would so consider it; for the latter properly is a history of the literary development of the old Hebrews, as displayed in their literature, while the former has to do with the origin and history of that collection of books we style the "Old Testament."

The idea, of course, directly affects the treatment. When Old-Testament Introduction is considered as a collection of important facts bearing upon the interpretation and estimation of the Old Testament, it is divided into two parts, general and special. General Introduction treats of the original languages of the Old Testament, the versions, the history and criticism of the text, the history of the canon; special Introduction, of the contents, origin, and credibility of the separate books. But if Old-Testament Introduction be looked at as a history of the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament, then it comprises the origin of the single writings, the history of their collection, of their canonicity, and, finally, of their transmission and spread with a canonical

As an independent discipline, Old-Testament Introduction is comparatively recent; for the ancient Church had no interest in merely scientific questions respecting the Scriptures. Jerome gives some valuable materials, and Adrianus' tract, εἰσαγωγή εἰς τὰς θείας γραφάς (fifth century, published first by Höschel, 1602, and in Critici sacri, London), probably gave the name to the science; but hermeneutics, rather than introduction, was served. The nearest approach in this period was made by Cassiodorus (sixth century), in his Institutiones divinarum literarum, in which he enumerates the different books, and mentions the most important commentaries upon them, gives hermeneutical rules, and then passes on to speak of the biblical divisions, canon and criticism. The only work on Introduction produced in the middle ages was that of Nicolaus of Lyra (d. 1340), Postilla perpetua s. brevis commentarius in universa biblia, published in Antwerp, 1634. But the revival of learning, and the mighty impetus given by the new art of printing, prepared the way for independent investigations of the Bible; although at first the Protestants were more interested in dogmatic than in critical questions. The Roman-Catholic Church has the honor of producing the first work in Introduction proper: it was by Santes Pagninus Lucensis (Sante Pagnino of Lucca, d. 1541), and entitled Isagogæ ad sacras literas, liber unicus (Lyons, 1536). Then came Sixtus of Siena (d. 1599), Bibliotheca sancta ex precipuis catholice ecclesie auctoribus collecta, et in octo libros digesta (Venice, 1566, and often; last edition, Naples, 1742). The contest between BUXTORF and CAPPELLUS (see those arts.) over the vowel-points called forth quite a literature from the Protestants, who have since kept the field. In biblical criticism two works of this period deserve especial mention, — Brian Walton, In Biblia polyglotta Prolegomena, London, 1657 (ed. Heidegger, Zürich, 1673; by J. A. Dathe, Leipzig, 1777; and by F. Wrangham, Cambridge, 1828, 2 vols.); and Humphry Hody, De bibliorum tentibus originalibus, versionibus græcis et latina vulgata libris IV., Oxford, 1705. General Introductions were written by Andr. Rivetus (Leyden, 1627), Abr. Calov (Wittenberg, 1643), J. H. Heidegger (Zürich, 1681 and often), J. Leusden (Utrecht, 1656). The scepticism which from England and France spread all over Europe, naturally laid violent hands upon the Bible, as was done by Hobbes, in his Leviathan (London, 1651; modern edition, London, 1882), and particularly by Spinoza (Tractatus theotogico-politicus, Hamburg, 1670 [ed. by van Vloten and Land, The Hague, vol. i., 1882, pp. 377–610], chapters viii.–x.). A much nearer approach to the traditional treatment was made by Richard Simon (Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, Paris, 1678), who first established Introduction's claim to be an historical science. The tendency of the time was, however, towards negative criticism; and in this direction were the works of Semler (Abhandlungen von freier Untersuchung des Kanons, Halle, 1771–75, 4 parts; and Apparatus ad liberalem V. T. interpretationem, Halle, 1773). After him, holding more or less nearly his views, came Eichhorn (Leipzig, 1780–83, 3 parts), G. L. Bauer (Nürnberg, 1794), Augusti (Leipzig, 1806), and L. Bertholdt (Erlangen, 1812–19, 6 parts). But most completely the negative criticism was exhibited by De Wette, Lehrbuch d. hist.-kritisch. Einleitung in d. alte Testament (Berlin, 1817), remodelled, and changed in opinion, in its eighth edition by Eberhard Schrader (Berlin, 1869). Of works of a mediating tendency may be mentioned (Friedrich Bleek) Einleitung in das alte Testament, orig. ed., Berlin, 1860, 4th ed. by J. Wellhausen, 1878 [English trans., London, 1869, 2 vols.]; (J. J. Stähelin) Specielle Einleitung in die kanonischen Bücher des alten Testaments, Elberfeld, 1862; (A. Davidson) An Introduction to the Old Testament, London, 1862, 3 vols. Jewish scholars have contributed to Introduction, such as J. Fürst (Der Kanon d. A. T. n.d. Ueberlieferung in Talmud und Midrasch, Leipzig, 1868) and J. S. Bloch (Studien z. Gesch. d. Samml. d. altheb. Lit., Leipzig, 1875); and Roman-Catholic scholars, such as Jahn (Wien, 1793; later ed., 1805; new ed. by Ackermann, 1825 [Eng. trans. by S. H. Turner and W. R. Whittingham, New York, 1827]), J. G. Herbst (Karlsruhe, 1840–42, 2 parts), J. M. H. Scholz (Köln, 1845–48, 3 parts), F. H. Reusch (Freiburg-i.-B., 1859; 3d ed., 1868), and Franz Kaulen (Freiburg-i.-B., 1876–82). From the Evangelical Church have proceeded the Introductions of J. D. Michaelis (Hamburg, 1787, unfinished), E. W. Hengstenberg (Berlin, 1831–39, 3 vols.), H. A. C. Hävernick (Erlangen, Parts I. and II., 1836–39; 2d ed. of Part I., by C. F. Keil, Frankfurt, 1854–56; Part III. ed. by Keil, 1849 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1852]), and C. F. II. New Testament. — What we mean by Introduction was not studied in the Early Church. There was no felt necessity to learn about the origin, the inducing causes, the immediate designs, and the histories of the New-Testament books. Even the presence of the apocryphal books, and of the heretics who had composed them, or who had departed from the canon, while it increased the reverence of the Church for those books known to be the genuine writings of the apostles and evangelists, led to very little work in this department in the first two centuries. Dionysius of Alexandria (third century) may be called the father of New-Testament historical criticism; for he contested the claim of John the apostle to be the author of the Revelation, while formally granting its canonicity. The incitement to critical consideration of the books of the New Testament had, however, been previously given by the discovery, when the Church came into more active intercourse, that some of these books had experienced different treatment in different places. For instance, the Epistle to the Hebrews, which the Alexandrian Church had accepted as Pauline, was found to be little known in other equally orthodox churches, and, indeed, in most was considered un-Pauline and even uncanonical; and the Shepherd of Hermas, it was found, was greatly valued in some churches, while in others it was little esteemed. Local tradition was thus robbed of its value; and the necessity of a critical comparison of these ecclesiastical traditions was felt by the Palestinian branch of the school of Origen. Eusebius' study of the primitive Christian literature was displayed in a comprehensive collection of the older witnesses for and against the not uncontested portions of the New Testament; and by so doing he rendered a valuable service, although his intention to substantiate certain prejudices respecting the limits of the canon destroys the objectivity of his information. From him, however, we have received pretty much all we know of the older tradition concerning the origin of the universally accepted books. Jerome followed in his steps, but added nothing, except a little about the difference between the Oriental and Occidental canons and the Gospel of the Hebrews. The dogmatic controversies of the fourth and following centuries diverted attention from critical questions; and what had been previously gained was merely repeated in the introductions to commentaries, catenas, and similar works.

But from the Revival of Learning began a better day for New-Testament Introduction. The works of Santes Pagninus (1536), Sixtus of Siena (1566), and A. Rivetus (1627), contained much information in this department, along with dogmatical considerations, and the new study of textual criticism gave great impetus. Richard Simon (1638-1712) published his three works upon the critical history of the New Testament (Histoire critique du N. T., Rotterdam, 1689-93), and thus won his place as the father of New-Testament Introduction. By critique he understood the investigations for the establishment of the original text; and, by his history from the sources, he disproved not only the Protestant claim of "a witness of the Spirit," but also the scholastic treatment, which, resting upon imperfect acquaintance with antiquity, could not prove that Christianity was a religion based on facts, and that the Bible was the record of those facts. But in the effort to establish the New-Testament text, he traversed a large part of the province of Introduction.

The next name to be mentioned is Johann David Michaelis (1717-1791), who wrote the Einleitung in die göttlichen Schriften des Neuen Bundes (Göttingen, 1750). He disclaimed dependency upon Simon; and yet (as only in textual criticism, by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, had much been done) his work was really, in its first shape, based upon Simon. With each succeeding edition it was greatly improved; but, even in the fourth and last edition (1788), its stand-point was a strongly rational supernaturalism. The differences to be noted between the editions are mainly, that his attacks on the "doubters" became milder, and that he preferred at last to give up the inspiration of the historical books, denied also the inspiration of the non-apostolic books (among which he reckoned apparently the Epistle to the Hebrews), and, indeed, flatly declared that the "inner witness of the Spirit" was of as little worth as the witness of the Church, in proof of the inspiration of any book.

Johann Salomo Semler (1725-1791) made the next contribution of importance (in his Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Kanons, Halle, 1771-75, 4 parts), when he distinguished between the word of God, which contained the doctrines of directly spiritual value, and the Holy Scriptures, which contained them only sporadically. There is, however, no historical proof that any particular passage was the word of God: the inner witness for the truth was the only source of proof. The Church had the right, exercised by the ancient Church and by the reformers, to say what books should constitute her canon. One cannot say that Introduction was influenced permanently by Semler: rather we must give the palm to Michaelis, who was followed by J. E. Chr Schmidt (1804), Eichhorn (1808), and Hug (1808). Schmidt applied the phrase "historico-critical" — since so widely used — to his Introduction; Eichhorn started his "original gospel" theory; Hug, in an unexcelled manner, investigated the relations of the synoptists. Schleiermacher (1811) called attention to the need of a reconstruction of this branch of study, declaring that its object was a history of the New Testament, so that its present readers might be, in their knowledge of the origin of the books and their text, on a level with the first. This idea — to write a history of the New Testament — has been carried out by Credner (1836), Reuss (1842), and Hupfeld (1844); so also by Davidson (1868) and Hilgenfeld (1875), under the old name "Introduction."

Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792-1860) has had by far the most influence upon New-Testament studies of any man of modern times. He attempted nothing less than a reconstruction of all apostolic and post-apostolic history and literature, in the face of all ecclesiastical and scholarly tradition, from the four Pauline Epistles (Galatians, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Romans), which alone he considered genuine. Starting with the idea that the difference between Paul and the rest of the apostles was fundamental, he declared that those New-Testament writings which either put the relations of the apostles in a more favorable light, or seemed to ignore their differences altogether, were either forgeries, or the products of a later time. But his historical considerations were derived from Hegel's philosophy, and his criticism rested upon dogmatic convictions. These four points may be made against him: (1) He reasoned in a circle; for he examined critically, first the sources of the history, and then the history of the sources. The reasoning which reduced the genuine Pauline Epistles to four reduces the four to none; so that Paul is robbed of his title to have produced any writing which lasted. (2) Baur certainly was extraordinarily familiar with the old Christian literature; but he read it with prejudice, and not with a desire to learn any thing different from his preconceptions. (3) He was lacking in the sense of the concrete and the value of the individual, and therefore could not grasp complicated relations and their results. (4) If it is self-evident that one must understand what he criticises, and that his criticism must rest upon thorough exegesis, then Baur surely was unfitted for his labor; for he was any thing rather than an exegete, and his school has done nothing in exegesis. It should, however, be added, that these defects in Baur's method of work were supplied by others; and the result of the operations of friend and foe is a much better understanding of the New Testament.

INVENTION OF THE CROSS. See Cross.

INVESTITURE. In the Frankish monarchy the idea gradually became prevalent, that the ruler of the realm had the right to appoint bishops; and in Germany the kings clung so much the more tenaciously to this idea, as, in course of time, the bishoprics and abbeys there entirely changed their original character of being merely ecclesiastical organizations, and became, to all intents and purposes, political divisions, with rights of coinage, toll, jurisdiction, etc., and with corresponding duties, especially of a military description. When a bishop died, his staff and ring were brought from his residence to the king; and, when the king had made up his mind with respect to the choice of a successor, he put the new bishop or abbot into possession of the temporalities of the fief by investing him with the staff and the ring, and receiving his homage, or oath of fealty. After the investiture, there followed, as the last act in the installation, the consecration by the metropolitan; but that the latter should exercise more than an advisory influence on the whole transaction was out of the question.

Meanwhile, during the first half of the eleventh century, the ideas of the reform party in the Roman curia, concerning the perfect freedom of the Church from any secular power, began to assume definite shape. As the bishops and abbots used to offer great presents to the king on the occasion of their investiture, it was easy to throw a shadow of simony over the whole transaction; and the statutes of the ecclesiastical law concerning simony were very severe. As yet, however, no direct application was made. The curia spoke only in general terms when it forbade ecclesiastics to accept their offices from the hands of laymen; but in 1068 it came to an actual clash. The king appointed a bishop of Milan in the usual way, — by investiture; while the people, instigated by the curia, demanded a bishop canonically elected and instituted. As the king would not yield, a Roman synod of 1074 aggravated the severity of the laws concerning simony; and the next year Gregory VII. officially denied the king's right of investiture, and admonished the people to oppose, in all their ecclesiastical functions, such bishops as had obtained their office in an uncanonical, simoniacal manner.

This meant for Germany the complete overthrow of its constitution. The bishops and abbots were princes of the empire, holding the larger mass of the imperial fiefs; and, as no dynastical claims could be put forward with respect to these fiefs, the king wielded an immense power through his right to give them to whom he pleased. It was evident that he would immediately break down before the Pope if he lost this right, — if the bishops and abbots of his realm should be canonically elected, that is, elected by a clergy, which, by the law of celibacy, was completely severed from the interests of the State, and transformed into mere tools of the Church. The contest was long, extremely bitter, and at times doubtful with respect to its issue. The final settlement, however, by the concordat of Worms (1122), was in favor of the Pope. The emperor gave up altogether his right of investiture with ring and staff; and though he retained a certain influence on the elections, and the right of investiture with the so-called regalia, in its golden days the Church knew very well how to elude these latter obligations. The concordat of Worms continued in active operation until the dissolution of the German Empire in 1806.

In no other country did the controversy concerning the right of investiture reach such a pitch of intensity as in Germany, — partly because the popes knew that victory on one point would be victory all along the whole line, and were too shrewd to engage in an unnecessary warfare with the whole world at once; partly because the question nowhere else affected the political constitution so deeply. In France, where the bishops and abbots, though large fief-holders, were not princes of the empire, the kings renounced their right of investiture with ring and staff towards the close of the eleventh century; but no elections could take place without their permission, nor was it valid until it received their confirmation, — two points which secured to them a considerable influence. In England it came to a compromise between Paschalis II. and Henry I. (1107), by which the king retained his right of nomination and of demanding an oath of fealty. Stephen, however, Henry's successor (1135–54), gave up his right of nomination; and in 1215 John repeated the renunciation. Nevertheless, practically the English chapters never obtained freedom in their elections.

INVOCATION OF SAINTS. See IMAGE WORSHIP, INTERCESSION.

IONA, HY or HII, I or IA, IOUA, from which, by a mistake of a transcriber, the present name of Iona has come. It gets also the name of Icolumbkill, or the Island of Columba of the Cell, and occasionally Innis van Druidheach, or Island of the Druids. It is one of the Outer Hebrides, lying north-east and south-west, and separated from the Ross, or south-western promontory of the Island of Mull, by a shallow channel about a mile in breadth. It is about three miles and a half in length, and one and a half in breadth; the rocks of igneous formation; the surface generally low, but rising into a number of irregular cnoos or knolls, not usually exceeding a hundred feet in height; the highest of them, which bears the name of Dun-i, or Dun-ii, and is situate on the north of the island, being about three hundred and thirty feet above the level of the sea. It has been variously estimated as containing from sixteen hundred to two thousand acres, much less than half of which are arable, and not more than six hundred actually under cultivation. The pastures on the sides of the knolls and ravines afford sustenance to about six hundred sheep, and from two to three hundred larger cattle. The population, according to the latest census, was two hundred and forty-three, and maintains itself partly by agriculture, and partly by fishing; the large flounders in the neighboring seas being accounted unusually fine. The coast is diversified by a number of small rocky bays and headlands, and three or four landing-places, — Port-na-Currach, on the south-west, where Columba is supposed to have first landed; Port-na-Muintir on the south-east, the usual starting-point in crossing from Iona to Mull; and Port-na-Marbh, at which the bodies brought for burial in the island were landed. The island at the time of the Reformation appears to have constituted a distinct parish, but afterwards to have been united to the parish of Kilfinnichen in Mull, and only in our own day to have been re-erected into a parish quoad sacra. Besides the parish church and the school, there is also a Free Church.

That which for ages has attracted visitors from all quarters to this little island, and still holds them captive by a spell more powerful than the neighboring Staffa does by its grander scenery and greater scientific interest, is that it was once "the luminary of the Caledonian regions, whence," as Dr. Johnson says, "savage clans and roving barbarians derived the benefits of civilization and the blessings of religion." But though its attractions arise chiefly from its history, and it must yield to its neighbor in respect of the grandeur of its scenery and the marvels of its geological structure, it is by no means so destitute of physical attractions as Montalembert has represented it to be. Mr. Skene, who knows it far better, has said, "No one who pays merely a flying visit to Iona in an excursion steamer, and is hurried by his guide over the sights, that he may return by the steamer the same day, can form any conception of the hidden beauties, — its retired dells, its long reaches of sand on shores indented with quiet bays, its little coves between bare and striking rocks, and the bolder rocky scenery of its north-western and south-western shores, where it opposes wild barren cliffs and high rocky islets to the sweep of the Atlantic waves." The Duke of Argyll fully concurs in the views of Mr. Skene. Even he who is most impressed with its higher claims, and feels most the force of Dr. Johnson's noble words, need not fail to own that Columba could hardly have found a spot combining more of the natural beauty he loved with the security he sought, and in all respects so well adapted for an island monastery designed "to form the centre of a great missionary work, and to exhibit the Christian life in contrast with the surrounding Paganism." These beauties seem to have been felt by him, especially those of the south-western corner, which Mr. Skene pronounces to be "the very perfection of rocky scenery," where was the Cuilnán Erin. From its summit the saint could look out on the wide ocean without catching a glimpse of the land of his birth, and might have had suggested to his mind the glowing imagery of the poem in which he revels on the delight of gazing from a pinnacle of rock on the face of ocean, with its heaving waves chanting music to their father, or more hoarsely thundering on the rocks.

It was in 563 that the island became the home of the saint, being given to him either by the king of the Dalriad Scots, or by the Picts, its more ancient possessors. It was well suited for a Celtic monastery, no less by its own limited size than by its proximity to larger islands and to the mainland, and it became not only the usual abode of Columba, but the head of all his monasteries and missions. From it as a centre he went out on many evangelistic tours, both to the islands and the mainland, till the kingdom of the Northern Picts was brought over to the Christian faith, and the faith as well as the fortunes of his own Scotie race were revived. From it missionaries went forth, or were sent, to more distant tribes and nations, and particularly to the Angles of Northumbria, to the Continent, to Iceland, and other hyperborean regions; and the blessings of civilization, learning, and religion, were extended far and wide.

The remains of the ancient church, nunnery, and monastery, now found in the island, belong to a much later age than that of Columba. The buildings erected by him, being, according to Scotie custom, of wood or wattles, have all disappeared many centuries ago, and their very site can now be but indistinctly pointed out. They were surrounded by a rampart, some portions of which can still be traced, and were not far from the Port-na-Muintir, or portus insulæ of Adamnan, facing a similar landing-place on the coast of Mull. Adamnan makes mention of a kiln and barn, and gives us reason to infer there was also a mill. He mentions the monasterium with its refectory; the hospitium, or guest-chamber, which was wattled; the cells of the monks; the little court in the centre; and the church or oratorium, which is supposed to have been of oaken planks or beams. The domus, or cell of Columba, was built of planks, and occupied the highest part of the ground, not far from the Tar an Abb, from which he took his last survey of his community and their agricultural operations. There would seem also to have been a library, which Mr. Cosmo Innes supposes at a considerably later period still to have had manuscripts, which had probably been in its possession from these early times, and was of great value.

In the ninth and tenth centuries the island was repeatedly ravaged, the monastery destroyed, and part of its inmates slaughtered by the Danes and other northern rovers, and the primacy of the Scottish Columban churches was removed to Dunkeld. In the end of the eleventh century, when the Western Isles were formally ceded to Norway, the seat of the bishopric of the Isles was transferred from Iona to Man, and the diocese incorporated into the Norwegian archbishopric of Drontheim. In 1266, when the isles were restored to Scotland, the patronage of this bishopric was restored also, but with reservation of the rights the Church of Drontheim could legitimately claim over it. In the following century the Island of Man was seized by Edward III., and its bishop swore allegiance to him. After 1380 the English appointed a bishop of Man, and the Scotch a bishop of the Isles; but no regular division of the diocese appears to have taken place. The later ecclesiastical buildings, of which remains still exist in the island, date mostly from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The most ancient, the temple or chapel of Oran or Odhrain, may possibly be even of the time of Queen Margaret. It is built of red granite, and has for its western doorway a Norman arch, with beak-headed ornament. Near it is the Reilig Oran, an ancient cemetery and sanctuary, said to have formed the burial-place of the Scottish and Pictish kings till the time of Malcolm the Third, and anciently to have contained three tumuli, appropriated respectively to the kings of Scotland, Ireland, and Norway, and in which forty-eight Scotch, four Irish, and eight Norwegian kings were buried. North of this cemetery are the remains of the mediæval monastery of the thirteenth century, erected for the Benedictine monks who had succeeded the Celtic. In connection with the cloisters is a Norman arcade of somewhat older date. The abbey or cathedral church is supposed to have been erected also in the thirteenth century. It is built of red granite, and in cruciform shape, with nave, transept, and choir, and with central tower rising to the height of seventy-five feet. The tower is said to have contained a fine peal of bells, two of which were carried off to Raphoe in Ireland, by Bishop Knox, when transferred to that see by James I. King Charles I. ordered Knox's successor to restore them; but whether this was actually done is not now known (Transactions of Iona Club, p. 187, Edinburgh, 1824).

