SLANDER (Heb. דִּבְבוּרָה, dib-baw), a defaming, evil report (Num. 14:36; Psa. 31:13; Prov. 10:18). In the apostolic Church the wife of a deacon was forbidden (1 Tim. 3:6) to be a slanderer (Gr. διάβολος, dce-ab'-ol-os), i. e., a calumniator, false accuser.

SLAVE, SLAVERY. See SERVICE.

SLEEP, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, used in the general sense of sleep or repose for the body (Psa. 4:8; 121:4; Jonah 1:5, 6). The manner of sleeping in warm Eastern climates is very different from that in colder countries. Their beds are generally hard, feather beds being unknown. The poor often sleep on mats, or wrapped in their outer garment, for which reason the latter was not allowed to be retained in pledge overnight (Gen. 9:21, 23; Exod. 22:26, 27; Deut. 24:12, 13). The wealthy sleep on mattresses stuffed with wool or cotton, being often only a thick quilt, used singly or piled upon each other. In winter a similar quilt of finer material forms the coverlet, while a thin blanket suffices in summer; unless, indeed, the convenient outer garment is used (1 Sam. 19:13). See BED.

Figurative. Sleep is employed as a symbol of death (Deut. 31:16; 2 Sam. 7:12; Job 7:21; Dan. 12:2; John 11:11, etc.); of supineness, indolence, or stupid inactivity of the wicked (Rom. 18:11, 12; Eph. 5:14; 1 Cor. 11:30).

SLIGHT. See GLOSSARY.

SLIME. See ASPHALT; BITUMEN, in MINERAL KINGDOM; GLOSSARY.

SLIME PITS. See SIDDIM.

SLING. See ARMOR, p. 85.

Figurative. The proverb, "As he that bindeth a stone in a sling," etc. (Prov. 26:8), is probably better rendered by Gesenius "As a bag of gems in a heap of stones," the Heb. מַרְגָּמַיִם (mar-gay-may), A. V. "sling") meaning a "heap of stones" (comp. Matt. 7:6).

SLIP (Heb. זַמְרִירָה, zem-o-raw, pruned), is the layer of a vine. To set "strange slips" (Isa. 17:10) is thought to be figurative for making foreign alliances, e. g., with the king of Damascus.

SLOTHFUL. In Prov. 12:24, "the slothful shall be under tribute," the Heb. רַמְיָהוּ, rem-ee-yaw, means remiss, treacherous; and the meaning seems to be, "The deceitful man will come to dependence." In v. 27 we have an expression which means that such a man does not improve his opportunities. The Heb. אַו־טָל, aw-tsal, has the usual meaning of to be slack, indolent, and is most generally used in the Old Testament.

SLOW. 1. Kav-bade' (Heb. כָּבֵד) means heavy, as when Moses said, "I am not eloquent [literally, a man of words], but heavy in mouth and in tongue" (Exod. 4:10); a difficulty in speaking, though not exactly stammering.

2. Aw-rake' (Heb. אָרַק, to make long) is used in the frequent expression, "slow to anger" (Neh. 9:17; Psa. 103:8; Prov. 16:32, etc.), and expresses the same state of mind as the term "long-suffering."

3. A very peculiar expression is found in Tit. 1:12, "slow bellies" (Gr. γαστέρες ἀργαί, gas-ter'-es ar-gak'-es), to describe the Cretians. The one word is used to indicate their sensuality, the other their sloth (R. V. "idle gluttons").

SLUGGARD, another rendering in the A. V. of the Hebrew, rendered Slothful (q. v.).

SLUICE (Heb. שֶׁכֶר, seh'-ker, wages, reward, Prov. 11:18), the improper rendering in Isa. 19:10, means those who live upon wages, and is not equivalent to שֶׁכֶר, the dammers-up of water.

SMITH. See HANDICRAFT; METALS.

SMYRNA (Gr. Σμύρνα, smoor'-nah, myrrh), a rich, prosperous, and dissolute city of Ionia, forty miles N. of Ephesus, at the mouth of a small river, Meles. Anciently it was one of the finest cities of Asia, and was called "the lovely—the crown of Ionia—the ornament of Asia." It is now the chief city of Anatolia, with a mixed population of two hundred thousand people, one third of whom are Christians. It is referred to in Rev. 2:8-11 as the seat of one of the seven churches. It was largely inhabited by Jews bitterly opposed to Christ and Christianity; and the church of Smyrna becomes the type of a suffering Church. It will be observed that at Smyrna the Church is still faithful, and that against her no word of reproach is uttered. It was Polycarp's field of Christian usefulness, and here he suffered martyrdom, A. D. 155.

SNAIL. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

SNARE (usually the rendering of some form of Heb. יָשָׁר, yaw-koshe', to ensnare; frequently of פַּחַ, pakh, a spring net; Gr. βρόχος, brokh'-os, noose; παγίς, pag-ee', trap), a net or trap, especially of the fowler (Isa. 8:14; Amos 3:5); also such as seizes man and beast (Job 18:10; Jer. 18:22). Snares were set in the path or hidden in the ground (Psa. 140:5; 119:10; Prov. 7:23; 22:5; Jer. 18:22). The snare (Heb. פַּחַ, pakh) was formed of two parts which, when set, were spread out upon the ground, and slightly fastened with a trap-stick; so that as soon as a bird or beast touched the stick the parts flew up and inclosed the bird in the net or caught the foot of the animal (Job 18:9).

Figurative. Snare is used for anything that may be the cause of injury or destruction, e. g., the nations about Israel (Josh. 23:13); false gods (Judg. 2:3; 1 Kings 11:4; Psa. 106:36); false prophets (Hos. 9:8); riches, love of (1 Tim. 6:9); death, as a hunter (2 Sam. 22:6; Psa. 18:5; comp. 91:3).

SNOOT (Heb. אַף, af, nostril, hence, face) is only mentioned in Prov. 11:22, "as a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman without discretion." Clark (Com.) thus comments: "Beauty in a woman destitute of good breeding and modest carriage is as becoming as a gold ring on the snout of a swine."

SNOW (Heb. שֶׁלֶג, sheh'-leg, white; Gr. χιόν, khez-one'). In the historical books of Scripture snow is twice mentioned as actually falling (2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chron. 11:22; comp. 1 Macc. 13:22). In the poetical books the allusions are so frequent as to make it probable that snow was an ordinary occurrence in Palestine. "During most winters both hail and snow fall on the hills. On the Central Range snow has been known to reach a depth of nearly two feet, and to lie for five days, or even more. . . . This explains the feat of Benaiah, who went down and slew a lion in the midst of a cistern in the day of the snow (2 Sam. 23:20)" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 64, sq.). The snow lies deep in the ravines of the highest ridge of Lebanon until the summer is far advanced, and, indeed, never wholly disappears; the summit of Hermon also perpetually glistens with frozen snow. From these sources, probably, the Jews obtained their supplies of ice for the purpose of cooling their beverages in summer (Prov. 25:13).

Figurative. The color of snow is given as an image of brilliancy (Dan. 7:9; Matt. 28:3; Rev. 1:14); of purity (Isa. 1:18; Lam. 4:7, referring to the white robes of the princes); of the blanching effects of leprosy (Exod. 4:6; Num. 12:10; 2 Kings 5:27); of cleansing power (Job 9:30); "snow waters," i. e., melted snow, easily dried up in the burning sand (24:19), is used to express the swift and utter destruction of the goddess; snow, fertilizing the earth before it again returns as vapor to the sky, figures the effective power of God's word (Isa. 55:10). "Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon?" (Jer. 18:14) is thus rendered by Orelli (Com.), "Does the snow of Lebanon disappoint on the rock of the fields?" i. e., the Lebanon snow feeds without ceasing, the water flowing therefrom. Phenomena of nature, stable and trustworthy, are contrasted with the fickleness of Israel.

SNUFF (Heb. שָׁאֵף, shav-af'), to inhale eagerly, as Jer. 14:6, where the wild asses, tormented by burning thirst, pant for wind like jackals (comp. 2:24). "Snuff" (Heb. נָפַח, naw-fakh', to blow at), means to express contempt, as of God's altar (Mal. 1:13).

SNUFF-DISH, SNUFFER, articles used in the TABERNACLE (q. v.).

SO (Heb. סוֹ, So), a king of Egypt. Hoshea, the last king of Israel, evidently intending to become the vassal of Egypt, sent messengers to So, and made no present, as had been the yearly custom to the king of Assyria (2 Kings 17:4), B. C. 725. The consequence of this step was the imprisonment of Hoshea, the taking of Samaria, and the carrying captive of the ten tribes (18:10, 11).

Identification. "It has been questioned whether this So was the same with Sabaco, the first king of the Ethiopian dynasty in upper Egypt, or his son and successor Sevechus, the second king of the same dynasty, and the immediate predecessor of Tirhakah . . . This name, in Egyptian Sevech, is also that of the god Saturn."

SOAP (Heb. בֹּרֶת, bo-reeth'). The Hebrew bo-reeth' is a general term for any substance of cleansing qualities. As, however, it appears in Jer. 2:22, in contradistinction to nether (Heb. נֶחֱלֶה, neh'-ther, A. V. "nitre"), which undoubtedly means "natron," or mineral alkali, it is fair to infer that bo-reeth' refers to vegetable alkali, or some kind of potash, which forms one of the usual ingredients in our soap. It occurs in Mal. 3:2, but there is nothing to tell us whether it was obtained from the vegetable or mineral kingdom. But בֹּרֶת, bore (Job 9:30) denotes a vegetable alkali used for washing. Numerous plants, capable of yielding alkalies, exist in Palestine and the surrounding countries; we may notice one named Hubeibeh (the Salsola Kali of botanists) found near the Dead Sea, the ashes of which are called el-Kali, from their strong alkaline properties, the Ajram, found near Sinai, which, when pounded, serves as a substitute for soap. Modern travelers have also noticed the Saponaria officinalis and the Mesembryanthemum nodiflorum, both possessing alkaline properties, as growing in Palestine.

SOBER, SOBERLY, etc. 1. (Gr. νῆψω, nay'-fo, and derivatives), calm and collected in spirit, temperate, dispassionate (1 Thess. 5:6, 8; 2 Tim. 4:5, A. V. "watch;" 1 Pet. 1:13).

2. (Gr. σωφρονέω, so-fro-nel'-o, and derivatives), the being of a sound mind, as of one who has ceased to be under the power of an evil one (Mark 5:15; Luke 8:35); the opposite of ἐκστήναι, to be beside one's self (2 Cor. 5:13); the exercise of self-control, so as to (a) place a moderate estimate upon one's self (Rom. 12:3), (b) to curb one's passion (Tit. 2:6).

SO'CHO (Heb. שׁוֹכֹה, so-ko', a fence, a hedge, 1 Chron. 4:18), variously called SOCHOH (1 Kings 4:10), SHOCHOH (1 Sam. 17:1), SHOCO (2 Chron. 11:7), SHOCHO (28:18). It was in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:35), and was settled by the sons of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah. It was one of the cities fortified by Rehoboam after the revolt of the northern tribes (2 Chron. 11:7). Here Goliath was slain, and it was also one of Solomon's commissariat districts. It lay on the north side of Wady es-Sunt, and is identified with modern Khurbet Shuweikeh, fourteen miles S. W. of Jerusalem.

SO'CHOH (1 Kings 4:10). See SOCHO.

SOCKET. See TABERNACLE.

SO'COH. 1. A city in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:35). See SOCHO.

2. Another city of Judah, in the mountain district (Josh. 15:48), one of a group of eleven towns. Robinson located it in the Wady el-Khalil, about ten miles S. W. of Hebron; bearing, like the other SOCHO, the name of Shuweikeh.

SO'DI (Heb. סוּדִי, so-dee', intimate), father of Gaddiel, the spy appointed to represent the tribe of Zebulun (Num. 13:10), B. C. 1209.

SOD'OM (Heb. סְדוֹם, sed-ome', burnt), an ancient city in the vale of Siddim, mentioned (Gen. 10:19) as belonging to the Canaanites, in which Lot settled after separating from Abraham (13:12; 14:12). It had its own "king," or chief, as did the other four cities of the plain (14:2), and with them rebelled against Chedorlaomer. It was finally destroyed by Jehovah because of its great wickedness (19:1, sq.). Respecting the manner of its destruction, it is recorded (v. 24), "Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven." "The words are to be understood quite literally as meaning that brimstone and fire, i. e., burning brimstone, fell from the sky, even though the examples of burning bituminous matter falling upon the earth, which are given in Oedmann's Vermischte Sammlungen (iii, 20), may be called in question by historical criticism. By this rain of fire and brimstone not only were the cities and their inhabitants consumed, but even the soil, which abounded in asphalt, was set on fire, so that the entire valley was burned out and sank, or was overthrown, i. e., utterly destroyed, and the Dead Sea took its place" (K. and D., Com.). See Lor.

Sodom is introduced by Ezekiel (16:46, sq.; comp. Rev. 11:8) with Samaria, as sisters of Jerusalem in a spiritual sense, as animated by the same spirit of idolatry, Jerusalem acting even more corruptly than they. The prophet then enumerates the sins of Sodom (v. 49, sq.): pride, satiety, careless ease, haughtiness, and uncharitableness toward the poor.

SOD'OMA (Gr. Σόδομα, sod'-om-ah, Rom. 9:29), the Greek form of Sodom (q. v.).

SOD'OMITE (Heb. שֹׁדֹמִי, kaw-dashe', consecrated, devoted). The sodomites were not inhabitants of Sodom, nor their descendants, but men consecrated to the unnatural vice of Sodom (Gen. 19:5; comp. Rom. 1:27) as a religious rite. "This dreadful 'consecration,' or, rather, desecration, was spread in different forms over Phœnicia, Syria, Phrygia, Assyria, Babylonia. Asharoth, the Greek Astarte, was its chief object." The term was especially applied to the emasculated priests of Cybele, called Galli, perhaps from the river Gallus in Bithynia, which was said to make those who drank it mad. In Deut. 23:17 the toleration of a sodomite was expressly forbidden, and the pay received by a sodomite was not to be put into the temple treasury (v. 18). "The price of a dog" is a figurative expression used to denote the gains of a kaw-dashe' (sodomite), who was called κυνικός, kin'-ahee-dos, by the Greeks, from the doglike manner in which he debased himself (see Rev. 22:15, where the unclean are called "dogs").

SOFT. See GLOSSARY.

SOLDER (Heb. דֶּקֶת, dek'-bek, joint), welding of metal (Isa. 41:7). In 1 Kings 22:34; 2 Chron. 18:33, deb-aw-keem, דֶּבְאֵי קַיִם, are "joints by which the iron thorax was attached to the hanging skirt which covered the abdomen" (Cler.). The true coat of mail covered only the breast to somewhere about the last rib; and below this it had an appendage (skirts) consisting of movable joints. Between this appendage and the true coat of mail there was a groove through which the arrow passed, and, entering the abdomen, inflicted upon the king a mortal wound" (Keil, Com., 1 Kings 22:34).

SOLDIER. See ARMY.

SOLOMON. 1. Name and Family. (Heb. שְׁלֹמֹה, shel'-o-mo', pacific; also named, at the command of Nathan, JEDIDIAH, beloved of Jehovah). A son of King David by Bath-sheba (2 Sam. 12:24; 1 Chron. 3:5), B. C. before 990. Sayce (Hibbert Lecture, pp. 51, 52) thinks that Solomon was a name given, not in childhood, but subsequently. The cuneiform inscriptions inform us that Sallimannu, "the god of peace," was a god honored particularly in Assyria (Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, pp. 178, 179).

2. Personal History. (1) His youth. Nothing is known of Solomon's youth, unless it be that he was brought up by Nathan the prophet (2 Sam. 12:25), where the true reading probably is, "and he intrusted him to Nathan," etc. (Kitto, Stanley). He was Bath-sheba's favorite son, "tender and only beloved in the sight of his mother" (Prov. 4:3), and to her David had pledged her son's accession by a separate and solemn oath (1 Kings 1:13, 17, 30). (2) Appointed successor. When David had become enfeebled by age, his son, Adonijah, endeavored to place himself upon the throne, and so far succeeded as to have himself proclaimed king at En-rogel (v. 5-9, 25). Nathan informed Bath-sheba of these proceedings, and they together succeeded in rousing the languid energies of the king, who acted with prudence and decision. At his command Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet, supported by Benaiah, with the bodyguard of Cherethites and Pelethites, proclaimed Solomon king, amid the rejoicings of the people, and anointed him with the sacred oil, which Zadok took out of the tabernacle, B. C. 960 (1:32-40). A constant memorial of this solemnity is presented in the seventy-second Psalm. The last act of David was to send for Solomon and urge upon him obedience to the statutes of Jehovah, so that he might enjoy prosperity. He also told him how to deal with Joab, Barzillai, and Shimei (2:1-9). Upon hearing tidings of Solomon's appointment, Adonijah fled to the altar for refuge, but received assurance from Solomon that his life would be spared if he proved worthy of clemency (1:50-53). (3) Solomon's reign. To give the narrative of Solomon's reign chronologically is a matter of great difficulty, because we have very few notices of time, and also because of the confusion of the various texts describing it. 1. Disposes of enemies. Adonijah, shortly after Solomon's accession, made a request that Abishag, David's concubine, should be given him as a wife. This was interpreted as an act of treason, and Adonijah was put to death; Abiathar was dispossessed of the priesthood, and Zadok put in his place; Joab was slain because of the murder by him of Abner and Amasa; Shimei was confined within the limits of Jerusalem, with the understanding that a trespass of the injunction would forfeit his life; three years after he went to Gath in pursuit of two of his servants, and was put to death (2:13-46). 2. Marriage. Having firmly seated himself upon the throne, Solomon sought to strengthen his kingdom by foreign alliances, and married the daughter of the king of Egypt (3:1), of the 21st dynasty. 3. Choice of wisdom. Notwithstanding this foreign alliance, Solomon loved the statutes of David, his father. The blot upon his conduct at this time was that he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places (3:3). In the course of a series of sacrifices (it may be) Solomon came to Gibeon, where the tabernacle stood. There, in the midst of a great convocation of the people, he sacrificed a thousand burnt offerings. The following night God appeared to him in a dream, and asked him to choose what he should give him. Sensible of the responsibilities resting upon him, he asked for wisdom in preference to any other blessing. This was granted him, and the Lord added riches and honor, with the promise of a long life if he was obedient to the commandment of Jehovah. Assured of God's favor, he returned to Jerusalem and renewed his sacrifices before the ark, and made a feast to all his servants (3:4-15). 4. Wise judgment. An opportunity soon arose to prove his sagacity. Two women appeared before him with a dead and a living child, each claiming the living one as her own. Solomon ordered the living child to be cut in twain. This the real mother could not endure, and begged him to spare the life of the babe. He therefore commanded the child to be restored to her. "And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king: for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him to do judgment" (3:16-28). (4) National prosperity. The general tone of the records of Solomon's reign is that of jubilant delight. The hard, warlike reign of David was followed by one of peace and quiet. His own court was arranged on the same general basis as his father's, but on a scale of greater magnificence. The supplies needed for the court were levied throughout the whole land by twelve officers, "each man his month in a year made provision." The provision for each day consisted of thirty measures of fine flour, sixty measures of meal, ten fat oxen and twenty from the pasture, and one hundred sheep, besides venison and fowl (4:22, 23). The peace and plenty of Israel are thus described: "Judah and Israel were many, as the sand which is by the sea in multitude, eating and drinking and making merry" (4:20). "And the king made silver and gold at Jerusalem as plenteous as stones, and cedar trees made he as sycamore trees that are in the vale for abundance" (2 Chron. 1:15). In his great military establishment Solomon set at naught the law against keeping up a force of cavalry (see Deut. 17:16). He had forty thousand stalls of horses for his fourteen hundred chariots, and twelve thousand cavalry horses, besides fleet horses used for posts (1 Kings 4:26, 28), dromedaries in the latter verses meaning "swift horses" (2 Chron. 1:14). (5) Sacred and royal buildings. It had been the intention of David in his later years to erect at Jerusalem a house for Jehovah, and for this he had made great preparations. Immense quantities of gold and silver were collected, and the designs placed in the hands of Solomon. King Hiram sent an embassy of congratulation to Solomon on his accession, who returned an answer informing Hiram of his intention of building a house to God, and requesting his assistance, which Hiram gladly promised (1 Kings 5:1, sq.). Hiram gave cedars and fir trees out of Lebanon, which his servants felled, while those of Solomon squared and fitted them for their places in the building. The provisions for both parties were supplied by Solomon. The prepared timber was brought down to the sea, floated round to Joppa under the care of the Tyrian sailors, whence Solomon undertook the thirty miles transport to Jerusalem. He employed, of the descendants of the Canaanites, seventy thousand to bear burdens, eighty thousand to hew timber and stone in Lebanon, under three thousand six hundred overseers (1 Kings 5:15, 16; 2 Chron. 2:17, 18). He also raised a levy of thirty thousand Israelites, whom he sent to work in Lebanon by relays of ten thousand, each relay serving a month and returning home for two (1 Kings 5:13, 14). The actual building of the temple was commenced in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, B. C. 966 (1 Kings 6:1; 2 Chron. 3:2). It was completed in seven and a half years, in the eighth month (Bul) of the eleventh year of Solomon, B. C. 949 (1 Kings 6:38). The site prepared for it by David had formerly been the thrashing floor of Ornan, on Mount Moriah. The dedication was a ceremony of remarkable grandeur. It took place in the month Ethanim (October) of the succeeding year, the delay being, no doubt, in order to accommodate it to the Feast of Tabernacles. It was held the week preceding that festival, and was attended by the whole people and all the priests. Solomon made the prayer of consecration, after which he and all the people offered their sacrifices, twenty-two thousand oxen and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep. The Feast of Dedication lasted seven days, followed by the seven of the Feast of Tabernacles, and the people returned to their homes "joyful and glad of heart for all the goodness that the Lord had done for David his servant, and for Israel his people" (1 Kings, ch. 8; 2 Chron. 5:6, 7). This superb structure was followed by others of great magnificence; a palace (q. v.) for himself, which consumed thirteen years in its erection; the house of the forest of Lebanon; and a third for his queen, Pharaoh's daughter (1 Kings 7:1-12). On the completion of this palace he conducted her to it in state from the city of David (1 Kings 9:24; 2 Chron. 8:11). "Among his other buildings may be mentioned a summer palace in Lebanon (1 Kings 9:19; Cant. 7:4), stately gardens at Etham (Eccles. 2:5, 6), the foundations of something like a stately school or college, costly aqueducts. About the same time Solomon undertook the repairs of the fortress of Zion, as well as Millo itself" (Smith, O. T. Hist.). He also fortified the towns Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, Beth-horon (upper and lower), Baalath, and Tadmor (1 Kings 9:15-18; 2 Chron. 8:4-6). The services of King Hiram were acknowledged by a cession of twenty cities along the seacoast of Galilee, a gift at which Hiram expressed his discontent by a play upon the name of one of them, Cabal, a word signifying dirt. Hiram returned them with a gift of one hundred and twenty talents of gold, and the alliance of the two kings remained unimpaired (1 Kings 9:11-14). (6) Second vision. After the completion of these works God appeared a second time to Solomon by night, assuring him that he had heard his prayer, accepted the temple as a house of sacrifice, promising to establish his kingdom, warning him, however, of the ruin that would follow disobedience (1 Kings 9:1-9; 2 Chron. 7:12-22). (7) Commerce. Solomon put forth vigorous efforts to promote the commerce and trade of his country. To increase the land traffic he had small cities built in advantageous localities, in which goods of all sorts in large quantities were kept in suitable storehouses. While thus linking his dominions with the great highways of commerce to the north and northeast, he opened the path of maritime enterprise, both in the Mediterranean and Indian Ocean, in conjunction with the Tyrian fleets of Hiram. The fleets built by Solomon, and navigated by the skilled mariners of Hiram, sailed to Ophir, a place in the Indian Ocean, probably on the eastern coast of Arabia, and returned after a three years' voyage, bringing gold, silver, ivory, and precious stones, almond trees, apes, and peacocks (1 Kings 9:26-28; 10:22; 2 Chron. 8:17, 18). (8) Wealth. Solomon's revenue had so greatly increased that it was variously stated (perhaps in different years) at four hundred and twenty, four hundred and fifty, and six hundred and sixty-six talents. Silver was so abundant as scarcely to be esteemed a precious metal, and all the king's drinking vessels were of gold. Solomon had two hundred shields made, each of which was overlaid with about eighteen pounds of gold; and three hundred smaller ones, whose covering of gold weighed about nine pounds. His throne was magnificently constructed of gold and silver, and was so remarkable that "there was not the like made in any kingdom" (1 Kings 10:14-23). (9) Queen of Sheba. So great had King Solomon become that he "exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches and wisdom." Solomon received visitors from all parts of the world, who came to hear his wisdom, bringing vast presents of gold, silver, garments, armor, spices, horses, and mules (10:23-25). Among these illustrious visitors the most distinguished was the queen of SHEBA (q. v.), who came with a great caravan of camels, bearing gold, precious stones, and spices. "She came to prove him with hard questions" (enigmas or riddles), by which to test Solomon's wisdom. Solomon gratified her curiosity and thirst for knowledge, drawing out her confidence until "she communed with him of all that was in her heart." The wisdom of the king and the magnificence of his surroundings completely overwhelmed the queen: "there was no more spirit in her." She confessed that the report which had reached her did not tell half the truth respecting his greatness and wisdom. Solomon dismissed her with valuable presents, and she returned to her own country (1 Kings 10:1-13; 2 Chron. 9:1-12). (10) Extent of dominion. "And Solomon reigned over all kingdoms from the river unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt: they brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life" (1 Kings 4:21; 2 Chron. 9:26). The territory over which Solomon ruled included all the kingdoms "from the river," the great Euphrates (comp. Gen. 15:18), "unto the land of the Philistines," lying on the Mediterranean coast to the west of Judea, and "unto the border of Egypt." These separate kingdoms doubtless preserved their separate organization and nationality, as when independent, but were ever ready both to contribute to the annual revenues of Solomon and also to furnish, when occasion offered, their quota of men for any public service (Whedon, Com.). (11) Sin. The great wisdom of Solomon appears to have been insufficient to keep him from falling into evil practices, for we read that "King Solomon loved many strange women, together with the daughter of Pharaoh, women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites; . . . and he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines: and his wives turned away his heart. For it came to pass, when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods; and his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, as was the heart of David his father. For Solomon went after Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites. And Solomon did evil in the sight of the Lord, and went not fully after the Lord, as did David his father. Then did Solomon build a high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem, and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon. And likewise did he for all his strange wives, which burnt incense and sacrificed unto their gods" (1 Kings 11:1-8). These outrages, the more flagrant in the king who had himself built the temple, and to whom Jehovah had twice given solemn warnings mingled with his promises, called down the wrath of God. The judgment was pronounced upon him that his kingdom should be rent from him and given to his servant, one tribe being reserved to his son for the sake of David (11:9-13). (12) Enemies. Solomon had already some formidable enemies. One of these was Hadad, prince of Edom, who had escaped to Egypt from the massacre of Joab, where he married the sister-in-law of Pharaoh. He returned to his own country, and began a harassing war against Solomon. A still more formidable enemy was Rezon, who founded the kingdom of Damascus, and was an enemy of Solomon through all his reign. But Jeroboam was an internal enemy of a still more dangerous character. He was a young man of talent and energy, who, having been appointed by Solomon superintendent of the engineering works projected around Jerusalem, had risen into public notice. He was informed by Ahijah the prophet that God intended to give him the kingdom, saving the remnant promised to Solomon's son. Hearing of this, Solomon sought the life of Jeroboam; but the latter fled to Egypt, and remained there till the death of Solomon (11:14-40). (13) End. Amid such beginnings of impending trouble Solomon approached the end of his course. He died after a reign of forty years, and was buried in the royal sepulcher in the city of David, B. C. about 920. Sayce (High. Crit., p. 320) thinks that "forty" is used as an Hebrew idiom for an indefinite period, and that Solomon's reign was about thirty-two years long. Notwithstanding his immense harem we only read of his having one son, Rehoboam (11:41-43). It may be that the historian mentions only Rehoboam because he was successor to the throne.

3. Character. The character of Solomon, as drawn in the Scriptures, is many-sided. The simple, unpretending child; the darling of Jehovah (2 Sam. 12:24, 25); the chosen king; the seeker after wisdom, choosing her above all other things; the wise and sagacious judge; the powerful ruler and glorious sovereign; the man of science, and able to solve difficult problems, surpassing in many ways all the kings of the nations round about him; his navies traversing many a sea, and kings and princes from afar bringing and laying at his feet their gifts. He was "full of sublime devotion, equally full of practical sagacity; the extemporizer of the loftiest litany in existence, withal the author of the pungent Proverbs; able to mount up on rapture's ethereal pinion to the region of the seraphim, but keenly alive to all the details of business, and shrewd in all human intercourse; zealous in collecting gold, yet lavish in expending it; sumptuous in his tastes, and splendid in costume; the patriot intense, the Israelite indeed" (Hamilton, The Royal Preacher). Enervated by luxury, debilitated by licentiousness, he was an easy prey to idolatry; he neglected to fear God and keep his commandments.

NOTE.—1 Kings 2:28-34. "A strict regard for the honor of Jehovah and for his statutes, laws, judgments, and testimonies required that the crimes of the bloody Joab should receive their merited penalty; but David seems to have felt that his own hands were too full of blood, and his own heart had been too deeply stained with blood-guiltiness" (Psa. 51:14), to allow him to be the instrument of Joab's punishment. Not for sins committed against the law and majesty of God, does David advise Solomon, the king, as the keeper of God's law and the guardian of God's honor, to punish the guilty offender (Whedon). Chap. 3:7-9. The wisdom that Solomon asked and obtained was not so much of the heart as the head. It was wisdom not for himself personally, but for his office, such as would qualify him for the administration of justice, the government of the kingdom, and for the attainment of general scientific knowledge (J. and F., Com.). Chap. 4:23-31. High powers of mind, great capacity for receiving, as well as aptitude for communicating, knowledge. Of his many proverbs and songs we have only a small portion remaining. He is generally considered as the author of the three canonical books, Proverbs, Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes.

SOL'OMON, SONG OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

SOL'OMON'S PORCH. 1. "The porch of judgment" attached to the palace (1 Kings 7:7). See PALACE. 2. The portico (Gr. σποά Σολομώντος, stō-ah' Sol-om-ō'-nos), the outer corridor of the temple (John 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12). See TEMPLE.

SOL'OMON'S SERVANTS (Heb. עֲבָדָיו, ab-day' shel-o-mo', Ezra 2:58; Neh. 7:57, 60), the descendants ("sons") of persons thus named returned from captivity. Following as they do in the lists, the priests, Levites, and the Nethinim, they would seem to have some connection with the temple service. Smith (Bib. Dict., s. v.) suggests: 1. The name as well as the order implies inferiority even to the Nethinim. They are descendants of the slaves of Solomon. The servitude of the Nethinim, "given to the Lord" was softened by the idea of dedication. 2. The starting point of their history is probably found in 1 Kings 5:13, 14; 9:20, 21; 2 Chron. 8:7, 8.

Canaanites, who had been living till then with a certain measure of freedom, were reduced by Solomon to the Helot state, and compelled to labor in the king's stone quarries, and in building his palaces and cities. To some extent, indeed, the change has been effected under David, but it appears to have been then connected especially with the temple, and the servitude under his successor was at once harder and more extended (1 Chron. 22:2). 3. The last passage throws some light on their special office. The Nethinim, as in the case of the Gibeonites, were appointed to be hewers of wood (Josh. 9:23), and this was enough for the services of the tabernacle. For the construction and repairs of the temple another kind of labor was required, and the new slaves were set to the work of hewing and squaring stones (1 Kings 5:17, 18). Their descendants appear to have formed a distinct order, inheriting, probably, the same functions and the same skill.

SOL'OMON'S SONG. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF. SOMETIMES. See GLOSSARY.

SON (Heb. בֶּן, bane; Gr. υἱός, hwee-os'; the Chald. בַּר, bar, son), occurs in the Old Testament, and appears in the New Testament in such words as Barnabas). "Son" is used in a great variety of meanings in both the Old and New Testaments; (1) the immediate offspring; (2) grandson, as Laban is called son of Nahor (Gen. 29:5), though he was his grandson (24:29); so Mephibosheth is called the son of Saul, though he was the son of Jonathan, Saul's son (2 Sam. 19:24); (3) remote descendants (Num. 2:14, 18); (4) son by adoption, as Ephraim and Manasseh to Jacob (Gen., ch. 48); (5) son by nation, as sons of the East (1 Kings 4:30; Job 1:3); (6) son by education, i. e., a disciple, as Eli called Samuel his son (1 Sam. 8:6). Solomon calls his disciple his son in the Proverbs often, and we read of the "sons of the prophets" (1 Kings 20:35, etc.), i. e., those under training for service; similarly a Christian convert (1 Tim. 1:2; Tit. 1:4; Philem. 10; 1 Cor. 4:15, 17; 1 Pet. 5:13); (7) son by disposition and conduct, as sons of Belial (Judg. 19:22; 1 Sam. 2:12), sons of the mighty, i. e., heroes (Psa. 29:1); sons of the band (2 Chron. 25:13, A. V. "soldiers of the army"), sons of the sorceress, i. e., those who practice sorcery (Isa. 57:3); (8) son in reference to age, as the "son of one year" (Exod. 12:5), i. e., a year old; (9) a production or offspring of any parent, as sparks are called "sons of the burning coal" (Job 5:7, marg.), an arrow is "son of the bow" (41:28), because the arrow flies from the bow; also "son of the quiver" (Lam. 3:13); "son of the floor," i. e., thrashed grain (Isa. 21:10); "sons of oil," i. e., branches of the olive (Zech. 4:14, marg.); expressive of deserving, as son of beating, i. e., deserving beating (Deut. 25:3), so son of perdition (John 17:12); (11) Son of God, by excellence above all, viz., Jesus (Mark 1:1; Luke 1:35; John 1:34; Rom. 1:4; Heb. 4:14); (12) sons of God, i. e., angels (Job 1:6; 38:7), perhaps so called as possessing power delegated from God, his deputies, vicegerents; (13) believers are sons of God (John 1:12; Phil. 2:15, etc.); (14) sons of the world (Luke 16:8), i. e., worldly-minded persons; sons of disobedience, those who are unrestrained in evil; sons of hell (Matt. 23:15); sons of the devil, i. e., under his power (Acts 13:10); sons of the bridechamber (Matt. 9:15; Mark 2:19), the youthful companions of the bridegroom, as in the instance of Samson. Offspring, especially sons, were highly valued among all Eastern nations, and barrenness was regarded as one of the severest afflictions (see Gen. 16:2; 29:31; 30:1, 14, etc.). See CHILDREN; FAMILY.

SON OF GOD. See SONSHIP OF CHRIST.

SON OF MAN (Heb. בֶּן־אָדָם, ben-aw-dawm';

Gr. υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, hwee'-os too an-thrō'-poo), "a designation, which, like the Son of God, is now chiefly associated with Christ, and used in both the Old and New Testaments. It had a general, before it received a special application. It is employed as a kind of circumlocution for man, as a frail and changeable being in contrast with God (Num. 23:19; Psa. 8:4; Isa. 51:12; 56:2). The address, 'Son of man,' occurs so frequently in Ezekiel (2:1; 3:1, etc.), that it must be regarded as one of the peculiarities of his prophecies. It may be that the frequent use of this expression was to remind the prophet, as well as the people to whom he communicated his revelations, not merely of the weakness of humanity, but to show them at the same time how powerfully the word of God operates in feeble man, and also that God, who has selected the prophet as the organ of his will, possesses also the power to redeem the people, that were lying powerless under the oppression of the heathen, from their misery, and to raise them up again" (Keil, Com., on 2:1).

In Dan. 7:13 it is recorded, "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven," etc. It would seem that the person so designated was not only ideal humanity bringing in the higher kingdom, as opposed to those represented by the beast, but also as coming from heaven. The words "as a man" do not teach that he was only a man. He that comes with the clouds of heaven may, as Kranichfeld observes, "be regarded, according to current representations, as the God of Israel coming on the clouds, while yet he who appears takes the outward form of a man." The clouds are the veil or the "chariot" on which God comes from heaven to execute judgment against his enemies (see Psa. 18:10, sq.; 97:2-4; 104:3; Isa. 19:1; Nah. 1:3). "This passage forms the foundation for the declaration of Christ regarding his future coming, which is described after Dan. 7:13 as a coming of the Son of man with, in, on the clouds of heaven (Matt. 24:30; 26:64; Mark 13:26; Rev. 1:7; 14:14)."

According to Weiss (Bib. Theol. of N. T., p. 75), the use of the article before "Son" points "to the fact that the expression (Son of man) means, not a son of man among others, but a definite Son of man, whose uniqueness required no explanation for his hearers." From this it follows, however, that this uniqueness is not to be sought in a higher divine nature, which constitutes the deepest essence of this Son of man; for the idea of such a Son of man was altogether foreign, at least to the popular consciousness. But, no doubt, every Israelite who believed in Scripture could, in consequence of prophecy, know of a Son of man who, because Jehovah would bring about the completion of salvation through him, had such a divine calling as no one had ever had, and no one after him could have. "The name Son of man appears about fifty times in the gospels in the mouth of Jesus. . . . And since Christ applies both names (Son of man and Son of God) to himself, and, therefore, the divine and human sides in his person and his self-consciousness have arrived at unity, and in this unity the consummation of revelation and humanity is at the same time given, this new personal living unity is to be thought as that which acts and speaks in him. According to the portrait communicated to us by the Gospel, this man is nowhere without the divine, which constitutes his person, just as conversely humanity essentially belongs to the person who is ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ (Son of God)" (Dorner, Christ. Doct., iii, p. 168, sq.).

SONG (Heb. שִׁיר, sheer; Gr. ᾠδή, o-day). Songs were used on occasions of thanksgiving and triumph, as the song of Moses at the deliverance from Pharaoh (Exod. 15:1); the song of Israel at the well of Beer (Num. 21:17); the song of Moses in Deuteronomy (ch. 32); of Deborah (Judg. 5:12); of David on bringing the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 13:8); of Hannah (1 Sam., ch. 2); of the Virgin Mary (Luke 1:46); the songs in heaven (Rev. 5:9, sq.; 14:3; 15:3, sq.; 19:4, sq.).

Figurative. Songs (see SINGING) were indicative of joy, and their absence of sorrow. "Ye shall have a song, as in the night" (Isa. 30:29), is a figurative allusion to the joyful singing of the Israelites on the festival night before the passover. "And, lo, thou art unto them as a very lovely song," etc. (Ezek. 33:32), is more correctly rendered, "Thou art unto them like a pleasant singer," etc., i. e., the prophet was like the singer of pleasant songs, to which they listened for pleasure, but without obedience.

SONSHIP OF BELIEVERS. See ADOPTION.

SONSHIP OF CHRIST, a matter of doctrine with reference to the divine nature of Christ. It is inwrought with the doctrine of the TRINITY (q. v.), and in the very nature of the case points to a relationship which in its deepest essence cannot be comprehended by the human understanding (see Matt. 11:27). And yet the Scriptures throw some rays of light upon the subject.

1. Scriptural. The term Son of God is used in the Scriptures in various senses. In the Old Testament it is sometimes applied to Israel (e. g., Exod. 4:22), also figuratively to heavenly beings (Job 1:6; 38:7). In the New Testament it is also employed in different applications (Luke 3:38; Matt. 5:9, 45). It is in one instance (Luke 1:35) applied to Christ on account of his miraculous conception. And yet it is plain beyond all question that the Scriptures apply this title to Christ in a sense far deeper than all these. Both Christ himself and his apostles speak of his Sonship in a way which cannot be employed with reference to any, even the highest, of God's creatures (see John 8:13, 16; 5:17-31; 6:62; 8:58; 10:30; 14:1, 11; Rom. 1:3, 4; 9:5; Col. 2:9; Tit. 2:13). See KENOSIS; WORD.

2. Theological. The doctrine of the Scriptures, universally held by the Christian Church, includes the following features:

(1) The Sonship of Christ involves an antemundane and eternal distinction of personality between the Son and the Father. He is the eternal Son even as the Father is the eternal Father. Thus both Christ and the apostles speak of his preexistent state (John 8:58; 17:5; Rom. 8:3; 2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:5-8). And thus while he teaches men to pray, saying "Our Father," for himself he simply says "Father," or "My Father" (see John 15:8, and many other places).

(2) The Sonship of Christ implies also that he as the Son "has the ground of his existence in the Father, and as the Father has not in the Son" (see Van Oosterzee, vol. i, p. 276). Christ is the "only begotten of the Father" (John 1:15, 18), the "only begotten Son" (3:16), "his own Son" (Rom. 8:3). Upon these and similar Scripture expressions is based the doctrine of the eternal generation. This theological term, however, it is rightly held, is one which is liable to abuse, and should never have associated with it anthropomorphic conceptions, and should exclude all idea of time. The idea to be reverently held is that the Son of God has the ground of his existence eternally in the Father.

(3) The Son is in the most complete sense partaker in the same nature with the Father. He possesses the same attributes (John 5:21; 21:17; Luke 11:49), performs the same works (Matt. 9:2, sq.; John 5:24-29), and claims equal honor with the Father (John 5:23; 14:1; Matt. 28:19). As the Son, having the ground of his existence in the Father, he is in this sense subordinate. Also in his incarnate state he became subordinate in a still deeper sense (see KENOSIS). And yet before his incarnation he "thought it not robbery to be equal with God;" and in his glorified state "in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily."

The doctrine of the eternal Sonship of Christ has been the ground of many hard-fought battles (see particularly ARIANISM and SABELLIANISM in works on theology), but the Christian Church steadfastly holds to the teachings of the Scriptures. And the truth at this point is most important; for only in the light of this truth can we recognize in Christ the perfect revelation of God, and realize the efficacy of his saving ministry.

SOOTHSAYER, SOOTHSAYING. See MAGIC, (15), p. 671.

SOP (Gr. ψωμίον, psō-mee'-on, fragment), a piece of bread dipped into the sauce (John 13:26-30). In the East the animal food is so thoroughly cooked as to be easily separated by the fingers. When, however, the food is in a semifluid state, or so soft that the fingers cannot conveniently hold it, it is conveyed to the mouth by means of a thin piece of bread. It is customary for the host to honor a guest by thus passing to him any dainty morsel. The handing of the "sop" to Judas would indicate that his place at the table must have been near to our Lord.

SOP'ATER (Gr. Σώπατρος, so'-pat'-ros, saviour of his father), a disciple of Berea, who accompanied Paul from Greece into Asia, on his return from his third missionary journey (Acts 20:4). In the Codex Sinaiticus, and several other manuscripts, his father's name is given as Pyrrhus. It is a question whether or not he is the same with SOSIPATER (q. v.).

SOPH'ERETH (Heb. סֹפֶרֶת, so-feh'-reth, scribe). "The children of Sophereth" were a family who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, among the descendants of Solomon's servants (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:57), B. C. before 536.

SORCERER, SORCERY. See MAGIC, (16), p. 671.

SORE. See DISEASES.

SOREK (Heb. סוֹרֵק, so-rake', red, vine), a valley in which was the home of Delilah (Judg. 16:4). Dr. Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 218) identifies it with the present Wady es Surar, through which runs the railroad from Joppa to Jerusalem. "It is the way the Philistines used to come up in the days of the judges and of David; there is no shorter road into Judea from Ekron, Jamnia, and, perhaps, Ashdod. . . . Just before the Wady es Surar approaches the Judean range its width is increased by the entrance of the Wady Ghurab from the northwest, and by the Wady en Najil from the south." It was by the level road up the Sorek valley that the ark was taken to Bethshemesh (1 Sam. 6:10, sq.). "The territory which the Book of Joshua assigns to Dan lies down the two parallel valleys that lead through the Shephelah to the sea, Ajalon a Sorek. . . . The head of the vale of Sorek has usually been regarded as the scene of the battle in which the Philistines took the ark (ch. 4)" (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 220, 223).

SORROW, the rendering of a number of Hebrew and Greek words, representing mental pain or grief, arising from the privation of some good we actually possessed. It is the opposite of joy; contracts the heart, sinks the spirit, and injures the health. Scripture cautions against it (2 Sam. 12:20; Ecclus. 30:24, 25; 1 Thess. 4:13, etc.). Paul distinguishes two sorts of sorrow: "Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of: but the sorrow of the world worketh death" (2 Cor. 7:10). The one is that sorrow for sin wrought by God which leads to repentance, while the other is a sorrow about worldly objects which, when separated from the fear of God, tends to death, temporal and eternal. Sorrow, in the expression, "The sorrows of hell compassed me about" (Psa. 18:5), may be rendered "the cords of the grave," etc.

SOSIP'ATER (Gr. Σωσίπατρος, so-sip'-at'-ros, saviour of his father), a kinsman of Paul, mentioned in the salutations of the Epistle to the Romans (16:21) as being with the apostle. He is perhaps the same with Sopater.

SOSTHÉNÉS (Gr. Σωσθένης, socē-then'-ace, of safe strength)

1. The ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, who was beaten by the Greeks in the presence of Gallio when the latter refused to entertain the charge made to him against Paul (Acts 18:17). Some have thought that he was a Christian, and was maltreated thus by his own countrymen, because he was known as a special friend of Paul. A better view is that Sosthenes was one of the bigoted Jews; and that "the crowd" were Greeks who, taking advantage of the indifference of Gallio, and ever ready to show their contempt of the Jews, turned their indignation against Sosthenes. In this case he must have been the successor of Crispus (v. 8).

2. Paul wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians jointly in his own name and that of a certain Sosthenes, whom he terms "the brother" (1 Cor. 1:1). Some have held that he was identical with the Sosthenes mentioned in the Acts. If this be so he must have been converted at a later period, and have been at Ephesus, and not at Corinth, when Paul wrote to the Corinthians. The name was a common one, and but little stress can be laid on that coincidence (Smith, Dict., s. v.). Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 259) says: "Probably two persons at Corinth named Sosthenes were brought into relations with Paul, one a Jew, the other a prominent Christian; or, perhaps, the Jew was converted at a later date."

SOTAI (Heb. סוֹטַי, so-tah'ee, roving). The "children" of Sotai were a family of the descendants of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57), B. C. before 536.

SOTTISH. See GLOSSARY.

SOUL (generally the rendering of Heb. נֶפֶשׁ, neh'-fesh, a breathing creature; Gr. ψυχή, psoo-khay', breath, etc., the equivalent of neh'-fesh). The Hebrew term "may indicate not only the entire inner nature of man, but also his entire personality, i. e., all that pertains to the person of man; . . . "in the sense of person; somebody, everybody (Deut. 26:16; Josh. 10:39; 11:11, 14); and numbers are reckoned, as well in the New Testament as in the Old, by souls (1 Pet. 3:20). It would thence be wrongly concluded that the soul is what constitutes the person of man; for the brute is also called נֶפֶשׁ (neh'-fesh). In נֶפֶשׁ (neh'-fesh) in itself is not involved the conception of the personal living, but only of the self-living (the individual). In such cases נֶפֶשׁ (neh'-fesh) indicates the person of the man, but not the man as a person. The beast is נֶפֶשׁ (neh'-fesh), as a self-living nature by the power of the spirit that proceeds from God and pervades entire nature, the individual constitution of which spirit is the soul of the brute; but man is נֶפֶשׁ (neh'-fesh), as a self-living nature by the power of the Spirit that proceeds from God, and is in the form of God, and is therefore personal, the operation of which spirit is his endowment with soul" (Delitzsch, Bib. Psych., pp. 181, 182).

The Greek term, ψυχή (psoo-khay'), has the simple meaning of life (Matt. 6:25; Luke 12:22); that in which there is life, a living being (1 Cor. 15:45); every soul, i. e., every one (Acts 2:43; 3:23; Rom. 13:1). It also has the meaning of the seat of the feelings, desires, affections, aversions (our soul, heart, etc.; R. V. almost uniformly soul); the human soul, in so far as it is so constituted that, by the right use of the aids offered it by God, it can attain its highest end and secure eternal blessedness; the soul regarded as a moral being designed for everlasting life (3 John 2; Heb. 13:17; James 1:21; 5:20; 1 Pet. 1:9). Another meaning of psoo-khay' is the soul as an essence which differs from the body, and is not dissolved by death (Matt. 10:28); the soul freed from the body, a disembodied soul (Acts 2:27, 31; Rev. 16:3; 20:4). See SPIRIT.

SOUR (Heb. בֹּסֵר, bo'-ser, immature). The proverb, quoted in Jer. 31:29, 30, and Ezek. 18:2, "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge," is easily understood. The sour grapes which the fathers eat are the sins which they commit; the setting of the children's teeth on edge is the consequence thereof, i. e., the suffering which the children have to endure. The teaching of the proverb is that children would have to atone for their fathers' sin, without any culpability of their own. This fatal error is condemned by both Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jehovah declares with an oath that this proverb shall not be used any more, for their iniquity shall be made manifest; and announces that all souls are his, and he will mete out to each his deserts. In Hosea it is declared of Israel, "their drink is sour" (4:18), i. e., deteriorated (Heb. שֹׂרֵר וְשֹׂרֵרִים, soor), and their rulers (lit. shields) love shame, viz., the things that bring shame.

SOUTH, the country or quarter of the heavens which the Shemite, standing with his face to the east, supposes to be on his right hand.

1. Neh'-gheb (Heb. נֶגֶב, rendered in A. V. "the south," means literally the dry or parched land; and probably took its name from the hot, drying winds, which annually blow into Syria from Africa and Arabia. Thus our Lord said (Luke 12:55), "And when ye see the south wind blow, ye say, There will be heat." The word is occasionally applied to a dry tract of land. Caleb's daughter says to her father, "Thou hast given me a south land [i. e., dry land]; give me also springs of water" (Judg. 1:15). It is also used in the geographical sense in Num. 34:3; Josh. 15:2; 1 Chron. 9:24; 2 Chron. 4:4; Ezek. 40:2; 46:9, etc.

A very important use of the word (Negeb) is as the designation of the regions lying south of Judea, consisting of the deserts of Shur, Zin, and Paran, the mountainous country of Edom or Idumea, and part of Arabia Petraea. Dr. Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 279) thinks that Dhâheriyah, probably the site of Kirjath-sepher, is the frontier town between the hill country of Judea and the Negeb. He says: "South of Dhâheriyah the soil is more bare, but travelers coming up from the desert delight in the verdure which meets them as soon as they have passed Beer-sheba and the Wady es-Seba. The disposition of the land—the gentle descent cut by the broad wady—and its fertility, render it as open a frontier and as easy an approach to Judea as it is possible to conceive.

But it does not roll out upon the level desert. South of Beer-sheba, before the level desert is reached, and the region of roads from Arabia to Egypt and Philistia, there lie sixty miles of mountainous country, mostly disposed in 'steep ridges running east and west,' whose inaccessibility is further certified by the character of the tribe that roam upon it. Wilder sons of Ishmael are not to be found in all the desert. The vegetation, even after rain, is very meager, and in summer totally disappears. 'No great route now leads, or ever has led, through this district,' but the highways which gather about the south of it from Egypt, Sinai, the Gulf of Akabah, and Arabia, are thrust by it either to the east up the Wady 'Arabah to the Dead Sea, or to the west toward Gaza and Philistia. Hence we find Judea almost never invaded from the south. The inhabitants of the Negeb were included in the conquests of Joshua (10:40); and to the same region belongs the passage, 'Turn our captivity as the streams in the south' (Psa. 126:4). Sometimes 'south' is used in a relative sense; thus the cities of Judah are called 'the cities of the south' (Jer. 13:19); relatively to Chaldea, expressed by 'the north' (1:14; comp. 4:6; 6:1). Egypt is also called 'the south'; thus, 'the king of the south' (Dan. 11:5) is Ptolemy Soter, and his successors."

2. Daw-rome' (Heb. דָרוֹם) is a bright, sunny region, hence the south, the southern quarter (Ezek. 40:24, sq.; 42:12, sq.; Eccles. 1:6); poetically for the south wind (Job 37:17).

3. Tay-mawn' (Heb. יָמִינִי, what is on the right hand), the south, the southern quarter (Josh. 12:3; 13:4; Job 9:9; Isa. 43:6); and, perhaps, meaning Egypt (Zech. 6:6). It is used poetically for the south wind (Psa. 78:26; Cant. 4:16).

4. Yaw-meen' (Heb. יְמִינִי, the right side), the south, as "Thou hast made the north and the south" (Psa. 89:12). The word is evidently here used in its widest sense, comprehending not only all the countries lying south, but also the Indian Ocean, etc., the whole hemisphere. In some passages where our translation renders the word right, the meaning would have been clearer had it been rendered south (2 Sam. 24:5; Job 23:9; comp. 1 Sam. 23:19, 24).

5. Mid-bawn' (Heb. מִדְבָּר, desert), "promotion cometh not from the south" (Psa. 75:6), literally "wilderness."

6. The Greek words are: (1) λίψη (leeps, bringing moisture), the quarter of the heavens from which the southwest wind blows (Acts 27:12); (2) μωσμηβρία (mus-ame-bree'-ah, noon), but, with respect to locality, the south (8:26); (3) νότος (not'-os), the southern quarter or wind (Matt. 12:42; Luke 11:31; 13:29; Rev. 21:13).

SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD, a term by which is expressed the supreme rulership of God. This is rightly held to be not an attribute of God, but a prerogative based upon the perfections of the divine Being.

The possession of the most complete sovereignty is a necessary part of the proper conception of God, and is abundantly declared in the Scriptures

(e. g., Psa. 50:1; 66:7; 93:1; Isa. 40:15, 17; 1 Tim. 6:15; Rev. 11:17). The method of the divine rulership is, however, to be judged in the light of special revelation. The term absolute sovereignty, as used in Calvinism, means the sovereign election of a certain number to salvation, and the sovereign reprobation of others. There is sense, indeed, in which the sovereignty of God is absolute. He is under no external restraint whatsoever. He is the Supreme Dispenser of all events. All forms of existence are within the scope of his dominion. And yet this is not to be viewed in any such way as to abridge the reality of the moral freedom of God's responsible creatures, or to make men anything else than the arbiters of their own eternal destinies. God has seen fit to create beings with the power of choice between good and evil. He rules over them in justice and wisdom and grace.

This is the whole tenor of the Scriptures, and the plain declaration of many passages (e. g., Deut. 10:17; Job 36:5; Acts 10:34, 35; Rom. 2:6; Col. 3:25; 1 Pet. 1:17).

Thus understood the sovereignty of God is the great ground of confidence for his people, and the proper basis upon which to urge sinners to repentance. See ELECTION.

SOWER, SOWING. See AGRICULTURE.

SPAIN (Gr. Σπανία, span-ee'-ah), the name anciently applied to the peninsula which now comprises Spain and Portugal, the usual Greek name being Ἰβηρία (ee-bay-ree'-ah), and the natives were called Iberians. The Carthaginians, during the flourishing times of their republic, established many settlements upon the Spanish coast, such as Carthage (now Cartagena), and Malacca, the royal city (now Malaga). Under the management of Hamilcar Barca and Hannibal a considerable part of Spain became a Carthaginian colony, and gradually passed under the Roman power. The Hebrews were acquainted with the position and mineral wealth of Spain from the time of Solomon.

Paul, in his epistle to the Romans (15:24), tells them of his purpose of visiting Rome whenever he should take his journey into Spain. "Such an intention implies in the plainest way an idea already existent in Paul's mind of Christianity as the religion of the Roman empire." "From" Rome, "the center of the Roman world, Paul would go on to the chief seat of Roman civilization in the west, and would thus complete a first survey" (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 255). Whether the journey was ever made is an open question. See PAUL.

SPAN. See METROLOGY, p. 710.

SPARK. In Job 18:5 it is predicated that his light "shall be put out, and the spark (Heb. שָׂרִיב, shaw-beeb', flame) of his fire shall not shine." Spark here probably refers to the lamp hanging in the tent that has gone out (comp. 21:17; 29:3). When misfortune breaks in upon the Arab, he says, "Fate has put out my lamp." The declaration of Eliphaz (Job 5:7) means that "Misfortune does not grow out of the ground like weeds;

it is rather established in the divine order of the world, as it is established in the order of nature that sparks of fire should ascend."

In describing the leviathan, it is said (Job 41:19), "Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out." Bartram has observed of the alligator, that as it comes on the land a thick smoke issues from his distended nostrils. This would seem to give the impression of a fire existing beneath, and bursting forth. The Hebrew word is קִידֹדֶר, kee-dode', struck off. "Sparks" (Isa. 50:11) is the rendering of Heb. קָוֶה, (zee-kaw', to spring, to let fly), and may be understood as burning arrows. These are figurative for the blasphemies and anathemas cast at the servant of Jehovah.

SPARROW. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. "I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house top" (Psa. 102:7) is a figure of loneliness, while our Lord's allusion to God's care for the comparatively worthless sparrow (Matt. 10:29, 31; Luke 12:6, 7) is an incentive for man to trust divine Providence.

SPEAR. See ARMOR, p. 84.

SPECKLED. 1. Navv-kode' (Heb. קִקְוֶה, marked), spotted, as black goats or sheep, with white spots, or vice versa (Gen. 30:32, 33, 35, 39; 31:8, 10, 12). Jacob, in order to increase his wages, resorted to the following plan: "In the first place (30:37-39) he took fresh rods of storax, maple, and walnut trees, all of which have a dazzling white wood under their dark outside, and peeled white strips upon them. These partially peeled and, therefore, mottled rods he placed in the drinking troughs; . . . in order that if copulation took place at the drinking time, it might occur near the mottled sticks, and the young be speckled and mottled in consequence" (K. and D., Com.).

2. Tsaw-boo'-ah (Heb. צְבֹרִיץ, dyed), colored, mottled (Jer. 12:9), elsewhere in modern Hebrew, the hycna, but in the above passage a many-colored bird of prey.

3. Saw-rook' (Heb. צְבֹרִיץ), red in color, as the horses (Zech. 1:8). See COLOR.

SPECTACLE (Gr. θάρσον, thel'-at-ron), one to be gazed at and made sport of (1 Cor. 4:9).

SPELT. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

SPICE. The spices mentioned as being used by Nicodemus for the preparation of our Lord's body (John 19:39, 40) are "myrrh and aloes," by which latter word must be understood, not the aloes of medicine (Aloe), but the highly-scented wood of the Aquilaria agallochum. The evangelist John computes the amount at one hundred litras (A. V. "pounds"), referring doubtless to the Roman pound of about twelve ounces. This would make seventy-five pounds avoirdupois. The amount mentioned may seem large, but Josephus (Ant., 17, 8, 3) tells us that there were five hundred spice-bearers at Herod's funeral; and in the Talmud it is said that eighty pounds of opobalsamum were employed at the funeral of a certain rabbi. It must also be remembered that Nicodemus was a rich man. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

SPICERY. See GLOSSARY.

SPIDER. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. Bildad compares the trust of the ungodly and secretly wicked (Heb. חַוִּינָה, khaw-nafe', A. V. "hypocrite") to a spider's web (Job 8:14); as easily as a spider's web is cut through, by the lightest touch or a breath of wind, so that on which the evil man depends and trusts is cut asunder. In Prov. 30:28 the spider is introduced as one of the instances of instinctive sagacity and providence; tolerated, even in palaces, to destroy flies. To "take hold with her hands" means to use with activity the limbs provided for taking prey. In the declaration of Isaiah (59:5), they "weave the spider's web," we have a figure to represent the worthlessness and deceptive character of the works of the wicked.

SPIKENARD. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

SPIN (Heb. טָוּוּ, taw-vaw'; Gr. νίθω, nay'-tho, Exod. 35:25, 26; Matt. 6:28; Prov. 31:19). The latter passage implies (according to the A. V.) the use of the same instruments which have been in vogue for hand spinning down to the present day, viz., the distaff and spindle. The distaff, however, appears to have been dispensed with, and the term so rendered means the spindle itself, while that rendered "spindle" represents the whirl of the spindle, a button of circular rim which was affixed to it, and gave steadiness to its circular motion. The "whirl" of the Syrian women was made of amber in the time of Pliny. The spindle was held perpendicularly in the one hand, while the other was employed in drawing out the thread.

SPINDLE (Heb. כִּישֹׁרִי, kee-shore', director), the twirl or lower part of the instrument used in giving motion to the whole (Prov. 31:19). In the East it is held in the hand, often perpendicularly, and is twirled with one hand, while the other draws out the thread. The spindle and distaff are the most ancient of all the instruments used for spinning, or making thread.

SPIRIT (Heb. רוּחַ, roo'-akh, breath, wind; Gr. πνεῦμα, pnuyoo'-mah, wind, breath, the vital principle, etc.), a term used in the Scriptures generally to denote purely spiritual beings, also the spiritual, immortal part in man. Other terms (נֶפֶשׁ, neh'-fesh; ψυχή, psoo-khay') refer to the animal soul or life of man, though it seems evident that these words are also used frequently in a broader and deeper sense with reference to man's spiritual nature (e. g., Gen. 2:7; Psa. 42:2; Matt. 10:28; 11:29). See SOUL. There are, however, passages (as 1 Thess. 5:23; Heb. 4:12) which seem to emphasize a distinction between soul and spirit.

Upon the basis of the Scripture terms attempts have been made to build up a theory of man as a being of threefold nature—body, soul, and spirit. This theory (trichotomy) was advocated by some of the Greek Christian fathers, and has been revived recently in England by the Rev. J. B. Heard, M.A. (The Tripartite Nature of Man, Spirit, Soul, and Body, Edinburgh, 1868). It has also found favor upon the Continent with Beck, Delitzsch, Oehler, and others. The whole matter is carefully reviewed, though adversely, by Laidlaw (The Bible Doctrine Concerning Man, Edinburgh, 1879). The underlying question is whether the Bible is intended to furnish us a psychology or a view of the subject that is strictly scientific. See INSPIRATION. Aside from this it should be said:

1. The primary significance of the words rendered spirit is wind, breath. But it is evident that these terms are most generally used in a sense that is figurative, as denoting forms of existence that have no basis in the material world. This is in accordance with a common law of language. Words primarily of material significance receive a meaning which entirely supplants the meaning which was original.

2. Thus "God is a Spirit" (John 4:24). The whole teaching of the Scriptures represents God as a purely spiritual being. This is one of the fundamental truths of biblical or Christian theology.

3. The term is also applied to superhuman created intelligences. Thus both the holy and the fallen angels are spoken of as "spirits" (see Heb. 1:14; Matt. 10:1; Mark 1:23; Luke 4:36; Acts 5:16). See ANGELS; DEVILS.

4. Also the term refers to that part in man which distinguishes man from the brute creation. It is the rational principle in human nature (Job 32:8; Psa. 31:5; 77:6; Eccles. 12:7; Acts 17:16; 18:5; Rom. 8:16; 1 Cor. 6:20; 7:34, et al.).

It should also be said that the term sometimes refers to dispositions or tempers, as the "spirit of meek men," etc. (Gal. 6:1; Rom. 8:15; 11:8; 2 Tim. 1:7).

SPIRIT, THE HOLY. See GHOST, THE HOLY.

SPIRITS, DISCERNING OF. See DISCERNING OF SPIRITS.

SPIRITUAL GIFTS (Gr. τά πνευματικά, ta pneumatika, the spiritual supply; χαρίσματα, khar-is'-mat-ah, gifts), a phrase to denote the endowments bestowed by the Holy Spirit in the primitive Church (1 Cor. 12:1), and the same as "gifts" (v. 4). A spiritual gift "means any extraordinary faculty, which operated for the furtherance of the welfare of the Christian community, and which was itself wrought by the grace of God, through the power of the Holy Spirit, in special individuals, in accordance, respectively, with the measure of their individual capacities, whether it were that the Spirit infused entirely new powers, or stimulated those already existing to higher power and activity (Rom. 12:6, sq.)" (Meyer, Com., 1 Cor. 12:1). These gifts included Word of wisdom, knowledge; faith; healing; working of miracles; prophecy; discerning of spirits; tongues and their interpretation (vers. 8-10). See under various heads.

SPIRITUALITY, the quality of being spiritual, as opposed to material. Thus theology predicates spirituality of God (see SPIRIT). The spirituality of man refers to the immaterial part of his nature. The term is also used with reference to the disposition or internal condition of men when in such a state as prepares them to recognize and properly appreciate spiritual realities.

True spirituality in the last sense is the result of the inworking of the Holy Spirit (see 1 Cor. 2:14, 15; 3:1, 16, et al.). In an ecclesiastical sense the term is used in the Church of England to denote the whole body of the clergy, with reference to the nature of their office.

SPIT, SPITTLE (Heb. from פָּרַק, raw-kak'; פָּרַק, yaw-rak', Num. 12:14; Deut. 25:9; Gr. πρῶμα, ploo'-mah), a source of legal defilement; e. g., the spittle of a person having an issue defiled the one upon whom it fell (Lev. 15:8). To spit in one's face was regarded as the grossest insult (Num. 12:14; Deut. 25:9; Isa. 50:6; Matt. 26:67; 27:30); indeed it was a great indignity to spit toward anyone, so that an oriental never allows himself to spit in the presence of one whom he respects. Spittle was employed by our Lord in the cure of the blind man (John 9:6), and the rabbins cite it as a remedy in like cases, especially the spittle of persons who were fasting.

SPOIL, the rendering of a number of Hebrew and Greek words, consisted of captives of both sexes, cattle, and whatever a captured city might contain, especially metallic treasures. Within the limits of Canaan no captives were to be made (Deut. 20:14, 16); beyond those limits, in case of warlike resistance, all the women and children were to be made captives, and the men put to death. The law of booty was that it should be divided equally between the army who won it and the people of Israel, but of the former half one head in every five hundred was reserved to God and appropriated to the priests, and of the latter one in every fifty was similarly reserved and appropriated to the Levites (Num. 31:26-47; comp. 2 Sam. 8:10, sq.; 1 Chron. 26:27, sq.). A portion of the spoil was assigned to the oppressed, the aged, widows, and orphans (2 Macc. 8:28, 30). As regarded the army, David added a regulation that the baggage guard should share equally with the troops engaged (1 Sam. 30:24, 25). The division of the spoil was a joyous feast for the people (Isa. 9:2).

SPOKE, an incorrect rendering of Heb. הַשֵּׁר, khish-shoor', which rather means the hub, where the spokes unite (1 Kings 7:33).

SPONGE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

SPOON. See TABERNACLE.

SPORT. The expression, "Against whom do ye sport yourselves?" (Isa. 57:4) may well be rendered "Over whom do ye make yourselves merry?" See GAMES.

SPOT. 1. Moom (Heb. מוֹם, moom), a blemish, and usually so rendered, either physical (Lev. 21:17, sq.; 22:20; 24:19, 20, etc.; 2 Sam. 14:25; Cant. 4:7); or moral (Deut. 32:5; Job 11:15; 31:7; Prov. 9:7).

2. Bo-hell'-reth (Heb. בֹּהַלְרֵת, bo-hell'-reth), a whitish spot on the skin, the "bright spot" of incipient leprosy (Lev. 13:2-39; 14:56).

3. Bo'-huk (Heb. בֹּהַק, bo-huk), to be pale, the "freckled spot" of pronounced leprosy (Lev. 13:39).

4. Khab-ar-boo-raw' (Heb. חַבְאֵר, khab-ar-boo-raw'), a streak, the mark upon the panther, or, according to Gesenius, the stripes of the tiger (Jer. 13:23), used as an illustration of the inability of men to rid themselves of evil character.

5. Taw-law' (Heb. טָלַעַ, to cover with pieces), spotted, variegated; as "sheep or goats" (Gen. 30:32-39; Ezek. 16:16, A. V. "divers colors").

6. In Heb. 9:14 Jesus is said to have "through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God" (Gr. ἄμωμος, am'-o-mos), i. e., in an ethical sense, without blemish, fault. The Gr. σπιλος (spee'-los, spot) has also a moral sense of fault (Eph. 5:27); and its negative form (ἀσπιλος, as'-pee-los) means spotless, free from censure (1 Tim. 6:14), from vice, and so unsullied (2 Pet. 3:14).

SPOUSE. See MARRIAGE.

SPREADINGS (Heb. נִפְרָשׁ, mif'-rawce', an expansion). "Also can any understand the spreading of the clouds?" (Job 36:29.) Here spreading does not mean bursting, but spreadings (comp. Ezek. 27:7). "It is the growth of the storm clouds, which collect often from a beginning 'small as a man's hand' (1 Kings 18:44), that is intended."

SPRIG is the rendering in the A. V. of (1) Heb. יָצַחַ (zal-zal', tremulous), a shoot of a vine (Isa. 18:5), and (2) Heb. פְּתִירָה (peh-o-raw', properly ornamentation, foliage), a branch (Ezek. 17:6).

SPRINKLING. Instances of sprinkling are given in the Scriptures, viz., with blood (Exod. 29:16, 20, 21; Lev. 1:5, 11, etc.); see SACRIFICE; with water (Lev. 14:51; Num. 8:7; 19:13, 20, etc.); with oil (Lev. 14:16). See ANOINTING.

Figurative. "So shall he sprinkle many nations" (Isa. 52:15) would seem to be a figure setting forth the expiation and purifying of many nations; and then the antithesis would be: Many were astonished; so many (not merely men, but) nations shall be sprinkled. They were amazed that such an abject person claimed to be the Messiah; yet it is He that shall justify and cleanse. Many commentators understand the phrase as meaning "He shall cause many nations to leap with astonishment." "The figurative expression, 'to sprinkle with clean water' (Ezek. 36:25), is taken from the lustrations prescribed by the law, more particularly the purifying from defilement by the dead by sprinkling with the water prepared from the ashes of a red heifer" (Num. 19:17-19; comp. Psa. 51:9). "Having our hearts cleansed from an evil conscience" (Heb. 10:22) stands over by contrast with mere physical cleansing (Heb. 9:13, 19; comp. Exod. 24:8; Lev. 8:11). As the Old Testament covenant people were sprinkled with the (cleansing) blood of the sacrifice, so are Christians sprinkled by the blood of Christ, and their consciences delivered from the sense of guilt.

STA'CHYS (Gr. Σταχύς, stakh'-oos, an ear, i. e., of grain), a Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations, calling him "my beloved" (Rom. 16:9). According to an old tradition recorded by Niceporus Callistus, he was bishop of Byzantium. He is said by Hippolytus and Dorotheus to have been one of the seventy disciples.

STACTE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

STAFF (Heb. מַטֵּה, mat-teh'; מַקְלֵה, mak-kale'; שֵׁבֶט, shay'-bet'; Gr. ῥάβδος, rab'-dos; all meaning a stick). Rods and staffs were employed for different purposes by the ancients, as with us. Men and women were goaded with them (Exod. 21:20; Num. 22:27; 1 Sam. 17:43, etc.); grain was sometimes beaten with them (Judg. 6:11; Ruth 2:17; Isa. 28:27); they were used by old and infirm persons for support or defense (Exod. 21:19; Zech. 8:4), also by travelers (Gen. 32:10; Exod. 12:11; 2 Kings 4:29; Matt. 10:10). A staff, like a seal, was a sign of rank (Gen. 38:18, 25), sometimes inscribed with the owner's name; also a badge of office (Exod. 4:2, sq.; Num. 20:8, etc.). The staff of the shepherd was used to aid in climbing hills, beating bushes and low brush in which the flock strayed, and where snakes and reptiles abounded.

STAGGER. See GLOSSARY.

STAIR (Hebrew usually מַעְלֵה, mah-al-eh', or מַעְלֵה, mah-al-aw', an ascend; once מַדְרַגָּה, mad-ray-gaw', Cant. 2:14, a precipice, "steep place," Ezek. 38:20; לִיל, lool, a winding stair, 1 Kings 6:8). The stairs probably ran around the inside of the quadrangle of the house, as they do still, e. g., in the ruin called "the house of Zaccheus" at Jericho. Respecting the meaning of 2 Kings 9:13, see עַמּוּ.

STAKE (Heb. יָדָה, yaw-thade', a peg), a peg or nail, and often so rendered; especially a tent pin (Isa. 33:20; 54:2). In the former passage the idea of continuance and permanency is figured by a tent that is not moved, nor its pegs drawn. The enlargement and strengthening of Zion is illustrated by a tent, the inside space of which is widened, and the tent pins driven deeper into the ground.

STALL, the rendering of Hebrew and Greek words signifying a stable for cattle (Amos 6:4; Mal. 4:2). A "stalled ox" (Prov. 15:17) is one that is fattened. "Stalls" is used in the sense of pairs, as of horses (1 Kings 4:26; 2 Chron. 9:25; 38:28). The expression, "There shall be no herds in the stall" (Hab. 3:17) is used to denote calamity, disaster.

STAMMERER (Heb. יִלְלָה, il-layg', a stutterer, Isa. 32:4; לֹא-אֶגֶד, law-ag', properly, to speak unintelligibly, Isa. 28:11; 33:19), hence to mock or deride.

STANDARD. See ENSIGN.

STANDARD BEARER (Heb. נוֹשֵׂא, nuw-sas', one who is sick). "And they shall be as when a standard bearer fainteth" (Isa. 10:18), should read, "as when a sick man dieth."

STAR (Heb. כּוֹכַב, ko-kawb', round or shining; Gr. ἀστήρ, as-tare').

1. Under the term stars the Hebrews included constellations, planets, indeed all the heavenly bodies except the sun and moon. In fact the ancient Hebrews knew very little of the starry heavens, and no indications are given in Scripture of scientific astronomy (q. v.). We find there only the ordinary observations of landsmen (Amos 5:8), especially shepherds (Psa. 8:3).

Figurative. The patriarchs observed the stars

(Gen. 37:9); and metaphors drawn from the starry world, either with reference to the countless number of the stars (Gen. 22:17; Exod. 32:13; Nah. 3:16, etc.) or to their brightness (Num. 24:17; Isa. 14:12; Rev. 22:16) came into frequent and early use. The Psalmist, to exalt the power and omniscience of Jehovah, represents him as taking a survey of the stars, as a king reviewing his army (Psa. 147:4). Stars were frequently employed as symbols of persons in exalted stations; e. g., "the star out of Jacob" designates King David (Num. 24:17), applied by some to the Messiah. The patriarchs were called "stars" (Gen. 37:9), and "stars" denote the princes, rulers, and nobles of the earth (Dan. 8:10; Rev. 6:13; 8:10-12; 9:1; 12:4). Christ is called the "Morning Star," as he introduced the light of Gospel day, revealing more fully the truths of God than the ancient prophets. The study of the stars led to their worship (see IDOLATRY), and to calculations of human affairs (see ASTROLOGY).

2. Star in the East (Gr. ἀστὴρα ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ, Matt. 2:2), seen by the wise men (Magi) on their journey to Jerusalem, and as they approached Bethlehem. After ascertaining at what time they first observed the star, Herod sent them to Bethlehem, with the request to inform him when they found the child. As they left Jerusalem the star which had attracted their attention at its "rising" (Gr. ἀνατολῇ, an-at-ol-ay), and which, it would appear, they had not seen of late, once more appeared. In ancient times such guidance by a star was a matter of belief and expectancy; and "they rejoiced with exceeding great joy."

Until the last few years this phenomenon was understood to be some supernatural light resembling a star, that appeared in some country far to the east of Jerusalem, to men who were versed in the study of celestial phenomena; and that it conveyed to their minds an impulse to travel to Jerusalem to find a newborn king. Latterly, however, the star has been removed from the category of supernatural events, and has been referred to the ordinary astronomical phenomenon of a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn (see N. T. Chronology, p. 205).

STAR GAZER (Isa. 47:13). See MAGIC.

STATELY (Heb. קְבוֹרָה, keb-ood-daw', magnificent). In speaking of the ungodly alliance between Judah and Chaldea, the former sent ambassadors to Chaldea, and, for the purpose of receiving the Chaldeans, adorned herself as a woman would do for the reception of her paramours. She seated herself upon "a stately bed" (Ezek. 23:41), i. e., a splendid divan, and in front of this there was a table spread, upon which stood the incense and the oil that she ought to have offered to Jehovah (Kliefoth).

STATURE (Gr. ἡλικός, hay-lee'kos, literally how much?).

1. "Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?" (Matt. 6:27.) "Stature" here is usually taken in the sense of the height of one's body, but others think it refers to the life itself; "the duration of life determined by God is set forth under the figure of a definite lineal measure." "This is more surely appropriate, for the admonition is directed against excessive anxiety about food and clothing, which, though necessary to the preservation of life, have nothing in common with stature" (Bloomfield, N. T.).

2. "Stature" in Eph. 4:13 is the age suitable for anything; figuratively of an attained state of mind fit for a thing, and so the age in which we are fitted to receive the fullness of Christ.

STAVES. See STAFF; TABERNACLE.

STAY, in the A. V. of Isa. 19:13, "even they that are the stay of the tribes thereof," is the rendering of the Heb. פִּינָאוֹ, pin-nao', an angle; and the passage may be rendered "the princes of Zoan . . . the corner stones of the castles" of Egypt. Instead of supporting and defending their people, they now only led them astray. In Isa. 31:1, "stay" is used in the sense of rely (comp. 48:2). In the description of Solomon's throne (1 Kings 10:19; 2 Chron. 9:18), "stays" is the rendering of the Heb. יָד, (yawd, hand), i. e., arms on both sides of the seat. See GLOSSARY.

STEADFASTNESS. 1. Ster-eh'-o-mah (Gr. στέρεωμα), is that upon which a thing can rest; in Col. 2:5, "steadfastness of faith," the term is used figuratively in a military sense, solid front.

2. Stay-rig-mos' (Gr. στηρικμός, 2 Pet. 3:17), in the usual sense of stability.

STEEL. See METALS; MINERAL KINGDOM.

STEPHANAS (Gr. Στεφάνος, stef-an-as', crowned), a Corinthian disciple whose household Paul baptized (1 Cor. 1:16), being the first converted to Christianity in Achaia, and one of those who "addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints" (16:15). Just the form that this ministry took we have no precise information. He appears to have been with Paul when he wrote his first letter to the Corinthians (16:17).

STEPHEN. 1. Name (Gr. Στέφανος, stef-an-os, a crown).

2. Personal History. Stephen, as his Greek name seems to indicate, was probably of Hellenistic origin. Where or when born, however, we have no means of ascertaining. (1) As deacon. The first authentic account we have of Stephen is in Acts 6:5. In the distribution of the common fund that was intrusted to the apostles for the support of the poorer brethren, the Hellenists complained that a partiality was shown to the natives of Palestine, and their widows were neglected. The apostles, hearing of the complaint, took measures immediately to remove the cause of it. Unwilling themselves to be taken from the work of the ministry, they advised the church to select seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, for this business (v. 3). The brethren proceeded immediately to select the prescribed number, among whom Stephen is first mentioned. The newly elected deacons were brought to the apostles, who ordained them to their work (v. 6). From the first Stephen occupied a prominent position. He is described as "a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost" (v. 5), "full of faith and power" (v. 8), and of irresistible "wisdom and spirit" (v. 10). He attracted attention by the "great wonders and miracles" which he did among the people. (2) His teaching. From his foreign descent and education he was naturally led to address himself to the Hellenistic Jews. In these disputations he probably took more advanced grounds than the apostles had respecting the discontinuance and abrogation of the Mosaic system, contending that already it had, as a ritual system, lost all force and binding obligation by its complete fulfillment in Christ (Kitto, Illustrations). Certain adherents of several (five) synagogues were leaders in the disputation with Stephen. (3) Arrest. Unable to withstand his reasoning, they caused his arrest, appearing against him before the Sanhedrin with false witnesses. The charge against him was blasphemy, in speaking "against this holy place and the law" (v. 13). Stephen doubtless saw that he was to be the victim of the blind and malignant spirit which had been exhibited by the Jews in every period of their history. Yet he stood serene, collected, and undismayed. "And all that sat in the council . . . saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (v. 15). From which we may not unreasonably conclude "that it pleased God to manifest his approbation of his servant by investing his countenance with a supernatural and angelic brightness, such as that with which the face of Moses shone when he had been speaking with the Lord" (Kitto). (4) His defense. The high priest that presided asked the judicial question, "Are these things so?" To this Stephen replied in a speech which has every appearance of being faithfully reported. He began with the call of Abraham, and traveled historically in his argument through all the stages of their national existence, evidently designing to prove that the presence and favor of God had not been confined to the holy land or the temple of Jerusalem. He also showed that there was a tendency from the earliest times toward the same ungrateful and narrow spirit that had appeared in this last stage of their political existence. He then suddenly broke away from his narrative and denounced them as "stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears," and as "always resisting the Holy Ghost." The effect upon his hearers was terrible; "they were cut to the heart, and gnashed on him with their teeth." On the other hand Stephen, filled with the Holy Ghost, was granted a vision of the glory of God, and Jesus at his right hand, "risen to meet and welcome his spirit as it should escape his mangled body, and to introduce him into the presence of his Father, and to a crown of unfading glory." (5) His martyrdom. Enraptured, he exclaimed, "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God!" The fate of Stephen was settled, for his judges broke into a loud yell, stopped their ears, ran upon him with one accord, dragged him out of the city to the place of execution. Saul was present and consented to his death. In striking contrast to the fearful rage of his enemies was the spirit shown by Stephen. First offering a petition for himself, he then prays, "Lay not this sin to their charge," and, in the beautiful language of Scripture, "fell asleep" (7:60). "Devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him" (8:2), A. D. 34.

NOTE.—1. The trial. The trial of Stephen appears to have been irregular, and the judicial act was not completed. There are, indeed, the witnesses, and part of the prisoner's defense; and here the legal action stops. The high priest does not, as in our Lord's trial, ask the opinion of the council, and then deliver sentence in accordance with their views. The whole proceedings broke up with a tumult at what they deemed the blasphemy of Stephen (Kitto, Meditations). 2. Sculi consuetudo. The witnesses against Stephen acted as his executioners (Deut. 17:7; John 8:7), and laid their outer garments for safety at the feet of Saul. One of the prominent leaders in the transaction was deputed by custom to signify his assent to the act by taking the clothes into his custody (Smith, Cyc.).

STEWARD (usually Heb. שׂר, sar, head person; Gr. ἐπίτροπος, epi-trop-os, manager; οἰκονόμος, oy-kon-om'-os, overseer), a manager or superintendent of another's household, as Eliezer over the house of Abraham (Gen. 15:2, where Eliezer is called בְּנֵי מְלֶכֶת, ben-mel'-shek, son of possession, i. e., heir). We read also of Joseph's steward (48:19; 44:1, 4); "stewards over all the substance and possession of the king," David (1 Chron. 28:1); of Tirzah (1 Kings 16:9); and of Herod (Luke 8:3). As great confidence was reposed in these officials, Paul describes Christian ministers as the stewards of God over his Church (Tit. 1:7; comp. 1 Cor. 4:1, 2). Believers are also said to be stewards of God, of God's gifts and graces (1 Pet. 4:10).

STOCK. The rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, meaning: the trunk of a tree (Isa. 44:19; Job 40:20, A. V. "food"): the stump (Job 14:8; 40:24, A. V. "stock"), or trunk (Isa. 11:1, A. V. "stem"); a tree or piece of wood (Jer. 2:27; 10:8); a plant transplanted (Acts 13:26; Phil. 3:5), race or kindred; a gazingstock (Nah. 3:6).

STOCKS. 1. Mah-pel'-keth (Heb. מַחְפֵּלֶת, wrench; Jer. 20:2, 3; 2 Chron. 16:10, A. V. "prison," literally the house of the stocks), a wooden frame in which the feet, hands, and neck of a person were so fastened that his body was held in a bent position.

2. Sad (Heb. סַד, the block or log of wood in which the feet of a criminal are fastened, and which he must drag about with him when he moves (Job 13:27; 33:11).

3. Eth'-kes (Heb. עֶתְקֵס, fetter), an ankle band. The rendering of Prov. 7:22 may be "as one bound in fetters (goeth) to the punishment of the fool."

Modern Oriental Stocks.

4. Tsec-noke' (Heb. תְּסֵקֶן, a prison; or, better, stocks proper, or some other confinement for the feet (Jer. 29:26). Orelli (Com., in loc.) thinks that the tsec-noke' was a kind of neck iron (comp. Arab. zinak, neck chain).

5. Xoo'-lon (Gr. ξύλον, wood), a log with holes in which the feet, hands, and neck of prisoners were inserted and fastened with thongs (Acts 16:24); probably similar to Sad, 2.

Stocks has an altogether different meaning in Hos. 4:12, "My people ask counsel at their stocks" (Ates, Heb. יָצַד). The stocks here referred to were idols made of wood (comp. Jer. 10:3; Hab. 2:19).

STOICS (Gr. Στωϊκός, sto-ik-os'). The Stoics and Epicureans, who are mentioned together in Acts 17:18, represent the two opposite schools of practical philosophy which survived the fall of higher speculation in Greece. The Stoic school was founded by Zeno of Citium (about B. C. 280), and derived its name from the painted "portico" (στοά) in which he taught. Zeno was followed by Cleanthes (about B. C. 260), Cleanthes by Chrysippus (about B. C. 240), who was regarded as the intellectual founder of the Stoic system. Stoicism soon found an entrance at Rome, and under the empire Stoicism was not unnaturally connected with republican virtue. The ethical system of the Stoics has been commonly supposed to have a close connection with Christian morality. But the morality of Stoicism is essentially based on pride, that of Christianity on humility; the one upholds individual independence, the other absolute faith in another; the one looks for consolation in the issue of fate, the other in Providence; the one is limited by periods of cosmical ruin, the other is consummated in a personal resurrection (Acts 17:18). But in spite of the fundamental error of Stoicism, which lies in a supreme egotism, the teaching of this school gave a wide currency to the noble doctrines of the Fatherhood of God, the common bonds of mankind, the sovereignty of the soul (Smith, Dict.).

STOMACHER (Heb. לִפְתָּיִם, peh-eeg-eel'), an article (Isa. 3:24) of female dress (q. v.).

STONE (usually Heb. בֶּנֶן, eh'-ben; שֶׁבֶב, sch'-lah, lofty; צַרַר, toor, a cliff; Gr. λίθος, lee'-thos; πέτρος, pe'-ros, large stone; ψήφος, psay'-fos, a pebble).

1. Kinds. The ordinary stones mentioned as found in PALESTINE (q. v.) are chiefly limestone (Isa. 27:9), especially marble and sandstone; basalt (Josephus, Ant., viii, 7, 4); flint and firestone (2 Macc. 10:3).

2. Uses. Stones were applied in ancient Palestine to many uses:

(1) They were used for the ordinary purposes of building, and in this respect the most noticeable point is the very large size to which they occasionally run (Mark 13:1). Robinson gives the dimensions of one as twenty-four feet long by six feet broad and three feet high. For most public edifices hewn stones were used; an exception was made in regard to altars (Exod. 20:25; Deut. 27:5; Josh. 8:31). The Phœnicians were particularly famous for their skill in hewing stone (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Kings 5:18). Stones were selected of certain colors in order to form ornamental stringcourses (1 Chron. 29:2). They were also employed for pavements (2 Kings 16:17; comp. Esth. 1:6).

(2) Large stones were used for closing the entrances of caves (Josh. 10:18; Dan. 6:17), sepulchers (Matt. 27:60; John 11:38; 20:1), and springs (Gen. 29:2).

(3) Flint stones (Heb. צַרַר, toor, or צָרַר tsore) occasionally served the purpose of a knife, particularly for circumcision and similar objects (Exod. 4:25; Josh. 5:2, 3).

(4) Stones were further used as a munition of war for slings (1 Sam. 17:40, 49), catapults (2 Chron. 26:14), and bows (Wisd. 5:22; comp. 1 Macc. 6:51); as boundary marks (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Job 24:2; Prov. 22:28; 23:10); such were probably the stone of Bohan (Josh. 15:6; 18:17), of Abel (1 Sam. 6:15, 18), the stone Ezel (20:19), the great stone by Gibeon (2 Sam. 20:8), and the stone Zoheleth (1 Kings 1:9); also as weights for scales (Deut. 25:13; Prov. 16:11), and for mills (2 Sam. 11:21).

(5) Large stones were set up to commemorate any remarkable events (Gen. 28:18; 31:45; 35:14; Josh. 4:9; 1-Sam. 7:12). Such stones were occasionally consecrated by anointing (Gen. 28:18). A similar practice existed in heathen countries, and by a singular coincidence these stones were described in Phœnicia by a name very similar to Beth-el, viz., baetylia. The only point of resemblance between the two consists in the custom of anointing.

(6) That the worship of stones prevailed among the heathen nations surrounding Palestine, and was from them borrowed by apostate Israelites, appears from Isa. 57:6 (comp. Lev. 26:1). "The smooth stones of the stream" are those which the stream has washed smooth with time, and rounded into a pleasing shape. "In Carthage such stones were called abbadires; and among the ancient Arabs the asndm, or idols, consisted for the most part of rude blocks of stone of this description. . . . Stone worship of this kind had been practiced by the Israelites before the captivity, and their heathenish practices had been transmitted to the exiles in Babylon" (Delitzsch, Com., in loc.).

(7) Heaps of stones were piled up on various occasions; the making of a treaty (Gen. 31:46); over the grave of a notorious offender (Josh. 7:26; 8:29; 2 Sam. 18:17); such heaps often attaining a great size from the custom of each passer-by adding a stone.

(8) Stones were used for tablets (Exod. 24:12; Josh. 8:32) and guide stones to the cities of refuge (q. v.).

(9) "A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones" (Eccles. 3:5) seems to refer to the custom of spoiling an enemy's field by throwing stones upon it (2 Kings 3:19, 25); and the clearing a field of stones preparatory to its cultivation (Isa. 5:2).

Figurative. Stones are used figuratively to denote hardness or insensibility (1 Sam. 25:37; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26), or firmness, strength (Gen. 49:24), where "the stone of Israel" is equivalent to "the rock of Israel" (2 Sam. 23:3; Isa. 30:29). Christians are called "living stones," i. e., not like the inanimate things of the material temple, but living men built up on Christ, the living and chief corner stone. "I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people" (Zech. 12:3) may be a figure founded upon the labor connected with building, the heavy stones of which hurt those who attempt to carry them away. The "white stone" (Rev. 2:17) has been understood as referring to the pebble of acquittal used in the Greek courts; to the lot cast in elections in Greece; to the white stone given to the victors at the Grecian games; and to the stones of hospitality usual in ancient times, a "sort of carte blanche, entitling the person who showed it to ask for and receive what he might want." Precious stones (q. v.) are used in Scripture in a figurative sense to signify value, beauty, durability, etc., in those objects with which they are compared (see Cant. 5:14; Isa. 54:11, 12; Lam. 4:7; Rev. 4:3; 21:11, 21). See CORNER STONE.

STONING. See PUNISHMENT.

STOOL (Heb. סֵבֵן, o'-ben, a pair of stones, as a potter's wheel, is used of a low stool, so called from its resemblance to a potter's wheel). Gesenius (s. v.) thinks a seat of this kind was used by the midwife while assisting a woman in labor lying on a bed (Exod. 1:16).

STORAX. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

STORE CITY (Heb. עִיר מְסֻבֵּנוֹת, eer, a city, and mis-ken-oth', magazines, 1 Kings 9:19; 2 Chron. 8:4, 6; 16:4; 17:12; "treasure city," Exod. 1:11; storehouse, 2 Chron. 32:28), a place of deposit for merchandise.

STOREHOUSE, the rendering of several original terms, meaning a treasury (1 Chron. 27:25; Psa. 33:7; Mal. 3:10, as elsewhere rendered); a receptacle for provisions (Deut. 38:8; "barn" in Prov. 3:10), usually underground in the East; a granary (Jer. 50:28; comp. Exod. 1:11; Luke 12:24). The Egyptians had storehouses for stuffs and jewels, gold, preserved fruits, grain, liquors, armor, provisions, etc. Their grain storehouses "had only two openings, one at the top for pouring in the grain, another on the ground level for drawing it out. For the security and management of these there were employed troops of porters, storekeepers, accountants, 'primates,' who superintended the works, record keepers, and directors. Great nobles coveted the administration of the storehouses, and even the sons of kings did not think it derogatory to their dignity to be entitled 'directors of the granaries' or 'directors of the armory'" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 285, sq.).

STORK. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

STORY. See GLOSSARY.

STRAIGHT STREET (Gr. βύμα εὐθεία, hroo' mah yoo-thi-yah'), one of the ancient thoroughfares of Damascus, on which was located the house of Judas, where Paul was visited by Ananias (Acts 9:11). It still retains the same name in an Arabic form (Derb el-Mustakim), running westward from the Bab es-Shurky, or East Gate. Its length was about one English mile, and its breadth about one hundred feet. It is not quite straight now, nor is its architecture imposing.

STRAIN. See GNAT, in ANIMAL KINGDOM; GLOSSARY.

STRAIT, STRAITLY. See GLOSSARY.

STRANGER. See FOREIGNER.

STRANGLE (Heb. קָחַקְח, khav-nak', to choke; Gr. πνίγω, pneeg'-o). It was forbidden by Moses, and also by the primitive Christians, to eat animals put to death by strangulation, not having the blood properly removed (Gen. 9:4; Acts 15:20).

STRAW (Heb. תֵּבֵן, teh'-ben; "chaff" in Jer. 33:28; "stubble" in Job 21:18). Both wheat and barley straw were used by the ancient Hebrews chiefly as fodder for their horses, cattle, and camels (Gen. 24:25; 1 Kings 4:28; Isa. 11:7; 65:25). There is no intimation that straw was used for litter. It was employed by the Egyptians for making bricks (Exod. 5:7, 16), being chopped up and mixed with the clay to make them more compact and to prevent their cracking. The ancient Egyptians reaped their corn close to the ear, and afterward cut the straw close to the ground and laid it by. This Pharaoh refused to give to the Israelites. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

STRAWED. See GLOSSARY.

STREAM OF EGYPT occurs once in the A. V. instead of "the river of Egypt" (Isa. 27:12). See RIVER OF EGYPT.

STRIKE. See GLOSSARY.

STRIKER (Gr. πληκτής, pluke'-tace), a pugna-cious, contentious, quarrelsome fellow (1 Tim. 3:3; Tit. 1:7).

STRINGED INSTRUMENTS. See MUSIC

STRIPES. See PUNISHMENT.

STRONG DRINK. See DRINK, STRONG

STUBBLE. 1. Kash (Heb. קָשׁ, dry), the dry portion of grain; left standing in the fields (Exod. 5:12), and then burned over (Exod. 15:7; Isa. 5:24; Joel 2:5, etc.); or broken up by thrashing and separated from the grain (Job 13:25; 41:20; Psa. 83:18; Isa. 40:24, etc.). See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

2. Teh'-ben (Heb. תֵּבֵן, teh'-ben, Job 21:18), properly straw, as used for provender.

3. Kal-am'-ay (Gr. καλαμή, 1 Cor. 3:12), the stalk of grain after the ears are removed. See AGRICULTURE.

STUMBLING, STUMBLING-BLOCK or STONE. 1. Mik-shole' (Heb. מִקְשׁוֹל, obstacle) is used as any object over which a person may trip the foot, and hence the cause of ruin or disgust (Isa. 57:14; Jer. 6:21; Ezek. 7:19, etc.), or an idol (Zeph. 1:3), i. e., an incitement to apostasy.

2. Neh'-ghef (Heb. נִהַף, tripping), a cause of stumbling (Isa. 8:14). Notice the heaping together of synonyms, especially in v. 15.

3. Pros'-kom-mah (Gr. πρόσκωμα), an obstacle against which, if one strike his foot, he necessarily falls; figuratively, that over which the soul stumbles into sin (1 Cor. 8:9). To put a stumbling-block in another's way is, figuratively, to furnish an occasion for sinning (Rom. 14:13). "Stone of stumbling" is used figuratively of Jesus Christ, with regard to whom it especially annoyed and offended the Jews that his words and deeds, and particularly his ignominious death, failed to correspond to their preconceptions respecting the Messiah (Rom. 9:32, 33; 1 Pet. 2:8).

STUMP (Heb. עֵקֶר, ik-kar') of a tree cut down, but able to sprout again (Dan. 4:15, 23, 26). In 1 Sam. 5:4 it is recorded that the image of Dagon was miraculously overthrown, his hands and his head cut off, and only the stump left. This was to prove to the Philistines the utter helplessness of their god.

SU'AH (Heb. סוּאָה, soo'-akh, sweeping [riches, Fürst]), the first mentioned of eleven sons of the descendants of Zophah, one of the "heads" of the house of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

SUBSTANCE. See GLOSSARY.

SUBURBS (Heb. מִגְרָשׁ, mig-rawsh'), a place where cattle are driven to graze, a pasture; especially the open country set apart for pasture round the Levitical cities (Num. 35:2; Josh. 21:11; 1 Chron. 6:55). It also meant an open place, area, round a city or building (Ezek. 27:28; 45:2; 48:17).

SUC'COTH (Heb. סוּכּוֹת, sook-kohth', booths).

1. An ancient town in Palestine, and the place where Jacob built booths for his cattle and a house for himself after separating from Esau (Gen. 33:17; Josh. 13:27). The brass foundries for making the fine work for the temple were built here (1 Kings 7:46; 2 Chron. 4:17). There Gideon met with opposition when pursuing the Midianites (Judg. 8:5, 8, 14-16). The place is referred to in Psa. 60:6; 108:7. There is question as to the present site of Succoth. Burckhardt, Porter, Robinson, and Van de Velde each have their theories in disagreement.

2. The first encampment of Israel after leaving

Rameses (Exod. 12:37). It was the name of a district or region, and not a city. "It is not necessary to suppose that all the Israelites reached Succoth on the day of their hurried start from their homes in Rameses-Goshen. . . . Brugsch argues strongly for the correspondence of the Egyptian 'Thuku' or Thukoo with the Hebrew Succoth. . . . As to the location of the Egyptian Thukoo, it is shown by the monuments that Pi-tum (the House of [the god] Tum), which probably was the Pithom of the Bible text, was the chief city of the district of Thukoo; that that city was situated 'at the entrance of the East;' and that it was near the lakes of the eastern border. . . . All this goes to show that Succoth was a well-known tenting field along the line of lakes of which Lake Timsah is a center" (Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, pp. 393-395).

SUC'COTH-BE'NOTH. See GODS, FALSE.

SU'CHATHITE (Heb. שׁוּכַתִּי, soo-kaw-thee'), a descendant probably of an unknown Israelite by the name of Suchah, and the last named of the families of scribes living at Jabez (1 Chron. 2:55).

SUK'KIIM (Heb. סוּכְיִים, sook-kee-yeem'), a race mentioned only in 2 Chron. 12:3 as associated with the LUBIM (q. v.) and the Cushim ("Ethiopians") in the army with which Shishak invaded Judah in the days of Rehoboam.

Gesenius, connecting the name with סֻכָּה (a booth or tent), thought them "dwellers in tents," in which case they might be an Arab tribe, like the Scenitæ.

According to the LXX. they were Troglodytes (Τρωγλοδιται). This name, from τράγλη, a hole, and δύω, to enter, corresponds fairly well with our "cave dwellers." It was given to various races, especially to a race inhabiting both shores of the Red Sea, their territory on the eastern side being southeast of Syene and northeast of Meroc. Their dwellings have been compared with the catacombs of Naples. Some of these Troglodytes were serpent eaters, but most were herdsmen. Their language seemed to the Greeks a "shriek or whistle" rather than an articulate speech. Their food was principally animal; their drink was a mixture of blood and milk. They were so fleet of foot as to be able to run down the animals which they hunted. They served as light-armed soldiers in the army of Xerxes, B. C. 480. Aristotle "describes the Troglodytæ as pygmies who, mounted on their horses, waged incessant war with the cranes in the Ethiopian marshes." The Ababdeh of the Troglodytic region, and the Barnagas on the Abyssinian frontier, are said to resemble the Troglodytes in manners and customs.

It is said that no hieroglyphic name has been found resembling the name Sukkiim. This would favor the Arabian theory.—W. H.

SULPHUR. See BRIMSTONE, in MINERAL KINGDOM.

SUMMER (Heb. קַיִץ, kah'-yits, harvest of fruits, 2 Sam. 16:1, 2, etc.). See AGRICULTURE; PALESTINE.

SUN (Heb. שֶׁשֶׁת, sheh'-mesh, to be brilliant), called in the history of the creation the "greater light" in contradistinction to the moon or "lesser light," in conjunction with which it was to serve "for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years," while its special office was "to rule the day" (Gen. 1:14-16). The "signs" referred to were probably such extraordinary phenomena as eclipses, which were regarded as conveying premonitions of coming events (Jer. 10:2; Matt. 24:29, with Luke 21:25).

Sunrise and sunset are the only defined points of time in the absence of artificial contrivances for telling the hour of the day. Between these two points the Jews recognized three periods, viz., when the sun became hot, about 9 A. M. (1 Sam. 11:9; Neh. 7:3); the double light or noon (Gen. 43:16; 2 Sam. 4:5), and "the cool of the day," shortly before sunset (Gen. 3:8). The sun also served to fix the quarters of the hemisphere, east, west, north, and south, which were represented respectively by the rising sun, the setting sun (Isa. 45:6; Psa. 50:1), the dark quarter (Gen. 13:14; Joel 2:20), and the brilliant quarter (Deut. 33:23; Job 37:17; Ezek. 40:24); or otherwise by their position relative to a person facing the rising sun—before, behind, on the left hand, and on the right hand (Job 23:8, 9).

The apparent motion of the sun is frequently referred to in terms that would imply its reality (Josh. 10:13; 2 Kings 20:11; Psa. 19:6; Eccles. 1:5; Hab. 3:11).

Figurative. Of God's favor (Psa. 84:11); of the law of God (19:7); Christ's coming (Mal. 4:2); of the glory of Christ (Matt. 17:2; Rev. 1:16; 10:1); of supreme rulers (Gen. 37:9; Isa. 13:10); (its clearness) of the purity of the Church (Cant. 6:10); (its brightness) of the future glory of saints (Dan. 12:3, with Matt. 13:43); (its power) of the triumph of saints (Judg. 5:31); (darkened) of severe calamities (Ezek. 32:7; Joel 2:10, 31; Matt. 24:29; Rev. 9:2); (going down at noon) of premature destruction (Jer. 15:9; Amos 8:9); (no more going down) of perpetual blessedness (Isa. 60:20); (before or in sight of) of public ignominy (2 Sam. 12:11, 12; Jer. 8:2); of the person of the Saviour (John 1:9; Mal. 4:2), and of the glory and purity of heavenly beings (Rev. 1:16; 10:1; 12:1).

SUN, WORSHIP OF. "The worship of the sun, as the most prominent and powerful agent in the kingdom of nature, was widely diffused throughout the countries adjacent to Palestine. The Arabians appear to have paid direct worship to it, without the intervention of any statue or symbol (Job 31:26, 27), and this simple style of worship was probably familiar to the ancestors of the Jews in Chaldea and Mesopotamia. The Hebrews must have been well acquainted with the idolatrous worship of the sun during the captivity in Egypt, both from the contiguity of On, the chief seat of the worship of the sun as implied in the name itself (On = the Hebrew Beth-shemesh, 'house of the sun,' Jer. 43:13), and also from the connection between Joseph and Poti-pherah ('he who belongs to Ra'), the priest of On (Gen. 41:45). After their removal to Canaan the Hebrews came in contact with various forms of idolatry, which originated in the worship of the sun; such as the Baal of the Phœnicians, the Molech or Milcom of the Ammonites, and the Hadad of the Syrians. It does not follow that the object symbolized by them was known to the Jews themselves. If we have any notice at all of conscious sun worship in the early stages of their history it exists in the doubtful term chammāntm (Lev. 26:30; Isa. 17:8, etc.), which probably described the stone pillars or statues under which the solar Baal was worshipped at Baal-hamon (Cant. 8:11) and other places. To judge from the few notices we have on the subject in the Bible, we should conclude that the Jews derived their mode of worshipping the sun from several quarters. The importance attached to the worship of the sun by the Jewish kings may be inferred from the fact that the horses were stalled within the precincts of the temple (2 Kings 23:11)" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

SUNDAY, or LORD'S DAY. 1. Name and Change of the Day. Sunday is the first day of the week, adopted by the first Christians from the Roman calendar (Lat. Dies Solis, Day of the Sun), because it was dedicated to the worship of the sun. The Christians reinterpreted the heathen name as implying the Sun of Righteousness, with reference to this "rising" (Mal. 4:2). It was also called Dies Panis (Day of Bread), because it was an early custom to break bread on that day. In The Teaching of the Twelve it is called the "Lord's Day of the Lord" (Κυριακὴν δε Κυρίου).

"The Jewish Christians at first continued to frequent the temple and synagogue services, but at a very early date 'the first day of the week' took the place of the Jewish Sabbath as the chief time of public worship (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2) in many of the churches of Jewish Christians. It was the day of the resurrection of Christ, of most of his appearances to the disciples after the resurrection, and on this day the Holy Spirit was poured out at Pentecost. For these reasons, and especially after the destruction of the sacred city had rendered the sacrificial service of the temple impossible, Sunday became the recognized day of assembly for fellowship and for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The Jewish Christians at first observed both the seventh and the first day of the week, but the Gentile Christians kept the 'Lord's Day' from the beginning. The relation of the seventh to the first, as understood by the Jewish Christians, may not be easy to determine, yet there seems to be indications that the seventh was regarded as a day of preparation for the first. 'The idea of Christian worship would attach mainly to the one; the obligation of rest would continue attached to the other; although a certain interchange of characteristics would grow up, as worship necessitated rest, and rest naturally suggested worship.'

"In his letter to the Magnesians Ignatius evidently addressed a church of mixed character, since he speaks of some 'who were brought up in the ancient order of things,' who 'have come to the possession of a new hope, no longer observing the Sabbath, but living in the observance of the Lord's Day,' etc.

"There is neither in this writer nor in the Barnabas epistle an intimation that Sunday was regarded as in any way a substitute for the Jewish Sabbath, nor yet a continuation of it; rather it was a new institution. It is, however, impossible to determine the time of its beginning; no impressive enactment, like that in the case of the Decalogue, was needed. . . . Not until the 4th century do we find a statement intimating that the Jewish Sabbath, with its sanctions and duties, was transferred to the first, or the Lord's Day. . . . The observance of the Jewish Sabbath in the churches of the Jewish Christians continued for the first five centuries. In the East both days were celebrated with rejoicing; in the West the Jewish Sabbath was observed as a fast.

"The reign of Constantine marks a change in the relations of the people to the Lord's Day. The rescript of the emperor, commanding the observance of Sunday, seems to have had little regard for its sanctity as a Christian institution; but the day of the sun is to be generally regarded with veneration. . . . Later enactments made plain the duties of civil and ecclesiastical officers respecting the observance of Sunday, until it takes its place as an institution to be guarded and regulated by the government."

2. Sanctity and Ground of Observance.

"The resurrection of Christ was the one all-sufficient fact which accounts for the rise and growth of the Christian Church. 'Jesus and the resurrection' was the burden of the apostolic preaching. Hence the recollection of the day of the resurrection was so indelibly impressed upon the hearts of the first disciples that on its return they came together to pray and to recall the memory of the Lord by breaking of bread and the celebration of the eucharist. It was the dictate of the glowing love for Christ, whose followers they delighted to be reckoned. . . . We fail to find the slightest trace of a law or apostolic edict instituting the observance of the 'day of the Lord;' nor is there in the Scriptures an intimation of a substitution of this for the Jewish Sabbath. The primal idea of the Jewish Sabbath was cessation of labor, rest; the transference of this idea to the first day of the week does not appear in the teachings of Christ nor of his apostles. Nor in the Council of Jerusalem, when the most important decisions are reached relative to the ground of union of Jewish and Gentile Christians, is one word found respecting the observance of the Sabbath. Contrariwise, Paul distinctly warns against the imposition of burdens upon the Church respecting days, but declares for a conscientious freedom in these observances. 'Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind' (Rom. 14:5, 6). Still more strongly does he upbraid the Galatian church for putting itself again in bondage to the weak and beggarly elements, as days, months, times, and years; while in his letter to the Colossians (2:16, 17) he speaks of the entire abolition of the Jewish Sabbath."

Justin Martyr, in his dialogue with the Jew Tryphon, who taunts the Christians with having no festivals nor Sabbaths, clearly claims that Sunday is to them a new Sabbath, and that the entire Mosaic law has been abrogated (Cum Tryph., cc. 10, 11). The new law binding upon Christians regards every day as a Sabbath, instead of passing one day in rest or absolute idleness.

"With respect to the strictness with which the first day of the week was observed during the first three centuries, the following facts are important to notice: Between the death of the apostles and the edict of Milan, the Lord's Day was sanctified by a Church unrecognized by the State and exposed to opposition and sometimes to bitter persecution. The motive for its observance was, therefore, purely moral and religious. The social position of the early Church, drawing its members for the most part from the poorer artisans, traders, and slaves, forbade the strict and general keeping of the Lord's Day, much more of both the Sabbath and Sunday. Thus the universal hallowing of the day of the resurrection was impossible" (Bennett, Christ. Arch., p. 444, sq.).

3. Legal Observance. In the midst of the corrupt influence of heathenism and the growing indifference of the Church, it was thought necessary to bring some stress of authority upon the Christian conscience to hold it to the faithful observance of the first day, as the Jews had known the power of a positive enactment in keeping them steadfast in the hallowing of their Sabbath. "The constant temptation of the Christians to attend upon the heathen spectacles and festivities could, in the case of such whose piety was low, no longer, as at first, be broken by considerations of the high privileges of Christian worship and of the commemoration of the resurrection of Christ, but the restraints coming from a quasi legal enactment were found to be more and more necessary" (ibid., p. 450).

"The obligation to observe the day does not come from the fourth commandment, but from the apostolic institution of the Lord's Day. Nevertheless, from the time of the attempts of the emperors to adjust the civil conditions to the recognition of Sunday as the chief religious holiday, the sense of obligation to keep sacred the first day of the week, coming from legal enactment, more and more supplanted the consideration of the high and holy privilege which had animated the Christian Church during the first years of its activity. From the last part of the 6th century the strict legalistic view becomes more and more prominent, and the rulers in State and Church incline to strengthen the civil and conciliatory enactments respecting the Lord's Day by divine authority, as contained in the fourth commandment" (ibid., p. 451).

SUP (Heb. שׁוּב , meg-am-mau', a gathering, host) is used (Hab. 1:9) as follows: "Their faces shall sup up as the east wind." A better rendering is, "the gathering of their faces is forward," i. e., all their faces are turned forward, pressing on. In the R. V. it is given, "All their faces are set eagerly as the east wind."

SUPERFLUITY (Gr. περισσεία, per-is-si'-ah) occurs in James 1:21, "Wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness," etc., and has been variously understood. Grimm (Gr.-Eng. Lex., s. v.) thinks it to mean "the wickedness remaining over in the Christian from his state prior to conversion." Weiss (Bib. Theol. of N. T., p. 270) thinks it "an excess of" wrath (A. V. "wickedness"), to which this wickedness hurries them on, the spirit opposed to meekness.

SUPERFLUOUS (Heb. שׁוֹרָה, saw-rah', to prolong), the having any member too long or large, and so deformed. Any person so afflicted was not allowed to officiate in the tabernacle or temple service (Lev. 21:18), nor was any such animal permitted as a sacrifice (22:23).

SUPERScription (Gr. ἐπιγραφή, ep-ig-raf-ay', written upon), an inscription, title; in the New Testament of an inscription in black letters upon a whitened tablet, such as Pilate wrote and caused to be placed on the cross (Luke 23:38; John 19:19); also an inscription upon a coin (Matt. 22:20; Mark 12:16; Luke 20:24).

SUPERSTITION (Gr. δεισιδαιμονία, dice-e-dahee-mon-ee'-ah, reverence for the gods), "a word which Festus, in the presence of Agrippa, the Jewish king, employs ambiguously and cautiously (Acts 25:19, A. V. 'religion'), so as to leave his own judgment concerning its truth in suspense" (Grimm, Lcx., s. v.).

SUPERSTITIOUS (Gr. δεισιδαίμων, dice-e-dahee'-mohn, reverencing the gods), in a good sense, godly; in a bad sense, superstitious. Paul, in the opening of his address to the Athenians (Acts 17:22) calls them, with kindly ambiguity, divinity-fearing, devout, without the knowledge of the true God.

SUPH, a word in the R. V. marg. (Deut. 1:1), referred to as meaning the Red Sea; most probably an abbreviation of Yam-suph, or the Red Sea.

SUP'PHAH (Num. 21:14, A. V. marg.; R. V. text), also instead of the Red Sea.

SUPPER. See BANQUET; FOOD; LORD'S SUPPER.

SUPPLICATION. 1. Tekh-in-naw' (Heb. תְּכַחֵן), has the meaning of favor, mercy (Josh. 11:20; Ezra 9:8); also prayer, i. e., a cry for mercy (1 Kings 8:28, etc.; 2 Chron. 6:19, 24, 29, 35; Psa. 6:9; 55:1; Dan. 9:20).

2. Khav-nan' (Heb. כָּחַן, to incline), to be favorably disposed; and then to implore favor, to entreat (1 Kings 8:33; Esth. 4:8; Job 8:5; Psa. 30:8, etc.).

3. Del'-ay-sis (Gr. δέησις, asking), in the New Testament, requests addressed by men to God (James 5:16; 1 Pet. 3:12, A. V. "pray" and "prayers"); joined with προσευχή (pros-yoo-khay', prayer), i. e., any pious address to God (Acts 1:14; Eph. 6:8; Phil. 4:6; 1 Tim. 2:1; 5:5). Bengel says "δέησις is the asking of favor in some special necessity; προσευχή is exercised in all presentation of desires and wishes to God." Trench (Syn. N. T., second series, p. 3) makes this important point of distinction, viz., "that προσευχή is res sacra, a word restricted to sacred uses; it is always prayer to God; δέησις has no such restriction."

SUR (Heb. סוּר, soor, removed, as in Isa. 49:21), the name of one of the gates of the temple at Jerusalem (2 Kings 11:6) in the parallel passage (2 Chron. 23:5) it is styled "the gate of the foundation."

SURETY (from Heb. עָרַב, aw-rab', to braid, intermix), to deposit a pledge, either in money, goods, or in part payment, as security for a bargain (Gr. ἔγγυος, eng'-goo-os). The earliest form of surety mentioned in Scripture is the pledging of person for person, as when Judah undertook with his father to be surety for Benjamin (Gen. 43:9); and when circumstances seemed to call for a fulfillment of the obligation, he actually offered himself in the room of Benjamin. In this sense the Psalmist asks God to be surety for him (Psa. 119:122), as did, also, in his great distress, Hezekiah (Isa. 38:14).

The more common kind of surety spoken of is financial. The Mosaic regulations respecting debts were such that, except in rare cases, the creditor was not likely to suffer any considerable loss; and it may be that this was the reason why the Mosaic law contains no statute on suretyship. In later times they were very common, as we learn from Proverbs, where foresight is taught (Prov. 6:1, sq.; 11:15; 17:18), by pointing to the fact that the surety has to stand for the debtor, and could not expect any milder treatment than he (Prov. 20:16; 22:26, sq.; comp. Siriac 8:16; 29:20, 24).

Figurative. "In the highest sense the term is applied to Christ, who, in his character as mediator, is represented as 'the surety (ἔγγυος, eng'-goo-os) of a better covenant' (Heb. 7:22), having made himself responsible for all that in this covenant was required to be accomplished for the salvation of those who were to share in its provisions" (McC. and S., Cyc.).

SURFETTING (Gr. κρατάλη, krah-ee-pal'-ay), the giddiness and headache caused by drinking wine to excess (Luke 21:34 only). Fulsomeness, in the early sense of that word, would express it very well, with only the drawback that by fulsomeness might be indicated the disgust and loathing from overfulness of meat as well as wine, while surfeiting expresses only the latter (Trench, Gr. Syn., 2d series, p. 51).

SURNAME. 1. Kav-naw' (Heb. כָּחַן), to mention with honor (Isa. 44:5), which may be rendered, "and name the name of Israel with honor" (see 45:4).

2. Ep-ee-kal-eh'-om-ah-ee (Gr. ἐπικαλέομαι, to invoke, to put a name upon), to surname (Matt. 10:3; Luke 22:3; Acts 1:23, etc.). The expression (Acts 15:17) "all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called," means those who were declared to be dedicated to him (comp. James 2:7, A. V. "worthy name").

SU'SA (Esth. 11:3; 16:18, Apocrypha), SHUSHAN.

SU'SANCHITES (Heb. שׁוֹשַׁנִּי, shoo-shun-kee', Ezra 4:9 only), one of the nations settled in Samaria by the Assyrians, and still remaining in the days of Artaxerxes. It is supposed that they were the inhabitants either of the province Susiana or of its capital Susa (Shushan); probably the latter, as Dan. 8:2 seems to make Shushan the capital of Elam, and in Ezra 4:9 Elamites are mentioned separately.—W. H.

SUSAN'NA (Gr. Σουσάννα, soo-san'-nah, a lily), one of the women who followed our Lord and "ministered unto him of their substance" (Luke 8:3). A. D. 28. No particulars of her life are known. The name, apparently of common occurrence, is of the same origin and meaning as Shesban (1 Chron. 2:31, 34, 35). The Susanna who figures prominently in the symbolism of the ancient Church is the heroine of the apocryphal story of the judgment of Daniel.

SU'SI (Heb. סוּסִי, sou-see', a horseman), the father of Gaddi, who was the representative of the tribe of Manasseh in the first commission sent by Moses to "spy out the land" of Canaan (Num. 13:11), B. C. before 1209.

SWADDLE (Heb. פָּעוּץ, law-fakh', to bear upon the palm); in English, to carry in the arms (Lam. 2:22); elsewhere (Ezek. 16:4) the rendering of כְּפָרִי, khaw-thal', to wrap in bandages, to swaddle (comp. Luke 2:17).

Figurative. The thick mist (A. V. "darkness") is called (Job 38:9) the swaddling clothes of the sea.

SWADDLING BAND. See GLOSSARY.

SWALLOW. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

SWAN. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

SWEAR. See OATH.

SWEAT (Heb. זֵיעָה, yeh'-zah, perspiration). In setting forth the requisites, obligations, and privileges of the priest's office, Ezekiel (44:18) designates linen as the material for their clothing, assigning as the reason that the priest is not to cause himself to sweat by wearing woolen clothing. Sweat produces uncleanness; and the priest, by keeping his body clean, is to show even outwardly that he is clean and blameless.

SWEAT, BLOODY. See BLOODY SWEAT.

SWELLING. 1. Gaw-ohm' (Heb. גִּבְעוּת, pride).

The "swelling of Jordan" is a phrase (Jer. 12:5; 49:19; 50:44, A. V.) which should be rendered "pride of Jordan," as in Zech. 11:3. Orelli renders it "jungles of Jordan," where lions lurk.

2. Hoop-er-okh-ay' (Gr. ὑπεροχή, to be above), superior in rank (authority, 1 Tim. 2:2); R. V. "those who are in high place."

3. Hoop-er'-ong-kos (Gr. ὑπερόγκος, a swelling), immoderate, extravagant; expressive of arrogance, as "great swelling words" (2 Pet. 2:18; Jude 16).

4. Foo-see'-o-sis (Gr. φουσιώσις), a puffing up of soul, loftiness, pride (2 Cor. 12:20).

SWINE. Figurative. "A fair woman without discretion" (Prov. 11:22), "Neither cast ye your pearls before swine" (Matt. 7:6), are proverbs which are easily understood. "As if he offered swine's blood" (Isa. 66:3) is used of those who, without reflection, and merely as an external act, offer sacrifices to God. Even though they offer sacrifices which are prescribed, their state of mind is no more acceptable than if they offered that which was unclean. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

SYCAMINE, SYCAMORE, SYCOMORE.

See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

SY'CHAR (Gr. Σιχάρ, sou-khar', perhaps liar, drunkard). Sychar was either a name applied to Shechem, or it was an independent place.

1. It may have been that the Jews called Shechem Sheqer, false, or Shikor, drunken. But we have absolutely no proof of their having done so, and Isaiah (ch. 28) does not mention Shechem at all, but the city of Samaria or Sebaste, six miles away.

2. The second possibility is that Sychar was the name of a place other than Shechem, but, like it, in the neighborhood of the parcel of ground which Jacob bought. "For this the first evidence we get is at the beginning of the 4th century, when two visitors to the land, Eusebius and the Bordeaux Pilgrim (the latter about A. D. 333), both mention a Sychar, distinct from Shechem, lying, says the former, before Neapolis, the present Nablús, and the latter adds that it was a Roman mile from Shechem." In mediæval times "the abbot Daniel (1106, 1107) speaks of 'the hamlet of Jacob called Sihar. Jacob's well is there. Near this place, at half a verst away, is the town of Samaria . . . at present called Neapolis.' Fetellus (1130) says: 'A mile from Sicheim is the town of Sychar; in it is the fountain of Jacob, which, however, is a well.'" Other travelers mention both Sicheim and Sychar, and Dr. Smith (p. 372) concludes, "That all this time, in spite of ecclesiastical tradition, the name Sychar should have continued to exist in the neighborhood, and solely among the natives, is a strong proof of its originality, of its having been from the first a native and not an artificial name."

"About one and a half miles to the east (of Nablús), where the vale opens into the small plain of Morch, is the undisputed site of Jacob's well; and north of this, at the foot of Ebal, the little village of Askur, among its cactus hedges, preserves the site of Sychar, mentioned in the fourth gospel, below which is the tomb of Joseph" (Conder, Palestine, p. 63).

SY'CHEM (Acts 7:16). See SHECHEM.

SYENE (Heb. סֵוֶן, sev-ay-nay', or סֵוֶן, sev-ane'), a town of Egypt on the frontier of Cush, or Ethiopia. Ezekiel speaks (29:10) of the desolation of Egypt "from Migdol (A. V. 'tower') to Syene, even unto the border of Ethiopia," and of its people being slain "from Migdol to Syene" (30:6). Its ancient Egyptian name is Sui, preserved in the Coptic Souan, Senon, and the Arabic Aswán. It was separated by an arm of the Nile, ninety yards wide, from Elephantine, forming a suburb of that important city. "Marshy pasturages occupied the modern site of Syene; beyond these were gardens, vines, furnishing wine celebrated throughout the whole of Egypt, and a forest of date palms running toward the north along the banks of the stream. . . . The markets and streets of the twin cities must have presented at that time the same motley blending of types and costumes which we might have found some years back in the bazaars of modern Syene. . . . Elephantine and Syene have preserved for us nothing of their ancient edifices; but the tombs which they have left us tell their history. They honeycomb in long lines the sides of the steep hill which looks down upon the whole extent of the left bank of the Nile opposite the narrow channel of the port of Aswán" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., pp. 425, 430).

SYNAGOGUE. The material of this article is largely taken from Schurer's The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (Div. II, vol. II, § 27).

1. Object. As only a small proportion of the people could become proficient in the study of the law under the scribes, and as it was desirable that all should have at least an elementary acquaintance therewith, the custom grew up in post-exilic times of reading the Scriptures in the synagogue on the Sabbath day. It must be understood that the main object of these Sabbath day assemblages in the synagogues was not public worship in its stricter sense, but religious instruction, which to an Israelite was above all instruction in the law. Thus Josephus says (Apion, ii, 7), "Not once or twice or more frequently did our lawgiver command us to hear the law, but to come together weekly, with the cessation of other work, to hear the law and to learn it accurately." Philo called the synagogues "houses of instruction," in which "the native philosophy" was studied, and every kind of virtue taught. In the New Testament, too, the teaching (Gr. διδάσκειν, did-as'-kein) always figures as the chief function of the synagogue.

2. Origin. The origin of these Sabbath day meetings in buildings erected for the purpose must be sought for in the post-exilic period. The first traces of them are "the synagogues of God" (בתי-הא-להים, mo-ad-ay'-ale, assembly of God, Psa. 74:8), probably of the Maccabean era; but their commencement may well be as far back as the time of Ezra. In the time of Christ "teaching in the synagogue on the Sabbath day" was already an established institution (Mark 1:21; 6:2; Luke 4:16, 31; 6:6; 13:10; Acts 13:14, 27, 42, 44; 15:21; 16:18; 17:2; 18:4). According to Acts 15:21, "Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath day." Josephus, Philo, and, later, Judaism generally, trace back the whole system to Moses, but there is no evidence of a pre-exilic origin.

3. Religious Community. The system presupposes a religious community. This was an independent organization in towns in which Jews might be excluded from civic rights, or Jews and others had equal rights. In such cases the Jews would be thrown back upon self-organization as a religious community; for whether they cooperated or not in civil affairs, the necessity of independent organization for religious matters was the same. Where Jews only had civic rights, and the local authorities were Jewish, matters relating to the synagogue were probably under their jurisdiction and direction. In the Mishna, for example, it is presumed as quite self-evident that the synagogue, the sacred ark, and the sacred books were quite as much the property of the town as the roads and baths.

4. Conduct of Synagogues. The general direction of affairs was committed to elders, while special officers were appointed for special purposes. But the peculiarity here is that just for the acts proper to public worship—the reading of the Scriptures, preaching and prayer—no special officials were appointed. These acts were, on the contrary, in the time of Christ still freely performed in turn by members of the congregation.

5. Officials. (1) The ruler of the synagogue (Gr. ἀρχιευνάγωγος, ar-khee-soon-ag'-o-gos) had the care of external order in public worship, and the supervision of the concerns of the synagogue in general. This officer was found in the entire sphere of Judaism, not only in Palestine, but also in Egypt, Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and the Roman empire in general. The Hebrew title (רֹאשׁ הַסִּנְגוֹגָה, roshe hak-ken-ay'-seth, "the minister of the synagogue") was undoubtedly synonymous with the Greek term. This office differed from that of an elder of the congregation, although the same person could fill the offices of both. The ruler of the synagogue was so called, not as head of the community, but as conductor of their assembly for public worship. Among his functions is specially mentioned that of appointing who should read the Scriptures and the prayer, and summoning fit persons to preach; to see that nothing improper took place in the synagogue (Luke 12:14), and to take charge of the synagogue building. Although it was customary to have but one ruler for each synagogue, yet sometimes more are mentioned (Acts 13:15).

(2) Receiver of alms (Heb. קַבְּלָן צְדָקוֹת, gab-bar-ay' tse-d-aw-kaw'). This official had nothing to do with public worship as such, and is, therefore, where the civil and religious communities were not separated, to be regarded rather as a civil official. According to the Mishna the collection was to be made by two, the distribution by three persons. Not only was money collected, but also natural products.

(3) The minister (Heb. מְדַבֵּר הַסִּנְגוֹגָה, khaz-zawm' hak-ken-ay'-seth; Gr. ὑποετής, hoop-ay-ret'-ace, Luke 4:20). His office was to bring forth the Holy Scriptures at public worship and to put them by again. He was in every respect the servant of the congregation, having, for example, to execute the punishment of scourging and also to instruct the children in reading.

The person (Heb. שְׂלֵחַת צְבִיר, who pronounced the prayer in the name of the congregation is also generally regarded as one of the officers of the synagogue. There were also "ten unemployed men," whose business it was, especially in the post-Talmudic period, to be always present for a fee in the synagogue at public worship, for the purpose of making up the number of ten members required for a religious assembly; but they are hardly to be regarded as officials.

6. Building (Heb. בֵּית הַסִּנְגוֹת, bayth hak-ken-ay'-seth, house of assembly; Gr. συναγωγὴ, soon-ag-o-gay'). Synagogues were built by preference outside the towns and near rivers, or on the seashore, for the sake of giving everyone a convenient opportunity for performing such Levitical purification as might be necessary before attending public worship. The size and architecture of course varied. In northern Galilee ruins of ancient synagogues are preserved in the present time, the oldest of which are of the 2d, possibly of the 1st century after Christ. They may perhaps give an idea of the style of building employed for synagogues in the time of Christ. Almost all these synagogues lie north and south, so that the entrance is at the south. As a rule they appear to have had one chief entrance and two smaller side doors.

The fittings of synagogues in New Testament times were very simple. The chief was the closet (Heb. תַּיְבוֹן, tay-baw) in which were kept the rolls of the law and the other sacred books. These were wrapped in linen cloths and lay in a case. A representation of an old silver case for the Pentateuch among the modern Samaritans is given in the Survey of Western Palestine (vol. ii, 1882, p. 206). An elevated place (Gr. βήμα, bay-mah, tribune), upon which stood the reading desk, was erected at least in post-Talmudic times, for the person who read the Scriptures or preached. Lamps were also used; and trombones and trumpets were indispensable instruments in public worship. The former were blown especially on the first day of the year, the latter on the feast days.

The large synagogue at Alexandria is said to have had the form of a basilica. It is possible that they were sometimes built like theaters, without a roof, but this is only really testified concerning those of the Samaritans.

7. Where Located. The value attached to these Sabbath day assemblies leads us to assume that there was in every town of Palestine, and even in smaller places, at least one synagogue. In the post-Talmudic period it was required that a synagogue should be built wherever ten Israelites were dwelling together. In the larger towns there was a considerable number of synagogues, e. g., in Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Rome. The different synagogues in the same town seem to have been distinguished from each other by special emblems, as a "synagogue of the vine" in Sephoris, "of the olive tree" in Rome.

8. Worship. The order of worship in New Testament times was tolerably developed and established. The congregation sat in an appointed order, the most distinguished in the front seats, the younger behind; men and women probably apart (see Matt. 23:6; Mark 12:39; Luke 11:43; 20:46). In the great synagogue in Alexandria the men are said to have been set apart according to their respective trades. A special division was prepared for the leper. The chief parts of the service were, according to the Mishna, the recitation of the Shema, prayer, the reading of the Torah, the reading of the prophets, the blessing of the priest, followed by the translation of the Scripture that had been read, and the discourse. The Shema, so called from its commencing words, שְׁמַע יִשְׂרָאֵל (shem-ah' yis-raw-ale', "Hear, O Israel"), consists of Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21; Num. 15:37-41, together with benediction before and after. It is rather a confession of faith than a prayer. The custom of praying the first three and last three benedictions of the Shemoneh Esreh at Sabbath and festival worship reaches back to the age of the Mishna. The Shemoneh Esreh was the chief prayer which every Israelite, even women, slaves, and children, had to repeat three times a day—morning, afternoon, and evening. It was the custom to pray standing and with the face turned toward the holy of holies, i. e., toward Jerusalem. The prayer was offered by some one named by the ruler of the synagogue, the congregation making only certain responses, especially the amen. He who uttered the prayer stood in front of the chest in which lay the rolls of the law. Every adult member of the congregation was competent to do this; and might also recite the Shema, read the lesson from the prophets, and, if a priest, pronounce the blessing.

The Scripture lessons, from both the law and the prophets, could be read by any member of the congregation, even by minors, the latter being only excluded from reading the Book of Esther at the feast of Purim. If priests and Levites were present, they took precedence in reading the lesson. The reader usually stood (Luke 4:16), but both sitting and standing were allowed at the reading of the Book of Esther, and the king was allowed to sit when he read his portion of Scripture at the Feast of Tabernacles in the Sabbath year. The lesson from the Torah was so arranged that the whole Pentateuch was got through with in a cycle of three years, for which purpose it was divided into one hundred and fifty-four sections.

On Sabbaths several members of the congregation, at the least seven, who were summoned for the purpose by some official, originally, indeed, by the ruler of the synagogue, took part in the reading; each (at the reading of the Torah) to read at least three verses, but not to repeat them by heart. The reading of the law was already followed in New Testament times by a paragraph from the prophets (see Luke 4:17; Acts 13:15). The prophets not being read in course, a choice of them was open, and they were always read by one person, and that on the chief services of the Sabbath. The sacred language of Scripture not being familiar to the bulk of the people, its reading was followed by translation into the Aramaic dialect. The reading of the Scripture was followed by a lecture or sermon, explaining and applying the portion read (Matt. 4:23; Mark 1:21; Luke 4:15; 6:6; 13:10; John 6:59; 18:20); the preacher sitting (Luke 4:20) on an elevated place. The position of preacher was open to any competent member of the congregation.

