(2) Calvinistic view. The Calvinistic types of theology regard the fall in two ways: (1) The supralapsarian, or most rigid view, includes the fall under the divine decree. (2) The sublapsarian, the less rigid but less logically consistent view, represents the divine decree as relating to the condition produced by the fall. Out from the race fallen in Adam God elected a certain number to salvation. The human race is not in a state of probation. The sin of our first parents closed the probationary period of human history.

(3) Arminian view. The Arminian theology regards the fall not as predetermined by a divine decree, but as foreseen and provided against by divine grace. It asserts that but for the redemptive purpose of God in Christ the race of fallen descendants of Adam would not have been permitted to come into existence. When man fell he did not "fall upward," but he fell into the arms of redeeming mercy. Probation is still the condition of mankind. For though man is fallen and therefore under the bondage of sin, through Christ, the second Adam, man has his moral freedom restored to such an extent that he can avail himself of the provisions that God has made for his salvation.

FALLOW DEER. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FALLOW GROUND (Heb. נִיר, neer), a field plowed up and left for seeding; as summer fallow, properly conducted, is a sure method of destroying weeds (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:12).

FALLOW YEAR. See SABBATH.

FALSE CHRISTS (Gr. ψευδοχριστοι, psuedokh'ris-toi), those who falsely claim to be Messiah foretold by Jesus (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22). Nothing is known of the historical fulfillment of this prophecy, but Josephus (Wars, vii, 11, 1) mentions Jonathan as a pretender.

FALSE PROPHET, one pretending to be sent from God, a false teacher (Matt. 7:15; 24:11, 24, etc.). "The false prophet" (Rev. 16:13) is used for the second "beast," the mythological system of paganism.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS (Heb. אֲרוֹב, obe, a mumble from a leathern bottle). Those professing to call up the dead were said to have a "familiar spirit" (Deut. 18:11; 2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron. 33:6, etc.). The expression sometimes means a spirit or demon supposed to attend on an individual or to come at his call (Lev. 19:31; 2 Kings 21:6), or the shade or departed spirit thus evoked (Isa. 29:4). A person with a familiar spirit was called an obe (bottle) because he was supposed to be inflated by the spirit. See MAGIC; GLOSSARY.

FAMILY. The family relation is the institution of God lying at the foundation of all human society. Christian ethics leave nothing wanting of the main elements of that institution. It confirms monogamy: "From the beginning of the creation God made them, male and female. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife" (Matt. 19:5; Mark 10:6, 7). So Christian legislation is clear and positive respecting the relation of marriage, of parents and children, of masters and servants, and the regulation of all the household. Parental obligations include the maintenance of children (1 Tim. 5:8) and their education in its fullest sense (Exod. 12:26, 27; Deut. 6:6, 7; Eph. 6:4).

The filial obligations are obedience (Luke 2:51; Eph. 6:1; Col. 3:20), reverence (Exod. 20:12; comp. Eph. 6:1, 2), and grateful requital (1 Tim. 5:4; comp. John 19:26). The moral teaching of Christianity has a very marked bearing on the relation between master and servants. Although the mutual rights, duties, and responsibilities are not in their widest range matter of direct statute in the Scriptures, the principles laid down by Paul are of permanent application. On the employer's side there is the obligation of justice (Col. 4:1); on the side of the servants there is enjoined the duty of obedience, fidelity, and honesty (Tit. 2:9, 10; Col. 3:22, 23; Eph. 6:5, 6). Thus the family occupies a prominent place throughout Scripture, is the first form of society, and has continued to be the germ and representative of every fellowship (Pope, Christ. Theol., iii; Westcott, Social Aspects of Christianity, p. 19, sq.).

FAMILY, or FATHER'S HOUSE, one of the divisions of the people of Israel. See ISRAEL, CLASSIFICATION OF.

FAMINE (Heb. רָעָב, rae-avb'; Gr. λιμός, lee-mos') occupies a conspicuous place in Scripture among the troubles with which God's people had to contend. It is mentioned as one of the scourges which God sent to chastise men for their wickedness (Lev. 26:21, 26; Psa. 105:16; Lam. 4:4-6; Ezek. 14:21).

1. Causes. Several causes of famine are given: (1) God's blessing withheld (Hos. 2:8, 9; Hag. 1:6); (2) Want of seasonable rain (1 Kings 17:1; Jer. 14:1-4; Amos 4:7, sq.). "In Egypt a deficiency in the rise of the Nile, with drying winds, produces the same results. The famines recorded in the Bible are traceable to both these phenomena; and we generally find that Egypt was resorted to when scarcity afflicted Palestine. In the whole of Syria and Arabia the fruits of the earth must ever be dependent on rain, the watersheds having few large springs and the small rivers not being sufficient for the irrigation of even the level lands. If, therefore, the heavy rains of November and December fail the sustenance of the people is cut off in the parching drought of harvest time, when the country is almost devoid of moisture" (Smith, Dict., s. v.). (3) Rotting of seed in the ground (Joel 1:17); (4) Blasting and mildew (Amos 4:9; Hag. 2:17); (5) Devastation by enemies (Deut. 28:33, 51). In addition to the above causes may be given the imperfect knowledge of agriculture which prevailed, in consequence of which men had few resources to stimulate, or in unfavorable seasons and localities, to aid the productive powers of nature. Means of transit were defective, rendering it often impossible to relieve the wants of one region even when there was plenty in another. Despotic governments and frequent wars and desolation greatly interrupted agricultural industry.

2. Characteristics. These famines were often long continued (Gen. 41:27) and of great severity (Gen. 12:10; 2 Kings 8:1; Jer. 52:6), accompanied with wars (Jer. 14:15; 29:18), and followed by pestilence (Jer. 42:17; Ezek. 7:15; Matt. 24:7). During the time of famine people fed upon wild herbs (2 Kings 4:39, 40), asses' flesh and ordure (2 Kings 6:25; Lam. 4:5) and human flesh (Lev. 26:29; 2 Kings 6:28, 29), while provisions were sold by weight and water by measure (Ezek. 4:16).

3. Instances. Famines are mentioned as occurring in the days of Abraham (Gen. 12:10), of Isaac (26:1), of Joseph (41:53-56), of the Judges (Ruth 1:1), of David (2 Sam. 21:1), of Ahab (1 Kings 17:1; 18:2), of Elisha (2 Kings 4:38), during the siege of Samaria (2 Kings 6:25), in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. 14:1, sq.), during the siege of Jerusalem (2 Kings 25:3), after the captivity (Neh. 5:3), in the reign of Claudius Cæsar (Acts 11:28), before the destruction of Jerusalem (Matt. 24:7).

Figurative. Famine is symbolic of the withdrawal of God's word (Amos 8:11, 12) and the destruction of idols (Zeph. 2:11).

FAN (Heb. פָּנִי, zaw-raw', to toss about; מִזְרָה, miz-reh'; Gr. πῑον, ptoo'-on), a sort of long-handled, wooden shovel, with which grain was thrown up against the wind in order to separate the chaff therefrom (Isa. 30:24; Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17). At the present day in Syria a large wooden fork is used.

Figurative. To fan is used in the sense of to scatter, as enemies (Isa. 41:16); to "fan at the gates" (Jer. 15:7) is to cause defeat and dispersion on the border of the land; "whose fan is in his hand" (Matt. 3:12) refers to Christ as judge, separating evil from good.

FANNERS (Heb. זָרִי, zoor, strangers), rendering in the A. V. (Jer. 51:2), but properly "strangers," and so translated in the R. V.

FASHION, FASHIONING. See GLOSSARY.

FAST, FASTING (Heb. צָוַם, tsoom, to cover the mouth; Gr. νηστεῖα, nace-tyoo'-o, to abstain). In the early ages men subsisted largely upon the spontaneous productions of the earth and the spoils of the chase; and owing to the uncertainty of obtaining food fasting was often compulsory. Superstitious ignorance could easily interpret this compulsion into an expression of the divine will, and so consider fasting as a religious duty. It was thought that the gods were jealous of the pleasures of men, and that abstinence would propitiate their favor. As a result we find that fasting as a religious duty is almost universal.

1. Jewish. The word fasting (Heb. tsoom) is not found in the Pentateuch, but often occurs in the historical books (2 Sam. 12:16; 1 Kings 21:9-12; Ezra 8:21) and the prophets (Isa. 58:3-5; Joel 1:14; 2:15; Zech. 8:19, etc.). The expression used in the law is "afflicting the soul" (Lev. 16:29-31; 23:27; Num. 30:13), implying the sacrifice of the personal will, which gives to fasting all its value. (1) Observance. The Jewish fasts were observed with various degrees of strictness. When the fast lasted only a single day it was the practice to abstain from food of every kind from evening to evening, whereas in the case of private fasts of a more prolonged character it was merely the ordinary food that was abstained from. To manifest a still profounder humbling of the soul before God in repentance and mortification on account of one's sin and the punishment with which it had been visited it was not unusual to put on sackcloth, rend the garments, and scatter ashes over the head (2 Sam. 13:19; 1 Kings 21:27; 1 Macc. 3:47; Lam. 2:10; Jonah 3:5, sq.). In 1 Sam. 7:6 it is said that Israel "drew water, and poured it out before the Lord, and fasted on that day." To "pour out thine heart like water" (Lam. 2:19) seems to denote inward dissolution through pain and misery. In connection with the fast it would be a practical confession of misery and an act of deepest humiliation before the Lord. (2) Different fasts. (1) The Mosaic law prescribed only one public occasion of strict fasting, viz., once a year on the great Day of Atonement (q. v.). This observance seems always to have retained some prominence as "the fast" (Acts 27:9). But as to the nature of the observance we are nowhere expressly informed, excepting that food was interdicted from evening to evening (Lev. 23:27-29). (2) The Hebrews, in the earlier period of their history, were in the habit of fasting whenever they were in hard and trying circumstances (1 Sam. 1:7), misfortune, and bereavement (1 Sam. 20:34; 31:13; 2 Sam. 1:12), in the prospect of threatened judgments of God (2 Sam. 12:16; 1 Kings 21:27), on occasions of falling into grievous sin (Ezra 10:6), or to avert heavy calamity (Esth. 4:1, sq.). (3) Extraordinary fasts were appointed by the theocratic authorities on occasions of great national calamity in order that the people might humble themselves before the Lord on account of their sins, thus avert his wrath, and get him to look upon them again with his favor (Judg. 20:26; 1 Sam. 7:6; 2 Chron. 20:3; Joel 1:14; 2:12; Jer. 36:9; Ezra 8:21; Neh. 1:4; 2 Macc. 13:12).

2. Post-Exilic. There is no mention of any other periodical fast than that on the Day of Atonement in the Old Testament, except in Zech. 7:1-7; 8:19. These anniversary fast days were observed from about the time of the captivity, and were as follows: (1) The seventeenth day of the fourth month, viz., Tammuz, or July. This fast was instituted in memory of the capture of Jerusalem (Jer. 52:6, 7; Zech. 8:19). (2) The ninth day of the fifth month, Ab, or August, in memory of the burning of the temple (2 Kings 25:8; Zech. 7:3; 8:19). (3) The third of the seventh month, Tishri, or October, in memory of the death of Gedaliah (Jer. 40:4; Zech. 7:5; 8:19). (4) The tenth day of the tenth month, Tebeth, or January, in memory of the commencement of the attack on Jerusalem (Zech. 8:19; 2 Kings 25:1; Jer. 52:4).

(5) The fast of ESTHER (q. v.), kept on the thirteenth of Adar (Esth. 4:16). "Subsequent to the captivity, and with the growth of the Pharisaic spirit, the fasts became much more frequent generally, till ere long they assumed the form of ordinary pious exercises, so that the Pharisees fasted regularly on the second and fifth day of every week (Matt. 9:14; Luke 18:12), while other Jewish sects, such as the Essenes and Therapeutae, made their whole worship to consist principally of fasting. There was, however, no fasting on the Sabbath, on festival and gala days in Israel, and on the day immediately preceding the Sabbath or a festival" (Judith 8:6). That in the lapse of time the practice of fasting was lamentably abused is shown by the testimony of the prophets (Isa. 58:4, sq.; Jer. 14:12; Zech. 7:5).

3. New Testament. In the New Testament the only references to the Jewish fasts are the mention of "the fast" in Acts 27:9 (generally understood to denote the Day of Atonement) and the allusions to the weekly fasts (Matt. 9:14; Mark 2:18; Luke 5:33; 18:12; Acts 10:30). These fasts originated some time after the captivity. They were observed on the second and fifth days of the week, which being appointed as the days for public fasts (because Moses was supposed to have ascended the Mount for the second tables of the law on a Thursday and to have returned on a Monday) seem to have been selected for these private voluntary fasts.

Our Lord sternly rebuked the Pharisees for their hypocritical pretenses in the fasts which they observed (Matt. 6:16, sq.) and abstained from appointing any fast as part of his own religion (Matt. 9:14; 11:18, 19). Prayer and fasting are mentioned (Matt. 17:21; Mark 9:29) as means for promoting faith and as good works. Mention is made of fasting in the Apostolic Church (Acts 13:3; 14:23; 2 Cor. 6:5). In the last passage the apostle probably refers to voluntary fasting, as in chap. 11:27 he makes a distinction between fasting and "hunger and thirst."

4. Christian Church. After the Jewish custom fasting was frequently joined with prayer that the mind, unincumbered with earthly matter, might devote itself with less distraction to the contemplation of divine things. As the Pharisees were accustomed to fast twice a week, on Monday and Thursday, the Christians appointed Wednesday and especially Friday as days of half fasting or abstinence from flesh in commemoration of the passion and crucifixion of Jesus. They did this with reference to the Lord's words, "When the bridegroom shall be taken from them, then shall they fast" (Matt 9:15).

In the 2d century arose also the custom of quadragesimal fasts before Easter, which, however, differed in length in different countries, being sometimes reduced to forty hours, sometimes extended to forty days, or at least to several weeks. Perhaps equally ancient are the nocturnal fasts or vigils before the high festivals, suggested by the example of the Lord and the apostles. On special occasions the bishops appointed extraordinary fasts and applied the money saved to charitable purposes, a usage which became often a blessing to the poor.

By the 6th century fasting was made obligatory by the Second Council of Orleans (A. D. 541), which decreed that anyone neglecting to observe the stated time of abstinence should be treated as an offender. In the 8th century it was regarded as meritorious, and failure to observe subjected the offender to excommunication. In the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches fasting remains obligatory, while in most Protestant Churches it is merely recommended (see Keil, Bib. Arch., ii, 442, sq.; Jahn, Arch., p. 464; Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, i, 324).

FAT. See GLOSSARY.

FAT (Heb. כֶּסֶל, khay'-leb). "The Hebrews distinguished between the suet or pure fat of an animal and the fat which was intermixed with the lean (Neh. 8:10). Certain restrictions were imposed upon them in reference to the former: some parts of the suet, viz., about the stomach, the entrails, the kidneys, and the tail of a sheep, which grows to an excessive size in many Eastern countries and produces a large quantity of rich fat, were forbidden to be eaten in the case of animals offered to Jehovah in sacrifice (Lev. 3:3, 9, 17; 7:3, 23). The ground of the prohibition was that the fat was the richest part of the animal, and therefore belonged to God (3:16). The presentation of the fat as the richest part of the animal was agreeable to the dictates of natural feeling, and was the ordinary practice even of heathen nations. The burning of the fat of sacrifices was particularly specified in each kind of offering" (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

Figurative. Next to blood, the bearer of life (Lev. 17:14), stood the fat as the sign of healthfulness and vigor. "The fat of the earth," "the fat of the wheat, of the oil, and the wine," even "the fat of the mighty," though to our view somewhat peculiar expressions were familiar to the Hebrews, as indicating the choicest specimens or examples of the several objects in question (Gen. 45:18; Deut. 32:14; Num. 18:12, marg. "Fat;" 2 Sam. 1:22). See GLOSSARY.

FATHER (Heb. אב, avb; Gr. πατήρ, pat-ayr', literally nourisher, protector).

1. Meanings. This word, besides its natural sense of progenitor (Gen. 19:31; 44:19, etc.), has a number of other meanings, as: (1) Any ancestor, near or remote (1 Kings 15:11; 2 Kings 14:3), e. g., a grandfather (Gen. 28:13; 31:42; 32:9, etc.); a great grandfather (Num. 18:2; 1 Kings 15:11, 24, etc.); frequently in the plural fathers, i. e., forefathers (Gen. 15:15; Psa. 45:16). (2) Founder, i. e., the first ancestor of a tribe or nation (Gen. 10:21; 17:4, 5; 19:37, etc.). Here we may refer to Gen. 4:21 ("the father of all such as handle the harp and organ," i. e., the founder of a family of musicians, the inventor of the art of music. Jabal was "the father of those who dwell in tents" (Gen. 4:20). The author of a family or society of persons animated by the same spirit as himself; thus Abraham was "the father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4:11). The author or maker of anything, especially a creator ("hath the rain a father?" Job 38:28). In this sense God is called the father of men and angels (Isa. 63:16; 64:8; Eph. 3:14, 15, etc.). He is also called the Father of lights, i. e., stars (James 1:17). The above topical senses come from the notion of source, origin; others are drawn from the idea of paternal love and care, the honor due a father, etc. (3) Benefactor, as doing good and providing for others as a father (Job 29:16, "I was a father to the poor"). Eliakim, the prefect of the palace, was called "a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem" (Isa. 22:21). The Messiah is the "everlasting father" (Isa. 9:6); God, the father of the righteous and of kings (2 Sam. 7:14; 1 Chron. 17:13, 22; Psa. 89:26). (4) Teacher, from the idea of paternal instruction (1 Sam. 10:12); priests and prophets were called father, as teachers (2 Kings 2:12; 5:13, etc.). In a similar sense the prime minister, as chief adviser, is called the king's father (Gen. 45:8). (5) Intimate relationship, as, "I have said to corruption, Thou art my father" (Job 17:14).

2. Place and Authority. The position and authority of the father as the head of the family is expressly assumed and sanctioned in Scripture as a likeness of that of the Almighty over his creatures. It lies, of course, at the root of that so-called patriarchal government (Gen. 3:16; 1 Cor. 11:3), which was introductory to the more definite system that followed, but did not wholly supersede it. "While the father lived he continued to represent the whole family, the property was held in his name, and all was under his superintendence and control. His power, however, was by no means unlimited or arbitrary, and if any occasion arose for severe discipline or capital punishment in his family he was not himself to inflict it, but to bring the matter before the constituted authorities" (Deut. 21:18-21). The children, and even the grandchildren, continued under the roof of the father and grandfather; they labored on his account and were the most submissive of his servants. The property of the soil, the power of judgment, the civil rights belonged to him only, and his sons were merely his instruments and assistants. The father's blessing was regarded as conferring special benefit, but his malediction special injury, to those on whom it fell (Gen. 9:25, 27; 27:27-40; 48:15, 20; ch. 49); and so also the sin of a parent was held to affect, in certain cases, the welfare of his descendants (2 Kings 5:27). The father, as the head of the household, had the obligation imposed upon him of bringing up his children in the fear of God, making them well acquainted with the precepts of the law, and generally acting as their instructor and guide (Exod. 12:26; Deut. 6:20, etc.). Filial duty and obedience to both parents were strictly enforced by Moses (Exod. 20:12), and any outrage against either parent, as a blow (Exod. 21:15), a curse (v. 17; Lev. 20:9), or incorrigible rebellion against their authority (Deut. 21:18, sq.), was made a capital offense.

FATHER, GOD THE, is a term which represents several scriptural conceptions.

1. The term designates the first person of the Holy Trinity. God has revealed himself as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. To the Eternal Son the Father stands related as to no other being, and finds in the Son the perfect and infinite object of his love. With this highest meaning in view the apostles speak of God as "the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ" (see Eph. 1:17; 1 Cor. 8:6; 1 Pet.

1:3). Thus also, while Christ taught his disciples to address God in prayer as "our Father," he did not use that form himself. He spoke of God as "my Father" and "your Father," but at the same time he made it plain that he distinguished between the relation in which they stood to God and that in which he himself stood. The first words of the Apostolic Creed, "I believe in God the Father Almighty," are first of all a recognition of this deep truth of holy Scriptures. See TRINITY.

2. In the Old Testament Scriptures God is in quite a number of conspicuous instances called the Father of the Jewish nation. The chosen nation owed its origin and continued existence to his miraculous power and special care. As their father he loved, pitied, rebuked, and required the obedience of his people (see Deut. 32:6; Hos. 11:1; Psa. 103:13; 68:5; Mal. 1:6).

3. In the New Testament, which brings the fact of the fatherhood of God into greater prominence and distinctness, God is represented as the Father of various objects and orders of beings which he has created. The term thus used refers to the natural relationship between God and his creatures, and has a significance more or less profound according to the different natures and capacities of these objects or orders of beings. Thus God is "the Father of lights," the heavenly bodies (James 1:17). Also he is "the Father of spirits" (Heb. 12:9). He is particularly the Father of man, created after his image (Acts 17:26; Luke 3:8).

4. God is in a special sense the Father of his redeemed and saved people. While all the hope of the Gospel rests upon the fact of the fatherly love of God for mankind even in its sinfulness (see John 3:16; Luke 15:11-32), still only they who are actually saved through Jesus Christ are admitted to the privileges of children in the divine household. Christ taught only his disciples to pray "our Father." He said to the unbelieving Jews, "Ye are of your father, the devil" (John 8:44). The spiritual and moral relationship destroyed by sin must be restored by gracious, divine renewal (John 1:12; Rom. 8:14-16, et al.). See ADOPTION.—E. McC.

FATHER-IN-LAW.—1. Khawm (Heb. כַּוֵּן, from כָּוַן), to join in affinity (Gen. 38:13, 25; 1 Sam. 4:19, 21).

2. Khaw-than' (Heb. כַּוְּתָן, to marry), one giving a daughter in marriage (Exod. 3:1; 4:18; 18:1-27; Num. 10:29, etc.).

3. Pen-ther-os' (Gr. πνεθερός), strictly one related by affinity, a wife's father (John 18:13).

FATHER'S BROTHER (Heb. אֲבִי, dode), strictly one beloved (Isa. 5:1); an uncle (Num. 36:11; 2 Kings 24:17); in Exod. 6:20 used in the feminine, FATHER'S SISTER, an AUNT.

FATHER'S HOUSE, the name given to families among the Israelites (Josh. 22:14; comp. 7:14, 16-18). See ISRAEL, CLASSIFICATION OF.

FATHOM. See METROLOGY, I.

FATLING. 1. An animal put up to be fattened for slaughter (Heb. מֵרֵעֵי, mer-ee', 2 Sam. 6:13; 1 Kings 4:23; Isa. 11:6; Ezek. 39:18; Matt. 22:4).

2. A marrowy sheep (q. v.), especially of the fat-tailed variety (Heb. מֵיֵשׁ, may'-akh, Psa. 66:15).

3. Improperly for Mish-nel' (Heb. מִשְׁנֵל, repetition, 1 Sam. 15:9). These were "animals of the second birth, which were considered superior to the others" (K. and D., Com., in loco).

FATTED FOWL (Heb. בְּרִירִים אֲבוֹסִים, bar-boo-ream' ay-boo-seem') are mentioned among the daily provisions for Solomon's table (1 Kings 4:23). The meaning of bar-boo-ream' is doubtful. The earlier translators render it birds or fowls, possibly "capons" or "geese" (from the Heb. בָּרַר, bar-rar', "to be pure," because of their white feathers). Some kind of special fowl is meant. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FEAR (Heb. יִרְאָה, yir-aw', reverence, and other Hebrew words meaning terror, Exod. 15:16, etc.; carefulness, Josh. 22:24, R. V.; trembling, Prov. 29:25; fright, Job 41:33; Gr. φόβος, fob'-os, dread, terror, Matt. 14:26, etc.). Fear is that affection of the mind which arises on the conception of approaching danger. The fear of God is of several kinds: Superstitious, which is the fruit of ignorance; servile, which leads to abstinence from many sins through apprehension of punishment; and filial, which has its spring in love, and prompts to care not to offend God and to endeavor in all things to please him. It is another term for practical piety and comprehends the virtues of the godly character (Psa. 111:10; Prov. 14:2), while its absence is characteristic of a wicked and depraved person (Rom. 3:18). It is produced in the soul by the Holy Spirit, and great blessing is pronounced upon those who possess this Christian trait: His angels protect them (Psa. 34:7); they are "under the shadow of the Almighty" (Psa. 91: 5, 6). This fear would subsist in a pious soul were there no punishment of sin. It dreads God's displeasure, desires his favor, reveres his holiness, submits cheerfully to his will, is grateful for his benefits, sincerely worships him, and conscientiously obeys his commandments. Fear and love must coexist in us in order that either passion may be healthy, and that we may please and rightly serve God. "The fear of the Lord" is used for the worship of God, e. g., "I will teach you the fear of the Lord" (Psa. 34:11), and for the law of God (19:9). The "fear of Isaac" (Gen. 31:42, 53) is God, whom Isaac worshiped with reverent awe. The "fear of man" is that dread of the opinions of our neighbors which makes us cowards in the performance of those duties which we fancy they do not practice (Prov. 29:25). See GLOSSARY.

FEAST. See BANQUET, FESTIVALS.

FEAST OF CHARITY. See AGAPE.

FEATHER. 1. No-tsaw' (Heb. נֹצֵף, or נִצְפָה), a pinion or wing feather (Ezek. 17:3, 7), but the excrement of the crop (Lev. 1:16, from נִצְפָה nav-tsaw', to expel).

2. Eb-raw' (Heb. אֲבָרָה), with the same meaning as No. 1 (Psa. 68:13; 91:4); incorrectly rendered wing (Deut. 32:11; Job 39:13).

3. Incorrectly for khas-ee-daw' (Heb. חֲסִידָה, kindly, maternal; Job 39:13).

FEEBLE KNEES (Gr. τὰ παραλελυμένα γόνατα), a term used to express the results of overexertion, as in an athletic contest, and, figuratively, of weariness of mind, low spirits (Heb. 12:12).

FEEBLE-MINDED (Gr. ὀλιγόψυχος, ol-ig-op'-soo-kos, little spirited), often occurs in the Septuagint, and signifies one who is laboring under such trouble that his heart sinks within him; and may mean here one despairing of working out his salvation (1 Thess. 5:14, R. V. "fainthearted").

FEELING. In Eph. 4:19 we find this, "who being past feeling have given themselves over to lasciviousness," etc. The Greek word ἀπαλγέω, ap-alg-eh'-o, means "to become insensible to pain, callous, and so indifferent to truth, honor, or shame." The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews (4:15) tells us that "we have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." Here we have the Greek συμπάθειω, sum-path-eh'-o, to feel for, to have compassion on. Dorner thus speaks of feeling as an element of man's nature: "In feeling he has existence within himself, in will he exists in a state of movement from self outward, in knowledge in movement from without inward. . . . Like the other spiritual faculties, so called, feeling is receptive of infinite as of finite truth. Feeling is a third element alongside of knowledge and will. The strength of feeling depending very much on individual mental temperament, this forms no security for the purity or healthiness of religious feeling. With respect to the contents of feeling, in religious feeling the reference to a definite idea of God will likewise exert an influence, and upon its accurate or confused character—in short, upon its completeness—will the nature of religion depend. A religion, for example, acquainted merely with God's physical attributes will stand lower than one that has heard of his holiness, or, still more, of his love. Feeling alone, occupied merely with self and brooding upon self, may easily become one-sided and selfish. Knowledge, as the product of revelation, we call illumination. Revelation must possess power by its contents to inspire and intensify the will, and under this aspect it is quickening, while the feeling (the spiritual consciousness of self or life) is enhanced in freedom and blessedness" (Dorner, Christ. Doct., ii, 109, 119, etc.).

FELIX (Gr. Φήλιξ, foy'-lix, happy), the Roman procurator before whom Paul was arraigned (Acts 24).

1. Elevation and Crimes. He was originally a slave, and for some unknown service was manumitted by Claudius Cæsar. He was appointed by this emperor procurator of Judea on the banishment of Ventidius Cumanus, probably A. D. 53. Suetonius speaks of the military honors which the emperor conferred upon him, and specifies his appointment as governor of the province of Judea, adding an innuendo which loses nothing by its brevity, viz., that he was the husband of three queens or royal ladies ("trium reginarum maritum"). Tacitus, in his History, declares that during his governorship in Judea he indulged in all kinds of cruelty and lust, exercising regal power with the disposition of a slave; and in his Annals (xi, 54) he represents Felix as considering himself licensed to commit any crime, relying on the influence which he possessed at court. Having a grudge against Jonathan, the high priest, who had expostulated with him on his misrule, he made use of Doras, an intimate friend of Jonathan, in order to get him assassinated by a gang of villains, who joined the crowds that were going up to the temple worship, a crime which led subsequently to countless evils by the encouragement which it gave to the Sicarii, or leagued assassins of the day, to whose excesses Josephus ascribes, under Providence, the overthrow of the Jewish state. While in office he became enamored of Drusilla, a daughter of King Herod Agrippa, who was married to Azizus, king of Emesa, and through the influence of Simon, a magician, prevailed upon her to consent to a union with him. With this adulteress Felix was seated when Paul reasoned before him (Acts 24:25). Another Drusilla is mentioned by Tacitus as being the (first) wife of Felix.

2. Hears Paul. Paul, having been arrested at Jerusalem, was sent by Claudius Lysias to Felix at Cæsarea (Acts 23:23, sq.), where he was confined in Herod's judgment hall till his accusers came. After five days they arrived, headed by Ananias, the high priest. Their case was managed by Tertullus, who, to conciliate Felix, expressed gratitude on the part of the Jews, "Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence" (24:1, 2). He then proceeded to accuse Paul, charging him, first, with sedition; secondly, with being "a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes;" and, thirdly, with an attempt to profane the temple at Jerusalem (vers. 5, 6). The evident purpose was to persuade Felix to give up the apostle to the Jewish courts, in which case his assassination would have been easily accomplished. Felix now gave the prisoner permission to speak, and the apostle, after briefly expressing his satisfaction that he had to plead his cause before one so well acquainted with Jewish customs, refuted Tertullus step by step. Felix deferred inquiry into the case for the present. "When Lysias comes down," he said, "I will know the uttermost of this matter." Meanwhile he placed him under the charge of the centurion who had brought him to Cæsarea (24:10-23). Some days after Felix came into the audience chamber with his wife Drusilla, and the prisoner was brought before them. As a faithful preacher he spoke to the Roman libertine and the profligate Jewish princess. As he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, "Felix trembled." But still nothing is decided, Felix saying, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee." We are informed why the governor shut his ears to conviction, and even neglected his official duty and kept his prisoner in cruel suspense: "He hoped also that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him" (vers. 24-26). Hence he frequently sent for Paul and had many conversations with him. But his hopes were unfulfilled, and he retained the apostle a prisoner for two years (v. 27).

3. Summoned to Rome. Meantime the political state of Judea grew more embarrassing. It was during the two years of Paul's imprisonment that disturbances took place in the streets of Cæsarea. In the end Felix was summoned to Rome, and the Jews followed him with their accusations. Thus it was that he was anxious "to show the Jews a pleasure," and "left Paul bound" (v. 27). At Rome he was saved from suffering the penalty due to his atrocities by the influence of his brother Pallas.

FELLOES (Heb. פֶּלְאֵס, khish-shook', conjoined), the curved pieces which joined together form the rim of a wheel (1 Kings 7:33).

FELLOW. 1. A contemptuous use of Hebrew (עֲשֵׂי, esh, 1 Sam. 29:4) Greek (ἀνὴρ, an'-ayr) words for man.

2. The rendering of ray'-ah (Heb. רֵעִי, re'ei), friend, associate, etc. (Exod. 2:13; Judg. 7:13, etc.), and of khav-bar' (Heb. חֵבֵר, chav-bar'), Eccles. 4:10).

3. The rendering of aw-meeth' (Heb. אֲוִמֵית, aw-meeth') in that remarkable passage, "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow" (Zech. 13:7). "The expression 'man, who is my nearest one,' implies much more than unity or community of vocation, or that he had to feed the flock like Jehovah. The idea of nearest one (or fellow) involves not only similarity in vocation, but community of physical or spiritual descent, according to which he whom God calls his neighbor cannot be a mere man, but can only be one who participates in the divine nature or is essentially divine." This passage is quoted and applied to himself by our Lord (Matt. 26:31).

FELLOWSHIP. 1. The rendering of the Hebrew tes-oo-meth' (תְּשׁוּמֵת, tes-oo-meth'), deposit (Lev. 6:2); something handed over as a pledge.

2. Joint interest (Heb. חֵבֵר, khav-bar', to be joined, Psa. 94:20; Gr. κοινωνία, koy-nohn-ee'-ah, fellowship, communion, Acts 2:42 et al.; μετοχή, met-okh-ay', partnership, 2 Cor. 6:14).

Fellowship means companionship, a relation in which parties hold something in common, familiar intercourse. Christians have fellowship with the Father and the Son (1 John 1:3) and the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14), and with one another (1 John 1:7). As is the case between men, no one can be in fellowship with God unless he possess like purposes and feelings (1 John 2:3-6), with love (Rom. 8:38, 39). The fellowship of believers embraces confession of faults one to another with prayer (James 5:16); assembly, with exhortation and provoking to love and good works (Mal. 3:16; Heb. 10:24, 25); partaking the Lord's supper (1 Cor. 11:24, 25); "ministering to the saints" (Acts 11:29; Rom. 12:13; 15:25; 1 Cor. 16:1, 2; 2 Cor. 8:4; Heb. 13:16); bearing the infirmities of the weak and edification (Rom. 15:1). Love for and fellowship with one another are necessary to, and an evidence of fellowship with God (1 John 4:12). Christ prayed that his people might have fellowship with each other (John 17:21). Fellowship with God is essential to fruitfulness (John 15:4).

FENCE (Heb. גֵּזֵר, gaw-dare', an inclosure; Num. 22:24; Psa. 62:3; 80:12). Fences were built of un-mortared stones, to protect cultivated lands, sheepfolds, etc. In the crevices of such fences serpents delighted to hide (Eccles. 10:8; comp. Amos 5:19).

Figurative. In Psa. 62:3 the wicked are compared to a tottering fence and bowing wall, i. e., their destruction comes suddenly: See HEDGE.

FENCED CITY, the rendering of several Hebrew words; sometimes translated "stronghold" (2 Chron. 11:11), "fort" (Isa. 29:3). The broad distinction between a city and a village in biblical language consisted in the possession of walls. The city had walls, the village was un-walled or had only a watchman's tower, to which the villagers resorted in times of danger. A threefold distinction is thus obtained: (1) Cities; (2) un-walled villages; (3) villages with castles or towers (1 Chron. 27:25). The district east of the Jordan, forming the kingdoms of Moab and Bashan, is said to have abounded from very early times in castles and fortresses, such as were built by Uzziah to protect the cattle and to repel the inroads of the neighboring tribes, besides un-walled towns (Deut. 3:5; 2 Chron. 26:10). When the Israelites entered Canaan they found many fenced cities (Num. 13:28; 32:17; Josh. 11:12, 13; Judg. 1:27-33), some of which held out for a long period, e. g., Jerusalem was held by the Jebusites till the time of David (2 Sam. 5:6, 7; 1 Chron. 11:5). See CITIES, FORTIFICATIONS.

FENS. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

FERRET (R. V. "gecko"). See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FERRYBOAT (Heb. גַּבְרֵי, ab-aw-raw', crossing), a vessel for crossing a stream (2 Sam. 19:18). Floats or rafts for this purpose were used from remote times (1 Kings 5:9, and paintings on Egyptian monuments). A ferryboat still crosses the Jordan ford near Jericho.

FERVENT. See GLOSSARY.

FESTIVALS. Besides the daily worship, the law prescribed special festivals to be from time to time observed by the congregation. One Hebrew name for festival was khag (חַג), from the verb signifying to dance, which, when applied to religious services, indicated that they were occasions of joy and gladness. The term most fitly designating, and which alone actually comprehended all the feasts, was mo-ade' (מוֹעֵד, a set time or assembly, place of assembly). What is meant by this name, therefore, was the stated assemblies of the people—the occasions fixed by the divine appointment for their being called and meeting together in holy fellowship, i. e., for acts and purposes of worship. There is also the Greek éopri, heb-or-tay', festival, holy day.

The date of every Mosaic festival without distinction, no matter what its special object may have been, gave evidence of being connected in some way or other with the number seven. So every seventh day, every seventh month, every seventh year, and, lastly, the year that came after the lapse of seven times seven years, was marked by a festival. Again, the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles extended over seven days; the number of special convocations (q. v.) during the year was seven—two at the Passover, one at the Pentecost, one at the Feast of Trumpets (or New Moon), one on the Day of Atonement, and two at the Feast of Tabernacles. All the festivals instituted by the law of Moses may be arranged in two series, Septenary and Yearly. In addition are the Post-Exilic and Doubtful Festivals. See table below:

TABLE OF FEASTS.

SEPTENARY FESTIVALS, or Cycles of Sabbaths, including:

Weekly Sabbath (Exod. 20:8-11; 31:12, sq.; Lev. 23:1-3).

Seventh New Moon, or Feast of Trumpets (Num. 28:11-15; 29:1-6).

Sabbatic Year, i. e., every seventh year (Exod. 23:10, 11; Lev. 25:2-7).

Year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:8-16; 27:16-25).
New Moon (Num. 10:10; 28:11).

YEARLY FESTIVALS:
Feast of Passover and Unleavened Bread (Exod. 12:1-28; 23:5, sq.; Lev. 23:4-8; Num. 28:16-25; Deut. 18:1-8).

Pentecost, or Feast of Weeks (Exod. 34:22; Lev. 23:15; Num. 28:26; Deut. 16:10).

Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:1-34; Exod. 30:10-30; Num. 29:7-11).

Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:34-42; Num. 29:12, sq.; Neh. 8:18; John 7:2, 37).

POST-EXILIC FESTIVALS, some of which were kept as regularly as those prescribed by Moses:

Feast of Purim (Esth. 9:24-32).

Feast of Dedication (1 Macc. 4:52, sq.; 2 Macc. 10:6, sq.; John 10:22).

Also, DOUBTFUL FESTIVALS, mentioned by Josephus and the Talmud:

Wood-carrying; of Acra; of Nicanor; of Joy in the Lord.

These festivals are treated in this article in the above order.

I. SEPTENARY FESTIVALS.

1. The Weekly Sabbath. In addition to entire cessation from all work the Sabbath was observed by a holy assembly, the doubling of the morning and evening sacrifices (Num. 28:9, sq.), and the presentation of new showbread in the Holy Place (Lev. 24:8). See SABBATH.

2. The Seventh New Moon, or Feast of Trumpets (Heb. יוֹם תְּרוּמָה, yome ter-oo-aw', day of blowing, Num. 29:1), the Feast of the New Moon (q. v.), which fell on the seventh month, or Tishri. This differed from the ordinary festivals of the new moon on account of the symbolical meaning of the seventh or sabbatical month, and partly, perhaps, because it marked the beginning of the civil year. This month was distinguished above all the other months of the year for the multitude of ordinances connected with it, the first day being consecrated to sacred rest and spiritual employment, the tenth being the Day of Atonement, while the fifteenth began the Feast of Tabernacles. (1) Sacrifices. (a) The usual morning and evening sacrifices, with their meat and drink offerings. (b) The ordinary sacrifice for the New Moon, except the sin offering, viz., two young bullocks, one ram, seven yearling lambs, with their meat and drink offerings (Num. 28:11, sq.). (c) Another festive offering of one young bullock, one ram, seven lambs, with their meat and drink offerings, together with "one kid of the goats for a sin offering, to make an atonement for you" (Num. 29:1-6). (2) Observance. This day was observed as a feast day, in the strict sense, by resting from all work, and as a memorial of blowing of horns, by a holy convocation. In later times, while the drink offering of the sacrifice was being poured out, the priests and Levites chanted Psalm 81, while at the evening sacrifice they sang Psalm 29. Throughout the day trumpets were blown at Jerusalem from morning to evening. In the temple it was done even on a Sabbath, but not outside its walls. "The Day of Atonement, which falls on this month, provides full expiation of all sins and the removal of all uncleanness; and the Feast of Tabernacles, beginning five days thereafter, provides a foretaste of the blessedness of life in fellowship with the Lord. This significance of the seventh month is indicated by the sounding of trumpets, whereby the congregation present a memorial of themselves loudly and strongly before Jehovah, calling on him to vouchsafe the promised blessings of grace in fulfillment of his covenant" (Keil, Arch., ii, p. 10). The fact that Tisri was the great month for sowing might easily have suggested the thought of commemorating on this day the finished work of creation; and thus the Feast of Trumpets came to be regarded as the anniversary of the beginning of the world. The rabbins believed that on this day God judges all men, and that they pass before him as a flock of sheep pass before a shepherd.

3. Sabbatic Year, the septennial rest for the land from all tillage and cultivation as enjoined by Moses (Exod. 23:10, 11; Lev. 25:2-7; Deut. 15:1-11; 31:10-13). (1) Names, etc. The four names given to this festival by Moses express some feature connected with its observance. These names are: (1) Rest of Entire Rest (Heb. שַׁבַּת שַׁבָּתוֹן, Sabbath of Sabbatism, Lev. 25:4, A. V. "Sabbath of rest"), because the land was to have a complete rest from cultivation; (2) Year of Rest (Heb. שְׁנַת שַׁבָּתוֹן, Year of Sabbatism, Lev. 25:5), because the rest was to extend through the year; (3) Release (Heb. שְׁנַת פְּדוּתָא, Deut. 15:1, 2), or more fully the Year of Release (Heb. שְׁנַת פְּדוּתָא דְּשַׁבָּתוֹן, Deut. 15:9), because in it all debts were remitted; (4) the Seventh Year (Heb. שְׁנַת הַשְּׁבִיעִי, Deut. 15:9), because it was to be celebrated every seventh year. (2) Design. The spirit of the Sabbatic year is that of the weekly Sabbath. The rest which the land was to keep in the seventh year was not to increase its fruitfulness by lying fallow, nor merely to be a time of recreation for laboring men and beasts, needful and useful as this may be. It was rather to afford true spiritual rest and quickening, with their attendant life and blessing. "Thus Israel, as the people of God, was to learn two things: First, that the earth, though created for man, was not merely that he might turn its powers to his own profit, but that he might be holy to the Lord and participate also in his blessed rest; next, that the goal of life for the congregation of the Lord did not lie in that incessant laboring of the earth which is associated with sore toil in the sweat of the brow (Gen. 3:17, 19), but in the enjoyment of the fruits of the earth, free from care, which the Lord their God gave and ever would give them if they strove to keep his covenant and to take quickening from his law" (Keil, Arch., ii, p. 12). Such an institution as the Sabbatic year might seem, at first sight, to be impracticable. But we are to remember that in no year was the owner of land allowed to reap the whole harvest (Lev. 19:9; 23:22). Unless the remainder was entirely gleaned there might easily have been enough to insure quite a spontaneous crop the ensuing year, while the vines and olives would yield fruit of themselves. Then, too, the unavoidable inference from Lev. 25:20-22 is that the owners of land were to lay by grain in previous years for their own and their families' need. (3) Time, observance, etc. The Sabbatic year, like the year of Jubilee, began on the first day of the civil year, viz., the first of the month Tisri. Though this was the time fixed for the celebration of the Sabbatic year during the time of the second temple, yet the tillage and cultivation of certain fields and gardens had already to be left off in the sixth year. Thus it was ordained that fields upon which trees were planted were not to be cultivated after the feast of Pentecost of the sixth year, while the cultivation of grain fields was to cease from the feast of the Passover (Mishna, Shebith, i, 1-8). The keeping of the Sabbatic year is very distinctly attested by 1 Macc. 6:49, 53, and Josephus, Antiq., xiii, 8, 1; xiv, 10, 6; xv, 1, 2, etc., and also that it was observed by the Samaritans (Josephus, Antiq., xi, 8, 6).

The laws respecting this year were: (1) That the soil, the vineyards, and the olive yards were to have perfect rest (Exod. 23:10, 11; Lev. 25:2-5). Rabbinical regulations carried the law to such an extent that anything planted wittingly or unwittingly had to be plucked up by its roots (Mishna, Terrum, ii, 3). (2) That the spontaneous growth of the fields or of trees (comp. Isa. 37:30) was for the free use of the poor, the hiring, stranger, servants, and cattle (Exod. 23:10, 11; Lev. 25:2-5). An especially fruitful harvest was promised for the sixth year (Lev. 25:20, 21). (3) The third enactment enjoins the remission of debts, with the exception of foreigners (Deut. 15:1-4). This does not seem to denote the entire renunciation of what was owed, but the not pressing it during the Sabbatic year. This enactment does not forbid the voluntary payment of debts, but their enforced liquidation. Also that no poor man should be oppressed by his brother. (4) Finally, at the feast of Tabernacles in this year, the law was to be read to the people—men, women, children, and strangers—in solemn assembly before the sanctuary (Deut. 31:10-13).

The Sabbatic year seems to have been systematically neglected. Hence Jewish tradition explains (see 2 Chron. 36:21) that the seventy years' captivity was intended to make up for the neglect of Sabbatical years. After the return from captivity this year was most strictly observed.

4. Jubilee (Heb. יובל, or יובל, yo-bale', a blast of a trumpet), usually in connection with the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:28); also called the "Year of liberty" (Ezek. 46:17). Its relation to the Sabbatic year and the general directions for its observance are found in Lev. 25:8-16, 23-55. Its bearing on lands dedicated to Jehovah is given in Lev. 27:16-25. It is not mentioned in Deuteronomy, and the only other reference to it in the Pentateuch is in Num. 36:4. (1) Time. After the lapse of seven Sabbaths of years, or seven times seven years, i. e., forty-nine years, the trumpet was to sound throughout the whole land, and the fiftieth year was to be announced and hallowed as Jubilee year. This was not the forty-ninth year, as held by some chronologists. Decisive against this view is the fact "that in Lev. 25:10, sq., not only is the fiftieth year expressly named as the year of Jubilee, but the forty-nine years which make seven Sabbatic years are expressly distinguished from it" (Winer, R. W. Buch, art. Jubeljahr). (2) Observance. It should be noticed that the observance of Jubilee was to become obligatory upon the Israelites after they had taken possession of the promised land and had cultivated the soil for forty-nine years. The ancient Talmudic tradition, which appears to be correct, is that the first Sabbatic year was the twenty-first, and the first Jubilee the sixty-fourth after the Jews came into Canaan, for it took them seven years to conquer it and seven more to distribute it. The only enactment as to the manner of its observance is that it should be announced with the blowing of trumpets, the Jubilee which proclaimed to the covenant nation the gracious presence of its God. Because the Scriptures do not record any particular instance of the public celebration some have denied or questioned whether the law of Jubilee ever came into actual operation. In favor of its actual observance are: (1) The probability arising from the observance of all the other festivals. (2) The law of the inalienability of landed property really obtained among the Hebrews (Num. 36:4, 6, 7; Ezek. 46:17). (3) The unanimous voice of Hebrew tradition. (3) Laws. The law states three respects in which the Jubilee year was to be hallowed, i. e., separated from other years: (1) Rest for soil. No sowing, reaping, nor gathering from the unpruned vine (Lev. 25:11). Thus the soil enjoyed a holy rest, and man was freed from the sore labor of sowing and reaping, and in blessed rest was to live and enjoy the bounty provided by Jehovah in the sixth year (v. 21). (2) Reversion of landed property (Lev. 25:10-34; 27:16-24). The law of Moses provided that all the promised land was to be divided by lot among the Israelites, and that it was to remain absolutely inalienable. Therefore, at Jubilee all property in fields and houses situated in villages or unwalled towns, which the owner had been obliged to sell through poverty and which had not been redeemed (see REDEMPTION), was to revert without payment to its original owner or his lawful heirs. The only exceptions were houses in walled cities, which remained with the buyer unless redeemed within one year (25:29, 30), and the fields which, unless redeemed by the owner, had been sold and thereby rendered unredeemable (27:17-21) and reverted to the priests. (3) Manumission of Israelites. Every Israelite, who through poverty had sold himself to one of his countrymen or to a foreigner settled in the land, if he had been unable to redeem himself or had not been redeemed by a kinsman, was to go out free with his children (Lev. 25:29-35, 39, sq). Thus ownership of a person was changed into a matter of hire (vers. 40, 53). It would seem that there must have been a perfect remission of all debts in the year of Jubilee from the fact that all persons who were in bondage for debt, as well as all landed property of debtors, were freely returned. "Thus the Jubilee year became one of freedom and grace for all suffering, bringing not only redemption to the captive and deliverance from want to the poor, but also release to the whole congregation of the Lord from the sore labor of the earth, and representing the time of refreshing (Acts 3:19) which the Lord provides for his people. For in this year every kind of oppression was to cease and every member of the covenant people find his Redeemer in the Lord, who brought him back to his possession and family" (Keil, Arch., ii, p. 17, 18).

5. New Moon (Heb. רוש חודש, roshe kho'-desh, beginning of month, Num. 10:10; 28:11). The ordinary New Moons, i. e., all except the seventh, were raised out of the rank of ordinary days, but not to that of festivals. They may be called demifeast days, and will therefore be inserted here. (1) Origin. Many nations of antiquity celebrated the returning light of the moon with festivities, sacrifices, and prayers. Some think that the object of Moses in providing for this occasion was to suppress heathen celebrations of the day. There was, however, a deeper meaning in this observance. The new moon stood as the representative of the month. "For a single day a burnt offering sufficed, in which the idea of atonement was subordinate to the idea of consecration to the Lord. But for the month, in view of sins committed and remaining unexpiated during the course of the past month, a special sin offering must be brought for their atonement; and thus, on the ground of the forgiveness and reconciliation with God thereby obtained, the people might be able in the burnt offering to consecrate their life anew to the Lord. (2) Mode of Ascertaining the New Moon. As the festivals, according to the Mosaic law, were always to be celebrated on the same day of the month, it was necessary to fix the commencement of the month, which was determined by the appearance of the new moon, for the new moon was reckoned not by astronomical calculation, but by actual personal observation. On the thirtieth day of the month watchmen were placed on commanding heights round Jerusalem to watch the sky. As soon as each of them detected the moon he hastened to a house in the city which was kept for the purpose, and was there examined by the president of the Sanhedrin. When the evidence of the appearance was deemed satisfactory the president rose up and formally announced it, uttering the words, "It is consecrated." The information was immediately sent throughout the land from the Mount of Olives by beacon fires on the tops of the hills. The religious observance of the day of the new moon may plainly be regarded as the consecration of a natural division of time. (3) Sacrifices. (a) The usual morning and evening sacrifices, with their meat and drink offerings. (b) Special sacrifices, consisting of two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, as a burnt offering, with their meat and drink offerings. A goat was also presented as a sin offering, at which time the priests blew the silver trumpets (Num. 28:11-15; 10:10). (4) Observance. It is evident from the writings of the prophets and from post-Exilian documents that the New Moon was an important national festival. It was often called a feast along with the Sabbath (Psa. 81:3; Isa. 1:13; Ezek. 46:1; Hos. 2:11), on which all business ceased (Amos 8:5), the pious Israelites waited on the prophets for edification (2 Kings 4:23), many families and clans presented their annual thank offerings (1 Sam. 20:6, 29), social gatherings and feasting were indulged in (vers. 5, 24), and the most devout persons omitted fasting (Judith 8:6).

II. YEARLY FESTIVALS. These were:

1. The Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread, the most important of the three great annual festivals of Israel. (1) Name and Signification. It was indifferently called the Feast of the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread, but where the object was to mark the distinction between the Passover as a sacrifice and as a feast following the sacrifice the latter was designated the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:5, sq.). The Hebrew word פֶּסַח, peh'-sakh (from פָּעַח, paw-sakh', to leap over, figuratively, to spare, show mercy) denotes: (1) An overstepping; (2) The paschal sacrifice by virtue of which the passing over was effected (Exod. 12:21, 27, 48; 2 Chron. 30:15). The paschal meal was on the evening of the 14th Nisan, while the seven days following are called the feast of unleavened bread (Lev. 23:5, 6), hence the expression the morrow of the Passover for the 15th Nisan (Num. 33:3; Josh. 5:11). The whole feast, including the paschal eve, is called the feast of Unleavened Bread (Exod. 23:15; Lev. 23:6; Ezra 6:22; Luke 22:1, 7; Acts 12:3; 20:6); but the simple name Passover (Heb. peh'-sakh) is the one commonly used by the Jews to the present day for the festival of unleavened bread (2 Chron. 30:15; 35:1, 11; Mark 14:1; Gr. πάσχα, a pas'-khal). (2) Institution. The Passover was instituted in memory of Israel's preservation from the last plague visited upon Egypt (the death of the firstborn) and their deliverance from bondage (Exod. 12:1-28). "The deliverance of Israel from Egypt was accompanied by their adoption as the nation of Jehovah. For this a divine consecration was necessary that their outward severance from Egypt might be accompanied by an inward severance from everything of an Egyptian or heathen nature. This consecration was imparted by the Passover, a festival which was to lay the foundation of Israel's birth (Hos. 2:15; Exod. 6:6, 7) into the new life of grace and fellowship with God and to perpetuate it in time to come" (K. and D., Com., on Exod. ch. 12).

(3) Observance. (1) At the Exodus. At its first institution, just before the Exodus, the keeping of the Passover was as follows: Every head of a family chose a male of the first year without blemish from the small cattle, i. e., from the sheep or goats, on the 10th Nisan (Exod. 12:3). Later it became the fixed practice to take a lamb. On the 14th Nisan the victim was slain "between the two evenings" (Exod. 12:6); according to the Karaite Jews between actual sunset and complete darkness, but understood by the Pharisees and Rabbins as the time when the sun begins to descend to his real setting (from 3 to 6 p. m.). A bunch of hyssop was dipped in the blood of the animal and applied to the two posts and the lintel of the house where the meal was to be eaten. Then the whole animal, without breaking a bone, was roasted and eaten by each family, including slaves and strangers, if circumcised. If the number of the family was too small the neighboring family might unite in the eating. It was eaten that same night with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, probably endives, wild lettuce, which are eaten by Jews of the present day in Egypt and Arabia with the paschal lamb. The meal was eaten the same evening, all who partook having their loins girded; shoes on their feet, and a staff in hand, ready to march out of Egypt. What of the lamb could not be eaten was to be burned on the morrow, and nothing of it was to be carried out of the house (12:1-13, 21-23, 28, 43-51). According to Jewish authorities this was called the "Egyptian" passover in distinction from the "Permanent" passover. The paschal lamb was a sacrifice, combining in itself the significance of the sin offerings and holy offerings, i. e., it shadowed reconciliation as well as glad fellowship with God; the lamb suffered instead of the partakers. There being no fixed sanctuary the houses were converted into such places of grace or altars, and the blood put on the posts and lintel of the door was the sign that the house was to be spared. With this sparing and reconciliation accomplished through forgiveness of sins there was immediately associated the meal, and thus the sacrificium becomes the sacramentum, the sacrificial flesh a means of grace. The unleavened bread symbolized the spiritual purity, after which Israel in covenant with the Lord is to strive; and the bitter herbs were intended to call to mind the bitter experiences which the Israelites had suffered in Egypt. (2) After the Exodus. The following supplementary enactments were introduced after the Exodus: All male members of the congregation were to appear before the Lord with "the first of the first fruits" (Exod. 23:14-19), the first sheaf of the harvest to be offered on "the morrow after the Sabbath" (Lev. 23:4-14); those prevented from keeping the Passover on the 14th Nisan were to observe it on the fourteenth of the following month (Num. 9:6-14); special sacrifices were to be offered each day of the festival (Num. 28:16-25); the paschal animals were to be slain in the national sanctuary, and the blood sprinkled on the altar instead of the doorposts and lintels of the several dwellings (Deut. 19:1-8).

The Feast of Unleavened Bread followed immediately on the Passover, and lasted seven days, from the 15th to the 21st Nisan (or Abib). On each of these days, after the morning sacrifice, a sacrifice in connection with the feast was presented; unleavened bread alone was eaten (Exod. 12:15-20; 13:6-8; Deut. 16:3-8). (1) Sacrifices. (a) The usual morning and evening sacrifices, with their meat and drink offerings. (b) Two young bullocks, one ram, seven lambs of the first year, with their meat and drink offerings. These were presented after the morning sacrifice (Num. 28:19-24). (2) Convocations. The first and seventh days of the feast were celebrated by a holy convocation and resting from work, with the exception of preparing food. On the intervening days work might be carried on unless the weekly Sabbath fell on one of them, in which case the full strictness of Sabbath keeping was observed, and the special feast sacrifice was not presented until after the Sabbath offering. (3) Barley sheaf. On the second feast day (16th Nisan) the first sheaf of the new harvest (barley) was symbolically offered to the Lord by waving—not burned on the altar—accompanied with a lamb of the first year for burnt offering, with its meat and drink offerings. Previous to this offering neither bread nor roasted grain of the new harvest was allowed to be eaten (Lev. 23:9-14). Those attending presented freewill, burnt, and holy offerings of sheep and oxen (Exod. 23:15, sq.; Deut. 16:2, sq.), and sacrificial meals were eaten. The feast closed on the 21st, with rest from work and a holy convocation. (4) History. Scripture records that the Passover was kept on the evening before the Israelites left Egypt (Exod. 12:28), the second year after the Exodus (Num. 9:1-5), and then not again until they entered Canaan (Exod. 13:5; Josh. 5:10). Only three instances are recorded in which the Passover was celebrated between the entrance into the promised land and the Babylonian captivity, viz., under Solomon (2 Chron. 8:13), under Hezekiah when he restored the national worship (2 Chron. 30:15), and under Josiah (2 Kings 23:21; 2 Chron. 35:1-19). But the inference that the Passover was only celebrated on these occasions seems the less warranted, that in later times it was so punctually and universally observed. (5) Post-Exilic observance. After the return of the Jews from captivity the celebration of the Passover, like that of other institutions, became more regular and systematic; and its laws, rites, manners, and customs faithfully transmitted to us. These were the same as those in the time of Christ and his apostles, and are, therefore, of the utmost importance and interest to us in understanding the New Testament. We give the various practices in connection with the days of the festival on which they were respectively observed.

(a) The Great Sabbath (10th Nisan) is the Sabbath immediately preceding the Passover, and is so called (in the Calendar) because, according to tradition, the 10th of Nisan, when the paschal lamb was to be selected, originally fell on the Sabbath. In later legislation the animal was not required to be set aside four days beforehand, yet the Sabbath was used for the instruction of the people in the duties of this great festival. In addition to the regular ritual, special prayers bearing on the redemption from Egypt, the love of God to Israel, and Israel's obligation to keep the Passover, were prescribed for that Sabbath. Mal. 3:1-4:6 was read as the lesson of the day, and discourses were delivered explanatory of the laws and domestic duties connected with the festival. This is likely the Sabbath referred to in John 19:31.

(b) The 13th Nisan. On the evening of the 13th Nisan, which, until that of the 14th, was called the "preparation for the Passover" (John 19:14), every head of a family searched for and collected by the light of a candle all the leaven. Before beginning the search he pronounced the following benediction: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and hast enjoined us to remove the leaven." After the search he said, "Whatever leaven remains in my possession which I cannot see, behold, it is null, and accounted as the dust of the earth."

(c) The 14th Nisan. This day, called until the evening the preparation for the Passover, was also known as the "first day of Passover" (Lev. 23:5-7). Handicraftsmen, with the exception of tailors, barbers, and laundresses, were obliged to cease from work, either from morning or from noon, according to the custom of the different places in Palestine. No leaven was allowed to be eaten after noon, when all that had been found on the preceding or this day must be burned. On the 14th Nisan every Israelite who was physically able, not in a state of Levitical uncleanness, nor further distant from Jerusalem than fifteen miles, was to appear before the Lord with an offering in proportion to his means (Exod. 23:15; Deut. 16:16, 17). Women, though not legally bound to appear in the sanctuary, were not excluded from it (1 Sam. 1:7; Luke 2:41, 42).

(d) Offering of the Paschal Lamb. This lamb must, of course, be free from all blemish, and neither less than eight days nor more than exactly one year old. Each paschal lamb was to serve a "company" of not less than ten nor more than twenty, the representatives of each company going to the Temple. The daily evening sacrifice (Exod. 29:38, 39), usually killed at the eighth hour and a half (i. e., 2:30 P. M.), and offered up at the ninth and a half hour (i. e., 3:30 P. M.), was on this day killed at 1:30 and offered at 2:30 P. M., an hour earlier; and if the 14th of Nisan happened on a Friday it was killed at 12:30 and offered at 1:30 P. M., two hours earlier than usual, so as to avoid any needless breach of the Sabbath.

Before the incense was burned or the lamps were trimmed the paschal sacrifice had to be offered. It was done on this wise: The first of the three festive divisions, with their paschal lambs, was admitted within the court of the priests. Each division must consist of not less than thirty persons. Immediately the massive gates were closed behind them. The priests blew a threefold blast from their silver trumpets when the Passover was slain. Altogether the scene was most impressive. All along the court up to the altar of burnt offering priests stood in two rows, the one holding golden, the other silver bowls. In these the blood of the paschal lambs, which each Israelite slew for himself (as representative of his company at the paschal supper), was caught up by a priest, who handed it to his colleague, receiving back an empty bowl, and so the bowls with the blood were passed up to the priest at the altar, who jerked it in one jet at the base of the altar. While this was going on a most solemn "hymn" of praise was raised, the Levites leading in the song and the officers either repeating after them or merely responding. "The HALLEL (q. v.) was recited the whole time, and if it was finished before all the paschal animals were slain it might be repeated a second and even a third time. Next the sacrifices were hung up on hooks along the court, or laid on staves which rested on the shoulders of two men (on Sabbaths they were not laid on staves), then flayed, the entrails taken out and cleansed, and the inside fat separated, put in a dish, salted, and placed on the fire of the altar of burnt offering. This completed the sacrifice.

The first division of officers being dismissed, the second entered, and finally the third, the service in each case being conducted in precisely the same manner. Then the whole service concluded by burning the incense and trimming the lamps for the night." If it was the Sabbath the first division waited in the court of the Gentiles, the second between the ramparts, i. e., the open space between the walls of the court of the women and the trellis work in the temple, while the third remained in its place. . . . At dark all went out to roast their paschal sacrifices. According to Jewish ordinance the paschal lamb was roasted on a spit of pomegranate wood, the spit passing through from mouth to vent. If it touched the oven the part so touched must be cut away, thus carrying out the idea that the lamb must not be defiled by any contact with foreign matter. It was not to be "sodden," because the flesh must remain pure, without the admixture even of water, and no bone of it was to be broken.

(e) The Paschal Supper. As the guests gathered around the paschal table they were arrayed in their best festive garments, joyous and at rest, as became the children of a king. To express this idea the Rabbins insisted that at least a part of the feast should be partaken of in a recumbent position. The left elbow was placed on the table, the head resting on the hand, with sufficient room between each guest for the free movement of the right hand. This explains in what sense John "was leaning on Jesus's bosom," and afterward "lying on Jesus's breast," when he leaned back to speak to him (Luke 22:14, sq.; John 13:23, 25). The father, or other person presiding, took the place of honor at the table, probably somewhat raised above the rest.

The paschal supper commenced by the head of the "company" pronouncing a benediction over the first cup of wine, which had been filled for each person. It was then drunk, and a basin of water and a towel were handed round, or the guests got up to wash their hands (John 13:4, 5, 12), after which the blessing belonging thereto was pronounced.

These preliminaries ended, a table was brought in, upon which was the paschal meal. The president of the feast first took some of the herbs, dipped it in the sauce (Heb. charoseth), ate of it, and gave to the others (Matt. 23:23; John 13:26). Immediately after this all the dishes were removed from the table (to excite the more curiosity), and the second cup of wine was filled. Then the son asked his father as follows: "Wherefore is this night distinguished from all other nights? For on all other nights we eat leavened or unleavened bread, but on this night only unleavened bread? On all other nights we eat any kind of herbs, but on this night only bitter herbs? On all other nights we eat meat roasted, stewed, or boiled, but on this night only roasted? On all other nights we dip (the herbs) only once, but on this night twice?" In reply the head of the house related the whole national history, commencing with Terah, Abraham's father, Israel's deliverance from Egypt, the giving of the law; and the more fully he explained it all the better.

The paschal dishes were now placed back upon the table. The president took up in succession the dish with the Passover lamb, that with the bitter herbs, and that with the unleavened bread, briefly explaining the import of each; the first part of the Hallel was sung (Psa. 113 and 114), with this brief thanksgiving at the close: "Blessed art thou, Jehovah our God, King of the universe, who hast redeemed us and redeemed our fathers from Egypt." The second cup of wine was then drunk, and hands were washed a second time, with the same prayer as before, and one of the two unleavened cakes broken and "thanks given."

Pieces of the broken cake, with "bitter herbs" between them, and "dipped" in the charoseth, were next handed to each of the company. This, in all probability, was "the sop" which, in answer to John's inquiry about the betrayer, the Lord "gave" to Judas (John 13:25, sq.; Mark 14:22; Luke 22:21).

The paschal supper itself consisted of the unleavened bread, with bitter herbs, of the so-called Chagigah (i. e., a voluntary peace offering made by private individuals), and the paschal lamb itself. After that nothing more was to be eaten, so that the flesh of the paschal sacrifice might be the last meat partaken of. But since the cessation of the paschal sacrifice the Jews conclude the supper with a piece of unleavened cake, called the Aphikomen, or after dish. Hands were again washed, the third cup was filled, and grace after meat said. The service concluded with the fourth cup, over which the second portion of the Hallel was sung (Psa. 115, 116, 117, 118), the whole ending with the so-called "blessing of the song."

(f) The 15th Nisan, Unleavened Bread. On this day there was a holy convocation, and it was one of the six days on which, as on the Sabbath, no manner of work was allowed, with this exception, that while on the Sabbath the preparation of necessary food was not allowed (Exod. 16:5, 23, 29; 35:2, 3), on holy convocation it was permitted (Exod. 12:16; Lev. 23:7; Num. 28:18). The other five days on which the Bible prohibits servile work are the seventh of this festival, the day of Pentecost, New Year's Day, and the first and last of the Feast of Tabernacles.

In addition to the ordinary sacrifices there were offered on this and the following six days two bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs of the first year (with meat offerings) for a burnt offering, and a goat for a sin offering (Num. 28:19-23). Besides these public sacrifices voluntary offerings were made by each individual appearing before the Lord in Jerusalem (Exod. 23:15; Deut. 16:16). The Jewish canons prescribed that this freewill offering should be, 1. A burnt offering, worth not less than sixteen grains of corn; 2. A festive offering of not less value than thirty-two grains; 3. A peace, or joyful offering (Deut. 27:7), the value to be determined by the offerer (Deut. 16:16, 17).

(g) The 16th Nisan, Cutting Barley Sheaf. This day was also called "the morrow after the Sabbath," and on it the omer of the first produce of the harvest (i. e., barley) was waved before the Lord (Lev. 23:10-14). Though for obvious reasons it was customary to choose barley grown in the sheltered Ashes valley across the Kedron, there were no restrictions, save that the barley was to be grown in Palestine, and without being forced by manuring and artificial watering. On the 14th Nisan delegates from the Sanhedrin had marked out the spot whence the first sheaf was to be cut, by tying together in bundles, while still standing, the barley to be reaped. When the time came for cutting the sheaf (i. e., the evening of the 15th Nisan, even though it was a Sabbath), just as the sun went down, three men, each with a sickle and basket, set formally to work. In order to bring out all that was distinctive in the ceremony, they first asked of the bystanders three times each of the following questions: "Has the sun gone down?" "With this sickle?" "Into this basket?" "On this Sabbath?" and, lastly, "Shall I cut?" Having each time been answered in the affirmative, they cut down the barley to the amount of one ephah (nearly three and a half pecks). The ears were brought into the court of the temple and thrashed out with canes or stalks, so that the grains might not be crushed. The grain was then "parched" on a pan perforated with holes, so that each grain might be touched by the fire, and finally exposed to the wind. It was then ground and sifted to the requisite fineness, which was ascertained by one of the "Gizbarim" (treasurers) plunging his hand into it, the sifting process being continued as long as any of the flour adhered to the hand. In this manner the prescribed omer of flour was secured and offered in the temple on the 16th Nisan. Whatever was in excess of an omer was redeemed, and could be used for any purpose. The omer of flour was mixed with a "log" of oil, and a handful of frankincense put upon it, then waved before the Lord, and a handful taken out and burned on the altar (Lev. 2:15, 16). This was what is popularly, though not very correctly, called "the presentation of the first, or wave sheaf."

(h) The 17th to the 20th Nisan. These days constituted a half holy day, and were "the lesser festival." As regards work during this period all that was necessary for the public interest or to prevent private loss was allowed, but no new work of any kind for public or private purposes might be begun. The following work was allowed: Irrigating dry land; digging watercourses; repairing conduits, reservoirs, roads, market places, baths; whitewashing tombs, etc. Dealers in fruit, garments, or utensils were allowed to sell privately what was required for immediate use. In the temple the additional sacrifices appointed for the festival were offered up, and the lesser Hallel was sung instead of the greater.

(i) The 21st Nisan, or the last day of the Passover, was observed by a holy convocation, and was celebrated in all respects like the first day, except that it did not commence with the paschal meal.

(j) The Second, or Little Passover. Anyone prevented by Levitical defilement, disability, or distance from keeping the regular Passover might observe the "second," or the "little Passover," exactly a month later (Num. 9:9-12). In this "second" Passover both leavened and unleavened bread might be kept in the house; the Hallel was not to be sung at the paschal supper; no Chagigah was offered. The supper could not be eaten by any defiled person.

(k) Release of Prisoners. It is not certain whether the release of a prisoner at the Passover (Matt. 27:15; Mark 15:6; Luke 23:17; John 18:39) was a custom of Roman origin, or whether it was an old Jewish usage, which Pilate allowed them to retain.

(l) Preparations for the Passover. A month previous (the 15th Adar) bridges and roads had been repaired for the use of pilgrims. This was also the time for administering the testing draught to women suspected of adultery (q. v.), for burning the red heifer (Num. 19:1, sq.), and for boring the ears of those wishing to remain in bondage. One of these preliminary arrangements is especially interesting as recalling the words of the Saviour. Any dead body found in the field was buried where found; and, as the pilgrims coming to the feast might have contracted "uncleanness" by unwittingly touching such graves, it was ordered that all "sepulchers" should be "whitened" a month before the Passover. Evidently, it was in reference to what our Lord saw going on around him at the time he spoke, that he compared the Pharisees to "whited sepulchers, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness" (Matt. 23:27). Two weeks before the Passover, and at the corresponding time before the other two great festivals, the flocks and herds were to be tithed and the treasure chests publicly opened and emptied. Lastly, "many went out of the country up to Jerusalem before the Passover, to purify themselves" (John 11:55; comp. 1 Cor. 11:27, 28).

(6) Present observance. The Jews of to-day continue to celebrate the Passover largely as in the days of the second temple. Several days before the festival all utensils are cleansed; on the eve of the 15th Nisan the master of the house, with a candle or lamp, searches most diligently into every hole and crevice of the house to discover any leaven which may remain about the premises. Before doing so he pronounces the benediction, following with the formal renunciation of all leaven. On the 14th Nisan (the Preparation Day) all the firstborn males above thirteen years of age fast, in commemoration of the sparing of the Jewish firstborn in Egypt. On this evening the Jews, arrayed in festive garments, offer up the appointed prayers in the synagogue. Returning to their homes they find them illuminated and the tables spread with the following food: Three unleavened cakes are put on a plate; a shank bone of a shoulder of lamb, having a small bit of meat thereon, and an egg roasted hard in hot ashes, are in another dish; the bitter herbs are in a third dish, while the sauce (Heb. charoseth) and salt water, or vinegar, are put into two cups. The whole family, including the servants, are gathered around the table, and the food, with four cups of wine, are partaken of with blessings and benedictions. The same service is gone through the following evening, as the Jews have doubled the days of holy convocation.

2. Pentecost (Gr. Πεντηκοστή, pen-tay-kos-tay, fiftieth, i. e., day), the second of the three great annual festivals, the others being the Passover and Tabernacles. The most important Bible passages relating to it are Exod. 23:16; Lev. 23:15-22; Num. 28:26-31; Deut. 16:9-12. (1) Names and signification. This festival is called: 1. The Feast of Weeks (Exod. 34:22; Deut. 16:10, 16; 2 Chron. 8:13), because it was celebrated seven complete weeks, or fifty days, after the Passover (Lev. 23:15, 16). 2. The Feast of Harvest (Exod. 23:16), because it concluded the harvest of the later grains. 3. The day of first fruits (Num. 28:26), because the first loaves made from the new grain was then offered on the altar (Lev. 23:17). (2) Origin and import. The Scriptures do not clearly attach any historical significance to this festival, but seem to teach that Pentecost owes its origin to the harvest which terminated at this time. It is to be expected that, in common with other nations of antiquity who celebrated the ingathering of grain by offering to the Deity, among other firstling offerings, the fine flour of wheat, the Jews would recognize Jehovah's bounty with the first fruits of their harvest. The Jews, at least as early as the days of Christ, connected with the Passover, and commemorated on the 6th Sivan, the giving of the Decalogue. It was made out from Exod. ch. 19 that the law was delivered on the fiftieth day after the Exodus. It has been conjectured that a connection between the event and the festival may possibly be hinted at in the reference to the observance of the law in Deut. 16:12. The Pentecost was essentially linked to the Passover—that festival which, above all others, expressed the fact of a race chosen and separated from other nations—and was the solemn termination of the consecrated period. (3) The time of the festival. The time fixed for celebrating the Pentecost is the fiftieth day from "the morrow after the Sabbath" of the Passover (Lev. 23:11, 15, 16; or, as given in Deut. 16:9, seven full weeks after the sickle was put to the corn. The precise meaning of the word Sabbath in this connection, which determines the date for celebrating this festival, has been from time immemorial a matter of dispute. The Æthusians and the Sadducees in the time of the second temple, and the Karaites since the 8th century of the Christian era, have taken "Sabbath" in the sense of the seventh day of the week, and have maintained that the omer was offered on the day following that weekly Sabbath which might happen to fall within the seven days of the Passover. This would make Pentecost always come on the first day of the week. Against this many arguments are presented, showing that such an opinion involves many arbitrary and improbable arrangements. Commenting on Lev. 23:15–22, K. and D. (Com., in loco) say that "Sabbaths (v. 15) signifies weeks. Consequently, 'the morrow after the seventh Sabbath' (v. 16) is the day after the seventh week, not after the seventh Sabbath." It is therefore evident that the Jews, who during the second temple kept Pentecost fifty days after the 16th Nisan, rightly interpreted the injunction in Lev. 23:15–22. The fiftieth day, according to the Jewish canons, may fall on the 5th, 6th, or 7th of Sivan. (4) Observance, Pentateuchal. The Mosaic ordinances provided that on the day of Pentecost there was to be a holy convocation, on which no manner of work was to be done; all the able-bodied men of the congregation to be present (unless legally precluded) at the sanctuary, and a special sacrifice offered (Lev. 23:15–22; Num. 28:26–31). The sacrifices offered were: (a) The morning and evening sacrifices, with their meat and drink offerings. (b) A burnt offering, consisting of seven lambs, one young bullock, two rams, with their meat and drink offering (Lev. 23:18; Num. 28:26, sq.). (c) Then was presented two tenths of an ephah of new flour (Lev. 23:17). (d) With the loaves were presented: A kid of the goats for a sin offering and two lambs for a peace offering. The firstling loaves, with the two lambs (peace offering), were devoted to the Lord, by waving, as a thank offering for the harvest which had been gathered in during the seven previous weeks. The words, "Ye shall bring out of your habitations wave loaves" (Lev. 23:17), are not to be understood as if every head of a house was to bring two such loaves, but that the two loaves were presented for the whole people. "Out of your habitations" appears to mean that they were to be loaves prepared for the daily nourishment of the house, and not specially for a holy purpose, or paid for out of the treasury. Freewill offerings, presented by each person in proportion to the blessings received from God. These might be burnt, meat, drink, or thank offerings (Deut. 16:10). This festival was to be a season of rejoicing, in which were to share the children, men and maid servants, the Levites, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow (Deut. 16:11). Israel was also to recall their bondage in Egypt and admonished to keep the divine law (Deut. 16:12). (5) Observance, Post-Exilian. From Acts (2:9–11) we infer that, perhaps more than to any other great festival, the Jews came from distant countries to Jerusalem. On the day before Pentecost the pilgrims entered Jerusalem, and the approach of the holy convocation was proclaimed in the evening by blasts of the trumpets. The great altar was cleansed in the first watch, and immediately after midnight the temple gates were thrown open. Before the morning sacrifice all burnt and peace offerings brought by the people were examined by the priests. The following order was observed for the various sacrifices: (a) The regular morning sacrifice. (b) The festive offerings, as prescribed (Num. 28:26–30); the Levites chanting the Hallel, in which the people joined. (c) The firstling loaves, with their accompanying offerings. These loaves were prepared as follows: "Three seahs of new wheat were brought to the temple, thrashed like other meat offerings, ground and passed through twelve sieves, and the remainder was redeemed and eaten by anyone. Care was taken that the flour for each loaf should be taken separately from one and a half seah; that it should be separately kneaded with lukewarm water (like all thank offerings), and separately baked in the temple itself. The loaves were made the evening preceding the festival; or, if that fell on the Sabbath, two evenings before. These loaves, with the two lambs, formed part of the same wave offering." (d) The freewill offerings of the people, which formed the cheerful and hospitable meal of the family, and to which the Levite, the widow, the orphan, the poor, and the stranger were invited. (6) Present day observance. This festival is annually and sacredly kept by the Jews on the 6th and 7th Sivan—i. e., between the second half of May and the first half of June, thus prolonging it to two days. In accordance with the injunction in Lev. 23:15, 16, the Jews regularly count every evening the fifty days from the second day of Passover until Pentecost, and recite a prayer over it. The three days preceding the festival, on which the Jews commemorate the giving of the law, are called the three days of separation and sanctification, because the Lord commanded Moses to set bounds about the mount, and that the people should sanctify themselves three days prior to the giving of the law (Exod. 19:12, 14, 23).

On the preparation day the synagogues and private houses are adorned with flowers and odoriferous herbs; the males purify themselves by immersion and confession of sins, put on festive garments, and resort to the synagogue, where, after the evening prayer, the hallowed nature of the festival is proclaimed by the cantor in the blessing pronounced over a cup of wine. The same is also done by every head of a family before the evening meal. After supper, either in the synagogue or in private houses, the reading of Scripture continues all night, the reason given being that, when God was about to reveal his law to Israel, he had to waken them from sleep, and to remove that sin they now keep awake during the night.

In the general festival service of the morning special prayers are inserted for the day, which set forth the glory of the Lawgiver and of Israel; the great Hallel is recited; the lesson from the law (Exod. 19:1, 20, 26), the Maphthir (Num. 18:26-31), and the lesson from the prophets (Ezek. 1:1-28, 3:12), are read; the evening prayer (Musaph) is offered, and the benediction is received by the congregation, their heads covered by the fringed wrapper. On the second evening they again resort to the synagogue, use the ritual for the festivals, in which are again inserted special prayers for this occasion, chiefly on the greatness of God and the giving of the law and the Decalogue. The sanctification of the festival is again pronounced, both by the preacher in the synagogue and the heads of the families at home. Prayers different from those of the first day, also celebrating the giving of the law, are mingled with the ordinary prayers: the Hallel is recited, as well as the book of Ruth; the lesson read from the law is Deut. 15:19-16:17, and the lesson from the prophets is Hab. 2:20-3:19, or 3:1-19; prayer is offered for departed relatives; the Musaph Ritual is recited; the priests pronounce the benediction, and the festival concludes after the afternoon service, as soon as the stars appear or darkness sets in.

3. Atonement, Day of (Heb. יוֹם הַכִּפּוּרִים, yome hak-kip-poor-eem'), the day appointed for a yearly, general, and perfect expiation for all the sins and uncleanness which might remain, despite the regular sacrifices. (1) Signification. The Levitical ritual was a constant reminder that "The law . . . can never, with those sacrifices which they offer year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect" (Heb. 10:1). Even with the most scrupulous observance of the prescribed ordinances many sins and defilements would still remain unacknowledged, and therefore without expiation. This want was met by the appointment of a yearly, general, and perfect expiation of all the sins and uncleanness which had remained unatoned for and uncleaned in the course of the year (Lev. 16:33). Thus on the Day of Atonement Israel was reconciled unto Jehovah, which was necessary before the Feast of Tabernacles, which feast prefigured the ingathering of all nations. In connection with this point it may also be well to remember that the Jubilee year was always proclaimed on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 25:9). (2) Time. The tenth day of the seventh month, or Tishri (October), and the fifth day before the Feast of Tabernacles, was the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:1-34; Num. 29:7-11). The day was a high Sabbath, on which no work was done; and all the people were to afflict their souls, i. e., to fast (from the evening of the 9th to the evening of the 10th), under penalty of being cut off from Israel (Lev. 23:27-32). The chronological link connecting the Day of Atonement with the death of Aaron's sons (Lev. 10:1-5) was intended to point out that event as leading thereto, and also to show the importance and holiness attached to an entrance into the inmost sanctuary of God (Lev. 16:1, 2). (3) Sacrifices. From Lev. 16:5-28; Num. 29:7-11, it would appear that the sacrifices for the day were as follows: (a) The ordinary morning sacrifice. (b) The expiatory sacrifices for the priesthood, viz., a young bullock. (c) The sin offering for the people, a kid of the goats for Jehovah and another for Azazel. (d) The festive burnt offerings of the priests and people, and, with them, another sin offering. (e) The ordinary evening sacrifice. Of course, if the Day of Atonement fell on a Sabbath, besides all these, the ordinary Sabbath sacrifices were offered. (4) Ceremonies. (1) Preparation. The center point of this feast was the expiation offered by the high priest after the morning sacrifice. In later times, at least, the high priest underwent a special preparation for this service. Seven days before he had left his own home and taken up his residence in the temple chambers. A substitute was provided, lest the high priest should die or become Levitically unclean. During this week he practiced the various priestly duties, such as sprinkling the blood, burning incense, lighting the lamps, offering the daily sacrifices, etc.; for every part of the service on Atonement Day devolved upon the high priest, and he must make no mistake. Further, he was to abstain from all that could render him unclean or disturb his devotions. On the morning of the Day of Atonement the high priest bathed his entire person; not in the place ordinarily used by the priests, but one specially set apart for him. He then put on the holy garments—the coat, drawers, girdle, and head dress of white cloth—thus signifying that he was entirely cleansed from the defilement of sin and arrayed in holiness. (2) Expiatory rites. Everything being in readiness, the high priest slew the bullock (the sin offering for himself and his house), then filled a censer (coal pan, Exod. 25:38) with burning coals from the altar of burnt offerings, and, putting two handfuls of incense into a vase, bore them into the holy of holies. He poured the incense upon the coals, "that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy seat." As burning incense was a symbol of prayer, this covering of the mercy seat with the cloud of incense was a symbolical covering of the glory of the Most Holy One with prayer to God, and thus served as protection to the worshiper. The high priest now returned to the altar of burnt offering to fetch some of the blood of the bullock, which he sprinkled upon the mercy seat ("eastward," Lev. 16:14) and seven times upon the ground before it. After this he slew the goat selected for a sin offering, and did with its blood as with the blood of the bullock, viz., sprinkled it upon and before the mercy seat. He thus made atonement for the holy of holies, because of the uncleanness of both priests and people (v. 16). He was now required to atone for the "tabernacle of the congregation" ("tent of meeting," R. V.), which he did by sprinkling the blood of both the bullock and the goat, first on the horns of the golden altar once, and then seven times toward the altar, on the ground (see Exod. 30:10). Atonement having been made for the building, the high priest was to expiate the altar of burnt offering, which he did by first putting some of the blood of the bullock and the he-goat upon the horns of the altar, and sprinkling it seven times. Thus the dwelling, the court, and all the holy things were expiated and cleansed. The question how often the high priest on this day went into the holy of holies is not of great importance. The biblical account seems to indicate that he entered four times: 1. With the incense, while a priest continued to agitate the blood of the bullock lest it should coagulate; 2. With the blood of the bullock; 3. With the blood of the goat; 4. To bring the censor, which, according to the Talmud, was done after the evening sacrifice. The high priest then, going out into the court of the tabernacle, laid his hands on the head of the scapegoat, confessing over it all the sins and transgressions of the people. It was led away, by a man standing ready, into the wilderness, and there let go free, to signify the carrying away of Israel's sins which God had forgiven. See AZAZEL. (3) Festive offerings. He then went into the tabernacle, took off his white garments, laid them down there (because they were only to be worn in the expiatory ritual of this day), washed himself "in the holy place" (in the laver of the court), put on his usual official robes, and completed his own and the people's burnt offering in the court, at the same time burning the fat of the sin offerings on the altar. But both of the sin offerings were carried without the camp and burned, with skin, flesh, and dung. The persons who had taken the live goat into the wilderness and burned the sin offerings outside the camp were, before they returned into it, to wash their clothes and bathe their bodies (Lev. 16:2-29). "This act of expiation for the people and the holy places being finished, there was presented immediately before the evening sacrifice, according to Jewish tradition, the offering prescribed for the feast of the day, a goat as sin offering, a bullock, a ram, and several lambs as burnt offerings, with the corresponding meat and drink offerings (Num. 29:7, 11), and therewith the feast of the day was closed." According to the Rabbins the high priest on this day (1) Performed all the duties of the regular daily service; (2) Sprinkled the blood eight times, once toward the ceiling and seven times on the floor; (3) After returning the third time from the holy of holies to the holy place he sprinkled the blood of bullock and goat toward the veil, mixed the blood of the two victims together, sprinkled the altar of incense with the mixture, pouring out what remained at the foot of the altar of burnt offering; (4) The two goats were similar in appearance (size and value). The lots with which they were chosen were originally of boxwood, later of gold; (5) The high priest, as soon as he received the signal that the goat had reached the wilderness, read some lessons from the law, and offered prayer; (6) Very strict rules are given by the Mishna for the fasting of the people. (5) Modern observance. The strict Jews, on the day previous to the Day of Atonement, provide a cock which is slain by an inferior rabbi; the person whose property it is then takes the fowl by the legs, swings it over the heads of himself and company, and at the same time prays to God that the sins committed by them during the year may enter the fowl. This fowl seems to be a substitute for the scapegoat of old. In the evening, after a sumptuous repast, they go to the synagogue dressed in their best. After a blessing by the clerk each contributes toward the free gift offering, after which begins the evening prayer, the reader, the chief rabbi, and many of the congregation clad with the shroud in which they are to be buried, continuing in prayer and supplication for upward of three hours. Some remain all night, and those who go to their homes come again in the morning at five o'clock and remain until dark. The following is the order for the day: Morning prayers; the usual prayers and supplications peculiar to the day; reading the portion from Lev. 16, the naphthar (Num. 19:7-11), the portion from the prophets (Isa. 57:14 to end of ch. 58; the prayer of the musaph, i. e., addition, which makes mention of the additional sacrifices (Num. 29:7), and supplicates Jehovah to be propitious; the offering of the day from Num. 29:7-27. They abstain from food altogether during the day. See EXPIATION.

4. Tabernacles, Feast of, the third of the great annual feasts, the other two being the Passover and Pentecost. (1) Names. (1) The Festival of Tents (Heb. חג המצות, khag has-sook-kohth', A. V. "Feast of Tabernacles," 2 Chron. 8:13; Ezra 3:4; Zach. 14:16, 18, 19); Gr. σκηνοπηγία, skay-nop-ayg-ee'-ah, John 7:2), because the Israelites were commanded to live in booths during its continuance (comp. Lev. 23:43). (2) The Feast of Ingathering (Heb. חג האסיף, khag haw-aw-seef', Exod. 23:16; 34:22), because it was held after the ingathering of the harvest and fruits.

(3) The Festival of Jehovah (Heb. חג יהוה, khag yeh-ho-vaw', Lev. 23:39, or simply the festival (1 Kings 8:2; 2 Chron. 5:3), because it was the most important or well known. The principal passages referring to this feast are: Exod. 23:16; Lev. 23:34-36, 39-43; Deut. 16:13-15; 31:10-13; Neh. ch. 8. (2) Origin and import. The origin of this feast is by some connected with Succoth, the first halting place of the Israelites on their march out of Egypt, and the booths are taken to commemorate those in which they lodged for the last time before they entered the desert (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, Appendix, 89). It was ordered by Moses in the regulations he gave to the Israelites respecting their festivals, and unites two elements: 1. The ingathering of the labor of the field (Exod. 23:16), the fruit of the earth (Lev. 23:39), or the ingathering of the thrashing floor and the wine press (Deut. 16:13), and the dwelling in booths, which were to be matters of joy to Israel (Lev. 23:41; Deut. 16:14). The dwelling in booths was to be a reminder to them of the fatherly care and protection of Jehovah while Israel was journeying from Egypt to Canaan (Deut. 8:9, sq.). "In comparison with the 'house of bondage' the dwelling in booths on the march through the wilderness was in itself an image of freedom and happiness" (K. and D., Com., in loco). Such a reminder of God's loving care and Israel's dependence would, naturally, keep the Israelites from pride and self-conceit. (3) Time of festival. It began on the 15th of Tisri (the seventh month), five days before the Day of Atonement, and although, strictly speaking, it lasted only seven days (Deut. 16:13; Lev. 23:36; Ezek. 45:25), another day was added (Neh. 8:18). This day was observed with a Sabbath rest. (4) Observance. To distinguish between the Pentateuchal enactments and the rites, ceremonies, etc., which gradually obtained, we divide the description of its observance into three sections: (1) Mosaic. On the first day of the feast booths were constructed of fresh branches of fruit and palm trees, "boughs of thick trees," i. e., thick with leaves and willows. These were located in courts, streets, public squares, and on house roofs. In these every home-born Israelite was to dwell during the festival, in memory of their fathers dwelling in booths after their exodus from Egypt (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15). The day was also to be observed as a Sabbath and a holy convocation, in which no secular work was to be done, and all able-bodied male members of the congregation not legally precluded were to appear before the Lord. The booth in Scripture is not an image of privation and misery, but of protection, preservation, and shelter from heat, storm, and tempest (Psa. 27:5; 31:20; Isa. 4:6). The following is a table of the sacrifices offered during this festival:

Day.	Bullocks.	Rams.	Lambs.	Goats, sin offering.
2d.	12	2	14	1
3d.	11	2	14	1
4th.	10	2	14	1
5th.	9	2	14	1
6th.	8	2	14	1
7th.	7	2	14	1
Total....	70	14	98	7

Each bullock, ram, and lamb was accompanied with its prescribed meat and drink offering. The above sacrifices were offered after the regular morning sacrifice (Num. 29:12-34). Every Sabbatical year the law was to be read publicly in the sanctuary on the first day of the festival (Deut. 31:10-13). The six following days were half festivals, probably devoted to social enjoyments and friendly gatherings, when every head of a family was to extend hospitality, especially to the poor and the stranger (Deut. 16:14). To these seven days there was added an eighth, the twenty-second of the month, as the close of the feast. This day was observed with a Sabbath rest and holy convocation, but had only a simple sacrifice, similar to the first and tenth days of the seventh month (Num. 29:35-38). See table of sacrifices above. There is only one instance recorded of this festival being celebrated between the entrance into the Promised Land and the Babylonian captivity (1 Kings 8:2; 2 Chron. 7:8-10; Neh. 8:17). (2) Post-Exilic. After the Babylonian captivity the Feast of Tabernacles began to be strictly and generally kept, and more minute definitions and more expanded applications of the concise Pentateuchal injunction were imperatively demanded, in order to secure uniformity of practice, as well as to infuse devotion and joy into the celebration.

It was ordained that the booth must be a detached and temporary habitation, constructed for the festival and not for permanent residence; the interior must neither be higher than twenty cubits nor lower than ten palms; it must have not less than three walls, and so thatched as to admit the view of the sky and the stars, and the part open to the rays of the sun was not to exceed the part shaded by the cover; it must not be under a tree, covered with a cloth, or with anything which contracts defilement or does not derive its growth from the ground. The furniture of the booths must be of the plainest, and only such as was fairly necessary. Every Israelite was to dwell in the booth during the whole of the seven days of the festival, while his house was to be only his occasional abode; and he was only to quit the booth when it rained heavily. Even a child, as soon as it ceases to be dependent upon its mother, must dwell in the booth. The only persons exempt were those deputed on pious missions, invalids, nurses, women, and infants.

There was a controversy between the Pharisees and Sadducees respecting the use of the branches of trees mentioned in Lev. 23:40; the latter, from Neh. 8:15, 16, understanding them to be for the erection of the booths, while the Pharisees applied them to what the worshippers were to carry in their hands. The Rabbins ruled that the athrog, or citron, was "the fruit of the goodly trees," and "the boughs of thick trees" meant the myrtle, provided it had "not more berries than leaves." Every worshiper carried the athrog in his left hand, and in his right the lulab, or palm, with myrtle and willow branch on either side of it, tied together on the outside with its own kind, though on the inside it might be fastened even with a gold thread. The lulab was used in the temple on each of the seven festive days; even children, if able to shake it, being bound to carry one.

14th Tisri. This was the day before the feast and was the Preparation Day. On this day the pilgrims came to Jerusalem and prepared all that was necessary for the solemn observance of the festival. When the evening set in the blasts of the priest's trumpets on the temple mount announced the advent of the feast. As at the Passover and at Pentecost the altar of burnt offering was cleansed during the first night watch, and the temple gates were thrown open immediately after midnight. The time till the beginning of the ordinary morning sacrifice was occupied in examining the various sacrifices and offerings that were to be brought during the day. If this day was the Sabbath all lulabs had to be deposited somewhere in the temple, as it was contrary to law to carry the palms on the Sabbath from the booths of the pilgrims to the temple.

15th Tisri. While the morning sacrifice was being prepared a priest, accompanied by a joyous procession with music, went down to the Pool of Siloam, whence he drew water into a golden pitcher capable of holding three logs. On the Sabbaths the water was brought from a golden vessel in the temple itself, to which it had been carried from Siloam the preceding day. At the same time that the procession started for Siloam another went to a place in Kedron valley (i. e., Motza), whence they brought willow branches. These they stuck on either side of the great altar, bending them over so as to form a canopy. The priest who had gone to Siloam so timed his return as to join his brother priests as they carried the sacrifice to the altar. On reaching the water gate he was welcomed by three blasts of the trumpet. He ascended the steps of the altar with another priest, who carried a pitcher of wine for a drink offering. They turned to the left, where there were two silver basins with holes in the bottom; the basin for the water at the west with a narrower hole, that for the wine at the east with wider hole, so that both might get empty at the same time. Into these respective basins the water and wine were poured; the people shouting to the priest, "Raise thy hand," to show that he really poured the water into the basin. The reason for this was that Alexander Jannæus, a Sadducee (about 95 B. C.), had shown his contempt for the Pharisees by pouring the water upon the ground. He was pelted by the people with their athrogs, and the soldiers being called in nearly six thousand Jews were killed in the temple.

As soon as the altar was decorated with the willow branches the morning sacrifice was offered, followed by the special festive sacrifices. While these sacrifices were being offered the Levites chanted the Great Hallel, as at the Passover and Pentecost. When the choir came to the words, "O give thanks unto the Lord" (Psa. 118:1), and again when they sang, "O work then now salvation, Jehovah" (Psa. 118:25), and once more at the close, "O give thanks unto the Lord" (Psa. 118:29), all the worshippers shook their lulabs toward the altar. The chant finished, the priests marched around the altar, exclaiming, "Hosanna, O Jehovah; give us help, O Jehovah, give prosperity" (Psa. 118:25). The benediction was then pronounced and the people dispersed, amid the repeated exclamation, "How beautiful art thou, O altar!" or, "To Jehovah and thee, O altar, we give thanks!" This prayer for succor was applied to Christ, when the multitude greeted palm branches and beat them to pieces at the side of the altar, from which the day was called the duty of willows, and the branch-thrashing day. This over, the children who were present threw away their palms and ate up their athrogs, or citrons; on the afternoon of this day the pilgrims began to move the furniture from the booths, the obligation to dwell in them ceasing at that time. This, the great Hosanna day, was regarded as one of the four days whereon God judges the world. It seems altogether probable that it was on this day that Jesus uttered those memorable words, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink" (John 7:37).

22d Tisri. This eighth day was added as the close of the festival, and was observed with Sabbath rest and holy convocation. It had only a simple sacrifice (similar to the first and tenth day of the seventh month; see table of sacrifices above). The people dwelt no longer in booths, the joyful procession for the drawing of water was discontinued, the illumination of the court

Booths Upon Housetops.

Jesus on his entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:8, 9; John 12:12, 13).

Each pilgrim betook himself to his booth, there to enjoy his social repast with the Levite, the stranger, etc. On the first day of the festival every Israelite carried about his lulab, or palm, all day—to the synagogue, on his visits to the sick and mourners.

16th to 20th Tisri, called also the middle days of the feast (John 7:14), or the lesser festival. These days were half holy days, on which necessary food or raiment might be privately purchased, and work required for the observance of the festival might be performed. During these days the sacrifices were offered, the palm and the citron were used, and the priests marched round the altar as on the first day of the festival, with this exception, that the number of animals offered diminished daily.

21st Tisri, or the last day of the feast (but according to some authorities this title was given to the 22d Tisri). This seventh day of the festival was distinguished from the other days as follows: After the Musaph, or special festival sacrifices of the day, the priests marched seven times around the altar, instead of once, as on other days; the willows which surrounded the altar were then so thoroughly shaken by the people that the leaves lay thickly on the ground; the people also brought of the women ceased; and the palms and willows were not used.

The ceremony of drawing the water was repeated every morning during the seven days of the festival, but was discontinued on the eighth.

When the Feast of Tabernacles fell on a Sabbath year the reading of portions of the law (Deut. 31:10–13) was afterward confined to one book of the Pentateuch, the number of synagogues in which the law was read every week rendering it less needful to read extensive portions in the temple. A peculiarity of this festival was that on the first seven days all the twenty-four orders of the priests officiated, while at all the other festivals only those served upon whom the lot fell (comp. 1 Chron. 24:7–19). On the eighth day the twenty-four orders were not all present; only those upon whom the lot fell. As the close of the first day of the feast was celebrated, the "joy of the pouring out of water," the worshipers descended to the court of the women, where great preparations had been made. Four golden candelabras were there, each with four golden bowls, against each candelabra a ladder resting, upon them standing four lads from the rising youth of the priests, with pitchers of oil, whereas they fed the lamps, while the cast-off breeches and girdles of the priests served for wicks. The light from these lamps illuminated the whole city, and around them danced distinguished men, with lighted torches in their hands, singing hymns and songs of praise. The Levites, stationed on the fifteen steps which led into the court, and corresponding to the fifteen psalms of degrees, i. e., steps (Psa. 120-134), accompanied the songs with harps, psalteries, cymbals, and other musical instruments. The dancing, as well as the music, continued until daybreak. It is probable that Jesus referred to this custom when he spoke those well-known words, "I am the light of the world" (John 8:12).

(3) Since the Dispersion. Save the adaptation of the rites to the altered condition of the nation, the Jews of the present day continue to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles as in the days of the second temple.

As soon as the Day of Atonement is over every Orthodox Jew begins to erect his booth in which he and his family are to take up their abode during the festival, and he also provides himself with a lulab (palm) and etrog (citron). The festival commences on the eve of 14th Tisri (Preparation Day), all the Jews, attired in festive garments, resorting to the synagogues, where, after the evening prayer, the hallowed nature of the festival is proclaimed by the cantor in the blessing pronounced over the wine. After the evening service every family resorts to its booth, which is illuminated and adorned with leaves and fruit, and in which the first festive meal is taken. Before this is eaten the head of the family pronounces the sanctity of the festival over a cup of wine. Each member of the family washes his hands, pronouncing the prescribed benediction while drying them, and all begin to eat. Orthodox Jews sleep in the booths all night.

The following morning, the first day of the feast, they resort to the synagogue, holding the palms and citrons in their hands, laying them down during the former part of the prayer, but taking them up after the eighteen benedictions, when about to recite the Hallel. Holding the palm in the right hand and the citron in the left, they recite the following prayer: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and hast enjoined us to take the palm branch." Then each turns his citron upside down and waves his palm branch three times toward each point of the compass, and the legate of the congregation pronounces the benediction; the Hallel is chanted; the lessons are read from the law (Lev. 22:26; 23:44; Num. 29:12-16), and from the Prophets (Zech. 14:1-21). After this the Musaph prayer is recited; and when the reader comes to the passage where the expression priests occurs the Aaronites and the Levites rise, and, after the latter have washed the hands of the former, the priests, with uplifted hands, pronounce the sacerdotal benediction (Num. 6:24-27) upon the congregation, whose faces are veiled with the Talit. The elders then march round the Ark, in the center of the synagogue, the legate carrying the scroll and the rest palm branches, repeating the Hosanna and waving the palms in memory of the procession round the altar. The morning service concluded, the people betake themselves to their booths to partake of the festive repast with the poor and the stranger. About five or six o'clock they recite, in the synagogue, the Minchah prayer, answering to the daily evening sacrifice in the temple.

The ritual and rites of the second evening and morning are similar to those of the first; the lesson from the prophets, however, is from 1 Kings 8:2-21. After the afternoon service of this day the middle days of the festival begin, which last four days, when the ritual is like that of ordinary days, a few prayers being inserted in the regular formula; lessons are read on each day, and the procession goes round the ark.

The seventh day, i. e., the Great Hosanna, is celebrated with peculiar solemnity, inasmuch as it is believed that on this day God decrees the weather, or, rather, the rain, for the future harvest. On the evening previous every Israelite supplies himself with a small bunch of willows tied with palm bark. Some pious Jews read all night from Deuteronomy, the Psalms, the Mishna, etc., and are immersed before the morning prayer. Candles are lighted at the time of morning service, and after the morning prayer (similar to those of the preceding days) seven scrolls are taken from the ark, from one of which the lesson is read. After prayer the procession, headed by the rabbi and the legate, with those carrying the scrolls, goes seven times round the ark, or the reading desk, reciting the Hosannas and waving their palms. The palms are then laid down and the willows beaten.

On the evening of the seventh day the festival commences which concludes the whole cycle of the feast. Being a day of holy convocation, the Kiddush (i. e., proclamation) of its sanctity is offered. On the following morning, in the synagogue, the prayers of the first two days are offered; the special lesson of the day is read; the Musaph, or additional prayer, is offered, and the priests pronounce the benediction. The people no longer take their meals in the booths on this day. On the evening of this day begins the festival called the Rejoicing of the Law. The eighteen benedictions are recited, all the scrolls taken from the ark, into which a lighted candle is placed. A procession of distinguished members is headed by the legate; they hold the scrolls in their hands and go around the reading desk; the scrolls are then put back into the ark, except the one placed upon the desk, from which is read the last chapter of Deuteronomy, all persons in the synagogue being called to the reading, including children. The evening service over, the children leave the synagogue in procession, carrying banners with sundry Hebrew inscriptions.

On the following morning the Jews resort again to the synagogue, recite the Hallel after the eighteen benedictions, empty the ark of all its scrolls, put a lighted candle into it, and, with the scrolls, go round the reading desk, amid jubilant songs. The scrolls are returned to the ark, with the exception of two, from one of which is read Deut. ch. 33, whereunto four persons are at first called; then all the little children, and then again several adults. The first of these is known as the Bridegroom of the Law, and after the cantor has addressed him in a lengthy Hebrew formula the last verses of the Pentateuch are read, the reading being followed by all the people exclaiming, be strong! Gen. 1:1-2:3 is read, to which another is called who is known as the Bridegroom of Genesis, to whom is delivered a Hebrew formula; the Maftir (i. e., Num. 29:35-30:1) is read from another scroll; the Musaph, or additional special prayer for the festival, and the service is concluded. The rest of the day is spent in rejoicing and feasting.

The design of this festival is to celebrate the annual completion of the perusal of the Pentateuch, inasmuch as on this day the last section of the law is read. Hence the name of the festival, The Rejoicing of Finishing the Law.

III. POST-EXILIC FESTIVALS. To the yearly festivals instituted by the Mosaic law several were added after the Exile, of which some were as regularly kept as the Mosaic yearly feasts. They were the following:

1. Purim (Heb. פּוּרִים, poo-rem', lots, Esth. 9:26, 31) was instituted by Mordecai, at the suggestion of Esther, in memory of the extraordinary deliverance of the Jews of Persia from the murderous plot of Haman. It was generally adopted, though not at first without opposition. (1) Name and signification. The name Purim, lots, was given to this festival because of the casting of lots by Haman to decide when he should carry into effect the decree issued by the king for the extermination of the Jews (Esth. 9:24). The name was probably given to the festival in irony. (2) Observance. The only directions given respecting the observance of the festival is (Esth. 9:17-24), that Mordecai ordered the 14th and 15th of Adar to be kept annually by the Jews; that these two days should be days of feasting and joy, of the interchange of presents, and of sending gifts to the poor; and that the Jews agreed to continue the observance of the festival as it was begun. No mention is made of any special sacrifice. At the present day the festival is kept as follows: The day preceding (13th Adar) is kept as a fast day (called "the Fast of Esther"), in accordance with the command of the queen (Esth. 4:15, 16), sundry prayers, expressive of repentance, etc., being introduced into the ritual for the day. As on all fast days, Exod. 32:11-14; 34:1-11 are read as the lesson from the law, and Isa. 55:6-56:8 as the Haphtarah. If 13th Adar falls on a Sabbath the fast is kept on the Thursday previous. As soon as the stars appear the festival commences, candles are lighted, all the Jews resort to the synagogue, where, after the evening service, the benediction is pronounced, and the book of Esther is read by the prelector. As often as the name of Haman is mentioned in the reading the congregation stamp on the floor, saying, "Let his name be blotted out. The name of the wicked shall rot!" while the children spring rattles. After the reading the congregation exclaim, "Cursed be Haman; blessed be Mordecai!" etc.; the benediction is said, and all go home and partake of milk and eggs. On the 14th, in the morning, the people go to the synagogue; several prayers are inserted into the regular ritual; Exod. 17:8-16 is read as the lesson from the law, and Esther, as on the previous evening. The rest of the festival is given up to rejoicing, exchange of presents, games, etc. Rejoicings continue on the 15th, and the festival terminates on the evening of this day.

2. Dedication, Feast of (Heb. חג המצות, khan-ook-kaw'; Gr. ἑγκαίνα, eng-kah'-ee-nee-ah), called in 1 Macc. 4:52-59 "the dedication of the altar," and by Josephus (Ant., xii, 7, 7) "the feast of lights." It was a popular and joyous festival, and commemorated the purifying of the temple, the removal of the old polluted altar, and the restoration of the worship of Jehovah by Judas Maccabeus, B. C. 164.

This feast began on the 25th Chisleu (December), and lasted eight days, but did not require attendance at Jerusalem. Assembled in the temple, or in the synagogues of the places where they resided, the Jews sang "Hallel," carrying palm and other branches; and there was a grand illumination of the temple and private houses. The real origin of the illumination of the temple is unknown, although tradition says that when the sacred "candlesticks" of the restored temple were to be lighted only one flagon of oil, sealed with the signet of the high priest, was found to feed the lamps. This was pure oil, but only sufficient for one day—when, lo, by a miracle, the oil increased, and the flagon remained filled for eight days, in memory of which the temple and private houses were ordered to be illuminated for the same period. No public mourning or fast was allowed on account of calamity or bereavement. The similarity between this festival and the "Feast of Tabernacles" would seem to indicate some intended connection between the two. Our Lord, without doubt, attended this festival at Jerusalem (John 10:22). It is still observed by the Jews.

IV. DOUBTFUL FEASTS.

1. Of Wood Carrying. This was held on the 3d Elul, on which everyone was accustomed to carry wood to the temple, that the fire on the altar might be kept always burning. This festival appears to have been derived from Neh. 10:34, and to have been nothing but a day of rejoicing, which was observed yearly in Jerusalem after providing the necessary supply of wood for the altar. The Talmudists do not mention it, but give nine yearly times for this fetching of wood.

2. Of Acra. The feast which the high priest Simon (B. C. 141) appointed on the 23d of the second month (Ijar) to commemorate the reconquest and purification of the tower and the expulsion of the Hellenists from Jerusalem (1 Macc. 13:50-52). It is not mentioned by Josephus.

3. Of Nicanor. This festival was held in commemoration of the defeat and death of Nicanor by the Jews under Judas Maccabeus. "The people greatly rejoiced, and ordained to keep yearly this day, being the 13th of Adar" (1 Macc. 7:47; Josephus, Ant., xii, 10, 5).

4. Feast of Joy in the Law was held on 23d Tisri, as the day on which the reading of the Torah ended yearly, and was again begun. It was most likely a Rabbinical invention.

FESTUS, POR'CIOUS (Gr. Πόρκιος Φήστος, por'-kee-os face'-tos), the successor of Felix as the Roman governor of Judea, appointed by the emperor Nero probably in the autumn of A. D. 60 (C. and H., Life and Epistles of St. Paul). Three days after his arrival at Cæsarea (the political metropolis) he went up to Jerusalem. Here he was met by "the high priest and the chief of the Jews, who informed him against Paul." They requested, as a favor, that he would allow Paul to be brought up to Jerusalem, the plea, doubtless, being that he should be tried before the Sanhedrin. The real purpose, however, was to kill him while on the way. Festus refused to comply, and told them that they must meet the accused face to face at Cæsarea. After eight or ten days Paul was summoned before Festus and asked whether he was willing to go to Jerusalem; but the apostle, knowing full well the danger that lurked in this proposal and conscious of the rights he possessed as a Roman citizen, refused to accede and replied boldly to Festus, concluding with, "I appeal unto Cæsar." About this time Herod Agrippa, with his sister, Berenice, came on a complimentary visit to Festus, and was consulted by the governor. The result was an interview between the three and Paul, in which the latter delivered a famous discourse and was pronounced innocent. But having appealed to Cæsar Festus sent him to Rome (Acts chaps. 25, 26). A few other facts are mentioned concerning Festus. Judea was in the same disturbed state that it had been in under the procuratorship of Felix. He took part with Agrippa against the priests, who built a wall to obstruct Agrippa's view of the temple, but allowed an appeal to Nero, who decided in favor of the Jews. He probably died in summer of A. D. 62. See PAUL.

FETCH. See GLOSSARY.

FETTERS, shackles or chains for binding prisoners, either by the wrists or ankles. The Philistines bound Samson with fetters of copper, or bronze (Judg. 16:21). Manasseh and Zedekiah, kings of Judah, were bound with fetters by the Chaldeans and carried to Babylon (2 Chron. 33:11; 2 Kings 25:7). The "man with an unclean spirit" was bound with fetters and chains (Mark 5:4). In the original several words are used.

The Egyptians "inclosed the hands of their prisoners in an elongated fetter of wood, made of two opposite segments, nailed together at each end, such as are used in securing prisoners in Egypt at the present day" (Wilkinson, The Ancient Egyptians, i, 410, abridged).

FEVER. See DISEASES.

Ancient Fetters.

FIDELITY (Gr. πίστις, pis-tis) "is that grace in the servant which shows him to be worthy of his Master's trust. Thus our Lord says, 'Who then is that faithful and wise steward,' etc. (Luke 12:42). Paul gives the description of the faithful servant as 'showing all good fidelity' (Tit. 2:10). The same word (Gr. πίστις) which expresses our trust in God's fidelity expresses his trust in ours. It is a grace which stands alone as having the epithet good, and it must pervade the whole of life. Here then are all the elements of our ethics: The Master commits a trust, and the trustworthy servant shows fidelity in all things. It may be that the very faith which trusts God is the strength of the faithfulness which God may trust. Fidelity extends to the whole of life, with special reference to our individual vocation. Nothing is excluded from the sphere of this duty. Fidelity, as the test applied to service, is guarded by threatenings and stimulated by the hope of reward" (Matt. 25:23, 26, 30) (Popz, Christ. Theol., iii, 220-223).

FIELD (Heb. שָׂדֵה, generally saw-deh', smoothness). This word does not exactly correspond to our "field." The two words agree in describing cultivated land, but differ in point of extent, the saw-deh' being specifically applied to what is uninclosed, while field conveys the notion of inclosure. On the one hand saw-deh' is applied to any cultivated ground, whether pasture (Gen. 29:2; 31:4; 34:7; Exod. 9:3), tillage (Gen. 37:7; 47:24; Ruth 2:2, 3; Job 24:6; Jer. 26:18; Mic. 3:12), woodland (1 Sam. 14:25, A. V. "ground;" Psa. 132:6), or mountain top (Judg. 9:32, 36; 2 Sam. 1:21), and in some instances in marked opposition to the neighboring wilderness, as the field of Shechem (Gen. 33:19), the field of Moab (Gen. 36:35; Num. 21:20, A. V. "country;" Ruth 1:1), and the vale of Siddim (Gen. 14:3, 8).

On the other hand the saw-deh' is contrasted with what is inclosed, whether a vineyard (Exod. 22:5; Lev. 25:3, 4; Num. 22:4, etc.), a garden, or a city (Deut. 28:3, 16), unwall'd villages ranking in the eyes of the law as fields (Lev. 25:31). The term often implies a place remote from a house (Gen. 4:8; 24:63), a sense more fully expressed by "the open field" (Lev. 14:7, 53; 17:5; Num. 19:16) and naturally coupled with the idea of exposure and desertion (Jer. 9:22; Ezek. 16:5; 32:4; 33:27; 39:5).

Fields were marked off by stones, which could be easily removed (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; comp. Job 24:2; Prov. 22:28; 23:10). Being unfenced fields were liable to damage from straying cattle (Exod. 22:5), hence the necessity of constantly watching flocks and herds. From the absence of inclosures cultivated land of any size might be termed a field, whether of limited area (Gen. 23:13, 17; Isa. 5:8), one's entire inheritance (Lev. 27:16, sq.; Ruth 4:5; Jer. 32:9), public land about a town, ager publicus (Gen. 41:48; Neh. 12:29), not applied, however, to the "suburbs" of Levitical cities immediately adjacent to the walls and considered as part of the town (Josh. 21:11, 12), and lastly the territory of a people (Gen. 14:7; Num. 21:20, A. V. "country," etc.).

Fields were occasionally called after remarkable events, as "Helkath-hazzurim," the field of strong men (2 Sam. 2:16), or the use to which it may have been put, as "the fuller's field" (2 Kings 18:17), "potter's field" (Matt. 27:7).

The expression "fruitful field" (Isa. 10:18; 29:17; 32:15, 16) and "plentiful field" (16:10, etc.) are not connected with saw-deh', but with kar-mel' (Heb. פְּרִיָה, a park, or well-kept wood), as distinct from a wilderness or forest (2 Kings 19:23; Isa. 37:24, A. V. "Carmel," etc.).

FIFTIES. See ISRAEL, CLASSIFICATION OF.

FIG. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

FIGHT. See WARFARE.

FIGURE, the rendering of the following words: Seh'-mel (Heb. שֶׁמֶל, Deut. 4:16) an idol, as elsewhere rendered; mik-lah'-ath (Heb. מִיִּלְחָה, 1 Kings 6:29) a carving, as elsewhere; tab-neeth' (Heb. תְּבִיטָה, Isa. 44:13), likeness or model; an-teet'-oo-pon (Gr. ἀντίτυπον, 1 Peter 3:21), antitype; the verb mel-askh-ay-mat-id'-zo (Gr. μετασχηματίζε, 1 Cor. 4:6, A. V. "in a figure transferred") means to shape one's discourse so as to transfer to one's self what holds true of the whole class to which one belongs, and the meaning in the passage cited is, "by what I have said of myself and Apollos I have shown what holds true of all Christian teachers" (Grimm, Lex.); par-ab-ol-ay' (Gr. παραβολή, Heb. Gen. 9:9; 11:19), parable, as elsewhere rendered.

FILE is the incorrect rendering in the A. V. of the Heb. פֶּה צֶרֶבֶת, peh-ec-rav' peh (1 Sam. 13:21) literally signifying a bluntness of the mouth, i. e., edge of tools. This came from the absence of smiths to sharpen them.

FILLET, an erroneous rendering in the A. V. of two words: Khash-oo-keem' (Heb. קִישׁוֹת, joinings, Exod. 38:17, 28; 27:17), the rods which joined together the tops of the pillars round the court of the Tabernacle (q. v.) and from which the curtain was suspended (Exod. 27:10, 11, etc.); khoot (Heb. חוֹת, thread (as elsewhere rendered), i. e., a measuring line (Jer. 52:21).

FILTH, FILTHY, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words and meaning "foul matter," "anything that soils or defiles." In 2 Chron. 29:5 and Ezra 6:21 the filth from which the Jews were to cleanse the temple and themselves was the abomination of idolatry. Filth is used as the equivalent of moral impurity (Ezek. 36:25; 2 Cor. 7:1; James 1:21, etc.). In 1 Cor. 4:13 it is used to denote outsweepings, that which is worthless. The expression "that the filthiness of it may be molten in it" (Ezek. 24:11) seems to mean that the pot was to be placed empty upon the fire that the rust may be burned away by the heat. The filthiness of the pot was the rust upon it.

FINE, FINES. See PUNISHMENTS.

FINERING. See METAL, WORKERS IN, art. "Handicrafts."

FINGER (Heb. אֶבְטָר, ets-bah'; Gr. δάκτυλος, dak'-too-los). Besides its usual meaning it is used:

Figuratively, to denote the special and immediate agency of anyone. The Egyptian magicians said of the plagues, "This is the finger of God," i. e., done by God himself (Exod. 8:19). The tables of stone were said to have been "written with the finger of God" (Exod. 31:18) under his personal direction. The heavens are said to be the work of God's fingers, i. e., his power (Psa. 8:3); and Christ said, "If I by the finger of God cast out devils" (Luke 11:20).

"The putting forth of the finger" (Isa. 58:9) signifies a scornful pointing with the fingers at humbler men, and especially at such as are godly. "Four fingers" is the measure of thickness used by Jeremiah (52:21).

FINGER NAIL signatures were common among the Chaldeans. "An indentation was made with the finger nail on one of the sides of the (soft clay) tablet, and this mark, followed or preceded by the mention of a name, 'Nail of Zabudamik,' 'Nail of Abzii,' took the place of more or less complicated sign-manuals" (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, p. 731).

FINING POT. See METALS, WORKERS IN, art. "Handicrafts."

FINISHER (Gr. τελειωτής, tel-i-o-lace', completer), spoken of Jesus (Heb. 12:2) as one who in his own person raised faith to its perfection and so set before us the highest example of faith (Grimm, Gr. Lex., s. v.).

FINS (Heb. כִּיָּסִי, sen-ap-prer') were a distinctive mark of such fish as might be eaten under the Mosaic law (Lev. 11:9, 10, 12; Deut. 14:9, 10). See Food.

FIR. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

FIRE (Heb. אֵשׁ, aysh; Gr. πῦρ, pyr). The invention of fire antedates history and seems to be assumed in the first sacrifice of Cain and Abel (Gen. 4:3). No nation has yet been discovered which did not know the use of fire; but the way in which it was first procured is unknown. Entering so largely into the life of men it has naturally been the subject of many legends. The ancient Chaldeans looked upon Gibir (or Gibil), the lord of fire, as their most powerful auxiliary against the Annunaki, an order of inferior but malignant beings. Gibir is addressed as the one who lightens up the darkness, who melts the copper and tin, the gold and silver (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, p. 635). According to Greek mythology Prometheus, when Zeus denied fire to mortals, stole it from Olympus and brought it to men in a hollow reed. For this he was punished by being chained on a rock in the wilds of Seythia.

The various uses of fire are given in the following sections:

1. Domestic. The preparation of food presupposes the use of fire, which the Israelites seem, at least in later times, to have produced by striking steel against flint (2 Macc. 10:3), although the oldest method known was that of rubbing two pieces of wood together. Besides for cooking purposes fire is often needed in Palestine for warmth (Jer. 36:22; Mark 14:54; John 18:18). Sometimes a hearth, with chimney, was constructed, on which lighted wood, or pans of charcoal, was placed. In Persia a hole made in the floor is sometimes filled with charcoal, on which a sort of table is set covered with a carpet, the company drawing the carpet over their feet. Rooms are warmed in Egypt with pans of charcoal. The use of charcoal in reducing and fashioning metals was well known among the Hebrews. See METALS, WORKERS IN, art. "Handicrafts".

2. Laws Regulating Fire. The law forbade any fire to be kindled on the Sabbath, even for culinary purposes (Exod. 35:3; Num. 15:32, sq.). This did not, probably, forbid the use of fire for warmth. The dryness of the land in the hot season made fires the more likely to occur (Judg. 8:15), and the law ordered that anyone kindling a fire which caused damage to grain should make restitution (Exod. 22:6; comp. Judg. 15:4, 5; 2 Sam. 14:30).

3. Religious. Fire was used to consume the burnt offerings and the incense offering, beginning with the sacrifice of Noah (Gen. 8:20) and continued in the ever-burning fire on the altar. "In the sacrificial flame the essence of the animal was resolved into vapor; so that when a man presented a sacrifice in his own stead, his inmost being, his spirit, and his heart ascended to God in the vapor, and the sacrifice brought the feeling of his heart before God" (K. and D., Com.). This altar-fire was thought by most to be miraculously sent from God (Lev. 6:9, 13; 9:24), like the fire of Jehovah which consumed the sacrifices of David and Solomon (1 Chron. 21:26; 2 Chron. 7:1). Keil and Delitzsch (Com., Lev. 9:24) say: "The miracle recorded in this verse did not consist in the fact that the sacrificial offerings placed upon the altar were burned by fire which proceeded from Jehovah, but in the fact that the sacrifices, which were already on fire, were suddenly consumed by it." Fire was to be constantly burning upon the altar without going out, in order "that the burnt offering might never go out, because this was the divinely appointed symbol and visible sign of the uninterrupted worship of Jehovah, which the covenant nation could never suspend either day or night without being unfaithful to its calling" (K. and D., Com., Lev. 6:12). If by any calamity the sacred fire was extinguished, according to the Talmud, it was only to be rekindled by friction. Fire for sacred purposes obtained elsewhere than from the altar was called "strange fire," for the use of which Nadab and Abihu were punished with death by fire from God (Lev. 10:1, 2; Num. 3:4; 26:61). When the Israelites returned with booty taken from the Midianites, Eleazar, whose duty it was to see that the laws of purification were properly observed, told them that "the ordinance of the law" was that all articles which could bear it were to be drawn through the fire, and then sprinkled with the water of purification (Num. 31:21-23). The victims slain for sin offerings were afterward consumed by fire without the camp (Lev. 4:12, 21; 6:30; 16:27; Heb. 13:11). The Nazarite, on the day when the time of his consecration expired, shaved his head and put the hair into the altar fire, under the peace offering that was burning, and thus handed over and sacrificed to the Lord the hair which had been worn in honor of him (Num. 6:18).

4. Penal. Capital punishment was sometimes aggravated by burning the body of the criminal after death (Lev. 20:14; 21:9; Josh. 7:25; 2 Kings 23:16). See PUNISHMENTS, WARFARE.

5. Figurative. Fire was a symbol of the Lord's presence and the instrument of his power, either in the way of approval or of destruction (Exod. 14:19, 24; Num. 11:1, 3, etc.). Thus Jehovah appeared in the burning bush and on Mount Sinai (Exod. 3:2; 19:18). In the midst of fire he showed himself to Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John (Isa. 6:4; Ezek. 1:4; Rev. 1:14), and will so appear at his second coming (2 Thess. 1:8). Jehovah guided the Israelites through the wilderness with the pillar of fire (Exod. 13:21). God is compared to fire, not only because of his glorious brightness, but on account of his anger against sin, which consumes sinners as fire does stubble (Deut. 32:22; Isa. 10:17; Ezek. 21:31; Heb. 12:29). Fire is illustrative of: The Church overcoming her enemies (Obad. 18); the word of God (Jer. 5:14; 23:29); the Holy Spirit (Isa. 4:4; Acts 2:3); the zeal of saints (Psa. 39:3; 119:139), and of angels (Psa. 104:4; Heb. 1:7); of lust (Prov. 6:27, 28), and of wickedness (Isa. 9:18); of the tongue (Prov. 16:27; James 3:6); the hope of hypocrites (Isa. 50:11; persecution (Luke 12:49-53), and of judgments (Jer. 48:46; Lam. 1:13; Ezek. 39:6). Fire, in its symbolical use, is also spoken of as purifying—the emblem of a healing process effected upon the spiritual natures of persons in covenant with God (Isa. 4:4; Mal. 3:2).

FIRE BAPTISM. See MOLOCH, WORSHIP OF.

FIRE, STRANGE. See FIRE, III.

FIRE WORSHIP, or pyrolatry. As a symbol of purity, or of the divine presence and power, or as one of the constituent elements, or as typifying the destructive element in nature, fire has been from early times the object of worship by many peoples, e. g., the ancient Persians and Medes. The faith of the Magi made the elements of nature the direct objects of worship. These were fire, water, earth, and air, of which the first was considered the most energetic and sublime. So the priest built an altar, and the sacred fire caught from heaven was kindled and kept burning always. The priest was the Holy Magus. No other might attend the altars or conduct the mystic rites. No breath of mortal might be blown upon the sacred flame without pollution; the burning of dead bodies was a horrid profanation, and of the sacrificial offerings only a fragment of fat was given to the flame. This worship among the Canaanites is frequently referred to in the Scriptures, and the people warned against joining in its abominations (Lev. 18:21; Deut. 12:31; 1 Kings 11:7; 2 Chron. 28:3; Ezek. 16:20, 21, etc.). In spite, however, of these warnings, the people caused their children to pass through the fire to Molech. See GODS, FALSE.

Fire worship was practiced also among the Carthaginians, Scythians, the ancient Germans, the ancient inhabitants of Great Britain; and traces of it are found in Mexican and Peruvian worship. The Mexican god of fire, Xihuitculli (the Lord of Fire), was a very ancient deity. He is represented naked, with his chin blackened, with a headdress of green feathers, carrying on his back a kind of serpent, with yellow feathers, thus combining the fire colors. . . . Sacrifice was offered to him daily. In every house the first libation and the first morsel of bread were consecrated to him. And as an instance of the astounding resemblance between the religious development of the Old World and that of the New, the fire in Mexico, as in ancient Iran and other countries of Asia and Europe, in every house must be extinguished on a certain day in every year; and the priest of Xihuitculli kindled fire anew by friction before the statue of the god. . . . "At set of sun" of this day "all who had prisoners of war or slaves to offer to the deity brought forward their victims, painted with the colors of the god, danced along by their side, and shut them up in a building attached to the teocalli of fire. At midnight each owner severed a lock of the hair of his slave or slaves, to be carefully preserved as a talisman. At daybreak they brought out the victims, the priests took them upon their shoulders, and flung their human burden upon the fire" (Reville, Religions of Mexico and Peru, p. 62, sq., 83). Among the Peruvians "Fire, considered as derived from the sun, was the object of profound veneration. Strange as it may seem at first sight, the symbol of fire was stones. But . . . stones were thought to be animated by the fire that was supposed to be shut up within them, since it could be made to issue forth by a sharp blow. A perpetual fire burned in the Temple of the Sun and in the abode of the Virgins of the Sun. It was supposed that fire became polluted and lost its divine nature by too long contact with men. The fire must be renewed from time to time, and this act was performed yearly by the chief priest of Peru, who kindled wood by means of a concave golden mirror" (ibid., p. 162, 163).

FIREBRAND. 1. Lap-peed, (Heb. ^{נֶרֶךְ}, torch, Judg. 15:4). The firebrand used by Samson was probably a torch made of resinous wood or other material tenacious of flame. His tying the foxes tail to tail was to prevent them from running to their holes, and by impeding their progress do more effectual execution. Similar conflagrations produced by animals, particularly by foxes, were well known to Greeks and Romans.

2. Zake (Heb. ^{זֶקֶן}, Prov. 26:18), i. e., arrows fitted with combustibles (comp. Eph. 6:16).

3. Ood (Heb. ^{וֹד}, Isa. 7:4; Amos 4:11), the fag ends of wooden pokers (literally, fire stirrers), which would not blaze any more, but only continue smoking.

FIREPAN (Heb. ^{מִזְבֵּחַ}, makh-taw).

1. Snuff dishes, i. e., dishes to receive the snuff when taken from the lamps of the holy place (Exod. 25:38).

2. An ashan or vessel used for taking away the coal from the fire on the altar (Exod. 27:3; Lev. 16:12, etc.).

FIRES (Heb. ^{אֵשׁ}, oor). In Isa. 24:15 we read, "Glorify ye the Lord in the fires," but which is better rendered in the R. V. "East." The lands of the Asiatic East were called oo-reeem, the lands of light, i. e., the sun-rising, as opposed to the West, i. e., "from the sea" (v. 14).

FIRKIN. See METROLOGY, II.

FIRMAMENT (Heb. ^{רָקִיעַ}, raw-keel'-ah, expanse, Gen. 1:6, 14, 15, 17), the pure and transparent expanse of ether which envelops the globe. This was made by God on the second day of creation, for the purpose of separating the sea from the clouds. As used in the record of creation, the raw-keel'-ah, or firmament, includes not merely the lower heavens, or atmospheric sky, with its clouds and vapors, but the whole visible expanse up to the region of the fixed stars. For it is said that on the fourth day God made in the firmament sun, moon, and stars. A controversy has arisen respecting the sense attached by the Hebrew writers to raw-keel'-ah, chiefly on account of the ancient translations given of it, and the poetical representations found of the upper regions of the visible heavens in some parts of Scripture. The Septuagint renders σφαιρωμα, ster-eh'-o-mah, meaning generally "some compact mass," while the Vulgate has firmamentum, a prop or support. Hence it has been argued that the Hebrews understood by the word something solid, capable of bearing up the waters which accumulate in masses above, and even of having the heavenly bodies affixed to it as a crystalline pavement. As proof of this view such passages are quoted as speak of the foundations of heaven shaking (2 Sam. 22:8), of its pillars trembling (Job 26:11), of the windows or doors of heaven (Gen. 7:11; Psa. 78:23; Mal. 3:10), or of the sky being "strong as a molten looking-glass" (Job 37:18). But these expressions are manifestly of a figurative nature.

FIRST-BEGOTTEN. See FIRSTBORN.

FIRSTBORN (Heb. several words from ^{בְּרִי}, bar-kar', to burst forth; Gr. πρωτοστόκος, pro-tot-ok'-os), applied equally to animals and human beings. By the firstborn, in a religious point of view, we are to understand the first of a mother's offspring (Exod. 12:12). See INHERITANCE.

Figurative. The expression "firstborn" stands for that which is most excellent. Thus Jesus Christ is "the firstborn of every creature" (Heb. 12:23). "The firstborn of the poor" (Isa. 14:30) means the poorest of the poor. "The firstborn of death" (Job 18:13) is that disease which Bildad has in his mind as the one more terrible and dangerous than all others. Diseases are conceived of as the children of death.

FIRSTBORN, DESTRUCTION OF. See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

FIRSTBORN IN ISRAEL. In memory of the death of Egypt's firstborn and the preservation of the firstborn of Israel, all the firstborn of Israel, both of man and beast, belonged to Jehovah (Exod. 13:2, 15; comp. 12:11-15).

1. Sanctification of the Firstborn of Man.

This was closely connected with Israel's deliverance from Egypt, and the object of that deliverance was their sanctification. Because Jehovah had delivered the firstborn of Israel they were to be sanctified to him. The fundamental element upon which this sanctification rests is evidently the representative character of the firstborn, standing for the entire offspring. Moreover, the firstborn of newly married people were believed to represent the prime of human vigor (Gen. 49:3; Psa. 78:51). Then, too, all Israel were in outward standing and covenant relationship the Lord's firstborn, being the national representatives of a redeemed Church, to be brought out of every kindred, tongue, and people, and as such they were a nation of priests (Exod. 4:22, 23; 19:6).

2. Redemption. The firstborn was the priest of the whole family. The honor of exercising the priesthood was transferred, by the command of God through Moses, from the tribe of Reuben, to whom it belonged by right of primogeniture, to that of Levi (Num. 3:12-18; 8:18). In consequence of this fact, that God had taken the Levites to serve him as priests, the firstborn of the other tribes were redeemed. They were presented to the Lord when a month old, and, according to the priest's estimation, were redeemed by a sum not exceeding five shekels (Num. 18:16). When the Levites were set apart Moses numbered the firstborn of Israel, to exchange them for the Levites. The number of the firstborn of the twelve tribes amounted to 22,273 of a month old and upward. Of this number 22,000 were exchanged for the 22,000 Levites. This left 273 to be redeemed, whose redemption money (1,365 shekels) was to be paid to Aaron and his sons as compensation for the persons who properly belonged to Jehovah (Num. 8:40, sq.). The Jewish doctors held that if the child died before the expiration of thirty days the father was excused from payment; if the child was sickly, or appeared otherwise to be inferior to children generally, the priest could estimate it at less than five shekels; or, if he found the parents were poor, he might return the money after the ceremony. When the mother's days of purification were accomplished, and she could appear in the temple, she brought the child to the priest to be publicly presented to the Lord (Luke 2:22). The Jews still observe this law of redemption when the firstborn male is thirty days old, inviting to their house friends and a priest to a meal on the following day. The priest, having invoked the divine blessing upon the meal and offered some introductory prayers, etc., looks at the child and the redemption money placed before him, and asks the father to choose between the money and the child. Upon the father's reply that he would rather pay the redemption money, the priest takes it, swings it round the head of the child, in token of his vicarious authority, saying, "This is for the firstborn; this is in lieu of it; this redeems it," etc. When the firstborn is thirteen years old he fasts the day before the feast of Passover, in commemoration of the sparing of the firstborn in Egypt.

3. Redemption of the Firstborn of Animals. (1) Of clean animals. The firstborn male of animals was devoted to the Lord, and, if a clean animal, was sacrificed to him. It was to be brought to the sanctuary within a year, dating from the eighth day after birth, and there offered in sacrifice; the blood sprinkled upon the altar, the fat burned upon it, while all the remaining flesh (as the breast and the right shoulder, in the case of peace offerings) belonged to the priest (Num. 18:17, sq.; comp. Exod. 13:13; 22:30; 34:20; Neh. 10:36). If the animal had some severe blemish—happened to be blind or lame—it was eaten at home by the owner. Before the sacrifice the animal was not to be used for any work, as it belonged to the Lord (Deut. 15:19). (2) Of unclean animals. The firstborn of unclean animals were to be redeemed according to the valuation of the priest, with the addition of a fifth; and if this was not done it was to be sold at the estimated value. By this regulation the earlier law, which commanded that an ass should either be redeemed with a sheep or put to death (Exod. 13:13; 34:20), was modified in favor of the revenues of the sanctuary and its servants. Nothing, however, that a man had devoted (banned) to the Lord of his property (man, beast, or field) was to be sold or redeemed, because it was most holy (Lev. 27:28, 29). Similarly with regard to the produce of the soil—i. e., the products of agriculture—the first of which (i. e., the best of the firstlings of which) were sacred to the Lord (Exod. 23:19; Deut. 18:4). See FIRST FRUIT.

4. Birthright (Heb. בְּכוֹרָה, bek-o-raw), the term applied to the peculiar advantages, privileges, and responsibilities of the firstborn among the Israelites. The firstborn was the object of special affection to his parents, and inherited peculiar rights and privileges. Before these are given it will be proper to call attention to the fact that, in case a man married a widow with children by a former husband, the firstborn, as respected the second husband, was the eldest child by the second marriage. Attention is also called to the additional fact that, before the time of Moses, the father might transfer the right of primogeniture to a younger child; but the practice occasioned much contention (Gen. 25:31, 32), and a law was enacted overruling it (Deut. 21:15-17). The rights and privileges of the firstborn were: (1) The firstborn received a double portion of the estate, the other sons single and equal portions. Thus, for example, if there were five sons the property would be divided into six portions, of which the eldest son received two sixths, each of the others one sixth. Where there were two wives, one loved, the other hated, the father is not to prefer the later-born son of the favorite wife to the older firstborn of the hated one, but is to give the right of primogeniture (with two portions of the estate) to the beginning of his strength (Deut. 21:15-17). Jacob took away the right of primogeniture from Reuben because of his incestuous conduct (Gen. 49:4; comp. 35:22), and transferred it to Joseph by adopting his two sons (Gen. 48:20-22; 1 Chron. 5:1). (2) The firstborn was the head of the whole family. Originally the priesthood belonged to the tribe of Reuben, as the firstborn, but was transferred to the tribe of Levi (Num. 3:12-18; 8:18). The firstborn enjoyed an authority over those who were younger similar to that possessed by a father (Gen. 35:23, sq.; 2 Chron. 21:3). As head of the family he had also, according to patriarchal custom, to provide food, clothing, and other necessities in his house for his mother till death, and his unmarried sisters till their marriage.

FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK. See LORD'S DAY, SUNDAY.

FIRST FRUIT (Heb. ראשית, ray-sheeth', first; בְּרִיָּה, bik-koor', first ripe; Gr. ἀρχή, ap-ar-khay', beginning). Like the firstborn of man and beast, the first fruits were sacred to Jehovah, as Lord of the soil (Exod. 23:19; Deut. 18:4, etc.).

1. Character of, etc. (1) In general, first fruits included those in the raw state (as grain and fruit); those prepared for use as food (wine, oil, flour, and dough), including even wool (Exod. 22:29; 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 18:4, etc.). (2) The firstling sheaf at the Passover (q. v.) presented by the congregation before the commencement of the grain harvest (Lev. 23:10, 11). Josephus says that the sheaf was of barley, and that, until this ceremony had been performed, no harvest work was to be done (Ant., iii, 10, 5). (3) The firstling loaf at Pentecost (q. v.), when the harvest was completed. Two of these loaves, made of the new flour (wheat) and leavened, like the sheaf above mentioned, were waved before the Lord (Lev. 23:15; Exod. 34:22; Num. 28:26).

2. Offering of First Fruits, etc. Regard ing the firstling (see PASSOVER and PENTECOST, art. "Festivals"), no private offerings of first fruits were allowed before the public oblation of the two loaves (Lev. 23:15, 20). The law nowhere specifies the amount that was to be given in the shape of offerings of this kind, but leaves it to each individual's discretion; only it provided that the choicest portions were always to be offered (Num. 18:12). "Neither is it stated in the law what were to be the different products of the soil from which firstlings were to be offered, but that the whole produce of husbandry was meant is implied in the spirit of the law itself. Accordingly, in the time of Hezekiah, firstlings of grain, wine, oil, honey, and of the whole produce of the soil, were offered" (2 Chron. 31:5). This may further be inferred from the regulation to the effect that, of every tree bearing edible fruit which any Israelite might plant, the fruits of the fourth year, the earliest period at which they could be eaten, were to be sacred to the Lord; and, consequently, they must have been presented to him as an offering (Lev. 19:23, sq.).

3. Manner of Offering. The first fruits were brought in a basket to the sanctuary and presented to the priest, who was to set the basket down before the altar of the Lord. Then the offerer recited the story of Jacob's going to Egypt, and the deliverance of his posterity therefrom, and acknowledged the blessings with which God had visited him (Deut. 26:2-11). It being found almost impracticable for every Israelite to go on this mission to Jerusalem, the following custom arose. The inhabitants of a district prepared a basket with seven kinds of ripe fruit, arranged in the following order: Barley in the bottom, then wheat, olives, dates, pomegranates, figs, and grapes. This basket was watched all night by a company of at least twenty-four persons, who stayed in the open market place, being afraid to go into a house lest the death of an inmate should cause pollution. In the morning the company set out for Jerusalem. An ox (to be the peace offering) went before them with gilded horns and an olive crown upon its head, the people singing, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord" (Psa. 122:1). On approaching Jerusalem a messenger was sent to announce their arrival, and the first fruits were tastefully arranged. The officiating priest, the Levites, and the treasurers went out to meet them (the number of officials depending upon the size of the party), and accompanied them into the city, singing, as they entered, "Our feet stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem" (Psa. 122:2). The piper, who led the music of the party, continued to play until the procession came to the mount of the temple. Here everyone, even the king, took his own basket upon his shoulders and went forward till they came to the court of the temple, singing, "Praise ye the Lord; praise God in his sanctuary," etc. (Psa. 150). The Levites responded with "I will extol thee, O Lord!" etc. Then the pigeons which were hung about the baskets were taken for burnt offerings. With the baskets still upon their shoulders everyone began the story of Jacob till he came to the words, "A wandering Syrian was my father" (see Deut. 26:3-5), when he let down his basket, holding it by the brim. The priest then put his hands under it and waved it, the offerer continuing to recite the story. When he reached Deut. 26:10, "And now, behold, I have brought the first fruits," etc., he put the basket beside the altar and, having prostrated himself, departed. After passing the night in Jerusalem the pilgrims returned the following day to their homes.

4. Exemptions. Exemptions were made in the case of: Those who simply possessed the trees, without owning the land, for they could not say, "The land which thou hast given me." Those living beyond the Jordan could not bring first fruits in the proper sense of the libation, not being able to say the words of the service, from "the land that floweth with milk and honey" (Deut. 26:10-15). A proselyte, though bringing the offering, was not to recite the service, being unable to say, "I am come to the country which the Lord swore unto our fathers to give us." Stewards, servants, slaves, women, sexless persons, and hermaphrodites were not allowed to recite the service, because they could not use the words, "I have brought the first fruits of the land, which thou, O Lord, hast given me" (Deut. 26:10), they having originally had no share in the land.

5. Historical. After the time of Solomon the corruption of the nation led to neglect of these as well as of other legal enactments, and their restoration was among the reforms brought about by Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:5, 11). Nehemiah also, after the captivity, reorganized the offerings of first fruits of both kinds and appointed places to receive them (Neh. 10:35, 37; 12:44). An offering of first fruits, brought to Elisha, was miraculously increased so as to feed one hundred persons (2 Kings 4:42). First fruits were sent to Jerusalem by Jews living in foreign countries (Josephus, Ant., xvi, 6, 7).

6. Figurative. Of the Jewish Church it was said, "Israel was holiness unto the Lord, and the first fruits of his increase" (Jer. 2:3). In the New Testament first fruits are emblematical of abundance, excellence, and sample of full harvest. Paul says that Christians "have the first fruits of the Spirit" (Rom. 8:23) i. e., the first manifestations of the Spirit in the Gospel dispensation. Christ was "the first fruits of them that slept," i. e., the first who rose from the dead (1 Cor. 15: 20, 23; 16:15; Rom. 11:16, etc.). Converts are called first-fruits, as Epenetus (Rom. 16:5).

FISH. See ANIMAL KINGDOM, FOOD.

Figurative. This term is used to signify the inhabitants of Egypt (Ezek. 29:4, 5); the visible Church (Matt. 13:48); defenseless people taken by the Chaldeans (Hab. 1:14). In Christian symbolism the fish is of great significance. "It is among the earliest art forms, and pertains to a period of Church history which causes it to be among the most interesting and important objects in the whole range of Christian symbolism. It is generally thought to be the symbol of Christ. The word in Greek was made up of the initial letters of the words in the article of faith so dear to the early Church: I, Ἰησοῦς, Jesus; X, Χριστός, Christ; Θ, Θεοῦ, of God; Υ, Υἱός, Son; Σ, Σωτήρ, Saviour—Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour. The fish is also used to represent Christ's disciples.

Probably, as suggested by Tertullian, the water and the rite of baptism were prominently in their thought, while secondary reference may have been had to the parable of the net or to the command of Christ to Peter and Andrew, 'Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men' (Matt. 4:18, 19) (Bennett, Christ. Arch., 77, 92).

FISH GATE (Heb. שַׁעַר הַדְּגִים, shah'-ar had-dawg-yeem', gate of the fishes), the name (2 Chron. 33:14; Neh. 3:3; 12:39) of one of the gates of JERUSALEM (q. v.). It probably took its name from the fact of fish being brought through it on the way to the city, or from the fish market being located near it.

FISH POOL (Heb. בְּרִיקָה, ber-ay-kaw', pool), in general a pond or reservoir; thought by our translators at Cant. 7:4 to be intended for fish (q. v.), such as were anciently constructed for pleasure angling.

FISHER (Heb. דָּוָג, dav-vawg'; Gr. ἄλιευς, hal-ee-yoos'). In addition to the usual meaning, the Lord called his disciples "fishers of men" (Matt. 4:19; Mark 1:17). See FISHING.

FISHHOOK (Hebrew plural סִירוֹת דִּיגָה, seer-oth' doo-gaw', horns of fishing).

1. The prophet Amos (4:2), in denouncing the voluptuous grandees of Samaria, predicts as follows: "God will take you away with hooks, and your posterity with fishhooks." Dr. Keil (Com., in loco), says: "The figure is not taken from animals, into whose noses hooks and rings are inserted to tame them, or from large fishes that are let down into the water again by nose hooks; but from the catching of fishes that are drawn out of the fish pond with hooks."

2. A ring placed in the mouth of fishes and attached to a cord to keep them alive in the water (Job 41:1, 2). See FISHING.

FISHING (Heb. דָּיג, deeg'; Gr. ἄλιευω, hal-ee-yoo'-o'). Fishing has always been an industry pursued by a large number of people in Palestine. The natives are exceedingly fond of fish, and pay double to triple the price for it that they do for flesh. The Turkish government realizes a handsome sum by the octroi tax on it. The methods of taking fish mentioned in the Bible are: (1) Angling with a hook (Isa. 19:8; Hab. 1:15; Job 41:1; Amos 4:2). (2) Spearing (Job 41:7). In this passage the reference is to the crocodile, but he is included under the generic idea of fish as conceived by the Hebrew mind, i. e., a creature living more or less in the water. (3) Netting. They used the cast net (Ezek. 26:5, 14; 32:3; 47:

10; Hab. 1:15, 17; Mic. 7:2; Eccles. 7:26; Matt. 4. 18, sq.; Mark 1:16, etc.). This consists of a net with fine meshes and of a circular form, about fifteen feet in diameter. The margin is loaded with leaden sinkers. To the center of the net is attached a long piece of fish line. This is held in the left hand, while the net, which has been previously gathered up in the right, is cast by a broad sweep of the arm over an area of the shallow water close to the shore, where the fisherman has previously observed a shoal of fish. The center of the net is now drawn up by means of the cord, and the fisherman wades into the water and secures the catch. The seine is also very much used. Half of it is loaded into one boat and the other half in another, and the boats then separate, paying out the net as they go and inclosing a vast area of the water. When all the net has been paid out the boats draw it toward the shore and land the ends of the net. The two crews now commence to draw in their respective ends of the net, thus inclosing the draught of fishes and gradually landing them (Matt. 13:48). At other times the two boats inclose a circle in the water and draw the fishes into the boats (Luke 5:4-9). The seine is also mentioned in the Old Testament (Isa. 19:8; Hab. 1:15). The writer has seen a fisherman in Egypt bore a hole through the tails of fishes caught by a hook and string them on a cord, and fasten one-end of the cord to a stake in the water to keep them fresh. Four of Christ's twelve disciples were fishermen. Christ promises them that they shall become fishers of men (Mark 1:17, etc.).—G. E. P.

FITCHES. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.
FLAG. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.
FLAG. See STANDARD.

FLAGON, the rendering in the A. V. of two Hebrew terms:

1. Ash-ee-shaw' (אֶשֶׁשׂוֹא, pressed together, 2 Sam. 6:19; 1 Chron. 16:3; Cant. 2:5). The meaning of this word is, doubtless, a cake of pressed raisins, such as are a common refreshment in the East. In the passage in Hosea (3:1) grape or raisin cakes are delicacies, figuratively representing that idolatrous worship which appeals to the senses and gratifies the carnal appetites and desires (comp. Job 20:12). Loving grape cakes is equivalent to indulgence in sensuality.

2. Neh'-bel (נֶחֱבֵל, a skin, Isa. 22:24). This word is commonly used for a bottle or pitcher made either of skin or earthenware (Isa. 30:14). The word sometimes occurs with the force of a musical instrument, generally rendered "psaltery," but sometimes "viol." See GLOSSARY.

FLAKE (Heb. מַפְּאוֹל, map-pawol', pendulous), the dewlaps or flabby parts on the belly of the crocodile (Job 41:23), which are firmly attached to the body and do not hang loosely as on the ox.

FLAME. See FIRE.

FLANK (Heb. כֶּהַל, keh'-sel, loin), the internal muscles of the loins near the kidneys, to which the fat adheres (Lev. 3:4, 10, 15; 7:4); hence the viscera in general, figuratively for the inmost feelings (Psa. 38:7, "loins"). The expression "he maketh collops of fat on his flanks" (Job 15:27) is used to denote the results of self-pampering.

FLAX. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

FLEA. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FLEECE (Heb. זֶה, gaze, sheared, Deut. 18:4; Job 31:20), the wool of a sheep, whether on the living animal, shorn off, or attached to the flayed skin. The miracle of Gideon's fleece (Judg. 6:37, 39, 40) consists of the dew having fallen one time upon the fleece, without any on the floor, and that at another time the fleece remained dry while the ground was wet with dew.

FLESH. 1. Esh-pawr' (Heb. אֶשֶׁתָּוֶר, 2 Sam. 6:19; 1 Chron. 16:3), an obscure word, understood by the Rabbins as signifying a piece of flesh or roast meat; but Gesenius and Rædiger have given their explanation of the word as signifying a measure of wine, or drink.

2. The rendering of two words in the original Hebrew and Greek (Heb. בָּשָׂר, baw-sawr', freshness; Gr. σάρξ, sarkē). These words have various meanings, as follows: (1) In a general sense of the whole animal creation, man or beast (Gen. 6:13, 17, 19; 7:15, 16, 21; 8:17; Matt. 24:22; 1 Pet. 1:24). (2) Of the flesh of the living body, both of men and beasts (Gen. 41:2, 19; Job 33:21; 1 Cor. 15:39); and as distinguished from other parts of the body, e. g., from bones (Luke 24:39). (3) In the sense of our word meat, i. e., the flesh of cattle used for food (Exod. 16:12; Lev. 7:19; Num. 11:4, 13); see FOOD. (4) The body as distinguished from the spirit (Job 14:22; 19:26; Prov. 14:30; Isa. 10:18, margin; John 6:52; 1 Cor. 6:5; 2 Cor. 4:11; 7:1; Col. 2:5; 1 Pet. 4:6); so also "flesh and blood" as a periphrasis for the whole animal nature or man (Heb. 2:14). (5) Human nature, man (Gen. 2:23; Matt. 19:5, 6; 1 Cor. 6:16; Eph. 5:29-31); also of the incarnation of Christ (John 1:14; 6:51; Rom. 1:3; Eph. 2:15; Col. 1:22; Heb. 5:7; 10:20, etc.). (6) Natural or physical origin, generation, relationship (Gen. 29:14; 37:27; Judg. 9:2; 2 Sam. 5:1; 19:18; John 1:13; Rom. 9:8; Heb. 2:11-14; 12:9); of one's countryman (Rom. 9:3; 11:14; Acts 2:30; Gal. 4:23); a fellow-mortal (Isa. 58:7). (7) The sensuous nature of man, "the animal nature," without any suggestion of depravity, sexual desire (John 1:13); with cravings which excite to sin (Matt. 26:41; Mark 14:38). (8) "Mere human nature, the earthly nature of man apart from divine influence, and therefore prone to sin and opposed to God; accordingly it includes in the soul whatever is weak, low, debased, tending to ungodliness and vice" (see Rom. 8:3, 5, 6; 2 Cor. 7:5; Gal. 5:16; Eph. 2:3). (9) As a modest, general term for the secret parts (Gen. 17:11; Exod. 28:42, margin; Lev. 15:2, 3, 7, 16, 19; 2 Pet. 2:10; Jude 7).

3. Other terms occasionally rendered "flesh" in the Old Testament are: Sheh-ayr' (Heb. שֶׁחַיִר, Psa. 73:26; 78:20, 27; Prov. 11:17, etc.), having a more special reference to the muscle or physical element as food. Tib-khaw' (Heb. תִּבְכָּוָה, a slaughtered carcass, 1 Sam. 25:11). Law-khoom' (Heb. לָוֶהוּ, food, Zeph. 1:17). See FOOD.

FLESH AND BLOOD (Gr. σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα), an expression denoting man as fallible, liable to err (Matt. 16:17; comp. Gal. 1:16; Eph. 6:12).

FLESH HOOK (Heb. מַזְלַיִג', maz-layyig', and מַזְלַיִגָּה, maz-law-gaw'), an instrument used in sacrificial services (Exod. 27:3; 38:3; Num. 4:14; 1 Chron. 28:17; 2 Chron. 4:16); probably a fork, with its many tines bent back to draw away the flesh. The implement in 1 Sam. 2:13, 14, is stated to be three-tined, and was apparently the ordinary fork with prongs for culinary purposes, of course, of large size.

FLESH "OFFERED TO IDOLS" (1 Cor. 8:1, sq.; comp. Acts 15:20). This consisted of those parts of the animals offered in heathen sacrifices which remained over after the priests had received their share, and which were either eaten in the temple, or at home in connection with sacrificial feasts, or else (by poor or miserly persons) sold in the flesh markets. This was a very practical matter, as the Christian might easily come to eat such meat, either through being invited to a feast by heathen acquaintances (10:27), or by buying it in the market (10:25), and thereby offense would be given to scrupulous consciences. On the other hand, those of freer spirit, and with more of Paul's own mode of thinking, might be apt to make light of the matter, and withal forget how a Christian ought to spare the weak. See EXPEDIENCY.

FLESH POT (Heb. הַבְּשָׂר, seer hab-baw-sawr', pot of the flesh, Exod. 16:3). This was probably the bronze vessels with three legs, and used for culinary purposes by the Egyptians, such as is represented in the paintings of the tombs.

FLIES. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FLINT. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

FLOAT (Heb. לִּבְרֵית, do-ber-aw'), of uncertain derivation. A raft for conveying bulky substances by water. Thus Solomon contracted with Hiram, king of Tyre, to have cedars cut on the western side of Mount Lebanon and floated to Jaffa (1 Kings 5:9). Sometimes spelled "flote" (2 Chron. 2:16).

FLOCK. Figurative. In addition to the usual sense of sheep (see ANIMAL KINGDOM), taken collectively the term is applied to the Church, whether of Israel in the olden times or the Christian Church (Isa. 40:11; Matt. 26:31; Luke 12:32; 1 Pet. 5:2, 3). "Flock of the slaughter" (Zech. 11:4) is an expression that may be applied either to a flock that is being slaughtered or to one that is destined to be slaughtered in the future. From verse 11 it would appear that Israel is the flock referred to, and not the human race. "Israel was given up by Jehovah into the hands of the nations or imperial powers to punish it for its sin. But as these nations abused the power intrusted to them and sought utterly to destroy the nation of God, which they ought only to have chastised, the Lord takes charge of his people as their shepherd" (K. and D., Com., in loco).

FLOOD, or DELUGE (Heb. מַבּוּל, mab-bool'; Gr. κατακλυσμός, kat-ak-looc-mos').

1. Bible Account. There are many references in Scripture to the Flood, as one of the prominent and important facts in the world's history; but the historical account is given in Genesis (chaps. 6-8). Attention is first pointedly drawn to the cause of this judgment, viz., "the wickedness of man was great in the earth" (6:5-7, 11-13), which had reached a height altogether subversive of the great end of God in the creation of mankind, and of the real well-being of the world itself.

"The announcement of the commencement, course, and termination of the Flood abounds in repetitions; but the connection is well sustained, and no links could be erased without producing a gap" (K. and D., Com.). At the command of God Noah built an ark (q. v.), in which he and his family were to be saved during the coming flood. The ark was finished when Noah was in his six hundredth year, and all its living freight was gathered into it. "And the Lord shut him in" (7:16). After a pause of seven days "the waters of the flood were upon the earth."

In Isaiah (54:9) the Flood is spoken of as "the waters of Noah." In the New Testament our Lord gives the sanction of his own authority to the historical truth of the narrative (Matt. 24:37, sq.; Luke 17:26). Peter speaks of the "long-suffering of God" which "waited in the days of Noah while the ark was preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water" (1 Pet. 3:20), and cites it as an example of God's righteous judgment (2 Pet. 2:5).

Table of Events.	Genesis.
Noah, in his six hundredth year, enters the ark with his family.....	7:1-9.
The rain begins on seventeenth of second month, and lasts forty days.....	7:10-17.
The rain ceases; the waters prevail....	7:18-24.

Table of Events.	Genesis.
The ark rests on Ararat, seventeenth day of seventh month.....	8:1-4.
Tops of mountains visible, first day of tenth month.....	8:5.
Raven and dove sent out.....	8:6-9.
Dove again sent out seven days after, and returns with olive branch.....	8:10, 11.
Dove sent out the third time, after seven days, and returns no more.....	8:12.
Ground becomes dry, six hundred and first year, first month, and first day; covering of ark removed.....	8:13.
Noah leaves the ark, second month, twenty-seventh day.....	8:14-19

Thus it will be seen that the Deluge lasted twelve lunar months and ten days, or exactly one solar year. See SUPPLEMENT.

2. Extent of Flood. On this question two opinions have obtained—one, that the flood was general over the whole globe; the other, that it was partial, affecting only those regions inhabited by man. The following considerations favor the probability of a partial flood. (1) The design to be fulfilled by the "flood of waters." That design was plainly not to destroy and remodel the surface of the earth, but rather to sweep off men on account of their wickedness. The opinion of a universal flood either takes it for granted that the whole world was peopled in the days of Noah, or that vast portions of the land were involved in ruin, although uninhabited by man. For the first alternative there is no evidence in Scripture. Again, it would have been impossible for Noah to have preached righteousness to men if they had dwelt in all lands. The second alternative necessitates our belief in the destruction of large portions of the earth, although uninhabited—a view opposed to the known modes of God's dealings with his creatures. (2) The astronomical difficulties in the way of the theory of a universal deluge are great. Supposing the earth's crust to have been about the same as now, the water must have risen about five miles above the sea level, so as to cover the top of the highest mountain. This would increase the equatorial diameter of the earth by some ten or twelve miles. The orbit round the sun would consequently be altered. The influence of its attraction on the planets would be increased, and thus the element of disorder reach to the utmost regions of space. After a year all this change would be done away with by the return of the earth to its original condition, and all this disturbance of the whole universe result from the method of destroying a comparatively small portion of creation. (3) The geological objections to a universal deluge are also formidable. In many parts of the earth is found a diluvium, or drift, supposed to owe its origin to the period of the Deluge. This diluvium, lying near the surface of the earth, and composed of various materials—sand, pebbles, fragments of rocks, organic remains—and often laid as if it had been drifted into its present position by the action of a mass of waters flowing in a particular direction, was at first naturally connected with the Deluge.

A more careful examination of the diluvium showed that it belonged to many different periods, and had, to considerable extent, resulted from local causes, acting over limited areas. Moreover, the agency which caused this drift was found not to be a rush of water, but ice, coming from the north. (4) Another difficulty which must be met by the advocate of a general deluge is the capacity of the ark for the support of animal life. From the description of the ark given in Genesis we are pretty certain of its dimensions; and we also know, for all practical purposes, the number of distinct species of animals, fowls, and creeping things upon the earth; and by no conceivable possibility could the ark be made to receive the whole of these by twos and sevens, and provide sufficient food for a year. The opinion, therefore, seems inevitable that the flood of Noah was a local event, and that it "was universal" only so far as it effected the destruction of the whole human race.

3. Traditions. In favor of the Mosaic account of the Deluge there are the ample traditional testimonies. The traditions of the ancient Asiatic nations are the most important, because they were the earliest to be put on record, and were also the accredited accounts of the descendants of those who settled nearest to the catastrophe. These traditions come nearest to the biblical account.

Chaldean.—The following is abbreviated from Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 565, sq.: From the beginning of the world to the Deluge they reckoned six hundred and ninety-one thousand two hundred years. Men in the meantime became wicked; they lost the habit of offering sacrifices to the gods, and the gods, justly indignant at this negligence, resolved to be avenged. Now Shamashnapsitum was reigning at this time in Shurippak, the "town of the ship;" he and all his family were saved, and he thus relates how Ea saved him from the disaster: "The great gods had determined upon the destruction of Shurippak, the city on the banks of the Euphrates. The master of wisdom, Ea, was anxious to warn me of the peril which threatened, but it was a very serious affair to betray to a mortal a secret of heaven. He therefore confided to a hedge of reeds the resolution that had been adopted." Shamashnapsitum heard the address to the field of reeds, or perhaps the reeds repeated it to him. He was to announce to his fellow-townsmen the coming flood, build himself a ship, and prepare for the catastrophe. Shamashnapsitum repeated the warning to the people, but they refused to believe it, and turned him into ridicule. The ship, one hundred and forty cubits long and one hundred and forty cubits wide on the deck, was completed; and, warned by the god, he entered with his family, servants, and possessions.' Then follows a description of the storm, which raged with such violence that even the gods were afraid of the deluge: "Six days and nights the wind continued, the deluge and the tempest raged. The seventh day, at daybreak, the storm abated; the deluge, which had carried on warfare like an army, ceased. . . . I opened the hatchway and the light fell upon my face; I sank down, I cowered, I wept, and my tears ran down my cheeks when I beheld the world all terror and all sea. At the end of twelve days a point of land stood up from the waters, the ship touched the land of Nisir; the mountain of Nisir stopped the ship and permitted it to float no longer." Then follows an account of the sending out of the dove, swallow, and raven. He resolved to conciliate the gods by expiatory ceremonies: "I sent forth the inhabitants of the ark toward the four winds; I made an offering; I poured out a propitiatory libation on the summit of the mountain." He thereupon reentered the ship to await the effect of his sacrifice. The gods, who no longer hoped for such a windfall, accepted the sacrifice with wondering joy. "The gods sniffed up the odor; the gods sniffed up the excellent odor; the gods gathered like flies above the offering." Bel, the god who had sent the flood, also came, and was full of wrath that any man had escaped destruction, but he was mollified by the words of Ea. "He went up into the interior of the ship; he took hold of my hand and made me go up, even me; he made my wife go up, and he pushed her to my side; he turned our faces toward him; he placed himself between us, and blessed us: 'Up to this time Shamashnapsitum was a man; henceforward let him and his wife be revered like us, the gods, and let him dwell afar off, at the mouth of the seas,' and he carried us away and placed us afar off, at the mouth of the seas."

Other notices of the Flood are found in Phœnician mythology; in the Sybilline oracles; in the Phrygian story of King Annakos, or Nannakos (Enoch); Syrian, Armenian, Persian, and Chinese traditions; also among the American Indians.

FLOOR (Heb. רָצֵף , go'-ren, to smooth), a level, or open area, as the "place" or square near the gates of oriental cities (1 Kings 22:10; 2 Chron. 18:9, A. V. "void place" in both passages). See HOUSE, PAYEMENT, THRASHING FLOOR.

FLOTES. See FLOAT.

FLOUR, rendered in the A. V. for the following: Kel'-makh (Heb. קֶלֶם , to grind, Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 1:24; 28:24, etc.). So'-leth (Heb. סֹלֶת , to strip), from a stripping off the hull, the finest and purest of the meal, usually rendered "fine flour."

Sem-id-al-is (Gr. σείδαλις, Rev. 18:13), the Greek term for the preceding. Fine meal, i. e., grain beaten fine, is spoken of in the time of Abramam (Gen. 18:6). At first barley alone was ground, but afterward wheat, as only the poor used barley. As to the method of making flour, both mortars and mills were employed. See BREAD; MILLS. Fine flour was presented in connection with sacrifices in general, and by the poor as a sin offering (Lev. 5:11-13).

FLOWER (Heb. פֶּרֶךְ, peh'-rakh, a calyx), the term applied to the floral ornaments of the golden candlestick (Exod. 25:31, sq.; 37:17; 1 Kings 7:26), and also the artificial lily ornaments round the edge of the great laver (1 Kings 7:26; 2 Chron. 4:5).

FLOWERS. Figurative. Flowers, from their speedy decay, are representative of the shortness of human life (Job 14:2; Psa. 103:15; 1 Pet. 1:24); the speedy downfall of the kingdom of Israel (Isa. 28:1), and the sudden departure of the rich (James 1:10, 11). See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

FLUTE. See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

FLUX, BLOODY. See DISEASES.

FLY. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FOAL (Heb. אֵילָן, al'-yeer, Gen. 49:11; בֶּן־בָּנֵי, bane, son, Zech. 9:9; Gr. υἱός, son, Matt. 21:5), an ass's colt. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FOAM (Heb. קֶשֶׁף, keh'-tsaf, a splinter). The original word is rendered "foam" in Hos. 10:7, "As for Samaria, her king is cut off as the foam upon the water." It means a broken branch, a fagot, or splinter.

FODDER (Heb. בֶּלֶל, bel-eel, Job 6:5). The word properly signifies a mixture, and is rendered "corn" in Job 24:6, and "provender" in Isa. 30:24.

FOLD, the rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Ghed-ay-raw' (Heb. גָּדְרָה, walled in, Num. 32:16, 24, 36).

2. Mik-law' (Heb. מִקְלָה, a pen, Hab. 3:17; Psa. 50:9; 78:70).

3. Raw-bats' (Heb. רָבַץ, to recline, Isa. 13:20). These three words, with the Gr. ὄυ-lay' (oúlai), signify a small inclosure for flocks to rest in.

4. The following terms, Do'-ber (Heb. דֹּבַר, Isa. 5:17; Mic. 2:12), and Naw-neh' (Heb. נָחַה, at home, 2 Sam. 7:8; 1 Chron. 17:7; Isa. 65:10; Jer. 23:3, etc.), signify pasture; while the Greek word ποιμνῆ (poym'-nay, John 10:16), means the stock itself. See FLOCK.

FOLDEN. See GLOSSARY.

FOLLOWER (Gr. μιμητής, mim-ay-tace', an imitator). Paul urges Christians to be "followers of me," etc., meaning that they were to imitate him in all good things (1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1, etc.); also to take God as an example (Eph. 5:1). In Phil. 3:17 the "followers" were to be co-imitators.

FOLLY (mostly Heb. נְבִלָה, iv-neh'-leth, and נֶבֶלָה, neb-aw'-law). The first word means silliness, as in Prov. 5:23, etc.; the second word stands for emptiness, Gen. 34:7, and many others. Other terms in the original may be rendered "thickheadedness" (Eccles. 2:3), "senselessness" (2 Tim. 3:9), "heedlessness" (2 Cor. 11:1), "self-confidence" (Psa. 85:8), "insipidity" (Job 24:12; Jer. 23:13). As a word in common use, folly is a weak or absurd act, and foolishness is a want of wisdom or judgment.

FOOD. Represented in the original by several Hebrew and Greek words.

1. In Early Times. The articles of food used by men are determined largely by the products of the country which they inhabit, and change with the growth of culture. At first men lived upon roots, vegetables, and the fruit of trees, all of which articles were known by the general name of Lekh'em (Heb. לֶחֶם, Gen. 1:29; 2:16). No doubt it was not till after the Flood that God allowed men the use of the flesh of animals (Gen. 9:3), but it is very probable that the Cainite Jubal, "the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle" (Gen. 4:20), used not only the milk and wool obtained from the flock, but also ate of the flesh of the cattle. That before the Flood the flesh of animals was converted into food may be inferred from the division of animals into clean and unclean (Gen. 7:8), and after the Flood it is expressly mentioned that animals were slain for food (Gen. 9:3, 4).

2. In the Patriarchal Age the flesh of animals, both tame and wild, was eaten. Leguminous food (i. e., beans, peas, etc.) was used, and a preparation of lentils (q. v.) seems to have been a common and favorite dish (Gen. 25:34). Use was also made of honey, spices, and nuts (Gen. 43:11). As early as the time of Abraham the art of preparing bread was carried to some degree of perfection.

3. Among the Egyptians. The Egyptians partook both of animal and vegetable food. Beef and geese constituted the principal part of the animal food, although ducks, teal, quails, and other birds were used. Mutton, however, was excluded. An endless succession of vegetables was also required on all occasions, and, when dining in private, dishes composed chiefly of them were in greater request than joints, even at the tables of the rich. Maspero says (Dawn of Civ., p. 64, sq.): "The Egyptians had begun by eating indiscriminately every kind of fruit which the country produced. Many of these, when their therapeutic virtues had been learned by experience, were gradually banished as articles of food and their use restricted to medicine; others fell into disuse, and only re-appeared at sacrifices or at funeral feasts; several varieties continue to be eaten to the present time—the acid fruits of the nabeca and of the carob tree, the astringent figs of the sycamore, the insipid pulp of the dom-palm, besides those which are pleasant to our Western palates, such as the common fig and the date. Vetches, lupins, beans, chickpeas, lentils, onions, fenugreek, the bamiä (having a fruit of five divisions, covered with prickly hairs, and containing soft white seeds, slightly sweet, but astringent to the taste), the meloukhia (chopped up and cooked much the same as endive is with us), the arum colocasia (the root of which, cooked in water, is eaten at the present day), all grew wild in the fields, and the river itself supplied its quota of nourishing plants." Among the poorer classes vegetables constituted a very great part of their ordinary food, some of which were eaten in the crude state, and others roasted in the ashes, boiled, or stewed. To these they added milk and cheese (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i, 165, sq.).

4. Among the Chaldeans. Their land afforded the Chaldeans "ten or twelve species of pulse to choose from—beans, lentils, chick-peas, vetches, kidney beans, onions, cucumbers, egg-plants, 'gombo,' and pumpkins. Wheat and barley are considered to be indigenous on the plains of the Euphrates; the date palm met many needs; fruit trees of many varieties abounded. A considerable proportion of the tribes on the lower Euphrates lived for a long time on fish only, eaten either fresh, salted or smoked; they dried them in the sun, crushed them in a mortar, strained the pulp through linen, and worked it up into a kind of bread or into cakes" (Maspero, Ancient Chaldean, p. 554, sq.).

5. Among the Israelites. While in Egypt the Israelites shared in the abundance of that land, where they "sat by the feshpots and did eat bread to the full" (Exod. 16:3); and they recalled in the wilderness with regret and murmuring "the fish, the cucumbers, the melons, the leeks, the onions, and the garlic" (Num. 11:5). The subject of food among the Israelites will be considered as follows: Articles prohibited; articles allowed; food, its preparation; meals, etc.

(1) Articles prohibited. Animal food was limited by the Mosaic law: (a) By the primeval distinction between clean and unclean, under which distinction were forbidden to be used as food: Quadrupeds which do not ruminant (i. e., chew the cud) or have cloven feet (Lev. 11:4-8; Deut. 14:7, 8). Fishes without scales and fins, e. g., eels and all shell fish (Lev. 11:9-12). Birds of prey and such as feed upon worms and carrion (Lev. 11:13-19). Serpents and creeping insects; insects which sometimes fly and sometimes go upon their feet, with the exception of some of the locust kind (Lev. 11:20-24, 42). (b) By the sacrificial ordinances were forbidden the eating of all blood of cattle and birds and bloody flesh (Lev. 3:17; 7:26; 17:10-14; Deut. 12:16, 23; comp. Gen. 9:4; 1 Sam. 14:32, sq.). The fatty portions which, in the sacrifice of oxen, sheep, and goats, were burned upon the altar (Lev. 3:17; 7:23, 25); also everything consecrated to idols (Exod. 34:15). (c) For sanitary reasons, doubtless, the following was forbidden as food: The flesh of cattle that had fallen down dead or had been torn by wild beasts (Exod. 22:31; Lev. 11:39, sq.; Deut. 14:21), as well as food prepared with water on which the dead body of an unclean insect had fallen (Lev. 11:33, 34). All food and liquids remaining in an uncovered vessel in the tent or chamber of a dying or dead man (Num. 19:14, 15). In addition, it was forbidden to "seethe a kid in his mother's milk" (Exod. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21). The reason for this prohibition is not given, but it may be that it would seem to indicate "a contempt of the relation which God has established and sanctified between parent and young, and thus subverting the divine ordinance" (K. and D., Com., in loco). Besides these, according to ancient tradition, the Israelites, perhaps from a feeling of reverence, denied themselves the use of the sinew of the hip (Gen. 32:32).

(2) Articles allowed. These were partly vegetable and partly animal, with salt for seasoning. Grain formed the chief nourishment, roasted in the fire, especially wheat kernels—still a favorite food in Palestine, Syria, and Egypt. But it was frequently baked into bread. Milk was an article of daily food; not only the milk of cows, but also of sheep and goats (Deut. 32:14; Prov. 27:27); sometimes sweet, sometimes sour, thick, or curdled. The latter still forms, after bread, the chief food of the poorer classes in Arabia and Syria, nor is it wanting on the tables of well-to-do persons. The Israelites, no doubt, prepared cheese of different kinds, and very likely butter also (Prov. 30:33). "Much liked also were honey of bees; perhaps, also, grape honey (must of sweet grapes boiled to a syrup), and wood honey of wild bees (1 Sam. 14:25; Matt. 3:4), in which Palestine was and still is rich; raisins, dried figs (1 Sam. 25:18), date cakes (2 Sam. 16:1), and various fresh fruits." Vegetables.—Of these those chiefly used were pulse, lentils, and beans, with onions, garlic, and cucumbers; also green herbs—sometimes raised in gardens (1 Kings 21:2), sometimes growing in the fields (Prov. 15:17). Animal food.—The flesh of oxen, sheep, and goats ranks first, while the flesh of calves, lambs, and kids was greatly prized; perhaps, also, that of pigeons and turtle doves. The rich had upon their tables stag, antelope, buck, and various kinds of winged game (1 Kings 4:23; Neh. 5:18). Fish were supplied in great abundance from the lake of Gennesaret (John 21:11; comp. Matt. 14:17; 15:34), while in after times the Phœnicians brought fish to Jerusalem from the sea (Neh. 13:16). Locusts were eaten by the poorer people (Lev. 11:22; Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6); sometimes salted and roasted (or fried), sometimes boiled in water and buttered.

(3) Preparation of Food. Grain was eaten at first without any preparation, and the custom of thus eating it had not entirely disappeared in the time of Christ (Matt. 12:1). After the uses of fire were known grain was parched. Later the introduction of the mortar and mill furnished flour, which was made into bread (q. v.). As to the preparation of vegetables and flesh, we learn that so early as the time of Isaac it was customary to prepare soup of lentils (Gen. 25:29, 34) and flesh (27:14). Vegetables, pulse, and herbs were cooked in pots (2 Kings 4:38; Num. 11:8; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 2:14) and seasoned with oil. Roasting on a spit was perhaps the oldest way of cooking flesh, but less common among the Israelites than boiling, roast flesh being used only by the rich and better classes (1 Sam. 2:15), as is still the case in the East. When cooked in pots (1 Sam. 2:14; 2 Chron. 35:13), it was lifted out with a three-pronged fork and brought to the table with the broth (Judg. 6:19). All the flesh of the slain animal, owing to the difficulty of keeping it in warm climates, was commonly cooked at once. The Israelites seem to have boiled the flesh of young animals in milk. Locusts were frequently roasted, as they still are in the East. "Their wings and feet are taken off and their intestines extracted; they are salted, fixed upon a sharp piece of wood, placed over the fire, and at length eaten. They are likewise prepared by boiling them. Sometimes they are salted and preserved in bottles and, as occasion requires, are cut in pieces and eaten" (Lev. 11:22; Matt. 3:4). Salt (q. v.) was very anciently used (Num. 18:19; comp. 2 Chron. 13:5). In most ancient times the animal was slain by the master of the house, although he were a prince, and the cooking also was done by his wife (Gen. 18:2-6; Judg. 6:19), with the help of female slaves. In the houses of the upper classes there were also special cooks (1 Sam. 9:23, sq.), and in the larger cities bakers (Hos. 7:4).

(4) Meals, etc. Besides a simple breakfast the Israelites had two daily meals; at midday (Gen. 18:1; 43:16, 25; Ruth 2:14; 1 Kings 20:16), and their principal meal at about six or seven in the evening (Gen. 19:1, sq.; Ruth 3:7). They were accustomed to wash their hands both before and after eating (Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:2; Luke 11:38), because food was lifted to the mouth with the fingers (see WASHING). Prayers were also offered (1 Sam. 9:13). In the older times it was the custom to sit at the table (Gen. 27:19; Judg. 19:6; 1 Sam. 20:5, 24; 1 Kings 13:19), but later it was usual to recline upon cushions or divans. The food was taken to the mouth with the right hand, a custom still prevalent in the East (Ruth 2:14; Prov. 26:15; John 13:26). See BANQUET; DRINK.

FOOL. Represented by a large number of Hebrew and Greek words. The word is used in Scripture with respect to moral more than to intellectual deficiencies. The "fool" is not so much one lacking in mental powers, as one who misuses them; not one who does not reason, but reasons wrongly. In Scripture the "fool," by way of eminence, is the person who casts off the fear of God, and thinks and acts as if he could safely disregard the eternal principles of God's righteousness (Psa. 14:1; 92:6; Jer. 17:11; Prov. 14:9, etc.). Yet in many passages, especially in Proverbs, the term has its ordinary use, and denotes one who is rash, senseless, or unreasonable. The expression "thou fool" (Matt. 5:22) is used in the moral sense, means "wicked," and seems to be equivalent to judging one as worthy of everlasting punishment. See FOLLY.

FOOLISHNESS. See FOLLY; FOOL.

FOOT. 1. The rendering of the Heb. רֶגֶל, kane, a stand, with reference to the laver (q. v.).

2. (Heb. רֶגֶל, reh'-gel; Gr. πούς, poocē). The word "feet" is used in Scripture for the sake of delicacy, to express the parts and the acts which it is not allowed to name. Hence, "the hair of the feet," "to open the feet," etc. "To cover the feet" (1 Sam. 24:3; Judg. 3:24) is a euphemism for performing the necessities of nature, as it is the custom in the East to cover the feet. The Jews neglected the feet, and bared them in affliction (2 Sam. 15:30; 19:24; Ezek. 24:17); stamped them on the ground in extreme joy or grief (Ezek. 6:11; 25:6); showed respect by falling at the feet (1 Sam. 25:24; 2 Kings 4:37; Esth. 8:3; Mark 5:22), reverence by kissing another's feet (Luke 7:38), subjection by licking the dust from the foot (Isa. 49:23); while the subjugation of enemies was expressed by placing the foot on their necks (Josh. 10:24; Psa. 110:1). The feet of enemies were sometimes cut off or maimed (Judg. 1:6, 7; 2 Sam. 4:12). Uncovering the feet was a mark of adoration (Exod. 3:5).

Figurative. "To be at any one's feet" is used for being at the service of another, following him, or receiving his instruction (Judg. 4:10; Acts 22:3). The last passage, in which Paul is described as being brought up "at the feet of Gamaliel," will appear still clearer if we understand that, as the Jewish writers allege, pupils actually did sit on the floor before, and, therefore, at the feet of, the doctors of the law, who themselves occupied an elevated seat. "He set my feet upon a rock" (Psa. 40:2) expresses the idea of stability. "Thou hast set my feet in a large place" (Psa. 31:8) denotes liberty. "Sliding of the feet" is figurative for yielding to temptation (Job 12:5; Psa. 17:5; 38:16; 94:18). "Treading under foot" (Isa. 18:7; Lam. 1:15) implies complete destruction. To "wash" or "dip" one's feet in oil or butter (Deut. 33:24; Job 29:6) is to possess abundance; "dipped in blood" (Psa. 68:23), of victory. "To keep the feet of the saints" (1 Sam. 2:9) is to preserve them from stumbling. "Lameness of feet" (Psa. 35:15, A. V. "adversity"; marg. "halting"; Jer. 20:10, etc.) denotes affliction. "To set one's foot" in a place signifies to take possession (Deut. 1:36; 11:24). "To water with the foot" (Deut. 11:10) refers to irrigation, which was effected by foot pumps, and by turning the small streams of the garden with the foot. A striking phrase, borrowed from the feet, is used by Paul (Gal. 2:14): "When I saw that they walked not uprightly;" literally, "with a straight foot" (Gr. οὐκ ὀρθοποδοῦσαν).

FOOT WASHING. See WASHING.

FOOTMAN. Employed in the A. V. in two senses: 1. The military use of the word is the infantry in the army (q. v.). 2. In the special sense of a runner (q. v.).

FOOTSTEPS (Heb. אָבָה, pah'-am, Psa. 17:5; אָבָה, avo-kabe', Psa. 66:6; 77:19; 89:51; Cant. 1:8). Footprints are held to be indicative of one's character, their direction a proof of his tendencies. Therefore to watch one's footsteps is to seek a cause for accusation (Psa. 17:5, 11).

FOOTSTOOL (Heb. כִּסֵּאֵי רַגְלַיִם, keh'-besh; something trodden upon), an article of furniture, used to support the feet when sitting in state, as upon a throne (2 Chron. 9:18). The divine glory which resided symbolically between the cherubim above disposition of God, in accordance with which he indulgently tolerates sins and delays their punishment (Meyer, Com., in loco).

FORCES (Hebrew, specially כֹּחַ, kah'-yil, strength). In a military point of view it is applied to army, fortifications, etc. In Isa. 60:5, 11 the phrase "forces of the Gentiles" seems to be used in its widest sense to denote not only the subjugation of the heathen, but also the consecration of their wealth (the rendering in the R. V.).

FORD (Heb. מַעְבָּר, mah-ab-awr', and מַעְבְּרָה, mah-ab-aw-raw', a pass), a shallow place in a river or other body of water which may be crossed on foot or by wading (Gen. 32:22; Josh. 2:7; Judg. 3:28; 12:5, 6, A. V. "passages;" Isa. 16:2). The fords of Jordan are frequently mentioned. A little above the Dead Sea two fords cross the Jordan near Jericho, passable for the most of the year, connecting roads from the Judean hills with highways from Gilead and Moab. The passage from Samaria into Gilead was made easy by an extraordinary number of fords through the Jordan. The depth of the Jordan fords varies from three feet to as much as ten or twelve (Smith, Hist. Geog. of Holy Land, pp. 266, 337, 486). Mention is also made of the ford of the Jabbok (Gen. 32:22) and of Arnon (Isa. 16:2). The "passages" of the Euphrates (Jer. 51:32) "are not merely those over the main river, but also those over the canals cut from it to add strength, whether fords, ferries, or light wooden bridges, which must have existed alongside the one stone bridge over the river for purposes of intercourse" (Orelli, Com., in loco).

Ford of Jordan.

FOREFRONT is used in its present sense, as the foremost part or place, e. g., the forefront of a building or of a battle (Ex. 26:9; 2 Sam. 11:15, etc.).

FOREHEAD (Heb. מִצְחָה, may'-tsakh, to shine). The practice of veiling the face in public for women of the higher classes—especially married women—in the East, sufficiently stigmatizes with reproach the unveiled face of women of bad character (Gen. 24:65; Jer. 3:3). Reference is made to this when Israel is called "impudent" the ark of the covenant is supposed to use the ark as a footstool (1 Chron. 28:2; Psa. 99:5; 132:7). The earth is called God's footstool by the same expressive figure which represents heaven as his throne (Psa. 110:1; Isa. 66:1; Matt. 5:35).

FORBEARANCE (Gr. ἀνοχή, an-okh-ay', a holding back, delaying, Rom. 2:4; 3:25). "The forbearance of God and his long suffering—the two terms exhausting the one idea—denote the (literally, "of an hard forehead," R. V.), while courage is promised to the prophet when Jehovah says, "I have made the forehead strong (R. V. 'hard') against their foreheads" (Ezek. 3:7, 8). The custom among many oriental nations both of coloring the face and forehead and of impressing on the body marks indicative of devotion to some special deity or religious sect is mentioned by various writers. In Ezekiel (9:4-6) we read that the mark \aleph (in early times made in the form of a cross) should be placed upon the foreheads of those who mourned the abominations of Israel, that they might be spared (see Rev. 7:3; 9:4; 14:1; 22:4). In the opposite sense as servants of Satan (Rev. 13:16, 17; 14:9, etc.). The "jewels for the forehead," mentioned by Ezekiel (16:12), and in margin of A. V. (Gen. 24:22), were in all probability nose-rings (Isa. 3:21).

FOREIGNER (Heb. נָכְרִי, nok-ree', stranger, Deut. 15:3; Obad. 11; תְּשׁוּבָה, to-shawb', Exod. 12:45, dweller, as distinguished from a native; Gr. nároukos, par'-oy-kos, dwelling near, Eph. 2:19), one living in a country of which he is not a native, i. e., in the Jewish sense, a Gentile. The kingdom of God, temporarily limited to the one people of Israel, yet bore within it the germ of universality, of diffusion among all people. The covenant made with Abraham and established with Israel at Sinai was from the beginning not exclusively confined to the natural posterity of Israel's twelve sons. As a practical proof that the redemption which was to be prepared through him and his seed was intended for all races of the earth, Abraham was commanded to circumcise every male belonging to his house. Hereby his servants, who amounted to hundreds, are included in his house, made partakers of the covenant promises, and incorporated with the promised seed.

Privileges. When the Israelites went up out of Egypt a large, mixed multitude of foreigners accompanied them (Exod. 12:38; Num. 11:4; Josh. 8:35), and were not rejected by them. Among the Israelites there were at all times individuals of other (heathen) peoples. To such were granted toleration and several privileges, in return for which compliance with the following regulations was insisted upon. They were required, for example, not to blaspheme the name of Jehovah (Lev. 24:16); not to indulge in idolatrous worship (Lev. 20:2); not to commit acts of indecency (Lev. 18:26); not to do any work on the Sabbath (Exod. 20:10); not to eat leavened bread during the Passover (Exod. 12:19); not to eat any manner of blood or flesh of animals that had died a natural death or had been torn by wild beasts (Lev. 17:10, 15). Under such circumstances the law accorded to foreigners not only protection and toleration, but equal civil rights with the Israelites. They could even acquire fixed property, lands (Lev. 25:47, sq.), and offer sacrifices to the Lord (Num. 15:15, sq., 26, 29).

Citizenship. Should he desire to enjoy the full rights of citizenship a stranger submitted to circumcision, thus binding himself to observe the whole law, in return for which he was permitted to enjoy to the full the privileges and blessings of the people of the covenant (Rom. 9:4), with whom, in virtue of this right, he was now incorporated (Exod. 12:48). The parties excluded from this fellowship were the Edomites and Egyptians resident in Israel—only, however, till the third generation (Deut. 23:7, 8); the seven Canaanitish nations, doomed to destruction and excluded forever (Exod. 34:15; Deut. 7:1-4); the Ammonites and Moabites, "even to the tenth generation"—i. e., forever—because of their opposition to the Israelites entering Canaan (Deut. 23:3).

Figurative. "Foreigners" in Eph. 2:19 denotes those who, being in a state of nature, are without citizenship in God's kingdom, as opposed to "fellow-citizens" (Gr. συμπολίται). In 1 Pet. 2:11 "foreigners" (A. V. "strangers") are those who live as strangers on the earth, i. e., with their citizenship in heaven (Phil. 3:20, R. V.).

FOREKNOWLEDGE. See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.

FOREORDINATION. See ELECTION.

FORERUNNER (Gr. πρόδρομος, prod'-rom-os), one who is sent before to take observations or act as a spy, a scout, a light-armed soldier. In Heb. 6:20 it is used in the sense of one who comes in advance to a place whither the rest are to follow, viz., Jesus Christ (comp. John 14:2).

FORESHIP (Gr. πρόρα, pro'-ra, Acts 27:30, 41, "forepart"), the prow of a ship (q. v.).

FORESKIN (Heb. or-law'; Gr. ἀκροβυστία, ak-rob-oos-tee'-ah), the loose fold of skin on the distinctive member of the male sex, which was removed in circumcision (q. v.), leaving the glans penis artificially uncovered. Circumcision being a symbol of purification, the foreskin was a type of corruption; hence the phrase, "foreskin of the heart" (Deut. 10:16; Jer. 4:4) to designate a carnal or heathenish state (Rom. 2:29). It was sometimes brought as a trophy of slain Gentiles (1 Sam. 18:25; 2 Sam. 3:14).

FORESKINS, HILL OF. A place at or near Gilgal, so called from the fact that the foreskins of the Israelites were buried there when the nation was circumcised (Josh. 5:3).

FOREST. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

Figurative. Forest is used symbolically to denote a city, kingdom, and the like (Ezek. 20:46, where the "forest of the south" denotes the kingdom of Judah). Kingdoms which God has threatened to destroy are represented under the figure of a forest, destined to be burned (Isa. 10:17, 18, 19, 34, where the briars and thorns denote the common people, while "the glory of the forest" are the nobles and others of high rank. See also Isa. 32:19; 37:24; Jer. 21:14; 22:7, etc.). The forest is the image of unfruitfulness as contrasted with a cultivated field or vineyard (Isa. 29:17; 32:15; Jer. 26:18; Hos. 2:12).

FORGIVENESS (Heb. kaw-far', to cover; to hide, to purge, to do away, Deut. 21:8, et al.; נָשָׂא, naw-saw', to lift up, to take away, Gen. 50:17, et al.; saw-lakh', and afinim, af-ee'-ay-mee, to send away, let off, Psalms. 108:3, et al.; Matt. 6:12, and most of the New Testament places; χαρίζουαι, khar-id'-zom-ah-ee, to give gladly or freely, Luke 7:42, et al.). Forgiveness is the act of putting aside an offense or overlooking it and treating the transgressor as if innocent. In ordinary use it has a deeper meaning than pardon. We ask pardon for inadvertent and slight offenses, and forgiveness for grievous ones. In religion forgiveness, or justification (q. v.), is a forensic or judicial act of God which does not effect a change of character, but of relation to him. God declares the sinner just or righteous—i. e., that the claims of justice are satisfied—so that the forgiven one is in justice entitled to the reward promised or due to perfect righteousness. What is called forgiveness in the Old Testament is frequently justification in the New Testament. The ground of it is the atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the penalty of the divine law is remitted, when the sinner believes in him. It may be forfeited by renewed sin, in which case all antecedent guilt returns upon the backslider (Ezek. 33:13).

FORK (Heb. פֶּתַח־שֵׁשׁ, shel-oshe' kil-lesh-one', three of prongs, only in 1 Sam. 13:21), a three-pronged fork, i. e., pitchfork, with which to handle hay, straw, etc.

FORMER. See GLOSSARY.

FORNICATION (Heb. זִנְיָוָה, taz-nooth'; Gr. πορνεία, por-ni-ah) is used of illicit sexual intercourse in general (Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25; Rom. 1:29; 1 Cor. 5:1; 6:13, 18; 7:2, etc.). It is distinguished from "adultery" (Gr. μοιχεία, moy-khi'-ah, in Matt. 15:19; Mark 7:21; Gal. 5:19). Jahn (Bibl. Arch., § 158) thus distinguishes between adultery and fornication among nations where polygamy exists: "If a married man has criminal intercourse with a married woman, or with one promised in marriage, or with a widow expecting to be married with a brother-in-law, it is accounted adultery. If he is guilty of such intercourse with a woman who is unmarried it is considered fornication." At the present time adultery is the term used of such an act when the person is married, fornication when unmarried; and fornication may be defined as lewdness of an unmarried person of either sex. Its prohibition rests on the ground that it discourages marriage, leaves the education and care of children insecure, depraves and defiles the mind more than any other vice, and thus unfits for the kingdom of heaven (1 Cor. 6:9, etc.). Our Lord forbids the thoughts that lead to it (Matt. 5:28).

Figurative. The close relationship between Jehovah and Israel is spoken of under the figure of marriage; the worship of idols is naturally mentioned as fornication (Rev. 14:8; 17:2, 4; 18:3; 19:2); as also the defilement of idolatry, as incurred by eating the sacrifices offered to idols (Rev. 2:21). See IDOLATRY.

FORT, FORTIFICATION, FORTRESS, the renderings of several Hebrew words: Mawatsood' (מִצְדָּה, nel), a fastness (2 Sam. 5:9; 22:2, and five times in the Psalms); maw-oox' (מִצְדָּה, Dan. 11:19), a stronghold, fortified by nature and art; daw-yake' (דָּוֵן, 2 Kings 25:1; Jer. 52:4; Ezek. 4:2; 17:17; 21:22), a scaling tower in a siege; mib-tsawr' (מִבְּצֻר, Isa. 17:3; 25:12; 34:13; Hos. 10:14; Jer. 10:17; Amos 5:9), a fortified castle or city; Orelli (Com., Jer. 6:27) would render "fortress" as metal, either gold or silver; mis-gawb' (מִסְגָּב, Isa. 25:12), a cliff or inaccessible height. There are a few other words having similar meanings. Modern artillery being unknown in scriptural times, the means of defense then in use were very simple. The rudest of all contrivances were resorted to, as caves, which abounded in Palestine, and clefts of the rocks (Josh. 10:16; Judg. 6:2; 20:47; 1 Sam. 12:6, sq.). In such a cleft of the rock Samson dwelt for a time (Judg. 15:8, 11, A. V. "top," R. V. "cleft"); and in such a cavern David found shelter for himself and his six hundred men (1 Sam. 22:1, sq.). Inventions for defense are met with from the earliest times. At first they consisted of unbewn or rudely chipped uncemented stones, piled up for walls, but with no ditches, towers, or gateways other than gaps left between the huge stones. These defenses were of the style of building known as Cyclopean, Pelasgian, and Etruscan. The Canaanites of the time of Moses and Joshua were a highly civilized people, connected by commerce with the most advanced nations of their time, and especially with Egypt. It is therefore probable that their walled cities, with gates and bars, bore a resemblance to fortifications shown on Egyptian monuments. "In Moses's time Bashan was famed for its strong cities, with high walls, strong gates and bars (Deut. 3:5; 1 Kings 4:13). In after times, especially under the kings, many places, particularly frontier and chief cities, and above all Jerusalem, were strongly and artistically strengthened by the erection of thick walls with battlements (2 Chron. 26:6, sq.; Zeph. 1:16), and high towers raised partly over the gates (2 Sam. 18:24; 2 Kings 9:17), partly at the corners of the walls (2 Chron. 25:23; 32:5); and the walls were still further defended by ditch and rampart on the outside" (2 Sam. 20:15; Isa. 26:1; 1 Kings 21:23). In addition to these there were built, sometimes in the cities (Judg. 9:51, sq.), sometimes at different points of the open country, watch towers and keeps, or castles (2 Kings 18:8; 2 Chron. 17:12; 27:4), for protection against enemies. Regarding the fortification of Jerusalem, see art. JERUSALEM.

Egyptian. "A system of regular fortification was adopted in the earliest times. The form of the fortresses was quadrangular; the walls of crude brick, fifteen feet thick, and often fifty feet high, with square towers at intervals along each face. The towers, like the rest of the walls, consisted of a rampart and parapet, which last was crowned by the usual round-headed battlements, in imitation of Egyptian shields, like those on their stone walls. . . . To keep the enemy as far as possible from the main wall was, of course, the great object. This was done by raising it on a broad terrace or basement, or by having an outer circuit or low wall of circumvallation, parallel to the main wall, and distant from it on every side from thirteen to twenty feet; and the tower stood at each side of the entrance, which was toward one corner of the least exposed face. Another more effectual defense, adopted in larger fortifications, was a ditch with a counterscarp, and in the center of the ditch a continuous stone wall. Over the ditch was a wooden bridge, which was removed during a siege" (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i, 407, sq.). See WAR; also SUPPLEMENT.

Figurative. As illustrative of divine protection to those who trust him, the Lord is compared to a fortress (2 Sam. 22:2; Psa. 18:2; 31:3; 71:3, etc.). "The fortress also shall cease from Ephraim" (Isa. 17:3), is an expression signifying that she loses her fortified cities, which were once her defense. To overthrow one's fortress is to rob it of defense, to humiliate (Isa. 25:12). Of the righteous man it is said, "his place of defense shall be the munitions of rocks" (Isa. 33:16), i. e., God's protection shall be to him as the impregnable walls of a fortress upon a rock. "I have set thee for a tower and a fortress among my people," etc. (Jer. 6:27), is rendered by Orelli, Com., moting, or striving after anything (2 Cor. 8:8, and in v. 7 "diligence;" R. V., in both verses, "earnestness").

2. Προθυμία, proth-oo-me'-ah (2 Cor. 9:2, R. V. "readiness"), literally predisposition, and so readiness of mind.

FOUNDATION, the lowest part of a building, and on which it rests.

Figurative. By foundation is sometimes understood the origin (Job 4:19), where men are represented as dwelling in clay houses, whose foundation, i. e., origin, was in the dust (comp. Gen. 2:7; 3:19). It is also used in the sense of beginning, as "the foundation of the world" (Matt. 13:35; 25:34, etc.). The expression is illustrative of Christ: "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation stone," etc. (Isa. 28:16; 1 Cor. 3:11); of the doctrines of the apostles (Eph. 2:20); the first principles of the Gospel (Heb. 6:1, 2); the in loco, "an assayer to my people, a piece of ore" (Heb. from בִּצְרָא, beh'-tser, broken off), "that thou mayest test their walk."

FORTH. See GLOSSARY.

FORTUNATUS (Gr. Φορτουνάτος, for-too-nat'-os, fortunate), a disciple of Corinth, of Roman birth or origin, as his name indicates, who visited Paul at Ephesus, and returned, along with Stephanas and Achaicus, in charge of that apostle's First Epistle to the Corinthian Church (1 Cor. 16:17). "The household of Stephanas" is mentioned in 1:16 as having been baptized by Paul himself; perhaps Fortunatus and Achaicus may have been members of that household. There is a Fortunatus mentioned at the end of Clement's First Epistle to the Corinthians, who was possibly the same person (McC. and S., Cyc.).

FORUM APPII. See APPII FORUM.

FORWARDNESS, the rendering in the A. V. of two Greek words:

1. Σπουδή, spon-day', literally haste, and then, generally, of earnestness in accomplishing, pro-

Christian religion (2 Tim. 2:19); of the righteous (Prov. 10:25); the wise man is one who lays his foundation upon a rock (Luke 6:48); the good minister, who builds on the true foundation—Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 3:10).

FOUNTAIN, the rendering of several Hebrew words and one Greek word.

1. Ah'-yin (אֵינַי, eye), a natural source of living water (Gen. 16:7; Deut. 8:7; 33:28; 1 Sam. 29:1; Prov. 8:28, etc.).

2. Mah-yawn' (מַיִן, may-in), a spring of running water (Lev. 11:36; Josh. 15:9; Psa. 74:15; 114:8; Prov. 25:26); a well-watered place (Psa. 84:6; A. V. "well;" R. V. "a place of springs"); spoken of the tide or influx of the sea (Gen. 7:11; 8:2). "A fountain sealed" (Cant. 4:12) is supposed to refer to pools of Solomon.

3. Mab-boo'-ah (מַבְּבוֹאֵי, gushing), probably a rill of running water (Eccles. 12:6; rendered "springs" in Isa. 35:7; 49:10).

4. Maw-kore' (מקור, something dug, Lev. 20:18; Psa. 36:9; 68:26; Prov. 5:18; 13:14; 14:27; Jer. 2:13), an artificial source of flowing water, occasionally rendered "spring," "well."

5. Improperly bor (בור, Jer. 6:7), which designates only a pit or standing water.

In the Greek πηγή, pay-gay', is used as the equivalent of maw-kore' (James 3:11, 12; Rev. 7:17; 8:10; 14:7; 21:6).

Figurative. Of God (Psa. 36:9; Jer. 17:13); as the source of grace (Psa. 87:7); of Christ (Zech. 13:1); of the manifestations of divine FOWLER (from Heb. יקוש, yaw-koosh', to lay snares; Psa. 91:3; 124:7; Prov. 6:5; Jer. 5:26; Hos. 9:8), one who took birds by means of nets, snares, decoys, etc. Among the Egyptians "fowling was one of the great amusements of all classes. Those who followed this sport for their livelihood used nets and traps, but the amateur sportsman pursued his game in the thickets, and felled them with the throw-stick. . . . The throw-stick was made of heavy wood, and flat, so as to offer little resistance to the air in its flight, and the distance to which an expert could throw it was considerable. It was about one foot and a quarter to two feet in length, and about one and a half inches in breadth, slightly curved at the upper end. They frequently took with them a decoy bird, and in order to keep it to its post, a female was selected, whose nest, containing eggs, was deposited in the boat" (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i, 234, sq.). By the Mosaic law any one finding a bird's nest was forbidden to take the mother with the eggs or young (Deut. 22:6, 7), lest the species be extinguished; or, perhaps, to impress upon men the sacredness of the relation between parent and young.

FOX. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. The proverbially cunning character of the fox is alluded to in Scriptures, as in Ezek. 13:4, where the prophets of Israel are said to be like foxes in the desert; and in Luke 13:32, where our Lord calls Herod "that fox." The fox's fondness for grapes is alluded to in Cant. 2:15.

FRAME (Heb. יצר, yay'iser, form), as of the human body (Psa. 103:14; "thing framed," Isa. 29:16); and "the frame of a city" (Heb. מִבְּנֵי, mib-neh', Ezek. 40:2), a city building. See GLOSSARY.

FRANKINCENSE. See INCENSE, VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

FRANKLY. See GLOSSARY.

FRAUD. See LAW.

FRAY (Heb. קרר, khaw-rad', to frighten, Deut. 28:26; Jer. 7:33; Zech. 1:21), an old word, signifying to frighten, to scare away. See GLOSSARY.

FRECKLED SPOT (Heb. בִּהַק, bo'hak, Lev. 13:39), an "efflorescence on the skin, not uncommon in the East, consisting of spots of a palish white, resembling the leprosy, but harmless, and neither contagious nor hereditary" (Gesenius, Lex., s. v.).

FREEDOM (Heb. חֵפְזָה, khoof-shaw', liberty; Gr. πολιτεία, pol-ee-ti'-ah, citizenship, Acts 22:28).

1. Hebrew. Every Israelite (man or maid) who had become a slave might not only be redeemed at any time by his relatives, but, if this did not take place, he was bound to receive his freedom without payment in the seventh year, with a present of cattle and fruits (Exod. 21:2, sq.; Deut. 15:12-15). Indeed all slaves of Hebrew descent, with their children, obtained freedom grace (Isa. 41:18; Joel 3:18); of Israel, as the father of a numerous posterity (Deut. 33:28); of a good wife (Prov. 5:18); of spiritual wisdom (Prov. 16:22; 18:4, in both passages rendered "well-spring"); of the Church (Cant. 4:12; Isa. 58:11, "spring of water"). See SPRING, WELL.

FOWL. See ANIMAL KINGDOM; FOOD; SACRIFICE.

In the New Testament "fowls" is the rendering most frequently of the Gr. τὰ πετεινά, which comprehends all kinds of birds (Matt. 13:4; Mark 4:4, etc.).

without ransom in the jubilee year (Lev. 25:41). If the man was single when he went into slavery, he was liberated alone; whereas the wife brought into slavery with her husband received her freedom at the same time with him (Exod. 21:2, sq.; Jer. 34:8, sq.). The emancipation of slaves among Greeks and Romans was tolerably common. The Greeks had no special legal form for the process, and consequently no legal differences in the legal status of freedom. At Athens they took the position of resident aliens, and were under certain obligations to their liberators as patrons.

2. Roman. Among the Romans emancipation was either formal or informal. (1) Of formal emancipation there were three kinds: (a) the manumissio vindicta, in which the owner appeared before the magistrate with the slave. A Roman citizen laid a staff upon the slave's head and declared him free, whereupon the master, who was holding the slave with his hand, let him go as a symbol of liberation. (b) The manumissio censu, in which the master enrolled the slave's name in the list of citizens. (c) The manumissio testamentō, or manumission by will, in which the master declared his slave free, or bound his heir to emancipate him. (2) Informal emancipation took place in virtue of an oral declaration on the part of the master, in the presence of friends, or by letter, or by inviting the slave to the master's table. After formal emancipation they at once became Roman citizens, but, not being freeborn, were not eligible to office and were excluded from military service. Informal emancipation conferred only practical freedom without civil rights (Seyffert, Dic. Class. Antiq. (s. v.). Freedom is used (Acts 22:28; comp. 21:39) for citizenship (q. v.).

FREEDOM. 1. Theological. An attribute of God. This is declared by the apostle Paul, in harmony with the unanimous testimony of the Scriptures, in the words, "Who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will" (Eph. 1:11). By this term theology expresses the fact that God is a self-determining agent; a free personal being acting purely in accordance with his own perfections. The reason of the divine purpose and act is to be found only in God himself. Inasmuch as God is eternally and unchangeably what he is, we must recognize in God, in a proper sense, an absolute necessity. But it is a necessity which not only does not conflict, but is identical, with his perfect freedom. The creation—the existence of all things that are not God—must be referred to the divine freedom. God could be under no necessity to create. But if he creates, his creation, the order, the laws he establishes among them, must reflect his wisdom and goodness and holiness—in a word, Himself. At this point the doctrine of the divine freedom reveals sharply its opposition to Pantheism, which asserts that all things, even sin (the sinfulness of which it denies), are but necessary manifestations or unfoldings of the Divine Being. See PANTHEISM.