IRELAND. I. THE COUNTRY. — Ireland is situated to the west of Great Britain. Its greatest length is three hundred miles, and greatest width two hundred; its area, 32,535 square miles. The surface is an undulating plain, with a rim of low mountains round the coast. The climate is moist, variable but temperate, and better adapted to cattle-raising than to the cultivation of cereals. The manufactures are not important, except that of linen in the north. The country is divided into the four provinces, Ulster, Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, and subdivided into

II. HISTORY. 1. To the Union of the Irish Church with Rome. — Ireland was at an early date settled by Celtic tribes, differing considerably among themselves, and maintaining constant warfare with each other. Christianity was introduced into the country, certainly early in the fifth century, through intercourse with Irish colonies formed in Wales and Cornwall on the decadence of the Roman power in Britain; but the founding of an organized church is usually admitted to be due to St. Patrick. The Patrician Church was independent of Rome, and, although agreeing in doctrine with the Western Church of that time, differed widely in organization. At first we find no diocesan bishops with definite territory, and clergy under them, much less metropolitans in their turn overseeing the bishops. The early Irish Church was essentially monastic, and adapted to the state of society then existing among the Irish Celts. The former religion was what is vaguely known as "Druidism;" and the so-called "schools of the Druids" may have accustomed the Irish to the monastic idea. The tribal system was in full force; and, owing to this, a chief could not make an absolute gift of land to the Church: he could only make over his own rights, the clansmen retaining theirs. Such religious communities were called "monasteries," though only a few members may have taken vows of celibacy. The heads of such bodies were the real ecclesiastical rulers of Ireland; and we find presbyters, laymen, and (in one famous instance, that of St. Brigit) a woman, filling such positions, and in authority over bishops. That the bishops were not territorial in early times is shown by the facts that St. Patrick himself is traditionally reported to have ordained between three hundred and four hundred bishops for a population of probably not half a million persons, and that St. Mochta is said to have had one hundred bishops in his monastery. The history of the Irish Church for the next six centuries is the history of its gradual conformation to that of Rome. As a rule, the higher and more educated of the clergy, impressed by the greatness and splendor of the Roman Church, were in favor of such changes as looked towards the establishment of the Roman graded hierarchy. In 633 part of the Church adopted the Roman method of reckoning Easter: in 716 the rest followed. The stricter Benedictine rule was introduced into the monasteries; and the tribe bishops approximated in time to diocesan. An apparent exception to the non-hierarchical constitution was the ard-bishop of Armagh, who bore this title at a comparatively early date. But a little examination shows that the title "ard" was applied very loosely, and that the so-called early bishops of Armagh were sometimes laymen, and were, in fact, abbots rather than bishops. The Irish Church of the seventh and eighth centuries was honorably distinguished for its missionary enterprise and its schools: the latter gave Ireland a literature two centuries in advance of the other barbarous nations of Europe.

Jealousy of the power of the northern bishop of Armagh led to the calling of the synod of Rathbreasail, in 1110, at which the first papal legate in Ireland, Gillebert, bishop of Limerick, presided. This synod was in the hands of the Romanizing party. The archbishop of Cashel was acknowledged as a rival to Armagh, and the country placed under twenty-three diocesan; but so imperfectly were these arrangements carried out, that we find similar measures introduced at the subsequent synods of Kells and Cashel. At this period a frightful state of anarchy prevailed; and, as was natural, the Church suffered fearfully. At this juncture St. Malachy, a man of great power, began his labors. As the fruit of his efforts, a great synod was held at Kells in 1152 (four years after his death), where true diocesan jurisdiction was set up, two new archbishoprics were established in Dublin and Tuam respectively, and the authority of Rome was formally acknowledged.

We now reach the period of the Norman Invasion. Adrian IV., the only English Pope, granted to Henry II., in 1155, a bull conferring on him the sovereignty of Ireland; the condition being the complete submission of the Irish Church. The expulsion of Dermot MacMurrough, a Leinster chieftain, gave the desired opportunity. Dermot applied to Henry for aid, and received letters-patent authorizing English subjects to assist him.

Richard de Clare, since known as Strongbow, agreed to reconquer Leinster for Dermot, receiving in marriage Eva, Dermot's only child, and with her the reversion of Dermot's lands, which, according to tribal law, Dermot had no right to give. In 1169 and 1170 the Norman knights landed in Ireland, and succeeded in firmly establishing themselves. In 1172 Henry visited Ireland, and received the country from Strongbow. A synod assembled at Cashel formally united the Church of Ireland to the Church of Rome; and so the last of the western national churches surrendered. And from this time until the Reformation, the history of the Irish Church is the history of the Roman-Catholic Church in Ireland.

2. From the Union of the Irish Church with that of Rome to the Reformation. — At first the advent of the Norman rulers was an unmixed benefit. To the tillers of the soil any strong rule was better than subjection to the exaction of every captain of banditti who could muster twenty men. But the Normans rapidly assimilated themselves to the Irish; and in a short time the only difference between the old and the new state of affairs was, that some of the clansmen now fought under Norman instead of Celtic leaders. In 1367, less than two hundred years from the landing of Strongbow, the Anglo-Irish Parliament assembled at Kilkenny passed a statute treating the old English settlers with almost as much severity as the Irish. Near the beginning of the fifteenth century considerable bodies of Celtic-Scotch invaded Ulster. Like other invaders of Ireland, they found allies, and made permanent settlements.

During the wars of the Roses in England, Ireland was left almost to herself; and on the accession of Henry VII., although the most powerful families were of Anglo-Norman name, the authority of the king extended only to the country immediately surrounding Dublin. Henry, an able and astute monarch, sent over Sir Edward Poynings. A Parliament assembled by him in 1495 made all English statutes law in Ireland, and subjected the Irish Parliament to the English privy council, — an arrangement which remained in force until within eighteen years of the union of the two countries.

Under the strong rule of Henry's deputy, the Earl of Kildare, — the head of the great family of the Geraldines, — the English authority was extended, the turbulence of the barons and native chiefs was checked, and the unhappy country enjoyed probably a greater degree of quiet than at any time since her history opened. This state of things continued through the early part of the reign of Henry VIII., broken only by the mad rebellion of "Silken Thomas," which ended in the ruin of the Kildare family.

3. From the Reformation to the Period of Protestant Ascendency, and of the Penal Laws. — A new and all-important factor is now introduced into Irish history. Henry VIII. extended his reformation to Ireland. Up to this time the Irish Church had been directly under the control of Rome. The Pope appointed the archbishops, and the king of England was seldom able to enforce his claim to any authority in ecclesiastical matters. At the time of the Reformation the Irish Church was as corrupt as any in Europe. Simony, lawlessness, and sexual immorality characterized the clergy. Nowhere was reform more needed; but unfortunately the worst side of the Reformation was turned to Ireland, and it could scarcely have happened otherwise than that it should be rejected by the mass of the people. The Irish were now beginning to realize that the power of England was real, and was to be exerted to crush out their tribal institutions, and substitute the common law of England for that of the Brehon lawyers. Northmen and Danes, Norman barons and Celtic Scotch, had all been welcomed as allies by some Irish power, and had been absorbed till they became "more Irish than the Irish." But under Henry VII. the Celt was made to feel that there was a force he could not mould or bend, — a force that must either bend or break him, and would, if possible, compel him to order. Hence the Reformation appeared to the Irish simply as an arbitrary act of the power they had learned to hate. Henry VIII. called a Parliament, which passed whatever acts he wished. Most of the bishops and clergy acquiesced in the supremacy of the king; but so unpopular was the change, that O'Neill was able to raise an insurrection in Ulster to oppose it, which was vigorously suppressed. It was not, however, until 1551, that Protestantism was formally established by law. Queen Mary restored the old order, of course; but her power in Ireland was so weak, that the country gave asylum to English Protestant refugees. In 1580, after the accession of Elizabeth, a Parliament was held, in which sat three archbishops and seventeen bishops. This Parliament restored the ecclesiastical order of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., but it is not certain how many of the bishops actually conformed. The Reformation made no real progress among the people. At the beginning of the reign of James I. the condition of the established Church was deplorable. The clergy were largely illiterate, and drawn from the lowest orders, and, although often pluralists, were almost beggars; the revenues being absorbed, under corrupt agreements, by those in authority. During the reigns of Queens Mary and Elizabeth the civil history presents a succession of rebellions and ferocious internal feuds. Exhaustion brought peace, and King James I. took advantage of the desolation of Ulster to introduce Scotch settlers. These settlers were strongly opposed to prelacy, and formed a basis for the Presbyterian Church of Ireland.

Charles I. tried the ruinous policy of using Ireland as a power against his Parliament. The Protestants were systematically disarmed, and the frightful outbreak of 1641 was the result. The Parliament sent some Scotch troops to Carrickfergus, attended by chaplains; and among them, in 1642, was organized the first presbytery of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. The misery of the country for the next few years was such as can hardly be equalled, even in her dismal annals. When Cromwell came, he found five hostile armies ranged against each other, and all preying on the wretched peasantry. His sharp and decisive treatment is well known. He proceeded to parcel out the forfeited and almost depopulated lands among English settlers, mostly Baptists and Independents. For a few years Ireland enjoyed prosperity, but the policy of the Restoration undid much of the work. Cromwell's settlers were displaced, and many of them emigrated to the New World. Up to this time it does not appear that the penal laws against Roman Catholics had been seriously enforced, although Cromwell refused liberty to celebrate the mass. The effect of Protestantism showed itself in a marked way on the Roman-Catholic clergy. From this time we hear no more of illegitimate children of bishops, nor of scandalous lives among the priests. Those who see most clearly the mischief the Roman-Catholic Church does in Ireland admit, that, with regard to purity of life, the Irish priesthood stands pre-eminent among the Roman-Catholic clergy of Europe.

When the Revolution of 1688 took place, and James II. landed in Ireland, the Protestants of the North saved a footing in Ireland for King William. After the battles of the Boyne (1690) and Aughrim (1691) had ruined the cause of James, peace was concluded by the treaty of Limerick, which guaranteed to the Roman Catholics all rights which they had enjoyed under Charles I. In Ulster large districts which had been forfeited were bestowed on owners who leased them for terms of thirty years to Scotch Presbyterian settlers.

4. From the Protestant Ascendency to the Union of Ireland to Great Britain. — The government now fell entirely into the hands of a few great Protestant-Episcopal land-holders; the treaty of Limerick was disregarded; and Ireland became the worst governed country in Europe. During the reign of Queen Anne, penal laws which bore almost as heavily on Presbyterians as on Roman Catholics were vigorously enforced. The state of religion was deplorable. The Established Church had gained no hold on the people, and, indeed, had made no adequate effort to do so. The richer bishoprics and deaneries were occupied by men who were chosen for quite other reasons than spiritual fitness. Most of the clergy were poorly paid, and were content to perform mechanically the duties required of them. The Roman-Catholic priests were, for the most part, very uneducated; and the penal laws were enforced with such severity, that in many places the sacraments were left unadministered. Cromwell's Baptists and Independents, who at one time were computed to have formed one-half of the Protestant population, had almost disappeared, in a way hard to account for. The Presbyterian Church presented a brighter aspect. It was felt that the strong Presbyterians were needed; and even the bigoted Irish Parliament had to provide for their admission to the army, and in 1719 passed an act of toleration in spite of the hysterical protests of the bishops.

In 1727 the Presbyterian Church was weakened by the secession of the synod of Antrim, — a body sympathizing so much with latitudinarian views as to the divinity of Christ, as to make a subscription to the Westminster standards distasteful, — and still further by the emigration of her members to America. As the leases granted under William III. fell in, the landlords raised the rents, charging the tenants for their own improvements. The enterprising Ulster farmers would not submit; and this, with the policy towards dissenters from the Established Church which England had sanctioned, sent many of the race which had fought for her cause in Ireland in 1688 to fight against her in America in 1776.

In 1747 Wesley preached in Ireland with success. The good he did must not be measured only by the number of his converts: his movement infused life, in many places, into the existing organizations.

In 1746 the first seceding Presbyterian minister had settled in Ireland, and in 1750 the first presbytery of this body was organized. In Ulster the system of lay patronage had never existed; but the rigidly orthodox secession church found a reason for being in the prevailing latitudinarianism of the synod of Ulster.

The rest of the eighteenth century may be passed over rapidly. The penal laws with regard to the Roman Catholics were gradually relaxed. Fear of French invasion caused the arming of the volunteers. The efforts of Grattan and Flood, backed by the strength of the volunteers, obtained in 1782 the independence of the Irish Parliament. Ireland, for eighteen years, had home rule; but, under the system of parliamentary representation then in force, this meant only the tyranny of a land-holding minority. The rebellion of 1798, with its frightful outrages on both sides, took place. Pitt, then at the head of the English Government, resolved to do away with the farce of Irish independence. He was resolved on union. The Roman Catholics favored the measure as promising them some relief, and it was carried by direct bribery.

5. From the Union to the Present Time. — In the first years of the nineteenth century, the state of religion in the Protestant churches in Ireland was not encouraging; but a better day soon dawned. In 1827 the synod of Ulster, under the leadership of Henry Cooke, freed herself from Arianism, which had obtained some foothold; and, as a result of this movement, the remonstrant synod of Ulster was formed of a few ministers who felt they could not remain in the Church.

In 1829 important reforms were carried out in the administration of the Roman-Catholic Church, in particular with regard to the appointment of bishops.

In 1833 the anti-tithe demonstrations led to a reform of the Established Church, by which it was arranged that the archbishoprics of Cashel and Tuam, and eight bishoprics, were to be left unfilled on their becoming vacant. This measure was vigorously opposed by the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, and there were dismal prophecies of the results. The actual loss of spiritual light due to the extinction of these ecclesiastical stars was, however, less than was expected. In fact, we have entered on a period of progress and success in both the Established and Presbyterian churches. The clergy of the former showed an earnest and faithful interest in the spiritual and temporal welfare of their charges, in strong contrast to their predecessors of the eighteenth century; while among the Presbyterians new congregations were rapidly organized, and increased life shown in those already existing.

In 1840 a union was effected between the synod of Ulster and the secession synod. The 292 congregations of the synod of Ulster united with 141 seceding congregations to form the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

In 1869 the act of Parliament was passed, disestablishing and disendowing the Episcopal Church of Ireland. This bill went into effect Jan. 1, 1871.

The principal events of the secular history since the union were the Catholic emancipation (1829), which gave political enfranchisement to the Roman Catholics; the fearful famine of 1846, which, with emigration, reduced the population by more than a million and a half in five years; the abortive rising of 1848; the home-rule agitation, begun in 1874; and the passing of a land bill in 1881, securing to the tenant rights to any improvements he may make, in a manner that to some seems to infringe on the commonly accepted rights of property.

III. PRESENT CONDITION. — The population, after desolating wars such as the Elizabethan, has been estimated at much less than one million. At the end of the last century it had increased to nearly five millions, and in 1845 reached the astonishing maximum of 8,295,061. Then came the famine and emigration, and in 1851 the population was only a little more than six millions and a half. Emigration has kept up the decrease ever since, but at a slower rate. The census returns of 1881 showed a total of 5,159,839.

At the census of 1881 there were 3,951,881 Roman Catholics, 635,670 Protestant Episcopalians, 485,503 Presbyterians, and 47,669 Methodists; forming respectively, 76.6, 12.3, 9.4, and .9 per cent of the whole population. All other religious bodies, including about 4,500 Independents (or Congregationalists), about the same number of Baptists, about 4,000 Quakers, 453 Jews, and 1,144 persons who refused information, numbered only 39,109, or .8 per cent.

The Roman-Catholic Church is under the four archbishops of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam, and twenty-three bishops. On the death of a bishop, the clergy of the diocese nominate a successor to the vacancy; and the bishops of the province also name two or three persons. Usually the new bishop is chosen from the latter number, by the cardinals composing the congregation De Propagandâ Fide. There are nearly 1,000 parish priests, and 1,750 curates; and the total number of the clergy in all capacities is given as 3,198. The parishes number 1,084, and churches and chapels nearly 2,500.

The Maynooth Roman-Catholic College, founded in 1795, formerly received annual government grants, which in 1871 were commuted for the sum of £372,331. Although the Roman-Catholic Church in Ireland is in most things ultramontane, in national questions it has sometimes shown a strong spirit of independence.

The Protestant-Episcopal Church includes most of the land-holding class. It is under two arch-bishops and ten bishops. There are 33 dioceses, divided into groups of two, three, or four each, and about 1,300 benefices. There are 364 curates. The commissioners appointed for the purpose have paid over more than seven million and a half sterling in commutation of life-interests existing at the time of the disestablishment. Although the disestablishment has in some ways weakened the Protestant-Episcopal Church, principally with regard to the social standing of candidates for orders, yet, on the other hand, a spirit is making itself felt among the laity which promises much good for the future.

The strength of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland is chiefly in Ulster, where there is a large population of Scotch descent. Before the disestablishment, the Presbyterian Church received £40,000 annually, from the government. In 1880 the Church embraced 36 presbyteries, nearly 600 congregations, 79,214 families, and 104,769 communicants. The revenues were £139,840, of which £44,922 was paid to ministers, whose salary is made up in part in this way, and in part by their congregations. The Presbyterian College, Belfast, and the Magee College, Londonderry, are the "theological seminaries" of the Presbyterian Church.

The other Presbyterian bodies are inconsiderable. They are, the remonstrant synod of Ulster (1830), with 23 ministers; the presbytery of Antrim (1727), with 8 ministers; the northern presbytery of Antrim (1862), with 6 ministers; the remnant of the secession church in Ireland (which refused to unite in 1840), with 10 ministers; a branch of the United Presbyterians of Scotland, with 13 ministers; and two branches of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, or Covenanters, with about 34 ministers. The synod of Munster (1660), with 5 ministers, though in connection with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, is kept up for legal convenience with regard to certain properties held by it.

The Methodist Church in Ireland was formed in 1878, by the union of the Wesleyan Methodists with the Primitive Wesleyan Methodists. Its hundredth annual conference, held in Cork in June, 1881, had under its care 10 districts and 146 stations. The Methodist New Connection Church has only 7 stations.

The Congregational churches in Ireland have 21 ministers, and the association of Baptist churches 25. The Moravians have 8 congregations.

The oldest Irish university is that of Dublin, established 1591. The Queen's University, soon to be superseded by the Royal University, has colleges in Belfast, Cork, and Galway.

In 1880 the national school system maintained 7,590 schools, having on their rolls 1,083,020 pupils. In 1841, 53 per cent of the population could neither read nor write. In 1871 this percentage was reduced to 33 for the whole country, and to 27 for Ulster.

IRELAND, John, b. at Ashburton, Devonshire, Eng., Sept. 8, 1761; d. in London, Sept. 1, 1842. He was graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, 1780; took orders, and was made dean of Westminster 1816. He was the author of Five Discourses; containing Certain Arguments for and against the Reception of Christianity by the Ancient Jews and Greeks, London, 1796; Nuptiæ sacræ, or An Inquiry into the Scriptural Doctrine of Marriage and Divorce, London, 1821; The Plague of Marseilles in the Year 1720, London, 1834. Besides other benefactions, he left ten thousand pounds to establish at Oxford a professorship of biblical exegesis. This professorship has been held by Canon H. P. Liddon, D.D., since 1870.

IRENÆUS, Bishop of Lyons (Lugdunum), one of the most distinguished authors and theologians of the early Church; was b., probably in Asia Minor, about 115; d. in Lyons about 190 [usual date 202]. As the facts of his life are drawn, to a large extent, from his own writings, we will begin with a survey of the latter.

1. Writings.—The only work of Irenæus which has come down to us entire is his treatise against Gnosticism, Ἐλεγχος καὶ ἀνατροπὴ τῆς ψευδοδόξου γνώσεως ["Disproof and Refutation of the Gnosis falsely so called"]. It was written in Greek, but is preserved only in a Latin translation and some fragments of a Syriac version. A portion of the original Greek text has, however, been preserved by Epiphanius, who transcribed verbally the first book, to 21, 4, in his work on Heresies (31, 9-34), and quotes largely in other places without, however, mentioning the source. Hippolytus likewise drew from the Greek original of Irenæus in his Refutation of all Heresies (vi. 38, 42-52, vii. 32-37). This work of Irenæus was usually quoted by the shorter titles, πρὸς τὰς αἰρέσεις, or κατὰ αἰρέσεων ("Against the Heresies"), and Adv. hæreses, or Adv. hereticos ("Against Heretics"). Irenæus may have found occasion, in the prevalence of Gnostic errors in his own diocese, for composing this work, as some of the disciples of the Gnostic Marcus had come to that vicinity (i. 13, 7), and the writings of Florinus, an apostate to Valentinianism, were circulated in the congregations along the Rhone. But the primary occasion of the work was the request of a friend to be supplied with more definite information in regard to the doctrines of Valentinus. See Gnosticism.

The work itself consists of five books. In the first the author gives a description of the Gnostic heresies, and in the remaining four a refutation of them by summarizing the teachings of the evangelists and the Pauline Epistles. The work shows clearness of thought, but is somewhat discursive. He makes no pretension to literary finish, or elegance of Greek diction (i. Præf.), but eagerly pursues the one object in view. While it is his primary purpose to analyze and refute the Valentinian heresy, he takes in all heresies, inasmuch as it is only a "recapitulation of all heresies," and has its roots back in Simon Magus. He was acquainted with older treatises against heresies (iv. Præf.), but draws largely upon the writings of Valentinus and his personal contact with that Gnostic's disciples. The third book (iii. 21, 1) was written while Eleutherus was bishop of Rome (175-189). The Latin translation must have been made soon after the original was written, as Tertullian, in his treatise against the Valentinians (about 202-207), speaks of Irenæus as one of his authorities, and as the most "studious explorer of all doctrines" (omnium doctrinarum curiosissimus explorator).

Irenæus wrote at least two other works on the heresies, both addressed to Florinus, — ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς μοναρχίας ἢ περὶ μὴ εἶναι τὸν θεὸν ποιητὴν κακῶν ["A Letter concerning the Divine Sovereignty, or whether God is not the Creator of Evils"], and σπουδαῖα περὶ οὐδόου ["Zeal concerning the Ogdoad"]. Both these works are quoted by Eusebius. The latter is preserved in a Syriac translation. Irenæus took an active interest in the Easter controversies of his day (see EASTER), and wrote on this subject a letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, and probably his treatise addressed to the Roman Blastus, περὶ σχίσματος ["The Schism"]. Eusebius (v. 26) and Jerome refer to a Book of Various Discussions, which was probably a collection of homilies; and Eusebius (v. 26), to an apologetic work (πρὸς Ἑλλήνας, etc.), probably on the rule of faith. Other works attributed to him, as a Commentary on the Canticles, are of doubtful authenticity.