The service closed with the blessing pronounced by a priestly member of the congregation, to which the whole congregation responded Amen. If no priest or Levite was present the blessing was not pronounced, but was made into a prayer.

SYNTICHE (Gr. Συντιχη, soon-too'-khai, accident), a Christian woman of Philippi, who seems to have been at variance with another female member named Euodias or Euodia (Phil. 4: 2, 3), A. D. 57. Paul pathetically entreats them to live in mutual harmony, and mentions their names with a respect bordering on fondness, as fellow-laborers in the Gospel, whose names were written in the book of life. It has been surmised that they were deaconesses, in which case their good fellowship would be of almost vital importance to the infant Church.

SYRACUSE (Gr. Συράκουσαι, soo-rak'-oo-sahce), a town on the eastern coast of the island of Sicily, once connected with the mainland by a causeway, a fact curiously recorded upon the coinage, which represents dolphins swimming round the head of Arthusa while the island remained, but meeting at the nose of the figure when it was no longer an island. It was a place of great splendor, the birthplace of Archimedes, and here

Saint Paul remained three days when on his way to Rome (Acts 28:12). Called now Syracuse, having a small population.

SYRIA Heb. סַרְיָא, ar-awm', highland; Gr. Syria, soo-ree'-al).

1. Name. In Gen. 10:22 Aram, the youngest son of Shem, is mentioned as the founder of the Aramæan nation, and thus the country is rightly called "Aram" (Num. 23:7); but the same Hebrew word is rendered "Mesopotamia" (Judg. 3:10) and "Syria" (10:6). Most probably Syria is derived from Tsûr (Heb. צֹר, tsoor), the ancient city of Tyre. Syria and Assyria are very different in Hebrew. The Greek form of the name derived from Tsûr would be softened down to Syria (soo-ree'-al); Assyria is in Hebrew אַשּׁוּר (ash-shoor'), and in Greek Ἀσσυρία (as-soo-ree'-al), sometimes Ἀρουπία (at-oo-ree'-al). In the Assyrian inscriptions Assyria is called As-sur, while the Tyrians are the Tsur-ra-ya, the characters used being entirely different. The name Syria was of foreign origin, and was never adopted or acknowledged by the people themselves.

2. Territory. Ancient geographers were not agreed as to the extent of Syria, confounding, with Herodotus, Syria and Assyria. The Hebrew Aram seems to commence on the northern frontier of Palestine, and to extend thence northward to the skirts of Taurus, westward to the Mediterranean, and eastward probably to the Khabour River. It was subdivided into five principalities:

(1) Aram-Dammesek, or "Syria of Damascus" (2 Sam. 8:5, 6). This was the rich country about Damascus, lying between Antilibanus and the desert, and the last with the district about Haran and Orfah, the flat country stretching out from the western extremity of Mons Masius toward the true source of the Khabour, at Ras-el-Ain. Aram-naharaim seems to be a term including this last tract and extending beyond it, though how far beyond is doubtful. (2) Aram-Zobah, or "Syria of Zobah" (10:6), seems to be the tract between the Euphrates and Cœle-Syria. The other divisions were: (3) Aram-Maachah (10:6, 8); (4) Aram-Beth-rehob (10:6, 8); and (5) Aram-Naharaim (Gen. 24:10), or "Mesopotamiae." The exact location of the last three is difficult to determine. Probably they were portions of the tract intervening between Antilibanus and the desert.

The Greek writers used the term Syria still more vaguely than the Hebrews did Aram. On the one hand they extended it to the Euxine; on the other they carried it to the borders of Egypt. Still they seem always to have had a feeling that Syria proper was a narrower region. The LXX and New Testament writers distinguish Syria from Phœnicia on the one hand, and from Samaria, Judea, Idumea, etc., on the other. In the present article it seems best to take the word in this narrow sense, and to regard Syria as bounded by Amanus and Taurus on the north, by the Euphrates and the Arabian Desert on the east, by Palestine on the south, by the Mediterranean near the mouth of the Orontes, and then by Phœnicia upon the west. The tract thus circumscribed is about three hundred miles long from north to south, and from fifty to one hundred and fifty miles broad. It contains an area of about thirty thousand square miles.

3. Physical Features. (1) Mountains. The general character of the tract is mountainous, as the Hebrew name Aram (from a root signifying "height") sufficiently implies. On the west two longitudinal chains, running parallel with the coast at no great distance from one another, extend along two thirds of the length of Syria, from the latitude of Antioch to that of Antioch. In the latitude of Antioch the longitudinal chains are met by the chain of Amanus, an outlying barrier of Taurus, having the direction of that range, which in this part is from southwest to northeast. The most fertile and valuable tract of Syria is the long valley intervening between Libanus and Antilibanus. The northern mountain region is also fairly productive; but the soil of the plains about Aleppo is poor, and the eastern flank of the Antilibanus, except in one place, is peculiarly sterile. The mountain ranges are: (a) Lebanon, extending from the mouth of the Litany to Arka, a distance of nearly one hundred miles, and is composed chiefly of Jura limestone, but varied with sandstone and basalt. (See LEBANON.) (b) Antilibanus. This range, as the name implies, stands over against Lebanon, running in the same direction, i. e., nearly north and south, and extending the same length. (c) Bargylus. Mount Bargylus, called now Jebel Nosairi toward the south, and toward the north Jebel Kraad, extends from the mouth of the Nahr-el-Kebir (Eleutherus), nearly opposite Hems, to the vicinity of Antioch, a distance of rather more than one hundred miles. One of the western spurs terminates in a remarkable headland, known to the ancients as Mount Casius, and now called Jebel-el-Akra, or the "Bald Mountain." (d) Amanus. North of the mouth of the Orontes, between its course and the eastern shore of the Gulf of Issus (Iskanderun), lies the range of Amanus, which divides Syria from Cilicia. Its average elevation is five thousand feet, and it terminates abruptly at Ras-el-Khanzir, in a high cliff overhanging the sea.

(2) Rivers. 1. The Orontes is the largest river in Syria, and has its source about fifteen miles from that of the Litany. Its modern name is the Nahr-el-Asi, or "Rebel Stream," an appellation given to it on account of its violence and impetuosity in many parts of its course. It is also called el-Maklûb ("The Inverted"), from the fact of its running, as is thought, in a wrong direction. It runs northwest across the plain to the foot of Lebanon, where its volume is more than trebled by the great fountain of Ain el-Asy. Hence it winds along the plain of Hamath, passing Riblah, Hems, Hamath, and Aramea. At Antioch it sweeps round to the west, and falls into the Mediterranean at Seleucia. 2. The Litany is the next largest river, having its source in a small lake situated in the middle of the Cœle-Syrian valley, about six miles to the S. W. of Baalbek. It enters the sea about five miles N. of Tyre. The other Syrian streams of some consequence, besides the Litany and the Orontes, are the Barada, or river of Damascus; the Koweik, or river of Aleppo; and the Sajur, a tributary of the Euphrates.

(3) The lakes. The principal lakes of Syria are the Agh-Dengiz, or Lake of Antioch; the Sabakhah, or Salt Lake, between Aleppo and Balis; the Bahr-el-Kades, on the upper Orontes; and the Bahr-el-Merj, or Lake of Damascus.

(4) The great valley. By far the most important part of Syria, and on the whole its most striking feature, is the great valley which reaches from the plain of Umk, near Antioch, to the narrow gorge on which the Litany enters in about latitude 33° 30'. This valley, which runs nearly parallel with the Syrian coast, extends the length of two hundred and thirty miles, and has a width varying from six or eight to fifteen or twenty miles. The more southern portion of it was known to the ancients as Cœle-Syria, or "the Hollow Syria."

(5) The eastern desert. East of the inner mountain chain, and south of the cultivable ground about Aleppo, is the great Syrian Desert, an elevated, dry upland, for the most part of gypsum and marl, producing nothing but a few spare bushes of wormwood and the usual aromatic plants of the wilderness. The region is traversed with difficulty, and has never been accurately surveyed. The most remarkable oasis is at Palmyra, where there are several small streams and abundant palm trees.

(6) Principal towns. These may be arranged, as nearly as possible, in the order of their imporance: 1. Antioch; 2. Damascus; 3. Apamea; 4. Seleucia; 5. Tadmor, or Palmyra; 6. Laodicea; 7. Epiphania (Hamath); 8. Samosata; 9. Hierapolis (Mabug); 10. Chalybon; 11. Emesa; 12. Heliopolis; 13. Laodicea ad Libanum; 14. Cyrrhus; 15. Chalcis; 16. Poseideium; 17. Heraclea; 18. Gindarus; 19. Zeugma; 20. Thapsacus. Of these, Samosata, Zeugma, Thapsacus, are on the Euphrates; Seleucia, Laodicea, Poseideium, and Heraclea, on the seashore; Antioch, Apamea, Epiphania, and Emesa (Hems), on the Orontes; Heliopolis and Laodicea ad Libanum, in Cœle-Syria; Hierapolis, Chalybon, Cyrrhus, Chalcis, and Gindarus, in the northern highlands; Damascus on the skirts, and Palmyra in the center of the eastern desert.

4. History. (1) The first occupants of Syria appear to have been of Hamitic descent. The Canaanitish races, the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, etc., are connected in Scripture with Egypt and Ethiopia, Cush and Mizraim (Gen. 10:6, 15-18). These tribes occupied not Palestine only, but also lower Syria, in very early times, as we may gather from the fact that Hamath is assigned to them in Genesis (10:18). Afterward they seem to have become possessed of upper Syria also. After a while the first comers, who were still to a great extent nomads, received a Shemitic infusion, which most probably came to them from the southeast. The only Syrian town whose existence we find distinctly marked at this time is Damascus (14:15; 15:2), which appears to have been already a place of some importance. Next to Damascus must be placed Hamath (Num. 13:21; 34:8). Syria at this time, and for many centuries afterward, seems to have been broken up among a number of petty kingdoms.

(2) Testimony of the monuments. The Egyptian records show that "in that eventful era, from the 16th to the 13th century B. C., Syria as well as Palestine was made an appanage of Egypt; that she was forced to relax her hold in consequence of local uprisings;" that "finally she fully retrieved her position under the much-vaunted 19th dynasty, and that then she was met by the Hittites, and compelled to call a halt upon the Syrian border" (Dr. McCurdy, in Recent Researches in Bible Lands, p. 11).

(3) Syria and Israel. The Jews first come into hostile contact with the Syrians, under that name, in the time of David. Claiming the frontier of the Euphrates, which God had promised to Abraham (Gen. 15:18), David made war on Hadadezer, king of Zobah (2 Sam. 8:3, 4, 13). The Damascene Syrians were likewise defeated with great loss (v. 5). Zobah, however, was far from being subdued as yet. When, a few years later, the Ammonites determined on engaging in a war with David, and applied to the Syrians for aid, Zobah, together with Beth-rehob, sent them twenty thousand footmen, and two other Syrian kingdoms furnished thirteen thousand (2 Sam. 10:6). This army being completely defeated by Joab, Hadadezer obtained aid from Mesopotamia (v. 16), and tried the chance of a third battle, which likewise went against him, and produced the general submission of Syria to the Jewish monarch. The submission thus begun continued under the reign of Solomon (1 Kings 4:21). The only part of Syria which Solomon lost seems to have been Damascus, where an independent kingdom was set up by Rezon, a native of Zobah (11:23-25). On the separation of the ten tribes from Rehoboam, Syria was ripe for revolt. Rezon disappears from the scene, and Ben-hadad, in the reign of Assa, king of Judah, is king of Aram, with Damascus as its capital. He forms an alliance with Assa, and subdues the northern part of the kingdom of the ten tribes (15:18-20). A second Ben-hadad lays siege to Samaria, the capital of Ahab, but is defeated; meeting with a still greater disaster the following year. In an endeavor to recover Ramoth-gilead Ahab was defeated and slain. Samaria was again besieged in the days of Jehoram, son of Ahab; but in consequence of a panic it was delivered. War continued to be waged between the Syrian kings (Hazael, Ben-hadad III, Rezin) and kings of Israel (Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, Joash, Jeroboam II).

In the latter days of Jotham, king of Judah, we find Rezin, king of Aram, and Pekah, king of Israel, confederate with Israel. They invade the country, threaten the capital, and recover Elath to Aram, in the reign of Ahaz, who, to protect himself, became a vassal of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. The latter accordingly "went up against Damascus, and took it, and carried the people of it captive to Kir, and slew Rezin" (2 Kings 16:9). It was probably at the same time that he "took Ijon and Abel-beth-maachah, and Janoah," etc., and carried them captive to Assyria (15:29).

(4) Relations with Assyria, Babylonia, etc. Syria became attached to the great Assyrian empire, from which it passed to the Babylonians, and from them to the Persians. In B. C. 333 it submitted to Alexander without a struggle. Upon the death of Alexander Syria became, for the first time, the head of a great kingdom. On the division of the provinces among his generals, B. C. 321, Seleucus Nicator received Mesopotamia and Syria. Antioch was begun in B. C. 300, and, being finished in a few years, was made the capital of Seleucus's kingdom. The country grew rich with the wealth which now flowed into it on all sides. The most flourishing period was the reign of the founder, Nicator. The empire was then almost as large as that of the Achaemenian Persians, for it at one time included Asia Minor, and thus reached from the Ægean to India. The reign of Nicator's son, Antiochus I, called Soter, was the beginning of the decline, which was progressive from his date. It passed under the power of Tigranes, king of Armenia, in B. C. 83, and was not made a province of the Roman empire till after Pompey's complete defeat of Mithridates and his ally Tigranes, B. C. 64.

(5) Under the Romans. As Syria holds an important place in the New Testament as well as in the Old, some account of its condition under the Romans is in order. That condition was somewhat peculiar. While the country generally was formed into a Roman province, under governors who were at first propretors or questors, then proconsuls, and finally legates, there were exempted from the direct rule of the governor, in the first place, a number of "free cities," which retained the administration of their own affairs, subject to a tribute levied according to the Roman principles of taxation; and secondly, a number of tracts, which were assigned to petty princes, commonly natives, to be ruled at their pleasure, subject to the same obligations with the free cities as to taxation. The free cities were Antioch, Seleucia, Apamea, Epiphania, Tripolis, Sidon, and Tyre; the principalities, Comagéné, Chalcis ad Belum (near Baalbek), Arethusa, Abila or Abiléné, Palmyra, and Damascus. The principalities were sometimes called kingdoms, sometimes tetrarchies. They were established where it was thought that the natives were so intractably wedded to their own customs, and so well disposed for revolt, that it was necessary to consult their feelings, to flatter the national vanity, and to give them the semblance without the substance of freedom.

Although previously overrun by the Romans, Syria was not made tributary and governors appointed, until B. C. 64. Down to the battle of Pharsalia the country was fairly tranquil, the only trouble being with the Arabs, who occasionally attacked the eastern frontier. The Roman governors, particularly Gabinus, took great pains to restore the ruined cities. After Pharsalia (B. C. 46) the troubles of Syria were renewed. Julius Cæsar gave the province to his relative, Sextus (B. C. 47), but Pompey's party was still so strong in the East that the next year one of his adherents, Cæcilius Bassus, put Sextus to death, and established himself in the government so firmly that he was able to resist for three years three proconsuls appointed by the Senate to dispossess him, and only finally yielded upon terms which he himself offered to his antagonists. Bassus had but just made his submission when, upon the assassination of Cæsar, Syria was disputed between Cassius and Dolabella (B. C. 43). The next year Cassius left his province and went to Philippi, where he committed suicide. Syria then fell to Antony, who appointed as his legate L. Decidius Saxa (B. C. 41). Pacorus, the crown prince of Parthia, overran Syria and Asia Minor, defeating Antony's generals and threatening Rome with the loss of all her Asiatic possessions (B. C. 40-39). Ventidius, however, in B. C. 38, defeated the Parthians, slew Pacorus, and recovered for Rome her former boundary. A quiet time followed. In B. C. 27 a special procurator was therefore appointed to rule it, who was subordinate to the governor of Syria, but within his own province had the power of a legatus. Syria continued without serious disturbance from the expulsion of the Parthians (B. C. 38) to the breaking out of the Jewish war (A. D. 66). In B. C. 19 it was visited by Augustus, and in A. D. 18-19 by Germanicus, who died at Antioch in the last named year. In A. D. 44-47 it was the scene of a severe famine.

(6) Syria and Christianity. A little earlier than A. D. 47 Christianity had begun to spread into Syria, partly by means of those scattered at the time of Stephen's persecution (Acts 11:19), and partly by the exertions of Paul (Gal. 1:21). Antioch, the capital, became as early probably as A. D. 44 the see of a bishop, and was soon recognized as a patriarchate.

SYRIA MA'ACHAH. See MAACHAH, 3.

SYRIAC (Dan. 2:4), SYRIAN TONGUE (Ezra 4:7) or LANGUAGE (2 Kings 18:26; Isa. 36:11), is the rendering in the A. V. of the Heb. אֲרָמֶיִת, ar-aw-meeth'. This represents that branch of the Shemitic or Syro-Arabian languages usually termed the Aramaean, the eastern being represented by the Chaldee.

SYRIAN (Heb. אֲרָמִי, ar-am-mee'), an inhabitant either of western SYRIA (q. v.), i. e., on the Mediterranean (2 Kings 5:20), or of eastern, i. e., Mesopotamia.

SYROPHENICIAN (Gr. Συροφεινισσα, so-rof-oy-nis-sah), a general name (Mark 7:26) of a female inhabitant of the northern portion of Phoenicia, popularly called Syrophenicia, by reason of its proximity to Syria and its absorption by conquest into that kingdom. The woman of Syrophenicia applied to Jesus to heal her afflicted daughter, who was possessed with a devil. When she came near to him and worshiped, saying, "Lord, help me," he replied, "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs." Whether this was to try her faith, or to show that at that time his work and mission were among Israel, is hard to determine. Her faith, however, was great and met its merited reward in the cure of her daughter. Matthew (15:22) calls her a "woman of Canaan," being in respect to her nationality, in common with the Phenicians, a descendant of Canaan.

TA'ANACH (Heb. תַּאֲנַח, tah-an-awk', sandy), a royal city of the Canaanites, whose king was among the thirty-one conquered by Joshua (Josh. 12:21). It was apportioned to the western half tribe of Manasseh (Josh. 17:11; 21:25; 1 Chron. 7:29), and became a city of the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:25). In the great struggle of the Canaanites under Siserah against Deborah and Barak it appears to have been the headquarters of their army (Judg. 5:19). They seem to have still occupied the town, but to have been compelled to pay tribute (Josh. 17:13; Judg. 1:28). Taanach is generally named with Megiddo, and they were evidently the chief cities of that fine, rich district in the western portion of the plain of Esdraelon. It is now called Tannuk; the old ruins being extensive on the top of the hill, the modern village being at its base. "On the temple walls of Karnak at Thebes, Thothmes III (B. C. 1600) gives Taanach in the list of Canaanitish towns which had submitted to his arms" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 65). See SUPPLEMENT.

TA'ANATH-SHI'LOH (Heb. תַּאֲנַח שִׁילֹה, tah-an-ath' shee-lo', approach to Shiloh), a place mentioned as on the northern boundary of Ephraim (Josh. 16:6), at its eastern end between the Jordan and Janohah. It is probably the Ain Tana, a heap of ruins southeast of Nablus, where there are large cisterns to be found.

TAB'BAOTH (Heb. תַּבְּבוֹת, tab-baw-oth', rings, or spots), one of the Nephthim whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46), B. C. before 536.

TAB'BATH (Heb. תַּבְּבַת, tab-bath', famous), a place mentioned in connection with the flight of the Midianite host (Judg. 7:22). It is possibly identified with Tubukhat-Fahil.

TAB'EAL, TA'BEEL (Heb. תַּבְּעָל, taw-beh-ale', pleasing, God is good).

1. The father of the man whom Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, proposed to seat on the throne of Judah instead of Ahaz (Isa. 7:6), B. C. before 738. In the A. V. the name is spelled Tabael. It has been conjectured that "the son of Tabael" was identical with Zichri, the "mighty man of Ephraim," whose sanguinary deeds are recorded in 2 Chron. 28:7, and who may have thus promoted the king in hope of receiving the crown. Because of the Aramaic form of the name, however, others have supposed him to have been a Syrian warrior, who, in the event of success, might hold the Judaic kingdom in fealty to Rezin, as suzerain. The Targum of Jonathan turns the name into a mere appellative, and makes the passage read: "We will make king in the midst of it whoso seems good to us."

2. A Persian official in Samaria, who, together with Bishlam, Mithredath, and others, wrote to King Artaxerxes a letter of bitter hostility to the rebuilders of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:7, A. V. "Tabeel"), B. C. 522. The letter was written in the "Syrian [or Aramaean] tongue," and it has been argued thence, as well as from the form of his name, that he and his companions were Aramaeans.

TAB'ERAH (Heb. תַּבְּעָרָה, tab-ay-raw', burning), a place in the wilderness of Paran, so called from the fact that the fire of the Lord consumed the discontented of the children of Israel (Num. 11:3; Deut. 9:22).

TABERING (Heb. תַּבְּעָרָה, taw-faf', to drum), used for the smiting of timbrels (Psa. 68:25), but in Nah. 2:7 for smiting upon the breast, as an expression of violent agony in deep mourning (comp. Luke 18:13; 23:27). See GLOSSARY.

TABERNACLE. 1. O'-hel (Heb. אוֹהֶל, tent) and mish-kavn' (מִשְׁכָּן, residence) are both used of the Jewish tabernacle (q. v.), but the terms are found to be carefully discriminated. O'-hel denotes the cloth roof, while mish-kavn' is used for the wooden walls of the structure.

2. Soke (Heb. סֹכֶה, sook-kaw' (סֹכֶה), both from סָכַךְ, saw-kak', to entwine, are used to denote a hut, booth (Lev. 23:34; Psa. 76:2; Job 38:29; Isa. 4:6; Amos 9:11; Zech. 14:16).

3. Sik-kooth' (Heb. סִיכָּוֶת, used to denote an idolatrous booth which the worshipers of idols constructed in their honor, like the tabernacle of the covenant in honor of Jehovah (Amos 5:26).

4. The Greek words rendered "tabernacle" are;

(1) Skay-nay' (σκηνή), any habitation made of green boughs, skin, cloth, etc. (Matt. 17:4; Mark 9:5; Luke 9:33; John 7:2; Heb. 11:9, etc.). The "tabernacle of Molech" (Acts 7:43, comp. Amos 5:26) was a portable shrine, in which the image of the god was carried. (2) Skay'-no-mah (σκηνωμα), used of the tabernacle, etc.

Figurative. "The light shall be dark in his tabernacle" (Job 18:6), is a symbol of misfortune. When Job says, "The secret of God was upon my tabernacle" (29:4), he means that the blessed fellowship of God, confiding, unreserved intercourse, ruled over his tent. "Who shall abide in thy tabernacle?" (Psa. 15:1; comp. 27:5,) is to be on terms of peaceful communion with God, i. e., in the Church.

The term tabernacle is transferred to heaven, as the true dwelling place of God (Heb. 9:11; Rev. 13:6); used figuratively for the human body in which the soul dwells as in a tent, and which is taken down at death (2 Cor. 5:4). To spread one's tabernacle over others (Rev. 7:15, σκηνώσει ἐπ' αὐτοῦς, A. V. "dwell among") is to afford shelter and protection. The "tabernacle" (hut) of David seems to be employed in contempt of his house, i. e., family, reduced to decay and obscurity (Acts 15:16).

TABERNACLE OF ISRAEL. 1. Sources of Information. The fullest, most definite, as well as most reliable source of information respecting the tabernacle is the Bible, especially the passages in Exodus. Chapters 25-28 minutely prescribe the construction of the edifice and its furniture, while the parallel passage (chaps. 35-40) describes the execution of the task. We are also aided by the specifications of the temple of Solomon (1 Kings, ch. 6; 2 Chron., chaps. 3, 4), including that seen in vision by Ezekiel (chaps. 40-43), both of which temples were modeled, in all essential features, after the plan of the tabernacle. Outside the Scriptures the principal authority is Josephus, who, in his description of the earliest sacred buildings of the Jews (Ant., III, vi, 2-vii, 7), repeats substantially the statements of Scripture. The rabbinical writings of the Jews give us little information which could aid us in reconstructing the tabernacle. Of all the modern works on the sacred edifices of the Jews the most imposing and learned is Solomon's Temple; or, The Tabernacle; First Temple; House of the King, etc., by T. O. Paine, LL.D., a minister of the New Jerusalem Church (Boston, 1861; large 8vo).

2. Names and Synonyms. (1) Mish-kawn' (Heb. מִשְׁכָּן, from שָׁכַן, shaw-kan', to lie down), a dwelling. It connects itself with the Jewish, though not scriptural word Shechinah, as describing the dwelling place of the divine glory. It is not applied in prose to the common dwellings of men, but seems to belong rather to the speech of poetry (Psa. 76:2; Cant. 1:8). In its application to the tabernacle it denotes (a) the ten tricolored curtains; (b) the forty-eight planks supporting them; (c) the whole building, including the roof.

(2) O'-hel (Heb. אוֹהֶל, a tent) is more connected with the common life of men as the tent of the patriarchs (Gen. 9:21, etc.). For the most part, as needing something to raise it, it is used, when applied to the sacred tent, with some distinguishing epithet. In one passage only (1 Kings 1:39) does it appear with this meaning by itself. In its application to the tabernacle the term o'-hel means (a) the tent roof of goat's hair; (b) the whole building.

(3) Bah'-yith (Heb. בַּיִת, house) is applied to the tabernacle (Exod. 23:19; 34:26; Josh. 6:24; 9:23; Judg. 18:31; 20:18), as it had been, apparently, to the tents of the patriarchs (Gen. 33:17). So far as it differs from the two preceding words it conveys the idea of a fixed settled habitation; and was, therefore, more fitted to the tabernacle after the people were settled in Canaan than during their wanderings. Its chief interest to us lies in its having descended from the first word ever applied in the Old Testament to a local sanctuary, Beth-el, "the house of God" (Gen. 28:17), keeping its place, side by side, with other words—tent, tabernacle, palace, temple, synagogue—and at last outliving them all; rising in the Christian Ecclesia to yet higher uses (1 Tim. 3:15).

(4) Ko'-desh (Heb. קֹדֶשׁ, or mik-davsh' (Heb. מִקְדָּשׁ; Gr. ἁγίασμα, hag-ee'-as-mah, etc.), the holy, consecrated place (Exod. 25:8, A. V. "sanctuary"; Lev. 12:4); applied, according to the consecrated scale of holiness of which the tabernacle bore witness, sometimes to the whole structure (Lev. 4:6; Num. 3:38; 4:12, A. V. "sanctuary"), sometimes to the innermost sanctuary, the Holy of Holies (Lev. 16:2).

(5) Hay-kawl' (Heb. הַיְקוּל, a temple), as meaning the stately building or palace of Jehorah (1 Chron. 29:1, 19), is applied more commonly to the temple (2 Kings 24:13, etc.); but also used of the tabernacle at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:9; 3:3) and Jerusalem (Psa. 5:7).

(6) Two compound phrases are used in Scripture: (a) "The tabernacle of the congregation" (Exod. 29:42, 44), the A. V. rendering of אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד (o'-hel mo-ade'), literally the tabernacle of meeting, "where I will meet with thee" (v. 42; comp. 30:6, 36; Num. 17:4). (b) O'-hel haw-ay-dooth' (Heb. אֹהֶל הָעֵדוּת, A. V. "the tent of testimony," Num. 9:15; "the tabernacle of witness," 17:7; 18:2). In this case the tent derives its name from that which is the center of its holiness, i. e., the two tables of stone within the ark, which are emphatically the testimony (Exod. 25:16, 21; 31:18).

3. History. We find mention in the Old Testament of three tabernacles:

(1) The provisional tabernacle, which was established after the sin of the golden calf. There followed a transitional period, the whole future depending upon the penitence of the people. In this period a tent is pitched, probably that of Moses himself, outside the camp, and called the "tabernacle of the congregation," or "of meeting." Of this provisional tabernacle there was no ritual and no priesthood. The people went out to it as to an oracle (Exod. 33:7).

(2) The Sinaitic tabernacle, which was erected in accordance with directions given to Moses by Jehorah (see below).

(3) The Davidic tabernacle, erected by David in Jerusalem for the reception of the ark (2 Sam. 6:12); while the old tabernacle remained till the days of Solomon at Gibeon, together with the brazen altar, as the place where sacrifices were offered (1 Chron. 16:39; 2 Chron. 1:3).

Upon the intercession of Moses, Jehovah renewed his covenant with Israel, gave them another copy of the law, and invited them to make their offerings of material for the construction of the tabernacle. This they did in excess of what was wanted (Exod. 36:5, 6), and the work proceeded under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab (35:30; 36:2). The tabernacle was completed on the first day of the first month (Nisan) of the second year after the exode, and the ritual appointed for it begun (40:2). Instead of being placed without the camp, like the provisional tabernacle, it stood in its very center. The priests on the east, the other three families of the Levites on the other sides, were closest in attendance, the "body-guard" of the great King. In the wider square Judah, Zebulun, Issachar, were on the east; Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin, on the west; the less conspicuous tribes, Dan, Asher, Naphtali, on the north; Reuben, Simeon, Gad, on the south side. When the army put himself in order of march the position of the tabernacle, carried by the Levites, was still central, the tribes of the east and south in front, those of the north and west in the rear (Num., ch. 2).

In all special facts connected with the tabernacle the original thought reappears. It is the place where man meets with God.

As long as Canaan remained unconquered, and the people were still therefore an army, the tabernacle was probably moved from place to place, wherever the host of Israel was for the time encamped; and finally was placed at Shiloh (Josh. 9:27; 18:1). The reasons of the choice are not given. Partly, perhaps, its central position, partly its belonging to the powerful tribe of Ephraim, may have determined the preference.

It remained in Shiloh during the whole period of the Judges, the ark being taken from the building in the time of Eli (1 Sam. 4:4), and never returned. Perhaps the woodwork (the curtains, of course, having been often renewed) became un-serviceable; and Talmudic tradition speaks of a permanent stone structure, traces of which, it is thought, are still to be seen on the site of Shiloh (Conder, Tent Work in Palestine, i, 84).

Under Samuel's administration worship was transferred to Mizpeh (1 Sam. 7:6) and elsewhere (1 Sam. 9:12; 10:3; 20:6; Psa. 132:6). In David's day the showbread was kept at Nob (1 Sam. 21:1-6), implying the existence there of at least part of the sacred furniture of the tabernacle; and at the close of his reign "the high place that was at Gibeon" possessed some fragments of the original tabernacle, with its altar of burnt offering (1 Chron. 16:39; 21:29; comp. 1 Kings 3:4; 2 Chron. 1:3-6). This is the last mention of the edifice itself. Meanwhile David had set up a tent on Mount Zion, to which he finally transported the ark (1 Chron. 15:1; 16:1; 2 Sam. 6:17, A. V. "tabernacle"); which in turn was superseded by the temple (q. v.).

There is a tradition that the candlestick was thrown into the Tiber by Maxentius in the 4th century, at the time of his flight from the city; and hopes have been entertained of its possible future recovery, but with very little foundation. Gibbon asserts, on the other hand, that it was taken by the Vandals to Carthage; thence recovered and brought to Constantinople, and there carried in the triumph given to Belisarius on his return from Africa, A. D. 534; that it was afterward removed to Jerusalem, and there deposited in a Christian church. Jerusalem was taken and sacked by Chosroes II, of Persia, in 614; and nothing has been known of it since.

A striking Hebrew tradition exists as to the ark of the covenant: That it was taken by Jeremiah and secreted in a cavern (2 Macc. 2:4-8), at the time of the Babylonian capture of the city; and that its hiding place has never been found, and never will be, until Messiah shall set up his kingdom and restore the glory of Israel. There are other rabbinical tales of similar character, but not deserving of attention.

4. Structure. In Exodus (25:10-27:19) we have the prescribed order for the building of the tabernacle, beginning with the ark and proceeding outward, while in 36:8-38:31 we have a description of its construction, pursuing the reverse order; which order will be followed in this article. It is proper to state here that the cubit used in this article is that adopted by the late celebrated Egyptologist, Sir J. G. Wilkinson, viz., 20.625 inches. The common estimate for the cubit is eighteen inches. See SUPPLEMENT.

(1) The court was an inclosed space about the tabernacle one hundred cubits long by fifty cubits wide, or, in round numbers, one hundred and seventy-two feet by eighty-six feet. Inclosing this space was a peculiarly constructed fence. Its framework consisted of pillars of "shittim" (probably acacia) wood, five cubits, i. e., a little over eight and one half feet high (Exod. 27:18). They were, doubtless, round and of the same thickness throughout, probably about five inches. The bottom was held in place by a "socket," or plate of copper (A. V. "brass"), evidently laid flat upon the ground. The socket had a mortise, or hole, to receive the tenon which was in the bottom end of the pillar.

The pillars were kept upright by cords (Exod. 35:18) fastened to pins of copper (27:19) driven into the ground, both on the inside and the outside. The "fillets" were curtain rods hung upon hooks near the upper end of the pillars, and served as the top rail of a fence, to keep the pillars at a proper distance apart. The fillets were of shittim wood, covered with silver, while the hooks and the caps which protected the tops of the pillars were of the same metal (38:17, 19). Hooks were also placed at the bottom of the pillars, by which the lower edge of the curtain was fastened. The pillars, when set up and braced by the fillets and stay ropes, formed the complete framework of a fence. Upon this was hung sheets of "fine twined linen," probably like our duck, sewed end-wise together so as to form a continuous screen from the doorway all round the corners to the doorway again. This was five cubits wide, the same as the height of the pillars, but as the pillars rested upon sockets, the curtain would be kept off from the ground.

The hanging for "the gate of the court" was in the middle of the eastern end, and was "needle-work, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen" (Exod. 38:18), i. e., the warp was of bleached linen threads and the woof of alternate bars of wool dyed blue, purple, and scarlet. Its size was five cubits high by twenty cubits long. Entrance into the court was only effected by lifting this curtain at the bottom. In this court was the altar of burnt offering, which probably stood in the center of the front half of the space, about halfway between the entrance and the tabernacle. Midway between the altar and the tabernacle (30:18) stood the laver (q. v.). The tabernacle itself was situated at the front edge of the rear half of the inclosure, and being thirty cubits long and ten cubits wide, it would leave equal spaces (viz., ten cubits) behind it and on either side.

(2) The tabernacle. This was composed of two parts, the tabernacle proper (Heb. מִשְׁכָּן, mish-kahn) and the tent (אֹהֶל, o'-hel, A. V. "a covering upon the tabernacle," Exod. 26:7). The tabernacle proper consisted of planks (A. V. "boards") of the acacia (A. V. "shittim") wood, each ten cubits long by one and a half broad (26:16); their entire surface being plated with sheets of gold. Twenty of these formed each side wall (vers. 18, 20), each plank having two tenons at its foot to enter the socket. There were eight rear planks (v. 25), six of which were of the same dimensions as those on the side, thus making nine cubits. As the width of the tabernacle was probably the same as its height, viz., ten cubits, thus making of the Holy of Holies a perfect cube, this would leave one cubit of space to be filled by the two corner boards. There is nothing in the Hebrew to indicate the breadth of these two boards, and we assume that they were only one half cubit wide. If, now, the rear planks are placed within the side planks, so as to be flush with the end, each corner plank will rest on two sockets, and we have the sixteen sockets demanded. This will oblige us to count the rear socket of the sides, as is done with the posts of the courts. The meaning seems to be that as you look at each side forty sockets are seen, while if you look at the rear, sixteen are in view.

Dr. J. Strong (The Tabernacle of Israel) has devised a very ingenious corner board, on the supposition that the same amount of material was required for it as for the others. He divides the board into two sections, one being the breadth of one cubit plus the thickness of the plank; the other section he fastens to this at right angles so as to overlap the side plank. At least three objections may be urged against this arrangement: (a) The grooving of the rear plank which is on the side, in order to receive the bars, would not only mar but seriously impair the strength of the board. (b) Even with this groove the bar would be too thick to make so short a bend as to enter the rings of the corner board. (c) It throws the rear planks their thickness beyond the sides of the building, whereas the tent cover is only thirty cubits long, and could not thus cover the rearboards. Much discussion has been caused by the directions in Exod. 26:24 and 36:29 respecting the rear planks. Dr. Strong thinks it to be the joining of the two parts of the plank itself. Dr. Paine thinks it refers to fastening it with a ring to the end side plank, and uses a ring for that purpose. Dr. Keil thinks the ring to be that through which the rear bar passes, the corner planks having only one instead of two, as do the other planks. I venture the suggestion that the corner plank may have been "coupled" to the end side plank by dowels. These being on the edge of one and the face of the other would securely hold the rear plank, and not deface any visible portion of either plank; while the side planks would be kept in place by the strain of the tent covers.

In order to keep the planks in line, three series of bars were provided, made of acacia wood overlaid with gold, to pass through rings of gold on the outside of the planks (Exod. 26:26-29; 36:31-34). Of these five were on each side and five on the rear, the middle bar reaching from end to end, while the upper and lower ones were divided, their ends being fastened (as Josephus suggests) with dowels. They were probably of different lengths, to prevent the break being in the center.

The whole structure was, doubtless, stayed with cords, one end fastened to the copper knobs to which the tent cloth was attached, and the other end to copper pins driven into the ground. The planks were covered on the outside with a double blanket of skins, probably suspended from the knobs above mentioned, thus keeping the wind and dust from entering between the planks, and also protecting the gold sheeting. The inner blanket was of "badger skins" (Exod. 26:14; 36:19, R. V. "seals"), but may have been of the Angora goat. This was probably hung with the hair turned inward toward the planks, while the other blanket (of ram skins dyed red) was hung with the hair on the outside, to shed the rain.

(a) THE ROOF (Heb. אֹהֶל, o'-hel, tent) was made of goat's-hair canvas, i. e., camlet, such as is still used by the Arabs, being generally of a foxy black or brownish color (Cant. 1:5). It consisted of an inner covering and a fly. The material was woven in eleven pieces, each thirty cubits long by four wide (Exod. 26:7, sq.; 36:14, sq.), five of these pieces being joined so as to make the inner tent, and six forming the fly. As to the manner in which they were sewed together, see Figures a, b. This sixth breadth, being thirty cubits long, would allow itself to be double across the front and single across the rear of the tabernacle (26:9, 13). The lower edge of each sheet was buttoned over curtain knobs on the planks by means of fifty loops attached to their selvedge. The tent extended one cubit over the sides (vers. 10-13). The roof was sustained by posts, one of them being an extension of the central front doorpost, their heads probably rounded so as not to tear the roof canvas.

(b) THE DOOR OF THE TENT. The entrance to the tabernacle was closed with a screen like that of the court, supported by five pillars, covered with gold; their hooks were of gold, and their "fillets" (curtain rods) were covered with gold; while their sockets were of bronze (Exod. 26:36, 37; 36:37,

TABERNACLE OF ISRAEL

The Jewish Tabernacle. (From Model Constructed by Author.)

38). If these pillars are arranged so as to leave six spaces, each space will be a little over thirty-four inches wide. According to Dr. Paine, the curtain rods had rings in their ends, which slipped down over hooks in the tops of the posts and on the planks.

(c) THE WALL DRAPERY. Each of these consisted of five pieces of cloth woven of the same material as the door screen, four cubits wide and twenty cubits long. These pieces were sewed together at the ends, and hung by "loops" of blue cord to the gold knobs on the inside of the planks (Exod. 26:1-6; 36:8-13). An especial dignity was given to these side curtains, over that of the door screen, by their embroidery of "cherubim of cunning work" (26:1; 36:8), instead of the simple tracery on the latter. As will be seen, the hangings were each twice as long as the entire circuit of the three walls, therefore they must have been gathered into some manner of festoons. Drs. Strong and Paine place these cherubim upon the blue stripes, which were so extended by the loops as to appear as panels, one before each plank. Arguing from there being only fifty taches (curtain knobs), these scholars hang one curtain behind the other. We prefer to raise the knobs near to the top of the planks, and hang the curtains one above the other, which can be done by simply having the loops of one curtain longer than those of the other—as we hang two pictures from the same nail. It seems improbable that such rich and beautiful curtains would be hid, as the first plan suggests.

(d) THE VEIL (Heb. פֶּרֶזְיֹת, po-reh'-keth, a separation), particularly described in Exod. 26:31-33; 36:35, 36, was the screen between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies. It was of the same material as the door screen, but was embroidered with cherubim. Of these it is thought that there were two, their extended wings touching each other. The veil, like the other hangings, was suspended upon pillars, and, probably, "fillets" (curtain rods), though these latter are not mentioned. These pillars (and fillets) were covered with gold, the hooks were of gold, and the sockets of silver. For the veil four pillars were used, and as no one of them ran up to the peak, it did not, therefore, need to be in the center. The upper corners of the veil were fastened to the gold hooks in the planks. If we follow the proportions of the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place in the temple, we must suppose the latter in the tabernacle to have been square, and the former to have been twice as long as broad. This will fix the dividing line between the two rooms at two thirds of the width of the seventh plank from the rear, the presumption being that the pillars were wholly within the Most Holy Place.

5. FURNITURE. 1. THE ALTAR OF BURNT OFFERING (Heb. מִזְבֵּחַ הַחֹלֶבֶת, miz-bakh' har-o-lav', Exod. 30:28; brazen altar, מִזְבֵּחַ הַבְּרָזִית, miz-bakh' han-nekh-shelh', Exod. 39:39; table of the Lord, Mal. 1:7, 12) was placed in the court, between the entrance and the tabernacle. It was made strong and light for convenient transportation; a hollow box of acacia ("shittim") wood, five cubits square and three cubits high (Exod. 27:1-8), overlaid with sheets of copper (A. V.

"brass"). At each corner was a "horn," apparently a triangular extension of the sides at their junction. The altar had a grate (Heb. מַכְבַּר, mak-bawr', a netting) placed halfway between the top and bottom (v. 8). At each corner of the grate was a ring, through which were passed the copper-covered poles by which the altar was carried when on the march, like a handbarrow. Of course it was lined both inside and outside with copper to protect it from the heat. At the end of twenty years two hundred and fifty censers were flattened out and nailed on its sides, telling their awful story (Num. 16:17, 36-40) to the coming generations. The common censer in Egypt was a small, shallow, platelike vessel, about half a cubit in diameter. As the priests were not allowed to go up the altar by steps (Exod. 20:26), and as it would be too high to reach from the ground, the earth was, probably, raised about the altar so as to approach it by an incline.

The utensils for the altar (Exod. 27:3) made of copper were: ash pans; shovels for cleaning the altar; basins for receiving the blood to be sprinkled on the altar; flesh hooks, i. e., large forks, to handle the pieces of flesh; fire pans (Exod. 38:3; A. V. "censers," Num. 16:17); snuff dishes (Exod. 25:38). According to Lev. 6:13, the fire on this altar was never allowed to go out.

2. THE LAVER (Heb. כִּיֹּר, kee-yore', rounded, a basin) stood about midway between the altar and the tabernacle. It was the basin used by the officiating priests, and was made from the bronze mirrors of the women (Exod. 30:18; 38:8). It was probably round, of considerable size, with another and shallower basin beneath it, into which the water ran after being used, and in which the priests washed their feet. We have no Scripture information as to its size or shape. As no mention is made of a vessel in which was washed the parts of the victims offered in sacrifice, the laver was likely used for this purpose also. As washing in the East was always in running water, the laver was, doubtless, supplied with faucets from which the water would flow upon the object to be cleansed, whether the hands or feet of the priests or the parts of the sacrifice (see LAVER). In the sacred structure itself there were four articles of furniture, three in the Holy Place and one in the Holy of Holies.

3. THE TABLE OF SHOWBREAD (Heb. שֻׁלְחַן לֶחֶם פָּנִים, shoo-lekh-awn' lekh-em pan-neem', table of the face, i. e., of Jehovah). This was placed on the north or right side, and facing the candlestick (Exod. 40:22). It was made of acacia wood, two cubits long, one broad, and one and one half high. This proportion between the length and the height is accurately-maintained in the sculptured form on the Arch of Titus. The surface, or top of the table, rested on a frame, a handbreadth deep, while round it ran a "crown" or molding of gold, projecting above the top, to keep articles from slipping off the table. The legs were apparently mortised into the sides (as usual nowadays), with rings near each corner for the carrying staves (25:23-30; 37:10-16).

The bread placed upon the table (Heb. "face bread") was made of fine wheat flour (unleavened), baked in twelve loaves (cakes), each containing one fifth of an ephah of flour. These, according to Jewish traditions, as well as the dimensions of the table, would seem to have been placed upon plates in two piles of six each. They were renewed every Sabbath to be eaten by the priests exclusively (and that in the sanctuary only), and were then replaced by fresh loaves (1 Sam. 21:6), which had been prepared overnight by the Levites (1 Chron. 9:32). To each pile of loaves incense was added, probably placed in bowls beside the bread, "for a memorial, even an offering made by fire unto the Lord" (Lev. 24:5-9).

The utensils belonging to the table were: the dishes (Heb. כַּף־רוֹחַ, keh-aw-roth') for the showbread; bowls (Heb. כַּפַּיִם, kap-poth', A. V. "spoons") for the incense; jugs (A. V. "covers," Heb. כְּפֵי־מֵן, men-ak-keeth'), which, as they were used for making libations with (A. V. "to cover withal") were doubtless for wine, with a spout for pouring; and cups (Heb. כְּסֵי־זָוִת, kes-aw-oth'), all being of pure gold.

4. THE GOLDEN CANDLESTICK (Heb. מְנוֹרָה, men-o-raw') stood on the south or left side of the Holy Place, directly opposite the table of showbread (Exod. 40:24), the construction of which, except as to size, is minutely described (25:31-40; 37:17-24). The material of which it was made was pure gold, of which an entire talent was used for the candlestick and its vessels. The different parts were of "beaten work" (מִקְשָׁוֶה, mik-shaw'), hammered out of sheets. It consisted of a pedestal (רֶגֶל, yaw-rake'), elsewhere meaning the leg, or, rather, the part of the body from which the legs and feet spring; and the shaft (קֶנֶף, kaw-neh', reed or stalk), from which, probably, at equal distances from one another, there projected three branches on each side, and rising as high as the central shaft. The central shaft and the six branches terminated in sockets, into which the seven lamps were placed. The ornamentation of the candlestick, a very beautiful design, consisted of a "bowl" (Heb. גִּבְיָה, gheb-ee'-al), which was almond-shaped (i. e., the nut), tapering from a head. Above this was the "knop" (Heb. כְּפִתּוֹר, kaf-tore', chaplet or chapter), like the capital of a column, and under the intersection of the branches (25:35). Surmounting all was the "flower" (Heb. פְּתִיחַ, pek'-rakh, literally "blossom"), like a bud just ready to burst into bloom. There were four of these ornamental groupings on the main stem, one being placed at intervals at each of the three points where the branches diverged, the fourth being probably at the upper end, just under the lamp which was placed upon it. There were three of these groups on each branch, one under the lamp, and the two others, probably, placed equidistant from each other. This is our conception of the form of the candlestick, which is known to us chiefly by the passages in Exod. 25:31-40; 37:17-24, the light thrown thereon by the Jewish writers, and by the representation on the Arch of Titus at Rome.

Dimensions. The size of the candlestick is not given in the Bible description of it, and we are therefore left to conjecture. "Jewish tradition assigns it a height of about five feet and a breadth of about three and one half feet. On the Arch of Titus it measures two feet nine inches high by two feet broad; but the figures there delineated are not life-size, and the proportion with the table of showbread on the same sculpture, as well as with the men there exhibited, yields a size about the same as the above tradition. We may therefore fix the entire height, including the base, at about three cubits, and the entire breadth at about two cubits" (Strong, The Tabernacle, p. 44). Taking the doctor's estimate of a cubit at 20.67 inches, the dimensions would be about 62 x 41 inches. Bähr conjectures that its height was the same as the table of showbread, viz., one and one half cubits, and that the distance between the two extreme lamps was one and one half cubits also.

Finally came the lamps themselves (Heb. singular נֵר, neer), which were of the kind generally used in the East, but here of gold. These were placed, of course, upon the top of the main shaft, and the branches in sockets. Opinion generally places them on a horizontal line, although the instructions given in Exodus afford no information. The lamps were supplied with olive oil, pure (i. e., "prepared from olives which had been cleansed from leaves, twigs, dust, etc., before they were crushed"), beaten (i. e., "obtained not by crushing in oil presses, but by beating, when the oil which flows out by itself is of the finest quality and a white color") (K. and D., Com., on Exod. 27:20). It is likely that the plane of the lamps ran from east to west—thus the better lighting up of the Holy Place. The lamps were lighted at the time of the evening sacrifice (Exod. 30:8), and extinguished, trimmed, and filled at the time of the morning sacrifice (Exod. 30:7; 1 Sam. 3:3). They are traditionally believed to have held half a "log," i. e., a little more than a half pint.

The utensils belonging to the candlestick were the "tongs" and the snuff dishes (Exod. 25:38), made of the same gold as the candlestick itself. The "tongs" were used to pull up the wick and to hold the coal while blowing it to light the lamp. The "snuff dishes" were coal pans (Exod. 27:3; Lev. 16:12), used for bringing the live coals from the great altar.

5. THE ALTAR OF INCENSE (Heb. מִזְבֵּיחַ מִקְטָרֶת, miz-bay'-akh mik-tar' ket-o'-reth) occupied the middle space near to and in front of the inner veil (Exod. 30:1-6; 37:25-28; 40:5; Lev. 16:18). It was, however, reckoned as belonging to the Most Holy Place (1 Kings 6:22; Heb. 9:4), apparently on account of its great sanctity. In construction it was a simple box of acacia wood, two cubits high, one cubit wide, and one cubit broad, with a top, and horns like the large altar, the whole being covered with gold. It had no grate, because the fire did not come directly in contact with it. It had a molding around the edge and rings to carry it, and staves. No utensils belonged especially to it. Upon this altar neither burnt offerings nor meat offerings were allowed to be offered, nor drink offerings to be poured, but it was used exclusively to burn incense upon morning and evening.

6. THE ARK. (a) Names. It was called the ark of the covenant (Heb. אָרוֹן בְּרִית, aw-ron' ber-eeth', Num. 10:33) or ark of the testimony (Heb. אָרוֹן הַעֵדוּת, aw-ron' hav-ay-dooth', Exod. 25:22, etc.), from the law which was kept therein. (b) Construction, contents, etc. The ark was made of acacia wood ("shittim") two and one half cubits long, one and one half cubits broad, and one and one half cubits high (external dimensions), and plated inside and out with pure gold. Running round each side was a gold border (A. V. "crown"), extending above the top of the ark, so as to keep the lid from moving.

This lid was called the "mercy seat" (Exod. 25:20 22; Heb. כַּפ־פֹּרֶת, kap-po'-reth, a covering), of the same size as the ark itself, and made of acacia wood covered with gold. The ark was transported by means of two gold-covered poles, run through two gold rings on each side, from which they were not to be drawn (25:15) unless it might be necessary to remove them in order to cover the ark when the tabernacle was removed (Num. 4:6).

Upon the lid, or mercy seat, or at the ends of the ark, as in the TEMPLE (q. v.), were placed the CHERUBIM (q. v.), probably figures beaten out of gold as was the candlestick. In shape they were probably human, with the exception of their wings, though some authorities think they were of the same complex form as the cherubim mentioned by Ezekiel (1:5-14). They were no doubt the normal or full height of a man, and are always spoken of as maintaining an upright position (2 Chron. 3:13). They stood facing each other, looking down upon the mercy seat, with their wings forward in a brooding attitude (Exod. 25:20; comp. Deut. 32:11). The golden censer, with which the high priest once a year entered the Most Holy Place, was doubtless set upon this lid.

Between the cherubim was the Shechinah (Heb. שְׁכִינָה, shek-ee-naw', residence), the cloud in which Jehovah appeared above the mercy seat (Exod. 25:22; comp. Lev. 16:2). It was not the cloud of incense (Lev. 16:13), but the manifest appearance of the divine glory. Because Jehovah manifested his essential presence in this cloud, not only could no unclean and sinful man go before the mercy seat, i. e., approach the holiness of the all-holy God, but even the anointed high priest, if he went before it at his own pleasure, or without the expiatory blood of sacrifice, would expose himself to certain death.

The contents of the ark were: the two tables of stone, on which Jehovah wrote the Ten Commandments, or rather those prepared by Moses from the original, broken by him when he heard of Israel's idolatry (Exod. 31:18-34:29; Deut. 9:10-10:4); the autograph copy of the law, written by Moses (Deut. 31:26), presumed to be the Pentateuch in full, and thought to be the same as was afterward discovered in the time of Josiah (2 Kings 22:8), but which must, in the meanwhile, have been removed, together with all the contents, for in the days of Solomon the ark contained the two tables only (1 Kings 8:9). The other contents of the ark were a golden pot of miraculously preserved manna (Exod. 16:33, 34), and "Aaron's rod that budded" (Heb. 9:4; comp. Num. 17:10).

6. Care of the Tabernacle. The following are the directions as to the care of the tabernacle and its furniture (Num. 4:4-33; 7:3-9; 10:17, 21): "The service" (v. 4) signifies military service, and is used here with special reference to the services of the Levites as the sacred militia of Jehovah. The following were the duties of the Kohathite Levites: When the tabernacle was to be taken down for removal the priests took down the veil and covered the ark of testimony with it; over this they put a covering of "badgers' skins," and finally a "cloth wholly of blue." Removing the dishes from the table of showbread, they spread over it a cloth of blue, then replaced the dishes and spread upon them a cloth of scarlet, and finally a covering of "badgers' skins." The candlestick, with its lamps, snuffers, and extinguishers, was then covered with a cloth of blue, over which was placed a covering of badgers' skins. The altar of incense was covered with a cloth of blue and badgers' skins, and then all other "instruments of ministry" in the sanctuary were wrapped in blue and badgers' skins and placed upon a "bar," i. e., a bier made of two poles with cross-pieces. After this the great altar was cleansed from the ashes, covered with a purple cloth, the altar utensils packed in it, and then covered with badgers' skins. When all this preparation was completed the Kohathites came forward to bear the furniture away. The only thing not mentioned as prepared by the priests was the laver, probably because it was carried without any covering.

To the care and carrying by the Gershonites were assigned the tapestry of the tabernacle, viz., the inner covering, the tent of goats' hair, the two outside coverings of the planks, the entrance curtain, the veil, the hangings of the court and its entrance curtain, with all the cords and the various implements used in said work. Thus their office was to perform whatever was usually done with these portions of the sanctuary, especially in setting up or taking down the tabernacle (Num. 3:25-4:33).

The charge of the Merarites was: the planks of the tabernacle with the bars, the pillars and their sockets (both of the sacred building and its court), and their pins and cords. That is, they were to take them down, carry them on the march, and to fix them when the tabernacle was set up again (Num. 3:36, 37; 4:31, 32). See LEVITES.

7. Symbolism of Tabernacle and Furniture. 1. THE DESIGN of the tabernacle is thus stated, "Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them" (Exod. 25:8). This sanctuary is accordingly styled the tent of meeting (Heb. אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד) between Jehovah and his people; for God said to Moses, "This shall be a continual burnt offering throughout your generations, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, before the Lord: where I will meet you, to speak with you there" (29:42); "and I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will be their God" (v. 45, sq.). In accordance with this promise the glory of Jehovah filled the tabernacle, but that presence was manifested to the people in the pillar of cloud and fire above the sacred structure (Exod. 40:34-38; Num. 9:15-23); and Jehovah continued to commune regularly with Moses from above the mercy seat (Lev. 1:1; Num. 1:1; 7:89; comp. Exod. 25:22). This dwelling on the part of God in the midst of Israel was the realization of his covenant which he made with his people, "I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God" (Exod. 6:7; comp. 19:5, sq.). "Accordingly the dwelling place reared within the tabernacle was a sign and pledge, not merely of the special, active presence of God in and among Israel, but eo ipso of God's rule over them as well, as is clearly indicated in the following: 'I will establish my covenant with you . . . and set up my tabernacle (dwelling place) among you: and my soul shall not abhor you. And I will walk among you, and will be your God, and ye shall be my people' (Lev. 26:9, 11, sq.). . . . As God's people Israel was not merely to have their God in their midst dwelling among them, but they were also to have the privilege of approaching him, of enjoying the protecting and blissful, the pardoning, sanctifying, and glorifying presence and fellowship of their God" (Keil, Bib. Arch., i, 125, 126).

2. THE STRUCTURE. Built at the time of Israel's journeyings, the tabernacle assumed the form of a tent, as indicating that God shared with their cares and sorrows. The tent for Jehovah was made of acacia wood, the only kind to be obtained in the Arabian desert for such a purpose (thus precluding any symbolical significance to the supposed choice of this species of wood), and the curtains that hung over the walls (planks) gave to it its tentlike appearance. This tent was surrounded by a court, so that the tabernacle was made up of two leading divisions, the court and the dwelling place. The latter, as already stated, was Jehovah's dwelling place in the midst of his people (Exod. 23:19; Josh. 6:24; 1 Sam. 1:7, 24, etc.), the palace of the divine King (1 Sam. 1:9; 3:3; Psa. 5:7; 27:4, 6), the seat of royalty in his kingdom, where he vouchsafed to his people evidences of his presence among them. The court was the place where Israel, isolated from all the nations of the earth, assembled before Jehovah, presented to him gifts and sacrifices with the view of obtaining from him mercy, well-being, and life. The dwelling place was divided into two parts: the Holy Place, where the priests, as the consecrated representatives of the people, were allowed to approach God with sacrifice; and the Holy of Holies, in which Jehovah was present sitting on his throne.

3. SHAPE, COLORS, etc. A certain significance seems to attach to the fundamental shape of the structure of both tabernacle and court; also to the numerical principle on which every detail was carried out, as well as to the colors employed (see COLOR, NUMBER). The whole structure rested upon a basis of metals; the pillars of the court and of the entrance to the tabernacle being set upon copper (A. V. "brass") plates, while those of the boards of the tabernacle, and the pillars that supported the veil between the Holy Place and Holy of Holies, were of silver. The copper plates were thought to represent the earthly side of the kingdom of God, though the silver capitals on its pillars pointed to the ethical purity and sanctity of this portion of the tabernacle. "Then again, the silver pedestals of the boards and pillars belonging to the dwelling place served to show that that part of the structure was founded upon purity and holiness." Ark, mercy seat, cherubim, the very walls, were all overlaid with gold, the noblest of all metals, the symbol of light and purity, sunlight itself as it were, fixed and embodied, the token of the incorruptible, of the glory of a great King. Various interpretations are given as to the symbolical meaning of the different colors employed. Dr. Keil thinks that "the white color of the byssus, of which the curtains round the court were made, serve to indicate that the tent was to be used as a sanctuary, while the four colors that are blended together, both in the curtain over the entrance of the court and in the veils and hangings of the dwelling place, denoted that the sanctuary was to be regarded as a representation of the kingdom of God. . . . As decorations of the sanctuary, those colors represented certain characteristics of the kingdom of God; the hyacinth (A. V. 'blue'), e. g., its heavenly origin and character; the purple, its royal glory; while crimson, as being the color of blood and fresh life, and white, as being that of holiness, served to indicate that the dwelling place of the divine king was a place of holiness and life" (Bib. Arch., i, 129, 130). Dr. Strong (Tabernacle of Israel) says: "Foremost among the true colors of the tabernacle was what in common parlance may be called 'blue,' but was in reality a mixture of indigo blue with deep red. So was also the next color (they are always named in the same order), the difference being that in the former the blue predominated, in the latter the red. . . . Blue, especially of the warm violet shade, is eminently characteristic of heaven (the cerulean sky, with a reddish tinge prevalent in the Orient), and hence interpreters, as by common consent, have not failed to recognize the symbolism here. . . . The Tyrian purple of antiquity was universally accepted as the emblem of royalty. . . . It is, therefore, so appropriate to the mansion and servitors of the supreme King that we need not dwell upon it. . . . The remaining shade of red (crimson) can only point to blood, . . . everywhere in Scripture designating the life principle of man and beast (Gen. 9:4-6), and the essential element of atonement."

4. FURNITURE. The design and meaning of the court culminated in the altar of burnt offering; and all the gifts with which Israel approached Jehovah were intended for it. Upon it they were completely or partially consumed; and in them the people were regarded as consecrating themselves to God as his peculiar possession. "The heart of the altar, in accordance with the general regulation (Exod. 20:24), was of earth or unhewn stones which had something of the character of earth about them; but as soon as this nucleus of earth had been inclosed within its framework of wood, overlaid with plates of brass (bronze), it assumed the important character of an article of furniture for use in the sanctuary, a divinely appointed center where Jehovah was pleased to establish a memorial to his name, where he was pleased to come near to his people Israel and bless them. Though in reality a mere elevation or mound of earth, it was, in virtue of a divine appointment, transformed into a place of sacrifice, where Israel, in presenting its oblations, lifted itself up toward the Lord that it might participate in his mercy and grace" (Keil, Bib. Arch., i, 140). The horns of an animal were the symbol of power, strength, and vitality, and in like manner the significance of the altar, as the place where the divine power and strength, the divine grace and blessing were manifested, culminated in the horns (comp. 1 Sam. 2:10; Dan. 7:24; 8:3-9; Rev. 17:12). For this reason the blood of the atoning sacrifices was sprinkled upon the horns as well, and they were laid hold of by anyone having committed an accidental homicide, with the view of securing himself against the avenger of blood.

The laver was for the priests to wash the hands and feet in an entering the holy place or approaching the altar to minister, so that they might not die (Exod. 30:19-21). Such washing was a symbol of sanctification; and it is only he who is inwardly pure that is fitted to serve God in his kingdom, fitted to serve as a mediator between sinful people and a holy God.

"The table of showbread derived its significance from the 'bread of the presence, that was placed upon it,' a symbol of the spiritual food which the people of Israel were called upon to labor for (John 6:27; comp. 4:32, 34), as a figure of the faithful accomplishment of the spiritual life task assigned them by God, . . . the fruit of their spiritual labors in the kingdom of God, i. e., of their sanctification by means of their good works" (Keil).

The candlestick was not without its symbolism, for oil (q. v.) is made use of in the Old and New Testaments as a symbol of the Spirit of God; and it is expressly stated (Rev. 1:20) that the seven candlesticks which John saw before the throne of God mean the seven churches, as representing the new kingdom of God, the Christian Church. The candlestick would seem to teach that the Old Testament Church was to receive divine direction from Jehovah, and in turn to be the light of the world (Matt. 5:14; Luke 12:35; Phil. 2:15).

The altar of incense was no less significant. The cloud of fragrant smoke was the natural, almost the universal, emblem of the heart's adoration (Psa. 141:2), and was a symbol of the fact that the prayers of believers are acceptable and pleasing to God (Psa. 141:2; Rev. 5:8; 8:3). Indeed the offering of incense had the force and significance of a sacrifice, in keeping with the idea of prayer being a sacrifice of the lips (Hos. 14:2; comp. Psa. 119:108). Upon that altar no "strange fire" was to be kindled. When fresh fire was needed it was to be taken from the altar of burnt offering in the outer court (Lev. 9:24; 10:1).

The ark, as containing "the testimony," was of extraordinary significance. The Decalogue not only expressed the divine will, but also bore testimony to those divine attributes under which Jehovah reveals himself, his essence and being, in and to Israel. "It is not merely what Jehovah requires of his people Israel as their covenant God, but it is, at the same time, what he is and desires to be for Israel." Thus as early as Deut. 9:9, 11, 15, the word "covenant" is substituted for "testimony" as being synonymous with it. While the tables of the law bore testimony to the truth that the God of the covenant was a "jealous God" (Exod. 20:5, sq.), we find that the mercy seat, regarded as God's throne, taught that grace and mercy were also conspicuous attributes of the God of Israel in dealing with his people. His gracious presence was manifested in a cloud, because his glory is so great that no mortal could look upon its naked splendor, and his holiness so overwhelming that no sinful man could stand before it.

Proceeding upon the very natural theory that the tabernacle represented the dwelling of God, as the divine King, among his people, Dr. J. Strong (The Tabernacle, p. 93) thus summarizes its symbolism: "In a general way it is obvious that the entire mansion and precincts are set forth as the residence of Jehovah in the style of an oriental king, and that this was his special home among his chosen people. The successive door screens kept out all intruders, and the furniture was such as suited his royal state and convenience. In the courtyard were performed the culinary offices of the establishment, the food was cooked (as it were) on the brazen altar, and the washing was done at the laver. The Holy Place represented the reception room, where the official business was transacted; and here the night-long lamp denoted the ceaseless vigilance and activity of the heavenly King. The table of showbread was his board, furnished with the three principal articles of oriental subsistence, bread, oil, and wine; and the altar of incense was the place appointed for the reception of homage and petitions from his subjects. The interior apartment was his secret chamber for his own private counsels and retirement." Still further, it may not be out of place to suggest that the pillar of cloud represented the royal standard, showing the presence of the King in his mansion, and guiding his people in their journeyings.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF. See FESTIVALS.

TABITHA (Gr. Ταβιθά, tab-ee-thah', gazelle, i. e., beauty), a benevolent Christian widow of Joppa whom Peter restored to life (Acts 9:36-42). She was probably a Hellenistic Jewess, known to the Greeks by the name Dorcas (Δορκάς), and to the Hebrews by the Syriac equivalent. It is not certain, however, that Tabitha bore both names; Luke may have translated the name for the benefit of his Gentile readers, and used its definition thereafter for their convenience. The Greeks used Dorcas, i. e., "female gazelle," as a term of endearment for their women. Soon after Peter had miraculously cured the palsied Æneas in Lydda the church at Joppa was bereaved by the death of Tabitha. They at once sent for the apostle, whether merely to receive his Christian consolation or in the hope that he could restore their friend to life, does not appear. A touching picture is given of the widows who stood "weeping, and showing the coats and garments which Dorcas had made." Peter "put them all forth," prayed, and commanded the lifeless woman to arise. She opened her eyes, arose, and by the apostle was presented to her friends. The facts, which became widely known, produced a profound impression in Joppa, and occasioned many conversions (9:42).

TABLE. 1. May-sab' (Heb. מַיִסַּב, a divan, i. e., a company of persons seated round about a room (Cant. 1:12, A. V. "at table").

2. Shool-khawn' (Heb. שׁוּלְחָן), extended, spread out, especially a table as spread with food, viands (Judg. 1:7; 1 Sam. 20:29, 34; 1 Kings 2:7, etc.). As to the form of tables among the Hebrews little is known; but, as among other orientals, they were probably not high. They were doubtless, among the ancient Israelites, similar to those of modern Arabs, a piece of skin or leather, a mat, or a linen cloth spread upon the ground. Hence the fitness of the name something spread, and the figurative expression, "Let their table become a snare before them" (Psa. 69:22), i. e., let their feet become entangled in it, as it is spread on the ground. See GLOSSARY.

3. An-ak-i'-mahee (Gr. ἀνακειμαι), to lie at table (John 13:28) on the divan.

4. Klee'-nay (Gr. κλινη, a bed), a couch to recline on at meals (Mark 7:4).

Roman Triclinium.

5. Trap-ed-zah (Gr. τράπεζα), a table on which food is placed (Matt. 15:27; Mark 7:28; Luke 16:21; 22:21, 30); the table of showbread (Heb. 9:2); the table or stand of a money changer, where he sits, exchanging different kinds of money for a fee, and paying back with interest loans or deposits (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:15).

Figurative. "The table of the Lord is contemptible" (Mal. 1:7; comp. v. 12), is what the prophets charge the priests with representing. The table of Jehovah is the altar, and they made it contemptible by offering upon it bad, blemished animals, which were unfit for sacrifices. "They shall speak lies at one table" (Dan. 11:27), is a figure of feigned friendship. Eating, especially in the presence of enemies (Psa. 23:5; comp. Isa. 21:5), denotes a sense of security. In 1 Cor. 10:21, "Ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils," brings into sharp contrast the holy communion and the sacrifices offered to heathen deities. Paul seems to make the real existences answering to the heathen conception of these gods to be demons.

6. Loo'-akh (Heb. לִיָּח or לִיָּח, glistening), a tablet whether of polished stone or wood (Exod. 27:8, etc., A. V. "board"), or for writing on (Isa. 30:8; Hab. 2:2; Prov. 3:3).

7. Pin-ak-id'-ee-on (Gr. πινακίδιον, Luke 1:63) and plax (Gr. πλάξ, flat), the former a small writing tablet, the latter meaning the same as No. 1 (2 Cor. 3:3).

TABLE OF SHOWBREAD. See TABERNACLE.

TABLE OF THE LORD is a phrase used to designate the table or altar of the Christian Church, and evidently taken from 1 Cor. 10:21. In the Old Testament the words table (q. v.) and altar appear to have been applied indifferently to the same thing (Ezek. 41:22).

TABLES OF THE LAW (Heb. טוֹרַת הַבְּרִית, loo-koth'eh'-ben, Exod. 24:12; 31:18), also called "tables of the covenant" (Deut. 9:9, 15), or "of the testimony" (Exod. 31:18) were given to Moses on Mount Sinai, having the Ten Commandments written by the finger of God.

TABLET, the inaccurate rendering in the A. V. of:

1. Koo-mawz' (Heb. כִּימָז, jewel), probably gold drops like beads worn around the neck or arm by the Israelites in the desert (Exod. 35:22; Num. 31:50).

2. Bot-tay' han-neh'-jesh (Heb. בֹּתַי הַנְּחֵשֶׁת, houses of the breath, i. e., perfume bottles, Isa. 3:20). See GLOSSARY.

TA'BOR. 1. Mount (Heb. תְּבוֹר, tau-bore'), now called Jebel et Tur; a conical and quite symmetrical mound of limestone, on the northeastern part of the plain of Esdraelon. It is about six miles east of Nazareth. The northern slope is covered with oak trees and syringa. It rises to the height of one thousand three hundred and fifty feet above the plain, which itself is four hundred feet above the Mediterranean Sea. The ascent is usually made on the west side, near the little village of Debúrieh, probably the ancient Daberrath (Josh. 19:12). Tabor is named (19:22) as a boundary between Issachar and Zebulun. Barak, at the command of Deborah, gathered his forces on Tabor, and descended thence with "ten thousand men" into the plain, conquering Sisera on the banks of the Kishon (Judg. 4:6-15). Here the brothers of Gideon were slain by Zebah and Zalmunna (8:18, 19); and some think Tabor is intended when it is said (Deut. 33:19) of Issachar and Zebulun that "they shall call the people unto the mountain: there they shall offer the sacrifices of righteousness." Dr. Robinson says the prospect from it is the finest in Palestine. Lord Nugent says he cannot recollect ever to have seen from any natural height a more splendid sight. In the time of Christ the summit is said to have been crowned by a fortified town, the ruins of which are present there now (1 Chron. 6:77). It is difficult to see how such a scene as that of Christ's transfiguration could have taken place there, and the New Testament clearly points to some part of Hermon as the place.

2. The City. Tabor is mentioned in the lists of 1 Chron., ch. 6, as a city of the Merarite Levites, in the tribe of Zebulun (v. 77). The list of the towns of Zebulun (Josh., ch. 19) contains the name of Chisloth-tabor (v. 12). It is therefore possible either that Chisloth-tabor is abbreviated into Tabor by the chronicler, or that by the time these later lists were compiled the Merarites had established themselves on the sacred mountain, and that Tabor is Mount Tabor.

3. The Plain, or Oak, is mentioned (1 Sam. 10:3) as one of the points in the homeward journey of Saul after his anointing by Samuel. The that sat in the seat," chief among David's captains (2 Sam. 23:8), is in 1 Chron. 11:11 called "Jashobeam, an Hachmonite," or, as the margin gives it, "son of Hachmoni." Kennicott has shown that the words translated "he that sat in the seat" are a corruption of Jashobeam, and that "the Tachmonite" is a corruption of the "son of Hachmoni," which was the family or local name of Jashobeam. Therefore he concludes "Jashobeam the Hachmonite" to have been the true reading.

TACKLING (Heb. חֶבֶל, khel'-bel, Isa. 33:23 ;

place is nowhere else mentioned, and nothing further can be determined concerning it than that it stood by the road leading from Rachel's tomb to Gibeah.

TABRET. See MUSIC, p. 765; GLOSSARY.

TAB'RIMMON, TAB'RIMON (Heb. טַבְרִימון, tab-rim-mone', pleasing to Rinmon), the father of Ben-hadad I, king of Syria in the reign of Asa (1 Kings 15:18), B. C. before 918.

TACHE, one of the knobs upon which were hung the curtains of the tabernacle (q. v.). See GLOSSARY.

TACHMONITE, THE (Heb. תַּחְמוֹנִי, takh-kem-o-nee', probably sugacious), "the Tachmonite Gr. σκαυή, skyoo-ay', Acts 27:19) represents the spars, ropes, chains, etc., of a ship (q. v.).

TADMOR (Heb. תַּדְמוֹר, tad-more', palm), a city built by Solomon in the wilderness (2 Chron. 8:4; R. V. "Tamar"), and the parallel passage (1 Kings 9:18) adds "in the land," indicating the land on the southern border of Palestine (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28). The Greeks and Romans call the city Palmyra. It was one hundred and seventy-six miles from Damascus, and the center of vast commercial traffic as well as a military station. Its grandeur is attested by its magnificent ruins. Presuming that Tadmor is the same as Palmyra, the following facts may properly be mentioned. The first author of antiquity who mentions Palmyra is Pflny the Elder. Later, Appian writes of it in connection with a design of Mark Antony to allow his cavalry to plunder it. In the 2d century A. D. it seems to have been beautified by the emperor Hadrian. It became a Roman colony under Caracalla (211-217 A. D.), and received the jus Italicum. In the reign of Gallienus the Roman Senate invested Odenathus, a senator of Palmyra, with the regal dignity, on account of his services in defeating Sapor, king of Persia. Upon his assassination his widow, Zenobia, wished to make of Palmyra an independent monarchy, and for a while successfully resisted the Roman arms; but was defeated and taken prisoner by the emperor Aurelian (A. D. 273), who left a Roman garrison in Palmyra. This garrison was massacred in a revolt, for which Aurelian punished the city so severely that it never recovered from the blow.

TAHAN (Heb. תַּחַן, takh'-an, camp).

1. The head of one of the families of the tribe of Ephraim at the end of the exode (Num. 26:35), B. C. before 1171.

2. Apparently the son of Telah and the father of Laadan, in the genealogy of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:25), B. C. after 1171.

TAHANITES (Heb. תַּחַנִּי, takh-an-ee'), the descendants (Num. 26:35) of TAHAN, 1 (q. v.).

TAHAP'ANES. See TAHAPANES.

TAHATH (Heb. תַּחַת, takh'-ath, station).

1. A Kohathite Levite, son of Assir and father of Uriel, or Zephaniah, in the ancestry of Samuel and Heman (1 Chron. 6:24, 37).

2. An Ephraimite, son of Bered and father of Eladah (1 Chron. 7:20), B. C. after 1171. Perhaps identical with TAHAN, 1 (q. v.).

3. Apparently the grandson of the foregoing, being registered as son of Eladah and father of Zabad (1 Chron. 7:20), B. C. after 1171.

4. The name of a desert station between Makheleth and Tarah (Num. 33:26); not identified.

TAHPANES (Heb. תַּחְפָּנִים, takh-pan-khac', Jer. 2:16, marg.; 43:7, 8, 9; 44:1; 46:14), TAHAP'ANES (Heb. תַּחְפָּנִים, takh-pen-ace', Jer. 2:16), or TEHAPH'NEHES (Heb. תַּחְפָּנִים, tekh-af-nekh-ace', Ezek. 30:18), an important city in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jeremiah (ch. 39) and Josephus (Ant., x, 9, 1) tell us that Nebuchadnezzar had taken Jerusalem, made Zedekiah captive, burned the city, and carried away most of the inhabitants to Babylon. A feeble remnant of Judah gathered under Johanan and fled to Tahpanhes, in Egypt. In this party were "the king's daughters," Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch, his amanuensis (compare other passages above). Here stood a house of Pharaoh, respecting which the command came to Jeremiah, "Take great stones in thine hand, and hide them in the clay in the brickkiln, which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the men of Judah; and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will send and take Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, my servant, and will set his throne upon these stones that I have hid; and he shall spread his royal pavilion over them," etc. (Jer. 43:8-10).

That this prediction became history, and that the Babylonian king did twice invade Egypt and conquered it, is no longer doubted.

The site of Tahpanhes was found by Dr. Flinders Petrie, in 1886, "who seems to have found the very house of Pharaoh-hopra. He has laid bare 'an area of continuous brickwork, resting on sand about one hundred and sixty feet by sixty feet, facing the eastern entrance to what seem royal buildings.' Mr. Petrie further says, 'It is curious how exactly this answers the biblical description of the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes.' Mr. Petrie dug into this square platform and found there some 'unbewn stones,' but without inscriptions. He was surprised on inquiry to learn that the mound from which these stones are exhumed is called by the Arabs to this day, 'Kasr el hint el Yahudi' (the Castle of the Jews' Daughters). Mr. Petrie calls this mound a tower. It was about one hundred and fifty feet high. It was square and contained many stories. The basement had certainly been used for a kitchen. In one room were stones for grinding corn, dishes, jars, and iron rods, the spits used for roasting meat. Several objects found contained the name of Uahabra" (Mariette Bey, Monuments of Upper Egypt, pp. 309, sq.).

TAHPENES (Heb. תַּחְפָּנִים, takh-pen-ace'), an Egyptian wife of the Pharaoh who received Hadad, the Edomite prince, when he fled from his father's desolated capital (1 Kings 11:18-20), B. C. about 940. The sister of Tahpenes was given to Hadad in marriage, and their son, Genubath, was "weaned" by the queen herself, and brought up "in Pharaoh's household among the sons of Pharaoh." At that time Egypt was divided into perhaps three monarchies. Psausennes, of the Tanitic line, has been conjectured to have been the husband of this Tahpenes, brother-in-law of Hadad and father-in-law of Solomon; but there has been no name found among those of that period bearing any resemblance to Tahpenes.

TAHRE'A (Heb. תַּחְרֵא, takh-ray'-ah, cunning, or flight), a great-grandson of Jonathan, and on of the four sons of Micah (1 Chron. 9:41), B. C. after 1037. In the parallel passage (8:35) he is called TAREA (q. v.).

TAHTIM-HOD'SHI, THE LAND OF (Heb. תַּחְתִּים חֹדְשִׁים, takh-teem' khod-shee', perhaps the land of the newly inhabited), one of the places visited by Joab during his census of the land of Israel. It occurs between Gilead and Dan-jaan (2 Sam. 24:6). The name has puzzled all the interpreters, but is thought by some to mean "the Hittites of Kadesh." Mr. Porter says, "It was manifestly a section of the upper valley of the Jordan, probably that now called Ard el-Huleh, lying deep down at the western base of Hermon."

TALE. See GLOSSARY.

TALENT, the greatest weight of the Hebrews. See METROLOGY, p. 712.

TALITHA CUMI, two Syriac words (Mark 5:41; Gr. ταλιθα κουμι, tal-ee-thah' koo'-me') signifying "Damsel, arise."

TALMAI (Heb. תַּלְמַי, tal-mak'ec, furrowed).

1. One of the gigantic sons of Anak who dwelt in Hebron (Num. 13:22). They were expelled from their stronghold by Caleb (Josh. 15:14) and killed by the men of Judah (Judg. 1:10), B. C. about 1145. There is a tall race, of light complexion, figured on the Egyptian monuments, and called in the hieroglyphic inscriptions Tanmahu, who have been supposed to represent the descendants of this man. "The interchange of the liquid l for n, so constant in all languages," makes plausible the conjecture that this is the Egyptian rendering of Talmal.

2. The son of Ammihud, and king of Geshur, a small kingdom in the northeast of Bashan (2 Sam. 8:3; 13:37; 1 Chron. 3:2). His daughter, Maacah, was one of David's wives and mother of Absalom, B. C. before 1000.

TALMON (Heb. תַּלְמוֹן, tal-mone', oppressor), the head of a family of doorkeepers in the temple, "the porters for the camps of the sons of Levi" (1 Chron. 9:17; Neh. 11:19). Some of his descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45), and were employed in their hereditary office in the days of Nehemiah and Ezra (Neh. 12:25).

TAMAH (Heb. תַּמָּח, tel'-makh, derivation uncertain). The children of Tamah were among the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:55), B. C. before 536. In Ezra (2:53) the name is Anglicized Thamah.

TAMAR (Heb. תַּמָּר, taw-mawr', a palm tree, sometimes Thamar).

1. The wife of Er, the son of Judah, and, after his death, of his brother Onan. The sudden death of his two sons so soon after their marriage with Tamar made Judah hesitate to give her the third also, thinking, very likely, according to a superstition (Tobit 2:7, sq.), that either she herself or marriage with her had been the cause of their deaths. He therefore sent her to her father, with the promise that he would give her his youngest son as soon as he was grown up, though he never intended to do so. Desirous of retaining the family inheritance and name through children, Tamar waited until satisfied that Shelah was not to be given to her as a husband, and then determined to procure children from Judah himself, who had become a widower. She ensnared him by pretending to be one of those women who were consecrated to the impure rites of Canaanitish worship. He gave her pledges, which she produced some three months after, when she was accused of unchastity and sentenced to death by Judah. He acknowledged his own guilt, and the provocation he had furnished her to do wrong. Tamar's life was spared, and she became the mother of the twins Pharez and Zarah (Gen. 38:6-30; Thamar, Matt. 1:3), B. C. about 2000.

2. A daughter of David by Maachah, as is evident from her being the full sister of Absalom (2 Sam. 13:1; comp. 3:3). Amnon, the eldest son of David by Ahinoam (3:2), conceived a passion for Tamar because of her beauty, and, being unable to gratify his desire, he quite pined away. Jonadab noticed his condition, and, learning its cause, suggested to him the means of accomplishing his wicked purpose. He feigned illness, and begged his father, who visited him, to allow his sister to come to his house and prepare food for which he had a fancy. She came and prepared some cakes, probably in an outer room; but Amnon refused to eat, and, ordering all his attendants to retire, he called her into his chamber, and there accomplished his infamous purpose. Amnon's love gave way to brutal hatred, and he ordered her to leave his apartments. Tamar remonstrated, telling him that this wrong would be greater than that already done her. The meaning of this seems to be that by being thus sent away it would inevitably be supposed that she had been guilty of some shameful conduct herself. Her brother would not listen to her, but ordered one of the attendants to put her out and bolt the door after her. Notwithstanding she wore the dress of a princess, a garment with sleeves (A. V. "of divers colors"), Amnon's servant treated her as a common woman, and turned her out of the house. Then Tamar put ashes upon her head, rent her royal dress, laid her hand upon her head, and ran crying through the streets. She shortly encountered Absalom, who took her to his house, where she remained in a state of widowhood. David failed to punish the crime of his firstborn, but she was avenged two years afterward by Absalom (2 Sam. 13:1-32; 1 Chron. 3:9), B. C. about 980.

3. Daughter of Absalom (2 Sam. 14:27). She ultimately, by her marriage with Uriel of Gibeath, became the mother of Maachah, the future queen of Judah, or wife of Abijah (1 Kings 15:2).

4. A place in the southern border of Palestine, supposed to be Thamara, a day's journey on the road from Hebron to Aelam (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28)

TAMARISK. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

TAMMUZ (Heb. תַּמְזָר, tam-mooz'). Ezekiel, after representing the elders of Israel as secretly carrying on their idolatrous worship, says that he "brought me to the gate of the Lord's house which was toward the north; and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz" (Ezek. 8:14). No satisfactory etymology of the word has been proposed. The LXX., the Targum of Jonathan Ben-Uzziel, the Peshito Syriac, and the Arabic in Walton's Polyglot, merely reproduce the Hebrew word. The Vulgate alone gives Adonis as a modern equivalent, and this rendering has been eagerly adopted by subsequent commentators, with but few exceptions. It is at least as old, therefore, as Jerome, and the fact of his having adopted it shows that it must have embodied the most credible tradition. Cyril of Alexandria and Theodoret give the same explanation, and are followed by the author of the Chronicon Paschale. Adonis, according to the legend, was slain in the month of June, and restored to life again. An annual festival was kept in his honor, at which he was lamented by women as though he were dead, and then afterward celebrated in songs as having come to life again. Sayce (High. Crit. and Mon., p. 101) gives the fragment of an old Accado-Sumerian hymn, descriptive of a garden, one verse of which reads:

[In] the midst of it was the god Tammuz.

TAN'ACH (Josh. 21:25), a slight variation of TAA'NACH (q. v.).

TAN'HUMETH (Heb. תַּנְחֻמֶת, tan-khoo'-meth, consolation), the father of SERALAH (q. v.) in the time of Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:23), B. C. 588. In this passage he appears as a Netophathite by the clerical omission of another name, as is evident from the parallel passage (Jer. 40:8).

TANNER. See LEATHER, WORKERS IN, p. 450.

TAP'HATH (Heb. תַּפְחָת, taw-fath', ornament), the daughter of Solomon, who married Ben-abinadab, who was commissary for the region of Dor (1 Kings 4:11), B. C. after 960.

TAP'PUAH (Heb. תַּפְּוּאָה, tap-poo'-akh, an apple).

1. The second named of the four sons of Hebron, of the lineage of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:43), B. C. before 1170.

2. A city of Judah, in the Shephelah, or lowland (Josh. 15:34), about twelve miles W. of Jerusalem; the modern village of Beit-Tirza in Wady Ahmed, north of Beit-Jala.

TARE'A (Heb. תַּרְעָא, tah-ar-ay'-ah), son of Micah, in the lineage of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:35; "Tahrea" in 9:41).

TARES. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

TARGET (Heb. קִרְדֹּן, kee-dohn'), a spear (1 Sam. 17:6), as usually rendered; אֲרֶבֶת, tsin-naw' (1 Kings 10:16; 2 Chron. 9:15; 14:8), a large shield, as usually rendered. See GLOSSARY.

TAR'PELITES (Heb. תַּרְפְּלִיטַיִם, tar-pel-aw-yay', only Ezra 4:9), one of the peoples settled in the cities of Samaria, and remaining there in the days of Artaxerxes. Some have compared the Median Tapuri (Tapuroi) of Ptolemy, the Tapyri (Τάπυροι) of Strabo; others the Tarpetes (Ταρπητες) of Strabo, who dwelt near the Palus Mæotis, or Sea of Azof. This latter location seems too far off. The Speaker's Commentary proposes Tubal, the classic Tibareni, on the coast of Pontus, which is also at some distance. In reality nothing is known.—W. H.

TAR'SHISH (Heb. תַּרְשִׁישׁ, tar-sheesh', subdued).

1. Second son of Javan, and grandson of Japheth (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chron. 1:7).

2. The sixth named of the seven sons of Bilhan, the grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:10; A. V. "Tharshish").

3. One of the seven princes of Persia in the time of King Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:14), B. C. about 519.

4. A city and emporium of the Phœnicians in the south of Spain. It was probably Tartessus. "It formed the western limit of the Mediterranean, and stood not far from the modern Gibraltar. From early times it had been visited by Phœnicians, and the ships that traded to it were known as the 'ships of Tarshish.' So numerous were they that the name became synonymous with trading ships generally, whatever might be their destination. A merchantman could be termed a 'ship of Tarshish,' even though its voyages were in the Indian seas" (Sayce, High. Crit., p. 130).

probably the same with the royal city of the Canaanites (12:17), conquered by the Israelites.

3. A town in the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. 16:8), near Manasseh, in which latter territory probably lay the "land of Tappuah" (17:8). It probably contained a fine spring, and hence called EN-TAP-PUAH (q. v.). Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 351) locates it at the present village of 'Atuf, which is disputed by Keil (Com.).

TARAH (Heb. תֵּרַח, teh'-rakh, stopping, station), one of the halting places of Israel, between Tahath and Mithcah (Num. 33:27, 28).

TAR'ALAH (Heb. תַּרְאֵלָה, tar-al-aw', a reeling), a town in the western section of the territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:27), perhaps identical with

With three exceptions in the Book of Chronicles, the following are references to all the passages in the Old Testament in which the word "Tarshish" occurs: Jonah 1:3; 4:2; Gen. 10:4; 1 Chron. 1:7; Isa. 2:16; 23:1, 6, 10, 14; 60:9; 66:19; Jer. 10:9; Ezek. 27:12, 25; 38:13; 1 Kings 10:22; 22:48; Psa. 48:7; 72:10. While none of these passages furnishes direct proof that Tarshish and Tartessus were the same cities, yet several circumstances render the identity highly probable. With respect to the passages in Chronicles (2 Chron. 9:21; 20:36, 37), they would seem to indicate that there was a Tarshish accessible from the Red Sea. The suggestion of Dr. Sayce above agrees with that of Dr. Keil (Com.) that "ships going to Tarshish" should read "Tarshish-built ships," i. e., built for a long voyage. It was to this city that Jonah shipped when he wished to avoid going on his God-given mission to Nineveh (Jonah 1:3).

TAR'SUS (Gr. Tapós, tar-sos), the capital of Cilicia, and the birthplace and early residence of the apostle Paul (Acts 9:11; 21:39; 22:3). The passages 9:30 and 11:25 give the limits of his residence in his native town, which succeeded the first visit to Jerusalem and preceded his active ministry at Antioch and elsewhere (comp. Acts 22:21; Gal. 1:21). It was during this period, probably, that he planted the Gospel there, and it has never since entirely died out. It would seem that Paul was there also at the beginning of his second and third missionary journeys (Acts 15:41; 18:23).

Tarsus was situated in a wide and fertile plain on the banks of the Cydnus, which flowed through it; hence it is sometimes called Tapool, tar-soy', in the plural. The city was founded by Sardana-palus, king of Assyria, although the Greeks claimed a share in its colonization. It appears first in authentic history in Xenophon's time, when it was a city of considerable importance. It was occupied by Cyrus and his troops for twenty days, and given over to plunder.

After Alexander's conquests had swept this way, and the Seleucid kingdom was established at Antioch, Tarsus usually belonged to that kingdom, though for a time it was under the Ptolemies. In the civil wars of Rome it took Caesar's side, and on the occasion of a visit from him had its name changed to Juliopolis. Augustus made it a "free city." It was renowned as a place of education under the early Roman emperors. Strabo compares it in this respect to Athens and Alexandria. Tarsus also was a place of much commerce.

"It is probable, but not certain, that Paul's family had been planted in Tarsus with full rights as part of a colony settled there by one of the Seleucid kings in order to strengthen their hold on the city. . . . The Seleucid kings seem to have had a preference for Jewish colonists in their foundations in Asia Minor" (Ramsay, Paul the Traveler, p. 32).

TAR'TAK. See GODS, FALSE.

TAR'TAN (Heb. תַּרְטָן, tar-tawn', foreign derivation), the name, apparently, of a general sent by Sennacherib, king of Assyria, to reduce the Philistine city of Ashdod (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 20:3). Recent discoveries make it probable that in Tartan, as in Rab-saris and Rab-shakeh, we have not a proper name at all, but a title or official designation, like Pharaoh or Surena. The Assyrian Tarlan is a general, or commander-in-chief.

TASKMASTERS (Heb. טַרְסִים, saw-ray mis-seem', masters of burdens, Exod. 1:11; טַרְסִים, nau-gas', to drive, 3:7; 5:6-14), persons appointed by order of Pharaoh to see that the Hebrews were assigned hard, wearing toil. It was his hope, by such oppression, to break down the physical strength of Israel and thus lessen its increase; and also to crush their spirit so as to banish the very wish for liberty. So Israel was compelled to build provision or magazine cities, i. e., cities for storing the harvests.

TAT'NAI (Heb. תַּתְנַי, tat-ten-ah'ee, perhaps gift), a Persian governor of Samaria when Zerubbabel began to rebuild Jerusalem. He seems to have been appealed to by the Samaritans to oppose that undertaking, and, accompanied by another high official, Shethar-boznai, went to Jerusalem. They sent a fair and temperate report of what they saw and heard to the supreme government, suggesting that search be instituted to learn whether the building was going on in accordance with a royal decree (Ezra 5:3, 6). The statement of the Jews being verified by the discovery of the original decree of Cyrus, Tatnai and his colleagues applied themselves with vigor to the execution of the royal commands (6:6, 13), B. C. 536-519.

TATTLER (Gr. φλυαρος, floo'-ar-os, from φλυω, to throw up bubbles, 1 Tim. 5:13), a person uttering or doing silly things, garrulous, babbling.

TAVERN. See INN.

TAX (Hebrew some form of אֶרֶץ, av-rak', to arrange, to value).

1. In Early Times. From the very beginning of the Mosaic polity provision was made for a national income. Taxes, like all other things in that polity, had a religious origin and import. While Israel was in the migratory state, only such incidental taxes were levied, or, rather, such voluntary contributions were received as the exigencies of the time required. Only when the nation became settled in Palestine did taxation assume a regular and organized form.

2. Under the Judges. Under the theocratic government, provided for by the law, the payments obligatory upon the people as of permanent obligation were: the tithes (q. v.), the first fruits (q. v.), the redemption money of the firstborn (q. v.), and such other offerings as belonged to special occasions.

3. Under the Monarchy. The kingdom, with its centralized government and greater magnificence, involved, of course, a larger expenditure, and, therefore, a heavier taxation. The chief burdens appear to have been: (1) A tithe of the produce both of the soil and of live stock (1 Sam. 8:15, 17); (2) forced military service for a month every year (1 Sam. 8:12; 1 Kings 9:22; 1 Chron. 27:1); (3) gifts to the king (1 Sam. 10:27; 16:20; 17:18); (4) import duties (1 Kings 10:15); (5) the monopoly of certain branches of commerce (1 Kings 9:28; 22:48; 10:28, 29); (6) the appropriation to the king's use of the early crop of hay (Amos 7:1).

At times, too, in the history of both the kingdoms there were special burdens. A tribute of fifty shekels a head had to be paid by Menahem to the Assyrian king (2 Kings 15:20), and under his successor, Hoshea, this assumed the form of an annual tribute (17:4).

4. Under the Persians. The financial system of Darius Hystaspis provided for the payment by each satrap of a fixed sum as the tribute due from his province. In Judea, as in other provinces, the inhabitants had to provide in kind for the maintenance of the governor's household, besides a money payment of forty shekels a day (Neh. 5:14, 15). A formal enumeration is given in Ezra 4:13; 7:24, of the three great branches of the revenue: (a) The mid-daw' (Heb. מִדְּדָוּ), fixed, measured payments, probably direct taxation; (b) the bel-o' (בֵּלֹו), the excise or octroi, on articles of consumption; (c) the hal-awk' (חַלְאֻקָּה), probably the toll payable at bridges, forts, or certain stations on the highroad. The influence of Ezra secured for the whole ecclesiastical order, from the priests down to the Nethinim, an immunity from all three (Ezra 7:24); but the burden pressed heavily upon the great body of the people.

5. Under Egypt and Syria the taxes imposed upon the Jews became still heavier, the "farming" system of finance being adopted in its worst form. The taxes were put up at auction; and the contract sum for those of Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria has been estimated at about eight thousand talents. A man would bid double that sum, and would then force from the province a handsome profit for himself.

6. Roman Taxation. "The Roman taxation, which bore upon Israel with such crushing weight, was systematic, cruel, relentless, and utterly regardless. In general, the provinces of the Roman empire, and what of Palestine belonged to them, were subject to two great taxes—poll tax (or, rather, income tax) and ground tax. All property and income that fell not under the ground tax was subject to poll tax, which amounted for Syria and Cilicia to one per cent. The poll tax was really twofold, consisting of income tax and head money, the latter, of course, the same in all cases, and levied on all persons (bond or free) up to the age of sixty-five—women being liable from the age of twelve, and men from that of fourteen. Landed property was subject to a tax of one tenth of all grain and one fifth of the wine and fruit grown, partly in product and partly commuted into money. Besides these, there was tax and duty on all imports and exports, levied on the great public highways and in the seaports. Then there was bridge money and road money, and duty on all that was bought and sold in the towns. . . . The Romans had a peculiar way of levying these taxes—not directly, but indirectly—which kept the treasury quite safe, whatever harm it might inflict upon the taxpayer, while at the same time it threw upon him the whole cost of the collection. Senators and magistrates were prohibited from engaging in business or trade; but the highest order, the equestrian, was largely composed of great capitalists. These Roman knights formed joint stock companies, which bought at public auction the revenues of a province at a fixed price, generally for five years. The board had its chairman, or magister, and its offices at Rome. These were the real publicans (q. v.), who underlet the certificate of the taxes" (Eder-sheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 53, sq.).

TAXING (Gr. ἀπογραφή, ap-og-raf-ay', Luke 2:2; Acts 5:37), an enrollment (or registration) in the public records of persons, together with their property and income, as the basis of an ap-ot-im'-ay-sis (ἀποτίμις), census, or valuation, i. e., that it might appear how much tax should be levied upon each one. Another form of the same Greek verb (ἀπογράφειν) is used in Heb. 12:23, "To the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written" (R. V. "enrolled"). The English word conveys to us more distinctly the notion of a tax or tribute actually levied, but it appears to have been used in the 16th century for the simple assessment of a subsidy upon the property of a given county, or the registration of the people for the purpose of a poll tax. The word ἀπογραφή by itself leaves the question, whether the returns made were of population or property, undetermined. In either case "census" would have seemed the most natural Latin equivalent. Two distinct registrations, or taxings, are mentioned in the New Testament, both of them by St. Luke. The first is said to have been the result of an edict of the emperor Augustus, that "all the world [i. e., the Roman empire] should be taxed" (Luke 2:1), and is connected by the evangelist with the name of Cyrenius, or Quirinius. The second, and more important (Acts 5:37), is distinctly associated, in point of time, with the revolt of Judas of Galilee. The account of Josephus brings together the two names which St. Luke keeps distinct, with an interval of several years between them. For further information respecting the enrollment, see CHRONOLOGY, p. 206.

TEACH (Heb. properly יָרַדָּה, law-mad', but many other words also; Gr. διδάσκει, did-as'-ko, and other terms). Inasmuch as men are delivered from the bondage of sin, and builded up in righteousness through the agency of the truth, teaching becomes essential. Moses and Aaron were teachers of Israel in the statutes of Jehovah (Exod. 18:20; Lev. 10:11; 14:57), having been first taught of God (Exod. 4:12). Moses commanded fathers to teach their children the commandments of God with persistency and care (Deut. 4:9, 10, 14; 11:19). The priests were to continue to instruct the people, especially by reading the law to them at the Feast of Tabernacles, in the seventh year (24:8; 31:9-13). It is frequently recorded of Jesus that he "taught" the people (Matt. 5:2; Mark 1:21; 4:2; Luke 4:15, 31, etc.).

Teaching is an important branch of the commission which Christ gave to his apostles before his ascension. "Go," said he, "teach all nations;" as recorded by another evangelist, "Preach the Gospel to every creature." In this way they were to make disciples, as the Gr. μαθητεύειν (math-ay-tyoos'-at-eh) imports. It is one of the precious promises of the new covenant that all its subjects shall be "taught of the Lord" (Isa. 54:13; quoted by Jesus, John 6:45).

"Teachers" are mentioned as among divine gifts (Eph. 4:11), i. e., those who undertook in the religious assemblies of Christians to teach, with the special assistance of the Holy Spirit (comp. 1 Cor. 13:28, sq.; Acts 13:1; James 3:1). If anyone was accepted as a teacher in this sense, he was the more dangerous, as he would seem to be inspired in his utterances (2:1).

TEARS. See MOURN.

TE'BAH (Heb. תְּבַח, tel'-bakh, slaughter), the first named of the four sons of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24).

TEBALI'AH (Heb. תְּבַלְיָהוּ, teb-al-yaw'-hoo, Jah has purified), the third named of the sons of Hosah, "of the children of Merari" (1 Chron. 26:11).

TE'BETH (Heb. תְּבֵת, tay'-bell), the tenth month of the sacred year of the Hebrews (Esth. 2:16), corresponding in the main to January.

TEHAPH'NEHES (Ezek. 30:18). See TAPHANES.

TEHIN'NAH (Heb. תְּחִינָה, tekh-in-naw', graciousness), a name occurring in the genealogy of the men of Rechah, of the tribe of Judah. He is mentioned as a son of Eshton, and founder of the city of Nahash (1 Chron. 4:12).

TEEL TREE (Isa. 6:13). See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

TE'KEL (Heb. תְּקֵל, tek-ale', weighed), the second word in the sentence of the Babylonian king (Dan. 5:26, 27). The interpretation presents the double meaning, "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found too light," i. e., deficient in moral worth.

TEKO'A, TEKO'AH (Heb. תְּקוֹא, tek-o'-ah, pitching of tents, perhaps trumpet clang), a town in Judah, about six miles S. of Bethlehem, and on the range of hills which rise near Hebron and stretch toward the Dead Sea. By the "wilderness of Tekoa" (2 Chron. 20:20) must be understood the adjacent region east of the town. Tekoa is now called Tekū'a, and is a ruined site, showing many Hebrew traces. We first meet with Tekoah in the account (2 Sam. 14:2, sq.) of Joab employing a "wise woman" residing there to effect a reconciliation between David and Absalom. Here, also, Ira, the son of Ikkesh, one of David's thirty "mighty men," was born, and was called on that account "the Tekoite" (23:26). Tekoa was one of the places fortified by Rehoboam at the beginning of his reign, to prevent an invasion from the south (2 Chron. 11:6). People from Tekoa took part in building the walls of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:5, 27). Jeremiah exclaims (6:1), "Blow the trumpet in Tekoa, and set up a sign in Beth-haccerem," both signals of warning of an enemy's approach. Tekoa was also the birthplace of Amos (Amos 1:1), and he was here called to be a prophet of God.

TEKOTTE (Heb. with article תְּתִיקוֹתַי, hat-tek-o-ee'), an inhabitant of TEKOA (q. v.).

TEL-A'BIB (Heb. תֵּל אַבִּיב, tale av-beeb', hill of corn), the residence of Ezekiel on the river Chebar (Ezek. 3:15). It doubtless derived its name from the fertility of the valley, rich in grain, by which it was surrounded.

TE'LAH (Heb. תֵּלַח, teh'-lakh, breach), son of Rephah (or Resheph), and father of Tahan, in the lineage between Ephraim and Joshua (1 Chron. 7:25), B. C. before 1210.

TELA'IM (Heb. תְּלַעִים, tel-aw-ee'm', young lambs), probably the same as TELEM (q. v.), the place where Saul gathered his army to fight Amalek (1 Sam. 16:4).

TELAS'SAR, or THELA'SAR (Heb. תְּלַסְסָר, tel-as-sar', the hill of Asshur), a city which lay in the hill country of the upper Mesopotamian plain, thirty miles from Sinjar, identified by some as Tel Afer. It is mentioned in 2 Kings 19:12 (A. V. "Thelassar") and in Isa. 37:12 as a city inhabited by "the children of Eden," which had been conquered and was held in the time of Sennacherib by the Assyrians.

TE'LEM (Heb. תְּלָם, teh'-lem, oppression).

1. One of the temple porters who put away his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:24), B. C. 456.

2. A town in the southern border of Judah (Josh. 15:24), where it is mentioned between Ziph and Bealoth. It is very probably the same as TELAIM (q. v.).

TEL-HAR'ESHA (Neh. 7:61). See TELHARSA.

TEL-HAR'SA (Heb. תֵּל חַרְשָׁיָה, tale khar-show', mound of workmanship), one of the Babylonian towns from which some Jews, who "could not show their father's house, nor their seed, whether they were of Israel," returned to Judea with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61, A. V. "Tel-haresha"). It was probably in the low country near the sea, in the neighborhood of Tel-melah and Cherub.

TELL. See GLOSSARY.

TEL-ME'LAH (Heb. תֵּל מְלַח, tale meh'-lakh, hill of salt), called in 1 Esdr. 5:36 "Thermeleth"), a place probably near the Persian Gulf, and from which the Jews returned (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

TE'MA (Heb. תַּימָא, tay-maw', desert, or south), the ninth son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:30); whence the tribe called after him, mentioned in Job 6:19; Jer. 25:23; and also the land occupied by this tribe (Isa. 21:14). The name is identified satisfactorily with Teyma, a small town on the confines of Syria, between it and Wadi-el-Kurá, on the road of the Damascus pilgrim caravan.

TE'MAN (Heb. תַּימָנָה, tay-mawn', the south, or right).

1. The eldest son of Eliphaz, the son of Esau (Gen. 36:11; 1 Chron. 1:36). He was a duke (or prince) of the Edomites (Gen. 36:15, 42; 1 Chron. 1:36, 53), and gave his name to the region in which the tribe he founded settled (Gen. 36:34), B. C. after 2000.

2. The country of the Temanites, the southern portion of Idumæa. In after ages it was the chief stronghold of Idumæa; hence when the Lord, by the prophet Ezekiel, pronounced the doom of Edom, he said, "I will make it desolate from Teman" (25:13). The Temanites were celebrated for their courage and wisdom (Jer. 49:7); hence the force and point of Obadiah's judgment, "Thy mighty men, O Teman, shall be dismayed!" (v. 9.) In Hab. 3:3 Teman is used for Idumæa generally.

TEMANI (Gen. 36:34), or TEMANITE (Heb. תִּמְנִי, tay-maw-nee'), a descendant of TEMAN (q. v.) or an inhabitant of that land (1 Chron. 1:46; Job 2:11, sq.).

TEMENI (Heb. תִּמְנִי, tay-men-nee', fortunate), the third son of Ashur, "father" (founder) of Tekoa, by his wife Naarah (1 Chron. 4:6), B. C. about 1170.

TEMPER. See GLOSSARY.

TEMPERANCE. 1. Eng-krat'-i-ah (Gr. ἐγκράτεια), self-control; the virtue of one who masters his desires and passions, especially his sensual appetites (Acts 24:25; Gal. 5:23; 2 Pet. 1:6, where it is named as one of the Christian graces). In 1 Cor. 9:25 the verbal form is used, and is rendered "is temperate," i. e., exhibits self-government.

2. So'-frone (Gr. σώφρων, Tit. 2:2) has the meaning of sound mind (R. V. "sober-minded"). See GLOSSARY.

TEMPLE, a building set apart for the worship of a deity. In this article attention is specially called to the three buildings at Jerusalem which successively bore the name of temple. As these were all built upon the same site, and after the same general pattern, they were in nature and design the same, viz., that of the one built by Solomon. This latter was, in its essential features, a reproduction of the tabernacle, in more lasting material, and the necessary adjuncts of a permanent building.

1. Name. The usual and appropriate Hebrew term for temple is תֵּבֵדִיב (hay-kavol', capacity, a large building, a palace), and frequently allied with יְהוָה (Jehovah). Occasionally it is also qualified by קֹדֶשׁ (ko'-desh, sanctuary), to designate its sacredness. Sometimes the simpler phrase, בַּיִת יְהוָה (bayth yeh-ho-vaw', house of Jehovah), is used.

The Greek terms employed are ναός (nah-os', shrine) and ἱερόν (hee-er-on', a sacred place).

2. The Temple of Solomon. (1) The inception. The idea that the tabernacle, a temporary building, should be supplanted by a permanent one of stone, seems to have been suggested to David by the Spirit (1 Chron. 28:12, 19), especially after he had secured peace by conquest of his enemies (2 Sam. 7:1-12; 1 Chron. 17:1-14; 28:1, sq.); but he was forbidden to build for the reason which he stated to Solomon, "The word of the Lord came to me, saying, Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars: thou shalt not build an house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight" (1 Chron. 22:8). He, however, collected much material for the building (22:2-5), and made arrangements to have the task completed by his son Solomon. The latter was a man of peace, and his reign a period of prosperity and peace (2 Sam. 7:9-13; 1 Kings 5:3, 4; 1 Chron. 22:7-10).

(2) Preparation. Solomon, as soon as he found himself securely seated upon the throne, made arrangements for beginning to build the temple (1 Chron., chaps. 22, 28, 29). He entered into a treaty with Hiram, king of Tyre, stipulating that this monarch should permit him to get cedar and cypress wood and blocks of stone from Lebanon; and that he would allow workmen sent by Solomon to fell the wood and quarry and hew the stones, under the direction of skilled workmen, subjects of Hiram. In return Solomon was to send supplies of wheat, oil, and wine. It was also arranged that Solomon was to have the services of a skillful artist of the name of Huram, to take charge of the castings and of the manufacture of the more valuable furnishings of the temple (1 Kings 5:15, sq.; 2 Chron., ch. 2). So, in the fourth year of his reign, Solomon began the erection of the sacred edifice, which was built on Mount Moriah to the east of Zion, an eminence which David himself selected for the purpose when he built an altar upon it after the plague had ceased (1 Chron. 21:18, sq.; 22:1). To secure an adequate site for the temple and its courts, an area of at least four hundred cubits by two hundred being required, the summit of the hill had to be leveled and the superficies enlarged by means of substructions built on the sides. The edifice was completed in the eleventh year of Solomon's reign, i. e., in seven and a half years (B. C. 949).

(3) The structure. The temple proper was a building formed of hewn stones, sixty cubits long, twenty wide, and thirty in height (measuring from the inside), and covered with a flat roof composed of rafters and boards of cedar, overlaid with marble. Josephus (Ant., viii, 3, 2) says, "The temple was sixty cubits high and sixty cubits in length, and the breadth was twenty cubits; above this was another story of equal dimensions, so that the height of the whole structure was one hundred and twenty cubits." Josephus probably gave the external dimensions, while in the Book of Kings the internal measurements are given. In the inside the building was divided by means of a partition of cedar wood into the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place, so that the former was forty cubits long, twenty wide, and thirty high; while the latter was a cube measuring twenty cubits in each direction, the other ten cubits going to form "upper chambers" (2 Chron. 3:9). On the inside the walls were lined with wood, so as to cover the stones; the walls and roof being covered with cedar, and the floor with planks of "fir" (cypress wood). The side walls were covered over with carved work, representing cherubim, palms, garlands, and opening flowers (1 Kings 6:18; 2 Chron. 3:5), overlaying them all with thin plates of gold. The floor as well as the walls and ceilings were covered with gold (1 Kings 6:30).

The entrance to the Holy of Holies consisted of a folding door in the partition wall, four cubits wide, made of olive wood, and ornamented with overlaid carvings of cherubim, palms, and opening flowers. These doors, as well as those at the entrance of the Holy Place, were hung on hinges of gold (1 Kings 7:50). These doors stood open, but a veil was hung over it, similar in material and ornamentation to that in the tabernacle. The entrance to the Holy Place consisted of a folding door of cypress wood with doorposts of olive, each one being divided into an upper and lower section (like the Dutch doors), and ornamented in the same manner as the door of the Holy of Holies.

In the front of the building was a porch twenty cubits wide and ten cubits deep (1 Kings 6:3; outer portion of the porch, their names being Jachin (Heb. יָכִין, yaw-keen', he will establish) and Boaz (Heb. בּוֹאֵז, bo'-az, perhaps alacrity). These pillars were hollow, of bronze (probably wrought), each eighteen cubits high and twelve in circumference, surmounted by capitals five cubits high.

These capitals were ornamented with two rows of pomegranates, with network between the rows, and their upper part terminating in representations of the stalks, leaves, and flowers of the lily (1 Kings 7:15-22; 2 Chron. 4:12, sq.). Thus the height of the pillars including the capitals would be twenty-three cubits, which may also be assumed as the height of the porch. On the sides and rear of the building wings were added, each three stories high, containing rooms for storing furniture and stores required for the temple service. These wings were so constructed that the rafters of the different stories rested upon projections on the outside of the walls of the main building, so as to avoid inserting them in the walls themselves (1 Kings 6:5, sq.). Each story was five cubits high, and five, six, and seven cubits wide, respectively, and they were communicated with by means of passages and stairs (6:8).

(4) The courts. There was an inner court (1 Kings 6:36) running round the temple and reserved exclusively for the priests. It was formed by an outer or boundary wall, composed of

2 Chron. 3:4). There would seem to be an error in the text (2 Chron. 3:4) as to the height of the "porch;" for a front one hundred and twenty cubits high to a house only thirty cubits high could not be called אֹרְלוֹם (oo-lawm', a porch); it would only have been a מִגְדָּל (mig-dawl', a tower). Two bronze (A. V. "brass") pillars supported the three layers of hewn stone and a "row of cedar beams," probably laid upon the stones to protect the masonry. Outside of this was the "great court" (2 Chron. 4:9), intended for the use of the people, and probably inclosed with masonry. Access to it was by doors of bronze (A. V. "brass"). From the fact that the court of the priests (inner) is called "the higher court" (Jer. 36:10), it is likely that it was on a higher level than the outer court; and it is not unlikely that the temple itself was higher than the inner court, so that the whole would have a terraced aspect. So far as can be gathered from subsequent statements of an incidental nature (2 Kings 23:11; Jer. 35:4; 38:10; Ezek., ch. 8, etc.), it would appear that there were vestibules and porticoes at the gates of the outer court, and that, if we may judge from the pattern of the temple (1 Chron. 18:12) at all the four sides, probably in the corners and on both sides of the gate, as the temple of Ezekiel's vision would seem to show. The measurement of the courts is not given, but following the analogy of the tabernacle (comp. Ezek. 40:27) we may venture to assume that the court of the priests was one hundred cubits, and the same in breadth, measuring it on the east or front side of the temple; thus making the entire measurement one hundred cubits wide by two hundred in length. We will then have for the outer court an area of at least four hundred cubits long and two hundred cubits wide.

(5) The furniture. In the Holy of Holies was placed the ark, with its mercy seat, which was taken from the tabernacle. It stood between two cherubim, which were ten cubits high, made of olive wood and overlaid with gold. Their wings were outstretched, about five cubits long, touching each other over the ark, while the outer wings touched the side walls of the apartment (1 Kings 6:23-28; 2 Chron. 3:10-13). They stood upon their feet and faced "inward," i. e., toward the Holy Place (2 Chron. 3:13).

In the Holy Place were the altar of incense, or "golden altar" (1 Kings 7:48; comp. 6:22; 2 Chron. 4:19), made of cedar wood and overlaid with gold; ten golden candlesticks with seven lamps to each, and placed in front of the Holy of Holies, five of them being on the right side and five on the left side (1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron. 4:7); and ten tables for the showbread, five being on each side (2 Chron. 4:8). The form and construction of these objects have not been minutely described, as they were clearly modeled after those in the tabernacle, only made on a larger scale to correspond with the greater dimensions of the temple apartments. Of course the several articles of furniture were accompanied with their utensils, viz., snuffers and extinguishers for the candlesticks; for the tables, the bowls, basins, and dishes, etc. (1 Kings 7:49, 50; 2 Chron. 4:21, etc.).

In the inner court was the altar of burnt offering (1 Kings 8:64), which according to 2 Chron. 4:1 was twenty cubits square and ten cubits high, and made after the pattern of the one in the tabernacle. Keil (Bib. Arch., p. 173) thinks that twenty cubits was the measurement of the bottom of the altar reduced a cubit by each of three steps or landings, besides a deep molding at the base. This would make the measurement at the top twelve cubits. The following utensils for this altar are mentioned: pots, shovels, basins, and forks (1 Kings 7:40, 45; 2 Chron. 4:11, 16). See ALTAR. A little to the south, but between the altar and the porch, stood the brazen or molten sea, a huge round basin, described in article LAVER. There were also on each side of the altar, at the right and left wing of the temple, ten brazen lesser lavens on wheels (1 Kings 7:27-30; 2 Chron. 4:6). See LAVER.

(6) Symbolical and typical meaning. These were both similar on the whole to those of the tabernacle, the points of difference being only such as would arise from the one being a tent and the other a house. The temple was designed to be "a house for Jehovah to dwell in, a place for his seat forever" (1 Kings 8:13; 2 Chron. 6:2), or a house where the name of Jehovah should dwell (2 Sam. 7:5, 13; 1 Kings 8:16, 18, 29; 2 Chron. 6:6, etc.). "The temple, like the tabernacle, was intended to be a representation of the kingdom of God in Israel. But if the tabernacle, as a movable tent, was suited to the circumstances of Israel before settling in the promised land, the temple, on the other hand, as a fixed habitation, suggested the idea that the people of God had now obtained a permanent inheritance in Canaan, and that the kingdom of God in Israel had now been placed upon a permanent basis. Hence it was that in the first instance Jehovah established the house of David by promising to secure the kingdom to his posterity forever (2 Sam. 7:11, sq.), before allowing a house of stone and cedar to be built for himself by the seed of David. In virtue of this promise the building of the temple and the circumstance of its being filled with the divine glory in the symbol of the cloud (1 Kings 8:10, sq.) assume the character of a pledge of the eternal duration of God's covenant of mercy" (Keil, Bib. Arch., i, p. 140). The figurative meaning of the measurements, colors, and furniture have already been treated under COLOR, NUMBER, TABERNACLE.

The word temple in Scripture, in a figurative sense, denotes sometimes the Church of Christ (Rev. 3:12; comp. 2 Thess. 2:4); heaven (Psa. 11:4; Rev. 7:15); while the soul of the righteous man is the temple of God, because it is inhabited by the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 3:16, 17; 6:19; 2 Cor. 6:16).

(7) History. After the completion of the building Solomon had the ark placed in the Holy of Holies, and dedicated the temple with solemn thanksgiving and prayer, accompanied with liberal thank offering. This service, participated in by the heads of the tribes as well as men from all parts of Israel, lasted seven days. So large was the number of victims offered that it was necessary for a time to convert the inner court in front of the porch into a place of sacrifice, as the altar of burnt offering was not capable of holding the multitude of sacrifices (1 Kings 8:1, sq.; 2 Chron., chaps. 5, 6; 7:7). Immediately after the consecration prayer, in offering up which Solomon knelt upon the brazen platform that was erected in the inner court and in front of the altar (2 Chron. 6:13), fire fell from heaven and consumed the burnt offering (7:1).

At the disruption of the kingdom the temple ceased to be the sanctuary of the whole people, Jeroboam having erected special places of worship at Beth-el and Dan for the use of the revolting ten tribes; but the temple continued to be the authorized center of worship for the kingdom of Judah. As early as the days of Rehoboam the treasures of the temple were plundered by Shishak, king of Egypt (1 Kings 14:26), and gold and silver therefrom were subsequently sent to Ben-hadad, king of Syria, to purchase an alliance against Basasha, king of Israel (15:18, sq.).

Under Jehoshaphat the outer court was renewed (2 Chron. 20:5), while under Jehoash considerable repairs were made upon the temple itself (2 Kings 12:5, sq.), which repairs had been made necessary by the havoc wrought by the wicked Athaliah (2 Chron. 24:7). During the reign of Amaziah all the gold and silver (as well as the utensils which had gold or silver about them) that were in the temple, were plundered by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 Kings 14:14). After this Jotham "built the higher gate" of the temple (2 Kings 15:35; 2 Chron. 27:3), probably at the entrance to the inner court. Ahaz, on the other hand, had the altar of burnt offering taken away and another put in its place, made after one he had seen in Damascus; he also had the decorations removed from the laver stands, the basins themselves taken out, and the oxen removed from under the brazen sea, and the latter placed upon a "pavement of stones" (2 Kings 16:10-17). This was done to secure for the king of Assyria those artistic objects, as he had already given him silver and gold from the temple and palace (v. 8). King Hezekiah was also compelled to pay tribute to Sennacherib, which he did by taking silver from the temple, and stripping the gold from the temple doors and posts (18:15, sq.). Worst of all was the desecration of the temple by Manasseh, who caused altars for the whole host of heaven to be erected in both courts, an image of Astarte to be set up in the sanctuary (21:4, 5, 7), and "houses of the sodomites" (23:7), probably tents or huts, erected in the temple court for the paramours to dwell in, and in which there were also women who wove tent-temple for Asherah; and kept horses consecrated to the sun in a place set apart for them in the inner court toward the back of the temple (v. 11). Josiah purged the sacred place of these abominations (v. 4, sq.); but soon after Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem, and gathered together all the treasures of the temple, including all the golden utensils, and carried them off (24:13). Eleven years later Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans, who burned the temple to the ground after pillaging it of its valuables, which they took to Babylon (2 Kings 25:9, 13, 17; Jer. 52:13, 17-23).

3. The Temple of Zerubbabel. "We have very few particulars regarding the temple which the Jews erected after their return from the captivity (about 520 B. C.), and no description that would enable us to realize its appearance. But there are some dimensions given in the Bible and elsewhere which are extremely interesting as affording points of comparison between it and the temples which preceded it, or were erected after it. The first and most authentic are those given in the Book of Ezra (6:3), when quoting the decree of Cyrus, wherein it is said, 'Let the house be builded, the place where they offered sacrifices, and let the foundations thereof be strongly laid; the height thereof threescore cubits; and the breadth thereof threescore cubits; with three rows of great stones, and a row of new timber.' Josephus quotes this passage almost literally, but in doing so enables us with certainty to translate the word here called row as 'story'—as indeed the sense would lead us to infer. The other dimension of sixty cubits in breadth is twenty cubits in excess of that of Solomon's temple, but there is no reason to doubt its correctness, for we find both from Josephus and the Talmud that it was the dimension adopted for the temple when rebuilt, or, rather, repaired, by Herod. We are left, therefore, with the alternative of assuming that the porch and the chambers all around were twenty cubits in width, including the thickness of the walls, instead of ten cubits, as in the earlier building. This alteration in the width of the pteromata made the temple one hundred cubits in length by sixty in breadth, with a height, it is said, of sixty cubits, including the upper room, or Talar, though we cannot help suspecting that this last dimension is somewhat in excess of the truth. The only other description of this temple is found in Hecataeus the Abderite, who wrote shortly after the death of Alexander the Great. As quoted by Josephus, he says, that 'in Jerusalem, toward the middle of the city, is a stone-walled inclosure about five hundred feet in length, and one hundred cubits in width, with double gates, in which he describes the temple as being situated. Hecateus also mentions that the altar was twenty cubits square and ten high. And although he mentions the temple itself, he unfortunately does not supply us with any dimensions. From these dimensions we gather that if 'the priests and Levites and elders of families were disconsolate at seeing how much more sumptuous the old temple was than the one which on account of their poverty they had just been able to erect' (Ezra 3:12), it certainly was not because it was smaller, as almost every dimension had been increased one third" (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

According to the Talmud this temple wanted five things that were in Solomon's temple, viz., the ark, the sacred fire, the Shekinah, the Holy Spirit, and the Urim and Thummim. The Holy of Holies was empty, and on the spot where the ark should have stood, a stone was set upon which the high priest placed the censor on the great day of atonement. In the Holy Place there was only one golden candlestick, one table of showbread, and the altar of incense (1 Macc. 1:21, sq.; 4:49); while in the court was an altar of burnt offering built of stone (4:45).

History. This temple was plundered by Antiochus Epiphanes, who also defiled it with idolatrous worship (1 Macc. 1:21, sq.; 46, sq.; 4:38; 2 Macc. 6:2, sq.), but was restored by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. 4:36, sq.). He also fortified the outside against future attacks (6:7). It was taken by Pompey on the day of atonement after a three months' siege, and later by Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant., xiv, 4, 2, sq.; xvi, 2).

4. Ezekiel's Temple. The vision of a temple which the prophet Ezekiel saw while residing on the banks of the Chebar in Babylonia in the twenty-fifth year of the captivity, does not add much to our knowledge of the subject. It is not a description of a temple that ever was built or ever could be erected at Jerusalem, and can consequently only be considered as the beau ideal of what a Shemitic temple ought to be. The temple itself was of the exact dimensions of that built by Solomon (q. v.). Notwithstanding its ideal character, the whole is extremely curious, as showing what were the aspirations of the Jews in this direction, and how different they were from those of other nations; and it is interesting here, inasmuch as there can be little doubt but that the arrangements of Herod's temple were in a great measure influenced by the description here given (see Ezek. 41:1-43:17).

5. Herod's Temple. The temple as it existed after the captivity was not such as would satisfy a man as vain and fond of display as Herod the Great; and he accordingly undertook the task of rebuilding it on a grander scale. "Although the reconstruction was practically equivalent to an entire rebuilding, still this temple cannot be spoken of as a third one, for Herod himself said, in so many words, that it was only intended to be regarded as an enlarging and further beautifying of that of Zerubbabel" (Keil, Bib. Arch., i, p. 188). After the necessary preparation the work of building was begun in the eighteenth year of Herod's reign (20 or 21 B. C.), and the temple proper, on which priests and Levites were employed, was finished in a year and a half, and the courts in the course of eight years. Subsidiary buildings were gradually erected, added to through the reigns of his successors, so that the entire undertaking was not completed till the time of Agrippa II and the procurator Albinus (A. D. 64).

For our knowledge of the last and greatest of the Jewish temples we are indebted almost wholly to the works of Josephus, with an occasional hint from the Talmud. The Bible unfortunately contains nothing to assist the researches of the antiquary in this respect.

The temple and its courts occupied an area of one stadium (Josephus), or five hundred cubits (Talmud). They were arranged in terrace form, one court being higher than another, and the temple highest of all, so as to be easily seen from any part of the city or vicinity, and thus presenting a very imposing appearance (Mark 13:2, 3).

(1) The outer court was surrounded with a high wall, with several gates on its west side, and had porticoes running all round it, those on three of the sides having double, and that on the south side having triple piazzas. These porticoes were covered with roofs of cedar supported on marble pillars, twenty-five cubits high, and were paved with mosaic work. This outer court, which could be frequented by Gentiles and unclean persons, had on its inner side and extending all round a rampart surrounded with a stone parapet, i. e., a mound ten cubits broad, the top of which was reached by a flight of fourteen steps. This constituted the outer boundary of the inner temple area (τὸ δεύτερον ἱερόν, Josephus). Some distance back from the rampart we come to the wall by which the temple and its inner courts were surrounded. On the outside this was forty cubits high, while on the inside it was only twenty-five, the level of the inner space being so much higher.

(2) Women's court. Entering by the east gate we come to the court of the women, a square of one hundred and thirty-five cubits, separated from the court of the Israelites by a wall on the west side, and having gates on the north and south sides for the women to enter by. These gates, as well as those on the east and west sides of this court, had rooms built over them to a height of forty cubits, each room being ornamented with two pillars twelve cubits in circumference, and provided with double doors thirty cubits high and forty wide, and overlaid with gold and silver. According to Middoth, ii, 3, the gates, with the exception of the eastern one, were only twenty cubits high and ten wide.

The eastern gate, called in the Talmud Nicanor's, or the great gate, was made of Corinthian brass, and was regarded as the principal gate on account of its greater height (being fifty cubits) and width (forty cubits), and from its being more richly decorated with precious metals. It is undoubtedly the "gate of the temple which is called Beautiful" (Acts 3:2, θύρα τοῦ ἱεροῦ ἢ λεγομένη Ὀραία). Round the walls of the court, except the west side, ran porticoes (porches), the roof of which rested on lofty and highly finished pillars. In each corner was a room, used, respectively, for storing the wood deemed unfit to be burned on the altar; for those affected with leprosy to wash themselves; for storing sacrificial wine and oil; and that one in which the Nazarites shaved their hair and cooked the flesh of the consecration sacrifices. According to Josephus (Wars, v, 5, 2) it was in some of the pillars of this court that the thirteen alms boxes were placed.

(3) The inner court. The entrance to the court of the Israelites was the western gate of the outer court, and was reached by a stair of fifteen steps. This inner court measured one hundred and eighty-seven cubits long (from east to west), and one hundred and thirty-five wide (from south to north), and surrounded the temple. Against its walls were chambers for storing the utensils required for the services, while it had three gates on both the south and north sides, making seven entrances in all. Eleven cubits of the eastern end was partitioned off by a stone balustrade one cubit high, for the men (the court of the Israelites), separating it from the rest of the space which went to form the court of the priests. In this latter stood the altar of burnt offering, made of unwrought stone, thirty cubits in length and breadth, and fifteen high. West of this was the temple, and between it and the altar stood the laver.

(4) The temple proper. The temple stood so much higher than the court of the priests that it was approached by a flight of twelve steps. It stood in the western end of the inner court and on the northwest part of the temple mount, and was built, according to Josephus (Ant., xv, 11, 3), upon new foundations of massive blocks of white marble, richly ornamented with gold both inside and out. Some of these stones were forty-five cubits long, six broad, and five high. Its length and height, including the porch, was one hundred cubits, while on each side of the vestibule there was a wing twenty cubits wide, making the total width of this part of the building one hundred cubits. The porch was ten cubits deep, measuring from east to west, fifty wide, ninety in height, and had an open gateway seventy cubits high and twenty-five in width.

The interior of the temple was divided into the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies. "The temple had doors also at the entrance, and lintels over them of the same height with the temple itself. They were adorned with embroidered veils, with their flowers of purple, and pillars interwoven; and over these, but under the crown work, was spread out a golden vine, with its branches hanging down from a great height" (Josephus, Ant., xv, 11, 3). The holy place was forty cubits long, twenty wide, and sixty in height, and contained one golden candlestick, a single table of showbread, and one altar of incense. Separated from it by a wooden partition was the Holy of Holies, twenty cubits long and sixty high, which was empty. The rabbinical writers maintain that there were two veils over its entrance. It was this veil that was rent on the occasion of our Lord's crucifixion. As in the case of Solomon's temple, side rooms three stories high were built on the sides of the main structure (see Smith, Bib. Dict.; McC. and S., Cyc.; Edersheim, The Temple; Keil, Bib. Arch.; Payne, Solomon's Temple). See SUPPLEMENT.

TEMPT (Heb. תָּנָּוּ, ba-w-khan'; Gr. πειράζω, pi-rad'-zo, both meaning to test or try) is used in different senses; not always involving an evil purpose, as an inducement to sin.

1. "God did tempt Abraham" (Gen. 22:1) in commanding him to offer up his son Isaac, intending to prove his obedience and faith, to confirm and strengthen him by this trial, and to furnish in him an example of perfect obedience for all succeeding ages. When it is recorded that God proved his people, whether they would walk in his way or not (Exod. 16:4), and that he permitted false prophets to arise among them, who prophesied vain things to try them whether they would seek the Lord with their whole hearts, we should interpret these expressions by that of James 1:13, 14, "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man: but every man is tempted, when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed."

2. Satan tempts us to every kind of evil, and lays snares for us, even in our best actions. He lays inducements before our minds to solicit us to sin (1 Cor. 7:5; 1 Thess. 3:5; James 1:13, 14). Hence Satan is called that old serpent, the devil, and "the tempter" (Rev. 12:9; Matt. 4:3). He tempted our first parents (see TEMPTATION); our Saviour (see TEMPTATION OF CHRIST); he tempted Ananias and Sapphira to lie to the Holy Ghost (Acts 5:3).

3. Men are said to tempt God when they unreasonably require proofs of the divine presence, power, or goodness. It is proper for us to seek divine assistance, and to pray him to give us what we need, but we are not to tempt him, or expose ourselves to dangers from which we cannot escape without miraculous interposition. God is not obliged to work miracles in our favor; he requires of us only such actions as are within the ordinary measure of our strength. The Israelites frequently tempted God in the desert, as if they had reason to doubt his presence, his goodness, or his power, after all his appearances in their behalf (Exod. 16:2, 7, 17; Num. 20:12; Psa. 78:18, 41, etc.).

4. Men tempt or try one another when they would know whether things or men are really what they seem or are desired; also when they wish them to depart from the right. The queen of Sheba came to prove the wisdom of Solomon by giving him riddles to explain (1 Kings 10:1; 2 Chron. 9:1). Daniel desired of the eunuch to prove them for some days whether abstinence from food of certain kinds would make them leaner (Dan. 1:12, 14). The scribes and Pharisees often tempted our Lord and endeavored to catch him in their snares (Matt. 16:1; 19:3; 22:18).