The freedom of God is exercised and illustrated in his government of his moral creatures. It has pleased God to create intelligences possessed of moral freedom, and to make their ultimate destiny contingent upon the right use of their freedom. This involves the fact that the divine freedom becomes connected with conditional events and is to the same extent conditioned by them. But this is a necessary feature of the government which God has established over the world of moral beings he has seen fit to create. God has manifested his perfect freedom in creating such a world and adapting his methods to the exigencies that arise in its history. This view of the divine freedom is to be maintained in opposition to the exaggerated and unscriptural view of the divine sovereignty which, despite all merely verbal qualifications, actually reduces the freedom of moral creatures to a nullity, and regards their destinies as unalterably fixed by an eternal, divine decree. See SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD; also Pope's Compendium of Christian Theology, vol. i, pp. 308–311.

2. Human. In what has been said above the freedom of man, as that of other moral intelligences, has been assumed. The doctrine of human freedom, or of freewill, the subject of so much controversy, requires, however, particular discussion.

(1) Definition. By freedom of the will, in the proper sense, is meant the power of contrary choice, i. e., the power of the mind to choose in some other direction than that in which the choice is actually made. Theologically freedom refers especially to the power to choose between good and evil, righteousness and unrighteousness. On the one hand, by those who uphold this doctrine, it is asserted that man freely determines his own volitions; on the other, by necessitarians, it is held that these volitions are determined by conditions, influences, and circumstances with which they are connected as rigidly and powerfully as effects are connected with causes in the material world.

(2) Parties to controversy. Prominent among those who deny human freedom are materialists. This position is also the natural result of Dualism and Pantheism. Also that form of Theism which fails to recognize the divine freedom finds no freedom in man. The attitude of Calvinistic theology upon this subject has been the occasion of much dispute and probably of some misunderstanding. The extreme doctrines of foreordination, of unconditional election and reprobation, held by Calvinists, as well as some of the terms by which they describe man's actual condition, are logically equivalent to a denial of man's freedom. And yet it may truly be said that, whether consistent with itself or not, Calvinism, generally speaking, has steadfastly proclaimed the responsibility of man as a free moral agent. On the whole, belief in the freedom of the will, properly interpreted, may be regarded as the unanimous, if not always coherently spoken, belief of the Christian Church.

(3) Theological interpretation. The doctrine of human freedom relates not only to man's original condition before the fall, but also to his present fallen condition, as that of bondage to sin; and still further to the condition to which he is brought through redemption by Christ. (a) Man was created in the image of God, and accordingly was endowed with perfect moral freedom. Sin resulted from the abuse of freedom. (See FALL OF MAN; SIN.) (b) In consequence of the sin of the first human pair mankind has inherited a depraved nature. So that while the natural freedom of man is not lost in respect to many things, yet with respect to meeting the requirements of the divine law, man is of himself in a state of complete moral inability (see Rom. 7:19-24, et al). This is to be held in opposition to Pelagianism (See PELAGIANISM). (c) The actual condition of mankind, as morally fallen, is, however, greatly modified by the grace of God that has come to the race through redemption. The Holy Spirit is poured out upon all flesh. The moral feeling of men is to such an extent restored that they are enabled to do freely many things that are right, and especially they may appropriate or refuse to appropriate the provision that God has made for their salvation. Through regeneration and sanctification the bondage of sin is completely destroyed, and thus true believers become "free indeed."

(4) Arguments for freedom. (a) Appeal is made to universal consciousness. The common experience of men is that while choosing one way they feel that they might choose another. (b) Freedom is essential to all moral responsibility. And moral responsibility is one of the intuitions of the human mind. (c) The denial of freedom must logically lead to the denial of moral distinctions in human affairs. (d) In addition to the above, which are purely rational arguments, is the general force of Scripture teaching, which uniformly represents man as invested with the power of choosing between right and wrong, and between sin and salvation.

FREEDOM, YEAR OF, OR JUBILEE.

See FESTIVALS.

FREEMAN (Gr. ἀπελευθερος, ap-el-yoo'-ther-os, one set free), a person who had been freed (1 Cor. 7:22). In Gal. 4:22, 23, 30, a strong distinction is drawn between the freewoman and the bondmaid. See FREEDOM.

FREEWILL OFFERING. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERING.

FRET. See GLOSSARY.

FRIEND (Heb. רֵעַ, ray'-uh, associate), a person with whom one has friendly intercourse (Gen. 38:12, 20; 2 Sam. 13:3; Job 2:11; 19:21, etc.); also a lover, one beloved of a woman (Cant. 5:16; Jer. 3:1, A. V. "lovers," 20; Hos. 3:1); and in Judg. 14:20 it is used in the sense of "the friend of the bridegroom" (John 3:29), who asked the hand of the bride and rendered service at the marriage (q. v.).

1. Het ah'-ee-ros (Gr. ἐταῖρος, comrade, Matt. 11:16, A. V. "fellow"), used in kindly address (Matt. 20:13; 22:12; 26:50).

2. Pi'-tho (Gr. Πείθω, Acts 12:20), is used in the sense of to pacify, to win one's favor.

3. Fee'-los (Gr. φίλος), one attached by affection; frequently used in the New Testament, as Jas. 2:23; 4:4.

FRINGE (Heb. תְּרֵלָה, ghed-eel', twisted thread, i. e., a tassel, Deut. 22:12; צִיצִית, tssee-tseeth', flowery, bloomlike, and so tassel, Num. 15:38, 39). Fringes were ordered to be sewn upon the hem of the outside garment, to remind the Israelites of the commandments of God, that they might have them constantly before their eyes and follow them. These fringes (tassels) were made of twisted blue thread and fastened upon each corner of the garment. The color (blue) was used to remind the Jews of the heavenly origin of the law. Fringed garments, elaborately wrought, were very common among the ancient Egyptians and Babylonians.

FROG. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FRONTIER (Heb. מְצִלָּה, kaw-tselh', Ezek. 25:9), the extremity or border of a country.

FRONTLET (Heb. תְּרֵמָה, to-faw-faw', to bind, only in Exod. 13:16; Deut. 6:8; 11:18). "The expression in Deut. 6:8, 'Thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes,' does not point at all to the symbolizing of the divine commands by an outward sign to be worn upon the hand, or to bands with passages of the law inscribed upon them, to be worn on the forehead between the eyes. . . . The line of thought referred to merely expresses the idea that the Israelites were not only to retain the commands of God in their hearts, and to confess them with the mouth, but to fulfill them with the hand, or in act and deed" (K. and D., Com. in loco). But the Jews, after their return from captivity, construed the injunction literally, and had portions of the law written out and worn as badges upon their persons. They are still worn by modern Jews, and consist of strips of parchment, on which are written four passages of Scripture (Exod. 13:2-10, 11-17; Deut. 6:4-9; 13-22). These are rolled up in a case of black calfskin, attached to a stiffer piece of leather having a thong one finger broad and one and a half cubits long. See PHYLACTERY.

FROST (Heb. כֶּפֶרֶר, kef-ore', so called from covering the ground, "hoar frost," Exod. 16:14; Job 38:29; Psa. 147:16; also קֶרֶךְ, keh'-rakh, smooth, as ice, so rendered Job 6:16; 38:29), frozen dew. It appears in a still night, when there is no storm or tempest, and descends upon the earth as silently as if it were produced by mere breathing (Job 37:10). In Psa. 78:47 "frost" is the rendering of the Heb. קְחָלִים, khan-aw-mav', which Michaelis thought to be a species of ant.

FRWARDNESS (Heb. תִּפְסִיחַ, tah-poo-kaw'); perverseness (Deut. 32:20); deceit, falsehood (Prov. 2:12; 6:14, etc.).

FRUIT. See GARDEN; VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

Figurative. The word fruit is often used figuratively in Scripture: Of offspring, children (Exod. 21:22; Psa. 21:10; Hos. 9:16); also in such phrases as "fruit of the womb" (Gen. 30:2; Deut. 7:13, etc.); "fruit of the loins" (Acts 2:30); "fruit of the body" (Psa. 132:11; Mic. 6:7).

Also in a variety of forms, as: "They shall eat the fruit of their doings," i. e., experience the consequences (Prov. 1:31; Isa. 3:10; Jer. 6:19; 17:10); the "fruit of the hands" is used for gain, profit; boasting is the "fruit of the stout heart" (Isa. 10:12); a man's words are called the "fruit of the mouth" (Prov. 12:14; 18:20; Heb. 13:15; Hos. 10:13); "fruit of lies;" "the fruit of the righteous" (Prov. 11:30) is his counsel, example, etc.; the "fruit of the spirit," enumerated in Gal. 5:22, 23, are those gracious habits which the Holy Spirit produces in the Christian, given more briefly as "goodness, righteousness, and truth" (Eph. 5:9); the "fruits of righteousness" (Phil. 1:11) are such good works as spring from a gracious frame of heart. Fruit is also the name given to a charitable contribution (Rom. 15:28).

FRYING PAN (Heb. מַרְהֶשֶׁת, mar-kheh'-sheth), a pot for boiling meat, etc. (Lev. 2:7; 7:9). It was, probably, deeper than the "baking pan" (Lev. 2:5) which was used for baking bread.

FUEL (Heb. מַאֲכֵלָה, mah-ak-o'-leth, and אֹכֵלֶת, ok-law', both meaning to be consumed). In most Eastern countries there is a scarcity of wood and other materials used by us for fuel. Consequently almost every kind of combustible matter is eagerly sought for, such as the withered stalks of herbs and flowers (Matt. 6:28, 30), thorns (Psa. 58:9; Eccles. 7:6), and animal excrements (Isa. 9:5, 19; Ezek. 4:12-15; 15:4, 6; 21:32). At the present time wood or charcoal is employed in the towns of Syria and Egypt, although the people of Palestine use anthracite coal to some extent. See COAL.

FUGITIVE, the rendering of several Hebrew words, meaning to wander, a refugee, deserter, etc.

FULFILL (Hebrew from מָלַא, man-law', to fill; Gr. πληρώω, pluy-ro'-o), a term generally used with reference to the accomplishment of prophecy; in the Old Testament with respect to prophecies such as are imminent (e. g., the death of Jeroboam's child, 1 Kings 14:17, 18), or distant (that referring to the rebuilding of Jericho, 1 Kings 16:34), or such as refer to a near as well as to a remote event, etc. In the New Testament the formulas "that it might be fulfilled," "For thus it is written," "Then was fulfilled," may be mere allegations, without its being intended to declare that the literal fulfillment took place on the occasion described. Dr. Whedon (Com., Matt. 1:22) says: "All these things did transpire, in order, among other and more direct purposes, to the fulfillment of that prophecy, inasmuch as the fulfillment of that prophecy was at the same time the accomplishment of the incarnation of the Redeemer and the verification of the divine prediction. Nor is there any predestinarian fatalism in all this. God predicts what he sees men will freely do, and then men do freely in turn fulfill what God predicts, and so unconsciously act in order to verify God's veracity."

FULLER. See HANDICRAFTS.

FULLER'S FIELD (Heb. שֵׂדֵה פִּנְס, seh-day' kaw-bas), a spot near Jerusalem (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 36:2; 7:3) so near the walls that one speaking there could be heard on them (2 Kings 18:17, 26). The pool mentioned is probably the one now known as Birket-el-Mamilla, at the head of the Valley of Hinnom, a little west of the Yafa gate. The position of the fuller's field is thus indicated.

FULLER'S SOAP. Figurative. The powerful cleansing properties of borith, or soap, are employed by the prophet Malachi (3:2) to represent the prospective results of the Messiah's coming (comp. Mark 9:3). See FULLER under HANDICRAFTS.

FULLNESS. 1. Mc-lay-aw' (Heb. מְלֵאָה, abundance). That portion of the corn and wine which was to be offered to Jehovah as a tithe or first fruits (Exod. 22:29, margin; Num. 18:27).

2. Saw-bah' (Heb. שָׂבַע, to fill, satiety, abundance Exod. 16:3, "to the full;" Lev. 25:19, "your fill").

3. Play'-ro-mah (Gr. πληρωμα, that which has been filled). This term has been variously used in Scripture. (a) The "fullness of time" is the time when Christ appeared—"When the fullness of the time was come God sent his Son" (Gal. 4:4). (b) The fullness of Christ is the superabundance with which he is filled (John 1:16; Col. 1:19; 2:9). In the last passage, "In him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily," means that the whole nature and attributes of God are in Christ. (c) The Church, i. e., the body of believers, is called the fullness of Christ (Eph. 1:23), as it is the Church which makes him a complete and perfect head.

FUNERAL. 1. Egyptian. When the body was buried, either in the hills, there to be preserved by the conservative influence of the sand, or, having been embalmed, was placed in a sarcophagus of hard stone, whose lid and trough, hermetically fastened with cement, prevented the penetration of any moisture, the soul was supposed to follow the body to the tomb, and there to dwell, as in its eternal house, upon the confines of the visible and invisible world. Funeral sacrifices and the regular cultus of the dead originated in the need experienced for making provision for the sustenance of the manes after having secured their lasting existence by the mummification of their bodies. Unless supplied with food the soul (or double) was supposed to wander abroad at night in search thereof. Therefore food and vessels of wine and beer were brought to the tomb, that they might enjoy that which was thought to be necessary for the maintenance of their bodies.

2. Among the Ancient Israelites. What form or ceremonies of obsequies were observed is to us almost unknown, except that the act of interment was performed by the relations (sons, brothers) with their own hands (Gen. 25:9; 35:29; Judg. 16:31; comp. Matt. 8:21, 22). In later times the Jews left this office to others, and in Amos 5:16 it is spoken of as something shocking that kinsmen should be obliged to carry the corpse to the grave. As soon as possible after death the body was washed (Acts 9:37), then wrapped in a large cloth (Matt. 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53), or all its limbs wound with bands (John 11:44), between the folds of which, in cases of persons of distinction, aromatics were laid or sprinkled (John 19:39, sq.). At public funerals of princes sumptuous shrouds were used, and there was a prodigal expense of odors. The body was

FURLONG. See METROLOGY, I.

FURNACE. The rendering in the A. V. of the following words:

1. Kib-shavn' (Heb. כִּבְשָׁן, so called from subduing the stone or ore), a smelting furnace or lime-kiln (Gen. 19:28; comp. Isa. 33:12; Amos 2:1), or brickkiln (Exod. 9:8, 10; 19:18).

2. At-toon' (Heb. אֲתוֹן, of uncertain origin), a large furnace, apparently with an opening at the top to cast in materials (Dan. 3:22, 23), and a door at the ground from which to take the metal (v. 26). It was probably built like the Roman kiln for baking pottery ware. The Persians used the furnace for inflicting capital punishment (Dan. 3; comp. Jer. 29:22; Hos. 7:7; 2 Macc. 7:5).

3. Koor (Heb. כּוּר, dug out, pot), a refining furnace (Prov. 17:3; 27:21; Ezek. 22:18), probably similar to the one used in Egypt. The jeweler appears to have had a little portable furnace and blow-pipe, which he carried about with him, as at present in India.

Figurative. The refining furnace is figuratively applied to a state of trial (Deut. 4:20; Isa. 48:10, etc.).

4. Tan-noor (Heb. תַּנּוּר, perhaps fire-pot), "a stove, i. e., a cylindrical fire-pot, such as is used in the dwelling houses of the East" (Gen. 15:17), "from which a fiery torch, i. e., a brilliant flame, was streaming forth." They are still in use among the Arabs under the same name; a large round pot of earthen or some other material, two or three feet high, narrowing toward the top; this being heated by a fire made within, the dough was spread upon the sides to bake.

5. Al-eel' (Heb. אֵלֵיל, of uncertain etymology), probably a crucible (Psa. 12:6).

6. Kam'-ee-nos (Gr. κλίβανος), a furnace either for smelting, burning earthen ware, or baking bread (Matt. 13:42, 50; Rev. 1:15; 9:2).

FURNACES, THE TOWER OF (Heb. מִגְדַּל הַתַּנּוּרִים, mig-dal' hat-tan-noo-rem', Neh. 3:11; 12:38). This was one of the towers of the middle or second wall of Jerusalem, at its north-west angle, adjoining the "corner gate," and near the intersection of the present line of the Via Dolorosa with the street of St. Stephen. It may be the same with the "Baker's Street" (Jer. 37:21).

FURNITURE. 1. The rendering in the A. V. of the Heb. כַּר, kar, pad, a camel's litter or canopied saddle, in which females are accustomed to travel in the East at the present day (Gen. 31:34).

removed to the grave in a coffin (probably open), or on a bier (2 Sam. 3:31), borne by men (Luke 7:14; Acts 5:6, 10), with a retinue of relatives and friends (2 Sam. 3:31; Luke 7:12). The Talmud speaks of funeral processions with horns, in a long train (Job 21:33), with loud weeping and wailing (2 Sam. 3:32). Female mourners were hired for the purpose, who prolonged the lamentation several days. The burial was followed by the funeral meal (2 Sam. 3:35; Jer. 16:5, 7; Hos. 9:4; Ezek. 24:17, 22).

3. Modern Jewish Customs. "Crowds of relatives, friends, and acquaintances assemble at funerals. For all these refreshments must be provided, and not a few from a distance tarry all night, and must be entertained. The priests, also, and religious functionaries of all sects, must be rewarded for their attendance, for their subsequent prayers, and good offices in behalf of the dead. Many families are reduced to poverty by funerals, and it must have been substantially so in remote ages, for the customs were very similar"

2. Kel-ee' (Heb. כֶּלֶּי, something prepared). The name given to the sacred things in the tabernacle and their utensils (Exod. 31:7, sq.; 35:14; 39:33). In Nah. 2:9 it is used for "ornamental vessels."

For furniture in its usual sense, see HOUSE, III.

FURROW, a trench in the earth made by a plow (Psa. 65:10; Hos. 10:4). In Hos. 10:10 "furrows" had better be rendered "transgressions," referring, according to some, to the golden calves at Dan and Beth-el, but according to others to their apostasy from Jehovah and the royal house of David (comp. ch. 3:5).

FUTURE LIFE. See LIFE; IMMORTALITY.

FURY (Heb. כַּהַרְוֹת, khai-maw', heat; or כַּהַרְוֹת, khai-ron'e', burning), intense anger, attributed to God metaphorically, or speaking after the manner of men (Lev. 26:28; Job 20:23; Isa. 63:3, etc.). See ANGER.

G

GA'AL (Heb. גַּאֵל, gah'-al, loathing), the son of Ebed (Judg. 9:26, sq.). He was probably a freebooter, and was welcomed to Shechem because the Shechemites hoped that he would be able to render them good service in their revolt from Abimelech. At the festival at which the Shechemites offered the first fruits of their vintage in the temple of Baal, Gaal strove to kindle their wrath against the absent Abimelech. His rebellious speech was reported to Abimelech by the town prefect, Zebul. On receiving this intelligence Abimelech rose up during the night with the people that were with him, and placed four companies in ambush against Shechem. When Gaal went out in the morning upon some enterprise, and stood before the city gate, Abimelech rose up with his army out of the ambush. Gaal fled into the city, but was thrust out by Zebul, and we hear of him no more, B. C. after 1100.

GA'ASH (Heb. גַּאֲשׁ, ga'-ash, quaking), more accurately Mount Gaash, in the district of Mount Ephraim. On the north side of the hill was Timnath-serach, the city given to Joshua (Josh. 24:30). Here Joshua was buried. The "brooks," that is, valleys of Gaash are mentioned in 2 Sam. 23:30; 1 Chron. 11:32.

GA'BA (Josh. 18:24; Ezra 2:26; Neh. 7:30), a less correct rendering of גֵּבַא (q. v.).

GAB'BAI (Heb. גַּבְבַּי, gab-bah'ee, tax gatherer), a chief of the tribe of Benjamin, who settled in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:8), B. C. before 445.

GAB'BATHA (Gr. γαββαθά, gab-bath-ah'; Chald. גַּבְבַּתָּא, knoll), the place mentioned in John 19:13, where it is stated that Pilate, alarmed by the insinuation of the Jews, "If thou let this man go thou art not Caesar's friend," went into the pretorium again, and brought Jesus out to them. He then pronounced formal sentence against Jesus, having taken his seat upon the tribunal (Gr. βῆμα), in a place called the Pavement (Gr. Λιθόστρωτον, stone strewn), but in the Hebrew Gab-batha. It is probable that the Greek name was given to the spot from the nature of its pavement, and the Hebrew from its shape.

GA'BRIEL (Heb. גַּבְרִיֵּאל; Gr. Γαβριήλ, gab-ree-ah'e', man or hero of God), the word used to designate the heavenly messenger, sent to explain to Daniel the visions which he saw (Dan. 8:16; 9:21), and who announced the birth of John the Baptist to his father, Zechariah (Luke 1:11), and that of the Messiah to the Virgin Mary (Luke 1:26). Keil (Com. on Dan. 10:5, sq.), thinks that we there find a description of Gabriel. The word appears to have been descriptive of the angelic office, used as a proper name. As to his relation to other angels and archangels, the Scriptures give no information; but in the book of Enoch "the four great archangels, Michael, Raphael, Gabriel, and Uriel," are described as reporting the corrupt state of mankind to the Creator, and receiving their several commissions. In the Rabbinical writings Gabriel is represented as standing in front of the divine throne, near the standard of Judah. The Mohammedans regard Gabriel with profound reverence, affirming that to him was committed a complete copy of the Koran, which he imparted in successive portions to Mohammed. He is styled in the Koran the Spirit of Truth and the Holy Spirit, and it is alleged that he will hold the scales in which the actions of men will be weighed in the last day.

GAD (Heb. גָּד, gawd, fortune). 1. Son of Jacob.

(1) Name and Family. Jacob's seventh son, the firstborn of Zilpah, Leah's maid, and whole brother to Asher (Gen. 30:11-13; 46:16, 18), B. C. perhaps about 2000.

(2) Personal History. Of the life of the individual Gad nothing is preserved, and therefore we must proceed immediately to speak of:

(3) The Tribe of Gad. (1) NUMBERS. At the time of the descent into Egypt seven sons are ascribed to him (Gen. 46:16), remarkable from the fact that a majority of their names have plural terminations, as if those of families rather than persons (Smith). At the first census Gad had forty-five thousand six hundred and fifty adult males, ranking eighth; and at the second census forty thousand five hundred, ranking tenth. (2) POSITION. They were attached to the second division of the Israelitish host, following the standard of Reuben, and camping on the south of the tabernacle, their chief being Eliasaph, the son of Deuel, or Reuel (Num. 1:14; 2:10-16). (3) TERRITORY. In common with Reuben, Gad requested Moses to give them their portion on the east of Jordan, because they had "a great multitude of cattle." Upon being assured that they would assist their brethren in the conquest of Canaan, Moses granted them their request. The country allotted to Gad appears, speaking roughly, to have lain chiefly about the center of the land east of Jordan. To Reuben and Gad was given the territory of Sihon, between the Arnon and the Jab-bok, and as far east as Jazer, the border of the Ammonites, but the division is hard to define (see Num. 32:34, sq.; Josh. 13:15, sq.). "The land is high, well suitable for flocks. . . there is water in abundance, and therefore the vegetation is rich" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 262). (4) STRU-QUENT HISTORY. The Gadites were a warlike race, and they bravely aided their brethren in the conquest of Canaan (Josh. 4:12; 22:1-4). Surrounded by the Ammonites, Midianites, and many other hostile tribes, they yet nobly defended their country. One of their greatest victories was that gained over the descendants of Ishmael, the tribes of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab, from whom they took enormous booty (1 Chron. 5:18-22). The seat of Ish-bosheth's sovereignty was established in this territory, for Abner brought him to Mahanaim, and there he reigned (2 Sam. 2:8), and there he was assassinated. Many, however, of the Gadite chiefs had joined David while in the hold (1 Chron. 12:8); and when, years later, he was obliged to flee across the Jordan, he found a welcome and help (2 Sam. 17:24, 27-29). In the division of the kingdom, Gad, of course, fell to the northern state, and many of the wars between Syria and Israel must have ravaged its territory (2 Kings 10:33). At last, for the sins of the people, Tig-lath-pileser carried the Gadites and the neighboring tribes away captive into Assyria (2 Kings 15:29; 1 Chron. 5:26).

2. "The Seer," or "the king's seer," i. e., David's (2 Sam. 24:11; 1 Chron. 21:9; 29:29; 2 Chron. 29:25), was a prophet who appears to have joined David when in "the hold," and at whose advice he quitted it for the forest of Hareth (1 Sam. 22:5), B. C. before 1000. We do not hear of him again until he reappears in connection with the punishment inflicted for the numbering of the people (2 Sam. 24:11-19; 1 Chron. 21:9-19). But he was evidently attached to the royal establishment at Jerusalem, for he wrote a book of the Acts of David (1 Chron. 29:29), and also assisted in settling the arrangements for the musical service of the "house of the Lord" (2 Chron. 29:25).

GAD (Heb. גַּד, gad), the god (Isa. 65:11, A. V. "troop") of good fortune. See GODS, FALSE.

GADARA (Gr. Γαδάρᾱ, gad-a-rah'), the capital of the Roman province of Perara, east of the Jordan, about six miles from the Sea of Galilee, opposite Tiberias. It is doubtful if the scene, strictly speaking, of the healing, by the Saviour, of the demoniac was Gadara, for it is inaccessible from the lake by a ravine of great depth. The description is probably general. The modern village, Un-Keis, is in the midst of ruins intimating the grandeur of the ancient Gadara. See GADARENE.

GADARENE' (Gr. Γαδάρηνος, gad-ar-ay-nos'), an inhabitant of GADARA (q. v.), mentioned in the account of the healing of the demoniacs (Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26, 37). It is also, probably, the correct reading in Matt. 8:28 (and is so rendered in the R. V.), where "Gergesenes" must be supposed to owe its origin to a confusion in the matter of geography.

GAD'DI (Heb. גַּדְדִּי, gad-dee', fortunate), son of Susi, of the tribe of Manasseh, sent by Moses to represent that tribe among the twelve "spies" on their exploring tour through Canaan (Num. 13:11), B. C. 1209.

GAD'DIEL (Heb. גַּדְדִּיֶּל, gad-dee-ale', fortune of God), son of Sodi, of the tribe of Zebulun. One of the twelve "spies" sent by Moses to explore Canaan (Num. 13:10), B. C. 1209.

GADI (Heb. גַּדִּי, gad-dee', a Gadite), the father of the usurper Menahem, who went up from Tirzah, and came to Samaria and slew Shallum, king of Israel (2 Kings 15:14), and reigned ten years over Israel (v. 17), B. C. about 741.

GADITES (Heb. גַּדִּיִּם, gad-dee'), the descendants of GAD (q. v.), the son of Jacob (Num. 34:14; Deut. 3:12, 16; 4:43; 29:8, etc.).

GAD'HAM (Heb. גַּדְחָם, gad'h-kham, to burn), one of the sons of Nahor (Abraham's brother) by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24), B. C. about 2200.

GAD'HAR (Heb. גַּדְחָר, gad'h-khar, lurker), one of the chief Nethinim whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49), B. C. before 536.

GAINED. See GLOSSARY.

GAIUS (Gr. Γάιος, gal'-ee-os; Latin Caius).

1. A Macedonian who accompanied Paul in some of his journeys, and was seized by the populace at Ephesus (Acts 19:29), A. D. about 54.

2. A man of Derbe, who accompanied Paul on his return from Macedonia into Asia, probably to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4).

3. An inhabitant of Corinth, the host of Paul, and in whose house the Christians were accustomed to assemble (Rom. 16:23). He was baptized by Paul (1 Cor. 1:14).

4. The person to whom John's third epistle is addressed. "He was probably a convert of St. John (v. 4), and a layman of wealth and distinction in some city near Ephesus, A. D. after 90. The epistle was written for the purpose of commending to the kindness and hospitality of Caius some Christians who were strangers in the place where he lived."—Smith.

GAL'LAL (Heb. גַּלְלָל, gaw-law'l', perhaps weighty), the name of two Levites after the exile.

1. One of those who dwell in the villages of the Netophathites and served at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:15), B. C. about 536.

2. A descendant of Jeduthun, and father of Shemaiah, or Shammua (1 Chron. 9:16; Neh. 11:17), B. C. before 445.

GALATIA (Gr. Γαλατία, gal-at-ee'-ah). The Roman Galatia was the central region of the peninsula of Asia Minor, with the provinces of Asia on the west, Cappadocia on the east, Pamphylia and Cilicia on the south, and Bithynia and Pontus on the north (Acts 16:6; 18:23; 1 Cor. 16:1; Gal. 1:2, etc.). It would be difficult to define the exact limits. In fact they were frequently changing. At one time there is no doubt that this province contained Pisidia and Lyconia, and therefore those towns of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, which are conspicuous in the narrative of St. Paul's travels.

GALATIANS. They were called by the Romans Galli, and were a stream from that torrent of barbarians which poured into Greece in the 3d century B. C., and which recoiled in confusion from the cliffs of Delphi. Crossing over into Asia Minor they lost no time in spreading over the whole peninsula with their arms and devastation, dividing nearly the whole of it among their three tribes. They levied tribute on cities and kings, and hired themselves out as mercenary soldiers. It became a Roman province under Augustus, reaching from the borders of Asia and Bithynia to the neighborhood of Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, "cities of Lycaonia." Henceforth this territory was a part of the Roman empire.

"The Galatians are frequently called Gallogrecians, and many of the inhabitants of the province must have been of pure Grecian origin. Another section of the population, the early Phrygians, were probably numerous, but in a lower and more degraded position. The presence of a great number of Jews in the province implies that it was, in some respects, favorable for traffic. . . . The Roman itineraries inform us of the lines of communication between the great towns near the Halys and the other parts of Asia Minor. These circumstances are closely connected with the spread of the Gospel" (C. and H., Life and Epist. of St. Paul, i, 247).

Religious Matters. The Galatians had little religion of their own, and easily adopted the superstitions and mythology of the Greeks. Paul introduced the Gospel among them (Acts 16:6; 18:23; Gal. 1:6; 4:3), visiting them in person. When detained by sickness he sent Crescens to them (2 Tim. 4:10). Soon after Paul left Galatia, missionaries of the Judaizing party came, and taught the necessity of circumcision for the higher grade of Christian service; declared that the apostle did, in effect, preach circumcision (Gal. 5:11), thus casting doubt upon Paul's sincerity. Such teaching caused defection among the converts to Christianity, and he wrote his epistle vindicating himself from the charges of the Judaizing party.

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

GALBANUM. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

GAL'EED (Heb. גַּלְעָד, gal-ade', heap of witness), the name given by Jacob to a pile of stones erected by Jacob and Laban as a memorial of their covenant (Gen. 31:47, 48). It is Hebrew, but the name given by Laban Jegar-sahadutha is Aramaic, known probably to Nahor's family, while Abraham and his descendants learned the kindred dialect of Hebrew.

GALILÆAN (Gr. Γαλιλαῖος, gal-ee-lah'-yos), a native, or inhabitant of Galilee (Matt. 26:69; Acts 1:11; 5:37; John 4:45, "of Galilee"). The Galilæans were generous and impulsive, of simple manners, earnest piety, and intense nationalism. They were also excitable, passionate, and violent. The Talmud accuses them of being quarrelsome, but admits that they cared more for honor than for money. Their religious observances were simple, differing in several points from those of Judea. The people of Galilee were specially blamed for neglecting the study of their language, charged with errors in grammar, and especially with absurd malpronunciation, sometimes leading to ridiculous mistakes. Thus there was a general contempt in Rabbinic circles for all that was Galilæan. The Galilæans were easily recognized by their dialect and tone, as is seen by the detection of Peter as one of Christ's disciples (Mark 14:70). The name was applied by way of reproach to the early Christians. Julian generally used this term when speaking of Christ or Christians, and called Christ "the Galilæan God." He also made a law requiring that Christians should be called by no other name, hoping thereby to abolish the name of Christian. It is said that he died fighting against the Christians, and as he caught the blood from a wound in his side, threw it toward heaven, saying, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilæan!"

GAL'ILEE (Heb. גַּלְיָלָה, gal-lee-law', circle or circuit). PALESTINE (q.v.) was divided into three provinces—Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. Galilee occupied the upper part of the land, being the northwest province. In the time of Christ it included more than one third of western Palestine, extending from the base of Mount Hermon, on the north, to the ridges of Carmel and Gilboa, on the south, and from the Jordan to the Mediterranean Sea, about fifty by twenty-five miles in extent. Solomon once offered the tract to Hiram, who declined it, after which Solomon colonized it. It embraced a large northern portion of the tribe of Naphtali, and was called Galilee of the Gentiles. There are very many Scripture references to it. The first three gospels are occupied largely with Christ's ministry in Galilee. Of his thirty-two parables nineteen were spoken in Galilee, and twenty-five of his thirty-three great miracles were performed in Galilee. In this province the Sermon on the Mount was spoken. Here our Lord was transfigured.

GAL'ILEE, SEA OF. This is called by four several names in Scripture: The "Sea of Chinnereth" (Heb. חִנְרֵת, kin-nel'-reth, harp-shaped), the shape of the sea (Num. 34:11; Josh. 12:3; 13:27); the "Lake of Gennesareth" (Luke 5:1, Gr. Γεννησαρετ, ghen-nay-sar-et'), the name of the extended plain adjoining the lake; the "Sea of Tiberias" (John 6:1; 21:1, Gr. Τιβεριάς, tib-er-ee-as'). This is the name used by the natives at this time—Bahr Tarbariyeh. The name "Galilee" is used (Matt. 4:18; 15:29). The lake is distant from Jerusalem about sixty miles; is from eighty to one hundred and sixty feet deep, with abundance of fish. The river Jordan, which makes a steep descent, falling on the scale of sixty feet to a mile, for the distance of more than twenty-five miles, enters the lake. The waters of the lake are blue and sweet. The lake, about which so much of the life of Jesus was passed, though six hundred and eighty feet below the Mediterranean Sea, was the center of busy life. Nine cities, each with a population of not less than fifteen thousand, bordered it. It was the very highway of rich traffic between Damascus and the sea. The customhouse duties, from which Christ took Matthew, were of no little import. The hot springs brought multitudes to be cured. Mr. George Adam Smith, in his recent statements, says concerning the industries of Galilee: "They were agricultural, fruit growing, dyeing, and tanning, with every varying department of a large carrying trade, but chiefly boatbuilding, fishing, and fish curing. Of the last, which spread the lake's fame over the Roman world before its fishermen and their habits became familiar through the Gospel, there is no trace in the Evangelists. The fisheries themselves were pursued by thousands of families. They were no monopoly; but the fishing grounds, best at the north end of the lake, where the streams entered, were free to all. And the trade was very profitable." It was on and about this lake that Jesus did many of his most wonderful miracles. Eighteen of the thirty-three recorded miracles of Christ were probably done in the immediate neighborhood of the Sea of Galilee. In the city of Capernaum alone he performed ten of these.

GALL, the rendering of the following original words:

1. Mer-ay-raw' (Heb. מֵרָרָה), or mer-o-raw' (Heb. מֵרָרָה), denotes etymologically "that which is bitter;" see Job 13:26, "thou writest bitter things against me." Hence the term is applied to the "bile" or "gall" from its intense bitterness (Job 16:13; 20:25); it is also used of the "poison" of serpents (Job 20:14), which the ancients erroneously believed was their gall. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

2. Roshe (Heb. רוֹשׁ or רוֹשׁ), generally translated "gall" by the A. V., is in Hos. 10:4 rendered "hemlock;" in Deut. 32:33 and Job 20:16 roshe denotes the "poison" or "venom" of serpents. From Deut. 29:18 and Lam. 3:19, comp. with Hos. 10:4, it is evident that the Hebrew term denotes some bitter, and perhaps poisonous plant. Other writers have supposed, and with some reason (from Deut. 32:32), that some berry-bearing plant must be intended. Gesenius understands "poppies." The capsules of the Papaveraceæ may well give the name of roshe ("head") to the plant in question, just as we speak of poppy heads. The various species of this family spring up quickly in cornfields, and the juice is extremely bitter. A steeped solution of poppy heads may be "the water of gall" of Jer. 8:14.

3. Khol-ay' (Gr. χολή, perhaps greenish), the bitter secretion gall. It is recorded that the Roman soldiers offered our Lord, just before his crucifixion, "vinegar (R. V. 'wine') mingled with gall" (Matt. 27:34), and "wine mingled with myrrh" (Mark 15:23). The Jews were in the habit of giving the criminal a stupefying drink before nailing him to the cross, probably with the purpose of deadening pain. Much discussion has arisen both as to the nature of the potion presented to Jesus and its purpose. Perhaps the following is about correct: "Gall" is to be understood as expressing the bitter nature of the draught, and its purpose was to strengthen the Lord for the trial of suffering before him.

GALLANT, GALLENTS. See GLOSSARY.

GALLERY, the translation of two Hebrew words:

1. At-took' (Heb. from פָּרַץ, to cut off), a term in architecture, signifying projection of a story or portico, an offset, terrace (Ezek. 41:15; 42:3, 5). Their exact form is a matter of conjecture.

2. Rekh-ect' (Heb. רֵיט), probably panel work or fretted ceiling (Cant. 1:17, margin).

GALLEY. See SHIP.

GAL'IM (Heb. גַּלְיִים, gal-levn', fountains, or perhaps heaps), a city of Benjamin, north of Jerusalem. It was the native place of Phalti, to whom David's wife Michal had been given (1 Sam. 25:44; Isa. 10:30).

GAL'LIO (Gr. Γαλλίον, gal-lee'-ovn), proconsul of Achaia (Acts 8:12, etc.). See PAUL.

GALLOWS. See PUNISHMENTS.

GAMA'LIEL (Heb. גַּמְלִיאֵל, gam-lee-ale', reward of God).

1. Son of Pedahzur, and the captain of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 7:54; 10:23), who was appointed to assist Moses in numbering the people at Sinai (1:10; 2:20). He made an offering, as tribe prince, at the dedication of the altar (7:54), and was chief of his tribe at starting on the march through the wilderness (10:23), B. C. 1210.

2. Doctor. The grandson of the great Hillel, and himself a Pharisee and celebrated doctor of the law. His learning was so eminent and his character so revered that he is one of the seven who, among Jewish doctors only, have been honored with the title of "Rabban." He was called the "Beauty of the Law," and it is a saying of the Talmud that "since Rabban Gamaliel died the glory of the law has ceased." He was a Pharisee, but anecdotes are told of him which show that he was not trammelled by the narrow bigotry of the sect. He rose above the prejudices of his party. Candor and wisdom seem to have been the features of his character, and this agrees with what we read of him in the Acts of the Apostles, that he was "had in reputation of all the people" (C. and H., Life and Epistles of St. Paul). When the apostles were brought before the Sanhedrin, and enraged the council by their courage and steadfastness, the latter sought to slay them. But this rash proposal was checked by Gamaliel, who, having directed the apostles to withdraw, thus addressed the council: "Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching these men. . . . Refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it" (Acts 5:34-39). His counsel prevailed, and the apostles were dismissed with a beating. We learn from Acts 22:3 that he was the preceptor of the apostle Paul. Ecclesiastical tradition makes him become a Christian and be baptized by Peter and Paul, together with his son Gamaliel and with Nicodemus. The Clementine Recognitions (1:65) state that he was secretly a Christian at this time. But these notices are altogether irreconcilable with the esteem and respect in which he was held even in after times by the Jewish Rabbins. The interference of Gamaliel in behalf of the apostles does not prove that he secretly approved of their doctrine. He was a dispassionate judge, and reasoned in that affair with the tact of worldly wisdom and experience, urging that religious opinions usually gain strength by opposition and persecution (5:35, 37), while, if not noticed, they are sure not to leave any lasting impression on the minds of the people if devoid of truth (v. 38), and that it is vain to contend against them if true (v. 39). GAMES. This word does not occur in Scripture, though frequent reference is made to the things signified by it.

1. Egyptian. Among the Egyptians the most usual indoor games were "odd and even;" "mora," played by two persons, who each simultaneously threw out the fingers of one hand, while one party guessed the sum of both; draughts; dice, the latter being, according to Plutarch, a very early invention in Egypt. The games of children were: Throwing and catching the ball, running, leaping, and similar feats. Young children were amused with painted dolls and animals, made to assume different positions by means of strings. Out-of-door games were: Ball, wrestling, throwing a knife or pointed weapon into a block of wood; feats of strength, such as lifting, etc.; mock fights, bull fights, etc. (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, i, 189-211).

2. Hebrew. With regard to juvenile games, the notices are very few. The only recorded sports, however, are keeping tame birds (Job 41:5) and imitating the proceedings of marriages or funerals (Matt. 11:16). With regard to manly games, they were not much followed up by the Hebrews; the natural earnestness of their character and the influence of the climate alike indisposed them to active exertion. The chief amusement of the men appears to have consisted in conversation and joking (Jer. 16:17; Prov. 26:19). A military exercise (probably a war dance) seems to be noticed in 2 Sam. 2:14. Indeed the public games of the Hebrews seem to have been exclusively connected with military sports and exercises; and it is probable that in this way the Jewish youth were instructed in the use of the bow and sling (1 Sam. 20:20, 35-40; Judg. 20:16; 1 Chron. 12:2). In Jerome's day the usual sport consisted in lifting weights as a trial of strength, as also practiced in Egypt. Dice are mentioned by the Talmudists, probably introduced from Egypt. Public games were altogether foreign to the spirit of Hebrew institutions; the great religious festivals supplied the pleasurable excitement and the feelings of national union which rendered the games of Greece so popular, and at the same time inspired the persuasion that such gatherings should be exclusively connected with religious duties. Accordingly the erection of a gymnasium by Jason was looked upon as a heathenish proceeding (1 Macc. 1:14; 2 Macc. 4:12-14). The entire absence of verbal or historical reference to this subject in the gospels shows how little it entered into the life of the Jews.

3. Grecian. The more celebrated of the Grecian games were four in number: The Isthmian, held on the Isthmus of Corinth, in a grove sacred to Pöseidön, from B. C. 589, held in the first month of spring, in the second and fourth years of each Olympiad; the Nemean, celebrated in the valley of Némëa, in honor of Zeus; the Olympian, celebrated in honor of Zeus at Olympia; and the Pythian, held from B. C. 586 on the Crissæan plain, below Delphi, once in four years, in the third year of each Olympiad. The Olympic games were by much the most celebrated, and in describing these we describe the others, with certain differences of no account. They were celebrated once every four years, and hence a period of four years was termed an Olympiad, by which period the Greeks reckoned their time. "The festival consisted of two parts: (1) The presentation of offerings, chiefly to Zeus, but also to the other gods and heroes, on the part of the Eleans, the sacred embassies, and other visitors to the feast; and (2) The contests. These consisted at first of a simple match in the stadium (1 Cor. 9:24-27), the race being run in heats of four, the winners in each heat competing together, the first in the final heat being proclaimed victor; later the runners had to make a circuit of the goal and return to the starting point; then came the long race, where the distance of the stadium had to be covered six, seven, eight, twelve, twenty, or twenty-nine times; the fivefold contest, consisting of leaping, running, quoit, spear throwing, and wrestling; boxing; chariot racing in the hippodrome; pancraton (a combination of wrestling and boxing); racing in armor, and competitions between heralds and trumpeters. Originally only men took part in the contests, but after B. C. 632 boys also shared in them. At first the contests were only open to freemen of pure Hellenic descent, but they were afterward opened to Romans. Permission to view the games was given to barbarians and slaves, while it was refused to women. All competitors were obliged to take an oath that they had spent at least ten months in preparation for the games, and that they would not resort to any unfair tricks in the contests. Judges, varying in number from one to twelve, but after B. C. 348 always ten, kept guard over the strict observance of all regulations and maintained order. Transgressions of the laws of the games and unfairness on the part of competitors were punished by forfeiture of the prize or by fines of money, which went to the revenue of the temple. The name of the victor, as well as his home, were proclaimed aloud by the herald and a palm branch presented him by the judges. The actual prize he only received on the last day of the festival. This was originally some article of value, but at the command of the Delphic oracle this custom was dropped, and the victors were graced by a wreath of the leaves of the sacred wild olive, said to have been originally planted by Heracles. Brilliant distinctions awaited the victor on his return home, for his victory was deemed to have reflected honor on his native land at large. He was accorded a triumph, and at Athens received 500 drachmæ, the right to a place of honor at all public games, and board in the Prytaneum for the rest of his life" (Seyffert, Dict. Class. Antiq.). These games were often held in the Hellenic towns of Palestine, being introduced by Herod into Caesarea and Jerusalem. In the former town he built a stone theater and a large amphitheater. St. Paul's epistles abound with allusions to the Greek contests (see 1 Cor. 4: 9; 9:24-27; 15:32; Phil. 3:14; Col. 3:15; 2 Tim. 2:5; 4:7; 8; Heb. 10:33; Heb. 12:1). A direct reference to the Roman beast-fights (Gr. θηριομαχία) is made by St. Paul when he says, "If after the manner of men I fought with beasts at Ephesus," etc. (1 Cor. 15:32). Paul takes for granted that his readers were acquainted with what he describes in such strong language, and that they would take it figuratively, since they knew that his citizenship would exclude him from condemnation to such punishment. It is here a significant figurative description of the fight with strong and exasperated enemies.

GAM'MADIM (Heb. גַּמְדִּים, gam-maw-deen'), mentioned as defenders of the towers of Tyre (Ezek. 27:11). Various explanations have been given of the meaning of the term, but the most probable is "warriors," "brave men," used as an epithet applied to the native troops of Tyre.

GAM'MUL (Heb. גַּמּוּל, gaw-mool', rewarded), the chief of the twenty-second course of priests, among whom the services of the sanctuary were distributed by lot in the time of David (1 Chron. 24:17), B. C. after 1000.

GAOLER. See JAILER.

GAP (Heb. פְּתָח, peh-rets, breach), an opening in a wall (Ezek. 13:5); "breaches" (Amos 4:3).

Figurative. The corruption was so great in Israel that Ezekiel (22:30) declares "that not a man could be found who should enter into the gap as a righteous man, or avert the judgment of destruction by his intercession."

GARDEN (Heb. גַּן, gan; גַּנָּוָה, gan-naw'; גִּנְיָה, gin-naw'; Gr. κήπος, kay'-pos). Gan and its derivatives have the same generic meaning in Hebrew as their English equivalent garden. They apply to flower gardens (Cant. 6:2), spice plantations (4:16), orchards (6:11), kitchen gardens (Deut. 11:10), and probably parks (2 Kings 9:27; 21:18, 26). Bible lands have been for the most part denuded of their forests. Even groves of non-fruit-bearing trees are rare, except in the neighborhood of cities and villages. The mountain tops are generally bare. So also the table lands of the interior. The unsafe condition of the country, and the necessity of aggregating human dwellings near the comparatively few springs or by the water courses, prevent the peasants from living in scattered houses in the midst of their fields and plantations. The grain fields and pastures are usually at a distance from the villages, not surrounded by fences or hedges, but extending unbroken for miles in every direction, often without a single tree to diversify their surface. On the other hand the vegetable gardens, fruit orchards, mulberry groves, and such trees as are cultivated for timber, like the poplar, are grouped in and around the villages and towns, where they are accessible to the people, can be easily guarded from poachers, and above all where they can be irrigated from the water supply which is the life of the place.

The western landscape exhibits fields and pastures, divided by fences, walls, and hedge rows, interspersed with groves or scattered trees, and dotted with picturesque cottages, with here and there a village or town, the outskirts of the town being usually more or less waste or barren. On the other hand the eastern landscape consists usually of broad areas sown with uniform crops of cotton or cereals, or terraced hillsides planted with vines, mulberries, or figs, or bleak mountain tops, often with scarcely a shrub to clothe the gray rocks, and not infrequently one may take in at a glance these varied features of the scenery without seeing a single human habitation. Suddenly, on rising above a knoll in the plains, or turning an angle in the valleys, he comes upon a scene of ravishing beauty. A village, perched on the top of a rounded hill or clinging to the mountain side, or a city in a broad plain, surrounded and interspersed with luxuriant gardens, orchards, and groves of shade and timber trees, among which wind silvery streams, and over which is a haze which transforms all into a dream. As he enters this paradise the voice of the nightingale, the goldfinch, and the thrush, and the odors and bright colors of innumerable flowers and fruits, charm his senses. Such a scene greeted Mohammed as he looked from the barren chalk hills of

An Eastern Garden.

Anti-Lebanon over the oasis of Damascus, and he feared to enter lest he should no longer care for Paradise.

An Eastern garden is wholly unlike a Western. It is generally surrounded by a high wall of mud or stone (Prov. 24:31), or hedges or fences (Isa. 5:5), usually composed of a tangle of brambles, thorns, or canes to prevent intrusion. The door has a wooden boltlock, by the side of which is a hole for the hand to be put through from the outside to reach the lock, which is fastened on the inner face (Cant. 5:4, 5). Over the gate or inside the garden is a booth or lodge of boughs (Isa. 1:8), or a room, often in the shape of a tower (Mark 12:1), for the watchman. On the trees are scarecrows (Gr. προβασκάνιον, Ep. Jer. 69). These consist of the figure of a man perched on the limb of a tree, or of rags tied to the branches, or of the body of a bird. These gardens are not laid out with the precision of the West, with paths and beds. The vegetables, however, are planted in rows by the shallow ditches or furrows through which the water is conveyed to them (Psa. 1:3; Eccles. 2:6). This water is turned from one furrow to another either by a hoe or by moving the earthen bank which separates them by a shove of the foot (Deut. 11:10). Sometimes the vegetables are planted in a sunken parallelogram, surrounded by a low, earthen wall, in which an opening is made by the foot until the space is filled with water, and then the earth is shoved back in the same way and retains the water. This process is repeated over the whole plantation. Many gardens have fountains or wells (Cant. 4:15). To this allusion is made in the name En-Gannim, "Fountain of Gardens," the modern Jennin. In the orchards and gardens were planted vines, olives (Exod. 33:11), figs, pomegranates, walnuts (Cant. 6:11), flowers (Cant. 6:23), henna, spikenard, safron, calamus, cinnamon, frankincense, myrrh, aloes, and various spices (R. V., Cant. 4:13, 14), and a great variety of vegetables and fruits. The gardens and parks of Solomon (Eccles. 2:5, 6) are supposed to have been in Wadi 'Urtās, and the "pools" (v. 6) are still in good preservation. The "King's garden" (2 Kings 25:4, etc.) was near the pool of Siloam, at Bir Ayyūb, which is probably En-rogel.

The delight which the ancients derived from their gardens is the subject of many allusions in Canticles. It is exactly reproduced in oriental gardens today. Seated on a mat or rug by the bank of a rushing stream, under the shade of the orange or apricot, which tempers the brightness while not obscuring the glory of the sunshine, in an atmosphere laden with the odors of flowers, and musical with the songs of the nightingales and plaintive with the cooings of the turtle-doves, he whiles away hours, eating the luscious fruits which droop over his head, drinking of the pure, cold water, conversing with his friends, or, soothed by these influences, he sinks into a tranquil slumber, in which he dreams of the paradise of God.—G. E. P.

Figurative. A "watered garden" (Isa. 58:11; Jer. 31:12) was an emblem of fertility. A "tree planted by the waters" (Jer. 17:8; comp. Psa. 1:3) was the emblem of the righteous. A waterless garden (Isa. 1:30) was a desert.

GARDEN HOUSE, the rendering (2 Kings 9:27) of Heb. בַּיִת הַגַּן, bayith hag-gawn', "Ahaziah fled by the way of the garden house." "The 'garden house' cannot have formed a portion of the royal gardens, but must have stood at some distance from the city of Jezreel, as Ahaziah went by the road thither, and was not wounded till he reached the height of Gur, near Jibleam" (Keil, Com.). Some think that a place is denoted.

In Canticles (1:16) the bride looks with delight upon the summer house shaded with verdure, and containing the divan, inviting to luxurious repose.

GARDENER, a class of workmen alluded to in Job 27:18, and mentioned in John 20:15. See GARDEN.

GAR'EB (Heb. גַּרְעִיב, gar-rabe', scabby). 1. An Ithrite, i. e., a descendant of Jethro, or Jether, and one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chron. 11:40), B. C. about 1000.

2. A hill near Jerusalem, apparently N. W. (Jer. 31:39).

GARLAND (Gr. στέμμα, stem'-mah). In heathen sacrifices it was customary to adorn the victims with fillets and garlands, and also to put garlands on the head of their idol before sacrifice. These garlands were generally composed of such trees or plants as were esteemed most agreeable to the god who was to be worshipped. It is recorded (Acts 14:13) that the priest at Lystra came out to meet Paul and Barnabas with "oxen and garlands," but whether to adorn the oxen or the apostles is uncertain.

GARLIC, GARLICK. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

GARMENTS. When the people proclaimed Jehu king they took their garments and put them under him on the stairs (2 Kings 9:13), probably thus making an improvised throne for him. The spreading of garments in the streets before persons to whom it was intended to show particular honor was a very ancient and general custom. Thus the people spread their garments in the way before Jesus (Matt. 21:8), while some strewed branches. The simple and uniform shape of garments encouraged the practice of gathering a large number together (Job 27:16; Matt. 22:11, 12; James 5:1, 2), and of keeping them on hand to present to those whom it was desired to honor (Gen. 35:2; 2 Kings 5:5; 2 Chron. 9:24). See DRESS.

GAR'MITE (Heb. גַּרְמִיטִי, gar-gar-mee', perhaps strong), an epithet of KEILAH (q. v.) in the obscure genealogy (1 Chron. 4:19) of MERED (q. v.).

GARNER. 1. O-tsaar' (Heb. גֹּרְנָן, depository), usually rendered a treasure, but really the place where goods are laid up (Joel 1:17).

2. Meh'-zev (Heb. מַגְרֵז, to gather), a place for storing away anything, especially a granary (Psa. 144:18); Ap-oth-ay'-kay (Gr. ἀποθήκη, Matt. 3:12; Luke 8:17); elsewhere "barn." See GRANARY.

GARNET. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

GARNISH. 1. Tsaw-faw' (Heb. צַפֵּי, to overlay, e. g., with stones, 2 Chron. 3:6).

2. Shif-raw' (Heb. שִׁפְרָא, brightness), i. e., with which the heavens are clothed (Job 26:13).

3. Kos-meh'-o (Gr. κοσμέω, to arrange, make ready), to decorate, as a house (Matt. 12:44; Luke 11:26); to adorn, as the walls of a city, with precious stones (Rev. 21:19). See GLOSSARY.

GARRISON (from Heb. נָצַב, to stand firm), a military or fortified post (1 Sam. 13:23; 14:1, 6, etc.; 2 Sam. 23:14). In Ezek. 26:11 an improper rendering is given of the Heb. mats-both' (מַצְבּוֹת), which always means a standing object or monumental column; here probably pillars dedicated to Baal, two of which are mentioned by Herodotus (ii, 44) as standing in the temple of Hercules at Tyre, one of gold, the other of emerald; not images of gods, but pillars, as symbols of Baal.

GASH'MU (Heb. גַּשְׁמוּ, gash-moo'), probably a prolonged form (Neh. 6:6) of the name GESHEM (q. v.).

GAT'AM (Heb. גַּתְאִם, gat-tawn', puny), the fourth named of the sons of Eliphaz, the son of Esau, and founder of an Edomitish tribe (Gen. 36:11, 16; 1 Chron. 1:36), B. C. about 1740.

At the Gate of an Eastern City.

GATE (generally the rendering of Heb. שַׁעַר, shah'-ar, opening, and Gr. πύλη, py'-lay, from πείλω, to turn), the entrance to inclosed grounds, buildings, cities, etc.

1. Various Names. In the Scriptures we find mentioned: (1) Gates of cities, as the "fish," "sheep gate," etc., of Jerusalem (Neh. 1:3; 8:3; Jer. 37:13); the gates of Sodom (Gen. 19:1), of Gaza (Judg. 16:3). (2) Gates of palaces (Neh. 2:8). (3) Gates of the temple (q. v.). (4) Gates of tombs (Matt. 27:60, A. V. "door"). (5) Gates of prisons (Acts 12:10). (6) Gates of camps (Exod. 32:26, 27; see Heb. 13:12).

2. Material, etc. We are not informed as to what materials the Israelites used for the inclosures and gates of their temporary camps. In Egyptian monuments such inclosures are indicated by lines of upright shields, with gates apparently of wicker, defended by a strong guard. Gates of brass (Psa. 107:16; Isa. 45:2, "bronze") and of iron (Acts 12:10) were, probably, only sheeted with plates of these metals. Gates of stone and of pearls are mentioned in Isa. 54:12; Rev. 21:21, and are supposed to refer to such doors, cut out of a single slab, as are occasionally found in ancient countries. Gates of wood were probably used in Gaza (Judg. 16:3). The doors themselves of the larger gates mentioned in Scripture were two-leaved, plated with metal, closed with locks, and fastened with metal bars (Deut. 3:5; Psa. 107:16; Isa. 45:1, 2). Gates not defended by iron were of course liable to be set on fire by an enemy (Judg. 9:52). The gateways of royal palaces and 20:2). In heathen cities the open spaces near the gates appear to have been sometimes used as places for sacrifice (Acts 14:13; comp. 2 Kings 23:8). Being positions of great importance the gates of cities were carefully guarded and closed at nightfall (Deut. 3:5; Josh. 2:5, 7; Judg. 9:40, 44).

4. Figurative. Gates are thus sometimes taken as representing the city itself (Gen. 22:17; 24:60; Deut. 12:12; Judg. 5:8; Ruth 4:10; Psa. 87:2; 122:2). "The gates of righteousness" (Psa. 118:19) are thought to mean the temple gates. The gates of death and hell occur (Job 38:17; Psa. 9:13; Mic. 2:13) as symbols of power and empire. In Matt. 16:18 by the "gates of hell" must be understood all aggressions by the infernal empire upon the Christian Church.

Tell es Safeh (Site of Gath).

even of private houses were often richly ornamented. Sentences from the law were inscribed on and above the gates (Deut. 6:9; Isa. 64:12; Rev. 21:21). In later Egyptian times the gates of the temples seem to have been intended as places of defense, if not the principal fortifications. The gateways of Assyrian cities were arched or square-headed, sometimes flanked by towers. The entrance to their own royal mansions was a simple passage between two colossal human-headed bulls or lions.

3. Purposes. The gate was the place for great assemblies of the people (Prov. 1:21), as they passed into and out of the city. This naturally led to the custom of using gates as places for: public deliberation; reading the law and proclamations (2 Chron. 32:6; Neh. 8:1, 3); holding court (Deut. 16:18; 17:8; Ruth 4:11; 2 Sam. 15:2, etc.); gathering news (Gen. 19:1), and gossip (Psa. 69:12); attracting the attention of the sovereign or dignitary at his going out or coming in (Esth. 2:19, 21; 3:2). The priests and prophets seem to have delivered their discourses, admonitions, and prophecies at the gates (Isa. 29:21; Amos 5:10; Jer. 17:19, 20; 26:10). Criminals were punished outside the gates (1 Kings 21:10, 13; Acts 7:58; Heb. 13:12). Pashur smote Jeremiah and put him in the stocks, at the high gate of Benjamin (Jer.

GATH (Heb. גַּת, gath, a wine vat), a city on the borders of the country of the Philistines, nearest to Jerusalem. Its inhabitants were called Gittites (Josh. 13:3). The ark brought trouble to it; Goliath was born in it; David fled thither from Saul (1 Sam. 21:10; 27:2, 4; Psa. 56). Gath was taken by Samuel (1 Sam. 7:14), by David (1 Chron. 18:1), and by Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:6). The site cannot be determined. Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 194), after a very careful putting of the case, concludes that "Gath, the city of giants, died out with the giants, and we have no certain knowledge of her site to-day owing to the city's early and absolute disappearance. . . . Both place and name were wholly destroyed about 750 B. C., and this renders valueless all statements as to the city's site, based on evidence subsequent to that date."

GATH'-HEPHER (Heb. גַּת־חֶפְרַיִם, gath-hah-khay-fer, winepress of the well), a town of Zebulun, in lower Galilee, five miles from Nazareth. It was Jonah's birthplace (2 Kings 14:25), whose reputed tomb is shown at the village of El-Meshad, at the top of the hill, as Neby-Yanas. In Josh. 19:13 the town is called Gittah-hepher.

GATH'-RIMMON (Heb. גַּת־רִמּוֹן, gath-rim-mone', winepress of Rimmon or pomegranate).

1. A Levitical city in the tribe of Dan. It was situated near Joppa, in the plain of Philistia (Josh. 19:45; 21:24; 1 Chron. 6:69). The Gath-rimmon (Josh. 21:25) is evidently a copyist's error, occasioned by the wandering of the eye to the previous verse.

2. Also a city of the same name in the half tribe of Manasseh, called in 1 Chron. 6:70 Bileam.

GAULANITIS, a province ruled by Herod Antipas, east of the Lake of Galilee. The name is derived from "Golan," one of the cities of refuge in the territory of Manasseh (Josh. 20:8; 21:27; Deut. 4:43). See GOLAN.

GAY (Gr. λαμπρός, bright), a term equivalent to magnificent, sumptuous, as applied to clothing (James 2:3; "goodly" in v. 2).

GA'ZA (Heb. אַזָּזָה, az-zaw', stronghold), like Damascus, one of the most ancient cities of the world, being a border Canaanite city before Abraham. Its Hebrew name is Azzah (Deut. 2:23; 1 Kings 4:24; Jer. 25:20). It was the capital of the Philistines. Its earliest inhabitants were the Avims, who were conquered by a Philistine tribe called the Capthorims (Josh. 13:2, 3). It was the scene of Samson's prowess and humiliation (Judg. 16:1-3); also of Philip's Christian service (Acts 8:26). Its modern name is Ghuzzeh, and it contains ten thousand inhabitants.

GA'ZATHITES (Heb. אַזָּזִיתִים, haw-az-zaw-thee'), a designation (Josh. 13:3) of the inhabitants of the city of Gaza; rendered Gazites (Judg. 16:2).

GAZELLE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

GAZER (2 Sam. 5:25; 1 Chron. 14:16). See GEZER.

GA'ZEZ (Heb. גַּזְזֵי, gaw-zaze', shearer).

1. A "son" of Caleb (son of Hezron, son of Judah) by his concubine Ephah (1 Chron. 2:46).

2. A grandson of the same Caleb, through his son Haran (1 Chron. 2:46).

GA'ZITES (Heb. אַזָּזִיתִים, haw-az-zaw-theem'), the designation (Judg. 16:2) of the inhabitants of Gaza; rendered "Gazathites" (Josh. 13:3).

GAZ'ZAM (Heb. גַּזְזָם, gaz-zawm', devouring), the progenitor of one of the families of Nethinim that returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:51), B. C. before 536.

GE'BA (Heb. גֵּבָה, ghel'-bah, hill), a Levitical city of Benjamin (Josh. 21:17; comp. 1 Kings 15:22; 1 Sam. 13:3, 16, etc.), situated north of Jerusalem. The Philistines were smitten from Geba unto Gaza by David (2 Sam. 5:25), and Gaza was rebuilt by Asa (1 Kings 15:22; 2 Chron. 16:6). "From Geba to Beer-sheba" expressed the whole extent of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 23:8). It is identified with Jeba, near Michmash.

GE'BAL (Heb. גֵּבַל, ghel-awl', a line, Psa. 83:7).

1. A mountain tract in the land of Edom, extending south from the Dead Sea toward the Eilat-gulf of the Red Sea.

2. A city spoken of (Ezek. 27:9) in which the Gibbites lived, who were employed when Solomon's temple was building by the king of Tyre, and therefore probably north of Palestine. There is much stone in the locality. The word גֵּבַלִּים, ghib-lee', indicates that the Gibbites were "stone-squarers," as they seem to have been.

GE'BER (Heb. גֵּבֵר, ghel'-ber, warrior), the son of Uri, and one of Solomon's purveyors, having jurisdiction over Gilead (1 Kings 4:19). His son (probably) had charge of Ramoth-gilead (v. 13), B. C. after 1000.

GE'BIM (Heb. גַּיְבִים, gay-beem', springs, cis-terns; in Isa. 33:4, "locusts," in Jer. 14:3, "pits"), a city of Benjamin, between Anathoth and Nob, mentioned only in Isa. 10:31.

GEDALIAH (Heb. גְּדַלְיָהוּ, ghed-al-yaw', made great by Jehovah).

1. The Son of Jeduthun and his second assistant in the Levitical choir selected by David for the temple service (1 Chron. 25:3, 9), B. C. before 960.

2. A Descendant of Jeshua, and one of the priests who divorced their Gentile wives after the Babylonish captivity (Ezra 10:18), B. C. 456.

3. The Son of Pashur, and one of the Jewish princes who, hearing a prophecy of Jeremiah, conspired to accuse and imprison the prophet (Jer. 38:1, sq.), B. C. 589.

4. The Son of Ahikam (Jeremiah's protector, Jer. 26:24), and grandson of Shaphan. After the destruction of the temple (B. C. 588) Nebuchadnezzar departed from Judea, leaving Gedaliah as governor. He was stationed, with a Chaldean guard, at Mizpah. Gedaliah had inherited his father's respect for Jeremiah (Jer. 40:5, sq.), and was, moreover, enjoined by Nebuzar-adan to look after his safety and welfare (39:11-14). Having established his government at Mizpah, the inhabitants, who had fled at the advance of the Chaldean armies, or when the troops of Zedekiah were dispersed in the plains of Jericho, quitting their retreats, began to gather around him. Gedaliah advised submission and quietness, promising them, on this condition, the undisturbed enjoyment of their possessions. The labors of the field were resumed, and they "gathered wine and summer fruits very much" (40:12). Jeremiah joined Gedaliah; and Mizpah became the resort of Jews from various quarters (40:6, 11), many of whom, as might be expected at the end of a long war, were in a demoralized state, unrestrained by religion, patriotism, or prudence. The wise, gentle, and prosperous reign of Gedaliah did not secure him from the foreign jealousy of Baalis, king of Ammon, and the domestic ambition of Ishmael, a member of the royal family of Judah (Josephus, Ant., x, 9, 3). The latter came to Mizpah with a secret purpose of destroying Gedaliah. Gedaliah, generously refusing to believe a friendly warning which he received of the intended treachery, was murdered, with his Jewish and Chaldean followers, two months after his appointment. After his death the Jews, anticipating the resentment of the king of Babylon, gave way to despair. Many, forcing Jeremiah to accompany them, fled to Egypt, under Johanan (2 Kings 25:22-26; Jer. 40:13; 41:18).

GED'EON (Gr. Γεδεών, ghed-eh-own', the Grecized form of Gideon). The judge GIDEON (q. v.), thus Anglicized in Heb. 11:32.

GE'DER (Heb. גֵּדֵר, ghel'-der, walled), a city of the Canaanites taken by Joshua (Josh. 12:13); identical probably with GEDOR (q. v.).

GEDE'RAH (Heb. גֵּדְרָה, ghed-ay-raw', sheep-cote), a city of Judah with a Phœnician title. It is the feminine form of Geder (Josh. 12:13), and its plural is Gederoth (15:41).

GED'ERATHITE (Heb. גֵּדְרָתִי, ghed-ay-raw-thee'), an epithet of Josabab, one of David's famous warriors at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), so called from being a native of Gedor or Gederah.

GED'ERITE (Heb. גְּדֵרִית, hag-ghed-ay-ree'), an epithet of Baal-hanan, David's overseer of olive and sycamore groves in the low plains of Judah (1 Chron. 27:28), probably so called from being a native of Geder or Gederah.

• GED'EROTH (Heb. גְּדֵרוֹת, ghed-ay-roth', fortresses), a town in the "valley" of Judah (Josh. 15:41), and captured by the Philistines from Ahaz (2 Chron. 28:18).

GEDEROTHA'IM (Heb. גְּדֵרוֹתַיִם, ghed-ay-ro-thah'-yim, double wall), named (Josh. 15:36) among the valley towns of Judah.

GE'DOR (Heb. גְּדוֹר, ghed-ore', a wall).

1. A chief of the Benjamites resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:31; 9:37), B. C. before 536.

2. An ancient city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:58), some of whose inhabitants joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:7). It was probably to this town that Josabab the Gederathite belonged (1 Chron. 12:4). Some identify it with Geder. The village is now called Jedûr.

3. It is said in 1 Chron. 4:39, "they went to the entrance of Gedor, even unto the east side of the valley," etc. Keil says (Com., in loco), "בְּבוֹא גְדוֹר, meh-bo' ghed-ore', does not mean the entrance of Gedor, but is a designation of the west." It is impossible to determine exactly the location of this Gedor, but it is not to be identified with No. 2.

GEHA'ZI (Heb. גְּחָזִי, gay-khah-zee', valley of vision), the servant of Elisha. The first mention of him is his reminding his master of the best mode of rewarding the kindness of the Shunamitess (2 Kings 4:12 sq.). He was present when she told the prophet of her son's death, and was sent by Elisha to lay his staff upon the face of the child, which he did without effect (4:25-36). The most remarkable incident in his career is that which caused his ruin. When Elisha declined the rich gifts of Naaman, Gehazi coveted at least a portion of them. He therefore ran after the retiring chariots, and requested, in his master's name, a portion of the gifts, on the pretense that visitors had arrived for whom he was unable to provide. He asked a talent of silver and two garments; and the grateful Syrian made him take two talents instead of one. Having hid the spoil, he appeared before Elisha, who asked him where he had been, and on his answering, "Thy servant went no whither," the prophet denounced his crime, and told him that the leprosy of Naaman should cleave to him and to his seed forever. "And he went out from his presence, a leper as white as snow" (2 Kings 5:20-27). We afterward find Gehazi recounting to King Joram the great deeds of Elisha, and, in the providence of God, it happened that while he was speaking of the restoration of the child of the Shunammite woman she, with her son, appeared before the king to claim her house and lands, of which she had been despoiled during the recent famine. Struck by the coincidence, the king immediately granted her request (2 Kings 8:1-6).

NOTE.—Gehazi made a leper. The punishment inflicted on Gehazi, though severe, cannot justly be reckoned too hard for the occasion. "There was a great complication of wickedness in his conduct. He first arrogated to himself a superior discernment to that of the Lord's prophet; then he falsely employed the name of that prophet for the purpose which the prophet himself had expressly and most emphatically repudiated; further, as an excuse for aiming at such a purpose, he invented a plea of charity, which had no existence but in his own imagination; and, finally, on being interrogated by Elisha after his return, he endeavored to disguise his procedure by a lie. Such accumulated guilt obviously deserved some palpable token of the divine displeasure" (M'C. and S., Cyc.). See ELISHA.

GEHEN'NA (Gr. Γέεννα, ghel-en-nah, for the Heb. הַיְיָנוֹם, hin-nome', the Valley of Hinnom), a deep, narrow glen to the south of Jerusalem, where the Jews offered their children to Moloch (2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 7:31; 19:2-6). In later times it served as a receptacle of all sorts of putrefying matter, and all that defiled the holy city, and so became the representative or image of the place of everlasting punishment, especially on account of its ever-burning fires; and to this fact the words of Christ refer when he says "the fire is not quenched." "The passages of the New Testament show plainly that the word 'gehenna' was a popular expression for 'hell' of which Jesus and his apostles made use, but it would be erroneous to infer that Jesus and his apostles merely accommodated themselves to the popular expression, without believing in the actual state of the lost" (Schaff-Herzog).

GEL'LOTH (Heb. גֵּלְלוֹת, ghel-ee-lowth', circles), a place on the boundary of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 18:17), and probably another form of Gilgal (Josh. 15:7).

GEMAL'LI (Heb. גַּמְלִי, ghem-al-lee', camel driver), the father of Ammiel, which latter was the Danite representative among those who explored the land of Canaan (Num. 13:12), B. C. 1209.

GEMARI'AH (Heb. גַּמְרִיָּה, ghem-ar-yaw', Jehovah has perfected).

1. The son of Hilkiah, who, with Elash, son of Shaphan, were sent to Babylon as ambassadors by King Zedekiah. They also took charge of a letter from Jeremiah to the Jewish captives at Babylon, advising them to settle peaceably in the land of captivity, promising deliverance after seventy years, and warning them against false prophets (Jer. 29:3, sq.), B. C. about 597.

2. The son of Shaphan, one of the nobles of Judah, and a scribe of the temple in the time of Jehoiakim. Baruch read aloud the prophecies of Jeremiah to the people at the official chamber of Gemariah (or from a window in it), which was attached to the new gate of the temple built by King Jotham (Jer. 36:10; comp. 2 Kings 15:35). Gemariah's son, Michaiab, having reported this to his father, Baruch was invited to repeat the reading, at the scribe's chamber in the palace, before Gemariah and others, who gave an account of the matter to the king (Jer. 36:11-20). He, with the others, heard the divine message with fear, though Gemariah and two others besought the king not to destroy the roll (36:21-25), B. C. about 608.

GENDER. See GLOSSARY.

GENEALOGY (Gr. Γενεαλογία, ghen-eh-al-og-ee'-ah; Heb. סֵפֶר הַדּוֹרוֹת or סֵפֶר הַיְיָנוֹם, "the book of the generations"), race accounts or famly registers tracing the descent and ancestral relationships of tribes and families. The older histories being usually drawn up on a genealogical basis, "genealogy" is often extended to the whole history, as "the book of the generation of Jesus Christ" includes the whole history contained in that gospel (comp. Gen. 2:4, etc.). This genealogical form of history was not peculiar to the Hebrew or the Shemitic races, for the earliest Greek histories were also genealogies.

1. The Purpose of God in respect to the higher interests of mankind took from the first a specific family direction, and it was of importance that at least the more prominent links in the successive generations of those more nearly connected with the development of that purpose should be preserved to future times. It is the genealogy of mankind in its bearing on this higher interest—reaching through the line of Seth to Noah, then from Noah through the line of Shem to Abraham, then again through the lines of Isaac, Jacob, Judah, and David to Christ—over which the providence of God has most carefully watched, and which it has most fully exhibited in the historical records of Scripture. "The promise of the land of Canaan to the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob successively, and the separation of the Israelites from the Gentile world; the expectation of Messiah as to spring from the tribe of Judah; the exclusively hereditary priesthood of Aaron with its dignity and emoluments; the long succession of kings in the line of David; and the whole division and occupation of the land upon genealogical principles by the tribes, families, and houses of fathers, gave a deeper importance to the science of genealogy among the Jews than perhaps any other nation."

2. Different Genealogies. "In Gen. 35:22-26 we have a formal account of the sons of Jacob, the patriarchs of the nation, repeated in Exod. 1:1-5. In Gen. 46 we have an exact genealogical census of the house of Israel at the time of Jacob's going down to Egypt. When the Israelites were in the wilderness of Sinai their number was taken by divine command 'after their families, by the house of their fathers.' According to these genealogical divisions they pitched their tents, and marched, and offered their gifts and offerings, chose the spies, and the whole land of Canaan was parceled out among them."

David, in establishing the temple services, divided the priests and Levites into courses and companies, each under the family chief. When Hezekiah reopened the temple and restored the temple services he reckoned the whole nation by genealogies. Zerubabel's first care seems to have been to take a census of those who had returned from Babylon and to settle them according to their genealogies (see 1 Chron. 9:2, sq.). In like manner Nehemiah gathered "together the nobles, and the rulers, and the people, that they might be reckoned by genealogy" (Neh. 7:5; 12:26). That this system was continued in after times, at least as far as the priests and Levites were concerned, we learn from Neh. 12:22; and we have incidental evidence of the continued care of the Jews still later to preserve their genealogies from the apocryphal books (1 Macc. 2:1-5; 8:17; 14:29). Another proof is the existence of our Lord's genealogy in two forms, as given by Matthew and Luke. The mention of Zacharias as "of the course of Abia," of Elizabeth as "of the daughters of Aaron," and of Anna, the daughter of Phanuel, as "of the tribe of Aser," are further indications of the same thing (Luke 1:5; 2:36). From all this it is abundantly manifest that the Jewish genealogical records continued to be kept till near the destruction of Jerusalem. But there can be little doubt that the registers of the Jewish tribes and families perished at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not before.

"The Jewish genealogies have two forms, one giving the generations in a descending, the other in an ascending scale. Examples of the descending form may be seen in Ruth 4:18-22, or 1 Chron. 3; of the ascending 1 Chron. 6:33-43, A. V.; Ezra 7:1-5. Females are named in genealogies when there is anything remarkable about them, or when any right or property is transmitted through them (see Gen. 11:29; 22:23; 25:1-4; 35:22-26; Exod. 6:23; Num. 26:33; 1 Chron. 2:4, 19, 35, 50, etc.)" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. See CHRONOLOGY, NEW TESTAMENT; JESUS.

GENERALLY. See GLOSSARY.

GENERATION (Heb. דֹר, to-led-ao'; Gr. γένεσις, ghen'-es-is, birth, nativity; Gr. γέννημα, ghen'-nay-mah, offspring; Heb. דֹר, dore; Gr. γενεά, ghen-eh-ah', period). As will be seen from the above the word generation is used in at least three shades of meaning in the Scriptures, which are closely related and growing out of each other. (1) The radical meaning is that of the production of offspring, in which sense it is applied to the offspring of an individual, or successions of offspring noted in a genealogical table, and called a "book for generations" (Gen. 5:1; 37:2; Matt. 1:17, etc.), i. e., lists of successive lines of descent from father to son. (2) A period of time. Differing as the intervals do in this respect, generation could never be intended to mark a very definite period, and must be understood with considerable latitude. The term is used in the sense of time or successive divisions of time. For generation in the sense of a definite period of time, see Gen. 15:16; Deut. 23:2, 3, 8, etc. As an indefinite period of time: for time past, see Deut. 32:7; Isa. 58:12; for time future, see Psa. 45:17; 72:5, etc. (3) The word is also taken to denote the persons actually constituting a specific generation, as exponents of its state or character, as: "this generation" (Matt. 11:16), "an evil and adulterous generation" (Matt. 12:39), "faithless and perverse generation" (Matt. 17:17), "crooked and perverse generation" (Phil. 2:15). Delitzsch (Com., on Isa. 53:8) thus defines generation: "We must adhere to the ordinary usage, according to which dore signifies an age, or the men living in a particular age; also, in an ethical sense, the entire body of those who are connected together by similarity of disposition" (Psa. 14:5).

GENESIS. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

GENNESARET (Gr. Γεννησαρῆ, ghen-nay-sar-et', garden of riches). The earliest use of the name is in 1 Macc. 11:67, Gen-nay-sar' (Gr. Γενναίος). The Targums identify the name with Chinnereth (Deut. 3:17; Josh. 19:35), which is applied both to the lake and the town.

1. The Town. This stood on the west shore of the lake, called in Old Testament CHINNERETH (q. v.).

2. The District. A small region of Galilee, on the west shore of the lake, visited by Jesus on his way south to Capernaum (Matt. 14:34).

3. Lake (Luke 5:1). The name given to the SEA OF GALILEE (q. v.).

GENTILE. 1. Old Testament. The Heb. go-yeem' (גוֹיִם) signified the nations, the surrounding nations, foreigners as opposed to Israel (Neh. 5:8).

2. New Testament. 1. The Greek ἔθνος (eth'-nos) in singular means a people or nation (Matt. 24:7; Acts 2:5, etc.), and even the Jewish people (Luke 7:5; 23:2, etc.). It is only in the plural that it is used for heathen (gentiles). 2. Ἕλλην (hel'-lane, literally Greek, John 7:35; Rom. 3:9). The A. V. is not consistent in its treatment of this word, sometimes rendering it by "Greek" (Acts 14:1; 17:4; Rom. 1:16; 10:12), sometimes by "Gentile" (Rom. 2:9, 10; 3:9; 1 Cor. 10:32). The latter use of the word seems to have arisen from the almost universal adoption of the Greek language.

3. Relation to Israel. "What rendered the Jews a distinct and honored class was simply their election of God to the place of his peculiar people, by which they became the recognized depositaries of his truth and the consecrated channels of his working among men." The distinction between Israel and other nations, as was shown in the covenant with Abraham, was to be only for a time; and believing Gentiles in no age were excluded from sharing in the benefits conferred upon the Jews, when they showed themselves willing to enter into the bond of the covenant.

Hedged in by a multitude of special institutions and taught to consider a nonobservance of these customs as uncleanness, and blinded by an intense national pride, the Jews seemed often to regard the heathen as only existing for the purpose of punishing the apostasy of Judea (Deut. 28:49; 1 Kings 8:33, etc.), or of undergoing vengeance for their enmity toward her (Isa. 63:6).

"Considering the wall of strict separation which, as regards matters of religion the Jews had erected between themselves and the Gentiles, it would not readily occur to one that these latter were also permitted to take part in the worship at Jerusalem. It may be accounted for, however, by reflecting how formal and superficial the connection often is between faith and worship. To present a sacrifice in some famous sanctuary was often no more than an expression, on the part of the offerer, of a cosmopolitan piety, and not intended to be an expression of the man's creed. This might take place at Jerusalem, for there was no reason why the Jewish people and their priests should discountenance an act intended to do honor to their God, even though it were purely an act of politeness. Accordingly we find the Old Testament itself proceeding on the assumption that a sacrifice might be legitimately offered even by a Gentile" (Lev. 22:25) (Schürer, Jewish People, Div. II, vol. i, 299, sq.; also ii, p. 311).

The form which the adhesion of Gentiles to Judaism assumed, and the extent to which they observed the ceremonial laws of the Jews, was of a very varied character. Tertullian speaks of Gentiles who, while observing several Jewish ordinances, continued notwithstanding to worship their own deities. On the other hand, those who submitted to circumcision thereby bound themselves to observe the whole law to its fullest extent. Between these two extremes there would be a manifold series of gradations. The "God-fearing" Gentiles mentioned (Acts 10:2, 22; 13:16, 26, 43; 16:14; 17:17; 18:7) were, probably, those who adopted the Jewish mode of worship, attended the synagogues, but restricted themselves to certain leading points of the ceremonial law, and so were regarded as outside the fellowship of Jewish communities (Schürer, ii, 311, sq.).

GENTILES, COURT OF THE. See TEMPLE.

GENTLENESS (Heb. רַחֲמִים, an-aw-vaav', con-descension, Psa. 18:35; Gr. ἐπιείκεια, ep-ee-i'-ki-ah, clemency, 2 Cor. 10:1). "All God's going back from the strictness of his rights as against men, all his allowing of their imperfect righteousness and giving a value to that which, rigidly estimated, would have none; all his refusal to exact extreme penalties; all his remembering whereof we are made and measuring his dealings with us thereby" (Trench, Syn. of N. T.), God demands the same of us toward our fellows (Matt. 18:23). The helping grace of God, that practical hearkening on the part of God, when called upon for help, which was manifested in the bettered condition of the Psalmist (2 Sam. 22:36; Psa. 18:35). Four Greek words are rendered "gentle" or "gentleness," all of them with the underlying meaning of affable, kindly.

GENU'BATH (Heb. גִּנְזַבַּת, ghen-oo-bath', perhaps theft), the son of Hadad, of the Edomitish royal family, by the sister of Talpenes, the queen of Egypt, and reared in Pharaoh's household (1 Kings 11:20). He was born in the palace of Pharaoh and weaned by the queen herself, and was on the same footing as the sons of the king.

GE'RA (Heb. גַּרְא, gay-raw', grain), the name of at last three Benjamites.

1. The son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:3); probably the same with the one mentioned (with some confusion) in verses 5, 7, unless one of these be identical with No. 2. In Gen. 46:21 he is given as the son of Benjamin, and there appears among the descendants of Jacob at the time of his removal to Egypt, B. C. about 1706. In 1 Chron. 7:7, Uzzi occupies the same position as Gera elsewhere in the genealogy.

2. The father (or ancestor) of Ehud the judge (Judg. 3:15), B. C. before 1170.

3. The father of Shimei, which latter cursed David when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. 16:5; 19:16, 18; 1 Kings 2:8), B. C. before 966.

GERAH, the smallest weight and coin among the Hebrews. See METROLOGY, III, IV.

GER'AR (Heb. גֵּרָר, gher-awr', a region, a lodging place). A rich country in the south of Palestine; the place of the first Philistine. Abimelech was its ruler. Abraham and Isaac both were here and sinned (Gen. 20:1; 26:1; 26:17). Henry A. Harper says: "This place has been identified with 'Umm el Jerrar.' The valley is about two hundred yards wide. . . . I may here remark that Gerar was well known to the Egyptians: Its name appears in the list of Thothmes III as 'Kerara.' I do not think there are any grounds for identifying Gerar with Gaza, as is done by some writers."

was the scene of the parable of the trees and brambles (Judg. 9:7, sq.). Tradition attempts to locate here Abraham's altar built for the sacrifice of Isaac, also his interview with Melchizedek. After the captivity Manasseh, by permission of Alexander the Great, built a temple on Gerizim, and the Samaritans joined together the worship of idols and the true God (2 Kings 17:33). This temple was destroyed by John Hyrcannus. To this day the sect offers annual paschal sacrifice on the top of the mount according to the prescriptions of Exod. 12. Moses commanded (Deut. 11:29; 27:12) that from Mount Gerizim the blessings of Mount Gerizim.

GERASE'NE, an inhabitant of GERASA (q. v.). Several manuscripts read Γερασηνῶν, instead of Γεργεσηνῶν, in Matt. 8:28.

GER'GESA or GER'ASA (Gr. Γέρασα, gher-as-ah), identical with Jerash, a city of magnificent ruins. Theaters, triumphal arches, temples, and colonnades of Corinthian pillars indicate what the city must once have been. The city is mentioned neither in the Old or New Testaments. Its founder and its ancient name are both unknown up to this time. Thomson says: "Whatever uncertainty there may be regarding the biblical history of Jerash, all agree that it is identical with Gerasa in Gilead, a city of the Decapolis, and upon the Eastern confines of Perea. The Romans included Gerasa among the cities of Decapolis, and it seems to have been burned by the Jews in retaliation for the massacre of over twenty thousand of their number at Cæsarea. Before the siege of Jerusalem Vespasian sent his general, Lucius Aunius, to Gerasa, who took the city and slew a thousand of its young men, and carried away their families captive."

GERGESENE' (Gr. Γεργεσηνός, gher-ghes-ay-nos), the reading in the A. V. in the account of the expulsion of the swine by our Lord (Matt. 8:28), instead of Gaderene (Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26).

GER'IZIM (Heb. גֵּרִיזִים, gher-ee-zeem'), the mountain of the Gerizzites, situated opposite Mount Ebal, over the valley of Shechem, which was about three miles in length and not wider than will allow the hearing of a voice across. It the law should be proclaimed, while its curses should proceed from Mount Ebal (comp. Josh. 8:33).

GER'SHOM (Heb. גֵּרְשֹׁם, gay-resh-ome', expulsion).

1. The elder of the two sons of Moses, born to him in the land of Midian by Zipporah (Exod. 2:22; 18:3), B. C. before 1210. He, with his brother Eliezer, held no other rank than that of simple Levites, while the sons of their uncle Aaron enjoyed all the privileges of the priesthood (1 Chron. 23:15, 16; 26:24), a proof of the rare disinterestedness of Moses. Shebuel, one of his descendants, was appointed ruler of the treasury under David (1 Chron. 26:24-28).

2. The oldest son of Levi (1 Chron. 6:16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71; 15:7), elsewhere written GERSHON (q. v.).

3. The 'son of one Manasseh (according to the text), and father of Jonathan, which last acted as priest to the Danites who captured Laish (Judg. 18:30); but, according to a more correct reading, he is not different from the son of Moses. The Talmud explains the substitution of "Manasseh" for "Moses" in the text by asserting that Jonathan did the works of Manasseh, and was therefore reckoned in his family.

4. A descendant of Phinehas, who went up with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:2), B. C. 457.

GER'SHON (Heb. גֵּרְשֹׁן, gay-resh-one', expulsion), the eldest of the three sons of Levi, apparently born before the migration of Jacob's family into Egypt (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16), B. C. before 1706. But, though the eldest born, the families of Gershon were outstripped in fame by their younger brethren of Kohath, from whom sprang Moses and the priestly line of Aaron (1 Chron. 6:2-15). At the census in the wilderness the Gershonites numbered seven thousand five hundred males (Num. 3:22), the number of efficient men being two thousand six hundred and thirty (4:40). The sons of Gershon had charge of the fabrics of the tabernacle—the coverings, curtains, hangings, and cords (3:25, 26; 4:25, 26). In the encampment their station was behind the tabernacle, on the west side (3:23). When on the march, they went with the Merarites, in the rear of the first body of three tribes—Judah, Issachar, Zebulun—with Reuben behind them. In the apportionment of the Levitical cities thirteen fell to the lot of the Gershonites—two in Manasseh beyond Jordan, four in Issachar, four in Asher, and three in Naphtali. In the time of David the family was represented by Asaph “the seer” (1 Chron. 6:39-43). It is not easy to see what special duties fell to the lot of the Gershonites in the service of the tabernacle after its erection at Jerusalem, or in the temple. They were appointed to “prophesy”—i. e., probably, to utter or sing inspired words, perhaps after the special prompting of David himself (25:2). Others of the Gershonites, sons of Laadan, had charge of the “treasures of the house of God, and over the treasures of the holy things” (26:20-22), among which precious stones are specially named (29:8). In Chronicles the name is, with two exceptions (6:1; 23:6), given in the slightly different form of “Gershom.”

GER'SHONITES, the descendants of Gershon, one of the sons of Levi (Num. 3:21; 4:24, 27; Josh. 21:33, etc.). As to the office and duties of the Gershonites, see LEVITES.

GE'SHAM, or rather GE'SHAN (Heb. גִּישָׁן, gay-shawn', filthy), the third son of Jahdai, among the descendants of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:47), B. C. after 1210.

GE'SHEM (Heb. גִּשְׁמִי, ghesh'-shem, shower), an Arabian (Neh. 2:19; 6:1), and one of the enemies of the Jews on the return from the exile, especially in the plots against the life of Nehemiah (6:2), B. C. 445. Geshem, we may conclude, was an inhabitant of Arabia Petraea, or of the Arabian Desert, and probably the chief of a tribe which, like most of the tribes on the eastern frontier of Palestine, was, in the time of the captivity and the subsequent period, allied with the Persians, or with any peoples threatening the Jewish nation; for the wandering inhabitants of the frontier, doubtless, availed themselves largely, in their predatory excursions, of the distracted state of Palestine, and dreaded the reestablishment of the kingdom. The Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites are recorded as having “conspired to fight against Jerusalem and to hinder” its repairing.

GE'SHUR (Heb. גִּשְׁשׁוּר, ghesh-oor', bridge), a principality in Syria on the east of Jordan, adjoining the north border of the Hebrew territory, and lying between Mount Hermon, Maachah, and Bashan (Deut. 3:13, 14; Josh. 12:5). It was ruled over by Talmi, whose daughter David married (2 Sam. 3:3). It was the possession of Manasseh, although its original inhabitants were not expelled (Josh. 13:13). Thither Absalom fled after killing Amnon (2 Sam. 13:37, 38), from which Joab returned him to Jerusalem (14:23). It is stated (1 Chron. 2:23) that “Jair took Geshur, and Aram. . . even threescore cities.” While these places were taken, they were held only as subject territories.

GESH'URI (Heb. גִּשְׁוּרִי, ghe-shoo-ree', Deut. 3:14; Josh. 13:2), or GESH'URITES (Heb. גִּשְׁוּרִים, ghe-shoo-reeem', Josh. 12:5; 13:11, 13; 1 Sam. 27:8), the inhabitants of GESHUR (q. v.), bordering on Aram, to the east of Jordan.

GETHER (Heb. גֵּתֵר, gheh'-ther, derivation uncertain), the name of the third son of Aram (Gen. 10:23). He is mentioned in 1 Chron. 1:17 as one of the sons of Shem, probably meaning “grandson of.” It is uncertain where his posterity settled.

GETHSEM'ANE (Gr. Γεθσημανη, gheth-say-man-ay', oil press), the olive yard at the foot of the Mount of Olives, to which Jesus was accustomed to retire (Luke 22:39) with his disciples, and which was the scene of his agony (Mark 14:32; Luke 22:44; John 18:1). There are two traditional places called Gethsemane. One is in the possession of the Latin Church. It consists of a triangular spot, some seventy paces in circumference. It is inclosed by a fence and contains some very large and old olive trees, besides a flower garden. The Greeks have set up another traditional Gethsemane, located farther up Mount Olivet. Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, ii, p. 483, sq.) says that he is inclined to think both are wrong, and he would place the garden in a very secluded spot several hundred yards northeast of the other traditional sites.

GEU'EL (Heb. גֵּאוּל, gheh-oo-ale', majesty of God), the son of Machi, of the tribe of Gad, and one of the men sent by Moses to search the land of Canaan (Num. 13:15), B. C. 1209.

GE'ZER (Heb. גֵּזֵר, ghel'-zer, a precipice). It was a Canaanitish city on the southwest border of Ephraim, near lower Beth-Horon (Josh. 16:3). It was allotted to the Korathite Levites, but the original inhabitants were not dispossessed, so that even in Solomon's time the Canaanites were still dwelling there and paying tribute to Israel (1 Kings 9:16). It must at this time have been independent of Israelitish rule, for Pharaoh captured it and gave it to his daughter, Solomon's wife, for a present (1 Kings 9:16-17). It is identified with Tell el Jezzar. See SUPPLEMENT.

GEZ'RITES, the name given in the A. V. of 1 Sam. 27:8 to a tribe associated with the Amalekites and Geshurites, “of old the inhabitants of the land, as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt.” The three were attacked, plundered, and exterminated by David during his stay in the land of the Philistines. This is all that is known of the tribe, and even the name is in doubt. Gez- rites (Heb. גִּזְרִיטִים, hagh-ghez-ree', strictly "the Gizrite") is the rendering of the geri of 1 Sam. 27:8, where the kethibh has גִּזְרִיטִים, which may be Girzite, Gerizite, or Gerizzite. The Alexandrian manuscript of the LXX has τὸν Γεζραιόν; Vulgate, Gerzi and Gezri. The R. V. has Girzites in the text and Gizrites in the margin. Gesenius himself, and after him Stanley, reading, as we suppose, Gerizite, supposed an old-time connection between this tribe and Mount Gerizim. If we read Gezrites, it would naturally mean inhabitants of Gezer; but Gezer being fifty miles distant in the territory of Ephraim, seems too far off to have been reached by David on this raid.—W. H.

lowing seems to be the true explanation: "They were called Nephilim because they fell upon the people and oppressed them. . . . To an unprejudiced mind the words, as they stand, represent the Nephilim, who were on the earth in those days, as existing before the sons of God began to marry the daughters of men, and clearly distinguish them from the fruits of those marriages" (K. and D., Com., in loco). That Nephilim signifies "men of violence," who plundered the weak and defenseless, is seen in the report of the spies (Num. 13:33), who gave this name to the "sons of Anak."

2. Rephaim (Heb. רִפְאִים, ref-ay-eem', strong).

Gethsemane.

GHOST, the English form of the German Geist, or spirit, and the translation of several Hebrew and Greek words signifying breath, life, spirit (Job 11:20; Jer. 15:9; Matt. 27:50; John 19:30). In the New Testament it frequently occurs as the designation of the third person in the Trinity—the HOLY GHOST (q. v.). Other phrases in which it occurs are those rendered "to give up the ghost," etc., all simply signifying to die (Gen. 25:17; Lam. 1:19, etc.). See HOLY GHOST.

GI'AH (Heb. גִּי'א, ghe'-akh, fountain), opposite the hill Ammah, on the way to the desert of Gibeon, mentioned in the account of the pursuit of Abner by Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. 2:24).

GIANT, the rendering of several Hebrew words.

1. Nephilim (Heb. נְפִילִים, nef-ee-leem', causing to fall). The first mention of Nephilim is in Gen. 6:4, "There were giants (Nephilim) in the earth in those days." Much dispute has arisen concerning the meaning of this verse, but the following seems to be the true explanation: "They were called Nephilim because they fell upon the people and oppressed them. . . . To an unprejudiced mind the words, as they stand, represent the Nephilim, who were on the earth in those days, as existing before the sons of God began to marry the daughters of men, and clearly distinguish them from the fruits of those marriages" (K. and D., Com., in loco). That Nephilim signifies "men of violence," who plundered the weak and defenseless, is seen in the report of the spies (Num. 13:33), who gave this name to the "sons of Anak."

3. Anakim (Heb. אֲנָקִים, an-av-keem', sons of Anak). In Num. 13:33, the spies brought back the report that in the promised land they had seen "the giants, the sons of Anak." In Deut. 2:10, 11, they are classed with the Emim and Rephaim on account of their gigantic stature. See REPHAIM.

4. Emim (Heb. אֱמִימִים, ay-meem'), a race who dwell in the country of the Moabites (Gen. 14:5), and described as "great, and many, and tall, as the Anakim" (Deut. 2:11). See EMIMS.

5. Zamzummim (Heb. זַמְזוּמִים, zam-zum-meem'), whose home was in the land of Ammon (Deut. 2:20). See ZAMZUMMIM.

6. One other passage employs the term "giant" (Job 16:14), where the original is ghib-bore' (Heb. גִּבּוֹרִים), rendered elsewhere "a mighty man." From the remnant of the Anakim left in Gath of the Philistines came the famous Goliath (1 Sam. 17:4). Other giants of the Philistines are mentioned in 2 Sam. 21:16-22, "Ishbi-benob, which was of the sons of the giant;" "Saph, slain by Sib-bechai;" "a man of great stature, that had on every hand six fingers, and on every foot six toes, he also was born to the giant;" and "the brother of GOLIATH (q. v.) the Gittite." All nations have had a dim fancy that the aborigines who preceded them, and the earliest men generally were of immense stature. No doubt at an early period men and even tribes under favorable circumstances reached an unusual size, and were of extraordinary strength. Many things, however, concur to show that the size of the race did not differ materially from what it is at present, as the mummies of Egypt, the size of ancient armor, as well as architectural dimensions, and the measures of length received from antiquity.

GIB'BAR (Chald. גִּבְבָּר, ghib-bar', a hero), an Israelite whose descendants, to the number of ninety-five, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:20), B. C. before 536. This is probably an error for the remnants of the natives of Gibeon (Neh. 7:25).

GIB'BETHON (Heb. גִּבְתוֹן, ghib-beth-one', a height), a Philistine city (Josh. 19:44; 21:23), within the bounds of the tribe of Dan, and assigned to the Kohathites (21:23). Nadab, king of Israel, was slain under its walls (1 Kings 15:27; 16:15).

GIB'EA (Heb. גִּבְעָה, ghib-aw', hill), a place built or occupied, in connection with Machbenah, by Sheva (1 Chron. 2:49), perhaps the same as Gibeah (Josh. 15:57).

GIB'EAH (Hebrew same as above), a hill, as the word is sometimes rendered.

1. Gibeah-haaraloth, "the hill of the fore-skins" (Josh. 5:3, margin).

2. Gibeah of Judah, situated in the mountains of that tribe (Josh. 15:57), where the prophet Habakkuk is said to have been buried. It lay from seven to ten miles S. W. of Jerusalem, and is identified by Robinson with Jebah.

3. Gibeah of Benjamin (Judg. 19:14; 1 Sam. 13:16; 2 Sam. 23:29), known also as "Gibeah of Saul" (1 Sam. 11:4; Isa. 10:29), the scene of the inhuman crime recorded in Judg. 19:12, sq., and for which the Benjamites were nearly exterminated. It was Saul's birthplace, and continued to be his residence after he became king (1 Sam. 10:26; 11:4; 15:33, etc.), and here the Gibeonites hung his descendants (2 Sam. 21:6). Professor Sayce says that "Gibeah is one of the names of the Canaanitish towns recorded upon the walls of the temple of Karnac at Thebes as paying tribute to Egypt under the eighteenth dynasty, under Thothmes III."

4. Gibeah at Kirjath-jearim, where the ark remained from the time the Philistines returned it until it was taken to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:3, 4; comp. 1 Sam. 7:1, 2).

5. Gibeah is rendered "hill" in the following passages: "The hill that pertained to Phineas," in Mount Ephraim, where Eleazar was buried (Josh. 24:33), identified with Khurbet Jibia, five miles N. of Guphna, toward Shechem; "hill of Moreh" (Judg. 7:1); "hill of God" (1 Sam. 10:5); "hill of Hachilah" (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1); "hill of Ammah" (2 Sam. 2:24); "hill of Gareb" (Jer. 31:39).

GIB'EATH (Josh. 18:28), same as GIB'EAH, III.

GIB'EATHITE (Heb. גִּבְעָתִי, ghib-aw-thee'), a native of Gibeah (1 Chron. 12:3), Shemah by name, who was the father of two Benjamites who joined David.

GIB'EON (Heb. גִּבְעוֹן, ghib-ohn', hill city), one of the Hivite cities which, through deception, effected a league with Joshua (Josh. 9:3-17), thus escaping the fate of Ai and Jericho. It was afterward allotted to Benjamin, and made a Levitical town (18:25; 21:17). After the destruction of Nob by Saul the tabernacle was set up here, and remained until the building of the temple (1 Chron. 16:39; 1 Kings 3:4, 5; 2 Chron. 1:3, sq.). When the Amoritish kings besieged Gibeon, Joshua hastened to its relief and a great battle followed, to the great discomfiture of the Amorites (see JOSHUA). From Jer. 41:16 it would seem that after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Gibeon again became the seat of government. It produced prophets in the days of Jeremiah (28:1). "Men of Gibeon" returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:25).

GIB'EONITES (Heb. גִּבְעוֹנִים, ghib-o-neem'), the people of Gibeon, and perhaps also of the three cities associated with Gibeon (Josh. 9:17). Upon the victorious advance of the Israelites the inhabitants of Gibeon attempted to anticipate the danger which threatened them by means of a stratagem, and to enter into a friendly alliance with Israel. A delegation waited upon Joshua at Gilgal, representing themselves as ambassadors from a far country, desirous of making a league with him. They made this appear probable by taking "old sacks upon their asses, and wine bottles, old, and rent, and bound up; and old shoes and clouted (i. e., mended) upon their feet, and old garments upon them; and all the bread of their provision was dry and moldy." They represented that all these tokens of age and wear had come to them upon their journey. Upon these representations they were received as friends and an alliance made with them. Upon the discovery of the stratagem by which they had obtained the protection of the Israelites, they were condemned to be perpetual bondmen, hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the house of God and altar of Jehovah (Josh. 9:23, 27). Saul appears to have broken this covenant, and in a fit of enthusiasm or patriotism to have killed some and devised a general massacre of the rest (2 Sam. 21:1, 2, 5). This was expiated many years after by giving up seven men of Saul's descendants to the Gibeonites, who hung them or crucified them "before Jehovah"—as a kind of sacrifice—in Gibeah, Saul's own town (vers. 4, 6, 9). From this time there is no mention of the Gibeonites as a distinct people, but many writers include them among the NETHINIM (q. v.), who were appointed for the service of the temple (1 Chron. 9:2).

GIB'LITES (Heb. גִּבְלִי, ghib-lee'), inhabitants, no doubt, of Gebal or Biblus (Byblus), a maritime town of Phœnicia, whose people, in Ezek. 27:9, are called Giblyans in the Vulgate and Biblians in the LXX. The Giblytes are mentioned in Josh. 13:5 (Heb. אֶרֶץ גִּבְלִי, "the land of the Giblyte"), and in 1 Kings 5:18 (in the Hebrew אֶרֶץ גִּבְלִי, Alexandrian manuscript of LXX of βιβλιου, Vulg. Biblii) as skilled laborers, called in the text of the A. V. "stone-squarers." The R. V. in both places has Gebalites.—W. H.

GIDDAL'TI (Heb. גִּדְדַלְתִּי, ghid-dal-tee', I have made great), the ninth son of Heman, and head of the twenty-second course of Levitical musicians in the tabernacle under David (1 Chron. 25:4, 29), B. C. after 1000. The office of these brothers was to sound the horn in the Levitical orchestra (v. 5).

GID'DEL (Heb. גִּדְדֵל, ghid-dale', large), the name of two men whose descendants returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel.

1. One of the Nethinim (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49), B. C. before 536.

2. One of "Solomon's servants," i. e., perhaps, of the Canaanitish tribes enslaved by Solomon (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58; comp. 1 Kings 9:21), B. C. before 536.

GID'EON.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. גִּדְדֵן, ghid-ohn', tree feller, i. e., warrior). He was son of Joash the Abi-ezrite, of the tribe of Manasseh, and resided at Ophrah in Gilead, beyond Jordan.

2. Personal History. (1) Condition of Israel. Another relapse into evil brought Israel under the oppression of the Midianites for seven years. With Midian were allied Amalek and "the children of the east" (of Jordan). Their power pressed so severely upon the Israelites that the latter "made them the dens which are in the mountains, and caves, and strongholds." The allies encamped in their territory, destroyed the crops, "till thou come unto Gaza, and left no sustenance for Israel, neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass," so that "Israel was greatly impoverished" (Judg. 6:1-6). But before helping them the Lord sent a prophet (name not given) to reprove them for their disobedience and bring them to repentance.

(2) Call of Gideon. In such a time of distress Gideon was thrashing wheat in the winepress to conceal it from the Midianites. While thus engaged the angel of the Lord appeared to him and addressed him in these words: "The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." To this Gideon made the despondent reply, "If the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us?" Then Jehovah (revealing himself) said, "Go in this thy night, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites: have not I sent thee?" Doubtful of the means by which he might accomplish so great a work, he requested a sign from heaven. This was granted to him; for when he presented his offering of a kid and unleavened cakes, the angel touched it, and it was consumed by fire.

Recognizing Jehovah, he was filled with fear; but being comforted he built an altar (JEHOVAH-SHALOM, the Lord send peace, Judg. 6:11-24). (3) Destroys an altar of Baal. The first thing for Gideon to do was to purify his father's house from idolatry, and sanctify himself by sacrificing a burnt offering. That night God commanded him to throw down the altar of Baal, belonging to his father, and cut down the grove by it. Then he was to build an altar unto the Lord, and offer thereon a seven-year-old bullock of his father's. Assisted by ten servants, Gideon obeyed the vision during (probably) the following night, through fear of those around. Gideon, being identified as the perpetrator of the act, was in danger of being stoned. But his father took the part of his son, and told the people to allow Baal to plead for himself. From this circumstance Gideon received the name of Jerubbaal, i. e., "Let Baal plead" (Judg. 6:25-32). (4) The sign of the fleece. When the Midianites and their allies once more invaded the land of Israel the Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon, and he gathered together an army from the tribes of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali. Before going into battle he asked for a sign from God of the success of his undertaking. He asked that the dew should fall on a fleece spread upon the thrashing floor, while the ground all around should be dry. In the morning the fleece was so wet that Gideon wrung out of it a bowl of water. The next night the wonder was reversed, the soil being wet and the fleece perfectly dry (6:36-40). "The sign itself was to manifest the strength of divine assistance to his weakness of faith. Dew, in the Scriptures, is a symbol of the beneficent power of God, which quickens, revives, and invigorates the objects of nature when they have been parched by the burning heat of the sun's rays" (K. and D., Com.). (5) Midianites defeated. Assured by this double sign, Gideon advanced against the enemy, and encamped near the brook Harod, in the valley of Jezreel. The army of the Midianites and their allies numbered about one hundred and thirty-five thousand (Judg. 8:10), while the Israelites mustered only thirty-two thousand. Nevertheless, "the Lord said unto Gideon, The people that are with thee are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hands, lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me." Gideon, therefore, made the usual proclamation (Deut. 20:8), that all the faint-hearted might withdraw; and twenty-two thousand availed themselves of this opportunity. Even this number the Lord regarded as too great, and so Gideon was commanded to test them in the matter of drinking. Those who knelt to drink were rejected, and only those were chosen who "lapped of the water with his tongue, as a dog lappeth," i. e., to take the water from the brook with the hollow of their hand, and lap it into the mouth with their tongue as a dog does. This test reduced the number to three hundred men. These took the provision from the people, and the war trumpets; so that every one of the three hundred had a trumpet and (as the provisions were probably kept in vessels) a pitcher as well. That night Gideon overheard a man telling to his fellow a dream which he had had, viz., that of a cake of barley bread overthrowing a tent. Regarding this dream as significant of divine cooperation, Gideon began the attack without delay. He divided his three hundred men into three companies, gave them all trumpets and empty pitchers, with torches in their hands. The pitchers were to hide the burning torches during the advance, and to increase the noise at the time of the attack by dashing them to pieces. The noise and sudden lighting up of the burning torches would naturally deceive the enemy as to the numbers of Gideon's army. His stratagem was eminently successful, and the enemy, thrown into a complete rout, "fled to Beth-shittah in Zererah, and to the border of Abel-meholah, unto Tibbath" (7:1-23). (6) The Ephraimites. In order to cut off the enemy's retreat at the Jordan, Gideon sent notice to the Ephraimites to "take before them the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan" (3:28). The Ephraimites responded, took possession of the waters mentioned, captured the two princes, Oreb and Zeeb, put them to death, and brought their heads to Gideon. This latter act amounted to an acknowledgment of Gideon's leadership, but they were greatly annoyed because he had made war upon and defeated the enemy without first summoning them to the field. Serious consequences were avoided by the tact of Gideon in speaking in a lowly spirit of his doings in comparison with theirs (7:24-8:3). The gleanings of Ephraim is the victory over the Midianites and the capture of the two princes. The vintage of Abiezer, Gideon's victory with his three hundred men. (7) Destroys Succoth. Passing over Jordan in his pursuit of the Midianites, he was refused assistance by the people of Succoth and Penuel. Upon his return he destroyed both places (8:4-17). (8) Avenges his brethren. Gideon inquired of the two captive kings of Midian (Zebah and Zalmunna), "What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor?" And they answered, "As thou art, so were they; each one resembled the children of a king." He then told them that these persons were his brethren, and commanded Jether, his firstborn, to slay them. But Jether fearing to do so, Gideon slew them, "and took away the ornaments that were on their camels' necks" (8:18-21). (9) Refuses the crown. Gideon, having so gloriously delivered Israel from the severe and long oppression of the Midianites, was offered by the Israelites an hereditary crown. "The men of Israel" were probably only the northern tribes, already mentioned in chap. 6:35, who had suffered most severely from the Midianitish oppression and had rallied about Gideon. The temptation to accept the government of Israel was resisted by Gideon, probably, because he thought the government of Jehovah in Israel amply sufficient, and did not consider himself or his sons called to found an earthly monarchy (Keil, Com.). (10) Remaining acts and death. Gideon made the request that the people should give him the golden earrings taken with the spoil, which they willingly consented to do, and brought them to the amount of seventeen hundred shekels (about fifty pounds). He made thereof a golden ephod, and put it in his own city, Ophrah. This was probably a magnificent coat, made of the gold and purple, and not an image (see EPHOD). It proved a snare to Israel, to himself, and house: to Israel, because they made it an object of worship; to Gideon and his house, because he invaded the prerogative of the Aaronic priesthood, and gave an impetus to the worship of Baal after his death. The evil consequences of this false step in religion was realized in the miserable sequel of Gideon's family. The history of Gideon is concluded in Judg. 8:28-32. The Midianites had been so humiliated that "they lifted up their heads no more. And the country was in quietness forty years in the days of Gideon." A few other notices are given respecting his family, to prepare the way for the history of his sons after his death. "And Jerubbaal, the son of Joash, went and dwelt in his own house;" retiring into private life. In addition to the seventy sons born of his many wives, he had a son by his concubine who lived in Shechem, and to this son he gave the name of Abimelech. Gideon died at a good old age, and was buried in his father's sepulcher at Ophrah, B. C. about 1100-1060.

GIDEONI (Heb. גִּדְוֹנִי, ghid-o-ne', warlike), a Benjamite whose son, Abidan, was a prominent man of his tribe, and was employed in numbering the people (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 7:60, 65; 10:24), B. C. about 1209.

GIDOM (Heb. גִּדְוֹם, ghid-olm', cutting, i. e., desolation), a place east of Gibeah, toward the wilderness (of Beth-el), where the routed Benjamites turned to escape to the rock Rimmon (Judg. 20:45).

GIFT. The giving and receiving of presents has in all ages been not only a more frequent, but also a more formal and significant proceeding in the East than among ourselves. We cannot adduce a more remarkable proof of the important part which presents play in the social life of the East than the fact that the Hebrew language possesses no less than fifteen different expressions for the one idea. Several of these have a distinct and specific meaning, indicative of the relation of giver and receiver, or of the motive and object of the presentation.

1. From the Hebrew root תָּנַן (naw-than') we have several words, meaning a gratuity (Prov. 19:6); to secure favor (Prov. 18:16; 21:14), in religious thankfulness (Num. 18:11), or in dowry (Gen. 34:12), in inheritance (Gen. 25:6; 2 Chron. 21:3; Ezek. 46:16, 17), or as a bribe (Prov. 15:27; Eccles. 7:7, etc.).

2. From the Heb. נָשָׂא (naw-saw', to raise) we have words signifying pecuniary assistance (Esth. 2:18) and a present in token of respect (2 Sam. 19:42). Perhaps the inherent idea of these terms is that of oblation to a superior, a dish of honor for special guests (2 Sam. 11:8), the "collection" for the sanctuary (2 Chron. 24:6, 9).

3. More distinctly in the sense of a votive offering is min-khav' (Heb. מִן־חָוֵה, min-khav'), an oblation or propitiatory gift (2 Sam. 8:2, 6; 1 Chron. 18:2, 6, etc.), and in several other passages where the word has the accessory idea of tribute.

4. Other words are mercenary in character. Thus shew'-khad (Heb. שָׂדֵה) is a gift for the purpose of escaping punishment, presented either to a judge (Exod. 23:8; Deut. 10:17) or to a conqueror (2 Kings 16:8).

5. In Greek the usual terms are generally derived from δίδωμι (did'-o-mee, to give), and have a very wide meaning, as did the Hebrew.

"It is clear that the term 'gift' is frequently used where we should substitute 'tribute' or 'fee.' The tribute of subject states was paid not in a fixed sum of money, but in kind, each nation presenting its particular product; and hence the expression 'to bring presents'—to own submission (Psa. 68:29; 76:11; Isa. 18:7). Friends brought presents to friends on any joyful occasion (Esth. 9:19, 22), those who asked for information or advice to those who gave it (2 Kings 8:8), the needy to the wealthy from whom any assistance was expected (Gen. 43:11; 2 Kings 15:19; 16:8); on the occasion of a marriage, the bridegroom not only paid the parents for his bride (A. V. 'dowry'), but also gave the bride certain presents (Gen. 34:12; comp. Gen. 24:22). The nature of the presents was as various as were the occasions. The mode of presentation was with as much parade as possible. The refusal of a present was regarded as a high indignity. No less an insult was it not to bring a present when the position of the parties demanded it (1 Sam. 10:27)" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

GIFT OF TONGUES. See TONGUES, GIFT OF.

GIFTS, SPIRITUAL (Gr. χαρίσματα, khari'-sa-ma-tah, gifts of grace). This term outside of the Pauline epistles is only used once in the New Testament, viz., 1 Pet. 4:10, in the sense of the gift of divine grace. The expression, "But every man hath his proper gift of God" (1 Cor. 7:7), seems to imply continence or some other gracious endowment in its place. In 2 Cor. 1:11 the "gift" was deliverance from great peril to life. Paul calls that which he intends to communicate to the Romans through his personal presence among them a spiritual gift of grace (Rom. 1:11), "because in his apprehension all such instruction, comfort, joy, strengthening, etc., as are produced by his labors, are regarded not as procured by his own human individuality, but as a result which the Holy Spirit works by means of him—the gracious working of the Spirit, whose organ he is" (Meyer, Com., in loco).

The "free gift," "gift by grace" (Rom. 5:15, 16) is the economy of divine grace, by which the pardon of sin and eternal salvation are appointed to sinners in consideration of the merits of Christ laid hold of by faith (comp. Rom. 6:23); plural of the several blessings of the Christian salvation (Rom. 11:29).

In the technical Pauline sense "gifts" (Gr. χαρίσματα) denote extraordinary powers, distinguishing certain Christians and enabling them to serve the Church of Christ, the reception of which is due to the power of divine grace operating in their souls by the Holy Spirit (Rom. 12:6; 1 Cor. 1:7; 12:4, 31; 1 Pet. 4:10); specially the sum of those powers requisite for the discharge of the office of an evangelist (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6).

The fullest list of these charismata, or spiritual gifts, is given in 1 Cor. 12).

Concerning spiritual gifts Cremer says: "Their number is as various as the needs of the Church, and neither the enumeration of 1 Cor. 12, nor of Eph. 4, nor Rom. 12 can be regarded as exhaustive. But those are permanent which are necessary for the government of the Church, and those temporary which had a miraculous element, as the miraculous gifts of the apostles. But among the latter is not to be included the 'gift of proclaiming the Gospel so as to produce faith' (Weiss). The apostolic charismata bear the same relation to those of the ministry that the apostolic office does to the pastoral office, and consist in the power to lay the foundations of the Church. They are therefore not repeated, as the Irvingites hold, for there are no circumstances calling for their repetition" (article in Schaff-Herzog).

G'IHON (Heb. גִּיחֹן, ghee-khone', a stream).

1. One of the four rivers of Eden (Gen. 2:13). The Nile, Oxus, Araxes, and the Ganges have all been supposed to be identical with the Gihon. Sayce thinks it the same with the modern Kerkhah, the Choaspes of classical antiquity.

2. A spring near Jerusalem, on the west bank of the Kidron valley. Probably the water course which Hezekiah turned aside when Sennacherib came to besiege the city, so that the besiegers might not have water to drink (2 Chron. 32:30; 33:14). Captain Sir Charles Warren claimed to have traced the diverted water course and secured the stone plug, twelve inches in length, with which the drain was stopped (see Harper, Bible and Mod. Disc.).

GIL'ALAI (Heb. גִּילְאֵי, ghil-al-lah'ee, dingy or weighty), one of the priests appointed by Nehemiah to aid Zechariah in the musical services under Ezra at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36), B. C. 445.

GILBO'A (Heb. גִּלְבּוֹא, ghil-bo'-ah, bubbling fountain). Its name was probably suggested by the spring or fountain about half a mile E. of the city of Jezreel, which stood on the western extremity of the mount. Parallel and six miles N. of this range is another, called the "hill of Moreh," but called by travelers "Little Hermon." The beautiful valley of Jezreel lies between the two. It was at Gilboa that Saul and his three sons were slain in the battle with the Philistines (1 Sam. 28:4; 31:1, 8; 1 Chron. 10:1). When David heard of the disaster he incorporated in his beautiful ode all the conditions, geographical, military, and social (2 Sam. 1:19-25).

GIL'EAD (Heb. גִּלְעָד, ghil-awd', mound of witness).

1. The mountain region east of the Jordan, called "the mount of Gilead" (Gen. 31:25), extending from the Sea of Galilee to the upper end of the Dead Sea. About sixty miles long and twenty wide, bounded on the north by Bashan, and on the south by Moab and Ammon (Gen. 31:21; Deut. 3:12-17). Called now Jebel Jelád or Jelúð. Upon it is the site of the ancient city of Ramoth-gilead, now called Es-Salt. Its scenery is beautiful. The hills are fertile and crowned with forests. Scripture names oak trees and herds of cattle as found there (Gen. 37:25; Num. 32:1). Reuben and Gad desired to possess this territory because in need of pasture for their herds (Deut. 8:12-17). The occupants now are, as in early times, hardy, fighting men. The name Gilead is seldom used in the Bible beyond Old Testament history.

2. A city "of them that work iniquity," etc. (Hos. 6:8). "Hosea calls Gilead (district) a city of evil-doers, as being a rendezvous for wicked men, to express the thought that the whole land was as full of evil-doers as a city is of men" (K. and D., Com.).

3. The son of Machir and grandson of Manasseh; his descendants bore his name as a patronymic (Num. 26:29, 30).

4. Father of Jephthah the judge, and descendant of the above (Judg. 11:1, 2).

5. Son of Michael and father of Jaroah, of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:14).

GIL'EADITES, THE (Heb. גִּלְעָדִים, ghil-aw-dee', Judg. 12:4, 5; Num. 26:29; Judg. 10:3), a branch of the tribe of Manasseh, descended from Gilead. There appears to have been an old-standing feud between them and the Ephraimites, who taunted them with being deserters. See Judg. 12:4, which may be rendered: "And the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they said, Ye Gileadites are fugitives of Ephraim among the Ephraimites and among the Manassites." "The meaning of these obscure words is probably the following: 'Ye are an obscure set of men, men of no name, dwelling in the midst of two most noble and illustrious tribes'" (Rosenmüller).

GIL'GAL (Heb. גִּלְגָּל, ghil-gaw'l, rolling).

1. A place in the Jordan valley not far from Jericho, called Geliloth (Josh. 18:17). Here the Israelites first encamped after they crossed Jordan, and here were the twelve stones set up as a memorial (Josh. 4:19, 20). Samuel judged here (1 Sam. 7:16); Agag was slain here (1 Sam. 15:33). "The name Gilgal has been recovered by Major Conder. The Arabs consider the place sacred, and bury their dead near a large tamarisk tree which grows there. There are about a dozen small mounds, seemingly artificial. Are these traces of the Israelitish camp? One of the mounds goes by the name of Tell Jilulieh. For a permanent camp there must have been water near. Major Conder found that a stream ran right through these Tells or mounds" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Disc.).

2. Gilgal of Elijah and Elisha (2 Kings 2:1, 2; 4:38), a locality probably four miles distant from Beth-el and Shiloh.

3. In Josh. 12:23 occurs the name of a regal Gilgal. In the R. V. the term "king of the nations of Gilgal" is exchanged for "the king of Goim in Gilgal," and Parker says the word Goim probably means the nomad people who had been driven away by Joshua.

GIL'LOH (Heb. גִּלְלוֹה, ghee-lo', exile), in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:51). The birthplace and the scene of the miserable suicide of the traitor Ahithophel (2 Sam. 15:12; 17:23). Probably the present Kurbet Jala, north of Hebron.

GIL'ONITE (Heb. גִּלְוֹנִי, ghee-lo-nee'), an epithet of the traitor Ahithophel (q. v.), doubtless from his city, Giloh (2 Sam. 15:12; 23:34).

GIM'ZO (Heb. גִּמְצוֹ, ghim-zo', a place fertile in sycamores), a town in the low country of Judah. Now Jimza, three miles from Ludd or Lydda.

GIN, an old English word for trap, and the rendering of two Hebrew words:

1. Mo-kashe' (Heb. מִקְשֵׁה, a moose or "snare," as elsewhere rendered (Psa. 140:5; 141:9; Amos 3:5).

2. Pakh (Heb. פַּח, a plate of metal, hence a trap (Job 18:9; Isa. 8:14); elsewhere "snare."

GIN'NATH (Heb. גִּנְנָת, ghee-nath', derivation uncertain), the father of Tibni (q. v.), king of the northern tribes of Israel (1 Kings 16:21, 22), B. C. before 925.

GIN'NETHO, a corrupt reading (Neh. 12:4) for the name Ginnethon.

GIN'NETHON (Heb. גִּנְנֶתֹן, ghin-neth-one', gardener), one of the "chiefs" of the priests that returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4, where the reading is "Gennetho") and subscribed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:6). His son, Meshullam, is mentioned as contemporary with the high priest Joiakim (12:16), B. C. 536-410.

GIRDLE, as an article of clothing, see DRESS; PRIESTS, CLOTHING OF.

Figurative. To "gird (or girdle) up the loins" was a common expression for putting one's self in readiness for any service that might be required (Luke 12:35; 1 Pet. 1:13). Girdles of sackcloth were worn as marks of humiliation and sorrow (Isa. 3:24; 22:12). The girdle was a symbol of strength, activity, and power (Job 12:18; 30:11; Isa. 23:10 margin; 45:5; 22:21; 1 Kings 20:11). "Righteousness and faithfulness" are called the girdle of the Messiah (Isa. 11:5), and the perfect adherence of the people of God to his service is spoken of as the "cleaving of the girdle to a man's loins" (Jer. 18:11).

GIR'GASHITES, or GIR'GASITE (Heb. גִּרְגָּשִׁי, gag-ghir-gaw-shee', "the Girgashite"; LXX, ὁ Γεργασαῖος; Vulg. Gergesæus), one of the seven Canaanite nations whose land was given to Israel. Josh. 24:11 seems to place them west of the Jordan. The Girgashites have been very naturally connected with the Gergesenes of Matt. 8:28, who were on the east of the Sea of Galilee; but here and in the parallel passages in Mark and Luke are variant readings, Gadarenes and Gerasenes, which are preferred by some. Thus we may say of the Gergesenes as Josephus (Ant., i, 6, 3) says of the whole seven, "We have nothing in the sacred books but their names." In Gen. 10:16 and 1 Chron. 1:14 the Girgashite is descended from Canaan. The Girgashites are enumerated among the devoted Canaanite nations only in Gen. 15:21; Deut. 7:1; Josh. 8:10; 24:11; Neh. 9:8.—W. H.

GIRL (Heb. יָלֵדָה, yal-daw', literally, one born), in the ordinary sense (Joel 3:3; Zech. 8:5), but of a marriageable "damsel" (Gen. 34:4).

GIS'PA (Heb. גִּישְׁפָּא, ghish-paw', derivation uncertain), one of the two overseers of the Nethinim in Ophel, at Jerusalem, after the captivity (Neh. 11:21); but whether he was himself also of that class is not stated, although this is probable from the fact that his associate, Ziba, was (Ezra 2:43), B. C. 445.

GIT'TAH-HE'PHER (Heb. גִּיתְתַּח־הַפְּהַר, ghit-tah'-yim, two winepresses), the place to which the Beerothites fled (2 Sam. 4:3), perhaps through fear of vengeance for the murder of Ishbosheth. It is mentioned (Neh. 11:33) in the list of cities inhabited by the Benjamites after the captivity. Location unknown.

GIT'TAIM (Heb. גִּיתַיִם, ghit-tah'-yim, two winepresses), the place to which the Beerothites fled (2 Sam. 4:3), perhaps through fear of vengeance for the murder of Ishbosheth. It is mentioned (Neh. 11:33) in the list of cities inhabited by the Benjamites after the captivity. Location unknown.

GIT'TITE (Heb. גִּיתִי, ghit-tee'), an inhabitant, or properly native, of the Philistine city, Gath (Josh. 13:3), six hundred of whom attached themselves to David and became part of his body-guard (2 Sam. 15:18, 19). OBED-EDOM (q. v.), in whose house the ark was placed for a time (6:10), is called a Gittite, probably from his birthplace, the Levitical city of Gath-rimmon in the tribe of Dan (Josh. 21:24; 19:45).

GIT'TITH, a musical term in title of Psa. 8, 81, 84. See MUSICAL TERMS.

GI'ZONITE (Heb. גִּיזוֹנִי, ghee-zo-nee'), an inhabitant of Gizoh, Hashem by name, who was the ancestor of two of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:34). Kennicott thinks that the name should be Gouni, a proper name and not an appellative (Dissert., pp. 199-203).

GLASS. "Glass" is mentioned in Scripture in the following passages:

1. "Hast thou with him spread out the sky, which is strong, and as a molten looking-glass?" (Job 37:18) (Heb. רָאֵה־דֶּעַד, raw-deed', spreading).

2. Among the numerous articles of the Jewish women's toilet are mentioned "glasses" (Heb. מִרְיָוִיִּם, ghil-law-yone', Isa. 3:23), better rendered mirrors, i. e., polished metal plates.

3. The familiar passages, "For now we see through a glass, darkly" (1 Cor. 13:12), and "like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass" (James 1:23), in both of which the Greek is ἑσπρτρον, es'-op-tron, a mirror.

4. In the Apocalypse we find the expression, "like unto a clear glass" (21:18), "as it were transparent glass" (v. 21); in both passages "glass is the rendering of the Greek ἄλος, hoo'-al-os, and probably means glass in its present sense. In Rev. 4:6; 15:2 the adjective form of the above word is used, meaning of glass, transparent.

Although so little mention is made of glass in the Scriptures, it was no doubt known to the Hebrews, as there is abundant evidence of its use. See HANDICRAFTS; MINERAL KINGDOM.

GLEAN (Heb. לָקַט, law-kat', to pick up; אַלְלָה, aw-lal'). Moses provided a liberal treatment of the poor at the harvest season. In reaping the field the owner was not to "wholly reap the corners," etc. (Lev. 19:9, sq.); i. e., he was not to reap the field to the extreme edge, nor gather together the ears left upon the field in the reaping. In the vineyard and olive plantation the fallen fruit was to be left for the distressed and the foreigner (comp. Deut. 24:20-22), hence the proverb of Gideon (Judg. 8:2). See AGRICULTURE.

GLEDE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

GLISTERING. See GLOSSARY.

GLORIFY. 1. To make glorious or honorable, or to cause to appear so (John 12:28; 13:31, 32; Acts 3:13, etc.); especially of the resurrection of Christ and his ascension (John 7:39; 12:16).

2. The bringing of Christians to a heavenly condition and dignity (Rom. 8:30).

3. To glorify (1 Cor. 6:20) is to "show forth his praise" by obedience to his law. Thus the "heavens declare the glory of God" in obedience to the law of creation, and much more do men glorify him by willing obedience to the moral law (1 Cor. 10:31; John 17:5).

GLORY in the A. V. usually represents the Heb. kaw-bode' (כְּבוֹד, weight), and Gr. dox'-ah (δόξα), although a number of other words in the original are thus rendered.

In the applications of the word "glory" in Scripture it is easy to trace the fundamental idea involved in it. Properly it is the exercise and display of what constitutes the distinctive excellence of the subject of which it is spoken; thus, in respect to God, his glory is the manifestation of his divine attributes and perfections, or such a visible effulgence as indicates the possession and presence of these (Exod. 33:18, 19; 16:7, 10; John 1:14; 2:11; 2 Pet. 1:17, etc.). God's "glory is the correlative of his holiness . . . is that in which holiness comes to expression. Glory is the expression of holiness, as beauty is the expression of health." In respect to man, his glory is found in the things which discover his honorable state and character, such as wisdom, righteousness, superiority to passion, or that outward magnificence which is expressive of what, in the lower sphere, bespeaks the high position of its possessor.

"By a very natural extension, the term glory is used for the property or possession itself, which tends to throw around its subject a halo of glory, or in some respect to crown it with honor; as when the glory of man is identified with his soul; the glory of Lebanon with its trees (Isa. 60:13); the glory of herbs with the beauty of their flower (40:6); the glory of God with his infinite perfections, and especially with his pure and unchanging righteousness (3:8; 42:8). In this last sense God is the glory of his people (Jer. 2:11; Zech. 2:5), because he is the living root and spring of all that distinguishes them for good; and they are his glory in the other sense (Jer. 13:11; 33:9), inasmuch as it is through their holy and blessed state, through the wonderful things done for them and by them, that his own glorious perfections are manifested before the eyes of men. There are no applications of the word in Scripture but what may without difficulty be reduced to the one or the other of those now indicated" (Imp. Dict., s. v.).

GLUTTON (Hebrew from גָּלַל, zaw-lal', to shake, hence to be loose, morally, a voluptuary, debauchee (Deut. 21:20; Prov. 23:21); "riotous" in Prov. 23:20; 28:7. "Gluttonous" (Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:34) is a free liver.

GNASH (Heb. גָּרַק, khaw-rak', to grate the teeth; Gr. βρῦχος, broo'-kho), "to gnash with the teeth," and "gnashing of teeth," are expressions denoting rage or sorrow (Job 16:9; Lam. 2:16).

GNAT. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

GO. See GLOSSARY.

GOAD, 1. (Heb. מַלְמֻדָּה, mal-maw'd'), an instrument for guiding oxen, the long handle of which might be used as a formidable weapon (Judg. 3:31). The instrument, as still used in the countries of southern Europe and western Asia, consists of a rod about eight feet long, brought to a sharp point and sometimes cased with iron at the bigger end, to clear the plow of clay.

2. (Heb. דָּרְבִּיזֵן, dar-bone'), anything pointed, and the context of Eccles. 12 requires rather the sense of a peg or nail, anything in short which can be fastened, while in 1 Sam. 13 the point of the plowshare is more probably intended.

Figurative. "To kick against the goads," A. V. "the pricks" (Acts 9:5), was proverbially used by the Greeks for unavailing resistance to superior power.

GOAT. See ANIMAL KINGDOM; FOOD; SCAPEGOAT.

GOAT'S HAIR; SKIN. See DRESS; TABERNAACLE.

GO'ATH (Heb. גֵּיֶת, go-aw', lowing), a place near Jerusalem, mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. 31:39) in his prophecy of the city's restoration. The site is unknown, but probably west of the city.

GOB (Heb. גֹּבַי, gobe', a pit, 2 Sam. 21:18, 19; called Gezer, 1 Chron. 20:4), the place where the brother of Goliath of Gath defied Israel, but was slain by Jonathan, the son of Shimei or Shammah. In the Syriac version Gob is "Gath."

GOBLET (Heb. גִּבְלֵת, ag-gawn'), a trough for washing garments; thus any laver, basin, bowl (Cant. 7:2; comp. Exod. 24:6, "basin;" Isa. 22:24, "cup"). In form and material the goblet was probably like those found in the Egyptian ruins, of silver, gold, bronze, porcelain, and even of wood.

GOD. 1. Names of God.—The two essential and personal names of God in the Hebrew Scriptures are Elohim (אֱלֹהִים, elo-heem'), and Jehovah (יְהוָה, yeh-ho-vaw'); the former calling attention to the fullness of divine power, the latter meaning "He who is," and thus declaring the divine Self-existence. These terms are varied or combined with others to bring out or emphasize certain attributes of the Godhead, such variations or combinations being rendered in our English version, "God Almighty," "The Living God," "The Most High," "The Lord," or "The God of Hosts." The English word God is identical with the Anglo-Saxon word for "good," and therefore it is believed that the name God refers to the divine goodness. (See Oehler's Theol. of Old Test., Strong's and Young's Concordances.)

2. Doctrine Defined. The scriptural or Christian doctrine of God must be distinguished not only from anti-theistic theories, but also from other theories more or less approximating that doctrine. God as revealed through the Scriptures is the one Infinite and Eternal Being. He is purely spiritual, the Supreme Personal Intelligence, the Creator and Preserver of all things, the perfect Moral Ruler of the universe; he is the only proper object of worship; he is the tri-personal—the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost constituting one Godhead (Gen. 1:1; Exod. 34:14; Psa. 90:1, 2; 139:7-12; Job 26; Jer. 23:2-4; Matt. 3:16, 17; 28:19; John 4:24; 1 John 4:16, etc.). The above does not present fully, as we shall see later, the contents of revelation concerning God. But it is sufficient for the purpose of making the distinctions named.

(1) Theism. Theism, as the term is most commonly used, is equivalent to monotheism, and particularly in the sense of recognizing the one God as distinct from the world, the personal Créator and Governor of all things. Accordingly the following are specified as: (a) Atheism avowed, or existing different names or disguises; (b) Polytheism, holding a multiplicity of gods; (c) Pantheism, identifying God with the universe; (d) Materialism, recognizing no existence save that of matter; (e) Agnosticism, denying all knowledge of God and all possibility of knowing him, thus being in practical effect equivalent to Atheism.

(2) Deism. Deism and Theism are etymologically equivalent terms, yet a distinction is found in their application. Deism has appeared in various forms, but in general it has been distinct from Theism in that, though holding to the existence of a personal God who has created the world, it has regarded God as holding himself aloof from the world and leaving it to the government of natural laws.

(3) Theism and Christian doctrine. Theism lies at the basis of all Christian doctrine, and yet is not to be regarded as comprehending that doctrine in all its fullness. This must appear most plainly in the consideration of the attributes of God and the mode of the divine existence.

(4) The knowledge of God. As to man's knowledge of God two questions have been the subjects of much controversy: the first relating to the possibility of true knowledge of the divine Being, the second the source or method of such knowledge.

First. Can God be known? The Scriptures declare that God is incomprehensible (see Job 11:7: 21:14; 36:26; Psa. 77:19; Rom. 11:33). Perfect or complete knowledge of God is not attainable by man upon the earth. But equally true it is that the Scriptures represent God as revealing himself to man, and that a sufficient though limited measure of true knowledge of God is put within the reach of human beings. The important distinction to be maintained at this point is that between partial and perfect knowledge. We cannot comprehend God, and yet we can truly know him. Our blessedness, our eternal life even, is in such knowledge (see Matt. 11:27; John 17:3; Rom. 1:19, 20; Eph. 1:17; Col. 1:10; 1 John 5:20).

The prevailing faith of the Christian Church in all ages has been in accord with these teachings of Scripture.

Both theological and philosophical speculation, however, have often diverged from this view, and in both directions. For example, defenders of the Arian heresy in the fourth century held that God could be fully known. They thus sought to meet the appeals of their opponents to the unsearchableness of God. The Mystics of the Middle Ages also claimed the possibility of perfect knowledge of God. Through the life of love in God they held that the soul could contemplate him immediately and clearly, and thus arrive at complete knowledge. In modern times the tendency of error, in the main, is in the opposite direction. The incomprehensibility of God and his unknowableness are conceived in such a one-sided or exaggerated form as to shut out the possibility of any measure of real knowledge. Agnosticism is an extreme illustration. The doctrine of Mansel in his Limits of Religious Thought betrays the same tendency.

Second. As to the source or method of the knowledge of God, it is held by many theologians that the idea, and consequently some knowledge of God, is innate. By this is meant, however, only that all men have naturally a conviction that there is a Being upon whom they are dependent and to whom they are responsible. The arguments for and against this view are too minute and extended to be here presented. Van Oosterzee's statement is weighty: "Belief in God is by no means the necessary product of abstract reasoning, but has its firm basis in the whole nature and being of man." It is also said with much force that the Scriptures do not seek to prove the existence of God, but simply assume or assert the fact as one that men ought to be prepared to recognize. The rational proofs of the existence of the divine Being are not, however, to be regarded otherwise than of great value. They are mainly drawn from nature, from history, and from humanity. It is sometimes rashly asserted that arguments built upon these foundations are antiquated or useless. Nevertheless they remain, whatever may be their changes of form, in all essential respects, valid and of great use in confirming and explaining the belief in God which is in some sense natural to every human heart. It is to be observed also that nature and man and history bring to us a general revelation from God—a fact not seldom recognized in the Scriptures (see Psa. 19:1-3; Acts 14:17; 17:26, 27; Rom. 1:19, 20; 2:15.)

Accordingly study in these directions yields not only evidences of the existence of the divine Being, but also some knowledge of his character.

Special revelation, for which the Holy Scriptures are the appointed vehicle, affords us the necessary and sufficient knowledge of God. The Scriptures throughout are harmonious in their teachings. The God of the Old Testament is also the God of the New. And yet the Scriptures exhibit a progress in the revelation.

The New Testament doctrine of God is distinguished from that of the Old, first, in that it presents with peculiar distinctness and fullness the divine fatherhood. Second, it declares likewise the divine sonship of Jesus Christ, "God manifest in the flesh." The God-man is the fullest disclosure of the divine nature, and the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind. Third, the distinct divine personality and peculiar office of the Holy Ghost is brought most clearly into view. And thus comes what at most was but intimated in the Old Testament, the doctrine of the Trinity. See TRINITY.

3. The Attributes of God. From the Scriptures is derived in the largest measure our knowledge of the attributes of God. By the word attributes in this connection is meant the properties or qualities of the divine Being, and particularly those which are made known to us through the revelation which he has given of himself. They are not to be regarded as mere human conceptions, but as true representations of the divine nature. Nor are they to be thought of as otherwise than absolutely inseparable from that nature. They blend harmoniously with each other in the unity of the one Being, God.

Theologians differ to some extent in their statements of the essential truth of Scripture at this point, varying in their use of terms, also in classification and arrangement. But they generally agree in recognizing the following as the revealed attributes of God, viz.: Spirituality, Infinity, Eternity, Immutability, Self-sufficiency, Perfection, Freedom, Omnipotence, Omnipresence, Omniscience, Justice, Truth, Love, Mercy, and Grace.

For discussion of attributes see separate heads.

"GOD FORBID," "GOD SPEED." See GLOSSARY.

GOD, THE UNKNOWN (Gr. ἄγνωστος Θεός). Paul, in his address on Mars' Hill, said that he had seen in Athens "an altar with this inscription, 'To the unknown God'" (Acts 17:22, 23). That there actually stood at Athens such an altar would appear historically certain, since Paul appeals to his own observation, and that, too, in the presence of the Athenians themselves. But there are corroborating external proofs, since Lucian, Pausanias, and Philostratus mention altars at Athens consecrated "to the unknown gods." The question naturally arises, What definite god is meant? Different answers have been given, but the following is probably correct: "On important occasions, when the reference to a god known by name was wanting, as in public calamities, of which no definite god could be assigned as the author, in order to honor or propitiate the god concerned by sacrifice, without lighting upon the wrong one, altars were erected which were destined and designated ἀγνωστώ θεῷ (to the unknown god)."

GODDESS. See GODS, FALSE.

GODHEAD (Gr. θεῖος, thi'-os, godlike, Acts 17:29; θεϊότης, thi-ol'-ace, divinity, Rom. 1:20; θεότης, thel-ol'-ace, divinity, Col. 2:9), the divine nature or essence.

GODLINESS, the rendering of Gr. ἐνσέβεια, yo-seb'-i-ah, reverence, in Scripture everywhere piety toward God (Acts 3:12, A. V., "holiness;" 1 Tim. 2:2; 4:7, 8; 6:3, 5, 6, 11). It is the sum of religious virtues and duties, bringing to its possessor blessedness here and hereafter (1 Tim. 4:8). "The mystery of godliness" (1 Tim. 3:16) is the mystery which is held by godliness and nourishes it. Once (1 Tim. 2:10) godliness is the rendering of θεοσεβεία, thel-os-eb'-i-ah, reverence toward God.

GODS (Heb. אֱלֹהִים, el-o-heem'). In Exodus (22:28, A. V.) is the command, "Thou shalt not revile the gods." Some understand the term "gods" to be applied to magistrates by way of respect. The more correct rendering (and so given in the R. V.) is "Thou shalt not revile God." "Elohim does not mean either the gods of other nations, or the rulers, but simply God, . . . whose majesty was despised in every breach of the commandments of Jehovah, and who was honored in the persons of the rulers (see Prov. 24:21; 1 Pet. 2:17)" (K. and D., Com., in loco).

GODS, FALSE.

Under the head of idolatry (q. v.) will be discussed the general subject of the evil, which proved so attractive and fatal to the Israelites, viz., the worship of false gods. In this article we only present the gods specially named in Scripture, whether worshiped by Israel or other nations. They are given in alphabetical order.

ADRAM'MELECH (Heb. אֲדָרָמֶלֶךְ, ad-ram-mel'-lek, splendor of the king), the name of a false god brought into Samaria by the Sepharvites (2 Kings 17:31), the other god mentioned in connection being Anammelech. It is evident from the offering of children in sacrifice to them that they were related to Molech. "Movers (Phoniz., i, pp. 410, 411) regards these two as names of the same deity, a double-shaped Molech, and reads in the singular 'the god of Sepharvaim.' This double god, according to his explanation, was a sun-being, because Sepharvaim, of which he was πολυειχός is designated by Berossus as a city of the sun. . . . This may be correct but there is something very precarious in the further assumption that Adar-melech is to be regarded as the sun's fire, and, indeed, since Adar is Mars, that he is so far to be thought of as a destructive being, and that Anammelech is a contraction of אֵינֵי עֵינֵי, eye of Molech, signifying the ever watchful eye of Saturn; according to which Adrammelech is to be regarded as the solar Mars, Anammelech as the solar Saturn" (Keil, Com., 2 Kings 17:31).

ANAM'MELECH (Heb. אֲנַמ־מֶלֶךְ, an-am-mel'-lek, 2 Kings 17:31). See ADRAMMELECH.

ASHERAH (Heb. אֲשֵׁרָה, ash-ay-rav', happy), the name of a goddess and the idol itself. "Asherah was the goddess of fertility, and as such was worshipped under the form of a cone of stone or the branchless trunk of a tree. Both goddess and emblem were called by the same name, a fact which has induced the translators of the Septuagint, and after them of the Authorized Version, to render them both by the false term 'grove' (q. v.). But in the Old Testament Asherah plays a very subordinate part to ASHTORETH (q. v.); it is Ashtoreth who is emphatically the goddess of Canaan, as in the eyes of the Greeks she was emphatically the goddess of Phœnicia" (Sayce, Higher Crit., etc., p. 81).

(Symbolical Tree).

ASH'TMA (Heb. אֲשֵׁתַיִם, ash-ee-maw', derivation uncertain), the god of Hamath introduced by the colonists settled in Samaria by Shalmaneser (2 Kings 17:30). Of the many suggestions, that presented by the Rabbins that it was worshiped under the figure of a bald-he-goat seems most probable. This agrees with the Egyptian worship of Pan.

ASH'TAROTH (Heb. אֲשֵׁתֹרֵת, plural of Ashtoreth, Judg. 2:13; 10:6; 1 Sam. 7:3, 4, etc.).

ASH'TORETH (Heb. אֲשֵׁתֹרֵת, ash-to'-reth, 1 Kings 11:5, 33; 2 Kings 23:13), the great goddess of the Canaanites, whose worship prevailed, not only among the Philistines (1 Sam. 31:10), but likewise in the region beyond Jordan, one of the chief cities of which was named Ashtoreth (Gen. 14:5; Deut. 1:4, etc.). Her worship was introduced among the Israelites in the time of the judges (Judg. 2:13; 1 Sam. 7:4), was celebrated by Solomon (1 Kings 11:5), and finally suppressed by Josiah (2 Kings 23:13). Ashtoreth was not of Canaanitish origin, but was probably the Ishtar of Babylonia, the evening star, whose name and worship had traveled west, and became the moon. She was worshiped at first as the conceiving and birthing principle in nature, but combined from primeval times with the planet Venus as morning and evening star, and worshiped as Aphrodite, the goddess of love, with voluptuous sensuality. She is probably the "queen of heaven"

(Jer. 7:18; 44:17, 18). Her worship seems to have extended wherever Phœnician colonies were founded. Thus we find her name in inscriptions still existing in Cyprus, on the site of the ancient Citium, and at Carthage, and quite frequently as an element of Phœnician proper names.

Ashtoreth was represented with an ox-head and horns (sickles), or with a woman's head surrounded by the crescent moon. Respecting the rites accompanying her worship, the Scriptures give no detailed information, but she is called (2 Kings 23:13) "the abomination of the Sidonians." The high hill and the shade of the green tree are most frequently mentioned in connection with her worship (Deut. 12:2; 2 Kings 16:4). Her priests were eunuchs, dressed as women, or women who prostituted themselves to enrich the temple of the goddess. Perhaps her most sensual cultus was among the Moabites, as appears from the clay figures recently found in Moab, one of which, e. g., represents the goddess in obscene nakedness, and of a repulsively coarse obesity (Keil, Arch., p. 37, sq.; Sayce, Higher Crit.).

The Greeks called Ashtoreth Ἀστάρτη, Astarte, and compare her to Venus Juno, and sometimes Luna. She also appears as the Mylitta of the Babylonians, and the Alytta of the Arabians and Armenians.

ASTARTE, the Greek name for ASHTORETH (q. v.).

BA'AL (Heb. בַּעַל, bah'-al, husband, lord), sometimes given in contracted form of Bel (Heb. בֵּל, bale), the chief deity of the Phœnicians and Canaanites, being the supreme male divinity, as Ashtoreth was the supreme female divinity. He was the original sun god—his symbol being the solar disk—the principle and bearer of physical life, and of the generating, propagating power of nature; also the preserving and destroying principle. Accordingly he was variously worshiped in different places and at different times. There were therefore many Baals, i. e. (Baalim), various conceptions of the god. The Romans identify Baal, on the one hand, with the Olympian Zeus as the king of heaven, and with Saturn as the principle of order, unity, and necessity in the organism of the world, as well as with Mars, the principle of dissension, disorder, and destruction.

The worship of Baal is of very great antiquity, as it was established among the Moabites and their allies in the time of Moses (Num. 22:41), and through these nations the Israelites were seduced to the worship of this god, under the peculiar form of Baal-peor (Num. 25:3-18; Deut. 4:3). For this they were fearfully punished, but soon returned to the worship of Baal (Judg. 2:10-13), and, with the exception of the time of Gideon's judgeship (6:25; 8:33), Baal was worshiped up to the time of Samuel (Judg. 10:10; 1 Sam. 7:4), through whose influence the people renounced his worship. From then on we do not read of Baal in the history of Israel until the reign of Ahab (1 Kings 16:31, etc.), when the apostasy from Jehovah reached its height. Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, the daughter of the king of the Zidonians, introduced, or greatly increased, the means for maintaining and advancing the worship of Baal. The worship of Baal, with that of Asherah, spread greatly, and during the times of the kings was the religion of the court and people of the ten tribes (16:31-33; 18:19, 22). It came to be the question whether Jehovah or Baal was to receive recognition as the national God. Occasionally suppressed (2 Kings 3:2; 10:28), it was never permanently abolished (17:16). The worship of Baal also prevailed in the kingdom of Judah (8:27; 16:3; 21:3).

"The worship of Baal among the Jews seems to have been appointed with much pomp and ceremony. Temples were erected to him (1 Kings 16:32; 2 Kings 11:18); his images were set up, (2 Kings 10:26); his altars were very numerous (Jer. 11:13), were erected particularly on lofty eminences (1 Kings 18:20), and on the roofs of houses (Jer. 32:29); there were priests in great numbers (1 Kings 18:19), and of various classes (2 Kings 10:19); the worshipers appear to have been arrayed in appropriate robes (10:22); the worship was performed by burning incense (Jer. 7:9) and offering burnt sacrifices, which occasionally consisted of human victims (19:5). The officiating priests danced with frantic shouts around the altar, and cut themselves with knives to excite the attention and compassion of the god (1 Kings 18:26-28)."

Of particular local conceptions of Baal, there are named in the Old Testament:

BA'AL-BE'RITH (Heb. בַּעַל בְּרִית, bah'-al ber-eeth', Baal of the covenant) worshiped in a temple at Shechem after the death of Gideon (Judg. 8:33; 9:4) as god of the covenant, i. e., protector and guardian of engagements. Called simply "the god of Berith" (9:46).

BA'ALIM (Heb. בַּעַלִּים, bah'-aw-leeem', plural of Baal), a general term including, not statues or images of Baal, but various conceptions of the god.

BA'AL-PE'OR (Heb. בַּעַל פְּעוֹר, bah'-al peh-ore', Baal of Peor), the god of the Moabites, to whose worship the Israelites were seduced in the plains of Moab (Num. 25:1, sq.; 31:16; Josh. 22:17). He was worshiped by the Moabites with sacrifices and sacrificial banquets, which often degenerated into unchastity, and was propitiated in times of great distress even with child sacrifices (2 Kings 3:27). He is identified by some with CHEMOSH (q. v.).

BA'AL-ZE'BUB (Heb. בַּעַל זְבוּב, bah'-al zeb-oob', Baal of the fly), he who produces and also removes the swarms of tormenting flies, which, in warm climates, are often the cause of sickness. He was consulted as the predicting God by Aha-ziah of Israel in his sickness (2 Kings 1:2, etc.). In the New Testament the name is altered, according to the correct text, to βεελζεβούλ, beh-el-zeb-ool'. See BEELZEBUB.

BEL (Heb. בַּל, bale), the name given to the national god of Babylonia (Isa. 46:1; Jer. 50:2; 51:44). Bel was the Jupiter of the Babylonians, and, as Bel-merodach, the tutelary deity of Babylon. It is not known what the word Merodach means, or what the special aspect of the god was, when worshiped under that title. According to the legend of the tablets, Merodach was chosen by the gods to do battle with Tiāmat (Chaos), who brought into existence, or gave nourishment to, monsters made up of members borrowed from scores of different animals. Having slain Tiāmat, "he split open the body, hanging one half on high, which became the heavens; the other half he spread out under his feet to form the earth, and thus made the universe such as men have since known it." To him was credited the sun, moon, etc., the peopling of the earth. He was supposed to unite wisdom with courage and strength; he attacked the wicked, protected the good, and used his power in the cause of order and justice. Some adored the sun under the title of Merodach, i. e., the youthful sun of spring and early morning. He was supposed to control the planet Jupiter. He was chosen by the brick-makers as their patron. As the protector of Babylon, he was honored with a great temple, E-saggill, "the house of the lofty head." Here every year he was thought to take his seat, while the gods of heaven and earth reverently regarded him, standing before him with bowed heads. The ruins now called Birs Nimrud is that of the temple of Bel, of which Herodotus gives a description.

In the earlier period of Babylonian history Bel shared with several other deities the worship of the people, but "Nabonidos, wishing to centralize Babylonian religion, declared Bel-merodach to be not only the supreme deity of the imperial city and the reigning monarch, but also the supreme deity of the Babylonian divinities. This attempt cost him his throne, as several of the cities of Babylonia claimed to be older than Babylon itself, and the gods they worshiped to have been revered long before Bel-merodach was heard of. At Nipur indeed Merodach was regarded as merely 'the younger Bel,' the god of Nipur (Mul-lil or El-lil) being the 'older Bel'" (Sayce, Higher Crit. and Mon. 510; Maspero, Dawn of Civilization).

BERITH. See BAAL-BERITH.

CALF WORSHIP. A form of worship to which the Israelites were prone, and the first species of idolatry into which they fell after the Exodus (Exod. 32:2, sq.). At a later period, when Jeroboam introduced a false or corrupt worship of Jehovah, it took the same type of the adoration of golden calves set up for the convenience of the people, one at Beth-el, in the south, and another at Dan, in the north (1 Kings 12:28, 29).

Among several Eastern nations there is evidence of the worship of the bull as the emblem of strength, the symbol of the generative power of nature. Thus we have the winged bull as well as lion among the Assyrians. In Egypt the term bull was a favorite one to be applied to a king or god. "The worship of the Apis Bull is as old as the age of the Pyramids, but an inspection of the tombs of the bulls in Serapeum, discovered by M. Mariette under the sands of Sagara, shows how immeasurably greater was the devotion to the sacred animals in the later times than in the former" (Renouf, Religion of Anc. Egypt).

The cow, in Sky, as well as in India, represents the Dawn, Sky, and other powers. Thus it would seem that the Israelites had been familiar with the worship of the calf while in Egypt, and that they might worship Jehovah under this symbol.

The question arises, Did the Israelites worship an Egyptian god or Jehovah when they set up the golden calf, and later under Jeroboam? The arguments in favor of the former supposition are briefly given thus: (1) The ready apostasy of Israel to Egyptian superstition (Acts 7:39). (2) The fact that they had been worshippers of such a god in Egypt (Josh. 24:14), and their familiarity with his cultus (1 Kings 11:40). (3) The resemblance of the feast of the golden calf to that in honor of Apis. The religious processions were like orgies, in which even the women appeared, amid indecent songs and dances, noisy music, and bacchanalian feasts. We can thus easily understand how, on setting up the worship of the golden calf in the wilderness, it should have been said of the people that "they sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play," and that Moses, on approaching, heard the noise of singing and dancing (Exod. 32:6, 17-19).

On the other hand it is urged: (1) That the Israelites adopted a well-known cherubic emblem and applied it to Jehovah, being already acquainted with this symbol (Exod. 26:18-22). (2) Aaron, in proclaiming the feast, calls it a feast to Jehovah, and speaks of the god as the visible representative of Him who had led them out of Egypt (Exod. 32: 4, 5). (3) It would appear unlikely that a god so recently humiliated by the judgment of Moses (Num. 33:4) would have been chosen. (4) Jeroboam seems to have had no idea of introducing a new religion, but only of giving a different form to an old one. This calf worship is throughout the Old Testament, and especially in the Book of Kings, very clearly distinguished from Baal and other idol worship. See CALF, GOLDEN.

CAS'TOR and POL'LUX (Gr. δῖσκόροισι, deos-koo-roiy, sons of Jupiter).

Castor and Pollux.

Castor was a horse tamer and Pollux master of the art of boxing. Castor became mortal, having fallen in a contest with Idas and Lynceus, the sons of their paternal uncle Aphareus. Pollux, the immortal son of Zeus, prayed his father to let him die too. Zeus permitted him to spend one day among the gods, his peers, the other in the lower world with his beloved brother. According to another story Zeus, in reward for their brotherly love, set them in the sky as the constellation of the Twins, or the morning and evening star. They are the ideal types of bravery and dexterity in fight.

The ancient symbol of the twin gods at Lacedæmon was two parallel beams, joined by cross-pieces, which the Spartans took with them into war. They were worshiped at Sparta and Olympia with Hercules and other heroes. As gods of the sea they were worshiped especially in Ostia, the harbor town of Rome. The only mention of them in Scripture is that the ship in which Paul sailed from Malta bore the sign of "Castor and Pollux" (Acts 28:11).

CHE'MOSH (Heb. כְּמוֹשׁ, kem-oshe', subduer), the leading deity of the Moabites (Num. 21:29; Jer. 48:7), and also god of the Ammonites (Judg. 11:24). The name and position of Chemosh in mythology are uncertain. Jerome identifies him with Baal-peor, probably a god of the sun. "He is found in this position upon the coins of Areopolis, standing upon a column, with a sword in the right hand and a lance and shield in the left, and with two fire torches by his side, and was appeased by the sacrifice of children" (2 Kings 3:27) (K. and D., Com., on Num. 21:29).

Others identify him with Baal-zebub, Mars, and Saturn. Solomon introduced his worship ("the abomination of Moab") at Jerusalem (1 Kings 11: 7), and Jehu abolished it (2 Kings 23:13). The Moabite worship of Chemosh has received unexpected illustration by the MOABITE STONE (q. v.). Mesha ascribes his victories to Chemosh (2 Kings 3:5), and to him offered his son (v. 27). The symbol of Chemosh was a black stone. Jewish tradition says a "black star."

CHI'UN (Heb. כִּיּוֹן, kee-yoon', probably a statue), named only in the passage, "Ye have borne the tabernacle of your Molech and Chiun your images" (Amos 5:26). Sayce identifies Chiun with the Babylonian Kaivan, the planet Saturn. The Septuagint translates it as a proper name, Rhephan, which became still further corrupted into Rhemphan (Acts 7:43). It is thought by many not to be a proper name, but simply a statue or idol, so that the whole may be translated (with Gesenius), "Ye bore the tabernacle of your king (Molech) and the statue of your idols, the star of your god which you made to yourselves;" referring not to any specific deity by name, but to the secret idolatrous practices which the Jews kept up with the worship connected with that of the ark in the wilderness.

DA'GON (Heb. דַּגּוֹן, daw-gohn', from dawg, a fish), a god of Sumerian origin associated with Dagon.

Anu, the god of the sky. That his worship was carried west from Babylon we know from the fact that Sargon inscribed the laws of Harran according to the wish of the gods Anu and Dagon. It would appear therefore that Dagon was one of the numerous gods whose names and worship were introduced into Canaan during the long period of Babylonian influence and supremacy. He is generally represented as having the body or trunk of a fish with a human head and hands, and as being the symbol of water, and so of all the vivifying natural powers which take effect in warm countries through water. The female counterpart of Dagon was Atergatis, whose temple is mentioned 2 Macc. 12:26.

The Babylonian-Assyrian Dagon is described by Philo Byblius as the god of grain, and that he was right "is shown by a Phœnician cylindrical seal of crystal now in the Ashmolean Museum, at Oxford. On this the name of 'Baal-Dagon' is written in Phœnician letters, while an ear of corn is engraved near it. There are other symbols on the seal. . . . but no figure of a fish" (Sayce, Higher Crit.).

Dagon was one of the principal deities of the Philistines, and was worshiped at Gaza and Ashdod; the former being used as a theater, and once overthrown by Samson (Judg. 16:21-30; 1 Sam. 5: 5, 6; 1 Chron. 10:10).

DIA'NA (Gr. Ἄρτεμις, ar'-tem-is), a goddess known among the Greeks as Artemis and among the Romans as Diana. Like Apollo she was armed with bow and arrow, which she used against monsters and giants, but she was also a beneficent and helpful deity. As Apollo was the luminous god of day, she with her torch was a goddess of light by night, and in course of time became identified with all possible goddesses of moon and night. Her proper domain is that of nature, being a mighty huntress, sometimes chasing wild animals, sometimes dancing, playing, or bathing with her companions. To her all beasts of the field were sacred, but her favorite animal all over Greece was held to be the hind. As goddess of the chase she had also influence in war, and the Spartans before battle sought her favor by the gift of a goat.

Diana (Artemis) was also a protectress of youth, especially those of her own sex. Young girls revered the virgin goddess as the guardian of their maiden years, and before marriage offered her a lock of their hair, their girdle, and their maiden garment. She was supposed to assist at childbirth. In early times human sacrifices had been offered to Artemis. A relic of this was the yearly custom observed at Sparta, of flogging the boys till they bled, at the altar of a deity known as Artemis Orthia.

"Diana of the Ephesians" was not a Greek divinity, but Asiatic. This is shown by the fact that eunuchs were employed in her worship—a practice quite foreign to Greek ideas. She was not regarded as a virgin, but as mother and foster-mother, as is clearly shown by the multitude of breasts in the rude effigy. She was undoubtedly a representative of the same power presiding over conception and birth which was adored in Palestine under the name of Ashtoreth. Her worship, frantic and fanatical after the manner of Asia, was traced back to the Amazons. Her temple at Ephesus was one of the wonders of the world, but its great glory was the "image which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts 19:35). Images claiming so lofty an origin were to be found in other cities than Ephesus. Once in the year there was a public festival in honor of the goddess at Ephesus, to which all the Ionians who could do so repaired with their wives and children, bringing costly offerings to Diana and rich presents for the priests. Great gain came to the silversmiths in making and selling small images of the goddess (see Acts 19:23, sq.).

GAD (Heb. גַּד, gad), improperly rendered "troop" (Isa. 65:11), was the god of good fortune, supposed to be the deified planet Jupiter. This star is called by the Arabs "the greater luck" as the star of good fortune.

JUPITER, the Latin form of Gr. Ζεύς, deyooco, Zeus. In the Italian mythology Jupiter was the highest god in heaven, and identical with the Greek Zeus, not only in nature but also in name, for Jupiter is compounded of Jovis and pater. As in the course of time the Italian god became identified with the Greek, he was regarded as a son of Saturn and of Ops, corresponding with the Greek Urānus and Rhea respectively. From Jupiter comes all that appears in the heavens. As Lucetius he is the bringer of light, the cause of the dawn, as well as of the full moon. Just as the calends (1st) of each month are sacred to Juno, so the ides (13th or 15th), which are full-moon days, are sacred to Jupiter. He controls all weather, sends the lightning and rain; was the giver of wine, the decider of battles and giver of victory; watches over justice and truth, and is therefore the most ancient and most important god of oaths.

Jupiter is mentioned in Acts 14:12, 13, where it is recorded that the people of Lycaonia cried: "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter, and Paul, Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker." Barnabas was probably identified with Jupiter because of his majestic appearance. Paul was identified with Mercury because he was the god of eloquence. The temple of Jupiter at Lystra appears to have been outside the gates, as was frequently the custom.

In Acts 19:35 it is stated that the Ephesians believed that their statue of Diana fell down from Jupiter.

MAL'CHAM (Heb. מַלְכָּם, mal-kavom, literally their king), understood by Gesenius to be an idol generally, as invested with regal honors by its worshipers. By others supposed to refer to Molech. Keil and Delitzsch (Com., on Zeph. 1:5) say, "'Their king' is Baal, who is distinctly called king in the inscriptions."

MER'CURY (Lat. Mercūrius; Gr. Ἑρμῆς, hermace), the Italian god of commerce and protector of the grain trade, and identical with Hermes, who was the son of Zeus and the Naiad, daughter of Atlas. He was the inventor of the lyre, the herald of the gods, and guide of the dead into Hades; the god of mining, of crops, and of roads. He was also the patron of trade and even of theft, of games, and of oratory. He is mentioned in Acts 14:12, where it is stated that the people of Lystra took Paul to be Mercurius, probably because of his eloquence.

MERO'DACH (Heb. מֶרֶדָּךְ, mer-o-dawk', Jer. 50:2). Merodach, in the inscriptions Marduk, was the specific tutelary deity of the city of Babylon. He rose to the head of the system of gods after Babylon became a capital with wide-spreading dominion, and also has the surname of Bel. Among the planets Merodach answers to Jupiter. The quotation in Jeremiah mentions both Bel and Merodach, but they are usually associated as Belmerodach on the monuments. Merodach may have been at first an epithet, which, from frequent and familiar use, passed at length into a proper name; or in Babylon there may have been twin idols representing the same gods under varied phases. On the Assyrian tablets the god seems to be called Merodach in his Assyrian character, and only Bel in his Babylonish relation. That both are the same is plain, from the fact that the wife of Merodach, named Zurbanit, is also worshiped as the wife of Bel.

In Babylon Merodach was held in high honor. He is called "the old man of the gods." The gates, as the scenes of dispensing justice, are under his charge. The inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar are full of his praises and of invocations to him (Imp. Dict. s. v.).

MIL'COM (Heb. מִלְכָּם, mil-kome'), another form of MALCHAM (q. v.), the national god of the Ammonites, called (1 Kings 11:5; 2 Kings 23:13), "the abomination of the Ammonites."

MO'LECH (Heb. מוֹלֵךְ, mo'-lek; Gr. μολόχ, mol-okh', Acts 7:43. With one exception in the Old Testament, 1 Kings 11:7, it is preceded by the article, "the Molech," not infrequently translated in the LXX by "the ruler," or "the king"). For the most part Molech is associated with the Ammonites as their national god, but there are notices and indications sufficient to show that this deity was widely worshiped. He was called by the Phœnicians and Carthaginians Melkarth, Baal-melech, Malcom and such other names; and was related to BAAL (q. v.), by the sacrifice of children. Molech was represented by a brazen statue, which was hollow and capable of being heated, and formed with a bull's head, and arms stretched out to receive the children to be sacrificed, drums and cymbals being meanwhile beaten to drown the cries of the sufferers (Ezek. 16:20, 21; 20:31; Jer. 32:35; 2 Kings 21:6, etc.).

Another class of passages which represent the worshipers as causing their children to pass through the fire to Molech (e. g., 2 Kings 23:10), or simply to pass through the fire (2 Kings 16:3; 17:17), have been understood by the Rabbins, fathers, and early theologians, as denoting a passing through the fire without burning, a purification through fire, a kind of fire baptism. But, as the practice is always associated with what was cruel and abominable, it is presumable that it ended with death.

The worship of Molech came in among the Israelites as an accommodation to the wives and concubines of Solomon, whom he had taken from the Ammonites (1 Kings 11:7). The high places built by Solomon for Molech before Jerusalem, on the Mount of Olives, appear to have stood till the time of Josiah (2 Kings 23:13). They were probably in a neglected state, and not regularly frequented for worship; for the valley of Hinnom (or that part of it called Tophet) is always represented as the scene of those atrocities which, in the later periods of the Hebrew monarchy, signalized the Molech worship of its princes (2 Kings 23:10; Isa. 30:33; Jer. 7:31).

The worship of Molech was punished with death by stoning, as a desecration of the name of Jehovah, and a defiling of his sanctuary (Lev. 20:3).

A great deal of discussion has taken place, and various fanciful opinions have been broached, respecting the passage in Amos 5:26, quoted by Stephen in Acts 7:43, in which the prophet charges the Israelites with not having brought "sacrifices and offerings to him (Jehovah) in the wilderness, but borne the tabernacle of their Molech." Keil and Delitzsch (Com., on Amos) thus interpret the meaning of the passage: "The thought is therefore the following: the king whose booth, and the images whose stand they carried, were a star which they had made their god, i. e., a star deity. The Sik-kuth was no doubt a portable shrine in which the image of the deity was kept."

Molech was the sun-god; not quite identical with Baal, but the tendency of the one kind of worship was to pass over into the other. Molech worship may be characterized as, at least in later times, the more intense and repulsive form of Baal worship.

MO'LOCH, another form in English (Amos 5:26; Acts 7:43) of MOLECH (q. v.).

NE'BO (Heb. נְבוֹ, neb-o'; Babylonian from Nabiu, Assyr. Nabu), a Babylonian and Assyrian god. He was one of the five gods who actuate the heavenly bodies, and have controlled them from the moment of creation; the oriental Mercury, or the interpreter of the gods. He assumed the rôle of soothsayer and prophet, and was ready to give advice upon every subject; the inventor of making clay tablets, and writing upon them; hence the wedge or arrowhead—the essential element of cuneiform writing—appears to have been his emblem; he also bore the name of Tir (“a shaft or arrow”). His wife Tashmit was the goddess of letters, and opened the eyes and ears of those who received instruction from her husband.

Nebo possessed the power of recalling the dead to life, though rarely making use thereof. He was interested in the art of building; and the work of brick-making was inaugurated with festivals and sacrifices to him and other gods concerned in the same art.

Generally, he enjoys the high-sounding title of “Lord of lords,” “Holder of the scepter of power,” etc. Hence Layard thinks the name is derived from the Egyptian Neb, “Lord.”

It was in the later Babylonian empire that the shrine of Nebo enjoyed a peculiar preeminence; and he was the tutelary god of the most important Babylonian kings, in whose names the word Nabu (Nabo) appears; e. g., Nab-polassar, Nebuchadnezzar, Nebonassar, and Nabonidus, Samgar-nebo (Jer. 39:3), and Nebushashban (Jer. 39:13). His principal temple was at Borsippa, called E-tida, “the eternal house.” In a chamber of this temple a wedge or arrowhead is found as a symbol of Nebo. His annual festival and that of his spouse, Tashmit, was held on the 17th of the month Elul.

In the clause, “Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth” (Isa. 46:1), the reference is to the utter helplessness of these guardian gods. The judgment of Jehovah falls upon them through Cyrus. They fall from their niches, and instead of being carried, as formerly, in solemn procession, are now packed upon the weary beasts as a spoil and burden. The gods “themselves are gone into captivity” (v. 2), since their self or personality consisted in nothing more than the wood and metal of which their images were composed.

NEHUSH'TAN (Heb. נְחֻשְׁטָן, nekh-oosh-tawn', a brazen or copper thing), a contemptuous epithet applied to the brazen serpent (q. v.), which the Israelites had turned into an object of worship (2 Kings 18:4). Among the first acts of Hezekiah was the destruction of all traces of the idolatrous rites which had gained a fast hold upon the people. Among other objects of superstitious reverence and worship was this serpent, which, in the course of a thousand years, had become invested with a mysterious sanctity, which easily degenerated into idolatry.

NER'GAL (Heb. נֶרְגַל, nare-gal'), the name of a Babylonian god worshiped by the people of Cutha (2 Kings 17:30). The name of this god has been found on Babylonian inscriptions of various dates, but the meaning of the name is as yet unknown. To Nergal were addressed large numbers of hymns. Prayers to him have come down to us upon Babylonian clay tablets. One of the most interesting of these prayers may be thus translated:

“O Nirgal, strong one of the gods, the darling of NIN. MIN, NA!
Thou treadest in the bright heavens, lofty is thy place!
Thou art exalted in the Under-world and art the benefactor of its . . .

With Ia among the multitude of the gods inscribe thy counsel!
With Sin in the heavens thou seekest all things!
And BH thy father has granted thee that the black-headed race, all living creatures.

The cattle of Nirgal, created things, thy hand should rule!
I go and so, the son of so and so am thy servant!
The . . . of god and goddess are laid upon me!
Uprooting and destruction are in my house!

Since thou art beneficent, I have turned to thy divinity!
Since thou art compassionate, I have sought for thee!
Since thou art pitiful, I have beheld . . . !
Since thou art merciful, I have taken my stand before thee!
Truly pity me and hearken to my cries!
May thine angry heart have rest!”—Kting.

The word Nergal is also used in Assyrian and Babylonian as the descriptive name of the large winged figures which stand before the entrances of Babylonian and Assyrian palaces. The connection between the name of the god and the name of these colossi is not yet understood.—R. W. R.

NIB'HAZ (Heb. נִיבְחָז, nib-khaz'), mentioned (2 Kings 17:31) together with Tartak as an Avite deity, but with no further information. The names of these gods have not yet been found on the Assyrian inscriptions. According to rabbinical accounts Nibhaz had the form of a dog and Tartak that of an ass.

NIS'ROCH (Heb. נִיסְרוֹךְ, nis-roke'), the name of an Assyrian god in whose temple at Nineveh Sennacherib (see SENNACHERIB) was murdered (2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38). The name Nisroch has not yet been found in any Assyrian inscription. It has been suggested by Schrader that the form in which the name appears in the Septuagint might be compared, by a slight change, with the name Asshur, the name of the chief god of Assyria. It has also been suggested that the name may possibly be compared with the name of the Assyrian god Nusku. Neither of these suggestions, however, has found any direct support in the inscriptions, and the matter must be left doubtful.—R. W. R.

NUMBER, the incorrect rendering of the Heb. מִנְיָן, men-ee', the apportioner (Isa. 65:11): "They that forsake the Lord, . . . that prepare a table for that troop, and that furnish the drink offering unto that number." The correct rendering of the words "troop" and "number" is "Gad" and "Meni." Delitzsch subscribes to the view proposed by Gesenius, who adopts the pairing of Jupiter and Venus, common among the Arabs, as the two heaven-bodies that preside over the fortunes of men; and understands by Meni (number), Venus, and by Gad (troop), Jupiter. "There is nothing at variance with this in the fact that Ashtoreth is the name of Venus. Meni is her special name as the bestower of good fortune and the distributor of fate generally." See GAD, above.

POL'LUX. See CASTOR.

REMPHAN (Gr. 'Ρεμφάν, hrem-fan'), an idol mentioned in his address before the council (Acts 7:43, quoted from Amos 5:26). Stephen evidently refers to two different divinities, Moloch and Remphan (R. V. Rephan), the latter being the rendering of Chiun in Amos. Much difficulty has been occasioned by this corresponding occurrence of two names so wholly different in sound. K. and D. (Com., in loco) thus explain: "The name Rephan (Gr. 'Ρεφάν) or Remphan (Gr. 'Ρεμφάν) owes its origin simply to the false reading of the unpointed כִּיֹּן, kee-yoon', as רִיֹּן, inasmuch as in the old Hebrew writing, not only is כ (k) similar to ר (r), but ר (r) is also similar to פ (f)." Meyer (Com., in loco) says: "Rephan is the Coptic name of Saturn, as Kircher has proved from the great Egyptian Scala. The ancient Arabs, Phœnicians, and Egyptians gave divine honors to the planet Saturn."

There was no god Rephan or Remphan, for the name never occurs apart from the Septuagint. The Alexandrian translation of Amos (5:26) has acquired a greater importance than it would otherwise possess from the fact that the protomartyr Stephen, in his address, has quoted the words of the prophet according to that version, simply because the departure of the Greek translation from the original text was of no consequence so far as his object was concerned, viz., to prove to the Jews that they had always resisted the Holy Ghost, inasmuch as the Alexandrian rendering also contains the thought that their fathers worshiped the army of heaven.

REPHAN, R. V. for REMPHAN (q. v.).

RIM'MON (Heb. רִמֹן, rim-mone', pomegranate), a Syrian deity, worshiped at Damascus, where there was a temple or "house of Rimmon" (2 Kings 5:18). It is probably a contracted form for Hadad-Rimmon, since Hadad was the supreme deity or sun-god of the Syrians. Hadad, with the modification expressed by Rimmon, would be the sun-god of the late summer, who ripens the pomegranate and other fruits. In this sense he has been thought to be the personification of the power of generation, since the pomegranate, with its abundance of seeds, is used in the symbolism of both oriental and Greek mythology along with Phallus as a symbol of the generative power, and is also found upon Assyrian monuments. Some derive the name from רַמִּים, raw-mam'=רַיִם, room, as the supreme god of heaven.

SA'TYR (Heb. שַׂטִּיר, saw-eeer', shaggy), a he-goat, and so rendered in Lev. 4:24; 2 Chron. 29:23, etc., but Satyr in Isa. 13:21; 34:14. Isaiah probably refers to the demons ("field devils," Luther), which were supposed to inhabit the desert, and whose pernicious influence it was sought to avert by sacrifices. The Israelites had brought this superstition, and the idolatry to which it gave rise, from Egypt. They were the gods whom the Israelites worshiped and went whoring after in Egypt (Josh. 24:14; Ezek. 20:7; 23:3, 8, 19, 21, 27). Both the thing and the name were derived from the Egyptians, who worshiped goats as gods, particularly Pan, who was represented in the form of a goat, a personification of the male and fertilizing principle in nature, whom they called Mendes (K. and D., Com., on Lev. 17:7).

SUC'COTH-BE'NOTH (Heb. סוּכּוֹת בְּנוֹת, sook-kohth' ben-ohth', booth of daughters), named in the list of Babylonian deities (2 Kings 17:30, 31), whose worship the settlers from Babylon set up in Samaria. Opinions vary as to its meaning. According to the connection and the ancient versions, it is the name of an idol. The rabbins thought it a goddess under the form of a hen and chickens; others regard it as an astronomical emblem of the Babylonians. Hengstenberg thinks it means the daughters of Bel and Mylitta. The general view is that it denotes "the booths in which the daughters of the Babylonians prostituted themselves in honor of their god Mylitta. Thenius says that the original meaning of Succoth-benoth was booth, in which the daughters of the servants of Mylitta prostituted themselves in her honor; but the word was later pronounced as one, and was used to denote the name of the deity worshiped in the booths" (Herzog, Cyc., s. v.).

TAMMUZ. See p. 1081.

TAR'TAK (Heb. תַּרְטָק, tar-tawk'), one of the gods introduced into Samaria by the Avite settlers

(2 Kings 17:31). Gesenius regards Tartak as a demon of the lower regions, and according to rabbinical accounts he was represented as an ass, while Niblaz had the form of a dog.

For more elaborate accounts of these several deities see: Keil, Arch., ii; Sayce, Higher Crit., etc.; Robertson, Early Religion of Israel; Herzog, Cyc.; McC. and S., Cyc.; Imperial Bib. Dict.; Ewald, Hist. of Israel, etc. See IMAGE; TEREBINTH; WORSHIP.

GOG (Heb. גֹּג, gog; Gr. Γόγ, gogue).

1. Son of Shemaiah and father of Shimei, and one of the descendants of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:4).

2. The prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal (A. V. "the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal"), whom Ezekiel said would invade the restored land of Israel from the far distant northern land by the appointment of God in the last times, and with a powerful army of numerous nations (38:1-9), with the intention of plundering Israel, now dwelling in security, that the Lord may sanctify himself upon him before all the world (v. 10-16). When Gog shall fall upon Israel, he is to be destroyed by a wrathful judgment from the Lord, that the nations may know that God is the Lord (vers. 17-23). On the mountains of Israel will Gog with all his hosts and nations succumb to the judgment of God (39:1-8).

"The army of Gog consisted not only of wild Japhetic tribes, but of Hamitic tribes also, i. e., of peoples living at the extreme North and East (Persians) and South (Ethiopians)—i. e., on the borders of the then known world. These are all summoned by Gog, and gathered together for an attack upon the people of Israel. This points to a time when their former foes—Ammon, Moab, Egypt, etc.—will all have passed away from the stage of history, and the people of God will stand in the center of the historical life of the world, and will have spread so widely over the earth that its foes will only be found on the borders of the civilized world (comp. Rev. 20:8)" (Keil, Com., on Ezek. 38).

"That the use made of Gog and the tribes in question is for the purpose of presenting an ideal delineation—a prophecy of what might be expected one day to arise of evil to the cause and people of God, from quarters and influences that should hold the same relative position toward them in the future which was done by the rude and distant tribes in question—seems clear from the whole character of the delineation itself" (Imp. Dict., s. v.).

3. St. John in the Apocalypse has made use of a portion of Ezekiel's prophecies in his prospective outline of the Church's future (20:8-10); and the manner in which he has done so confirms the view of Gog and Magog being an ideal representation. The names appear to symbolize some future barbarian or infidel enemy that is to rise against Christianity.

GO'LAN (Heb. גֹּלָן, go-lan', captive), one of the three cities of refuge on the east of Jordan, the others being Bezer and Ramoth (Deut. 4:43; comp. Josh. 20:8; 21:27; 1 Chron. 6:71). It became the head of the province of Gaulanitis, one of the four provinces into which Bashan was divided after the Babylonish captivity, and probably identical with the modern Jaulán, in Western Hauran.

GOLD. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

GOLDEN CITY (Heb. הַיְרֵחוֹ, mad-hay-baw), a term applied to Babylon (Isa. 14:4) and occurring nowhere else. "Not one of the early translators ever thought of deriving this word from the Aramæan dehab (gold), but translated the word as if it were marhebah (haughty, violent treatment). We understand it, according to mad-menah (dunghill) in chap. 25:10, as denoting the place where they were reduced to pining away, i. e., as applied to Babylon as the house of servitude where Israel had been wearied to death" (Delitzsch, Com., in loco).

GOLDEN WEDGE. See Kek'-them, p. 734.

GOLDSMITH. See HANDICRAFTS.

GOL'GOTHA (Gr. Γολγοθά, gol-goth-ah', place of a skull). The gospels and tradition disagree as to the locality. John (19:41, 42) locates the place by saying, that "in the garden near" the place where Jesus was crucified there was a new sepulcher, and that he was here laid, for it was nigh at hand, and it was the Jew's preparation day. The Scripture references place the spot outside of the city, and from Matt. 27:33, and Mark 15:29, it is to be concluded that the place of crucifixion was on the public highway or road. On the contrary, the place of tradition is quite a distance within the city limits. The fact that the city wall may have been changed in the rebuilding of the city by Hadrian, etc., etc., is met with the fact of the general uncertainty of localities located by tradition, being matters of hearsay without the records.

The name gives no certain clew. The Hebrew Golgotha has by some been translated "Hill of death" (Jerome in old times, and Kraft and Hengstenberg in modern times), but both linguistic and archaeological reasons, Schultz says, are against this derivation. See CALVARY.

GOLI'ATH.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. גִּלְיָת, gol-yath', exile.) Goliath, although repeatedly called a Philistine, was probably descended from the old Rephaim, of whom a scattered remnant took refuge with the Philistines after their dispersion by the Ammonites (Deut. 2:20, 21; 2 Sam. 21:22). Some trace of this condition may be preserved in the giant's name, exile.

2. Personal History. The only mention made of Goliath is his appearance as the champion of the Philistines, and his death at the hands of David (1 Sam. 17), B. C. 1007. The Philistines had ventured upon another inroad into the country, and had taken up a firm position on the slope of a mountain, Ephes-dammim, between Shochoh and Azekah, in western Judah. Israel encamps over against them on the slope of a second mountain, at a place called the Valley of the Terebinth, and between the two camps lies a deep, narrow valley, which seems destined as a field on which the warriors of either side may exercise their valor. And now from the Philistine camp there advances a champion, Goliath of Gath, six cubits and a span high (which, taking the cubit at twenty-one inches, would make him ten and a half feet high), with a bronze helmet, and clothed in a coat of mail the weight of which was five thousand shekels, and a spear like the shaft of a weaver's beam. Forty days he terrifies the people by challenging, morning and evening, to single combat any of Israel's warriors. David had been sent to his brethren with provisions, and, hearing the challenge of Goliath, inquired its meaning. Upon being told, he offered to become Israel's champion, and sallied forth armed with a sling and five smooth stones. He answered the scornful taunt of the giant with, "This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand." He smote Goliath in the forehead, and, slaying the fallen champion, cut off his head. "When the Philistines saw their champion was dead, they fled," and were pursued by the Israelites with great slaughter.

NOTE.—The size of the giant has been variously estimated. The Septuagint (1 Sam. 17:4) and Josephus (Ant., vi, 9, 1) read "four cubits and a span," which would make him a little over seven feet. Thenius computes the six cubits and a span to have been about nine feet two inches, Parisian measure. "There are still giants who are eight feet and upward, for, according to the N. Preuss. Zeit., of 1857, there came a man to Berlin eight feet four inches high, and possibly still growing, as he was only twenty years old, and he was said to have a great-uncle who was nine inches taller." "The weight of the armor, five thousand shekels, is given by Ewald (vol. iii, p. 69) as five thousand pounds, who merely observes that the pounds were, of course, much smaller than ours. Thenius makes the weight equal one hundred and forty-eight Dresden pounds, and adds that the cuirass of Augustus the Strong, preserved in the historical museum at Dresden, weighed fifty-five pounds. From this he infers that the weight given as that of Goliath's coat of mail is by no means too great." In 2 Sam. 21:19, we find that another Goliath of Gath (of whom it is also said that "the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam") was slain by Elhanan, also a Bethlehemite. St. Jerome makes the unlikely conjecture that Elhanan was another name for David. The Authorized Version here interpolates the words "the brother of," from 1 Chron. 20:5, where the giant is called "Lahmi." "The assumption that there were two Goliaths is a very improbable one, and there is nothing at all strange in the reference to a brother of Goliath, who was also a powerful giant, and carried a spear like Goliath" (see K. and D., Com.).

GOMER (Heb. גֹּמֶר, go'mer, perfection).

1. The eldest son of Japheth, and father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gen. 10:2, 3). The name afterward occurs as that of a tribe (see Ezek. 38:6), probably the Cimmerianians, who dwelt, according to Herodotus, on the Mæotis, in the Taurian Chersonesus (K. and D., Com.).

2. The name of the daughter of Diblaim, a harlot who became the wife or concubine (according to some, in vision only) of the prophet Hosea (Hos. 1:3), B. C. about 785.

GOMORRAH (Heb. גְּמֹרָה, am-o-raw', a ruined map; Gr. Γόμορρα, gom'-or-rahah, Matt. 10:15, etc.), the city which, with Sodom, became the type of intolerable wickedness, and was destroyed by fire (Gen. 10:19; 13:10; 19:24, 28). The Dead Sea now occupies the place of these towns. The plain but awful account of the destruction of these cities has been unsuccessfully accounted for, in the theory of such subsidence as that of an Atlantis, and it is as fabulous. George A. Smith (Hist. Geog., pp. 305, 308) shows that "statements of this argument have hitherto been vitiated by three faults. They have been based upon facts that are irrelevant, they have omitted some that are relevant, and they have supposed that critics who maintain the historical truth of the narrative have some subjective or dogmatic reason for doing so." Difficulties surround the exact locating of the ruined cities, in respect to the Dead Sea. Their relative position to each other led to the use of the descriptive words "Cities of the Kikkar, or Circle," translated in our English version, Cities of the Plain.

GOODLY.

GOODLY TREES (Heb. יְצֵי קָדָר, ates haw-dawr', trees of ornament). The Israelites were directed to take "boughs of goodly trees" (i. e., carry about in festive procession) on the first day of the FEAST OF TABERNACLES (q. v.), in memory of their having dwelt in booths (Lev. 23:40). The expression, "goodly trees," probably included not only the orange and citron, which were placed in gardens for ornament rather than for use, but also myrtles, olive trees, palms, and others which had beauty or pleasant odor" (K. and D., Com., in loco).

GOODMAN (Gr. οἰκοδεσπότης, oy-kod-es-pot'-acc, Matt. 20:11; 24:43; Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11), rendered "master of the house" (Matt. 10:25; Luke 13:25; 14:21; "householder" (Matt. 13:27; 20:1, etc.). "Goodman" (Prov. 7:19) is the rendering of the Hebrew אִישׁ, esh, man, i. e., husband. See GLOSSARY.

GOODNESS (Heb. כְּהֶדְוָה, kheh'-sed; טוֹב, tobe; Gr. ἀγαθωσύνη, ag-ath-o-soo'-nay, etc.). In some places kindness seems more especially meant; e. g., "the earth is full of the goodness—loving-kindness, R. V.—of the Lord" (Psa. 33:5). In others it expresses the supreme benevolence, holiness, and excellence of the divine character, the sum of all God's attributes. "I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee" (Exod. 33:19). In common use goodness is the opposite of badness, the quality of character which makes its possessor lovable; excellence more particularly of a religious kind, virtue, righteousness.

GOPHER. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

GOPHER WOOD. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

GO'SHEN. 1. (Heb. גֹּשְׁן, go'shen). Usually called the "land of Goshen," "country of Goshen" (Gen. 47:27), simply "Goshen," and "the land of Rameses" (47:11; comp. Exod. 12:87), for the towns Pithom and Rameses lay within its borders; also Zoan or Tanis (Psa. 78:12). Goshen is fairly well identified, the various references to it, in the Bible and on the Egyptian monuments, as well as later historical data, all go to fix it as including the Wady Toomilat, with more or less of the country on each side of the wady. Ebers outlines this region graphically when he says: "As far as it is possible to fix its ancient limitations, it exhibits the form of a cornucopia, by the waterway (the series of lakes through which runs the Suez Canal) that divides Africa from Asia. The fresh-water canal which already existed at the time of the sojourn of the Jews in Egypt, and which was reopened by M. de Lesseps, washes its southern frontier; the Lake of Menzaleh lies to the north of it, and to the west the Tanitic arm of the Nile—which has now dwindled to a narrow water course." It was in this district that Jacob and his family settled upon their removal to Egypt, and there remained until the Exodus (Gen. 45:10; 46:28, etc.). It was a pastoral district in which some of the king's cattle were kept (47:6).

2. A district of southern Palestine, lying between Gaza and Gibeon, its name probably being given in remembrance of Egypt (Josh. 10:41; 11:16). In the latter passage the maritime plain of Judah, the Shefelah, is expressly mentioned, and if Goshen was any part of that rich plain, its fertility may have suggested its name.

3. A town mentioned in company with Debir, Socoh, and others as in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:51), in the group on the southwest part of the hills.

GOSPEL (A. S., god and spell, good story), good tidings, and used as the equivalent of the Gr. εὐαγγέλιον (yoō-ang-ghel'-ee-on), which in earlier Greek signified a present given to one who brought good tidings, or a sacrifice offered in thanksgiving for such tidings having come. In later Greek it was used for the good tidings themselves. It is used to signify:

1. The welcome intelligence of salvation to man, as preaching by our Lord and his disciples.

2. The four histories of our Lord's life, published by Matthew, Mark, etc., who are called "Evangelists," writers of the history of the Gospel.

3. Collectively, the Gospel doctrines; as "the Gospel of the grace of God" (Acts 20:24), because it flows from God's free love and goodness; "the Gospel of the kingdom" (Mark 1:14), because it treats of the kingdom of grace, and shows the way to the kingdom of glory; "the Gospel of Christ" (Rom. 1:16), because he is the author and great subject of it.

The "Law and the Gospel" are sometimes used as being antagonistic, which is an error. Jesus said, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law," etc. (Matt. 5:17). The gospels emphasize the law, and give it a deep spiritual meaning; but they go farther and tell us that the divine favor may be obtained otherwise than by a perfect and universal conformity to the law. In this sense Gospel is not law.

GOSPELS. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

GOSPELS, THE FOUR. The term Gospel is an old English word (used A. D. 1250-1350) derived from the Saxon God-spel, i. e., God, and spel, story; from spelian, to tell, meaning "literally a narrative of God" (Skeat) as realized in the life of Jesus Christ. It is so used in both the Authorized and the Revised Version (Webster). "Gospel is not a translation of the Greek word εὐαγγέλιον (yoō-ang-ghel'-ee-on); as is constantly supposed" (Stormonth), but "it is the nearest idiomatic equivalent" known to the sacred writers (Schaff). The word gospels is applied in a specific sense to the first four books of the New Testament, because each one gives a distinct memoir of Jesus Christ; and so exclusively and completely are the contents of these four gospels occupied with the Lord's life that had there never been the historical Christ, who lived and died, who rose from the dead and ascended into heaven, those four gospels would have no right to exist.

Different in authorship, different in the standpoint of the writer, different in the parts and period of our Lord's life traversed, different also in the omissions and additions of each, the four gospels constitute one harmonious whole: one in subject, one in source, one in history, one in purpose and in power; and each biographer relates independently his own story of Jesus with that inimitable simplicity and truth which commends itself "to every man's conscience in the sight of God."

1. Writers of the Gospels. The authors of the four gospels were severally Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John (see under several names). They were not all fishermen as is often supposed. They were from different secular occupations, and from various parts of the country.

Patristic testimony regarding both the authors and the order of the several gospels is very conclusive. Irenaeus (born about A. D. 115), the pupil of Polycarp, who was the disciple of the apostle John, says: "It is not possible that the gospels can be either more or fewer than they are now" (Against Heresies, iii, 8). Origen (b. 185) "attests that he knows only four gospels . . . which are the only undisputed ones in the whole Church of God throughout the world;" and he names them in the exact order as they have come down to us (Eusebius, Ecl. Hist., B. vi, ch. 25, p. 231, Crusé's translation). The famous Fragment known as the Muratorian Canon (dating A. D. 170) is torn off in the first part, leaving a few words in the last of Mark's gospel, but gives Luke and John in that order. As the part due to Matthew has disappeared, and is found nowhere else, it is easy to understand that it was the part which was lost. Eusebius (b. 260), the first historian of the Church whose work has come down to us, while discussing the books of the New Testament, says: "Among the first must be placed THE HOLY QUATERNION OF THE GOSPELS" (Euseb., E. H., iii, 25, p. 99).

(1) Matthew wrote at Jerusalem, before starting out to evangelize the nations; Mark wrote at Rome, before starting out to establish the faith in Egypt; Luke wrote in Greece, or while sharing Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea; John wrote at Ephesus after his exile at Patmos. Clement of Alexandria (b. 150) affirms that Matthew continued his stay at Jerusalem with the other apostles, busy with his own countrymen for a period of twelve years after the crucifixion (Strom., vi, 5, 53). Eusebius says: "The Holy Apostles and disciples of our Saviour, being scattered over the whole world, Thomas, according to tradition, received Parthia as his allotted region; Andrew received Scythia, and John Asia, where, after continuing for some time, he died at Ephesus. Peter appears to have preached through Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia, to the Jews that were scattered abroad; who also finally coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downward, having requested of himself to suffer in this way" (E. H., iii, c. 1, p. 70).

Theodore of Mopsuestia says: "For a good while the apostles preached chiefly to Jews in Judea. Afterward Providence made way for conducting them to remote countries. Peter went to Rome; the rest elsewhere; John, in particular, took up his abode in Ephesus. About this time the other evangelists, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, published their gospels, which were soon spread abroad all over the world" (cited by Lardner, v, 299). The author of the Imperfect Work (about A. D. 560) wrote: "The occasion of Matthew's writing is said to be this: There was a great persecution in Palestine, so that there was danger lest all the faithful should be dispersed. That they might not be without teaching, though they should have no teachers, they requested Matthew to write for them a history of all Christ's words and works, that wherever they should be, they should have with them the ground of their faith" (Lard., v, p. 300). Exactly when Matthew's gospel was written is at present indeterminate. Ancient writers differ in dates. Theophylact, of the 11th Christian century, and Euthymius, of the 12th century, state that it was produced "eight years after the ascension," which would be about A. D. 41 or 42 of our current chronology. But the more ancient writers give a later date. The Paschal Chronicle of the 7th century says, "about fifteen years after our Lord's ascension," with which Nicephorus Callisti, of the 14th century, agrees. This would be about A. D. 48. But Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, in the 2d century, and at only one remove from the apostle John, says: "Matthew indeed produced a gospel written among the Hebrews in their own dialect, while Peter and Paul proclaimed the gospel and founded the Church at Rome. After the departure [death] of these, Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, also transmitted to us in writing that which had been preached by Peter. And Luke, the companion of Paul, committed to writing the gospel preached by him [Paul]. Afterward John, the disciple of our Lord, the same that lay in his bosom, also published the gospel while he was yet in Ephesus, in Asia" (Euseb., E. H., v, c, 8). In no case could this have been earlier, but probably later than A. D. 61, the year Paul arrived at Rome a prisoner. Epiphanius, Bishop of Cyprus in A. D. 367, who is accounted high authority in these matters, says that Matthew wrote first [of the four evangelists] and Mark soon after, being a companion of Peter at Rome; that Mark and Luke were both of the seventy disciples sent out to the Gentiles; that both were offended at Christ's words recorded in John 6:44; that Peter recovered Mark, and Paul recovered Luke to the Christian faith afterward; that Mark wrote the second gospel and Luke the third, and John wrote the fourth and last gospel (see Lard., iv, pp. 187, 188).

By whom the gospel of Matthew was given in our present Greek form is unknown, but probably by himself. The consensus of critical scholars is that it is not a mere translation, but an original composition. Socrates, the historian, states that Matthew went to Ethiopia, where he is said to have died a natural death. Eusebius says that Pantænus, the philosopher, who afterward became a Christian, and was placed at the celebrated school at Alexandria, penetrated as far as the Indies, and "there found his own arrival anticipated by some who there were acquainted with the gospel of Matthew, to whom Bartholomew, one of the apostles, had preached, and left them the gospel of Matthew in Hebrew, which was also preserved until this time" (see E. H., v, 10, p. 178).

(2) Mark is the evangelist who wrote the second gospel. Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis in the first half of the 2d century, furnishes the earliest notice of this gospel. He says: "Mark, having been the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately whatever he remembered, without however recording in order what was either said or done by Christ. For neither did he hear the Lord, nor did he follow him [as did the Twelve] . . . So then Mark committed no error in thus writing down such details as he remembered; for he made it his own forethought not to omit or misrepresent any details that he heard [from Peter]" (Euseb., E. H., iii, 39). Jerome observes of Mark, that "taking his gospel which himself had composed, he went to Egypt and at Alexandria founded a church of great note;" and in his Book of Illustrious Men, says: "Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, at the desire of the brethren at Rome, wrote a short gospel according to what he had heard related by Peter, which, when Peter knew it, he approved it and authorized it to be read in the churches" (see Lard., v, 334). Universal testimony is to the effect that Mark wrote down in his gospel as best he could the substance of Peter's preaching; and the gospel itself confirms by internal evidence the testimony of the fathers in many respects. For while it details in a graphic manner important facts, it is at once the briefest and least complete of the four gospels. Nevertheless, it represents fairly the impulsive and energetic Peter, and the very omissions and additions indicate the style of the apostle. Justin Martyr, who wrote about A. D. 140-150, and was born before the death of the apostle John, cites from the Memoirs of Peter the names given to James and John by Jesus, who called them "Boanerges," or sons of thunder; a circumstance mentioned only in Mark's gospel (3:17). Jerome, after mentioning Mark as having composed his gospel, and gone to Egypt, and founding a notable church at Alexandria, states that this evangelist "died in the eighth year of the reign of Nero." As Nero ruled the empire A. D. 54-68, this would place the death of Mark in the year 62 (Lard., v, 331).

Three things are made evident as related to Mark's gospel by these patristic citations: (1) That Mark composed his gospel of the substance preached by Peter; (2) that Peter "knew" of the fact, and both approved and authorized his gospel to be read in the several churches; (3) that all this was accomplished before the death of Peter at Rome.

(3) Luke, by common consent, was the writer of the third gospel and of Acts. Even such writers as the Frenchman Rénan, known as hostile to Christianity, fully concede this fact as incontestable. The third gospel is derived from different sources, but all legitimate authorities, as it is confessedly due to those apostles who "from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word" (Prologue of chap. 1). Nevertheless, it is the most complete gospel of them all, and the only one which observes a strictly historical method, the first three gospels being biographical sketches, or as designated by Justin Martyr, "Memoirs of the Apostles" (ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν ἀποστόλων). It is to be remarked that both Luke's gospel and Acts are dedicated to one Theophilus (friend of God), which was a custom in those days, obligating those thus receiving a copy as a gift to exert themselves to give the work circulation (Lee).

(4) John is the author of the fourth gospel. After extraordinary research and testing, the criticism of the best scholarship of the age ascribes this work to that apostle "whom Jesus loved." No classic writing of equal antiquity is so well attested by both external and internal evidence as John's gospel. It has been said, so peculiar and marked is this writing, that if we did not know who its author was, we should have to imagine a personage of such character for its authorship.

2. Designations of the Writers. (1) Evangelists. In organizing the workers for the kingdom of Christ "He gave some, apostles; some, prophets; and some, evangelists. . . for the perfecting of the saints" (Eph. 4:11, 12). Evangelists appear to have been appointed to a certain work, rather than to be a specific order in the apostolic Church. They were afterward known as εὐαγγελιστοί, evangelists, whose function was that of missionary preachers, who are described by Eusebius as "leaving their country they performed the office of evangelists to those who proclaim Christ; they also delivered to them the books of the holy gospels. The Holy Ghost also wrought many wonders through them, so that as soon as the gospel was heard men voluntarily gathered in crowds and eagerly embraced the true faith with their whole minds." The evangelists were "bringers of good tidings given to the heralds of salvation through Christ, who are not apostles" (Thayer). In the time of Chrysostom the term was applied to the writers of the gospels" (Cremer). The four gospels were composed within a short period, if measured by the lapse of time, but at long intervals, if measured by the course of events.

A just distinction is to be noted as between the first and fourth gospel written by two of Christ's disciples, who were eyewitnesses of facts stated, and the second and third gospels, which were written by evangelists who did not witness the facts which they record. Mark and Luke were not of the Twelve at least. The distinction relates to the kind of testimony which each class furnishes. Matthew and John were identified with the original "Twelve" disciples who were chosen by our Lord to accompany him throughout his ministry, "beginning from the baptism of John unto the same day that he was taken up" to heaven (Matt. 10:2-5; Acts 1:22). They were so chosen, as Mark and Luke were not, to be "witnesses of all things which he did both in the land of the Jews and in Jerusalem," whose perfectly familiar knowledge of Jesus was such that they even "did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead." These were they whom he "commanded" "to preach unto the people and to testify" (Acts 10:39, 41, 42). As seen, Papias, who was almost within touch of the apostles, says that Mark neither heard the Lord, nor did he follow him. Even if Epiphanius be correct in identifying Mark and Luke with the seventy disciples, it does not follow from the evidence that they were with Jesus "from the beginning," and certainly not at the end, if they became offended at Christ's words, "and walked no more with him." Neither of these writers professes to have been eyewitnesses of the scenes which he records; but quite to the contrary, Luke makes declaration of other sources of information. However, this is no detriment at all to the claim of these two gospels as being equally historical and credible with the others. Mark reports the substance of Peter's sermons which he had often heard repeated in public or in private conversations; and Peter was an eyewitness, and Luke acknowledges his obligation to those who were "eyewitnesses and ministers of the word."

Nor do these facts reduce the contents of the second and third gospels to the character of mere "traditions," as some have assumed. Traditions may be, and often are, thoroughly historical, since the mere act of writing does not render anything historical. But these two gospels were not handed down from one generation to another, or from father to son, as must be the case with "tradition;" they were written deliverances to contemporaries of Christ and his apostles, who were themselves cognizant of many facts recorded in these gospels. These writings of Mark and Luke were never questioned by those who lived in their time, and were in a position to know or deny the historicity and credibility of their statements. Their gospels were not of the character of traditions any more than the records taken in the courts, of the testimony of witnesses, are to be called mere "traditions," which would obviously be a vicious misuse of language.

(2) Synoptists. The writers of the first three gospels are known as Synoptists in distinction from the fourth gospel; and the first three gospels are called the synoptic gospels; from σύν (soon) together, and ὄψις (op'sis) view. The reference is to the parallel narratives in the facts recorded and the statements made by Matthew, Mark, and Luke. John's gospel is very different in character, being intentionally supplementary to the accounts given by the synoptists. Clement of Alexandria says: "The three gospels previously written, having been distributed among all, and also handed down to him [i. e., John], they say that he admitted them, giving his testimony to their truth; but that there was wanting in the narrative the account of the things done by Christ among the first of his deeds, and at the commencement of the gospel . . . For it is evident that the other three evangelists only wrote the deeds of our Lord for one year after the imprisonment of John the Baptist, and intimated this in the very beginning of their history. . . . The Apostle John, it is said, being entreated to undertake it, wrote the account of the time not recorded by the former evangelists, and the deeds done by our Saviour which they have passed by (for these were the events that occurred before the imprisonment of John), and this very fact is intimated by him when he says (2:11): "This beginning of miracles did," etc. (Euseb., iii, c. 24). Clement elsewhere says: "But John, last of all, perceiving that what had reference to the body in the gospel of our Saviour was sufficiently detailed, and being encouraged by his familiar friends and urged by the Spirit, wrote a spiritual gospel" (Ib., vi, 14).

The synoptists in traversing the same ground with each other exhibit certain agreements and disagreements in statement which are really remarkable. These divergencies relate alike to matter and method, yet without invalidating the account. For the last century it has been a problem for the ripest scholarship and keenest criticism to solve. The careful analysis and consideration have been carried on nearly to exhaustion, and no satisfactory solution has been reached from sheer insufficiency of data, now after the lapse of nearly two thousand years. These several writers indicate their individuality of character and independence of each other in a manner that excludes the thought of either collision or collusion in their testimony. For they evince not the slightest consciousness of any error as possible, and evidence not the slightest concern that anything that they record could be disputed by contemporaries who might be supposed to be at times as familiar with certain public events as themselves. Unquestionably they neglect the strict chronological order of events, in that they aim at the higher end of spiritual sequence, which is always kept in sight. Mere deviations of statement are certainly not to be taken as contradictions. The variations of the first three gospels furnish a clear case of what in the courts is known as "Substantial truth under circumstantial variety of testimony in manner and detail," as in any other case of testimonies from different witnesses who are honest. For, as Dr. Schaff admirably remarks, "It is a generally acknowledged principle in legal evidence that circumstantial variation in the testimony of witnesses confirms their substantial agreement."