2. Life. — Irenæus spent the earlier years of his life in Asia Minor, and was probably born there early in the second century. He speaks (v. 30, 3) of the Apocalypse of John as "having been seen almost in our own generation at (or near) the close of Domitian's reign" (96). Irenæus' painstaking accuracy leaves no ground for extending this period to fifty years, and putting the date of his birth so late as 140 (Massuet) or 147 (Ziegler). These late dates are also incompatible with other positive testimonies in regard to his relations to Polycarp and other disciples of the apostles in Asia Minor; although it is doubtful whether Papias was among them, as Jerome states (Ep., 75, 3 ad Theodoram). He speaks in such a way of those "who had seen John face to face," and "of some who had not only seen John, but others of the apostles" (ii. 22 5; v. 5, 1; 30, 1; 33, 3; 36, 2), as to leave no doubt that he had been the recipient of verbal communications from them. Polycarp suffered martyrdom Feb. 23, 155. Of his relations to him he says (iii. 3, 4), ὃν καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐωράκμεν ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ ἡμῶν ἡλικίᾳ ἐπιπολὺ γὰρ παρέμεινε καὶ πάντῃ γεραλέος, ἐνόδως καὶ ἐπιφανέστατα μαρτυρήσας, etc. ["whom we also saw in our early years, for he remained a very long time, and at a great age was put to death, testifying most gloriously," etc.]. The period expressed by "early years" must evidently be used in the usual sense among the Greeks, for the years of early manhood, eighteen to thirty-five, especially as Irenæus himself reckons the thirtieth year to the "first period of life" (prima ætas), and extends it to the fortieth year (ii. 22, 5). As Polycarp was about a hundred years old when he suffered martyrdom at Smyrna, he would have been an aged man in 130, when we may think of Irenæus as having first seen him. Another evidence that Irenæus was born about 115, and lived in or near Smyrna between 130 and 140, is his acquaintance with Florinus. He reminds Florinus, in his letter to him, of having met him in Asia Minor, in company with Polycarp, while he (Irenæus) was still a boy (παῖς). Florinus was a court official. Lightfoot (Contemp. Rev., 1875) ventures the doubtful explanation that this does not mean that he was at the court of the then ruling emperor, but belonged to the household of Antoninus Pius, who afterwards became emperor, and was proconsul of Asia about 135. Rather must we think of one of the two visits of the Emperor Hadrian to Asia Minor, and of these the second, when he tarried for some time. Both visits occurred between 122 and 130, and the second about 129. Our assumption, then, of the year 115 as the date of Irenæus' birth falls in well with the description that he was still a boy (παῖς) at the time of his meeting with Florinus (129). The term παῖς ("boy"), however, is sometimes extended to an older period of life. Eusebius, for example, calls Origen a boy when he was a theological teacher, and certainly above eighteen (H. E., vi. 3, 3; 8, 1-5); and Constantine speaks of himself in the same way at the outbreak of the Diocletian persecution, when he was almost thirty (Euseb.: Vita Const., ii. 51, 1; comp. i. 19, 1).

Another evidence for the year 115 as the date of Irenæus' birth is the fact that he was resident in Rome as a teacher at the time of Polycarp's death (155). The account of Polycarp's martyrdom (Martyrium Polyc.), written, at the latest, before the close of the fourth century, is our credible authority on this point. In this case it draws from one of Irenæus' own works; and as, in other cases where it draws from Irenæus' great work, it is accurate, so we may expect it to be in this. This residence in Rome explains the lively interest Irenæus afterwards took in the Roman Church, and his accurate acquaintance with its traditions, as the short sojourn in 177 scarcely can. He speaks of details of the pontificates of Anicetus (d. 166) and his immediate predecessors (i. 25, 6; iii. 4, 3); and his double account of Polycarp's visit to Rome leaves upon us the impression that he accompanied him on that visit, — an impression which is confirmed by the account of Pionius.

What it was that led Irenæus to Gaul is not known. In 177 he is a presbyter at Lyons, whom the confessors then lying in prison there chose as their representative before Eleutherus, bishop of Rome (d. 189). During the persecutions at Lyons, therefore, he went to Rome (Euseb.: H. E., v. 3, 4). At his return he was elected bishop, to succeed the martyred Pothinus. He took an active part in the Quarto-deciman, or Easter controversies of the day, and wrote to Victor, bishop of Rome, in the interest of peace and liberty. Jerome (Com. in Es., xvii.) mentions cursorily that he died a martyr. Ziegler and Harvey (ii. 454) have mentioned other authorities on this point, but they are of little value. Hippolytus, Tertullian, Eusebius, and others do not speak of it. [Irenæus occupies a prominent position as a theologian, and "is the first of all the church teachers to give a careful analysis of the work of redemption, and his view is by far the deepest and soundest we find in the first three centuries" (SCHAFF: Ch. Hist., i. 297). He also occupies a very important position as a link in the chain of evidence for the authenticity of John's Gospel, himself being the disciple of Polycarp, who, in turn, was the disciple of John, as well as for the whole canon of the New Testament.]

IRENÆUS OF TYRE represented the Emperor Theodosius II. at the Council of Ephesus, 431, and espoused the cause of Nestorius, but was, for that very reason, banished from the court; and, when the Oriental bishops made him bishop of Tyre (445), he was deposed and banished by an imperial decree. Of his Greek work on the Nestorian controversy, only some fragments of a Latin translation are still extant: Variarum Patrum Epistolæ ad Concilium Ephes. pertinentes, ed. Christian Lupus, Louvain, 1682.

IRENÆUS, Christoph, b. at Schweidnitz, Saxony, d. at Horn, Austria, at unknown dates; was appointed pastor at Eisleben in 1562, and afterwards court-preacher at Weimar, but was discharged and banished in 1572, as one of the noisiest champions of Flacius; emigrated to Austria, and published a pamphlet against the first article of the Formula Concordiæ, 1581; and another, Vom Bilde Gootes, 1585.

IRENE, b. at Athens, 752, in very humble circumstances; d. in destitution, in the Isle of Lesbos, 803; was married in 769 to the Emperor Leo IV., and ruled over the Eastern Empire with great vigor and adroitness, from his death in 780 to her banishment in 802. Her passion was power; and for its gratification she dared any thing, from the most hideous crimes to the most ridiculous absurdities. She had her own son, Constantine VI., blinded in order to make him unfit to reign; and she proposed marriage to Charlemagne in order to unite the Eastern and Western empires. But, in spite of all her crimes and cruelties, she is a saint of the Greek Church; for she overthrew the iconoclasts, and re-established image-worship; which article see. At last, however, she was over-reached by her own treasurer, Nicephorus, deposed, and banished to the Isle of Lesbos, where she earned her living by spinning.

IRENICAL THEOLOGY, or IRENICS (from εἰρήνη, "peace"), presents the points of agreement among Christians with a view to the ultimate unity, if not organic union, of Christendom. It is the opposite of polemics, yet its legitimate successor, heir by divine right to its territory. It seeks to show how large is the common ground, and how comparatively unimportant are the points in dispute. In every age of the Church there have been peace-loving spirits; such as Gregory of Nazianzus and Chrysostom in the Nicene age; Melancthon and Butzer in the sixteenth century; Calixtus, Grotius, Baxter, Dury, Spener, Zinzendorf, and Neander in later times. The union of the various denominations in Christian work proves the existence of the irenical temper, and, so far as it is the result of a recognition of the common Christianity, it is to be applauded; but there is a sort of irenics which results from indifference, and such a temper is reprehensible.

The noble sentence of Rupertus Meldenus (often falsely attributed to Augustine) — "In necessary things, unity; in unnecessary things, liberty; in all things, charity" — has probably contributed as much as any treatise to bring about brotherhood among Christians. But there is quite a literature on the subject, of which we may mention ERASMUS: De amabili ecclesiæ concordia; JOHN DURY: Irenicorum tractatum Prodromus, Amsterdam, 1662; J. C. KÖCHER: Bibliotheca theologica irenica, Jena, 1764. Die Irenik is the fourth part of LANGE'S Dogmatik (Heidelberg, 1852); but the word is used in a broad sense, and applied to the common ground between Christian and Pagan religious thought. The existence of the Evangelical Alliance, of the Kirchentag in Germany (see art.), and the family gatherings among those holding the same polity, — such as the Pan-Presbyterian, Pan-Anglican, and Pan-Methodist councils, — are so many indications that the days of fiery debate among Protestants are over. But whether there can be peaceful, self-respecting intercourse between Protestants and Roman and Greek Catholics is a different matter. In these latter churches the elements of truth are deeply buried under sad and destructive errors: nevertheless it is sincerely to be desired that there might be more kindly feeling than now exists. Protestants cannot afford to denounce unsparingly those who hold to the distinguishing doctrines of Christianity. The Catholic is still a Christian. See HERZOG, ed. i., vol. vii. 60 sqq.; also H. G. HASSE: Grundlinien christlicher Irenik, Leipzig, 1882.

IRREGULARITIES denote, in canon law, such defects as prevent a person from receiving ecclesiastical orders. The statutes are based on 1 Tim. iii. 2 sqq., Tit. i. 6 sqq., Lev. xxi., and comprise irregularities of two kinds, — irregularitates ex defectu and irregularitates ex delicto. To the first class belong illegitimate birth, bodily deformity, uncanonical age, lack of education, the pursuit of certain professions which may make a person instrumental to the death of his fellow-men (soldiers, judges, though not physicians), etc. To the second class belong all crimes which have become public, and also some crimes, such as heresy and apostasy, though they have not become public. The Pope, however, and, in certain cases, also the bishops, have the right of giving dispensation from these irregularities. There is nothing corresponding to them among Protestants.

P. HINSCHIUS.

IRVING, Edward, an original and distinguished preacher, and the real founder of the Catholic Apostolic Church, was b. in Annan, Scotland, Aug. 4, 1792, and d. in Glasgow, Dec. 7, 1834. His father was a tanner. At the age of thirteen he went to the University of Edinburgh, and, graduating four years afterward, he took a school at Haddington, and in 1812 one at Kirkcaldy. At the former place he was the tutor of Jane Welsh, afterwards the wife of Carlyle. In 1815 he was licensed to preach, and in 1818 he left the school-room to seek a pastoral settlement. After long waiting, he was thinking seriously of offering himself as a foreign missionary, when Dr. Chalmers invited him to become his assistant in Glasgow (1819). There he remained till 1822, when he was called to the Caledonian Church, London. The audience, which was at first small, grew rapidly, until it completely filled the church. A reference to Irving's eloquence by Canning on the floor of Parliament, is thought to have contributed to this result. Two years later a new church was built on Regent Square. Irving was a man of commanding form and stature (six feet two inches tall), with pale, meagre, but interesting face, coal-black hair reaching down to his shoulders, eyes from which he looked forth somewhat obliquely, but with an expression of severe, holy earnestness, not unmingled with self-consciousness. His utterances were pregnant with original thoughts, but florid, and adorned by the figures of a rich imagination. Walter Scott said he missed in his sermons the chaste simplicity which is seemingly in a sermon. They were unusually long.

Irving's mind was especially moving in the realm of eschatological problems, and in 1823 he published an Argument for the Judgment to come. Then he gave himself up to the study of a work on the second coming of Christ, which had appeared in Spanish under the name of Ben Ezra (1812), and which influenced him so powerfully that he published a translation of it [with an original Introduction in 1827]. In his thought upon these subjects, in which he became in an increasing measure engrossed during the remainder of his life, he found a kindred spirit in Henry Drummond, a rich banker, who afterwards took a prominent part in the Irvingite movement. Irving was in the mean time departing in some particulars from the received doctrine of the Scottish Church, and preached that the decree of salvation was a universal one; that Christ assumed human nature as it was, — corrupted by sin, — without, however, himself sinning. He also adopted the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. His theological opinions were largely influenced by Richard Hooker [“the venerable companion of my early days”]. In 1830 he was accused before the presbytery of London for his views on the humanity of Christ, and condemned; but he appealed to the General Synod.

In 1830 the news was spread abroad of the strange speaking with tongues which had occurred in widely separated parts of Scotland. Mr. Cardale, a Scotch lawyer, brought the news to London, and in 1831 his wife and a Mr. Taplin began to “prophesy,” and speak in an unknown tongue, in Irving's church. Irving fell in with the movement, heartily convinced of its scriptural basis and divine authority. Forsaken by a large part of his congregation, he began to hold services, on May 6, 1832, with eight hundred communicants, in a new place of worship. To the Scotch presbytery of Annan the synod had referred Irving's appeal, and before it he appeared. But his plea was in vain; and in 1833 he was condemned, and excluded from the Church. On his return to London, Cardale, who had been before recognized as an apostle, forbade his administering the sacraments, until, instructed by a prophecy of Taplin, he ordained Irving bishop, or “angel” of a special congregation. His health, however, was plainly undermined. In 1834 he went to Scotland, in obedience to a prophecy which predicted that he would labor there as a great prophet, and convert the masses; but he almost immediately fell a victim to consumption in Glasgow at the age of forty-two [fully convinced of the truth of his views, and confiding in the prophecy that God had a great work for him to do in Scotland, and repeating as his last words, “In life and in death I am the Lord's.” Of him his friend Thomas Carlyle, a kindred nature in the originality of his mind, imposing impressiveness of personality, and strength of will, writing in 1835 said, “His was the freest, brotherliest, bravest human soul mine ever came in contact with. I call him, on the whole, the best man I have ever found in this world, or hope to find.” This admiration suffered no abatement with years, and in 1867 he again took up his pen to commemorate Irving's strong personality. He regarded his friend as having been the victim of hallucination, but passed a high tribute (as far as he could do so in his atrabilious temper of mind) upon his purity of motives, straightforward honesty, and that “style of modesty and friendly magnanimity which no mortal could surpass.” See Mrs. OLIPHANT'S Life of Edward Irving, London (3d ed., 1865); EDW. ISAAC (פִּיִּץ or פִּיִּץ', "laughter"), the son of Abraham and Sarah, is a much less conspicuous and energetic personality than his father. He was an occasion to Abraham for the display of faith and obedience, in his circumcision (Gen. xxi. 4), and his willingness to offer him up as a sacrifice (Gen. xxii.). Isaac shows his dutifulness by marrying Rebekah, as Abraham wished him to do, and this when he was already forty years old. He was generous to his friends, and always yielded to his neighbors (Gen. xxvi. 20 sqq.), but won the respect of more powerful chiefs, who considered it advisable to be on good terms with the "blessed of the Lord" (Gen. xxvi. 28 sqq.). Isaac's importance consists mainly in the fact that he was the link extending the blessing of the covenant from Abraham to Jacob. Two sons were born to him late in life (Gen. xxv. 21); and although he preferred the older, Esau, he was deceived into conferring the blessing upon Jacob, the younger. A feud broke out, in consequence, between the two brothers; but the death of the father, in his hundred and eightieth year, was the occasion of their reconciliation. Isaac bowed submissively to the dispensations of Providence; and, although the weakest of the three patriarchs, he represents the pious fidelity which quietly preserves the inherited blessing. The later Jews regarded him as the prototype of the martyrs.

[Josephus says that Isaac was twenty-five years old when Abraham led him into the land of Moriah, to sacrifice him. There is no other authority for this statement. But it is evident that Isaac was at least a lad, as the father placed the wood of sacrifice on his back for him to carry (Gen. xxii. 6). He was not only a dutiful son, but a constant and gentle husband, and in all his trials seems to have been a pattern of resignation and humility. Tertullian and others of the fathers, and Fairbairn and others in modern times, regard him as a type of Christ in this respect. The discussion of the sacrifice of Isaac belongs most properly under ABRAHAM; but this much may be said here: (1) The ancient idea, universally prevalent, that the son was the property of the father, pervades the whole account of the event, as Professor Mozley specially insists. (2) It was God who commanded the deed. (3) The whole circumstance was designed to try and to strengthen the faith of Abraham. (4) It was a vivid object-lesson, warning the Hebrews for all future time against human sacrifices.] See the Histories of Israel, of KURTZ, EWALD, HENGSTENBERG [STANLEY]; BERNSTEIN: *Ursprung d. Sagen v. Abraham, Isaac, u. ISAAC OF ANTIOCH. The question whether there was one or several Syriac church-writers of the name Isaac, the Monophysite, Jacob of Edessa, of the seventh century, answers by mentioning three (Wright: Catalogue ii., 603 sq.), — two "orthodox," and one "a Chalcedonian heretic;" namely (I.) Isaac of Amid, who was a pupil of Ephraem Syrus, and went to Rome during the reign of Arcadius, to see the Capitol, but was imprisoned for a long time in Constantinople, while on his return; (II.) Isaac of Edessa, who in the reign of the Emperor Zeno, and during the patriarchate of Petrus Fullo, came to Antioch, and preached against the Nestorians, deriving his text from a parrot, which could screech the trisagion, with the addition, ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμῶν; and another (III.) Isaac of Edessa, who was orthodox in the time of Bishop Paul (512), but a Nestorian in the time of Bishop Asclepius (522).

Gennadius knows two Syriac church-writers of the name Isaac. The latter of them he calls a "presbyter of the Church of Antioch," and ascribes to him a very long life, during which he wrote much in Syria, and finally, during the reign of Leo and Majorianus, a great elegiac poem lamenting the destruction of Antioch (459). Bickell identifies the two first Isaacs of Jacob of Edessa with the second Isaac of Gennadius, and considers him to be orthodox; though his sermons contain no direct recognition of the synod of Chalcedon, but, on the contrary, a number of passages of rank Monophysitism, which Bickell can explain away only by assuming very large interpolations. One point, however, may be considered as settled: the book De contemptu mundi (Magna Bibl., IV., 2, 688, Col. 1618; Lugd., XI. 1019; Gallandi XII. 2) does not belong to Isaac of Antioch, but to Isaac Ninivita, who lived a century later on, and to whom it is ascribed both by the Greek edition of Nicephorus Theotokius, Leipzig, 1770, and by the Syriac and Arabian manuscripts.

ISAAC LEVITA, b. at Wetzlar 1515; studied rabbinical lore, and filled for several years the office of a rabbi, but was by the study of the Messianic prophecies led to embrace Christianity; assumed the name of Johann Isaac Levi; and was appointed professor of Hebrew and Chaldee languages at Louvain 1546, and at Cologne 1551. He wrote several works on Hebrew grammar, which were much valued in their time, also a defence of the trustworthiness of the Old Testament: Defensio Veritatis H. Sac. Script., Cologne, 1559.

ISA'IAH (יִשְׁעִיָּה, or יִשְׁעִיָּה) was the greatest of the Hebrew prophets. His name has been derived from יִשְׁעָ [in which case it means "Salvation of Jehovah"]. But I prefer the derivation from יִשְׁעָ ("to look"), and the pronunciation יִשְׁעִיָּה ("Yishāyahu"), or יִשְׁעִיָּה ("Yishaya"). There are only two notices of Isaiah in the Bible outside of the prophecy itself and 2 Kings xviii. sqq. In 2 Chron. xxvi. 22 it is said, "The rest of the acts of Uzziah did Isaiah the son of Amoz write." This may refer to a special work of Isaiah not preserved, or to a portion of the Book of the Kings, or to the first six chapters of the prophecy. It has afforded ground for some critics to maintain that the first five chapters date, in whole or in part, from the early years of Uzziah's reign. But it is evident that nothing definite can be drawn from the words. The second notice (2 Chron. xxxii. 32) reads, "The rest of the acts of Hezekiah . . . are written in the vision of Isaiah," etc. This undoubtedly refers to the prophecy of Isaiah, which is called the "vision of Isaiah" (i. 1). But from very ancient times many have found here a trace of another work of Isaiah. An attempt to imitate or restore such a work has come down to us in the so-called Vision of Isaiah, which is combined with an account of the prophet's martyrdom. This work was cited by Origen, and has been edited from Ethiopic manuscripts by Laurence (1819) and Dillmann (1877), under the title Ascensio Isaiaë. A Christian was undoubtedly its author (Dillmann); but the matter was a subject of Jewish tradition, and we meet with it in other places. It states that Isaiah suffered a violent death in the reign of Manasseh, being sawn asunder with a wooden saw (see Justin: Dial. c. Tryph., ed. Otto, p. 430), after an iron one had been tried in vain (see v. Gebhardt's edition of the Greek account of the martyrdom in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr., 1878, p. 341). Origen says the condemnation was based upon the prophet's blasphemous utterances concerning God and Jerusalem (iii. 6-12). The Gemara also says that Manasseh put Isaiah to death, but goes on to narrate that he was encompassed by a cedar, which they sawed through until Isaiah's blood flowed out like water (see also Targum in Cod. Reuchlin, at Isa. lxvi. 1). The Roman Church celebrates his martyrdom July 6; the Greek, May 9. One fact, at least, may with certainty be derived from these traditions; namely, that Isaiah died in the reign of Manasseh. Combining this fact with the statement that Isaiah prophesied "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah" (i. 1), we conclude that his public life began some time in Uzziah's reign, and extended into that of Manasseh. More definitely (according to vi. 1) it began in the fifty-second year of Uzziah's reign, which was the year of his death. Uzziah died 758 B.C.; and, if we suppose that Isaiah was twenty years old at that time, he would have been eighty-one at the beginning of Manasseh's reign (in 696 B.C.); so that it is not necessary at all to assume that Isaiah lived to an unusually great age.

These years of Isaiah's prophetic activity (758-690 B.C.) were years of the most varied events and decisive changes. Here belong the protracted attempts of the Assyrian kings to become masters of Palestine and Syria. In the realization of this design they were hampered by the Medes and the repeated attempts of the Babylonians to throw off the Assyrian yoke, as well as by the Egyptians, whose foreign policy had begun to be aggressive. The Jews of Jerusalem were kept informed of the movements in the political world by communications from their exiled brethren in Assyria, and by the various expeditions which passed through the land; so that it is not to be wondered at that the prophet's vision took in, not only the small neighboring peoples, but also tribes living at a distance. At this period the northern kingdom was torn by tribal jealousy, and sought an alliance, now with Assyria, and now with Egypt. Uzziah, king of Judah, and his successor Jotham, seem to have essayed to hold the kingdom aloof from political complications by strengthening the defences, and accumulating war materials. But Ahaz pursued a different policy, and depended more upon the Assyrian monarch than upon Jehovah. Hezekiah, however, felt that he held his kingdom only in trust, and that Jehovah exercised supernatural agency to preserve it. The lesson these circumstances were meant to teach the people of Israel was, that they should not renounce the old faith; that Jehovah, as the God of Israel, was working out his purpose, which was to be honored everywhere on the earth, and to establish a kingdom which should not be limited to Jerusalem or Israel. The carnal hopes of those who looked for external glory for the kingdom, in spite of their sins and unrighteousness, were declared to be fallacious. The Jerusalem which opened its doors to heathen luxury, and ignored mercy, was not the Jerusalem from which the light of the knowledge of God was to beam forth to all peoples. God could, without denying his promise to Abraham, lead the people into foreign bondage, and desolate the land of Israel. The national catastrophe meant disappointment for such carnal hopes; but a remnant was to be preserved, which should be animated by a new life, and enjoy an undying glory. The house of David, which had disappeared in the darkness, was to revive again in the royal son of a virgin; and the tree of Jesse, which had been cut down, to flourish again in a new scion. To this remnant belong only those who in humble faith recognized the hand of God in the calamities of the nation, and obeyed his will. It was the invisible church, known only to God, and pervaded by moral life. For the prophet himself, the supreme idea was the separation of a congregation of the Spirit, of faith and righteousness of life.