TEMPTATION (Heb. מִסָּוָה, mas-saw'; Gr. πειρασμός, pi-ras-mos', a testing) is generally understood as the enticement of a person to commit sin by offering some seeming advantage. The sources of temptation are Satan, the world, and the flesh. We are exposed to them in every state, in every place, and in every time. The nearest approach to a definition of the process of temptation from within is given us by James, "Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed" (James 1:14). "Temptation proper in the case of a fallen creature is, strictly speaking, within. It craves the gratification that is offered from without: 'then when it hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin' (1:15). The contest in the regenerate man is his lust of the flesh opposing the Spirit of the new nature; and the Spirit continually moving the renewed spirit to oppose its desires. In this sense our first parents were not tempted, though in their case the temptation from without assailed a will capable of falling, and was the means of engendering the concupiscence that then engendered all sin. In this sense the glorified in heaven, after a probation ended, will be incapable of temptation. In this sense our sinless Redeemer was absolutely untemptable and impeccable. 'He was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (Heb. 4:15). . . . He had no mother lust which could conceive and bring forth sin. . . . But there is another aspect of temptation which brings him still nearer to us, and that is, the trial of the spirit from without. This he underwent to the utmost; indeed, as much beyond the possibility of his servants' temptation as their internal temptation was impossible to him" (Pope, Christ. Theol., iii, 205). See TEXT; TEMPTATION OF CHRIST.

TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. An experience in the life of our Lord recorded in Matt. 4:1-11; Mark 1:12, 13; Luke 4:1-13. That Christ was tempted on other occasions and in other ways than here indicated would seem evident from Luke 22:28 and Heb. 4:15. This, however, through which he passed immediately after his baptism and before his entrance upon his ministry, was an event of so much importance as to be regarded as preeminently his temptation. And to this commonly exclusive reference is made.

1. Character of the Narration. Much labor and ingenuity are often expended in seeking to determine to what extent the narrative of the gospels is to be taken literally. How much of it is to be understood as descriptive of actual outward occurrences, and how much was internal, subjective? Did Satan actually bear Christ away to a "pinnacle of the temple" at Jerusalem? Did he also take our Lord to "an exceeding high mountain" from the summit of which he showed him "all the kingdoms of the world?" Did such changes in the scene of the temptation actually take place in an outward, material sense, or did they simply take place in the mind of Jesus? Is the gospel narrative in these respects marked by the figurative manner common among orientals? Upon these questions the opinions of commentators are greatly divided. There has been no end of discussion, and with little profit. The popular interpretation has been literal. And not a few scholars have attempted to defend this interpretation. But, on the other hand, even as orthodox a scholar as Calvin has held the account to be that of a vision or allegory. But it should be observed that whichever view is taken the reality of the temptation is in no measure lessened, nor is the fact disguised that the real agent of the temptation was Satan.

2. The Temptation as Related to the Character of Christ. How could he, the sinless One, be tempted? Did the temptation imply in any sense the possibility of his falling into sin? As to the first question it should be remembered that temptation does not necessarily imply a sinful nature on the part of the one tempted. The first man Adam, though created "in the image and after the likeness" of God, was tempted and fell into sin. And does not the passage Heb. 4:15 teach that not only did Jesus successfully resist temptation, but also that his temptation was not such as springs up within a sinful nature? Christ was "without sin" in both these senses. His temptation was wholly from without, from the evil one, though appealing to desires within him that were wholly innocent. As to the possibility of his yielding to temptation these views have been held: (1) The old Calvinistic view, that Christ had no volitional power to yield to temptation. Dr. Edwards strongly advocated this view in his work on the Will. (2) The old Arminian view, that the man Jesus had such volitional power. (3) The view maintained by Dr. Nast, in his Commentary on Matthew, in accord with much present-day German teaching, that "the eternal Logos had the volitional power to sin, having concentrated and reduced himself to finite and human conditions." Van Oosterzee appropriately says, "The sinlessness of the Lord is to be regarded as an attribute of his true humanity, and thus to be clearly distinguished from the absolute holiness of him who cannot even be tempted of evil. The moral purity of the Lord did not in itself exclude even the least possibility of sinning. Had such possibility been absolutely wanting, the former would, even in the Son of man, have lost all moral worth. The great thing here is precisely this, that he who was exposed to the severest temptation, ever so maintained the dominion over himself that it could be said of him, he was able not to sin, "potuit non peccare." As the result of a sustained conflict, he so perfectly vanquished the power of evil that sinning became for him morally an absolute impossibility; in other words, the "potuit non peccare" was evermore raised to a "non potuit peccare." He could not 'sin.' And yet discussion upon this theme, as Edersheim says, "sounds, after all, like the stammering of divine words by a babe." It is a subject for reverent faith rather than exact dogmatizing.

3. The Nature of the Threefold Temptation. According to Mark, the temptation was protracted throughout the "forty days." The temptations described by Matthew and Luke are therefore regarded as the culminating features of the long struggle. The order of the temptations vary in the two gospels named, a matter of little or no consequence. The long fast, once a favorite matter for infidel objections, no longer presents any difficulty whatever. The significance of the separate assaults of evil have been variously interpreted; a fact due in considerable measure to the comprehensiveness of the whole great event. Says Smith: "The three temptations are addressed to the three forms in which the disease of sin makes its appearance in the soul—to the solace of sense, and the love of praise and the desire of gain (1 John 2:16). But there is one element common to them all, they are attempts to call up a willful and wayward spirit in contrast to a patient and self-denying one." The subject, however, can hardly be summed up thus briefly.

1. The temptation to change the stones into bread by a miracle was an appeal to Christ to step out of his divinely appointed path for the sake of satisfying his hunger. He had accepted the conditions of a human life, and it was for him to do his duty and trust in God for sustenance. His power to work miracles was not for himself but for others (see KENOSIS). Had he obeyed the temptation he would have become unlike men who ful prominence to temporal, material, good, is illustrated, so in the present instance all attempts to build up Christ's kingdom by means of display, rather than by the patient, divinely appointed processes, find their rebuke; likewise all forms of fanatical presumption.

3. The temptation to win power by an act of homage to the devil.

Inconceivable as this may seem at first, nevertheless this was the bold form in which was embodied the idea of winning power for good and holy ends by a compromise with evil at the outset. It was an appeal to holy ambition, but upon the must put their trust in divine Providence. "He would have become his own providence."

2. The second temptation was to prove his Sonship, to exhibit his faith in his Sonship, by casting himself down from a pinnacle of the temple. This temptation was at the opposite extreme from the preceding. The first was a temptation to distrust, the second that of extravagant, unwarranted confidence, or presumption. Again was the call to step out of the path divinely appointed, but by presumptuously plunging himself into needless perils. The Scripture quoted by the adversary was quoted in a mutilated form. "He shall give his angels charge concerning thee." "To keep thee in all thy ways" was left out. As in the former instance all temptation to give unlawground of doing evil that good might come. The kingdom was to be won, but in the way suggested it would have been at the expense of ruining the King. At this point also the great temptation of Christ has its most practical lessons.

The manner and complete success of Christ's resistance appear upon the surface of the narrative and call here for no comment.

TEN. See NUMBER, p. 796.

TEN COMMANDMENTS. See DECALOGUE.

TENDER-HEARTED. 1. Rak lay-bawb' (Heb. רַךְ לֵבָב), literally tender of heart, i. e., fainthearted, timid, as spoken of Solomon's son Rehoboam in his youth (2 Chron. 13:7).

2. Yoo'-sprangh-ohs (Gr. εὐσπλαγχνος, having strong bowels), in biblical and ecclesiastical language, compassionate, tender-hearted (Eph. 4:32; 1 Pet. 3:8, A. V. "pitiful;" R. V. "tender-hearted").

TENONS (Exod. 26:17, 19; 36:22, 24), probably dowel pins at the end of the planks of the TABERNACLE (q. v.).

TENS, RULERS OF. See p. 637, column 2.

TENT (Heb. usually טֶבֶט, o'-hel; Gr. σκηνή, skay-nay'), a movable habitation, made of curtains extended upon poles. The patriarchs of the Israelites, whose fathers and kindred already possessed fixed houses in Mesopotamia, dwelt in tents because they lived in Canaan only as pilgrims. The Israelites did not dwell in houses until their return from Egypt. Their tents, in material, form, and furniture, no doubt resembled the tents of the present Bedouins, consisting sometimes of plaited mats, but generally of cloth coverings, either coarser, of goat hair (black, Cant. 1:5), or finer, woven from yarn. (See cut, p. 1091.) The goat-hair cloth is sufficient to resist the heaviest rain. The tent poles, called amid, or columns, are usually nine in number, placed in three groups, but many tents have only one pole, others two or three. The ropes which hold the tent in its place are fastened not to the tent cover itself, but to loops consisting of a leathern thong tied to the ends of a stick, round which is twisted a piece of old cloth, which is itself sewed to the tent cover. The ends of the tent ropes are fastened to short sticks or pins, called wed or avutad, which are driven into the ground with a mallet (Judg. 4:21). Round the back and sides of the tent runs a piece of stuff removable at pleasure to admit air. The tent is divided into two apartments, separated by a carpet partition drawn across the middle of the tent and fastened to the three middle posts. The furniture deemed necessary was a carpet, cushions, a low table (sometimes replaced by a round skin), eating and cooking utensils, and a lamp. When the pasture near an encampment is exhausted, the tents are taken down, packed on camels and removed (Isa. 38:12; Gen. 26:17, 22, 25). The larger tents of the well-to-do are divided into three rooms; the first, at the entrance, in the case of common people, is reserved for the young and tender of the flock or herd, the second for the men, and the innermost for the women. The manufacture of tents formed a regular trade, at which Paul occasionally labored, especially in connection with Aquila (Acts 18:3).

Figurative. So prominent a feature of oriental life could hardly fail to suggest many striking metaphors. Thus the heavens are compared to a tent (Isa. 40:22). The prosperity of the Church is referred to as an enlargement of a tent (54:2; see also 33:20). The setting up of a tent, especially a large one, was a work needing the help of others, and one bereft of friends is referred to as having no helpers in erecting his tent (Jer. 10:20). The tent being rapidly taken down and removed became a symbol of the frailty of life (Isa. 38:12; 2 Cor. 5:1).

TENTH DEAL (Heb. עֲשָׂרִית, is-saw-roné', a tenth), a dry measure, specially for grain and meal (Exod. 29:40; Lev. 14:10, 21; Num. 15:4, 6, 9, etc.); more fully the tenth of an ephah. See METROLOGY, II.

TERAH (Heb. תֵּרַח, teh'-rakh, station), the son of Nabor born in Ur of the Chaldees; the father of Abram, Nahor, and Haran, and through them the ancestor of the great families of the Israelites, Ishmaelites, Midianites, Moabites, and Ammonites (Gen. 11:24-32). We learn from the Scripture that Terah was an idolater (Josh. 24:2), that he took part in the family migration toward Canaan, and that he died in Haran at the age of two hundred and five years, B. C. before 2250.

TER'APHIM (Heb. תְּרָפִים, ter-aw-femé'), images connected with magical rites; always in the masculine plural. In the Septuagint they are represented by a different rendering in nearly every book where the word occurs: in Gen., ch. 31, by ειδωλα (i-dō-lah); in Judg., chaps. 17, 18, by θεραφίν (ther-af-in'); in 1 Sam., ch. 19, by κενοσόα (ken-ōsaf-ee-ah); in Ezek. 21:21, by γλυπτρά (gloop-tah'); in Hos. 3:4, by δῆλοι (day'-loy); and in Zech. 10:2, by ἀποθεγγόμενοι (ap-of-theng-gom'-eu-oi). Teraphim is probably from the Heb. תַּו־רַפַּף, taw-raf', to live in comfort. The teraphim were the supposed guardians and givers of prosperous life, and were greatly venerated and worshiped in early times. It appears that Laban attached great value to these objects, from what he said as to the theft and his determined search for them (Gen. 31:19, 30, 32-35). The most important point is that Laban calls them his "gods" (31:30, 32), although he was not without belief in the true God (31:24, 49-53); for this makes it almost certain that we have here not an indication of the worship of strange gods, but the first notice of a superstition that afterward obtained among the Israelites who added corrupt practices to the true religion. Teraphim again are included among Micah's images (Judg. 17:3-5; 18:17, 18, 20). Teraphim were consulted for oracular answers by the Israelites (Zech. 10:2; comp. Judg. 18:5, 6; 1 Sam. 15:22, 23; 19:13, 16, LXX.; 2 Kings 23:24), and by the Babylonians, in the case of Nebuchadnezzar (Ezek. 21:19-22). The worship or use of teraphim after the occupation of the promised land cannot be doubted to have been one of the corrupt practices of those Hebrews who leaned to idolatry, but did not abandon their belief in the God of Israel.

Some writers have relied upon the declaration of the prophet Hosea (3:4), "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without king, and without prince, and without sacrifice, and without pillar, and without ephod or teraphim," to prove that pillars, ephod, and teraphim were all together parts of the genuine Israelite religion. Professor Robertson (Early Religion of Israel, pp. 238, 239) says: "The passage is one of threatening, and the inference generally drawn from it is, that as the things mentioned are to be taken away from Israel as a punishment, they are to be regarded as things of which they were aforesaid lawfully possessed. They were, in a word, to be deprived of both political freedom and religious privileges; and as the former is denoted by king and prince, the latter is summed up in the succeeding expressions, which, therefore, at Hosea's time, denoted legitimate elements of their worship. . . . The things are, in fact, arranged in pairs, and I think light at once falls upon the passage when read in this connection, each pair representing at once the true and the false, the good and the evil, of which they would be deprived.

Neither king . . . nor prince.
Neither sacrifice . . . nor pillar.
Neither ephod . . . nor teraphim.

If we take the things in pairs we get the legitimate monarchy and the bastard lordship, legitimate sacrifices and those with which the idolatrous pillars were associated, the legitimate priestly ephod and the superstitious consulting of teraphim." There is no description of these images; but from the account of Michal's stratagem to deceive Saul's messengers, it is evident, if only one image be there meant, as is very probable, that they were at least sometimes of the size of a man, and, perhaps, in the head and shoulders, if not lower, of human shape, or of a similar form (1 Sam. 19:13-16).

TERESH (Heb. תֶּרֶשׁ, teh'-resh, severe), one of the two eunuchs whose plot to assassinate Ahasuerus was discovered by Mordecai (Esth. 2:21; 6:2). He was hanged B. C. about 515.

TERRACE (Heb. מִסְבֵּת, mes-il-law', thoroughfare), a staircase, constructed out of algum trees, for Solomon's palace (2 Chron. 9:11).

TERRIBLENESS. See GLOSSARY.

TERROR, the rendering of several Hebrew words and one Greek word denoting great fear, that which agitates both body and mind. Some of these words have as their primary meaning the cause of fear, others the result. Thus אַיִמָּוָה (ay-maw', Josh. 2:9; Job 20:25; Psa. 33:18; 55:4; 88:15) is that which inspires dread, as a king (Job 33:7), a bugbear; idols (Jer. 50:38), from the fear with which they fill their worshipers; מִכְּחִי-תֹאוֹ' (mekh-it-taw', Isa. 54:14) is a breaking in pieces, and so consternation, from מִחַלְחָלִית (khav-thalth'), to be broken, confounded (Gen. 35:5; Ezek. 26:17, 32:23-32); בְּחַלְחָלִית (hav-law') denotes the falling away of a person in sickness, a garment through age, etc., and so the mind consumed with anxiety and care. Other words simply express fear, as the Greek word φόβος (job'-os). Death is called the "king of terrors" (Job 18:14; comp. 24:17), in distinction from the terrible disease which is called its "firstborn" (18:13). Death is also personified elsewhere (Psa. 49:15; Isa. 28:15).

TERTIUS (Gr. Τέρτιος, ter'-tee-os, from Lat. tertius, third), probably a Roman, was the amanuensis of Paul in writing the Epistle to the Romans (Rom. 16:22). Some have proposed without reason to identify him with Silas. Nothing certain is known of him.

TERTULLUS (Gr. Τέρτυλλος, ter'-tool-los, diminutive form of Tertius), "a certain orator" retained by the high priest and Sanhedrin to accuse the apostle Paul at Caesarea before the procurator, Felix (Acts 24:1, 2). He evidently belonged to the class of professional orators, multitudes of whom were to be found not only in Rome, but in other parts of the empire, where they went with the expectation of finding occupation at the tribunals of the provincial magistrates. We may infer that Tertullus was of Roman, or, at all events, of Italian origin; while the Sanhedrin would naturally desire his services on account of their own ignorance of the Latin language and of the ordinary procedure of a Roman law court. The historian probably only gave an abstract of the speech, giving, however, in full the most salient points, and those which had the most forcibly impressed themselves upon him, such as the exordium and the character ascribed to Paul (v. 5).

TESTAMENT, the frequent rendering of Gr. διαθήκη, dee-ath-ay'-kay, a disposal.

1. A disposition, arrangement of any sort, which one wishes to be valid (Gal. 3:15), especially the last disposal which one makes of his earthly possessions after his death, a testament or will.

2. A covenant, a compact, very often used in Scripture. The word covenant is used to denote the close relationship which God entered into: with Noah (Gen. 6:18; 9:9, sq.); with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their posterity (Lev. 26:42); and afterward, through Moses, with the people of Israel (Exod., ch. 24; Deut. 5:2; 28:69). "By this last covenant the Israelites are bound to obey God's will as expressed and solemnly promulgated in the Mosaic law; and he promises them his almighty protection and blessings of every kind in this world, but threatens transgressors with the severest punishments. Hence in the New Testament we find mention of . . . the ark of the covenant, or law, in which the tables were deposited (Heb. 9:4; Rev. 11:19, A. V. 'the ark of his testament'); of the covenant of circumcision (Heb. 9:20; comp. Acts 7:8)" (Grimm, Gr.-Eng. Lex.). The new and more satisfactory bond of friendship which God in the Messiah's time would enter into with the people of Israel is called καὴν διαθήκη, kahee-nay' dee-ah-ay'-kay, the new testament—which divine promise Christ has made good (Heb. 8:8-10; 10:16). Thus we find two testaments (covenants) spoken of, the Mosaic and the Christian (Gal. 4:24); with the former of which (Heb. 9:15, 18; comp. 8:9) the latter is contrasted (Matt. 26:28; Mark 14:24; Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; Heb. 13:20), of which Christ is the Mediator (8:6).

Old and New Testaments. When the books written by Christ's apostles, or by apostolic men, came to be placed alongside the sacred books of the Hebrews, as comprising the entire scriptural canon, it became necessary to distinguish the two divisions by appropriate designations. A usage which already prevailed furnished the designations required. The gracious engagements into which God was pleased to enter with individuals and communities bear in the Old Testament the name of ber-eeth' (Heb. בְּרִית), or covenant (q. v.), and to this corresponds the Gr. διαθήκη in the LXX. and the New Testament. Of these covenants two stand out from all the rest as of preeminent importance—God's covenant with Israel mediated by Moses, and that covenant which he promised to establish through the Messiah. This latter is called by Jeremiah (31:31) "a new covenant," and familiarly used by the apostles (2 Cor. 3:6; Heb. 9:15, etc.), would naturally suggest the application of the phrase "the first testament" (ἡ καὴν διαθήκη) to the former (Heb. 9:15). In the Latin Church the usage prevailed of calling these two covenants Vetus et Novum Testamentum, i. e., the Old and the New Testament; and Testamentum has naturally passed into the title of the two divisions of the Scriptures in the English and most of the European versions (see Kitto, McC. and S., Cyc.).

TESTIMONIES (Heb. עֵדוּת, ay-daw', or עֵדוּת, ay-dooth'; Gr. from μαρτυρέω, mar-too-reh'-o, witness), anything which testifies (Gen. 31:52, A. V. "witness"); a precept of God (Deut. 4:45; 6:17, 20; 1 Kings 2:3; 23:3; 1 Chron. 29:19, etc.; Psa. 25:10; 78:56; 93:5; 119:2, etc.); a collection of precepts, the law, specially the Decalogue (Exod. 16:34; 25:16, 21; 31:18). The Scriptures are so called because "they testify" of Christ (John 5:39). As being the receptacle of the table of the law, the ark was called "the ark of the testimony" (Exod. 25:22; 26:33, 34); and the tabernacle, "the tabernacle of testimony" (Num. 1:50, 53; 10:11). Ay-dooth' is found in composition with Shushan (in the title of Psa. 60) and with Shoshannim (Psa. 80, title). See MUSICAL TERMS, p. 768. "The testimony of Jesus Christ" (Rev. 1:2) was that which Jesus spoke to John, probably concerning future events.

TETRARCH (Gr. τετράρχης, tet-rar'-khace), properly the sovereign or governor of the fourth part of a country. 1. Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:1; Luke 3:1, 19; 9:7; Acts 13:1), who is commonly distinguished as "Herod the tetrarch," although the title of "king" is also assigned to him both by Matthew (14:9) and by Mark (6:14, 22, sq.). 2. Herod Philip, who is said by Luke (3:1) to have been "tetrarch of Ituræa and of the region of Trachonitis." 3. Lysanias, who is said (Luke 3:1) to have been "tetrarch of Abilene." The title of tetrarch was at this time probably applied to petty tributary princes without any such determinate meaning. But it appears from Josephus that the tetrarchies of Antipas and Philip were regarded as constituting each a fourth part of their father's kingdom. We conclude that in these two cases, at least, the title was used in its strict and literal sense.

THADDÆUS (Gr. Θαδδαιος, thad-dah'-yos), a name in Mark's catalogue of the twelve apostles (Mark 3:18) in the great majority of manuscripts. In Matthew's catalogue (Matt. 10:3) Lebbæus is probably the original reading. From a comparison with the catalogue of Luke (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13) it seems scarcely possible to doubt that the three names of Judas, Lebbæus, and Thaddæus, were borne by one and the same person. Edersheim (Life of Jesus, i, 522) derives the term Thaddæus from thodah, praise, and adds, "In that case both Lebbæus and Thaddæus would point to the heartiness and thanksgiving of the apostle, and hence his character." His real name seems to have been Judas Labbæus, and his surname Thaddæus.

THA'HASH (Heb. תַּשְׁבַּע, takh'-ash, badger), the third son of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24).

THA'MAH (Ezra 2:53). See TAMAH.

THA'MAR (Matt. 1:3). See TAMAR, 1.

THANK. See GLOSSARY.

THANK OFFERING. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

THANKSGIVING (Heb. יָדוּת, yaw-daw'; יָדוּת, to-daw'; Gr. εὐχαριστία, yoo-khar-is-tee'-ah) "is a duty of which gratitude is the grace. This obligation of godliness is acknowledged by the universal sentiment of mankind; but as a Christian grace it has some blessed peculiarities. It is gratitude, as for all the benefits of divine Providence, so especially for the general and personal gifts of redemption. The very term most in use shows this; it is χάρις, khar'-ece, which is the grace of God in Christ, operating in the soul of the believer as a principle, and going back to him in gratitude: 'Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.' The ethical gratitude of Christianity connects every good gift and every perfect gift with the gift of Christ. Moreover, it is a thanksgiving which in the Christian economy, and in it alone, redounds to God for all things: in everything give thanks. This characteristic flows from the former. The rejoicing which we have in the Lord, and the everlasting consolation we possess in him, makes every possible variety of divine dispensation a token for good. The Christian privilege is to find reason for gratitude in all things: 'for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you'" (Pope, Christ. Theol., pp. 226, 227).

THANKWORTHY is the rendering of the Gr. χάρις (khar'-is, grace), in the declaration (1 Pet. 2:19), "For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully." The meaning is, this wins for us (God's) favor (R. V. "is acceptable"). See GLOSSARY.

THA'RA (Luke 3:34). See TERAH.

THAR'SHISH, a less correct form for TARSHISH, 2.

THEATER (Gr. θέατρον, thēk'-at-ron).

1. A place in which games and dramatic spectacles are exhibited and public assemblies held, for the Greeks use the theater also as a forum (Acts 19:29, 31).

2. A public show, and, figuratively, a man who is exhibited to be gazed at and made sport of (1 Cor. 4:9, A. V. and R. V. "a spectacle"). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks (12:1) of "so great a cloud of witnesses," having in mind, no doubt, the agonistic scene, in which Christians are viewed as running a race, and not the theater or stage, where the eyes of the spectators are fixed on them.

(1) The Greek theater was originally intended for the performance of dithyrambic choruses at the feast of Dionysus. The hymn celebrated the sufferings and actions of the god in a style corresponding to the passionate character of his worship; and it was sung to the accompaniment of a flute and a dance round the altar. "From the first it consisted of two principal parts: (a) the circular dancing place (orchestra), with the altar of the god in the center, and (b) the place for the spectators, or the theater (thēatron) proper. The thēatron was in the form of a segment of a circle, with the seats rising above one another in concentric tiers. The seats were almost always cut in the slope of a hill. When the dithyrambic choruses had developed into the drama, a structure called the skēnē (Lat. scena) was added, with a stage for dramatic representations. It was erected on the side of the orchestra away from the spectators, and at such a height and distance as to allow of the stage being in full view from every part of the theater. The first stone theater was that built at Athens, the home of the Greek drama; and the theaters in every part of the Hellenic world were constructed on the same general principles. It is estimated that the theater in Athens had room for twenty-seven thousand five hundred persons. . . . The tickets of admission discovered in Attica are of two kinds: (a) ordinary leaden tokens about the size of either a florin or a six-penny bit, or (b) counters of bone or ivory about the size of a half crown."

(2) The Roman theater. "In Rome, where dramatic representations, in the strict sense of the term, were not given until 240 B. C., a wooden stage was erected in the circus for each performance, and taken down again. . . . Those who wanted seats had to bring their own chairs; sometimes, by order of the senate, sitting was forbidden. In 154 B. C. an attempt was made to build a permanent theater with fixed seats, but it had to be pulled down by order of the senate. In 145 B. C., on the conquest of Greece, theaters were provided with seats after the Greek models were erected; these, however, were only of wood, and served for one representation alone. The first stone theater was built by Pompey in 55 B. C., a second one by Cornelius Balbus (13 B. C.), and in the same year the one dedicated by Augustus to his nephew Marcellus, and was called by his name, the ruins of which still exist. Besides these there were no other stone theaters in Rome. The Roman theater differed from the Greek. In the first place the auditorium formed a semicircle only, with the front wall of the stage building as its diameter, while in the Greek it was larger than a semicircle. Again a covered colonnade ran round the highest story of the Roman theater, the roof of which was of the same height as the highest part of the stage. The orchestra, moreover, which was inclosed by the cavēa, contained places for spectators; these were, at the first, reserved exclusively for the senators; foreign ambassadors whom it was wished to honor were afterward admitted to them. . . . Places of dignity were also assigned to magistrates and priests, probably on the podium, or the space in front of the lowest row of seats, where there was room for a few rows of chairs. The first fourteen rows of the ordinary seats were (68 B. C.) appropriated to the equites; after them came the general body of citizens, who were probably arranged in the order of their tribes; in the upper part of the cavēa were the women, who sat apart, in accordance with a decree of Augustus; the lowest class were relegated to the highest tier. Even children were admitted, only slaves being excluded. Admission was free, as was the case with all entertainments intended for the people. The tickets of admission did not indicate any particular seat, but only the block of seats and the row in which it would be found" (Seyffert, Dict. of Class. Antiq., s. v.).

THEBES, the Greek name of a city of Egypt, and its capital during the empire; called in the A. V. "No-Amon," R. V. "Noamon," or simply No (Jer. 46:25); R. V. "Amon of No" (Ezek. 30:14-16) (see No). Thebes is referred to by classical writers as being very ancient. "Thebes spreads itself on both banks of the Nile, just as London and Paris extend over both banks of the Thames and Seine. On the right bank are the temples of Karnak and of Luxor. On the left bank, going from north to south, are the temple of Goornah, of Deir-el-Bahari, the Rameseum, the Colossi, the temple of Deir-el-Medineh, and of Medinet-Abou." Of these the most wonderful was Karnak, whose ruins are to-day the most picturesque of all Egypt. For descriptions of these temples see Mariette Bey, Movuments of Upper Egypt; Maspero, Dawn of Civilization.

In October, 1899, nine columns of the great hall of the temple at Karnak collapsed. Their fall, as indeed the general decay of the temple, is perhaps due to the infiltration of the Nile, whose water, saturated as it is with nitre, eats away the sandstone.

THE'BEZ (Heb. תְּבֵז, tay-bates', conspicuous), the scene of the death of the usurper Abimelech (Judg. 9:50). He had suffocated a thousand Shechemites in the hold of Baal-berith by the smoke of green wood, and then besieged and took Thebez. This town possessed a strong tower, to tions if contrary to the divine will. The later history of Israel is a rehearsal of the conflict and intercourse between the great head of the kingdom and the refractory functionaries. Under the new economy this idea passed over, in its spiritual import, to the Messiah, as the heir of David's perpetual dynasty, and thus Christ becomes the ruler of his Church and the hearts of its members.

THEOPHILUS (Gr. Θεόφιλος, theh-oh'-il-os, friend of God), the person to whom Luke inscribes his gospel and the Acts of the Apostles (Luke 1:3; Acts 1:1). We meet with a considerable number and variety of theories concerning him. The traditional connection of Luke with Antioch has disposed some to look upon Antioch as the abode of Theophilus, and possibly as the seat of his government. "We may safely reject the Patristic notion that Theophilus was either a fictitious person or a mere personification of Christian love. The epithet κράτιστε ('most excellent') is a sufficient evidence of his historical existence. It does not, indeed, prove that he was a governor, but it makes it most probable that he was a person of which the men, women, and children betook themselves. When Abimelech advanced to the tower, and drew near to set the door on fire, a woman threw a millstone down upon him from the roof of the tower, and smashed his skull. Whereupon he called to his armor-bearer to give him a death-blow with his sword, that men might not say of him, "A woman slew him." Thebez seems to be preserved in the large village of Tubás, northeast of Shechem, a still important town. It is situated on the slopes and summit of a hill, whose sides are pierced with numerous cisterns, some in use. Hundreds of people even now live underground, in caves cut in the rock.

THEFT. See LAW, p. 637.

THELA'SAR (2 Kings 19:12). See TEL-ASSAR.

THEOCRACY (Gr. θεοκρατία, theh-ok-rat-ee'-ah, rule of God), the form of government among the early Israelites, in which Jehovah was recognized as their supreme civil ruler, and his laws were taken as the statute book of the kingdom. Moses, Joshua, and the Judges were the appointees and agents of Jehovah. The kings were each specifically anointed in his name and the prophets were commissioned to inform them of his will, and did not hesitate to rebuke and even veto their ac-high rank. All that can be conjectured with any degree of safety concerning him comes to this, that he was a Gentile of rank and consideration who came under the influence of Luke or under that of Paul at Rome, and was converted to the Christian faith" (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

"The only traditional information we possess about this person is that found in the 'Clementine Recognitions' (x, 71), about the middle of the 2d century: 'So that Theophilus, who was at the head of all the men in power at the city (of Antioch), consecrated, under the name of a church, the great basilica (the palace) in which he resided.' According to this, Theophilus was a great lord residing in the capital of Syria" (Godet, Com., on Luke).

THESSALO'NIAN (Gr. Θεσσαλονικεὶς, thes-sal-on-ik-ee'-oos), the designation (Acts 20:4; 1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 2:1; "of Thessalonica," 27:2) of an inhabitant of THESSALONICA (q. v.).

THESSALO'NIANS, EPISTLES TO. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

THESSALONI'CA (Gr. Θεσσαλονίκη, thes-sal-on-ee'-kay), called anciently Therma. It was named after the wife of Cassander, who rebuilt the city. Under the Romans it was one of four divisions of Macedonia. Paul and Silas organized a church there (Acts 17:1-4; 1 Thess. 1:9). In Acts 20:1-3 Paul's visit is named; see also Phil. 4:16; 2 Tim. 4:10. In Acts 17:6, 8, the rulers of the city are called, in the original, polítarchai. It is now the most important town, after Constantinople, of European Turkey. Its name is Saloniki, and it has a mixed population of eighty-five thousand. Placed on the great road (Via Egnatia), which connected Rome with the whole region north of the Ægean Sea, Thessalonica was an invaluable center for the spread of the Gospel. In fact it was nearly, if not quite, on a level with Corinth and Ephesus in its share of the commerce of the Levant. The circumstance noted in Acts 17:1, that here was the synagogue of the Jews in this part of Macedonia, had evidently much to do with the apostle's plans, and also doubtless with his success. The first scene of the apostle's work at Thessalonica was the synagogue (17:2, 3).

THEU'DAS (Gr. Θευδᾶς, thyoo-das', perhaps contraction of Θεόδωρος, God-given), an insurgent mentioned by Gamaliel in his speech before the Sanhedrin, at the time of the arraignment of the apostles (Acts 5:35-39). He seems to have been a religious impostor, and to have had about four hundred adherents, who were all slain or scattered. Josephus (Ant., xx, 5, 1) informs us "that a certain magician, whose name was Theudas, persuaded a great part of the people to take their effects with them and follow him to the river Jordan; for he told them he was a prophet, and that he would, by his own command, divide the river, and afford them an easy passage over it; and many were deluded by his words. Fadus . . . sent a troop of horsemen out against them; who, falling upon them unexpectedly, slew many of them, and took many of them alive. They also took Theudas alive, and cut off his head, and carried it to Jerusalem."

THIEF. See LAW, p. 637.

THIEVES. The prophet Isaiah (1:23) says of the Israelitish rulers that they were "companions of thieves," meaning thereby that they allowed themselves to be bribed by presents of stolen goods to acts of injustice toward those who had been robbed. The men who under this name appear in the history of the crucifixion were robbers rather than thieves, belonging to the lawless bands by which Palestine was at that time and afterward infested. Against these brigands every Roman procurator had to wage continual war. It was necessary to use an armed police to encounter them (Luke 22:52). Of the previous history of the two who suffered on Golgotha we know nothing. They had been tried and condemned, and were waiting their execution before our Lord was accused. It is probable enough, as the death of Barabbas was clearly expected at the same time, that they had taken part in his insurrection. At first the thieves reviled our Lord, but afterward one of them in penitence prayed to be remembered when Jesus should come to his kingdom (Matt. 27:38, 44; Mark 15:27).

THIGH (Heb. יָרֵךְ, yaw-rake'; Gr. μηρός, may-ros'), the part of the body from the legs to the trunk.

1. In taking an oath it was an ancient custom to put the hand under the thigh. Abraham required it of his servant, when he made him swear that he would take a wife for Isaac of the daughters of the Canaanites (Gen. 24:2-9). Jacob required it of Joseph when he bound him by oath to bury him in Canaan (47:29-31). This custom, the so-called bodily oath, was, no doubt, connected with the significance of the hip as the part from which the posterity issued (46:26, margin) and the seat of vital power. The early Jewish commentators supposed it to be especially connected with the rite of circumcision.

2. It is stated (Gen. 32:25-32) that the angel touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh and put it out of joint. By the dislocation of his hip the carnal nature of his previous wrestling was declared to be powerless and wrong. By his wrestling with God Jacob entered upon a new stage in his life. Because of the dislocation of Jacob's thigh the custom grew up among his descendants of refraining from eating the nervus ischiadicus, the principal nerve in the neighborhood of the hip, which is easily injured by any violent strain in wrestling.

3. If the wife, accused by her husband of infidelity, was guilty, a part of the curse pronounced upon her was that her thigh should rot (Num. 5:21). Precisely the nature of this disease it is impossible to determine. Michaelis supposes it to have been dropsy of the ovary.

Figurative. The phrase "hip and thigh" (Heb. שֵׁן וְיָרֵךְ, shoke, Judg. 15:8) occurs in the account of Samson's slaughter of the Philistines, and is a proverbial expression for a cruel, unsparring slaughter. To uncover the thigh (Isa. 47:2) was to lay aside all feminine modesty, as to "grind at the mill" was to take a servant's place. Striking the thigh was the sign of the deepest shame (Jer. 31:19) or of sorrow (Ezek. 21:12). In Rev. 19:16 it is written, "And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written," etc. Schleusner thinks that the name was written upon the sword, which hung upon the thigh. Montfaucon gives an account of several images of warriors having inscriptions upon the thighs.

THIM'NATHAH (Josh. 19:43). See TIMNAH.

THINE WOOD. See GLOSSARY.

THIRST (Heb. צָמָא, tsaw-maw'; Gr. δίψος, dip'-sos), a painful sensation occasioned by the absence of liquids from the stomach. This sensation is sometimes accompanied by vehement desire, and the term is therefore used figuratively in the Scripture, in the moral sense of a longing after God (Psa. 42:2; 63:1; 143:6, etc.). A longing after criminal indulgence is also called thirst (Jer. 2:25). A state of continued satisfaction is expressed by the phrase, "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more" (Rev. 7:16).

THISTLE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

THOM'AS (Gr. Θωμᾶς, tho-mas', twin), also called Didymus, its Greek equivalent.

1. Name and Family. Out of this name has grown the tradition that he had a twin sister, Lydia, or that he was a twin-brother of our Lord; which last, again, would confirm his identification with Judas (comp. Matt. 13:55). He is said to have been born in Antioch, but is also considered by some a native of Galilee, like most of the other apostles (John 21:2).

2. Personal History. In the first three gospels we have an account of his call to the apostleship (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15). The rest that we know of him is derived from the gospel of John. When Jesus declared his intention of going to Bethany, Lazarus being dead, Thomas, apprehensive of danger, said to the other disciples, "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (John 11:16). At the last supper, when Jesus was speaking of his departure, Thomas said unto him, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?" (14:5). When Jesus appeared to the first assembly after his resurrection, Thomas, for some reason, was absent. The others told him, "We have seen the Lord." Thomas broke forth into an exclamation which conveys to us at once the vehemence of his doubt, and the vivid picture that his mind retained of his Master's form as he had last seen him lifeless on the cross (20:25). "And after eight days again which he did not recognize the statement of eye-witnesses as a sufficient ground of faith. In the New Testament we hear of Thomas only twice again, once on the Sea of Galilee, with six other disciples (21:2), and again in the assembly of the apostles after the ascension (Acts 1:13). The earlier traditions, as believed in the fourth century, represent him as preaching in Parthia, or Persia, and as finally buried in Edessa. The later traditions carry him farther east. His martyrdom is said to have been occasioned by a lance.

THORN, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words; indeed there are no less than twenty-two words rendered in the A. V. "thorn," "thistle," "brier," etc. (see VEGETABLE KINGDOM). In the passage "Canst thou put a hook into his [the leviathan] nose? or bore his jaw through with a thorn?" (Job 41:2; comp. 2 Chron. 33:11; Heb. תַּוּן, khô'-akh), thorn was a hook or ring put through the nostrils of large fishes in order to let them down again alive into the water and retain them as captives.

his disciples were within, and Thomas with them: then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, Peace be unto you." Turning to Thomas, he uttered the words which convey as strongly the sense of condemnation and tender reproof as those of Thomas had shown the sense of hesitation and doubt. "Then saith he to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing." The effect upon Thomas is immediate. Doubt is removed, and faith asserts itself strongly. The words in which he expresses his belief contain a high assertion of his Master's divine nature: "And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God." The answer of our Lord sums up the moral of the whole narrative: "Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (20:26-29). From this incident came the title of "Doubting Thomas," and he has been characterized as "slow to believe, subject to despondency, seeing all the difficulties of a case, viewing things on the darker side." It may be that he was of a critical tendency of mind, in Figurative. "A grieving thorn" (Ezek. 28:24) should be rendered a smarting sting, figurative of the hurts of heathenism. "The most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge" (Mic. 7:4) refers to the corruption of the nation, which was so great that even the most upright injured all who came in contact with him. In Job 5:5, "taketh it even out of the thorns," means that even a thorny hedge does not prevent them from taking the food of the orphan. From want of energy "the way of the slothful man is as an hedge of thorns" (Prov 15:19), i. e., full of almost insurmountable obstacles (comp. 22:5). To be overgrown with thorns is a figure of desolation (24:31). "The crackling of thorns under a pot" (Eccles. 7:6) is that to which the laughter of fools is compared. The wicked are often compared to thorns (2 Sam. 23:6; Nah. 1:10). Dried cow dung was the common fuel in Palestine; its slowness in burning makes the quickness of a fire of thorns the more graphic as an image of the sudden end of fools (comp. Psa. 118:12). Thorns and thistles are symbolic of false prophets (Matt. 7:16).

THORN IN THE FLESH. See PAUL.

THOUGHT. See GLOSSARY.

THRASHING. See AGRICULTURE, p. 28.

Figurative. Thrashing is used in Scripture as a figure of providential chastisement (Isa. 21: 10); crushing oppression (Isa. 41:15; Mic. 4:12, 13); judicial visitation (Jer. 51:33); the labors of ministers (1 Cor. 9:9, 10). Dust made by thrashing is a figure of complete destruction (2 Kings 13:7).

THRASHING FLOOR (Heb. תַּרְשָׁנָה, go'-ren, even), a level and hard-beaten plot in the open air (Judg. 6:37; 2 Sam. 6:6), on which sheaves of grain were thrashed (Isa. 21:10; Jer. 51:33; Mic. 4: 12; Matt. 3:12). The top of a rock was a favorite spot for this purpose; on this the sheaves were spread out, and sometimes beaten with flails—a method practiced especially with the lighter grains, such as fitches or cummin (Isa. 28:27)—but more commonly by oxen. The oxen were either yoked side by side and driven round over the grain, or yoked to a machine (Lat. tribulum or trahea), consisting of a board or a block of wood, with stones or pieces of iron fastened to the lower surface to make it rough. This was dragged over the grain, beating out the kernels.

The thrashing floors were watched all night to guard against theft of the grain (Ruth 3:4, 6, 14); they were often of considerable value, and frequently named in connection with the winepress (Deut. 16:13; 2 Kings 6:27; Hos. 9:2; Joel 2:24), since grain, wine, and oil were the more important products of the soil. They were sometimes given particular names, as that of Nachon (2 Sam. 6:6) or Chidon (1 Chron. 13:9), Atad (Gen. 50:10), Ornan or Araunah (2 Sam. 24:18, 20; 1 Chron. 21:15).

THRESHOLD, the rendering in A. V. of:

1. Saf (סַף), a sill or bottom of a doorway (Judg. 19:27; 1 Kings 14:17; Ezek. 40:6, 7; Zeph. 2:14).

2. Mif-tawn' (מִפְתָּן, a stretcher), probably the bottom beam or sill of a door (1 Sam. 5:4, 5; Ezek. 9:3; 10:4, 18; 46:2; 47:1).

3. Aw-soof (אֲוֹסוֹף, collection), only in the plural, and meaning stores, storehouses (1 Chron. 26:15, 17), especially as connected with the western gates of the temple (Neh. 12:25).

THRONE (Heb. כִּסֵּי, kis-say'; Gr. θρόνος, thron'-os; βήμα, bay'-mah). The Hebrew term kis-say' applies to any elevated seat occupied by a person in authority, whether a high priest (1 Sam. 1:9), a judge (Psa. 122:5), or a military chief (Jer. 1:15). The use of a chair in a country where the usual postures were squatting and reclining, was at all times regarded as a symbol of dignity (2 Kings 4:10; Prov. 9:14). In order to specify a throne in our sense of the term it was necessary to add to kis-say' the notion of royalty; hence the frequent occurrence of such expressions as "the throne of the kingdom" (Deut. 17:18; 1 Kings 1: 46; 2 Chron. 7:18). The characteristic feature in the royal throne was its elevation: Solomon's throne was approached by six steps (1 Kings 10: 19; 2 Chron. 9:18); and Jehovah's throne is described as "high and lifted up" (Isa. 6:1). The materials and workmanship were costly. It was furnished with arms or "stays." The steps were also lined with pairs of lions. As to the form of the chair, we are only informed in 1 Kings 10:19 that "the top was round behind." The king sat on his throne on state occasions. At such times he appeared in his royal robes.

Figurative. The throne was the symbol of supreme power and dignity (Gen. 41:40). "To sit upon the throne" implied the exercise of regal power (Deut. 17:18; 1 Kings 16:11); to "sit upon the throne of another" (1 Kings 1:13) meant to succeed him as king. "Thrones" also designates earthly potentates and celestial beings, archangels (Col. 1:16).

THUMMIM. See URIM AND THUMMIM.

THUNDER (Heb. קוֹל or קָל, kole, a voice, i. e., of Jehovah; רָעַם, rah'-am, a peal; Gr. βροντή, bron-tay'). In a physical point of view the most noticeable feature in connection with thunder is the extreme rarity of its occurrence during the summer months in Palestine and the adjacent countries. From the middle of April to the middle of September it is hardly ever heard. Hence it was selected by Samuel as a striking expression of the divine displeasure toward the Israelites (1 Sam. 12:17). Rain in harvest was deemed as extraordinary as snow in summer (Prov. 26:1), and Jerome asserts that he had never witnessed it in the latter part of June or in July (Com., on Amos 4:7). The plague of hail in Egypt is naturally represented as accompanied with "mighty thunderings" (Exod. 9:22-29, 33, 34). It accompanied the lightnings at the giving of the law (19:16; 20:18). It is referred to as a natural phenomenon subject to laws of the Creator (Job 28:26; 38:25).

In John 12:28 it is related that there "came a voice from heaven" in response to the prayer of Jesus. "It is a voice which came miraculously from God; yet, as regards its intelligibility conditioned by the subjective disposition and receptivity of the hearers, which sounded with a tone as of thunder, so that the definite words which resounded in this form of sound remained unintelligible to the unsusceptive, who simply heard that majestic kind of sound, but not its contents, situated on the confines of Mysia and Ionia, a little south of the river Hyllus, and at the northern extremity of the valley between Mount Tmolus and the southern ridge of Temnus. It was one of the many Macedonian colonies established in Asia Minor, in the sequel of the destruction of the Persian empire by Alexander. The waters of Thyatira are said to be so well adapted for dyeing that in no place can the scarlet cloth, out of which fezes are made, be so brilliantly or so permanently dyed as here. So in the Acts (16:14) Lydia, the first convert of Paul at Philippi, is mentioned as a seller of purple from Thyatira. The principal deity of the city was Apollo, worshiped as the sun-god under the surname Tyrimnas. He was no doubt introduced by the Macedonian colonists, for the name is Macedonian. A priestess of Artemis is also mentioned in the inscriptions. Another superstition of an extremely curious nature, which existed at Thyatira, seems to have been brought and said, Βροντῆν γεγεῖναι ("It is thunder")" (Meyer, Com., in loc.). Mark (3:17) tells us that our Lord surnamed James and John "Boanerges, which is, The sons of thunder." Some have thought that this was applied to them because of their eloquence; others to their courage and energy. It seems more likely that it referred to their impetuous, ardent temperament.

Figurative. In the imaginative philosophy of the Hebrews thunder was regarded as the voice of Jehovah (Job 37:2, 4, 5; 40:9; Psa. 18:13; 29:3-9; Isa. 30:30, 31), who dwelt behind the thundercloud (Psa. 81:7). Thunder was, to the mind of the Jew, the symbol of divine power (29:3, etc.) and vengeance (1 Sam. 2:10; 2 Sam. 22:14).

THUNDERBOLT (Heb. רֶשֶׁת, reh'-shef, a live coal, an arrow). In accordance with the popular notion "hot thunderbolts" (Psa. 78:48) meant lightnings, with reference, doubtless, to the manner in which lightning strikes the earth.

THYATIRA (Gr. Θυάτιρα, thoo-at'-i-rah), a city in Asia Minor, the seat of one of the seven Apocalyptic churches (Rev. 1:11; 2:18). It was thither by some of the corrupted Jews of the dispersed tribes. A fane stood outside the walls, dedicated to Sambatha—the name of the sibyl who is sometimes called Chaldean, sometimes Jewish, sometimes Persian—in the midst of an inclosure designated "the Chaldean's court." This seems to lend an illustration to the obscure passage in Rev. 2:20, 21, which Grotius interprets of the wife of the bishop. Now there is evidence to show that in Thyatira there was a great amalgamation of races. But amalgamation of different races in pagan nations always went together with a syncretism of different religions, every relation of life having its religious sanction. If the sibyl Sambatha was really a Jewess, lending her aid to this proceeding, and not discountenanced by the authorities of the Judeo-Christian Church at Thyatira, both the censure and its qualification become easy of explanation. Dr. Milligan (Expositor's Bible) thinks that the Jezebel referred to in connection with Thyatira was the Old Testament character of that name; and that the sin of the church in Thyatira was that it tolerated the evil of which she was so striking a representative.

TIBERIAS

TIBERIAS (Gr. Τιβεριάς, tib-er-ee-as'), a city in the time of Christ, on the Sea of Galilee; first mentioned in the New Testament (John 6:1, 23; 21:1), and then by Josephus, who states that it was built by Herod Antipas, and was named by him in honor of the emperor Tiberius. It was one of neighborhood. Tiberias was the capital of Galilee from the time of its origin until the reign of Herod Agrippa II, who changed the seat of power back again to Sepphoris, where it had been before the founding of the new city. Many of the inhabitants were Greeks and Romans, and foreign nine towns round the sea, each one having not less than fifteen thousand inhabitants. It was probably a new town, and not a restored or enlarged one merely; for "Rakkath" (Josh. 19:35), which is said in the Talmud to have occupied the same position, lay in the tribe of Naphtali, whereas Tiberias appears to have been within the limits of Zebulun (Matt. 4:13). G. A. Smith, however, thinks it may be the same with Rakkath, or in its customs prevailed there to such an extent as to give offense to the stricter Jews. The ancient name has survived in that of the modern Tübarieh, which occupies unquestionably the original site, except that it is confined to narrower limits than those of the original city. Near Tübarieh, about a mile farther south along the shore, are the celebrated warm baths, which the Roman naturalists reckoned among the greatest known curiosities of the world. The intermediate space between these baths and the town abounds with traces of ruins, such as the foundations of walls, heaps of stones, blocks of granite, and the like; and it cannot be doubted, therefore, that the ancient Tiberias occupied also this ground, and was much more extensive than its modern successor. It stood anciently as now, on the western shore, about two thirds of the way between the northern and southern end of the Sea of Galilee. There is a margin or strip of land there between the water and the steep hills (which elsewhere in that quarter come down so boldly to the edge of the lake), about two miles long and a quarter of a mile broad. The tract in question is somewhat undulating, but approximates to the character of a plain. Tüberiah, the modern town, occupies the northern end of this parallelogram, and the warm baths the southern extremity; so that the more extended city of the Roman age must have covered all, or nearly all, of the peculiar ground whose limits are thus clearly defined. Its newness, uncleanness, bad character of its inhabitants, and idolatry, may account for its absence from the records of our Lord's ministry on the lake. After the fall of Jerusalem the Jews resorted thither, it became their metropolis, and, after A. D. 150, the seat of the Sanhedrin, and the rabbinical schools, from which came the Talmud and the Masorah.

TIBERIAS, THE SEA OF, another name (John 21:1 only) for the Sea of Galilee (comp. 6:1). It is thought that the evangelist used this name as being more familiar to nonresidents in Palestine than the indigenous name of the "Sea of Galilee" (q. v.) or "Sea of Gennesaret."

TIBERIUS (Gr. Τιβέριος, tib-er'-ee-os, pertaining to the Tiber; in full, Tiberius Claudius Nero Cæsar), the second Roman emperor, successor of Augustus, who began to reign A. D. 14, and reigned until A. D. 37. He was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia, and hence a stepson of Augustus. He was born at Rome on the 16th of November, B. C. 42. He became emperor in his fifty-fifth year, after having distinguished himself as a commander in various wars, and having evinced talents of a high order as an orator and an administrator of civil affairs. He even gained the reputation of possessing the sterner virtues of the Roman character, and was regarded as entirely worthy of the imperial honors to which his birth and supposed personal merits at length opened the way. Yet, on being raised to the supreme power, he suddenly became, or showed himself to be, a very different man. His subsequent life was one of inactivity, sloth, and self-indulgence. He was despotic in his government, cruel and vindictive in his disposition. Tiberius died at the age of seventy-eight, after a reign of twenty-three years.

He is mentioned in Scripture only in Luke 3:1, where he is termed Tiberius Cæsar. John the Baptist, it is there said, began his ministry in the fifteenth year of his reign, an important chronological statement, helping to determine the year of Christ's birth and entrance on his public life.

TIB'HATH (Heb. טִּבְחָת, tib-khath', slaughter), a city of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (1 Chron. 18:8), called BETHA (q. v.) in 2 Sam. 8:8, probably an accidental transposition of the first two letters.

TIB'NI (Heb. טִּבְנִי, tib-nee', strawy), the sixth king of Israel, and son of Ginath. After the tragic death of Zimri there was a division among the people, "half followed Tibni . . . and half followed Omri." After a struggle lasting four years Omri's party prevailed, and, according to the brief account of the historian, "Tibni died, and Omri reigned" (1 Kings 16:21, 22), B. C. 886.

TIDAL (Heb. תִּדְאֵל, tid-ael'), the name of a king who accompanied Chedorlaomer in his raid into Palestine about 2250 B. C. Of the personality of this king nothing else is known. The name has, however, been unexpectedly found by Mr. Pinches upon a broken Babylonian tablet of the reign of Hammurabi, king of Babylon (B. C. 2287-2283?). Upon this inscription the name is written, "Tudghulla, son of Gazza." This discovery is very important, because by it the chain of evidence which connects the 14th chapter of Genesis with Babylonian history is materially strengthened. The country ruled by Tidal was Gouim, often translated "nations or Gentiles." It is not yet certainly located. Hommel believes it to be Goi, in northeastern Babylonia. LITERATURE.—Sayce, Patriarchal Palestine, London, 1895 (especially the preface).—R. W. R.

TIGLATH-PILESER, the name of an Assyrian-king (see also PUL). The name of Tiglath-pileser fills a large place in the history of the Hebrew people before the fall of Samaria. It was in the reign of Tiglath-pileser III, known also to us under the name of Pul, that they first sensibly felt the menace of complete overthrow by the Assyrians. (1) Name and origin. The name Tiglath-pileser appears in Assyrian under the form of Tukulti-apal-esharra, but this was abbreviated even by the Assyrians themselves. It was a famous name in the annals of Assyria, for one of the greatest Assyrian conquerors, Tiglath-pileser I (about 1120 B. C.), had borne it. Tiglath-pileser III was, however, a far greater man than his earlier namesake. He was not of royal origin. Of his origin, indeed, nothing is known. It is probable that he was an Assyrian general. He may have been also an administrator or governor of one of the vast provinces of the Assyrian empire. He appears suddenly upon the scene of historical action. He says nothing in his inscriptions of his father or of his mother. His inscriptions were mutilated long after his death by Esar-haddon, an indignity offered to no other king, and these facts lead irresistibly to the conclusion that he was not a member of the royal family. The king who preceded him upon the throne was Asshur-nirari III, who reigned weakly from 784 to 745 B. C. In the year 746 there was a rebellion against his rule. Whether Tiglath-pileser, then perhaps a general, set this rebellion on foot, participated in it, or merely reaped its results, we have no means of knowing, but immediately upon the death of Asshur-nirari III he was acknowledged king of Assyria. (2) Reign. The very first years of his reign showed him a masterful man. In other instances in Assyrian history such an usurpation would have been followed by petty wars and insurrections all over the kingdom, but no audible murmur was heard at the beginning of his reign. He was evidently known everywhere as a man with whom it would be dangerous to trifle. His reign was not long (745-727 B. C.), and he may have come to the throne comparatively late in life. Whatever his name was, he assumed at once the royal style of Tiglath-pileser, adopting as his own a famous name. Were it not for the abuse of his inscriptions, suffered at the hands of Esar-haddon, we should know all the events of his reign in great detail. He had restored the palace of Shalmaneser II, in Kalchi. Upon the walls of its great rooms he placed stone slabs with beautifully engraved thought he was far enough away to place them out of danger. Some of the previous kings had tried in a very slight fashion colonization and deportation, but without conspicuous success. These were made by Tiglath-pileser III his chief methods. He first conquered a people and then deported the best of them to another part of his dominions, bringing from that place enough people to colonize the land thus vacated. For many peoples this was punishment worse than death. From his point of view it contributed to stability by making successful rebellion almost an impossibility. He further set Assyrian governors over conquered provinces, and endeavored not only to collect tribute annually, but also to administer all the affairs of the land as a part of the Assyrian empire which he was building. Campaign followed campaign, north, east, and south, with lesser invasions also in the west. All these things affected the Hebrew people but little. They were, however, a threat of what might be when once he was free to set about to the conquest of Palestine. (3) Relation with Israel. Nominally some of the states of Syria and Palestine were already Assyrian tributaries, but Assyrian influence had been little felt for a long time. If it had been possible to unite all the petty kingdoms of Syria, Palestine, and their neighboring countries into one great confederation for mutual defense it would probably have been possible to prevent the reconquest of the west by the Assyrians, even under so great a master as Tiglath-pileser III. But the weakness of the west lay in its utter inability to put aside selfish and petty concerns to work for united interests. Some of these states determined again, about 739 B. C., to throw off the Assyrian yoke. At the head of the coalition thus formed Azariah, or Uzziah, king of Judah, took his stand. To support him Hamath, Damascus, Tyre, Que, Melid, Samaria, and others, to the number of nineteen, had banded together. It was indeed a promising confederation. If these nineteen states should put their full quota of men into the field under competent military direction they would, no doubt, be able to resist the Assyrians, and to prevent, and, at least, postpone the engulfing of Syria into the now rapidly growing Assyrian empire. But before any combination of their forces could be brought about Tiglath-pileser came west and entered Palestine, apparently determined to attack the ringleader, Uzziah, in his own territory, before his allies could come to his aid. As soon as he entered the northern kingdom Menahem threw down his arms and paid the Assyrians one thousand talents of silver as a token of subjection. Here was practically an end of the entire confederation. Tiglath-pileser was apparently satisfied with this collapse, and as the others were willing to pay inscriptions recounting the campaigns of his reign. Besides these he left inscriptions written upon clay, giving accounts of his campaigns grouped in geographical order; and supplemented these by other inscriptions on clay containing lists of the countries conquered, but without any details of the campaigns. The first matter that claimed the attention of the new king was an invasion of Babylonia, rendered necessary to drive out nomadic Aramæans who had invaded and settled in the country, and threatened to destroy its civilization. The march of the new Assyrian king southward was a triumphal progress. He was heralded as a deliverer, and soon reestablished an orderly government in the kingdom of Babylonia. After this he turned into the northwest and into the east, where he collected heavy tribute from peoples who had refused it during the weak reign of his predecessor. At the very beginning he introduced an entirely new method of dealing with conquered peoples. Before his reign the Assyrian kings had for the most part contented themselves with predatory raids by which they enormously increased the wealth of Assyria, but contributed little to the upbuilding of stable government in the conquered lands. Peoples thus conquered paid tribute while the conqueror was at hand, and refused when they tribute, he did not pursue the advantage which he had gained, but went back to Assyria laden with a heavy booty, to which Rezon of Damascus and Hiram of Tyre had also contributed. In 734 B. C. we find him again on the Mediterranean coast. In this year he seems to have crossed the plain of Syria, near Damascus, and to have gone straight to the coast, which he followed toward the south. He had no fear of Tyre nor of Sidon, for they were busy with commerce, and he needed to strike but a few light blows before Gaza was reached. Here, if ever, Egypt and Syria and all the West ought to have made a stand against the Assyrians, but no stand was made, and Gaza was overwhelmed. In the reign of Ahaz, king of Judah, with him Pekah of Samaria and Rezon of Damascus, was another opportunity for coalition against Assyria, but Pekah and Rezon thought they saw in the youth of Ahaz a chance for the enrichment of their own kingdoms. They united forces and invaded Judah. So began the Syro-Ephraimitic war. Ahaz was likely to be overwhelmed. To whom should he turn for help? No help was to be had in Egypt, and in the madness of the hour he sent an embassy to meet Tiglath-pileser and sue for help against Damascus and Samaria. Tiglath-pileser accepted a bribe from Ahaz, for it suited his own future purposes so to do, and at once threatened Damascus. This drew off from Judah the armies of Damascus and Samaria. Tiglath-pileser then passed by Damascus, came down the sea coast past his tributary states of Tyre and Sidon, and turned into the plain of Esdraelon above Carmel. His own accounts fail us at this point, but the biblical narrative fills the gap by stating that he took a number of cities and overran the land (2 Kings 15:29). He might then have attacked Samaria itself, but the party of assassins made that unnecessary, for they slew the king, and in his place Tiglath-pileser set up Hoshea as the nominal king of Samaria, but as his personal representative (15:30). Damascus was next besieged, and the entire country about it given over to desolation. Tiglath-pileser boasts that he destroyed at this time five hundred and ninety-one cities, whose inhabitants were carried away with all their possessions to Assyria. Ahaz of Judah came to pay honor in Damascus to this foreign conqueror, who was now practically master over the whole country. He it was who had prepared the way for the destruction of Samaria by Shalmaneser IV and Sargon II (722 B. C.). His later career has but little bearing upon the Old Testament story. In 728 B. C., upon New Year's Day, he was solemnly anointed king of Babylon, and in 727 he died. Upon any basis of estimate whatever he ranks as one of the greatest conquerors and one of the greatest executives among all the lines of great rulers who made Assyria a dreaded name in Asia.

He made the Assyrian empire out of a kingdom and a few dependencies. He made it a world power, binding province to province, and transforming local centers into general centers by deportation and colonization.—R. W. R.

TIGRIS (Gr. Tίγρις, tig'-ris) is used in the Septuagint as the equivalent of the Heb. כְּחַדְדֵּל (khid-deh'-kel, A. V. Hiddekel, Gen. 2:14), one of the rivers of Eden. Dr. Sayce says (High. Crit., etc., p. 96): "The name of Hiddekel, or Tigris, was also Accadian. In the old language of Babylonia it was termed Idiqla and Idiqla, 'the encircling,' which the Semitic successors of the Accadians changed into the feminines Idiqlat and Idiqlat. From Idiqlat the Persians formed their Tigrá with a play upon a word in their own language which signified an 'arrow.' The Hiddekel, we are told, flowed 'to the east of Asshur.' But the Asshur meant is not the land of Assyria, as the A. V. supposes, but the city of Assur, the primitive capital of the country, now represented by the mounds of Kalah Sherghat. The land of Assyria lay to the east as well as to the west of the Tigris." Daniel

Captivity of the Inhabitants. (From the Monuments.)

(10:4) calls it "the great river, which is Hiddekel." It rises in the mountains of Armenia, about thirty miles northwest of Diarbekir, at no great distance from the sources of the Euphrates, and pursues a meandering course for upward of one thousand one hundred miles, when they at last unite and flow as one stream into the Persian Gulf.

TIK'VAH (Heb. תִּיקְוָה, tik-vaw', a cord, or hope).

1. The son of Harhas, and father of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 Kings 22:14), B. C. before 624. He is called in 2 Chron. 34:22, TIKVATH.
2. The father of Jahaziah, which latter was one of the rulers appointed by Ezra to superintend the divorcement of the Gentile wives after the captivity (Ezra 10:15), B. C. before 437.

TIK'VATH (Heb. text, תִּיקְוָה, to-kah'-ath, obedience, marg. תִּיקְוָה, tok-hath'), the father of Shallum (2 Chron. 34:32). See TIKVAH (2 Kings 22:14).

TIL'GATH-PILNE'SER, a variation (1 Chron. 5:6, 26; 2 Chron. 28:20) of TIGLATH PILESER.

TILE (Heb. לֵבְנָה, leb-ay-naw', so called from the whitish clay, a brick (Ezek. 4:1) used to write upon. When the clay was in a soft, moist state, in its mold or frame, the characters were inscribed upon it, and then the clay was baked. Such was the perfection of the manufacture that some of them are in a state of fine preservation after three thousand years. See WRITING.

TILING (Gr. κέραμος, ker'-am-os, pottery ware). The rendering of the A. V., Luke 5:19, "through the tiling" (διὰ τῶν κεράμων), has been the cause of considerable difficulty. Some have understood by the tiling the layer of sticks, brush, and hard-rolled clay which constitutes the ordinary flat roof of an oriental house. Of course, the breaking up of this might be readily repaired, but would cause an intolerable dust at the time. Dr. Edersheim (Life of Jesus, i, 503) says: "The roof itself, which had hard-beaten earth or rubble underneath it, was paved with brick, stone, or any other hard substance, and surrounded by a balustrade which, according to Jewish law, was at least three feet high. It is scarcely possible to imagine that the bearers of the paralytic would have attempted to dig through this into a room below, not to speak of the interruption and inconvenience caused to those below by such an operation. But no such objection attaches if we regard it not as the main roof of the house, but as that of the covered gallery under which we are supposing the Lord to have stood. . . . In such case it would have been comparatively easy to 'unroof' the covering of 'tiles,' and then 'having dug out' an opening through the lighter framework which supported the tiles, to let down their burden 'into the midst before Jesus.'"

TILLAGE. 1. Neer (Heb. נִיר or נֵר, Prov. 13:23), to break up with a plow (comp. Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:12).

2. Ab-o-daw' (Heb. עֲבֹדָה or עֲבוּדָה, work), i. e., servile labor (Lev. 25:39); work, business (1 Chron. 9:19). Specifically, work of the field, agriculture (1 Chron. 27:26; Neh. 10:37).

TIL'ON (Heb. תִּילּוֹן, tee-lone', suspension, or חִילּוֹן, too-lone', gift, or scorn), the last named of the four "sons" of Shimon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20), B. C. perhaps 1170.

TIME'US, more correctly TIMÆ'US (Gr. Τίμαϊος, tim'-ah-yos), father of the blind beggar cured by Christ (Mark 10:46), the son being thence called BARTIMEUS (q. v.).

TIMBREL. See MUSIC, p. 765.

TIME, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek terms, of which the following are most important:

1. Yome (Heb. יוֹם, a day), used both in the particular sense of a natural day (see below), and in the general sense of a set time.

2. Zem-awn' (Heb. זְמַן), an appointed time; thus "To everything there is a season" (Eccles. 3:1), i. e., everything remains but for a time; all things are frail and fleeting. In Dan. 2:16 it is an appointed season.

3. Mo-ade' (Heb. מוֹעֵד, an appointment), a space of time, appointed and definite (Exod. 34:18; 1 Sam. 13:8; Isa. 14:31, etc.).

4. Maw-khaur' (Heb. מָוֹךְ, deferred) is time to come, to-morrow (Exod. 13:14; Josh. 4:6, 21; comp. 1 Sam. 20:12).

5. Id-dawn' (Heb. יָדָע, a set time) is used in the Book of Daniel in a sense that has been much disputed. In Dan. 4:16, 23, 25, 32, the prophet writes of Nebuchadnezzar, "Let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him; and let seven times pass over him." Gesenius (Lexicon) gives its meaning as prophetic language for a year. "Following the example of the LXX. and of Josephus, many ancient and recent interpreters understood by the word יָדָע years, because the times in 7:25; 12:7 are also years, and because in 4:29 mention is made of twelve months, and thereby the time is defined as one year. But from 4:29 the duration of the יָדָע cannot at all be concluded, and in 7:25 and 12:7 the times are not years. Id-dawn' (יָדָע) designates generally a definite period of time, whose length or duration may be very different" (Keil, Com., on Dan. 4:16).

6. Ayth (Heb. אֵיִת) is a general term for time; e. g., the time of evening (Josh. 8:29, A. V. "even-tide"); time of bearing (Job 39:1, 2); at or about a time (Dan. 9:21); time or season of love (Ezek. 16:8), i. e., of young women at marriageable age, etc.

7. Pah'am (Heb. פֵּאֵם, a stroke), a tread of the foot, step (Psa. 119:126); one time (Gen. 18:32, A. V. "this once;" Exod. 9:27; Prov. 7:12, A. V. "now").

8. O-lawm' (Heb. עֲלָמִים or עֲלֻמִים, concealed), hidden time, i. e., obscure and long, of which the beginning or end is indefinite, duration, everlasting, eternity (Josh. 24:2; Deut. 32:7, A. V. "days of old;" Prov. 8:23, "everlasting").

9. Kahec-ros' (Gr. καῖρός, an occasion, set time; khron'-os (Gr. χρόνος), a space of time, opportunity, etc.

TIME, DIVISIONS OF. The following are mentioned in Scripture:

1. Year (Heb. שָׁנָה, shaw-naw', as a revolution of time), so called from the change of the seasons. The years of the Hebrews in the pre-exilic period were lunar, of 354 days 8 hours 38 seconds, and consisted of twelve unequal lunar months. As this falls short of the true year (an astronomical month having 29 days 12 hours 44 minutes 2.84 seconds), they were compelled, in order to preserve the regularity of harvest and vintage (Exod. 23:16), to add a month occasionally, thus making it, on the average, to coincide with the solar year (containing 365 days 5 hours 48 minutes 45 seconds). The method of doing this among the very ancient Hebrews is unknown. Among the later Jews an intercalary month was inserted after Adar and was called Ve-dar, or second Adar. The intercalation was regularly decreed by the Sanhedrin, which observed the rule never to add a month to the sabbatical year.

The Hebrew year began, as the usual enumeration of the months shows (Lev. 23:34; 25:9; Num.

9:11; 2 Kings 25:8; Jer. 39:2; comp. 1 Macc. 4: 52; 10:21), with Abib or Nisan (Esth. 3:7), subsequent to and in accordance with the Mosaic arrangement. As we constantly find this arrangement spoken of as a festal calendar, most rabbinical and many Christian scholars understand that the civil year began, as with the modern Jews, with Tisri (October), but the ecclesiastical year with Nisan.

A well-defined and universal era was unknown among the ancient Hebrews. National events were sometimes dated from the exodus from Egypt (Exod. 19:1; Num. 33:38; 1 Kings 6:1), usually from the accession of the kings (as in Kings, Chronicles, and Jeremiah), or the erection of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 8:1; 9:10), later from the beginning of the exile (Ezek. 33:21; 40:1), but in Ezek. 1:1 otherwise. For special purposes, such as the tithing of cattle and the planting of trees, the Jewish year began at distinct times. The regnal year began with Nisan. The first year of each king's reign began on the first day of Nisan after his accession, the preceding days being counted to his predecessor. This accounts for the precise specification of the time of three months, as exceptional, in the case of the reigns of Jehohabaz and Jeconiah. The post-exilian books date according to the reigning years of the Persian masters of Palestine (Ezra 4:24; 6:15; 7:7, sq.; Neh. 2:1; 13:6; Hag. 1:1, 2, etc.).

As Syrian vassals the Jews adopted the Greek (1 Macc. 1:10) or Seleucid era, which dated from the overthrow of Babylon by Seleucus Nicator I. Still another national reckoning is given (1 Macc. 13:41, sq.), viz., from the year of the deliverance of the Jews from the Syrian yoke, i. e., seventeen of the Seleucian era, or from the autumn of B. C. 143.

2. Month (Heb. חֹדֶשׁ, khō'-desh, the new moon). The Hebrew months were lunar, and began from the new moon as ocularily observed; at least this is the case from the post-exilian period. In this period the length of the lunar month depended upon the day when the appearance of the new moon was announced by the Sanhedrin, which thus made the month either twenty-nine days or thirty days, according as the day was included in the following or the preceding month. The general rule was that in one year not less than four nor more than eight full months should occur. The final adjustment of the lunar to the solar year was by intercalation, so that whenever in the last month, Adar, it became evident that the pass-over, which must be held in the following month, Nisan, would occur before harvest, i. e., not at the time when the sun would be in Aries, an entire month was interjected between Adar and Nisan, constituting an intercalary year. This, however, according to the Gemara, did not take place in a sabbatic year, but always in that which preceded it; nor in two successive years, nor yet more than three years apart.

Before the exile the individual months were usually designated by numbers (the twelfth month occurs in 2 Kings 25:27; Jer. 52:31; Ezek. 29:1); yet we also find the following names: Ear month (Heb. חֹדֶשׁ הָאָזְבִיב, khō'-desh haw-aw-beeb', Exod.

13:4; 23:15; Deut. 16:1), corresponding to the later Nisan; Bloom month (חֹדֶשׁ זֵבֶב, khō'-desh zeev, 1 Kings 6:1, 37), the second month; Rain month (חֹדֶשׁ בֹּוֹל, yeh'-rakh bool, 6:38), the eighth month; Freshet month (חֹדֶשׁ הַחֲדָשִׁים, yeh'-rakh haw-ath-aw-neem', 8:2), the seventh month; all of which seem to be mere appellatives. Occasionally the months were newly numbered after the post-exilian period.

After the exile the months received the following names: (1) Nisan (חֹדֶשׁ נִסָּן, nee-sawn', Neh. 2:1; Esth. 3:7), the first month, in which the passover was held and in which the vernal equinox fell; (2) Iyār (חֹדֶשׁ יָאָר, ee-yavor', Targum on 2 Chron. 30:2); (3) Sivān (חֹדֶשׁ סִיּוֹן, see-vawn', Esth. 8:9); (4) Tammāz (חֹדֶשׁ תַּמּוּז, tam-mooz'); (5) Ab (חֹדֶשׁ אָב, avd); (6) Elul (חֹדֶשׁ אֱלּוּל, el-ool', Neh. 6:15), the last month of the civil year in the post-exilian age; (7) Tishri (חֹדֶשׁ תִּשְׁרִי, tish-ree'), in which the festivals of atonement and tabernacles fell; (8) Marches-vān (חֹדֶשׁ מַרְחֶשְׁוָן, mar-khesh-vawn', Josephus, Ant., i, 3, 3); (9) Chisleū (חֹדֶשׁ כִּסְלֵו, kis-lave', Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:1); (10) Tebēth (חֹדֶשׁ תְּבֵת, tay-belh', Esth. 2:16); (11) Shebāt (חֹדֶשׁ שֶׁבַת, sheb-awt', Zech. 1:7); (12) Adār (חֹדֶשׁ אָדָר, ad-awr', Esth. 3:7; 8:12).

3. Week (Heb. שָׁבִיעַת, shaw-boo'-ah, sewened; Gr. σάββατον, sab'-bat-on, rest, by extension sewnight, i. e., the interval between two sabbaths). The division of time into weeks is met with as early as Gen. 2:2, 3; and in the narrative of the deluge more than one allusion occurs to this mode of computing time (7:4, 10; 8:10, 12). Later, weeks appear to have been known among the Syrians of Mesopotamia (29:27, 28), while still later they attached a certain sacredness to the number seven, if we may judge from the procedure of Balaam (Deut. 23:4; Num. 23:1, 4, 14, 29). Weeks appear to have been known in Egypt in the time of Joseph (Gen. 50:10, 11). The septenary (weekly) institutions constituted a very prominent feature of the Mosaic law (Num. 19:11; 28:17; Exod. 13:6, 7; 34:18; Lev. 14:38; 23:42; Deut. 16:8, 13). Ordinarily, however, days rather than weeks (as among the Greeks and Romans) constituted the conventional mode of computing time (see Lev. 12:8; Dan. 10:2, sq.).

In the post-exilian period the reckoning by weeks became more customary, and at length special names for particular week days came into use (Mark 16:2, 9; Luke 24:1; Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2). The astronomical derivation of the week naturally grows out of the obvious fact that the moon changes about every seven—properly, seven and three eighths—days, so that the lunar month divides itself into four quarters. The days of the week were named long before the Christian era on regular astronomical principles from the seven planets; which was an Egyptian invention. They began with Saturn's day (Saturday), inasmuch as Saturn was the outermost planet; but among the Jews this day (the Sabbath) was the last of the week, and so the Jewish and Christian week commences with Sunday. These heathen names were never in general use among the Jews. Weeks (or heptads) of years belong, among the Jews, to prophetic poetry, but in one instance they occur in a literal sense in prose (Dan. 9:24-27).

4. Day (Heb. יוֹם, yome; Gr. ἡμέρα, hay-mer'-ah), one of the commonest and most ancient of the divisions of time. As used in Gen. 1:5, etc., day marks an entire revolution of time, as of natural day and night; not day as distinguished from night, but day and night together. "If the days of creation are regulated by the recurring interchange of light and darkness, they must be regarded not as periods of time of incalculable duration, of years or thousands of years, but as simple earthly days. It is true the morning and evening of the first three days were not produced by the rising and setting of the sun, since the sun was not yet created; but the constantly recurring interchange of light and darkness, which produced day and night upon the earth, cannot for a moment be understood as denoting that the light called forth from the darkness of chaos returned to that darkness again, and thus periodically burst forth and disappeared. The only way in which we can represent it to ourselves is by supposing that the light called forth by the creative mandate was separated from the dark mass of the earth, and concentrated outside or above the globe, so that the interchange of light and darkness took place as soon as the dark chaotic mass began to rotate, and to assume in the process of creation the form of a spherical body. The time occupied in the first rotations of the earth upon its axis cannot, indeed, be measured by our hourglass; but even if they were slower at first, and did not attain their present velocity till the completion of our solar system, this would make no essential difference between the first three days and the last three, which were regulated by the rising and setting of the sun" (K. and D., Com., on Gen. 1:5).

From a very early period the time of reckoning the day was from sunset to sunset, and this became the Jewish method (Lev. 23:32; comp. Exod. 12:18). The Phœnicians, Numidians, and other nations of the East are said to have followed the same custom, if it was not indeed the custom generally followed in remote antiquity. "The ancient Germans (Tacitus, ch. xi) compute not the number of days, but of nights; the night appears to draw on the day." And Cæsar says (Bell. Gal., vi, 18) of the Gauls, "They measure time not by the number of days, but of nights; and accordingly observe their birthdays, and the beginning, of months and years, so as to make the day follow the night." Of this custom we have a memorial in our "sennight," "fortnight," to express the period of seven and fourteen days respectively.

Figurative. Day is often used by sacred writers, in a general sense, for a definite period of time—an era or season, when something remarkable has taken place, or is destined to do so (Gen. 2:4; Isa. 22:5; Joel 2:2, etc.). And it accorded with Hebrew usage to designate by the term day or night what probably formed only a part of these; thus by three days and three nights might be understood only a portion of three (Matt. 12:40; 27:63, 64; comp. with 1 Kings 12:5, 12). As it is also by day that the more active portion of man's life is spent, so day is used to express the whole term of life considered as a season of active labor (John 9:4).

5. Hour (Chald. שָׁעָה, shaw-aw', properly a look; Gr. ὥρα, ho'-rah). The mention of hours first occurs in Scripture at the time of the Babylonian captivity (Dan. 3:6; 5:5). It would appear that the Babylonians were among the first to adopt the division of twelve equal parts for the day, as Herodotus testifies (ii, 109) that the Greeks derived this custom from the Babylonians. The Hebrews also adopted it; and in the New Testament we read of the third, sixth, the ninth hours of the day, which were the more marked divisions of the twelve. The night was divided into the same number of parts. From the variations in sunrise and sunset this division, which had these natural phenomena for its two terminations, could never attain to exactness, and was therefore unsuited to nations that had reached a high degree of civilization. Such nations accordingly fell upon the plan of adopting midnight as the fixed point from which the whole diurnal revolution might be reckoned, divided into twice twelve, or twenty-four hours.

The following table gives the Jewish divisions of the day, according to natural phenomena and religious observances:

ENGLISH HOUR.	JEWISH.	SCRIPTURE.	NAME IN TALMUD.
6:00 P. M.	Sunset.	Gen. 28:1; Exod. 17:12; Josh. 8:29, etc.	Twilight (Arab. 'Ahra).
6:20 "	Stars appear.		Evening Shema, or prayer.
10:00 "	First watch ends.	Lam. 2:19.	The ass brays.
12:00 "	Midnight.	Exod. 11:4; Ruth 3:8; Psa. 119:62; Matt. 25:6; Luke 11:5.
2:00 A. M.	Second watch ends.	Judg. 7:19.	The dog barks.
3:00 "	Cock crow.	Mark 13:35; Matt. 26:75.
4:30 "	Second cock crow.	Matt. 26:75; Mark 14:30.
5:40 "	Column of dawn.		Twilight (Arab. Subâh).
6:00 "	Sunrise (third watch ends).	Exod. 14:24; Num. 21:11; Deut. 4:41; Josh. 1:15; 1 Sam. 11:11.	Three blasts of trumpet (Arab. Doher). Morning sacrifice.
9:00 "	First hour of prayer.	Acts 2:15.
12:00 M.	Noon.	Gen. 43:16; 1 Kings 18:26; Job 5:14.
1:30 P. M.	Great vesper.		First Mincha.
3:30 "	Small vesper.		Second Mincha (Arab. 'Aser). Arab. Mogorib , before sunset. Evening sacrifice at northeast of altar. Nine blasts of trumpet.
5:40 "			Six blasts of trumpet, on eve of Sabbath.
6:00 "	Sunset.	Gen. 15:12; Exod. 17:12; Luke 4:40, etc.

TIM'NA (Heb. תִּמְנָה, tim-naw', restraint).

1. A concubine of Eliphaz, son of Esau, and mother of Amalek (Gen. 36:12). In 1 Chron. 1:36 she is named (by an ellipsis) as a son of Eliphaz. She is probably the same as the sister of Lotan, and daughter of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:22; 1 Chron. 1:39).

2. A duke (or sheik) of Edom (Gen. 36:40; 1 Chron. 1:51, A. V. "Timnah").

TIM'NAH (Heb. תִּמְנָה, tim-naw', portion), a name which occurs, simple and compounded, and with slight variations of form, several times, in the topography of the Holy Land.

1. A place which formed one of the landmarks on the north boundary of the allotment of Judah (Josh. 15:10). It is probably identical with the Timnathah which belonged to Dan (19:43), and that again with the Timnath, or, more accurately, Timnath, of Samson (Judg. 14:1, 5), and the Thamnatha of the Maccabees. The modern representative of all these various forms of the same name is probably Tibneh, a village about two miles west of Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh), among the broken undulating country by which the central mountains of this part of Palestine descend to the maritime plain. In the later history of the Jews Timnah must have been a conspicuous place. It was fortified by Bacchides as one of the most important military posts of Judea (1 Macc. 9:50), and it became the head of a district or toparchy.

2. A town in the mountain district of Judah (Josh. 15:57). It was the place near which Tamar entrapped Judah into intercourse with her (Gen. 38:12-14, A. V. "Timnath"). A distinct place from No. 1.

3. The name of a person. See TIMNA, 2.

TIM'NATH (Heb. תִּמְנָת, tim-nath', portion). See TIMNAH.

TIM'NATH-HERES (Heb. תִּמְנַת הֶרֶס, tim-nath' khel'-res, portion of Heres, Judg. 2:9). See TIMNATH-SERAH.

TIM'NATH-SERAH (Heb. תִּמְנַת סֶרָח, tim-nath' seh'-rakh, portion of Serah, Josh. 19:50; 24:30), the name of the city which was presented to Joshua after the partition of the country (19:50); and in "the border" of which he was buried (24:30). It is specified as "in Mount Ephraim, on the north side of Mount Gaash." In Judg. 2:9, the name is altered to Timnath-heres. The latter form is that adopted by the Jewish writers. Accordingly, they identify the place with Kefar Cheres, which is said by Rabbi Jacob, hap-Parchi, and other Jewish travelers, to be about five miles south ("nine miles," G. A. Smith) of Shechem (Nablus). No place with that name appears on the maps. Another and more promising identification has, however, been suggested by Dr. Eli Smith. In his journey from Jifna to Mejdel-Yabi, about six miles from the former, he discovered the ruins of a considerable town. Opposite the town was a much higher hill, in the north side of which are several excavated sepulchers. The whole bears the name of Tibneh, and although without further examination it can hardly be affirmed to be the Timnah of Joshua, yet the identification appears probable (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

TIM'NITE (Heb. תִּמְנִי, tim-nee'), a designation of Samson's father-in-law, from his residence in Timnah (Judg. 15:6).

TIM'NON (Gr. Τιμων, tee'-mone, valuable), the fifth named of the seven "deacons," appointed to serve as almoners on the occasion of complaints of partiality being made by the Hellenistic Jews at Jerusalem (Acts 6:5). Nothing further of him is known.

TIMO'THEUS, the Greek form of TIMOTHY (q. v.).

TIM'OTHY (Gr. Τιμόθεος, tim-oth'-eh-os, dear to God), the convert and friend of Paul.

1. Family. Timothy was the son of one of those mixed marriages which, though unlawful, were quite frequent in the later periods of Jewish history. His mother was a Jewess, while his father (name unknown) was a Greek (Acts 16:1-3).

2. History. (1) Early life. The picture of Timothy's early life, as drawn by the apostle Paul, represents a mother and grandmother, full of tenderness and faith, piously instructing him in the Scriptures, and training him to hope for the Messiah of Israel (2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15). Thus, though far removed from the larger colonies of Israelitish families, he was brought up in a thoroughly Jewish atmosphere; although he could hardly be called a Jewish boy, having never been admitted by circumcision within the pale of God's ancient covenant. (2) Conversion. Timothy was probably living at Lystra when Paul made his first visit to that city (Acts 16:1), and appears to have been converted at that time (Acts 14:6; comp. 2 Tim. 1:5). No mention is made of Timothy until the time of Paul's second visit, but it is safe to assume that his spiritual life and education was under the care of the elders of the church (Acts 14:23). (3) Circumcision. Those who had the deepest insight into character, and spoke with a prophetic utterance, pointed to Timothy (1 Tim. 1:18; 4:14) as specially fit for missionary work; and Paul desired to have him as a companion. The apostle circumcised him (Acts 16:3), and Timothy was set apart as an evangelist by the laying on of hands (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6; 4:5). (4) Paul's companion. Henceforth Timothy was one of Paul's most constant companions. They and Silvanus, and probably Luke also, journeyed to Philippi (Acts 16:12), and there already the young evangelist was conspicuous at once for his filial devotion and his zeal (Phil. 2:22). He seems to have been left behind at Philippi to watch over the infant church. He appears at Berea, where he remained with Silas after Paul's departure (Acts 17:14), joining Paul at Athens. From Athens he is sent back to Thessalonica (1 Thess. 3:2), as having special gifts for comforting and teaching. He returns from Thessalonica, not to Athens, but to Corinth, and his name appears united with Paul's in the opening words of both the letters written from that city to the Thessalonians (1 Thess. 1:1; 2 Thess. 1:1). Of the five following years of his life we have no record. When we next meet with him it is as being sent on in advance when the apostle was contemplating the long journey which was to include Macedonia, Achaia, Jerusalem, and Rome (Acts 19:22). It is probable that he returned by the same route and met Paul according to a previous arrangement (1 Cor. 16:10), and was thus with him when the second epistle was written to the church of Corinth (2 Cor. 1:1). He returns with the apostle to that city, and joins in messages of greeting to the disciples whom he had known personally at Corinth, and who had since found their way to Rome (Rom. 16:21). He forms one of the company of friends who go with Paul to Philippi and then sail by themselves, waiting for his arrival by a different ship (Acts 20:3-6). We have no mention of him until he joins the apostle, probably soon after his arrival in Rome. He was with Paul when the Epistles to the Philippians, to the Colossians, and to Philemon were written (Phil. 1:1; 2:19; Col. 1:1; Philem. 1). It follows from 1 Tim. 1:3 that he and Paul, after the release of the latter from his imprisonment, revisited the proconsular Asia, that the apostle then continued his journey to Macedonia, while the disciple remained, half reluctantly, often weeping at the separation (2 Tim. 1:4), at Ephesus, to check, if possible, the outgrowth of heresy and licentiousness which had sprung up there. He had to exercise rule over presbyters, some older than himself (1 Tim. 4:12), to render judgments (5:1, 19, 20), to regulate the almsgiving and sisterhood of the church (vers. 3-10), and ordain presbyters and deacons (3:1-13). These duties, together with the danger of being entangled in the disputes of rival sects, made Paul very anxious for the steadfastness of his disciple. Among his last recorded words Paul expresses his desire to see him again (2 Tim. 4:9, 21). It is uncertain whether Timothy was able to fulfill these last requests of the apostle, or that he reached Rome before his death, although some have seen in Heb. 13:23 an indication that he shared Paul's imprisonment. (5) Legends. According to an old tradition, Timothy continued to act as bishop of Ephesus, and suffered martyrdom under Domitian or Nerva.

NOTE.—"He took and circumcised Timotheus" (Acts 16:1, 3). Paul's conduct in circumcising Timotheus has been considered inconsistent with his principle and conduct in refusing to circumcise Titus (Gal. 2:3, 4). "The two cases are, however, entirely different. In the latter there was an attempt to enforce circumcision as necessary to salvation; in the former it was performed as a voluntary act, and simply on prudential grounds" (Haley, Discrepancies, p. 260).

TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

TIN. See MINERAL KINGDOM, p. 741.

TINKLING (Heb. טִּקְלִי, aw-kas'), mentioned as a characteristic of the manner in which the Jewish women carried themselves (Isa. 3:16). They could only take short steps because of the chains by which the costly foot rings worn above their ankles were joined together. These chains were probably ornamented with bells, as is sometimes the case now in the East, which tinkled as they walked. The Gr. ἀλαλάζω, al-al-ad'-zo (1 Cor. 13:1), refers to the clanging sound which comes from cymbals when beaten together.

TIPH'SAH (Heb. תִּפְסָח, tif-sakh', a fording place), the limit of Solomon's dominion toward the Euphrates (1 Kings 4:24), and said to have been attacked by Menahem, king of Israel (2 Kings 15:16). It is generally admitted that this town is the same as the one known to Greeks and Romans as Thapsacus, a strong fortress on the western bank of the Euphrates. Situated at the termination of the great trade road from Egypt, Phœnicia, and Syria, to Mesopotamia and the kingdoms of inner Asia, its possession was of great importance.

TIRAS (Heb. תִּירָס, tee-rauce'), the youngest son of Japheth, the son of Noah (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). Several efforts have been made to identify his descendants, ancient authorities generally fixing on the Thracians. But the matter is still enveloped in obscurity.

TYRATHITE (Heb. תִּירָתִי, teer-aw-thee', from תִּירָה, teer-aw', gate), the designation of one of the three families of scribes residing at Jabez (1 Chron. 2:55), the others being the Shimeathites and Suchathites. The Jewish commentators, playing with names in Shemitic fashion, interpret them thus: "They called them Tirathim, because their voices when they sang resounded loud (תִּירָה); and Shimeathites, because they made themselves heard in reading the law." But this interpretation is improbable.

TIRE, an old English word used in the A. V. exclusively for dressing the head.

1. Yaw-tab' (Heb. יָבֵט, yab'et), a verb, to make comely, adorn the head as did Jezebel (2 Kings 9:30).

2. Peh-ayn' (Heb. פִּינֵי, peey-neey), a headdress, turban (Ezek. 24:17, 23).

3. Sah-har-one' (Heb. שִׁהַרְוֵן, sheh-har-veyn), a pendent disk worn by women on the head or neck (Isa. 3:18). Lieutenant Conder thinks that the "round tires, like the moon," of Isaiah were like the strings of coin which form part of the headdress of the modern Samaritan women. See page 283; GLOSSARY.

TIR'HAKAH (Heb. תִּירְחָקָה, teer-haw'-kaw), the Ethiopian king in the south of Egypt, and opponent of Sennacherib (2 Kings 19:9; Isa. 37:9). The king of Assyria was waging war against Hezekiah when intelligence was received that Tirhakah was advancing against him. Upon hearing this he sent a second time, demanding the surrender of Jerusalem, B. C. probably 710. Tirhakah (Gr. Θαρακᾶ), LXX., is the Ταρακός of Manetho, the successor of Sevechus (Shebek II), the third king of the twenty-fifth (Ethiopian) dynasty. His name is spelt Tahalqa or Taharqo upon the monuments.

TIR'HANAH (Heb. תִּירְחָנָה, teer-khan-aw', derivation uncertain), the second son of Caleb the Hezronite by his concubine Maachah (1 Chron. 2:48).

TIR'IA (Heb. תִּירְיָה, tee-reh-yaw', fear), the third named of the four sons of Jehaleleel of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16).

TIRSHATHA (Heb. תִּרְשָׁתָא, hat-teer-shaw-thaw), the title of the governor of Judea under the Persians (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65, 70), and added as a title after the name of Nehemiah (8:9; 10:1). In the margin of the A. V. it is rendered "governor;" an explanation justified by Neh. 12:26, where "Nehemiah the governor" occurs, instead of the more usual expression "Nehemiah, the Tirshatha." According to Gesenius, it denotes the prefect or governor of a province of less extent than a satrapy. It is used of officers and governors under the Assyrian (2 Kings 18:24; Isa. 36:9), Babylonian (Jer. 51:57; Ezek. 23:6, 23), Median (Jer. 51:28), and Persian (Esth. 8:9; 9:3) monarchies.

TIR'ZAH (Heb. תִּרְצָה, teer-tsaw', delight).

1. The youngest of the five daughters of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3), B. C. 1170. This was the case that gave rise to the Levirate provision, that in the event of a man dying without male children his property should pass to his daughters.

2. An ancient Canaanitish city, whose king was among the thirty-one overcome by Joshua on the west of Jordan (Josh. 12:24). It was the capital of the kings of Israel down to the time of Omri (1 Kings 14:17; 15:21, 33; 16:6, sq.), who besieged Zimri there, and the latter perished in the flames of his palace (16:18). Once, and once only, does Tirzah reappear, as the seat of the conspiracy of Menahem (son of Gadi) against Shallum (2 Kings 15:14, 16). Its beauty was well known (Cant. 6:4). It is probably the present Talzuza, an elevated and beautifully situated place, of considerable size, surrounded by large olive groves, two hours north of Shechem.

TISH'BITE, THE (Heb. תִּשְׁבִּי, hat-tish-bee', 1 Kings 17:1; 21:17, 28; 2 Kings 1:3, 8; 9:36), the well-known title of Elijah, probably meaning a resident of some town of similar name in Gilead. This name would naturally be Tishbeh (Fürst and Gesenius), Tishbi, or possibly Tesheb. In 1 Kings 17:1, תִּשְׁבִּי, "of the inhabitants," might be pointed תִּשְׁבִּי, "from Tishbi" of (i. e., in) Gilead. This would accord well with the LXX. (ὁ Θεσβείτης, ὁ ἐχ Θεσβῶν) and Josephus (πρόβλεως Θεσβώνης, "of Thesbon, a city" in Gilead). The Targum has תִּשְׁבִּי, "from Toshab." This is further favored by the fact that the noun תִּשְׁבִּי is everywhere written with ך if we leave out of account this place (1 Kings 17:1). Putting all these things together, it is quite likely that the true pointing of the text is תִּשְׁבִּי, "from Tishbi" of Gilead; and "of Gilead" might be added to distinguish it from a place of like name in Galilee. If we accept the ordinary reading it means, not that Elijah was a native of Gilead, but that he was a sojourner there. That this is the meaning of the word תִּשְׁבִּי, anyone can see by examining the passages where it is found: Exod. 12:45 (A. V. "foreigner," R. V. "sojourner"); Gen. 23:4; Lev. 22:10; 25:23, 35, 40, 47; Num. 35:15; Psa. 39:12;

1 Chron. 29:15 ("sojourners"); Lev. 25:6, 45, 47 ("stranger[s]"; R. V., v. 47, "sojourner"). This leaves the place of his birth unsettled. It is generally supposed to be Thisbe, in Naphtali (Tob. 1:2, LXX.). But the text and the identification are too uncertain to be of evidentiary value.—W. H.

TITHE (Heb. תְּשֻׁבָה, mal-as-ayr'; Gr. δεκάτη, dek-at'-ay, a tenth). The use of tithes is frequently referred to in both profane and biblical history.

1. In early times the two prominent instances are: (1) Abram presenting the tenth of all his property, or rather of the spoils of his victory, to Melchizedek (Gen. 14:20; Heb. 7:2, 6). (2) Jacob, after his vision at Luz, devoting a tenth of all his property to God in case he should return home in safety (Gen. 28:22).

2. Mosaic Law. The tenth of all produce, flocks, and cattle was declared to be sacred to Jehovah by way, so to speak, of feu-duty or rent to him who was, strictly speaking, the owner of the land, and in return for the produce of the ground; though, if so disposed, a man was at liberty to redeem the tithes of the fruits of his field and his trees by paying the value of them with a fifth part added (Lev. 27:30, sq.). The law did not specify the various fruits of the field and of the trees that were to be tithed. The Mishna (Maaseroth, i, 1) includes everything eatable, everything that was stored up or that grew out of the earth. The Pharisees, as early as the time of Jesus, made the law to include the minutest kitchen herbs, such as mint and cummin (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42). With regard to animal tithes, the law prescribes that every tenth beast that passes under the staff, i. e., under which the shepherd makes them pass when he counts his flock, was to be sacred to the Lord, good and bad alike. It forbids any attempt to substitute one beast for another on pain of both animals—the tenth as well as the one exchanged for it—being required to be redeemed (Lev. 27:32, sq.). This tenth, called Terumoth, is ordered to be assigned to the Levites as the reward of their service, and it is ordered further that they are themselves to dedicate to the Lord a tenth of these receipts, which is to be devoted to the maintenance of the high priest (Num. 18:21–28).

This legislation is modified or extended in the Book of Deuteronomy, i. e., from thirty-eight to forty years later. Commands are given to the people: 1. To bring their tithes, together with their votive and other offerings and first fruits to the chosen center of worship, the metropolis, there to be eaten in festive celebration in company with their children, their servants, and the Levites (Deut. 12:5–18). 2. All the produce of the soil was to be tithed every year, and these tithes with the firstlings of the flock and herd were to be eaten in the metropolis. 3. But in case of distance permission is given to convert the produce into money, which is to be taken to the appointed place, and there laid out in the purchase of food for a festal celebration, in which the Levite is, by special command, to be included (14:22–27). 4. Then follows the direction that at the end of three years all the tithe of that year is to be gathered and laid up "within the gates," and that a festival is to be held, in which the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, together with the Levite, are to partake (vers. 28, 29). 5. Lastly, it is ordered that after taking the tithe in each third year, "which is the year of tithing," an exculpatory declaration is to be made by every Israelite that he has done his best to fulfill the divine command (26:12-14).

From all this we gather: 1. That one tenth of the whole produce of the soil was to be assigned for the maintenance of the Levites. 2. That out of this the Levites were to dedicate a tenth to God for the use of the high priest. 3. That a tithe, in all probability a second tithe, was to be applied to festival purposes. 4. That in every third year either this festival tithe or a third tenth was to be eaten in company with the poor and the Levites. The question arises, Were there three tithes taken in this third year; or is the third tithe only the second under a different description? It must be allowed that the third tithe is not without support. Josephus distinctly says that one tenth was to be given to the priests and Levites, one tenth was to be applied to feasts in the metropolis, and that a tenth besides these was every third year to be given to the poor (comp. Tob. 1:7, 8). On the other hand Maimonides says the third and sixth years' second tithe was shared between the poor and the Levites, i. e., that there was no third tithe. Of these opinions that which maintains three separate and complete tithings seems improbable. It is plain that under the kings the tithe system partook of the general neglect into which the observance of the law declined, and that Hezekiah, among his other reforms, took effectual means to revive its use (2 Chron. 31:5, 12, 19). Similar measures were taken after the captivity by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:44), and in both these cases special officers were appointed to take charge of the stores and storehouses for the purpose. Yet, notwithstanding partial evasion or omission, the system itself was continued to a late period in Jewish history (Heb. 7:5-8; Matt. 23:23; Luke 18:12).

The firstborn, the firstlings, and of the tenth of the flocks and herds and produce of the soil were offered to Jehovah as being sacred to him. "Tithes and offerings, along with the firstborn, were understood, therefore, to be the representatives of the entire produce of the land and of the whole of property generally, and, being paid over as they were to Jehovah, they constituted a practical confession and acknowledgment that the whole land, that all possessions in general, belonged to him, and that it was he alone who conferred them upon those who enjoyed them" (Keil, Bib. Arch., i, p. 453).

TITLE. See GLOSSARY.

TITTLE (Gr. κεραία, ker-ah'-yah, a little horn, extremity, point), used by Greek grammarians of the accents and diacritical points. In Matt. 5:18; Luke 16:17, it means the little lines or projections by which the Hebrew letters, in other respects similar, differ from each other, as \aleph and \aleph' , \beth and \beth' , \daleth , \daleth' and \daleth'' , κ , κ' and κ'' . The meaning is that "not even the minutest part of the law shall perish" (Grimm, Lex., s. v.).

TITUS (a common Latin name, Grecized Τίτος, tee'-tos), a fellow-laborer of Paul. We find no mention of Titus in the Acts, and must draw materials for a biography of him from Second Corinthians, Galatians, and Titus, combined with Second Timothy. If, as seems probable, the journey mentioned in Gal. 2:1, 3, is the same as that recorded in Acts 15, then Titus was closely associated with Paul at Antioch, and accompanied him and Barnabas thence to Jerusalem. At Troas the apostle was disappointed in not meeting Titus (2 Cor. 2:13), who had been sent on a mission to Corinth; but in Macedonia Titus joined him (7:6, 7, 13-15). He was sent back to Corinth, in company with two other trustworthy Christians, bearing the second epistle to the Corinthians, and with the earnest request that he would attend to the collection being taken for the poor Christians of Judea (8:6, 17). The "brethren" (ἀδελφοί) who took the first epistle to Corinth (1 Cor. 16:11, 12) were doubtless Titus and his companion, whoever he may have been. In the interval between the first and second imprisonment of Paul at Rome he and Titus visited Crete (Tit. 1:5). Here Titus remained and received a letter written to him by the apostle. From this letter we learn that Titus was originally converted through Paul's instrumentality (v. 4). Next we learn the various particulars of the responsible duties which he had to discharge in Crete. He is to complete what Paul had been obliged to leave unfinished (v. 5), and to organize the Church throughout the island by appointing presbyters in every city. Next he is to control and bridle (v. 11) the restless and mischievous Judaizers, and he is to be peremptory in so doing (v. 13). He is to urge the duties of a decorous and Christian life upon the women (2:3-5), some of whom, possibly, had something of an official character (vers. 3, 4). The notices which remain are more strictly personal. Titus is to look for the arrival in Crete of Artemas and Tychicus (3:12), and then he is to hasten to join Paul at Nicopolis, where the apostle is proposing to pass the winter. Zenas and Apolos are in Crete, or expected there; for Titus is to send them on their journey, and supply them with whatever they need for it (v. 13). Whether Titus did join the apostle at Nicopolis we cannot tell. But we naturally connect the mention of this place with what Paul wrote at no great interval of time afterward (2 Tim. 4:10); for Dalmatia lay to the north of Nicopolis, at no great distance from it. From the form of the whole sentence it seems probable that this disciple had been with Paul in Rome during his final imprisonment.

Tradition. The traditional connection of Titus with Crete is much more specific and constant, though here again we cannot be certain of the facts. He is said to have been permanent bishop in the island, and to have died there at an advanced age. The modern capital, Candia, appears to claim the honor of being his burial place. In the fragment by the lawyer Zenas Titus is called bishop of Gortyna. Lastly, the name of Titus was the watchword of the Cretans when they were invaded by the Venetians (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

TITUS, EPISTLE TO. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.
TIZITE (Heb. זִיזִית , tee'-zee), the designation of JOHA (q. v.), the brother of Jediahel and son of Shimri, a hero in David's army (1 Chron. 11:45).

TO'AH (Heb. תוֹאֵה, to'-akh, lowly), son of Zuph and father of Eliel, ancestor of Samuel and Heman (1 Chron. 6:34), called Tohu (1 Sam. 1:1) and Nahath (1 Chron. 6:26).

TOB (Heb. תוֹב, tobe, good). "The land of Tob" was, according to 2 Sam. 10:6, 8, a district in the northeast of Perea, on the border of Syria, or between Syria and Ammonitis, called Tóβιον (1 Macc. 5:13), or more correctly Τουβιον (2 Macc. 12:17). There Jephthah took refuge when expelled from home by his half-brother (Judg. 11:3), and there he remained, at the head of a band of freebooters, till he was brought back by the sheiks of Gilead (v. 5). It is undoubtedly mentioned again in 2 Sam. 10:6, 8, as Ish-tob, i. e., Man of Tob, meaning, according to a common Hebrew idiom, the "men of Tob." After an immense interval it appears again, in the Maccabean history (1 Macc. 5:13), in the names Tobie and Tubieni (2 Macc. 12:17). No identification of this ancient district with any modern one has yet been attempted. The name Tell Dobbe, or, as it is given by the latest explorer of those regions, Tell Dibbe, attached to a ruined site at the south end of the Lejah, a few miles northwest of Kenáwat, and also that of ed Dab, some twelve hours east of the mountain el Kuleib, are both suggestive of Tob. Dr. G. A. Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 587) says: "The name of the land of Tob, which was north of Mizpeh, may survive in that of the wady and village of Taiyibeh, east of Pella."

TOB-ADONI'JAH (Heb. תוֹב אֲדוֹנִי יָהּ, tobe ad-o-nee-yah', pleasing to Adonijah), one of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah to teach the law to the people (2 Chron. 17:8), B. C. after 875.

TOBI'AH (Heb. תוֹבִיָּה, to-bee-yaw', goodness of Jehovah).

1. "The children of Tobiah" were one of the families returning with Zerubbabel who were unable to prove their kinship with Israel (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62), B. C. before 536.

2. One of the leading opponents to the rebuilding of Jerusalem under Nehemiah. Tobiah was formerly a slave at the Persian court, and had probably, as a favorite, been appointed governor of the Ammonites (Neh. 2:10, 19). Tobiah, though a slave and an Ammonite, found means to ally himself with a priestly family, and his son Johanan married the daughter of Meshullam, the son of Berechiah, while he himself was the son-in-law of Shechaniah, the son of Arah (6:18), and these family relations created for him a strong faction among the Jews. He and SANBALLAT (q. v.), on receiving intelligence of the expected arrival of Nehemiah, were greatly exasperated and endeavored to terrify him by asking whether he intended to rebel against the king. Nehemiah replied that they had no authority of any kind in Jerusalem, and did not allow himself to be intimidated (2:19, 20). When he heard that the building of the walls had been actually commenced, Tobiah, in unmingled scorn, declared, "Even that which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall" (4:3). Then followed the league against the Jews entered into by Sanballat and Tobiah with the surrounding nations (v. 7, sq.). After that an unsuccessful attempt was made to inveigle Nehemiah into a conference in the valley of Ono (6:1, sq.). Still later we find Tobiah carrying on a secret correspondence with the Jewish nobles hostile to Nehemiah (vers. 17-19). During Nehemiah's absence from Jerusalem Elishib, the high priest, installed Tobiah in "a great chamber," i. e., one of the very large buildings in the forecourts of the temple, from which he was ejected by Nehemiah upon his return (13:4-8).

TOBI'JAH (Hebrew same as TOBIAH [q. v.]).

1. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), B. C. after 875.

2. One of the captivity in the time of Zechariah, in whose presence the prophet was commanded to take crowns of silver and gold and put them on the head of Joshua the high priest (Zech. 6:10, 14), B. C. 519.

TO'CHEN (Heb. תוֹכֵן, to'-ken, measured), one of the towns of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:32); probably the same with TELEM (Josh. 15:24) or TELAIM (1 Sam. 15:4).

TOGAR'MAH (Heb. תוֹגַרְמַחַ, to-gar-mav', meaning doubtful), a son of Gomer, and brother of Ashkenaz and Riphath (Gen. 10:3; 1 Chron. 1:6). The descendants of Togarmah are mentioned among the merchants who trafficked with Tyre in "horses, horsemen, and mules" (Ezek. 27:14); and are also named with Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya, as followers of Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal (38:5, 6).

TO'HU (Heb. תוֹהוּ, to'-khoo, lowly, 1 Sam. 1:1), the same as Toah (1 Chron. 6:34), or Nahath (v. 26).

TO'I (Heb. תוֹי, to'-ee, error), the king of Hamath on the Orontes, in the time of David. When the latter defeated the Syrian king, Hadadezer, Toi's powerful enemy, Toi sent his son Joram (or Hadoram) to congratulate him upon his victory, and to make presents of gold, silver, and brass (2 Sam. 8:9, 10), B. C. about 984.

TOKEN (Heb. אוֹת, oth, a sign). "And the blood shall be to you for a token" (Exod. 12:13), i. e., a pledge that God would spare the Israelites upon whose doorposts was the blood. A sign of something past, a memorial (Exod. 13:9, A. V. "sign," 16; Isa. 55:13; Ezek. 14:8, "sign"). A sign of something future, a portent, omen (Isa. 8:18, A. V. "signs"). A sign or token of anything in itself not visible; e. g., the token of a covenant, as circumcision (Gen. 17:11), the Sabbath (Exod. 31:13, A. V. "sign"). Hence, an argument, proof (Job 21:29). The prophetic sign of the truth of a prophecy (Exod. 8:12).

TO'LA (Heb. תוֹלַעַ, to-law', a worm).

1. The eldest son of Issachar (Gen. 46:13; 1 Chron. 7:1). His six sons (1 Chron. 7:2) became progenitors of the Tolaites (Num. 26:23), which numbered in David's time twenty-two thousand six hundred fighting men (1 Chron. 7:2).

2. A judge of Israel. He was the son of Puah, of the tribe of Issachar. He succeeded Abimelech in the judgeship, and ruled Israel twenty-three years in Shamir, Mount Ephraim, where he died and was buried (Judg. 10:1, 2). The date is uncertain, as Tola doubtless ruled contemporaneously with some other judge.

TO'LAD (Heb. תּוֹלַד, to-lawd', posterity), a town in Simeon in David's time (1 Chron. 4:29); given in the fuller form El-tolad (Josh. 15:30). It is not yet discovered.

TO'LAITES (Heb. תּוֹלַיִת, to-law-ee'), the general name of the descendants of TOLA (q. v.), the son of Issachar (Num. 26:23).

TOLL. See TAX; TRIBUTE; PUBLICAN.

TOMB (Heb. קִבְרִית, gaw-deesh', heaped up, a tumulus; Gr. μνημειον, mnay-mi'-on, a remembrance), a natural cave enlarged and adapted by excavation, or an artificial imitation of one, was the standard type of sepulcher. This was what the structure of the Jewish soil supplied or suggested.

"The caves, or rock-hewn sepulchers, consisted of an antechamber in which the bier was deposited, and an inner or rather lower cave in which the bodies were deposited, in a recumbent position, in niches. According to the Talmud these abodes of the dead were usually six feet long, nine feet wide, and ten feet high. Here there were niches for eight bodies—three on each side of the entrance and two opposite. Larger sepulchers held thirteen bodies. The entrance to the sepulcher was guarded by a large stone or by a door (Matt. 27:65; Mark 15:46; John 11:38, 39). This structure of the tombs will explain some of the particulars connected with the burial of our Lord, how the women coming early to the grave had been astonished in finding the 'very great stone' 'rolled away from the door of the sepulcher,' and then, when they entered the outer cave, were affrighted to see what seemed 'a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment' (Mark 16:4, 5)" (Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, p. 171).

The accompanying diagram represents the forms of Jewish sepulture. In the apartment marked A there are twelve such loculi, about two feet in width by three feet high. On the ground floor these generally open when in the upper story, as at C, on a ledge or platform, on which the body might be laid to be anointed, and on which the stones might rest which closed the outer end of each loculus. The shallow loculus is shown in chamber B, but was apparently only used when sarcophagi were employed, and, therefore, so far as we know, only during the Græco-Roman period, when foreign customs came to be adopted.

"Of the twenty-two kings of Judah who reigned at Jerusalem from 1048 to 590 B. C., eleven, or exactly one half, were buried in one hypogeum in the 'city of David.' Of all these it is merely said that they were buried in 'the sepulchers of their fathers' or 'of the kings' in the city of David, except of two—Asa and Hezekiah. Two more of these kings (Jehoram and Joash) were buried also in the city of David, 'but not in the sepulchers of the kings.' The passage in Neh. 3:16, and in Ezek. 43:7, 9, together with the reiterated assertion of the books of Kings and Chronicles, that these sepulchers were situated in the city of David, leave no doubt but that they were on Zion, or the Eastern Hill, and in the immediate proximity of the temple. They were in fact certainly within that inclosure now known as the 'Haram Area;' but if it is asked on what exact spot, we must pause for further information before a reply can be given" (Smith, Bib. Dict.). See DEAD; GRAVE.

TONGS. 1. Mal-kawkh' (Heb. מַלְקָחִים, 1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron. 4:21; Isa. 6:6), or Mal-kawkh' (מַלְקָחִים, Exod. 25:38; 37:23, A. V. "snuffers;" Num. 4:9), pincers either for holding coals or for trimming a lamp.

2. Mah-ats-avod' (Heb. מַחֲאֲטָאוֹד, Isa. 44:12), an ax, and so rendered in Jer. 10:3.

TONGUE (Heb. לִשָּׁה, law-shone'; Gr. γλῶσσα, gloce-sah') is variously used in Scripture.

1. Literally for the human tongue (Judg. 7:5; Job 27:4; Psa. 35:28; Prov. 15:2; Zech. 14:12; Mark 7:33, 35, etc.); the tongue of the dog (Psa. 68:23); the viper (Job 20:16).

2. A particular language or dialect spoken by any particular people, e. g., "Everyone after his tongue" (Gen. 10:5, 20, 31; comp. Deut. 28:49; Esth. 1:22; Dan. 1:4; John 5:2; Acts 1:19; 2:4, 8, 11; 1 Cor. 12:10, etc.).

3. For the people speaking a language (Isa. 66:18; Dan. 3:4, 7; Rev. 5:9; 7:9; 10:11, etc.).

4. Personified. "Unto me shall every tongue [i. e., man] swear" (Isa. 45:23; comp. Rom. 14:11; Phil. 2:11; Isa. 54:17). Such expressions as the following are used: the tongue is said to meditate (Psa. 52:2), to hate (Prov. 26:28), to rejoice (Acts 2:26), to be bridled (James 1:26), to be tamed (3:8).

5. Figurative. For speech generally. "Let us not love in tongue only" (1 John 3:18); "a soft tongue," i. e., soothing language (Prov. 25:15). "Rage of the tongue" (Hos. 7:16)—i. e., verbal abuse—"strife of tongues" (Psa. 31:20), and "scourge of tongue" (Job 5:21) mean contention and execration. "They bend their tongues like their bow for lies" (Jer. 9:3) is to tell determined and malicious falsehoods. To "sharpen the tongue" (Psa. 140:3) is to prepare cutting speeches (comp. 57:4); "to smooth the tongue" (Jer. 23:31) is to employ flattery; while "to smite with the tongue" (18:18) is to traduce. To mock is figuratively expressed by "to stick out the tongue" (Isa. 57:4). "To hide under the tongue" (Job 20:12) is to enjoy wickedness; while "honey and milk under the tongue" is figurative for delicious language. "To divide the tongues of the wicked" is to bring about dissension among them (Psa. 55:9; comp. 2 Sam. 15:34; 17:14, 15). "The cleaving of the tongue to the palate" may mean profound attention (Job 29:10), excessive thirst (Lam. 4:4; comp. Psa. 22:15), or dumbness (Ezek. 3:26; Psa. 137:6). To gnaw one's tongue is a sign of fury, despair, or torment (Rev. 16:10).

6. Vicious uses of the tongue are expressed by the following phrases: flattery (Psa. 5:9; Prov. 28:33), backbiting (Psa. 15:3, literally "run about with the tongue," Prov. 25:23), deceit (Psa. 50:19), unrestrained speech (73:9), lying (109:2), etc. Vir- tuous uses are specified: "keeping the tongue" (Psa. 34:13; 1 Pet. 3:10; Prov. 21:23), "ruling the tongue" (James 1:26), etc.

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF (Gen. 11:1-9). The biblical account of this event begins with the statement, "And the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech" (v. 1). The author of the Book of Genesis conceived the unity of the human race to be of the most rigid nature—not simply a generic unity, nor again simply a specific unity, but a specific based upon a numerical unity, the species being nothing else than the enlargement of the individual. Unity of language is assumed by the sacred historian apparently as a corollary of the unity of race. No explanation is given of the origin of speech, but its exercise is evidently regarded as coeval with the creation of man. Speech, being inherent in man as a reflecting being, was regarded as handed down from father to son by the same process of imitation by which it is still perpetuated. The original unity of speech was restored in Noah. Disturbing causes were, however, early at work to dissolve this twofold union of community and speech. The human family endeavored to check the tendency to separation by the establishment of a great central edifice, and a city which should serve as a metropolis of the whole world (vers. 3, 4). The project was defeated by the interposition of Jehovah, who determined to "confound their language, so that they might not understand one another's speech" (vers. 5-7).

The desire for renown and the purpose to thus maintain their unity were thus manifested, revealing pride and the loss of spiritual unity and brotherly love. "Consequently the undertaking, dictated by pride, to preserve and consolidate by outward means the unity which was inwardly lost, could not be successful, but could only bring down the judgment of dispersion" (K. and D., Com.). By the firm establishment of an ungodly unity the wickedness and audacity of men would have led to fearful enterprises. Therefore God determined, by confusing their language, to prevent the heightening of sin through ungodly association, and to frustrate their design.

The nature of the confusion of tongues has been variously understood. "It is unnecessary to assume that the judgment inflicted on the builders of Babel amounted to a loss, or even a suspension, of articulate speech. The desired object would be equally attained by a miraculous forestallment of those dialectical differences of language which are constantly in process of production. The elements of the one original language may have remained, but so disguised by variations of pronunciation, and by the introduction of new combinations, as to be practically obliterated" (Smith, Bib. Dict.). See DISPERSION, SUPPLEMENT.

"When it is stated, first of all, that God had resolved to destroy the unity of lips and words by a confusion of the lips, and then that he scattered the men abroad, this act of divine judgment cannot be understood in any other way than that God deprived them of the ability to comprehend one another, and thus effected their dispersion. The event itself cannot have consisted merely in a change of the organs of speech produced by the omnipotence of God, whereby speakers were turned into stammerers who were unintelligible to one another" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

TONGUES, GIFT OF. 1. Promise of. The promise of a new power coming from the Divine Spirit, giving not only comfort and insight into truth, but fresh powers of utterance of some kind, appears once and again in our Lord's teaching. The disciples are to take no thought what they shall speak, for the Spirit of their Father shall speak in them (Matt. 10:19, 20; Mark 13:11). The lips of Galilean peasants are to speak freely and boldly before kings. In Mark 16:17 we have a more definite term employed: "They shall speak with new tongues." It can hardly be questioned that the obvious meaning of the promise is that the disciples should speak in new languages which they had not learned as other men learn them.

2. Fulfilment. After our Lord's ascension, while the disciples were gathered together in one place, "suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them" (Acts 2:2, 3). After this external phenomenon there now ensued the internal filling of all who were assembled with the Holy Spirit. The immediate result was that they began to speak with other tongues (Gr. λαλεῖν ἑτέρας γλώσσαις). "For the sure determination of what Luke meant by this, it is decisive that ἑτέρας γλώσσας ('other tongues'), on the part of the speaker was, in point of fact, the same thing which the congregated Parthians, Medes, Elamites, etc., designated as ταῖς ἡμετέραις γλώσσαις ('our own tongue,' comp. v. 8). The 'other tongues,' therefore, are, according to the text, to be considered as absolutely nothing else than languages, which were different from the native language of the speakers. They, the Galileans, spoke, one Parthian, another Median, etc., consequently languages of another sort, i. e., foreign (1 Cor. 14:21); and these indeed—the point wherein precisely appeared the miraculous operation of the Spirit—not acquired by study (Mark 16:17)" (Meyer, Com., in loc.). When the event is admitted to be distinctly miraculous, and the power a special gift of God, it need not be considered either impossible or inconceivable; and incapacity of conceiving the modus operandi should not lead to a refusal of the credibility and certainty of the fact.

In the list of spiritual endowments mentioned in 1 Cor. 12:8-10 are "divers kinds of tongues," and "the interpretation of tongues" (comp. vers. 28-30; 14:4, 5, 13, 14). By many the speaking with tongues is a miraculous gift by which a person is able to speak a foreign tongue without learning it. On the other hand there are those who, with Meyer, "Understand by γλώσσαις λαλεῖν such an outburst of prayer in petition, praise, and thanksgiving, as was so ecstatic that in connection with it the speaker's own conscious intellectual activity was suspended, while the tongue did not serve as the instrument of the utterance of self-active reflection, but, independently of it, was involuntarily set in motion by the Holy Spirit, by whom the man in his deepest nature was seized and borne away" (Com., in loc.). "The spiritual gifts are classified and compared, arranged, apparently, according to their worth, placed under regulation. The facts which may be gathered are briefly these: 1. The phenomena of the gift of tongues were not confined to one church or section of a church. 2. The comparison of gifts, in both the lists given by St. Paul (1 Cor. 12:8-10, 28-30), places that of tongues, and the interpretation of tongues, lowest in the scale. 3. The main characteristic of the 'tongue' is that it is unintelligible. The man 'speaks mysteries,' prays, blesses, gives thanks, in the tongue (14:15, 16), but no one understands him. He can hardly be said, indeed, to understand himself. 4. The peculiar nature of the gift leads the apostle into what appears at first a contradiction. 'Tongues are for a sign,' not to believers, but to those who do not believe; yet the effect on unbelievers is not that of attracting but repelling. They involve of necessity a disturbance of the equilibrium between the understanding and the feelings. Therefore it is that, for those who believe already, prophecy is the greater gift" (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

TONGUES OF FIRE. In the account of the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples at Pentecost it is said (Acts 2:3): "And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire [Gr. γλώσσαι ὡσεὶ πυρός], and it sat upon each of them." The words mean: There appeared to them, i. e., were seen by them, tongues which appeared like little flames of fire, luminous, but not burning; not really consisting of fire, but only ὡσεὶ πυρός, "as of fire." "As only similar to fire, they bore an analogy to electric phenomena; their tongue-shape referred as a sign to that miraculous speaking which ensued immediately after, and the firelike form to the divine presence (comp. Exod. 3:2), which was here operative in a manner so entirely peculiar. The whole phenomenon is to be understood as a miraculous operation of God manifesting himself in the Spirit, by which, as by the preceding sound from heaven, the effusion of the Spirit was made known as divine, and his efficacy on the minds of those who were to receive him was enhanced" (Meyer, Com., in loc.).

TOOTH (Heb. שן, shane; לֶחֶץ, lekh'-ee, in Psa. 58:6; Prov. 30:14; Joel 1:6; Gr. ὀδούς, od-ooce').

1. Literal Use. In this sense the term is used with reference to the loss of the member by violence, in illustration of the law of retaliation (Exod. 21:24; Lev. 24:20; Deut. 19:21). Such loss admitted of a pecuniary compensation, and under private arrangement, unless the injured party became exorbitant in his demand, when the case was referred to a judge. Our Lord's comment upon the law (Matt. 5:38) prohibits private revenge. Lekh'-ee (Heb. לֶחֶץ) is used for the human jawbone (Psa. 3:7), for that of an ass (Judg. 15:15-17), and for that of a leviathan (Job 41:14). Although shim-nah'-yim is the general word for teeth, yet the Hebrews had a distinct term for molars or jaw teeth, especially of the larger animals; thus meth-al-leh-oth' (Heb. מַתְּחֵמֶת, Job 29:17; Psa. 57:4; Prov. 30:14; Joel 1:6), and, by transposition, mal-et-leh-oth' (Heb. מַלְעֵת, Psa. 58:6).

2. Figurative. "His teeth shall be white with milk" (Gen. 49:12) seems to denote a superabundance of milk, as "his eyes shall be red with wine" denotes plenty thereof. "I will send upon them the teeth of beasts" (Deut. 32:24) expresses devastation by wild animals. "The teeth of lions" (Job 4:10) is a symbol of the cruelty and rapacity of the wicked. "To take one's flesh into one's teeth" (Job 13:14) is thought by some to mean to gnaw it with anguish (comp. Rev. 16:10), while others interpret it "to be intent upon the maintenance of life, as a wild beast upon the preservation of his prey, by holding it between its teeth and carrying it away" (Delitzsch, Com., in loc.). Gnashing of teeth means, properly, grinding the teeth with rage or despair (Job 16:9; Psa. 35:16; 37:12; 112:10; Lam. 2:16; Matt. 8:12, etc.). By "the skin of my teeth" (Job 19:20) is generally understood the gums; Delitzsch, however, thinks it to be the periosteum, a skin in the jaw. Job's disease was such that the gums especially were destroyed and wasted away about the teeth, only the periosteum round about the teeth being still left to him, and single remnants of the covering of his loose and projecting teeth. "To smite upon the jawbone" and "to break the teeth" mean to disgrace and disable (Psa. 3:7; comp. Mic. 6:13; 1 Kings 20:35; Lam. 3:30). The teeth of calculators, etc., are compared to "spears and arrows" (Psa. 57:4; comp. 1 Sam. 24:9); and to "break the teeth" of such persons is to disable them (Psa. 58:6). To "escape from the teeth" of one's enemies is to avoid their malice (Psa. 124:6; Zech. 9:7). Oppression is compared to "jaw teeth like swords and grinders like knives" (Prov. 30:14). Beautiful teeth are compared (Cant. 4:2; 6:6) to sheep newly shorn and washed; but the remaining part of the comparison, "whereof every one bear twins and there is not one barren among them," is much better rendered by Le Clerc, "all of them twins, and none hath lost his fellow." "To break the teeth with gravel stones." A very forcible figure is in "He hath also broken my teeth with gravel stones" (Lam. 3:16; comp. Prov. 20:17), referring to the grit that often mixes with bread baked in ashes, as is the custom in the East, and figurative of harsh disappointment. "Iron teeth" (Dan. 7:1, 19) are the symbol of destructive power. Hypocritical and greedy prophets are represented as those who "bite with their teeth and cry, Peace" (Mic. 3:5). "I will take away his blood out of his mouth, and his abominations from between his teeth" (Zech. 9:7), refers to idolaters keeping a feast, which is interrupted by Jehovah, and idolatry abolished. "Cleanness of teeth" (Amos 4:6) is the figure of hunger, famine. "To cast in the teeth" is an old English phrase, for the Hebrew has no such idiom, signifying to reproach. The Greek is ὀνειδίζον αὐτὸν (on-i'-did-zon ou-ton), "they upbraided him" (Matt. 27:44). The action of acid is referred to in Ezek. 18:2; comp. 10:26.

TOPAZ. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

TOPHEL (Heb. טֶפֶל, to'-fel, lime, mortar), apparently a boundary of the great Sinaitic desert of Paran (Deut. 1:1). It is supposed by Hengstenberg and Robinson, and all the more modern writers, to be the large village of Tafyleh, the chief place in Jebal, west of the Edomitish mountains. The suggestion of Schultz that Tophel may have been the place where the Israelites purchased food and drink of the Edomites (2:28, 29) has much to be said in its favor; for the situation of Tophel warrants the supposition that it was here that they passed for the first time from the wilderness to an inhabited land.

TOPHET, or TOPHETH. 1. Name. Tophet is commonly supposed to be derived from tôph, or drum, from the drums used to drown the cries of children who were made to pass through the fire to Moloch. Gesenius says: "As to the etymology of the name תֹּפֶת (to'-feth, spittle), it is best referred to the root תִּפַּח (toof, to spit), and rendered place to be spit upon, to be abhorred (Job 17:6)." Others regard Tophet as from תֹּפְתֵי (tof-tel', contempt), the place of burning dead bodies.

2. Location, etc. Tophet lay somewhere east or southeast of Jerusalem, for Jeremiah went out by the Sun Gate, or east gate, to go to it (Jer. 19:2). It was in "the Valley of the Son of Hinnom" (7:31), which is "by the entry of the east gate" (19:2). Thus it was not identical with Hinnom. It was in Hinnom and was, perhaps, one of its chief groves or gardens. It seems also to have been part of the king's gardens, and watered by Siloam, perhaps a little to the south of the present Birket el-Hamra. The name Tophet occurs only in the Old Testament (2 Kings 23:10, "Topheth;" Isa. 30:33; Jer. 7:31, 32; 19:6, 11-14). The New Testament does not refer to it, nor the Apocrypha.

In Tophet the deity (Baal, Jer. 19:5; Moloch, 32:35) was worshiped by sacrifices in heathen fashion, first by the ancient Canaanites, and afterward by apostate Israelites (comp. Psa. 106:38; Jer. 7:31). This was done first by Ahaz (2 Kings 16:3), then especially by Manasseh (21:6). Thus it became the place of abomination, the very gate or pit of hell. The pious kings defiled it (23:10), and threw down its altars and high places, pouring into it all the filth of the city, till it became the "abhorrence" of Jerusalem. Every vestige of Tophet, name and grove, is gone, and we can only guess at the spot.

TORCH. The Heb. פְּרִיט (lap-peed', Zech. 12:6), and the Gr. λαμπάς (lam-pas', John 18:3), usually signify, and are translated, a lamp. In Nah. 2:3 "torch" stands for Heb. פְּרִיט (pel-aw-daw', steel); "the chariots shall be with flaming torches," i. e., with polished scythes or armature.

Figurative. A flaming torch is used by the prophet (Zech. 12:6) as a symbol of great anger and destruction.

TOR'MAH (Heb. טוֹרְמָה, tor-maw', deceit) occurs only in the margin of Judg. 9:31. By a few commentators it has been conjectured that the word was originally the same with Arumah (v. 41). The Septuagint and Chaldee take the word as an appellative = ἐν κρυφίῃ, secretly; so also do Rashi and most of the earlier commentators, while R. Kimchi, the elder, has decided in favor of the second rendering as a proper name. As the word only occurs here it is impossible to determine in favor of either view.

TORMENTOR (Gr. βασανιστής, bas-an-is-tace', Matt. 18:34), one who elicits the truth by means of the rack, an inquisitor; used in this passage of a jailor, probably because the business of torturing was assigned to him. Torture was usually employed to extort confession or evidence, as when Claudius Lysias, the chief captain, commanded Paul to be brought into the castle and "examined by scourging" (Acts 22:24).

TORTOISE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

TOU (1 Chron. 18:9, 10). See Tot.

TOW. 1. Neh-o'-reth (Heb. נֶחֱרֵת, Judg. 16:9; Isa. 1:31), as being shaken or beaten off from flax in hatching.

2. Pish-law' (Heb. פִּישְׁלָו, Isa. 43:17), flax, as elsewhere rendered.

TOWEL (Gr. λέντιον, len'-tee-on), a linen cloth or apron, which servants put on when about to work (John 13:4, 5). Girding one's self with a towel was the common mark of a slave, by whom the service of footwashing was ordinarily performed.

TOWER. 1. Or-nawn' (Heb. מִגְדֹּל, strong), a siege tower (Isa. 23:13).

2. Bakl'-an (Heb. בִּקְלָאן, "A word often used for 'tower' in the Egyptian records is bekhen, bakhan, or bekhent. This word Brugsch declares to be 'identical with the Hebrew bekhon,' and to mean an 'outlook,' 'a tower built on a hill.' It applies, he says, to 'any building from which one can look far out into the land, and which itself is visible afar; thence any house standing high; a tower.' . . . In any event it is a word which is used in the Hebrew interchangeably with mig-dole, for a watchtower" (Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, p. 363).

3. Mig-dole' (Heb. מִגְדֹּל, or Mig-dawl' (מִגְדָּל), is from a root meaning "to become great." See MGDOL.

4. Pin-noth' (Heb. פִּנְנוֹת, the corners and battlements of the walls of the fortifications (Zeph. 1:16; 3:6; comp. 2 Chron. 26:15).