3. Origin of the Gospels. Very evidently the several gospels had their origin in a common source. There is not the slightest proof, however, that they were derived from some prior and unknown writing of some unknown and imaginary author. Their character precludes the assumption. The four gospels owe their existence solely to one source, as they are exclusively occupied with one subject, viz., the historical Person of Jesus Christ. His life is no ideal creation, and the contents of the gospels are not the outgrowth of exuberant fancy. The evangelists themselves were utterly incapable of even conceiving ideally, much less developing, such a unique character as that of the perfect Man delineated on their pages. There must first have been the real God-Man made manifest to their gaze, present to the apprehension through the senses, realized and known to their mind, by long and familiar contemplation, to have furnished to the race such an imperishable portraiture of the living Christ of God.

The origin of the four gospels was clearly historical, although somewhat progressive in character. First, there was the Christly Presence whose very personality and spirituality spoke so directly to men's consciousness that at his word they turned from their occupation instantly, and with a loving cheer, "left all . . . and followed him" (Matt. 4:21, 22; Luke 5:27). Then the gospel which he himself orally declared, the miracles which he wrought to confirm the word, the truths which he taught in conversation, as one who gazed upon the invisible world; and the passion which he endured at the end, in maintenance of his teachings—are the things which made a powerful and imperishable impression upon mankind. After that the apostles took up the story of his life, and began to preach with strange power that Jesus was the realization of Jewish prediction, was the true Messiah of the Jews, the incarnate Son of God, the wonderful Redeemer of mankind. For about thirty years after the crucifixion, while whole communities were religiously reformed or revolutionized by Christian doctrine, no pen had yet traced a single line about Jesus Christ in the gospels. At last, all these oral teachings both by Christ and his apostles crystallized in written and permanent form known to us as the four gospels, to be the heritage of the generations to come, down to the end of time. The oral and the written teachings were equally authoritative and the product of inspired minds (Comp. 2 Pet. 1:21; 2 Tim. 3:16, 17; 1 Thess. 2:13; 2 Thess. 2:15; Acts 15:22-28). Jesus directed his disciples to go "teach all nations" (Matt. 28:20); but he did not restrict them to any one mode of teaching, and speech and writing are but different methods of instruction for those who are present or absent.

(1) Matthew. In point of time, the best biblical scholars give priority to Matthew's gospel (Schaff). Origen mentions "the four gospels as the only undisputed ones in the whole Church of God throughout the world," and that "the first is written by Matthew, the same who was a publican, but afterward an apostle of Jesus Christ, who having published it for the Jewish converts, wrote it in Hebrew." That Matthew wrote his gospel in the Hebrew language is amply attested by Papias, Irenæus, Pantænus, Origen, Eusebius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, and Jerome. Traces of this fact may be found in his use of certain Hebrew words found nowhere else than in a Jewish vocabulary. Such are Immanuel (Heb. יְמָנְוּאֵל; Gr. Ἐμμανουήλ, "God with us," 1:23); Golgotha (Heb. גּוֹלְגוֹתָא; Chald. ܩܘܠܘܬܐ; Gr. Γολγοθά, a skull, 27:33); Raca (Gr. Παῖ, a simpleton, 5:22); Eli (Heb. אֵלִי; Gr. Ἠλί, "My God," 27:46). Pantænus, the Christian philosopher, avers that in his evangelism he had penetrated so far as the Indies, where he found those who are acquainted with Matthew's Hebrew gospel, which Bartholomew, one of the apostles, had preached to the natives (see Euseb., E. H., v, 10, p. 178).

That Matthew wrote as early as the period assigned is evident from citations made therefrom by one who was a disciple of the apostles. Barnabas, whose epistle is now dated A. D. 70-79, mentions many incidents recorded in the several gospels as well as in Paul's earlier epistles, such as Christ's choosing the twelve apostles, the mockery of Jesus by Herod Antipas and his soldiery, the casting lots for his garments, etc., and then cites the very words of Matthew (9:13, also in Mark 2:17): "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners" to repentance. Not only is this passage cited as being Scripture, but as determinative that he was not quoting from an oral gospel, he says, "As it is written, Many are called, but few chosen;" ὡς γέγραπται πολλοὶ κλητοὶ ὀλίγοι, δὲ ἐκλεκτοί—sicut scriptum est (Epi. of Barnabas, ch. 4, close) (see Matt. 22:14, and 20:16 of Authorized Version; the latter reference is omitted in the English Revised Version). This is the first distinct reference made by an apostolic father to a written gospel. The document known as the Didaché of the Apostles, which was written in the last decade of the 1st century, makes much use of this Gospel of Matthew, particularly of the Sermon on the Mount, which Matthew is by far the most copious in quoting. The Didaché was in existence while the apostle John was still living, and proves that Matthew's written gospel was well known in the 1st century. So Justin writes of the "Memoirs," or "Memorabilia of the Apostles which are called Gospels" in both his Apologies and Dialogue. Papias says that "Matthew composed his history [τὰ λόγια, i. e., the divine oracles] in the Hebrew dialect, and everyone translated them as he was able" (Euseb., iii, c. 38, p. 116). Clement of Alexandria says, referring to the first and third gospel: "Those which contain the genealogies were written first" (Euseb., E. H., vi, c. 14, p. 220).

(2) Mark. Respecting the difficulties which confronted Peter at Rome, and his success, Eusebius says: "The declaration of the truth prevailed and overpowered all, and the divine word itself, now shining from heaven upon men and flourishing upon earth and dwelling with his apostles, prevailed and overpowered every opposition" (ii, c. 14). Clement of Alexandria says: "The gospel of Mark was occasioned in the following manner: When Peter had proclaimed the word publicly at Rome, and declared the gospel under the influence of the Spirit, as there was a great number present, they requested Mark, who had followed him from afar, and remembered well what he had said, to reduce these things to writing, and that after composing the gospel, he gave it to those who requested it of him" (Euseb., E. H., vi, 14).

Clement, in another place, says: "So greatly did the splendor of piety enlighten the minds of Peter's hearers, that it was not sufficient to hear but once, nor to receive the unwritten doctrine of the Gospel of God, but they persevered in every variety of entreaties to solicit Mark as the companion of Peter, and whose gospel we have, that he should leave them a monument of the doctrine thus orally communicated in writing. Nor did they cease their solicitations until they had prevailed with the man, and thus became the means of that history which is called the gospel of Mark." Peter "having ascertained what was done, by the revelation of the Spirit, was delighted," and . . . "the history obtained his authority for the purpose of being read in the churches" (Euseb., E. H., ii, c. 15, pp. 52, 53).

(3) Luke. This evangelist, in the prologue of his gospel, professes to have received information from those who "from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word," and that he himself "had a perfect understanding of all things from the very first," respecting which he now proposed to write (1:2, 3). Clement remarks that "Luke also in the commencement of his narrative premises the cause which led him to write, showing that many others having rashly undertaken to compose a narration of matters that he had already completely ascertained, in order to free us from the uncertain suppositions of others, in his own gospel he delivered the certain account of those things that he himself had fully received from his intimacy with Paul, and also his intercourse with the other apostles" (Euseb., E. H., iii, 24). In the sense that he possessed several sources of information, his gospel is the most composite of the four, in its contents. It is safe to believe that it was composed in the period between A. D. 68 and 63, but probably not published until after the death of Paul. "Mark and Luke wrote at a time when their writings might be approved, not only by the Church, but also by the apostles still living" (Augustine).

(4) John. In respect to this evangelist, Clement again observes: "After Mark and Luke had already published their gospels, they say that John, who, during all this time, was preaching the gospel without writing, at length proceeded to write it on the following occasion: The three gospels previously written, having been distributed among all, and also handed to him, they say that he admitted them, giving his testimony to their truth; and that there was only wanting in the narrative the account of the things done by Christ, among the first of his deeds and at the commencement of the gospel. . . . The apostle, therefore, in his gospel gives the deeds of Jesus before the Baptist was cast into prison, but the other evangelists mention the circumstances after that event. One who attends to these circumstances can no longer entertain the opinion that the gospels are at variance with each other, as the gospel of John comprehends the first events of Christ's life, but the others, the history that took place at the latter part of the time. It is probable, therefore, that for these reasons John has passed by in silence the genealogy of our Lord, because it was written by Matthew and Luke; but he commenced with the doctrine of the divinity as the part reserved for him by the divine Spirit, as if for a superior" (Euseb., E. H., iii, c. 24, pp. 98, 99).

The celebrated Fragment of the New Testament known as the Muratorian Canon, which dates about A. D. 170, thus accounts for the origin of John's gospel: that at Ephesus the apostles and elders showed John the first three gospels, which he read and approved, and then urged him to write the fourth gospel; that thereupon John desired to seek the Lord's will, and proposed to make it the subject for fasting and prayer for three days; that meantime anyone receiving a revelation respecting it should immediately communicate it to the others; that on the first night Andrew the disciple reported a vision that John should narrate all matters in his own name, and the others should assist him. Thereupon, John proceeded to write his gospel, with the special view of supplementing any details omitted by the other evangelists, and generally omitting particulars which they had inserted in the first three gospels. This account serves to explain the special indorsement given by these assistants, which now is included in the text, at the close of the fourth gospel, in these words: "This is the disciple which testified of these things and wrote these things; and we know that his testimony is true" (John 21:24 (see Westcott's Canon, p. 214).

4. Objects of the Gospels. Each evangelist naturally had some special object in view in composing his gospel, and that gave it prominence. Matthew, being himself a Jew, wrote in the Jewish language for the special benefit of all Jewish converts and people. Accordingly he records the evidence that Jesus Christ was truly the realization of the Jews' Messiah, and hence traces Christ's royal descent from Abraham the progenitor of the Jewish race, down through the line of Davidic kings, and thereby proves that Jesus was the true King of "the kingdom of heaven," in distinction from an earthly monarchy of common expectation. The accentuation of the phrase is made obvious by the fact that "the kingdom of heaven" does not occur in any other evangelist, but occurs in the first gospel no less than thirty-two times (Westcott). Luke, on the other hand, was a Greek, and wrote his gospel in the Greek language—the language of common intercourse among the nations—for the special advantage of all the Greek-speaking Gentiles. He therefore naturally neglects the proof of the Jewish Messiah as secondary in the interest of the Gentiles, and traces Christ's natural descent down from Adam, as the progenitor of the whole human race, cognizing Jesus Christ as the Redeemer, not of the Jews only, but of universal mankind. Mark's surname being Roman, and he being Peter's interpreter in preaching to the Romans at Rome, at their urgency wrote his gospel in the interests of the Roman converts and people, concerning "the Kingdom of God" which now had come to them. John wrote his gospel long after the other evangelists, with the purpose of supplementing the first three gospels, writing for the special edification and evangelization of the Christian Churches. Thus the four gospels had each a speciality, but not an exclusive purpose in writing; for these specialities are but the variations of the one great Gospel adapted to all men, in the interests of every age, until the end of the world.

5. Contents of the Gospels. (1) Titles. These are prefixed to the several gospels, introducing them as "According to Matthew," "Ac-

ording to Mark," etc., which do not appear on the earliest manuscripts which have come down to us. This, however, is not to be understood as saying that these indications of authorship are not entirely correct and authentic. For while it is not absolutely known, it is very highly probable that this formula was placed there by the direction of the Church first receiving them, with a view to properly designating them for permanent future use.

(2) Contents. Matthew and Luke open their gospels with the genealogies and birth of Jesus; Mark, with the baptismal ministrations of the Baptist; and John, with the mystery of the incarnation. Matthew closes his gospel with Christ's great commission to go "disciple all nations;" Mark, with the successes which should crown the ministry of the apostles; Luke, with the indescribable joy experienced by the disciples returning from Christ's ascension; and John, with the assurance that a world of books could not describe the words and deeds of Christ to men. As to those contents of the gospels which relate to our Lord's ministry, the characteristic differences may properly be remarked. Matthew gives special prominence to our Lord's discourses on the mountains, as related to the ancient prophecies (5-7); Mark gives in simplest but graphic narrative, a vivid picture of Christ's miracles, of which he records nearly as many as the other two evangelists (5-8); Luke gives prominence to the parables of Jesus elsewhere unrecorded (13-17); while the evangelist John discourses profoundly respecting the preexistence of Christ, and his wonderful prayers (chaps. 1, 10, 12:27-30; 17). "Matthew groups together doctrinal teachings in the form of great discourses; he is a preacher. Mark narrates events as they occur to his mind; he is a chronicler. Luke reproduces the external and internal development of events; he is a historian" (Godet). John declares the profound doctrine of the incarnation; he is a theologian.

"Matthew's narration occupies about one fourth of his gospel; Mark's about one half, and Luke's about one third" (Norton). "If the total contents of the gospels be represented by one hundred, there are seven peculiarities in Mark, forty-two in Matthew, fifty-nine in Luke, and ninety-two in John" (Westcott). "One half of Mark is found in Matthew, one fourth of Luke is found in Matthew, one third of Mark is found in Luke. . . . If the extent of all the coincidences be represented by one hundred, their proportion is: Matthew, Mark, and Luke have fifty-three coincidences; Matthew and Luke have twenty-one; Matthew and Mark have twenty; and Mark and Luke have six coincidences" (Schaff).

Matthew's gospel serves as the connecting link between the Old Testament and the New. His Sermons of Christ are larger in extent than all the others together. He makes constant reference to the civil law of Moses, correcting wrong impressions and tendencies of the Jewish people. His familiarity with the land of the Jews, its geography and topography, is indicated in his assumption of such knowledge on the part of the Jews. That the contents of Mark's gospel, as already indicated, was the substance of Peter's preaching which Mark reported, is accordant with the affirmations of Papias, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome. Tertullian (b. 150), referring to the second and third gospel, says: "That which Mark published may be affirmed to be Peter's, whose interpreter Mark was. For even Luke's form of the gospel men usually ascribe to Paul. And it may well seem that the works which the disciples publish belong to their masters" (Adv. Marcion, iv, c. 5).

In the incorporation and also in the omission of certain significant facts, Mark indicates that Peter's statements were the basis of his gospel, especially those related to the apostle. In his opening chapter the evangelist mentions that Peter's home was "the house of Simon and Andrew" (1:16, 29); and in the closing chapter he records the message of the angel of the resurrection: "Go your way, tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him" (16:7). There is a parallel statement amounting almost to identity of words in one of the last sentences of Mark (16:19), and in Peter's First Epistle: "So the Lord Jesus . . . was received up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God," and "Jesus Christ, who is on the right hand of God, having gone into heaven" (1 Pet. 3:22, Eng. R. V.; comp. Acts 2:25, 33-36).

Among the contents of Mark's gospel are two miracles of unusual character to be noted; one wrought upon the deaf and dumb man in Decapolis, at which the people "were above measure astonished, saying he hath done all things well. He maketh even the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak" (7:37). Another miracle was that wrought upon a blind man of Bethsaida, whose cure was not instantaneous, but gradual, in that at first he only "saw men, as trees, walking;" but who at Jesus's touch, "saw all things clearly" (8:22-26).

Mark's gospel is the least literary and least complete of the four. His style is crude, his vocabulary limited, his narrative abrupt and often broken off suddenly, suggestive of the speaker whom he is reporting, rather than the graceful writer. Despite all this, it is the peculiarity of the contents of his gospel that they are always interesting, because the thoughts are sharply presented in a series of pictures, rapid, vivid, and often dramatic. All this is the marked characteristic of all Peter's public addresses. Mark's remarkable impressibility and memory are distinctively illustrated herein. Sometimes the evangelist gives delicate touches of shade and coloring to persons and scenes which he describes. He notes particularly the manly emotions and passions of Jesus in the stir of events; such as his positions (1:12), his gestures (9:35; 10:23), his expression of countenance (8:12), his movements (3:34; 5:32; 9:35; 11:11), his repose (4:38), his wonder (6:6), his indignation (3:5), his tenderness (6:31; 6:34; 8:23; 10:21). The same particularity is observable in mentioning persons, parties, places, and in noting times: of persons (1:29, 36; 3:6; 11:11; 13:3; 15:21; 16:7); of places (2:1, 13; 8:7; 4:1; 5:20; 7:31); of times (1:35; 4:35; 6:2; 11:11; 14:68; 15:25).

Luke's gospel in contents is the most particular in details, the most historical in order, and the most complete in character of them all. His is preeminently the gospel of Christ's humanity; the gospel of "the Son of Man;" and the gospel of salvation for the universal human race. He alone narrates Christ's prayer on the cross for his enemies, and his promise of paradise to the penitent thief, closing with a brief description of our Saviour's benediction with uplifted hands upon the world which he had just redeemed, as he ascended into the heavens. His style indicates culture. He possessed a wealth of vocabulary. He is remarkable for his carefulness in historical details. He uses about one hundred and eighty terms in his gospel alone, not found elsewhere in the writings of the New Testament, many of which are rare and even technical. An illustration is furnished in his remarkable description of Paul's shipwreck in Acts, in which he gives no less than seventeen nautical terms with entire correctness. He notices with the observance of a trained physician the subjects of diseases, of sufferings, and the miracles of healing. He mentions Peter's mother-in-law, who was distressed with "a great fever" (4:38); the fever and dysentery which had seized upon Publius of Melita (Acts 28:8), and Christ's deadly sufferings in the garden, so that "his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (Luke 22:44).

John, the loving disciple whom Jesus loved, survived all the other disciples, and unto him it was reserved to close the apostolic age. He was the preeminent personage whose part it was to close also the story of our Lord's life. "His gospel is the golden sunset of the age of inspiration" (Schaff). It was written at Ephesus, a city of prominence in "Asia," the name of the most western province of Asia Minor, long after the Jerusalem of John's early manhood was made a heap of ruins in A. D. 70. Writing at such a remote point both in distance and time, and especially under the circumstances which gave rise to his gospel, it would not be expected that he would need to parallel the lines and traverse the territory traced by the synoptists. Accordingly he neglects the genealogical ancestry of our Lord, the birth of the Baptist, the story of Christ's temptation, his baptism in the Jordan, his transfiguration on the mountains, the choosing of the twelve disciples, and the account of the demons cast out. He records nothing of the two sacraments, the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord's Prayer, the destruction of Jerusalem, or of the end of the world. On the other hand, John begins his gospel with "the beginning" of time, discourses of Christ's pre-existent state, and identifies Jesus as the Word with the uncreated God by his incarnation. The witness of the Baptist that Jesus was the Son of God, is incorporated in his writings. He thence passes into the spiritual birth of men, the bread and water of life, and enlarges upon the mission and comfort of the Holy Spirit. John includes the accounts of Nicodemus, the woman of Samaria, and six miracles not mentioned by the synoptists: the first, which occurred at the marriage of Cana of Galilee; and the last, the most wonderful of miracles, the raising of Lazarus from death to life. At the close he confesses that he omits "many other things" "which are not written in this book;" but then carefully states that "These things are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye might have life through his name" (20:30, 31; 21:25).

It is evident that the writer of the fourth gospel is a Jew, and is familiar with Jewish facts, personages, and places in history. A delegation of Jewish "priests and Levites from Jerusalem" asked the Baptist, "Who art thou?" (1:19); Philip saith, "We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth" (1:45). "How is it that thou, being a Jew, asketh drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" (4:9, 10). "Salvation is of the Jews" (4:22). "Now Jacob's well was there" (4:6). "This is that prophet which should come into the world" (6:14). There is also evident a familiarity with the geography: "These things were done in Bethabara, beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing" (1:28); "Go wash in the pool of Siloam [at Jerusalem] (9:7). "Philip was from Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter" (1:44); "There was a marriage in Cana of Galilee" (2:1); "John also was baptizing in Ænon near Salim" (3:23). "Then cometh he to a city of Samaria, which is called Sychar, near a parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph" (4:5). So also of the topography about the Holy City: "Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep-market a pool which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches" (5:2); and we read of "in the temple in Solomon's porch" (10:23); "over the brook Kedron where was a garden" (18:1), "the judgment-seat in a place called The Pavement, but in the Hebrew Gabbatha" (19:13), and "the place called the place of the skull, which is called in the Hebrew, Golgotha" (19:17).

6. Characteristics of the Gospels. If Matthew's gospel is the most majestic and powerful in citations from the Old Testament, Mark's is clearly the briefest and most incomplete in the historical sense, while Luke's is the most composite with reference to his various sources, and John the most profound and impressive for its advance doctrine. Matthew conducts the essential Jewish argument in the Jewish tongue, for the Jewish people. He traces Christ's ancestral kings, he records the Sermon on the Mount; he disregards the chronological order of events, following similarity of matter, looking constantly to spiritual sequence.

Dr. Lange remarks of Mark's gospel, as a prominent characteristic, the alternation of rest and labor constantly noted by that evangelist in Christ's public life. After his baptism, Jesus retired to the wilderness of Judea, before engaging in preaching in Galilee (1:12). He withdrew himself with his disciples to the sea, and to "a small ship," before he began the work of miracles upon "plagues" and the casting out "unclean spirits" who cried out, "Thou art the Son of God" (3:7-12).

Luke's characteristic is his completeness and his exactness in all matters of detail. It has been called the gospel of womanhood. Throughout from the very first chapter to the last, the noble and womanly deeds of devoted women are remarked. Elizabeth the wife of the saintly priest, and mother of the Baptist; Mary "the wedded Maid and Virgin Mother;" "Anna a prophetess, the daughter of Phanael, of the tribe of Aser;" the sorrowing but gladdened widow of Nain, whose dead son was lifted into life; the woman with the issue of twelve years' standing; the nameless woman who anointed Christ's feet in the house of Simon the Pharisee; the guiltless, but much abused Mary Magdalene, who was the first to visit the sepulcher; the Mary and Martha who with Lazarus composed the first Christian family at Bethany; the poor widow who cast into the treasury her two mites, which was all the living she had; the weeping "daughters of Jerusalem" whom Jesus addressed so thoughtfully from the cross; the women of Galilee who brought with them spices to the sepulcher of our Lord; the woman in the beautiful parable of the lost piece of silver—these all attest what prominence Luke "the beloved physician" gave to womanhood in his gospel.

Another characteristic of Luke's authorship is that he brings so much sunshine and cheer in his gospel. From first to last there are "words of joy and gladness." To Zacharias it was said, "Thou shalt have joy and gladness" (1:14). To the shepherds with their flocks on the hills of Bethlehem, it was said, "Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people" (2:10). The seventy disciples return with joy, because even demons are subject to them through Christ's name (10:17). So the shepherd recovers his sheep and returns with joy; the lost piece of silver is found and neighbors and friends are asked to join in the joy and cheer it brought to them all; the angels in heaven rejoice over one sinner that repenteth (ch. 15). In that surprise in the presence of the risen Lord, the disciples "believed not for joy" and wonder (24:4); and at last, when Jesus "was parted from" his disciples, and was taken up into heaven, the apostles worshiped him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy (24:51, 52). Is it any wonder that the skeptical Renan should declare that the third gospel is the most beautiful book ever written, when viewed from a purely literary and humanitarian standpoint?

Four characteristics mark the gospel of John. These are (1) the inimitable simplicity of its style, which engages the thoughtful interest of the child quite as much as that of the man; (2) the profound doctrine of the incarnation of Jesus Christ, which of course transcends human understanding, but so is one's own life incomprehensible; (3) the preeminent spirituality of its character, and this is attributable to the devout personality of its author; and (4) finally, John's gospel is to be recognized in a supreme sense as the gospel of love. His sentences are brief and sententious; sometimes antithetical, but oftener running in parallelisms after the style of Hebrew poetry. His vocabulary is not large, but is sufficient. "The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." "A servant is not greater than his lord; neither one that is sent greater than he that sent him." The author of the fourth gospel and the three synoptists traverse the territory of our Lord's life from opposite starting points. That is, the synoptists begin with our Saviour's manhood, and develop progressively along the lines of his Messiahship and miracles until the doctrine of his divinity is to be clearly apprehended. On the contrary, John begins with his preexistence and Godhead and descends gradually through his Messiahship to the plane of his manhood among men. The synoptists trace his claims as the God-Man through his external history; but John lays claim at once to Christ's dignity by opening up to our apprehension his internal nature as the Son of God through the incarnation. Hence the author of the fourth gospel supplements but does not repeat the thrice-told story of the first three evangelists, filling their omissions with most interesting matter, seldom overlapping their narratives, and then only to give added details, and so supplement the whole. Added years, and matured experience, and deep reflections with increased spirituality, and a constant faith and abounding love, gave to this apostle the highest qualifications for the production of his gospel. He uses the verb to believe (πιστεύειν) about two hundred times; twice as often as the synoptists. This writer especially speaks as an eyewitness: "We beheld his glory; glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (1:14), and near the close of the gospel, he records his affirmation that there were "many other signs which Jesus did in the presence of his disciples which are not written in this book; but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name" (20:30, 31).

7. Credibility of the Gospels. It seems strange that this point should be discussed in view of such documents. "The credibility of the gospels would never have been denied if it were not for the philosophical and dogmatic skepticism which desires to get rid of the supernatural and miraculous at any price" (Schaff).

(1) Signatures. An objection to the credibility of the gospels is based upon the fact that they bear no signatures to authenticate sacred authorship. The case is different with the epistles of the New Testament. Paul's thirteen epistles invariably open with a declaration of his authorship as an apostle of Jesus Christ (see Rom. 1:1); and sometimes it appears again embodied in the text near the close of the epistle (1 Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18; 2 Thess. 3:17, comp. Phil. 5:9). For this marked difference in documents of equal antiquity, there is required a justifying explanation. Fortunately we have not far to go for the sufficient reason. Chrysostom (b. 347) states the case fully thus: "Moses did not put his name to the first five books [of the Bible], nor did the historian who wrote after him . . . nor did Matthew, or Mark, or Luke, or John, put their names to their writings. . . . What is the reason for this? [Because] they delivered their writings [directly] to those who were present, when it was needless to put their name down; [but the apostle Paul] sent his writings to those who were at a distance, in the form of an epistle, where the addition of the name is necessary" (Homily 4, on Matt.). There was besides great critical care exercised by Paul in this regard in order to prevent imposture, especially as he employed amanuenses in writing, but left his autograph deposited with the several churches addressed, accompanied with certain marks or signs which should indicate by comparison the real authentication of any given document purporting to be apostolical. This special precaution against fiction and forgery is clearly set forth in 2 Thess. 3:17: "The salutation of Paul in mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle; so I write." No other writings of equal antiquity can furnish such evidence of their authenticity as these sacred writings.

(2) Simplicity. Another evidence of credibility is internal, manifested in the absolute simplicity and sincerity of purpose on the part of the evangelists. These apostolic men unhesitatingly record their own ignorance and stupidity which had subjected them to repeated reproof from Christ; their carnal ambitions for place and power; their utter failure to work a miracle after they had been duly authorized by the Master (Matt. 17:14-21; Mark 9:14-29); how they forbade another to work miracles because he did not follow the disciples (Luke 9:38, 39). Further, they make it a matter of circumstantial record against themselves that Peter openly denied his Master; that Judas was guilty of treachery and was bribed by a small price; that out of sheer fear, all the disciples forsook Jesus when he was arrested in the garden. After the crucifixion they confess the deep despondency and despair of all the apostles; their absolute disbelief in the fact of Christ's resurrection; their consequent return to former secular pursuit at the sea of Galilee. Without strictures on the horrid cruelties of the crucifixion; without concealments or exaggeration; without explanation or extenuation, they confess their own faults and foibles. Facts just as they occurred, have to speak for themselves, and the record unexplained and unjustified, goes down to all future generations, to be read and known of all men. In their profound sincerity they evidence no reservations, and no concern respecting their own, or each others' fame; they do not even seem to inquire what will be the effect of all this touching the Christian cause thereafter. Their whole trend is to tell the story of Jesus which had taken full possession of their souls; and the account receives an added charm from the very simplicity and sincerity for the absolute truth of the narrative.

(3) Confirmation. The credibility as well as the authenticity of the gospels is confirmed by an ancient disbeliever, Celsus (b. about 135-140) who was an eclectic philosopher who championed the literary assault upon Christianity and the Christians, in a work entitled A True Word (Λόγος Ἀληθής). It was published about a century after the gospels. Having evidently a copy of these Scriptures in his possession, he makes adverse criticisms upon about one hundred and twenty facts which are mentioned in their contents. Among these particulars he refers to Jesus as having descended from the Jewish kings, that at first Joseph was suspicious of Mary's chastity, that Jesus was born in a small village in Judea, that Mary was married to an unnamed carpenter, that a strange star appeared at Christ's birth, that Herod slew the children of Bethlehem, that an angel directed Joseph and family to flee into Egypt, that they were recalled to their home in Nazareth, and that Jesus was called a Nazarene. Then to clinch his charges he emphasizes the fact that these gospels were written by Christ's disciples. His words are: "The disciples of Christ wrote such statements regarding him" (Origen, Contra Celsum, B. ii, ch. 16). "As you yourselves have recorded" (Ib. ii, 49; 53). "All these statements are taken from your own books, in addition to which we need no other witness; for you fall by your own swords" (Ib. ii, 74). Celsus never cites an apocryphal gospel as authority, for he knew that only these four had ever been acknowledged as genuine by the Christian world, upon which they relied with an implicit and absolute faith. At this early date this enemy of Christianity corroborated and authenticated the authenticity and historicity of the four gospels.

8. Canoncity of the Gospels. The canon of the New Testament was formed and established directly between the apostolic writers and the several churches addressed. No council whatever of the church had any part in its formation. About the middle of the 2d century certain false writings known as Apocryphal Gospels first appeared, purporting to give a sketch of the childhood and early life of Jesus. They were mere romances, strangely puerile writings, unhistorical in character as a whole, yet with shreds of truth borrowed from the genuine history. These apocryphal books were put in circulation about a century after the genuine gospels had been published. About A. D. 363 the small Council of Laodiceæ, as the first instance of the kind, took formal action in recording a list of the genuine books of the New Testament, to preserve the just distinction between those which had always been accepted and those which were known to be apocryphal. To prevent imposition, especially in remote churches, this council made a public declaration of the Canon just as it had been maintained and known to be, from the time of the apostles themselves. Now obviously this action was not original, but simply confirmatory of that which the church had held from the beginning as settled respecting canonical books. It was, in intention and in fact, a standing protest against those other books which were known as spurious. Having done this as a public, and formal declaration and confirmation of the faith of the church respecting the sacred books, its work was done. The council originated nothing, inaugurated nothing, and except in the ratifying sense, "settled" nothing.

The epistles being sent to distant churches were always received with critical caution and care. To find acceptance at all, they had to come under due apostolic sanctions and bear significant tokens from the writers thereof that they were genuine, and not spurious (2 Thess. 3:17).

GOULD. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

GOVERNMENT OF GOD. See THEOCRACY, ISRAEL.

GOVERNMENT OF ISRAEL. See ISRAEL.

GOVERNOR, the representative in the Authorized Version of no less than ten Hebrew and five Greek words, denoting various degrees of authority and power. The numerous and generally vague original terms are also rendered by "ruler," "chief," "prince," "captain," etc. See GLOSSARY.

1. Al-loof (Heb. אֲלוּף, gentle, familiar), the chief of a tribe or family (Judg. 6:15; Isa. 60:22; Mic. 5:1), not equivalent to the "prince of a thousand" of Exod. 18:21, or the "head of a thousand" of Num. 1:16. It is the term applied to the "dukes" of Edom (Gen. 36; comp. Zech. 9:7; 12:5, 6).

2. Kho-kake (Heb. קָהָק, Judg. 5:9), and Mekho-kake (Heb. מְקָהָק, Judg. 5:14), denote a ruler in his capacity of lawgiver and dispenser of justice (Gen. 49:10; Prov. 8:15; comp. Judg. 5:14 with Isa. 10:1).

3. Mo'-shel (Heb. מִשָּׁל, having dominion), a ruler considered especially as having power over the property and persons of his subjects (Josh. 12:2; Psa. 105:20; Gen. 24:2). The "governors of the people," in 2 Chron. 23:20, appear to have been the king's bodyguard (comp. 2 Kings 11:19).

4. Naw-gheed (Heb. נָגִיד, a commander), denotes a prominent personage, whatever his capacity. It is applied to a king as the military and civil chief of his people (2 Sam. 5:2; 8:21; 1 Chron. 29:22), to the general of an army (2 Chron. 32:21), and to the head of a tribe (19:11). It denotes an officer of high rank in the palace, the lord high chamberlain (28:7).

5. Naw-see (Heb. נָשִׂא, an exalted one). The prevailing idea in this word is that of elevation. It is applied to the chief of the tribe (Gen. 17:20; Num. 2:3, etc.), to the heads of sections of a tribe (Num. 3:32; 7:2), and to a powerful sheik (Gen. 23:6). In general it denotes a man of elevated rank. Naw-see was the official name of the president of the Sanhedrin, whose seat was in the middle of the seventy-one members.

6. Peh-khav' (Heb. פְּהָקָה, a word probably of Assyrian origin. It is applied in 1 Kings 10:15 to the petty chieftains who were tributary to Solomon (2 Chron. 9:14); to the military commander of the Syrians (1 Kings 20:24), the Assyrians (2 Kings 18:24; 23:6), the Chaldeans (Jer. 51:23), and the Medes (51:38). Under the Persian vice-roys, during the Babylonian captivity, the land of the Hebrews appears to have been portioned out among "governors" inferior in rank to the satraps (Ezra 8:36), like the other provinces which were under the dominion of the Persian king (Neh. 2:7, 9). It is impossible to determine the precise limits of their authority, or the functions which they had to perform. It appears from Ezra 6:8 that these governors were intrusted with the collection of the king's taxes; and from Neh. 5:18; 12:26, that they were supported by a contribution levied upon the people, which was technically termed "the bread of the governor" (comp. Ezra 4:14). They were probably assisted in discharging their official duties by a council (Ezra 4:7; 6:6). The "governor" beyond the river had a judgment seat at Jerusalem, from which probably he administered justice when making a progress through his province (Neh. 3:7).

7. Paw-keed' (Heb. פקדן) denotes simply a person appointed to any office. It is used of the officers proposed to be appointed by Joseph (Gen. 41:34); of Zebul, Abimelech's lieutenant (Judg. 9:28); of an officer of the high priest (2 Chron. 24:11); and of a priest or Levite of high rank (Neh. 11:14, 22).

8. Shal-let' (Heb. שׁלֵטָן), a man of authority. Applied to Joseph as Pharaoh's prime minister (Gen. 42:6); to Arioch, the captain of the guard; to the king of Babylon (Dan. 2:15); and to Daniel as third in rank under Belshazzar (5:29).

9. Sar (Heb. שָׂר), to rule, a chief, in any capacity. The term is used equally of the general of an army (Gen. 21:22), or the commander of a division (1 Kings 16:9; 11:24), as of the governor of Pharaoh's prison (Gen. 39:21), and the chief of his butlers and bakers (40:2), or herdsmen (47:6).

10. Seg-an' (Chald. שֵׁגָאֵן) is applied in the plural (Dan. 3:2, 27; 6:8) to the governors of the Babylonian satrapies, in connection with other official terms, who were probably the military chiefs of the provinces.

The Greek terms rendered in the New Testament "governor" are the following, of which the first two relate to public or military officers, and the last two to domestic usages:

11. Eth-nar'-khuce (Gr. ἐθνάρχης, 2 Cor. 11:32), an officer of rank under Aretas, the Arabian king of Damascus. It has been conjectured that the ethnarch of Damascus was merely the governor of the resident Jews, but it does not seem probable that an officer of such limited jurisdiction would be styled "the ethnarch of Aretas the king;" and, as the term is clearly capable of a wide range of meaning, it was most likely intended to denote one who held the city and district of Damascus as the king's vassal or representative.

12. Hagg-em-ohi' (Gr. ἡγεμών), the procurator of Judea under the Romans (Matt. 27:2; Luke 2:2).

13. Oy-kon-om'-os (Gr. οἰκονόμος, Gal. 4:2), a steward, apparently intrusted with the management of a minor's property.

14. Ar-khee-tree'-klee-nos (Gr. ἀρχιτρίκλινος, John 2:9), "the governor of the feast." Lightfoot supposes him to have been a kind of chaplain, who pronounced the blessings upon the wine that was drunk during the seven days of the marriage feast. He appears to have been on intimate terms with the bridegroom, and to have presided at the banquet in his stead. The duties of the master of a feast are given at full length in Ecclus. 35 (32), which were to place in order the tables and couches, arrange the courses, taste the food and wine beforehand, etc.

15. Yoo-thoo'-none (Gr. εὐθύων, one leading, a guide), i. e., a helmsman (James 3:4).

GO'ZAN (Heb. גֹּזָן, go-zawn', quarry), the river upon whose banks the Israelites were located when carried away captive (2 Kings 17:6; 1 Chron. 5:26); a region of Central Asia, subject to the Assyrians (2 Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12). The towns to which they were taken were Halah and Habor. Gozan adjoins the Euphrates, is now called Kiz-zele-ozan; it "rises in Kurdistan, falls into the White River, and thence into the Caspian. The region through which it flows is most fertile" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis.).

GRACE (Heb. חֵן, khane; once, in Ezra 9:8, חֶן, tekh-in-nan'; Gr. χάρις, kar'-ece; once, in James 1:11, εὐπρέπεια, yoo-prep'-i-ah), a word of various meanings.

1. Physical beauty (i. e., grace of form and person, Prov. 1:9; 3:22; 31:30, A. V. "favour"; Psa. 45:2; James 1:11, etc.).

2. Favor, goodness, benevolence, friendship of God toward man, or of men toward each other (Gen. 6:8; 18:3; 19:9; 2 Sam. 10:2; 2 Tim. 1:9).

3. God's forgiving mercy, as gratuitous and opposed to merit (Rom. 11:6; Eph. 2:5; Col. 1:6, etc.).

4. The Gospel generally, as opposed to law (John 1:17; Rom. 6:14; 1 Pet. 5:12, etc.).

5. Certain gifts of God, freely bestowed; e. g., miracles, prophecy, tongues, etc. (Rom. 15:15; 1 Cor. 15:10; Eph. 3:8, etc.).

6. Christian virtues; e. g., charity, liberality, holiness, etc. (2 Cor. 8:7; 2 Pet. 3:18).

7. The glory to be revealed, or eternal life (1 Pet. 1:13).

8. Theological Differences. The principal contentions of theology as to the doctrine of divine grace have related: (1) To its absolute necessity, Pelagians denying the depravity of man's nature and his consequent utter dependence upon grace; (2) To the extent of grace and its relation to the human will, Calvinists asserting their doctrine of unconditional and irresistible grace for the elect; (3) To the means of grace, or methods of its operation, Roman Catholics and High Churchmen attaching undue importance to the sacraments.

GRACE AT MEALS, a short prayer at table, returning thanks to God for food provided and asking the divine blessing thereon. The propriety of such an act is evident from the injunction (Rom. 14:6; 1 Cor. 10:31; 1 Tim. 4:4), and from the example of our Lord (Mark 8:6, 7; Luke 24:30). Among the Jews "grace" was said both before and after meals, and also by women, slaves, and children. Regulations were made down to the pettiest detail, viz.: what form was to be used for the fruits of the trees; what for wine; what for the fruits of the ground; for bread; for vegetables; for vinegar; for unripe fallen fruit; for locusts, milk, cheese, eggs; and scholars contended as to when this and that form was suitable. . . . When such restriction was laid upon prayer by the legal formula, it could not but be chilled into an external performance (Schürer, Jewish People, Div. ii, vol. ii, 117 sq.).

GRACIOUS. See GLOSSARY.

GRAFF. See GLOSSARY.

GRAFT, GRAFF (Gr. ἐγκεντρίζω, eng-ken-trid'-zo, to prick in). Grafting is the process in horticulture by which a portion of a plant is made to unite with another plant, whether of the same kind or of another variety or species. The plant upon which the operation is performed is called the stock; the portion inserted or joined with it, the scion or graft. The usual process was to take shoots or buds from approved trees, and to insert them on others, where, with proper care, they continued to grow. Thus fruit was kept from degenerating, for the grafts received nourishment from the stocks, but always produced fruit of the same sort as the tree from which they were taken.

The apostle Paul makes use (Rom. 11:17-24) of a figure which has something striking. He compares the Jewish theocracy to a good olive tree, the Gentiles to a wild one, of which a branch is engrafted upon the former, and which by that means acquires fruitfulness.

GRAIN (Heb. צֶרֶר, tser-ore', packed, i. e., kernel; Gr. κόκκος, kok'-kos, kernel), used (Amos 9:9; Matt. 13:31, etc.) in the singular, and not as we do in a collective sense. See also CORN in VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

GRANARY. See STOREHOUSE.

GRAPE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

GRASS. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

GRASSHOPPER. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

GRATE (Heb. מַקְבָּר, mak-bare'), a copper network, movable by a copper ring at each corner, and placed below the top of the great altar (Exod. 27:4; 35:16; 38:4, 5, 30; 39:39). See ALTAR.

GRAVE (properly Heb. קֶבֶר, keh'-ber, a sepulcher; Gr. μνήμα, mnay'-mah, or μνημεῖον, mnay-mi'-on, literally, remembrance, and so tomb; once of שַׁחַת, shakh'ath, Job 33:22; and in Job 30:24 the Heb. בֵּיץ, beh-ee', is rendered improperly grave, but should be prayer). Many times "grave" is the rendering of Heb. שְׁחֵלֹה, sheh-ole', Gr. ἄδης, hah'-duce, in the sense generally of the abode of the dead. See SHEOL.

1. Egyptian. "The bodies of the common people, usually naked and uncoffined, were thrust under the sand, a depth of barely three feet from the surface. Those of the better class rested in mean, rectangular chambers, hastily built of yellow bricks, and roofed with pointed vaulting. No ornaments or treasures gladdened the deceased in his miserable resting place; a few vessels, however, of coarse pottery contained the provisions

"Some of the wealthy class had their tombs cut out of the mountain side; but the majority preferred an isolated tomb, 'mastaba' (i. e., formed like the stone bench or platform seen in the streets of Egyptian towns in front of each shop), comprising a chapel above ground, a shaft, and some subterranean vaults. The doors face east, sometimes north or south, but never west. One of these is but the semblance of a door, contrived so as to face the east; this was for the use of the dead, and it was believed that the ghost entered or left it at will. The door for the use of the living, sometimes preceded by a portico, was almost always characterized by great simplicity. Over it is a smooth flagstone, bearing sometimes merely the name of the dead person, sometimes his titles and descent, sometimes a prayer for his welfare, and an enumeration of the days during which he is entitled to receive the worship due to ancestors.

"The fashion of burying in a pyramid was not adopted in the environs of Memphis until tolerably late times, and the Pharaohs of the primitive dynasties were interred, as their subjects were, in sepulchral chambers or mastabas" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 248, sq., 359).

2. Chaldean. "We must not expect to find on the plains of the Euphrates the rock-cut tombs, the mastabas or pyramids of Egypt. No mountain chain ran on either side of the river formed of rock soft enough to be cut and hollowed easily into chambers or sepulchral halls, and at the same time sufficiently hard to prevent the tunnels once cut from falling in." The tomb "was constructed of dried or burnt brick, and its form varied much from the most ancient times. Sometimes it was a great vaulted chamber, and contained the remains of one or two bodies walled up within it. At other times it consisted of an earthen jar, in which the corpse had been inserted in a bent-up posture, or was composed of two enormous cylindrical jars, which, when united and cemented with bitumen, formed a kind of barrel around the body. Clay jars and dishes, arranged around the body, contained the food and drink required for the dead man's daily fare; and even stone representations of provisions, which, like those of Egypt, were lasting substitutes for the reality. . . . The sepulchers of royal personages alone furnish us with monuments of which we can determine the site. At Babylon these were found in the ancient palaces in which the living were no longer inclined to dwell; that of Shargina, for instance, furnished a burying place for kings more than two thousand years after the death of the founder" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 685, sq.).

3. Hebrew. Among the Jews graves were sometimes mere cavities, dug out in the earth (Gen. 35:8; 1 Sam. 31:13); natural caves or grottoes (Gen. 23:17); artificial tombs hewn out in the rock, provided with galleries and chambers, preference being given to places outside cities (Luke 7:12; John 11:30). Only kings and prophets (1 Kings 2:10; 16:6; 1 Sam. 25:1; 28:3) were buried in cities. The rich had, no doubt, family burying places (Gen. 23:20; Judg. 8:32;

2 Sam. 2:32; 1 Kings 13:22), while the poorer classes would doubtless have their public ones (Jer. 26:23; 2 Kings 23:6; comp. Matt. 27:7). Graves hewn in the rock, or laid out in natural caves, were closed with large flat stones (Matt. 27:60; 28:2; John 11:38). Monuments were set up in very early times on or over graves (Gen. 35:20; comp. Job 21:32; 2 Sam. 18:18), which afterward took the form of magnificent mausoleums with pyramids and many kinds of emblems 1 Macc. 13:27, sq.).

Probably there were burying places attached to each village in ancient times, as we find in the case of Nain, where the graveyard remains to this day.

In post-exilic times it was sought to restore and adorn the graves of the prophets and other holy persons, and this was particularly affected by the Pharisees, to testify their reverence for the prophets (comp. Matt. 23:30, sq.).

Flat stones laid upon graves had upon them the title וַיִּזְכֹּר (tsee-yone', waymark), to warn passers-by lest they should contract uncleanness by touching the grave. For this end also the tombs were whitewashed every year on the 15th of Adar.

There are scriptural traces of the popular idea that graves were the residence of demons (comp. Matt. 8:28), who were, perhaps, connected with soothsaying (Acts 16:16); while others refer such allusions to the supernatural notions respecting offering to the manes of the departed. See TOMB.

GRAVE CLOTHES (Gr. κερπια, ki-ree'-ah, winding sheet). From early times the body was washed (Acts 9:37), then wrapped in a linen cloth (Matt. 27:59), or the limbs separately wound with strips of linen (John 11:44).

GRAVED. See GRAVING under HANDICRAFTS.

GRAVEL (Heb. קִשְׁיָוִט , khaw-tsawts', Prov. 20:17; Lam. 3:16; מַי־אָוֶן , may-aw', thought by some to mean interior, belly, Isa. 48:19), small stones or pebbles; comminuted rock, coarser than sand.

GRAVEN IMAGE (Heb. בַּעַל־סֵל , peh'-sel, or בַּעַל־עֵל , pes-eel', a carving), a figure made of wood or stone (Exod. 20:4; Deut. 27:15), to represent Jehovah. See IMAGE WORSHIP.

GRECIA (Heb. יָוֵן , yaw-nawn'), usually rendered JAVAN (q. v.), the Latin form (Dan. 8:21; 10:20; 11:2) of GREECE (q. v.).

GRECIANS.—Identification. In the Old Testament, Greeks, inhabitants of Greece and the coast lands and islands belonging to the Greek race; in the New Testament, Hellenists, or Greek-speaking Jews.

In the Old Testament Javan (Heb. יָוֵן , yaw-nawn') is translated "Greece" (A. V. of Zech. 9:

13, R. V. throughout) and "Grecia" (A. V. of Dan. 8:21; 10:20; 11:2); in Joel 3:6, יְהוּדָיִם , q. d., "Javanites" is translated "Grecians." In the New Testament both versions distinguish between Ἕλληνας (hel'-lay-nese), "Greeks" by birth, as opposed to Ἰουδαῖοι (ee-oo-dah'-yaw), "Jews," whence Ἕλληνας is sometimes applied to Gentiles in general; and Ἑλληνισταί (hel'-lay-nis-tah'-ee), "Grecians," i. e., Greek-speaking Jews, as opposed to Ἐβραῖαι (heb'-rah'-yaw), home Jews dwelling in Palestine. The difference between the two versions in Acts 11:20 and 18:17 results from a difference between the Greek texts which they followed.

In the New Testament, then, Grecians or Hellenists were foreign Jews who spoke Greek, which the conquests of Alexander had made the language of the educated throughout the civilized world, and "also the language of the masses in the great centers of commerce." Some would also include under the name "Hellenists" proselytes of Greek birth.

There are legends of early Jewish settlements in Arabia, Ethiopia, and Abyssinia. Indeed, the natural overflow of a vigorous people inheriting the business energy of their father Jacob would have united with the varying fortunes of war to carry numbers of Jews far beyond the limits of Palestine at a remote period. Of the influence of the Jews who were scattered abroad in these early ages it is impossible to form an estimate. Theirs was not professedly a missionary religion; but wherever the faithful Jew went he carried the knowledge of the true God, as did Naomi (Ruth 1:15, 16; 2:12), or, indirectly, Naaman's maid (2 Kings 5:3, 11); and, as far as his influence extended, he carried that combination of religion and lawful commerce which the great missionary explorer, Livingstone, thought so desirable.

But "the Dispersion, as a distinct element influencing the entire character of the Jews, dates from the Babylonian exile." Its limits had been extended by the Greek conquests in Asia, by the colonizing policy of some of the successors of Alexander the Great, and by the persecutions of Antiochus, so that "at the beginning of the Christian era the Dispersion was divided into three great sections—the Babylonian, the Syrian, the Egyptian."

"From Babylon the Jews spread throughout Persia, Media, and Parthia; but the settlements in China belong to a modern date." Nisibis, in northeast Mesopotamia, became a colonizing center. "In Armenia the Jews arrived at the greatest dignities."

We find them throughout Asia Minor even to its western coast. They were numerous in Cyprus, and were important enough in Delos and in Cos to receive religious recognition from the Romans. "The Jews of the Syrian provinces gradually formed a closer connection with their new homes, and together with the Greek language adopted in many respects Greek ideas." Hence arose Hellenism.

"This Hellenizing tendency, however, found its most free development at Alexandria. The Jewish settlements established there by Alexander and Ptolemy I became the source of the African dispersion, which spread over the north coast of Africa, and perhaps inland to Abyssinia. At Cyrene and Berenice (Tripoli) they formed a considerable portion of the population." It was Jason of Cyrene who wrote "in five books" a history of the Jewish war of liberation, which supplied the chief materials for the second book of the Macabees."

"The Jewish settlements in Rome" either resulted from "the occupation of Jerusalem by Pompey, B. C. 63," or were largely increased by that event. Under the favor of the early emperors they increased, till in the time of Claudius they had become formidable on account of their numbers and dissensions, and were banished from the city" (Acts 18:2; comp. Suet., Claud., 25, "Judeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulsi"). But they soon flowed back and were quite numerous (Acts 28:17, ff.) and conspicuous (Mart., Ep., xi, 94; Juv., Sat., iii, 14).

Thus at the day of Pentecost there were at Jerusalem devout Jews out of every nation under heaven (Acts 2:5). For, though scattered through so many remote lands, "the Dispersion was still bound together in itself and to its mother country by religious ties. The temple was the acknowledged center of Judaism, and the faithful Jew everywhere contributed the half shekel toward its maintenance." But, while the fires of patriotism burned unquenched and unquenchable throughout the Jewish world, it was impossible to maintain pharisaic strictness and rigor in these remote lands. Egypt, for example, was beyond the reach of the beacon fires which signaled the time of appearance of the new moon, and beyond the Sabbath reading of the Hebrew Scriptures. "The influence of the Dispersion on the rapid promulgation of Christianity can scarcely be overrated. The course of the apostolic teaching followed in a regular progress the line of Jewish settlements." This we can see by following the travels of St. Paul in the Acts. "Throughout the apostolic journeys the Jews were the class to whom 'it was necessary (ἀναγκαῖον) that the word of God should be first spoken' (Acts 13:46); and they in turn were united with the mass of the population by the intermediate body of 'the devout' (οἱ σεβόμενοι), which had recognized in various degrees the faith of the God of Israel."

The Hellenistic system was so widely diffused as to form an excellent preparation for a world religion. It was strong enough to give the new faith a good start, yet too weak to restrain its growth or to smother its free spirit in a mass of Judaic details and reduce it to the position of an advanced Judaism. The steadfast adhesion of the Hellenistic system to the historic faith, with its comparative freedom from Pharisaic narrowness, well qualified it to be the nurse of a new religion which was to be an expanded but not enfeebled development of the old. "The purely outward elements of the national life were laid aside with a facility of which history offers few examples, while the inner character of the people remained unchanged."

The Septuagint version of the Old Testament had given the Hellenists a Greek language of their own, so near to the classic Greek as to be easily understood, but simpler, more intelligible, and more translatable than the classic, and also more analytic, like modern languages. "It was essentially a fusion of Eastern and Western thought. . . . The characteristic of the Hellenic dialect is the combination of a Hebrew spirit with a Greek body, of a Hebrew form with Greek words. The conception belongs to one race and the expression to another. Nor is it too much to say that this combination was one of the most important aids for the adequate expression of its teaching. In the fullness of time, when the great message came, a language was prepared to receive it; and thus the very dialect of the New Testament forms a great lesson in the true philosophy of history, and becomes in itself a monument of the providential government of mankind."

GREECE (Heb. גֵּר, yaw-wawm'; Gr. Ἑλλάς, hel-las), properly that country in Europe inhabited by the Greeks (1 Macc. 1:1), but in Acts 20:2, apparently designating only that part of it included in the Roman province of MACEDONIA (q. v.). Greece is sometimes described as a country containing the four provinces of Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia (or Hellas), and Peloponnesus, but more commonly only the two latter are to be understood as comprised in it. There seems to have been little intercourse between Greece and the Hebrews, until the Macedonian conquest of the East; hence the few references in the Old Testament. Greece is mentioned in Gen. 10:2, 4, under the name JAVAN (q. v.); the Jews and Greeks are said to have met in the slave market (Joel 3:6); and Greece is spoken of as "the rough goat," by Daniel (8:21).

"At the beginning of the Christian era those territories which now form the kingdom of Greece formed the Roman province of Achaia, with the proconsul residing at Corinth. As a place of learning, however, Athens held the first rank, and study there was held as indispensable to a Roman youth wishing to distinguish himself. Her schools of grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, and philosophy, were crowded.

"Christianity was first planted in Greece by Paul, who visited Philippi (Acts 16:12), then Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, and Corinth (chaps. 17, 18). Dionysius the Areopagite, who was converted through the apostle's address on Mar's Hill, is said to have become the Bishop of Athens." See GRECIANS, PAUL.

GREEK, an inhabitant of Greece.

GREEN. See COLOR.

GREETING. See SALUTATIONS.

GREYHOUND. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

GRIEF. See GLOSSARY; SORROW.

GRIEVANCE, GRIEVOUSLY. See GLOSSARY.

GRIND. See MILL.

Figurative. To oppress the poor by exaction (Isa. 3:15, "to grind the faces of the poor").

The expression, "Let my wife grind unto another" (Job 31:10) means, let her become another's menial (comp. Exod. 11:5; Isa. 47:2).

GRISLED, or GRIZZLED (Heb. גָּרִיזָן, bar-rodé, spotted), partly colored or variegated, as goats (Gen. 31:10, 12), or horses (Zech. 6:3, 6).

GROVE, the rendering of two Hebrew words.

1. Ash-ay-raw' (Heb. אֲשֵׁרָה, fortunate). It is generally admitted that this word cannot mean either a green tree or a grove, for the simple reason that the words to make (1 Kings 14:15; 16:33; 2 Kings 17:16, etc.), to set up (2 Kings 17:10), to stand up (2 Chron. 33:19), and to build (1 Kings 14:23), used to denote the erection of an Asherah, are not one of them suitable to a tree or grove. On the other hand the Asherah is spoken of as being set up under, or by the side of, the green tree. Asherah is, in all probability, a name for ASHTORETH (q. v.), and the idol (a wooden column) was generally set up by the side of the altars of Baal.

2. Ay'-shel (Heb. שֵׁל, rendered "grove," Gen. 21:33) really means the tamarisk tree, which with its long life, hard wood, and evergreen leaves, was a type of the ever-enduring grace of the faithful covenant-keeping God. In the religions of the ancient heathen world groves play a prominent part. In the old times altars only were erected to the gods. It was thought wrong to shut up the gods within walls, and hence, as Pliny expressly tells us, trees were the first temples; and from the earliest times groves are mentioned in connection with religious worship (Gen. 12:6, 7; 13:18; Deut. 11:30; A. V. "plain"). The groves were generally found connected with temples, and often had the right of affording an asylum. Some have supposed that even the Jewish Temple had an inclosure planted with palm and cedar (Ps. 92:12, 13) and olive (Ps. 52:8), as the mosque which stands on its site now has. This is more than doubtful; but we know that a celebrated oak stood by the sanctuary at Shechem (Josh. 24:26; Judg. 9:6).

GRUDGE. See GLOSSARY.

GUARD, the rendering of three Hebrew words:

1. Tab-bawkh' (Heb. טָבַח, originally signified a "cook;" and as butchering fell to the lot of the cook in Eastern countries it gained the secondary sense of "executioner," and is applied to the bodyguard of the kings of Egypt (Gen. 37:36) and Babylon (2 Kings 25:8; Jer. 39:9; 41:10; Dan. 2:14).

2. Rats (Heb. רָץ) properly means a "runner," and is the ordinary term employed for the attendants of the Jewish kings, whose office it was to run before the chariot (2 Sam. 15:1;

1 Kings 1:5), and to form a military guard (1 Sam. 22:17; 2 Kings 10:25; 11:6; 2 Chron. 12:10).

3. Mish-meh'-reth (Heb. מִשְׁמָרֵת), and mish-maw'r (Heb. מִשְׁמָר), express properly the act of watching, but are occasionally transferred to the persons who kept watch (Neh. 4:9, 22; 7:3; 12:9; Job 7:12).

GUARDIAN ANGELS. See ANGELS.

GUD'GODAH (Heb. גֻּדְגֹדָה, gud-go'-daw, cutting, cleft), the fortieth station of the Israelites, between Mt. Hor and Jotbath (Deut. 10:7). The name appears to be preserved in the present wady Ghudhagidh.

GUEST. See HOSPITALITY.

GUEST CHAMBER (Gr. κατάλυμα, kat-al'-oo-mah, to break up, i. e., a journey), any room for the entertainment of guests (Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11); rendered Inn in Luke 2:7. See HOUSE.

GUILT. See SIN.

GUILTY. See GLOSSARY.

GULF (Gr. χάσμα, khas'-mah, chasm), an impassable space, such as is represented to exist between the abode of Abraham and the lost rich man (Luke 16:26).

GU'NI (Heb. גֻּנִי, goo-nee', colored, dyed).

1. One of the sons of Naphtali (B. C. perhaps about 2000), but not necessarily born before the migration to Egypt (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:48; 1 Chron. 7:13). His descendants are called Gunites (Num. 26:48).

2. Father of Abdiel and grandfather of Ahi, which last was chieftain of the Gileadite Gadites (1 Chron. 5:15).

GU'NITE (Heb. גֻּנִי, lag-goo-nee'), a general name of the descendants of GUNI (q. v.), of the tribe of Naphtali (Num. 26:48).

GUR (Heb. גֹּר, goor, a whelp as abiding in the lair), an ascent near Ibleam, on the road from Jezreel to Beth-haggan, where the servants of Jehu overtook and slew Ahaziah the king (2 Kings 9:27). It has not been identified.

GUR'-BA'AL (Heb. גֹּר-בְּאֵל, goor-bah'-al, sojourn of Baal), a place in Arabia captured by Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:7); not identified.

GUTTER (Heb. צִנּוּר, tsin-noor).

1. This term occurs in the proposal of David that some one should "get up to the gutter and smite the Jebusites" (2 Sam. 5:8). Different meanings of the word have been given, but it probably signifies "waterfall," or "steep water course."

2. Rah'-hat (Heb. רַחַת, drinking troughs (Exod. 2:16), into which Jacob placed peeled rods when the sheep came to drink (Gen. 30:38, 40).

H

HAAHASH'TARI (Heb. אַחֲאֲשֵׁרִי, akh-ash-law-ree', the mule driver), the last mentioned of the four sons of Naarah, the second wife of Ashur, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:6).

HABA'IAH (Heb. חַבְיָהוּ, khah-ah-yaw', Jehovah has hidden), a priest whose descendants returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel, but were degraded from the priesthood, not being able to trace their genealogy (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63), B. C. about 536.

HAB'AKKUK (Heb. חַבְקֻק, khah-ak-kook', embrace), the eighth in order of the twelve minor prophets. Nothing certain is known as to the circumstances of Habakkuk's life, as we have only apocryphal and conflicting accounts. In the headings to his book (chaps. 1:1, and 3:1) Habakkuk is simply described as a man who held the office of prophet. From the conclusion to the psalm in ch. 3, "To the chief singer on my stringed instruments" (v. 19), we learn that he was officially qualified to take part in the liturgical singing of the temple, and therefore belonged to one of the Levitical families who were charged with the maintenance of the temple music, and, like the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who sprang from priestly households, belonged to the tribe of Levi. This is supported by the superscription of the apocryphon of Bel and the Dragon, "Habakkuk the son of Joshua of the tribe of Levi" (K. and D., Com.).

HAB'AKKUK, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

HABAZINI'AH (Heb. חַבְצִינִיָּהוּ, khah-atsan-yaw', perhaps lamp of Jehovah; according to Fürst, collection of Jehovah), the father of one Jeremiah, and grandfather of the chief Rechabite, Jazaniah, which last the prophet Jeremiah tested with the offer of wine in the temple (Jer. 35:3), B. C. about 607.

HABERGEON, an old English word for breastplate. See ARMOR, II, (3).

HABITATION, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, and used in the general sense of a place to dwell in (Psa. 69:25; 104:12; Acts 1:20, etc.).

Figurative. God is called the "habitation of his people" (Psa. 71:3; 91:9). Justice and judgment are the habitations of God's throne (89:14), since all his acts are founded on them (117:2). Palestine, Jerusalem, the tabernacle, and the temple are called the habitation of God, for in them he signally showed his presence (Psa. 132:5, 13; Eph. 2:22). God is said to "inhabit the praises of Israel" (Psa. 22:3), i. e., Jehovah is the object of and graciously receives the praises of his people. Eternity is represented as Jehovah's habitation (Isa. 57:15), i. e., the eternally dwelling One, whose life lasts forever and is always the same. See HOUSE, TENT.

HA'BOR (Heb. חַבּוֹר, khaw-bore', joining together), a river of Mesopotamia, distinguished from Chebar of Ezekiel (2 Kings 17:6). It empties into the Euphrates. The ten tribes were carried into the region through which it flows. Harper (Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 352) says: "Sargon, in the Assyrian inscriptions, says: 'Samaria I looked at, I captured; twenty-seven thousand two hundred and eighty men (or families) who dwelt in it I carried away. I appointed a governor over them, and continued the tribute of the former people.' He adds that he transported prisoners from Babylon to the 'land of the Hittites.' This land was Samaria, and the inscription agrees with the Bible statement. The captives from Samaria are taken to Halah, a town of Media; to Habor, now called the Khabour."

HACHALI'AH (Heb. חַחְלִיָּהוּ, khah-al-yaw', darkness of Jehovah; ornament of Jehovah, Fürst), the father of Nehemiah, the governor after the captivity (Neh. 1:1; 10:1), B. C. before 446.

HACH'ILAH (Heb. חַחִילָה, khah-ee-law', dark), a hiding place of David at the time the Ziphites proposed betraying him to Saul (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1, 3). Hachilah appears to have been the long ridge now called El Kôlah, where there is a high hill with a ruin, called Yûkin.

HACH'MONI (Heb. חַחְמוֹנִי, khah-mo-nee', skillful), a man only known as the father (or ancestor, comp. 1 Chron. 27:2) of Jashobeam, the chief of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:11, where son of Hachmoni is rendered "Hachmonite," for which the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:8) has "Tachmonite"), and also of Jehiel, the companion of the princes in the royal household (1 Chron. 27:32), B. C. considerably before 1000. Hachmon or Hachmoni was, no doubt, the founder of a family to which these belonged. The actual father of Jashobeam was Zabdriel (27:2), and he is also said to have belonged to the Korithes (12:6); possibly the Levites descended from Korah (McC. and S., Cyc.).

HACHEMONITE. See HACHEMONI.

HADAD (Heb. חַדָּד, had-ad', ferce), probably an official title, like Pharaoh, and the names of several men. It is found occasionally in the altered form, Hadar.

1. One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15, "Hadar;" 1 Chron. 1:30), after B. C. 2200.

2. The son of Bedad, and king of Edom. He gained an important victory over the Midianites on the field of Moab. He was the successor of Husham, and established his court at Avith (Gen. 36:35; 1 Chron. 1:46).

3. Another king of Edom, successor of Baalhanan. The name of his city was Pni (Pau), and his wife's name Mehetabel (1 Chron. 1:50). He is called Hadar in Gen. 36:39, where his death is not mentioned. This may be explained by the simple fact that at the time when the first table was drawn up Hadad was still alive and seated upon the throne. In all probability Hadad was the king of Edom to whom Moses applied for permission to pass through the land (Num. 20:14, sq.), B. C. about 1170.

4. A prince of the royal house of Edom. In his childhood he escaped the massacre under Joab, and fled with some followers into Egypt. Pharaoh treated him very kindly, and gave him his sister-in-law in marriage. By her he had a son, Genubath, who was brought up in the palace with the sons of Pharaoh. After David's death Hadad resolved to recover his dominion, but Pharaoh opposing him, he left Egypt and returned to his own country (1 Kings 11:14, sq.), B. C. 984. It does not appear from the text, as it now stands, what was the result of this attempt, further than he was one of the troubleshooters of Solomon's reign (v. 14). Our version makes v. 25 refer to Rezon, but the Septuagint has, "This is the evil which Adar did." The meaning then will be, This same kind of mischief (incursions in the land of Israel like those of Rezon) wrought also Hadad (Whedon, Com., in loco).

HADADE'ZER (Heb. הַדְּדֵזֶר, had-ad-eh'-zer, Adad his help), son of Rehob, and king of the Aramite state of Zobah. While on his way to establish his dominion (B. C. about 984) he was defeated in the neighborhood of the Euphrates (2 Sam. 8:3). From ch. 10 (v. 7, sq.) we learn that Joab commanded the forces of Israel. Hadadezer made preparations for the campaign of the following year on a far larger scale. When David heard that Hadadezer was gathering great armies on the Euphrates, he determined to anticipate his attack. He marched in person with his troops over Jordan to the northeast, and, at Helam, a place unknown to us, a decisive battle was fought. The Arameans from both sides of the Euphrates were completely routed (2 Sam. 8:4; 10:18), and the power of Hadadezer was so thoroughly broken that all the small tributary princes seized the opportunity of throwing off his yoke.

HADADRIM'MON (Heb. הַדְּדֵרִימֹן, had-ad-rim-mone'), a place in the valley of Megiddo (Zech. 12:11). The lamentation on account of the death of the good king Josiah, who lost his life in battle here, was so great as to pass into a proverb (2 Chron. 35:22-25).

HAD'AR (Heb. הַדָּר, khad-ar', perhaps chamber). 1. One of the "sons of Ishmael" (Gen. 25:15), given in 1 Chron. 1:30 as HADAD (q. v.).

2. (Heb. הַדָּר, had-ar', perhaps ornament), an Edomitic king who succeeded Baal-hanan (Gen. 36:39). The name of his city, and the name and genealogy of his wife, are given. In the parallel list in 1 Chron. 1 he appears as Hadad. We know from another source (1 Kings 11:14, sq.) that Hadad was one of the names of the royal family of Edom. See HADAD, 3.

HADARE'ZER (Heb. הַדְּרֵזֶר, had-ar-eh'-zer, Adad his help), the form (2 Sam. 10:16, 19; 1 Chron. 18:3, sq.; 19:16, 19) of HADADEZER (q. v.).

HAD'ASHAH (Heb. הַדָּשָׁה, khad-aw-shaw', new), a city in the valley of Judah (Josh. 15:37), between the hilly region and the Philistine border.

HADAS'SAH (Heb. הַדָּסָה, had-as-saw', myrtle), the earlier Jewish name of Esther (Esth. 2:7). See ESTHER.

HADATTAH (Heb. הַדַּתָּה, khad-at-taw', new), one of the extreme southern towns of Judah (Josh. 15:25). The Masoretic accents of the Hebrew connect Hadattah with Hazor preceding, making it read "new Hazor." It may be represented by the ruins of el Hudhaira, south of Jebel Khulil.

HADĒS (Gr. ᾠδης), had'-dace, unseen). This word does not occur in the English Bible, either as a general or proper name, but is found several times in the original (Matt. 11:23; 16:18; Luke 10:15; 16:23; Acts 2:27, 31; Rev. 1:18; 6:8; 20:13, 14; 1 Cor. 15:55, but in the last passage the true reading is θάνατος, death).

The following views of Hades may be well noted:

1. The ancient Greek view of Hades, and the Roman view of Orcois, or Inferna, is that of a place for all the dead in the depth of the earth; dark, dreary, cheerless, shut up, inaccessible to prayers and sacrifices, ruled over by Pluto. This presiding god was the enemy of all life, heartless, inexorable, and hated accordingly by gods and men.

2. The Hebrew SHEOL (q. v.) is the equivalent for Hades, and is likewise the subterranean abode of all the dead until the judgment. It was divided into two departments, paradise or Abraham's bosom for the good, and Gehenna or hell for the bad.

3. In the New Testament, as will be seen above, the term Hades is of comparatively rare occurrence; in our Lord's own discourses it is found only three times, and on two of the occasions by way of contrast to the region of life and blessing. From a consideration of the various passages the following may be a just conclusion: "It seems as if in the progress of God's dispensations a separation had come to be made between elements that originally were mingled together, so that Hades was henceforth appropriated, both in the name and in the reality, to those who were reserved in darkness and misery to the great day; and other names, with other and brighter ideas, were employed to designate the intermediate resting place of the redeemed. These latter pass immediately upon death into the presence of their Lord (John 14:2, 3; Phil. 1:23). Such being the nature of the scriptural representation on the subject, one must condemn the fables that sprung up amid the Dark Ages about the limbus, or antechamber of hell, and the purgatorial fires, in which it was supposed even redeemed souls had to complete their ripening for glory" (Imp. Dict., s. v.).

HAD'DID (Heb. הַדִּיד, khaw-deed', pointed), a place in Benjamin, seven hundred and twenty of whose inhabitants returned from captivity (Ezra 2:33, where some copies read Harid; Neh. 7:37; 11:34).

HAD'LAI (Heb. הַדְּלָי, khad-lah'ee, resting), the father of Amasa, which latter was one of the Ephraimites who opposed the captives of Judah in the civil war between Pekah and Ahaz (2 Chron. 28:12), B. C. about 735.

HADO'RAM (Heb. הַדּוֹרָם, had-o-rawm', Hador is exalted).

1. The fifth of the thirteen sons of Joktan

(Gen. 10:27; 1 Chron. 1:21), and supposed to be progenitor of a tribe in Arabia Felix. It is impossible to identify the tribe in question. Gesenius and others think that the Adramites are meant.

2. The son of Toi (Tou), king of Hamath, sent by his father (with valuable presents of gold, silver, and brass vessels) to congratulate David on his victory over their common enemy, Hadad-ezer, king of Syria (1 Chron. 18:10), B. C. about 984. In the parallel narrative of 2 Sam. 8, the name is given as Joram. This, being a contraction of Jehoram, which contains the name of Jehovah, is peculiarly an Israelitish appellation (Smith, s. v.).

3. Chief officer of the tribute in the time of Rehoboam, son of Solomon. He was stoned to death by the people of the northern tribes when sent by the king to collect the usual taxes (2 Chron. 10:18), B. C. about 934. Probably the same person as Adoniram in 1 Kings 4:6; 5:14.

HADRACH (Heb. חַדְרָח, khadrach), the name of a country mentioned by Zechariah (9:1), concerning which many theories exist. Some think it the name of an old deity; others, that it was a king of Damascus; others, as Rawlinson, identify it with Edessa. Keil and Delitzsch (Com., in loco.) say: "The land of Hadrach must denote a land hostile to the covenant nation or the kingdom of God, and can only be a symbolical epithet descriptive of the Medo-Persian empire."

HÆMORRHOIDS. See DISEASES, "EMERODS."

HAFT (Heb. חַפֵּץ, nits-tsavb'), fixed) an old form of handle, e. g., of a dagger (Judg. 3:22).

HA'GAB (Heb. חַגָב, khaw-gavb'), a locust), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46), B. C. before 536.

HAG'ABA (Heb. חַגְבָּא, khag-aw-baw'), also חַגְבָּא, a locust, Ezra 2:45), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:48), B. C. before 536.

HAG'ABAH (Ezra 2:45), another form of the preceding.

HA'GAR (Heb. חַגְרָה, haw-gawr'), derivation uncertain), an Egyptian, servant of Abraham (Gen. 21:9, 10), and Sarah (16:1). See SUPPLEMENT.

1. Abraham's Wife. Sarah, continuing for so long a time childless, determined to become a mother by proxy (not uncommon in the East) through her handmaid, whom she gave to Abraham as a secondary wife (Gen. 16), B. C. after 2250. This honor was too great for the weak and ill-regulated mind of Hagar; and no sooner did she find herself likely to become the mother of her master's heir than she openly triumphed over her less favored mistress. Sarah, deeply wounded, complained to Abraham, who gave her power to act as she thought best toward Hagar.

2. Flight. As soon as Sarah made her feel her power, Hagar fled, doubtless intending to return to Egypt by a road used from time immemorial, that ran from Hebron past Beersheba "by the way of Shur." There the angel of the Lord found her by a well, and directed her to return to her mistress and submit to her, promising her the birth of a son and numerous descendants.

3. Return. Obedient to the heavenly visitor, and having distinguished the place by the name of Beer-lahai-roi, Hagar returned again to the tent of Abraham, where in due time she had a son. Abraham called him, as directed by the angel (v. 11), Ishmael, "God shall hear." About fourteen years after Isaac was born, and when he was weaned, two or three years later, Ishmael greatly offended Sarah by mocking her son. Sarah insisted upon his expulsion from the family, together with Hagar.

4. Expelled. Abraham, though displeased, consented, being divinely instructed to follow Sarah's advice. Hagar and her son were sent away. In the desert, the strength of Ishmael gave way, and she laid him down under one of the stunted shrubs of that region. She withdrew about a bowshot's distance, unwilling to see his dying sufferings, and wept. The angel of the Lord appeared with a comforting promise of her son's increasing greatness, and directed her to a fountain, from which she filled the bottle and gave her son to drink. We have no account of Hagar's subsequent history beyond what is involved in that of Ishmael, who established himself in the wilderness of Paran, in the neighborhood of Sinai, and was married to an Egyptian woman (Gen. 21:1-21). In Gal. 4:24, the apostle Paul, in an allegory, makes Hagar represent the Jewish Church, which was in bondage to the ceremonial law, as Sarah represents the true Church of Christ, which was free from this bondage (Bloomfield, New Test.).

NOTE.—Well of Hagar. In her flight Hagar rested by a prominent watering-place—"the fountain in the way of Shur" (Gen. 16:7), located "between Kadesh and Bered" (v. 14). The identification of this fountain with Mouhdi, or Muwaylith, is approved by many commentators.

HAGARENES', HA'GARITES (Psa. 83:6,

חַגְרִי, A. V. Hagarenes, R. V. Hagarenes, marg. Hagrites; 1 Chron. 5:10, חַגְרִי, A. V. Hagarites, R. V. Hagrites; 19, 20, חַגְרִי, A. V. Hagarites, R. V. Hagrites; comp. 27:31, חַגְרִי, A. V. Hagerite, R. V. Hagrite; LXX, Ἀγαρῆνοι, 'Agaraiōi, a nation living east of Palestine who were disposed by Reuben, Gad, and east Manasseh, in the days of Saul. To this time 1 Chron. 5:10 refers. Vers. 18-22 seem at first sight to refer to the days of Jotham and Jeroboam II. But we incline to think that v. 18 is a resumption of the narrative of v. 10, which is interrupted by the genealogy of Gad (vers. 11, 17), the more because Pekah, in whose reign the first captivity took place (2 Kings 15:29), was contemporary with Jotham (2 Kings 15:32), so that little time would be left for the occupation by Israel (1 Chron. 5:21).

The power of the Hagarenes is shown by the force sent against them (1 Chron. 5:18), and their wealth in flocks and herds by the spoil (v. 21). Their subsequent hostility appears from Psa. 83:6, where they are mentioned next to Moab. In 1 Chron. 27:31 Jaziz, the Hagrite, keeps the flocks of David, very likely in his ancestral regions. Mibhar, "the son of Haggeri" (מִבְּחָר חַגְרִי), may equally well mean "son of a Hagrite." We need find no discrepancy between this and 2 Sam. 23:36.

"Bani the Gadite," since the two accounts are connected with different periods of David's life, about thirty years apart, and it is not likely that the persons about him were exactly the same.

It is generally supposed that the Hagarites were the descendants of Hagar. This is favored by the fact that of the three names, Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab, which are mentioned in 1 Chron. 5:19, apparently as names of Hagrite tribes or chiefs, two, Jetur and Nephish, appear in Gen. 2:5, 15 as names of sons of Ishmael. In Psa. 83:6 Ishmaelites are distinguished from Hagarites; but it may be as a general and special term, as the Parisians might be distinguished from the French in one passage, and in another all might be called French, or, as among the seven nations of Canaan, one was called especially Canaanites.

Smith (Bib. Dict.) thinks the name and location of the Hagarites may be represented by Hejer, the Agræ of Ptol., v, 19, 2, and Strabo, xvi, 767. Gesenius (12th ed.) thinks that the Ἀγαιοί of Strabo were probably another section of the same race. McClintock and Strong set their limits from the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates to the isthmus of Suez. We only know them by the land taken from them east of Gilend; but as a pastoral tribe they no doubt traversed at different times a good deal of territory. Jetur is thought to be represented by Iturea.—W. H.

HA'GERITE (Heb. הַגֵּרִיתִּי, ha-hag-ree), a designation of Jaziz (q. v.), who was overseer of David's flocks (1 Chron. 27:31). See HAGERITE.

HAG'GAI (Heb. חַגַּי, khag-gah'ee, festive), the tenth in order of the twelve minor prophets, and the first of the three who, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian exile, prophesied in Palestine. Of the place and year of his birth, and his descent, nothing is known. He commenced to prophesy in the second year of Darius Hystaspes (Hag. 1:1). Together with Zechariah, he urged the renewal of the building of the temple, which had been suspended after the reign of Cyrus, and obtained the permission and assistance of the king (Ezra 5:1; 6:14). Animated by the high courage of these devoted men, the people prosecuted the work with vigor, and the temple was completed and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius, B. C. 520.

HAG'GAI, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

HAG'GERI (Heb. חַגְרִי, hag-ree', a Hagerite). "Mibhar, son of Haggeri," was one of the mighty men of David's guard, according to the catalogue of 1 Chron. 11:38. The parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:36) has "Bani the Gadite."

HAG'GI (Heb. חַגִּי, khag-ghee', festive), the second of the seven sons of the patriarch Gad (Gen. 46:16), and progenitor of the family of Haggites (Num. 26:15).

HAGGI'AH (Heb. חַגִּי'אֵה, khag-ghee-yaw', festival of Jehovah), a Levite of the family of Merari, apparently the son of Shimea and the father of Asaiah, which last seems to have been contemporary with David (1 Chron. 6:30).

HAG'GITES (Heb. חַגִּיטִים, ha-khag-gee'), the family title of the descendants of HAGGI (q. v.), the son of Gad (Num. 26:15).

HAG'GITH (Heb. חַגִּיתִּי, khag-gheeth', festive), a wife of David, known only as the mother of Adonijah (2 Sam. 3:4; 1 Kings 1:5, 11; 2:13; 1 Chron. 3:2). She was probably married to David after his accession to the throne, B. C. 1000.

HAGIOGRAPHIA (Gr. ἁγιόγραφα, Hag-og'ra-phah, holy writings), a name sometimes applied to the third division of the Scriptures, called by the Jews "The Writings," and consisting of the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Ruth, Esther, Chronicles, Canticles, Lamentations, and Ecclesiastes. This division was so manifestly arbitrary that it was never accepted as a proper one by the Church.

HAI, another form (Gen. 12:8; 13:3) of AI (q. v.).

HAIL. 1. (Gr. χαίρει, khah'ee-reh, be cheerful, rejoice.) A salutation conveying a wish for the welfare of the person addressed (Luke 1:28); continued among our Saxon forefathers in "Joy to you," and "Health to you."

2. Congealed rain (Heb. בָּרָד, baw-rawd'; Gr. χάλαζα, khah'-ad-zah), with which God defeated an army of Canaanites (Josh. 10:11, "the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died"). This phenomenon, which resembled the terrible hail in Egypt (Exod. 9:24), was manifestly a miraculous occurrence produced by the omnipotent power of God, for the hailstones did not injure the Israelites who were pursuing the enemy. That hail, though uncommon, was not absolutely unknown in Egypt, we learn from the testimony of travelers from ancient times to the present. In Palestine, "hail is common, and is often mingled with rain and with thunder storms (comp. Psa. 18:12, 13, etc.), which happen at intervals through the winter, and are frequent in the spring" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 64).

As a hailstorm is generally accompanied by lightning, we find in Scripture hail and fire (i. e., lightning) mentioned together (Exod. 9:23; Psa. 78:48; 105:32, etc.).

Figurative. Hail is the symbol of divine vengeance upon kingdoms and nations, as the enemies of God and his people (Isa. 28:2, 17; 32:19; Hag. 2:17).

HAILSTONE (Heb. אֲבֵן בָּרָד, eh'-ben baw-rawd'), a stone of hail (Josh. 10:11). See above.

HAIR (properly Heb. שֵׂעָר, say-aor'; Gr. θῆκη, threcks). The customs of ancient nations regarding the hair varied considerably.

1. Of the Head. (1) The Egyptians. According to Herodotus, the Egyptians "only left the hair of their head and beard grow in mourning, being at all other times shaved." This agrees perfectly with the authority of the sculptures and of Scripture, where Joseph is said to have "shaved himself," when sent for from prison by Pharaoh (Gen. 41:14). Love of cleanliness seems to have been the motive for this custom, and the priests carried this so far that they shaved the whole body every three days. Even the heads of young children were shaved, certain locks being left at the front, sides, and back. Women always wore their own hair, and they were not shaved even in mourning, or after death. Wigs were also worn, though rather by women than by men (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., pp. 32, 639).

(2) Assyrian. In the Assyrian sculptures the hair always appears long, combed closely down upon the head, and shedding itself in a mass of curls upon the shoulders. Herodotus testifies that the Babylonians wore their hair long. The very long hair, however, that appears in the figures on the monuments is supposed to have been partly false, a sort of headdress to add to the effect of the natural hair.

(3) Greeks. The Greeks of the oldest times regarded long hair in man as an ornament, and only cut it as a sign of mourning. At Athens, down to the Persian wars, the hair was worn long, and fastened up into a knot by a needle in the form of a grasshopper. A free Athenian citizen did not wear his hair very short, or he would have been mistaken for a slave, who would be obliged to do so. The Greek women, to judge from existing monuments, followed an extraordinary variety of fashions, but all of them sought to cover the forehead as much as possible. Hairpins (made of ivory, bronze, silver, and gold), fillets, and nets were used in dressing the hair. Both Greek and Roman ladies tried by artificial means to give their dark hair a fair or ruddy complexion.

(4) Hebrews. The Hebrews bestowed special care on the hair and beard (see below); regarding thick, abundant hair as an ornament, while the bald head was exposed even to insults (2 Kings 2:23). Long flowing hair was worn only by youths in more ancient times (2 Sam. 14:26; Cant. 5:11), and by Nazarites during the term of their vow (Num. 6:5). Women always wore their hair long (Cant. 4:1; Luke 7:38; John 11:2; 1 Cor. 11:15), and put up in plaits (2 Kings 9:30); so the Nazirite (Judg. 16:13, 19). Fashionable ladies were in the habit of curling artificial locks (Isa. 3:24). The fashionable braided hair, in which the Jewesses of a later time probably imitated the style of Roman ladies, is censured by the apostles as unsuitable for Christians (1 Tim. 2:9; 1 Pet. 3:3). Even men began at that time to curl their hair, a practice which was generally condemned (Josephus, Ant., xiv, 9, 4), the usual custom for men being to cut the hair from time to time with a razor (Ezek. 44:20), but without shaving it bare. Female hairdressers, who are first mentioned in the Rabbinical writers, may have existed in more ancient times, for barbers are mentioned in Ezek. 5:1.

2. The Beard. (1) Customs. Western Asiatics have always cherished the beard as the badge of the dignity of manhood, and attached to it the importance of a feature, e. g., the eye or nose. The Egyptians, on the contrary, sedulously, for the most part, shaved the hair of the face and head, and compelled their slaves to do the like.

The enemies of the Egyptians, including probably many of the nations of Canaan, Syria, and Armenia, etc., are represented nearly always bearded. In the Ninevite monuments is a series of battle views from the capture of Lachish, by Sennacherib, in which the captives have beards very like some of those in the Egyptian monuments. There is, however, an appearance of conventionalism both in Egyptian and Assyrian treatment of the hair and beard on monuments, which prevents our accepting it as characteristic.

(2) Hebrew regulations, etc. Among the Hebrews the beard was considered as an ornament, and was not shaven, but only trimmed (2 Sam. 19:25). The dressing, trimming, anointing, etc., of the beard was performed with much ceremony by persons of wealth and rank (Psa. 133:2). The removal of the beard was a part of the ceremonial treatment proper to a leper (Lev. 14:9). Size and fullness of beard are said to be regarded, at the present day, as a mark of respectability and trustworthiness. The beard is the object of an oath, and that on which blessings or shame are spoken of as resting. The custom was and is to shave or pluck it and the hair out in mourning (Isa. 15:2; 50:6; Jer. 41:5; 48:37; Ezra 9:3; Bar. 6:31); to neglect it in seasons of permanent affliction (2 Sam. 19:24), and to regard any insult to it as the last outrage which enmity can inflict (2 Sam. 10:4). The beard was an object of salutation (2 Sam. 20:9), and it was a custom to swear by it (Matt. 5:36). The law forbade the deforming of the head by cutting away the hair round it, and of the beard by cutting the corners (Lev. 19:27). This is understood to mean that the hair was not to be cut in a circle from one temple to another, as among the Arabs; nor that portion of the face where the beard and hair met be shaved. By some these regulations are thought to have reference to the fact that among some nations these customs are part of idolatrous worship.

Figurative. Hair was a symbol of that which was of the least value in man's person (1 Sam. 14:45; 2 Sam. 14:11; 1 Kings 1:52; Matt. 10:30; Luke 12:7; 21:18); of great number (Psa. 40:12; 69:4); a minute distance (Judg. 20:16). White or gray hair is the symbol of honor or authority, and is thus entitled to respect (Lev. 19:32; Prov. 16:31; Dan. 7:9; Rev. 1:14); sometimes of approaching decay, as of Israel (Hos. 7:9). To cover the beard (A. V. "upper lip"), i. e., to cover the face up to the nose, is the sign of mourning (Lev. 13:45), of trouble and shame (Ezek. 24:17; Mic. 3:7), and is really equivalent to covering the head (Jer. 14:4; Esth. 6:12).

HAK'KATAN, or rather KAT'AN (Heb. קטן, kaw-tawn', little, or junior), a descendant (or native) of Azgad, and father of Johanan, which last returned with one hundred and ten male retainers from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:12), B. C. before 457.

HAK'KOZ (1 Chron. 24:10). See Koz.

HAKUPHA (Heb. חקופה, khak'oo-faw', crooked; Fürst, incitement), one of the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53), B. C. about 538.

HA'LAH (Heb. חַלְאָה, khal-akh'), the district in Media into which the captive Israelites were taken by the Assyrian kings (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11); 1 Chron. 5:26), and situated on the banks of the Khabour.

HA'LAH (Heb. חַלְאָה, khal-lawk', bare), the Smooth or Bald Mountain, mentioned in the description of Joshua's conquests in Canaan (Josh. 11:17; 12:7). Doubtless this ridge is referred to in Num. 34:3, 4; Josh. 15:2, 3, under the name Ascent of Akrabbim. Trumbull (Kadesh-Burnea, p. 96) identifies Halak with the present Madara, the bare northern wall of Wady Fegreh, with its smooth rock passes, Es-Sufah and Es-Sufey. Others think it to be the north edge of the Azazim-mountain, inclosing the wilderness of Zin.

HALE. See GLOSSARY.

HAL'HUL (Heb. חַלְחוּל, khal-khool', full of hollows), a town in the highlands of Judah, in which tradition says Gad, the seer of David, was buried (Josh. 15:58); preserved in the ruins of Halhul, an hour and a half north of Hebron.

HAL'LI (Heb. חַלְלִי, khal-ee', jewel), one of the towns assigned to Asher (Josh. 19:25), not definitely located.

HALL. See HOUSE.

HALLEL (Heb. הַלְלֵל hal-lale', Gr. ἕμνος, hoom'-nos, praise), the name of a particular part of the hymnal service chanted at certain festivals. This service received the designation "hallel" because it consists of Psalms 113-118, which are psalms of praise and begin with Hallelujah. It is also called the "Egyptian Hallel," because it was chanted in the temple while the Passover lambs, first enjoined in Egypt, were slain. This Hallel was also chanted after the morning sacrifice on the Feast of Pentecost, the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles, and the eight days of the Feast of Dedication. It was chanted too in gunning and close of many of the Psalms (see Psa. 106, 111, 113, 117, 135). In the great hymn of triumph in heaven over the destruction of Babylon the large multitude in chorus, like the voice of mighty thunders, burst forth, "Allelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth," in response to the voice from the throne saying, "Praise our God, all ye his servants" (Rev. 19:1-6).

HALLO'HESH, or rather LO'CHESH (Heb. הַלְלוֹחֵשׁ, hal-lo khashe', enchanter), the father of Shallum, which latter assisted Nehemiah in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:12), where the name is Anglicized "Halohesh." He was one of the popular chiefs who covenanted with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:24). B. C. 445.

HALLOW, HALLOWED (Heb. קָדַשׁ, kawdash', to set apart, consecrate; Gr. ἀγιάζω, hag-eead'-zo, to make sacred). Spoken of a person who consecrates himself to God (Isa. 65:5); of Christ undergoing death to consecrate himself to God (John 17:19; comp. 10:36; Gal. 1:15); of things, e. g., the altar, the temple (Exod. 29:36; Lev. 8:15; Num. 7:1; 1 Kings 8:64); the Sabbath in keeping it holy (Exod. 20:8, etc.). In general, Christians are the hallowed (Acts 20:32; 26:18, A. V. "sanctified"), as those who, freed from impurity, have been brought near to God through their faith and sanctity. See SANCTIFICATION.

HALO'HESH (Neh. 3:12). See HALLOHESH.

HALT. See GLOSSARY; DISEASES.

HAM (Heb. חָם, khamm, hot), the youngest of the three sons of Noah (Gen. 5:32). Like his brothers he was married at the time of the Deluge, and with his wife was saved from destruction in the ark (7:13). After the Deluge he provoked the wrath of his father by an act of indecency toward him and reaped the patriarch's curse (9:21, sq.). A list of his descendants is given in chap. 10:6-18, as follows:

HAM.

I. CUSH.	II. MIZRAIM.	III. PHUT.	IV. CANAAN.
1. Seba; 2. Havilah; 3. Sabtah; 4. Raamah; 5. Sabtechs; 6. Nimrod.	1. Ludim; 2. Ananin; 3. Lehabim; 4. Naphtulin; 5. Pathrusim; 6. Casluhim; Caphtoric;		1. Sidon; 2. Heth; 3. Jebusite; 4. Amorite; 5. Girgashite; 6. Hivite; 7. Arkite; 8. Sinitte; 9. Arvadite; 10. Zemarite; 11. Hamathite.
Sheba; Dedan.	Philistin.

private families on the first evening of Passover. The Great Hallel was so called because of the reiterated response after every verse, "For thy mercy endureth forever" (Psa. 136). It was recited on the first evening of the Passover, at the supper, by those wishing to have a fifth cup, i. e., one above the enjoined number. The hymn sung by Jesus and his disciples after the Last Supper (Matt. 26:30) is supposed to have been part of this Hallel.

HALLELUJAH (Heb. הַלְלֵי יְהוָה, hal-leh-loo'-yah, praise ye Jah, i. e., Jehovah; Gr. ἀλληλοῦν, al-lay-loo'-ee-ah), evidently a common form of adoration and thanksgiving in Jewish worship, as appears from its frequent employment at the be-

Cush, Mizraim, and Phut were the progenitors of the tribes that peopled Africa, and Canaan became the father of those that principally occupied Phœnicia and Palestine. "Glasser has identified the Khan (Ham) of the biblical list of races with the 'Amu' (viz., worshippers of 'Am') of the Egyptian inscriptions" (Recent Research. in Bib. Land, p. 141). The name of Ham alone, of the three sons of Noah, if our identification be correct, is known to have been given to a country (Psa. 78:51; 105:23; 106:22).

NOTE.—Gen. 9:24: "His younger son." It is questionable whether the adjective "younger" literally, "little") is to be taken as comparative, in the sense of "the younger," or as superlative, meaning "the youngest." Keil and Delitzsch (Com., in loco.) prefer the former, and take the order in which the three names stand as an indication of their relative ages. Others accept the superlative and consider Ham to be the youngest son (McC. and S., Cyc.). Gen. 9:25: "Cursed be Canaan!" "To understand the words of Noah with reference to his sons we must bear in mind, on the one hand, that as the moral nature of the patriarch was transmitted by generation to his descendants, so the diversities of character in the sons of Noah foreshadowed diversities in the moral inclinations of the tribes of which they were the heads; and, on the other hand, that Noah, through the Spirit and power of that God with whom he walked, discerned in the moral nature of his sons, and the different tendencies which they already displayed, the germinal commencement of the future course of their posterity, and uttered words of blessing and of curse, which were prophetic of the history of the tribes that descended from them" (K. and D., Com.).

"HAM, THEY OF" (1 Chron. 4:40) (Heb. מִן־חָמ, min-hamm). The Simeonites, wishing to extend their territory, "went to the entrance of Gedor" (q. v.), and there found these Hamites who "dwelt there of old." They may have been Egyptian Cushites, or even Canaanites (1 Chron. 1:8). This only is certain, that they were a peaceful shepherd people, dwelling in tents, and therefore nomads.

HAM'AN (Heb. חָמָן, ham-mawn', foreign derivation), the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, prime minister of Ahasuerus, the Persian king (Esth. 3:1), B. C. after 486. As Agag was a title of the kings of the Amalekites, it is supposed that Haman was descended from the royal family of that nation. He, or his father, probably found their way to Persia as captives or hostages. His intrigues against Mordecai and the Jews, the discovery of his plot, and his own execution, are graphically delineated in the Book of Esther. Pridaux (Connexion, anno 453) computes the sum which he offered to pay into the royal treasury at more than two million sterling pounds (ten million dollars).

HAM'MATH (Heb. חָמַת, kham-awth', fortress), a very ancient city, and capital of the upper Syria, in the valley of the Orontes, and most important town, as Shalmanezar claims to have captured eighty-nine towns belonging to it (Sayce). Originally a Canaanite colony (Gen. 10:18). In the time of Hezekiah it was taken by the Assyrians (2 Kings 18:34) and was annexed to the Assyrian empire, B. C. 720. It was located in a fertile and well watered valley at the foot of Lebanon. Its modern name is "Hamah," and it is here that those inscribed stones, called "Hamath" stones, were first noticed by Burckhardt in 1810, afterward rediscovered by Sir Richard Burton and Tyrwhitt Drake, and of which squeezes were shown in London in 1872 which are now known to be "Hittite."

HAM'ATHITE (Heb. חָמַתִּי, kham-aw-thee'), the inhabitants (Gen. 10:18; 1 Chron. 1:16), or rather founders of HAMATH (q. v.). The Hamathites were a Hamitic race, closely akin to the Hittites, on whom they bordered and with whom they were generally in alliance.

HAM'MATH-ZO'BAH (Heb. חָמַת צוֹבָה, kham-ath' tso-baw', fortress of Zobah, 2 Chron. 8:3), supposed to be the same as HAMATH (q. v.). Some think it different, and distinguished therefrom by the suffix "Zobah."

HAM'MATH (Heb. חָמַת, kham-math', warm springs), one of the fortified cities in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh. 19:35). It is not possible from this list to determine its position, but the notices of the Talmudists leave no doubt that it was near Tiberias, one mile distant—in fact, that it had its name, Chammath, "hot baths," because it contained those of Tiberias. Josephus mentions it under the name of Emmaus as a village not far from Tiberias. The Hammam, at present three in number, still send up their hot and sulphureous water at a spot rather more than a mile south of the modern town. In the list of Levitical cities given out of Naphtali (Josh. 21:32) the name of this place seems to be given as Hammoth-dor, and in 1 Chron. 6:76 it is further altered to Hammon.

HAMMED'ATHA (Heb. חָמַדְאָתָא, ham-med-aw-thaw'), father of the infamous Haman, and commonly designated as "the Agagite" (Esth. 3:1, 10; 8:5; 9:24), though also without the title (9:10).

HAM'MELECH (Heb. חָמֶלֶךְ, ham-meh-lek', the king), father of Jerahmeel, which latter was one of those commanded by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. 36:26), B. C. before 605. It is uncertain whether this was the same with Hammelech, the father of Malchiah, into whose dungeon Jeremiah was afterward cast (Jer. 38:6), B. C. before 589. Others, however, regard the word in both cases as an appellative, referring in the first passage to Jehoiakim and in the latter to Zedekiah. Compare HAMMOLEKETH.

HAMMER is the rendering of several Hebrew words:

1. Pat-teesh' (Heb. פַּת־טֵישׁ), used by the gold-beater (Isa. 41:7) and the quarryman (Jer. 23:29).
2. Mak-kaw-baw' (Heb. מַקְכָּוֶבָה), probably a tool for hollowing, as the pointed hammer of the stone cutter and smith (1 Kings 6:7; Isa. 44:12), and, generally, any workman's hammer (Judg. 4:21, where the form is mak-keh'-beth, מַקְכָּוֶבֶת; Jer. 10:4).
3. Hal-mooth' (Heb. חַלְמוֹתַי, only in Judg. 5:26), probably a heavy wooden mallet used for driving in the tent pins.
4. Kay-laf' (Heb. קַי־לַף, Psa. 74:6), a heavy hammer, a maul.

Figurative. The hammer is used symbolically for the word of God (Jer. 23:29), and for Babylon as a destructive agency (Jer. 50:23).

HAMMOL'EKETH (Heb. חַמּוֹלֵקֶת, ham-moleh'-keth, the queen), a woman introduced in the genealogies of Manasseh as daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Chron. 7:17, 18), and as having among her three children Abiezer, from whose family sprang the great judge Gideon. The Jewish tradition is that "she used to reign over a portion of the land that belonged to Gilead," and that for that reason her lineage has been preserved. See HAMMELECH.

HAMMON (Heb. חָמוֹן, kham-mone', warm).
1. A town in the territory of Asher (Josh.

19:28), apparently midway between Naphtali and Sidon. Present site not certain.

2. A Levitical city of Naphtali assigned to the Gershonites (1 Chron. 6:76), and answering to the similar names of HAMMATH and HAMMOTH-DOR (q. v.).

HAM'MOTH-DOR (Heb. חַמְמוֹת דּוֹר, kham-moth' dore, hot springs of Dor), a city of Naphtali (Josh. 21:32); probably the same with HAMMATH (q. v.).

HAM'ONAH (Heb. חַמְוֹנָה, ham-o-naw', multitude), the figurative name of the place in the valley in which the burial of Gog and his forces are prophetically announced to take place (Ezek. 39:16).

HAM'ON-GOG (Heb. חַמְוֹן גּוֹג, ham-one' gog, multitude of Gog), the name given by the prophet Ezekiel (39:11) to the valley in which the slaughtered army of Gog are described as being buried. See Gog.

HAMOR (Heb. חַמּוֹר, kham-ore', a he-ass), a Hivite, from whom (or his sons) Jacob purchased the plot of ground in which Joseph was afterward buried (Gen. 33:19; Josh. 24:32; Acts 7:16, in which last passage the name is Anglicized Emmor), and whose son, Shechem, seduced Dinah (Gen. 34:2). As the latter appears to have founded the city of Shechem, Hamor is also named as the representative of its inhabitants (Judg. 9:28), in the time of Abimelech. Neither his character and influence (indicated by his title "prince"), nor his judicious behavior in the case of his son, saved him from the indiscriminate massacre by Dinah's brothers.

HAMU'EL (Heb. חַמּוּאֵל, kham-moo-ale', heat, or anger of God), the son of Mishma and (apparently) father of Zacchur, of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:26).

HAM'UL (Heb. חַמּוּל, khaw-mool' pitted, spared), the second of the two sons of Pharez, son of Judah (1 Chron. 2:5). He could not have been born, however, before the migration of Jacob into Egypt (as appears to be stated in Gen. 46:12), since Pharez was not at that time grown up (38:29).

HAM'ULITES (Heb. חַמּוּלִי, khaw-moo-lee'), the descendants (Num. 26:21) of Hamul.

HAMU'TAL (Heb. חַמּוּטָל, kham-oo-tal', kinsman of the dew), daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, wife of King Josiah and mother of King Jehohaz (2 Kings 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1), B. C. 639.

HANAM'EEL (Heb. חַנְמָאֵל, khan-am-ale', perhaps God has given), the son of Shallum and cousin of Jeremiah, to whom, while Jerusalem was besieged, he sold a field in Anathoth (Jer. 32:6-12), B. C. about 590. The prohibition to sell Levitical estates applied merely to their alienating them from the tribe. "The transaction was intended to evince the certainty of restoration from the impending exile by showing that possessions, which could be established by documents, would be of future value to the possessor" (vers. 13-15).

HAN'AN (Heb. חַנָּן, khaw-nawn', merciful).

1. One of the sons (or descendants) of Shashak, one of the chief men of Benjamin, residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:23), B. C. before 1050.

2. The last named of the six sons of Azel the Benjaminite (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

3. Son of Maachah, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:43), B. C. 1000.

4. One of the Nethinim whose posterity were among those that returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:49), B. C. 536.

5. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the law to the people (Neh. 8:7), B. C. 445. He also sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah (10:10). He is probably the same as the one mentioned in chap. 13:13, as the son of Zaccur, who, on account of his integrity, was appointed to distribute the Levitical revenues among his brethren.

6. A chief of the people who subscribed the covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:22). The same name occurs in ver. 26.

7. The son of Igdaliah, and an officer about the Lord's house. Into the chamber of his sons Jeremiah brought the Rechabites in order to test their temperance (Jer. 35:4), B. C. about 607.

HANAN'EEL, TOWER OF (Heb. חַנְנְיָאֵל, khan-an-ale', God has favored), a tower which formed part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). From these two passages, particularly from the former, it might almost be inferred that Hananeel was but another name for the Tower of Meah; at any rate they were close together, and stood between the sheep gate and the fish gate. This tower is further mentioned in Jer. 31:38. The remaining passage in which it is named (Zech. 14:10) also connects this tower with the "corner gate," which lay on the other side of the sheep-gate (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

HANA'NI (Heb. חַנְנִי, khan-aw-nee', gracious).

1. One of the sons of Heman, appointed by lot, in the time of David, for the service of song in the sanctuary. Hanani had charge of the eighteenth division (1 Chron. 25:4, 25), B. C. after 1000.

2. A prophet who rebuked Asa, king of Judah, for seeking help from the king of Syria against Baasha, king of Israel. In punishment for his defection from the true God, Hanani threatened him with wars during the remainder of his reign. Enraged at the prophet's boldness, the king put him in prison (2 Chron. 16:7-10), B. C. 879. This Hanani is probably the same with the father of the prophet Jehu, who denounced Baasha (1 Kings 16:1, 7) and King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19:2; 20:34).

3. One of the sons (or descendants) of Immer, who had taken a strange wife during the captivity (Ezra 10:20).

4. One of the "brethren" of Nehemiah, who, with others, went from Jerusalem to Shushan, sent probably by Ezra, and brought information concerning the condition of the returned Jews. Their information probably led to the mission of Nehemiah (Neh. 1:2). Hanani returned to Judea, and, together with one Hananiah, was placed in charge of the gates of Jerusalem, to see that they were opened and shut at the proper hours, morning and evening (7:2), B. C. 445.

5. A priest, one of the musicians who officiated in the ceremonial of purifying the walls of Jerusalem when they had been rebuilt (Neh. 12:36), B. C. 445.

HANANĪ'AH (Heb. חַנַּנְיָאֵה, khan-an-yaw', Jehovah has favored).

1. One of the sons of Zerubbabel, who was of the family of David (1 Chron. 3:19). His sons are given as Pelatiah and Jesaiiah (ver. 21).

2. One of the sons of Shishak, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:24).

3. A son of Heman, appointed by David to take charge of the sixteenth division of Levitical musicians (1 Chron. 25:4, 23), B. C. about 1000.

4. "One of the king's captains" in the army of Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Chron. 26:11), B. C. after 783.

5. An Israelite, of the family of Bebai, who renounced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:28), B. C. 456.

6. "The son of one of the apothecaries" (or makers of the sacred ointments and incense, Exod. 30:22-38), who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8), B. C. 445. Possibly the same with No. 5.

7. The son of Shelemiah, and one of the priests who repaired the wall of Jerusalem opposite their houses, "from above the horse gate" (Neh. 3:30), B. C. 445.

8. The "ruler of the palace," and the person who was associated with Nehemiah's brother, Hanani, in charge of the gates of Jerusalem. He is described as "a faithful man," and one that "feared God above many" (Neh. 7:2), B. C. 445. His office seems to have been one of authority and trust, and perhaps the same as that of Eliakim, who was "over the house" in the reign of Hezekiah.

9. The name of one of the "chief of the people" who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people to serve the Lord (Neh. 10:23), B. C. 445.

10. A priest, apparently son of Jeremiah, after the captivity (Neh. 12:12); probably the same with one of those who celebrated the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (ver. 41), B. C. 44".

11. Son of Azur, a prophet of Gibeon, who uttered false prophecies in the fourth year of Zedekiah, king of Judah. He publicly prophesied in the temple that within two years Jaconiah and his fellow-captives, with the vessels of the Lord's house, which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away to Babylon, should be brought back to Jerusalem. He sought to uphold his prophecy by taking off from the neck of Jeremiah the yoke which he wore by divine command (Jer. 27:2), in token of the subjection of Judea and the neighboring countries to the Babylonian empire. Jeremiah was bidden to go and tell Hananiah that for the wooden yokes which he had broken he should make yokes of iron, "that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar." Jeremiah also added this rebuke and denunciation: "Hear, now, Hananiah: The Lord hath not sent thee; but thou makest this people to trust in a lie. Therefore, thus saith the Lord: Behold, I will cast thee from off the face of the earth: this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord. So Hananiah the prophet died the same year in the seventh month" (Jer. 28:1-17), B. C. about 593. "The history of Hananiah is of great interest, as throwing much light upon the Jewish politics of that eventful time, divided as parties were into the partisans of Babylon on one hand, and Egypt on the other. It also exhibits the machinery of false prophecies, by which the irreligious party sought to promote their own policy in a very distinct form" (McC. and S., Cyc.).

12. The father of Zedekiah, who was one of the princes to whom Michaiah reported Baruch's reading of Jeremiah's prophecies (Jer. 36:12), B. C. about 604.

13. The grandfather of Irijah, the captain of the guard at the gate of Benjamin, who arrested the prophet Jeremiah upon the supposition that he intended to desert to the Chaldeans (Jer. 37:13), B. C. 597.

14. The original name of Shadrach, one of the three Hebrew children, by which latter name he is better known (Dan. 1:6, 7, 11, 19; 2:17).

HAND (Heb. יָד, yawd, the open palm; חֲזֵק, kaph, the hollow of the hand; Gr. χεῖρ, khire).

Figurative. Being the member of the body which is chiefly employed in active service, the hand is used in Scripture with a great variety of applications founded upon and suggested by this natural employment, thus: (1) Hands are the symbols of human action; pure hands represent pure actions, unjust hands injustice; while "hands full of blood" denote actions stained with cruelty, etc. (Psa. 90:17; Job 9:30; 1 Tim. 2:8; Isa. 1:15). (2) Washing the hands was a symbol of innocence (Deut. 21:6, 7; Psa. 26:6; Matt. 27:24). (3) The hand, in general, was the symbol of power and strength, especially the right hand (Exod. 15:6; Psa. 17:7). "Holding by the right hand" was expressive of support (Psa. 73:23; Isa. 41:13); standing at it: right hand indicated protection (Psa. 16:8; 109:31 110:5); to lean upon the hand of another was a mark of familiarity, as well as of superiority (2 Kings 5:18; 7:17); to give the hand, as to a master, was a sign of submission (2 Chron. 30:8, margin), and to kiss the hand denoted homage, (1 Kings 19:18; Job 31:27); pouring water on another's hands signified to serve him (2 Kings 3:11), to "seal up the hand" is to prevent one from working; e. g., by reason of the cold (Job 4:7); to withdraw the hand is to withhold support (Psa. 74:11), while to cut it off was to practice extreme self-denial (Matt. 5:30). The open hand is figurative of liberality (Deut. 15:8; Psa. 104:28), the closed hand of illiberality (Deut. 15:7). The right hand was used to indicate the South, and the left the North (Job 23:9; 1 Sam. 23:19; 2 Sam. 24:5). The right hand was the place of honor (1 Kings 2:19) and power (Mark 14:62). "I will turn my hand upon thee" (Isa. 1:25) signifies a movement of the hand, hitherto at rest, either for the purpose of inflicting punishment upon the person named (Amos 1:8; Jer. 6:9; Ezek. 88:12; Psa. 81:14), or, though this is seldom the case, for the purpose of saving one (Zech. 13:7).

Customs. Men lifted up their hands in prayer (Job 11:13; 1 Tim. 2:8), also in taking an oath (Gen. 14:22, etc.); smote the hands together over the head as a gesture of extreme grief (2 Sam. 13:19; Jer. 2:37); the accuser stood at the right hand of the accused in a trial (Psa. 109:6; Zech. 3:1); the right hand of the priest was touched with blood of the consecration ram (Exod. 29:20; Lev. 8:23, 24). The Jews washed their hands before eating (Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:3), or after touching an unclean person (Lev. 15:11); servants were directed by movements of the hand of master or mistress (Psa. 123:2); the hand was kissed in idolatrous worship (Job 31:27); treaties were made and sureties entered into by joining hands (2 Kings 10:15; Job 17:3; Prov. 6:1; 17:18); the hand was placed under the thigh of a person to whom an oath was made (Gen. 24:2, 3; 47:29, 31); joy was shown by clapping the hands (2 Kings 11:12; Psa. 47:1); while smiting them together expressed extreme anger (Num. 24:10; Ezek. 21:14, 17).

HANDICRAFTS.

The word handicraft is not found in Scripture, and yet it is very appropriate, inasmuch as most of the mechanical work of olden times was performed by hand.

I. Early Notices. Examples of handicraft as applied to the ordinary needs of life occur in the mythical ages of Greece, Hephaestus representing the gods in this kind of industry. The only artisans mentioned in Homeric poems are builders, carpenters, potters, and workers in leather, and metal. The first craftsman we read of in Scripture, Tubal-Cain (Gen. 4:22) was a worker in metals, indicating that metal-working was one of the earliest crafts among the Hebrews. This circumstance becomes so much the more significant as the general Hebrew term for an artisan, חָדָשׁ, haw-dawsh, primitively denotes a worker in metals, or at least in some hard material. The Hebrews, when they left Egypt, had among them skilled workmen in gold, silver, brass, wood, leather, as is evident from the building of the tabernacle. But, when these artists died, the development of the mechanical arts seemed to have come to a standstill (Judg. 5:8; 1 Sam. 13:19). Even in the time of Solomon the Hebrews needed the teaching of the Phœnicians (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Kings 6:1, sq.; 7:13, sq.).

Manual labor was generally held in low esteem by the Greeks, in later times many free citizens declining to engage in it at all. The Romans also seem to have thought that there was something objectionable in mechanical labor, and in many wealthy homes this was mostly done by slaves. To pursue a trade was, at least in later times, not considered degrading among the Jews. Indeed, at this time all the rabbinical authorities were working at some trade, and it became the fashion to affect hard labor: the great Hillel being a woodcutter; his rival Shammai a carpenter; and among the celebrated rabbis of after times we find shoemakers, tailors, carpenters, sandal makers, smiths, potters, builders, etc. Nor were they ashamed of their manual labor. It was a rabbinical principle, that "Whoever does not teach his son a trade, is as if he brought him up to be a robber."

II. Corporations. In Egypt each class of workmen recognized one or more chiefs—the masons their master-mason, etc.—who looked after their interests and represented them before the local authorities. It is said that among the Greeks even the robbers were united in a corporation like others, and maintained an accredited superior as their representative with the police, to discuss the somewhat delicate questions which their trade gave occasion to. Most of the workmen who formed a state corporation lodged, or at least all of them had their stalls in the same quarter or street, under the direction of their chief. In Chaldea "every workman taught his own trade to his children, and these in turn would instruct theirs; families which had an hereditary profession, or from generation to generation had gathered bands of workmen about them, formed themselves into various guilds, or, to use the customary term, into tribes governed by chiefs and following specific customs. The organization was like that of Egypt, but more fully developed." (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 310, 753).

The Palestinian workmen, though they kept by each other, had no exclusive guilds; the principle of "free trade," so to speak, prevailing among them. Bazaars and streets were named after them. In Alexandria there were excellent Jewish workmen, arranged in guilds in their great synagogues. The guild of coppersmiths there was represented by one in Jerusalem, organized under its Rabbim or chief, with a synagogue and burial place of its own.

Below is presented further information respecting the several handicrafts mentioned in Scripture.

APOTHECARY (Exod. 30:25, 35; 37:29; Eccles. 10:1), rendered "confectionaries" (1 Sam. 8:13). See PERFUMER, below; article PERFUME.

ARMORER. In 1 Sam. 8:12, it is recorded that Samuel told the Israelites that if they chose a king he would take their sons and set them to make his instruments of war; i. e., to be engaged in the arts of warfare rather than in those of peace. As to the work of the armorer, it can be better understood by consulting article ARMOR.

BAKER (Heb. בָּאֵר, aw-faw, to cook), makers of bread and pastry, a department then more varied than that of cook (Gen. 40:1, sq.; 41:10; Hos. 7:4, 6). In Jer. 37:21 it is stated that bread was brought daily "out of the baker's street," a baker's bazaar, which would indicate that bakers formed a guild by themselves.

BRICKMAKER. "Brickmaking, a mere manual occupation, with nothing to stimulate the clever workman to improvement, was only followed by the meanest of the community, who had not even the satisfaction of working for themselves; for bricks were a government monopoly, and the pay for a tale of them was a small remuneration for this laborious drudgery in mud. The employment of numerous captives, who worked as slaves, would in any case have enabled the government to sell the bricks at a lower price than those persons who had recourse solely to free labor." See article BRICK.

CALKER (Heb. פִּרְזֵה, beh'-dek, a gap), a repairer of leaks in a vessel (Ezek. 27:9, 27), where Tyre is represented as a ship.

CARPENTER. See WOOD, WORKERS IN, below.

CARVER, the rendering of six Hebrew words, meaning to engrave, sculpture, and carve. Carving was carried on to a great extent by the Egyptians both upon buildings and furniture. The arts of carving and engraving were much in demand in the building of the tabernacle and the temple (Exod. 31:5; 35:33; 1 Kings 6:18, 35; Psa. 74:6), as well as in the ornamentation of the priestly dresses. Carving of timber is mentioned (Exod. 31:8), and a minute description of the process of idol making is given in Isa. 44:13, sq.

CONFECTIONER. See PERFUMER, below; article PERFUME.

DYER. This word does not occur in Scripture, but we have mention of skin dyed, and of various colored curtains in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:4, 5; 26:14, etc.), and of Lydia, as a seller of purple (Acts 16:14). The dyeing of purple was actively carried on, especially in Thyatira, and an inscription found there particularly mentions the guild of dyers of that place.

EMBALMING, a distinct craft. See article ENBALS.

EMBROIDERER. See articles EMBROIDER; NEEDLEWORK.

FULLER (Heb. כַּוֵּשׂ, kaw-bus', to wash; Gr. γναφεῖς, gnaf-yuce', a clothes dresser). The art of the fuller is of great antiquity, and seems to have, at a very early period, reached a comparative degree of perfection. Many persons, both men and women, were engaged in cleaning cloths and stuffs of various kinds, and the occupations of the fuller form some of the subjects of Egyptian sculptures. It is probable that they were only a subdivision of the dyers. The trade of the fullers, so far as it is mentioned in Scripture, appears to have consisted chiefly in cleansing garments and whitening them (Mark 9:3). The process of fulling and cleansing cloth, so far as it may be gathered from the practice of other nations, consisted in treading or stamping on the garments with the feet or with bats in tubs of water, in which some alkaline substance answering the purpose of soap had been dissolved. "In early times, before and even after the invention of soap, potash, niter, and several earths were employed for cleaning cloths, as well as various herbs, many of which are still in use among the Arabs" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., ii, p. 166). The "fuller's field" (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 7:3; 36:2) was near Jerusalem, and its mention would seem to indicate that it was a well-known resort of this craft. See FULLER'S FIELD, SOAP.

GARDENER. See GARDEN, AGRICULTURE.

GLASS WORKER. Discoveries in Egypt show that the Egyptians were acquainted with the use of glass as early as B. C. 1600. Glass blowing, the blowpipe, and furnace are clearly indicated by the monuments. A glass bead found at Thebes bears the name of a Pharaoh who lived about B. C. 1450; glass bottles are met with on the monuments of the fourth dynasty, dating back more than four thousand years ago. "Pliny ascribes the discovery of glass to some Phœnician sailors accidentally lighting a fire on the seashore; but if an effect of chance, the secret is more likely to have been arrived at in Egypt, where natron (subcarbonate of soda) abounded, than by the seaside." There is little doubt that the honor of the discovery belongs to the Egyptians. Glass was not only known to the ancients, but used by them far more extensively than in modern times. The Egyptians knew the art of cutting, grinding, and engraving it, and they could even inlay it with gold or enamel, and "permeate opaqu^e glass with designs of various colors." Besides this they could color it with such brilliancy as to be able to imitate precious stones in a manner which often defied detection. The principal use to which glass was applied by the Egyptians, besides beads and fancy work, was for the manufacture of bottles, vases, and other utensils. Egyptian porcelain should, perhaps, be called glass porcelain, as partaking of the quality of the two. The Assyrians were also acquainted with the art. Glass was not applied in ancient times to windows.

GOLDSMITH (Heb. תְּרַפֵּס, tso-rafe', Neh. 3:8, 32; Isa. 40:19; 41:7; 46:6), a melter of gold ("refiner," Mal. 3:2, 3). From the remotest ages gold has been used for jewelry and articles of luxury.

Thus we read of a "ring" and a "gold chain" being given to Joseph by Pharaoh (Gen. 41:42), and the borrowing of "jewels of silver, and jewels of gold" from the Egyptians by the Israelites (Exod. 11:2). The sculptures of Thebes and Beni Hassan show, by their numerous representations of gold and silver vases, inlaid work, and jewelry, in common use, the great advancement the Egyptians had made in the art of goldsmithing.

"At Beni Hassan the process of washing the ore, smelting, or fusing the metal with the help of the blowpipe, and fashioning it for ornamental purposes, weighing it, and taking an account of the quantity so made up, and other occupations of the goldsmith, are represented; but, as might be supposed, these subjects merely suffice, as they were intended, to give a general indication of the goldsmith's trade, without attempting to describe the means employed" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., ii, 138, sq.).

When gold first began to be used, idols, ornaments, or other objects were made of the metal in its pure state, but later an alloy was added to harden it, and at the same time increase the bulk of the valuable material. Gold leaves were used at an early period, even in the time of the first Osir-tasen; and we find the ark overlaid with pure gold, while gold thread was used for embroidery (Exod. 28:6, 15). The casting of the metal is noticed on the same occasion. See JEWELRY.

GRAVING, ENGRAVING. 1. Khaw-tsab' (Heb. כָּצַב, to cut, haw), although once translated "graven" (Job 19:24), is generally used to indicate the rougher work of hewing (q. v.) stone.

2. Khaw-rash' (Heb. שָׂרַח, to scratch), used to describe "engraving" (Jer. 17:1). It occurs frequently as a noun, and is rendered in the A. V. "engraver," "craftsman," "smith," "artificer," etc. It indicates artistic work with fine instruments, yet it can hardly be understood in the specific sense of our art. Sometimes it appears to mean mason (1 Chron. 14:1), carpenter (14:1), and with iron that of smith.

3. Khaw-kak' (Heb. קָצַח, to hack), a branch of art more nearly coinciding to our idea of engraving. The word is used of engraving a plan or map upon a clay brick (Ezek. 4:1, "portrayed"), of inscribing upon a tablet of stone or metal (Job 19:24), while in Ezek. 23:14 it seems to indicate painting.

4. Peh-sel' (Heb. שָׂסַל, graven image) refers to the operation of the carver or sculptor. For curious details of the fabrication of idols, see Isaiah (30:22; 40:19; 41:7; 44:12-15). From Jeremiah (10:3-9) it would seem that the wrought and prepared metal for covering the idol was imported and put on by Jewish artisans.

5. Paw-thakh' (Heb. פָּתַח, to open) would appear to describe figures in relief, rather than statues, such as the cherubic figures on the temple walls (2 Chron. 3:7). In 1 Kings 6:29, sq., we learn that engraved (A. V. "carved") work of cherubs, palms, and open flowers stood out in relief from the walls. The chief application, however, of the word is to the cutting and engraving of precious stones and metals, such as the breast-plate of the high priest (Exod. 28:9-11, 21), and the plate on his miter (vers. 36, 37). The mystic engraving of Zechariah (3:9) is likewise described in the same terms.

6. Mik-lah'-ath (Heb. מִקְלָחֶיךָ, a sculpture) is rendered "carved figures" (1 Kings 6:29), and "gravings" (7:31). Two other words are used to signify a "graving tool" or "pen" (Isa. 8:1; Jer. 17:1).

Figurative. The prevalent idea of No. 2 is the subtle work of the fine arts, and with this well agrees the use of the word in Prov. 6:18, "the heart that deviseth wicked imaginations" (comp. 1 Sam. 23:9; literally, to forge). In the passage, "Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands" (Isa. 49:16), there is an allusion to the ancient custom of puncturing ornamental figures and mementoes upon the hand, arm, and forehead, and coloring the punctures with indigo, cypress, etc. This gives us the figure of Zion being as close to God as he is to himself, and facing him amid all the emotions of his divine life.

LEATHER, WORKERS IN (Heb. עֹרֵי, ore; Gr. δερμάτινος, der-mat'-ee-nos, Matt. 3:4). The probability is that the Israelites obtained much of their knowledge of the making of leather from the Egyptians. "Part of the process of curing skins is introduced in the sculptures, and that of dyeing them is mentioned in the Bible (Exod. 25:5). In one instance a man is represented dipping the hide into a vase, probably containing water, in which it was suffered to soak, preparatory to the lime being applied to remove the hair, a process very similar to that adopted at the present day in the East. The tanning and preparation of leather was also a branch of art in which the Egyptians evinced considerable skill; the leather cutters constituted one of the principal subdivisions of the fourth class, and a district of the city was exclusively appropriated to them in the Libyan part of Thebes. Of leather they made thongs, shoes, sandals, the coverings and seats of chairs or sofas, bow cases, and most of the ornamental furniture of the chariot; harps were also adorned with colored leather, and shields and numerous other things were covered with skin prepared in various ways" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., ii, p. 92, sq.). Reference is made (2 Kings 1:8; Matt. 3:4) to girdles of leather.

MASON. See article HOUSE; STONE, WORKERS IN, below.

METAL, WORKERS IN.—1. Egyptian. "Iron and copper mines are found in the Egyptian desert, which were worked in old times; and the monuments of Thebes, and even the tombs about Memphis, dating more than four thousand years ago, represent butchers sharpening their knives on a round bar of metal attached to their apron, which from its blue color can only be steel. The skill of the Egyptians in compounding metals is abundantly proved by the vases, mirrors, arms, and implements of bronze discovered at Thebes and in other parts of Egypt; and the numerous methods they adopted for varying the composition of bronze, by a judicious mixture of alloys, are shown in the many qualities of the metal. They had even the secret of giving to bronze (or brass) blades a certain degree of elasticity, as in the dagger of the Berlin Museum, which probably depended on the mode of hammering the metal, and the just proportions of peculiar alloys. . . . The art of soldering metals had long been practiced in Egypt before the time of Glaucus. . . . In coarser work, or those parts which were out of sight, the Egyptians soldered with lead" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 159, sq.).

2. Chaldean. "The Chaldeans made metal implements of copper at an early age, afterward of bronze, and, lastly, of iron. Among the metal founders and smiths all kinds of examples of these were to be found—axes of an elegant and graceful design, hammers and knives, as well as culinary and domestic utensils, cups, caldrons, dishes, mountings of doors and coffers, statuettes of men, bulls, monsters, and gods; ornaments, rings, earrings, bracelets, and ankle rings; and, lastly, weapons of all descriptions—arrow and lance heads, swords, daggers, and rounded helmets with neck piece or visor" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 755, sq.).

3. Israelites. For the working of metals, three different trades were early developed: that of the smith in iron (Isa. 44:12; 2 Chron. 24:12), including the locksmith (2 Kings 24:16); the coppersmith (1 Kings 7:14), and the gold and silver smith (Judg. 17:4, A. V. "founder"). We read of axes and other iron instruments (Num. 35:16; Deut. 19:5; 27:5), while vessels and cooking utensils were of brass (or copper). The working (hammering) of iron was probably known to the patriarchs. In later times arms and other things, formerly made of copper, such as chains, bolts, and armor, were made of iron (comp. Judg. 16:21 with Job 20:24; Psa. 107:16, 149:8; Isa. 45:2). Copper working was not older than of iron, both originating with Tubal Cain (Gen. 4:22), only copper ore, being found more frequently solid in large masses, and more easy to work than iron ore, was more widely spread in earlier ages than iron. Copper was used for all sorts of vessels, weapons, and armor, mirrors (Exod. 38:8), and statues (Dan. 5:4, 23).

Casting was certainly known and practiced among the Hebrews (Judg. 17:4; 1 Kings 7:46; 2 Chron. 4:17). In the last two passages we are told that the workmen employed by Solomon cast the metal vessels, etc., of the temple in the clay soil of Jordan.

Gold was in extensive use from the earliest times, both as a commercial medium and ornament. See JEWELRY.

PERFUMER. The perfumes used in the religious services, and in later times in the funeral rites of monarchs, imply knowledge and practice in the art of the "apothecaries" (i. e., perfumers), who appear to have formed a guild or association (Exod. 30:25, 35; Neh. 3:8; 2 Chron. 16:14; Eccles. 7:1; 10:1; Eccles. 38:8). See OINTMENT, PERFUME.

PLASTERER. See articles HOUSE; PLASTER.

POTTER (Heb. כֹּרֵם, yaw-tsar, to mold; Gr. κεραμικός, ker-am-yooce'). The art of making vessels of earthenware is one of the most common and most ancient of all manufactures. Potters were a very numerous class in Egypt, "and all the processes of mixing the clay, and of burning, baking, and polishing the vases are represented in the tombs of Thebes and Beni Hassan." It is abundantly evident, both that the Hebrews used earthenware vessels in the wilderness, and that the potters' trade was afterward carried on in Palestine. They had themselves been concerned in the potters' trade in Egypt (Psa. 81:6), and the wall paintings minutely illustrate the Egyptian process. The clay, when dug, was trodden by men's feet so as to form a paste (Isa. 41:25; Wisd. 15:7); then placed by the potter on the wheel beside which he sat, and shaped by him with his hands.

How early the wheel came into use in Palestine we know not, but it seems likely that it was adopted from Egypt (Isa. 45:9; Jer. 18:3). It is impossible to fix the period of the invention of the potter's wheel, but the monuments prove that it was known previous to the arrival of Joseph. Many articles were shaped by the hands of the workman, without the aid of the wheel. The vessel was then smoothed and coated with a glaze, and finally burnt in a furnace. There was at Jerusalem a royal establishment of potters (1 Chron. 4:23) from whose employment, and from the fragments cast away in the process, the Potter's Field perhaps received its name (Isa. 30:14).

Figurative. There are several allusions to both the potter and his fabrics: The breaking of pottery is used, from its fragile nature, to illustrate the ease with which God punishes the wicked (Psa. 2:9; Isa. 30:14; Jer. 19:11); from its cheapness, the depreciation of good men (Lam. 4:2). The thorough acquaintance of the potter with both the clay and the vessel that he made therefrom is used to illustrate God's knowledge of men. The power of the potter in molding the clay is used to illustrate the absolute power of God in molding the destinies of men (Rom. 9:21). To place one's self as clay in the hands of God, as the potter, is a striking figure of complete trust and surrender (Isa. 64:8). The phrase "throw to the potter" (Zech. 11:13) is apparently a proverbial expression for contemptuous treatment, although we have no means of tracing its origin satisfactorily. "As the words read, they can only be understood as signifying that the potter was in the house of Jehovah when the money was thrown to him; that he had either some work to do there, or that he had come there to bring some earthenware for the temple kitchens" (see 14:20) (K. and D., Com., in loco).

Egyptian Potters.

ROPE (Heb. רֶבֶב, kheh'-bel, twisted; יָבֵב, ab-oth', twined; Gr. σχοῖον, skhoy-nee'-on, grass withe). Ropes, strings, and various kinds of twine were made by the ancients of flax and other materials. "For large ropes of ordinary quality, and for common purposes, the fibers of the date tree were employed by the Egyptians as at the present day, and many specimens of these durable materials have been found in the excavations of Upper and Lower Egypt. In a tomb at Thebes, of the time of Thothmes III, is represented the process of twisting thongs of leather, which is probably the same as that adopted in ropemaking" (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii, p. 93).

The Scripture references to rope are but few: The binding of Samson with them by Delilah (Judg. 16:11, 12); in Ahithophel's counsel to drag down with ropes the supposed place of David's retreat (2 Sam. 17:13); the servants of the defeated Syrian king, Ben-hadad, coming to Ahab with ropes round their necks (1 Kings 20:31, 32), as a sign of absolute surrender; and in the account of Paul's shipwreck (Acts 27:32).

Figurative. Isaiah directs a woe against those guilty of impiety thus: "Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart rope" (5:18). "There is a bitter sarcasm involved in the bold figure employed. They were proud of their unbelief, but this unbelief was like a halter with which, like beasts of burden, they were harnessed to sin, and therefore to the punishment of sin, which they went on drawing farther and farther, in ignorance of the wagon behind them" (Delitzsch, Com., in loco).

SHIPBUILDER. See article SHIP.

SHOEMAKER. See LEATHER, WORKERS IN, above.

SILVERSMITH. See METALS, WORKERS IN, above.

STONECUTTER. See STONE, WORKERS IN.

STONE, WORKERS IN.—1. Egyptians. The Egyptians, at a remote period, used stone implements; and we find that stone-tipped arrows continued to be occasionally used for hunting long after the metal head had been commonly adopted. The same prejudice in favor of an ancient custom retained the use of stone knives for certain religious purposes, examples of which have been found in excavations and tombs.

"The most ancient buildings in Egypt were constructed of limestone, hewn from the mountains bordering the valley of the Nile; but so soon as the durability of sandstone was ascertained the quarries of Silsilis were opened, and these materials were universally adopted. Immense blocks of stone were quarried here and transported to their destined localities. The obelisks transported from the quarries of Syene, at the first cataracts, to Thebes and Heliopolis, vary in size from seventy to ninety-three feet in length. Small blocks of stone were sent from the quarries by water to their places of destination in boats or on rafts, and if any land carriage was required, they were placed on sledges and rollers; but those of very large dimensions were dragged the whole way by men, overland. . . . The immense weight of stone shows that the Egyptians were well acquainted with mechanical powers and the mode of applying a locomotive force with the most wonderful success. . . . The hieroglyphics on obelisks and other granite monuments are sculptured with a minuteness and finish which is surprising, even if they had used steel as highly tempered as our own" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 156, 308, sq.).

2. Hebrews. Stone work among the Hebrews consisted of the hewing and smoothing of stones and marble for great buildings. They were also skillful in cutting and engraving precious stones for ornaments (Exod. 35:33). From the fact that David secured masons from Hiram (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Chron. 14:1) we infer that the Hebrews were not as skillful as the Tyrians.

As will be seen from the above, the ancients employed substantially the same appliances as are used in working stone to-day, and the great pyramids, temples, aqueducts, etc., of the East testify to their skill.

TAILOR. See article DRESS.

TANNER. See LEATHER, WORKERS IN, above.

TOOLS. Metal workers used the anvil, hammer (Isa. 41:7), tongs, chisel, or graving tool (Exod. 32:4), bellows (Jer. 6:29), melting pot (Prov. 17:3), and for large castings the furnace (Ezek. 22:18).

WEAVER. The weaving of the common, coarser, and finer woolen, linen, cotton, and hair cloths into garments, covers, tent curtains, etc., was the business of the housewives, as well as the spinning of flax, wool, cotton, goat's and camel's hair (Exod. 35:25, sq.; 2 Kings 23:7; Prov. 31:13, 19). But the art of weaving, strictly so called (Exod. 27:16, Heb. מַעֲשֵׂה הַשֵּׁבֶט, mah-as-ay' k'ho-shabe'), with inwrought flowers and figures, was done by men, as well as the weaving of fine byssus, in which the sons of Selah were engaged even in Egypt (1 Chron. 4:21). Hence the particular manipulations of this business were so generally known that in figurative language we often read of the weavers' beam (1 Sam. 17:7; 2 Sam. 21:19), the shuttle (Job 7:6), warp and woof (Lev. 13:48, sq.; Judg. 16:13), etc. "The loom itself, as it happens, is not mentioned in the Old Testament; it was, however, chiefly the high-shafted one common throughout all antiquity, so that the weaver required to stand before it" (Keil, Bib. Arch., ii, p. 228).

WOOD, WORKERS IN.—1. Egyptian. Carpenters and cabinetmakers were a very numerous class of workmen, and their occupations form one of the most important subjects in the paintings which represent the Egyptian trades. From these we learn that the Egyptians made the various wooden parts of houses (doors, etc.), boxes, tables, sofas, chairs, etc. With the carpenters may be mentioned the wheelwrights, makers of coffins, and the coopers; and this subdivision of one class of artisans shows that they had systematically adopted the partition of labor. The makers of chariots and traveling carriages were of the same class. Palanquins, canopies, and wooden chests for traveling and religious purposes were the work of cabinetmakers or carpenters; but the makers of coffins were distinct from both of these. The boat builders and basket makers were subdivisions of workers in wood. The occupation of the cooper was comparatively limited in Egypt, where water and other liquids were carried or kept in skins and earthenware jars; and the skill of the cooper was only required to make wooden measures for grain, which were bound with hoops of either wood or metal. Among the many occupations of the carpenter, that of veneering is noticed in the sculptures of Thebes as early as the time of the third Thothmes" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii, p. 109, sq.).

2. Israelites. As among the Egyptians the carpenter, joiner, carver, sculptor, wagon maker and basket maker all worked in wood. These trades or occupations were probably never strictly separated from one another. Mention of the first three is made in connection with the building of the tabernacle (Exod. 25:10, sq.; 35:30, sq.; 37:1, 10, 15, 25). The Israelitish princes had wagons—covered ones too—in the desert, which they probably brought from Egypt (Num. 7:3), and baskets are mentioned (Num. 6:15, sq.; Deut. 26:2, 4); but of cooping there is not a trace.

3. Tools. "The usual tools, among the Egyptians, of the carpenter were the ax, adz, hand-saw, chisels of various kinds, the drill, and two sorts of planes (one resembling a chisel, the other apparently of stone, acting as a rasp on the surface of the wood, which was afterward polished by a smooth body, probably of stone); and these, with the ruler, plummet, right angle (square), a leather bag containing nails, the hone, and the horn of oil, constituted the principal, and perhaps the only implements he used" (Wilkinson, ii, 111).

Among the Israelites the following tools for carpenters and joiners are incidentally mentioned: the ax, hatchet, saw, plane, level, compass (Isa. 44:13), hammer, and pencil (or red lead).

HANDKERCHIEF (Gr. σουδάριον, soo-dar'-ee-on, sweat cloth). The sudarion is noticed in the New Testament as a wrapper to fold up money (Luke 19:20); as a cloth bound about the head of a corpse (John 11:44; 20:7), being probably brought from the crown of the head under the chin, and, lastly, as an article of dress that could be easily removed (Acts 19:12), probably a handkerchief worn on the head like the keffich of the Bedouins. See DRESS.

HANDLE (Hebrew, plural יָדַיִם, kap-poth', literally hands), the thumb pieces or knobs of the bolt or latch to a door (Cant. 5:5). See LOCK.

HANDMAID or HANDMAIDEN (Heb. יְהוֹדָה, shif-khaw', or מַאֲוָה, aw-maw', Gen. 16:1; Ruth 3:9, etc.; Gr. δοῦλη, doo'-lay, Luke 1:38, etc.). A maidservant, as both Hebrew terms are often translated, the latter being rendered "handmaid" in a deprecatory sense. See SERVICE.

HANDS, IMPOSITION OF. This occurs in Scripture as a patriarchal usage, as Jacob's laying his hands upon the heads of Joseph's children (Gen. 48:14); as well as in later times, when Jesus placed his hands upon children presented to him for his blessing (Matt. 19:15). The imposition of hands formed part of the ceremonial observed on the appointment and consecration of persons, as of Joshua by Moses (Num. 27:18-20; Deut. 34:9); and also sometimes attended the healing of persons by a prophet (2 Kings 4:34), though in this instance Elisha placed his hands upon the hands of the child. In the Gospel age the action was, undoubtedly, used in connection with the bestowal of supernatural gifts, or the miraculous effects of the Holy Spirit (Mark 5:23, 41; 7:32), although our Lord extended his hands over the apostles in blessing them at the Mount of Olives (Luke 24:50). The apostles laid their hands upon sick folk and healed them (Matt. 9:18; Mark 6:5, etc.); and at times also laid their hands upon the baptized, that they might receive the special gifts of the Spirit (Acts 8:15-18; 19:6). A quite natural extension of this practice was to apply it to those who were set apart to the sacred office in the Church—the men already possessed of delegated power and authority proceeding, like Moses in respect to Joshua, to put some of their own honor upon those chosen to the same responsible and dignified position (Acts 14:3; 1 Tim. 4:14). "Not that the mere act could confer any special spiritual power, but it was employed as a fit and appropriate symbol to denote their full and formal consent to the bestowal of the divine gift; and, being accompanied by prayer to Him who alone can really bestow it, might ordinarily be regarded as a sign that the communication had actually taken place."

Ecclesiastical Uses. In the rites of the early Church the imposition of hands was used in confirmation, which generally was an accompaniment of baptism, and symbolized the reception of the Holy Ghost. It was also practiced in ordination (q. v.). In the modern Church the Roman Catholics use the imposition of hands in the ceremonies which precede extreme unction, in ordination and confirmation (in both of which services it has received a sacramental efficacy). In the mass, previous to the consecration of the elements, the priest extends his hands over the people in blessing. The Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal churches employ it as a symbolical act in baptism and confirmation. The Methodist Episcopal, the Presbyterian, and Congregational Churches employ it only in ordination.

HANDSTAFF (Heb. קַלֵּב, mak-kale', a rod or staff), a javelin (Ezek. 39:9). See ARMOR, I, (3).

HANDWRITING (Gr. χειρόγραφον, khi-rog'-raf-on, what one has written with his own hand), specially a note of hand, or writing in which one acknowledges that money has either been deposited with him or lent to him by another, to be returned at an appointed time.

Figurative. It is applied in Col. 2:14 (R. V. "bond") to the Mosaic law, which shows men to be chargeable with offenses for which they must pay the penalty (Thayer, Gr.-Eng. Lex., s. v.).

HANES (Heb. חָנַן, khan-nace'), a place in Egypt only mentioned in Isa. 30:4: "For his princes were at Zoan, and his messengers came to Hanes." Hanes has been supposed by Vitringa, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius to be the same as Heracleopolis Magna in the Heptanomis. This identification depends wholly upon the similarity of the two names; a consideration of the sense of the passage in which Hanes occurs shows its great improbability. We are disposed to think that the Chald. Paraphr. is right in identifying it with Tahpanhes, a fortified town on the eastern frontier (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

HANGING. See PUNISHMENT.

HANGING, HANGINGS, the rendering of three Hebrew terms, two referring to the furnishings of the tabernacle and temple.

1. Maw-savok' (Heb. מַשְׂכָּוֶה, the "hanging" was a curtain or "covering" to close an entrance; one was placed before the door of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:36, 37; 39:38); another was placed before the entrance of the court (Exod. 27:16; 38:18; Num. 4:26); the term is also applied to the veil that concealed the holy of holies (Exod. 35:12; 39:34; 40:21; Num. 4:5).

2. Kel'-lah (Heb. כֶּלֶל, a screen). The "hangings" were used for covering the walls of the court of the tabernacle, just as tapestry was in modern times (Exod. 27:9; 35:17; 38:9; Num. 3:26; 4:26).

3. Bawt-teem' (Heb. בַּיִתֵּי, marg. "houses"), "hangings" (2 Kings 23:7), probably means small tent temples woven by the women for Asherah (comp. 2 Kings 17:30).

HAN'IEL, the less correct form (1 Chron. 7:39) of HANNIEL (q. v.).

HAN'NAH (Heb. חַנָּה, khan-naw', grace, favor), wife of Elkanah (a Levite of Ephrath) and mother of Samuel. Although childless, she was much beloved by her husband, but was greatly distressed by the insults of Elkanah's other wife, Peninnah, who had children. On one of her visits to Shiloh she vowed before the Lord, if he would give her a son, to devote him to his service. Her manner, speaking in an inaudible tone, attracted the attention of the high priest, Eli, who suspected her of drunkenness. From this suspicion she easily vindicated herself, and, receiving a blessing from Eli, returned to her home with a lightened heart. Before the end of the year Hannah became the mother of a son, whom she named Samuel, B. C. about 1106. When Samuel was old enough to dispense with her maternal services Hannah took him to Shiloh and presented him, with due form, to the high priest (1 Sam. 1:1-25). The joy of Hannah found expression in an exulting song of thanksgiving. It is especially remarkable that in this song (2:10) is the first mention in Scripture of the word "anointed" or Messiah, and, as there was no king in Israel at the time, it seems the best interpretation to refer it to Christ. There is also a remarkable resemblance between this song and that of Mary (Luke 1:46, sq.). Hannah came up to Shiloh every year to visit Samuel and to bring him a coat. She received the kindly notice of Eli, and, blessed of God, bare after Samuel three sons and two daughters (2:21).

HAN'NATHON (Heb. חַנְּתוֹן, khan-naw-thone', probably favored), a place on the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:14), apparently about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the valley of Jiphthah-el.

HAN'NIEL (Heb. חַנְּיָאֵל, khan-nee-ale', grace of God).

1. The son of Ephod, prince of the tribe of Manasseh, and one of those appointed by Moses to divide the land among the several tribes (Num. 34:23).

2. One of the sons of Ulla, and a chief of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:39, where the name is less correctly Anglicized Haniel).

HAN'NOCH (Heb. חַנּוֹךְ, khan-oke', initiated).

1. The third son of Midian, and grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33, A. V. "Henock"), B. C. after 2200.

2. The oldest son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; 1 Chron. 5:3), from whom came "the family of the Hanochites" (Num. 26:5), B. C. perhaps about 1640.

HAN'NOCHITES. See HANOCH, 2.

HAN'NUN (Heb. חַנּוּן, khan-noon', favored).

1. The son and successor of Nahash, king of the Ammonites (2 Sam. 10:1, sq.; 1 Chron 19:2-6). David, who had received kindness from Nahash, sent an embassy to condole with Hanun on the death of his father, B. C. about 984. The young king, led by his courtiers, misapprehended the object of the mission and shamefully treated the ambassadors. Their beards were half shaven and their garments cut off at the middle, and in this plight they were sent back to David. News being brought to the king of the affront, he commanded the ambassadors to tarry in Jericho until their beards grew. He vowed vengeance, and Hanun, anticipating war, called to his aid the Syrians. The power of the Syrians, however, was broken in two campaigns, and the Ammonites were left to their fate.

2. A Jew who was associated with the inhabitants of Zanoah in repairing the valley gate of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:13), B. C. 445.

3. The sixth son of Zalaph, who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:30), B. C. 445.

HAP. See GLOSSARY.

HAPHRA'IM (Heb. חַפְרַיִם, khaf-aw-rah'-yim, double pit), a place near the borders of Issachar, mentioned as between Shunem and Shihon (Josh. 19:19). It is identified by Knobel with the village of Afuleh, west of Sulem, and more than two hours N. E. of Lejun.

HAPLY. See GLOSSARY.

HAR'RA (Heb. חַרְרָא, haw-raw', mountainous), a province of Assyria, mentioned (1 Chron. 5:26) as one of the localities to which Tiglath-pilneser deported the two and a half trans-Jordanic tribes. Being joined with Hala, Habor, and the River Gozan, all situated in western Assyria, between the Tigris and Euphrates, we may safely conclude that Hara was in their neighborhood.

HAR'ADAH (Heb. חַרְאָדָּה, khaw-aw-daw', place of terror), the twenty-fifth station of the Israelites in the desert (Num. 33:24); perhaps at the head of the valley northeast of Jebel Araf en Nakah.

HAR'AN (Heb. חַרְאֵן, haw-ravn', mountaineer).

1. One of the three sons of Terah, brother of Abraham, and the father of Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. He died in his native place (Ur) before his father, Terah (Gen. 11:26, sq.), B. C. probably before 2250.

2. (Heb. חָרָרִית, khaw-ravn', parched.) The son of Ephah, a concubine of Caleb, and father of Gazez (1 Chron. 2:46), B. C. after 1210.

3. (Hebrew same as No. 1.) One of the three sons of Shimei, a Gershonite, who was appointed by David to superintend the offices at the tabernacle (1 Chron. 23:9), B. C. about 960.

4. (Hebrew same as No. 2. The name of the place where Abraham, after he left Ur, tarried until the death of his father, Terah (Gen. 11:31, 38; Acts 7:2, A. V. "Charran"). The elder branch of the family remained at Haran, which led to the journeys—first, that of Abraham's servant to obtain a wife for Isaac (Gen. 24); and, next, that of Jacob when he fled from the wrath of Esau (28:10, sq.). It is said to be in Mesopotamia (24:10), more definitely in Padan-aram (25:20). Sennacherib, in his letter to Hezekiah, names Haran as among the towns taken by his predecessors (2 Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12). It is mentioned by Ezekiel (27:23) among the places which traded with Tyre. This trade would be very natural, as Haran was the frontier town of Babylon, commanding both the roads and fords of the Euphrates. "It was the city of the moon god, the foundation of whose temple went back to prehistorical times, and was restored by Nabonidas" (Sayce, Higher Crit. and Mon., p. 507, sq.).

HARARITE (Heb. חָרָרִיתִי, ha-hah-raw-ree'). the designation of three of David's guard.

1. Agee, a Hararite (2 Sam. 23:11).
2. Shammah, the Hararite (2 Sam. 23:33).
3. Sharar (2 Sam. 23:33) or Sacar (1 Chron. 11:35), the Hararite, was the father of Ahiam, another member of the guard.

HARBO'NA (Heb. חַרְבוֹנָה, har-bo-naw', ass driver; in Esth. 7:9 חַרְבוֹנָה), one of the seven chamberlains of King Ahasuerus, or Xerxes, commanded by him to exhibit the beauty of Queen Vashti to his courtiers (Esth. 1:10). He also suggested to the king the hanging of Haman (7:9, A. V. "Harbonah"), B. C. about 478.

HARBO'NAH (Esth. 7:9). See HARBONA.
HARDEN. "To harden one's face" (Prov. 21:29) is to put on an impudent, shameless face. "To harden the neck" (2 Kings 17:14; Neh. 9:29; Prov. 29:1, etc.) is to be stubborn, self-willed.

HARD, HARDLY. See GLOSSARY.
HARDNESS OF HEART (Gr. σκληροκαρδία, sklay-rok-ar-dee'-ah, Matt. 19:8; Mark 3:5, Gr. πῶρωσις, po'-ro-sis, callousness), destitution of feeling; obtuseness to spiritual things; obduracy, wickedness. In common use—stinginess, solidity, firmness. In Ezek. 3:7 "hardhearted" evidently means morally hardened.

HARE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.
HA'REPH (Heb. חָרֵף, khaw-rafe', reproachful), the "father" of Bethgader and "son" of Caleb of Judah by one of his legitimate wives (1 Chron. 2:51), B. C. about 1190.

HARETH (Heb. חֲרֵת, khah'-reth, thicket). This is the place in the wooded mountain to which David fled from Saul (1 Sam. 22:5). Possibly the scene of the incident narrated in 2 Sam. 23:14-17; 1 Chron. 11:16-19.

HARHA'TAH (Heb. חָרְחָיָהוּ, har-hah-yaw', fearing Jehovah), the father of Uzziel, "of the goldsmiths," which latter repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:8), B. C. 445.

HAR'HAS (2 Kings 22:14), given in 2 Chron. 34:22 as HASRAH (q. v.).

HAR'HUR (Heb. חָרְחֹר, har-khoor', burning fever), one of the Nethinim whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53), B. C. before 536.

HAR'IM (Heb. חַרְמִים, khaw-ream', flat-nosed).
 1. The head of the third course of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:8), B. C. after 1000.

2. An Israelite, whose descendants, to the number of three hundred and twenty males, or one thousand and seventeen in all, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:32, 39; Neh. 7:35, 42), B. C. before 536. But among these some are enumerated (Ezra 10:21) as priests in the corresponding lists of those who renounced their Gentile wives, and others (10:31) as ordinary Israelites. Schwarz and others consider Harim to be a place, and identify it with the village Charim, situated eight English miles N. E. of Jaffa (McC. and S., Cyc.).

3. The father of Malchijah, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11), B. C. before 445.

4. One of the priests who signed the sacred covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5), B. C. 445.

5. A chief of the people who signed the covenant (Neh. 10:27), B. C. 445.

6. One of the priests who returned from Babylon (Neh. 12:15). In the former list the name is changed to Rehum (v. 3), B. C. about 536.

HAR'IPH (Heb. חָרִיף, khaw-reef', autumnal).

1. An Israelite, whose descendants (or possibly a place whose inhabitants), to the number of one hundred and twelve, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:24). Probably the same with Jorah (Ezra 2:18), B. C. before 536.

2. A chief of the people who gave his hand to the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:19), B. C. 445.

HARLOT, WHORE, etc., are terms promiscuously used in the A. V. for several Hebrew words of widely different meaning.

1. Zo-naw' (Heb. זֹנֵינָה) is the word which occurs most generally in the Old Testament, and expresses licentious action on the part of either men or women, married or unmarried; also used to describe the misconduct of a concubine or secondary wife (Judg. 19:2). This word is often rendered in the A. V. by the first of the above English words (Gen. 34:31, etc.), and without apparent reason by the second (Prov. 23:27, etc.). From Gen. 38:15 it would appear that such women were marked either by a veil or some peculiarity in its size or mode of wearing it, although Jahn (Bib. Arch., p. 141) thinks that all lewd women went without the veil, and that Tamar assumed a veil for the purpose of concealing herself from her father-in-law. The effort to identify the term harlot with innkeeper (Josh. 2:1; Judg. 16:1) seems hardly justifiable.

2. Ked-ay-shaw' (Heb. כְּדַי־שָׂוָה, to consecrate; in the three passages, Gen. 38:21, 22; Deut. 23:17; Hos. 4:14), one "set apart to a sacred purpose," according to the infamous rites in use among the votaries of certain deities in Canaan and neighboring countries. Herodotus refers to the infamous custom of the Babylonians, who compelled every native female to attend the temple of Venus once in her life, and to prostitute herself in honor of the goddess. Such prostitution was forbidden by the law of Moses (Lev. 19:29; 21:9), yet it seems to have been assumed that the harlot class would exist, and the prohibition of Deut. 23:18, forbidding offerings from the wages of such sin, is perhaps due to the contagion of heathen example.

3. Nok-ree-yaw' (Heb. נֹכְרֵי־יָוָה, to ignore, "the strange woman" (1 Kings 11:1; Prov. 5:20; 6:24; 7:5; 23:27). There is a difference of opinion as to the circumstances in which such a name was given to harlots. The simplest account seems to be that it refers to a man leaving his own rightful wife for another, who ought to be strange to him (Prov. 5:17, 18, 20). Another explanation is that the earliest and most frequent offenders against purity were "strange women," in the sense of foreigners, like the Midianite women in the days of Moses (Num. 25:1, sq.), Canaanites, and other Gentiles (Josh. 23:13).

4. Por'-nay (Gr. πόρνη, Matt. 21:31, 32; Luke 15:30; 1 Cor. 6:15, 16; Heb. 11:31; James 2:25), any woman, married or single, who practices unlawful sexual indulgence, whether for gain or for lust. The representation given by Solomon is no doubt founded upon facts, and therefore shows that in his time prostitutes plied their trade upon the "streets" (Prov. 7:12; 9:14, etc.; Jer. 3:2; Ezek. 16:24, 25, 31).

Figurative. The term "harlot" is used figuratively for idolatress (Isa. 1:21; Jer. 2:20; Rev. 17:1, 5, 15; 19:2). See FORNICATION; ILLEGITIMACY.

HARNEPHER (Heb. חַרְנֵפֶה, khar-neh'-fer, snorer), one of the sons of Zophiah, a chief of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

HARNESS, HARNESSED (Heb. אָצַר, av-sar', to fasten), the act of fastening animals to a cart or vehicle, e. g., yoking cattle (1 Sam. 6:7, 10; A. V. "tie") or horses (Jer. 46:4). From the monuments we see that the harness of the Egyptian war chariots was of leather, richly decorated, many colored, and studded with gold and silver. See GLOSSARY.

HAROD (Heb. חָרֹד, khar-ode', trembling or terror), the spring at which the test of drinking was applied before the battle of Israel with the Midianites (Judg. 7). The well bursts out of the source "some fifteen feet broad and two feet deep, from the very foot of Gilboa." Bishop John P.

Newman says that when he drank of the water he found it very sweet and delicious. It is identical with the present fountain Ain Julad, a mile E. from Jezreel, and opposite Shunem.

HARODITE (Heb. חָרוּדִי, khar-o-dee'). Sham-mah and Elika, two of David's heroes (2 Sam. 23:25) were so called, probably from their being natives of HAROD (q. v.). In 1 Chron. 11:27 an error in writing gives us Harorite (Heb. חָרוּרִי, har-o-ree').

HAR'OEH (1 Chron. 2:52). See REAJAH.

HARORITE (Heb. חָרוּרִי, har-o-ree', 1 Chron. 11:27), another form for HARODITE (q. v.), an epithet of Shammoth, one of David's heroes.

HAROSHETH OF THE GENTILES (Heb. חַרְשֵׁת, khar-o'-sheth), a city in the north of Palestine, the home of Sisera (Judg. 4:2, 13, 16). Harper thinks the name signifies "forests," and says "there still are the densely wooded slopes." Easton says "the name in the Hebrew is Harosheth ha Gojim, i. e., 'the smithy of the nations,' probably so called because here Jabin's iron war chariots, armed with scythes, were made." Jabin's great army gathered here preparatory to battle and defeat (Judg. 4).

HARP. See Music, p. 766.

HARROW (Heb. חָרַר, khar-ree'ts', 2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chron. 20:3). The word so rendered in the above passages is probably a thrashing machine, the verb rendered "to harrow" (Job 39:10), expresses apparently the "breaking of the clods" (Isa. 28:24; Hos. 10:11), and is so far analogous to our harrowing, but whether done by any such machine as we call "a harrow" is very doubtful.

HAR'SHA (Heb. חַרְשָׁא, khar-shaw', enchanter), one of the Nethinim whose descendants (or rather, perhaps, a place whose inhabitants) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54), B. C. before 536. Schwarz (Palest., p. 116) thinks it may be identical with the ruins called by the Arabs Charsha, situated south of Wady Sur, about halfway between Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis) on the west, and Gedur (Gedor) on the east.

HART. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HARUM (Heb. חָרוּם, har-room', exalted), the father of Aharhel, the "families" of which latter are enumerated among the posterity of Coz, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8).

HARUMAPH (Heb. חָרוּמָפִי, khar-oo-maf', snub-nosed), "father" of Jedaiah, which latter was one of the priests who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10), B. C. 445.

HARUPHITE (Heb. חָרוּפִי, khar-oo-fee'), a patronymic applied to Shephatiah (1 Chron. 12:5), which denotes either one descended from HARUPH (q. v.), or a native of HARIPH (q. v.).

HARUZ (Heb. חָרוּץ, khar-roots', earnest), a citizen of Jotbah, and father of Meshullemeth, who became the wife of King Manasseh and mother of King Amon (2 Kings 21:19), B. C. before 641.

HARVEST (Heb. קָצִיר, kaw-tseer', severed; Gr. θερισμός, ther-is-mos). The crops in the southern parts of Palestine and in the plains come to maturity about the middle of April but in the northern and mountainous sections they do not become ripe till three weeks, or more, later. The harvest began with the barley and the festival of the Passover (Lev. 23:9-14; 2 Sam. 21:9, 10; Ruth 2:23) and ended with the wheat (Gen. 30:14; Exod. 34:22) and the festival of Pentecost (Exod. 23:16). See AGRICULTURE.

Figurative. Harvest is a figurative term for judgment (Jer. 51:33; Hos. 6:11; Joel 3:13; comp. Rev. 14:15); of a season of grace (Jer. 8:20); a time when many are ready to receive the Gospel (Matt. 9:37, 38; John 4:35); and, as the harvest is considered as the end of the season, so our Lord says, "The harvest is the end of the world" (Matt. 13:39). Dev in harvest, causing the plants to ripen with rapidity and luxuriance, is a symbol of God's fostering care (Isa. 18:4); cold in harvest is refreshing, like a faithful messenger (Prov. 25:13); while rain in harvest, being untimely, is a symbol of honor given to a fool (26:1).

HASADI'AH (Heb. חַסְדִּי'אֵה, has-ad-yaw', favored by Jehovah), one of the five sons of Zerubbabel mentioned in 1 Chron. 3:20. Keil (Com.) thinks that this group was by a different mother from those in v. 19.

HASENU'AH (Heb. חַסְנִי'אֵה, has-sen-oo-aw', pointed), an Israelite of the tribe of Benjamin, whose descendants dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:7), B. C. before 536.

HASHABI'AH (Heb. חַשְׁבִּי'אֵה, hash-ab-yaw', Jehovah regards).

1. The son of Amaziah and father of Malluch, of the family of Merari (1 Chron. 6:45).

2. The son of Bunni and father of Azrikam, of the family of Merari (1 Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15), B. C. before 445.

3. The fourth of the six sons of Jeduthun (1 Chron. 25:3), who had charge of the twelfth course of singers (v. 19), B. C. after 1000.

4. A Hebronite, appointed by David on the west side of Jordan "in all the business of the Lord, and in the service of the king" (1 Chron. 26:30), B. C. after 1000.

5. Son of Kemuel, and ruler of the Levites in David's time (1 Chron. 27:17), perhaps the same with No. 4.

6. One of the chief Levites who made voluntary offerings of victims for the Passover kept by King Josiah (2 Chron. 35:9), B. C. about 639.

7. One of the Levites who responded to the invitation of Ezra to act as a minister in the house of the Lord (Ezra 8:19), B. C. about 457.

8. One of the chief priests into whose care Ezra intrusted the bullion and other valuables for the sacred vessels at Jerusalem (Ezra 8:24). He is probably the same whose father, Hilkiah, is mentioned in Neh. 12:21, B. C. 457.

9. The son of Mattaniah and father of Bani (Neh. 11:22), B. C. before 445.

10. A chief of the Levites (Neh. 12:24), who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (3:17), and subscribed the covenant of fidelity to Jehovah (10:11), B. C. 445.

HASHAB'NAH (Heb. חַשְׁבַּנָּה, hash-ab-naw', probably for Hashabiah), one of the chiefs of the people who subscribed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:25), B. C. 445.

HASHABNI'AH (Heb. חַשְׁבַּנִּי'אֵה, hash-ab-neh-yaw', thought of Jah).

1. Father of Hattush, which latter repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10), B. C. before 445.

2. A Levite who was among those who officiated at the solemn fast under Ezra and Nehemiah when the covenant was sealed (Neh. 9:5), B. C. 445.

HASHBAD'ANA (Heb. חַשְׁבַּדָּנָה, hash-bad-daw'-naw, considerate judge), one of those who stood at Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), B. C. 445.

HA'SHEM (Heb. הַשֵּׁם, haw-shame', wealthy). The sons of Hashem, the Gizonite, are named among the members of David's guard (1 Chron. 11:34; the Jashen of 2 Sam. 23:32), B. C. before 1047.

HASHMO'NAH (Heb. חַשְׁמוֹנָה, hash-mo-naw', fatness), the thirtieth station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:29, 30), near Mount Hor. It was located, apparently, near the intersection of Wady el-Jerajeh with Wady el-Jeib, in the Arabah.

HA'SHUB (Heb. חַשְׁשׁוּב, hash-shoob', intelligent).

1. The son of Pabath-moab, and one of those who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11), B. C. 445. Perhaps he is the same person mentioned (10:23) as one of the chief Israelites who joined in the sacred covenant of Nehemiah.

2. Another who assisted in the building of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:23), B. C. 445.

3. A Levite, son of Azrikam and father of She-maiah, which last was one of those resident in the "villages of the Netophathites," and having general oversight of the temple (Neh. 11:15; 1 Chron. 9:14, in which latter passage the name is more correctly Anglicized "Hasshub"), B. C. before 445.

HASHU'BAH (Heb. חַשְׁוּבָה, hash-oo-baw', esteemed), one of the five sons of Zerubbabel (Keil, Com.), but according to some authorities the son of Pedaiah, the descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:20).

HA'SHUM (Heb. חַשְׁשׁוּם, haw-shoom', enriched).

1. An Israelite whose posterity (or perhaps a place whose inhabitants), to the number of two hundred and twenty-three, came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:19), or three hundred and twenty-eight in all (Neh. 7:22). Seven men of them married foreign wives, from whom they separated (Ezra 10:33), B. C. before 536.

2. One of those who stood up with Ezra while he read the book of the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), B. C. about 445.

3. The head of a family who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people (Neh. 10:18), B. C. 445.

HASHUPHA (Neh. 7:46). See HASUPHA.

HAS'RAH (Heb. חַסְרָה, chas-raw', poverty), the father (or mother) of Tikvath and grandfather of Shallum, which last was husband of Hul-dah the prophetess (2 Chron. 34:22). The parallel passage (2 Kings 22:14) gives the name, probably by transposition, in the form Harhas. Hasrah is said to have been "keeper of the wardrobe," perhaps the sacerdotal vestments, B. C. before 639.

HASSENA'AH (Heb. חַסְנָאָה, chas-sen-aw-aw', thorny), a Jew whose sons rebuilt the fish gate in the repair of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:3), B. C. before 445. In Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:38; the name is given without the article. SENAAH (q. v.).

HAS'SHUB (1 Chron. 9:14). See HASHUB, 8.

HASTE. See GLOSSARY.

HASUPHA (Heb. חַסּוּפָה, chas-oo-faw', un-covered), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46, in which latter passage the name is less correctly Anglicized HASHUPHA, q. v.), B. C. before 536.

HAT (Chald. כַּרְבֵּלָה, kar-bel-aw', Dan. 3:21), a mantle, and so rendered in the R. V. See DRESS.

HATACH (Heb. חַתָּךְ, hath-awk', perhaps verity), a eunuch in the palace of Xerxes, appointed to wait on Esther, and who acted for her in her communications with Mordecai (Esth. 4:5, 6, 9, 10), B. C. about 478.

HATE (Heb. שָׂנֵא, saw-nay'; Gr. μισῶ, mis-el'-o), in the root of the Hebrew word is the idea of ugliness, deformity; hence to regard with feelings contrary to love; to abhor, to loathe, to cherish dislike to. In both the Hebrew and Greek words we find the above meaning in some places (e. g., 2 Chron. 18:7; Psa. 45:7; Matt. 24:10, etc.); while in others the meaning is "to regard with less love" (e. g., Deut. 21:15, 16; Prov. 13:24; Mal. 1:3; Rom. 9:13).

The requirement to hate father and mother, wife and children, etc., and one's own life (Luke 14:26), means that all earthly ties and love must be subordinate to love for Christ.

God's hatred is toward all sinful thoughts and ways. It is a feeling of which all holy beings are conscious in view of sin, and is wholly unlike the hatred which is mentioned in the Scriptures among the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:20).

HATHATH (Heb. חַתָּת, khath-ath', terror, as in Job 6:21), son of Othniel and grandson of Kenaz, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:13), consequently also grandnephew and grandson of Caleb (v. 15; comp. Judg. 1:13), B. C. probably after 1170.

HATIPHA, many HATIPHA (Heb. חַתִּיפָה, khat-ee-faw', robber), one of the Nethinim whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56), B. C. before 536.

HATTA, some HATITA (Heb. חַתִּיטָה, khat-ee-taw', exploration), one of the "porters" (i. e., Levitical temple janitors) whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:46), B. C. before 536.

HATSI HAM MEN'UCHOTH (1 Chron. 2:52, margin). See MANAETHITES.

HATTIL (Heb. חַתִּיל, khat-teel', waving), one of the descendants of "Solomon's servants" whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59), B. C. before 536.

HATTUSH (Heb. חַתּוּשׁ, khat-toosh', derivation uncertain).

1. One of the sons of Shemaiah, among the posterity of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:22), B. C. after 536.

2. A descendant of David who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:2), B. C. 457.

3. Son of Hashabniah, and one of those who rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10), B. C. 445. Perhaps identical with No. 2.

4. One of the priests who united in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:4), B. C. about 445.

5. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:2), B. C. 536.

HAUNT. See GLOSSARY.

HAURAN (Heb. חֲוֵרָן, khav-ram', cave land), known to the Greeks and Romans as Auranites; one of the divisions of BASHAN (q. v.). The following description of Hauran is given by Smith (Hist. Geog. of the Holy Land, p. 536, sq.): "It stretches north and south from the territory of Damascus to the district of 'Ajlun, from the Jebel' Aswad to the Wady Shelaleh or Upper Yarmuk. The southern end of it is called En-Nukra, 'the hollow hearth' of the Bedouin, for it lies low between the hilly Jaulan on the west, the Leja and more distant Jebel Hauran on the east, and the range of Zumleh behind Edrei on the south." It is, for the most part "a rolling prairie of rich, red soil, under wheat, or lying for the year fallow in pasture. Its grain is packed in bags and carried on camels to Damascus and Acre. A remarkable peculiarity of this plain is that it is practically treeless, and very little timber is used. The houses, even to the rafters, ceilings, most of the doors, the lattices, and window bars are of stone, the somber basalt.

"In the beginning of the 1st century before Christ, the western Hauran was under the Jew Alexander Janneus, while the Nabateans occupied everything else to the east, including Damascus, the rest of Hauran, and the Leja. When the Romans came, in B. C. 64, besides freeing the Greek cities of Gaulanitis and Gilead from the Jews, they drove the Nabateans to the southern edge of Hauran, but did not occupy Hauran itself" (Smith, p. 616, sq.). It later came under the rule of the Herods. The Roman rule manifests itself in the ruins of aqueducts, theaters, etc., and roads. Hauran is mentioned in Scripture only in Ezek. 47:16, 18, in defining the northeast border of the promised land. It formed part of "the region of Trachonitis" referred to by Luke (3:1) as subject to Philip the tetrarch.

HAVE. See GLOSSARY.

HAVEN, the rendering of two Hebrew and one Greek word, and having the meaning of our words, "port," or "harbor."

HAVILAH (Heb. חַוִּילָה, khav-ee-law', circular).

1. A country which the description of Eden represents as producing gold and precious stones (Gen. 2:11). A sandy region skirting Babylonia on the western border. Havilah was on the border "as thou goest to Assyria." Dr. Keil says (Com., on Gen. 2:11): "The identity of this Chavilah with the Chavilah of the Joktanites (Gen. 10:29; 25:18; 1 Sam. 15:7), or of the Cushites (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9), is disproved, not only by the article used here, but also by the description of it as a land where gold, bedolach, and the shoham stone are found."

2. A district of Arabia Felix, on the borders of Arabia Petræa, named after the second son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; see below), or, according to others, from a son of Joktan (10:29). "Havilah appears to answer to Chaulaw of Edrisi, a district between Sanaa and Mecca. Havilah and Shur formed the southeast and southwest boundaries of the territories of the Ishmaelites, from which they extended their nomadic excursions toward the northeast, as far as the districts under Assyrian rule" (Keil, Com., Gen. 10:29; 25:18) (see also 1 Sam. 15:7; 1 Chron. 1:9, 23).

3. The second son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9).

4. The twelfth named of the thirteen sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chron. 1:23).

HAVOTH-JAIR (Heb. חַוּוֹת יַעִיר, khav-voth' yaw-er', huts or hamlets of Jair), a district of villages in Bashan, east of the Jordan, which the son of Manasseh took and called by his name (Num. 32:41).

Deut. 3:14 says that "Jair took all the country of Argob and Maachathi, and called them Bashan-havoth-jair." In Judges (10:4) it is recorded that Jair the Gileadite and judge had thirty cities called Havoth-jair.

HAWK. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HAY. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

HAZ' AEL (Heb. חַזְאֵל, khas-aw-ale', God holds, i. e., cares for), an officer of Benhadad, king of Syria, whom Elijah was commanded to anoint to be king in his stead (1 Kings 19:15).

1. Consults Elisha. When Elisha was at Damascus, Hazael was sent by his master, then ill, to consult the prophet respecting his recovery (2 Kings 8:7-13), B. C. about 843. The answer was that he might certainly recover. "Howbeit," added the prophet, "the Lord hath showed me that he shall surely die." He then looked steadily upon Hazael till he became confused, on which the man of God wept. Upon Hazael asking, "Why weepeth my lord?" Elisha replied, "Because I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel," etc. Hazael exclaimed, "But what is thy servant, the (not a) dog, that he should do this great thing?" The prophet responded, "The Lord hath showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria."

2. Kills Benhadad. Hazael returned and told Benhadad the prophet's answer. The next day he took a cloth, dipped it in water, and spread it over the face of the king, who, in his feebleness, and probably in his sleep, was smothered, and died what seemed a natural death (2 Kings 8:15).

3. King. He ascended the throne, and was soon engaged in hostilities with Ahaziah, king of Judah, and Jehoram, king of Israel, for the possession of Ramoth-gilead (2 Kings 8:28).

4. Wars. The Assyrian inscriptions show that about this time a destructive war was waged between the Assyrians on one side, and the Syrians, Hittites, Hamathites, and Phenicians on the other. Benhadad had recently suffered several severe defeats at the hands of the Assyrian king, and upon the accession of Hazael the war was speedily renewed. Hazael took up a position in the fastnesses of the Anti-Libanus, but was there attacked by the Assyrians, who defeated him with great loss, killing sixteen thousand of his warriors, and capturing more than one thousand one hundred chariots. The Syrians rapidly recovered their losses, and toward the close of the reign of Jehu, Hazael led them against the Israelites, whom he "smote in all their coasts" (2 Kings 10:32), thus accomplishing the prophecy of Elisha (2 Kings 8:12). His main attack fell upon the eastern provinces, where he ravaged "all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, and the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan" (2 Kings 10:32, 33). He seems to have held the kingdom of Israel in a species of subjection (2 Kings 13:3-7, 22), and toward the close of his life he even threatened the kingdom of Judah. Having taken Gath (2 Kings 12:17), he proceeded to attack Jerusalem, defeated the Jews in an engagement (2 Chron. 24:24), and was about to assault the city, when Joash induced him to retire by presenting him with a large ransom (2 Kings 12:18). This able and successful, but unprincipled, usurper left the throne, at his death, to his son, Benhadad (2 Kings 13:24), B. C. about 815.

HAZAI'AH (Heb. חַזַּי'אֵה, khas-aw-yaw', Jehovah beholds), son of Adaiah and father of Col-hozeh, a descendant of Pharez (Neh. 11:5), B. C. before 536.

HA'ZAR (Heb. חָצָר, khas-tsare', an inclosure), a term frequently prefixed to geographical names in order to indicate their dependence as villages upon some town or noted spot. Gesenius (Heb. Lex., s. v.) says that Hazar is "spoken also of the movable villages or encampments of nomadic tribes, who usually pitch their tents in a circle, or so as to form an inclosure." The African Arabs, who originally emigrated from Arabia, have retained many of their ancestral customs. "When these Arabs are in a region where they are liable to attacks from enemies, they pitch their tents in a circle, with their cattle and goods in the center. The whole is then fenced in with a low wall of stones, in which are inserted thick bundles of thorny acacia, the tangled branches and long needlelike spikes forming a perfectly impenetrable hedge around the encampment" (Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, p. 281). See HAZAR-ADDAR, etc.

HA'ZAR-AD'DAR (Heb. חָצָר אֲדָר, khas-ar' ad-daw', village of Addar), a place in the southern desert part of Palestine, between Kadesh-barnea and Amon (Num. 34:4; simply Adar in Josh. 15:3).

HA'ZAR-E'NAN (Heb. חָצֵר עֵינָן, khats-ar' ay-mavn', village of fountains), a village named as a boundary place (Num. 34:9, 10; Ezek. 47:17; 48:1). Probably a place located east-northeast of Damascus; identified as Keryetein. "And the border from the sea shall be Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus, cannot have any other meaning than that the northern boundary, which started from the Mediterranean Sea, stretched as far as Hazar-Enan, the frontier city of Damascus" (Keil, Com., Ezek. 47:17).

HA'ZAR-GAD'DAH (Heb. חָצֵר גְּדָה, khats-ar' gad-daw', village of fortune; Josh. 15:27), a town in the extreme south of Judah. Perhaps identified with Wady Mubughik and its extensive ruins.

HA'ZAR-HAT'TICON (Heb. חָצֵר הַתִּיכּוֹן, khats-ar' hat-tee-kone', middle village), named in the prophecy of Ezekiel (47:16) as the ultimate boundaries of the land. Its location has not been ascertained.

HA'ZARMA'VETH (Heb. חָצֵר מָוֶת, khats-ar-mau'-veth, village of death), one of the sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chron. 1:20), or a district of Arabia Felix settled by him.

HA'ZAR-SHU'AL (Heb. חָצֵר שׁוּאֵל, khats-ar' shoo-awl', village of jackals), a town the identifications of which are all conjectural. It was upon the south border of Judah (Josh. 15:28; Neh. 11:27), but afterward included in the territory of Simeon (Josh. 19:3; 1 Chron. 4:28).

HA'ZAR-SU'SAH (Heb. חָצֵר סוּסָה, khats-ar soo-saw', village of horses), a city that fell to the tribe of Simeon (Josh. 19:5), identified by some with Sansannah (15:31), one of Solomon's "chariot cities" (2 Chron. 1:14). "Probably the ruin Susin on the caravan road to Egypt, ten miles S. of Gaza" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis.).

HAZAZON-TA'MAR (2 Chron. 20:2). See HAZAZON-TAMAR.

HAZEL. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

HAZELEPONI, or rather ZELEL/PONI (Heb. הַצֵּלְפּוֹנִי, hats-tsel-el-po-nee', shade-facing), the sister of Jezreel and others of the sons of Etam, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:3).

HAZE'RIM (Heb. חָצֵרִים, khats-ay-reem', villages), the name of a place (Deut. 2:23); or, perhaps, as Schwartz suggests (Palestine, p. 93), a general designation of the many towns by the name of Hazor, or Hagar, found among the AVITES (q. v.), in northwest Arabia Petraea.

HAZEROTH, or HAZEROTH (Heb. חָצֵרֹת, khats-ay-roth', villages), the sixteenth station of the Israelites, and their second after leaving Sinai (Num. 11:35; 12:16; 33:17, 18; Deut. 1:1). Respecting its site, Trumbull says (Kadesh-Barnea, p. 314): "It has been common since the days of Robinson to identify this station with 'Ayn el-Hudhera. . . It would, indeed, seem more probable that this second formal encampment was at the northern side of the Desert et-Teeh; perhaps at the southeast portion of the Jebel Muqrâh tract." At Hazeroth the people tarried (Num. 11:35); here occurred the sedition of Miriam and Aaron (chap. 12), after which Israel removed to "the wilderness of Paran."

HAZEZON-TA'MAR (Heb. חָצֵצוֹן תְּמָר, khats-ets-one' tau-mavr', pruning of the palm trees), the ancient name of Engedi (Gen. 14:7); in 2 Chron. 20:2) called Hazazon-tamar.

HA'ZIEL (Heb. חָזִיֵּל, khaz-ee-ale', vision of God), a "son" of the Gershonite Shimei, and chief of the family of Laadan (1 Chron. 23:9), B. C. about 960.

HA'ZO (Heb. חָזוֹ, khaz-o', a seer), one of the sons of Nahor by Milcah (Gen. 22:22), B. C. after 2250. The only clew to the locality settled by him is to be found in the identification of Chesed, and the other sons of Nahor; and hence he must, in all likelihood, be placed in Ur of the Chaldees, or the adjacent countries.

HA'ZOR (Heb. חָצוֹר, khaw-tsore', village).

1. A chief city of north Palestine (Josh. 11:10), near Lake Merom, and the seat of Jabin, a powerful Canaanitish king, who sent out a summons to the neighboring kings to assist him against Joshua (11:1, sq.). Like other strong places in that part, it stood on an eminence (Josh. 11:13, A. V. "strength"), but the surrounding country was doubtless flat and suitable for chariot manœuvres (see vers. 4, 6, 9; Judg. 4:3). Another, Jabin, king of Canaan, oppressed Israel, from whose yoke deliverance was obtained by Deborah and Barak, after which Hazor remained in possession of the Israelites, and belonged to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36; Judg. 4:2, sq.; 1 Sam. 12:9). It was one of the places to fortify which Solomon made a tax levy (1 Kings 9:15). Its inhabitants were carried off to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15:29; Josephus, Ant., ix, 11, 1). "A hill, close by Jebel Hadîreh, and now called Tell Hara, is found to be covered with ruins. Here are the remains of an ancient fortress; a city with its walls and towers is still to be traced on the eastern slope. . . . This is probably the site of Hazor" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 350).

2. A city in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:23), perhaps Hezron, near to Kadesh-barnea (v. 3). This is thought to have been the central town of that name, the other Hazors, Hazor-hadattah, etc., being probably so called for distinction's sake.

3. "The kingdoms of Hazor" (Jer. 49:28-33); probably a district of Arabia; "it may be a collective name, and refer to settled, not wandering Arabs, dwelling in strong farmsteads. The tents of these nomads, and the insignificant Bedouin villages, without doors and bars, present a strange contrast to the great cities of Syria, with their magnificent palaces (vers. 23-27); and yet even the former contain precious goods, tempting the foreigner's greed" (Orelli, Com., in loc.).

4. A city inhabited by the Benjamites after the captivity (Neh. 11:33); possibly the modern Gazur. From the places mentioned with it, as Anathoth, Nob, etc., it would seem to have been a little north of Jerusalem.

HA'ZOR-HADATTAH ("New Hazor," Josh. 15:25). See HADATTAH.

HEAD (Heb. רִשְׁתָּהּ, rosheh; Gr. κεφαλή, kefalay). This part of the body has generally been thought to be the seat of intelligence, while the heart, or the parts near it, were the place of the affections (Gen. 3:15; Psa. 3:3; Eccles. 2:14). In Scripture the head is sometimes put for the whole person (Gen. 49:26; Prov. 10:6), or for the life itself (Dan. 1:10; 1 Sam. 28:2).

Customs. The head was bowed: in worshipping God (Gen. 24:26; Exod. 4:31), and as a token of respect (Gen. 43:28). In grief the head was covered up (2 Sam. 15:30; Esth. 6:12), shorn (Job 1:20), sprinkled with dust (Josh. 7:6; Job 2:12), or the hands placed thereon (2 Sam. 13:19; Jer. 2:37). Shaving the head was forbidden to the priests and Nazarites (Lev. 21:5, 10; Num. 6:5). Lepers always went with the head uncovered (Lev. 13:45), while women generally covered the head in public (Gen. 24:65; 1 Cor. 11:5). The heads of criminals and enemies slain in war were often cut off (Matt. 14:10; Judg. 5:26; 1 Sam. 17:51, 57; 31:9).

Diseases. The head was liable to leprosy (Lev. 13:42-44), scab (Isa. 3:17), internal disease (2 Kings 4:19; Isa. 1:5). See DISEASES.

Figurative. The head is illustrative of God (1 Cor. 11:3), of Christ (1 Cor. 11:3; Eph. 1:22; Col. 2:19), of rulers (1 Sam. 15:17; Dan. 2:38), of chief men (Isa. 9:14, 15), of the chief city of a kingdom (Isa. 7:8). The covered head is a symbol of defense and protection (Psa. 140:7), or of subjection (1 Cor. 11:5, 10); made bald signifies heavy judgments (Isa. 3:24; 15:2; 22:12; Mic. 1:16); lifted up, of joy and confidence (Psa. 3:3; Luke 21:28); of pride, etc. (Psa. 83:2); of exaltation (Gen. 40:13; Psa. 27:6); anointed, of joy and prosperity (Psa. 23:5); shaking the head is a gesture of mockery at another's fall (Isa. 37:22) or misfortune (Psa. 22:7; Jer. 18:16; Matt. 27:39). "The head is, according to Scripture, evidently the noblest part of man. . . . Because in the head the human organism culminates Christ is called the 'Head of the Church;' and for the same reason the head is the general metaphorical appellation of him who is most exalted, the most excellent, the chief. He who blesses lays his hand upon the head of the person to be blessed, and he who consecrates on the head of the person to be consecrated. . . . Precisely for the same reason tongues of fire are distributed on the heads of the apostles: it was a heavenly laying on of hands."

HEAD OF THE CHURCH. On account of the very intimate union that exists between Christ and the Church he is called the head (Eph. 4:15; 5:23), and the Church his body (4:12; Col. 1:24), inseparably united. Not only does the Church, as a body, stand in need of Christ (Col. 2:19; Eph. 4:15, 16), but the apostle ventures the bold expression that Christ also needs the Church, as that which belongs to his completeness.

HEADBAND (Hebrew plural קִישֹׁתַיִם, kish-shoor-eym), probably a girdle (Isa. 3:20; "attire," Jer. 2:32). See DRESS.

HEADDRESS. See DRESS.

HEADSTONE (Zech. 4:7). See CORNER STONE.

HEADY (Gr. προπετής, prop-et-ace', falling forward), a term applied to one form of wickedness, viz., those who are rash, reckless (2 Tim. 3:4).

HEAL. See DISEASES.

HEAP, the rendering of several Hebrew words, with the general meaning of a collection of things so as to form an elevation. The term was applied to a pile of earth or stones covering over or marking the place of a grave (Josh. 7:26; 8:29; 2 Sam. 18:17); to the ruins of walls and cities (Job 8:17; Isa. 25:2; Jer. 9:11); a pile (e. g., of rubbish, Neh. 4:2; of grain, Cant. 7:2; of sheaves, Ruth 3:7; Hag. 2:16, etc.).

HEART (Heb. mostly לֵב, labe; Gr. καρδία, kar-dee'-ah). According to thorough investigation and evidence of Scripture in all its parts, the heart is the innermost center of the natural condition of man. . . . The heart is: (1) The center of the bodily life, the reservoir of the entire life-power (Psa. 40:8, 10, 12), and indeed in the lowest physical sense; for eating and drinking, as strengthening of the heart (Gen. 18:5; Judg. 19:6; 1 Kings 21:7; Acts 14:17, etc.), becomes the strengthening of the whole man. (2) The center of the rational-spiritual nature of man; thus when a man determines upon anything, it is called to "presume in his heart to do so" (Esth. 7:5); when he is strongly determined, he is said to "stand steadfast in his heart" (1 Cor. 7:37); what is done gladly, willingly, and of set purpose, is done "from the heart" (Rom. 6:17). The heart is the seat of love (1 Tim. 1:5) and of hatred (Lev. 19:17). Again, the heart is the center of thought and conception; the heart knows (Deut. 29:4, Prov. 14:10), it understands (Prov. 8:5; Isa. 44:18; Acts 16:14), it deliberates (Neh. 5:7, marg.), it reflects (Luke 2:19), and estimates (Prov. 16:9). The heart is also the center of the feelings and affections: Of joy (Isa. 65:14); of pain (Prov. 25:20; John 16:6); all degrees of ill will (Prov. 23:17; Acts 7:54; James 3:14); of dissatisfaction, from anxiety (Prov. 12:25) to despair (Eccles. 2:20); all degrees of fear, from reverential trembling (Jer. 22:40) to blank terror (Deut. 28:28; Psa. 143:4). (3) The center of the moral life; so that all moral conditions, from the highest love of God (Psa. 73:26), even down to the self-deifying pride (Ezek. 28:2, 5), darkening (Rom. 1:21) and hardening (Isa. 6:10; 63:17; Jer. 16:12; 2 Cor. 3:15), are concentrated in the heart as the innermost life circle of humanity (1 Pet. 3:4). The heart is the laboratory and place of issue of all that is good and evil in thoughts, words, and deeds (Mark 7:21; Matt. 12:34); the rendezvous of evil lusts and passions (Mark 4:19, comp. 15; Rom. 1:24); a good or evil treasure (Luke 6:45); the place where God's natural law is written in us (Rom. 2:15), as well as the law of grace (Isa. 51:7; Jer. 31:33); the seat of conscience (Heb. 10:22; comp. 1 John 3:19-21); the field for the seed of the divine word (Matt. 13:19; Luke 8:15). It is the dwelling place of Christ in us (Eph. 3:17); of the Holy Ghost (2 Cor. 1:22); of God's peace (Col. 3:15); the receptacle of the love of God (Rom. 5:5); the closet of secret communion with God (Eph. 5:19). It is the center of the entire man, the very hearth of life's impulse. See GLOSSARY.

HEARTH, the rendering of several Hebrew words:

1. Awkkh (Heb. אִוֶּכֶח), a brazier, or portable furnace, in which fire was made in the king's winter apartment (Jer. 36:22, 23).

2. Kee-yore' (Heb. כִּי־יֹרֵה), a fire pan or basin for holding fire (Zech. 12:6), for roasting in (1 Sam. 2:14), or for washing, "laver" (Exod. 30:18, etc.).

3. Mo-kade' (Heb. מֹכָדֵה), a burning, so rendered in Isa. 33:14), a fagot for fuel (Psa. 102:3), and from the same root, yaw'-kad, a burning mass upon a hearth (Isa. 30:14).

HEAT, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, having besides its ordinary meaning several peculiar uses in Scripture.

Figurative. The heat of the sun is symbolical of tribulation, temptation, or persecution (Matt. 13:6, 21; Luke 8:6-13). A gentle heat of the sun signifies the favor and bounty of the prince, while a fierce heat denotes punishment (see Psa. 121:6). "Heat of the day" (Matt. 20:12) is united with burden to denote severe toil.

HEATH. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

HEATHEN (Heb. גֹּיִם, go-yeem', troop). At first the word go-yeem' denoted generally all the nations of the world (Gen. 18:18; comp. Gal. 3:16), but afterward the Jews became a people distinguished from the other nations. They were a separate people (Lev. 20:23; 26:14-38), and the other nations were heathen. With these nations the Israelites were forbidden to associate (Josh. 23:7), to intermarry (Josh. 23:12; 1 Kings 11:2), or to worship their gods. Owing to its position these nations penetrated into Palestine, and the advance of heathen culture could not be prevented. For that very reason the lines of defense against all illegality were only the more strictly and carefully drawn by the vigilance of the scribes. "Two points especially were not to be lost sight of in guarding against heathen practices—heathen idolatry and heathen non-observance of the Levitical law of uncleanness. With respect to both the pharisaism of the scribes proceeded with extreme minuteness. For the sake of avoiding even an only apparent approximation to idolatry, the Mosaic prohibition of images (Exod. 20:4, sq.; Deut. 4:16, sq.; 27:15) was applied with the most relentless consistency." Not only did they declare themselves ready to die rather than to allow a statue of Caligula in the temple (Josephus, Ant., xviii, 3, 8), but the Jews also repudiated pictorial representations in general, such as the trophies in the theater or the eagle at the gate of the temple. Very minute and exact regulations were made to prevent any encouragement of idolatry or contact therewith: e. g., an Israelite was not to have any business transaction with a Gentile during the three days preceding or the three days following a heathen festival, while on the festival itself an Israelite was to hold no kind of intercourse with the town; all objects possibly connected with idolatrous worship were forbidden, wood taken from an idol grove was prohibited, and bread baked by it could not be eaten, or if a weaver's shuttle was made of such wood its use was forbidden, as well as cloth woven therewith. A Gentile—as a non-observer of the laws of purification—was unclean, and all intercourse with him was defiling, including his house and all objects touched by him (John 18:28). Provisions coming from the heathen were not to be eaten by Jews, although they were allowed to trade in them. A strictly legal Israelite could not at any time sit at meat at a Gentile table (Acts 11:3; Gal. 2:12) (Schurer, Div. II, vol. i, 51, sq.). See GENTILE.

HEAVE SHOULDER. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

HEAVEN, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Material. (1) Shaw-mah'-yim (Heb. שָׁמַיִם, lofty), by far the most frequent designation of heaven in the Hebrew Scriptures, and meaning the firmament, which appears like an arch spread out above the earth, and represented as supported on foundations and pillars (2 Sam. 22:8; Job 26:11), with the rain descending through its gates or windows (Psa. 78:23; comp. Gen. 28:17). We find such expressions as toward heaven, heavenward (Gen. 15:5; 28:12); "under the heavens," i. e., on earth (Eccles. 1:13; 2:3); "under the whole heaven," i. e., the whole earth (Gen. 7:19; Deut. 2:25; Job 28:24, etc.); "the heavens and the earth," i. e., the universe (Gen. 1:1; 2:1). Akin to this word is maw-rome' (Heb. מַרְוָם, elevation), which, though not rendered "heaven," has doubtless a celestial signification (Psa. 68:18; 93:4; 102:19), rendered "on high," "the height." (2) Gal-gal' (Heb. גַּלְגַּל, a wheel), rendered "heaven" in Psa. 77:18, but meaning a whirlwind. (3) Shakh'-ak (Heb. שָׁחַק, dust, vapor), the sky or heavens; serene (Job 37:18) or as covered with clouds (37:21); from which descend the rain and dew (36:28; Prov. 3:20), and manna (Psa. 78:23; comp. Isa. 45:8), and whence the thunder is heard (Psa. 77:18). Also put for the clouds themselves (Job 38:37). (4) Closely connected with (3) is raw-kee'-ah (Heb. רָעָא, an expanse), rendered in the A. V. "firmament" (q. v.). (5) Of the Greek terms, oo-ran-os' (οὐρανός), like (1), signifies the heights, and thence the vaulted expanse of the sky; the region where clouds and tempests gather (Matt. 16:2; Luke 4:25); the region above the sky, the seat of things eternal and perfect, where God and the other heavenly beings dwell (Matt. 5:34; 23:22, etc.). This heaven Paul (2 Cor. 12:2) seems to designate the third heaven. Mes-oo-ran'-ay-mah (Gr. μεσο-pάνηα, mid-heaven); thus the sun is said to be in mid-heaven at noon, where what is done can be seen and heard by all (Rev. 8:13; 14:6; 19:17).

2. Spiritual. Heaven in this sense is the place and state of blessedness of the righteous. The nature of this blessedness is beyond any adequate conception by us, but we are aided by such declarations as when Jesus calls heaven his "Father's house" (John 14:2); "Paradise" (Luke 23:43; comp. 2 Cor. 12:4; Rev. 2:7; 22:2). It is also styled "the heavenly Jerusalem" (Gal. 4:26; Heb. 12:22; Rev. 3:12), the "kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 19:12; 25:1; 2 Tim. 4:18; James 2:5), the "everlasting kingdom" (2 Pet. 1:11), the "eternal inheritance" (1 Pet. 1:4; Heb. 9:15), the "better country" (Heb. 11:14, 16).

We learn that the blessed in heaven will have "life everlasting," "an eternal weight of glory" (2 Cor. 4:17), exemption from death, sorrow, and pain (Rev. 21:4), as well as from all evil works (v. 27). See LIFE, EVERLASTING.

HEAVINESS is in A. V. the English translation of several Hebrew and Greek words, and, with its derivations, in Scriptural usage, means weight (כֶּבֶד, kaw-badé, 1 Kings 12:11); sharp, hard to bear (כָּבֵד, kaw-sheh', 1 Kings 14:6); sulky, sour (צָר, sar, 1 Kings 20:43); mourning (אֲנָחָה, tah-an-ee-yaw', Isa. 29:2, R. V.); sorrow and fear (דָּחַיָה, déh-aw-gaw', Prov. 12:25); countenance (פָּנֵי, paw-neem', Job 9:27, R. V.); weakness (חֵלְוָה, kay-haw', Isa. 61:3); affliction, grief (אֲנָחָה, tah-an-ee-yaw', Psa. 119:28); humiliation (אֲנָחָה, tah-an-ee-yaw', Ezra 9:5, R. V. marg. fasting); sore sickness (נֹאֵשׁ, noash, Psa. 69:20, R. V. marg.); troubled (ἀδύναμις, ad-ay-mon-eh'-o, Phil. 2:26, R. V.); dejection of the eye (κατάφραση, kat-ay'-f-ah, James 4:9); sorrow (λύπη, loo-pay', Rom. 9:2, R. V.; 2 Cor. 2:1). In common use: the quality of being weighty; torpidness, depression of spirits, sorrow, grief, tediousness, burdensomeness.

HEAVING AND WAVING. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

HEBER (Nos. 1, 2, 3, Heb. אֵבֶר, ay'-ber, of the other side, i. e., of the river, immigrant).

1. The last named of the seven chiefs of the Gadites in Bashan (1 Chron. 6:13).

2. One of the sons of Elpaal, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:17).

3. A Benjamite and son of Shashak (1 Chron. 8:22), B. C. before 598.

(Nos. 4, 5, 6, Heb. כְּהֵבֶר, keh'-ber, community.)

4. Son of Beriah and grandson of Asher (Gen. 46:17; 1 Chron. 7:31, 32), B. C. about 1700. His descendants are called Heberites (Num. 26:45).

5. "A descendant of HOBAB (q. v.), whose wife, Jael, slew Sisera (Judg. 4:17, sq.). He is called Heber the Kenite (Judg. 4:11, 17; 5:24), which seems to have been a name for the whole family (Judg. 1:16). Heber appears to have lived separate from the rest of the Kenites, leading a patriarchal life. He must have been a person of some consequence from its being stated that there was peace between the house of Heber and the powerful King Jabin. At the time the history brings him under our notice his camp was in the plain of Zaanaim, near Kedesh, in Naphtali" (Kitto).

6. Probably a son of Mered (of Judah) by Jehudijah, and "father" of Socho (1 Chron. 4:18). B. C. probably before 1300.

HEBERITE, a descendant of HEBER (q. v. No. 4), of the tribe of Asher (Num. 26:45).

HEBREW LANGUAGE. The language of the Hebrews and of the Old Testament Scriptures, with the exception of a few chapters written in Chaldee. It is called Hebrew nowhere in Scripture, but this is not surprising when we remember how rarely that name is employed to designate the Israelites. It is called "the language of Canaan" (Isa. 19:18), as distinguished from that of Egypt; and the "Jewish language" (2 Kings 18:26, 28), as distinguished from the Aramaean. The Hebrew belongs to the Semitic or Shemitic group of languages.

1. Characteristics. (1) Sound. The Hebrew has a predominance of guttural sounds—at least four, if not five; the use of very strong letters, which may be represented by tt, ts, kk (or kh); the vowels are kept in strict subordination to the consonants, it being a rare and exceptional case when a word or syllable begins with a vowel. (2) Roots, etc. Like other Semitic languages, the Hebrew is characterized by the three-letter root. This is expanded into a variety of conjunctive forms, expressing intensity, reflexiveness, causation, etc., modifications of the root idea being indicated, not by additions to the root, but by changes within the root. (3) A peculiar use of the plural, not only denoting plurality, but likewise extension, in space or time. (4) In composition the Hebrew is simple, pictorial, and poetical.

2. History. So far as history informs us Palestine was the earliest seat of the Hebrew language, and it appears to have been the common language of the numerous tribes of that country when Abraham came thither. "It is certain that in Palestine itself Hebrew was adopted long before the days of Israelitish conquest. The letters on Tel el-Amarna tablets prove this. . . . Old Canaanitish words, which have been so strangely preserved under the dust heap of an Egyptian city, are important not only in indicating the wide extent to which the Canaanitish language was spoken in Palestine, but also in proving that long before the days of the Israelitish invasion 'the language of Canaan' was in all respects the same as that of the Old Testament" (Sayce, Higher Crit. and Mon., p. 356, sq.). Of course the Canaanitish language, when adopted by the Hebrews, did not remain unchanged, being modified by such influences as time, place, the individual peculiarities of the Hebrew writers, and the character and subject matter of their compositions. A progressive development in the writings handed down to us is observable, so that it is quite safe to distinguish three periods—that of Moses, of David and Solomon, and of the exile. The cause of the dying out of the Hebrew as the national language of the Jews was doubtless the captivity. The Chaldee language had already come to be widely known among the Jews in Palestine by means of the Chaldean invasions; but in exile it attained such preponderance over the Hebrew that on their return to their mother country only the more educated (with the old people) still understood this their mother tongue. On the contrary, the generation which had grown up in exile spoke Chaldee, and the Hebrew ceased to be the living language of the people.

3. The Written Hebrew. Respecting this two interesting questions present themselves: (1) As to the age and origin of the characters or letters found in all extant Hebrew MSS. and in our printed Hebrew Bibles. Two conclusions may be relied upon as certain—that they were not in use among the Jews previous to the captivity and that they have been used since the beginning of our era. "The probability is that the introduction of these characters had some connection with the introduction of the Aramæan language, and that the change from the ancient written characters, like that from the ancient language, was accomplished gradually." (2) Respecting the punctuation. "The two following conclusions may now be regarded as established: That the present punctuation did not form an original part of the inspired record, but was introduced by the Jewish doctors long after that record had been closed, for the purpose of preserving, so far as possible, the true pronunciation of the language; and that the present pointed text, notwithstanding its comparative recency, presents us with the closest possible approximation to the language which the sacred writers actually used" (Insp. Dict., s. v.; Keil, Introd. to O. T.).

"man from the region beyond," and supposed to have been applied to Abraham, as having crossed the Euphrates.

2. The name Hebrews differs from the term Israelites in this respect, that the latter was in use only among the people themselves, while the former was the current name among foreign nations. In Scripture the name Hebrew is never applied to the Israelites except when the speaker is a foreigner (Gen. 39:14, 17; 41:12; Exod. 1:16; 2:6, 7; 1 Sam. 4:6, 9, etc.), or when the Israelites speak of themselves to a foreigner (Gen. 40:15; Exod. 1:19; Jonah 1:9, etc.), or when they are contrasted with other peoples (Gen. 43:32; Exod. 1:15; Deut. 15:12; 1 Sam. 13:3, 7). See ISRAEL; JEWS.

HE'BREW OF THE HEBREWS (Gr. Ἑβραῖος ἔξ Ἑβραίων). A Hebrew of Hebrew parentage and ancestry; a Hebrew of pure blood (Phil. 3:5). Owing to the loss of private records in earlier times there might have been many a Benjaminite left in Palestine who could not prove a pure Hebrew descent. On another occasion Paul seems to appeal in a similar case, "Are they Hebrews? So am I" (2 Cor. 11:22). That the expression did not refer to being born in Palestine is shown by Paul himself saying, "I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus" (Acts 21:39).

HE'BREWS (Heb. עִבְרִי, ib-ree'; plural עִבְרִיִּים, ib-reeem'; Gr. Ἑβραῖος, heb-rah'-yos), a designation of the people of Israel.

1. Its Derivation. (1) Some ascribe the origin of the word to Ay-ber' (Heb. עֵבֶר); Eber, the ancestor (Gen. 10:21); see also the use of Eber as a national name (Num. 24:24). (2) Others trace the name to the Hebrew aw-bar' (עָבַר), to pass over), so that a Hebrew would mean the most ancient in the world. It was in the mountains of Judah, about two thousand eight hundred feet above the Mediterranean Sea, and between Beersheba and Jerusalem, being about twenty miles from each. It was named Kirjath-arba (Gen. 23:2; Josh. 14:15; 15:13), also MAMRE (q. v.), after Mamre the Amorite (Gen. 13:18; 35:27). It is now called el-Khulil. Among those who lived there were the Canaanites and the Anakim (Gen. 23:2; Josh. 14:15; 15:13), Abraham (Gen. 13:18), Isaac and Jacob (Gen. 35:27). David made it his royal residence (2 Sam. 2:1-4; 5:5; 1 Kings 2:11); also Absalom (2 Sam. 15:10). Sarah was buried here (Gen. 23:17-20); Joshua took Hebron (Josh. 10:36, 37; 12:10) and Caleb retook it (Josh. 14:12). The Romans also captured and destroyed it. The mosque of Hebron covers the remains of some of the patriarchs, and it is with difficulty that any Christian gains admission to the sacred building.

2. The third son of Kohath, and a grandson of Levi; a younger brother of Amram, father of Moses and Aaron (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19; 1 Chron. 6:2, 18; 23:12), B. C. before 1290. His descendants are called Hebronites (Num. 3:27, etc.).

3. The son of Mareshah, and, apparently, grandson of Caleb, of the posterity of Judah (1 Chron. 2:42, 43), B. C. after 1170.

HE'BRONITE (Heb. כְּהֵרֹנִי, kheb-ro-nee'), a descendant of Hebron, the third son of Kohath (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19, comp. v. 27; 1 Chron. 26:23, 30, 31). We find them settled in Jazer, in Gilead, "mighty men of valor," seventeen hundred in number, who were superintendents for King David (1 Chron. 26:31, 32), while twenty-seven hundred others held the same position over the two and a half tribes (v. 30).

HEDGE, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, most of them used to denote that which surrounds or incloses, whether it is a stone wall (Prov. 24:31; Ezek. 42:10), or a fence of other materials. Gaw-dare' (Heb. גֵּרַר) and ghed-ay-raw' (Heb. גֵּדְרָיִם) are used of the hedge of a vineyard (Psa. 89:40; 1 Chron. 4:23; Jer. 49:3), and the latter is employed to describe the wide walls of stone, or fences of thorn (Eccles. 10:8), which served as a shelter for sheep in winter and summer (Num. 32:16). The word mes-or-kav' (Heb. מִסְרֵקַיִם) means a thorn hedge (Mic. 7:4). See WALL.

Figurative. A hedge is used figuratively of God's protection (Job 1:10); of the sluggard's way (Prov. 15:19); afflictions (Job 3:23; 19:8); judgments (Lam. 3:7; Hos. 2:6); holy ordinances (Isa. 5:2; Matt. 21:33); broken hedge, figurative of the removal of protection (Psa. 80:12; Isa. 5:5).

HE'GAI, or HEG'AI (Heb. חַיִּגַּי, hay-gak'-ee, eunuch; or HE'GE, Esth. 2:8, Heb. חַיִּגַּי, hay-gay', same), the eunuch having charge of the harem of Xerxes, and the preparation of the females sought as concubines for him (Esth. 2:8, 15), B. C. about 478.

HE'GE, the same as HEGAI (Esth. 2:3, q. v.).

HEIFER. See ANIMAL KINGDOM; SACRIFICES. Figurative. As the heifer, or young cow, was not used for plowing, but only for treading out the grain, when it ran without any headstall, the expression an "unbroken heifer" (Hos. 4:16; A. V. "backsliding") is used for refractoriness. A similar sense is attached to the expression, "calf of three years old" (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:34). "To plow with another man's heifer" (Judg. 14:18), is to take an unfair advantage of another. An heifer that "loveth to tread out the corn" (Hos. 10:11), is figurative of one choosing pleasant, productive, and profitable labor; because in thrashing the animal was allowed to eat at pleasure (Deut. 25:4). "An heifer of three years old" (Isa. 15:5) is one still in freshness and fullness of its strength, and is used figuratively of a nation still strong. "Fair," of the beauty and wealth of Egypt (Jer. 46:20). "At grass," of the luxurious Chaldees (50:11).