Isaiah was led to this train of thought by his own experiences and the events narrated in his prophecy. He was a citizen of Jerusalem, had at least two sons (vii. 3, viii. 1), treated his wife and children as living pictures, and emblems of what he announced, and looked back to the vision of vi. 1 as the turning-point of his thought and life, which made it possible for him to stand firm, without distrust or fear, where all was unstable and dark (viii. 11 sqq.). He regarded it as his duty to train up a body of disciples to retain their trust in God, but with resignation looked forward to the destruction of Jerusalem as an unavoidable event, and counselled unreserved submission to the Assyrian power. It becomes a matter of no surprise that a prophet who identified himself so closely with public affairs should have gathered about him a body of disciples. For these disciples, as well as for future generations, he wrote down his utterances; and there can be no doubt that he wrote much. The only question that arises is, whether the book which goes by his name has come down in its original form. In the consideration of this question, it will help us little to trace out evidences of the style and spirit of Isaiah in different parts of the book (for what was that style and spirit?) or to fall back upon certain prepossessions of what God is able to reveal through prophecy concerning the future.

All historical investigation about the authenticity of the prophecy must start from the account of Isaiah in chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix. It was placed by the editor between two series of anonymous prophecies, of which the preceding one relates the transformation of the Assyrian, and the succeeding one the transformation of the Babylonian, oppression into salvation for Judah. It is unscholarly and arbitrary to make a break at the end of chap. xxxv. and at chap. xxxix., as though one had reached, in chap. xl. 1, the coast of an unknown land. These portions all belong together. He who has read chap. xxv. 3, 4, finds nothing strange in xl. 1; and only he who has read chaps. xxviii.—xxxix. understands xlvi. 3-11, and appreciates that one and the same prophet (xlvi. 16) distinguishes two periods in his prophetic activity, whose utterances run along parallel lines, and who, on the basis of their fulfilment in the first period, can demand obedience in the second. He who consents to recognize chaps. xxviii.—xxxv., as a whole, as Isaiah's, has no scientific ground for denying that chaps. xl.—lxvi. are essentially his also. The main difficulties have been, that Cyrus is predicted by name, the overthrow of the Babylonian power, and the liberation of the Jews. But if the description of the servant of Jehovah, which suits Jesus of Nazareth best, was fulfilled, why not the prediction concerning Cyrus? The freer from prejudices the student is, the more certainly will he conclude that chaps. xl.—lxvi. contain prophecies of Isaiah, although arranged in their present form by another hand than his.

In the narrative of chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix. we learn, that from the thirteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, until after Sennacherib's campaign, Isaiah stood in high esteem at court, and his word was accepted as authority. In the six prophecies of chaps. xxviii.—xxxv. the author takes the same position that the author of chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix. does concerning the invasion of Sennacherib. Chaps. xxxiv. and xxxv. have been denied to Isaiah, and been referred to the time of the exile; but this certainly would never have been done if the wilderness (xxxv.) had not been arbitrarily explained to be the wilderness lying between Babylon and Judah, and the Book of Jehovah (xxxiv. 16) been explained to be the Book of Isaiah.

The other two portions of Isaiah (ii.—xii. and xiii.—xxvii.) bear Isaiah's name. Here we find many parallels with chaps. xxviii.—xxxix. (comp. ii. 20 with xxx. 22, iii. 8-iv. 1 with xxxii. 1-20, etc.); but the plan of chaps. ii.—xii. agrees remarkably with the plan of chaps. xxviii.—xxxv. We may, it seems to me, confidently assert that all of this section belongs to Isaiah, although parts of it (v.—xii.) may not be preserved in the order in which they belong. The prophetic utterances of the second portion (xiii.—xxvii.) are distinguished by being the expression of the mind immediately under the influence of its ecstatic emotion. In the first part, the ruling thought is the preservation of David's throne and city by Jehovah, and their restoration to a position of glorious prosperity. In the second, the ruling thought is the universal kingdom of Jehovah arising out of his judgments upon the peoples, and the humiliation of all human greatness. The whole consists of prophecies of Isaiah with older fragments.

ISH'BO'SHETH (אִישְׁבוֹשֶׁת, "man of shame") was that son of Saul who survived the ruin of his father's family in the battle of Gilboa. His real name was Esh-baal (1 Chron. ix. 39), which a later generation gave up in order to avoid the use of the name Baal. Abner, Saul's captain, espoused the claims of Ishbosheth after the death of his father and three brothers, and he was proclaimed king of the trans-Jordanic tribes and all Israel, the house of Judah alone remaining true to David (2 Sam. ii. 8-10). He was about forty years old at the time. He was a timid man, and depended very largely upon Abner. The latter was called to account for his intimate relations with the king's concubine, Rizpah, but in turn reproached the king for his ingratitude, and declared he would espouse the cause of David. Ishbosheth gave up his sister Michal to David, at his request. Abner now plotted to deliver up the northern tribes to David, but was murdered by Joab (2 Sam. iii. 2-39). Ishbosheth himself was murdered by two of his officers. They cut off his head, and carried it to David. But David gave it honorable burial, and put the assassins to death (2 Sam. iv. 1-12).

ISH'MAEL (אִשְׁמָאֵל, "God hears") was the son of Abraham and Hagar (an Egyptian slave). He was circumcised at the age of thirteen (Gen. xvii. 25), but was sent away with his mother, reluctantly, by Abraham, to satisfy Sarah, who had become jealous of the playful (wrongly translated mocking) lad (Gen. xxi. 9). The rabbins falsely explained the word, of malicious bantering treatment of Isaac. In the desert of Beersheba, Hagar received a revelation, when she and her son seemed to be destined to die for want of water. The narrative (Gen. xxi. 9 sqq.), which represents Ishmael as a tender lad, seems to be inconsistent with Gen. xvii. 25, according to which he was circumcised at thirteen, and must have been at least fifteen when he was sent away by Abraham. But the passages xxi. 14, 15, 18, do not imply that he was carried on his mother's arm, which is the popular idea. Ishmael united with Isaac in burying his father (xxv. 9), and died at the age of a hundred and thirty-seven (xxv. 17). The descendants of Ishmael were not heirs of the covenant promise, but became very numerous. Twelve Arab tribes looked back to him as their ancestor (xxv. 12-18). The general character of these descendants was indicated in the words spoken of Ishmael: "He will be a man like a wild ass, his hand against every man, and every man against him" (xvi. 12). This is a masterly characterization, to which the wandering life of those tribes, shunning every place of civilization, accurately corresponds. They have ever since lived by their flocks and their bow, in the use of which they became skilful, like their ancestor (Gen. xxi. 20; Isa. xxi. 17). They inhabited the desert east of Palestine, and stretched in a southerly direction to the Persian Gulf and over Northern Arabia. The Moslem Arabs, who speak with pride of their descent from Ishmael, say that he and his mother, Hagar, lie buried in the Caaba at Mecca.

ISIDORE MERCATOR, a fictitious person, a mere name, gotten up and put into circulation by a mistake. In the introductory matter to the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, there occur a quotation from Isidore of Seville, and another from Marius Mercator. By a combination of those two quotations, an Isidore Mercator was made up; but he never existed. See HINSCHUS: Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianæ, Leipzig, 1863.

ISIDORE OF MOSCOW, d. in Rome, April 27, 1463; was a native of Thessalonica; entered the Church at Constantinople, and was in 1437 made metropolitan of the Russian Church. As such he attended the Council of Florence, and labored, together with Bessarion, zealously for the union of the Eastern and Western churches. The czar, however, was dissatisfied with the result of the negotiations, imprisoned him, and condemned him to be burnt alive. But he escaped, sought refuge in Rome, and was afterwards employed by Nicholas V. as ambassador to Constantinople.

ISIDORE OF PELUSIUM, b. not after 370; d. not before 431; was a native of Alexandria, and spent most of his life as presbyter and abbot of a monastery at Pelusium. He left about two thousand letters, which represent him as one of the noblest religious characters of the age, in intimate connection with all the most prominent men of his time. In dogmatics he is orthodox, so far as an orthodoxy was established in the Greek Church at that period. But he is much more interesting as an exegete than as a dogmatist. Many of his letters are devoted to the exposition of Scriptures; and, though he does not altogether abstain from allegory, principally he places isotopia far beyond theopia. The greatest interest, however, he yields as a practical moralist. Monastic life he represents as the true ideal of Christian life; but he is by no means blind to the many peculiar dangers, illusions, and vices which may be engendered in a monastery. Collected editions of these letters appeared in Paris, 1638, 5 vols., folio, and in MIGNÉ: Patrol. Græca, vol. 58. See P. B. GLÜCK: Isidori P. Summa Doctrinæ Moralæ, Wirceb., 1848. W. MÖLLER.

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (Isidorus Hispalensis, also called Isidorus Junior, in contradistinction to Isidore of Cordova), b. 500, at Carthage, or Seville; d. in the latter city April 4, 636; descended from a noble Roman (not Gothic) family, and was, after the early death of his parents, educated by his elder brother, Leander, Bishop of Seville, whom he succeeded in 600. For thirty-six years he governed his diocese with unflagging vigor and great dignity, presided over the synods of Seville (619) and Toledo (633), founded several institutions for the better education of the clergy, and exercised a lasting influence on Spanish legislation, civil as well as ecclesiastical. But it was as an author that he achieved his greatest fame. He wrote on nearly every branch of science then known; and, though his books are distinguished by industry and learning rather than by genius and originality, they are far from being mere compilations, and in the dark ages they were almost the only light shining. We have two old lists of his works,—one by his friend and colleague, Bishop Branlio of Saragossa; and another by his pupil, Ildefonsus of Toledo; and all the works enumerated in these lists are still extant. The principal ones are: Officiorum Libri II., a kind of ecclesiastical archaeology, the first book treating of the institutions and their working-materials, the second of the officers and their functions, the whole dedicated to his younger brother Fulgentius, Bishop of Astigi; De Natura Rerum, a compendium of natural history, specially edited by G. Becker, Berlin, 1857; Sententiarum sive de Summo Bono Libri III., his most important theological work, the first book treating of dogmatics, the two last of ethics; De Viris Illustribus, a continuation of Jerome and Gennadius, containing biographies of forty-six authors,—fourteen Spaniards between Hosius of Cordova and his own time, and thirty-two foreigners between Pope Xystus and Gregory the Great; Etymologicæ sive Origines, his most famous work, a kind of theological encyclopædia, and still of great value. Besides the works mentioned in the above lists, several of his letters have come down to us, and there circulate under his name a large number of spurious works, even poems; thus the so-called Isidorian Decretals have no connection whatever with him. The best collected edition of his works is that by Faustinus Arevalus, Rome, 1797-1803, 7 vols. quarto, reprinted in MIGNE: Patr. Lat., vol. 81-83.

LIT. — The sources of his life have been gathered together by AREVALUS (vol. i., ii.), and reprinted by MIGNE. Modern biographies have been written by CAJETAN (Rome, 1616), DUMESNIL (Paris, 1843), and COLLOMBET (Paris, 1846).

IS'RAEL, Biblical History of. Israel's history commences with the call of Abraham, who, as the rock whence Israel was hewn (Isa. li. 1), was not only at the head of the people of the old covenant, but also of the people of the new covenant in consequence of the organic connection (Gal. iii. 29). Whilst the nations of the earth went their own ways, in which they developed their natural characteristics, in the seed of Abraham a people were to be raised, which, in their particular formation, were to be, not the result of natural development, but the product of the creative power and grace of God (Deut. xxxii. 6); thus not only forming a contrast to the nations of the world, but also containing the germ of removing this contrast, since all nations of the earth were to be blessed in the seed of Abraham (Gen. xii. 3, xviii. 18). The character and future of the people of God are depicted in the life of his patriarchs and in the promises given to them by God, who calls himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob (Gen. xii. 2-7, xiii. 15 sq., xv. 5, xvii. 6 sq., xviii. 18, xxii. 17, xxvi. 2 sq., xxviii. 14, xxxv. 11 sq.; Exod. iii. 6, 15).

The patriarchal period closes with the migration of Jacob and his family into Egypt, where Israel was to become a people. Here, it seems, the people were ruled by elders and other officers, who, again, were under Egyptian masters. The great mass was given to idolatry (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7 sq., xxiii. 3, 8, 19); and the remembrance of the God of the fathers, and of the promises given to them, had to be revived first in the people. The deliverance of Israel is narrated in Exodus. To stop the rapid increase of the people, heavy tasks were laid upon them by the Egyptians. At last a royal edict was issued to kill all newly-born male children. At the point of this deepest humiliation, when the people were like a helpless child cast out in the open field, and polluted in its own blood (Ezek. xvi. 5, 6), the promise given to the fathers was to be inaugurated, and El-Shaddai was to be revealed as Jehovah. Moses is born, and raised up as a deliverer of the people. In the ten plagues the battle of the living God with the national deities is victoriously fought (Exod. xii. 12; Num. xxxiii. 4), thus foreshadowing the triumph of the kingdom of God over heathenism (Exod. xv. 11, xviii. 11). Moses leads the people, who were not yet ready for the battle with the nations of Canaan, not by the way of the land of the Philistines to Canaan (Exod. xiii. 17), but through the desert of the Sinaitic peninsula. Here they are persecuted by the Egyptians. The people are told to go on. A heavy gale drives the water back. Israel in the noise of the elements is led by its God like a flock (Ps. lxxvii. 16-20; Isa. lxiii. 11) through the Red Sea; but the Egyptians were buried by the water. "And the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord and his servant Moses" (Exod.

xiv. 31). To prepare the people for their theocratic calling, they had to remain in the desert (Deut. viii. 2-5, 14-18). The law was given by which the tribes of Israel became a holy communion, and thus "he was king in Jeshurun" (Deut. xxxiii. 5). The sacrifice of the covenant sealed the entrance of the people into the communion of the holy God. The manner in which the covenant of the law is made shows both the electing love of that God who here enters into a covenant with his people (Ezek. xvi. 8), and the holy zeal of the Holy One of Israel and of his law (Amos iii. 2). As for grace and judgment, Israel is now the privileged people.

By means of the covenant, Jehovah was to dwell among his people. But, before the laws concerning the building of the sanctuary were given, the people, in the absence of Moses, make a calf, and break the covenant. Moses causeth the idolaters to be slain, the tribe of Levi showing especial zeal for the honor of Jehovah. Moses intercedes for the people, till at last pardon is granted. The first breaking of the covenant leads to the new revelation of Jehovah as the merciful and gracious (Exod. xxxiv. 6). During the first year's residence at Sinai, the holy tabernacle is erected and dedicated, and such laws were given as would distinguish the people from the Egyptians and the Canaanitish tribes (Lev. xviii. 3 sq., xx. 23 sq.). A census is then taken; and the encampment is ordered, and regulations about the tribe of Levi are made. In the second year, on the 20th of the second month, the journey from the wilderness of Sinai to the wilderness of Paran began. Moses sends spies to Canaan. Their evil report causes a general murmuring (Num. xiv. 1 sq.). As a punishment, the people had now to remain forty years in the wilderness, where Moses also died, after having appointed Joshua his successor. Joshua, by divine direction, waged a successful war against the inhabitants of the promised land, and distributed the conquered territory among the tribes of Israel. The people are warned, that, by transgressing the law of God, the same punishment will be inflicted upon them as was upon the Canaanites (Deut. viii. 19 sq.; Josh. xxiii. 15 sq.). After the death of Joshua, the people were ruled by the so-called "Shophetæ," or judges. During this period, the Israelites were steeped in idolatry, for which they were punished; though, on their repentance, they were always re-instated in the divine favor through the judges whom God raised up for them. Towards the end of the so-called "time of the judges," the temporal and spiritual supreme power seems to have resided in the high priest Eli, at Shiloh; but his administration was sullied by such sins, that God allowed the Philistines to be victorious over his people, and even to capture the holy ark (1 Sam. iv.). The loss of this great national treasure seems to have at last awakened throughout all the tribes the consciousness of their forming one nation; and when, at last, the ark was recovered, Samuel, who had succeeded Eli as high priest and judge, obtained a hold upon the nation which seemed to have recognized his authority. In Samuel's time the tribes renewed their wish, formerly expressed to Gideon (Judg. viii. 22 sq.), for a king. Samuel yielded to the request in such a manner, that the theocratic principle was preserved; the Lord being now, as before, the real king of the people, whilst the king as his anointed was subject to him. Saul having been made king, Samuel retired from his activity as judge, to act solely as prophet, and preserver of the theocracy.

The history of Israel during the time of the undivided kingdom may be divided, according to the three kings, into three characteristic parts. Saul, whose endeavor it was to emancipate the kingdom from the prophetic superintendence, and hence from the subjection under the theocratic principle, succumbs in this endeavor. David, being fully alive to the idea of a theocratic king, gave his nation a capital and a religious centre, — Jerusalem, the city of God (Ps. xlv. 4), the city of the great King (Ps. xlviii. 2), which, with her mountains round about, was in itself a symbol of the divine kingdom (Ps. cxxv. 2 sq.). The institutions of the theocracy were especially developed by David by his instituting the order of the Levites and priests. As David was a type of the theocratic kingdom, he was also destined to be its bearer by means of the divine promise given to him by the prophet Nathan, according to 2 Sam. vii., which forms one of the most important turning-points in the history of the theocracy. David was succeeded by Solomon, who was destined to build the temple, from which the knowledge of the true God was to go to all nations (1 Kings viii. 41). After the death of Solomon, the decline of the Jewish nation begins. Under Rehoboam, Solomon's successor, ten tribes revolted, leaving him but Judah and Benjamin to reign over, whilst Jeroboam became king over the ten tribes. The history of the ten tribes, the kingdom of Israel, or, as it is called according to its main tribe, the kingdom of Ephraim, forms, from a theocratic stand-point, the history of a continual apostasy from Jehovah, until at last, notwithstanding all means to save it, "the sinful kingdom" (Amos ix. 8) is given to destruction, and, after an existence of two hundred years, its people are carried away as captives in 722 B.C. During these two hundred years, there reigned in Israel nineteen kings, belonging to nine different houses. The last king was Hosea, who after Samaria, "the crown of pride, the drunkards of Ephraim," was trodden under feet (Isa. xxviii. 3), was carried away with his people by Shalmaneser.

Different was the history of the kingdom of Judah, which, although smaller, was more powerful, because it was in the possession of the true sanctuary with its priests and Levites, and because its kings belonged to the royal lineage of David, which was hallowed by the memory of the glorious ancestor David, and the promise given to his posterity. Thus it happened, that of the nineteen kings who reigned during three hundred and eighty-seven years (from the time of Rehoboam to the downfall of the kingdom), there were some excellent men, in whom the idea of a theocratic kingdom was alive. Such were Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joash, Josiah, Hezekiah, who revived the religious state of the people. In the end, however, the people of Judah, too, had to submit to the divine punishment for their many backslidings, and to go into captivity to Babylon (588 B.C.).

In Babylon the people enjoyed the guidance of the prophets Ezekiel and Daniel; and the pious among them never resigned the hope of regaining their country, as predicted by Jeremiah (1.). For this future, Israel was to be preserved in the exile. In accordance herewith, we see the people settled in Babylon, forming, as it were, a nation within a nation, and not in the least amalgamating with their Gentile neighbors. After the overthrow of the Babylonian Empire by the Persians, Cyrus permitted the Jews (536 B.C.) to return to their own land, and to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple (2 Chron. xxxvi. 22 sq.; Ez. i. 1 sq.). The return from Babylon took place under the guidance of Zerubbabel, of the house of David, and Joshua the high priest. A second colony followed under Ezra, who with Nehemiah restored the law, and constituted the Jews into a compact religious community. Under them the sacred books of the Old Testament were collected, and such reforms were introduced as to make the Jews again a people of God. In the twelfth year of his administration, Nehemiah returned to the Persian court (433 B.C.). During his absence of many years, affairs fell into disorder; but on his return, after a long residence in Persia, Nehemiah reformed all these disorders, and even expelled a grandson of the high priest, Eliashib, on account of his unlawful marriage with the daughter of Sanballat (Neh. xiii. 28). This expelled priest is undoubtedly one and the same person with Manasseh, who built a rival temple on the mountain of Gerizim. Before or during the second absence of Nehemiah, the prophet Malachi lived and labored.

From the administration of Nehemiah to the time of Alexander the Great, one atrocious crime, committed in the family of the high priest, appears as the only memorable transaction in the uneventful annals of Judæa. Eliashib was succeeded in the high priesthood by Judas; Judas, by John. The latter, jealous of the influence of his brother Jesus with Bagoses, the Persian governor, and suspecting him of designs on the high priesthood, murdered him within the precincts of the sanctuary. The Persian came in great indignation to Jerusalem; and, when the Jews would have prevented his entrance into the temple, he exclaimed, "Am I not purer than the one who has been murdered in the temple?" Bagoses laid a heavy mulct on the people, — fifty drachms for every lamb offered in daily sacrifice.

At length the peace of this favored district was interrupted by the invasion of Alexander. While he was at the siege of Tyre, he sent to demand the surrender of Jerusalem. The high priest answered that he had sworn fealty to Darius, and was bound to maintain his allegiance to that monarch. After the taking of Gaza, the conqueror advanced against Jerusalem, and was met by the high priest Jaddua, himself clad in his pontifical robes, the priests in their ceremonial attire, the people in white garments. No sooner had Alexander beheld the high priest, than he was reminded of a vision he once had, and in which he saw a figure, in that very dress, exhorting him to pass over into Asia, and achieve the conquest of Persia. Alexander even worshipped the God of the Jews, entered the city, and offered a sacrifice in the temple, whilst the high priest communicated the prophecies of Daniel concerning the Greeks. Whatever truth there is in that story, certain it is, that the Jews enjoyed great liberties and privileges. Palestine now became subject to the Macedonian rule. On the death of Alexander, Judæa came into the possession of Laomedon. After the defeat of Laomedon (B.C. 320), Ptolemy, the king of Egypt, attempted to seize the whole of Syria. He advanced against Jerusalem on the sabbath, carried a great many Jews away as captives, whom he settled in Egypt. Under the Ptolemies, the Jews enjoyed great liberties and prosperity. In the time of Antioch the Great (223-187), Palestine was again the seat of war between Syria and Egypt, till at last, under Seleucus IV. (187-175), it came under the Syrian sway.