5. O'-fel (Heb. עֵפֶל, hill, 2 Kings 5:24). See OPHEL.

6. Mam-tsore' (Heb. מַצְוֵר, a fortress, only in Hab. 2:1.

7. Mits-pel' (Heb. מִצְפֵּה, See MIZPEH.

8. Poor'-gos (Gr. πύργος), a tower, a fortified structure rising to a considerable height, to repel a hostile attack, or to enable a watchman to see in every direction. The "tower of Siloam" seems to designate a tower in the walls of Jerusalem, near the fountain of Siloam (Luke 13:4). Watch-towers or fortified posts in frontier or exposed situations are mentioned in Scripture, as the tower of Edar, etc. (Gen. 35:21; Mic. 4:8; Isa. 21:5, 8, 11, etc.), the tower of Lebanon (Cant. 7:4). Remains of such fortifications may still be seen, which probably have succeeded to more ancient structures built in the same places for like purposes. Besides these military structures, we read in Scripture of towers built in vineyards as an almost necessary appendage to them (Isa. 5:2; Matt. 21:33; Mark 12:1). Such towers are still in use in Palestine in vineyards, especially near Hebron, and are used as lodges for the keepers of the vineyards.

TOWN is not carefully distinguished from city in the A. V., and is sometimes the rendering of eer (Heb. עִיר, awr (עָוֶר), or aw-yar' (עִירָה), a place guarded by watchmen; generally rendered "city;" keer (קִיר), or kee-raw' (קִירָה), wall. In the Greek we have ko'-may (κώμη), hamlet. Neither in the Old nor in the New Testament is the distinction between cities and towns carefully observed. "Palestine had at all times a far larger number of towns and villages than might have been expected from its size, or from the general agricultural pursuits of its inhabitants. Even at the time of its first occupation under Joshua we find somewhere about six hundred towns, . . . with probably an average population of from two to three thousand. But the number of towns and villages, as well as their populousness, greatly increased in later times. . . . Alike the New Testament, Josephus, and the rabbis give us three names, which may be rendered villages, township, or towns—the latter being surrounded by walls, and again distinguished into those fortified already at the time of Joshua, and those of later date. A township might be either 'great,' if it had its synagogue, or small if it wanted such; this being dependent on the residence of at least ten men (see SYNAGOGUE). The villages had no synagogue; but their inhabitants were supposed to go to the nearest township for market on the Monday and Thursday of every week, when service was held for them, and the local Sanhedrin also sat (Mcgill, i, 1-3). . . . Approaching one of the ancient fortified towns, one would come to a low wall that protected a ditch. Crossing this moat, one would be at the city wall proper, and enter through a massive gate, often covered with iron, and secured by strong bars and bolts. Above the gate rose the watch-tower. 'Within the gate' was the shady or sheltered retreat where 'the elders' sat. . . . The gates opened upon large squares, on which the various streets converged. . . . These streets are all named, mostly after the trades or guilds which have there their bazaars. In these bazaars many of the workmen sat outside their shops, and in the interval of labor exchanged greetings or banter with the passers-by. . . . The rule of these towns and villages was exceedingly strict. The representatives of Rome were chiefly either military men or else fiscal or political agents. Then every town had its Sanhedrin, consisting of twenty-three members if the place numbered at least one hundred and twenty men, or of three members if the population were smaller. . . . Of course all ecclesiastical and, so to speak, strictly Jewish causes, and all religious questions, were within their special cognizance. Lastly, there were also in every place what may be called municipal authorities, under the presidency of a mayor—the representative of the elders—an institution so frequently mentioned in Scripture, and deeply rooted in Jewish society. Perhaps these may be referred to (Luke 7:3) as sent by the centurion of Capernaum to intercede for him with the Lord.

"What may be called the police and sanitary regulations were of the strictest character. Of Cæsarea, e. g., we know that there was a regular system of drainage into the sea, apparently similar to, but more perfect than that of any modern town (Josephus, Ant., xv, 9, 6). The same holds true with regard to the temple buildings at Jerusalem. But in every town and village sanitary rules were strictly attended to. Cemeteries, tanneries, and whatever also might be prejudicial to health, had to be removed at least fifty cubits outside a town. Bakers' and dyers' shops, or stables, were not allowed under the dwelling of another person. Again, in building, the line of each street had to be strictly kept, nor was even a projection beyond it allowed. In general the streets were wider than those of modern Eastern cities. The nature of the soil, and the circumstance that so many towns were built on hills (at least in Judæa), would, of course, be advantageous in a sanitary point of view. It would also render the paving of the streets less requisite. But we know that certain towns were paved—Jerusalem with white stones (Josephus, Ant., xx, 9, 7). To obviate occasions of dispute, neighbors were not allowed to have windows looking into the courts or rooms of others, nor might the principal entrance to a shop be through a court common to two or three dwellings" (Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life, pp. 87-93).

TOWN CLERK (Gr. γραμματεὺς, gram-mat-yooce'), the city secretary, recorder, to whose office belonged the superintendence of the archives, the drawing up of official decrees, and the reading of them in public assemblies of the people. This official appeased the mob in Ephesus, when Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen raised a tumult (Acts 19:35). The speech delivered by him may be analyzed thus: He argues that such excitement as the Ephesians evinced was undignified, inasmuch as they stood above all suspicion in religious matters (vers. 35, 36); that it is unjustifiable, since they could establish nothing against the men whom they accused (v. 37); that it was unnecessary, since other means of redress were open to them (vers. 38, 39); and, finally, if neither pride nor a sense of justice availed anything, fear of the Roman power should restrain them from such illegal proceedings (v. 40) (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

TRACHONITIS (Gr. Τραχωνίτις, trakh-o-nee-tis, rough district, only in Luke 3:1). "Trachonitis was the territory which contained the Trachon or Trachons. These are described by Strabo (xvi, 2, 20) as 'the two so-called Trachones' lying 'behind Damascus.' The name . . . corresponds exactly to the two great stretches of lava, 'the tempests in stone,' which lie to the southeast of Damascus—the Lejá and the Safá. Each of these is called by the Arabs a wa'ar, a word meaning rough, stony tract, and thus equivalent to Trachon. The latter, beyond the reach of civilization, was little regarded, and the Lejá became known as the Trachon par excellence, as is proved by the two inscriptions at either end of it—in Musmireh, the ancient Phæniá, and the Bereke, each of which is called a chief town of the Trachon. . . . Now the Trachonitis was obviously the Trachon plus some territory round it. In the north it extended westward from the borders of the Lejá to the districts of Ulatha and Paneas in the northern Jaulan; and in the south it bordered with Batanea, but also touched Mons Alsadamus, the present Jebel Hauran. Philo uses the name Trachonitis for the whole territory of Philip" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 543).

The portion of Philip's tetrarchy most difficult to define is the Ituræan; and it is uncertain whether it covered or overlapped Trachonitis. Luke's reference is ambiguous, and we have no modern echo of the name to guide us.

TRADE. 1. In the sense of occupation, as when Joseph told Pharaoh, "The men are shepherds, for their trade hath been to feed sheep" (Heb. אֲשֵׁי מִקְנֵה, an-shay' mik-neh', men of cattle, Gen. 46:32, 34). "Trading" (Luke 19:16) is the rendering of the Greek διαπραγματεύομαι (deap-rag-mat-yoo'-om-ahce), to undertake a business earnestly, for the sake of gain.

2. In the sense of traffic, commerce: Nav-than' (Heb. נָתַן, to give, i. e., to pay), something as an equivalent for the sale (Ezek. 27:12-14); Sav-khar' (סָבַח, to go about, travel), to traverse the country as a merchant, to trade, traffic (Gen. 34:10); Gr. ἐργάζομαι (er-gad'-zom-ahce), to work, to make gains by trading, our "do business" (Matt. 25:16), and especially as seamen (Rev. 18:17).

Traffic is the rendering of Heb. קָנָה (ken-ah'-an, literally Canaan). The expression, "land of traffic" (Ezek. 17:4), should read "a land of Canaan" (comp. 16:29); the sentence will then read, "He plucked off the top of his young twigs, and carried it into a land of Canaan," an epithet applied to Babylonia as being a land whose trading spirit had turned it into a Canaan. In Gen. 42:34 "traffic" is the rendering of saw-khar' (see 2), while in 1 Kings 10:15 the Hebrew is mis-khawr' (מִסְכָּוֶר), from the same root, signifying to travel about for the purpose of trade. Similar in meaning is the Heb. מִסְכָּוֶר, rek-ool-law' (Ezek. 28:5, 18). "Trafficckers" (Isa. 23:8) is from the Hebrew signifying Canaanite.

TRADITION (Gr. παράδοσις, par-all'-os-is, a giving over), a giving over either by word of mouth or in writing; objectively, what is delivered, as Paul's teaching (2 Thess. 3:6; comp. 2:15; 1 Cor. 11:2, A. V. "ordinances"). It is also used of the body of precepts, especially ritual, which, in the opinion of the later Jews, were orally delivered by Moses, and orally transmitted in unbroken succession to subsequent generations, which precepts, both illustrating and expanding the written law, as they did, were to be obeyed with equal reverence (Matt. 15:2, sq.; Mark 7:3, 5, 9, 13; Col. 2:8). "The traditions of my fathers" (πατρικαὶ παραδόσεις, Gal. 1:14) are precepts received from the fathers, whether handed down in the Old Testament books or orally. Meyer, in his Com. on Matt. 15:2, says: "The Jews, founding upon Deut. 4:14; 17:10, for the most part attached greater importance to this tradition than to the written law. They laid special stress upon the traditional precept, founded on Lev. 15:11, which required that the hands should be washed before every meal. Jesus and his disciples ignored this tradition as such, which had been handed down from the men of olden time."

TRAFFICKER. See GLOSSARY.

TRAIN. 1. Khak'-yil (Heb. כָּחַק, strength), the term used respecting the queen of Sheba; "she came to Jerusalem with a very great train" (1 Kings 10:2), i. e., a retinue of men, and camels laden with riches.

2. "Train up a child," etc. (Prov. 22:6), has the sense in Hebrew (רָצַף, khaw-nak') of "to imbue one with anything," to initiate; and so to train up a child according to his way, according to his disposition and habits.

3. Isaiah (6:1) says that the Lord's train (Heb. שָׂרֵפִים, shool) filled the temple. "The heavenly temple is that superterrestrial place, which Jehovah transforms into heaven and a temple, by manifesting himself there to angels and saints. But while he manifests his glory there he is obliged also to veil it, because created beings are unable to bear it. But that which veils his glory is no less splendid than that portion of it which is revealed. And this was the truth embodied for Isaiah in the long robe and train. He saw the Lord, and what more he saw was the all-filling robe of the indescribable One" (Delitzsch, Com., in loc.).

TRANCE. 1. In the only passage (Num. 24:4, 16) in which this word occurs in the English of the Old Testament, there is, as the Italics show, no corresponding word in Hebrew.

2. In the New Testament the word occurs three times (Acts 10:10; 11:5; 22:17, Gr. ἐκστασις, ek'- stas-is). The word is thus defined by Grimm, "A throwing of the mind out of its normal state, whether such as makes a lunatic, or that of the man who by some sudden emotion is transported out of himself, so that in this rapt condition, although he is awake, his mind is so drawn off from all surrounding objects and wholly fixed on things divine that he sees nothing but the forms and images lying within, and thinks that he perceives with his bodily eyes and ears realities shown him by God."

TRANSFIGURATION (Gr. μεταμορφώσις, met-am-or-fō'-o, to change into another form). It is recorded (Matt. 17:2; Mark 9:2) that our Lord "was transfigured" before his disciples, Peter, James, and John; and this is explained (Luke 9:29), "And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistening." Each of the evangelists represent it as taking place about eight days after the first distinct intimation our Lord made to them of his approaching sufferings, death, and resurrection. The location is merely given as a high mountain, which is traditionally thought to have been Mount Tabor; but as Jesus was at this time sojourning in the neighborhood of Cæsarea Philippi, it seems likely that it was one of the ridges of Hermon. While our Lord was praying he was "transfigured," i. e., his external aspect was changed, his face gleaming like the sun, and his raiment being so white that it shone like light. The cause of this appearance was that his divine glory shone out through his human form, and not, as in the case of Moses, caused by God having appeared to him.

The disciples seem to have been in a slumber when this divine radiance began to shine forth; but when they woke up they were filled with wonder and fear, beholding also two men, Moses and Elias, in glory, conversing with him. Peter, recovering himself, in the rapture of the moment, suggested that three tents should be pitched to secure the continued presence and fellowship of such glorious company. He had scarcely given expression to his thought when a bright cloud overshadowed them, out of which came a voice, saying, "This is my beloved Son, hear ye him." The theme of conversation is not given by Matthew or Mark, but Luke records that they spake concerning his death.

The lessons of the transfiguration are thus summed up by Kitto: (1) To teach that, in spite of the calumnies which the Pharisees had heaped on Jesus, the old and new dispensations are in harmony with each other. To this end the author and restorer of the old dispensation talk with the founder of the new, as if his scheme, even the most repulsive feature of it, was contemplated by theirs, as the reality of which they had promulgated only types and shadows. (2) To teach that the new dispensation was superior to the old, Moses and Elias appear as inferior to Jesus, not merely since their faces did not, as far as we know, shine like the sun, but chiefly because the voice from the excellent glory commanded to hear him in preference to them. (3) To gird up the energies of Jesus for the great agony which was so soon to excruciate him. (4) To comfort the hearts of his disciples, who being destined to see their Master, whom they had left all to follow, nailed to a cross, to be themselves persecuted, and to suffer the want of all things, were in danger of despair. Gazing at the glorified body of their Master, they beheld not only a proof, but an express and lively image of his resurrection, ascension, and exaltation above the heavens. (5) To teach that virtue will not allow supine contemplation, but demands the exercise and exertion of our several powers.

This wonderful event in the life of Christ is alluded to by Peter, toward the close of his life, as one of the proofs of our Lord's majesty (2 Pet. 1: 18); and the apostle John refers (1:14) to the convincing power of the "glory" exhibited on that occasion.

TRANSFORMED (Gr. μεταμορφω, met-amor-fo'-o), used of the change of the moral character for the better (Rom. 12:2), through the renewal of the thinking power. "The apostle considers it as a peculiar operation of the Christian faith, that believers are seriously concerned to prove in everything what is the will of God (Eph. 5:10); whereas man, in his natural state, looks more to the point of how he may please men" (Tholuck, Com.). The apostle (2 Cor. 3:18) speaks of the Christian being "changed into the same image from glory to glory," etc. In this passage the Gospel is probably spoken of as a mirror, in which the glory of Christ gives itself to be seen; the Christian, studying the Gospel, becomes so transformed that the same image which he sees in the "mirror"—the image of the glory of Christ—presents itself on him, i. e., he is so transformed that he becomes like the glorified Christ.

In 2 Cor. 11:13, sq., the apostle, characterizing false prophets, says of them that they are "deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light" (see vers. 14, 15). The Greek is μετασχηματιζο (met-askh-ay-mat-id'-zo), and means to assume the appearance of another. The persons of whom Paul speaks were servants of Satan, but in working against the apostle in doctrine and act they hypocritically assumed the mask of an apostle, though they were the opposite of a true apostle.

TRANSGRESSION (Heb. mostly פְּשָׁע, peh'-shah, revolt; Gr. παράβασις, par-ab'-as-is, violation), sometimes used synonymously with sin, but sometimes used in a distinctive sense, as indicating a violation of the law through ignorance, e. g., Exod. 34:7; Rom. 4:15. All sin is transgression, but all transgression is not sin in the sense of incurring guilt. See SIN.

TRANSLATE, in both its Hebrew and Greek originals, has the sense of removal of a person or thing from one state or condition to another (2 Sam. 3:10), where it has reference to transferring a kingdom from Saul to David. Col. 1:13, "hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son," has clearly a local reference; as is also the case with Enoch (Heb. 11:5).

TRAP, the rendering of several Hebrew and one Greek word, and used figuratively of fatal dangers, of destructive sins (Job 18:10; Prov. 13:14), also of a person or thing as a cause of ruin (Exod. 10:7; 1 Sam. 18:21; Rom. 11:9).

TREAD, TREADERS. See WINEPRESS.

TREASURE (Hebrew mostly from צָנַן, aw-tsar', to hoard; Gr. θησαυρός, thay-sow-ros'), anything collected in storehouses, e. g., treasures of grain, wine, oil; brass, silver, gold; coined money. So winds, rain, hail, snow, etc., are in the treasures of God (Psa. 135:7; Jer. 51:16). Pharaoh compelled the Hebrews to build him treasure cities, or magazines (Exod. 1:11), and the kings of Judah had keepers of their treasures, both in city and country (1 Chron. 27:25; 2 Chron. 32:27, etc.), and these places were called treasure cities. The temple treasury (Mark 12:41; John 8:20) was that portion of the Court of the Women in which were thirteen chests to receive the offerings of worshippers, either for the temple service or for the poor. These chests were narrow at the mouth and wide at the bottom, and shaped like trumpets, whence their name.

Figurative. "Ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me," etc. (Exod. 19:5; comp. Psa. 135:4), means more than property in general, for in this sense all peoples are the Lord's. The meaning is that Israel were a costly, valued possession as compared to other people, because they recognized Jehovah alone as God. "The fear of the Lord is his treasure" (Isa. 33:6) means that piety is the wealth of a nation. The word treasures is often used to denote great abundance, as: "In Jesus Christ are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. 2:3); the "treasures of wickedness" (Prov. 10:2; Mic. 6:10) are those things which are accumulated through wrong (comp. Luke 16:9); "the treasures of darkness" (Isa. 45:3) refer to the carefully stored riches of Babylon and the Lydian Sardes, which Cyrus acquired by conquest; Amos 3:10 says of the rich in Samaria, "They know not to do right. . . who store up violence and robbery in their palaces," i. e., they heap up injustice and violence in their palaces like treasures (comp. Rom. 2:5); "this treasure in earthen vessels" (2 Cor. 4:7) "is referred either, in accordance with v. 6, to the light kindled by God in the heart, or to the ministry of the Gospel (Calvin, Bengel, etc.). In Matt. 12:35; Luke 6:45, the heart of a good man is compared to a treasure of good things, while the depraved man has his treasury of evil. "Treasure hid in a field" (Matt. 13:44) refers to the custom of burying money, jewels, and other valuables, that they may remain free from molestation or suspicion. Thomson (Land and Book, i, p. 194) refers to the finding of several copper pots which contained a large quantity of ancient copper coin, all of issues of Alexander and his father Philip, and adds: "I suspect it was the royal treasure, which one of Alexander's officers concealed when he heard of his unexpected death in Babylon, intending to appropriate it to himself; but being apprehended, slain, or driven away by some of the revolutions which followed that event, the coin remained where he had hid it." Such a fact illustrates the above text. A man discovers the place where the treasure is hid, keeps the discovery to himself, buys the field, and the treasure is his own. Job represents (3:21) the man weary of life as seeking the grave with the eagerness of one digging for hid treasure; and Solomon (Prov. 2:4) compares wisdom to "hid treasures."

TREASURER (Heb. and Chald. גִּזְבָּן, ghiz-bawr, Ezra 1:8; 7:21; Chald. גִּזְבָּן, ghid-bawr, Dan. 8:2, 3), an important officer in all oriental courts. In Isa. 22:15 Shebna is not a "treasurer" as rendered in the A. V., but a so-kane', associate (Heb. סֹכֵן), and is officially described as "over the house." This name was given to an office of state of great importance, in fact the highest of all, and one so vastly superior to all others (36:3; 37:2) that it was sometimes filled by the heir to the throne (2 Chron. 26:21).

TREASURY. See TREASURE.

TREATY. See ALLIANCE; COVENANT.

TREE (Heb. עֵץ, ales; Gr. δέσπορον, den'-dron). Besides this generic term there occur words of more special signification, e. g., ay'-shel (Heb. אֵשֶׁל, 1 Sam. 22:6; 31:13, "grove" in Gen. 21:33), which is thought to denote the tamarisk or else the terebinth (q. v.); ayl (Heb. אֵיל, Isa. 61:3; Ezek. 31:14), etc.

Mosaic Regulations. When the Israelites planted fruit trees in Palestine they were to treat the fruit of every tree as uncircumcised, i. e., not to eat it. "The reason for this command is not to be sought for in the fact that in the first three years fruit trees bear only a little fruit, and that somewhat insipid, and that if the blossom or fruit is broken off the first year the trees will bear all the more plentifully afterward, though this end would no doubt be thereby attained; but it rests rather upon ethical grounds. Israel was to treat the fruits of horticulture with the most careful regard as a gift of God, and sanctify the enjoyment of them by a thank offering. In the fourth year the whole of the fruit was to be a holiness of praise for Jehovah, i. e., to be offered to the Lord as a holy sacrificial gift, in praise and thanksgiving for the blessing which he had bestowed upon the fruit trees" (K. and D., Com.). The Hebrews were forbidden to destroy the fruit trees of their enemies in time of war, "for the tree of the field is man's life" (Deut. 20:19, 20).

Noted Trees. There are in Scripture many memorable trees, e. g., Allon-bacluth (Gen. 35:8), the tamarisk in Gibeah (1 Sam. 22:6), the terebinth in Shechem (Josh. 24:26), under which the law was set up; the palm tree of Deborah (Judg. 4:5), the terebinth of enchantments (9:37), the terebinth of wanderers (4:11), and others (1 Sam. 14:2; 10:3; sometimes "plain" in A. V.). This observation of particular trees was among the heathen extended to a regular worship of them. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

Worship of Trees. Among the Cunaanites and other Eastern peoples worship was carried on in holy groves (q. v.). In the absence of groves they chose green trees with thick foliage (Ezek. 6:13; 20:28), such as the vigorous oak, the evergreen terebinth (Isa. 1:29, 30; 57:5), and the poplar or osier, which remains green even in the heat of summer (Hos. 4:13). To explain how this worship came about, Stade (Geschichte, i, p. 451) says that at such places were graves of patriarchs or other heroes—as Hebron, the burying place of Abraham, etc.; but Robertson (Early Religion of Israel, p. 248) says: "I believe the prophet, who approved the worship under green trees, came nearer to a true explanation of the origin of the worship in the hint, 'because the shadow thereof is good' (Hos. 4:13), than modern critics, with their learned disquisition as to the tree suggesting life and being the abode of a spirit or a divinity."

TREE OF KNOWLEDGE, and OF LIFE. These were planted by God in the garden of Eden; "the one to train man's spirit through the exercise of obedience to the word of God, the other to transform his earthly nature into the spiritual essence of eternal life. These trees received their names from their relation to man, that is to say, from the effect which the eating of their fruit was destined to produce upon human life and its development. The fruit of the tree of life conferred the power of eternal, immortal life; and the tree of knowledge was planted to lead men to the knowledge of good and evil. The tree of life was to impart the power of transformation into eternal life. The tree of knowledge was to lead man to the knowledge of good and evil; and, according to the divine intention, this was to be attained through his not eating of the fruit. This end was to be accomplished, not only by his discerning, in the limit imposed by the prohibition, the difference between that which accorded with the will of God and that which opposed it, but also by his coming eventually, through obedience to the prohibition, to recognize the fact that all that is opposed to the will of God is an evil to be avoided, and, through voluntary resistance to such evil, to the full development of the freedom of choice originally imparted to him into the actual freedom of a deliberate and self-conscious choice of good" (K. and D., Com., Gen. 2:17). But by yielding to the temptation to eat of its fruit our first parents came to know good from evil by a sad, bitter experience, and by receiving the evil into their own soul became the victims of the threatened death. The various references to the "tree of life" evidently consider it to have been the divinely appointed medium for securing in some way the immortality of our first parents (Prov. 3:18; 11:30; Ezek. 47:12; Rev. 2:7; 22:2, 14).

TRENCH. 1. Teh-aw-law' (Heb. תֵּהוֹלָה), a channel or conduit (1 Kings 18:32, 35, 38, as elsewhere rendered), a kind of ditch cut for the purpose of receiving and draining water from adjacent parts. Something of this kind Elijah probably had dug round the altar on Carmel (v. 32).

2. Khale (Heb. כַּל, 2 Sam. 20:15), a wall, rampart, or bulwark, as elsewhere rendered.

3. Mah-gawl' (Heb. מַגְוֹל, 1 Sam. 26:5, 7; comp. 17:20), a wagon rut, hence a defense formed by the vehicles of an army.

4. Khar'-ax (Gr. χάρᾱξ, a pale or stake), a paliade or rainpart, i. e., pales between which earth, stones, trees, and timbers are heaped and packed together (Luke 19:43).

TRESPASS. 1. Peh'-shah (Heb. פְּשָׁע, revolt), the breaking away from an allegiance, covenant (Exod. 22:9; 1 Sam. 25:28).

2. Mah-al' (Heb. מַחֲלֵה, to cover up), to act covertly, and so treacherously, as an adulterous woman against her husband (Lev. 26:40); or to take away by stealth, to steal (Josh. 7:1).

3. Aw-shawn' (Heb. שָׁוְיָה; Gr. par-ap'-to-nah (παράπτωμα), an offense committed, a hurt or wrong done a neighbor. The Hebrew means a side slip, and the Greek a lapse or deviation from truth and uprightness. They both convey the meaning of an error or slip rather than a deliberate or gross sin (Lev. 5:6, etc.; Matt. 6:14, 15, etc.).

TRESPASS OFFERING. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

TRIAL. See LAW, ADMINISTRATION OF; TEMPTATION.

TRIBE. See ISRAEL, CONSTITUTION OF.

TRIBULATION (Heb. צָר, tsar, or צָוָר, tsawr, narrow; Gr. θλίψις, thlip'-sis, a pressure) has in the A. V. much the same meaning as trouble, or trial, i. e., afflictive dispensations to which a person is subjected either by way of punishment (Judg. 10:14; Matt. 24:21, 29; Rom. 2:9; 2 Thess. 1:6) or by way of trial (John 16:33; Rom. 5:3; 2 Thess. 1:4).

TRIBUTARY (Heb. מַס, mas, or מַעַס, mees, commonly derived from מַסֵּס, maw-sas', to pine away, because tribute is a consuming of strength), one who becomes subject to tribute service (Deut. 20:11; Judg. 1:30, 33, 35; Lam. 1:1). See TRIBUTE.

TRIBUTE. 1. Mas (Heb. מַס, a consuming), spoken mostly of tribute to be paid in service, fully "tribute of one serving" (1 Kings 9:21), a condition of serfdom (Josh. 16:10; 17:13; Judg. 1:28). Thus we see that Adoram was appointed overseer over the tributary service in the time of Solomon (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 4:6).

2. Meh'-kes (Heb. מְכִסֵּס, to enumerate), a portion paid to the Lord (Num. 31:28, sq.).

3. Mil-daw' (Heb. מִדָּוָה, something measured out (2 Kings 23:33; Ezra 4:20).

4. Bel-o' (Chald. בֵּלֵי, consumed), a tax on things consumed, excise (Ezra 4:13; 7:24).

5. O'-nesh (Heb. נֶשֶׁת, a fine imposed (Ezra 6:8; Neh. 5:4).

6. Mis-saw' (Heb. מִסְכָּה, number), that which an Israelite gave to the Lord, according to his ability (Deut. 16:10).

7. Mas-saw' (Heb. מַסֵּס) does not signify tribute, for the word denotes burden; so that it should read "and of silver a burden" (2 Chron. 17:11).

8. Did'-rakh-mon (Gr. διδραχμον, a double drachma), a temple tax levied upon all Jews (Matt. 17:24); and kane'-sos (κῆνος), a register and valuation of property in accordance with which taxes were paid, the tax or tribute levied on individuals, and to be paid yearly (Matt. 17:25; 22:17; Mark 12:14). "Tribute money" (Matt. 22:19) was the coin with which the tax was paid. For'-os (Gr. φόρος, a burden) was the annual tax upon houses, lands, and persons (Luke 20:22; 23:2).

Figurative. Of Issachar, Jacob said, "Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens; . . . and became a servant unto tribute" (Gen. 49:14, 15). The simile of a strong ass, etc., pointed to the fact that this tribe would content itself with material good, and not strive after political power and rule. "Like an idle beast of burden, he would rather submit to the yoke and be forced to do the work of a slave than risk his possessions and his peace in the struggle for liberty." See TAX.

TRINITY, the term by which is expressed the unity of three persons in the one God. The Christian doctrine is: 1. That there is only one God, one divine nature and being. 2. This one divine being is tripersonal, involving the distinctions of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. 3. These three are joint partakers of the same nature and majesty of God. This doctrine is preeminently one of revelation. And while it brings before us one of the great mysteries of revelation, and transcends the finite comprehension, it is essential to the understanding of the Scriptures; and, as we shall see, has its great value and uses.

1. Scripture Doctrine. It is quite generally admitted that the doctrine under consideration cannot be proved from the Scriptures of the Old Testament; but, at the same time, it is properly held that with the accompanying light of the New Testament traces of this truth can be found in the Old (e. g., Num. 6:24-26; Isa. 6:3; 63:9, 10, the sanctity of the symbolical number three—the plural form of Elohim, also places in which the deity is spoken of as conversing with himself). This is in accord with the gradual development of revealed truth in other particulars. The religion of the Old Testament is emphatically monotheistic. The almost exclusive proclamation of the unity of God was essential as a safeguard against polytheism.

The New Testament teaching upon this subject is not given in the way of formal statement. The formal statement, however, is legitimately and necessarily deduced from the Scriptures of the New Testament, and these, as has been suggested, cast a light backward upon the intimations of the Old. Reliance, it is held by many competent critics, is not to be placed upon the passages Acts 20:28 and 1 Tim. 3:16; and 1 John 5:7 is commonly regarded as spurious. Aside from these, however, it is plain that both Christ and the apostles ascribe distinct personality to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost (see articles, FATHER, GOD THE; SONSHIP OF CHRIST; HOLY GHOST, THE). And these utterances are such as to admit legitimately of no other conception than that of the unity of these three persons in the ontological oneness of the whole divine nature (see, e. g., Matt. 28:19; John 14:16, 17; 1 Cor. 12:4-6; 2 Cor. 13:13; Eph. 4:4-6; 1 Pet. 1:2; Rev. 1:4-6). The same worship is paid, the same works are ascribed to each of these three persons, and in such a way as to indicate that these three are united in the fullness of the one living God. The Monotheism of the Old Testament is maintained, while glimpses are, nevertheless, afforded into the tripersonal mode of the divine existence.

2. Theological Suggestions. (1) The Christian faith at this period does not ground itself upon philosophy, for it here extends to a matter far above the reach of philosophical reflection. Also but little stress, if any, is to be laid upon apparent resemblances between pagan religions and Christianity at this point—resemblances more apparent than real. The doctrine is to be accepted by faith in the divine revelation; and while it is above reason, and cannot be comprehended in its depth and fullness, it does not follow, nor can it be shown, that it is opposed to reason.

(2) The question whether the Trinity is merely one of manifestation or that of essential nature has been raised again and again in the history of the Church (see SABELLIANISM in works on Doctrine). Undoubtedly the history of revelation shows a progress in the unfolding of truth concerning God. And in that sense the Trinity is dispensational. But it is also emphatically to be borne in mind that if God reveals himself he must reveal himself as he is, and the Trinity of revelation must therefore rest upon a Trinity of nature. The attempt to remove difficulty by any sort of Sabellian interpretation only raises difficulty of a deeper character. Can God on the whole reveal himself other than he actually is?

(3) On the other hand Christianity has reason to guard itself, as it has generally sought to do against tritheistic conceptions. Both the unity and the tripersonal nature of God are to be maintained. And thus the proper baptismal formula is not, "In the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost," but the words as our Lord gave them (Matt. 28:19).

(4) It is admitted by all who thoughtfully deal with this subject that the Scripture revelation here leads us into the presence of a deep mystery; and that all human attempts at expression are of necessity imperfect. The word person, it may be, is inadequate, and is doubtless used often in a way that is misleading, "That God is alike one Person, and in the same sense three Persons, is what Christianity has never professed" (Van Oosterzee). Said Augustine, "Three persons, if they are to be so called, for the unspeakable exaltedness of the object cannot be set forth by this term." And yet the long standing and prevailing doctrine of the Church expresses more nearly than any other the truth concerning God as it comes to us in the Holy Scriptures. And it is further to be borne in mind that this teaching of the Church has been called forth for the purpose of combating various forms of error. It has not been held as a complete or perfect expression of the truth concerning the unfathomable being of God, but rather as a protest against the denials of the personality and supreme deity of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.

(5) Accordingly the doctrine has a large measure of importance. It has been called "a bulwark for Christian theism." Unitarianism is very apt to degenerate into deism or pantheism. Also this doctrine affords us a glimpse into the wonderful being of God, while at the same time it constantly proclaims the impossibility of comprehending God. Thus while it is a stumbling-block to rationalism, it is for those who accept it a safeguard against all tendency to rationalism or intellectual pride. And, further, in the Trinity we should behold not only a God who is exalted far above us, but also Christ with us, and the Holy Ghost who will dwell in us. Thus in a proper way is harmonized the divine transcendence with the divine immanence.

The glory of the Gospel depends upon this truth; for Christ is most clearly seen to be God's unspeakable gift, the bringer of the most perfect revelation, and the author of eternal salvation, when we recognize his essential oneness with the Father. Likewise the Holy Ghost is thus seen to be, in his relation to a sinful world, and to the Church as well as to individual believers, the infinite source of hope and new and holy life.

3. Historical. Briefly it may be said that the faith of the primitive Christians at this point, as many others, was without attempt at scientific form. The elements of the doctrine, however, were embraced by their simple reliance upon the teaching of Christ and his apostles. It was only gradually, and after a considerable period, in its conflict with Judaism and paganism, that the thought of the Church arrived at something of formal statement. The word Trinity (Trinitas) was first employed by Tertullian (2d century), though his word was only the Latin translation of the Greek τριας, employed by Theophilus of Antioch. The word Person was also first employed by Tertullian, though he used it in the inadmissible sense of individual.

The Council of Nice (A. D. 325) was an epoch in Christian history. The heresy of Sabellius and Paul of Samosata, which refused to recognize the Father as in any personal sense distinct from the Son and the Holy Ghost, had been previously condemned. But Arius, who began with the Sabellian idea that the Trinity is only one of manifestation, changed his position and declared that there were three persons in God, but that these three were unequal in glory. In short, the Son and the Holy Ghost owed their existence to the divine will, and, accordingly, were creatures of God (see ARIANISM in books on Doctrine). The Council of Nice, in opposition to Arianism and various other theories, adopted the formal statement of the substantiality of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, while maintaining the distinction of personality. The doctrine of the Nicene Council was reaffirmed at various succeeding councils, and is the generally recognized doctrine of the Christian Church.

TRIUMPH (Heb. זָּבַח , av-laz', to exult; זָּבַח , av-laz', to jump for joy; Gr. θριαμβεω, three-am-byoo'-o, a noisy song). The nations of antiquity generally celebrated success in war by a triumph, which usually included a gorgeous procession, a display of captives and spoil, and a solemn thanksgiving to the gods.

1. The Egyptians. The return of a king in triumph from war was a grand solemnity celebrated with all the pomp which the wealth of the nation could command. "The inhabitants flocked to meet him, and with welcome acclamations greeted his arrival and the success of his arms. The priests and chief people of each place advanced with garlands and bouquets of flowers; the principal person present addressed him in an appropriate speech; and as the troops defiled through the streets or passed without the walls the people followed with acclamations, uttering earnest thanksgivings to the gods, the protectors of Egypt, and praying them forever to continue the same marks of favor to their monarch and their nation" (Wilkinson, The Ancient Egyptians, i, 277, 278). The Assyrian sculptures abound with similar representations.

2. The Romans. Among them the highest honor which could be bestowed on a citizen or magistrate was the triumph or solemn procession, in which a victorious general passed from the gate of the city to the capitol. He set out from the Campus Martius along the Via Triumphalis, and from thence through the most public places of the city. The streets were strewn with flowers and the altars smoked with incense. The procession was formed as follows: First, a numerous band of music, singing and playing triumphal songs; the oxen to be sacrificed, their horns gilded and heads adorned with fillets and garlands; the spoils, and captives in chains; the victors, having their fasces adorned with laurel; a great company of musicians and dancers; a long train of persons carrying perfumes; the general dressed in purple embroidered with gold, wearing a crown of laurel, in his right hand a laurel branch and a scepter in his left, his face painted with vermilion, and a golden ball suspended from his neck. He stood erect in his chariot, with a public slave by his side to remind him of the vicissitudes of fortune and of his mortality. Behind him came the consuls, senators, and other magistrates, on foot; the whole procession closing with the victorious army.

3. The Hebrews celebrated their victories by triumphal processions, the women and children dancing to the accompaniment of musical instruments (Judg. 11:34-37), and singing hymns of triumph to Jehovah; of which hymns that sung by Miriam (Exod. 15:1-21) and Deborah (Judg. 5:1-31) are notable examples. Triumphal songs were uttered for the living (1 Sam. 18:6-8; 2 Chron. 20:21-28), and elegies for the dead (2 Sam. 1:17-27; 2 Chron. 35:25). Great demonstrations of joy were made, and the shout of victory resounded from mountain to mountain (Isa. 42:11; 52:7, 8, 63:1-4; Jer. 50:2; Ezek. 7:7; Nah. 1:15). Monuments in honor of victory were erected, and the arms of the enemy were hung up as trophies in the temples (1 Sam. 21:9; 31:10; 2 Sam. 8:11, 12; 2 Kings 11:10).

Indignities to prisoners formed a leading feature among ancient nations; such as maiming, blinding, and killing. Many representations appear upon the monuments of putting the foot upon the head or neck of a conquered foe (Josh. 10:24), and it forms the ground of many figurative representations in the Scriptures (Psa. 110:1; Isa. 60:14; 1 Cor. 15:26).

TROAS (Gr. Τρωάς, tro-as), a city on the coast of Mysia, opposite the southeast extremity of the island of Tenedos, and near Troy. It was formerly called Antigonia Troas (Ἀντιγόνη Τρωάς), having been built by Antigonus; but was embellished by Lysimachus, and named Alexandria Troas in honor of Alexander the Great. It flourished under the Romans, and, with its environs, was raised by Augustus to be a colonia with the Jus Italicum. It was while in Troas that Paul received the divine intimation that he was to carry the Gospel into Europe (Acts 16:8-11); where he rested for a short time on the northward road from Ephesus (during the next missionary journey), in the expectation of meeting Titus (2 Cor. 2:12, 13); where on his return southward he met those who had preceded him from Philippi (Acts 20:5, 6), and remained a week; and where, years after, he left a cloak, some books and parchments in the house of Carpus (2 Tim. 4:13).

TROGYLIUM (Gr. Τρογύλιον, tro-gool'-lee-on), a town and promontory on the Ionian coast, directly opposite Samos, the channel here being about one mile in width. Paul sailed through this channel on his way to Jerusalem at the close of his third missionary journey, spending a night at Trogyllium (Acts 20:15). "St. Paul's Port" is the name still given to the harbor there.

TROOP. 1. Gawd (Heb. גַּד, fortune) is an improper rendering (Isa. 65:11) for Gad, the God of fortune. See "Gad" in article GONS, FALSE.

2. Ghed-ood' (Heb. גַּדְוָד, gawd), a marauding party in the forays for which Palestine has always been notorious, especially beyond Jordan (Gen. 49:19; 2 Sam. 3:22; 22:30; Job 19:12; Psa. 18:29, etc.), sometimes in the A. V. "bands."

TROPHIMUS (Gr. Τρόφιμος, trof'-ee-mos, nutritious), a companion of the apostle Paul. He was a native of Ephesus in Asia Minor, and, together with Tychicus, accompanied Paul in his third missionary journey when returning from Macedonia toward Syria (Acts 20:4). Trophimus went to Jerusalem, where he was the innocent cause of the tumult in which the apostle was apprehended. Certain Jews from the district of Asia saw the two missionaries together, and supposed that Paul had taken Trophimus into the temple (Acts 21:27-29). In 2 Tim. 4:20 Paul writes that he had left Trophimus in ill health at Miletus. Of further details we are ignorant.

TROUGH (Heb. תַּרְסֵי, sho'-keth, drinking), a vessel of wood or stone for watering animals (Gen. 24:20; 30:38; Exod. 2:16, Heb. תַּרְסֵי, rah'-hat; Gen. 30:38, 41, A. V. "gutter"). See KNEADING TROUGH.

TROW (Gr. δοκέω, dok-ek'-o, Luke 17:9), to be of opinion, to think; so used that the object is easily understood from the context.

TRUCE BREAKER (Gr. ἀσπονδός, as'-pon-dos, without a treaty), one who cannot be persuaded to enter into a covenant, implacable (2 Tim. 3:3; Rom. 1:31, A. V. "covenant breaker").

TRUMPETS, FEAST OF. See FESTIVALS.

TRYPHENA (Gr. Τρύφαινα, trōo'-fahee-nah, luxurious), a Christian woman of Rome to whom, in connection with Tryphosa, Paul sent a special salutation (Rom. 16:12). What other relation they sustained is not known, but it is more than likely that they were fellow-deaconesses.

TRYPHOSA (Gr. Τρυφώσα, trōo'-fo'-sah, luxurious). See TRYPHENA; also SUPPLEMENT.

TU'BAL (Heb. תּוּבַל, too-bal', meaning uncertain), one of the seven sons of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5). He is thought to have been the founder of the Tiberani, said by the scholiasts to have been a Scythian tribe. "Tubal and Meshech, the Tabali and Muská of the Assyrian monuments, were the representatives of eastern Asia Minor. Their territory originally extended far to the south. In the time of Sargon and Sennacherib that of the Tabali adjoined Cilicia, while the Muská inhabited the highlands to the east of them, where they were in contact with Meliténé and the Hitites. In later days, however, Meshech had retreated to the north, and the classical geographers place the Tiberani and the Moschians at no great distance from the Black Sea" (Sayce, Higher Crit., etc., p. 130).

TU'BAL-CAIN (Heb. תּוּבַל כַּיִן, too'-bal kah'-yin, meaning uncertain), the son of Lamech by his wife Zillah, who is described (Gen. 4:22) as "hammering all kinds of cutting things in brass and iron"—the inventor of edge tools.

TWINKLING. The apostle Paul, in speaking of those who shall be alive when Christ comes in judgment, says (1 Cor. 15:52), "We shall all be changed in a moment" (Gr. ἐν ἀτόμῳ, en at-om'-ō, that which cannot be divided), "in the twinkling of an eye" (ἐν ῥιπή ὀφθαλμοῦ, en ree-pays' of-thal-moo', the jerk of the eyelash). Both these were common expressions to denote the shortest conceivable time.

TYCHICUS (Gr. Τυχικός, too-khee-kos', fateful), one of Paul's fellow-laborers. We first meet him as a companion of the apostle during a portion of his return journey from the third missionary tour (Acts 20:4). He is there expressly called (with Trophimus) a native of Asia Minor; but while Trophimus went with Paul to Jerusalem (21:29), Tychicus was left behind in Asia, probably at Miletus (20:15, 38). In Paul's first imprisonment he was with the apostle again (Col. 4:7, 8; Eph. 6:21, 22). The next reference to him is in Tit. 3:12. Here Paul (writing possibly from Ephesus) says that it is probable he may send Tychicus to Crete, about the time when he himself goes to Nicopolis. In 2 Tim. 4:12 (written at Rome during the second imprisonment), he says, "I am herewith sending Tychicus to Ephesus." There is much probability in the conjecture that Tychicus was one of the two "brethren" (Trophimus being the other) who were associated with Titus (2 Cor. 8:16-24) in conducting the business of the collection for the poor Christians in Judea.

TYRAN'NUS (Gr. Τύραννος, too'-ran-nos, sovereign), the man in whose school Paul taught for two years during his sojourn at Ephesus (Acts 19:9). The fact that he taught in his school after quitting the synagogue favors the opinion that he was a Greek, but whether he was a convert is uncertain. Paul taught every day in the lecture room of Tyrannus. "Public life in the Ionian cities ended regularly at the fifth hour (11 A. M.); . . . thus Paul himself would be free, and the lecture room would be disengaged after the fifth hour; and the time, which was devoted generally to home life and rest, was applied by him to mission work" (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 271).

TYRE (Heb. צֵר or צָר, tsore; Gr. Τύρος, too'-ros), an ancient Phœnician city, located on the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, twenty miles from Sidon and twenty-three miles from Acre. It once consisted of two parts—a rocky coast defense of great strength on the mainland, and a city upon a small but well-protected island, about half a mile from the shore. Tyre was already a city on an island in the sea in the 14th century B. C., as we learn from an Egyptian papyrus of that date. At the time that Alexander the Great besieged Tyre for seven months, the configuration of the locality was changed, and a causeway being built, the island no longer existed. The city was spoken of as "a crowning city, whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honorable of the earth" (Isa. 23:8). The Tyrian merchants sailed to all ports and colonized almost everywhere. David early formed an alliance with them for trading purposes (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Kings 5:1; 2 Chron. 2:3). See HIRAM; SOLOMON.

These friendly relations survived for a time the disastrous secession of the ten tribes, and a century later Ahab married a daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians (1 Kings 16:31), who, according to Menander, was daughter of Ithobal, king of Tyre. When mercantile cupidity induced the Tyrians and the neighboring Phœnicians to buy Hebrew captives from their enemies, and to sell them as slaves to the Greeks and Edomites, there commenced denunciations and, at first, threats of retaliation (Joel 3:4-8; Amos 1:9, 10). But the likelihood of the denunciations being fulfilled first arose from the progressive conquests of the Assyrian monarchs. Accordingly, when Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, had taken the city of Samaria, had conquered the kingdom of Israel and carried its inhabitants into captivity, he turned his arms against the Phœnician cities. At this time Tyre had reached a high point of prosperity. Shalmaneser seems to have taken advantage of a revolt of the Cyprians; and what ensued is thus related by Menander, who translated the archives of Tyre into the Greek language: "Elulæus reigned thirty-six years (over Tyre). This king, upon the revolt of the Kittæans (Cyprians), sailed with a fleet against them and reduced them to submission. On the other hand, the king of the Assyrians attacked in war the whole of Phœnicia, but soon made peace with all and turned back. On this Sidon and Ace (i. e., Akkô or Acre) and Palætyrus revolted from the Tyrians, with many other cities which delivered themselves up to the king of Assyria. Accordingly, when the Tyrians would not submit to him, the king returned and fell upon them again, the Phœnicians having furnished him with sixty ships and eight hundred rowers. Against these the Tyrians sailed with twelve ships, and, dispersing the fleet opposed to them, they took five hundred men prisoners. The reputation of all the citizens in Tyre was hence increased. Upon this the king of the Assyrians, moving off his army, placed guards at their river and aqueducts to prevent the Tyrians ever, of this fact respecting Tyrian mercenary soldiers, Ezekiel gives interesting details respecting the trade of Tyre. It appears that its gold came from Arabia by the Persian Gulf (v. 22), just as in the time of Solomon it came from Arabia by the Red Sea.

Only thirty-four years before the destruction of Jerusalem commenced the celebrated reformation of Josiah (B. C. 622). This momentous religious revolution (2 Kings, chaps. 22, 23) fully explains the exultation and malevolence of the Tyrians. In that reformation Josiah had heaped insults on the gods who were the objects of Tyrian veneration and love. Indeed, he seemed to have endeavored to exterminate their religion (23:20). These acts from drawing water. This continued for five years, and still the Tyrians held out, supplying themselves with water from wells." It is in reference to this siege that the prophecy against Tyre in Isaiah, ch. 23, was uttered. After the siege of Tyre by Shalmaneser (which must have taken place not long after 721 B. C.), Tyre remained a powerful state with its own kings (Jer. 25:22; 27:3; Ezek. 28:2-12), remarkable for its wealth, with territory on the mainland, and protected by strong fortifications (Ezek. 28:5; 26:4, 6, 8, 10, 12; 27:11; Zech. 9:3). Our knowledge of its condition thenceforward until the siege by Nebuchadnezzar depends entirely on various notices of it by the Hebrew prophets, who denounced the idolatry and wickedness of the city (Isa. 23:1; Jer. 25:22; Ezek., chaps. 26, 27, 28; Amos 1:9, 10; Zech. 9:2, 4). Some of these notices are singularly full, and especially the twenty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel furnishes us on some points with details such as have scarcely come down to us respecting any one city of antiquity, excepting Rome and Athens. One point especially arrests the attention, that Tyre, like its splendid daughter Carthage, employed mercenary soldiers (Ezek. 27:10, 11). Independently, however, of this fact respecting Tyrian mercenary soldiers, Ezekiel gives interesting details respecting the trade of Tyre. It appears that its gold came from Arabia by the Persian Gulf (v. 22), just as in the time of Solomon it came from Arabia by the Red Sea. Only thirty-four years before the destruction of Jerusalem commenced the celebrated reformation of Josiah at Megiddo, and the subsequent destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem were hailed by them with triumphant joy as instances of divine retribution in human affairs. This joy, however, must soon have given way to other feelings, when Nebuchadnezzar invaded Phœnicia, and laid siege to Tyre. That siege lasted thirteen years, and it is still a disputed point whether Tyre was actually taken by Nebuchadnezzar on this occasion. At the time our Lord visited Tyre (Matt. 15:21; Mark 7:24) it was perhaps more populous than Jerusalem. The town is in ruins now, consisting of miserable huts and people, about five thousand "impoverished Metawileh, or Persian schismatics, and Arab Christians." After the death of Stephen the Martyr, a church was formed here, and here Paul spent some time (Acts 21:3, 4), and it was early the seat of a Christian bishopric (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

TYRUS, the Greek form (Τύρος) of TYRE (Jer. 25:22; 27:3; 47:4; Ezek. 26:2-4, 7, 15; 27:2, 3, 8, 32; Hos. 9:13; Amos 1:9, 10; Zech. 9:2, 3).

U

U'CAL (Heb. עֲכָל, oo-kaw', or עֲכָל, ook-kaw', devoured), a word which occurs as a proper name in the received version of Prov. 30:1: "The man spake unto Ithiel, even unto Ithiel and Ucal." Most great authorities indorse this translation, and regard these two persons as disciples of "Agur the son of Jakeh," a Hebrew teacher, whose authorship of this unique chapter has rescued his name from obscurity; but the passage is very obscure. By slightly varying the punctuation it has been translated, "I have labored for God, and have obtained" (Cocceius); "I have wearied myself for God, and have given up the investigation" (J. D. Michaelis); "I have wearied myself for God, and have fainted" (Bertheau); "I have wearied myself for God, and I became dull" (Hitzig), etc. If either of these views be correct, the repetition of the first clause of the sentence is merely for poetical effect. Bunsen, however, supposes the speaker to have given himself a symbolical name, somewhat in the manner of the English Puritans, and translates, "The saying of the man 'I-have-wearied-myself-for-God: I have wearied myself for God, and have fainted away.'" Dr. Davidson, with greater accuracy, reads: "I am weary, O God, I am weary, O God, and am become weak." Ewald combines the two names into one, which he renders, "God-be-with-me-and-I-am-strong," and bestows it upon a character whom he supposes to engage in a dialogue with Agur. Keil follows Ewald's translation of the names, but disjoins them, and regards the first as typifying the reverential believers in God among Agur's disciples, and the second the self-righteous freethinkers "who thought themselves superior to the revealed law, and in practical atheism indulged the lusts of the flesh."

U'EL (Heb. עֲוֵל, oo-ale', wish of God), one of the sons of Bani. He is mentioned in Ezra 10:34 as one of those who "gave their hands that they would put away" their Gentile wives after the captivity, B. C. 456.

UK'NAZ (the marginal reading of "even Kenaz," 1 Chron. 4:15), grandson of Caleb the son of Jephunneh. See KENAZ.

U'LAM (Heb. עֲלָם, oo-lawm', solitary).

1. A son of Sheresh, and father of Bedan, of the tribe of Manasseh. Mentioned only in the genealogical record (1 Chron. 7:16, 17).

2. The firstborn of Eshkek, a direct descendant from Mephibosheth, the grandson of King Saul; lived about B. C. 588. His sons and grandsons, numbering one hundred and fifty, were famous as archers and "mighty men of valor" (1 Chron. 8:39, 40).

UL'LA (Heb. עֲלָלָה, ool-law', burden or yoke, 1 Chron. 7:39), a descendant of Asher, and father of three of the "chief of the princes" of the tribe.

UNCIAL LETTERS. See SCRIPTURE, MANUSCRIPTS OF.

UNCIRCUMCISED (Heb. עָרֵל, aw-rale', exposed; Gr. ἀκροβυστία, ak-rob-oos-tee'-ah) is used figuratively, for a heathen (Gen. 34:14; Judg.

14:3; 15:18; 1 Sam. 14:6; Jer. 9:26; Rom. 4:9; 1 Cor. 7:18, etc.); "of uncircumcised lips" (Exod. 6:12, 30) means one whose lips are, as it were, covered with a foreskin, so that he cannot easily bring out his words, "slow of speech" (4:10); "of uncircumcised ears" (Jer. 6:10; Acts 7:51) are those whose ears are closed with a foreskin, i. e., closed to the prophet's testimony by their impure heart; "uncircumcised in heart" (Lev. 26:41; Ezek. 44:9; Acts 7:51; comp. James 1:21; Col. 2:13) are those who are in an impure, God-offending state of nature (Jer. 4:4, "take away the foreskins of your hearts"). The "uncircumcised tree" was the one under three years of age, whose fruit by the law was treated as unclean (Lev. 19:23).

UNCLEAN (Heb. טָמֵא, taw-may', to be foul; נִדְוָה, nid-law', rejection, Lev. 20:21; Ezra 9:11; Zech. 13:1; עֲרֵוָה, er-vaw', nudity, Deut. 23:14; קָדָשׁ, kaw-dash'e, consecrat'd, Job 36:14; קָדָה, kaw-reh', accidental disqualification, Deut. 23:10; Gr. ἀκάθαρτος, ak-ath'-ar-tos; μωσμός, mee-as-mos', contamination).

UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS. Although sin has its origin and its proper seat in the soul, it pervades the whole body as the soul's organ, bringing about the body's dissolution in death and decomposition. Its effects have spread from man to the whole of the earthly creation, because, as having dominion over nature, he has brought nature with him into the service of sin. God has also made the irrational creature subject to "vanity" and "corruption" on account of man's sin (Rom. 8:20, 21). "It is in this penetration of sin into the material creation that we may find the explanation of the fact that from the very earliest times men have neither used every kind of herb nor every kind of animal as food; but that, while they have, as it were, instinctively avoided certain plants as injurious to health or destructive to life, they have also had a horror naturalis (i. e., an inexplicable disgust) at many of the animals, and have avoided their flesh as unclean. A similar horror must have been produced upon man from the very first, before his heart was altogether hardened by death as the wages of sin, or rather by the effects of death, viz., the decomposition of the body; and different diseases and states of the body, that were connected with symptoms of corruption and decomposition, may also have been regarded as rendering unclean. Hence, in all nations and all the religion of antiquity, we find that contrast between clean and unclean, which was developed in a dualistic form, it is true, in many of the religious systems, but had its primary root in the corruption that had entered the world through sin" (K. and D., Com., on Lev., ch. 11).

This contrast between clean and unclean was limited by Moses to three particulars: (1) Food; (2) contact with dead bodies, human and animal; (3) bodily conditions and diseases. The law pointed out most minutely the unclean objects and various defilements within these spheres, and prescribed the means for avoiding or removing them. In this article the subject will be treated as follows : (1) Causes of uncleanness; (2) disabilities of uncleanness; (3) purification from uncleanness.

1. Causes of Uncleanness. (1) Food. Certain articles of diet were prohibited as conducing to uncleanness. These were things strangled or dead of themselves, or through beasts or birds of prey; whatever beast did not both part the hoof and chew the cud; and certain other smaller animals rated as "creeping things;" certain classes of birds mentioned in Lev., ch. 11, and Deut., ch. 14, twenty or twenty-one in all; whatever in the waters had not both fins and scales; whatever winged insect had not besides four legs the two hind legs for leaping; besides things offered in sacrifice to idols; and all blood, or whatever contained it (save, perhaps, the blood of fish, as would appear from that only of beast and bird being forbidden, Lev. 7:26), and, therefore, flesh cut from the live animal; as also all fat, at any rate that disposed in masses among the intestines, and probably wherever discernible and separable among the flesh (3:14-17; 7:23). The eating of blood was prohibited even to "the stranger that sojourneth among you" (17:10, 12-14). Besides these, we find the prohibition against "seething a kid in its mother's milk" (Exod. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21). Thus it will be seen that all animals are unclean which bear the image of sin, of death, and corruption, e. g., all larger land animals, all ravenous beasts which lie in wait for life or tear and devour the living; all winged creatures, not only birds of prey, but also marsh birds and others, which live on worms, carrion, and all sorts of impurities; all serpentine fishes and slimy shellfish, and small creeping things, except some kinds of locusts, "because, partly, they recall the old serpent, partly they seek their food in all sorts of impurities, partly they crawl in the dust and represent corruption in the slimy character of their bodies" (Keil, Bib. Arch., ii, 117, 118).

(2) Defilement by death. The dead body of a human being, no matter whether he had been killed (Num. 19:16, 18; 31:19) or had died a natural death, had the effect of rendering unclean for seven days the tent (or house) in which the man had died, and any open vessels that were in it, as well as the persons who lived in it or happened to enter it. It was equally defiling to touch the body of anyone who had died in the open air, or even to touch a dead man's bones or a grave. When thus defiled the uncleanness was not confined to himself, but extended to everything he touched, and everyone that touched him, and such were unclean till evening (19:22).

The carcass of any animal, clean or unclean, defiled everyone who touched, carried, or ate it, until the evening, so that he was required to bathe himself in water and wash his clothes before he became clean again (Lev. 11:24-28, 31, 36, 39, 40; 17:15). But it was no more defiling to touch clean animals slaughtered by men, and unclean animals that had been killed by them, than it was to touch unclean animals while still alive. Eight kinds of the smaller animals (Heb. שְׂרָפִים, shel'-rets, a swarm), viz., the weasel, mouse, and six of the lizard species, that communicated their defiling influence to inanimate objects, such as pots for cooking, if they or any part of their carcasses happened to fall upon them, such earthen vessels as any of them dropped into, and, lastly, food in the preparation of which water had been used that had been thus contaminated, or seed that had been wet with such polluted water (11:32-37).

(3) Defilement by bodily conditions and diseases. (a) Leprosy (q. v.), either in connection with persons, dwellings, or fabrics (Lev., chaps. 13, 14). (b) The discharge of seminal fluid, whether of an involuntary character (as during sleep or in dreams), or such as occurred during sexual intercourse. Both alike constituted the man, and, in the latter case, the woman also unclean till evening (15:16-18). (c) The flux; whether the catamenial discharge of the woman, the morbid issue of blood in a woman, or the flux in men, i. e., the discharge of mucus from the urethra (Num. 5:2). (d) Childbirth. Contact with persons in the above states, or even with clothing or furniture that had been used by them while in those states, involved uncleanness in a minor degree (Lev. 15:5-11, 21-24).

2. Disabilities of Uncleanness. Defilement by contact with a dead human body rendered the person or object unclean for seven days. Defilement from the carcass of an animal made the person or object unclean until evening. The leper was required to rend his clothes, to bare his head, and put a covering upon his upper lip, and then to cry to everyone he met, "Unclean; unclean;" and, besides this, he had to isolate himself by living outside the camp (or city) (Lev. 13:45, sq.; Num. 5:2; 12:10, 14, sq.). Houses affected with leprosy were examined by the priest, who, before entering, had all the contents of the house removed in order to prevent everything within from becoming unclean. If symptoms of leprosy were discovered the house was closed for seven days. After seven days the house was again examined, and if indications of leprosy were evident, the affected stones were removed, with the scrapings of the walls, and carefully replastered. If the evil broke out anew, the house was pronounced unclean, pulled down, and removed to an unclean place outside the city. Leprosy in clothes or fabrics made of linen, wool, or leather, required that the article should be shut up for seven days, and if still affected it was burned (Lev. 13:47-59). Persons or objects defiled by the discharge of seminal fluid were unclean until evening; persons defiled by a flux were removed from the camp (Num. 5:2); the menstruous woman was considered unclean for seven days, as well as the man who might have intercourse with her at this time; everything on which she lay or sat was unclean until evening (Lev. 15:19-24). A man or woman with an issue was unclean as long as the disorder lasted, and also rendered unclean anything upon which they sat or laid, or the person whom they might touch, and in the case of the man anyone upon whom his spittle might come (15:25-29); the woman at childbirth became unclean just as at the time of her courses, and that for seven days at the birth of a boy, and fourteen if it was a girl, besides being obliged to remain at home in the blood of her purifying for thirty-three days more in the former case and sixty-six in the latter, and was debarred from touching anything holy and from coming to the sanctuary (12:2-8).

3. Purification from Uncleaness. The regulations with respect to defilements and their corresponding purifications were not prescriptions framed with a view to the cultivation of cleanliness, tidiness, and decency—not mere sanitary regulations—but they were of a religious nature, having as their object the cultivation of holiness and spiritual life. It was owing to the well-understood connection between defilements on the one hand and sin and its consequence, death, on the other, that the Levitical purification ranked side by side with the sacrifices; and that they formed, quite as much as these latter, an integral part of the Mosaic ritual. The term "purification," in its legal and technical sense, is applied to the ritual observances whereby an Israelite was formally absolved from the taint of uncleanness, whether evidenced by any overt act or state, or whether connected with man's natural depravity.

The following regulations respecting purification are given in the law:

(1) Of those defiled by contact with the dead.

The medium appointed in such cases was a kind of sprinkling water, composed of running water and the ashes of a sin offering specially suited to the occasion (Num., ch. 19). A heifer, without blemish, and which had never been yoked, was slaughtered without the camp, Eleazar dipping his finger in the blood and sprinkling it seven times toward the sanctuary. The heifer, entire, was then burned in the presence of the priest, who cast cedar wood, hyssop, and the scarlet wool into the flames. The ashes were then carried by a man free from defilement to a clean place outside the camp, where they were stored for use as occasion might require. A man free from defilement took some of these ashes, put them into a vessel, and then poured some fresh running water over them. Dipping a bunch of hyssop into the mixture, he sprinkled it upon the person to be purified, both on the third and the seventh day. On the latter day, after atonement had been made, the person being purified was required to wash his clothes and bathe himself in water, after which he became clean on the evening of that day. The tent in which the corpse had lain, as well as the furniture that it contained, were all sprinkled with this same water and were thus purified (vers. 12, 17-19).

(2) Of those recovered from leprosy. The ceremonial for the purifications is based upon the idea that this malady is the bodily symbol not so much of sin as of death. "As being a decomposing of the juices of the body, as a putrefying and dropping off of its members, as being the presence of corruption in the living body, leprosy forms the counterpart of death. . . . Consequently the person affected with this disease was required to display the tokens of his intimate association with death in the kind of dress he wore, in his shaved head, and in his rent garments; and hence it was, too, that he was excluded not merely from the pale of the sanctuary, but was even debarred from all intercourse whatever with the covenant people, called as it was to be a holy nation" (Keil, Bib. Arch., i, 393).

The rites are described in Lev. 14:4-32. The two stages of the proceedings indicated—the first, which took place outside the camp, the readmission of the leper to the community of men; the second, before the sanctuary, his readmission to communion with God. In the first stage the slaughter of the one bird and the dismissal of the other symbolized the punishment of death deserved and fully remitted. In the second, the use of oil and its application to the same parts of the body, as in the consecration of priests (8:23, 24), symbolized the rededication of the leper to the service of Jehovah. The ceremonies to be observed in the purification of a house or a garment infected with leprosy were identical with the first stage of the proceedings used for the leper (14:33-53).

(3) Of those defiled by sexual discharges.

Such purification was, in every instance, effected by bathing the body and washing the objects defiled in running water, the purifying medium of nature's own providing. If, however, the state of defilement lasted longer than seven days, as in the case of those suffering from an issue of blood, a discharge of mucus from the urethra, or childbirth, then a sin offering and a burnt offering were added to the washing with water. These were offered at a certain period after the healing and the washing—those suffering from an issue of blood or a mucus discharge, and the leper after his first cleansing, at seven days; while in the case of childbirth it was thirty-three or sixty-six days. In those cases where the defilement lasted over a week communion with the Lord could only be secured by the offering of a sin offering (of a pigeon) and a burnt offering (a lamb).

The necessity of purification was extended in the post-Babylonian period to a variety of unauthorized cases. Cups and pots, brazen vessels and couches were washed as a matter of ritual observance (Mark 7:4). The washing of the hands before meals was conducted in a formal manner (v. 3), and minute regulations are laid down on this subject in a treatise of the Mishna entitled Yadain. What may have been the specific causes of uncleanness in those who came up to purify themselves before the passover (John 11:55), or in those who had taken upon themselves the Nazarite's vow (Acts 21:24, 26), we are not informed; in either case it may have been contact with a corpse, though in the latter it would rather appear to have been a general purification preparatory to the accomplishment of the vow. In conclusion it may be observed that the distinctive feature in the Mosaic rites of purification is their expiatory character. The idea of uncleanness was not peculiar to the Jew. But with all other nations simple ablution sufficed—no sacrifices were demanded. The Jew alone was taught, by the use of expiatory offerings, to discern, to its full extent the connection, between the outward sign and the inward fount of impurity.

UNCTION (Gr. χρίσμα, khri's'-mah, ointment, anointing), the gift of the Holy Spirit as an efficient aid in getting a knowledge of the truth (1 John 2:20). Not that the work of Jesus was imperfect, but the Spirit helps us to understand the truth he taught, and thus to glorify him (John 16:14), in whom the full revelation of God had been given (v. 15). See GLOSSARY.

UNDEFILED (Heb. טָמֵא, tawm, complete), one who is sound in a moral sense, as the pious man (Psa. 119:1); or, as in Cant. 5:2; 6:9, of a bride who is innocent of connection with another than her spouse. In the New Testament "undefiled" is the rendering of the Greek ἀμίαντος (am-ee'-an-tos), not defiled, i. e., free from that by which the nature of a thing is deformed or its force and vigor impaired. Thus Jesus was undefiled (Heb. 7:26), i. e., pure from sin. "The bed undefiled" (13:4) is one free from adultery. A religion that is sincere and clean (James 1:27), and the inheritance provided for the just (1 Pet. 1:4), are "undefiled."

UNDERGIRDING. See SHIP, p. 1024.

UNDERSSETTERS (Heb. קַוֵּי, kaw-thafe', a shoulder, usually so rendered) were parts of the laver (q. v.) in Solomon's temple, probably props running up from the body of the vehicle and holding the basin between them. See GLOSSARY.

UNGRACIOUS. See GLOSSARY.

UNICORN. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

UNITY (Heb. יְחִיד, yakh'-ad, adverb unitedly) is used to signify a oneness of sentiment, affection, or behavior, such as should exist among the people of God (Psa. 133:1). The "unity of the faith" (Eph. 4:13, Gr. ἐνότης, hen-ot'-ace, oneness) is the unanimity of belief in the same great truths of God, and the possession of the grace of faith in a similar form and degree.

UNKIND. See GLOSSARY.

UNKNOWN GOD (Gr. ἀγνωστος θεός, ag'-noce-tos theh-os', unknown god), the inscription observed by Paul upon an altar in Athens (Acts 17:23), which he ingeniously adduces in his speech before the people as an instance of their religiousness. This was not addressed to the philosophers; they did not dedicate altars to an unknown god, but regarded all such proceedings as the mere superstition of the vulgar. Pausanias (i, 1, 4) and Philostratus (Vit. Apollon., vi, 2) both mention "unknown gods," and it is evident from both passages that at Athens there were several altars so inscribed. "It is related that Epimenides put an end to a plague in Athens by causing black and white sheep, which he had let loose on the Areopagus, to be sacrificed on the spots where they lay down, to the god concerned, yet not known by name, viz., who was the author of the plague; and that therefore one may find in Athens altars without the designation of a god by name. From this particular instance the general view may be derived, that on important occasions, when the reference to a god known by name was wanting, as in public calamities of which no definite god could be assigned as the author, in order to honor or propitiate the god concerned by sacrifice, without lighting upon a wrong one, altars were erected which were destined and designated ἀγνωστω θεῷ (unknown god)" (Meyer, Com.).

UNKNOWN TONGUE (1 Cor. 14:2, 4, 13, 14, 19, 27) is a gloss of the A. V., for the Greek has simply γλῶσσα (gloe'-sah, a tongue), and obviously a different language from that usually employed by the speaker (Mark 16:17; Acts 2:4). Others (see Grimm, Lex.) understand it to mean "strange utterances, rugged, dark, disconnected."

UNLEARNED (Gr. ἀγράμματος, ag-gram'-mat-os, unlettered), illiterate, without learning (Acts 4:13); while elsewhere "unlearned" is the rendering of ἀμαθής (am-ath-ace', 2 Pet. 3:16), without knowledge; ἀπαιδευτος (ap-ah'-ee-dyoo-tos, 2 Tim. 2:23), without instruction, rude, uneducated; ἰδιώτης (id-ee-o'-tace, 1 Cor. 14:16, 23, 24), a private person, i. e., an unlearned, illiterate man as opposed to the learned.

UNLEAVENED BREAD (Heb. מַצֹּת, mats-taw', sweet; Gr. ἄζυμος, ad'-zoo-mos), bread baked from unfermented dough (Gen. 19:3; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 28:24). This was formally presented for the paschal cakes (Exod. 12:8, 16, 20; 13:3, 6, sq.), and thus became a symbol of the festival popularly called "the feast of unleavened bread" (q. v.). See LEAVEN.

UN'NI (Heb. נִנְיָ, oon-nee', afflicted).

1. A relative of Heman the singer, who with other Levites was appointed, by order of King David, to perform on the psalter in the tabernacle service (1 Chron. 16:18, 20), B. C. about 986.

2. A Levite employed in the musical service of the temple after the return from captivity (Neh. 12:9), B. C. 535. This name should be written Unno (Heb. נִנְיָ, oon-no').

UNTEMPERED MORTAR (Heb. לַעֲפָן, law-fale'), the plaster coating or cement of a wall, probably from the primary meaning of לַעֲפָן (law-fal'), to stick or plaster over, from which has sprung the secondary meaning of weak, insipid. The meaning of the figure "to daub with untempered mortar" (Ezek. 13:10, 11, 14, 15; 22:28) is, "the people build up foolish hopes, and the prophets not only paint these hopes for them in splendid colors, but even predict their fulfillment, instead of denouncing their folly. . . . The plastering is therefore a figurative description of deceitful flattery or hypocrisy" (Keil, Com.).

UPHAR'SIN. See MENE.

UPHAZ (Heb. עֲפָז, oo-fawz'), the name of a famous gold region (Jer. 10:9; Dan. 10:5), is thought by many to be a corruption of ΟΡΗΙΣ (q. v.); but Orelli (Com., on Jer. 10:9) says: "It is inconceivable that the word arose by error from this well-known name. Assyria and Babylon might have other gold mines. Still the views respecting the site of this Uphaz remain mere conjectures."

UPPER CHAMBER or ROOM (Heb. מִגְדָּל, al-ee-yaw', lofty; 2 Kings 1:2; 23:12; 1 Chron. 28:11; 2 Chron. 3:9; "summer parlor," Judg. 3:23; "loft," 1 Kings 19:17, 23; "chamber over the gate," 2 Sam. 18:23; Gr. ανώγειον, an-o'-geh-on, Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12; ὑπερῶνον, hoo-per-o'-on, upper, Acts 1:13; 9:37, 39; 20:8), a room in the upper part of the house, used to receive company, hold feasts, to retire for meditation and prayer (Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12). Among the Hebrews it seems to have been on or connected with the flat roofs of their dwellings; in Greek houses it occupied the upper story (1 Kings 17:19, sq.; 2 Kings 4:10; Acts 1:13; 9:37, 39; 10:9; 20:8). Rich, luxurious men were charged with sinfully multiplying chambers of this sort (Jer. 22:13, 14). They were used as "summer houses for their coolness" (Judg. 3:20; 2 Kings 1:2; 23:12). In Scripture the lower portion was the winter house, the upper room was the summer house; or, if on the same story, the outer apartment is the summer house, the inner is the winter house.

UR, UR OF THE CHALDEES (Heb. אֲרַח, oor, light, east), the name of one of the most ancient cities of the world, called in the Old Testament Ur Kasdim, or Ur of the Chaldees. It was the fatherland of Abraham, the father of the Hebrew people. The ancient city of Ur is represented by vast mounds on the western side of the river Euphrates, opposite Nasrich, which are known to the inhabitants under the name of Mughair, which means "place of pitch." The modern name is due to the fact that the mound has long been used by the natives as a place from which to obtain bitumen, or pitch, for building purposes. This bitumen is taken from the walls of buildings in the ancient city. The mound has been repeatedly visited by explorers from the days of Taylor to Peters, but has never been excavated. Wells have been sunk in it in places, and enough is known of the general character of the mound to make it certain that it contains quantities of antiquities which go back to the days of its early history. It is unfortunate for the progress of knowledge relating to the past history of the race that excavations on this site cannot be immediately undertaken. The importance of this could scarcely be overrated.

The origin of the city of Ur is veiled in the obscurity of the earliest ages of human history.

"This city was admirably situated to achieve commercial and historical importance. The river Euphrates flowed just past its gates, affording easy transportation for stone and wood from its upper waters, to which the Lebanon, rich in cedars, and the Amanus were readily accessible. The Wady Rummein came close to the city and linked it with central and southern Arabia, and along that road came gold and precious stones, and gums and perfumes to be converted into incense for temple worship. Another road went across the very desert itself, and, provided with wells of water, conducted trade to southern Syria, the peninsula of Sinai, and across into Africa. This was the shortest road to Africa, and commerce between Ur and Egypt passed over its more difficult but much shorter route than the one by way of Haran and Palestine. Nearly opposite the city the Shatt-el-Hai emptied into the Euphrates, and so afforded a passage for boats into the Tigrus, thus opening to the commerce of Ur the vast country tributary to that river. Here, then, were roads and rivers leading to the north, east, and west; but there was also a great outlet to the southward. The Euphrates made access to the Persian Gulf easy. No city lay south of Ur on that river except Eridu, and Eridu was no competitor in the world of commerce, for it was devoted only to temples and gods—a city given up to religion.

"In a city so favorably located as Ur the development of political as well as commercial superiority seems perfectly natural. About 2800 or 2900 B. C. we find ruling in Ur a king named Ur-Gur. Like his predecessors in other cities his boast was in the building of new temples and the repairing of old ones. The temple of the sun god at Larsa, the temple of Nina in Uruk, and temples in Nippur were built or restored by him. The great temple of the moon god in Ur was founded by him, and the walls of the city were built by him. Of his wars and conquests we hear no word. His son Dungi was also indefatigable in building operations. He completed the temple of the moon god in Ur, and built also in Uruk, Lagash, and Kutha. These two names of Ur-Gur and Dungi are all that remain of what was perhaps a considerable dynasty in Ur. Their buildings would seem to indicate that they held at least nominal sway over a considerable part of Babylonia. It is probable, however, that they were contented with the regular receipt of tribute, and did not attempt to control all of the life of the cities subject to them, which still retained their former kings in the capacity of viceregerents" (Rogers, History of Early Babylonia, pp. 15-17).

Nothing is known of the political situation in Ur at the time of Abraham. Of its culture and its religious position in Babylonia we know much. The city represented at that time the highest civilization which had been achieved by man. It was the center in southern Babylonia of the worship of the moon god Sin, as Haran was the center of the worship of the same god in northern Babylonia. When Abraham left the city of Ur, a citizen of no mean city, to wander into lands almost unknown, he left behind him all that civilization had been able to achieve and went out in pursuit of higher ideals. The city was then hopelessly given over to polytheism, and there was no opportunity in it for the cultivation of monotheism. It is just to view Ur as the motherland of much of Western civilization, for the ideas of the Hebrew people have dominated the West, and the early history of those ideas is inseparably bound up with the name of Abraham.—R. W. R.

UR (Heb. אֲרַח, oor, light), mentioned in 1 Chron. 11:35, as the father of Eliphaz, one of David's "valiant men," B. C. before 1000. There is evident confusion at this point in the genealogical list, both here and in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:34). Hephher must either be regarded as another name for Ur, or else omitted as an error in copying. The phrase "the son of" should be erased from 2 Sam. 23:34, and Ahasbai and Ur might then be identified.

UR'BANE (Gr. Ὀὐρβανός, oor-ban-os', of the city), a Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations, as having been his associate in labor, "our helper in Christ" (Rom. 16:9).

URI (Heb. אֲרִירָה, oo-ree', fiery).

1. The father of Bezaleel, one of the architects of the tabernacle. He was of the tribe of Judah, and son of Hur (Exod. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22; 1 Chron. 2:20; 2 Chron. 1:5), B. C. before 1210.

2. The father of Geber, Solomon's purveying officer in Gilead (1 Kings 4:19), B. C. before 960.

3. One of the temple porters who put away his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:24), B. C. 456.

URI'AH (Heb. אֲרִיָּהּ, oo-ree-yaw', and אֲרִיָּהּ, oo-ree-yaw'-hoo, flame of Jehovah).

1. One of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:41; 2 Sam. 23:39), and husband of Bath-sheba. He was a Hittite. His name, however, and his manner of speech (2 Sam. 11:11) indicate that he had adopted the Jewish religion. He married Bath-sheba, a woman of extraordinary beauty, the daughter of Eliam. The time of the illicit intercourse between David and his wife, Uriah was in camp with Joab; but when the king was informed by Bath-sheba that she was with child by him, he ordered Uriah to come to Jerusalem, on the pretext of asking news of the war—really in the hope that his return to his wife might cover the shame of his own crime. The king met with an unexpected obstacle in the austere, soldierlike spirit which guided all Uriah's conduct, and which gives us a high notion of the character and discipline of David's officers. On the morning of the third day David sent him back to the camp with a letter containing the command to Joab to cause his destruction in the battle. The device of Joab was to observe the part of the wall of Rabbath-Ammon where the greatest force of the besieged was congregated, and thither, as a kind of forlorn hope, to send Uriah. A sally took place. Uriah and the officers with him advanced as far as the gate of the city, and were there shot down by the archers on the wall. Just as Joab had forewarned the messenger, the king broke into a furious passion on hearing of the loss. The messenger, as instructed by Joab, calmly continued, and ended the story with the words: "Thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also." (2 Sam. 11:24), B. C. about 980.

2. A priest in the reign of Ahaz, who is introduced in Scripture history as a witness to Isaiah's prophecy concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Isa. 8:2), B. C. about 735. He is perhaps the same as Urijah, the priest who built the idolatrous altar for King Ahaz (2 Kings 16:10, sq., "Urijah"). He was probably high priest at the time, succeeding to Azariah, who was high priest in the reign of Uzziah, and was succeeded by that Azariah who was high priest in the reign of Hezekiah. Hence it is likely that he was son of the former and father of the latter.

3. A priest of the family of Hakkoz (A. V., "Koz"), who supported Ezra while reading the law to the people ("Urijah," Neh. 8:4), B. C. 457. He is probably the same with the father of Mere-moth (Ezra 8:33; Neh. 3:4, 21).

URI'AS, the Greek form (Οὐριᾶς, oo-ree'-as) of Uriah, the husband of Bath-sheba (Matt. 1:6).

U'RIEL (Heb. אֲרִיֵּל, oo-ree-nel', flame of God).

1. A Levite of the family of Kohath. His father's name was Uzziath (1 Chron. 6:24).

2. Chief of the Kohathites, who assisted, with one hundred and twenty of his brethren, in bringing the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:5, 11), B. C. about 992.

3. Uriel of Gibeah was the father of Maachah, or Michaiiah, wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (2 Chron. 13:2), B. C. before 930. In 11:20 she is called the daughter (granddaughter) of Ab-salom.

URI'JAH. 1. (2 Kings 16:10, sq.) See URIAH, 2. 2. (Neh. 8:4, 21.) See URIAH, 3.

3. The son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim, who prophesied in the days of Jehoiakim. When the king sought his death he fled to Egypt, but his retreat was soon discovered. Elnathan brought him to Jehoiakim, who put him to death, and cast his body among the graves of the common people (Jer. 26:20-23), B. C. about 609.

U'RI'IM AND THUM'MIM (Heb. אֲרִיִּים וְתֻמְמִים, haw-oo-reem', lights; veh-hat-toom-meem', perfections). Into the breastplate of the high priest (q. v.) were placed "the Urim and the Thummim; and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the Lord" (Exod. 28:30). These formed the medium through which the high priest ascertained the will of Jehovah in regard to any important matter affecting the theocracy (Num. 27:21). Even such early writers as Josephus, Philo, and the Rabbins are unable to furnish any precise information as to what the Urim and Thummim really were. On every side we meet with confessions of ignorance.

1. Meaning of the Words. In Urim Hebrew scholars, with hardly an exception, have seen the plural of ur (light or fire). The LXX. translators, however, appear to have had reasons which led them to another rendering. The literal English equivalent would of course be "lights;" but the renderings in the LXX. and Vulg. indicate, at least, a traditional belief among the Jews that the plural form did not involve numerical plurality. Thummim. Here also there is almost a consensus as to the derivation from tóm (perfection, completeness). What has been said as to the plural of Urim applies here also. "Light and Perfection" would probably be the best English equivalent. The mere phrase, as such, leaves it therefore uncertain whether each word by itself denoted many things of a given kind, or whether the two taken together might be referred to two distinct objects, or to one and the same object. In Deut. 33:8 we have separately, "Thy Thummim and thy Urim," the first order being inverted. Urim is found alone in Num. 27:21; 1 Sam. 28:6; Thummim never by itself, unless we find it in Psa. 16:5.

2. Scripture References. The first reference (Exod. 28:30) to these objects would seem to indicate that they needed no explanation. Inside the breastplate, as the tables of the covenant were placed inside the ark (25:16; 28:30), are to be placed "the Urim and the Thummim," the Light and the Perfection; and they, too, are to be on Aaron's heart when he goes in before the Lord (28:15-30). Not a word describes them. They are mentioned as things already familiar both to Moses and the people, connected naturally with the functions of the high priest, as mediating between Jehovah and his people. The command is fulfilled (Lev. 8:8). They pass from Aaron to Eleazar with the sacred ephod and other pontificalia (Num. 20:28). They are mentioned again (Num. 27:21; Deut. 33:8, 9). Once, and once only, are they mentioned by name in the history of the Judges and the monarchy (1 Sam. 28:6). There is no longer a priest with Urim and Thummim (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65) to answer hard questions.

3. Theories. Some think the Urim and Thummim to have been identical with the twelve stones on the breastplate. Josephus (Ant., iii, 7, 5) identifies them with the sardonxyes on the shoulders of the ephod, and says that they were bright before a victory, or when the sacrifice was acceptable, dark when any disaster was impending. "Another theory is that in the middle of the ephod, or within its folds, there was a stone or plate of gold, on which was engraved the sacred name of Jehovah; and that by virtue of this, fixing his gaze on it, or reading an invocation which was also engraved with the name, or standing in his ephod before the mercy seat, or at least before the veil of the sanctuary, he became capable of prophesying, hearing the divine voice within, or listening to it as it proceeded in articulate sounds from the glory of the Shekinah."

Michaleis (Laus of Moses, v, 52) gives his own opinion that the Urim and Thummim were three stones, on one of which was written Yes, on another No, while the third was left neutral or blank. These were used as lots, and the high priest decided according as the one or the other was drawn out. Kalisch (on Exod. 28:31) identifies the Urim and the Thummim with the twelve tribal gems, looks on the name as one to be explained by an hendiadys (light and perfection = perfect illumination), and believes the high priest, by concentrating his thoughts on the attributes they represented, to have divested himself of all selfishness and prejudice, and so to have passed into a true prophetic state. The process of consulting Jehovah by Urim and Thummim is not given in Scripture.

USURY (Heb. שֶׁקֶט, neh'-shek, a biting, i. e., extortion; Gr. τόκος, tok'-os, a yield) is used in the A. V. in the sense of interest for money, and does not necessarily imply the demand for exorbitant increase. According to the Mosaic law the Israelites were forbidden to take usury from their brethren upon the loan of money, food, or anything else, i. e., they were not upon the return of the loan to demand anything more (Lev. 25:36, 37; Deut. 23:19, 20, etc.); although interest might be taken from foreigners (ver. 20). The Israelites not being a commercial people, money was not often loaned for the purpose of business, but rather to aid the struggling poor. This last is the only kind of usury forbidden in the law, and the avoiding of this is sometimes given among the characteristics of the godly man (Psa. 15:5; Jer. 15:10; comp. Prov. 28:8).

The practice of mortgaging lands, sometimes at exorbitant interest, grew up among the Jews during the captivity, in direct violation of the law (Lev. 25:36; Ezek. 18:3, 13, 17); and Nehemiah exacted an oath to insure its discontinuance (Neh. 5:3-13). Jesus denounced all extortion, and promulgated a new law of love and forbearance (Luke 6:30, 35). The taking of usury in the sense of a reasonable rate of interest for the use of money employed in trade is different, and is nowhere forbidden; and is referred to in the New Testament as a perfectly understood and allowable practice (Matt. 25:27; Luke 19:23).

UTHAI (Heb. עֲתָי, oo-thah'ee, helpful).

1. The son of Ammihud, of the children of Pharez, the son of Judah. He resided at Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:4).

2. One of the sons of Bigvai, who returned with seventy males in the second caravan with Ezra (Ezra 8:14). B. C. about 457.

UTTER. See GLOSSARY.

UZ (Heb. עֻז, oots, consultation).

1. A son of Aram (Gen. 10:23; 1 Chron. 1:17), and a grandson of Shem.

2. A son of Nahor, by Milcah (Gen. 22:21, A. V., Huz).

3. A son of Dishan, and grandson of Seir (Gen. 36:28).

4. The land of Uz was the country in which Job lived (Job 1:1). The LXX. renders ἐν χώρα τῆ Ἀβιθιῶν; and Ptolemy (v, 19, 2) says that the Aisitai, i. e., the Uzzites, dwelt in the Arabian desert, west from Babylon, under the Caucabenes, and adjacent to the Edomites of Mount Seir, who at one period occupied Uz, probably as conquerors (Lam. 4:21). The position of the country may further be deduced from the native lands of Job's friends—Eliphaz, the Temanite, being an Idumæan; Elihu, the Buzite, probably a neighbor of the Chaldeans; and Bildah, the Shulite, being one of the Bene-Kedem. "The land of Uz" is mentioned in only two other passages of Scripture; grouped by Jeremiah (25:20) with Egypt, Philistia, Edom, and Moab, but in Lam. 4:21 identifying it with a portion of Edom, or affirming that some of the Edomites in his day inhabited Uz.

UZ'AI (Heb. עֻזַּי, oo-zah'ee, strong), the father of Palal, one of those who assisted in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25), B. C. before 447.

UZ'AL (Heb. עֻזְאֵל, oo-zaw'el, derivation uncertain), the sixth of the thirteen sons of Joktan, a descendant of Shem (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chron. 1:21). Authorities quite generally agree that Sanaa, the metropolis of Yemen, is the modern name of the Uzal founded by this person.

UZ'ZA (Heb. עֻזְזָא, ooz-zaw', strength).

1. The proprietor, apparently, of (or the person after whom was named) the garden in which Manasseh and Amon were buried (2 Kings 21:18, 26), B. C. before 643.

2. (1 Chron. 6:29.) See UZZAH, 2.

3. The older of the two sons of Ehud the Benjamite, born to him after the removal of his former children (1 Chron. 8:7).

4. The "children of Uzza" were a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:51), B. C. before 536.

UZZAH (Heb. עֻזָּה, ooz-zaw', strength).

1. One of the sons of Abinadab of Kirjath-jearim. He, with his brother Ahio, accompanied the ark when David sought to remove it to Jerusalem. When the procession had reached the thrashing floor of Nachon the oxen drawing the cart upon which the ark was placed stumbled. Uzzah, who was walking beside it, put out his hand to prevent its falling. He died immediately, being smitten by God on account of his offense. The event produced a profound sensation, and David, fearing to carry the ark any farther, had it placed in the house of Obed-edom (2 Sam. 6:3-10; 1 Chron. 13:7, 9, 11), B. C. about 988.

NOTE.—Why was Uzzah so severely punished? is a question variously answered. We think the following answer correct: "According to Num., ch. 4, the ark was not only to be moved by none but Levites, but it was to be carried on the shoulders; and in v. 15 even the Levites were expressly forbidden to touch it on pain of death. But instead of taking these instructions as their rule, they had followed the example of the Philistines when they sent back the ark (1 Sam. 6:7, sq.), and had placed it upon a new cart and directed Uzzah to drive it, while, as his conduct on the occasion clearly shows, he had no idea of the unapproachable holiness of the ark of God, and had to expiate his offense with his life, as a warning to all the Israelites" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

2. A Levite of the sons of Merari, the son of Shimei, and father of Shimea (1 Chron. 6:29).

UZZ'EN-SHERAH (Heb. אֲזַן שֶׁרָאָה, ooz-zane' shel-er-aw', the plat of Sheerah), a place near Beth-horon, founded or rebuilt by Sherah, an Ephraimitess (1 Chron. 7:24), and probably an heiress who had received these places as her inheritance. The place Uzzen-Sherah is not elsewhere referred to.

UZZI (Heb. אֲזִי, ooz-zee', strong).

1. Son of Bukki, and father of Zerariah, in the line of the high priests (1 Chron. 6:5, 51; Ezra 7:4), B. C. considerably after 1171. Josephus (Ant., v, 11, 5) relates that after Ozi (Uzzi), of the family of Eleazar, Eli, of the family of Ithamar, received the high priesthood. But the circumstances that led to the transfer of this honor are unknown.

2. Son of Tola, the son of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2, 3).

3. Son of Bela, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7).

4. The son of Michri and father of Elah, among the ancestors of a Benjamite house which settled at Jerusalem after the return from captivity (1 Chron. 9:8), B. C. before 536.

5. A Levite, son of Bani, and overseer of the Levites dwelling at Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:22), B. C. 536.

6. A priest, chief of the course of Jedaiah, in the time of Joiakim the high priest (Neh. 12:19). He is probably the same with one of the priests who assisted Ezra in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12:42), B. C. about 500.

UZZI'A (Heb. אֲזִי'א, ooz-zee-yaw', probably for Uzziah), the "Ashterathite" (i. e., from Ashtaroth, beyond Jordan), who was one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:44), B. C. after 1000.

UZZI'AH (Heb. אֲזִי'אָה, ooz-zee-yaw', strength of Jehovah).

1. The tenth king of Judah.

(1) Name and family. In some passages his name appears in the lengthened form Azariah, which Gesenius attributes to an error of the copyists. This is possible, but there are other instances of the princes of Judah changing their names on succeeding to the throne. His father was Amaziah, who was slain by conspirators.

(2) History. 1. Chosen king. After the murder of Amaziah, his son Uzziah was chosen by the people to occupy the vacant throne at the age of sixteen (2 Kings 14:21), B. C. 783. 2. Wars. He began his reign by a successful expedition against his father's enemies, the Edomites, who had revolted from Judah in Jehoram's time, eighty years before, and penetrated as far as the head of the Gulf of Akaba, where he took the important place of Elath (2 Kings 14:22; 2 Chron. 26:1, etc.). Uzziah waged other victorious wars in the south, especially against the Mehunim, or people of Maan, and the Arabs of Gurbaal. Toward the west Uzziah fought with equal success against the Philistines, leveled to the ground the walls of Gath, Jabneh, and Ashdod, and founded new fortified cities in the Philistine territory. 3. Reign. Uzziah strengthened the walls of Jerusalem, and was a great patron of agriculture. He never deserted the worship of the true God, and was much influenced by Zechariah, a prophet who is only mentioned in connection with him (2 Chron. 26:5). So the southern kingdom was raised to a condition of prosperity which it had not known since the death of Solomon. During his reign an earthquake occurred which was apparently very serious in its consequences, for it is alluded to as a chronological epoch by Amos (Amos 1:1; comp. Zech. 14:6) as a convulsion from which the people "fled." 4. Sin and death. The end of Uzziah was less prosperous than his beginning. Elated with his splendid career, he determined to burn incense on the altar of God, but was opposed by the high priest Azariah and eighty others (see Exod. 30:7, 8; Num. 16:40; 18:7). The king was enraged at their resistance, and, as he pressed forward with his censor, was suddenly smitten with leprosy. Uzziah was "buried with his fathers," yet apparently not actually in the royal sepulchers (2 Chron. 26:23), B. C. about 738.

2. A Kohathite Levite, and ancestor of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:24), B. C. perhaps 1300.

3. Father of Jehonathan, one of David's overseers (1 Chron. 27:25), B. C. before 1000.

4. Father of Athaiah, or Uthai, resident in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 11:4), B. C. before 536.

5. A priest of the sons of Harim, who had taken a foreign wife in the days of Ezra (Ezra 10:21), B. C. 456.

UZZI'EL, or UZZIEL (Heb. אֲזִי'ֵל, ooz-zee-ale', strength of God).

1. Fourth son of Kohath, father of Mishael, Elzaphan, or Elizaphan, and Zithri, and uncle to Aaron (Exod. 6:18, 22; Lev. 10:4), B. C. before 1210.

2. A Simeonite captain, son of Ishi, in the days of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:42), B. C. about 712.

3. Head of a Benjamite house, of the sons of Bela (1 Chron. 7:7), B. C. after 1706.

4. A musician of the sons of Heman, in David's reign (1 Chron. 25:4).

5. A Levite, of the sons of Jeduthun, who took an active part in purifying the temple in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:14-19), B. C. 719.

6. Son of Harhaiah, probably a priest in the days of Nehemiah, who took part in repairing the wall (Neh. 3:8). He is described as "of the goldsmiths," i. e., of those priests whose hereditary office it was to repair or make the sacred vessels, B. C. about 445.

UZZI'ELITE (Heb. אֲזִי'ֵלִיטָה, oo-zee-ay-lee'), a descendant of Uzziel the Levite. In David's time the Uzzielites numbered one hundred and twelve adult males (Num. 3:27; 1 Chron. 26:23; 16:10).

V

VAGABOND (Heb. נָדָד, nood, Gen. 4:12, 14; נָדָד, noo'-ah, Psa. 109:10) has the sense of wandering in both of the original terms. Perhaps a good rendering of "a fugitive and vagabond" is "banished and homeless." The "vagabond Jews" mentioned in Acts 19:13 were strolling Jewish demon-exorcisers—sorcerers, who, for the healing of demoniacs, used secret arts and charms.

VAIL. See VEIL, DRESS.

VAINGLORY (Gr. κενοδοξία, ken-od-ox-ee'-ah), glorying without reason, self-esteem, empty pride (Phil. 2:3). See GLOSSARY.

VAJEZ'ATHA (Heb. נַחֲשֵׁי, vah-yez-aw'-thaw, foreign derivation), one of the ten sons of Haman, whom the Jews slew in Shushan (Esth. 9:9), B. C. about 509.

VALIANTNESS, valor, bravery.

VALLEY, the rendering in the A. V. of the following Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Bik-aw' (Heb. בֵּיקָאָו, a split), rather a plain than a valley, wider than the latter, but, like it, surrounded by mountains. It denotes a wide alluvial bottom, and its levelness is referred to in Isa. 40:4; usually rendered "valley" (Deut. 8:7; 11:11; 34:3; Josh. 11:8, 17; 12:7; 2 Chron. 35:22; Psa. 104:8, etc.), but "plain" (Gen. 11:2; Neh. 6:2; Isa. 40:4; Ezek. 3:22, 23; 8:4; Amos 1:5). This Hebrew term is applied to the following places: the valley of Shinar (Gen. 11:2); valley of Jericho (Deut. 34:3); valley of Lebanon (Josh. 11:17); valley of Megiddo (2 Chron. 35:22; Zech. 12:11); valley of Mizpeh (Josh. 11:8); valley of Ono (Neh. 6:2); valley of Aven (Amos 1:5).

2. Ay'-mek (Heb. אַי־מֶק, to be deep), a long broad sweep between parallel ranges of hills of less extent than No. 1, answering quite closely to our idea in general of a valley in its proper sense. It is applied to the following localities: Valley of Achor (Josh. 7:24, 26; 15:7; Isa. 65:10; Hos. 2:15); valley of Ajalon (Josh. 10:12); valley of Hebron (Gen. 37:14); valley of Jehoshaphat (Joel 3:2, 12), called (v. 14), figuratively, the valley of decision; valley of Jezreel (Josh. 17:16; Judg. 6:33; Hos. 1:5); valley of Keziz (Josh. 18:21). This term is sometimes used as an appellative for certain well-known localities, e. g., the valley of weeping (Psa. 84:6, A. V. "valley of Baca"); the valley of blessing (2 Chron. 20:26, A. V. "valley of Berachah"); valley of the oak (1 Sam. 17:2, 19; 21:9, A. V. "valley of Elah"); valley of giants (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; "valley of Rephaim," 2 Sam. 5:18, 22, etc.); valley of Shaveh (Gen. 14:17), or of the king ("dale," Gen. 14:17; 2 Sam. 18:18); valley of the slime pits (Gen. 14:3, 8, 10, A. V. "of Siddim"); the valley of booths (Psa. 60:6; 108:7, A. V. "of Succoth"), etc.

3. Gah'ee (Heb. גַּחֲעִי or גַּחֲעִי, a gorge), a deep, narrow ravine with a stream in the bottom, either between hills or through an open plain. In the A. V. it is invariably rendered "valley," and is applied to the following localities: The valley of Hinnom (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; Neh. 11:30), or of the son of Hinnom (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; 2 Kings 23:10, etc.), the ravine on the southwestern side of Jerusalem, whence the term Gehenna; the valley of Siphah-el, a ravine between Zebulun and Asher (Josh. 19:14, 27); the valley of Zepthahak, a ravine in the tribe of Simeon (2 Chron. 14:10); the valley of Gedor, another ravine in Simeon (1 Chron. 4:39); the valley of Hamon-gog (Ezek. 39:11, 15), or of the passengers (v. 11), a ravine on the east of the Sea of Galilee; the valley of the craftsmen (1 Chron. 4:14), a ravine in Judah; the valley of the mountains (Zech. 14:6), a ravine near Jerusalem; the valley of salt (2 Sam. 8:13; 2 Kings 14:7; 1 Chron. 18:12; 2 Chron. 25:11; Psa. 60, title), a ravine on the southwestern shore of the Dead Sea; the valley of the hyenas (1 Sam. 13:18), in the tribe of Benjamin. Others, such as the valley of vision (Isa. 22:1, 5), of slaughter (Jer. 7:32; 19:6), are fanciful names; and still more poetical is the valley of the shadow of death (Psa. 23:4).

4. Nakh'-al (Heb. נַחַל, receiving; A. V. often "brook," "river," "stream"), answers exactly to the Arabic wady. It expresses as no English word can the bed of a stream (often wide and shelving, and like a "valley" in character, which in the rainy season may be nearly filled by a foaming torrent, though for the greater part of the year dry), and the stream itself which after the subsidence of the rains has shrunk to insignificant dimensions. Many of the wadies of Syria, owing to the demolition of the wood which formerly shaded the country and prevented too rapid evaporation after rain, are now entirely and constantly dry. As Palestine is emphatically a land of wadies, so this Hebrew term is of very frequent occurrence in the Bible. Stanley enumerated fifteen of these water courses or torrent beds—those of Gerar, of Eshcol, of Zered, of Arnon, of Jab-bok, of Kanah, of Kishon, of Besor, of Sorek, of Kidron, of Gaash, of Cherith, of Gad. This last could not be distinguished by a mere English reader from the "river of Egypt," viz. the Nile, although in the original an entirely different word is used.

5. Hash-shef-ay-law' (Heb. הַשֵּׁפֶת־אֵי־לָוַי, is the only case in which the employment of the term "valley" is unfortunate. This district (see SHEPHELAH) has no resemblance to a valley, but is a broad swelling tract of many hundred miles in area, which sweeps gently down from the mountains of Judah toward the Mediterranean. It is rendered "vale" (Deut. 1:7; Josh. 10:40; 1 Kings 10:27; 2 Chron. 1:15; Jer. 33:13), and "the valley," or "valleys" (Josh. 9:1; 11:2, 16; 12:8; 15:33; Judg. 1:9; Jer. 32:44).

6. In the New Testament we read of our Lord standing in "the plain" (Gr. τὸς πεδῖνος, top'-os ped-ee-nos, Luke 6:17), a level place; and "valley" (Gr. φάραξ, far'-anz, 3:5), ravine (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

VALLEY GATE (Heb. שַׁעַר הַגַּחֲעִי, shah'-ar hag-gah'ee), an entrance at the northwestern end of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:13; 8:13; comp. 2 Chron.

26:9; 33:14), probably corresponding to the present Jaffa gate.

VANIAH (Heb. נַיָּה, van-yaw', Jah has answered), one of the sons of Bani, and an Israelite who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:36), B. C. 456.

VANITY, the rendering of the following Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Aw'-ven (Heb. נָפֶת, to paint), nothingness, a vain and empty thing (Isa. 41:29; Zech. 10:2), specially of the nothingness of idols and of everything pertaining to idolatry (1 Sam. 15:23), and so put for an idol (Isa. 66:3); hence in Hosea the city (house of God, בַּיְתֵי אֱלֹהִים, bayth-ale') is scornfully called the house of idols (בַּיְתֵי אֱלֹהִים, bayth aw'-ven, Hos. 4:15; 10:5); it has the meaning of nothingness as to worth; naughtiness, i. e., wickedness, iniquity (Num. 23:21; Job 36:21; Isa. 1:13); also of toil, trouble (Psa. 55:3, A. V. "iniquity"; Prov. 22:8, A. V. "vanity").

2. Heh'-bel (Heb. הֶבֶל, a breath), something vain, empty, fruitless (Job 9:29; 21:34; 35:16; Jer. 10:3, 8; Lam. 4:17); specifically of idols (2 Kings 17:15; Psa. 31:6; Jer. 2:5; Jonah 2:8).

3. Shawv (Heb. שָׁוָה or shav (שָׁו) has the meaning of desolation; so "months of vanity" (Job 7:3) are those of calamity. Evil and calamity are both implied in 15:31, "Let him not trust in vanity [evil], deceiving himself: for vanity [calamity] shall be his recompense." To "speak vanity" (Psa. 41:6) is to utter falsehood. This term is also applied to idols (31:6).

4. To'-hoo (Heb. תְּהוֹ, to lie waste), a desert (Deut. 32:10; 11:24, "wilderness") also a worthless thing (Isa. 41:29), as an idol (44:9; comp. 59:4).

5. Mut-ah-yol'-ace (Gr. ματαίωσις) corresponds to shawv, and means that which is devoid of truth and appropriateness (2 Pet. 2:18); that which is perverse or depraved (Eph. 4:17); frailty, want of vigor (Rom. 8:20).

VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

The flora of Syria and Palestine is very rich. The phænogamous plants and higher cryptogams are distributed through one hundred and twenty-four orders, eight hundred and fifty genera, and about three thousand five hundred species, with many well-characterized varieties (see Post, Flora of Syria, Palestine, and Sinai, Beirut, 1896). Only one hundred names of plants are given in the Bible. Of these thirty-six cannot be determined with certainty. Of the sixty-four which are determinable thirty-five are cultivated. Of the identity of most of these, as wheat, barley, flax, olives, vines, figs, etc., there can be no doubt. In one case, rye (A. V. Exod. 9:32; Isa. 28:25, R. V. "spelt"), the name is a mistranslation. Of the wild plants mentioned, some, as algum, lign aloes, etc., are exotics, of which it is impossible to determine with certainty the species. Others, as anise, ash, bay tree, chestnut, heath, juniper, hemlock, mulberry, poplar, rose of Sharon, are mistranslations. Others, as flag, reed, thistle, thorn, refer to plants agreeing in mode of growth rather than ordinal or generic relationships, and are the equivalent of a number of Hebrew words, the generic or specific signification of which has been lost. Others still, as the lily, are ordinal for all plants of a given type. The effort, therefore, to construct a scriptural flora, accurate and precise in its details, must be abandoned, and each name of a plant treated on its own merits.

ALGUM or ALMUG TREES (Heb. אֶלְגוּמִים, al-goom-meem'). There is no reason to doubt the identity of the algum and the almug, as is proven by a comparison of 1 Kings 10:11 and 2 Chron. 9:10. As to the algum trees "out of Lebanon" (2 Chron. 2:8), they may have been the same as those that were imported from Ophir. In this case they may have then been indigenous, or cultivated, and have since become extinct; or they may have been another sort of tree called by the same name, as is the case with many other trees. There is no necessity for supposing an interpolation, nor even for inferring, as some have done, that "out of Lebanon" refers to "cedar trees and fir trees" only, and not to algums. We have no means of determining certainly what tree was intended. The weight of authority is in favor of the red sandalwood, but not a particle of evidence. As now seen in commerce it is not suitable either for terraces (marg. highways, or stairs, 2 Chron. 9:11), more properly staircases, or for pillars (marg. a prop, or nails, 1 Kings 10:12), more properly balustrades, or for harps and psalteries. We are therefore obliged to content ourselves with the transliteration and the uncertainty.

ALMOND (Heb. שָׁוֶה, shaw-kade', wakeful, probably from its early blossoming), a tree very much resembling in form and blossom the peach; and is only another species of the same genus. Its flowers appear as early as February, or even January. The almond is diffused by culture from China to Spain, on both sides of the Mediterranean, in the south of England, and in southern portions of the United States. There is no region, however, where it thrives better than in Syria.

The almond tree blossoms toward the end of January, or the beginning of February, before the coming of the leaves, so that the appearance of a tree in full bloom is very striking. Although the blossoms are tinged with pink, the general effect is white. The fruit is eaten in two stages, the first the tender, acidulous, unripe, crisp pod, and the other the ripe almonds, so familiar everywhere. There are four species of wild almonds in the Bible lands. The Hebrew name of the almond is the waker, in allusion to its being the first of the fruit trees to awake in the winter and put forth its luxuriant blossoms. This tree is referred to by Jacob when he tells his sons to take into Egypt "of the best fruits in the land . . . and almonds" (Gen. 43:11). In Eccles. (12:5), "The almond tree shall flourish," doubtless refers to the profuse flowering and white appearance of the tree when in full bloom and before the leaves appear (Jer. 1:11, 12). In Num. 17:8 the rod of Aaron is described as having "budded, and brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds." With its oblong-oval sharpened at one end and rounded at the other, the shape of the almond nut is remarkably graceful. This naturally led to its selection for ornamental carved work; and it was the pattern selected for the bowls of the golden candlestick (Exod. 25:33, 34; 37:19), "symbolizing the speedy and powerful result of light" (Keil, Arch., i, 146).

Figurative. In Jer. 1:11, 12, there is an allusion to another of the meanings of the Hebrew root, which is to hasten. In the first of the two verses the almond tree is mentioned by its name shaw-kade', and in the second it is said "for I will hasten [ki-shaw-kad'] my word," hasten being from the same root as almond. The almond was chosen to symbolize God's haste in fulfilling his promises.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the allusion in Eccles. 12:5 is to the white hair of the aged.

ALOE, LIGN ALOES (Heb. אֵלוֹן, al-hav-lem'; Gr. ἀλοή, al-ō-ay'). This is doubtless the lignum aloes of the ancients, the product of Aquilaria Agallocha, Roxb., and other trees of the same genus, growing in India and China. It was well known to the Greeks and also to the Arabians. Avicenna gives in considerable detail descriptions of the various grades and qualities of the drug. It is now known to the Arabs under the name of 'ūd-ē-salīb, and 'ūd-en-nadd, and 'ūd-el-bachūr. It is mentioned in four places in the Old Testament and once in the New Testament (Num. 24:6; Psa. 45:8; Prov. 7:17; Cant. 4:14; John 19:39). A question has been raised as to the identity of the tree mentioned in Num. 24:6 with the other trees of the same name. This question may safely be answered in the affirmative. Although the lign aloes is a native of India and China it is easy to suppose that it was cultivated in the tropical valley of the Jordan, which is well known to have produced trees in ancient times all traces of which have now disappeared. But even if it were to be supposed that it was not cultivated in Palestine, it might have been alluded to as a well-known tree of foreign growth, of which the luxuriance was proverbial, in this respect resembling the cedar of Lebanon, was to the Israelites of that day also a foreign tree, mentioned as an emblem of prosperity.

AMOMUM (Gr. ἀμόμυμ, am'-o-mum). This word occurs only in Rev. 18:13, and is rendered in the A. V. "odors." Amomum is a fragrant plant of India. It belongs to a genus of plants, natural order Scitamineæ, belonging to tropical regions of the Old World, and allied to the ginger plant. They are herbaceous, with creeping rootstocks and large sheathing leaves, and are remarkable for the pungency and aromatic properties of their seeds. Several specimens yield the cardamoms and grains of paradise of commerce. The one mentioned in Revelation had seeds like grapes, from which an ointment was made.

ANISE (Gr. ἀνιθον, an'-ay-thon). The marginal rendering dill is undoubtedly the true one. The Gr. ἀνιθον is the exact equivalent of the Lat. anethum, which is the dill, and not the anise. It is the aromatic, carminative seed of Anethum graveolens, L., an umbellifera, cultivated widely in the East, and used both in cookery and domestic medicine. It was certainly subject to tithe among the Hebrews (Matt. 23:23).

APPLE. The Hebrew word (תַּפּוּחַ, tap-poo'-akh) for apple is nearly the same as the Arabic tuffûh, and wherever the name of the tree has been preserved in that of a place, as in Beth Tappuah, the Arabic has preserved it in the modified form, in this tuffûh, showing that the reference to the familiar fruit is recognized. The apple is a favorite fruit with the natives of this land, and although they do not now possess any very fine varieties, they are particularly fond of the smell of an apple (Cant. 7:8). They habitually smell an apple to revive themselves when faint (2:5). Most of the apples cultivated here are sweet (v. 6). The allusions to the size of the apple tree in 2:3, 8:5, are borne out by the facts of the case. There is no occasion, then, to seek for any other tree, as some have done, to meet the Scripture requirements.

ASH (Heb. אֵשׁ, o'-ren, strength). This word occurs but once in the A. V. (Isa. 44:14). It is impossible to say with certainty what tree the original o'-ren meant. It is, however, wholly improbable that it was an ash. The LXX. and Vulg. have pine. There are three kinds of pines common in Syria and Palestine, but only one of these is planted. This is the familiar stone pine or maritime pine, Pinus Pinea, L. It is one of the most extensively cultivated trees of the country, with wood hard enough to be carved into an image, and never sown in irrigated districts, but nourished only by the rain. Large forests of this tree have been planted along the sandy coast to resist the encroachment of the drifted sand, and also still more extensive forests in the mountains, for the sake of its valuable timber.

ASPALATHUS. The name of one or more aromatic substances mentioned only once (Ecclus. 24:15). The substance and plant producing it are indeterminate.

BALM (Heb. טְּסֵרֵעַ, ts'er-ee', or טְּסֹרֵעַ, tsor-ee', to crack, hence to leak), an aromatic gum, or resin (Gen. 37:25), probably produced in Gilead, or a prime article of commerce there (Jer. 8:22; 46:11; 51:8), well known to Jacob (Gen. 43:11), and dealt in by Judah and Israel in the latter days of their monarchies (Ezek. 27:17). No tree now growing in Gilead produces the traditional balm, now known as Mecca balsam. This substance is the gum of Balsamodendron Gileadense and B. opobalsamum, which grow in southern Arabia. But there can be no doubt that in Roman times these trees were cultivated in the lower Jordan valley. This would bring a part of its area of cultivation within the limits of Gilead. In any case it was to such an extent an article of commerce in that district that it went by the name of balm of Gilead. Dioscorides erroneously says that the tree grew "only in the country of the Jews, which is Palestine, in the Ghor." Balm of Gilead was once an important element in the materia medica, but it has now fallen into disuse. Some have supposed that mastich is the balm of Gilead. Avicenna, however, clearly distinguishes it from that well-known gum. The so-called balm of Gilead, prepared by the monks of Jericho, from the fruits of the zaggum, Balanites Aegyptiaca, Del., has no claim except their authority. It is said, however, to have healing properties.

BARLEY (Heb. שֵׁבֶרֶה, seh-o-raw'; טֵבֵרֵי, seh-ore'; Gr. κριθῶνος, kree'-thee-nos), a well-known grain, cultivated from the remotest antiquity, and frequently mentioned in the Bible. A wild species, found in Galilee, and northeastward to the Syrian desert, Hordeum Ilhaburense, Boiss. (H. spontaneum, Koch), may be the original stock from which the cultivated varieties were derived. It is conspicuous by its very long awns, which are sometimes a foot in length. Barley is the universal provender for horses, mules, and, to a certain extent, for asses (1 Kings 4:28), taking the place of oats with us. It is still used for bread among the very poor (2 Kings 4:42). It was sometimes mixed with other cheap grains, for making bread (Ezek. 4:9). From its cheapness it was the jealousy offering (Num. 5:15); part of the price of an adulteress (Hos. 3:2) and of lewd women (Ezek. 13:19); a barley cake expressed the low rank and poverty of Gideon (Judg. 7:13).

The barley harvest is earlier than the wheat harvest (Exod. 9:31, 32), and begins in April, in the Jordan valley, and continues to be later as the altitude increases, until, at a height of six thousand feet above the sea, it takes place in July and August. Barley is sown in October and November, after the "early rain." It is never sown in the spring, for the simple reason that it would not have rain, and so could not mature any grain, even if there were moisture enough in the soil to cause it to germinate. That which is sown on the higher levels behaves like winter wheat in cold climates, dying down under the snow, and sprouting again in the spring.

BAY TREE (Heb. יֵזֵבֶל, ez-rawkh', springing up). The translation of the A. V., "like a green bay tree" (Psa. 37:35), is well amended by the R. V., to "like a green tree in its native soil."

BEANS (Heb. בֹּטָן, pole, thick, plump). Beans are mentioned twice, once as part of a mixture of cheap cereals, used for making a coarse kind of bread (Ezek. 4:9), and once as part of the provisions of David at Mahanaim (2 Sam. 17:28). The vegetable alluded to in each case is the horse bean, Faba vulgaris, L., which is extensively cultivated, both as human food and for fodder. As human food it is either cooked unripe in the green pod, like string beans, or the ripe seeds are boiled like our white beans.

BITTER HERBS (Heb. מְרוֹרֵי, mer-ore', bitter). The Hebrews were commanded to eat the pasover lamb with bitter herbs (Exod. 12:8; Num. 9:11). There are many such, wild and cultivated, which are habitually used by the natives of the East in salads; among them are lettuce, water cress, pepper grass, and endive. The object of the ordinance was not to remind the Israelites of their "bitter bondage" (Exod. 1:14), but of the haste with which they made their exit from Egypt. Unleavened bread, a roast lamb, and a few bitter herbs constituted a meal the elements of which were always at hand and could be got together with the least possible delay. So far from these herbs being distasteful to them, the orientals are very fond of them.

BOX TREE (Heb. תֵּאֲשׁוּרִי, teh-ash shoor'). We have no reliable data to enable us to determine the tree intended by the Hebrew original of this word. It is mentioned in two passages (Isa. 41:19; 60:13) in connection with the cedar, shittah, myrtle, fir, and pine. It seems rather unlikely that a shrub, known only in far northern Syria, should be associated with these familiar trees. The Syrian box, Buzus longifolia, Boiss., is only two to three feet in height, and must have been unfamiliar to the readers of the Bible in the time of Isaiah. The old Arabic version gives sherbin, which is either the wild cypress or the lizzab, Juniperus excelsa, M. B. It might be better to transliterate the Hebrew, as is done in the case of algum, and call the tree teashshūr.

BRAMBLE. See THISTLES, THORNS.

BRIERS. See THISTLES, THORNS.

BULRUSH. See REED.

BURNING BUSH (Heb. בִּטְוֵה, sen-eh', bramble, Exod. 3:2-4; Deut. 33:16), one of the many thorny shrubs growing in Sinai. The monks of the Convent of St. Catherine point out a blackberry bush (Rubus tomentosus, Borek, var. collinus, Boiss.), growing behind the chapel of the convent, as the bush in question. This is improbable, as Rubus is not indigenous there. The burning bush might be one of the sejal trees, Acacia tortilis, Hayne, or A. Seyal, Del., or the nebk, Zizyphus Spina Christi, L., or some other thorn bush.

CALAMUS. See REED.

CAMPHIRE (Heb. כֹּפְסֵר, ko'-fer). This is the hemia plant, Lawsonia alba, L. It is cultivated everywhere in the Holy Land. Its clusters of cream-colored flowers are much admired by the orientals, and form a part of almost every nosegay during the flowering season. The scriptural allusions (Cant. 1:14; 4:13, 14) show that it was equally esteemed in ancient times. Its leaves are also used for staining the hands and feet. There is, however, no allusion to this use of the plant in the Scripture.

CANE. See REED.

CAPERBERRY (R. V. Eccles. 12:5; A. V. "desire"; Heb. אֲבֵעֵי-יוֹנָו, ab-ee-yo-naw', provocative of desire), the immature fruit of Capparis spinosa, L., a plant growing everywhere in clefts of rocks and walls. It is stimulant, and supposed to be aphrodisiac. If caperberry be the correct rendering of ab-ee-yo-naw' the meaning of the passage is that even the caperberry shall fail to excite desire, a meaning in effect similar to that of A. V.

CASSIA (Heb. קִדְדָוֹ, kid-dav', shriveled, Exod. 30:24; Ezek. 27:19; קֶצֶי-אוֹ, kets-ee-aw', peeled, Psa. 45:8). Probably Cassia lignea of commerce, which consists of strips of the bark of Cinnamomum Cassia, Blume, a plant growing in China and Malaysia. Cassia buds are the immature flowers of the same. Both have the flavor and aroma of cinnamon.

CEDAR (Heb. רִמֹן, sh'-rez). By far the greater number of references to the cedar in the Scriptures are to be understood of the famous "cedar of Lebanon." This is a tree of very wide distribution, and fulfills well the conditions demanded, with the following exceptions: 1. The cedar wood used in purification, in connection with scarlet and hyssop. This would seem to have been a tree found in the Sinaitic desert, and in use long before the Israelites could have easily obtained the cedar of Lebanon. It might well have been Juniperus Phœnicea, L., which is found in Mount Hor and its neighborhood, and could also have grown on the mountains of Sinai. 2. The "cedars in the garden of God" (Ezek. 31:8). The comparison of the Assyrian, who is called "a cedar of Lebanon" (v. 5), with these trees would seem to indicate some other tree. We have no means of determining what it was. 3. The "cedars by the waters" (Num. 24:6) can hardly be cedars of Lebanon, because this tree never grows in such situation. True, in poetry, even in the Scriptures, it is not to be expected that all the congruities of time and place shall be rigidly observed. But unless we suppose such poetic license, we must infer that the trees here referred to were some water-loving species then known as cedars, now no longer determinable.

It is likely that the subalpine regions of Lebanon and Antilebanon were clothed with these trees. They are still found at a number of points on Lebanon, along the flanks and top of Jebel Barûk, and above the gorge of the Kadisha, as also above Sir, and in the Duniyeh. They are abundant in Amanus and the Taurus. Their range is from the Himalayas to the Atlas, and from central Asia Minor to Lebanon. They also existed in Cyprus. It is a tall tree (Isa. 2:13, etc.), "with fair branches and with a shadowing shroud" (Ezek. 31:3); suitable for masts of ships (27:5), and for beams, pillars, and boards (1 Kings 6:9; 7:2), and for carved work (Isa. 44:14). Of this noble tree much of the temple was built, as well as Solomon's house and other important public edifices in Jerusalem. It was used for roofing the temple of Diana at Ephesus and that of Apollo at Utica, and other famous buildings. Its claim to be the "king of trees" is not to be considered with reference to the whole forest world, but only in comparison with the trees found in Bible lands. This claim was never disputed in the period of the Hebrew nationality in this land, and the sacred grove at Beshheri, on Lebanon, still bears the ancient name of "the cedars of the Lord."

CHAFF, the husks which surround the seeds of the cereals. A. V. incorrectly renders by chaff khaw-shash', which should be cut grass, and teh'-ben, which should be cut straw. Chaff is the correct rendering for the Hebrew נֹץ (motes, winnowed). Chaff, after the thrashing is over, is mingled with the cut and split straw (teh'-ben). Winnowing separates the product of thrashing into four heaps—grain, cut straw, chaff, and finally the dust, caused by the comminution of a part of the straw and chaff and its commingling with the dust of the earthen floor. This, which is 'ûr in Hebrew, is also erroneously translated (Dan. 2:35) "chaff."

CHESTNUT TREE (Heb. עֲרֵמוֹן, ar-mone').

As this tree is not found in the Holy Land, some other must be sought that will fill the conditions required. The R. V. very properly follows the LXX. and the Vulg., and gives plane tree. A scratch in the bark of this tree would at once show a white streak (Gen. 30:37). The plane tree is also of a stature and imposing appearance sufficient to make it suitable for comparison in the group with which the cedar of Lebanon is compared (Ezek. 31:8). This tree often attains a height of a hundred feet and a diameter at its base of from six to ten feet. It is abundant along all water courses in Syria and Mesopotamia.

CINNAMON (Heb. קִינָמוֹן, kin-naw-mone';

Gr. κιννάμωμον, kin-am'-o-mon). No one can doubt the substance intended, as the Hebrew name is the same as the English. It was used by that race as a perfume for the holy oil (Exod. 30:23) and for beds (Prov. 7:17). It seems to have been cultivated by Solomon (Cant. 4:14). It is a part of the wares of Babylon the Great (Rev. 18:13).

COCKLE (Heb. בֹּשֶׂת, bosh-aw'). The word rendered cockle (Job 31:40) should be, as in the margin of the A. V., stinking weeds, or of R. V. noisome weeds. There are multitudes of these in the fields of Palestine and Syria, as the goose weeds, stink weeds, arums, henbane, and mandrake. The wild grapes (Isa. 5:2, 4) should be rendered stinking fruits. Such are the fruits of Solanum ni- grum, L., a plant growing in all vineyards in this land, the fruit of which is black, resembling a small grape, and having an ill odor, which would correspond with the requirements of the comparison. It is called in Arabic 'inab-edh-dhib, wolf's grapes.

CORIANDER (Heb. רִצְדָּה, gad, cutting), the aromatic seed of Coriandrum sativum, L. It is somewhat larger than a hemp seed, and only spoken of to illustrate the size and color of the grains of manna (Exod. 16:31; Num. 11:7).

CORN, the generic name for the cereal grains. Those cultivated in Bible lands are wheat, barley, vetch, filches (Nigella sativa, L.), millet, beans, pulse (edible seeds in general), lentils, and maize (not mentioned in Scripture, as it is a grain of modern introduction). Rye (Exod. 9:32; Isa. 28:25) is an erroneous translation for vetch. See HARVEST, FAN, THRASHING FLOOR, AGRICULTURE.

An Ear of Egyptian Corn.

We have no evidence that the ancient Hebrews knew it, although it has been cultivated from time immemorial in India and other parts of the East.

CROWN OF THORNS. See THISTLES, THORNS.

CUCUMBER. There are two kinds of cucumbers cultivated in the East, both of which were probably known to the ancient Egyptians and the Hebrews. One is identical with our ordinary kind, but more delicate in flavor and more wholesome. The other is tougher, more dry, and less delicate in flavor. The former kind grows only in irrigated ground, while the latter flourishes during the hot, rainless months of summer, without a drop of water, except what it can extract from the parched soil or absorb from the atmosphere during the night. It was doubtless the custom in Egypt to water both kinds, and hence the succulent character of the vegetable so keenly regretted by the Israelites during their thirsty journey in the wilderness (Num. 11:5; Heb. קִישׁוּשׁ, kish-shoo', hard).

The garden of cucumbers (Isa. 1:8; Heb. מִקְשָׁו, mik-shaw') is still a feature of oriental landscapes, some of these being on rolling ground, exposed to the blazing sun of August, without water, and others being among the irrigated orchards of orange and other fruit trees, but all supplied with a lodge, where the watchman keeps guard over the tempting vegetable, none of which would reach its lawful owner but for this precaution. This lodge is a frail structure of poles and leaves, adapted only to protect the watchman from the sun by day and the dew by night, during the rainless summer of Syria and Palestine. As soon as the last of the cucumbers is gathered the lodge is "left," a useless reminder of past plenty and prosperity.

CUMMIN (Heb. קָמֹנִי, kam-mone', preserving; Gr. κίμινον, koo'-min-on), one of the aromatic seeds, subject to tithe by the Jewish law (Matt. 23:23). It is still known by its ancient name (kammûn) throughout the Arabic world. It is an aromatic and carminative, used in cooking and in domestic medicine. It is still thrashed with a rod (Isa. 28:25, 27).

CYPRESS (R. V. HOLM OAK). It is impossible to determine what tree is meant by the Hebrew (תְּרֵזֶוֹת, teer-zaw', Isa. 44:14) original of the word translated as above. The meaning of the root, hard or strong, would apply to many trees. It would therefore be better to transliterate it, as in the case of algum, than to guess at it, as has been done by both versions. See FIR.

DILL. See ANISE.

EBONY (Heb. בְּנֵי, ho'-ben, hard), the hard, close-grained, black heart wood of Diospyros Ebenum, L., which grows in the East Indies. It has been an article of commerce from ancient times, having been brought to Palestine from Dedan, on the Persian Gulf (Ezek. 27:15). It is used for cabinet work, rulers, etc. An ebony was brought in ancient times from Ethiopia, but we have no certainty as to the tree which produced it. Virgil (Georg., ii, 116) says that "India also produces the black ebony."

ELM (Hos. 4:13) should be terebinth, as in R. V.

FIG (Heb. תְּנָנִי, teh-ane', or תְּנָנִי, teh-ay-naw'; Gr. σῦκον, soo'-kon), the fruit of the well-known tree. It is one of the favorite articles of food in the East, and, in the dried state, a considerable article of commerce. The failure of the fig trees was a national calamity. Their productiveness was a token of peace and the divine favor. They are associated with the vine, the palm, the pomegranate. The fig tree differs from most other fruit trees in that its fruit is green and inconspicuous, concealed among leaves until near the time of ripening. If the promise given from a distance by the leaves be not fulfilled on approaching (Mark 11:13), the tree is a hypocrite. Such a one our Saviour cursed.

FIR (Heb. בְּרוֹשׁ, ber-osh'), probably the cypress, Cupressus sempervirens, L. This tree fulfills all the conditions of the various passages in which fir occurs (1 Kings 6:15, 34; 2 Chron. 3:5; Ezek. 27:5). The tall trunk of this tree is well adapted for masts. Other possible candidates which have been suggested are Pinus Halcensis, Mill., and Juniperus excelsa, M. B. The R. V. margin, in the first three of the above passages, favors "cypress."

FITCHES, the rendering of two different words.

1. Koos-seh'-meth (Heb. כִּסְמֵת, Ezek. 4:9), which should be vetch, or kirseineh. See RYE.

2. Keh'-tsakh (Heb. קֵצִיחַ, Isa. 28:25, 27), which refers to the fruit of the nutmeg flower, Nigella sativa, L. It is a black seed, used in the East as a condiment, R. V. marg., i. e., "black cummin." It is still thrashed in this country with a stick.

FLAG (Heb. אֵזוֹן, aw'-khoo), a generic word for such plants as have a more or less grasslike or sedgy form, and grow in swamps or by river banks (Job 8:11). The Hebrew original, אֵזוֹן, is rendered (Gen. 41:2, 18) A. V. "meadow," R. V. "reed grass." It would be better to render it in all the passages feus. Another word, soof (Exod. 2:3, 5), is well translated "flags."

FLAX (Heb. פִּשְׁתִּילָה, pish-taw'), a well-known plant, Linum sativum, L. The fibers of the bark, when separated, twisted, bleached, and woven, are linen. In the raw state they are "tow" (Judg. 16:9; Isa. 1:31). Somewhat twisted, tow constitutes a "wick" (R. V. marg. Isa. 42:3; 43:17).

FLOWERS. The flowers of the Holy Land are renowned for their beauty. The most showy and widely diffused are the scarlet and blue anemones, the scarlet ranunculi and poppies, the numerous silenes, the purple pea blossom, a number of showy roses, the scarlet pomegranate, a host of composites, the styrax, a number of crocuses, colchicums, irises, tulips, and ixiolirions, etc. In many places they are so abundant as to impart a rich and varied coloring to the landscape.

FOREST (Heb. יַבֵּשׁ, yah'-ar, a thicket). While the Holy Land has never been a wooded country in historic times, it was doubtless more so at the time of the Hebrew conquest than it has been ever since. Numerous woods and forests are mentioned by name. Several Hebrew names are used for collections of trees. While not consistently translated, sebhak and 'abhim denote thickets; pardes, park or orchard; and hōresh and ga'ar, wood or forest. Few considerable forests remain in our day, except north of Antioch, beyond the proper limits of the Holy Land.

FRANKINCENSE (Heb. לְבוֹנָה, leb-o-naw'). See GALBANUM, below.

FRUIT. The Holy Land is not only a land of flowers, but also of fruits. Owing to the great diversity of level, from the tropical valley of the Jordan, one thousand three hundred feet below the sea, to subalpine Lebanon, the fruits of the country present a cosmopolitan variety. The most characteristic are the banana, orange, and its congeners, dates, most of the rosaceous fruits, persimmon, jujube, grapes, figs, olives, and pomegranates. The orange is in season for six months, the grape nearly as long. Figs ripen during four months. Almost all garden vegetables thrive, and many of them are in season for months.

GALBANUM (Heb. לְבוֹנָה, leb-o-naw', whiteness), a gum resin with a pungent balsamic odor (Exod. 30:34). It was one of the constituents of the sacred incense. Two ferulas, F. galbaniflua, Boiss. et Buhse, and F. rubricaulis, Boiss., both growing in Persia, are believed to be the sources of the gum. It is used in medicine as an antispasmodic. "It is a greasy, sticky, granulated resin, presenting a whitish appearance at first, but afterward changing to yellow, and having a pungent odor and taste, and which, when mixed with fragrant substances, has the effect of increasing the odor and fixing it longer" (Keil, Bib. Arch., i, 121).

GALL. While some of the references to gall clearly point to bile, or gall bladder (Job 16:13; 20:14, 25, Heb. מֶרֶר, mer-o'-raw), others as clearly point to a plant (Deut. 29:18; Lam. 3:19, etc., Heb. שֵׁן, roshe). It is probable that the poppy is the plant intended. The "gall" which was offered to Christ on the cross (Matt. 27:34) was doubtless myrrh (Mark 15:23).

GARDEN, a term used in Scripture with a far wider signification than in ordinary literature. It includes park, orchard, vegetable, and flower gardens. The garden of Eden was a vast farm, including all the above. A peculiar feature of most oriental cities is that, while the houses are crowded together, and few gardens are found among them, the environs are mostly composed of fruit and vegetable gardens, and trees of various sorts, planted for utilitarian purposes. The effect of these gardens, surrounding the towns, as in the case of Jaffa, Sidon, Beirut, Damascus, and Hems, is extremely beautiful.

GARLIC (Heb. שֵׁן, shoom, odor), a well-known vegetable, more agreeable to oriental than to most European palates. It is mentioned but once (Num. 11:5).

GOPHER WOOD (Heb. גֹּפֶרֶת, go'-fer), an unknown wood, used in the construction of the ark (Gen. 6:14).

GOURD (Heb. קִיָּוִן, kee-kaw-yone', nauseous). The ivy and castor oil plant have been supposed to be the kee-kaw-yone' (Jonah 4:6-10). But the bottle gourd, Cucurbita lagenaria, L., fulfills the conditions of the narrative, and is, we believe, the plant intended.

GOURDS, WILD (Heb. פִּקְוֵז, pak-koo-aw', splitting open, 2 Kings 4:39), were probably colocynths, which grew abundantly in the locality alluded to, and suit the requirements of the passage.

GRAPES. See VINE.

GRASS, a term used in Scripture in an indefinite sense, referring to green herbage in general. All the four Hebrew words, yerek, huzir, desh, and 'esebh, translated "grass," have this wide meaning. The idea conveyed to us by the term grasses, as plants with hollow culms, strap-shaped leaves, and an inflorescence of glumes and pales, is a strictly modern creation of descriptive botany.

GREEN HERBS, GREEN GRASS, GREEN THING. See GRASS.

GROVE, the equivalent in A. V. of two words.