HEIFER, RED. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

HEIR. See INHERITANCE.

HE'LAH (Heb. חֶלְהָד, khel-aw', rust), one of the two wives of Ashur, the father of Tekoah, by whom she had three sons (1 Chron. 4:5, 7).

HE'LAM (Heb. חַיִּלָּמ, khay-lawm', place of abundance, 2 Sam. 10:16; but חַיִּלָּמַיִם, in v. 17). Memorable as the place located between the Euphrates and the Jordan, where David routed the Syrians under Hadadazer. The town named Alameda by Ptolemy is identified as modern Helam.

HEL'BAH (Heb. חֶלְבָּה, khel-baw', fatness), a town of Asher not far from Sidon, and one of the places from which the Canaanites were not expelled (Judg. 1:31). Site unknown.

HEL'BON (Heb. חֶלְבֹּן, khel-bone', fat, i. e., fertile), a place named only in Ezek. 27:18, where "the wine of Helbon" is mentioned among the commodities furnished by Damascus to the great market of Tyre. "It still exists in the village of Helbón, a place with many ruins three and a half miles N. of Damascus in the midst of a valley of the same name" (Keil, Com., in loc.).

HEL'DAI (Heb. חֶלְדַּי, khel-dah'ee, worldliness).

1. A Netophathite, and descendant of Othniel, chief of the twelfth division (twenty-four thousand) of David's forces (1 Chron. 27:15), B. C. about 960. In 1 Chron. 11:30 (where he is called Heled) his father's name is said to be Baanah; and in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:29) he is called Heleb.

2. One returned from the captivity, whom the prophet Zechariah was directed to take with him when he went to crown the high priest Joshua as a symbol of the future Messiah's advent (Zech. 6:10), B. C. 519. The name is written Helem in v. 14.

HE'LEB (Heb. חֶלְבַּי, khay-leb', fat, fatness), son of Baanah the Netophathite, and one of David's warriors (2 Sam. 23:29); elsewhere more correctly called Heled (1 Chron. 11:30), or, still better, Heldai (1 Chron. 27:15).

HE'LED (Heb. חֶלְדַּי, khay'-led, portion of time; Fürst, continuance of life), son of Baanah, a Netophathite, and one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:30), called in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:29) Heleb, but more accurately Heldai (1 Chron. 27:15).

HE'LEK (Heb. חֶלְעֵק, khay'-lek, a portion), the second son of Gilead, of the tribe of Manasseh, whose descendants were called Helekites (Num. 26:30; Josh. 17:2).

HELEKITES (Heb. חֶלְעֵקַיִם, khel-ke'e'), the descendants of Helek (Num. 26:30). "Children of Helek" (Josh. 17:2).

HE'LEM (Heb. חֶלְמַי, khay'-lem, dream. 1. The brother of Shamer and great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35), B. C. probably before 1210. Perhaps the same with Hotham (v. 32).

2. One assisting Zechariah in typical crowning of the high priest (Zech. 6:14), probably by erroneous transcription for Heldai (v. 10).

HE'LEPH (Heb. חֶלְפָּה, kheh'-lef), a city mentioned as the starting point of the northern border of Naphtali, beginning at the west (Josh. 19:33).

HE'LEZ (Heb. חֶלְצַיִם, khay'-lets, or חֶלְצָה, kheh'-lets, strength).

1. One of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:26), an Ephraimite of Pelon (1 Chron. 11:27), and captain of the seventh monthly course (1 Chron. 27:10), B. C. about 950.

2. Son of Azariah and father of Eleasah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:39).

HELI (Gr. Ἡλί, hay-lee', for Heb. אֵלִי, ay-lee', ascend), the father-in-law of Joseph, and maternal grandfather of Christ (Luke 3:23).

HEL'KAI (Heb. חֵלְכַי, khel-kak'ee, appointed), son of Meraioth, and one of the chief priests in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:15), B. C. after 536.

HEL'KATH (Heb. חֵלְכַת, khel-kath', smoothness), a town assigned to the tribe of Asher, on the eastern border (Josh. 19:25), and one of the Levitical cities (21:31). In 1 Chron. 6:75 Hukok is an old copyist's error).

HEL'KATH-HAZ'ZURIM (חֵלְכַת הַצְּרִימִים, khel-khath' hats-iso-reem', smoothness of the rocks, others field of the sharp edges), the name given to the plain near the pool of Gibeon, because of the deadly combat of twelve of the adherents of Ish-bosheth with as many of David's, which appears to have brought on a general engagement, resulting in the defeat of the men of Israel (2 Sam. 2:12-17).

HELL, a term which in common usage designates the place of future punishment for the wicked. Other meanings in many instances are expressed by this term, which must be recognized to prevent mistakes and confusion. In some cases it refers to the grave, in others to the place of disembodied spirits without any necessary implication as to their happiness or unhappiness. This fact, however, does not militate against the correctness of the belief indicated by the common use of the term, a belief which rests upon many passages of Scripture for its support.

1. Scripture Terms. The words of the original Scriptures rendered "hell" in the English A. V. are three in number. With a solitary exception (2 Pet. 11:4; ταρταρώω, tar-tar-ō'-o, to incarcerate) they are the only words thus translated. These, however, are not the only terms, as we shall see, in which the idea of a place of future penal suffering for the wicked is clearly and strongly expressed. The three words are as follows:

(1) Sheh-ole' (Heb. שְׁאוֹל, Sheol). Without entering into the discussion as to the derivation or root meaning of this term of the Old Testament Scriptures, it may be sufficient to say, that this word occurs sixty-five times. In our A. V. it is translated thirty-one times "grave," thirty-one times "hell," and three times "pit." The general idea is "the place of the dead;" and by this is meant, not the grave, but place of those who have departed from this life. The term is thus used with reference to both the righteous and the wicked; of the righteous (Psa. 16:10; 30:3; Isa. 38:10, etc.). Of the wicked (Num. 16:33; Job 24:19; Psa. 9:17, et al.). This is in accordance with the general character of the Old Testament revelation, which presents much less clearly and strongly than the New the doctrine of the future life with its distinct allotments of doom. But there are many hints, and more than hints, of the difference in the conditions of the departed. The Psalmist prays: "Draw me not away with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity" (Psa. 28:3; see also Isa. 33:14; 66:24; Dan. 12:2.).

(2) Hah'-dace (Gr. ᾅδης). One of the New Testament terms rendered "hell" like the Old Testament "sheol" is comprehensive, and has a quite similar significance. It refers to the underworld, or region of the departed. It occurs eleven times in the New Testament, viz.: Matt. 11:23; 16:18; Luke 10:15; 16:23; Acts 11:27, 31; 1 Cor. 15:55; Rev. 1:18; 6:8; 20:13, 14. The A. V. renders the word "hell" in every case with one exception, viz.: 1 Cor. 15:55, where it gives "grave." The R. V., however, substitutes "hades" for "hell," leaving the word untranslated, thus representing, as it is held, more correctly the original idea. It is not to be denied that the distinction thus recognized between "hades," and "hell," as a place of misery is a valid one. Nevertheless it is equally plain that our Lord, in certain of his words, associated judgment and suffering with the condition of some of the inhabitants of "hades" (e. g., Matt. 11:23; Luke 16:23).

(3) Gheli'-en-nah (Gr. γέεννα, the valley of Hinnom). A place where the Jewish apostacy, the rites of Moloch, were celebrated (1 Kings 11:7). It was converted by King Josiah into a place of abomination, where dead bodies were thrown and burnt (2 Kings 23:13, 14). Hence the place served as a symbol, and the name was appropriated to designate the abode of lost spirits. In this way the term was used by our Lord.

The word occurs twelve times in the New Testament, and in every case it is properly translated "hell." That is, the meaning of the English word which overbears all others is particularly the meaning of Gehenna (see Matt. 5:22, 29, 30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Mark 9:43, 45, 47; Luke 12:5; James 3:6).

The distinction between hades and Gehenna is of importance, because not only is it necessary to the understanding of quite a large number of passages in the New Testament, but also it may prevent misconstruction and remove uncertainty as to Christ's teaching with regard to the future state of the wicked. It also has important bearing upon the doctrine of "Christ's descent into hell" (hades) and that of the "Intermediate State."

2. Scripture Synonyms. The Bible doctrine of hell is by no means confined to the terms above mentioned, and to the passages in which they appear. There are many phrases in which the overshadowing idea is presented with great distinctness, such as "unquenchable fire," "outer darkness," "the blackness of darkness," "furnace of fire," "torment in fire and brimstone," "the smoke of their torment," "the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone," "where their worm dieth not," "the place prepared for the devil and his angels." Van Oosterzee well remarks: "There is no doubt that Holy Scripture requires us to believe in a properly so-called place of punishment, in whatever part of God's boundless creation it is to be sought. That the different images under which it is represented cannot possibly be taken literally will certainly need no demonstration; but it is perhaps not unnecessary to warn against the opinion that we have to do here with mere imagery. Who shall say that the reality will not infinitely surpass in awfulness the boldest pictures of it?"

For theological treatment of doctrine, see PUNISHMENT, FUTURE.

HELMET. See ARMOR, 2 (2).

HE'LON (Heb. חַיִּלֹּן, khay-lone', strong), the father of Eliab, which latter was prince of the tribe of Zebulun at the Exode (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24, 29; 10:16), B. C. 1210.

HELP. Besides its usual meaning of assistance, a technical application is given the term in two passages.

1. "Helps" (Gr. βοηθεια, bo-ay'-thi-ah), an apparatus for securing a leaking vessel, by means of ropes, chains, etc., forming a process of undergirding (Acts 27:17).

2. "Helps" (Gr. ἀντιληψις, an-til'-ape-sis, a laying hold of), the ministrations of the deacons, who have care of the sick (1 Cor. 12:28), where it is used in the senses of helpers.

HELPMET (Heb. עֵזֶר כְּנָגֶדוֹ, hel'-zer keh-neg-dow', a help as his counterpart), i. e., an aid suitable to him, such as the man stood in need of (Gen. 2:18, generally now punctuated so as to read a "helpmeet for him").

HELVE (Heb. עֵץ, ates, wood), the handle or wooden part (Deut. 19:9) of an ax (q. v.).

HEM OF A GARMENT (Heb. שֵׁבִיל, shool, to hang down; Gr. κρᾶσπεδον, kras'-ped-on), the extremity, border of the outer garment (Exod. 28:33; 39:24-26; Matt. 9:20; 14:36). The importance which the later Jews, especially the Pharisees, attached to this portion of the dress (Matt. 23:5, A. V. "borders") was founded upon the regulation (Num. 15:38, 39). The fringe did not owe its origin to this regulation, but was originally the ordinary mode of finishing the robe; the ends of the threads composing the woof being left in order to prevent the cloth from unraveling.

HE'MAM, the son of Lotan, the eldest son of Seir (Gen. 36:22). The same as HOMAM (q. v.).

HE'MAN (Heb. חַיִּמָּן, hay-mawn', faithful).

1. One of the four persons celebrated for their wisdom, to which that of Solomon is compared (1 Kings 4:31). He is probably the same as the son of Zerah and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 2:6). The mention of these men together as famous for their wisdom does not at all require that we should think them contemporaries.

2. Son of Joel and grandson of Samuel (Shemuel) the prophet, the Kohathite, and one of the leaders of the temple music as organized by David (1 Chron. 6:33 where singer should rather be rendered musician; 15:17; 16:41, 42), B. C. about 960. This, probably, is the Heman to whom the eighty-eighth Psalm is ascribed. He had fourteen sons and three daughters. "Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun are termed 'seers' (2 Chron. 35:15), which refers rather to their genius as sacred musicians than to their possessing the spirit of prophecy (1 Chron. 16:19; 25:1; 2 Chron. 5:12), although there is not wanting evidence of their occasional inspiration" (McC. and S., Cyc.).

HE'MATH (Heb. חַמַּת, kham-awth', fortress).

1. A Kenite, ancestor of the Rechabites (1 Chron. 2:55).

2. An incorrect Anglicized form (1 Chron. 13:5; Amos 6:14) of HAMATH (q. v.).

HEM'DAN (Heb. חֶמְדָּן, khem-dawn', pleasant), the first named of the four "children" of Dishon, which latter was a son of Seir, and one of the Horite "dukes" in Mount Seir (Gen. 36:26). In 1 Chron. 1:41 the name is, by an error of transcribers, written Amran.

HEMLOCK. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

HEN. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HEN (Heb. חַנָּה, khane, grace), the son of Zephaniah, to whom the prophet was sent with a symbolical crown (Zech. 6:14); probably a figurative name for Josiah (v. 10). "By the LXX and others the words are taken to mean 'for the favor of the son of Zephaniah'" (Smith, Dict.).

HE'NA (Heb. חַיִּנָּה, hay-nah', signification unknown), a city probably in Mesopotamia, mentioned in connection with Hamath, Arpad, etc., as having been overthrown by Sennacherib before his invasion of Judea (2 Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13). It is probably the city of Ana on the Euphrates.

HE'NADAD (Heb. חַנָּדָד, khay-nav-dawd', favor of Hadad), a Levite, whose sons were active in the restoration after the captivity (Ezra 3:9). Two of the latter, Bavai and Binnui, are named (Neh. 3:18, 24; 10:9), B. C. before 536.

HE'NOCH (1 Chron. 1:3, 33). See ENOCH.

HE'PHER (Heb. חַפְרָיִם, khay'-fer, a pit, well).

1. The youngest son of Gilead and great-grandson of Manasseh (Num. 27:1). He was the father of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33; 27:1; Josh. 17:2, 3), and his descendants were called Hepherites (Num. 26:32), B. C. before 1170.

2. The second son of Ashur (a descendant of Judah) by one of his wives, Naarah (1 Chron. 4:6), B. C. after 1210.

3. A Mecherathite, one of David's heroes, according to 1 Chron. 11:36. The name does not appear in the list given in Samuel, and is supposed to be an interpolation, or identical with Eliphelet of 2 Sam. 23:34.

4. A royal city of the Canaanites, taken by Joshua (12:17), and used by Solomon for commissary purposes (1 Kings 4:10). It is to be sought for in the neighborhood of Socoh, in the plain of Judah.

HE'PHERITE (Heb. חַפְרָיִם, khef-ree'), a descendant of Hephher 2 (Num. 26:32).

HEPH'ZI-BAH (Heb. חַפְצִיבָּה, khef-tsee'-baw, my delight is in her).

1. The queen of Hezekiah and mother of King Manasseh (2 Kings 21:1), B. C. before 690.

2. A symbolical name given to Zion by Isaiah (62:4). Zion had been called "Forsaken," but now is called Hephzi-bah, as the object of God's affection.

HERALD (Heb. כְּרוֹז, kaw-roze', only in Dan. 3:4), a crier, a herald, from an old Persian word khresii (Keil, Com., in loc.). The several Greek words usually rendered "preach" in the New Testament have the meaning of to proclaim as a herald, while the word "preacher" (1 Tim 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11; 2 Pet. 2:5) would be more correctly rendered herald.

HERB, see VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

HERBS, BITTER (Heb. מְרֵיִם, mer-o-reem'). The Israelites were commanded to eat "bitter herbs" with the Passover bread (Exod. 12:8; Num. 9:11) in remembrance of the bitterness of their bondage in Egypt (Exod. 1:14). "The Mishnah mentions these five as falling within the designation of 'bitter herbs,' viz, lettuce, endive, succory, what is called 'Charchavina (artica, beets?), and horehound'" (Edersheim, The Temple, p. 204).

HERD (Heb. בָּקָר, baw-kawr'; Gr. ἀγέλη, ag-el'-ay). "The herd was greatly regarded both in the patriarchal and Mosaic period. The ox was the most precious stock next to horse and mule. The herd yielded the most esteemed sacrifice (Num. 7:3; Psa. 69:31; Isa. 66:3); also flesh meat and milk, chiefly converted, probably, into butter and cheese (Deut. 32:14; 2 Sam. 17:29), which such milk yields more copiously than that of small cattle. The full-grown ox was hardly ever slaughtered in Syria; but, both for sacrificial and convivial purposes, the young animal was preferred (Exod. 29:1). The agricultural and general usefulness of the ox, in plowing, thrashing, and as a beast of burden (1 Chron. 12:40; Isa. 46:1), made such a slaughtering seem wasteful. The animal was broken to service probably in his third year (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:34). In the moist season, when grass abounded in the waste lands, especially in the 'south' region, herds grazed there. Especially was the eastern table land (Ezek. 39:18; Num. 32:4) 'a place for cattle.' Herdsmen, etc., in Egypt were a low, perhaps the lowest caste; but of the abundance of cattle in Egypt, and of the care there bestowed on them, there is no doubt (Gen. 47:6, 17; Exod. 9:4, 20). So the plague of hail was sent to smite especially the cattle (Psa. 78:48), the firstborn of which also were smitten (Exod. 12:29). The Israelites departing stipulated for (Exod. 10:26) and took 'much cattle' with them (12:38). Cattle formed thus one of the traditions of the Israelitish nation in its greatest period, and became almost a part of that greatness. When pasture failed, a mixture of various grains (Job 6:5) was used, as also 'chopped straw' (Gen. 24:25; Isa. 11:7; 65:25), which was torn in pieces by the thrashing machine and used probably for feeding in stalls. These last formed an important adjunct to cattle keeping, being indispensable for shelter at certain seasons (Exod. 9:6, 19)" (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

HERDMAN (Heb. בֹּקֵר, bo-kare', a tender of oxen; in distinction from רֹעֵי, a feeder of sheep). The rich owners of herds placed them in charge of herdsmen, who watched the cattle to keep them from straying, to protect them from wild beasts, and lead them to suitable pasture. Usually they carried a staff furnished with a point of iron (see GOAD) and had also a wallet or small bag for provisions, etc. (1 Sam. 17:40, 43; Psa. 23:4; Mic. 7:14; Matt. 10:10; Luke 9:3,4). They wore a cloak, with which they could envelop the entire body (Jer. 43:12); and their food was always simple, sometimes only the chance fruit they might find (Amos 7:14; Luke 15:15). Their wages consisted of the products of the herd, especially of the milk (Gen. 30:32, sq.; 1 Cor. 9:7). The occupation of herdsman was honorable in early times (Gen. 47:6; 1 Sam. 11:5; 1 Chron. 27:29; 28:1). Saul himself resumed it in the interval of his cares as king; also Doeg was certainly high in his confidence (1 Sam. 21:7). Pharaoh made some of Joseph's brethren "rulers over his cattle." David's herdmasters were among his chief officers of state. The prophet Amos at first followed this occupation (Amos 1:1; 7:14). See SHEPHERD.

HE'RES (Heb. חֵרֶס, har-kheh'-res, mountain of the sun), a city of Dan, near Aijalon, which the Ammonites continued to hold (Judg. 1:35), but as tributaries. Keil (Com., in loc.) thinks Har-kheh'-res only another name for Ir-shemesh.

HE'RESH (Heb. חֵרֶשׁ, kheh'-resh, silence, artificer), one of the Levites that dwelt in the "villages of the Netophathites," near Jerusalem, on the return from captivity (1 Chron. 9:15), B. C. 536.

HERESY (Gr. ἄρεσις, hal'-ee-res-is, a choice) means, in the New Testament: 1. A chosen course of thought and action; hence one's chosen opinion, tenet, and so a sect or party, as the Sadducees (Acts 5:17); the Pharisees (15:5; 26:5); the Christians (24:5, 14; 28:22). 2. Dissensions arising from diversity of opinions and aims (Gal. 5:20; 1 Cor. 11:19). 3. Doctrinal departures from revealed truth, or erroneous views (Tit. 3:10; 2 Pet. 2:1). Against such departures the apostles vigorously warned the Church (Acts 20:29; Phil. 3:2).

In the Early Church. In the apostolic age we find three fundamental forms of heresy, which reappear with various modifications in almost every subsequent period.

(1) Judaistic. "The Judaizing tendency, the heretical counterpart of Jewish Christianity, so insists on the unity of Christianity with Judaism, as to sink the former to the level of the latter, and make the Gospel merely a perfected law. It regards Christ also as a mere prophet, a second Moses, and denies, or at least wholly overlooks, his priestly and kingly offices, and his divine nature in general. The Judaizers were Jews in reality, and Christians only in appearance and name. They held circumcision and the whole moral and ceremonial law of Moses to be still binding, and the observance of them necessary to salvation. Of Christianity as a new, free, and universal religion, they had no conception. The same heresy, more fully developed, appears in the 2d century under the name of Ebionism."

(2) The Paganizing or Gnostic Heresy. "This exaggerates the Pauline view of the distinction of Christianity from Judaism, sunders Christianity from its historical basis, resolves the real humanity of the Saviour into a Docetic illusion (i. e., the heavenly Being, whose nature is pure light, suddenly appearing as a sensuous apparition). The author of this baptized heathenism, according to the uniform testimony of Christian antiquity, is Simon Magus, who unquestionably adulterated Christianity with pagan ideas and practices, and gave himself out, in pantheistic style, for an emanation of God. This heresy, in the 2d century, spread over the whole Church, east and west, in various schools of gnosticism."

(3) Syncretistic Heresy. As attempts had already been made, before Christ, by Philo and others to blend the Jewish religion with heathen philosophy, especially that of Pythagoras and Plato, so now, under the Christian name, there appeared confused combinations of these opposing a Christian resident at Rome to whom St. Paul sends greeting (Rom. 16:14). Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen agree in attributing to him the work called The Shepherd, but this is greatly disputed. He is celebrated as a saint, in the Roman calendar, on May 9.

HERMES (Gr. Ἑρμῆς, her-mace', i. e., the Greek Mercury), a man mentioned (Rom. 16:14) as a disciple in Rome. "According to the Greeks he was one of the seventy disciples and afterward Bishop of Dalmatia" (Calmet, Dict., s. v.).

HERMOG'ENES (Gr. Ἑρμογένης, her-mog-en'-ace, Mercury-born), a disciple in Asia Minor mentioned by the apostle Paul, along with Phygellus, as having deserted him, doubtless from fear systems, forming either a paganizing Judaism or a Judaizing paganism, according as the Jewish or the heathen element prevailed.

"Whatever their differences, however, all these three fundamental heresies amount at last to a more or less distinct denial of the central mystery of the Gospel—the incarnation of the Son of God for the salvation of the world. They make Christ either a mere man or a mere superhuman phantom; they allow, at all events, no real and abiding union of the divine and human natures in the person of the Redeemer."

Heresy disturbed the unity of doctrine and of fellowship in the early Church, which was therefore forced to exclude those holding false doctrine from its communion. Once excluded, they formed societies of their own. This was the case with the Novatians, Gnostics, Donatists, etc. See Schaff (Hist. Christ. Church, p. 88, sq.).

HERMAS (Gr. Ἑρμᾶς, her-mamas', Mercury), of the perils of the connection (2 Tim. 1:15). Nothing more of him is known.

HER'MON (Heb. הַר הֶרְמוֹן, kher-mone', the peak), a mountain which formed the northernmost boundary (Josh. 12:1) of the country beyond the Jordan (11:17), which Israel conquered from the Amorites (Deut. 3:8). It must, therefore, have belonged to Anti-Libanus (1 Chron. 5:23; comp. Deut. 4:48; Josh. 11:3, 17, etc.). It is identified with the present Jebel es-Sheik, i. e., Sheik's Mountain, situated thirty miles S. W. of Damascus and forty miles N. E. of the sea of Galilee. Its height is about nine thousand and thirty-five feet above the Mediterranean sea. In Deut. 4:48 it is called Mount Zion, i. e., a high mountain, being by far the highest of all mountains in or near Palestine. The ancient inhabitants of Canaan had sacred places on the high mountains and the hills. We need not wonder, then, that Hermon should have been selected for the altar and the sacred fire. Hermon was the religious center of primeval Syria.

Its Baal sanctuaries not only existed, but gave it a name, before the Exodus (Josh. 11:17). "From nearly every prominent point in Palestine the mountain is visible, but it is when we leave the hill country of Samaria and enter the plain of Esdraelon that Hermon appears in all its majesty, shooting up on the distant horizon behind the graceful rounded top of Tabor. It was probably this view that suggested to the Psalmist the words 'The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name (Psa. 89:12)'" (McC. and S., Cyc.). The Psalmist also speaks (Psa. 133:3) of the "dew of Hermon." The snow on the mountain condenses the vapors during the summer so that abundant dews descend upon it while the surrounding country is parched. One of its tops is actually called Abu-Nedy, i. e., "father of dew."

It is now quite generally accepted that one of the southern peaks of Hermon was the scene of the transfiguration. "In many points it fits the narrative of the gospels better than Tabor" (Schaff-Herzog, s. v.). Kitto says: "There can be no doubt that one of the southern peaks of Hermon was the scene of the transfiguration. Our Lord traveled from Bethsaida, on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee, to the coasts of Cæsarea Philippi; thence he led his disciples 'into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them.' Afterward he returned, going toward Jerusalem through Galilee (comp. Mark 8:22-28; Matt. 16:13; Mark 9:2-13, 30-33). For many centuries a monkish tradition assigned this honor to Tabor, but it is now restored to its proper locality."

HERMONITES (Heb. הַרְמוֹנִיִּים, Eher-moneem), properly "the Hermons," with reference to the three summits of Mount Hermon (Psa. 42:6).

HER'OD. This was not a personal name, but the family or surname. It belonged alike to all the generations of the Herodian house as known to the Scriptures. Much confusion has arisen from not having cognized this simple fact. Hence some have even questioned the inerrancy of Luke in that he called Herod Antipas "Herod," when Josephus uniformly calls him "Antipas." But the point assumed is itself a mistake. For Luke mentions him as "Herod," and "Herod the tetrarch," and as "Herod the tetrarch of Galilee" in the same chapter (3:1, 19); and Josephus repeatedly calls him "Herod the tetrarch," and "Herod the tetrarch of Galilee," and "that Herod who was called Antipas" (Ant., xviii, ch. 2, § 3; ch. 7, § 1; ch. 9, §§ 5 and 6; War., ii, ch. 9, § 1). The identification therefore is perfect as regards the person, the official title, the political geography; and Luke's mention is strictly historical. All the descendants of Herod the Great down to the fourth generation, who were identified with the government of Palestine and are mentioned in the New Testament, are known in history by the surname Herod: Herod Archælaus, Herod Antipas, Herod Philip II, Herod Agrippa I, and Herod Agrippa II.

I. HER'OD THE GREAT, B. C. 37-4.

1. History. The father of Herod the Great was named Antipater. He was of Idumæan blood. The Idumæans were of the Edomite stock, the descendants from Esau (see Smith's Bible Dict., "Idumæan;" Josephus, Ant., xiv, ch. 8, § 5; Wars., i, ch. 10, § 3). They occupied a southern district of Palestine known as Nageb, located between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea and southward. By conquest John Hyrcanus brought the Idumæans into Palestine about B. C. 130, and as they conformed to the Jewish rite of circumcision they embraced the Jewish religion. However, the Jews regarded the Idumæans with considerable suspicion and prejudice, calling them but "half Jews" (Ant., xiv, ch. 15, § 2; xx, ch. 8, § 7). Josephus records that Herod was appointed procurator of Galilee when only fifteen years of age (Ant., xiv, ch. 9, § 2); but probably the age of twenty-five was intended (see Whiston's note in loco). Mark Antony gave Herod a tetrarchy (Ant., xiv, ch. 13, §§ 1 and 2; War., i, ch. 12, § 5), and afterward he persuaded the Roman Senate to make Herod a king (Ant., xiv, ch. 14, § 4). The great Roman historian Tacitus affirms that Herod was placed on the throne by Mark Antony, and that Augustus [Cæsar] enlarged his privileges (Hist., v, 9). But Herod did not succeed in asserting his royal rights over Palestine until he had captured Jerusalem, B. C. 37. Nevertheless, his coronation by Cæsar was made an occasion of great magnificence (Wars., i, ch. 20, § 3).

2. Architecture. Herod had a passion for ostentatious display in the direction of magnificent architecture and monuments, as had also all his ruling descendants after him. Jerusalem, as the metropolis of the land, was the recipient from him of much munificence in the way of architectural monuments. To conciliate the Jews, who had been alienated by his cruelties, he with much address proposed to reconstruct their ancient temple which Solomon had originally built, though it has been shrewdly suspected that he entertained the sinister motive to possess himself of the public genealogies collected there, especially those relating to the priestly families, unto whom they were of paramount importance and interest. It is said that he thereby hoped to destroy the genealogy of the expected Messiah, lest he should come and usurp his kingdom. However that may be, he endeavored to make the Jewish nation understand that he was doing them a great kindness without cost to them, and he promised that he would not attempt to build them a new temple, but merely restore to its ancient magnificence the one originally built by David's son. For the restoration made by Zerubbabel upon the return of Israel from the captivity of Babylon seems to have fallen short in architectural measurement, in height some sixty cubits (Ant., xv, ch. 11, § 1), and the whole was becoming marked with decay. To this end Herod took down the old temple to its very foundations, and engaged one thousand wagons to draw stones and ten thousand skilled workmen to teach the priests the art of stonemasonry and carpentering.

The temple proper which he erected was one hundred cubits in length and twenty cubits in height. It was constructed of white stone, each one being twenty-five cubits long and eight in height. Surmounting this structure was a great white dome adorned with pinnacle of gold, suggestive of a mountain of snow as seen from afar (Ant., xv, ch. 11, §§ 2 and 3). The Jewish tradition holds that "the temple itself was built by the priests in one year and six months, when they celebrated its completion with Jewish feast and sacrifices; but that the cloisters and outer inclosures were eight years in building." However that may be, additions were made continuously from year to year; so that though Herod began the rebuilding B. C. 20, as a whole it was literally true that the temple was "built (ἰκοδομήθη) in forty and six years," when the Jews so asserted to Jesus (John 2:20). But the end was not yet, for the work was really continued until A. D. 64, just six years before the final destruction of the temple by the Roman soldiers of Titus. Even then, when the Romans under Vespasian made incursion into Palestine in 64, Herod's great grandson, Herod Agrippa II was making expensive preparations to "raise the holy house twenty cubits higher" (War, v, ch. 1, § 5).

The destruction of the temple occurred on the Jewish Sabbath, August 10, in the year 70, and then was realized the prediction of Daniel that "sacrifice and oblation shall cease" (9:25-27). When Jerusalem was captured, the temple was burned, the Jewish people were expatriated; and never since has sacrifice been offered up to God on Jewish altars. The ceremonial law was extinguished significantly with their Sabbath! "Old things have passed away; behold all things have become new."

About the same time Herod rebuilt the temple at Samaria, "out of a desire to make the city more eminent than it had been before, but principally because he contrived that it might at once be for his own security and a monument of his magnificence" (Ant., xv, ch. 8, § 5). He is also credited with having erected a monument over the royal tombs at Jerusalem, after having attempted to rob the dead of their sacred treasures, "such as furniture of gold and precious goods that were laid up there" (Ant., xvi, ch. 7, § 1).

3. Character. Herod was not only an Idumæan in race and a Jew in religion, but he was a heathen in practice and a monster in character. During his administration as king he evidenced himself to be exceedingly crafty, jealous, cruel, and revengeful. He exercised his kingly power with the disposition of a very despot. This characteristic was illustrated in its worst form toward the several members of his own family. He had nine or ten wives (War, ii, ch. 28, § 4), and on the merest suspicion put to death his favorite wife, Mariamne, and also her brothers, Aristobulus and Alexander (War, i, ch. 11, § 6, close), and at last, when on his own deathbed, just five days before he died himself, he ordered his son, Antipater, to be slain (Ant., xv, ch. 7, §§ 5-7; War, i, ch. 22, § 5; Ant., xv, ch. 6, § 2, close; ch. 3, § 3; xvi, ch. 11, § 7; xvii, ch. 7, § 1; War, i, ch. 33, § 7). It is no wonder that Augustus should have ridiculed this Jewish king, saying that "It is better to be Herod's hog than to be his son!" It is easy to understand how it is accordant with his character that the inquiry made by the Magi, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" should so arouse his jealous spirit that he should "seek the young child to destroy him," and "sent forth and slew all the male children that were at Bethlehem" (Matt. 2:13, 16). One of Herod's most infamous crimes in the purpose was, when he was on his deathbed, to command that "the principal men of the entire Jewish nation" should come to his presence, whom he then shut up in the hippodrome and surrounded them by soldiers, and ordered that immediately after his own death, which he expected soon, they should all be killed, which he expected soon, they should all be killed, that it might seemingly, at least, afford "an honorable mourning at his funeral!" The royal wretch died, but the order was never executed (Ant., xvii, 6, 5; War, i, ch. 33, § 8).

II. HEROD ARCHÆLAUS (B. C. 4-A. D. 6) He was the eldest of the three sons who succeeded the father in the government of Palestine—the son of Malthake, the Samaritan wife (War, i, ch. 33, § 7).

1. Accession. His father provided in his will that Archælaus should become a king at his own death; but a deputation of fifty Jews of distinction, by the consent of Quintilius Varus, Prefect of Syria, sailed to Rome and protested against such measure, urging that instead there might be a theocracy under the civil authority of a Roman procurator. It is said that eight thousand Jews met and hailed these deputies with shouts of joy in sympathy with this movement.

2. Ethnarchy. When the Emperor Augustus had read the will and heard the protestations against Archælaus, he refused his royalty, and instead appointed him ethnarch over one half of his father's kingdom, including therein Samaria, Judea, and Idumæa, promising, however, that if his ruling his people should justify the measure he would thereafter make him a king over the same territory.

3. Government. But Archælaus began at once to usurp kingly prerogatives without and against imperial authority. Soon his course produced tumults and revolts, which he sought to reduce to peace by cruelties and terrorism. On the occasion of a certain Passover he slew three thousand Jewish subjects, "till the temple was full of dead bodies; and all this was done . . . by one who pretended to the lawful title of king" (Ant. E., xvii, ch. 9, §§ 3-6; War, B. ii, ch. 6, §§ 1, 2; ch. 7, § 8).

4. Deposition. In consequence of the complaints made against the ethnarch Archælaus was deposed in the year 6 of corrected chronology, which was early in the tenth year of his government, and he was banished to Vienna in Gaul (France), where at length he died. His territory was then reduced to a Roman province and placed under the authority of Coponius as procurator. "With Archælaus ended all remaining semblance of the monarchy. The scepter had departed from Judah." (Farrar on The Herods.)

5. Scripture Reference. A single incidental allusion is made in the gospels to Archælaus, but it is in exact accordancy with his character. It was probably near the close of the first year of Christ's infancy that Joseph and Mary returned from Egypt, intending to go to Galilee by way of Jerusalem. "But when he heard that Archælaus was reigning over Judea in the room of his father, Herod [the Great], he was afraid to go thither, and he turned aside into the parts of Galilee" (Matt. 2:22). (For criticism on the expression "Archælaus was reigning," see HEROD ANTIPAS, 8).

III. HER'OD ANTIPAS (B. C. 4—A. D. 39). This prince was the full but younger brother of Archælaus (Ant., xvii, ch. 1, § 3).

1. Character. As a ruler he was regarded as "sly, ambitious, luxurious, but not so able as his father" (Schürer). Hausrath does him the scant courtesy of calling him "a wily sneak!" Of him Jesus said, "Go ye and tell that fox, behold, I cast out devils;" Πορευθέντες εἶπατε τῇ ἀλώπεκι ταύτην (Luke 13:32). His administration was characterized throughout with cunning and crime, intensely selfish and utterly destitute of principle.

2. Tetrarchy. His father had contemplated making him a king, to reign over the territory ruled by Archælaus, which constituted one half of his own kingdom, but subsequently concluded to alter his will, making him a mere "tetrarch" of Galilee and Perea, which embraced but one fourth of the original territory (Ant., xvii, ch. 8, § 1), and Cæsar afterward confirmed the will and "made Antipas tetrarch" (War, i, ch. 33, § 7). Besides this testimony a coin exists which distinctly proves the historicity of this tetrarchy. It was struck in the year 83, and reads on the obverse side, "Of Herod the Tetrarch;" and on the reverse side, "Tiberias," as the capital of the tetrarchy; obverse, Ἡρώδου τετραρχου; reverse, Τιβεριου.

3. Marriages. Herod Antipas was first married to the daughter of Aretas, an Arabian king of Petra. Nevertheless he intrigued with Herodias, the wife of his half-brother, Philip I, who was a tetrarch of noble standing, in whose house Antipas was a guest. The two eloped together, although both were married at the time (Ant., xviii, ch. 5, § 1). Now Herodias was granddaughter of Herod the Great and sister of Herod Agrippa I, and the wife and niece of Herod Philip I.

4. John and Antipas. The scandalous conduct of Herod Antipas and Herodias is cited in the first three gospels in connection with the reproof administered by John the Baptist to Herod Antipas, and is treated quite at large by Josephus (Matt. 14; Mark 6; Luke 9; Ant., xviii, ch. 7, § 1). For John said, "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife" (Mark 6:18); and Luke adds, "Herod the tetrarch being reproved by him for Herodias, Philip's wife, and for all the evils which he had done, added yet this above all, that he shut up John in prison" (3:19, 20).

The first two gospels mention "the daughter of Herodias," but neither gives her name. Josephus says that her name was Salome (Ant., xviii, ch. 5, § 4). The occasion referred to by both evangelists and historian, in which so much interest centers, was a festive party of the nobles of the land who assembled at the tetrarch's palace to celebrate the anniversary of Herod's birthday. Salome here first appears in this scene in sacred history. On the mother's side she was granddaughter of Simeon, the high priest. Now the fact that a child was born to Philip and Herodias by the first marriage of the mother was a bar to her second marriage under Jewish law. Her marriage to Antipas, while her proper husband and his proper wife were still living, was the more aggravating to the Jews because she was a Jewess and belonged to the royal family; and their infamy was the more conspicuous in that Herod Antipas was the ruler of the Jews and had shamelessly put the Jewish laws at defiance (Lev. 18:16; 20:21).

This anniversary was the occasion, and this daughter, Salome, was made the guilty person by whom this infamous Herodias secured the revenge of a bad woman for the reproof given her husband for living with her unlawfully. Salome having danced before the nobles to the great fascination and gratification of Herod, he promised her anything she might ask of him, to the half of his kingdom. Herodias saw her opportunity and induced her daughter to request the head of John the Baptist, who was then in prison near at hand. The executioner was sent to the prison at once and the ghastly gift was given. John the Baptist was beheaded, the man who of all men born of women was greatest (Matt. 11:11; Luke 7:28). The voice of one crying in the wilderness was at last silenced. The rough and rugged prophet of righteousness ceased to live. "His disciples came and took up the body and buried it, and went and told Jesus" (Matt. 14:12).

The place of the Baptist's prison was anciently known as Machærus, but the modern name is Mkaur (see Bedeker's Palestine, 1876, p. 303). It is located in the mountain fastnesses with a deep ravine below, on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, between Abarim and Pisgah, not far from the northern extreme of the sea. It is said that "the rock-hewn dungeon was beneath the splendid banquet hall" in which the nobility were entertained when the swordsman was sent to bring in the prisoner's head. It was here "in the same mountains in which Israel sought for the grave of her first prophet [Moses], was the last prophet [John] entombed."

5. Treacheries. It was now the thirty-ninth year of our chronology when Caius Caligula had been for two years upon the imperial throne at Rome. He soon discovered the real character of Herod Antipas. Ascertaining that as tetrarch he was intriguing with a Roman officer of the army named Sejanus, and had been confederating with the king of Parthia against the Roman empire, and had laid in store armors for seventy thousand men of war, Antipas was soon to be called to judgment. Meantime Herodias was most urgent that the tetrarch should go to Rome and make request that he might receive a crown as king. Moreover, he was extremely jealous of his nephew Herod Agrippa I, who had already received a kingdom; a man whom Antipas had deeply offended by insulting reflections on his condition of poverty before he had had royalty bestowed on him. Agrippa was in relations of intimacy with the emperor, and kept him posted as to these movements of his uncle Antipas. At length Antipas unwillingly was constrained to go to Rome and request that the first will of his father might be granted him by the emperor. Herod Agrippa I immediately sent his freedman named Fortunatus to Rome with the necessary documents to prove these accusations, and Agrippa himself followed in a few days to confront Antipas with the facts and proofs in person. Antipas was just having his first interview when Fortunatus entered and handed the letters at once to the emperor. When Agrippa had also arrived, and all the accusations against Antipas were understood by the emperor, he challenged Antipas to deny the charges preferred of his treachery toward the imperial government, in confederating with Sejanus, and with Artabanus, king of Parthia, and the secret storing of arms against himself. The tetrarch could not deny these accusations, and so confessed his guilt.

6. Antipas Deposed. Thereupon Caligula deprived Herod Antipas of his tetrarchy "and gave it by way of addition to Agrippa's kingdom," confiscated his money, and sent him and his wife into perpetual banishment in Lyons, Gaul (France), and eventually in Spain, where he died (Ant., xviii, ch. 7, §§ 1, 2; War, ii, ch. 9, § 6). Dion Cassius also relates that "Herod the Palestinian, having given a certain occasion by reason of his brothers [nephew] was banished beyond the Alps, and his estates of the government confiscated to the state" (Book IV, Cæsar Augustus, 27).

7. Jesus and Antipas. It is now in place to consider the relations of our Saviour and this tetrarch during the week of the great crucifixion. It was about six years before Herod Antipas was deposed and exiled. From the time that this Herod had slain the Baptist, this crime had haunted his conscience. When then he heard of the deeds done by Jesus, "he was perplexed, because it was said of some that John had risen from the dead." "And Herod said, John have I beheaded, but who is this of whom I hear such things?" And he said, "This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead; and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him" (Luke 9:7; Matt. 14:2).

We find Herod Antipas at Jerusalem when Jesus was before Pilate on trial for his life. When Pilate understood that Jesus was from Galilee, the territory of Antipas, "he sent him to Herod as belonging to his jurisdiction." "And when Herod saw him, he was exceedingly glad; for he was desirous to see him of a long season, because he had heard many things of him, and he hoped to see some miracle done by him." Nevertheless, as Christ did not reply to his questions of curiosity, he was offended, and "Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate. And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together; for before they were at enmity between themselves" (Luke 23:5-12; comp. Acts 4:27).

8. Kingship of Antipas. Criticism has found difficulty in understanding how the evangelists mention that "Archælaus was reigning over Judea in the room of his father Herod [the Great]" as if he was a king, whereas Archælaus was but an ethnarch, and his father ruled a kingdom (Matt. 2:22). So also Herod Antipas is repeatedly called "a king" in the first two gospels when his principality was merely a tetrarchy (Matt. 14:1, 9; Mark 6:14, 22-27). Alford says, "Herod was not king properly, but only a tetrarch." Wescott, states that "he was called king by courtesy." Whedon, that he was so called "in compliance with custom;" and Farrar, "It is only popularly that he is called king." The determining argument, however, is fatal to all these conjectural opinions, and is based upon the usus of the word king, at the time the evangelists employed it, and not in its modern restricted sense. We now apply the term absolutely and exclusively to royalty, but in the time of Augustus and afterward, it was applicable not only to a sovereign ruler, but "in a general and lower sense applied equally to a prince, ruler, viceroy, and the like" (Robinson's Greek Dictionary of the New Testament, on βασιλεύς, and also βασιλεύω). The appellation was applied "to a chief, a captain, a judge . . . to a king's son, a prince, or anyone sharing in the government; generally a lord, a master, a householder, and after Augustus, to any great man" (Liddell and Scott's Greek Dictionary, 1883, on βασιλεύς). Josephus (born A. D. 37), who lived in the time of the apostles, confirms this usage when he relates that Herod the Great altered his will, "and therein made Antipas king," when in fact he was merely made tetrarch (War, i, ch. 32, § 7).

IV. HER'OD PHIL'IP II (B. C. 4-34 A. D.)

1. Philip the Tetrarch. This Herod was also the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra. He should not be confounded with a half brother of the same name, who was the son of Mariamne, and known as Philip I. By his father's will Philip I was excluded from all government rights on account of the supposed treachery on the part of his mother toward her husband (War, i, ch. 30, § 7). He married his niece Herodias, who afterward eloped with her husband's half brother Herod Antipas. Philip I and Herodias had a daughter named Salome, who figured in the death of John the Baptist. Philip II, the tetrarch, married this Salome.

2. Tetrarchy. With characteristic accuracy Luke refers to this "Philip," and is confirmed in all particulars by Josephus and contradicted in none. This Jewish historian of fame gives us definitely the countries included in his tetrarchy. He mentions how Herod the Great by will provided that his own kingdom should be divided between his three sons; Archælaus taking half the territory, as already described, to be ruled as an ethnarchy, and the remaining half to be divided into two parts, to be called tetrarchies, meaning each a fourth part, to be given to the "two sons, Philip [II] and Antipas;" and that "Batanaea and Trachonitis and Auranitis [i. e., Gaulonitis] and parts of Jamnia . . . were to be made subject to Philip;" under the name of tetrarchy (Ant., xvii, ch. 11, § 4; ch. 8, § 1). These regions were located in northeastern Palestine. There is in existence a coin struck by the authority of Philip II, in the reign of the Emperor Tiberius, which bears the following superscription:

Obverse, "Tiberius Augustus Cæsar"—Τιβεριος Σεβαστος Καισαρ.

Reverse, "Of Philip Tetrarch"—Φιλίππου τετ [ραρχης].

It is said that Philip was the first Jewish prince who used images on his coins (Madden on Jewish Coins; Thomas Lewin on Paul, vol. i, p. 17). Philip's subjects were mostly Syrians and Greeks. He had a peaceful rule for thirty-seven years.

3. Conduct. This tetrarch was altogether the best of all the Herods. He is described as "a person of moderation and quietness in the conduct of his life and government," whose consideration for his subjects was remarkable; that when he traveled among them he was careful to have his tribunal on which he sat in judgment to follow him in his progress, and when anyone met him who wanted assistance, he made no delay but had his tribunal set immediately wheresoever he happened to be, and sat down upon it and heard his complaint. Moreover, he left monuments of himself worthy of his name in improvements for his people. At Paneas, at the base of Mount Hermon, in the north, at the principal source of the Jordan, he built a new city with much magnificence, called Cæsarea Philippi (Matt. 16:13). It is now but a mere ruin. This city must be distinguished from Cæsarea on the Mediterranean Sea. He also erected Bethsaida to the rank of a city, whose site was a little north of the Sea of Galilee on the upper Jordan, and he gave it the name Julius, after Julia, "the profligate daughter of Augustus" (Ant., xviii, ch. 2, § 1; War, ii, ch. 9, § 1).

4. Death. After a long rule, distinguished for its moderation and equity, this worthy tetrarch died A. D. 34, which was "in the thirtieth year of the reign of Tiberius." He was greatly beloved by his people. He had married Salome, the daughter of Herodias, but they left no children. Upon his death his territory was annexed to the Roman province of Syria. "When he was carried to his monument, which he had already erected for himself beforehand, he was buried with great pomp" (Ant., xviii, ch. 4, § 6).

5. Philip and the Gospels. He is mentioned by Luke as "Philip, tetrarch of the Iturea," which is the Greek name for the country lying at the base of the Lebanon mountains (Luke 3:1). "When Jesus came into the coasts [Mark, Gr. τὰς κώμας, the villages] of Cæsarea Philippi, he asked his disciples, saying, Whom do men say that I, the Son of man, am. . . . But whom say ye that I am? Simon Peter said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. Jesus said, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 16:13-17; Mark 8:27-30). It was in this region that Jesus began to teach them that "the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be slain, and be raised the third day" (Luke 9:22). "But they understood not that saying, and were afraid to ask him" (Mark 9:32).

Thus the second generation of the Herodians known to the gospels pass out of history.

We come now to the third generation of the Herods, the first of whom is

V. HER'OD AGRIP'PA I (A. D. 37-44).

1. Princely Life. This Agrippa was the son of Bernice and Aristobulus, a son of Herod the Great, who slew him. He was born B. C. 10, and died A. D. 44. He was the child of two first cousins, and was himself married to another cousin, who was the daughter of his aunt, who again was married to an uncle! Josephus mentions him as "Agrippa," and "Agrippa the Great" (War, i, ch. 28, § 1; Ant., xvii, ch. 2, § 2; xviii, ch. 5, § 4). In the New Testament he is called either by his surname "Herod," or "Herod the king" (Acts 12:1, 6, 7, 11, 19-21). He was brought up and educated at Rome, as were most of the Herodian princes. Agrippa appears to have been a man of gracious manners, of kindly spirit in the main, gifted with extraordinary powers of eloquence, and quite vain withal. In religion he was a zealous rather than a devout Jew, attentive to "tithe of mint and anise and cummin," but neglectful of "the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith." He was keenly fond of popularity, and possessed much personal magnetism (Ant., xix, ch. 6, §§ 1, 2; xix, ch. 7, § 3).

2. Reverses. Agrippa and Caius (Gaius) Caligula, the heir apparent to the imperial throne, in early life became warm personal friends, a fact which afterward was greatly to the advantage of this prince. For out of this intimacy came some remarkable surprises and reverses of fortune to Agrippa. One day these friends were riding out together in a chariot, and Eutyclus, a freedman, was their charioteer. In the course of conversation, Agrippa enthusiastically stretched out his hands and said confidently to Caligula that he wished that old Tiberius would die, that Caius Caligula might assume the purple and the throne. The freedman, overhearing the remark, reported it to the emperor Tiberius, who at once peremptorily ordered Agrippa to be put in chains and then imprisoned. Wearing his robe of distinction, the order was executed, and Agrippa was placed among the criminals of the State. This humiliation was endured, however, but six months, when Tiberius died, and Caligula at once became emperor (Ant., xviii, ch. 6, § 6; War, ii, ch. 9, § 5).

3. Kingship. A few days after the imperial funeral Agrippa was summoned to appear at the new emperor's palace—the palace of Caligula. Having shaved and changed raiment, he presented himself hopefully in the presence of the new emperor, his friend, who immediately proceeded to "put a diadem upon Agrippa's head and appointed him to be king of the tetrarchy of [his uncle] Philip [and Lysanius]; also . . . changed his iron chain for a gold one of equal weight," which he hung about his neck. Afterward this golden chain was "hung up within the limits of the temple at the treasury [at Jerusalem], that it might be a memorial of the severe fate he had lain under; . . . a demonstration how the greatest prosperity may have a fall, and that God sometimes raises what is fallen down. . . . For this chain thus dedicated afforded a document to all men that King Agrippa had once been bound in a chain for a small cause, but recovered his former dignity and was advanced to be a more illustrious king" (Ant., xviii, ch. 6, §§ 10, 11; xix, ch. 6, § 1). The Senate at Rome also gave him the honorary position of pretor.

4. Assumes Government. In the second year of Caligula's reign Agrippa requested leave of the emperor to return home to Palestine and take possession of his kingdom (Ant., xviii, ch. 6, § 11). Accordingly he sailed on the Mediterranean, in the usual course, to Alexandria in Egypt. At this time the Jews and Greeks of the city were in very unpleasant relations with each other. When the Greeks saw this Jewish king, accompanied by his bodyguard, exploiting much gold and silver, they spitefully took occasion to mock him with the meanest insults. They even engaged a poor, naked, idiot boy, named Carabas, who was the butt of the street boys, placed on him a crown of paper, clothed him in mat cloth, and with a stick in his hand to represent a scepter and a bodyguard composed of the gamin of the city, they derided the new king on the stage (see Philo's Flaccum, §§ 5 and 8). But when Agrippa reached his subjects in Palestine the Jews were astonished to see him returning as a king, and he was received with apparent satisfaction.

5. Memorable Services. In accordance with his promise on leaving the emperor at Rome, having organized and established his kingdom, King Agrippa I returned to the imperial capital. It was about this time that Caligula developed unmistakable indications of insanity, and, among other things, demanded that he should be universally deified and adored as a god, and that all men should swear by his name. He filled his Jewish subjects with the utmost horror when he ordered Petronius, president of Syria, to place a gilded statue of the emperor in the holy of holies of the temple at Jerusalem to be worshipped. For when they submitted to become subjects of the empire they were guaranteed all their own national and religious rights. A similar attempt at Alexandria had occasioned both tumults and massacres. An embassy composed of Jews, who were the principal men among them, was organized, with the eminent Philo at their head, to persuade Caligula to desist from this inexpressible wrong. But when they went to the emperor he refused them his presence, and bade Philo "Begone!" Petronius meantime, with an army, marched to Jerusalem. At Ptolemais the Jews flocked by the ten thousand to petition the Syrian prefect not to compel them to "violate the laws of their forefathers;" but that, if he persisted in carrying out the imperial order, to first kill them, and then do what he was resolved upon (Ant., xviii, ch. 8, §§ 1-6). Petronius was touched with this loyalty of their faith, and, dismissing the Jews, promised to send to Rome in their interests in this matter. Meantime Agrippa, who was at this time at Rome, furnished in honor of Caligula a magnificent banquet; and when the emperor was full of wine, and Agrippa had drunk to his health, Caligula generously proposed in return everything that might contribute to Agrippa's happiness, and, so far as was in the emperor's power, he should be at his service. With admirable tact and address Agrippa declined to receive anything in his own behalf, as he had already received so much; but, in behalf of his brethren at home, he said, "This is my petition, that thou wilt no longer think of the dedication of that statue which thou hast ordered to be set up in the Jewish temple by Petronius." Caligula thereupon, "as a favor to Agrippa," rescinded the order (Ant., xviii, ch. 8, §§ 1-8). Nevertheless, because Petronius so far disobeyed Caligula's orders as to make representations, and so delay executing his orders, the emperor ordered the prefect to commit suicide; but the order was delayed at Rome, and very soon Caligula died by the dagger of the assassin, named Chærea, whom the emperor had outrageously insulted. This was in A. D. 41.

6. Enlarged Kingdom. Claudius, a weak-minded man, who had been the laughingstock of the court, now came to the front. Through the friendly offices of Herod Agrippa I, who with great diplomacy used his influence adroitly with the Senate favorably for this man, he was made emperor. As a return for being elevated to the imperial succession in the house of the Cæsars and the empire of the world, Claudius published edicts in favor of the Jews, and greatly enlarged the dominions of Agrippa by adding Judea, Samaria, and Abyeane, so that his realm was now almost as extensive as was his grandfather's, King Herod the Great, lacking only Idumæa (Ant., xix, ch. 5, § 1; War, ii, ch. 11, § 5). Monumental evidence of the historicity of this account is furnished in a coin struck by Herod Agrippa I, at Cæsarea. It reads:

Obverse: ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΜΕΓΑΣ ΑΓΡΙΠΠΑ ΦΙΛΟΚΑΙΣΑΡ.

Reverse: ΚΑΙΣΑΡ Η ΣΕΒΑΣΤΩ ΑΙΜΕΝ.

Obverse: "Agrippa the Great, Lover of Cæsar."

Reverse: "Cæsar on Port Sebastus."

Sebaste is the standing Greek word for Augustus, the title assumed by several emperors. "Cumanus took one troop of horsemen, called the troop of Sebaste, out of Cæsarea" (War, ii, ch. 12, § 5).

7. Humiliations Imposed. Though having received royalty, with the added heritage of his grandfather's kingdom, Herod Agrippa was at one time made to feel that, after all, his dominion was a mere dependency upon the Roman power which dominated the nations included in the empire. Being of Idumæan origin, it is related that on one occasion, before his kingdom had been enlarged by Claudius, when the Feast of Tabernacles was observed, the lesson from the law for the day was read: "Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shalt choose. . . . Thou mayest not set a stranger over thee which is not thy brother" (Deut. 17:15). He, remembering that he was of foreign stock, and was so recognized by his brethren, Agrippa, from bitter anticipations, burst into tears before them all; but the people, sympathizing with him, exclaimed, "Fear not, Agrippa, thou art our brother!" For the law required also, "Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite, for he is thy brother. . . . The children that are begotten of them shall enter into the congregation of the Lord in their third generation" (Deut. 23; ch. 7, § 8). Agrippa thus was clearly entitled to this consideration; he was at a remove of the third generation at least from the Idumæans or Edomites.

Now Agrippa resided mostly at Jerusalem. He commenced the building of impregnable walls to fortify the city. But Marsus Vibius, prefect of Syria, ordered the constructions discontinued on the mere grounds of suspicion. The king, like his ancestors, was fond of ostentatious display. He had once invited a number of petty kings contiguous to his own realm to be his guests and accept his hospitality at the city Tiberias, where royal spectacles were to be witnessed. Marsus Vibius came also from Syria. Agrippa and the five kings thinking to do him honor, went forth in a chariot about seven furlongs to meet the prefect. But Marsus, being suspicious of the real meaning of hospitable popularity and display of the public games, offered a great affront to all concerned when he ordered the five kings to proceed at once and quietly to their respective homes (Ant., xix, ch. 7, § 2; Ibid., ch. 8, § 1).

8. Christian Persecutions. Herod Agrippa I is known in the New Testament simply as "Herod." He was the only Herod who had royalty bestowed upon him and governed all Palestine since the death of his grandfather, Herod the Great, who died soon after the birth of Jesus. He is mentioned only in the Book of Acts, where he is named twice in the same chapter in connection with two different events (ch. 12). Although usually an affable man, he was exceedingly ambitious to please his Jewish subjects, and this passion led him to become a persecutor of the Christians in the little community at Jerusalem. The record reads: "Now about this time Herod the king stretched forth his hands to vex (κακόω, to maltreat, exasperate) certain of the Church. And he killed James, the brother of John [sons of Zebedee], with the sword; and because he saw it pleased the Jews he proceeded further to take Peter also," with a view of slaying him after the Passover was ended (Acts 12:1-3). But Peter was delivered by night by the interposition of an angel. Now this procedure was exactly accordant with the Jewish Talmud in the Mishna, which reads thus: "The ordinance of putting to death by the sword is this, the man's head is cut off with a sword, as is accustomed to be done by royal command" (Professor Lombry, Com., in loco; comp. Ant., xix, ch. 9, § 3).

9. Death. Agrippa and his deputies and other dignitaries of the land assembled at Cæsarea, at the seaside, to celebrate the games at a festival and to offer vows for the safety and prosperity of the Emperor Claudius. Early in the morning of the second day of the celebration the king presented himself to the people clad in "a garment made wholly of silver and of a texture truly wonderful." When the sun's rays touched his dress the reflections shone out in a surprising splendor. Josephus says that the people exclaimed that "he was a god," and that "the king did neither rebuke them nor reject their impious flattery" (comp. Acts 12:19-23). After five days the king "departed this life, being in the fifty-fourth year of his age and in the seventh of his reign." "For he reigned four years under Caius [Caligula] Cæsar, three of them were over Philip's tetrarchy only, and on the fourth he had that of Herod [Antipas] added to it; and he reigned besides those three years under the reign of Claudius Cæsar" (Ant., xix, ch. 8, § 2).

VI. HEROD AGRIPPA II (A. D. 53-70).

1. Identification. Much confusion and difficulty have been experienced to identify these two historical personages—father and son—as they bear exactly the same name. Nevertheless, they are known in both profane and sacred history by different appellations. Outside of Scripture the elder is called Herod Agrippa I and the younger as Herod Agrippa II. But in the New Testament the father is named either "Herod," as he is repeatedly called in the same chapter (Acts 12:6, 11, 19-21), or "Herod the king" (12:1); whereas the son, in contradistinction from the father, is called either "Agrippa" (25:22, 23; 26:32), or "King Agrippa" (25:26; 26:27, 28). True, both were kings and bore the same name, but they were not both rulers at the same time and their kingdoms were different. So far as appears in Scripture, Herod Agrippa I was king of all Palestine proper during the period A. D. 41-44; while Herod Agrippa II was king of perhaps one third of that country, lying to the north and northeast, during the period A. D. 52-70, when his government was utterly destroyed by the Roman-Jewish war and the Jewish nation ceased to be. As to scriptural incidents associated with each, it was Herod Agrippa I who beheaded James, the brother of John, and also imprisoned Peter at Jerusalem (12:13); but it was Herod Agrippa II who went to Cæsarea, whom Paul called "king" or "King Agrippa" in his memorable defense at Cæsarea (26:2, 7, 13, 19, 26, 27), and whom Luke calls either "Agrippa" or "King Agrippa" in narrating the same occasion (25:13, 22-24, 26; 26:28, 32).

2. Youth. When Herod Agrippa I died, in A. D. 44, he left this son and three daughters named Bernice, Mariamne, and Drusilla (Ant., xviii, ch. 5, § 4; xix, ch. 9, § 1). Agrippa was born A. D. 27, and was but a stripling of seventeen years of age at his father's death, resident at the imperial capital, receiving his education under the patronage of the emperor. "Now Agrippa, the son of the deceased, was at Rome and brought up with Claudius Cæsar" (Ant., xix, ch. 9, § 2). This emperor at first contemplated placing young Agrippa immediately upon his father's throne to rule all Palestine; but better counsels prevailing, he concluded that it would be "a dangerous experiment" for "so young a man," who was without any experience, to undertake to govern so large a kingdom (Ant., xix, ch. 9, § 2). "So Claudius made the country a Roman province, and sent Cuspius Fadus to be procurator of Judea and the whole of the kingdom" (Ant., xix, ch. 9, § 2; War, ii, ch. 11, § 6).

3. Royalty. When his uncle, Herod, king of Chalcis, died, in A. D. 48, Agrippa junior had attained the twenty-first year of his age. Claudius now appointed him to be governor of that vacant kingdom. At the same time he was made superintendent of the Jewish temple at Jerusalem and manager of its treasury, with full power to remove the high priests from office at will, an authority which he frequently exercised, as did his uncle before him (Ant., xx, ch. 8, § 11; xx, ch. 9, §§ 1, 4, 6; xx, ch. 1, § 3). These frequent changes of the high priesthood for political reasons rendered Herod Agrippa II quite unpopular with the Jews.

It is not quite clear whether royalty was conferred upon this Agrippa when he was appointed at Chalcis over his uncle's vacant kingdom, but it is quite certain he had this distinction at least when he was transferred to another and greater kingdom. His royal residence was finally established at Cæsarea Philippi, at the southwestern base of Mt. Hermon, which is at the principal source of the River Jordan.

4. Kingdom. Josephus remarks: "Now, after the death of Herod, king of Chalcis, Claudius set Agrippa, the son of Agrippa, over his uncle's kingdom, while Cumanus took upon him the office of procurator of the rest (of the territory), which was a Roman province" (War, ii, ch. 12, § 1). He also mentions that about the year 53, "when Claudius had completed the twelfth year of his reign, he bestowed upon Agrippa [II] the two former tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanius, but took from him Chalcis when he had been governor thereof four years" (Ant., xx, ch. 7, § 1; War, ii, ch. 12, § 1), and removed him to a greater kingdom" (War, ii, ch. 12, § 8). His realm was now situated in the north and northeast of Palestine, but the regions known as Peræa, and Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, which belonged to the kingdom of his father, were never included in the kingdom of King Herod Agrippa II. A coin exists, struck by the authority of the second Herod, at Cæsarea Philippi, the capital of his new kingdom, in the imperial reign of Nero, which reads thus:

Obverse: "Nero Cæsar."

Reverse: "By King Agrippa, Neronias."

That is, the city Cæsarea Philippi is renamed "Neronias" in honor of Nero, the reigning emperor at that time.

5. End. Herod Agrippa II, unlike his father, was never popular with his subjects. It appears to have been the purpose of the procurator, Florus, to goad the Jews into revolt and war with the whole Roman empire by his own official and infamous conduct toward those people. "Multitudes of Jews addressed themselves to the king [Agrippa II] and to the high priests, and desired that they might have leave to send ambassadors to Nero against Florus" (War, ii, ch. 17, § 4). But Agrippa, seeing the evils to arise, in a public address endeavored to dissuade the Jews from their warlike purpose, an appeal which ended in tears, and greatly moved the impassioned people addressed. But when Agrippa saw that the inevitable had come, he joined his forces with those of the Romans and made war upon his abused and aggrieved subjects (War, ii, ch. 17, § 4). In a battle before Gamala Herod was wounded in the elbow by a stone, but continued in the command of his own troops until the Romans had destroyed both Agrippa's kingdom and the Jewish commonwealth. The war closed in the capture of Jerusalem in the year 70. Agrippa then retired to Rome, where at length he died, in the seventy-third year of his age, A. D. 100, and in the third year of the reign of the emperor Trajan.

Josephus makes special note of the fact that Titus, the Roman general, affixed his signature to the history of the Roman-Jewish war, as written by himself, and authenticated its statements as being historical, and, moreover, when he was emperor, ordered the publication of his books; and that Josephus then had in his possession sundry letters from Herod Agrippa II attesting the truth of his historical narrative as one who was an eyewitness of the facts therein stated (Life, § 65).

PRINCESSES OF THE HOUSE OF THE HERODS.—HERODIAS, BERNICE, DRUSILLA. The Herodian princesses were not themselves Jewish rulers, but were married to those who were. They belonged to the royal family by birth. There were others, but these are the only ones mentioned in the historical New Testament.

I. HERODIAS. See under HEROD ANTIPAS, 3 and 4.

II. BERNICE. 1. Personality. This princess was the eldest daughter of King Herod Agrippa I and Cypros, and she was therefore the sister of King Herod Agrippa II and Drusilla; and she was the wife of Herod, king of Chalcis, "who was both her husband and uncle." She was sometimes called "a queen," but in reality never wore a crown. Bernice was a woman of rarest beauty and charms of person. Tacitus mentions her as "Queen Bernice [who] at that time [was] in the bloom of youth and beauty" (Hist. ii, 81).

2. Character. Her husband dying in A. D. 48, Bernice was but twenty years of age. However, after that event her character was held much in question on the score of chastity. She had retired to the home of her brother Agrippa II, and even their relations with each other were regarded with grave suspicion (Ant., xx, ch. 7, § 3). In order to cast off all evil surmises respecting them, she accepted marriage with Polemo, king of Pontus, who was induced to take the step "on account of her riches;" but their married life together was of but short duration, as not long afterward Bernice forsook her husband and returned to her brother Agrippa (Ant., xx, ch. 7, § 3, comp. Tacitus, Hist., ii, 81; Suetonius, Titus, vii; Juvenal's Satires, 155-157). No intimation of Bernice's reputation is given in the references in the New Testament.

3. Publicity. She figures conspicuously besides her unmarried brother, Herod Agrippa II, in places of public interest and assemblies, on several occasions. In one instance they went together to Jerusalem to quiet the warlike spirit aroused among the Jews by the exasperating cruelties perpetrated by, and the conduct of, the notorious Gessius Florus, the procurator. Bernice appeared in the gallery of the auditorium overlooking the excited and surging multitude, to whom Agrippa made a powerful appeal that they should not revolt against the Roman power. "When Agrippa had thus spoken, both he and his sister wept, and by their tears repressed a great deal of the violence of the people" (War, ii, ch. 16, §§ 1-5). They went together again when "King Agrippa [II] was going to Alexandria, to congratulate Alexander [the procurator] upon his having obtained the government" of Judea (War, ii, ch. 15, § 1). And now once again they are found together at Cæsarea on the sea, to extend courtesy of greetings and congratulations to Portius Festus upon the occasion of his entering upon office as procurator of that country, while Paul was in custody there as a prisoner (Acts 25). From the lips of Festus, King Agrippa learned the particulars respecting the eloquent prisoner whom his predecessor Felix had left "bound," because "he was willing to show the Jews a pleasure." Already had Paul been imprisoned two years, and the official Jews of Jeru-

When the father died in A. D. 44, Drusilla was but a prattling child of six summers. As she grew into womanhood she became a celebrated beauty, and was the envy of even her sister Bernice.

1. Marriages. Being a Jewess of a family of distinction, she accepted in marriage Azizus, king of Edessa (Emesa), on the express condition that he would conform to the required ceremony of becoming a Jew. At one time "while Felix the procurator of Judea saw this Drusilla, he fell in love with her; for she did indeed excel all other women in beauty." Felix sent a Jew "to persuade her to forsake her husband and marry him; and he promised that if she would not refuse him, he would make her a happy woman." She accepted this proffer, and was "prevailed upon to transgress the laws of her forefathers and marry Felix. And when he had a son by her, he named salem had been clamoring for his life. Agrippa having expressed a desire to hear Paul speak in defense of the Christian faith, Festus promised him opportunity "on the morrow." Accordingly, "when Agrippa was come and Bernice with great pomp, and was entered into the place of hearing, with the chief captains and principal men of the city, at Festus's command Paul was brought forth" (Acts 25:22, 23). Bernice was now conspicuously seated beside her brother, King Agrippa. At this time the princess was thirty-two years of age, and "sat blazing with all her jewels" before the gazing public, listening to the apostle's immortal defense (Acts 26).

III. DRUSILLA. Herod Agrippa I left three daughters, named Bernice, Mariamne, and Drusilla, in that order of their age (Ant., xviii, ch. 5, § 4).

him Agrippa" (Ant., xx, ch. 7, §§ 1, 2). This son and mother perished in the eruption of Mount Vesuvius in the Christian year 79.

2. Husband. Claudius Felix was a man of low origin, and obviously of the lowest instincts. He "had been a slave [in Rome], in the vilest of all positions, at the vilest of all epochs, in the vilest of all cities" (Farrar). Tacitus says that as a procurator "Antonius Felix exercised the prerogatives of a king, with the spirit of a slave, rioting in cruelty and licentiousness;" a man who "supposed he might perpetrate with impunity every kind of villainy" (Annals, xii, 54). Suetonius remarks that "in consequence of his elevation [to be procurator of Judea], he became the husband of three queens" (Claudius, c. 28).

3. At Cæsarea. During the procuratorship,

"Felix came [to Cæsarea] with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, he sent for Paul and heard him concerning the faith in Christ Jesus. And as he reasoned of righteousness, and temperance [i. e., self-control], and the judgment to come, Felix was terrified, and answered, Go thy way for this time; and when I have a convenient season, I will call thee unto me." He hoped that bribe money would be given him to release Paul, and accordingly sent for him the oftener; but, when he was to be succeeded by the honorable Porcius Festus, "Felix left Paul bound" to please the Jews (Acts 24:24-27). Thus closed the scene and the procuratorship of Felix at Cæsarea.

HERODIANS (Gr. Ἡρωδιανοί, hay-ro-dee-anoy), a party among the Jews of the apostolic age, and a party keenly opposed to Jesus (Matt. 22:16; Mark 3:6; 12:13); but of which no explicit information is given by any of the evangelists. The party was, probably, formed under Herod the Great, and appears to have had for its principle that it was right to pay homage to a sovereign who might be able to bring the friendship of Rome and other advantages, but who had personally no title to reign by law and by religion. On this question they differed from the Pharisees (Matt. 22:16, 17), although they coalesced with them in disguised opposition, or in open union against Jesus, in whom they saw a common enemy. The Herodians were obviously something more than a political party, something less than a religious sect.

HERODIAS (Gr. Ἡρωδιάς, hay-ro-dee-as', feminine of Herod), the daughter of Aristobulus—one of the sons of Mariamne and Herod the Great—and sister of Herod Agrippa I. See HEROD, III, 4.

HERODION (Gr. Ἡρωδιών, hay-ro-dee'-ohn, derived from Herod), a Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation as his kinsman (Rom. 16:11). According to Hippolytus he became Bishop of Tarsus, but according to others, of Patra.

HERON. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HE'SED (Heb. הֶסֶד, kheh'-sed, kindness), the name of a man whose son (Ben-hesed) was Solomon's purveyor in the districts of Aruboth, Sochol, and Hephher (1 Kings 4:10), B. C. before 960.

HESH'BON (Heb. הֶשְׁבֹן, khesh-bone', intelligence), originally a Moabitish town, but when the Israelites arrived from Egypt it was ruled over by Sihon, styled both "king of the Amorites" and "king of Heshbon." It was taken by Moses (Josh. 21:23-26), and became a Levitical city (Josh. 21:39; 1 Chron. 6:81), in the tribe of Reuben (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:17); but, being on the border of Gad, is sometimes assigned to the latter (Josh. 21:39; 1 Chron. 6:81). "Heshbon, now Hesbân; twenty miles E. of Jordan. The ruins stand on a low hill, and are a mile in circuit; a shapeless mass of hewn stones, a great pool, a ruined fort, numerous caves here exist" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 374).

Figurative. In Cant. 7:4 the eyes of the Shulamite are likened to the "fishpools of Heshbon," by the gate of Bath-rabbim. The bright pools in the stream which runs beneath Hesbân on the west are probably intended (Harper).

HESH'MON (Heb. הֶשְׁמֹן, khesh-mone', fatness), a town in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:27), perhaps the same as Azmon (v. 4).

HETH (Heb. הֵת, khayth, terror, dread), the forefather of the nation of the HITTITES (q. v.) called "sons and children of Heth" (Gen. 23:3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 18, 20; 25:10; 49:32). Once we hear of the daughters of Heth (Gen. 27:46). In the genealogical tables of Gen. 10 and 1 Chron. 1, Heth is named as a son of Canaan, younger than Zidon, the firstborn, but preceding the Jebusite, the Amorite, and the other Canaanitish families. The Hittites were, therefore, a Hamitic race.

HETH'LON (Heb. הֶתְלוֹן, kheth-lone', wrapped up), the name of a place on the northern border of Palestine (Ezra 4:7:15; 48:1). In all probability the "way of Hethlon" is the pass at the northern end of Lebanon, and is thus identical with "the entrance of Hamath" in Num. 34:8, etc. Its site has not been identified.

HEWING (Heb. הָצַב, khaw-tsab'). The Gibeonites, having deceived Joshua, were sentenced to serve as "hewers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation" (Josh. 9:21), a service which was performed by the lowest class of the people (Deut. 29:11). In 1 Kings 5:15 it is recorded that Solomon "had fourscore thousand hewers in the mountains."

HEZ'EKI (Heb. הֶזְקִי, khiz-kee', strong), one of the "sons" of Elpael, a chief resident of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:17, 18).

HEZEKIAH (Heb. הֶזְקִיָּא, khiz-kee-yaw', strengthened of Jehovah, 2 Kings 18:1, 10, 14, 15, 16; 1 Chron. 3:23; Neh. 7:21; Prov. 25:1; הֶזְקִיָּא, khiz-kee-yaw'-hoo, 2 Kings 20:10; 1 Chron. 4:41; 2 Chron. 28:27; 29:1, 20, etc.; הֶזְקִיָּא, yekh-iz-kee-yaw', Ezra 2:16; Hos. 1:1; Mic. 1:1; הֶזְקִיָּא, yekh-iz-kee-yaw'-hoo, Isa. 1:1; Jer. 15:4; Gr. Ἡζεκίας, ed-zeek'-as).

1. The thirteenth sovereign (including Queen Athaliah) of the separate kingdom of Judah.

Family. Hezekiah was the son of Ahaz and Abi (Abijah), born B. C. about 744 (2 Kings 18:1, 2; 2 Chron. 29:1).

Personal History. "The biblical history of Hezekiah's reign has come to us in detached fragments. We have two versions of it, one in the Books of Kings, the other in the Book of Isaiah, but the two versions differ but little from each other. . . . The chronicler informs us that 'the acts of Hezekiah' were 'written in the vision of Isaiah the prophet' (2 Chron. 32:32). This vision, then, would have been a biography of the king, and we may conclude that the fragmentary history of his reign, which we now possess, was extracted from it. The most striking fact connected with this fragmentary history, however, has been revealed to us by the Assyrian monuments. . . . The embassy of Merodach-baladan took place ten years before the campaign of Sennacherib in Judah," which "happened not in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, but in his twenty-fourth year" (Sayce, Higher Crit., etc., p. 423, sq.).

Hezekiah began to reign at the age of twenty-five years, and occupied the throne twenty-nine years (2 Kings 18:2; 2 Chron. 29:1), B. C. 719-690.

(1) Reform. His first act was to purge, repair, and reopen the temple, which had been neglected during the idolatrous reign of his father. This work was so thorough as not even to spare "the high places," which "he removed, and brake the images, and cut down the groves." A still more decisive act was the destruction of a brazen serpent, said to have been the one used by Moses in the miraculous healing of the Israelites (Num. 21:9), which had become an object of adoration. The history of this reformation is given at length in 2 Chron. 29, sq. It commenced with the cleansing of the temple "in the first month" of Hezekiah's first year, i. e., in the month Nisan after his accession, and was followed in the next month (because at the regular season neither Levites nor temple were in a state of preparation) by a great Passover, extended to fourteen days, to which not only all Judah was summoned, but also the "remnant" of the ten tribes, some of whom accepted the invitation.

(2) War with Philistines. Hezekiah early (B. C. about 718) assumed the aggressive against the Philistines, and not only retook the cities which his father had lost (2 Chron. 28:18), but even dispossessed them of their own cities, except Gaza (2 Kings 18:8) and Gath (Josephus, Ant., ix, 13, 3). He thus came to exercise a sort of suzerainty over the Philistian cities, and Ashdod, under its Greek prince, was induced to lead them in the revolt against Assyria.

(3) Relations with Assyria. "Hezekiah received from his father, Ahaz, a kingdom mortgaged to Assyria. Egypt, whose noxious interference had contributed to the fall of Samaria, appears again as a fomenter of insurrection in Palestine. The misguided patriotic party in Jerusalem disregards the warning given by the capture of the rebellious Ashdod (B. C. 711), and, after the accession of Sennacherib (B. C. 705), takes the lead in an alliance of the disaffected states." Hezekiah rebelled against the king of Assyria, refusing to pay tribute or send presents (2 Kings 18:7), using every available means to strengthen his position and render his capital impregnable (2 Kings 20:20; 2 Chron. 32:3-5, 30; Isa. 22:8-11).

In 701 Sennacherib invaded Judea (2 Kings 18:13-16). The rumor of the invasion redoubled Hezekiah's exertions, and he prepared for a siege by providing offensive and defensive armor, stopping up the wells, and diverting the watercourses, conducting the water of Gihon into the city by a subterranean canal (Eclus. 48:17). But the main hope of the political faction was the alliance with Egypt, and they seem to have sought it by presents and private entreaties (Isa. 30:6). The account given of this first invasion in the Annals of Sennacherib is that he attacked Hezekiah because the Ekronites had sent their king, Padiya, (or "Haddiya"), as a prisoner to Jerusalem (comp. 2 Kings 18:8); that he took forty-six cities ("all the fenced cities" in 2 Kings 18:13, is apparently a general expression, comp. 19:8) and two hundred thousand prisoners; that he besieged Jerusalem with mounds (comp. 2 Kings 19:32); and although Hezekiah promised to pay eight hundred talents of silver (the Scripture narrative, 2 Kings 18:14, says three hundred of silver and thirty of gold), yet, not content with this, he mulcted him of a part of his dominions, and divided it among the kings of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza. "Brandis has endeavored to show that the difference really originates in a difference of computation, eight hundred 'light' Assyrian talents being equivalent to three hundred 'heavy' Palestinian ones" (Sayce, High. Crit., etc.). In almost every particular this account agrees with the notice in Scripture. Hezekiah's bribe (or fine) brought a temporary release, for the Assyrians marched into Egypt, where Sennacherib was thwarted by Tirhakah, or Tarakos.

On his return he "dealt treacherously" with Hezekiah (Isa. 38:1) by attacking the stronghold of Lachish. This was the commencement of that second invasion, respecting which we have such full details in 2 Kings 18:17, sq.; 2 Chron. 32:9, sq.; Isa. 36. From Lachish he sent against Jerusalem an army with a blasphemous and insulting summons to surrender. Hezekiah's ministers were thrown into anguish and dismay, but the undaunted Isaiah hurled back threatening for threatening with unrivaled eloquence and force. Meanwhile Sennacherib, having taken Lachish, was besieging Libnah, when, alarmed by a "rumor" of Tirhakah's advance, he was forced to relinquish once more his immediate designs, and content himself with a defiant letter to Hezekiah. The Jewish king, with simple piety, prayed to God with Sennacherib's letter outspread before him, and received a prophecy of immediate deliverance. Accordingly "that night the angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians" one hundred and eighty-five thousand men (2 Kings 19:35). Of this great destruction there is no word or hint in Sennacherib's inscriptions, as so shameful a disaster would be naturally concealed by national vanity. The Assyrians only recorded victories. Sennacherib admits by his silence that he never penetrated within the walls of Jerusalem.

(4) In Peace. Hezekiah assiduously cultivated the arts of peace, and, by wise management of finance and the attention which he paid to agriculture and increase of flocks and herds, he became possessed of much wealth (2 Chron. 32:23, 27-29; 2 Kings 20:13; Isa. 39:2). Hezekiah improved the water supply of Jerusalem, first introduced by Solomon, covering the upper outlet of the Gihon, and bringing it by a subterranean channel into the city (2 Chron. 32:3; Isa. 22:11). A very interesting account of the discovery and survey of this tunnel is given by Major Conder in his Palestine, pp. 26, sq. This was stored in the large reservoir still called after Hezekiah (Ewald, History of Israel; iii, p. 264). Himself a sacred poet, and probably the author of other psalms besides that in Isa. 38, he seems to have collected the psalms of David and Asaph for the temple worship, and certainly employed competent scribes to complete the collection of Solomon's Proverbs (Prov. 25:1). He appears also to have given orders for the preservation of genealogical records.

(5) Sickness. "In those days was Hezekiah sick unto death" (2 Kings 20:1; 2 Chron. 32:24; Isa. 38:1). Hezekiah, whose kingdom was still in a dangerous state from fear of the Assyrians, and who had at that time no heir, "turned his face to the wall and prayed unto the Lord." God had compassion on his anguish, and heard his prayer. Isaiah had hardly left the palace when he was ordered to promise the king immediate recovery, and a fresh lease (fifteen years) of life, ratifying the promise by a sign (see NOTE), and curing the boil by a plaster of figs (2 Kings 20:1, sq.; Isa. 38:1, sq.). Various ambassadors came with letters and gifts to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery (2 Chron. 32:28), and among them an embassy from Merodach-baladan (or Berodach) (2 Kings 20:12). The pretended object of this mission was to compliment Hezekiah upon his convalescence (2 Kings 20:12; Isa. 39:1), but it certainly had also the secret political object of making common cause with Hezekiah to throw off the Assyrian yoke. Hezekiah received the overtures of Babylon with unconcealed gratification; and, perhaps to enhance the opinion of his own importance as an ally, displayed to the messengers his princely treasures. The consequences of this coquetting with the strangers, and vain display are pointed out in Isa. 39:3-8.

(6) Death. After the destruction of the Assyrians Hezekiah lived to enjoy for only about one year his well-earned peace and glory. He died, after a reign of twenty-nine years, in the fifty-fourth year of his age (2 Kings 20:21; 2 Chron. 32:33), B. C. 690.

Character. The prominent characteristics of Hezekiah were his trust in God and disposition to render him suitable honor and service (2 Kings 18:4-6). Nor was he wanting in courage, as is shown in the stern measures adopted to reform the religion of his people as well as in his revolt from the Assyrian king. His belief in prayer is seen by his earnest calling upon God during his illness, and upon the reception of Sennacherib's blasphemous letter. In later times he was held in honor as the king who had "after him none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him" (2 Kings 18:5); in Jer. 26:19 the elders of the land cite him as an example of pious submission to the word of the Lord spoken by Micah; and the son of Sirach closes his recital of the kings with this judgment—that of all the kings of Judah, "David, Hezekiah, and Josiah alone transgressed not, nor forsook the law of the Most High" (Ecclus. xlix, 4).

NOTE.—(1) Time of Pasover (2 Chron. 29:3, sq.). "The statement, 'in the first year of his reign, in the first month,' is sufficiently explained if Hezekiah ascended the throne in one of the last months of the calendar year, which began with Nisan. In that case, on the first of Nisan of the new year, so few months, or perhaps only weeks, would have elapsed since his accession, that what he did in Nisan could not rightly have been dated otherwise than 'the first year of his reign'" (Kell, Com.). "It (the Reformation) commenced with the cleansing of the temple 'in the first month of Hezekiah's first year, i. e., in the month Nisan next after his accession, and was followed in the next month (because at the regular season neither Levites nor temple were in a due state of preparation) by a great Pasover, extended to fourteen days" (Kitto). (2) Sign (Isa. 38:7, 8). "The step dial of Abaz may have consisted of twenty steps or more, which measured the time of day by half hours, or even quarters. If the sign was given an hour before sunset, the shadow, by going back ten steps of half an hour each, would return to the point at which it stood." "When it stated that 'the sun returned,' this does not mean the sun in the heaven, but the sun upon the sun dial, upon which the illumined surface moved upward as the shadow retreated; for when the shadow moved back, the sun moved back as well. The event is intended to be represented as a miracle; and a miracle it really was" (Smith, Bib. Dict.; McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.). See SENNACHERIB.

2. The second of the three sons of Neariah, a descendant of Salathiel (1 Chron. 3:23), probably a brother of the Esh of Luke 3:25, and also of Azor of Matt. 1:13, B. C. after 536.

3. The children of "Ater of Hezekiah," to the number of ninety-eight, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:21). In Neh. 10:17 his name (Anglicized "Hizkijah") appears in a similar connection (but without the connective "of") among those who subscribed the covenant of Nehemiah, B. C. before 536.

HE'ZION (הֲצִיּוֹן, khez-yone', vision), the father of Tabrimon and grandfather of Ben-hadad I, to whom Asa sent silver and gold from the sacred treasury to secure his aid against Baasha (1 Kings 15:18). B. C. before 915. In the absence of all information the natural suggestion is that he is the same person as Rezon, the contemporary of Solomon (1 Kings 11:23), the two names being very similar in Hebrew, and still more so in the versions (Smith).

HE'ZIR (Heb. חֲזִיר, khay-zeer', swine).

1. The head of the seventeenth course of priests as established by David (1 Chron. 24:15), B. C. after 1000.

2. One of the heads of the people who sealed the solemn covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:20), B. C. 445.

HEZ'RAI (Heb. חֲצַרַי, khets-ray', walled in, 2 Sam. 23:35), the same as HEZRO (q. v.).

HEZ'RO (Heb. חֲצִרוֹ, khets-ro', inclosure), a Carmelite; one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:37). He is called in the margin and in 2 Sam. 23:35 HEZRAI (q. v.).

HEZ'RON (Heb. חֲצִירוֹן, khets-ron', inclosed).

1. The third son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; 1 Chron. 4:1; 5:3). His descendants were called Hezronites (Num. 26:6).

2. The elder of the two sons of Pharez and grandson of Judah (Gen. 46:12; Ruth 4:18, 19; 1 Chron. 2:5, 9, 18, 21, 24, 26). He is called Esrom in Matt. 1:3.

3. A place on the southern boundary of Judah, west of Kadesh-barnea (Josh. 15:3, 25). In the latter passage it is identified with HAZOR (q. v.).

HEZ'RONITES, the descendants of HEZRON, No. 1 (q. v.).

HID'DAI (Heb. חִידַי, hid-dah'ee, derivation uncertain), one of the "thirty" heroes of David, "of the brooks of Gaash" (2 Sam. 23:30). In 1 Chron. 11:32 he is given as HURAI (q. v.).

HID'DEKEL (Heb. חִידְקֵל, khid-del'-kel), the name of the third of the four rivers of Paradise (Gen. 2:14), being that which runs on the border of Assyria. It is generally identified with the TIGRIS (q. v.), "the great river" (Dan. 10:4).

HIE'EL (Heb. חִיֵּאל, khee-ale', life from God), a native of Beth-el, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Ahab (1 Kings 16:34), and in whom was fulfilled the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. 6:26), B. C. after 875.

HIERAP'OLIS (Gr. Ἱεράπολις, hee-er-apol'-is, sacred city). This place is mentioned only once in Scripture (Col. 4:13), with Colossæ and Laodicea. Such association is just what we should expect, for the three towns were all in the basin of the Mæander and within a few miles of one another. Its modern name is Pambouk-Kalessi (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). There is little doubt that the Church of Hierapolis was founded at the same time with that at Colossæ.

HIEROGLYPHICS (from Gr. ἱερός, hee-er-os', sacred, and γλύφειν, gloo'-fen, to carve). Pictures of objects, as of an animal, tree, bird, etc., representing a word, syllable, or single sound, and intended to convey a meaning. The name was first applied to the engraved marks and symbols found on the monuments and other records of ancient Egypt. The key to these inscriptions was the ROSETTA STONE (q. v.). The Egyptian hieroglyphics were generally engraved, but in old temples are found in high relief, generally from right to left, but read either vertically or horizontally. They ceased to be written about 300 A. D. See WRITING.

HIGH DAY. See GLOSSARY.

HIGH PLACE (Heb. בָּמֹת, baw-maw', elevation).

1. Meaning. The proper meaning of baw-maw' is rather doubtful, but was at first a designation of any eminence, as "the heights of the clouds" (Isa. 14:14); "waves of the sea" (Job 9:8, marg. "heights"); but more especially of mountains and hills (Deut. 32:13; 2 Sam. 1:19, 25, etc.). Then the term came to be applied to elevated places on which worship and sacrifice were offered; to idols (Num. 22:41, etc.), and to Jehovah (1 Sam. 9:12, etc.). As to the nature and arrangement of the bawmaw there is nothing certain. That they were buildings is evident, for they are described as having been "built" (1 Kings 11:7; 2 Chron. 33:3), "removed" (2 Kings 18:4), "thrown down" (2 Chron. 31:1), "broken down" (2 Kings 23:8), and "burned" (2 Kings 23:15). The sanctuary at Beth-el (1 Kings 12:31) was a temple in the strict sense, in which a golden calf was set up as Jehovah's symbol, with an altar of sacrifice. In the kingdom of the ten tribes every city had its bawmaw (2 Kings 17:9, comp. Ezek. 16:24, 31, 39). Altars seem to have been invariably associated with the high places (2 Chron. 31:1, etc.), and frequently groves (2 Chron. 34:3, etc.).

2. History. (1) General. Probably a natural and, at first, an innocent impulse led men to worship on the hills. The worshiper appeared to be brought nearer to heaven and removed from the scenes of life's usual routine, thus suggesting the idea of sacredness. The use of high places was widely spread, the Trojans sacrificing to Jupiter on Mt. Ida, the Greeks placing the habitations of their gods on Mt. Olympus, and the Persians on Alborisch. We find that high places were very frequent among the neighbors of the Israelites, the Moabites (Num. 22:41; Isa. 16:12, etc.), and the Canaanites (Deut. 12:2, etc.). Nebo was probably sacred to the divinity of that name (Isa. 46:1).

(2) Among the Israelites. The origin of this kind of worship may be partly traced to the simple custom of the patriarchs, who built altars and offered sacrifices at the places where Jehovah revealed himself to them (Gen. 26:25; 28:18). But it is mainly to be sought in the influence of the Canaanites, who were left in the land with their high places, exercised on the hearts of the Israelites. Its earthly tone and sensuality were more attractive than the severe discipline of the earnest worship of Jehovah, which insisted upon the denial of the flesh and consecration of the heart.

The Israelites were commanded to "pluck up" the high places of the Canaanites, as being seats of idolatry (Num. 33:52; Deut. 12:2; 33:29). In obedience to Moses, Joshua set up great stones upon Mt. Ebal, upon which was inscribed the law (Deut. 27:5; Josh. 8:30). Of the period prior to Samuel the term bawmaw is used only three times of high places where worship was offered, and only once is there reference to their use by the Hebrews (Lev. 26:30). During the time of the judges the high places are not mentioned, although sacrifice was offered even by Levitical priests and prophets; and they are noticed only once in the time of Samuel (1 Sam. 9:12, 19, 25; 10:5). No mention is made of a high place during David's reign, although it is evident that he worshiped on Mt. Olivet (2 Sam. 15:32) and offered sacrifices at local altars (1 Chron. 21:26). The reign of Solomon shows an unusual development of the worship on high places, and it is recorded of him that "he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places, and that Gibeon was "the great high place" (1 Kings 3:3, 4). Beth-el was another of the principal of these sanctuaries (1 Kings 12:32). To gratify his foreign wives Solomon built high places for Aslithoth, Chemosh, and for Milcom (1 Kings 11:7; 2 Kings 23:13). The construction of the temple did not prevent idolatrous worship and the worship of Jehovah on high places from increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:23). Hezekiah waged warfare against local shrines on high places (2 Kings 18:4, 22; 2 Chron. 32:12; Isa. 36:7), but his successor, Manasseh, revived them. Josiah, however, completed the work of Hezekiah (2 Kings 23:8). After the captivity the high places were not revived. High places were expressly sanctioned by Jeroboam in the kingdom of Israel, and raised to a national worship by his erecting high-place temples (1 Kings 12:31; 13:32) at Beth-el and at Dan. Introduced on political grounds (1 Kings 12:26, sq.), it was maintained by all the kings of the ten tribes down to the fall of the kingdom (2 Kings 17:9, 29, 32). See Grove.

HIGHEST (Heb. el-yone', elevated), a title ascribed to Jehovah (Psa. 18:13; 87:5). and in the New Testament (Gr. ὑψιστος, hoo'p'-sis-tos) of the highest region, i. e., heaven (Matt. 21:9; Mark 11:10; Luke 2:14, etc.); also of rank, the most high God (Mark 5:7; Luke 8:28, etc.).

HIGH-MINDED. See GLOSSARY.

HIL'EN (1 Chron. 6:58). See HOLON.

HILKIAH (Heb. khil-keeyaw', portion of Jehovah).

1. The father of Eliakim, who was overseer of the household in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:18, 26, 37; Isa. 22:20; 36:3, 22; 37:2), B. C. before 719.

2. High priest in the reign of Josiah. According to the genealogy in 1 Chron. 6:13 (see Neh. 11:11) he was son of Shallum, and, from Ezra 7:1, apparently the ancestor of Ezra, the scribe. His high priesthood was rendered particularly illustrious by the great reformation effected under it by King Josiah (2 Kings 23:4, sq.; 2 Chron. 34:9, sq.) by the solemn Passover kept at Jerusalem in the eighteenth year of the king's reign (2 Chron. 35:1, sq.), and, above all, by the discovery which he made in the house of the Lord of a book which is called "the Book of the Laws" (2 Kings 22:8) and "the Book of the Covenant" (23:2), B. C. 639.

NOTE.—A difficult and interesting question arises: What was the book found by Hilkiah? Kennicott is of opinion that it was the original autograph copy of the Pentateuch written by Moses which Hilkiah found, but his argument is far from conclusive. Our means of answering this question seem to be limited: (1) To an examination of the terms in which the depositing of the book of the law by the ark was originally enjoined; (2) To an examination of the contents of the books discovered by Hilkiah, as far as they transpire; (3) To any indications which may be gathered from the contemporary writings of Jeremiah, or from any other portions of Scripture. A consideration of all these points raises a strong probability that the book in question was the book of Deuteronomy (Smith). The probability is that the book found by Hilkiah was the same which was intrusted to the care of the priests and was to be put in the side of the ark (Deut. 31:9-26), and that this was the entire body of the Mosaic writing and not any part of it, seems the only tenable conclusion (Kito).

3. A Merarite Levite, the son of Amzi and father of Amaziah (1 Chron. 6:45).

4. The second son of, Hosah, a Merarite, appointed by David as doorkeeper of the tabernacle (1 Chron. 26:11), B. C. about 995.

5. One of those who stood at the right hand of Ezra while he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), B. C. about 445.

6. One of the chief priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. 12:7). His son Hashabiah is mentioned in v. 21, B. C. 536.

7. A priest of Anathoth and father of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 1:1), B. C. before 626.

8. Father of Gemariah, who, with Elashah, was sent by Zedekiah with a message to the captives at Babylon (Jer. 29:3), B. C. before 599.

HILL, the rendering of several words in the original.

1. Ghib-aw' (Heb. gib'ah, high), from a root which seems to have the force of curvature or humpishness. A word involving this idea is peculiarly applicable to the rounded hills of Palestine. (Exod. 17:9; 1 Sam. 7:1, etc.).

2. Har (Heb. har). Our translators have also employed the English word hill for the very different term har, which has a much more extended sense than ghib-aw', meaning a whole district rather than an individual eminence, and to which our word "mountain" answers with tolerable accuracy. This exchange is always undesirable, but it sometimes occurs so as to confuse the meaning of a passage where it is desirable that the topography should be unmistakable. For instance, in Exod. 24:4, the "hill" is the same which is elsewhere in the same chapter (12, 13, 18, etc.), consistently and accurately rendered "mount" and "mountain." The country of the "hills," in Deut. 1:7; Josh. 9:1; 10:40; 11:16, is the elevated district of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, which is correctly called "the mountain" in the earliest descriptions of Palestine (Num. 13:29), and in many subsequent passages. In 2 Kings 1:9 and 4:27, the use of the word "hill" obscures the allusion to Carmel, which in other passages of the life of the prophet (e. g., 1 Kings 18:19; 2 Kings 4:25) has the term "mount" correctly attached to it.

3. Mah-al-eh' (Heb. מַחֲאֵלֶיךָ, elevation). On one occasion the word Mah-al-eh', better "ascent," is rendered "hill" (1 Sam. 9:11).

4. In the New Testament the word "hill" is employed to render the Greek word βουνός (Boonos', hillock), but on one occasion it is used for ὄρος (or'-os), elsewhere "mountain," so as to obscure the connection between the two parts of the same narrative (Luke 9:37).

HILL COUNTRY, the rendering in the Old Testament (Josh. 21:11) of Har (see HILL, 2); and in the New Testament of the Gr. or-i-nos' (ὄρεινός, mountainous; Luke 1:39, 65); and meaning Mount Ephraim. The rendering "hill country" is misleading. "With their usual exactness the Hebrews saw that these regions (i. e., the mountains of Judah, Ephraim, and Naphtali) formed part of one range, the whole of which they called not by a collective name, but singularly—the mountain" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 53).

HIL'LEL (Heb. הִלְלַיִל, hil-layl', praising), a Pirathonite, and father of the judge Abdon (Judg. 12:13, 15), B. C. before 1070.

HIN. See METROLOGY, II, 2 (2).

HIND. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HINGE, the rendering of two Hebrew words, viz., teer (תֵּר, to open, Prov. 26:14), and pokth (פֹּכֶת, literally an interstice, 1 Kings 7:50). Doors in the East turn rather on pivots than what we call hinges. They were sometimes made of metal (e. g., Solomon had hinges in the temple made of and below—in the door frame. The weight of the door resting on the lower pivot, it would open with much less ease than one working on our hinges, especially when the lower socket became worn (Prov. 26:14).

HIN'NOM (Heb. הִנְנוֹם, hin-nome', perhaps abundant).

1. An unknown person whose name is given to the "Valley of Hinnom" (Josh. 18:16; Neh. 11:30); elsewhere (Josh. 15:8; 2 Kings 23:10; 2 Chron. 33:6, etc.) called "the valley of the son," or "children of Hinnom."

2. Valley of Hinnom, otherwise called "the valley of the son," or "children of Hinnom," a deep and narrow ravine, with steep, rocky sides to the south and west of Jerusalem, separating Mount Zion to the north from the "Hill of Evil Counsel," and the sloping rocky plateau of the "plain of Rephaim" to the south. The earliest Bible mention of the Valley of Hinnom is in Josh. 15:8; 18:16, where the boundary line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin is described as passing along the bed of the ravine. On the southern brow, overlooking the valley at its eastern extremity, Solomon erected high places for Molech (1 Kings 11:7), whose horrid rites were revived from time to time in the same vicinity by the later idolatrous kings. Ahaz and Manasseh made their children "pass through the fire" in this valley (2 Kings 16:3; 2 Chron. 28:3; 33:6), and the fiendish custom of infant sacrifice to the fire-gods seems to have been kept up in Tophet, at its southeast extremity for a considerable period (Jer. 7:31; 2 Kings 23:10). To put an end to these abominations the place was polluted by Josiah, who rendered it ceremonially unclean by spreading over it human bones, and other corruptions (2 Kings 23:10, 13, 14; 2 Chron. 34:4, 5), from which time it appears to have become the common cesspool of the city, into which its sewage was conducted, to be carried off by the waters of the Kidron, as well as a bystall, where all its solid filth was collected. From its ceremonial defilement, and from the detested and abominable fire of Molech, if not from the supposed overburning funeral piles, the later Jews applied the name of this valley Ge Hinnom, Gehenna, to denote the place of eternal torment. The name by which it is now known is Wady Jehennam, or Wady er Rubéb (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

terially assisted the work by sending cedar wood from Lebanon, and skillful workmen to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Chron. 14:1), B. C. about 994. It was probably the same prince who sent an embassy of condolence and congratulation when David died and Solomon ascended the throne. In consideration of large quantities of corn, wine, and oil sent him by Solomon, the king of Tyre furnished from Lebanon the timber required for the temple, delivering it at Joppa, the port of Jerusalem (1 Kings 5:1, sq.; 9:11, sq.; 2 Chron. 2:3, sq.). He also supplied large quantities of gold, and received from Solomon in return twenty towns in Galilee (1 Kings 9:11-14), which, when he came to inspect them,

HIP AND THIGH (Heb. שׂוֹק, shoke), a proverbial expression for a great slaughter (Judg. 15:8), like the Arabic "war in thigh fashion," or the German "cutting arm and leg in two."

HĪ'RAH (Heb. הִירָה, khee-raw', splendor), an Adullamite, and friend of Judah (Gen. 38:1, 12; comp. v. 20).

HĪ'RAM (Heb. הִירָם, khee-rawm', high-born; generally in the Chronicles הִרָם, khoo-rawm', "Huram"; and הִרְרִים, khee-rome', "Hirom" in 1 Kings 5:10, 18; 7:40).

1. King of Tyre, who sent an embassy to David after the latter had conquered the stronghold of Zion and taken up his residence in Jerusalem. It seems that the dominion of this prince extended over the western slopes of Lebanon; and when David built himself a palace, Hiram ma-pleased him so little that he applied to them a name of contempt (Cabul), and restored them to Solomon (1 Kings 9:12, 13; 2 Chron. 8:2). It does not, however, appear that the good understanding between the two kings was broken by this unpleasant circumstance, for it was after this that he admitted Solomon's ships to a share in the profitable trade of the Mediterranean (1 Kings 10:22); and Jewish sailors, under the guidance of Tyrians, were taught to bring the gold of Ophir (1 Kings 9:26-28) to Solomon's two harbors on the Red Sea. Dius, the Phœnician historian, and Menander of Ephesus, assign to Hiram a prosperous reign of thirty-four years, and relate that his father was Abibal, his son and successor Baleazar. Others (later writers, as Eusebius, after Tatian, Præp. Ev. x, 11) relate that Hiram, besides supplying timber for the temple, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon. Some have regarded this

Hiram as a different person from the friend of David, arguing from the long reign necessary, if he was the same who assisted David to build his house. Dius relates that Solomon used to send difficult questions to Hiram, with a request that he should send similar ones in return, on condition that he who failed to solve them should pay the other a penalty, and that Hiram had to pay these fines for some time, until he succeeded in reversing his fortune by the employment of a Tyrian, Abdémon, against Solomon. Dr. Thomson describes a remarkable monument (called "Hiram's tomb") still extant, which he passed a little beyond the village of Hanaweih (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 290, sq.).

2. The son of a widow of the tribe of Naphtali, and of a Tyrian father. He was sent by King Hiram to execute the principal works of the interior of the temple, and the various utensils required for the sacred services (1 Kings 7:13, 14, 40). It is probable that he was selected for this purpose by the king, in the notion that his half-Hebrew blood would render him the more acceptable at Jerusalem, B. C. about 960.

HIRE. See WAGES.

HIRELING (Heb. שָׂכִיר, saw-keer'; Gr. μισθωτός, mis-tho-tos), a laborer employed on hire for a limited time (Job 7:1; 14:6; Mark 1:20), as distinguished from one belonging to his master. Naturally, as a temporary laborer, he would feel much less interest as compared with the shepherd or permanent keeper of the flock (John 10:12, 13). See SERVICE.

HISS (Heb. שָׁרַק, shaw-rak', to whistle). (1) This term usually expresses insult and contempt (Job 27:23); and mingled astonishment and contempt, as by beholders of the ruined temple (1 Kings 9:8; 2 Chron. 7:21). (2) It is also used in the sense of to allure, to entice; as a bee keeper, who by hissing (whistling) induced the bees to come out of their hives and settle on the ground (Isa. 5:26; 7:18).

HISTORY, NEW TESTAMENT AND EARLY CHRISTIANITY. From the birth of Christ until the accession of the last of the house of the Herods, Herod Agrippa II, embracing fifty years, is a period without a parallel in history for changes and complications in the several governments and political geography of Palestine.

The conspectus following synchronizes the reign of the Roman emperors of the first Christian century, the numerous high priests of the Jews, and the different political governments of that country, with the Christian history of the same period.

HISTORY, OLD TESTAMENT. To write an Old Testament history in literary form and style, even in the briefest possible compass, would be to deal critically with the greater portion of the whole Bible narrative. Instead of attempting this task, here so manifestly impracticable, it will be better to present in tabular form the leading events of ancient Hebrew history with their dates, as nearly as these can be ascertained, and a note of synchronisms, with the most important occurrences outside of the sphere of the chosen people. A preliminary remark or two may be helpful. As to the dates employed, the system of Usher has been so far referred to that it is represented in the first column. The reader is referred to the article CHRONOLOGY for a brief statement of the reasons why the scheme of Usher is discredited. Unfortunately we cannot give any but approximate dates to events preceding the middle of the 9th century B. C. From that time onward nearly every occurrence can be correctly timed. The only exceptions are those for which the numbers* of the current Bible text give diverse or contradictory data. This is particularly true of the accession of Hezekiah and the length of the reign of Manasseh.

As to the events cited it should be observed that since a selection must be made those must be chosen which are (1) important or useful in marking off epochs or conventional divisions of time. Hence all the kings of Israel and Judah have been cited, as well as the most important earlier and later political incidents. (2) Those which mark an era in the progress of Revelation. Hence the dates of the prophets and their writings as well as of the other books of the Old Testament, so far as these can be ascertained.

The events mentioned under the head of "Synchronisms" are those which are of most importance in general history, and especially those that directly or indirectly affected the fortunes of Israel.

HITTITES (Heb. חִיטִּי, Khil'-tee), a people mentioned frequently in the Old Testament. In Genesis (10:15) they are described as the sons of Heth, and in the days of Abraham are located in the neighborhood of Hebron (Gen. 23:1-20), for from a body of them the patriarch bought a burial place. Esau married Hittite wives (Gen. 26:34, 35; 36:2), and the spies sent by Moses into the land of Canaan found them located in the hill country (Num. 13:29). When the Hebrews invaded the land west of Jordan, and attempted to divide it among themselves, the Hittites opposed them in several struggles (Josh. 9:1, 2; 11:3). At this same period the Hittites were located near the territory held by Israel, for the inhabitant of Luz who had betrayed that city into the hands of Israel built a new city in Hittite territory (Judg. 1:26). As the territory was gradually conquered by Israel, the Hittites were not driven out of it, but remained, and in some cases intermarried with their conquerors. Their later influence on Israel is marked in various ways. We find mention of Hittites as among David's followers (1 Sam. 26:6) and Uriah, against whom David plotted was of this race (2 Sam. 11:3). During the reign of Solomon Hittite women were in his harem (1 Kings 11:1), while many of this people were impressed for forced labor (1 Kings 9:20, 21).

If now we attempt to gather together all these various references at different periods to draw from them a picture of the historical situation and of the general movements of the race we shall find almost insuperable difficulties. The general progress of research is also extremely confusing, for as soon as new facts are learned from Egyptian and Assyrian sources, and an attempt is made to reconcile them with those already known, the conclusions drawn are more likely to be darkening than illuminating. There can be no reason to doubt that in the future the main outlines of their racial origin, connection, and history will be cleared up, but at present little more can be done than to state a series of facts without making a serious attempt to relate them.

1. It is now believed by many, perhaps by the majority of modern scholars, that the people called Hittites once lived in the mountainous country of Asia Minor beyond the Taurus ranges, in the district roughly covered by the later appellation Cappadocia. Thence they poured southward in migratory bands, and possessed themselves of a large part of southern Asia Minor, and of the upper part of the Euphrates Valley. These migrations may, perhaps, be regarded as having occurred chiefly about 1500 B. C., though earlier and perhaps smaller migrations are necessary to explain the biblical allusions.

2. During the reign of Egyptian kings, beginning with Thothmes III (about 15th century), and continuing on down through the reigns of Seti I and Rameses II (about 13th century), the Egyptians had frequent hostile encounters with a people called the Kheta. This people was plainly trying to seize the whole of Syria and Palestine, and its progress southward must lead to continual conflict with Egypt, which was still determined upon possessing that whole country. In the reign of Rameses II occurred the most important of these wars between the Kheta and Egypt. The decisive engagement took place at Kadesh on the Orontes. The battle showed the prowess of the Kheta no less than the power of the Egyptian monarchy. It was celebrated in a splendid poem by the great national Egyptian poet Pentand, and on its conclusion a treaty of peace was made between the Kheta and Rameses II. This treaty is inscribed in superb style on the walls at Karnak, in Upper Egypt. In it the king of the Kheta and the king of upper and lower Egypt make pledges of eternal faithfulness and peace, establish boundaries between their respective territories in Syria, and proclaim an amnesty upon both sides to political fugitives. The very form of this treaty shows that the boasting expressions of the poet Pentand, which claim overwhelming Egyptian victories, were hardly justified by the facts. The Kheta had indeed successfully withstood the greatest power then existing in the world, and Rameses II had not succeeded in possessing himself of the very valuable territory which they had already seized. This campaign alone is sufficient to prove that the Kheta had already instituted some sort of established government, with centralized power. It is, however, scarcely wise to claim that they had already established an empire. In what particulars and to what extent these Kheta are the same as the Hittites of the Bible, it is simply impossible to say. They are judged by many to be the same people. The explanation then given is, that in the north of Israel they had united, formed a kingdom, established a government, and organized an army, while in earlier days detached communities had been formed in various places even as far south as Hebron.

3. The inscriptions of Assyrian kings, between the 12th and the 8th centuries before Christ, contain numerous references to a people called Khatte. The first allusions to them are found in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser I (about 1120 B. C.), whose raids for plunder into the west brought him into conflict with them in the territories west of the Euphrates, beyond the city of Carchemish. The records of Tiglath-pileser I hardly make it clear whether there was at that time any organized Hittite commonwealth, for he was engaged only in conquest for purposes of plunder, and not with the purpose of acquiring territory to be united with his kingdom. After his reign there came a gradual weakening of Assyrian power, and not until the reign of Assurnazirpal III (884-860 B. C.) did the Khatte feel the advance of Assyrian power. This king makes a number of references to them in his inscriptions, claiming to have defeated them in battles at different places from Carchemish westward. His successor, Shalmaneser II (859-825) actually attempted to take possession of the west, and naturally came into conflict with this same people. He took the city of Pethor, west of the Euphrates, and calls it a city of the Khatte. In 854 he fought a great battle at Karkar for the possession of the west, and in the league of confederates opposed to him the Khatte are mentioned. He claims a victory again, but he was not able to take the territory of these same Khatte, and they continue to oppose Assyrian conquests down to 717 B. C., when the city of Carchemish is taken by Sargon II. After that they seem to drop gradually out of sight as a force in western Asia.

From these and other allusions in the Assyrian inscriptions but little of the history of the Khatte can be learned, and it is premature, to say the least, to speak about the Hittite empire which the Assyrians have revealed to us. That the Kheta of the Egyptian inscriptions and the Khatte of the Assyrians are the same people is not indeed certain even yet, but it is most probable.

4. At a number of places in Syria and in Asia Minor, as far back as 1815, travelers noticed large blocks of stone containing inscriptions in an unknown language. The writing is evidently hieroglyphic in character, and the figures represented in it are parts of the human body, such as the head, the eye, arms, legs, and feet; figures and parts of the figures of various birds and animals, and other less easily recognizable signs. As these inscriptions were found in territory in which the Hittites are localized by the Assyrian and Egyptian inscriptions, as well as the Old Testament, many scholars leaped to the conclusion that they were written by the Hittites. This theory was attractive in many ways, for, to mention no others, it would readily explain at one stroke a host of facts which are now more or less unrelated. But, unfortunately for these good ends, no definite proof has yet been found to connect these inscriptions with the Hittite people. Attempts to decipher them continue to be made, and some of the ablest orientalists in the world have essayed this exceedingly difficult problem. Professor A. H. Sayce has attempted to decipher the inscriptions by comparing them with the inscriptions found near Lake Van, but his results have not been widely accepted. C. R. Conder has made several attempts, and has even ventured so far as to propose a rendering of certain of the inscriptions, but this essay is even less successful than the work of Professor Sayce, and may be safely regarded as having utterly failed. The work of Sayce and Conder was succeeded by that of Peiser, an Assyriologist of assured reputation. Peiser's efforts have, however, also not proved successful, and some of his methods he has since modified or abandoned. By far the most promising of all these successive endeavors has been made by Peter Jensen, professor in the University of Marburg, and a distinguished Assyriologist. He has attempted to prove that the inscriptions are not Hittite at all, but were produced by an entirely different people. He calls the language Cilician tentatively, and proposes to connect it with the old Armenian language, by the use of which he seeks to decipher words and phrases. If there were any bilingual texts in existence the problem would be much simplified, for then the words of equivalent meaning would be quickly separated from the others, and a combination of them would be certain to yield an interpretation. But in the so-called Hittite character there has been found but one bilingual text—the Boss of Tarkondemos—and this has been lost, and only a questionable cast of it remains in existence. The interpretation of the characters upon this cast is so doubtful that no two interpreters are in full agreement about it. Jensen has brought to the task extraordinary mental equipment as well as a certain keenness of mind and an unusual power of combination. It may well be that he will reach the solution, and a number of scholars have already given in their adherence either to his method or, in whole or part, to his conclusions. Of all these none is quite so important as Hilprecht. Those who hastily attach themselves to the hypothesis of Jensen, but are not themselves independent scholars, may not be counted as of weight, and also but little influence should be permitted to those who, while competent scholars in general or special linguistics, have not dealt with monumental literature. Hilprecht is a master in the knowledge of the monumental literature of the Assyrians and Babylonians, and is qualified to judge of the methods pursued by Jensen in handling this unknown and unread monumental literature. Hilprecht's judgment is entitled to great weight, but others still hold off from Jensen's conclusions. The only safe position at present seems to be that of suspended judgment.

5. The question of the racial connections of the Hittites cannot be decided until it is determined finally whether the writers of these inscriptions are really the same people as they. When that vexed question is settled we shall have either a mass of fresh testimony to handle or we shall be able to eliminate material that now confuses the question. If we assume for the present that the Hittites are the same people as the Kheta of the Egyptian monuments, we can gain thereby a few facts as to the personal appearance of this people. The Egyptian pictures represent the Kheta as short in stature, stout, and thick-limbed. The skin was yellow, the hair black, and the eyes a very dark brown. The clothing in which they are represented would suggest that they belonged in a cold climate, for they wear boots, with upturned toes, gloves, and a close-fitting cap, or sometimes a tiaralike headcovering. The face is prognathous in an unusual degree. In general appearance it is thought that they resemble Mongols, but the evidence at hand is hardly sufficient for a scientific conclusion. See SUPPLEMENT.

6. The facts here presented concerning the Hittites and the peoples identified with them are left unconnected intentionally. Too much has been said about the Hittites in many popular books. It is necessary to strip off a mass of doubtful generalization and return to the thoroughly ascertained truth. In a few years all this doubt and uncertainty may give place to knowledge, and we may be able to speak of the Hittites with the same confidence that we now use in discussing the Assyrians and Babylonians.—R. W. R.

HIVITES (Hebrew always in the form הִיִּטִּי, hakh-i-vi-vee', "the Hivite"; LXX ó Evaioi), one of the seven nations of Canaan, who were to be destroyed by the Israelites (Deut. 7:1, and elsewhere; comp. Gen. 10:17). The focus of the Hivites seems to have been in the north. In Josh. 11:3 the Hivites dwelt "under Hermon, in the land of Mizpeh;" in Judg. 3:3, they "dwelt in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal-hermon unto the entering in of Hamath;" in 2 Sam. 24:7, "all the cities of the Hivites" are numbered apparently near Tyre. And all these seem to be in some sense official locations of the Hivite race, rather than mere chance settlements. But the name Hivite may be a descriptive term like AMORITES (q. v.), and not a local name, for we find Hivites in other localities. Hamor, the father of Shechem, was a Hivite. The whole story (Gen. 34:2-31) shows them to have been warmhearted, impulsive, and overconfident (v. 23), yet overtrusting (v. 21), and given to trade and to the multiplication of flocks and herds rather than to war. It is hinted that the absence of any attempt at revenge confirms this impression of their unwarlike character, as does the ease with which Abimelech took the city, though indeed at last not without hard fighting (Judg. 9:22-49) and by the "unmilitary character" of his slayer and of her weapon (v. 53). Perhaps the name of their god, Baal-berith, Baal of the league, may confirm this impression of their unwarlike character. In Josh. 9:7, 17 we find Hivites occupying four confederate cities (Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim) in the western half of the territory assigned. Here we find the same foresighted keenness and the same disposition to gain their ends by diplomacy rather than by arms; but their craft this time is less self-confident and more successful.

The Hivite form of government is not described, but the mention of "our elders and all the inhabitants of our country" (Josh. 9:11) certainly indicates one in which the people had considerable voice, since the sending of an embassy of unconditional peace is one of the highest acts of sovereignty. So Hamor and Shechem "communed with the men of their city" (Gen. 34:20-24), and reasoned, but did not attempt to command.

The scarcity of Hivite names prevents our judging of their language; but it was in all probability like that of the other Canaanite tribes, quite near the Hebrew. It is not probable that they were the same with the KADMONITES (q. v.), since these, as their name implies, are more likely to have been "children of the East," Bene-kedem; nor with the Avim, since these had been destroyed by the Caphthorim.—W. H.

HIZKI'AH (Heb. חִזְקִיָּהוּ, khiz-kee-yaw', strengthened of Jah), an ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. 1:1), B. C. before 630.

HIZKI'JAH (Hebrew same as above). According to the punctuation of the A. V. a man who sealed the covenant of reformation with Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 10:17). But there is no doubt that the name should be taken with that preceding it, as "Ater-Hizkijah," a name given in the lists of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Smith, s. v.). See HEZEKIAH.

HOARFROST (Heb. כְּפוֹר, kef-ore', Exod. 16:14; Psa. 147:16; Job 38:29, "hoary" See FROST.

HO'BAB (Heb. הוֹבָב, ho-bawb', beloved), the son of Raguel the Midianite (Num. 10:29; Judg. 4:11), B. C. 1210. He has usually been identified with Jethro (see Exod. 18:5, 27, compared with Num. 10:29, 30); but it is rather his father, Reuel, to whom the title "Moses's father-in-law" is intended to apply in Num. 10:29. That Jethro and Reuel (Raguel) were names of the same person seems evident from Exod. 2:18, 21; 3:1. Hobab would, therefore, be the brother-in-law of Moses. When Jethro returned to his home (Exod. 18:27) Moses prevailed upon Hobab to remain (as seems implied by the absence of any refusal to his second importunity in Num. 10:32) and act as guide through the desert. We find his descendants among the Israelites (Judg. 4:11).

HO'BAH (Heb. הוֹבָה, ho-baw', hiding-place), a place, north of Damascus, to which Abraham pursued the kings who had pillaged Sodom (Gen. 14:15). "Hobah has probably been preserved in the village of Hobah, a quarter of a mile N. of Damascus" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

HOD (Heb. הוֹד, hode, majesty), one of the sons of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

HODAIAH (Heb. הוֹדִיָּהוּ, ho-dah-yeh-vaw', hoo, majesty of Jah), the first named of the seven sons of Elioenaï, of the descendants of Zerubbabel

(1 Chron. 3:24); probably a brother of the Naum of Luke 3:26.

HODAVIAH (Heb. הוֹדָוְיָהוּ, ho-dav-yaw', praise of Jehovah).

1. One of the chief men of the tribe of Manasseh, east of Jordan at the time of the Assyrian captivity (1 Chron. 5:24).

2. Son of Hasenuah and father of Meshullam, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 9:7), B. C. before 536.

3. A Levite, whose descendants (to the number of seventy-four) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:40), B. C. before 536. In the parallel passage (Neh. 7:43) his name is written Hodevah. He is probably the same as Judah (Ezra 3:9).

HODESH (Heb. חֹדֶשׁ, kho'-desh, a month), one of the wives of Shaharaim, of the tribe of Judah, several of whose children are enumerated (1 Chron. 8:9), in v. 8 more correctly ΒΑΑΡΑ (q. v.).

HODEVAH (Heb. הוֹדְוָה, ho-dev-aw', majesty of Jah, Neh. 7:43). See HODAVIAH, 3.

HODIAH (Hebrew same as Hodijah), one of the two wives of Mered (1 Chron. 4:19), and the mother of Jered and Heber and Jekuthiel; she is called (v. 18) Jehudijah (יְהוּדִיָּה, the Jewess, i. e., his Jewish wife, as distinguished from Bithiah, who was an Egyptian).

HODIAH (Heb. הוֹדְיָהוּ, ho-dee-yaw', majesty of Jehovah).

1. One of the Levites who assisted Nehemiah in expounding the law (Neh. 8:7; 9:5). From the association of his name in Neh. 10:10, with some of those mentioned in connection with his in chap. 8:7, we conclude that he is the same person, B. C. 445.

2. Another Levite mentioned in Neh. 10:13, as one of those who signed the covenant with Nehemiah.

3. One of the Israelites who became parties with Nehemiah in the sacred covenant (Neh. 10:18).

HOGLAH (Heb. חֹגְלָה, khog-law', perhaps partridge), the third of the five daughters of Zelophead the Gileadite, to whom, in the absence of male heirs, portions were assigned by Moses (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3).

HOSHAM (Heb. הוֹשָׁם, ho-havm', derivation uncertain), the king of Hebron, who joined the league against Gibeon, but was overthrown in battle by Joshua and slain after being captured in the Cave of Makkedah (Josh. 10:3), B. C. after 1170.

HOISE. See GLOSSARY.

HOLD (Heb. מְצוּדָה, metz-oo-daw', fortress, as often rendered), the term especially applied to the lurking places of David (1 Sam. 22:4, 5; 24:22, etc.).

HOLDEN. See GLOSSARY.

HOLINESS (Heb. קִדְּוָה, ko'-desh; Gr. ἁγιωσύνη, hay-ee-o-soo'-nay; in both cases "separation," or "setting apart," holy, from Sax. "halig," "whole," "sound"). Holiness is therefore a general term to indicate sanctity, or separation from all that is sinful, or impure, or morally imperfect; moral wholeness. The term is used with reference to persons, places, and things.

1. Holiness of God. Holiness is one of the essential attributes of the divine nature. It is, on the one hand, entire freedom from moral evil, and upon the other, absolute moral perfection. The Scriptures lay great stress upon this attribute of God (see Exod. 15:11; 1 Sam. 2:2; Psa. 71:22; 99:9; 111:9; Isa. 6:3; Hab. 1:12; Rev. 15:4, etc.). Of greatest consequence, also, in this connection, is the revelation of God's holiness in the character and work of Jesus Christ. See CHRIST, SINLESSNESS OF; ATONEMENT.

By the holiness of God, it is not implied that he is subject to some law or standard of moral excellence external to himself, but that all moral law and perfection have their eternal and unchangeable basis in his own nature. "He is the One in whom these eternal sanctities reside, who is himself the root and ground of them all." In this sense it is said without qualification, "There is none holy as the Lord" (1 Sam. 2:2); "Thou only art holy" (Rev. 15:4).

Religious and Moral Bearings. The holiness of God is set before us in the Scriptures as of great practical consequence.

(a) It is the special ground of reverence, awe, and adoration (see Psa. 71:22; 111:9; Isa. 6:3, et al.). (b) It is the standard of all holiness (see Matt. 5:48; 1 Pet. 1:16, et al.). (c) It implies necessarily the divine opposition to, and condemnation of all sin (Hab. 1:13; 1 Sam. 6:20; Isa. 6:5, et al.). (d) The contemplation of this attribute is accordingly peculiarly adapted to awaken or deepen the human consciousness of sin. See Scriptures above referred to. (e) It is revealed to men, nevertheless, as setting before them the highest end of their aspiration, and hope, and endeavor (see Exod. 19:6; Lev. 20:7; Heb. 12; 1 Pet. 1:16).

2. Holiness in Moral Creatures Generally. The Scriptures represent the unfallen angels as "holy" (Matt. 25:31; Mark 8:38); men also in many instances are thus represented (2 Kings 4:9; 2 Chron. 35:3; Ezra 8:28; Mark 6:20; 1 Pet. 2:5).

But in all such cases the following distinctions are to be borne in mind: (a) Holiness of the most exalted type in the creature, as in the holy angels, is less than the holiness of God. Their holiness is perfect conformity to the will of God, one infinitely superior to themselves. The holiness of God is absolute; its law is in the perfection of his own Being. (b) God is in the most complete sense separate from evil. In him is no possibility of sin. With infinite comprehension he perfectly measures the enormity of sin and hates it with a perfect hatred. The angels are finite in their capacities, and however holy there exists for them at least the abstract possibility of sinning. For such reasons, probably, it is written, "There is none holy as the Lord" (1 Sam. 2:2); "He charged his angels with folly" (Job 4:18), and "Behold, he putteth no trust in his saints (angels); yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight" (Job 15:15). In connection with the last passage, says Dillmann, "In comparison with the all-transcending holiness and purity of God, the creatures which ethically and physically are the purest are impure."

Holiness in man, with respect to which the foregoing, is certainly suggestive, requires further consideration.

3. Holiness in Man. Of this it is to be noted, (a) That in many cases the holiness ascribed to men in the Scriptures is simply ceremonial, formal. They are persons "separated," "set apart," or dedicated to holy services. They were expected or required, however, along with this outward dedication, to lead holy lives, and to be inwardly dedicated, a requirement frequently lost sight of. Thus the priests and the Levites are spoken of in the Old Testament as "holy." (b) The holiness predicated or required of men, upon which the Scriptures everywhere lay almost exclusive stress, is that of character and conduct. (c) Man appears before us in the Scriptures as a fallen being, and, as he appears to our observation, by nature unholy and sinful. Created in the image of God, he has lost one of the most essential features of that image—holiness. (d) Holiness, so far as it appears in man anywhere, is an outcome of God's gracious work in salvation, and yet not without the proper exertion of one's own free will, and the putting forth of strenuous effort (Eph. 4:22, 24). (e) Exalted attainments in holiness are possible for men, and often realized in this life (Luke 1:75; 2 Cor. 7:1; 1 Thess. 3:13). (f) The whole tone of Scripture accords with the weighty exhortation, "Follow peace with all men and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord" (Heb. 12:14).

For other phases of this part of the subject, see SANCTIFICATION.

4. Holy Place, Things, etc. The Scriptures also ascribe holiness to places (e. g., the Temple, and the "most holy place" therein). Also to things, as the altars and other accessories of worship. By holiness in such instances is meant "separation" or dedication to holy uses, and of course there is implied no moral quality or inherent sanctity in the objects themselves. They were to be treated with reverence, as should churches and accessories of worship in these days, because of the holiness of God to whose service they are dedicated. See HOLINESS, CEREMONIAL.—E. McC.

HOLINESS, CEREMONIAL. Jehovah had called Israel to be "a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation" (Exod. 19:6), having placed them in covenant fellowship with himself. In this covenant relationship he established an institution of salvation, which furnished the covenant people with the means of obtaining the expiation of their sins and securing righteousness before God and holiness of life with God (see also Lev., chaps. 11-15, 17, 18; Deut. 14:1-21). This holiness was shown in certain ceremonies and laws:

1. The dedication of the firstborn (Exod. 13:2, 12, 13; 22:29, 30, etc.), and the offering of all firstlings and first fruits (Deut. 26:1, sq.).

2. The distinction between clean and unclean food (Lev., ch. 11; Deut., ch. 14).

3. Provision for purification (Lev., chaps. 12-15; Deut. 23:1-14). See PURIFICATION.

4. Laws against disfigurement (Lev. 19:27; Deut. 14:1) and against excessive scourging (Deut. 25:3).

5. Laws against unnatural marriages and lusts (Lev., chaps. 18, 20).

6. Holiness of priests (q. v.), LEVITES (q. v.), and holiness of sacred places. See TABERNACLE; TEMPLE, etc.

7. Of times. See FESTIVALS.

HO'LON (Heb. הוֹלוֹן or הוֹלֹן, kho-lone', sandy).

1. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:51), given to the priests (21:15). Location is unknown.

2. A city in the plain of Moab upon which judgment was pronounced by Jeremiah (48:21). Not identified, although named in connection with Jahazah, Dibon, and other known places.

HOLPEN. See GLOSSARY.

HOLY GHOST, the third Person in the Trinity.

1. Scriptural Designations (Heb. רִיחַ אֱלֹהִים, roo'-akh el-o-heem', Spirit of God; or רִיחַ יְהוָה, roo'-akh yeh-ho-vaw', Spirit of Jehovah; Gr. τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, lō pnyoo'-mah to hag'-ee-on, "the Holy Ghost," or "the Holy Spirit"). Frequently the term is simply "the Spirit," or "the Spirit of the Lord," or "the Spirit of God," or "the Spirit of Jesus Christ" (Matt. 3:16; Luke 3:22; 4:18; Acts 5:9; Phil. 1:19).

2. Theological Statements. The doctrine of the Holy Ghost has about it the difficulty that belongs to that of the Trinity, or the existence of God as a purely spiritual being; the difficulty that arises from the narrow limits of the human understanding. Nevertheless the Scriptures bring to us their definite representations of truth. And with these Christian thought must concern itself. The chief topics of theology respecting the Holy Ghost are: 1. His personality; 2. His divinity; 3. His relation to the Father and to the Son; 4. His office or work.

(1) Personality. The historic and prevailing doctrine of the Christian Church, in accordance with the Scriptures, has been that the Holy Ghost is a person distinct from the Father and the Son, though united to both in the mysterious oneness of the Godhead. He is not simply a personification or figurative expression for the divine energy or operation, as some have held at various periods of the history of the Church (Anti-Trinitarians), but an intelligent agent, possessed of self-consciousness and freedom. In proof of this it is justly said: (1) That the Scriptures which ascribe distinct personality to the Father and the Son, with equal explicitness ascribe distinct personality to the Holy Ghost. Prominent illustrations of this are found in Matt. 3:16, 17; 28:19; John 14:16, 17; 15:26. (2) The pronouns used with reference to the Holy Spirit are invariably personal pronouns, e. g., John 16:13, 14; Acts 13:2. (3) The attributes of personality, self-consciousness, and freedom are ascribed to the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. 2:10; 12:11). (4) The relations described as existing between the Holy Spirit and mankind are such as to emphasize his personality. The Spirit strives with man (Gen. 6:3). He instructs, regenerates, sanctifies, and comforts believers (John 16:13, 14; 3:5; 14:16; 1 Pet. 1:2). We are warned not to "sin against," "not to resist," not "to grieve," nor to quench the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:31, 32; Acts 7:51; Eph. 4:30; 1 Thess. 5:19).

(2) Divinity. The divinity of the Holy Ghost has been but little disputed in the Church by those who have admitted his personality. The Arian heresy of the 4th century, which represented the Holy Ghost as the earliest of all the creatures of the created Son, is the chief exception to the general rule. The Scriptures which establish the personality of the Holy Spirit, in many cases, as must have been noted, also establish his divinity. Beyond this attention is commonly called to the following sure indications of Holy Scripture: (1) The Holy Ghost is distinctly called God, and names are given to him that properly belong only to God (Acts 5:3, 4; Isa. 6:9; comp. Acts 28:25; Jer. 31:31-34; Heb. 10:15; 2 Cor. 3:17, 19). (2) Divine attributes, as knowledge, sovereignty, eternity, are ascribed to the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. 2:11; 12:11; Heb. 9:14). (3) Divine works, as creation and the new birth, are attributed to him (Gen. 1:2; Job 26:13; John 3:8, 8). (4) Worship and homage such as belong only to God are paid to the Holy Ghost (Isa. 6:3-10; comp. Acts 28:25-27; 2 Cor. 13:14). And harmonious with this is the fact that the sin against the Holy Ghost is the unpardonable sin (Matt. 12:31, 32). See SIN, UNPARDONABLE.

(3) Relation to Trinity. The relation of the Holy Ghost to the Father and to the Son is a subject with respect to which the faith of the Church developed slowly. The controversies of the first four centuries related principally to the Son. The Council at Nicæa, A. D. 325, gave forth simply this clause respecting the third Person in the Trinity: "And we believe in the Holy Spirit." The second Council at Constantinople, A. D. 381, added the words "the Lord and Giver of life who proceeds from the Father, who is to be worshiped and glorified with the Father and the Son, and who spake through the prophets." At the third Synod of Toledo, A. D. 589, the words "filio que" (and the Son) were added, so as to assert the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son as well as the Father. This was a principal cause of the division between the Western and Eastern Churches, the former maintaining, the latter denying, that the Holy Ghost proceeds from both the Father and the Son (see Shedd, Hist. of Doctrine, vol. i, pp. 355-362). The prevailing doctrine may be thus summed up: (1) The Holy Ghost is the same in substance and equal in power and glory with the Father and the Son. (2) He is, nevertheless, as to his mode of subsistence and operation, subordinate to both the Father and the Son, as he proceeds from them and is sent by them, and they operate through him (John 15:26; 16:15; 14:26; Phil. 1:19; Acts 11:17).

(4) Office. Well says Van Oosterzee: "Happily, not the sounding the depths of the Holy Spirit's nature, but the receiving and possessing of the Holy Spirit himself, is for us, even as Christian theologians, the main point." Hence, without detracting from the value of what has preceded, the paramount importance of the office and work of the Holy Spirit. This is indicated as follows: (1) The Spirit is the immediate source of all life, physical and intellectual (Psa. 104:29; Isa.

32:14, 15; Job 32:8; 33:4; Gen. 2:7; Exod. 31:2, sq.; Num. 11:17, et al.). (2) He bore an important part in the coming of Christ in the flesh and the qualifying of his human nature for his work (Luke 1:35; John 3:34; 1:32). (3) He is the revealer of all divine truth. The Holy Scriptures are especially the product of the Holy Spirit (Mic. 3:8; John 14:26; 16:13; 1 Cor. 2:10-13; 2 Tim. 3:16). (4) He moves upon the hearts and consciences of all men, attending revealed truth with his power wherever it is known, and even where it is not known, affording some measure of divine light and gracious influence (Acts 2:17; John 16:8-11; 1 Cor. 2:4). (5) He convicts men of sin, graciously aids them in repentance and faith; regenerates, comforts, and sanctifies believers; bears witness to their acceptance with God and adoption as God's children; dwells in them as the principle of a new and divine life. In addition to Scripture before quoted, see Rom. 8:14-16; 1 Cor. 6:19; 2 Cor. 3:18 (see SPIRIT, WITNESS OF). (6) He also exercises guidance in the ministrations of the Church, calling men to various offices and endowing them with qualifications for their work (Acts 13:2; 1 Cor. 12:4-11).

HOLY OF HOLIES. See TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.

HOLY PLACE. See TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.

HOLY SPIRIT. See HOLY GHOST.

HOLYDAY. 1. The rendering of the Heb. חַגֵּי, khaw-gag', to dance, a festival celebrated by sacred dances (Exod. 5:1), and so a public solemnity (Psa. 42:4).

2. In Col. 2:16 "holyday" is the rendering of the Gr. heh-or-tay' (εορτή), a feast, and often so translated.

HOMAM (Heb. חֹמָם, ho-maum', destruction), one of the sons of Lotan, and grandson of Seir the Horite (1 Chron. 1:39). In the parallel passage (Gen. 36:22) his name is written HEMAM.

HOME. See FAMILY; HOUSEHOLD.

HOME BORN. See SERVICE.

HOMER. See METROLOGY, II.

HONEST, HONESTY. See GLOSSARY.

HONESTY (Gr. καλός, kal-os', excellent). "Honorable" is generally rendered in the R. V. "honorable" and "seemly." Sem-not'-ace (Gr. σεμνότης) has the meaning of gravity, probity, purity (1 Tim. 2:2). "Honestly" (Rom. 13:13; 1 Thess. 4:12) is the rendering of the Gr. γνο-σκη-μον'-acc (ἐνασχ-μόνως), and means seemingly. In general, honesty stands for upright disposition, rectitude in dealing with others, probity, purity.

HONEY. 1. The rendering of the following words:

(1) Yah'-ar (Heb. יָאָר, copse, or forest, 1 Sam. 14:25, 27, 29; Cant. 5:1), the honey of bees, and so called because found in trees.

(2) No'-feth (Heb. נִפְתָּה, to drip, distil, Psa. 19:10; Prov. 5:3; 24:13; 27:7; Cant. 4:11), usually used of the honey in the comb.

(3) Deb-ash' (Heb. דְּבַשׁ, stickiness), the word most frequently used for honey. It is to be understood as bee honey in most passages in the Old Testament, even in those in which Canaan is described as the land flowing with milk and honey (Exod. 3:8, 17, etc.), bees being abundant even in the remote parts of the wilderness, where they deposit their honey in the crevices of the rocks or in hollow trees. The term debash applies also to grape honey, which the Israelites prepared and made an article of export. It was this which Jacob sent to Joseph (Gen. 43:11), and which the Tyrians purchased from Palestine (Ezek. 27:17). It is still called dibs, and is an important article of commerce in Palestine and Syria. Three hundred pounds of grapes yield one hundred pounds of dibs, and when diluted with a little water takes the place of sugar (Exod. 16:31).

(4) Tsoof (Heb. תְּסוּף, dripping), the cells of the honeycomb full of honey (Psa. 19:10; Prov. 16:24).

(5) Mel'-ee (Gr. μέλι, Rev. 10:9, sq.) is the term for honey in general, while kay-ree'-on (Gr. κηρὸν) is applied to the honeycomb (Luke 24:42).

(6) The "wild honey" mentioned as part of John the Baptist's food (Matt. 3:4) is supposed by some to have been a vegetable honey exuding from trees, but was likely the honey of wild bees. Josephus mentions a honey made from the juice of grapes!

2. Mosaic Regulations. Together with "leaven," honey was not permitted to be burned on the altar. They are mentioned together as producing fermentation, and tending to acidify and spoil that which might be mixed with them. Their prohibition was to show that the taint of corruption must not be allowed to adhere to the spiritual food which man offered to God. The first fruits of honey were, however, presented for the use of the priests (2 Chron. 31:5).

Figurative. Honey and milk are put for sweet discourse (Cant. 4:11). The word of God is compared with honey as furnishing pleasure (Psa. 19:10; 119:103), and honey taken in due quantities is illustrative of moderation in pleasure (Prov. 25:16, 27). See BEES, in ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HONOR, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, meaning: (1) Respect paid to superiors: to God (1 Chron. 16:27; Psa. 66:2; 96:6; Dan. 11:38; John 5:23; Rev. 5:12); to parents and kings, including submission and service (Exod. 20:12; Matt. 15:4; 1 Pet. 2:17); the esteem due to virtue, wisdom, glory, reputation, and probity (Prov. 15:33; 22:4; 29:23). (2) The reward, emolument, position, given to subjects (Num. 22:17, 37; 2 Chron. 1:11, 12; Esth. 6:3, 6, 9), and the final reward of righteousness (John 5:44; Rom. 2:7; Heb. 2:7; 2 Pet. 1:17).

HONORABLE. See GLOSSARY.

HOOD (Heb. טָוֵשׁ, tsaw-neeef', Isa. 3:23), a headdress composed of twisted cloths of various colors; a turban. See DRESS.

HOOF (Heb. פָּרָסָה, par-saw', to split, divide), the cleft foot of neat cattle (Exod. 10:26; Lev. 11:3, etc.), and also of the horse, though not cloven (Isa. 5:28; Jer. 47:3). The parting of the hoof is one of the main distinctions between clean and unclean animals. See ANIMAL.

HOOK. 1. Khawkh (Heb. חֹקֶה, literally, a thorn), a ring, such as we place in the nose of a bull to lead him about (2 Kings 19:23; Isa. 37:29; Ezek. 29:4, etc.); an allusion in the first two passages to the absolute control of Jehovah over Sennacherib. A similar method was adopted for leading captives, as Manasseh (2 Chron. 33:11).

2. A peg, or pin, upon which the curtains were hung in the tabernacle (q. v.).

3. A vine dresser's pruning hook (Isa. 2:4; 18:5; Mic. 4:3; Joel 3:10).

4. Double or forked pegs, upon which the carcasses of beasts were hung for flaying (Ezek. 40:43).

5. A fleshhook for taking joints of meat out of the boiling pot (Exod. 27:3; 1 Sam. 2:13, 14). See FISHHOOKS.

HOPE, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Beh'-takh (Heb. בְּטָחָה, safety) means both the fact, security, and the feeling, trust (Psa. 16:9; 22:9, etc.).

2. Keh'-sel (Heb. כִּפְסָה, fatness), confidence, sometimes foolishly entertained (Job 8:14; 31:24, etc.), but not always (Psa. 78:7).

3. Mib-tawkh' (Heb. מִבְּטָחָה, refuge), firm and certain hope (Prov. 22:19, A. V. "trust"); sometimes figuratively of a person or thing in which confidence is placed (Job 8:14, A. V. "trust"; Psa. 42:5; 71:5, etc.).

4. Makh-as-eh' (Heb. מַחְסֵה, or makh-sel' (מִבְּטָחָה), a shelter (Psa. 62:8, A. V. "refuge"; Jer. 17:7, 17; Joel 3:16, literally, a refuge from storm, and applied to God).

5. Mik-vel' (Heb. מִבְּקֵרָה, or mik-vay' (מִבְּקֵרָה), something waited for; also something collected (Ezra 10:2, expectation); also one in whom confidence is placed (Jer. 14:8; 17:13; 50:7).

6. Tik-vau' (Heb. תֵּיקוּוֹה, line thread, Josh. 2:18, 21), expectation (Job 11:20; 19:10; Psa. 71:5); the "prisoners of hope" (Zech. 9:12) are those cherishing hope of deliverance.

7. To-kheh'-leth (Heb. תּוֹכְהֵלֶת, expectation (Job 41:9; Psa. 39:7).

8. El-pee' (Gr. ἐλπίς) means: (1) In a bad sense, expectation of evil, but in the New Testament always (2) in a good sense, expectation of good, hope. In the Christian sense, joyful and confident expectation of eternal salvation (Acts 28:6; 26:7; Rom. 5:4, sq.; 1 Cor. 13:13). God is styled the "God of hope" (Rom. 15:13), because our hope is from him. Paul calls his converts his hope (1 Thess. 2:19), not as cause, but subjects of his hope.

HOPH'NI (Heb. חֹפְנִי, khof-nee', a fighter), the first named of the two sons of the high priest Eli (1 Sam. 1:3; 2:34), who fulfilled their hereditary sacerdotal duties at Shiloh. Their brutal rapacity and lust, which increased with their father's age (2:12-17, 22), filled the people with indignation, and provoked the curse which was denounced against their father's house, first by an unknown prophet (vers. 27-36), and then by the youthful Samuel (3:11-14). They were both slain on the same day, and the ark was captured by the Philistines (4:10, 11), B. C. about 1076. The Scriptures call them "sons of Belial" (2:12).

HOPH'RA. See PHARAOH-HOPHRA.

HOR, MOUNT (Heb. הַר הָהוֹר, hore haw-howr', "mountain, the mountain," i. e., the mountain of mountains), the name of two mountains.

Mount Hor.

1. The mountain on which Aaron died (Num. 20:25, 27). The word Hor is regarded by the lexicographers as an archaic form of Har, the usual Hebrew term for "mountain." The few facts given us in the Bible regarding Mount Hor are soon told. It was "on the boundary line" (Num. 20:23) or "at the edge" (33:37) of the land of Edom. It was the halting place of the people next after Kadesh (20:22; 33:37), and they quitted it for Zalmonah (33:41) in the road to the Red Sea (21:4). It was during the encampment at Kadesh that Aaron was gathered to his fathers. The commonly accepted site of Mount Hor is at the east of the 'Arabah, the highest and most conspicuous of the whole range of the sandstone mountains of Edom, having close beneath it on its eastern side the mysterious city of Petra. The tradition has existed from the earliest date. It is now the Jebel Nebi-Harûn, "the mountain of the Prophet Aaron." Trumbull (Kadesh-Barnea, p. 129, sq.) opposes this tradition for the following reasons: "(1) Permission to pass through his territory was refused Israel by the king of Edom, who came out against Israel 'with much people and with a strong hand . . . wherefore Israel turned away from him' (Num. 20:14-21). It was at this time that the death and burial of Aaron took place. (2) There is commonly a distinction between 'Mount Seir' and 'the land of Edom' in the various Pentateuchal references to the Edomitish territory east and west of the 'Arabah. . . . And Mount Hor is said to be 'by the coast (or, on the line) of the land of Edom' (Num. 20:23), . . . yet when the region of which Jebel Neby Hâroon is a part had to be compassed, it is mentioned as Mount Seir (Deut. 2:1-5). (3) The advance of Israel from Kadesh-barnea to Mount Hor alarmed the king of Arad in Canaan, who came out against them in force (Num. 21:1; 33:40). There is a mountain which fully meets the requirements of the Bible text, and the natural demands of the narrative, as to the Mount Hor where Aaron died and was buried. That mountain is Jebel Madurah, near the western extremity of Wady Feqreh, a little to the southwest of the passes es-Sufâh and el-Yemen. Its formation, its location, its name, go to identify it with the place of Aaron's burial, and there is even a smack of tradition in its favor. . . . In its location, Jebel Madurah stands at a triangular site, where the boundaries of Edom, of Canaan, and the Wilderness of Zin meet. It is at the extremest northwest boundary of Edom, yet it is not within that boundary line. It is on the very verge of the land of promise, yet it is not within the outer limits of that land." See Rowland (Imp. Dict.), article Moserah.

2. A mountain named only in Num. 34:7, 8, as one of the marks in the northern boundary of the land of promise. Its identification is difficult. The Mediterranean was the western boundary; the first point was Mount Hor, and the second "the entrance of Hamath." If Dr. Porter's identification of the latter with the pass at Kalat el-Husn, close to Hums, is correct, then Mount Hor can be nothing else than the great chain of Lebanon itself. "It is so clearly the natural northern boundary of the country, that there seems no reason to doubt that the whole range is intended by the term Hor" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

HOR'AM (Heb. הָרַם, ho-ramm', lofty), the king of Gezer, who, coming to the relief of Lachish, was overthrown by Joshua (Josh. 10:33), B. C. after 1170.

HOR'EB (Heb. הָרֵב, ho-rabé', desert, Exod. 3:1; 17:6; 33:6; Deut. 1:2, 6, 19, etc.; 1 Kings 8:9; 19:8; 2 Chron. 5:10; Psa. 106:19; Mal. 4:4), in the opinion of some a lower part or peak of the Sinai from which one ascends towards the south the summit of Sinai (Jebel Musa); but according to others a general name of the whole mountain of which Sinai was a particular summit. See SINAI.

HOREM (Heb. חֹרֵם, chor-ame', devoted), one of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38), between Migdal-el and Beth-Anath. Van de Velde (i, 178, 9) suggests Hurah as the site of Horem; Keil and Delitzsch (Com., in loc.) say that neither Horem nor Beth-Anath are known.

HOR-HAGID'GAD (Heb. חֹר הַגִּידָד, khore hag-glid-gawd', hole of the cleft), the name of the thirty-third station of Israel in the desert (Num. 33:32, 33), probably the same with their forty-first station, GUDGODAH (q. v.) (Deut. 10:6, 7).

HORI (Heb. חֹרִי, or חֹרְרִי, kho-ree', cave dweller).

1. A son of Lotan, and grandson of Seir (Gen. 36:22; 1 Chron. 1:39).

2. In Gen. 36:30, "Hori" has in the original the article prefixed, i. e. THE Horite; and is the same word with that which in vers. 21, 29, is rendered in the A. V. "the Horites" (Smith, Dict.).

3. A Simeonite, whose son Shaphat was the commissioner of his tribe, sent by Moses to explore the land of Canaan (Num. 13:5), B. C. 1210.

HORIMS (Deut. 2:12, 22). See HORITE.

HORN (Heb. קֶרֶן, keh-ren, projecting; Gr. κέρας, ker'-as). Horns are mentioned in Scripture as being used for:

1. Trumpets. These were at first merely horns perforated at the tip; such as are still used for calling laborers to meals. Later they were made of metal, as the silver trumpets of the priests (Num. 10:1, sq.). Those used at the overthrow of Jericho (Josh. 6:4, 6, 13) were, probably, large horns or instruments in the shape of a horn, which gave a loud, far-sending note (see Lev. 23:24; 25:9).

2. Vessels. Horns being hollow and easily polished, have been used in ancient and modern times for drinking and kindred purposes, such as a flask or vessel made of horn to hold oil (1 Sam. 16:1, 13; 1 Kings 1:39), or toilet bottle containing antimony for blacking the eyelashes. See INKHORN.

3. The projections of the altar of burnt offering (Exod. 27:2) and of the altar of incense (30:2) at their four corners, were called "horns." By laying hold of these horns of the altar of burnt offering, a criminal found safety (1 Kings 1:50; 2:28), if his offense was accidental (Exod. 21:14).

4. The peak or summit of a hill was called a horn (Isa. 5:1, margin) (see illustration below).

Horns of Hattin.

nect the name with a root signifying "white," and considers the Horites as the representatives of a white race whom their neighbors contrasted with the "red"-skinned Edomites. In such a case they would have been members of the Amorite stock. The Horites anciently dwelt in Mount Seir, and were the earliest inhabitants of the land between the Dead Sea and the Elamitic Gulf. They were conquered and exterminated by the Edomites (Gen. 14:6; 36:20, 21, 29; Deut. 2:12, 22, "Horim").

HOR'MAH (Heb. חֹרְמָה, chor-maw', devoted to destruction), the chief town of a Canaanitish king in the south of Palestine (Josh. 12:14), near which the Israelites were discomfited by the Amalekites when against the advice of Moses they attempted to enter Canaan by that route (Num. 14:45; comp. 21:1-3; Deut. 1:44). It was afterward taken by Joshua and assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:30), but finally fell to Simeon (19:4; 1 Chron. 4:30). Hormah has not been positively identified, though S'beita has been suggested as its possible site.

5. In Hab. 8:4, "he had horns coming out of his hand;" the context implies rays of light (comp. Deut. 33:2).

The custom of the Druse women of wearing horns seems not to have been referred to in the Scripture. So remarkable an article of dress, had it been in existence, would in all probability have been noticed by many authors who have entered so minutely into such matters. These horns consisted at first of an apparatus designed to finish off the headdress so as to raise the veil a little from the face, and from small beginnings have developed to their present enormous size. Sometimes they are made of pasteboard, of tin, silver, and among the wealthy of gold. The day for these preposterous appendages is about over. After the wars between the Maronites and the Druses (A. D. 1841 and 1845), the Maronite clergy thundered their excommunications against them, and very few Christians now wear them (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 101, 102).

Figurative. Two principal applications of this metaphor will be found—strength and honor.

Horns being the chief source of attack and defense with the animals to which God has given them, they are employed in Scripture as emblems of power; of God (Psa. 18:2; Hab. 3:4), of Christ (Luke 1:69; Rev. 5:6), of Ephraim (Deut. 33:17), of the wicked (Psa. 22:21; 75:10), of kingdoms (Dan. 7:7, 8, 24; 8:3, 5, 6, 20), of antichristian powers (Rev. 13:1; 17:3, 7).

The budding, or sprouting of horns, is figurative of the commencement or revival of a nation or power (Psa. 132:17; Ezek. 29:21); raising up, of arrogance (Psa. 75:4, 5); exalting, of increase of power and glory (1 Sam. 2:1, 10; Psa. 89:17, 24; 92:10; 112:9); pushing with, of conquests (Deut. 33:17; 1 Kings 22:11; Mic. 4:13); bringing down, or degradation (Job 16:15, "I have defiled," i. e., laid low, "my horn in the dust," as a wounded animal); cutting off, of destruction of power (Psa. 75:10; Jer. 48:25; Lam. 2:3).

HORNET. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HORONAIM (Heb. חֲרֹנַיִם, kho-ro-nah'-yim, double cave town), a city of Moab, on the mountain slope of Luhith, along the route of the invading Assyrians (Isa. 16:5; Jer. 48:3, 5, 34).

HORONITE, THE (Heb. חֲרֹנִי, hakh-ō-ro-nee'), an epithet of Sanballat (only in Neh. 2:10, 19; 13:2). Fürst and the latest (12th) German edition of Gesenius derive it from Beth-Horon, while Dr. Strong's Exhaustive Concordance and Robinson's Gesenius take it from Horonaim. On the latter supposition Sanballat was a Moabite; and this would accord well with his connection with Tobiah, the Ammonite. But if the term is from Beth-Horon, he was probably a Samaritan, or related to the Samaritans. This would agree with Josephus, who says: "He was a Cuthean by birth, of which stock were the Samaritans also" (Ant., xi, 7, § 2).—W. H.

HORSE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. On account of the strength of the horse, he has become the symbol of war (Deut. 32:13; Psa. 66:12; Isa. 58:14; Zech. 9:10; 10:3); of conquest, as in Cant. 1:9, the bride advances with her charms to conquest, "as a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots." The war horse rushing into battle is figurative of impetuosity of the wicked in sin (Jer. 8:6). In Zechariah (6:2-7) the prophet mentions horses that were red, black, white, and speckled. The red horses symbolize war, the black pestilence, the speckled famine, while the white points to the glorious victories of the ministers of the divine judgment (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

HORSE GATE (Heb. שַׁעַר הַכּוֹסֵיִם, shah'-ar has-soo-seem'), a gate in the old wall of Jerusalem (q. v.), at the west end of the bridge leading from Zion to the temple (Neh. 3:28; Jer. 31:40), perhaps so called because the "horses of the sun" (2 Kings 23:11) were led through it for idolatrous worship (2 Chron. 23:15).

HORSE-LEECH. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HORSEMAN (usually Heb. בַּעַל פָּרָשׁ, bah'-al paw-rash', master of a horse). From Exod. 14:9, etc., it would appear that cavalry accompanied Pharaoh in his pursuit of Israel—"his horsemen."

Because in the delineations of battle scenes which occur in the monuments there is no representation of cavalry, it has been supposed by some that Egypt did not possess that arm of service, at least in early times. Professor Hengstenberg has maintained that the word "horsemen," of the above passage, should be rendered "chariot riders." "The first and principal passage concerning the constituent parts of the Egyptian army which pursued the Israelites, is that of Exod. 14:6, 7: 'And he made ready his chariot, and took his people with him; and he took six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and chariot warriors upon all of them.' Here Pharaoh's preparation for war is fully described. It consists, first, of chariots, and, secondly, of chariot warriors. Cavalry is no more mentioned than infantry." If cavalry was not an early arm of Egyptian warfare it is evident that it was well known in later times (Isa. 31:1; 36:9). Among the Assyrians single riders on horseback were not uncommon, although with them, too, the cavalry arm of the military service consisted chiefly of chariots. See WARFARE.

HO'SAH (Heb. הוֹסֵה, kho-saw', hopeful).

1. A city of Asher, at a point on the boundary line where it turned from the direction of Tyre toward Achzib (Josh. 19:29); possibly the modern village of el-Ghazieh, a little south of Zidon.

2. A Levite of the family of Merari, who, with thirteen of his relatives, was appointed door-keeper to the ark after its arrival in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 16:38). In the latter distribution (26:10, 11, 16) the gate Shallecheth, on the west side of the temple, fell to him, B. C. about 988.

HOSANNA (Gr. ὡσαννά, ho-san-nah', from Heb. הוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ הוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ, ho-she-ah' naw, save now), the cry of the multitude as they thronged in our Lord's triumphal procession into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:9, 15; Mark 11:9, 10; John 12:13). The psalm from which it was taken (the 118th) was one with which they were familiar from being accustomed to recite the 25th and 26th verses at the Feast of Tabernacles. On that occasion the Hallel, consisting of Psalms 113-118, was chanted by one of the priests, and at certain intervals the multitudes joined in the responses, waving their branches of willow and palm, and shouting as they waved them hallelujah, or hosanna, or "O Lord, I beseech thee, send now prosperity" (Psa. 118:25). On each of the seven days during which the feast lasted the people thronged in the court of the temple, and went in procession about the altar, setting their boughs bending toward it, the trumpets sounding as they shouted hosanna. It was not uncommon for the Jews in later times to employ the observances of this feast, which was pre-eminently a feast of gladness, to express their feelings on other occasions of rejoicing (1 Macc. 13:51; 2 Macc. 10:6, 7). See HALLEL.

The early Christian Church adopted this word into its worship. It is found in the apostolical constitutions connected with the great doxology, "Glory be to God on high," and was frequently used in the communion service, during which the great doxology was sung.

HOSE, HOSEN (Chald. שׁוּשַׁן, pat-teesh', Dan. 3:21). The better rendering of this term appears to be tunic, and undergarment. See DRESS.

HOSE'A (Heb. שׁוּשַׁן, ho-shay'-ah, deliverer), the son of Beeri, and the first of the minor prophets as they appear in the A. V.

1. Time. In the first verse of his prophecy it is stated that "the word of the Lord came unto Hosea in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and . . . of Jeroboam, king of Israel." Dr. J. F. McCurdy dates the beginning of Hosea's public life at B. C. 748, and Hezekiah's death at B. C. 690, which would make the prophet's ministry extend over a period of about fifty-eight years. The book furnishes strong presumptive evidence in support of this chronology.

2. Place. There seems to be a general consent among commentators that the prophecies of Hosea were delivered in the kingdom of Israel, and that he was a subject of that kingdom. This is favored not only by the fact that his prophetic addresses are occupied throughout with the kingdom of the ten tribes, but also by the peculiar style and language of his prophecies, which have here and there an Aramæan coloring, and still more by the intimate acquaintance with the circumstances and localities of the northern kingdom (5:1; 6:8, 9; 12:12; 14:6), which even goes so far that he calls the Israelitish kingdom "the land" (1:2), and the king of Israel "our king" (7:5). It has been conjectured that Hosea, having long appealed in vain to his countrymen, retired to Judah, and that there his prophecy was committed to writing in its present form. Dr. Sayce (High. Crit., etc., p. 477) says of Hosea, "Hosea was a northern prophet, and his prophecies were delivered to the rulers and the inhabitants of Samaria." But they have undergone a revision in Judah; in other words, they have passed through the hands of Jewish editors . . . there are passages where the context shows that the name of Judah has been substituted for that of Israel (e. g., 8:14)."

3. The Prophet's Family Relations. It is recorded in 1:2-9 that Hosea, at the command of God, took an impure woman (Gomer, the daughter of Gibleim) to wife, and had by her two sons (Jezeel and Loammi) and one daughter (Lo-ruhamah), and in 3:1, 2, that by the divine command he purchased an adulteress. These statements have given rise to much discussion as to their literal or allegorical interpretation. Dr. Strong (Mc. and S., Cyc., s. v.) expresses the opinion that "There were two marriages by the prophet: first in chaps. 1, 2, of a woman (probably of lewd inclinations already) who became the mother of three children, and was afterward repudiated for her adultery; and the second, in ch. 3, of a woman at least attached formerly to another, but evidently reformed to a virtuous wife. Both these women represented the Israelitish nation, especially the northern kingdom, which, although unfaithful to Jehovah, should first be punished and then reclaimed by him." Dr. Keil (Com., in loc.) says, "No other course is left to us than to picture to ourselves Hosea's marriages as internal events, i. e., as merely carried out in that inward and spiritual intuition in which the word of God was addressed to him; and this removes all the difficulties that beset the assumption of marriages contracted in outward reality." See BIBLE.

HOSHA'IAH (Heb. שׁוּשַׁן, ho-shah-yaw', Jah has saved).

1. A man who assisted in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem after it had been rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:32), B. C. 445.

2. The father of a certain Jezeaniah, or Azariah, who was a man of note after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and besought Jeremiah to favor the flight of the remnant of the Jews into Egypt (Jer. 42:1; 43:2), B. C. 586.

HOSHA'MA, or HOSH'AMA (Heb. שׁוּשַׁן, ho-shaw-maw', Jah has heard), one of the sons of King Jehoiachin, born during his captivity (1 Chron. 3:18), B. C. after 597.

HOSHE'A (Hebrew same as Hosea).

1. The original name of Joshua, the son of Nun (Deut. 32:44); sometimes written Oshea, as Num. 13:8, 16.

2. The son of Elah, and last king of Israel. He conspired against and slew his predecessor, Pekah (2 Kings 15:30), "in the twentieth year of Jotham" Tiglath-pileser set up Hoshea as the nominal king of Samaria, but as his personal representative (B. C. about 733). He did not become established on the throne till after an interregnum of at least eight years, viz., in the twelfth year of Ahaz (2 Kings 17:1). It is declared of him that "he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, but not as the kings of Israel that were before him" (v. 2). Shortly after his accession he submitted to the supremacy of Shalmaneser, who appears to have entered his territory with the intention of subduing it by force if resisted (2 Kings 17:3); and indeed seems to have stormed the strong caves of Beth-arbel (Hos. 10:14), but who retired pacified with a present. Intelligence that Hoshea had entered into negotiations with So, king of Egypt, prompted Shalmaneser to return and punish the rebellious king with imprisonment for withholding the tribute (2 Kings 17:4). He was probably released by the payment of a large ransom, but a second revolt soon after provoked the king of Assyria to march an army into the land of Israel; and after a three years' siege Samaria was taken and destroyed, and the ten tribes were carried away beyond the Euphrates, B. C. 722 (2 Kings 17:5, 6; 18:9-12). Of the future fortune of Hoshea we know nothing.

3. Son of Azariah and prince of the tribe of Ephraim in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:20), B. C. about 1000.

4. One of the chiefs of Israel who joined in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah after the captivity (Neh. 10:23), B. C. 445.

HOSPITALITY. In oriental lands, and still in some countries of belated civilization, it was and is felt to be a sacred duty to receive, feed, lodge, and protect any traveler who might stop at the door. The stranger was treated as a guest, and men who had thus eaten together were bound to each other by the strongest ties of friendship, which descended to their heirs, confirmed by mutual presents. With the Greeks hospitality was a religious duty, as was the case with Hebrews, enjoined by the law of Moses (Lev. 19:34). The present practice of the Arabs is the nearest approach to the ancient Hebrew hospitality. A traveler may sit at the door of a perfect stranger and smoke his pipe until the master welcomes him with an evening meal, and may tarry a limited number of days without inquiry as to his purposes, and depart with simple "God be with you" as his only compensation. As the Hebrews became more numerous inns were provided, but these did not entirely supersede home hospitality. The Old Testament gives illustrations of it in Gen. 18:1-8; 19:1-3; 24:26, 31-33, etc. Job says (31:32), "The stranger did not lodge in the street, but I opened my doors to the traveler." The neglect of the law of hospitality is illustrated in the case of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-25).

The spirit of Christian hospitality is taught in the New Testament (Luke 14:12-14). The Gr. φιλόξενος (fil-ox'-en-os, a lover of strangers) is the word for hospitality in Tit. 1:8; 1 Pet. 4:9; and φιλοξενία (fil-ox-en-ee'-ah, love of strangers) in Rom. 12:13; Heb. 13:2.

HOST. 1. In a social sense.

(1) Xenos (Gr. ξενος), literally a stranger, i. e., one who receives and entertains hospitably (Rom. 16:23), where "and of the whole Church" is added; meaning that Gaius received all the members of the Church who crossed his threshold, or kindly permitted the Church to worship in his house.

(2) Pan-dokh-yoos' (Gr. πανδοχεύς, "one who receives all comers"), an innkeeper, host (Luke 10:35).

2. In a military sense. See ARMY.

HOST OF HEAVEN (Heb. צְבָאֵי הַשָּׁמַיִם, tseb-aw' hash-shaw-mah'-yim, army of the skies, Gen. 2:1). The sun, moon, and stars, under the symbol of an army; in which the sun is considered as king, the moon as his vicegerent, the stars and planets as their attendants (comp. Judg. 5:20). The worship of the host of heaven was one of the earliest forms of idolatry (q. v.), and was common among the Israelites in the times of their declension from the pure service of God (Deut. 4:19; 2 Kings 17:16; 21:3, 5; Jer. 19:13; Zeph. 1:5; Acts 7:42).

The "host of heaven," referred to in Dan. 8:10, 11, appears to be figurative for "the holy people," i. e., Israel (see 8:24). The comparison of Israel to the "hosts of heaven" has its root in this, that God, the King of Israel, is called the God of Hosts ("the Prince of the Host," v. 11), and by the hosts are generally to be understood the stars or angels; but the tribes of Israel also, who were led by God out of Egypt, are called "the hosts of Jehovah" (Exod. 7:4; 12:41). As in heaven the angels and stars, so on earth the sons of Israel form the host of God. This comparison serves, then, to characterize the insolence of Antiochus (the "horn," Dan. 8:9) as a wickedness against heaven and the heavenly order of things (Keil, Com., in loc.).

Jehovah is frequently mentioned as "Jehovah, God of hosts," i. e., of the celestial armies (Jer. 5:14; 38:17; 44:7; Hos. 12:5, etc.). The Heb. Sabaoth, hosts, is used by the apostles Paul and James (Rom. 9:29; James 5:4).

HOSTAGE (Heb. תַּעֲרָבָה, tah-ar-oo-baw', suretyship), one delivered into the hand of another as security for the performance of a pledge or engagement. In ancient times it was very usual for conquered kings or nations to give hostages for the payment of tribute, of continuance in subjection; thus Josiah, king of Israel, exacted hostages from Amaziah, king of Judah (2 Kings 14:14; 2 Chron. 25:24).

HOTHAM (Heb. חֹתָם, ho-thawm', a seal ring), one of the sons of Heber, the grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:32). He is probably the same with Helem, whose sons are enumerated in v. 35, and grandsons in vers. 36, 37.

HOTHAN (Hebrew same as HOTHAM), an Aroelite, father of Shama and Jehiel, two of David's "valiant men" (1 Chron. 11:44), B. C. about 1000.

HOTHIR (Heb. חֹתִיר, ho-theer', preserver), the thirteenth son of HEMAN (q. v.), who, with eleven of his kinsmen, had charge of the twenty-first division of Levitical singers (1 Chron. 25:4, 28), B. C. after 1000.

HOUGH (Heb. חֲקַר, aw-kar', to extirpate), the method employed to render useless the captured horses of an enemy (Josh. 11:6; comp. Gen. 49:6, margin), since the Israelites were forbidden to use that animal (2 Sam. 8:4; 1 Chron. 18:4). It consisted in hamstringing, i. e., severing "the tendon Achilles" of the hinder legs.

HOUE. See TIME.

HOUSE (Heb. בַּיִת, bah'-yith; Gr. οἰκία, oy-kee'-ah). The beginning of house building is lost in the darkness of primeval times, and reaches back in the sacred record to the days of Cain (Gen. 4:17). While the Israelites did not become dwellers in cities till the sojourn in Egypt and after the conquest of Canaan (Gen. 47:3; Exod. 12:7; Heb. 11:9), the Canaanites, the Assyrians, and the Egyptians were from an early period builders of houses and cities. Of course houses would vary much, according to the climate, tastes, and condition of the people. And yet we find some leading characteristics in the oriental house, distinguishing it from that of northern latitudes.

1. Material. The material for house building is determined partly by what is to be had in the locality, partly by the object of the buildings and the means of the builders. The houses of the rural poor in Egypt, as well as in most parts of Syria, Arabia, and Persia, are for the most part mere huts of mud or sunburnt bricks. Those of the Israelites were probably such as they still are in Palestine, mostly made of brick burned or merely dried in the sun, or of lime and sandstone. Only the houses of the rich, and palaces, were built of hewn stone (1 Kings 7:9; Isa. 9:10) or white marble (1 Chron. 29:2). For mortar there was used clay or lime, or gypsum (Isa. 33:12; comp. Deut. 27:4) and asphaltate (Gen. 11:3). The beams, doorposts, doors, windows, and stairs were commonly of sycamore (Isa. 9:10); in more ornamental buildings, of olive, cypress, cedar, and sandal (1 Kings 7:2; Jer. 22:14).

2. Exterior. Only large palaces, it would appear, were built of more than one story, at least in earlier times; so the palace of Solomon, the house of Lebanon (1 Kings 7:2, sq.), the three-story side chambers of Solomon's Temple (6:5, sq.). There is no other mention in Scripture of any house in Palestine with more than one story, for Acts 20:9 refers to Troas.

(1) The walls were whitewashed outside and Zeph. 1:5). Upon the roof, as in a most public place, Absalom spread the tent for his father's concubines, to indicate the unalterable estrangement between himself and David (2 Sam. 16:21, 22). Announcements were made from the roof (Matt. 10:27; Luke 12:3). It was usual to have two flights of steps to ascend to the roof, one within the house and one in the street, which latter would afford a more ready escape than through the house (Matt. 24:17).

(3) The porch (Heb. מִסְדֵּרֶן, oo-lawn', vestibule) was not uncommon in Egyptian houses, but was a very unusual feature in the houses of ancient Palestine, no reference to it being found in the Old Testament, except in the case of the temple and of Solomon's palace (1 Kings 7:6, 7; 2 Chron. 15:8; Ezek. 40:7). The "porch" (Judg. 3:23, Heb. מִסְדֵּרֶן, mis-der-ohn') is an incorrect rendering, the reference being probably to a colonnade running along the outside of the upper room of Eglon's palace and communicating with a staircase. In the A. V. we read of a porch attached to the high priest's palace (Matt. 26:71, Gr. πυλῶν, poo-lone'), which was likely the gate or entrance to the house from the street, as inside with lime or gypsum, palaces with bright-colored vermilion (Jer. 22:14). The exterior of a dwelling house of the better kind in Palestine is for the most part plain and unattractive, having but few openings or projections, such as to give relief and variety. These openings are not more than the doorway and two or three latticed windows.

(2) The roof is commonly flat, has never any chimneys, and does not overhang the external walls. In the poorer class of houses the roofs were made of earth, stamped and rolled upon a foundation of boughs or rafters. The nature of these roofs readily explains the transaction referred to in Mark (2:4) and Luke (5:19). Probably the bearers of the paralytic in their anxiety broke up the simple materials of the roof, and through the aperture let him down into the presence of Jesus. The better class of houses had their roofs laid with tiles and stone. The outer edge was provided with a breastwork or latticelike railing to prevent falling (Deut. 22:8). The roof is one of the most important parts of an Eastern house, every kind of business and amusement at times proceeding upon it. We have Rahab hiding the spies beneath the stalks of flax laid on the roof to dry (Josh. 2:6). We find the roof used for confidential communing (1 Sam. 9:25), for sleeping (v. 26), for lamentation (Isa. 15:3; Jer. 48:38), for watching the approach of an enemy (Isa. 22:1), or the bearer of tidings (2 Sam. 18:24, 33). Booths were built upon the roof (Neh. 8:16), and altars for idolatrous worship (2 Kings 23:12; Jer. 19:13;

elsewhere (Acts 10:17; 12:14; 14:13; Rev. 21:12). The stō-ah' (John 5:2, Gr. στωά) bore no resemblance to the porch of a dwelling house, but was rather a colonnade, or cloisters, or a distant building, used as a place of resort in the heat of the day. The porch of the palace was a place of judgment for the king (1 Kings 7:7, 8).

(4) Door. Doors were commonly made of wood, the more expensive being of cedar (Cant. 8:9); but doors made of single slabs of stone, some inches thick, occasionally ten feet high, and turning on stone pivots, are found in the old houses and sepulchers in Syria. The doorways of Eastern houses are sometimes richly ornamented, though they are generally mean in appearance even when belonging to sumptuous dwellings. The doorway from the street into the court is usually guarded within from sight by a wall or some arrangement of the passages, and had a stone seat for the porter and other servants. Over the door the Israelites were directed to write sentences from the Law.

(5) Court (Heb. חֲצֵר, khav-tsare', inclosed). The court was one of the great characteristics of the Eastern house, the latter being built to inclose one, two, and even three courts. Some of the finest houses in Damascus have as many as seven. The court nearest the entrance is variously arranged, according as it is the only one, or the house has two or more. If there is only one court, it is an open space or quadrangle, round which the apartments for the inmates, and in country places also the sheds for the cattle, are arranged. A house of a somewhat better description, usually consisted of the court, three or four storerooms on the ground floor, with a single chamber above, from which a flight of stairs leads to the court. The houses of men of rank, and palaces, were usually built with a roomy court, surrounded with porticoes and galleries, paved, provided with well (2 Sam. 17:18) and baths (11:2), probably planted with trees, and forming the reception room of the house. If there were three or more courts, all except the outer one were alike in size and appearance; but the outer one, being devoted to the more public life and intercourse with society, was ma-where they dwell. It was into this court that Esther came to invite the king to visit her part of the palace, but she would not on any account have gone into the outer court.

(6) Windows. The window of an Eastern house had no glass; consisted generally of an aperture, inclosed with latticework, and small, so as to exclude the heat. The windows usually look into the court, but in every house one or more look into the street, making it possible for a person to observe the approach of another without himself being visible (Judg. 5:28; 2 Sam. 6:16; Prov. 7:6; Cant. 2:9). Where houses were built against the city wall it was not unusual for them to have terially different from all the others. Into this court the principal apartments look, and are either open to it in front or are entered from it by doors. Over the doorway leading from the street is a projecting window with a lattice more or less elaborately wrought, which, except in times of public celebrations, is usually closed (2 Kings 9:30). An awning is sometimes drawn over the court and the floor strewn with carpets on festive occasions. The stairs to the upper apartments are in Syria usually in a corner of the court. Around part, if not the whole, of the court is a veranda, often nine or ten feet deep, over which, when there is more than one floor, runs a second gallery of like depth with a balustrade. If there are more than three courts the second is for the use of the master of the house, where he is attended by his eunuchs, children, and females, and sees only those whom he may call from the third court, projecting windows surmounting the wall and looking into the country. From such a window the spies escaped from Jericho (Josh. 2:15) and Paul from Damascus (2 Cor. 11:33). Daniel's room had several windows, and his lattices were open when his enemies found him at prayer (Dan. 6:10). The projecting nature of the window, and the fact that a divan or raised seat encircles the interior, so that persons sitting at the window are near the aperture, easily explains the fall of Ahaziah and Eutyclus (2 Kings 1:2; Acts 20:9).

(7) The pillar formed a very important feature in oriental building, partly, perhaps, as a reminiscence of the tent, with its supporting poles, and partly from the use of flat roofs. Pillars were used to support flat roofs or awnings; also to support curtains (Exod. 26:32). The circumstance of Samson's pulling down the house by means of the pillars may be explained by the fact of the company being assembled on tiers of balconies above each other, supported by central pillars on the basement; when these were pulled down the whole of the upper floors would fall also (Judg. 16:26).

(8) Chimney. The ancient house did not have chimneys; the word so rendered (Hos. 13:3) means a hole through which the smoke escaped, and in use only in the poorer houses, where wood was used for fuel. In the better class of houses the rooms were warmed by charcoal in braziers (Jer. 36:22; Mark 14:54; John 18:18), or a fire at night might be kindled in the open court (Luke 22:55).

3. Interior. (1) The upper room (Heb. עֲלֵי, al-ee-yaw'; Gr. ὑπερώων, hoop-er-o'-on) was on the roof, and, being the most desirable place in the house, was often given up to favored guests; but it must not be confounded with the guest chamber (q. v., below). Usually the Scriptures mention but one upper room, as if there were only one (Judg. 3:23; 1 Kings 17:19; 2 Kings 4:11; Acts 9:39; 20:8), but in the larger houses there were several (2 Chron. 3:19; Jer. 32:13, 14). Frequent mention is made of them in connection with kings, who seem to have used them as summer houses because of their coolness (Judg. 3:20; 2 Kings 1:2; 23:12). The summer house spoken of in Scripture was very seldom a separate building, the lower part of the house being the winter house and the upper the summer house. This room was used for meditation and prayer (Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12), set apart for the prophets (1 Kings 17:19; 2 Kings 4:10), and, on account of their size and coolness, as places of meeting (Acts 1:13; 20:8), and for similar reasons the dead were laid out in it (9:39). An upper room appears to have been built over the gateways of towns (2 Sam. 18:33).

(2) Guest chamber (Heb. לִישׁ-כַּוֹס', lish-kaw'; Gr. κατάλυμα, kat-al'-oo-mah). This room was placed opposite the entrance into the court, and was used by the master of the house for the reception of all visitors. It is often open in front and supported in the center by a pillar. It is generally on the ground floor, but raised above the level of the court. This would seem to have been the guest chamber where our Lord ate his last passover (Mark 14:15; Luke 22:11), being not the "upper room," but a ground room elevated. Before entering the guests take off their shoes; so our Lord is thought to have had his feet bare when the woman washed them (Luke 7:38).

(3) Other rooms. There are seldom any special bedrooms in Eastern houses, except in those of the wealthy (2 Kings 11:2; Eccles. 10:20; 2 Sam. 4:5). In Egypt there were such (Gen. 43:30; Exod. 8:3), as also in Syria (2 Kings 6:12). In houses generally a low divan, raised round the sides of the room, serves for seats by day, and on it are placed the beds for sleeping during the nights. The ceilings (q. v.) of the principal apartments were adorned with much care, and often at great expense. The kitchen, where there is an inner court, is always attached to it, as the cooking is performed by the women. The furniture of this apartment consists of a sort of raised platform of brick, with receptacles on it for fire, answering to the "boiling places" of Ezekiel (46:23). The fuel used was usually charcoal, and the food cooked in pots and chafing dishes.

(4) Furniture. The furniture in ancient Eastern houses was generally simple, owing probably to the people living so much out of doors. And though we have no exact information respecting the furniture of houses in Palestine, it is probable that they indulged, as did surrounding nations, as wealth permitted, in many luxuries (Keil, Arch., ii, 108). For the furnishing of an apartment the Israelites appear to have held the following articles indispensable: A bed, table, seat, and candlestick, i. e., lamp (2 Kings 4:10). To these were added, for the complete furnishing of a house, the necessary cooking, eating, and drinking vessels. In the houses of the wealthy these articles were not only provided in great abundance, but were also costly and luxurious. The rooms were furnished with cushions and couches (sofa or divan), which served also as beds, and were covered with costly carpets (Prov. 7:16) and soft pillows (Ezek. 13:18, 20). The bedsteads were inlaid with ivory (Amos 6:4), and the tables and stools, which were much more in use among the Israelites than at present in the East (2 Kings 4:10; Prov. 9:14), were artistically wrought. The eating and drinking vessels were of gold and silver, and the needful wardrobes and chests were not wanting.

Figurative. The word "house" is often used in Scripture in the sense of lineage, or family; thus Joseph was of the house of David (Luke 1:27; 2:4); offspring (2 Sam. 7:11; Psa. 118:9); household (Gen. 43:13; Isa. 36:3). Heaven is the house of God (John 14:2); the grave is the house appointed for all living (Job 30:23; Isa. 14:18); the body is called a house (2 Cor. 5:1).

HOUSEHOLD, the rendering generally of the same Hebrew and Greek words as are rendered "house," and meaning the members of a family living in the same dwelling, including servants and dependents. In Job 1:3 the word ab-ood-daw' (Heb. עֲבָדָה, literally "service") appears to mean a retinue of servants. The expression "they of Caesar's household" (Phil. 4:22) seems to refer to some of the servants of the emperor.

One of the divisions of the Hebrews, as tribes, families, households, etc. See ISRAEL, CONSTITUTION OF.

HOUSETOP, the flat roof of an Eastern house (q. v.).

Figurative. Some of these roofs were covered with earth rolled hard, which, softened by rain, would afford nourishment for grass seeds. When the returning drought and heat came the grass speedily withered, a proper illustration of momentary prosperity followed by ruin (2 Kings 19:26; Psa. 129:6; Isa. 37:27).

HUK'KOK (Heb. חֻקֹּק, khoo-koke', appointed), a city on the southern border of Naphthali, near to Aznoth-tabor (Josh. 19:34). Robinson and Van de Velde identify it with Yakuk, five miles W. of the site of Capernaum. There is another Hukkuk (1 Chron. 6:75, A. V. "Hukok") in Asher. In Josh. 21:31 it is Helkath instead of Hukkuk, a case in which the two names are applied to one place.

HUKOK (1 Chron. 6:75). See HUKKOK.

HUL (Heb. חוּל, khoal, circle), the second son of Aram, and grandson of Shem (Gen. 10:23; 1 Chron. 1:17). The geographical location of the people whom he represents is not positively known. Quite probable seems the identification proposed by Rosenmüller (Alterthum, i, 2, p. 253) with the district now called Huleh, around Lake Merom (Mc. and S., Cyc.)

HUL'DAH (Heb. חוּלְדָה, khoal-daw', weasel), a prophetess, the wife of SHALLUM (q. v.), who was keeper of the wardrobe. She dwelt, in the reign of Josiah, in that part of Jerusalem called the Mishneh (second or double, perhaps "suburb," or "lower city"). To her the king sent Hilkiah the priest, Shaphan the scribe, and others, to consult respecting the denunciations in the lately found book of the law. She then delivered an oracular response of mingled judgment and mercy, declaring the not remote destruction of Jerusalem, but promising Josiah that he should be taken from the world before these evil days came (2 Kings 22:14-20; 2 Chron. 34:22-28), B. C. about 639. Huldah is only known from this circumstance.

HUMAN SACRIFICE. See SACRIFICE.

HUMAN SOUL. See SOUL.

HUMANITY OF CHRIST. See CHRIST, INCARNATION OF.

HUMBLENESS (Col. 3:12), elsewhere rendered Humility (q. v.).

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST, an expression which refers to the earthly life of the Lord Jesus Christ, and contrasts his condition during that period, on the one hand, with the glory of his preexistent state, and, on the other, with his subsequent exaltation.

Scripture Teaching. The fact, the constituent features, the end, and the ethical significance of Christ's humiliation, are all matters of explicit Scripture teaching.

(1) The fact was more than suggested in certain utterances of the Lord himself (see John 3:13; 6:62; 16:28; 17:5). In deepest harmony with such utterances, as well as with the declared facts of our Lord's earthly history, was apostolic teaching; e. g., Paul said, "he humbled himself" (Phil. 2:8; see also 2 Cor. 8:9; Heb. 2:9, 10, 16; Rev. 1:18). According to the import of these and other passages the humiliation of Christ began with his incarnation and culminated in his death upon the cross, and came to its end in his exaltation to the right hand of God.

(2) Nature. An examination of the Scripture bearing upon this subject shows that the humiliation consisted; (a) in his voluntary incarnation; (b) in not only entering into union with human nature, but also in assuming a manhood which, though sinless, was still subject to the infirmities of man's moral condition (see Rom. 8:3); (c) in that "he was made under the law" (Gal. 4:4, 5), i. e., subjected to legal measures and obligations appropriate only for human beings; (d) in standing as the representative of sinners (2 Cor. 5:21); (e) in his sacrificial death; (f) his humiliation was made more conspicuous by poverty, persecutions, and the scorn and cruelties which he suffered at the hands of blind and sinful men.

(3) The end of his humiliation was, (a) in a subordinate sense, the fulfillment of certain types and predictions of the Old Testament dispensation (see Matt. 2:23; 27:35; John 12:38, et al.); (b) chiefly, that Christ might come in the most complete sense into oneness with mankind, and thus accomplish human redemption (2 Cor. 5:21; 8:9, et al.).

(4) Its ethical import appears in that (a) thus Christ sets before the world the most perfect example of unselfishness (see Matt. 20:28; 2 Cor. 8:9); (b) likewise of patience and humility (Matt. 10:24, 25; 11:29; Heb. 12:2, 3).

For theological treatment we refer to Van Oosterzee's Dogmatics, vol. ii, pp. 540-550; Pope's Compendium of Christian Doctrine, vol. ii, pp. 152-166, and other works of systematic theology. —E. McC.

HUMILITY (Heb. נְיָוָה, an-av-raw', gentleness, affliction; Gr. ταπεινοφροσύνη, tap-i-nof-ros-oo'-nay, lowliness of mind; Prov. 15:33, et al.; Acts 20:19 in R. V. is "lowliness of mind"). The heathen moralists had not the idea; their humility (from humus, earth) meant meanness of spirit. Christian humility is that grace which makes one think of himself no more highly than he ought to think (Rom. 12:3). It requires us to feel that in God's sight we have no merit, and in honor to prefer our brethren to ourselves (Rom. 12:10), but does not demand undue self-depreciation or depressing views of one's self, but lowliness of self-estimation, freedom from vanity. It is enjoined of God (Col. 3:12; James 4:10), with promise of his blessing (James 4:6). The word is about equivalent to meekness (Psa. 25:9), and is essential to discipleship to Christ (Matt. 18:3, 4).

HUNDREDS. One of the groups (Exod. 18:21) into which Moses divided the people of Israel. See ISRAEL, CLASSIFICATION OF.

HUNGER (Heb. רָבָה, raw-abe'), the rendering of the same Hebrew and Greek words that are sometimes rendered "famine" (q. v.).

Figurative. Our Lord, in his Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:6), uses hunger as symbolic of deep and earnest longing after righteousness.

HUNGER-BITTEN. See GLOSSARY.

HUNT, HUNTER, HUNTING (Heb. צָדָה, tsah'-yid, to lie in wait; רָדַף, raw-daf', to run after). Naturally, the pursuit and capture of wild animals became very early a means of sustenance and of pleasure.

1. Egyptians. In Egypt the desert had its perils and resources; the lion, leopard, panther, and other dangerous beasts being found there. The nobles, like the Pharaohs of later times, regarded as their privilege or duty the stalking and destroying of these animals. The common people hunted the gazelle, oryx, mouflon sheep, ibex, wild ox, and the ostrich, and such humbler game as the porcupine and the long-eared hare. To scent and retrieve the game, the hyena ran side by side with the wolf-dog and the lithe Abyssinian grayhound. When the Egyptian wished to procure animals without seriously hurting them, he used the net for birds, and the lasso and the bola for quadrupeds, these being less injurious than the spear and arrow. The bola was made of a single rounded stone, attached to a strap about five yards long. When the stone was thrown the cord twisted round the legs, muzzle, or neck of the animal pursued, and the hunter was able to bring down his half-strangled prey.

2. Chaldeans. Among this people the chase was a favorite pastime, and afforded substantial additions to the larder. It was, however, essentially the pastime of the great noble, who hunted the lion and bear in the wooded covers or the marshy thickets of the river bank; the gazelle, ostrich, and bustard on the elevated plains or rocky table lands of the desert.

3. Biblical. The chase is mentioned as being pursued as early as the time of Nimrod, who was "a mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. 10:9); but it does not appear to have formed a special occupation among the Israelites. It was practiced by farmers and shepherds (q. v.), partly for the sake of food (Gen. 27:3, sq.; Prov. 12:27), partly in defending their flocks against beasts of prey (1 Sam. 17:34).

Hunters used the bow and arrow (Gen. 27:31), slings (1 Sam. 17:40), nets, snares, and pits, especially for larger animals, such as gazelles (Isa. 51:20) and lions (2 Sam. 23:20; Ezek. 19:4).

The following regulations are given in the Mosaic law: 1. The products of the land in the Sabbath year were to be left in part to serve the wants of the beasts of the field (Exod. 23:11; Lev. 25:7). 2. If eggs or young birds were taken from a nest, the mother was allowed to escape (Deut. 22:6, sq.). 3. Israelites and strangers among them were required to let the blood flow from edible wild beasts and birds taken in the hunt, and to cover it with earth (Lev. 17:13), because containing the life it was considered holy.

HUPHAM (Heb. חֹפֶם, kho-fawm', perhaps coast man, Gesenius; protected, Fürst), apparently one of the sons of Benjamin (Num. 26:39), and founder of the family of the Huphamites. He is supposed to be the same with Huppim. From 1 Chron. 7:12, 15, it would appear that Huppim was a grandson of Benjamin.

HUPHAMITES, the descendants (Num. 26:39) of HUPHAM (q. v.).

HUPPAH (Heb. חֹפֶה, khoop-paw', covering, protection), a priest in David's time, having charge of the thirteenth of the twenty-four classes into which the king divided the priests (1 Chron. 24:13), B. C. 1000.

HUPPIM (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chron. 7:12). See HUPHAM.

HUR (Heb. חֹר, khoor, a hole, prison), the name of five men.

1. A man who is mentioned in connection with Moses and Aaron on the occasion of the battle with Amalek at Rephidim, when with Aaron he stayed up the hands of Moses (Exod. 17:10, 12). He is mentioned again in 24:14 as being, with Aaron, left in charge of the people by Moses during his ascent of Sinai, B. C. 1210. He was, according to Josephus (Ant., iii, 2, 4), the husband of Miriam, the sister of Moses.

2. The grandfather of Bezaleel, the chief artificer of the tabernacle—"son of Uri, son of Hur—of the tribe of Judah" (Exod. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22). In the lists of the descendants of Judah in 1 Chron. the pedigree is more fully preserved. Hur there appears as one of the great family of Pharez. He was the son of Caleb ben-Hezron by a second wife, Ephrath (2:19, 20; comp. v. 5, also 4:1), the first fruit of the marriage (2:50; 4:4), and the father, besides Uri (2:20), of three sons, who founded the towns of Kirjath-jearim, Bethlehem, and Beth-gader (v. 51), B. C. before 1210 (Smith, Dict.).

3. The fourth named of the five kings of Midian who were slain (with Balaam) by the Israelites, under the leadership of Phineas (Num. 31:8), B. C. about 1170. In a later mention of them (Josh. 13:21) these five Midianites are termed "dukes of Sihon," properly, "vassals" (Keil, Com.).

4. A person whose son (Ben-Hur) was the first named of Solomon's twelve purveyors. His district was in Mount Ephraim (1 Kings 4:8), B. C. before 960.

5. Father of Rephaiah, which latter is called "ruler of the half part of Jerusalem" after the captivity, and who assisted in repairing its walls (Neh. 3:9), B. C. before 445.

HUR'RAI (Heb. חֹרֵי, khoor-rah'ee, linen worker), a native of the valleys ("brooks") of Mount Gaash, and one of David's valiant men (1 Chron. 11:32); called less correctly (2 Sam. 23:30) Hiddai, B. C. 953.

HURAM (Heb. חֹרָם, khoor-rawm', high born), another form of HIRAM (q. v.).

1. A Benjamite, son of Bela, the firstborn of the patriarch (1 Chron. 8:5).

2. The form in which the name of the king of Tyre in alliance with David and Solomon—and elsewhere given as Hiram—appears in Chronicles (2 Chron. 2:3, 11, 12; 8:2, 18; 9:10, 21).

3. The same change occurs in Chronicles in the name of Hiram the artificer, which is given as HURAM (2 Chron. 2:13; 4:11, 16).

HURI (Heb. חורי, khoor-ree', linen worker), the son of Jaroah, and father of Abihail, of the descendants of Gad in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:14).

HUSBAND. See MARRIAGE.

HUSBANDMAN (properly Heb. אִישׁ אֲדָמָה, eeesh ad-aw-maw', man of the ground; Gr. γεωργός, gheh-ore-gos', land worker), a farmer or other worker of the soil. Husbandry is among the most ancient and honorable occupations (Gen. 9:20; 26:12, 14; 37:7; Job 1:3; Isa. 28:24-28; John 15:1).

Figurative. God is compared to a husbandman (John 15:1; 1 Cor. 3:9). The various operations of husbandry (see AGRICULTURE), such as sowing of seed, harvesting, etc., furnish many apt illustrations in Scripture.

HUSBANDRY. See AGRICULTURE; GLOSSARY.

HUSHAH (Heb. חושה, khooshaw', haste), son of Ezer, and descendant of Hur, of the family of Judah (1 Chron. 4:4), whence probably the patronymic Hushathite (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chron. 11:29; 20:4). He seems to be the same person that is called Shuah in 1 Chron. 4:11. Comp. HUSHAM.

HUSHAI (Heb. חושי, khooshah'-ee, hasty), an Archite, and a prominent actor in the history of Absalom's rebellion. When David fled from Jerusalem, Hushai joined him, but, at David's suggestion, returned to the city for the purpose of serving his master, as occasion might offer (2 Sam. 15:32, sq.). He offered his allegiance to Absalom (16:16, sq.), and was invited by him to a conference, which should decide the prince's action. Hushai advised delay in the pursuit of the king until ample preparation had been made, thus defeating the counsel of Ahithophel (17:5-22). The immediate result was the suicide of the defeated Ahithophel (v. 23), and the ultimate consequence was the crushing out of the rebellion, B. C. about 977. He is called the "friend" of David (2 Sam. 15:37), and "the king's companion," i. e., vizier, or intimate adviser (1 Chron. 27:33). Baanah, Solomon's vicegerent in Asher (1 Kings 4:16), was doubtless his son.

HUSHAM (Heb. חושם, khooshawm, hastily), a Temanite, successor of Jobab and predecessor of Bedad, among the native princes of Mount Seir before the usurpation of the Edomites (Gen. 36:34, 35; 1 Chron. 1:45, 46).

HUSHATHITE, THE, the designation of one of the heroes of David's guard. Sibbechai (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chron. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11). Josephus, however, calls him a Hittite. In 2 Sam. 23:27 he is named Mebunnai, a mere corruption of Sibbechai. See HUSHAH.

HUSHIM (Heb. חושיים, khoosheem', hastens).
1. The son of Dan (Gen. 46:23); given Shuham in Num. 26:42.

2. A name given as that of "the sons of Aher," or Aharah, the third son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12; comp. 8:1), and therefore only a plural form for Shuham, as a representative of his brethren.

3. One of the wives of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, in the country of Moab, by whom he had Abitub and Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:8, 11).

HUSK. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

HUZ, eldest son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. 22:21). See UZ.

HUZ'ZAB (Heb. יָצַב, naw-tsab', to establish).

This word is erroneously rendered (Nah. 2:7) as a proper name. The meaning appears to be as follows: The prophet has been declaring that "The gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved," and he cries out, as if against objectors, "It is established," i. e., is determined (by God).

HYACINTH. See JACINTH, MINERAL KINGDOM.

HYENA. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

HYK'SOS (compounded according to Josephus, of the Egyptian hyk, "king," and sos, "shepherd," or "Arab"), a race who invaded EGYPT (q. v.), and constituted the 15th and one or two of the following dynasties. See SUPPLEMENT.

HYMENÆUS (Gr. Ὑμναίος, hoo-men-ah-yos, wedding song), a person in Ephesus twice named in the Epistles of Timothy, who, with Alexander (1 Tim. 1:20) and Philetus (2 Tim. 2:17) had departed from the truth in faith and practice.

1. Error. The chief doctrinal error of these persons consisted in maintaining that "the resurrection was past already" (2 Tim. 2:18). "The precise meaning of this expression is by no means clearly ascertained; the most general and perhaps best founded opinion is, that they understood the resurrection in a figurative sense of the great change produced by the gospel dispensation." Thus he stands as one of the earliest of the Gnostics.

2. Sentence. "Whom I have delivered unto Satan" (1 Tim. 1:20). The exact meaning of this formula has been much discussed. Some think it means simply excommunication; others, supernatural infliction of corporeal punishment; others, both combined. Elliott (Com., in loc.) says: "We conclude, then, with Waterland, that 'delivery over to Satan' was a form of Christian excommunication, declaring the person reduced to the state of a heathen, accompanied with the authoritative infliction of bodily disease or death." Satan was held to be the instrument or executioner of all these visitations.

HYMN. See MUSIC.

HYPOCRISY (Hebrew from חָפַץ, khaw-naf'e', to defile, and so rendered in Jer. 3:9; Gr. ὑπόκρισις, hoop-ok'-ree-sis, an answer, to play a part), dissimulation of one's real character or belief; a false assumption of character or belief. In Isa. 32:6 we have the expression "to practice hypocrisy" with the meaning of dealing craftily. The Greek word signifies the part taken by an actor; hence outward show. Hypocrisy is professing to be what one is not, and is generally applied to religious character.

HYPOCRITE. The hypocrite is a double person, natural and artificial; the first he keeps to himself, the other he puts on, as he does his clothes, to make his appearance before men. "Hypocrites have been divided into four classes: 1. The worldly hypocrite, who makes a profession of religion and pretends to be religious, merely from worldly considerations (Matt. 23:5). 2. The legal hypocrite, who relinquishes his vicious practices, in order thereby to merit heaven, while at the same time he has no real love to God (Rom. 10:3). 3. The evangelical hypocrite, whose religion is nothing more than a bare conviction of sin; who rejoices under the idea that Christ died for him, and yet has no desire to live a holy life (Matt. 13:20). 4. The enthusiastic hypocrite, who has an imaginary sight of his sins and of Christ; talks of remarkable impulses and high feelings, etc., while he lives in the most scandalous practices (2 Cor. 11:14)."

HYSSOP. In some of the sacrifices the relation between the shed blood and the transgressor was made manifest by the sprinkling on him of part of the blood. This was done with a bunch of hyssop. The first record of this use of hyssop is in connection with the Exodus, when the Israelites employed it to sprinkle the doorposts with the blood of the paschal lamb (Exod. 12:22). It was also used in connection with the ceremony of purifying lepers (Lev. 14:4-7), and in sprinkling blood on the leprous house (vers. 48-53). Hyssop was also used in the peculiar ordinance appointed for the purification of ceremonial uncleanness contracted by touching a dead body (Num. 19:1, sq.). See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS, 7.

The simplest form of the hyssop sprinkler is the "bunch" which each father in Israel hastily prepared before leaving Egypt. In the Mosaic ritual the bunch of hyssop was tied with a scarlet thread (Num. 19:6). In the account of the crucifixion (John 19:28, 29) it is recorded, "they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth." In the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark no reference is made to the hyssop, but it is said that the sponge was put upon a reed. Some explain the difference of statement by the supposition that the hyssop was fastened to a reed; others that the Greek term rendered "reed" was a long stalk of hyssop; others, as Haley (Alleged Discrepancies, p. 285), think that drink was twice offered to our Lord.

Figurative. The Psalmist, having in view the frequent use of hyssop in the ceremonial law, as a means by which the virtue of the sacrifice was transferred to the transgressor, applies it figuratively to the purification of the soul from guilt when he prays, "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean" (Psa. 51:7). In alluding to Solomon's botanical knowledge it is said "He spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall" (1 Kings 4:33). The tall cedar and the humble hyssop at once suggests the most extensive range in the vegetable world. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

I

I AM (אֵלֹהִים אֲשֶׁר אֵינִי), a name of God (Exod. 3:14, lit. God is he who is), the absolute I, the self-existent One.

IB'HAR (Heb. יְבִיחָר, yib-khar', choice), one of the sons of David, born to him in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 3:6; 14:5). B. C. after 1000.

IB'LEAM (Heb. יְבִי־לֵאֵם, yib-leh-awm', devouring people), a city—with suburban towns—within the natural boundaries of Asher, but assigned to Manasseh (Josh. 17:11); one of the towns from which Manasseh failed to expel the Canaanites (v. 12). It is called Bileam (1 Chron. 6:70) a Levitical city (comp. Josh. 21:25, where it is called Gath-rimmon). Probably preserved in the ruins of Khirbet-belameh, half an hour S. of Jenin.

IBNEI'AH (Heb. יְבִינֵי־אֵה, yib-neh-yaw', built by Jah), a son of Jeroham, who, with other Benjamites, returned to Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:8). B. C. after 536.

IBNI'JAH (Heb. יְבִינֵי־יָה, yib-nec-yaw', building of Jah), the ancestor of Meshullam, a Benjamite, who settled in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Josh. 9:8). B. C. after 536.

IB'RI (Heb. יְבִירֵי, ib-ree', an Eberite, or "Hebrew"), the last of "the sons of Merari by Jaaziah," apparently a descendant of Levi in the time of David (1 Chron. 24:27).

IB'ZAN (Heb. יְבִיצָן, ib-tsaun', shining), the tenth "judge of Israel" (Judg. 12:8-10). He was of Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem of Zebulun (so Michaelis and Hezel), and not of Judah (as Josephus says). He governed seven years, B. C. probably after 1080. The prosperity of Iuzan is marked by the great number of his children (thirty sons and thirty daughters), and his wealth by their marriages, for they were all married. Some have held, with little probability, that Iban was the same with Boaz (Kitto).

ICE (Heb. קָרָח, keh'-rakh, smooth, Job 6:16; 38:29; Psa. 147:17). "On the Central Range (in Palestine) snow has been known to reach a depth of nearly two feet, and the pools at Jerusalem have sometimes been covered with ice. But this is rare" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 68).

ICH'ABOD (Heb. אִי־כָבוֹד, ee-kaw-bode', where is the glory? inglorious), the son of Phinehas, and grandson of Eli. The wife of Phinehas was about to become a mother when she heard that her husband was slain in battle, that Eli was dead, and that the ark of God had been taken by the Philistines. Under such circumstances her labor was fatal. When lying at the point of death the women standing about sought to cheer her, saying, "Fear not; for thou hast borne a son." She only replied by naming the child Ichabod, adding, "The glory is departed from Israel: for the ark of God is taken" (1 Sam. 4:19-22). B. C. about 1076. The only other mention of Ichabod is in 1 Sam. 14:3, where it is stated that his brother, Ahitub, was father of ΑΗΛΙΑΗ (q. v.), who acted as high priest for Saul.

ICO'NIUM (Gr. Ἰκόνιον, ee-kon'-ee-on, image-like), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, visited probably three times by the apostle Paul (Acts 13:51; 14:1, 19, 21; 16:2), the present Konia, or Konieh, having a population of forty thousand.

ID'ALAH (Heb. יִדְאֵלָה, yid-al-aw', exalted), a city of Zebulun, near its western border, mentioned between Shimron and Bethlehem (Josh. 19:15), "supposed by V. de Velde to be the village of Jeda, or Jeida, on the west of Semunieh, though Robinson (Bib. Res., p. 113) states the very opposite" (K. and D., Com.).

ID'BASH (Heb. יִדְבַשׁ, yid-bawsh', honeyed), a descendant of Judah who, with his two brothers and a sister, are said (1 Chron. 4:3, R. V. "sons of") to be "of the father of Etam," probably meaning of the lineage of the founder of that place, or perhaps they were themselves its settlers.

ID'DO. 1. Id-do' (Heb. יִדְדוֹ, timely), the father of Ahinadab, Solomon's purveyor in the district of Mahanaim (1 Kings 4:14), B. C. before 960.

2. Id-do' (Heb. יִדְדוֹ, timely), a Gershonite Levite, son of Joah, and father of Zerah (1 Chron. 6:21); perhaps more correctly called Adaiah in v. 41.

3. Yid-do' (Heb. יָדוֹ, lovely), son of Zechariah, and ruler of the half tribe of Manasseh east (1 Chron. 27:21), B. C. 960.

4. Id-do' (Hebrew same as No. 2), a seer whose "visions" against Jeroboam incidentally contained some of the acts of Solomon (2 Chron. 9:29). He appears to have written a chronicle or story relating to the life and reign of Abijah (13:22), which he seems to have called Midrash, or "exposition," and also a book "concerning genealogies," in which the acts of Rehoboam were recorded (12:15), B. C. after 934. These books are lost, but they may have formed part of the foundation of the existing books of Chronicles.

5. Id-do' (Hebrew same as No. 2 in Zech. 1:1, but different in other passages), the father of Berechiah and grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. 1:1, 7), although in other places Zechariah is called "the son of Iddo" (Ezra 5:1; 6:14; Neh. 12:16). Iddo returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4), B. C. 536.

6. Id-do' (Heb. יִדְדוֹ, mishap), the chief of the Jews established at Casiphia. It was to him that Ezra sent for Levites and Nethinim to join his company. Thirty-eight Levites and two hundred and twenty Nethinim responded to his call (Ezra 8:17-20), B. C. 457. It would seem from this that Iddo was a chief person of the Nethinim, and also that this is one of the circumstances which indicate that the Jews, in their several colonies under the exile, were still ruled by the heads of their nation and allowed the free exercise of their worship (Kitto).

IDLE (Gr. ἀργός, ar-gos'). A peculiar use of this word is, "I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof" (Matt. 12:36). Here the term idle means unprofitable, pernicious. The Greek word ἄργος, lay'-ros, may be rendered nonsensical, absurd (Luke 24:11).

IDOL, IMAGE. These are the rendering of a large number of Hebrew and Greek words, and may be divided as follows: (1) Abstract terms, which, with a deep moral significance, express the degradation associated with, and stand out as a protest of the language against, the enormities of idolatry; (2) Those which apply to the idols or images, as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshiped through them; (3) Terms relating to material and workmanship.

1. Abstract Terms. 1. Aw'-ven (Heb. אָוֵן, rendered elsewhere "nought," "vanity," "iniquity," "wickedness," "sorrow," etc., and only once "idol" (Isa. 66:3). The primary idea of the root seems to be emptiness, nothingness, as of breath or vapor; and, by a natural transition, in a moral sense, wickedness in its active form of mischief, and then, as the result, sorrow and trouble. Hence aw'-ven denotes a vain, false, wicked thing, and expresses at once the essential nature of idols and the consequences of their worship.