The plan of Alexander, to imbue the nations of the East with Greek culture, was continued under his successors, and by degrees Grecian influence was felt in Palestine. Thus Antigonus of Socho, the first who has a Grecian name, is said to have been a student of Greek literature. In opposition to these Hellenists, whose Judaism was of a very lax nature, there developed itself, in a quiet manner, the party of the pious, or Chasidim, which rigidly adhered to the laws of the fathers, and openly showed itself afterwards in the struggle of the Maccabees. Under Seleucus IV., as has been stated, the Jews had come under the Syrian sway. The people were governed by the high priest, and thus their condition was tolerable. When, however, the effort was made to hasten the process of Hellenizing the people, and to destroy altogether the Jewish nationality, new troubles began, which resulted in the rise of the Maccabees. Seleucus was succeeded by Antiochus (IV.) Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.). When he ascended the throne, there were at Jerusalem two parties, — a national one, adhering to the laws of the fathers; and the Greek, which endeavored to introduce Grecian manners, vices, and idolatry. Joshua, or Jason, the brother of Onias III., the high priest, by the offer of four hundred and forty talents annually as tribute, and a hundred and fifty more for permission to build a gymnasium, obtained the priesthood from Antiochus, who deposed Onias (2 Macc. iv. 7-10). Now the Greek party made rapid progress in Judæa. But Jason soon lost his high office. Menelaus, another devotee of the new ideas, simply offered Antiochus a higher tribute than Jason was paying, and got the office. The latter, however, did not leave him long in peace. While the king was absent on his second expedition against Egypt (170 B.C.), he took possession of Jerusalem for a time, with his retainers, and compelled his rival to flee to the citadel. Antiochus, professing to look upon this act of Jason as a rebellion on the part of his Jewish subjects, on his return took fearful vengeance on temple and people (1 Macc. i. 16-28; 2 Macc. v. 11-23; comp. Dan. xi. 28). In the year 168 a royal edict was issued, according to which the exercise of the Jewish religion and circumcision was interdicted, and the temple at Jerusalem was converted into one to Jupiter Olympius (1 Macc. i. 43 sq.; 2 Macc. vi. 1 sq.; Dan. xi. 30). At last the patience of the people was exhausted, and gave rise to the Maccabæan struggle, which ended in the independence of Judæa. The Maccabæan successors of Judas united in their own persons the offices of king and high priest (1 Macc. xiv. 28 sq.); but, though they proved valiant defenders of the country against foreign enemies, they could not prevent Palestine from being torn by interior factions. At that time the two religious factions known as Pharisees and Sadducees stood in opposition to each other. Hitherto the Maccabees had sided with the Pharisees; but the third successor of Judas Maccabæus, named John Hyrcanus, being offended by the Pharisees, broke with them, and prepared great troubles for his descendants. His eldest son's (Aristobulus) reign was but short; but, when his second son (Alexander Jannæus), ascended the throne, he was so annoyed by the popular party of the Pharisees, that, before his death, he felt obliged to advise his wife Alexandra to join the Pharisees, and abandon the Sadducees entirely. Through this policy, peace was restored, and Hyrcanus II. was made high priest while Alexandra occupied the throne. After Alexandra's death (70 B.C.) a deadly strife began between the two sons (Hyrcanus and Aristobulus) for the sovereignty. In the course of this struggle both parties appealed to Pompey, who at once invaded Palestine, and, after having taken Jerusalem and its temple, appointed Hyrcanus high priest, limiting his dominion, however, to Judæa alone, and taking his brother Aristobulus, with his two sons, as captives to Rome. Alexander, one of the sons of Aristobulus, managed to escape, and tried to raise the standard of revolt against Hyrcanus, but with no success. Hyrcanus was recognized as high priest; and Antipater, for services rendered to Julius Cæsar, was appointed procurator over Judæa. Cæsar also granted the Jews many privileges, and at his death they were among the first to mourn for him (Suetonius: Cæsar, c. 84.). Antipater made his son Phasael governor of Jerusalem, while he placed his son Herod over Galilee. The latter soon succeeded, by the help of the Romans, in becoming king of the Jews (39 B.C.). Under him Aristobulus, the last of the Maccabæans, acted as high priest; but he was put to death. Herod was succeeded by his son Archelaus, who, after a few years' reign, was deposed (6 A.D.), and Judæa became part of a Roman province with Syria, but with its own procurator residing at Cæsarea. When Quirinius took the census, he succeeded in quelling a general revolt; but the fiercer spirits found a leader in Judas the Galilean, who, fighting for the theocratic principle (according to the notions of the Pharisees) against the Roman yoke, kindled a fire in the people, which, though often quenched, was not extinguished. Side by side with the deeds of God, who now sent to his people the promised Messiah to build up the messianic kingdom, we now see, as if caricaturing God's word and promise, a wild, demagogical power, which leads the people, after having rejected the invitation of the Good Shepherd, to utter destruction. In quick succession the Roman governors follow each other. In quicker succession followed the high priests, with the exception of Caiaphas, who retained his office during the long reign of Pontius Pilate (26-36 A.D.). The principle of interfering as little as possible with the religious liberty of the Jews was rudely assailed by the Emperor Caligula, who gave orders that his image should be set up in the temple of Jerusalem, as in others elsewhere. It was entirely through the courage and tact of the Syrian governor Petronius, that the execution of these orders was temporarily postponed until the emperor was induced by Agrippa I. to withdraw them. Caligula soon afterwards died; and under the rule of Agrippa I., to whom the government of the entire kingdom of his grandfather Herod was committed by Claudius, the Jews enjoyed much prosperity. In every respect the king was all they could wish. At the time of his death (in 44 A.D.: compare also Acts xii. 23), his son Agrippa being too young, Judæa was again ruled by Roman governors; viz., Cuspius Fadus (from 44, under whom Theudas played his part: Joseph., Ant. XX. 5, 1), Tiberius Alexander (the nephew of Philo, till 48), Cumanus (48-52), and Felix (52-60). Felix, who has the honor to be pilloried in the pages of Tacitus (Hist. 5, 9), contrived to make the dispeace permanent (Joseph., Wars II. 13). He was followed by Festus (60-63). At the death of the latter, the high priest Ananus, a cruel Sadducee, caused the death of James the Just, and of other Christians. Festus's successor, Albinus (64), caused great dissatisfaction; and, under Florus, disturbances in the streets of Jerusalem and Cæsarea were of frequent occurrence, and massacre followed upon massacre, until Cestius Gallus, the prefect of Syria, moved his troops towards Jerusalem. In Jerusalem a war party, called "Zealots," prepared for the defence of the temple. The peace party tried in vain to pacify the insurgents, and in vain also were all attempts at peacemaking on the part of Agrippa II. Judæa was at open war with the Emperor Nero, who sent the first general of the empire, Vespasian, to subjugate Palestine. Into all parts of Palestine prominent men were sent to manage the affairs; and thus Josephus, the Jewish historian, was intrusted with the defence of Galilee. While Galilee and other provinces fell into the hands of Vespasian, Jerusalem awaited the enemy, but not with the whole united strength, but torn up into three factions, under John of Gischala, Eleazar, and Simon, son of Gioras. At length, however, Vespasian, who in the mean time had become emperor, sent his son Titus to reduce Jerusalem. Titus besieged Jerusalem, took the temple, and burned it to the ground Aug. 10, 70 A.D. The history of the world knows of no other catastrophe so mortal as was the combat of the Jewish people with the Roman power. The presentiment of the heathen Titus, that a special divine judgment had taken place, was but the fulfilment of the word of the Lord. Jerusalem fell, because it knew not the time of her visitation (Luke xix. 44). Since these last words were spoken by her rejected Messiah (Matt. xxiii. 37 sq.), Jerusalem and the defiled temple are dedicated to destruction: the kingdom of God shall be taken from the Jewish people, and given to the heathen (Matt. xxi. 43). From that time on, till the final ruin, the elected residue is gathered from the ancient covenant people, which is to form the root of the new congregation of salvation, the branch into which the believing Gentiles were to be grafted. This congregation is now the Israel of God, which assumes all the prerogatives of the latter, becoming "the chosen generation, the royal priesthood, the holy nation, the peculiar people" (1 Pet. ii. 9), to which belong the divine promises. And yet Israel according to the flesh, in whom God has shown, before all nations, how he loves and how he punishes, is not yet excluded from the realm of promise. Concerning the same, the old law remains in force, that it cannot perish, even in the banishment and dispersion, but is spared rather to an induction into the divine kingdom. Israel's captivity and Jerusalem's destruction shall last until the times of the nations of the earth are full. And when the fulness of the Gentiles has come in (Rom. xi. 25), Israel as a whole shall receive the gospel, and see his Messiah (Matt. xxiii. 39); "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. xi. 29).

ISRAEL, Post-Biblical History of. With the destruction of Jerusalem, Israel, or the Jews as this people is generally called since the return from Babylon, were without metropolis and without temple. For a time Jamnia was chosen as the seat of the college of learning, and Gamaliel II. was chosen its spiritual head. The religious life of the Jews was re-organized, and the decisions of Jamnia were carried to the Jews of the diaspora. On the ruins of the city and the temple, the Pharisaic Judaism, which rests upon the law and the school, celebrated its triumph. National fanaticism, indeed, was not yet extinguished; but it burnt itself completely out in the vigorous insurrection led by Bar-Cocheba, the pseudo-Messiah, in which nearly six million Jews lost their lives, together with the famous Rabbi Akiba, one of the pseudo-Messiah's most ardent adherents (135 A.D.). Hadrian, to annihilate forever all hopes of the restoration of the Jewish kingdom, accomplished his plan of establishing a new city on the site of Jerusalem, which he called Elia Capitolina. An edict prohibited any Jew from entering the new city, on pain of death. More effectually to keep them away, the image of a swine was placed over the gate leading to Bethlehem. The seat of the spiritual head, or patriarch, was now transferred from Jamnia to Tiberias, where it remained till the year 429. When, in the fifth century, Palestine ceased to be the centre of Judaism, Babylonia took her place. From the period of the exile a numerous and coherent body of Jews had continued to subsist there. The Parthians and Sassanidæ granted them self-government. At their head was a native prince, or Resh Galutha, who, when the Palestinian patriarchate came to an end, was left without a rival. The schools there at Pumbaditha, Sora, and Nahardea, prospered greatly, vied with those of Palestine, and continued to exist after the cessation of the latter, when the patriarchate became extinct; thus they had the last word in the settlement of doctrine, which was embodied in the celebrated Babylonian Talmud, compiled about the year 500.

In the Roman Empire, after the reign of Vespasian and Hadrian, the position of the Jews was not only tolerable, but in many respects prosperous. Their position changed entirely after the conversion of Constantine. The Jews, who formerly had taken a great share in the persecutions of the Christians by Pagan Rome, became now a condemned and persecuted sect. A gleam of hope shone upon them in the days of Julian the Apostate; but they were only the more ill treated under his Christian successors, especially by Justinian.

At the beginning of the seventh century, with the rise of Mahomet, better times were ushered in for the Jews, notwithstanding the fact that they were expelled from Arabia by Omar; but outside of Arabia, in Mauritania and Spain, they thrived especially well. In the latter country their prosperous condition lasted so long as the Catholic Church did not dominate the State. In the Germanic states which arose upon the ruins of the Roman Empire, the Jews fared well on the whole, especially under the Frankish monarchy. The Carolingians helped them in every possible way, making no account of the complaints of the bishops.

Meanwhile the Church was not remiss in seeking constantly repeated re-enactments of the old laws which she enacted in former years. Gradually she succeeded. The feudal system, and the crusading spirit of the middle ages, only tended to lower the position of the Jews in Christian society. Not only was intercourse with them shunned: they were also obliged to wear a little wheel upon their dress as a mark. Outbreaks against the Jews were of repeated occurrence; and though popes and other prelates set themselves against such persecutions, yet the popular aversion against the Jew was too strong. It was not only religious hate, which was accompanied by repeated deadly outbreaks,—especially when the Black Death, in 1348, was raging, and Jews were blamed for it, on the notion they had poisoned the wells and rivers,—but also worldly considerations. The Jews, having at that time the control of financial affairs in their hands, used it without scruple, and thus made themselves still more repugnant to the Christians than they previously were by means of their religion. Thus it came about, that, where the spirit of toleration was exhausted, the Jews had to leave the country. England was the first kingdom in which this occurred, under Edward I. in 1290; France followed in 1395; Spain and Portugal, in 1492 and 1495. In this way it happened that Germany, Italy, and adjoining districts became the chief abode of the Jews. In the German Empire the Jews, as Kammerknechte, or servants of the imperial chamber, enjoyed protection of person and property for a tax paid to the emperor. In some respects they maintained a kind of autonomy, and settled civil affairs among themselves by the dicta of their rabbins. And though they had repeatedly to suffer from the popular rage, which often marked its course by bloodshed and desolation, yet the Jews maintained their ground on account of the political confusion then prevailing in Germany; and, if they were expelled from one locality, they readily found refuge in some other.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, Western Europe was almost depopulated of Jews. Most of them lived in Germany, Italy, Poland, and in the Osmanic and African states. In small numbers they were found in India, Malabar, Cochinchina, Bokhara, China, and Abyssinia. Very great was their number in Turkey, where many European exiles sought refuge, especially from Spain, on account of persecution under Ferdinand and Isabella. Very large congregations were soon formed at Constantinople, Smyrna, Damascus, and other places.

The Reformation opened a new and better era to the Jews. Not that the Reformers personally were much more tolerant towards them than the Roman-Catholic hierarchy; but the very fact that the boasted unity of the Church had received a serious blow made people more inclined to toleration. The fury of persecution, formerly directed against the Jews, was now directed against heretics in the bosom of Christianity itself; and whilst the Jews were left alone, yet the anathema of public contempt, humiliation, and exclusion from every public or private connection, still lay heavily upon them. The period which intervened between the Reformation and the French Revolution was of a monotonous character to the Jews, with the exception of a few instances which attracted public attention. Thus in 1677 rose the pseudo-Messiah, Sabbathai Zevi, born at Smyrna in 1625, and died at Belgrade, as a Mohammedan. Notwithstanding the apostasy of this pretender, there were some who upheld his claims even after his death, and asserted that he was still the true Messiah, and that he was to return from the dead. A few years later, this heresy appeared under a new form, and under the guidance of two Polish rabbis, who travelled extensively to propagate Sabbathism, which had its followers from Smyrna to Amsterdam, and even in Poland. In 1722 the whole sect was solemnly execrated in all the synagogues of Europe. In 1750 Jacob Frank, a native of Poland, made his appearance, and caused a schism in the synagogues of his native country, and founded the sect of the "Frankists." The most extraordinary movement which occurred among the Jews in the eighteenth century was that of the sect termed the "Chassidim" (see art.).

Contemporary with the rise and progress of this sect, there lived in Germany the famous Moses Mendelssohn (see art.), b. in 1729 at Dessau, d. at Berlin, 1786,—a man whose remarkable talents and writings constituted an era in the history of the modern Jews. He destroyed all respect for the Talmud and rabbinic writings among the Jews who approved his opinions, and thus rendered them dissatisfied with their religion, and drove them, on the one hand, either to the adoption of total infidelity, or of Christianity, on the other, as in the case of his own children.

Six years before Mendelssohn's death, Joseph II. ascended the throne of Austria, and issued in 1782 his edict of toleration, which marked for the Jews the beginning of a new era in the German Empire, as well as in the other Austrian countries. A century before, the Elector of Brandenburg, Frederick William, had already paved the way for this change. Peter the Great admitted them into Russia; England received them again; the Netherlands, Denmark, and Hamburg were opened to them; whilst in North America and Brazil they built colonies. The example set in 1783 by the American Union, which allowed to her citizens the free exercise of their religion, without respect of creed, was followed by the French Revolution, which in 1791 declared the Jews French citizens. In 1796 they were emancipated in the Netherlands; in 1848, in Germany. At present the Jews occupy the most prominent positions everywhere. As for the Jews in general, they divide themselves into the Chassidim, or strict rabbinic Jews; the Karaites (see art.), or the Protestants of Judaism, who took their rise in the eighth century, rejecting entirely the authority of tradition; the orthodox Jews; and the reformed, or liberal Jews. All these parties are separated from Christendom by their religion. The emancipation of the Jews, it is true, has brought about many changes among them. They imitate the manners of the Gentiles, not only in their social position, but also in religious matters. Their synagogue choirs are mostly composed of Christian singers. They have the rite of confirmation; they use organs; and the service, with a few exceptions, is held in the language of the country. But all these imitations bring them not nearer to the Church, the founder of which they regard as an Essene, and not as the Christ, the promised Messiah. Whatever the destinies of this people in the hands of Providence may be, certain it is that God has great things in store for the Jews, for whose conversion the Church has to pray till Jesus is all in all.

According to calculations published in 1881, there are 5,166,326 Jews in Europe, 402,996 in Africa, 182,847 in Asia, 307,963 in America, and 20,000 in Australia; or 6,080,132 Jews in the world, exclusive of 200,000 Falashas (Appletons' Annual Cyclopædia for 1881, p. 456). ITALY, Ecclesiastical Statistics of. The kingdom of Italy comprises an area of 113,000 square miles, with a population of 28,000,000, of which 100,000 are Greek Catholics, 96,000 Evangelical Christians, 36,000 Jews, and 25,000 Mohammedans, while all the rest belong to the Roman-Catholic Church.

The Roman-Catholic Church.—Sept. 20, 1870, the temporal power of the Pope glided quietly out of existence; but May 13, 1871, the legislative assembly of the kingdom of Italy passed a law guaranteeing the independence of the Pope and the holy see. The person of the Pope is sacred and inviolable, like that of the king. The honors of sovereignty are due to him, and he is allowed to keep a body-guard. The State pays him annually a pension of 3,225,000 lire, which, however, he has hitherto declined to receive; and the palaces of the Vatican and the Lateran, and the villa of Castle Gandolfo, with their libraries and collections, are declared to be the property of the holy see, inalienable, free of taxation, and exempted from expropriation. The Italian Government furthermore guarantees the freedom and independence of the conclave, and of all ecclesiastical officers in the execution of their official functions. In the city of Rome, all seminaries, academies, and colleges for the education of the clergy, remain under the special authority of the Pope; and the State has renounced its right of appointment and nomination to the higher ecclesiastical benefices. No Italian bishop is compelled to take the oath to the king, and no royal placet is necessary to the execution of a purely ecclesiastical act. The law is very liberal, and ought to be so on account of the anomalous character of the situation. Meanwhile the Pope resides in the Vatican, keeping a court of about eighteen hundred persons, and working a huge machine (see CURIA) for the government of the Roman-Catholic Church at large.

Another question presenting nearly as great difficulties as that of abolishing the temporal power of the Pope, though preserving his spiritual sovereignty, arose from the monastic orders. In the kingdom of Sardinia the law of May 29, 1855, dissolved all religious orders not engaged in preaching, teaching, or nursing the sick, abrogated all chapters of collegiate churches having no cure of souls, and abolished all private benefices for which the holders paid no service; and thus 274 monasteries with 3,733 monks, and 61 convents with 1,756 nuns, were closed, and 2,722 chapters and private benefices were disestablished. As the union of Italy progressed, the same principles were applied in Umbria, the Marches, Naples, and Rome, by the laws of July 7, 1866, Aug. 15, 1867, and June 19, 1873. When the census of 1866 was taken, there still existed in Italy, outside of the city and province of Rome, 32 orders of monks, with 3,874 brethren in 625 monasteries, and an annual income of 6,714,371 lire; 31 orders of nuns, with 8,264 sisters in 537 convents, and an annual income of 7,008,624 lire; 10 mendicant orders, with 10,848 brethren in 1,209 monasteries; and 3 orders of mendicant nuns, with 876 sisters in 43 convents. When the census of 1871 was taken, there were in the province and city of Rome 474 monasteries (311 for monks and 163 for nuns), with 8,151 inmates (4,326 male and 3,825 female), and an annual income of 4,780,891 lire. An idea of the benefit which the State or the people derived from these institutions may be formed by observing, that, of the thirty-two monastic orders having an independent fortune, ten were devoted to teaching, one to nursing the sick, and the rest to a contemplative life; but of the annual revenue of 6,714,371 lire, only 451,732 lire were spent for educational purposes, and 151,401 lire on the sick, while the rest was eaten up by contemplation. The legislation since 1855 has disestablished about fifty thousand ecclesiastical foundations, which rendered no other service than supporting idleness, ignorance, and vice. From the closed monasteries the monks and nuns returned into society with the full rights and duties of citizens; but each of them received a pension varying from one hundred to six hundred lire, according to age and other circumstances. The confiscated estates became State domains, but were gathered into a special fund, from which the ecclesiastical pensions, the expenses of public education, etc., are paid. The capital value of the property which has thus accrued to the domain since 1855 is estimated at 839,776,076 lire, yielding an annual revenue of 30,969,465 lire.

The Roman-Catholic Church in Italy numbers 265 episcopal dioceses (of which eleven archiepiscopal and sixty-three episcopal sees are independent of any metropolitan authority, and stand immediately under the Pope); and 24,980 parishes, which vary very much in size, from fourteen thousand to one hundred souls. The parish priest is always landholder, and derives his principal income from his podere; but the State spends yearly about one million lire in augmentation of the parochial stipends. The rite employed is the ordinary Latin rite, though other rites are recognized. Thus the Albanians in the southern provinces use the Greek rite and the Greek language in their worship, and their priests are allowed to marry. Other differences of rite occur among the Armenians in Venice and in the church of Milan.

The Evangelical Church is represented in Italy by the old and celebrated Church of the Waldensians, the Free Italian Church, and various more or less successful endeavors by the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians, and other denominations.

By a decree of Feb. 17, 1848, religious liberty was established in the kingdom of Sardinia. The Church of the Waldensians consisted at that time of fifteen congregations up among the mountains, and one in Turin. But it immediately took on a considerable missionary activity, and afterwards formed 39 new congregations in various parts of Italy, with 34 ordained pastors, 23 evangelists, 44 teachers, 2,813 communicants, and about 400 catechumens, 1,684 pupils in the primary schools, and 1,636 in the Sunday school. It has a theological school, with three professors and eighteen students, founded in 1855 at Torre Pellice, but removed in 1862 to Florence. Before the establishment of this school the Waldensian ministers were educated at Lausanne or Geneva.

The Free Italian Church was founded in Milan (1870) by twenty-three congregations, which had been formed independently of the Waldensian evangelization. It numbers (report of 1881) now 36 congregations, with 13 ordained ministers, 16 evangelists, 21 teachers, 1,750 communicants, 284 catechumens, 1,250 pupils in the week-day schools, 657 pupils in the Sunday schools, and a theological school with four professors and ten students in Rome. [Gavazzi is one of the leading spirits in this church.] The Methodists have in their northern missionary district 28 congregations, and 15 in their southern district, and in all 22 ordained preachers. [The American Methodists who began missionary efforts in Italy in 1873, have 15 Italian preachers, one American missionary (Dr. Vernon), 708 church-members, and 311 probationers. The Presbyterians work in Italy through the Waldensian and Free churches. The Church of England has three congregations in Rome. Dr. Robert Nevin is rector of the American Episcopal Church in Rome, which has the largest Protestant house of worship, built by his own exertions. The American Baptists have had an Italian mission since 1870, and now have nine preachers, and 175 communicants, with congregations at Milan, Rome, Naples, Venice, etc. The English Baptists have eleven preachers, and began their mission in 1871.]