1. Ash-ay-raw' (Heb. אֲשֵׁרָה, asherah), which may be translated mast or flagstaff, or transliterated, as in R. V.

2. Ay'-shel (Heb. אֵשֶׁל, eshel), which should be translated tamarisk, as in R. V. (Gen. 21:33; 1 Sam. 22:6, marg.).

HAY. Hay is never, and probably never has been, made in the Holy Land. The grasses from which it is prepared are not cultivated. In the three passages where it occurs in A. V. (Prov.

27:25; Isa. 15:6; 1 Cor. 3:12) it would better be rendered herbage or grass, understood in the most generic sense.

HAZEL (Gen. 30:37) should be almond, as in R. V. (Heb. לוֹז, looz).

HEATH (Heb. אֶרְוֵי, ar-o-ayr'). There is one species of heath, Erica verticillata, Forsk., which grows in Lebanon. But this cannot be the plant intended (Jer. 17:6; 48:6), called 'ar'ar, which is the Arabic name for Juniperus Phœnicea, L., a tree found in the mountains of Edom. It is no way likely that it is "tamarisk," as in R. V. marg. in the above passages.

HEDGE. Hedges are more commonly used to separate gardens and orchards in the East than are walls. Many thorny plants are set out for this purpose. Also some of the giant grasses, as Arundo Donax, L., and Saccharum Aegyptiacum, L.

HEMLOCK, an unfortunate translation of the Heb. שֵׁן, roshe (A. V. Hos. 10:4) (see GALL), and of לַח-אֲוֹ, lah-an-aw' (Amos 6:12), which should be, as in R. V., "wormwood."

HENNA. R. V. for A. V. "camphire," marg. "cypress" (Cant. 1:14; 4:13).

HERB. See GRASS.

HOLM TREE (R. V. Isa. 44:14, A. V. "cypress," Sus. 58). The holm oak is Quercus coccifera, L., one of the finest trees of Bible lands. It is widely diffused, and usually planted near solitary tombs.

HUSKS (Gr. κεράτιον, ker-at'-ee-on, horned, Luke 16:15), the pods of Ceratonia Siliqua, L., the carob tree. This tree is an evergreen, cultivated everywhere in the Holy Land. The pods are still often fed to swine, and are eaten by the people. An inspissated decoction of them is known as abs kharrub, i. e., carob honey.

HYSSOP (Heb. אֶזְרוֹבָח, ay-zobe'; Gr. ὑσσωπος, hoos'-so-pos), a labiate plant, probably Origanum Maru, L. It was used in sprinkling (Exod. 12:22; Lev., ch. 14; Heb. 9:19), and in quenching the thirst of a victim on the cross (John 19:29). It grew out of walls (1 Kings 4:33), probably the walls of terraces. There is no reason to believe that the "reed" (Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36), on which the sponge soaked in vinegar was raised to Christ's mouth, was the same as the "hyssop" upon which the sponge was put (John 19:29). Even were it so the stem of the caper plant, which has been proposed as the hyssop, would not suit the requirements of the term "reed," which suggests a straight, not a zigzag stem.

IVY (2 Macc. 6:7) grows everywhere over rocky walls in the Holy Land.

JUNIPER (Heb. יְרֵכָה, ro'-them, 1 Kings 19:4, R. V. marg. "broom;" Job 30:4, R. V. text "broom"). The plant intended is doubtless the retem of the Arabs, Retama roetam, L., a desert, almost leafless, shrub, furnishing a very poor refuge from the sun's rays. Its roots make good fuel and charcoal (Psa. 120:4).

LEEKS (Heb. קָצִיר, khaw-tseer), a kind of onion, Allium Porrum, L., cultivated extensively in the East. It is mentioned once with onions and garlic (Num. 11:5).

LENTILS (Heb. לְעֵט, aw-dawsh', Gen. 25:34; 2 Sam. 17:28; 23:11; Ezek. 4:9). The seed of Ervum Lens, L., a cereal everywhere cultivated in the East. A pottage made of it is as much used now as food as it was in Jacob's time.

LIGN ALOES. See ALOES.

LILY (Heb. שִׁשְׁוֹן, shoo-shan'), while in a special sense the word for iris, is as broad in its application as its rendering in our versions, lily. The expression "lily of the valleys" (Cant. 2:1) does not refer to the flower understood by this designation in ordinary speech, as it is not found in Palestine. The lily of other passages in Canticles was evidently a garden flower (2:16; 4:5; 6:3). The allusion (5:13) may be to rosy color, or fragrance, or both. From earliest times the lily has been imitated in stone and bronze, as an architectural ornament (1 Kings 7:19; 2 Chron. 4:5). The expression "lilies of the field" (ra' kriva tov ayrov, Matt. 6:28-30) is well translated. Fortunately we have only to go to the grain fields of Palestine to find precisely what fulfills the conditions of the allusion. They are as follows: A plant which would naturally be called a lily (not a ranunculus, nor an anemone, nor a poppy), plants having names of their own in both Greek and English, and never confounded with lilies in either ancient or modern speech), growing among the wheat, adorned with regal colors, and having stems, which, when dried, would answer as fuel for the oriental oven. There are three species of the sword lily, Gladiolus segetum, Gawl, G. Illyricus, Koch, and G. atro-violaceus, Boiss., with pink to purple and blackish-violet flowers, which grow everywhere among standing corn, and have stems suitable for light fuel. As they are the only plants which fulfill all the conditions, we cannot but believe that they were the very plants to which our Saviour pointed to illustrate the heavenly Father's care of his children.

A Lily of Palestine.

MALLOWS (Heb. מַלּוֹאִים, mal-loo'-akh), a term used only once in the Bible (Job 30:4, R. V. "salt-wort"). The Arabic equivalent of the Hebrew mal-loo'-akh refers to the sea orache, Atriplex Halimus, L., a plant growing in just such regions as the one referred to by Job. Dioscorides says that they were cooked as vegetables. The leaves are sour, and furnish little nourishment.

MALOBATHRON (Heb. מַלּוֹבַתְרוֹן, bel'-ther), a spice (R. V. marg. Cant. 2:17 for "Bether"). It is an Indian and Chinese tree, which does not grow in Palestine, and therefore could not have given its name to a chain of mountains. If it is to be translated, A. V. marg. "division" is better than malobathron. The transliteration of both A. V. and R. V. text, "Bether," is better.

MANDRAKE (Heb. מַדְרַקָּה, doo-dah'ee, Gen. 30:14; Cant. 7:13, R. V. marg. in both "love apples"), a narcotic plant of the order Solanaceae, Mandragora officinarum, L., esteemed by the ancients as a love philter, and evidently so referred to in both the above-cited passages. Taken in considerable quantities, it is an acrid narcotic poison. It is not used in modern medicine.

MANNA (Heb. מַנָּה, mann, what?). Many have sought to identify manna with some substance naturally produced in the desert, answering to the conditions of the food rained down on the Israelites in the wilderness, during a period of forty years. There is a substance called mann by the Arabs, and having some nutrient properties, which exudes from Tamarix mannifera, Ehr., and certain oaks, and Alhagi Maurorum, D. C., and A. Camelorum, Fisch. But this substance corresponds in no way with the properties of the scriptural manna. The latter was clearly a miraculous production, and ceased as soon as the necessity for it passed away (Exod. 16:14, 31; Num. 11:7, 8; Josh. 5:12). Among its most remarkable characteristics was the double supply on Friday, and the total lack on the Sabbath.

MASTICH, a fragrant, terebinthine gum, exuding from Pistacia Lentiscus, L., a small tree, growing abundantly in Palestine and Syria, mentioned only in the Apocrypha (Sus. 54). It is the universal chewing gum of the East. A preserve is also made of it.

MELONS (Heb. מַלּוֹאִים, ab-at-tee'-akh, Num. 11:5), doubtless generic for watermelons and cantaloupes, of which there are several luscious varieties in the Holy Land. Being very oleag., and serving to quench the thirst engendered by the hot climate of Bible lands, it would naturally be lamented by the Israelites in the desert.

MILDEW (Heb. מִלְדֵּה, yay-raw-kone', pale-ness). Various sorts of parasitic fungi, on plants, the growth of which is favored by moisture. It is the opposite of blasting, shid-daw-fone', which is the drying up of plants by the hot sirocco, or khamsin winds (see Deut. 28:22; 1 Kings 8:37, etc.).

MILLET (Heb. מִלֵּת, do'-khan, Ezek. 4:9), the seed of Panicum miliaceum, L., and of Setaria Italica, Kth. It is about as large as a mustard seed. In the single passage where it occurs it formed part of the basis of a very complex bread. Some have supposed that Sorghum vulgare, L., is the plant intended by the Hebrew original do'-khan. This seems to us improbable.

MINT, a titable herb. The most common species of mint is Mentha sativa, L., which is universally cultivated and used as a flavoring in salads and in cookery. Ἡδύσσμα (Gr. hay-doo'-os-mah, Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42) was probably generic for other kinds of mint, as well as the above.

MULBERRY TREE (Heb. בַּוְכָבִי, baw-kaw', 2 Sam. 5:23, 24; 1 Chron. 14:14, 15), a tree, to the identification of which we have no clue. It would be better to transliterate the Hebrew term, which is from the same root as Baca (Psa. 84:6), which signifies weeping. The expression would then read trees of becaim. They were certainly not mulberries. The mulberry is mentioned, however, in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. 6:34). The syca-mine (Luke 17:6) is the black mulberry (see SYCAMINE).

MUSTARD (Gr. σίναπι, sin'-ap-ee), a well-known plant, of which two species, Sinapis arvensis, L., and S. alba, L., flourish in the Holy Land. Beside these, S. nigra, L., the black mustard, is cultivated as a condiment. All produce minute seeds (Matt. 17:20; Luke 17:6). All, in favorable soil in this warm climate, attain a size quite sufficient for the exigencies of the passages (Matt. 13:31, 32; Mark 4:32; Luke 13:19). The birds, in the latter passage, it will be observed, lodge, not nest, in the branches. The term "great tree" is to be taken only as an exaggerated contrast with the minute seed, and to be explained by the parallel "greatest among herbs" (Matt. 13:32). There seems to us to be no evidence whatever that Salvadora Persica, Garcin, is the plant intended by sin'-ap-ee.

MYRRH (Heb. מוֹר, or מוֹרָה, more, distilling; Arabic murr) is the well-known gum resin extracted from the Arabian Balsamodendron Myrrha, Nees. It was used as a perfume, for embalming, and as an ingredient of the holy anointing oil. It was one of the gifts of the Magi. Another Hebrew word, מוֹר (lote), is translated myrrh (Gen. 37:25; 43:11). It should be translated ladanum (R. V. Gen. 37:25, marg.). This is a gummy exudation from Cistus villosus, L., a plant growing in great abundance in the Holy Land.

MYRTLE, a well-known and beautiful evergreen shrub, Myrtus communis, L., with white flowers, berries which are at first white, and then turn bluish black. They are edible, though rather too astringent for Western palates. The Hebrew name of Esther, Madasseh, is derived from the name of this plant. The translation "myrtle trees" (Zech. 1:8, 10, 11) is an error, as the original has only הַדְּרִימִים (had-as'-seem), myrtles, with no hint as to whether they were trees or shrubs.

NETTLE. The Hebrew קְרוֹלִי (khaw-rool'), which occurs thrice (Job 30:7; Prov. 24:31; Zeph. 2:9), and is translated "nettle," R. V. marg. "wild vetches," probably signifies thorn, scrub, or brush. The Holy Land is preeminently a land of such scrubs, and the sense of the above passages is well met by the term. The Hebrew words קִמְמוֹשׁ (kim-moshe') and קִימוֹשׁ (kee-moshe') (Isa. 34:13; Hos. 9:6), from a root signifying to sting, doubtless refer to the true nettles, of the genera Urtica and Forskahlea, of the order Urticaceæ, of which there are a number of species in this land. This rendering perfectly suits the passages cited.

NUTS. The nuts of Gen. 43:11 (Heb. בִּטְנֵי, bo'-ten) are without doubt pistachios, as in R. V. marg. They are, and always have been, luxuries in the East. The nuts of Cant. 6:11 (אֵגֹזִים, eg-ozel') are walnuts. They are universally cultivated and greatly esteemed in Bible lands.

OAK. Four Hebrew words are rendered oak. Of these, three, אֵיל (ah'-yil), אֵילָוִי (ay-law'), and אֵילָנִי (al-lone'), are uncertain in meaning, some referring them to the oak and others to the terebinth. The other, אֵילָוִי (al-law'), probably refers definitely to the oak. They are always so translated in A. V. and R. V. There are nine species of oak in the Holy Land, many of them being large and fine trees. They were doubtless much more abundant in ancient times in Bashan (Isa. 2:13; Ezek. 27:6; Zech. 11:2). They are still, as in ancient times (Gen. 35:8), planted by tombs. The wood is valuable for many industrial purposes.

OIL TREE. The Hebrew expression עֵץ שֶׁל־מֵן (ates sheh'-men) is of uncertain meaning. It occurs only in three connections (1 Kings 6:23, 31-33, "olive"; Neh. 8:15, A. V. "pine," R. V. "wild olive;" Isa. 41:19, "oil tree," R. V. marg. "oleaster"). It evidently, from its name, denotes some tree rich in oleaginous or resinous matter, the presence of which is a sign of fertility. It is of a size and hardness sufficient to furnish material for a carved image ten cubits high. It grows in the mountains and has foliage suited for booths, and is not the olive, which is mentioned by name in the same connection (Neh. 8:15); some fatwood tree, for example any of the pinces (as in A. V., Neh. 8:15, not "wild olive" as in R. V.). It is useless to seek to identify it. Better call it "oil tree."

OLIVE (Heb. זַיִת, zah'-yith; שֶׁל־מֵן, sheh'-men; Gr. from ἐλαία, el-ah'-yah), a tree, with leaves of the characteristic dull green at their upper surface and a silvery sheen at their lower, universally cultivated in Bible countries. It is alluded to many times in the Bible, often as an emblem of peace, prosperity, and wealth. Much is said of its beauty, fruitfulness, and usefulness to mankind. Its berries and oil are now, as always, leading articles of commerce. Disasters to olive trees are national afflictions, and the failure of the crop is a cause of ruin and a sign of the divine wrath. The olive berry (Isa. 17:6; James 3:12) is a small drupe, of an oblong ovoid shape, green when young, becoming dark purple, then black, and containing a large amount of oil and a bitter principle. The bitter, appetizing taste and the nutritive properties of the berry cause it to be a prime article of diet in all Eastern lands. It is eaten after pickling in brine, or preserved in olive oil. Only the fully ripe berries are preserved in the latter way. But the chief value of the olive tree consists in the rich and abundant oil which is expressed from the berry. Large groves of olive trees exist in the neighborhood of most of the cities of the coast of Syria and Palestine, and throughout Lebanon and the hill country of Palestine. The oil produced from them is one of the chief articles of commerce in this land. Oil forms a large element in the diet of the people, being used for salads, which are an accompaniment of most of their meals, and for frying, in place of butter, especially during the fasts of the various Christian sects. It is also much used in the manufacture of soap. It is boiled with crude carbonate of soda; and makes a very excellent grade of hard soap, of which considerable quantities are exported to Europe, and the remainder consumed in the country.

Olives and Olive Press.

ONIONS (Heb. בצל, beh'-tsel, peeled). Much as the onion is cultivated and used as an article of food and commerce, it is only mentioned once in the Bible, in connection with the longing of the Israelites in the desert for the good things of Egypt (Num. 11:5). Those familiar with the yield (Psa. 92:12). Its beauty is compared with that of woman (Cant. 7:7). The failure of the palm was a sign of general calamity (Joel 1:12). The names of many places contain the word Tamar, the Hebrew for this noble tree.

PANNAG (Heb. אֲנַג, pan-nag', Ezek. 27:17), delicately flavored onions of the East prefer them to the ranker product of the West.

PALM TREE (Heb. תְּמָר, taw-mawr', erect; Gr. φοινίξ, foy'-nix), a well-known tree, Phoenix dactylifera, L., widely disseminated in Bible lands. Its trunk, the midribs of its leaves, and its fruit are all important. It is an emblem of the righteous, owing to its straight trunk and abundant a substance, perhaps the one known by the Arabs as halawa. It is made of a decoction of soapwort root, to which is added syrup of dibs and sesame oil. The mixture is stirred over the fire until the elements are fully incorporated, and set aside to crystallize. Pannag was, as halawa is now, an article of internal commerce in Palestine and Syria, and of export to other lands.

PAPER REEDS, PYPYRUS. See REED.

PINE TREE. We have already seen under OIL TREE that ates sheh'-men (Heb. אֶתֶשׁ שְׁהִי־מֵן, Neh. 8:15) is probably, as in A. V., "pine," or fat wood, not, as in R. V., "wild olive." Another word (Heb. תִּדְהוּר, tid-hawr', enduring) is rendered in the only place in which it occurs "pine" (Isa. 41:19, R. V. marg. "plane"). There is, however, no etymological basis for this rendering, nor for R. V. marg. "plane," for which there is another Hebrew word, ar-mone', עֵרְמוֹן (see CHESTNUT), nor for Gesenius's rendering "oak." We prefer to transliterate it tid-hawr'. Under ASH we have given our reasons for the opinion that o'-ren (Heb. אֶרֶן) probably refers to the stone pine, Pinus Pinea, L. On the whole it must be admitted, however, that it is not absolutely certain that any of these words signifies pine.

PLANE TREE. See CHESTNUT.

POMEGRANATE (Heb. רִמּוֹן, rim-mone'), a well-known tree, Punica Granatum, L., cultivated everywhere in the East. The fruit is spherical, often four inches or more in diameter, green when young, turning red in ripening, with a woody, astringent rind, inclosing a large number of luscious pulpy seeds of a pinkish color. The pomegranate is frequently mentioned in company with the vine, fig, and palm. The rind contains much tannin, and a decoction of it is a specific against the tape worm (see 1 Sam. 14:2; Cant. 4:13, etc.).

POPLAR, the translation of Heb. לִבְנֵיָהּ (lib-neh'), Arabic lubna, white tree (Gen. 30:37, R. V. marg. "storax;" Hos. 4:13). There can be little doubt that storax is the correct rendering; Storax officinale, L., although usually a shrub, often attains a height of twenty feet, which would answer the requirements of the passage in Hosea. The lower surface of its leaves is white, and it bears a wealth of large white blossoms, which well entitle it to the name of the white tree. Its effect in the landscape is similar to that of Cornus florida, L., the flowering dogwood of the northern woods in the United States.

POTTAGE. See LENTILS.

PULSE (Dan. 1:12, 16), a word of far more restricted meaning than the Hebrew זֶרַע, zay-ro'-ah, or זֶרַעֵן, zay-raw-ohn', something sozen, which signifies primarily vegetables in general, and more particularly edible seeds which are cooked, as lentils, horse beans, beans, chick peas, and the like. Daniel and his companions were pleading for a simple vegetable diet in place of the rich, unwholesome dishes of the king's table.

PURSLANE. See EGG.

RAISIN. See VINE.

REED GRASS. See FLAG.

REEDS, RUSHES. Six Hebrew words are used for marsh plants. Two, aw'-khoo (Heb. אֲוֹחֹ), and soof (Heb. סוּף), are frequently but not always rendered "flag" (see FLAG). Of the remaining four:

1. Ag-mone' (Heb. אֶגְמוֹן) is rendered "reed," "marsh," "hook," "rope," "caldron," "burning rushes," "rush," and "bulrush." It doubtless refers in a general way to swamp plants of the orders Cyperaceæ and Gramineæ, and the like,

Papyrus.

2. Go'-neh (Heb. גֹּמֶה) probably includes the papyrus, bulrushes, club rushes, and twig rush, i. e., plants of the orders Juncaceæ and Cyperaceæ.

3. Kaw-neh' (Heb. קָוֶה), which is cognate with cane, may be considered as the equivalent of the English reed, taken as that term is in a broad sense. It includes the tall grasses with woody stems, such as Arunlo Donax, L., the Persian reed, Saccharum Ægyptiacum, Willd., the Arabic ghazzir (both of which may be considered as included under the expression "reed shaken with the wind," Matt. 11:7), Phragmites communis, L., the true reed. Kaw-neh' is variously translated "reed," "stalk," "bone," "beam" of a balance, "branches" of a lampstand, "cane," "calamus."

4. Aw-roth' (Heb. אֲוֶרֶת), translated "paper reeds" (A. V. Isa. 19:7), should be, as in R. V., "meadows."

ROSE (Heb. קְהַל־אֶתֶלֶת, khab-ats-tseh'-leth). The word occurs in A. V. twice (Cant. 2:1; Isa. 35:1), in both of which R. V. marg. has "autumn crocus." It is probable that narcissus is the correct rendering. Two species, Narcissus Tazetta, L., and N. serotinus, L., grow in the Holy Land. The rose is mentioned in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. 24:14; 39:13). There are seven species of rose which grow in the Holy Land. The most widely distributed of these is Rosa Phœnicea, Boiss., which grows on the coast and in the mountains. A pink rose, with very fragrant petals, is cultivated in Damascus for the sake of its essential oil, the famous attar of roses. Rose water and syrup of rose leaves are also extensively manufactured throughout the country.

RUE (Gr. ῥίγανον, pay'-gan-on), a plant with a penetrating, to most persons disagreeable, odor. It was tithable (Luke 11:42). The official species, Ruta graveolens, L., is cultivated. The allied wild species, R. Chalepensis, L., is widely diffused throughout the country.

RUSH. See REED.

RYE, the A. V. rendering (Exod. 9:32; Isa. 28:26) of the Heb. כֹּסֶם, koos-seh'-meth (A. V. "fitches," Ezek. 4:9). The R. V. renders it in all three passages "spelt." We believe it to be the kirsenneh, which is the cognate Arabic for the leguminous plant Vicia Ervilia, L., a cercal universally cultivated in the East. Rye is unknown in these lands, and spelt is not commonly cultivated. The Vulgate renders the word vicia. Fitches is a corruption of this Latin word, but it is elsewhere used for the seeds of Nigella sativa (see FITCHES). It is not a happy choice here. It would be better to translate koos-seh'-meth by vetch, with a marginal note, "the kirsenneh of the Arabs."

SAFFRON (Heb. כַּרְכֹּמֶה, kar-kome', Cant. 4:14), an aromatic, composed of the styles of several species of crocus, principally C. cancellatus, Herb. Bot. They are of an orange color, and are principally used to impart an agreeable odor and flavor to boiled rice. The flowerets of Carthamus tinctorius, L., known as safflower, or bastard saffron, are used for a similar purpose.

SALTWORT. See MALLOWS.

SHITAH TREE, SHITTIM WOOD (Heb. שִׁטִּי, shit-taw'; שִׁטִּים, shit-teem'), a tree, of which two species, Acacia Seyal, Del., and A. Tortilis, Hayne, grow in the deserts of Sinai and et-Tib, Acacia (Shittim) Foliage, Flower, and Fruit.

and around the Dead Sea. The wood is hard, very heavy, indestructible by insects, of a fine and beautiful grain, and thus suitable in every way for the construction of the framework and furniture of the tabernacle. It also yields the officinal gum arabic. Shittim, Abel-Shittim, and the Valley of Shittim were named from this tree.

SOD'OM, VINE OF. See VINE.

SPELT. See RYE.

SPICE, SPICERY. Two generic Hebrew words for aromatics occur in the Old Testament, sam (סַם) and baw-sawm' (בַּשָּׂמ); bo'-sem (בֹּשֶׂם) and beh'-sem (בְּשֶׂם) being alternative forms of the same. Several of the individual aromatics included under these words are given, as frankincense, stacte, onychā, galbanum, myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia (Exod. 30:23, 34). These and numerous other aromatics, among them spikenard and lign aloes, were used as perfumes, anointing oils, and incense, and for embalming bodies. Nek-ohth' (Heb. נֶחֱוֹת, Gen. 37:25) has been supposed by some to be gum tragacanth. We are inclined, however, to regard it as also a generic term, which is not badly expressed by "spicery," better by aromatics.

SPIKENARD (Heb. נַרְדֻּ, nayrd; Gr. vápδος, nar'-dos), an aromatic oil extracted from an East Indian plant, Nardostachys Jatamansi, D. C. (Cant. 1:12; 4:13, 14; Mark 14:3; John 12:3). It cost the woman who anointed Christ's feet $62.50 for her devotion.

STACTE (Heb. נַו־טַו־ף, naw-tawf', Exod. 30:34), an aromatic; R. V. marg. "opobalsamum" is not probable; nor is it likely that it is storax, which we believe to be a product of the plant designated as libneh (see POPLAR). Stacte is in fact myrrh, and its Hebrew original in the above passage, naw-tawf', signifying drops, probably refers to myrrh in tears. The same word (Job 36:27) is used for drops of water.

STORAX. See MYRRH, POPLAR, STACTE.

STRAW. During the process of oriental thrashing the straw is cut into bits half an inch to two in length, and more or less crushed and shredded, and pulverized, and mixed with the chaff. This product is known in Arabic as tibn, the cognate of the Hebrew תֵּבֵן (teh'-ben), which is usually translated straw, sometimes incorrectly chaff and stubble. As hay is unknown this cut straw is its substitute.

STUBBLE (Heb. קַשׁ, kash, dry; תֵּבֵן, teh'-ben, Job 21:18; Gr. καλάμη, kal-am'ay, 1 Cor. 3:12). As grain is, for the most part, pulled up by the roots in oriental harvesting, there is very little true stubble in an Eastern field. But there is an abundance of dry sticks and fallen straws, with weeds and thorny plants growing among them. On this stubble the herds and flocks subsist in summer, and it astonishes occidentals to see what large numbers of animals get a living from land that to their eyes seems blasted and desert. Such dry sticks and straws are readily lighted, and the flames spread like prairie fire.

SWEET CANE. See REED.

SYCAMINE. The Gr. συκάμινος (soo-kam'-ee-nos) meant also the sycomore, but the English term has come to mean only the black mulberry, Morus nigra, L. The fruit of it resembles in shape and external appearance the larger sorts of blackberries, but it has a decidedly different, though pleasant acid flavor. It is mentioned but once, in the New Testament (Lukel 7:6). Wherever συκάμυθος occurs in the LXX. it refers to the sycamore.

SYCOMORE, the rendering in the Old Testament of סָמָר (shaw-kawm) and שִׁיקְמָוֶה (shik-maw) in the Hebrew, and σοκάμυθος (soo-kam'-ee-nos) in the LXX. It is a spreading tree, Ficus Sycomorus, L., of the order Urticaceae, often planted by roadsides, where it affords a favorable point of view for sightseers. It also grows wild and reaches a very large size. Its wood is light but durable, and much used for house carpentry and fuel. It was once abundant in the Holy Land (1 Kings 10:27, etc.) and in Egypt (Psa. 78:47). Its fruit is a small edible fig.

TAMARISK, R. V. correctly for Heb. תְּמָרִים (ay'-shel) (Gen. 21:33, A. V. "grove," marg., "tree," 1 Sam. 22:16, A. V. "tree," marg. "grove in a high place;" 31:13, A. V. "tree"). There are nine species of tamarisk in the Holy Land, many of which make fine heads of foliage, suitable to the needs of the above references.

TARES (Gr. ζιζάνιον, dzidz-an'-ee-on). Tares are very numerous in the grain fields, along with a large number of other species of plants not suitable for human food. They are left until the stalks are well grown together, and then, not long before the harvest (Matt. 13:30), women and children, and sometimes men, go carefully among the grain and pull up all but the wheat and barley. Nowadays these weeds are not burned, but fed to cattle. If any tares remain unnoticed until the grain is harvested and thrashed out, the seeds are separated from the wheat and barley and set aside for poultry. There are four kinds of tares in the Holy Land, far the most common of which in the grain fields is Lolium temulentum, L.

TEIL TREE (Isa. 6:13) should be terebinth, as in R. V.

TEREBINTH. See TURPENTINE, OAK, TEIL TREE.

THICKET. See FOREST.

THISTLES, THORNS (including BRAMBLE, BRIER). Seventeen Hebrew words are used for plants with prickles and thorns. Probably most of them once referred to definite species, which we have now no means of fixing. It is clear that translators, both ancient and modern, have given up in despair all hope of unraveling the intricacies of the tangle, and have translated these numerous terms to suit their conviction of the needs of the context of the various passages in which they occur. One of them, sar-pawd' (Heb. סַרְפָּד, Isa. 55:13), is probably no thorn, but the elecampane, which is placed in the above passage in parallelism with the myrtle. The number of names for thorny plants, though so large, is small in comparison with the number of such plants. At least fifty genera, and more than two hundred species, in the Holy Land, are armed with prickles or thorns, and many more with stinging hairs. If the weary traveler sits confidently on a grassy bank by the wayside, he is sure to rise more quickly than he sat down, happy if he is able to extract the thorns which are often broken off in his flesh. It is often difficult to force horses through fields overrun with Eryngiums, Cirsiums, Onopordons, and the like. They will swerve from side to side, and attempt to leap over their tormentors, and sometimes become almost frantic from the pain. Many herbs have heads several inches in diameter, bristling with spines two to six inches long. Such are sometimes dragged out on the thrashing floors and broken to pieces, as food for asses and camels. With such, perhaps, Gideon "taught [thrashed] the men of Succoth" (Judg. 8:16). The number of intricate thorn bushes suitable for hedges is large (Job 5:5).

The "crown of thorns" which was platted for our Saviour's head (Mark 15:17, etc.; Gr. ἀκάνθινος, ak-an'-thee-nos) may have been composed of Calycotome villosa, Thistle and Thorny Cactus.

L., or Poterium spinosum, L. Zizyphus Spina-Christi, L., the traditional Christ thorn, would not have been easy to procure in Jerusalem.

THYINE WOOD (Gr. θύϊνος, thoo'-ee-nos, fragrant), the fragrant brown wood of Thuja articulata, Desf., growing in the Atlas, analogous to lignum vitæ, and used for costly furniture (Rev. 18:12).

TOW. See FLAX.

TREES. Trees are valued in this land, mainly as yielding fruit or timber. Systematic planting of shade trees is almost unknown, except in cemeteries and around the tombs of saints. The forests have been greatly reduced in number and contain few large trees (see FOREST). Some efforts have been made from time to time to acclimatize foreign trees. Solomon appears to have had botanical gardens, and such are mentioned by Josephus in his days. Pliny mentions the palm groves of Jericho. Trees have important symbolical meanings in Scripture. Man fell from eating the fruit of the "tree of knowledge of good and evil," and was driven off in the attempt to attain the "tree of life." This tree, transplanted to heaven, supplies food and medicine for all.

TURPENTINE. This tree is only mentioned in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. 24:16). It is the terebinth (butm of the Arabs), Pistacia Terebinthus, L., and its variety Palæstina (P. Palestina, Boiss.). It is generally diffused, the trees being usually solitary, seldom in groves or forests. Another species, Pistacia mulica, Fisch et Meyer, is more common east of the Jordan and in Jebel Bil'âs, of the Syrian Desert. Several of the words translated "oak" in A. V. may refer to this tree. See OAK.

VINE, a plant mentioned early and very frequently in Scripture. It was and is one of the most important sources of livelihood and wealth to the people of the East. It is associated with the fig, palm, and pomegranate in the enumeration of the products of the land. Ghek'-fen (Heb.

Vine Leaf and Flower.

וֵיזֵי) is generic for wine, so-rake' (Heb. שִׂרָקַ, Jer. 2:21), a choice vine, and naw-zeer' (Heb. נָזֵר, un-pruned vine).

VINE OF SODOM (Heb. נֶבֶקִים וּמִסְדָּרֹת, gaph-nawm' oo-mish-shad-moth', Deut. 32:32). It is impossible to identify any plant growing near the site of Sodom which corresponds with this poetical allusion. Various plants have been suggested, but none of them fulfill the necessary conditions. The colocynth is a vine, but does not produce clusters nor grapelike fruit. The 'ushr, Calotropis procera, Willd., also bears neither clusters nor grapes. Solanum nigrum, L., and its allied species, called in Arabic 'inab-edh-dhib, wolf's grapes, have fruits too small to be called grapes, are not vines, and are not peculiar to this region. Solanum coagulans, Forsk., is not a vine, and bears fruits like small tomatoes not grapes. Cucumis prophetarum, L., produces no clusters nor grapes. In our view it is better to regard the vine of Sodom as a poetic creation, similar to the wine in the same passage. The poet, filled with the idea of bitterness suggested by the waters of the Dead Sea, pictures an ideal vine, nourished by this bitter sea, producing bitter clusters, grapes of gall, the wine of which is dragon's poison and the cruel venom of asps. Such imagery is in strict accord with Hebrew poetical license.

VINEGAR of excellent quality is made from the light wines of the country. It is uncertain whether the vinegar presented to our Saviour on the cross was acid wine or true vinegar.

VINEYARDS are often hedged about, but as often not. They are provided with towers or booths for watchmen. The vines must be regularly pruned. Grapes are of many kinds in the Holy Land and of superior excellence. The vine-tage takes place in September and October, and is a season of great rejoicing. The grapes are either eaten as such, or dried into raisins, or the juice expressed in the wine vat and fermented into wine, or boiled down in great caldrons into dibs, i. e., grape honey. Neither the unfermented juice (mistâr) of the grapes nor the inspissated syrup is known as wine. The latter is never diluted as a beverage.

WEEDS (Heb. סוף, soof, Jonah 2:5) are sea weeds (Gr. χότρος, chor-tos, Eccles. 40:16), worthless land plants.

WHEAT, the translation of Heb. בָּר, bar, usually generic for cereals; daw-gawn' (Heb. דָּגָן, also usually generic for cereals; ree-faw' (Heb. רֵפָה, A. V. Prov. 27:22, R. V. "bruised corn"), which should be translated grits, komb, and hillah, the specific names for wheat. The date of the first cultivation of wheat mounts to the remotest antiquity. Grains of it have been found in Egyptian tombs, in the deeper strata of the ruins at Lachish, and elsewhere in ancient monuments. The wild original is unknown.

WILLOW. Several species of willows are found in the Holy Land. There are two Hebrew words for willow—tsaf-tsaw-faw' (צַפְצַפִּים), the equivalent of the Arabic sifsaf, and aw-rawb' (אַרְבֵּב). Tradition says that the willow on which the Israelites hung their harps was the weeping willow, called from that circumstance Salix Babylonica, L. Many places mentioned in Scripture are named from willows.

WORMWOOD (Heb. אֲרֵמֶסֶת, lah-an-aw'; Gr. ἀρμισθος, ap-sin-thos), bitter plants growing in waste, usually desert places. They are an emblem of calamity and injustice. They belong to the genus Artemisia, of which there are five species in the table-lands and deserts of Palestine and Syria.—G. F. Post.

VEIL (Heb. פֶּתִיל, paw-ro'-keth), the screen separating the Holy and Most Holy Places in the tabernacle (q. v.) and temple (q. v.). It was this piece of tapestry that was rent by the earthquake at Christ's crucifixion (Matt. 27:51, etc.).

VEIN (Heb. מַעְיָן, mo-tsaw', a source), signifies the issuing place, i. e., the place from which anything naturally comes forth (Job 38:27), or whence it is obtained (1 Kings 10:28); the place where a mineral is found, the mine (Job 28:19), the place where the gold comes forth, therefore a gold mine.

VENGEANCE. 1. Naw-kam' (Heb. נָקָם, to grudge) is to punish. In a bad sense, as of an injured person, it is to take vengeance, to avenge oneself (Judg. 15:7; 1 Sam. 18:25; Ezek. 25:15), and is the manifestation of vindictiveness (Lam. 3:60). When vengeance is predicted of the Lord it must be taken in the better sense of righteous punishment (Psa. 94:1; Jer. 11:20; 20:12, etc.).

2. Dee'-kay (Gr. δίκη, right, justice); ek-dik'-ay-sis (Gr. ἐκδίκησις, punishment). Both these words express the idea of executing righteous judgment (Acts 28:4), vindicating one from wrongs (Luke 18:7, sq.; 21:22), avenging an injured person (Acts 7:24).

3. Or-gay' (Gr. ὄρη, impulse, desire), as attributed to God in the New Testament, is that in God which stands opposed to man's disobedience, and passes over into the notion of retribution, punishment (Rom. 3:5). See WRATH.

VENISON (Heb. צַי, tsah'-yid, the chase; צַיִד, tsay-daw', Gen. 27:3), game taken in hunting (25:28; 27:5-33).

VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES, a general name for translations of the Scriptures into other languages than the original. After the Hebrew language became a dead language in the 2d century before Christ, and still more after the spread of Christianity, translations of the Hebrew Scriptures into the prevailing languages became a necessity. Accordingly, almost every language then current had at least one version, which received ecclesiastical authority, and was used instead of the original Hebrew text.

"In the case of the New Testament, there did not for a long time exist any occasion for a translation, as the Greek language, in which it was written, was universally prevalent in the civilized world at the time of the promulgation of the Gospel. In certain provinces of the Roman empire, however, the Latin soon came into common use, especially in North Africa, and hence the old Italic and afterward the Vulgate arose. Still later the Syriac version was made for the use of the oriental Christians, to whom that language was vernacular" (McC. and S., Cyc.).

In this article the several versions are arranged into two general groups, ancient and modern.

1. Ancient. (1) Arabic. (1) VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. (a) Made from the Hebrew text. Rabbi Saadiah Haggan, the Hebrew commentator of the 10th century, translated portions (some think the whole) of the Old Testament into Arabic. His version of the Pentateuch was printed at Constantinople in 1546. The version of Isaiah by Saadiah was printed by Paulus at Jena in 1791, from a Bodleian manuscript; the same library contains a manuscript of his version of Hosea. The Book of Joshua in the Paris and Walton's Polyglots is also from the Hebrew; and this Rödiger states to be the fact in the case of the polyglot text of 1 Kings, ch. 12; 2 Kings 12:16; Neh. 1-9:27. (b) Made from the Peshito Syriac. This is the base of the Arabic text contained in the polyglots of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, and Nehemiah. (c) Made from the LXX. The version in the polyglots of the books not specified above. Another text of the Psalter in Justiniani Psalterium Octuplum, Genoa, 1516. (2) VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. (a) The Roman edition of the four Gospels, 1590-91. (b) The Erpenian Arabic. The whole New Testament, edited by Erpenius, 1616, at Leyden, from a manuscript of the 13th or 14th century. (c) The Arabic of the Paris Polyglot, 1645. In the Gospels this follows mostly the Roman text; in the Epistles a manuscript from Aleppo was used. (d) The Carshuni Arabic text (i. e., in Syriac letters), the Syriac and Arabic New Testament, published in Rome, 1703.

(2) Armenian. This translation was undertaken by Mesrob (Miesrob), A. D. 410, aided by his pupils Joannes Eccelensis and Josephus Palensis. Their work was begun with translating Proverbs, ending with the completion of the whole Old Testament. In the New Testament they used the Syriac as their basis, from their inability to obtain any Greek books. In 431 Joseph and Eznak returned from the Council of Ephesus, bringing with them a copy of the Scriptures; and Isaac, the Armenian patriarch, and Mesrob began a new version from the Greek. Hindered by their want of a competent knowledge of the Greek, Eznak and Joseph were sent, with Moses Chorenensis, to Alexandria to study that language. There they made what Moses called a third translation. The first printed edition of the Old and New Testaments in Armenian appeared at Amsterdam, 1666, under the care of Oscan (or Uscan), described as an Armenian bishop. Zohrab, in 1789, published at Venice an improved text of the Armenian New Testament; and in 1805 he and his coadjutors completed an edition of the entire Armenian Scriptures based upon a manuscript written in the 14th century. Dr. Charles Rieu, of the British Museum, undertook the task of collating the Venice text of 1805 for Tregelles, thus supplying him with a valuable portion of the materials for his critical edition of the New Testament.

(3) Chaldee (Targums).

(4) Egyptian. (1) THE MEMPHITIC VERSION was for some time the only Egyptian translation known to scholars. Coptic was then regarded as a sufficiently accurate and definite appellation. It being established that there were at least two Egyptian versions, the name Coptic was found to be indefinite, and even unsuitable for the translation then so termed; for in the dialect of upper Egypt there was another; and it is from the ancient Coptos in Upper-Egypt that the term Coptic is taken. Thus Copto-Memphitic, or, more simply, Memphitic, is the better name for the version in the dialect of lower Egypt. When Egyptian translations were made we do not know, probably before the beginning of the 4th century. When the attention of European scholars was directed to the language and races of modern Egypt

it was found that while the native Christians use only Arabic vernacularly, yet in their services and in their public reading of the Scriptures they employ a dialect of the Coptic. This is the version now called Memphitic. Wilkins, in 1716, published at Oxford the first Memphitic New Testament, founded on manuscripts in the Bodleian, and compared with some at Rome and Paris. It was published by Wilkins (London, 1781, 4to), by Fallet (Paris, 1854, sq.), and by De Lagarde (Leipzig, 1867, 8vo); the Psalms at Rome (1744 and 1749) by the Propaganda Society. In 1837 Ideler published the Psalter more correctly; and in 1844 the best critical edition, by Schwartz, appeared. The twelve minor prophets were published by Tattam (Oxon., 1836, 8vo), and the major prophets by the same (1852). Bardelli published Daniel (Pisa, 1849), and a few other pieces of other earlier books were printed at different times by Mingarelli, Quatremère, and Münster. In 1846 a new and more correct edition was begun by Schwartz, and continued, but in a different manner, after his death, by Botticher (1852, etc.). In 1848-52 the "Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge" published the New Testament in Memphitic and Arabic (London, 2 vols., folio). (2) THE THEBAIC VERSION. The examination of Egyptian manuscripts in the last century showed that beside the Memphitic there is also another version in a cognate Egyptian dialect. To this the name Sahidic was applied by some, from an Arabic designation for upper Egypt and its ancient language. It is, however, far better to assign to this version a name not derived from the language of the Arabian occupants of that land; thus Copto-Thebaic (as styled by Giorgi), or simply Thebaic, is far preferable. This version was also made from the Greek, both in the Old and the New Testament, and probably in the 2d century. Only some fragments of it have been printed by Münster, Mingarelli, and Zoega. (3) BASHMURIC OR AMMONIAN. Some Egyptian fragments were noticed by both Münster and Giorgi among the Borgian manuscripts, which in dialect differ both from the Memphitic and Thebaic. These fragments of a third Egyptian translation were edited by both these scholars independently in the same year (1789). In what part of Egypt this third dialect was used, and what should be its distinctive name, has been a good deal discussed. Arabian writers mention a third Egyptian dialect under the name of Bashmuric, and this has by some been assumed as the appellation for this version. Giorgi supposed that this was the dialect of the Ammonian Oasis; in this Münster agreed with him; and thus they called the version the Ammonian.

(5) Gothic. The Moeso-Goths were a German tribe which settled on the borders of the Greek empire, and their language is essentially a German dialect. Their version of the Bible was made by Ulphilas, a bishop born 318 A. D., after Greek manuscripts in the New Testament, and after the Septuagint in the Old Testament. In the latter part of the 16th century the existence of a manuscript of this version was known through Morillon having mentioned that he had observed one in the library of the monastery of Werden on the Ruhr, in Westphalia. In 1648, almost at the conclusion of the Thirty Years' War, among the spoils from Prague was sent to Stockholm a copy of the Gothic Gospels, known as the Codex Argenteus. It is now preserved in the library of the University of Upsal. "The manuscript is written on vellum that was once purple, in silver letters, except those at the beginning of sections, which are golden. The Gospels have many lacunæ. It is calculated that when entire it consisted of three hundred and twenty folios; there are now but one hundred and eighty-eight. It is pretty certain that this beautiful and elaborate manuscript must have been written in the 6th century, probably in upper Italy, when under the Gothic sovereignty. Knittel, in 1762, edited from a Wolfenbützel palimpsest some portions of the Epistle to the Romans in Gothic, in which the Latin stood by the side of the version of Ulphilas. New light dawned on Ulphilas and his version in 1817. While the late Cardinal Mai was engaged in the examination of palimpsests in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, of which he was at that time a librarian, he noticed traces of some Gothic writing under that of one of the codices. This was found to be part of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. In making further examination, four other palimpsests were found which contained portions of the Gothic version. Mai deciphered these manuscripts in conjunction with Count Carlo Ottavio Castiglione, and their labors resulted in the recovery, besides a few portions of the Old Testament, of almost the whole of the thirteen Epistles of St. Paul and some parts of the Gospels. The edition of Gabelentz and Loebe (1836-45) contains all that has been discovered of the Gothic version, with a Latin translation, notes, and a Gothic dictionary and grammar."

(6) Greek Versions of the Old Testament. Of these there are six.

(1) SEPTUAGINT. "When the Jews returned from the Babylonian exile the common people had lost the use of the old classic Hebrew, and this led to the formation of Targums, or translations into the Aramæan patois spoken by the multitude. And these Targums, gradually perfected during the four and a half centuries between Nehemiah's age and the coming of Christ, and handed down by oral tradition in the Rabbinic schools, guarded the Hebrew text from corruption then, and are most useful to us now for textual criticism. But the most complete version of the Old Testament was that made into Greek in Egypt," called the Septuagint. It was probably begun in the time of the first Ptolemy, about 280 B. C., and completed in the course of the next thirty or forty years. All agree that Alexandria was the birth-place of this version. That which led to the making of this version was, doubtless, the fact that a very large number of Jews had settled in Egypt. Isaiah speaks of their presence not only in lower Egypt, but in Pathros (i. e., Upper Egypt), and even in Cush (i. e., the Soudan and Abyssinia) (Isa. 11:11). He foresaw the time when whole cities there would speak the Aramæan tongue (19:18), and condemned the policy which caused so many Israelites to migrate thither (30:2). They naturally adopted the language of commerce, which was Greek. When the Greek empire of Alexander was divided among his generals, and the Ptolemy took Egypt, and fostered the Jews, they, with increased numbers and wealth, naturally wished to have their law and other Scriptures in the language of their daily life.

"A fabulous account of this version is given in a letter of Aristeas, narrating how King Ptolemy sent an embassy to the high priest at Jerusalem, with large sums in silver and gold; and how the high priest selected six men of each tribe, who, after a magnificent reception, were shut up in cells on the seacoast, and completed the translation in seventy-two days. The internal evidence proves that it was made gradually, and by men deficient in the knowledge handed down in the schools in Palestine. They often divide sentences wrongly, mistake the meaning of rare words, and not unfrequently confess their ignorance by transcribing Hebrew words in Greek characters. But the story was so generally current that the version was called the Septuagint, as being made by seventy [and two] men" (Dean of Canterbury in The Observer).

The letter of Aristeas was received as genuine and true for many centuries. The general belief of scholars now is that it was the work of some Alexandrian Jew, whether with the object of enhancing the dignity of his law or the credit of the Greek version, or for the meaner purpose of gain.

This translation holds a very important place in Church history for the following reasons given by the Dean of Canterbury:

"And, first, for many ages it was the sole means by which the Old Testament was known to Christians. The Hebrew Scriptures were absolutely unknown in the West, and only partially known in the East; and thus the Church was unable to distinguish between what was genuine and what apocryphal. The old Latin version (Vetus Italia) was made from the Septuagint.

"An equally important service which it rendered was that it prepared the Gentile world for the reception of Christ. Those devout men and women of whom we read so much in St. Paul's missionary tours were Gentiles whose hearts had been reached by the revelation in the Old Testament of the unity, holiness, omnipresence, and almighty power of God; and it was the Septuagint which had given them this knowledge. Without this preparation, going on for nearly three centuries, the Gentile world would not have been fit to receive doctrines so pure and refined as those of Christianity.

"To us a third most important use is that the Septuagint bears witness to the substantial accuracy of the Hebrew text. Made in Egypt at a distance from the Palestinian schools, and by men evidently untrained in the vast traditional knowledge of the scribes, it has preserved for us a text long current in Egypt, and made from manuscripts some of which may possibly have been carried thither in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah. Of course there are considerable differences of reading, and these often are of great value. But the wonder is that this text, which branched off from the main stem three centuries before Christ, agrees so generally, and often even minutely, with the ordinary Hebrew text as given us by the Masorites in the 9th and 10th centuries after Christ.

“Finally, this version rendered to Christianity a fourth and most important service; for it formed the Greek of the New Testament both in its vocabulary and its grammar. The New Testament, humanly speaking, could not have been written unless the Septuagint had provided for it a language. Possibly a vocabulary had grown up in Egypt to express both the technical terms of the law, and also ideas altogether beyond the range of the Greek philosophies. These the Septuagint has preserved for us, and only by its study can we reach the full meaning of many of the words used by the apostles and evangelists. Even the names of Christian graces are often of Septuagint origin. Thus the word for love—agapē—is not found in any classic writer, but in the Septuagint alone.”

(2) AQUILA. In the 2d century there were three versions executed of the Old Testament Scriptures into Greek. The first of these was made by Aquila, a native of Sinope in Pontus, who had become a proselyte to Judaism. The Jerusalem Talmud describes him as a disciple of Rabbi Akiba, which would place him some time in the reign of the emperor Hadrian (A. D. 117–138). It is supposed that this object was to aid the Jews in their controversies with the Christians.

(3) THEODOTON. The second version, of which we have information as executed in the 2d century, is that of Theodoton. He is said to have been an Ephesian, and most generally described as an Ebionite. His work was rather a revision of the Septuagint, with the Hebrew text, than a translation.

(4) Symmachus is stated by Eusebius and Jerome to have been an Ebionite; while Epiphanius and others style him a Samaritan. It may be that as a Samaritan he made this version for some of that people who used the Greek, and who had learned to receive more than the Pentateuch. Epiphanius says that he lived under the emperor Severus. The translation which he produced was probably better than the others as to sense and general phraseology.

(5) THE FIFTH, SIXTH, AND SEVENTH VERSIONS. Besides the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodoton, the great critical work of Origen, comprised as to portions of the Old Testament three other versions, placed for comparison with the LXX., which, from their being anonymous, are only known as the fifth, sixth, and seventh; designations taken from the places which they respectively occupied in Origen's columnar arrangement. Eusebius says that two of these versions were found, the one at Jericho and the other at Nicopolis, on the Gulf of Actium. Epiphanius says that the fifth was found at Jericho, and the sixth at Nicopolis; while Jerome speaks of the fifth as having been found at the latter place. The contents of the fifth version appear to have been the Pentateuch, Psalms, Canticles, and the minor prophets. The existing fragments prove that the Hebrew translator used the Hebrew original; but it is quite certain that he was aided by the work of former translators. The sixth version seems to have been just the same in its contents as the fifth (except 2 Kings). Of the seventh version very few fragments remain. It seems to have contained the Psalms and the minor prophets; and the translator was probably a Jew. The existing fragments of these varied versions are mostly to be found in the editions of Origen's Hexapla, by Montfaucon and by Bardhi.

(6) THE VENETO-GRECIAN VERSION. A manuscript of the 14th century, in the library of St. Mark, at Venice, contains a peculiar version of the Pentateuch, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, and Daniel. All of these books except the Pentateuch were published by Villoison at Strasburg in 1784; the Pentateuch was edited by Ammon at Erlangen (1790–91). It may be said briefly that the translation was made from the Hebrew, although the present punctuation and accentuation is often not followed; and the translator was no doubt acquainted with some other Greek versions.

(7) Latin Versions. See VULGATE.

(8) Samaritan Versions. THE SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH A recension of the commonly received Hebrew text of the Mosaic law, in use with the Samaritans, and written in the ancient Hebrew (Ibri), or so-called Samaritan character.

(a) History. This recension is found vaguely quoted by some of the early fathers of the Church, under the name of “Παλαιότατον Ἑβραϊκὸν τὸ παρὰ Σαμαρειταῖς.” Eusebius of Cæsarea observes that the LXX. and the Samaritan Pentateuch agree against the received text in the number of years from the deluge to Abraham. Cyril of Alexandria speaks of certain words (Gen. 4:8) wanting in the Hebrew, but found in the Samaritan. The Talmud, on the other hand, mentions the Samaritan Pentateuch distinctly and contemptuously as a clumsily forged record. Down to within the last two hundred and fifty years, however, no copy of this divergent code of laws had reached Europe, and it began to be pronounced a fiction, and the plain words of the Church fathers—the better known authorities—who quoted it, were subjected to subtle interpretations. Suddenly, in 1616, Pietro della Valle, one of the first discoverers also of the cuneiform inscriptions, acquired a complete codex from the Samaritans in Damascus. In 1628 it was presented by Achille Harley de Sancy to the Library of the Oratory in Paris, and in 1628 there appeared a brief description of it by J. Morinus in his preface to the Roman text of the LXX. It was published in the Paris Polyglot, whence it was copied, with few emendations from other codices, by Walton. The number of manuscripts in Europe gradually grew to sixteen. During the present century another but very fragmentary copy was acquired by the Gotha Library. A copy of the entire (?) Pentateuch, with Targum (? Samaritan Version) in parallel columns, 4to, on parchment, was brought from Nâblus by Mr. Grove, in 1861, for the Comte de Paris, in whose library it is.

(b) Description. Respecting the external condition of these manuscripts, it may be observed that their sizes vary from 12mo to folio, and that no scroll, such as the Jews and the Samaritans use in their synagogues, is to be found among them. Their material is vellum, or cotton paper; the ink used is black in all cases, save the scroll used by the Samaritans at Nâblus, the letters of which are in gold. There are neither vowels, accents, nor diacritical points. The individual words are separated from each other by a dot. Greater or smaller divisions of the text are marked by two dots placed one above the other, and by an asterisk. A small line above a consonant indicates a peculiar meaning of the word, an unusual form, a passive, and the like; it is, in fact, a contrivance to bespeak attention. The whole Pentateuch is divided into nine hundred and sixty-four paragraphs, or Kasot, the termination of which is indicated by these figures, =, ., or <. To none of the manuscripts which have as yet reached Europe can be assigned a higher date than the tenth Christian century. The scroll used in Nâblus is said by the Samaritans to have been written by Abishua, the son of Phinehas. Its true date is not known.

(c) Critical character. A controversy was maintained respecting the claims of the Samaritan Pentateuch for genuineness above the received text, until 1815, when Gesenius (De Pent. Sam. Origine, Indole, et Auctoritate) abolished the remnant of the authority of the Samaritan Pentateuch. There are many variations in the Samaritan Pentateuch, some mere blunders arising from an imperfect knowledge of the first elements of grammar and exegesis; others, from the studied purpose of conforming certain passages to the Samaritan mode of thought, speech, and faith; still others, to a tendency toward removing, as well as linguistic shortcomings would allow, all that seemed obscure or in any way doubtful, and toward filling up all apparent imperfections either by repetitions or by means of newly invented and badly fitting words and phrases. These variations have been arranged by Gesenius as follows: 1. The first class, then, consists of readings by which emendations of a grammatical nature have been attempted. 2. The second class of variants consists of glosses and interpretations received into the text. 3. The third class exhibits conjectural emendations of real or imaginary difficulties in the Masoretic text. 4. The fourth class exhibits readings in which apparent deficiencies have been corrected or supplied from parallel passages in the common text. 5. The fifth class is an extension of the one immediately preceding, and comprises larger phrases, additions, and repetitions from parallel passages. 6. To the sixth class belong those "emendations" of passages and words of the Hebrew text which contain something objectionable in the eyes of the Samaritans, on account either of historical improbability or apparent want of dignity in the terms applied to the Creator. 7. The seventh class comprises what we might briefly call Samaritanisms, i. e., certain Hebrew forms, translated into the idiomatic Samaritan. 8. The eighth and last class contains alterations made in favor or on behalf of Samaritan theology, hermeneutics, and domestic worship. Thus the word Elohim, four times construed with the plural verb in the Hebrew Pentateuch, is in the Samaritan Pentateuch joined to the singular verb (Gen. 20:13; 31:53; 35:7; Exod. 22:9).

(d) Origin and age. Respecting these questions opinions have been much divided: that the Samaritan Pentateuch came into the hands of the Samaritans as an inheritance from the ten tribes, whom they succeeded, which is the popular opinion; that it was introduced by Manasseh at the time of the foundation of the Samaritan sanctuary on Mount Gerizim. Other, but very isolated, notions are those of Morin, Le Clerc, Poncet, etc., that the Israelitish priest sent by the king of Assyria to instruct the new inhabitants in the religion of the country brought the Pentateuch with him. Further, that the Samaritan Pentateuch was the production of an impostor, Dositheus, who lived during the time of the apostles, and who falsified the sacred records in order to prove that he was the Messiah (Ussher). Against which there is only this to be observed, that there is not the slightest alteration of such a nature to be found. Finally, that it is a very late and faulty recension, made after the Masoretic text (6th century after Christ), into which glosses from the LXX. had been received (Frankel).

(e) Versions. According to the Samaritans themselves, a Samaritan version of the Samaritan Pentateuch was made by the high priest Nathaniel, who died about B. C. 20. It would seem to have been composed before the destruction of the second temple; and being intended, like the Targums, for the use of the people exclusively, it was written in the popular Samaritan idiom, a mixture of Hebrew, Aramaic, and Syriac. In this version the original has been followed, with a very few exceptions, in a slavish and sometimes perfectly childish manner, the sense evidently being of minor consideration. In other cases, where no Samaritan equivalent could be found for the Hebrew word, the translator, instead of paraphrasing it, simply transposes its letters, so as to make it look Samaritan. On the whole it may be considered a very valuable aid toward the study of the Samaritan text, on account of its very close verbal adherence.

Τὸ Σαμαρειτικόν. The hatred between the Samaritans and the Jews is supposed to have caused the former to prepare a Greek translation of their Pentateuch in opposition to the LXX. of the Jews. In this way at least the existence of certain fragments of a Greek version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, preserved in some manuscripts of the LXX., together with portions of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, etc., is accounted for. These fragments are supposed to be alluded to by the Greek fathers under the name Σαμαρειτικόν. It is doubtful, however, whether it ever existed in the shape of a complete translation, or only designated a certain number of scholia translated from the Samaritan version.

(9) Slavonic version. In the year 862 there was a desire expressed, or an inquiry made, for Christian teachers in Moravia, and in the following year the labors of missionaries began among them. They were Cyrillus and Methodius, two brothers from Thessalonica. To the former is ascribed the invention of the Slavonic alphabet and the commencement of translating the Scriptures. He appears to have died in Rome, while Methodius continued for many years to be the bishop of the Slavonians. He is said to have continued his brother's translation, although how much they themselves actually executed is quite uncertain. The Old Testament is, as might be supposed, a version of the LXX., but what measure of revision it may since have received appears by no means certain. As the oldest known manuscript of the whole Bible is of A. D. 1499, it may reasonably be questioned whether this version may not in large portion be comparatively modern. The oldest manuscript of any part of this version is an Evangelium in Cyrillic characters (A. D. 1056). The first printed portion was an edition of the Gospels in Wallachia (1512); in 1575 the same portion was printed at Wilna; and in 1581 the whole Bible was printed at Ostrog in Volhynia. The general text is such as would have been expected in the 9th century; so some readings from the Latin have, it appears, been introduced in places.

(10) Syriac versions. (1) OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. 1. From the Hebrew. In the early times of Syrian Christianity there was executed a version from the Old Testament of the original Hebrew, the use of which must have been widely extended among those professing the Christian religion among that people.

(a) Name. Ephraem the Syrian, in the latter half of the 4th century, gives abundant proof of its use in general by his countrymen. When he calls it our version it does not appear to be in opposition to any other Syriac translation, but in contrast to the original Hebrew text, or to those in other languages. At a later period this Syriac translation was designated Peshito (Simple). It is probable that this name was applied to the version after another had been formed from the Hexaplar Greek text.

(b) Date. This translation from the Hebrew has always been the ecclesiastical version of the Syrians. Its existence and use prior to the divisions of the Syrian churches is sufficiently proved by Ephraem alone. It is highly improbable that any part of the Syriac version is older than the advent of our Lord; those who placed it under Abgarus, king of Edessa, seem to have argued on the account that the Syrian people then received Christianity. All that the account shows clearly is, that it was believed to belong to the earliest period of the Christian faith among them. Ephraem, in the 4th century, not only shows that it was then current, but also gives the impression that this had even then been long the case. For in his commentaries he gives explanations of terms which were even then obscure. This might have been from age; if so, the version was made comparatively long before his days; or it might be from its having been in a dialect different from that to which he was accustomed at Edessa. In this case, then, the translation was made in some other part of Syria. Probably the origin of the old Syriac version is to be compared with that of the old Latin; and that it differed as much from the polished language of Edessa as did the old Latin, made in the African province, from the contemporary writers of Rome. The old Syriac has the peculiar value of being the first version from the Hebrew original made for Christian use.

(c) Origin and history. The proof that this version was made from the Hebrew is twofold;

we have the direct statements of Ephraem, and we find the same thing as evident from the internal examination of the version itself. The first printed edition of this version was that which appeared in the Paris Polyglot of Le Jay in 1645; it is said that the editor, Gabriel Sionita, a Maronite, had only an imperfect manuscript. In Walton's Polyglot, 1657, the Paris text is reprinted, but with the addition of the Apocryphal books which had been wanting. In the punctuation given in the polyglots a system was introduced which was in part a peculiarity of Gabriel Sionita himself. Dr. Lee collated for the text which he edited for the Bible Society six Syriac manuscripts of the Old Testament in general, and a very ancient copy of the Pentateuch; he also used in part the commentaries of Ephraem and of Bar-Hebræus. From these various sources he constructed his text, with the aid of that found already in the polyglots. But we now have in the manuscript treasures brought from the Nitrian valleys, the means of far more accurately editing this version. It has been much discussed whether this translation were a Jewish or a Christian work. There need be no reasonable objection made to the opinion that it is a Christian work.

(d) Relation to other texts. It may be said that the Syriac in general supports the Hebrew text that we have. A resemblance has been pointed out between the Syriac and the reading of some of the Chaldee Targums. If the Targum is the older, it is not unlikely that the Syriac translator examined the Targums in difficult passages. If existing Targums are more recent than the Syriac, it may happen that their coincidences arise from the use of a common source—an earlier Targum. But there is another point of inquiry of more importance; it is, how far has this version been affected by the LXX. and to what are we to attribute this influence? It is possible that the influence of the LXX. is partly to be ascribed to copyists and revisers; while in part this belonged to the version as originally made. When the extensive use of the LXX. is remembered, and how soon it was superstitiously imagined to have been made by direct inspiration, so that it was deemed canonically authoritative, we cannot feel wonder that readings from the LXX. should have been from time to time introduced. Some comparison with the Greek is probable even before the time of Ephraem; for, as to the Apocryphal books, while he cites some of them (though not as Scripture), the Apocryphal additions to Daniel and the Books of Maccabees were not yet found in Syriac. Whoever translated any of these books from the Greek may easily have also compared with it in some place the books previously translated from the Hebrew.

(e) Recensions. In the Book of Psalms this version exhibits many peculiarities. Either the translation of the Psalter must be a work independent of the Peshito in general, or else it has been strangely revised and altered, not only from the Greek, but also from liturgical use. It is stated that, after the divisions of the Syrian Church, there were revisions of this one version by the Monophysites and by the Nestorians. The Karkaphensis recension mentioned by Bar-Hebræus was only known by name prior to the investigations of Wiseman. It is found in two manuscripts in the Vatican, and was formed for the use of Monophysites.

2. The Syriac version from the Hexaplar Greek text. The only Syriac version of the Old Testament up to the 6th century was apparently the Peshito. Moses Aghelæus, who lived in the middle of the 6th century, speaks of the versions of the New Testament and the Psalter, "which Polycarp (rest his soul!), the chorepiscopus, made in Syriac for the faithful Xenaias, the teacher of Mabug, worthy of the memory of the good." It is said that the Nestorian patriarch, Marabba, A. D. 552, made a version from the Greek. The version by Paul of Tela, a Monophysite, was made in the beginning of the 7th century; for its basis he used the Hexaplar Greek text—i. e., the LXX., with the corrections of Origen, the asterisks, obeli, etc., and with the references to the other Greek versions. The Syro-Hexaplar version was made on the principle of following the Greek, word for word, as exactly as possible. It contains the marks introduced by Origen; and the references to the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, etc. In fact, it is from this Syriac version that we obtain our most accurate acquaintance with the results of the critical labors of Origen. It is from a manuscript in the Ambrosian library at Milan that we possess accurate means of knowing this Syriac version. This manuscript contains the Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, minor prophets, Jeremiah, Baruch, Daniel, Ezekiel, and Isaiah.

(2) SYRIAC NEW TESTAMENT VERSIONS. (a) The Peshito Syriac. It may stand as an admitted fact that a version of the New Testament in Syriac existed in the 2d century; and it seems equally certain that in the 4th century such a version was as well known of the New Testament as of the Old. To the translation in common use among the Syrians—orthodox, Monophysite, or Nestorian—from the 5th century and onward, the name of Peshito has been as commonly applied in the New Testament as the Old. There seem to be but few notices of the old Syriac version in the early writers. In 1552 Moses of Mardin came to Rome to Pope Julius III, commissioned by Ignatius the Jacobite (Monophysite) patriarch, to state his religious opinions, to affect (it is said) a union with the Romish Church, and to get the Syriac New Testament printed.

In this last object he failed both at Rome and Venice, but was successful at Vienna. Widmanstadt, chancellor of Ferdinand I, had studied Syriac many years before, and through his influence the emperor undertook the charge of an edition, which appeared in 1555, through the joint labors of Widmanstadt, Moses, and Postell. The lexicon which accompanies this edition is of great value. Later editions are those of Professor Lee (1816); Mr. William Greenfield (1828), published by Messrs. Bagster. It appears probable that the New Testament of the Peshito is not from the same hand as the Old.

This Syriac version has been variously estimated. Some have thought that in it they had a genuine and unaltered monument of the 2d or perhaps even of the 1st century. They naturally upheld it as almost coordinate in authority with the Greek text, and as being of a period anterior to any Greek copy extant. Others, finding in it indubitable marks of a later age, were inclined to deny that it had any claim to a very remote antiquity. It appears probable that the New Testament of the Peshito is not from the same hand as the Old. Not only may Michaelis be right in supposing a peculiar translator of the Epistle to the Hebrews, but also other parts may be from different hands; this opinion will become more general the more the version is studied.

(b) The Curetonian Syriac gospels. Among the manuscripts brought from the Nitrian monasteries in 1842, Dr. Cureton noticed a copy of the gospels differing greatly from the common text; and to this the name of Curetonian Syriac has been rightly applied. Every criterion which proves the common Peshito not to exhibit a text of extreme antiquity equally proves the early origin of this. Dr. Cureton considers that the manuscript of the gospels is of the 5th century, in which competent judges are agreed. The manuscript contains Matt. 1-8:22; 10:31-23:25; Mark (the last four verses only); Luke 2:48-3:16; 7:33-15:21; 17:24-24:41; John 1:1-42; 3:6-7:37; 14:11-29.

In examining the Curetonian text with the common printed Peshito we often find such identity of phrase and rendering as to show that they were not wholly independent translations. Then again we meet with such variety in the forms of words, etc., as seem to indicate that in the Peshito the phraseology had been revised and refined. But the great (it might be said characteristic) difference between the Curetonian and the Peshito gospels is in their readings; for while the latter cannot in its present state be deemed an unchanged production of the 2d century, the former bears all the marks of extreme antiquity, even though in places it may have suffered from the introduction of readings current in very early times.

(c) The Philoxenian Syriac version, and its revision by Thomas of Harkel. Philoxenus, or Xenaias, a Monophysite, Bishop of Hierapolis or Mabug at the beginning of the 6th century, caused Polycarp, his chorepiscopus, to make a new translation of the New Testament into Syriac. This was executed in A. D. 508, and it is generally termed Philoxenian from its promoter. This version has not been transmitted to us in the form in which it was first made; we only possess a revision of it, executed by Thomas of Harkel in the following century (The Gospels, A. D. 616). From the subscriptions we learn that the text was revised by Thomas with three (some copies say two) Greek manuscripts. In describing this version as it has come down to us, the text is the first thing to be considered. This is characterized by extreme literalness: the Syriac idiom is constantly bent to suit the Greek, and everything is in some manner expressed in the Greek phrase and order. As to the kind of Greek text that it represents, it is just what might have been expected in the 6th century.

(d) Syriac versions of portions wanting in the Peshito. These are the Second Epistle of Peter, Second and Third of John, Jude, the Apocalypse, John 8:1-11.

(c) The Jerusalem Syriac Lectionary. The manuscript in the Vatican containing this version was written in A. D. 1031 in peculiar Syriac writing; the portions are of course those for the different festivals; the dialect is not common Syriac.

(11) Targum (Heb. תרגום, tar-goom', a translation, interpretation), the name given to a Chaldee, or, more accurately, Aramaic version of the Old Testament, of which there are several extant.

Moses commanded that at the end of every seven years, in the Feast of Tabernacles, the law should be read in the hearing of all Israel (Deut. 31:10-13). How far the ordinance was observed in early times we have no means of judging. It would appear that such readings did take place in the days of Jeremiah. After the exile Ezra commanded that the law should be read "before the congregation, both men and women" (Neh. 8: 2, 8), with the addition of an oral paraphrase in the Chaldee dialect. This ecclesiastical usage, rendered necessary by the change of language consequent on the captivity, was undoubtedly continued in aftertimes. The office of interpreter thus became one of the most important, and the canon of the Talmud, that as the law was given by a mediator, so it can be read and expounded only by a mediator, became paramount. Both translation and explanation were designated by the term Targum. In the course of time there sprang up a guild, whose special office it was to act as interpreters, while formerly the learned alone volunteered their services. These interpreters were subjected to certain bonds and regulations as to the form and substance of their renderings.

Again, certain passages liable to give offense to the multitude are specified, which may be read in the synagogue and translated; others, which may be read but not translated, others, again, which may be neither read nor translated. Altogether these interpreters (Meturgemanim) do not seem to have been held generally in very high respect, one of the reasons being probably that they were paid, and thus made the Torah "a spade to dig with it." The same causes which, after many centuries of oral transmission of the whole body of the traditional law, engendered also, and about the same period, as it would appear, written Targums—for certain portions of the Bible, at least. The fear of the adulterations and mutilations which the divine word, amid the troubles within and without the commonwealth, must undergo at the hands of incompetent or impious exponents, broke through the rule that the Targum should only be oral, lest it might acquire undue authority. The gradual growth of the code of the written Targum, such as now embraces almost the whole of the Old Testament, is shrouded in deep obscurity. The Targums now extant are:

(1) THE TARGUM OF ONKELOS ON THE PENTATEUCH. (a) Authorship, etc. Onkelos is the same name as Aquila, the Greek translator of the Old Testament; and the Targum was so called because the new Chaldee version was started under the name which had become expressive of the type and ideal of a Bible translation; so that, in fact, it was a Targum done in the manner of Aquila—Aquila-

Targum. Still others dissent, and identify Onkelos and Aquila as the same person. With regard to the date, the Targum was begun to be committed to writing about the end of the 2d century A. D. So far, however, from its superseding the oral Targum at once, it was, on the contrary, strictly forbidden to read it in public. Nor was there any uniformity in the version. Down to the middle of the 2d century we find the masters most materially differing from each other with respect to the Targum of certain passages, and translations quoted not to be found in any of our Targums. We shall not be far wrong in placing the work of collecting the different fragments with their variants, and reducing them into one—finally authorized version—about the end of the 3d or the beginning of the 4th century, and in assigning Babylon to it as the birthplace.

(b) Style, etc. We now turn to the Targum itself. Its language is Chaldee, closely approaching in purity of idiom to that of Ezra and Daniel. It follows a sober and clear, though not a slavish exegesis, and keeps as closely and minutely to the text as is at all consistent with its purpose, viz., to be chiefly, and above all, a version for the people. Its explanations of difficult and obscure passages bear ample witness to the competence of those who gave it its final shape and infused into it a rare unity. It avoids the legendary character with which all the later Targums entwine the biblical word as far as ever circumstances would allow. Only in the poetical passages it was compelled to yield—though reluctantly—to the popular craving for Haggadah; but even here it chooses and selects with rare taste and tact. In spite of its many and important discrepancies, the Targum never for one moment forgets its aim of being a clear though free translation for the people, and nothing more. Wherever it deviates from the literalness of the text, such a course, in its case, is fully justified—nay, necessitated—either by the obscurity of the passage or the wrong construction that naturally would be put upon its wording by the multitude. The explanations given agree either with the real sense, or develop the current traditions supposed to underlie it. As to the Bible text from which the Targum was prepared, we have no certainty whatever on this head, owing to the extraordinary corrupt state of our Targum texts.

(2) TARGUM ON THE PROPHETS—viz., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets—called TARGUM OF JONATHAN BEN UZZIEL. We shall probably not be far wrong in placing this Targum some time, although not long, after Onkelos, or about the middle of the 4th century, the latter years of R. Joseph, who, it is said, occupied himself chiefly with the Targum when he had become blind. This Targum may fairly be described as holding, in point of interpretation and enlargement of the text, the middle place between Onkelos, who only in extreme cases deviates into paraphrase, and the subsequent Targums, whose connection with their texts is frequently of the most flighty character.

(3 AND 4) TARGUM OF JONATHAN-BEN-UZZIEL AND JERUSHALMI-TARGUM ON THE PENTATEUCH. Onkelos and Jonathan on the Pentateuch and Prophets, whatever be their exact date, place, authorship, and editorship, are the oldest of existing Targums, and belong, in their present shape, to Babylon and the Babylonian academies flourishing between the 3d and 4th centuries A. D. The one which extends from the first verse of Genesis to the last of Deuteronomy is known under the name of Targum Jonathan (ben Uzziel), or Pseudo-Jonathan, on the Pentateuch. The other, interpreting single verses, often single words only, is extant in the following proportions: a third on Genesis, a fourth on Deuteronomy, a fifth on Numbers, three twentieths on Exodus, and about one fourteenth on Leviticus. The latter is generally called Targum Jerushalmi, or, down to the 11th century (Hai Gaon, Chananel), Targum Erets Israel, Targum of Jerusalem, or of the Land of Israel. Not before the first half of this century did the fact become fully and incontestably established that both Targums were in reality one—that both were known down to the 14th century under no other name than Targum Jerushalmi—and that some forgetful scribe, about that time, must have taken the abbreviation װײַן (T. J.) over one of the two documents, and, instead of dissolving it into Targum-Jerushalmi, dissolved it erroneously into what he must till then have been engaged in copying, viz., Targum-Jonathan, scribe ben Uzziel (on the Prophets).

(5) TARGUMS OF JOSEPH THE BLIND ON THE HAGIOGRAPHA. These Targums on the Hagiographa which we now possess have been attributed vaguely to different authors, it being assumed in the first instance that they were the work of one man. Popular belief fastened upon Joseph the Blind. Yet, if ever he did translate the Hagiographa, certain it is that those which we possess are not by his or his disciples' hand, i. e., of the time of the 4th century. Between him and our hagiographical Targums, many centuries must have elapsed.

(6) TARGUM ON THE BOOK OF CHRONICLES. This Targum was unknown up to a very recent period. In 1680 it was edited for the first time from an Erfurt manuscript by M. F. Beck, and in 1715 from a more complete as well as correct manuscript at Cambridge, by D. Wilkins. The name of Hungary occurring in it, and its frequent use of the Jerusalem-Targum to the Pentateuch, amounting sometimes to simple copying, show sufficiently that its author is neither "Jonathan b. Uzziel" nor "Joseph the Blind," as has been suggested. But the language, style, and the Haggadah, with which it abounds, point to a late period and to Palestine as the place where it was written. Its use must be limited to philological, historical, and geographical studies.

(7) THE TARGUM TO DANIEL. It is for the first time that this Targum is here formally introduced into the regular rank and file of Targums, although it has been known for now more than five-and-twenty years. Munk found it, not indeed in the original Aramaic, but in what appears to him to be an extract of it written in Persian.

(8) There is also a Chaldee translation extant of the Apocryphal pieces of Esther.

(12) Vulgate. The popular name given to the common Latin version of the Bible, usually attributed to Jerome. This version should have a deep interest for all the Western churches. For many centuries it was the only Bible generally used; and, directly or indirectly, it is the real parent of all the vernacular versions of western Europe. The Gothic version of Ulphilas alone is independent of it. In the age of the Reformation the Vulgate was rather the guide than the source of the popular versions. That of Luther (N. T., in 1523) was the most important, and in this the Vulgate had great weight. From Luther the influence of the Latin passed to our own Authorized Version. But the claims of the Vulgate to the attention of scholars rest on wider grounds. It is not only the source of our current theological terminology, but it is, in one shape or other, the most important early witness to the text and interpretation of the whole Bible.

(1) NAME. The name Vulgate, which is equivalent to Vulgata editio (the current text of Holy Scripture), has necessarily been used differently in various ages of the Church. There can be no doubt that the phrase originally answered to the $\text{\kappa\omicron\iota\nu\eta\ \epsilon\kappa\delta\omicron\varsigma\iota\varsigma}$ of the Greek Scriptures. In this sense it is used constantly by Jerome in his Commentaries. In some places Jerome distinctly quotes the Greek text; but generally he regards the old Latin, which was rendered from the LXX., as substantially identical with it, and thus introduces Latin quotations under the name of the LXX. or Vulgata editio. In this way the transference of the name from the current Greek text to the current Latin text became easy and natural. Yet more: as the phrase $\text{\kappa\omicron\iota\nu\eta\ \epsilon\kappa\delta\omicron\varsigma\iota\varsigma}$ came to signify an uncorrected (and so corrupt) text, the same secondary meaning was attached to Vulgata editio. Thus in some places the Vulgata editio stands in contrast with the true Hexaplaric text of the LXX. This use of the text Vulgata editio to describe the LXX. (and the Latin version of the LXX.) was continued to later times. As a general rule the Latin fathers speak of Jerome's version as "our" version (nostra editio, nostri codices).

(2) THE OLD LATIN VERSIONS. (a) Origin. The history of the earliest Latin version of the Bible is lost in complete obscurity. All that can be affirmed with certainty is that it was made in Africa. During the first two centuries the Church of Rome was essentially Greek. The same remark holds true of Gaul; but the Church of North Africa seems to have been Latin-speaking from the first. At what date this Church was founded is uncertain. It is from Tertullian that we must seek the earliest testimony to the existence and character of the Old Latin (Vetus Latina). On the first point the evidence of Tertullian, if candidly examined, is decisive. He distinctly recognizes the general currency of a Latin version of the New Testament, though not necessarily of every book at present included in the canon. This was characterized by a "rudeness" and "simplicity" which seems to point to the nature of its origin. The version of the New Testament appears to have arisen from individual and successive efforts; and the work of private hands would necessarily be subject to revision for ecclesiastical use. The separate books would be united in a volume, and thus a standard text of the whole collection would be established. With regard to the Old Testament the case is less clear. It is probable that the Jews who were settled in North Africa were confined to the Greek towns; otherwise it might be supposed that the Latin version of the Old Testament is in part anterior to the Christian era, and that (as in the case of Greek) a preparation for a Christian Latin dialect was already made when the Gospel was introduced into Africa. However this may have been, the substantial similarity of the different parts of the Old and New Testaments establishes a real connection between them, and justifies the belief that there was one popular Latin version of the Bible current in Africa in the last quarter of the 2d century.

(b) Canon. With regard to the African canon of the New Testament the old version offers important evidence. From considerations of style and language it seems certain that the Epistle to the Hebrews, James, and Second Peter did not form part of the original African version. In the Old Testament, on the other hand, the Old Latin erred by excess and not by defect.

(c) Revision. After the translation once received a definite shape in Africa, which could not have been long after the middle of the 2d century, it was not publicly revised. The old text was jealously guarded by ecclesiastical use, and was retained there at a time when Jerome's version was elsewhere almost universally received. In the Old Testament the version was made from the unrevised edition of the LXX. But while the earliest Latin version was preserved generally unchanged in North Africa, it fared differently in Italy. There the provincial rudeness of the version was necessarily more offensive. In the 4th century a definite ecclesiastical recension (of the gospels at least) appears to have been made in North Italy by reference to the Greek, which was distinguished by the name of Itala. The Itala appears to have been made in some degree with authority: other revisions were made for private use, in which such changes were introduced as suited the taste of scribe or critic. The next stage in the deterioration of the text was the intermixture of these various revisions.

(d) The labors of Jerome. At the close of the 4th century the Latin texts of the Bible current in the Western Church had fallen into the greatest corruption. The evil was yet greater in prospect than at the time; for the separation of the East and West was growing imminent. But in the crisis of danger the great scholar was raised up which probably alone, for fifteen hundred years, possessed the qualifications necessary for producing an original version of the Scriptures for the use of the Latin churches. Jerome (Eusebius Hieronymus) was born, A. D. 329, at Stridon, in Dalmatia, and died at Bethlehem A. D. 420. After long and self-denying studies in the East and West, Jerome went to Rome A. D. 382, probably at the request of Damasus, the pope, to assist in an important synod. His active biblical labors date from this epoch, and in examining them it will be convenient to follow the order of time, noticing (1) the revision of the old Latin version of the New Testament; (2) the revision of the old Latin version (from the Greek) of the Old Testament; (3) the new version of the Old Testament from the Hebrew.

Jerome had not been long in Rome (A. D. 383), when Damasus applied to him for a revision of the current Latin version of the New Testament by the help of the Greek original. "There were," he says, "almost as many forms of text as copies." The gospels had naturally suffered most. Jerome therefore applied himself to these first. But his aim was to revise the old Latin, and not to make a new version. Yet, although he proposed to himself this limited object, the various forms of corruption which had been introduced were, as he describes, so numerous that the difference of the old and revised (Hieronymian) text is throughout clear and striking. Some of the changes which Jerome introduced were made purely on linguistic grounds, but it is impossible to ascertain on what principle he proceeded in this respect. Others involved questions of interpretation. But the greater number consisted in the removal of the interpolations by which the synoptic gospels especially were disfigured. This revision, however, was hasty.

Jerome next undertook the revision of the Old Testament from the LXX. About the same time (about A. D. 383) at which he was engaged on the revision of the New Testament, Jerome undertook also a first revision of the Psalter. This he made by the help of the Greek, but the work was not very complete or careful. This revision obtained the name of the Roman Psalter, probably because it was made for the use of the Roman Church at the request of Damasus. In a short time "the old error prevailed over the new correction," and at the urgent request of Paula and Eustochium Jerome commenced a new and more thorough revision (Gallican Psalter). The exact date at which this was made is not known, but it may be fixed with great probability very shortly after A. D. 387, when he retired to Bethlehem, and certainly before 391, when he had begun his new translations from the Hebrew. In the new revision Jerome attempted to represent as far as possible, by the help of the Greek versions, the real reading of the Hebrew. This new edition soon obtained a wide popularity. Gregory of Tours is said to have introduced it from Rome into the public services in France, and from this it obtained the name of the Gallican Psalter. Numerous manuscripts remain which contain the Latin Psalter in two or more forms. From the second (Gallican) revision of the Psalms Jerome appears to have proceeded to a revision of the other books of the Old Testament, restoring all, by the help of the Greek, to a general conformity with the Hebrew. The revised texts of the Psalter and Job have alone been preserved; but there is no reason to doubt that Jerome carried out his design of revising all the "canonical Scriptures." He speaks of this work as a whole in several places, and distinctly represents it as a Latin version of Origen's Hexaplar text, if, indeed, the reference is not to be confined to the Psalter, which was the immediate subject of discussion. But though it seems certain that the revision was made, there is very great difficulty in tracing its history.

The next work of Jerome was the translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew. This version was not undertaken with any ecclesiastical sanction, as the revision of the gospels was, but at the urgent request of private friends, or from his own sense of the imperious necessity of the work. Its history is told in the main in the prefaces to the several installments which were successively published. The Books of Samuel and Kings were issued first, and to these he prefixed the famous Prologus galeatus, addressed to Paula and Eustochium, in which he gives an account of the Hebrew canon. At the time when this was published (about A. D. 391-392) other books seem to have been already translated; and in 393 the sixteen prophets were in circulation, and Job had lately been put into the hands of his most intimate friends. Indeed, it would appear that already in 392 he had in some sense completed a version of the Old Testament; but many books were not completed and published till some years afterward. The next books which he put into circulation, yet with the provision that they should be confined to friends, were Ezra and Nehemiah, which he translated at the request of Dominica and Rogatianus, who had urged him to the task for three years. This was probably in the year 394, for in the preface he alludes to his intention of discussing a question which he treats in Ep. lvii, written in 395. In the preface to the Chronicles he alludes to the same epistle as "lately written," and these books may therefore be set down for that year. The three books of Solomon followed (A. D. 398), having been "the work of three days," when he had just recovered from the effects of a severe illness. The Octateuch (i. e., Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and Esther) was probably issued after A. D. 400. The remaining books were completed at the request of Eustochius, shortly after the death of Paula (A. D. 404).

Thus the present Vulgate contains elements which belong to every period and form of the Latin version: (1) Unrevised old Latin: Wisdom, Eccclus., 1 and 2 Macc., Baruch. (2) Old Latin revised from the LXX: Psalter. (3) Jerome's free translation from the original text: Judith, Tobit. (4) Jerome's translation from the original: Old Testament except Psalter. (5) Old Latin revised from manuscripts: Gospels. (6) Old Latin cursorily revised: the remainder of New Testament.

(e) Revision of Alcuin. Meanwhile the text of the different parts of the Latin Bible were rapidly deteriorating, the simultaneous use of the old and new versions necessarily leading to great corruptions of both texts. Mixed texts were formed according to the taste or judgment of scribes, and the confusion was further increased by changes introduced by those having some knowledge of the Greek. The growing corruption, which could not be checked by private labor, attracted the attention of Charlemagne, who intrusted to Alcuin (about A. D. 802) the task of revising the Latin text for public use. This Alcuin appears to have done simply by the use of manuscripts of the Vulgate, and not by reference to the original texts. Alcuin's revision probably contributed much toward preserving a good Vulgate text. The best manuscripts of his recension do not differ widely from the pure Hieronymian text, and his authority must have done much to check the spread of the interpolations which reappear afterward, and which were derived from the intermixture of the old and new versions. But the new revision was gradually deformed, though later attempts at correction were made by Lanfranc of Canterbury (A. D. 1089), Cardinal Nicolaus (A. D. 1150), and the Cistercian abbot Stephanus (about A. D. 1150).

HISTORY OF THE PRINTED TEXT. Early editions. It was a noble omen for the future of printing that the first book which issued from the press was the Bible; and the splendid pages of the Mazarin Vulgate (Mainz: Gutenberg and Fust) stand yet unsurpassed by the latest efforts of typography. This work is referred to about the year 1455, and presents the common text of the 16th century. Other editions followed in rapid succession. The first collection of various readings appears in a Paris edition of 1504, and others followed at Venice and Lyons in 1511, 1513; but Cardinal Ximenes (1502-17) was the first who seriously revised the Latin text, to which he assigned the middle place of honor in his polyglot between the Hebrew and Greek texts. This was followed in 1528 (2d edition, 1532) by an edition of R. Stephens. About the same time various attempts were made to correct the Latin from the original texts (Erasmus, 1516; Pagninus, 1518-28; Cardinal Cajetanus; Steuchius, 1529; Clarius, 1542), or even to make a new Latin version (Jo. Campensis, 1533). A more important edition of R. Stephens followed in 1540, in which he made use of twenty manuscripts, and introduced considerable alterations into his former text. In 1541 another edition was published by Jo. Benedictus at Paris, which was based on the collation of manuscripts and editions, and was often reprinted afterward. Vercellone speaks much more highly of the Biblia Ordinaria, with glosses, etc., published at Lyons, 1545, as giving readings in accordance with the oldest manuscripts, though the sources from which they are derived are not given.

(f) The Sixtine and Clementine Vulgates. The first session of the Council of Trent was held on December 13, 1545. After some preliminary arrangements the Nicene Creed was formally promulgated as the foundation of the Christian faith on February 4, 1546, and then the council proceeded to the question of the authority, text, and interpretation of Holy Scripture. A committee was appointed to report upon the subject, which held private meetings from February 20 to March 17. Considerable varieties of opinion existed as to the relative value of the original and Latin texts, and the final decree was intended to serve as a compromise. In affirming the authority of the "old Vulgate" it contains no estimate of the value of the original texts. A papal board was engaged upon the work of revision, but it was currently reported that the difficulties of publishing an authoritative edition were insuperable. Nothing further was done toward the revision of the Vulgate under Gregory XIII, but preparations were made for an edition of the LXX. This appeared in 1587, in the second year of the pontificate of Sixtus V, who had been one of the chief promoters of the work. After the publication of the LXX. Sixtus immediately devoted himself to the production of an edition of the Vulgate. He himself revised the text, and when the work was printed he examined the sheets with the utmost care, and corrected the errors with his own hand. The edition appeared in 1590, with the famous constitution Aeternus ille (dated March 1, 1589) prefixed, in which Sixtus affirmed with characteristic decision the plenary authority of the edition for all future time. He further forbade expressly the publication of various readings in copies of the Vulgate. Upon the accession of Gregory XIV, a commission was appointed to revise the Sixtine text, under the presidency of the Cardinal Colonna (Columna). At first the commissioners made but slow progress, and it seemed likely that a year would elapse before the revision was completed. The mode of proceeding was therefore changed, and the commission moved to Zagorolo, the country seat of Colonna; and, if we may believe the inscription which still commemorates the event, and the current report of the time, the work was completed in nineteen days. The task was hardly finished when Gregory died (October, 1591), and the publication of the revised text was again delayed. His successor, Innocent IX, died within the same year, and at the beginning of 1592 Clement VIII was raised to the papedom. Clement intrusted the final revision of the text to Toletus, and the whole was printed by Aldus Manutius (the grandson) before the end of 1592.

2. Modern Versions. In the English language see Bib. Dict., p. 150, sq.

The number of versions of Scriptures in whole or in parts has greatly increased of late years. The American Bible Society made an exhibit at the World's Columbian Exposition in 1893 of two hundred and forty-two languages and dialects in which the Bible has been printed in whole or in part, and circulated. These versions were arranged in the following groups:

(1) The languages of the British Isles. English, Gaelic (Highlands of Scotland), Irish, Irish (Roman characters), Manx (Isle of Man), Welsh; total, 6.

(2) The Continent of Europe. Breton (Britany), French, French Basque (Pyrrhenees), Spanish, Catalan (Eastern Spain), Spanish Basque, Spanish Basque (Guipuscoan dialect), Gitano (Spanish Gypsies), Portuguese, Icelandic, Norwegianian, Swedish, Norway-Lapponee (or Quanian), Lapponee, Russ Lapp, Finnish, Dutch, Flemish, German, German (Hebrew), Lithuanian, Polish, Polish (Hebrew), Upper Wendish (Lusatia), Lower Wendish (Lusatia), Bohemian, Hungarian, Hungarian-Wendish (Wends in Hungary), Slovenian, Latin, Italian, Romanese (Oberland, Switzerland), Romanese (Enghadine, Switzerland), Piedmontese, Vaudois (Waldenses, Northern Italy), Maltese, Greek (Ancient), Greek (Modern), Greek (Modern, Roman characters), Albanian (Ghez), Albanian (Tosk), Turkish (Arabic), Turkish (Greek characters), Turkish (Armenian), Spanish (Hebrew, for Spanish Jews in Turkey), Rouman (Roman characters, Danubian Provinces), Rouman (Cyril characters), Ruthenian (Little Russia), Servian, Croatian, Bulgarian, Slavonic, Russian, Esthonian (Reval, Russia), Esthonian (Dorpat), Lettish (Livonian), Karelian (Finland), Zirian or Siryenian (Finns about Vologda), Samogitian (Wilna, Mordvin), Tcheremissian (Finns on the Volga), Tchuwash (Volga); total, 62.

(3) Countries of Asia. Wotjak (Western Siberia), Wogul (Ural Mountains), Orenburg or Kirghise Tartar, Ossetinian (Caucasus), Hebrew, Armenian (Ancient), Armenian (Modern), Armenian (Ararat), Georgian, Koordish, Azerbaijan, Turkish Tartar or Karass (Astrakhan), Arabic, Arabic (Hebrew, Jews in Syria, Yemen, etc.), Arabic (Carshun, Mesopotamia, etc.), Syriac (Ancient), Syriac (Modern), Persian, Persian (Hebrew, Jews in Persia), Pushtoo or Afghan, Sanskrit, Urdu or Hindustani (Arabic), Urdu (Persian), Urdu (Roman), Bengali, Bengali (Roman), Mussulman-Bengali, Santali (Bengal), Moudari (Koles of Chota Nagpore), Lepcha, Orissa, Hindi or Hindui, Hindi (Kaithi), Sindhi (Arabic, West India), Sindhi (Gurumukhi), Moultan (or Wuch, or Ooch), Punjabi or Sikh, Gondi (Central India), Nepalese or Parbutti, Telugu (Southeast India), Canarese (Mysore), Singhalese (Ceylon), Pali, Tamil, Dakhani or Madras Hindustani, Malayalam (Travancore), Tulu (West of the Mysore), Marathi (Western India), Marathi (Modi), Gujerati, Parsi-Gujerati, Indo-Portuguese (colonies in Ceylon), Assamese, Khassi (Eastern India), Siamese, Peguese (Burmah), Burman, Karen (Burmah), Bghai-Karen, Sgau-Karen, Pwo-Karen, Tibetan, Malay, Malay (Roman), Low Malay or Soerabaya (Batavia), Dajak (Borneo), Javanese, Balinese (Dutch East Indies), Sundanese, Nias (island near Sumatra), Batta (Toba, Sumatra), Batta (Mandaheling), Chinese (Classical), Mandarin, Foochow (Colloquial), Ningpo (Colloquial), Roman, Swatow (Colloquial), Shanghai (Colloquial), Soochow (Colloquial), Amoy (Colloquial), Roman, Nanking (Colloquial), Canton (Colloquial), Shanghai (Colloquial, Roman), Swatow (Colloquial, Roman), Hakka (Colloquial, Roman), Canton (Colloquial, Roman), Calmuc (or Western Mongolian), Japanese, Chino-Japanese, Chino-Corean, Japanese (Roman), Manchu, Mongolian Literary, Mongolian (Colloquial), Mongolian (Buriat Colloquial); total, 94.

(4) The Islands. Malagasy (Madagascar), Nuriyeri (Australia), Maori (New Zealand), Neugone or Mare (Loyalty Isles), Lifu, Iaian, Aneityum (New Hebrides), Eromanga, Fate, Fiji, Rotuman, Tongan (Friendly Islands), Nieue, or Savage Island, Samoan (Navigator's Island), Rarotongan (Cook's Island), Tahitian (Society Islands), Marquesan, Ebon (Marshall Islands), Kusaian (Strong's Island), Gilbert Islands, Ponape (Ascension Island), Mortlock, Hawaiian (Sandwich Islands); total, 23.

(5) Africa. Ethiopic, Amharic (Abyssinia), Tigre (Abyssinia), Coptic (Egypt), Galla (South of Abyssinia), Kinika, Swahili (East Coast of Africa), Sechuana, Zulu, Otiyeherero, Kafr, Damara, Namaqua (these six in South Africa), Sesuto, Dualla, Ibo, Haussa, Nupé, Yoruba, Accra or Ga, Tshi or Twi, Mandingo, Mende, Temne, Benga, Grebo, Mpongwe, Dikele (all fourteen in West Africa), Galla (South of Abyssinia), Bullom (near Sierra Leone), Ewe (Gold Coast), Berber (North Africa); total, 32.

(6) America. Greenland, Esquimaux, Cree (Roman, British America), Cree, Micmac (Nova Scotia, Tinne (Hudson's Bay), Chippewayan, Tukudh (Loucheux Indians), Maliset (New Brunswick), Mohawk, Choctaw, Seneca, Dakota, Ojibwa, Muskokee, Cherokee, Delaware, Nez Perces (nine North American Indian tribes), Mayan (Yucatan), Mexican or Aztec, Negro-English (Surinam), Creolese (West Indies), Aymara (Peru), Arrawack (Guiana), Quichuan (Argentine); total, 25.

VERY. See GLOSSARY.

VESTRY (Heb. בֵּית הַכֹּהֵן, mel-taw-khaw', from an old root to spread out), the wardrobe of the temple of Baal (2 Kings 10:22). The priests of Baal, like those of almost all religions, had their sacred dresses (A. V. "vestments"), which were worn at the time of worship, and were kept in a wardrobe in the temple.

VESTURE. See GLOSSARY.

VEX. See GLOSSARY.

VIAL 1. Pak (Heb. בֹּקֶץ, from root to distil), a bottle or flask, as of oil (1 Sam. 10:1; "box" in 2 Kings 9:1, 3).

2. Fee-al-ay (Gr. φιάλη, Rev. 5:8, etc.), a bowl.

VICTUAL. The rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. See BANQUET; FOOD, etc.

VILLAGE, a collection of houses less regular and important than a town (q. v.) or city (q. v.). "Village," in the A. V., is the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words.

1. Kaw-fawr' (Heb. כַּפְר, protected, 1 Chron. 27:25; Cant. 7:11) is the proper Hebrew term for village. It appears also in the forms kef-eer' (כַּפְרִי, covered as by walls, Neh. 6:2), and ko'-fer (כּוֹפֵר, 1 Sam. 6:18), and is represented by the Arabic kefr, still so much used. In the Hebrew the prefix kaw-fawr' implied a regular village, as Capernaum, which had in later times, however, outgrown the limits implied by its original designation.

2. Khaw-tsare' (Heb. כְּסָר, inclosed) is properly an inclosure, as of farm buildings inclosing a court (Josh. 13:23, 28), the encampment of nomads (Gen. 25:16; Deut. 2:23, A. V. "Hazerim"), and of hamlets near towns (Josh. 15:32, sq.; 1 Chron. 4:35; Neh. 11:25), especially unwall'd suburbs of walled towns (Lev. 25:31; comp. v. 34).

3. Ko'-may (Gr. κώμη) is applied to Bethpage (Matt. 21:2), Bethany (Luke 10:38; John 11:1), Emmaus (Luke 24:13), Bethlehem (John 7:42). A distinction between city or town (πόλις) and village (κώμη) is pointed out in Luke 8:1.

4. Other terms are improperly rendered "village." Thus the plural of paw-rauz' (Heb. from פָּרַץ, to separate), rendered "villages" (Hab. 3:14), should be "captains," or "eminent men," i. e., men separated by their rank or prowess from the mass. In Judg. 5:7, 11, per-aw-zone' (Heb. פְּרִזִּים, properly rulers) is rendered "villages," and in Ezek. 38:11, per-aw-zoth' (Heb. פְּרִזֹּתַי) means "open country." See CITY; TOWN.

VILLAINY (Heb. בְּבִלְיָה, neb-aw-law', foolish- ness). In Isa. 32:6 "the vile person will speak villainy" may better be rendered "the fool speaks folly." In Jer. 29:23 "villainy" is wickedness in the practice of adultery.

VINE. 1. Names. The following Hebrew and Greek names denote the vine:

(1) Gheh'-fen (Heb. גֵּפֶן, twining), or more definitely, gheh'-fen hay-yah'-yeen (גֵּפֶן הַיָּהוּבָה, Gen. 40:9 and fifty-two other places).

(2) So-rake' (Heb. שֵׁרָק), or so-ray-kaw' (שֵׁרָקוֹ), is a term denoting some choice kind of vine (Jer. 2:21; Isa. 5:2; Gen. 49:11), thought to be the same as that now called in Morocco serki, and in Persia kishmish, with small round dark berries and soft stones.

(3) Naw-zeer' (Heb. נֵזֶרִי, unpruned) is an "undressed vine" (A. V., Lev. 25:5, 11), i. e., one which every seventh and every fiftieth year was not pruned.

(4) Am'-pel-os (Gr. ἀμπέλος), a generic word for vine.

2. Culture. The grapevine (Vitis vinifera) is supposed to be a native of the shores of the Caspian. Its culture "extends from about the twenty-first to the fiftieth degree of north latitude, and reaches from Portugal on the west to the confines of India on the east. It is, however, only along the center of this zone that the finest wines are made" (Hogg, Vegetable Kingdom, p. 181). Although Egypt is not now noted for its grapes, yet we find it mentioned early in Scripture (Gen. 40:9-11; Num. 20:5; Psa. 78:47). The Egyptians "trained their vines on a trelliswork, supported by transverse rafters resting on pillars; and a wall, extending round it, separated this part from the rest of the garden. Sometimes the orchard and vineyard were not separated by any wall, and figs and other trees were planted within the same limits as the vines. But if not connected with it, the vineyard was close to the orchard. . . . Some vines were allowed to grow as standing bushes, and, being kept low, did not require any support; others were formed into a series of bowers. . . . When the vineyard was inclosed within its own wall or circuit, it frequently had a reservoir of water attached to it, as well as the building which contained the winepress; but the various ways of arranging the vineyard, as well as the other parts of the garden, depended, of course, on the taste of each individual. . . . When the grapes were gathered the bunches were carefully put into deep wicker baskets, which men carried, either on their head or shoulders, or slung upon a yoke, to the winepress; but when intended for eating, they were put, like other fruits, into flat open baskets, and generally covered with the leaves of the palm, vine, or other trees" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., vol. 1, pp. 38-44).

Palestine, even before Israel took possession of it, was a land of vineyards (Deut. 6:11; 28:30; Num. 13:23); and Moses enacted rules and regulations for the culture of the vine, while their prospective owners still wandered in the desert (Exod. 22:5; 23:11; Lev. 25:5, 11; Num. 6:8; Deut. 22:9; 23:24; 24:21). For this culture the portion of Judah was especially adapted; and in obtaining for his inheritance the hilly slopes of the south, the prophecy of his ancestor was fulfilled, "He washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes" (Gen. 49:11). Here, more than elsewhere, are to be seen on the sides of the hills the vineyards, marked by their watchtowers (see TOWERS) and walls, seated on their ancient terraces—the earliest and latest symbol of Judah. The elevation of the hills and table-lands of Judah is the true climate of the vine, and at Hebron, according to the Jewish tradition, was its primeval seat. It was from the Judean valley of Eshcol—"the torrent of the cluster"—that the spies cut down the gigantic cluster of grapes. Although from many of its most famous haunts the vine has disappeared—e. g., from En-gedi—both in southern Palestine and on the slopes of Lebanon there are specimens sufficient to vindicate the old renown of this "land of vineyards." The grapes of Hebron are still considered the finest in the Holy Land. Bunches weighing from six to seven pounds are said to be by no means uncommon, and Sir Moses Montefiore said he saw one bunch at Hebron a yard long (Imp. Dict., s. v.).

3. Vineyard (Heb. כֶּרֶם, keh'-rem, garden; קִנְיָן, kan-naw', planted; Gr. ἀμπελών, am-pel-ohn'). "The preparation of a vineyard is the most costly and onerous of all the operations of that primitive husbandry in Eastern lands, the methods of which have remained unchanged and unimproved from the earliest times of which we possess any records. It is, in fact, the only branch of agriculture, as there practiced, which demands any considerable outlay. In the first place, the vineyard must be carefully inclosed by a permanent fence, which is required for no other crop. The pasture lands outside the villages are all unfenced, and the boundaries only marked by well-known stones or landmarks. The cornfields are equally open, or only protected by thorn branches strewn on the ground, while the olive yards nearer the town or village are equally unprotected. When the vineyard has been thus hedged, the next operation is to gather out the stones, not the small stones which strew all the hillsides, and are indispensable for the retention of moisture in the soil, but the larger boulders, which are heaped in long rows like a ruined stone wall. On these rows the vines are trailed, to preserve the fruit from damp. Next, there must be a wine press (q. v.) hewn out of the native rock; for the grapes are always pressed on the spot, lest they should be bruised and injured by conveyance to a distance. These wine presses, or vats, are the most imperishable records of the past in the deserted land. They are simply two parallel troughs, one above the other, with a perforated conduit between them. The bunches of grapes are thrown into the upper vat, where they are trodden, and the juice flows into the lower one. These 'wine fats,' found in abundance through the whole land, and even far into the southern desert, are silent witnesses to its former fertility. Then, unless the vineyard adjoins the village, there must be a temporary lodge, or booth, erected on poles; but, more generally, a permanent tower, of which many traces may still be seen, for the watchman, during the season, to guard the vintage from thieves or jackals" (Dr. H. B. Tristram, in S. S. Times).

4. Mosaic Regulations. It was contrary to the law to eat the fruit of a vineyard during the first three years after its planting. The fourth year all the fruit was holy to the Lord, "to praise the Lord withal." Only in the fifth year did the produce of the vines fall entirely to the owner's disposal (Lev. 19:23-25; comp. Mark 12:2). In later times, however, while it was still held wrong to eat during the first three years, the rule was greatly relaxed regarding the fourth year. Various markings were adopted whereby the passer-by might distinguish the three years' from the four years' vineyard, and so escape the peril of eating from the former. The proper "season" for claiming produce would therefore not come until the fifth year.

The vine in the Mosaic ritual was subject to the usual restrictions of the "seventh year" (Exod. 23:11), and the jubilee of the fiftieth year (Lev. 25:11). The gleanings were to be left for the poor and the stranger (Jer. 49:9; Deut. 24:21). The vineyard was not to be sown "with divers seed" (Deut. 22:9), but fig trees were sometimes planted in vineyards (Luke 13:6; comp. 1 Kings 4:25: "Every man under his vine and under his fig tree"). Persons passing through a vineyard were allowed to eat grapes therein, but not to carry any away (Deut. 23:24).

5. Vintage (Heb. בִּצְוֹר, baw-tseer', clipped). The vintage began in September, and was a time of general festivity. The towns were deserted, and the people lived in the vineyards—in lodges and tents (Judg. 9:27; Jer. 25:30; Isa. 16:10). The grapes were gathered with shouts of joy by the "grape gatherers" (Jer. 25:30), and put into baskets (6:9), and then carried to the wine press.

In Palestine at present the finest grapes, says Robinson, are dried as raisins, and the juice of the remainder, after having been trodden and pressed, is boiled down to a syrup, which, under the name of dibs (Heb. דִּבְסָ, dib-sa), is much used by all classes, wherever vineyards are found, as a condiment with their food. Even the leaves and the stocks of the vine are useful. The cuttings of the vine and the leaves are much used for manure to the vineyards. The leaves are also used as a vegetable, chopped meat and rice being rolled up together in single leaves, and boiled for the table, making a very agreeable dish. The leaves are also used for fodder, while the wood serves as fuel (Ezek. 15:3, 4; comp. John 15:6).

6. Figurative. The vine is a symbol; thus Israel was a vine brought from Egypt (Psa. 80:8; comp. Isa. 5:2, sq.). To dwell under one's vine and fig tree is an emblem of domestic happiness and peace (1 Kings 4:25; Psa. 128:3; Mic. 4:4). The rebellious people of Israel are compared to "wild grapes," "an empty vine," "the degenerate plant of a strange vine" (Isa. 5:2, 4; Jer. 2:21; Hos. 10:1). By the vine our Lord symbolizes the spiritual union existing between himself and believers (John 15:1-6), unfruitful branches being mere professors. The quick growth of the vine is a symbol of the growth of saints in grace (Hos. 14:7); its rich clusters, of the graces of the Church (Cant. 7:8); the worthlessness of its wood, of the unprofitableness of the wicked (Ezek. 15:2, 3, 6); a vine setting fruit, but not bringing it to maturity, is representative of Israel not answering the rightful expectations of Jehovah (Hos. 10:1). The vineyard is used as a figure of Israel (Isa. 5:7; 27:2; Jer. 12:10; comp. Matt. 21:33); while the failure of the vineyard is a symbol of severe calamities (Isa. 32:10); to plant vineyards and eat the fruit thereof is a figure of peaceful prosperity (Neh. 9:25; Isa. 65:21; Ezek. 28:26). See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

VINE OF SODOM. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

VINEGAR. See WINE.

VINEYARD. See VINE.

VINEYARDS, PLAIN OF THE (Heb. אַרְבַּל כֶּרְמִים, av-bale' ker-aw-meem), a place mentioned in Judg. 11:33 only; and possibly now represented by a ruin bearing the name of Beit el-Kerm—"house of the vine"—to the north of Kerak. Its situation cannot be definitely determined.

VINTAGE. See VINE.

VIOL. See MUSIC.

VIOLENCE. The rendering of two Hebrew and three Greek words:

1. Khav-mawce' (Heb. מַחֲרָץ, macharatz) has the sense of using violence, especially with evil intent (Gen. 6:11, 13; 49:5, A. V. "cruelty;" Psa. 18:48, A. V. "violent man").

2. Gaw-zal' (Heb. גָּזַל, gazal) has the meaning of to rob (Lev. 6:2; Job 20:19; 24:2), in which passages the sense is that of seizing another's property by fraud or injustice, especially of the rich and powerful who seize upon the possessions of the poor by fraud and force (Eccles. 5:8; Jer. 22:3; Ezek. 18:7, 12, 16, 18).

3. Bee'-ah (Gr. βία, vial activity), strength in violent action, force (Acts 5:26; 24:7). In Matt. 11:12, "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence" (ἡ βασιλεία τ. οὐρ. βιάσεται), carried by storm, i. e., a share in the heavenly kingdom is sought for with the most ardent zeal and the intensest exertion.

4. Doo'-nam-is (Gr. δύναμις, strength, ability) is used in the expression, "Quenched the violence of fire" (Heb. 11:34).

5. Dec-as-i'-o (Gr. διασεῖω, Luke 3:14), "do violence to no man," means to extort money, or other property, from one by intimidation.

VIPER. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

VIRGIN, the rendering of two Hebrew words and one Greek word:

1. Beth-oo-law' (Heb. בְּתוּלָה, separated) properly denotes a virgin, maiden (Gen. 24:16; Lev. 21:13; Deut. 22:14, 23, 28; Judg. 11:37; 1 Kings 1:2); the passage Joel 1:8 is not an exception, as it refers to the loss of one betrothed, not married.

2. Al-maw' (Heb. עַלְמוּה, veiled), a young woman of marriageable age (Gen. 24:43; Exod. 2:8; Psa. 68:25, A. V. "damsel"; Prov. 30:19; Cant. 1:3; 6:8; Isa. 7:14). "The primary idea of this word is not that of unspotted virginity, for which the Hebrews have the special word beth-oo-law' (בְּתוּלָה), but simply being of marriageable age, the age of puberty."

3. Par-then'-os (Gr. παρθένος, a virgin (Matt. 1:23; 25:1, 7, 11; Luke 1:27; Acts 21:9; 1 Cor. 7:25, 28, 33), i. e., either a marriageable maiden or a young married woman, a pure virgin (2 Cor. 11:2). In Rev. 14:4 it is used in the sense of a man who has abstained from all uncleanness and whoredom attendant upon idolatry, and so has kept his chastity.

Respecting the virginity of Mary, the mother of our Lord, see MARY.

VIRTUE (Gr. ἀρετή, ar-et'-ay, manliness; δύναμις, doo'-nam-is, power, strength). The first of these terms denotes a virtuous course of thought, feeling, and action, moral goodness (2 Pet. 1:5), any particular moral excellence, as modesty, purity (Phil. 4:8). The latter term indicates power, ability, and is often so rendered. In Mark 5:30; Luke 6:19; 8:46, it indicates the power of Christ to heal disease. See GLOSSARY.

VISION (some derivative of Heb. רָאוּ, khaw-zaw', to perceive; Gr. ὁράω, hor-ah'-o; or of ῥάω, raw-aw', to see; ὁπτομαι, op'-tom-ahēe), a supernatural presentation of certain scenery or circumstances to the mind of a person while awake (Num. 12:6-8). Balaam speaks of himself as having seen "the vision of the Almighty" (24:16). In the time of Eli it is said, "And the word of the Lord was precious in those days; there was no open vision" (1 Sam. 3:1), i. e., there was no public and recognized revelation of the divine will (comp. Prov. 29:18, "Where there is no vision the people perish"). See DREAM.

VISITATION (Heb. פְּקִידָה, pek-ood-daw'; Gr. ἐπισκοπή, ep-is-kop-ay'), inspection, is sometimes taken for a visit of mercy from God (Gen. 50:24; Exod. 13:19; Luke 1:68), but oftener for a visit of rigor and vengeance, or at least of close inspection (Exod. 32:34; Isa. 23:17; 1 Pet. 2:12).

VOCATION (Gr. κλήσις, klay'-sis, an invitation), a theological term signifying calling (Rom. 11:29; 1 Cor. 1:26; Eph. 1:18; 4:4; Phil. 3:14; 2 Thess. 1:11; 2 Tim. 1:9; Heb. 3:1; 2 Pet. 1:10).

The dominant idea is that God in his grace calls men to forsake a sinful life and to enter into the kingdom and service of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The long-standing point of controversy between Calvinistic and Arminian theologians relates to the character of this call, the former holding that there is an "external call" to all men, addressed indiscriminately to all men, while the "effectual call" is given only to those who by the divine decree are predestined to everlasting life, the latter refusing to recognize any such distinction.

Methodists and Arminians generally regard the divine call, under whatever external conditions it is made, as in every case one of thoroughly gracious reality, and so efficacious that if it is heeded the man is certain of salvation.

VOPHSI (Heb. וּפְסִי, vof-see', additional), the father of Nabhi, one of the explorers of Canaan (Num. 13:14).

VOW (Heb. from נָדַר, naw-dar, to promise; Gr. ἐπιχρῆ, yoo-khay', a prayer), defined as a religious undertaking, either, positive, to do something, or, negative, to abstain from doing a certain thing. Under the old covenant the principle of vowing was recognized as in itself a suitable expression of the religious sentiment, and as such was placed under certain regulations. It was not, except in a few special cases, imposed as an obligation on the individual conscience. The Lord never said, Thou shalt vow so and so; but, If thou shouldst make a vow, or when thou dost so, then let such and such conditions be observed. The conditions specified in the law related almost exclusively to the faithful performance of what had been freely undertaken by the worshiper—what he had pledged himself before God to render in active service or dedicated gifts. He was on no account to draw back from his pledged word, but conscientiously to carry it into effect, since otherwise a slight would manifestly be put upon God and a stain left upon the conscience of the worshiper (Deut. 23:21-23; Eccles. 5:5; Psa. 50:14; Nah. 1:15).

Mosaic Regulations. (1) A man could not devote to sacred uses the firstborn of man or beast, which was devoted already (Lev. 27:26); if he vowed land, he might redeem it or not (vers. 16, 20) (see REDEMPTION). (2) Animals fit for sacrifice, if devoted, were not to be redeemed or changed, and if a man attempted to do so he was required to bring both the devotee and the changing (27:9, 10, 33). They were to be free from blemish (Mal. 1:14). An animal unfit for sacrifice might be redeemed, with the addition to the priest's valuation of a fifth, or it became the property of the priests (Lev. 27:12, 13). (3) The case of persons stood thus: A man might devote either himself, his child (not the firstborn), or his slave. If no redemption took place, the devoted person became a slave of the sanctuary (2 Sam. 15:8) (see NAZARITE). Otherwise he might be redeemed at a valuation according to age and sex (Lev. 27:1-7). (4) General regulations. Vows were entirely voluntary, but once made were regarded as compulsory, and evasion of performance of them was held to be contrary to true religion (Num. 30:2; Deut. 23:21; Eccles. 5:4). If persons in a dependent condition made vows—as an unmarried daughter living in her father's house, or a wife, even if she afterward became a widow—the vow, if in the first case her father, or in the second her husband, heard and disallowed it, was void; but if they heard without disallowance, it was to remain good (Num. 30:3-16). Votive offerings arising from the profit of any impure traffic were wholly forbidden (Deut. 23:18).

Vows in general and their binding force as a test of religion are mentioned (Job 22:27; Psa. 22:25; 60:14; 66:13; 116:14; Prov. 7:14; Isa. 19:21; Nah. 1:15). See OATH.

WAGES. 1. Usually some form of Heb. שֶׂכָר (saw-kar', Gen. 31:8; Exod. 2:9; Ezek. 29:18, 19); elsewhere "hire," "reward," etc.

2. Mas-koh'-reth (Heb. מִסְכָּרְתָּ, Gen. 29:15; 31:41; Ruth 2:12, "reward").

3. Peh-ool-law' (Heb. פְּעֻלָּה, Lev. 19:13; Psa. 109:20, "reward").

4. Two Greek words are thus rendered: Misthos' (μισθός, John 4:36, elsewhere "reward," or "hire"); op-so'-nee-on (ὄψωνιον, Luke 3:14; 2 Cor. 11:8; Luke 6:23, "reward").

Wages, according to the earliest usages of mankind, are a return for something of value, specifically for work performed. Thus labor is recognized as property, and wages as the price paid or obtained in exchange for such property. The earliest mention of wages is of a recompense not in money, but in kind. This was given to Jacob by Laban (Gen. 29:15, 20; 31:7, 8, 41). Such payment was natural among a pastoral and changing population like that of the tent-dwellers of Syria. Burekhardt (Syria, p. 297) mentions a case in Syria resembling closely that of Jacob with Laban—a man who served eight years for his food, on condition of obtaining his master's daughter in marriage, and was afterward compelled by his father-in-law to perform acts of service for him. In Egypt money payments by way of wages were in use, but the terms cannot now be ascertained.

Among the Hebrews wages in general, whether of soldiers or laborers, are mentioned (Hag. 1:6; Ezek. 29:18, 19; John 4:36). The rate of wages is only mentioned in the parable of the householder and vineyard (Matt. 20:2) where the laborer's wages are given as one denarius per day (about sixteen cents), a rate which agrees with Tob. 5:14, where a drachma is mentioned as the rate per day, a sum which may be taken as fairly equivalent to the denarius, and to the usual pay of a soldier in the latter days of the Roman republic. In earlier times it is probable that the rate was lower. But it is likely that laborers, and also soldiers, were supplied with provisions. The Mosaic law was very strict in requiring daily payment of wages (Lev. 19:13; Deut. 25:14, 15). The employer who refused to give his laborers sufficient provisions was censured (Job 24:11), and the iniquity of withholding wages is denounced (Jer. 22:13; Mal. 3:5; James 5:4) (Smith). See SERVICE.

WAGON (Heb. עֲגָלָה, ag-aw-law', that which rolls or turns round, Gen. 45:19, 21, 27; 46:5; Num. 7:3, 6-8; רֶכֶב, reh' keb, Ezek. 23:24, elsewhere "chariot"). The oriental wagon, or arabah, is a vehicle composed of two or three planks, fixed on two solid circular blocks of wood, from two to five feet in diameter, which serve as wheels. To the floor are sometimes attached wings, which splay outward like the sides of a wheelbarrow. For the conveyance of passengers mattresses or clothes are laid in the bottom, and the vehicle is drawn by bullocks or oxen. The covered wagons for conveying the materials for the tabernacle were probably constructed on Egyptian models. Others of a lighter description, and more nearly approaching the modern cart, occur in the Assyrian monuments. Some of these have eight, others as many as twelve spokes in their wheels.

WAIL. See MOURNING.

WALK. Figurative. Walk is often used in Scripture for conduct in life, general demeanor, and deportment. Thus it is said that Enoch and Noah "walked with God," i. e., they maintained a course of action conformed to God's will and acceptable in his sight. In the Old and New Testaments we find God promising to walk with his people; and his people, on the other hand, desiring the influence of the Holy Spirit, that they may walk in his statutes. "To walk in darkness" (1 John 1:6, 7) is to be involved in unbelief and misled by error; "to walk in the light" (v. 7) is to be well informed, holy, and happy; "to walk by faith" (2 Cor. 5:7) may be rendered "through faith we walk," i. e., faith is the sphere through which we walk. "To walk after the flesh" (Rom. 8:1, 4; 2 Pet. 2:10) is to gratify the carnal desires, to yield to fleshly appetites, and to be obedient to the lusts of the flesh; while "to walk after the Spirit" (Gal. 5:16) is to be guided and aided by the Holy Spirit, the active and animating principle of the Christian life.

WALL (Heb. properly קִיר, keer, as a defense; or חוֹמָה, kho-maw', as a barrier; sometimes שָׂרַי, shoor, perhaps from its rocky character; various forms of גֹּרֵר, gaw-dar', to inclose; occasionally חֵיל, khale, from its strength; חֵיץ, khah'-yits, from its exterior position; שְׁרָיִם, khaw-roots', from its being dug, etc.; Gr. τειχος, ti'-khos; τοιχος, toy'-khos). In ancient times the walls of cities and houses were usually built of earth, or of bricks (q. v.) of clay, mixed with reeds and hardened in the sun. When any breach took place in such a mass of earth, by heavy rains or a defect in the foundation, the consequences were serious (Gen. 49:6; Psa. 62:3; Isa. 30:13); and we can easily understand how such walls could be readily destroyed by fire (Amos 1:7, 10, 14). The extensive mounds on the plains of Mesopotamia and Assyria, marking the sites of ancient cities, show that the walls were principally constructed of earth or clay. The wall surrounding the palace of Khorsabad is fixed by Botta at forty-eight feet nine inches; probably about the same as that of Nineveh, upon which three chariots could be driven abreast. The wall of Babylon was eighty-seven feet broad, and six chariots could be driven together upon it. Not infrequently stone walls, with towers and a fosse, surrounded fortified cities (Isa. 2:16; 9:10; Neh. 4:3; Zeph. 1:16).

The following additional points are mentioned by Smith (Bib. Diet., s. v.): "1. The practice common in Palestine of carrying foundations down to the solid rock, as in the case of the temple, and in the present day with structures intended to be permanent (Luke 11:48). 2. A feature of some parts of Solomon's buildings, as described by Josephus, corresponds remarkably to the method adopted at Nineveh of incrusting or veneering a wall of brick or stone with slabs of a more costly material, as marble or alabaster. 3. Another use of walls in Palestine is to support mountain roads or terraces formed on the sides of hills for purposes of cultivation. 4. The 'path of the vineyards' (Num. 22:24) is a pathway through vineyards, with walls on each side."

Figurative. In Scripture language a wall is a symbol of salvation (Isa. 26:1; 60:18); of protection—of God (Zech. 2:5), of those who afford protection (1 Sam. 25:16; Isa. 2:15), of the Church as a protection to the nation (Cant. 8:9, 10), of ordinances as a protection to the Church (Cant. 2:9; Isa. 5:5); of the wealth of the rich in his own conceit (Prov. 18:11). A "brazen wall" is symbolical of prophets in their testimony against the wicked (Jer. 15:20); the "wall of partition" (Eph. 2:14), of the separation of Jews and Gentiles; "whited walls" (Acts 23:3), of hypocrites.

See WILDERNESS OF WANDERING.

WAR. The rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words: Heb. מִלְחָמָה, mil-khao-maw', fighting; צָבָה, tsav-bar', or צָבָה, tseb-aw-aw', to make war; used also for the sacred service of the Levites (Num. 4:23); קָחַם, law-kham', literally to consume; Gr. πόλεμος, pol'-em-os, a conflict; στρατεύω, strat-yoo'-o, to make a military expedition.

1. The Egyptians. "Military service in Egypt was not universally compulsory, but rather the profession and privilege of a special class of whose origin but little is known. Perhaps originally it comprised only the descendants of the conquering race, but in historic times it was not exclusively confined to the latter, and recruits were raised everywhere among the fellahs, the Bedouins of the neighborhood, the negroes, the Nubians, and even from among the prisoners of war, or adventurers from beyond the seas. This motley collection of foreign mercenaries composed ordinarily the bodyguard of the king or of his barons, the permanent nucleus round which in times of war the levies of native recruits were rallied. Every Egyptian soldier received from the chief to whom he was attached a holding of land for the maintenance of himself and his family. . . . They were enrolled in special registers, with the indication of the holding which was temporarily assigned to them. A military scribe kept this register in every royal home or principality. Military service seemed in the eyes of the fellahs so great that for the most part those who were engaged in it had their children also enrolled, and taken to the barracks, where they were taught not only the use of the bow, the battle-ax, the mace, the lance, and the shield, but were all instructed in such exercises as rendered the body supple and prepared them for maneuvering, regimental marching, running, jumping, and wrestling either with closed or open hand. Their training being finished, they were incorporated into local companies and invested with their privileges. When they were required for service part or the whole of the class was mustered, arms kept in the arsenal were distributed among them, and they were conveyed in boats to the scene of action" (Mespéro, Dawn of Civ., p. 305-309).

2. The Chaldeans. "When a war was imminent a military levy was made upon his (the king's) domains, but we are unable to find out whether the recruits thus raised were drawn indiscriminately from the population in general or merely from a special class analogous to that of the warriors which we find in Egypt, who were paid in the same way by grants of land. The equipment of these soldiers was of the rudest kind; they had no cuirass, but carried a rectangular shield, and, in the case of those of higher rank at all events, a conical metal helmet, probably of beaten copper, provided with a piece to protect the back of the neck. The heavy infantry were armed with a pike tipped with bronze or copper, an ax or sharp adze, a stone-headed mace, and a dagger. The light troops were provided only with the bow and sling. As early as the millenium B. C. the king went to battle in a chariot drawn by onagers, or perhaps horses; he had his own peculiar weapon, which was a curved baton probably terminating in a metal point, and resembling the scepter of the Pharaohs. . . . At the beginning of a campaign a distribution of weapons to the newly levied troops took place; but as soon as the war was at an end the men brought back their accouterments, which were stored till they were again required" (ibid., pp. 721, 722).

3. The Hebrews. (1) Preliminary. Before entering on an aggressive warfare the Hebrews sought for the divine sanction by consulting either the Urim and Thummim (Judg. 1:1; 20:2, 27, 28; 1 Sam. 14:37; 23:2; 28:6; 30:8) or some acknowledged prophet (1 Kings 22:6; 2 Chron. 18:5). Divine aid was further sought in actual warfare by bringing into the field the ark of the covenant, which was the symbol of Jehovah himself (1 Sam. 4:4, 18; 14:18). Formal proclamations of war were not interchanged between the belligerents. Before entering the enemy's district spies were sent to ascertain the character of the country and the preparations of its inhabitants for resistance (Num. 13:17; Josh. 2:1; Judg. 7:10; 1 Sam. 26:4).

(2) Actual warfare. When an engagement was imminent a sacrifice was offered (1 Sam. 7:9; 13:9), and an inspiring address delivered either by the commander (2 Chron. 20:20) or by a priest (Deut. 20:2). Then followed the battle signal (1 Sam. 17:52; Isa. 42:13; Jer. 50:42; Ezek. 21:22; Amos 1:14). The combat assumed the form of a number of hand-to-hand contests. Hence the high value attached to fleetness of foot and strength of arm (2 Sam. 1:23; 2:18; 1 Chron. 12:8). At the same time various strategic devices were practiced, such as the ambuscade (Josh. 8:2, 12; Judg. 20:36), surprise (Judg. 7:16), or circumvention (2 Sam. 5:23). Another mode of settling the dispute was by the selection of champions (1 Sam., ch. 17; 2 Sam. 2:14), who were spurred on to exertion by the offer of high reward (1 Sam. 17:25; 18:25; 2 Sam. 18:11; 1 Chron. 11:8). The contest having been decided, the conquerors were recalled from the pursuit by the sound of a trumpet (2 Sam. 2:28; 18:16; 20:22).

(3) Siege of a town. The siege of a town or fortress was conducted in the following manner: A line of circumvallation was drawn round the place (Ezek. 4:2; Mic. 5:1), constructed out of the trees found in the neighborhood (Deut. 20:20), together with earth and any other materials at hand. This line not only cut off the besieged from the surrounding country, but also served as a base of operations for the besiegers. The next step was to throw out from this line one or more "mounds," or "banks," in the direction of the city (2 Sam. 20:15; 2 Kings 19:32; Isa. 37:33), which were gradually increased in height until they were about half as high as the city wall. On these mounds or banks towers were erected (2 Kings 25:1; Jer. 52:4; Ezek. 4:2; 17:17; 21:22; 26:8), whence the slingers and archers might attack with effect. Battering-rams (Ezek. 4:2; 21:22) were brought up to the walls by means of the bank, and scaling ladders might also be placed on it.

(4) Treatment of conquered, etc. The treatment of the conquered was extremely severe in ancient times. The bodies of the soldiers killed in action were plundered (1 Sam. 31:8; 2 Macc. 8:27); the survivors were either killed in some savage manner (Judg. 9:45; 2 Sam. 12:31; 2 Chron. 25:12), mutilated (Judg. 1:6; 1 Sam. 11:2), or carried into captivity (Num. 31:26; Deut. 20:14). Sometimes the bulk of the population of the conquered country was removed to a distant locality. The Mosaic law mitigated to a certain extent the severity of the ancient usages toward the conquered. The conquerors celebrated their success by the erection of monumental stones (1 Sam. 7:12; 2 Sam. 8:13), by hanging up trophies in their public buildings (1 Sam. 21:9; 31:10; 2 Kings 11:10), and by triumphal songs and dances in which the whole population took part (Exod. 15:1-21; Judg., ch. 5; 1 Sam. 18:6-8; 2 Sam., ch. 22; Judith 16:2-17; 1 Macc. 4:24).

4. Figurative. War is a figure of our contest with death (Eccl. 8:8). In the song of Moses, Jehovah is declared to be "a man of war" (Exod. 15:3), one who knows how to make war, and possesses the power to destroy his foes. War illustrates the malignity of the wicked (Psa. 55:21), the contest of saints with the enemies of their salvation (Rom. 7:23; 2 Cor. 10:3; Eph. 6:12; 1 Tim. 1:18), and between antichrist and the Church (Rev. 11:7; 13:4, 7).

WATCH. 1. The rendering of some form of the Heb. שָׂמַר (shaw-mar', to protect), and may mean day or night watch; thus there was a guard (A. V. "watch") of the king's house (2 Kings 11:5-7), and in Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 4:9; 7:3).

The Jews, like the Greeks and Romans, divided the night into military watches instead of hours, each watch representing the period for which sentinels or pickets remained on duty. Thus we read of "a watch in the night" (Psa. 90:4). The proper Jewish reckoning recognized only three such watches, entitled the first or "beginning of the watches" (Lam. 2:19), the middle watch (Judg. 7:19), and the morning watch (Exod. 14:24; 1 Sam. 11:11). These would last respectively from sunset to 10 P. M.; from 10 P. M. to 2 A. M.; and from 2 A. M. to sunrise. Subsequently to the establishment of the Roman supremacy, the number of watches was increased to four, which were described either according to their numerical order, as in the case of the "fourth watch" (Matt. 14:25, Gr. φύλακῆ, foo-lak-ay), or by the terms "even," "midnight," "cockcrow," and "morning" (Mark 13:35). These terminated respectively at 9 P. M., midnight, 3 A. M., and 6 A. M.

2. Shaw-kad' (Heb. שָׂרָב, to be alert) is to be wakeful, and so watchful, either for good (Jer. 31:28; 51:12) or evil (Isa. 29:20).

3. Koos-to-dee'-ah (Gr. κοῦστροδία), a Roman sentry, one of the soldiers who guarded the tomb of our Lord (Matt. 27:65, 66).

4. Gray-gor-el'-o (Gr. γρηγορέω) means to keep awake, to watch, and so to take heed lest through remissness and indolence some destructive calamity suddenly overtake one (Matt. 24:42; 25:13; Mark 13:35; Rev. 16:15), or lest one be led to forsake Christ (Matt. 26:41; Mark 14:38), or fall into sin (1 Thess. 5:6; 1 Cor. 16:13; 1 Pet. 5:8; Rev. 3:2, sq.) To "watch" (Col. 4:2) is to employ the most punctilious care.

5. Nay'-fo (Gr. νίψω, to abstain from wine, be sober) is used in the New Testament figuratively, to be calm and collected in spirit; to be temperate, dispassionate, circumspect (1 Thess. 5:6, 8; 2 Tim. 4:5; 1 Pet. 1:13; 5:8).

WATCHTOWER. See TOWER.

WATER (Heb. מַיִם, mah'-yim; Gr. ὕδωρ, hoo'-dore) is frequently mentioned in Scripture both as an element in fertility and as a drink.