2. El-eel' (Heb. אֵלֵיִל, good for nothing) is thought by some to have a sense akin to that of "falsehood," and would therefore much resemble aw'-ven, as applied to an idol. It is used of the idols of Noph or Memphis (Ezek. 30:13). In strong contrast with Jehovah it appears in Psa. 96:5; 97:7.

3. Ay-maw' (Heb. אַיִמָּוָה, "terrifying shapes," "horror," or "terror," and hence an object of horror or terror (Jer. 50:38), in reference either to the hideousness of the idols or to the gross character of their worship. In this respect it is closely connected with number 4.

4. Mif-leh'-tseh (Heb. מִפְּלֵחַ, a "fright," "horror," applied to the idol of Maachah, probably of wood, which Asa cut down and burned (1 Kings 15:13; 2 Chron. 15:16), and which was unquestionably the phallus, the symbol of the productive power of nature and the nature-goddess Ashera.

5. Bo'-sheth (Heb. בֹּשֶׁת, "shame," or "shameful thing" A. V. and R. V., Jer. 11:13; Hos. 9:10), applied to Baal or Baal-peor, as characterizing the obscenity of his worship.

6. Ghil-loo-leem' (Heb. גִּילְלוּלֵיִם) is used as a term of contempt, but is of doubtful origin (Ezek. 30:13). The expression is applied, principally in Ezekiel, to false gods and their symbols (Deut. 29:17, margin "dungy gods"; Ezek. 8:10, etc.). It stands side by side with other contemptuous terms in Ezek. 16:36; 20:8; as, e. g., shekets, "filth," "abomination" (Ezek. 8:10), and

7. Shik-koots' (Heb. שִׁקְוֹץ, filth, impurity, especially applied to that which produced ceremonial uncleanness Ezek. 37:23; Nah. 3:6). As referring to the idols themselves, it primarily denotes the obscene rites with which their worship was associated, and hence, by metonymy, is applied both to the objects of worship and also to their worshippers.

2. Names of Idols. Terms applied more directly to the images or idols, as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshipped through them.

1. Sek'-mel (Heb. סֶמֶל), or say'-mel (Heb. סֵמֶל, likeness, semblance), rendered "idol" (2 Chron. 33:7, 15); "figure" (Deut. 4:16); "image" (Ezek. 8:3, 5). It corresponds to the Latin simulacrum.

2. Tseh'-lem (Heb. צֶלֶם), and tsel-em' (Heb. צֶלֶם, a shadow). It is the "image" of God in which man was created (Gen. 1:27; comp. Wisd. 2:23), distinguished from "likeness," as the "image" from the "idea" which it represents, though it would be rash to insist upon this distinction. But whatever abstract term may best define the meaning of tsel'-lem, it is unquestionably used to denote the visible forms of external objects, and is applied to figures of gold and silver (1 Sam. 6:5; Num. 33:52; Dan. 3:1), such as the golden image of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as to those painted upon walls (Ezek. 23:14). "Image" perhaps most nearly represents it in all passages. Applied to the human countenance (Dan. 3:19, "form"), it signifies the "expression."

3. Tem-oo-naw' (Heb. תְּמוּנָה), rendered "image" in Job 4:16; elsewhere "similitude" (Deut. 4:12); "likeness" (Deut. 5:8). "Form," or "shape" would be better.

4. Aw-tsaub' (Heb. עֲצָב), 5. Eh'-tseb (Heb. עֲצָב, Jer. 22:28); or, 6. O'-tseb (Heb. עֲצָב, Isa. 48:5), "a figure," all derived from a root aw-tsaub', "to work," or "fashion," are terms applied to idols as expressing that their origin was due to the labor of man.

7. Tseer (Heb. צִיר), once only applied to an idol (Isa. 45:16). The word signifies "a form," or "mold," and hence an "idol."

8. Mats-tsay-baw' (Heb. מַצֵּבָה), anything set up, a "pillar" (Gen. 28:18; 31:45; 35:14, 15). Such were the stones set up by Joshua (Josh. 4:9) after the passage of the Jordan, and at Shechem (24:26), and by Samuel, when victorious over the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:12). When solemnly dedicated they were anointed with oil, and libations were poured upon them. The word is applied to denote the obelisks which stood at the entrance to the Temple of the Sun at Heliopolis (Jer. 43:13). The Palladium of Troy, the black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca, said to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel, and the stone at Ephesus "which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts 19:35), are examples of the belief, anciently so common, that the gods sent down their images upon earth.

9. Kham-maw-neem' (Heb. חַמְמָוֶנִים), in the margin of most passages "sun images," the mention of which is joined with statues of Astarte (Lev. 26:30; Isa. 17:8; 27:9; Ezek. 6:4, 6; 2 Chron. 14:5; 34:7) several times; while from 2 Chron. 34:4 it appears that they stood upon the altars of Baal. They were probably images of the fire-god Baal, and seem to have represented a rising flame of fire, being made either of wood or stone.

10. Mas-keeth' (Heb. מַשְׁכֵּת), Lev. 26:1; Num. 33:52; Ezek. 8:12). The general opinion appears to be that eben maskeeth signifies a stone with figures graven upon it.

11. Teraphim. See TERAPHIM.

3. Material, etc. Terms relating to the material and workmanship of the idol.

1. Peh'-sel (Heb. פֶּסֶל), usually rendered in the A. V. "graven or carved image," but "quarries" in Judg. 3:19, 26). The verb is employed to denote the fine work of the stone worker, after receiving it from the quarries (Exod. 34:4; 1 Kings 5:18). The term pehsel was applied, however, to images of metal and wood, as well as those of stone (Deut. 7:25; Isa. 30:22; 40:19; Hab. 2:19).

2. Neh'-sek (Heb. נֶחֶשֶׁק), or nay'-sek (Heb. נֶחֶשֶׁק), and mas-say-kaw' (Heb. מַסֵּכָה), are evidently synonymous (Isa. 41:29; 48:5; Jer. 10:14) in later Hebrew, and denote a "molten" image, the last term being often used in distinction from pehsel (Deut. 27:15; Judg. 17:3, etc.).

4. Forms of Idols. Among the earliest objects of worship, regarded as symbols of deity, were meteoric stones; then rough, unhewn blocks, and later stone columns or pillars of wood, in which the divinity worshiped was supposed to dwell. The Bible does not give us many traces of the forms of idolatrous images. DAGON (q. v.), god of the Philistines, had a figure partly human, terminating in a fish. See IDOLATRY.

IDOLATRY. 1. Definition and Classification. In a general sense idolatry is the paying of divine honors to any created thing; the ascription of divine power to natural agencies. Idolatry may be classified, as follows: (a) The worship of inanimate objects, as stones, trees, rivers, etc.; (b) of animals; (c) of the higher powers of nature, as the sun, moon, stars; and the forces of nature, as air, fire, etc.; (d) hero-worship, or of deceased ancestors; (e) idealism, or the worship of abstractions or mental qualities, as justice. Another classification is very suggestive: (a) the worship of Jehovah under image or symbol; (b) the worship of other gods under image or symbol; (c) the worship of the image or symbol itself. Each of these forms of idolatry had its peculiar immoral tendency. See GODS, FALSE; IDOL.

2. Idolatry of the several heathen nations with whom the Israelites came into contact. From these idolatry was imported into Israel.

(1) Chaldea. The gods of the Euphrates constituted a countless multitude of visible and invisible beings, distributed into tribes and empires throughout the universe. Each god had his peculiar function or occupation, forming his principality, in which he worked under his respective prince or king. Differing from the gods of Egypt, who were supposed to be either friendly to man or indifferent, in Chaldea they for the most part pursued him with the most implacable hatred, seeming to exist only to destroy him. Some floated in the air, and presided over the unhealthy winds; the genii of fevers and madness crept in everywhere; imps haunted the houses; goblins wandered about the water's edge; ghouls lay in wait for travelers in unfrequented places; and the dead quitted their tombs at night to satiate themselves with the blood of the living. These murderous beings were represented as composite creatures, in whom the body of a man was joined grotesquely with birds' wings, tails, and claws, fishes' scales, and different parts of the hyena or wolf. Not only were these demons hostile to men and animals, but some of the more audacious among them did not fear at times to attack the gods of light; on one occasion, in the infancy of the world, they had sought to dispossess them and reign in their stead. To combat this deformed and vicious band were the good genii, monsters of fine and noble bearing—griffins, winged lions, lion-headed men, and human-headed bulls.

When we remember that the number of the Chaldean gods was sixty-five thousand, it is no wonder that we should be puzzled to say what these various divinities could have possibly represented. "The gods, like those of Egypt, were not abstract personages, guiding in a metaphysical fashion the forces of nature. Each of them contained in himself one of the principal elements of which our universe is composed—earth, water, sky, sun, moon, and the stars which moved around the terrestrial mountain. The succession of natural phenomena with them was not the result of unalterable laws; it was due entirely to a series of voluntary acts, accomplished by beings of different grades of intelligence and power. Every part of the great whole is represented by a god, a god who is a man, a Chaldean, who although of finer and more lasting nature than other Chaldeans, possesses the same instincts and is swayed by the same passions." Among all the thousands of tablets or inscribed stones on which we find recorded prayers and magical formulas, we have as yet discovered no document treating of the existence of a supreme god, or even containing the faintest allusion to a divine unity. The supreme triad was composed of Anu, the immovable firmament; Ea, the bottomless abyss, the dark waters which had filled the universe until the day of creation, and had a complete knowledge of the past, present, and future; Bel, the earth on which men live, and into whose bosom they return after death. "The gods, who had begun by being the actual material of the element which was their attribute, became the spirit of it, and then the ruler. At first residing in their own domain, in the course of time they entered the domain of the other gods, till finally the greater number of them were identified with the firmament." Thus instead of being god of the heaven, the earth, or the waters, each god reigned in the province of others as in his own.

"The national god of the Assyrians was Assur (or Asshur), identified by ancient scribes with the Accadian An Sar, or 'god of the hosts' of the Upper Firmament, whose name appears in the Greek form of Assóros." The secondary triad consisted of gods of restricted power and invariable form. Recognizing in the unswerving regularity with which the moon waxed and waned, or with which the sun rose and set every day, a proof of their subjection to a superior will, the theologians signaled this dependence by making them sons of one or other of the three great gods. Sin was the offspring of Bel, Shamash of Sin, Ramman of Anu. Sin was the Moon god, and was represented in human shape. Shamash is the Sun god, and in addition to natural light, he sheds upon the earth truth and justice; he is the "high judge" before whom everything makes its obeisance. The third place in this triad was held originally by the goddess Ishtar, the evening and morning star, but was later replaced by Ramman, the god of tempests and thunder. This triad gathered around them all the divinities who could easily be abstracted from the function or object to which they were united, and constituted a kind of divine aristocracy. This was supposed to have been composed of seven supreme and magnificent gods, fifty great gods of heaven and earth, three hundred celestial spirits, and six hundred terrestrial spirits. Each of these had a representative on earth, to receive for him the homage of men, and to signify to them his will. Government.—The gods assembled every morning in a hall situated near the gates of the sun in the East, and there deliberated on the events of the day. Ea submitted to them the fates which were about to be fulfilled, a record was made thereof, and Shamash was deputed to carry them out.

(2) Egypt. Entering the theological world of the Egyptians, "we are confronted by an actual rabble of gods," representing a function, a moment in the life of a grain of wheat, a man or the universe. Deities went from place to place, easing the pains of women in travail, giving to the newly born child a name; others hailed the sun in his rising and setting; certain genii opened the gates in hades, or kept the paths daily traversed by the sun, etc. Some appeared in human form, others as animals, bulls or lions, rams or monkeys, serpents, fishes, ibises, hawks; others dwelt in inanimate things, as trees, stakes, etc., while others were of shapes formed by a combination of the human and animal. The Egyptians deified the sun, the earth, the stars, the sky, the Nile, but each principality, each city, almost every village, conceived and represented them differently. Thus Osiris of the Delta, Khnômû of the Cataract, Harshâfitû of Heracleopolis, were each of them incarnations of the fertilizing and life-sustaining Nile. Similarly Horus the sun, and Râ the solar disk, and other sun gods, were worshiped in different parts of the Nile valley. Female deities were recognized, and families assigned to them. The god, his wife and son, often formed a triad; and where a goddess ruled over a province the triad was completed by a divine consort and a divine son. The gods were thought to be soul and body, the latter molded out of more rarified substance, and generally invisible, but endowed with the same qualities, and subject to the same imperfections as those of men. Consequently, they were mortal, and, though more slowly, yielded at last to decay. The chief god of the shepherds, or Hyksos, was Set, or Sutekh, who was worshiped by the Egyptians until the time of the 22d dynasty, which was probably of Assyrian or Babylonian origin. Other foreign deities were worshiped in Egypt—Renpu-Ken, Anta, and Astarta. This foreign worship was probably never reduced to a system.

(3) Moab. Although we know for certain of but one Moabitish divinity, viz., CHEMOSH (see GODS, FALSE), there appear to have been other gods (Judg.

10:6, "the gods of Moab"). A large collection of Moab terra-cotta, made under the auspices of the German emperor, afford us some light. We find among them bird-headed figures, bearing some relation to those found in the tombs and on the papyrus of Egypt; calf-headed figures, and calves with symbolical marks and planetary symbols; figures with hollows below, or in the abdomen (probably referring to Molech); figures with cup-shaped protuberances on different parts of the body, thought to be amulets, or idols made for local application to the human body; figures with horns (called by German archæologists Teraphim; figures resembling Pan; figures seated on tripods, and usually with open mouths, and probably regarded as oracles; male and female gods. No trace is found of the fish-god, Dagon, nor any symbol of the deity of thunder, as Jupiter or Thor (Bible Educator, ii, 139, 140).

(4) Canaan. With the Canaanites, as with all the other races of western Asia, nature worship, or the deification of the powers of nature itself, the worship of the divine in nature, may be described as the predominant characteristic of their system of religion. The supreme objects of this worship were Baal and Ashteroth, generally supposed to represent the sun and moon. In addition there was eventually introduced into the worship of the Sidonian Canaanites an indefinite number of subordinate deities representing the planets and stars, the phenomena of nature, its qualities and attributes, the seasons, human passions and emotions, even trades and professions. Another deity was Tammuz, the Phœnician Adonis (Ezek. 8:14). The whole "host of heaven" are referred to as receiving divine honors (Deut. 17:3; 2 Kings 17:16; 21:3; 23:4, etc.). That idolatry, in the sense of image worship, was prevalent, appears everywhere. Human sacrifice formed one of their characteristic religious observances, and especially the sacrifice of their own children (Lev. 18:21; 2 Chron. 28:3, etc.) (see Maspero, Dawn of Civ.; Keil, Bib. Arch.; Robertson, Early Religion of Israel).

(5) Ammon. The god of the Ammonites was Molech, Malcham, or Milcom, who was regarded by them as their king. The Philistine idolatry had peculiarities of its own, but was connected with that of Canaan. Although Baal-zebub was worshipped at Ekron, the national deity was Dagon, who had temples at Gaza and Ashdod.

3. Idolatrous Usages. Mountains and high places were chosen spots for offering sacrifice and incense to idols (1 Kings 11:7; 14:23), and the retirement of gardens and the thick shade of woods offered great attractions to their worshippers (2 Kings 16:4; Isa. 1:29; Hos. 4:13). The host of heaven was worshipped on the housetop (2 Kings 23:12; Jer. 19:13; 32:29; Zeph. 1:5). The priests of the false worship are sometimes designated Chemarim, a word of Syriac origin, to which different meanings have been assigned. It is applied to the non-Levitical priests who burnt incense on the high places (2 Kings 23:5) as well as to the priests of the calves (Hos. 10:5). In addition to the priests there were other persons intimately connected with idolatrous rites, and the impurities from which they were inseparable. Both men and women consecrated themselves to the service of idols: the former as kedeshim, for which there is reason to believe the A. V. (Deut. 23:17, etc.) has not given too harsh an equivalent; the latter as kedeshôth, who wore shrines for Astarê (2 Kings 23:7). The same class of women existed among the Phœnicians, Armenians, Lydians, and Babylonians (Epist. of Jer., v. 43). They are distinguished from the public prostitutes (Hos. 4:14), and associated with the performances of sacred rites. Besides these accessories there were the ordinary rites of worship which idolatrous systems had in common with the religion of the Hebrews. Offering burnt sacrifices to the idol gods (2 Kings 5:17), burning incense in their honor (1 Kings 11:8), and bowing down in worship before their images (1 Kings 19:18) were the chief parts of their ritual; and from their very analogy with the ceremonies of true worship were more seductive than the grosser forms" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

4. Idolatry Among the Israelites. Although of a family which worshipped strange gods (Josh. 24:2), yet Abraham still worshipped one true God when he revealed himself to him, and called him to leave his native land for Canaan (Gen. 12:1). The teraphim which Rachel took with her (Gen. 31:19) were household gods of an inferior kind, which might be combined with the worship of the one supreme God. Hence we find no idolatry in the strict sense either among the patriarchs or Israelites in Egypt and under Moses, but only solitary traces of idolatry and image worship, whereby the knowledge and worship of God was so far polluted, but not supplanted (Gen. 30:27; 31:53). The traces of idolatry which have been sought in Exod. 17:7; Num. 25:2; Josh. 24:14; Ezek. 20:7; and Amos 5:25, 26 prove nothing more than disturbances of pure Jehovah worship by image worship, heathen superstition, and proneness to fleshly sins. The golden calf (Exod. 32) was intended to be a representation of Jehovah after an Egyptian pattern. Amos (5:25) in his rebuke seems to have in view image worship, but not the service of the Assyrian idols Sakkuth and Kewan. The worship of Baal-peor was a temporary apostasy, brought about by the temptations to licentious indulgence offered by the rites of that deity.

The people of Israel were first seduced into apostasy from Jehovah, into heathen idolatry by the Canaanites, who had not been rooted out. This apostasy took place during the time of the judges. The various gods to whose service the Israelites gave themselves were Canaanitish; and after the invasion of Palestine by the Assyrians, Assyrian idols were added. After the death of Joshua and the elders who outlived him, Israel forsook Jehovah "and served Baal and Ashtaroth" (Judg. 2:13); and from this time its history becomes little more than a chronicle of the inevitable sequence of offense and punishment (Judg. 2:12-14). Idolatry becomes the national sin, even Gideon, the judge and a Levite (Judg. 17:7) giving occasion to, or assisting in idolatrous worship. In later times the practice of secret idolatry was carried to greater lengths. Images were set up on the corn floors, in the wine vats, and behind the doors of private houses (Isa. 57:8; Hos. 9:1, 2); and to check this tendency the statute in Deut.

27:15 was originally promulgated. Under Samuel's administration a fast was held and purificatory rites performed, to mark the public renunciation of idolatry (1 Sam. 7:3-6). But in the reign of Solomon all this was forgotten. Each of his many foreign wives brought with her the gods of her own nation; and the gods of Ammon, Moab, and Zidon were openly worshiped.

(1) Among the ten tribes. Jeroboam, fresh from his recollections of the Apis worship of Egypt, erected golden calves at Beth-el and at Dan, and by this crafty state policy severed forever the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (1 Kings 12:26-33). The successors of Jeroboam followed in his steps, till Ahab, who married a Zidonian princess, at her instigation (21:25), built a temple and altar to Baal, and revived all the abominations of the Amorites (21:26). Henceforth Baal worship became so completely identified with the northern kingdom that it is described as walking in the way or statutes of the kings of Israel (2 Kings 16:3; 17:8), as distinguished from the sin of Jeroboam. The conquest of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser was for them the last scene of the drama of abominations which had been enacted uninterruptedly for upward of two hundred and fifty years. In the northern kingdom no reformer arose to vary the long line of royal apostates; whatever was effected in the way of reformation was done by the hands of the people (2 Chron. 31:1).

(2) Idolatry in Judah. Rehoboam, the son of an Ammonite mother, perpetuated the worst features of Solomon's idolatry (1 Kings 14:22-24); and in his reign was made the great schism in the national religion. The first act of Hezekiah on ascending the throne was the restoration and purification of the temple which had been dismantled and closed during the latter part of his father's life (2 Chron. 28:24; 29:3). The iconoclastic spirit was not confined to Judah and Benjamin, but spread throughout Ephraim and Manasseh (2 Chron. 31:1), and to all external appearance idolatry was extirpated. But the reform extended little below the surface (Isa. 29:13). With the death of Josiah ended the last effort to revive among the people a purer ritual, if not a purer faith. Idolatry spread fearfully in the last times of the kingdom of Judah, until it brought down on the people the punishment of captivity in Babylon. This exile bore wholesome fruit, for in captivity the Jews wholly gave up gross idolatry; with the exception of certain of those who had returned to Palestine, marrying heathen wives and sharing their worship, which departure was corrected by Ezra (Ezra 9:1, sq.). Later a new danger presented itself in Greek influence brought into Asia by Alexander; and some place-hunting Jews were base enough to adopt Greek idolatry. So far was the nation from showing any inclination to idolatry that the attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes was utterly baffled by the Jews (1 Macc. 2:23-26). The erection of synagogues has been assigned as a reason for the comparative purity of the Jewish worship after the captivity, while another cause has been discovered in the hatred for images acquired by the Jews in their intercourse with the Persians.

5. Idolatry and the Law. Israel had entered into a solemn compact with Jehovah, accepting him as the only God, and pledging themselves to faithfully serve him (Exod. 19:3-8; 20:2, sq.). Idolatry, therefore, to an Israelite was a state of offense (1 Sam. 15:23), a political crime of the gravest nature, high treason against his king. It was a transgression of the covenant (Deut. 17:2, 3), "the evil" preeminently in the eyes of Jehovah (1 Kings 21:25). Idolatry was a great wrong because of the licentious rites associated with it (Rom. 1:26-32), thus debauching the morals of its adherents. Regarded in a moral aspect, false gods are called "stumbling blocks" (Ezek. 14:3), "lies" (Amos 2:4; Rom. 1:25), "abominations" (Deut. 29:17; 32:16; 1 Kings 11:5; 2 Kings 23:13), "sin" (Amos 8:14, comp. 2 Chron. 29:18); and with a profound sense of the degradation consequent upon their worship, they were characterized by the prophets as "shame" (Jer. 11:13; Hos. 9:10), "strange gods" (Deut. 32:16), "new gods" (Judg. 5:8), "devils—not God" (Deut. 32:17; 1 Cor. 10:20, 21), and as denoting their foreign origin, "gods of the foreigner" (Josh. 24:14, 15). Their powerlessness is indicated by describing them as "gods that cannot save" (Isa. 45:20), "that made not the heavens" (Jer. 10:11), "nothing" (Isa. 41:24; 1 Cor. 8:4), "wind and confusion" (Isa. 41:29), "vanities of the Gentiles" (Jer. 14:22; Acts 14:15).

Many customs associated with idolatry were forbidden by the law. Maimonides tells us that the prohibition against sowing a field with mingled seeds, and wearing garments of mixed material was because some idolaters attributed a kind of magical influence to the mixture (Lev. 19:19). It was also forbidden to interchange the garments of the sexes (Deut. 22:5); to cut the flesh for the dead (Lev. 19:28; 1 Kings 18:28), and make a baldness between the eyes (Deut. 14:1), as being associated with idolatrous rites. Eating of things offered was a necessary appendage to sacrifice (comp. Exod. 18:12; 32:6; 34:15; Num. 25:2). The printing upon one's person was forbidden to the Israelites (Lev. 19:28), because idolaters branded upon their flesh some symbol of the deity they worshiped, as the ivy leaf of Bacchus (3 Macc. 2:29).

6. Penalties. The first and second commandments are directed against idolatry of every form. Individuals and communities were equally amenable to the rigorous code. The individual offender was devoted to destruction (Exod. 22:20); his nearest relatives were not only bound to denounce him and deliver him up to punishment (Deut. 13:2-10), but their hands were to strike the first blow when, on the evidence of two witnesses at least, he was stoned (Deut. 17:2-5). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (Deut. 18:6-10). An idolatrous nation shared a similar fate.

Figurative. The term idolatry is used to designate covetousness, which takes mammon for its god (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:13; Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5). Appetite or gluttony is also included under idolatry (Phil. 3:19; comp. Rom. 16:18; 2 Tim. 3:4). See GODS, FALSE.

IDUMÆA (Gr. Ἰδουμαία, id-oo-mah'-yah), the Greek form (Isa. 34:5, 6; Ezek. 35:15; 36:5; Mark 3:8) of Hebrew (עֲדוֹם, Edom), EDOM (LXX sometimes 'Εδώμ, ed-ome', but more generally 'Ιδομαία).

I'GAL (Heb. יִגְאֵל, yig-awl', avenger).

1. The son of Joseph, and agent from Issachar to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:7), B. C. 1209.

2. The son of Nathan of Zobah, and one of David's mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:36), B. C. about 962. In the parallel list (2 Chron. 11:38) the name is given as "Joel the brother of Nathan."

3. See IGEAL (1 Chron. 3:22).

IGDALI'AH (Heb. יִגְדַּלְיָהוּ, yig-dal-yaw'-hoo, magnified of Jah), the father of Hanan, into the chamber of which latter Jeremiah brought the Rechabites to propose the test of their temperance (Jer. 35:4), B. C. about 600.

I'GEAL (Heb. יִגְאֵל, yig-awl', avenger), one of the sons of Shemaiah, of the descendants of Zerubabel (1 Chron. 3:22), B. C. after 536.

IGNORANCE. The term implies error, going astray (Lev. 4:2, "If a soul sin through ignorance"). In the New Testament the Greek means want of knowledge; sometimes simple, excusable want of information (Acts 17:30); sometimes inexcusable (Eph. 4:18); sometimes moral blindness or sinful ignorance (Acts 3:17).

I'IM (Heb. יִימ, ee-yeem', ruins).

1. A city in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. 15:29), and doubtless included within the territory of Simeon, as the associated places were (19:3). It is probably to be identified with the ruins of Beit-awua.

2. A contracted form (Num. 33:45) of IJE-ABARIM (q. v.).

I'JE-AB'ARIM (Heb. יִיְהֵאֲבָרִים, ee-yay' hav-ab-aw-reen', ruins of Abarim), the forty-seventh station of the Israelites in the wilderness, "in the borders of Moab" (Num. 33:44), or "before Moab, toward the sun-rising" (21:11). It was probably not far from the north shore of the el-Ahsy, in the neighborhood of Kalaat el Hassa (Ahsa), a station for pilgrim caravans.

I'JON (Heb. יִיֶּזֶן, ee-yone', ruin), a frontier town in the north of Palestine, in the hills of Naphtali—a store city. It was captured in the days of Asa by Benhadad (1 Kings 15:20; 2 Chron. 11:28), and later by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15:29). It is thought to be el-Khiam, in the fertile valley of Merj 'Ayûn ("the meadow of springs"), northwest of Dan.

IK'KESH (Heb. יִקְשֵׁה, ik-kashe', perverse), the father of Ira the Tekoite, which latter was one of David's famous warriors (2 Sam. 23:26; 1 Chron. 11:28), and captain of the sixth regiment of his troops (1 Chron. 27:9), B. C. 1000.

ILAI (Heb. יִלְאִי, ee-lah'ee, supreme), an Ahoite, and one of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:29), called Zalmou in the parallel list (2 Sam. 23:28), B. C. 1000.

ILL-FAVORED. See GLOSSARY.

ILLUMINATED (from Gr. φωτισω, to give light), a term meaning imbued with a saving knowledge of the gospel, and so applied to Christians (Heb. 6:4, A. V. "enlightened"; 10:32). In the early Christian Church it was used to denote the baptized. See GLOSSARY.

ILLYRICUM (Gr. Ἰλλυρικόν, il-too-ree-kon', uncertain derivation), "a region lying between Italy, Germany, Macedonia, and Thrace, having on one side the Adriatic Sea, and on the other the Danube" (Grimm, Gr. Lex., s. v.). It answers to the present Dalmatia; by which name, indeed, the southern part of Illyricum itself was known, and whither Paul informs Timothy that Titus had gone (2 Tim. 4:10). It is of uncertain dimensions, being understood differently by Greek and Roman writers. It is only once mentioned in the New Testament, and that simply as the extreme limit to which, in the direction of Rome, Paul carried the gospel message (Rom. 15:19). It is difficult to ascertain the exact meaning of this passage. The expression "round about" (κύκλω) may be joined with Jerusalem, and signify its neighborhood (as Alford); or it may be joined with "unto Illyricum" (μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικῶν), and denote the circuit of the apostle's journey "as far as Illyricum," an expression warranted by the indefinite phrase of Luke, "those parts" (Acts 20:2).

IMAGE, also rendered "graven image," "molten image," etc. See IDOL.

IMAGE, NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S (Heb. תְּשֵׁבֶל, tseh'-len, a resemblance), Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream a great metallic image which was terrible to look upon. It was not an idol image, but a statue, and from the description given was evidently in human form. The image appears divided as to its material into five parts—the head of fine gold, breast and arms of silver, the "belly (the abdomen) and thighs" (loins) of brass (i. e., copper), the legs with upper part of thighs of iron, and the feet of clay (Dan. 2:32, 33). Thus it will be seen the material becomes inferior from the head downward, finally terminating in clay. While Nebuchadnezzar was contemplating this image a "stone was cut out without hands," broke loose from the mountain, struck against the lowest part of the image, broke the whole of it into pieces, and ground all of its material to powder. The expression "without hands" signifies without human help. The image represented the world power, of fearful import to the people of God. "The world power is in all its phases one, therefore all these phases are united in the vision in one image" (Klief). The head represented Nebuchadnezzar, as distinguished from his successors in the Babylonian kingdom, and the other kingdoms are thought to be the Medo-Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman.

As to the metals of which the image was composed, perhaps the following is a true interpretation: Gold and silver are more valuable than copper and iron, and gold and silver are used figuratively to designate moral purity and righteousness (comp. Mal. 3:3 with Isa. 1:22); brass (copper) to designate moral impurity (Jer. 6:28; Ezek. 22:18) and stubborn rebellion against God (Isa. 48:4). Thus their gradation in the image shows, without doubt, an increasing moral and religious deterioration of the world kingdoms. "The stone that smote the image" is evidently the kingdom of

IMAGE OF GOD

God, which destroys the world powers, but shall last itself forever.

In Dan. (ch. 3) is an account of a golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar in the plain of Dura. It probably represented his patron god, Bel-Merodach, and adoration to it was a test of loyalty. As its height was out of proportion to its breadth (six cubits) ten to one, it is probable that a tall pedestal is included in its measurement.

IMAGE OF GOD. 1. As Borne by Man (Heb. צֶמֶד, tsch'lem, resemblance; accompanied in Gen. 1:26; 5:1 by דְּמוּתוֹ, dem-oolh', "likeness"). Attempts have been made by modern as well as ancient writers to base important distinctions upon the use of the two words. But such attempts are regarded generally as instances of overrefined or fantastic exegesis. The double expression is for the purpose of giving strength and emphasis to the idea of godlikeness in man as set forth in these passages. "Likeness added to image tells us that the divine image which man bears is one corresponding to the original pattern."

The conception of man as created after the image of God is justly held to be of great importance, and fundamental in theology. It is foremost among the Bible representations of man; it is bound up in the account of his creation; it appears in striking relation elsewhere, sometimes with the same, at others with different expressions (Gen. 9:6; Psa. 8; James 3:9; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10; comp. Matt. 5:48; Luke 6:36; Acts 17:28, 29; 1 Pet. 1:15, 16; 2 Pet. 1:4, where the exalted capacity and nature of man are assumed).

Significance of the idea. This has been a favorite battleground of theologians, partly due to the brevity of the Scripture statements, and more largely to the different theological presuppositions with which the subject has been considered. An outline of the history of speculation, or of doctrine, upon this point cannot be given here. Evidently the Scriptures proclaim resemblance of some most important character between the constitution of man and the divine nature. The creature man is exalted above all the other creatures of the earth, as the account shows, in that he is a copy of the Creator. And, what is also of great moment, according to the representations of Scripture, this image survived the fall, and, though blurred, still exists. The sacredness of human life is based upon this fact (Gen. 9:6). The cursing tongue as well as the violent hand for the same reason must be restrained (James 3:9). As to the effect of the fall and man's sinful history upon God's image in man the Scriptures are almost wholly silent. Paul (Rom. 3:23) declares that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God," a statement equivalent to saying that the glorious image is, because of sin, less than it once was. There are also recognitions of loss in this respect, through sin, where, in the famous passages Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10, the apostle speaks of the "new man," or man's renewal. But, as the best theologians commonly agree, the representations of Scripture are such as to create the impression that in some lofty sense "the divine image is inalienable from man." As to what constituted this image originally, and as to what still constitutes it, it should be said that a top frequent mistake has been to concentrate attention upon some single feature instead of comprehending all those excellent characteristics, which, according to the Scriptures, belonged, or belong, to man, and which constitute his likeness to his Maker. Also the effort has been made to distinguish too sharply between that in the likeness which has been lost through sin and that which is permanent. Man's nature has generally suffered loss from sin, but even in those respects in which the loss has been greatest, "in righteousness and true holiness," the loss is not such but that, through grace, he is capable of divine renewal. With these preliminaries in view, the chief significance of the idea, or the contents of the divine image, may be summarized as follows: (1) Spirituality. Man's likeness to God is not, as some of the early Latin fathers fancied, a bodily likeness. "God is a Spirit." And the first great point of resemblance between man and his Creator is found in man's spiritual nature. His life is inbreathed from God—a distinguishing fact in his creation (see Gen. 1:7; Job 32:8). With this stands connected the fact of man's immortal nature and destiny, for God is "the Eternal Spirit." The general teaching of Scripture is that this feature survives. (2) Personality. God is a person; he is conscious of his own existence. He is the Supreme Intelligence. He is free. Man is also self-conscious; is endowed with intelligence, rationality, and freedom. And at this point, despite sin, still may be discerned in man wonderful vestiges of his inherent greatness and likeness to the divine. (3) Holiness. God is the Holy One. Man was created pure, with no inherent tendency to sin; not with such righteousness as must be developed and confirmed by habitual practice of good, but still with such positive qualities in his nature that he was "after the image and likeness" of the righteous and holy God. (4) Love. "God is love." The cardinal virtue, or moral excellence, proclaimed for man in the Scriptures is love. Man originally bore and again may bear the divine likeness in this respect. But here, as elsewhere, we see the necessity for restoration. (5) Dominion. God is sovereign. He created man to rule (see Gen. 1:26; Psa. 8:6, et al.). Whether the place assigned to man in the creation is to be considered a feature of his likeness to the divine, or, in consequence of that likeness, is a question that has been much discussed. The latter is the more exact view, as reference is here to his position rather than to his nature. And yet man's royalty in the natural world is still so great that it must suggest his original complete fitness for it. For related topics, see RIGHTHOUSNESS, ORIGINAL; SIN, ORIGINAL; GRACE; IMMORTALITY.

2. Christ the Image of God. In two passages of the New Testament Christ is thus designated. In Col. 1:15 he is "the image of the invisible God;" in Heb. 1:3 he is "the brightness of God's glory," "the express image of his person" (comp. John 1:1; 17:25, 26).

Ellicott well remarks, "The Son is the Father's image in all things, save only in being the Father." Christ has appeared in the world as the perfect manifestation of God. And that he called himself "the Son of man" is not opposed to this fact.

For if man in his original state bore the divine image, certainly he must bear it who is not only perfect in his human nature, but is also the "only begotten Son" of God. What this designation of Christ may convey to us as to the eternal relations between the Father and the Son is a deep matter which cannot here be considered. But it should be noted that this "second man," this "Lord from heaven," this eternal "Word," this "image of the invisible God," appears in the New Testament as the Author of salvation. And, besides, the end of this salvation is conformity to his image. In the Old Testament man appears created after the image of God, in the New "the Son is the prototype of redeemed or renewed humanity" (see Rom. 8:29; Col. 3:10, 11; comp. Rom. 8:19 with 1 John 3:2; Phil. 3:21; 2 Cor. 3:18; 1 Cor. 15:47, 49).

IMAGE WORSHIP. See IDOL; IDOLATRY.

IMAGERY (Heb. מַשְׁכָּלֹת, mas-keeth', an image Lev. 26:1; picture, Num. 33:52). "The chambers of his imagery" is an expression found in Ezek. 8:12, in the description given by the prophet of the vision shown him of the Temple. The prophet appears to have been conducted out of the inner court through its northern gate into the outer court and placed in front of the northern gate, which led into the open air. There was a hole in the wall, and on breaking through the wall, by the command of God, he came to a door. Entering it, he saw all kinds of figures of animals portrayed on the wall of the rooms; in front of these seventy of the elders of Israel were standing and paying reverence to the images of the beasts with burning incense. The vision was a revelation of what was going on through the whole of Israel. The secret chamber is figurative of the idolatry secretly practiced by the people; the number, seventy, represents the whole nation. The picture on the walls, representing animal worship, showed the great degradation of the nation's religion, which was justified by the elders under the delusion that "The Lord seeth not; the Lord hath forsaken the earth;" that is to say, not that "He does not trouble himself about us, but that he does not know what we do; and has withdrawn his presence and help." Thus they denied God's omniscience and omnipresence. "Chambers of imagery" is a term applied to the rooms or closets in the homes of the people in which idolatrous images were set up and worshipped.

IMAGINATION is the image-making, pictorial faculty of the mind, reproducing and recombining former thoughts and experiences. It illustrates, adorns, and illuminates our speech and writing by presenting new views and applications of things, truths, and conceptions. It is the artist's great qualification, and the supreme talent of the inventor, finding expression in painting and sculpture, new machinery, architecture, landscape gardening, etc.

Imagination is the rendering of the Heb. שְׂרָרֹת, sher-ee-root', firmness, generally in a bad sense, i. e., hardness of heart (Deut. 29:19; frequently in Jeremiah); יָצָר, yay-tser, form, conception (Gen. 6:5; 8:21; Deut. 31:21, etc.); Gr. διαλογισμός, deal-og-is-mos', deliberating with one's self (Rom. 1:21); διάνοια, dee-an'-oy-ah, way of thinking (Luke 1:51).

IM'LA (Heb. יְמִלָּא, yeem-law', full), the father of Micaiah, which latter was the prophet who ironically foretold the defeat of the allied kings of Judah and Israel against Ramoth-gilead (2 Chron. 18:7, 8). In the parallel passage (1 Kings 22:8, 9) his name is written Imlah.

IM'LAH (1 Kings 22:8, 9). See IMLA.

IMMANUEL. See EMMANUEL.

IMMATERIALITY, not consisting of matter. This quality is predicated of God and the human soul. "Finite and passive matter, with its divisibility, is not in his essence. The absolute Being is thoroughly one with itself, and is not composite; the composite is divisible, the divisible is finite and material; thus all this cannot be applied to God" (Dorner, Christ. Doctrine, i, 238). God is also free from the limitations to which matter is subject, i. e., from the limits of space and time. The immateriality of God is therefore the basis of the qualities of eternity, omnipresence, and unchangeableness.

The immateriality of the soul includes simplicity as another of its qualities, but it is not superior to the limitations of space and time, since the soul needs the body as a necessary organ of its life.

IMMER (Heb. יְמֵר, im-mare', talkative), the name of several priests.

1. The father of Meshillemith (1 Chron. 9:12), or Meshillemoth (Neh. 11:13), some of whose descendants took a conspicuous part in the sacred duties at Jerusalem after the exile. His descendants, to the number of one thousand and fifty-two, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:37; Neh. 7:40). He is probably the one some of whose descendants divorced their Gentile wives (Ezra 10:20), B. C. long before 536. By some he is identified with Nos. 4 and 5.

2. A priest in the time of David, and head of the sixteenth sacerdotal division (1 Chron 24:14).

3. One who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon, but was unable to prove his Israelitish descent (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61), B. C. 536. "It does not clearly appear, however, that he claimed to belong to the priestly order, and it is possible that the name is only given as that of a place in the Babylonish dominions from which some of those named in the following verses came" (McC. and S., s. v.).

4. The father of Zadok, which latter repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:29), B. C. before 445.

5. The father of Pashur, which latter "smote Jeremiah the prophet, and put him in the stocks" (Jer. 20:1, 2), B. C. before 605.

IMMORTALITY, "Exemption from death and annihilation;" with reference to man, unending personal existence beyond the grave.

Viewed strictly, the idea of man's future life is not altogether identical with that of his immortality. And yet practically the question, "If a man die shall he live again?" covers the whole matter. Bishop Butler justly remarks, "If men were assured that the unknown event, death, was not the destruction of our faculties of perception and action there would be no apprehension that any other power or event, unconnected with this death, would destroy these faculties just at the instant of each creature's death; and therefore no doubt that they would remain after it; which shows the high probability that our living powers will continue to live after death, unless there be some ground to think that death is their destruction."

1. Scripture Doctrine. (1) The Old Testament. The idea of individual immortality is not as prominently and emphatically set forth in the Old Testament as in the New, it being the purpose and method of the Old Testament writers to present, not so much the contrast between the present and the future, as that between the chosen people and the heathen nations. It is national life, and not that of individuals, which occupies the foremost place. Nevertheless, the assertion, made even by certain Christian writers, that the doctrine of the future life is not taught in the Old Testament Scriptures, is unwarranted. And the supposition, which has sometimes been entertained, that the patriarchs and prophets and the Jewish people generally held no such doctrine is unreasonable and opposed to fact. It is to ascribe to them lower views of man's nature and future destiny than prevailed among the nations with which they came in contact. It is to regard the recipients and custodians of special revelation as less enlightened than others to whom such privileges had not been afforded. That the Jews, with the exception of the Sadducees, universally believed in man's immortal nature when Christ came is beyond dispute. And there is sufficient evidence to show that such had been their belief during the preceding centuries of their history. For example, such common expressions as "Was gathered unto his people," and the prohibition of necromancy, or invocation of the dead, clearly testify to the popular Hebrew belief in continued conscious existence beyond the grave. If the number of passages in the Old Testament explicitly affirming this doctrine is not large it should not, therefore, be a matter of cavil. The fact of life after death is taken for granted. Its recognition pervades the general drift or spirit of these ancient Scriptures. Thus man is represented as created in the image of God, and therefore a creature whose chief existence is spiritual, and not to be obliterated by the death of the body. His highest good is constantly set before us, as found in the divine favor and fellowship. All temporal good is insignificant in comparison with this. "The prosperity of the wicked" is not to be envied, because of the "end" which is understood in "the sanctuary." In the same place of clear and holy light is seen the contrasted condition and prospect of the righteous. "I am continually with thee; thou hast holden me by my right hand. Thou shalt guide me by thy counsel and afterward receive me to glory"

(Psa. 73). Thus the whole drift or tendency is to turn the thoughts of the people from the present toward the future. And besides there are several places in the Old Testament where the doctrine of a future life is plainly asserted. The sixteenth psalm, especially as connected with the apostolic comments (Acts 2:27; 13:36) is a case in point (see also Psa. 17:15; Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2, 3).

(2) The New Testament. In 2 Tim. 1:10 Paul speaks of Christ "who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." Literally the phrase "brought to light" means "has illuminated," or "shed light upon." It is certainly not implied here that the doctrine of immortality was unknown to the world before Christ came. For some sort of belief in that doctrine had been common, if not universal, among the Gentile nations, as well as among the Jews. It means that "the Gospel pours light upon and discloses the author, origin, and true nature of life and immortality to our view" (see Whedon, Com., on above passage). It should be added that, not only among the Jews, some, particularly the Sadducees, had cast away the belief and hope of a future life, but also false philosophy and prevailing corruption had weakened or destroyed the faith of many among the Gentiles. The mission of Christ, therefore, was not only to "shed light upon immortality" by means of definite and authoritative instruction, but also by his life and death and resurrection to make it possible for men to attain to an immortality that should be blessed. Accordingly, we find explicit utterances from Christ in large number with respect to this subject. He argued with the Sadducees against their unbelief. And his argument is significant as showing, not only Christ's own affirmation of a future deathless life, but also his affirmation of that doctrine as taught in the Old Testament (see Luke 20:27-38). He taught the doctrine plainly; he illustrated it by parables; it ran as a solemn undertone through all his teachings (see Matt. 5:12; 8:11, 12; 12:32; 13:36, 43; 18:8, 9; 22:11-13; 25:1-13, 31-46; Mark 8:35-37; Luke 12:4, 5; 13:24-29; 16:19-31; 18:29, 30; John 3:16; 5:39, 40; 6:47-58; 10:28; 11:25; 14:1-6, et al.). It should be noted that in the passages referred to Christ speaks of the future, not only of the righteous, but also of the wicked; also, that he speaks of a blessed immortality as attainable only through himself. The teachings of the apostles, as found in other parts of the New Testament, are, as we might expect, equally explicit with those of Christ. It is unnecessary to cite illustrations. As it has well been said, "The obligation which even in this respect the world owes to the Gospel of the Cross is one which cannot be overrated" (Van Oosterzee).

2. Theological. The prevalent and almost unvarying faith of the Christian Church has been in harmony with the teachings of the Holy Scriptures in holding to endless future life, not only for the righteous, but also for the wicked. In early Church history, however, there are a few traces, or isolated examples, of what has come to be known as the doctrine of conditional immortality. By this is meant not only the immortal blessedness, but also immortality itself is to be won by the saving union with Christ. Man is not by nature immortal; he becomes immortal upon the condition that he receives a new and spiritual life. The fate of the wicked accordingly will be annihilation (see Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrine, vol. 2, p. 16). This view has been promulgated in some measure in recent times in England and in this country. The chief objections to it, and which must make it untenable, are that it loses sight of the inherent dignity of human nature, and is opposed also by those teachings of the Scripture which represent the punishment of the wicked as of equal duration with the reward of the righteous (see Matt. 25:46; Dan. 12:2; John 5:29; 2 Thess. 1:8-10).

From the standpoint of theology immortality is not a doctrine that requires scientific proof. It belongs to the realm of faith; and here, as elsewhere, faith may rest upon the revelation of God. Doubts have often been expressed by theologians as to whether reason alone can furnish satisfactory proof of that doctrine. And it is generally admitted that in an exact or scientific way it cannot be demonstrated. Nevertheless, while not conclusive, some of the arguments commonly adduced are of recognized force, as, e. g., the teleological, viz., That the mental capacities are fitted for a larger development than is afforded by the imperfect conditions of the present life, and therefore we may reasonably expect a future field for their exercise and expansion; also the historical, the general and enduring belief in a future state of rewards and punishments, as manifesting a correspondence between such belief and the essential features of human nature. The words of Plato may be regarded as applicable to this whole class of arguments, where, in a passage of the Phædo, he makes one of the speakers to say that if a man can do no better on a matter of such practical importance as faith in the future world "he ought to choose out the best and most irrefragable human opinion about it, and upon that, like a mariner on a raft, risk his way through the storms of life, unless he can proceed more easily and safely on the more sure vehicle of some divine word."

Belief in immortality is most secure when united with a living faith in God; and that must mean God as revealed in the Holy Scriptures. With the right conception of God as a starting point theologians bring forward considerations of the utmost importance. We present at this point, in somewhat condensed form, the argument of Van Oosterzee: "The recognition of God's supremacy excludes the representation that man might by a voluntary deed entirely annihilate himself, and thus after the greatest misdeeds withdraw himself from the hands of the Supreme Judge. God's justice demands that the balance between virtue and happiness should not only be preserved and restored in secret, but should be revealed and maintained in the sight of all; this certainly is not done, or is only imperfectly effected, on this side of the grave. . . . The holiness of God requires that we should choose the good unconditionally, even before life itself; this requirement would be unreasonable, and self-denial would be alike a crime and folly if it led to self-annihilation. The wisdom of God would not have provided man with a preeminent moral disposition if the term of his existence had been limited to this life. It is the most highly developed minds which find themselves here least satisfied, and who at their highest attainment would desire to be able to begin, not only once again, but even in an infinitely better way. . . . The goodness of God, finally, would not have implanted so deeply in our hearts this desire for continuance if that desire must continue unsatisfied forever. The fear of death makes man much more unhappy than the beast if there be no immortality. . . . The satiety of life, which is observable in some people, does not prove the contrary, since it is just the opposite of real satisfaction. Men are satiated with this form of life because they have not found life in it; they are satiated with the esse, not with the vivere, which is the highest aspiration of the soul. Here, if anywhere, the aspiration proves the reality of the object of desire" (see Van Oosterzee's Dogmatics, vol. i, pp. 371, 372). Van Oosterzee adds: "Still this only becomes infallibly certain when the believer is conscious of his life in personal communion with God."

The philosophic treatment of the doctrine, also the history of the belief in immortality, do not come within the scope of this article, and accordingly are only dealt with incidentally.

LITERATURE.—The literature of this subject is most abundant. In addition to works referred to we cite a few others of special importance: Laidlaw, Bible Doctrine Concerning Man; Channing, Works, iv, p. 169; Chalmer, Works, x, 416; Liddon, University Sermons, p. 92; Martineau, Endeavors of the Christian Life, p. 107; Hodge, Systematic Theology, iii, 716, sq.; Pope, Compendium of Christian Doctrine, iii, 371, sq.; Wuttkie, Christian Ethics, vol. i, p. 161, sq.—E. McC.

IMMUTABILITY, the divine attribute of unchangeableness. The Scripture declarations of this attribute are most clear and emphatic. It is indicated in the title under which God made himself known to Moses, "I Am," "I Am That I Am" (see Exod. 3:14; Num. 23:19; Psa. 32:11; 102:25-27; Mal. 3:6; James 1:17).

From this it is to be understood that God is eternally the same in his essence, in the mode of his existence, in his perfections, in the principles of his administration.

This attribute is essential to deity. To think of God otherwise than unchangeable is to think of him otherwise than perfect.

Immutability is not, however, to be confounded with immobility. God acts, and his actions vary with reference to different ends. His affections toward the same persons change according to the changed attitude of those persons toward him. Thus, according to the representations of Scripture, the God who "is not man that he should repent" nevertheless does "repent," an accommodation of language to express the truth above stated. In reality such changes in the divine operations and affections are illustrations of the fact and character of divine immutability (see Num. 23:19; Psa. 90:13; Jonah 3:9, 10; Ezek. 33:7-19).

The proper conception of God's unchangeableness is to be derived only from the Scriptures, and the sublimity of the conception therein given is one of the indications of divine revelation (see Van Oosterzee's Christ. Dogmatics, vol. i, p. 257, sq.; Watson's Institutes, vol. i, 398, sq.; and other works of systematic theology).—E. McC.

IM'NA (Heb. יִמְנָה, yim-naw', he will restrain), one of the sons, apparently, of Helem, the brother of Shamer, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35; comp. v. 40).

IM'NAH (Heb. יִמְנָה, yim-naw', good fortune).
1. The first named of the sons of Asher (1 Chron. 7:30), called Jinnah in Gen. 46:17; B. C. about 2000.

2. The father of Kore, which latter, a Levite, had charge of the east gate of the temple, and was appointed by Hezekiah over the freewill offerings (2 Chron. 31:14), B. C. 719.

IMPUTATION, as a theological term, means the reckoning of the guilt and penal consequences of the sin of Adam as belonging also to his descendants; also the application of the righteousness of Christ to the account of believers. A doctrine involving such remarkable assumptions and leading to such extreme consequences has been, naturally, the subject of much discussion (see Hagenbach and Shedd, History of Doctrine). Such matter as it is practicable here to present is arranged most conveniently under two separate heads.

1. Of Adam's Sin. The imputation of the sin of Adam to his posterity. The Scripture upon which chief stress is laid by those who hold to the extreme Calvinistic view is Rom. 5:12-19. Reference is also had to 1 Cor. 15:22. It is argued that the whole human race is here represented as bearing the punishment of the sin of Adam, and, accordingly, as sharing in his guilt. To account for this Adam is held to have been the representative, "the federal head," of mankind. As some have said, "he stood in our law place." Against this it is urged that this language of Paul, "wholly popular and not formally exact and didactic," is taken by such expositors as if it were scholastic, legal, technical. This accords with the fact that the doctrine of imputation first took its rise in the Roman in distinction from the Greek Church, in surroundings in which the word imputatur, used in the Latin versions in Rom. 5:13, bore a particularly legal sense. And thus is illustrated the power of words to mislead. This conception of Adam as the federal head of the race is a theological fiction. He was the natural head of humanity, and the natural depravity of his posterity is properly accounted for upon the ground of heredity. As Van Oosterzee says, "Not that we were already in Adam, but that Adam is in us." Our sinning is historically connected with the first transgression. From that source first sprang our hereditary taint—a reality which must make unrenewed men repugnant to the holy God—but for which they are not responsible except as they have rejected God's freely offered grace. The imputation of Adam's sin as bringing personal guilt directly upon his descendants is nowhere taught in the Scriptures. See FALL OF MAN; ORIGINAL SIN.

2. The Imputation of Christ's Righteousness. As in the first instance Adam is held to have been the legal representative of the race, so in the second Christ is regarded as standing in relation to the law of God in the stead of believers. His righteous life fulfills for them the demand of the law, as the active righteousness of Christ is imputed unto them for righteousness. It is not strange that this view has often led to ANTINOMIANISM (q. v.). But here again appears the mistake of forcing upon the Scriptures an improperly rigid or exact interpretation, or of reading into them what does not belong there. The notion that Christ thus represents believers does appear in the Scriptures. It is a figment of speculation. He bears, it is true, a relation to the divine law in the stead of men in the atonement. But even here he does not "bear the sins of men" in the sense that they were his own. He suffered for the sins of men, but still they were men's sins. And thus the view that men's sins were imputed to Christ, and therefore his righteousness is imputed to believers is not valid. The relation which Christ sustains to men, and more particularly to believers, is spiritual, organic. He is "the second Adam" in the sense that from him new spiritual life has come into the world (John 5:40; 6:48, sq.; 10:10; 15:4, 5, et al.). The doctrine in question also shows its unscripturalness in the fact that it ascribes the justification of believers to Christ's holy life, or active righteousness, instead of his sacrifice of himself, "his obedience unto death."

This doctrine of high Calvinism, it should be said, is not precisely that held by Calvin himself, nor that of many of his followers, the difference being in "not separating the active from the passive righteousness of Christ," i. e., the righteousness of Christ manifested in his sufferings and death. Still Calvinism is consistent with itself in constantly holding that the righteousness of Christ is imputed to believers in the sense of being reckoned as their own.

Arminian doctrine, at this point, in the main, while recognizing the benefits which accrue to the believer from Christ's righteousness, denies the Calvinistic view of imputation, as one leading not only theoretically, but also practically, to false conclusions. At the same time great stress is laid upon the imputation of faith for righteousness. Reference is had to Rom. 3:21, 22; 4:3-24, and other Scriptures. See ATONEMENT; FAITH; JUSTI-

FIGATION; OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST; RIGHTEOUSNESS.

IM'RAH (Heb. יִמְרָא, yim-raw', refractoriness), one of the sons of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36). See HOTHAM.

IM'RI (Heb. יִמְרִי, im-ree', wordy, i. e., eloquent).

1. The son of Bani and father of Omri of Judah (1 Chron. 9:4), B. C. before 536.

2. The father of Zaccur, which latter repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:2), B. C. before 445.

INABILITY, the want of power sufficient to perform any particular action or design. It has been divided into natural and moral. We are said to be naturally unable to do a thing when we cannot do it if we wish, because of some impending defect or obstacle, apart from the will, either in the understanding, constitution of the body, or external objects. Moral inability consists either in the want of inclination or the strength of a contrary inclination; the want of sufficient motives to induce and excite the act of the will, or the strength of apparent motives to the contrary. Man's inability is not, however, an excuse for wrongdoing or the failure to do right, for God's grace has been promised for ability (Phil. 4:13, "I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me").

INCANTATION. See MAGIC.

INCARNATION (Lat. in and caro, "flesh"), the act of assuming flesh; in theology, the gracious voluntary act of the Son of God in assuming a human body and human nature.

1. The Christian Doctrine of the incarnation, briefly stated, is that the Lord Jesus Christ is one person with two natures indissolubly united, the one nature being that of the eternal Son of God, the other that of man, in all respects human, "yet without sin." It includes the miraculous conception and birth of Christ. The incarnation is absolutely without parallel in history. The fabled incarnations of pagan religions are at most only indications of the vague longing of humanity for union with the divine, and are thus in some sense imaginative anticipations of the Christian reality. The incarnation is also to be distinguished from theophanies, or those appearances of a divine person in human form (often bearing the title "the Angel of Jehovah"), of which the Old Testament gives instances (see Gen. 33:24-30; Exod. 3:2-7; 14:19; Josh. 5:13-15; 6:1; Judg. 6:11-22; Dan. 3:25). These are to be regarded as preintimations, or occasional prophetic manifestations of that which was to be permanently realized in Christ (see THEOPHANIES).

2. Scripture Teachings. In addition to the gospel record of the miraculous conception and birth of Christ (see Luke 1:26-35; 2:1-14, comp. with Matt. 2:1-15) the Scriptures disclose this doctrine in several ways.

(1) Old Testament. In the Old Testament prophecies, which represent Christ as a person both human and divine, he is set forth in "the seed of the woman," a descendant of Abraham, of Judah, and of David, "a man of sorrows." But he is also called "the mighty God," "the everlasting Father," "the Son of God," "the Lord (Jehovah) our righteousness." While these familiar Scriptures do not formally state the doctrine of the incarnation, they logically suggest, or lead up to it.

(2) New Testament. Also in the New Testament there are many passages which present the elements of this doctrine separately—Christ is represented as a man, with a human body and a rational human soul; physically and mentally he is truly human. The designation "the Son of man" occurs more than eighty times in the gospels. But elsewhere this same person claims for himself, and has ascribed to him, the attribute of Deity. For Scripture reference see HUMANITY and DIVINITY OF CHRIST.

(3) There are numerous instances in which these two elements of Christ's personality are combined in the statement, or in which they are brought without hesitation or reserve close together (e. g., Matt. 11:8; 16:27; 22:42-45; 25:31-46; Mark 14:60-64; Luke 9:48, 44; John 3:13; Rom. 8:15, 21; 1 Cor. 15:47).

(4) While the doctrine does not rest for its authority upon isolated proof-texts, but rather upon the Scripture revelation as a whole, still there are certain utterances of great weight in which the truth is distinctly, and we may say even formally, stated (see John 1:1-14, comp. 1 John 1:1-3; 4:2, 3; Rom. 1:2-5; Phil. 2:6-11; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 2:14). The only way in which the force of these teachings can be set aside or lessened is by proving lack of authority on the part of the Scriptures. It should be added that the only way in which the Scriptures can be understood or intelligently interpreted is in the light of the essential facts of the incarnation.

3. Theological Development of the Doctrine. The early centuries of the history of the Church were marked in an unusual degree by speculations concerning the person of Christ. The representation of Scripture raised many questions among thinkers, and led to numerous attempts to give scientific form and elaborateness to the doctrine of the incarnation. These speculations were affected in some instances by Jewish opinions and prejudices held by members of the Christian communion, but more frequently by one form or another of pagan philosophy. It is not surprising, therefore, that various styles of error, heresies which became historic, appeared, and were overthrown, during those centuries. Among the prominent heresies were the following, viz.:

(1) Ebionism, or the doctrine of the Ebionites, a Jewish sect which existed even in the time of the apostles. This error arose from mistaken Jewish preconceptions concerning the Messiah, and consisted in the denial of the divine nature of Christ.

(2) Gnosticism, a name indicating the assumption of superior capacity for knowledge (Gr. γνῶσις, gno'-sis, "knowledge"). Gnosticism in its diverse forms received its impulse, and in the main its guidance, from pagan philosophy. In different ways it denied the humanity of Christ, even to the extent of denying the reality of his human body.

(3) Saballianism, which at bottom was a denial of the tri-personality of God, denied, accordingly, the existence of the Son of God, as a distinct person, before the incarnation. The union between the divine and human natures in Christ was held to be but temporary.

(4) Arianism denied that the Son was of the same essence with the Father, but held that the essence in both was similar. Hence the conclusion reached that Christ was created, though the greatest of all creatures. In connection with this heresy was the fierce contention over ὁμοούσιος (homoousios, "same substance"), and ὁμοιούσιος (homoiouios, "similar substance"), a discussion to which uninformed persons, who do not realize the importance of the issue involved, sometimes sneeringly refer.

(5) Apollinarianism, resting upon the Platonic distinction between body, soul, and spirit, as three distinct elements in man, viewed Christ as having a human body and soul, or animal life, but not a human spirit, the seat of rationality and intelligence. Instead of the latter was the divine nature of Christ. Thus Christ was not completely human. The study of the heresies of early Church history is especially valuable because the errors of modern times, as Socinianism, Unitarianism, and Rationalism, are simply these ancient and oft-refuted heresies revived. It would be a mistake to suppose that during those centuries the faith of the Christian Church was reduced to confusion. It has been said with much force, "The faith of the common people is determined by the word of God, by the worship of the sanctuary, and by the teachings of the Spirit. They remain in a great measure ignorant of, or indifferent to, the speculations of the theologians. It cannot be doubted that the great body of the people from the beginning believed that Christ was truly a man, was truly God, and in one person" (Hodge, vol. ii, p. 398). Nevertheless, it is to be remembered that systematic treatment of this great subject was indispensable, not only to meet the demands of the most thoughtful minds, but also to afford guidance to the popular teachings of the Church; especially to prevent such teachings departing from the truth revealed in the Holy Scriptures. The discussions of the early period of the Church practically determined in its general form the faith of Christendom as to the person of Christ for all the centuries that have followed. At present the question is more frequently asked by theologians than formerly "whether the Son of God would still have become incarnate had not sin entered the world." By some it is held that the Son held such an original relation to man that incarnation would have taken place even then as an event essential to man's attainment of his high destiny, though not of course under circumstances of humiliation. For judicious treatment of this not simply curious question the reader is referred to Van Oosterzee's Christian Dogmatics, vol. i, p. 298, sq. Also, the significance of the phrase used by Paul (Phil. 2:7, ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσε, properly rendered in the R. V. "emptied himself") is at present receiving unusual attention, though much discussed as "a most profound question" centuries ago. In considering this kenosis, or self-abnegation on the part of the Son of God, the correct distinction appears to be that between the possession and the use of the divine attributes. The laying aside of the possession conflicts with the idea of the divine immutability. That Christ did not use or exercise his divine properties in their fullness during his humiliation is evident from the Scriptures. His power to work miracles was never exerted for himself, but often for others. He bore "the form of a servant." He admitted, asserted, a limitation to his knowledge in one respect (see Mark 13:32), though manifesting and declaring himself possessed of divine knowledge in others (see Matt. 11:27; John 3:12, 13). But truly says Van Oosterzee, "The subject remains a divine mystery of which we cannot sound the depths, and can only approximately indicate the peculiar nature and meaning (see Van Oosterzee's Christian Dogmatics, vol. ii, p. 543, sq.). See art. KENOSIS."

4. Theoretical and Practical Value of the Doctrine. The doctrine of the incarnation is fundamental in Christian theology. In its light we find in Christ a new and the highest revelation of God; also a revelation of man in his original pure and perfect nature, most exalted and capable of union with God. The sinlessness of Christ, also his miraculous works, are here explained. Only thus can be reconciled the contrasting and seemingly contradictory facts of his earthly life; his human limitations on the one hand and the manifestation of divine attributes and the exercise of divine prerogatives (as in the forgiveness of sins) on the other. The atonement depends for its efficacy upon the fact that Christ was "God manifest in the flesh;" likewise the value of his intercession, his sympathetic relation to his people, and his power to impart to them a new and holy life, and bring them to everlasting exaltation and glory (see Heb. 2:9-18; 4:14-16; John 1:12; 1 John 1:4; 3:1-3).

INCENSE (Hebrew usually קֶטֶר, ket-o'-reth, once applied to the fat of rams, the part always burned in sacrifice; once קִילְתָרֶה, kit-lar'e, Jer. 44:21, both from the Hebrew, to smoke; sometimes לֶב־נָוֹה, leb-o-naw', Isa. 43:23; 60:6; 66:3; Jer. 6:20; 17:26; 41:5, frankincense), an aromatic compound which gives forth its perfume in burning. Its most general use in Scripture is that perfume which was burned upon the Jewish altar of incense (see TABERNACLE). Both among the Hebrews and Egyptians we find no other trace of incense than in its sacerdotal use, but in Persian sculptures we see it burned before the king.

1. Material. The incense employed in the service of the tabernacle was called incense of the aromas (Heb. קְטֹרֶת סַמִּים, ket-ot'-reth sam-meem), the ingredients of which are given in Exod. 30:34, 35. These consisted of: (1) Stacte (Heb. נַחַלְתָּן, naw-tawf), i. e., "not the juice squeezed from the highly fragrant myrrh tree, but probably a species of gum storax resembling myrrh;" (2) Onycha (Heb. שֶׁחַלְתָּן, shekh-ay'-leth, literally, a scale), the shell of the perfumed mollusk, blatta byzantina, found in the Mediterranean and Red Seas, and yielding a musky odor when burned; (3) Galbanum (Heb. קְלֵב־נָוִי, khel-ben-aw', literally, fat), a gum that is obtained by making incisions in the bark of a shrub growing in Syria, Arabia, and Abyssinia; and (4) Pure frankincense (Heb. לֶב־נָוִי, leb-o-naw', literally, white), a pale yellow, semitransparent, pungent resin, which, when burnt, is very fragrant, grown in Arabia and Judea.

2. Preparation. The A. V. says "of each there shall be a like weight," i. e., equal parts of the various ingredients, but Abarnabel, Aben Ezra, and others think that the meaning is, each ingredient was, in the first place, to be pounded by itself, and then mixed with the rest, for it is possible that the ingredients did not all admit of being pounded to the same extent. Besides, it was to be salted (A. V. "tempered"), was to be "pure and holy," i. e., unadulterated with any foreign substance, and was to be reserved exclusively for sacred use, any other application of it being forbidden on pain of being "cut off from his people."

3. Sacred Use. The person selected to burn incense upon the altar of incense was Aaron, but in the daily service of the second temple the office devolved upon the inferior priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot (Luke 1:9). Uzziah was punished for presuming to infringe upon this prerogative of the priests (2 Chron. 26:16, 21). The times of offering incense were, in the morning, at the time of trimming the lamps, and in the evening, when the lamps were lighted (Exod. 30:7, 8). On the day of atonement (see FESTIVALS) the high priest offered the incense.

4. Figurative. Incense in Scripture is the symbol of prayer. "Let my prayer be set before thee as incense" (Psa. 141:2; see Isa. 60:6). In Rev. 5:8; 8:3, 4 we meet with the same idea. But "it is not prayer alone that is expressed by incense. . . . A good or evil savor was to Israel the symbol of a good or godless life; and when, therefore, the sanctuary of God was kept continually filled with fragrance, they beheld in this the sweet savor, not of prayer alone, but of that life to which, as a priestly nation, they were called" (Dr. Wm. Milligan, Bib. Ed., iii, 226, sq.). See TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.

INCEST, the crime of cohabitation with a person within the degrees forbidden by the Levit-ical law (Lev. 18:1-18). The prohibition of incest and similar sensual abominations is introduced with a general warning as to the licentious customs of the Egyptians and Canaanites, and an exhortation to walk in the judgments and ordinances of Jehovah. Intercourse is forbidden (1) with a mother; (2) with a stepmother; (3) with a sister or half-sister; (4) with a granddaughter, the daughter of either son or daughter; (5) with the daughter of a stepmother; (6) with an aunt, sister of either father or mother; (7) with the wife of an uncle on the father's side; (8) with a daughter-in-law; (9) with a sister-in-law, or brother's wife; (10) with a woman and her daughter, or a woman and her granddaughter; (11) with the sister of a living wife. No special reference is made to sexual intercourse with a daughter, being a crime regarded as not likely to occur; with a full sister, i. e., the daughter of one's father and mother, being included in No. 3; or with a mother-in-law, included in No. 10. Those mentioned in Nos. 1, 2, 3, 8, and 10 were to be followed by the death of the criminals (Lev. 20:11, 12, 14, 17), on account of their being accursed crimes (Deut. 23:1; 27:20, 22, 23); while the punishment of those guilty of Nos. 6, 7, 9 was to bear their iniquity and die childless (Lev. 20:19-21). See MARRIAGE.

INCONTINENCY (Gr. ἀκρασία, ak-ras-ee'-a, want of self-control, 1 Cor. 7:5; 2 Tim. 3:3), absence of that virtue which consists in restraining concupiscence.

INCORRUPTION (Gr. ἀθαρσία, af-thar-see'-ah), is applied to the body of man as exempt from decay after the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:42, 50, 53, 54). In Rom. 2:7 and 2 Tim. 1:10 the Greek word is rendered immortality, and in Eph. 6:24, sincerity, R. V. incorruptness. The crown of the saints is incorruptible (1 Cor. 9:25), also their "inheritance" (1 Pet. 1:4). The meaning is ever-enduring, unchanging.

INDEPENDENCE OF GOD. God is absolute and not dependent upon any thing or person outside of himself for his existence. "His being and perfections are underived, and not communicated to him, as all finite perfections are by him to the creature." (1) He is independent as to his knowledge (Isa. 40:13, 14); (2) in power (Job 36:23); (3) as to his holiness, his bounty and goodness (Rom. 9:18).

INDIA (Heb. הַיַּדִּין, ho'-doo), the limit of the territories of Ahasuerus in the east (Esth. 1:1; 8:9). The country so designated is not the peninsula of Hindustan, but the region surrounding the Indu—the Punjab.

INFINITY, unlimited extent of space or duration or quantity. As designating an essential attribute of God the term refers to his unlimited existence, capacity, energy, and perfections.

The word infinity does not occur in the Scriptures, and yet, properly understood, it is an appropriate term, and necessary to express certain Scripture revelations concerning God. God is not subject to the limitations of time or space. Thus infinity expresses both his eternity and his immensity. Also his power and knowledge and other perfections exist in unlimited fullness.

This idea of God, necessary to our conception of him, can be held by us only in a negative form, this being due to the finite nature of our understanding. It is nevertheless a positive idea and represents the actual fact that God in his being and attributes transcends, not only our comprehension, but also all limits that must everywhere else be recognized. God is the only infinite existence.

Care must, however, be exercised not to conceive of the infinity of God in a material manner. God is the infinite Spirit. His presence pervades and fills all space, but not necessarily to the exclusion of other and finite existences. The mistake of Spinoza, and Pantheists generally, has been that of applying to God the material conception of infinity. And upon the principle of the impenetrability of matter, or that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time, the conclusion has been reached that the being of God includes all things, or that all things are parts or manifestations of God. The idea of infinity brought forward by Mr. Mansel in The Limits of Religious Thought is also essentially of the same character, though he avoids the Pantheistic conclusion by appealing from philosophy to faith for the right conception of God. It must be borne in mind that the infinity of God is that of Spirit, and to spirit the ideas of extension and impenetrability do not apply, as they do to matter. And further, the infinite Spirit is necessarily one capable of creating finite existences. And withal there must ever be the proper acknowledgment of the incapacity of the human mind to argue adequately upon this and certain other subjects.

For discriminating discussion see Pope's Compend. of Christ. Theol., vol. i, p. 293, sq.; also Hodge's System. Theol., vol. i, p. 380, sq.—E. McC.

INFIRMITY (Heb. מַחְלָה, makh-al-aw', sickness, Prov. 18:14; Gr. ἀσθένεια, as-then'-i-ah, weakness or frailty of body, A. V. sicknesses, Matt. 8:17; translated weakness in 1 Cor. 15:43; 2 Cor. 13:4). In Rom. 6:19, "infirmity of your flesh" means the weakness of human nature as respects understanding. Paul says in 1 Cor. 2:3, "I was with you in weakness," meaning inability to do great things, want of skill in speaking, or of human wisdom. In Heb. 5:2 and 7:28, the high priest is spoken of as "compassed with infirmity," which means tendency to sin, unlike our great High Priest. In Heb. 4:15, "We have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities," it denotes all human disabilities. Also in Rom. 8:26 and 2 Cor. 12:5, 9. The Gr. νόσος, nos'-os, is rendered sickness, disease (Luke 7:21, etc.). Matt. 8:17 contains both words. In Rom. 15:1 sins of infirmity are referred to, which are such as are attributable to excusable ignorance, unavoidable surprise, or constitutional weakness. See DISEASES.

INHERITANCE. The following laws prevailed among several nations:

1. Greek. If a person died intestate, leaving sons, all of equal birthright, and none of them disinherited, the sons inherited the property in equal parts, the eldest probably receiving the same as the rest. Daughters were provided with dowries, which went back to the remaining heirs in case the daughter was divorced or childless after marriage. If a man had no son, he usually adopted one to continue the family and its religious worship; and if he had daughters he would marry one of them to the adopted son, in which case the chief share of the inheritance fell to his daughter and her husband, the rest receiving dowries. If only daughters survived, the succession passed to them, and the next of kin had a legal right to one of the heiresses and could claim to marry her, even though she had married another before receiving the inheritance. A man marrying an heiress was bound by custom and tradition, if he had sons, to name one as heir to the property coming with his wife, and thus restore the house of his maternal grandfather. Children born out of wedlock were illegitimate, and had no claim to the estate of the father. If a man died intestate, leaving no heirs either of his body or adopted, his nearest relations in the male line inherited, and in default of these, those in the female line as far as children of first cousins.

2. Roman. If a man died intestate leaving a wife and children of his own body or adopted, they were his heirs; this did not apply, however, to daughters who had passed into the hands of their husbands, or of children who had been freed by emancipation from the power (potestas) of their father. If a man left no wife or children, the agnati, or relations of the male line, inherited, according to the degree of their kinship. If there were no agnati, and the man was a patrician, the property went to his gens. The relations in the female line (cognati) were generally not entitled to inherit by the civil law.

3. Hebrew. The Hebrew institutions relative to inheritance were of a very simple character. Under the patriarchal system the property was divided among the sons of the legitimate wives (Gen. 21:10; 24:36; 25:5), a larger portion being assigned to one, generally the eldest, on whom devolved the duty of maintaining the females of the family. The sons of concubines were portioned off with presents (Gen. 25:6). At a later period the exclusion of the sons of unlawful wives was rigidly enforced (Judg. 11:1, sq.).

The possession of land, which Israel received by lot from God, was to remain the inalienable property of the several families. According to an old-standing custom, the father's property went to his sons, the firstborn receiving a double portion, the other sons single and equal portions—i. e., of five sons the firstborn got two sixths, and each of the others a sixth of the father's entire property. In consideration of this division, the firstborn, as head of the family, had to provide food, clothing, and other necessities in his house, not only for his mother, but also for his sisters until their marriage. This custom was more precisely defined by Moses: the father could not deprive his firstborn of his birthright by mere caprice (Deut. 21:15-17), but it might be taken away because of a trespass against the father, as in the case of Reuben (Gen. 49:4; 1 Chron. 5:1). See FIRSTBORN.

If there were no sons, it went to the daughters (Num. 27:8), on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (Num. 36:6, sq.; Tob. 6:12; 7:13), otherwise the patrimony was forfeited. If there were no daughters, it went to the brother of the deceased; if no brother, to the paternal uncle; and, failing these, to the next of kin (Num. 27:9-11). In the case of a widow being left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her, and in the event of his refusal the next of kin (Ruth 3:12, 13); with him rested the obligation of redeeming the property of the widow (Ruth 4:1, sq.) if it had been either sold or mortgaged. If none stepped forward to marry the widow, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin. The land being thus so strictly tied up, the notion of heirship, as we understand it, was hardly known to the Jews.

TABLE SHOWING ORDER OF SUCCESSION AS HEIRS.
Father.

If the testators were possessed of what we should call personal property—i. e., flocks and herds, stores of change of raiment, precious metals, or jewels, which last, in oriental countries, is still the favorite mode of investment—the portions of the younger children, as well as gifts or dowers for the daughters, were usually provided from this source. The strict law of entail with regard to land did not at all fetter the testator in the disposition of his personal property. It was to this latter that the request of the younger son referred. He asked that the third part of the movable property, which would naturally come to him at his father's death, should be granted him now (Luke 15:12). Testamentary dispositions were of course superfluous. The references to wills (q. v.) in St. Paul's writings are borrowed from the usages of Greece and Rome (Heb. 9:17), whence the custom was introduced into Judea.

INHERITANCE, SPIRITUAL. "The metaphor of the spiritual 'inheritance' is peculiarly, though not exclusively, Pauline. St. Peter employs it twice (1 Pet. 1:4; 3:9), St. James once (2:5), but St. Paul in a multitude of instances. It is closely interwoven with the substance of the longest and most intricate arguments in his epistles; it appears in the reports of his sermons in the Acts; he alone of all the sacred writers employs it in what may be described as the most daring of all theological conceptions—that which is embodied in the celebrated definition of believers as 'heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ.' To our minds heirship involves no more than the idea of the acquisition of property by succession, and the idea of succession is manifestly inapplicable with reference to the eternal God. That the heirship to which St. Paul alludes is Roman and not Hebrew, is evident not only from the accompanying reference to adoption, but also from the fact that it is a joint and equal heirship."

Sir Henry Maine writes (Ancient Law): "The notion (among the Romans) was 'that though the physical person of the deceased had perished, his legal personality had survived and descended unimpaired to his heirs or co-heirs, in whom his identity (so far as the law was concerned) was continued' (p. 181). "The testator lived on in his heir or in the group of his co-heirs. He was in law the same person with them" (Ibid., p. 188). "In pure Roman jurisprudence the principle that a man lives on in his heir—the elimination, so to speak, of the fact of death—is too obviously for mistake the center round which the whole law of testamentary and intestate succession is circling" (Ibid., p. 190). Contrary to the well-known maxim of English law, Nemo est heres viventis ("No one is heir of the living"), according to Roman law, the moment a child was born he was his father's heir. Paul the Jurist (3d century, A. D.) observes that there is a species of copartnership between a father and his children; "when, therefore, the father dies, it is not so correct to say that they succeed to his property, as that they acquire the free control of their own."

"In the light of the theories of Roman jurisprudence incongruity disappears from the great Pauline metaphor, and we discern in it a new sublimity. Instead of the death of the ancestor being essentially connected with the idea of inheritance, we find this circumstance 'eliminated.' The heir has not to wait for the moment of his father's decease. In and through his father he is already a participator in the family possessions. The father does not die, but lives on forever in his family. Physically absent, he is spiritually present, not with so much as in his children. In this phrase, 'the heirs of God,' there is presented a most vivid view of the intimate and eternal union between the believer and God, and of the faithful soul's possession in present reality, and not merely in anticipation of the kingdom of God on earth and in heaven" (W. E. Ball, LL.D., Mag. of Christ. Literat., p. 344, sq.).

INIQUITY. 1. Av-vone' (Heb. פָּזַר), perversity, depravity, sin (Gen. 4:13, A. V. "punishment," etc.); guilt contracted by sinning (Exod. 20:5, etc.); anything unjustly acquired (Hos. 12:8); penalty of sin (Isa. 5:18); calamity, misery (Psa. 31:10).

2. Eh'-vel (Heb. עָוֵל, Job 34:10) and Av-law' (Heb. עָוָרָה, 2 Chron. 19:7), mean perverseness.

3. In the New Testament the Greek words are very expressive. Thus ad-ee-kre'-ah (ἀδικία), rendered "unrighteousness," "wrong," means "that which is not just" (Matt. 7:23, et al.); an-om-ee'-ah (ἀνομία) and par-an-om-ee'-ah (παράνομία), "without law" and "transgression of law" (Matt. 23:28; 2 Thess. 2:7; 2 Pet. 2:16); while pon-ay-ree'-ah (πονηρία, Matt. 22:18; Luke 11:39; Rom. 1:29; 1 Cor. 5:8, etc.) signifies depravity, wickedness, malice.

In ordinary usage the term means absence of equity, wickedness, sin, etc.

INK (Heb. יַיִךְ, del-yo', Jer. 36:18; Gr. μέλαν, mel'-an, black, 2 Cor. 3:8; 2 John 12; 3 John 13).

INK-HORN (Heb. כֶּלֶסֶת, kel'-seth, a round vessel). This consists of a long tube for holding pens, sometimes made of hard wood, but generally of metal—brass, copper, or silver. It is about nine or ten inches long, one and a half or two inches wide, and half an inch deep. To the upper end of this case the inkstand is attached. This is square or cylindrical, with a lid moving on hinges and fastening with a clasp. The inkhorn was carried in the girdle.

Courtyard of Oriental Khan.

The ink of the ancients was composed of powdered charcoal, lampblack or soot, mixed with gum and water. It was intensely black and would retain its color for ages, but was easily erased from the parchments with sponge and water (see Num.

INN (Heb. מִלְּוֶה, maw-lone', Gen. 42:27; 43:21; Exod. 4:24, a "resting place for the night;" while the Gr. κατάλυμα, kat-al'-oo-mah, is used for an "inn," Luke 2:7; an "eating room," A. V. guest chamber, Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11). In the East hospitality was religiously observed, and therefore, in our sense of the term, inns were not known. Khans, or caravansaries, are the representatives of European inns, and were only gradually established. It is doubtful whether there is any allusion to them in the Old Testament, the meaning in Gen. 42:27; Exod. 4:24; Jer. 9:2, being only the station, the place of rest for the night, either under a tent or in a cave. Keil, Arch., ii, p. 257, thinks the first trace of an inn is found in Jer. 41:17, "the habitation of Chimham" (Heb. גַּי־רֹחֶל, gay-rooth'). The πανδοχείον (Luke 10:34) probably differed from the κατάλυμα (Luke 2:7) in having a "host" or "innkeeper" (Luke 10:35), who supplied some few of the necessary provisions and attended to the wants of travelers left to his charge. In these hostleries bazaars and markets were held, animals killed and meat sold, also wine and cider; so that they were a much more public place of resort than might at first be imagined.

5:23, sq.). When needed for use some of the dry preparation was mixed with water until about the consistence of modern printer's ink. It was thus less adapted for rapid work than modern ink. Both the Egyptians and the Hebrews made use of different colors for writing, some of the books of the latter having been written, according to Josephus, in red, blue, purple, gold, and silver tints.

The origin of caravansaries is unknown. Perhaps they were established at first by traders who regularly passed the same road. Now they are spread over the whole of the East, being found in cities, villages, and even the open highway. They consist of large buildings of stone arranged in a square, which inclose a spacious court. They are frequently of two stories, the lower containing stores and vaults for goods and stalls for cattle, the upper for travelers. They have a well or a large reservoir.

It appears that houses of entertainment were sometimes, as in Egypt (Herod. ii, 35), kept by women, whose character was suspicious. But the inference that the women mentioned in Josh. 2:1; Judg. 16:1; 1 Kings 3:16 were innkeepers seems rather forced.

INNOCENCY (Heb. נִיִּצְוּת, or נִיִּצְוּת, nik-kaw-yone', literally clearness, Gen. 20:5; Psa. 26:6; 73:13; Hos. 8:5; זָכוּת, zaw-koo', purity, Dan. 6:22). The Hebrews considered innocence as consisting chiefly in an exemption from external faults, but this is a very different standard of morality from that of the Gospel (Matt. 5:28; John 3:25) or even of the Old Testament (Psa. 51:6). Innocence is sometimes used as an exemption from punishment (Jer. 46:28, Heb. "I will not treat you as one innocent;" also Nah. 1:3; Psa. 18:26).

INSPIRATION (Lat. inspiratio, a breathing into). In the Scriptures inspiration is referred to God as its source, hence the compound term (2 Tim. 3:16), Θεόπνευστος, theopneustos, God-inspired, or breathed into from God.

1. Preliminary Statements. In theology the term has properly three applications: (1) General. In a general sense inspiration is the gracious gift of God to all Christians. All spiritual life, all power for holy living, proceeds from the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. It is the result of inspiration. The baptism of the Holy Ghost described in the New Testament is the fulfillment of the Old Testament prediction of the universal outpouring of the Spirit. Christians are exhorted to "be filled with the Spirit" (see Joel 2:28; Acts 2:17; Eph. 5:18) (see also HOLY GHOST). And back of this is the fact that man's original spiritual nature, his capacity for communion with God, was divinely inbreathed (see IMAGE OF GOD, 1). (2) Special. In a special sense there were certain persons, as the prophets and apostles, inspired as the instruments of special revelations. We should view in this connection other particular forms of inspiration, as of artists, poets, judges, and kings, who are represented as "filled with the Spirit of God" (see Exod. 31:3, sq.; 35:31; Judg. 11:29; 14:6; 15:14). But pre-eminent among the persons thus specially endowed are those who have been rightly called "spiritual progenitors, the men who by revelation mark a new stage in religion." In such cases must be recognized an inspiration differing from that of others, not only in degree, but also of kind, inasmuch as the divine inbreathing has reference to certain special services, or functions and results. Here is manifested the diversity of "gifts by the same Spirit" (see 1 Cor., ch. 12). (3) Sacred Writers. Closely connected, though not identical, with this is the sense in which the term is most commonly used, in which it refers to the special preparation with which God endowed certain men, by virtue of which they became the human authors of the Holy Scriptures, the infallible record of divine revelation. It is with inspiration in this last and strictest sense that the remainder of this article deals exclusively.

Inspiration is to be distinguished from revelation, the latter term representing the work of God in communicating his saving truth, also the truth itself thus communicated; the former designating the divine preparation of the first recipients of such truth, not only for its reception, but also for its transmission to others, and particularly by giving it permanent record. The Holy Scriptures are the writings of inspired men, but are not the divine revelation itself. They are "the source of our knowledge of it—the record, the memorial, the bearer thereof."

The proof of the reality of inspiration accordingly logically follows, as dependent upon that of the reality of revelation, however closely the two are associated. First, it must be ascertained that the special revelation brought to us is real—is actually from God—and then follows the question as to the method of its reception and transmission. And of this we must learn from the Scriptures themselves. This is not, as often objected, arguing in a circle. For when the appeal is made to the Scriptures, in order to establish their inspiration, it is done solely upon the ground of their historical trustworthiness, and consequently the reality of the revelations they record, and the truthfulness of their statements of fact in relation thereto. And among these statements is that of the inspiration of the writers of the Holy Scriptures. See REVELATION, REALITY OF.

It should be observed further that inspiration is not identical with canonicity. The many writings which make up the Bible have been received into the sacred canon upon the recognition of their inspiration. But still it may remain a proper question for scholarly investigation as to whether this recognition in every case has been worthily bestowed; and this without affecting materially the general fact of Scripture inspiration. It should be remembered, however, for how long, and in how many ways, the sifting process has been applied to the Bible, and how meager have been the results of destructive criticism. See CANON.

And still further, the obvious fact should be borne in mind that the doctrine of inspiration relates to the original Scriptures. It does not include the idea of a guaranty against mistakes on the part of transcribers and translators. This is a matter often lost sight of by those who cavil at the discrepancies found in the Scriptures in their present form. Nevertheless, at this point, the providential oversight with respect to the Bible, and the essentially complete preservation of its saving teachings, must be taken into account.

2. Biblical Doctrine. The doctrine of the Scriptures themselves upon this subject is of highest importance. The too common mistake has been to approach the Scriptures with preconceived ideas or definitions of inspiration instead of ascertaining from the Scriptures themselves the character and extent of the inspiration they actually manifest or declare.

(1) The fact of inspiration. The fact of inspiration is brought before us by the Scriptures in several ways and with great emphasis. Throughout is the tone of peculiar authority based upon the idea that through the writers God has spoken. The divine commission to men to "write," to "write for a memorial," to write "by the commandment of the Lord," appearing so often in the Old Testament, and repeated also in the New, together with the solemn stress laid upon the products of such writing, is of great significance (see Exod. 17:14; 34:27; Num. 33:2; Deut. 31:19; Isa. 8:1; 30:8; Jer. 36:2; Ezek. 24:2; Dan. 10:21; Rev. 1:2, 3, 19). We doubtless obtain here glimpses of the impulse and guidance under which the Scriptures were written.

(2) The testimony of Christ to the inspiration of the Scriptures is justly accounted of very great weight. His testimony bears explicitly upon the Old Testament, implicitly upon the New.

(1) He plainly and emphatically ascribes to the Old Testament divine authority, not, it should be said, in such a way as to render careful examination of these ancient documents unnecessary or improper, but still in such a way as should lead us to regard this part of the Scripture canon as, at least, generally the outcome of inspiration. The one thing in common between our Lord and his Jewish opponents was that he, as did they, regarded the Hebrew Scriptures as the writings of inspired men, of men peculiarly inspired, and therefore as declaring the divine word with infallible authority (see Matt. 5:17, 18; 15:3, 6; 22:43; Luke 24:27-44; John 5:39, and many other places).

(2) There is much reason for saying that Christ by necessary implication bore testimony to the inspiration of the New Testament. Christ declared that his coming and mission were in fulfillment of the prophecies of the old dispensation. Accordingly it is strongly suggested that as the old prophetic dispensation has its inspired records, so also must the new dispensation furnish the inspired records of the fulfillment. More particularly our Lord said, "My words shall not pass away" (Matt. 24:35); also "I have given them thy word" (John 17:14). He laid emphasis upon his own teachings at least equal to that which he laid upon the teachings of the Old Testament Scriptures. It cannot be imagined that he expected or intended that his words should be left without equally authoritative record. And, further, we find him providing and arranging for essentially the same procedure in the production of the New Testament Scriptures. The Holy Spirit is promised to the apostles for ends most significant at this point. "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you" (14:26). "He will guide you into all truth: . . . he will show you things to come" (16:13). And in one particular instance we find the distinct command to "write" given to an apostle, such a command as lay back of the Scriptures of the earlier dispensation (Rev. 1:2, 3, 19).

(3) The testimony of the apostles also to the fact of inspiration is clear and decisive. As to the Old Testament Scriptures, all references on the part of the apostles are such as make it manifest that they regarded those Scriptures as, in the most lofty sense, sacred and authoritative, and so, because written by men under the special inspiration of the Holy Spirit (e. g., Acts 1:16; 7:38; 2 Pet. 1:20, 21; Rom. 1:2; 16:26; Gal. 1:16; 2 Tim. 3:15, 16, et al.). The doctrine of the apostles as to the New Testament Scriptures is gathered in part from distinct references to the fact of their inspiration, but more largely from the assertion of such authority on the part of the writers as could result only from inspiration (see John 20:31; Rev. 1:10; 2 Pet. 1:19; 3:1, 2, 16; Gal. 1:7, 8, 16; Eph. 3:3; 1 Cor. 1:13: 7:40). The writers of the New Testament who were not apostles (e. g., Mark and Luke) are held to have shared the apostolic promise and gift, not directly, but indirectly, as they wrote respectively under the direction of Peter and Paul. The consideration of these and other cases belong to the study of the Canon.

(4) The character, method, and measure of the inspiration of the Scripture writers must likewise be ascertained from the Scriptures themselves. This has come to be more generally and distinctly recognized in recent years, and with considerable effect in clearing up difficulties that had existed in theories of inspiration.

(1) From the Scriptures it is manifest that the inspiration which lies back of them is of such a character and extent as to make them the infallible and divinely authoritative source of religious and moral teaching. The claim of the Bible throughout is that it brings to men the word of God. The distinguishing value the Scriptures ascribe to themselves is that they "are able to make" us "wise unto salvation."

(2) Still it is apparent that while in the Scriptures "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (see 2 Pet. 1:21), they were used by the Spirit as human instruments. Their faculties were strengthened and exalted; they were prepared to receive and to communicate the truth that God would make known through them to the world, and yet not in such a way as to obliterate all peculiarities or differences of natural endowments or of mental acquisitions. Thus what is termed the dynamical theory of inspiration, in opposition to the mechanical conception, has come to be regarded as corresponding with what the Scriptures actually manifest.

(3) As to verbal inspiration (a phase of the mechanical theory, and the subject of much con-tion), it may be truly said that the Scriptures do not claim for themselves all that some in their mistaken zeal have claimed for them. There is in the language of the Bible a divine majesty which is the result of the inworking of the Spirit. There are many places where we may readily conceive that not only the thoughts but also the very words were divinely given. In the records of the utterances of our Lord we may note in some instances what must impress us as even verbal accuracy, and even in that sense a fulfillment of his promise to his apostles that the Spirit would bring all things to their remembrance, "whatsoever I have said unto you." And yet it is most difficult, if not impossible, to say how far this extends. And certain it is that the strict verbal theory is in conflict with many of the phenomena of Scripture, as, e. g., where the words of Christ in instituting the Holy Communion are given in four different forms (see Matt. 26:26, 27; Mark 14:24; Luke 22:21; 1 Cor. 11:25). The essential matter of Scripture teaching is evidently that to which the Scriptures themselves attach chief importance.

(4) It is also evident from the study of the Scriptures that the inspiration of the writers had its limits. These holy men are not represented as invested by the Holy Spirit with omniscience, or infallible in every respect. They make no such claim to inspiration as some have made for them. They profess to be the divinely authorized bearers of God's saving revelation. But beyond this they exhibit in not a few instances the limitations and fallibility of human nature. The unwillingness to recognize this has led to pitiable methods of attempting to remove not only apparent but real, though unimportant, discrepancies presented in the Scriptures, and has thus served not the cause of revealed truth but of skepticism.

(5) The fact that the original manuscripts of the Bible have been allowed to disappear, and that errors have undoubtedly come in through the mistakes of transcribers and translators, together with the fact that the divine saving message in its fullness and harmony has been preserved, is sufficient to show us what is the intended result of Scripture inspiration; also how little depends upon the scholastic conception of inspiration, and how much upon the conception that is truly biblical.

3. Historical. The subject of the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures has been one to which great emphasis has been given throughout all its history. The Jews of pre-Christian times, to say nothing of later periods, held high views of inspiration of the Old Testament Scriptures. Josephus represents them correctly when he says, "It is implanted in every Jew from the hour of his birth to esteem these writings as the ordinances of God, and to stand by them; in defense of them, if need be, cheerfully to die."

The Christian Church in the Patristic age furnished no formal definition of inspiration, though the faith of the Church upon the subject, generally speaking, was thoroughly firm. The Montanist heresy of the 2d century, which proclaimed a continuance of inspiration in the same sense with Scripture inspiration, was wholly rejected, a fact worthy of note, particularly in view of the recent revival of that error under the name of "Continuous Revelation."

In the church of the Middle Ages the authority ascribed to tradition obscured the pure doctrine of Scripture inspiration, inasmuch as the Church came then to be regarded as another source of inspired teaching. But the Scriptures were still held as possessing their own divine authority. Such essentially is the position of the Roman Catholic Church at present.

With the rise and growth of Protestantism this subject has been naturally one of more earnest and varied discussion. Luther held what are regarded by many as lax views of inspiration, insisting chiefly upon inspiration as to matters of doctrine, and applying his own judgment freely as to the books of the Bible, rejecting, e. g., the epistle of St. James. Calvin made strong admissions as to the human elements in the Scriptures.

Later, largely on account of the advantage taken by Roman Catholic opponents from these views, the tendency of Protestant doctrine was to the other extreme. Early in the 17th century appeared the verbal theory of inspiration in its most rigid form, Buxtorf and others carrying it so far as to argue, in the spirit of the Helvetic formulary, that even the vowel points and punctuation of the Hebrew Scriptures were inspired. A recoil from this extreme naturally followed. The early Arminian divines took the position that inspiration related principally, if not exclusively, to matters of faith. Said Grotius, "A Spiritu sancto dictari historias non opus fuit." But the question as to the extent and results of inspiration is as yet by no means settled in Protestant and evangelical Christendom. Some theologians, even in most recent times, have held to the theory of verbal inspiration; others assert the absolute inerrancy of the Scriptures in all their contents, while others, and in increasing numbers, give clearer recognition to the human element connected with the production of the Holy Scriptures. One noteworthy point of agreement, however, is that the Bible is in such a sense the result of inspiration as to make it the supremely authoritative bearer of God's saving revelation to mankind, "the only infallible rule of faith and practice."

(a modern example of the verbal theory). Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, p. 402, sq.; Howe, Divine Authority of Scripture; Burnet, article vi, p. 157; Lowth, Vindication of Divine Authority and Inspiration of Old and New Testament; Conybeare, Theological Lectures, p. 186; Alford, Prologue to Gospels; Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology, p. 433; Neander, Christian Dogmas, ii, 433, sq. The literature of this subject is most abundant. The writers referred to above are mainly of recent times, and valuable as setting forth the present state of doctrine.—E. McC.

INSTANT, INSTANTLY. In addition to the usual use of the word (i. e., a particular point of time), several Greek words are used in the New Testament. These words imply to be urgent, urgently, or fervently, as will be seen from the following passages (Luke 7:4; 23:23; Acts 26:7; Rom. 12:12). In 2 Tim. 4:2 we find, "be instant in season and out of season." The literal sense is "stand ready"—"be alert" for whatever may happen. See GLOSSARY.

INSTRUCTION. See EDUCATION; CHILDREN; SCHOOLS.

INSTRUMENT (Heb. כֵּל, kel-ee', something prepared), a general term for any apparatus, as implement, utensil, weapon, vessel, furniture, etc. The expression "instruments of unrighteousness," etc. (Rom. 6:13; Gr. ὄπλα ἀδικίας) is a part of a figure in which sin as a ruling power would employ the members of the body as weapons against holiness.

INSULT. Such treatment of another, in word or deed, as expresses contempt. It is not definitely noticed in the Mosaic law; only the reviling of a ruler was forbidden (Exod. 22:28), but without any special penalty attached. The severity with which disrespect toward sacred persons was regarded appears from 2 Kings 2:23, sq. See MOCKERY.

INTEGRITY (Heb. כֹּחַ, tome, completeness) has various shades of meaning: simplicity or sincerity (Gen. 20:5; Psa. 25:21; 78:72); entirety as Job when under grievous trial (Job 2:3, 9; 27:5; 31:6; comp. Psa. 26:1; 41:12, etc.).

INTELLIGENCE. See GLOSSARY.

INTENT. See GLOSSARY.

INTENTION, purpose, design, the deliberate exercise of the will with reference to the consequences of an act attempted or performed.

It is one of the fundamental principles of ethics that the moral quality of an action is in the intention. This is a general principle, however, to be guarded by the fact that no one is at liberty to do evil that good may come. See ETHICS.

In the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church the idea of intention plays a peculiarly important part in connection with the efficacy of the sacraments. Thus the efficacy of baptism depends upon the intention of the priest. "He must have the intention to baptize indeed, i. e., to do what the Church does, or what Christ has ordained" (Deharbe, Catechism, p. 251). Also, more generally, in the decrees of the Council of Trent (11th canon, section 7) it is stated: "If anyone shall say that in ministers, while they effect and confer the sacraments, there is not required the intention at least of doing what the Church does, let him be anathema." In opposition to this is the 26th Article of Religion of the Church of England, which declares that the unworthiness or wickedness of ministers "hinders not the effect of the sacraments . . . which be effectual because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men." See SACRAMENTS.

INTERCESSION (Heb. פָּדָה, paw-gah', to come upon; Gr. ἐντυγχάνω, en-toong-khan'-o, to meet with, to come between).

1. Intercession of Christ. This belongs to the office of Christ as priest (q. v.) and refers generally to the aid which he extends as mediator between God and mankind (see MEDIATION). In a particular sense Christ is represented as drawing near to God and pleading in behalf of men. Thus, in harmony with the idea of intercession, he is called our Advocate. The prayers and praises of believers are acceptable to God through Christ's intercession (see 1 John 2:1; Rom. 8:27; Heb. 4:14-16; 7:25; 13:15; 1 Pet. 2:5; Rev. 8:3).

The objects of Christ's intercession are (1) The world, the whole of humanity, which he represents. On no other ground can we understand how a guilty race could be permitted to extend its existence upon the earth under the moral government of God. In the broadest meaning of the term Isaiah says, "He made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12). (2) The great body of his people. In a special and peculiarly appropriate and emphatic sense Christ pleads the cause of those who are savingly united to him. He prays for them as "not for the world" (see John 17). (3) Individuals, and particularly those who penitently put their trust in him. "The Head of every man is Christ" (1 Cor. 11:3). "If any man sin we have an Advocate with the Father" (1 John 2:1).

2. Intercession of the Holy Ghost. In one important passage (Rom. 8:26) this is particularly mentioned, and refers to the aid of the Holy Spirit afforded to believers that they may offer truly appropriate prayers.

3. Intercession of Christians. Roman Catholics believe in the intercession of the saints, i. e., of canonized departed spirits. This is rejected by Protestants as unscriptural because it derogates from the character of Christ, who is the only and sufficient mediator between God and man, also because of the supposition involved that there exists a class of glorified human beings who have personal merits of their own on account of which they may plead effectually for others. A great truth, however, is to be recognized in that it is the privilege and duty of all Christians to pray effectively, as well as put forth efforts, for their fellow-men. This is intercession in a subordinate though still important sense. The propriety and validity of such human intercession is illustrated in the Scriptures of both Testaments (see 1 Sam. 12:23; 1 Kings 18:36, 37; Luke 12; Matt. 5:44; 1 Tim. 2:1, et al.).

INTEREST. See USURY.

INTERMARRIAGE. See MARRIAGE.

INTERMEDDLE. See GLOSSARY.

INTERMEDIATE STATE, a phrase employed in theology in two ways: First, it is sometimes used to designate the interval between the death and resurrection of Christ. This is Van Oosterzee's exclusive use of the term. Second, the use which is by far more general refers the term to the condition of mankind after death and before the resurrection and final judgment. The following discussion, therefore, embraces these two distinct though importantly related subjects.

1. Of Christ. The condition or situation of the God-man during the period in which his body lay in the grave may be a matter for reverent inquiry, but not one for much of dogmatic statement. For the latter there is not sufficient Scripture basis.

(1) We may look upon our Lord at this point as affording another illustration of his acceptance of human conditions in that he existed for a time as a disembodied spirit, and for a time awaited his resurrection and glorification. The words spoken to Mary, "I am not yet ascended to my Father" (John 20:17), would seem to indicate that his disembodied spirit had not attained to the final blessedness. On the other hand, his promise to the penitent thief certainly had a glorious meaning (comp. with 2 Cor. 12:2-4; Rev. 2:7).

(2) At the same time the intermediate state may be regarded as the transition between our Lord's humiliation and exaltation. In one sense, at all events, it was the beginning of his exaltation. For though he was "dead and buried," even in death he triumphed over death, in that his body "saw no corruption" (Acts 2:27; 13:37). Also, it is held that in entering the world of spirits our Lord did so triumphantly, and took possession of the kingdom of the dead. Reference is made in this connection to Rom. 14:9; 10:7; Eph. 4:8, 9; Col. 2:15; 1 Pet. 3:18, 19; but the precise character of Christ's activity during this interval is one of those obscure matters upon which speculation has been abundant, and has often gone beyond the proper warrant of Holy Scripture.

(3) Christ's descent into hell is a phrase the proper meaning of which has been a subject of endless controversy. That the phrase should continue to be used is, in view of its ambiguity and liability to abuse, at least open to question.

The Apostles' Creed contains in its fifth article the words "He descended into hell." But it is universally conceded that they did not appear in that creed or any other before the 4th century. The purpose for which the clause was introduced is in dispute. It remains in the Apostles' Creed as used by the Roman and Greek and Lutheran Churches and the Church of England. The Protestant Episcopal Church prefaces the Creed with a note permitting the substitution of the words "He went into the place of departed spirits," as meaning the same as the words of the Creed. The Methodist Episcopal Church omits the words altogether. See CREEDS; also Westminster Catechism answer to question 50.

The phrase "descent into hell," or any proper equivalent does not appear in the New Testament. The words quoted by St. Peter (Acts 2:30, 31), much relied upon, are quoted also by St. Paul (Acts 13:34, 35), but in such a way as to show that both apostles had in mind solely the resurrection of our Lord as preceded by his actual death and burial. But for the exposition of these and other passages (as Eph. 4:8-10; 1 Tim. 3:16, and especially 1 Pet. 3:19-21; 4:6), the meaning of which is disputed, reference must be made to the works of Scripture exegetes.

It would be vain to attempt here to outline the history of speculation in connection with this subject. It should be said, however, that the view that Christ's activity during his intermediate state embraced the preaching of his Gospel was held by quite a considerable number of the early Church fathers. The advantages of this preaching were regarded as offered to both Jews and Gentiles in Hades. This view, as is well known, has been revived and brought into considerable prominence within recent years. But that this Gospel proclamation by our Lord in the world of spirits has ever been repeated (if it ever existed), or that others have been commissioned to similar work, must certainly remain a matter of pure and perilous conjecture. Upon the inference taken from this view of probation and the offer of salvation beyond the grave, further remark will be made in the second part of this article.

The Roman Catholic view of the descent is interwoven with the peculiar ideas of the Roman Church as to the various divisions of the world of spirits. The purpose of Christ in the descent was to deliver the saints of Israel and others from the limbus patrum, and conduct them to heaven (see Cat. Council Trid., art. v.).

The doctrine of the Greek Church represents Christ as descending into Hades for the purpose of offering redemption "to those who were subject to Satan on account of original sin, releasing believers, and all who died in piety under the Old Testament dispensation."

The Lutheran doctrine has presented considerable variations. But prominent amid the conflict of opinions is the view of the later Lutheran theologians, which regards the "descent into hell" as taking place not before, but immediately after the resurrection. The period of the intermediate state was passed in Paradise. Early on Easter morning before the risen Lord manifested himself to men, he went soul and body to hell, the abode of the lost, and there proclaimed his power over the devil and his angels. The "descent," according to this view, belonged emphatically to Christ's exaltation. The greatest extravagance of opinion upon this subject was that taught by Johannes Hoch in the 16th century, viz., that the soul of Christ descended into hell to suffer punishment while his body lay in the grave. That such a thought could find any measure of acceptance is, as has been said, "the opprobrium of one of the darkest chapters of historical theology."

Without going further, sufficient has been presented to illustrate the sentence quoted by Van Oosterzee: "On this subject also it is wiser, after David's fashion (Psa. 139:18) to meditate on one's couch than to write thereupon." See HELL.

Dietmaler, History Dogma de Descensu Christi ad Inferos; Dorner, Person of Christ; Hacker, Dissert de descensu Christi ad Inferos. Whedon's Commentary on 1 Peter is worthy of special attention with respect to the passage in question.

2. Of Mankind. This likewise is a subject upon which the light of the Scripture is not abundant. There is, however, a progress to be noted when we compare the revelations of the New with those of the Old Testament. That the human spirit continues to exist consciously after the death of the body is a fact most clearly established upon a biblical basis, to say nothing of the strength of philosophical arguments upon the matter (see IMMORTALITY). That a most powerful contrast is declared between the state of the righteous and that of the wicked, not only after the final judgment, but also during the interval between that event and the death of the body should also be regarded as beyond question. But still the precise condition or situation in which the departed spirit finds itself immediately after death is another matter, upon which even the teachings of the New Testament are not full, or always most explicit. Accordingly speculation has been rife, and has frequently illustrated the peril of attempting to be "wise above that which is written." It is not practicable here to do more than to indicate by the most general outline the various theories that have found their advocates, and, besides this, to suggest the conclusions that may be derived fairly from the Scriptures.

(1) The belief has been held by many at different times in the history of the Church that during the intermediate state the soul is unconscious. Strictly speaking, the theory has sometimes gone beyond this, and denied the existence of any spiritual principle in man that may survive the disorganization of the body. A modification of the theory of the unconscious state, or sleep of the soul, has appeared in the speculation that the soul while disembodied can take no note of the succession of events, and thus no note of time, and therefore, so far as consciousness is concerned, the moment of death is practically identical with that of resurrection. Without delaying, in order to criticise these speculations upon philosophic grounds, it may be sufficient to say that in all its forms the theory in question is opposed to the picture of conscious life given by our Lord in the parable of Dives and Lazarus; also to the general representations of the Apocalypse. The fact upon which stress is often laid, that in the New Testament the dead are sometimes spoken of as sleeping, and the saints "sleep in Jesus" (1 Thess. 4:14), proves nothing in favor of the theory. For this is simply a figurative expression with reference to the resemblance which death bears to sleep; and, besides this, sleep is one thing and utter unconsciousness is another.

(2) In contrast with the preceding is the theory which obliterates the intermediate state by representing human beings as entering at the moment of their death upon their final condition. Redemption according to this condition (that of Gnosticism) accomplishes its final triumph in the deliverance of the spirit from the body, while St. Paul represents the final triumph as the resurrection, the "redemption of the body" (see Rom. 8:19-23; 1 Cor., ch. 15). This theory also ignores the final judgment as represented in the Scriptures.

(3) The theory of a purgatory, or intermediate state of suffering between heaven and hell, for the discipline and purification of those who finally are to enter heaven, belongs to the Romish Church. It is part of an elaborate system of doctrine concerning the souls of the departed developed by mediæval theology. It has no foundation in Scripture. It is opposed by such Scriptures as pronounce those "who die in the Lord" as "blessed," or "with Christ." It dishonors the perfect atonement of our Lord. It has led to the great abuse of the sale of masses for the dead. See PURGATORY.

(4) Within recent years has been presented, sometimes with great apparent force, the theory which regards the intermediate state as one of probation and opportunity to choose the way of life, particularly for those who, from no fault of their own, have not in the present world known the Gospel. This theory rests for its Scripture support mainly upon 1 Pet. 3:19-21; 4:6, much controverted passages to which reference has already been made. Interwoven with this theory are what may be regarded as overstrained conceptions of the necessity of probation in every case for the development of moral life, and of the necessity of an intellectual apprehension of the historic Christ in order to salvation (see PROBATION; also FAITH; also Arminian view of the application of the benefits of the atonement in article on ELECTION). It should be said that many, if not most, of the advocates of this view guard it, or attempt to guard it, in such a way as not to encourage men in the rejection of the Gospel, for they admit, as all must, that the whole tone of Scripture, at least for those who hear the Gospel, is to the effect: "Behold now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation" (see also Luke 16:25-31).

(5) From what is revealed in the Scriptures it may reasonably be concluded (a) that the intermediate state is not for the wicked that of their final misery, nor for the righteous that of their completed and final blessedness. They await the resurrection and the judgment of the great day (see Matt. 25:31-46; John 5:28, 29) (see RESURRECTION; JUDGMENT). (b) The state of those "who die in the Lord" is, even for this period, pronounced "blessed." It is so, for the reason that though they wait for the final consummation, they are "with Christ" (see Rev. 14:4, 13; Phil. 1:23; John 14:1, 3; Luke 23:43, et al.). (c) For those who have willfully rejected the offer of salvation through Christ there is no ground of hope based upon Scripture that after death that offer will be renewed. It is proper to emphasize this statement in view of the spirit of presumption fostered by conjectural dealing with this most awful of all themes.

INTREAT. See GLOSSARY.

INWARD. See GLOSSARY.

IPHEDE'AH (Heb. יִפְדֵּי־יָאוֹ, yif-deh-yaw', Jah will liberate), one of the "sons" of Shashak, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:26), B. C. before 588.

IR (Heb. עִיר, eer, a city), the father of Shuppim (Shupham) and Huppim (Hupham), of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12); probably identical with one of the sons of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21), and, therefore, not, as often supposed, the same with IRI (1 Chron. 7:7).

IRA (Heb. עִירָא, ee-raw', citizen, or watchful), the name of three of David's favorite officers.

1. A Jairite, and "chief ruler about David" (2 Sam. 20:26), B. C. after 1000.

2. A Tekoite, son of Ikkesh, and one of David's thirty warriors (2 Sam. 23:26; 1 Chron. 11:28). He was afterward placed in charge of the sixth division of troops (1 Chron. 27:9), B. C. 993.

3. An Ithrite, one of David's "valiant men" (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chron. 11:40), B. C. 993.

IRA'D (Heb. עִירָד, ee-rawd', fugitive), one of the antediluvian patriarchs of the Cainite line, son of Enoch, and father of Mehujael (Gen. 4:18).

IRAM (Heb. עִירָם, ee-raum', city-wise), the last named of the Edomite phylarchs in Mount Seir, apparently contemporary with Horite kings (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chron. 1:54).

IR-HAHERES (Heb. עִיר הַהֶרֶס, eer ha-her'-res, A. V. "the city of destruction"), the name or an appellation of a city in Egypt, mentioned only in Isa. 19:18. "There are various explanations. 1. 'The city of the sun,' a translation of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis. 2. 'The city of Heres,' a transcription in the second word of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, Ha-ra, 'the abode (literally, 'house') of the sun.' 3. 'A city destroyed,' literally, 'a city of destruction,' meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be destroyed, according to Isaiah's idiom. 4. 'A city preserved,' meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be preserved. A very careful examination of the 19th chapter of Isaiah, and of the 18th and 20th, which are connected with it, has inclined us to prefer the third explanation" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

IRI (Heb. עִירִי, ee-ree', citizen), the last named of the five sons of Bela, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7).

IRI'JAH (Heb. יִרְיָהוּ, yir-ee-yaw', fearful of Jah), son of Shelemiah, and a captain of the ward at the gate of Benjamin, who arrested the prophet Jeremiah on the pretense that he was deserting to the Chaldeans (Jer. 37:13, 14), B. C. about 597.

IR'-NA'HASH (Heb. עִיר נָחַשׁ, eer naw-khawsh', city of a serpent, marg. "city of Nahash"), thought by some to be a city founded (rebuilt) by Tehinnah (1 Chron. 4:12). Keil (Com.) prefers to understand it as the name of a person, Nahash (see 2 Sam. 17:25).

IRON (Heb. יִירוֹן, yir-ohn', place of alarm), one of the "fenced" cities of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38), probably the present village of Jarān, southeast of Bint-Jebel.

IRON. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. IRON is used in Scripture as the symbol of strength (Dan. 2:33, etc.), of stubbornness (Isa. 48:4); of severe affliction (Deut. 4:20; Psa. 107:10); of a hard, barren soil (Deut. 28:23); of harsh exercise of power (Psa. 2:9; Rev. 2:27).

IR'PEEL (Heb. יִירְפֵּאל, yir-peh-ale', God will heal), a city of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:27). From the associated names it would seem to have been located in the district west of Jerusalem.

IRRIGATION. There is a reference to artificial irrigation by conduits in the "water parties, canals" (Job 38:25; Prov. 21:1). Besides, they were well known to the Israelites from Egypt (Deut. 11:10), for there water is brought from the Nile, its canals and reservoirs, to the higher-lying regions in various ways: sometimes by draw wells with a long lever (now called Shaduf); sometimes by large dredge wheels moved by the foot, over which passes a long endless rope with earthen jars fixed to it such as are still in use (Deut. 11:10), though the phrase "wateredst it with thy foot" may refer to pushing aside the soil between one furrow and another, so as to allow the flow of water; sometimes by more complex machines moved by oxen; sometimes by carrying it on the shoulder in buckets.

IR-SHE'MESH (Heb. עִיר שֶׁמֶשׁ, eer sheh'-mesh, city of the sun), a city of Dan, on the border between Eshtaol and Shaalabbin (Josh. 19:41), probably the same with Beth-shemesh (1 Kings 4:9).

IR'U (Heb. עִירוּ, ee-roo', citizen), the first named of the sons of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 4:15), B. C. after 1210.

ISAAC.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. יִצְחָק, yits-khawk', laughter, i. e., mockery; יִשְׁחָק, yis-khawk', he will laugh, in Psa. 105:9; Jer. 33:26; Amos 7:9, 16; Gr. Ἰσαάκ, ee-sah-ak'.) The only son of Abraham by Sarah. The name Isaac was fitly chosen by Jehovah for the child in commemoration of supernatural birth (Gen. 17:19), and of the laughing joy it occasioned.

2. Personal History. (1) Early life. The birth of Isaac occurred (B. C. about 2233) when Abraham was a hundred years old and his mother ninety (Gen. 21:5; comp. 17:17). He was circumcised when he was eight days old, and his mother's skeptical laughter was turned into exultation and joy. The next event recorded of Isaac is his weaning, probably (according to Eastern custom) when he was two years old (21:8, sq.). In honor of the occasion Abraham made a great feast, as an expression, no doubt, of his joy. This happiness was naturally shared by the mother and the friends of the parents. But ISHMAEL (q. v.) saw no occasion for gladness to him—being supplanted in the more peculiar honor of the house by this younger brother. He mocked (see NORAH) and so angered Sarah that she insisted upon his being sent away. (2) Offering. We are next informed of the event connected with the command of God to offer Isaac up as a sacrifice on a mountain in the land of Moriah (ch. 22), B. C. perhaps 2317. He was probably about sixteen years of age; according to Josephus (Ant., i, 13, 2) twenty-five. It appears from the narrative that Isaac was not aware that he was to be offered until the act was in process of being accomplished (Gen. 22:7, 8), and then there was no resistance; nor, so far as we are informed, did Isaac raise any objection. His conduct proved him to be a fitting type of Him who came to do not his own will, but the will of Him that sent him. (3) Marriage. A long gap occurs in the narrative of Isaac's life, and we hear nothing of him till his marriage to Rebekah. We may reasonably infer that a period of twenty years or more elapsed since the last event recorded concerning him; for his marriage took place after his mother's death, which occurred when Isaac was thirty-seven years old. In obedience to the command of Abraham, his trusty servant went to Mesopotamia to take, under divine direction, a partner from among his own kin for his son. Rebekah was chosen, and became the wife of Isaac when he was forty years of age (ch. 24), B. C. about 2193. (4) Death of Abraham.

fully trust the divine protection, but that he was led by his fears into an error. While dwelling in the neighborhood of Gerar he had the weakness to call Rebekah his sister, lest the people might kill him if they knew her to be his wife. Upon learning the truth Abimelech, the Philistine king, rebuked Isaac for his prevarication, but allowed him to remain in the land (26:1-11). (7) Later life. Isaac remained in the land of the Philistines, cultivated a portion of ground, and in the same year reaped a hundredfold. His flocks and herds multiplied greatly. This so excited the envy of the Philistines that they drove him from their territory. He reopened the wells which his father had digged, and which the Philistines had filled up; digging also several new ones, which they claimed as theirs. Withdrawing from one

The shaduf or draw-well. [See under "Irrigation."]

Previous to his death Abraham made a final distribution of his property, leaving to Isaac his possessions, while the sons of Hagar and Keturah were sent away with presents into the east country (Arabia). Isaac and Ishmael buried their father in the cave of Machpelah, and Isaac took up his residence "by the well Lahai-roi" (26:5-11). (5) Children. After about twenty years (B. C. about 2173), and in answer to prayer, Rebekah gave birth to two sons, Jacob and Esau (25:21, sq.). As the boys grew Isaac gave a preference to Esau, perhaps from his robust character, while Jacob, "a plain man, dwelling in tents," was the favorite of his mother. (6) Denies his wife. A famine in the land compelled Isaac to seek food in some foreign land, but he was admonished by God not to go down to Egypt, but to continue in the promised land. The Lord renewed the promise to him and to his seed, and confirmed the promise made to his father. Isaac did not so after another, he dug one which he was allowed to keep unmolested; and, in token of his satisfaction at the peace he enjoyed, he called it Rehoboth (Room, Gen. 26:12-22). Thence he returned to Beersheba, where the Lord appeared to him and repeated the covenant blessing. Abimelech also sought and obtained from Isaac a covenant of peace (26:24-33). When Esau was forty years of age, and Isaac a hundred, the former married Judith and Bashemath, daughters of Canaan, "which were a grief of mind to Isaac and Rebekah" (vers. 34, 35). (8) Isaac's blessing. The last prominent event in the life of Isaac is the blessing of his sons (27:1, sq.). Being old and dim of sight, and supposing that his death was near at hand, Isaac called Esau and requested him to take venison and to make him "savory meat," that he might eat and bless him before he died. Rebekah, hearing his request, sought to frustrate this intention, and to secure the blessing for Jacob. While Esau was absent, Rebekah prepared the "savory meat," and Jacob, disguised so as to resemble his hairy brother, deceived his father and obtained the blessing. Upon the discovery of the deception Isaac, remembering, no doubt, the prediction that "the elder should serve the younger," declined to revoke the words he had uttered, but bestowed an inferior blessing upon Esau. This so angered Esau that he seems to have looked forward to Isaac's death as affording an opportunity for taking vengeance upon his brother. The aged patriarch was therefore induced, at his wife's entreaty, to send Jacob into Mesopotamia, that he might take a wife "of the daughters of Laban" (27:41-28:6). (9) Death. After some time Jacob returned and found his father at Mamre, in "the city of Arba, which is Hebron, where Abraham and Isaac sojourned." Here Isaac died at the age of one hundred and eighty years, and was gathered unto his people, and his sons, Esau and Jacob, buried him (35:27-29), B. C. about 2053.

3. Character. Isaac was the worthy offspring of the chosen patriarch. He appears less a man of action than of suffering, from which he is generally delivered without any direct effort of his own. Thus he suffers as the object of Ishmael's mocking, of the intended sacrifice on Moriah, of the rapacity of the Philistines, and of Jacob's stratagem. He seems ever to be upheld by the tokens of God's favor, retaining his calmness and dignity as a conscious heir of the promises, and kept from commission of acts which would forfeit respect. He was modest, meditative, and retiring, full of sentiment and affection. While his life was not filled with stirring acts, yet, by its consistency and harmony, it won respect and envy from his contemporaries. Posterity always joined his name in equal honor with those of Abraham and Jacob.

NOTES.—(1) Ishmael mocking (Gen. 21:9). Various meanings are ascribed to the word (יִשְׁמָאֵל) translated "mocked." In Gal. 4:29 the apostle Paul refers to persecutions sustained by Isaac from Ishmael. Ellicott thinks that Paul accepted the tradition that Isaac suffered personal violence from Ishmael; Kell and Delitzsch (Com.) that Paul refers to Ishmael's mocking, making ridicule. "Isaac, the object of holy laughter, was made the butt of unholly wit or profane sport." (2) Offering of Isaac (Gen. 22). The only proper way is to consider this transaction as it is represented in the sacred page. The command, then, was expressly designed to try Abraham's faith. Religious perfection and his position alike demanded a perfect heart; hence the trial. If he were willing to surrender even his only child, and act himself both as an offerer and priest in the sacrifice of the required victim; if he could so far conquer his natural affections, so subdue the father in his heart, then there could be no doubt that his will was entirely submissive to God's, and that he was worthy of every trust, confidence, and honor. The trial was made, the fact was ascertained, but the victim was not slain (McC. and S., Cyc.). See art. ABRAHAM. (3) Denial of Rebekah (Gen. 28:1-11). This has been supposed to be a varying account of the transaction recorded of Abraham. But the name "Abimelech" occurring in both cases proves nothing, for Abimelech was probably the common title of the kings of Gerar (Haley, Discrepancies).

ISAIAH (Heb. יְשַׁעְיָהוּ, yesh-ah-yaw', or יְשַׁעְיָהוּ, yesh-ah-yaw'-ho, Jah has saved).

Personal History. Very little information has come to us respecting the history of Isaiah. His father's name was Amoz (Isa. 1:1), but of what tribe we do not know. Isaiah is thought to have lived in Jerusalem, near the temple (ch. 6), and married a prophetess, by whom he had a son named Maher-shalal-hash-baz (8:3); another son, Shear-jashub, being mentioned in 7:3. His dress was suitable to his vocation (20:2), viz., a coarse linen or hairy overcoat of a dark color, such as was worn by mourners. (1) Time of the prophet. Isaiah prophesied under the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. The first period of his ministry was in the reigns of Uzziah (B. C. 783-738) and Jotham 750-738 as regent, 738-735 sole ruler), in which he preached repentance without success, and, consequently, had to announce judgment and banishment. The second period extended from the commencement of the reign of Ahaz (735-719) to that of the reign of Hezekiah; the third from the accession of Hezekiah (719-705) to the fifteenth year of his reign. After this he took no further part in public affairs, but he lived till the commencement of Manasseh's reign, when, according to a credible tradition, he suffered martyrdom by being sawn asunder. To this Heb. 11:37 is supposed to be an allusion. The traditional spot of the martyrdom is a very old mulberry tree, which stands near the Pool of Siloam, on the slopes of Ophel, below the southeast wall of Jerusalem.

(2) Writings. Isaiah was the author of a biography of King Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:22), and of Hezekiah (32:32), as well as of the sublime prophecies that bear his name. Both biographies have been lost, together with the annals of Judah and Israel into which they had been inserted. He is by general consent the greatest of all Hebrew writers, and so fully does he describe the person and offices of the Messiah, that from the time of St. Jerome he has been known as the evangelical prophet. (3) Position. Isaiah appears to have held a high rank in Jerusalem, for Hezekiah, when sending a deputation to him, chose his highest officers and the elders of the priests (2 Kings 19:2). It is exceedingly probable that he was the head and chief of the prophetic order, holding in Jerusalem the same rank which Elisha had held in the prophetic schools in Israel. His authority greatly increased after the fulfillment of his prophecies by the Babylonian exile, the victories of Cyrus, and the deliverance of the covenant people. Even Cyrus was induced (Josephus, Ant., xl, 1, 1 and 2) to set the Jews at liberty by the prophecies of Isaiah concerning himself.

Concerning the opinion of a "second Isaiah," see BIBLE (Isaiah). See JESAJAH.

ISAIAH, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

IS'CAH (Heb. יִשְׂכָּרְיֹת, yis-kaw', watchful), the daughter of Haran, and sister of Milcah and Lot (Gen. 11:29; comp. v. 31). Jewish tradition, as in Josephus (Ant., i, 6, 5), Jerome and the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan identifies her with SARAH (q. v.).

ISCARIOT (Gr. Ἰσκαριώτης, is-kar-ee-ot'-tace, probably from Heb. אִישׁ קַרְיֹת, esh ker-ee-yoth', man of Kerioth), a surname of JUDAS (q. v.) the traitor, to distinguish him from others of the same name (Matt. 10:4, etc.).

ISH'BAH (Heb. יִשְׁבָּח, yish-bakh', he will praise), a descendant of Judah, and founder ("father") of Eshtemoa; he was probably a son of Mered by his wife Hodiah (1 Chron. 4:17). (See MERED.) He is perhaps the same as ISHI (q. v.) in v. 20, and apparently identical with the NAHAM (q. v.) of v. 19.

ISH'BAK (Heb. יִשְׁבַּק, yish-bawk', leaving), a son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32.) B. C. after 2233, and the progenitor of a tribe of northern Arabia. The settlements of this people are very obscure, perhaps in the valley of Sabak (called also Sibak), in the Dahna, a fertile and extensive tract, belonging to the Benee-Temeem, in Nejd, or the highland, of Arabia, on the northeast of it (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

ISH'BI-BENOB (Heb. יִשְׁבִּי בְנוֹב, yish-bee' beh-nobe', my seat is at Nob), one of the Rephaim, a gigantic warrior, "whose spear weighed three hundred shekels of brass," who attacked David, but was slain by Abishai (2 Sam. 21:16), B. C. about 965.

ISH'-BO'SHETH (Heb. אִישׁ-בֹּשֶׁת, eesh-bō'sheth, man of shame, i. e., bashful), the youngest of Saul's four sons (2 Sam. 2:8; 1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39; in the two later passages his name is given as Esh-Baal, "the man of Baal").

Personal History. (1) Succeeds Saul. Ish-bosheth was the only son who survived his father, his three brothers being slain with Saul in the battle of Gilboa, B. C. about 1000. Being the oldest of the royal family, he was, according to the law of oriental succession, the heir to the throne. His uncle, Abner, loyally espoused his cause, but the whole kingdom was in ruins; while hardly a single city west of the Jordan either could or would acknowledge the rule of the house of Saul. Abner, therefore, took Ish-bosheth beyond the Jordan, to the city Mahanaim, and announced him as Saul's successor (2 Sam. 2:8, 9). Abner appears to have first undertaken to reunite under his protection the country of the east, and then reconquer the territory subdued by the Philistines. The order in which these districts were retaken seem to be indicated in v. 9. While Abner was making these efforts some five years probably elapsed, leaving the length of Ish-bosheth's reign two years (v. 10). He was forty years old when he began to reign. Even the semblance of authority which he possessed he owed to the will and influence of Abner, who kept the real control of affairs in his own hands, carrying on all wars and negotiations with David (2 Sam. 2:12, sq.; 3:6-12). (2) Breaks with Abner. At length Ish-bosheth accused Abner (whether justly or not is not stated) of cohabiting with Rizpah, his father's concubine, which, according to oriental custom, was considered treason. When Ish-bosheth accused him of this he fell into a great rage, and announced his intention of handing over the kingdom to David. Ish-bosheth made no reply, "because he feared him." Soon after Abner made proposals to David, and the latter demanding Michal, his former wife, Ish-bosheth forced Phaltiel to give her up (3:12-16). While carrying on negotiations with David, Abner fell a victim to the resentment of Joab for the death of Asahel (v. 17, sq.). (3) Death. When Ish-bosheth heard that Abner was dead, "his hands were feeble," and he was soon after murdered, while taking his midday rest, by Rechab and Baana, probably to revenge a crime of his father, or in the hope of obtaining a reward from David. They met with a stern reception from that king, who rebuked them for the cold-blooded murder, and ordered them to be executed. The head of Ish-bosheth was buried in the sepulcher of Abner in Hebron (4:2-12), B. C. about 903.

ISH'I (Heb. יִשְׁעִי, yish-ee', salutary.)

1. The son of Appaim and father of Sheshan, and descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:31).

2. Another descendant of Judah, but through what line does not appear (1 Chron. 4:20); his sons were Zoheth and Ben-zoheth.

3. A Simeonite, four of whose sons led their brethren in the invasion of Mt. Seir, and the dis-possession of the Amalekites (1 Chron. 4:42), B. C. before 715.

4. One of the chiefs of Manasseh east, who were "mighty men of valor, famous men" (1 Chron. 5:24), B. C. about 720.

ISHI'AH (Heb. יִשְׁיָהוּ, yish-shee-yaw', Jehovah will lend), the fifth son of Izrahiah, great-grandson of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3).

ISHI'JAH (Hebrew same as above), one of the "sons" of Harim, who renounced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:31), B. C. 456.

ISH'MA (Heb. יִשְׁמָא, yish-maw', desolate), a descendant of Judah, given as one of the sons "of the father (founder) of Etam" (1 Chron. 4:3).

ISH'MAEL (Heb. יִשְׁמַעֵאל, yish-maw-ale', God will hear), the name of several men.

1. Son of Abraham (Gen. 16:15, 16).

Personal History. Ishmael was the eldest son of Abraham by Hagar, his Egyptian concubine, when the patriarch was eighty-six years old, fourteen years before the birth of Isaac (Gen. 21:5), B. C. 2248. The place of his birth was Mamre. (1) Circumcision. The next recorded event of his life is his circumcision, he then being thirteen years of age (Gen. 17:25), at which time the Lord renewed to Abraham in more definite terms the promises made to Abraham respecting Ishmael (v. 20). Up to this time Abraham appears to have considered Ishmael as the heir of promise, and to have entertained great affection for him (vers. 17, 18). (2) Expulsion. Ishmael is not mentioned again until the weaning of Isaac, when Ishmael was probably between fifteen and sixteen years of age. During the festivities of the occasion, Ishmael, angered doubtless by his blighted hopes, gave way to some insulting expressions of mockery. Sarah speedily detected him, and said to Abraham, "Cast out this bond-woman and her son: for the son of this bond-woman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac." Grieved at the demand of Sarah, he only yielded when influenced by a divine admonition. The beautiful and touching picture of Hagar's departure and journey is thus recorded: "And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away; and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lifted up her voice and wept" (Gen. 21:6-16). The Lord appeared to Hagar, opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water, and thus saved the life of the lad. Again the cheering promise is renewed to her of her son, "I will make him a great nation" (v. 18). (3) Marries. Thus miraculously preserved, the lad "grew and dwelt in the wilderness (Paran), and became an archer." It would seem to have been his mother's wish to return to Egypt, but this being prevented, she took him an Egyptian wife (Gen. 21:21). We have no account of Ishmael having any other wife, and if this be the case, she was the mother of twelve sons (Gen. 25:13-15) and one daughter. This daughter, being called the "sister of Nebajoth" (Gen. 28:9), the limitation of the percentage of the brother and sister seems to point to a different mother for Ishmael's other sons. (4) After life. Of this we know but little. Ishmael was present, with Isaac, at the burial of Abraham (Gen. 25:9), B. C. 2158. The sacred historian gives us a list of his twelve sons, tells us that Esau married his daughter Mahaloth (28:9), and closes up the brief sketch in these words: "And these are the years of the life of Ishmael, a hundred and thirty and seven years: and he gave up the ghost and died, and was gathered unto his people. And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria: and he died in the presence of all his brethren" (25:17, 18), B. C. 2111.

Character. Ishmael appears to have been a wild and wayward child, and doubtless the perfect freedom of desert life, and intercourse with those who looked upon him as heir-apparent of their great chief, tended to make him impatient of restraint, and overbearing in his temper. His harsh treatment by Sarah, his disappointment in not becoming the heir of Abraham, and the necessity of earning a scanty living by his sword and bow, would naturally wound his proud spirit and make him what the angel had predicted, "A wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him" (16:12).

NOTE.—Gen. 16:12. Kell (Com.) considers the expression, "He shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren," to mean that "Ishmael would maintain an independent standing before all the descendants of Abraham," and adds: "The Ishmaelites have continued to this day in free and undiminished possession of the extensive peninsula between the Euphrates, the Straits of Suez, and the Red Sea, from which they have overspread both Northern Africa and Southern Asia." Smith (Cycl.) says that the passage "seems only to signify that he dwelt near them," which view, Dr. Strong (McC. and S., Cycl.) says, "is confirmed by the circumstance that the Israelites did, in fact, occupy the country bordering that in which the various tribes descended from Abraham or Terah had settled—the Ishmaelites, Edomites, Midianites, Ammonites, etc." Gen. 21:14. The age of Ishmael at the time of his expulsion has given occasion to considerable discussion. He was doubtless thirteen years of age (Gen. 17:25) at the time of his circumcision, and the time of his expulsion was about two or three years later (Gen. 21:5-8). The translation of Gen. 21:14, which seems to speak of Ishmael as an infant is infelicitous. It is unnecessary to assume that the child was put on Hagar's shoulder, the construction of the Hebrew not requiring it; and the sense of the passage rendering it highly improbable. Hagar carried "it," the bottle, on her shoulder. The fact of the lad being overcome by thirst and fatigue before his hardy Egyptian mother, is not remarkable, especially when we remember God's miraculous interposition in her behalf.

2. Son of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Meribbaal, or Mephibosheth (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44), B. C. before 588.

3. A man of Judah, whose son (or descendant), Zebadiah, was "ruler of the house of Judah," under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19:11), B. C. about 875. The office of "ruler," etc., was that of lay president of the supreme court in Jerusalem.

4. Son of Jehohanan, of Judah, and captain of a "hundred," who assisted Jehoiada in restoring Joash to the throne (2 Chron. 23:1), B. C. 836.

5. One of the "sons" of Pashur, who relinquished his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:22), B. C. 456.

6. Murderer of Gedaliah, who was the superintendant, under the king of Babylon, of the province of Judea. His full description is "Ishmael, the son of Nathaniah, the son of Elishama, of the seed royal" of Judah (Jer. 41:1; 2 Kings 25:25). "Whether he was actually a son of Zedekiah or a king, or more generally, that he had royal blood in his veins—we cannot tell." (2) Crime. During the siege of Jerusalem he, like many others of his countrymen (Jer. 40:11), had fled across the Jordan, where he found a refuge at the court of Baalis, then king of Bene-Ammon (Josephus, Ant., x, 9, 2). Gedaliah had taken up his residence at Mizpah, a few miles N. of Jerusalem, where the prophet Jeremiah resided with him (Jer. 40:6). Ishmael had been instigated by Baalis to slay Gedaliah (v. 14), and his intention was made known by Johanan who offered to put Ishmael to death. To this Gedaliah would not consent, and a short time after, Ishmael and ten companions, "princes of the king," came to him and were by him entertained at a feast (vers. 15, 16). He returned the kindness shown him by murdering Gedaliah and all his attendants, including some Chaldean soldiers who were there. So secretly was the deed executed that for two days it remained undiscovered. On the second day he saw a party of eighty devotees, bringing incense and offerings to the temple, who, at his invitation, turned aside to the residence of Gedaliah. As they passed into the city he closed the gates and slew all but ten, who escaped by the offer of heavy ransoms. He then carried off the daughters of King Zedekiah, and the people of the town, and started for the country of the Ammonites. The massacre was soon made known, and Ishmael was quickly followed by Johanan and his companions, who "found him by the great waters that are in Gibeon" (41:1-12), B. C. 588. Ishmael, with eight of his men, escaped, and went to the Ammonites. Nothing more is recorded of this marvel of craft and villainy.

ISH'MAELITE (Heb. יִשְׁמַעֲלִי, hah-yish-maw-ay-lee', 1 Chron. 2:17; יִשְׁמַעֲלֵי, hah-yesh-meh-ay-lee', 27:30; יִשְׁמַעֲלִים, yish-meh-ay-leem', Gen. 37:25; Judg. 8:24; Psa. 83:6; יִשְׁמַעֲלִים, hah-yish-meh-ay-leem', Gen. 37:27, 28; 39:1), a descendant of Ishmael. The term is probably sometimes used as a general name for all the Abrahamic peoples from Egypt to the Euphrates, and perhaps to the Persian Gulf, their headquarters being in western Arabia. In Gen. 37:25, 27, 28 the name "Ishmaelites" may have been applied in general to the caravan, which included a body of Midianite merchantmen. The same relation may exist in Judg. 8:22, 24; in v. 24 that kind of traders may have been called "Ishmaelites" as the name CANAANITES (q. v.) was used for merchants, since the Ishmaelites were caravan traders from the remotest times.

Mohammed claimed descent from Ishmael. Though, in the confusion of the Arab genealogies, the names are lost beyond the twenty-first generation before the prophet, the claim is probable enough, since the pre-Mohammedan law of blood revenge, which required every one to know his ancestors for four generations back, would prevent all confusion in regard to race. And, after making due allowance of mixture with Joktanites and Keturahites, we may fairly regard the Arabs as essentially an Ishmaelite race.

In 2 Sam. 17:25 Amasa, Absalom's commander-in-chief, was the son of "Ithra an Israelite," but in 1 Chron. 2:17 "the father of Amasa was Jether the Ishmaelite." If one reading is wrong, "Ishmaelite" is more likely to be correct, inasmuch as the fact of Amasa's father being an Israelite would be too common to demand special mention. But, "according to Jardri, Jether was an Israelite, dwelling in the land of Ishmael, and thence acquired his surname, like the house of Obed-edom the Gittite." Or, as there were Israelites who bore the name of Ishmael (see especially 1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44; also 2 Chron. 19:11; 23:1; Ezra 10:22; 2 Kings 25:23-25; Jer. 40:8-41:15), it might well be that Jether or Ithra was descended from some Israelite named Ishmael.—W. H.

ISHMA'IAH (Heb. יִשְׁמַעְיָהוּ, yish-mah-yaw', Jah will hear), son of Obadiah, and ruler of the tribe of Zebulun in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:19), B. C. 1000.

ISH'MEELITE (Gen. 37:25, 27, 28; 39:1; 1 Chr. 2:17). See ISHMAELITE.

ISH'MERAI (Heb. יִשְׁמַרְיָהוּ, yish-mer-ah'ee, preservative), one of the family of Elpaal, a chief Benjamite resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:18), B. C. before 588.

ISHOD (Heb. יֵשׁוּד, eesh-hode', man of renown), a son of Hammoleketh, and, from his near connection with Gillead, probably an important person (1 Chron. 7:18).

ISH'PAN (Heb. יִשְׁפָּן, yish-paw'n, he will hide), one of the "sons" of Shashak, a chief Benjamite residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:22), B. C. before 588.

ISH'-TOB (Heb. אִישׁ-טוֹב, eesh-tobe', man of Tob), "apparently one of the small kingdoms or states which formed part of the general country of Aram (2 Sam. 10:6, 8)" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). Keil and Delitzsch (Com.) say "אִישׁ-טוֹב is not to be taken as one word and rendered as a proper noun, . . . but 'the men of Tob.' Tob was the district between Syria and Ammonitis, where Jephthah had formerly taken refuge."

ISH'UAH (Heb. יִשְׁוֵה, yish-vaw', he will level), the second named of the sons of Asher (Gen. 46:17; 1 Chron. 7:30, A. V. "Isuah"), B. C. about 1640. He appears to have left no issue (comp. Num. 26:44).

ISH'UAI (1 Chron. 7:30). See ISHUI, 1.

ISH'UI (Heb. יִשְׁוֵי, yish-vee', level), the name of two men.

1. The name is given as Isui (Gen. 46:17), Jesui (Num. 26:44), and Ishuai (1 Chron. 7:30), the third son of Asher, and founder of the family of "Jesuites," B. C. about 1640.

2. The second named of Saul's sons by Ahinoam (1 Sam. 14:49; comp. v. 50). In the list of Saul's genealogy, in 1 Chron., chaps. 8, 9, his name is omitted. Some, therefore, claim that he died young. In 1 Sam. 31:2 his place is occupied by Abinadab, with whom others identify him.

ISLAND, ISLE (Heb. יָם, ee).

1. The radical sense of the Hebrew word seems to be "habitable places," as opposed to water, and in this sense it occurs in Isa. 42:15, "I will make the rivers islands."

2. Any maritime district, whether belonging to a continent or to an island; thus it is used of the shore of the Mediterranean (Isa. 20:6; 23:2, 6), and of the coasts of Elishah (Ezek. 27:7), i. e., of Greece and Asia Minor. In this sense it is more particularly restricted to the shores of the Mediterranean, sometimes in the fuller expression, "islands of the sea" (Isa. 11:11). Occasionally the word is specifically used of an island, as of Caphtor or Crete (Jer. 47:4). But more generally it is applied to any region separated from Palestine by water, as fully described in Jer. 25:22.

The "many isles" (Ezek. 27:3) may have been the islands and coasts of Arabia, on the Persian Gulf and Erythraean Sea.

ISMACHI'AH (Heb. יִסְמַחְיָהוּ, yis-mak-yaw-hoo', Jah will sustain), one of the Levites charged by Hezekiah with the superintendence of the sacred offerings under the general direction of the high priest and others (2 Chron. 31:13), B. C. 719.

ISMATAH (Heb. יִשְׁמַתְיָהוּ, yish-mah-yah', Jehovah hears), a Gibeonite, one of the chiefs of the warriors who joined themselves to David when he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), B. C. before 1000. He is described as "a hero (Gibbor) among the thirty and over the thirty," i. e., David's body-guard, but his name does not appear in the lists of the guard in 2 Sam., ch. 23, and 1 Chron., ch. 11. Possibly he was killed in some encounter before David reached the throne (Smith).

IS'PAH (Heb. יִשְׁפָּה, yish-paw', he will scratch), one of the "sons" of Beriah, a chief Benjamite (originally from the neighborhood of Aijalon) resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:16), B. C. before 588.

IS'RAEL (Heb. יִשְׂרָאֵל, yis-raw-ale', having power with God, or God's fighter; Gr. Ἰσραήλ, is-rah-ale').

1. Jacob, the name conferred by the angel Jehovah upon JACOB (q. v.) at Peniel (Gen. 32:28).

2. Israelites, i. e., the whole people of Israel, the twelve tribes; called the children of Israel (Josh. 3:17; 7:25; Judg. 8:27; Jer. 3:21); the house of Israel (Exod. 16:31; 40:38); in Israel (1 Sam. 9:9); and land of Israel (1 Sam. 13:19; 2 Kings 6:23). Sometimes the whole nation is represented as one person: "Israel is my son" (Exod. 4:22; Num. 20:14; Isa. 41:8; 42:24; 43:1, 15; 44:1, 5). Israel is sometimes put emphatically for the true Israelites, the faithful, those distinguished for piety and virtue (Psa. 73:1; Isa. 45:17; John 1:47; Rom. 9:6; 11:26; Gal. 6:16). In the expression (Isa. 49:3), "Thou art my servant, O Israel," Christ is undoubtedly referred to.

Israelites was the usual name of the twelve tribes, from their leaving Egypt until after the death of Saul, but after the defection of the ten tribes they arrogated to themselves the name of the whole nation (2 Sam. 2:9, 10, 17, 28; 3:10, 17; 19:40-43; 1 Kings 12:1). The kings of the ten tribes were called kings of Israel, and the descendants of David, who ruled over Judah and Benjamin, were known as kings of Judah; and in the prophets of that period Judah and Israel are put in opposition (Hos. 4:15; 5:3, 5; 6:10; 7:1; 8:2, 3, 6, 8; 9:1, 7; Amos 1:1; 2:6; 3:14; Mic. 1:5; Isa. 5:7). Yet in Isa. 8:14 the two kingdoms are called the "houses of Israel."

After the Babylonish captivity the returned exiles, though mainly of Judah, resumed the name of Israel as the designation of their nation, but as individuals they are called Jews in the Apocrypha and New Testament. The expression "to all Israel in Judah and Benjamin" (2 Chron. 11:3) characterizes all who had remained true to the house of David as Israel, i. e., those who walked in the footsteps of their progenitor Israel (Jacob) (Keil, Com., in loc.).

Israel seems to have been used to distinguish laymen from priests, Levites, and other ministers (Ezra 6:16; 9:1; Neh. 11:3).

IS'RAEL, CLASSIFICATION. See ISRAEL, CONSTITUTION OF.

IS'RAEL, CONSTITUTION OF. Properly to understand this subject it must be remembered that the Israelites are sometimes spoken of as one of the nations, and with a civil constitution. At other times they are mentioned as the people adopted into covenant with Jehovah, when reference is made to the theocratic constitution.

1. The Civil Constitution. This had respect to the classification of the people, succession and right of inheritance (q. v.), land (q. v.), and property.

Classification. The nation, in virtue of its descent from the twelve sons of Israel, formed a great family called "the house of Israel" (Heb. בֵּית יִשְׂרָאֵל, bayth yis-raw-ale'). Genealogically it was divided (Josh. 7:14, 16-18) into:

(1) Tribes (Heb. מַטֵּה, mat-teh', or שֵׁבֶט, shay'-bet, both meaning branch, the former term being applied to the tribe in its genealogical branches, the latter as being under one scepter). Tribal divisions are found among many ancient peoples, as the Edomites, Ishmaelites, Arabs, etc. The Hebrew tribes were founded by the twelve sons of JACOB (q. v.) as the tribal fathers of the people. An exception to this rule was made in the case of Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, they being raised to the position of heads of tribes, having been adopted by Israel as his sons (Gen. 48:5). This would make, strictly speaking, thirteen tribes, but only twelve are uniformly reckoned (see Exod. 24:4; Josh. 4:2, sq., etc.), because Levi, as intrusted with the service of worship, occupied a mediatorial position between Jehovah and Israel; consequently no special tribal territory was allotted to them (Josh. 13:14, 33), but they dwelt in towns scattered through all the other twelve tribes. When the Levites were so reckoned Ephraim and Manasseh are included together as the tribe of Joseph (Num. 26:28; comp. v. 57; Josh. 17:14, 17). This tribal organization was still further established and completed by the giving of the land of Canaan to the Israelites according to their tribes, clans, and fathers' houses. Such a firm root did this organization take that it survived the troublous times of the judges, and was not dissolved by the introduction of the monarchy. We find the heads of tribes exercising great influence on the election of kings (1 Sam. 8:4, sq.; 10:20, sq.; 2 Sam. 3:17, sq.; 5:1, sq.), consulted by them on all important state affairs (1 Kings 8:1; 20:7; 2 Kings 23:1), and sometimes asserting their influence with great energy (1 Kings, ch. 12). Though the tribal organization lost its firm basis with the carrying away of the people into exile, the elders maintained the internal administration and guidance of the people both in and after the exile (Jer. 20:1; Ezek. 14:1-5; 20:1). In the prophetic vision which Israel had of the future condition of his sons (Gen. 49:3, sq.), he thus enumerates them: 1. Reuben, the first-born; 2. Simon, and, 3. Levi, instruments of cruelty; 4. Judah, whom his brethren shall praise; 5. Zebulun, dwelling at the haven of the sea; 6. Issachar, a strong ass; 7. Dan, the judge; 8. Gad, overcome and overcoming; 9. Asher, whose bread shall be fat; 10. Naphtali, a hind let loose, giving goodly words; 11. Joseph, a fruitful bough; 12. Benjamin, a wolf. In this enumeration it is remarkable that the subsequent division of the tribe of Joseph into the two branches of Ephraim and Manasseh is not yet alluded to. Respecting the vexed question of the territory occupied by the several tribes, see LAND; PALESTINE.

(2) Families or clans (Heb. מִשְׁפָּחוֹת, mish-pav-khoth', circle of relatives), the first subdivision under tribes, founded from the beginning by Jacob's grandchildren (the sons of his own or adopted sons), and also by grandchildren and great-grandchildren of the twelve heads of the tribes. Of the fifty-seven of the families into which the twelve tribes were divided in the last year of their wilderness travels (Num. 26) two belonging to Judah were formed by his grandchildren (v. 21); to Manasseh one family founded by his grandson Gilead, and six by Gilead's sons or Manasseh's great-grandsons (vers. 29-38); to Ephraim, a family founded by his grandson Eran (v. 36); to Benjamin, two families by his grandchildren, the sons of Bela (v. 40); and to Asher, two families by his grandchildren, the sons of Beriah (v. 45). The principle according to which not only sons but grandsons and great-grandsons were raised to be founders of families is unknown.

(3) Households (Heb. בַּיִת, bah'-yith, house; בַּיִת אָב, bayth awb, house of father), a technical expression denoting the larger subdivisions or family groups into which the "families" (clans) fell. "Father's house" also denotes that family which had the primacy in every tribe or family, or that house which belonged to the father of a tribe or his representative in each division of the people.

(4) Men (Heb. אִישׁ, gheh'-ber, a person), fathers with wife and child.

Government. "According to patriarchal custom, the fathers, standing by-right of birth (primogeniture) at the head of the several tribes and divisions of tribes, regulated the relations of the tribes and clans, directed their common affairs, settled disputes as they arose, punished offenses and crimes, and administered law and equity. By founding clans grandchildren were often put on an equality with sons; the heads of clans and fathers' houses gradually attained to almost equal authority and standing with the heads of tribes, for each governed within his own circle, as far as was possible in that state of servitude to which the Israelites were gradually reduced in Egypt. Thus from the heads of tribes, clans, and families proceeded elders (q. v.), who, even before the time of Moses, formed the superiors of the people" (Keil, Arch., ii, 312, sq.).

2. Theocratic Constitution. As we have already seen, the Israelites possessed in their tribal constitution the elements of a state, and it was not until their adoption into covenant with Jehovah, the Lord of the whole earth (Exod. 19:5), that they received through Moses the laws and ordinances for the kingdom which they were to establish in Canaan. This constitution is called a theocracy (Gr. θεοκρατία, rule of God), and has its root in the peculiar relation into which Jehovah entered with the people of Israel, whom he chose to carry out his purposes of redemption (Psa. 44:4; 68:24; 74:12; Isa. 43:14, 15). According to Keil (Arch., pp. 320, 321), the theocracy "consists essentially in these three things: (a) God himself, as Lawgiver, orders or modifies the relations of the religious and common life of the people by immediate revelation given to Moses. (b) He takes into his own hand the control and government of the Israelitish state or kingdom, in that he is ever really present to his people, makes known his will in important state affairs by the Urim and Thummim, by prophets, and, when necessary, interposes in a miraculous way, judging, punishing, blessing. (c) Finally he raises up for the people the needed leaders and rulers, and furnishes them with the power required for their office. Thus all the human superiors of the Israelites were, in the strictest sense of the word, servants and representatives of God, who had only to carry out his law, to execute his will. The one Lord and sovereign was Jehovah, the covenant God, who, as Lawgiver, supreme Judge and Ruler of his people, united in himself all the powers constituting the state, and directed them by his servants."

Under the theocracy we find that Jehovah called Moses to be the organ of his will in the giving of the law; that the judicial power was intrusted to the princes of the tribes and elders of the congregation (see CLASSIFICATION, above; ELDERS); the executive was held sometimes by the princes of the tribes, sometimes by men called of Jehovah in extraordinary cases to lead and govern the people, and invested with sovereign power; the priesthood, with the high priest at its head, stood before the congregation or its individual members and Jehovah in religious matters; and, lastly, as a check to the overstraining of priestly power, and to all hierarchal ambition, were the prophets, who, with divine authority and power, and without respect of persons, admonished all ranks to keep within the limits of the law.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF. An earthly kingdom was not incompatible with the theocracy (q. v.), if the kings submitted unconditionally to the will of Jehovah, and, as earthly representatives of his sovereignty, wished only to execute his laws and judgments. It was not the original intention of Jehovah to leave his people as sheep without a shepherd, but to set over them a man who should lead them (Num. 27:16, sq.), as he gave them Moses and Joshua, and afterward judges from Othniel to Samuel. Knowing that Israel would long for a king, God gave a promise to the patriarchs that kings should go forth from their loins (Gen. 17:6, 16; 35:11); this promise was renewed by Moses (Deut. 28:36), and a law given relating to the king (17:14-20), whereby the earthly kingdom was incorporated in the theocracy.

1. Law of Kingdom. This law (Deut. 17:14, sq.) does not prescribe an earthly kingdom, but only arranges for such if desired by Israel. It provides that (1) one of their own people, and not a stranger, shall be chosen; (2) That he shall not multiply horses, i. e., strengthen his power by a standing army; (3) "Neither shall he multiply wives," that would serve to gratify lust and give oriental splendor to his court (comp. 1 Kings 11:3); (4) He shall carefully study the law, a copy of which was to be given him, and guide his rule thereby. This "law of the kingdom" was proclaimed by Samuel, written "in a book, and laid up before the Lord" (1 Sam. 10:25).

Still further, the king set by Jehovah over his people was not a constitutional prince elected by the people, but was independent. He owed his selection to God, and was dependent upon him alone, and was bound to carry out the Mosaic law, and follow out the will of Jehovah as made known by his prophets (1 Sam. 10:24; 16:1, 13; 13:13; 15:26, sq.). Thus Saul and afterward David were chosen by Jehovah to be princes over Israel, and anointed by Samuel to their office.

The kingdom was not firmly established under truly theocratic meaning by Saul. He unduly exalted himself, and was rejected because of his opposition to the will of Jehovah (see SAUL). DAVID (q. v.), on the contrary, was always faithful to the theocratic idea, and carefully watched over its institutions. Thus the earthly kingdom became the visible representation of Jehovah's sovereignty over Israel.

The kingdom, although intended to be hereditary as among other peoples (Deut. 17:20; comp. 1 Sam. 13:13), first became so under David in virtue of the divine promise (2 Sam. 7:12, sq.). The law of succession was that the eldest or first-born son followed his father on the throne (2 Chron. 21:3), though not without exceptions (2 Chron. 11:22; 2 Kings 23:34). If the successor was a minor a regency intervened, or the queen mother acted as sovereign (1 Kings 15:13), or the high priest became guardian (2 Kings 12:2).

2. Administration. Kings, as the "anointed of the Lord," were considered by the people as holy persons (1 Sam. 24:7, 11; 26:11, 16, 23; 2 Sam. 1:16) without being deified, or becoming inaccessible to their subjects. In the highest cases of appeal they pronounced sentence personally (2 Sam. 15:2; 1 Kings 3:9, 16, sq.), usually led their army in war (1 Sam. 12:2, sq.; 2 Sam. 5:6, etc.), and publicly arranged for and conducted festivals (1 Sam., ch. 6; 1 Kings, ch. 8).

3. Officials. As a bodyguard the kings had the CHERETHITES (q. v.) and PELETHITES (q. v.), who also executed the sentences pronounced by them (2 Sam. 15:18; 20:7, etc.). They were supported in their administration by many officials who served as princes (1 Kings 4:2), or counselors. In 2 Sam. 8:16-18; 20:23-26; 1 Chron. 27:32-34 and 1 Kings 4:1-6 the following officials are named: (a) The head of the army, or commander-in-chief; (b) The commander of the Cherethites and Pelethites; (c) The recorder, probably the keeper of the state archives; (d) The scribe, or secretary of state; (e) The high priest; (f) Privy counselors (Cohanim, or friends of the king), called also "chief about the king" (1 Chron. 18:17), "old men that stood before Solomon" (1 Kings 12:6), "them that were in the king's presence" (2 Kings 25:19; Jer. 52:25); (g) The overseer of public works (1 Kings 5:16); (h) The royal treasurer, i. e., having charge of the treasures in Jerusalem, with assistant treasurers having charge of the royal fields, vineyards, flocks, etc. (1 Chron. 27:25-31, besides "officers" who acted as chief tax collectors (1 Kings 4:7-19); (i) The court marshal, or prefect of the palace (v. 5). There were also the cupbearer (10:5), keeper of the wardrobe (2 Kings 10:22), and inferior servants.

In addition, after the fashion of oriental courts, but at variance with the law (Deut. 17:17), there were a large number of wives and concubines (2 Sam. 5:13; 1 Kings 11:3; 2 Chron. 11:21), who, on the death of the king, became the property of his successor (2 Sam. 12:8).

4. Revenue. This was derived from the following sources: (a) Voluntary gifts from subjects (1 Sam. 10:27; 16:20), and from foreign visitors (1 Kings 10:10, 25; 2 Chron. 32:23); (b) Regular contributions made by subjects (1 Kings 4:7; comp. 1 Sam. 17:25); (c) Tribute paid by subject peoples (2 Sam. 8:2; 2 Kings 3:4; Isa. 16:1); (d) The share of spoil taken in war (2 Sam. 8:11; 12:30); (e) The produce of the royal domains, i. e., of the fields, vineyards, flocks, etc. (1 Chron. 27:25, sq.; 2 Chron. 26:10), and the gain by commerce, etc. (1 Kings 10:11, 14, 22).

5. Continuance. Israel, as the legitimate kingdom, lasted until the destruction of the state by the Chaldees, but the apostate ten tribes, revolting under the lead of Jeroboam, perished much earlier (see CHRONOLOGY). Respecting Israel as a separate kingdom, see HISTORY, OLD TESTAMENT.

IS'SACHAR (Heb. יִשָּׂשכָר, strictly yis-sau-sawr), but usually yis-saw-kawr, he will bring reward).

1. The Ninth Son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah (Gen. 30:16), B. C. before 2000. He was born at Padan-aram, and but little is recorded of him.

2. The Tribe of Issachar. (1) Numbers. At the descent into Egypt four sons are ascribed to him, who founded the four chief families of the tribe (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23, 25; 1 Chron. 7:1). The number of fighting men, when the census was taken at Sinai, was fifty-four thousand four hundred, ranking fifth (Num. 1:28, 29); at the second census the number had increased to sixty-four thousand three hundred, ranking third (26:25). (2) Position. Issachar's place during the journey to Canaan was on the east of the tabernacle, with his brothers Judah and Zebulun (2:3-8). At this time the captain of the tribe was Nethaneel, the son of Zuar (1:8). He was succeeded by Igal, the son of Joseph, who went as one of the spies (13:7), and he again by Paltiel, the son of Azzan, who assisted Joshua in apportioning the land of Canaan (34:26). (3) Territory. The allotment of Issachar lay above that of Manasseh. The specification of its boundaries and contents is contained in Josh. 19:17-23. (4) Subsequent history. Jacob's prophecy, "Issachar is a strong ass crouching down between two burdens; and he saw that rest was good, . . . and became a servant unto tribute" (Gen. 49:14, 15), was fulfilled by Issachar paying tribute to the various marauding tribes attracted to its territory by the richness of the crops.

3. One of the Korhite Levites, seventh son of Obed-edom, and one of the doorkeepers of the house of the Lord (1 Chron. 26:5).

ISSHI'AH (Heb. יִשִּׁי'אֵה, yish-shee-yaw, lent by Jehovah), the name of two men.

1. The first of the sons of Rehabiah, and great-grandson of Moses (1 Chron. 24:21; comp. 26:25, where he is called Jeshiah).

2. The second son of Uzziel (grandson of Levi), and father of Zechariah (1 Chron. 24:25; comp. 23:20, where he is called Jesiah).

ISSUE. This term has the meaning of offspring (Gen. 48:6; Matt. 22:25); of anything ignoble, worthless, and is applied to the large and hitherto ignoble family of Eliakim, who would fasten upon him and climb through him to honor (Isa. 22:24); and of the emission of a stallion, to whom the idolatrous paramours of Judah are compared (Ezek. 23:20). See DISEASES.

IS'UAH (1 Chron. 7:30). See ISHUAH.

IS'UI (Gen. 46:17). See ISHUI, 1.

ITAL'IAN (Gr. Ἰταλικός, ee-tal-ee-kos', of or from Italy, Acts 10:1). This only mention of the name in Scripture is in connection with the "band" to which Cornelius belonged. It was probably a cohort of Italians separate from the legionary soldiers, and not of the Italian Legion.

IT'ALY, (Gr. Ἰταλία, ee-tal-ee'-ah), occurs five times in Scripture (Acts 18:2; 27:1, 6; Heb. 13:24, and subscription). From these passages we have testimony respecting the Jewish colony in Italy, the commerce between it and Asia, and the spread of Christianity. The Italy of the New Testament denotes the whole natural peninsula between the Alps and the Straits of Messina.

ITCH. See DISEASES.

IT'HAJ (1 Chron. 11:31). See ITTAI.

IT'H'AMAR (Heb. יִתְחָמָר, eeth-aw-mawr', palm-coast, Gesenius; little, Fürst), the fourth and youngest son of Aaron (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 1 Chron. 6:3), B. C. perhaps before 1210. He was consecrated to the priesthood along with his brothers (Num. 3:3), and after the death of Nadab and Abihu, they leaving no children (Num. 3:4), he and Eleazar were appointed to their places in the priestly office (Lev. 10:6, 12; Num. 3:4; 1 Chron. 24:2). We learn nothing more of Ithamar, save that the property of the tabernacle (the curtains, hangings, pillars, cords, and boards) was placed under his charge (Exod. 38:21), and that he superintended its removal by the Gershonites and Merarites (Num. 4:28, 33). Ithamar with his descendants occupied the position of common priests till the high priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eli, under circumstances of which we are ignorant. Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed, was the last high priest of that line, and the pontificate reverted to the elder line of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 Kings 2:27). A priest by the name of Daniel, of Ithamar's posterity, returned from Babylon (Ezra 8:2).

IT'H'EL (Heb. יִתְחֵל, eeth-ee-ale', God with me).

1. The son of Jesaiah and father of Maaseiah, a Benjamite, one of whose posterity returned with a party from Babylon (Neh. 11:7), B. C. long before 536.

2. A person mentioned along with Ucal in Prov. 30:1, to whom the words of Agur's prophecy was addressed.

IT'H'MAH (Heb. יִתְחָמָה, yith-maw', orphanage), a Moabite, and one of David's supplementary bodyguard (1 Chron. 11:46), B. C. 950.

IT'H'NAN (Heb. יִתְחָנָן, yith-nawn', extensive), one of the cities of south Judah (Josh. 15:23), not identified.

IT'H'RA (Heb. יִתְחָרָה, yith-raw', excellence), an Israelite (but more correctly an Ishmaelite, according to 1 Chron. 2:17, where he is called Jether), and father of Amasa (David's general) by Abigail, David's sister (2 Sam. 17:25; 1 Kings 2:5), B. C. before 1000.

IT'H'KAN (Heb. יִתְחָקָן, yith-rawn', excellent).

1. One of the sons of Dishou, grandson of Seir (36) the Horite (Gen. 36:26; comp. v. 30; 1 Chron. 1:41).

2. One of the sons of Zophah, the great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37). Perhaps the same as Jether, in v. 38.

IT'H'REAM (Heb. יִתְחָרֵם, yith-reh-awm', residue of the people), David's sixth son, born of Eglah in Hebron (2 Sam. 3:5; 1 Chron. 3:3), B. C. about 1000.

IT'H'RITE (Heb. יִתְחָרֵי, yith-ree'), the descendants of a Jether resident in Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:53). David's heroes, Ira and Gareb (11:40; 2 Sam. 23:38) belonged to the family of JETHER (q. v.).

IT'TAH-KA'ZIN (Heb. יִתְחָצִין, ayth kaw-tseen', time of a judge), a city, near the eastern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13), not identified.

IT'TAI (Heb. יִתְחָי, it-tah'ee, timely).

1. "Ittai the Gittite," i. e., a native of Gath, a Philistine in the army of David, who first appeared on the morning of David's flight from Absalom and Jerusalem. The king saw him coming with those who remained faithful, and besought him as "a stranger, and also as an exile, and as one who had but recently joined his service, to return and not ally himself to a doubtful cause. But Ittai declared himself to be the king's slave (A. V. 'servant'), and determined to share his master's fortunes. He was allowed to proceed, and passed over the Kedron with the king and his company (2 Sam. 15:19, sq.), B. C. 970. When the army was numbered and organized by David at Mahanaim, Ittai appeared in command of a third part of the force, and seems to have enjoyed equal rank with Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. 18:2, 5, 12). We learn nothing more of Ittai, excepting traditions and speculations which seem very improbable" (Smith, Dict.).

2. The son of Ribai, a Benjamite of Gibeah, one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. 23:29). In the parallel list of 1 Chron. 11:31 the name is given as Ithai.

ITURÆ'A (Gr. Ἰτρουραία, ee-too-rah'-yah), a small province on the northwestern border of Palestine, lying along the base of Mount Hermon, and a portion of the tetrarchy of Philip (Luke 3:1). It is very difficult to define the limits of Ituræa. "Luke's reference is ambiguous, and we have no modern echo of the name to guide us" (Smith, Hist. Geog.).

"Jetur, the son of Ishmael, gave his name, like the rest of his brethren, to the little province he colonized (Gen. 25:15, 16). Ituræa, with the adjoining provinces, fell into the hands of a chief called Zenodorus; but about B. C. 20 they were taken from him by the Roman emperor, and given to Herod the Great, who bequeathed them to his son Philip (Luke 3:1). Pliny rightly places Ituræa north of Bashan and near Damascus (v. 23), and J. de Vitry describes it as adjoining Trachonitis and lying along the base of Libanus, between Tiberias and Damascus. At the place indicated is situated the modern province of Jedâr, which is just the Arabic form of the Hebrew Jetur. It is bounded on the East by Trachonitis, on the south by Gaulanitis, on the west by Hermon, and on the north by the plain of Damascus" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

IVAH (Heb. יְוָה, iv-vav', or אֲוָה, av-vav', 2 Kings 17:24, an overturning), one of the cities of the Assyrians, from which they brought colonists to repeople Samaria (2 Kings 18:34; 19:13; comp. Isa. 37:13); called AVA (q. v.) in 2 Kings 17:24.

IVORY was imported into Tyre by "men of Dedan" (Ezek. 27:15) and "ships of Tarshish" (1 Kings 10:22), and used in ornamenting houses, constructing furniture, etc., as in the present day in the East. The tusks are called "horns" (Ezek. 27:15).

IZEHAR (Num. 3:19), the same as Izhar.

IZEHARITES. See IZHARITES.

IZ'HAR (Heb. יִצְהָר, yits-hawr', anointing), the second son of Kohath, the son of Levi and father of Korah (Exod. 6:18, 21; Num. 16:1; 1 Chron. 6:2, 18, 38; 23:12, 18). In Num. 3:19, the name is given "Izebar." His descendants are called Izharites, B. C. about 1210.

IZ'HARITES, a family of Kohathite Levites, descended from Izhar, the son of Kohath (1 Chron. 24:22; 26:23, 29), and rendered Izebarites in Num. 3:27).

IZRAHI'AH (Heb. יִזְרָחִיאַח, yiz-rakh-yaw', Jah will bring forth).

1. The son of Uzzi and great-grandson of Is-sachar (1 Chron. 7:3).

2. A Levite (Neh. 12:42), A. V. JEZRAIAH (q. v.).

IZ'RAHITE (Heb. יִזְרָחִי, yiz-rakh'h', the Izrahite), a patronymic epithet of Shamhuth, one of David's generals (1 Chron. 27:8); probably so called as being descended from Zerah, Judah's son.

IZ'RI (Heb. יִזְרִי, yits-ree', the Jezerite), the leader of the fourth division of Levitical singers under David (1 Chron. 25:11); probably the same with Zeri, of the sons of Jeduthun, mentioned in v. 3, B. C. 1000.

J

JA'AKAN (Heb. יַחֲקָן, yah-ak-avn', wrestler), the ancestor of the Bene-jaakan, round whose well the children of Israel encamped, once after they left Mosera (Num. 33:30-32), and again in a reverse direction after they left Kadesh-barnea, before they reached Mount Hor or Mosera (Deut. 10:6), B. C. before 1210. He was the son of Ezer and grandson of Scir (1 Chron. 1:42), where the name is given as Jakan. In Gen. 36:27, the name appears in the simple form Akan.

JAAK'OBAB (Heb. יַחֲקֹבָב, yah-ak-o'-baw, another form of Jacob), one of the prosperous descendants (נְסִינִים, princes) of Simeon that emigrated to the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:36), B. C. about 710.

JAA'LA, or JA'ALA (Heb. יַחֲלָא, yah-al-aw', wild goat), one of the Nethinim ("servants of Solomon"), whose descendants (or perhaps a place whose former inhabitants) returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:58); called in the parallel passage (Ezra 2:56) by the equivalent name Saalah, B. C. before 536.

JAA'LAH, or JA'ALAH (Ezra 2:56). See JAA'LA.

JAA'LAM (Heb. יַחֲלָמ, yah-lawm', concealed), the second named of Esau's three sons by Aholibamah in Canaan (Gen. 36:5, 14; 1 Chron. 1:35).

JA'ANAI, or JAA'NAI (Heb. יַחֲנַי, yah-an-ak'ee, responsive), one of the chief Gadites resident in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:12).

JA'ARE-OR'EGIM (Heb. יַחֲרֵי אֲרֵגִים, yah-ar-ay' o-reg-eem', woods of weavers), the father of ELHANAN (q. v.), a Bethlehemite, who smote Goliath the Gittite (2 Sam. 21:19), but in 1 Chronicles (20:5) it is stated that "Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath," etc. The reading in Chronicles is probably the correct one, the word Oregim having crept in from the next line through oversight of the copyist.

JA'ASAU (Heb. יַחֲאָסָא, yah-as-oo', they will do), an Israelite of the "sons" of Bani, who renounced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:37), B. C. 456.

JAA'SIEL (Heb. יַחֲאָסִיאל, yah-as-ee-ale', made by Jehovah), the son of Abner, and ruler of the tribe of Benjamin in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:21). By some he is identified with Jasiel, the Mesobaite, and one of David's bodyguard (1 Chron. 11:47), B. C. about 1000.

JAAZANI'AH (Heb. יַחֲאָזָנִיאַח, yah-az-an-yaw', Jehovah hears).

1. The son of Jeremiah (not the prophet), and a chief man of the Rechabites, whom the prophet tested as to their obedience to Jonadab, their founder, by the offer of wine (Jer. 35:3, sq.), B. C. 606.

2. A Maachathite, son of Hoshaiah, and one of the "captains" who accompanied Johanan to pay his respects to Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8), and after his assassination asked Jeremiah's advice (Jer. 42:1). He appears to have assisted Johanan in recovering the prey from Ishmael (41:11, sq.), and to have gone to Egypt with the rest (43:4, 5). In Jer. 40:8; 42:1, the name is changed to Zeaniah. He is doubtless the person called Azariah in Jer. 43:2, B. C. 588.

3. The son of Shaphan, leader of the seventy elders of Israel, seen by Ezekiel, in his vision, offering idolatrous worship at Jerusalem (Ezek. 8:11), B. C. 592.

4. The son of Azur, one of the "princes" among the twenty-five men seen (in a vision) by Ezekiel at the east gate of the temple, "devising mischief and giving wicked counsel" (Ezek. 11:1, sq.), B. C. 592.

JA'AZER (Heb. יַחֲאָזֵר, yah-az-ayr', helpful) or JA'ZER (Heb. יַחֲזֵר, yah-zare'), a town east of Jordan, in or near to Gilead (Num. 32:1, 3). It was taken by Israel from the Amorites (21:32), was assigned to the tribe of Gad (Num. 32:1, 3, 35), and was constituted a Levitical city (Josh. 21:39; 1 Chron. 26:31). It must have been a place of importance, as it gave its name to a district and dependent towns (Num. 21:32). From its being mentioned between Dibon and Nimrah, it would seem to have been located on the high plain north of Heshbon. Jaazer is mentioned in connection with the census under David (2 Sam. 24:5; 1 Chron. 26:31), and also in the prophecies of Isaiah (16:8, 9) and Jeremiah (48:32).

JAAZI'AH (Heb. יַאֲזִיָּאֵה, yah-az-ee-yaw'-hoo, comforted by Jehovah), apparently the third son or descendant of Merari the Levite, and founder of an independent house in that family (1 Chron. 24:26, 27), B. C. before 1015. Neither he nor his descendants are mentioned elsewhere (see 23:21-23; Exod. 6:19). The word Beno, which follows Jaaziah, should probably be translated "his son," i. e., the son of Merari (McC. and S.).

JAA'ZIEL (Heb. יַאֲזִיֵּאל, yah-az-ee-ale', comforted by God), a Levitical musician among those of the subordinate part (1 Chron. 15:18); the same with the Aziel who was one of those that performed the soprano (v. 20), B. C. after 1000.

JABAL (Heb. יַבָּל, yaw-bawl', a stream), the son of Lamech and Adah, the brother of Jubal (Gen. 4:20), where he is described as "the father of such as dwell in tents, and have cattle," B. C. about 3875. This obviously means that Jabal was the first who adopted that nomadic life still followed by many Arabian and Tartar tribes in Asia.

JAB'BOK (Heb. יַבְבֹּק, yab-bok'e', pouring forth), a stream east of the Jordan, which empties into that river nearly midway between the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee, or about forty-five miles S. of the latter. Its headwaters rise on the edge of Moab, only about eighteen miles E. of the Jordan. The river flows at first toward the desert under the name of Ammán, past

Rabbath-Ammon; there turns N., fetches a wide compass N. W., cuts the Gilead range in two, and flows in a very winding channel W. S. W. to the Jordan. Its whole course, counting its windings, is over sixty miles. It is shallow and always fordable, except where it breaks between steep rocks. Its valley is fertile, has always been a frontier and a line of traffic. It was anciently the border of the Ammonites (Num. 21:24; Deut. 2:37; 3:16), and afterward became the boundary between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Josh. 12:2, 5). The earliest notice of it is the account of the mysterious struggle of Jacob with Jehovah, and the interview with his brother Esau (Gen. 32:22, sq.), both of which took place on Jabbok's southern bank. The Jabbok is now called Zerka, "the blue river."

JAB'BESH (Heb. יַבֶּשֶׁת, or יַבֶּשֶׁת, yaw-bashe', dry, parched).

1. The father of SHALLUM (q. v.), which latter slew Zachariah, king of Israel, and reigned only a month (2 Kings 15:10, 13, 14), B. C. before 742.

2. The short form (1 Chron. 10:12 only) of JABESH-GILEAD (q. v.).

JAB'BESH-GIL'EAD (Heb. יַבֶּשֶׁת גִּלְעָד, yaw-bashe' ghil-awd', Jabesh of Gilead), a town of Gilead beyond Jordan, distant a night's journey from Beth-shan (1 Sam. 31:11; 2 Sam. 2:4), and lying within the territory assigned to the eastern half-tribe of Manasseh (Num. 32:39, 40). Its inhabitants were severely punished because they did not respond to the call against Benjamin (Judg. 21:8-14), every man being put to the sword and four hundred maidens being given to the Benjamites.

The city survived the loss of its males, and is next heard from as being besieged by Nahash the Ammonite. He offered to spare its inhabitants if they would agree to have their right eyes put out (to render them unfit for military service). Being allowed seven days to ratify the treaty, they appealed to Saul, who raised a large army and defeated the Ammonites (1 Sam. 11:1, sq.).

This service was gratefully remembered, and when Saul and his sons were slain in Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:8, the men of Jabesh, after a night march, took down their corpses, burned them, and buried their ashes "under a tree at Jabesh." For this kindly act David sent his blessing (2 Sam. 2:5).

Its site is not defined in Scripture. Josephus (Ant., vi, 5, 1) calls Jabesh the metropolis of Gilead. Robinson (Bib. Res., p. 320) supposes it to be the ruins of ed-Deir in the Wady Yabes.

JAB'BEZ (Heb. יַבֶּז, yah-bayts', sorrowful).

1. A descendant of Judah, but of what family is not apparent. The only mention made of him is this remarkable account: "And Jabez was more honorable than his brethren: and his mother called his name Jabez, saying, Because I bare him with sorrow. And Jabez called on the God of Israel, saying, O that thou wouldest bless me indeed, and enlarge my coast, and that thine hand might be with me, and that thou wouldest keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me! And God granted him that which he requested" (1 Chron. 4:9, 10). Keil (Com., in loc.) supposes that this is a record of a vow made by Jabez, the conditions only being given. "The reason of this is, probably, that the vow had acquired importance sufficient to make it worthy of being handed down only from God's having so fulfilled his wish that his life became a contradiction of his name, the son of pain having been free from pain in life, and having attained to greater happiness and reputation than his brothers."

2. A place inhabited by "the families of the Scribes" (1 Chron. 2:55), apparently in Judah. It is nowhere else mentioned.

JAB'BIN (Heb. יַבִּין, yaw-bene', intelligent, discerning), probably a royal title at Hazor, like Agag among the Amalekites.

1. A king of Hazor, who organized a confederacy of the northern princes against the Israelites. These assembled with their hosts near the waters of Merom, where Joshua surprised this vast army and overthrew it. He then took Hazor and slew Jabin (Josh. 11:1-14), B. C. about 1169.

2. Another king of Hazor, and probably a descendant of the former. He is called "king of Canaan" (Judg. 4:2) in distinction from the kings of other nations, such as Moab, Mesopotamia, etc. (Keil, Com.). He seems to have had unusual power, as he is credited with nine hundred chariots of iron. The idolatry of the Israelites having lost them the divine protection, they became subject to Jabin, who "mightily oppressed" them for twenty years. From this they were delivered by the great victory won by Barak over the forces of Jabin, commanded by Sisera (4:3-16), B. C. about 1120. The war still continued until it ended in the overthrow of Jabin. His name is mentioned in Psa. 83:9.

JAB'NEEL (Heb. יַבְנֵאל, yab-neh-ale', built of God).

1. A town on the northern boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:11), probably the same as JABNEH (q. v.).

2. A city on the border of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33). Little or no clew can be obtained relative to its situation.

JAB'NEH (Heb. יַבְנֵה, yab-neh', a building, probably the same as Jabneel, 1), a point on the northern boundary of Judah, between Mount Baalah and the Mediterranean Sea. There was a constant struggle between the Danites and the Philistines, and it is not surprising that we find Jabneh in the hands of the latter. Uzziah captured this place along with Gath and Ashdod (2 Chron. 26:6). Josephus calls it Jannia. It still exists as a good-sized village, under the name of Jebuah, about two miles from the sea, seven miles S. of Joppa.

JA'CHAN (Heb. יַעֲכָן, yah-kam', trouble-some), one of seven chief Gadite "brothers" resident in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:13).

JA'CHIN (Heb. יַעֲכִין, yaw-keen', he will establish).

1. The fourth son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15), called Jarib in 1 Chron. 4:24, founder of the Jachinites (Num. 26:12).

2. One of the priests residing in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:10; Neh. 11:10).

3. Head of the twenty-first course of priests in the time of David (1 Chron. 24:17).

4. Jachin and Boaz were the names of two columns in the porch of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:15-22; 2 Chron. 3:17). See TEMPLE.

JACINTH. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

JACKAL. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

JAC'OB (Heb. יַעֲקֹב, yah-ak-obe', heel-catcher, i. e., supplanter).

1. The Patriarch. The second born of the two sons of Isaac and Rebekah, his conception being supernatural, in answer to Isaac's prayer. He was born when his father was sixty years old, probably at the well Lahai-roi (Gen. 25:21-26; comp. v. 11), B. C. about 2173.

Personal History. It is recorded that Jacob grew up to be "a plain man, dwelling in tents," preferring the quiet of a home life to the active, dangerous career of a hunter. He was the favorite of his mother, while Isaac's partiality was shown toward Esau. (1) Buys Esau's birthright. The first incident mentioned is his purchase of Esau's birthright at the paltry price of a mess of pottage, thus making use of his brother's hunger to advance his own interests. "The birthright consisted afterward in a double portion of the father's inheritance (Deut. 21:17); but with the patriarchs it embraced the chieftainship, rule over the brethren and the entire family (Gen. 27:29), and the title to the blessing of promise (27:4, 27-29), which included the future possession of Canaan and of covenant fellowship with Jehovah (28:4)" (Keil and Delitzsch, Com.). (2) Obtains Isaac's blessing. Isaac, now aged, was about to pronounce his blessing upon Esau, his elder son, which blessing acted with all the force of a modern testamentary bequest. This was thwarted by the deception practiced upon him by Rebekah and Jacob, the latter personating Esau and helping out his mother's fraud by direct falsehood. Thus Jacob received his father's blessing (27:1-29).

(3) Jacob's flight. Esau hated his brother because of his deception and its success, and resolved to slay him, only delaying until a sufficient time after the probably near death of his father. Rebekah, informed of Esau's purpose, advised Jacob to flee to her brother Laban, in Haran, obtaining Isaac's consent by the plea that she wished Jacob to marry one of his kinswomen and not a daughter of Canaan. Isaac blessed Jacob again and sent him away (27:41-28:5), B. C. about 2096. Jacob's age is arrived at thus: Joseph was thirty years old when introduced to Pharaoh; and, allowing for seven years of plenty and two of famine (45:6), Joseph was thirty-nine years old when Jacob went to Egypt, at which time Jacob was one hundred and thirty years of age; therefore Joseph was born before Jacob was ninety-one. His birth occurred in the fourteenth year of Jacob's sojourn in Mesopotamia (30:25; 29:18, 21, 27), which would make Jacob's flight to have taken place in his seventy-seventh year. (4) Dream at Beth-el. On his journey he stopped at Luz for the night, and was there favored with the vision of the ladder and the ascending and descending angels. God there confirmed to him the promises given to his fathers, and promised him protection on his journey and a safe return to his home. In recognition of the divine presence Jacob called the place Beth-el, and made a vow, and dedicated a tenth of all God gave him to Jehovah (28:10-22) (see LADDER). (5) Serves Laban. Arrived at Haran, Jacob met Rachel, Laban's daughter, by whom Jacob's coming was made known to her father. After a month Laban inquired what wages Jacob desired for his services, and he asked for Rachel on the condition of a seven years' service. At the expiration of the time, which seemed to Jacob "but a few days for the love he had to her," Laban availed himself of the customs of the country to substitute his elder daughter, Leah. Upon the discovery of the deception, Laban excused himself, saying: "It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born"—a perfectly worthless excuse, for if it had been the custom in Haran Laban should have told Jacob of it before. Another seven years' service gained for Jacob his beloved Rachel. Leah became the mother of Jacob's firstborn, Reuben, three other sons successively following, viz., Simeon, Levi, and Judah. Rachel, bearing no children, gave to Jacob her maid Bilhah, who bore Dan and Naphtali. Two other sons, Gad and Asher, were born of Leah's maid, Zilpah. Leah bare two more sons, Issachar and Zebulun, and a daughter, Dinah. At length Rachel became the mother of a son, whom she called Joseph (29:1-30:24). A number of years later Benjamin was born. After Jacob's fourteen years had expired he was induced by Laban to remain six years longer, and, by a hardly honorable artifice, increased greatly in wealth. This displeased Laban, so that a separation was deemed advisable (30:25-31:16). (6) Flees from Laban. Gathering together his Mighty one, God of Israel (33:1-20). Here is located the well called after Jacob (John 4:6). (10) Goes to Beth-el. Having been brought into collision with the people of Shechem, because of the violation of Dinah and the revenge taken by her brothers, Jacob was commanded to go and dwell in Beth-el. He took the strange gods found in his family and buried them "under the oak which is by Shechem." There God appeared to Jacob again and blessed him, renewing the Abrahamic covenant. family and property, he set out for Canaan, B. C. about 2076. On the third day Laban learned of Jacob's departure and followed after him, but was warned by God not to hinder his return. After much reproach and recrimination peace was restored, and Laban returned to his home (31:17, sq.). Shortly after the departure of Laban Jacob met a company of angels, and called the place, in honor of them, Mahanaim (two hosts). (7) News from Esau. Jacob sent messengers to Esau with a friendly greeting, who brought word that his brother was on the way to meet him with four hundred men. Greatly alarmed and distressed, he divided his people, with the flocks and herds, into two companies, so that if one was attacked the other might escape. Jacob also prepared a present from his substance for Esau, hoping thus to pacify his brother. (8) Wrestling. Then came a night of prayer, during which the angel of the Lord wrestled with him (see NORÉ). In attestation of his power with God, through faith, his name was changed from Jacob to Israel ("wrestler with God"). His request, viz., to know the name of the person with whom he wrestled, was denied him, but Jacob named the place, near Jabbok, of the remarkable transaction, Peniel, "the face of God" (32:24, sq.). (9) Reconciled to Esau. In the morning Jacob saw Esau, with his army, approaching, and sent forward, first his handmaids, then Leah and her children, and lastly Rachel and Joseph. Esau's bitter feelings gave way at the sight of his brother, his liberal gifts, and earnest entreaties. They embraced as brothers, and, for aught we know, maintained friendly relations for the rest of their lives. Jacob remained for a while on the other side of Jordan, at Succoth. He then came to Shechem, and pitched before the city of Shalem, and purchasing a plot of ground, "erected there an altar, and called it El-Elohe-Israel," i. e.,

Rachel, died in giving birth to her second son, Benjamin (35:20). Not long after this Jacob was sorely afflicted in the loss of his beloved son, Joseph, who was sold by his brethren (ch. 37), B. C. about 2053, and by the death of Isaac. (12) Egypt. The great famine, predicted by Joseph, becoming very sore in Canaan, Jacob sent his sons down into Egypt to purchase grain. He retained Benjamin, his youngest son, "lest mischief should befall him." His sons returned with a good supply of food, and told him that they had been taken for spies, and could only disprove the charge by carrying Benjamin to the "lord of the land." His credulity was greatly tested when his sons came home with the tidings that "Joseph is yet alive." Convinced, however, of the truth of their story, he decided to go and see him before he died. On his way he was encouraged by a vision at Beer-sheba. He came to Egypt, and was affectionately received by Joseph (chap. 42-46), B. C. about 2049. By him he was presented to Pharaoh, and he and his family located in Goshen (47:1-12). (13) Death. After a residence of seventeen years in Egypt "the time drew near that Israel must die," and, calling Joseph to him, acquainted him with the divine promise of the land of Canaan, and took from him a pledge that he would bury him with his fathers. He then adopted Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, as his own, and pronounced his benediction upon his sons. And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet in the bed and "yielded up the ghost" (49:33), at the ripe age of one hundred and forty-seven years (47:28), B. C. about 2026. His body was embalmed, carried with great care and pomp into the land of Canaan, and deposited with his fathers and his wife Leah in the Cave of Machpelah (50:1-13). His descendants were led out from Egypt by Moses, and entered Canaan under the leadership of Joshua. The twelve tribes of which the nation was composed were named after his sons, with the exception that Joseph was represented by his sons Ephraim and Manasseh. The list of Jacob's descendants (46:8-27) was probably made up at the time of his decease, as we find mentioned sons of Benjamin, himself a mere youth when he went to Egypt. (14) Scripture references. "Hosea, in the latter days of the kingdom, seeks (12:3, 4, 12) to convert the descendants of Jacob from their state of alienation from God, by recalling to their memory the repeated acts of God's favor shown to their ancestor. And Malachi (1:2) strengthens the desponding hearts of the returned exiles by assuring them that the love which God bestowed upon Jacob was not withheld from them. Besides the frequent mention of his name in conjunction with those of the other two patriarchs, there are distinct references to events in the life of Jacob in four books of the New Testament. In Rom. 9:11-13, Paul alludes the history of Jacob's birth to prove that the favor of God is independent of the order of natural descent. In Heb. 12:16, and 11:21, the transfer of the birthright and Jacob's dying benediction are referred to. His vision at Beth-el and his possession of land at Shechem are cited in John 1:51, and 4:5, 12. And Stephen in his speech (Acts 7:12, 16) mentions the famine which was the means of restoring Jacob to his lost son in Egypt, and the burial of the patriarch in Shechem" (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

Character. Jacob appears to have inherited the gentle, quiet, and retiring character of his father; also a selfishness and a prudence which approached to cunning. These showed themselves in his reprehensible deception of his father, his dealings with Esau, and the means which he employed to make his bargain with his uncle (Laban) work to his own enrichment. We must remember, however, that he was inured to caution and restraint in the presence of a more vigorous brother; that he was secretly stimulated by a belief that God designed for him some superior blessing; that he was compelled to leave home to preserve his life, and obliged to cope with an avaricious and crafty uncle. But "God revived the promise over which he had brooded for sixty years, since he learned it in childhood from his mother. Angels conversed with him. Gradually he felt more and more the watchful care of an ever-present spiritual Father. Face to face he wrestled with the representative of the Almighty. And so, even though the moral consequences of his early transgressions hung about him, and saddened him with a deep knowledge of all the evil of treachery, and domestic envy, and partial judgment, and filial disobedience, yet the increasing revelations of God enlightened the old age of the patriarch; and at last the timid 'supplanter,' the man of subtle devices, waiting for the salvation of Jehovah, dies the 'soldier of God,' uttering the messages of God to his remote posterity" (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

Figurative. The "God of Jacob" (Exod. 3:6; 4:5; 2 Sam. 23:1; Psa. 20:1; Isa. 2:3); simply "Jacob" (Psa. 24:6, where the term יְהוָה, God, appears to have been dropped from the text; and "mighty One of Jacob" (Psa. 132:2), are titles of Jehovah as the national deity. For the house or family of Jacob, i. e., the Israelites, we have the "house of Jacob" (Exod. 19:3; Isa. 2:5, 6; 8:17, etc.), "Seed of Jacob" (Isa. 45:19; Jer. 33:26), "the sons of Jacob" (1 Kings 18:31; Mal. 3:6); "congregation of Jacob" (Deut. 33:4), and simply "Jacob" (Num. 23:7, 10, 21, 23; 24:5, 17, 19, etc.); and the expression "in Jacob" (Gen. 49:7; Lam. 2:3), i. e., among the Jewish people.

NOTE.—(1) Isaac's blessing. Justification of the deceit practiced upon Isaac by Jacob and Rebekah is impossible. Nor can we approve Isaac's conduct in insisting upon giving Esau the chief blessing, if we believe him to have been acquainted with the divine prediction. Nowhere in Scripture do we find approval. On the contrary, sin was followed by immediate punishment. "Rebekah was obliged to send her pet son into a foreign land, away from his father's house, and in an utterly destitute condition. She did not see him for twenty years, even if she lived till his return. Jacob had to atone for his wrong by a long and painful exile, in the midst of privation, anxiety, and fraud. Isaac was punished for retaining his preference for Esau, in opposition to the will of Jehovah, by the success of Jacob's stratagem; and Esau, for his contempt of the birthright, by the loss of the blessing of the firstborn. In this way a higher hand prevailed above the acts of sinful men, bringing the counsel and will of Jehovah to eventual triumph in opposition to human thought and will" (K. and D., Com.). (2) Jacob's polygamy is an instance of a patriarchal practice quite repugnant to Christian morality, but to be accounted for on the ground that the time had not then come for a full expression of the will of God on this subject. In times when frequent wars increased the number of captives and orphans, and reduced nearly all service to slavery, there may have been some reason for extending the recognition and protection of the law to concubines, or half-wives, as Bilhah and Zilpah (Smith, Bib. Dict.). (3) Wrestling with the angel. This has been a fruitful source of difficulty and misinterpretation. This occurrence is not to be regarded as a dream, nor as a natural or corporeal wrestling. Delitzsch (Com.) defines it as a "real conflict of both mind and body, a work of the spirit with an intense effort of the body." A very obvious end pursued throughout the history of Jacob was the development of his religious convictions; and the event in question, no less than the altars he erected and the dreams he had, may have materially conducted to so important a result. The immediate lesson taught Jacob by this incident may have been that he was not to overcome by the power of flesh alone. To convince him of this God dislocated his thigh. By the power of faith and prayer Jacob proved himself a true wrestler with God. That the occurrence had a lasting spiritual effect upon Jacob is evident from the devout tenor of his after life.

2. The Father of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary (Matt. 1:15, 16), B. C. before 40.

JACOB'S WELL. See JACOB; also SUPPLEMENT.

JADA (Heb. יָדָא, yaw-daw', knowing), the last named of the two sons of Onam, a descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel; his two sons are likewise mentioned (1 Chron. 2:28, 32).

JAD'AU (Heb. יָדָא, yad-dav', knowing), one of the sons of Nebo who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:43).

JADDU'A, or JAD'DUA (Heb. יָדְדוּא, yad-doo'-ah, knowing).

1. One of the chiefs of the people who subscribed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:21), B. C. 445.

2. The son of Jonathan (Neh. 12:11), and the last high priest mentioned in the Old Testament (v. 22). This is all that we learn of him from Scripture, but we gather pretty certainly that he was a priest in the reign of the last Persian king, Darius, and that he was still priest after the Persian dynasty was overthrown, i. e., in the reign of Alexander the Great. Josephus (Ant., xi, 8, 3-6) makes Jaddua high priest when Alexander invaded Judea, but the balance of his story does not deserve credit.

JAD'DON (Heb. יָדְדוֹן, yaw-done', judge), a Meronothite who assisted in reconstructing the walls of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:7), B. C. 445.

JAE'EL (Heb. יַעֲל, yaw-ale', wild goat), the wife of Heber the Kenite, and slayer of Sisera. Sisera took refuge, after the defeat of the Canaanites by Barak, in the tent of Jael, there being peace between the house of Heber and Jabin, king of Hazor. He would not, probably, have so openly violated all ideas of oriental propriety, by entering a woman's apartments, but for Jael's earnest invitation. She covered him with a quilt (A. V. "mantle"), and gave him milk to drink. Fearing discovery by his pursuers, he exacted a promise from her to preserve the secret of his concealment, and fell into a heavy sleep. Jael took one of the great wooden pins (A. V. "nail") which fastened down the cords of the tent and drove it into the temples of Sisera, until it penetrated the ground, or floor. "So he died." Barak, coming up in his pursuit of Sisera, was met by Jael, who showed him the deed she had performed (Judg. 4:17-22), B. C. about 1120.

NOTE.—Many have sought to justify the conduct of Jael; others see in it a scriptural indorsement of murder. It is not necessary to accept either alternative. The Scripture narrative simply gives the incident as a fact. Jael violated her offered hospitality, so universally sacred to the oriental mind, committing the sins of lying, treachery, and assassination. These are nowhere justified by God's word. Nor can we accept the assumption of Calovius, Buddeus, and others, that Jael offered Sisera her hospitality in perfect sincerity, and that after he was asleep was instigated by the Spirit of God to do the deed. She probably acted from prudential motives, and seeing that the Hebrews were victorious, and her people were at peace with Jabin, and fearing vengeance from them for sheltering Sisera, she conceived the purpose of slaying the sleeping and helpless man. Much more difficult is it to explain the eulogistic notice which Jael receives in the triumphal ode of Deborah and Barak, "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be; blessed shall she be above women in the tent," etc. (Judg. 5:24-27). We "question whether any moral commendation is directly intended. What Deborah stated was a fact, viz., that the wives of the nomad Arabs would undoubtedly regard Jael as a public benefactress, and praise her as a popular heroine. She certainly was not 'blessed' as a pious and upright person is blessed when performing a deed which embodies the noblest principles, and which goes up as a memorial before God, but merely as one who acted a part that accomplished an important purpose of heaven" (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.). "In the days of Jael" (Judg. 5:6). The Jael here mentioned has been supposed by some (e. g., Gesenius, Dr. Robinson, Fürst, and others) to have been a local judge of the Israelites in the interval between Shamgar and Jabin. The reasons for this supposition are: 1. That the state of things described in Judg. 5:6, as existing in Jael's days, is not the state of things existing in the days of Jael the wife of Heber, whose time was famous for the restoration of the nation to a better. 2. That the wife of a stranger would hardly have been named as marking an epoch in the history of Israel. But there is no evidence of such an interval or of such a judgeship; and it is, therefore, more natural to refer the name to the wife of Heber as the most prominent character in the period referred to. The circumstance that the name Jael is masculine in the Hebrew is of no force, as it is freely used (literally) of the female deer (Prov. 5:19) (McC. and S.).

JAE'GUR (Heb. יָגוּר, yaw-goor', a lodging), a town of southern Judea, on the border of Edom, mentioned (Josh. 15:21) as part of the portion of Judah.

JAH, a contraction (Psa. 68:4) for JEHOVAH (q. v.). Jah also enters into the composition of many Hebrew words, as Adonijah, Isaiah, etc.

JAH'HATH (Heb. יַחַת, yakh'-ath, union).

1. Son of Reaiah (or Haroeh), of the posterity of Hezron, and father of two sons, Ahumai and Lahad (1 Chron. 4:2).

2. A son of Shimei, grandson of Gershom and great-grandson of Levi (1 Chron. 23:10). Considerable confusion occurs respecting SHIMEI (q. v.) and his sons. In v. 9 the three sons of Shimei are, by some error (probably the transposition of the latter clause), attributed to his brother Laadan, while in v. 11 Jahath is stated to have been "chief" (i. e., most numerous in posterity) of the four sons of Shimei. A similar disagreement appears in the parallel passage (1 Chron., ch. 6) where Jahath (v. 43) occurs as the son of Gershom, and again (v. 20) as a son of Libnah (i. e., Laadan), instead of Shimei, B. C. considerably after 1640.

3. One of the sons of Shelomoth, an Izharite of the family of Kohath, appointed by David to a prominent place in the sacred services (1 Chron. 24:22), B. C. about 960.

4. A Merarite Levite, and one of the overseers of the temple repairs carried on by King Josiah (2 Chron. 34:12), B. C. 639.

JAE'HAZ (Heb. יַחַז, yah'-hats, trodden down, a thrashing floor), a town in the tribe of Reuben, mentioned in connection with Moab (Isa. 15:4). It was called Jahaza (Josh. 13:18), Jahazah (21:36), and Jahzah (1 Chron. 6:78). Sihon the Amorite was defeated here (Num. 21:23; Deut. 2:32). "On the Moabite stone, lines 19, 20, the name is spelt like the shorter Hebrew form, and the place is given as a fortress, and seemingly near Daibon" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 539).

JAE'HAZA (Josh. 13:18), and JAEH'ZAH (Josh. 21:36; Jer. 48:21), other renderings of the Hebrew JAHAZ (q. v.).

JAEHAZI'AH (Heb. יַחֲזִי'אֵה, yakh-zeh-yaw', beheld by Jehovah), son of Tikvah, apparently a priest, one of those assisting Ezra in ascertaining which of the Jews had married Gentile wives after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:15), B. C. 457.

JAH'AZIEL (Heb. יָחִיאֵל, yakh-az-ee-ale', held by God).

1. One of the Benjamite warriors who deserted Saul and came to David when he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), B. C. shortly before 1000.

2. One of the priests, in the reign of David, appointed with Benaiah to blow the trumpet before the ark when it was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 16:6), B. C. about 986.

3. The third "son" of Hebron, the grandson of Levi, through Kohath (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23), B. C. after 1640.

4. Son of Zechariah, a Levite of the family of Asaph, who was inspired by Jehovah to prophesy to Jehoshaphat his victory over the Moabites and others who were invading the country (2 Chron. 20:14, sq.), B. C. 875.

5. A son of Jahaziel, was chief of "the sons of Shechaniah," and returned with Ezra from Babylon with three hundred males (Ezra 8:5), B. C. 457.

JAH'DAI (Heb. יְהוֹדָי, yeh-dah'ee, Judaistic), a descendant, apparently, of Caleb, of the family of Hezron; his sons' names are given, but as his own parentage is not stated (1 Chron. 2:47) it can only be conjectured.

JAH'DIEL (Heb. יְהוֹדִיעַל, yakh-dee-ale', unity of God), one of the heroes of the tribe of Manasseh east of Jordan (1 Chron. 5:24).

JAH'DO (Heb. יְהוֹדוֹר, yakh-doe', his union), a Gadite, son of Buz and father of Jeshishai, of the descendants of Abihail, resident in Gilead (1 Chron. 5:14), B. C. before 771.

JAH'LEEL (Heb. יְהוֹלֵל, yakh-leh-ale', hoping in God), the last named of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26). His descendants are called Jahleelites (Num. 26:26), B. C. before 1640.

JAH'LEELITES, the descendants of JAH'LEEL (q. v.).

JAH'MAI (Heb. יְהוֹמַי, yakh-mah'-ee, hot), one of the "sons" of Tola, grandson of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2).

JAH'ZAH (1 Chron. 6:78). See JAHAZ.

JAH'ZEEL (Heb. יְהוֹצֵל, yakh-tseh-ale', alotted by God), the first named of the sons of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24). His descendants are called Jahzeelites (Num. 26:48). In 1 Chron. 7:13 the name is written JAHZIEL (q. v.), B. C. before 1640.

JAH'ZEELITES (Num. 26:48), the descendants of JAHZEEL (q. v.).

JAH'ZERAH (Heb. יְהוֹזֵרָה, yakh-zay-raw', led back by God), the son of Meshullum and father of Adiel, a priest (1 Chron. 9:12), B. C. long before 536. He is probably the same with Azareel (Neh. 11:13).

JAH'ZIEL (1 Chron. 7:13). See JAHZEEL.

JAILOR (Gr. δεσμοφύλαξ, des-mof-oo'-laz, Acts 16:23), a keeper of a prison (q. v.).

JAIR (Heb. יָאוֹר, yaw-ere', enlightener).

1. The son of Segub, which latter was descended from Judah on his father's side (1 Chron. 2:22), and from Manasseh on his mother's side. Moses reckons Jair as belonging to Manasseh (Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14; see also 1 Kings 4:13), probably on account of his exploits and possessions in Gilead (1 Chron. 2:23). He settled in the part of Argob bordering on Gilead, where we find the small towns taken (retaken) by him named collectively Havoth-jair, or "Jair's villages" (Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14; 1 Kings 4:13; 1 Chron. 2:22). They are said to have numbered twenty-three (1 Chron. 2:22), thirty (Judg. 10:4), and sixty (1 Chron. 2:23; Josh. 13:30; 1 Kings 4:13). Perhaps the whole sixty were captured by him and his relatives, and twenty-three of them were assigned to him, others being added afterward (Mc. and S., Cyc.; Winer, Realwörterbuch, s. v.).

2. The eighth judge of Israel, a Gileadite in Manasseh (Josephus, Ant., v, 7, 6), and probably a descendant of the preceding. He ruled twenty-two years, and his opulence is thus recorded: "And he had thirty sons that rode on thirty ass colts, and they had thirty cities, which are called Havoth-jair unto this day, which are in the land of Gilead." The twenty-three villages of the more ancient Jair were probably among the thirty which this Jair possessed. He was buried in Camon, probably in the same region (Judg. 10:3-5).

3. The father of Elhanan, who slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath (1 Chron. 20:5), B. C. before 1018. The Hebrew has יָאוֹר, yaw-oor, wooded; and in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 21:19) we find "Jaare."

4. A Benjamite, son of Shimei and father of Mordecai, Esther's uncle (Esth. 2:5), B. C. before 518.

JATRITE, THE (2 Sam. 20:26). See IRA.

JAIRUS (Gr. Ἰαίρος, ee-ah'-i-ros), a ruler of a synagogue, probably at Capernaum, whose only daughter Jesus restored to life (Mark 5:22; Luke 8:41; comp. Matt. 9:18), A. D. 27. Some have wrongfully inferred, from our Saviour's words, "The maid is not dead, but sleepeth," that the girl was only in a swoon (Olshausen, Com., i, 321; Neander, Leben Jesu, p. 347; McC. and S., Cyc.).

JAK'KAN (1 Chron. 1:42). See JAAKAN.

JAK'KEH (Heb. יָקֵה, yaw-keh', obedient, pious), the father of Agur, whose sayings are given in Prov. 30:1, sq. Beyond this mention we have no clew to the existence of either person. There is great difference of opinion as to the person intended. The traditional view is that which gives the word a figurative import (יָקֵה, yik-kaw-haw', obedience), and applies it to David. Others understand a real name of some unknown Israelite, which seems very likely.

JAK'KIM (Heb. יָקִים, yaw-keem', God sets up).

1. One of the "sons" of Shimhi, a Benjamite resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:19).

2. Head of the twelfth course of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:12), B. C. about 970.

JAL'ON (Heb. יָלוֹן, yaw-lone', lodging), the last named of the four sons of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah, and, apparently, of a family kindred with that of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:17).

JAM'BRES (Gr. 'Ιαμβρῆς, ee-am-brace'), a person named as opposing Moses (2 Tim. 3:8). See JANES; also SUPPLEMENT.