ITALY, Protestantism in. Every now and then the noblest and loftiest spirits produced by the Italian people — Dante, Petrarca, Laurentius Valla, Savonarola, Ægidius of Viterbo, Picus de Mirandola — burst out in open denunciation of the corruption of the Church of Rome, and demanded reforms. Councils, such as those of Pisa and Constance, supported the movement; and popes, such as Adrian VI. and Paul III., took the lead of it, or at least made people believe that they did. The reforms demanded were purely moral, however, not doctrinal: it was a reform of the clergy, rather than a reform of the Church, which was intended. Thus the order of the Theatines was founded in 1524 by Cajetan of Threne and Bishop Caraffa of Theate (afterwards Paul IV.), for the express purpose of reforming the clergy; but at the same time the Theatines were the bitterest enemies, the most furious persecutors, of the Reformation; and, as soon as it became apparent that a moral reform could not be accomplished, unless on the basis of a doctrinal reform, the council and the Pope, the monk and the prelate, at once agreed in calling in the Inquisition for the purpose of stamping out "heresy." In Italy all the necessary materials for a moral reform were absolutely lacking. The revival of letters, which had been more vigorous there than in any other country, turned out to be essentially a revival of Paganism, and resulted in a religious indifferentism and cynical scepticism, which might have a great talent for railing at vices, but certainly showed very little power to correct them. But, where such a spirit is reigning, no moral reform is possible: there the reform must begin with the spirit, the idea, the doctrine. In the case of Italy, evidences were plenty and striking. The consilium novemvirale, consisting of Contarini, Pole, Caraffa, Sadolet, Fregoso, Giberti, Badia, Cortese, and Aléandre, which Paul III. organized in 1536 for the purpose of reforming the chancelry, the episcopacy, the morals of the clergy, the penitential, the administration of the rota, etc., barely escaped having its report put on the Index; for it was, indeed, impossible to explain the causes of the reigning evils, and indicate remedies against them, without touching upon questions of doctrine. But a doctrinal reform the Church of Rome neither would nor could consent to; for it surely meant a revision and consequent alteration of her whole social and political position. As soon, therefore, as Paul III. came to understand that this cry for reform, which had arisen spontaneously in Italy, and earlier there than in any other country, was in principle identical with the Reformation in Germany, he handed over the whole case to the Inquisition (established by a bull of June 21, 1542); and, two generations later on, every trace of Protestantism was wiped off from the face of Italy.

In Northern Italy the transition from a moral to a doctrinal reform took place under the influence of the Reformation in Germany. The works of the reformers — Luther, Melanchthon, Zwingli, and Butzer — were early introduced into Venice, often under fictitious names. Thus the Loci communes of Melanchthon circulated under the name of Hippophilo de Terra Negra. In 1520 the writings of Luther were seized and burnt by the Patriarch Contarini, which, however, did not prevent them from being clandestinely reprinted, and widely read. In 1543 Luther was in actual correspondence with the Venetian Government through Baldassari Altieri, secretary to the English embassy in Venice. The rapid spread of Protestantism in the territory of the Republic during the period 1520–42 was, to a great extent, due to the indefatigable exertions of Altieri, supported by the fervent preachings of a number of monks, and the translation of the Bible by Bruciole, a disciple of Savonarola. Of course the Roman curia protested in the most vehement manner. But the Venetian ambassador, Tiepolo, had the cynical frankness to tell Pius V. to his face, that toleration or intolerance with respect to heretics was to the Republic merely a question of policy. And so it was. As soon as the Republic needed the friendship of the Pope, the Inquisition was established, Altieri was banished, fifteen hundred and forty-five processes were instituted against Protestants of the higher classes, while those of the lower were tracked like game on the Lido. The archives of the Inquisition contain the acts of two hundred and forty-three processes instituted between 1541 and 1592, some against members of the first families,—the Giustiniani, Dandola, Falieri, etc.,—twenty-six against ecclesiastics; but thousands of persons were quietly burnt, drowned, decapitated, tortured, or exiled. The same proceedings were enacted throughout the whole territory of the Republic, in Vicentia, Padua, Berganso, Treviso, Undino, etc. Into Lombardy—bounded north by Switzerland, and west by Piedmont—Protestantism penetrated in a double stream; and in the beginning of the sixteenth century several of the Lombard cities maintained connections with Geneva, Zürich, and Wittenberg. In 1521 verses were composed and sung in Milan in honor of Luther; and Gerdes tells us, that in 1524 the Reformation was preached there with great success. In 1530 Curio fled from Piedmont, and found refuge in Milan, though he had openly embraced the Reformation; and in 1555 Paleario could still write his Actio in Pontifices Romanos undisturbed in Milan. The year previous, Archbishop Arcimboldi forbade the reading of the Scriptures in his diocese, and stipulated that a part of the confiscated property of heretics should be given to the informers and spies of the Inquisition. But Arcimboldi was a contemptible person: he could be cruel, but he could also be cowed. Quite otherwise with his successor, Carlo Borromeo (1559–84). He was as sincere as he was passionate. His merciless severity has something noble in its motives, which commands respect. He was able, chiefly by the aid of the Inquisition and the Jesuits, not only to cleanse Milan thoroughly from heresy, but also to make it a barrier against all influence from Germany. In Piedmont there existed at the beginning of the sixteenth century numerous evangelical congregations founded by missionaries of the Waldensian Church (which see). But also the influence from Geneva and Wittenberg was considerable. When Calvin, in 1536, passed through the valley of Aosta, he found many adherents; and in 1560 it was said, even of the Princess Margaretta, that she was a secret Calvinist. But in Piedmont, as in Venice, political regards compelled the government to yield to the Pope's demands. The Inquisition was established; and in cases in which it was found impossible to apply this instrument,—namely, when the question was not about individual persons, but about whole families, towns, districts,—the children were by force taken from the parents, and placed in convents, to be educated in the Roman-Catholic faith.

In Southern and Central Italy the movement was started by the circle of eminent men which formed in Naples (1535–40) around the Spaniard

Valdez; but it was in many ways nourished, both through direct communication with the German reformers, and by the existence of evangelical congregations founded by Waldensian missionaries. Valdez fled from Spain on account of a satirical dialogue he wrote against the clergy. In Naples he lived very quietly, and he died before the persecutions began. But he exercised a considerable influence, both by his writings, and still more through his friends,—Bernardino Ochino from Siena, general of the Capuchins, a celebrated preacher, who formed congregations at Venice, Florence, Siena, and Perugia, but fled to Geneva, Aug. 23, 1542; Peter Martyr Vermigli, professor of theology, first at Naples, afterwards at Lucca, strongly influenced by the reformers of Geneva, whither he fled a few days later than Ochinus; Carnesecchi, who had been secretary to Clement VII., and twice escaped from the grip of the Inquisition (1546 and 1559), but finally fell a victim to the unconquerable hatred of Pius V. and the loose policy of Cosmus of Medicis (1567); Flaminius, author of the beautiful book, Del Benefizio di Gesù Christi confesso, which the Inquisition hunted after with nearly as much appetite as after the Bible; and Caracciolo, who became the founder of the Italian congregation at Geneva. When the Inquisition began its work, it found large congregations formed by these men in nearly all the great cities of Central and Southern Italy; and, what was still worse, in many cases it found the very officers of the Church most strongly affected by the disease it was sent to extirpate. In the environs of Naples the bishops of Chironia, Sorrente, Isola, Caiazzo, Mola, Civita di Penna, Policastro, Reggio, etc., read the works of Luther, and were more or less infected with Lutheranism. Most of them recanted immediately; but some of them it was necessary to punish. Yea, at some places the Inquisition had to supplement itself with laymen in order to be sure of having no heretics among its own members. With the chiefs, however, the Inquisition had comparatively easy work. They often succeeded in escaping to foreign countries. Geneva, London, and Cracow swarmed with Italian Protestants. In such cases the Inquisition had only to burn their books,—Florence was especially prominent by its autos-da-fé of that kind,—and to prohibit all further communication with the mother-country, in which respect Lucca proved herself most sagacious. But the task became rather difficult when the question was about whole congregations. In Calabria the Waldenses had occupied the villages of Guardia, San Sisto, Vaccarizzo, Rosa, Argentina, San Vincenzo, and Montalto since 1315. What was to be done in such a case? Well, the villages were razed to the ground, and sixteen hundred persons were carried into the donjons of Naples, whence some of them were exported to the Saracen slave-markets, while others were removed to the rowing-banks of the Spanish galleys (1558–60). In Rome new prisons had to be built; but the attendance which the Pope could spare for the inmates was not sufficient to prevent them from being occasionally starved to death. No day passed away without its sacrifice of human flesh. On one occasion eighty-eight victims were despatched in one day by one executioner and with one knife. After working in this manner for about half a century, the Inquisition succeeded in completely silencing Protestantism in Italy; and nothing further was heard from this movement until the fourth and fifth decade of the present century. See arts. WALDENSAINS, and ITALY, ECCLESIASTICAL STATISTICS OF.

ITINERANCY. Our Lord had no settled place of abode and no fixed congregation. The apostles similarly went from place to place, at least during a portion of their ministry. Methodists thus find Scripture precedent for their peculiar system of ministerial appointments. The ministers of this denomination, in the settled parts of this country, are assigned to churches by the bishops, but are not allowed to hold the same charge more than three consecutive years; then they are put over another church in the same conference. In this way they move from place to place in the conference. In England and upon our frontiers, the circuit-system prevails; i.e., a number of churches or preaching-places are served by the same set of preachers in rotation. There can be no question of the immense value of this itinerant system in the past history of the Methodist Church. It was started by John Wesley, who, as early as his third conference (May, 1746), assigned the lay-preaching to certain fields of labor called then and now "circuits." But, owing to the altered circumstances of the church, the question of abolishing the system, or greatly modifying it, has been of late very earnestly debated. The weight of opinion seems to be against any essential change. See METHODISM.

ITURÆA, the country of the Ituræans, was at one time identified with Auranitis, or Trachonitis (Eusebius, Jerome, and others), in direct contradiction of Luke iii. 1. Modern archæologists have placed it in the plains of north-eastern Galilee, or on the eastern spurs of the Hauran Mountains; but neither of these locations agrees with the notes of ancient writers. As the Ituræans were a nomadic tribe, they may have lived at various places in various times. They descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31), and, together with other Arabian tribes, they fought with the Israelites settled east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 18-22). Aristobulus I. conquered them (105 B.C.); but Pompey was the first who really succeeded in subduing them. Afterwards they are often mentioned as excellent soldiers, serving as archers in the Roman army. Their country often changed dominion, until Claudius definitively incorporated it with Syria. See SEBASTIAN MÜNSTER: De rebus Ituræorum, Copenhagen, 1824.

IVES, Rt. Rev. Levi Silliman, D.D., LL.D., b. at Meriden, Conn., Sept. 16, 1797; d. at Manhattanville, New-York City, Oct. 13, 1867. He came of Presbyterian stock; but in 1819 he became an Episcopalian, and in 1823 he was ordained priest, and settled over Trinity Church, Philadelphia. In 1831 he was consecrated bishop of North Carolina, and displayed zeal and ability in the religious education of the slaves. He was a High Churchman, and sided with the Oxford Tractarians. In December, 1852, he visited Rome, and there joined the Roman Church. His friend and confessor, Dr. Forbes, went with him, but returned again to the Episcopal Church. Ives was deposed from his bishopric (Oct. 14, 1853), but made professor of rhetoric in St. Joseph's (R.C.) Theological Seminary at Fordham, N.Y. Among his last labors was the founding of the Protectory for Roman-Catholic children at Westchester, N.Y., and of the Manhattanville College, where he taught. He published an apology for his secession, The Trials of a Mind in its Progress to Catholicism, London and Boston, 1854.

IVO OF CHARTRES (Yvo Carnotensis), b. about 1040 in the diocese of Beauvais; d. at Chartres, Dec. 23, 1116; studied humaniora and philosophy in Paris, and theology in the monastery of Bec, where he had Lanfranc for teacher, and Anselm for a schoolmate, and was appointed director of the monastery of St. Quentin in 1075, and bishop of Chartres in 1090. He was implicated in grave controversies, first with his predecessor, Ganfried, who had been deposed by the Pope on account of simony, but still found many adherents in France, and afterward with Philippe I., who had repudiated his legitimate spouse, Bertha, and entered into an adulterous connection with Bertrade of Anjou. But the most interesting point in his life is the stand-point he occupied in the great contest concerning the right of investiture (see his letters 63, 232, 236, and Baronius ad ann. 1106 and 1111). He denounced with great frankness the faults and failings of the Roman curia, and is often represented as one of the principal champions of Gallicanism. On the other hand, when the extreme hierarchical party, indignant at the concessions which Paschalis II. had made to the emperor, tried to have these concessions condemned by a general council as heretical, Ivo interfered, and defended Paschalis. Moderation and a deep sense of equity distinguished his views, and governed all his actions. Of his works the two most important are his collections of canons: Decretum or Decretorum Opus in seventeen books, and Pannormia in eight books. His letters, numbering two hundred and eighty-seven, have also great interest for the history of his time. Whether the Breve chronicon de rebus Francorum is by him is uncertain; but the Historia ecclesiastica was written by Hugo of Fleury. A collected edition of his works (except the Pannormia), Paris, 1647, has been reprinted by Migne, Patr. Latin., tom. 157, 161. Biographies of him were written by I. Fronteau (Hamburg, 1720), Abry (Strassburg, 1841), and Ritzke (Breslau, 1863).

JAB'BOK, the present Zurka, a stream which rises in the plateau east of Gilead, cuts through Gilead in a narrow defile, and empties itself into the Jordan, about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. It formed the northern boundary of Ammon, and separated the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Num. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 37, iii. 16; Josh. xii. 2; Judg. xi. 13, 22). On the south bank of the Jabbok the interview took place between Jacob and Esau (Gen. xxxii. 22).

JABLONSKI, Daniel Ernst, b. at Nassenhuben, near Danzig, Nov. 20, 1660; d. in Berlin, May 25, 1741; studied theology and Oriental languages at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Oxford, and was appointed pastor of the Reformed congregation in Magdeburg in 1683, pastor of the Polish congregation in Lissa in 1686, court-preacher at Königsberg in 1671, and court-preacher at Berlin in 1697. He sprung originally from the Bohemian diaspora, and was consecrated bishop in 1699. In 1737 he consecrated Count Zinzendorf bishop, and thus he formed the transition from the old stock of the Moravian Brethren to the younger branch of the Herrnhuters. In the church-history of Prussia he distinguished himself by his exertions to bring about a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches. But his long negotiations with Leibnitz, who represented a similar tendency in Hanover, came to a sudden end in 1706, chiefly on account of the indiscretion of superintendent Winkler of Magdeburg. He published several collections of sermons, and an annotated text of the Hebrew Bible, which is still of value. JACKSON, Arthur, b. at Little Waldinfield, Suffolk, 1593; d. in London (?) Aug. 5, 1666. He was educated at Trinity College; became lecturer of St. Michael's, Wood Street, London; afterwards obtained the living of St. Faith's, under St. Paul's, but was ejected in 1662. He was no friend to Cromwell, and was imprisoned for refusing to testify in the trial of Love (1651). He wrote A Help for the Understanding of the Holy Scriptures (or annotations on Genesis to Canticles), Cambridge, 1643-58, 3 vols.; Annotations on the whole Book of Isaiah, with Memoir of the Author, published by his son, London, 1682.

JACKSON, John, b. at Lensey, Yorkshire, April 4, 1686; educated at Cambridge, appointed master of Wigston's Hospital, in Leicester, 1726, where he d. May 12, 1763. He was an Arian, and engaged in many a theological controversy now forgotten. For a list of his many publications, see Darling's Cyclopædia Bibliog., 1623-25. Dr. Sutton of Leicester published a memoir of his life and writings, London, 1764.

JACKSON, Thomas, D.D., b. at Willowing, Durham, 1579; d. 1640. He was educated at Oxford; was made president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, 1630, and dean of Peterborough 1638. He was originally a Calvinist, but became an Arminian. His valuable works were published in 3 vols. folio, 1673, and in 12 vols. 8vo, Oxford, 1841. Each of these editions is prefaced by his Life. His Commentaries upon the Creed have been particularly admired.

JACKSON, Thomas, b. at Sancton, Yorkshire, Dec. 12, 1783; d. at Richmond, March 11, 1873. He became an itinerant in the Wesleyan connection, 1804; in 1824 was chosen by the British Conference "connectional editor;" in 1833 was appointed tutor in the Richmond Theological Institution, resigned in 1861, on account of age. His principal publications are Centenary of Methodism (London, 1839), Library of Christian Biography (1837-70, 12 vols.), Life of Charles Wesley (1841, 2 vols.), Journal of Charles Wesley (1849, 2 vols.), Lives of Early Methodists (1849, 3 vols.), Curiosities of Pulpit Literature (1868), and The Institutions of Christianity (3 vols.).

JA'COB (heel-holder, or supplanter), or IS'RAEL (prince of God, or warrior of God), the son of Isaac and the direct ancestor of the Israelites. His life is plainly divisible into three parts,—(1) his birth, youth, and early manhood (Gen. xxv. 22-xxviii. 22); (2) His mature years (xxix. 1-xxxv. 29); (3) His old age (xxxvii. 1-xlix. 33). (1) The characteristic feature of his early years was his desire to get the birthright from Esau. He began the struggle before he was born (xxv. 22), took advantage of his twin-brother's momentary despair to buy it from him for a mess of pottage (xxv. 33), and finally got the blessing by fraud (xxvii.). For this act of perfidy he had to flee, and went to Haran, where his uncle (Laban) lived. On his way thither he had a vision at Luz, in consequence of which he called the place Beth-el. (2) Kindly received by his uncle, he fell in love with Rachel, and served seven years for her, only to be cheated by the substitution of the older daughter, Leah, for Rachel, on the wedding-night,—a proceeding which the Eastern marriage-customs render comparatively easy. He had therefore to serve another seven years for his chosen wife. Leah bore him four sons successively,—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah; while Rachel remained childless. By Rachel's maid, Bilhah, Jacob had Dan and Naphtali; by Leah's maid, Zilpah, Gad and Asher; by Leah herself, Isaachar, Zebulun, and his only daughter mentioned,—Dinah. At length God remembered Rachel, and she bore Joseph. Not only in children, but in all his possessions, manifestly favored, it is no wonder Laban desired him to stay; but Jacob had become weary of the long subordination and the frequent trickery (xxxi. 7), and, knowing that Laban would not willingly let him go, he departed secretly, was pursued, overtaken, came to an understanding with Laban, and so in peace started once more for Canaan. The news of the approach of his brother with his band alarmed him. But, ere he met his brother, a change was wrought in him. He wrestled at the Jabbok with God all night, until the breaking of the day, and, in reward of his persistency, received the blessing he so earnestly desired, and a new name, — Israel. But, ere granting his request, the "man" touched the sinew of Jacob's thigh, and it shrank, putting his thigh out of joint. To his surprise, Esau was very friendly; and the brothers separated peaceably, to meet once more at the funeral of their father. Jacob settled first at Shechem, but was compelled to leave in consequence of Simeon's and Levi's conduct, and went to Beth-el, and thence to Hebron. On this latter journey, Rachel died at Bethlehem, shortly after bearing Benoni, or Benjamin. (3) In Hebron the patriarch lived quietly, passed through heavy sorrows in the supposed death of Joseph, the pressure of famine, and the reluctant separation from Benjamin. But the night of weeping was followed by the morning of joy. He left Hebron at the summons of Joseph, was personally honored by the Pharaoh, and in prosperity and tranquillity passed his last days in the land of Goshen. When he felt the hand of death upon him, he gathered his sons about him, prophesied the fortunes of their respective descendants, and died at the age of a hundred and forty-seven years. His funeral was attended with royal pomp.

The character of this remarkable man is best expressed by his double name. Jacob was he; for he was naturally adroit and sly, and thus got the better of the physically stronger, more warlike Esau, and the egoistical, calculating Laban. Yet he was not sordid in his aims. He sought something higher than mere earthly possessions, and so he was Israel: for he wrestled for the divine blessing as the most valuable thing one could have; to win it, he summoned all his energy, and underwent every deprivation. It was the ambition of his life. He began the struggle in his mother's womb, and kept this end steadily in view, until, in the maturity of his powers, he received it. It is true he was far from being perfect. In him the lower nature was in conflict with the higher, and often victorious; but, in the course of a life much more troubled than that of his father's, he was purified. He was punished by a personal experience of the treatment he had given others. The deceiver of his father was deceived by Laban and by his own sons. The loving God of Jacob was by no means blind to the faults of his favorite, but approved his humble, hearty, undaunted desire after salvation.

JACOB'S WELL is mentioned in John iv. 5 as a well near the city of Sychar, in Samaria, on the parcel of ground which the patriarch Jacob gave to his son Joseph (compare Gen. xxxiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32). There the Lord sat down once while travelling from Judæa to Galilee, wearied from the journey, and then occurred the wonderful conversation related in John iv. 7-28. The place can still be identified with certainty, as situated one mile and a half to the south-east of the town of Nablus, the ancient Shechem, close by the highway from Jerusalem to Galilee, at the eastern base of Mount Gerizim. The well, which is lined with masonry, is now only seventy-five feet deep, and mostly dry, it having been filled up with debris of the adjacent ruined buildings; but in 1838, when Robinson visited it, it was a hundred and five feet deep. Jerome, in his Onomasticon, tells us that at his time a church built over the well occupied the site. That church was destroyed during the crusades; but in the twelfth century it was replaced by a chapel, which now also has fallen into ruins. See CONDER: Sychar and Sychem, in Statements, 1877, p. 149; [SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, 1879, p. 312.] RÜETSCHI.

JACOB BARADÆUS, b. at Tella; was educated in the monastery of Phasilta, near Nisibis, and lived for fifteen years in Constantinople as a monk, when, in 541 or 543, he was consecrated bishop of Nisibis by Theodosius, the Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, who was held a prisoner in Constantinople. In this position he labored with great energy and success for the reorganization and consolidation of the scattered Monophysite party in the East. "Light-footed as Asahel" (2 Sam. ii. 18), and clad in rags (whence Baradai, "a coarse horse-blanket"), he wandered from the boundary of Egypt to the banks of the Euphrates, preaching during the day, and often walking thirty or forty miles in the night, thus escaping his persecutors. He consecrated two patriarchs, twenty-seven (according to another reading, eighty-seven) bishops, and a hundred thousand priests and deacons. No wonder, therefore, that the whole party was called, after him, the Jacobites. Of written monuments he left very little. An anaphora, translated into Latin by Renaudot (Lit. Or. Coll., ii. 333), is ascribed to him; also a Confession, of which an Ethiopian version is extant in several manuscripts, edited and translated by Cornill, in Zeitschrift d. Deut. Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1876. A number of his encyclical letters are contained in a Syrian manuscript in the British Museum. E. NESTLE.