1. Supply. "The long rainy season in Palestine means a considerable rainfall, and while it lasts the land gets a thorough soaking. But the land is limestone and very porous. The heavy rains are quickly drained away, the wadies are left dry, the lakes become marshes or dwindle to dirty ponds, and on the west of Jordan there remain only a few short perennial streams, of which but one or two, and these mere rills, are found in the hill country." Hence the water of running streams and fountains, as opposed to that of stagnant cisterns, pools, or marshes, is called living water (Gen. 26:19; Zech. 14:8; John 4:10, 11; 7:38; Rev. 7:17). In the hot countries of the East the assuaging of thirst is one of the most delightful sensations that can be experienced (Psa. 143:6; Prov. 25:25), and every attention which humanity and hospitality can suggest is paid to furnish travelers with water. Public reservoirs or pools are opened in several parts of Egypt and Arabia (Matt. 10:42). Sometimes water is so scarce as to be paid for (Num. 20:17, 19; Lam. 5:4).

2. Peculiar Usages. "Among the optical illusions which the deserts of the East have furnished is the mirage. This phenomenon of 'waters that fail,' or 'are not sure,' was called by the Hebrews שָׂרָב, shaw-rawb', i. e., heat, and is rendered 'the parched ground' (Isa. 35:7); properly, 'And the mirage shall become a pool,' i. e., the desert which presents the appearance of a lake shall be changed into real water."

3. Figurative. Water occasionally is used for tears (Jer. 9:1, 7); hence, figuratively, trouble (Psa. 66:1) and misfortune (Lam. 3:54; Psa. 69:1; 119:136; 124:4, 5); persecution (Psa. 88:17); hostile armies (Isa. 8:7; 17:13). Water is put for children or posterity (Num. 24:7; Isa. 48:1); for clouds (Psa. 104:3); for the ordinances of the Gospel (Isa. 12:3; 35:6, 7; 55:1; John 7:37, 38); divine support (Isa. 8:6); the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit (Isa. 41:17, 18; 44:3; Ezek. 36:25); water poured out, the wrath of God (Hos. 5:10) and of faintness by terror (Psa. 22:14). Deep water is used of the counsel in the heart (Prov. 20:5) and of the words of the wise (18:4). Water "spilled on the ground" is a figure of death (2 Sam. 14:14); while its instability figures a wavering disposition (Gen. 49:4). "Stolen waters" (Prov. 9:17) denote unlawful pleasures with strange women. The difficulty of stopping water (17:14) is a symbol of strife and contention, while its rapid flowing away represents the career of the wicked (Job 24:18; Psa. 58:7). See FOUNTAIN; WELL.

WATER OF JEALOUSY. See JEALOUSY OFFERING.

WATERPOT (Gr. ὕδρια, hoo-dee'-ah), a large vessel of stone in which water was kept standing (John 2:6, 7) for the sake of cleansing, which the Jews practiced before and after meals

The "firkin" (Gr. μετρητής, met-ray-tace) was a measure containing about eight and seven eighths gallons. The "waterpot" mentioned in 4:28 was a jar of earthenware in which water was carried.

WATERSPOUT (Heb. מַטְרֵיף, tsin-noor', hol-low) was a cataract, waterspout (Psa. 42:7; rendered in the A. V. of 2 Sam. 5:8, "gutter"; R. V. "water course").

WEAVING. In addition to material on this subject given in article on Handicraft, we give the following from Smith (Bib. Dict., s. v.): "The art of weaving appears to be coeval with the first dawning of civilization. In what country or by whom it was invented we know not, but we find it practiced with great skill by the Egyptians at a very early period. The 'vestures of fine linen' such as Joseph wore (Gen. 41:42) were the product of Egyptian looms, and their quality, as attested by existing specimens, is pronounced to be not inferior to the finest cambric of modern times. The Israelites were probably acquainted with the process before their sojourn in Egypt; but it was undoubtedly there that they attained the proficiency which enabled them to execute the hangings of the tabernacle (Exod. 35:35; 1 Chron. 4:21) and other artistic textures. At a later period the Egyptians were still famed for their manufactures of 'fine' (i. e., hackled) flax and of chôri, rendered in the A. V. 'networks,' but more probably a white material either of linen or cotton (Isa. 19:9; Ezek. 27:7).

"The character of the loom and the process of weaving can only be inferred from incidental notices. The Egyptian loom was usually upright and the weaver stood at his work. The cloth was fixed sometimes at the top, sometimes at the bottom. The modern Arabs use a procumbent loom, raised above the ground by short legs. The Bible does not notice the loom itself, but speaks of the beam to which the warp was attached (1 Sam. 17:7; 2 Sam. 21:19), and of the pin to which the cloth was fixed and on which it was rolled (Judg. 16:14). We have also notice of the shuttle, which is described by a term significant of the act of weaving (Job 7:6); the thrum or threads which attached the web to the beam (Isa. 38:12, marg.), and the web itself (Judg. 16:14). Whether the two terms in Lev. 13:48 rendered 'warp' and 'woof' really mean these admits of doubt.

"The textures produced by the Jewish weavers were very various. The coarser kinds, such as tent cloth, sackcloth, and the 'hairy garments' of the poor were made of goat's or camel's hair (Exod. 26:7; Matt. 3:4). Wool was extensively used for ordinary clothing (Lev. 13:47; Prov. 27:26; 31:13; Ezek. 27:18), while for finer work flax was used, varying in quality, and producing the different textures described in the Bible as 'linen' and 'fine linen.' The mixture of wool and flax in cloth intended for a garment was interdicted (Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:11)."

WEIGHT. 1. Eh'-ben (Heb. אֵבֶן, a stone), a weight of a balance, even when not made of stone, since anciently, as at the present day, the orientals often made use of stones for weights (Lev. 19:36; Deut. 25:15, etc.).

2. Mish-kaw' (Heb. מִשְׁקָל), or mish-kole' (מִשְׁקָלִים), may mean either the weight numerically estimated (Gen. 24:22; Lev. 19:35; Num. 7:13, etc.), or the act of weighing (Ezra 8:34).

3. Peh'-les (Heb. פְּלֵס, Prov. 16:11; "balance," Isa. 40:12), a steelyard.

4. In the New Testament "weight" is mentioned only once in its literal sense, and is the rendering of Gr. ταλανταίος (tal-an-tee-ah'-yos), talentlike in weight (Rev. 16:21). The Israelites were commanded to have "just weights" (Lev. 19:36; Deut. 25:15; Prov. 20:10, 23), and the prophet Micah (6:11) denounces "the bag of deceitful weights," referring to the stone weights which were carried in a bag.

5. Figurative. Job, in speaking of the fixed laws ordained by Jehovah for the duration of the world, particularizes by examples: "He appointed the weight for the winds" (28:25) i. e., the measure of its force or feebleness. To "eat bread by weight" (Ezek. 4:10, 16) denotes extreme poverty or scarcity of food. The "weight of glory" (2 Cor. 4:17) is a figurative expression to denote the intensity of the celestial glory, especially as contrasted with the transitoriness of our present afflictions. The writer of the Hebrews (12:1) urges his readers to "lay aside every weight" (Gr. δύκος, ong'-kos). This word means anything prominent, an encumbrance; it is used figuratively for whatever disposition (as sensuality and worldly-mindedness) bows the soul down to earth, and consequently impedes it in running its spiritual race.

WELL. 1. Names. The rendering of the following Hebrew and Greek words:

(1) Bē-ayr' (Heb. בְּאֵר, a pit), something dug, and having the meaning of our word cistern (Gen. 16:14; 21:19, sq.; 26:19, sq.; 2 Sam. 17:18, etc.).

(2) Bore (Heb. בּוֹר, from No. 1) is found in 1 Sam. 19:22; 2 Sam. 3:26; 23:15, 16; 1 Chron. 11:17, 18.

(3) Mah-yawn' (Heb. מַיְוֵן, from No. 4), a spring, as in Psa. 84:6.

(4) Ak'-yin (Heb. אֵינַי, an eye), a fountain; whether so called from its resemblance to the eye, or, vice versa, the eye, from its resemblance to a fountain, may be doubtful (Gen. 24:13, 16; 49:22; Neh. 2:13); a living spring.

(5) Pay-gay' (Gr. πύγι, gushing), a fountain spread by a spring (John 4:6, 14; 2 Pet. 2:17).

(6) Freh'-ar (Gr. σπήρα, hole, John 4:11, 12), a pit dug, and thus distinguished from a living spring.

2. Importance. The heat and the large flocks and herds have made a special necessity of a supply of water (Judg. 1:15) in a hot climate; it has always involved among Eastern nations questions of property of the highest importance, and sometimes given rise to serious contention. Thus the well Beer-sheba was opened, and its possession attested with special formality by Abraham (Gen. 21:30, 31). The Koran notices abandoned wells as signs of desertion (Sur. 22). To acquire wells which they had not themselves dug was one of the marks of favor foretold to the Hebrews on their entrance into Canaan (Deut. 6:11). To possess one is noticed as a mark of independence (Prov. 5:15), and to abstain from the use of wells belonging to others, a disclaimer of interference with their property (Num. 20:17, 19; 21:22). Similar rights of possession, actual and hereditary, exist among the Arabs of the present day.

3. Construction. Wells in Palestine are usually excavated from the solid limestone rock, sometimes with steps to descend into them (Gen. 24:16). The brims are furnished with a curb or low wall of stone, bearing marks of high antiquity in the furrows worn by the ropes used in drawing water. It was on a curb of this sort that our Lord sat when he conversed with the woman of Samaria (John 4:6), and it was this, the usual stone cover, which the woman placed on the mouth of the well at Bahurim (2 Sam. 17:17), which was dry at times.

4. Raising the Water. "The usual methods for raising water are the following: 1. The rope and bucket, or water-skin (Gen. 24:14-20; John 4:11). 2. The sakiyeh, or Persian wheel. This consists of a vertical wheel furnished with a set of buckets or earthen jars, attached to a cord passing over the wheel, which descend empty and return full as the wheel revolves. 3. A modification of the last method, by which a man, sitting opposite to a wheel furnished with buckets, turns it by drawing with his hands one set of spokes prolonged beyond its circumference, and pushing another set from him with his feet. 4. A method very common, both in ancient and modern Egypt, is the shadoof, a simple contrivance consisting of a lever moving on a pivot, which is loaded at one end with a lump of clay or some other weight, and has at the other a bowl or bucket. Wells are usually furnished with troughs of wood or stone, into which the water is emptied for the use of persons or animals coming to the wells. Unless machinery is used, which is commonly worked by men, women are usually the water carriers" (Smith).

5. Figurative. Wells are figurative of: God as the source of salvation (Isa. 12:3; comp. Jer. 2:13; John 4:10; Cant. 4:15); mouth of the righteous (Prov. 10:11); wisdom and understanding in a man (16:22; 18:4); "drinking from one's own," domestic happiness (5:15); "wells without water," of hypocrites (2 Pet. 2:17).

The oriental, in speaking of the quarters of the heavens, supposes his face turned to the east. So the east is before him, the west behind, the south at his right hand, and the north at his left.

WHALE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

WHEAT. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

Figurative. On account of its excellence as a food, wheat is a figure of good men, as tares are of evil (Matt. 3:12; 13:25, 29, 30; Luke 3:17).

WHEEL. 1. O-fawn' (Heb. אֹפֵן, revolving) is usually and properly rendered "wheel" (Exod. 14:25; 1 Kings 7:30-33; Isa. 5:28; 28:27, 28; Ezek. 1:15-21; 3:13; 10:2-19; 11:22; Nah. 3:2).

2. Gal-gal' (Heb. גַּלְגַּל, or ghil-gawl' (גִּלְגַּל)), means revolving, and is rendered "wheel" in Psa. 83:13; Eccles. 12:6; Isa. 5:28; 28:28; Jer. 47:3; Ezek. 10:2, 13; Dan. 7:9. In Isa. 17:13 the A. V. has "a rolling thing," thought to be a thistle down.

3. Pah'-am (Heb. פַּעַם, Judg. 5:28), a step, and often so rendered.

4. O'-ben (Heb. אֲבֵן, only in Jer. 18:3, a potter's wheel.

As seen in article on Wagon, many of the wheels in the East were merely circular pieces of solid wood, but we also find evidences of their being also made with spokes and fellyes. An Egyptian wheel has been found having a wooden tire to the felly and an inner circle, probably of metal, which passed through and connected its six spokes a short distance from the hub. The diameter of the wheel was about three feet one inch. The felly was in six pieces, the end of one overlapping the other; and the tire was fastened to it by bands of rawhide passing through long, narrow holes made to receive them (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, i, 379, sq.). Among the ancient Assyrians the wheel had eight spokes, and was apparently strengthened by four pieces of metal which bound the felloes.

The wheels mentioned as seen in vision by Ezekiel (1:15, sq.; 10:2-19) seem to have served to put the chariot in motion. "Although the throne of God is not now expressly represented and designated as a chariot throne, yet there can be no doubt that the wheels which Ezekiel sees under the throne beside the cherubim are intended to indicate the possibility and ease with which the throne can be moved in the direction of the four quarters of the heavens" (Keil, Com., in loc.). These wheels were "a wheel in the middle of a wheel" (v. 16), i. e., one wheel placed at right angles with another, so that being turned it could go toward all the four sides. Their being supplied with eyes seems to indicate that their movement was guided by intelligence.

In Jer. 18:3 is a reference to the potter's wheel. Sir J. G. Wilkinson conclusively shows that it must have been in use in Egypt previous to the time of Joseph.

WHELP (Heb. בֵּן, bane, son or offspring, Job 4:11; 28:8; elsewhere גֹּר, goor, or גֹּרֶה, gore, Gen. 49:9; Deut. 33:22; Jer. 51:38; Ezek. 19:2, 3, 5; Nah. 2:13), the cub of a lion, or of a jackal (Lam. 4:3); the cubs of a bear (2 Sam. 17:8; Prov. 17:12; Hos. 13:8) are not designated by the Hebrew word.

WHETHER. See GLOSSARY.

WHIP (Heb. שֹׁט, shote, lash; sometimes rendered "scourge," Job 5:21; 9:23; Isa. 10:26; 28:15). In all slavholding countries the whip has been used upon human beings as a means of coercion and punishment. The system of administering personal chastisement has been, and is, universal throughout the East. For this purpose, however, the rod was oftener used, and punishment by the bastinado is now most common. Whips were made of various materials, from the simple scourge (q. v.) to the cruel scorpion (q. v.).

WHIRLPOOL. See GLOSSARY.

WHIRLWIND. The four Hebrew words rendered in A. V. "whirlwind," all refer, not to a wind revolving with great rapidity upon its own axis, but to a wind blowing with fury and producing blight and destruction; hence tempest or storm, rather than whirlwind, would have been the proper term.

The two in most frequent use are soo-faw' (Heb. סוּפוּף), from a root meaning to snatch away, and signifying a sweeping desolating blast (Job 21:18; 37:9; Isa. 21:1; Hos. 8:7, etc.); and saw-ar' (סַעַר, to toss), indicating the same thing, but more with reference to its vehement agitating motion (2 Kings 2:1, 11; Job 40:6; Isa. 40:24, etc.). Of the other two, roo'-akhl (רוּחַ, Ezek. 1:4) should be rendered simply wind; and the other saw'-ar' (סַעַר, Psa. 58:9; Dan. 11:40) has respect to the sense of horror which is occasioned by blasts of a more destructive and terrific kind.

Figurative. In a large proportion of the passages the terms are used in a figurative sense, as with reference to the resistless and sweeping destruction sure to overtake the wicked (Psa. 58:9; Prov. 1:27; 10:25; Isa. 41:16, etc.).

WHITED. See GLOSSARY.

WIDOW (Heb. יָתוּם, al-maw-naw', bereaved; Gr. χήρα, khay'-rah, deficient, as of a husband).

1. Mosaic Regulations. In the Mosaic legislation special regard was paid to widows. 'Tis true that no legal provision was made for their maintenance; but they were left dependent partly on the affection of relations, more especially of the eldest son, whose birthright, or extra share of the property, imposed such a duty upon him, and partly on the privileges accorded to other distressed classes, such as a participation in the triennial third tithe (Deut. 14:29; 26:12), in leasing (24:19-21), and in religious feasts (16:11, 14). God himself claimed a special interest in the widows, even calling himself their husband (Psa. 68:5; 146:9); and uttered the severest denunciations against such as defraud and oppress them (Psa. 94:6; Ezek. 22:7; Mal. 3:5). With regard to the remarriage of widows, the only restriction imposed by the Mosaic law had reference to the contingency of one being left childless, in which case the brother of the deceased husband had a right to marry the widow (Deut. 25:5, 6; Matt. 22:23-30). See MARRIAGE; LEVIRATE.

2. New Testament Usage. In the apostolic Church the widows were sustained at the public expense, the relief being daily administered in kind, under the superintendence of officers appointed for this special purpose (Acts 6:1-6). Particular directions are given by St. Paul as to the class of persons entitled to such public maintenance (1 Tim. 5:3-16). Out of the body of such widows a certain number were to be enrolled, the qualifications for such enrollment being (1) that they were not under sixty years of age; (2) that they had been "the wife of one man," probably meaning but once married, and (3) that they had led useful and charitable lives (vers. 9, 10). Some have thought this implies a receiving of the more elderly and approved widows into a kind of ecclesiastical order (v. 9), either of deaconesses or of a sort of overseers for those of their own sex; but the language is certainly vague and indefinite.

WILDERNESS. The Hebrew term most frequently rendered "wilderness" is מִדְבָּר (mid-baw'r', in the sense of driving flocks, and so pasture). In a few cases only the following are the Hebrew terms: Ar-aw-baw' (אֶרְוּבָה, sterility, Job 24:5; Isa. 33:9; Jer. 51:43; Amos 6:14); yesh-ec-mone' (יֶשְׁעִמֹנֶה, desolation, Deut. 32:10; Psa. 68:7); tsee-yaw' (צִיָּה, aridity, Job 30:3; Psa. 78:17); to'-hoo (תוֹהוּ, desolation, Job 12:24; Psa. 107:40).

The Greek term is er-ay-mee'-ah (ἐρημία, solitude) used in New Testament.

WILDERNESS OF WANDERING, the land in which the Israelites sojourned and wandered for forty years on their way from Egypt to Canaan. It lay within the peninsula of Sinai, or that peninsula extended, i. e., within the angle or fork formed by the two branches of the Red Sea—the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Akabah—or the lines of these branches produced, having the Holy Land to the north of it. It is that portion of Arabia called Arabia Petraea (or rocky Arabia), from its rocky and rugged character. It consisted, according to Dr. Trumbull, of several districts: (1) The wilderness of Shur, or Etham, i. e., the great wall of Egypt, extending from Suez to the Mediterranean; (2) the wilderness of Paran, occupying the center of the peninsula; (3) the wilderness of Sin, in the lower part of the peninsula; (4) the wilderness of Zin to the northeast. It was in the plain or wilderness of Paran (Gen. 14:6; 21:21; ites moved northward to the wilderness of Paran (Num. 10:12; Taberah (Num. 11:3; Deut. 9:22); Kibroth-hattaavah (Num. 11:34; 38:16); Hazeroth (11:35; 33:17); desert of Arabah by the way of Mount Seir (Deut. 1:1, 2, 19); Rithmah (Num. 33:18); Kadesh in the desert of Paran (Num. 12:16; 13:26; Deut. 1:2, 19).

2. Wanderings. In consequence of unbelief and rebellion, the Lord swore that they should wander in the wilderness until all that were above twenty years old should perish (Num. 14:33). Their wandering, therefore, began on their retreat from Kadesh. The following stations were encamped in until their return to Kadesh: Rimmon-parez (33:19); Libnah (v. 20); Rissah (v. 21); Kehelathah (v. 22); Mount Shapher (v. 23); Haradah (v. 24); Makheloth (v. 25); Tahath (v. 26); Tarah (v. 27); Mithcah (v. 28); Hashmonah (v. 29); Moseroth (v. 30); Bene-jaakan (v. 31); Hor-hagidgad (v. 32); Jotbathah (v. 33); Ebronah (v. 34); Ezion-geber (v. 35), by the way of the Red Sea (Deut. 2:1;

Num. 13:26), still called the Wilderness of Wandering, and in the neighboring mountains, that the children of Israel chiefly wandered after their retreat from Kadesh. But their wandering was not altogether confined to this region, for it seems to have extended to the region of Sinai, or the district of the Tawarah Arabs, and then toward the close of the thirty-eight years to the plain of the Arabah and to the wilderness of Zin. All of this region was deficient in water. Hence the occasion for the miraculous stream of water which followed the Israelites for so many years. It was deficient also in food for man, but apparently not in food for cattle. There is little doubt that the wilderness once afforded greater resources than at present; although there seems to have been no city nor village (Psa. 107:4). The wandering of Israel, properly speaking, commenced on their retreat from Kadesh (Num. 14:33; 32:13), for up to that time their journey had been direct, first to Sinai and then to Kadesh.

1. The Direct Journey. The first part, viz., to Sinai, has been given in article on Exodus (q. v.). Having rested there for about one year, the Israelites moved northward to the wilderness of Paran (Num. 20:1), by the way of Mount Seir (Deut. 2:1).

3. From Kadesh to Jordan. To Beeroth Bene-jaakan (Deut. 10:6); Mount Hor (Num. 20:22; 33:37), or Mosera (Deut. 10:6), where Aaron died; Gudgodah (v. 7); Jotbath (v. 7); by way of the Red Sea (Num. 21:4); by Ezion-geber (Deut. 2:8); Elath (v. 8); Zalmonah (Num. 33:41); Punon (v. 42); Oboth (21:10; 33:43); Ije-abarim (21:11), or Iim (33:44, 45); the brook Zered (21:12; Deut. 2:13, 14); brook Arnon (Num. 21:13; Deut. 2:24); Dibongad (Num. 33:45); Almon-diblathaim (v. 46); Beer (well) in the desert (21:16, 18); Mattanah (21:18); Nahaliel (v. 19); Bamoth (v. 19); Pisgah (v. 20), or mountains of Abarim, near Nebo (33:47); by way of Bashan to the plains of Moab by Jordan (21:33; 22:1; 33:48). See SUPPLEMENT.

WILL, WILL-WORSHIP. See GLOSSARY.

WILLOW. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

WILLOWS, THE BROOK OF THE (Heb. נַחַל הַיְדֵבִיִּים, nakh'-al hav-ar-aw-beem'), a stream mentioned by Isaiah (15:7) in his dirge over Moab.

His language implies that it is one of the boundaries of the country. Some authorities read "the desert stream" (as Hitzig, Maurer, Ewald, and Knobel), and identify it with the Wady-el-Ahsy; others (as Gesenius, Pusey, and Delitzsch) think it to be the "Willow Stream," and identify it with one of the rivers which flow to the south of Arnon from the mountains of the Moabitish highlands down to the Dead Sea. One of these is still known as the Wady Sufsaf, i. e., the willow brook. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

WILLS. Under a system of close inheritance like that of the Jews, the scope for bequest in respect of land was limited by the right of redemption and general reentry in the jubilee year. Keil says (Bib. Arch., p. 309, 311, note 5), "of wills there is not a trace to be found in the Mosaic law or throughout the whole of the Old Testament. . . . Neither the expression 'command his house' (put his house in order), 2 Sam. 17:23; 2 Kings 20:1; Isa. 38:1, nor the writing mentioned in Tob. 7:14, indicates a testamentary disposition. Not till the time of the later Jews do testaments occur; comp. Gal. 3:15; Heb. 9:17, and among princely families (Josephus, Ant., xiii, 16, 1; xvii, 3, 2; War, ii, 2, 3), as well as in Talmudic law, after the Greek and Roman fashion."

WINDOW. See HOUSE.

WINDS. That the Hebrews recognized the existence of four prevailing winds as issuing, broadly speaking, from the four cardinal points—north, south, east, and west—may be inferred from their custom of using the expression "four winds" as equivalent to the "four quarters" of the hem-

The northwest wind prevails from the autumnal equinox to the beginning of November, and the north wind from June to the equinox.

2. The east wind crosses the sandy wastes of Arabia Deserta before reaching Palestine, and was hence termed "the wind of the wilderness" (Job 1:19; Jer. 13:24). It blows with violence, and is hence supposed to be used generally for any violent wind (Job 27:21; 38:24; Psa. 48:7; Isa. 27:8; Ezek. 27:26). It is probably in this sense that it is used in Exod. 14:21. In Palestine the east wind prevails from February to June.

3. The name "sherkiyeh," our sirocco (literally "the east"), is used of all winds blowing in from the desert, east, southeast, south, and even south-southwest. They are hot winds. "When ye see the south wind blow, ye say, There will be heat; and it cometh to pass" (Luke 12:55; comp. Job 37:17; Jer. 4:11; Ezek. 17:10; 19:12; Hos. 13:15). They blow chiefly in the spring, and for a day at a time; and they readily pass over into rain by a slight change in the direction, from south-southwest to full southwest.

4. The west and southwest winds reach Palestine loaded with moisture gathered from the Mediterranean, and are hence expressively termed by the Arabs "the fathers of the rain." Westerly winds prevail in Palestine from November to February, and, damp from the sea, drop their moisture and cause the winter rains. "In summer the winds blow chiefly out of the drier northwest, and, meeting only warmth, do not cause showers, but greatly mitigate the daily heat. This latter function is fulfilled morning by morning with almost perfect punctuality. . . . He strikes the coast soon after sunrise; in Hauran, in June and July, he used to reach us between ten and twelve o'clock, and blew so well that the hours previous to that were generally the hottest of our day. The peasants do all their winnowing against this steady wind" (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 66, 67).

In addition to the four regular winds, we have notice in the Bible of the local squalls (Mark 4:37; Luke 8:23), to which the Sea of Genesareth was liable. In the narrative of St. Paul's voyage we meet with the Greek term lips (λίψ) to describe the southwest wind; the Latin carus or caurus (χῶρος), the northwest wind (Acts 27:12); and euroclydon, a wind of a very violent character coming from east-northeast (v. 14).

WINE. 1. Bible Terms.

The product of the wine press was described in Hebrew by a variety of terms, indicative either of the quality or of the use of the liquid.

(1) Yah'-yin (Heb. יין, effervescing) is rendered invariably in the A. V. "wine," excepting Judg. 13:14, "vine"; Cant. 2:4, "banqueting." This term corresponds to the Gr. oinos (oy'-nos), and our wine. In most of the passages in the Bible where yah'-yin is used (eighty-three out of one hundred and thirty-eight), it certainly means fermented grape juice, and in the remainder it may fairly be presumed to do so. In four only (Isa. 16:10; Jer. 40:10-12; Lam. 2:12) is it really doubtful. In no passage can it be positively shown to have any other meaning. The intoxicating character of yah'-yin in general is plain from Scripture. To it are attributed the "darkly flashing eye" (Gen. 49:12; A. V. "red"), the unbridled tongue (Prov. 20:1; Isa. 28:7), the excitement of the spirit (Prov. 31:6; Isa. 5:11; Zech. 9:15; 10:7), the enchain'd affections of its votaries (Hos. 4:11), the perverted judgment (Prov. 31:5; Isa. 28:7), the indecent exposure (Hab. 2:15, 16), and the sickness resulting from the heat (chemáh, A. V. "bottles") of wine (Hos. 7:5).

isphere (Ezek. 37:9; Dan. 8:8; Zech. 2:6; Matt. 24:31).

1. The north wind, or, as it was usually called "the north," was naturally the coldest of the four (Ecclus. 43:20), and its presence is hence invoked as favorable to vegetation in Cant. 4:16. It blows chiefly in October, and brings dry cold (Job 37:9). It is described in Prov. 25:23 as bringing rain; in this case we must understand the northwest wind.

So in actual instances: Noah planted a vineyard, and drank of the yah'-yin and was drunken (Gen. 9:21); Nabal drank yah'-yin and was very drunken (1 Sam. 25:36, 37); the "drunkards of Ephraim" were "overcome with yah'-yin" (Isa. 28:1). Jeremiah says, "I am like a drunken man, and like a man whom yah'-yin hath overcome" (Jer. 23:9). The intoxicating quality of yah'-yin is confirmed by rabbinical testimony. The Mishna, in the treatise on the Passover, informs us that four cups of wine were poured out and blessed, and drunk by each of the company at the eating of the paschal lamb, and that water was also mixed with wine, because it was considered too strong to be drunk alone. The Gemara adds, "The cup of blessing is not to be blessed, until it is mixed with water." To meet the objection, How can intoxication be hindered? the rabbins replied, "Because wine between eating does not intoxicate a man." But although usually intoxicating, yet it was not only permitted to be drunk, but was also used for sacred purposes, and is spoken of as a blessing (Gen. 49:12; Deut. 14:24-26; Exod. 29:40; Lev. 23:13; Num. 15:5; Amos 4:9). "Some, indeed, have argued from these passages that yah'-yin could not always have been alcoholic. But this is begging the question, and that in defiance of the facts. Although invariably fermented, it was not always inebriating, and in most instances, doubtless, was but slightly alcoholic, like the vin ordinaire of France" (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

(2) Tee-roshé' (Heb. תירוש, properly signifies must, the freshly pressed juice of the grape (the γλεύχος of the Greeks, or sweet wine); rendered "new wine" in Neh. 10:39; 13:5, 12; Prov. 3:10; Isa. 24:7; 65:8; Hos. 4:11; 9:2; Joel 1:10; Hag. 1:11; Zech. 9:17; "sweet wine" in Mic. 6:15. In this last passage it seems to be used for that from which wine is made. The question whether either of the above terms ordinarily signified a solid substance, would be at once settled by a reference to the manner in which they were consumed. With regard to yah'-yin we are not aware of a single passage which couples it with the act of eating. In the only passage where the act of consuming tee-roshé' alone is noticed (Isa. 62:8, 9), the verb is shaw-thaw' (Heb. שָׁוַת, which constantly indicates the act of drinking). There are, moreover, passages which seem to imply the actual manufacture of tee-roshé' by the same process by which wine was ordinarily made (Mic. 6:15; Prov. 3:10; Joel 2:24). As to the intoxicating character of this drink, the allusions to its effects are confined to a single passage, "Whoredom and wine [yah'-yin] and new wine [tee-roshé'] take away the heart," where tee-roshé' appears as the climax of engrossing influences, in immediate connection with yah'-yin.

(3) Kheh'-mer (Heb. כְּחַמְרָא, or kham-ar' (Chald. ܟܚܡܐ). This word occurs eight times—twice (Deut. 32:14; Isa. 27:2) in its Hebrew and six in its Chaldee form (Ezra 6:9; 7:22; Dan. 5:1, 2, 4, 23). It conveys the notion of foaming or ebullition, and may equally well apply to the process of fermentation, or to the frothing of liquid freshly poured out, in which latter case it might be used of an unfermented liquid.

(4) Shay-kawr' (Heb. שַׁיִן, an intoxicant), an inebriating drink, whether wine prepared or distilled from barley, honey, or dates. It is rendered in the A. V. "strong drink" twenty-one times, and once "strong wine" (Num. 28:7; Psa. 69:12, "drinkers of strong drink"). Dr. Douglass (Imp. Dict., s. v.) says, "But we incline to the belief that shechár early came to have a fixed meaning related to that of yáyin; the latter denoting all the liquid products of the grape, from 'asis to mesech; the former including all similar products of any fruit except the grape. The liquors included under shechár might therefore be pomegranate wine, palm wine, apple wine, honey wine, perhaps even beer, for some have identified it with the liquor obtained from barley by the Egyptians." The word is employed in the following passages in such a manner as to show decisively that it denotes an intoxicating drink: Lev. 10:9, where the priests are forbidden to drink wine, or shay-kawr', when they go into the tabernacle; 1 Sam. 1:15, where Hannah, charged with drunkenness by Eli, replies it is not so—"I have drunk neither wine nor shay-kawr';" Psa. 69:12, where the psalmist complains, "I was the song of the drinkers of shay-kawr'" (A. V. "drunkards"); Prov. 31:4, 5, "It is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes shay-kawr': lest they drink, and forget the law;" Isa. 5:22, "Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle shay-kawr'" (comp. 28:7; 29:9).

(5) Aw-sees' (Heb. אָוֶסֶס, Cant. 8:2; Isa. 49:26; Joel 1:5; 3:18; Amos 9:13) is derived from a word signifying "to tread," and therefore refers to the method by which the juice was expressed from the fruit. It would very properly refer to new wine as being recently trodden out, but not necessarily to unfermented wine.

(6) So'-beh (Heb. סֹבֵה, potation) occurs only three times (Isa. 1:22, "wine;" Hos. 4:18, "drink;" Nah. 1:10, "drunken"), but the verb and participle often—the latter to denote drunk, a drunkard, a toper.

(7) Meh'-sek (Heb. מֵשֶׁק, a mixture) is wine mixed with water or aromatics (Psa. 75:8, A. V. "mixture"). But the noun appears to have been restricted in usage to a bad sense, to denote wine mingled with stupefying or exciting drugs, so that the wine might produce more powerful effects than was possible otherwise, at a time when distillation had not been discovered.

(8) Kho'-mets (Heb. חֹמֶט) occurs five times, and is simply vinegar. It was probably made from yah'-yin or shay-kawr'.

(9) Ay-naub' (Heb. אֵינַב, A. V. "wine" in Hos. 3:1; elsewhere correctly "grapes").

(10) Yeh'-keb (Heb. יֶחֶב, A. V. "wine" in Deut. 16:13; elsewhere correctly "press"). See WINE PRESS.

(11) In the New Testament we have the following Greek words: Oy'-nos (οἶνος), comprehending every sort of wine. Glyoo'-kos (γλεύχος, must) sweet or "new wine," which seems to have been of an intoxicating nature (Acts 2:13), where the charge is made, "These men are full of new wine;" to which Peter replies (v. 15), "These men are not drunken as ye suppose." If the wine was not intoxicating the accusation could only have been ironical. From the explanations of the ancient lexicographers we may infer that the luscious qualities of this wine were due not to its being recently made, but to its being produced from the purest juice of the grape. Gen'-ay-mah tace am-pel'-oo (γένημα τῆς ἀμπέλου), fruit of the vine (Luke 22:18). Oy'-nos ak'-rat-os (οἶνος ἀκρατός), pure wine (Rev. 14:10). Ox'-os (ὄξος), sour wine or vinegar (Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36, etc.). Sik'-er-ah (σίκερα, Luke 1:15, A. V. "strong drink"), an intoxicating beverage made of a mixture of sweet ingredients, whether derived from grain or vegetables, or from the juice of fruits, or a decoction of honey. It corresponds to No. 4.

2. Biblical History of Wine. Wine is first

mentioned in the case of Noah, who "planted a vineyard, and did drink of the wine [yah'-yin], and was drunken" (Gen. 9:20, 21). The second notice is in Gen. 19:32, etc., where it is said that the daughters of Lot made their father drink wine (yah'-yin), so that he became stupidly intoxicated. It is mentioned in the blessing pronounced by Isaac upon Jacob (27:28); in connection with Egypt (40:11), when the chief butler says, "I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup." With regard to the uses of wine in private life there is little to remark. It was produced on occasions of ordinary hospitality (14:18), and at festivals, such as marriages (John 2:3). The monuments of ancient Egypt furnish abundant evidence that the people of that country, both male and female, indulged liberally in the use of wine. Under the Mosaic law wine formed the usual drink offering that accompanied the daily sacrifice (Exod. 29:40), the presentation of the first fruits (Lev. 23:13), and other offerings (Num. 15:5). Tithe was to be paid of wine as of other products. The priest was also to receive first fruits of wine, as of other articles (Deut. 18:4; comp. Exod. 22:29). The use of wine at the paschal feast was not enjoined by the law, but had become an established custom, at all events in the post-Babylonian period. The wine was mixed with warm water on these occasions, as implied in the notice of the warming kettle. Hence in the early Christian Church it was usual to mix the sacramental wine with water.

Figurative. Wine is figurative of the blood of Christ (Matt. 26:27-29); of the blessings of the Gospel (Prov. 9:2, 5; Isa. 25:6; 55:1); of the wrath and judgments of God (Psa. 60:3; 75:8; Jer. 13:12-14; 25:15-18); of the abominations of the apostasy (Rev. 17:2; 18:3); of violence and rapine (Prov. 4:17).

WINE PRESS. Each vineyard had its wine press, the practice being to extract the juice from the grape in the field. These presses were generally hewn out of the solid rock, and a large number of them remain at the present day. From the scanty notices contained in the Bible we gather that the wine presses of the Jews consisted of two receptacles or vats placed at different elevations, in the upper one of which the grapes were trodden, while the lower one received the expressed juice. The two vats are mentioned together only in Joel 3:13: "The press [gath, Heb. גַּת] is full; the fats [trough, yeh'-keb, Heb. יֶחֶב] overflow"—the upper vat being full of fruit, the lower one overflowing with the must. Gath is also strictly applied to the upper vat in Neh. 13:15, Lam. 1:15, and Isa. 63:2, with poo-raw' (Heb. פָּרַדָּה, crushing) in a parallel sense in the following verse. The term poo-raw', as used in Hag. 2:16, probably refers to the contents of a wine vat rather than to the press or vat itself. The two vats were usually dug or hewn out of the solid rock (Isa. 5:2, marg.; Matt. 21:33). Ancient wine presses, so constructed, are still to be seen in Palestine.

Figurative. The very forceful use of the wine press as a figure is found in Isa. 63:3-6, where Jehovah is represented as taking vengeance upon the ungodly nations. The nations are the grapes, which are cut off and put into the wine press (Joel 3:12); and the red upon his garments is the life blood of these nations. "This work of wrath had been executed by Jehovah, because he had in his heart a day of vengeance, which could not be delayed, and because the year of his promised redemption had arrived." The New Testament counterpart of this passage is the destruction of antichrist and his army (Rev. 19:11, sq.). He who effects this destruction is the Faithful and True, the Logos of God. The vision of John is evidently based upon that of Isaiah. Merciless oppression is forcibly illustrated in Job 24:9-12, where serfs are said to "tread wine presses and suffer thirst."

WING (Heb. generally כַּנָּף, kaw-nawf', extremity; Gr. πτερυξ, pter'-oox, feather). The Hebrew word conveys the meaning not only of the wings of birds, but also the lappet, skirt, or flap of a garment (Ruth 3:9; Jer. 2:34), the extremity of a country (Job 38:13; Isa. 24:16, marg.).

Figurative. God says that he has borne his people on eagles' wings (Exod. 19:4; Deut. 32:11), i. e., he had brought them out of Egypt with strong and loving care. The eagle watches over its young in the most careful manner, flying under them when it leads them from the nest, lest they should fall upon the rocks and be destroyed. "To mount up with wings as eagles" (Isa. 40:31), i. e., their course of life, which has Jehovah for its object, is, as it were, possessed of wings. The wings of the sun (Mal. 4:2) are the rays by which it is surrounded. As the rays of the sun spread light and warmth over the earth, for the benefit of plants and living creatures, so will the Sun of righteousness bring healing for all the hurts inflicted by sin. "The wings of the wind" (2 Sam. 22:11; Psa. 18:10), and "of the morning" (Psa. 139:9) are expressive of the swiftness with which the winds and the morning move onward. The idea of protection, defense, is given by such expressions as "Hide me under the shadow of thy wings" (Psa. 17:8; comp. 36:7; 57:1; 61:4; 63:7; 91:4; Matt. 23:37; Luke 13:34).

WINTER (Heb. usually חֵרֵף, kho'-ref, strictly autumn; Gr. χειμών, khi-mone', the rainy season). In Palestine winter includes part of autumn and the seasons of seedtime and cold, extending from the beginning of September to the beginning of March (Gen. 8:22; Psa. 74:17; Zech. 14:8; Matt. 24:20). The cold of winter is not usually very severe, though the north winds are very penetrating from the middle of December to the middle of February. Snow and hail during most winters fall on the hills. On the central range snow has been known to reach a depth of nearly two feet, and to lie for five days or even more, and the pools at Jerusalem have sometimes been covered with ice. But this is rare. On the central range the ground seldom freezes, and the snow usually disappears in a day. On the plateaus east of Jordan snow lies regularly for some days every winter, and on the top of Hermon there are fields of it during the summer. See CALENDAR; GLOSSARY.

WINTERHOUSE (Heb. חֵרֵף, kho'-ref). In Scripture the lower portion of the house was called the "winterhouse," as was also the inner apartment, while the outer and upper ones were called the "summerhouse" (Jer. 36:22).

WISDOM. 1. Khok-naw' (Heb. חֵכְמָה, khok-naw'), has the special meaning of dexterity, skill in an art (Exod. 28:3; 31:6; 36:1, 2). It has also and more generally the meaning of intelligent, sensible, ju- icious, endowed with reason and using it (Deut. 4:6; 34:9; Prov. 10:1, etc.); skillful to judge (1 Kings 2:9); thus the wisdom of Solomon is manifested in his acute judgment (3:26; 10:1, sq.), in the verses and sentences he composed or retained in his memory (1 Kings 6:12; Prov. 1:2). Wisdom includes skill in civil matters (Isa. 19:11), the faculty of interpreting dreams and prophesying (Dan. 5:11), as well as the art of enchantment and magic (Exod. 7:11). A higher and more enlightened wisdom is ascribed to angels (2 Sam. 14:20), to God (Job 9:4; 28:23).

2. Saw-kal' (Heb. שָׂכַל, to be prudent, circumspect, 1 Sam. 18:30; Job 22:2; Psa. 2:10; 94:8, etc.).

3. Too-shee-yaw' (Heb. יוֹשֵׁעַ, properly uprightness), counsel, understanding (Job 11:6; 12:16; 26:3; Prov. 3:21, etc.).

4. Bee-naw' (Heb. בִּינָה, understanding), the faculty of insight, intelligence (Prov. 4:7, "understanding," v. 5; 39:26).

5. The Greek terms are: Sof-ee'-ah (σοφία), broad and full intelligence; used of knowledge of very diverse matters, so that the shade of meaning in which the word is taken must be discovered from the context in every particular case; from'-ay-sis (φρόνησις), understanding, specially knowledge and holy love of the will of God (Luke 1:17; Eph. 1:8).

Occasional Uses. (1) Wisdom is put for ingenuity, mechanical dexterity (Exod. 28:3; 31:3); (2) craftiness, subtlety, whether good or bad (Exod. 1:10; 2 Sam. 13:3; Prov. 14:8); (3) the skill or arts of magicians, etc. (Gen. 41:8; Exod. 7:11; Eccles. 9:17); (4) sagacity, learning, experience (Job 12:2, 12; 38:37; Psa. 105:22); (5) the current pagan philosophy of the apostolic age (1 Cor. 1:20; 2:5; 3:19; 2 Cor. 1:12).

The Dominant Uses. (1) An attribute of God, intimately related to the divine knowledge, but manifesting itself in the selection of proper ends and the proper means for their accomplishment. Thus not only the world of nature, but especially the economy of redemption, is a manifestation of divine wisdom (see Psa. 104:24; Rom. 11:33; 1 Cor. 1:24; Rev. 7:12). Thus the Old Testament appeal of wisdom to men is the appeal of the "Only Wise God" (see Proverbs and Psalms). (2) In men wisdom is not only practical understanding of matters relating to this life (1 Kings 3:12), but in the highest sense it is the theoretical and practical acceptance of divine revelation. Wisdom is in the deepest sense a divine gift (see Acts 6:10; 1 Cor. 2:6; 12:8; Eph. 1:17; Col. 1:9; 3:16; James 1:5; 3:15-17).

WITNESS (Heb. עֵד, ayd; Gr. μαρτυρέω, mar-too-reh'-o, to testify).

1. A Memorial. Among people with whom writing is not common, the evidence of a transaction is given by some tangible memorial or significant ceremony. Abraham gave seven ewe lambs to Abimelech as an evidence of his property in the well of Beer-sheba. Jacob raised a heap of stones, "the heap of witness," as a boundary mark between himself and Laban (Gen. 21:30; 31:47, 52). The tribes of Reuben and Gad raised an "altar" as a witness to the covenant between themselves and the rest of the nation; Joshua set up a stone as an evidence of the allegiance promised by Israel to God (Josh. 22:10, 26, 34; 24:26, 27).

2. Legal Usages. Thus also symbolical usages, in ratification of contracts or completed arrangements, as the ceremony of shoe-loosing (Deut. 25:9, 10; Ruth 4:7, 8), the ordeal prescribed in the case of a suspected wife (Num. 5:17-31), with which may be compared the ordeal of the Styx. But written evidence was by no means unknown to the Jews. Divorce was to be proved by a written document (Deut. 24:1, 3). In civil contracts, at least in later times, documentary evidence was required and carefully preserved (Isa. 8:16; Jer. 32:10-16).

3. Evidence in Law. On the whole the law was very careful to provide and enforce evidence for all its infractions and all transactions bearing on them. Among special provisions with respect to evidence are the following: 1. Two witnesses at least are required to establish any charge (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6; John 8:17; 2 Cor. 13:1; comp. 1 Tim. 5:19). 2. In the case of the suspected wife, evidence besides the husband's was desired (Num. 5:13). 3. The witness who withheld the truth was censured (Lev. 5:1). 4. False witness was punished with the punishment due to the offense which it sought to establish. 5. Slanderous reports and officious witness are discouraged (Exod. 20:16; 23:1; Lev. 19:16, 18, etc.). 6. The witnesses were the first executioners (Deut. 13:9; Acts 7:58). 7. In case of an animal left in charge and torn by wild beasts, the keeper was to bring the carcass in proof of the fact and disproof of his own criminality (Exod. 22:13). 8. According to Josephus, women and slaves were not admitted to bear testimony (Ant., iv, 8, 15).

4. New Testament Use of Word. In the New Testament the original notion of a witness is exhibited in the special form of one who attests his belief in the Gospel by personal suffering. Hence it is that the use of the ecclesiastical term "martyr" has arisen.

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT, the direct testimony of the Holy Spirit to true believers as to their acceptance with God and their adoption into the divine household.

1. Scriptural. The two classic passages upon which this doctrine is especially based are Rom. 8:16; Gal. 4:6. It is, however, argued that just as Christ in his visible ministry not only forgave sins, but also announced to penitent sinners their forgiveness, so it is one of the offices of the Holy Spirit still to proclaim directly to those who are pardoned the fact of their pardon. Also this view is confirmed by other representations than those named in the Scriptures of the presence and activity of the Holy Spirit (see Rom. 8:1, 2; 2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30). The Holy Spirit is "the Spirit of Adoption." It is because he speaks within us that we are able to cry, "Abba, Father;" are consciously free from condemnation, and are "sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise."

2. Theological Suggestions. 1. The fact to which the witness of the Spirit particularly relates is that of the gracious change in relation of the pardoned sinner to God. He is no longer guilty, and "an alien," but forgiven, and by adoption a child of God. That the Spirit also witnesses to the sanctification of believers is gathered by inference and experience rather than from explicit teaching of the Scriptures. The one point upon which the Scriptures lay emphasis is that the Spirit's witness is to the fact of adoption, connected, of course, with justification and regeneration. 2. The witness of our own spirit is to be distinguished from the witness of the Holy Spirit. In Rom. 8:16 the word used is συμμαρτυρέω, which means two or more witnesses jointly, yet distinctly, giving testimony to the same fact. And two witnesses here are mentioned, the spirit of the man himself and the Spirit of God. The witness of our own spirit is indirect in the sense that it is based upon a comparison of the facts of our religious life and experiences with the representations and requirements of the Scriptures. We know whether or not we have truly repented and believed in Christ, and whether we have peace and joy and love and the spirit of obedience (see Rom. 5:1; 8:1-14; 1 John 2:29; 3:14, 19, 21; 4:7). But the witness of the Spirit is beyond this, though associated with it. As Wesley says, "The testimony of the Spirit is an inward impression on the souls of believers, whereby the Spirit of God directly testifies to their spirit that they are 'children of God,'" and, further, "there is in every believer both the testimony of God's Spirit and the testimony of his own that he is a child of God." This direct and distinct witness of the Spirit is frequently merged into and confused with the witness of our own spirit, as notably by Dr. Chalmers (Lectures on Rom., p. 202), where he reduces the work of the Spirit to the graving "upon us the lineaments of a living epistle of Jesus Christ, and tells us in the epistle of a written revelation what these lineaments are." But this is in opposition to a fair exegesis of Rom. 8:16, where the idea of two joint yet distinct testimonies appear. 3. The witness of the Spirit is to be regarded as a sequence or reward of saving faith, and not the basis of such faith or a necessary element therein. Wesleyan writers, and Wesley himself, have not always been sufficiently clear upon this point. At times Wesley distinguishes most clearly between "justifying faith and a sense of pardon," and adds, "How can a sense of pardon be the condition of our receiving it?" (Works, xii, 109, 110.) But elsewhere (Sermons, x, 8, 9) he argues that "we cannot love God till we know he loves us; and we cannot know his pardoning love to us till his Spirit witnesses to our spirit." He is seeking to prove here that the witness of the Spirit must precede the witness of our own spirit; but in seeking this he goes too far, and makes the witness of the Spirit the basis of our faith and an essential element therein. It is of the largest importance that it should be understood that saving faith is simply complete reliance of the penitent soul upon the grace of God in Jesus Christ, as offered in his word, and that the witness of the Spirit comes in God's own time and way to those who do thus truly repent and believe. While the Spirit's witness is a great boon proffered to all believers, and none should rest without it, yet there are ways of directly seeking it which involve not faith, but unbelief, and disparagement of the sure promises of God as contained in his Holy Word.

3. Historical. 1. Sacramentarian theories of salvation make the evidence of salvation to stand in connection with the proper use of the sacraments. The direct testimony of the Spirit to the hearts of believers is almost wholly ignored. 2. The doctrine of assurance among Calvinists at one point goes beyond, at another it falls short of, that of the Scriptures. It regards assurance, or the witness of the Spirit, as relating to final and eternal salvation, of course including the state of present acceptance with God. But it at the same time regards the witness of the Spirit as on the whole an exceptional and unusual bestowment of God upon believers. 3. Methodism regards the witness of the Spirit as the common privilege of all who believe. It is the direct testimony of the Spirit of God to their divine adoption. And while not independent of the external and objective grounds of assurance, it is in itself the supreme additional testimony to the one great reality (see ASSURANCE).

WORSHIP. The rendering in the A. V. of the following Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Shaw-khaw' (Heb. שָׁחַת, to bow down), to prostrate oneself before another in order to do him honor and reverence (Gen. 22:5, etc.). This mode of salutation consisted in falling upon the knees and then touching the forehead to the ground (Gen. 19:1; 42:6; 48:12; 1 Sam. 25:41, etc., often rendered "bowed"). It is, however, used specifically to bow down before God, spoken of worship rendered to God, and also to false gods (Gen. 22:5; Exod. 24:1; 33:10; Judg. 7:15; Job 1:20; Psa. 22:27; 86:9).

2. Seg-eed' (Heb. סָגַד, to fall down), spoken of in connection with idol worship; to fall down in adoration of idols (Dan. 3:5, 6; 10-12, 14, 15, 28); in honor of a man, as of Daniel (2:46).

3. Aw-tsab' (Heb. עָצַב, to carve, labor), to serve an idol, as in Jer. 44:19; or according to others, to fashion her, i. e., the image (see Orelli, Com., in loc.).

4. The Greek words thus rendered are: Proskou-neh'-o (προσκυνέω), properly to kiss the hand to (toward) one, in token of reverence, also by kneeling or prostration to do homage—the word most frequently used in the New Testament. Seb'-om-ah-ee (σέβομαι), to revere a deity (Matt. 15:9; Mark 7:7; Acts 18:13; 19:27). "Proselytes of the gate" are called "men that worship God" (σεβομένη τὸν Θεόν, Acts 16:14; 18:7), or simply "devout persons" (τοῖς σεβομένοις, Acts 17:17). Lar-ryoo'-o (λατρεύω, to serve), in the New Testament to render religious service or honor, and in the strict sense to perform sacred services, to offer gifts, to worship God in the observance of the rites instituted for his worship (Heb. 10:2; "service," 9:9). Eth-el-oth-race-ki'-ah (ἑθελθησκεία, voluntary worship), i. e., worship which one devises and prescribes for himself, contrary to the contents and nature of the faith which ought to be directed to Christ; said of the misdirected zeal and practices of ascetics (Col. 2:23). Ther-ap-yoo'-o (θεραπεύω), to do service, as in Acts 17:25.

General Observations. It is as natural to worship as it is to live. The feeling and expression of high adoration, reverence, trust, love, loyalty, and dependence upon a higher power, human or divine, is a necessity to man. To these sentiments, to a greater or less degree, in every man, something or somebody, real or imaginary, appeals. And that something secures his worship. "Worship is as old as humanity. It has its root in a necessity of the human soul as native to it as the consciousness of God itself, which impels it to testify by word and act its love and gratitude to the Author of life and the Giver of all good" (Keil, Bib. Arch., p. 55).

Primitive Worship. We are not informed as to the nature of the worship rendered by our first parents; but we learn from earliest records that their sons were moved to present a portion of the product of their labor in sacrifice to God. Men as early as Enos, the grandson of Adam (Gen. 4:26), called upon the name of the Lord; or, in other words, the regular and solemn worship of God as Jehovah (i. e., as the God of salvation) was celebrated in word and act—with prayer and sacrifice. Max Müller (in his essay) says: "That feeling of sonship which distinguishes man from every other creature, and not only exalts him above the brute, but completely secures him against sinking into a purely physical state of being, that original intuition of God, and that consciousness of his being dependent upon a higher power, can only be the result of a primitive revelation in the most literal sense of the word." This view is entertained by Schelling. The other view is that worship cannot be traced to a divine source; that the original condition of the human family was of an extremely rude and imperfect character; and that fetichism, as being the lowest, was also the earliest form of religion, and that for this reason we ought to regard religion, even in its most advanced forms, as springing originally from a barbarous fetichism. But the grounds upon which this opinion is based are weak in the extreme. "It would be nearer the truth to say that they are as divine as they are human in their origin, seeing that they are based upon the relation of man to God involved in his creation, and are evoked by a sense of the divine training and guidance under which he finds himself after his creation" (Keil, Bib. Arch., p. 56).

In primitive times that form of worship which Enos introduced was still maintained, for Enoch "walked with God" (Gen. 5:24); Noah was righteous before him, and expressed his gratitude by presenting burnt offerings (6:9; 7:20).

In a subsequent age God chose for himself a faithful servant in the person of Abraham, made him the depository of his revelation, and the father and founder of that people, which was destined to preserve the knowledge and worship of his name till the time when the Saviour should issue from its midst. While other nations multiplied their modes of worship according to the political constitution which they adopted, and to suit the number and variety of their deities, they devised a corresponding variety of ritual, with a numerous priesthood and a multitude of sacred observances. But Abraham, and the posterity born to him, preserved a simple form of worship as became shepherds, while it was at the same time duly in keeping with the revelation imparted to them. Wherever they pitched their tents for any length of time they built altars, that, in compliance with ancient usage, they might call upon the name of the Lord (Gen. 12:7, 8; 13:4, 18, etc.). Those altars were, doubtless, simple mounds (Heb. בְּמִלָּה, baw-möllh') composed of earth and stone, while the victim sacrificed upon them consisted of animals of an edible nature (i. e., clean) taken from the fold.

We have no information regarding the particular ceremonies observed in connection with these sacrifices; but it is probable that prayer was offered by the patriarchs in person, who were in the habit of discharging the priestly functions. The offerings were for the most part burnt offerings, i. e., offerings that were entirely consumed upon the altar; although instances are given of a portion of the sacrifice being reserved for use in the sacrificial feasts (Gen. 3:54; 46:1). In the selection of animals for sacrifices the patriarchs were probably guided by the directions given to Abraham (15:9); while the way in which the sacrifice of Isaac terminated (22:12, 13) must have shown that the animal victim was to be regarded merely as a symbol of the heart's devotion to God. Whether these sacrifices were offered at regular intervals or on special occasions (see Job 1:5), we cannot say.

Besides altars, memorial stones (Heb. מַצֵּבֹת, mats-tsay-böth') were erected by the patriarchs on spots where God had favored them with special revelations, drink offerings being poured upon them (Gen. 28:18, sq.; 35:14, sq.). The narrative of Jacob's vow (28:20, sq.) tells of his promise that if God would watch over him, supply his wants, and bring him back in safety, that he would acknowledge Jehovah as his God, that he would consecrate the pillar he had set up and make it a house of God, and render to Jehovah the tenth of all his income. We read (35:1, sq.) of his exclusion of strange gods from his house, and, after due preparation on the part of his household, his building of an altar at Beth-el.

In the above-mentioned forms of worship the rite of circumcision was added. In obedience to a divine order, and as a token of the covenant which Jehovah made with him, Abraham performed this rite upon himself and the male members of his household, enjoining it upon his posterity as an inviolable obligation (17:1, sq.). Nothing further is known regarding the forms of worship which obtained among the patriarchs.

Mosaic. When Israel became a nation with an organized civil government, in order to fulfill its divine mission, it was necessary that its religious affairs should also be remodeled, and that the character and style of its worship should be fixed and regulated by positive divine enactments. This did not necessitate an entirely new system of worship, since they were to serve and worship the God of their fathers. Therefore the worship introduced by Moses was grafted on that of Israel's ancestors, improved and perfected only as the circumstances of the Israelites as a confederacy of tribes or a monarchy seemed to require, with such forms and ceremonies as would further Israel's divinely appointed mission. This object was further secured by the Mosaic ritual, inasmuch as it embraced all the essential elements of a perfect system of worship, giving precise directions as to the place of worship, with its structure and arrangements, instituting a distinct order of sacred functions, prescribing the religious ceremonies, fixing the sacred seasons and the manner in which they were to be observed.

This system bore the stamp of genuine worship, being framed by Moses in accordance with revelation, and recognizing Jehovah as the true God. Nor is it a vital objection to its being true worship that it had a material and sensuous character, and that many of its forms and ceremonies were such as belonged to the ritual of pagan religions. These facts have been variously misconstrued, and have been taken advantage of for the purpose of disparaging the origin and character of the Mosaic worship. It is true that the Mosaic worship embodies itself, for the most part, in outward forms and ceremonies, for one can only give expression to his relation to his Creator through corporal media. Religious thought and feeling can only express themselves in word and act; and therefore forms are necessary in every kind of worship. And being copies or impressions of religious ideas, they must have an allegorical or symbolical character.

Further, the religion of the Old Testament is monotheism, in contradiction to the polytheism of heathen nations. Jehovah is represented not only as the only true God; not merely as the almighty Creator, Preserver, and Governor of the world and every creature; not simply as the eternal, absolute Spirit, the good and merciful One who has destined man to enjoy the felicity of life which springs from personal fellowship with himself; as the omnipresent and near One watching over all his creatures, to keep the weak and distressed; who seeks to conduct those who have wandered from him back to the fountain of life; who selected for himself, from degenerate humanity, a race to be in a special sense his people, and to whom he, in a special sense, would be God, with the purpose of saving the world. This is accompanied with such directions for the regulations of their life, that, if accepted and complied with, Israel would become to Jehovah "a peculiar treasure above all people" (Exod. 19:5, sq.), "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation."

Christian. The Church of Christ is not only his representative body on earth, it is also the temple of divine service, continuing and perfecting the worship of the past. This service includes offerings presented to God, and blessings received from him. The former embraces the entire ordinance of worship, with its nature, reasons, and observances; the latter embraces the means of grace, common prayer, the word, and the sacraments. These, however, are really one, and their relations to each other as one are of great importance. Both require for their realization the institution of the evangelical ministry. The worship of the Christian Church may be regarded in its divine principles and in its human arrangements. As to the former, its object is the revealed Trinity; its form is mediatorial, through the Son incarnate, by the Holy Spirit; its attributes are spirituality, simplicity, purity, and reverent decorum; its seasons are the Christian Sabbath preeminently, and all times of holy assembly. As to the latter, it is left to the congregation itself to determine the minor details, according to the pattern shown in the Scripture.

As an institute of worship the Church of Christ has its ordinary channels for the communication of the influences of the Holy Ghost to the souls of men, viz., the means of grace; the supreme means being the word and prayer. Special attention is also called to the sacraments (q. v.), baptism, and the Lord's Supper (Keil, Bib. Arch., i, p. 55, sq.; Pope, Christ. Theol., iii, p. 287, sq.). See GLOSSARY.

WORTHIES (Heb. זָכָרִים, ad-deer', large). In Nahum (2:5) is the expression, "He shall recount his worthies," i. e., "he remembers his powerful ones." The Assyrian king is represented, in the hour of defeat, as remembering that he has brave and powerful ones, and sends for them.

WORTHY. See GLOSSARY.

WOT, WOULD. See GLOSSARY.

WOUNDS. See DISEASES.

WRATHS (Gr. θυμός, thoo-mos', passion). In the list of probable evils to be avoided (2 Cor. 12:20) is "wraths." Thoo-mos' and or-gay' (Gr. ὀργή) are found several times together in the New Testament (Rom. 2:8; Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8; Rev. 19:15). The general opinion of scholars is that thoo-mos' is the more turbulent commotion, the "boiling agitation of the feelings, either presently to subside and disappear, or else to settle down into or-gay', wherein is more of an abiding and settled habit of the mind ('ira inveterata'), with the purpose of revenge" (Trench, i, pp. 178, 179).

WREST. See GLOSSARY.

WRINKLE. Job in his complaint (16:8) says, "Thou hast filled me with wrinkles" (Heb. קְרַמְרָמ, kuw-mat'), a figurative expression, meaning to be shriveled up. Paul speaks (Eph. 5:27) of the Church as a bride "not having a spot or wrinkle" (Gr. ἰστίς, hroo-tece'). The former is any blemish on the person, the latter probably means the tokens of approaching age. If so, it reminds us of the continued youth and attractiveness of the Church.

WRITING (Heb. כָּתוּב, kaw-thab', to grave; כָּתוּב, saw-far', to inscribe; מִלְכָּתוּב, mik-tawb', characters in writing; Gr. γράφω, graf'-o, to grave, ἐπιγράφω, ep-ee-graf'-o, to write upon, to fix indelibly).

1. Antiquity. The conclusion of much of modern scholarship is that the art of writing dates back quite early in the history of the human family. The Old Testament writers, when they speak of reading and writing, speak of them as matters of course, as if they were commonly practiced, well-understood things. Thus it would seem that from a very early time reading and writing were quite common. "For, to speak first of all of Egypt, not only are there proofs of the practice of writing long before the time of Moses, but the period immediately preceding the exodus was one of remarkable activity and high attainment. The poem of Pentaur, which has been compared with a lay of the Iliad, celebrates a victory gained over the Hittites by Rameses II, the father of the Pharaoh of the exodus." The tablets found at Tell-el-Amarna, in Upper Egypt, written in the cuneiform character, go back to the century before the date assigned by most Egyptologists to the exodus. These prove, according to Sayce, that "good schools existed (at that time) throughout western Asia; that the people of Canaan could read and write before the Israelitish conquest; that there was an active literary intercourse from one end of the civilized East to the other."

Robertson (Early Religion of Israel, p. 78) says: "It is true the medium of communication was the Babylonian language and script; but we cannot suppose that a people acquainted with that mode of writing would relapse into illiterates when the Phœnician alphabet took its place; much more reasonable is it to suppose that this discovery would be an immense stimulus to them. We need no longer, therefore, wonder that among the towns taken by Joshua was one called Kirjath-sepher, book-town (Josh. 15:15; Judg. 1:11), or Kirjath-sannah (Josh. 15:49); or that a lad caught at the roadside was able to write down the names of the chief men of Succoth in the time of the judges (Judg. 8:14, R. V.)."

2. Scripture Mention. Writing is first distinctly mentioned in Exod. 17:14, and the connection clearly implies that it was not then employed for the first time, but was so familiar as to be used for historic records. Moses is commanded to preserve the memory of Amalek's onslaught in the desert by committing it to writing. The tables of the testimony are said to be "written by the finger of God" (Exod. 31:18) on both sides, and Oriental Letter Writer.

"the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables" (32:15). The engraving of the gems of the high priest's breastplate with the names of the children of Israel (28:11), and the inscription upon the miter (39:30) have to do more with the art of the engraver than of the writer, but both imply the existence of alphabetic characters. The curses against the adulteress were written by the priest "in the book," and blotted out with water (Num. 5:23). This proceeding, though principally distinguished by its symbolical character, involves the use of some kind of ink, and of a material on which the curses were written which would not be destroyed by water. Hitherto, however, nothing has been said of the application of writing to the purposes of ordinary life, or of the knowledge of the art among the common people. Up to this point such knowledge is only attributed to Moses and the priests. From Deut. 24:1, 3, however, it would appear that it was extended to others. It is not absolutely necessary to infer from this that the art of writing was an accomplishment possessed by every Hebrew citizen, though there is no mention of a third party; and it is more than probable that these "bills of divorcement," though apparently so informal, were the work of professional scribes. It was enjoined as one of the duties of the king (Deut. 17:18) that he should transcribe the book of the law for his own private study. If we examine the instances in which writing is mentioned in connection with individuals, we shall find that in all cases the writers were men of superior position. In Isa. 29:11, 12, there is clearly a distinction drawn between the man who was able to read and the man who was not, and it seems a natural inference that the accomplishments of reading and writing were not widely spread among the people, when we find that they are universally attributed to those of high rank or education—kings, priests, prophets, and professional scribes.

3. Materials. The oldest documents which contain the writing of a Shemitic race are probably the bricks of Nineveh and Babylon on which are impressed the cuneiform Assyrian inscriptions. There is, however, no evidence that they were ever employed by the Hebrews. Wood was used upon some occasions (Num. 17:3), and writing tablets of boxwood are mentioned in 2 Esd. 14:24. The "lead," to which allusion is made in Job 19:24, is supposed to have been poured, when melted, into the cavities of the stone made by the letters of an inscription, in order to render it durable. It is most probable that the ancient as well as the most common material which the Hebrews used for writing was dressed skin in some form or other. We know that the dressing of skins was practiced by the Hebrews (Exod. 25:5; Lev. 13:48), and they may have acquired the knowledge of the art from the Egyptians, among whom it had attained great perfection. Parchment was used for the manuscripts of the Pentateuch in the time of Josephus, and the μεμβράνας of 2 Tim. 4:13, were skins of parchment. It was one of the provisions in the Talmud that the law should be written on the skins of clean animals, tame or wild, or even of clean birds. The skins when written upon were formed into rolls (mégilloth; Psa. 40:8; comp. Isa. 34:4; Jer. 36:14; Ezek. 2:9; Zech. 5:1). See INK; INKHORN; PEN; ROLL; also SUPPLEMENT.

YARN (Heb. מִיקַיָּוַי, mik-vay', 1 Kings 10:28; מִיקַיָּוַי, mik-vay', 2 Chron. 1:16) is noticed in the two above-mentioned and extremely obscure passages. Keil (Com., in loc.) renders "And (as for) the going out of horses from Egypt for Solomon, a company of king's merchants fetched (horses) for a definite price." The R. V. has "And the king's merchants received them in droves, each drove at a price." This comes from understanding the Hebrew term as meaning company or troop.

2. Mo-law' (Heb. מוֹלָוַי, Isa. 58:6, 9; Jer. 27:2; 28:10, 12, 13; Ezek. 30:18), the bars of the yoke, i. e., the oxbows of the same form as now.

3. Ole (Heb. עֹל, Jer. 2:20, etc.; עֹל, 5:5), the curved piece of wood upon the neck of draught animals, by which they are fastened to the pole or beam. This is the Hebrew term most frequently rendered "yoke."

4. The Greek terms are dzoo-gos' (ζυγός, Matt. 11:29, 30; Acts 15:10; Gal. 5:1; 1 Tim. 6:1),

Two Draught Oxen Yoked Together.

The translators of the LXX. and Vulg. have taken מִיקַיָּוַי as the name of a place, ἔξ' Ἐκονέ, or rather ἐκ Κοπέ. According to this the rendering would be, "And as for the going out of horses from Egypt and Koa," etc.

YEAR. See TIME.

YEARN. See GLOSSARY.

YOKE. The rendering of the following Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Tseh'-med (Heb. צֶהְמֵד, 1 Sam. 11:7; 1 Kings 19:19, 21; Job 1:3; 42:12; Jer. 51:23) has the same meaning as our "yoke of oxen," viz., two. It also means so much land as two oxen will plow in a day.

which has the usual meaning of yoke; and dzoo-gos' (ζῦγος, Luke 14:19), meaning two draught cattle (horses, mules, or oxen) yoked together.

Figurative. Yoke is frequently used as a symbol of servitude to others (Gen. 27:40; Lev. 26:13; Deut. 28:48; Jer. 27:8, 11, 12; 1 Tim. 6:1); to one's own sins (Lam. 1:14); God's disciplinary teaching (Lam. 3:27; comp. Psa. 90:12; 119:71); "troublesome laws imposed on one, especially of the Mosaic law (Acts 15:10; Gal. 5:1); hence the name is so transferred to the commands of Christ as to contrast them with the commands of the Pharisees, which were a veritable 'yoke,' yet even Christ's commands must be submitted to, though easier to be kept (Matt. 11:29)" (Grimm, Gr. Lex.).

Z

ZAANA'IM (Heb. צֵאֲנַיִם, tsah-an-an-ncem'), a "plain," or, more accurately, "the oak by Zaanaim"—probably a sacred tree—marking the spot near which Heber the Kenite was encamped when Sisera took refuge in his tent (Judg. 4:11), and said to be near Kedesh, on the northwest of Lake Huleh. It is probably the same as Zaananim (Josh. 19:33).

ZA'ANAN (Heb. צֵאֲנָן, tsah-an-awn', place of flocks), a place named by Micah (1:11) in his address to the towns of the Shephelah. Keil objects to its identification with Zenan, "as Zenan was in the plain, and Zaanan was most probably to the north of Jerusalem."

ZAANAN'NIM (Heb. צֵאֲנַנִּים, tsah-an-an-ncem', only in Josh. 19:33; Judg. 4:11, marg.), and probably the same with ZAANAIM (q. v.).

ZA'AVAN (Heb. זָאָוָן, zah-av-awn', disquiet), the second named of the three sons of Ezer and a Horite chief (Gen. 36:27; 1 Chron. 1:42, "Zavan").

ZABAD (Heb. זָבָד, zav-baud', gift).

1. Son of Nathan, son of Attai, son of Ahlai, Sheshan's daughter (1 Chron. 2:31-37), and hence called son of Ahlai (11:41), B. C. about 992. He was one of David's mighty men, but none of his deeds has been recorded.

2. An Ephraimite, son of Tahath, and father of Shuthelah, 2 (1 Chron. 7:21).

3. Son of Shimeath, an Ammonitess; an assassin who, with Jehozabab, slew King Joash (2 Chron. 24:26), B. C. 797. The assassins were both put to death by Amaziah, but their children were spared (25:3, 4), in obedience to the law of Moses (Deut. 24:16). In 2 Kings 12:21 his name is written, probably more correctly, Jozachar.

4, 5, 6. Three Israelites, "sons" respectively of Zattu (Ezra 10:27), Hashum (10:33), and Nebo (10:43), who divorced their Gentile wives after the captivity, B. C. 466.

ZAB'BAI, or ZABBA'I (Heb. זַבַּי, zab-bal'ee, pure).

1. One of the "sons" of Bebai, who divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:28), B. C. 456.

2. Father of the Baruch who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 8:20), B. C. 445.

ZAB'BUD (Heb. זַבְיָד, zab-boo'd', given), a "son" of Bigvai, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (8:14), B. C. 459.

ZAB'DI (Heb. זַבְדִּי, zab-dee', giving).

1. The son of Zerah and grandfather of Achan, of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 7:1, 17, 18), B. C. before 1170.

2. The third of the nine sons of Shimhi the Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:19), B. C. about 1170.

3. The Shiphmite (i. e., inhabitant of Shepham), and David's custodian of wine cellars (1 Chron. 27:27), B. C. about 960.

4. Son of Asaph, the minstrel, and grandfather of Mattaniah, a prominent Levite in the time of Nehemiah (11:17), B. C. 445.

ZAB'DIEL (Heb. זַבְדִּיֵּאל, zab-dee-ale', gift of God).

1. The father of Jashobeam, which latter was commander of the first division of David's army (1 Chron. 27:2), B. C. about 960.

2. The "son of Haggadolim" (i. e., "mighty men of valor"), who was overseer of one hundred and twenty-eight of the captives returned from the captivity (Neh. 11:14), B. C. 445.

ZAB'BUD (Heb. זַבְיָד, zaw-boo'd', given), the son of Nathan (1 Kings 4:5). He is described as a priest (A. V. "principal officer"), and as holding at the court of Solomon the confidential post of "king's friend," which had been occupied by Hushai the Archite during the reign of David (2 Sam. 15:37; 16:16; 1 Chron. 27:33).

ZAB'ULON (Gr. Ζαβουλών, dzab-oo-lone), the Greek form of the name Zebulun (Matt. 4:13, 15; Rev. 7:8).

ZAC'CAI (Heb. זַכַּי, zak-kah'ee, pure). The sons of Zaccai to the number of seven hundred and sixty returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:9; Neh. 7:14), B. C. before 536.

ZACCHE'US, more properly ZACCHÆ'US (Gr. Ζακχαῖος, dzak-chal'ee-yos, for Heb. Zaccai), a chief publican (ἀρχιτελώνης) residing at Jericho, who, being short of stature, climbed up into a sycamore tree in order that he might see Jesus as he passed through that town. When Jesus came to the tree he paused, looked up, and calling Zaccheus by name, bade him hasten and come down, because he intended to be a guest at his house. With undisguised joy Zaccheus hastened down and welcomed the Master. The people murmured, saying, "That he was gone to be a guest with a man that is a sinner." Zaccheus was especially odious as being a Jew and occupying an official rank among the taxgatherers, which would indicate unusual activity in the service of the Roman oppressors. He seems to have been deeply moved by the consideration shown him by Jesus, and, before all the people, made the vow which attested his penitence, "Behold, half of my goods, Lord, I hereby give to the poor; and whatever fraudulent gain I ever made from any one, I now restore fourfold," greater restitution than the law required (Num. 5:7). Jesus thereupon made the declaration, "This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is [in the true spiritual sense] a son of Abraham" (Luke 19:1-10).

ZAC'CHUR (1 Chron. 4:26), see ZACCUR, 2.

ZAC'CUR (Heb. זַכְכּוּר, zak-koor', mindful).

1. The father of Shammua, the Reubenite spy (Num. 13:4), B. C. before 1209.

2. Son of Hamuel, and father of Shimei (1 Chron. 4:26; A. V. "Zacchur"), B. C. before 1170.

3. A Levite, and third named of the four "sons of Merari by Jaaziah" (1 Chron. 24:27).

4. Son of Asaph the singer, and leader of the third course of Levitical musicians (1 Chron. 25:2, 10; Neh. 12:35).

5. The son of Imri, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the city wall (Neh. 3:2), B. C. 445.

6. A Levite, or family of Levites, who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:12), B. C. 445.

7. A Levite whose son or descendant, Hanan, was one of the treasurers over the treasuries (marg. "storehouses") appointed by Nehemiah (13:13), B. C. 434.

ZACHARI'AH (another form of ZACHARIAH), the son of Jeroboam II, the last of the house of Jehu, and fourteenth king of Israel. He ascended the throne upon the death of his father (2 Kings 14:29), B. C. about 742. He reigned only six months, being slain by Shallum (15:8-10).

ZACHARI'AS (Gr. Ζαχαρίας, dzakh-ar-ee'-as, Greek form of Heb. Zechariah).

1. Son of Barachias, who, our Lord says, was slain by the Jews between the altar and the temple (Matt. 23:35; Luke 11:51). There has been much dispute who this Zacharias was. Many of the Greek fathers have maintained that the father of John the Baptist is the person to whom our Lord alludes; but there can be little or no doubt that the allusion is to Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada (2 Chron. 24:20, 21).

2. Father of John the Baptist (Luke 1:5, sq.).

ZAC'CHER (Heb. זַכָּר, zeh'-ker, memorial), one of the sons of Jehiel, the father or founder of Gibeon, by his wife Maachah (1 Chron. 8:31; 9:37, "Zechariah").

ZADOK (Heb. זָדוֹק, tsaw-doke', just).

1. Son of Ahitub, and, with Abiathar, high priest in the time of David. He was of the house of Eleazar, the son of Aaron (1 Chron. 24:3), and eleventh in descent from Aaron. (1) Joins David. In 1 Chron. 12:28 we are told that he joined David at Hebron, after Saul's death, with twenty-two captains of his father's house, and, apparently, with nine hundred men (4,600—3,700, vers. 26, 27), B. C. 1000. (2) Fidelity to David. From this time Zadok was unwavering in his loyalty to David. When Absalom revolted and David fled from Jerusalem, Zadok and all the Levites bearing the ark accompanied him, and it was only at the king's express command that they returned to Jerusalem, and became the medium of communication between the king and Hushai the Archite (2 Sam., ch. 15; 17:15). After Absalom's death Zadok and Abiathar were the persons who persuaded the elders of Judah to invite David to return (19:11). When Adonijah, in David's old age, set up for king, and had persuaded Joab and Abiathar the priest to join his party, Zadok was unmoved, and was employed by David to anoint Solomon to be king in his room (1 Kings, ch. 1). (3) Rewarded. For this fidelity he was rewarded by Solomon, who "thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord," and "put in Zadok the priest" in his room (2:27, 35). From this time, however, we hear little of him. It is said in general terms in the enumeration of Solomon's officers of state that Zadok was the priest (1 Kings 4:4; 1 Chron. 29:22), but no single act of his is mentioned. Zadok and Abiathar were cohanim, i. e., officiating high priests (2 Sam. 15:35, 36; 19:11). The duties of the office were divided. Zadok ministered before the tabernacle at Gibeon (1 Chron. 16:39); Abiathar had the care of the ark at Jerusalem; not, however, exclusively (1 Chron. 15:11; 2 Sam. 15:24, 25, 29).

2. In the genealogy of the high priests in 1 Chron. 6:12, there is a second Zadok, son of a second Ahitub, and father of Shallum. It is supposed by some that the name was inserted by error of a copyist, while others identify him with Odeas, mentioned by Joseplus (Ant., x, 8, 6). He is perhaps the same person as the one mentioned (1 Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11).

3. Father of Jerusha, the wife of Uzziah, and mother of King Jotham (2 Kings 15:33; 2 Chron. 27:1), B. C. before 738.

4. Son of Baana, who repaired a portion of the wall in the time of Nehemiah (3:4). He is probably the same who is in the list of those that sealed the covenant in Neh. 10:21, as in both cases his name follows that of Meshebebel (B. C. 445).

5. Son of Immer, a priest who repaired a portion of the wall opposite his house (Neh. 3:29), B. C. 445.

6. The scribe whom Nehemiah appointed one of the three principal treasurers of the temple (Neh. 13:13), B. C. 445.

ZAHAM (Heb. זָהָם, zah'-ham, loathing), the last of the three sons of Rehoboam by Abihail (2 Chron. 11:19), B. C. about 930. Keil (Com., in loc.) holds that Mahalath is the wife of Rehoboam, and that Abihail, the daughter of Eliab, was Mahalath's mother.

ZATR (Heb. זָטָר, tsaw-er', little), a place east of the Dead Sea, in Idumea, where Israel discomfited the Edomites (2 Kings 8:21). Its identification is not positive.

ZAL'APH (Heb. זָלָפֶה, tsaw-lawf', perhaps wound), the father of Hianun, who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:30), B. C. 445.

ZAL'MON (Heb. זָלְמוֹן, tsal-mone', shady).

1. An Aholite (i. e., sprung from the Benjamite family of Ahoah), and one of David's warriors (2 Sam. 23:28). In the parallel passage (1 Chron. 11:29) he is called ILAI (q. v.).

2. A wood near Shechem (Judg. 9:48), a kind of "black forest," as rendered by Luther. David (Psa. 68:14, "white as snow in Salmon") uses language symbolical of the presence of light in darkness, or brightness in calamity.

ZALMONAH (Heb. זָלְמוֹנָה, tsal-mo-naw', shady), a station of Israel in the wilderness (Num. 33:41, 42). It lay southeast of Edom, perhaps in the Wady el-Amran, which runs into the Wady Ithm, close to where Elath anciently stood.

ZALMUN'NA (Heb. זָלְמוֹנָנָה, tsal-moon-naw', shade denied, i. e., deprived of protection), one of the two kings of Midian who were captured and slain by Gideon (Judg. 8:5—21; Psa. 83:11), B. C. about 1100. See ZEBAH.

ZAMZUM'MIM (Heb. זַמְזוּמִים, zam-zum-mim', only in Deut. 2:20), the name given by the Ammonites to the people called by others REPHEIM (q. v.). They were "a people great, many, and tall." "From a slight similarity between the two names, and from the mention of both in connection with the Enim, it is usually assumed that the Zamzumims were identical with the Zuzims" (q. v.), but all is conjecture.—W. H.

ZANO'AH (Heb. זָנוֹאֵה, zaw-no'-akh, marsh, bog).

1. A town in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:34). It was inhabited by Judeans after the captivity (Neh. 11:30), who also assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (3:13). The site is marked now by Zan'va in the Wady Ismail, some ten miles west of Jerusalem.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah, ten miles southwest of Hebron (Josh. 15:56). In 1 Chron. 4:18 Jekuthiel is said to have been the father (i. e., founder or rebuilder) of Zanoah.

ZAPH'NATH-PAANE'AH (Heb. זָפְנַת פְּאֵנֵאָה, tsaf-nalk' pah-nay'-akh), the name given by Pharaoh to Joseph (Gen. 41:45). According to Rossellini and more recent Egyptologists, Zaph-nath-paaneah answers to the Coptic P-sont-emp-anh, i. e., sustentator vite, support or sustainer of life, with reference to the call intrusted to him by God. Sayce (Higher Crit. and the Monuments, p. 213) says, "At present the origin of the first syllable is still doubtful, and though the latter part of the name is certainly the Egyptian n-ti-pa-anhk, 'of the life,' it is difficult to say in which of its different senses pa-ankh, 'the life,' is employed." See JOSEPH, SUPPLEMENT.

ZAPHON (Heb. צַפּוֹן, tsaw-fone', north), a place mentioned, in connection with Beth-aram, Beth-nimrah, and Succoth, as part of the inheritance of Gad (Josh. 13:27). It was in "the valley" (i. e., of Jordan), and probably not far from the southern extremity of the Sea of Galilee.

ZARA (Gr. Ζαρά, dzar-ah'), the Greek form (Matt. 1:3) of the Hebrew name ZERAH 2 (q. v.).

ZARAH (Gen. 38:30; 46:12). See ZERAH. 2.

ZAREAH (Neh. 11:29). See ZORAH.

ZAREATHITE (1 Chron. 2:53). See ZORATHITE.

ZARED (Num. 21:12). See ZERED.

ZAREPHATH (Heb. צַרְפָּת, tsaw-ref-ath', refinement), a town which derives its claim to notice from having been the residence of the prophet Elijah during the latter part of the drought (1 Kings 17:9, 10). Beyond stating that it was near to, or dependent on, Zidon, the Bible gives no clue to its position. Josephus (Ant., viii, 13, 2) says that it was "not far from Sidon and Tyre, for it lies between them." It is on the seashore, north of Tyre. And to this Jerome adds (Onom., "Sarepta") that it "lay on the public road," i. e., the coast road. Both these conditions are implied in the mention of it in the itinerary of Paula by Jerome, and both are fulfilled in the situation of the modern village of Sirafend. Of the old town considerable indications remain. One group of foundations is on a headland called Ain el-Kantarah; but the chief remains are south of this, and extend for a mile or more, with many fragments of columns, slabs, and other architectural features. In the New Testament Zarephath appears under the Greek form of Sarepta.

ZARETAN (Heb. צַרְתָּן, tsaw-reth-awn', cooling), a place named in the account of the passage of Jordan by the Israelites, "That the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap very far from the city Adam, that is beside Zaretan" (Josh. 3:16; R. V. "rose up in one heap, a great way off, at Adam, the city that is beside Zarethan"). "Near Beisân is an unusually large mound called Tell es Sârem. A good deal of clay is found here, and a mile to the south is a stream the Arabic of which means 'red river.' . . . It has been suggested that the waters of the Jordan were suddenly dammed up by a landslip or similar convulsion. The appearance of the banks, and the curious bends of the river near this place, would seem to support the idea. . . . It is clear from the Bible statement that the waters were arrested a long way off, above Jericho" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Disc., p. 148). Kurn Sartabeh is a little more than fifteen miles above Jericho, which tallies well with the expression "very far." See ZARTHAN.

ZARETH-SHACHAR (Heb. צַרְתָּת הַשָּׁחַר, tsch'-reth hash-shakh'-ar, the splendor of dawn), a city in Reuben "in the mount of a valley" (Josh. 13:19), and near the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. Identified with the ruins of Zara, in Wady Zurka Main.

ZAR'HITES, THE (Heb. זָרְחִי, zar-khes'), a branch of the tribe of Judah; descended from Zerah, the son of Judah (Num. 26:13, 20; Josh. 7:17; 1 Chron. 27:11, 13).

ZAR'TANAH, a place named (1 Kings 4:12) to define the position of Beth-shean. It is possibly identical with ZARTHAN (q. v.).

ZARTHAN (Heb. זָרְתָּן, tsaw-reth-awn').

1. A place in the ciccar or circle of Jordan, mentioned in connection with Succoth (1 Kings 7:46), between which and Zarthan the bronze (or copper) vessels for the temple were cast. It is given in 2 Chron. 4:17 as Zeredathah.

2. It is also named in the account of the passage of the Jordan by the Israelites (Josh. 3:16, A. V. "Zaretan") as defining the position of the city Adam.

ZATTHU (Neh. 10:14). See ZATTU.

ZATTU (Heb. זַטּוּ, zat-too', derivation uncertain), an Israelite whose "children," to the number of nine hundred and forty-five (Ezra 2:8) or eight hundred and forty-five (Neh. 7:13), returned with Zerubbabel (B. C. before 536). Several of his descendants renounced their Gentile wives (Ezra 10:27), and a person (or family) was among those who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:14, "Zatthu").

ZAVAN (1 Chron. 1:42). See ZAAVAN.

ZAZA (Heb. זָזָא, zaw-zaw', prominent [?]), the second son of Jonathan, a descendant of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:33).

ZEBADI'AH (Heb. זְבַדִּיָּהוּ, zeb-ad-yaw', and זְבַדִּיָּהוּ, zeb-ad-yaw'-hoo, gift of Jehovah).

1. A Benjamite, of the sons of Beriah (1 Chron. 8:15).

2. A Benjamite, of the sons of Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:17).

3. One of the two sons of Jeroham of Gedor, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:7), B. C. before 1000.

4. Third son of Meshelemiah the Korhite (1 Chron. 26:2).

5. Son of Asahel, the brother of Joab, of the fourth division of David's army (1 Chron. 27:7), B. C. before 960.

6. A Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat, sent to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), B. C. 872.

7. The son of Ishmael, and prince of the house of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19:11), B. C. about 853.

8. Son of Michael, of the "sons" of Shephatiah, who returned with Ezra from captivity with eighty males (Ezra 8:8), B. C. about 457.

9. A priest of the sons of Immer, who had married a foreign wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:20), B. C. 456.

ZEBAH (Heb. זֶבַח, zeh'-bakh, sacrifice), one of the two Midianitish kings overthrown by Gideon. He is mentioned in Judg. 8:5-21; Psa. 83:11, and always in connection with Zalmunna. They seem to have commanded the invasion of Palestine, leading their hordes with the cry, "Seize these goodly pastures" (v. 12). While Oreb and Zeeb, two of the inferior leaders of the incursion, had been slain, with a vast number of their people, by the Ephraimites, at the central fords of the Jordan, the two kings had succeeded in making their escape by a passage farther to the north (probably the ford near Beth-shean), and thence by the Wady Yabis, through Gilead, to Karkor, a place which is not fixed, but which lay doubtless high up on the Hauran. Here they were reposing with fifteen thousand men, a mere remnant of their huge horde, when Gideon overtook them. The name of Gideon was still full of terror, and the Bedouins were entirely unprepared for his attack—they fled in dismay, and the two kings were taken. They were brought to Ophrah, the native village of their captor, and then Gideon asked them, "What manner of men were they which ye slew at Tabor?" Up to this time the sheikhs may have believed that they were reserved for ransom; but these words once spoken, there can have been no doubt what their fate was to be. They met it like noble children of the desert, simply requesting that the blow should be struck by their captor himself; "and Gideon arose and slew them," B. C. about 1100.

ZEBAIM (Heb. זֵבַיִם, hats-zeb-av-yim', the gazelles), apparently the name of the native place of the "sons of Pochereth," who are mentioned in the catalogue of "Solomon's slaves" as having returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59).

ZEB'EDEE (Gr. Ζεβεδαιος, dzeb-ed-ah'-yos, the Greek form, probably, of Zabdi or Zebediah), the father of James the Great and John (Matt. 4:21), and the husband of Salome (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40). He was a Galilean fisherman, living probably either at or near Bethsaida. From the mention of his "hired servants" (Mark 1:20), and the acquaintance between John and Annas the high priest, it has been inferred that the family were in good circumstances. He appears only once in the gospel narrative, viz., in Matt. 4:21, 22; Mark 1:19, 20, where he is seen in his boat with his two sons, mending their nets.

ZEBINA (Heb. זְבִינָה, zeb-ee-naw', bought), one of the "sons" of Nebo, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:43), B. C. 456.

ZEBOIM (Gen. 14:2, 8). See ZEBOIM.

ZEBOIM, the rendering of: 1. (Heb. זְבִיַּים, zeb-o-ee-m', gazelles), one of the five cities in the vale of Siddim, destroyed by Jehovah (Gen. 10:19; Deut. 29:23; Hos. 11:8). It was ruled over by a separate king, Shemeber (Gen. 14:2, 8).

2. (Heb. הַיַּבְעִים, hats-zeb-o-ee-m', valley of the wild beasts), the name of a valley, i. e., the ravine or gorge, apparently east of Michmash (1 Sam. 13:18), near to which one of the flying columns of the Philistines came. "The wilderness" is no doubt the district of uncultivated mountain tops and sides lying between the central portion of Benjamin and the Jordan valley. In that very district there is a wild gorge known as Shuk ed-Duba, "ravine of the hyena."

ZEBU'DAH (Heb. זְבוּדָה, zeb-oo-daw', given), a daughter of Pedaiah, of Rumah, wife of Josiah, and mother of King Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:36), B. C. before 608.

ZEBUL (Heb. זְבֻל, zeb-ool', dwelling), ruler of the city of Shechem under Abimelech. He advised Abimelech of the defection of the Shechemites, and counseled him to advance upon the city. He closed the gates of the city against Gaal and his men that went out to fight against Abimelech, and thus assisted in their overthrow (Judg. 9:28-41), B. C. about 1100.

ZEBULONITE (Heb. זְבוּלֹנִי, zeb-oo-lo-nee'), a member of the tribe of Zebulun (Judg. 12:11, 12; Num. 26:27, A. V. "Zebulonite").

ZEB'ULUN (Heb. זְבוּלֹן, zeb-oo-loon', habitation).

1. The tenth son of Jacob, and the sixth and last of Leah (Gen. 30:19, 20). We have nothing recorded concerning Zebulun personally. In the genealogical list (ch. 46) he is mentioned as having, at the time of the migration into Egypt, three sons, founders of the chief families of the tribe (comp. Num. 26:26).

Tribe. During the desert journey Zebulun, with Judah and Issachar, formed the first camp. The tribe then numbered fifty-seven thousand four hundred (1:31). The head of the tribe at Sinai was Eliab, son of Helon (7:24), and at Shiloh, Elizaphan, son of Parnach (34:25). Its representative among the spies was Gaddiel, son of Sodi (13:10). The territory of Zebulun in Canaan lay between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean Sea. Nazareth and Cana were in it; and it embraced a section of the shore of the former sea, where Christ performed so many of his miracles. Then was fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah (Isa. 9:1, 2; comp. Matt. 4:12-16). In the visions of Ezekiel (48:26-33) and of John (Rev. 7:8) this tribe finds due mention.

2. A place on the eastern border of the tribe of Asher, between Beth-dagon and the valley of Jiphthah-el (Josh. 19:27).

ZEBULONITE (Num. 27:27). See ZEBULONITE.

ZECHARIAH (Heb. זְכַרְיָה, zeh-ar-yaw', remembered of Jehovah).

1. A chief of the Reubenites at the time of the captivity by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. 5:7), B. C. about 740.

2. Son of Meshelemiah, or Shelemiah, a Korhite and keeper of the north gate of the tabernacle of the congregation (1 Chron. 9:21). In 26:2, 14, he is described as "one counseling with understanding."

3. One of the sons of Jehiel (1 Chron. 9:37).

4. A Levite of the second order in the temple band as arranged by David, appointed to play "with psalteries on Alamoth" (1 Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:5), B. C. before 960.

5. One of the priests who, with trumpets, accompanied the ark from the house of Obad-edom (1 Chron. 15:24), B. C. about 988.

6. Son of Isshiah, or Jesiah, a Kohathite Levite, descended from Uzziel (1 Chron. 24:25).

7. Fourth son of Hosah, of the children of Merari (1 Chron. 26:11).

8. The father of Iddo, who was chief of his tribe, Manasseh in Gilead, in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:21), B. C. about 1000.

9. One of the princes of Judah sent to teach the people the law in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 17:7), B. C. 912.

10. The son of Benaiah and father of Jahaziel, which latter was the Gershonite Levite who encouraged the army of Jehoshaphat against the Moabites (2 Chron. 20:14), B. C. before 875.

11. One of the sons of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2).

12. Son of the high priest Jehoiada in the reign of Joash, king of Judah (2 Chron. 24:20), and therefore the king's cousin. After the death of Jehoiada, Zechariah probably succeeded to his office, and in attempting to check the reaction in favor of idolatry which immediately followed, he fell a victim to a conspiracy formed against him by the king, and was stoned in the court of the temple, B. C. 836. It is probable that "Zacharias, son of Barachias," who was slain between the temple and the altar (Matt. 23:35), is the same with Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, and that the name of Barachias as his father crept into the text from a marginal gloss, the writer confusing this Zechariah either with Zechariah the prophet, who was the son of Berechiah, or with another Zechariah, the son of Jeberechiah (Isa. 8:2).

13. A prophet in the reign of Uzziah, who appears to have acted as the king's counselor, but of whom nothing is known (2 Chron. 26:5), B. C. 783.

14. The father of Abijah, or Abi, Hezekiah's mother (2 Chron. 29:1), B. C. before 719.

15. A Levite who, in the reign of Hezekiah, assisted in the purification of the temple (2 Chron. 29:13), B. C. 719.

16. A Kohathite Levite and an overseer of the temple restoration in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:12), B. C. 621.

17. One of the rulers of the temple in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 35:8), B. C. about 621.

18. The leader of the "sons" of Pharosh, who, to the number of one hundred and fifty, returned with Ezra (8:3), B. C. about 457.

19. The leader of the twenty-eight "sons" of Bebai, who returned from captivity with Ezra (8:11), B. C. 457.

20. One of the chiefs of the people whom Ezra summoned in council at the river Ahava (Ezra 8:16). He stood at Ezra's left hand when he expounded the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), B. C. 457.

21. One of the family of Elam who divorced a foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:26), B. C. 456.

22. One of the ancestors of Athaiah, of the tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:4), B. C. before 536.

23. The son of Shiloni and father of Joiarib, of the family of Perez (Neh. 11:5).

24. A priest and ancestor of Adaiiah, which latter was prominent in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:12), B. C. before 445.

25. The representative of the priestly family of Iddo in the days of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua (Neh. 12:16). Probably the same as Zechariah the prophet, the son of Iddo, B. C. about 536.

26. One of the priests, son of Jonathan, who blew with the trumpets at the dedication of the city wall by Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 12:35, 41), B. C. 445.

27. The son of Jeberechiah, who was taken by the prophet Isaiah as one of the "faithful witnesses to record," when he wrote concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Isa. 8:2), B. C. about 742.

28. The eleventh of the twelve minor prophets. Zechariah was of priestly descent, a son of Berechiah and grandson of Iddo (Zech. 1:1, 7), the chief of one of the priestly families that returned from exile along with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4). His mention in Ezra 5:1; 6:14, as the son of Iddo is explained by the hypothesis that owing to some unexplained cause—perhaps the death of his father—Zechariah followed his grandfather in the priestly office, and so the historian dropped the father's name. Zechariah commenced his prophetic labors in the eighth month of the second year of Darius, B. C. about 520. In the fourth year of Darius a deputation of Jews came to the temple to inquire whether the day on which Jerusalem and the temple were reduced to ashes by the Chaldeans was still to be kept as a day of mourning and fasting. Zechariah replied to them declaring that, in the sight of Jehovah, obedience is better than fasting. Two other oracles delivered by Zechariah are recorded in his book of prophecies (chaps. 9–11 and 12–14). According to the fathers, Zechariah exercised his prophetic office in Chaldea, where he wrought many miracles—returned to Jerusalem when an old man, still discharging the duties of his priestly office, and, dying at an advanced age, was buried in the holy city by the side of Haggai. The statement to the effect that he was slain under Joash has arisen from his being confounded with the Zechariah mentioned in 2 Chron. 24:20; Matt. 23:35. See 12; BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

ZEDAD (Heb. זֶדָד, tsed-awd', side, sloping place), a city on the northern boundary of Palestine, as promised by Moses (Num. 34:8), and as restored by Ezekiel (Ezek. 47:15). It is identical with Sudud, between Emesa and Baalbec.

ZEDEKI'AH (Heb. זְדַכְיָהוּ, tsid-kee-yaw', and זְדַכְיָהוּ, tsid-kee-yaw'-hoo, justice of Jehovah).

1. Son of Chenaanah, and the person who acted as spokesman of the prophets when consulted by Ahab as to the result of his proposed expedition to Ramoth-gilead (B. C. 875). Preparing himself with a pair of iron horns (the horns of the re'em, or buffalo, being the recognized emblem of the tribe of Ephraim), Zedekiah illustrated the manner in which Ahab should drive the Syrians before him. When Micaiah delivered his prophecy Zedekiah came near and smote him upon the cheek. For this he was threatened by Micaiah in terms that evidently alluded to some personal danger. The probability that Zedekiah and his followers were false prophets is strengthened by the question of the king, "Is there not here besides a prophet of Jehovah, that we may inquire of him?" (1 Kings 22:11; 2 Chron. 18:10.)

2. The Last King of Judah. (1) Family. Zedekiah was the son of Josiah by his wife Hamutal, and therefore own brother to Jehoahaz (2 Kings 24:18; comp. 23:31; 1 Chron. 3:15). His original name had been Mattaniah, which was changed to Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar, when he carried off his nephew Jehoiachin to Babylon, and left him on the throne of Jerusalem. (2) Reign. Zedekiah was twenty-one years of age when he was made king (2 Kings 24:17, 18; 2 Chron. 36:11), B. C. 597. The earlier portion of Zedekiah's reign was marked by an agitation throughout the whole of Syria against the Babylonian yoke. In this movement Jerusalem seems to have taken the lead, since in the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign we find ambassadors from all the neighboring kingdoms—Tyre, Sidon, Edom, and Moab—at his court, to consult as to the steps to be taken. This happened either during the king's absence or immediately after his return from Babylon, whither he went, perhaps, to blind the eyes of Nebuchadnezzar to his contemplated revolt (Jer. 51:59). The first act of overt rebellion of which any record survives was the formation of an alliance with Egypt, of itself equivalent to a declaration of enmity with Babylon. As a natural consequence it brought on Jerusalem an immediate invasion of the Chaldeans. The mention of this event in the Bible, though sure, is extremely slight, and occurs only in Jer. 37:5-11; 34:21, and Ezek. 17:15-20; but Josephus (x, 7, 3) relates it more fully, and gives the date of its occurrence, viz., the eighth year of Zedekiah. Nebuchadnezzar, aware of Zedekiah's defection, sent an army and reduced the whole country of Judea, excepting Jerusalem, Lachish, and Azekah (Jer. 34:7). Pharaoh having marched to the assistance of Zedekiah, the Chaldeans at once raised the siege and advanced to meet him. The nobles seized this opportunity of reenslaving those whom they had so recently manumitted (ch. 34). Shortly after this Jeremiah was put in prison, and would probably have lost his life but for the interference of Zedekiah (37:15-21). On the tenth day of the tenth month of Zedekiah's ninth year the Chaldeans were again before the walls (52:4). From this time forward the siege progressed slowly but surely to its consummation, with the accompaniment of both famine and pestilence. Zedekiah again interfered to preserve the life of Jeremiah from the vengeance of the princes (38:7-13). While the king was hesitating the end was rapidly coming nearer. The city was indeed reduced to the last extremity. The fire of the besiegers had throughout been very destructive, but it was now aided by a severe famine. The bread had long since been consumed (38:9), and all the terrible expedients had been tried to which the wretched inhabitants of a besieged town are forced to resort in such cases. At last, after sixteen dreadful months, the catastrophe arrived. It was on the ninth day of the fourth month, about the middle of July, at midnight, as Josephus with careful minuteness informs us, that the breach in those stout and venerable walls was effected. Passing in through the breach, they made their way, as their custom was, to the center of the city, and for the first time the temple was entered by a hostile force. Zedekiah fled, but was betrayed by some Jews who had deserted to the enemy. After his capture he and his sons were sent to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, while his daughters were kept at Jerusalem. Nebuchadnezzar reproached Zedekiah for breaking his oath of allegiance, ordered his sons to be slain before him, and then his own eyes to be thrust out. He was loaded with chains and taken to Babylon, where he died (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

NOTE.—At first sight there seems a discrepancy between Jer. 34:3; 2 Kings 25:7; Ezek. 12:13. The first passage, however, does not assert that he should actually see Babylon, but that he should see the king and go thither. The above facts verify the predictions. Zedekiah saw the king of Babylon, but not the city itself, having lost his sight before being taken there.

3. A son of Jeconiah and grandson of Jehoiakim, king of Judah (1 Chron. 3:16), B. C. 598 or later. Some identify him with the person mentioned in v. 15, but Keil (Com., in loc.) conjectures that he was a literal son, and not simply a successor of Jeconiah, and that he died before the exile.

4. The son of Maaseiah and a false prophet among the captives in Babylon. He was denounced by Jeremiah (29:21) for having, with Ahab, uttered false prophecies, and for flagitious conduct. Their names were to become a byword, and their terrible fate—death by burning—a warning, B. C. about 586.

5. The son of Hananiah, and one of the princes of Judah who received the announcement that Baruch had delivered the words of Jeremiah to the people (Jer. 36:12), B. C. 607.

ZE'EB (Heb. זֵבִי, zeh-abe', wolf), one of the princes of Midian who were defeated by Gideon, probably near the Jordan. Zeeb was slain in a wine press, which in later times bore his name (Judg. 7:24, 25; 8:3; Psa. 83:11), B. C. about 1100.

ZELAH (Heb. זֶלַח, tsel'-lah, slope, side), a town in Benjamin, which was the family burying place of Kish, the father of Saul (2 Sam. 21:14; comp. Josh. 18:28), probably the native place of Saul, the first king of Israel. It has not been identified.

ZE'LEK (Heb. זֶלֶק, tsel'-lek, fissure), an Ammonite and one of David's valiant men (2 Sam. 23:37; 1 Chron. 11:39).

ZELO'PHEHAD (Heb. זֶלּוֹפְהָדָי, tsel-of-khawd', meaning unknown), the son of Hephher and descendant of Manasseh through Gilead (Josh. 17:3), B. C. before 1170. He died without male heirs, and his five daughters claimed his inheritance. The claim was admitted by divine direction, and a law was promulgated, to be of general application, that if a man died without sons his inheritance should pass to his daughters (Num. 26:33; 27:1-11). A still further enactment (ch. 36) provided that such heiresses should not marry out of their own tribes—a regulation which the five daughters of Zelophehad complied with, all being married to Manassites.

ZELOTES (Gr. Ζηλωτής, dzay-lo-tace', partisan), the surname of the apostle Simon (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13), to distinguish him from Simon Peter. In the parallel lists (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:

18) he is called Simon the Canaanite, this being thought by some to be a transliteration of the Heb. זֵלְזָה, kan-awn', zeal. Meyer (Com., on Matt. 10:4) says: "Zealots were a class of men who, like Phineas (Num. 25:7), were fanatical defenders of the theocracy; and who, while taking vengeance on those who wronged it, were themselves guilty of great excesses. But the δ Kavavaios (or Kavavirns, according to the received text) is not to be explained in this way, inasmuch as this form of the epithet is derived from the name of some place or other."

ZEL'ZAH (Heb. זֵלְזָה, tsel-tsakh', clear shade), a place in the border of Benjamin, mentioned by Samuel when taking leave of Saul at Ramah (1 Sam. 10:2). Among the signs which the prophet said would confirm his anointing of Saul was the latter's meeting with two men at Rachel's sepulcher. This was on the way from Bethel to Bethlehem, and to the west in full view is the village of Beit Jala, which may be identical with Zelzah.

ZEMARA'IM (Heb. זְמַרְאִים, tsem-aw-rah'-yim, double fleece).

1. One of the ancient towns assigned to Benjamin (Josh. 18:22); in the eastern section of its territory, and grouped with Beth-arabah and Beth-el. It is probably to be identified with the ruins of es-Sumrah, on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, east of Kkan Hadhur.

2. The mountain from which Abijah, king of Judah, addressed Jeroboam and the army of Israel (2 Chron. 13:4). It is described as being "in Mount Ephraim," i. e., within the general highland district of that tribe. Robinson (Phys. Geog., § 38) conjectures Mount Zemaraim to the east of Bethel, near the border of the two kingdoms, to which Mount Ephraim also extends.

ZEM'ARITES (Heb. זְמַרְאִים, hats-tsem-aw-ree', "the Zemarite," only found Gen. 10:18 and 1 Chron. 1:16), the name of a people reckoned among the sons of Canaan, "the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite," whence it is naturally assumed that the Zemarites lived between Arvad and Hamath. The old interpreters, as the Jerusalem Targum, the Arabic version, etc., locate them at Emessa, the modern Hums. Michaelis placed them at Sumra, the classical Simyra (but see Smith, Dict. of Greek and Rom. Geog., s. v.). It is possible that the names Zemaraim (Josh. 18:22) and Mount Zemaraim (2 Chron. 13:4) represent southern migrations of Zemarites; or, as the list in Gen. 10:15-18 is not altogether in strict geographical order, the Zemarites as a whole may have lived in the vicinity of Zemaraim and Mount Zemaraim.—W. H.

ZEMI'RA (Heb. זְמִירָה, zem-ee-raw', music), one of the nine sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

ZE'NAN (Heb. זֵנָן, tsen-awn', pointed), a town in the lowland district of Judah (Josh. 15:37), and supposed to be the same as Zaanán (Mic. 1:11).

ZE'NAS (Gr. Ζηνάς, deay-nas', Jove-given), a Christian lawyer of Crete mentioned in Tit.

3:13, in connection with Apollos. It is impossible to determine whether Zenas was a Roman juriconsult or a Jewish doctor. Grotius thinks that he was a Greek who had studied Roman law. The New Testament usage of νομικός, "lawyer," leads rather to the other inference.

ZEPHANI'AH (Heb. זְפַנְיָהּ, tsef-an-yaw', hidden of Jehovah).

1. A Kohathite Levite, ancestor of Samuel and Heman (1 Chron. 6:36).

2. The son of Maaseiah (Jer. 21:1), and sagan, or second priest, in the reign of Zedekiah. He succeeded Jehoiada (29:25, 26), and was probably a ruler of the temple, whose office it was among others to punish pretenders to the gift of prophecy. In this capacity he was appealed to by Shemaiah the Nehelamite to punish Jeremiah (29:27). Twice was he sent from Zedekiah to inquire of Jeremiah the issue of the siege of the city by the Chaldeans (21:1), and to implore him to intercede for the people (37:3). On the capture of Jerusalem he was taken and slain at Riblah (52:24, 27; 2 Kings 25:18, 21), B. C. about 589.

3. The prophet, son of Cushi, who prophesied against Judah and Jerusalem in the days of King Josiah (Zeph. 1:1), B. C. about 630.

4. Father of Josiah (Zech. 6:10) and of Hen, according to the reading of the received text of Zech. 6:14, B. C. before 519.

ZEPHANI'AH, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

ZEPHATH (Heb. זִפְתָּה, tsef-ath', beacon, watchtower), the earlier name (Judg. 1:17) of a Canaanitish town, destroyed by Judah and Simeon, and renamed Hormah. Two identifications have been proposed for Zephath: that of Dr. Robinson with the well-known pass es-Sufil; and that of Mr. Rowlands (Williams, Holy City, i, 464) with Sebata, two and one half hours beyond Khalasa, on the road to Suez.

ZEPH'ATHAH (Heb. זִפְתָּה, tsef-aw'-thaw, vale of the watchtower), a valley near Mareshah (2 Chron. 14:10), where Asa joined battle with Zerah the Ethiopian. A deep valley is found near the site of Mareshah, running down to Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis), and thence into the plain of Philistia. This may be the valley of Zephathah.

ZEPHI (1 Chron. 1:36). See ZEPHO.

ZEPHO (Heb. זֵפּוֹ, tsef-o', or זֵפִי, tsef-ee', watchtower), a son of Eliphaz, son of Esau (Gen. 36:11), and one of the "dukes" of the Edomites (v. 15). In 1 Chron. 1:36 he is called Zephi.

ZEPHON (Heb. זֵפְוֹן, tsef-one', watch), the first of the seven sons of Gad (Num. 26:16) and progenitor of the Zephonites.

ZEPH'ONITES (Num. 26:15). See ZEPHON.

ZER (Heb. זֶר, tsare, rock), a fortified town in the territory assigned to Naphtali (Josh. 19:35). It has not been identified.

ZE'RAH (Heb. זְרָח, zeh'-rakh, rising).

1. Son of Reuel, son of Esau (Gen. 36:13; 1 Chron. 1:37), and one of the "dukes," or phylarchs, of the Edomites (Gen. 36:17). Jobab, an early king of Edom, perhaps belonged to his family (Gen. 36:33; 1 Chron. 1. 44).

2. Less properly, Zarah. Twin son with his brother Pharez of Judah and Tamar (Gen. 38:30; 1 Chron. 2:6; Matt. 1:3). His descendants were called Zarhites, Ezrahites, and Izrahites (Num. 26:20; 1 Kings 4:31; 1 Chron. 27:8, 11).

3. Son of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:24; "Zohar," Gen. 46:10).

4. A Gershonite Levite, son of Iddo, or Adaiiah (1 Chron. 6:21, 41).

5. The Ethiopian (or Cushite) king defeated by Asa. After a period of ten years' peace Asa's reign was disturbed by war. Zerah, with a million of men and three hundred chariots, invaded the kingdom and pressed forward to Mareshah. Thither Asa marched to meet him, and drew up his army in battle array in the valley of Zephatah. After commending his cause to Jehovah Asa made the attack, which was eminently successful. Asa pursued the fleeing Ethiopians as far as Gerar, crippling them so that they could not recover themselves and again make a stand (2 Chron. 14:9-13), B. C. 905. Dr. Sayce (Higher Criticism and Monuments, pp. 363, 465) identifies Zerah with Osorkon II of Egypt, and makes Asa's twenty-fifth year of reign the time of the invasion.

ZERAH'AH (Heb. זְרַחְיָהוּ, zer-akh-yaw', Jehovah has risen).

1. A priest, son of Uzzi and ancestor of Ezra the scribe (1 Chron. 6:6, 51; Ezra 7:4), B. C. about 457.

2. Father of Elihoenai, of the sons of Pahath Moab (Ezra 8:4), B. C. about 457.

ZER'ED, or ZA'RED (Heb. זְרֵד, zeh'-red, luxuriance, willow-brook), a valley separating Moab from Edom (Deut. 2:13, 14), and where the Israelites encamped before crossing the Arnon (Num. 21:12). It seems to be the same with the Wady el-Ahsy, which communicates with the Dead Sea, and is called "brook of the willows" (Isa. 15:7), and "river of the wilderness" (Amos 6:14). Dr. Smith thinks all sites to be problematical.

ZER'EDA (Heb. צְרֵדָה, tser-ay-daw', pierced), a town in Mount Ephraim given as the birthplace of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat the Ephrathite, and servant (i. e., officer) of Solomon (1 Kings 11:26). By some it is identified with ZARTHAN (q. v.); others, because of its connection with Mount Ephraim, think that it cannot be the same. Lieut. Conder (Tent Work in Palestine, ii, 340) identifies it with Surdah, a village a little more than a mile south of Jufua.

ZER'ED'ATHAH (Heb. צְרֵדָתָה, tser-ay-daw'-thaw, same as Zereda), another name (2 Chron. 4:17) for ZARTHAN (q. v.), the place of Solomon's brass foundry.

ZER'ERATH (Heb. צְרֵרָתָה, tser-ay-raw'), a place mentioned (Judg. 7:22) in describing the route of the Midianites before Gideon. Keil and Delitzsch (Com.) identify it with ZARTHAN (q. v.).

ZERESH (Heb. זֶרֶשׁ, zeh'-resh, gold), the wife of Haman the Agagite, who advised the hanging of Mordecai (Esth. 5:10, 14; 6:13), B. C. about 510.

ZER'ETH (Heb. צֶרֶת, tseh'-reth, splendor), son of Ashur, the founder of Tekoa, by his wife Helah (1 Chron. 4:7), B. C. perhaps 1170.

ZER'I (Heb. צֶרִי, tser-ee', balm), one of the sons of Jeduthun, and a Levitical harper in the reign of David (1 Chron. 25:3). He is probably the Izri mentioned in v. 11.

ZER'OR (Heb. צֶרוֹר, tser-ore', a particle), a Benjamite ancestor of Kish, the father of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1), B. C. before 1095.

ZERU'AH (Heb. צֶרְוּיָה, tser-oo-aw', leprous), the mother of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat (1 Kings 11:26), B. C. before 934.

ZERUB'BABEL (Heb. זְרֻבְבָל, zer-oob-baw-bel, born in Babylon; it represents the Babylonian Ziru-Babili, "the seed of Babylon"), the head of the tribe of Judah at the time of the return from Babylonish captivity.

1. Family. Zerubbabel is called the son of Shealtiel (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2), and in the genealogies ("Zorobabel," Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27). In 1 Chron. 3:19 he is given as the son of Pedaiiah, the brother of Shealtiel (see note below). Josephus (Ant., xi, 3, 10) speaks of him as "the son of Salathiel, of the posterity of David and of the tribe of Judah."

2. History. In the first year of Cyrus, Zerubbabel was living in Babylon, and was recognized as prince of Judah in the captivity. He was probably in the king's service, as he had received a Chaldee name (Sheshbazzar) and had been intrusted by Cyrus with the office of governor of Judea.

(1) Goes to Jerusalem. Zerubbabel led the first colony of captives to Jerusalem, accompanied by Jeshua the high priest, a considerable number of priests, Levites, and heads of houses of Judah and Benjamin. Arrived at Jerusalem, their first care was the building of the altar on its old site and to restore the daily sacrifice (Ezra, ch. 2; 3:1-3), B. C. about 536.

(2) Rebuilding of the temple. The great work of Zerubbabel was the rebuilding of the temple. Aided by a grant of material and money, Zerubbabel was enabled to lay the foundation in the second month of the second year of their return. This was done with the utmost solemnity, amid the trumpet blasts of the priests, the music of the Levites, and the loud songs of thanksgiving of the people (vers. 8-13).

(3) Hindrances. The work had not advanced far before the mixed settlers in Samaria put in a claim to take part in it; and when Zerubbabel and his companions declined the offer, they endeavored to hinder its completion. They "troubled them in building," and hired counselors to misrepresent them at the court. The result was that no farther progress was made during the remaining years of the reign of Cyrus and the eight years of Cambyses and Smerdis (4:1-24). Nor does Zerubbabel appear quite blameless for this long delay. The difficulties in the way of building the temple were not such as need have stopped the work; and during this long suspension of sixteen years Zerubbabel and the rest of the people had been busy in building costly houses for themselves (Hag. 1:2-4). (4) Building resumed. Moved by the exhortations of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, Zerubbabel threw himself heartily into the work, and was zealously seconded by Jeshua and all the people. This was in the second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspes, who enjoined Tatnai and She-tharboznai to assist the Jews with whatsoever they had need of at the king's expense. The work advanced so rapidly that on the third day of the month Adar, in the sixth year of Darius, the temple was finished, and was forthwith dedicated with much pomp and rejoicing (Ezra 5:1 to 6:22), B. C. 516. The only other works of Zerubbabel which we learn from Scripture history are the restoration of the courses of priests and Levites, and of the provision for their maintenance, according to the institution of David (Ezra 6:18; Neh. 12:47); the registering the returned captives according to their genealogies (Neh. 7:5), and the keeping of a pass-over in the seventh year of Darius. In the genealogies of Jesus (Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27), he is represented as son of Salathiel, though the Book of Chronicles tells us he was the son of Pedaiah and nephew of Salathiel. It is of more moment to remark that while Matthew deduces his line from Jeconias and Solomon, Luke deduces it through Neri and Nathan. Zerubbabel was the legal successor and heir of Jeconiah's royal estate, the grandson of Neri, and the lineal descendant of Nathan, the son of David. In the New Testament the name appears in the Greek form of Zorobabel.

3. Character. Zerubbabel was inferior to few of the great characters of Scripture, whether we consider his loyalty to Jehovah and his people, his zeal in the great and perilous work he undertook, his courageous faith, or his heroic self-abnegation.

NOTE.—The discrepancy between 1 Chron. 3:19 and other passages as to the parentage of Zerubbabel is explained by Keil (Com., in loc.) by the supposition that Shealtiel died without any male descendants, leaving his wife a widow. . . . After Shealtiel's death his second brother, Pedaiah, fulfilled the Levirate duty, and begat, in his marriage with his sister-in-law, Zerubbabel, who was now regarded, in all that related to laws of heritage, as Shealtiel's son."

ZERUIAH, or ZERUI'AH (Heb. זְרוּיָהוּ, tser-oo-yaw', wounded), the mother of David's three great generals, Abishai, Joab, and Asahel. She and Abigail are specified (1 Chron. 2:16) as "sisters of the son of Jesse," while it is stated in 2 Sam. 17:25, that Abigail was the daughter of Nahash. Some early commentators have concluded that Abigail and Zeruiah were only stepsisters of David, i. e., daughters of his mother by Nahash, and not by Jesse. Of Zeruiah's husband there is no mention in the Bible.

ZETHAM (Heb. זֵיתָם, zay-thawm', olive), the son of Laadan, a Gershonite Levite (1 Chron. 23:8), and, with his brother, a keeper of the temple treasury (26:22), B. C. about 960.

ZETHAN (Heb. זֵיתָן, zay-thawm', olive), a Benjamite, of the sons of Bilhan (1 Chron. 7. 10), B. C. probably about 960.

ZETHAR (Heb. זֵיתָר, zay-thar', star, or sacrifice), one of the seven eunuchs of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1. 10), B. C. about 519.

ZI'A (Heb. זִי'א, zee'-ah, motion), one of the Gadites who dwelt in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:13).

ZI'BA (Heb. זִיבָא, or זִיבָא, tsee-baw', station), a former servant of Saul of whom David made the inquiry, "Is there not yet any of the house of Saul, that I may show the kindness of God unto?" Mephibosheth was in consequence found, and Ziba was commanded to cultivate the land which was restored to the king's son (2 Sam. 9. 2-12). At this first mention of Ziba he had fifteen sons and twenty servants (v. 10). When David, in his flight from Jerusalem, had gone a little over the height (Mount of Olives) Ziba met him with a present of asses, food, and wine. To the king's inquiry, "Where is thy master's son?" Ziba replied, "Behold, he abideth at Jerusalem: for he said, To-day shall the house of Israel restore me the kingdom of my father." This improbable calumny was believed by David in the excited state in which he then was, and he gave to Ziba all the property of Mephibosheth (16:1, sq.). On David's return Mephibosheth accused Ziba of having slandered him, and David gave command that the land should be divided between them (19:29).

ZIB'EON (Heb. זִיבְעוֹן, tsib-one', dyed), father of Anah, whose daughter Aholibamah was Esau's wife (Gen. 36:2). Although called a Hivite, he is probably the same as Zibeon, the son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:20, 24, 29; 1 Chron. 1:38, 40).

ZIB'IA (Heb. זִיבִיָּא, tsib-yaw', roe), a Benjamite, the son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. 8:9).

ZIB'IAH (Heb. זִיבִיָּה, tsib-yaw', roe), a native of Beer-sheba and mother of King Jehoash (2 Kings 12:1; 2 Chron. 24:1).

ZICH'RI (Heb. זִיכְרִי, zik-ree', memorable, remembered).

1. Son of Izhar, the son of Kohath (Exod. 6:21).
2. A Benjamite, of the sons of Shimhi (1 Chron. 8:19).
3. A Benjamite, of the sons of Shashak (1 Chron. 8:23).
4. A Benjamite, of the sons of Jeroham (1 Chron. 8:27).
5. Son of Asaph (1 Chron. 9:15); elsewhere called Zabdi (Neh. 11:17) and Zaccur (12:35).
6. A descendant of Eliczer, the son of Moses and father of the treasurer Shelomith (1 Chron. 26:25), B. C. before 960.
7. The father of Eliczer, the chief of the Reubenites in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:16).
8. Of the tribe of Judah, father of Amasiah, which latter volunteered at the head of two hundred thousand men in Jehoshaphat's army (2 Chron. 17:16), B. C. after 875.
9. Father of Elishaphat, one of the conspirators with Jehoiada to make Joash king (2 Chron. 23:1), B. C. about 799.
10. A mighty man of Ephraim who slew Maa-seiah the son of King Ahaz, the governor of the palace, and the prime minister (2 Chron. 28:7), B. C. about 735.

11. The father of Joel, which latter was overseer of the Benjamites after their return to Jerusalem from captivity (Neh. 11:9), B. C. before 536.

12. A priest of the family of Abijah in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:17), B. C. about 445.

ZID'DIM (Heb. זִידִים, tsid-deem', sides), a place in Naphtali (Josh. 19:35), possibly the same as Kefr-Hattin several miles west of the Sea of Galilee.

ZIDKI'JAH (Neh. 10:1). See ZEDEKIAH.

ZIDON (Heb. זִידון, tsee-done', fishery).

1. The eldest son of Canaan (Gen. 10:15, "Sidon;" 1 Chron. 1:13).

2. A very ancient and wealthy city, on the Mediterranean, about twenty-five miles north of Tyre. It is situated on a small promontory in the narrow plain between the Lebanon and the sea. It had a very commodious harbor, now nearly choked up with sand. It was distant one day's journey from the fountains of Jordan. Although it was assigned to Asher (Judg. 1:31) it was never conquered; but, on the contrary, was sometimes a formidable enemy (10:12). Even in Joshua's time it was called Tsidon-rabba, or Great Zidon (Josh. 11:8; 19:28), or Zidon the metropolis, i. e., of Zidonia.

Zidon claimed to be the mother city of which Tyre was a colony; perhaps correctly, though the weight of ancient authority is pretty evenly divided. Zidon, in Gen. 49:13, is the firstborn of Canaan. Tyre first appears in the Bible at the time of the invasion of Palestine by the Israelites (Josh. 19:29). Both cities were of great antiquity. According to the researches of Herodotus, who visited Tyre for the very purpose of investigating this question (Herodotus, ii, 43, 44), Tyre was founded two thousand three hundred years before his own time, hence 2750 B. C.

From the time of Solomon to the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar Zidon is not often directly mentioned in the Bible, and it appears to have been subordinate to Tyre. It was threatened by the prophet Joel (3:4) and Jeremiah (27:3). During the Persian domination Zidon seems to have attained its highest point of prosperity, excelling at the close of this period all other Phœnician cities in wealth and importance. This prosperity was suddenly cut short by an unsuccessful revolt against Persia; for upon the approach of the Persian troops the inhabitants shut themselves up with their families, and each man set fire to his own house. Forty thousand persons are said to have thus perished, B. C. 351. It gradually recovered, and cooperated with Alexander against Tyre, but from that time ceased to play any important political part in history.

Zidon is mentioned in the New Testament. Jesus went once to the coasts of Tyre and Zidon (Matt. 15:21); Sarepta, a city of Zidon, is referred to (Luke 4:26); and Paul touched at Zidon on his voyage from Cæsarea to Rome (Acts 27:3). See SIDON; ZIDONIANS.

ZIDONIANS (Heb. זִידוֹנִים, tsee-do-neem'), the inhabitants of Zidon. In Gen. 10:19 Zidon and Gaza are two of the extreme points of Canaan. In 49:13 Jacob makes Zidon the limit of Zebulun.

This, perhaps, means that the territory of Zidon, though afterward limited by that of Tyre, originally "extended southward to the tribe of Zebulun and Mount Carmel." In Josh. 19:28, 29, Great Zidon and Tyre are on the border of Asher.

The Zidonians were not dispossessed (Judg. 8:3), and were among the early oppressors of Israel (10:12). In Josh. 13:6 the R. V. reads "even all the Zidonians." This would make the inhabitants of the hill country Zidonians, indicating that the Zidonian population had "spread up into the hill country;" and this idea is rather favored by the Hebrew accentuation, צִידוֹנִים כָּל-צִידוֹנִים (Green, Heb.-Gr., § 29, 10 and § 30, 1, p. 39, l. 7), and still more by their skill in cutting timber (1 Kings 5:6). So in Judg. 18:7 we find them described as living "quiet and secure," devoted, no doubt, to the cultivation of their lands, and not engaged in trade, having "no business with any man." The language of the text indicates this "careless," "quiet and secure" life was the usual "manner of the Zidonians." The Zidonians adored, as tutelary god and goddess, Baal (whence the name of the king Ethbaal, 1 Kings 16:31) and Ashtoreth (1 Kings 11:5, 33; 2 Kings 23:13). Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, was the daughter of the king of the Zidonians (1 Kings 16:31), but the example of taking Zidonian women had been set by Solomon (11:1).

In Homer, also, the Sidonians are praised for their skillful workmanship, but never as traders, except as they may have passed under the general name Phœnician (Iliad, vi, 289-295; Od., iv, 614-618; xv, 425); and the two are distinguished in Iliad, xxiii, 743, 744, where Phœnicians convey Sidonian work. The Homeric poems do not mention Tyre, but they mention both Sidon (Σιδῶνος πολυχάλκου, Od., xv, 425) the Sidonians (πέπλοι παμσοικίλοι, ἔργα γυναικῶν Σιδωνῶν, Iliad, vi, 289, 290); see also Od., iv, 84 and 618; xv, 118, and Σιδῶνες πολυδαίδαλοι, Iliad, xxiii, 743; and their country Sidonia, Iliad, vi, 291, following 290, already quoted, τὰς αὐτὸς Ἀλέξανδρος θεοειδὴς ἤγαγε Σιδωνίηθεν, and Od., xiii, 285, ἐξ Σιδωνίης εἰνατομένην). Strabo observes that while the poets glorified Sidon, the Phœnician colonists in Africa gave "more honor" to Tyre.—W. H.

ZIF (Heb. זִיף, zeev, bloom), the early name (1 Kings 6:1, 37) of the second Hebrew-month, Iyar. See CALENDAR.

ZI'HA (Heb. זִיחָא, tsee-khaw', thirsty).

1. One of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46), B. C. before 536.

2. A ruler of the Nethinim after the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:21), B. C. 536.

ZIK'LAG (Heb. זִיקְלָג, tsik-lag'), a town in the Negeb, or south country of Judah (Josh. 15:31). The next mention is of its assignment, with other places in Judah, to Simeon (19:5). It was made David's residence for a year and four months by the appointment of Achish, king of Gath (1 Sam. 27:6). It was destroyed once by the Amalekites, who in turn were routed utterly by David (30:1, 2). It was at Ziklag that David received the news of Saul's death (2 Sam. 1:1; 4:10). It is identified with "Asuj," or Khirbet Zuhailikah, by Conder.

ZIL'LAH (Heb. זִילְלָה, tsil-law', shade), one of the two wives of Lamech, the Cainite, to whom he addressed his song (Gen. 4:19, 22, 23). She was the mother of Tubal-cain and Naamah.

ZIL'PAH (Heb. זִילְפָּה, zil-paw', a trickling), the female servant given by Laban to his daughter Leah as an attendant (Gen. 29:24), and by Leah to Jacob as a concubine. She was the mother of Gad and Asher (30:9-13; 35:26; 37:2; 46:18), B. C. about 2085.

ZIL'THAI (Heb. זִילְתַּי, tsil-leth-ah'ee, shadow).

1. A Benjamite, of the sons of Shimhi (1 Chron. 8:20), B. C. after 1170.

2. One of the captains of thousands of Manasseh who deserted to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20), B. C. about 1000.

ZIM'MAH (Heb. זִמְמָה, zim-maw', purpose).

1. A Gershonite Levite, son of Jahath, the grandson of Gershom (1 Chron. 6:20), B. C. after 1210. He is probably the same as the son of Shimei in v. 42.

2. Father or ancestor of Joah, a Gershonite in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12), B. C. before 726. At a much earlier period we find Zimmah and Joah as father and son (1 Chron. 6:20), for in the various families the same name often repeats itself.

ZIM'RAN (Heb. זִמְרָן, zim-ravn', musical), the eldest son of Keturah and Abraham (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32). His descendants have not been positively identified.

ZIM'RI (Heb. זִמְרִי, zim-ree', musical).

1. The son of Salu, a Simeonite chieftain, slain by Phinehas with the Midianitish princess Cozbi (Num. 25:14), B. C. 1171. When the Israelites at Shittim were suffering for their impure worship of Baal-peor, Zimri brought this woman into his tent to commit adultery with her. This shameless wickedness so inflamed the zeal of Phinehas, the high priest, that he seized a spear and pierced both of them through in the very act.

2. The fifth king of Israel, who reigned only seven days. He is first mentioned as captain of half the chariots of the royal army and as chief conspirator against King Elah, who was murdered while indulging in a drunken revel in the house of his steward in Tirzah. His first act as king was the slaying of all the house of Baasha. But the army, which at that time was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon, when they heard of Elah's murder, proclaimed their general Omri king. He immediately marched against Tirzah and took the city. Zimri retreated into the innermost part of the late king's palace, set it on fire, and perished in the ruins (1 Kings 16:9-20), B. C. 887.

3. The eldest of the five sons of Zerah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 2:6).

4. Son of Jehoadah and descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36; 9:42).

ZIN (Heb. זֵן, tseen, a crag), a wilderness or open, uncultivated region lying south of Palestine

(Num. 13:21; 20:1; 27:14; 33:36; 34:3; Deut. 82:51; Josh. 15:1). By some it is supposed to be a portion of the desert tract between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of 'Aqabah (see McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.). But it must have been to the west of this tract (called 'Arabah), as is clearly indicated in Num. 34:4. "Directly west of the 'Arabah is a wild mountain region, rising in successive slopes or terraces from the 'Arabah in one direction, and from the Desert et-Teih in another. It now bears the name of the Arabs who inhabit it, and is commonly known as the Azázimeh mountains, or the 'Azázimat. This is a distinct and well-defined local wilderness, fully meeting the conditions of the various references to the wilderness of Zin in the Bible. It may fairly be identified as that wilderness, and again as a portion of the wilderness of Paran in its larger sense. Yet its northeastern portion was probably in Edom, and it is possible that only the remainder was known as Zin. This identification of the wilderness of Zin would locate Kadesh somewhere in the 'Azázimeh mountains" (Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, pp. 70, 71).

ZIN'A (Heb. זֵינָה, zee-nav', abundance, 1 Chron. 23:10). See ZIZAH.