JAMES; more correctly JACO'BUS (Gr. Ἰάκωβος, ee-ak'-o-bos—Jacob).

1. The Son of Zebedee (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19; Luke 5:10) and Salome (comp. Matt. 20:20; Mark 15:40; 16:1), and the elder brother of John the Evangelist (Mark 5:37).

Personal History. James appears first in the sacred narrative as following his occupation of fisherman, he and his brothers being partners with Simon Peter (Luke 5:10). When called by our Lord to be his followers in the spring or summer (A. D. 27) James and his brother responded with an alacrity that renders them models of obedience (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19). We find him named among the twelve who received (A. D. 28) a call to apostleship (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:14; Luke 6:13; Acts 1:13). These brothers and Peter seemed for some reason to be especially fitted to live in close intimacy with the Master, and were associated on several interesting occasions. They alone were present at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28), at the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51), and at the garden of Gethsemane during our Lord's agony (Mark 14:33; Matt. 26:37); and with Andrew they listened to the Lord's private discourse on the fall of Jerusalem (Mark 13:3.) Through mistaken views of the Messiah's kingdom, and an ambition to share in its glory, they joined in the request made to Jesus by their mother (Matt. 20:20–23; Mark 10:35). James was the first of the apostles to suffer martyrdom, being slain with the sword by command of Herod (Acts 12:2), A. D. 44. Many legends are recorded of James, but as they have no good foundation they had better be omitted.

Character. From the desire to punish the inhabitants of a certain village in Samaria, because they declined to receive Jesus (Luke 9:52–54), we infer that James and John were warm and impetuous in temperament. They were called by our Lord (Mark 3:17) Boanerges—sons of thunder—probably on account of their boldness and energy in discharging their apostleship.

2. James the Less, another of the twelve apostles. He was the son of Alphæus (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13) and Mary, the sister of our Lord's mother (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40; Luke 24:10; John 19:25), and was called James the Less (ὁ μικρός, the little) because he was younger than James the son of Zebedee, or on account of his low stature (Mark 16:1). His mother is supposed by some to have been called sister, i. e., sister-in-law, of Mary the mother of Jesus, because of their marriage to two brothers, Cleophas and Joseph. It has also been conjectured that Alphæus died without issue, and that his wife was espoused by Joseph, on which account James is styled the (legal) son of Alphæus and the (reputed half) brother of our Lord. James had two brothers, Judas (or Jude) the apostle and Joses (Matt. 27:56; Luke 6:16).

3. The Brother of the Lord. The natural interpretation of the passages Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3 indicates that James and his brothers and sisters were sons and daughters of Joseph and Mary, the mother of Jesus. He was not one of the twelve apostles (Matt. 10:2–4), nor at first a believer in Jesus (John 7:5). From Acts 1:13, 14 we conclude that his former skepticism had passed away, as it is stated there that "his brethren" continued with the apostles and others in the "upper room" after the ascension. Although he was not one of the twelve, yet he was vouchsafed a vision of the risen Lord (1 Cor. 15:5, 7). Like Paul and Barnabas, he received the title of apostle (Gal. 1:19), and was recognized by the zealots for the law as their leader (2:12). He occupied a prominent, if not the chief, place in the Church at Jerusalem (v. 9). He was president of the first council (Acts 15:13), and, with the elders, received Paul upon his return from his third missionary tour (21:18), A. D. 57. He was the author of the epistle that bears his name. Eusebius tells us that James was surnamed "the Just" by the ancients on account of his eminent virtue. In the Apocryphal Gospel according to the Hebrews he is said to have been precipitated from a pinnacle of the temple, and then assaulted with stones, and at last dispatched by a blow on the head with a fuller's pole (Kitto, Cyc.).

NOTE.—By many James the son of Alphæus and James the brother of our Lord are considered as identical; but this view is insisted upon principally by those who hold to the perpetual virginity of Mary, for which there is not the slightest evidence in Scripture any more than there is for "Immaculate Conception." They therefore insist that the words brethren and sisters are not to be taken in their literal sense, but in the more general one of relations, and argue that they were either (1) stepbrothers and sisters or (2) cousins. Without introducing the argument for either theory they have been dropped as untenable. That James was literally the Lord's brother is the view held by Sier, Fitch, Andrews, Farrar, Neander, Alford, Demarest, Whedon, and others. For discussion of this subject, see Whedon, Com., Matt. 13:35; Andrews, Life of our Lord; Eadie, Com., Gal. 1:19; Alford, Introduct. to James; Wordsworth, Introduct. to James; Johnstone, Lectures on the Epist. of James; Ormiston, Com. on Epist. of James in Homiletic Monthly, April, 1883.

JAMES, EPISTLE OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

JA'MIN (Heb. יָמִין, yaw-meen', right hand).

1. The second son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; 1 Chron. 4:24), B. C. about 1640. He was founder of the family of the Jaminites (Num. 26:12).

2. The second son of Ram, the fourth in descent from Judah (1 Chron. 2:27).

3. One of the priests who expounded the law to the people when read by Ezra (Neh. 8:7), B. C. about 445.

JAMINITES, THE, the descendants of Jamin the son of Simeon (Num. 26:12).

JAM'LECH (Heb. יָמֵלֵךְ, yam-lake', whom God makes king), a chief of the tribe of Simeon, apparently one of those whose family invaded the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:34), B. C. about 715.

JANGLING (Gr. ματαιολογία, met-ah-yol-og-ee'-yah, 1 Tim. 1:6), vain talking, and in Tit. 1:10 the noun, "vain talkers," i. e., those who utter empty, senseless things.

JAN'NA (Gr. 'Ιαννά, ee-an-nah', probably from Heb. יָנַן, flourishing), the son of Joseph and father of Melchi, the sixth in ascent from Christ on his mother's side (Luke 3:24), B. C. about 200.

JAN'NES (Gr. 'Iavvῆς, ee-an-nace'). Jannes and Jambres are supposed to have been two of the Egyptian magicians who attempted by their enchantments to counteract the influence on Pharaoh's mind of the miracles wrought by Moses (2 Tim. 3:8; comp. Exod. chaps. 7, 8).

JANO'AH (Heb. יָנוֹחַ, yaw-no'-akh, or יְנוּחָה, yaw-no'-khaw, quiet), a place apparently in the north of Galilee, or the "land of Naphtali," one of those taken by Tiglath-pileser in his first incursion into Palestine (2 Kings 15:29). No trace of it appears elsewhere.

JANO'HAH (Hebrew same as Janoah), a place on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh. 16:6, 7). Eusebius gives it as twelve miles E. of Neapolis. A little less than that distance from Nablûs, and about southeast in direction, two miles from Ak-rabeh, is the village of Yanûn, doubtless the ancient Janohah, but now a miserable village with extensive ruins of antiquity.

JAN'UM (Heb. יָנוּם, yaw-neem', asleep), a town of Judah in the mountain district, apparently not far from Hebron (Josh. 15:53), not identified.

JAPHETH (Heb. יָפֶֿתֿ, yeh'-feth, widespread-ing), one of the three sons of Noah (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18; 10:1; 1 Chron. 1:4, 5). Although he is mentioned last in these passages, yet we learn from Gen. 10:21 (comp. 9:24) that he was the eldest of the three. He and his wife were preserved in the ark (Gen. 7:7; 1 Pet. 3:20). He had seven sons (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5), and his descendants occupied the "isles of the Gentiles" (Gen. 10:5), i. e., the coast lands of the Mediterranean Sea in Europe and Asia Minor. His act of filial piety when, with Shem, he covered his father's nakedness, is recorded in Gen. 9:20-27.

JAPH'YA (Heb. יָפִיָּא, yaw-fee'-ah, bright, splendid).

1. The king of Lachish who, with three other kings, joined Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, against Joshua, but was defeated and slain after confinement in the cave of Makkedah (Josh. 10:3, sq.), B. C. about 1170.

2. One of the sons of David, born to him by one of his wives, whose name is not given, at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 3:7; 14:6), B. C. after 1000.

3. A town on the eastern part of the southern boundary of Zebulun, situated on the high ground between Daberath and Gittah-hepher (Josh. 19:12). Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii, 194) identifies it with modern Yafa, about one and a half miles S. W. of Nazareth. Others locate it elsewhere.

JAPH'LET (Heb. יָפֶֿלֶֿתֿ, yaf-lute', he will deliver), a son of Heber and great-grandson of Asher, and father of three sons and a daughter (1 Chron. 7:32, 33), B. C. probably before 1640. Some think it to have been a branch of his descendants (Japhleti) that are mentioned in Josh. 16:3 as having settled along the border between Ephraim and Dan, but this is improbable.

JAPH'LETI (Heb. יָפֶֿלֶֿתֿ, yaf-lay-tee'). The boundary of "the Japhleti" is one of the landmarks on the south boundary line of Ephraim (Josh. 16:3). Perhaps the name preserves the memory of some ancient tribe who at a remote age dwelt on these hills (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

JAP'HO, the Hebrew form (Josh. 19:46) of JOPPA (q. v.).

JAR'RAH (Heb. יָרְרָה, yah-raw', honey, 1 Chron. 9:42). See JEHOADAH.

JAR'EB (Heb. יָרֵב, yaw-rabe', adversary) occurs as a proper name in Hos. 5:13; 10:6, where a "King Jareb" is spoken of as the false refuge and final subjugator of the kingdom of Israel. It probably is a figurative title of the king of Assyria.

JAR'RED (Heb. יָרֵד, yeh'-red, descent), an antediluvian patriarch, the fifth from Adam. He was the son of Mahaleel and father of Enoch (Gen. 5:15-20; 1 Chron. 1:2; "Jered," Luke 3:37).

JARESIAH (Heb. יָרֵשִׁיָּה, yah-ar-esh-yaw', origin uncertain), one of the "sons" of Jehoram, a chief man of Benjamin resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:27).

JAR'HA (Heb. יָרְחָי, yar-khaw'), the Egyptian slave of Sheshan, a descendant of Jerahmeel. He was married to the daughter of his master, and, in consequence, obtained his freedom. Sheshan having no sons, his posterity were traced through this connection (1 Chron. 2:34-41). Some suppose that the name of Jarha's wife was Ahlai (v. 31; comp. 34), but the masculine form of the word, and the use of Ahlai (11:41) for a man, is adverse to this conclusion. Others suppose Ahlai to be a clerical error for Attai (v. 35); others again that Ahlai was a name given to Jarha on his incorporation into the family of Sheshan, while still others conjecture that Ahlai was a son of Sheshan, born after the marriage of his daughter.

JAR'IB (Heb. יָרִיב, yaw-rebe', adversary).

1. A son of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:24), given in Gen. 46:10 as JACHIN (q. v.).

2. One of the "chief men" sent by Ezra to procure a priest "for the house of God" on the return from Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16), B. C. about 457.

3. A priest of the "sons" of Jeshua, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:18), B. C. 456.

JAR'MUTH (Heb. יָרְמוּת, yar-mooth', elevation).

1. A town in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:35), and the seat of the Canaanitish king Pirim. He was one of the five who conspired to punish Gibeon for having made alliance with Israel (10:3, 5), and who were routed at Beth-horon and put to death by Joshua at Makkedah (v. 23). It is identified with the modern Yarmuk, a village with the remains of walls and cisterns of very ancient date.

2. A Levitical (Gershonite) city in the tribe of Asher (Josh. 21:29), called Remeth (19:21) and Ramoth (1 Chron. 6:73).

JARO'AH (Heb. יָרוֹחַ, yaw-ro'-akh, new moon), a chief man of the tribe of Gad resident in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:14), B. C. before 740.

JASHEN (Heb. יָשֵׁן, yaw-shane', sleeping), a person several of whose "sons" are named as among David's famous bodyguard (2 Sam. 23:32), called (1 Chron. 11:34) Hashem the Gizonite. The discrepancies between the two passages may, perhaps, best be reconciled by understanding the two braves referred to as being Jonathan Ben-shammah (or Ben-shageth) and Ahiam Ben-sharar (or Ben-sacar), grandsons of Jashen (or Hashem) of Gizon, in the mountains of Judah—hence called Hararites, B. C. before 1000.

JASHER, BOOK OF (Heb. סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר, say-fer hay-yaw-shaur', the book of the righteous, A. V. "Book of Jasher," Josh. 10:13; 2 Sam. 1:17, 18), the book of the upright or righteous man, that is to say, of the true members of the theocracy, or godly men. From the two references given it has been justly inferred that the book was a collection of odes in praise of certain heroes of the theocracy, with historical notices of their achievements interwoven. That the passage in Joshua quoted from this work is extracted from a song is evident enough, both from the poetical form of the composition and also from the parallelism of the sentences. The reference in 2 Sam. 1:18 is to an elegy upon Saul and Jonathan in the Book of Jasher. By some the Book of Jasher is supposed to have perished in the captivity.

JASHO'BEAM (Heb. יֶשְׁבַעִים, yaw-shob-aum', returning people).

1. A Hachmonite, one of David's warriors, and the first named of the two lists given of them (2 Sam. 23:8, "the Tachmonite," marg. "Joshebbassebet;" 1 Chron. 11:11). The former passage attributes to him the defeat of eight hundred, the latter of three hundred Philistines. This is accounted for by Kennicott (Diss., i, 95, 96) as follows: "י, the initial letter of the Hebrew words for three and eight, being used as an abbreviation, a mistake arose." Dr. Strong (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.) inclines to the supposition that "Jashobeam, or Joshebbash-shebeth (2 Sam. 23:8, margin) was the name or title of the chief, Adino and Eznite being descriptive epithets, and Hachmonite the patronymic of the same person." The exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines to procure a draught of water from the well of Bethlehem is ascribed to the three chief heroes, and therefore to Jashobeam, the first of the three (23:18-17), B. C. before 1000. See JOSHEB-BASH-SHEBETH.

2. One of the Korhites who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:6), B. C. before 1000.

3. One who commanded twenty-four thousand, and did duty in David's court in the month Nisan (1 Chron. 27:2). He was the son of Zabdiel, and, if the same as No. 1, his patronymic of "the Hachmonite" must refer to his race or office.

JASHUB (Heb. יָשׁוּב, yaw-shoob', he who returns).

1. The third son of Issachar, and founder of the family of the Jashubites (Num. 26:24; 1 Chron. 7:1). He is called Job (Gen. 46:13), perhaps by contraction, or corruption, or substitution, B. C. before 1640.

2. One of the sons of Bani, a layman in the time of Ezra who had to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29), B. C. 456.

JASH'UBI-LE'HEM (Heb. יָשׁוּבִי לֶחֶם, yaw-shoo'-be leh'-khem, returner of bread), a person or a place named among the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah by Bath-shua the Canaanitess (1 Chron. 4:22). It is probably a place, and we should infer that it lay on the western side of the tribe, in or near the Shefelah.

JASHUBITES, THE (Heb. יָשׁוּבִי, yaw-shoo-bee'), the family founded by Jashub the son of Issachar (Num. 26:24).

JASIEL (1 Chron. 11:47). See JAASIEL.

JASON (Gr. 'Ιάσων, ee-as'-oan, about to cure), of Thessalonica, was the man who entertained Paul and Silas in that city. The mob, in consequence, assaulted his house, and, not finding his guests, dragged Jason before the ruler, who released him on security (Acts 17:5-9). He is probably the same as the Jason mentioned in Rom. 16:21, as a kinsman of Paul, and probably accompanied him to Corinth (A. D. 54).

JASPER. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

JATH'NIEL (Heb. יָתִינְאֵל, yath-nee-ale', whom God bestows), the fourth son of Meshelemiah, a Korhite Levite, one of the doorkeepers of the temple (1 Chron. 26:2), B. C. about 960.

JAT'TIR (Heb. יַתִּיר, yat-teer', redundant), a city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:48), and with its suburbs assigned to the priests (Josh. 24:14; 1 Chron. 6:57). David was accustomed to visit Jattir in his freebooting days, and sent to his friends there gifts taken from his enemies (1 Sam. 30:27). According to Eusebius and Jerome it was in their time a large place inhabited by Christians, twenty miles from Eleutheropolis, probably on the site occupied by the ruins of Attir.

JAVAN (Heb. יָוָן, yaw-vavn', effervescing), the fourth named of the sons of Japheth, and father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (Gen. 10:2, 4; 1 Chron. 1:5, 7). The name appears in Isa. 66:19, where it is coupled with Tarshish, Pul, and Sud, and more particularly with Tubal and the "isles afar off," as representatives of the Gentile world; in Ezek. 27:13, among the places where the Syrians obtained articles of traffic; in Dan. 8:21; 10:20 (comp. 11:2; Zech. 9:13 A. V. "Græcia"), where Alexander the Great is styled king of Javan. A comparison of these passages leave no doubt that Javan was the name given to Greece by the Hebrews, and believed to be the country settled by his posterity. "The name Javan came from the Ionians or Iafones, on the Asiatic shores of the Ægean, but is used of all Greeks down to Alexander the Great" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 136). "A Yivána or 'Ionian,' a name which corresponds letter for letter with the Hebrew Javan, is referred to in one of the cuneiform tablets found at Tel el-Amarna, and written in the century before the Exodus, as being on a mission in the country of Tyre" (Sayce, Higher Crit., etc., p. 20).

JAVELIN. See ARMOR, 1 (3).

JAW (Hebrew usually יָדָי, lekh, ee', rendered jawbone; jaws, Psa. 22:15; jag teeth, Prov.

30:14; cheek teeth, Joel 1:6). The jawbone of an ass was the weapon with which Samson once did great slaughter (Judg. 15:15). See CHEEK.

JAZ'ER (Num. 32:1, 3; Josh. 21:39; 2 Sam. 24:5; 1 Chron. 6:31; 26:31; Isa. 16:8, 9; Jer. 48:32). See JAAZER.

JAZ'IZ (Heb. יַזִּיז, yaw-zeez', prominent), a Hagarite, and overseer of David's flocks (1 Chron. 27:31), which were probably pastured east of Jordan, where the forefathers of Jaziz had lived for ages (comp. vers. 19-22).

JEALOUSY (Heb. כִּנְיָהּ, kin-aw'; Gr. ζήλος, dzay'-los), properly suspicion of a wife's purity (Num. 5:14); often used of Jehovah's sensitive regard for the true faith of his Church (Exod. 20:5, etc.; 2 Cor. 11:2); used for anger or indignation, or intense interest for the welfare of another (Psa. 79:5; 1 Cor. 10:22; Zech. 1:14; 8:2). "I, Jehovah thy God, am a jealous God," who will not transfer to another the honor that is due to himself (Isa. 42:8; 48:11), nor tolerate the worship of any other god (Exod. 34:14), but who directs the warmth of his anger against those who hate him (Deut. 6:15) with the same energy with which the warmth of his love (Cant. 8:6) embraces those who love him, except that love in the form of grace reaches much farther than wrath" (K. and D., Com., in loc.). When speaking of the jealousy of God, we are to understand this language to be employed to illustrate, rather than represent the emotions of the divine mind. The same causes operating upon the human mind would produce what we call anger, jealousy, repentance, grief, etc.; and therefore, when these emotions are ascribed to the mind of God, this language is used because such emotions can be represented to us by no other.

JEALOUSY, IMAGE OF (Heb. תִּבְרַת הַכִּנְיָהּ, say'-mel hak-kin-aw'), the image seen by Ezekiel in the vision of the abominations of Jewish idolatry (Ezek. 8:3, 5). The idolatrous object was such as to excite the jealousy (q. v.) of Jehovah; probably Baal or Asherah, whose image had already been placed in the temple by Manasseh (2 Kings 21:7). "As the God of Israel, Jehovah cannot tolerate the image and worship of another god in his temple. To set up such an image in the temple of Jehovah was a practical renunciation of the covenant, a rejection of Jehovah on the part of Israel as its covenant God" (Keil, Com., in loc.).

JEALOUSY OFFERING (Heb. מִנְחַת כִּנְיָהּ, min-khath' ken-aw-oth', literally offering of jealousies, an intensive plural). If a man suspected his wife of adultery without her having been caught in the act, or without his having witnesses to prove her supposed guilt, then he was required to bring her to the priest, along with an offering (Num. 5:12, sq.). It consisted of a tenth of an ephah of barley flour, without oil or incense, called "an offering of jealousy, an offering of memorial." The priest set her before Jehovah, poured holy water (Exod. 30:18) into an earthen basin, and put dust into it from the floor of the sanctuary. Uncovering her head, he put the offering into her hand; and holding the water in his hand, he pronounced a solemn oath of purification before her, to which she responded, Amen, amen.

"The dust was strewn upon the water . . . as an allusion to the fact that dust was eaten by the serpent (Gen. 3:14) as a curse of sin, and therefore as a symbol of a state deserving a curse, a state of the deepest humiliation and disgrace (Psa. 72:9; Isa. 49:23; Mic. 7:17). On the very same ground an earthen vessel was chosen, that is to say, one quite worthless in comparison with a copper one. The loosening of the hair of the head is to be regarded here as a removal or loosening of the female headdress, and a symbol of the loss of the proper ornament of female morality and conjugal fidelity. . . . The priest, as a representative of God, held the vessel in his hand, with the water in it, which was called the 'water of bitterness, the curse-bringing,' inasmuch as, if the crime imputed to her was well-founded, it would bring upon the woman bitter suffering as the curse of God."

The priest wrote these curses, "those contained in the oath, in a roll, and washed them with the bitter water, i. e., washed the writing in the vessel, so that the words of the curse should pass into the water, and be imparted to it; a symbolical act, to set forth the truth that God imparted to the water the power to act injuriously upon a guilty body, though it would do no harm to an innocent one."

After all this was done he gave her the water to drink (Num. 5:11-31); although, according to v. 26, not till after the presentation of the sacrifice and the burning of the memorial upon the altar.

It cannot be determined with any certainty what was the nature of the disease threatened in the curse; but the idea of the curse seems to have been properly enunciated by Theodoret, "the punishment shall come from the same source as the sin." The punishment was to answer exactly to the crime, and to fall upon those bodily organs which had been the instruments of the woman's sin, viz., the organs of child-bearing.

JEALOUSY, WATERS OF. See JEALOUSY OFFERING.

JE'ARIM (Heb. יְעָרִים, yeh-aw-ream', forests), a mountain named in specifying the northern boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:10), having CHESALON (q. v.) upon it as a landmark.

JEATERAI (Heb. יְעָתַרַי, yeh-aw-ther-ah'ee, stepping), a Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. 6:21), generally thought to be the same called Ethni in v. 41.

JEBERECHI'AH (Heb. יְבֵרֵכִיָּהוּ, yeb-eh-rck-yaw'-hoo, whom Jehovah blesses), the father of Zechariah (not the prophet), which latter Isaiah took as one of the witnesses of his marriage with "the prophetess" (Isa. 8:2), or, as Delitzsch thinks (Com., in loc.), as witnesses of the writing upon the tablet, B. C. about 742.

JE'BUS (Heb. יְבוּס, yeb-oos', trodden), a Canaanitish city, identified with Jerusalem (Josh. 15:8; Judg. 19:10); Jebusi (Josh. 18:16, 28). David once captured it in brilliant achievement (2 Sam. 5:8). See JERUSALEM.

JEBUSITE, JEBUSITES (Hebrew always singular יְבוּסִי, yah-yeb-oo-see, except that it is יְבוּסִים in 2 Sam. 5:6; 24:16, 18; 1 Chron. 21:18, and יְבוּסִי in 2 Sam. 5:8; 1 Chron. 11:6; Zech. 9:7), one of the Canaanitish nations who were to be dispossessed by Israel. In the list of the doomed nations the Jebusites always come last, except in Ezra 9:1; Neh. 9:8. But this was not because they were of no account. They were mountaineers (Num. 13:29; Josh. 11:3). Their city was Jerusalem (Josh. 15:63), "which is Jebus" (1 Chron. 11:4). Their warlike character is shown by their whole history. It was Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, who raised the confederacy against Gibeon (Josh. 10:1-4). The Jebusites were summoned to take part in the confederacy headed by Jabin, king of Hazor (11:3). The king of Jerusalem was among those smitten by Joshua (12:10), and from Josh. 12:7 we might infer that Israel had taken their territory. But they still retained at least their royal city (Judg. 1:21) till the time of David (2 Sam. 5:6-8; 1 Chron. 11:4-6). Living on the border between Judah and Benjamin, the Jebusites dwelt with Judah (Josh. 15:63) and with Benjamin (Judg. 1:21), to which tribe Jerusalem belonged (Josh. 18:28). It is presumably implied that neither tribe was able to dislodge them.

The only real appearance of Jebusites after this is in the story of Araunah (2 Sam. 24:16-24), or Ornan (1 Chron. 21:14-27), the Jebusite. Neh. 9:8 is a historical reminiscence, and probably Zech. 9:7; but Ezra 9:1 certainly seems to imply the existence of the Jebusites as a distinct heathen tribe.

No allusions to special Jebusite institutions, customs, or religion are found. But two Jebusite names remain, Adoni-zedek (Josh. 10:1), which is Hebrew in form and means "Lord of justice," or "righteousness," and Araunah (Heb. אֲרָוֶנָה, arav-nah, q. אֲרָוֶנָה, 2 Sam. 24:16; אֲרָוֶנָה, q. אֲרָוֶנָה, v. 18; אֲרָוֶנָה in Chronicles). This name has a foreign look, and may be a Jebusite form.

The apocryphal Acts of the Apostles allude to a cave in Cyprus, "where the race of the Jebusites formerly dwelt," and to a "pious Jebusite, a kinsman of Nero."—W. H.

JECAMIAH (1 Chron. 3:18), elsewhere JEKAMIAH (q. v.).

JECHOLIAH (Heb. יְחֹלִיָּה, yek-ol-yaw', able through Jehovah), wife of Amaziah, king of Judah, and mother of Azariah, or Uziah (2 Kings 15:2), B. C. 797. In 2 Chron. 26:3 her name is given as Jecoliah.

JECHONIAS, the Greek form (Matt. 1:11, 12) of the name of King JECHONIAH (q. v.).

JECOLIAH (2 Chron. 26:3). See JECHOLIAH.

JECONIAH, an altered form of the name of King JECHOLACHIN (q. v.) found in 1 Chron. 3:16, 17; Esth. 2:6; Jer. 24:1; 27:20; 28:4; 29:2.

JEDIAH. 1. (Heb. יְדִיָּה, yed-av-yaw', praised of Jah). The son of Shimri and father of Allon, of the ancestors of Ziza, a chief Simeonite, who migrated to the valley of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:37), B. C. before 716.

2. (Hebrew same as No. 1). Son of Harumaph, and one of those who repaired the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10), B. C. 445.

3. (Heb. יְדִיָּה, yed-ah-yaw', Jah has known). The chief of the second division of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:7), B. C. about 960.

4. (Hebrew same as No. 3). A priest officiating in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:10; Neh. 11:10); in the latter passage called the son of Joiarib (probably a corrupt reading). He seems to have belonged to the family of Jeshua, nine hundred and seventy-three of his relatives accompanying him from Babylon (Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39). A Jediah is mentioned in Neh. 12:6, 7, 19, 21, but whether the same person or not is difficult to decide, some (Smith, Bib. Dict.) holding that there were two priestly families of this name. He is probably identical with the Jediah whom the prophet was directed to crown with the symbolical wreath (Zech. 6:10-14), B. C. 536-517.

JEDIAEL (Heb. יְדִיָּאֵל, yed-ee-ah-ale', known of God).

1. One of the "sons" of Benjamin, ancestor of many Benjamite families, numbering, according to David's census, seventeen thousand two hundred warriors (1 Chron. 7:6, 10, 11). He is usually identified with Ashbel (1 Chron. 8:1), but may have been a later descendant of Benjamin, who reached the first rank by reason of the fruitfulness of his house and the decadence of elder branches.

2. The son of Shimri, and one of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:45), and, perhaps, the chief of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (12:20), B. C. before 1000.

3. The second son of Meshelemiah, and a Korhite of the Levitical family of "the sons of Asaph." He was appointed a doorkeeper of the tabernacle by David (1 Chron. 26:2), B. C. about 960.

JEDIDAH (Heb. יְדִידָה, yed-ee-daw', beloved), the daughter of Adaiah of Bosath, wife of King Amon and mother of Josiah (2 Kings 22:1), B. C. 640.

JEDIDIAH (Heb. יְדִידִיָּה, yed-ee-deh-yaw', beloved by Jehovah), the name given by God through Nathan to Solomon (2 Sam. 12:25).

JEDITHUN (Heb. יְדִיתוּן, yed-ee-thoon'), the form given in 1 Chron. 16:38; Neh. 11:17; Psa. 39, title; and 77, title, of JEDUTHUN (q. v.).

JEDUTHUN (Heb. יְדִיתוּן, yed-oo-thoon', he who praises), a Merarite, and one of the masters of the sacred music appointed by David (1 Chron. 16:38, sq.; 25:1, 3, etc.), B. C. about 960. From a comparison of 1 Chron. 15:17, 19 with 16:41, 42; 25:1, 3, 6; 2 Chron. 35:15, some identify him with Ethan. In 2 Chron. 35:15 he is called the "king's seer." His sons appear sometimes as exercising the same office (1 Chron. 25:1, 3), at others as doorkeepers (16:42). His descendants are mentioned (2 Chron. 29:14) as taking part in purifying the temple in the reign of Hezekiah, and later still (Neh. 11:17; 1 Chron. 9:16) employed about the singing. His name is used (2 Chron. 35:15) instead of Jeduthunites (sons of Jeduthun).

JEE'ZER (Heb. יְעִזֵר, ee-elt'-zer, helpless, abridged for Abiezer), a son of Gilead of Manasseh (Num. 26:30), elsewhere (Josh. 17:2, etc.) called ABIEZER (q. v.).

JEE'ZERITES, the descendants (Num. 26:30) of Jeezer.

JE'GAR - SAHADU'THA (Chald. יְגַר סַחְדוּתָא, yeg-ar' sah-had-oo-thaov', heap of testimony), the Aramaean name given by Laban the Syrian to the heap of stones which he erected as a memorial of the compact between Jacob and himself, while Jacob commemorated the same by setting up a pillar (Gen. 31:47), as was his custom on several other occasions. Galeed, a "witness heap," is given as the Hebrew equivalent.

JEHALE'LEEL (Heb. יְהִלֵּל, yeh-hal-lal-ale', praiser of God), a descendant of Judah whose own immediate parentage is not known. Four of his sons are enumerated (1 Chron. 4:16).

JEHAL'ELEL (Hebrew same as above), a Merarite Levite whose son, Azariah, took part in the restoration of the temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12), B. C. 719.

JEHDE'IAH (Heb. יְהִדְיָהוּ, yekh-dee-yaw'-hoo, unity of Jah).

1. A descendant of Shubael, or Shebuel, of the family of Gershon, and head of a division of the Levitical temple as attendants arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:20; comp. 23:16), B. C. about 960.

2. A Meronothite who had charge of the royal asses under David (1 Chron. 27:30), B. C. 1000.

JEHEZ'EKEL (Heb. יְהִזְקֵאל, yekh-ez-kale', God will strengthen), the head of the twentieth "course" of priests under David (1 Chron. 24:16). See EZEKIEL.

JEHI'AH (Heb. יְהִיָּהוּ, yekh-ee-yaw', Jah liveth), a Levite associated with Obed-edom as "door-keeper of the ark" when brought by David to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24), B. C. 982. Called Jehiel, or Jeiel, in v. 18.

JEHI'EL (Heb. יְהִיֵּל, yekh-ee-ale', God lives, Nos. 1 and 2; יְהִיֵּלֵל, yeh-ee-ale', treasured of God).

1. A Benjamite, apparently the founder ("father") of, and resident at, Gibeon, and the husband of Maachah. A number of his sons are named (1 Chron. 9:35, sq.; comp. 8:29).

2. The son of Hothan, an Aroerite, one of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:44), B. C. 993.

3. A Levite "of the second degree," appointed by David to play upon a psaltery on the occasion of the removal of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:18, 20), in which former passage he and those named with him are called "porters." He is apparently the Jehiah of v. 24. By some he is identified with the Gershonite head of the Benc-Laadan in the time of David (23:8), who had charge of the treasures (29:8). If so, his descendants were called Jehieli (Jehielites, 26:21), B. C. 982.

4. Son of Hachmoni (or a Hachmonite), who was "with the king's sons," probably as tutor (1 Chron. 27:32). The mention of Abithophel (v. 33) seems to fix the date before the revolt, B. C. perhaps about 976.

5. The second named of the six brothers of Jehoram, and son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2). These brothers were all murdered by Jehoram upon his accession (v. 4), B. C. 850.

6. One of the descendants ("sons") of Heman the singer, who assisted King Hezekiah in his reformations (2 Chron. 29:14), and probably the same person who was appointed one of the superintendents of the sacred offerings (31:13), B. C. 719.

7. One of the "rulers of the house of God," who contributed liberally toward the temple sacrifices in the time of King Josiah (2 Chron. 35:8), B. C. 639.

8. The father of Obadiah, which latter returned with two hundred and eighteen males of the sons of Joab from Babylon, with Ezra (Ezra 8:9), B. C. before 457.

9. A priest, one of the "sons" of Harim, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:21), B. C. 457.

10. One of the "sons" of Elam, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:26), and probably the father of Shechaniah, who proposed that measure (v. 2), B. C. 457.

JEHI'ELI (Heb. יְהִיֵּלֵי, yekh-ee-ay-lee', Jehielite), a Gershonite Levite of the family of Laadan. His sons had charge of the treasures of the Lord's house (1 Chron. 26:21, 22), B. C. before 960.

JEHIZKI'AH (Heb. יְהִיזְכִּיָּהוּ, yekh-iz-kee-yaw'-hoo, same as Hezekiah, whom Jehovah strengthens), the son of Shallum, one of the leaders of Ephraim, who, at the instance of Obed the prophet, insisted upon the liberation of the captives brought into Samaria by the army under Pekah in the campaign against Judah (2 Chron. 28:12; comp. vers. 8, 13, 15), B. C. about 741.

JEHO'ADAH (Heb. יְהוֹאֲדָא, yeh-ho-ad-daw', whom Jehovah adorns), son of Ahaz, the great-grandson of Jonathan, the son of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36), called JARAH (q. v.) in 1 Chron. 9:42, B. C. considerably after 1037.

JEHOAD'DAN (Heb. יְהוֹאֲדָן, yeh-ho-ad-dawn', Jehovah pleased=Jehoadah), a woman of Jerusalem, queen of Joash and mother of Amaziah (2 Kings 14:2; 2 Chron. 25:1), B. C. 825.

JEHO'AHAZ (Heb. יְהוֹאָחָז, yeh-ho-aw-khawz', Jehovah sees).

1. The son and successor of Jehu, the twelfth king of Israel after the division of the kingdom (2 Kings 10:35). He reigned seventeen years B. C. 815-799. Following the sins of Jeroboam, his forces were defeated by the Syrians until they were reduced to fifty horsemen, ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen. In his humiliation he besought Jehovah, and a deliverer was granted to Israel, probably in the person of JEHOASH (q. v.), his son, who expelled the Syrians and reestablished the affairs of the kingdom (2 Kings 13:1-9, 25).

2. The third son of Josiah by Hamutal, called Shallum in 1 Chron. 3:15, where he is given as the fourth son, but by a comparison of 2 Kings 23:31, and 2 Chron. 36:11, we find that Zedekiah was the younger. After his father had been slain in resisting the progress of Pharaoh-necho, Jehoahaz was raised to the throne, at the age of twenty-three years, in preference to his elder brother, Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:31, 36). He was anointed at Jerusalem (v. 30), and found the land full of trouble, but free from idolatry (v. 24). He is described as an evil-doer (v. 32) and an oppressor (Ezek. 19:3), but seems to have been lamented by the people (Jer. 22:10; Ezek. 19:1). Pharaoh-necho, upon his return from the Euphrates, removed him from the throne, and put Jehoiakim in his place. Jehoahaz was taken first to Riblah in Syria, and then to Egypt, where he died. His reign lasted only three months, B. C. 608.

3. The name given (2 Chron. 21:17; 25:23) to the youngest son of Jehoram, king of Judah; usually called AHAZIAH (q. v.).

JEHO'ASH (Heb. יְהוֹאָשׁ, yeh-ho-avush', Jehovah-given).

1. The eighth king of Judah, and son of King Ahaziah (2 Kings 11:2), by Zibiah (2 Kings 12:1; 2 Chron. 24:1). He was born B. C. about 843. His aunt, Jehosheba, saved him from the massacre by ATHALIAH (q. v.). At the age of seven years he seems to have been the only living descendant of Solomon, and was then brought into the temple and anointed king. JEHOIADA (q. v.), the high priest, thought the time ripe for overthrowing the power of Athaliah, the usurper, and secured the cooperation of the royal bodyguard. The noisy greeting that was accorded Jehoash brought Athaliah to the temple, where she was seized and slain, B. C. 836. Jehoash behaved well as long as Jehoiada, his uncle, lived. Excepting that the high places were still resorted to for incense and sacrifice, pure religion was restored, and the temple was repaired. But after the death of his aged counselor evil advisers led him into sin; the law was neglected, idolatry prevailed, and God's anger kindled against him. Prophets were sent to warn him, but the ungrateful king responded by putting to death Zechariah, the son and successor of his benefactor Jehoiada. In about a year Hazael, king of Syria, came against him, overcame his forces, and, appearing before Jerusalem, was bought off with the treasures of the temple. Jehoash also suffered from a painful malady, and was at length slain by his own servants, B. C. 797. He was buried in the city of David, but not in the sepulcher of the kings (2 Kings chaps. 11, 12; 2 Chron. 24). He is one of the three kings omitted in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. 1:8).

2. The son and successor of Jehoahaz, king of Israel. (1) Reign. He became viceroy to his father (2 Kings 13:10), reigning thirteenth over the separate kingdom sixteen years, including his viceroyship, B. C. 799-783. According to the scriptural account, Jehoash "did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord; he departed not from all the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel sin: but he walked therein" (2 Kings 13:11). Josephus says (Ant., ix, 8, 6) that "He was a good man, and in disposition was not at all like his father." The statement in Kings is supposed by some to refer to the first part of his reign, while that of Josephus relates to the latter part, after a reclamation. (2) Interview with Elisha. Jehoash held Elisha in great veneration, and when he heard of the prophet's last illness he went to his bedside, wept over him, and said, "O, my father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof." The prophet promised him deliverance from the Syrian yoke in Aphek, and bid him smite upon the ground. The king smote thrice and then stayed, whereupon the prophet rebuked him for staying, and limited to three his victories over Syria. These promises were accomplished after the prophet's death, Jehoash in three successive victories overcoming the Syrians and retaking from them the towns which Hazael had rent from Israel (2 Kings 13:10, sq.). (3) War. The success of Jehoash appears to have made Amaziah, king of Judah, jealous, and he sought a quarrel with him. Jehoash replied with the parable of the "Thistle and the Cedar." But Amaziah was determined in his purpose, and a war ensued in which Jehoash was victorious. Having defeated Amaziah in Beth-shemesh, in Judah, he advanced against Jerusalem, broke down the walls to the extent of four hundred cubits, and carried away the treasures both of the temple and the palace, together with hostages for the future good behavior of Amaziah (2 Chron. 25:17-24). Jehoash, soon after his victory, died in peace, and was buried in Samaria (2 Kings 14:8-16).

JEHOHA'NAN (Heb. יְהוֹהָנָן, yeh-ho-khawnawn', Jehovah favored).

1. A Korhite, and head of the sixth division of the Levitical temple porters (1 Chron. 26:3), B. C. about 960.

2. The second named of the "captains" of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. He commanded two hundred and eighty thousand men (2 Chron. 17:15), and is, probably, the same whose son Ishmael supported Jehoiada in the restoration of prince Jehoash (23:1), B. C. about 875.

3. An Israelite of the family of Bebai, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:28), B. C. 456.

4. A leading priest, descendant of Amariah, which latter returned with Zerubbabel. He was contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. 12:13; comp. vers. 2 and 12), B. C. considerably after 536.

5. A priest who took part in the musical services at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42), B. C. 445.

JEHOI'ACHIN (Heb. יְהוֹיָכִן, yeh-ho-yawkeen', Jehovah will establish), son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and Nehushta, daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem; called also Coniah. (1) Reign. He succeeded his father as the nineteenth king over the separate kingdom, and reigned three months and ten days, B. C. 597. His age at his accession was eighteen years, according to 2 Kings 24:8, but eight years according to 2 Chron. 36:9 (see NORE). Jehoiachin "did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord," and probably opposed the interests of the Chaldean empire, for in three months after his accession we find Nebuchadnezzar laying siege to Jerusalem, as Jeremiah had predicted (Jer. 22:18-30). Immediately after Jehoiachin's succession the Egyptians were completely driven out of Asia, the fortresses south of Jerusalem were invested, and numbers of the inhabitants of the lowlands carried away as prisoners. Jerusalem was at the time quite defenseless, and in a short time Jehoiachin surrendered at discretion (with the queen-mother, and all his servants, captains, and officers) to Nebuchadnezzar, who carried them, with the eunuchs and harem, to Babylon (Jer. 24:1, 29; comp. Ezek. 17:2). The number of captives is given in 2 Kings 24:14 as ten thousand, including warriors, craftsmen, and others. Nebuchadnezzar also took the treasures found in palace and temple (v. 13), and placed Mattaniah, the only surviving son of Josiah, on the throne, changing his name to Zedekiah (2 Kings 24:14-17).

(2) Captivity. Jehoiachin was placed in prison in Babylon, where he remained for thirty-six years, until the death of Nebuchadnezzar, when Evil-merodach not only released him, but gave him a seat at his own table and an allowance for his support (2 Kings 25:27-30; Jer. 52:31-34), B. C. 561. We learn from Jer. 28:4, that four years after he had gone to Babylon there was an expectation at Jerusalem of Jehoiachin's return, but Jeremiah accuses Hananiah, who thus prophesied, of falsehood (v. 15). The tenor of Jeremiah's letter to the elders of the captivity (ch. 29) would seem to indicate that there was a party among the captivity who were looking for the overthrow of Nebuchadnezzar and the return of Jehoiachin. Neither Daniel nor Ezekiel makes any further allusion to him, except that Ezekiel dates his prophecies by the year "of King Jehoiachin's captivity" (1:2; 8:1; 24:1, etc.), the latest date being the twenty-seventh year (29:17; 40:1).

NOTE.—(1) Jehoiachin's Age. He was at his accession eighteen years of age, according to 2 Kings 24:8, but only eight according to 2 Chron. 36:9. The usual explanation of this difference is that he reigned ten years in conjunction with his father. This would make him eight at the beginning of his joint reign, and eighteen when he began to reign alone. "The probability is that 'eight' in the latter text is a corruption (the 7, 10, being 'dropped out') (Haley, Discrepancies)." (2) Time of Capture. His capture was in Nebuchadnezzar's eighth year, according to 2 Kings 24:12; but in the seventh according to Jer. 52:28. This discrepancy may have arisen either from a slight mistake in numeral letters or else from a different method of counting regnal years (Haley, Discrepancies). (3) Childless. The expression (Jer. 22:30) ("Write ye this man childless" refers to his having no legally reckoned successor on the throne, for he had children (Orelli, Com., in loc.; Meth. Quar. Review, October, 1852, pp. 602-604; McC. and S., Cyc.; Smith, Dict., s. v.).

JEHOI'ADA (Heb. יהוידָע, yeh-ho-yaw-daw', known as Jehovah).

1. The father of Benaiah, one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. 8:18; 20:23; 23:20, 22; 1 Kings 1:8, sq.; 2:25, sq.; 4:4; 1 Chron. 11:22, 24; 18:17; 27:5), B. C. before 1000. He is probably the same person mentioned as leader of three thousand seven hundred Aaronites who assisted David at Hebron (1 Chron. 12:27). In 1 Chron. 27:34 his name seems to have been transposed with that of his son, although Keil (Com., in loc.) suggests that the Jehoiada mentioned there was a grandson of this Jehoiada.

2. The high priest at the time of Athaliah's usurpation, B. C. 842, and during most of the reign of Jehoash. He married Jehosheba, daughter of King Jehoram and sister of King Ahaziah. When ATHALIAH (q. v.) slew the royal family, Jehoiada with his wife stole and secreted Jehoash, and after six years placed him on the throne. In this revolution Jehoiada showed great tact and ability. He waited until public sentiment seemed ripe for a change, and then entered into secret alliance with the chief partisans of the house of David and of the true religion. He gathered at Jerusalem the Levites from the different cities, and concentrated a large concealed force in the temple by the expedient of not dismissing the old courses of priests and Levites when their successors came to relieve them. These were armed by means of the shields and armor deposited in the temple treasury by David, divided into three bands, and posted at the principal entrances. The courts were filled with people favorable to the cause, and then Jehoiada produced the young king, and crowned and anointed him, and presented him with a copy of the Law, according to Deut. 17:18-20. Nor did Jehoiada forget the sanctity of the temple, none but the priests and ministering Levites being allowed to enter; and strict orders having been given that Athaliah should not be slain within its precincts. The new reign was inaugurated by a solemn covenant between himself, as high priest, and the people and king to renounce the worship of Baal, which was followed by the destruction of the altar and temple of Baal and the death of his priest, Mattan. His influence over the young king was very beneficial, who ruled well and prosperously during Jehoiada's lifetime. The restoration of the temple in the twenty-third year of his reign was carried on under Jehoiada's supervision. For account of this work see 2 Kings, ch. 12, and 2 Chron., ch. 24. At length he died at the age of one hundred and thirty years (2 Chron. 24:15), and, as a signal honor, was buried "in the city of David among the kings." B. C. perhaps 798. He is, doubtless, the same with Berechiah (Barachias, Matt. 23:35), whose son Zechariah was slain by command of the king (2 Chron. 24:20-22).

3. The son of Paseah, apparently one of the chief priests who with Meshullam repaired the "old gate" of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6), B. C. 446.

4. A priest who was in Jerusalem when the Jews were led into captivity, but who was displaced, Zephaniah being put in his stead (Jer. 29:26).

JEHOI'AKIM, the eighteenth king of the separate kingdom of Judah.

1. Name and Family (Heb. יהויָאִים, yeh-ho-yaw-keem', Jehovah established). His original name was Eliakim, but its equivalent, Jehoiakim, was given him by Pharaoh-necho, the Egyptian king. He was the second son of Josiah by Zebudah, the daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah (2 Kings 23:36), born B. C. 633.

2. Personal History. (1) Made king. Jehoiakim's younger brother, Jehoahaz, or Shallum (Jer. 22:11), was made a king at the death of his father, Josiah. The intention, probably, was for him to follow up his father's policy in siding with Nebuchadnezzar against Egypt. Pharaoh-necho, having overcome all resistance with his victorious army, deposed Jehoahaz, made him a prisoner in Riblah, and afterward took him to Egypt. He set Eliakim upon the throne, B. C. 608, changing his name to Jehoiakim, and charged him with collecting a tribute of one hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold, nearly two hundred thousand dollars (2 Kings 23:33-35; 2 Chron. 36:3, 4).

(2) Made a vassal. After the battle of Carchemish Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem, and, taking the king prisoner, "bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon." He also took "of the vessels of the house of the Lord," and carried them to the temple of Bel (his god) in Babylon (2 Chron. 36:6, 7). Nebuchadnezzar, for some reason, seems to have abandoned his intention of conveying Jehoiakim to Babylon, and restored him to his throne as a vassal (2 Kings 24:1; Jer. 25:1).

(3) Destroys the roll. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign the prophet Jeremiah caused a collection of his prophecies to be written out by Baruch and publicly read in the temple. This coming to the knowledge of the king, he sent for it and had it read before him. He listened to only a small portion of it, and then took the roll, and, cutting it in pieces, burned it in the fire. But Jeremiah was bidden to take another roll and write upon it the same words, with the addition of another and an awful denunciation (Jer., ch. 36).

(4) Rebellion and death. After three years of subjection Jehoiakim, deluded by the Egyptian party in his court (comp. Josephus, Ant., x, 6, 2), withheld his tribute and rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 24:1). This step was taken against the earnest protestation of Jeremiah, and in violation of his oath. We are not informed as to what moved Jehoiakim to this rebellion, but it may be that seeing Egypt entirely severed from the affairs of Syria since the battle of Carchemish, and Nebuchadnezzar wholly occupied with distant wars, he hoped to make himself entirely independent. His reign was now turbulent and unhappy. Bands of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites came against him and cruelly harassed the country. It was perhaps at this time that the great drought occurred described in Jer., ch. 14 (comp. Jer., ch. 15, with 2 Kings 24:2, 3). In the closing years of his reign the Ammonites appear to have overrun the land of Gad (Jer. 49:1), and other nations ravaged Israel (Ezek., ch. 25). Jehoiakim came to his end, as was predicted, in a violent manner, and his body was thrown over the wall, perhaps to convince the enemy of his death. It was afterward taken away and given an unhonored burial (Jer. 22:18, 19; 36:30; 2 Kings 23:36; 24:1-7; 2 Chron. 36:4-8), B. C. 597.

3. Character. Jehoiakim was a vicious and irreligious man, and one who encouraged the abominations of idolatry (Jer. 19, which chapter is supposed to refer to his reign). The vindictive pursuit of URIJAH (q. v.), and the indignities offered to his corpse by the king's command, are samples of his irreligion and cruelty (26:20-23). His daring impiety is shown by his treatment of the roll containing Jeremiah's prophecy; and his selfishness is shown by his spending large sums in building magnificent palaces for himself when the land was impoverished by the tributes laid upon it by Egypt and Babylon (22:14, 15).

NOTE.—(1) No Successor. In Jer. 36:30 it is predicted of Jehoiakim that "He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David," while 2 Kings 24:6 states that "Jehoiachin his son reigned in his stead." In answer, we state that Jehoiachin's reign lasted but three months, and the Hebrew term rendered "sit" in Jeremiah implies some degree of permanence; and hence there is no collision between the passages (Haley, Discrepancies, p. 346). (2) Carried to Babylon, etc. It is stated in 2 Chron. 36:6 that Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim in fetters to carry him to Babylon; but in 2 Kings 24:6 it is said that he "slept with his fathers," and in Jer. 22:19 that his body should be "cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem." The probability is that he was bound with the intention of carrying him to Babylon, but instead was slain and his corpse ignominiously treated (Rawlinson).

JEHOI'ARIB (Heb. יהויָאָרִיב, yeh-ho-yaw-reeb', Jehovah will contend), head of the first of the twenty-four courses of priests, as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:7), B. C. about 961. Some of his descendants returned from the Babylonish captivity (1 Chron. 9:10; Neh. 11:10, A. V. "Joiarib"). Jewish tradition asserts that only four of the courses returned from Babylon, viz., Jedaiah, Immer, Pashur, and Harim, and that they were subdivided into six each, to keep up the old number of twenty-four. But we find that other of the priestly courses are mentioned as returning (Neh. 10:2-8), and in the list (12:1-7) that of Jehoiarib is expressly mentioned. In the other passages the name is abbreviated, both in Hebrew and A. V., to JOIARIB (q. v.).

JEHON'ADAB (Heb. יהונָאָדָב, yeh-ho-naw-davb', Jehovah impels).

1. The son of Shimeah, and nephew of David, and a friend of Amnon. He gave the latter the wicked advice that resulted in the ensnaring of Amnon's sister, Tamar (2 Sam. 13:3), B. C. about 974. When Amnon was murdered by Absalom, and the exaggerated report reached David that all the princes were slaughtered, Jonadab was aware of the real fact, and, being with the king, assured him that Amnon alone was slain (vers. 32, 33; A. V. shorter form "Jonadab").

2. A son (or descendant) of Rechab, the founder of a peculiar tribe, who bound themselves to abstain from wine, and never to relinquish the nomadic life. This mode of life, partly monastic, partly Bedouin, was adhered to from generation to generation, and when, many years after the death of Jehonadab, the Rechabites were forced to take refuge from the Chaldean invasion within the walls of Jerusalem, nothing would induce them to transgress the rule of their ancestor (Jer. 35:19, A. V. "Jonadab"). The single occasion in which Jehonadab appears before us in the historical narrative is in 2 Kings 10:15, sq., B. C. about 842. Jehu was advancing, after the slaughter of Beth-ekeked, on the city of Samaria, and met Jehonadab. Upon being assured that he was in sympathy with the king, he was taken up into the chariot and intrusted with the king's secret, viz., the destruction of the Baalites. He then proceeded to Samaria in the royal chariot. It may be that Jehonadab had been commissioned by the people of Samaria to meet the king on the road and appease him. If so, his venerable character, his rank as head of a tribe, and his neutral position, well qualified him for the task. No doubt he acted with Jehu throughout, but the only occasion in which he is expressly mentioned is when he went with Jehu through the temple of Baal to turn out any who might happen to be in the mass of pagan worshipers (2 Kings 10:23).

JEHON'ATHAN (Heb. יְהוֹנָתָן, yeh-ho-naw-thawn', Jehovah-given).

1. The full Hebrew form of the name JONATHAN (q. v.), the eldest son of King Saul. The name is given in the A. V. in the shorter form.

2. The son of Uzziah, and superintendent of certain of King David's storehouses (1 Chron. 27:25), B. C. after 1000.

3. The name of one of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah to teach the law to the people (2 Chron. 17:8), B. C. 875.

4. The name of a priest (Neh. 12:18), and a representative of the family of Shemaiah (v. 6) in the days of Joiakim, B. C. after 536.

JEHORAM (Heb. יְהוֹרָם, yeh-ho-rawm', exalted by Jehovah), contracted form Joram (יֹרָם, yo-rawm').

1. The son of Ahab and Jezebel, and successor of his brother Ahaziah, who died childless. He was the tenth king on the separate throne of Israel, and reigned twelve years. (2 Kings 1:17; 3:1), B. C. 853-842.

Personal History. (1) War against Moabites. After the death of Ahab the Moabites, who had been tributary to Israel, asserted their independence; and their king, MESHIA (q. v.), withheld his tribute of one hundred thousand lambs and one hundred thousand rams, with the wool. Thereupon Jehoram asked and obtained the help of Jehoshaphat (king of Judah) in a war against the revolting Moabites. While marching through the wilderness of Edom the armies were in great danger through lack of water. Jehoshaphat suggested an inquiry of some prophet of Jehovah, and Elisha was found with the host. He severely rebuked Jehoram, and bid him inquire of the prophets of Baal; but afterward predicted a great victory over the Moabites. The king was directed to have many ditches dug in the valley, and was assured that they would be filled immediately with water. The Moabites, advancing, saw the water reddened like blood with the rays of the morning sun, and concluding that the allies had fallen out and slain each other, advanced incautiously. They were put to rout, and their land utterly ravaged (2 Kings 3:1-25).

(2) Invasion of Samaria. A little later war again broke out between Syria and Israel, and we find Elisha befriending Jehoram. The king was made acquainted with the secret counsels of the Syrian king, and was thus enabled to defeat them; and the blinding of the Syrian soldiers by God procured a cessation of the invasion (2 Kings 6:8-23). (3) Further disasters. But it seems probable that when the Syrian inroads ceased, and he felt less dependent upon the aid of the prophet, he relapsed into idolatry, and was rebuked by Elisha, and threatened with a return of the calamities from which he had escaped. Refusing to repent, a fresh invasion by the Syrians and a close siege of Samaria actually came to pass, according, probably, to the word of the prophet. Hence, when the terrible incident arose, in consequence of the famine, of a woman boiling and eating her own child, the king immediately attributed the evil to Elisha, the son of Shaphat, and determined to take away his life. The providential interposition by which both Elisha's life was saved and the city delivered is narrated in 2 Kings, ch. 7, and Jehoram appears to have returned to a friendly feeling toward Elisha (2 Kings 8:4, sq.). (4) Alliance with Ahaziah. It was very soon after the above events that Elisha went to Damascus and predicted the revolt of Hazael and his accession to the throne of Syria in the room of Ben-hadad. Jehoram seems to have thought the revolution in Syria, which immediately followed Elisha's prediction, a good opportunity to pursue his father's favorite project of recovering Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians. He accordingly made an alliance with his nephew Ahaziah, who had just succeeded Joram on the throne of Judah, and the two kings proceeded to occupy Ramoth-gilead by force. The expedition was an unfortunate one. Jehoram was wounded in battle, and obliged to return to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds (2 Kings 8:29; 9:14, 16), leaving his army under Jehu to hold Ramoth-gilead against Hazael. Jehu, however, and the army under his command, revolted from their allegiance to Jehoram (2 Kings, ch. 9), and, hastily marching to Jezreel, surprised Jehoram, wounded and defenseless as he was. Jehoram, going out to meet him, fell pierced by an arrow from Jehu's bow on the very plat of ground which Ahab had wrested from Naboth the Jezreelite; thus fulfilling to the letter the prophecy of Elijah (1 Kings 21:21-29). With the life of Jehoram ended the dynasty of Omri. Jehoram, like his father, was an idolater, laying aside his worship of Baal, probably after his rebuke by Elisha, but still clinging to the abominations of Jeroboam (1 Kings 12:26, 31, 32).

2. Eldest son and successor of Jehoshaphat, and fifth king on the separate throne of Judah. He was crowned at the age of thirty-two, and reigned eight years, from B. C. 850-843 (2 Kings 8:16; 2 Chron. 21:1-6). Jehosheba, his daughter, was wife to the high priest Jehoiada. As soon as he was fixed on the throne he put his six brothers to death, with many of the chief nobles of the land. He then, probably at the instance of his wife, Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, proceeded to establish the worship of Baal (2 Kings 8:18, 19). A prophetic writing from the aged prophet Elijah (2 Chron. 21:12-15) failed to produce any good effect upon him. This was in the first or second year of his reign. The remainder of it was a series of calamities. First the Edomites, who had been tributary to Jehoshaphat, revolted from his dominion, and, according to old prophecies (Gen. 27:40), established their permanent independence. Next Libnah, one of the strongest fortified cities in Judah (2 Kings 19:8), rebelled against him. Then followed invasions of armed bands of Philistines and of Arabians, who stormed the king's palace, put his wives and all his children, except his youngest son, Ahaziah, to death (2 Chron. 22:1), or carried them into captivity, and plundered all his treasures. He died of a terrible disease (2 Chron. 21:19, 20) early in the twelfth year of his brother-in-law Jehoram's reign over Israel.

Character. Jehoram was an impious and cruel tyrant, manifesting his impiety by the setting up of Baal worship in the high places, and prostituting the daughters of Judah to the infamous rites of Ashteroth; and showing his cruelty by the murder of all his brothers—the first example of that abominable mode of avoiding a disputed succession.

NOTE.—(1) Jehoram's accession. It is stated in 2 Kings 1:17 that Jehoram, the son of Ahab, began to reign in the second year of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat; while in 2 Kings 8:16 it says that the latter began to reign in the fifth year of the former. To reconcile these statements let us remember that Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, was for some time joint ruler with his father. Now, suppose that in the second year of this joint reign Jehoram (son of Ahab) began his reign; then that in the fifth year of the latter the former began to reign alone. This will make the joint reign about five years long. (2) Jehoram's sons. In 2 Chron. 21:16, 17 it is stated that the sons of Jehoram were taken captive; but in 2 Chron. 22:1 that they were slain. The presumption is that they were first taken captive and afterward slain (Haley, Discrepancies, p. 346).

3. One of the priests sent by Jehoshaphat, to instruct the people in the law (2 Chron. 17:8), B. C. after 875.

JEHOSHAB'EATH (Heb. יהושב־אֵת, yeh-ho-shab-ath', Jehovah sworn), the form in which the name of JEHOSEBA (q. v.) is given in 2 Chron. 22:11. It is stated here, but not in Kings, that she was the wife of Jehoiada, the high priest.

JEHOSH'APHAT (Heb. יהושפט, yeh-ho-shaw-fawt', Jehovah judged).

1. Son of Ahilud, who filled the office of recorder or annalist in the courts of David (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24; 1 Chron. 18:15) and Solomon (1 Kings 4:3), B. C. 984-965.

2. Son of Paruah, one of the twelve purveyors of King Solomon (1 Kings 4:17). His district was Issachar, B. C. about 960.

3. The fourth king of the separate kingdom of Judah was the son of Asa (by Azubah), whom he succeeded on the throne when he was thirty-five years old, and reigned twenty-five years (875-850). His history is to be found among the events recorded in 1 Kings 15:24; 2 Kings 8:16, or in a continuous narrative in 2 Chron. 17:1-21:3. He was contemporary with Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram. (1) Strengthens himself. At first he strengthened himself against Israel by fortifying and garrisoning the cities of Judah and the Ephraimite conquests of Asa (2 Chron. 17:1, 2). But soon afterward the two Hebrew kings, perhaps appreciating their common danger from Damascus and the tribes on their eastern frontier, formed an alliance. Jeshoshaphat's eldest son, Jehoram, married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. (2) Resists idolatry. In his own kingdom Jehoshaphat ever showed himself a zealous follower of the commandments of God; he tried, it would seem not quite successfully, to put down the high places and groves in which the people of Judah burnt incense (1 Kings 22:43; 2 Chron. 17:8; 20:33). In his third year he sent out certain princes, priests, and Levites, to go through all the cities of Judah, teaching the people out of the Book of the Law (2 Chron. 17:7-9). Riches and honors increased around him. He received tribute from the Philistines and Arabians, and kept up a large standing army in Jerusalem (2 Chron. 17:10, sq.). (3) Alliance with Ahab.

He went to Samaria to visit Ahab and become his ally against the Syrians. Desirous of consulting the Lord, Micah was sent for; but he did not make the impression upon Jehoshaphat which might have been expected, or else the king felt bound in honor not to recede. He came very near falling a victim to the plan that Ahab had laid for his own safety, but escaped and returned to Jerusalem in peace (1 Kings 22:1, sq.; 2 Chron., ch. 18-19:1). There he met the just reproaches of the prophet Jehu, and went himself through the people, "from Beersheba to Mount Ephraim," reclaiming them to the law of God (2 Chron. 19:1-3). (4) Further reforms. He tried to remedy the many defects in the local administration of justice and applied himself to their remedy. He appointed magistrates in every city, and a supreme council at Jerusalem, composed of priests, Levites, and "the chief of the fathers," to which difficult cases were referred, and appeals brought from the provincial tribunals (2 Chron. 19:4-11). (5) Commerce. Turning his attention to foreign commerce, he built at Ezion-geber, with the help of Ahaziah, a navy designed to go to Ophir; but it was wrecked at Ezion-geber. He afterward, through the advice of Eliezer, the prophet, declined the cooperation of the king of Israel, and the voyage prospered. The trade was, however, soon abandoned (2 Chron. 20:35-37; 1 Kings 22:49). (6) Wars. After the death of Ahaziah, king of Israel, Jehoram, his successor, persuaded Jehoshaphat to join him in an expedition against Moab. The allied armies were saved by a miraculous supply of water, and were afterward victorious over the enemy (2 Kings 3:4-27). Another war, and to Jehoshaphat much more dangerous, was kindled by this. The Moabites turned their wrath against him, and induced the Ammonites, the Syrians, and the Edomites to unite with them. Jehoshaphat, believing that his help was to come from God, proclaimed a fast, and the people assembled in Jerusalem to implore divine assistance. "And Jehoshaphat stood in the congregation of Judah and Jerusalem, in the house of the Lord, before the new court. . . . O our God, wilt thou not judge them? for we have no might against this great company that cometh against us; neither know we what to do; but our eyes are upon thee." After he ceased praying Jehaziel, a Levite, pronounced deliverance in the name of the Lord, assuring Judah of the overthrow of the enemy without a blow from them. And so it happened; for the allies quarreled among themselves and destroyed each other. This great event was recognized by the surrounding nations as the act of God, and they allowed Jehoshaphat to close his life in quiet (2 Chron., ch. 20). During the last years of his reign his son JEJORAM (q. v.) was associated with him in the government. His name (Josphat) occurs in the ancestral list of our Lord (Matt. 1:8).

Character. The character of Jehoshaphat is thus summed up: "Jehoshaphat sought the Lord with all his heart" (2 Chron. 22:9). "His good talents, the benevolence of his disposition, and his generally sound judgment, are shown not only in the great measures of domestic policy which distinguished his reign, but by the manner in which they were executed. No trace can be found in hip of that pride which dishonored some and ruined others of the kings who preceded and followed him."

4. Son of Nimshi and father of King Jehu (2 Kings 9:2, 14), B. C. before 842.

5. One of the priests who (1 Chron. 15:24) were appointed to blow trumpets before the ark when it was carried from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem, B. C. about 982.

JEHOSH'APHAT, VALLEY OF, the name given to the valley situated between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, which in modern times has been used by the Jews as a burying-ground. There is a typical use of the word, in a sense of divine judgments upon the enemies of God and his people (Joel 3:2, 12). In this valley Jehoshaphat overthrew the united enemies of Israel (2 Chron. 20:26, A. V. "valley of Berachah").

JEHOSH'EBA (Heb. יהושׁבֵּבַת, yeh-ho-shebb'bah, Jehovah her oath, that is, worshiper of Jehovah), the daughter of Joram, sister of Ahaziah, aunt of Joash, all kings of Judah, and wife of Jehoiada, the high priest (2 Kings 11:2). Her name in the Chronicles (2 Chron. 22) is given Jehoshabeath. As she is called (2 Kings 11:2), "the daughter of Joram, sister of Ahaziah," it has been conjectured that she was the daughter, not of Athaliah, but of Joram by another wife. By her the infant Joash was rescued from the massacre of the seed royal by Athaliah, and he and his nurse secreted in the palace and afterward in the temple (2 Kings 11:2, 3; 2 Chron. 22:11, 12). He was brought up, probably, with her sons (2 Chron. 23:11), who assisted at his coronation (B. C. 842).

JEHOSH'UA (Num. 13:16), or JEHOSH'UAH (1 Chron. 7:27), fuller forms in the A. V. of the name JOSHUA (q. v.).

JEHO'VAH (Heb. יהוָה, yeh-ho-vav'; LXX. usually δ Kύριος, ho koo'-ree-os), the name of God most frequently used in the Hebrew Scriptures; but commonly represented—we cannot say rendered—in the A. V. by "Lord."

1. Pronunciation. The true pronunciation of this name, by which God was known to the Hebrews, has been entirely lost, the Jews themselves scrupulously avoiding every mention of it, and substituting in its stead one or other of the words with whose proper vowel points it may happen to be written; usually the name Adonai. They continued to write YHVH, but read Adonai. Where God is called "My Lord Jehovah" (Heb. יהוָה יְהוָה), to avoid the double Adonai, Elohim (Heb. אֱלֹהִים) was substituted. When the vowel points were added to the Hebrew text the rule, in the case of words written but not read, was to attach to these words the vowels belonging to the words read in place of them. Thus they attached to יהוָה the points of אֱדֹנָי (ad'noy); hence the form יהוָה יְהוָה, and the name Y'hovah. The strong probability is that the name Jehovah was anciently pronounced YAHVE (יהוֹהֵ), like the LABE of the Samaritans. This custom, which had its origin in reverence, and has almost degenerated into a superstition, was founded upon an erroneous rendering of Lev. 24:16, from which it was inferred that the mere utterance of the name constituted a capital offense. According to Jewish tradition, it was pronounced but once a year by the high priest on the Day of Atonement when he entered the Holy of Holies; but on this point there is some doubt. On the authority of Maimonides we learn that it ceased with Simeon the Just. But even after the destruction of the second temple instances are met with of individuals who were in possession of the mysterious secret.

2. Import. The passage in Exod 3:14 seems to furnish designedly a clew to the meaning of the word. When Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, the Almighty, who appeared in the burning bush, communicated to him the name which he should give as the credentials of his mission: "And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM (Heb. אֲנִי אֲנִי אֲנִי, eh-yeh' ash-cr' eh-yeh'); and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you."

"In both names eh-yeh' (Heb. אֲנִי אֲנִי) and YAVH (Heb. יהוָה), the root idea is that of undervived existence. When it is said that God's name is He Is, simple being is not all that is affirmed. He is in a sense in which no other being is. He is; and the cause of his being is in himself. He is because he is. . . . From the idea of undervived and independent existence, which seems to be the root idea in this divine name, follows that of independent and uncontrolled will and action."

3. When Made Known. "The words 'By my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them' (Exod. 6:3) do not mean, however, that the patriarchs were altogether ignorant of the name Jehovah. When Jehovah established his covenant with Abram he said, 'I am EL SHADDAI, God Almighty,' and from that time forward manifested himself to Abram and his wife as the Almighty, in the birth of Isaac, which took place apart altogether from the powers of nature, and also in the preservation, guidance, and multiplication of his seed; now he was about to reveal himself to Israel as JEHOVAH, as the absolute Being working with unbounded freedom in the performance of his promises" (K. and D., Com., on Exod. 6:3). Respecting the difference between Jehovah and Elohim, see ELOHIM.

JEHO'VAH-JI'REH (Heb. יהוָה יִרְאֶה, yeh-ho-vav' yir-eh', Jehovah will see, i. e., provide), the name given by Abraham to the mount on which the angel of the Lord appeared to him and not only arrested the sacrifice of Isaac, but provided a ram in his place (Gen. 22:14). See MORIAH.

Jehovah-Nissi (Heb. יְהוָה נִסִּי, yeh-ho-vaw' nees-see', Jehovah my banner), the name given by Moses to an altar which he erected upon the hill where he sat with uplifted hands during the successful battle against the Amalekites (Exod. 17:15). Nothing is said about sacrifices being offered upon the altar, and it has been suggested that the altar with its expressive name was merely to serve as a memorial to posterity of the gracious help of Jehovah.

Jehovah-Shalom (Heb. יְהוָה שָׁלוֹם, yeh-ho-vaw' shaw-lome', Jehovah-peace), the name given to an altar erected by Gideon in Ophrah after Jehovah had given him the commission to deliver Israel from the Midianites, confirming it by miracles and a message of peace (Judg. 6:24). As it was a time of backsliding, Gideon gave expression to his surprise and gratitude by erecting this altar a monument to Jehovah as the God of peace.

Jehovah-Shammah (Heb. יְהוָה שָׁמָּה, yeh-ho-vaw' shawm'-mah, Jehovah is there), the figurative name given by Ezekiel (48:35, A. V. "The Lord is there") to the spiritual Jerusalem seen by him in his vision. The expression seems to signify that Jehovah has turned his favor once more to Jerusalem, which was laid waste.

Jehozabad (Heb. יְהוֹזָבָד, yeh-ho-zaw-bawd', Jehovah endowed).

1. The son of Shomer (or Shimrith), a Moabitess, and one of the two servants who assassinated King Jehoash of Judah in that part of Jerusalem called Millo (2 Kings 12:21; 2 Chron. 24:26), B. C. about 797.

2. A Korahite Levite, second son of Obbedom, and one of the porters of the south gate of the temple, and of the storehouse appointed by David (1 Chron. 26:4, 15), B. C. about 960.

3. The last named of Jehoshaphat's generals, who had the command of one hundred and eighty thousand troops (2 Chron. 17:18), B. C. about 875.

Jehozadak (Heb. יְהוֹזָדָק, yeh-ho-tsaw-dawk', justified by Jehovah, A. V. "Josedeck" in Haggai and Zechariah; also contracted Jozadak in Ezra and Nehemiah), son of the high priest Seraiah at the time of the Babylonish captivity (1 Chron. 6:14, 15), B. C. 588. Whether he succeeded to the high priesthood after the slaughter of his father (2 Kings 25:18-21) is not known. But if he did he had no opportunity of performing the functions of his office, as he was carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar (1 Chron. 6:15). He probably died in exile, as his son Joshua (Jeshua) was the first high priest who officiated after the return from captivity (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4; Zech. 6:11; Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; 10:18; Neh. 12:26).

Jehu (Heb. יְהוּ, yay-hoo', Gesenius, "Jehovah is He;" Fürst, the living).

1. The son of Hanani, a prophet of Judah, but whose ministrations were chiefly directed to Israel. His father was probably the seer who rebuked Asa (2 Chron. 16:7). He must have begun his career as a prophet when very young. He first denounced Baasha (1 Kings 16:1, 7), and then, after an interval of thirty years, reappears to reprove Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahab (2 Chron. 19:2, 3). He survived Jehoshaphat and wrote his life (20:34), B. C. about 879-850.

2. The eleventh king of the separate kingdom of Israel.

Family. Jehu was the son of Jehoshaphat (2 Kings 9:2), and the grandson of Nimshi, although sometimes called the latter's son (1 Kings 19:16).

Personal History. The first appearance of Jehu is when, with a comrade in arms, Bidkar, he rode behind Ahab on the journey from Samaria to Jezreel (2 Kings 9:25). Elijah was commanded at Horeb to anoint him king, but, for unknown reasons, did not do so (1 Kings 19:16, 17).

(1) Anointed king. Jehu meantime, in the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, had risen to importance. He was, under the last-named king, captain of the host in the siege of Ramoth-gilead. While in the midst of the officers of the besieging army a youth suddenly entered, of wild appearance, and insisted on a private interview with Jehu. They retired into a secret chamber. The youth uncovered a vial of sacred oil, poured it over Jehu's head, and after announcing to him the message from Elisha, that he was appointed to be king of Israel and destroyer of the house of Ahab, rushed out of the house and disappeared. Jehu's countenance, as he reentered the assembly of officers, showed that some strange tidings had reached him. He tried at first to evade their questions, but then revealed the situation in which he found himself placed by the prophetic call. In a moment the enthusiasm of the army took fire. They threw their garments under his feet, so as to form a rough carpet of state; then blew the royal salute on their trumpets, and thus ordained him king (2 Kings 9:1-13), B. C. 842. (2) Slays the kings. Jehu accepted the kingdom, and immediately began to make it secure. He cut off all communication between Ramoth-gilead and Jezreel, and set off at full speed with Bidkar, whom he had made captain of his host. Jehoram was there (suffering from wounds received at the hands of the Syrians), as well as Ahaziah, king of Judah, who had come to see him. The watchman told of the coming of a company, and as it neared the city he announced to the kings that "the driving is like the driving of Jehu" (9:20). When near the city the alarm was taken, and the two kings hastened out and met Jehu in the field of Naboth. In answer to the question of Jehoram, "Is it peace, Jehu?" the latter replied, "What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" Then he drew his bow and smote Jehoram, while his followers pursued and mortally wounded Ahaziah. Jehu advanced to Jezreel and fulfilled the divine warning on Jezebel. The queen appeared at the palace window as if to welcome Jehu, but he shouted, "Who is on my side?" two eunuchs appeared, and at his command they threw her from the window (9:14-37).

(3) Destroys house of Ahab. Jehu then sent a letter to the rulers, challenging them to set up one of the young princes as king, and fight out the matter. They replied that they were ready to submit to him; whereupon he ordered them to appear the next day with the heads of all the royal princes of Samaria, which they did. He explained that he must be regarded as the appointed minister of the divine decrees against the house of Ahab, and proceeded to slay all the officers of the late government who would most likely disturb his own reign (10:1-11). Proceeding to Samaria he met forty-two sons (or nephews) of Ahaziah, king of Judah, and put them to the sword (2 Kings 10:12-14; 2 Chron. 22:8). (4) Destroys Baalites. On his way to Samaria he met Jehonadab, the Rechabite, to whom he confided his purpose of exterminating the Baalites. Arriving at Samaria, he announced that he was to be even more enthusiastic in the service of Baal than Ahab had been, and summoned them to come and sacrifice to that god. When they were assembled in the temple, clad in their sacerdotal garments, Jehu offered the chief sacrifice, Jehonadab joining in the deception. At a concerted signal the eighty trusted guards fell upon and massacred the worshippers, and thus at one blow exterminated the heathen population of Israel. The temple and image of Baal were demolished, and the sanctuary became a resort for the basest uses (2 Kings 10:15-28). (5) Sin and punishment. Jehu sinned against God in not overturning the golden calves worshipped in Beth-el and Dan, and thus continued in the sin of Jeroboam. For this it was foretold that his dynasty should only extend to four generations; and the divine aid was withheld from him in his wars with the Syrians under Hazael. The war was disastrous to him, and a great part of his territories beyond the Jordan was held by the Syrians. He died in quiet, was buried in Samaria, and left the throne to his son Jehoahaz (10:29-35), B. C. 815. His name is thought to be the first of the Israelitish kings which appear in the Assyrian monuments, from which "we learn that Jehu became a fawning suppliant to Shalmanezar" (McCurdy, in Recent Researches in Bib. Lands, p. 23).

Character. Jehu was a very positive and ambitious character; quick to decide upon a plan of action, and equally ready in execution. He was also prudent, calculating, and passionless. The narrative justifies us, we think, in judging that his zeal for God was regulated very much by his zeal for Jehu. "He must be regarded, like many others in history, as an instrument for accomplishing great purposes rather than as great or good in himself. In the long period during which his destiny, though known to others and perhaps to himself, lay dormant; in the ruthlessness with which he carried out his purposes; in the union of profound silence and dissimulation with a stern, fanatic, wayward zeal, he has not been without his likenesses in modern times" (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

3. The son of Obed and father of Azariah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:38).

4. A Simeonite, son of Josibiah, and one of the chief Simeonites who moved into the valley of Gedor in search of pasturage during the reign of Hezekiah. They smote and dispossessed the original inhabitants (1 Chron. 4:35-41), B. C. about 713.

5. An Antothite, one of the chief of the slingers of Benjamin, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3), B. C. before 1000.

JEHUB'BAH (Heb. יְהוּבָבָה, yeh-hoo-baw', hidden), a man of Asher, son of Shamer, or Shomer, of the house of Beriah (1 Chron. 7:34).

JEHU'GAL (Heb. יְהוּכָל, yeh-hoo-kal', able), the son of Shelemiah, and the person who was sent with Zephaniah by King Hezekiah to Jeremiah to request that he would pray to Jehovah in behalf of the kingdom (Jer. 37:3). He afterward joined with his associates in requesting the death of the prophet because of his unfavorable response (38:4), in which verse he is styled one of "the princes." In 38:1 his name is given in the abbreviated form Jucal.

JE'HUD (Heb. יְהוּדָה, yeh-hood', Judah), a town on the border of Dan, named between Baalath and Bene-berak (Josh. 19:45), and probably preserved in the village of Jehudich, two hours to the N. of Ludd, in a splendidly cultivated plain.

JEHU'DI (Heb. יְהוּדִי, yeh-hoo-dee', Jew), the son of Nethaniah, employed by the princes of Jehoikim's court to bring Baruch to read Jeremiah's denunciation (Jer. 36:14), and then by the king to fetch the volume itself and read it to him (vers. 21, 23), B. C. 608.

JEHUDI'JAH (Heb. יְהוּדִיָּה, yeh-hoo-dee-yuw', Jewess, not a proper name, as in the A. V.), the wife, probably, of Mered (1 Chron. 4:18). The following readjustment of the text is proposed to clear away its obscurity: "These are the sons of Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh, which Mered took, and she bare Miriam, etc., and his wife Jehudijah bare Jered," etc. (Jamieson, Fausset, and Brown, Com., in loc.). She is probably the same with Hodiah (v. 19).

JE'HUSH (Heb. יְהוּשׁוּ, yeh-oosh', hasty), son of Eshek, a remote descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:39).

JEI'EL (Heb. יְיֵאֵל, yeh-ce-al', treasure of God).

1. A Reubenite of the house of Joel at the time of the taking of some census, apparently on the deportation of the trans-Jordanic tribes by Tiglath-pilezer (1 Chron. 5:7), B. C. about 740.

2. A Merarite Levite appointed by David to assist in the removal of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 16:5). He is probably the same as the one mentioned in the same verse as performer on "psalteries and harps," and identical with the "porter" (15:18) and musician (v. 21), B. C. about 982.

3. A Levite, and great-grandfather of Jehaziel, who predicted success to Jehoshaphat against the Ammonites and Moabites (2 Chron. 20:14), B. C. considerably before 875.

4. The scribe who, with others, kept the account of the numbers of King Uzziah's troops (2 Chron. 26:11), B. C. about 769.

5. A Levite of the sons of Elizaphan, who assisted in the restoration of the temple under King Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13), B. C. 719.

6. One of the chief Levites in the time of Josiah, who assisted in the rites of the great Passover (2 Chron. 35:9), B. C. about 639.

7. One of the "last sons" of Adonikam, who, with sixty males, formed part of the caravan of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:18), B. C. about 457.

8. An Israelite of the "sons" of Nebo, who had taken a foreign wife and had to relinquish her (Ezra 10:43), B. C. 457.

JEKAB'ZEEL (Heb. יְקָבֶזֶעַל, yek-ab-tseh-ale', God will gather), a town in Judah (Neh. 11:25), probably identical with KABZEEL (q. v.).

JEKAME'AM (Heb. יְקָמֵאָם, yek-am'-awm, the people will rise), a Levite, the fourth in rank of the "sons" of Hebron in the Levitical arrangement established by David (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23), B. C. about 960.

JEKAMI'AH (Heb. יְקָמִיָּאֵה, yek-am-yaw', Jehovah will rise).

1. The son of Shallum and father of Elishama, of the descendants of Sheshan of Judah (1 Chron. 2:41), B. C. probably about 588.

2. In A. V. "Jecamiah." The fifth named of the sons of King Jeconiah (1 Chron. 3:18), born to him during the captivity, B. C. after 597.

JEKU'THIEL (Heb. יְקֻתִּיאֵל, yek-ooth-ee'-ale, reverence for God, piety), a man recorded in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. 4:18) as the son of Mered by his Jewish wife (A. V. Jehudijah), and in his turn the father, or founder, of the town of Zanoah.

JEMI'MA (Heb. יְמִימָה, yem-ee-maw', dove), the name of the first of the three daughters born to Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42:14).

JEM'UEL (Heb. יְמִוֵּאל, yem-oo-ale', day of God), the eldest son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15); elsewhere (Num. 26:12) called Nemuel, JEOPARD. See GLOSSARY.

JEPHTHÆ, the Greek form (Heb. 11:32) of JEPHTHAH (q. v.).

JEPH'THAH (Heb. יִפְתָּח, yif-tawkh', he will open), the ninth judge of Israel, the illegitimate son of Gilead, and belonging to Manassch east.

1. Personal History. (1) A Freebooter. In consequence of his illegitimacy, he was banished from his father's house, and took up his residence at Tob, a district of Syria, not far from Gilead (Judg. 11:1-3). Here it was that he became head of a marauding party, and when a war broke out between the Israelites and the Ammonites, he probably signalized himself. (2) Leader of Israel. This induced the Israelites to seek his aid as commander; and though at first he refused, in consequence of their ill-treatment of him, yet, on their solemn covenant to regard him as their leader, he consented. In this capacity he was successful, and, in a war which soon followed, the Ammonites were defeated with great loss (11:3-33). On the eve of the battle he made a vow (vers. 30, 31) that whatever should come forth from his house first to meet him on his return home he would devote to God. This turned out to be his daughter, an only child, who welcomed his return with music and dancing. (See below.) (3) Quarrel with Ephraimites. His victory over the Ammonites was followed by a quarrel with the Ephraimites, who challenged his right to go to war without their consent, and used threatening language toward him. Jephthah remonstrated with them, and then, gathering his forces, gave the Ephraimites battle, defeating them with great loss. The Gileadites then seized the fords of Jordan, and made those attempting to cross pronounce the word "Shibboleth;" but if any one pronounced it "Sibboleth," they knew him to be an Ephraimite, and slew him on the spot (12:1-6). (4) Rule and death. The remainder of Jephthah's rule seems to have been peaceful, lasting about six years (B. C. perhaps 1080-1074). He was buried in his native region, in one of the cities of Gilead (12:7).

2. Character. Jephthah appears to have been a daring, intrepid man, skilled in war, quick to avenge injuries, and ready to defend the helpless as well as to forgive wrong. He does not seem to have been rash and impetuous, notwithstanding his vow, for he did not take the sword at once, but waited until negotiations with the king of the Ammonites had been without effect.

3. Jephthah's Vow. Volumes have been written on what is generally termed "Jephthah's rash vow;" the question is whether, in doing to his daughter according to his vow, he actually offered her in sacrifice or not. That he really did so is a horrible conclusion, but one that it seems impossible to avoid. The following may be taken as a summary of the arguments on both sides:

(1) In favor of actual sacrifice, the following arguments are urged: (1) The express terms of the narrative, "I will offer it up for a burnt offering," and "he did according to his vow." (2) The fact that Jephthah was half a heathen, and that the circumstances took place where the heathen dwelt in great numbers, and where human sacrifices were not unknown. (3) That Jephthah's excessive grief on seeing his daughter come forth to meet him can only be accounted for on the supposition that he considered her devoted to death. (4) That the mourning for Jephthah's daughter for four days in the year can be reconciled only with the supposition that she was an actual sacrifice. (5) That there is nothing in the history to show that his conduct was sanctioned by God.

(2) In opposition it is urged: (1) By translating the Hebrew prefix (which is rendered and in our version), or, all difficulty will be removed. His words would then read, "shall surely be the Lord's, or I will offer a burnt offering;" and not unfrequently the sense requires that the Hebrew should be thus rendered (Lev. 27:28) where there is a similar meaning of the conjunctive וְאִם. (2) He cannot be understood as declaring an intention to offer as a burnt offering whatever might come forth to meet him, since he might have been met by what no law or custom permitted to be so offered. (3) The sacrifice of children to Moloch is expressly forbidden, and declared an abomination to the Lord (Lev. 20:2, 3); and it would be a yet higher insult to offer them to the Lord. (4) There is no precedent for such an offering. (5) No father by his own authority could put even an offending child to death, much less one that was innocent (Deut. 21:18-21; 1 Sam. 14:24-45). (6) It is said he did to her "according to his vow," and "she knew no man," which conveys the idea that she was devoted to a life of celibacy; and that what the daughters of Israel bewailed was not her death, but her celibacy (Judg. 11:38-40). There appears to have been a class of women devoted exclusively to the temple service who were Nazarites (Exod. 38:8); the word rendered assembled means engaged in service. To this company of females reference is made (1 Sam. 2:22; see also Luke 2:37). To such a company of devoted women Jephthah's daughter might be set apart. One of the strongest points on this side of the argument is, that the Hebrew word LETHANOTH, rendered to bewail, rather meant to celebrate; these daughters of Israel went yearly, not to lament, but with songs of praise to celebrate, the daughter of Jephthah. The prominence given to the daughter's virginity, as an argument against Jephthah's sacrifice, we think is hardly warranted. It is probably mentioned to give greater force to the sacrifice, as it would leave him without issue, which in the East was considered a special misfortune (Ewald, Hist. Israel; K. and D., Com.; Robertson, Early Religion of Israel; Mc. and S., Cyc.; Smith, Bib. Dict., and others).

JEPHUN'NEH (Heb. יֶפְתָּח, yef'-oon-neh', nimble).

1. The father of Caleb, which latter was a faithful explorer of Canaan with Joshua (Num. 13:6; 14:6, sq.; 26:65; 32:12; 34:19; Deut. 1:36; Josh. 14:6, sq.; 15:13; 21:12; 1 Chron. 4:15; 6:56), B. C. before 1210. He was a descendant of Caleb, the son of Hezron (1 Chron. 4:4, 15).

2. One of the sons of Jether, of the descendants of Asher (1 Chron. 7:38), B. C. probably before 1017.

JER'AH (Heb. יְרֵאִי, yeh'-rakh, month), the fourth son of Joktan (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chron. 1:20).

JERAH'MEEL (Heb. יְרַחְמֵאל, yer'-akh-meh-ale', God will compassionate).

1. The firstborn son of Hezron, son of Pharez, son of Judah (1 Chron. 2:9, sq.), B. C. after 1640. His descendants were called Jerahmeelites.

2. A Merarite Levite, the representative of the family of Kish, probably the son of Mahli (1 Chron. 24:29; comp. 23:21), B. C. about 960.

3. Son of Hammelech, who was employed by Jehoiakim to make Jeremiah and Baruch prisoners, after he had burnt the roll of Jeremiah's prophecy (Jer. 36:26), B. C. about 608.

JERAH'MEELITE (1 Sam. 27:10; 30:29), descendants of Jerahmeel, 1.

JER'RED (Heb. יְרֵד, yeh'-red, a descent).

1. One of the patriarchs before the flood (1 Chron. 1:2), the name, in Gen. 5:15-20, is given as JARED (q. v.).

2. A son, apparently, of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah, by his wife JEHUDJAH (q. v.). He is named as the father (founder) of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:18), B. C. perhaps about 1640.

JER'EMAI (Heb. יְרֵמַי, yer'-ay-mah'ee, dweller on heights), one of the "sons" of Hashum, who divorced his wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:33), B. C. 457.

JEREMI'AH (Heb. יְרֵמְיָהוּ, yir'-meh-yaw', Jah will rise).

1. An inhabitant of Libnah, the father of Hamutal, wife of Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 Kings 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1), B. C. before 608.

2. One of the chief men of the tribe of Manasseh east, apparently about the time of their deportation by the Assyrians (1 Chron. 5:24), B. C. about 727.

3. One of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), B. C. before 1000.

4, 5. The fifth and tenth in rank of the Gadite adventurers who joined David's troops in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:10, 13), B. C. before 1000.

6. One of the priests who subscribed the sacred covenant along with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:2); probably the same with one of those who followed the princes in the circuit of the newly repaired walls with the sound of trumpets (12:34), B. C. 445.

7. A priest who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon to Jerusalem (Neh. 12:1). It is probably himself or his course that is mentioned in v. 12, B. C. 536.

8. The son of Habazaniah and father of Jaazaniah, which last was one of the Rechabites whom the prophets tested with the offer of wine (Jer. 35:3), B. C. before 626.

9. The second of the greater prophets of the Old Testament.

Family. Jeremiah was the son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth, in the land of Benjamin (Jer. 1:1). Many writers, both ancient and modern, have supposed that his father was the Hilkiah mentioned in 2 Kings 22:8. Against this hypothesis, however, there have been urged (Keil, Ewald, Orelli, and others) the facts, (1) That the name is too common to be a ground of identification. (2) That the manner in which Hilkiah is mentioned is inconsistent with the notion of his having been the high priest of Israel. (3) That neither Jeremiah himself nor his opponents allude to himself. (4) That the priests who lived at Anathoth were of the house of Ithamar (1 Kings 2:26), while the high priests, from Zadok down, were of the line of Eleazar.

History. (1) Early life. The word of the Lord came to Jeremiah while he was still very young (Jer. 1:6), and happened in the thirteenth year of the reign of King Josiah (B. C. 626), while the prophet still lived in Anathoth. He appears to have remained in his native city until he was obliged to leave in order to escape the persecution of his fellow-townsmen (Jer. 11:21), and even of his own family (12:6). He then took up his residence at Jerusalem. (2) Under Josiah. He probably assisted King Josiah in the reformation effected during his reign (2 Kings 23:1, sq.). The movement in behalf of true religion ceased as soon as the influence of the court was withdrawn; and the prophet bewailed the death of this prince as the precursor of the divine judgments for the national sins (2 Chron. 35:25).

(3) Under Jehoahaz. The short reign—three months—of this king gave little scope for prophetic action, and we hear nothing of Jeremiah during this period. (4) Under Jehoiakim, B. C. 608-597. The king had come to the throne as the vassal of Egypt, and for a time the Egyptian party was dominant in Jerusalem. Jeremiah appeared as the chief representative of the party that favored the supremacy of the Chaldeans as the only way of safety. In so doing he had to expose himself to the suspicion of treachery, and was interrupted in his ministry by "the priests and prophets," who, with the populace, brought him before the civil authorities, urging that capital punishment should be inflicted on him for his threatenings (Jer. 26). The princes of Judah endeavored to protect him, and appealed to the precedent of Micah the Morasthite, who had uttered a like prophecy in the reign of Hezekiah; and so for a time he escaped. Alikam, the son of Shaphan, seems to have had influence to secure the prophet's safety. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim he was commanded to write the predictions which had been given him. Probably as a measure of safety he was, as he says, "shut up," and could not himself go to the house of the Lord. He therefore deputed Baruch to write the predictions and to read them publicly on the fast day. Baruch was summoned before the princes, who advised that both he and Jeremiah should conceal themselves, while they endeavored to influence the mind of the king by reading the roll to them. Jehoiakim read three or four leaves and then destroyed the roll. He gave orders for the immediate arrest of Baruch and Jeremiah, who, however, were preserved from the angry king. The prophet, at the command of God, rewrote the roll, adding "besides unto them many like words" (Jer. 36:32). To this period is assigned the prophecy in the valley of Ben-hinnom (Jer. 19), and his ill treatment at the hand of PASHUR (q. v.). (5) Under Jehoiachin, B. C. 597. We still find Jeremiah uttering his voice of warning during the closing days of the reign of Jehoiakim and the short reign of his successor, Jehoiachin (Jer. 13:18; comp. 2 Kings 24:12; Jer. 22:24-30). He sent a letter of counsel and condolence to those who shared the captivity of the royal family (chaps. 29-31). (6) Under Zedekiah. In the fourth year (B. C. 593) of this monarch's reign Hananiah prophesied that the power of the Chaldeans would be destroyed and the captives restored from Babylon (28:3); and corroborated his prophecy by taking off from the neck of Jeremiah the yoke which he wore by divine command (27:2). Jeremiah was told to "Go and tell Hananiah, saying, Thus saith the Lord; thou hast broken the yokes of wood; but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron. For thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; I have put the yoke of iron upon the neck of all these nations, that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon" (28:13, 14). It was probably not until the latter part of the reign of Zedekiah that the prophet was put in confinement, as we find that "they had not put him into prison" when the army of Nebuchadnezzar commenced the siege of Jerusalem (37:4, 5). Jeremiah had declared what would be the fatal issue (ch. 24), and was incarcerated in the court of the prison adjoining the palace, where he predicted the certain return from the impending captivity (32:37). Jeremiah's suffering reached its climax under this king, especially during the siege of Jerusalem. The approach of the Egyptian army, and the consequent withdrawal for a time of the

Chaldeans, brightened the prospects of the Jews, and the king entreated Jeremiah to pray to the Lord for them. The answer received from God was that the Egyptians would go to their own land, and that the Chaldeans would return and destroy the city (37:7, 8). This irritated the princes, who made the departure of Jeremiah from the city the pretext of accusing him of deserting to the Chaldeans. He was cast into prison in spite of his denial, where he would doubtless have perished but for the interposition of Ebed-melech, one of the royal eunuchs (37:12-38:13). The king seems to have been favorably inclined toward the prophet, but, for fear of the princes, consulted with him secretly (38:14-28). In one of these secret interviews Jeremiah obtained a milder imprisonment in the "guard-court" belonging to the royal citadel (37:17, sq.). While in prison he bought, with all requisite formalities, the field at Anathoth, which his kinsman Hanameel wished to get rid of (32:6-9), thus showing his faith in his country's future. (7) Under Nebuchadnezzar. Nebuchadnezzar took the city (B. C. 586), and gave a special charge to his captain, Nebuzaradan, to free Jeremiah and to follow his advice (39:11, 12). He was, accordingly, delivered from the prison, and the choice given him either to go to Babylon or remain with his own people. He chose the latter, and went to Mizpah with Gedaliah, who had been appointed governor of Judea. After the murder of Gedaliah he advised Johanan, the recognized leader of the people, to remain in the land (42:7, sq.). The people refused to heed his advice, under the plea that he was acting in the interest of the Chaldeans, removed to Egypt, and took Jeremiah and Baruch with them (43:6, 7). While there he still sought to turn the people who had so long rebelled against the Lord to him (ch. 44). His writings give us no further information respecting his life, but it is probable that he died in Egypt soon after. (8) Traditions. There is a Christian tradition that Jeremiah was stoned to death by the Jews at Tahpanhes. An Alexandrian tradition reported that his bones had been brought to that city by Alexander the Great. On the other hand, there is the Jewish statement that, on the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, he, with Baruch, made his escape to Babylon, and died there in peace.

Character. "In every page of Jeremiah's prophecies we recognize the temperament which, while it does not lead the man who has it to shrink from doing God's work, however painful, makes the pain of doing it infinitely more acute, and gives to the whole character the impress of a deeper and more lasting melancholy. He is pre-eminently 'the man that hath seen afflictions'" (Lam. 3:1). He reveals himself in his writings "as a soul of gentle nature, yielding, tender-hearted, affectionate, with almost a woman's thirst for love, with which certainly the iron, unbending firmness, and immovable power of resistance belonging to him in his prophetic sphere are in strange contrast" (Orelli, Com., p. 11).

JEREMIAH, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

JEREMIAS, a Grecized form of the name Jeremiah the prophet (Matt. 16:14).

JER'EMOTH (Heb. יֵרֵמוֹת, yer-ay-mohth', heights).

1. A Benjamite chief, a son of the house of Beriah of Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:14; comp. 12 and 18). His family dwelt at Jerusalem, B. C. apparently about 588.

2. A Merarite Levite, son of Mushi (1 Chron. 23:23), called Jerimoth in 1 Chron. 24:30, B. C. about 960.

3. Son of Heman, head of the thirteenth course of musicians in the divine service (1 Chron. 25:22); probably the same called Jerimoth in v. 4, B. C. about 960.

4. One of the "sons of Elam" who put away his strange wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:26, B. C. 456).

5. One of the "sons of Zattu" who had taken strange wives, and put them away after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:27), B. C. 456.

6. The name which appears in the same list as "and Ramoth" (v. 29). See RAMOTH.

JER'EMY, a familiar form of the name Jeremiah (Matt. 2:17; 27:9).

JERI'AH (Heb. יֵרֵיָה, yer-ee-yaw', Jah will throw), a Kohathite Levite, chief of the great house of Hebron when David organized the Levitical service (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23), B. C. about 960. His name is given as Serijah in 1 Chron. 26:31.

JER'TAI (Heb. יֵרֵיָי, yer-eeb-ah'ee, contentions), the second named of the sons of Elnaam, and one of David's bodyguard (1 Chron. 11:46), B. C. after 1000.

JER'ICHO (Heb. יֵרֵיְחוֹ, yer-ee-kho', fragrant), an ancient city in the wide plain where the Jordan valley broadens between the Moab mountains and the western precipices, and situated on the route of Israel after it crossed the Jordan under Joshua (Josh. 3:16). The first mention of Jericho in Scripture is in connection with the advance of Israel to Canaan; they "pitched in the plains of Moab, on this side Jordan by Jericho" (Num. 22:1). From the manner and frequency in which it is referred to it would seem to have been the most important city of the Jordan valley at that time (Num. 3:12; 34:15; 35:1, etc.). The spies sent by Joshua were entertained in Jericho by RAHAB (q. v.), for which they promised her protection when the city should be destroyed; which promise was religiously observed (Josh. 2:1-21; 6:25). The miraculous capture of Jericho, and the sin and punishment of Achan, and the curse pronounced upon anyone who should attempt to rebuild it, are graphically recorded (Josh. 6:1-7:26). Jericho was given to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:21), "and from this time a long interval elapses before Jericho appears again upon the scene. It is only incidentally mentioned in the life of David in connection with his embassy to the Ammonite king (2 Sam. 10:5). And the solemn manner in which its second foundation under Hiel, the Beth-elite, is recorded (1 Kings 16:34) would certainly seem to imply that up to that time its site had been uninhabited. It is true that mention is made of 'a city of palm trees' (Judg. 1:16; 3:13) in existence apparently at the time when spoken of.

However, once actually rebuilt, Jericho rose again slowly into consequence. In its immediate vicinity the sons of the prophets sought retirement from the world: Elisha 'healed the spring of the waters;' and over against it, beyond Jordan, Elijah 'went up by a whirlwind into heaven' (2 Kings 2:1-22). In its plains Zedekiah fell into the hands of the Chaldeans (2 Kings 25:5; Jer. 39:5). In the return under Zerubbabel the 'children of Jericho,' three hundred and forty-five in number, are comprised (Ezra 2:34; Neh. 7:36); and it is even implied that they removed thither again, for the 'men of Jericho' assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding that part of the wall of Jerusalem that was next to the sheep-gate (Neh. 3:2). The Jericho of the days of Josephus was distant one hundred and fifty stadia from Jerusalem and fifty from the Jordan."

In the New Testament Jericho is mentioned in connection with Jesus restoring sight to the blind (Matt. 20:30; Mark 10:46; Luke 18:35), and his being entertained by Zaccheus (Luke 19:1, sq.); and, finally, it was introduced in the parable of the good Samaritan, which, if not a real occurrence, derives interest from the fact that robbers have ever been the terror of the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. See SUPPLEMENT.

Modern Jericho. "The Jericho of Christ's time stood nearer to the mountains than the modern Er-Riha. Its gardens, orchards, and cultivated lands covered a wide area. As you descend the steep way from Jerusalem—a good road, if not demolished by the winter's rains—winding along the edge of the precipitous ravine, Wady Kelt, through a wide gap in the hills you can see the plains of Jericho stretching away below to the foot of the mountain range beyond Jordan. A red-tile roof and a few white walls, rising from the midst of a patch of dark green, clearly defined against the sands of the surrounding wastes, mark the site of the dirty fellahy village Er-Riha. Jericho Hotel, a building of only a few years' standing, boasts the red-tile roof; the white walls belong to the Russian hospice and one or two less pretentious houses of entertainment. A ruinous structure of dark stone to the southeast of the village, dating, possibly, from crusading times, is called the 'House of Zaccheus.' For the rest, the houses in the village are miserable mud huts, much inferior to what are elsewhere used as cattle shelters, and the inhabitants are perhaps the most miserable lot to be found in Syria. A few vines, bananas, and other fruit trees are cultivated. 'Ain es-Sultan, The Fountain of Elisha, furnishes the water required for the gardens, such as they are, while the waters from Wady Kelt sweep past to the southward, carrying a thin strip of green across the plain to the Jordan. Only a corner, comparatively speaking, of these rich lands is tilled" (Rev. W. Ewing in S. S. Times).

JER'IEL (Heb. יֵרֵיֵאל, yer-ee-ale', founded by God), a man of Issachar, one of the six heads of the house of Tola mentioned in the census in the time of David (1 Chron. 7:2), B. C. perhaps after 1000.

JERIJ'AH, a different form (1 Chron. 26:31) of the name JERIAH (q. v.).

JERIMOTH (Heb. יְרִימוֹת, yer-ee-mohlt', heights).

1. The fourth named of the four sons of Bela, son of Benjamin and founder of a Benjamite house which existed in the time of David (1 Chron. 7:7; comp. v. 2), B. C. after 1689.

2. One of the "sons" of Becher (1 Chron. 7:8), and head of another Benjamite house, B. C. about 1017.

3. One of the Benjamite archers and slingers that joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5), B. C. before 1000.

4. The last named of the sons of Mushi, the son of Merari (1 Chron. 24:30); elsewhere called Jeremoth.

5. One of the sons of Heman, head of the fifteenth ward of musicians (1 Chron. 25:4, 22); called in the latter verse Jeremoth (B. C. about 960).

6. Son of Azriel, ruler of the tribe of Naphtali in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:19), B. C. about 1000.

7. Son of King David, whose daughter Mahalath was the first wife of Rehoboam, her cousin Abihail being the other (2 Chron. 11:18), B. C. before 974. He is not named in the list of David's children (1 Chron., ch. 3, or 14:4-7), and it is probable that he was the son of a concubine, and such is the Jewish tradition. The passage 2 Chron. 11:18 is not quite clear, since the word "daughter" is a correction of the qeri; the original text had בַּן, i. e., "son" (Smith, s. v.).

8. A Levite, and one of the overseers of the temple offerings in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:13), B. C. 729.

JERIOTH (Heb. יְרִיעוֹת, yer-ee-ohth', curtains or timidity), apparently the second wife of Caleb, the son of Hezron (1 Chron 2:18), B. C. about 1210. The Vulgate renders this as the son of Caleb by his first-mentioned wife, and father of the sons named; but this is contrary to the Hebrew text, which is closely followed by the LXX. Perhaps the connective ׀ should be rendered by even, thus making Jerioth but another name for Azubah.

JEROBOAM (Heb. יְרוֹבְעָם, yaw-rob-awn', people will contend).

1. The First King of Israel, the son of Nebat, an Ephraimite, by a woman named Zeruah (1 Kings 11:26).

Personal History. (1) Noticed by Solomon. At the time when Solomon was constructing the fortifications of Millo underneath the citadel of Zion, his sagacious eye discovered the strength and activity of the young Ephraimite who was employed on the works, and he raised him to the rank of superintendent over the taxes and labors exacted from the tribe of Ephraim (1 Kings 11:28), B. C. after 960. (2) Future foretold. On one occasion, when leaving Jerusalem, he encountered Ahijah, "the prophet" of the ancient sanctuary of Shiloh. Ahijah stripped off his new outer garment and tore it into twelve shreds, ten of which he gave to Jeroboam, with the assurance that, on obedience to his laws, God would establish for him a kingdom and dynasty equal to that of David (vers. 29-40). (3) Flight into Egypt. Jeroboam, probably, began to form plots and conspiracies, for Solomon sought to take his life, whereupon he fled to Egypt. He received the protection of King Shishak, and remained there until the death of Solomon (v. 40), B. C. 934. (4) Revolt of Israel.

Upon the accession of Rehoboam Jeroboam appears to have headed a deputation who asked for a redress of grievances. The harsh answer of Rehoboam rendered a revolution inevitable, and Jeroboam was called to be "king of Israel" (12:1-20). (5) As king. He selected Shechem as his capital, but for some cause not now known removed the seat of government to Penuel, west of Jordan. He later returned to the east of Jordan and took up his permanent residence at Tirzah (1 Kings 12:25; comp. 15:21, 33; 16:6, sq.; Josh. 12:24). The policy of Jeroboam was to bring about a religious as well as political disruption of the kingdom. He therefore sought to discourage the yearly pilgrimages to the temple at Jerusalem. To this end he established shrines at Dan and Beth-el, sanctuaries of venerable antiquity, and at the extremities of the kingdom. He set up "golden calves" as symbols of Jehovah, and united the pontificate to his crown (1 Kings 12:26-33). While officiating at the altar a man of God appeared and announced the coming of King Josiah, who should burn upon that altar the bones of its ministers. Jeroboam attempted to arrest him, when the arm that he stretched forth was smitten with palsy, but in answer to his prayer was healed (13:1-10). Jeroboam continued his idolatrous practices, making "the lowest of the people priests of the high places" (v. 31), and his contumacy soon brought about the extinction of his dynasty. His son Abijah fell sick, and Jeroboam sent his wife in disguise to the prophet Ahijah, who, however, recognized her and predicted her son's death. She returned to Tirzah, "and when she came to the threshold of the door the child died." Jeroboam seems never to have recovered from the blow, and died soon after, having reigned twenty-two years (14:1-20), B. C. 934-913. Jeroboam waged constant war with the house of Judah, but the only act distinctly recorded is a battle with Abijah, the son of Rehoboam, in which he was defeated, and for the time lost the important cities of Beth-el, Jeshanah, and Ephraim (2 Chron. 13:1-19).

Character. "Jeroboam was perhaps a less remarkable man than the circumstance of his being the founder of a new kingdom might lead us to expect. His government exhibits but one idea—that of raising a barrier against the reunion of the tribes. Of that idea he was the slave and victim; and, although the barrier which he raised was effectual for his purpose, it only served to show the weakness of the man who could deem needful the protection for his separate interests which such a barrier offered."

2. Jeroboam II was the son and successor of Jehoash, and the fourteenth king of Israel (B. C. 783-742). Notwithstanding he followed the example of the first Jeroboam in keeping up the idolatry of the golden calves, the Lord had pity upon Israel. Jeroboam brought to a successful issue the wars which his father had undertaken.

and delivered Israel from the Syrian yoke (comp. 2 Kings 13:4; 14:26, 27). He took the chief cities of Damascus (2 Kings 14:28; Amos 1:3-5) and Hamath, and restored to Israel the ancient eastern limits from Lebanon to the Dead Sea (2 Kings 14:25; Amos 6:14). He reconquered Ammon and Moab (Amos 1:13; 2:1-3), restored to the trans-Jordanic tribes their territory (2 Kings 13:5; 1 Chron. 5:17-22). But it was merely an outward

NOTE.—Some regard the prophecy of Amos, that Jeroboam should die by the sword, a failure, "as there is no evidence that his death was other than natural, for he was buried with his ancestors in state (2 Kings 14:20). The interregnum of eleven years which intervened before the accession of his son Zechariah (14:29; comp. with 15:8) argues some political disorder at the time of his death. But the probability rather is that the high priest, who displayed the true spirit of a persecutor, gave an unduly specific and offensive turn to the words of Amos, in order to inflame Jeroboam the more against him" (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

JERO'HAM (Heb. ירוחם, yer-o-khawom', compassionate).

1. The son of Elihu and father of Elkanah, the father of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Chron. 6:27, 34); B. C. before 1171.

2. The father of several Benjamite chiefs residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:27), B. C. before 536.

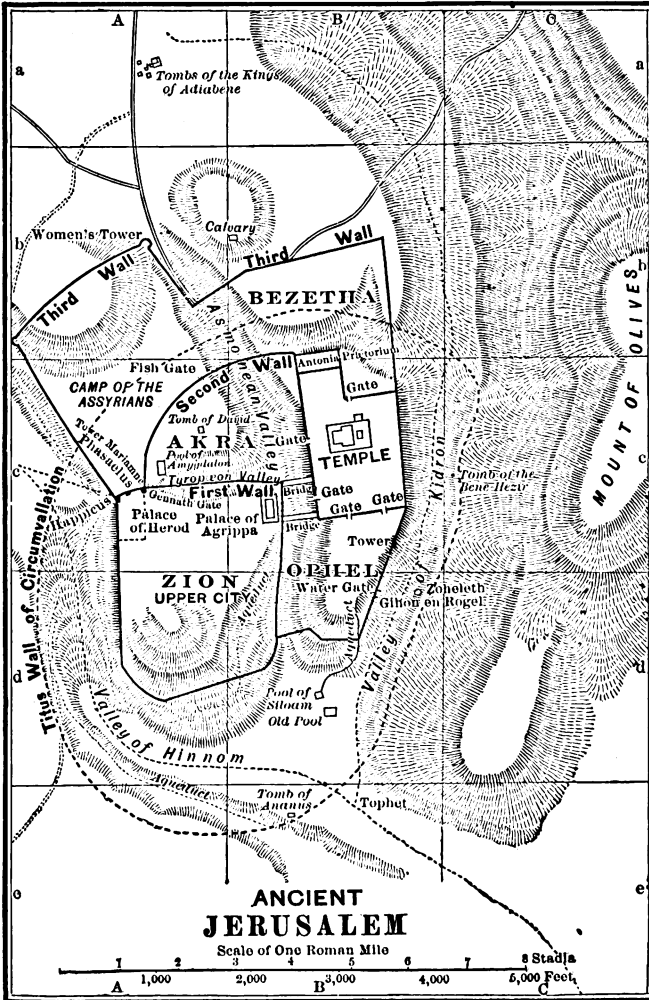

3. The father of Ibneiah, a Benjamite chief who was a resident of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:8), B. C. probably before 536. Perhaps the same as No. 2.

4. A priest whose son Adaiah was one of the priests residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:12). The same names are given as father and son in Neh. 11:12, and are probably identical. B. C. before 536.

5. An inhabitant of Gedor, and father of Joelah and Zebadiah, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:7), B. C. before 1000.

6. A Danite whose son (or descendant) Azarel was ruler over his tribe in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:22), B. C. before 1000.

7. Father of Azariah, which latter was one of the "captains of hundreds" by whose assistance Jehoiada placed Josiah on the throne of Judah (2 Chron. 23:1), B. C. before 836.

restoration. The sanctuary at Beth-el was kept up in royal state (Amos 7:13), but drunkenness, licentiousness, and oppression prevailed in the country (Amos 2:6-8; 4:1; 6:6; Hos. 4:12-14; 1:2), and idolatry was united with the worship of Jehovah (Hos. 4:13; 13:6). Amos prophesied the destruction of Jeroboam and his house by the sword (Amos 7:9, 17), and Hosea (1:1) also denounced the crimes of the nation.

JERUB'BAAL, or JERUBBA'AL (Heb. ירובאל, yer-oo-bak'-al, Baal will contend), a surname given by his father to Gideon, the judge of Israel, because he destroyed the altar of Baal (Judg. 6:32; 7:1; 8:29, 35; 9:1, 2, 5, 16, 19, 24, 28, 57; 1 Sam. 12:11).

JERUB'BESHETH (Heb. ירובשת, yer-oo-bek'-sheth, contender with shame, i. e., idol), a name of Gideon (2 Sam. 11:21), given, probably, to avoid pronouncing the name (Exod. 33:13) of a false god (viz., Baal).

JERUEL (Heb. יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, yer-oo-ale', founded of God). "The wilderness of Jeruel" is mentioned (2 Chron. 20:16) by Jahaziel as the place where Jehoshaphat would meet the Moabites and Ammonites and overcome them. This "wilderness" was, doubtless, a part of the great stretch of flat country, bounded on the south by Wady el Ghâr, and extending from the Dead Sea to the neighborhood of Tekoa, and now called el Hasasah.

JERUSALEM.—1. Names. (Heb. יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, yer-oo-shann-lame', founded peaceful). First named in the Bible as Salem (Gen. 14:18; Psa. 76:2).

The second wall was built by Jotham, Hezekiah, and Manasseh. This was destroyed, as well as the first, at the time of the captivity. Both were afterward rebuilt on much the same lines, and were substantially the same in the time of Christ. The third wall was built by Herod only ten years after the crucifixion of Christ. The whole circumference at that time was four miles. The walls were destroyed by Titus, A. D. 70, but restored by Hadrian, A. D. 132-136.

The gates of the city, always important, were many. The Corner Gate, mentioned in 2 Chron. 26:9, was probably on the northwest corner of the second city, and the Valley Gate was on the northwest corner of Zion, the site of the present Jaffa Gate. Also four gates opened into the temple

Modern Jerusalem, from Mount of Olives.

Then as one of the cities of Benjamin (Judg. 19:10; 1 Chron. 11:4). Called by David "the City of David" (2 Sam. 5:5-9; 1 Chron. 11:4-8); hence the political and religious center of the land. Called also Jebus, as belonging to the Jebusites (Judg. 19:10, 11). The modern city is called by the natives, or Arabs, El-Kuds.

2. Situation. In latitude north 31° 46' 43'', and longitude east 35° 13'; on the border of the highest table-lands of Palestine, about two thousand four hundred feet above the Mediterranean Sea. It is three thousand seven hundred feet above the Dead Sea, which lies to the east sixteen miles. It was on the border of the tribes of Benjamin and Judah, and after the division of the tribes it was the capital of Judah. It has none of the natural conditions or advantages of a great city, being built upon different levels, inland from the sea, and quite difficult of access. The temperature in summer is at times 102° Fahr., and in winter as low as 25°. Although the ground does not freeze, snow falls in winter to the depth of a foot.

3. Structure and Buildings. The city has had three walls. The most ancient was that of David and Solomon, which encircled the whole of Mount Zion, and was continued around Moriah and Ophel.

inclosure—the Upper Gate, called also the Gate of Benjamin (Jer. 38:7), and the New Gate (36:10); the east gate called the King's Gate (1 Chron. 9:18), called also the Gate of the Inner Court (Ezek. 46:1), and the East Gate (Neh. 3:29). On the west the Gate Shallecheth (1 Chron. 26:16), and on the south the Gate Miphkad (Neh. 3:31). Nehemiah, in chapter 3, gives much information concerning the gates after the time of exile. The towers were Meah and Hananeel, near each other and between the Sheep and Fish gates, and the Tower of the Furnaces, near the Valley Gate.

Among the chief buildings of the city were the temple, built by Solomon upon Mount Moriah, and the citadel called Antonia, belonging to it, and which commanded the temple area. The palaces of Herod upon the site of the old tower of David, the palace of the high priest, and that of the Asmonæans, all of which are described by Josephus at length. The country being destitute of springs because of the limestone formation, water was supplied from cisterns of rain water or by means of aqueducts leading from the pools, sometimes called Solomon's pools. There are two fountains near the temple, to which reference is made in Joel 3:18; Ezek. 47:1-12; Zech. 14:8.

First, Siloam, mentioned Neh. 3:15; Isa. 8:6; John 9:11. Also the Fountain of the Virgin (Ain siti Miriam), on the west bank of the Kidron. It is called "Ain um ed Deraj" (the Fountain of the Mother of Stairs) because of a descent of thirty steps to reach it. The flow of this water is intermittent. En Rogel is another water supply (see in loco.). See SUPPLEMENT.

4. Historical. The history of Jerusalem from the time of Joshua to its destruction by Titus, a period of fifteen centuries, is a succession of changes, revolutions, sieges, surrenders, famines, each followed by restorations and rebuilding. Its greatest glory was reached under the reign of which had been broken down for one hundred and forty years (Neh. 4:7-22). Under Nehemiah the city regained much of its former glory. Alexander the Great, in 332 B. C., showed much favor to the Jews, exempting them in some degree from tribute. In 320 B. C., because the Jews refused to fight and defend themselves on the Sabbath day when Ptolemy Soter attacked the city, it was captured, and many of its inhabitants were removed to Africa. The prosperity of the city under Antiochus the Great, 200 B. C., was undone by the infamy of Antiochus Epiphanes, against whom the oppressed Jews revolted in 165 B. C. when a great victory was gained over Antiochus

Angle of Wall of Jerusalem.

King Solomon, who built the temple and a most royal palace, besides very greatly enlarging and strengthening the walls of the city. Its greatest humiliation possibly was reached under the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, B. C. 175, when the most violent and cruel efforts were made to destroy the Jews and their religion. For the earliest record of Jerusalem we must go to the description of the boundaries of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. chaps. 15 and 18).

Until David captured the entire city from the Jebusites (2 Sam. 5:7; 1 Chron. 11:6) they had always been in possession of a part of it. From the time when David brought the Ark of God into the city (2 Sam. 6:2-16) until the rebuilding under Nehemiah, or the period of the city's history under the kings, there was a series of rising and declining. This included Hezekiah's vast structures for aqueduct and water supply and the inclosing with an outside wall of Zion and the City of David. During fifty years of this period, and immediately succeeding the capture of the city by Nebuchadnezzar, it lay in ruins.

Cyrus decreed the return of the captive Jews to their city and the rebuilding of the city wall, by an army led by Judas Maccabæus. The period from the death of Judas Maccabæus, B. C. 161, until the city was captured by Pompey in 63 B. C., was marked by the occurrence of strife and disorder in Jerusalem. In the dissensions between the political rulers and the religious sects of Pharisees and Sadducees probably not less than fifty thousand people fell victims.

Crassus plundered the temple of treasure, which, together with that taken from the city, amounted to ten million dollars. About six years after a Roman army under Herod the Great captured the city. The city soon again became restored to much of its former grandeur. Under Herod the temple was enlarged and beautified. It was in this state of things that Christ found the city. Under Herod the city was given a better water supply. Under Herod's grandson, Herod Agrippa in 41 B. C., the area of the city wall was doubled. Bad government by Roman procurators, appointed over Judea as a Roman province, led to disaster and discontent, until finally Titus laid siege to the city and captured it with the sacrifice of one million lives.

After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus it became pagan under the rule of Hadrian, who excluded the Jews from the city and built a temple in honor of Jupiter on the site of the former Jewish temple.

Hadrian gave to the city the heathen name Aelia Capitolina, but Constantine afterward restored the name Jerusalem. Under his rule many costly Christian churches were built and the cause of Christianity promoted, both by the emperor himself and his mother, the Empress Helena, who devoted herself to identifying the sacred places and erecting churches upon the sites of deep interest to the Christian world. The Emperor Julian (362) attempted to champion the cause of polytheism and rebuilt the temple. The effort was abandoned, and the tradition indicates that certain supernatural signs, consisting of fire from heaven and earthquakes, were the cause of the discouragement. In 614 A. D. the Persians, under Chosroes II, captured Jerusalem, with the destruction of large numbers of the clergy and their churches. From 637 to 1517 the city alternated between the possession of the Mohammedans and the Christians, the Crusaders capturing it in 1099. Three times since that time has the city been in Christian hands, and as many times fallen into the hands of the Moslem.

5. The Early Church. After the death of Christ Jerusalem became the scene of the most stirring events of the new Christian sect, beginning with the day of Pentecost and including much of the history contained in the Acts of the Apostles. The Gospel was first proclaimed here in strict obedience to the command of Christ (Acts 1:4). The church here increased rapidly (ch. 5). Here the first martyr was sacrificed (ch. 7); here Paul sat at the feet of Gamaliel, and here he preached, and it was from here that he was taken to Caesarea and Rome.

In Jerusalem the great council was held, at which the question of the rite of circumcision was discussed, at which time addresses were made by Peter, Barnabas, Paul, and James. James was the president of the council, occupying a very prominent place, if, indeed, not the first place in the church. Herod here put an end to the career of James by beheading him (Acts ch. 12). The extreme severity of the persecutions tended to scatter abroad the Christians, which resulted in the dissemination of the Gospel throughout the world.

6. The Modern City. The modern city occupies the site of the ancient one. It has been built upon the ruins of its predecessor. The modern wall built in 1542 varies from twenty to sixty feet in height. The site of the former magnificent temple is occupied by the Mohammedan mosque, Kubbet es-Sakhara (Dome of the Rock), and called also the Mosque of Omar, built by Abd el-Melik, A. D. 686. The present condition of the population of Jerusalem is thus stated by Dr. Philip Schaff: "The present population of Jerusalem is variously estimated, as no census has been taken. Robinson in 1841 made the whole population 11,500, but later was inclined to place it at 17,000; Drake (1874) puts it at 20,900; Baedeker, 24,000; Dr. Neuman, a Jewish physician, fifteen years a resident of the city, estimates it at 36,000. Baedeker distributes the 24,000 as follows: 13,000 Moslems, 7,000 Christians, 4,000 Jews. The Turkish statistics in 1871 gave an estimate in families or houses as follows: 1,025 Moslem, 680 Jewish, 299 Orthodox Greek, 179 Latin, 175 Armenian, 44 Coptic, 18 Greek Catholic, 16 Protestant, 7 Syrian; in all, 2,393 families. Dr. Newman distributes his estimate of 36,000 into 15,000 Mohammedans, 13,000 Jews, and 8,000 Christians, including 5,000 Franks." The Greek Church is strongest in numbers, wealth, and influence, and is supported by the Russian power. The Jews live very largely upon charity. Only in Jerusalem is the Hebrew language spoken in ordinary conversation, and that by the Jews. Protestantism in the city is not represented in any great strength. The English and the Prussian churches for a long time unitedly supported this work until, in 1888, the German government withdrew. Recently the German Protestant work has shown vigor in the erection and consecration of a new church. One of the most significant of recent events is the visit of the Emperor William of Germany to the city of Jerusalem in 1898 to be present at the opening of this church, to the building fund of which he had been a large contributor. The emperor, having purchased from the Sultan of Turkey a piece of land on Mount Zion, offered it for the erection of a Roman Catholic church, school, and other buildings, for the use of his Roman Catholic subjects in Jerusalem. One of the latest innovations in the immediate neighborhood of the city is the construction of a railroad from Jaffa to Jerusalem itself.

JERUSALEM, NEW. The symbolic name of the true Church of God, wholly separated from the false Church (Rev. 21:2, sq.; 3:12); representing, not a place but a people, the redeemed themselves. The vision is really an echo of Old Testament prophecy (Ezek. 40:1-48:35). It is referred to as "Jerusalem that is above," i. e., existing in heaven, according to the pattern of which the earthly Jerusalem was supposed to be built (Gal. 4:26); and "the heavenly Jerusalem," of which true Christians are to be regarded as citizens while still living upon the earth (Heb. 12:22).

JERUSA (Heb. יְרוּשָׁה, yer-oo-shaw', possessed), the daughter of Zadok and queen of Uzziiah. She was the mother of Jotham, king of Judah (2 Kings 15:33), B. C. 738. Called also JERUSAH.

JERUSAH (Heb. יְרוּשָׁה, yer-oo-shaw'), another form (2 Chron. 27:1) of the name JERUSAH (q. v.).

JESATAH (1 Chron. 3:21; Neh. 11:7), another form of JESHAIAH (q. v.).

JESHAIAH (Heb. יֵשַׁעְיָהוּ, yesh-ah-yaw', Jehovah saves).

1. The second-named of the sons of Hananiah, the son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:21), another form of JESALIAH, B. C. after 536.

2. One of the sons of Jeduthun, appointed as a sacred harper (1 Chron. 25:3) at the head of the eighth division of Levitical musicians (v. 15), B. C. after 1000.

3. The son of Rehabiah, of the Levitical family of Eliezer. His descendant, Shelomith, was over the sacred treasury in the time of David (1 Chron. 26:25; comp. 24:21, where he is called Issiah), B. C. after 1000.

4. Son of Athaliah, and chief of the family of Elam. He returned from Babylon with seventy males (Ezra 8:7), B. C. about 457.

5. A Levite of the family of Merari, who, in company with Hashabiah, met Ezra at Ahava, on the way from Babylon to Palestine (Ezra 8:19), B. C. about 457.

6. Father of Ithiel, a Benjamite, whose descendant, Sallu, resided in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 11:7, A. V. "Jesaiah"), B. C. before 445.

JESH'ANAH (Heb. יֵשָׁנָה, yesh-aw-naw', old), one of the cities of Israel, which was taken with its suburbs from Jeroboam by Abijah, king of Judah (2 Chron. 13:19). It is only mentioned in this connection, and its site has not been ascertained.

JESHAR'ELAH (Heb. יֵשָׁרְאֵלָה, yesh-ar-ale'-aw, upright toward God), head of the seventh division of the Levitical musicians (1 Chron. 25:14). He was a son of Asaph, and his name is given (ver. 2) as Asarelah.

JESHEB'EAB (Heb. יֵשֶׁבְעָב, yeh-sheb-awb', father's seat), the head of the fourteenth course of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:13), B. C. before 960.

JES'SHER (Heb. יֵשָׁר, yay'-sher, uprightness), one of the sons of Caleb, the son of Hezron, by his wife Azubah (1 Chron. 2:18), B. C. about 1210.

JESH'IMON (Heb. יֵשִׁימוֹן, yesh-ce-mone', a desolation). The title simply designates the place, which lies north of the Dead Sea (Num. 21:20; 23:28; 1 Sam. 23:19, etc.). "In the Old Testament the wilderness of Judea is called the Jeshimon, a word meaning devastation, and no term can better suit its haggard and crumbling appearance. It covers some thirty-five miles by fifteen . . . short bushes, thorns, and succulent creepers were all that relieved the brown and yellow bareness of the sand, the crumbling limestone, and scattered shingle. Such is Jeshimon, the wilderness of Judea. It carries the violence and desolation of the Dead Sea Valley right up to the heart of the country, to the roots of the Mount of Olives, to within two hours of the gates of Hebron, Bethlehem, and Jerusalem" (Smith, Hist. Geog.).

JESHI'SHAI (Heb. יֵשִׁישַׁי, yesh-ee-shah'ee, aged), the son of Jahdo and father of Michael, one of the ancestors of the Gadites who dwelt in Gilead (1 Chron. 5:14), B. C. long before 740.

JESHOAH'AH (Heb. יֵשׁוּחָאֵה, yesh-o-khawa-yaw', Jah wi empty), a chief of the Simeonites, and one of those who emigrated to Gedor (1 Chron. 4:36), B. C. about 715.

JESH'UA (Heb. יֵשׁוּעַ, yay-shoo'-ah, Jehovah's helps).

1. A priest in the reign of David, to whom the ninth course fell by lot (1 Chron. 24:11, in which passage it is Anglicized Jeshuah), B. C. about 960. Perhaps the same with the one mentioned in Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39, whose descendants returned from Babylon.

2. A Levite appointed by Hezekiah, with others, to distribute the sacred offerings among their brethren (2 Chron. 31:15), B. C. 719.

3. Son of Jehozadak, first high priest of the third series, viz., of those after the Babylonish captivity, and ancestor of the fourteen high priests his successors down to Joshua or Jason, and Onias or Menelaus, inclusive. Jeshua, like his contemporary Zerubbabel, was probably born in Babylon, whither his father, Jehozadak, had been taken captive while young (1 Chron. 6:15). He came up from Babylon in the first year of Cyrus with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7; 12:1, 7, 10), and took a leading part with him in the rebuilding of the temple and the restoration of the Jewish commonwealth (Ezra 3:2-8, 9; 4:3; 5:2), B. C. 536-446. Besides the great importance of Jeshua as a historical character, from the critical times in which he lived, and the great work which he accomplished, his name Jesus, his restoration of the temple, his office as high priest, and especially the two prophecies concerning him in Zech. 3 and 6:9-15, point him out as an eminent type of Christ (Smith, s. v.). He is called Joshua (Hag. 1:1, 12; 2:2, 4; Zech. 3:1, 3, 6, 8, 9).

4. A descendant (or native) of Pahath-moab, mentioned with Joab as one whose posterity, numbering two thousand eight hundred and twelve (Ezra 2:6), or two thousand eight hundred and eighteen (Neh. 7:11), returned from Babylon, B. C. before 536.

5. A Levite named along with Kadmiel as one whose descendants ("children of Hoderah"), to the number of seventy-four, returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43), B. C. before 436.

6. The father of Jozabad, which latter was appointed by Ezra one of the receivers of the offering for the sacred service (Ezra 8:33), B. C. about 457.

7. A Jew whose son Ezer repaired the part of the wall ("over against the going up to the armory") under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:19), B. C. 445.

8. A Levite, probably son of Azaniah (Neh. 10:9), who assisted in explaining the law to the people under Ezra (Neh. 8:7; 9:4, 5; 12:8), B. C. about 445.

9. Joshua, the son of Nun, is called Jeshua in Neh. 8:17.

10. Son of Kadmiel, one of the Levites who served in the temple, "to praise and to give thanks" after the restoration in the time of Eliashib (Neh. 12:24), B. C. about 406. Perhaps, however, "son" is here a transcriber's error for "and," in which case this Jeshua will be the same as N. 5 (McC. and S., Cyc.).

11. A city of Judah inhabited after the captivity (Neh. 11:26); perhaps the village Yeshua, between Zorah and Chesalon.

JESH'UAH (1 Chron. 24:11). See JESBUA, 1.

JESH'URUN (Heb. יֵשִׁרוּן, yesh-oo-roon', upright), an honorable surname given to Israel (Deut. 32:15; 33:5, 26; Isa. 44:2, A. V. "Jesurun"), and representing Israel as a nation of just or upright men. The epithet righteous nation, as we may render Jeshurun, was intended to remind Israel of its calling, and involved the severest reproof of its apostasy.

JESI'AH (1 Chron. 12:6; 23:20). See ISSHIAH.

JESIM'EL (Heb. יְשִׁמְיֵאל, yes-eem-aw-ale', God will place), one of the thirteen Simeonite princes who, in the time of Hezekiah, migrated to the valley of Gedor for purposes of conquest (1 Chron. 4:36).

JES'SE (Heb. יֵשִׁי, yee-shah'ee, living), a son (or descendant) of Obed, the son of Boaz and Ruth (Ruth 4:17, 22; Matt. 1:5, 6; Luke 3:32; 1 Chron. 2:12). He had eight sons (1 Sam. 17:12), the youngest of whom was David. Jesse's wealth consisted chiefly of sheep, for whom David acted as shepherd (1 Sam. 16:11; 17:34, 35). The last historical mention of Jesse is in relation to the asylum which David procured for him from the king of Moab (1 Sam. 22:3), B. C. before 1000.

JESTING (Gr. εὐτραπέλεια, yoo-trap-el-ee'-ah, pleasantry, humor, facetiousness) is used in a bad sense (Eph. 5:4), as scurrility, ribaldry, low jesting.

JES'UI (Num. 26:44). See ISHUI, No. 1.

JES'UITES (Num. 26:44), descendants of ISHUI, No. 1.

JES'URUN (Isa. 44:2). See JESHURUN.

JES'US CHRIST. In order to study understandingly the life of our Lord recourse should first be had in brief to the broad teachings of the New Testament respecting the character, relations, and claims of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is the one subject whose history fills the four gospels. We should properly apprehend, though we cannot comprehend, the divine personality set forth in these Scriptures; that personality whose words, deeds, and sufferings, and whose revealing names and titles are recorded therein for our learning.

1. Names Assigned to our Lord. Matthew opens his gospel as "the book of the generations of Jesus Christ the Son of David." Both designations are here used as a personal name, although usually "Christ" is a term employed rather as an appellative or common name.

(1) The personal name of our Lord was Jesus, which signifies Saviour. It is carefully accented by repetitions in the record as being highly important. (a) He was so called prospectively by Gabriel unto Mary: "Thou hast found favor with God: and behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb and bring forth a Son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus" (Luke 1:31). (b) He was so named by the angel to Joseph in his supernatural dream respecting Mary and the child: "She shall bring forth a Son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins" (Matt. 1:21). (c) He was so called on the day of his birth: "She brought forth her firstborn son, and he called his name Jesus" (Matt. 1:25). (d) He was so called when his name was officially bestowed at circumcision: "His name shall be called Jesus who was so named of an angel before he was conceived in the womb" (Luke 2:21).

(2) His official appellative was Christ, which means the Anointed One. Here the Messiah and the Christ of the Scriptures meet and identify themselves in the personality of Jesus, who was the Anointed of God as the Prophet, Priest, and King (Χριστός = Christ = the Anointed; Heb. מָשִׁיחַ, Messiah = the Anointed). "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost, and with power, who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with him" (Acts 10:38). Andrew, who had been one of the Baptist's disciples, when he turned to follow Jesus "first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ" (John 1:35, 40, 41). "It was revealed" unto the just and devout Simeon "by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ" (Luke 2:25, 26). Peter, answering the Lord's question, said: "Thou art the Christ (Σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστός), the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16).

(3) Other titles ascribed to our Lord. The Jehovah of the Old Testament is the Jesus of the New. (a) Jesus is called "the son of Man" (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου). With this formula Jesus usually addressed himself to the apprehension of his disciples. The reasons are quite obvious: Jesus was in his condition of humility; he was, as yet, thus best known to his followers in his humanity. He was to be cognized as the promised "seed of the woman," and withal, he was that Perfect Man whose unique mission into this world was to be the Redeemer of lost mankind. (b) Jesus is called distinctively "the Son of God" (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ). This title expresses the deity of the Lord Jesus as distinguished from his humanity. In Scripture this designation is never applied to his miraculous birth, or exclusively to his Messiahship, which, however, is included, but invariably to his original relation to the Father as he was in his preexistence before he assumed humanity. Our Lord declares himself to be the Son of God, and includes his Messiahship as based upon his proper oneness and equality with God, either by direct expression or indirectly by implication (for full discussion, see Cremer, Biblio-Theol., Lex. of New Testament, 1880, p. 562). That relation made the Messiahship possible, as expressed in "God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. 8:3). The reference is not to the incarnation or miraculous conception of Christ, but to his oneness with God in the glory which he had with the Father before the world was (John 17:5). Jesus said to the Jews: "Say ye of him whom the Father hath sent into the world, Thou blasphemest, because I said I am the Son of God?" (John 10:36; comp. 9:35-37; Matt. 26:63, 64). Jews understood that Jesus made this high claim, and would stone him, because that he, being a man, had made himself God (John 10:33); and Paul reaffirms the claim when he represents Jesus Christ as "being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God," "that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:5-8). (c) Jesus is called "God our Saviour" (ὁ Σωτὴρ ἡμῶν Θεός). These passages express Christ's unity and identity with God, illustrating the character of the preexistence of Jesus. Hence, the apostle Paul speaks of "the commandment of God our Saviour" (1 Tim. 1:1; Tit. 1:3); of "the kindness and love of God our Saviour" (Tit. 3:4); of that which "is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour" (1 Tim. 2:4); and that men should "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things" (Tit. 2:10), "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Tit. 2:13).

2. Ground of Christian Belief. The four gospels are occupied in furnishing facts illustrative of Jesus Christ and his work as related to mankind; also in teaching his relation to God. As these Scriptures derive all their character and significance from his personality and life—without which they would have no occasion to exist—our faith in their teaching reposes on the following propositions: (1) The absolutely unique and perfect manhood of Jesus Christ among men; (2) The realization in him of all the Messianic predictions of Scripture; (3) All his miracles being restorative, were part of his redemptive plan; (4) The resurrection of Jesus from the dead, an absolute historical fact; (5) The transformation secured in the character of the individual believer; (6) The Spirit's witness to personal adoption in Christian consciousness; (7) Preeminence of the Christian nations as seen on the atlas of the world.

The details of our Lord's life may now be studied with advantage.

* "Golgotha" was written in Chaldee גולגלתא, gul-gal-law', and in Hebrew גולגולתא gul-go'-lath; but in Greek, τὸ κρῆνον, and in Latin Calvaria, rendered "Calvary" in Luke 23:33—all meaning "the place of a skull." The three Hebrew evangelists give the Hebrew designation, but Luke being himself a Greek, designates the place by the Greek term.

JESUS, OFFICES OF. "Jesus is, in virtue of his incarnation, anointed mediator between God and man. His work was the fulfillment and consummation of the ancient prophetic, priestly, and regal functions to which the typical servants of God under the old economy were anointed. These offices he began to discharge on earth, and continues to discharge in heaven. While considering them as distinct, it is important to remember that they are one in the mediatorial work" (Pope, Christ. Theol., p. 196).

1. The Prophetic Office. We call Christ our highest prophet because he is the perfect revealer of the counsel and will of God for the salvation of sinners. As such he comes with supreme credentials, the Truth and the Light of men. The Lord not only speaks of himself as a prophet (Matt. 13: 57; John 13:38), but also receives this name from others without contradiction (Matt. 21:11; John 3:2; 4:19; 6:14; 9:17), and declares that he is come into the world in order to bear witness of the truth (John 18:37). His disciples call him Prophet and Apostle (Luke 24:19; Acts 3:22-24; Heb. 1:1; 3:1; 2 Pet. 1:18, sq.; Rev. 1:5).

"Jesus Christ was the last lawgiver, and the first evangelist of his own glad tidings; his whole ministry united the law and the Gospel in their essential elements. He came not to abolish, but to fulfill ancient Scripture, and that in three senses: First, to fulfill its meaning in himself as it was all one prophecy of him; secondly, to discharge it of its functions as it was the law of a transient ceremonial economy which he appeared to end; and thirdly, by republishing its moral teaching in harmony with the new dispensation as a dispensation of the Spirit and of love." Our Lord used his human nature as the organ of his revelation, and as man speaking to men was the consummate agent of divine counsel for mankind. Through the eyes of his human spirit the God-man saw the mysteries of his own kingdom.

Another point should not be lost sight of—the ministry of Jesus as the apostle of our profession was the final revelation for the world. In him all past, present, and future teaching was one. Our Lord's credentials were his miracles, but he was himself the Miracle of miracles.

2. The Priestly Office. Jesus Christ was our High Priest, because he "alone has satisfied the deepest wants of humanity, and restored the broken communion between man and the holy God, by presenting the perfect offering of atonement for the sins of the whole world. This high-priestly function Christ has discharged partly during his sojourn upon earth, and partly in continuing during his life in the heavenly glory. By the one as well as by the other is Jesus Christ of God made to us righteousness" (Van Oosterzee, ii, 592). Our Lord not only offered himself as a sacrifice for sin, but is man's intercessor and, through the Holy Ghost, imparts his benediction upon all believers. See INTERCESSION, MEDIATION, PROPITIATION.

3. The Kingly Office. We call Jesus "King,"

because having entered through suffering into glory, he is exalted by the Father as Lord of the kingdom of God. As such, by his word and Spirit, he rules the Church, renews the heart, and finally overcomes the world. See KINGDOM OF GOD.

JETHER (Heb. יֶתֶר, yeh'-ther, surplus).

1. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses (Exod. 4: 18, marg.).

2. The firstborn of Gideon's sons, who, when called upon to execute the captured Midianitish kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, timidly declined on account of his youth (Judg. 8:20). According to Judg. 9:18, he was slain, with sixty-nine of his brothers, by the hands of Abimelech.

3. The father of Amasa, captain general of Absalom's army (1 Kings 2:5, 32). Jether is merely another form of Ithra (2 Sam. 17:25), the latter being probably a corruption. He is described in 1 Chron. 2:17, as an Ishmaelite, which again is more likely to be correct than the "Israelite" of the Hebrew in 2 Sam. 17, or the "Jezreelite" of the LXX and Vulgate in the same passage (K. and D., Com., in loc.). Kimchi suggests "that in the land of Ishmael Jether was called the Israelite from his nationality, and in that of Israel they called him the Ishmaelite on account of his living in the land of Ishmael."

4. The son of Jada, a descendant of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:32).

5. The son of Ezra, whose name occurs in a dislocated passage in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chron. 4:17).

6. The chief of a family of warriors of the line of Asher, and father of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 7: 38). He is probably the same as Ithran (v. 37).

JETHETH (Heb. יֶתֶת, yeh'-thayth', derivation uncertain), one of the phylarchs (A. V. "dukes") who came of Esau (Gen. 36:40; 1 Chron. 1:51).

JETH'LAH (Heb. יֶתְלָה, yith'-law', suspended, i. e., lofty), a city on the borders of the tribe of Dan, mentioned only in Josh. 19:42, and not yet discovered.

JETHRO (Heb. יֶתְרוֹ, yith-ro', excellence, superiority), a priest or prince of Midian, both offices probably being combined in one person. Moses spent the forty years of his exile from Egypt with him, and married his daughter Zipporah (Exod. 3: 1; 4:18), B. C. 1250. By the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed deputies to judge the congregation and share the burden of government with himself (Exod. 18); and on account of his local knowledge he was entreated to remain with the Israelites throughout their journey to Canaan (Num. 10:31, 33). It is said in Exod. 2:18, that the priest of Midian whose daughter Moses married was Reuel; afterward, at ch. 3:1, he is called Jethro, as also in ch. 18; but in Num. 10:29, "Hobab the son of Raguel the Midianite" is apparently called Moses' father-in-law (comp. Judg. 4:11). The probability is that Jethro and Raguel were but different names of Moses' father-in-law (the former being either a title, or a surname showing the rank of Raguel in his tribe), and that the son, Hobab, was his brother-in-law.

JETUR (Heb. יֵטוּר, yeh-oor', encircled), one of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31). His name stands also for his descendants, the Ituræans (1 Chron. 5:19), living east of the northern Jordan (Luke 3:1).

JEU'EL (Heb. יְעוּאֵל, yeh-oo-ale', protected by God), a descendant of Zerah, who, with six hundred and ninety of his kindred, dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:6), B. C. 536.

JEU'SH (Heb. יְעוּשׁ, yeh-oosh', collecting; Strong, hasty).

1. The first of the three sons of Esau by Aholibamah, born in Canaan, but afterward a sheik of the Edomites (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. 1:35), B. C. after 2133.

2. The first-named son of Bilhan, the grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:10), B. C. considerably after 2000.

3. A Levite, one of the four sons of Shimei, of the Gershonites. He, with his brother Beriah, not having many sons, were reckoned as the third branch of the family (1 Chron. 23:10, 11), B. C. about 960.

4. The first named of the three sons of Rehoboam, apparently by Abihail, his second wife (2 Chron. 11:19), B. C. after 934.

JEU'UZ (Heb. יְעוּז, yeh-oots', counselor), the head of a Benjaminite house, one of the sons of Shaharaim, born of his wife Hodesh in Moab (1 Chron. 8:10).

JEW (Heb. יְהוּדִי, yeh-oo-dee', a Jehudite, i. e., descendant of Judah; Gr. Ἰουδαῖος, ee-oo-dah'-yos), a name formed from that of the patriarch Judah, and applied first to the tribe or country of Judah, or to a subject of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 16:6; 25:25; Jer. 32:12; 38:19; 40:11; 41:3; 52:28) in distinction from the seceding ten tribes, the Israelites. From the time of the Babylonish captivity, as the members of the tribe of Judah formed by far the larger portion of the remnant of the covenant people, Jews became the appellation of the whole nation (2 Macc. 9:17; John 4:9; Acts 18:2, 24). The original designation of the Israelitish people was the Hebrews, as the descendants of Abraham. Thus Paul was appropriately called a Hebrew, and still later the terms Hebrew and Jew were applied with little distinction. See ISRAEL.

JEWEL, JEWELRY. In all ages and among all peoples the love of ornament has expressed itself in the making and wearing of objects of beauty in such forms as were attainable. Very early, as soon indeed as the use of metals was known, the making of jewelry, in our sense of the word, began. In the prehistoric bronze age we find multitudes of objects for personal adornment made of that material; and articles of silver and gold, set with stones, are preserved to us from the very dawn of history. The almost universal practice of burying such treasures with the remains of their owners has been a priceless boon both to history and archæology in revealing to us the arts, the commerce, the culture, and the migrations of perished races and civilizations.

1. The Uses of jewelry have been various:

(1) Mere personal adornment (Exod. 11:2; Isa. 3:

19, 20); (2) Gifts and tokens of friendship or affection of our most familiar associations (Gen. 24:22, 53; Ezek. 16:11); (3) In sacred and religious ceremonials (Gen. 41:42; Dan. 5:7, 16, 29); and (4) The priestly jewels (Exod., chaps. 28 and 39). The royal jewels and the insignia of orders of nobility in Europe and the ecclesiastical jewelry of the Greek and Roman Catholic churches are modern examples of 3 and 4. In addition to these uses it may be noted that in ancient times, and still in the East, where money could not be invested as it is with us, the precious stones and elaborate jewelry formed one of the safest and most convenient ways of preserving great wealth in small bulk, easy to transport and to secrete.

2. Scripture Terms. Four Hebrew words are rendered in the A. V. "jewels:"

(1) Seg-oo-law' (סֵגוּלָה), shut up, treasure, is connected with the idea and habit referred to in No. 4 (see Mal. 3:17), and often used figuratively (Exod. 19:5; Psa. 135:4, A. V. "treasure").

(2) Kel-ee' (כֶּלֶעַי) is something wrought or prepared, an article of silver or gold (Gen. 24:53; Exod. 3:22; 11:2; 12:35; Num. 31:50, 51), and more generally (Isa. 61:10; Ezek. 16:39). This is also an indefinite term, often, perhaps, meaning vessels or implements, at other times decorations or trappings, as in last passage cited.

(3) Khel-yaw' (כֶּלֶיָּהוּ), an ornament or trinket (Hos. 2:13), again very general in character.

(4) Neh'-zem (נֶהְזֶם), a ring, the only term that is at all specific, generally rendered earring, and clearly so in Gen. 35:4; Exod. 32:2, 3; Ezek. 16:12; but a nosering (Prov. 11:22; Isa. 3:21), while in many other cases (Gen. 24:22, 30, 47; Num. 31:50, 51; Judg. 8:24-26; Prov. 25:12, etc.), although the former is the rendering, agreeably to modern and Western ideas, the latter may very probably be the original sense.

The nosering in some form is an oriental custom of great persistency. It is sometimes two or two and a half inches in diameter (as in Arabia, especially in the Nejed), or less (as with the women of Anatolia); and sometimes, as in the region of Damascus, is reduced to a mere jeweled stud, like our earrings within the last generation. Lortet (La Syrie d'aujourd'hui, p. 585) speaks of it as a universal custom in Mesopotamia for girls to have one nostril bored for the wearing of gold neh-zem.

Other forms of jewelry need but brief reference. Bracelets and necklaces are familiar in all ages and nations; but in ancient times they were largely worn, especially the former, by men, as is conspicuously shown in the Assyrian sculptures, and implied in Scripture passages, as Num. 31:50. The large, massive golden bracelets of both men and women were sometimes made hollow, as is now done, and filled with sulphur, partly to lighten their weight and partly to save material. This has been proved by Phœnician examples, and was, probably, frequent. Some of the ancient necklaces were very beautiful; much use was not made of precious stones, but of glass and glazed earthenware, especially in Phœnician jewelry, as beads and pendants mingled with gold. Such a necklace is figured in a colored plate by Perrot and Chipius, consisting of gold pendants alternating with blue glass beads; materials of this kind were employed in part for choice articles, as in this instance, and largely in cheaper jewelry.

The passage (Cant. 1:10), "Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels," probably refers to a style of ornament seen in many Cypriote figures, a series of coin hung by small chains or links from behind the ears and coming down by the sides of the face in pendant "rows."

3. Egyptian. The art of manufacturing jewelry had reached great perfection in Egypt at a very early date. Nothing in ancient gilt or gem-work, and scarcely anything now, can surpass in elegance the jewelry found with mummies of the royal family of the 12th dynasty by M. de Morgan in his recent explorations of the brick pyramid of Dashour. These exquisite pieces of workmanship go back to 2400 B. C., fully one thousand years before the Exodus. The tombs were systematically violated and robbed in ancient times, probably, it is thought, during the period of the Hyksos; but a few had escaped intact, and in them were found the mummies of several princesses, with their jewels. Among these were necklaces, bracelets, etc., exquisitely wrought and set with pearls, carnelian, emerald, and lapis lazuli; other articles inlaid with these same stones somewhat in the manner of cloisonne enamel, and two very remarkable crowns, like delicate wreaths, the one incrustated with flowers of gems and bearing a fanlike spray of similar flowers, with stems and leaves of gold; the other a lacelike garland of gold with forget-me-nots of gems and beads of lapis lazuli (comp. Ezek. 16:12). The most familiar form of Egyptian jewelry is that of the so-called scaraboid seals. Many of them, doubtless, were used more as ornaments than as actual seals, though frequently employed for the latter purpose.

4. Assyrian. The jewelry of Assyria and Babylonia may be characterized generally as large, heavy, and showy, but not graceful or delicate. The form best known to us, however, is that of the peculiar "Chaldean cylinders," or rolling seals, which, like the Egyptian scarabs, were largely worn as ornaments and charms. Herodotus mentions a cylinder seal, a staff and some other articles, as forming part of the regular outfit of a Babylonian gentleman for all dress occasions; and with this may be compared the much more ancient account of Judah (Gen. 38:18).

5. Phœnician. With regard to the Phœnician artisans in Judea, it is not necessary to suppose that they resided there, save, perhaps, in the principal cities; but they very probably traveled through the country doing a little business from place to place. Some writers observe that this custom may still be seen in the East; the itinerant goldsmith and jeweler comes with his small portable furnace, crucible, and stock in trade, and sets up business for a day or two in a Syrian or Roumanian hamlet. The women bring their treasured coins to be fashioned into bracelets, bangles, or rings, and the artificer deducts a little percentage for his work. This method is probably very ancient and widespread.

6. Hebrew. Of course, the most interesting and important articles of Hebrew jewelry are those connected with the worship of the tabernacle, especially the high priest's breastplate, of which such particular descriptions are given. The style of workmanship must have been Egyptian in character; the Israelites had been living there for generations, and must have been familiar with the art of that country, while long cut off from association with Mesopotamia. At a later period of their history they came under Assyrian and Babylonian influence, and largely in art matter of their Phœnician neighbors. We have seen how the latter borrowed and mingled the art styles of Egypt and Mesopotamia, developing no originality, though much of skill and delicacy in treatment. It would seem, therefore, that the influences dominating Hebrew art in jewelry must have been first Egyptian, then Phœnician, and finally Chaldean.

At this point a few words should be said as to the differences between ancient and modern jewelry. The whole method of cutting stones in facets is modern and European; all Eastern and all ancient jewelry is quite different; the stones are dressed en cabochon, as modern jewelers call it, i. e., in rounded forms with smooth or polished convex surfaces. This mode we still employ for opaque and translucent gems, such as turquoises, opals, moonstones, and "carbuncle" garnets; but anciently it was universal. This method gives none of the brilliant flashing effect now so highly esteemed, which results from the internal reflection and refraction of the rays of light from the numerous facets; hence the ancients seem to have cared less for transparency than we do; and to make up for the loss of beauty in this regard they paid more attention to engraving gems than the moderns. Any collection of ancient jewelry will show a large proportion of opaque and semi-transparent stones, all en cabochon, rounded, and many beautifully sculptured with cameos, intaglios, or inscriptions. In this work the ancients excelled; and the fineness, sharpness, and boldness of their gem engraving cannot be surpassed, indeed, can scarcely be equaled by modern workmen with the best of tools and magnifiers (see ANKLETS, BRACELET, PRECIOUS STONES, RING.—D. S. M.).

JEWELS. See GLOSSARY.

JEWESS (Gr. Ἰουδαία, ee-oo-dah'-yah), a woman of Hebrew extraction, without distinction of tribe (Acts 16:1; 24:24). It is applied in the former passage to Eunice, the mother of Timothy, who was unquestionably of Hebrew origin (comp. 2 Tim. 3:15), and in the latter to Drusilla, the wife of Felix, and daughter of Herod Agrippa I (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

JEWISH (Gr. Ἰουδαϊκός, ee-oo-dah-ee-kos), of or belonging to Jews. The apostle Paul warns his young brother against Jewish legends, i. e., the Rabbinical legends (Tit. 1:14).

JEWERY (Heb. יְהוּדִי, yeh-hood; Gr. Ἰουδαία, Luke 23:5; John 7:1), the Jewish nation, i. e., the kingdom of Judah, later Judea (Dan. 6:13).

JEZANI'AH (Jer. 40:8; 42:1). See JAAZANIAH, 1.

JEZEBEL (Heb. יֵזַבֵּל, ee-zeh'-bel, non-cohabited, chaste), the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre and Sidon, and queen of Ahab. Her father had formerly been a priest of Astarte, but had violently dispossessed his brother Phelles of the throne.

1. Personal History. The first mention of Jezebel in the sacred narrative is her marriage with Ahab (1 Kings 16:31), B. C. about 875. (1) Introduces idolatry. The first effect of her influence was the immediate establishment of the Phœnician worship on a grand scale at the court of Ahab. At her table were supported no less than four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal and four hundred of Astarte (1 Kings 16:31, 32; 18:19), while the prophets of Jehovah were slain by her orders (1 Kings 18:13; 2 Kings 9:7). (2) Opposes Elijah. When at last the people, at the instigation of ELIJAH (q. v.), rose against her ministers and slaughtered them at the foot of Carmel, and when Ahab was terrified into submission, she alone retained her presence of mind; and when she received, in the palace of Jezreel, the tidings that her religion was all but destroyed (1 Kings 19:1), she vowed to take the life of the prophet. (3) Secures the death of Naboth. When she found her husband cast down by his disappointment at being thwarted by Naboth, she took the matter into her own hands (1 Kings 21:7). She wrote a warrant in Ahab's name, which was to secure the death of NABOTH (q. v.). To her, and not to Ahab, was sent the announcement that the royal wishes were accomplished (21:14), and she bade her husband go and take the vacant property. On her, accordingly, fell the prophet's curse as well as on her husband (21:23). (4) Influence. Her policy was so triumphant that there were at last but seven thousand people who had not bowed the knee to Baal, nor kissed the hand of his image. Through her daughter Athaliah, queen of Judah, the same policy prevailed for a time in that kingdom. She survived Ahab fourteen years, and maintained considerable ascendancy over her son Jehoram. (5) Death. When Jehu entered Jezreel Jezebel was in the palace, which stood by the gate of the city, overlooking the approach from the east. She determined to face the destroyer of her family, whom she saw rapidly advancing in his chariot. She painted her eyelids in the Eastern fashion with antimony, so as to give a darker border to the eyes and make them look larger and brighter, possibly in order to induce Jehu, after the manner of Eastern usurpers, to take her, the widow of his predecessor, for his wife, but more probably as the last act of regal splendor. She tired her head (i. e., adorned her head and hair with a queenly headdress), and, looking down upon him from the high latticed window in the tower, she met him by an allusion to a former act of treason in the history of her adopted country. Jehu looked up from his chariot. Two or three eunuchs of the royal harem showed their faces at the windows, and, at his command, dashed the ancient princess down from the chamber. She fell immediately in front of the conqueror's chariot. When, afterward, he wished to show respect to her corpse as that of "a king's daughter," nothing was found of her but the skull, the palms of her hands, and the soles of her feet (2 Kings 9:7, 30, sq.), B. C. about 841.

2. Character. "Jezebel was a woman in whom, with the reckless and licentious habits of an oriental queen, were united the sternest and fiercest qualities inherent in the Phœnician people. The wild license of her life, the magical fascination of her arts or of her character, became a proverb in the nation (2 Kings 9:22). Long afterward her name lived as the byword for all that was execrable, and in the Apocalypse it is given to a church or an individual in Asia Minor, combining in like manner fanaticism and profligacy (Rev. 2:20)" (Smith).

JE'ZER (Heb. יֶזְרַע, yay'-tser, formation), the third named of the sons of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49; 1 Chron. 7:13), and progenitor of the Jezerites (Num. 26:49), B. C. before 1640.

JE'ZERITES (Num. 26:49). See JEZER.

JEZI'AH (Heb. יֶזִיָּא, yiz-zee-yaw', whom Jehovah sprinkles), an Israelite of the "sons" of Parosh, who put away his heathen wife after the exile (Ezra 10:25), B. C. 456.

JE'ZIEL (Heb. יֶזִיֶּאל, yeh-zee-ale', assembly of God), a "son" of Azmaveth, and one of the skilled Benjamite archers, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3), B. C. before 1000.

JEZLI'AH (Heb. יֶזְלִיָּא, yiz-lee-aw', drawn out, preserved), one of the "sons" (or descendants) of Elpaal, and apparently a chief Benjamite resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:18), B. C. probably about 588.

JEZO'AR (Heb. יֶזְעָר, yits-khar', he will shine), the son of Helah, a wife of Ashur, the father (founder) of Tekoa (1 Chron. 4:7).

JEZRAHI'AH (Heb. יֶזְרָחִיא, yiz-rakh-yaw', Jah will shine), the superintendent of the singers at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 12:42), B. C. 445.

JEZ'REEL (Heb. יֶזְרְעֵאל, yiz-reh-ale', sown by God).

1. A descendant of the father (or founder) of Etam, of the line of Judah (1 Chron. 4:3).

2. The oldest son of the prophet Hosea, so called because of the great slaughter predicted by his father (Hos. 1:4, 5), B. C. about 748.

3. The name of a city in Issachar (Josh. 19:18), and the plain in which it was located (1 Sam. 29:1; Hos. 1:5). It was situated about fifty-five miles N. of Jerusalem, and is identified with the present Zerin. Here the kings of Israel had a palace (2 Sam. 2:8, sq.), and here the court often resided (1 Kings 18:45; 2 Kings 10:11). In or near the town was a temple of Baal, and an asherah (A. V. "grove," 1 Kings 16:32, 33), and the palace of Ahab (1 Kings 21:1; 18:46) was on the eastern side of the city forming part of the city wall (comp. 1 Kings 21:1; 2 Kings 9:25, 30, 33). The seraglio in which Jezebel lived was on the city wall, with window facing to the east (2 Kings 9:30). Nearby was the vineyard of Naboth, coveted by King Ahab, and secured by Jezebel through the cruel death of Naboth (1 Kings 21:1, sq.).

(1) Jezreel, blood of ("I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu," Hos. 1:4), is generally understood to be put for the murders perpetrated by Ahab and Jehu at this place. But the divine vengeance is to be visited upon the house of Judah, and would seem, therefore, to be because of his acts. This may be, not because of his extermination of the house of Ahab, in which he fulfilled the divine command, but by reason of the motives which actuated Jehu. That he was moved by evil and selfish motives is evident (see 2 Kings 10:29, 31).

(2) Jezreel, ditch of. The fortification, or in-trenchment, surrounding the city, outside of which Naboth was executed (1 Kings 21:23, marg.).

(3) Jezreel, fountain of. "The fountain which is in Jezreel" (1 Sam. 29:1) is mentioned as the spot near which the Israelites pitched their camp in one of their campaigns against the Philistines. At present it is called Ain Jalûd (or Ain Jalût),

2:2; 3:2; 1 Chron. 3:1), a woman of Jezreel in Judah.

JIB'SAM (Heb. יִבְסָם, yib-sawm', fragrant, pleasant), one of the "sons" (descendants) of Tola, the son of Issachar, in David's army (1 Chron. 7:2), B. C. about 1000. Or he may have been a son of Tola, with descendants in the army of David.

JID'LAPH (Heb. יִדְלָפ, yid-lawf', tearful, weeping), the seventh named of the eight sons of Nahor (Abraham's brother) by Milcah (Gen. 22:22), B. C. perhaps about 2200.

JIM'NA (Num. 26:44), JIM'NAH (Gen. 46:17). See IMNAH.

JIM'NITE (Num. 26:44), descendants of Jimna.

Jezreel (Ain Jalût).

i. e., Goliath's fountain, probably because it was regarded as the scene of Goliath's defeat. It is a very large fountain issuing from the foot of the mountain on the northeast border of Gilboa.

(4) Jezreel, portion of. The field or country adjacent to the city, where the crime of Ahab had been perpetrated, and its retribution was to be exacted (2 Kings 9:10, 21, 36, etc.).

(5) Jezreel, tower of. One of the turrets or bastions guarding the entrance of the city, and where the watchman was stationed (2 Kings 9:17).

(6) Jezreel, valley of, lying on the northern side of the city, between the ridges of Gilboa and Moreh. Its name was afterward extended to the whole plain of Esdraelon (Josh. 17:16; Judg. 6:33; Hos. 1:5). Smith suggests that the "word for 'vale,' eneq, literally deepening, is a highlander's word for a valley as he looks down into it, and is never applied to any extensive plain away from hills."

4. A town in the mountains of Judah, mentioned between Juttah and Jokdeam (Josh. 15:56), and probably the native place of Ahinoam, one of David's wives (1 Sam. 25:43; 27:3); not yet discovered.

JEZ'REELITE, an inhabitant of JEZREEL (q. v.), in Issachar (1 Kings 21:1, 4, 6, 7, 15, 16; 2 Kings 9:21, 25).

JEZ'REELITISS (1 Sam. 27:3; 30:5; 2 Sam.

JIPH'TAH (Heb. יִפְתָּח, yif-tawkh', he will open), a city in the lowland district of Judah (Josh. 15:43), not positively identified, but located by some at the ruined village Jimrin.

JIPH'TAH-EL (Heb. יִפְתָּחֵל, yif-takh-alé, opening of God), a valley at the intersection of the line between Asher and Naphtali, with the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:14, 27). It is probably "no other than the large Wady Abilin, which takes its rise in the hills in the neighborhood of Jefât" (Robinson, Bib. Res., p. 107).

JO'AB. 1. (Heb. יוֹאָב, yo-awb', Jehovah his father.) A "captain of the host" of David.

Family. Joab was one of the three sons of Zeruiah, the sister of David. His father is not named in the Scriptures, but Josephus (Ant., vii, 1, 3) gives his name as Suri. He seems to have resided at Bethlehem, and to have died before his sons, as we find mention of his sepulcher at that place (2 Sam. 2:32).

Personal History. (1) First appearance. Joab's first appearance was in connection with his brothers, Abishai and Asahel, in command of David's army, when they went against Abner, who was championing the claims of Ishbosheth to the throne. The armies met at the pool of Gibeon, a general action was brought on, and Abner worsted. In his flight he killed Asahel, who was pursuing him (2 Sam. 2:13-32), B. C. 1000. (2) Avenges Asahel. Joab was greatly angered at the death of his brother, but postponed his revenge. Abner, quarreling with Ishbosheth, came to David in Hebron, in order to enlist in his service. When Joab returned from some warlike excursion, and was informed of Abner's visit, he chided the king, and accused Abner of treachery. He then sent messengers after Abner, who returned at once and was slain by Joab. David reprobated the act, but seems to have been in fear of his able and intrepid nephew (2 Sam. 3:8-39). (3) In chief command. At the siege of Jerusalem Joab succeeded in scaling the height upon which the fortress stood, and was made "chief and captain" of the army of all Israel, of which David was now king (2 Sam. 5:6-10; 1 Chron. 11:5-8). He immediately undertook, in conjunction with David, the fortification of the city (2 Sam. 5:9; 1 Chron. 11:8). He had a chief armorbearer of his own, Naharai, a Beerothite (2 Sam. 23:37; 1 Chron. 11:39), and ten attendants to carry his equipment and baggage (2 Sam. 18:15). He had the charge of giving the signal by trumpet for advance or retreat (18:16). He was called by the almost regal title of "Lord" (11:11), "the prince of the king's army" (1 Chron. 27:34). His usual residence was in Jerusalem, but he had a house and property, with barley fields adjoining, in the country (2 Sam. 14:30), in the "wilderness" (1 Kings 2:34), probably on the northeast of Jerusalem (comp. 1 Sam. 13:18; Josh. 8:15, 20), near an ancient sanctuary, called from its nomadic village "Baal-hazor" (2 Sam. 13:23; comp. with 14:30), where there were extensive sheepwalks. (4) Military achievements. These were conducted by him in person, and may be divided into three campaigns: (a) That against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon. Joab attacked and defeated the Syrians, while his brother did the same to the Ammonites. The Syrians rallied with their kindred beyond the Euphrates, and were finally routed by David himself (2 Sam. 10:1, sq.). (b) The second was against Edom. The decisive victory was gained by David himself in the "valley of salt," and celebrated by a triumphal monument (8:13). But Joab had the charge of carrying out the victory, and remained for six months, extirpating the male population, whom he then buried in the tombs of Petra (1 Kings 11:15, 16). (c) The third was against the Ammonites. They were again left to Joab (2 Sam. 10:7-19). At the siege of Rabbah the ark was sent with him, and the whole army was encamped in booths or huts round the beleaguered city (11:1, 11). After a sortie of the inhabitants, which caused some loss to the Jewish army, Joab took the lower city on the river, and then sent to urge David to come and take the citadel, that the glory of the capture might pertain to the king (12:26-28). (5) Services to David. Joab served David faithfully, both in political and private relations, and showed himself to be truly devoted to his interests. (a) Joab and Uriah. During the Ammonite war Joab lent himself to the king's passion, and secured the death of Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam.

11:1-25). (b) Joab and Absalom. When Absalom accomplished the death of Amnon, Joab effected his return by means of the widow of Tekoah; and when he revolted, Joab's former intimacy with the prince did not impair his fidelity to the king. He followed him beyond the Jordan, and in the final battle of Ephraim, slew Absalom in spite of David's injunction to spare him, and when no one else had courage to act so decisive a part (2 Sam. 18:2, 11-15). (c) When David resolved to number the people Joab endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose, and, unsuccessful in this, performed the task so tardily as to afford the king an opportunity of reconsidering the matter (24:1-4). (6) Murder of Amasa. David, to conciliate the powerful party which had supported Absalom, offered the command of the army to Amasa. Joab was grievously offended by this act of the king, and when Amasa tarried longer than the time allowed him to assemble his forces, Joab had an opportunity of displaying his superior resources. Abishai was ordered to pursue the revolting Sheba (perhaps with Joab in command, K. and D.), and when Amasa came up to meet them at Gibeon he was treacherously slain by Joab (2 Sam. 20:4-13). (7) Joins Adonijah. Shortly before the death of David a demonstration was made in favor of his eldest surviving son, Adonijah, and Joab joined his party. The prompt measures taken rendered Adonijah's demonstration abortive (1 Kings 1:7, 15, sq.). (8) Death. Hearing of the death of Adonijah, Joab fled for refuge to the altar. Solomon, hearing of this, sent Benaiah to put him to death; and as he refused to come forth, Benaiah slew him. His body was buried in the wilderness of Judah (1 Kings 2:5, 28-34), B. C. 960.

Character. Joab was a man of great military prowess, valiant, and capable. He was revengeful, and not above treachery in order to gratify his vengeance. While treating his king with but little ceremony he was, nevertheless, truly devoted to his interests. His principles did not prevent him from serving his master's vices as well as his master's virtues. Altogether he appears in history as one of the most accomplished and unscrupulous warriors that Israel ever produced.

2. In 1 Chron. 2:54 there is mention of "Ataroth, the house of Joab." What Joab is meant is uncertain, but it is supposed to refer to No. 1.

3. The son of Seruiah (son of Kenaz), a Judaite and progenitor of the inhabitants of Charashim, or craftsmen (1 Chron. 4:14).

4. The head of a family whose descendants, with those of Jeshua, to the number of two thousand eight hundred and twelve (Ezra 2:6), or two thousand eight hundred and eighteen (Neh. 7:11), returned from Babylon with Ezra. It is not certain whether Jeshua and Joab were sons of Pahath-Moab, or whether, in the registration of those returned, the descendants of Jeshua and Joab were represented by the sons of Pahath-Moab. The Joab mentioned in Ezra 8:9 is probably the same person, B. C. 445.

JO'AH (Heb. יוֹאָח, yo-anak'h, Jehovah his brother).

1. Son of Asaph and "recorder" of King Hezekiah, and one of the messengers sent to receive the insulting message of Rabshakeh (2 Kings 18:18, 26, 37; Isa. 36:3, 22), B. C. about 719.

2. A Levite of the family of Gershon, son of Zimnah and father of Iddo (1 Chron. 6:21). He is probably the same person who, with his son Eden, assisted Hezekiah in the reformation of the temple worship (2 Chron 29:12), B. C. about 719. He is identified with Ethan, mentioned in 1 Chron. 6:42.

3. The third son of Obed-edom, one of the porters for the tabernacle in the time of David (1 Chron. 26:4), B. C. after 1000.

4. Son of Joahaz, and recorder for King Josiah. He was appointed one of the superintendents of the temple repairs (2 Chron. 34:8), B. C. 639.

JO'AHAZ (Heb. יוֹאָחָז, yo-aw-khawz', Jehovah holds), the father of Joah, which latter was recorder in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:8), B. C. 639.

JOAN'NA. 1. (Gr. Ἰωάννης, ee-o-an'-nas, Joannas). The son of Rhesa and grandson of Zerubabel, in the lineage of Christ (Luke 3:27).

2. (Gr. Ἰωάννα, ee-o-an'-nah, probably feminine of Ἰωάννης, John). The wife of Chuza, the steward of Herod Agrippa (Luke 8:3). She, with other women, had been cured of grievous diseases by the Saviour, or received material benefits from him, and ministered to him and his disciples. She was also one of the women to whom Christ appeared after the resurrection (Luke 24:10).

JO'ASH (Heb. יוֹאָשׁ, yo-awsh', given by Jehovah).

1. The father of Gideon, who, although himself an idolater, ingeniously screened his son from those desiring to avenge his overthrow of the altar of Baal (Judg. 6:11, 29-31; 7:14; 8:13, 29). He was buried in Ophrah, where he lived (8:29-32).

2. A person who was ordered by King Ahab to imprison Micaiah the prophet for denouncing the allied expedition against Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 22:26; 2 Chron. 18:25), B. C. 862. In both passages he is styled "the king's son," which is usually taken literally. Some, however, suggest that the title may merely indicate a youth of princely stock; others, that Melek, translated king, is a proper name.

3. King of Judah (2 Kings 11:2; 12:19, 20; 13:1, 10; 14:1, 3, 17, 23; 1 Chron. 3:11; 2 Chron. 22:11; 24:1, 2, 4, 22, 24; 25:23, 25). See JEHOASH, 1.

4. King of Israel (2 Kings 13:9, 12, 13, 14, 25; 14:1, 23, 27; 2 Chron. 25:17, 18, 21, 23, 25; Hos. 1:1; Amos 1:1). See JEHOASH, 2.

5. A descendant of Shelah, son of Judah, mentioned among those "who had the dominion in Moab" (1 Chron. 4:22). The Hebrew tradition, quoted by Jerome and Jarchi, applies it to Mahlon, the son of Elimelech, who married a Moabitess.

6. A son of Semeah (or Hasmath), the Gibeathite, who, with his brother Abiezer and other "mighty men," joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3).

JO'ASH (Heb. יוֹאָשׁ, yo-awsh', Jehovah hastened).

1. One of the "sons" (descendants) of Becher, son of Benjamin, and a chieftain of his family (1 Chron. 7:8).

2. The person having charge of the "cellars of oil" under David and Solomon (1 Chron. 27:28), B. C. after 1000.

JO'ATHAM=Jotham the son of, Uziah (Matt. 1:9).

JOB (Heb. יוֹב, yobe, returning), the third named of the sons of Issachar (Gen. 46:13), called Jashub (Num. 26:24; 1 Chron. 7:1).

JOB (Heb. יוֹבֵן, ee-yobe', persecuted), the hero of the book bearing his name; a chieftain of the land of Uz (probably a district of northern Arabia), of great wealth and high rank, and father of seven sons and three daughters.

1. His Affliction. Upon a certain occasion when he, with others, was worshiping God, Satan accused Job of selfishness in his piety: "Doth Job fear God for naught?" Satan was allowed to exert his baleful power upon Job's possessions, and flocks, herds, and children were swept away. The patriarch maintained his integrity, and "in all this sinned not, nor charged God foolishly" (Job 1:1-22).

2. Second Affliction. Again Satan appeared against Job, declaring that were he assailed in his person he would yield up his integrity, whereupon he was allowed to afflict the body of Job, and smote him with a grievous disease. Job's wife breaks down under the trial, and counsels him "to curse God and die." Job remains steadfast, and answers her with, "What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips" (Job 2:1-10). In this sad state he is found by Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, who had come to condole with him. They seem to have been overpowered by the sight of his wretchedness, and sat seven days and nights without uttering a word (vers. 11-13). Job then breaks the silence by cursing the day of his birth, and declares that there is no hope for the end of his misery but in death (ch. 3).

3. Discussion. This act of Job led to a discussion which forms the body of the book, and may be analyzed thus:

(1) The entanglement. (a) First discussion. Eliphaz's first speech (Job, chaps. 4, 5), Job's answer (chaps. 6, 7); Bildad's first speech (ch. 8), Job's answer (chaps. 9, 10); Zophar's first speech (ch. 11), Job's answer (chaps. 12-14). The results of the first discussion were, on the part of Job's friends: 1. A theory of the divine government resting upon an exact and uniform correlation between sin and punishment. 2. Afflictions are always penal, leading to correction and amendment of life when the sufferer repents and turns to God, and in his destruction if he does not submit. 3. Suffering always proves the commission of some special sin, while the conduct of the sufferer indicates the true internal relation between him and God. On the part of Job, a denial of sin as inferred by his opponents, and a denial that punishment proves the commission of sin; that prosperity and adversity are not always commensurate with man's deserts; that in the government of Providence all events and results are absolutely in God's hands, and supplication that God would give him a fair and open trial; prayer for death and a future justification. (b) Second discussion. Eliphaz's second speech (ch. 15), Job's answer (chaps. 16, 17); Bildad's second speech (ch. 18), Job's answer (ch. 19); Zophar's second speech (ch. 20), Job's answer (ch. 21). In the second discussion Job's friends endeavor to uphold their theory of vindictive justice, and in order to do so strive to overthrow Job's innocence. Eliphaz accuses Job of impiety, blasphemy, and rebellion against God, and declares Job to have deserved every calamity that had befallen him (ch. 15). Bildad (ch. 18) takes up this suggestion of ungodliness, and, enlarging upon the inevitable results of impiety, concludes that Job's calamities are peculiarly the penalties due to one who is without God. Zophar (ch. 20) declares that a sinner's sufferings must needs be proportioned to his former enjoyments, and his losses to his former gains. In answer Job recognizes the hand of God in his afflictions (16:7-16; 19:6-20), but denies his ungodliness; asserts that he has never forsaken his Maker, nor ceased to pray. He argues that since in this life the righteous are not saved from evil, it follows that their ways are watched and their sufferings recorded with a view to future justice. He declares his conviction that God will personally manifest himself as his avenger (19:25-27). He nevertheless recognizes the fact that ungodly men frequently enjoy great and unbroken prosperity, and concludes that an impenetrable veil hangs over the temporal dispensations of God (ch. 21).

(c) Third discussion. Eliphaz's third speech (ch. 22), Job's answer (chaps. 23, 24); Bildad's third speech (ch. 25), Job's answer (chaps. 26-31). In the third discussion Eliphaz raises a new point, viz., that the station in which Job was formerly placed presented temptations to certain crimes, and that the punishments he undergoes are precisely such as might be expected had those crimes been committed; hence he infers they actually were committed. Bildad adds a few solemn words on the incomprehensible majesty of God and the nothingness of man, while Eliphaz seems to have been put to silence. Job does not alter his position, nor, properly speaking, adduce any new argument, but restates with force and eloquence the chief points which he regards as established (ch. 26). All creation is confounded by the majesty and might of God, and man is baffled in the attempt to comprehend his ways. He then (ch. 27) describes the ruin that, as a rule, overtakes the hypocrite, and which he would deserve were he to dissemble the truth; admits what is true in his opponents' arguments, and corrects his hasty and unguarded statements. In ch. 28 he gives a grand description of wisdom, and states that true human wisdom consists in the fear of the Lord and in turning from evil. Then follow (chaps. 29-31) a beautiful description of his former life contrasted with his present misery, together with a vindication of his character from all the charges and insinuations of his opponents.

(2) The unravelment. Elihu's four speeches to Job (Job, chaps. 32-37); Jehovah's address to Job (38-40:2); Job's first reply (40:3-5); Jehovah's second address to Job (40:6 to ch. 41), Job's second reply (42:1-6). Elihu shows that Job's friends had accused him upon false or insufficient grounds, and had failed to convict him or to vindicate God's justice. Job had assumed his entire innocence, and had arraigned God's justice (33:9-11). These errors arose from their overlooking the main object of all suffering, that God by chastisement warns man, teaches him self-knowledge and humility, thus preparing him to seek pardon, renewal of life, and restoration (vers. 9-26). Again, God being the source of justice, any charge of injustice is a contradiction of terms. God sees all things and controls all events, and that for the purpose of bringing righteousness to light (34:10-30). Man having no claim upon God, what he receives is of grace (35:6-9). Unanswered prayer (v. 9) is owing to the fact that man prays in a proud and insolent spirit (vers. 12, 13), and Job is urged to self-examination. Elihu proceeds (ch. 36) to show that God's almightiness is not associated with any contempt or neglect of his creatures, an error which had led Job into great danger (v. 12; comp. v. 18). Reference is made to the manifestations of goodness as well as greatness in creation. Jehovah now speaks, and, in language of incomparable grandeur, he reproves and silences the murmurs of Job; he illustrates his absolute power by a marvelously beautiful and comprehensive survey of creation, and his all-embracing providence by reference to the phenomena of the animal kingdom. Job confesses his inability to comprehend, and therefore to answer, his Maker (40:3, 4). In his second address Jehovah proves that a charge of injustice against God assumes that the accuser is more competent than he to rule the universe; while in fact he cannot subdue the monsters of the irrational creation. Job responds by admitting the power and wisdom of God; expresses contrition for the bitterness and arrogance which had characterized some portion of his complaints. His friends are rebuked by God for untruth, which, inasmuch as it was not willful, but proceeded from a real though narrow-minded conviction of the divine justice, was forgiven through the intercession of Job. Respecting authorship, history, etc., of Job, see BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

4. Job's Restoration. "The Lord turned the captivity of Job;" his friends came to him, each bringing a piece of money and an earring of gold. Job became very prosperous, so that his latter end was "more than his beginning;" his sheep numbered 14,000, his camels 6,000, his oxen 1,000 yoke, and 1,000 she asses. He had also seven sons and three daughters. He lived after this one hundred and forty years.

5. Character. The character of Job is concisely expressed by Jehovah: "Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?" And during the trial, his patience under affliction, his uncomplaining submission to God, his unwavering trust in divine providence, are strikingly manifested.

NOTE.—Job's Disease. This disease was probably elephantiasis (so called because the limbs become jointless lumps, like elephants' legs). The disease begins with the rising of tubercular boils, and at length resembles a cancer spreading itself over the whole body, by which the body is so affected that some of the limbs fall completely away. Scraping with a potsherd will not only relieve the intolerable itching of the skin, but also remove the matter (Delitzsch, Com., Job 2:7; see Kitto, Smith; also LEPROSY, in article DISEASES).

JO'BAB (Heb. יוֹבָב, yo-hawb', howler).

1. The last in the order of the sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chron. 1:23).

2. Son of Zerah of Bozrah, and one of the "kings" of Edom (Gen. 36:33, 34; 1 Chron 1:44, 45), B. C. probably before 1210.

3. The king of Madon, a royal city of the Canaanites. Assisting Jabin, king of Hazor, against Joshua, they were both by him overcome (Josh. 11:1), B. C. after 1170.

4. A Benjamite, and the first named of the sons of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. 8:9).

5. One of the "sons" (probably descendants) of Elpaal, a chief of Benjamin at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:18), B. C. probably about 588.

JOCH'EBED (Heb. יוֹכָבֵד, yo-keh'-bed, Jehovah her glory), the wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Num. 26:59), B. C. before 1290. In Exod. 6:20 it is expressly declared that she was the sister of Amram's father, and, consequently, her husband's aunt. It was contrary to the law for persons thus related to marry, and several attempts have been made to prove a more distant relationship. Kitto says: "The fact seems to be that where this marriage was contracted there was no law forbidding such alliances, but they must in any case have been unusual, although not forbidden; and this, with the writer's knowledge that they were subsequently interdicted, sufficiently accounts for this one being so pointedly mentioned." So Keil and Delitzsch (Com., in loc.).

JO'ED (Heb. יוֹאֵד, yo-ade', Jehovah his witness), the son of Pedaiah, and grandfather of Sallu, which last was one of the Benjamites chosen to dwell in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:7), B. C. before 536.

JO'EL (Heb. יוֹאֵל, yo-ale', Jehovah his God).

1. The eldest of the two sons of Samuel, appointed by him as judges in Beer-sheba. By the taking of bribes and perversion of judgment they led to the popular desire for a monarchy (1 Sam. 8:2), B. C. before 1080. In 1 Chron. 6:28 by a clerical error he is called Vashni. He is named as the father of Heman, the Levitical singer (1 Chron. 6:33; 15:17).

2. A descendant of Simeon, one of those whose families emigrated to the valley of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:35), B. C. about 715.

3. A descendant of Reuben, but by what line or in what degree of proximity is uncertain (1 Chron. 5:4, 8).

4. A chief of the Gadites resident in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:12), B. C. perhaps about 782.

5. A Kohathite Levite, son of Azariah, and father of Elkanah (1 Chron. 6:36). He is probably the Joel who assisted Hezekiah in his restoration of the temple services (2 Chron. 29:12), B. C. 719.

6. The third named of the four sons of Izrahiah, a chieftain of the tribe of Issachar in the time of David (1 Chron. 7:3), B. C. about 1000.

7. Brother of Nathan, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:38), B. C. about 1000. He is called "Igal the son of Nathan" in 2 Sam. 23:36. Kennicott decides in favor of the former as most likely to be the genuine text (Dissertations, pp. 212-214).

8. A Levite, chief of the family of Gershom, who, at the head of one hundred and thirty, was appointed by David to assist in removing the ark (1 Chron. 15:7, 11), B. C. after 1000. He is probably the same with the third of the "sons" of Laadan (23:8), and also with the son of Jehiel, who was one of the keepers of the "treasures of the dedicated things" (26:22) (Keil).

9. Son of Pedaiah, and chief, in the time of David, of the half tribe of Manasseh west (1 Chron. 27:20), B. C. about 1000.

10. One of the "sons" of Nebo, who put away his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:43), B. C. 456.

11. Son of Zichri, and "overseer" of the Benjamites resident at Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:9), B. C. about 536.

12. Son of Pethuel, and second of the twelve minor prophets (Joel 1:1; Acts 2:16). Nothing is known of his life, and all that can be inferred with any certainty from his writings is that he lived in Judah, and probably prophesied in Jerusalem. The date of his ministry is also a disputed point, some making him contemporary with Amos and Isaiah, during the reign of Uzziah, B. C. about 770; others (Keil, Com.) assign him to the first thirty years of Jehoash.

JO'EL, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

JOE'LAH (Heb. יוֹאֵלָה, yo-ay-law', furthermore), one of the two sons of Jeroham of Gedor who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:7), B. C. before 1000.

JOE'ZER (Heb. יוֹאֵזֶר, yo-eh'-zer, Jehovah his help), one of the Korhites who united themselves to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:6), B. C. before 1000.

JOG'BEHAH (Heb. יוֹגְבְּהָא, yog-beh-haw', hillock), one of the "fenced cities" rebuilt by the Gadites (Num. 32:35). It is mentioned (Judg. 8:11) as in the route of Gideon while pursuing the Midianites. It is probably preserved in the ruins of Jebelha, about two hours N. E. of Ammán.

JOG'LI (Heb. יוֹגְלִי, yog-lee', exiled), the father of Bukki, which latter was appointed from the tribe of Dan on the commission for dividing the land of Canaan (Num. 34:22), B. C. 1170.

JO'HA (Heb. יוֹחָא, yo-khaw', probably Jehovah revives).

1. One of the sons of Beriah the Benjamite, and a chief of his tribe resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:16). B. C. perhaps about 588.

2. A Tizite who, with his brother Jedacl, was one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:45), B. C. 1000.

JOHANAN (Heb. יוֹחָנָן, yo-khaw-naw', contracted form of Jehohanan, God-given).

1. The son of Careah (Kareah), one of the Jewish chiefs who rallied around Gedaliah on his appointment as governor (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8). He also warned the governor of the purpose of Ishmael to assassinate him, and offered to slay Ishmael, but Gedaliah refused to listen to his advice (Jer. 40:13-16). After the murder of Gedaliah Johanan led in the pursuit of the assassin and rescued the people he had taken captive (41:11-16). He then consulted with Jeremiah as to what course the remnant of the people should pursue, but when told by the prophet to remain in the land he and his associates refused, and retired (taking Jeremiah with them) to Tahpanhes, in Egypt (43:1-7). From this time we lose sight of him and his fellow-captives, and they, doubtless, shared the threatened punishment (v. 11, sq.), B. C. 586.

2. The eldest son of Josiah, king of Judah (1 Chron. 3:15). He probably died early, as Scripture makes no further mention of him, B. C. after 639.

3. The fifth son of Elieonai, one of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:24), B. C. probably after 400. He is identified by some with Nahum, mentioned (Luke 3:25, A. V. "Naum") among the ancestry of Christ.

4. Son of Azariah, and father of Azariah, high priests (1 Chron. 6:9, 10), and by some thought to have been the same with Jehoiada (2 Chron. 24:15).

5. One of the mighty men who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), B. C. before 1000. He was probably a Benjamite.

6. The eighth named of the Gadite warriors who rallied to the support of David in the hold in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:12), B. C. before 1000.

7. The father of Azariah, which latter insisted upon sending home the captives taken from Judah (2 Chron. 28:12), B. C. about 735.

8. The son of Hakkatan, of the "sons" of Azgad, who returned, with one hundred and ten males, from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:12), B. C. about 457.

9. A priest, the "son" of Eliashib, into whose chamber Ezra retired to mourn over the marrying of Gentile wives by the Jews (Ezra 10:6). He is identified with the Johanan mentioned in Neh. 12:22, 23).

10. The son of Tobiah the Ammonite, who married the daughter of Meshullum, the priest (Neh. 6:18), B. C. 445.

JOHN. 1. The Apostle (Gr. Ἰωάννης, ee-o-an'-nace, from Hebrew Jehohanan, Jehovah favored), the son of Zebedee, a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee, probably not of the poorer class (Mark 1:20; Luke 5:10), and Salome (Mark 15:40; comp. Matt. 27:56). We have no information respecting the religious character or personal participation of Zebedee in the events of the Gospel history, but his mother was one of the women who followed Jesus even to his crucifixion (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40).

Personal History. (1) Early life. John was probably the son of Zebedee and Salome and younger brother of James (Matt. 4:21), and lived in Bethsaida (Luke 5:10; John 1:44). The mention of the "hired servants" (Mark 1:20), of his mother's "substance" (Luke 8:3), of "his own home" (John 19:27), as also his acquaintance with Caiaphas the high priest (John 18:15), implies a position of at least considerable influence and means. His mother, who manifested an earnest desire for the welfare of her sons (Matt. 20:20), probably early instructed him in religious things; and his trade of fisherman was adapted to holy meditation, since it would lead him frequently to pass whole nights in stillness upon the water.

(2) Introduction to Jesus. The incident recorded in John 1:35-39, would seem to indicate that John had become a disciple of John the Baptist. His mention of Andrew only by name is consistent with his usual manner of naming himself as "that other disciple," "the disciple whom Jesus loved." One day, about the hour of evening sacrifice, John Baptist pointed to Jesus walking by, and said, "Behold the Lamb of God!" His two disciples immediately followed Jesus, and inquired where he dwelt. To this question the Master replied, "Come and see;" and they "abode with him that day, for it was about the tenth hour." John was probably among the disciples who followed their new teacher to Galilee (John 1:43), who were with him at the marriage feast of Cana (2:2), journeyed with him to Capernaum, and thence to Jerusalem (2:12, 23), and came back through Samaria (4:5). He then returned to his former occupation. (3) As apostle. At last the time came when the disciples are to enter into closer relation to Jesus, and become his apostles. John, with his brother James, Simon, and Andrew, were called at the same time, after the incident of the miraculous draught of fishes (Mark 1:19, 20; Luke 5:10). John, with Peter and James, was distinguished above the other apostles, entering more fully into the Master's feelings and plans, and receiving in return his confidence and love. Mention is made of John at the restoration of Peter's mother-in-law (Mark 1:29-31); at the ordination of the twelve apostles (3:17), where he and his brother received from Jesus the surname Boanerges; at the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:35-37; Luke 8:51); at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28); rebuking one who cast out devils in the Lord's name, because he was not one of their company (Luke 9:49); seeking to call down fire from heaven upon a village of the Samaritans (9:54); joining with his mother and James in asking for the highest places in the kingdom of the Master (Matt. 20:20-28; Mark 10:35-45); with Jesus upon the Mount of Olives when he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem (Mark 13:3); sent by the Master to prepare, with Peter, the passover (Luke 22:8); asking Jesus, at the supper, who would betray him (John 13:23-26); with Peter and James in Gethsemane (Mark 14:32, 33). When the betrayal is accomplished Peter and John follow afar off, and, through the personal acquaintance between the latter and Caiaphas, gain admittance into the palace (John 18:15, 16); he was the only disciple present at the crucifixion, and was appointed by Jesus to care for Mary as a son (19:26, 27). (4) Friendship for Peter. Notwithstanding the denial of Peter he and John continued friends, and are afterward often mentioned together. To them Mary Magdalene first runs with the tidings of the emptied sepulcher (20:2); they are the first to hasten thither (20:4-8). For at least eight days they remain in Jerusalem (20:26), after which we find them on the Sea of Galilee pursuing their old calling (21:1). John is the first to recognize his risen Lord; Peter the first to plunge into the water and swim toward the shore where he stood (21:7). The affection and anxiety of Peter for John is shown in his question put to the Master, "Lord, and what shall this man do?" (21:21). (5) History of the Acts. The same union continues between Peter and John. Together they witness the ascension, share in the election of Matthias and the pentecostal baptism. Together they enter the temple as worshippers (Acts 3:1), are imprisoned and protest against the threats of the Sanhedrin (4:3 sq.). They were also sent together to preach to the Samaritans (8:14). John and the rest of the apostles remained at their post despite the persecution of Saul (8:1). He did not meet Paul when the latter came back to Jerusalem as a convert (Gal. 1:19); but this, of course, does not make the inference necessary that he had left Jerusalem. During the persecution under Herod Agrippa he lost his brother by martyrdom (Acts 12:2), while his friend Peter sought safety in flight (12:18, 19). Fifteen years after Paul's first visit he was still at Jerusalem (Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles), one of the "pillars" of the Church, and took part in settling the controversy between the Jewish and Gentile Christians (Acts 15:6, 13; Gal. 2:9). Of the work of the apostle during this period we have hardly the slightest trace. (6) After his departure from Jerusalem. John probably remained in Judea till the death of Mary released him from his trust. When this took place we can only conjecture. There are no signs of his being at Jerusalem at the time of St. Paul's last visit (Acts 21). "Assuming the authorship of the epistles and Revelation to be his, the facts which the New Testament writings assert or imply are: (1) That, having come to Ephesus, some persecution drove him to Patmos (Rev. 1:9). (2) That the seven churches in Asia Minor were the special objects of his affectionate solicitude (1:11); that in his work he had to encounter men who denied the truth on which his faith rested (1 John 4:1; 2 John 7), and others who disputed his authority (3 John 9, 10)." If to this we add that he must have outlived all, or nearly all, of those who had been the friends and companions even of his maturer years; that this lingering age gave strength to an old impression that his Lord had promised him Immortality (John 21:23); that, as if remembering the actual words which had been thus perverted, the longing of his soul gathered itself up in the cry, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. 22:20), we have stated all that has any claim to the character of historical truth. Tradition tells us that he was shipwrecked off Ephesus, and arrived there in time to check the progress of the heresies which sprang up after Paul's departure; that in the persecution under Domitian he was taken to Rome, and that the boiling oil into which he was thrown had no power to hurt him; returned to Ephesus, attested the truth of the first three gospels, writing the fourth to supply what was wanting; introduced the Jewish mode of celebrating the Easter feast; and that, when all capacity to work and teach was gone—when there was no strength even to stand—he directed himself to be carried to the assemblage of believers, and simply said, with a feeble voice, "Little children, love one another." (7) Writings. The following books of the New Testament are generally accepted as having been written by the apostle John: the gospel and the three epistles bearing his name and the Revelation. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

2. One of the family of the high priest, who, with Annas and Caiaphas, sat in the council before whom the apostles Peter and John were summoned for their cure of the lame man and preaching in the temple (Acts 4:6). "Lightfoot identifies him with Rabbi Johanan ben Zaccai, who lived forty years before the destruction of the temple, and was president of the great synagogue after its removal to Jabne, or Jamnia. Grotius merely says he was known to rabbinical writers as 'John the priest'" (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

3. The Hebrew name of the evangelist Mark, who throughout the narrative of the Acts is thus designated (Acts 12:12, 25; 13:5; 15:37).

JOHN THE BAPTIST (Gr. Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτιστής, ee-o-an'-ace ho bap-tis-tace', John the baptizer), the forerunner of Jesus Christ. He and his mission were foretold by Isaiah (40:3; comp. Matt. 3:3), and by Malachi (3:1).

1. Family. John was of the priestly race by both of his parents, his father, Zacharias, being a priest of the course of Abia, or Abijah (1 Chron. 24:10), and his mother, Elizabeth, was "of the daughters of Aaron" (Luke 1:5). His birth—through the miraculous interposition of almighty power, by reason of his parents' extreme age—was foretold by an angel sent from God, who at the same time assigned to him the name of John. He was born in the hill country (whither his mother had gone, probably for the sake of privacy) six months before the birth of our Lord (perhaps June, B. C. 4).

2. Personal History. (1) Early life. On the eighth day he was brought to be circumcised, and friends of his parents proposed to call him Zacharias, after his father. But his mother required that he should be called John, a decision which his father, still speechless, confirmed by writing on a tablet. He was set apart as a Nazarene, according to the angelic injunction (Luke 1:15; comp. Num. 6:1–21). All that we know of the period between this time and the beginning of his ministry is contained in a single verse: "The child grew and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel" (Luke 1:80). (2) Beginning of ministry. At length, in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar (A. D. 25), John began to preach, and attracted to himself a great multitude from "Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan" (Matt. 3:5). To them he proclaimed the near approach of "the kingdom of heaven," and administered the rite of baptism "unto repentance." His birth, his hard, ascetic life, the general expectation that some great one was about to appear, served to attract this great multitude, for "John did no miracle" (John 10:41). (3) Meeting with Jesus. Before long Jesus presented himself to John, to receive baptism at his hand, which John declined to administer, until our Lord's declaration that "Thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness" (Matt. 3:15). (4) Subsequent ministry. With the baptism of Jesus John's more especial office ceased. The king had come, and there was little further need of the herald. We learn that John and his disciples continued to baptize some time after our Lord entered upon his ministry (John 3:23; 4:1). He also instructed his disciples in certain moral and religious duties, as fasting (Matt. 9:14; Luke 5:33) and prayer (Luke 11:1). We learn also that he still continued to be a witness to Jesus, so confidently pointing him out as the Lamb of God that two of his own disciples were led to accept Jesus as the true Messiah, and became his followers (John 1:29, sq.; v. 35-37). (5) Imprisonment and death. Shortly after this his public of self-denial, humility, and holy courage. His abstinence was so great that some thought him possessed, and said, "He hath a devil." In his humility he declined the honors which an admiring multitude almost forced upon him, and declared himself to be no one—a voice merely—calling upon the people to prepare for the reception of the one whose shoe-latchet he was not worthy to unloose. And when that one came he recommended his own disciples to attach themselves to him, furnishing the world an example of gracefully accepting the fact, "He must increase, but I must decrease." For his courage in speaking the truth he went a willing victim to prison and to death.

NOTE.—John's acquaintance with Jesus. Much discussion has arisen concerning the apparent contradiction in Matt. 3:13, 14, and John 1:31, 33. In the former John evidently recognized Jesus, while in the latter he says, "I knew him not." The truth seems ministry was brought violently to a close. Herod Antipas had taken Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, and when John reproved him for this and other sins (Luke 3:19), Herod cast him in prison, the castle of Machærus, on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. While confined there he sent two of his disciples with the inquiry, "Art thou he that should come?" This was doubtless done in order to assist his disciples in transferring their allegiance to Jesus, as Jesus himself bore testimony to the steadfastness of John (7:19-28). Herodias, embittered against John, determined upon his death, but was prevented by Herod's conviction that John was a just man (Mark 6:20) and his fear of the people (Matt. 14:5). But at last her opportunity arrived, and taking advantage of a promise given by Herod to her daughter, Herodias bade her order the head of John the Baptist. The king reluctantly complied, and sent an executioner, who beheaded him in the prison. His disciples, when they heard of his death, buried his body and went and told the Lord (Matt. 14:3-12; Mark 6:17-29).

3. Character. The nature of John the Baptist was full of impetuosity and fire—a very Elijah. His life, however, was characterized by the graces to be that John knew Jesus, but was not certain of his Messiahship. It was necessary for him, before asserting positively that Jesus was the Christ, to have undoubted testimony of the fact. This was given him in the descent of the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove, as John himself declares (John 1:33).

JOI'ADA (Heb. יְהוֹאָדָב, yo-yaw-daw', a contraction of יְהוֹיָדָב, q. v.), the son and successor of Eliashib in the high priesthood, and succeeded by his son Jonathan (Neh. 12:10, 11, 22). Another of his sons married a daughter of Sanballat, on which account he was banished by Nehemiah (Neh. 13:28), B. C. before 445.

JOI'AKIM (Heb. יְהוֹאָכִים, yo-yaw-keem', a contraction of יְהוֹיָאִים, q. v.), a high priest, son of Jeshua, and father of Eliashib (Neh. 12:10, 12, 26). B. C. before 445.

JOI'ARIB (Heb. יְהוֹאָרִיב, yo-yaw-reeb', Jehovah will contend).

1. A man "of understanding," and one of those with whom Ezra consulted upon the subject of obtaining a company of Levites to return with him to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16). This conference took place at the river Ahava (v. 15), and resulted in sending a delegation to "Iddo the chief at the place Casiphia," who responded with a large number of the desired ministers (vers. 17-20), B. C. about 457.

2. A descendant of Judah, son of Zechariah, and father of Adaiiah, probably through Shelah (Neh. 11:5), B. C. before 445.

3. The founder of one of the courses of priests, and father of Jedaiah (Neh. 11:10). It is thought that there is some error in the list by which he is given as the father of Jedaiah, for in 1 Chron. 9:10 (where his name is given in full, Jehoiarib), he ranks with Jedaiah and Jachin as heads of courses of priests (see Kiel, in loc.).

4. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:6). His son, Mattanai, was a contemporary with the high priest Joiakim (v. 19), B. C. 536.

JOINING (Heb. מְתַבְּרֹת, mekh-ab-ber-oth'), cramps or binders in the wall of a building (1 Chron. 22:3).

JOINT (Heb. קְמָכָה, kham-mook', a wrapping) is employed very erroneously in the A. V. (Cant. 7:1) for drawers, "a part of the female dress, which, in the case of bridal toilet, are represented as being fringed with a worked edging like lace or a skillfully chased jewel" (McC. and S., Cyc.). Or it may refer to a richly worked girdle.

JOK'DEAM (Heb. יְקֹדְעַם, yok-deh-awm', burning of people), a city of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. 15:56), apparently south of Hebron.

JO'KIM (Heb. יְקִים, yo-keem', contraction of Joiakim), a descendant of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 4:22). Jerome quotes a Hebrew legend that Jokim was Elimelech, the husband of Naomi, in whose days the sun stood still on account of the transgressors of the law (Smith, s. v.).

JOK'MEAM (Heb. יְקֹמְעַם, yok-meh-awm', people will be raised), one of the places given to the Levites with its suburbs (1 Chron. 6:68). It is in the Jordan Valley. The A. V. gives it as Kibzaim (Josh. 21:22), and "Jokneam" (1 Kings 4:12).

JOK'NEAM (Heb. יְקֹנְעַם, yok-neh-awm', people will be lamented), a city in Palestine on the border of Zebulun's allotted portion (Josh. 12:22; 19:11; 21:34; 1 Kings 4:12). Called also Jokmeam (1 Chron. 6:68). The modern Tell Kaimon, twelve miles S. W. of Nazareth.

JOK'SHAN (Heb. יְקֹשָׁן, yok-shawn', snarer, or fowler), the second son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2, 3; 1 Chron. 1:32). His sons Sheba and Dedan are supposed to have been the ancestors of the Sabæans and Dedanites that peopled a part of Arabia Felix.

JOK'TAN (Heb. יְקֹטָן, yok-tawn', small), the second named of the two sons of Eber, a descendant of Shem. His brother was Peleg (Gen. 10:25, 26, 29; 1 Chron. 1:19, 20, 23).

JOK'THEEL (Heb. יְקֹתְאֵל, yok-theh-ale', veneration of God).

1. A city in the low country of Judah, mentioned between Mizpeh and Lachish (Josh. 15:38), possibly preserved in the ruins of Keitulaneh.

2. The name given by King Amaziah to Selah—the stronghold of the Edomites—after he captured it from them (2 Kings 14:7; comp. 2 Chron. 25:11-13).

JO'NA (John 1:42), same as JONAS (q. v.).
JON'ADAB, a shortened form of the name JEHONADAB (q. v.).

1. The son of Shimeah, and nephew of David (2 Sam. 13:3, 32, 35).

2. The Rechabite (Jer. 35:6, 8, 10, 14, 16, 18, 19).

JO'NAH (Heb. יוֹנָה, yo-naw', dove), the fifth in order of the minor prophets, was the son of Amittai, and was born in Gath-hepher, in the tribe of Zebulun (2 Kings 14:25).

Personal History. Jonah flourished probably in or before the reign of Jeroboam II. (B. C. about 783), and predicted the successful conquests, enlarged territory, and brief prosperity of the Israelitish kingdom under that monarch's sway (2 Kings 14:25). What else we know of Jonah's history is to be gathered from the book that bears his name. He was commissioned by Jehovah to go and prophesy to the Ninevites, but for some reason was reluctant to obey, and attempted to flee to Tarshish. He went to Joppa, and there embarked upon a ship bound for that port. A violent storm arose, and the captain of the vessel called upon Jonah to pray to his God to save them. As the storm did not abate, the sailors proceeded to cast lots, believing that some person on board the ship had caused the anger of God, as manifested in the tempest. Jonah was singled out as the culprit, and at his suggestion they unwillingly cast him into the sea. By the appointment of God he was swallowed by a great fish, which upon the third day cast him out upon dry land. Jonah was again commanded to go to Nineveh, and immediately obeyed. The people repented, a fast was appointed, and the city was not destroyed. Provoked at the sparing of Nineveh, Jonah in his displeasure prayed to Jehovah to take his life, as his proclamation had not been fulfilled. God taught him, by means of the rapidly growing and speedily decaying gourd, that it was proper for him to exercise mercy toward the repentant city (Jonah 1:1-4:11).

NOTE.—1. Much objection has been urged against the truth of the story of Jonah and the fish. It is simply said, "The Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah." The species of marine animal is not defined, and the Greek κῆτος, kay'-tos, is often used to specify, not the genus whale, but any large fish or sea monster. All objection to its being a whale which lodged Jonah in its stomach, from the straitness of throat or rareness of baunt in the Mediterranean, are thus removed. Since the days of Bochart it has been a common opinion that the fish was of the shark species, Lamia canis carcharias, or "sea dog." Entire human bodies have been found in some fishes of this kind. Still, granting all these facts, the narrative is miraculous, and nothing is impossible with God. 2. Various interpretations are given of "the sign of the prophet Jonas" (Matt. 12:39). Kell (Com., in loc.) says: "The mission of Jonah was a fact of symbolical and typical importance, which was intended not only to enlighten Israel as to the position of the Gentile world in relation to the kingdom of God, but also to typify the future adoption of such of the heathen as should observe the word of God, into the fellowship of the salvation prepared in Israel for all nations." Whedon (Com., in loc.) explains: "Our Lord, even in refusing a sign, gives a sign. His prophecy of his burial, after the manner of the swallowing of Jonah, was in itself a miracle of foreknowledge, and so a proof of his Messiahship" (McC. and S., Cyc.; Ewald Hist.).