JACOB OF EDESSA (Syriac, Orrhoënus), b. in the middle of the seventh century, at 'Indaba, near Antioch; studied in Alexandria, and was in 684 appointed bishop of Edessa, but resigned in 688, on account of disputes with his clergy, and lived eleven years in the monastery of Eusebona, then nine years in the great monastery of Tell 'eda. When his successor in the see of Edessa, Habib, died, in 708, he was invited to resume office. He consented, but died while on the journey to Edessa, June 5. He wrote on theology, history, philosophy, and grammar. He was master of three languages, — Syriac, Greek, and Hebrew. He corrected the Syriac version of the Old Testament, and translated books of Aristotle, Porphyry, the two Gregories, and others, into Syriac: his literary accomplishments were, indeed, of the very highest order. Of his works much has come down to us, and is found in the libraries of London, Paris, Florence, and Rome. See the respective catalogues of Syriac manuscripts. Something has also been published: his Syriac grammar, edited by Wright, London, 1871; several of his letters in ASSEMANI: Bibliotheca Orientalis, i. 468-494; and in WRIGHT: Journal of Sacred Literature, 1867. See also BARHEBRÆUS: Chronicon Ecclesiast. (1872, i. 289). E. NESTLE.

JACOB OF JÜTERBOGK, b. at Jüterbogk, in the Prussian province of Brandenburg, 1381; d. at Erfurt, 1465 or 1466; entered the Polish monastery, the Paradise, and was by its abbot sent to Cracow to study; found the rules of the Cistercian order too lax, and adopted those of the Carthusian order, 1441; removed to the monastery, ad montem St. Salvatoris, in Erfurt, and labored in the university there as professor of canon law. He has a special interest on account of his reformatory zeal. Not that he in any way felt himself at variance with the doctrines of the Church; but he fully realized the corruption of her morals, and spoke with great frankness of the necessary reforms in Petitiones religiosorum pro reformatione sui status; De negligentia prelatorum; Avisamentum ad papam, addressed to Nicholas V.; and De septem statibus ecclesie. In his works he calls himself variously Jacobus de Jutirbock, de Paradiso, de Polonia, Cisterciensis, Carthusiensis, de Erfordia, etc. See ULLMANN: Reformatoren vor d. Ref., 1866, vol. i. PAUL TSCHACKERT.

JACOB (Aphraates) OF MAR MATTAL. See APHRAATES.

JACOB OF MISA, also called Jacobellus, from his small stature; b. at Misa, in Bohemia, in the latter half of the fourteenth century; studied theology at Prague, and was appointed pastor, first at Tina, afterwards of the Church of St. Michael in Prague, where he d. Aug. 9, 1429. His study of Scripture and the Fathers showed him that the withholding of the cup in the administration of the Lord's Supper to the laity was an arbitrary and completely unwarranted measure of the Roman Church. He first propounded and defended his views in a public disputation (1414); and when Hus, at that time in jail in Constance, accepted them, he published his Demonstratio, and began to administer the cup to his parishioners, in spite of the remonstrances of the bishop and the university. The fathers of the council were much alarmed; and in the thirteenth session (June 15, 1415), they issued a curious decree, admitting in theory as truth what in practice they condemned as heresy. Jacob answered in his Apologia; and, though he would by no means submit, he was not removed from his office, perhaps because in other points, as, for instance, in the doctrine of purgatory, he agreed with the Roman Church.

JACOB OF NISIBIS, also called Jacob the Great, lived for some time, together with Eugenius, the founder of Persian monachism, as a hermit in the Kurdistan Mountains, but was in 309 chosen bishop of Nisibis (Zoba); built the famous church there (313-320), of which ruins are still extant; was present, together with his disciple, Ephraem Syrus, at the Council of Nicæa, 325; and d. 338. None of his writings have come down to us. See art. APHRAATES, and EPHRAEM: Carmina Nisibena, ed. Bickell, 1866. E. NESTLE.

JACOB OF SARŪC, b. at Curtamun, on the Euphrates, towards the close of the year 451; d. at Sarŭc, Nov. 29, 521, where he had been chosen bishop in 519. He was a very prolific writer, keeping no less than seventy scribes busy with copying his works. Besides other works, seven hundred and sixty-three homilies or orations, in the common Syriac metre, are ascribed to him. Barhebræus knew a hundred and eighty-two; the Library of the Vatican contains two hundred and thirty-three; that of London, a hundred and forty; that of Paris, one hundred. Most of his works still remain in manuscript. Some have been printed in Breviarium feriale Syr., and Officium Dominicale; ASSEMANI: Act. Sanct. Mart., ii.; CURETON: Ancient Syriac Documents, 1864; Monumenta Syrica, i.; ABBELOOS: J. B. de vita et scriptis S. J. Bat. Sar., Louvain, 1867. His memory is greatly revered by the Jacobites and Maronites, and even by the later Nestorians; though, according to documents published by Abbé Martin, in Zeitschrift d. Deutsch. Morgenländ. Gesellschaft, 1876, he remained a Monophysite to his death. A Life of him was written by Jacob of Edessa, Bibl. Orient., i.: another (anonymous) is found in Act. Sanct. Oct. 12, 929, and in ABBELOOS, l.c. See ABBÉ MARTIN: Un Evêque-Poète, in Revue des Sciences Ecclésiastiques, 4 ser. t. iii., October, November, 1876. E. NESTLE.

JACOB OF VITRY (Jacobus Vitriacus, or de Vitriaco), b. at Vitry-sur-Seine, 1160; d. in Rome, April 30, 1240; was appointed presbyter parochialis, at Argenteuil, near Paris, 1200, but gave up this position in 1210, and removed to the monastery of Oignies, in the diocese of Liège, attracted by the sanctity of the Belgian nun Mary, whose life he wrote (ed. by Fr. Moschus, Arras, 1660, and in Act. Sanct., June 23). At the instance of the Pope he began in 1213 preaching a crusade against the Albigenses; and so great was the impression his eloquence produced (Sermones, Antwerp, 1575; compare LE COY DE LA MARCHÉ: La Chaire française au moyen âge, 1868), that in 1217 he was elected bishop of Ptolemais. In Palestine, where he remained for ten years, he made himself well approved, especially by the care he bestowed upon the children of the Saracen captives. But, shortly before the death of Honorius III., he seems to have returned to Oignies. Gregory IX., however, used him in many important diplomatical missions, and made him bishop of Frascati, and a cardinal. His principal work, Historia orientalis et occidentalis, was first edited by Fr. Moschus, Douay, 1597; then by Martène and Durand, in Thes. Nov. Anecd., iii., Paris, 1717. His letters have also great interest; MARTÈNE, l.c., and BONGARSIIUS: Gesta Dei per Francos, i. See MATZER: De J. Vitri., Münster, 1864. WAGENMANN.

JACOBI, Friedrich Heinrich, b. at Düsseldorf, Jan. 25, 1743; d. at Pempelfort, an estate he possessed near his native city, March 10, 1819; was educated, at Francfort and Geneva, for a commercial career, but showed from early youth great inclination towards literature and philosophy. In 1763 he took the lead of the mercantile concern his father had established at Düsseldorf; and in 1770 he was made a member of the council for the duchies of Juliers and Berg. In 1779 he was invited to Munich to take a similar position; but, not finding circumstances there after his taste, he retired to Pempelfort, where he remained until the war drove him away, 1793. He went to Holstein, and staid there for ten years. In 1804 he was again invited to Munich, as president of the academy; and he remained there till 1812. His first literary productions were Allwill's Brief-Sammlung (1774) and Woldemar (1779), two philosophical novels, of which especially the latter gives an easy outline of his philosophical speculations. In 1785 his Briefe über die Lehre Spinozas implicated him in a controversy with Moses Mendelssohn and the Berlin philosophers; and in 1787 a similar conflict with Kant and the critical school ensued from his Davil Hume über den Glauben. In 1801 he published one of his most important works, Ueber das Unterehmen des Kriticismus die Vernunft zu Verstande zu bringen, and in 1811 his last great book, Von den göttlichen Dingen, which called forth a very bitter rejoinder from Schelling. Jacobi's philosophy is not a system: on the contrary, his fundamental principle—the limitation of thought, its incapability to explain the existence of facts, to do any thing more than connect them with each other—places him in direct opposition to any purely demonstrative system. All thought, when applied alone, and carried resolutely to its last consequences, ends in atheism and fatalism. It needs to be supplemented with faith, which is the only organ of objective truth. Nevertheless, though Jacobi, as the "philosopher of faith," rests his speculations on intuition as their proper foundation, he is very far from the romantic fancifulness of Schelling. He was a sharp critic; and Schelling, as well as Kant, felt the penetrating power of his searching eye. In this point, as in many others, he resembles Sir William Hamilton, who, indeed, owed not a little to him. His works were collected by himself, and provided with very instructive prefaces and appendixes. His letters were edited by Roth, 1825-27, 2 vols. His life was written by KUHN: Jacobi und die Philosophie seiner Zeit, 1834, and ZIERNGIEBL: Jacobi's Leben, Dichten, und Denken, 1867.

JACOBITES was, from the middle of the sixth century, the name of the Syrian, and sometimes also that of the Egyptian Monophysites. Originating in the middle of the fifth century, Monophysitism spread among the Syrians, Copts, Abyssinians, and Armenians; and indeed, with the exception of some minor modifications, these four churches agree in all fundamental doctrines. The name, however, derived from Jacob Baradaeus, and not from the apostle or the patriarch, is generally confined to the Syrian Monophysites. The Egyptian Monophysites called themselves, in older times, Theodosians, or Severians, or Dioscorians.

Most of the Byzantine emperors were hostile to the Monophysites. Only Zeno and Anastasius favored them. Justinian's attempt at reconciling them with the Catholic Church failed. From the later emperors the Syrian Jacobites suffered very much, while their Egyptian brethren seemed to get along tolerably well with the Mohammedans. In the time of Gregory XIII. (1572-85) the number of Jacobites in Syria appears to have decreased. It was estimated, that in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia, there lived only about fifty thousand families scattered about, mostly in the villages and small towns. Their patriarch resided at Caramit: under him ranged five metropolitans, — at Amid, Mosul, Maadan, Haleb, and Jerusalem, — and six bishops, at Mar-din, Edessa, Gezira, Gargara, Tagrit, and Damascus. The Dutchman, Kootwyk (Itiner. Hierosol. et Syriamen, Antwerp, 1619), describes them as very poor. Richard Pococke (Descriptions of the East, London, 1743-45) estimated, that, out of twenty thousand Christians in Damascus, there were only two hundred Jacobites. Niebuhr (Reisebeschreibung, Copenhagen, 1770) found a small congregation at Nisibis, and tells us that at Mardin they had three churches; at Orfa, a hundred and fifty houses; in Jerusalem, a small monastery, etc.; while they occupied the whole district of Tor, where they also had an independent patriarch besides the one residing at Caramit. Buckingham, who travelled in Mesopotamia in 1816, estimated the number of Jacobites in Mardin at two thousand out of a population of twenty thousand; and in the neighborhood of the city he found two Jacobite monasteries. In Diabekr he counted four hundred, and in Mosul three hundred families. In these figures no considerable change seems to have taken place later on. See E. ROBINSON: Biblical Researches in Palestine, Boston, 1841; J. L. PORTER: Five Years in Damascus, London, 1855. Sadad, where they number about six thousand souls, is now the headquarters of the Jacobites in Syria.

The peculiar doctrines and institutions which distinguish the Jacobites are, the conception of one nature in Christ, resulting from a perfect blending of the divine and human in him, according to the formula, ex duabus naturis, non in duabus: the rejection of the canons of the council of Chalcedon, while those of the second council of Ephesus, the so-called "Robber Synod," are accepted; the veneration of Jacob of Sarûg, Jacob of Edessa, Dioscorus, Severus, Petrus Fullo, and Jacob Baradaeus as teachers and saints, while Eutyches is condemned; the use of leavened bread in the Lord's Supper; the making of the sign of the cross with one finger; the frequent application of the lot at elections of bishops and patriarchs. The Jacobite patriarch is styled "Patriarch of Antioch;" but the Greeks, who consider the Jacobites as heretics, have never allowed him to reside there. In the latter part of the ninth century it became customary for the patriarch to change his name on his election; and in the fourteenth Ignatius became the fixed name of the Jacobite patriarch, as Peter is that of the Maronite, Joseph that of the Chaldean, and Simon or Elijah, that of the Nestorian patriarchs. The Jacobite Church has produced quite a number of distinguished men, scholars, authors, etc. See Assemani: Bibl. Orient., ii. The various attempts of the Roman-Catholic Church to bring about a reconciliation with the Jacobites have not led to any remarkable results.

JACOBUS DE VORAGINE, b. at Viraggio, 1230; d. in Genoa, 1298; entered the order of the Preaching Friars in 1244, and was made archbishop of Genoa in 1292. His great fame he owes to his collection of legends, — Legenda Sanctorum, Legenda Aurea, also called Historia Longobardica, from the short Lombard chronicle attached to the life of Pope Pelagius. The materials of which the book is composed were derived partly from apocryphal gospels, acts of apostles, acts of martyrs, and partly from mediæval traditions of the wildest description; but just this made it acceptable to the time. It was translated into all European languages [into English by William Caxton, in the fifteenth century], and reprinted over and over again. He also wrote a number of sermons (Sermones de Sanctis, Lyons, 1494; Mariale, Venice, 1497, etc.) and a book in defence of the Dominican order. His chronicle of Genoa is found in MURATORI: Scriptores Rerum Italicarum, ix.

JACOBUS, Melancthon Williams, D.D., LL.D., b. at Newark, N.J., Sept. 19, 1816; d. at Allegheny, Penn., Oct. 28, 1876. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1834, and at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1838; taught in the Hebrew department for a year; was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, 1839-50; and from 1851 till his death was professor of Oriental and biblical literature in the theological seminary at Allegheny, Penn. In 1869 he was moderator of the General Assembly (Old School), the last assembly before the re-union. He was the author of a popular series of Notes on the New Testament, of which there appeared Matthew, with Harmony (New York, 1848), Mark and Luke (1853), John (1856), Acts (1859), and in 1864-65 Notes on the Book of Genesis, 2 vols. His Notes on the New Testament were republished in Edinburgh, 1862. See sketch of his life in Presbyterian Re-union Memorial Volume, pp. 530-532.

JACOMB, Thomas, b. at Burton Lazars, Leicestershire, 1622; educated at Cambridge; pastor in London; ejected in 1662 for nonconformity; d. at Exeter, March 27, 1687. He was one of the continuators of Poole's Annotations; but his fame rests upon his Several Sermons preached on the whole Eighth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans: Eighteen of which, on the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th verses, are here published [all published], London, 1672, republished, Edinburgh, 1868.

JACOPONE DA TODI, the author of the Stabat mater, b. at Todi, Italy, about 1240; d. Dec. 24, 1306, in the convent of Collazone. His real name was Jacopo de Benedetti, or Jacobus de Benedictis (the Latin form), Benedetti being the family name. He spent the years of early manhood in revelry and carousing. His talents, however, won him both degrees of the law at Bologna. He gave himself up with enthusiasm to the practice of law, when the whole tenor of his life was suddenly changed by the violent death of his wife, from the falling of a gallery in a theatre. He decided to become a monk, and one morning appeared in the market-place, on his hands and knees, harnessed like a beast of burden. He submitted to painful asceticism for ten years, when he was admitted, in 1278, to the Franciscan order of Minorites. He was led by the corruption of the Church to compose poems arraiguing Pope Boniface VIII. (1294-1303), and in 1297 entered into a confederacy of Roman nobles to compass his deposition. For this he was placed in close confinement, and limited to bread and water, until the death of Boniface, in 1303. He spent his last days at Collazone, and lies buried at Todi, where the following inscription was placed over his remains in 1569: Ossa Beati Jacoponi de Benedictis Tudertini Fratris ordinis Minorum, qui stultus propter Christum nova mundum arte delusit et cælum rapuit ("The remains of the blessed J. d. B. T., a brother of the order of Minorites, who, becoming a fool for Christ's sake, deluded the world by a new art, and carried off heaven"). The expression "fool" refers to the tradition that he was partially insane. His last hours were consoled by his own hymn, Giesu nostra fidanza ("Jesus our confidence"); and his last words are reported to have been, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit."

Jacopone wrote poems in Latin and Italian. The Florentine edition of 1490 contains a hundred Italian pieces; and the Venetian of 1614, two hundred and eleven. These poems consist of odes, satires, penitential psalms, etc. He wrote for the people, and reached the heart of his nation. His two most important Latin hymns (if the second be his) are the Stabat mater dolorosa ("At the cross her station keeping"), and its companion-piece, recently discovered, Stabat mater speciosa ("Stood the glad and beauteous mother"). The former hymn depicts the sorrows of the mother of Jesus at the foot of the cross (John xix. 25); the latter, her joys at the manger. The Stabat mater has been attributed to Gregory the Great (d. 606), Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), and Innocent III. It is anonymous in the copies of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but the uniform tradition attributes it to Jacopone, and there is no sufficient reason why we should not hold to it. The Flagellants, who marched through Italy in 1398, sang it [Summa historialis, by Antoninus Florentinus (d. 1450); Annals of Detmar of Lübeck and Georg Stella (d. 1420)].

The Stabat mater is the most pathetic hymn of the middle ages or any other age. It is defaced by Mariolatry, but its soft melody and tender pathos will always delight and soothe the ear. It has frequently been set to music; first by Nanini (about 1620), and since by Astorga (about 1700), Palestrina, Pergolese (about 1736), Haydn, Rossini, and others. It is sung to Palestrina's music on Palm Sunday, at Rome. [Lisco gives fifty-three German translations of the Stabat mater; and it has often been translated into English by Lord Lindsay, Caswall, Coles, Benedict, etc. The Mater speciosa has been translated by Dr. Neale, Coles, Benedict, etc.]

JAE'L (יַעַל; "wild goat"), the wife of Heber, the chief of a nomadic Arab tribe, was a heroine whose patriotic deed Deborah magnified in her triumphant song of victory (Judg. v. 24-26). In the precipitate flight of the Canaanites, after their defeat by Barak and Deborah, Sisera was induced, by the invitation of Jael, to stop in at her tent, whose seclusion might be expected to effectually conceal him. After refreshing himself with buttermilk, he fell asleep. While in this condition, Jael took a tent-pin, and drove it through his temples. The impassioned eulogy of Deborah expressed the gratitude of the nation for its deliverance from its enemy. Jael's deed was prompted by patriotic motives, and was a bold act; but the deed was carried out by a resort to treachery and a disregard of the laws of hospitality. The best treatment of the general subject of the justification of the deed will be found in Mozley's Ruling Ideas in Early Ages.

JAFFÉ, Philipp, b. at Schwerzenz, Posen, Feb. 17, 1819; d. in Berlin, April, 1870. He studied first medicine, but afterwards devoted himself to literature and history; was the collaborator of Pertz in the publication of the Monumenta Germanica, 1854-63, and was in 1862 appointed professor of history in the University of Berlin. His principal works are, History of the Empire under Lothair the Saxon; History of the Empire under Conrad III.; Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, 1851 (2d ed., 1881 sq.); and Bibliotheca Rerum Germanorum, 1864-69.

JAHN, Johann, b. at Tasswitz, Moravia, June 18, 1750; d. in Vienna, Aug. 16, 1816; entered the Premonstratensian order in 1774, and was appointed professor of Oriental languages and exegesis at the gymnasiums of Olmutz in 1784, and in the University of Vienna in 1789; but, as on several points of exegesis his views deviated from those maintained by the theologians of the curia, he was removed from his chair in 1805, and made canon of St. Stephen. His Introduction to the Old Testament and Arch. Biblica were even put on the Index. His grammars and textbooks were much used by students of the Syriac, Arab, and Chaldean languages. In English are his Biblical Archæology, Andover (U. S.), 1823, 5th ed., N. Y., 1849; and his History of the Hebrew Commonwealth, Andover (U. S.), 1828, 2 vols., 3d ed. rev., Oxford, 1840.

JAINS, The name of a very numerous and wealthy sect among the Hindus, founded in the fifth or sixth century B.C., by Vardhamana (commonly called Maha-vira), a contemporary of Gautama, the Buddha. Their belief resembles Buddhism in some particulars, as in their reverence for life in all its forms, which leads them to scrupulously avoid destroying even insects. They are, too, accounted heretics by the orthodox Brahman. But in most respects they differ from Buddhists; as (a) in the use of the word "nirvana," by which they mean immortality, and the delivery of the soul from the bondage of transmigration, in consequence of "the practice of the four virtues, — liberality, gentleness, piety, and remorse for failings, — by goodness in thought, word, and deed, and by kindness to the mute creation, and even to the forms of vegetable life;" (b) in their theism, indeed almost monotheism; and (c) in their customs. They reject the Vedas, and appeal to their own sacred books, called Agamas, which are now written in Sanscrit, though formerly in Prakrit. They worship twenty-four immortal saints, and deny the sacredness of caste. They are divided into two parties, — the Digambaras, the "sky-clad" (i.e., naked), and the Svetambaras, the "white-robed." Vardhamana and his immediate followers went naked; but the custom is now abandoned, although the idols in the Jain temples are still always naked. Their priests are celibates, and their widows are not allowed to remarry. The Jain temples and caves are remarkable. The series of temples and shrines on Mount Abu is "one of the seven wonders of India," and presents most striking evidence of the wealth and importance of the sect. Some of their idols are enormous in height.

JAMES, the name of three important characters of the New Testament.

I. JAMES THE SON OF ZEBEDEE. — His mother, Salome, was a follower of Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 41). He was the brother of John, and older than he, as is very probable from the fact that his name is almost always mentioned before John's (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 17, etc.). It is likely, though not certain, that he became a follower of Christ immediately after the baptism in the Jordan (John i. 32 sqq.). He and his brother were surnamed Boanerges, i.e., "sons of thunder" by Christ (Mark iii. 17). The reason for giving this designation is not recorded. He certainly did not intend an allusion to their eloquence, as the fathers supposed. The more probable view is, that the surname had reference to their passionate and vehement nature, both in thought and emotion, which sometimes showed itself in ambitious aspirations (Mark x. 35 sqq.) for a place of honor in the Messianic kingdom, but also in an ardent attachment to the person of Christ. James belonged, with John and Peter, to the narrower circle of Christ's more intimate disciples, was admitted into the chamber of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 37), to the vision of the transfiguration (Mark ix. 2), and to the scene of the agony in Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 37). In the history of the early apostolic church nothing further is recorded of him than his death by the sword, under Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xii. 2). He was the first of the apostles to suffer martyrdom; and thus, in a more pronounced measure than in the case of John, the prediction of Christ was fulfilled in his experience, that the brothers should indeed drink of his cup, and be baptized with his baptism (Mark x. 39); and, at least in point of time, he received the second place of honor in the kingdom of heaven. Ecclesiastical tradition says that the accuser of James confessed Christ, and, after receiving the apostle's pardon, himself suffered martyrdom (Clem. Alex., in Euseb., H. E., ii. 9). The Church of Spain boasts that he shared in its foundation, but its fables are in conflict with the statements of the New Testament.