ZI'ON (Heb. צִיּוֹן, tsee-yone', sunny, or fort [Fürst]), the most southwestern hill, and the highest in Jerusalem. It has been identified by Ferguson (Jerusalem Revisited, etc.) with Moriah; Captain Warren (The Temple or the Tomb, Lond., 1880) has contended for Akra; while Dr. Sayce (Higher Crit., etc., p. 385) says, "It was the southern hill, the so-called Ophel." Zion has an elevation of two thousand five hundred and fifty feet above the Mediterranean Sea; its western and southern sides rise abruptly from the valley of Hinnom, to the height of three hundred feet, and above the Kidron, at En-rogel, of five hundred feet. "Since the days of the Jewish kings the appearance of the hill has undergone much change. The valley of the Cheesemakers has been filled with rubbish to a depth of more than seventy feet, while the summit of Zion was cut away in the age of the Maccabees in order that it might be overlooked by the temple hill. . . . Mount Zion is now but a southerly continuation of Mount Moriah." Zion was the stronghold of the Jebusites, who so long defied the Israelites, and was at last captured by King David (Num. 13:29; Josh. 15:63; Judg. 1:21; 2 Sam. 5:5-8). Upon it David built his palace, and there he and fourteen of his successors were buried in the royal tomb (1 Kings 2:10; 11:43; 14:31, etc.) As first occupied for a palace, Zion was called the city of David (2 Chron. 6:2), and, as the site of the tabernacle pitched by David, it was known as the holy hill, or hill of the sanctuary (Psa. 2:6). Zion was the last spot to yield to the Romans under Titus, and even when the rest of the city was in ruins, and the enemy occupied the temple courts, the remnant of the Jews from the walls of Zion haughtily refused the terms of the conqueror, and perished in thousands. Zion was frequently, by the prophets, put for Jerusalem itself (Isa. 8:8; 10:24; 30:19; 33:14; Psa. 48:2, 11, 12; comp. Rom. 9:33; 11:26; 1 Pet. 2:6; Rev. 14:1); and its inhabitants were sometimes called sons or daughters of Zion (Isa. 1:27; Zech. 2:7, 10; 9:9, 13; Zeph. 3:14, 16; Joel 2:23; Matt. 21:5; John 12:15).

Figurative. It is used as a symbol of the spiritual Zion, the church or city of the living God (Heb. 12:22, 28; Gal. 4:26; Rev. 3:12; 21:2, 10).

ZI'OR (Heb. צִיֹּר, tsee-ore', smallness), a town in the mountain district of Judah (Josh. 15:54), where it is mentioned in the group around Hebron to the south. It has not been identified, though "so far as the name is concerned, it might have been preserved in the heights of Tugra, near to Hebron" (Knobel).

ZIPH (Heb. זִיפְ, zeef, a flowing).

1. The eldest son of the four sons of Jehaleleel (1 Chron. 4:16).

2. A town apparently in the south or Simeonitic part of Judah (Josh. 15:24), mentioned with Ithnan and Telem. Dr. Strong joins it with the former, i. e., Ithnan-Ziph.

3. A town in the desert (A. V. "wilderness") of Ziph, to which David fled from Saul (1 Sam. 23:14, sq.; 26:2, 3); and was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:8), having been originally built by Meshu, the son of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:42). It has been preserved in the ruins upon the hill Ziph, about three miles south of Hebron. The "wilderness of Ziph" was that portion of the desert of Judah which was near to and surrounded the town of Ziph.

ZIPHAAH (Heb. זִיפְאָה, zee-faw', feminine of Ziph), the second son of Jehaleleel, and brother of the preceding (1 Chron. 4:16).

ZIPHIMS (Psa. 54, title). See ZIPHITES.

ZIPH'ION (Heb. זִיפְיוֹן, tsif-yone', Gen. 46:16). See ZEPHON.

ZIPHITES, ZIPHIMS (R. V. always "Ziphites," 1 Sam. 23:19, Heb. זִיפְיִים, ziph-eeem'; 26:1, זִיפְיִים, haz-ziph-eeem'; Psa. 54, title, זִיפְיִים, haz-zee-feem'), inhabitants of Ziph, who twice revealed to Saul the hiding of David in their vicinity. The interesting events which happened at that place, the farewell interview between David and Jonathan, the sparing of Saul's life by David, and the temporary relenting of Saul, belong rather to the geography or to the biographies of Saul and David. This Ziph was "in the highland district" in Judah; it is named between Carmel and Juttah (Josh. 15:55). The Ziph of v. 24 is a different place.—W. H.

ZIPH'RON (Heb. זִיפְרוֹן, zif-ron', fragrance), a place on the northern boundary of the Promised Land, and, consequently, of Naphtali (Num. 34:9), where it is mentioned between Zedad and Hazar-enan. It is thought by Knobel and Wetstein to be preserved in the ruins of Zifran, fourteen hours' journey northeast of Damascus, near the road from Palmyra. In the parallel passage (Ezek. 47:16) Hazar-hatticon occurs in a similar connection.

ZIP'POR (Heb. צִיפּוֹר, tsip-pore', a sparrow), father of Balak, king of Moab. His name occurs only in the expression "son of Zippor" (Num. 22:2, 4, 10, 16; 23:18; Josh. 24:9; Judg. 11:25), B. C. before 1170. Whether he was the "former king of Moab," alluded to in Num. 21:26, we are not told, nor do we know that he himself ever reigned (Smith).

ZIP'PORAH, or ZIPPO'RAH (Heb. צִיפּוֹרָה, tsip-po-raw', feminine of Zippor, sparrow), daughter of Reuel or Jethro, the priest of Midian, wife of Moses and mother of his two sons Gershom and Eliezer (Exod. 2:21; 4:25; 18:2; comp. v. 6), B. C. 1250. The only incident recorded in her life is that of the circumcision of Gershom (4:24-26). See Moses.

ZITH'RI (Heb. צִיחְרִי, sith-ree', protective), the son of Uzziel, and grandson of Kohath, of the tribe of Levi (Exod. 6:22). This is the only mention made of him in Scripture.

ZIZ (Heb. צִיז, hats-tseels, a flower), an ascent or cleft leading up from the Dead Sea toward Tekoa (2 Chron. 20:16; comp. v. 20), by which the band of Moabites, Ammonites, and Mehunim, who attacked Jehoshaphat, made their way. There can be very little doubt that the pass was that of Ain Jidy; "the very same route which is taken by the Arabs in their marauding expeditions at the present day; along the shore as far as to Ain Jidy, and then up the pass, and so northward below Tekûa" (Robinson, Bib. Res., i, 508, 530). The name, "ascent, or height of Hazziz," has perhaps remained attached to the Wady el Hasasah.

ZI'ZA (Heb. צִיזָא, zee-zaw, abundance).

1. Son of Shiphai, a chief of the Simeonites in the reign of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:37), B. C. about 719.

2. Son of Rehobom by Maachab, the granddaughter of Absalom (2 Chron. 11:20), B. C. after 934.

ZI'ZAH (Heb. צִיזָה, zee-zaw'), a Gershonite Levite, second son of Shimei (1 Chron. 23:11; called Zina in v. 10).

ZO'AN (Heb. צֹאן, tso'-an, perhaps place of departure, or low region), the biblical name of Tanis, an ancient city of Lower Egypt, situated on the Tanitic branch of the Nile (Num. 13:22; Psa. 78:12, 43; Isa. 19:11:13; 30:4; Ezek. 30:14). The modern name is San or Zan. The town was built on an island surrounded by delta mud. It was on the bank of the river, and possibly on the shore of the sea. "Zoan, the Tanis of classical geography, was the capital of the Hyksos ('shepherd kings') during their long domination in northern Egypt. It was from Zoan that Apophis, the Hyksos Pharaoh, sent the insulting message to the vassal prince of Thebes which led to the long war of independence and the final expulsion of the Asiatic stranger from the soil of Egypt. The departure of the Hyksos was the signal for the decline of Zoan. It sank for a while to the rank of a petty village, and it was not till the rise of the 19th dynasty that its temple was again adorned with images and sculptures, and the city itself made a residence of the Pharaohs. The excavations which have been carried on there have shown that the foundation of the city went back to the earliest days of the Egyptian monarchy. Monuments of Pepi, of the 6th dynasty, have been discovered, and the kings of the 12th and 13th dynasties were munificent benefactors of its temple. Even the short-lived 14th dynasty seems to be represented among its ruins" (Sayce, Higher Crit., etc., pp. 189, 190).

"No city presents stronger evidence of the magnificence of the reign of Rameses II than does Tanis. The costliness of his temple there, and his statue, ninety-two feet in height, weighing nine hundred tons, towering above all surrounding buildings, seen for miles across the plains, unsurpassed by any monolith the world has ever seen, show that either Tanis was in a position to command the northern route to Syria, or because it gave the king easy communication with all his dominions, or for some other reason or reasons, was his capital. It certainly ranked in size and grandeur with Memphis and Thebes" (Mariette Bey, Monuments, etc., pp. 308, 309).

"Amenemhät I founded a great temple in Tanis (Zoan) in honor of the gods of Memphis. The vestiges of the columns, still scattered on all sides, show that the main body of the building was of rose granite, and a statue of the same material has preserved for us a portrait of the king" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 500).

Bible Notices. From the Bible we learn that Zoan was one of the oldest cities in Egypt, having been built seven years after Hebron, which already existed in the time of Abraham (Num. 13:22; comp. Gen. 22:2), B. C. about 2250; that it was one of the principal capitals of the Pharaohs (Isa. 19:11, 13); and that "the field of Zoan" was the scene of the marvelous works which God wrought at the hand of Moses (Psa. 78:12, 33). To Tanis came ambassadors either of Hoshea or Ahaz, or else possibly of Hezekiah: "For his princes were at Zoan, and his ambassadors came to Hanes" (Isa. 30:4). As mentioned with the frontier town Tahpanhes, Tanis is not necessarily the capital. But the same prophet, perhaps, more distinctly points to a Tanite line (19:13). The doom of Zoan is foretold by Ezekiel, "I will set fire in Zoan" (Ezek. 30:14), where it occurs among the cities to be taken by Nebuchadnezzar. See SUPPLEMENT.

ZO'AR (Heb. צֹרַר, fully צֹרַר, tso'-ar, smallness), one of the five cities which lay on the floor of the Jordan valley, after the name of which they were called Cities of the Kikkar, or Circle. It was one of the most ancient cities of the land of Canaan. Its original name was BELA (Gen. 14:2, 8). In the general destruction of the cities of the plain Zoar was spared to afford shelter to Lot (19:22, 23, 30). It is mentioned in the account of the death of Moses as one of the landmarks which bounded his view from Pisgah (Deut. 34:3), and it appears to have been known in the time both of Isaiah (15:5) and Jeremiah (48:34). These are all the notices of Zoar contained in the Bible. It was situated in the same district with the four cities already mentioned, viz., in the "plain" or "circle" "of the Jordan," and the narrative of Gen. 19 evidently implies that it was very near to Sodom (vers. 15, 23, 27). The definite position of Sodom is, and probably will always be, a mystery; but there can be little doubt that the plain of the Jordan was at the north of the Dead Sea, and that the cities of the plain must therefore have been situated there instead of at the southern end of the lake, as it is generally taken for granted they were (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). Others place the district to the south of the Dead Sea, and Dr. G. A. Smith thus sums up the argument for each locality: "That Abraham and Lot looked upon the cities from near Bethel (Gen. 13:5, 10); that the name Circle of Jordan is not applicable to the south end of the Dead Sea; that the presence of five cities there is impossible; that the expedition of the Four Kings, as it swept north from Kadesh-Barnea, attacked Hazezon Tamar, which is probably En-gedi, before it reached the vale of Siddim and encountered the king of Sodom and his allies; that the name Gomorrah perhaps exists in Tubk 'Amriyeh, near 'Ain el Feshkah (14:7, 8); and that the name of Zoar has been recovered in Tell Shāghūr. However, at the south end of the Dead Sea there lay, throughout Roman and mediæval times, a city called Zoara by the Arabs, which was identified by all with the Zoar of Lot," etc. (Hist. Geog., p. 506). See SUPPLEMENT.

ZO'BAH (Heb. צֹבָה, tso-baw', station), a portion of northern Syria lying between Hamath and the Euphrates, and so closely connected with Hamath that the great city was sometimes called Hamath-Zobah. Solomon, David, and Saul all had trouble with the people of Zobah (1 Sam. 14:47; 1 Kings 11:23-25; 2 Sam. 8:3, 5, 12; 23:36; 1 Chron. 18:3, 5, 9; 19:6; 2 Chron. 8:3; Psa. 60).

ZOBE'BAH (Heb. צֹבְבָה, tso-bay-baw', the slow moving), the second child (probably daughter, as the word is feminine) of Coz, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8), B. C. after 1170.

ZO'HAR (Heb. צֹהַר, tso'-khar, whiteness, light).

1. A Hittite, and father of Ephron, from which latter person Ephraim bought the grave of Machpelah (Gen. 23:8; 25:9).

2. Fifth named of the six sons of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15); elsewhere (1 Chron. 4:24) called Zerah.

ZO'KHELETH (Heb. צֹחֶלֶת, zo-khek'-leth, serpent, slippery), a rocky and dangerous ledge or plateau "by En-rogel," upon which Adonijah slew oxen and sheep (1 Kings 1:9). It overhangs the Kidron valley. This has been most satisfactorily identified by M. Clermont Ganneau for the present Arab name Zahweilah, a cliff on which the village of Silwā or Silwan stands. To this the women of the village resort to draw water at the "Virgin's Fount."

ZO'KHAYTH (Heb. צֹחַיִת, zo-khayth', perhaps strong), son of Ishi, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20), B. C. after 1170.

ZO'PHAH (Heb. צֹפָה, tso-fakh', a cruse), son of Helem, or Hotham, the son of Heber, an Asherite (1 Chron. 7:35, 36), B. C. about 1170.

ZOPHAI (Heb. צֹפַי, tso-fah'-ee, honeycomb), a Kohathite Levite, son of Elkanah and ancestor of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:26), B. C. before 1050. In v. 35 he is called Zuph.

ZOPHAR (Heb. צוֹפָר, tsō-far', sparrow), one of the three friends of Job (Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9). He is called a Naamathite, or inhabitant of Naamah, whose location is unknown. In the LXX. Zophar, the friend of Job, is called "king of the Minæans."

ZOPHIM (Heb. צוֹפִים, tsō-feem', watchers, field of watchers). The "field of Zophim" was on the top of Pisgah (Num. 23:14), one of the high places to which Balak brought Balaam, that he might see Israel. It is the modern Tai'at-es-Safa.

ZOR'AH (Heb. צוֹרְאָה, tsor-aw', place of wasps or hornets), a town of Dan, but really within the limits of Judah (Josh. 19:41; Judg. 18:2). It was both the birthplace and burial place of Samson (Judg. 13:2, 25; 16:31), and afterward fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:10). It was on the hillside overlooking Sorek.

ZORATHITES (Heb. הַצֹּרְאִיתִים, hats-tsor-aw-thee'), people of Zorah, a town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:33, A. V. "Zoreah," R. V. "Zorah"), but assigned to Dan (19:41). In 1 Chron. 4:1, 2 the "families of the Zorathites" are descended from Ahumai and Lahad, sons of Jahath, the son of Reniah, the son of Shobal, the son of Judah. The Hebrew word rendered in the A. V. mostly Zorah, but in Neh. 11:29 Zareah, and in Josh. 15:33 Zoreah, is the same—צוֹרְאָה, R. V. always Zorah. So the Zorathites of 1 Chron. 4:2 and the Zareathites of 1 Chron. 2:53 are alike הַצֹּרְאִיתִים, "the Zorathite" (comp. "the Amalekite," etc.), R. V. "the Zorathites;" unless we take the conjunctive accent in 1 Chron. 2:53, הַצֹּרְאִיתִים, as a substitute for Methegh (Mitchel's Gesenius, Heb.-Gr., § 16, 2b, end). In this case Zareathites would be justifiable. If, as is likely, they refer to one people, it is better to read 1 Chron. 2:50 with the R. V., "These were the sons of Caleb; the son of Hur, the firstborn of Ephrathah, Shobal the father of Kirjath-jearim." The list of Judah's "sons" (1 Chron. 4:1) will then be successive descendants. The "Zorites" of 1 Chron. 2:54 will belong to a separate branch.—W. H.

ZOR'EAH (Josh. 15:33). See ZORAH.

ZORITES, THE (Heb. צוֹרְעִי, tsor-ee'), are named in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. 2:54) apparently among the descendants of Salma; and near connections of Joab. They are hence classed with the "Zareathites and the Eshtaulites (v. 53).

ZOROB'ABEL (Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27). See ZERUBABEL.

ZU'AR (Heb. צוֹרְעִי, tsō-awr', littleness), the father of Nethaneel, of the tribe of Issachar.

Nethaneel was chief of his tribe at the time of the exodus (Num. 1:8; 2:5; 7:18, 23; 10:15), B. C. before 1210.

ZUPH (Heb. צוּפָה, tsōof, honeycomb).

1. A Levite of the family of Kohath, and father of Tohu, in the ancestry of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Chron. 6:35; "Zophai," v. 26).

2. A district at which Saul and his servant arrived after passing through those of Shalisha, of Shalim, and of the Benjamites (1 Sam. 9:5 only). It evidently contained the city in which they encountered Samuel (v. 6), and that again was certainly not far from the "tomb of Rachel." The only trace of the name of Zuph in modern Palestine, in any suitable locality, is to be found in Soba, a well-known place about seven miles due west of Jerusalem, and five miles southwest of Neby Samwil. But this is at the best no more than conjecture, and unless the land of Zuph extended a good distance east of Soba, the city in which the meeting with Samuel took place, could hardly be sufficiently near to Rachel's sepulcher (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

ZUR (Heb. צוּר, tsoor, a rock).

1. Father of Cozbi (Num. 25:15), and one of the five princes of Midian who were slain by the Israelites when Balaam fell (31:8; Josh. 13:21), B. C. 1170.

2. Son of Jehiel, the founder of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36), B. C. after 1170.

ZU'RIEL (Heb. צוּרִי־אֵל, tsoor-ree-ale', my rock is God), son of Abihail, and chief of the Merarite Levites at the time of the exodus (Num. 3:35), B. C. 1210.

ZURISHAD'DAI (Heb. צוּרִישַׁדַּי, tsoor-ree-shad-dah'ee, my rock is the Almighty), father of Shelumiel, the chief of the tribe of Simeon at the time of the exodus (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36, 41; 10:19), B. C. 1210.

ZU'ZIM (Heb. הַזוּזִיִּים, haz-zoo-zeem', only Gen. 14:5), the name of an ancient people dwelling in Ham, who were smitten by Chedorlamer. The LXX. (both manuscripts) has εἰς ἡμᾶς ἰσχυρά; the Targum of Onkelos and the Samaritan version also translate the name "strong people." This rendering depends upon some different Hebrew reading, possibly קְזוּזִיִּים or קְזוּזִיִּים. Robinson's Gesenius proposes the root זוּז as referring to the fertility of the soil. Sayce thinks it originated in a transcription of a cuneiform rendering of Zamzumim. It is quite generally suspected to be an abridgment of ZAMZUMIM (q. v.), on the ground that the place of the Zuzim in the text would accord well with the supposition that "זוּזִים" is 'Am, i. e., Ammon;" but all is conjecture.—W. 1 AARON.—2. (2) Golden calf. See CALF, GOLDEN, SUPPLEMENT.

2 AARON.—2. (7) Death. The exact place of the burial of Aaron cannot be definitely known, but the mountain upon which he died is now fairly well identified. As far as any reliance may be placed upon tradition and especially upon the very exact fulfillment of the conditions imposed by the biblical narrative, Mount Hor is probably to be identified not with the traditional site, a mountain in Edom from which Israel had been excluded, but with a mountain farther to the W., with which Aaron's name is still locally connected (Hoskins, From Nile to Nebo).

10 ABOMINATION. It is well to distinguish carefully between the Hebrew words translated "abomination." שְׁקִיץ, shik-koots', unclean, and שֶׁקֶט, shek'-kets, rejected, are properly explained in the various passages where they occur as having reference to ceremonial requirements. רֵיבָבָה, to-ay-baw', though a Hebrew word, has certainly an Egyptian history in Gen. 43:32. The Hyksos kings, Egyptian Haq-shashu, Bedouin Princes, were desert princes who invaded the Delta of Egypt, and finally usurped the throne of Lower Egypt and maintained a more or less rigid suzerainty over Upper Egypt for about five hundred years. These kings were on the throne in the time of Joseph. They were expelled by the early kings of the eighteenth dynasty. Their rule was held in the utmost abhorrence by the Egyptians, who called them aat, pest or abomination. So persistent was the bitter animosity of the Egyptians towards these hated foreigners, that later Egyptian history has not preserved their ethnic name at all, but has handed on their memory by this spiteful appellation. It was no doubt to this Egyptian name for the Ilyksos people that Joseph referred when he said "every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians." The word not being a proper name, but an epithet, was not transliterated by the Hebrew writer, but translated into the Hebrew word רֵיבָבָה, to-ay-baw'.

This use of the word becomes one of the subtle linguistic evidences of the Egyptian origin or associations of this portion of the Pentateuch at a time when the use and significance of this word would be still perfectly understood by the Hebrew people.

How is it possible that later writers "before the time of Jeremiah," eight hundred years after the "abomination" was driven out of Egypt, and the utmost effort had been made to eradicate every trace of their residence in Egypt, should have attended to such a philological nicety as this? Rather it is a distinct mark of authorship either contemporaneous with the "abomination" in Egypt or not long subsequent to its departure.

ABRAHAM. B. C. 2333. The discoveries of 10 L. W. King, made among the tablets in the British Museum 1909-10, have satisfied most scholars that the first and second dynasties of kings in Babylonia, formerly regarded as successive, were, in fact, in large part contemporaneous with the third dynasty, so that the chronology of the time is reduced at least three hundred and sixty-nine years. Thus the date of Hammurabi, the contemporary of Abraham, was probably as late as 1912 B. C. This date for Hammurabi has of course changed all subsequent dates for the life of Abraham (King, Letters and Inscriptions of Hammurabi).

ABRAHAM. NOTE.—(1) Sacrifice of Isaac. 18 The excavations by Macalister at Gezer, 1902-09, have most remarkably fulfilled the conjecture that human sacrifice was practiced in the land of Canaan in the early times, especially the sacrifice of the firstborn. "All round the feet of the columns, and over the whole area of the High Place, the earth was discovered to be a regular cemetery in which the skeletons of young infants were buried. These infants were never more than a week old. They were deposited in large jars, and with them were placed smaller jars, possibly for food for the use of the little victim in the other world. Two at least of the skeletons showed marks of fire. We have here evidence of the widespread custom of devoting the firstborn, a part of the practice whereby the first fruits of man, of beast, and of the field, were sacred to the divinity" (Macalister, Bible Side Lights From the Mound of Gezer, pp. 73, 74). Not only was the example of human sacrifice round about Abraham, but the withholding of his own son Isaac from sacrifice would probably be remarked upon as an act of impiety by his heathen neighbors. Thus God's dealing with Abraham in the offering of Isaac gave at one and the same time the divine approval of the dedication of children to God and the divine condemnation of the notion that this required the death of the children.

13 ABRECH. The important thing in the interpretation of this word is not so much what they cried before Joseph, but that they cried before him. Whatever may have been the exact meaning of this expression, abrech, its general import can hardly be mistaken. Outrunners go before every royal carriage in the East; indeed, every cab-driver acts as his own outrunner, if he does not have one; and always the cry, however it may vary, is for the purpose of clearing the way in streets where foot-men make no distinction between the roadway and the sidewalk. Thus the general import of this narrative of Joseph is simply that he was allowed to have royal outrunners who cried before him.

15 ACCAD. This ancient city is now identified with tolerable certainty. "Akkad is the Agade of the cuneiform writings, city of the elder Sargon, and then the name for the North Babylonian kingdom, whose chief city was Agade. Its identification with Agade has now been assured by the inscriptions K 9906. Bezold, Catalogue IV, 1049 and comp. Weissbach, Z. D. M. G., 1899, p. 661" (Jeremias, The Old Testament in the Light of the Ancient East, I, p. 295).

21 ADONI-ZEDEK. Colonel Conder has read the name of the king of Jerusalem in the Tell el-Amarna tablets Adoni-Zedek, but Winckler reads it Abt-Khiba and Sayce, Ebed-Tob.

29 AHAB. The palace of Ahab at Samaria was discovered during the excavations conducted by Reisner in 1907-10 under the auspices of the American Institute of Archaeology. Only the foundations remain. These have been enclosed within the foundation of a structure of Roman times, the architect apparently ignoring the foundations of the palace of Ahab, except where it was necessary to clear them out of the way. See SAMARIA.

38 ALTAR. 1. Early. A very curious altar was found by Sellin (Tel Taannek) at the site of Taanach of the Old Testament. It is probably Canaanite, or an instance of Israelite lapse into Canaanite worship. The altar is about three feet high, of poorly burned pottery. It has a hollow place in the top for the placing of a pan with fire, probably for the offering of incense. It is grotesquely decorated with mysterious symbols, conspicuous among which is a standing serpent. This altar is now shown in the Imperial Ottoman Museum at Constantinople.

A large altar, probably an altar of burnt offering, was found by Professor George L. Robinson in 1900 at the High Place discovered by him near Petra. This particular altar is probably of later times than the Canaanite altar, but the High Place may be very old (Robinson, Biblical World, January, 1901, January, 1908). Altars of old Semitic worship were discovered by de Morgan in a bas-relief of a High Place at Susa (Vincent, Canaan d'après l'Exploration Récente, p. 144). Both the great altar and the altar of incense are approached by steps and are flat on the top.

45 AMORITES. Many remains which are probably of Amorite populations of Canaan have been unearthed at Gezer (P.E.F.S., 1903-1908), and at Taannek (Sellin, Tel-Taannek), and later at Bethshemesh (P. E. F. S., 1911-12). There is little in all these discoveries that throws light either upon the history, the civilization or the system of government of the Amorites. They were a tall people, as the name seems to indicate and the Egyptian sculptors represent, as also is evinced by the skeletons exhumed. In religion, they were worshipers at the High Place, apparently with all the abominations attributed in Scripture to the Canaanites. Numerous bodies of little children, all under eight days of age, buried together near the High Place, cannot be reasonably interpreted to mean anything else than the most horrid of human sacrifices, the sacrifice of the firstborn (Bible Side Lights from the Mound of Gezer, pp. 63, 82). "In two important respects the first Semitic invaders were superior, as regards their civilization, to the people they dispossessed—namely, in the use of bronze, as just mentioned, and in the use of a simple form of potter's wheel. Otherwise they cannot be said to have been much in advance of their predecessors. At first they lived in the caves that these had been obliged to vacate, but before long they began to build houses, of the type that has persisted, with wonderfully little change, down to the villages of modern twentieth century Palestine" (Macalister, A History of Civilization in Palestine, p. 30).

The most important discoveries concerning the Amorites, however, are through Egyptian and other sculptured representations, and by means of the philological studies of Professor Clay and others. Clay (Amurru) has shown that Amurru was the early Semitic name for Palestine and Syria, a land which was an earlier home of the Semites than Babylonia; if not the source of Semitic culture, at least an earlier source than Babylonia, to which they went when they "journeyed east" (Gen. 11:2). Thus the surmise long indulged, that the name Amorite is rather a general name for the inhabitants of this region, is confirmed, although, when later, other peoples, especially Hittites, became great in the land, the name Amorite was restricted to particular tribes. Numerous sculptures of Amorites have put beyond question the Semitic character of the Amorite people. The features are so characteristically Semitic as to be recognized instantly. What little is known of the Amorite language, chiefly through Amorite words in other languages, makes certain that it was a Semitic tongue; that, indeed, Amorite and early Hebrew of patriarchal times were practically the same language. The seeming discrepancy in the statement that the Amorites are descendants of Canaan (Gen. 10:15-16) is only apparent, not real. The lists of Genesis 10 do not discriminate sharply among various classes of descriptive distinctions now expressed by the technical terms geographical, ethnographical, and ethnological. Political boundaries, racial boundaries, and racial relationships were all classed together and denominated by one and the same word.

46 AMRAPHEL. Much has been learned concerning Hammurabi since the year 1900, and while the identification of Amraphel with this great Edomite king is still the subject of some discussion, most scholars scarcely question it any longer. The identification phonetically is fairly well made out, not involving more difficulty than many other names which have been written in both cuneiform thus far discovered in the history of excavations. It was found in three large fragments, which were readily joined together. It is cut out of a block of diorite, and stands seven feet four inches high. At the base it is about twenty-two inches wide, and at the top just above the bas-relief it is about sixteen inches. . . . Beneath the bas-relief are sixteen parallel columns running beltwise, beneath which five additional lines had been erased, and the stone polished. On the reverse there are twenty-eight parallel columns, containing in all about four thousand lines of a closely written cuneiform inscription. . . . The inscription is divided into a prologue, code, and an epilogue. In the prologue, Hammurabi gives his titles, mentions the gods he worshiped, enumerates the cities over which he ruled, and in general magnifies himself by referring to the beneficent deeds which he conferred upon his people and country. Including the number of characters and Hebrew letters and been subject to local changes. This latter, local changes, is too much overlooked. The name of a person or place among a people is that by which the person or place is known among them, even though the name be very different elsewhere. The names of two noted Italian cities are, among English-speaking people, Florence and Leghorn, which differ certainly as much from their names in the home land, Firenze and Livorno, as Amraphel does from Hammurabi. Then, many other things than the phonetic resemblance of the name contribute to the identification between Amraphel and Hammurabi. A Confederacy of Elamite and Babylonian kings has been found, of which Hammurabi was one. Amurru, "the land of the Amorites," i. e., Canaan, was a province of the empire of that confederacy and there was an emigration movement in that age. In 1901-2, de Morgan found at Susa a great monument of Hammurabi containing a wonderful code of laws (Johns, The Code of Hammurabi). "It is the longest cuneiform inscription known, and perhaps the most important monument of antiquity laws erased, which are estimated at about thirty-five, the code has about two hundred and eighty-two paragraphs of laws" (Clay, Light on the Old Testament from Babel). The code of Hammurabi is one of the most systematic codes ever prepared (Lyon, Journal of the American Oriental Society, xxv, p. 254). The laws of this code are found upon comparison with the life of Abraham to have been the laws in force in Canaan in that time (Kyle, The Deciding Voice of the Monuments in Biblical Criticism, pp. 206-208).

ARCHÆOLOGY. The rapid extension of 75 archaeological discoveries, the growing confidence in archaeological evidence, and the gradual formation of systematic archaeological science have broadened and defined much more sharply the place of biblical archaeology in Bible study, especially in biblical criticism. A very large use of archaeological material, though without much attempt at classification, in the great Bible encyclopedias, A Bible Dictionary, by Hastings, and the Encyclopædia Biblica, by Cheyne, and the more systematic discussion of the subject in Authority and Archaeology, by Hogarth, to which many great scholars contributed, have made decided progress toward fuller recognition of biblical archaeology. Orr, in The Problem of the Old Testament, said of the science of archaeology that it "bids fair, before long, to control both criticism and history." And this theme has systematic discussion in Kyle's recent work, The Deciding Voice of the Monuments in Biblical Criticism. Comprehensive application of archaeological material to critical problems has been made by Jeremias in The Old Testament in the Light of the Ancient East, Eerdmans in his Studien, Clay in Light on the Old Testament from Babel, and Driver in his Introduction and Commentaries. These works, in addition to the great sources of archaeological facts, the works of Naville, Petrie, Müller, Père Vincent, and all the older archaeological research workers, have given to biblical archaeology a place in the very first rank of biblical study. Some of those who are now putting forth archaeology as authoritative in biblical discussions, as Jeremias and Eerdmans, are advocates of very radical views of Scripture; others, as the various writers in Authority and Archaeology, are adherents of the Wellhausen Biblical analysis of the Pentateuch, and other books of the Old Testament; while others, as Orr, Clay, Naville, and Kyle, hold much more conservative views of biblical interpretation. But, whatever the conclusions reached, the discussion is giving archaeology a place of far greater importance in biblical study than ever before.

79 ARCHITECTURE. 5. Hebrew. (2) Various periods. Palestinian excavations since 1900 have added another period of Palestinian building between the Stone Age and the Hebrews, namely, the Pre-Israelite Semitic period, usually called Amorite (Macalister, P.E.F.S. 1902-09, Bible Side Lights from Gezer and a History of Civilization in Palestine). It cannot be said that this period added much to the great architecture of the world, but it did one thing of importance, it gave to Palestine that form of village domicile which has continued in that land down to the present day.

92 ASENATH. Much stress has been laid in critical works upon the names Asenath and Zaphenath-paaneah as belonging exclusively to later Egyptian history not earlier than 900 B. C. "The Egyptian names Zaphenath-Paaneah, Potipherah, and Asenath belong to types of names which do not appear, or are not frequent, on the Egyptian monuments till some centuries after the Exodus. From these facts, reached in complete independence of criticism, the Egyptologists Steindorff, Brugsch, and Ebers all agree in inferring that the names in question did not originate before the 9th century B. C." (Smith, Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament, pp. 63-64). This date, the 9th century B. C., for these names would bring the biblical record containing them down to that date for origin. Asenath is now known from the eleventh dynasty onward to the eighteenth, i. e., from about 2000 B. C. to near the time of the Exodus (Kyle, The Deciding Voice of the Monuments, pp. 157-160). See JOSEPH.

93 ASHER. There are indications that some of the tribe of Asher were in Palestine before the Exodus. That some of the tribes of Asher and possibly Ephraim may have returned to Palestine in the days of favor at court or have escaped after the days of oppression began, as seems to be indicated in Judges and by the Chronicler (Judg. 5: 17; 1 Chron. 7:21, 22; Müller, Asien und Europa, p. 236), is so inherently reasonable and natural that it furnishes no ground for critical argument either for or against the biblical story. Days of freedom and favor always are days of the liberty of movement. And when has it ever been that slaves did not succeed in running away?

ASHKELON. A brief exploration of the site 94 of the ancient city of Ashkelon was recently made by Duncan Mackenzie. The history of civilization revealed by the layers of débris is about the same as at Gezer and Beth-Shemesh, except the Israelite remains, which are wanting. As Ashkelon remained a Philistine city, this was to be expected (P.E.F.S., Jan., 1913, pp. 8-23).

ASSYRIA. Two notable works on Assyria 97 appeared in 1912. One was by Professor R. W. Rogers, Cuneiform Parallels to the Old Testament, being a large collection of transliterations and translations of the original texts of those passages in cuneiform literature which furnish information on subjects treated in the Bible. It is of great interest and use to the general Bible student. The other book, a more technical work, is by Professor Morris Jastrow, Religion Babyloniens und Assyriens, with Bildermappe.

BABYLONIA.—3. Ethnology. During 113 the past ten years there has been increasing inclination to find an earlier home, if not the original home, of Semitic culture in Amurru, Syria, and Palestine. Whether this branch of the race remained thus near the second starting point of world migration in the region of Ararat, drifting gradually southward along the Mediterranean coast, or whether this movement of Semitic people toward Canaan was a later one, it is impossible to say. The view of the origin of Semitic culture that places it in this region, as the earliest origin now known, has been well stated and most completely developed by Professor Clay (Amurru). From this point it is believed they "journeyed east and found a plain in the land of Shinar." There they mingled with the Sumerians and learned from them the cuneiform writing, and later "went forth Ashur and builded Nineveh."

BABYLONIA.—4. History. (5) Ham-murabi. See AMRAPHEL, SUPPLEMENT.

BAPTISM. The Hermetic Writings of Egypt 121 contain many references to baptism in very remarkable terms. Formerly these Writings were thought to be subsequent to the baptism of John and of the apostles and early disciples of Jesus, but a re-examination of the Writings (Petrie, Personal Religion Among the Ancient Egyptians) has shown from internal evidence that the Writings come in large part from a period 500-300 B. C. In these Writings (Corp. Herm. V) about 300 B. C. occur such expressions as "baptize thyself with this font's baptism." The application of water as a symbol of purification makes use of a most natural figure. It is not surprising that it should be found in other than revealed religion. But the natural and true is God's everywhere; that heathen used it did not make it theirs, nor debar God from his own. It has ever been the way of revelation to adopt as symbols most familiar things. The "tree of life" in the garden was a tree. The "bow" in the clouds was a natural phenomenon. The materials of the Supper were the familiar materials present at the Passover feast. So baptism adopted the symbol well known and used as expressive of cleansing. The very essence of revelation is the making known the unknown through the well known and familiar. Otherwise it would not be revelation. A revelation in an unknown tongue or a religion with incomprehensible symbolism would be no revelation at all.

BAPTISM, BELIEVERS'. From the beginning the Christian Churches practiced baptism, and practiced it in the name of Jesus (Acts 2:38; 16:38; 10:48; 19:5; Gal. 3:24; Rom. 6:3; 1 Cor. 1:13-15; 12:13; Eph. 4:5; John 3:5). They clearly did so under the conviction that they were acting according to the will of Christ, and, therefore, under the highest authority. Even if the formal baptismal command of Jesus contained in Matt. 28:19 be left out of the count on the grounds some take that it was unlike Jesus to give such a formula, that Paul seemed not to know it when he wrote that Christ had sent him not to baptize but to preach the Gospel, and because it is considered out of harmony with the rest of the New Testament, which knows only of baptism in the name of Jesus, it must be conceded that the elements which this command contains came to be considered by later congregations as those which constitute Christian baptism, and that the early Christians traced these elements back to a direct word of Jesus. If, in addition, Mark 16:16 be set aside as a part of the spurious appendix of that Gospel, so that no direct word of Jesus formally instituting Christian baptism is left on record, we are nevertheless assured by the facts of the case represented in these passages, and in the faith and practice of these early Churches, that baptism was practiced by Christians, and practiced in the form in which it was practiced, because it was believed to be according to the will of Christ that it should be so practiced. In short, it was the supreme authority of Christ here, as in all other things pertaining to Christian faith and practice, that was the fundamental presupposition with these early Christians.

Now Baptists hold to this fundamental principle, and accepting the Scriptures of the New Testament as they do, as the sufficient and authoritative revelation of Christ's will, they recognize them as justly claiming their allegiance and obedience. They hold also, accordingly, that the two ordinances, baptism and the Lord's Supper, are the only outward forms embraced in the order of the churches and observed with Christ's sanction, and that the forms of these ordinances as essential to their significance are to be preserved and observed according to the will of Christ.

They believe that Christian baptism had its root in the baptism of John, not in Jewish ablutions, not in "Proselyte baptism," as there is no evidence of its existence before the time of Christ, and certainly not in the mysterious, initiatory lus-trations of Greek religious societies. They hold, in accordance with the standard Greek lexicons, that the meaning of the word baptizo is to dip, immerse, plunge. Professor Sophocles, a native Greek and an authority on ecclesiastic terms of the Roman and Byzantine period, so defines it, and he says: "There is no evidence that Luke and Paul and the other writers of the New Testament put upon the word meanings not recognized by the Greeks." That the word for baptism was technically applied to an ordinance of Christianity does not make the act used as an ordinance anything different from the act signified by the original and persistent meaning of the word. Moreover, the figurative senses of it found in the New Testament are always in harmony with the literal meaning of the word. These facts, together with the uniform usage and practice of the New Testament, the symbolic significance of baptism as a burial and resurrection, and the witness of a host of scholars of all denominations, agree with the view that baptism is immersion, and that immersion was the invariable practice of New Testament times.

It should be noted, however, that the stress Baptists place on immersion is not because they believe it essential to salvation, but essential to the ordinance itself. They insist that when one is baptized he should be really baptized. They would not have the pictured truth of the ordinance destroyed or clouded by the substitution of some other act. Besides, they contend that the will of Christ cannot be done, unless the thing commanded by him is done. If Christ himself was immersed, then we cannot follow his example unless we are immersed. Why, they ask, should we do anything in the name of baptism if we are unwilling for any reason to do what Christ did and what he commands?

Coming now to the more specific and important subject of this article, Believers' Baptism. Baptism was practiced at the command of Jesus as a preparation for, or condition of admission into his Messianic congregation (John 3:22; 4:1, 2). The act was usually performed immediately after the recognition and confession of the Messiahship of Jesus and the decision on the part of the believer to join the Messianic congregation (Acts 2:41; 8:38; 9:18; 10:33-48; 16:33). Baptism in the name of Jesus, then, was equivalent to a profession of faith in him, of entering formally into the relation of belonging to Christ, of subjecting oneself to the lordship of Christ.

Accordingly, the invariable order is repent or believe and be baptized. "They then that received his word were baptized" (Acts 2:41). Mark 16:16, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," is a witness to this order, as is also the gloss Acts 8:36, 37: "What doth hinder me to be baptized? . . . If thou believest with all thine heart thou mayest." These and kindred passages throughout the New Testament show that baptism was at the beginning simply the initial, voluntary, formal act of a Christian believer's public life as a member of a Messianic congregation or Christian Church. Not a single clear exception to the rule can be found. The burden of proof, therefore, would seem to rest upon those who would substitute something else for immersion as baptism, and some other than a believer as a true subject of baptism.

GEORGE BOARDMAN EAGER.

BAPTISM.—LUTHERAN VIEW.

Whatever the church gets from the hands of God, man presumably must have a blessing in it. Baptism was instituted by Christ (Matt. 28:18-20; Mark 16: 15, 16, 20).

John's B. Luther calls "the vestibule to Christian Baptism," Chemnitz calls it "a transient sacrament," John himself contrasts it with Christ's (Matt. 3:11; John 1:33; see also Acts 19:2-6).

Christian Baptism is "not simply water, but it is the water comprehended in God's command and connected with God's Word" (Luther's Catechism). Water applied "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" constitutes Christian Baptism. All are "shapen in iniquity and conceived in sin," "by nature children of wrath" (see Rom. 5:12; 8:7; 1 Cor. 2:14; Matt. 15:19; James 1:14; Gal. 5:17 and references). See Augsburg Confession, Art. 2; Smalcald Articles, Part 3, Art. 1; Formula of Concord, Chap. 1.

All need to be born again of the Holy Ghost (John 3:3, 5, 6; Gal. 6:15). God the Holy Ghost can if he will recreate the sinful heart (Matt. 3:9). He can effect this through simple means. Christ used saliva and clay to open the eyes of one born blind, and fed thousands with five barley cakes and two fishes. He can use the water and word of Baptism as a means of Grace. And this is His will. (See Matt. 28:19; Mark 16:16; John 3:5; Acts 2:38; 22:16; Rom. 6:3; Gal. 3:27; Eph. 5:25-26; Col. 2:12; Tit. 3:5; 1 Pet. 3:21.) The Holy Ghost works through this God-given means. And on the basis of such clear Scripture, which is nowhere changed or explained away, Luther says in his Small Catechism, "Baptism worketh forgiveness of sins, delivers from death and the devil, and confers everlasting salvation on all who believe, as the Word and promise of God declare." Baptism then is a means of regeneration; by it the seeds or germs of the new life are implanted, and he who rightly receives it is brought into covenant relation with the Triune God.

Man is bound to the revealed means. God can use other means or work without means. "It is not the absence, but the contempt of the sacrament that condemns." The Lutheran Church never taught either confessionally or through her reputable theologians that unbaptized infants are lost.

The Lutheran Church insists earnestly on Infant Baptism. She does this because, (a) As sinful by nature, infants need the regenerating grace of this sacrament. (b) God himself ordained infant membership among his covenant people (infants at eight days old were circumcised). God alone can recall such membership. He has never done so. Therefore it stands. (c) The divine commission is, "Baptize the nations"—There never was a nation without infants. (d) Thousands of infants were among those who were "baptized unto Moses in the sea." (e) There is not a case in the New Testament of one born of believing parents and baptized as an adult. The adult baptisms are all convert baptisms. (f) Christ asserts the rights of infants (Matt. 19:14). (g) The promise is theirs (Acts 2:38, 39). (h) Household baptisms (Acts 16:15, 33; 1 Cor. 1:16). (i) Practice of Post-apostolic church. (j) It fits the whole scheme of Redemption.

As to mode, the Lutheran Church is stringent on what she believes to be doctrine revealed by God, but is liberal on government, forms and ceremonies (Augsburg Confession, Art. VII). It will never be admitted that immersion is the only mode for valid Baptism. In general this position satisfies: "Any quantity of water, in any way applied, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost constitutes Christian Baptism."

GEO. H. GERBERDING.

BAPTISM.—TRINE IMMERSION.

Trine immersion is administered by a threefold dipping of the candidate,—once for each name of the Trinity. It is the form of baptism observed by the Greek and Armenian churches, numbering millions of adherents, and also by the Church of the Brethren and a few other Christian bodies in the United States and Canada. The authority of the practice is based on the meaning of the baptismal formula, given by Jesus, and found in Matt. 28:19, reading thus: "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." In this formula we have the names of the Trinity, and it is the purpose of the three actions to symbolize the three persons of the Godhead;—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The three actions constitute the one baptism, mentioned in Eph. 4:5, they being looked upon as one, in the sense that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one. Taking it the Christian world over, there are more than 100,000,000 persons who were dipped three times at their baptism. They claim triple immersion to have been the first practice of the early churches, and, in the language of Dr. Wall, affirm that "the way of trine immersion, or plunging the head of the person three times into the water, was the general practice of all antiquity."—History of Infant Baptism, vol. i, page 419. They further maintain, as stated by John Chrysostom, the learned Greek orator, that "Christ delivered to his disciples one baptism, in three immersions of the body, when he said unto them: 'Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father,' etc.

J. H. MOORE.

BELSHAZZAR. Belshazzar is now a well-known personage. Nabonidus in a prayer to the moon-god Sin pleads: "And as for me, Nabonidus, the king of Babylon, protect thou me from sinning against thy exalted godhead, and grant thou me graciously a long life; and in the heart of Belshazzar, my firstborn son, the offspring of my loins, set the fear of thine exalted godhead, so that he may commit no sin and that he may be satisfied with the fullness of life" (Price, The Monuments and the Old Testament, p. 241; also Rogers, Cuneiform Parallels to the Old Testament, 379).

Not all the events in the taking of Babylon are yet understood, but much has become clear. The chronicle of Nabonidus says: "In the month of Tammuz, Cyrus, when he made battle in Kesh (Opis) on the banks of the river Zaizallat, with the soldiers of Accad, conquered the inhabitants of Accad. On the 14th, Sippara was taken without a battle. Nabonidus fled. On the 16th Gobryas, the governor of the land of Gutium, and the soldiers of Cyrus entered Babylon without a battle. Later Nabonidus was captured because he tarried in Babylon. To the end of the month the shield bearers of Gutium guarded the gates of Esagila. No arms of any kind were taken into Esagila or into the shrines; nor was the standard carried in. On the third day of Marchesvan Cyrus entered Babylon. Difficulties were cleared. (?) Peace was established for the city. Cyrus proclaimed peace for all Babylonia and from the month Kislev unto Adar the gods of Accad whom Nabonidus had brought to Babylon returned to their cities. In Marchesvan, by night, on the 11th, Gobryas in . . . and the son of the king was killed. From the 27th of Adar, until the 3d of Nisan, there was lamentation in Accad. All the people bowed their heads."

This is evidence that most of the events of the taking of Babylon as described in the Bible did take place, and there is no necessary conflict between the account in Daniel and the account by Nabonidus. The chronicler is interested in the great affairs of the army of Cyrus and the political changes in the land, and so describes many things of which Daniel makes no mention. The sacred historian, on the other hand, from his characteristic viewpoint of God's providence, makes most out of that later portion of the military operation when "In Marchesvan, by night, on the 11th, Gobryas in . . . and the son of the king was killed" (Clay, Light on the Old Testament from Babel, p. 375). The archaeological evidence supplements the Bible account very much, but presents nothing contradictory to it, and makes nothing in it improbable. "The son of the king" in this particular Chronicle can hardly be any other than "Belshazzar, my firstborn son" of the preceding part of the Chronicle of Nabonidus.

- 141 BETH-SHEMESH. 1. Ain-Shems is about three quarters of a mile S. W. of the modern station of Deir Aban on the Jaffa-Jerusalem railway. It stands on a high promontory on the mountains of Judea which juts out near the valley of Sorek. Ain-Shems has been excavated by Dr. Duncan Mackenzie under the auspices of the Palestine Exploration Fund. It was an ancient Canaanite High Place, and like all such High Places, as Gezer, Megiddo, Taanach, and probably also Carmel, occupies a most commanding site—was in fact a high place. Much the same evidence on the history of civilization in Palestine appeared here as at Gezer. The habitations of the Cave Dwellers, probably aborigines, appear here exactly as there. These are followed by the pre-Israelite Semitic remains, probably Amorite, and then by Israelite remains. Not nearly so many Egyptian remains were found here as at Gezer; naturally enough, as Gezer continued an Egyptian city, at least still claimed by the Pharaoh down to the time of Solomon, and Solomon admitted the claim by accepting it as a dowry with his wife. The High Place with a row of standing stones presents here the same view of Canaanite religion as that given at Gezer and Taanach. Dr. Mackenzie mentions one curious identification, that of a flat stone on the side of the road on which probably the Ark rested. To one not familiar with oriental roads, this seems an amazing identification. But the old roads are the paths of animals; the donkeys and the camels were the road engineers. They followed the course of least resistance and located the paths accordingly, and the stopping places were put just where the loaded beasts needed to stop and rest. For the same natural reason both roads and stopping places continue to this day where they have been from the beginning. The road from the Philistine cities, whence the cows bringing the Ark came, comes over the ridge here at Beth-shemesh in a low place, and to this day donkeys and camels coming by that road stop to rest at a certain spot, and there, by the side of the road in the field, is a large flat stone, a part of the rock ledge, indeed, jutting out of the hillside.

BEZALEEL. What Bezaleel could do is now well illustrated in the abundant remains of jewelry and decorations and art work in the great museum at Cairo. Among many other treasures are these: Let us sit before this great carved door and admire its beauty. It comes from long before the Oppression was over, perhaps from near the beginning of it. It is carved in very low relief, in panels running across the door, increasing in elaborateness and beauty from the bottom to the top. The lowest panel is a series of representations of doors; the next above is made up of alternating groups of ornamental hieroglyphs; and above these are two larger panels of scenes of the king himself, Thothmes II, surrounded by his names and titles, the delicate tracery of the birds and animals and flowers of the hieroglyphs brought out in all the rounded softness of low relief, the most difficult and beautiful of all carving. We must not estimate the work that was done for the tabernacle, "in carving of wood," by the crude Oriental carving that comes into market to-day, but by this, which compares favorably with the famous medieval carving in the pulpit at Amsterdam or in the cathedrals of England.

This great coffin from the tombs of the kings has the five exposed sides completely overlaid with pure gold, not the thin gold leaf which we know, but beaten plates of gold. The gold beaten "into thin plates and cut into wires" to work it in "blue, and in purple, and in scarlet, and in fine linen with skilful work," may yet be seen in process of manufacture at Assiut, and also among the showy articles of personal adornment of many ladies who have been to see the wonders of modern Egypt.

Who that has seen the pots and pans and skillers of the ancient Romans, which have been recovered from Pompeii and elsewhere, has not wondered at the beauty and artistic workmanship of those compared to our own plebeian domestic utensils? But those scarcely surpass in design and workmanship this large collection of such vessels from the ruined altars and palaces of Egypt. They give us a vivid idea of "the vessels of the altar, the pots, and the shovels, and the basins, the flesh hooks, and the firepans" which Bezaleel made.

Besides, here are still more exquisite pieces in gold and silver from the very time of the Exodus; this silver pitcher delicately worked in a conventional flower pattern with a band of hieroglyphs, the rim a gold band and the handle an admirably figured goat trying to climb into the pitcher; or this cup in solid gold, ornamented in hieroglyphs and leaf ornaments, and this bowl of solid silver completely covered with beautiful chasing. No silversmith's window of New York or London can give us hints of higher art or more skilful workmanship than we find here.

Before me in these cases are wonderful specimens of linen, some light and flimsy like a gossamer of silk, and more delicate than the finest produce of the Belfast looms. Other is heavy damask, rich and soft. Still other is a linen crepe with all the crinkled texture of that beautiful fabric. Then see these pieces embroidered in "blue." How did they make a "blue" that would keep in these delicate shades for three thousand five hundred years? Next to an examination of the wardrobe of the priests of the tabernacle itself is the privilege of looking upon these "fine twined linens" and embroideries of ancient Egypt.

The best things are yet to be seen, for the richest of all the work of Bezaleel must have been the jewelry of the high priest. This jeweled dagger has the blade set in a heavy gold socket, the hilt is resplendent with precious stones, and the pommel is crescent-shaped of lapis lazuli. These two gold necklaces are of the finest workmanship, one with a butterfly pendant of microscopic filigree work, the other has three little eight-pointed stars of similar delicacy.

Here are also hawk breastpins, less than an inch and a half from tip to tip of the wings, each feather of which is a separate gem set in gold. But surpassing all else in the collection in this jewel room are these breastplates. The base is of massive, solid gold, which appears at the back of the gem. Even there the feathers of the vultures are worked out with such infinite pains as only a glass can show. The front of the breastplate defies all description. It is of the same gold framework which we have already seen, with precious stones for the inlaying, a kind of work which defies successful imitation to-day. Birds and flowers, the names of kings, and mythological creatures and scenes are joined together in some of the most beautiful creations which the jeweler's art has ever produced.

BITTERN (Heb. קִפּוֹדִים, קִפּוֹד, kip-pode). By many kip-pode is thought to be a bird, but others render porcupine as the R. V. The porcupine is a shy and man-fearing animal, and is more likely than the bittern to dwell in ruins. The porcupine is found along the sea coast and in the lower mountain districts of Palestine and Syria. Its flesh is eaten by the natives. It is covered with quills, is nocturnal in its habits, and seldom seen by man (Isa. 14:23; 34:11; Zeph. 2:14).

165 BRICK. 2. Egyptian. The value of sun-dried brick can best be understood now by the return to earthworks in military fortifications. With the increasing power of projectile weapons, earthworks now afford better protection than stone fortifications. The great walls of cities and fortifications in ancient Egypt by their very massiveness afforded almost impregnable defense against all the methods of attack then known. Besides the great walls and the fortress at Pithom, the enormous walls of the Hyksos fortified the camp found at Tell el-Yehudiyeh by Petrie, in 1906, and again at On (Heliopolis) in 1912 are the best examples of defenses of sun-dried bricks. These Hyksos walls were about one hundred and thirty feet broad; that at Heliopolis built around a central core of mud and sand upon which the brick were laid in sloping fashion. These walls remain almost intact to this day, but are now nearly completely covered by the mud from the sediment of the Nile inundation. Notwithstanding the waters of the inundation have flowed around and over this wall for a thousand years, it is still so solid that the diggers recognize it instantly from the surrounding mud as soon as the pick is struck into it.

BUSH, BURNING. Studies in Egyptian 169 religious forms and beliefs, those amidst which Israel then dwelt and from which Moses was to deliver them, set the symbolism of the burning bush in a very different light. The prevailing idea was that God dwelt in darkness and was dangerous. The secret place of the god in an Egyptian temple was in perpetual darkness and the approach was by a rising and narrowing and ever-darkening way, so as to impress the worshiper with the darkness and the mystery in which the divinity dwelt, while the dread of the gods was inculcated by many other devices. The scene at the burning bush was to prepare Moses for the work of training the Israelites in a revealed religion, one that began with the revelation that God, instead of being dark and dangerous, would enlighten and not destroy his people. This scene in the wilderness was the beginning of the revelation of him who was the Light of the world. The fire in the bush revealed God; the interpretation that the bush represented the Church of God in the fires of affliction in Egypt yet not consumed, is repugnant to this revelation at the bush that God is the Light and Saviour of the world. He is there seen manifesting his glory (Acts 7:30) and not any evil whatever, much less the wickedness of the Egyptians. The reference to the "good will of him that dwelt in the bush" is not compatible with the idea of affliction in the symbolism there (Deut. 32:16). That scene revealed his "good will," and the crown of the blessing upon Joseph.

CALF, GOLDEN. Formerly it was generally 178 agreed that the golden calf was copied from the Egyptian Apis. Much additional light in recent years makes this very improbable. Apis worship was the worship of the living bull, not of the image of the bull. If Israel desired to introduce Apis worship, with which they probably were familiar, they would have searched the herds for a young bull with the marks which were esteemed essential, and, failing to find such, would have given up their designs for Apis worship. Even if the worship of an image of the bull was allowable, which is exceedingly doubtful, they would certainly have searched first to see if a real bull might be found. The view that the golden calf was an image of the Apis bull arises out of a confusion of Apis worship with Serapis worship. This latter was a combination of Apis worship with the worship of Osiris, whence the name Serapis, Osiris-Apis. In Serapis worship the image of the bull was very commonly worshipped. In the valuable collection illustrating Serapis worship in the Louvre Museum this may be seen abundantly shown. But this Serapis worship did not arise until about one thousand years after Israel left Egypt. Information concerning the Mnevis bull whose worship was much in vogue in the delta, especially at On (Heliopolis), has been coming to light little by little. A picture of the image of this bull is known which is painted yellow, the usual Egyptian method of representing gold. If Israel worshiped any Egyptian god at Sinai, it is far more likely to have been Mnevis, since the Israelites were a delta people and apparently a golden image of this god was worshipped in Egypt.

It is, however, much more likely that the calf-worship at Sinai was Semitic calf-worship prevalent among Semitic peoples from very early times down until at least the Babylonian captivity. Thus the sin of Aaron at Sinai would be much the same as that of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, the worshipping of Jehovah by images. In these cases the lapses were into primitive Semitic worship of the young bull, which was regarded as the visible symbol of power. This explanation seems more in accord also with the words of worship used by the Israelites at Sinai. "These be thy gods, O Israel, which have brought thee up out of Egypt." Could they be supposed to believe that an Egyptian god had turned against Egypt and brought them out?

179 CALVARY. There has been much development of theories concerning the location of Calvary since the beginning of this century, but very little progress toward actual identification. The hill north of the Damascus gate suggested by Colonel Exterior of the Garden Tomb.

Conder has been adopted with great enthusiasm by many persons. Public attention was called to it first, or at least with greatest influence, by General Gordon. Two things have powerfully operated toward acceptance of this site among many Christians; repugnance to the ridiculous and revolting superstitions which attach to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher and the disgusting shams which are there practiced on the ignorant, together with the wonderful adaptation of Gordon's Calvary to the demands of Christian sentiment for a suitable place for the crucifixion and the burial. The discovery of what is now known as the Garden Tomb at the side of Skull Hill, or Gordon's Calvary, has added much impetus to general acceptance of this site as the true Calvary. Added to these things, the pictures of this little knoll with holes in the sides, which give it very much the gruesome appearance of a skull, and are even pointed out as part of the evidence in favor of this site, and a very appealing case is made out for those who wish to find such a place for the crucifixion and burial as Christian sentiment can approve. But Christian sentiment was not consulted in the selection of the place of the crucifixion. Roman soldiers chose the site, and Christian sentiment was not even on the horizon. And having had nothing to do with the selection of the site it must not be allowed to have anything to do with identifying it. The idea that there was a hill at the place of the crucifixion is entirely gratuitous. There is no hint of it in the Bible. The "green hill far away" is the sentiment of modern hymnology. The garden which makes such delightful appearance now is, of course, the work of its German caretaker. There are no old gardens in that region. Titus leveled every garden and orchard between his camp and the city wall for the maneuvering of his troops and the operating of his machines. All gardens after that date must be entirely new. The holes which give the hill the appearance of a skull are the work of quarrymen within the memory of those now living in Jerusalem. The best that can be said for this location of Calvary is that the tomb is just such a tomb as that in which the Lord lay.

Concerning the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher not much more can be said than for Skull Hill. The ridiculous superstitions which locate the tomb of Adam, show the holes in which the crosses stood, the slab on which they say the Lord was laid for his anointing, and a crack left by the earthquake, in addition to what is claimed to be the very tomb itself, and all within the small space enclosed by the church walls, fill one with disgust. But neither did superstition have anything to do with locating the place of the crucifixion and must not be allowed to frighten us away from it, if real evidence attest the locality. But as to this real evidence, very little can be said. Of Queen Helena's dream by which she claimed to locate the crosses and the tomb nothing can be said except that probably she had the dream. Of the Jerusalem traditions which may have influenced her dream we know nothing. Whatever they may have been, if they existed, they are absolutely all the evidence there is for the place. Moreover, if the crucifixion was at this point, the city wall must have been just at the foot of a steep declivity. No engineer would ever build a city wall thus, when by extending it a very little he could get far enough up on the hillside to prevent any enemy standing outside and shooting over the wall. The site of Calvary is lost probably forever. We can only say that it was not far from this place; but, like Mary in the garden, we "know not where they have laid him."

183 CANDACE. Recent excavations in Nubia under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania have brought to light some interesting traces of that dynasty of queens to which Candace belonged. A large bronze or copper bowl was found engraved with the picture of one of the successors of Candace sitting in state under a palm tree, attended by the royal fanbearers. Attendants are also seen bringing to the queen a large bowl of milk, a mark of the greatest honor and esteem to this day in the Sudan.

185 CAPERNAUM. German explorations at Tell-Hum have gone far to establish this place as the real site of Capernaum. The old method of locating places by inference from biblical references must give way to the more scientific method of identifying places by their ruins and then understanding the Scripture by the location rather than fixing the location by interpretation. The full report of the German work at Tell-Hum has not yet been published, but the discovery of an important city and especially a great and beautiful synagogue, together with the absence of any identification of an important city or large buildings at Kahn Minyeh, make it practically certain that Tell-Hum is the site of the Saviour's city. One may stand there today on the very pulpit or reading platform from which, most probably, Christ preached the sermon on the bread that came down from heaven. The full publication of the work done at this point may be expected with great interest.

188 CARCHEMISH. Everything pertaining to the Hittites is of interest in these days. The world is talking about the Hittite literature, the Hittite capital, a Hittite empire, and the Hittite power as a third great world-power with Egypt and Assyria. And now the British Museum has sent an accomplished archaeologist, D. G. Hogarth, to begin excavations at Carchemish, the site of the old southern capital of the Hittites on the Euphrates. Professor Sayce, who does so much for biblical research, and who is ever on the watch for anything that may reflect even a ray of light upon Bible history, gives an account of a visit to the scene of the excavations at this interesting place. The work has not progressed very far, but already there have been found a Hittite palace and some Hittite inscriptions. The palace is similar in character to the great palace at the northern capital of the Hittites at Boghatz-keui uncovered by Professor Winckler in 1906.

CENSER. The tabernacle was Egyptian in 191 its architecture, and the furniture, at least in part, the veil and the ark, followed Egyptian forms stripped of all idolatrous symbolism. It is thus probable that the censer was also Egyptian, as censers were very common in the worship in Egyptian temples. The Egyptian censer was usually, if not always, a dish or bowl, probably of bronze, with a handle, sometimes very short, sometimes about two feet in length. Many such censers from every era are seen in Egyptian sculpture.

CHEDALAOHER. Careful attention to the 197 narrative of the campaign of the four kings from the East together with the study of the geography of that campaign, as now fairly well understood, have caused much misapprehension of this famous passage to disappear. The imperial armies of the Elamite allies were on a great campaign, which, having reached the Palestinian border, swept down the E. side of the Jordan to the lower end of the Dead Sea, subduing all the tribes along the way, then turned westward and again northward through the Amorite region W. of the Dead Sea, and finally closed the campaign in the valley where the Cities of the Plain attempted to make a stand against the imperial troops. They were completely defeated in this attempt and overthrown. Then the great army from the East set out on its return march. The campaign was over. Abraham hearing of the predicament of Lot, carried off among the captives and the spoil, gathered his household and allies and followed. It must be noted that the baggage train of plunder and captives is not the main army of fighting men. Lot and the plunder would be with this train and not with the great army of the warriors. Abraham and his Bedouin allies came up with the baggage train at the head of the Jordan and hung upon its flanks until it had reached Damascus, when, by a night attack, a successful raid was made. Lot, with some of the plunder, was rescued. The purpose of Abraham being accomplished, the raiders immediately drew off to return. That the imperial army on its return march would stop to give attention to a band of marauders who in a night foray had rescued a few captives and a little plunder is not to be thought of for a moment; and yet the account properly describes the attack and defeat of Chedalaomer and his allies, because the guards, probably far outnumbering Abraham's party, belonged to the imperial army. The raid was completely successful in the face of great danger and fearful odds and is properly described as, for the little band of Abraham, a great victory.

CHERUB. The cherubim of the Tabernacle 199 bear little or no relation to the cherubim of Eden or of heaven. The name cherub seems here to be taken in a general way to mean a symbolical, winged creature. These cherubim of the Tabernacle, like most of the "pattern showed" to Moses "in the Mount," were certainly taken from Egyptian forms, the idolatrous symbolism being, in each case, left behind. The sheltering of wings is one of the most common and beautiful symbols seen in Egypt, and also in Assyrian sculpture, which copied it from Egypt. It is a natural, and most beautiful and expressive symbol of tender providential care. It is used in the language of many biblical writers, and even by the Lord himself.

204 CHRONOLOGY, NEW TESTAMENT.

Much light has been thrown upon the dates of New Testament events and upon the subject of New Testament chronology by the explorations conducted by Sir William Ramsey in Asia Minor (The Cities of St. Paul; The Letters to the "Seven Churches;" Pauline and Other Studies in Early Christian History; St. Paul in Asia Minor; St. Paul the Traveler and Roman Citizen).

214 CIRCUMCISION.

For the existence of circumcision among the Egyptians, reliance had formerly to be placed almost wholly upon the statements of ancient writers, especially Herodotus; but recently pictured representations of the operation of circumcision have been found by Professor W. Max Müller (Egyptological Researches, 1906).

215 CITIES OF THE PLAIN.

Recent changes at the Dead Sea seem to throw a new and clearer light on the location of the Cities of the Plain. The Dead Sea is rapidly rising. Along the eastern shore of the sea, at the foot of Jebel Usdum, there was, a few years ago, quite a little beach; now there are four feet of water against the foot of the cliff. The River Arnon had quite a delta down to recent years; now the delta has entirely disappeared and boats pass over the place where it once was. Underneath the water may be seen stumps of great trees which once grew there. Twenty years ago a small island lay in the sea near the N. end; even fifteen years ago picnic parties resorted thither; now boats row over the spot without obstruction and a new island may be seen in the making at the N. end of the sea in the delta of the Jordan. The water has passed N. of a portion of the coast to some slightly lower land and now has nearly cut off another portion of the delta as an island. As nearly as can be learned, for no exact records of the Dead Sea have been kept for any long period, this rising of the sea began about fifty years ago, but has become quite rapid within the last fifteen years. The meaning of this phenomenon can be inferred with practical accuracy from observation of geological formations and changes. The delta of the Jordan, formed, of course, by the detritus of that river, is now about eight miles in extent, i. e., once the mouth of the Jordan was eight miles farther N. than it is now. The filling in of this delta diminished the evaporating surface of the Dead Sea, and the re-establishment of an equilibrium between inflow and evaporation required the sea to rise. Far down the sea a tongue of land runs out from the E., now under a few feet of water, not many years ago a ford for camels. Beyond it to the S. is a broad plain a little lower, now covered with water. With the rise of the sea by the filling in of the delta at the N. end the waters were at last pushed out over that tongue of land in the S., thus quickly increasing the area of evaporation and causing equilibrium between inflow and evaporation to be restored and kept stable. This state of stability continued down until perhaps fifty years ago when the delta of the Jordan had grown large and opportunity for expansion of the evaporating area to the S. was exhausted, and then the sea began to rise again, and gradually take possession once more of the delta of the Jordan to increase the area of evaporation; and thus an island is today seen in the making.

Now the Cities of the Plain could not have been at the N. end of the sea, for little, if any, of the delta of the Jordan was then in existence and that only the highest portion. Had the cities been there or on the bluffs above the delta, the ruins would be discoverable to this day. But if they were at the lower end of the sea, then when the waters were shoved out over that tongue of land by the filling in of the delta of the Jordan they covered the ruins of the cities, and they are there at the bottom of the sea to this day. Only marine explorations will settle the question finally, but these geological changes leave little room for doubt that the Cities of the Plain were at the S. end of the sea.

CORINTH. The American School of Classical Studies at Athens, under the auspices of the American Institute of Archeology, has been conducting excavations at old Corinth since 1896. A considerable portion of the most important parts of the ancient city has been laid bare. A number of old fountains of elaborate architecture and fine workmanship were found. Among them is a sacred spring for the use of the priests and the service of the temple. This fountain had been sealed up in the third century B. C., probably from the failure of the water, and never again opened until Mr. Hill and his workmen found it. In front of this fountain ran a carved wall composed of alternating plain panels and triglyphs. One of the plain panels was found to be a secret door opening in, upon being pushed, and having no lock nor handle to reveal to the beholder its character as a door. Within the passage to which this door led was another door having a lock. Beyond this locked door a passage continued by a tortuous way to a considerable distance and ended at the back of an altar in a very old temple. At the end of the passage was a megaphone arrangement cut in the stone by which some one passing from the distant priests' spring could deliver in a great sepulchral tone the oracles to the multitudes waiting in the temple. Such a device had been believed to have existed in ancient temples, but this is the first time it has been actually found. A warning inscription on the wall near the spring forbade any one to pass along that way, "penalty eight pieces of money."

The Agora of ancient Corinth has also been cleared, as also the ancient Basilica. The steps of the Agora, which served as a rostrum for those who would harangue the public, are in situ, and in the Basilica there is a very ancient part which is probably, though not certainly, the judgment hall of Gallio.

CRETE. Arthur J. Evans in 1894 obtained a 233 clue of the possibilities of Cretan discoveries in some three- and four-sided seals which he found at Athens. They were engraved with strange hieroglyphic characters, certainly neither Egyptian nor Hittite. He learned that these seals were from Crete. Again, in the same year and the beginning of 1895, a series of explorations to locate the most favorable site for excavation was made and the yet remaining part of the site at Kephalah was secured for the work of excavating. The result of the work was the uncovering of a large portion of the Palace of Minos, who, however much this name may cover, thus passes from the realm of myth and becomes in some sense historical. The palace is on a far larger scale than the palaces at Tiryns and Mycenæ. Within the palace was discovered the base of a large altar, a large magazine with store-jars, the magazine still containing a number of great jars. The throne room of the palace was also identified. There were also beautiful frescoes which introduce us to a new epoch in the history of painting. The colors are almost as brilliant as when laid on three thousand years ago. Among the decorations is a painting of a group of ladies with strangely modern-looking costumes. The ladies seem to be engaged in lively conversation; altogether the scene seems to be so modern and lifelike that a French gentleman visiting the explorer exclaimed at the sight of them, "Ce sont des Parisiennes" ("These are Parisian ladies").

But the crowning discovery was a clay receptacle containing a horde of tablets, some in the same hieroglyphics as the above-mentioned seals, but the great mass of them, amounting to over a thousand inscriptions, in a form of writing which belongs to another and much more advanced system of linear characters. Much study and comparison will be necessary for the full elucidation of these materials. The language, even, is not certainly known, but is probably some primitive form of Greek (A. J. Evans, Smithsonian Institution Report, 1901, pp. 425-37).

245 DANIEL. The critical discussion about the reality of Daniel, the trustworthiness of his story and the date of the authorship of the book that bears his name still rages with unabated zeal. But little by little, for many years archaeological evidence has been coming to light bearing upon details of the story of Daniel's career. Belshazzar is now a well-known personage (see BELSHAZZAR). He was not the immediate son of Nebuchadnezzar, but of Nabonidus. Nor was Nabonidus the son of Nebuchadnezzar, but there is evidence which points to a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar as the wife of Nabonidus and the mother of Belshazzar. Not all the events of the taking of Babylon are yet understood, but the account has become clearer (Chronicle of Nabonidus, Clay, Light on the O. T. from Babel, pp. 374-75). It is even now apparent from independent evidence that most of the events of the taking of Babylon as described in the Bible did take place. And there is no necessary conflict between the account in Daniel and the account by Nabonidus and Cyrus (Clay, Light on the O. T. from Babel, pp. 374-75, 381-84). Darius the Mede is still a mysterious personage, but not as mysterious as he was; nor was he ever quite as mysterious as he is sometimes represented to be. "Xenophon says that a Mede succeeded to the throne of Babylon. He gives him the name Cyaxeres" (Wilson, Did Daniel Write Daniel? p. 56). Æschylus in his Persæ mentions a Mede as the first leader, followed by Cyrus. There occurs in the Scholiast upon Aristophanes this statement, "The Daric (i. e., the coin) is not named from Darius (Hystaspes), the father of Xerxes, but from another preceding king." Finally, a general of Cyrus's army, Gobryas, whose name is Median, plainly appears in command at Babylon at the time the Persians began their rule; he "took the kingdom." Considering that it was common, as it is still common, for Eastern monarchs, as well as Western monarchs, to have several names, it is not at all impossible that the Cyaxeres of Xenophon, Gobryas of Nabonidus, and "Darius the Mede" are one and the same person. He would be a hardy critic, indeed, who would dare to say that "Darius the Mede" is impossible. Some Greek archaeologists now claim that there are indications that Greek music was an introduction from the East, probably from Persia. The tendency of musical instruments to carry their names with them is well known. It is certain that there was a very wide intercourse of Greeks with other nations as early as the eighteenth and nineteenth Egyptian dynasties, about nine hundred years before Nebuchadnezzar. W. Max Müller finds those whom he thinks to be Ægeans in Egypt about 2600 B. C., and Mesopotamians on the Nile at the same early date (Müller, Egyptological Researches, 1904, p. 16, pls. 5-7; also p. 9). It is evident that there was intermingling of foreign peoples over the East at a much earlier date than has been generally thought. There is nothing impossible in Greek minstrels themselves being present in the great orchestra of Nebuchadnezzar at this late date.

Daniel has not been found, and not certainly Darius the Mede. There is nothing to do but to wait for the further evidence from archaeology which, judging by the development of the past half century, will not long be delayed. The uniform tendency of the evidence thus far to substantiate the details of the life and book of Daniel may well give hope that the final outcome of the critical discussion will be in the same direction.

2. DARIUS THE MEDE. This king mentioned by Daniel is not yet identified by this name. There can be little doubt that in person he is to be identified with Gobryas, a general of Cyrus who took Babylon. That Darius is but another name for this same general is quite in accord with the custom of oriental monarchs (indeed, modern occidental monarchs for that matter) of having more than one name. The mention by the Scholiast of Aristophanes that the "Daric is not named from Darius (Hystaspes) the father of Xerxes, but from another preceding king" may quite probably refer to this Darius. The custom of having subordinate kings was much practiced by Persian monarchs. Professor R. D. Wilson (comp. Orr, Problem of O. T., p. 534) has shown that there are five Assyrio-Babylonian words meaning in Aramaic "king." Three of these denote subordinate rulers. Any of these words might be rendered into Hebrew by "king." Further he has shown, what is apparent even in the English Bible, that "king" sometimes means little more than mayor of a city.

So that, though Cyrus was himself "king," it is quite in accordance with custom that there should be another subordinate "king," as Darius the Mede, resident at Babylon.

248 DAVID.—1. Name. The name of Israel's great king, David, which formerly stood alone in records of ancient history, has recently been found part of the name of an early Sumerian king at Bysmia by the explorations of J. Edgar Banks, beginning in 1903. The statue of this early king was found and his full name is Lugal-daudu, the second part of which is undoubtedly David; indeed, almost its exact equivalent in modern Arabic. No historical connection is apparent between this early king David in Babylon and the king of Israel at Jerusalem, though there may be a lineal descent of the name, other links of which may yet appear.

255 DAVID, CITY OF. There has been a complete reversal of opinion concerning the location of the City of David within the few years since the explorations of Bliss and Dickey, south of the present city of Jerusalem. See ZION and OPHEL, SUPPLEMENT.

257 DEAD, THE.—1. Egyptian. Much has been learned concerning the Egyptian belief of the state and experiences of the dead since the days of Wilkinson, especially since the translation and study of the Pyramid texts (Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt) has opened the way for much more complete understanding of Egyptian ideas concerning the dead. There was much progress in the belief of the Egyptians concerning the future state, from the gross materialistic conceptions in the earliest times, toward some partial approach to the idea of a real resurrection near the Christian era. In the earliest times the dead man was supposed to come out of the tomb in the body and partake of the food provided in the antechamber of the tomb for his use. An actual door was provided for him, as may be seen in the tombs at El Kab. Later a false door, i. e., the sculptured appearance of a door, was substituted for the real door, and the dead man was pictured as seated within the tomb partaking of the food presented without, to which in some mysterious way he was supposed to have access without a real door. The next step in the progress finds him released from the confines of the tomb and going away through the heavens in the boat of the sun and coming back again to his place. All the while this progress in doctrine went on, the provisions were still brought by the friends for the dead man's use. The idea that the ka, the mysterious double of the dead man, could live on the kas, the doubles, of the food, gained acceptance. From this it was but an easy step to the notion that the picture of the food, or a wish for its supplying, would furnish all that the ka of the dead man needed. The Egyptian doctrine of rising from the dead never did become a doctrine of a real resurrection, but was always a doctrine of resuscitation to the same old life upon "oxen, geese, bread, beer, wine, and all good things" (comp. Maspero, Guide to the Cairo Museum; Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt).

DEAD SEA. Recent observations at the Dead Sea are of much interest. See CITIES OF THE PLAIN, SUPPLEMENT.

DISPERSION OF MANKIND. The relation of the confusion of tongues at Babel to the dispersion of the race over the world is placed in a different light by recent discoveries together with careful attention to the form of the narrative in Genesis. There has been a growing tendency for some years to question the view that Babylon was the source of Semitic culture (see AMORITE), and its course westward. And now by the investigations of many, especially the work of Professor Clay (Amurru), it is well established that the source and course of Semitic culture was very different from that view which derived it from Babylon. Careful study of names, especially the names of gods, shows that the Semitic culture of Babylon came from the West, Amurru, "the land of the Amorites." Here after the flood, how long afterward it is impossible to say, the culture began and from this point extended into Babylonia. The words "journeyed east and found a plain in the land of Shinar" refer probably exclusively to this Semitic emigration, and thus the confusion of tongues at Babel had to do only with this branch of the race, "the whole earth," as in many cases in the Bible and out of it, being limited to the scope of the subject in hand. The invariable literary method of the Book of Genesis, which is divided into ten parts, is to give first and briefly in each part a general view of other peoples of the world, including the chosen line of descent, and then, much more in detail, the history of the chosen line. Thus the tenth chapter of Genesis gives in brief outline the dispersions of the nations, including the Semitic people, an outline of history which extends far down the course of human progress and implies the existence of many languages. Then, having finished this general account, the author of Genesis takes up more in detail the history of the Semitic people, the chosen line of descent, and gives an account of the confusion of tongues and the resulting division of races which took place among Semitic people as an illustration of the method of dispersion all over the world. This is in exact accord with the account which science gives of the way in which different tongues arise, indeed, are still arising, in the world, though easy communication in these days has diminished this progress almost to the vanishing point.

EAST. 1. Keh'-dem. The East, the Quedem 288 of the ancients, is the Bible name for the country E. and S. E. of Palestine. It was well known to the Egyptians, and even the Hebrew name was adopted by them as the name for that land, as in the journeys of Sinuhit (Chabas, Records of the Past, new series, ii, pp. 18-36).

EDOM. Edom's place in history has been 291 clearly identified in the papyrus Anastasia, where an officer of Seti Merenptah II reported to the Pharaoh "that the Bedouin tribe of the Edomites passed the frontier guard near Thuku (Succoth) to the lakes of Pithom of Merenptah in Thuku, in order to pasture their beasts on the land of Pharaoh" (Müller, Asien und Europa, p. 136).

natural causes made use of by God in carrying out his great moral purpose in the flood is found in the work of Professor George Frederik Wright, the greatest authority on the geology of the surface of the earth. According to Wright, the flood is connected with the close of the Glacial Period in North America and northern Europe. Very accurate observations made at the gorge of the Niagara and the Falls of St. Anthony show that these gorges have been worn through the rock by the action of the water since about the close of the Glacial Period, thus having only been in process of formation for a period of from five thousand to seven thousand years. At the close of the Glacial Period a series of great cataclysms occurred, and especially many local floods, all culminating in the great flood known as the Flood of Noah, the account of which we have in the Bible, this being the last great change of land levels in the history of geology. During the Ice Age a mass of ice and snow had accumulated on the northern continent of the Western Hemisphere, and also on a part of the Eastern Hemisphere, to an enormous quantity, all of which was withdrawn as water from the ocean. At last the equilibrium of the earth's crust was disturbed, the enormous weight caused the sinking of the glaciated area which, of course, resulted in an upheaval of the bottom of the sea and the pushing out of the waters over a great portion of Central Asia; at the same time the water flowed in over a large part of the glaciated area also. This condition is most exactly described in the biblical account by the statement that "the foundations of the great deep were broken up." There is very conclusive evidence that this subsidence was of short duration, followed by a return to about the former status of the earth's surface, the land rising again and the water returning to the sea. These various movements are clearly recorded in the geological formations of the Western Continent, and evidences of equal clearness of an inundation of the great central basin of Asia are still found along the mountain sides there.

The study of this same Glacial Period shows that the Western Continent was inhabited before the great flood, and that the inhabitants came from the N. W. from the direction of what is now Behring Strait, where there was then probably no open water. Few events of Bible history have so much scientific confirmation as the Flood of Noah, both the conditions and extent of the flood and the time in the history of the world in which it took place (Wright, The Ice Age in North America; also Scientific Confirmations).

383 FORT. Egyptian. The hugeness of the walls of fortifications which have recently been found far surpass the figures given above. The wall of the great fortified camp of the Hyksos at Tel el-Yehudiyeh was one hundred and thirty feet thick and the similar wall, probably by the same kings, at On (Heliopolis), is of the same gigantic dimensions. The thickness of the wall prevented speedily digging through in case an enemy succeeded in getting a foothold at the base of the wall. The great wall at On was not made entirely of brick, but had a central core of mud and sand around which the bricks were laid on the slope of the core. Sun-dried brick made a more substantial fortification than would seem possible. The return of modern defenses to earth-works in these days of great projectile weapons has quite justified the ancients in their dependence on walls of mud brick.

GEZER. In the year 1902 the excavation of 404 Gezer was undertaken by R. A. Stewart Macalister under the auspices of the Palestine Exploration Fund. Work continued on the hill each season until 1908, by which time all the ancient city had been examined except a small portion upon which is now a Mohammedan cemetery. Gezer occupied a high, bold hill with a most commanding view of the Plain of Sharon N. and S. and of the mountains of Judea to the E. Gezer proved to be a Canaanite High Place. The sanctuary, with its standing stones, ten in number, was found with the stones still in place, though two were broken off.

Stone Altar Found at Gezer.

This was afforded for the first time actual knowledge of the High Places of Canaan, though others have since been found. Little is yet known of the ceremonies which took place at the sanctuary. The stones are in a straight row, are roughly hewn, but sufficiently hewn to bring them into a standing-pillar form. One of the stones was from the neighborhood of Jerusalem, probably taken in war and carried off, as idols and other symbols of worship were sometimes taken captive, and as the Ark itself was taken by the Philistines.

The skeletons of numerous little children, under eight days of age, all buried near together and close by the High Place affords most gruesome suggestion of the sacrifice of little children, probably the firstborn, in connection with the worship at the High Place. The uncovering of the site of Gezer revealed much concerning the history of civilization in Palestine. At least four layers of civilization were detected: I. Remains of the earliest non-

Semitic cave-dwelling inhabitants whose homes in caves, together with their sanctuaries and burial places, were found; II. Evidences of a pre-Israelite Semitic population and civilization, thought to be Amorite; III. Clear indication of the incoming Israelite civilization; IV. Remains of post-Israelite times down to the Greek and Roman occupations. Egyptian remains in great abundance were found of periods from very early times down to the monarchy. The appearance of Hebrew pottery clearly marks the time of the Conquest as contemporaneous with certain changes in the religious and burial customs of the Gezerites. The sanctuary at the High Place is also encroached upon by the Palestine do not sustain the "P document" in Joshua. And indeed when these portions of the book of Joshua are separated from the rest they are not supported by the excavations, but the book of Joshua as it stands in the Bible is confirmed in a remarkable way. Let us look fairly at both sides of the controversy. What state of things in Canaan between Israel and the Canaanites does the biblical narrative at its face value demand at the conquest period, and what does this new archaeological book of Joshua being constructed by the excavators evince for the same period in that land? We have already seen that the Israelites spoke the "language of Canaan" and were of the same race as the dominant element in the land. They occupied the vineyards and olive orchards and the "houses full of all good things." They had the same material for pottery and in the main the same uses for it. They are represented to have fallen into many customs of the Canaanites and to have intermarried, though against their law, with the people of the land. Finally, they did not drive out all the Canaanites, as they were commanded to do, but made alliances with many of them and dwelt together with them in joint occupancy of many cities and communities, and so soon fell, as it was said they would, under the seduction of Canaanite idolatry. After the days of Joshua, they lapsed very much into the Canaanite religion so that it was not until in the period of the Judges and the beginning of the monarchy that the religion of Israel emerged for a time triumphant. This was only, as we know, to yield again in later times until the Northern Kingdom perished altogether and the Southern Kingdom was finally cured of idolatry in Babylon. Turning now to the results of the excavations, we find that it is just such a state of things that is revealed by them at the same period. At Gezer, especially, the layers of debris are most clearly apparent. They are definitely marked by Egyptian remains and by the introduction of Hebrew jar handles. There is manifested an intermingling of populations at Gezer at this period of the incoming of Israel. A joint occupancy is represented as in the sacred narrative. A decline in reverence for the High Place is manifested by the partial occupancy of it for the purpose of private dwellings. The coming down of a purer religion is to be noted in the speedy disappearance of the horrible child-sacrifices and the gradual and finally complete introduction of the beautiful symbolism of the bowl and lamp deposit in tombs.

houses of the people contemporaneously with the entrance of the Israelites to live with the Gezerites, as recorded in the Bible. The earlier burial customs give way and there is the gradual introduction of the beautiful symbolism of the bowl and lamp deposit in tombs, denoting the going out of the life. At the same time there are evidences of severe struggle. At this period the great tunnel leading to a secret water supply, far down through the solid rock within the city walls, was lost and never again found until it was cleared out by the excavators.

Much controversy in biblical criticism has arisen out of the discoveries at Gezer. Critics who hold to the documentary theory of the Pentateuch and some other portions of the Bible urge that the results of the excavations at Gezer and elsewhere in

The results of the excavations, as far as they have progressed, show at this period exactly the kind and extent of changes demanded by the Bible narrative as it stands in the book of Joshua. This might seem at once to settle the question and decide against the critical view. It is here the strange issue is made upon which now the whole conflict at this point must be decided. The issue is this: whether or not the agreement of the excavations with the narrative as it stands in the Bible, if made out beyond all question, does after all vindicate the book of Joshua in its present form. The advocates of the critical partition of the book take their stand upon the position that the excavations do not confirm the "P document." It is not necessary to go into a detailed description and illustration of that document. It is frankly admitted that when the book of Joshua is broken into the fragments produced by the critical hypothesis and according to the critical criteria, and the "P document" is separated and read by itself, the excavations do not confirm it. Its advocates then ask our further assent to the conclusion that the narrative in Joshua at its face value is by this discredited. This assumes the correctness of the critical partition of Joshua, which is the real question at issue. Indeed, if we may be allowed so harsh an expression, it begs that question. It puts the facts to the test of a theory, whereas, the theory should be put to the test of the facts. Let us ask if there is anything in the situation created by the critical partition which points to a decision of this real question at issue. On this supposition that the critical partition is correct, what then shall we say of the work of the final redactor who put together these various documents so as to make up the book of Joshua as it stands in the Bible? How does it come that he so put together these fragments and so filled up the gaps that, when more than twenty-five hundred years later this old civilization should be dug up, the things that should remain in the debris of ages would so exactly confirm this fabricated narrative which he had pieced together out of such inharmonious fragments? What kind of prevision did this wonderful redactor possess? May we expect such divine gift in one who is literally "making history"?

Will it not seem to most people that the failure of the excavations to confirm the "P document," considering all these circumstances and facts, discredits the critical partition which produced the "P document," rather than the complete narrative in Joshua from which this part of the "P document" is extracted? It does seem that a calm and faithful following of logical processes leads to this conclusion. The excavations in Palestine confirm the narrative of the conquest as it stands in the Bible. They do also substantiate this completed narrative as true at its face value.

HAGAR. The conduct of the Patriarch in selecting a subordinate wife and then in dealing with Hagar as he afterward did, which is a shock to our ideas of pious propriety, is now found to have been not only in accordance with the customs of the people but in most exact conformity to the law of the land. Palestine was then a province of the Elamite-Babylonian empire and subject to its laws. The great Code of Hammurabi is now almost entirely in our possession. Among many other things in the conduct of the patriarch, Abraham's and Sarah's conduct in this instance is found to be prescribed by law. The Code (law 146) says: "If a man has espoused a votary, and she has given a maid to her husband and she has borne children, afterward that maid has made herself equal with her mistress, because she has borne children, her mistress shall not sell her for money, she shall put a mark upon her and count her among the maid-servants."

HITTITES. Great progress has been made in the search for information concerning the Hittites within ten years, but the foregoing admirable article on this people has been written with such true scientific insight that scarcely anything needs to be changed: only the recent discoveries should be added. The confident opinion of the reality of the Hittites, as a great people, has been finally confirmed and is now accepted by all. Former sneers at the historical accuracy of the biblical references to Hittites are no more heard. The general outlines of Hittite growth and migration are also confirmed. Only the probable direction in which the solution of the problem of the Hittite

Hittite Sculpture from Boghatz-keui.

PAGE language and of the final identification of the strange hieroglyphic inscriptions of the N. as Hittite is to be found is not now quite what it seemed at the time of the writing of the above article. This problem is not yet solved, but it may be that in the end Jensen's studies may prove to be nearly, if not quite correct. Several additional attempts to read the strange hieroglyphics, thought to be Hittite, have been made, in one or two instances with great confidence, but none yet with such success as to carry conviction to the minds of scholars. It is now generally accepted, however, that the hieroglyphic inscriptions of the N. are Hittite. Although it can hardly still be said that more is absolutely proven than that these inscriptions occur in territories at some time occupied by Hittites, still it is scarcely now a mooted question that this strange writing was Hittite.

Many discoveries of hieroglyphic inscriptions believed to be Hittite and a few additional references among other people to the Hittites, have come to light. But the great discovery, eclipsing all others and putting the Hittites finally beyond challenge as a great nation, was the discovery in 1906, by Winckler, of Hittite remains at Boghazkeui and the identification of this place as the northern capital of the empire, as Carchemish was probably the southern capital. Most important of all was the discovery of a great library of tablets written in the cuneiform script, many of which are in an unknown tongue believed to be Hittite. Among the tablets is a copy of the great treaty between the Hittite king and Rameses II made after the battle of Kadesh between those kings, and of which we have the Egyptian copy on a wall of the S. wing of the great temple at Karnak. A preliminary statement of the discoveries of Winckler may be seen in the Orientalistische Literatur-Zeitung, Dec. 15, 1906. The tablets are at Constantinople undergoing a thorough examination and translation. The full publication of the material is still anxiously awaited by the learned world. Whether the attempts already made at the complete unfolding of the Hittite inscriptions shall prove successful or whether others must take their place, the unraveling of the long-time mystery of the Hittites cannot be long delayed, and when it comes, great additional light can scarcely fail to be thrown across the pages of biblical history. Discoveries thus far have far more than vindicated any expectation concerning these people which the few biblical references to them arouse.

HOLY GHOST, OPERATIONS OF.—LUTHERAN VIEW. The Lutheran Church believes and teaches that the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity, operates on the hearts, consciences, and lives of men through the ministry, preaching the Word, and administering the sacraments (Augsburg Confession, Art. 5). The Word which conditions the sacraments is by pre-eminence the vehicle, means, and instrument through which he is ever operative. The Word is more than information: it is life, it is power, it bears to the devout hearer and user the Spirit of God. It not only tells about sin and salvation, but through it the Holy Spirit delivers from sin and confers salvation (see Luther's Catechism,

That this is the teaching and claim of the word itself, see John 6:63; Rom. 1:16; Heb. 4:12; 1 Pet. 1:23; James 1:21; 2 Cor. 3:8; Eph. 6:17.

The same gracious, quickening, strengthening, and comforting effects are ascribed indiscriminately to the Spirit and the Word, showing that where one is, there the other is also, and that one acts through the other. So, "calling" is ascribed in one place to the Spirit and in another to the Word (Rev. 22:17; in Matt. 22:3, 4, the servants', i. e., ministers', call).

On "enlightening" see John 14:26 and 16:13. The Spirit is called the "Spirit of Wisdom," "of Light" (comp. 2 Tim. 3:15; 2 Pet. 1:19).

On "regeneration," comp. John 3:5, 6, 8; 1 John 5:4; 1 Pet. 1:23; James 1:18.

On "sanctification," comp. John 17:17; 1 Cor. 6:11; see also Rom. 10:13-15; 1 Cor. 1:21; Rom. 10:6-8.

So the Spirit operates through the Word wherever and whenever that Word is devoutly and earnestly used, whether it be the preached Word, the written Word, the pondered Word, the Word in the administration of the Sacraments, or the Word in absolution. He that would have the influence and power of the Spirit, must prayerfully and diligently use the Word. He who desires a larger measure of the Spirit, must let the Word dwell in him more richly. This teaching clears away many difficulties and affords much comfort.

GEO. H. GERBERDING.

HYKSOS. Recent discoveries have shed much light and started many suggestions concerning the Hyksos. First of all the name Hyksos, which was formerly learned through Josephus, who quoted it from Manetho, has been found upon scarabs and is definitely known to be Egyptian, or at least a name expressed in Egyptian elements. It is compounded of hag, a prince, and shashu, bedouin, who were shepherds, hence, Bedouin Princes, or Shepherd Kings, as they have been called. This suggestion of the origin of these invaders receives strong confirmation from the discoveries made by Petrie at Tel el-Yehudieh in 1906. A great fortified camp was found surrounded by an immense wall one hundred and thirty feet thick enclosing a space about four hundred wide, a truncated oval in shape. The walls had sloping sides and a causeway leading over the wall instead of a gateway in it. The presence of numerous Hyksos scarabs and the almost total absence of all others in the stratum of debris to which the wall belonged makes it certain that this was a Hyksos camp. The location indicates that either it was Avaris of which Herodotus speaks, as seems most probable, or some other similar camp. The sloping side of the walls was for defense by projectile weapons, in this case the bow. This indicates that these Hyksos invaders were of the desert people to the E. whom the Egyptians called "bow people." This epithet was rather a term of contempt in distinction from their own use of the more virile offensive weapons, the spear and the short sword, the battle-ax and the club. Thus the character of the Hyksos and the region from which they came is well determined. They were Bedouin Princes from the E. and the N. E., but this does not determine their ethnic character or relationships.

The discovery, also, in 1906, of the great Hittite capital at Boghatz-keui, by Winckler, together with the many other pieces of scattered information concerning these mysterious people which have come to light from various sources, now incline many to see in them the Hyksos invaders of Egypt, who ruled in the Delta and held in suzerainty all Upper Egypt for five hundred years. Some things favor this suggestion; as the time at which the Hyksos appear on the scene of history in Palestine; the greatness to which it is now apparent these strange people attained, apparently the only people known to have had such greatness as seems demanded of those who should invade and hold Egypt; the worship of the god Sutekh by the Hyksos, a god not of Egypt but of the eastern Mediterranean shore; and finally the many resemblances between the Hittite hieroglyphics and those of Egypt. On the other hand, were they the great hereditary enemy of the Egyptians who had ruled them for five hundred years, it seems incredible that, in the lengthy accounts of the later wars between Egyptians and Hittites, there should be no reference to the former relations of this people with Egypt, nor any boast of having once driven them out of the Nile valley (Petrie, Hyksos and Israelite Cities; also Orientalistische Literatur-Zeitung, Dec. 15, 1906).

550 JACOB'S WELL. We have no biblical knowledge concerning Jacob's connection with the well which bore his name. The description of it given in John, "Jacob, which gave us the well and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle," is the statement of the Samaritan woman. It was doubtless a tradition of that day. The real importance of this well is not its connection with Jacob but with Jesus. It is well known and its identification can scarcely be called in question. It is one of the few places where one may feel sure of being in the very footsteps of Jesus in that land. Greek monks now have charge of the well and the surrounding land and have carried on extensive excavations, uncovering the foundation of a large and beautiful church which had been built in the very early days of Christianity and then in later years displaced by a much larger structure.

553 JAMBRES. This mysterious reference to a person whose real character has been only an inference has received illumination; probably Jambres is identified by the work of Professor Groff in Egypt. The great magician of the time of Rameses II and the beginning of the reign of his successor Merenptah, who was most probably the Pharaoh of the Exodus, was Kha-em-uas, a prince of the realm, the brother of Rameses II. His fame existed long after his death. By a careful comparison of the spelling of this name in the Egyptian and the Greek spelling of the word Jambres it appears most probable that the name as it appears in Timothy is the form in which the name of this ancient Egyptian was preserved among the Greeks, and that Janes and Jambres were the great antagonists of Moses among the magicians of Egypt.

JERICO. The site of ancient Jericho was excavated recently by Sellin under Austrian auspices. Many of the walls of the houses were found, but only the lower portions of the ancient walls of the city. The excavations were a great disappointment of the ordinary expectations from such work, i. e., almost nothing was found. This is a negative kind of evidence not usually of much worth, and perhaps not of much worth in this case, though it is exactly what was to be expected on the assumption that the Bible narrative is correct.

A "tongue of gold," translated in the English version a "wedge of gold," mention of which is made in the account of the sin of Achan at Jericho, received unexpected explanation in the excavations at Gezer in the layer of debris corresponding in time with the Conquest. A piece of gold bullion made in the shape of a sheep's tongue was found, showing that gold was passed around in this form in that day. Incidentally, it is rather suggestive concerning the need of that age for a medium of exchange; only large business of individuals or nations would have any need of an exchange medium in such large pieces.

JERUSALEM. Topography. The location and topography of Jerusalem of today differ much from the location and topography of the ancient city down even to Roman times. Successive destructions with the ever accumulating debris have filled up the valleys and have caused a leveling down of the hills so as to change in some measure the topography, and the city itself has, as a whole, been moved somewhat N.

The site upon which Jerusalem stands is almost surrounded by two deep valleys. These start from either side of the high ridge to the N. W. From the N. E. side of this ridge the valley of the Kidron runs first about due E. It is about an eighth of a mile wide and from twenty to thirty feet deep, gradually becoming narrower and having more precipitous sides until it reaches the ridge of Olivet. It then turns abruptly and runs almost due S., descending and narrowing very rapidly until, as it passes the site of the ancient city, it is no more than a deep, precipitous ravine. It joins the Valley of Hinnom, immediately S. of the city, having descended seven hundred and fifty feet in the course of about four miles. The other valley, the Valley of Hinnom, starts from the S. W. side of the same ridge N. W. of the city, descends still more rapidly, by a much shorter course, first S. and then S. E. to join the Kidron S. of the city. The high ridge included between these two valleys ends in an abrupt headland above where the valleys meet, and is itself split at that point by a third valley, the Tyropean, which begins just N. of the present city wall and descends by a steep and narrow course to the S. front of the promontory on which the city was built, and there spreads out in a great crescent-shaped valley opening out into the junction of the Kidron and the Hinnom. This Tyropean valley thus divides the headland into two unequal ridges, a broad high ridge on the W. and a lower and narrower and more precipitous ridge on the E. Two smaller lateral valleys, one from the E. and one from the W., near the Tyropean, cut both the E. and the W. ridges into two portions. The upper end of the E. ridge was Bezetha, the new city, the lower part Moriah, where stood the temple and where now stands the Mosque of Omar. The N. part of the W. ridge was Acra, the S. portion of the ridge has been called Zion since the days of Josephus and no one knows for how long before his time. The E. ridge was crossed just below the summit of Moriah by still another valley or low portion; and the lower part of the ridge from this valley down to the junction of the Kidron with the Valley of Hinnom, was the hill Ophel. Here on this narrow and almost impregnable rocky ridge stood the Jebusite fortress which was taken by David and again fortified by him as his own citadel. This was the original City of David and Zion. These names ultimately spread over all the hills occupied by Jerusalem. On this same ridge of Ophel above the site of the Jebusite fortress, later the castle of David, the palace of David was erected, and still later, on the summit of Moriah above, the temple was built by Solomon. When the city spread over the western ridge, the names, "the City of David," and "Zion" followed the growth of the city and at some time during the long history, probably after the return from the captivity, the name Zion was localized on the larger western hill, and, in the days of Josephus, that scholarly man and ardent Jew seemed not to have suspected that the belief of his day concerning the location of the original fortress of David was not correct. The work of many excavators, and especially Bliss and Dickie's examination of the foundation of the old city walls, have shown beyond question the original location of the city. The ancient city occupied the S. slopes of the headland upon which the city stood and gradually spread up over the summit. The city of today has moved bodily northward, and the southern slopes and the broad crescent shapes of the Tyropean Valley are now left to the farmer and the gardener. Zion is literally "plowed as a field." The city has spread far back toward the summit of the ridge from which the Kidron Valley and the Valley of Hinnom start. When the ancient city stood in its glory, the castle on the lower summit of Ophel, above it the palace, and crowning all, the white splendor of the temple on the summit of Moriah, the hearts of the people must have thrilled with the words of the Psalmist, "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north," i. e., looking northward.

The situation of the city was in ancient times justly celebrated. The city, which, as we have seen, was almost wholly surrounded by valleys as by great moats, was also surrounded beyond the valleys by ridges. These ridges on either side withdrew the attacking force of any enemy to a distance beyond the reach of the projectile weapons of that age. Today an enemy who should occupy those ridges would have the city at his mercy. In those days an enemy so situated was utterly baffled as long as he could be kept there. From these natural defenses of Zion was drawn the beautiful and expressive symbolism of God's care of his people, "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even forever."

JOSEPH. The former insurmountable difficulty in reconciling the chronology of the Patriarchs and the Exodus has been practically removed by the discovery that some of the early Babylonian dynasties which had been thought successive were in fact contemporaneous. This discovery has reduced the date of Abraham's call to about 1912 B. C. Other discoveries have also thrown light upon the life, the career, and the character of Joseph. It may be noticed that Palestinian ambassadors to Egypt, long before the days of Abraham, wore coats of many colors, almost certainly the insignia of rank, a kind of ceremonial dress. And so Joseph's coat of many colors probably indicated the father's intention to promote him, perhaps to make him Sheik of the tribe. This accounts for the otherwise silly conduct of the older brothers in their spiteful discontent about the coat of many colors which was the object of their hatred when they had him in their hands. Had it been only the gaudy expression of a father's vanity in decking out a child, it could hardly have excited the hatred of men. Ishmaelites, Midianites, and Medianites are still puzzling. But evidence of activity, of travel, of trade routes and of military routes through the east country beyond Jordan and in Arabia is accumulating. The existence of different tribes in a great caravan going down into Egypt, which had traveled no one knows how long nor how far to pick up trade, is not a matter of surprise. The Hyksos Kings, Bedouin Princes, were on the throne of Egypt (see Hyksos), and Joseph, the Bedouin Prince, had thus a clear road for promotion in exact accord with the experience which the Bible attributes to him. This fact, together with the presence of the Semitic tongue in Egypt and the activity of Phœnician traders in the foreign business of Egypt, and, finally, some understanding, even sympathy, between the Patriarchs and these Pharaohs in religious matters, furnish Joseph's day and opportunity in exact accord with the biblical account. Recent excavations at Heliopolis, the ancient On (see On), have discovered the presence of Hyksos fortifications. As Joseph married "the daughter of the Priest of On" the priests must already, in his day, have been subservient to the royal house of the foreign invaders; i. e., these invaders had already taken possession of the capital. Thus within this Hyksos wall at Heliopolis, in the fortified citadel of the great capital, Joseph probably had the seat of his government and from this place directed all the affairs of the famine relief.

KADESH-BARNEA. To this admirable review of the discoveries and discussions concerning Kadesh-Barnea should be added a reference to the epochal researches of Professor Palmer in 1868-1871 (E. H. Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus).

KIBROTH-HATTA AVAH. Concerning this site and the discontent and the murmuring and the death which took place at Kibroth-Hattavah, there has been received much additional information in recent years. The place was visited and carefully considered by Professor Palmer (E. H. Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus), and latterly Hoskins also has visited this place and given most careful consideration to its claims. The one thing that at first causes some incredulosity is the seeming unlikelihood of such heaps of stones remaining until the present day. This objection, however, arises from ignorance of the character and ways of the desert, and is best satisfied by a consideration of the fact that Petrie discovered at Serabit el-Khadem stone huts of the workmen of Pharaoh which have existed there from the time of the twelfth dynasty, about 1,000 years before the journey of the Israelites through this region (Petrie, Researches in Sinai).

636 LAW OF MOSES. The preparation of an elaborate code of laws at so early a period in the history of the world is set now in a new light by the discovery of the Code of Hammurabi (see AMRAPHEL).

650 LINEN. لِن, shaysh, the byssus, was linen, not silk. Microscopic examination has shown conclusively that mummy cloth to which the name byssus was applied in references to Egypt, was pure linen.

653 LORD'S PRAYER. A remarkable discovery of what is probably an Aramaic original of the Lord's Prayer in meter has been made by Professor C. C. Torrey. In translating the Greek of the Lord's Prayer in Luke into Palestinian Aramaic as an illustration of the thesis that Luke often used Aramaic original documents in preparing his Gospel, there appeared quite unexpectedly incidental evidence that the Lord's Prayer was originally in Aramaic and in verse. It was observed when the translation was finished in the Aramaic that two of the lines were in exact meter and that a few entirely legitimate changes, not affecting either the idiom or the translation, turned the whole passage into exact seven syllable meter in Aramaic, the poetic form most in favor in Aramaic in early times. Professor Torrey says, "The use of meter in formulæ to be recited and especially in prayers, is, of course, most natural, and has a great many illustrations. There seems to be a real probability that the original form of the Lord's Prayer has here been found, since the accidental appearance of these six lines of the formulæ in exact syllabic meter and faithfully rendering the most primitive Greek text, would be almost a marvel. No attempt, for instance, to render the Greek of Matthew into metrical lines can succeed" (Sunday School Times, May, 1913).

LORD'S SUPPER, THE.—LUTHERAN VIEW. Lutherans believe that this holy sacrament is a means of grace, appointed by Christ amid the most solemn surroundings. "It hath been instituted for the special comfort and strengthening of those who humbly confess their sins and who hunger and thirst after righteousness," ordained by Him in whom dwelt the fulness of the Godhead and to whom all power was given in heaven and in earth, whose incarnation, nature, vicarious atonement, and divine kingdom are mysteries that the angels desire to look into. We do not expect to comprehend it with our frail, sin-blinded reason. The awful solemnities of the night of the institution prepare us to expect a miracle of grace. We note its testamentary character. He makes his will, he bequeathes to his church his legacy of love. In a will we do not look for ambiguous or figurative language. Men do not lightly change or substitute the words of a last will or testament.

As to interpretation of Scripture, the Lutheran Church has certain fixed principles. She interprets literally unless text or context indicate that it is figurative. She interprets Scripture by Scripture. She examines and compares all that is said on a subject before she formulates a doctrine.

The words of the institution are found in Matt. 26:26-28; Mark 14:22-24; Luke 22:19-20. The differences are verbal only. Luke adds, "Do this in remembrance of Me." About thirty years later Paul writes to the church in Corinth, reminding them that what he delivered, he had received of the Lord (see 1 Cor. 11:23-25). In his instructions as to worthy and unworthy communing, he takes the real and actual presence of Christ's body and blood for granted (see verses 27-29; comp. 1 Cor. 10:16). The Lutheran Church, noting that the earthly elements are called bread and wine before, during, and after the consecration and distribution, does not believe in or teach a transubstantiation or physical change of the bread into flesh or of the wine into blood. Neither does she believe in a physical mixture or fusing of the earthly and heavenly elements. Though often falsely accused of believing in such a consubstantiation of elements, she has never taught it, but always repudiated it. She does believe in a real presence of the glorified Christ. She does believe that he gives his glorified but real, true body and blood to the communicant. She believes that the consecrated bread which the communicant receives is the communion, or communication, or conveyance of that glorified body and the wine of that blood. Without change of substance, or physical mixture, the bread remaining bread and the wine remaining wine, these earthly elements convey the heavenly gift of the present body and blood of the God-man who is present with his church always, even to the end of the world. It is not then a gross, carnal, caper-naitic presence and eating and drinking. It is a mysterious but real presence, not of Christ's body of humiliation as it was, subject to weakness, hunger, thirst, pain, and death, but of that glorified, spiritual, resurrection body, in his state of exaltation, inseparably joined with the Godhead and by this union rendered everywhere present. This body and divinity was present though veiled, when the God-man walked this earth. Peter and James and John caught a glimpse of it on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17:1-8; Mark 9:2-9; Luke 9:28-36; 2 Pet. 1:16, 17).

The same mode or method of argument that will get rid of Baptismal Grace and the Real Presence will eliminate the incarnation, the deity of Christ, the Trinity, and all the great fundamental mysteries.

The confessional teaching of the Lutheran Church is set forth in Luther's Small and Large Catechisms, Parts 5; in Augsburg Confession, "Art and Apology," Art. 10; Smalcald Articles, Art. 8; Formula of Concord, ch. vii, in Parts 1 and 2.

GEO. H. GERBERDING.

659 LYDIANS. Recent excavations at Sardis (see SARDIS) have brought to light some material in the Lydian tongue. It is not yet translated, but ere long, it is hoped, something will be known of the language of this interesting people.

667 MAGICIANS. 1. Egypt. See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

678 MANNA. Attempts have been made in critical discussions to explain the manna by the manna of commerce, a gum which exudes from the tamarisk tree in this region of the route of the Exodus through the Sinai Peninsula. This gum is called in Arabic mān. It is only necessary to remember the qualities of the real manna, and its giving, as described in the Book of Exodus, with those of this manna of commerce, and its source, to see how utterly the explanation fails. The manna in the Wilderness was (1) round and hard and white and resembled a coriander seed; (2) it could be ground and boiled and baked; (3) it furnished food supplies for forty years; (4) it was nourishing as food. On the other hand, the manna of commerce; (1) is a drop of gum, neither hard nor white; (2) it cannot be ground, for it is a soft, sticky gum; if boiled, it would become molasses; and if baked, it would produce only a pan of taffy; (3) all the supply of gum from the tamarisk trees on the whole peninsula for forty years would not be enough to give Israel one meal; (4) it is not a food, but a cathartic.

690 MEDEBA. In the year 1890, a mosaic floor of an old church was found at Medeba, which contained an ancient map of Jerusalem, dating from the 4th or 5th century A. D. Unfortunately, the workmen did not appreciate its value and much of it was destroyed, but the work of destruction was stopped in time to save a considerable portion. The value of this map, which has been much written about, is really rather as a curiosity than as offering any reliable geographical or topographical information concerning the land of Palestine or the City of Jerusalem. Its value as a map has been much sacrificed to the introduction of symbolism in keeping with the decorative character of the mosaic.

699 MELCHIZEDEK. The Tel el-Amarna tablets are thought by many to throw light upon the character of Melchizedek, although affording no historical information concerning him. The King of Jerusalem, Ebed-Tob, employs a formula, apparently a formula of vassalage, in addressing the Egyptian King, Amenhotep IV (?), which probably explains the strange language concerning Melchizedek, "without father, without mother, without descent." Ebed-Tob says, "Behold it was not my father and not my mother who established me in this position, but it was the mighty arm of the king himself who made me master of the lands and possessions of my father" (Budge, A History of Egypt, iv, p. 231).

700 MEMPHIS. The systematic excavation of the site of Memphis was begun in 1908, by Professor Petrie. The site of the great temple is now in a low-lying tract amidst the palm groves by the village of Mit-Rahineh, but is in large part occu-

ried by a lake of water, except that at the time of low Nile the lake is reduced to very small dimensions. This condition of the site of the temple has been brought about by the rising of the surrounding land by reason of the Nile deposit from the inundation continued through many thousands of years. The work of excavation proceeds very slowly because it is only during the short period of the low Nile that the work can be carried on and even then, at the lowest levels, only by constant baling and pumping. Little by little the area of the great temple is examined and plotted, but on account of this inflow of the Nile water, the great ruins can never be exposed to view. Thus far a part of the great avenue of sphinxes which led from the E. toward the entrance to the temple has been found. The West Hall of the temple of Ptah, the great temple of Memphis, has been examined. The oldest portion of the temple has not yet been reached in the excavations. An enormous alabaster sphinx of eighty tons weight of the eighteenth or nineteenth dynasty, the largest movable sphinx yet found in Egypt, was discovered in 1912. Outside of the temple area, the Palace of Apries (see PHARAOH HOPHRU) has been examined, a most interesting work, because this is the best preserved specimen of an Egyptian palace and affords a more distinct notion of the true character of the great palaces of the Pharaohs (Petrie, Memphis, i, ii).

METROLOGY. (4) Cubit. The mysteries ⁷¹⁰ concerning the cubit so well set forth in the article on this subject have probably received final illumination in the work of the Rev. W. Shaw Caldecott. The study of those phenomena which have puzzled so many led Mr. Caldecott to the theory that the Semitic long measure employed three different cubits, "the cubit," "the cubit of a cubit and a hand breadth" and the "great cubit." With this theory in mind as a working hypothesis, he set about to read and restore the Senkerek mathematical tablet in the British Museum which long defied all attempts of the greatest Assyriologists. It was believed to be a table of measures, but on the hypothesis of a single standard of long measure, nothing could be made out of it. Caldecott found its mysteries to dissolve rapidly before the supposition of a triple standard. The portions of the tablet yet remaining were read and found to be systematic tables of long measure. The system upon which the tables were constructed having once been perceived, the missing portions of the tables were easily restored on the same principles.

Another monument of antiquity now came into the solution. The statue of Gudea of the Louvre Museum, Paris, is a sitting figure of a king having on his lap the ground plan of a great palace. At one side of it is a measuring rule which, like the Senkerek Tablet, had defied explanation on the supposition of a single standard of measure. Applying the theory of a triple standard and the table of measures derived from the Senkerek Tablet, the Rule of Gudea also became perfectly intelligible; is, indeed, simply a builder's measuring rule, graduated for all three standards of long measure. From this rule the exact length for each standard cubit was found. They were related to each other as 3, 4, and 5, the relations between three sides of a right-angled triangle. These measures were used respectively as a jeweler's cubit in decorative work, an architect's cubit on buildings, and a surveyor's cubit in land measurement. The tables of measure on the Senkereh Tablet were constructed on the duodecimal, instead of the decimal system. It remains only to test the accuracy of the results by the application of the system of tables and the Rule of Gudea to the actual constructions described in the Bible and in Josephus. The plan of the Tabernacle as given in Exodus, which on the single cubit system has always presented some inexplicable difficulties, was found to be perfectly simple and clear. When drawings were made from descriptions and according to the new tables of measures, a symmetrical structure was produced, adapted to the desert life and involving no difficulties in construction. The same method of testing was applied to the Temple of Solomon with like satisfactory results. Even the plan of Ezekiel's temple, the puzzle of commentators in all ages, which, it has been declared, was never intended to be built, was, in the hands of an architect working by the new tables of measures, perfectly workable. Here only, in all the application of the system, one measurement as given in the received text of Ezekiel, was found impracticable; perhaps a mistake of a copyist. Then Josephus's description of the Temple of Herod, which had been said to be full of mistakes, because Josephus was not an architect and did not take the trouble to be exact, was found absolutely correct, working out, under the hands of an architect, a beautiful and symmetrical structure. Last of all, the discovery was tested on the temple area itself where some traces of the old walls of the temple are to be seen and some ancient drains are still visible. It is well known that the drains in that time and in that part of the world were carried under doors of buildings. The plan of Herod's Temple, drawn to the new measurement, when placed upon the temple area, puts a still remaining drain exactly under a door. The system would seem to be established on firm ground. The principle upon which it is constructed is the same as that which gave to the English-speaking world three standard gallons, the wine gallon, the beer and milk gallon, and the dry gallon, and which formerly gave Europe three measuring sticks, the ell Flemish, the ell English, and the ell French. Remembering the very large literature on Hebrew architecture which exists, it is not to be expected that such a radical change will speedily be adopted by all, but these results of Caldecott seem to be established upon unassailable ground.

723 MIGDOL. A recent discovery of manuscripts makes mention of some places along the route of the Exodus, as Migdol and Pi-Hahiroth, but does not afford any exact information concerning the location of any of these places. The Bible account is still the most illuminating. If it be possible to locate approximately any one of the places mentioned in connection with the crossing of the Red Sea, all the others may be located approximately by means of that one. The route of the Wilderness journey from Marah onward is fixed with almost absolute accuracy. A journey over the way along the old caravan route, finding each station in its place, at the right distance, in the right direction, and with the exact experiences of the Israelites, produces a conviction scarcely possible to be shaken. Now, according to the description in Exodus the crossing must have been within three days' journey of Marah, i. e., near the site of the modern town of Suez. Anywhere within ten miles of that place will satisfy all the conditions of the narrative. According to this approximate location of the crossing, Migdol must have been either Ras Ataka or some other high point on the mountains of the desert W. of Suez, suitable for a watch tower, a Migdol. Pi-Hahiroth lay between Migdol and the sea, somewhere beyond the ancient sea line within ten miles of modern Suez; and Baal-Zephon on the opposite, the eastern shore of the sea.

MILLO. This old fortification has been sought 725 in the region of the present Jaffa Gate, in accordance with the notion that the Castle of David was on the W. hill, but the work of Bliss and Dickie in the search for the old walls of the city has very conclusively substantiated the opinion that located Zion on the eastern hill Ophel. Accordingly Millo is likewise to be sought in that quarter of the city.

MOAB: Mention of Moab has been found in 749 Egypt (Recueil de travaux, xxx). It occurs in an inscription around the base of a standing statue of Rameses II in front of the N. pylon of the temple of Karnak. The spelling of the name is the plainest possible in hieroglyphics and the identification of the name of this ancient people for the time of Rameses II, the Oppressor, is beyond question. Whether Rameses II himself actually subdued this people, as he claims, or whether he boasted of the success of his fathers, after the usual fashion of the Pharaonic inscriptions, in either case the existence of Moab before the time of Rameses II is attested. The placing of Moab in that age is completely vindicated.

MOSES. 1. Name. The name Moses, in 757 Hebrew, מֹשֶׁה, mo-sheh, is of Egyptian origin. The Egyptian form is mes or mos. The h is added as the Hebrew ending of the word. Mes in Egyptian means "drawn out," then "born," then "child." It occurs generally with the name of the god Ra joined with it. It was the basis of the name of the royal family, as we would say the "family name." During a large part of the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties, this name was the royal name, Rameses or Ramoses. In the eighteenth dynasty there were also Ahmoses and Thothmoses, i. e., "born of Ah," the moon god, or "born of Thoth," the scribe god. Pharaoh's daughter on seeing this Hebrew child resolved to adopt it; thus it would receive the family name, Ramos. Certainly in Egyptian the name of the god would be appended. This name comes down to us as Rameses, or Ramoses, with the ending es or os received through the Latin and the Greek. The Egyptian theory of royal birth was that each member of the royal family was born of a princess through the intervention of the god Ra, and so "Ramoses," "born of Ra." This child, however, was not really a child of the princess. But to the oriental mind the name must have some significance. So she fell back on the primary meaning of the word, "drawn out," and so named the child, because she "drew him out of the water."

This Egyptian name of Moses is one of the deciding evidences for the period of Egyptian history to which Moses belonged. He could not have received this name in Egypt before the dynasties when "born of" was used as a royal family name. Coupled with the name of the land, Rameses, which could not have been so called until the Rameside kings, it limits the time of Moses to the Rameside dynasties, the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties.

790 NILE. Later discoveries and investigations have made clear the seeming confusion in the references to these various names of the Nile. Yeor was the Nile, and its canals and pools of water, indeed, all the water of the Nile. Shihor, also spelled Sihor, has been discovered in the Egyptian name Shi-t-hor, the canal of Horus (see СННОК). This canal carried the waters of the Nile farthest E. and thus furnished the first sweet water of Egypt to those approaching from the eastern desert (Jer. 21:18). Nahar and Nahal, in the passage mentioned, both refer to the desert stream separating Palestine from Egypt. This was always the boundary. Abraham's posterity never did occupy from the Nile to the Euphrates, but from "the river of Egypt," this desert stream, to "the great river, the river Euphrates."

793 NO-AMON. This name is the Egyptian nut, a city, and Amon, the proper name of a god, "the city of Amon," i. e., the city par excellence. It was translated in the authorized version "populous No," following a mistake in the Vulgate of the meaning of the word amon. The description of No-amon in Nahum 3:8 seems to be that of a delta city, for it is represented as on the sea. But □, sea, in that passage is used poetically for the Nile. With this difficulty removed, the Egyptian etymology of the word leaves no doubt as to the identification of the place. The "city of Amon" in the days of Nahum and Ezekiel was Thebes. See THEBES.

794 NOPH. The explorations being conducted at Memphis, Noph, and at Heliopolis, the ancient On, thus far indicate that On, and not Noph, was the capital in the Hyksos time. No Hyksos remains have been found at Memphis, while a great Hyksos wall fortifying the temple, or a large portion of it, is still in situ at Heliopolis.

805 ON. The ruins of On within the walls cover about four square miles. Through the center of this area, from E. to W., runs a low-lying strip of land which marks the site of the ancient great sanctuary. It is about a quarter of a mile wide and nearly a mile long. The temple, one of the earliest in Egypt, having been built originally upon the level of the land in the age of its erection, has, of course, remained down at that low level, while the surface of the land of Egypt has risen by reason of the inundation. Today, the foundation of that portion of the temple erected in the twelfth dynasty is about nine and a half feet below the level of the soil. Systematic excavation of this place was begun by Professor Petrie in 1912. Houses of the priest of On, the E. pylon of the city, which was perhaps also a pylon of the temple, a building of Rameses II and the foundation of an obelisk of Thothmes III have been found, the latter being paired with the standing obelisk of Usersten I. The most important discoveries, however, have been that the place has been abandoned since the Persian invasion, and that there existed here a great Hyksos wall fortifying the temple, or at least a large portion of it. This wall is very similar to the Hyksos wall of the fortified camp at Tel el-Yehudiyeh, probably the Avars of Hyksos history. As Joseph married a daughter of the priest of On, it is certainly implied that the priests of On were subservient to the royal house at that time. It is probable that at On, within this great wall of fortification, Joseph ruled as Prime Minister in Egypt.

PHARAOH. Cheyne says (Encyclopedia Biblica), "The name given to all Egyptian kings in the Bible." He also says that the name could not have been received by the Hebrews until after 1000 B. C. The Hastings Bible Dictionary says that a letter was addressed to Amen-Hotep of the eighteenth dynasty as "Pharaoh the lord."

But the name Pharaoh was used in the Egyptian from the time of the pyramid texts onward. Its etymology is per-a-a, "great house." It was used at first with distinct reference to its etymology and not clearly as an independent title. This plainly shows that originally it was simply the expression "a great house," and only by a figure of speech came to mean "king." In the time of Rameses II, the Oppressor, the word was fully established as a title of the king as embodying the government, exactly as the expression the "Sublime Porte," the "High Gate," denotes the Turkish government. The word is so used in the Tale of Two Brothers, in a document of the time of Rameses II. Later in Egyptian history, Pharaoh was followed by the name of the king, as "Pharaoh Shishak" (Recueil de Travaux, xxi, 13, i, i). But the Bible does not speak so, but calls this king "Shishak, king of Egypt." This new custom in the use of this title Pharaoh, did not reach the Hebrews until later when we have Pharaoh Necho and Pharaoh-Hopra.

PHARAOH. 11. Pharaoh-Hopra. The 854 Palace of Pharaoh-Hopra (Apris) at Memphis was explored by Professor Petrie in 1909. It is one of the most complete specimens of great Egyptian palaces remaining to the present day. It consisted of a great court, with a place in the centre where it is supposed the throne was set for judgment, and back of this, private apartments, thought to be those of the women's quarters. A rather surprising and interesting feature of this palace is the private veranda at the north end of the palace for the "wind of the evening" (Petrie, Memphis, ii).

PI-HAHIROTH. Nothing is certainly known 871 of the meaning of this name. Attempts toward an Egyptian etymology have been made, but with indifferent success. A Demotic papyrus recently discovered by Spiegelberg speaks of a "Lake Kharthra" in this region. This is probably the Egyptian name of which Hahiroth is the Hebrew equivalent. Thus Pi-Hahiroth would mean "the mouth of (lake) Hahiroth." References to Pi-Hahiroth in the Bible contain no hint of description. Since we have neither the meaning of this name nor any description of the place, other than the above-mentioned discovery, it is impossible to know certainly whether Pi-Hahiroth was a fortress, a sanctuary, a city, or some natural feature of the landscape. On the location of Pi-Hahiroth see MIGDOL, SUPPLEMENT.

875 PITHOM. In the last decade there has arisen much discussion concerning Naville's discoveries of Rameses' claims at Pithom, but no new evidence. The argument against the identification of Rameses as the builder of Pithom rests wholly upon his well-known character as a plagiarist, who systematically took possession of the monuments of his great predecessors, chiseling out their names and inserting his own in the inscriptions. This, however, was so clumsily done that it is apparent to the eye of even the casual, non-technical beholder, not to speak of the absurdities which at once appear when scholars read the inscriptions into which his name has been inserted without any other change. The original inscriptions of Rameses himself are recognizable at a glance because of the absence of this bungling. He has an inscription at the gateway of Pithom, "I built Pithom at the mouth of the east," i. e., as a frontier fortress. No charge of plagiarism is brought against this inscription. So that his general character as a plagiarist cannot hold against this instance. The only thing that can be said in truth against the identification of Rameses as the builder of Pithom is that he may have been only a rebuildler of a fortress which had been destroyed, and that the Israelites may have built the former fortress under another Pharaoh. This is a possible supposition, but it is pure supposition. The account in the book of Exodus says that Israel built Pithom. Rameses II says, "I built Pithom." Until some actual evidence appears which breaks this synchronism, it must stand, and Naville's work of the identification of Rameses II as the Pharaoh of the Oppression must also stand.

876 PLAGUES OF EGYPT. To this admirable discussion of the plagues later discoveries have added nothing, except so to bring out the facts concerning the natural phenomena of Egypt in the order of the plagues, and exactly corresponding in character to them, as to have made more clear the relation which these miracles bear to natural means and agencies. As every soul of man is given a body, so every supernatural manifestation is given a natural embodiment. Even the Spirit descended "as a dove" and God's presence at Sinai was manifested in brightness. The deity of Jesus was attested with the sound of a "voice" on the mountain. The most devout and unequivocal believers in miracles have viewed the Egyptian plagues as the embodiment of the divine interposition in those various natural hardships and pests and disasters known in that land, existing to the present time, and occurring, when they do occur, in the exact order of the plagues. The miraculous character of the plagues is clearly set forth in the foregoing article (see PLAGUES 3, [1]). To the three miraculous elements there mentioned may be added a fourth: the orderly increasing severity of the plagues with such arrangement as, at one and the same time, vindicated Jehovah's claim to be the Lord of the whole earth and educated the Egyptians concerning the power and wisdom and even the mercy of Jehovah, who, in the last but two of the plagues, the plague of the hail, afforded an opportunity for God-fearing Egyptians to escape.

RAMESES. This name Rameses has much to do with the identification of both the time of the Oppression and the time of the writing of Genesis. No land would be called Rameses until the time of the Rameside kings. If the Oppression had taken place in the eighteenth dynasty under Thothmes III, as claimed by many, why should a city be called Rameses? If the account of the Patriarchs had been written at a late date after the Rameside dynasty and when the name had ceased, among the Egyptians, for a land, or a city, as well as for kings, how was such a philological nicety attended to by the author of that account? Or, if he was such an archaeologist and so careful to name every place by the name by which it was known at the time at which he wrote, or at the time of which he wrote, why did he speak of the "land of Rameses" in the days of Jacob, many centuries before any place was called by such a name in Egypt? The writing of this account in Genesis in the Rameside Period, that is, about the time of the Exodus, is entirely in harmony with the common practice of historians of naming places by the names by which they were known at the time at which the historian lived.

RED SEA. An earlier mention of an expedition to the Red Sea than that noted above from Herodotus, is that found in the inscription of Hatshepsut of the eighteenth dynasty on the temple wall of Deir el-Bahri, where is the account of a wonderful expedition to the land of Punt by way of the Red Sea. Much earlier mention, also, than even this is made in Egyptian inscriptions; that of the expedition of Henu to the land of Punt occurs in the time of Se-ankh-ka-ra of the eleventh dynasty.

RIVER OF EGYPT. See NILE, SUPPLEMENT. 932

SABBATH. The Babylonian "Sabbath" does not now appear to correspond so exactly to the Sabbath of the Bible. See "Discussion of Babylonian Use of the Sabbath" in Clay, Amurru, p. 55; Light on the O. T. from Babel, p. 15. Of the word "sha-bat-tum," Professor Clay says: "This has generally been regarded as being the origin of the Hebrew Sabbath. But it has since been ascertained from a list, which gives the Sumerian and Babylonian days of the month, that shabatti, or shapatti, was the Babylonian name for the fifteenth day of the month. This word does not have anything to do with the Hebrew shabat, "to rest," but is explained as a synonym of the Babylonian gamarru, "to complete."

SACRIFICE. The sacrificial system of the Egyptians, with which Israel must have been in some good measure familiar, is of special interest for comparison with the Mosaic ritual. 950

I. MATERIALS. The Egyptians used the same materials for sacrifice as the Hebrews with some additions, especially using flowers in great profusion. The materials are, in both cases, for the most part, the suitable materials available.

II. METHOD. The method of sacrifice in Egypt differed much from that in the Mosaic ritual. There was no ceremony of substitution, such as the laying on of the hands. The animal was slain for the bloody sacrifice, and thus his blood was shed, but the shedding of blood seems only to have been a necessary incident in the sacrifice, little or no account whatever being taken of the blood. Sacrifices were presented, but not burned. In the case of some of the small sacrifices, such as could be presented on a dish or in an urn held in the hand, there seems to have been some use of fire, either by the incensing of the sacrifice or by laying it upon coals to make a good smell. But the holocaust was unknown among the Egyptians, if we are to judge by the ten thousand sculptured representations of the offerings found on the monuments. Also, the great altars yet remaining in Egypt, from the largest of all, at Abu Gurab of the fifth dynasty, and the great altar of Userten of the twelfth dynasty at Lisht, now in the Museum at Cairo, down to the beautiful and elaborate altar of Hatshepsut at Deir el-Bahri, have never had sacrifices burned upon them. And it certainly was not expected by those who erected them that sacrifices ever would be burned upon them. The great altar of Abu Gurab is of alabaster and the altar of Hatshepsut at Deir el-Bahri is of the delicate white limestone of Egypt: in either case a single fire would have calcined the stone and have ruined the perfection of the altar forever. The altar of Userten from Lisht is of granite, but shows not a trace of fire, such as granite easily takes. Moreover, the top of the altar is carved and the carving is as perfect and beautiful as on the day it came from the hand of the sculptor. The innumerable pictures of altars on the monuments never show any preparation for the burning of the offering. No wood is under the sacrifice, and none is ever seen being brought for the burning. The offerings are heaped upon the altar in perpendicular heaps to a great height. Any attempt to burn them would have resulted in the whole mass slipping off to the floor of the temple as soon as the fat began to melt. The Egyptian sacrifices were not burned. What was done to them is not known. Presumably they were not allowed to be lost. A few of them have been found in the tombs. There is no indication of a sacrificial meal.