JONAH, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

JONAN (Gr. 'Ἰωνάν, ee-o-nan', the son of Eliakim, and father of Joseph, among the maternal ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:30). He is not mentioned in the Old Testament.

JONAS (Gr. 'Ἰωνᾶς, ee-o-nas', for the Hebrew Jonah).

1. The prophet Jonah (Matt. 12:39, 40, 41; 16:4; Luke 11:29, 30, 32).

2. The father of the apostle Peter (John 21:15-17). In John 1:42 the name is given as Jona.

JONATHAN (Heb. יְהוֹנָתָן, yo-naw-thavn', a contracted form of Jehonathan, God-given).

1. The Son (or descendant) of Gershom, the son of Moses (Judg. 18:30). Jonathan, who was a Levite, resided at Bethlehem, and, leaving that place to seek his fortune, came to Mount Ephraim, to the home of Micah. This person made Jonathan an offer to receive him into his house as priest, which offer he accepted (17:7-13). Not long after five Danite spies, looking for a suitable place for settlement, came to the house of Micah, and inquired of Jonathan respecting the success of their journey. He replied, "Go in peace: before the Lord is your way wherein ye go." Afterward, when a company of six hundred Danites were on their way to occupy Laish, they went to Micah's house, appropriated the carved image, the ephod, the teraphim, and the molten image. Jonathan accepted their invitation to accompany them, and became their priest. This office remained in his family until "the day of the captivity of the land" (18:1-30).

NOTE.—There is little doubt but that Jonathan was a descendant of Moses, and we have, therefore, to explain the expression "son of Manasseh." It is supposed that in the name Moses (מֹשֶׁה, mo-sheh'), the single letter n (נ) has been interpolated, changing it into Manasseh, in order to save the character of the great lawgiver from the stain of having an idolater among his immediate descendants.

2. The eldest son of Saul, king of Israel.

(1) Personal history. Jonathan first appears in history some time after his father's accession, being at that time at least thirty years of age. In the war with the Philistines, commonly called, from its locality, "the war of Michmash," he commanded one thousand men of the three thousand which composed Saul's standing army. He was encamped at Gibeah, and "smote the garrison of the Philistines" in Geba (1 Sam. 13:2, 3), B. C. 1028. Saul and the whole population rose, but unsuccessfully, and the tyranny of the Philistines became harsher than ever. From this oppression Jonathan resolved to deliver his people, and, unknown to any but his armor-bearer, he attacked the garrison at Michmash (14:1, 4-14). A panic seized the garrison, spread to the camp, and thence to the surrounding bands. This was increased by an earthquake and by the combined assault of various bodies of Israelites hidden in the mountains. Saul and his band joined in the pursuit of the Philistines, having forbidden any man to taste of food until the evening. Ignorant of this command and accompanying curse, Jonathan partook of some honey while passing through the forest. This coming to the knowledge of Saul, he would doubtless have fulfilled his vow and have sacrificed

Jonathan, but the people interfered in his behalf (14:16-45), B. C. about 1022. Jonathan is next introduced to us as the bosom friend of David. Their friendship began on the day of David's return from the victory over Goliath, and was confirmed by a solemn covenant, which was ratified by Jonathan giving his friend his mantle, sword, girdle, and bow (18:1-4). Shortly after this he pleaded with his father in behalf of David, and secured a reversal of the royal decree against the latter's life (19:1-7). The king's madness soon returned, and David fled. The friends met, however, by the stone of Ezel, and entered into a second covenant, pledging themselves to strive for each other's safety, and David swearing to show kindness to the family of Jonathan when he should be delivered of his enemies. He again pleaded with his father to spare David, which so enraged the king that he "cast a javelin at him," with the evident intention of taking his life. The next day he communicated the failure of his mission to David, and they parted to meet only once more (20:1-42). This last meeting was in the forest of Ziph, during Saul's pursuit of David. Jonathan gave expression to his confidence in his friend's elevation to the throne. "They two made a covenant before the Lord," and parted to meet no more (23:15-18). We hear no more of Jonathan until the battle of Gilboa, when, with his father and his two brothers, he was slain by the Philistines (31:2, 8). His remains were carried to Jabesh-gilead and buried there (v. 13), but were afterward removed, with those of his father, to Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. 21:12-14). Jonathan left one son, Mephibosheth, who was five years old at the time of his death (4:4), B. C. 1000.

(2) Character. Jonathan was a man of lofty daring, who did not shrink to place himself in the greatest danger for the sake of his country. But his most noticeable characteristic was his ardent and unselfish devotion to his friends, which led him to give up his hopes of the throne, and even expose himself to death, for the sake of those he loved. Notwithstanding that his affection for his father was repelled by the latter, owing to the king's insanity, he cast his lot with his father's decline, and "in death they were not divided."

3. Son of Abiathar, the high priest, who adhered to David during the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. 15:27, 36). He remained at En-rogel to report to his master the proceedings in the camp of the insurgents, but, being discovered, fled to Bahurim, and escaped by hiding in a well (17:17-21), B. C. about 967. Later his loyalty to the house of David is shown by announcing to the ambitious Adonijah the forestallment of his measures by the succession to the throne of Solomon (1 Kings 1:42, 43), B. C. 1000.

4. The son of Shimeah (Shammah), and nephew of David, who slew a gigantic relative of Goliath, and became one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. 21:21; 1 Chron. 20:7). He is probably the same who is mentioned as secretary of the royal cabinet (1 Chron. 27:32), where יָרֵךְ is translated "uncle."

5. The son of Shage the Hararite, and one of David's famous warriors (2 Sam. 23:32; 1 Chron. 11:34).

6. The second son of Jada, the grandson of Jarahmeel, of the family of Judah. Jether dying without issue, this branch of the line was continued through Jonathan's two sons, Peleth and Zaza (1 Chron. 2:32, 33).

7. Father of Ebed, which latter was an Israelite of the "sons" of Adin, who returned with Ezra from Babylon with fifty males (Ezra 8:6), B. C. before 457.

8. Son of Asahel, employed with Jahaziah in separating the people from their Gentile wives (Ezra 10:15), B. C. 457.

9. Son of Joiada, and father of Jaddua, Jewish high priests (Neh. 12:11); elsewhere (12:22) called JOHANAN (q. v.). Josephus relates (Ant., xi, 7, 1, 2) that he murdered his own brother, Jesus, in the temple, because Jesus was endeavoring to get a high priesthood from him through the influence of Bagoses, the Persian general.

trees from the same mountains (Ezra 3:7). Here Jonah embarked for Tarshish (Jonah 1:3). In Joppa Peter wrought the miracle on Tabitha (Acts 9:36), resided for quite a time with Simon the tanner (v. 43), and saw the vision of the great sheet let down from heaven (10:5, 16), and here received the summons from Cornelius (v. 17, sq.). Jonathan Maccabeus captured Joppa in B. C. 148 (1 Macc. 10:76). Simon, suspecting its inhabitants, set a garrison there (1 Macc. 12:34), and upon the restoration of peace, established it again as a haven (14:5). The city was twice destroyed by the Romans, and changed hands several times during the crusades. It was made in the 4th century the seat of a bishopric. The city is now called Jaffa, or Yáfa, and is connected (A. D. 1898) with Jerusalem by a railroad.

JO'RAH (Heb. יֹרָחַ, yo-rah', sprinkling), a

Joppa by the Sea.

10. A priest, the descendant of Melicu, in the time of Joiakim (Neh. 12:14), B. C. between 536 and 549.

11. Son of Shemaiah, and father of Zechariah, a priest who blew the trumpet at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:35), B. C. after 536. He is probably the same as Jehonathan (v. 18).

12. A scribe in the time of King Zedekiah, in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned by the princes of Judah (Jer. 37:15, 20; 38:26), B. C. 589.

13. One of the sons of Kareah, who, with others, held a conference with Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor of Jerusalem (Jer. 40:8, B. C. 588).

JO'NATH-E'LEM-RECHO'KIM, a term in title of Psalm 56. See MUSICAL TERMS.

JOP'PA (Heb. יָפוֹ, or יָפֹ, yav-fo', beauty; Gr. Ἰόππη, ee-op'-pay), a very old city on the Mediterranean, about thirty miles N. W. of Jerusalem. It is supposed to have got its name from the mass of sunshine which its houses reflected. It is one of the oldest cities in the world, ranking with Hebron, Zann, and Damascus. It was included in the portion assigned to Dan (Josh. 19:46, A. V. "Japho"). Its harbor naturally made it the port of Jerusalem. Thither Hiram floated down from Tyre the fir trees of Lebanon (2 Chron. 2:16), and, later, Zerubbabel, acting on the edict of Cyrus, caused to be brought here the cedar man whose descendants (or place whose former inhabitants), to the number of one hundred and twelve, returned from the Babylonish captivity (Ezra 2:18; Hariph in Neh. 7:24), B. C. about 536.

JO'RAI (Heb. יֹרָי, yo-rah'ee, rainy, same as Jorah), the fourth named of seven Gadite chieftains (1 Chron. 5:13), the place of whose residence is not given, unless, as Keil conjectures (Com., in loc.), v. 16 mentions it. In that case they dwelt in Gilead, in Bashan, B. C. perhaps about 782.

JO'RAM (Heb. יֹרָם, yo-rawm', a shortened form of JEHORAM, q. v.).

1. Son of Toi, king of Hamath, who was sent by his father to congratulate David upon his victory over Hadadzezer (2 Sam. 8:9, 10), B. C. about 986. He is called Hadoram in 1 Chron. 18:10.

2. One of the descendants of Eliezer (1 Chron. 26:25). In Matt. 1:8, JEHORAM (q. v.).

JORDAN, RIVER OF (Hebrew generally with article יַרְדֵּן, hay-yar-dan', the descender, probably from the rapid descent of the stream). It is now called El Urdan, or Esh Sheryah, or the watering-place, and is the chief river of Palestine.

JORDAN, VALLEY OF (Heb. יַרְדֵּן, ar-aw-baw'; rendered "the plain," Josh. 18:18, marg., "the champaign," Deut. 11:30, "the desert," Ezek. 47:8). Its modern name is El Ghor. For convenience we treat both the river and valley in the same article.

The valley of the Jordan is a rift more than one hundred and sixty miles long, counting from just below Lake Huleh, where the dip below sea level begins, to the point on the Arabah S. of the Dead Sea where the valley rises again to sea level. It is from two to fifteen miles broad, and falls as deep as one thousand two hundred and ninety-two feet below sea level, while the bottom of the Dead Sea is one thousand three hundred feet deeper still. In this valley is the Jordan river; two great lakes—Huleh and Galilee—respectively twelve and fifty-three miles long; large tracts of arable land, especially about Gennesaret, Bethlehem, and Jericho.

Geologists tell us that this valley is due to volcanic action, forcing up two long folds of limestone, running north and south, with a diagonal ridge shutting off the Dead Sea from the Red Sea, and inclosing a part of the old ocean bed. "There then followed a period of great rains, with perpetual snow and glaciers on Lebanon, during which the valley was filled with fresh water to an extent of two hundred miles, or one long lake from the Sea of Galilee to some fifty miles S. of the present end of the Dead Sea. How the valley passed from that condition to its present state is not clear" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 470).

"In this valley are six distinct sections: the Beka'a, or valley between the Lebanons; the Upper Jordan, from its sources at the foot of Hermon through Lake Huleh to the Lake of Galilee; this lake, itself; the lower Jordan to its mouth at Jericho; the Dead Sea; and thence to the Gulf of 'Akaba, the Wady 'Arubah" (p. 471).

1. The Upper Jordan. "The great valley of Palestine, as it runs out from between the Lebanons, makes a slight turn eastward round the foot of Hermon, so that Hermon not only looks right down the rest of its course, but is able to discharge into this three fourths of the waters which gather on its high and ample bulk." Four streams which unite before entering Lake Huleh contest the honor of being considered as the source of Jordan: (1) The Nahr Bareight, which comes down the Merj 'Arun; (2) the Nahr Hasbany, which springs half a mile to the N. of Hasbeya, from a buttress of Hermon, and flows down between Hermon and the Jebel Dahar, the longest of the four, but having much less water than the two following; (3) the Nahr Leddán, the shortest but heaviest, springing from Tell-el-Kadi, in the bosom of the valley itself; and (4) Nahr Baniyas, rising in the very roots of Hermon, and having the largest number of tributaries. These last two have generally been considered as the sources of Jordan.

This whole district was given (B. C. 20) to Herod the Great by Augustus, and the town he built was known as Cæsarea-Philippi. To this region Jesus repaired to avoid Jewish hostility, and it is this district that is referred to in Psa. 42. It was, in a military point of view, the northern gate of Palestine; and here in Dan lay the limit of the land of Israel. At the lower end of this district lay Lake Huleh, without doubt the Lake Semehonitis of Josephus (Ant., v, 5, 1; Wars, iii, 10, 7), and probably also the waters of Merom of the book of Joshua (11:5, 6). From the lower end of the lake the river Jordan enters the Great Rift below the level of the sea, falling six hundred and eighty feet in less than nine miles, and then glides quietly into the Lake of Galilee. "Six miles above the lake it is crossed by the Bridge of the Daughters of Jacob on the high road between Damascus and Galilee."

2. The Lower Jordan. The Jordan Valley between the Lake of Galilee and the Dead Sea is sixty-five miles long. On the west are the mountains of Galilee and Samaria, with the break between them of the Vale of Jezreel. On the east are the flat hills of Gilead, some two thousand feet above the Jordan, broken by the valleys of the Yarmuk and Jab-bok. Between these ranges of hills the valley is from three to fourteen miles wide. Much of this valley is very fertile, vegetation being extremely rank, especially in the spring. There is, however, much sour land, jungle, obtrusive marl, and parched hillsides, all justifying the name of desert. "Down this broad valley there curves and twists a deeper, narrower bed, perhaps one hundred and fifty feet deeper and from two hundred yards to a mile broad." This is the breadth to which the Jordan rises when in flood, once a year (Josh. 3:4; Ecclus. 24:26). Further we come to the Jordan itself, from ninety to one hundred feet broad, rapid and muddy. The depth varies from three feet at some fords to ten or twelve. In the sixty-five miles the descent is six hundred and ten feet, an average of fourteen feet a mile. But few towns have been built in the Jordan valley, for the following reasons: From early spring to late autumn the heat is intolerable, the temperature rising as high as one hundred and eighteen degrees in August; in ancient times the valley was infested with wild beasts; the frequent incursions of Arabs. The importance of the Jordan in Scripture would seem to arise from its being a frontier and boundary (Gen. 32:10; Deut. 3:20; 27:4; Josh. 1:2; Num. 34:10-12), and a military frontier (Judg. 7:24; 12:5). To pass the Jordan was figurative of decision; like crossing the Rubicon. Many of the most remarkable names and events of Scripture are associated with the Jordan; Joshua leading Israel into the promised land, the parting of Elijah and Elisha, Naaman being healed in its waters, David crossing it to escape from the rebellious Absalom, and the baptism of Jesus by John. See PALESTINE.

JORIM (Gr. 'Ιωρὶμ, ee-o-rime'), the son of Matthai and father of Eliezer, maternal ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:29).

JOR'KOAM (Heb. יֹרְקָאִם, yor-keh-awm', scattered people), the son of Raham, descendant of Caleb; or the name of a place in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:44).

JOS'ABAD, another form of Jozabad (No. 1).

JOS'APHAT, a Grecized form (Matt. 1:8) of the name Jehoshaphat, king of Judah.

JO'SE, one of the maternal ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:29), not mentioned in the Old Testament.

JOS'EDECH, another form of Jehozadak, or Jozadak, the son of Seraiah (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4; Zech. 6:11).

JO'SEPH (Heb. יוֹסֵף, yo-saf'e', adding), the name of the following men:

1. Son of Jacob. Joseph was the elder son of Jacob and Rachel, born while his father was still serving Laban (Gen. 30:22-25), B. C. about 2082. See NOTE.

Personal History. After his birth Joseph is mentioned in connection with his father's flight (Gen. 33:2, 7), and then no more until he was seventeen years of age. (1) Position in family. As the child of Rachel, and "son of his old age" (37:3), and doubtless also for his excellence of character, he was beloved by his father above all his brethren. This, together with the fact that he reported to his father the evil conduct of the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, caused his brethren to hate him. Their jealousy was aggravated by Jacob's showing his preference in presenting Joseph with a dress, probably a long tunic with sleeves, worn by youths of the richer class (37:2-4). A still greater provocation was the telling of his dreams, that seemed to foreshow his preeminence in the family (v. 5-11). (2) Sold into slavery. Such was Joseph's relation to his brethren when his father sent him from the vale of Hebron to Shechem to inquire concerning their welfare. They were not at Shechem, but were found by Joseph in Dothan. His appearance aroused their hatred, and, with the exception of Reuben, they resolved to kill him. He interfered in Joseph's behalf, and persuaded them to cast him into a pit, intending "to deliver him to his father again." This they accordingly did, after stripping him of his tunic. While they were eating bread a company of Arabian merchants (Ishmaelites) appeared, and, at the suggestion of Judah and in the absence of Reuben, Joseph was sold to them for twenty shekels of silver. Dipping Joseph's tunic in the blood of a kid, they sent it to Jacob, that he might believe that his favorite had been torn in pieces by some wild beast. Their trick succeeded, and Joseph was mourned as dead. The merchants sold Joseph to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, and he became an Egyptian slave (37:12-36), B. C. about 2062. (3) Slave life. In the service of Potiphar Joseph behaved himself so discreetly, and was so led of God, that he found great favor with his master, who gave him the direction of all his affairs. Refusing, however, to gratify the improper request of his master's wife, he was accused by her of unchastity and thrust into prison. Here, also, God was with Joseph, procuring him favor in the eyes of the governor of the prison, so that he intrusted all the prisoners to his care, leaving everything to his supervision (39:1-23). While here he interpreted correctly the dreams of two of his fellow-prisoners—Pharaoh's chief butler and baker—disclaiming any human skill, and acknowledging that the interpretations were of God. These interpretations were fulfilled three days afterward, on the king's birthday (ch. 40). (4) Exaltation. After two years Pharaoh had two prophetic dreams which the magicians and wise men of Egypt were unable to interpret. The butler, calling to mind the service rendered him by Joseph, advised his royal master to put his skill to the test. Joseph was sent for and interpreted the dreams as foretelling seven years of plenty to be followed by seven years of famine. He followed up this interpretation by advising Pharaoh to "look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt." This counsel pleased Pharaoh and his ministers, who believed that Joseph possessed the spirit of supernatural insight and wisdom. Joseph was appointed ruler over Pharaoh's house, and over all the land; in other words, became grand vizier of Egypt. Pharaoh called him Zaphnath-paaneah (saviour of the world), and married him to Asenath, daughter of Poti-pherah, the priest of On. This promotion took place when Joseph was thirty years of age (41:1-46), B. C. 2050. During the seven years of plenty Joseph prepared for the years of famine to follow by carefully husbanding the grain, which was so abundant as to be beyond measurement. During these years his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, were born (41:47-52). When scarcity began Joseph was in a condition to supply the wants of Egypt, and also of surrounding nations. He put all Egypt under Pharaoh—first the money, then the cattle, the land (excepting the priests'), and eventually the Egyptians themselves becoming the property of the crown. The people were distributed according to the cities in which the grain was stored, and were instructed to pay a tax to the crown of one fifth of the product of the soil (41:53-57; 47:14-26). (5) Joseph and his brethren. Early in the time of famine the brethren of Joseph, excepting Benjamin, went to Egypt to buy food. Applying to Joseph, who had supreme control over the stores of Egypt, he was not recognized, but knew his brethren, and seems to have resolved to make them feel and acknowledge the wrong they had done him. He acted as a foreigner toward them, speaking harshly to them, inquired whence they had come, and accused them of being spies. This charge they denied, and told him particularly about their family. After putting them in ward for three days he sent them home to bring back their youngest brother as proof of their veracity, keeping Simeon as hostage. Having with great difficulty secured Jacob's permission, they took Benjamin, a present, double money to repay the sum placed by order of Joseph in each man's sack, and returned to Egypt. The presence of his younger brother assured Joseph of the truth of his father's welfare, and, yielding to his natural impulses, he made himself known to his brethren. He inquired again concerning his father; told them not to grieve because of the sin they had committed in selling him, as God had overruled it for their welfare; charged them to return to Canaan and bring Jacob and their families to Egypt, and that he would provide for them during the five remaining years of famine. These events reached the ear of Pharaoh; he approved all that Joseph had done, and gave commandment that Jacob and his family should forthwith come into Egypt (42:1-45:24). (6) Welcomes Israel. Israel, convinced that Joseph still lived, went to Egypt, where he was tenderly welcomed and provided for, and placed in the land of Goshen. When he died he was embalmed by order of Joseph, and carried by him to Canaan and laid in the cave of Machpelah (45:25-50:13). (7) Remaining history. Upon his return from Canaan Joseph found his brethren in fear lest, his father being dead, he would punish them. He assured them that this was not his purpose, and promised still to nourish them and their little ones. Joseph lived to be one hundred and ten years of age, and, dying, took an oath of his brethren that they would carry up his bones to the land of promise. After his death he was embalmed and "put in a coffin in Egypt" (50:14-26), B. C. about 1972. This promise was religiously kept, as "Moses took the bones of Joseph with him" (Exod. 13:19), and they were at length put in their final resting place at Shechem (Josh. 24:32).

Character. In Joseph we recognize the elements of a noble character—piety, pure and high morality, simplicity, gentleness, fidelity, patience, perseverance, an iron will, and an indomitable energy.

NOTE.—There is insurmountable difficulty in reconciling the chronology of the patriarchs and the Exodus. The Assyriologists seem to have shown that Abraham was born in the 23d century B. C., and recent research has proved that the Exodus cannot be later than the 13th century B. C.

2. The father of Igal, the spy delegated from Issachar to explore Canaan (Num. 13:7), B. C. 1209.

3. One of the sons of Asaph who were appointed chiefs of the first division of sacred musicians by David (1 Chron. 25:2, 9), B. C. about 960.

4. A Jew of the family of Bani who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:42), B. C. 456.

5. Son of Shebaniah, and one of the chief priests after the captivity (Neh. 12:14), B. C. after 536.

6. (Gr. Ἰωσήφ, ee-o-saf'e). The husband of Mary and foster-father of our Lord. By Matthew (who gives the line of royal descent) he is said to have been the son (i. e., son-in-law) of Jacob, whose lineage is traced through David up to Abraham. Luke (giving the line of natural descent) represents him as the son of Heli, and traces his origin up to Adam. Only a few statements respecting Joseph appear in Holy Writ. While living at Nazareth (Luke 2:4) he espoused Mary (1:27), but before he took her home as his wife she proved to be with child. Grieved at this, and yet not wishing to make a public example of Mary, Joseph purposed quietly to separate from her "by simply a note of dismissal, or bill of divorcement." He was dissuaded from taking this step by the assurance of the angel that Mary had conceived under a divine influence (Matt. 1:18, sq.). Joseph obeyed the divine command and took Mary as his wife (1:24). Shortly after he was obliged, by the decree of enrollment from Augustus Cæsar, to leave Nazareth with his wife and go to Bethlehem. When the shepherds came he was there with Mary and her babe; he went with them to the temple to present the infant according to the law, and, warned by an angel, took them down to Egypt, where he remained until, directed by a heavenly messenger, he returned to the land of Israel. His intention to reside in Bethlehem was changed through fear of Archelaus, and he took up his abode in Nazareth (2:1-23), where he carried on his trade of carpenter. When Jesus was twelve years old Joseph took him and Mary to Jerusalem to keep the Passover, and upon their return to Nazareth continued to act as his father (Luke 2:41-51). The sacred writings furnish no additional information respecting Joseph, and the origin of all the earliest stories and assertions of the fathers concerning him is to be found in the apocryphal gospels.

7. The son of Mattathias and father of Janna, maternal ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:24).

8. The son of Judah and father of Semei, maternal ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:26).

9. The son of Jonan and father of Judah, among Christ's maternal ancestors (Luke 3:30).

10. Of Arimatheæ, "an honorable counselor, who waited for the kingdom of God," and was a secret disciple of Jesus. The crucifixion seems to have wrought in him positive convictions, for, upon learning of the death of our Lord, he "went in boldly unto Pilate and craved the body of Jesus." Pilate, having learned from the centurion who had charge of the execution that Jesus was actually dead, gave the body to Joseph, who took it down from the cross. After it had been embalmed at the cost of Nicodemus, another secret disciple (John 19:38, 39), Joseph had the body wrapped in linen, and deposited it in a new tomb belonging to himself and located in a garden "in the place where Jesus was crucified" (Matt. 27:58-60; Mark 15:43-46; Luke 23:50, sq.), A. D. 29. Luke describes Joseph as "a good man and a just," and adds that "he had not consented to the counsel and deed of them," i. e., of the Jewish authorities. From this remark it seems to be evident that he was a member of the Sanhedrin.

11. Surnamed Barsabas, was one of the two persons whom the primitive Church nominated, immediately after the resurrection of Christ, praying that the Holy Spirit would show which one should be apostle in place of Judas. When the lots were cast Matthias was chosen (Acts 1:23-25), A. D. 29. Joseph also bore the name of Justus, and was one of those who had "complicated with the apostles all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among them, beginning from the baptism of John" until the ascension (vers. 21, 22).

JOSES, 1. (Gr. Ἰωσῆς, ee-o-suce', perhaps for Joseph.) The son of Mary and Cleopas, and brother of James the Less, Simon, and Jude. He was, consequently, one of those who are called "the brethren" of our Lord (Matt. 13:55; 27:56; Mark 6:3; 15:40, 47). He alone of his brethren was not an apostle.

2. A Levite of Cyprus (Acts 4:36), surnamed by the apostle BARNABAS (q. v.).

JOSH'AH (Heb. יוֹשָׁא, yo-shaw', Jehovah established), son of Amaziah, and one of the princes of Simeon, the increase of whose family led them to remove to the valley of Gedor, from which they expelled the Hamites (1 Chron. 4:34), B. C. about 711.

JOSH'APHAT (Heb. יוֹשָׁפָט, yo-shaw-fawt', Jehovah judged), a Mithnite, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:43). B. C. about 1000.

JOSHAV'AH (Heb. יוֹשָׁבֵעַב, yo-shav-yaw', Jehovah sufficient), son of Elnaam, and, with his brother Jeribai, associated with the bodyguard of David (1 Chron. 11:46), B. C. 1000.

JOSHBEK'ASHAH (Heb. יוֹשֶׁבֶק־אֲשָׁה, yosh-bek-aw-shaw', seat in hardness), a son of Heman, and leader of the seventeenth division of the temple musicians (1 Chron. 25:4, 24), B. C. about 960.

JOS'SHEB-BASS'EBET (Heb. יוֹשֶׁב־בַּעֲבֵת, yo-shabe' bash-shek'-beth, sitting in the council), the Tachmonite, the chief of David's three heroes (2 Sam. 23:8, marg.; R. V. Josheb-basshebeth); called in 1 Chron. 11:11, JASHOBEAM (q. v.).

JOSH'UA, 1. The assistant and successor of Moses.—Name (Heb. יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, yeh-ho-shoo'-ah, Jehovah his help), changed by Moses (Num. 13:16) from Hoshea, salvation (Num. 13:8).

Family. The son of Nun, the son of Elishama, prince of the tribe of Ephraim (Exod. 33:11; Num. 1:10).

Personal History. (1) In battle. In the Bible the first mention of Joshua is as the victorious commander of the Israelites in their battle against the Amalekites at Rephidim (Exod. 17:8-16), B. C. 1210. (2) On Mount Sinai. When Moses ascended Sinai to receive for the first time (Exod. 24:13) the two tables, Joshua, who is called his minister or servant, accompanied him part of the way, and was the first to accost him on his return (32:17). (3) In charge of tabernacle. After the defection of Israel and their worship of the golden calf, Moses moved the tabernacle outside of the camp, and, returning to the congregation, left it in charge of Joshua (33:11). (4) An unwise request. When it was told Moses that Eldad and Medad prophesied in the camp, Joshua requested him to forbid them, which request elicited that famed reply of Moses, "Enviest thou for my sake? would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them" (Num. 11:27-29). (5) A spy. Soon after Joshua was appointed as one of the twelve chiefs sent (13:8, 16, 17) to explore the land of Canaan. He and CALEB (q. v.) were the only ones that gave an encouraging report of their journey, and exhorted the people to go up and possess the land (14:6-9). (6) Appointed ruler. The forty years of wandering were almost passed, and Joshua, because of his faithfulness, was one of the few survivors (26:65). Moses, by direction of God (Num. 27:18-23; Deut. 1:38), invested him solemly and publicly with authority, in connection with Eleazar, over the people (Deut. 3:28). (7) With Moses in the tabernacle. It was revealed to Moses that he was soon to die, and that he should appear with Joshua in the tabernacle. And while in the presence of God Moses gave his faithful minister a "charge," and said, "Be strong and of good courage: for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I swear unto them; and I will be with thee" (Deut. 31:14, 23). (8) Assumes charge of Israel. Under the direction of God, again renewed (Josh. 1:1), Joshua, now in his eighty-fifth year, and "full of the spirit of wisdom" (Deut. 34:9), assumed the command of the people (B. C. 1170). From Shittim he sent spies into Jericho, who were lodged and secreted by RAHAB (q. v.), and returned to Joshua with an account of the fear of the people because of the Israelites (Josh., ch. 2). (9) Entrance into Canaan. The next morning after their return Joshua broke camp at Shittim and moved down to the edge of Jordan, which at this season, the harvest (April), overflowed the banks (Josh. 3:18). On the third day the officers instructed the people in the order of the march, and Joshua bade them sanctify themselves for the morrow. In the morning the priests advanced in front of the people bearing the ark, and when their feet touched the water the river was divided. They took their position in the midst of the river bed, and there remained until the people had all passed over. Meanwhile twelve chosen men, one from each tribe, took twelve stones from the spot where the priests stood, leaving in their place twelve other stones taken from the dry land. When all this was done Joshua commanded the priests to come up out of Jordan; and as soon as they reached dry ground the waters of Jordan returned and overflowed its banks as before (4:1-18). (10) In Canaan. The host encamped that night at Gilgal, in the plains of Jericho, and there Joshua set up the twelve stones taken from Jordan as a perpetual memorial of the dividing of its waters (4:19-24). At the command of God, Joshua caused the people to be circumcised; which rite seems to have been neglected in the case of those born after the Exodus (5:5). Four days after the crossing of Jordan the Passover was celebrated; and the Israelites eating the next day of bread made from the corn of the land, the manna ceased (5:10-12). (11) Capture of Jericho. As Joshua was meditating how to attack Jericho, he saw a warrior with a drawn sword in his hand, who, in reply to Joshua's challenge, announced himself as the "captain of the host of Jehovah," and gave the divine plan for the capture of the city (vers. 13, 14). The men of war, and priests carrying trumpets and the ark, were to compass the city once each day for six days, and seven times on the seventh day, when the walls of the city would fall. Following the directions given, Joshua beheld the fall of the city, put the inhabitants to death, and destroyed the property found therein. The only exception was Rahab and her household, and the silver and gold and vessels of brass and iron, which were placed in the sacred treasury (ch. 6). (12) The first defeat. The next undertaking was the capture of Ai, which the spies informed Joshua would be easily accomplished. But three thousand men were sent to take it—so sure seemed victory. They were repulsed and chased to Shebarim, with a loss of thirty-six men. Joshua made inquiry of the Lord as to the reason of the defeat of Israel, and was told of the taking of spoil from Jericho by one of the Israelites. A lot was ordered, which resulted in fixing the crime upon Achán (q. v.), and the destruction of himself, family, and property (ch. 7). (13) Taking of Ai. Joshua then formed a plan for taking Ai by stratagem, which met with complete success. The city was destroyed with all its inhabitants, its king hanged on a tree, and buried under a great heap of stones, the only memorial of the city (Josh. 8:1-29). After this Joshua caused the law to be engraven upon stones on Mount Ebal, and read to the people stationed upon that mountain and Mount Gerizim (8:30-35).

(14) Craft of the Gibeonites. When the kings of the Hittites and other nations west of Jordan heard of the fall of Ai, they armed themselves against Joshua. But the Gibeonites, a confederacy of several cities not far from the encampment of the Israelites, sent ambassadors in torn clothes, with oldsacks and musty bread, pretending that they had come from a distant country and wished to make a covenant with Israel. They obtained a treaty which was respected by Joshua, he merely making them 'hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation of and for the altar of the Lord' (ch. 9). (15) Battle of Gibeon. Alarmed by the defection of the Gibeonites, Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, made a league with the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon, and laid siege to Gibeon. Joshua hastened to their help, marching by night from Gilgal, and, taking the Amorites by surprise, utterly routed them near Bethhoron. Joshua was aided in this battle by an unprecedented hail-storm, which slew more than fell by the sword; and by a miraculous lengthening of the day, which enabled him to pursue the fugitives even to Makkedah (Josh. 10:1-14). (16) Subsequent conquests. This great battle was followed by the conquest of Makkedah, Libnah, Lachish, Gezer, Eglon, Hebron, and Debir. In this one campaign Joshua subdued the southern half of Palestine, from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, the eastern and western limit of the southern frontier; and he led the people back to Gilgal (Josh. 10:15-43). In another campaign he marched to Lake Merom, where he met and overthrew a confederacy of the Canaanitish chiefs of the north, under Jabin, king of Hazor; and in the course of the war led his victorious soldiers to the gates of Sidon and into the valley of Lebanon, under Mount

Hermon, but left the cities standing, with the exception of Hazor. In six years Joshua was master of the whole land from Mount Halak, at the ascent of Mount Seir on the south, to Baalgad, under Mount Hermon, on the north. His conquests were six nations, with thirty-one kings, including the Anakim, the old terror of Israel (11:1-12:24). (17) Dividing the inheritance. Joshua now, in conjunction with Eleazar and the heads of the tribes, proceeded to apportion the promised land, including the part as yet unconquered, asking for his portion Timnath-serah, a city of Mount Ephraim (Josh., chaps. 13-19). After the inheritance of five of the tribes had been determined Joshua removed to Shiloh, where he set up the tabernacle and assembled the people (18:1). Seven tribes had not received their inheritance, and Joshua reproved them for not taking possession of the land. Three men were appointed from each tribe to survey the rest of the land and to divide it into seven portions, which, with their several cities, they described in a book. The survey being finished, Joshua cast lots for the seven portions before the tabernacle in Shiloh (18:2-10). Six cities of refuge were appointed by the people themselves, three on the west of Jordan and three on the east of Jordan (ch. 20). The Levites having claimed the right given to them by Moses, received forty-eight cities and their suburbs, which were given up by the several tribes in proportion to the cities they severally possessed (Josh., ch. 21; comp. Num. 35:1-8). The warriors of the trans-Jordanic tribes were then dismissed in peace to their homes (Josh. 22:1-30). (18) Old age and death. After an interval of rest Joshua convoked an assembly from all Israel, and delivered to them two solemn addresses concerning the marvelous fulfillment of God's promises to their fathers. He warned them of the conditions upon which their property depended, and caused them to renew their covenant with God at Shechem. He died at the age of one hundred and ten years, and was buried in his own city, Timnath-serah (Josh. 24:29), B. C. about 1145.

Character. It is difficult to form an estimate of Joshua's character, because the man is overshadowed by the very greatness of the events in which he is placed. And yet this is not a dishonor to him, but a glory; a lesser man would have been seen and heard more. His life, though recorded with fullness of detail, shows no stain. By the faithful serving of his youth he was taught to command as a man; as a citizen he was patriotic in the highest degree; as a warrior, fearless and blameless; as a judge, calm and impartial. He was quite equal to every emergency under which he was to act—valiant without temerity, active without precipitation. No care, no advantage, no duty, is neglected by him. He ever looked up for and obeyed divine direction with the simplicity of a child, and wielded the great power given him with calmness, unostentation, and without swerving, to the accomplishment of a high, unselfish purpose. He earned, by manly vigor, a quiet, honored old age, and retained his faith and loyalty, exclaiming, in almost his dying breath, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord!"

NOTE.—1. The severe treatment of the Canaanites has provoked considerable comment. That Josiah was right because he acted under command of Jehovah, has been justified by two facts: (a) The excessive wickedness of the Canaanites (Lev. 18:21-24), and (b) The contamination of their example (Deut. 7:1-4). "It was utterly impossible to live near these degraded idolaters without being defiled by the association" (Haley, Discrepancies of the Bible). 2. The lengthening of the day of the battle of Gibeon has called forth many theories and stout denial of the fact. The miracle may have consisted in the suspension of the rotary motion of the earth, or an unusual refraction of the light so as to be visible over the whole of the globe (Cox, Sacred Geography; McC. and S., Cyc.; Stanley, Hist. of the Jewish Church). Another theory is that the work accomplished by the Israelites was so great that the day seemed to them as lengthened (Kell, Com.).

2. A native of Beth-shemesh, an Israelite, the owner of the field into which the cart came which bore the ark on its return from the land of the Philistines (1 Sam. 6:14, 18), B. C. about 1076.

3. The governor of Jerusalem at the time of the reformation by Josiah (2 Kings 23:8), B. C. 621.

4. The son of Josedech (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14), a high priest in the time of Haggai and Zechariah, better known under the name of Jeshua (see JESUUA, No. 2). In Zechariah (3:1-10) Joshua, as pontiff, represents the people in the garb of slaves, and afterward clothed with the new and glorious garments of deliverance. When messengers came to Jerusalem, from the remnant of the captivity in Babylon, to offer presents of gold and silver to the temple, the prophet was directed to have some of their offerings made into crowns for Joshua, as a symbol of the sacerdotal and regal crowns of Israel which were to be united on the head of the Messiah (Zech. 6:10, 11).

JOSIAH (Heb. יְהוֹשָׁפָט, yo-shee-yaw', founded of Jah).

1. The sixteenth king of the separate kingdom of Judah; the son of King Amon and his wife Jedidah. Josiah, at the early age of eight years, succeeded his father on the throne of Judah (2 Kings 21:26; 22:1; 2 Chron. 34:1), B. C. 639.

(1) Idolatry overthrown. In the eighth year of his reign "he began to seek after the God of David his father" (2 Chron. 34:3), and mani-festated that enmity to idolatry in all its forms which distinguished his character and reign. In the twelfth year of his reign "he began to purge Judah and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved images, and the molten images." So strong was his detestation of idolatry that he ransacked the sepulchers of the idolatrous priests of former days and burned their bones upon the idol altars, before they were overthrown. He did not confine his operations to Judah, but went over a considerable part of Israel, with the same object in view; and at Beth-el, in particular, executed all that the prophet (1 Kings 13:2) had foretold (2 Kings 23:1-19; 2 Chron. 34:3-7).

(2) Temple repaired. In the eighteenth year of his reign Josiah proceeded to cleanse and repair the temple. The task was committed to Shaphan, the state secretary; to Maaseiah, the governor of the city; and to the chancellor, Joah. All parties engaged in the work displayed such fidelity that the money could be given to them without reckoning (2 Kings 22:3-7; 2 Chron. 34:8-13). (3) Finding of the law. In the course of this pious labor the high priest, Hilkiah, discovered in the sanctuary "a book of the law" by Moses. He reported his discovery to Shaphan, who conveyed the volume to the king, and read it in the royal presence. Alarmed by the penalties threatened in the law, Josiah sent several of his chief counselors to consult with the prophetess Huldah, who replied that although these dread penalties would be inflicted, he should be gathered to his fathers in peace before the days of punishment came. Perhaps with a view of averting the threatened doom, Josiah convened the people at Jerusalem; and, after the reading of the law, made a solemn covenant with Jehovah (2 Kings 22:8-23:3; 2 Chron. 34:14-32). To ratify the renewal of the covenant Josiah appointed the Passover to be held at the legal time, which was accordingly celebrated on a scale of unexampled magnificence. But it was too late; the hour of mercy had passed; for "the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath" (2 Kings 23:21-23, 26; 2 Chron. 35:1-19).

(4) Death. Not long after this Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt, sought a passage through Josiah's territory, on his way to fight against Carchemish, on the Euphrates. Josiah, disguising himself, went out to battle, and was mortally wounded by a random arrow and taken to Jerusalem, where he died (B. C. 608). "Jeremiah lamented for Josiah; and all the singing men and the singing women spake of Josiah in their lamentations to this day;" i. e., in the lamentation which they were wont to sing on certain fixed days, they sung also the lamentation for Josiah (2 Kings 23:29, 30; 2 Chron. 35:20-25). Both Jeremiah and Zephaniah mention Josiah in their prophecies.

2. The son of Zephaniah, residing in Jerusalem after the captivity, in whose house Zechariah was to crown the high priest Joshua (Zech. 6:10), B. C. 519.

JOSIAS, the Grecized form of JOSIAH (Matt. 1:10, 11).

JOSIBIAH (Heb. יוֹשִׁבְיָהוּ, yo-shib-yaw', dweller with Jehovah), the son of Seraiah, of the tribe of Simeon. His son Jehu was one of those who migrated to Gedor (1 Chron. 4:35), B. C. before 711.

JOSEPHIAH (Heb. יוֹסֵפִיאֵהוּ, yo-sif-yaw', increased by Jehovah), one of the family of Shelomith, whose son led up one hundred and sixty males under Ezra to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 8:10), B. C. about 457.

JOT, rather Iota (Ἰωτα), the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet (ι), from the Heb. yod (י), and answering to the i (j) or y of the European languages. It is used figuratively to express the minutest trifles (Matt. 5:18), as alpha and omega are used to express the beginning and the end.

JOTBAH (Heb. יוֹתבָּה, yot-baw', pleasantness), the city of Haruz, whose daughter Meshullemeth was the mother of King Amon (2 Kings 21:19). According to Jerome it was "an ancient city of Judea," but it is not further known.

JOTBATH (Deut. 10:7). See JOTBATHAH.

JOTBATHAH (Heb. יוֹתבָּתָּה, yot-baw'-thaw, pleasantness), one of the Israelitish encampments (Num. 33:33, 34); "Jotbath" in Deut. 10:7.

JOTHAM (Heb. יוֹתָם, yo-thaum', Jehovah is upright).

1. The youngest of Gideon's legitimate seventy sons, and the only one of them who escaped the massacre ordered by Abimelech (Judg. 9:5), B. C. perhaps about 1100. After Abimelech had been made king by the Shechemites, Jotham appeared on Mount Gerizim and protested against their act in a beautiful parable, in which the trees are represented as bestowing upon the bramble the kingly honor which had been refused by the cedar, the olive, and the vine (vers. 7-21). We hear no more of him, but are informed that three years later the curse that he uttered was accomplished (v. 57).

2. The eleventh king of Judah, and son of King Uzziah by Jerusha, daughter of Zadok. After his father was smitten with leprosy Jotham conducted the government for him until his death (about thirteen years), when he ascended the throne, being then twenty-five years of age (2 Kings 15:5, 32, 33; 2 Chron. 27:1), B. C. about 738. Jotham reigned in the spirit and power of his father, and avoided any assumption of the priestly functions which proved so disastrous to his father. He was unable, however, to correct all of the corrupt practices of the people. He built the upper gate of the temple—i. e., the northern gate of the inner court—and continued the fortifying of Jerusalem, which his father had begun. He also built "cities in the mountains of Judah, and in the forests he built castles and towers." He waged war successfully against the Ammonites, who seem to have refused to pay to Jotham the tribute which they paid to Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:8). For three years after their defeat he compelled them to pay one hundred talents of silver and ten thousand measures each of wheat and barley (27:2-5). After a reign of sixteen years, including his joint reign with Uzziah, Jotham died, and was buried in the sepulcher of the kings (2 Kings 15:38; 2 Chron. 27:8, 9), B. C. about 735.

3. A descendant, apparently, of Caleb, and one of the six sons of Jahdai (1 Chron. 2:47).

JOURNEY, DAYS'; SABBATH DAYS. See METROLOGY.

JOY (usually some form of Heb. גִּיל, gheel, to leap, or spin round with pleasure); a stronger term than שִׂמְחָה, sim-khav' (Psa. 30:5, etc.); מְשׁוֹעֵה (מְשׁוֹשׁ), Job 8:19, etc.), rejoicing; khar-ah' (Gr. χαρά, Matt. 2:10), gladness; the cause or occasion of joy (Luke 2:10; 1 Thess. 2:20).

1. Joy is a delight of the mind arising from the consideration of a present, or assured possession of a future good. When moderate it is called gladness; raised suddenly to the highest degree it is exultation or transport; when the desires are limited by our possessions it is contentment; high desires accomplished bring satisfaction; vanquished opposition we call triumph; when joy has so long possessed the mind that it has settled into a temper, we call it cheerfulness. This is natural joy.

2. There is a moral joy, which is a self-approbation, or that which arises from the performance of any good actions; this kind of joy is called peace, or serenity of conscience; if the action be honorable, and the joy rise high, it may be called glory.

3. Spiritual. This is called a "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22); "the joy of faith" (Phil. 1:25); "the rejoicing of hope" (Heb. 3:6). Its objects are: God himself (Psa. 43:4; Isa. 61:10); the promises (Phil. 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:8); the Gospel (Psa. 89:15); the prosperity of Christ's kingdom (Acts 15:3; Rev. 11:15, 17); the happiness of a future state (Psa. 16:9-11; Rom. 5:2; 15:13; Heb. 3:6). This spiritual joy is permanent (John 16:22; Phil. 4:4); unspeakable (1 Pet. 1:8). See GLOSSARY.

JOZABAD (Heb. יוֹזָבָד, yo-zaw-bawd', contraction of Jehozabad, Jehovah endowed).

1. An inhabitant of Gederah, and one of the famous Benjamite archers who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4, A. V. "Josabad"), B. C. before 1000.

2, 3. Two of the "captains" of Manasseh having this name, joined David when retreating to Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20), B. C. before 1000.

4. One of the subordinate overseers, under Conaniah and Shimei, who had charge of the first fruits, tithes, and consecrated gifts in the time of Hezekiah. He was probably a Levite (2 Chron. 31:13), B. C. about 719.

5. One of the Levite princes who made offerings at the solemnization of the Passover by Josiah (2 Chron. 35:9), B. C. about 621.

6. A Levite employed with others by Ezra to weigh the silver and gold and vessels brought from Babylon for the sanctuary (Ezra 8:33), B. C. about 457. He is probably the same with the chief Levite who afterward had "the oversight of the outward business of the house of God" (Neh. 11:16), B. C. 445.

7. One of the priests, of the "sons" of Pashur, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:22), B. C. 456.

8. A Levite who also divorced his Gentile wife

(Ezra 10:28), B. C. 456. Perhaps identical with No. 9.

9. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the law to the people (Neh. 8:7), B. C. about 445.

JOZ'ACHAR (Heb. יוֹזָאֵךְ, yo-zaw-kaw', remembered by Jehovah), the son of Shimeath, an Ammonitess, and one of the two servants of Joash, king of Judah, who formed a conspiracy against him and slew him in Millo (2 Kings 12:21; 2 Chron. 24:25, 26; in the latter passage the name is given as Zabad), B. C. 839.

JOZ'ADAK (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; 10:18; Neh. 12:26). See JEHOZADAK.

JU'BAL (Heb. יוֹבָל, yoo-bawl', stream), the second son of Lamech by Adah, a descendant of Cain. He is described as the inventor of the "harp and organ," perhaps the lyre and mouth-organ, or pipe (Gen. 4:21). According to Josephus (Ant., i, 2, 2), "he cultivated music, and invented the psalterly and cithara."

JUBILEE. See FESTIVALS, I, 4.

JU'CAL, an abbreviated form (Jer. 38:1) of JEHUCAL (q. v.).

JU'DA, an incorrect English form of the name Judas or Judah.

1. The patriarch Judah, son of Jacob (Luke 3:33; Heb. 7:14; Rev. 5:5; 7:5).

2. One of the brethren of our Lord (Mark 6:3). His name is given more correctly in Matt. 13:55, as Judas.

3, 4. Maternal ancestors of our Lord (Luke 3:26, 30).

JU'DAH. 1. The Patriarch — Name and Family. (Heb. יְהוּדָה, yeh-hoo-daw', celebrated), was the fourth son of Jacob and Leah, and whole brother to Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, older than himself, and Issachar and Zebulun younger (Gen 29:35). B. C. about 2000.

Personal History. (1) Treatment of Joseph. It was by Judah's advice that his brethren sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites instead of taking his life. By the light of his subsequent conduct we see that his action on this occasion arose from a generous impulse, although the form of the question he put to them has been sometimes held to suggest an interested motive: "What profit is it if we slay our brother and conceal his blood? Come and let us sell him" (Gen. 37:26, 27).

(2) Removes to Adullam. After the sale of Joseph, Judah removed to Adullam, and married a woman of Canaan named Shuah, by whom he had three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er married a woman whose name was Tamar, and, dying childless, Judah bestowed his wife upon his second son, Onan, who also died without children. Judah was reluctant to bestow his only surviving son upon this woman, and put her off on the plea that he was not of sufficient age (38:1-11).

(3) Judah's sin. Tamar, actuated by the usual passion of Eastern women for children, conceived the plan of associating herself with Judah himself, under the guise of a loose woman. Having waylaid him on the road to Timnath, she accomplished her object. The result of the painful affair was the birth of two sons, Zara and Pharez (38:12, sq.). (4) Becomes leader. Though not the firstborn, Judah "prevailed above his brethren" (1 Chron. 5:2); and we find him subsequently taking a decided lead in all the affairs in the family. When it became necessary to go a second time into Egypt for food, he remonstrated with Jacob against his detention of Benjamin, and undertook to be responsible for the safety of the lad (Gen. 43:3-10). When the cup was found in Benjamin's sack, and punishment from Joseph seemed imminent, Judah's earnest prayer for his father and brethren and his offer of himself as slave so moved upon his princely brother that he could no longer retain his secret (44:16-34). Soon, too, it is Judah who is sent by Jacob to smooth the way for him in the land of Goshen (46:28). We hear nothing more of him till he received, along with his brethren, the final blessing of his father (49:8-12).

The Tribe of Judah. (1) Numbers. When Judah went into Egypt he had three sons, but so greatly did this family increase that it numbered, at the first census, seventy-four thousand six hundred, being first in population of all the tribes. At the second census it numbered seventy-six thousand five hundred, still retaining its rank. Its representative among the spies, and also among those appointed to partition the land, was the great Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (Num. 13:6). (2) Position. During the march through the desert Judah's place was in the van of the host, on the east side of the tabernacle, with his kinsmen Issachar and Zebulun (2:3-9; 10:14). According to rabbinical authority, Judah's standard was green, with the symbol of a lion (Keil). (3) Portion in Canaan. Judah was the first tribe which received its allotted possessions west of the Jordan, and this territory included fully one third of the whole land. When the land was again distributed, by actual survey, a portion was given to Simeon. The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are given at great length (Josh. 15:20-63; see MAP). (4) Relation to other tribes. During the rule of the judges Judah maintained an independent spirit toward the other tribes; and while they acquiesced in the Benjamite (Saul's) appointment as king, it could hardly have been with a very good grace, as may be inferred from the very small contingent they supplied to that monarch's army against Analek (1 Sam. 15:4). (5) As a kingdom. When Judah established David as king, and removed the sanctuary to Jerusalem, the Ephraimites were dissatisfied, and seized the first opportunity of setting up an independent kingdom. Then the history of Judah as a tribe lapsed into that of Judah as a kingdom. Then followed a varied history of wars, vassalage, and occasional prosperity. Against Judah were arrayed Israel, Egypt, Syria, and finally the country was ravaged by the king of Babylon; Jerusalem was burnt with fire, the holy temple laid in ashes, the people taken away into captivity, and then Judah was no more (2 Kings chaps. 24, 25; Jer. chaps. 39-41).

2. A Levite who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8), B. C. about 536. He is perhaps the same person whose son aided in rebuilding the temple (Ezra 3:9, A. V. "Jeshua"), although the latter may be the same as Hodaviah (2:40).

3. The son of Senuah, a Benjamite, and "second over the city" of Jerusalem. Dr. Strong (see Cyc., s. v.) says that the true translation is "over the second city," and that Judah was prefect over Acra, or the Lower City (Neh. 11:9), B. C. 445.

4. One of those (priest or Levite is not stated) who followed the Jewish princes around the southern portion of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:34), B. C. 445. He is perhaps identical with the musician named in v. 36.

JU'DAH, KINGDOM OF. See HISTORY, OLD TESTAMENT; JUDAH.

JU'DAH UPON JOR'DAN (Josh. 19:34), mentioned in a description of the boundaries of Naphtali, and the cause of great perplexity. "The Jordan" is in apposition to "Judah," in the sense of "Judah of Jordan." C. V. Raumer solved the difficulty by showing that the district of the sixty towns of Jair, on the east of Jordan, is called Judah here, or reckoned as belonging to Judah, because Jair, the possessor of these towns, was a descendant of Judah on the father's side through Hezron (1 Chron. 2:5, 21, 22), whereas in 13:30 and Num. 32:41 he is reckoned as a descendant of Manasseh, on account of his descent from Machir on his mother's side (Keil, Com., on Joshua).

JU'DAS (Greek form, 'Ιούδας, ee-oo'-das, of Judah).

1. The Patriarch Judah, son of Joseph (Matt. 1:2, 3). See JUDAH.

2. Iscariot (Gr. 'Ισκαριώτης, is-kar-ee-o'-tace, inhabitant of Kerioth), the son of Simon, and one of our Lord's twelve apostles.

Personal History. (1) His call. We learn nothing of Judas previous to his call (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:19; Luke 6:16), and yet the appearance of his name in the lists of the apostles would seem to indicate that he had previously declared himself a disciple. It does not seem necessary to speculate upon the motives that influenced Judas to become a disciple, or to attempt a solution of the question why such a man was chosen for the office of an apostle. (2) As treasurer. When the twelve became an organized body, traveling hither and thither, receiving money and other offerings, and distributing to the poor, it became necessary that some one should act as steward, and we learn (John 12:4-6; 13:29) that this duty fell to Judas. And then, probably finding himself in possession of larger sums than before, there came covetousness, unfaithfulness, and embezzlement (12:4-6). (3) Treachery foretold. Some time previous to the betrayal of Jesus "many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him" (6:66), probably influenced by the disappointment of their earthly expectations, or fearful of coming evil. In deep sadness of heart he asked his disciples the question, "Will ye also go away?" Receiving assurances of faithfulness from the disciples through Peter, "Jesus answered them, Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? He spake of Judas Iscariot the son of Simon: for he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve" (6:70, 71), indicating that even then the greed of immediate or the hope of larger gain kept him from "going back;" that hatred was taking the place of love, and leading him on to a fiendish malignity. The scene at Bethany (Matt. 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9; John 12:3-9) showed how deeply the canker had eaten into his soul. The warm outpouring of love calls forth no sympathy. He utters himself, and suggests to others, the complaint that it is a waste. Under the plea of care for the poor he covers his own miserable theft. (4) Betrayal of Jesus. Previous to the feast of the Passover Judas had gone to "the chief priests and captains," and covenanted with them for money to betray Jesus to them (Matt. 26:14, sq.; Mark 14:10, sq.; Luke 22:3, sq.). He seems to have concealed his treachery, however, for we find him still with the disciples. At the beginning of the last supper he is present, his feet are washed, he hears the fearful words, "Ye are clean, but not all," and the Master's teaching the meaning of the act (John 13:2, sq.). Reclining near Jesus, he hears him tell the disciples that "One of you shall betray me," and asks with the others, "Is it I?" And then, fully given over to the evil one, and beyond reclaim, Satan enters into him, and Jesus said unto him, "That thou doest, do quickly." Judas rose from the feast, and was a disciple no more (Matt. 26:20, sq.; John 13:26-30), and shortly after he completed the betrayal. He knew the garden whither Jesus and the disciples often resorted, and he came accompanied by a band of officers and servants, to whom he made known his Master by a kiss (Matt. 26:47-49; Mark 14:43-45; Luke 22:47, 48; John 18:1-5). Jesus replied to that kiss with the words of stern, sad reproach, "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" (Luke 22:48). (5) Remorse and death. When Judas had time for reflection, and saw that Jesus was condemned, he was conscience stricken. Returning to the priests, he confessed his crime and hurled down the money, which they refused to take (Matt. 27:3-5). Feeling, perhaps, that there was for him no restoration; that he was, indeed, "the son of perdition" (John 17:12), "he departed, and went and hanged himself" (Matt. 27:5). He went "to his own place" (Acts 1:18-25).

NOTE.—Between these two passages (Matt. 27:5; Acts 1:18-25) there appears at first sight a discrepancy. In Matthew it is stated "He cast down the pieces of silver in the temple and departed, and went and hanged himself." In Acts (ch. 1) another account is given. There it is stated: (1) That instead of throwing the money into the temple he bought a field with it. (2) That instead of hanging himself, "falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out." (3) That for this reason, and not because the priests had bought it with the price of blood, the field was called "Aceldama." The fact would seem to be that Judas hanged himself, probably with his girdle, which either broke or became untied, and threw him heavily forward upon the jagged rocks below, thus inflicting the wound mentioned by Peter in the Acts. The apparent discrepancy in the two accounts as to the disposition of the money may be thus explained: "It was not lawful to take into the temple treasury, for the purchase of sacred things, money that had been unlawfully gained. In such case the Jewish law provided that the money was to be restored to the donor, and, if he insisted on giving it, that he should be induced to spend it for something for the public weal. By a fiction of law the money was still considered to be Judas's, and to have been applied by him in the purchase of the well-known 'potter's field'" (Edersheim, Life of Jesus, II, 575).

Character. The strongest element in the character of Judas was doubtless avarice, and "there is no vice at once so absorbing, so unreasonable, and so degrading as the vice of avarice." The disappointment of every expectation which had first drawn him to Jesus, the intolerable rebuke of that sinless life, and, lastly, the sight of Mary's lavish sacrifice, which brought no gain to himself, increased his alienation to repugnance and hate, so that Judas became capable of the deed that has given his name an everlasting stain.

3. Mentioned, with James and Simon, as a son of Mary (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3, A. V. "Juda").

4. Judas Lebbaeus, surnamed Thaddeus (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18). Luke (6:16) simply designates him "Judas of James," which probably means that he was the brother of JAMES THE LESS (q. v.). We find mention of Judas among the twelve apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:16), besides which the only circumstance recorded of him in the gospels consists in the question put by him to our Lord (John 14:22): "Judas saith unto him (not Iscariot), Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?" Nor have we any account of his proceedings after the resurrection, for the traditions respecting him are lacking in authority, associating him with the foundation of the Church at Edessa. The author of the Epistle of Jude has usually been identified with Judas.

5. Of Galilee, who stirred up a sedition among the Jews soon after the birth of Jesus (Acts 5:37). According to Josephus, he was born in Gamala, and the sedition occurred in A. D. 6. He was destroyed, and his followers scattered by Cyrenius, proconsul of Syria and Judea.

6. A Jew who lived in Damascus, in the street called Straight, probably the "Street of Bazaars." Paul went thither to lodge, and Ananias went there by direction of God, and recovered Saul from his blindness (Acts 9:11). The so-called "House of Judas" is still shown in an open space called "the Sheyk's Place," a few steps out of the Street of Bazaars.

7. Surnamed Barsabas, a disciple, and one of the deputation sent to confirm the Syrian Christians. The epistle having been read to the Church assembled at Antioch, Judas and Silas exercised their prophetic gifts for the confirmation of the believers, after which Judas returned to Jerusalem (Acts 15:22, 27, 32).

JUDE (Jude, ch. 1), the brother of James, and author of the last of the general epistles, usually identified with Judas, 4. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

JUDEA (Gr. Ἰουδαία, ee-oo-dah'-yah), the name of the southernmost Roman division of Palestine. Judea is very small, for if you include the whole maritime plain and the desert, it does not amount to more than two thousand square miles. But it never included the whole of the plain. Apart from the Shephelah and the plain, Judea was fifty-five miles long, from Bethlehem to Beer-sheba, and from twenty-five to thirty miles broad, about one thousand three hundred and fifty square miles, of which nearly one half was desert. On the east was the Jordan and its valley, and, coming west, the desert, then the "hill country," then the Shephelah (or low hills), and, finally, the maritime plain. On the north Judea was bounded by Samaria, and on the south by the desert.

The wilderness of Judea extends from the beach of the Dead Sea to the very edge of the central plateau (or hill country), thus obliging travelers from the east to journey for from five to eight hours through a waterless desert. Three well-watered spots are on its eastern edge, Jericho 'Ain Feshkah (ten miles to the south), and 'Ain Jidi (or Engedi, eighteen miles farther). From Jericho there start into Judea three roads, from 'Ain Feshkah one, and from Engedi one. The roads from Jericho run northwest to Ai and Beth-el, southwest to Jerusalem, and south southwest to the lower Kedron and Bethlehem. Just after this last crosses the Kedron it is joined by the road from 'Ain Feshkah. The road from Engedi breaks into two branches, one running northwest to Bethlehem and Jerusalem, a wild and difficult road, never used by caravans, the other branch turns southwest to Yuttah and Hebron.

Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 310) says that the three features of Judea's geography which are most significant in her history are, "her pastoral character, her neighborhood to the desert, her singular unsuitableness for the growth of a great city." Two, at least, of the prophets were born in face of the wilderness of Judea—Amos at Tekoah, and Jeremiah at Anathoth. The wilderness was the scene of David's refuge from Saul; here John the Baptist prepared for his mission, and here our Lord suffered his temptation.

Although physically the most barren and awkward, Judea was morally the most famous and powerful of the provinces of Syria. Her character and history are thus summed up: "At all times in which the powers of spiritual initiative or expansion were needed, she was lacking, and so in the end came her shame. But when the times required concentration, indifference to the world, loyalty to the past, and passionate patriotism, then Judea took the lead, or stood alone in Israel, and these virtues even rendered brilliant the hopeless, insane struggles of her end. Judea was the seat of the one enduring dynasty of Israel, the site of their temple, the platform of their chief prophets. After their great exile they rallied round her capital, and centuries later they expended upon her fortresses the last efforts of their freedom. It is, therefore, not wonderful that they should have won from it the name which is now more frequent than either their ancestral designation of Hebrews or their sacred title of Israel" (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 259, 260).

JUDGE. For judge in the general sense of magistrate, see LAW, ADMINISTRATION OF.

JUDGES, THE. There is a restricted sense of the word judge, in which it means that officer who presided over the affairs of the Hebrews in the period between Joshua and the accession of Saul.

1. Age of the Judges. "In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:25). This sentence, frequently and earnestly repeated, gives us the keynote of the whole Book of Judges. Each tribe took thought for itself how best to secure and maintain an adequate territory, so that separate interests of all sorts soon became prevalent, and regard for the general welfare was more and more forgotten. This separation of the parts of the nation was aided by the early disunion and jealousies of the several tribes, no one of which held the preeminence. The consequences of this internal discord were so threatening that it became a very grave question whether the nation would be able to hold even the soil on which its peculiar religion and culture were to attain their full development. Then, too, the ancient inhabitants still retained their hold on large tracts, or on important positions throughout the country. The neighboring powers still looked upon the newcomers as an easy prey to incursion and devastation, if not to actual subjugation. Nor did Israel escape the pernicious influences of idolatry, both of Canaan and the surrounding countries. The following is the review of the period of the judges: "The children of Israel did evil against Jehovah, though he had manifested special favor to them; he sold them into the hand of this enemy or that; they cried to him in their trouble; he raised up a deliverer who saved them; the land had rest; again they sinned; and again the same cycle was repeated" (Robinson, Early Religion of Israel, p. 116, sq.).

2. The Judges. Under the circumstances mentioned above the people were left an easy prey to idolatrous influences; they seemed incapable of grasping the idea of a divine and invisible King; therefore God allowed them judges in the persons of faithful men, who acted, for the most part, as agents of the divine will, regents of the invisible King, holding their commission directly from him or with his sanction. They would thus be more inclined to act as dependent vassals of Jehovah than kings, who would naturally have notions of independent rights and royal privileges. In this greater dependence of the judges upon the divine King we see the secret of their institution. As to the nature of the office it appears to have resembled that of the Roman dictator, to which it has been compared, with this exception, that the dictator laid down his power as soon as the crisis which had called for its exercise had passed away; but the Hebrew judge remained invested with his high authority during life (1 Sam. 4:18; 7:15). Sometimes these judges commenced their career with military exploits, but this was not always the case. Eli and Samuel were not military men; Deborah judged Israel before she planned the war against Jabin; and of Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, it is at least uncertain whether they ever held any military command. The origin of their authority must in all cases be traced ultimately to Jehovah, owing to the very nature of the theocracy (2 Sam. 7:7), yet this did not prevent differences of detail in the manner of their appointment. In Judg. 2:16 it is distinctly stated that "the Lord raised up judges" (comp. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 13:25). One, Barak, was named by a prophetess, who was herself acknowledged as a judge of Israel (4:5, 6). Of others it is simply said that they arose (10:1, 3), while Jephthah furnishes a clear instance of popular election (10:18; 11:5, 6).

3. Name and Function. The name in Hebrew is the participle of שָׁפַט, shaw-fat, to judge, pronounce judgment. "The judges were men (excepting Deborah) who procured justice or right for the people of Israel, not only by delivering them from the power of their enemies, but also by administering the laws and rites of the Lord" (Judg. 2:16-19). Judging in this sense was different from the administration of civil jurisprudence, and included the idea of government such as would be expected from a king (see 1 Sam. 8:5, 6; 2 Kings 15:5). Alongside with the extraordinary rule of the judges, the ordinary administration of justice and government of the commonwealth still remained in the hands of the heads of the tribes and the elders of the people.

4. Chronology of the Period. The following is the data of this period as we find it in the Book of Judges:

	YEARS.
1. Oppression by Cushan-rishathaim (3:8).....	8
Deliverance by Othniel and rest (3:9-12).....	40
2. Oppression by the Moabites (3:14).....	18
Deliverance by Ehud and rest (3:15-30).....	80
Shamgar as judge (3:31).....
3. Oppression by King Jabin (4:2, 3).....	20
Deliverance by Deborah and Barak and rest (4:4-5:31).....	40
4. Oppression by the Midianites (6:1).....	7
Deliverance by Gideon and rest (6:2-8:28).....	40
Abimelech's reign (9:22).....	3
Tola, judge (10:1, 2).....	23
Jair, judge (10:3).....	22
5. Oppression by the Ammonites (10:8).....	18
Deliverance by Jephthah, judge (11:1-12:7).....	6
Ibzan, judge (12:8-10).....	7
Elon, judge (11:11, 12).....	10
Abdon, judge (12:13-15).....	8
6. Oppression by the Philistines (13:1).....	40
Samson judged Israel during this period (15:20; 16:31) twenty years.....
Total.....	390

If we add to this:
 (a) The time of Joshua, not distinctly mentioned... 20
 (b) The time of Eli, judge (1 Sam. 4:18)..... 40
 450

And adding still further:
 (c) The times of Samuel and Saul combined..... 40
 (d) The reign of David (2 Sam. 5:4; 1 Kings 2:11)..... 40
 (e) The reign of Solomon to the building of the temple (1 Kings 6:1)..... 3

The whole time from the entrance of Israel into Canaan to the building of the temple..... 533
 Add forty years for wandering in the desert, and we have..... 573

But according to 1 Kings 6:1, the temple was built in the four hundred and eightieth year after the Israelites left Egypt. The apostle Paul says: "And after that he gave unto them judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the prophet" (Acts 13:20). There can be but little doubt that some of the rulers were contemporaneous, which would greatly reduce the length of the period. See CHRONOLOGY, HISTORY, OLD TESTAMENT.

JUDGMENT. In this article we treat of judgment: 1. Right of private; 2. Judgments of men; 3. Judgments of God; and 4. Judgment, the final.

1. Judgment, Right of Private. The matters in question at this point relate:

(1) To the right of individuals to interpret the Scriptures for themselves, or to form their own judgments as to the meaning of the Scriptures. This is an issue principally between Roman Catholics and Protestants. It is asserted by the Romish

Church that the Church is the divinely authorized and infallible interpreter of Scripture revelation. It is admitted that many questions of details in connection with the study of the Bible should be left to scientific research. But still it is held that in all controversies with respect to the meaning of particular passages, also that, as to the general doctrine of the Scriptures the decision of the Church is final. The only course that is safe or right for the people is to submit unreservedly to the judgment of the Church. In opposition to this Protestants generally hold that the Bible is a book for the people. It is God's message to be received and read, and, in its great general meaning, to be apprehended directly by the people themselves. The prophets of the Old Testament spoke to the people. The gospels and the epistles were for popular use and instruction. And while parts of Holy Scripture are difficult or impossible to understand without skilled interpretation, still the truth essential to salvation is within the reach of all. Christ has not appointed any class or body of men in the Church as interpreters of the Scriptures in any such sense as to make their interpretation final or supreme before the conscience and intelligence of the people. The responsibility for religious faith and conduct belongs to the individual. He has not the right to submit himself blindly in these respects to the guidance of others. It is to be maintained, however, that everyone is bound to exercise diligence and to use all proper means for the right understanding of moral truth, to pay respect to the judgment of those wiser than himself, and especially to pay heed to those interpretations of the Scriptures which have generally prevailed, or have been universal, in the history of the Christian Church.

(2) The place of private judgment in Churches not professing infallibility. The claim of the Church of Rome to infallibility covers not only the interpretation of Scripture, but other matters resting professedly upon tradition, with respect to which the Church has rendered formal decision. Protestants meet this twofold assumption with their historic watchword, "The Bible the only and sufficient rule of faith and practice." And yet the extent to which private judgment may be rightfully exercised in Protestant Churches is a question by no means settled. At the one extreme are those who hold that the Church should present very few, if any, doctrinal tests of membership; that reliance should be placed upon vigorous Christian institutions as most likely to lead to a real and general Christian belief. This is the view of the Broad Church party in the Church of England and others of so-called liberal tendencies. At the other extreme are those who would impose upon the membership of Protestant Churches not only a detailed system of doctrine, but also ethical regulations which are not supported by the Scriptures. With this is asserted strictly the obligation of membership in these Churches. The more moderate position is that Churches for their very existence must have a basis of general doctrine which rests unmistakably upon the Scriptures, and must prescribe a line of conduct resting upon the same authority. The difficulties, both theoretical and practical, grow out of a lack of proper conception of the Church and of the Churches. For discussion of this we refer to the article in this work, CHURCH.

(3) The liberty of private judgment in relation to the state. Civil government is clearly recognized by the Scriptures as resting upon divine authority. Obedience to the state may therefore be said, in general terms, to be a divine requirement (see Rom. 12:1-5; 1 Pet. 2:13-15). But it is equally clear that in order to exact justly obedience from citizens or subjects the state must confine its action within its proper sphere. The function of the state is to protect life and property, and to preserve social order. When civil government attempts to enforce assent to religious doctrines, or to enact laws which require disobedience to the commandments of God, then the right of private judgment must be asserted. "We ought to obey God rather than men." There are other cases, into which we cannot here enter, in which a perversion or abuse of civil power must be met by the exercise of individual conscience. This is a principle, nevertheless, which in a free and popular government needs to be carefully guarded. For discussion of this point, see Hodge, Systematic Theology, vol. iii, p. 356-360; Lieber, Political Ethics.

2. Judgments of Men. The Scriptures recognize it to be necessary that, under proper limitations, men should form and express judgments relative to their fellow-men.

(1) There is the necessity of private, unofficial judgment. We must constantly form estimates of the conduct and character of others for our own guidance and safety and usefulness. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The prohibition of judging, in Matt. 7:1, is not opposed to this, as must be seen in vers. 6, 7 of the same chapter. We are forbidden to usurp God's place as judge; also to pass rash and unjust and uncharitable and needless judgments.

(2) It is also necessary that men should judge officially. Human government is divinely authorized. And the exercise of judicial functions is essential to all government. All judges, however, are to remember that they are subject to the judgment of God, and to exercise their office equitably and with due moderation. The application recently given by Tolstoi to Matt. 7:1, as against all judicial procedure, is a perversion of Scripture (see Rom. 13:1-5; 1 Pet. 2:13, 14).

3. Judgments of God. The meaning of the numerous references in the Scriptures to the judgments of God is not uniform. In each case it must be determined from the connection. Frequently the expression has a force closely allied to that of commandments or statutes (e. g., Deut. 5:1; 11:1). Frequently it combines the idea of divine condemnation with that of the divine infliction of penalty (e. g., Psa. 119:84; 140:7-9; 143:2). Frequently also it expresses the divine approval and protection and gracious reward (e. g., Psa. 119:43; 146:7). In every case it refers to God as "the Judge of all the earth," and should call to mind that divine judicial authority which shall have its full disclosure in the final judgment.

4. Judgment, the Final, sometimes called the general judgment, also "the judgment of the great day."

(1) Among the most clear and emphatic revelations of the Scriptures are those which relate to this fact of the future. It was predicted in the first prophecy of which we have record (see Jude, vers. 14, 15). The prophets of Israel, though speaking often of national, and, therefore, temporal, judgments, frequently looked beyond all these to the final judgment, for which these were preparatory (Psa. 9:7, 8; 96:13; Dan. 12:2, 3, 13, et al.). Our Lord gave utterances of greatest weight upon this subject (e. g., Matt. 11:24; 25:31-46; John 12:48). It pervades all apostolic teaching (17:31; 24:25), and is presented with sublime imagery in the last book of the Scripture canon (e. g., Acts 11:42; Rev. 20:11-15). It must be recognized that the terms employed in the Scriptures with reference to this event are often figurative. But this certainly does not detract from the reality and greatness of the event itself, which is beyond all human power of expression. Of the force and suggestiveness of the symbolical or figurative terms used we cannot here speak.

(2) The doctrine as held generally in all divisions of the Church, Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Greek, contains the following principal features: 1. The final judgment is a definite event. It is not an isolated act, as having no relation to the preliminary judgments which God is constantly manifesting in history. But it is the final and complete disclosure and exercise of God's judicial authority with respect to the judged. There is a "day" of judgment; not necessarily, by any means, to be understood as a period of twenty-four hours, but still, as shown by the Scripture connections, and by the circumstances of the judgment, a definite and limited portion of time (see Matt. 11:24; John 12:48; Acts 17:31; Rom. 2:5, et al.). 2. The final judgment is to take place at the end of the world, and in immediate connection with the final coming of Christ and the general resurrection (see Matt. 13:30-39; 16:27; 25:31-46; John 5:28, 29; 1 Cor. 4:5; 2 Tim. 4:1). 3. The Judge is the Lord Jesus Christ. And this not only because he is God, but also because as the God-man he is infinitely exalted, and has the function of judgment especially committed to him (see Matt. 25:31-46; John 5:22-27; Acts 17:31; 2 Cor. 5:10). 4. The judgment is for the whole race of mankind, and yet, while thus universal, it is to be specific for every individual (see Heb. 9:27; Matt. 25:32; Acts 10:42; 17:31; Rom. 2:5, 6, 16; 2 Tim. 4:1; 2 Cor. 5:10; Rev. 20:12). Two passages include the fallen angels among the subjects of the last judgment (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude, v. 6). 5. The standard or rule of judgment includes: (a) The recognition of various degrees of privilege, and, consequently, of responsibility (Luke 12:48; Matt. 10:15; Mark 6:11; Rom. 2:10, 11). (b) The recognition of both faith and works, or the lack of these, on the part of the judged; and this because, in relation to the judgment, faith and works are indissolubly united, faith being the inner principle of the life that is acceptable to God, and works the outward expression. Also faith itself involves a moral act, the act of all most decisive in determining subsequent actions. The Lord declared to the unbelieving Jews when they inquired, "What shall we do that we might work the work of God?" "This is the work of God that ye believe on him whom he hath sent" (John 6:28, 29). Upon this point, connected with others more or less in dispute, the following observations may be useful: It is true that the New Testament throughout declares that there shall be rendered to every man according to his works. But this is not because these are in themselves meritorious, but because they are the actual expressions of the life principle—faith. If the actual merit or demerit of the actions of men were to be the standard of final judgment, then there could not be hope for anyone. Then the final judgment would be a reversal of that justification of believers which is without works (Rom. 4:5, 6; Gal. 2:16). The stress laid upon works in connection with the final judgment is the proper safeguard against Antinomianism, or a delusive reliance upon a faith that is not genuine (see James 2:17-26). It also brings out strongly the fact of degrees of righteous penalty and of gracious reward (Rom. 2:6; 2 Cor. 5:10; Gal. 6:7; Rev. 22:12; 2 Pet. 1:11). Our conclusion as to the grounds of judgment with reference to those who have not had the privilege of the Gospel must be determined by scriptural conception of saving faith, and of the benefits of the atonement (comp. Acts 4:12 with 10:34, 35; see also article FAITH). 6. The results of the judgment are to be: (a) The complete revelation of the righteous government of God (1 Cor. 4:5). (b) The complete and eternal separation between the righteous and the wicked (Matt. 13:30-39; 25:33). (c) The manifestation before all of the destiny of the righteous, and of the wicked. The decisions of that day will be of matters in principle already settled. But the sentences there first publicly pronounced will be followed by eternal blessedness on the one hand and everlasting punishment on the other (Matt. 25:46; Phil. 3:9; John 3:36; 8:24; 2 Thess. 1:9).

(3) Various departures from the doctrine of the Scriptures and of the Church have appeared, of which we note: 1. That of Rationalists, who hold that all the Bible really teaches upon this subject is to be taken, in a general way, as meaning simply a future state of rewards and punishments. 2. Another view, also rationalistic in its character, is that expressed in the words of Schelling, "The history of the world is the judgment of the world." There is no occasion for final judgment. 3. The doctrine of Premillenarians, that the day of judgment is a protracted future dispensation, to begin with the second coming of Christ and to continue during his millennial reign upon the earth.

JUDGMENT HALL (Gr. πρωτόδικον, praheo-to'-ree-on, "headquarters" in a Roman camp; the palace of a governor). The Greek word pretorium is so rendered in Mark 15:16; in Matt. 27:27 it is given in the A. V. as common hall; in Phil. 1:13, palace; in John 18:28, hall of judgment; and in the same verse; John 18:33; 19:9; Acts 23:35, judgment hall.

1. In John 18:28, 33; 29:9, it is the residence which Pilate occupied when he visited Jerusalem. The site of Pilate's pretorium in Jerusalem has given rise to much dispute, some supposing it to be the palace of King Herod, others the tower of Antonia; but it has been shown elsewhere that the latter was probably the pretorium, which was then and long afterward the citadel of Jerusalem.

2. In Acts 23:35 Herod's judgment hall, or pretorium, in Casarea, was doubtless a part of that magnificent range of buildings the erection of which by King Herod is described in Josephus.

3. The word "palace," or "Caesar's court," in the A. V. of Phil. 1:13, is a translation of the same word, pretorium. It may here have denoted the quarter of that detachment of the pretorian guards which was in immediate attendance upon the emperor, and had barracks in Mount Palatine.

JUDGMENT SEAT (Gr. βῆμα, bay'-ma, a step), a raised place mounted by steps; used of the official seat of a judge (Matt. 27:19; John 19:13; Acts 18:12, 16, sq.; 25:6); of the judgment seat of Christ (Rom. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10); of the structure, resembling a throne, which Herod built in the theater at Casarea, and from which he used to view the games and make speeches to the people (Acts 12:21).

JUDGMENTS OF GOD. See JUDGMENT.

JUDICIAL BLINDNESS, OR HARDNESS, a term employed to express a state of moral incorrigibility. Thus we read, "Being grieved for the blindness (i. e., hardness), of their hearts" (Mark 3:5); also, "blindness (hardness) in part hath happened to Israel" (Rom. 11:25; comp. 2 Cor. 3:14). The question arises: Is this blindness or hardness an infliction of God? From such passages as Isa. 6:10 some have argued that this condition of the individual or nation is the result of a direct act of God. Stronger still appears the passage, "He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts" (John 12:40), which seems to be contradictory to Matt. 13:15, where the people themselves are said to have closed their own eyes (comp. Acts 28:27). The true explanation seems to be that God does not harden men's hearts directly, but rather that his offers and displays of salvation which man receives necessarily serve to fill up the measure of his sins. "There is a self-hardening in evil which renders a man thoroughly incorrigible, and which, regarded as the fruit of his moral behavior, is no less a judicial punishment inflicted by God than self-induced guilt on the part of man. The two are bound up in one another, inasmuch as sin, from its very nature, bears its own punishment, which consists in the wrath of God excited by sin" (K. and D., Com., Isa. 6:10).

JUDITH (Heb. יְהֻדִית, yeh-hoo-deeth, Jewness), the daughter of Beeri, the Hittite, and one of Esau's two wives (Gen. 26:34). She is elsewhere called ACHOLIBAMAH (q. v.).

JULIA (Gr. Ἰουλίᾱ, ee-oo'-lee'-ah, feminine of Julius), a female disciple at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations (Rom. 16:15).

JULIUS (Gr. Ἰούλιος, ee-oo'-lee-os), the centurion who conducted Paul to Rome. At Sidon he allowed Paul to visit his friends, and treated him courteously throughout the voyage (Acts 27:1, 3, 48), A. D. 62.

JU'NIA, or rather JU'NIAS (Gr. Ἰουνία, ee-oo-nee'-as), a Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation in connection with Andronicus as "kinsmen and fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the apostles, who also were in Christ before" himself (Rom. 16:7), A. D. 60. From his calling them kinsmen it is supposed that they were of Jewish extraction.

JUPITER. See GODS, FALSE.

JU'SHAB-HE'SED (Heb. יְרֵשֵׁב הַסֵּד, yeh-shab' kheh'-sed, returner of kindness), according to some, the son of Pedaiah (1 Chron. 3:20); but according to Keil (Com., in loc.) the last named of the sons of Zerubabel. Keil thinks that the two groups of sons (vers. 19, 20) are mentioned separately because they had different mothers.

JUSTICE, IN ETHICS, is a term of comprehensive meaning. It refers to both disposition and conduct. For various Hebrew and Greek words rendered justice or righteousness in the Scriptures, we refer to Young's or Strong's Concordance. The Latin word "justitia" is defined by Cicero as "animi affectio suam cuique tribuens" (De Finibus, v, 23, 65). This definition he expands elsewhere so as to have justice include religion, filial affection, fidelity, lenity in moderating punishment, and kindly benevolence (Partitioes Orat., 22, 78). Thus the term is used in a general sense for "what is right, or as it should be." The New Testament conception of justice thoroughly accords with this. Justice is not only respect for the rights of one's fellow-men, as of life, property, and reputation. In the broadest sense it includes the proper recognition of man's duty toward God. It begins with that (see Matt. 22:21, 37, 38, and many other places). With respect to man's relation to man, it includes several details often forgotten as items of justice. Thus charity or love is an obligation of righteousness (Rom. 13:8). Thus respect for human nature is enjoined in the precept "Honor all men" (1 Pet. 2:17). Thus also courtesy and hospitality (1 Pet. 3:8; 4:9). In short, man in his relation to man is to reflect the justice or righteousness of God; with the exception, considered below, that man, as an individual, is not to administer retributive justice. The public administration is a most important part of social ethics, and, as just noted, entirely distinct from the ethics of individual life. Here it is to be borne in mind that in human courts where just laws are properly administered, are reflections, at least, of the distributive justice, that is divine (see JUDGMENTS OF MEN). The judicial function of the state must, however, be confined within its proper limits, taking cognizance of only external conduct, and this so far as it relates to the protection of life, property, reputation, and social order. And yet justice is not to be administered merely upon grounds of social expediency but because it is justice (see PUNISHMENT).

LITERATURE.—Martensen, Social Eth., pp. 82, ff.; 176, ff.; Pope, Comp. of Christ. Theol., iii, 234, ff.; Hodge, Sys. Theol., i, 416, ff.)—E. McC.

JUSTICE OF GOD (Heb. צְדָקָה, tseh'-dek, right, rightness). In theology, as in the Scriptures, the terms justice and righteousness are used synonymously. The justice of God is both an essential and a relative attribute of the divine existence. It is a necessary outflow from the holiness of God. It is that in positive form which is negatively described as holiness, or separateness from evil. And, further, it is the holiness of God as manifested and applied in moral government. See HOLINESS of God.

The justice or righteousness of God is proclaimed emphatically in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments (e. g., Gen. 18:25; Psa. 11:7; John 17:25; Heb. 6:10). In accordance with the Scripture, divine justice, i. e., perfect justice, is everywhere in the divine administration. God is the righteous Governor of the world. His laws are equitable and practicable. This is legislative or rectoral justice. God is also the righteous Judge. The sentences he pronounces, the rewards he bestows, the penalties he inflicts, are all righteous. This is judicial or distributive justice (see Deut. 32:3, 4; Psa. 36:6; 19:7-10; 119:142; 97:2; Isa. 33:22; Acts 10:34; Rom. 2:11; Rev. 15:3; 16:7, et al.).

The relation of the justice to the grace of God cannot be considered here fully. It should be remarked, however, that the revelation of his highest grace in Christ was "to declare his righteousness" (Rom. 3:25, 26; see GRACE; ATONEMENT). Also the rewards graciously apportioned to the eternally saved vary in measure, and have respect to the individual character and deeds of those who receive them (see JUDGMENT, the FINAL). The righteousness or justice of God, also like his holiness, is communicable to men. It is the work of divine grace to impart to men rightness by renewal "in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph. 4:23, 24; Isa. 46:13; 51:5; 56:1; Rom. 10:3). See IMAGE of God.

There is no warrant for the statement that the Old Testament magnifies the justice of God more than does the New. The New Testament brings to light most distinctly the economy of grace, by no means lost sight of in the Old. But, at the same time, it reveals most fully the triumph of the righteous kingdom of God, culminating in the final judgment.—E. MCC.

LITERATURE.—Pope, Comp. Christ. Theol., i, 335, ff.; Van Oosterzee, Christ. Dogm., i, p. 265, ff.; Hodge, System of Theol., i, p. 416, ff.; Martensen, Christ. Dogm., 97, ff.; Owen, On the Justice of God; Elisha Cole, On the Righteousness of God.

JUSTIFICATION (Heb. פָּדוּת , tsuw-dak', to make or declare; Gr. δικαιωσις, dik-ah'-yo-nec-ah), judicial sentence, declaration of right; thus, judicial acquittal, the opposite of condemnation.

1. Theological Statement, the term used in theology to designate the judicial act of God by which he releases from divine condemnation and restores to divine favor sinners who truly believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. Various phrases in Scripture refer to the same gracious act of God, as "forgiving iniquity," or forgiveness of sins (Exod. 34:7; Psa. 103:3; Acts 5:31; 13:38; 26:18; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14). "Not imputing iniquity," but "covering sins" (Psa. 32:1, 2). See IMPUTATION.

Justification is distinguished from regeneration, as the former is a change wrought in man's relation to God, and the latter is a change wrought by the Spirit of God in man himself (see REGENERATION). It is likewise distinct from adoption, adoption being not a judicial act on the part of God, but the act of God as Father restoring the filial relation of man annulled by sin (see ADOPTION). These are all, however, simultaneous blessings of the same grace in Christ (Rom. 5:1-2; 8:29; 2 Cor. 5:17, 21; Eph. 2:5; Gal. 4:6). Justification is represented in the Scriptures as having its primal source in the love of God for the sinful human race (John 3:16, 17; Rom. 1:5; 5:8; Tit. 2:11; 3:4, 5). Here is the originating cause. The sole meritorious cause is the sacrificial death of the Lord Jesus Christ (Matt. 26:28; Rom. 5:8, 9; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14, et al.; see ATONEMENT.) The instrumental cause, or that in man by which he obtains and retains justification, is faith, as faith in the Lord Jesus Christ is the divinely established condition upon the fulfillment of which the conditional benefits of the atonement are received (John 3:16, 17; Acts 16:31; Rom. 5:1; Gal. 3:11, 12, and many other places). At this point, however, it is most important to note that the faith upon which the Scriptures lay such stress is of the deepest and most genuine character—such as involves the most hearty repentance or turning away from sin to righteousness, the thorough surrender of one's self to God, and the persistent endeavor to keep perfectly his commandments, together with an entire despair of salvation through one's own merits, and a humble yet hearty trust in the mercy of God in Christ. See FAITH.

2. Historical. Throughout the whole history of this doctrine the principal point of difference and dispute has been as to whether faith is the only condition of justification, or whether good works in connection with faith are also to be regarded as an instrumental cause. Upon this question opinion has run to opposite extremes—those of Antinomianism and the doctrine of penances and works of supererogation. A chief cause of error has been an undue magnifying of the intellectual element in faith at the expense of the element that is moral and practical. Even in the earliest days of Christianity the tendency was manifest to regard faith as merely a mental assent to Christian doctrine. The possessor of such faith deemed himself as having fully met the Gospel requirement, though regardless of the claims of Christian service, and even of ordinary morality. Passages in the epistles of St. Paul and St. James were written to correct this Antinomian error (e. g., Rom. 6:1; Gal. 5:16-25; James 2:14-26). Partly as a recoil from this error the demand arose that, in addition to good works as evidences of true faith in believers, the sins of believers should be expiated by penances. And still further came in a false idea of the character of good works. Instead of the clear recognition of the only relative and imperfect character of the righteousness of even the best Christians, the distinction was made between the divine commands and the divine counsels, and the belief obtained footing that by keeping both men might do more than meet the divine requirements. Thus the scriptural doctrine of justification by faith became, to a considerable extent, beclouded in the early period of the history of the Church. The abuses which later became prevalent in the Roman Catholic Church through the failure to maintain the Scripture conception of faith and through the false conception of good works, are well known. Without entering in detail into the views of this, or of the Greek Church, it must suffice us to emphasize the fact that the rescuing of the Scripture doctrine upon this subject, largely, though not wholly, lost sight of for a long time, was the work of the reformation of the 16th century. Justification by faith is a fundamental doctrine of Protestant and evangelical Christianity. It stands opposed to those rationalistic conceptions of sin, and the attitude of God toward it, which reduce justification to a nullity, and to those views of Christian merit, cherished by Romanism, which derogate from the efficacy of Christ's atonement, and at the same time it holds before men the great hope of the Gospel, and lays deep the foundation of Christian morality.

JUSTUS (Gr. Ἰούστος, ee-ooos'-tos, just).

1. The surname of Joseph, called also Barsabas, who, with Matthias, was selected by the apostles as candidates for the place made vacant by the apostasy of Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:23).

2. A disciple living at Corinth, in whose house, near the synagogue, Paul preached to the Gentiles (Acts 18:7), B. C. 54.

3. Called also Jesus, a Jewish Christian, named in connection with Mark by Paul, as being his "only fellow-workers" at Rome when he wrote to the Colossians (Col. 4:11), B. C. 64.

JUTTAH (Heb. יִטָּה, yoo-taw', inclosed), a Levitical city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:55; 21:16). It was allotted to the priests, but in the catalogue (1 Chron. 6:57-59) the name has escaped. It is supposed to have been the residence of Zacharias and Elizabeth, and the birthplace of John the Baptist (Luke 1:39). It is, doubtless, the present Jutta, or Jitta, about four miles S. of Hebron.

K

KAB'ZEEL (Heb. קַבְצִיאל, kab-tseh-ale', God has gathered), a city in the south of Judah, the birthplace of Benaiah (Josh. 15:21; 2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chron. 11:22). In Neh. 11:25 it is called JEKAB-ZEEL (q. v.).

KA'DESH (Heb. קָדֵשׁ, kaw-dashe', sanctuary), more fully KA'DESH-BAR'NEA (Heb. קָדֵשׁ בַּרנָּה, kaw-dashe', and בַּרנָּה, bar-nay'-ah; Simon derived the latter word from בָּר, bar, desert, and נָּה, nay'-ah, wandering, rendering it "Desert of Wanderings"), a spot where the Israelites twice encamped while journeying from Egypt to Palestine, being their nineteenth and thirty-seventh station. Its original name would seem to have been RITHMAH (q. v.), becoming Kadesh when the tabernacle rested there; EN-MISHPAT (q. v.), "Fountain of Judgment," when judgment was passed upon the Israelites; and MERIBAH (q. v.) when it was the place of murmuring and strife.

From Kadesh-barnea Moses sent messengers to explore the promised land, and, returning, they made their report. The people rebelled, and even went so far as to choose a captain to lead them back to Egypt (Num. 14:4). In consequence Kadesh, the sanctuary, became En-Mishpat, a "Fountain of Judgment," when the rebellious people were sentenced to complete forty years of wandering. Israel determined to obtain possession of Canaan (14:39, 40), and pushed into the "south country" (the Negeb, Heb. נֶגֶב, neh'-gheb), i. e., the high land between the desert and Canaan proper. They were, however, defeated by the Amorites (Deut. 1:44) and the Amalekites (Num. 14:45).

1. Scripture References. The first mention of Kadesh-barnea is in connection with the devastating march of CHEDORLAOMER (q. v.), king of Elam, in the days of Abraham (Gen. 14:1-16). Kadesh is mentioned in connection with the flight of Hagar (16:7), where it is recorded that she rested by "the fountain in the way of Shur," between Kadesh and Bered (v. 14). Again it is recorded that Abraham moved from Hebron, and sojourned at a point "between Kadesh and Shur" (20:1). Some think that the rebellion of Korah and his company occurred at Kadesh, and that it was there "the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up" (Num. 16:1-31). It was certainly at Kadesh that Miriam died and was buried (20:1), and that Moses struck the rock when he had been told only to speak to it (vers. 2-11). This was the third time that it was the "Fountain of Judgment" by Jehovah passing judgment upon Moses for his impatience, presumption, and lack of reverent obedience (vers. 12-24). Then Kadesh, sanctuary, became Meribah, or strife (v. 13).

A long halt at Kadesh followed (Deut. 1:46), and it would appear that the Israelites scattered about in the valleys of the desert, leading a nomad life, having all this time Kadesh as the northernmost limit of their roving, and as, in a peculiar sense, the center of their occupancy, or the pivot of their wanderings (Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, p. 20). Thus passed thirty-seven years, during which Israel did not advance one single step toward the occupancy of the promised land. Then they came together in Kadesh, "even the whole congregation" (Num. 20:1; Deut. 2:1), as if it was the rendezvous and rallying point of the scattered nation.

It was from Kadesh that Moses sent messengers to the king of Edom with the request that Israel might pass through his country on the way to Canaan (Num. 20:14-21,) and also with like request to the king of Moab (Judg. 11:16, 17).

2. Location. With such a history it is natural that much interest should be felt as to the location of Kadesh. From Deut. 1:2, 19, and other passages, it is evident that Kadesh was on the southeast border of Palestine, lying toward Edom. Robinson selected for the site of Kadesh-barnea 'Ayn el-Wabeh, a desert spring near the west slope of the 'Arabah. The doctor's reputation was such that for years this was accepted as the true site. In 1844 Mr. John Rowlands, in a letter to his friend, Mr. George Williams, and published in the latter's Holy City, Appendix, reported his discovery of Kadesh-barnea, locating it east of Jebel Halal, toward its northern extremity, about twelve miles to the E. S. E. of Moilähhi, "something like due of every other landmark, in its order, along the southern boundary line of Canaan, according to the Bible text. (4) To identify Kadesh-barnea at 'Ayn Qadees is to render clear the movements of the Israelites toward, and away from, the southern border of Canaan, as no other identification of this site has done" (Kadesh-Barnea, p. 311, sq.). See KADESH.

KAD'MIEL (Heb. קַדְמִיֵּאל, kad-mee-ale', presence of God).

1. One of the Levites who, with his family, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and apparently a representative of the descendants of Hodaviah, or, as he is elsewhere called, Hodaveh or Judah (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43; 12:3, 12, 24). He assisted in the various reforms of that period (Ezra 3:9), B. C. 536.

2. A Levite who assisted in leading the devosouth from Khalasa." This view has been accepted by such authorities as Professors Tuch and Winer, of Leipzig; Drs. Keil, Delitzsch, and other German scholars; Edersheim, Geikie, and Sayce, of England, and Bartlett and Lowrie, of this country. This location has been proven correct by Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, in his charming and learned work, Kadesh-Barnea (Scribner's Sons, New York, 1884). In support of the claims of 'Ayn Qadees, Dr. Trumbull presents the following considerations: (1) The region of 'Ayn Qadees is a strategic stronghold on the southern border of Canaan, immediately accessible from the main road out of the southern desert, Canaanward, yet secluded from it. It is near the trunk-connection of the principal roads into Canaan, at a point convenient for watching or seizing these roads, and it has an inner road northward separate from those roads, and easily held by itself at its single mountain pass. (2) 'Ayn Qadees, with its adjoining plain, is the southernmost and central point of the obvious natural boundary line along the southern border of Canaan, from the lower end of the Dead Sea to the outgoings of Wady el-Areesh into the Mediterranean. (3) Accepting 'Ayn Qadees as the site of Kadesh-barnea, secures, also, the identification tions of the people after they were taught the law by Ezra (Neh. 9:4, 5), signed the covenant (10:9), B. C. 445. He is thought to have been a son of No. 1.

KAD'MONITES (Heb. קַדְמוֹנִיִּים, hak-kad-mo-nee', the Kadmonite), a tribe mentioned only in Gen. 15:19 as one of the nations to be dispossessed by Israel. As an adjective the name means "eastern," or "ancient." Quite probably, therefore, the Kadmonites were "Bene-Kedem" (Heb. בְּנֵי־קֶדֶם, Judg. 6:33, A. V. "children of the East"), i. e., "tribes who roved in the great waste tracts on the east and southeast of Palestine." Bochart connected the name with that of Cadmus, and identified them with the HIVITES (q. v.), whose place they fill in the list.—W. H.

KAL'LAI (Heb. קַלְלַי, kal-lak'ee, frivolous), son of Sallai, and a chief priest in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:20, B. C. after 536).

KANAH (Heb. קַנְהָה, kaw-naw', reediness).

1. A stream which empties into the Mediterranean between Caesarea and Joppa, after serving as a boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:8; 17:19). It is identified by some as the river Aujeh.

2. A town in the north of Asher (Josh. 19:28). It possesses colossal ruins and figures of persons, which cuttings are supposed to be of Phœnician origin.

KAR'AH (Heb. קָרַח, kaw-ray'-akh, bald), the father of Johanan and Jonathan, Jewish princes in the time of Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor of Jerusalem (Jer. 40:8, sq.; 41:11, sq.; 42:1, 8; 43:2, 4, 5). Elsewhere called CAREAH (q. v.).

KAR'KAA (Heb. קַרְקַע, kar-kah', ground floor), a place named in the description of Judah's lot, and between the Mediterranean and the Dead Seas (Josh. 15:3). It has not been identified.

KAR'KOR (Heb. קַרְקֹר, kar-kore', foundation), a place east of the Jordan where Gideon's three hundred men, "faint yet pursuing," captured Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. 8:10). Its location cannot be determined with accuracy.

KAR'TAH (Heb. קַרְתָּה, kar-taw', city), a town in the tribe of Zebulun, assigned (Josh. 21:34) to the Levites of the family of Merari.

KAR'TAN (Heb. קַרְתָּן, kar-tawm', double city), one of the cities of refuge in Naphtali, belonging to the Gershonite Levites, not far from the Sea of Galilee (Josh. 21:32; Kirjathaim, 1 Chron. 6:76), the same as the present el-Katanah.

KAT'TATH (Heb. קַתְתֹּחַ, kat-tanoh', littleness), one of the towns of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15), probably the same as Kitron (Judg. 1:30).

KE'DAR (Heb. קֵדָר, kay-dawr', dark skinned).

1. The second son of Ishmael, and father of the tribe bearing his name (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29), B. C. about 2133. Of Kedar little is known, but his posterity are frequently mentioned (see 2).

2. Kedar, in the stricter sense, was a nomadic tribe of Ishmaelites, which wandered as far as the Elnitic gulf; but it is usually used in Scripture as the collective name of the Arabic tribes (Bedouins) generally (Cant. 1:5; Isa. 21:16, 17; 42:11; 60:7; Jer. 2:10; 49:28; Ezek. 27:21). In Psa. 120:5 Kedar and Meshach are put for barbarous tribes.

KE'DEMAH (Heb. קֵדְמָה, kayd'-maw, eastward), the last named son of Ishmael, and probably head of an Arab tribe of the same name (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31).

KE'DEMOTH (Heb. קֵדְמוֹת, ked-ay-moth', beginnings), a city of Reuben, assigned with its suburbs ("villages") to the Levites of the Merari family (Josh. 13:18; 21:37; 1 Chron. 6:79). "Out of the wilderness of Kedemoth" Moses sent a deputation to Sihon, king of the Amorites, with a request to pass through his land (Deut. 2:26).

KE'DESH (Heb. קֵדֶשׁ, keh'-desh, sanctuary).

1. A city in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. 15:23), and probably the same as KADESH-BARNEA (q. v.).

2. A city in tribe of Issachar, given to the Levites of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. 6:72; called "Kishion," Josh. 19:20; "Kishon," 21:28).

3. A "fenced city" of Naphtali (Josh. 19:37), and one of the cities of refuge (Josh. 20:7). Its king was slain by Joshua (12:22). It was the residence of Barak (Judg. 4:6); was captured by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15:29), and was a well-known place after the captivity (1 Macc. 11:61, sq.). It is now an insignificant village, still bearing the ancient name, to the northwest of the lake of Huleh.

KE'DESH NAPH'TALI (Judg. 4:6). See KEDESH, 3.

KEHEL'ATHAH (Heb. קְהֵל־אֶתָּה, keh-hay-law'-thaw, convocation), one of the stations (twenty-third) of the children of Israel in the desert (Num. 33:22, 23).

KEI'LAH (Heb. קַיִלָּה, keh-ee-law', inclosed, a citadel), a city in the plains of Judah, which David once relieved from a siege by the Philistines, but its inhabitants were false and sought to deliver him up to Saul (1 Sam. 23:1-13; Neh. 3:17). "The site is satisfactorily identified with Khurbet Kila, a ruined village seven miles from Beit Jibrin; it is near Harith, and on the low ground, which accounts for the expression 'go down,' and it was a key to the hill country, and had fertile corn lands about it" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 225). In the time of Nehemiah Keilah was so considerable a city as to have two prefects, who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17, 18).

KELATAH (Heb. קַלְיָה, kay-law-yaw', insignificance), one of the Levites who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:23, A. V. "the same is Kelita").

KEL'TA (Heb. קְלֵי־טָוֹ, kel-ee-taw', maiming, dwarf), one of the Levites who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:23); assisted Ezra to expound the law (Neh. 8:7); and signed the covenant made by Nehemiah (10:10), B. C. 456.

KEM'UEL, or KEM'UEL (Heb. קְמוּאֵל, kem-oo-ale', assembly of God).

1. One of the sons of Abraham's brother Nahor (Gen. 22:21), and father of Bethuel (Gen. 24:16), B. C. about 2300.

2. The son of Shiptan, and commissioner to represent Ephraim in the partition of the land of Canaan (Num. 34:24), B. C. 1170.

3. The father of Hashabiah, who was ruler of the Levites in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:17), B. C. about 1000.

KE'NAN (1 Chron. 1:2). See CAINAN.

KE'NATH (Heb. קֵנַת, ken-awth', possession), a city in Gilead which, with its "villages," was taken from the Canaanites by Nobah, and afterward called by his name (Num. 32:42). It is mentioned (1 Chron. 2:22, 23), apparently as taken by Jair. Kenath is "now Kūnawāt, a ruined town east of Bashan, on the west side of the Hauran Mountains. It overlooks a vast region, and is surrounded by a cluster of cities, all within a distance of from half an hour to two hours from it. . . . The number of ruined buildings of all kinds is very considerable" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 368).

KE'NAZ (Heb. קֵנַז, ken-az', a hunter).

1. One of the sons of Eliphaz, the first-born of Esau. He became chief of one of the Edomitic tribes of Arabia Petrea (Gen. 36:11, 15; 1 Chron. 1:36). In Gen. 36:42; 1 Chron. 1:53, we have, according to Keil and Delitzsch (Com., in loc.), a list, not of persons, but of capital cities of the several kingdoms.

2. A brother of Caleb, and father of Othniel, who took Kirjath-sepher and received Caleb's daughter Achsah as a prize (Josh. 15:17; Judg. 1:13; 3:9, 11; 1 Chron. 4:13), B. C. about 1210-1162.

3. The son of Elah, and grandson of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:15).

KENEZITE, KEN'IZZITE (alike in the Hebrew קִנְזִי, hak-ken-iz-zee). The Kenizzites are mentioned only in Gen. 15:19, where they are named between the Kenites and the Kadmonites among the nations to be dispossessed by Israel. They probably dwelt somewhere in the southern part of Canaan. In Gen. 36:11, 15 Kenaz is son of Eliphaz, the son of Osan; and in Gen. 36:42 Kenaz appears among the dukes of Edom. This might lead us to think that the Kenizzites were an Edomite tribe, if they had not been mentioned so long before. The case is similar to that of AMALEK (q. v.); but the occurrence of the name Kenaz in vers. 15, 42 makes it appear that Kenaz may have been a more common name than Amalek. In Num. 32:12; Jos. 14:6, 14, the same Hebrew (A. V. "Kenezite," R. V. "Kenizite") is an epithet of Caleb or of Jephunneh in the phrase, "Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite" (Kenizite). It is quite probable that Caleb was descended from the Edomite Kenaz. This is argued from Josh. 15:13, "Unto Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, he gave a part among the children of Judah," and 14:14, "Hebron became the inheritance of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, the Kenezite unto this day, because that he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel." The same is indicated by Edomite and Horite names in the genealogy of Caleb. Thus, besides Kenaz (Gen. 36:11, 15), we find Shobal (comp. 1 Chron. 2:52 with Gen. 36:20); Manahethites (1 Chron. 2:52; comp. Manahath, Gen. 36:23); Korah (Gen. 36:14, 16, 18, with 1 Chron. 2:43); the Ithrites (1 Chron. 2:53, comp. Ithran, Gen. 36:26); Elah (2 Chron. 4:15, comp. Gen. 36:41); and Jephunneh has been compared with Pinon (Gen. 36:41).—W. H.

KENITE (Heb. קִנִּי, kay-nee), a tribe of people originally dwelling in the rocky and desert region lying between southern Palestine and Sinai. Their origin is unknown. Their territory was part of that promised by God to Abraham (Gen. 15:19). According to Judges (1:16; 4:11, 17) Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite. "His being called a Midianite (Num. 10:29) does not prove that he was descended from Midian (Gen. 25:2), but is to be accounted for from the fact that he dwelt in the land of Midian" (K. and D., Com.). This branch of the Kenites went with the Israelites to Canaan "into the wilderness of Judah" (Judg. 1:16), and dwelt even in Saul's time among the Amalekites on the southern border of Judah (1 Sam. 15:6); while their cities in Judah are mentioned (30:29). One family of the tribe separated from their brethren in the south, and migrating north, settled upon the grassy plains of Kadesh Naphtali (Judg. 4:11). Their name and descent are included in the genealogies of the great house of Judah (1 Chron. 2:55).

KEN'IZZITES (Gen. 15:19). See KENEZITE.
KENOSIS (Gr. κένωσις, ken'-ō-sis), a Greek word used in theology with reference to the self-abnegation of the Son of God in becoming incarnate, and entering upon his state of humiliation. This use of the term is based upon Phil. 2:7, where the phrase ἐαυτὸν ἐκένωσε occurs (rendered in the A. V. "made himself of no reputation," translated literally in the R. V. "emptied himself"). The same idea of self-deprivation, or the laying aside of something that Christ possessed as a divine person in his preexistent state, finds expression in other places in the Scriptures (e. g., John 17:5), where our Lord speaks of "the glory" which he had with the Father "before the world was," also (2 Cor. 8:9) where St. Paul says of Christ, "though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor."

The profound and difficult question naturally raised is, in what sense did the Son of God lay aside his divine riches in becoming the God-man: of what "glory" did he divest himself; what are we to understand by the kenosis, or "emptying of himself?" The question is inwoven with the mystery of the incarnation. It is a part of the mystery. And the inquiry soon leads to depths that are unfathomable, because of the incomprehensibility of God, and the inability of the human mind to conceive adequately the divine mode of existence. And yet, fidelity to the Scriptures, and the proper demands of the intellect, foster the attempt to penetrate the mystery as far as possible, even though the result may fall far short of the full solution.

A brief survey of the fluctuations of doctrine and conjecture upon this subject will be helpful. Historically, the question has presented many phases, among them these: Was the Son of God during his earthly sojourn in the flesh self-deprived in any measure of his divine attributes? If he still retained them fully in his possession, was their exercise or use for the time surrendered; and if so, to what extent, and under what regulating principles? Was the consciousness of our Lord simply human, the divine consciousness for the time non-existent, or awakening in him only gradually; or was his consciousness throughout that of the God-man?

The ancient Church, with but few exceptions, taught that the Son did not retain the divine glory for himself, for his own advantage, while yet he did not cease even in the flesh to be what he eternally was. "That emptying," said Hilary, "is by no means the annihilating of the heavenly nature." The theology of the Middle Ages so honored the divine nature of Christ as to overlook all limitations assumed in the union of that nature with the human. Thomas Aquinas admitted only an outward development in age and wisdom as in the sight of men.

The kenosis became the subject of much controversy between the theologians of Giessen and Tübingen early in the 17th century, the former (Menzer and Feurborn) maintaining that if Christ did not during his humiliation actually divest himself of his attributes, as omnipotence and omniscience, etc., he did lay aside their use; the latter (Haffenreffer, Thummus, Nicolai, Oriander) contending that the kenosis was only a concealment or veiling of their use. Later Thomasius (Person and Work of Christ) took the ground positively of self-abdication of the divine attributes on the part of Christ, assuming a sleeplike unconsciousness of the divine nature of the Son during our Lord's earthly life, and the exclusion of the Son from the Trinity during that period. Gess (Die Lehre von der Person Christi) Georg Ludw. Hahn (Theologie der N. T.) take substantially the same ground. This scanty outline is sufficient to show the perilous paths that are followed when the attempt is made to push speculation too far in this direction. Likewise it must be apparent that the conclusion reached should be such as not to deny the absolute unchangeableness of God, nor the constant completeness of the divine nature in the Son even in the days of his humiliation; while, on the other hand, the reality of his loving self-abasement in his entrance into fellowship with humanity should be duly recognized. And all reflection upon this subject, as upon many others, must be under the guidance, and within the limits, of Scripture teaching.

That the "Word made flesh" was truly God, as well as man, with divine nature and attributes undiminished, cannot be doubted by anyone who believes the first chapter of St. John's gospel, to say nothing of the force of other Scriptures.

Whether the consciousness of his divine nature was from the very outset possessed by our Lord is a matter upon which the Scriptures are silent. St. Luke, however, furnishes a glimpse that is suggestive when the child Christ says, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" (Luke 2:49, 50) And certain it is that he clearly expresses this consciousness during the years of his ministry (e. g., John 14:9-11; 8:58; 10:30; 17:25).

As to the divine attributes in Christ, the distinction seems valid between their full possession and their constant exercise. That he constantly possessed the attributes of deity is inseparable from faith in his divine, and, therefore, unchangeable nature. And yet the use of these same properties appears to have been in some way limited. This must be manifest to anyone who attentively reads the gospels. And the law of this limitation is found in the love and self-sacrifice which led our Lord to the complete acceptance of his human and earthly lot. He who "emptied himself" "took upon him the form of a servant." The two expressions are mutually explanatory. Thus He who was "in the form of God" and "thought it not robbery to be equal with God," placed himself in relation to the Father in the lowly position of a servant (John 5:30; 4:34; 17:4, 18; 14:28; Matt. 26:39); he was also the servant of mankind (Matt. 20:28; Luke 22:26, 27); he never wrought miracles for himself, but often did so for others (comp. Matt. 4:3, 4; 14:15-21; 15:32-39); he admitted and asserted a limitation to his knowledge with respect to one matter, but mani-festated and declared himself to be possessed of divine knowledge with respect to other matters, and even the highest. And here the fullness of his knowledge was always at the service of his love (comp. Mark 13:32; Matt. 11:27; John 3:12, 13; 17:25, 26). He neither exercises his omnipotence nor exhibits his omniscience for his own advantage and glory, but for the performance of his saving work among men.

Two other expressions in the same passage (Phil. 2:5-8) throw light upon the kenosis. Before the kenosis Christ was "in the form of God;" afterward he was "made in the likeness of men," "formed in fashion as a man." Here the contrast is between the manifestations of being and character which naturally belonged to the Son of God, and the veiling of the divine glory which came to pass when he became incarnate. What the "form of God" was which the Son laid aside, the apostle does not tell us; but evidently it was such manifestation of the divine being as was befitting to him who "deemed it not a prize to be on an equality with God." St. Paul elsewhere writes that God "dwelleth in light which no man can approach unto" (1 Tim. 6:16). In strongest contrast with this was all the outward appearance of the earthly life of our Lord. He left the companionship of angels for that of men. The angels are the servants of God. Though on special occasions they were sent to minister to him (Matt. 3:11; Luke 22:43), Christ never called for them (see Matt. 27:53).

Two features of the incarnate life of the Son of God are emphasized by St. Paul for ethical purposes in connection with the kenosis. First, self-sacrificing love (Phil. 2:3-5). Second, obedience (Phil. 2:8, 12, 13). The sequence, the exaltation of Christ (vers. 9-11) has the gloriously hopeful suggestion and promise for all his followers. See INCARNATION; HUMILIATION OF CHRIST.

KERCHIEF (Ezek. 13:18, 21), where only in the Scriptures it is spoken of by that name. There it is mentioned as an article of apparel or ornament applied to the head by the idolatrous women of Israel. The passage contains a twofold charge against the idolatrous women of Israel: "Woe to the women that sew pillows to all armholes, and make kerchiefs upon the head of every stature, to hunt souls!" The words of both clauses are figurative and have elicited many explanations, of which that given by Kliefoth seems the most probable: "A double charge is brought against the prophetesses. In the first place, they sew coverings together to wrap round all the joints of God, so that he cannot touch them; i. e., they cover up and conceal the word of God by their prophesying, more especially its rebuking and threatening force, so that the threatening and judicial arm of God, which ought above all to become both manifest and effective through his prophetic word, does not become either one or the other. In the second place, they make coverings upon the heads of men, and construct them in such a form that they exactly fit the stature or size of every individual, so that the men neither hear nor see; i. e., by means of their flattering lies, which adapt themselves to the subjective inclinations of their hearers at the time, they cover up the senses of the men, so that they retain neither ear nor eye for the truth." "The Eastern women bind on their other ornaments with a rich embroidered handkerchief, which is described by some travelers as completing the head-dress and falling, without order, upon the hair behind. This would be a not unapt decoration for the purpose in question" (McC and S., Cyc.). See GLOSSARY.

KER'EN-HAP'PUCH (Heb. קֶרֶן הַפּוּחַ, keh'-ren hap-pook', paint-horn, i. e., cosmetic box), the name given to the youngest daughter of Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42:14).

KE'RIOTH (Heb. קֶרְיֹוֹת, ker-ee-yoth', buildings).

1. A city of southern Judah, and probably included within Simeon (Josh. 15:25). It seems to be the place alluded to in the name of Judas Iscariot, a native of Kerioth. It has been identified with the ruins el-Kureitein, about ten miles S. from Hebron.

2. A city of Moab mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. 48:24, 41) and Amos (2:2, A. V. "Kiriath") in their prophecies of its overthrow by the Babylonians.

KERNEL (Heb. קֶרֶן, kar-tan', sharp), supposed by the Talmudists to mean the grape stones, as opposed to the skin ("husk," Num. 6:4). The ancient versions refer it to the sour or unripe grapes themselves.

KE'ROS (Heb. קֶרֶס or קֶרֶס, kay-roce', curved), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem after the captivity (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47), B. C. before 536.

KETTLE (Heb. כִּדְיָה, dood, boiling), a large pot for cooking (1 Sam. 2:14; elsewhere rendered "pot," Psa. 81:6; Job 41:20; "caldron," 2 Chron. 35:13). From 1 Sam. 2:14, it is evident that this vessel was used in preparing the peace offerings, as it is said: "All that the flesh hook brought up the priest took for himself."

KETU'RAH (Heb. קֶטוּרָה, ket-oo-raw', incense), the second wife (or concubine, 1 Chron. 1:32) of Abraham (Gen. 25:1, 4). By Abraham she had six sons, who, after they grew to manhood, were established "in the east country," that they might not interfere with Isaac. It is generally supposed that she was married to Abraham after the death of Sarah; but against this it is urged that it is very improbable that six sons should have been born to Abraham by one woman, and that, too, after he was one hundred and forty years old, and that he should have lived to see them arrive at adult age. It has therefore been suggested that Keturah had been Abraham's secondary or concubine wife before the death of Sarah, and that she was raised to the dignity of a full wife after that event. Through the offspring of Keturah Abraham became the "father of many nations."

KEY. As an instrument for fastening, see Lock.

Figurative. Because of its power to open to, or exclude from, all treasures of a city or house, the key is often used in Scripture as a symbol of power and authority, whether in Church or State. Thus Isaiah speaks (22:22) of the key of David being given to Eliakim, as the most influential adviser of the king. The power of the keys consisted not only in the supervision of the royal chambers, but also in deciding who was and who was not to be received into the king's service.

With reference to the administration of the house of David in the higher sense, our Lord is represented as having the key of David (Rev. 3:7), receiving and excluding whom he pleases, and committing to his apostles—to Peter first as the most prominent member of the apostolic body—the keys of the kingdom (Matt. 16:19; 18:18). See PETER.

"The key of knowledge" (Luke 11:52) of spiritual things is the Scriptures, which the Scribes reserved exclusively to themselves. The figure used by our Lord is that of knowledge being a temple, into which the Scribes should have led the people, but whose gate they closed and held the key with jealous care, even their commentaries hiding rather than revealing knowledge.

KEZI'A (Heb. קֶצִיָּה, kets-ee-aw', casnia), Job's second daughter, born to him after his adversity (Job 42:14).

KE'ZIZ (Heb. קֶצִיץ, kets-ects', abrupt), a city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:21, A. V. "Valley of Keziz"), the name of which is still preserved in the Wady el Kaziz, on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, southeast of the Apostles' Well.

KHAN, the more common Arabic name for the establishments which correspond to our inn (q. v.).

KIB'ROTH-HATTA'AVAH (Heb. קִבְרוֹת הַתְּאֵבָה, kib-roth' hat-tah-av-aw', graves of the longing), one of the stations of the Israelites, probably in Wady Murrah, about thirty miles N. E. of Sinai. It was the scene of murmuring and discontent, followed by most severe punishment (Num. 11:34, 35; 33:16, 17; Deut. 9:22; Psa. 78:30, 31). Perhaps the same as Taherah.

Ancient Prison Key.

KIB'ZAIM (Heb. קִבְצַיִם, kib-tsak'-yim, a double heap), a city of Ephraim, assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:22), called Jockmeam in 1 Chron. 6:68. Its site has not been discovered.

the purpose of separating from the blood certain materials which, when dissolved in a quantity of water, also separated from the blood, constitute the urine.

Gorge of the Kidron.

KID, the young of the goat. See ANIMAL KINGDOM; SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

KIDNEY (Heb. כִּלְיָה, kil-yaw'; Gr. νεφρός, nef-ros). The kidneys, two in number, are situated in the back part of the abdomen, one on each side of the vertebral column, and surrounded by a mass of fat and areolar tissue. They are for

1. The kidney with its surrounding fat was part of the burnt offering (Exod. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9; 8:16, 25, etc.). See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

2. The Hebrew word is sometimes applied to kernels of grain, from their kidneylike shape (Deut. 32:4).

3. Figurative. When the kidney is used figuratively, it is rendered in the A. V. "reins." In the ancient system of physiology the kidneys, from their sensitiveness, were believed to be the seat of desire; and the Scripture brings the tenderest and most inward experience of a manifold kind into association with them.

"When man is suffering most deeply within he is pricked in his kidneys (reins, Psa. 73:21). When fretting affliction overcomes him, his kidneys are cloven asunder (Job 16:13; comp. Lam. 3:13); when he rejoices profoundly, they exult (Prov. 23:16); when he feels himself very penetratingly warned, they chasten him (Psa. 16:7); when he very earnestly longs, they are consumed away within his body (Job 19:27); when he rages inwardly, they shake (1 Macc. 2:24). . . . God is frequently called (Psa. 7:19 to the Apocalypse) the Trier of the heart and reins; and of the ungodly it is said that God is far from their reins (Jer. 12:2), i. e., that he, being withdrawn back into himself, allows not himself to be perceived by them" (Delitzsch, Psychology, p. 317).

"The inward parts" (Heb. קִלְכֹלֹת, too-khoh't, Psa. 51:6; Job 38:36), are, without doubt, the kidneys; and Dr. Delitzsch (Psych., p. 317) thus disposes of these passages: "In the latter passage, which I translate, 'Who hath placed in the reins wisdom, and given to the cock (Heb. טֵבֵי, sek-vee'), insight?' the kidneys are regarded as the organ of the faculty of foreboding, as the cock is considered as a weather prognosticator."

KID'RON (Heb. קִדְרוֹן, kid-rone', dusky, gloomy; Gr. Kedrw̄n, ked-rone', John 18:1, A. V. "Cedron"), the brook or wintry torrent which flows through the Valley of Jehoshaphat. The name was also applied to its bed, the valley of Kidron. It is thus described by Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 511): "To the north of Jerusalem begins the torrent-bed of the Kidron. It sweeps past the Temple Mount, past what were afterward Calvary and Gethsemane. It leaves the Mount of Olives and Bethany to the left, Bethlehem far to the right. It plunges down among the bare terraces, precipices, and crags of the wilderness of Judea—the wilderness of the scapegoat. So barren and blistered, so furnacelike does it [the valley] become as it drops below the level of the sea, that it takes the name of Wady-en-Nar or the Fire Wady. At last its dreary course brings it to the precipices above the Dead Sea, into which it shoots its scanty winter waters; but all summer it is dry." The valley is only twenty miles long, but with a descent of three thousand nine hundred and twelve feet. The place where it enters the Jordan is a narrow gorge about twelve hundred feet deep. "Recent excavations have brought to light the fact that the true bed of the Kidron is about forty feet lower than its present bed, and about seventy feet nearer the sanctuary wall."

Kidron is the brook crossed by David when fleeing from Absalom (2 Sam. 15:23, 30); Solomon fixed upon it as the limit of Shimei's walks (1 Kings 2:37); beside it Asa destroyed and burned his mother's idol of Asherah (1 Kings 15:13); here Athaliah was executed (Josephus, Ant., ix, 7, 3;

2 Kings 11:16). It then became the regular receptacle for the impurities and abominations of the idol worship, when removed from the temple and destroyed by the adherents of Jehovah (2 Kings 23:4, 6, 12; 2 Chron. 29:16; 30:14); and in the time of Josiah this valley was the common cemetery of Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:6; Jer. 26:23; 31:40).

KIN. See KINDRED.

KIN'AH (Heb. קִינָה, kee-naw', a dirge), a city in the extreme south of Judah toward Edom (Josh. 15:22). "The true position of Kinah can only be conjecturally located as not far from the Dead Sea, possibly in Wady Fikreh."

KINDNESS and LOVING-KINDNESS

(Heb. חֶסֶד, kheh'-sed, desire, zeal), zeal toward another in a good sense: (1) Of men, as shown in doing mutual favors, benefits (Gen. 21:23; 2 Sam. 10:2); compassion for the afflicted (Job 6:14, A. V. "pity"). The formula "to do" or "show kindness" is very frequent in Scripture (2 Sam. 3:8; 9:1, 7), and in 2 Sam. 9:3, there is the expression "that I may show the kindness of God unto him," i. e., "like that of God," or "for the sake of God." (2) Of God toward men, as shown in mercies, benefits, etc. (Psa. 31:21; 107:43; 117:2, etc.). Kindness is also the rendering of the Gr. χρηστότης, khroy-stol'-ace, moral goodness, and so benignity (Rom. 2:4; Gal. 5:22, A. V. "goodness"; 2 Cor. 6:6; Eph. 2:7; Col. 3:12).

KINDRED is the rendering in the A. V. of the following Hebrew and Greek terms:

1. Mish-paw-khau' (Heb. מִשְׁפָּחָה, usually rendered "family"). This word corresponds to our word clan, and is used of the different tribes of Canaanites (Gen. 10:18); a subdivision of the Israelites (Exod. 6:14; Num. 1:20, etc.), and figuratively for a nation (Jer. 5:9; 8:3; 25:9; 20:32; Mic. 2:3), and is rendered kindred (Gen. 24:41; Josh. 6:23; Ruth 2:3; Job 32:2), in all of which it refers to relationship, to consanguinity, more or less remote.

2. Mo-leh'-deth (Heb. מוֹלֶדֶת, lineage, nativity), hence a person born, a child (Gen. 28:9; Lev. 18:9, 11); persons of the same family or lineage (Gen. 12:1; 24:4; 31:3; 43:7; Num. 10:30; Esth. 2:10; 8:6). In some of these instances the relation is only that of common nationality.

3. Mo-dah'ath (Heb. מוֹדַעִית, acquaintance, Ruth 3:2), is used to express blood relationship.

4. Gheh-ool-law' (Heb. גְּוֵלוֹת, redemption). This term is applied to one who is so related as to possess the rights and obligations of a kinsman, avenger (q. v.). It is generally used to denote either the thing redeemed (Ruth 4:6; Lev. 25:29, etc.), or the redemption price (Lev. 25:26, etc.). It is rendered kindred in the A. V. only in Ezek. 11:15.

5. Awkh (Heb. אָח, brother). This term occurs as kindred in the A. V. only in 1 Chron. 12:29, but occurs frequently elsewhere in a wide sense, including all collateral relationships, whether by consanguinity, affinity, or simple relationship. From this term comes brotherhood. The Hebrews also expressed consanguinity by such words and phrases as flesh (Gen. 37:27; Isa. 58:7); bone and flesh (Gen. 29:14; Judg. 9:2; 2 Sam. 5:1, etc.); flesh of his flesh (A. V. "near of kin," Lev. 18:6; "nigh of kin," 25:49).

6. In the New Testament the following Greek words are rendered kindred: ghen'-os (γένος), the most general and frequent term, our kin, i. e., blood-relationship; its derivative, soong ghen'-i-ah (συγγένεια), co-relationship; pat-ree'-ah (πατρία) (Acts 3:25), descent in a direct line (Luke 2:4, "lineage"; Eph. 3:15, "family"); foo-lay' (φυλή), offshoot, a tribe (Rev. 5:9; 7:9; 11:9; 13:7, etc.), a tribe. Of the special names denoting relation by consanguinity, the principal will be found explained under their proper heads, FATHER, BROTHER, etc. It will be there seen that the words which denote near relation in the direct line are used also for the other superior or inferior degrees in that line, as grandfather, grandson, etc. The words which express collateral consanguinity are: 1. Uncle; 2. Aunt; 3. Nephew; 4. Niece (not in A. V.); 5. Cousin. The terms of affinity are: 1. (a) Father-in-law, (b) Mother-in-law; 2. (a) Son-in-law, (b) Daughter-in-law; 3. (a) Brother-in-law, (b) Sister-in-law. The domestic and economical questions arising out of kindred may be classed under the heads of FAMILY, MARRIAGE, INHERITANCE, and BLOOD REVENGE.

KINE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. Kine is used figuratively: Of proud and wealthy rulers (Amos 4:1); well favored, of years of plenty (Gen. 41:2, 26, 29); lean, of years of scarcity (41:3, 27, 30). See GLOSSARY.

KING (Heb. and Chald. מֶלֶךְ, melek, ruler; Gr. βασιλεύς, bas-il-yooce').

1. General Use of Term. This term is used with considerable latitude in Scripture, and is often applied where some inferior epithet would correspond better with modern ideas. Thus, when we read of the king of Sodom, of Gomorrah, of Admah, of Zeboim (Gen. 14:2)—all towns lying within a very limited distance—it is manifest that we must understand the term king in the sense of a local ruler. This, and many similar notices, shows a prevailing tendency in early times toward monarchical government. Whenever the people of a district settled down and formed themselves into a regular community it was under the presidency of a regal head. Not in Egypt alone, but in Salem, in Gerar, in all the little towns to which the patriarchs came, a king invariably appears on the scene. Thus, in so small a country as Canaan thirty-one kings were conquered by Joshua (Josh. 12:9, 24); while Adonibezek speaks of having subdued seventy (Judg. 1:7).

2. Hebrew Use of Term. Among the Israelites king was the title applied to the supreme head of the nation from about B. C. 1030-586. (1) Occasion. The immediate occasion for the substitution of a regal form of government for that of the judges (q. v.) seems to have been the siege of Jabesh-gilead by Nahash, king of the Ammonites (1 Sam. ch. 11; 12:12), and the refusal to allow the inhabitants of that town to capitulate, except on humiliating and cruel conditions (11:2, 4-6). The Israelites seem to have been convinced that they could not succeed against their formidable enemies unless, like other nations, they placed themselves under the rule of a king. Probably another influencing cause was the disgust excited by the corrupt administration of affairs by the sons of Samuel and the desire for a radical change (8:3-5). Accordingly, the original idea of a Hebrew king was twofold: First, that he should lead the people to battle in time of war; and, secondly, that he should execute judgment and justice to them in war and in peace (8:20). (2) Powers. Besides being commander in chief of the army, supreme judge and absolute master of the lives of his subjects, the king exercised the power of imposing taxes upon them, and of exacting from them personal service and labor. The degree to which the exaction of personal labor might be carried on a special occasion is illustrated by King Solomon's requirements for building the temple. The king of Israel had also another claim to respect and obedience, as the vicegerent of Jehovah (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:13), and, as it were, his son, if just and holy (2 Sam. 7:14; Psa. 89:26, 27; 2:6, 7). Set apart as a consecrated ruler, and anointed with the holy oil (Exod. 30:33; 1 Kings 1:39), he became "the Lord's Anointed." (3) Court. A ruler who had so much authority, human and divine, was naturally distinguished by outward honors and luxuries. Thus, gradually, he came to have a court of oriental magnificence. When the kingdom was at its height he sat on a throne of ivory, covered with pure gold, at the feet of which were two figures of lions; and was dressed in royal robes (1 Kings 22:10; 2 Chron. 18:9); his insignia were a golden crown, perhaps radiant with gems (2 Sam. 1:10; 12:30; 2 Kings 11:12; Psa. 21:3), and a royal scepter. He was treated with the utmost consideration, those who approached him bowing to the ground (1 Sam. 24:3; 2 Sam. 19:24). He had a more or less extensive harem, guarded by eunuchs (1 Sam. 8:15; 2 Kings 24:12, 15, etc.). (4) Succession. The law of succession to the throne is somewhat obscure, but it seems most probable that the king during his lifetime named his successor. This was certainly the case with David (1 Kings 1:30; 2:22) and with Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:21, 22). At the same time, if no partiality for a favorite wife or son intervened, there would always be a natural bias of affection in favor of the eldest son. (5) Officers. The recorder, or chronicler, whose duty it was to write the annals of the king's reign; the scribe, or secretary (2 Sam. 8:17; 20:25; 2 Kings 12:10, etc.); chief steward, or officer "over the house" (Isa. 22:15; 36:3); the king's friend (1 Kings 4:6) or companion; the keeper of the wardrobe (2 Kings 10:22); the captain of the bodyguard (2 Sam. 20:23); officers over the king's treasure, his storehouses, laborers, vineyards, olive trees, sycamore trees, camels, and flocks (1 Chron. 27:25-31); the commander in chief of the army (2 Sam. 11:1; 20:23; 1 Chron. 27:34); the royal counselors (1 Chron. 27:32; Isa. 3:3; 19:11, 13). (6) Revenues: the following sources are mentioned. The royal demesnes, cornfields, vineyards, and olive gardens; the produce of the royal flocks (1 Sam. 21:7; 2 Sam. 13:23; 2 Chron. 26:10; 1 Chron. 27:25); a nominal tenth of the product of corn lands and vineyards and of sheep (1 Sam. 8:15, 17); a tribute from merchants who passed through the Hebrew territory (1 Kings 10:14); presents made by his subjects (1 Sam. 10:27; 16:20; 1 Kings 10:25; Psa. 72:10); in the time of Solomon the king had trading vessels of his own at sea (1 Kings 10:22). It is probable that Solomon and some other kings may have derived some revenues from commercial ventures (1 Kings 9:28); the spoils of war taken from conquered nations and the tribute paid by them (2 Sam. 8:2, 7, 8, 10; 1 Kings 4:21; 2 Chron. 27:5); lastly, an undefined power of exacting compulsory labor, to which reference has been already made (1 Sam. 8:12, 13, 16).

3. New Testament Use of Term. Owing to the peculiar political relations of the Jews the title "king" has very different significations: The Roman emperor (1 Pet. 2:13, 17); and so the "seven kings" (Rev. 17:10) are thought to be the first seven Cæsars; Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:9; Mark 6:22), although he was only tetrarch (comp. Luke 3:19); the ten provincial representatives of the Roman government (Rev. 17:12), as being supreme each in his own jurisdiction.

4. Figurative. "King" is used symbolically to signify the possessor of supreme power (Prov. 8:15, 16); it is applied to God, as the sole proper sovereign and ruler of the universe (1 Tim. 1:17); to Christ as the sole head and governor of his Church (1 Tim. 6:15, 16; Matt. 27:11; Luke 19:38; John 1:49; 18:33, 37); to men, as invested with regal authority by their fellows (Luke 22:25; 1 Tim. 2:1, 2, etc.). The people of God are called kings and priests (Rev. 1:6; comp. Psa. 49:14; Dan. 7:22, 27; Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:29, 30; 1 Cor. 6:2, 3, etc.); Death, the "king of terrors" (Job 18:14); the "leviathan" (q. v.), "a king over all the children of pride" (Job 41:34). See HISTORY, OLD TESTAMENT; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

KINGDOM OF CHRIST, KINGDOM OF GOD, KINGDOM OF HEAVEN are terms which in the free and popular language of the Bible are often used synonymously, but for the proper understanding of which it is, nevertheless, necessary to observe the following distinctions:

1. God is the absolute and eternal sovereign of the universe. His rulership over the earth and mankind is but a part of his universal dominion (see, for example, Psa. 108:19-22; Rev. 4:11). Sovereignty in this sense belongs to Christ as a divine person (comp. Psa. 45:6; Heb. 1:8).

2. The Scriptures also represent Christ as king in the particular and more restricted sense of being the King of Saints. He is the head of his Church. In this sense his kingdom admits of increase; and though it has its beginning in time it is everlasting (see Luke 1:32, 33; Eph. 1:22, 23; Col. 1:18; Rev. 15:3).

3. God has set up by Jesus Christ the special economy of the mediatorial kingdom, the clearly revealed purpose of which is to exercise the gracious rulership of God over the sinful world of mankind, and to accomplish the great end of salvation. It is to this kingdom that the Scriptures, and especially those of the New Testament, most frequently refer. This kingdom has had its beginning; it has its progressive development; it will come to an end (see 1 Cor. 15:24-28).

It is called the kingdom of God because it originated in God as the Sovereign of the universe. It is the kingdom of Christ, because to him as the God-man, the Redeemer of mankind, has been committed the headship of this kingdom. It is the kingdom of heaven because of its origin, its character and its aims.

The theocracy of the Old Dispensation, also the prophecies of the Old Testament, were in anticipation of the kingdom which was declared to be "at hand" when Christ entered upon his ministry (Psa. 2:6-12; Isa. 32:1-3; 33:17, 27; Jer. 46:18; Matt. 3:2; 4:17; 10:7). This kingdom was the central and all-pervading theme of Christ's teaching (Matt. 12:28; Mark 1:14; Luke 4:43, and many other places). The redemption wrought by Christ, the salvation freely offered through him, are the great distinguishing features of this kingdom. Hence the Gospel is called the "Gospel of the Kingdom" (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 24:14). The prayer, "Thy kingdom come," is not only for the increasing effect of the Gospel, but for the complete realization of the power of Christ in the world. This kingdom will end triumphantly with the final coming of our Lord and the final judgment. See JUDGMENT, FINAL; CHRIST, KINGLY OFFICE OF; MESSIAH.

KINSFOLK, KINSMAN, KINSWOMAN, the rendering of several Hebrew words and one Greek word, viz.: Sheh-ayr' (שֶׁהַאֵיִר), Num. 27:11; "kinswoman," Lev. 18:12, 13; "kinswomen," 18:17). Mo-dah' (מוֹדָה), "kinswoman," Prov. 7:4). Kaw-robe' (קַוְרוֹב), literally, near, "kinsfolk," Job 19:14; "kinsmen," Psa. 38:11). Yaw-dah' (יָדָה), literally, to know, "kinsfolks," 2 Kings 10:11; "kinsman," Ruth 2:1). Soong-ghen-acc' (συγγενής, relative, "kinsfolk," Luke 2:44; 21:16; "kinsman," Luke 14:12; Acts 10:24; Rom. 9:3, etc.).

KINSMAN (Heb. קִנְיָא, go-ale', redeemer). This Hebrew term for kinsman is used to imply certain obligations arising out of that relationship, and has for its primary meaning coming to the help or rescue of one. The goale among the Hebrews was the nearest living male blood relation, and on him devolved certain duties to his next of kin.

1. Blood Avenger. The most striking office of the kinsman (goale) was that of blood avenger (q. v.). Although the word is peculiar to the Hebrew language, the institution which it represents is common to several branches of the Semites. "The unit of Semitic society is the clan, a body of persons united to one another by blood, a family on a somewhat enlarged scale. The members of the clan, closely bound by blood ties to one another, feel a mutual responsibility for one another. A wrong done to a single member is a crime against the entire clan. The obligation, therefore, rests upon the clan to punish the wrongdoer; and in the case of a murder committed it is a positive obligation to seek, not, indeed, vengeance, but vengeance. The blood of the murdered man cries up from the ground, and the cry is heard loudest by that member of the clan who stands nearest to the dead. The crime consists in the spilling of the blood—its waste, rather than in the extinction of life. The son is enjoined to avenge the blood of his father, the brother is obliged to punish a crime committed against his sister. 'Lynch law' is the most primitive form of justice; and goale is the 'avenger,' legitimately constituted as such, and recognized by the verdict of ancient Semitic society." If the killing was accidental the goale had no claim, unless the slayer left the city of refuge before the death of the high priest in whose reign the crime was committed.

2. Redeemer. It was the duty of a kinsman (i. e., "redeemer") to redeem the paternal estate which his nearest relative might have sold through poverty (Lev. 25:25; Ruth 4:4), to ransom his kinsman who may have sold himself (Lev. 25:47, sq.), to act as go-between in case a person wished to make restitution to a relative. If there was no kinsman, then the compensation went to the priest, as representing Jehovah, the king of Israel (Num. 5:6, sq.). From Ruth (chaps 3, 4) it has been inferred that among the duties of kinsman (goale) was that of marrying the widow of a deceased kinsman's widow. But the Levirate law expressly limits the obligation to a brother. The nearest kinsman had the right to redeem the land, which, perhaps, involved the marrying the widow of the deceased owner, according to usage. See MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE; REDEEMER.

KIR (Heb. קִיר, keer, fortress), the place to which Tiglath-pileser led captive the people of Damascus (2 Kings 16:9), according to the prophecy of Amos (1:3-5), and from which at some time the Aramaeans emigrated to Syria (Amos 9:7). Delitzsch (Com., on Isa. 22:6) identifies the Kir in this passage with that mentioned in Kings and Amos. It seems to have been situated on the river Kur (Cyrus, Gr. Κίρως), which takes its rise in Armenia.

KIR OF MOAB (Heb. קִיר־מוֹאָב, keer-mo-avb'), one of the two strongly fortified cities of Moab (Isa. 15:1), the other being Ar. It is probably the same with KIR-HARASETH (q. v.).

KIR-HAR'ASETH (Heb. קִיר־הַרְשֵׁת, keer khar-eh'-seth, 2 Kings 3:25; "Kir-hareseth," Isa. 16:7; "Kir-haresh," 16:11; "Kir-heres," Jer. 48:31, 36; and Kir of Moab, Isa. 15:1), a strongly fortified city of Moab, which is now known as Kerak, and is distant from Jerusalem about fifty miles as the crow flies. Joram, king of Israel, took the city, and destroyed all but its walls (2 Kings 3:25). Meshah, its king, endeavored with seven hundred men to fight his way through the besiegers; but when this attempt failed, in his desperation, he took his firstborn son, who was to succeed him as king, and offered him as a sacrifice upon the wall. From the other passage cited it would appear to have been restored before Isaiah's time, and ravaged by the Babylonians.

KIR'TOTH (Amos 2:2). See KERIOTH.

KIR'JATH (Heb. קִרְיָת, keer-yath', city), a city belonging to Benjamin (Josh. 18:28). By some it is identified with Kirjath-jearim, but this is disputed.

KIRJATHA'IM (Heb. קִרְיַתַּיִם, keer-yau-thah'-yim, double city), or "Kiriathaim."

1. A city of refuge in Naphtali (1 Chron. 6:76); elsewhere (Josh. 21:32) called KARTAN (q. v.).

2. A very ancient town east of Jordan, from which the gigantic EMIM (q. v.) were expelled by the Moabites (Gen. 14:5, A. V. "Kiriathaim;" comp. Deut. 2:9, 10). It was next held by the Amorites, from whom it was taken by the Israelites, and assigned to Reuben (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:19). During the Assyrian exile the Moabites again took possession of this and other towns (Jer. 48:1; Ezek. 25:9, A. V. both "Kiriathaim"). Harper and others identified it with the ruins of El Kureiyât, between Madeba and Dibon.

KIR'JATH-AR'BA (Heb. קִרְיַת אַרְבָּע, keer-yath' ar-bal', city of Arbah), a city in the mountains of Judah, and named after Arba the Anakite (Gen. 23:2; Josh. 14:15; 15:54; 20:7; Judg. 1:10; Neh. 11:25), but better known as HEBRON (q. v.). "The place still exists as a small town on the road from Jerusalem to Beersheba, called by the Arabs el Khalil" (K. and D., Com., on Gen. 23:2).

KIR'JATH-A'RIM (Ezra 2:25). See KIRJATH-JEARIM.

KIR'JATH-BA'AL (Heb. קִרְיַת בַּעַל, keer-yath' bah'-al, city of Baal), another name (Josh. 15:60; 18:14) for KIRJATH-JEARIM (q. v.).

KIR'JATH-HU'ZOTH (Heb. קִרְיַת הַצֹּהֵר, keer-yath' khoo-tsoth', city of streets), a city of Moab, to which Balak took Balaam to offer up sacrifice (Num. 22:39). Balak undoubtedly expected through these offerings to propitiate Jehovah and secure his favor to the Moabites. It was near Bamoth-baal (v. 41).

KIR'JATH-JE'ARIM (Heb. קִרְיַת יְעָרִים, keer-yath' yeh-av-reem', city of forests; KIR'JATH-A'RIM, contracted form, קִרְיַת אֲרָיִים, keer-yath' av-reem'), a Gibeonite town (Josh. 9:17), first assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:60; Judg. 18:2), but afterward to Benjamin (Josh. 18:28). It was called Baalah (15:9) and Kirjath-baal (v. 60). "This must have lain somewhere about Mount Jearim, the rugged, wooded highlands which look down on the basin of Sorek from the north of the great defile. But the exact site is not known with certainty. Some think that it was the present Kuriet 'Enab to the north of Mount Jearim, and others Khurbet 'Erma to the south, near the mouth of the great defile. Each of these, it is claimed, echoes the ancient name; each suits the descriptions of Kirjath-jearim in the Old Testament. For the story of the ark Khurbet 'Erma has the advantage, lying close to Beth-shemesh, and yet in the hill country. Leaving the question of the exact site open, we must be satisfied with the knowledge that Kirjath-jearim lay on the western border of Benjamin; once the ark was set there; it was off the debatable ground of the Shephelah and within Israel's proper territory. Here in the field of the woods it rested till David brought it up to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:2, 3, 12; 1 Chron. 15:1-29; comp. Psa. 132), and that was probably why Kirjath-jearim was also called Kirjath-baal, or Baal of Judah, for in those times Baal was not a name of but "it is an evidence that libraries existed in Canaan at the time of Israel's invasion, and that the age of the Exodus was one of literature and books, of readers and writers."

KISH (Heb. קִישׁ, keesh, a bow or horn).

1. The father of King Saul (1 Sam. 9:3; 10:11, 21; 14:51; 1 Chron. 9:39; 12:1; 26:28). He was a wealthy Benjamite, the son of Ner (1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39), and grandson of Abiel, the "son" of (1 Sam. 9:1), being used in the general sense of male descendant. No incident respecting him is mentioned with the exception of his sending Saul after the lost asses (9:3), and that he was buried in Zelah (2 Sam. 21:14), B. C. about 1060. He is called Cis in Acts 13:21.

2. The third son of Jehiel (of Gibeon) and Maachah, a Benjamite of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36), B. C. about 1618.

Kirjath-jearim—Kuriet 'Enab.

reproach, but the title even of Jehovah as Lord and Preserver of his people's land" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 225).

KIR'JATH-SAN'NAH (Heb. קִרְיַת סֵפֶר, keer-yath' san-naw') and KIR'JATH-SE'PHER (Heb. קִרְיַת סֵפֶר, keer-yath' say'-fer, both meaning the city of books, or instruction), and called in later times DEBIR (q. v.), a Canaanitish royal city (Josh. 10:38), which fell to Judah (Josh. 15:48; comp. Judg. 1:11). It was situated in the mountains of Judah, was taken from the Canaanites by Joshua (10:38), retaken by Canaanites, and carried by storm by Othniel (15:15-17), and was later assigned to the priests (Josh. 21:15; 1 Chron. 6:58). "The name (Kirjath-sannah, or sepher) implies the character of the place; it must have been the seat of a library like those of the great cities of Babylonia and Assyria—a library which doubtless consisted in a large measure of books on clay that may yet be brought to light. It was also known as Debir, a word which is rendered 'the oracle' in the A. V. of 1 Kings 6:5. It was essentially 'a place of speaking,' wherein the oracles of the god were delivered to his priests. It was thus a fitting spot for the site of a great library" (Sayce, High. Crit., p. 54, sq.). Kirjath-sepher was overthrown and its library buried under its ruins, and, indeed, its very site forgotten;

3. The second son of Mahli (grandson of Levi). His sons married their cousins, the daughters of his brother Eleazar (1 Chron. 23:21, 22; 24:29), B. C. probably before 1210.

4. Another Levite, also of the family of Merari. He was the son of Abdi, and assisted Hezekiah in cleansing the temple (2 Chron. 29:12), B. C. 719.

5. A Benjamite, and great-grandfather of Mordecai (Esth. 2:5), B. C. considerably before 478.

KISH'T (1 Chron. 6:44). See KUSHATHAH.

KISH'ION (Heb. קִישְׁיוֹן, kish-yone', hard ground), a city of Issachar (Josh. 19:20), assigned to the Levites of the family of Gershon and for a city of refuge (21:28, A. V. "Kishon"). It is erroneously called Kedesh (1 Chron. 6:72).

KI'SHON (Heb. קִישׁוֹן, keesh-shone', winding), and "Kison," Psa. 83:9; also known as the "waters of Megiddo" (Judg. 5:19), a torrent or winter stream in Central Palestine. It rises in the hills about Tabor and Gilboa, and running in a northeast direction through the plains of Esdraelon and Acre, empties into the Mediterranean Sea at the foot of Mount Carmel. The two channels of the stream unite a few miles N. of Megiddo. "The channel of the united stream is here deep and miry, the ground for some distance on each side is low and marshy, and the fords during winter are always difficult, and often, after heavy rain, impassable; yet in summer, even here, the whole plain and river bed are dry and hard" (Robinson, ii, 364). Indeed, during the greater part of the year the stream is confined to a few miles next the sea. The modern name is Nahr el-Mokattah, i. e., "the river of slaughter" (comp. 1 Kings 18:40). In the song of Deborah (Judg. 5:21) it is spoken of as "that ancient river."

It was a little to the south of Kishon, viz., at Megiddo, that SISERA (q. v.) was defeated. While the battle raged a violent storm of wind and rain came (5:20, 21), and the plain became a marsh and the dry river bed a foaming torrent. This, of course, greatly interfered with the fighting of Siseras's cavalry and charioteers. Kishon was also the scene of the destruction of the prophets of Baal. Their slaughter doubtless took place near the foot of Carmel. "This spot is now fixed with all but certainty at the east end of the mountain, to which the name is still attached of El-Mahraka, 'the burning'" (McC. and S., Cyc.).

KI'SON (Psa. 83:9), another form of KISHON (q. v.).

KISS (Heb. נָשַׁק, nav-shak'; Gr. φίλημα, fil'-ay-mah). Kissing the lips by way of affectionate salutation was customary among near relatives of both sexes, both in patriarchal and in later times (Gen. 29:11; Cant. 8:1). Between individuals of the same sex, and in a limited degree between those of different sexes, the kiss on the cheek as a mark of respect or an act of salutation has at all times been customary in the East, and can hardly be said to be extinct even in Europe. In the Christian Church the kiss of charity was practiced not only as a friendly salutation, but as an act symbolical of love and Christian brotherhood (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26, 1 Pet. 5:14). It was embodied in the earlier Christian offices, and has been continued in some of those now in use. Among the Arabs the women and children kiss the beards of their husbands or fathers. The superior returns the salute by a kiss on the forehead. In Egypt an inferior kisses the hand of a superior, generally on the back, but sometimes, as a special favor, on the palm also. To testify abject submission, and in asking favors, the feet are often kissed instead of the hand. The written decrees of a sovereign are kissed in token of respect; even the ground is sometimes kissed by orientals in the fullness of their submission (Gen. 41:40; 1 Sam. 24:8; Psa. 72:9, etc.). Kissing is spoken of in Scripture as a mark of respect or adoration to idols (1 Kings 19:18; Hos. 13:2), (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

KITE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

KITH'LISH (Heb. כִּיתְלִישׁ, kith leesh', wall of man), a town in the valley of Judah (Josh. 15:40). It is identified by some with Jelameh; by others it is thought to be found in Tell Chilchis, to the S. S. E. of Beit-jibrin.

KIT'RON (Heb. כִּטְרוֹן, kit-rone', figurative, knotty), a city in Zebulun, from which the Israelites did not expel the Canaanites (Judg. 1:30), probably the same as ΚΑΤΤΑΡΗ (q. v.). It has not been identified, unless the Talmud is correct in making it the same as Suffûrieh in Galilee (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 180).

KITTIM. See CHITTIM.

KNEAD (Heb. לָחַץ, loosh), the preparation of dough by working it into a mass with the hands; a task usually performed by women (Gen. 18:6; 1 Sam. 28:24; 2 Sam. 13:8, etc.), but sometimes by men (Hos. 7:4).

KNEADING TROUGH (Heb. מִשְׁחָת, mesh-eh'-reth), the vessel in which the dough was mixed and leavened and then left to rise (Exod. 8:3; 12:34; "store" in Deut. 28:5, 17). The Arabs use for this purpose a leather which can be drawn up into a bag by running a cord along the border, in which they often prepare and carry their dough. It is not probable that the troughs of the Hebrews, in the references above, were like these, as they were not a nomadic people. See BREAD.

KNEE (Heb. and Chald. כַּף, keh'-rek; Gr. γόνυ, gon-oo'); KNEEL (Heb. בָּוּרַק, baw-rak; Gr. γονυπετεύω, gon-oo-pel-eh'-o, to bend the knee). The expression "to bend the knee" has for its primary notion that of breaking down, and then to invoke God, to bless (2 Chron. 6:13; Psa. 95:6; Dan. 6:10; Matt. 17:14). To bend the knee signifies also to give or receive a blessing, because the person blessed kneels. In this sense it refers to: (1) The benediction of dying parents (Gen. 27:4, 7, 10, 19); (2) of the priest to the people (Lev. 9:22, 23); (3) of a prophet (Num. 24:1; Deut. 33:1). It also signifies "to salute," which is connected with blessing (2 Kings 4:29).

The expression, "And he made his camels to kneel down" (Gen. 24:11), means that they were to rest.

"To bow the knee" is to perform an act of worship (1 Kings 19:18; Isa. 66:3, where the rendering is "he blessed an idol").

Kneeling in prayer was a practice of great antiquity; and references are made to it in both the Old Testament and New Testament (2 Chron. 6:13; Psa. 95:6; Dan. 6:10; Luke 22:41; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 21:5; Eph. 3:14).

Figurative. Knees are used symbolically for persons (Job 4:4; Heb. 12:12).

KNIFE, the rendering of several Hebrew terms, but not important enough to be given.

1. Material. The knives of the Egyptians, and of other nations in early times, were probably only of hard stone, and the use of the flint or stone knife was sometimes retained for sacred purposes after the introduction of iron and steel. Herodotus (ii, 86) mentions knives both of iron and of stone in different stages of the same process of embalming. The same may perhaps be said to some extent of the Hebrews.

2. Uses, etc. In their meals the Jews, like other orientals, made little use of knives, but they were required both for slaughtering animals either for food or sacrifice, as well as cutting up the carcasses (Lev. 7:33, 34; 8:15, 20, 25; 9:13; Num. 18:18; 1 Sam. 9:24, etc.). Smaller knives were in use for paring (Joseph) and for sharpening pens (Jer. 36:23). The razor was often used for Nazaritic purposes, for which a special chamber was reserved in the temple (Num. 6:5, 9, 19).

Ezek. 5:1, etc.). The pruning hooks of Isa. 18:5 were probably curved knives. The lancets of the priests of Baal were, probably, pointed knives (1 Kings 18:28) (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt.; Smith, Dict., s. v.); and the suffering caused by cutting themselves with these knives was supposed to secure from Baal a favorable hearing. The knives which with other articles of temple furniture were brought back from Babylon were doubtless used for killing and dissecting the sacred victims (Ezra 1:9).

KNOCK (Heb. כָּפַח, daw-fak'; Gr. κρούω, kroo'-o; Cant. 5:2; Judg. 19:22, "beat;" Matt. 7:7; Rev. 3:20, etc.). "Though orientals are very jealous of their privacy, yet they never knock when about to enter your room, but walk in without warning or ceremony. It is nearly impossible to teach Arab servants to knock at your door. They give warning at the outer gate, or entrance, either by calling or knocking. To stand and call is a very common and respectful mode; and thus it was in Bible times, and to it there are many very interesting allusions. Moses commanded the holder of a pledge to stand without, and call to the owner thereof to come forth (Deut. 24:10). This was to avoid the insolent intrusion of cruel creditors. Peter stood knocking at the outer gate door (Acts 12:13, 16), and so did the three men sent to Joppa by Cornelius (Acts 10:17, 18). The idea is that the guard over your privacy is to be placed at the entrance to your premises" (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 191, sq.). The expression, "ask, seek, knock" (Matt. 7:7; Luke 11:9), is the climax depicting the rising of prayer into intense fervor.

KNOP, an old form of knob, and the rendering of two Hebrew words.

1. Kaf-tore (Heb. כַּפְתֹּרֶת, a chaplet), in the description (Exod. 25:31-36; 37:17-22) of the golden candlestick (q. v.), where it is directed that each branch of the candlestick should be made of "three bowls like unto almonds, with a knop and a flower," etc.

2. Peh-kah'im (Heb. פְּהֻקֵי־אֵימ), mentioned as part of the carving which formed the inward decoration of the temple; "The cedar of the house within was carved with knops and open flowers" (1 Kings 6:18). Knops also formed the ornamentation of the molten sea (7:24). See GLOSSARY; TABERNACLE.

KNOW, KNOWLEDGE (Hebrew most frequent, Heb. יָדָע, yaw-dah'; Gr. γινώσκω, ghin-oc'-ko, each having a wide variety of meaning). Both terms have the meaning of coming to know, i. e., gaining a knowledge; and to know, i. e., to have knowledge of. The verb yawdah signifies to perceive, discern, become aware of, e. g., with the eyes (Isa. 6:9); with the mind, hence, to understand, to comprehend (Gen. 8:11; Judg. 13:21; 1 Sam. 20:33). It is often used with the idea of intent and purpose, to observe, mark (1 Sam. 23:22; Job 5:27); with the like idea of volition, i. e., to see after, care for, regard (Gen. 39:6; Prov. 9:13; 27:23; Isa. 51:7).

The expression "to know" sometimes means to approve of and take delight in (Psa. 1:6; Rom.

8:29); to cherish (John 10:27); to experience (Eph. 3:19). In Job 7:10 it is used of an inanimate object, "He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more." By a euphemism "to know" frequently denotes sexual connection (Gen. 44:1).

Knowledge may be partial (1 Cor. 13:9). It implies discovery, detection; as through the law comes the knowledge of sin (Rom. 3:20). Knowledge is spoken of as an emblematical person, and as the gift of God (Prov. 1:29; 8:10, etc.). Knowledge may be perverted, and thus become the medium of evil (Isa. 47:10; Rom. 1:28; 1 Cor. 8:1). Respecting divine knowledge, see OMNISCIENCE.

KO'A (Heb. כּוֹא, ko'-ah, perhaps cutting off). This word occurs only in Ezek. 23:23, in the prophetic denunciations of punishment to the Jewish people from the various nations whose idolatries they had adopted: "The Babylonians, and all the Chaldeans, Pekod and Shoa, and Koa, and all the Assyrians with them." In the last three words "there is some obscurity, which the older theologians have almost unanimously taken to be the names of different tribes in the Chaldean empire. Ewald also adopts this view, but it is certainly incorrect" (Keil, Com., in loc.). Gesenius (Heb. Lex., s. v.) says that "Koa is a he-camel, stallion, then figuratively a prince, noble."

KO'HATH (Heb. כּוֹהַת, keh-hawth', allied, assembly), the second son of Levi (Gen. 46:11), and the father of Amram, Izehar, Hebron, and Uzziel (Num. 3:19). Of his personal history we only know that he went down to Egypt with Levi and Jacob (Gen. 46:11); that his sister was Jochebed (Exod. 6:20); and that he lived to the age of one hundred and thirty-three years (6:18), B. C. about 2000. His descendants, the KOHATHITES (q. v.), formed one of the three great divisions of the Levites, and contained the priestly family descended from Aaron (6:18-20). In the service of the tabernacle their duty was to bear the ark and the sacred vessels (Num. 4:15; 7:9). The inheritance of the Kohathites who were not priests lay in the half tribe of Manasseh in Ephraim (1 Chron. 6:61-70) and in Dan (Josh. 21:5, 20-26).

KO'HATHITES, the descendants of Kohath, the second of the three sons of Levi (Gershon, Kohath, Merari), from whom the three principal divisions of the Levites derived their name (Gen. 46:11; Num. 3:17; 2 Chron. 34:12, etc.). See LEVITES, 5 (1).

KOLA'IAH (Heb. כּוֹלֵי־יָאוֹ, ko-law-yaw', voice of Jehovah).

1. A Benjamite, and remote ancestor of Sallu, which latter dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:7), B. C. long before 445.

2. The father of Ahab, which latter was a false prophet denounced by Jeremiah (Jer. 29:21), B. C. about 626.

KORAH (Heb. כּוֹרַח, ko'-rakh, ice).

1. The third son of Esau by his Canaanite concubine Aholibamah (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. 1:35), B. C. about 2100. He was born in Canaan before Esau migrated to Mount Seir (Gen. 36:5-9), and became the head of a petty Edomite tribe (36:18), where "duke" means "tribe head." "Korah, in Gen. 36:16, has probably been copied by mistake from v. 18" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

2. The Levite who conspired with Dathan and Abiram against Moses. Korah was the son of Izhar, the brother of Amram, the father of Moses and Aaron, making him cousin to these leaders of Israel (Exod. 6:21; Num. 16:1). About all that we know of Korah is in connection with the conspiracy of which he was one of the leaders (Num. 16:1-49). (1) Reasons for conspiracy.

Korah was probably influenced by jealousy because the high honors and privileges of the priesthood had been exclusively appropriated by the family of Aaron. Moses having supreme authority in civil affairs, the whole power over the nation would seem to have been engrossed by him and Aaron. "The particular grievance which rankled in the minds of Korah and his company was their exclusion from the office of priesthood—and their being confined—those among them who were Levites—to the inferior service of the tabernacle."

(2) Complaint. Having joined to himself Dathan and Abiram and two hundred and fifty "princes of the assembly," Korah appeared with them before Moses and Aaron, and charged them with usurpation of privileges and offices rightfully belonging to others. Moses no sooner heard this charge than he fell upon his face, as if to refer the matter to the Lord (comp. Num. 14:5), and declared that the decision should be left to Jehovah. He told them to appear the next day with censers and incense. (3) Destruction.

The next day the rebels presented themselves before the tabernacle, along with Moses and Aaron; and the whole congregation were gathered at the instigation of Korah. The Shekinah appeared, and a voice commanded Moses and Aaron to separate themselves from the congregation, that they might not share in its destruction for making common cause with the conspirators. The two leaders prayed that the people might be spared, and that Jehovah would confine his wrath to the leaders of the rebellion. The congregation, instructed by Moses, withdrew, and, after Moses had appealed to what was about to happen as a proof of the authority by which he had acted, the earth opened and then closed over the fallen tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. The other two hundred and fifty rebels, who were probably in front of the tabernacle, were then consumed by "fire from the Lord," B. C. about 1190. The censers of the rebels were made into plates to form an outer covering to the altar, a warning of the just judgment of God (v. 37, sq.). The next morning the whole congregation murmured against Moses and Aaron, and charged them with having slain the people of Jehovah. Notwithstanding the prayers of Moses and his brother, they could not avert the bursting forth of wrathful judgment. A plague destroyed fourteen thousand seven hundred (vers. 41-50), and the high priesthood of Aaron was confirmed (ch. 17). As the descendants of Korah afterward became eminent in the Levitical service, it is clear that his sons were spared. They were probably living in separate tents, or separated themselves from the conspirators at the command of Moses. He is referred to in Num. 26:9-11; 1 Chron. 6:22, 37. In Jude (v. 11; A. V. "Core") Korah is coupled with Cain and Balaam, and is held up as a warning to presumptuous and self-seeking teachers.

3. Son of Hebron. The eldest of the four sons of Hebron, of the family of Caleb and tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:43), B. C. considerably after 1191.

KORAHITE (1 Chron. 9:19, 31), Korhite, or Korathite, that portion of the Kohathite Levites who were descended from KORAH (q. v.). See LEVITES, 5 (1).

KORATHITES, THE (Num. 26:58). See KORAHITE.

KORE (Heb. כֹּרֵי, ko-ray', crier, or a part-ridge).

1. A Levite, the son of Ebiasaph, and father of Shallum, who was doorkeeper of the tabernacle (1 Chron. 9:19). In 1 Chron. 26:1, Kore is named as the father of Meshelemiah (or Shelemiah), a temple warden, B. C. about 960.

2. (1 Chron. 26:19). Erroneous translation for Korahites.

3. Son of Imnah, a Levitical keeper of the East Gate, appointed by Hezekiah to receive the thank offerings and distribute them to the priests (2 Chron. 31:14), B. C. 719.

KOR'HITES, THE (Exod. 6:24; 1 Chron. 12:6; 26:1; 2 Chron. 20:19). See KORAHITE.

KOZ (Heb. קֹז, kotse, a thorn), the head of the seventh division of priests according to the arrangement of David (1 Chron. 24:10, where the name is translated Hakkoz, B. C. about 960. He is probably the same whose descendants were excluded by Nehemiah from the priesthood because of their defective pedigree (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63). To the same family seems to have belonged Meremoth, who repaired two portions of the walls of Jerusalem, one portion of which extended from the door of the high priest's house to the end of it. (Neh. 3:4, 21). See Coz.

KUSHALAH (Heb. קֹשֵׁי־יָוֵה, koo-shaw-yav'-hoo, entrapped of Jah), a Merarite Levite, whose son Ethan was appointed a chief assistant of Heman in the temple music by David (1 Chron. 15:17), B. C. about 960. In 1 Chron. 6:44, he is called Kishi.

L

LA'ADAH (Heb. לַאדָּאָה, lah-daw', uncertain meaning), the second son of Shelah (son of Judah), and "father" (founder) of Mareshah (1 Chron. 4:21).

LA'ADAN (Heb. לַאדָּאָן, lah-dawn', as above).

1. An Ephraimite, the son of Tahan, and grandfather of Elishama, which latter was prince of his tribe at the Exodus (1 Chron. 7:26), B. C. before 1210.

2. The first named of the two sons of Gershom, the son of Levi (1 Chron. 23:7-9; 26:21). He is called Libni (6:17). Keil (Com., in loc.) thinks that Laadan was a later descendant of Gershom than Libni, and that the Shimei of v. 9 was a descendant of Libni, not elsewhere mentioned.

LA'BAN (Heb. לָבָן, law-bawn', white).

1. The son of Bethuel (Gen. 28:5), grandson of Nahor, Abraham's kinsman, and brother of Rebekah (Gen. 24:15, 29); an Aramæan herd owner of Mesopotamia. He united with his father, according to the usual custom, in consenting to the marriage of Rebekah to Isaac (24:50, sq.), B.C. about 2200. When their son Jacob became of marriageable age his parents directed him to take a wife from the daughters of Laban, and Jacob complied (28:2, 5). Laban arranged with his nephew to give him Rachel to wife on condition of seven years' service, but on the wedding night led Leah, his eldest daughter, into the bridechamber. When complained to by Jacob he made the weak excuse, "It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the firstborn." But, to satisfy Jacob, he promised to give him Rachel in a week if he would serve him seven years longer. To this Jacob consented, and eight days later was wedded to the woman he loved (29:15-30). At the end of the second period of seven years Jacob desired to return to Canaan, but Laban persuaded him to remain, and made a contract with him to keep his flocks. By a cunning artifice Jacob made this bargain result greatly to his own advantage (30:25-43), and at the end of six years left stealthily for his former home (31:1-21). Three days after, Laban, hearing of Jacob's flight, started in pursuit, and overtook him on the seventh day at Mount Gilead. The night before he was warned by God in a dream "not to speak to Jacob either good or bad," i. e., not to threaten or persuade him to return. He confined himself to bitter reproaches; told Jacob that he had power to do him harm if God had not forbidden him, and accused him of stealing his gods (the teraphim). Rachel concealed the theft by resorting to a trick well calculated to deceive. Thereupon Jacob grew angry and remonstrated with Laban, who at once proposed a covenant of peace. This was celebrated with a feast, and the next morning Laban departed to his own place (31:22, sq.).

2. A place in the desert, on the route of the Israelites (Deut. 1:1), probably identical with LIBNAH (Num. 33:20).

LABOR, the rendering of a large number of Hebrew and Greek terms. The teaching of Scripture (Gen. 2:15) is that man, even in his state of innocency, was to lead a life of activity, which was very different, however, from the trouble and restlessness of the weary toil into which he was plunged by sin. Exercise of some kind was essential to his wellbeing (Eccl. 5:12). In consequence of the fall, the earth no longer yielded spontaneously the fruits requisite for man's maintenance, but he was obliged to secure the necessities of life by labor and strenuous exertion (Gen. 3:19).

"Work, as distinguished from labor, is not so much a term denoting a lighter kind of labor as a general and comprehensive term applied to the performance of any task, whether easy or severe. עֲבֹדָה (ab-o-daw') is the execution of a definite daily task, whether in field labor (Psa. 104:23) and mechanical employment (Exod. 39:32) on the one hand, or priestly service and the duties connected with the worship on the other (Exod. 12:25, 26; Lev. 23:7, sq.), i. e., such occupations as came under the denomination of labor, business, or industrial employment" (K. and D., Com., on Exod. 20:8).

That labor was held in high respect we gather from such expressions as, "Seest thou a man diligent in business (skilled in his work), he shall stand before kings" (Prov. 22:29; comp. 10:4; 12:24, 27). When Nebuchadnezzar carried the Jews away into captivity he found among them a thousand craftsmen and smiths (2 Kings 24:14-16; Jer. 29:2).

The ancient rabbins regarded manual labor as honorable, and urged it upon all as a duty. In the Talmud we find such sayings as the following: "He who does not teach his son a craft is, as it were, bringing him up to robbery;" "Labor is greatly to be prized, for it elevates the laborer, and maintains him."

Value of Labor. The following values of labor are given by F. R. Conder (Bib. Ed., iii, 223, sq.): "The denarius, which was the Roman equivalent for a quarter shekel, was a day's pay of a Roman soldier. This was in exact accordance with the price, mentioned in the parable of the laborers in the vineyard, of a penny a day. We thus arrive at the conclusion that the hire of a laborer or of a workman, about the time of the Christian era in Palestine, was equivalent to the price of a quarter of a bushel of wheat. If we take fifty-six shillings a quarter as an average wheat price, we have a day's wage of one shilling and ninepence (about forty-four cents), which is rather higher than the ordinary rate in Wales. We have another indication of the relative wealth or poverty of the industrial classes in Palestine at the time of Christ and in Europe at the present day from the provisions as to the distribution of alms. The limit between the proper subject for alms for the purpose of support and the independent man was fixed by the oral law at the receipt of two hundred zuzae, that is to say, to one shekel per week, . . . the equivalent of seven shillings (about one dollar and seventy-five cents) per week. This was considered by the law of Moses to be the lowest rate at which life was to be supported." See HANDICRAFTS, SERVICE.

LACE (Heb. לָבַד, lav-theel', twined), the blue cord with which the high priest's breastplate was tied to the ephod (Exod. 28:28, 37; 39:21, 31). The Hebrew term is rendered "ribband" (Num. 16:38); "thread" (Judg. 16:9, etc.). See GLOSSARY.

LA'CHISH (Heb. לַחִישׁ, law-kheesh', impregnable), a royal Canaanite city, situated in the southeastern portion of Palestine, in the seacoast plain. Its king, Japhia, joined the confederacy against Joshua (10:3, 5), but was captured and destroyed by the Israelites (vers. 31-35; 12:11). It was rebuilt, or fortified, by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:9), and seems to have been regarded as one of the strongest fortresses of Judah—for hither Amaziah fled and was slain (2 Kings 14:19; 2 Chron. 25:27). It was strong enough to resist the siege of Sennacherib when on his way to Egypt (2 Kings 18:13-17; 2 Chron. 32:9; Isa. 36:2; 37:8). It was finally taken by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 34:1, 7). It was recaptured after the exile (Neh. 11:30). Micah (1:13) denounced Lachish because it was the first to grant admission to the iniquities of Israel, i. e., to the idolatry of the image-worship of the ten tribes (see Mic. 1:5; Amos 3:14).

Explorations conducted by Professor Petrie, for the Palestine Exploration Fund (1890), resulted in the discovery of the site of Lachish at Tell el-Hesi. The mound of Tell el-Hesi rises sixteen miles to the east of Gaza; stands on a natural eminence about forty feet in height, on the summit of which the ruins of successive cities are piled sixty feet higher. The earliest of these cities was the primitive Lachish; and above its ruins we find fresh walls raised upon those destroyed, and fresh buildings constructed of the old stones. "In the time of Amenôphis IV, or Khu-n-Aten, Lachish had been the seat of an Egyptian governor. More than one letter from him has been found among the cuneiform tablets of Tel-el-Amarna, and one of the dispatches of the vassal king of Jerusalem states that Lachish, Ashkelon, and Gezer had furnished the garrison of his city with food and oil" (Sayce, High. Crit., p. 289). These explorations were continued by T. G. Bliss, Ph.D. (see Recent Research in Bible Lands, pp. 31, sq.), and among his finds is a "precious tablet in cuneiform, which encourages the hope of finding a library among the ruins."

LAD (Heb. לָדָד, lah'-ar). This term is applied to the young from the time of infancy to that of adolescence—of an infant just born (Exod. 2:6; Judg. 13:5, 7; 1 Sam. 4:21); of a boy not yet full grown (Gen. 21:16, sq.; 21:12; 22:12; Isa. 7:16; 8:4); and of a youth nearly twenty years of age (Gen. 34:19; 41:12; 1 Kings 3:7; 2 Sam. 18:5, 29); and occasionally of a girl, or maiden (Gen. 24:14, 16; 34:3, 12; Deut. 22:15, sq.). In some of the above passages the A. V. renders "child." See CHILDREN.

LADDER (Heb. מַדְבַּח, sool-lawm', staircase). This word occurs only in the account of Jacob's dream at Beth-el (Gen. 28:12, "and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven," etc.). By many the rendering "staircase" is preferred, and is supposed to apply to the rocky mountain side. The vision that Jacob saw of angels ascending and descending is thought to teach the fact of communication between heaven and earth, and the ministry of angels. "To us there is a deeper meaning since the incarnation. The true staircase by which heavenly messengers ascend and descend is the Son of man. It is he who really bridges the interval between heaven and earth, God and man."

LADY, LADIES, the rendering in the A. V. of:

1. Gheb-eh'-reth (Heb. מַלְּכָה, feminine of master), applied to Babylon (Isa. 47:5, 7; elsewhere "mistress," as opposed to maidservant, Gen. 16:4, 8, 9; 2 Kings 5:3).

2. Saw-raw' (Heb. מַלְּכָה, a noble female (Judg. 5:29; Esth. 1:18; elsewhere a "princess," particularly the king's wife of noble birth, 1 Kings 11:3).

3. Koo-ree'-ah (Gr. κωρία, feminine of master) occurs only as an epithet of a Christian woman (2 John 1:1, 5), either as an honorable title of regard or as a feminine proper name, CYRIA (q. v.).

LA'EL (Heb. לֵאלֹהֵי, law-ale', to God, i. e., devoted to him), the father of Eliasaph, who was chief of the Gershonites at the time of the Exodus (Num. 3:24), B. C. 1210.

LA'HAD (Heb. לַחַד, lah'-had, oppression), the second of the two sons of Jahath, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:2), B. C. after 1210.

LAHAI'-ROI (Gen. 24:62; 25:11), elsewhere BEER-LAHAI-ROI (q. v.).

LAH'MAM (Heb. לַחֲמַם, lakh-mawm', food-like), a city in the plain of Judah (Josh. 15:40), perhaps among the Philistines west of the highlands of Judea. It is thought to be represented by the ruins of el-Lahm, near Beit-Jibrin.

LAH'MI (Heb. לַחֲמִי, lakh-mee', foodful), named as the brother of Goliath, and slain by Elhanan (1 Chron. 20:5). Dr. Strong (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.) considers this an incorrect reading for Bethlehemite, as in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 21:19). Winer, Keil, Deutsch, Grove, and others maintain that Chronicles gives the true reading.

LA'TSEH (Heb. לַיִשׁ, lah'-yish, a lion).

1. A native of Gallim, a Benjamite, to whose son Phalti Saul gave David's wife Michal (1 Sam. 25:44; 2 Sam. 3:15), B. C. about 1036.

2. A place in the north of Palestine (Judg. 18:7, 14), about four miles from Paneas, at the head of the Jordan. It was taken by the restless Danites and included within their territory. It is called also Leshem and Dan (Josh. 19:47; Judg. 18:7, 29; Jer. 8:16), now identified with Tell-el-Kady, "the mound of the judge," to the north of the waters of Merom (Josh. 11:5).

3. A place mentioned in Isa. 10:30, and thought by some to be the modern el-Isawiye'h, about a mile from Jerusalem.

LAKE (Gr. λίμνη, lim'-nay, a pool), a term used in the New Testament only of the Lake of Gennesaret (Luke 5:1, 2; 8:22, 23, 33), and the "lake of fire" (Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14, 15; 21:8).

LAKUM (Heb. לַקּוּם, lak-koom', a way stopper, or fortification), a place in the northeast of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33).

LAMA (Gr. λαμά, lam-al'; λαμμά, lam-mah'), a term signifying why, quoted from Psa. 22:1 by our Saviour on the cross (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34).

LAMB, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. The most frequent are keh-bes' (Heb. כֶּה־בֶּשֶׂת), transposed form keh'-seb (כֶּה־שֶׁבֶת), and the feminine kib-saw' (כִּיב־סָוּ), kab-saw' (כַּב־סָוּ), and kis-baw' (כִּישׁ־בָּוּ), and respectively denote a male and female lamb from the first to the third year. The former perhaps more nearly coincide with the provincial term hog or hogget, which is applied to a young ram before he is shorn. Young rams of this age formed an important part of almost every sacrifice, while ewe lambs were also offered (Num. 6:14; Lev. 4:32). See SACRIFICE.

2. The corresponding Chaldee form for the above is im-mar' (Heb. אִמ־מַר, Ezra 6:9, 17; 7:17).

3. Taw-leh' (Heb. טָו־לֵה, 1 Sam. 7:9; Isa. 65:25), a young sucking lamb; originally the young of any animal.

4. Kar (Heb. כָּר, plump), a fat ram, or more probably "wether," as the word is generally employed in opposition to ayil, which strictly denotes a "ram" (Deut. 32:14; Isa. 34:6). The Tyrians obtained their supply from Arabia and Kedar (Ezek. 27:21), and the pastures of Bashan were famous as grazing grounds (39:18). Mesha, king of Moab, sent tribute to the king of Israel of one hundred thousand fat wethers (2 Kings 3:4), and this tribute the prophet declares was now to be sent to Jerusalem (Isa. 16:1), as indicative of Moab's submission to the house of David.

5. Tseh-one' (Heb. צֶה־אֶחָד, from unused root, signifying to migrate), rendered "lamb" in Exod. 12:21, is properly a collective term denoting a "flock" of small cattle, sheep, and goats, in distinction from herds of the larger animals (Eccles. 2:7; Ezek. 45:15).

6. Seh (Heb. שֶׁה), in opposition to the above collective term, is applied to denote the individuals of a flock, whether sheep or goats (Gen. 22:7, 8; Exod. 12:3; 22:1, etc.).

7. In the New Testament we find ar-nee'-on (Gr. ἀρνίον, diminutive of ἀρνός, ar-ane', which latter occurs only in Luke 10:3), a little lamb. Jesus calls his followers "my lambs" (John 21:15).

Figurative. In the symbolical language of Scripture the lamb is a type of: Purity (1 Pet. 1:19); Christ as a sacrifice (John 1:29; Rev. 5:6); anything dear or cherished (2 Sam. 12:3, 9); care of, type of love and tenderness (Isa. 40:11); patience of Christ (Isa. 53:7; Acts 8:32); among wolves, of ministers among the ungodly (Luke 10:3); deserted and exposed, as a lamb in a wide field becomes the prey of wild beasts, of Israel deprived of God's protection (Hos. 4:16); brought to slaughter (Jer. 51:40), and consumed in sacrifice (Psa. 37:20); of the destruction of the wicked; of meekness and innocence (Isa. 11:6; 65:25; John 21:15).

LAMB, as the symbol of Christ (John 1:36; 1 Pet. 1:19; Rev. 13:8), was typified by the paschal lamb (q. v.), and travestied by the Antichrist, who sets himself up as the true Christ, professing to imitate the Redeemer, of whom he is the opposite (Rev. 13:11, "another beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like a lamb").

LAMB OF GOD (Gr. ἀμνός Θεοῦ, am-nos' theh-oo'), a title given to our Lord (John 1:29, 36); comp. Acts 8:32; 1 Pet. 1:19). In these passages Christ is likened to a sacrificial lamb on account of his death, innocently and patiently endured, to expiate sin. In the Revelation John beheld "a lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth" (Rev. 5:6); i. e., invested with the attributes of God, omnipotence and omniscience, and sharing the universal empire and homage of the universe.

LAME, a general term signifying imperfect, either by birth or injury. Lameness is mentioned among the bodily imperfections which would exclude a son (descendant) of Aaron from entering the holy place or offering sacrifices (q. v.). A person thus afflicted might, however, eat of the sacrifices, like other priests (Lev. 21:17-23).

LAMECH (Heb. לֶמֶךְ, leh'-mek, vigorous).

1. The fifth in descent from Cain, being the son of Methusael and the father of Jabal, Jubal, Tubalcain, and the latter's sister, Naamah (Gen. 4:18-22), B. C. probably about 3700. Lamech took two wives, Adah and Zillah, and was thus the first to practice polygamy. To the narrative of Lamech we are indebted for the only example of antediluvian poetry (vers. 23, 24):

"Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
Wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech:
For a man I slew for my wound,
And a young man for my stripes.
For sevenfold is Cain avenged,
And Lamech seven-and-seventyfold."

Many views have been entertained as to the meaning of these words. Keil (Com., in loc.) says that "in the form of pride and arrogance Lamech celebrates the inventions of Tubal-cain;" and the idea of the song is, "Whoever inflicts a wound or stripe on me, whether man or youth, I will put to death; and for every injury done to my person I will take ten times more vengeance than that with which God promised to avenge the murder of my ancestor Cain." Turner (Companion to Genesis, p. 209) says "that he had slain a young man, not in cold blood, but in consequence of a wound or bruise he had himself received; and on the ground, apparently, of a difference between his case and that of Cain's—viz., that he had done under provocation what Cain had done without it—he assures himself of an interest in the divine guardianship greater than that granted to Cain."

2. The son of Methuselah and father of Noah. He lived to be seven hundred and seventy-seven years of age (Gen. 5:25-31; 1 Chron. 1:3; Luke 3:36).

LAMP (Heb. לָפֶיֶד, lap-peed'; נֵר, neer; Gr. λαμπάς, lam-pas'). The terms candle and candlestick are frequent in the A. V., where lamp and lampstand would have been more literal renderings. Although lamps are frequently mentioned in Scripture, no indication is given of their form and structure. The natural supposition is that they were similar to those employed in surrounding countries, especially Egypt, to which in matters of art and comfort the Israelites stood nearly related. The following are the references to lamps:

1. That part of the golden candlestick (q. v.) which bore the light; also of the ten golden candlesticks in the Temple of Solomon (Exod. 25:37; 1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron. 4:20; 13:11; Zech. 4:2).

2. A torch, such as were carried by the soldiers of Gideon (Judg. 7:16, 20), and, perhaps, similar to those which Samson tied to the foxes' tails (15:4). See TORCH.

3. Lamps for domestic use. The form of these may probably be inferred from the prevailing shape of ancient specimens from neighboring nations that have come down to us. In the British Museum there are various forms of ancient Egyptian lamps, of terra cotta and bronze, with ornaments in bas-relief. It seems that the Hebrews, like other ancient and modern orientals, were accustomed to burn lamps overnight in their chambers, which custom gave rise to several symbols. Wilkinson gives (Anc. Egypt, v, p. 376) what he takes to be a representation of a lamp made of glass, with a hand holding separately an erect wick, as if the bearer were about to place it in the vase previous to its being lighted. The lines, he thinks, may represent the twisted nature of the cotton wick, as they do the watering of the glass vase. Modern Egyptian lamps consist of small glass vessels with a tube at the bottom containing a cotton wick twisted around a piece of straw.

4. The use of lamps fed with oil in marriage processions is alluded to in the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1). These probably were similar to the modern Egyptian lantern, called fanoos, a sort of folding lantern.

5. Figurative. Lamp is used as symbolical of: The word of God (Psa. 119:105; Prov. 6:23); the omniscience of Christ (Dan. 10:6; Rev. 1:14); salvation of God (Gen. 15:17; Isa. 62:1); God's guidance (2 Sam. 22:29; Psa. 18:28, "candle"); spirit of man (Prov. 20:27, "candle"); ministers and wise rulers (John 5:35, "light;"; 2 Sam. 21:17, marg.); completely put out, the destruction of him who curses his parents (Prov. 20:20).

LANCE (Heb. פִּיִּדוֹן, kee-dohn', Jer. 50:42, usually called "spear"), a javelin in distinction from the long-handled spear. See ARMOR I (3).

LANCET (Heb. רִמְחָה, ro'-makh, to hurl, 1 Kings 18:28). This word is elsewhere rendered and appears to mean a javelin, or light spear. It may mean the iron point or head of a lance. See ARMOR I (3).

LAND. Respecting the cultivation of land by the Hebrews, see AGRICULTURE.

LAND AND PROPERTY. 1. Distribution. The patriarchs were promised for their posterity the possession of Canaan on the west of Jordan. Owing to the opposition of the Amorites, who had formed two large kingdoms on the east of Jordan, the Israelites were compelled to wage war with Sihon of Heshbon and Og of Bashan. Defeated by Israel, their territory was taken and divided by Moses, who gave it to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. They were allowed to enter upon their possession, however, only after having fulfilled their promise of sending all their men of war in aid of their brethren over the Jordan (Num., ch. 32; Deut. 2:26-3:20; Josh. 13:15-32).

Joshua had charge of the taking and dividing of Canaan, and, having defeated thirty-one kings and taken their cities, he proceeded, by divine command, to divide the whole land among the remaining tribes, according to the boundaries fixed by Moses (Num. 34:1-35:8). The portion of each tribe was fixed by lot, i. e., by lot it was decided where each tribe was to be located (26:52-56; 33:54). Then the compass, size, and boundaries of the several territories were settled and regulated by the commission appointed for the purpose, consisting of Eleazar the priest, Joshua, and twelve princes of the tribes mentioned by name (Num. 34:16-29; Josh. 14:1). Naturally the extent of territory assigned to each tribe depended upon its number (Num. 33:54). A committee was formed of three men out of each tribe to survey the land (Josh. 18:4-9), i. e., not to measure it geometrically, but to have it described according to the number of its cities and villages, its soil, etc. The land was subdivided, so that every clan and father's house received an inheritance for itself. All the land was not immediately taken possession of, for the Canaanites were not extirpated. In the course of time the Canaanites left in the land were subjugated, and their land became the property of the Israelites. As to the division of the cities, towns, and villages, the Old Testament does not give any clear account.

Israel was taught that they had conquered Canaan only by the help of Jehovah (Psa. 44:3), and that the land was and remained the property of Jehovah, the covenant God (Lev. 25:23). Though the land was promised to the children of Israel for an everlasting possession (Gen. 13:15, sq.), yet their retaining it was conditional on their faithful fulfillment of its covenant obligations (Lev. 26:32, sq.; Deut. 4:26, sq.; 11:19, sq.), and even the ground did not become Israel's property in such a way that the possessor could dispose of it as he willed.

2. Laws. (1) Rest. (a) That Israel might be constantly reminded of the condition upon which it held the land, a year of rest for the ground was to be observed every seventh year, "a Sabbath for the Lord" (Lev. 25:4); and every fiftieth year was to be a jubilee, in which everyone returned to his property (25:10, 13). (b) Sale. The land was not to be sold in perpetuity, but there was a provision for redeeming the land by the seller or next of kin (25:23, 24); and if not redeemed before, the land reverted without payment in the jubilee year to its original possessor or his heir (v. 28). Thus every sale of land became a lease, since only its produce was sold, till the jubilee (25:15, 16). (2) Redemption. In case the owner or his next of kin wished to redeem the land, then the years that had elapsed since the sale were reckoned, and the buyer received only as much purchase money as would be due for the time remaining till the next jubilee (Lev. 25:25-27). This right of redemption in the jubilee held absolutely for (1) property in lands and houses in villages and unwalled places; (2) for the houses of the Levites in the cities allotted for them, and the attached fields (25:31-34). In a limited way it held: (1) for the dwelling house in walled cities; for them the right of redemption lasted only a full year from the day of sale (vers. 29, 30); (2) for fields vowed unto the Lord, with the limitation, that if they were not recovered for the prescribed valuation, but were sold to another, they did not revert in the jubilee to their original possessor or his heir, but as being holy to Jehovah, like a devoted field, became the property of the priests (27:14-21). Houses in walled cities were not so closely connected with the land, which the Lord gave to his people for an inheritance, that they could be regarded as inalienable. (3) Consecration. A bought field could be consecrated to the Lord by the buyer only so far as it had become his property. Strictly speaking, he had only bought its produce until the jubilee, and could, therefore, vow only this to Jehovah. If he ransomed it he ransomed it for himself till the jubilee; if he did not ransom it, the sanctuary had the use of it for this interval, after which the field reverted in either case without payment to the original owner (Lev. 27:22-24). An hereditary owner could vow a portion to Jehovah, who had given him all. In such a case ransom was allowed till the jubilee by the payment of the value of the harvests till this date with an added fifth. Then the field remained his property, and from the jubilee onward its produce again belonged to him cost free. If not redeemed it was understood that he had given it wholly to Jehovah, and it became the property of the priests (27:16-21).

LANDMARK (Heb. גְּבוּל, or גְּבֹל, gheb-ool'), a mark to designate the boundary of land; a stone, stake, or other monument. The removal of such landmark was prohibited by the Mosaic law (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Prov. 22:28; comp. Job 24:2), on account of the close connection in which a man's possession as the means of his support stood to the life of the man himself. Landmarks were held sacred by other nations; by the Romans, for example, who held them so sacred that removal was punished with death.

LANE (Gr. ρίπνη, hroo'-may, Luke 14:21) a narrow way or passage in a town, shut in by buildings on both sides (Matt. 6:2; Acts 9:11; 12:10, A. V. "street").

LANGUAGE, the rendering of the following Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Saw-faw' (Heb. שֵׁפֶת, sef-eth'), a lip, and so speech (Gen. 11:1, 6, 7, 9; 2 Kings 18:26, 28; Neh. 13:24, etc.).

2. Law-shone' (Heb. לֶשׁוֹן, lesh-o-naw'), lish-shawn' (לְשׁוֹן), the tongue, and so speech or language (Esth. 1:22; 3:12; 8:9; Dan. 3:29, etc.).

3. Law-az' (Heb. לָצַח, law-awz'), to speak in a foreign tongue (Psa. 114:1); daw-bawz' (דַּבָּר, daw-bar'), from the primary idea of ranging in order, to speak (Psa. 19:3).

4. Dee-al'-ek-tos (Gr. διάλεκτος), the tongue or language peculiar to any people (Acts 1:19; 2:6, 8; 21:40; 22:2; 26:14).

Very natural is the question, How did man come to speak? We give as answer the following from Delitzsch (Bib. Psyc., p. 213, sq.): "The Old Testament use of the word לָמַד (aw-mar', to speak) proceeds from the essential identity of thought and speech, for לָמַד signifies both—the thought as inward speaking, and the speech as audible thinking. Thinking and speaking, spirit and speech, are necessarily associated. Human speech, indeed, is effected psychically and corporeally, and is indissolubly bound to this agency; but speech in itself, even in the pure spirit, even in the Godhead itself, is inseparable from thought, for the word is the comprehension of the thought. . . . Man thinks by speaking inwardly; this speech often occurs so rapidly as not to be observed; but there are always words by which the thought, as all reckoning, even the most rapid, is by means of figures. To think apart from language is to think apart from thought itself.

“What is related in Gen. 2:19 is not the first genesis of language. By way of illustration, however, it is there set forth to us how language came into existence. God brought the animals to Adam to show him the creatures which were formed to serve him, that he might see what he would call them. . . . God does not order him to name them; but by bringing the beasts he gives him an opportunity of developing that intellectual capacity which constitutes his superiority to the animal world. The man sees the animals, and thinks of what they are and how they look; and these thoughts, in themselves already inward words, take the form involuntarily of audible names.”

LANTERN (Gr. φανάριον, fan-os', shining). This word occurs only in John 18:3, where it is recorded that the party which went to Gethsemane were provided “with lanterns, and torches, and weapons.” A lantern is simply a lamp with a covering of some sort to protect it from the wind and other violence. Therefore too sharp a distinction between it and lamp is not to be drawn, and not infrequently either term might be indifferently used. The lamps, e. g., of Gideon’s band were lanterns rather than lamps in the ordinary sense; and when the psalmist speaks of “a lamp to his path” (Psa. 119:105), we naturally conclude that he refers to some kind of lantern. As the streets of Eastern towns are not lighted at night, and never were so, lanterns are used to an extent unknown to dwellers in modern towns. See LAMP.

LAODICE'A (Gr. Λαοδικεία, lah-od-ik'-i-ah). Of the several cities named Laodicea in Syria and Asia Minor, only one is mentioned in the Scriptures, viz., the one situated on the confines of Phrygia and Lydia, on the banks of the Lycus, and about forty miles from Ephesus—not far from Colossæ. After having been successively called Diospolis and Rhoas, it was named Laodicea, in honor of Laodice, the wife of Antiochus II (B. C. 261–246), who rebuilt it. It was destroyed by an earthquake (A. D. 66, or earlier) and rebuilt by Marcus Aurelius. It was the seat of a Christian Church (Col. 2:1; 4:13, 15, 16; Rev. 1:11). It is now a heap of ruins, called by the Turks Eski-hissar, or “old castle.”

LAODICE'A, CHURCH AT. Among the residents of this city at the time of the apostles were many Jews; and it is probably owing to this fact that a Christian Church was planted here at so early a date. It appears from the epistle to the Colossians (4:15, 16) that Paul never visited Laodicea, but hearing, most probably, from Epaphras of the false doctrines spread in that city, he wrote to the Colossians desiring that his epistle to that Church should also be read in Laodicea. The message of the Spirit (Rev. 3:14–22) to the Church of Laodicea was an awful warning. See LAODICEANS, EPISTLE TO.

LAODICE'ANS, EPISTLE TO. In Col. 4:16 Paul desires that the epistle from Laodicea “be read at Colossæ.” From this it has been supposed that Paul wrote an epistle to the Laodiceans, which is no longer extant. Jerome and Theodoret mention such an epistle, and it was also referred to at the second council of Niceæa. The epistle assuming to be that in question, and which is generally condemned as spurious, is found in some copies of the New Testament printed in Germany; and Calmet in his dictionary gives a full translation of it. Some (Conybeare and Howson) have thought that the epistle to the Ephesians is the one alluded to by the apostle. Another explanation of the passage is that St. Paul intended the letter of the Laodiceans to him, conveyed by Epaphras, to be read in the church of Colossæ, together with the apostolic epistle to the Colossians themselves; and that as the epistle to the Colossians was in some sense an answer to the Laodiceans, it would be necessary that both should be read in the church of Laodicea also (Imp. Dict., s. v.).

LAP (Heb. לָפַד, lah-ped, 2 Kings 4:39, a garment; כֶּהָקֵה, khake, Prov. 16:33, the bosom; כֶּהָסֵן, kh'o'-sen, bosom, Neh. 5:13). The fold of the garment in which orientals are accustomed to carry articles in lieu of pockets; thus one of the sons of the prophets gathered “wild gourds (q. v.) his lap full” (2 Kings 4:39). See DRESS.

The psalmist prayed, “render unto our neighbors sevenfold into their bosom their reproach” (Psa. 79:12). The same allusion occurs in Luke 6:38, “Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom.”

LAP'DOTH (Heb. לַפְדוֹת, lap-pee-doh't, torches), the husband of the prophetess Deborah (Judg. 4:4), B. C. about 1120.

LAPPED, LAPPETH (Heb. לָקַח, lah-kak', to lick up as a dog, 1 Kings 21:19, etc.). Lapping was the test of Gideon’s men (Judg. 7:5, 6), and is still in the East supposed to be an evidence of that readiness which fits men for active service. The meaning is that these men, instead of kneeling down to drink, employed the hand to carry the water to their mouths. Practice gives a peculiar tact in this mode of drinking; and the passage of the hand between the water and the mouth is so rapidly managed as to be comparable to that of the dog’s tongue in similar circumstances. Again, the water is dexterously jerked into the mouth before the hand is brought close to it, so that the hand is reaching for a new supply before the preceding has been swallowed.

LAPWING. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

LARGE. See GLOSSARY.

LASCIVIOUSNESS (Gr. ἀσελγεία, as-elg'-i-a, that which excites disgust), unbridled lust, licentiousness, wantonness. In the list of the evil products of the heart given by our Lord (Mark 7:

22) it is uncertain what particular vice is spoken of; gluttony and venery (Jude, ch. 4; 1 Pet. 4:3); carnality (2 Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19; Eph. 4:19).

LASE'A, or LASE'A (Gr. Λασαία, las-ah'-yah), a city of Crete, near Fair Havens (Acts 27:8). If the vessel in which Paul was sailing stopped any length of time it is probable that Paul visited Lasæa. Its ruins are located near Cape Leonda, about five miles from Lasæa.

LA'SHA (Heb. לֶשֶׁת, leh'-shah, fissure, spring), one of the places named in defining the border of the Canaanites (Gen. 10:19). Jerome, Jonathan, and the Jerusalem Targum identify it with Calirhoe, a place with sulphur baths, east of the Dead Sea, in Wady Serka Ma'in.

LASHA'RON (Heb. לַשְׁרוֹן, lash-shaw-ron'e', signification unknown), one of the thirty-one Canaanitish towns, west of Jordan, smitten by Joshua (Josh. 12:18). Harper (Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 167) identifies it with "the ruins of Saron, six and one half miles W. of the south end of the Sea of Galilee, the district generally between Mount Tabor and the Sea of Galilee."

LAST DAY. See JUDGMENT, THE FINAL.

LAST TIME. See ESCHATOLOGY.

LATCHET (Heb. שְׂרוֹךְ, ser-oke', thong; Gr. ῥαβδίς, hee-mas', strap, i. e., tie), the strap or cord used by the orientals to fasten the shoe upon the foot (Isa. 5:27; Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27). See GLOSSARY.

Figurative. In Isa. 5:27, the prophet uses the poetical figure, "neither shall the girdle of their loins be loosed, nor the latchet of their shoes be broken;" to illustrate the tightness and durability of their equipment. The expression, "the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose"

(Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27), and that in Matt. 3:11, "whose shoes I am not worthy to bear," refer to the fact that in the East to bear the sandals of their masters, as well as to fasten them on or take them off, was the business of slaves of the lowest rank. "That I will not take from a thread even to a shoe latchet" (Gen. 14:23) is figurative for the smallest or most worthless thing belonging to the king of Sodom.

LAT'IN (Gr. Ῥωμαϊκός, rho-mah-ee-kos', Roman, Luke 23:38), the vernacular language of the Romans, although most of them in the time of Christ likewise spoke Greek.

LATTICE, the rendering of the following words:

1. Esh-naub' (Heb. אֶשְׁנָבִיב, a latticed window, through which the cool breezes pass (Judg. 5:28; "window;" Prov. 7:6).

2. Seb-aw-kaw' (Heb. שֶׁבַקָה, a net, 2 Kings 1:2), probably a screen before a window.

3. Kheh'-rek (Heb. רֶקֶת, a window lattice (Cant. 2:9).

The object of the lattice is to keep the apartments cool by intercepting the direct rays of the sun, and at the same time permit a free circulation of the air through the trellis openings. Perhaps the network through which Ahaziah fell and received his mortal injury was on the parapet of his palace (2 Kings 1:2).

LAUD. See GLOSSARY.

LAUGHTER (Heb. צִחֻק, tsekh-oke'; שִׂחֻק, saw-khak'; Gr. γέλως, ghel'-oce). "In Scripture it usually expresses joy (Gen. 21:6; Psa. 126:2; Eccles. 3:4; Luke 6:21); sometimes mockery (Gen. 18:13; Eccles. 2:2; James 4:9); also security (Job 5:22). When predicated of God (Psa. 2:4; 59:8; Prov. 1:26) it signifies that he despises or pays no regard to the person or subject" (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

LAVER (Heb. כִּיּוֹר and כִּיֹּר, kee-yore', something round, a basin), the basin at which the priests washed their hands and feet while engaged in their public ministrations. The laver of the tabernacle differed from that of the temple.

1. Tabernacle Laver. This was made by divine direction (Exod. 30:18) of "brass" (i. e., copper or bronze) out of the metal mirrors of the Hebrew women (38:8). It was placed between the tabernacle and the great altar, so as to be convenient for the priests' use when going from the altar to the tabernacle (30:20, 21; 40:32). It consisted of two parts, viz., the laver proper and foot or pedestal. Neither the form nor size is given. Regarding its shape, something may be deduced from the etymology of the Hebrew term and its use in other passages. Keeyore "is derived from a root that seems primarily to mean excavation by hammering, and this would naturally yield a semiglobular hollow, which form is confirmed by the convenience for a lavatory, like a washbowl or basin, and by the similar shape of the molten sea and the smaller lavers, which took its place in the temple (1 Kings 7:38, 40, 43, etc.), and which are denoted by the same word. The laver proper was probably used as the receptacle for the water, which was allowed to run down upon the hands and feet of those washing."

The "foot" (Heb. כַּנֶּה, kane) was, doubtless, circular in shape, and formed another basin. It was evidently an expansion of the shaft, probably

2 Chron. 4:3, we have "the similitude of oxen" instead of "knops." "It is possible that בקררים, bakarim, oxen, may be a corruption of פקדיים, pekaim" (Clark, Com., in loc.). The capacity of this huge basin was two thousand baths (comp. bath). The number three thousand baths (2 Chron. 4:5) is thought to be an error of a transcriber. The water was doubtless drawn from this basin by means of faucets. This laver was supported by twelve brazen oxen, three looking toward each point of the compass, while it is probable that they all stood upon one and the same basement of metal. (2) The ten lesser lavers. For full description of these see 1 Kings 7:27-39. In order to convey water to any part of the courts where it might be needed for washing "such things as they offered for the burnt offering (2 Chron. 4:6),

The Molten Sea.

ten beautifully ornamented bronze trucks (A. V. 'bases of brass') were prepared, five of them being placed on the south and five on the north side of the altar. These trucks were all alike in form, size, and casting; and were square chests, four cubits long, the same wide, and three cubits with a turned-up rim. As no mention is made of a vessel in which was washed the parts of the victims offered in sacrifice, the laver probably served this purpose. No direction is given as to the kind of water to be used; but the Jewish commentators state that any kind might be employed, provided that it be renewed daily. "In the account of the offering by the woman suspected of adultery there is mention made of 'holy water' mixed with dust from the floor of the tabernacle, which the woman was to drink according to certain rites (Num. 5:17). Most probably this water was taken from the laver. Perhaps the same should be said of the 'water of purifying' (Num. 8:7), which was sprinkled on the Levites on the occasion of their consecration to the service of the Lord in the tabernacle" (Fairbairn). Like other sacred vessels, the laver was consecrated with oil (Lev. 8:10, 11). No mention is made in the Hebrew text of the mode of transporting the laver, but "in Num. 4:14, a passage is added in the LXX agreeing with the Samaritan version, which prescribes the method of packing it, viz., in a purple cloth, protected by a skin covering" (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

2. Temple Lavers. Owing to the increased number of priests and victims in Solomon's temple, greater facilities were needed for washing; ten lavers were used for the sacrifices and the "molten sea" for the ablutions of the priests (2 Chron. 4:6). Of these we have minuter descriptions than of the tabernacle laver. (1) The "molten sea" (Heb. יָאֹמֶן, yawm, sea). This was a huge round basin, five cubits high and ten cubits in diameter at the brim, "and a line of thirty cubits did compass it about" (1 Kings 7:23-26). Perhaps the circumference measurement was of the bowl at the water line, and not including the projected rim. It was made of strong bronze, a hand breadth in thickness. "Its brim was bent outward in a cuplike form, and made to resemble the flower of the lily, while underneath two rows of 'knops' (coluquintidas, i. e., wild cucumbers or apples), ten to every cubit, ran around the sea for ornament." In ten beautifully ornamented bronze trucks (A. V. 'bases of brass') were prepared, five of them being placed on the south and five on the north side of the altar. These trucks were all alike in form, size, and casting; and were square chests, four cubits long, the same wide, and three cubits high. They were constructed with flat panels (Heb. מִסְגָּרִים, mis-ghch'-reth, something inclosing, A. V. 'borders'), supported by stiles (Heb. שֵׁלֶבֶתִים, sheh-lab-beem, A. V. 'ledges'); the panels being ornamented with figures of lions, oxen, and cherubim." Each truck had four bronze wheels and bronze axles, and the four feet thereof had shoulderpieces (1 Kings 7:30). The meaning seems to be that the chests had feet at each corner, and that these rested upon the axles in such a manner as to raise the chest above the rim of the wheels (v. 32), and under the borders were four wheels. Keil supposes that the shoulderpieces ran up each corner from the foot and reached to the lower side of the laver, thus helping to support it (A. V. "under the laver were undersettlers, molten at the side of every addition," v. 30). The wheels were one and one half cubits high, in construction resembling that of chariot wheels, and their hubs, felloes, spokes, and axletrees were cast in bronze. The top of the trucks were constructed for the purpose of holding the lavers. They were made with stiles and panels, like the sides, but appear to have been arched so as to rise in the center, terminating in a circular receptacle (A. V. "chapter"), one half cubit high by one and one half diameter, for the laver. These stiles and panels were ornamented with graved cherubim, lions, and palm trees. The lavers were four cubits in diameter, corresponding with the trucks, narrowing down at the base to one and one half cubits, and held forty baths (about four hundred and forty gallons), just one fiftieth of the capacity of the great laver. Some have thought that these trucks were made of so great height in order to bring the laver near the height of the altar. It may be that these chests (trucks) opened at the sides, and were really tanks for washing the sacrifices in, the water coming into them from the lavers by means of a pipe. After use they could be wheeled away and cleansed.

3. In the second temple there appears to have been only one laver of brass, with twelve instead of two stopcocks, and a machine for raising water and filling it.

LAW (Heb. תּוֹרָה, to-rav', direction; Gr. νόμος, nom'os), a term which in the Scriptures almost universally refers to the revealed will of God with respect to human conduct. It includes all the divine commands and precepts for regulating man's moral life without and within. When the word has other applications the meaning may be readily discovered from the context.