II. JAMES THE SON OF ALPHÆUS, one of the twelve disciples of Jesus. He is so designated in four places, — Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13. No other passage can with certainty be regarded as referring to him or his family, and nothing further is known definitely of his life. The alleged blood relationship of his family with the house of Jesus lacks all evidence. This hypothesis identifies his father Alphæus with Clopas, and makes "Mary the wife of Clopas" (John xix. 25) a sister of Mary the mother of Jesus, or Clopas a brother of Joseph (Hegesippus). These suggestions are pure assumptions; for it is not at all certain that Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ means the wife of Clopas. It may mean the mother, or the daughter, of Clopas. Nor has the identification of the name Alphæus with Clopas any thing in its favor. A further objection is, that sisters would not be apt to have the same name, Mary. It is possible that he is the James whose mother is called Mary (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xvi. 1), and who is styled "James the Less," and the brother of Josès (Mark xv. 40). The title "the Less" contained an allusion to his stature, and was not given to distinguish him from James the son of Zebedee (Meyer). But it is possible that another James is here mentioned, as we would rather expect the expression, "James the son of Alphæus." Of his further experiences we know nothing, except that, according to tradition, he labored in Egypt, where he suffered martyrdom by crucifixion, in the city of Ostrakine (Niceph., ii. 40).

III. JAMES THE JUST, THE BROTHER OF THE LORD, the head of the Church at Jerusalem, is distinguished from the two apostles of the same name in Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 7; Gal. i. 19, ii. 9, 12; Jas. i. 1; Jude 1; and is mentioned by Josephus (Ant., XX. 9, 1), Hegesippus (Eusebius: H. E., ii. 33), and the Church fathers. In the early Church the existence of our James as a distinct person was denied by some; he being identified with one of the two apostles of that name, and more generally with James the son of Alphæus. The fraternal relation reported to have existed between James and Jesus was explained as a relation between cousins. But Tertullian is a witness to the fact that the distinction between James and the apostles was still held in his day. He speaks of the consummation of Mary's marriage with Joseph after the birth of Jesus, and of the brothers of Jesus (De carne Christi 7, adv. Marc. 19), to prove the reality of the incarnation over against Gnostic objections. At a somewhat later date the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 55, vi. 12, 13) declare for the same view, when they mention as the representatives of Catholic doctrine the twelve apostles, Paul, and James the brother of the Lord, who is also placed among the seventy disciples. That a fraternal relation is here meant is vouched for by another passage (vii. 46): "I James, a brother of the Lord according to the flesh." The testimony of Eusebius is also very important. He clearly distinguishes James, the brother of the Lord, from the twelve apostles, places him among the seventy disciples, and counts fourteen apostles in all, Paul being the thirteenth, and James the fourteenth (Com. Jes. xvii. 5; H. E., i. 12, ii. 1, vii. 19); and the passage (H. E., ii. 1) in which he speaks of him as the "so-called" brother of the Lord does not refer to a more distant relationship, for he prepares the way for this expression by stating that Jesus was born before the consummation of the marriage between Mary and Joseph.

Gradually the presumption of the perpetual virginity of Mary gained currency, and the fraternal relation of James was resolved into the relation of a step-brother. It is a matter of doubt whether this was done by Hegesippus, and in the pseudo-Clementine writings; but it is certain that there is not a trace in either of an identification of the brother of the Lord with an apostle. Hegesippus clearly makes this distinction (Euseb.: H. E., ii. 23). In the Protevangelium Jacobi, which originated in Essenic Christian circles, Joseph is represented as having been an aged man, surrounded with grown-up sons, before his espousal with Mary. It was only with hesitation that some learned Fathers, under the influence of a growing devotion to Mary, adopted this fable. The first trace of it occurs in Clement of Alexandria, — whom Origen followed, leaning upon Josephus and some others (ῥωίς), — Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Alexandria, Ecumenius, Hilary, and others.

From this hypothesis, which was entirely wanting in historical confirmation, it was natural to proceed farther, and resolve the fraternal relation into that of cousin, and identify the so-called brothers of our Lord with the apostles of the same name. It is quite possible that Clement of Alexandria identifies James the brother of the Lord with James the son of Alphæus; for he speaks of only two men by this name, — the one thrown from a tower, the other executed with the sword (Euseb.: H. E., ii. 1). But the first to declare himself distinctly for this identification was Jerome, who wrote a work against Helvidius, advocating the doctrine of Mary's perpetual virginity. He speaks of the theory that James was a son of Joseph by a former marriage as an ungrounded fancy taken from the Apocrypha, and tries to prove that our James was the same as James the son of Alphæus by identifying Mary of John xix. 25 ("Mary the wife of Clopas"), the sister of Jesus' mother, with the wife of Alphæus. He seems afterwards to have renounced this theory; for in his Commentary on Isaiah (xvii. 6) he mentions fourteen apostles, — the twelve, James the brother of the Lord, and Paul. Augustine spoke of James as the son of Joseph by a former marriage, or as a relation of Mary. To the latter view he gave the preference.

These various views have all had their advocates among modern divines. The theory that James the Just was a son of Mary and Joseph, and is to be distinguished from the apostles, has been held by Herder, Stier, Credner, De Wette, Wieseler, Neander, Schaff, Lechler, Reuss, Huther, B. Weiss, Bleek, Keim [Alford, Farrar], and others; Stier and Wieseler, however, referring Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18, Gal. ii. 9–12 to James the son of Alphæus. Semler, Hug, Schneckemburger, Hofmann, Lange, and others identify our James with James the son of Alphæus. And Thiersch and [Lightfoot] hold that he was a son of Joseph by a former marriage.

The statements of the New Testament emphatically favor the first view. The expressions in Matt. i. 25 and Luke ii. 7 most naturally imply that the marriage between Joseph and Mary was consummated after Christ's birth; and the expression "first-born son," by the analogy of the other cases in the New Testament (Rom. viii. 29; Col. i. 15, 18; Heb. xi. 28; Rev. i. 5), indicates that other children were born to Mary. The subsequent close relation in which the so-called brothers of our Lord stand to Mary (Matt. xii. 47 sqq., xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; John ii. 12; Acts i. 14) likewise strongly favors this view. The word "brother" (ἀδελφός) is never used in the New Testament of any other than the fraternal relation; and the few cases adduced from the Old Testament are indefinite; and special terms are employed for kindred (συγγενής) and cousin (ἀνεψίος), Mark vi. 4; Luke i. 36, ii. 44; Col. iv. 10). To these arguments must be added the fact that James the brother of the Lord and the Lord's "brethren" are distinguished from the apostles (John ii. 12; Acts i. 13; 1 Cor. ix. 5). In John vii. 5 it is stated, that, in contrast to the disciples, the brethren of the Lord had not believed; and in Matt. xii. 46 Christ institutes a comparison between his brethren by blood and by moral affinity. Paul's expression in Gal. i. 19 — "Other of the apostles saw I none save James the Lord's brother" — refers back to Peter, and not forward to James. He afterwards (Gal. ii. 9) calls James a "pillar" of the Church, avoiding the expression "apostle;" but in 1 Cor. xv. 7 he is as little distinguished from "all the apostles" as Peter is from the twelve (1 Cor. xv. 5). The expression "servant of the Lord" (Jas. i. 1) does not prove any thing at all against the view; for the appellation "the brother of the Lord," which was given to him by others as a mark of distinction, would have been out of place in his own mouth. The objection that the names of the four brothers of the Lord correspond to the names of four of the apostles ought to be of little weight when we remember that Josephus mentions no less than twenty-one different persons by the name of Simon, and sixteen by the name of Judas. James was, therefore, the full brother of Jesus, and a different person from the two apostles of that name.

James was the representative of the conservative Jewish party at the council of Jerusalem (Acts xv.), and stood at the head of the local church. The party of the Ebionites took him for their patron; and Hegesippus described him as a Nazarite, who from his childhood had drunk neither wine nor strong drink, had never been anointed with oil, never bathed, never worn any but linen garments, and whose hair had never been cut. He was surnamed the Just, and represented as having prayed constantly at the temple for the forgiveness of his people. According to Hegesippus, he suffered martyrdom in 69, by being thrown from a pinnacle of the temple by the Pharisees; but according to Josephus he was stoned to death by the Sadducees in 62 or 63. The latter passage is of doubtful authenticity, and the former statement is to be preferred.

JAMES, The Epistle of, was written by James, a servant of Jesus Christ, and addressed to the Jews of the Dispersion (Jas. i. 1). The readers are the Jewish people as a whole, not in the foreign country of this world (Hofmann), but outside of Palestine, only in so far, however, as they recognize the authority of a servant of Jesus (comp. i. 18; ii. 1; v. 7). They are not all classes of Jews, Christian and non-Christian (Grotius, Credner, etc.), nor Christians without reference to birth and nationality (De Wette, Schwegler, Hilgenfeld), nor Jews both in and out of Palestine (Thiersch, Hofmann), but Jewish Christians of the Diaspora. They belonged not to a single district, but to foreign lands generally. There are no references to any personal relations between the writer and his readers; no greetings or requests, as in the Epistle to the Galatians, for example, which was addressed to a special locality. The Epistle of James is a circular-letter designed for a general class of readers. That which he finds as a universal characteristic of the condition of the Jewish Christians at that time, was the secularization of Christian truth, and its reduction to a system of external observances. Influenced by exposure to trial (i. 2), and the delay of the Second Coming (v. 7, 8), men had begun to lose patience, and to divide their hearts between God and the world (i. 8). The "friendship of the world" (iv. 4) displays itself in the disregard of the poor, and the preference given to the rich (ii. 1 sqq.), in petitions to God for means to gratify lusts (iv. 3), or in the temporary forgetfulness of God (iv. 13 sqq.). They were also attempting to substitute external professions and ceremonies for piety of heart, and appealed to their creed (ii. 14) rather than to their deeds.

The object of the Epistle is to check these tendencies by warnings and exhortations; and for this reason the contents are, for the most part, of a parenetic and practical character. The exhortation (1) to steadfastness under temptation (i. 2–12) is followed by (2) the teaching that temptation originates with the heart, and not with God (i. 13–18), and the exhortation (3) to be obedient to the word of the divine truth (i. 19–27). Hereupon follow special exhortations against partisan preference for the rich (ii. 1–13), a dead faith (ii. 14–26), pride of wisdom (iii. 1–18), and the pursuit of worldliness, carnal security, etc. (iv. 1–v. 11). The Epistle is brought to a close by some briefer exhortations (v. 12–19).

The ethical nature of the Epistle is due not merely to the tendency towards laxness and worldliness which called it forth, but to the general conception of the gospel in the mind of the writer. It is characteristic that he calls the gospel the "law of liberty" (i. 25). He, however, recognizes the distinction between it and the law of the Old Testament, that it is not a servile yoke on the neck of man, but, implanted in his heart, it produces new motives and divine inclinations. And yet the word of Christ is in the last resort also a law, a revelation of God's will bearing upon human activity. The words of Christ are brought out more prominently than his person; and no writer of the New Testament lays so much stress on the discourses of Christ which developed the idea of the righteousness of the kingdom of heaven as he (comp. i. 2, 4, 5, 9, 20; ii. 13, 14; iii. 17, 18; iv. 4; v. 10, 12, etc.). For this reason he stands farthest away, of all the apostolic laborers, from Paul. Some have asserted that these two writers expressly contradict one another (Baur, Schwegler, Holtzmann, etc.); others, that there is a contrast between them which cannot be reconciled (Luther, Kern); while there are others still who hold that there is entire agreement (Thiersch, Hofmann, Lange, Philippi, Huther, etc.). Weiss and Beyschlag have recently tried to remove the whole difficulty, on the basis of the early date of James. There is no direct antithesis between the two men, for James was writing for those who held the works of faith to be unnecessary. Paul, on the other hand, wrote to show the incompetency of the works of the natural man to justify. James agrees with Paul in his main point, that faith without corresponding works is insufficient (comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 2; 2 Cor. v. 10).

There are indications that the Epistle was written at a comparatively late date in the apostolic period. Schneckenburger, Thiersch, Hofmann, Schaff, B. Weiss, Bleek, Beyschlag, [Alford, Plumptre, Lumby], and others hold to an earlier origin; and some regard it as the first of the New-Testament writings. Their reasons do not seem to us sufficient. The synagogue (ii. 2) is not a Jewish synagogue, but a place of Christian worship, controlled by Christians (ii. 3). The expectation of the second coming is also appealed to (v. 8 sq.); but this expectation prevailed during the whole of the apostolic period. As the First Epistle of Peter seems to have made use of James, and itself was written in the year 65 or 66, we conclude that James was written a few years before.

The author designates himself as "James a servant of Jesus Christ." This was the brother of the Lord, who stood at the head of the Church at Jerusalem, and took such a prominent part in the council of Jerusalem (Acts xv.). Notices confirming the genuineness of the Epistle are not found till the close of the second century, and Origen is the first to quote him by name; but he did not regard the work as authentic. Eusebius also placed it among the antilegomena. In the Syrian Church, however, the Peshito version received it, and Ephraem quoted it. In the Latin Church, Jerome accepted it as canonical, and so, likewise, Augustine. This difference of opinion is to be regarded as due to the fact that James the brother of the Lord was not an apostle. (See preceding article.) But the whole tone, as well as the special injunctions, of the book, are in exact accord with the character of James as it is brought out in the New Testament and by Hege-sippus. He looked at the gospel in its legal aspect, and insisted upon righteousness of life. Both these features are prominent in the Epistle. The comparatively good Greek style of the composition is no argument against its genuineness; for Galilee in the first century was completely hellenized.

JAMES, John Angell, an English Congregational pastor; b. at Blandford, June 6, 1785; d. at Birmingham, Oct. 1, 1859; educated in the theological academy conducted by Rev. David Bogue, D.D., at Gosport; ordained pastor of Carr's Lane Chapel at Birmingham, May 8, 1806, when barely twenty-one, and continued in that office till his death, over fifty years, Rev. R. W. Dale becoming his co-pastor in later years, and afterwards his biographer. Mr. James was a very laborious, earnest, and successful pastor, not remarkable for scholarship, but with fine talents for practical service, a good person and voice, a ready flow of language, and a constant aim at religious impression. As an author he is best known by The Anxious Enquirer after Salvation Directed and Encouraged, which has had so wide a circulation in Britain and America, and has been translated into several languages. But a collected edition of his works numbers fifteen volumes. They consist of sermons and addresses on practical subjects, — the ministry, the family, revivals, Christian graces, duties of young men, young women, and church-members. Mr. James cultivated a warm friendship with American ministers, — Dr. W. B. Sprague, Dr. S. H. Cox, Dr. C. G. Finney, and others, — and was a chief promoter of the formation of the Evangelical Alliance in 1846. See DALE: Life and Letters of John Angell James, Lond., 1862. F. H. MARLING.

JAMESON (Anna Murphy), Mrs., b. in Dublin, May 19, 1797; married Robert Jameson, 1823, but soon after ceased to live with him; d. at Ealing, London, March 17, 1860. She is mentioned here because of her familiar Sacred and Legendary Art (London, 1848, 2 vols.), Legends of the Monastic Orders (1850), Legends of the Madonna (1852), History of our Lord and of his Precursor as represented in Art (vol. i. 1860, vol. ii. finished by Lady Eastlake, 1864). These works have all been republished in America.

JANES, Edmund Storer, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sheffield, Mass., April 27, 1807; d. in New-York City, Sept. 18, 1876. From 1824 to 1830 he taught school in New-York State and New Jersey, when he entered the Methodist ministry; in May, 1840, he was elected financial secretary of the American Bible Society, and in 1844 resigned to accept the episcopate, having already impressed the whole church with his piety, eloquence, and wisdom. Henceforth for thirty-two years he was to be a wanderer over the earth, travelling longer distances, enduring longer absences from home, and performing more official work, than any of his colleagues. There was hardly a single successful measure of his denomination which did not bear the trace of his wisdom in council, and the vigor of his hand in execution. He greatly excelled as a preacher. See his Life by Henry B. Ridgeway, D.D., New York, 1882.

JANEWAY, Jacob Jones, D.D., a Presbyterian divine; was b. in New-York City, 1776; d. at New Brunswick, N.J., June 27, 1858. He graduated at Columbia College, 1794; became co-pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in 1799; was chosen professor of theology in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny in 1826; and spent the last years of his life at New Brunswick, where he acted as pastor of a Dutch Reformed Church from 1830 to 1832, and as vice-president of Rutgers College from 1833 to 1839. He was one of the founders of Princeton Seminary, and took an active part in the theological controversies of the day. He wrote Commentaries on Romans and Hebrews (Philadelphia), Internal Evidence of the Bible (1845), Review of Schaff on Protestantism, etc. See his Life, 1861.

JAN'NES AND JAM'BRES, spoken of in 2 Tim. iii. 8 as opposing Moses, are often referred to in Jewish tradition under different spellings. The names are evidently phonetically paired. They are Hebrew, not Egyptian, names. יָנוֹס, also written יָנוֹס and יָנוֹס, also called יָנוֹס, comes from the root נָוָא ("to seduce"); יָמָרְס, with the Greek ending μαρς, and with β inserted (written in the Targum יָמָרְס, יָמָרְס, but in the Talmud מָרְס, מָרְס), comes from the root מָרָא ("to be obstinate;" in Hiphil, "to rebel"). So the names mean "the seducer" and "the inciter" respectively. Jewish tradition has much to say about them. They two evidently stand opposite the two leaders, Moses and Aaron, whose miracles they imitated in the presence of Pharaoh. They were sons of Balaam, killed the Israelitish children on Pharaoh's order, opposed that people, carried on debates with Moses (whose teachers they had previously been), prepared a model of the golden calf, and finally accompanied Balaam. There is nothing remarkable in Paul's mention of them: their names must have been often heard in Gamaliel's school, and they were current among the heathen. Pliny apparently borrowed (Hist. nat. xxx. 2) from an apocryphal writing upon them mentioned by Origen (Tract. xxv. in Matth.) and Ambrose (on 2 Tim.). The Pythagorean Numenius in the second century knew of them (Origen: c. Celsus., iv. 51, and Eusebius: Præp. evang., ix. 8), as did Apuleius (Apol. II.) and the author of the Gospel of Nicodemus (c. 5). The comparison between them and the teachers described in the context (2 Tim. iii. 8 sq.) rests upon the similarity of their wilful resistance to the heralds of the divine truth and their lack of genuine faith-power. For the original passages concerning them, see Fabricius: Codex Pseudepigraphus, ed. 2, I. 813-825.

JANOW, Matthias von, d. in Prague, Nov. 30, 1394; descended from a noble Bohemian family; studied theology in Prague and Paris, whence he was often called Magister Parisiensis; was appointed canon in the Cathedral of St. Vitus in 1381, and stands in the history of the Bohemian Church as one of the predecessors of Hus. He was not a great preacher, but exercised influence through his practical care of souls, and through his writings, — treatises, which in 1392 he collected under the title Regulæ veteris et novi testamenti. The principles of reform which he propagated were the abolition of any merely human addition to Christianity (doctrinal or ceremonial) and the return to the simple foundation on which rested the Apostolical Church. In 1433 Johann Rockycana asserted before the council of Basel that Janow used to administer the cup to the laity in the Lord's Supper; but there is nothing in his writings which confirms that statement. JANSEN, Cornelius, b. in the village of Acquoy, North Holland, Oct. 28, 1585; d. in Ypres, May 6, 1638. After completing his preliminary studies at Leerdam and Utrecht, he went to Louvain in 1602, and studied for a short time at the Jesuit college; but, becoming dissatisfied with the doctrines taught there, he removed to the College of Adrian VI., and came under the influence of Jacobus Jansenius, a follower of Michael Bajus, and a disciple of Augustine. Here he made the acquaintance of M. du Vergier de Hauranne, afterwards Abbé de St. Cyran. Having graduated in philosophy at Louvain in 1604, he went to Paris, and subsequently accompanied Du Vergier to Bayonne, where they remained together for six years, devoting themselves to the study of Augustine's writings. Returning to Louvain in 1617, he declined the offer of a chair of philosophy, and was made director of the newly founded College of St. Pulcheria, which was completed, and its regulations instituted by him. He did not long retain this position, desiring to devote himself to theology. In 1619 he became doctor in that faculty. By incessant study of Augustine he became convinced that Catholic theologians had departed from the doctrine of the ancient Church. On a visit of St. Cyran to Louvain, in 1621, they divided their work for the reformation of the Church, Jansen taking the department of teaching, and St. Cyran that of organization. Intimate relations were formed with distinguished priests in Ireland. In 1623, and again in 1627, Jansen, deputed by the university, travelled to Spain in order to oppose the Jesuits, who had attempted to establish professorships of their own at Louvain. He was successful, the Jesuits in the Low Countries being ordered to continue to observe the restrictions which had been laid upon them in 1612. Notwithstanding their hostility, he was appointed in 1630 to the Regius Professorship of biblical exegesis at Louvain. In the same year he engaged in a controversy about Protestantism with Voetius, in which he was worsted. He secured the favor of the Spanish court by his opposition to France and its recent alliance with the Protestant Gustavus Adolphus. He also attacked the pretensions of France, in his pseudonymous work entitled Alexandri Patricii Arnacani, Theologi, Mars Gallicus, seu de Justitia Armorum et Fœderum Regis Galliarum Libri Duo. For this service to Spain he was rewarded with the bishopric of Ypres in 1636. Here he died of the plague two years after, just as he had completed his great work, the Augustinus, embodying the results of twenty-two years'

study of the writings of Augustine. These writings he declared that he had read through ten times, pen in hand, and the portions relating to sin and grace thirty times. The manuscripts of his work were bequeathed to Lamæus, Fromundus, and Calenus, for publication; but he declared his obedience to the Roman see, if any alterations should be desired. The work was published under the title Cornelii Jansenii Episcopi Iprensis, Augustinus, seu Doctrina Sti Augustini de Humanæ Naturæ Sanitate, Ægritudine, Medicina, adversus Pelagianos et Massilienses. It consists of three parts. In the first he gives an historical account of the Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian (Massilian) heresies. In the second he sets forth the Augustinian doctrine as to human nature in its primitive and fallen states. The third part, in ten books, expounds Augustine's ideas concerning grace, and also the predestination of men and angels. The fundamental proposition of the work is, that, since Adam's fall, free agency no longer exists in man, pure works are a mere gratuitous gift of God, and the predestination of the elect is not an effect of his prescience of our works, but of his free volition. The Augustinus struck at the Jesuits, who wished to conciliate the doctrine of salvation by grace with a certain amount of free agency; and its sting lay mainly in the epilogue, which draws a parallel between the errors of the Massilians and those recentiorum quorundam, the Jesuits being referred to.