III. MEANING. In meaning there was scarcely any resemblance between the Egyptian and Mosaic sacrifice. Most of the Egyptian offerings were provisions, either for the dead or for the gods, and not sacrifices at all in any true sense of that word. In the case of those offerings presented on the altars of the gods, intended in some way to placate or please the gods: (1) as there was no ceremony of substitution, there was nothing to indicate that the offering was instead of the offerer; (2) as no use was made of the blood there was no propitiation by means of it; (3) since the sacrifices were not burned, there was no dedication such as had so prominent a place in the Mosaic ritual; (4) as there was no sacrificial meal, the idea of fellowship seems neglected or entirely wanting.

With Moses in the sacrificial system at Sinai presenting its profound religious symbolism, we are face to face with God in revelation.

SAMARIA. Excavations have been conducted at Samaria by Dr. Reisner, under the auspices of the American Institute of Archaeology, during the years 1908-10. Great Roman remains have been found, and underneath them the foundations of the Palace of Ahab. A large number of potsherds with Hebrew lettering have come to light, but no historical inscriptions or, indeed, inscriptions of any kind. There were simply the marks of the makers of the pots, or the record of the date and the amount of the wine or oil delivered in the pots. Some valuable material in epigraphy has been supplied and in the use of a very few Hebrew words. Beyond this, the Hebrew finds have yielded nothing thus far.

SARDIS. The work of exploration at Sardis 974 has revealed many indications of a splendid city, some inscriptions supplying valuable linguistic material, some information concerning ancient laws, and also some inscriptions in the Lydian tongue. These are not yet understood, but it is hoped that these Lydian inscriptions will enable scholars to recover the lost Lydian tongue.

SERPENT. Serpent worship is probably indicated among the Canaanites by the discovery at Gezer of a bronze serpent now in the museum at Constantinople, though this may have been only a votive offering (Macalister, Bible Side Lights from Gezer, p. 76).

SHEBA. See CANDACE, SUPPLEMENT.

SHIHOR. Joshua (13:3) speaks of the "Shihor which is before Egypt," a stream which commentators have thought to be "the brook of Egypt," the desert stream which separated Egypt from Palestine, now called Wady el-Arish. Again Jeremiah (2:18) says, "What hast thou to do in the way to Egypt, to drink the waters of the Shihor? (Sihor)." The commentators have thought Shihor in this case to be a name for the Nile. Both interpretations cannot be right. Whatever the name Shihor means, at least it was not a movable river. It must be the same stream in both these passages. In fact, as now appears, neither of these former interpretations was strictly correct. In the northeasternmost province of ancient Egypt, Khentab ("Fronting on the East") was a canal, a fresh-water stream drawn off from the Nile, called in the Egyptian language "Shi-t Hor," i. e., the Horus Canal ("t" is a feminine ending). There have been many changes in the branches and canals from the Nile in the Delta, and this one with many others has been lost altogether; but there is a tradition among the Bedouin of Wady el-Arish to this day that once a branch of the Nile came over to that point. This Shihor "Stream of Horus" makes perfectly clear and harmonious the different references of Scripture to Shihor. It was "before Egypt," as Joshua describes it, and it was the first sweet water of Egypt which the traveler from Palestine in those days was able to obtain, as the words of Jeremiah indicate. "To drink the waters of the Sihor" meant to reach this supply of the fresh water of the Nile at the border of the desert (Sunday School Times, April 19, 1913).

1025 SHISHAK. The reading of the name read "King of Judah" by Champollion was long ago given up by the Egyptologists. Another name in the same inscription has been the subject of some discussion recently. It has been translated by some persons as the "field of Abram" and pointed out as the first actual mention of the name Abraham, as used in Palestine. It would be of great interest to all to have such a mention of Abraham in the time of Shishak or at any other time. But this reading is barely a possibility. It is rejected by nearly all Egyptologists (Journal of the American Oriental Society, 1910-11).

1035 SINAI. Comp. Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus; Petrie, Researches in Sinai; Hoskins, From the Nile to Nebo.

1067 TAANACH. This ancient Canaanite High Place was explored by Sellin. It revealed a civilization very similar to that found in the other Canaanite city Gezer, with the exception that the earliest work on the walls and cisterns at Taanach was the best, and, indeed, of a very superior character. The High Place showed the same arrangement of upright stones found at Gezer. The most interesting and unique object discovered was an altar, probably an incense altar. It is about three feet high, made of rude pottery, ornamented by grotesque, symbolical figures moulded in the clay on either side. There is a hollow place in the top of the altar into which, apparently, a fire pan was fitted. This altar is very far from being an artistic object, either having belonged to a primitive civilization and religious culture or having been a very crude representation of the civilization from which it comes, probably the latter, as some other good pottery was found in the ruins. Whether this altar represents the worship of Canaanites or some later lapse of Israelite people into Canaanite worship it is impossible to say. In either case it represents Canaanite worship (Sellin, Tel Taanek).

1068 TABERNACLE OF ISRAEL. 4. Structure. The discovery of the triple standard for the cubit in use among the Hebrews (See METROLOGY, SUPPLEMENT), the cubit of 10.8 inches for art work of decorations, of 14.4 inches for architectural work and 18 inches for land measure (Caldecott, The Tabernacle, Solomon's Temple, The Second Temple) affects the description of the tabernacle very much. While the general form and character of the structure remains the same, many small details are found to be different, and especially all the difficulties requiring special devices and suppositions in order to be constructed according to the specifications in the account in the Book of Exodus, entirely disappear. Concerning the plan of the Tabernacle, in addition to the most excellent description given in the article above, it should be noted that the plan is Egyptian.

Stone Altar Found at Taanach.

God said to Moses, "See thou make all things according to the pattern shown thee in the mount." The plan shown him can be known only by the structure which he erected. The command of God to follow the plan indicated nothing as to its character, whether old or new. It was the simple, universal plan of the Egyptian house, the Egyptian great house or palace, the Egyptian temple or house of the gods, and the Egyptian tomb, the house of the dead (Bible Student, Jan., 1902, pp. 29-33). See BEZALEEL, SUPPLEMENT.

TEMPLE. The description of the structure 1086 of the temple, like that of the tabernacle (see TABERNACLE, SUPPLEMENT) is very much altered by the discovery of the triple standard for the cubit in use among the Hebrews, 10.8 inches for art work and decoration, 14.4 inches for architectural work, and 18 inches for land measure (see METROLOGY, SUPPLEMENT). The general form of the Temple of Solomon is found to be very different from that in all published plans of that building. The same is true in a still greater degree of the Temple of Zerubbabel. And the Temple of Ezekiel, which is thought impossible to be built, and indeed never intended for actual construction, is none other than the Temple of Zerubbabel, with perhaps some modifications made necessary by the limited means at command (Caldecott, Tabernacle, The Temple of Solomon, The Second Temple).

1116 TONGUES, CONFUSION OF. See DIS-PERSION, SUPPLEMENT.

1127 TRYPHENA AND TRYPHOSA. In the columbarium of Caesar's household discovered in Rome inside the Porta San Sebastiano are two niches inscribed Tryphena and Tryphosa. These are thought to be very probably the resting places of the funeral urns containing the ashes of Paul's friends of these names at Rome.

1175 WILDERNESS OF WANDERING. Hoskins, From Nile to Nebo, gives in a helpful way the most recent re-examination of the route of Israel through the Wilderness of the Wandering.

WORD (Heb. דָּבָר, daw-baw'r; Gr. λόγος, log'-os, something said; pīma, hray'-mah, utterance). As early as the second century the terms sermo (sermon) and verbum (word) were rival translations of the Greek λόγος (logos). The Latin versions of the Scriptures all adopted verbum and from it came "The Word." Logos means not only the spoken word but thought expressed by the word. It is the spoken word as expressive of thought and is applied to God's revelation to man. See REVELATION, SCRIPTURE.

In the LXX both Greek words are used as translations of the Hebrew דָּבָר. In the familiar phrase "the word of the Lord came," word is rendered by logos (2 Sam. 24:11; 1 Kings 6:11, 12, 22, etc., etc.) and by hray'-mah (1 Sam. 15:10; 2 Sam. 7:4; 1 Kings 17:8; 19:9, etc.), but in the prophetic books (Jer. 1:1 excepted) logos is invariably used to denote the message which God revealed to the prophet, that he might declare it to the people of His name.

Very early in the church ὁ λόγος was used to designate the special revelation of grace given in and by Jesus Christ (Luke 1:2; Acts 4:4, etc.). Jesus so described his message (Matt. 13:20; Mark 4:14), and Mark thus summarizes the teaching of Jesus (Mark 2:2). The Apostles characterize their own distinctive duty as a steadfast continuance in the ministry of the word (Acts 6:4). It is declared to be the exclusive subject and substance of the early missionaries (Acts 8:4, 17, etc.). It is found in the earliest and latest of Paul's epistles (1 Thess. 1:3; 2 Tim. 4:2).

The Word is the principal means by which revelation is introduced and communicated. The kingdom of heaven grows from a germ or seed, which seed is the Word of God (Matt. 13:3, 19, 24, 37; 1 Peter 1:23). To this Word of Christ is ascribed the power to purify, enlighten, and to make free through the knowledge of its truth (John 14:23; 15:7, 10).

The word logos as applied to Jesus (John 1:1) is a remarkable expression; all the more because the apostle assumes that his readers will at once understand it. It had its origin in the Targums, or paraphrases of the Hebrew Scriptures. The personification of the Word of God appears in the Psalms (33:6; 107:20; 119:89; 147:15), and in Proverbs (8 and 9) the wisdom of God is strikingly personified. In the apocrypha the personification is still more complete; while in the Targums the development is carried still further. Where Scripture speaks of a direct communication from God to man, the Targums substituted the Memra or "Word of God." Philo's conception of the Logos is not fixed or clear, but generally means some intermediate agency, by means of which God created material things and communicated with them. The Logos of St. John is not a mere attribute of God, but the Son of God, existing from all eternity, and manifested in time in the person of Jesus Christ. "Human thought had been searching in vain for some means of connecting the finite with the Infinite, of making God intelligible to man and leading man up to God. St. John knew that he possessed the key to this enigma. He therefore took the phrase which human reason had lighted on in its gropings, stripped it of its misleading associations, fixed it by identifying it with Christ, and filled it with that fulness of meaning which he himself derived from Christ's own teaching" (Plummer, Cambridge Bible).

WRITING. A most comprehensive and logical discussion of this subject is found in Professor Zerbe's The Antiquity of Hebrew Writing and Literature. On the Egyptian origin of the Phœnician alphabet, additional evidence is adduced by M. G. Kyle in Recuril de travaux. The latest contribution on the subject is an elaborate gathering of pottery marks, showing in a very startling way that, however historically the alphabet may have been put together in its final form by the Phœnicians, the various signs have been in use in very widely different places from early time as arbitrary signs employed for convenience (Petrie, The Formation of the Alphabet, 1912).

ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH. See JOSEPH, 1187 SUPPLEMENT.

ZOAN. It only needs to be added that the 1197 ruins of Zoan were carefully examined by Professor Petrie in 1887-88. He found works of the kings of Egypt from the early times of the old kingdom, from the middle kingdom, from the Hyksos kings and from the later great Pharaohs on down to Ptolemaic times. The ruins are hopelessly imbedded in the swamps, owing to the rising of the ground from the sediment of the inundation.

ZOAR. In the account of the separation of 1198 Abraham and Lot at Bethel (after they came up out of Egypt), the writer in Genesis describes the attractive region which took Lot's avaricious eye as "like the garden of God, like the land of Egypt as thou goest unto Zoar." The only Zoar which commentators and critics have known is the "little one" to which Lot was permitted to flee from Sodom. Manifestly this reference could not be to that Zoar. Translators and commentators and critics have tried all sorts of corrections and suppositions and transpositions to make sense of this passage. Now on some branch of the sweet water of the Nile, probably on Shi-hor, stood an ancient frontier fortress (Egyptian, khetam), called in the Egyptian language Tsoar, of which the Hebrew for "Zoar" is a good equivalent, and of which "Zoar" is the nearest equivalent in our Roman letters. This fortress, Zoar, was then on the edge of the desert as one came up out of Egypt, and limited on that side all the richness and verdure of Egypt, beyond which lay barren sands. This Zoar on the desert edge of Egypt makes the passage relating to Lot's choice perfectly clear. A man, as Moses, writing in Egypt or in the desert to a people just come out of Egypt, would, with perfect naturalness, use the words "like the land of Egypt as thou goest unto Zoar." But a writer in Palestine five or six hundred years later than the time when Israel came out of Egypt could not use such language at all. It would have been more puzzling to the Israelites than it has ever been to the commentators and the critics. As Professor Naville says, "What conception can men living in Judea, in a mountainous and dry country, watered chiefly by rain, have of an irrigated land owing its fertility to a large river and its inundations?" "It is one of the Mosaic touches, of which we find many in Genesis" (Sunday School Times, April 19, 1913).

ABANDON (Gr. ἐκβάλασιν, ex-bal'-a-sin, Luke 6:22). Rhe., "Blessed shall ye be when men shall hate you, and abandon your name as evil for the Son of man's sake." R. C. T. says that the word comes down from "banu" or "banus," as a proclamation, then becoming more severe, to denounce, from "abandonare," which expression is the point of contact between the past and present, since what we denounce we are expected to "abandon."

ABIDE (Gr. μένω, men'-o, Acts 20:23), to stay in a state of expectancy. O. E. abidan, to wait for. "The active sense of looking out for a thing was much more strongly felt in the word abide than it is now." Wyclif, 2 Pet. 3:12, "abiding and highling unto the coming of the day of our Lord." Tyn., Heb. 12:2, "abode the crosse." Abide denotes shortest stay, sojourn is marked by longer continuance, while dwell comprehends the idea of perpetuity in a place. Abide and sojourn relate more properly to the wandering habits of men in the primitive state of society. Abide, from the Persian or Arabic lat or bit, "to pass the night." Sojourn, Fr. séjourner, from sub and diurnus, "in the daytime," 'to pass the day.'—Halliwell, Dict. of Archaic and Provincial Words.

ABJECTS (Heb. נַכְחִים, nay-keh', Psa. 35:15), smiters, i. e. traducers, worthless, contemptible people. This is now used only as an adjective, but formerly as a substantive as well as a verb. R. V., has it "smiters." George Herbert says, "Servants and abjects flout me."

ABUSE (Gr. καταχράσθαι, kat-akh-rah'-om-ahce, 1 Cor. 7:31; 9:18), to use badly, to overuse; employed concerning the abuse of power. R. V., "using it to the full."

ACCESS (Gr. προσαγωγή, pros-ag-ogue-ay', Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:18). Lat. accessus, increase (Isa., ch. 18, cap.). Bacon makes use of the word in Advancement of Learning: "Besides, infinite is the access of territory and empire by the same enterprise."

ADDICT (Gr. τάσσω, tas'-so), to arrange in an orderly way, to appoint (1 Cor. 16:15). The word addict is now used in a bad sense, as given to a bad habit, but it had no such sense formerly.

ADMIRATION (Gr. θαύμα, thaw'-mah, Rev. 17:6), wonder, astonishment, whether accompanied with approval or disapproval. R. V., "with great wonder."

ADVISE (Heb. יָוַד, yaw-dah', 2 Sam. 24:13), to take counsel; (R. V. רָאָה, raw-aw', 1 Chron. 21:12), to "consider." "Now therefore advise thee what worde I shall bring againe to him that sent me."—Geneva.

AFFECT (Gr. ζηλώω, dzay-ló'-o), to desire, to have warmth of feeling for or against, to covet. Gal. 4:17, R. V., "They zealously seek you in no good way; . . . that ye may seek them."* This was formerly a very common use of the word.

AFTER (Gr. κατά, kat-ah', Rom. 8:1), according to. Matt. 16:27, Wyclif, "And thanne he schal yelde to every man aftir his workis."

AGAIN (Heb. שׁוּב, shoob, Judg. 3:19, to turn back, Gr. ἀπαγγέλλω, ap-ang-el-lo, Matt. 11:4), in the sense of to carry back word, without any idea of repetition. O. E. engegen.

AGAINST (Chald. נֶגְדָא, neh'-ghed, Num. 25:4), against or in full view of the sun. R. V., "before."

(Heb. אֵד, ad, Gen. 43:25), in the sense of time. And "they made readye the present ageynst Joseph came at noon."—Coverdale.

ALARM (Heb. רוּחַ, roo-ah'), figurative to split the ears by noise, a battle cry, a call to arms (2 Chron. 13:12). Wright says this phrase without the article goes back to the origin of the word "alarm" as an interjection (Ital. all' arme, to arms), before it became a substantive.

ALL (Judg. 9:53, "all to brake"), to break all to pieces. The R. V. changes to read, "And a certain woman cast an upper millstone upon Abimelech's head, and brake his skull."

(Gr. πᾶς, pas, any, Heb. 7:7). R. V. changes to "without any dispute."

ALLEGE (Gr. παρίθηναι, par-at-ith'-ay-mee, Acts 17:3), to place alongside of, to adduce proofs. A law term, not as now simply to assert, but it includes the idea of argument strongly put.

ALLOW (Gr. συνευδοκέω, soon-yoo-dok-eh'-o, Luke 11:48), to approve, to think well of. R. V., "consent." The word had once a sense of praise or approval, which now may be said to have departed altogether.—R. C. T.

In Rom. 7:15, γινώσκω, ghin-ocel'-ko; in the sense of understand, viz., "I do not understand what I am doing." R. V., "know."

AMBASSAGE (Gr. πρεσβεία, pres-bi'-ah, Luke 14:32), an embassy, persons sent on a mission, and refers also to the mission itself.

AMERCE (Heb. אָנַשׁ, aw-nash', Deut. 22:19), to inflict a penalty.

ANCIENT (Heb. זָקֵן, zaw-kane', Psa. 119:100; Jer. 19:1), an old man, an elder, as indicating dignity. R. V., "I understand more than the aged," also, "take of the elder of the people."

AND IF (Matt. 24:48), a redundant expression. Horne Tooke derives "and" from the A. S. unnan, and "if" from gifan, both signifying "to give." . . . Wright says that the usage of "gif" in Old English, and of "gin" in Scotch, seems to support Horne Tooke's etymology.

ANGLE (Heb. חָקַךְ, khak-kaw', Isa. 19:8), a hook, connected with the idea of piercing or adhering. O. E. angul.

ANON (Gr. εἰθέως, yoo-theht'-oce, Matt. 13:20; Mark 13:30), at once, immediately. R. V., "straightway." The Rheims version has it "and 'incontinent' receiveth with joy." Incontinent, meaning instantly, is obsolete.

ANYTHING (Gr. τις, tis), at all, in any way (Acts 25:8). R. V. has it "nor against Cæsar have I sinned at all."

APACE (Heb. הָרַץ, haw-lak', 2 Sam. 18:25; Psa. 68:12), a pace, at a great pace, swiftly, a fleeing, escape.

APPLE (Heb. אֵישׁוֹן, ee-shone', diminutive of אֵישׁ, ee-sh, Deut. 32:10; Psa. 17:8), the little man of the eye. Vulg., pupilla oculi.

APPROVE (Gr. ἀποδείκνυμι, ap-od-ikel'-noo-mee, Acts 2:22), to demonstrate or accredit. (Gr. συνιστημι, soon-ist'-tay-mee, 2 Cor. 6:4), to commend. Shakespeare, "and approve it with a text."

ARMHOLE (Heb. אֶצְעָל, ats-tseel', Jer. 38:12; Ezek. 13:18, to separate, select, refuse, meanings from the primitive root אָצַל, aw-tsal'; hence the joint of the hand, i. e., knuckle), armpit. "Put these ragges and cloutes under thine arme holes."—Coverdale.

ARTILLERY (Heb. כֶּלִי, kel-ee', 1 Sam. 20:40), any armor, weapon. R. V., "weapons." "In earlier use any engines for the projecting of missiles, even to the bow and arrow, would have been included under this term."—R. C. T. The word artillery was used long before the invention of gunpowder to denote missiles, weapons in general

ASSWAGE (Heb. חָשַׁק, khaw-sak', Job 16:5, 6), to restrain, hinder, or hold back.

(Heb. חָשַׁק, shaw-kak', Gen. 8:1), to abate, to make cease. The word here is used intransitively.

ASTONIED (Heb. שָׁמַמ, shaw-mame', Job 17:8; Jer. 14:9), to stun, to stupefy, amaze, usually in a passive sense (Mark 5:42). Tyn., 1534, has it "They were astonied at it out of measure." The word "to astonish" has now loosened itself altogether from its etymology, attonare and attonitus, thunderstruck.

AT ONE (Acts 7:26). The passage has the signification of a nailing or fastening together in a condition of peace, hence the "at one" or "at peace." Fuller, in Pisgah-Sight of Palestine, says, "His first essay succeeded so well, Moses would adventure on a second design, to atone two Israelites at variance."

ATTENT (Heb. קָשַׁב, kash-shoo'b', 2 Chron. 6:40), harkening, attent (-ive). Lat. attentus.

AVOID (Heb. סָבַב, saw-bab', 1 Sam. 18:11), to depart, to remove, to (fetch a) compass, to escape; the Old French esvuidier, to e. . . ply out. Shakespeare, "Well done, avoid no more."

AVOUCH (Heb. אָמַר, aw-mar', Deut. 26:17, 18; Luke, ch. 20, cap.; Acts, ch. 4, cap.), to answer, to challenge, to certify. Mr. Wedgwood says that the word "avouch" came to the meaning of performing the part of an avouchee, or person called to defend his right, when impugned, under the feudal system, when the right of a tenant being impugned, he called upon his lord to come forward and defend his right. This act was called in the Latin of the time advocare (Dict. of Eng. Etym., s. v.).

AWAY WITH (Heb. יָרַב, yaw-kole', Isa. 1:13), to endure, to suffer, to overcome. "I maye not awaye with youre new-moones."—Coverdale.

AWORK (Heb. עָבַד, aw-bad', 2 Chron. 2:18), to work, to labor. Wright says this is a compound formed like ado, abroach, asleep, the prefix being the abbreviated preposition "on."

BAKEMEATS (Heb. אָפֵה, aw-faw', to bake, Gen. 40:17). The marg. has "meat of Pharaoh, the work of a baker, or, cook." Shakespeare, "The funeral baked meats did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables."

BANK (Heb. סֹרֶלֶב, so-tel-aw', 2 Sam. 20:15), a military mound, or a rampart of besiegers.

BANQUET (Heb. מִשְׁתֵּה, mesh-teh', Esth. 7:1), drink, drinking. The Hebrew here is literally "to drink;" and the banquet formerly applied to the drinking, not to feasting in general, but rather the dessert after dinner. Shakespeare, "Bring in the banquet quickly; wine enough Cleopatra's health to drink."

BANQUETING (Gr. πότος, pot'-os, from πινω, peel-no, to imbibe, to drink, 1 Pet. 4:3), an indulgence in drinking. Literally, "drinkings."

BARBARIAN (Gr. βάρβαρος, bar-bar-os', 1 Cor. 14:11), a foreigner, one speaking a foreign tongue. Of uncertain derivation.

BEAST (Gr. ζῷον, zōo-on, neuter of a derivation of ζῷον, zōōn-o), a live thing, living creature (Rev. 4:6). In Dan., ch. 7, cap., the original words (Heb. נִיָּוִי, khay-yaw', from נִיָּוִי, khah-yaw') mean "living creature" of any kind, not "beast" in the modern sense. In 1 Cor. 2:14 the A. V. has it "natural man," but in Wyclif, 1380, the passage reads, "A beestli man perseyueth not the things that ben of the spirit of God; for it is foli to hym." Also in 1 Cor. 15:44, in Wyclif, "It is sowun a beestli bodi, it schal rise a spiritual bodi. If ther is a beestli bodi, there is also a spiritual bodi."

BECAUSE (Gr. ἵνα, hin'-ah, Matt. 20:31), to the end that, in order that (denoting the purpose or the result), so as. Wright says, "The etymology of the word 'by cause,' as spelt in Pol. Vergil, 'ble cause' (Lat. causa), evidently shows that the word may as properly be applied to mark the intention of an action as the reason for it."

BESOM (Heb. מַטְאֵי, mat-at-ay', apparently a denominative from טֵט, teet), suggesting something sticky, dirt to be swept away, or removed with a broom. "I will sweep them out with the besome of destruction."—Coverdale. In 1 Kings 7:40 the Geneva version has it, "And Hiram made caldrons, and besomes, and basens." Wright says, "In Devonshire the name 'bisam,' or 'bassam,' is given to the heath plant, because used for making besoms, as, conversely, a besom is called a broom, from being made of broom twigs." The word is still common as a provincialism.

BESTEAD (Isa. 8:21, situated; A. S. stede, a place, stead as in steady, homestead). It means a place of difficulty, as in Froissart, "They that were lefte behynde were hardly bestadde."

BESTOW (Heb. בָּטַח, yaw-nakh', 2 Chron. 9:25), to deposit; by implication, to allow to stay, to place, put, set down.

(Gr. συνάγω, soon-ag'-o, from συν, soon, and ἄγω, ag'-o), to lead together, to gather, to bestow (Luke 12:17, 18). The word "synagogue" is the place of meeting. Wright says the word is from the A. S. stow, "a place," and it still exists in the names of towns, as Stowe, Stowmarket. Hence, "bestow" signifies to stow away, or dispose of.

(Gr. ψωμιζῶ, psō-mid'-zo, 1 Cor. 13:3, from the base ψωμίον, psō-meē-on), a crumb, morsel, a mouthful. In the sense of giving food, alms, or money.

BEWRAY (Heb. גָּלַע, gaw-law', Isa. 16:3), primarily to denude; as, for instance, captives were disgraced by being stripped, uncovered, hence, revealed (Matt. 26:73, δῆλος, day'-los, clear, manifest). A. S. wreġan or wreian, to accuse, connected with Goth. wrothjan and Ger. rugen, to accuse; hence, to discover or point out.

BLOW UP (Heb. תָּפַח, taw-kah'), to clang, to blow on a wind instrument. Psa. 81:3, "Blowe up the trompettes in the new Moone."—Coverdale. Comp. Shakespeare, "King John," v. 2.

BODY OF HEAVEN (Heb. עֲצָמַי, eh'-tsem, Exod. 24:10), from root signifying strong, the bone; hence, the body, substance, strength, the self-same, the very thing or substance. It is here a Hebraism for "the heaven itself, the very heaven."

BOLLED (Heb. בָּלַעַל, ghib-ole', blossom, Exod. 9:31), made convex, like a cup or the calyx of a flower. The R. V. has it in marg. "was in bloom." The word is still in use in Ireland in the sense in which it is found in the A. V.

BONNET (Heb. מִגְבָּעוֹת, mig-baw-aw', Exod. 28:40; Isa. 3:20); the R. V. has "headtire;" Vulg., tiara; LXX. has κιάρις, signifying a Persian head-dress, or one differing from the common tiara in having a peak. Wedgwood claims for it a Scandinavian origin. A headdress of women, except in Scotland, where men also use the name.

BOOK (Heb. סֵפֶר, say'-fer), any formal writing. Job 31:35, R. V., has "indictment"—"And that I had the indictment which mine adversary hath written!"

BOTCH (Heb. שָׁחַח, shekh-eev', Deut. 28:27, 35), from unused root meaning to burn, inflammation; hence, boil, ulcer. See DISEASES.

BOTTOM (Heb. מַטְאֵי, mets-ool-law', Zech. 1:8), to be dark, shadowing, and this from primitive root מָטַל, tsaw-lal', meaning to tumble down, i. e., to sink or settle by a waving motion; hence, the idea of a shady valley or low place.

BOWELS (Gr. σπλάγχνον, splanekh'-non, from σπλίν, splane, the intestine), figuratively sympathy, pity, tender mercy. 1 John 3:17, "He that . . . shall see his brother have neede and shal shut his bowels from him."—Rhe.

BRAVERY (Heb. תִּפְעָלִים, tif-eh'-reth, Isa. 3:18), beauty, comeliness, finery, not synonymous with courage, but descriptive of personal adornment. Shakespeare, "with scarfs and fans and double change of bravery."

BREACHES (Heb. נִפְרָצִים, mif-rawts', from פָּרַץ, paw-rats', Judg. 5:17), primitive root to break out, to burst out; hence, a break or breach in a coast, a bay (Vulg., portus); R. V., "creeks."

BREAK UP (Gr. διορίσω, dee-or-ooś-so, Matt. 24:43; Mark 2:4, ἐξορίσω, ex-or-ooś-so), to break open, as a door or a house. The A. V. has in the marg. of Ezek. 18:10, "the breaker up of an house."

BRIGANDINE (Heb. שִׁירְיוֹן, sir-yone', Jer. 46:4; R. V., "coats of mail"), armor for a brigand.

BRUIT (Heb. שִׁמְעוֹת, shem-oo'-aw, passive participle of שָׁמַע, shaw-mame', primitive root, to stun, to stupefy, Jer. 10:22), in passive sense, to make amazed.

(Heb. שַׁיְמָה, shay'-mah, Nah. 3:19), something heard, a sound, rumor.

BUCKLER (Heb. כִּשְׂמֹרֶת, so-khuy-raw', Psa. 91:4), a shield, something surrounding a person; Fr. bouclier, a shield with a knob; Lat. bucula, a boss of a shield. The thing has gone out of use and the word also.

BY (1 Cor. 4:4) means in respect to or concerning. R. V. has it "agalust"—"nothing against myself." The word was also used in the sense of during the time, by the space of (see Acts 7:42; 13:21; 19:10; 20:31; Rev. 14:20).

BY AND BY (Gr. ἐξαιτίας, ex-aw-tace', Mark 6:25), at once. "Give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptist;" R. V., "forthwith." (Gr. εὐθείας, yoo-thus', Matt. 13:21; R. V., "straightway").

CABIN (Heb. כְּבֹד, khaw-nooth', from כָּבֵד, khaw-naw', Jer. 37:16), to incline, and by implication to decline, as in a sunset; hence, the time to pitch the tent, or encamp, and thence to the signification of a cell, vault, or prison. A. V. in marg. has "cells," as also the R. V. in the text. The word is of Celtic origin.

CANKERED (Gr. κατιόω, kat-ee-ol-o, James 5:3), canker, or that is rusted down, corroded. Latimer in his sermon speaks of "a new canker to rust and corrupt the old truth," and Shakespeare, "Henry IV," has "the canker'd heaps of strange-achievèd gold."

CAPTIVATE, used only in a figurative sense now, but in the cap. of 1 Sam. 14, 2 Kings 17, 2 Chron. 28, and Jer. 39 it has the old meaning of taking captive or prisoner. Shakespeare, "Henry VI," "upon their woes whom fortune captivates."

CAREFUL (Heb. כָּשָׁה, khaw-shakh', Dan. 3:16), used in the old sense of necessity, needful, as we say we do not think it needful, or do not care to answer. Chaucer and Milton use it in the literal sense, as "full of care, anxious" (comp. Jer. 17:8; Luke 10:41; Phil. 4:6).

CARRIAGE (Heb. כֶּלִי, kel-ee', 1 Sam. 17:22). The R. V. has "baggage." It includes dress, implements, weapons, vessel, ware.

(Heb. כְּבוֹדָה, keb-ood-daw', Judg. 18:21), wealth, mightiness, magnificence, from a root signifying something burdensome. In this passage it means the valuables, and not the heavy baggage.

(Heb. נְשִׂאוֹהָ, nes-oo-aw', Isa. 46:1), something borne, a load.

(Gr. ἀποσκευάζω, ap-ask-yoo-ad'-zo, Acts 21:15), to pack up baggage. R. C. T. says once it meant the thing carried, now it means the thing which carries, the vehicle which carries. "Spartacus charged his lieutenants that led the army, gave them battle, overthrew them, and took all their carriage" (see Plutarch's Lives). Cranmer, 1539, has it, "We toke vp oure burthens and went vp to Jerusalem." The Geneva version, 1557, has it, "After those dayes we trussed vp our fardels and went vp to Jerusalem."

CASTAWAY (Gr. ἀδόκιμος, ad-ok'-ee-mos, 1 Cor. 9:27), unapproved, rejected, castaway. Tyndale, 1534, Cranmer, 1539, and Geneva, 1557, all employ the term, at 2 Cor. 13:5, "except ye be cast-awayes."

CATHOLIC (Gr. καθολικός, kath-ol-ee-kos'), general, universal (1 John, ch. 4, cap.).

CAUL (Heb. שֵׁבִיב, shaw-beece', Isa. 3:18, from an unused root meaning to interweave), a netting for the hair. R. V. marg., "networks." See DRESS.

CERTIFY (Gr. γνωρίζω, gno-rid'-zo, Gal. 1:11), to make known, to certify, to give to understand.

CHALLENGE (Heb. אַמַּרְתִּי, aw-mar', Exod. 22:9), to claim as one's own, to demand. R. V. has it "Wherefore one saith, this is it."

CHANCE (Heb. מִקְרָה, mik-reh', something met with by chance; from קָרָה, kaw-raw', to light upon or bring about chiefly by chance, Deut. 23:10). Lat. cadere, to fall; hence, to happen. Accident, from Lat. accidere, in the same way. (Gr. τυγχάνω, toong-khan'-o), intransitive, to happen as if meeting with (1 Cor. 15:37).

CHANGEABLE (Heb. מַחֲלֵפֵי, makh-al-aw-tsaw', Isa. 3:22), a changeable suit of apparel. R. V. has it "the festival robes." Coverdale has "holy day clothes;" Geneva version, "costly apparel." In Zech. 3:4 the Hebrew is translated "change of raiment."

CHANELBONE (Job 31:22, marg.), an old term for collar bone (see Hall's Anatomy, 1565, "of the shoulder and the chanel bone"). "Without hole or canal bone."—Chaucer.

CHAPMAN (Heb. תּוֹר, toor, 2 Chron. 9:14), primitive root, to meander about, especially in search of trade; a merchantman; we would call him a bagman or runner. A. S. chapman; from same root are derived "cheap" and "chaffer."

CHAPT (Heb. כָּתַת, khaw-thath', Jer. 14:4), to break down, to go down, to cause dismay. "The earth chappeth or goeth a sunder for drought."

CHARGE (Gr. παραγγέλλω, par-ang-gel'-lo, 1 Tim. 5:7), to transmit a message, and by implication to enjoin, to command, as in R. V.

(Gr. βαρῖω, bar-eh'-o), to weigh down, to burden, to charge (1 Tim. 5:16, R. V., "be burdened"). "Let not the congregation be charged."—Tyn.

CHARGER (Heb. קָטַעַה, keh-aw-raw', cut out), a bowl (Num. 7:13-86).

(Gr. πίναξ, pin'-ax, flat), a dish, plate (Matt. 14:8, 11; Mark 6:25, 28; Luke 11:39, "platter").

CHARGES (Gr. δαπανῶ, dap-an-ah'-o, Acts 21:24), in good sense, to incur cost; in a bad sense, to waste, to spend.

CHAWES (Ezek. 29:4; 38:4), the old form for jaws. The antiquated form, "chaw," connects the word with chew or chaw.

CHECK (Heb. מוֹסַרְתִּי, mo-say-raw', Job 20:3), reproof, rebuke. Fr. échec, this from the Persian shah, king; used in the game of chess to call attention to the danger of the king.

"Although I had a check,
To geue the mate is hard!"—Surrey.

CHEEK TEETH (Heb. מַלְאָכֵי הַפִּי, meth-al-leh-aw'), great teeth, molars (Joel 1:6). R. V., "jaw teeth."

CHEER (Gr. θαρσέω, thar-seh'-o, from θάρσος, thar-sos, Matt. 9:2), to have courage, having reference to the face. Fr. chere, the countenance, aspect. "In swoot of thi cheer thou schalt ete thi breed, till thou turne agen in to the erthe of thich thou art takun" (Gen. 3:19).—Wyclif. Cicero urges that the Greek has no equivalent to the Lat. vultus, the countenance, that is, as the ever-varying exponent of the sentiments and passions of the soul. Perhaps it may be charged on the English that it, too, is now without such a word. But "cheer" in its earlier uses, of which certain vestiges still survive, was exactly such.—R. C. T., Gloss. Eng. Words.

CHIDE (Heb. רוּב, roob, Exod. 17:2; Judg. 8:1; Psa. 103:9), primitive root, to grapple, but mostly figurative, to hold controversy, to plead. "We shall downright chide if I longer stay."—Shakespeare.

CHIDING (Heb. רִיב, reeb), complaining, quarrelling (Exod. 17:7).

CHIMNEY (Heb. אֶרְבֵּי, ar-oo-baw', Hos. 13:3), a window, an aperture for smoke. In the Apoc., 2 Esd. 6:4, the word is the translation of the Lat. caminus, a fireplace or oven. Wyclif, in Matt. 13:42, has "Thei schulen sende hem in to the chymney of fler;" and the same in Rev. 1:15, "his feet like to latoun as in a brennyng chymeney."

CHOLER (Heb. מַרְרָה, maw-rar', from מָרַר, maw-rar', Dan. 8:7, to be bitter, figurative to be moved with anger). "And touched with choler, hot as gunpowder."—Shakespeare. The Greek word χολή, chol-ay', literally signifies bile, from which fluid anger was supposed to be produced.

CHURL (Heb. כָּוֵל, kay-lah'ee, from כָּוַל, kool, in sense of providing in a niggardly way, Isa. 32:5, 7). The word both in the English of Shakespeare and in rabbinical interpretation refers to miserliness. The signification is much the same as the Gr. αὐστηρός, au-stay-ros', used in the parable of the talents.

CHURLISH (Heb. קָטָה, kaw-sheh', 1 Sam. 25:3), cruel, hard, stubborn. "The churlish chiding of the winter's wind."—Shakespeare.

CLAVE (Heb. בָּקַע, baw-kah', Gen. 22:3), to rend, to break, or make a breach. Coverdale has "He clove wodd for the brent offerynge."

(Heb. דָּבַק, daw-bak', Gen. 34:3; Ruth 1:14), to cling to, attached to.

CLOSET (Gr. ταμειον, tam-ee-on, Matt. 6:6), a private chamber in the oriental house, spot for retirement (comp. Joel 2:16).

COAST (Gr. ὄριον, hor'-ee-on, Mark 7:31), a boundary line, and by implication a border or coast. Misrendered in A. V. at Josh. 12:23; Judg. 18:2; Jer. 25:32 (see R. V.).

COLLOPS (Heb. קָלֹפֶי, pee-maw', Job 15:27), from a root meaning to be plump. The word is still used in Yorkshire, as applied to bacon; hence, Collops Monday, before Ash Wednesday.

COMFORTLESS (Gr. ορφανός, or-fan-os', John 14:18), parentless, orphans; marg., "orphans;" R. V., "desolate."

COMMUNICATE (Gr. κοινωνία, koy-nohn-ee'-ah, Heb. 13:16), from root meaning partnership, sharer; used intransitively, to participate, Phil. 4:14. "They were to judge whether they had done well or amisse to communicate these dignitararies with the commons."—Holland, Livy.

COMPEL (Heb. פָּרַץ, paw-rats', 1 Sam. 28:23), to press, urge, compel; R. V., to constrain by argument; also 2 Sam. 13:25, 27; 2 Kings 5:23; Luke 14:23, ἀναγκάζω, an-ang-kad'-zo, to compel.

COMPREHEND (Heb. כָּוַל, kool, Isa. 40:12), from primitive root, to keep in, to contain, to hold as in a measure.

CONCLUDE (Gr. συγκλείω, soong-klee'-o, Rom. 11:32; Gal. 3:22), to shut together, or include. "Scriptures hath concluded alle things undir synne."—Tyn. R. V., "shut up all things."

CONCUPISCENCE (Gr. ἐπιθυμία, ep-ee-thoo-meel'-ah, Rom. 7:8; Col. 3:5; 1 Thess. 4:5), a longing (especially for what is forbidden), lust, unlawful desire. Lat. concupiscencia.

CONFUSION (Heb. הִתְחַוָּה, to'-hoo, Isa. 34:11, 41:29), from unused root, to lie waste, desert, without form. It appears to be used in the strong sense of destruction.

(Gr. ἀκαταστασία, ak-at-as-tah-seel'-ah, James 3:16). Instability, disorder, tumult. Wyclif has unsteadfastness; Cranmer has unstableness; Geneva has sedition.

CONSCIENCE (Gr. συνείδησις, soon-ee-diy-sis, Heb. 10:2; 1 Cor. 8:7); Vulg., conscientia, or consciousness. "The reason why the simpler sort are moved with authority is in the conscience of their own ignorance."—Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

CONTAIN (Gr. ἐγκρατεῖομαι, eng-krat-yoo'-om-ah-ee, 1 Cor. 7:9), to exercise self-restraint in diet and chastity.

CONVENIENT (Gr. καθήκω, kath-ay'-ko, to come to, Rom. 1:28), becoming, seemly, fitting—used in this sense in the marriage service.

CONVENT (marg. of Jer. 49:19 and 50:44), to convene, to summon to a tribunal; Lat. conventire. "Tomorrow morning to the council board he be convented."—Shakespeare, "Measure for Measure."

CONVERSANT (Heb. חָוַה, haw-lak', Josh. 8:35; 1 Sam. 25:15), to come continually, follow, wont to haunt. "The stranger that was conversant with thee."—Geneva.

CONVERSATION (Heb. דְּרָכָה, deh'-rek, Psa. 50:23), road, way, custom, manner; R. V., marg., "way." (Gr. τρόπος, trop'-os, Heb. 13:5), deportment, style, mode of life.

(Gr. πολιτεῖα, pol-ee'-you-mah), citizenship (Phil. 3:20); to behave as a citizen (1:27).

CONVINCE (Heb. כִּנְיָה, yaw-kakh'), to be right, justify, maintain (Job 32:12).

(Gr. ἐλέγχο, el-eng'-kho, John 8:46), to convict.

CORN (Gr. κόκκος, kok'-kos, John 12:24), kernel of seed grain.

COUNTERVAIL (Heb. שָׁוָה, shaw-vaw', Esth. 7:4), to equalize, compensate.

COURSE (Gr. μέρος, mer'-os, 1 Cor. 14:27), a section, a share, an allotment.

CREATURE (Gr. κτίσις, ktis'-is, Rom. 8:20), a building, a creation. "The creature is suget to vanity."—Wyclif.

CUNNING (Heb. חָכָם, khaw-shab', Psa. 137:5), skill, ability; primitive root, properly to plait or impentrate, as to fabricate or plot; to devise, conceive. "I believe that all these three Persons in the Trinity are even in power; and in cunning, and in might, full of grace and of all goodness."—Foxe (T. S. G.).

(Heb. דָּאָה, dah'-ath, 1 Kings 7:14), knowledge, skillfulness.

CURIOS (Gr. περίεργος, per-eel'-er-gos, Acts 19:19), in the sense of magic, R. V. marg., "magical;" working all around, curious arts; also used in the sense of "careful." "Give me thy grace, that I may be a curious and prudent spender of my time."—Jeremy Taylor, Holy Living.

CURIOSLY (Heb. רָקַם, raw-kam', Psa. 139:15), to variegate color, embroider. The figurative is of the adjusting the parts of a human body, as the threads and colors are in tapestry.

DANCE (Heb. רָדָה, raw-kad', Eccles. 3:4), to stamp, to spring about for joy, to skip.

(Gr. ὀρχήσασθαι, or-khel'-om-ahes, Matt. 14:6, from ὀρχός, a row or ring), to dance, from the ranklike or regular motion. "The mingling of males and females, which is so common in the modern dance, was unknown to the Jews; indeed, the dancing was usually done by the women alone, as it is still in Egypt."—Schaff. Dr. Clarke says, concerning this passage, "By a literal rendering of the saltavit of the Vulgate in my old manuscript of the English Bible, the whole of this business seems to have been treated with sovereign contempt; for thus says the translator, 'Shoeleped in the myddle.'" The whole modern implication and signification of the dance is so entirely different from the meaning of the word as used both in the Old and New Testaments, that it seems very properly an archaic word. Only the grossest perversity would look to the Scriptures for an approval of the modern dance.

DANGER (Gr. ἐνοχος, en'-okh-os, Matt. 5:22), liable to, subject to.

DARLING (Heb. יָחִיד, yaw-kheed', Psa. 22:20; 35:17), sole, only, solitary, and, by implication, beloved.

DAYSMAN (Heb. כִּנְיָה, yaw-kakh', Job 9:33), primitive root, to set right, to judge, to plead.

DEBATE (Heb. מַטְסָה, mats'-isaw', Isa. 58:4), a quarrel, contention (comp. Rom. 1:29; 2 Cor. 12:20).

DECK (Heb. בָּדַד, yaw-bad', Prov. 7:16), to spread a bed.

DEHOUT (Prov., ch. 7, cap.; 1 Pet., ch. 2), to disuade.

DELICATE (Heb. מְנַגֵּף, aw-nogue', Deut. 28:54; Isa. 47:1; Jer. 6:2), luxurious, effeminate.

DELICATELY (Gr. σπαταλάω, spat-al-ah'-o, 1 Tim. 5:6, marg.) means given up to pleasure, voluptuousness.

DELICATES (Heb. מְנַגֵּף, el-nau', Jer. 51:34), pleasure, delight, choice morsels.

DENOUNCE (Heb. נָגַד, nau-gad', Deut. 30:18), primitive, to front, to stand boldly opposite, certify, bewray. "Tongues of heaven, denouncing vengeance upon John."—Shakespeare.

DEPUTY (Gr. ἀνθίπατος, anth-oo'-pat-os, Acts 13:7). Vulg. and R. V., "proconsul." Superlative of ὑπέρ, hoop'-er, superior to, exceeding.

DESCRY (Heb. לָוַה, loor, Judg. 1:23), to reconnoiter, to seek, spy, in a military sense. "Who hath descried the number of the foe."—Shakespeare.

DESIRE (Heb. חָמַד, khem-daw', "without being desired," is used (2 Chron. 21:20) in the sense of being unregretted. "She shall be pleasant while she lives, and desired when she dies."—Bishop Taylor, Sermon.

DESPITE (Gr. ἐνυβρίζω, en-oo-brid'-zo, Heb. 10:29), to insult, to treat with contempt. "Despitous is he that hath disdayne of his neighbour."—Chaucer.

(Heb. שִׁקָּץ, shek-awt'), contempt, Ezek. 25:6.

DESPITEFUL (Heb. שִׁקָּץ, sheh-awt'), to push aside, Ezek. 25:15.

(Gr. ἐπηρεάζω, ep-ay-reh-ad'-zo), to insult; A. V., "despitefully," Matt. 5:44; Luke 6:26.

(Gr. ὑβρίζω, oo-brid'-zo), to abuse, Acts 14:5; Rom. 1:30.

DEVOTIONS (Gr. σέβασμα, seb'-as-mah), something adored, the object of devotion or worship (Acts 17:23, R. V.). Tyndale has it "the manner how ye worship your Goddes." R. C. T. says "devotions" is now abstract, and means the mental offering of the devout worshiper; once it was concrete, and meant the outward object to which these were rendered, as temples, altars, images, shrines, and the like. The word σέβασμα is found in 2 Thess. 2:4, where it is rendered "all that is called God, or that is worshiped."

DIE THE DEATH (Gr. τελευτάω, tel-yoo-tah'-o, Matt. 15:4), to expire, decease. The sense was that of dying by judicial sentence. Rendered in the Bishop's Bible (Gen. 2:17), "For in what daye so ever thou eatest thereof, thou shalt dye the death."

DILIGENCE (Gr. σπουδάζω, spoo-dad'-zo, 2 Tim. 4:9), to make haste, to be prompt. Found often in the old writers.

Also 2 Pet. 1:10 (Gr. σπουδή, spoo-day'), dispatch, earnestness.

- DILIGENTLY (Gr. ἀκριβῶς, ak-ree-boe's, Matt. 2:7); R. V., "accurately." Bible title-page, edition 1611: "The Holy Bible, with the former translations diligently compared and revised."
- DISALLOW (Heb. נָאָה, noo, Num. 30:5), to forbid, make of none effect.
(Gr. ἀποδοκιμάζω, ap-od-ok-ee-mad'-zo), to disapprove, repudiate, reject. R. V., "reject" (1 Pet. 2:4, 7).
- DISANNUL (Gr. ἀκυρόω, ak-oo-ro'-o, Gal. 3:17, R. V.), to invalidate.
(Gr. ἀθετέω, ath-et-eh'-o, Gal. 3:15; Heb. 7:18), to set aside.
- DISCOMFIT (Heb. הִמַּנְתִּי, haw-mam', Judg. 4:15), to put in commotion. Primarily means to unfasten, then to disintegrate. "Hannibal's army, by such a panick of fear, was discomfited at the walls of Rome."—Burton, Anat. Melon.
- DISCOVER (Heb. הִשָּׁתֵּף, khaw-saf', Psa. 29:9), to strip off, uncover. "The voice of the Lord discovereth the forests, i. e., strippeth off the leaves."
(Heb. גָּלַה, gaw-law', Isa. 22:8; Job 12:22), to reveal, to tell. Esth., ch. 2, cap., Mordecai discovered treason, not that he found it out, but told of it.
- DISHONESTY (Gr. αἰσχύνη, ahee-skhoō'-nay, 2 Cor. 4:2), shame, disgrace. R. V., "shame." "It is a great reproach and dishonesty for the husband to come home without his wife."—More, Utopia.
- DISPOSITION (Gr. διαταγή, dee-at-ag-ay', Acts 7:53), an arrangement, instrumentality. R. V., "received the law as it was ordained by angels;" marg., "as the ordinance of angels."
- DISPUTE (Gr. διαλέγομαι, dee-al-eg'-om-ahee, Acts 19:8), to say thoroughly, to discuss, to reason.
- DIVERT (2 Kings, ch. 16, cap., "Ahaz diverteth the brazen altar to his own devotion"). "This word signifies the turning us away from ourselves, not so much to make us happy, as to make us forget that we are not happy."
- DOCTOR (Gr. διδάσκαλος, dīd-as't-kal-os), master, teacher. R. V., "teacher," Luke 2:46.
(Gr. νομοδιδάσκαλος, nom-od-id-as't-kal-os, Luke 5:17; Acts 5:34), an expounder of Jewish law, rabbi, doctor of laws.
- DOTE (Heb. נָאָה, yaw-al', Jer. 50:36), to be foolish, to lose one's senses through fright. "A sword is upon the boasters, and they shall dote."
(Heb. נָאָה, aw-gab', Ezek. 23:5, sq.), primitive root, to breathe often, to love, to be foolishly fond. "She doted on . . . the Assyrians her neighbors."
- DRAUGHT (Gr. ἀγρα, ag'-rah, Luke 5:9), a catching of fish, a haul.
(Gr. ἀφ' ἑδρών, af-ed-ron', Matt. 15:17), place for sitting apart, house of the sewer.
- DREDGE (Job 24:6, in marg., A. V., "mingled corn, or, dredge"), a word still used in Wiltshire; dredge-malt, or malt made of oats and barley. "Grain sown for beasts' provender."—Pliny.
- DURE (Gr. εἶσι, es-tee', Matt. 13:21), consist, remain. R. V., "endure." "Durling" is a participle of the same verb.
- EAR (Heb. קָרַח, khaw-rash' 1 Sam. 8:12), primitive root, to scratch, to engrave with tools, hence to plow with an instrument.
(Heb. עָבַד, aw-bad', Deut. 21:4; Isa. 30:24), primitive root meaning to work, to till, to dress.
- EARNEST (Gr. ἀρραβών, ar-hrab-ohn', Eph. 1:14), a pledge, part of a price paid in advance as security for the rest. Rhe., 1582, "Which is the pledge of our inheritance, to the redemption of acquisition, unto the praise of his glorie."
- EDIFY (Gr. οἰκοδομῶ, oy-kod-om-eh'-o, Acts 9:31), to construct or be a house-builder. Used by old writers literally in this sense, but now in a spiritual or metaphorical sense. The Greek word is translated literally in Acts 20:32; see also Col. 2:7.
- EFFECT (Heb. דָּבַר, daw-bawr', Ezek. 12:23), meaning "purport."
- ELEMENTS (Gr. στοιχείον, stoy-khi'-on, Gal. 4:3, 9), rudiments, fundamentals.
- ENDAMAGE (Heb. נָזַף, nez-ak', Ezra 4:13), damage, hurt. Some old words have lost the prefix "en," while others retain it; thus, to damage, to treat, but to en-courage and to en-compass.
- ENGINE (Heb. הִשְׁבִּיחַן, khish-shaw-hone', 2 Chron. 26:15), a warlike contrivance or invention, strictly any instrument of commerce or skill.
- ENLARGE (Heb. רָחַב, raw-khab', 2 Sam. 22:37; Psa. 4:1), to broaden, to make room, to set at liberty.
- ENSIGN (Heb. אֹתוֹת, oth, Num. 2:2), signal, sign, standard.
- ENSUE (Gr. δώλω, dee-ō'-ko, 1 Pet. 3:11), to pursue, to persecute. Wyclif has it, "Seke he pees, and parfyll sue it."
- ENTREAT (Gr. ἐπιπράζω, hoo-brid'-zo), to use shamefully (Luke 18:32).
(Gr. κηρύσσειν, khrah'-om-ahee, Acts 27:3), in same sense. Also ἐρωτάω, er-ō-ta'-o (Phil. 4:3; A. V., "intreat"), to beseech, ask, pray. The following has the word in both significations: "I entreated you in my last to burn my letters sent unto you for the argument sake, . . . and if you entreat the postscript in the same manner, you shall not erre a whit."—Secretary Davidson, 1586.
- EQUAL (Heb. שָׁוָה, taw-kan', Ezek. 18:25), primitive root to, balance, to measure out.
(Heb. שָׁוָה, may-shaw'r', Psa. 17:2), from primitive root, שָׁרָה, yaw-shar', to make even.
(Heb. שָׁרָה, yo-she'r', Prov. 17:26), to be straight or even, upright; equal in the sense of equity, righteousness.
- EQUAL TO (Heb. שָׁוָה, shaw-var', Lam. 2:13), primitive root, to level, to compare, to equalize. "Monks equal this to the still small voice of Elijah."—Fuller, Christ. Hist.

- ERR (Heb. אָפּטָוּ, taw-aw', Psa. 95:10), primitive root, to vacillate, to go astray, to be out of the right way.
- ESCHEW (Gr. ἐκκλίνω, ek-klee'-no, 1 Pet. 3:11), to avoid, to go out of the way. "Let him eschue evyll and do good."—Tyn. Job 1:3, primitive root, to turn off, depart, withdraw.
- ESTATE (Heb. כָּנֶה, kane, Dan. 11:7, 20), station, office, place. "We will establish our estate upon our eldest Malcolm."—Shakespeare, "Macbeth."
- EVANGELIST (Gr. εὐαγγελιστής, yoo-ang'-ghel-is-tace', Acts 21:8; 2 Tim. 4:5; Eph. 4:11), to announce good news, i. e., the Gospel; hence, the preacher. In some old writers the word is gospeler. Applied now generally to the writers of the first four books in the New Testament.
- EVIDENCE (Heb. סִפְרָה, sif-raw', Jer. 32:10, etc.), a register, written paper, deed, document.
- EVIL-FAVOREDNESS (Heb. דָּוֶה, daw-bawn'; רָע, rah, Deut. 17:1), bad, evil, ill-looking, deformed.
- EXACTRESS (Isa. 14:4, marg.); Lat. exactor, collector of taxes. The city of Babylon as an exactress of gold. "Expectation, who is so severe an exactress of duties."—B. Jonson.
- EXCEED (Heb. בָּבַר, gaw-bar', Job 36:9), primitive root, to be strong, to act insolently, proud. R. V., "behaved themselves proudly."
- EXCELLENCY (Gr. ὑπέρεχω, hoop-er-ekh'-o, Phil. 3:8), to hold oneself above, figuratively to excel, superiority. Wyclif has it, "Nethelless I gesse alle things to be peirement; for the clere science of Jesus Christ my Lord." A class of Latin words in "ia" are superseded by the termination "y," as arrogancy.
- EXCHANGER (Gr. τραπέζιτης, trap-ed-zee'-tace, from τράπεζα, trap'-ed-zah, Matt. 25:27), a four-legged table or stool, thence the exchanger or money broker who sat at the table or place of exchange. R. V., "bankers."
- EXORCIST (Gr. ἐξορκιστής, ex-or-kis-tace', Acts 19:13), one who binds by an oath (or spell), a conjuror. The original meaning was to adjure, as in Matt. 26:63.
- EXPECT (Gr. ἐκδέχομαι, ek-dekh'-om-ahce, Heb. 10:13), to look for, wait for. "Whilst he expected the tides and return of business, he filled up the empty places of leisure with his studies."—Fuller, Holy War.
- EXPRESS (Gr. χαρακτήρ, khara-ak-tare', Heb. 1:3, from to sharpen to a point, akin to γράφω, graf-o, to grave, scratch, write), exact copy, image, figure; hence, the word character as a figure stamped upon.
- EYESERVICE (Gr. ὄφθαλμοδουλεία, of-that-mod-oo-li'-ah, Eph. 6:6; Col. 3:22), sight labor, that is, that needs watching.
- FAIN (Gr. ἐπιθυμῶ, ep-ee-thoo-meh'-o, from θυμῶ, to breathe hard, to have passion, hence to set the heart upon, desire, Luke 15:16). In Bacon's Essays it occurs in almost the sense of "compelled:" "For the Nobility, though they continued loyal unto him, yet did they not cooperate with him, in his business. So that in effect, he was faine to doe all things himself."
- FAIR (Heb. טָהוֹר, taw'-hore, Zech. 3:5), pure, clean, in a ceremonial, moral, or physical sense.
- FAITHLESS (Gr. ἀπιστος, ap'-is-tos, Matt. 17:17; John 20:27), disbelieving, or without Christian faith—spoken of heathen.
- FAMILIAR SPIRIT (Heb. אֹבֵב, obe, 1 Sam. 28:3-9), an evil spirit, a servant or attendant upon a necromancer. Allusions to such are found frequently in writers of the 16th and 17th centuries.
- FAN (Gr. πτύον, ptoo'-on, Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17), a winnowing fork, as scattering like spittle. (Heb. מִזְרֵה, miz-reh', Isa. 41:16), a winnowing shovel.
- FARE (Heb. שָׂמֵחַ, shaw-lome', 1 Sam. 17:18), welfare, prosperity. (Gr. εὐφράνω, yoo-frah'-ee-no, Luke 16:19), to make glad, to make merry.
- FASHION (Gr. εἶδος, i'-dos, Luke 9:29), appearance. "The facion of his countenance was changed."—Tyn.
- FAT (Heb. קָבַב, yeh'-keb, Joel 2:24; 3:13), elsewhere rendered wine press. A. S. foet, a vessel. In Coleridge, Gloss., it is found as "fet."
- FAVOR (Heb. פָּנֵה, paw-neh', Psa. 119:58), the face simply. But the mind is used in a nicety of signification.
- FEAR (Heb. פָּחַד, pakh'-ad, Gen. 31:42), in the concrete sense of the "cause or object of fear." The active sense of the verb fear, once common, has become obsolete.
- FERVENT (Gr. εκτενής, ek-ten-acc', 2 Pet. 3:10, 12), intense, extreme burning.
- FETCH (Heb. לָקַח, law-kakh', Deut. 19:5), to force away, to drive, to fetch a stroke. (Heb. בָּבַר, saw-bab', 2 Sam. 14:20), to revolve, surround, as to fetch a compass. "Fetch" and "take" are used in similar phrases, as in Shakespeare, "If he took you a box of the ear, you might have your action for slander to."
- FLAGON (Heb. אֶשְׁשָׁוֶה, ash-ee-shaw', 2 Sam. 6:19). The word signifies something pressed closely together. The R. V. renders it "a cake of raisins;" as, Cant. 2:5, "stay ye me with raisins." The Geneva version has it "stay me with flagons."
- FOLDEN (Heb. שָׂבַב, saw-back', primitive root, to fold together, to entwine. R. V. has it "tangled," Nah. 1:10).
- FORERUNNER (Gr. πρόδρομος, prod'-rom-os), a scout, or runner ahead, precursor. Wyclif has it "foregoer," Heb. 6:20.

FORMER (Heb. קָדְמוֹנִי, kad-mo-nee'); as to time it is anterior, and as to place it refers to the "East." R. V. has it "eastern," Zech. 14:8.

FORTH (Gr. ἐκδίδομι, ek-did'-o-mee), out, to let out, to deliver over, Luke 20:9.

FORWARDNESS (Gr. σπουδή, spos-day', from σπειδῆ, spyoos'-day, 2 Cor. 8:8), to speed, and so earnestness, readiness. R. V., "as proving through the earnestness of others."

(Gr. προθυμία, proth-oo-mei'-ah, 2 Cor. 9:2), readiness of mind, i. e., alacrity.

FRAME (Heb. כָּוַן, koon, Judg. 12:6), primitive root, to be erect; figurative, to render sure, to contrive. In the Suffolk dialect to frame means to speak affectedly.

FRANKLY (Gr. χαρίζομαι, khar-id'-zom-ah-ee, Luke 7:42), gratuitously, freely, with the sense of forgiveness. R. V. omits the word altogether. "The pirate soldiers were frankly let go."—Holinshed, Chronicles. "I do beseech your grace . . . now to forgive me frankly."—Shakespeare, "Henry VIII."

FRAY (Heb. קָרַח, khaw-rad', Deut. 28:26; Jer. 7:33), primitive root, to shudder with fear; hence, to make afraid. Chaucer used it in this sense. Still used as a provincialism, though called obsolete in the dictionaries.

FRET (Heb. פָּקַח, pek'-eh'-theth, Lev. 13:55), to wear a hole by corrosion, to eat like moth or mildew.

(Heb. קָוַר, khaw-raw', Ps. 37:1), primitive root, to grow warm, glow, vex, displease in the sense of vying with a rival. O. E. fretan, to devour.

FRONTLETS (Heb. מִצְפֵּי, to-faw-faw', Exod. 13:16), from unused root, meaning to go round, or bind, as a fillet for the forehead; hence, the name given to a piece of parchment upon which are written certain passages of Scripture.

(Gr. φυλακτήριον, foo-lak'-tay'-ree-on, Matt. 23:5, A. V. "phylacteries," neuter of a derivative of φυλάσσω, foo-las'-so, to watch or guard or preserve; hence, the leather case in which were put the passages of Scripture, and which was bound about the forehead.

FULLER (Gr. γναφεύς, gnaf-yuce', Mark 9:3), a cloth dresser; κνύπτω, knup'-to, to tease cloth. John the Baptist is called in the Anglo-Saxon gospels the "fulluhtere."

GAINED (Gr. κερδαίνο, ker-dah'-ee-no, Acts 27:21). Wright says: "The Greek is here literally translated; but the English phrase conveys an erroneous idea, as if it meant to incur danger, whereas it can be proved by numerous examples to mean escape or avoid danger. The Geneva version renders it, 'So should ye haue gayned this hurt and losse,' and adds in a note, 'that is, ye should haue saued the losse by auoyding the danger.'"

GALLANT (Heb. גָּדְלוֹ, ad-deer', Isa. 33:21), large, mighty. "Our royal good and gallant ships."—Shakespeare.

GARNER (Gr. ἀποθήκη, ap-oth'-ay'-kay, from ἀποθήμι, ap-ot-eeh'-ay-mee, Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17), to put away, to lay aside; old form of granary. Lat. granaria, a place for storing grain.

GARNISH (Gr. κοσμέω, kos-meh'-o, Luke 11:25; Matt. 12:44; 23:29), to decorate, adorn, to put in order, to trim, to snuff, as a wick.

GENDER (Heb. בָּרַךְ, aw-bar', Job 21:10), primitive root, to cross over, to carry over, to engender, to beget.

(Gr. γεννάω, ghen-nah'-o, Gal. 4:24; 2 Tim. 2:23), to propagate.

GENERALLY (Heb. כֹּל, kole, 2 Sam. 17:11), in general, together, all, the whole.

GENERATION (Gr. γέννημα, ghen'-nay-mah, Luke 3:7), progeny, offspring, brood. "O generation of vipers."

GHOST (Heb. נָשַׁף, gaw-vah', Gen. 25:8; 49:33), primitive root, to breathe out, to die. Once used in a common way, but now applied to one spirit only, and in a hallowed way. "It liketh hem to be cleue in body and gost."—Chaucer.

GIN (Heb. פָּקַח, pakh, a snare, trap net, especially of a fowler, from פָּקַח, paw-kakh', primitive root, to batter out). It is used five times in A. V. (Job 18:9; Ps. 140:5; 141:9; Isa. 8:14; Amos 3:5). The word "grin" is common in early authors. Sternhold and Hopkins, 1599, "Even as a bird, out of the fouler's grin" (Ps. 124:7).

(Heb. מִשְׁכָּשֵׁת, mo-kashe'), a noose for catching animals, a snare (Ps. 140:5; 141:9).

GLASS (Gr. κατοπτρίζομαι, kat-op-trid'-zom-ah-ee, 2 Cor. 3:18), to show in a mirror.

(Gr. ἑσποτρον, es'-op-tron, 1 Cor. 13:12; James 1:24) a mirror for looking into.

GLISTERING (Gr. ἐξαστράπτω, ex-as-trap'-to), to be radiant (Luke 9:29; compare 1 Chron. 29:2). Superseded by the modern "glisten." "All that glisters is not gold."—Shakespeare.

GO ABOUT (Gr. ζητέω, zay-eh'-o, Rom. 10:3), to seek; R. V., "seeking to establish."

GO BEYOND (Gr. υπερβαίνο, hoop-er-bah'-ee-no), R. V., "transgress," or, "overreach" (1 Thess. 4:8).

GO TO (Heb. הָבָה, yaw-hab'), come on (Gen. 11:3).

(Gr. ἄγε, ag'-he), lead, or come on (James 4:13).

GOD FORBID (Gr. μή, may, Rom. 3:4), a primitive particle of qualified negation distinguished from οὐ, oo, which expresses unqualified denial, and γίνωμαι, ghin'-om-ah-ee, to come to be. This is a frequent expression in Scripture, and is not at all understood as an appeal to the Almighty, either in the Hebrew or Greek or Vulgate.

GOD SPEED (Gr. χαίρω, khai'-ee-ro, 2 John 10, 11), a primary verb, signifying to be cheerful; hence, a salutation with hope and joy.

- GOODMAN (Gr. οἰκοδεσπότης, oig-kod-es-pot'-ace), the master of the house (Matt. 20:11; 24:43; Luke 12:39). Goodman is probably a corruption of the A. S. gummann or guma, a man.
- GOVERNOR (Gr. εὐθύνω, goo-thoo'-no), to straighten or steer. James 3:4, R. V., "steersman" (see Acts 27:11). In Gal. 4:2 used in the sense of a guardian. See its use in Plutarch, North's translation: "The others called him (Leonidas) Alexander's gouverneur."
- GRACIOUS (Heb. חָנֵן, khane), kindness, favor (Prov. 11:16; Jer. 22:23). Once used in a passive sense as comely and of fair proportions. "In voices well divulged, free, learn'd, and vallant; and in dimension and the shape of nature, a gracious person."—Shakespeare.
- GRAFF (Gr. ἐγκεντριζω, eng-ken-trid'-zo), to prick in, to ingraft (Rom. 11:17-23). "We will eat a last year's pippin of my own grafting."—Shakespeare.
- GREAVES (Heb. מִטְּחָוִים, mits-khaw'), defensive armor for the legs. From the Fr. grève, which means the shin of a leg. Wyclif has "leg-harnais." "Vaunt-brass and greves."—Milton. Ancient armor (see 1 Sam. 17:6).
- GRIEF (Heb. כְּחֹלֶה, khoh'-ee), disease, sickness, anxiety. Used in a bodily as well as a mental sense to indicate pain: "Or take away the grief of a wound."—Shakespeare. "This hearbe Tobacco, hath perticuler vertue to heale griefs of the heade."—Frampton. The Hebrew word rendered grief in Isa. 53:3, 4, 10, is elsewhere translated sickness (Deut. 7:15; 28:59, 61; 2 Kings 1:2).
- GRIEVANCE (Heb. אַו־מַאֲוִי, av-maw'), wearing effort, worry, Hab. 1:3), human misery either of mind or body.
- GRUDGE (Heb. לָעַן, leen), prinitive root, to stay permanently; hence, in a bad sense, to be obstinate; not as in our sense, to covet or begrudge (Psa. 59:15). R. V. has it "tarry all night." R. C. T. says it formerly implied open utterances of displeasure at others. Wyclif, in Luke 15:2, has, "And the farisies and scribbs gruechiden: seiyng, for this resceyveth synful men and eteth with hem." (Gr. γογγυσμός, gong-goos-mos, 1 Pet. 4:9), in the sense of murmuring. "Without a grudge or grumbings."—Shakespeare, "Tempest." "As Judas grueched agens the Maudeleyn."—Chaucer, Parson's Tale.
- GUILTY (Gr. ἐνοχος, en-oh'-os, Matt. 26:66). It meant guilty to the extent of meriting death as a penalty. It corresponds to the reus mortis of the Vulgate.
- HALING (Gr. κατασίρω, kat-as-oo'-ro, Acts 8:3). It meant to arrest by force, as we use the word haul. "Diseases that violently hale men to death euerlasting."—Udal, Erasmus.
- HALT (Heb. טָחַל, tsh'-lah, Gen. 32:31), to limp. "But shée refused him, because that hee halted on one legge."—Stow. (Gr. χλωός, khoh'-los', Matt. 18:8), crippled.
- HAP (Heb. מִקְרֵה', mik-reh', Ruth 2:3), generally now used in composition with other words: as, mishap, perhaps, haply, hapless. 2 Cor. 13:5, "In happe ye been reprevable."—Wyclif.
- HAPLY (Gr. ἄρα, ar'-ah, Acts 5:39). "Lest haply ye be founde to stryve agaynst God."—Tyn.
- HARD (Heb. נָגַשׁ, naw-gash', Judg. 9:52), near, close. (Gr. συνουρέω, soon-om-or-eh'-o), to adjoin or be near to (Acts 18:7).
- HARDLY (Gr. δυσκόλως, doos-koll'-oce, Matt. 19:23), with difficulty, impracticability. R. C. T. says of Mark 15:43, "Hardily (audacter, Vulg.) he entride in to Pilat, and axide the body of Jhesu."
- HARDNESS (Gr. κωκοπαθείω, kak-op-ath-eh'-o, 2 Tim. 2:3), trouble, harshship.
- HARLOT (Gr. πόρνη, por'-nay, Matt. 21:31), originally a vagabond. R. C. T. says it was used of both sexes alike, and for the most part a term of slight and contempt.
- HARNESS (Heb. שִׁירְיוֹנֹת, shir-yone', 1 Kings 22:34). It was used formerly in reference to armor or covering, both of man and beast. Now it refers to that of the animal only. In French harnais refers to the beast and harnois to the man.
- HARNESSED (Heb. שִׁירְיוֹנֵי, khaw-moosh', Exod. 13:18), armed, equipped.
- HASTE (Heb. מְהֵרָה, oos, Exod. 5:13), to be close, narrow, to hurry. Obsolete in prose.
- HAUNT (Heb. רֵהַל, reh'-gel, 1 Sam. 30:31), to frequent, to inhabit. Psa. 26:4, Geneva version, "I have not haunted with vain persons."
- HAVE (Heb. יָצָא, yaw-tsaw', 2 Kings 11:15), to escort, bring, conduct, as in Shakespeare, "Your mistress sent to have me home to dinner." Used with various prepositions; as, to have away, to have forth.
- HEADSTONE (Heb. רוֹשָׁאֵי, ro-shaw', Zecl. 4:7), topmost stone of a building.
- HEADY (Gr. προπετής, prop-el'-ace, 2 Tim. 3:4), rash, quick, obstinate. "That rash and headie attempt."—Holland, Livy.
- HEART (Heb. לֵב, labe, 2 Sam. 7:27), to be bold.
- HEAVINESS (Gr. λυπέω, loo-peh'-o, 1 Pet. 1:6), sadness. "I am here, brother, full of sadness."—Shakespeare.
- HELPS (Gr. βοήθεια, bo-ay'-thi-ah, Acts 27:17), a chain for frapping a vessel. Also (Gr. ἀντιλήψις, ant-il'-ape-sis, 1 Cor. 12:28), assistance, counsel. So Bacon has it, "Embrace, and invite helps, and advices, touching the execution of thy place."
- HEM (Gr. κράσπεδον, kras'-ped-on, Matt. 9:20), R. V., "border." "Entomb'd upon the very hem o' the sea."—Shakespeare.
- HIGH DAY (Heb. גָּדֹל, gaw-dole', Gen. 29:7), great, i. e., broad daylight. Shakespeare uses the word great in the same way, thus, "It is great morning" ("Trollus and Cressida").

- HIGH-MINDED (Gr. ὑψηλοφρονέω, hoop-say-to-fron-eh'-o, Rom. 11:20; 1 Tim. 6:17), lofty in mind, arrogant.
- HOAR (Heb. הַבַּיִשׁ, say-baw', 1 Kings 2:6; "hoary," Job 41:32; Prov. 16:31), said of hair, gray. "As hoar as an hawethorn."—"Piers Ploughman."
- HOARY (Heb. כֶּפֶר־אֲדָמָה, kef-ore', Job 38:29), white frost, as covering the ground.
- HOISE (Gr. ἐπαίρω, ep-ah-ee'-ro, Acts 27:40), to hoist up.
- HOLD (Gr. τήρησις, tay'-ray-sis, Acts 4:3), a prison. (Heb. תְּסַרְסֵר, tser-ee'-ah-ee, Judg. 9:46), a fortress.
- HOLPEN (Heb. זָרַע־אֶזְרָא, zer-o-aw', Psa. 83:8), helped. A. S. helpan.
- HONEST (Gr. καλός, kal-os', Rom. 12:17), honorable. The Greek word applies to moral as well as physical beauty.
- HONESTY (Gr. σεμνότης, sem-not'-ace, 1 Tim. 2:2). R. V. has it "gravity." Shakespeare applying it to men indicated "honor," to women "chastity."
- HONORABLE (Gr. ἐντιμος, ent-tee-mos, Luke 14:8), rank in society.
- HOSEN (Heb. פַּת־תְּשֵׁי, pat-teesh', Dan. 3:21). The old plural of hose meant not merely breeches, but any covering of the legs. Wyclif, in Acts 12:8, has, "And the aungel seide to him girde thee & do on thin hosis, and he dide so"—here also the Vulg. has "caligas," and the A. V. "sandals."
- HOUGH (Heb. אַו־כַּר', au-kar', Josh. 11:6). It refers to the cutting the back sinews of a horse's leg. Also 2 Sam. 8:4. The early version of Wyclif has, "The hors of hem thow shalt kut of the synewis at the knees."
- HUNGER-BITTEN (Heb. רָאָב־אֵבֶן, raw-abe', Job 18:12), famished. The words hunger-starved and winter-starved are used by the old writers.
- HUSBANDMAN (Heb. אִישׁ, eesh, Gen. 9:20, etc.), cultivator of land.
- HUSBANDRY (Gr. ἑωργιον, gheh-ore'-ghee-on, 1 Cor. 3:9), tilled land. "And all her husbandry doth lie on heaps, corrupting in its own fertility."—Shakespeare.
- ILL-FAVORED (Heb. רָח, rah, Gen. 41:3), bad, hurt.
- ILLUMINATED (Gr. φωτιζω, fo-tid'-zo, Heb. 10:32), to shed rays, to brighten. The Geneva version has it "after ye had received light."
- IMAGERY (Heb. מַשְׂכֵּתִים, mas-keeth', Ezek. 8:12), referring to ancient palace chambers whose walls were decorated with paintings. "An altar carved with cunning imagery."—Spenser.
- IMAGINE (Heb. הִגַּדְתִּי, haw-gaw', Gen. 11:6; Job 21:27; Psa. 2:1; 10:2), to devise or contrive.
- IMPART (Gr. μεταδιδωμι, met-ad-id'-o-mee, Luke 3:11; Rom. 1:11), to supply or communicate.
- IMPLEAD (Gr. ἐγκαλέω, eng-kal-eh'-o, Acts 19:38), a law term, meaning to accuse or indict.
- IMPUDENCY (a word found in the cap. of Isa., ch. 3). The old form of impudent, Lat. impudentia. "Audacious, without impudency."—Shakespeare, "Love's Labor Lost."
- INCONTINENT (Gr. ἀκράτης, ak-rat'-ace, 2 Tim. 3:3), intemperate, wanting self-control. It once had a broad meaning, conveying the idea of indulgence of any passion whatever.
- INDITE (Heb. שָׂחַ, raw-khash', Psa. 45:1), to compose, or prepare for another what he shall write. "And couthe eke rede well ynough and indite. But with a penne she could not write."—Chaucer.
- INFLUENCE (Heb. כֶּה־מָוֶה, kee-maw', Job 38:31). The oriental idea of astrological effect upon human destiny seems here introduced. "The moist star, upon whose influence Neptune's empire stands."—Shakespeare.
- INHABITER (Gr. κατοικέω, kat-oy-keh'-o, Rev. 8:13; 12:12), an inhabitant. The idea of housing permanently is here. The marg. of some passages has "inhabitriss" (Jer. 10:17; 51:35; Mic. 1:11).
- INJURIOUS (Gr. υβριστής, hoo-bris-tace, 1 Tim. 1:13), insolent, abusive. "Not half so bad as thine to England's king, injurious duke, that threatest where's no cause."—Shakespeare, "Henry VI."
- INKHORN (Heb. כַּף־סֵת, keh'-seth, Ezek. 9:2), a cup, now an inkstand.
- INN (Heb. מַלְוֶה, maw-lone', Gen. 42:27; 43:21; Exod. 4:24), a place for lodging without food or entertainment, hence the O. E. "innus of court." Joseph's brethren carried their own provisions, and one opened his sack, to feed his beast of burden, at the inn.
- INNOCENTS (Heb. נָקִיִּים, naw-kee', Jer. 19:4), innocent people, also innocency. The old form of innocency is used in Gen. 20:5; Psa. 26:6.
- INORDINATE (Gr. πάθος, path'-os, Col. 3:5), excessive and ungoverned, as passion.
- INQUISITION (Heb. דַּו־רַשׁ, daw-rash', Psa. 9:12), search, inquiry. "Avoid envie; anxious feares; anger fretting inwards, subtil and knottle inquisitions."—Bacon.
- INSTANT (Gr. επικειμαι, ep-ik'-i-mah-ee, Luke 23:23), importunate, urgent. (Gr. προσκαρτερέω, pros-kar-ter-eh'-o, Rom. 12:12), persevering. (Gr. ἐπίστημι, ef-is-tay-mee, 2 Tim. 4:2), to stand, be pressing, urgent.
- INSTANTLY (Gr. σπουδαίος, spoo-dah'-yos, Luke 7:4), earnest, energetic.
- INTELLIGENCE (Heb. בֵּינָה, bene, Dan. 11:30), to have an understanding or agreement rather than a quality of mind. "The arch flatterer with whom all the petty flatterers have intelligence."—Bacon. It seems to convey the idea of treachery or double dealing.

- INTENT (Gr. iva, hin'-ah, John 13:28), intention or purpose.
- INTERMEDDLE (Heb. עָרַב, aw-rab', Prov. 14:10), engage, mingle in, not necessarily in an offensive way, as is generally implied in the use of the word now.
- INTREAT (Gr. παρακαλέω, par-ak-al-eh'-o, 1 Tim. 5:1), to exhort in a kindly spirit, without rebuking. In the A. V. of 1611 entreat and intreat are used indifferently in both senses of the word. It signifies to deal with.
- INWARD (Heb. סוּדָה, sode, Job 19:19), intimate. "Those inward counsellours had need also to be wise men."—Bacon.
- ITERATE. The word is in the marg. at Prov. 26:11. It signifies to repeat. Shakespeare says, "Truth tired with iteration."
- JANGLING (Gr. ματαιολογία, mat-ah-yol-og-ee'-ah, 1 Tim. 1:6), random talk, babbling, prating. Wyclif, in Exod. 17:7, has, "And he clepide the name of that place Temyngne, for the janglyng of the sones of Ysrael."
- JAW TEETH (Heb. מְרִיָּדָה, meth-al-leh-aw', Prov. 30:14), the grinders, cheek teeth.
- JEOPARD (Heb. חָרַף, khaw-raf', Judg. 5:18), to hazard or risk, as we use the word jeopardize.
- JEOPARDY (Gr. κινδυνεύω, kin-doon-yoo'-o, Luke 8:23; 1 Cor. 15:30), a risk.
- JEWELS (Heb. כֶּלִי, kel-ee', Gen. 24:53; Exod. 3:22; Prov. 11:22). It was formerly applied to the precious metals; now used in reference to precious stones.
- JEWRY (Heb. יְהוּדָה, yeh-hood', Dan. 5:13, rendered "Judah" in Daniel; Gr. Ἰουδαία, ee-oo-dah'-yah, Luke 23:5; John 7:1). It refers to the part of Palestine occupied by the tribes of Judah and Benjamin.
- JOT (Gr. ἰῶτα, ee-o'-tah, Matt. 5:18), the smallest letter in the Greek alphabet, and therefore the one most likely to be omitted or overlooked.
- JOY (Heb. שִׂמְחָה, saw-makh', Psa. 21:1), to rejoice; rarely used. Wyclif has, Gen. 45:16, "And Pharaoh loyede and al the meyne of hym."
- JUDGE (Gr. κρίνω, kree'-no, Luke 19:22), condemn, sentence. "Apprehended and judged to die."—Shakespeare, "Henry IV."
- JUSTIFY (Heb. צַדִּיק, tsaw'-dak, Isa. 5:23), a legal term; to acquit or exonerate. "I cannot justify whom the law condemns."—Shakespeare.
- KERCHIEF (Heb. מִסְפָּחָה, mis-paw-khaw', Ezek. 13:18), spread out like a veil, a covering for the head.
- KINE (Heb. פָּרָה, paw-raw', Gen. 32:15; Exod. 41:2, etc.), the old plural of cow. The Scotch have "kye." Pliny wrote, "This serpent liveth at the first of kine's milk, and thereupon takes the name Boae" (Holland's Translation).
- KNOP (Heb. כַּפְתּוֹר, kaf-tore', Exod. 25:31), a bud or like a bud, an ornament.
- LACE (Heb. פֶּתִיל, paw-theel', Exod. 28:28, 37), a band, upon which are fastened jewels. "At their eares hang laces full of jewels."—Old English.
- LARGE (Gr. ικανός, hik-an-os', Matt. 28:12), a largesse or ample present of money. "They gave large money to the soldiers."
- LATCHET (Heb. שֵׁרָט, ser-oke', Isa. 5:27; Gr. ἰμάς, hee-mas', Mark 1:7), a shoe string or thong.
- LAUD (Gr. ἐπαινώω, ep-ah-ee-neh'-o, Rom. 15:11), to praise.
- LAVER (Heb. כִּיּוֹר, kee-yore', Exod. 38:8), a vessel for washing, particularly in religious ceremonial.
- LAY (Heb. שָׁם, seem, Job 41:26), to lay at or to strike at; also to lay out and to lay away. (Josh. 2:1, marg.), to lodge or dwell.
- LEASING (Heb. זָבַג, kaw-zawb', Psa. 4:2; 5:6), falsehood, lying.
- LEES (Heb. שֵׁטָן, sheh'-mer), sediment, dregs (Isa. 25:6; Jer. 48:11; Zeph. 1:12).
- LET (Gr. κατέχω, kat-ekh'-o), to hinder, prevent, or, as the R. V. has it, "restraineth" (2 Thess. 2:7).
- LET BE (Gr. ἀφήμι, af-ee'-ay-mee), forsake, leave alone (Matt. 27:49).
- LEWD (Gr. πονηρός, pon-ay-ros', Acts 17:5). R. C. T. says the word has gone through three distinct significations. It first conveyed the idea of ignorance, and, on the assumption that those who were ignorant of the truth would not practice it, it came to mean moral delinquency. John 7:49, "This people who knoweth not the law are accursed." (Heb. זָמָה, zam-maw', Ezek. 16:27; 23:44), impure, dissolute.
- LIGHT (Heb. פָּחַז, paw-khaz'), to bubble, as boiling water, to froth, to be unimportant (Num. 21:5).
- LIGHTEN (Gr. ἀποκάλυψις, ap-ok-al'-oop-sis), to give light to (Luke 2:32).
- LIKE (Heb. כִּמְצֵה, kem-oh'), likely (Jer. 38:9). "The same had like to have happened a second time."—Pliny.
- LIKING (Heb. חָלָם, khaw-lam'), condition (Job 39:4).
- LIST (Gr. θέλω, thel'-o), to please, or wish of choice (Matt. 17:12; Mark 9:13).
- LIVELY (Gr. ζῶω, zah'-o), living (Acts 7:38, etc.).
- LOADEN (Heb. מָשָׂה, aw-mas'), made a load, laden (Isa. 46:1).
- LODGE (Heb. מְלוּנָה, mel-oo-naw', Isa. 1:8), a hut or place to lodge. "As melancholy as a lodge in a warren."—Shakespeare.
- LOFT (Heb. עֲלֵיָּוָה, al-ee-yaw'), a story or upper room (1 Kings 17:19).
- LOOK (Gr. προσδοκάω, pros-dok-ah'-o), to expect (Acts 28:6). "My lord, I look'd you would have given me your petition."—Shakespeare, "Henry VIII."

LUNATIC (Gr. σεληνιαζομαι, sel-ay-nee-adi-zom-ahce), epileptic (Matt. 4:24; 17:15).

LUST (Gr. ἐπιθυμία, ep-ee-thoo-mee-ah), a desire, pleasure (James 1:14, 15; 2 Pet. 1:4, etc.), but not confined to the idea of passion as mostly now.

MADE (Gr. προσποιομαι, pros-poy-eh-om-ahce), to pretend, to feign (Luke 24:28; comp. 2 Sam. 13:6). "My Lord of London maketh as though he were greatly displeased with me."—Latimer.

MAGNIFICENT (Heb. גָּדֹל, gaw-dal', 1 Chron. 22:5), magnificent. "Neither ought we to be carried away with external shews of magnificent pomp."—Sandys, "Old Sermons."

MALICE (Gr. κακία, kak-ee-ah, 1 Cor. 5:8; Eph. 4:31). This is applied to wickedness in a more extended sense than is understood now. Not merely malice. R. C. T. intimates that the word used in Rom. 1:29 signified that state of mind which "takes things by the wrong handle" or misinterpretation of motives—the "malignitas interpretantium" of Pliny. "The study of the word is very suggestive of the psychological truth, that the evil which men find in themselves they suspect in their fellow-men."

MANSIONS (Gr. μονή, mon-ay', John 14:2), a resting place. Our idea of magnificent display in a dwelling is not in the original word. The French has maison, a resting place.

MAR (Heb. שָׁחַט, shaw-khatth', Ruth 4:6), to spoil or squander or waste.

MARISH (Heb. גֵּהֵב, geh-beh, Ezek. 47:11), a marsh, low place under water.

MASTER BUILDER (Gr. ἀρχιτέκτων, ar-kee-tekt-tone, 1 Cor. 3:10), an architect. "The master-builders and inferior builders in Christs Church."—Bacon.

MASTERY (Heb. גִּבּוּרָה, gheb-oo-raw', Dan. 6:24), superiority.

MATTER (Gr. ὕλη, hoo-lay, James 3:5), wood, fuel. "Perpetual matier of the fuyr of helle."—Chaucer.

MEAN (Heb. קָטָן, khaw-shoke', Prov. 22:29), not necessarily base, but low and humble. Confusion of the Anglo-Saxon word gemoeene, common, and moene, false, probably led to the change in signification.

MEAT (Heb. אֶכְלָה, ok-lav', Gen. 1:29). R. C. T. says all food was once called meat; it is so in our Bible, and "horse meat" for fodder is still a phrase in use in the North country. "Meat" is now a name given only to flesh.

MEDDLE (Heb. גָּלַעַת, gaw-lah', 2 Chron. 35:21). Barrow distinguishes between "meddling" and being meddlesome. Some of the early translations of the Scriptures have in 1 Thess. 4:11, "Meddle with your own business." Once the word had no offensive meaning as now, but simply implied the idea of having proper dealings with a person or thing.

MEMORIAL (Heb. זִכָּר, zeh-ker, Psa. 9:6), memory.

MESS (Heb. מַשְׁאֵל, mas-ayth', Gen. 43:34; 2 Sam. 11:8), a supply of food.

METE (Gr. μετρέω, mel-reh'-o, Matt. 7:2), measure.

METEYARD (Heb. דָּבָר, mid-daw', Lev. 19:35), measuring rod. "The smith giveth over his hammer and stithy: the tailor his shears and meteward."—Bacon.

MIGHTIES (Heb. גִּבּוּרִים, ghib-bore', 1 Chron. 11:12, 24), valliant men.

MINCING (Heb. הִלָּךְ, tav-saf', Isa. 3:16), moving with short steps like children. "Turn two mincing steps into a manly stride."—Shakespeare.

MIND (Gr. μέλλω, mel-lone, Acts 20:13), to intend or purpose, to be about to do.

MINDED, to resolve, determined, as the Gr. βούλομαι, boo-lom-ahce (Matt. 1:19).

MINISH (Heb. רָחַק, gaw-rah', Psa. 107:39), to make less, or, as we say, diminish. An early version of the gospel of John has, at 3:30, "It blhoueth him for to waxe, forsoth me to be menusid, or maad lesse."

MINISTER (Gr. ὑπηρέτης, hoo-py-ret'-ace, Luke 4:20), formerly an attendant or servant, not as now referring to a church official or officer of state.

MISERABLE (Gr. ἐλεεινός, el-eh-i-nos, Rev. 3:17). R. C. T. says: "There was a time when the 'miser' was a wretched man, now he is the covetous; at the same time 'misery,' which is now wretchedness, and 'miserable,' which is now wretched, were severally coveteousness and covetous. They have exactly exchanged places." Hooker says, "The liberal-hearted man is, by the opinion of the prodigal, miserable, and by the judgment of the miserable, lavish" (Eccles. Polity).

MITE (Gr. λεπτόν, lep-ton', Mark 12:42), a very small coin. R. C. T. says, "'Minutes' are now 'minute' portions of time; they might be minute portions of anything." Wycliff's version of Mark 12:42 would indicate that the word "mite" is contracted from "minute," being a minute portion of money. "But whanne a pore widowe was come, sche cast two mynutis, that is a farthing."

MOCK (Heb. לָצַח, loots, Prov. 14:9), a jeer or taunt, a matter of ridicule.

Also to delude (Gr. ἐμπαίζω, emp-ahced'-zo, Matt. 2:16), to delude or mislead.

MOLLIFIED (Heb. רָחַם, raw-kah', Isa. 1:6), to soften; an old medical term.

MORE (Gr. πλείων, pli-own, Acts 19:32), greater, larger in extent. "A man cannot tell whether Apelles or Albert Durer were the greater trifler."—Bacon.

MORTIFY (Gr. θανατώω, than-at-o'-o, Rom. 8:13), to put to death. Erasmus says, "Christ was mortified and killed in dede as touchynge to his fleshe."

MOTE (Gr. κάρφος, kar'-fos, Matt. 7:3, etc.), a small particle. "A mote it is, to trouble the mind's eye."—Shakespeare.

MOTIONS (Gr. πάθημα, path'-ay-mah, Rom. 7:5), emotions, passions, impulses.

MOUNT (Heb. הַרְבֵּעַ, so-lal-aw', Jer. 6:6), mound.

MUFFLER (Heb. הַרְבֵּעַ, rah-al-aw', Isa. 3:19), a covering for the lower part of the face. It was called sometimes a mask. "He might put on a hat, a muffler, and a kerchief, and so escape."—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives."

MUNITION (Heb. מַצֵּדָה, met's-o-daw', Dan. 11:15, marg.; Isa. 29:7; 33:16; Nah. 2:1), a fortress, stronghold. The verb munite is used by Bacon (Essay III).

MURRAIN (Heb. דַּחְבֵּר, dah'-ber, Exod. 9:3), a disease of animals. Matthew's Bible has "The Lord shal be upon thy cattell with a mighty greate morraine." "The fold stands empty in the drowned field, And crows are fattened with the murrion flock."—Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream."

NAMELY (Gr. μάλιστα, mal'-is-tah, Tit. 1:10, A. V., "specially"), according to R. C. T., once meant chiefly or especially, while it now only signifies that something is designated (Mark 12:31; Rom. 13:9).

NATURAL (Gr. ψυχικός, psoo-khee-kos', 1 Cor. 15:44), a body animated with the principle of animal life.

NAUGHTINESS (Gr. κακία, kah-ee'-ah, James 1:21), wickedness, sin, or crime. The modern sense almost entirely confined to the nursery. "So shines a good deed in a naughty world."—Shakespeare.

NAUGHTY (Heb. רַח, rah, Jer. 24:2), worthless or good for nothing.

NECROMANCER (Heb. מוֹת, mooth, Deut. 18:11), a person who professes to hold communication with the dead.

NEESE (Heb. נִישָׁה, at-ee-shaw', Job 41:18; 2 Kings 4:35, A. V., "sneeze"), to sneeze. "His nesinge is like a glisteringe fyre."—Coverdale.

NEPHEW (Gr. ἐγγονον, ek'-gon-on, 1 Tim. 5:4), formerly a grandson, or even remote lineal descendant; A. V., "children's children." So also the Lat. nepos once had a wider meaning than that of nephew. Hence our modern word nepotism includes quite an extensive circle of relationship. Until the 17th century the word which in our A. V. is indicated by the daughters of children did mean niece, and so Wyclif has it. Our word nepotism still has the early signification.

NEVER (Gr. οὐδέ, oo-deh', Matt. 27:14), never a word, and never so, not, or not at all. The provincialism "nary" is equivalent to "ne'er a."

NITER (Heb. נֶחֱתֵר, neh'-ther', Prov. 25:20; Jer. 2:22), soda. Not the saltpeter of commerce of our day, but the alkali which, with acid, causes a strong fermentation.

NOISED (Gr. ἀκούω, ak-oo'-o, Mark 2:1), heard by others and through others.

NOISOME (Gr. βλαβερός, blab-er-os', Rev. 16:2; comp. Psa. 91:3; Ezek. 14:15, 21; "hurtful" in 1 Tim. 6:9), in the early translations, was equivalent to noxious or hurtful. So in Plutarch's Morals the gods are spoken of as noisome, hurtful, and doing mischief unto men. But in the 17th century it came to mean anything disgusting or offensive.—R. C. T., "On Bible Revision."

NOTABLE (Gr. ἐπιφανής, ep-if-an-ace', Acts 2:20), well known, conspicuous.

NOVICE (Gr. νεόφυτος, neh-of-oo-tos, 1 Tim. 3:6), one newly admitted to the Church or having espoused the faith. It has come in modern phrase to signify one admitted to a religious order or house.

NURSING FATHER (Heb. אָמֵן, aw-man', Isa. 49:23; Num. 11:12), a foster father, or nourisher; whatever encouraged or promoted. "Idelnes, mother and norisher of all vices."—Shakespeare, "Richard III."

OBESANCE (Heb. שָׁוָה, shaw-khaw', Gen. 37:7, etc.), literally, "bowed or prostrated oneself." Wright says, "From the simple meaning of obedience which literally belongs to obelance, it is applied to denote the act of obedience or homage, the outward symbol of the act." Chaucer uses the word obelant for obedient.

OBULATION (Heb. קוֹרְבָּנִים, koor-bawm', Lev. 7:38, etc.), anything offered or solemnly devoted to God in his worship. Money as well as other sacrifices were intended in the old form. Oblations and alms are synonymous.

OBSERVATION (Gr. παρατήρησις, par-at-ay'-ray-sis, Luke 17:20), observation in the sense of ceremony, demonstrative anticipation.

OBSERVE (Gr. συντηρέω, soon-tay-reh'-o, Mark 6:20), to hold in respect or reverence. To watch with intense interest. "Aye, and to have better men than himself, by many thousand degrees, to observe him, and stand bare."—Milton.

OCCUPY (Heb. אָשַׁף, aw-saw', Judg. 16:11), to make use of, to employ. "Newe ropes that were never occupied."—Geneva. "Iron with much occupyng is worne too naught, with little handling gathereth rust."—Schoole of Abuse. R. C. T. says, "He now occupyes who has in present possession; but the word involved once the further signification of using, employing; an occupier was a trader or retail dealer." Thus, "He (Eumenes) made as though he had occasion to occupy money, and so borrowed a great sum of them."—Plutarch, Lives. In Luke 19:13 we have "occupy till I come," in the sense of trade, improvement of property. "Occupiers and shopkeepers."—Pliny.

OCCURRENT (Heb. פֶּה־גַח, peh'-gah, 1 Kings 5:4), an occurrence. "This occurrent fel out in Lactania, the nearest part unto us of Spaine."—Pliny.

ODD (Heb. עָרָב, aw-daf', Num. 3:48), overplus, over, remain.

OFTEN (Gr. πυκνός, pook-nos', 1 Tim. 5:23), frequent. "Often messengers."—Shakespeare, "Richard III."

OINTMENT (Gr. μύρον, mool-ron, John 12:3, etc.), perfume. "The odour of ointments are more durable than those of flowers."—Bacon.

"Do you not see the grasse, how in color they excell the emeralds, every one striving to pass his fellow, and yet they are all kept of an equal height."—Sidney, Arcadia.

PASSAGE (Heb. מַעְבָּרָה, mah-ab-aw-raw', Judg. 12:6; 1 Sam. 13:23; 14:4; Isa. 10:29), a pass over a mountain, or a ford across the river. The passage of Michmash; the passages of Jordan.

PASSENGER (Heb. דַּחֲרֵק, dch-rek, Prov. 9:16; Ezek. 39:11, 14, 15), wayfarer, passer-by.

PASSION (Gr. ὁμοιοπαθής, hom-oy-op-ath-ace', James 5:17), feelings. "Free from gross passion of mirth or anger."—Shakespeare. (Gr. πάσχω, pas'-kho, Acts 1:3), sufferings, the sufferings of Christ. "All the passion of all the martyrs that ever were . . . were not able to remedy our sin."—Latimer.

PATE (Heb. קֶדֶקֶד, kod-kode', Psa. 7:16), crown of the head; used now mostly in a comic sense.

PATTERN (Gr. τύπος, too'-pos, Heb. 9:23). When the A. V. was made pattern not only denoted the thing from which the copy was made, but also the copy which was made from a model.

PEACE (Heb. חַרָשׁ, khaw-rash', Exod. 14:14; Num. 30:4), to keep silence. (Gr. σιωπία, see-o-pah'-o, Mark 4:39), an interjection used to enforce quiet.

PECULIAR (Heb. שְׂגוּלָה, seg-ool-law', Exod. 19:5; Deut. 14:2), used formerly in the sense of ownership, and with a signification of private property; technically the property which a slave or a child was allowed by the master to control. "What exempt or peculiar places are within the circuit of your diocese where you have not full jurisdiction as ordinary?"—Parker, Correspondence.

PEELED (Heb. מָוֶרַח, maw-rat', Isa. 18:2,7; Ezek. 29:18), stripped of hair, and sometimes of skin also. "As peeled as an ape was his skulle."—Chaucer. "Peel'd priest, dost thou command me to be shut out?"—Shakespeare. "An old provincial boatman said, 'Brayed nettles is the best cure for a peeled skin.'"—Wright.

PEOPLE (Heb. עַם, am, Josh. 11:4), a host, multitude. "Much people" used for a great number, and "little people" for a small number. "He is so courageous of himselfe that he is come to the field with little people."—"King Arthur." (Gr. λαός, lah-os', Rev. 7:9), peoples, races, or tribes.

PERADVENTURE (Heb. פֶּנֶ, pene, Gen. 31:31), perhaps.

- PERSECUTE (Heb. דָּרַס, raw-daf, Psa. 7:1, 5; 71:11), to pursue. "Freye ze for hem that pursuen and sclaudren you."—Wyclif. To follow up with hostile intent.
- PIETY (Gr. εὐσεβέω, yoo-seb-eh-o, 1 Tim. 5:4). This meant, not so much a religious state, as a relation between relatives, more especially a filial affection: "Yet for his kindnesse and dutifull pietie to his father, deserveth commendation."—Livy. Erasmus, "On the Creed," says: "To the loue of God & to the loue of our parentes, is gyuen one commune name in the Latyne, that is to wyte, pietas. For pietas properly is called the affection or loue towards God and towards our parentes, & towards our countrie, which is as it were a commune parente of many men, lykewyse as God is father of all men."
- PILL (Heb. לָצַעַף, paw-tsaf, Gen. 30:37), to strip off the skin or bark. See PEELED.
- PLAGUE (Heb. נִגְזַף, naw-gah', Psa. 73:5, 14; 89:23). Its meaning originally was of most serious import, but it has come to mean a mere trifling annoyance. Once a God plagued the victim, now a child plagues.
- PLAIN (Heb. דָּרַס, tome, Gen. 25:27), honest, simple.
- PLAT (Heb. כֶּהַל־קָוָה, khel-kaw', 2 Kings 9:26), a portion of land. The word is akin to the Fr. plat and the Gr. πλατύς, which bear the signification "flat." Probably meant a flat small portion of ground.
- PLAY (Heb. קִחַץ, tsaw-khak', Exod. 32:6), diversion. The old form not confined to children's amusement. As used, 2 Sam. 2:14, in the technical sense it means a sword play, fencing.
- PLEAD (Heb. קָחַץ, yaw-kakh', Jer. 2:9, 35; Ezek. 17:20), a legal arguing as in lawsuit, as Job 16:21.
- POLL (Heb. לָחַץ, gaw-lakh', 2 Sam. 14:26; Ezek. 44:20; Mic. 1:16), to cut off the hair of the head. "Their heades be not polled or shauen, but rounded a lytle about the eares."—More, Utopia. (Heb. גִּלְגֹּלֶת, gul-gol-leth, Num. 1:2, 18; 3:47; 1 Chron. 23:3, 24), skull; hence, by implication, a head.
- POMMEL (Heb. גִּלְגֹּלֶת, gool-law', 2 Chron. 4:12), applied once to any round, ball-shaped protuberance, but now almost exclusively in reference to a part of the saddle.
- PONDER (Gr. συμβάλλω, soom-bal'lo, Luke 2:19), to seriously consider, to weigh in the mind.
- PORT (Heb. שַׁעַר, shah'-ar, Neh. 2:13; Psa. 9:14), a gate. Bishops' Bible has "Mourne, thou porte, weepe, thou citle" (Isa. 14:31).
- PORTER (Gr. θυρωρός, thoo-ro-ros', John 10:3), gate keeper.
- POSSESS (Heb. שָׁחַץ, yaw-roysh', Num. 13:30). The old signification is to take forcible possession of, not merely to have in keeping. "Remember, first, to possess his books."—Shakespeare.
- POST (Heb. שָׁחַץ, roots, Job 9:25; Esth. 8:14; 2 Chron. 30:6), swift messenger. It first meant a thing fixed or stationary, then a fixed place, as a military post or a designated place on a line of travel, where horses were in waiting, and then the meaning was transferred to the traveler or messenger himself.
- POWER (Heb. מְשָׁלָה, mem-shaw-law', 2 Chron. 32:9), a military force. "So soon as we had gather'd us a power we dallied not."—Heywood.
- PREFER (Heb. שָׁחַץ, shaw-naw', Esth. 2:9), to promote an individual to honor.
- PRESENTLY (Gr. παρίστημι, par-is'tay-mee, Matt. 26:53, etc.), instantly. "There are two infallible touchstones of a true miracle, which alwaies is done—εὐθέως, presently, and τελείως, perfectly."—Fuller, Church Hist.
- PRESSFAT (Heb. דָּרַס, poo-raw', Hag. 2:16), vat of the olive or wine press.
- PREVENT (Heb. דָּרַס, kaw-dam', Psa. 18:5; 119:148), to anticipate, to precede.
(Gr. πρόω, sthan'-o, Matt. 17:25; 1 Thess. 4:15). The word came to have the meaning of hindrance. R. C. T. says: "One may reach a point before another to help or to hinder him there; may anticipate his arrival either with the purpose of keeping it for him or against him. 'To prevent' has slipped by very gradual degrees, which it would not be difficult to trace, from the sense of keeping for to that of keeping against; from the sense of arriving first, with the intention of helping, to that of arriving first, with the intention of hindering; and then generally from helping to hindering" (Gloss. Eng. Words).
- PRICK (Gr. κέντρον, ken'-tron, Acts 9:5; 26:14), to spur, goad.
- PRIVILY (Heb. שָׁחַץ, tsaw-fan', Psa. 10:8, etc.), secretly, in lurking place.
(Gr. λάθρα, lath'-rah, Matt. 1:19.)
- PRIVY (Heb. דָּרַס, khaw-dar', Ezek. 21:14), informed of a secret matter.
(Gr. συνείδω, sun-i'-do, Acts 5:2), cognizant of a secret.
- PROGNOSTICATOR (Heb. דָּרַס, yaw-dah', Isa. 47:13), relating especially to the weather, a weather prophet. "Let now the astrologers, the starre gasers, and prognosticatours stand up."—Geneva Version.
- PROLONG (Heb. שָׁחַץ, maw-shak', Ezek. 12:25), postpone. "This wedding day perhaps it is but prolong'd."—Shakespeare.
- PROPER (Heb. שָׁחַץ, seg-ool-law', 1 Chron. 29:3), Lat. proprius, one's own, hence property.
(Gr. ἀστέιος, as-t'ios, Acts 1:19), peculiarly fit or characteristic.

PROPHECY (Gr. προφητεία, prof-ate-yoo'-o, 1 Cor. 11:5) meant not only to foretell, but to expound truth. Bacon writes: "First, whether it were not requisite, to renew, that good exercise, which was practiced, in this church, some years; . . . and was commonly called prophesying. Which was this; that the ministers, within a precinct, did meet, upon a week day, in some principall town; where there was, some ancient, grand minister, that was president; and an auditory admitted, of gentlemen, or other persons of leysure. Then every minister, successively, beginning with the youngest, did handle one, and the same part, of Scripture, spending, severally, some quarter of an hour, or better, and in the whole, some two hours: and so, the exercise, being begun, and concluded with prayer; and the president, giving a text, for the next meeting, the assembly was dissolved."

PROPHET (Gr. προφήτης, prof-ay'-tace, Eph. 4:11), a Christian teacher, under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

PUBLICAN (Gr. τελώνης, tel-ol'-nace, Matt. 5:46, etc.), one to whom was farmed out the collection of the Roman customs in the time of Christ.

PULSE (Heb. זָרַי, zay-raw-ohu', Dan. 1:12), a bean, or fruit of a pod, used for food.

PURGE (Gr. καθαίρω, kath-ah'-ee-ro, John 15:2), to cleanse. Latimer says, "He came into this world with his passion to purge our sins." To cleanse away excrescences or excessive growth, as upon a plant.

PURLOIN (Gr. νοσφίζομαι, nos-fid'-zom-ahce, Tit. 2:10). Nosphi signifies clandestinely, or apart, hence the idea of embezzlement.

PURTENANCE (Heb. כֶּחָרֶב, keh'-reb, Exod. 12:9), the intestines or inwards of an animal. Translated elsewhere bowels.

QUAINTLY (Gr. ἀσφαλίζω, as-fal-id'-zo, Mark 14:44). The word quaint, which now means odd, antique, curious, once signified skillful, safe, securely. "Whom ever I schal kisse, he it is; holde ye him, and lede ye warli, or quaintly."—Wyclif.

QUARREL (Gr. μομφή, mom-fay', Col. 3:13), complaint as in an action at law.

QUATERNION (Gr. τετράδιον, tel-rud'-ee-on, Acts 12:4), a squad of four Roman soldiers. Holland's Livy makes part of the word stand for a set of three.

QUICK (Gr. ζάω, dzah'-o, 2 Tim. 4:1), used in contrast with dead; alive, living.

QUICKEN (Gr. ζωοποιέω, dzo-oy-oy-eh'-o, 1 Cor. 15:36; Eph. 2:1), to make alive.

QUIET (Heb. שָׁקֵט, shaw-kal', Judg. 18:27), at rest. "To incense an angry bodie when he is at quiet."—French Dict.

QUIT (Heb. נָקִי, naw-keel', Josh. 2:20), released. "We are never quit of this debt."—Latimer.

QUIT ONESELF (Gr. ἀνδρίζομαι, an-drid'-zom-ahce, 1 Cor. 16:13), in the sense of acquit, behave. "Now quit you well."—Shakespeare.

RANGE (Heb. סֵדֵר, sed-ay-raw', 2 Kings 11:8), a rank or row, as of soldiers, and of mountains (see Job 39:8).

RAVENING (Gr. ἀρπαγή, har-pay-ay', Luke 11:39), plunder, extortion.

RAW (Heb. רָא, kah'-ee, 1 Sam. 2:15), alive, active, springing, hence raw.

READY (Gr. μέλλω, mell'-o, Luke 7:2), from a root containing the idea of expectation, and near as to point of time.

REASON (Gr. ἀρεστός, ar-es-tos', Acts 6:6), fit. "It is not reason that we should leave the word of God and serve tables." The word is used in the sense in which we employ the adjective, reasonable. Also, as in Rev. 18:19, in the sense of in consequence of.

RECEIPT (Gr. τελώνιον, tel-ol'-nee-on, Matt. 9:9). The place for the taking of toll is meant, rather than the act of receiving customs.

RECKON (Gr. λογίζομαι, log-id'-zom-ahce, Rom. 8:18), to conclude.

RECORD (Gr. μάρτυς, mar'-toos, Phil. 1:8), witness.

REFUGE (Heb. מְנוּחָה, meh-o-naw', Deut. 33:27), habitation, abode.

REFUSE (Heb. סָמָה, maw-as', Psa. 118:22), to reject. (Gr. ἀποδοκιμάζω, ap-od-ok-ee-mad'-zo, Matt. 21:42, A. V., "rejected"), disapprove, disallow.

RELEASE (Heb. הַנְּאֻתָה, han-aw-khaw', Esth. 2:18). It meant permission of rest, quiet.

RELIGION (Gr. θρησκεία, thrace-ki'-ah, Acts 26:5; James 1:26, 27), a ceremonial observance. R. C. T. says, "Religion once meant, not a service of God, but an order of monkery; and taking the monastic vow was termed going into a 'religion.'"

REPROBATE (Heb. מָוָה, maw-as', Jer. 6:30), cast away, spurn. A. V. marg. has "refuse silver."

REPROOF (Heb. תֹּכַחְתָּה, to-kay-khaw', Psa. 38:14), argument, rejoinder. So Job 24:2; Prov. 29:15. "In the reproof of this lies the jest."—Shakespeare.

REPROVE (Heb. יָבֵר, yaw-kakh', Job 6:25), refute, disapprove.

REQUIRE (Heb. שָׁאַל, shaw-al', Ezra 7:21; 8:22), to ask for.

REVERENCE (Heb. שָׁחָה, shaw-khaw', Esth. 3:2, etc.), to salute, bow down to.

RID (Heb. נָצַל, naw-tsal', Gen. 37:22; Exod. 6:6), to snatch away. "Rydde me and deliver me throw thy righteousness."—Coverdale, Psa. 71:2.

RINGSTRAKED (Heb. קָדַק, aw-kodel', Gen. 30:35, 39, 40; 31:8, 10, 12). Straked means streaked, or marked with a line or streak.

- RIOT (Gr. ἀσούρια, as-o-tee'-ah, Tit. 1:6; 1 Pet. 4:4), excess, dissoluteness in living.
- RISING (Heb. רָאָה, seh-ayth', Lev. 13:2, etc.), swelling, a leprous scab.
- ROD (Heb. שֵׁבֶט, shay-bet', Psa. 23:4), staff or support, on which one leans.
- ROLLER (Heb. כְּתִיבָה, khit-tool', Ezek. 30:21), a bandage.
- ROOM (Gr. προτοκλισία, pro-tok-lis-ee'ah, Luke 2:7), a place or seat. "They seke after salutations in the market place, & the preferment of the chiefe seate in assemblies; and in all feastes, and bankets, the first place or vppermost roume of the table."—Erasmus.
- SAINT (Heb. קָדוֹשׁ, khaw-seed', Psa. 106:16; Dan. 8:13), a holy person, a beloved one. "Nor thou shalt not suffre thy saint to see corrupcion."—Sir Thomas More.
- SALUTE (Heb. בָּרַךְ, baw-rak', 2 Kings 4:29), to bow down to the ground; to salute with embrace, kneel in adoration, protracted and elaborate, hence unfavorable for haste.
- SAVOUR (Gr. φρονέω, fron-eh'-o, Matt. 16:23; 2 Cor.), to think, to have a sentiment, to be of a mind. Latimer quotes Paul thus, "When I was a child I savoured as a child" (1 Cor. 13:11). Also it meant flavor, taste, scent, and in the Hebrew it was used figuratively for reputation.
- SCALL (Heb. נֶחֱתֶק, neh'-thek, Lev. 13:30), tetter, scurf. "Under thy long locks thou maist have the scall."—Chaucer.
- SCARCE (Gr. σῶλις, mol'-is, Acts 14:18; 27:7), scarcely. "Many warring rapiers are afraid of goose quills and dare scarce come hither."—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."
- SCRABBLE (Heb. תַּרְבֵּה, taw-raw', 1 Sam. 21:13), scratch, mark. Scrab is a word still in use in the Suffolk dialect, meaning to scratch.
- SCRIP (Gr. πήρα, pay-rah, Matt. 10:10), a small bag or wallet. "He on the tender grass would sit, and hearken, even to ecstasy, and in requital ope his leathern scrip."—Milton.
- SEAR (Gr. καυτηριάζω, kow-tay-ree-ad'-zo, 1 Tim. 4:2), to dry up, cauterize, scorch.
- SECURE (Gr. ποιέω, poi-eh'-o, Matt. 28:14), a relief from responsibility and care.
- SERVITOR (Heb. שָׂרֵי, shaw-rath', to attend, 2 Kings 4:43), a serving man. "Come, I have heard that fearful commenting is leaden servitor to dull delay."—Shakespeare.
- SHAMEFASTNESS (Gr. αἰδώς, ah-ee-docel', 1 Tim. 2:9), modesty, bashfulness. "Shamefast she was, in maiden's shamefastness."—Chaucer. R. C. T. says shamefacedness was "shamefastness," like steadfastness and steadfast; but the ordinary manifestation of shame being in the face, it has been brought to its present orthography. Early editions of the A. V. had "shamefastness."
- SHAPEN (Heb. לָקַח, kheel, Psa. 51:5), formed, fashioned. "As the births of living creatures at first are ill shapen, so are all innovations which are the births of time."—Bacon, Essays.
- SHERD (Heb. שֵׁרֵד, kheh'-res, Isa. 30:14; Ezek. 23:34), a shred, fragment.
- SHIPMEN (Gr. ναύτης, now'-tace, Acts 27:27), sailors.
- SHIPPING (Gr. πλοῖον, ploy'-on, John 6:24), taking a voyage. "Take, therefore, shipping; post, my lord, to France."—Shakespeare, "Henry VI."
- SHOE LATCHET (Heb. שֵׁרֵד, ser-oke', Gen. 14:23), the thong or string of a shoe.
- SHRED (Heb. שֵׁרֵד, paw-lakh', 2 Kings 4:39), cut to pieces. "Shredding it into countries: and, with topography, mincing it into particular places."—Fuller, Holy State.
- SHREWD (Heb. מַחֲמֵד, khaw-mawcel', Gen. 6:11). Wyclif has, "Forsothe the erthe is corrupt before God, and is filled with shrewness." It once meant iniquity, or intense moral evil.
- SHROUD (Heb. מָוֶה, kho-resh, Ezek. 31:3), shelter, overhanging shade. Wright says that the covered space on the side of St. Paul's Church, called the shrouds, was to protect the congregation in inclement seasons. "Places underground, as the burrows of wild animals."—Halliwell, Dict.
- SIEGE (Gr. θρόνος, thron'-os). The word once meant a seat; now it is confined to the military idea of a land blockade by an army. In Matt. 25:31, 32, Wyclif has "Thane he schal sitte on the sege of his majestie."
- SIGHT (Gr. δρασις, hor'-as-is, Rev. 4:3), appearance, aspect.
- SILLY (Heb. פָּוֶה, paw-thaw, Job 5:2; Hos. 7:11). It once had no bad sense, and meant harmless, inoffensive. Wyclif uses "uncell" for unhappy. "I am an vncell man! who schal deluyner me fro the bodi of this synne?" (Rom. 7:24.)
- SIMPLE (Gr. ἀκέραιος, ak-er'-ah-yos, Rom. 16:19), guileless, innocent. R. C. T. says the "simple" is one "without fold"; sine plica, not double, without duplicity, as we may imagine Nathanael to have been.
- SINCERE (Gr. ἀδόλος, ad'-ol-os, 1 Pet. 2:2), unadulterated, clear; sine cera, without wax, as honey.
- SIRS (Gr. ἀνὴρ, an-ayr', Acts 7:26), a form of address as we would say "Gentlemen." "Sirs, strive no more."—Shakespeare.
- SIT (Gr. ἀνακείμεναι, an-ak-i'-mahee, Luke 22:27), to recline.
- SITH (Heb. סֵם, sem, Ezek. 35:6), since; corruption of Old English. Latimer has "sithens" and Shakespeare has "sithence."
- SLACK (Heb. רָפוּ, rau-faw', Josh. 10:6), to slacken or relax. "Slack their duties."—Shakespeare.
- SLEIGHT (Gr. κυσία, koo-bi'-ah, Eph. 4:14), artifice, fraud, gambling, associated with the idea of crawling or creeping. "With sleight and manhood stole to Rhesus' tent."—Shakespeare, "Henry VI." The word means literally dice playing or throwing, from κύβος, a cube or die.

- SLIME (Heb. חַיִּימָה, khai-maur', Gen. 11:3), bitumen. "The bitumen of which I speak is in some places in manner of a muddle slime."—Pliny.
- SOFT (Gr. μαλακός, mal-ak-os', Matt. 11:8), mild-tempered, effeminate; hence Tyndale has (Tit. 3:2), "Be no fighters but soft, showing all meekness to all men."
- SOMETIMES (Gr. ποτέ, pot-eh', Eph. 2:13; 5:8; Col. 1:21; Tit. 3:3), once, once upon a time, in reference to the past. "Thy sometimes brother's wife."—Shakespeare, "Richard III."
- SOTTISH (Heb. לַחֲזוֹן, saw-kawl', Jer. 4:22), foolish. Fr. sol, a fool.
- SPICERY (Heb. תְּבַשְׂמִינִים, nek'-ohth, Gen. 37:25), aromatics.
- STAGGER (Gr. διακρίνω, dee-ak-ree'-no, Rom. 4:20), doubt, to waver. Once written "stacker."
- STAY (Heb. שָׁמַר, saw-mak', Isa. 26:3), to support. "Good husbandman . . . went to pitch props and stakes close unto their young plants to stay them up."—Pliny.
- STORY (Heb. מִשְׁתָּרְיָה, mid-raush', 2 Chron. 13:22), history. R. V., "commentary." "As many as know story or have any experience."—The Translators to the reader.
- STRAIN (Gr. διήλίζω, dee-oo-lid'-zo, Matt. 23:24), from hoo-lid'-zo, to filter. The early versions of Coverdale, Tyndale, and the Geneva had it "strain out," not "strain at," a gnat.
- STRAITLY (Gr. σπειλῆ, ap-i-lay', Acts 4:17), strictly, severely.
- STRAWED (Gr. σπρῶννύω, strone-nool'-o, Matt. 21:8), scatter, spread.
- STRIKE (Heb. חָטַף, naw-than', Exod. 12:7), to smear or rub.
- STUFF (Heb. כֶּלִי, kel-ee', 1 Sam. 10:22; Gen. 31:37), furniture, baggage.
- SUBSTANCE (Gr. ὑπαρξις, hoopt-are'-is, Heb. 10:34), property. Wyclif has "a better and a dwellynge substance."
- SWADDLING BAND (Heb. חֲבִילֵי מִלְבָּשׁ, khath-ool-law', Job 38:9), swathing cloth.
- TABERING (Heb. תַּבְעֵרָה, taw-faf', Nah. 2:7), to beat or play upon the tambourine.
- TABLE (Gr. πινυκίδιον, pin-uk-id'-ee-on, Luke 1:63), a writing tablet.
- TABLET (Heb. טַבְעֵלָה, koo-mawz', Exod. 35:22). This was not used in the sense of a tablet, but an ornament or necklace.
- TABRET (Heb. תֹּפֵף, tofe, Gen. 31:27; Job 17:6), a tambourine.
- TACHE (Heb. כֶּהֶלֶס, keh'-res, Exod. 26:6), a clasp or fastening, as a buckle.
- TALE (Heb. תֹּכֵן, to'-ken, Exod. 5:18), a carefully counted number.
- TARE (Gr. σπαρίσσω, spar-as'-so, Mark 9:20), to convulse with epilepsy.
- TARGET (Heb. תֵּיִשָּׁבֵט, tsin-naw', 1 Kings 10:16; 2 Chron. 9:15), a small shield used in war.
- TELL (Heb. סָפַר, saw-far', Psa. 48:12), to count, reckon.
- TEMPER (Heb. בָּלַל, baw-lal', Exod. 29:2), to mix or compound. "To temper poisons for her."—Shakespeare.
- TEMPERANCE (Gr. εγκράτεια, eng-krat'-i-ah, Acts 24:25), self-control; not used exclusively, as now, in reference to abstinence from intoxicating drink, but it meant moderation in all things.
- TERRIBLENESS (Heb. מִרְיָא, mo-raw', Deut. 26:8), dread, terror.
- THANK (Gr. χάρις, khar'-ecc, Luke 6:32), reward.
- THANKWORTHY (Gr. χάρις, khar'-ecc, 1 Pet. 2:19), deserving thanks.
- THOUGHT (Gr. μεριμνάω, mer-im-nah'-o, Matt. 6:25), care, concern, or anxiety. Tyndale has it in 1 Cor. 9:9, "Doth God take thought for oxen." "Thou art a fool to take thought, for it will not amend thee."—Shakespeare.
- THRONG (Gr. θλίβω, thlee'-bo, Mark 3:9), to crowd. "To sht hand to hand, thy men so pestered behind that one thronged & overlaid an other."—Plutarch.
- THOROUGHLY (Gr. διακαθαρίζω, dee-ak-ath-ar-id'-zo, Matt. 3:12), to cleanse thoroughly, to winnow.
- THYNE WOOD (Gr. θύινος, thoo'-co-nos, Rev. 18:12), a fragrant wood, citron wood.
- TIRE (Heb. בִּצְבָא, yaw-tab', 2 Kings 9:30), to deck the head. Milton says, "A golden tiar circled his head."
- TITLE (Gr. τίτλος, titt'-los, John 19:19), the inscribed charge of crime, for which men were punished, publicly displayed, as, for example, on the cross of such as were crucified.
- TITTLE (Gr. κεραία, ker-ah'-yah, Matt. 5:18; Luke 16:17), something hornlike, the apex of a Hebrew letter. "It is in the Hebrew alphabet that the I, called "yot" or "yod," is the smallest of the letters, and that the tips of the letters afford so natural a figure of speech for the smallest tittle of the law."—Sharpe, Bible Texts Illus.
- TORMENTOR (Gr. βασανιστής, bas-an-is-tace', Matt. 18:34), executioner. "When master Latimer stood at the stake, and the tormentors were about to set the fire upon him."—Foxe, Acts.
- TRAFFICKER (Heb. כַּנְזָאן, ken-ah-ane-el', Isa. 23:8), merchant or tradesman.
- UNAWARES (Heb. יָדָה, yaw-dah', Psa. 35:8; Josh. 20:9), unexpectedly.
- UNCTION (Gr. χρίσμα, khrist'-mah, 1 John 2:20), anointing; still used in the Roman Catholic Church in reference to the sacrament called extreme unction.

- UNDERSSETTERS (Heb. כְּרָפֵף, kaw-thafel, 1 Kings 7:30), supports.
- UNICORNS (Heb. רָם, rame, Psa. 22:21), wild oxen. See R. V.
- UNIMPOSSIBLE (Matt. 17:20; Tyndale, ed. 1611, "unpossible"), impossible.
- UNPERFECT (Psa. 139:16; Wyclif, ed. 1611, "unperfit"), imperfect.
- UNWASHEN (Gr. ἀνίπτως, an-tp-tos, Matt. 15:20; Mark 7:2), unwashed.
- USED (Heb. לְבַד, im-mood', Exod. 21:36), accustomed.
- UTTER (Heb. נָגַד, naw-gad', Lev. 5:1), to disclose, to give information.
(Heb. חָצוּר, khce-tsonel, Ezek. 42:1), outer, outside.
- VAIN (Gr. μάταιος, mat-ah-yos, James 1:26), empty, worthless.
- VAINGLORY (Gr. κενοδοξία, ken-od-ox-eet-ah, Phil. 2:3), self-conceit, empty glory. Marvin R. Vincent says: "In the Septuagint the word is used to describe the worship of idols as folly. The verb κενοδοξέω is used of following vain conceits about the truth."
- VANITY (Gr. ματαιότης, mat-ah-yot'-ace, Rom. 8:20), inutility, transientness.
- VAUNT (Gr. περπερένομαι, per-per-yoo'-om-ahce, 1 Cor. 13:4), to boast.
- VENISON (Heb. צֵדָה, tsay-daw', Gen. 27:3), flesh of beasts taken in hunting. Pliny writes of "the venison of elephant's flesh."
- VERILY (Gr. ἀμύην, am-awel, John 8:51, etc.), sure, firm, trustworthy.
- VERY (Gr. ἀληθώς, al-ay-thocel, John 7:26), original sense, true, as, "My very friend hath got his mortal hurt in my behalf."—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet."
- VESTURE (Heb. לְבָשׁ, leb-oosh', Gen. 41:42; Psa. 22:18), clothing.
- VEX (Gr. ὀχλέω, okh-leh'-o, Luke 6:18), to torment, harass. It signified a more serious trouble than its present use suggests.
- VIRTUE (Gr. δύναμις, doo'-nam-is, Mark 5:30), power, manly strength, might. "Be bold and comforted by our Lord and the power of his might."—Latimer. "The general end of God's external working is the exercise of his most glorious and most abundant virtue."—Hooker, Ecl. Polity.
- VOCATION (Gr. κλήσις, klayt'-sis, Eph. 4:1), calling. "We should tarry our vocation till God call us; we should have a calling of God."—Latimer.
- VOID (Heb. מְבוּקָה, meb-oo-kaw', Gen. 1:2), empty, waste.
- VOYAGE (Gr. πλοῦς, plot'-os, 2 Macc. 5:1). "Any journey was a voyage once, whether by land or sea."—R. C. T.
- WARE (Gr. φυλάσσω, foo-las'-so, Luke 8:27), past tense of wear. "I am his firstborn son, that was the last that ware the imperial diadem of Rome."—Shakespeare.
- WARFARE (Gr. στρατεία, strat-t'-ah, 1 Cor. 9:7), military service, figurative of apostolic career.
- WASHPOT (Heb. סָרַף, see-raw', Psa. 60:8; 108:9), a vessel to wash in.
- WAX, WAXEN (Gr. γηράσκω, ghay-ras'-ko, Heb. 8:13), to grow. "Behold ye lilies of the field, how thei waxen."—Wyclif.
- WAYFARING (Heb. אָרַח, aw-rakh', Judg. 19:17; Isa. 33:8), traveling.
- WEALTHY (Heb. רָבִיב, rev-aw-yaw', Psa. 66:12), rich. The marg. of R. V. has it "abundance."
- WENCH (Heb. שִׁפְחָה, shif-khaw', 2 Sam. 17:17), a maid or servant, generally of low birth.
- WHETHER (Gr. τις, tis, Matt. 21:31), which of the two. "Whether of them twayne did the will of the father?"—Tyn.
- WHITED (Gr. κονιάω, kon-ee-ah'-o, Matt. 23:27; Mark 9:3), made white, whitened.
- WILL (Gr. θέλω, thel'-o, Mark 6:25; Rom. 9:16), to wish or desire. "He sent into the city to his friends, to will them to come unto him."—Plutarch.
- WILL-WORSHIP (Gr. ἐθειλορησκία, eth-el-oth-racc-kil'-ah, Col. 2:23), piety, sanctimony. Wyclif has it "chosen holiness;" Cranmer, "superstition;" Geneva, "voluntarie worshipping."
- WIMPLE (Heb. מִטְפָּחָת, mit-pakh'-ath, Isa. 3:22), a linen cloth or covering for the neck. "For she had layd her mournfull stole aside, and widow-like sad wimple throwne away."—Spenser, "Faerie Queene."
- WINK AT (Gr. ὑπερίδω, hoop-er-U-do, Acts 17:30), to connive at or countenance. Literally, to close the eyes.
- WINTER (Heb. חָרַף, khaw-raf', Isa. 18:6), to be winter, from a root signifying the crop or harvest gathered; hence, autumn and winter.
- WISE (Gr. οὕτως, hoo'-toce, Matt. 1:18), on this wise, on this way, like this.
- WISH (Gr. ἐύχομαι, yoo'-khom-ahce, Acts 27:29), to earnestly long for; more emphatic than the common use of the word.
- WIT (Heb. יָדַע, yaw-dah', Gen. 24:21), to know. O. E. witan.
(Heb. חָכְמָה, khok-maw', Psa. 107:27), understanding, sense, knowledge.
- WITCH (Heb. כַּשְׁפָּה, kaw-shaf', Deut. 18:10), wizard, sorcerer. In Acts 8:9 Wyclif has "Symount, a witche."
- WITHAL (Gr. ἀμα, ham'-ah, Col. 4:3), also, in connection with. It signifies close relationship.

WITHDRAWN (Heb. נָדַח, naw-dakh, Deut. 13:13), drawn away; always transitive in A. V.

WITTINGLY (Heb. יָדַע, saw-ka', Gen. 48:14), knowingly, understandingly.

WITTY (Heb. מְצִיחָה, mez-im-maw', Prov. 8:12). The word originally meant not a humorous or smart expression, but skill, ingenuity, cunning.

WOE WORTH (Heb. הָוָה, haw, Ezek. 30:2), an expression of despair, as, "Woe be to the day! Ah! Alas!" The opposite state of feeling indicated by "well worth," as by Coverdale, "Well worth the Corinthians, for though they were fallen into abuse about this holy mystery, and about other things, we read not that they spurned against the Holy Spirit."

WORKFELLOW (Gr. συνεργός, soon-er-gos', Rom. 16:21), a fellow-workman, as our modern term coadjutor.

WORSHIP (Gr. δόξα, dox'-ah, Luke 14:10), reverence, dignity. "Aye, but give me worship and quietness."—Shakespeare. "If any man serve me, my fadir schal worship hym."—Wyclif. "With my body I thee worship."—"Marriage Service."

WORTHY (Gr. ἀξίος, ax'-ee-os, Luke 12:48), suitable, deserving, meritorious.

WOT (Heb. יָדַע, yaw-dah', Gen. 21:26), know.

WOULD (Heb. אַחֲ-אֵלֶּיךָ, akh-al-ah'ee), an exclamation, as "Would God!"

WREST (Heb. נָתַח, naw-taw', Exod. 23:2), to pervert, to twist. "Some there be that labour by wrestynge of the Scriptures to pulle themselves from under due obedience."—Lever, Sermons.

WROUGHT (Heb. הָלַךְ, haw-lak', Jonah 1:11), to walk or exercise, to go to and fro, restless. "The sea works high, and the wind is loud."—Shakespeare. Tholuck says, "To man everything forbidden appears as a desirable blessing; but yet, as it is forbidden, he feels that his freedom is limited, and now his lust rages more violently like the waves against the dike."

YEARN (Heb. קָמַח, kaw-mar', Gen. 43:30), literally to shrivel as by heat, hence to warm with passion or emotion. "No: for my manly heart doth yearn."—Shakespeare.