1. The Scriptures recognize divine law, or a knowledge of the divine will, as a part of natural religion (see Acts 10:34, 35; Rom. 1:19, 20; 2:14-16). But this knowledge of the will of God confused and made imperfect by sin is not the law to which the Scriptures commonly refer.

2. The law is one of the chief contents of special revelation. The whole body of truth contained in the Scriptures may be comprehended under the two terms, the law and the Gospel. The relation between the two is one of the great questions of Christian theology and ethics; hence we observe further:

3. The law of God is perfect. Its statutes are appropriate expressions of divine authority, holiness, wisdom, goodness, and love. They are adapted to the necessities and welfare of mankind. They are conformed to the final end of divine government (see Psa. 19:7; 119:142; 97:2; Rom. 7:12; 1 John 5:3; Rev. 16:7).

4. The law as revealed in the Scriptures contains two elements, the permanent and universal, and the temporary and limited. The moral law revealed upon Sinai is for all men and all times. The special laws, ceremonial and otherwise, for the regulation of Jewish life under the old dispensation belonged exclusively to the Jews and were for that period (see LAW OF MOSES). It is these temporary enactments which the New Testament Scriptures declare to be abolished under the Gospel (John 4:20-24; Acts 21:21; Rom. 2:29; Gal. 5:1-6; Heb. 8:13).

5. The permanent and universally binding element in divine law is, however, to be viewed under the Gospel under new aspects. (1) It received a new sanction from Christ, inasmuch as he expressly approved and ratified its various items, and exhibited in his own life its perfect fulfillment (see Matt. 19:17-19; John 8:46; Heb. 4:15). (2) At the same time its spiritual character was unfolded, and its meaning more deeply and broadly manifested. Love is declared to be the fulfilling of the law, but it is a love which finds in Christ its highest and most practical example. The law thus is to be looked upon as a life principle which includes not only those obligations which are of universal requirement, but also those individual duties which are based upon the particular circumstances and relationships of individuals (see Matt. 22:37-40; Rom. 12:8-10; Phil. 2:2-12, et al.). (3) In the economy of grace man's fulfillment of the law is not a condition of his salvation. This, however, is a point of such importance as to call for most careful consideration. Under the old dispensation were manifestations of grace as offerings for sin and the exercise of divine mercy in forgiving sinners. This was in anticipation of Christ, who by his gracious atonement brought salvation to a sinful world. It is impossible for men to be saved otherwise than through the grace of God in Christ (see Acts 4:12; Rom. 3:20-23; Tit. 3:5, et al.). And beyond this necessity for forgiveness of the sins of the past there remains even in believers mental and moral weaknesses which make them constantly dependent upon divine mercy (see Matt. 6:12; James 3:2; 1 John 1:8-10; 2:1, 2). The law nevertheless has a most important place in connection with the Gospel. It reveals to sinners their sin, and brings them to the Saviour (see Rom. 7:9-13; Gal. 3:24). It is the rule and standard of holy living, to be known in its depth and breadth more and more completely, and to be strenuously applied in the strength and spirit of the divine Master (Rom. 6:1, 2; 12:2). It is the test of the reality of repentance and faith, and of the new life implanted by the Holy Spirit (see Matt. 7:21, 29; John 15:14; Heb. 8:10; James 2:17, 18; 1 John 2:3, 4). It is a criterion with respect to which will be the allotments of the final judgment. See JUDGMENT, THE FINAL; also ATONEMENT; IMPUTATION; SANCTIFICATION.

LAW OF MOSES (Heb. תּוֹרַת מֹשֶׁה, to-raw' Mo-sheh), signifies the whole body of Mosaic legislation (1 Kings 2:3; 2 Kings 23:25; Ezra 3:2); with reference to its divine origin the law of Jehovah (Heb. יְהוָה יְהוָה, Psa. 19:8; 37:31; Isa. 5:24; 30:9). In the latter sense it is called by way of eminence, THE LAW (Heb. הַתּוֹרָה, hat-to-raw', Deut. 1:5; 4:8, 44; 17:18, 19; 27:3, 8). The law is especially embodied in the last four books of the Pentateuch. Respecting the question of the origin of the Mosaic law, we quote from Dr. J. Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, p. 335, sq. "It occurs at once as a striking thing that the uniform tradition is, that Moses gave laws and ordinances to Israel; and that it is not a blind ascription of everything to some great ancestor may be gathered from the fact that there are ordinances and customs which are not traced to him. The Sabbath is made as old as the creation; circumcision is a mark of the covenant with Abraham; sacrifices are pre-Mosaic; and the abstaining from the sinew that shrank is traced to the time of Jacob. The body of laws, however, that formed the constitution of Israel as a people is invariably referred to Moses. The persistence with which it is represented that law, moral and ceremonial, came from Moses, and the acceptance of the laws by the whole people as of Mosaic origin, proves at least that it was a deeply-seated belief in the nation that the great leader had given some formal legal constitution to his people. . . . The testimony of a nation is not so lightly to be set aside; it is the work of criticism to explain and account for tradition, not to give it the lie."

Principles. At the root of the Mosaic code lies (1) the principle of strict but righteous retribution, and its intention is to extirpate evil and produce reverence for the righteousness of the holy God in the heart of the people; (2) Punishment should correspond to the heinousness of the offense, that there shall fall upon the culprit what he has done to his neighbor; the punishment is to be limited to the guilty party, and not be extended to his children (Deut. 24:16); (3) It commands with unsparing severity the punishment of all presumptuous disobedience to God and to his holy ordinances; and, (4) finally, "it threatens a curse and severe punishments from God, the avenger of all evil, for offenses which either escape the eye of civil justice, or which, like apostasy from the Lord to idolatry, may prevail to such a degree that the arm of the earthly magistrate is overpowered and paralyzed by the spirit of the time." In analyzing the Mosaic code we adopt the division usual in systems of law—the civil, criminal, judicial, constitutional, ecclesiastical, and ceremonial.

1. Civil. (1) Of persons. (a) OF FATHER AND CHILDREN. The authority of the father to be sacred; cursing, smiting (Exod. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9); stubborn and willful disobedience to be considered as capital crimes; but punishment of death was vested only in the congregation (Deut. 21:18–21); vow of daughter conditional upon consent of father (Num. 30:3–5). Inheritance. Right of the firstborn to a double portion not to be set aside by partiality (Deut. 21:15–17); inheritance allowed to daughters in default of sons, if the heiress married within her own tribe (Num. 27:6–8; comp. ch. 36); unmarried daughters entirely dependent upon their fathers (30:3–5). (b) HUSBAND AND WIFE. The power of husband over wife such as to make the wife dependent even to the fulfilling of an engagement before God, as in case of a vow (30:6–15); but a widow or divorced wife became independent, and was bound by any vow she may have made (v. 9); upon marriage the husband was excused from war or public duties for one year (Deut. 24:5); marriages within certain degrees were forbidden (Lev. 18:1, sq.); divorce for "uncleanness" allowed, but the divorced wife could not be taken back after marriage to another (Deut. 24:1–4); slander against a wife's virginity punishable by fine and by deprivation of power of divorce, but if wife was proven guilty she was put to death (Deut. 22:13–21); a slave wife, bought or captive, not to be actual property, nor to be sold; if ill-treated, freed (Exod. 21:7–9; Deut. 21:1, sq.); raising up of seed (Levitical law) a right to be claimed by widow with a view of preserving the family (Deut. 25:5–10). (c) MASTER AND SLAVE. Power of master limited, so that death under chastisement was punishable (Exod. 21:20), and maiming gave liberty (vers. 26, 27); Hebrew slave freed at the Sabbatical year (his wife and children, if they entered bondage with him, to go out with him), unless he formally consented to remain in perpetual servitude (Exod. 21:1–6; Deut. 15:12–18); but in any case he seems to have received his freedom and that of his children at the jubilee (Lev. 25:10); if sold to a resident alien ("stranger"), he was always redeemable, at a price proportional to the distance from the jubilee (25:47–54). Foreign slaves were held and inherited as property forever (25:45, 46), and fugitive slaves from other nations were not to be given up (Deut. 23:15). (d) STRANGERS seem never to have been sui juris, or able to protect themselves; and kindness toward them was enjoined as a duty (Exod. 22:21; Lev. 19:33, 34). (2) Law of things. (a) LAND AND PROPERTY. All land was considered as belonging to Jehovah, with its holders as his tenants (Lev. 25:23); sold land, therefore, was to return to its original owners at the jubilee, the price of sale to be calculated accordingly, and redemption on equitable terms to be allowed at all times (25:25–28); a house sold to be redeemed within one year, and if not, to pass away altogether (25:29, 30); land to rest in Sabbatic and jubilee years, and spontaneous growth of these years to be for poor, stranger, etc. (Lev. 23:22; Deut. 24:19–21). Houses of Levites, or those in unwallled villages, to be redeemed at any time, in the same way as land, and Levitical suburbs inalienable (Lev. 25:31–34); sanctified land or houses, tithes, or unclean firstlings might be redeemed at the addition of one fifth their value (reckoned by priest according to distance from the jubilee), if devoted and unredeemed by owner, to be hallowed at the jubilee forever, and given to the priests (25:14–39); Inheritance (q. v.). The following were the regulations respecting losses: If two men strove together, and as a result one should be disabled from work, the other must pay for the lost time (Exod.

21:19); claims for losses from trespass, or for any lost thing, were to be brought before the judges, and adverse judgment was followed by the payment of double to the other (22:9); a man finding any lost thing, and denying it, was obliged, when he wished to present a trespass offering, to restore the lost thing with an added fifth to the one to whom it belonged (Lev. 6:4, 5). The general principle upon which these enactments were based was that an Israelite's fellow-countrymen were his brothers; and he was always to act the brotherly part. Therefore, whenever he found anything that was lost he was commanded to care for it, and to make diligent search for its owner with a view of restoration (Deut. 22:3). (b) LAW OF DEBT. All debts to an Israelite to be released at the Sabbatical year, but they might be exacted of strangers (Deut. 15:1-11); interest, from an Israelite, not to be taken (Exod. 22:25-27; Deut. 23:19, 20). Pledges not to be insolently or ruinously exacted (Deut. 24:6, 10-13, 17, 18). (c) TAXATION. Census money, a poll-tax (of a half shekel) to be paid for the service of the tabernacle (Exod. 30:12-16); spoil in war, divided equally between combatants and the congregation, of the combatant's half one five hundredth, and of the people's one fiftieth, given as a heave offering unto the Lord (Num. 31:26, sq.); Tithes (q. v.); poor laws providing for the legal right of the poor to glean fields and vineyards (Lev. 19:9, 10; Deut. 24:19-22); for the hungry to eat of grain, etc., on the spot (Deut. 23:24, 25); for payment of wages daily (24:15); maintenance of priests, see PRIEST.

2. Criminal. (1) Offenses against God, which were considered as treason. These offenses were all forbidden, in principle, by the Ten Commandments. FIRST COMMAND. Acknowledgment of false gods (Exod. 22:20), and all idolatry (Deut., ch. 13; 17:2-5). SECOND COMMAND. Witchcraft and false prophecy (Exod. 22:18; Deut. 18:9-22; Lev. 19:31). THIRD COMMAND. Blasphemy (Lev. 24:15, 16). FOURTH COMMAND. Sabbath breaking (Num. 15:32-36). Punishment in all cases, death by stoning. Idolatrous cities to be utterly destroyed. (2) Offenses against man. FIFTH COMMAND. Parents, disobedience to, cursing, or smiting of (Exod. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; Deut. 21:18-21); also disobedience to priest or supreme judge. Punishment, death by stoning (comp. 1 Kings 21:10-14; 2 Chron. 24:21). SIXTH COMMAND. (1) Murder, punished without sanctuary, reprove, or satisfaction (Exod. 21:12, 14; Deut. 19:11-13). If in a quarrel a pregnant woman is struck, and she lose her child, fine was exacted; but if she suffered other injury, full retribution (Exod. 21:22, sq.). Death of a slave actually under the rod to be punished (21:20, 21). (2) Death by an ox known to gore, punishable by death of ox and owner, but as this was not an intentional crime the owner was allowed to redeem his forfeited life by expiation money (21:28-30). (3) Accidental homicide, escaped the avenger by flight to city of refuge till death of high priest (Num. 35:9-28; Deut. 4:41-43; 19:4-10). (4) Death at hands of unknown person, to be expiated by formal disavowal and sacrifice by elders of the nearest city (Deut. 21:1-9). SEVENTH COMMAND. (1) Adultery, punished by death of both offenders; rape of married or betrothed woman, by death of offender (22:22-27). (2) Rape or seduction of unbetrothed virgin, to be compensated by marriage, with dowry (fifty shekels), and without power of divorce; or, if she be refused, by payment of full dowry (Exod. 22:16, 17; Deut. 22:28, 29). (3) Unlawful marriages (incestuous, etc.), to be punished, some by death, some by childlessness (Lev., ch. 20). EIGHTH COMMAND. (1) Theft. Stolen property found on thief, if an ox, ass, or sheep, punished by twofold restoration; if killed or sold, then restoration to be made, fivefold for an ox and fourfold for a sheep (Exod. 22:1-4). If unable to make restitution, thief might be sold (v. 3); if he was killed while breaking in the thief might be slain as an outlaw (v. 2). (2) Trespass, injury to things or money lent, to be compensated (22:5-15). (3) Perversion of justice, by bribes, threats, etc., strictly forbidden (23:6-9). (4) Kidnapping, to be punished by death (Deut. 24:7). NINTH COMMAND. False witness, punished with that which he wished done to the one against whom he testified (Exod. 23:1-3; Deut. 19:16-21). Slander of a wife's chastity punished by fine and loss of power of divorce (Deut. 22:18, 19). TENTH COMMAND. For the tenth commandment, see DECALOGUE, 8. In addition to the above, it was forbidden to remove boundary lines, under penalty of a curse (Deut. 27:17); neighbor's straying beast to be returned (Exod. 23:4, sq.), or helped if in trouble (Deut. 22:1-4); injury done to the field or vineyard of another by beast or fire, to be compensated by best of one's own (Exod. 22:5); the killing of a beast to be made good, beast for beast (Lev. 24:18); a blemish caused to another punished by lex talionis, or damages (Exod. 21:18, 19, 22-25; Lev. 24:19, 20).

LAW, ADMINISTRATION OF.

1. Judges and Courts. (1) Early courts.

In patriarchal times the head of the house had the judicial power over his household, even over life and death (Gen. 38:24). With the increase of families this power naturally passed over to the heads of tribes and clans; but after the exodus those who sought justice naturally turned to Moses (Exod. 18:13, sq.). Moses, unable to keep up with the demands made upon him, acting on Jethro's advice, chose from among the elders "able men, such as feared God, men of truth, hating covetousness." These he appointed as rulers over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, who should act as judges in all small matters, while the more difficult matters should be brought to Moses for decision (Exod. 18:19-26; Deut. 1:13-18). The relation of these judges to one another is not exactly defined in Scripture; but it may have consisted in this, that the judges over thousands were appointed to settle the disputes between the tribes and chief clans of the people; the judges over hundreds, etc., the quarrels and the different contentions between the larger and smaller divisions of the clans and families. (2) Local courts. After the entrance into Canaan the same general rules remained in force. For this period there is only the quite general command: "Judges and officers (shoterim) shalt thou make thee in all thy gates (cities), that they may judge the people with just judgment" (Deut. 16:18). These officials were the local justices, who, in the several cities, pronounced finally on all minor controversies, i. e., such as were easy to decide by law, and to punish the guilty. For more difficult cases, viz., such as had been referred to Moses, a higher court is appointed, having its seat at the place of the sanctuary, and to consist of priests and judges; with the high priest and a (secular) supreme judge (Deut. 17:8; 19:16, sq.). In this court the lay judge conducted the investigation (19:18), while the priest gave guidance from the law (Lev. 10:11); finally the judge pronounced sentence. (3) Senate. Besides these local courts, the elders of every city formed a senate or magistracy, whose duty it was, as representatives of the congregation, to remove the evil from the midst of them. This senate decided various simple family matters which required no deeper judicial investigation, punished the guilty even with death, and delivered up the deliberate manslayer to the avenger of blood (Deut. 19:12). Among the cases which came under the jurisdiction of this senate were a rebellious son (21:18, sq.), a husband's charge against the virgin chastity of his wife (22:13, sq.), and the refusal in the matter of levirate marriage (q. v.). These matters belonged rather to the department of government than to the administration of justice in the strict sense; and the elders took up these cases as the upholders of good order. In David's time. David, after his wars, arranged the affairs of his kingdom; and among other appointments set apart six thousand Levites to be shoterim and judges (1 Chron. 23:4; comp. 26:29). It is doubtful if these Levites were associated with the local courts, the probability being that they were appointed to administer the payments of the people for the sanctuary, to watch over them, and in disputed cases to give judicial decisions. Jehoshaphat, desirous of spreading the knowledge of the law (2 Chron. 17:7-9), put judges in all the fortified cities (19:5-7), and provided a supreme tribunal in Jerusalem, consisting of Levites, priests, and heads of tribes, presided over by the high priest (for the interest of Jehohai) and the prince of the house of Judah (for the king's interest), with functions of an exclusively judicial character. Post-exilic times. Josephus (Wars, ii, 14, 1) mentions local courts that discharged judicial functions; and local sanhedrins are referred to as those to which the believers would be delivered (Matt. 10:17; Mark 13:9). These lesser courts were empowered to deal with criminal cases of a serious nature, even to the sentencing of murderers. We may also regard as belonging to the same category those courts that in Matt. 5:22, are assumed to be inferior to the high court of the sanhedrin; and similarly with regard to the "elders" of Capernaum (Luke 7:3). The most subordinate of these courts consisted of seven persons; although three judges were considered sufficient to decide certain cases. There is a statement in the Mishna to the effect that an inferior sanhedrin consisted of twenty-three persons, and that one of this sort was assigned to every town with a population of at least one hundred and twenty, or, according to R. Nehemiah's view, of at least two hundred and thirty, in order that there might be a judge for every ten inhabitants. (4) The Sanhedrin, the great council in latter times (see SANHEDRIN).

2. Judicial Procedure. The course of justice was very simple. The judges appointed by Moses were to judge the people "at all seasons" (Exod. 18:22); while the lawgiver himself sat with Aaron and the princes of the congregation before the tabernacle (Num. 27:2; comp. Exod. 18:19, sq.). Judges in the cities, after the custom of the ancient East, had their seat at the gate (Deut. 21:19; 22:15; Prov. 22:22; Amos 5:11, 15) and on the open squares. Before them the litigants appeared, and presented their case orally (Deut. 1:16; 21:19; 25:1); and the accused who did not appear was summoned (25:8); counsel are unknown in the Old Testament. The supreme judges of the people administered justice in public; e. g., Deborah under a palm (Judg. 4:5), the king in the gate or court of the palace (2 Sam. 15:2, 6; comp. 14:4, sq.; 1 Kings 3:16); Solomon made a porch of judgment in his palace (1 Kings 7:7). Later the princes sat for judgment at the entrance of the new gate of the temple (Jer. 26:10, sq.). The judge was bound to hear and examine closely (Deut. 1:16, sq.; 13:14). The proof varied according to circumstances. It might be a simple oath (Exod. 22:11), the word of accuser if a parent (21:18), a token (Deut. 22:15, 17). Generally the declarations of witnesses were taken, and those of two or three were required to make testimony valid (19:15), especially in criminal cases (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6). Witnesses were to be rigidly questioned, and if a witness was found to be false he was to be punished with the punishment which would have fallen upon the accused (Deut. 19:18, 19). From Prov. 18:18; 16:33, it would appear that other evidence lacking the lot was applied, though it is not mentioned in the Pentateuch, but only in Josh. 7:14, and 1 Sam. 14:40, sq., as an immediate divine decision. Sentence. Sentence was pronounced orally, although under the kings the judges seem to have written their sentences (Isa. 10:1). Punishment. This was executed without delay (Num. 15:36; Deut. 22:18); was administered before the judge (Deut. 25:2, sq.), probably by the officers of the court; if capital it was stoning by the whole congregation (Num. 15:36) or the people of the city (Deut. 22:21), the witnesses being the first to cast a stone (13:9; 17:9), which could hardly be expected of a witness who was not fully satisfied of the truth of his testimony; or by the avenger of blood (Num. 35:19, sq.). After the introduction of the kingdom punishment was administered by the servants of the king (2 Sam. 1:15), or by the royal guard in case of state or reasonable offenses (1 Kings 2:25, 34, 46; 2 Kings 10:25).

LAWGIVER (Heb. מְדוּקֵן, meh-kho-kake'; Gr. νομοθέτης, nom-olh-et'-ace), used in the usual sense of lawgiver (Deut. 33:21; Isa. 33:22); of God as the supreme lawgiver and judge (James 4:12); but elsewhere a scepter, as a badge of power (Num. 21:18; Psa. 60:7; Gen. 49:10).

LAWYER (Gr. νομικός, nom-ik-os', according to law), a term used to signify one who is conversant with the law, "jurist" (Matt. 22:35; Luke 7:30; 10:25; 11:45; 14:3; Tit. 3:13), and probably applied to a scribe (q. v.) in his practical administration of the law in the pronouncement of legal decisions. It is not accidentally that the expression is so frequently used by St. Luke. He purposes by the repetition to make clear to his Roman readers the character of the Jewish scribes.

LAY. See GLOSSARY.

LAZ'ARUS (Gr. Λάζαρος, lad'-zar-os, abridged form of Heb. Eleazar).

1. A beggar named in the parable of Dives (Luke 16:20-25), whose patient piety in this world was rewarded with bliss in the other. This is the only instance of a proper name being given in a parable.

2. A man of Bethany, and the brother of Mary and Martha. He was a personal friend of Jesus, by whom he was raised from the dead four days after his burial (John 11:1-44). Later, when a supper was given to our Lord, Lazarus was present, and many people gathered through a desire to see the resurrected man. So convincing an evidence of Jesus's power was very distasteful to the chief priests, and they "consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death" (12:1-10). This they probably did not do, but satisfied themselves with the death of Jesus. According to an old tradition in Epiphanius (Hæc., lvi, 34, p. 652), Lazarus was thirty years old when restored to life, and lived thirty years after.

LEAD. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

LEAF (Heb. אֵלֶף, aw-leh', coming up). Fig leaves are mentioned as forming the first covering of Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:7).

Figurative. Leaves, as the outward manifestation of life in the tree, are used symbolically, as: a bright, fresh-colored leaf, showing that it is richly nourished, is figurative of prosperity (Psa. 1:3; Jer. 17:8); a faded leaf, on the contrary, showing a lack of moisture and nourishment, becomes an emblem of adversity and decay (Job 13:25; Isa. 64:6). In Ezekiel's vision of the holy waters the blessings of Messiah's kingdom are spoken of under the image of trees growing on a river's bank and with fadeless leaves (Ezek. 47:12), which should be good as medicine (comp. Rev. 22:1, 2).

Leaf of a door (Heb. פֶּתַח, tsay-law', a side). Keil (Com. in loc.) thinks that this refers to doors made in two sections, like the "Dutch doors," that could be open either above or below. Their height in this case would be sufficient to allow the priests to pass through with the lower half only open. In Isa. 45:1, a "two-leaved gate" refers to a double gate. Leaf of a book (Heb. פֶּתַח, deh'-leth). In Jer. 36:23, it is said that "when Jehudi had read three or four leaves he cut it (the roll) with the penknife." "Leaves" here denotes the columns, the four-cornered squares into which the rolls were divided.

LEAGUE. See COVENANT.

LE'AH (Heb. לֵאָה, lay-aw', weary), the eldest daughter of Laban, who by a deceit of her father became the wife of Jacob (Gen. 29:16-23). She was not so good-looking as her sister Rachel, having weak eyes, which is probably the reason of Jacob's preference for the younger sister. Leah had six sons, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah (29:32-35), Issachar, and Zebulun (30:17-20), and a daughter, Dinah (v. 21). She probably died in Canaan, as she is not mentioned in the migration to Egypt (46:6), and was buried in Hebron (49:31).

LEANNOTH (Psa. 88, title), a musical term. See MUSIC, TERMS.

LEASING, an old English word equivalent to lying. Lies, as elsewhere rendered. See GLOSSARY.

LEATHER. See HANDICRAFT, WRITING.

LEAVEN. 1. Hebrew and Greek Terms.

(1) Sch-ore' (Heb. שֵׂוֹרֵה). This occurs only five times in Scripture, in four of which (Exod. 12:15, 19; 13:7; Lev. 2:11) it is rendered "leaven," and in the fifth (Deut. 16:4) "leavened bread." It was probably the remnant of dough left from the preceding baking, which had fermented and turned acid. Its distinctive meaning is fermented or leavened mass. It might in this way apply to the murk or lees of wine. (2) Khaw-mates' (Heb. חַמֵּץ), should be rendered ferment, and is applied to both liquids and solids. In Num. 6:3, it is an adjective, and should be rendered "fermented wine" and not "vinegar of wine." The Talmudists tell us that this species of wine was given to persons about to be executed, mingled with drugs, to stupefy them (Prov. 31:6; comp. Matt. 27:48). (3) Mats-tsaw' (Heb. מַצָּה, sweet), means without leaven (Lev. 10:12). (4) Dzoo'-may (Gr. ζύμη) is used with the same latitude of meaning as Nos. 1 and 2.

2. Preparation. "In early times leaven was made from fine white bran, kneaded with must, or from the meal of certain plants such as fitch and vetch, or from barley mixed with water, and then allowed to stand till it turned sour. In later times it was made from bread flour, kneaded without salt, and kept so long until it passed into a state of fermentation."

3. Levitical Regulations. The Mosaic law strictly forbade the use of leaven in the altar service: "No meat (meal) offering which ye shall bring unto the Lord shall be made with leaven: for ye shall burn no leaven . . . in any offering of the Lord made by fire" (Lev. 2:11). The reason that leaven was kept aloof from the altar is thus stated by Rabbi R. Grossman, D.D. (S. S. Times): "The offering was to be the type of purity and moral health, and leaven, whose nature is to disintegrate, to corrupt, is eo ipso out of harmony with the central idea of the sacrificial ritual. The interdiction of leaven bears the same relation to the bloodless offerings that the prohibition of a sickly unsound animal bears to the bloody sacrifices (Lev. 3:1). As the latter was prohibited because the animal that is to serve as the expression of human to March. During the summer the higher parts of the mountain are cool and pleasant, rain seldom falling between June 1 and September 20.

History. Lebanon is first mentioned (Deut. 1:7; 11:24) as a boundary of the country promised to Israel; and to those who had lived in Egypt or the desert Lebanon must have seemed a paradise. It was originally inhabited by a number of independent, warlike tribes, some of whom Joshua conquered near Lake Merom (Josh. 11:2-18). They are said to have been of Phœnician stock (Pliny, v, 17; Eusebius, Onom., s. v.; comp. 1 Kings 5). Farther north were the Hivites (Judg. 3:3), the Gibeonites and Arkites. The Israelites never completely subdued them, but the Phœnicians appear to have had them under their power, as they supplied themselves and Solomon with timber from their forests (1 Kings 5:9-11; Ezek. 27:9, sq.). Still later the king of Assyria felled its timber for his military engines (Isa. 14:8; 37:24; Ezek. 31:16). In the fourth century B. C. the whole country was incorporated with the country or kingdom of the Seleucidæ. At present Lebanon is inhabited by Christians (Maronites and Druses) and Anti-Lebanon by Mohammedans, and is under a Turkish ruler.

Figurative. Lebanon is used to symbolize that which is great, strong, beautiful, as: (1) The army of Asshur (Isa. 10:34); (2) A proud people (Isa. 29:17); (3) The Jews (Jer. 22:6, 23; Hab. 2:17); (4) Perhaps of the temple, in which was timber from Lebanon; (5) The Church (Isa. 35:2; 60:13; Cant. 4:11, etc.); (6) mourning of Lebanon, of deep affliction (Ezek. 31:15).

LEBA'OTH (Josh. 15:32), see BETH-LEBAOTH.

LEBBE'US or LEBBÆ'US (Gr. Λεββαῖος, leb-bah'-yos, courageous), a surname of Judas or Jude (Matt. 10:3), one of the twelve apostles. He was called also Thaddæus, which Meyers (Com., in loco) thinks was his regular apostolic name.

LEBONAH (Heb. לְבוֹנָה, leb-o-naw', frankincense), a town near Shiloh, north of the spot where the young men of Benjamin were directed to capture the Shilonite maidens at the yearly festival (Judg. 21:19). It is, doubtless, the same as Lubban.

LE'CAH (Heb. לָקַח, lay-kaw', a journey), a place in the tribe of Judah founded by Er (1 Chron. 4:21), not elsewhere mentioned.

LEDGE (Heb. שֹׁלֵב, shaw-lawb', a term used in the description of the lavers of the temple (1 Kings 7:28, 29), and meaning, perhaps, the base running round and supporting the work within. The term yawd (Heb. יָד, a hand) would seem to be the upright stile (v. 35).

LEECH. See ANIMAL KINGDOM (HORSELEECH).

LEEKs. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

LEES (Heb. שֵׁמֶר, sheh'-mer, something preserved). "Wines on the lees" are wines which have been left to stand upon their lees after the first fermentation is over, which have thus thoroughly fermented, and have been kept a long time, and which are then filtered before drinking; hence wine both strong and clear; in which case it was used figuratively for the full enjoyment of blessedness in the perfected kingdom of God (Isa. 25:6). Allowed to remain upon the lees, the wine became thick and syrupy, and symbolized the sloth, indifference, and gross stupidity of the ungodly (Jer. 48:11; Zeph. 1:12). To drink the lees ("dregs," A. V., Psa. 75:8) was an expression for the endurance of extreme punishment.

LEFT (Heb. שְׂמֹאל, sem-ole', dark; Gr. εὐσπυμος, yoo-o'-noo-mos, of good omen). The left hand was esteemed of ill omen, hence the term sinister as equivalent to unfortunate. This was especially the case among the Greeks and Romans. "The Greek term was used in taking auguries; but these omens were euphemistically called εὐσπυμα, which in fact were regarded as unlucky, i. e., which came from the left, sinister omens (for which a good name was desired)" (Grimm, Lex., s. v.). Among the Hebrews the left hand indicated the north (Gen. 14:15; Job 23:9), the person's face being supposed to be turned toward the East.

LEFT-HANDED (Heb. יְמִינִי, shut as to his right hand), a term applied to one who is unable to skillfully use his right hand (Judg. 3:15; 20:16). It can hardly mean an ambidexter, since the expression "shut as to his right hand" would preclude the fact of ability to use both hands alike. An instance of using both hands dexterously is given in 1 Chron. 12:2. Perhaps this power of using the left hand may have come through cultivation.

LEG, the rendering of several words in the A. V.:

1. Kaw-raw' (Heb. כַּרְסֵי, the lower limb, the shank (Exod. 12:9; 29:17; Lev. 1:9, 13; 4:11, etc.).

2. Shoke (Heb. שׁוֹק, the shin, but used of the whole limb, e. g., of a person (Deut. 28:35; Psa. 147:10; Prov. 26:7). It is also used of the "thigh" (Isa. 47:2; in the phrase "hip and thigh," Judg. 15:8).

3. Rel'-gel (Heb. רֵגֶל, properly the foot (1 Sam. 17:6).

4. Improperly for show'-bel (Heb. שֹׁבֵל, the train or trailing dress of a woman (Isa. 47:2), and of tseh'-aw-daw' (Heb. צַיְטֵרָה), an ornamental chain for the ankle).

The bones of the legs of persons crucified were broken to hasten death (John 19:31). See CRUCIFIXION.

LEGERDEMAIN. See MAGIC.

LEGION, a main division of the Roman army, nearly equivalent to our regiment. It comprised a much larger number of men, running from three thousand men to about six thousand at the time of Christ. See ARMY.

Figurative. The word legion came to mean a great number or multitude, e. g., of angels (Matt. 26:53) and of evil spirits (Mark 5:9; comp. v. 15).

LE'HABIM (Heb. לְהַבִּים, leh-haw-beem'), a people reckoned among the Midianitish stock (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11). Authorities differ as to their identification. Sayce (Higher Crit. and Mon., p. 135) says: "The Lehabim are the fair-haired, blue-eyed Libyans, who as far back as the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties had been incorporated into the Egyptian army. At one time they occupied much the same place in Egyptian history as was subsequently occupied by the Lydians, and it is probable that the twenty-second dynasty, that of Shishak, was of Libyan extraction, and owed its rise to power to the influence of the Libyan troops."

LE'HI (Heb. לֶהִי, lekh'-ee, a cheek, or jawbone), the place in Judah where Samson slew the Philistines with a jawbone (Judg. 15:9, 14, 16). The R. V. has in Judg. 15:19, "the hollow place that is in Lehi." The spring in the hollow place he called En-hakkore, the fountain of him that prayed.

LEM'UEL (Heb. לֵמְוֵאל, lem-oo-ale', belonging to God), a person of whom nothing is known, except that to him the admonitory apothegms of from the society of men (vers. 45, 46). While thus excluded the leper was to wear mourning costume, rend his clothes, leave the hair of his head disordered, keep the beard covered (Ezek. 27:17, 22), and cry "Unclean! unclean!" that everyone might avoid him for fear of being defiled (Lam. 4:15), and as long as the disease lasted he was to dwell apart without the camp (Lev. 13:45, 46; Num. 5:2, sq.; 12:15, etc.). Respecting the symptoms the priest was to decide as to whether they indicated leprosy or some other disease. (2) Purification. "The ceremonial prescribed for the purification of persons cured of leprosy is based upon the idea that this malady is the bodily symbol, not so much of sin merely as of death." Accordingly the rite of purification resolved itself into two parts: (1) The readmission of the sufferer (Lev. 14:1-9), who had been looked upon as dead, into the society of the living, and

"Ten Men That Were Lepers."

Prov. 31:2-9, were addressed by his mother. The rabbinical commentators identify Lemuel with Solomon, which seems the most likely conjecture. Others (as Grotius) refer the epithet to Hezekiah, while others (as Gesenius) think that it refers to some neighboring petty Arabian prince.

LEND. See LOAN.

LENTILE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

LEOPARD. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. The leopard is illustrative of God in his judgments (Hos. 13:7); of the Macedonian kingdom (Dan. 7:6); of Antichrist (Rev. 13:2); tamed, of the wicked subdued by truth and grace (Isa. 11:6).

LEPER (Heb. לֵצַרֵּעַ, tsaw-rah', intransitive, smitten). LEPROSY (Heb. לֵצַרֵּעִית, tsaw-rah'-ath, a smiting). Concerning the nature of leprosy, see DISEASES. Here will be considered the Mosaic regulations respecting the existence of leprosy and the purification therefrom. The law for leprosy treats of:

1. Leprosy in Man. (1) Symptoms, etc. The priest was to decide whether the leprosy was: (a) In its dangerous forms when appearing on the skin (Lev. 13:2-28), on the head and beard (vers. 29-37); (b) in harmless forms (vers. 38, 39); and (c) when appearing on a bald head (vers. 40-44); (d) instructions were given for removal of the leper preparation for his return to fellowship with the covenant people. This ceremony, therefore, took place without the camp. The officiating priest caused two clean and living birds, along with some cedar wood, scarlet wool, and hyssop to be brought. One of the birds was killed over running water, i. e., water from a spring or stream, in such a way that the blood would flow into the water. He then dipped into this the living bird, the cedar, the scarlet wool, and the hyssop—the symbol of duration of life, vigor of life, and purity. He then sprinkled it seven times upon the leper, after which the living bird was set free, thus symbolizing that the leper was at liberty to return to society. The slain bird, though not having a sacrificial character, seems intended to show that the leper was saved from death by intervention of divine mercy. The sprinkling was repeated seven times. The symbolical cleansing was followed by the shaving off of the hair, which was peculiarly liable to be affected by the leprosy; bathing the body in water, and washing the clothes. (2) Admission to camp (Lev. 14:10-32), i. e., to resume living in his tent, was obtained after a second cleansing, on the eighth day. On this day the priest presented the candidate, with the necessary offerings, before the Lord. These offerings were: two he-lambs, one ewe lamb, three tenth deals flour mingled with oil, and one log of oil. The priest waved one of the he-lambs and the log of oil for a trespass offering. The lamb was then slain, and some of the blood was put upon the tip of the ear, the hand, and the foot of the person. These same organs were afterward anointed with oil, and after the priest had sprinkled some of the oil seven times before the Lord the remainder was poured upon the head of the person to be dedicated. The she-lamb was then offered for a sin offering, for the purpose of making atonement (v. 19), after which the burnt and meat offerings were presented. In case the person was poor he offered one lamb, two turtledoves, or two young pigeons (vers. 21-22). Thus the restored leper was admitted again to communion with the altar and Israel.

2. Leprosy in a House. The law concerning this was made known to Moses, as intended for the time when Israel should possess Canaan and dwell in houses. This leprosy manifested its presence by depressions of a greenish or reddish color on the walls, and was of vegetable formation. When these indications were observed the owner of the house reported to the priest, who directed that the whole contents of the house should be taken out, in order to prevent everything within it from becoming unclean. He then examined the walls of the house, and if he saw symptoms of the plague ordered the house closed for seven days. If on the seventh day the leprosy gave evidence of spreading he ordered the affected stones to be removed, the inside of the house to be scraped, the affected parts removed without the city, the stones thus removed replaced by others, and the walls plastered with fresh mortar. If, after these precautions, the evil should reappear, the leprosy was pronounced of a malignant type, the house was pulled down, while stones, timber, and rubbish were removed to an unclean place without the city. Any person entering the house, who ate or slept in it, was accounted unclean and was required to wash his clothes. If it was found that the plague had not spread after the house was plastered, the priest declared it free from the disease, and after sprinkling it seven times with the same kind of sprinkling water as was used in the case of human leprosy, he purified it, and made atonement for it that it might be clean (Lev. 14:33-53).

3. Leprosy in Fabrics. The leprosy in woolen or linen fabrics and leather is probably the result of damp or ill ventilation, causing the material to rot. Leprosy in woolen or linen clothes or fabrics, or in leather, was also indicated by greenish or reddish spots upon them. The presence of these were reported to the priest, who ordered the affected article to be shut up for seven days. If the spots had spread by the eighth day, the article was burned; if not, it was ordered washed and shut up another seven days. If then similar spots appeared, the article or material was burned; but if the leprous spot had yielded to the washing but left a stain, the stained portion was cut out and the remainder pronounced clean. In case no further indication of the disease appeared, the material was washed the second time and pronounced clean (Lev. 13:47-59). The Jewish laws exempt dyed material from liability to leprosy.

LE'SHEM (Heb. לֶשֶׁם, leh'-shem, a gem), a city in North Palestine (Josh. 19:47), elsewhere called LAISH (q. v.).

LET. See GLOSSARY.

LET'HECH (Heb. לֶחֶךְ, leh'-thek), a Hebrew word in margin of Hos. 3:2, and meaning a measure for grain. In the A. V. it is rendered "a half homer." See METROLOGY, II.

LETTER is used both as an alphabetical character (see WRITING and EPISTLE). The words of the apostle (Gal. 6:11), "Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand," is thus explained by Meyer (Com., in loc.): "In accordance with his well-known manner in other passages, Paul adds to the letter, which up to this point he had dictated, the conclusion from verse 11 onward in his own handwriting. . . . But this close of our epistle was intended to catch the eyes of the readers as something so especially important, that from verse 12 to the end the apostle wrote with very large letters, just as we, in writing and printing, distinguish by letters of a larger size anything that we wish to be considered as peculiarly significant."

Figurative. "The letter" is used by the apostle Paul in opposition to the spirit (Rom. 2:27, 29; 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:6, 7). In general letter is used to denote the Mosaic law, and mere external obedience thereto.

LETU'SHIM (Heb. לְטוּשִׁים, let-oo-sheem', hammered, oppressed), the second son of Dedan, grandson of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:3), B. C. considerably after 2200. The plural form of the three sons of Dedan would seem to indicate tribes descended from him. The Letushim have been associated with the Banu Leits in Hejas. Foster (Geog. of Arabia, i, 334) supposes that the Letushim were absorbed in the generic appellation of Dedanim (see DEDAN).

LEUM'MIM (Heb. לְאֻמִּים, leh-oom-meem', peoples), the last of the three sons of Dedan, grandson of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:3), or more probably a tribe descended from Dedan, among whose descendants they appear as third. Some have identified them with the Ἀλυμῶται of Ptolemy (vi, 7, § 24); but the Alumeotæ of Central Arabia have been quite as probably thought to correspond to Almodad. In the Sabæan inscriptions, however, the forms לְאֻמִּים and לְאֻמִּים occur. The Leummim have likewise been identified with the anti-Abrahamic and, perhaps, aboriginal Arabic tribe Ummeiyim.—W. H.

LE'VI (Heb. לֵוִי, lay-vee', a joining), the third son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:34), B. C. probably before 2000.

1. Personal History. (1) Avenges Dinah. One fact alone is recorded in which Levi appears prominent. His sister DINAH (q. v.) was seduced by Shechem, and, according to the rough usage of the times, the stain could only be washed out by blood. Simeon and Levi took this task upon themselves. Covering their scheme with fair words and professions of friendship, they committed a cowardly and repulsive crime (Gen. 34). (2) Levi and Joseph. Levi shared in the hatred which his brothers bore to Joseph, and joined in the plots against him (37:4). (3) Migrates to Egypt. With his three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, Levi went down into Egypt (46:11), and as one of the four eldest sons we may think of him as among the five (47:2) specially presented to Pharaoh. Then comes the last scene, when Jacob, on his deathbed, recalls Levi's old crime and expresses his abhorrence of it (49:5-7). See LEVITES.

2. Father of Matthat and son of Melchi, third preceding Mary among the ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:24) B. C. considerably before 22.

3. The father of another Matthat, and son of Simeon, in the maternal line between David and Zerubbabel (Luke 3:29), B. C. after 876.

4. An apostle. See MATTHEW.

LEVIATHAN. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (from Lat. Levir, a husband's brother), the name applied to the custom among the Hebrews that when an Israelite died without leaving male issue his nearest relative should marry the widow, and continue the family of his deceased brother through the first-born son of such union, he becoming the heir of the former husband. If the brother did not choose to marry the widow she subjected him to gross insult. See MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE.

LEVITES (Heb. לֵוִי, bane lay-vee', son of Levi, or simply לֵוִי, Lay-vee'; usually in the plural and with the article לְלֵוִיִּם), a patronymic title which, besides denoting all the descendants of Levi (Exod. 6:25; Lev. 25:32; Josh. 21:3, 41), is also the distinctive title of that portion of the tribe which was set apart for the service of the sanctuary subordinate to the priests (Num. 8:6; Ezra 2:70; John 1:19, etc.). It is sometimes added as an epithet, and we read of "the priests of the Levites" (Josh. 3:3; Ezek. 44:15).

1. Their Appointment. No reference is made to the consecrated character of the Levites in Genesis. Tracing its descent from Leah, the tribe would naturally take its place among the six chief tribes sprung from the wives of Jacob, and share with them a superiority over those who bore the names of the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah. The work of Aaron, and his greater brother Moses, would give prominence to the family and tribe to which they belonged. And again the tribe stood separate and apart as the champions of Jehovah, after the sin of making the golden calf. "If the Levites had been sharers in the sin of the golden calf, they were, at any rate, the foremost to rally round their leader when he called on them to help him in stemming the progress of the evil" (McC. and S., Cyc.). But we are told that the tribe of Levi was specially chosen by God for the purpose of intrusting to it the care and administration of holy things (Num. 3:5, sq.; 8:14-19). They were consecrated to Jehovah as his peculiar property, instead of the firstborn (q. v.) of the whole nation, these latter being replaced by the Levites, while all over and above the number required were ransomed at the rate of five shekels a head (18:16).

2. Division of the tribe of Levi. Different functions having been assigned to the separate houses of the Levitical branch of the tribe, we insert the following table, formulated from Exod. 6:16-25 and Num. 3:17-20, italicising the priestly branch.

LEVI	KOHATH	GERSHON	Libni.	Eleazar.
			Shimei.		Ithamar.
			Amram.
			Izhar.
MERARI	Hebron.	Moses.	Zichri.
	Uzziel.	Korah.
	Mishael.	Nepheg.
			Mushi.	Zithri.

In Num. 3:21 Libni and Shimei are mentioned as fathers of families, as is Hebron also (3:27). The design of the genealogy appears to be to give the pedigrees of Moses and Aaron, and some other principal heads of the family of Aaron (see Exod. 6:25).

3. Age and Qualifications. A Levite's period of service was from twenty-five to fifty years of age (Num. 8:24, 25); after the latter age he ceased from "work," and acted as overseer. The age of thirty years (Num. 4:3-49) has been variously explained, some thinking it to have arisen from an error of the copyist, others that it referred to the time of transporting the tabernacle, others that the first selection of Levites was those from twenty-five to fifty, but that all future Levites had to commence service at twenty-five. The Septuagint solves the difficulty by uniformly reading twenty-five instead of thirty. No other qualification than that of age is mentioned, although the regulations in force among the priests respecting deformity and cleanness doubtless applies also to the Levites.

4. Duties. The functions of the whole tribe of Levi were to preserve the law of Jehovah in all its integrity and purity, to see that its requirements were duly complied with, to dispense justice in accordance with its enactments, and to transmit it to posterity (Lev. 10:11; Deut. 17:18; 31:9-13; 33:10; comp. 2 Chron. 17:8-10; Neh. 8:9; Ezek. 44:23; Mal. 2:7, sq.). The Levites, apart from their priestly portion, were to act as assistants to the sons of Aaron "in all the service of the tabernacle" (Num. 18:4), but they were forbidden to touch any sacred furniture or the altar until it had been covered by the priests (4:5-15). As the tabernacle was the sign of the presence among the people of their unseen King, so the Levites may be compared to a royal guard; indeed the terms "host" (4:3) and "service" (v. 30) are rendered "warfare" in the margin. When the people settled in Canaan it was the duty of the Levites, acting as police, to guard the sanctuary, to open and close it, to look after the cleaning of it and the furniture, to prepare the showbread, and to do whatever other baking was needed in connection with the sacrifices, to lead the music (q. v.) during worship, to assist the priests in slaughtering and skinning the animals for sacrifice, to examine the lepers according to law, to look after the temple stores, and such like. For the heavier and more menial duties of their office, the Levites were assisted by temple slaves.

Thus the Gibeonites had been appointed to act as hewers of wood and drawers of water (Josh. 9:21). David and other kings presented to the sanctuary persons to perform services of such a nature (Ezra 8:20), probably prisoners of war who had become proselytes, called after the captivity NETHINIM (q. v.).

5. Classification. The better to systematize their service, Moses divided the Levites into three sections by their respective descent from the sons of Levi, viz., Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. They were under the general supervision of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, with aids having charge of a section (Num. 3:32).

(1) The Kohathites, with Elizaphan as leader (Num. 3:30). Number, at the building of the tabernacle, eight thousand six hundred men (3:28), with two thousand seven hundred and fifty qualified for active service (4:36). Place of encampment, south side of the tabernacle (3:29). Duty, charge of the ark, table of showbread, candlestick, altars of burnt offering and of incense, the sacred vessels used in the service, and the veil (3:27, sq.; 4:4, sq.).

(2) Gershonites, with Eliasaph as leader (Num. 3:24). Number, seven thousand five hundred men, with two thousand six hundred and thirty for active service (3:22; 4:40). Place of encampment, west side of tabernacle (3:23). Duty, charge of curtains, the tent (i. e., above the planks), the coverings and the hanging for the door of the tabernacle, the hangings of the court and the court entrance, their cords and instruments of service, also the work of taking down and setting these up (3:25, 26; 4:22-28).

(3) Merarites, with Zuriel as leader (Num. 3:35). Number, six thousand two hundred men, with three thousand two hundred qualified for active service (3:34; 4:44). Encampment, north side of tabernacle (3:35). Duty, charge of planks, bars, pillars, and sockets of the tabernacle; also the pillars of the court, their sockets, pins, cords, and tools pertaining thereto (3:36, sq.; 4:29, sq.). Owing to the heavy nature of the materials which they had to carry, four wagons and eight oxen were assigned to them; and in the march both they and the Gershonites followed immediately after the standard of Judah, and before that of Reuben, that they might set up the tabernacle against the arrival of the Kohathites (7:8).

6. Consecration. The consecration of the Levites began with sprinkling them with the "water of purifying" (marg. "sin-water"), followed by shaving off the hair of the entire body, washing of clothes, accompanied by the sacrifice of two bullocks, fine flour and oil (Num. 8:6-15). The water of purifying (or sin-water) is thought by some to be the same as that used in the purification for leprosy (Lev. 13:6, 9, 13), while others understand it to be the water in the laver, provided for the purpose of cleansing the priests for the performance of their duties. After this purification they were brought before the door of the tabernacle, and set apart for service by the laying on of the hands of the elders.

7. Revenues and Residence. Chosen from among the whole people to be Jehovah's peculiar possession, the Levites did not obtain, like the rest of the tribes, any inheritance in the land of Canaan. Their portion was to be Jehovah himself (Num. 18:20; Deut. 10:9, etc.), who ordained that they should have set apart for them four cities out of every tribe, along with the necessary pasture for their cattle (Num. 35:1-8). Besides this they received the tithes due to Jehovah from the fruits of the fields, from the flocks and herds (Lev. 27:30-33; comp. Num. 18:21-24), of the first fruits (Exod. 23:19; Lev. 2:14; 23:17, etc.), of the firstborn (Exod. 13:12, sq.; Lev. 27:26; Num. 18:15, sq.; Deut. 15:19), as well as certain portions of the sacrificial offerings of the people (Num. 18:8-11, 19). Of the tithes the Levites had to turn over a tithe to the priests (18:26, sq.). The Levites lived for the greater part of the year in their own cities, and came up at fixed periods to take their turn of work (1 Chron. chaps. 25, 26). How long that term lasted we have no sufficient data for determining.

8. History, etc. (1) Till death of Solomon. It may be well to add a few additional facts to those already given. We have seen that the Levites were to take the place of the earlier priesthood of the firstborn as representatives of the holiness of the people; that they acted as the royal guard, waiting upon Jehovah; and that they alone bore the tabernacle and its sacred furniture. Failing to appreciate their holy calling, that section of the Levites whose position brought them into contact with the tribe of Reuben conspired with it to reassert the old patriarchal system of a household priesthood, but were severely punished by divine interposition (Num. 16:1, sq.). Joshua, the successor of Moses, faithfully planned to continue the Mosaic ideal of the Levites as the priestly caste, providing them with cities to dwell in and servants from the conquered Hivites. During the period of the Judges we have only scanty material respecting the Levites, but the conduct of the people would seem to indicate that either the Levites failed to bear witness to the truth or had no power to enforce it. The shameless license of the sons of Eli may be looked upon as the result of a long period of decay affecting the whole order. Samuel, himself a Levite (1 Chron. 6:28, 33), infused new life into the organization. His rule and that of his sons, and the prophetic character now connected with the tribe, tended to give them the position of a ruling caste; and perhaps the desire of the people for a king was a protest against the assumption of the Levites of a higher position than that originally assigned them.

David definitely recognized their relation to the priesthood, and publicly admitted their claim to be the bearers of the ark (1 Chron. 15:2). In the procession which entered Jerusalem bringing the ark to its final resting place, the Levites were conspicuous, wearing their linen ephods and appearing in their new character as minstrels (15:27, 28). "The education which the Levites received for their peculiar duties, no less than their connection, more or less intimate, with the schools of the prophets, would tend to make them, so far as there was any education at all, the teachers of the others, the transcribers and interpreters of the law, the chroniclers of the times in which they lived."

(2) During the divided kingdom. "The revolt of the ten tribes, and the policy pursued by Jeroboam, led to a great change in the position of the Levites. They were the witnesses of an appointed order and a central worship. He wished to make the priests the creatures and instruments of the king, and to establish a provincial and divided worship. The natural result was that they left the cities assigned to them in the territory of Israel, and gathered round the metropolis of Judah (2 Chron. 11:13, 14). In the kingdom of Judah they were, from this time forward, a powerful body, politically as well as ecclesiastically. We find them prominent in the war of Abijah against Jeroboam (13:10-12). They are sent out by Jehoshaphat to instruct and judge the people (19: 8-10). The apostasy that followed on the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah exposed them for a time to the dominance of a hostile system; but the services of the temple appear to have gone on, and the Levites were again conspicuous in the counter revolution effected by Jehoiada (ch. 23), and in restoring the temple to its former stateliness under Joash (24:5). The closing of the temple under Ahaz involved the cessation at once of their work and of their privileges (28:24). Under Hezekiah they again became prominent, as consecrating themselves to the special work of cleansing and repairing the temple (29:12-15); and the hymns of David and of Asaph were again renewed. Their old privileges were restored, they were put forward as teachers (30:22), and the payment of tithes, which had probably been discontinued under Ahaz, was renewed (31:4). The genealogies of the tribe were revised (v. 17), and the old classification kept its ground. The reign of Manasseh was for them, during the greater part of it, a period of depression. That of Josiah witnessed a fresh revival and reorganization (34:8-13). In the great passover of his eighteenth year they took their places as teachers of the people, as well as leaders of their worship (35:3, 15). Then came the Egyptian and Chaldean invasions, and the rule of cowardly and apostate kings. Then the sacred tribe showed itself unfaithful. They had, as the penalty of their sin, to witness the destruction of the temple and to taste the bitterness of exile."

(3) After the captivity. "The position taken by the Levites in the first movements of the return from Babylon indicates that they had cherished the traditions and maintained the practices of their tribe. It is noticeable that, in the first body of returning exiles, they were present in a disproportionately small number (Ezra 2:36-42). Those who do come take their old parts at the foundation and dedication of the second temple (3:10; 6:18). In the next movement under Ezra their reluctance was even more strongly marked. None of them presented themselves at the first great gathering (8:15). The special efforts of Ezra did not succeed in bringing together more than thirty-eight, and their places had to be filled by two hundred and twenty of the Nethinim (v. 20). Those who returned with him resumed their functions at the feast of tabernacles as teachers and interpreters (Neh. 8:7), and those who were most active in that work were foremost also in chanting the hymnlike prayer which appears in ch. 9 as the last great effort of Jewish psalmody. They are recognized in the great national covenant, and the offerings and tithes which were their due are once more solemnly secured to them (10:37-39). They take their old places in the temple and in the villages near Jerusalem (12:29), and are present in full array at the great feast of the dedication of the wall. The two prophets who were active at the time of the return, Haggai and Zechariah, if they did not belong to the tribe, helped it forward in the work of restoration. The strongest measures were adopted by Nehemiah, as before by Ezra, to guard the purity of their blood from the contamination of mixed marriages (Ezra 10:23); and they are made the special guardians of the holiness of the Sabbath (Neh. 13:22). The last prophet of the Old Testament sees, as part of his vision of the latter days, the time when the Lord 'shall purify the sons of Levi' (Mal. 3:3). The guidance of the Old Testament fails us at this point, and the history of the Levites in relation to the national life becomes consequently a matter of inference and conjecture" (Smith, Dict. of Bible).

(4) In New Testament. The Levites appear but seldom in the history of the New Testament. Where we meet with their names it is as the type of a formal heartless worship, without sympathy and without love (Luke 10:32). The mention of a Levite at Cyprus in Acts 4:36 shows that the changes of the previous century had carried that tribe also into "the dispersed among the Gentiles."

LEVITICAL CITIES. As the Levites were to "have no inheritance in their land" (Num. 18: 20), Moses commanded the children of Israel, i. e., the rest of the tribes, to give towns to the Levites to dwell in of the inheritance that fell to them for a possession, with pasturage round about the cities for their cattle (Num. 35:2, sq.). The pasturage (A. V. "suburbs") were to "reach from the wall of the city and outward 1,000 cubits round about.

Diagram 1.

And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side 2,000 cubits." These dimensions have occasioned great difficulty because of the apparent contradiction in the two verses, as specifying first 1,000 cubits and then 2,000.

Of the many explanations given of these measurements the following two seem most probable: According to the Talmud Erubin, 51a, the space "measured from the wall 1,000 cubits round about" was used as a common or suburbs, and the space measured "from without the city on the east side," etc., was a further tract of land of 2,000 cubits, used for fields and vineyards, the former being "the suburbs," properly so called, and the latter "the fields of the suburbs," as represented in diagram 1. The above explanation takes for granted, which seems probable, that the cities were circular in form. Keil and Delitzsch indorse the explanation given by J. D. Michaelis: "We must picture the towns and the surrounding fields as squares, the pasturage as stretching 1,000 cubits from the city wall in every direction, and the length of each outer side as 2,000 cubits, apart from the length of the city wall; so that if the town itself occupied a square of 1,000 cubits (see 2a), the outer side of the town fields would measure 2,000 + 1,000 cubits in every direction; but if each side of the city was only 500 cubits long (2b), the outer side of the town fields would measure 2,000 + 500 cubits in every direction." Of these cities six were to be cities of refuge (q. v.), and thirteen allotted to the priests' portion of the tribe. Which cities belonged to the priests, which to the nonpriestly portion of the tribe, and how they were distributed among the other tribes (Josh. 21:3, sq.), is shown in the following table:

These cities were not given entirely to the Levites as their own property, but as many houses in the towns as sufficed for their necessities. These could be redeemed if sold at any time, and reverted to them without compensation in the year of jubilee, even if not redeemed before (Lev. 25: 32, 33); but such portion of the city as was not taken possession of by them, together with the fields and villages, continued the property of those tribes to which they had been assigned by lot.

LEVITICUS. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

LEVY (Heb. מַס, mas, tribute), the term applied to a company of thirty thousand Israelites raised by Solomon (1 Kings 5:13). They were free Israelites, who to pay tribute (or tax) worked four months in the year, felling trees under the direction of subjects of Hiram. Another levy was of Canaanites, who were assigned to tributary labor (9:15), in this case for the erection of buildings.

LEWD (Gr. πονηρός, pon-ay-ros'), in a moral sense evil, wicked (Acts 17:5).

LEWDNESS (Gr. βαδισύργημα, had-ee-oorg'-ay-mah, literally doing things easily, or boldly), a piece of knavery, rascality (Acts 18:14). Elsewhere these terms are used in their proper sense of licentiousness (Heb. זָמָוּת, zam-maw', etc., badness, Judg. 20:6; Jer. 11:15; Ezekiel frequently; Hos. 6:9), once (Hos. 2:10) the parts of shame (Heb. נַבְלוּת, nab-looth). See GLOSSARY.

LIBATION, the act of pouring wine on the ground in divine worship. Sometimes other liquids have been used, as oil, milk, water, honey, but mostly wine. Among the Greeks and Romans it was an essential part of solemn sacrifices. Libations were also in use among the Hebrews, who poured a hin of wine on the victim after it was killed, and the several pieces of the sacrifice were laid on the altar ready to be consumed in the flames. See OFFERINGS.

LIBERALITY, a generous disposition of mind, resulting in large giving, i. e., according to one's ability; largeness of mind; catholicity. In Isaiah (32:5, 8) the term naw-deeb' (Heb. נָדִיב, voluntary) seems to have been applied to persons of noble character or birth, and Delitzsch thus renders the eighth verse: "But a noble man devises noble things, and to noble things he adheres."

LIBERTINES (Gr. Λιβερτινός, lib-er-tee'-nos, a freedman). This occurs but once in the New Testament: "Certain of the synagogue, which is called of the Libertines" (Acts 6:9). The interpretation of this word has been various. Some think these Libertines were manumitted Roman slaves, who having embraced Judaism had their synagogue at Jerusalem. Others, owing to the geographical names given to other synagogues in the same verse, infer that this must have the same meaning, and suppose that Jews dwelling in Libertum, a city or region in proconsular Africa, are meant. Others, with far greater probability, appeal to Philo, and understand the word as denoting Jews who had been made captive by the Romans under Pompey, but were afterward set free, and who, although they had fixed their abode at Rome, had built at their own expense a synagogue at Jerusalem, which they frequented when in that city.

LIBERTY, CHRISTIAN, or evangelical liberty, a phrase which covers several New Testament representations of the Christian life.

1. Believers are emancipated from the bondage of Satan, the domination of sin, from guilt, and the fear of death (see John 8:31-36; Acts 26:

17, 18; Rom. 7:24, 25; 8:15; Heb. 2:14, 15). Spiritual union with Christ, involving the service of Christ, is compatible with perfect freedom; inasmuch as we are thus restored to the right relationship to God and brought into harmony with his will (see Matt. 11:28-30; James 1:25).

2. Christians are not under obligation to observe the distinctively Jewish regulations. Circumcision, the sign of the old covenant, with the whole body of ceremonial and economic requirements essential to the chosen nation during the period that was preparatory to the Gospel, under the Gospel is set aside. These features of religion, once imposed by special revelation, were annulled by the incoming of the new dispensation. They were not in keeping with the proper magnifying of the grace of Christ, the dignity and inward liberty of redeemed souls, their moral elevation and illumination, their relationship as children of God. Nor were they adapted to Christianity as designed to be the universal religion of the world (see John 4:20-24; Acts 15:1-29; Gal. 2:1-21; 5:1-6; Heb. 8:10, 13).

3. The phrase also refers to the privilege of Christians to regulate their lives as individuals with respect to matters which are morally indifferent. The New Testament instructions upon this point were developed for the most part on account of the attempt to impose Jewish regulations upon converts to Christianity, but the principles set forth are of much broader application, and are still of great importance (see Rom. 13:1-23; 14:14; 1 Cor. 7:8; also Scriptures referred to above). With respect to such things as are not commanded or forbidden in the word of God Christian liberty may be exercised and should be allowed. Actions are not to be pronounced sinful which are not sinful. Non essentials are not to be elevated to the place of essential virtues. Proper room must be left for the exercise of individual judgment or of enlightened Christian conscience. But this liberty with respect to things indifferent is not absolute. Its exercise is under the limitations of the laws of self-preservation, of expediency, of duty, or of love. Concession should be made for the sake of "the weak," though care should be taken not to make them in such a way, or to such an extent, as to perpetuate their weakness or to promote superstition. If the former be not done "the weak" are needlessly injured. If the latter is omitted the principle of evangelical liberty is violated, Christians are reduced to unchristian thralldom, and the progress of Christ's kingdom is obstructed.

LIBNAH (Heb. לִבְנָה, lib-naw', transparency, whiteness).

1. The twenty-first station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:20, 21); not identified.

2. A city of the Canaanites, near Lachish, captured by Joshua (Josh. 10:29-32; 12:15); the birthplace of Josiah's queen, Hamutal (2 Kings 23:31). It was strongly fortified when Sennacherib laid siege to it, and the Assyrian army was cut off (2 Kings 19:8, 9, 35). It was a Levitical city in the tribe of Judah (Josh. 21:13), and has been identified with the modern Arak El-Menshiyeh.

LIBNI (Heb. לִבְנִי, lib-nee', white).

1. The first son of Gershon, the son of Levi (Exod. 6:17; Num. 3:18, 21; 1 Chron. 6:17, 20), B. C. after 2000. His descendants are called Libnites (Num. 3:21; 26:58).

2. The son of Mahli, son of Merari (1 Chron. 6:29). It is probable that he is the same with the preceding, and that something has been omitted from the text (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

LIBNITE (Heb. לִבְנִי, lib-nee', white), a descendant of Libni, the Levite (Num. 3:21; 26:58).

LIBYA (Gr. Λιβύη, lib-oo'-ay), the country of the Libum (Gen. 10:13), the tract lying on the Mediterranean between Egypt and Carthage (Ezek. 30:5; 38:5; Acts 2:10). Cyrene was one of its cities. See LUBIM.

LICE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

LIE. "The rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. A lie is the utterance by speech or act of that which is false, with intent to mislead or delude" (Cent. Dict.). In Scripture the word is used to designate all the ways in which men deny or alter the truth in word or deed, as also evil in general. Good is designated as the truth, and evil as its opposite. Hence the Scriptures most expressly condemn lies (John 8:44; 1 Tim. 1:9, 10; Rev. 21:27; 22:15). The Bible mentions instances of good men telling lies, but without approving them, as that of Abraham (Gen. 12:13; 20:2); Isaac (ch. 26); Jacob (ch. 27), the Hebrew midwives (Exod. 1:15-19), Michal (1 Sam. 19:14, sq.), David (1 Sam. ch. 20). See GLOSSARY.

LIEUTENANTS (Heb. מְחַלְשֵׁי, akh-ash-dar-pen-eem'), the official title of the satraps or viceroys who governed the provinces of the Persian empire; it is rendered "lieutenant" in Esth. 3:12; 8:9; 9:3; Ezra 8:36; and "prince" in Dan. 3:2; 6:1, etc.

LIFE (Heb. חַיָּה, kha'h'ee, life or lives; נְשָׁמָה, neh-fesh, breath; Gr. ζωή, dzo-ay', life activity; ψυχή, psoo-khay', breath). The word has several significations in the Scriptures, to be decided in each case by the context:

1. Physical or animal life (e. g., Gen. 6:17; 7:15). It thus often refers to man's bodily life upon the earth, its relative value and short duration (e. g., Exod. 1:14; Psa. 17:14; 63:3; James 4:14).

2. The manner of living (e. g., Luke 8:14; Eph. 4:18; 1 Tim. 2:2; 1 John 2:16).

3. Spiritual life, i. e., a life of holiness, of restored spiritual powers and activities, derived from the favor of God and union with Christ (e. g., Psa. 30:5; Prov. 12:28; Matt. 7:14; Luke 12:15; John 10:10; 14:19; 15:5; Acts 6:20; Rom. 8:2, 6).

4. Eternal life, not as contrasted with non-existence beyond the grave, but as the endless continuance and perfection of blessedness and communion with God entered upon by the saved on the earth (e. g., Matt. 18:8, 9; 19:29; Luke 18:30; John 3:15, 16; 6:40; 17:3; Rom. 2:7). See BREAD; CROWN, 3; IMMORTALITY, WATER.

5. God, Christ, as self-existent, or absolute life, the source of all life (e. g., John, ch. 1; 4:26; 14:6; Col. 3:4; 1 John 1:1, 2; 5:20).—E. McC.

LIFT (Heb. נִשָּׂא, naw-saw'; Gr. ἀέρω, ah'-ee-ro).

Besides the general meaning of raising, this word has figurative meanings:

1. To lift up the hands is, among the orientals, a common part of taking an oath (Gen. 14:22; Exod. 6:8, marg.). To lift up one's hand against another is to attack, to fight him (2 Sam. 18:28; 1 Kings 11:26).

2. To lift up one's face in the presence of another is to appear boldly in his presence (2 Sam. 2:22; Ezra 9:6).

3. To lift up one's hands, eyes, soul, or heart unto the Lord, are expressions describing the sentiments and emotion of one who prays earnestly or ardently desires anything.

LIGHT (mostly Heb. אֵר, ore; Gr. φῶς, focē). Light is declared by the Scriptures to have come into existence by the express fiat of the Almighty, and to have been in existence long before man or the present races of animals or vegetables had their being (Gen. 1:3).

"Of all the benefits which we have, as inhabitants of this lower world, received from God, there are few more remarkable than the possession of light, with an organization enabling us to make use of it." By means thereof we come into possession of much of our knowledge, many of our comforts and necessities, to say nothing of its wonderful purity, delicacy, and variety of colors which it reveals to the eye of man. It is not at all surprising, therefore, that it should exercise a vast influence over the imagination of man and lead to its worship. Such being the case, we find many instances in the word where such tendency is discouraged. See SUN, WORSHIP OF.

Figurative. The Almighty himself is frequently spoken of as connected with the idea of light. Thus "God is light" (1 John 1:5); the "Father of lights" (James 1:17). God is addressed as one "Who coverest thyself with light, like as with a garment" (Psa. 104:2), and as "dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto" (1 Tim. 6:16). Great sublimity is introduced by the combination of figures of darkness and light, and by making them mutually enhance each other (Psa. 18:11; Exod. 24:15-17). Jesus, as the one who brings the true knowledge of God, is called "the light of men" (John 1:4; see also Matt. 4:16; John 1:9; 8:12; 12:35, 36). Light is continually used as figurative of holiness and purity (Prov. 6:23; Isa. 5:20; Rom. 13:12). Light also, as might naturally be expected, is frequently used for spiritual illumination, especially that illumination which is effected in the soul by the indwelling Spirit of God (2 Cor. 4:6; Eph. 5:14; 1 Peter 2:9). Again, light is used as the figure in general for that which cheers or renders prosperous, and is applied with much force to spiritual joy arising from the happy influences of the Spirit of peace. Hence the frequent use of the expression, "The light of thy countenance," "The Lord is my light and my salvation" (Psa. 27:1), and "Light is sown for the righteous and gladness for the upright in heart" (Psa. 97:11). A striking variety is given in Job 37:21, "Men see not the bright light in the cloud," their trouble so oppressing them that all seems dark, and they observe not the happier times in store for them. The word of God is compared to a light (Psa. 119:105). The figure is also applied to the heavenly state (Isa. 60:19, 20; Col. 1:12; Rev. 21:23; 22:5). Finally, the figure is applied to Christians in general (Matt. 5:14; Eph. 5:8), and to holy men, as John the Baptist (John 5:35). See GLOSSARY; LAMP.

LIGHTEN. See GLOSSARY.

LIGHTNING (Heb. בָּרָק, baw-rawk', gleam, Gr. ἀστραπή, as-trap-ay'). In Syria lightnings are frequent in the autumnal months, seldom a night passing without a great deal of lightning, sometimes accompanied with thunder. A squall of wind and clouds of dust usually precede the first rains.

Figurative. Lightning is used as a symbol of God's glorious and awful majesty (Rev. 4:5); as his edicts, enforced with destruction to those that oppose him (Psa. 18:14; 144:6; Zech. 9:14); and, accompanied with thunder and hail, of great plagues, so that men blasphemed on account thereof.

LIGN-ALOES. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

LIKENING. See GLOSSARY.

LIK'HI (Heb. לִיקְחִי, lik-khee', learned), the third named of the four sons of Shemidah, son of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:19; B. C. after 1950).

LILY. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

LILY WORK (Heb. שֹׁשַׁן, shoo-shan', lily; מַלְאָכָה, mah-as-eh', work), part of the ornamentation of the two pillars which were erected (2 Chron. 3:15) before the (temple) house. The pillars were surmounted by capitals ("chapters"), and these were covered to a depth of four cubits with sculpture in the form of flowering lilies, below which was a cubit of network and pomegranates (1 Kings 7:19, 22).

LIME. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

LINE, the rendering of several Hebrew words and one Greek word, with various meanings. Thus we have a line as our measuring line (2 Sam. 8:2; 1 Kings 7:15, 23; Amos 7:17; Isa. 34:17; Ezek. 40:3; 47:3), a cord (Josh. 2:18, 21, etc.). There can be little doubt that the Hebrews acquired the art of measuring land from the ancient Egyptians, who were early acquainted with it. The language of Josh. 18:9, "And the men went and passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book," evidently indicates that a survey of the whole country had been made.

Figurative. The word "line," as a string of a musical instrument, is put for sound (Psa. 19:4); while in the expression "not to boast in another man's line of things" (2 Cor. 10:16) the meaning probably is, not within the boundary line of another to boast of what is already done. In Isa. 28:10, 13, the expression "line upon line, line upon line," etc., is a sneer intended to throw ridicule upon the smallness and vexatious character of the prophet's interminable and uninterrupted chidings. The word also means a portion as described by measurement (Psa. 16:6).

LINEAGE (Gr. παρτίς, pat-ree-ah', paternal descent, "kindred," Acts 3:25; "family," Eph. 3:15; family or race, Luke 2:4). See GENEALOGY.

LINEN, the rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew and Greek words, which must be noticed in detail, as the meaning is somewhat different in each.

1. Pish-leh' (Heb. פִּשְׁלֵה, carded) is rendered "linen" in Lev. 13:47, sq.; Deut. 22:11; Jer. 13:1, etc.; and "flax" in Josh. 2:6; Judg. 15:14; Prov. 31:13; Isa. 19:9; Ezek. 40:3; Hos. 2:5, 9. It was used, like our "cotton," to denote not only flax (Judg. 15:4), or raw material from which the linen was made, but also the plant itself (Josh. 2:6), and the manufacture from it. It was used for nets (Isa. 19:9), girdles (Jer. 13:1), measuring lines (Ezek. 40:3), as well as for the dress of the priests (44:17, 18). See FLAX.

2. Boots (Heb. בָּוֹט, from root signifying whiteness), always translated "fine linen," except in 2 Chron. 5:12 ("white linen"), is apparently a late word, and probably the same with the Gr. βύσσος, boos'-sos. It was used for the dresses of the Levite choir in the temple (2 Chron. 5:12), for the loose upper garment worn by kings over the close-fitting tunic (1 Chron. 15:27), and for the veil of the temple, embroidered by the skill of the Tyrian artificers (2 Chron. 3:14). Mordecai was arrayed in robes of fine linen (boots) and purple (Esth. 8:15) when honored by the Persian king, and the dress of the rich man in the parable was purple and fine linen (boots, Luke 16:19). "Fine linen," with purple and silk, are enumerated in Rev. 18:12 as among the merchandise of the mystical Babylon.

3. Shaysh (Heb. שַׁיֵּשׁ, bleached), an Egyptian word referring chiefly to the Egyptian byssus, which was brought to Tyre (Ezek. 27:7), and was among the offerings brought out of Egypt by the Israelites (Exod. 25:4; 35:6). The exact material of which shaysh was made is difficult to determine, our translators hesitating whether linen or silk should be used (Gen. 41:42, marg. "silk;" Prov. 31:22, "silk" in the text). It would seem that by this term is meant, in general, the same material as byssus (see above). From shaysh were made the curtains and veil of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:1, 31, 36; 27:9, 16, 18, etc.), and the priestly garments, especially the high priest's ephod or shoulder-piece (23:5, sq.; 39:2, sq.).

4. Ay-toon' (Heb. אַיִתּוֹן, twisted) occurs only in Prov. 7:16, and there in connection with Egypt. It was probably a kind of thread, made of Egyptian flax, and used for ornamenting the coverings of beds with tapestry work. Put into Greek letters and with Greek terminations, aytoon becomes ὀθώνη (oth-on'-ay), thought to be applied by the Greeks to any fine and thin cloth, although not of linen. This word is used of the great sheet let down from heaven in Peter's vision (Acts 10:11). Its diminutive form ὀθώνιον, oth-on'-ee-on is used to designate the clothes in which Joseph wrapped the body of Jesus (John 19:40; 20:5-7). Matthew and Mark employ the word σινδών, sin-done', for the same linen cloth, while Luke uses both words in the same passage.

5. Bad (Heb. בַּד, perhaps from its separation for sacred uses) is a word employed in describing the linen dresses worn in religious ceremonies, and may refer to the cloth made from the shaysh, or yarn. The articles of dress which in Exodus (39:27, 28) are ordered to be made of shaysh, are in Leviticus (6:10) made of bad, showing that they were of the same material, if the words are not synonymous.

6. Shah-at-naze' (Heb. שַׁחֲאֵת־נָזֵעַ, a kind of garment woven of wool and linen, like our linsey-woolsey, which the Hebrews were forbidden to use (Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:11).

7. Mik-veh' (Heb. מִיקְוֵה, a collection), occurs only in the account of goods brought from Egypt by the merchants of Solomon (1 Kings 10:28). Various explanations have been offered of this word. Gesenius renders it "troop;" Bochart makes it "tax;" while the LXX, Vulgate, and other early versions make it the name of a place. We conclude that the word is doubtfully connected with linen. Egypt, from the earliest times, was the great center of linen manufacture. The principal dress of the people was made of linen, and it was the only material used for the dress of the priests. The city of Panopolis was inhabited by linen weavers. All the mummy cloths are composed of linen. See FLAX; also SUPPLEMENT.

Figurative. Linen is used as an emblem of moral purity (Rev. 15:6), and of luxury (Luke 16:19).

LINTEL. 1. Mash-kofe' (Heb. מַשְׁקֹפֶה, overhanging), the beam which forms the upper part of the framework of a door (Exod. 12:22, 23; rendered "upper door post" in v. 7). This the Israelites were commanded to mark with the blood of the paschal lamb on the memorable occasion when the passover was instituted.

2. Ah'-yil (Heb. אֲחִיֵּיל, strength, 1 Kings 6:31); translated "post" throughout Ezek. chaps. 40, 41. The true meaning of this word is extremely doubtful. In the LXX it is left untranslated, and in the Chaldee version it is represented by a modification of itself.

3. Kaf-tore' (Heb. כַּפְתֹּרֶה, a chaplet, Amos 9:1; Zeph. 2:14). The marginal rendering, "chapter or knop," of both these passages is undoubtedly the more correct.

LINUS (Gr. Λίνος, lee'-nos, perhaps from linon, linen), one of the Christians at Rome whose salutations Paul sent to Timothy (2 Tim. 4:21), A. D. 64.

LION. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. The strength (Judg. 14:18; 2 Sam. 1:23), courage (2 Sam. 17:10; Prov. 28:1, etc.), and ferocity (Gen. 49:9; Num. 24:9) of the lion were proverbial. Hence the lion was symbolical of Israel (Num. 24:9), of the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:9), of Gad (Deut. 33:20), Dan (Deut. 33:22, "a lion's whelp"), of Christ (Rev. 5:5), of God in protecting his Church (Isa. 31:4), of God in executing judgments (Isa. 38:13; Lam. 3:10; Hos. 5:14; 13:8), of the boldness of saints (Prov.

28:1), of brave men (2 Sam. 1:23; 23:20), of cruel and powerful enemies (Isa. 5:29; Jer. 49:19), of persecutors (Psa. 22:13; 2 Tim. 4:17), of Satan (1 Pet. 5:8), of imaginary fears of the slothful (Prov. 22:13; 26:13). The tamed lion is symbolical of the natural man subdued by grace (Isa. 11:7; 65:25), while the roaring of a lion is used to characterize a king's wrath.

LIP (Heb. שֵׁפָתַי, saw-faw' with the idea of termination). In addition to its literal meaning the word is often used in the original for an edge or border, as of a cup, a garment, the sea, etc. It is often put as the organ of speech, thus: "To open the lips," is to begin to speak (Job 11:5; 32:20); to "refrain the lips" is to keep silence (Psa. 40:10; Prov. 10:19). "Uncircumcised of lips" (Exod. 6:12), i. e., not of ready speech, is the same as "slow of speech" (4:10). The "fruit of the lip" (Heb. 13:15) is a metaphor for praise, and by a bolder figure we have "the calves of the lips" (Hos. 14:2) for a thank offering. "Lip" stands in Scripture for language or dialect (1 Cor. 14:21). The moral quality of speech is represented by "lying lips," i. e., falsehood (Prov. 10:18; comp. 17:4, 7) or wickedness (Psa. 120:2) or truth (Prov. 12:19). Ardent professions are represented by "burning lips" (Prov. 26:23); a pleasant discourse by "sweetness of lips" (Prov. 16:21). To "shoot out the lip" (Psa. 22:7) has always been an expression of the utmost scorn and defiance; so "unclean lips" are used to express an unfitness to impart or receive divine communications (Isa. 6:5, 7), and the touching of the lip with a "live coal" is figurative for cleansing it. To "cover the lip," i. e., the beard, was a sign of mourning, as in the case of a leper (Lev. 13:45), of trouble and shame (Ezek. 24:17; Mic. 3:7).

LIQUOR, the juice of olives and grapes (Exod. 22:29; Num. 6:3; Cant. 7:2). See WINE.

LIST. See GLOSSARY.

Egyptian Litter

LITTER (Heb. לִטְוָה, tsawb, Isa. 66:20), a sedan, or palanquin, borne by men or animals, which was in general use throughout the East.

LITTLE OWL. See OWL in ANIMAL KINGDOM.

LIVELY. See GLOSSARY.

LIVER (Heb. כִּבְדָּה, kaw-bade', as the heaviest of the viscera). The word often occurs in the natural sense, as indicative of a vital organ in the animal system, and especially with reference to the part of animals slain in sacrifice (Exod. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9, etc.). See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS. The liver was used by the ancients for the purpose of divination (q. v.), and such use was not unknown to the Jews, though it is only once referred to in the Scriptures, and then with reference to the conduct of a heathen prince (Ezek. 21:21). In common with other ancient peoples, the Israelites were wont to identify the liver more with the source and center of life than we do, and sometimes put liver where we would put heart (see Prov. 7:23; Lam. 2:11).

LIVING CREATURES (Ezek., chaps. 1, 3, 10; Rev. 4:6-9, A. V. "beasts;" R. V. "living creatures"), are identical with CHERUBIM (q. v.).

LIZARD. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

LOADEN. See GLOSSARY.

LOAF (Heb. לֶחֶם, kik-kawr', circle; Gr. ἄρτος, ar'-tos; sometimes only לֶחֶם, lek'h'-em, bread), a round cake, or biscuit, the usual form of bread among the orientals (Exod. 29:23; Judg. 8:5; 1 Sam. 10:3; 1 Chron. 16:3; Matt. 14:17; Mark 6:38, etc.). See BREAD, OFFERING.

LO-AMMI (Heb. לֹא-אֲמִי, lo am'-mee, not my people), the figurative name given by the prophet Hosea to his second son by Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim (Hos. 1:9), to denote the rejection of the kingdom of Israel by Jehovah. Its significance is explained in vers. 9, 10.

LOAN. The law of Moses did not contemplate any raising of money by loans to obtain capital; and such persons as bankers and sureties, in the commercial sense (Prov. 22:26; Neh. 5:3), were unknown in the early ages of the Hebrews. The law made the following provisions respecting loans:

1. Interest. It strictly forbade any interest to be taken for a loan to any poor person, and at first, as it seems, even in the case of a foreigner; but this prohibition was afterward limited to the Hebrews only, from whom, of whatever rank, not only was no usury on any pretense to be exacted, but relief to the poor by way of loan was enjoined, and excuses for evading this duty were forbidden (Exod. 22:25; Lev. 25:35-37; Deut. 15:3, 7-10; 23:19, 20).

As commerce increased, the practice of usury, and so also of suretyship, grew up; but the exaction of it from a Hebrew appears to have been regarded to a late period as discreditable (Prov. 6:1, 4; 11:15; 17:18; 20:16; 22:26; Psa. 15:5; Jer. 15:10; Ezek. 18:13; 22:12). Systematic breach of the law in this respect was corrected by Nehemiah after the return from captivity (Neh. 5:1-13). The money changers, who had seats and tables in the temple, were traders whose profits arose chiefly from the exchange of money with those who came to pay their annual half shekel.

2. Pledges. In making loans no prohibition is pronounced in the law against taking a pledge of the borrower, but certain limitations are prescribed in favor of the poor. (1) The outer garment, if taken in pledge, was to be returned before sunset. (2) The prohibition was absolute in the case of (a) the widow's garment (Deut. 24:17), and (b) a millstone of either kind (24:6). (3) A creditor was forbidden to enter a house to reclaim a pledge, but was to stand outside till the borrower should come forth to return it (24:10, 11). (4) The original Roman law of debt permitted the debtor to be enslaved by his creditor until the debt was discharged; and he might even be put to death by him. The Jewish law, as it did not forbid temporary bondage in the case of debtors, so it forbade a Hebrew debtor to be detained as a bondsman longer than the seventh year, or, at farthest, the year of jubilee (Exod. 21:2; Lev. 25:39-42; Deut. 15:9).

LOCK (Hebrew verb לָכַס, naw-al', to fasten; noun לִקְלוֹן, man-aw'el). The doors of the ancient Hebrews were secured by bars of wood or iron, the latter generally used in the entrances of fortresses, prisons, and towns (see Isa. 45:2). The locks are usually of wood, and consist of a partly hollow bolt from fourteen inches to two feet long for external doors or gates, or from seven to nine inches for interior doors. The bolt passes through a groove in a piece attached to the door into a socket in the doorpost. In the groove-piece are from four to nine small iron or wooden sliding-pins or wires, which drop into corresponding holes in the bolt, and fix it in its place (Neh. 3:3, 6, 13-15). The key has a certain number of iron pegs at one end, which correspond to the holes in the bolt of the lock, into which they are introduced to open the lock; the former pins being thus pushed up, the bolt may be drawn back. These keys were from seven inches to two feet in length, and so heavy as sometimes to be as much as a man could conveniently carry. It is to a key of this description that the prophet probably alludes: "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder" (Isa. 22:22). But it is not difficult to open a lock of this kind even without a key, viz., with the finger dipped in paste or other adhesive substance. The passage, Cant. 5:4, 5, is thus probably explained.

LOCUST. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. The locust is used in Scripture as a symbol of destructive enemies. See the highly poetical description in Joel (1:6, 7; 2:2-9); of armed men (Nah. 3:17).

LOD (Heb. לוֹד, lode, 1 Chron. 8:12; Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:35) is, without doubt, the city of Lydda (Acts 9:32, etc.).

LO-DE'BAR (Heb. לֹדְבָר, lo deb-ar', no passage), probably identical with Debir (Josh. 13:26), in Gilead, north of the brook Jabbok, not far from Mahanaim, the residence of Ammiel, whose son Machir entertained Mephibosheth (2 Sam. 9:4, 5), and afterward sent supplies to David (17:27).

LODGE (Heb. לִוְיָ, leen, or לוֹיָ, loon, to stop over night, and several Greek words): (1) In the general sense of stopping for rest, or the place of lodging (Gen. 24:23; Josh. 4:3; Ruth 1:16, etc.). (2) A shed or lodge for the watchman of a garden (Isa. 1:8, "The daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers," etc.). The "lodge" here referred to was a little temporary hut for a shelter from heat by day and the cold dews by night. It is usually built on an elevation of ground, with room for only one person, who in this solitude watches the ripening crop. "The point of comparison, therefore, is that in the vineyard and cucumber field not a human being is to be seen in any direction; and that there is nothing but the cottage and the lodge to show that there is any human being there at all. So did Jerusalem stand in the midst of desolation reaching far and wide—a sign, however, that the land was not entirely depopulated" (Delitzsch, Com., in loc.). The Hebrew word sometimes means a hanging bed, or hammock, which was often used in hot climates (Isa. 24:20, "cottage").

LOFT (Heb. לוֹפֶת, al-ee-yaw', lofty), the upper chamber of a private house (1 Kings 17:19).

LOG. See METROLOGY, II.

LOGOS. See WORD.

LOIN (the rendering of several Hebrew words and one Greek word), the part of the back and sides between the hip and the ribs, which, being, as it were, the pivot of the body, is most sensibly affected by pain or terror (Deut. 33:11; Job 40:16; Psa. 38:7, etc.). It is used by euphemism for the generative power (Gen. 35:11; 1 Kings 8:19; 2 Chron. 6:9). This part of the body was especially girt with sackcloth in token of mourning (Gen. 37:34; 1 Kings 20:31, 32; Psa. 66:11; Isa. 20:2, etc.).

Figurative. "If his loins have not blessed me" (Job 31:20) is an expression in which the blessing of the thankful (29:13) is transferred from the person to the parts of the body benefited by the warmth imparted. The loose and flowing garments of the orientals required to be gathered at the waist before engaging in any exertion or enterprise; hence, "to gird up the loins" (1 Kings 18:46; Job 38:3; 40:7; Prov. 31:17, etc.) is used as a figure for vigorous effort.

LOIS (Gr. Lwis, lo-ec', perhaps agreeable), the maternal grandmother of Timothy, his father being a Greek (Acts 16:1). She was commended by the apostle Paul for her faith (2 Tim. 1:5), B. C. before 66.

LONG-SUFFERING (Heb. עֲנָוָה, an-rake' ap-peem', slow to anger; Gr. μακροθυμία, mak-roth-oo-mee'-ah), that disposition of God in accordance with which he indulgently tolerates the sins and delays the punishments of men (Exod. 34:6; Num. 14:18; Psa. 86:15; Jer. 15:15; Rom. 2:4; 9:22; 1 Tim. 1:16; 1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 3:9, 15). It is also mentioned as one of the Christian graces, and is shown in bearing troubles and ills, in a slowness in avenging wrongs (2 Cor. 6:6; Eph. 4:2; 2 Tim. 4:2).

LOOK. See GLOSSARY.

LOOKING-GLASS. See MIRROR.

LOOP (Heb. לִפְתָּח, loo-law-aw', winding). By loops the curtains of the tabernacle were fastened to their corresponding knobs. They were probably made of goat's hair cord, and were dyed blue (Exod. 26:4, sq.; 36:11, sq.). See TABERNACLE.

LORD, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, which have a very different meaning from each other:

1. Yeh-ho-vaw' (Heb. יְהוָה, self-existent), Jehovah. This is used as a proper name of God only, and should have been retained in that form by the translators. See JEHOVAH.

2. Aw-don' (Heb. אֲדֹנָי, an early word denoting ownership; hence, absolute control. It is not properly a divine title, being used of the owner of slaves (Gen. 24:14, 27; 39:2, 7; A. V. "master"); of kings as the lords of their subjects (Isa. 26:13); of a husband as lord of the wife (Gen. 18:12). It is applied to God as the owner and governor of the whole earth (Exod. 23:13; Psa. 114:7). It is sometimes used as a term of respect, like our sir; but with a pronoun attached ("my lord"), and often occurs in the plural.

3. Ad-o-noy' (Heb. אֲדֹנָי, emphatic, the Lord); and by many regarded as the plural of No. 2. It is used chiefly in the Pentateuch; always where God is submissively and reverently addressed (Exod. 4:10, 13; Josh. 7:8); also when God is spoken of (1 Kings 13:9; 22:6, etc.). The Jews, out of a superstitious reverence for the name Jehovah, always, in reading, pronounce Adonai where Jehovah is written. The similar form, with the suffix, is also used of men, as of Potiphar (Gen. 39:2, sq.; A. V. "master"), and of Joseph (42:30, 33).

4. Koo'-ree-os (Gr. κύριος, supreme), he to whom a person or thing belongs, the master, the one having disposition of men or property, as the "Lord of the vineyard" (Matt. 20:8; 21:40; Mark 12:9; Luke 20:15); the "Lord of the harvest" (Matt. 9:38; Luke 10:2); the "master of the house" (Mark 13:35); "Lord of the Sabbath" (Matt. 12:8; Mark 2:28; Luke 6:5), as having the power to determine what is suitable to the Sabbath, and of releasing himself and others from its obligation. The term is also a title of honor, expressive of the respect and reverence with which servants salute their master (Matt. 13:27, A. V. "sir"; Luke 13:8; 14:22, etc.); employed by a son in addressing his father (Matt. 21:30, A. V. "sir"); by citizens toward magistrates (27:63, A. V. "sir"); by anyone wishing to honor a man of distinction (Matt. 8:2, 6, 8; 15:27; Mark 7:28; Luke 5:12, etc.); by the disciples in saluting Jesus their teacher and master (Matt. 8:25; 16:22; Luke 9:54; John 11:12, etc.). This title is given to God, the ruler of the universe, both with the article ὁ κύριος (Matt. 1:22; 5:33; Mark 5:19; Luke 1:6, sq.; Acts 7:33; 2 Tim. 1:16, 18, etc.), and without the art (Matt. 21:9; 27:10; Mark 13:

20; Luke 2:9, 23, 26; Heb. 7:21, etc.). The title is also applied to Jesus as the Messiah, since by his death he acquired a special ownership in man kind, and after his resurrection was exalted to a partnership in the divine administration (Acts 10:36; Rom. 14:8; 1 Cor. 7:22; 8:6; Phil. 2:9-11).

5. Baal (Heb. בַּעַל, bah'-al, master), applied only to heathen deities, or to man as husband, etc., or to one specially skilled in a trade or profession. See BAAL.

6. Several other and less important words in the original are rendered "Lord" in the A. V. They are: Shaw-leesh' (Heb. שָׁלִישׁ, 2 Kings 7:2, 17), an officer of the third rank; rab (רב, Dan. 2:10), a chief, or captain; maw-ray' (מַרְיָן, master, 2:10), an official title; seh'-ren (שֵׁרֵן, a Philistine term found in Joshua, Judges, and 1 Samuel, where "the lords of the Philistines" are mentioned; rab-reb-awn' (רַב־רֵבֵן, magnate), used in reference to certain Babylonish nobles (Dan. 4:36; 5:1, 9, 10, 23; 6:17), and its Greek equivalent, RABBONI (q. v.); sar (שָׂר, a head person), title of nobility (Ezra 8:25).

LORDLY (Heb. כֶּסֶל אֲדִירִים, say'-fel ad-deer-eem', bowl of nobles, Judg. 5:25), a large vessel fit to be used by persons of quality.

LORD'S DAY (Gr. ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα). This term occurs only once in the New Testament (Rev. 1:10), and there with no explanation as to its meaning. In after ages of the Church it was known to be used for the first day of the week, viz., SUNDAY (q. v.).

LORD'S PRAYER, the usual title of the prayer given by Jesus to his disciples. It is found in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:9, sq.), and is recorded in a briefer form by Luke (11:1-4), and as given on another occasion. Very many of the most distinguished commentators (such as Schleiermacher, Baumgarten-Crusator, Sieffert, Olshausen, Neander, De Wette, Ewald, Bleek, Weiss, etc.) declare against the position of the prayer as unhistorical. Godet (Com., on Luke 11:1, sq.) says the repetition of this model of prayer, though not impossible, is far from probable. Meyer (Com., on Matthew) holds that "it is perfectly conceivable that the author of our version of Matthew, when he came to that part of the Sermon on the Mount where warnings are directed against meaningless repetitions in prayer, took occasion also to put this existing model prayer into our Lord's mouth."

The prayer is formed of an address, "Our Father which art in heaven," six petitions, three of which refer to the honor of God, while the other three have reference to the wants of God's family; and a doxology. The doxology is omitted in Luke, as is also the third petition in many manuscripts. "The prayer is doubtless based upon expressions and sentiments already familiar to the Jews; indeed, parallel phrases to nearly all its contents have been discovered in the Talmud. This, however, does not detract from its beauty or originality as a whole." The prayer is not given as a set form which is to be slavishly followed, but rather as setting forth the general sentiments and desires which are acceptable to him whom we address in prayer. See SUPPLEMENT.

LORD'S SUPPER (Gr. κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, koo-ree-ak-on' dipe'-non, a meal belonging to the Lord).

1. Name. The meal established by our Lord (1 Cor. 11:20), and called "supper" because it was instituted at supper time. Synonymous with this is the phrase "the Lord's table" (10:21), where we also find the name "the cup of the Lord." Other terms were introduced in the Church, such as communion (Gr. κοινωνία, koy-nohn-ee'-ah, participation, i. e., a festival in common, 1 Cor. 10:16), and eucharist ("a giving of thanks"), because of the hymns and psalms which accompanied it.

2. Its Origin. Of this we have the accounts recorded by Matthew (26:26-29), Mark (14:22-25), Luke (22:19, sq.), and by the apostle Paul (1 Cor. 11:24-26), whose words differ very little from those of Luke. The only difference between Matthew and Mark is that the latter omits the words "for the remission of sins." Paul declares (1 Cor. 11:23) that the account which he wrote to the Corinthians he "received of the Lord," which would seem to imply a communication made to himself personally by the Lord, contrasting it with the abuse among them.

Jesus instituted the supper while he was observing the Passover with his disciples; so that some references to that feast should be given. The following order of observing the Passover prevailed at the time of Christ: (1) Meeting of celebrants, the head of the household, or celebrant, blessing a cup of wine, of which all partook. (2) Washing the hands, accompanied with a benediction. (3) Table set with paschal lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and sauce. (4) The celebrant first, and then others, dipped a portion of bitter herbs into the sauce and ate them. (5) Dishes removed and cup of wine brought, followed by an interval for asking questions as to this strange procedure, and then wine passed. (6) Table set again, the celebrant repeating the commemorative words which opened what was strictly the paschal supper, a solemn thanksgiving and Psalms 103 and 104. (7) Second washing of hands with a short blessing, breaking of one of the two cakes of unleavened bread, with thanks. Bread partaken of after dipping it, with the bitter herbs, into the sauce. (8) Flesh eaten with bread, another blessing, a third cup of wine, known as the "cup of blessing." (9) Fourth cup, with recital of Psa. 115-118, from which this cup was known as the cup of the Hallel, or of the Song. (10) There might be, in conclusion, a fifth cup, provided that the great Hallel was sung over it (possibly Psa. 120-138).

"Comparing the ritual thus gathered from rabbinic writers with the New Testament, and assuming (1) that it represents substantially the common practice of our Lord's time; and (2) that the meal of which he and his disciples partook was either the Passover itself or an anticipation of it, conducted according to the same rules, we are able to point, though not with absolute certainty, to the points of departure which the old practice presented for the institution of the new. To 1 or 3, or even to 8, we may refer the first words and the first distribution of the cup (Luke 22:17, 18); to

2 or 7, the dipping of the sop (John 13:26); to 7, or to an interval during or after 8, the distribution of the bread (Matt. 26:26; Mark 14:22; Luke 22:19; 1 Cor. 11:23, 24); to 9 or 10 ('after supper,' Luke 22:20), the thanksgiving and distribution of the cup, and the hymn with which the whole was ended."

"The original eucharistic meal was symbolic. The broken bread and the consecrated cup were also prophetic of the work which Christ was to accomplish for his disciples and the world. The real sacrifice, of which this sacrament was to be a remembrance, was yet to be accomplished; hence the supper was so far prophetic. The bread was to symbolize the broken body and the cup the blood, which was the pledge of the covenant between God and man" (Bennett, Christ. Arch., p. 416).

3. Observance. The Passover was an annual festival, but no rule was given as to the time and frequency of the new feast, although the command, "Do this as oft as ye drink it" (1 Cor. 11:25) suggested a more frequent observance. It would appear that the celebration of the Lord's Supper by the first disciples occurred daily in private houses (Acts 2:46), in connection with the agape or love feast, to indicate that its purpose was the expression of brotherly love. The offering of thanks and praise (1 Cor. 11:24; 10:16) was probably followed with the holy kiss (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20). It was of a somewhat festive character, judging from the excesses which Paul reprobated (1 Cor. 11:20), and was associated with an ordinary meal, at the close of which the bread and wine were distributed as a memorial of Christ's similar distribution to the disciples. From the accounts in the Acts (2:42, 46) and from Paul's letter to the Corinthians (11:20, 21) it is safely inferred that the disciples contributed each a share of the food necessary for the meal, thus showing a community of love and fellowship. To this unifying power of the eucharist Paul evidently refers (1 Cor. 10:16, 17). From the account given in 1 Cor. 11:17-34, it is evident that each person ate of that which he brought, and held therein his own private meal in place of the Lord's Supper. There was not a proper waiting for the distribution of the elements by a church officer, and there seems to be no evidence that a priestly consecration and distribution of the bread and wine were regarded as necessary to the validity of the sacrament. "His true a blessing was spoken over the cup (1 Cor. 10:16), but every Christian man, probably, might offer this blessing at that time, when the arrangements of church life as regards public worship were as yet so little reduced to fixed order.

4. Early Church. Under Trajan the strict edicts against secret societies compelled the separation of the agape from the Lord's Supper; the former, being adjudged by the emperor to pertain to the secret clubs, was discontinued, and the Lord's Supper was connected with the public worship. From the circumstance that unbaptized persons, and such as were under church discipline, as well as others not in full communion with the church, were excluded from the assembly before the celebration of the Lord's Supper, the idea of mystery soon attached to this rite.

In the earliest notices of the Lord's Supper a simple and almost literal imitation of the meal as instituted by Christ is prevalent. In the "Teaching of the Twelve" the instructions for celebrating the eucharist are as simple and archaic as those respecting baptism. In Justin Martyr's account of the Lord's Supper is noticed an almost like simplicity as in the "Teaching." A change is in the fact that special celebrants or officers are now recognized: "There is brought to the president of the brethren bread and a cup of wine mixed with water." The deacons distribute the consecrated elements and carry away a portion to those who are absent. In Tertullian's account there is scarcely more formality.

In ante-Nicene times the following order was observed: The prayers, the kiss of peace between man and man, and woman and woman; the oblation or offerings for the feast, the poor, and the clergy; and the communion of the partaking of the consecrated elements. The wine was mingled with water, and the communicants, standing, received both elements in the hands of the officiating deacons. Portions of the sanctified bread were sometimes borne to their homes by the members, where the family communion was repeated in one kind. The custom of the apostolic Church for all communicants to make offerings of bread and wine and other things to supply the elements of the holy eucharist, and gifts to the poor, was continued through all the early history of Christianity and in a modified form until the 12th century.

As Church government and discipline developed the ceremonies connected with the eucharist became more formal and involved. Extended and carefully prepared liturgical forms appear, the work of great Churchmen or councils. Based upon the earlier and simpler order of consecration and communion, they were often of great length and accompanied with many impressive ceremonies, especially frequent musical recitations by the choirs and responses by the people.

At the institution of the Lord's Supper Christ used unleavened bread. The primitive Christians carried with them the bread and wine for the eucharist, and took the bread in common use, viz., leavened. When this custom ceased the Greeks retained the leavened bread, while in the Latin Church the unleavened bread became common since the 8th century. The custom of breaking the bread (1 Cor. 11:24) was discontinued by the Roman Catholic Church when, in the 12th and 13th centuries, the host or holy wafer was cut in a peculiar way, so as to represent upon it a crucified Saviour. The Reformed Churches reintroduced the use of common bread and the breaking of it.

We have no evidence as to whether the wine used by Christ was pure, mixed with water, fermented, or unfermented; although general practice, as well as other facts, would lead to the conclusion that it was fermented.

5. Controversies. (1) Transubstantiation. The Council of Trent teaches that, after the consecration, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, are contained "truly, really, and substantially in the sacrament of the most holy eucharist," and it anathematizes those who say that Christ's body and blood are there in sign and figure only. Furthermore, the Roman Catholic Church teaches "that the worship of sacrifice was not to cease in the Church, and the Council of Trent defines that in the eucharist or mass a true and proper sacrifice is offered to God" (Cath. Dict., s. v.). (2) Lutheran. The Lutheran Church rejects transubstantiation, while insisting that the body and blood of Christ are mysteriously and supernaturally united with the bread and wine, so that they are received when the latter are. This is called consubstantiation. (3) General Protestant view. According to this view, "this hallowed food (the bread and wine), through concurrence of divine power, is in verity and truth, unto faithful receivers, instrumentally a cause of that mystical participation whereby I make myself wholly theirs, so I give them in hand an actual possession of all such saving grace as my sacrificial body can yield, and as their souls do presently need, this is to them, and in them, my body" (Hooker, Eccles. Polity, book v, 167). "The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the supper is faith" (Discipline, Meth. Epis. Church, Art. 18).

LO-RU'HAMAH (Heb. לֹא רוּחָמָהּ, lo rookhaw-maw', not pitied, not favored), the name divinely given to the second child (a daughter) of the prophet Hosea (1:6) to indicate that the Lord will not continue to show compassion toward the rebellious nation, as he hitherto has done under Jeroboam II (2 Kings 13:23). In Hos. 2:23 the expression is translated "her that had not obtained mercy." A daughter is named to represent the effeminate period which followed the overthrow of the first dynasty, when Israel was at once abject and impious. When God restored his favor to the people her name was changed to RUHAMAH (q. v.).

LOT. 1. (Heb. קָלָה, go-rawl', a pebble; קֶלֶבֶט, kkeh'-bel, measuring line, portion; Gr. λαχάνα, lang-khan'-o, to cast lots, Luke 1:9; κλήρος, klay'-ros, pebble, bit of wood to cast lots with (Acts 1:26). The custom of deciding doubtful questions by lot is one of great extent and high antiquity, recommending itself as a sort of appeal to the Almighty, secure from all influence of passion or bias, and is a sort of divination employed even by the gods themselves (Horn., Il., xxii, 209; Cic., De Div., i, 34; ii, 41). Among the Jews also the use of lots, with a religious intention, direct or indirect, prevailed extensively. The religious estimate of them may be gathered from Prov. 16:33. The following historical or ritual instances are: (1) Choice of men for an invading force (Judg. 1:1-3; 20:9); (2) Partition of the soil of Palestine among the tribes (Num. 26:55; Josh. 18:10; Acts 13:19), of Jerusalem, i. e., probably its spoil or captives among captors (Obad. 11), of the land itself in a similar way (1 Macc. 3:36); apportionment of possessions, or spoil, or of prisoners, to foreigners or captors (Joel 3:3; Nah. 3:10; Matt. 27:35); (3) Settlement of doubtful questions (Prov. 16:33; 18:18), a mode of divination among heathens by means of arrows, two inscribed and one without mark (Hos.

4:12; Ezek. 21:21), detection of a criminal (Josh. 7:14, 18), appointment of persons to offices or duties, as the priests (Luke 1:9); also successor to Judas (Acts 1:26); selection of the scapegoat on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:8, 10). See URIM and THUMMIM.

2. That which falls to one by lot, as a portion or inheritance (Deut. 32:9; Josh. 15:1; 1 Chron. 16:18; Psa. 105:11; 125:3; Isa. 17:14; 57:6; Acts 8:21; comp. Acts 18:19).

LOT (Heb. לוֹט, lote, a covering), the son of Haran and nephew of Abraham.

1. Family. The following genealogy exhibits the family relations (Gen. 11:27, sq.).

2. Personal History. Lot's father dying (Gen. 11:28), he was left in charge of his grandfather, Terah, with whom he migrated to Haran (11:31), B. C. before 2250. After the death of Terah Lot accompanied Abraham to Canaan (12:4, 5), and thence to Egypt, and back again to Canaan (12:10; 13:1). (1) Separation. The flocks and herds of both increased so greatly that the land did not furnish pasture enough, and, consequently, disputes arose between their herdsmen. To put an end to strife Abraham proposed a separation, and magnanimously left the choice of territory to his nephew, who selected the plain of Jordan and fixed his abode at Sodom (13:5-12). (2) A prisoner. A few years after, Lot was carried away by Chedorlaomer, along with other captives from Sodom, but was rescued and brought back by Abraham (14:12-16), B. C. about 2250. (3) Escape from Sodom. When Jehovah had determined to destroy Sodom Lot was still residing there, and, sitting at the city gate, met the messengers (angels) of the Lord. He pressed them to pass the night at his house, and they yielded to his entreaty. While they were at supper the house was beset by a number of the inhabitants, who demanded, with the basest violation of hospitality, that the strangers should be delivered up to them for a most shameful purpose. Lot went out to them, shut the door behind him to protect his guests, and resisted the base demands of the crowd. This enraged them still more, and they were about to break in the door when the angels pulled Lot into the house, shut the door, and smote the people with blindness. Lot was then informed of the coming destruction of the city, and exhorted to remove his family, and in the morning was hastened away by the angels. Instead of cheerfully obeying the commandment to flee to the mountain, Lot entreated that he might be allowed to take refuge in Zoar, the smallest of the cities of the plain. While on their way Lot's wife, disobedient to the divine command, "Look not behind thee," lingered behind, probably from a longing for her home and earthly possessions, and "became a pillar of salt" (see NOTE). Lot, actuated by fear, soon left Zoar and removed to a cave in the neighboring mountains (19:1-30). (4) Daughters' crime. While there his daughters, dreading the extinction of their family, resolved to procure children through their father. This they succeeded in doing by making him drunk with wine, and in that state seducing him into an act of which he would not in soberness have been guilty. The son of the elder daughter was Moab, progenitor of the Moabites and of the younger Ben-ammi, "the father," i. e., ancestor of the Ammonites (19:31-38).

Lot is not mentioned again, and the time and place of his death are unknown.

NOTE.—Lot's wife. The turning of Lot's wife into a pillar of salt has often been regarded as one of the difficulties of the Bible, but is not so necessarily. "We are not to suppose that she was actually turned into one, but having been killed by the fiery and sulphureous vapor with which the air was filled and afterward incrustured with salt, she resembled an actual statue of salt" (K. and D., Com., in loco). Lot's daughters. The narrative of the conduct of these women is related without comment by the sacred writer. There is no concealment, no extenuation. The very fact of their securing Lot's intoxication is evidence that he was too good a man to accede to their wishes while in his right mind.

LOTAN (Heb. לוֹטָן, lo-tan', covering), the first-named son of Seir, the Horite, and a prince of Idumæa prior to the ascendancy of the Esauites (Gen. 36:20, 29; 1 Chron. 1:38). His sons were Hori and Heman (or Homan) (36:22; 1 Chron. 1:39), and through his sister, Timna, he was related to Eliphaz, Esau's son (Gen. 36:12).

LOVE (Heb. אֲהַבָּה, â-hab-aw'; Gr. ἀγάπη, ag-ah'-pay), chiefly represented in the Scriptures as an attribute of God, and as a Christian virtue. Its consideration, therefore, belongs to both theology and ethics.

1. An attribute of God. According to the Scriptures, God has feeling, affection, though rationalistic theologians (e. g., Schleiermacher, Bruch) have asserted the contrary. We must derive our conceptions of God from the special revelation which he has given of himself; and this declares his love as strongly as his existence. It is held by some to be inadequate to speak of love as a divine attribute, "God is love" (1 John 4:8, 16). The Scriptures contain no equivalent statements with respect to other qualities of the divine nature. Love is the highest characteristic of God, the one attribute in which all others harmoniously blend. The love of God is more than kindness or benevolence. The latter may be exercised toward irrational creatures, but love is directed toward rational, personal beings. The eternal love of God has never been without its object; a fact upon which we receive some light from the Scripture revelation of the threefold personality of God (see TRINITY; see also Matt. 3:17; John 15:9; 17:23-26). The gracious love of God to men, even to sinful men, is most strongly declared in both the Old and the New Testaments (e. g., Exod. 34:6; Isa. 63:9; Jer. 31:3; John 3:16; 1 John 4:10). The love of God underlies all that he has done and is doing, although many facts exist which we cannot reconcile with his love on account of our limited understanding. The highest disclosure and most complete proof of divine love is in redemption (see Rom. 5:8; 8:32-39; 1 John 4:9, 10). The reality and power of this love are properly apprehended only under the influence of the Holy Spirit. "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us" (Rom. 5:5).

2. A Christian virtue. Love is the preeminent virtue inculcated and produced by Christianity. The whole law is summed up in love, not in the sense of rendering all other requirements nugatory, but in the sense that love is fundamental, and expresses the spirit of all others, and with enlightenment will lead to the observance of all others (see Matt. 22:37-39; 5:43-48; John 14:15, 21; 15:12-14; Rom. 13:8; 1 Cor., ch. 13; Gal. 5:14). Accordingly love is declared to be the chief test of Christian discipleship (see John 13:35; Matt. 5:44; 1 John 3:14). Also, love is the highest motive or ground of moral actions. Without this all other motives fall short of furnishing the true stimulus of Christian living. As all sin roots itself in selfishness, so all virtue springs out of love; and yet the love which is presented in the New Testament as the mainspring of holy living is grateful love as distinct from the love that is wholly disinterested. "We love him because he first loved us" are words which rightly express the whole matter (see 1 John 4:19, also 2 Cor. 5:14; Rom. 12:1, 2). The contention of Fénelon that true Christian love should be disinterested, that we must love God exclusively on account of his perfection, so that if he did not bless us, but were to cast us off, we would love him still, finds no support in the Scriptures. It contains a measure of truth inasmuch as it emphasizes the warning that we are certainly not to love the gifts of God more than the giver, and that we are not to love God wholly on account of his gifts. In reality, grateful love includes adoring love, or that which loves God for his own sake. Christian love, it is also important to note, is made possible only by divine grace. It is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22; see also 1 John 3:14).

LOVE FEAST (Gr. ἀγάπη, ag-ah'-pan).

1. Meaning. Feasts expressing and fostering mutual love, which used to be held by Christians in connection with the Lord's Supper (whether before or after is uncertain), and at which the poorer Christians mingled with the wealthier and partook in common of the food provided by the wealthy (Jude, ch. 12). The expression, "sporting themselves with their own deceivings" (2 Pet. 2:13), is rendered in some texts "living luxuriously in their agapæ."

2. Mode of Celebrating. The bishop or presbyter presided. Before eating the guests washed their hands, and prayer was offered; then followed the reading of Scripture, and questions by the person presiding, reading or reciting accounts from other churches, which aroused sympathy and sometimes called for assistance; partaking of the feast and collection for orphans and widows, the poor, and prisoners; the kiss of charity, and conclusion by prayer (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 1 Thess. 5:26; 1 Pet. 5:14).

3. Decline. It appears from the passages already referred to, and from 1 Cor., ch. 11, that at an early period the agapæ were perverted from their original design, and the heathens began to tax them with impurity. The Roman authorities suspected the agapæ of belonging to the class of Heteriæ (secret societies), which were often employed for political purposes, and as such denounced by imperial edict. On account of these and similar irregularities, and probably in part to elude the notice of their persecutors, the eucharist came to be celebrated by itself and before day-break. The council of Laodicea, 28th canon, forbade holding the agapæ in the churches, and this was confirmed by the Council of Carthage (can. 29, A. D. 397).

4. Modern Observance. The Moravians observe the love feast on various occasions, "generally in connection with a solemn festival or preparatory to the holy communion. Printed odes are often used, prepared expressly for the occasion. In the course of the service a simple meal of biscuit and coffee or tea is served, of which the congregation partake together. In some churches the love feast concludes with an address by the minister" (Moravian Manual, 1859, p. 161). Wesley borrowed the practice from the Moravians, "in order to increase in them (persons in class) a grateful sense of all God's mercies." The only food is a little bread and water, and the exercises generally consist of singing, prayer, and the relation of Christian experience. These love feasts are observed by the Wesleys and Methodists of America.

LOVING-KINDNESS (Heb. רַחֲמִים, kheh'-sed, desire, ardor). In a good sense kheh'sed is zeal toward anyone, kindness, love. Of God toward men, goodness, mercy, grace (Psa. 17:7; 26:8; 36:7, 10, etc.). Figuratively, it is used of God as a merciful benefactor (144:2, "My goodness"). In the plural, mercies, benefits from God (89:2, "mercy;" v. 49; 25:6; Isa. 63:7).

LOW, LOWER, LOWEST (Heb. תַּחְתִּי, takh-tee). The expression, "low parts of the earth," means properly valleys; hence, by extension, sheol, or the under world, as the place of the dead (Ezek. 26:20; Psa. 63:9, rendered "lower"). The "lower parts of the earth" (Isa. 44:23) is not hades, but the interior of the earth, with its caves, its pits, and its deep abysses. The "lowest parts of the earth" (Psa. 139:15) is used figuratively for any hidden place, as the womb.

LU'BIM (Heb. לִבְיִם, loo-beem', Nah. 3:9; 2 Chron. 12:3; הַלִּיבְיִים, hal-lee-beem', 2 Chron. 16:8; לִבְיִים, loob-beem', "Libyans," Dan. 11:43), an African race, probably the primitive Libyans. They are always mentioned in connection with Egyptians and Ethiopians. They formed part of the armies of Shishak (2 Chron. 12:3) and of Zerah (16:8), and they helped No-amon, or Thebes (Nah. 3:9). In Dan. 11:43 they pay court to a northern conqueror. The Lubim were probably the Rebu, or Lebu, of the Egyptian monuments, a fair race of Semitic type, warlike, but not able to stand against Menepthah and Rameses III. Their home appears to have been on the north coast of Africa, west of Egypt. They doubtless belonged to the oldest stream of colonization which flowed westward along the northern coast of Africa. The territory of the Lubim and their kindred tribes may be likened to that of the great Arab tribe of the Bence 'Alee, which extends "from Egypt to Morocco." "Reduced by the Egyptians about 1250 B. C., and afterward driven inland by the Phœnician and Greek colonists, they still remain on the northern confines of the great desert, and even within it and in the mountains, while their later Semitic rivals pasture their flocks in the rich plains." Probably the Mizraite Lehabim (לְהַבִּיִם), Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11) are the same with the Lubim.—W. H.

LU'CAS (Gr. Λουκάς, loo-kas'), a "fellow-laborer" of Paul during his imprisonment at Rome (Phil., v. 24), A. D. 64. He is doubtless the same as LUKE (q. v.).

LU'CIFER (Heb. הַיְלֵל, hay-lal', brightness). The name is found in Isa. 14:12, coupled with the epithet "son of the morning," and clearly signifies a "bright star," and probably what we call the morning star. In this passage it is a symbolical representation of the king of Babylon in his splendor and in his fall. In another and far higher sense, however, the designation was applicable to him in whom promise and fulfillment entirely corresponded, and it is so applied by Jesus when he styles himself "the bright and morning star" (Rev. 22:16). "Lucifer, as a name given to the devil, was derived from this passage, which the fathers (and lately Stier) interpreted, without any warrant whatever, as relating to the apostasy and punishment of the angelic leaders" (Delitzsch, Com., in loc.). Its application, from St. Jerome downward, to Satan in his fall from heaven, arises probably from the fact that the Babylonian empire is in Scripture represented as the type of tyrannical and self-idolizing power, and especially connected with the empire of the evil one in the Apocalypse.

LU'CIUS (Gr. Λούκιος, loo'-kee-os, illuminative, for Lat. Lucius, surnamed the "Cyrenian"), one of the "prophets and teachers" at Antioch who, at the command of the Holy Ghost, ordained Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13:1; Rom. 16:21), A. D. 45.

LUD, LU'DIM (Heb. לֹד, lood, Gen. 10:22; 1 Chron. 1:17; Isa. 66:19; Ezek. 27:10; לִדְיִים, loo-deem', Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11; see also לֹד, A. V. "Lydia," R. V. "Lud," Ezek. 30:5; and לִדְיִים, A. V. "Lydians," R. V. "Ludim," Jer. 46:9).

The Lud of Gen. 10:22, 1 Chron. 1:17, was the fourth son of Shem; the Ludim of Gen. 10:13, 1 Chron. 1:11, were the first mentioned among the descendants of Mizraim, the second son of Ham. In Jer. 46:9 and Ezek. 30:5 לֹד and לִדְיִים are associated with African nations, and partly so in Isa. 66:19 and Ezek. 27:10. Our first impulse would be to refer all these prophetic passages, especially Jer. 46:9 and Ezek. 30:5 to the Mizraite tribe. This is confirmed by Smith (Bib. Dict., s. v., "Ludim"). It is hinted, however, that the Lud and Ludim of the prophets may have been the Ionian and Carian mercenaries which were employed in the Egyptian army from the time of Psammetichus I to the final subjugation of the country. This might explain the ambiguous manner in which they are associated with both Asiatic and African nations. In the time of the prophets Lydia might well be taken to represent the western part of Asia Minor. See LYDIANS.—W. H.

LU'HITH (Heb. לְחִית, loo-khoth', Jer. 48:5; לְחִיתָה, loo-kheeth', Isa. 15:5, flooded), apparently a Moabite town situated upon an eminence, whither the people fled from the invading Babylonians.

LUKE (Gr. Λουκάς, loo-kas'; Lat. Lucanus), the evangelist and author of the gospel bearing his name and the Acts of the Apostles. See GOSPELS; BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

Personal History. The materials found in Scripture for a life of Luke are very scanty, and seem to yield the following results: (1) That Luke was of Gentile origin. This is inferred from the fact that he is not reckoned among those "who are of the circumcision" (Col. 4:11; comp. 5:14). When and how he became a physician is not known. (2) That he was not "an eyewitness and minister of the word from the beginning" (Luke 1:2). (3) On the supposition of Luke's being the author of the Acts we gather from those passages in which the first person we is employed the following information: That he joined Paul's company at Troas and sailed with them to Macedonia (Acts 16:10, 11); he accompanied Paul as far as Philippi (16:25-17:1), but did not share his persecution nor leave the city, for here the third person they is used. The first person we does not reappear until Paul comes to Philippi at the end of his third journey (20:6), from which it is inferred that Luke spent the intervening time—a period of seven or eight years—in the city or neighborhood; and as the we continues to the end of the book, that Luke remained with Paul during his journey to Jerusalem (20:6-21:18), was that apostle's companion to Rome (27:1), sharing his shipwreck (28:2), and reaching the imperial city by way of Syracuse and Puteoli (28:12-16). According to the epistles he continued to be Paul's "fellow-laborer" till the end of his first imprisonment (Philem. v. 24; Col. 4:14). The last glimpse of the "beloved physician" (2 Tim. 4:11) discovers him to be faithful amid general defection. Tradition, since the time of Gregory of Nazianzus, makes Luke a martyr; yet not unanimously, since accounts of a natural death slip in. Where he died remains a question; certainly not in Rome with Paul, for his writings are far later (Meyer, Com., on Luke, introduction).

LUNATIC. See DISEASES, DEMONIAC.

LUST, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words with various meanings:

1. Intense longing desire, "my lust shall be satisfied upon them" (Exod. 15:9; Num. 11:34; Deut. 12:15, etc.).

2. In the ethical sense lust is used to express sinful desire—sinful either in being directed toward forbidden objects, or in being so violent as to overcome self-control, and to engross the mind with earthly, carnal, and perishable things.

"By lusts Paul, like Peter and James, understands, not the natural appetites of the body, but the sinful, godless inclinations (Rom. 1:24), whether these be of a sensuous or of a spiritual nature. He purposely quotes the Old Testament commandment against sinful lust (Exod. 20:17; Deut. 5:21) in such a manner that it is not any definite objects of lust, but the longing for them as such that he calls forbidden (Rom. 7:7). In his sense every lust is a product of sin (v. 8), which compels us to obey the lusts of the body (6:12); every natural appetite may be perverted by sin into lust (13:14). Such passages as 1 Thess. 2:17; Phil. 1:23 have naturally nothing to do with this technical use of the word lust (Gr. επιθυμία)" (Weiss, Theology of New Testament, i, p. 328).

LUZ (Heb. לוז, looz, nut tree).

1. The ancient Canaanitish name of Beth-el (Gen. 28:19; 35:6; 48:3), or a town which formerly stood upon or near the latter city (see BETH-EL). In Josh. 18:2 "Luz is distinguished from Beth-el because the reference is not to the town of Beth-el, but to the southern range of mountains belonging to Beth-el, from which the boundary ran out to the town of Luz, so that this town, which stood upon the border, was allotted to Benjamin (18:13)" (K. and D., Com.).

2. A town in the land of the Hittites, built by an inhabitant of the former Luz. He was spared when the latter was destroyed by the Benjamites (Judg. 1:23-26). It cannot be definitely located.

LYCAONIA (Gr. Λυκαονία, loo-kah-on-ee'-ah), a small Roman province of Asia Minor, bounded north by Galatia, east by Cappadocia, south by Isauria, and west by Phrygia. It is not very fertile, though level, and therefore adapted to pasturage. Its cities are Derbe, Iconium, and Lystra. The "speech of Lycaonia" (Acts 14:11) was a corrupt Greek mingled with Assyrian. Paul preached in this region (14:1-6), and revisited it (16:1, 2).

LYCIA (Gr. Λυκία, loo-kee'-ah, a wolf), a mountainous province in the southwest of Asia Minor belonging to Rome. Patara and Myra are its towns, which were visited by Paul (Acts 21:1; 27:5). It is a part of the region now known as Tekeh.

LYD'DA (Gr. Λυδδα, lud'-dah), called in the Old Testament Lod (1 Chron. 8:12), while its modern name is Ludd. It is located in the midst of a rich and fertile plain. It was one of the most westernly of the Jewish settlements after the exile, the site of which is described as Ge-haharashim, the valley of the smiths or craftsmen. It was here that Peter healed the paralytic, and secured many converts (Acts 9:32-35). It was not Jewish, but pagan, under the name of Diopolis. The traditional place of martyrdom, according to some, of St. George, and the depository of his relics, with his tomb and church.

LYDIA (Gr. Λυδία, loo-dee'-ah), a seller of purple of the city of THYATRATA (q. v.) who dwelt in Philippi. She sold the purple-dyed garments from Thyatira in Philippi, and traded in both the cheap and expensive merchandise. "As her husband is not mentioned, and she was a householder, she was probably a widow." She was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte, as the phrase "who worshiped God" imports. Converted by the preaching of Paul, and baptized by him, she pressed upon him the use of her house so earnestly that he was constrained to accept (Acts 16:14, 40). Whether she was one of "those women who labored with Paul in the gospel at Philippi" (Phil. 4:3) it is impossible to say.

LYDIA, LYDIANS, the words used in the A. V. for לוד, looz (Ezek. 30:5); and לודיים, loodeem' (Jer. 46:9); see under LUDIM. In Homer's time the country was occupied by Pelasgic Meonians (Gr. Μεγόνες), kindred of the Trojans. The Lydians came in with Lydus, son of Atys, from which Lydus, with his brothers Mysus and Car, descended Lydians, Mysians, and Carians respectively. To what race the Lydians belonged it is impossible to tell. To the Greeks they and their language was barbarous, but they were highly civilized, and with the Carians "were in many respects little inferior to the Greeks." Their commercial enterprise was an "industrial power" in its day, and was to them a source of great and lasting prosperity. Before their subjugation by Persia they were warlike, and their cavalry was the best of its time. To them is ascribed the invention of the games (παύσια) which they had in common with the Greeks, of retail trade, and of the coining of gold and silver.

After the dynasty of Lydus followed that of the Herakleids, beginning with Agron, son of Ninus, son of Belus, son of Alcæus, son of Hercules (Herod. i, 7). This connects at least the reigning family with Assyria. After reigning for twenty-two generations (five hundred and five years) this line ended with Candaules (Myrsilus), and was followed by Gyges, the first of the Mermnadæ, at a time variously estimated before and after 708 B. C. These Mermnadæ, who are thought to have been real Lydians, reigned till the fall of their last king, Cræsus, 546 B. C. Under the Romans Lydia was part of the Roman province of Asia.

Josephus (Ant., i, 6, § 4) makes Lud the ancestor of the Lydians; but as the Ruten or Luden of the Egyptian monuments for the 13th-15th century B. C. seem to have come from a place north of Palestine and near Mesopotamia, it has been conjectured that the Lydians may have gone from this place to Asia Minor, being displaced by the Assyrians. See SUPPLEMENT.—W. H.

LYSIANIAS (Gr. Λυσίαντας, loo-san-ee'-as, grief dispelling), named by Luke (3:1) as tetrarch of Abilene, on the eastern slope of the Anti-Lebanon, near Damascus, at the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry. Objection has been made to the truth of Luke's statement because there reigned in this country, about fifty years before this, a king named Lysanias. The probability is that this was a younger Lysanias, who was not king, but simply tetrarch.

LY'SIAS (Gr. Λυσίας, loo-see'-as), Claudius, the "chief captain" in command of the Roman troops in Jerusalem, who rescued Paul from the fury of the Jews (Acts 21:31-38; 22:24-30), and sent him under guard to the procurator Felix at Caesarea (23:17-30; 24:7, 22), A. D. 55.

LYS'TRA (Gr. Λύστρα, loos'-trah), a town of LYCAONIA (q. v.), where Paul preached after being driven from Iconium (Acts 14:2-7). Here he healed a lame man, and because of this was taken by the inhabitants to be the god Mercury (v. 8, sq.). Through the influence of Jews from Antioch and Iconium the tide was turned, and Paul was stoned nearly to death (v. 19; 2 Tim. 3:11). Paul left for Derbe, but soon returned (Acts 14:21). It is not definitely stated that he ever visited Lystra again, but the route of his third missionary journey (18:23) makes it probable.

M

MA'ACAH, or MA'ACHAH (Heb. מַאֲכָה, mah-ak-av', oppression).

1. The last named of the four children of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24). Whether this child was son or daughter is not stated.

2. One of David's wives, and the mother of Absalom. She was the daughter of Talmi, king of the Geshur, lying to the north of Judah (2 Sam. 3:3).

3. A city and small Syrian kingdom at the foot of Mount Hermon, near Geshur (Josh. 13:13; 2 Sam. 10:6, 8; 1 Chron. 19:7). The kingdom embraced the southern and eastern declivities of Hermon, and a portion of the rocky plateau of Iturea. The Israelites included this territory in their grant, but never took possession of it (Josh. 13:13). Its king contributed one thousand men to the Syrian alliance against David (2 Sam. 10:6-8), which was defeated (v. 19).

4. The father of Achish, king of Gath, to whom Shimei went in pursuit of two runaway servants, and by so doing forfeited his life by going beyond the limits prescribed by Solomon (1 Kings 2:39).

5. The mother of King Abijam. She was the daughter of Abishalom, and wife of Rehoboam (1 Kings 15:2), B. C. about 934. In v. 10 she is called the "mother" of Asa, but there "mother" is used in a loose sense, and means "grandmother." The following seem to be the facts: Maachah was the granddaughter of Absalom (Abishalom), and the daughter of Tamar (Absalom's only daughter), and her husband was Uriel of Gibeah (2 Chron. 11:20-22; 13:2). Because of the abuse of her power as "queen mother" in encouraging idolatry, Asa "removed her from being queen" (1 Kings 15:10-13; 2 Chron. 15:16).

6. The second named of the concubines of Caleb (son of Hezron), and the mother by him of several children (1 Chron. 2:48).

7. The sister of Huppim and Shuppim, and wife of Machir, by whom he had two sons (1 Chron. 7:15, 16).

8. The wife of Jehiel, and mother of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:29; 9:35).

9. The father of Hanan, one of David's valiant men (1 Chron. 11:43).

10. The father of Shephatiah, military chief of the Simeonites in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:16).

MAACH'ATHI (Deut. 3:14), MAACHA'-THITES (Hebrew singular with article, מַאֲכָתִי, han-mah-ak-av-thee', once, Josh. 13:13, מַאֲכָתִי, mah-ak-avth'), inhabitants of Maac(h)ah, a small kingdom near Palestine, probably in the stony desert of el-Kra, "which is to this day thickly studded with villages." It lies east of Argob (Lejah), between that and the Sufá. There were Maachathite warriors among the mighty men of Israel. One is apparently the father of Ahasbai in 2 Sam. 23:84, one was the father of Jezaniah, or Jaazaniah (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8); another, Eshtemoa (1 Chron. 4:19), may have taken the title from Maachah, Caleb's concubine (1 Chron. 2:48). Indeed, so common was Maachah as a personal name that other Maacathites may have received the epithet in the same way. It is possible that the kingdom Maac(h)ah (מַאֲכָה) may have taken its name from the Maachah (מַאֲכָה) of Gen. 22:24. The Maachathites are mentioned in Joshua in connection with the Geshurites as bordering the territory of Og, king of Bashan (12:5; comp. 13:11), but not dispossessed by Israel.—W. H.

MAAD'AI (Heb. מַאֲדָי, mah-ad-ak'ee, ornamental), a Jew of the family of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:34), B. C. 456.

MAADI'AH (Heb. מַאֲדִיָּה, mah-ad-yaw', ornament of Jehovah), one of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:5), B. C. about 536. He is thought to be the same with Moadiah (v. 17).

MAA'I (Heb. מַאֲי, maw-ak'ee, compassionate), one of the priests appointed to perform the music at the celebration of the completion of the walls of Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 12:36), B. C. 445.

MAAL'EH-ACRAB'BIM (Heb. מַאֲלֵה עַקְרָבִים, mah-al-ay'ak-rab-beem', steep of scorpions, i. e., "scorpion-hill"), a pass in the southeast border of Palestine (Josh. 15:3), called "the ascent of Akrabbin" (Num. 34:4). It is identified with the steep pass of es Sufah.

MA'ARATH (Heb. מַאֲרָתָה, mah-ar-awth', desolation), a place in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:59), not positively identified.

MAASEIAH (Heb. מַאֲסִיָּה, mah-as-ay-yaw', or מַאֲסִיָּהוּ, mah-as-ay-yaw'-hoo, work of Jehovah).

1. One of the Levites of the second class appointed musicians "with psalteries upon Alamoth," at the bringing up of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:18, 20), B. C. about 982.

2. One of the "captains of hundreds" who assisted the high priest Jehoiada in raising Joash to the throne of Judah (2 Chron. 23:1), B. C. 836.

3. A "ruler" (steward) who assisted Jeiel the scribe in arranging the army of King Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:11), B. C. 783.

4. A person slain by Zichri, an Ephraimite hero, in the invasion of Judah by Pekah, king of Israel (2 Chron. 28:7), B. C. about 735. Maaseiah is called the "king's son;" but this should not, probably, be interpreted literally, "for in the first years of his reign, in which this war arose, Ahaz could not have had an adult son capable of bearing arms, but" Maaseiah was likely "a royal prince, a cousin or uncle of Ahaz" (Keil, Com., in loc.).

5. The "governor of the city," appointed by King Josiah to cooperate with Shaphan and Joah in repairing the temple (2 Chron. 34:8), B. C. 621. He is probably the same with Maaseiah, the father of Neriah, and grandfather of Baruch and Seraiah (Jer. 32:12; 51:59).

6. One of the priests of the descendants of Jeshua, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:18), B. C. 456.

7. Another priest of the "sons" of Harim who put away his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:21), B. C. 456. He is probably the one who belonged to the chorus that celebrated the completion of the walls (Neh. 12:42), B. C. 445.

8. A priest of the "sons" of Pashur, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:22), B. C. 456. Perhaps the same with one of the trumpeters who joined in celebrating the building of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41), B. C. 445.

9. An Israelite, descendant of Pahath-moab, who put away his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:30), B. C. 456.

10. A Jew, whose son Azariah repaired a portion of the walls of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:23), B. C. 445.

11. One of those who stood at the right hand of Ezra while he read the book of the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), B. C. about 445.

12. One of the priests who, with the Levites, expounded the law as it was read by Ezra (Neh. 8:7), B. C. about 445.

13. One of the "chief of the people" who joined in the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:25), B. C. 445.

14. The son of Baruch, and one of the descendants of Judah who dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:5), B. C. about 536. In 1 Chron. 9:5, the same person is, probably, given as Asaiiah.

15. The son of Ithiel, a Benjamite, and one whose descendants resided in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:7), B. C. before 536.

16. A priest, whose son Zephaniah was sent by Zedekiah, king of Judah, to inquire of the prophet Jeremiah during the invasion by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 21:1; 29:21, 25; 37:3), B. C. before 589.

17. The son of Shallum, and a "keeper of the door" of the temple, with a chamber in the sacred edifice (Jer. 35:4), B. C. about 607.

MAA'SIAI (Heb. מַאֲסִיָּאִי, mah-as-ah'ee, operative), the son of Adiel, descendant of Immer, and one of the priests resident at Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:12), B. C. probably after 536.

MA'ATH (Gr. Μαῖθ, mah-ath'), a person named as the son of Mattathias, and father of Nagge in the maternal ancestry of Jesus (Luke 3:26). As no such name appears in the Old Testament pedigrees, it is thought that this name has been accidentally interpolated from the Matthat (v. 24) (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

MA'AZ (Heb. מַאֲזִיָּאִי, mah'-atz, anger), the first named of the three sons of Ram, the firstborn of Jerahmeel, of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. 2:27), B. C. after 1210.

MAAZI'AH (Heb. מַאֲזִיָּאִה, mah-az-yaw', rescue of Jehovah).

1. The head of the last (twenty-fourth) course of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:18), B. C. before 960.

2. One of the priests who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:8), B. C. about 445.

MAC'ABEES, THE. The Asmonæan family, distinguished in Jewish history, from B. C. 167 till the time when Judea became a province of Rome, were called Maccabees from Judas, a distinguished member of the house, whose surname was Macca-bæus.

1. Name. The etymology of the word is uncertain. Some have maintained that it was formed from the combination of the initial letters of the Hebrew sentence, "Who among the gods is like unto thee, Jehovah?" (Exod. 15:11), which is supposed to have been inscribed upon the banner of the patriots. Another derivation has been proposed, which, although direct evidence is wanting, seems satisfactory. According to this, the word is formed from Makkâbâh, "a hammer," giving a sense not altogether unlike that in which Charles Martel derived a surname from his favorite weapon. Although the name Maccabees has gained the widest currency, that of Asmonæans, or Hasmoneans, is the proper name of the family. This name probably came from Chasmon, the great-grandfather of Mattathias.

2. Pedigree. The relation of the several members of the family will be seen in the table on the following page.

3. History. The Maccabees first came into notice through the terrible persecution of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes. His accession was immediately followed by desperate efforts of the Hellenizing party at Jerusalem to assert their ascendancy. Jason, brother of Onias III, the high priest, secured the high priesthood, and bought permission (2 Macc. 4:9) to carry out his design of habituating the Jews to Greek customs (4:7, 20). Three years later Menelaus supplanted Jason by a larger bribe, and the latter fled to the Ammonites (4:23-26). During the absence of Antiochus on his second invasion of Egypt, he was reported as dead, and Jason seized the opportunity of recovering his office, took the city, and inflicted all manner of cruelties on the inhabitants. Antiochus, on hearing of this, and supposing that there was a general revolt of the Jews, hastily returned to Jerusalem, laid siege to the city, put forty thousand of its inhabitants to death, and sold as many more into slavery. He despoiled the temple of its precious vessels and furniture, and returned to Antioch laden with the treasure. On occasion of his fourth and last invasion of Egypt, he was arrested by the Roman ambassadors and ordered to leave the country on pain of the wrath of the Roman Senate (Dan. 11:30). On his way homeward he passed through Palestine, and vented his wrath upon the Jews, commissioning his lieutenant Apollonius, with an army of twenty-two thousand men, to destroy Jerusalem. Taking advantage of the Sabbath, he came upon the people assembled in their synagogues, massacred the men, and made the women and children captives. He burned the city, erected a fort on an eminence commanding the temple, so that the worshippers approaching it were slain; while the place itself was defiled with every abomination; and the daily sacrifice was made to cease, according to the prediction of Daniel (8:9-12; 11:31). Matters were brought to a height by the famous decree of Antiochus, commanding that all the people should conform to the religion of the sovereign on pain of death. This brought about the Maccabean war.

(1) Mattathias. At the time of the great persecution he was already advanced in years, and the father of grown-up sons. He was a priest of the course of Joarib, the first of the twenty-four courses (1 Chron. 24:7), and, consequently, of the noblest blood. He retired to Modin, a little town west of Jerusalem. He was required to sacrifice on the heathen altar, but refused. A Judean coming forward to sacrifice, Mattathias, carried away by his zeal, smote him, overthrew the altar, anes, whose resources had been impoverished by the war (27-31), left the government of the Palestinian provinces to Lysias. Lysias organized an expedition against Judas; but his army, a part of which had been separated from the main body to effect a surprise, was defeated by Judas at Emmaus with great loss, B. C. 166 (46-53); and in the next year Lysias himself was routed at Bethsura. After this success Judas was able to occupy Jerusalem, except the "tower" (6:18, 19), and he purified the temple (4:36, 41-53) on the 25th of Chisleu, exactly three years after its profanation (1:59). The next year was spent in wars with frontier nations (ch. 5); but in spite of continued triumphs the position of Judas was still precarious. In B. C. 163 Lysias laid siege to Jerusalem. The accession of Demetrius brought with summoned all the faithful to follow him, and fled with his sons into the wilderness. He was joined by many from various parts of the country; in many places the idolatrous altars were overthrown, and the old Israelite usages and customs reintroduced. Mattathias did not long survive the fatigues of active service. He died B. C. 166, and "was buried in the sepulcher of his father at Modin."

(2) Judas. Mattathias himself named Judas—apparently his third son—as his successor in directing the war of independence (1 Macc. 2:66). The energy and skill of "the Maccabee," as Judas is often called in 2 Maccabees, fully justified his father's preference. It appears that he had already taken a prominent part in the first secession to the mountains (2 Macc. 5:27), where Mattathias is not mentioned. His first enterprises were night attacks and sudden surprises (8:6, 7); and when his men were encouraged by these means he ventured on more important operations and defeated Apollonius (1 Macc. 3:10-12) and Seron (13-24) at Beth-horon. Shortly afterward Antiochus Epiph-

it fresh troubles to the patriot Jews. A large party of their countrymen, with Alcimus at their head, gained the ear of the king, and he sent Nicanor against Judas. Nicanor was defeated, first at Capharsalama, and again in a decisive battle at Adasa, near to the glorious field of Bethhoron (B. C. 161) on the 13th Adar (1 Macc. 7:49; 2 Macc. 15:36), where he was slain. This victory was the greatest of Judas' successes, and practically decided the question of Jewish independence; but it was followed by an unexpected reverse. A new invasion under Bacchides took place. Judas was able only to gather a small force to meet the sudden danger. Of this a large part deserted him on the eve of the battle; but the courage of Judas was unshaken, and he fell at Eleasa, the Jewish Thermopylæ, fighting at desperate odds against the invaders. His body was recovered by his brothers and buried at Modin "in the sepulcher of his fathers," B. C. 161.

(3) Jonathan. After the death of Judas the patriotic party seems to have been for a short time wholly disorganized, and it was only by the pressure of unparalleled sufferings that they were driven to renew the conflict. For this purpose they offered the command to Jonathan, surnamed Apphus (the wary), the youngest son of Mattathias. He retired to the lowlands of the Jordan (1 Macc. 9:42), where he gained some advantage over Bacchides (B. C. 161), who made an attempt to hem in and destroy his whole force. After two years Bacchides again took the field against Jonathan, B. C. 158. This time he seems to have been but feebly supported, and after an unsuccessful campaign he accepted terms which Jonathan proposed; and after his departure Jonathan "judged the people at Michmash" (v. 73), and gradually extended his power. The claim of Alexander Balas to the Syrian crown gave a new importance to Jonathan and his adherents. The success of Alexander led to the elevation of Jonathan, who assumed the high-priestly office (10:21); and not long after he placed the king under fresh obligations by the defeat of Apollonius, a general of the younger Demetrius (ch. 10). After the death of Alexander Jonathan attached himself to Antiochus VI. He at last fell a victim to the treachery of Tryphon, B. C. 144 (1 Macc. 11:8-12:4).

(4) Simon. As soon as Simon, the last remaining brother of the Maccabean family, heard of the detention of Jonathan in Ptolemais by Tryphon, he placed himself at the head of the patriot party. His skill in war had been proved in the lifetime of Judas (1 Macc. 5:17-23), and he had taken an active share in the campaigns of Jonathan (11:59). Tryphon, after carrying Jonathan about as a prisoner for some little time, put him to death; and then, having murdered Antiochus, seized the throne. On this Simon made overtures to Demetrius II, B. C. 148, which were favorably received, and the independence of the Jews was at length formally recognized. The long struggle was now triumphantly ended, and it remained only to reap the fruits of victory. This Simon hastened to do. The prudence and wisdom for which he was already distinguished at the time of his father's death (2:65), gained for the Jews the active support of Rome (15:16-21), in addition to the confirmation of earlier treaties. After settling the external relations of the new state upon a sure basis, Simon regulated its internal administration. With two of his sons he was murdered at Dok by Ptolemæus, B. C. 135 (1 Macc. 16:11-16).

(5) John Hyrcanus was the next leader of the family. Having been unanimously proclaimed high priest and ruler at Jerusalem, he marched against Jericho to avenge the death of his father and brothers. The threats of Ptolemy against the mother of Hyrcanus caused him to protract the siege, until the sabbatical year obliged him to raise it. But Ptolemy, after killing her and her sons, fled to Philadelphia. Antiochus soon after invaded Judea, and, besieging Jerusalem, reduced Hyrcanus to great extremity. At the feast of Passover, however, he granted a truce for a week, supplied the besieged with sacrifices, and ended with conceding a peace on condition that the Jews surrendered their arms, paid tribute for Joppa and other towns, and gave him five hundred talents of silver and hostages. Ewald (History, v, p. 344) says that "John sought relief in his financial difficulties by opening the tomb of David. The treasures which he found there enabled him not only to pay the required redemption money, but also to enlist foreign mercenaries." John himself immediately accompanied the king to Parthia, where Antiochus was killed. Hyrcanus availed himself of the opportunity to shake off the Syrian yoke and establish the independence of Judea, which was maintained until it was subjugated by the Romans. He also captured several towns beyond the Jordan; destroyed the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim; captured the towns of Dora and Marissa in Idumæa, and forced the rite of circumcision upon the people; renewed a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Rome, and amassed great wealth. His sons, Antigonus and Aristobulus, conducted a campaign against the Samaritans; and when Antiochus Cyzicenus came to the relief of the Samaritans, he was defeated by Aristobulus. After a year or so Samaria fell into the hands of Hyrcanus. Soon after, being exposed to some indignity from a Pharisee, he openly left that sect and joined the Sadducees. He passed the rest of his days in peace, built the castle of Baris on a rock within the fortifications of the temple, called by Herod "Antonia." His reign lasted about thirty years.

(6) Aristobulus succeeded his father, John Hyrcanus, as high priest and governor. He was the first since the captivity to assume the title of king. He starved his mother to death and imprisoned three of his brothers. He only reigned one year.

(7) Alexander Jannæus succeeded to his brother Aristobulus, slaying one brother who displayed ambition, but leaving the other alone. After varying fortunes, he found himself at the head of sixty thousand men, and he marched in triumph to Jerusalem. After a reign of twenty-seven years he died, B. C. 78.

Alexander was succeeded by Hyrcanus II, and he was induced to enter private life by his brother Aristobulus II. Aristobulus, offering to surrender Jerusalem, was thrown into chains by Pompey. Hyrcanus was restored by Pompey to the high priesthood. He carried Aristobulus and family to Rome; but Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, escaped, and, raising a considerable force, garrisoned Machærus, Hyrcania, and the stronghold of Alexandrión. He was subdued by Gabinus. No sooner had he done so than Aristobulus escaped from Rome and established himself in Alexandrión. He was taken prisoner and sent in chains to Rome, but his son Antigonus was released. Alexander, with eighty thousand men, opposed the Romans, but was put to flight. He was subsequently executed by Metellus Scipio, B. C. 49. Thus Hyrcanus retained the sovereignty, but Antipater enjoyed the real power. He found, however, a troublesome enemy in Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, who allied himself with the Parthians, and for a time held Jerusalem and kept Herod in check. At Masada, a city on the west coast of the Dead Sea, Antigonus was nearly successful, until Herod obliged him to raise the siege. He afterward suffered defeat by Herod, and was vanquished by the Roman general Sosius, sent to Anthony, by whom, at the request of Herod, he was put to death, B. C. 37.

Thus perished the last of the Maccabees, who seemed to inherit something of their ancient spirit. Hyrcanus, who previously to this had been incapacitated for the priesthood by having his ears cut off, was put to death in his eightieth year, B. C. 30. Herod married Mariamne, in whom the race of the Asmonæans came to an end, and by her marriage passed into the Idumæan line of the Herodians.

Two of the first generation of Maccabees, though they did not like their brothers attain to leadership, shared their fate—Eleazar, by a noble act of self-devotion; John, apparently the eldest brother, by treachery. Probably history affords no parallel to the courage with which this band of men dared to face death, one by one, in a holy cause. "The many years, probably visited it for a third time (Phil. 2:24; 1 Tim. 1:3). See PAUL.

MACHÆRUS (Gr. Μαχαίρων, the Black Fortress), a strong fortress of Petræa, and the place, according to Josephus (Ant., xviii, 5, 2), of John the Baptist's beheading. It was built by Alexander Jannæus as a check against Arab marauders (Josephus, Wars, vii, 6, 2), demolished by Gabinius when he made war against Aristobulus, and rebuilt by Herod. It was situated in the gorge of Callirhoe, one of the valleys east of the Dead Sea, three thousand eight hundred and sixty feet above this sea and two thousand five hundred and forty-six feet above the Mediterranean. "Its ruins, now called M'khaur, are still visible on the northern end of Jebel Attarûs." See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

M'khaur.

Maccabees inspired a subject-people with independence; they found a few personal followers, and they left a nation" (McC. and S., Cyc.; Smith, Bib. Dict.; Ewald, History of Israel). See MACCABEES, BOOKS OF.

MACEDO'NIA (Gr. Μακεδονία, mak-ed-on-ee'-ah), a country lying north of Greece, whose and Thessalonica. It was conquered by the Romans, 168 B. C. Under the famous Philip and his son, Alexander the Great, it attained the summit of its power. Paul was summoned to preach in Macedonia by a vision (Acts 16:9; 20:1). The history of his journey through Macedonia is given in detail in Acts 16:10-17:15. He again passed through this province (20:1-6), and, after whose rivers were the Strymon and the Axios, and whose mountains were Olympus and Athos. Some of its chief cities were Amphipolis, Apollonia, Berea, Neapolis, Philippi, and Thessalonica.

MACH'BANAI (Heb. מַכְבַּנַי, mak-ban-nah'ee, binding), the eleventh of the Gadite warriors who joined themselves to David in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:13), about 1002 B. C.

MACH'BENAH (Heb. מַכְבְּנָה, mak-bay-naw', knoll), if a man, was the son of Sheva, and the one after whom the place of the same name was called (1 Chron. 2:49).

MA'CHI (Heb. מַכִּי, maw-kee', pinning), the father of Geuel, who represented the tribe of Gad among the explorers of Canaan (Num. 13:15), B. C. 1209.

MA'CHIR (Heb. מַכִּיר, maw-keer', sold).

1. The eldest son of Manasseh (Josh. 17:1), who had children during the lifetime of Joseph (Gen. 50:23), B. C. after 2000. He was the founder of the family of the Machirites (Num. 26:29), who settled in the land taken from the Amorites (Num. 32:39, 40; Deut. 3:15; Josh. 13:31; 1 Chron. 2:23). Owing to the fact of Machir's grandson, Zelophehad, having only daughters, a special enactment was made as to their inheritance (Num. 27:1; 36:1; Josh. 17:3). His daughter became the wife of Hezron and mother of Segub (1 Chron. 2:21). Machir's mother was an Aramitess, and by his wife, Maachah, he had several sons (7:14-16).

2. A descendant of the former, a son of Ammiel, residing at Lo-debar, who took care of the lame son of Jonathan until he was provided for by David (2 Sam. 9:4, 5), and afterward hospitably entertained the king himself at Mahanaim (17:27-29), B. C. about 984-967.

MA'CHIRITES (Heb. מַכִּירִיתִים, ham-maw-keeree', "the Machirite," only in Num. 26:29), descendants of Machir, 1, who was son of Manasseh by an Aramite concubine. The wife and children are named in 1 Chron. 7:16, 17; but the statement in v. 17, "These are the sons of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh," with the declaration that "Machir begat Gilead" would add Gilead to the list of Machir's sons. At the same time the enumeration of the Gileadites by families in Num. 26:29-32, together with the account of the people of Gilead in Num. 36:39, 40, gives some color to the opinion that in "Machir begat Gilead" Gilead is used collectively for the inhabitants of Gilead, like Moab for the Moabite nation, and the like, and that what is meant is that Machir was the ancestor of the Gileadites. The wife of Machir, who seems to have been a Benjamitess, was Maachah, the sister of Huppim and Shuppim (1 Chron. 7:12, 15). And Abiah (2:24) was the last wife of Hezron (v. 21), son of Pharez (v. 6), son of Judah (v. 4). Thus did the Machirites connect Manasseh with both Judah and Benjamin. The daughters of Zelophead, whose story is told in Num. 26:33; 27:1-11; 36:1-12; Josh. 17:3-6, were Machirites. The law which prevented confusion of inheritances by tribal intermarriages was first made in regard to this case (Num. 36:1-12), and was not in existence at the time of the before-mentioned intermarriages. See more under MANASSITES.—W. H.

MACHNADE'BAI (Heb. מַכְנַדְבַּי, mak-nad-bah'ee, what is like the liberal?), an Israelite of the "sons" of Bani who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:40), B. C. 456.

MACHPE'LAH (Heb. מַכְפֵּלָה, mak-pay-law', double), a field containing a cave, bought by Abraham for a burying place (Gen. 23:9, 17) and where he buried Sarah (v. 19). Abraham was buried there (25:9), Isaac and Rebekah, his wife, and Leah, the wife of Jacob (49:30), and later Jacob also (50:13). This is the last biblical mention of the cave of Machpelah; and there is no reason to think that any building was erected on the spot before the captivity. The cave was in HEBRON (q. v.), and is now marked by a Mohammedan mosque, in which are shown the so-called tombs. Each is inclosed in a chapel, or shrine, closed with gates, and below the floor. Moslem and Christian have together held this sanctuary for six hundred years. The building, from the immense size of some of its stones and the manner in which they are fitted together, is supposed by some to have been erected in the time of David or Solomon, while others ascribe it to the time of Herod.

MAD. See MADNESS.

MAD'AI (Heb. מַדְאִי, maw-dah'-ee, a Mede), the third son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5), from whom the Medes are supposed to have descended. "We first hear of Madai upon the Assyrian monuments, about B. C. 840, where they are called Amadā, and found by the Assyrian army in Media Atropatēnē" (Sayce, Higher Crit., p. 126).

MA'DI'AN (Gr. Μαδιάμ, mad-ee-an', Acts 7:29). See MIDIAN.

MADMAN'NAH (Heb. מַדְמַנָּה, mad-man-naw', dunghill), a town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. 15:31), afterward assigned to Simeon. From 1 Chron. 2:49 it appears to have been founded or occupied by Shaaph, the son of Maachah, Caleb's concubine. It is, perhaps, identical with Miniay, or Minieh, south of Gaza.

MAD'MEN (Heb. מַדְמַנִּים, mad-mane', dunghill), a town in Moab, threatened with the sword from the Babylonian invasion (Jer. 48:2), perhaps near the northern extremity of the Dead Sea.

MADME'NAH (Heb. מַדְמַנָּה, mad-may-naw', dunghill), a town (Isa. 10:31) named on the route of the Assyrian invaders, north of Jerusalem, between Nob and Gibeah. The same word in Isa. 25:10 is rendered "dunghill," and the verse may mean "that Moab will be trodden down by Jehovah as teh'-ben (broken straw) is trodden to fragments on the thrashing floors of Madmenah."

MADNESS. Besides its proper meaning of mania (see DISEASES), the term "mad" is used in Scripture of a violent disturbance of the mental faculties: (1) From overstudy (Acts 26:24, 25); (2) from sudden and startling intelligence (12:15); (3) of false prophets (Isa. 44:25; Hos. 9:7); (4) the result of inebriety (Jer. 25:16; 51:7); (5) in derision, with reference to the ecstatic utterances of the prophets when in a state of holy exaltation (2 Kings 9:11; Jer. 29:26); (6) furious passion, as a persecutor (Acts 26:11; Ps. 102:8); (7) idolatrous hallucination (Jer. 50:38), or wicked and extravagant jollity (Eccles. 2:2); (8) a reckless state of mind (10:13), bordering on delirium (Zech. 12:4), whether induced by overstrained mental effort (Eccles. 1:17; 2:12), blind rage (Luke 6:11), or depraved tempers (Eccles. 7:25; 9:3; 2 Pet. 2:16).

MA'DON (Heb. מַדּוֹן, maw-dohn', strife), a Canaanitish city, in the north of Palestine, ruled by a king named Jobab (Josh. 11:1), and captured by Joshua (12:19). It "is probably represented by the village of Madin, near Hattin, west of the Sea of Galilee" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 162).

MAG'BISH (Heb. מַגְבִּישׁ, mag-beesh', stiffening), the name of a man (or place) whose descendants, to the number of one hundred and fifty-six, returned to Palestine with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:30).

MAG'DALA (Gr. Μαγδαλά, mag-dal-ah', tower), a small town of Galilee, on the west shore of the Lake of Genesaret, between Capernaum and Tiberias, mentioned only in Matt. 15:39 (Dalmanutha in the parallel passage, Mark 8:10), and may be the same as Migdal-el (Josh. 19:38). It was the birthplace of Mary Magdalene, i. e., the Magdalene. It is now probably the small village of el-Mejdel, three miles N. W. of Tiberias.

MAG'DALEN, or MAGDALE'NE, the surname of MARY, 2.

MAG'DIEL (Heb. מַגְדִּיֵּל, mag-dee-ale', pre-iousness of God), one of the chiefs of Edom, descended from Esau (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chron. 1:54).

MA'GI (Heb. מַגִּי, mag; Gr. μάγοι, mag'-oy, A. V. "wise men" in Matt. 2:1, 7, 16; "sorcerer" in Acts 13:6, 8).

1. In the Old Testament. In the Hebrew text of the Old Testament the word occurs but twice, and then only incidentally. Among the Chaldean officers sent by Nebuchadnezzar to Jerusalem one had the name or title of Rab-mag (Jer. 39:3, 13). This word was interpreted as equivalent to chief of the magi. The term magi was used as the name for priests and wise men among the Medes, Persians, and Babylonians. These persons were supposed to be adepts in that secret learning which in remote antiquity had its seat in Egypt, and later in Chaldea, from which latter fact they were often called "Chaldeans" (Dan. 2:2, sq.; 4:7; 5:7, 11, 30). They formed five classes: The Chartummim, expounders of sacred writings and interpreters of signs (Dan. 1:20; 2:2; 5:4); the Ashophim, conjurers (2:10; 5:7, 11); the Mekashephim, exorcists, soothsayers, magicians, diviners (Dan. 2:2; comp. Isa. 47:9, 13; Jer. 27:9); the Gozerim, casters of nativities, astrologists (Dan. 2:27; 5:7, 11); and the Chasdim, Chaldeans in the narrower sense (2:5, 10; 4:4; 5:7). The magi took their places among "the astrologers and stargazers and monthly prognosticators." It is with such men that we have to think of Daniel and his fellow-exiles as associated. They are described as "ten times wiser than all the magicians and astrologers" (1:20). The office which Daniel accepted (5:11) was probably identical with that of the Rab-mag who first came before us.

2. Later Meaning. We find that the word magi presented itself to the Greeks as connected with a foreign system of divination and the religion of a foe whom they had conquered; and soon became a byword for the worst form of imposture. The swarms of impostors that were to be met with in every part of the Roman empire, known as "Chaldei," "Mathematici," and the like, bore this name also. We need not wonder, accordingly, to find that this is the predominant meaning of the word as it appears in the New Testament. The noun and the verb derived from it are used by St. Luke in describing the impostor, who is therefore known distinctively as Simon Magus (Acts 8:9). Another of the same class (Bar-jesus) is described (13:8) as having, in his cognomen Elymas, a title which was equivalent to Magus. In one memorable instance, however, the word retains (probably, at least) its better meaning. In the gospel of Matthew, written according to the general belief of early Christian writers for the Hebrew Christians of Palestine, we find it, not as embodying the contempt which the fraud of impostors had brought upon it, but in the sense which it had of old, as associated with a religion which they respected, and of an order of which one of their own prophets had been the head. Thus, the evangelist would probably see in them men at once astronomers and astrologers, but not mingling any conscious fraud with their efforts after a higher knowledge (Matt. 2:1). The indefinite expression, "from the east" (see Matt. 8:11; 24:27; Luke 13:29; Rev. 21:13), leads us to assume that the writer himself had no more precise information at his command. "It is entirely baseless to determine their number from the threefold gifts, and to regard them as kings on account of Psa. 68:30, 32; 72:10; Isa. 49:7; 60:3, 10." From a very early period the Church has believed the magi to be the first Gentile worshippers of the Christ. "The expectations of the Jews, that their Messiah was to rule over the world, might at that period have been sufficiently disseminated throughout the foreign countries of the East to lead heathen astrologers, for the object in question, to the Jewish capital" (Meyer, Com., in loc.; Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). See STAR.

MAGIC, MAGICIANS (from Heb. מַחֲשֵׁי, kheh'-ret, to engrave, and so to draw magical lines or circles), the art or science of working wonders beyond the ordinary powers of man. "Magic may be divided into two classes—natural or scientific, and supernatural or spiritual—the one attributed its wonders to a deep, practical acquaintance with the powers of nature; the other to celestial or infernal agency. But both systems seem to have taken their origin in traditional accounts of early miracles—in attempts to investigate how such miracles were performed, and whether it were possible or not to imitate them. The theory of atoms held by the Epicureans appears to have been the basis of most magical speculations. It may be expressed somewhat after this manner: All changes in nature take place by the operation of atoms, and must ultimately, therefore, be effected by mechanical action. Wherever man can substitute artificial action of the same kind, he can produce the same effects as those of nature. It required, in the first place, a knowledge of the mode in which nature acted; and, secondly, the power of applying the same agencies. On the other hand, the spiritual or geotic (literally "terrestrial," and so superstitious) magic relied entirely on the powers of spiritual beings; it demanded no knowledge of nature, and rarely required any moral or intellectual preparation. Its works were understood to be purely miraculous; and those who practiced it claimed the wonder-working power only by means of mighty and unseen intelligences in obtaining communion with and authority over whom their science consisted" (Imp. Bib. Dict., s. v.). As will be seen in the article MAGI, there were among the Egyptians, Babylonians, etc., classes who were expert in magical arts. We will refer to these before calling attention to the Scripture accounts.

1. Egypt. The god Thot, having pointed out the evil to men, gave to them at the same time the remedy. The magical arts, of which he was the repository, made him virtual master of the other gods. Their mystic names, their secret weaknesses, the perils they most feared, ceremonies by which they could be subdued, prayers which they must grant under penalty of misfortune or death, were all known to him. This wisdom, transmitted to his worshippers, gave them the same authority in heaven, earth, or the nether world. Thus, they could bind or loose Osiris, Sit, Anubis, or even Thot himself; send them forth, recall them, constrain them to work or fight for them.

Very naturally, this great power exposed the magicians to temptations, being often led to use it to the detriment of others, to satisfy spite, or gratify their grosser appetites. Many made a gain of their knowledge, putting it at the service of the ignorant who would pay for it. They pretended to be able to bring on sicknesses, deceptive or terrifying dreams, specters, constrain the wills of men, cause women to be victims of infatuation, etc. Magic was not supposed to be all powerful against destiny; thus, fate decreed that the man born on the twenty-seventh of Paophi would die of a snake bite, but magic might decide as to the year in which his death would occur. Still more efficacious were the arts of magic in combating the influences of secondary deities, the evil eye, and the spells of man. After expelling the hurtful deity it was necessary to restore the health of the victim, and thus the magician was naturally led to the study of medicine. Magic was also invoked against magic, and thus rivalry arose among magicians.

Among the officers of distinction in the royal household were the "masters of the secrets of heaven," those who see what is in the firmament, on the earth, and in hades; those who know all the charms of the soothsayers, prophets, or magicians. The laws of the seasons and the stars, propitious months, days, or hours, presented no mysteries to them, drawing, as they did, their inspiration from the magical books of the god Thot. They understood the art of curing the sick, interpreting dreams, invoking or obliging the gods to aid them, etc. The great lords themselves deigned to become initiated into the occult sciences, and were invested with these formidable powers; sorcery was not considered incompatible with royalty, and the magicians of Pharaoh often took Pharaoh himself as a pupil. The Egyptians thought "that everything that happened was owing to the action of some divinity. They believed in the incessant intervention of the gods; and their magical literature is based on the notion of frightening one god by the terrors of a more powerful divinity, either by prayer placing a person under the protection of this divinity, or by the person assuming its name and authority. Sometimes threats are uttered against a god; or rather, as an Egyptian priest (Abammon by name) said, the δαίμονες, i. e., subordinate ministers of the gods" (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, pp. 212, 281, 282; Renouf, Religion of Ancient Egypt, p. 219, sq.). See SUPPLEMENT.

2. Chaldeæ. The Chaldeans believed that the operations of nature were not carried on under impersonal and unswerving laws, but by voluntary and rational agents, swayed by an inexorable fate against which they dared not rebel, but still free enough and powerful enough to avert by magic the decrees of destiny, or at least to retard their execution. "From this conception of things each subordinate science was obliged to make its investigations in two perfectly distinct regions; it had first to determine the material facts within its competence—such as the position of the stars, for instance, or the symptoms of a malady; it had then to discover the beings which revealed themselves through these material manifestations, their names and characters. When once it had obtained this information, and could lay its hand upon them, it could compel them to work on its behalf; science was thus nothing else than the application of magic to a particular class of phenomena. . . . Chaldea abounded with soothsayers (q. v.) and necromancers (q. v.) no less than with astrologers (q. v.), to whom the sick were confided, as expert in casting out demons and spirits. Consultations and medical treatment were, therefore, religious offices, in which were involved purifications, offerings, and a whole ritual of mysterious words and gestures. The use of magical words was often accompanied by remedies, which were for the most part grotesque and disgusting in their composition; (these) filled the possessing spirits with disgust, and became the means of relief owing to the invincible horror with which they inspired the persecuting demons. . . . The neighboring barbaric peoples were imbued with the same ideas as the Chaldeans regarding the constitution of the world and the nature of the laws which governed it. They lived likewise in perpetual fear of those invisible beings whose changeable and arbitrary will actuated all visible phenomena. . . . In the eyes of these barbarians, the Chaldeans seemed to be possessed of the very powers which they themselves lacked" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 780, sq.).

3. Scripture Accounts. The earliest account of any magical proceedings recorded in Scripture is to be found in the history of Rachel (Gen. 31:19, 30, 32-35). This would seem to indicate the practice of magic in Padan-aram at that early time. The teraphim were consulted by the Israelites for oracular answers (Judg. 18:5, 6; Zech. 10:2). The only account of divining by teraphim is in the record of Nebuchadnezzar's advance against Jerusalem (Ezek. 21:19-22).

In Gen. 44:5, referring to the cup found in Benjamin's sack, we read: "Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth?" (see CUR, 4). We cannot infer with certainty that Joseph actually adopted this superstitious practice. The intention of the statement may simply have been to represent the goblet as a sacred vessel, and Joseph as acquainted with the most secret thing (v. 16).

In the histories of Joseph and Moses the magicians are spoken of as a class. When Pharaoh's officers were troubled by their dreams, being in prison, they were at a loss for an interpreter. Before Joseph explained the dreams he disclaimed the power of interpreting save by the divine aid, saying, "(Do) not interpretations (belong) to God? Tell me (them), I pray you" (Gen. 40:8). In like manner, when Pharaoh had his two dreams, we find that he had recourse to those who professed to interpret dreams. Joseph, being sent for on the report of the chief of the cupbearers, was told by Pharaoh that he had heard that he could interpret a dream. From the expectations of the Egyptians and Joseph's disavowals, we see that the interpretation of dreams was a branch of the knowledge to which the ancient Egyptian magicians pretended.

The Bible narrative of the events immediately preceding the Exodus introduces the magicians. When the rod of Aaron was changed into a serpent, it is said that Pharaoh called his magicians, and "they also did in like manner with their enchantments" (Exod. 7:11). The same is said of their imitation of the first and second plague (7:22; 8:7). But when they attempted to imitate Moses in the plague of the lice, they were unsuccessful, for it is recorded that "the magicians did so with their enchantments to bring forth lice, but they could not" (8:18). Whether the magicians really did what they appeared to do, or only performed a clever trick, has been a question of much dispute. Some contend that they did produce the same sort of miracle as that wrought through Moses, and that this was through demoniacal influence. It would seem the writer's intention to intimate that the Egyptian magicians considered Moses to be one of their own profession—what he did, that they claimed to be able to do also—he worked by the same means, and only exceeded them in degree. And this was unquestionably the opinion of the king himself. That they could not produce lice seems to be conclusive proof against their having acted through supernatural agency, for why should demoniacal power stop there? They admitted that this plague was from Jehovah, and the next plague, that of boils, attacked them to their discomfiture.

Balaam (see Num. 22:6, sq.; Josh. 13:22) furnishes us another case of a man accustomed to use incantations; and it is evident that Balak believed, in common with the whole ancient world, in the real power and operation of the curses, anathemas, and incantations pronounced by priests, soothsayers, etc.

Saul attempted to obtain a knowledge of the future in ungodly ways, and commanded his servants to seek for a woman that had a familiar spirit; the mistress of a conjuring spirit with which the dead were conjured up for the purpose of making inquiry concerning the future (see NECROMANCY, below). The supernatural terror with which the account is full cannot however be proved to be due to this art; for it has always been held by sober critics that the appearing of Samuel was permitted for the purpose of declaring the doom of Saul, and not that it was caused by the witch's incantations. The witch is no more than a bystander after the first; she sees Samuel, and that is all.

The prophets, through their condemnation of them, tell us that magical practices prevailed among the Hebrews in the later days of the two kingdoms. Isaiah (2:6) says that the people were "soothsayers like the Philistines," understood by Delitzsch (Com., in loc.) to mean "cloud-gatherers," or "storm-raisers." In another place (8:19) he reproves the people for seeking those "that have familiar spirits, and wizards that peep" (R. V. "chirp") and mutter; while in 47:12, 13, the magic of Babylon is characterized by the prominence given to astrology. Micah (3:5-7) refers to the prevalence of divination among those who were such pretended prophets as the opponents of Jeremiah, not avowed prophets of idols as Ahab's seem to have been.

Jeremiah was constantly opposed by false prophets, who pretended to speak in the name of the Lord, saying that they had dreamt, when they told false visions, and who practiced various magical arts (Jer. 14:14; 23:25, sq.; 27:9, 10).

From Ezekiel (8:7-12) we learn that fetishism was among the idolatries which the Hebrews, in the latest days of the kingdom of Judah, had adopted from their neighbors. The passage (13:18) is thought by some to refer to the making of amulets; while others believe that it is figurative of hiding the truth. See KERCHIEF.

Daniel, when taken captive, was instructed in the learning of the Chaldeans, and placed among the wise men of Babylon (2:18), by whom we are to understand the magi, for the term is used as including magicians, sorcerers, enchanters, astrologers, and Chaldeans, the last being apparently the most important class (2:2, 4, sq.; comp. 1:20). As in other cases the true prophet was put to the test with the magicians, and he succeeded where they utterly failed.

After the captivity it is probable that the Jews gradually abandoned the practice of magic. Zechariah speaks indeed of the deceit of teraphim and diviners (10:2), and foretells a time when the very names of idols should be forgotten and false prophets have virtually ceased (13:1-4), yet in neither case does it seem certain that he is alluding to the usages of his own day. In the Apocrypha we find indications that in the later centuries preceding the Christian era magic was no longer practiced by educated Jews.

In the New Testament we read very little of magic. Philip the deacon found in Samaria Simon, a famous magician, known as SIMON MAGUS (q. v.), who, while having great power with the people, is not said to have been able to work wonders. At Paphos, Elymas, a Jewish sorcerer and false prophet, was struck blind for a time at the word of Paul (Acts 13:6-12); while at Ephesus, certain Jewish exorcists, signally failing in their endeavor to cast out demons, abandoned their practice of the magical arts. We have also the remarkable case of Paul casting out the "spirit of divination" from a damsel who "brought her masters much gain by foretelling" (Acts 16:16-18). "Our examination of the various notices of magic in the Bible gives us this general result: They do not, as far as we can understand, once state positively that any but illusive results were produced by magical rites. They therefore afford no evidence that man can gain supernatural powers to use at his will."

4. Magic Forbidden. The law contains very distinct prohibitions of all magical arts. Besides several passages condemning them, in one place there is a specification which is so full that it seems evident that its object is to include every kind of magical art. The Israelites are commanded in the place referred to not to learn the abominations of the peoples of the promised land. Then follows this prohibition: "There shall not be found among you anyone that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that uses divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer" (Deut. 18:10, 11). It is added that these are abominations, and that because of them the Canaanites were driven out from before the Israelites.

5. Various Forms. As stated in article DIVINATION (q. v.), there were forms of ascertaining the divine will, and future events which were taken in a good sense, and, therefore, not forbidden. Two other classes of divination are mentioned in Scripture—those forbidden and those without special sanction or reprobation. We group these together for greater convenience in the study of the subject:

(1) Astrologer (Heb. and Chald. אֲשַׁרְיָן, ash-sharf', an enchanter, Dan. 1:20; 2:2, 10, 27; 4:7; 5:7, 11, 15), one who professed to foretell future events by the appearance of the stars; a forecaster of nativities, horoscopes, and thus determined the fate of men from the position and movement of the stars at the time of their birth. Among the Egyptians the days were supposed to have special virtues, "which it was necessary for man to know if he wished to profit by the advantages, or escape the perils which they possessed for him." Among the Chaldeans astronomy was considered as "the mistress of the world; taught secretly in the temples, its adepts—at least those who passed through the regular curriculum of study which it required—became almost a distinct class in society. The occupation was a lucrative one, and its accomplished professors had numerous rivals whose educational antecedents were unknown, but who excited the envy of the experts in their trading upon the credulity of the people. These quacks went about the country drawing up horoscopes and arranging schemes of birthday prognostications, of which the majority were without any authentic warranty" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ.).

(2) Belomancy, or divination by arrows. It is said of the king of Babylon, "he made his arrows bright" (Ezek. 21:21), more strictly, the quiver with the arrows. On this practice itself Jerome writes: "He consults the oracle according to the custom of his nation, putting his arrows into a quiver, and mixing them together, with the names of individuals inscribed or stamped upon them, to see whose arrow will come out, and which state shall be first attacked." In this case Jerusalem was the ill-fated object of this divination, as we learn from the next verse, "At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem." The arrow lot of the ancient Greeks was similar to this; also that of the ancient Arabs. Another kind of arrow lot was by shooting. Three suitors of an Eastern princess decided their claims by shooting each an arrow inscribed with his own name. The arrow taking the longest flight indicated the name of the successful competitor. This sort of divination is not to be confounded with the arrow shot by Jonathan, which was an understood sign; nor the shooting of the arrows by Joash, king of Israel, at the command of the prophet, in which we have a symbolical prophecy.

(3) The Chaldeans. Among others consulted by the king of Babylon respecting his dream were the Chaldeans. Among an Aramaic people the priests in a stricter sense were called Chaldeans, from the fact of the ancient supremacy of the Chaldean people in Babylonia. These Chaldeans sought their greatest glory in the study of astrology, and also possessed the knowledge of divination from omens, of expounding of dreams and prodigies, and of skillfully casting horoscopes (Keil, Com. on Dan. 2:2).

(4) Charm (Heb. שָׁחַח, law-khash', to whisper), a word used to express serpent charming (Psa. 68:5; Jer. 8:17; Eccles. 10:11). "In the first of these passages lawkhash occurs in connection with kheh'ber (Heb. כְּהֵבֵר, a confederacy, i. e., with the spirits of the other world), which is rendered in the same manner and has a similar meaning. It is certain that from time immemorial certain people of the East have exercised remarkable power over even the most poisonous of serpents" (see SERPENT CHARMER). The "charmer" mentioned in Deut. 18:11 (Heb. כְּהֵבֵר, kheh'ber) is one who pronounced a ban, probably referring to the custom of binding or banning by magical knots. Another reference to charmer is found in Isa. 19:3 (Heb. חַוִּיתֵי, hav-it-teem', mutterers), and is thought to refer to ventriloquists.

(5) Divination, diviners. Generally speaking, "divination differs from prophecy in that the one is a human device while the other is a divine gift—the one an unwarranted prying into the future by means of magical arts, superstitious incantations, or natural signs, arbitrarily interpreted; the other a partially disclosed insight into the future by the supernatural aid of Him who sees the end from the beginning" (Imp. Dict., s. v.). In Scripture the diviners were false prophets, and divination was allied to witchcraft and idolatry (Deut. 18:10, 18; Josh. 13:22; Jer. 27:9, etc.).

(6) Dreams, divination by. The Hebrews, along with other orientals, greatly regarded dreams, and applied for their interpretation to those who undertook to explain them. Such diviners were called oneirocritics and the art itself oneiromancy. Dreams were looked upon from the earliest antiquity as premonitions from their idol gods to future events. Opposed to this was the command of Jehovah forbidding his people from observing dreams and from consulting explainers of them. Those who pretended to have prophetic dreams and to foretell future events, even though what they foretold came to pass, if they had any tendency to promote idolatry, were put to death (Deut. 18:1-4). "In opposition to the word of God no prophets were to be received, although they rained signs and wonders—not even an angel from heaven" (Gal. 1:8).

(7) Enchantment. The rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew words: (1) Naw-khash' (שָׁחַח) to whisper, a spell, hence to practice divination in general (Lev. 19:26; Num. 23:23; 24:1; Deut. 18:10; 2 Kings 17:17; 21:6); (2) Law-khash (שָׁחַח), Eccles. 10:11), incantation (see No. 12)

(3) Loot (לָוֵה), literally to muffle up, hence to use magic arts (Exod. 7:11, 12; 8:7, 18); (4) Aw-nan' (אָוֵן), to cover with a cloud, hence to practice sorcery (Jer. 27:9); (5) Khav-bar' (כָּוַר), to bind, i. e., with a spell, to charm (Isa. 47:9, 12).

(8) Exorcist (Gr. ἐξορκιστής, ex-or-kis-tas'e', one who exacts an oath), one who employs a formula of conjuration for expelling demons (Acts 19:13). "The use of the term exorcists in this passage, as the designation of a well-known class of persons to which the individuals mentioned belonged, confirms what we know from other sources as to the common practice of exorcism among the Jews." Among all the references to exorcism, as practiced by the Jews, in the New Testament (Matt. 12:27; Mark 9:38; Luke 9:49, 50), we find only one instance which affords any clue to the means employed (Acts 19:13). In this passage it is said that "certain of the vagabond Jews, exorcists, took upon them to call over" a demoniac "the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth." See DEMON.

(9) Familiar spirits, consulter with. See NECROMANCER, below.

(10) Idolomaney, i. e., consulting with images, literally teraphim. These household gods of the Shemitic nations are often mentioned in the Old Testament from the time of Laban (Gen. 31:19). They were wooden images (1 Sam. 19:13) consulted as "idols," from which the excited worshippers fancied that they received oracular responses (Ezek. 21:21; Zech. 10:2).

(11) Magician, a general term including all those who worked wonders beyond the ordinary powers of man. See head of this article.

(12) Necromancer (Heb. רֹאֵי אֱלֹהֵי הַמֵּתִים, one who inquires of the dead), one who pretends to be able by incantations to call up the dead to consult them respecting things unknown to the living. A few, such as Cicero (Tusc., i, 16, 37), scouted the idea, but the practice held its ground in pagan and even Christian lands until the present. The Eastern magi were especially famed for necromantic skill. The necromancer was supposed to be the possessor of a conjuring spirit, i. e., of a spirit with which the dead were conjured up, for the purpose of making inquiry concerning the future (see Lev. 19:31). Such a person was the witch of Endor, to whose incantations the shade of Samuel responded (see SATL). It is evident from her exclamation that she was surprised at this appearance, and that she was not really able to conjure up departed spirits or persons who had died. The familiar spirit (Heb. רֹאֵה, obe, a leathern bottle), was supposed to be granted to the necromancer as a servant or attendant, and bound to him by the ties or obligations of witchcraft. To the spirits of the departed thus evoked the necromancer lent a low, soft, almost whispering voice (Isa. 8:19; comp. 19:3), as seemed natural for such shades. It is not certain that these mutterings and whisperings were produced by ventriloquism, although this may be the case, as ventriloquism was one of the arts of ancient jugglers. "In most parts of Greece necromancy was practiced by priests or consecrated persons in the temples: in Thessaly it was the profession of a distinct class of persons called Psychagogoi (evokers of spirits)." Necromancy was forbidden to the Israelites as a heathen superstition (Lev. 19:31), and they who disobeyed were threatened with death (Lev. 20:6; Deut. 8:11). Still it found its way among them, especially when idolaters occupied the throne (2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron. 33:6; Isa. 8:19; 29:4; comp. 19:3, where the Egyptian enchantments are mentioned).

(13) Prognosticators (Heb. מוֹדִיעִים לְחֻדְשֵׁי, making known as to the months) are mentioned in Isa. 47:13, where the prophet is enumerating the astrological superstitions of the Chaldeans. See ASTROLOGY.

(14) Rabdomancy (Gr. ῥάβδος, hrab'-dos, a staff, and μαντεία, man-ti'-ah, divination), divination by rods. Cyril of Alexandria calls this an invention of the Chaldeans, and describes it as consisting in this, that two rods were held upright, and then allowed to fall while forms of incantation were being uttered; and the oracle was inferred by the way in which they fell, whether forward or backward, to the right or to the left. This custom is referred to in the passage, "And their staff declareth unto them" (Hos. 4:12), as an evidence of the tendency of Israel to idolatry.

(15) Soothsayer, soothsaying, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words: (1) Kaw-sam' (קָסַם), to distribute, determine by lot (Josh. 13:22), where Balaam is so called; (2) Aw-nan' (אֲנָן), to act covertly. In Isa. 2:6, Mic. 5:12, soothsayers are supposed to mean "diviners of the clouds," the word used of the Chaldean diviners who studied the clouds; (3) Ghez-ar' (גִּזְרֵי), to quarry, determine (Dan. 2:27; 4:7; 5:7, 11), is applied to Chaldean astrologers, "who by casting nativities and by various arts of computing and divining, foretold the fortunes and destinies of individuals" (Gesenius, Heb. Lex.).

(16) Sorcery (Heb. from כַּשְׁפָּה, kaw-shaf', to whisper; Gr. pharmakeia, mag-i'-ah, Acts 8:11; pharmakeia, far-mak-i'-ah, medication). A sorcerer was one who professed to tell the lot of others, to have power with evil spirits (Isa. 47:9, 12; Dan. 2:2), and was severely denounced (Mal. 3:5; Rev. 21:8; 22:15). This art was also practiced in connection with pharmacy, the mixing of drugs and medical compounds (Rev. 9:21; 18:23).

(17) Splanchnomaney, divination by inspection of entrails, was practiced in Rome by the Etrurian soothsayers, and frequently referred to by Greek and Latin writers. Cicero (De Divin., ii, 15) mentions the importance of the liver in divination of this kind. One example of this is contained in Scripture (Ezek. 21:21), where it is said that the king of Babylon "looked in the liver," when he came to the "parting of the way," to decide as to his future course.

(18) Stargazer (Heb. מִבְּרָה, kho-zeh', beholder, and כֹּכַב, ko-kawb', star), one who pretends to foretell what will happen by observing the stars (Isa. 47:13). See ASTROLOGY, above.

(19) Witch, witchcraft, generally the rendering of the same original words translated "sorcery," "sorcerer" (see above). In 1 Sam. 15:23 it is the rendering of the Heb. כַּהֵן, keh'-sem, lot, and is the pretended divination in connection with the worship of idolatrous and demigonal powers.

(20) Wizard (Heb. יָדֵי דַעַת, yid-deh-o-nee', a knowing one), a term denoting a person pretending to be wise; but the term is usually employed as the masculine of witch. A wizard might employ any of the magical arts (Lev. 19:31; 20:27; 1 Sam. 28:3, 9), and the Israelites were forbidden to consult any such (Deut. 18:11).

MAGISTRATE, the rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew and Greek words, and referring to a public civil officer. Among the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans the corresponding term had a much wider signification than the term magistrate with us.

1. "There was no magistrate in the land" (Judg. 18:7) would be better rendered "no one who seized the government to himself," etc.

2. "Magistrates and judges" (Ezra 7:25) ought to be rendered "judges and rulers."

3. Ar-khōne (Gr. ἀρχων, first), rendered magistrate (Luke 12:58), signifies one first in power. Similar in derivation and meaning is ar-khay' (Gr. ἀρχή, Luke 12:11, "magistrates"; Tit. 3:1, "principalities"). Arkhōne is used of the Messiah as "the prince of the kings of the earth" (Rev. 1:5), and of Moses as the judge and leader of the Israelites. It is spoken of magistrates of any kind, e. g., the high priest (Acts 23:5); of civil judges (Acts 16:19); a ruler of the synagogue (Matt. 9:18, 23; Mark 5:22; Luke 8:41); persons of influence among the sects at Jerusalem, who were also members of the Sanhedrin (Luke 14:1; 18:18; 23:13, 35; 24:20, etc.); of Satan, the prince of the fallen angels (Matt. 9:34; Mark 8:22; Luke 11:15; John 12:31; Eph. 2:2, etc.).

4. Strat-ay-gos' (Gr. στρατηγός, general), properly signifies the leader of an army, commander; but in the New Testament a civic commander (Acts 16:20, 22, 35, 36, 38; Tit. 3:1). In Roman colonies and municipal towns the chief magistrates were usually two in number (called duumviri). These had the power of administering justice in the less important cases. See ISRAEL, CONSTITUTION OF.

MAGNIFICENT. See GLOSSARY.

MAGNIFY. See GLOSSARY.

MA'GOG (Heb. מַגּוּג, maw-gogue', region of Gog) is mentioned in Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5, as the second son of Japhet, but understood by some to be the name of a people. Sayce (Higher Crit., etc., p. 125) says "Magog is associated with Gomer in Genesis, with Gog also in Ezekiel (38:2; 39:6). Gog is described by the prophet as belonging to 'the land of Magog,' the situation of which is defined by its proximity to 'the isles' of the Ægean. It is clear that Lydia is meant, and that by Magog we must understand 'the land of Gog.' Whatever be the explanation, Magog was not the only country we know of in the name of which the initial Ma appears as a separable prefix."

MA'GOR-MIS'SABIB (Heb. מַגּוּר מִסַּבִּיב, maw-gore' mis-saw-heb', terror round about), the name given by Jeremiah to PASHUR (q. v.), emblematical of his fate (Jer. 20:3-6).

MAG'PIASH (Heb. מַגְפִּישׁ, mag-pee-avsh', moth-killer), one of the chief Israelites who joined the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:20), B. C. 445.

MAHA'LAH (1 Chron. 7:18). See MAHLAH, No. 2.

MAHA'LALEEL (Heb. מַחֲלֵלֵל, mah-hal-al-ale', praise of God).

1. The son of the patriarch Cainan, the grandson of Seth. Born when his father was seventy years of age, he himself became the father of Jared at the age of sixty-five, and died when he was eight hundred and ninety-five years old (Gen. 5:12-17; 1 Chron. 1:2; Luke 3:37), in which passage the name is Anglicized Maleleel.

2. An Israelite of the tribe of Judah and family of Perez (Pharez), and ancestor of Athaiah, who resided in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:4), B. C. before 536.

MA'HALATH (Heb. מַחֲלַת, makh-al-ath', sickness).

1. The daughter of Ishmael and third wife of Esau (Gen. 28:9; 36:3; in the latter passage called Bashemath).

2. The granddaughter of David, daughter of Jerimoth, and wife of Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:18), B. C. 934.

3. Part of title of Psalms 53 and 88. See MUSICAL TERMS.

MA'HALI (Exod. 6:19). See MAHLI.

MAHANATH'M (Heb. מַחֲנַתַּיִם, makh-an-ath'-yim, double camp, or double host, was so called because the host of God joined that of Jacob as a safeguard), a place beyond the Jordan, north of the brook Jabbok, where the angels of God appeared to Jacob (Gen. 32:1, 2). The name was afterward given to the town then existing, or afterward founded, in the neighborhood. It was on the boundary of Gad and Manasseh, as well as of Bashan (Josh. 13:26, 30), and was a city of the Levites (Josh. 21:38; 1 Chron. 6:80). Here Ishbosheth reigned and was assassinated (2 Sam. 2:8, 12; 4:5-8). Many years after David repaired to Mahanaim, and was entertained by Barzillai (2 Sam. 17:24, 27; 1 Kings 2:8). Near this appears to have been fought the battle between the forces of David and Absalom (2 Sam., ch. 18). It was named as the station of one of the twelve officers who had charge, in monthly rotation, of the provisions for Solomon's establishment (1 Kings 4:14). It has not been positively identified, but it may be that it is represented by a ruined site under the name of Maneh.

MA'HANEH-DAN (Heb. מַחֲנֵה דָן, makh-an-ay'-dawn, camp of Dan; R. V. "Mahaneh-dan"), a place at which six hundred Danites once encamped before the capture of Laish (Judg. 18:11-13). It was "behind," i. e., west of Kirjath-jearim; and was called "Dan after the name of their father" (18:29).

MAHAR'AI (Heb. מַחֲרֵי, mah-har-ah'ee, hasty), the Netophathite who was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:28; 1 Chron. 11:30), and was appointed captain, for the tenth month, of a contingent of twenty-four thousand men (1 Chron. 27:13), B. C. about 960.

MA'HATH (Heb. מַחֲת, makh'-ath, erasure).

1. A Kohathite, son of Amasai and father of Elkanah, in the ancestry of Heman (1 Chron. 6:35), B. C. before 1000.

2. Another Kohathite, who, with his brother

Levites, took part in the restoration of the temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12), and was afterward appointed one of the overseers of the sacred offerings (31:13), B. C. 719.

MA'HAVITE (Heb. מַחַוִּיטִים, makh-av-eeem', re-viving), apparently a patril designation of Eliel, one of David's guard (1 Chron. 11:46). As no place or person Mahavah, or Mahawai, is anywhere else alluded to from which the title could have been derived, a corruption in the text is supposed. Bertheau suggests that it should read, "he of Mahanaim."

MAHA'ZIOTH (Heb. מַחַזְיוֹת, makh-az-ee-oh', visions), one of the fourteen sons of Heman the Levite (1 Chron. 25:4), and appointed by lot leader of the twenty-third division of temple musicians (v. 30), B. C. before 960.

MAHER-SHAL'AL-HASH'-BAZ (Heb. מַהֲרֵ-שָׁלַל-חָשׁוּבָז, mah-hare'shaw-lavol'khashvsh-baz, he hastens to the spoil) are words which Isaiah was commanded to write upon a tablet, and afterward to give as a symbolical name to a son to be born to him (Isa 8:1, 3).

MAH'LAH (Heb. מַחֲלָה, makh-law', disease).

1. The eldest of the five daughters of Zelophehad, of the tribe of Manasseh, who married among their kindred, and so kept their inheritance (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3), B. C. 1171.

2. Given in the A. V. Mahalah, as the name of a child, whether son or daughter is uncertain, of Hamoleketh, the sister of Gilead, a Manassite (1 Chron. 7:18).

MAH'LI (Heb. מַחֲלִי, makh-lee', sickly).

1. The eldest son of Merari and grandson of Levi (Exod. 6:19, A. V. Mahali; Num. 3:20; 1 Chron. 6:19; 23:21; 24:26; Ezra 8:18). He had three sons, named Libni (1 Chron. 6:29), Eleazar, and Kish (23:21; 24:28), and his descendants were called Mahlites (Num. 3:33; 26:58).

2. A son of Mushi, a son of Merari, and therefore nephew of the preceding (1 Chron. 23:23; 24:30). He had a son, Shamar (6:47), B. C. before 1210.

MAH'LITE (Heb. מַחֲלִי, makh-lee'), a descendant of MAHLI (q. v.), the son of Merari (Num. 3:33; 26:58).

MAH'LON (Heb. מַחֲלוֹן, makh-lone', sickly), the elder of the two sons of Elimelech the Bethlehemite and Naomi. Having removed to Moab with their parents, Mahlon married Ruth the Moabitess, and died without issue (Ruth 1:2, 5; 4:9, 10), B. C. before 1070.

MA'HOL (Heb. מַחֲוֹל, maw-khole', a dance), a person who seems to have been the father of Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, men renowned for their wisdom before the time of Solomon (1 Kings 4:31). If these are the same as those given (1 Chron. 2:6) as the sons of Zerah, the word must be taken, as elsewhere, to denote simply their pursuit as musical composers, an art ever connected with dancing.

MAID, MAIDEN, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, differing in meaning beyond the mere matter of sex:

1. Nek-ay-baw' (Heb. נַקְיָה, Lev. 12:5 only, a maid child), a female from the sexual form. Similar in meaning is nah-ar-aw' (Heb. נַחֲרָה, 2 Kings 5:2, 4; Ezra 2:4, 9, 13; Prov. 9:23), corresponding to pahee-dis'-kay (Gr. παιδικον, Mark 14:66; Luke 22:56), a girl from infancy to adolescence.

2. Beth-oo-law' (Heb. בְּתוּלָה, Exod. 22:16; Judg. 19:24; Job 31:1; Psa. 78:63; Jer. 2:32; 51:22), a virgin, from the idea of separation. Similarly al-maw' (Heb. עֲלֵמָה, veiled, kept out of sight, Exod. 2:8).

3. Aw-maw' (Heb. אֶמָּה, Gen. 30:3; Exod. 21:20; Lev. 25:6, etc.); shif-khav' (Heb. שִׁפְחָה, Gen. 30:7, sq.; Psa. 123:2; Isa. 24:2), a maid-servant.

MAIL; COAT OF. See ARMOR.

MAIMED (from Heb. קָטַע, khav'-rats, to wound, Lev. 22:22; Gr. κωλύω, kool-los', rocking about, Matt. 15:30, 31; 18:8; Mark 9:43; ἀνάπηρος, an-ap'-ay-ros, crippled, Luke 14:13, 21), deprived by violence of some necessary member. Such sacrifices were not allowed to be offered (see LAME, SACRIFICES).

MAINSAIL. See SHIP.

MA'KAZ (Heb. מַכָּז, maw-kats', end, bound-ary), one of the places in the district under the supervision of "the son of Dekar" (1 Kings 4:9), one of Solomon's purveyors. Its situation is unknown.

MAKER (Heb. עָשָׂה, aw-saw', to make in the widest sense; once only, in Job 36:3, פָּעַל, paw-al', to do and so make; also יָצַר, yaw-tsar', to mold), a term usually applied to God as creator (Job 4:17; 36:3; Psa. 95:6; Prov. 22:2; Isa. 17:7, etc.; Hos. 8:14). It is used of man in Isa. 22:11 and Hab. 2:18. The expression "And the strong shall be as tow, and the maker of it as a spark" (Isa. 1:31), has a better reading in the margin and the R. V., "and his work as a spark." The meaning seems to be "that the fire of judgment need not come from without. Sin carries the fire of indignation within itself, and an idol is, as it were, an idolater's sin embodied and exposed to the light of day" (Deltzsch, Com., in loc.).

MAKHE'LOTH (Heb. מַקְהֵלוֹת, makh-hay-loth', assemblies), the twenty-sixth station of Israel in the wilderness, between Haradah and Tabath (Num. 33:25, 26); present location unknown.

MAKED'DAH (Heb. מַכְּדָה, makh-kay-daw', herdsman's place), a royal Canaanite city in the low country of Judah (Josh. 12:16), located near the place at which Joshua put to death five kings who had fought against Israel (Josh. 10:10-29). It was afterward assigned to Judah (15:41). George Smith identifies this place with el-Mughâr, "the caves," to the southwest of Ekron, yet admits it as doubtful.

MAK'TESH (Heb. מַכְתֵּשֶׁת, makh-taysh', mortar), a peculiar mortar-shaped valley, generally supposed to have been the Tyropean Valley. Ewald thinks it to have been that part of the city of Jerusalem known as the Phœnician quarter (Zeph. 1:11).

MAL'ACHI (Heb. מַלְאָכִי, mal-aw-kee', messenger), the last both of the minor prophets and Old Testament writers (Mal. 1:1). The circumstances of Malachi's life are unknown, only as they may be inferred by his prophecies. He seems to have been contemporary with Nehemiah, if we may judge from the agreement found between them in the reproof administered for the marriage of Gentile wives (comp. 2:11, sq., with Neh. 13:23, sq.) and negligent payment of tithes (Mal. 3:8-10 with Neh. 13:10-14), B. C. 432. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

MAL'CHAM (Heb. מַלְכָּם, mal-kawm', their king).

1. A Benjamite, and fourth named of the seven sons of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. 8:9).

2. A false god (Zeph. 1:5). See GODS, FALSE.

MALCHI'AH, or MALCHI'JAH (Heb. מַלְכִּי־יָהוּ, mal-kee-yaw', and מַלְכִּי־יָהוּהוּ, mal-kee-yaw'-hoo, Jehovah's king).

1. A Gershonite Levite in the ancestry of Asaph (1 Chron. 6:40).

2. A priest, the father of Pashur (1 Chron. 9:12; Jer. 21:1; in other passages "Malchijah," Neh. 11:12; Jer. 38:1), B. C. before 589.

3. The head of the fifth division of the sons of Aaron as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:9, Malchijah), B. C. before 960.

4. An Israelite, formerly resident (or descendant) of Parosh, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:25), B. C. 456.

5. Another Israelite of the same place (or parentage) who did the same (Ezra 10:25, "Malchijah"), B. C. 456.

6. A Jew of the family (or town) of Harim who divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:31), B. C. 456. He also assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11, A. V. "Malchijah"), B. C. 445.

7. The son of Rechab, the ruler of part of Beth-haccerem, who repaired the dung gate of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:14), B. C. 445.

8. The "goldsmith's son" who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:31), B. C. about 445.

9. One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the book of the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), B. C. about 445.

10. One of the priests who subscribed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:3, A. V. "Milchijah"), B. C. 445.

11. One of the priests appointed, probably as singers, to assist in celebrating the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42, A. V. "Malchijah"), B. C. 445.

MAL'CHIEL (Heb. מַלְכִּי־אֵל, mal-kee-ale', God's king, i. e., appointed by him), the younger son of Beriah, the son of Asher (Gen. 46:17), B. C. about 2000. His descendants were called Malchielites (Num. 26:45), and he himself was the "father" (founder) of Birzavith (1 Chron. 7:31).

MAL'CHIELITE (Heb. מַלְכִּי־אֵלִי, mal-kee-ay-lee'), a descendant of MALCHIEL (Num. 26:45).

MALCHI'RAM (Heb. מַלְכִּי־רָם, mal-kee-rawm', king of height, i. e., exaltation), the second son of King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin), born to him during his captivity (1 Chron. 3:18), B. C. after 597. See 2 Kings 24:12.

MAL'CHI-SHU'A (Heb. מַלְכִּי־שׁוּא, mal-kee-shoo'-ah, king of wealth), one of the four sons of Saul, probably by Ahinoam (1 Sam. 14:49; 1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39). He was slain, with his father, at the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:2; 1 Chron. 10:2), B. C. 1000.

MAL'CHUS (Gr. Μάλχος, mal'-khos; from Heb. מַלְכֵי, meh'-lek, king), the servant of the high priest whose ear was cut off by Peter at the arrest of Jesus in the garden of Gethsemane (John 18:10). Caiaphas is doubtless the high priest intended, for John, who was personally acquainted with him (John 18:15), is the only evangelist who gives the name of Malchus.

MALE (Heb. זָכָר, zaw-kawr', remembered).

This term was applied to male children as being the more worthy sex. The estimation in which such were held is shown by numerous passages in the Scriptures.

MALEFACTOR, the rendering of two Greek words (κακοποιός, kak-op-oy-os', John 18:30; evildoers in 1 Pet. 2:12, 14; 3:16; 4:15; and κακοίργος, kak-oor'-gos, Luke 23:32, sq.; evildoer in 2 Tim. 2:9). By the term malefactor is not meant, strictly speaking, thieves or robbers, but rebels or insurgents. The persons mentioned in the Gospels were, no doubt, men who had taken up arms on a principle of resistance to Roman oppression, and especially to the payment of tribute money. Though professedly opposed to the Romans only, yet, when engaged in their unlawful courses, it made less difference between Romans and Jews than they at first set out with doing (Bloomfield, New Testament, on Luke 23:32).

MALELEEL (Luke 3:37). See MAHALALEEL.

MALICE (Gr. κακία, kak-ee'-ah, badness, 1 Cor. 5:8; 14:20; Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8; Tit. 3:3; 1 Pet. 2:1; maliciousness, Rom. 1:29; 1 Pet. 2:16; malicious, from Gr. πονηρός, pon-ay-ros', hurtful, 3 John 10). Of these two Greek words the former denotes rather the vicious disposition, and the latter the active exercise of the same. Another kindred word is malignity (Gr. κακοίθεια, kak-ö-ay'-thi-ah, bad character, only in Rom. 1:29), given by Paul in his long list of Gentile sins. Aristotle defines it as "taking all things in the evil part" (Rhet., ii, 13); and the Geneva version of the Scriptures so renders it. It is "that peculiar form of evil which manifests itself in a malignant interpretation of the actions of others, an attributing of them all to the worst motive" (Trench, Gr. Syn., xi).

MALIGNITY (Gr. κακοίθεια, kak-ö-ay'-thi-ah), bad character, depravity of heart; used in Rom. 1:29 for malignant subtlety, malicious craftiness.

MAL'LOTHI (Heb. מַלְלוֹתִי, mal-lo'-thee, I have talked, i. e., loquaciousness), one of the sons of Heman (1 Chron. 25:4), and appointed by David head of the nineteenth division of temple musicians (25:26), B. C. before 960.

MALLOWES. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

MAL'LUCH (Heb. מַלְלֹךְ, mal-luke', reigning, or counselor).

1. A Levite of the family of Merari, and an ancestor of Ethan the musician (1 Chron. 6:44).

2. One of the descendants (or residents) of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return to Jerusalem (Ezra 10:29), B. C. 456.

3. A Jew of the family of Harim who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:32), B. C. 456.

4. One of the priests who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people to serve Jehovah (Neh. 10:4), B. C. 445. The associated names would seem to indicate that he is the same with one of those who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:2), B. C. 536.

5. One of the "chief of the people" who subscribed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:27), B. C. 445.

MAMMON (Gr. μαμμωνᾶς, mam-mo-nas', what is trusted in), a term signifying riches (Luke 16:9, 11), but personified and spoken of as opposed to God (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:13). The expression "make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness," etc., is interpreted as follows by Godet (Com., Luke 16:13): "Instead of hoarding up or enjoying, hasten to make for yourselves, with the goods of another (God's), personal friends, who shall then be bound to you by gratitude, and share with you their well-being." According to Meyer and Ewald the "friends" are the angels, but Godet prefers to understand them as "men who have been succored by one on earth."

MAMRE (Heb. מַמְרֵי, mam-ray, lustily).

1. The Amorite who, with his brothers Aner and Eschol, was a confederate of Abraham (Gen. 14:13, 24), B. C. about 2250.

2. The name of Abraham's dwelling place, near Hebron (Gen. 23:17, 19; 35:27, R. V. "the oaks of Mamre"—marg, "terebinth"). Here Abraham entertained three angels, and was promised a son (Gen. 18:1, 10, 14). The cave of Machpelah lay "before, probably to the east of the grove of Mamre" (Gen. 23:17, 19; 25:9; 49:30, 50:13).

MAN, MEN, the rendering of fourteen Hebrew and seven Greek words. In some cases man is used in the sense of an individual without respect to sex. Thus it is the rendering of the Gr. μὴ τις (may-tice', not one, Matt. 16:20; 17:9; Luke 10:4, etc.; of οὐ τις, oo-tice', none, nobody, Matt. 11:27; Mark 3:27; Luke 8:51, etc.; of τις, (tis, some one or any, Matt. 24:4; John 3:5; Acts 10:47, etc.); and in an inclusive sense πᾶς (pas, all, Rom. 2:10).

1. Names. Several words are used with as much precision as terms of like import in other languages.

(1) Aw-dawm' (Heb. אָדָם, ruddy), with various meanings. (a) The proper name of the first man (Luke 3:38; Rom. 5:14; 1 Tim. 2:13, 14; Jude, v. 14); see also the remarkable use of it in 1 Cor. 15:45, "the first man Adam." (b) The generic name of the human race as originally created; and afterward, like our man, person whether man or woman (Gen. 1:26, 27; 5:1; Deut. 8:3). (c) Man in opposition to woman (Gen. 3:12). (d) Very rarely for those who maintain the dignity of human nature (Eccles. 7:28), i. e., who manifest true uprightness. (e) The more degenerate and wicked portion of mankind (Gen. 6:2). (f) Other men, as distinguished from those named; as "both upon Israel and other men" (Jer. 32:20); men of inferior rank as opposed to those of higher rank (Isa. 2:9; 5:15; Psa. 62:9). (2) Eesh (Heb. אִישׁ; Gr. ánhr̄p, an'-ayr) denotes a man as distinguished from a woman (1 Sam. 21:4; Matt. 14:21); as a husband (Gen. 3:16; Hos. 2:16, marg); and in reference to excellent mental qualities (Jer. 5:1, "Run ye to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem . . . and seek . . . if ye can find a man," etc.).

(3) En-oshe' (Heb. עֲנוּשׁ, mortal), as transient, liable to sickness, etc., "Let not man (marg, 'mortal man') prevail against thee" (2 Chron. 14:11). "To 'write with a man's pen' (Isa. 8:1) means to write in the vulgar, i. e., popular characters, that could be easily read" (Delitzsch, Com., in loc.). (4) Ghek'-ber (Heb. גִּבּוֹר, valiant), as indicating strength, superior ability, etc. It is applied to man, as distinguished from woman, e. g., "A man shall not put on a woman's garment" (Deut. 22:5); as distinguished from children (Exod. 12:37); to a male child in opposition to a female (Job 3:3), the birth of a male child being a matter of joy in the East, rather than that of a female. It is much used in poetry (Job 14:10; 22:2; Psa. 34:8; 40:4; Prov. 6:34, etc.). (5) Meh-theem' (Heb. מַעֲמֵי, men, always masculine). The singular is to be traced in the antediluvian proper names, Methusael and Methuselah. Perhaps it may be derived from the root mûth, "he died," in which case its use would be very appropriate in Isa. 41:14. If this conjecture be admitted, this word would correspond to βροτός, and might be read "mortal." Other Hebrew words rendered man are zaw-kawm' (זָכַר, remembered, Lev. 12:2), as representing the sex worthy of distinction; neh'-fesh (נֶפֶשׁ, a breathing creature, 2 Kings 12:4), an animate being; bak'-al (בָּקָל, master or husband, Prov. 22:24; 23:2; 29:22); gul-go'-leth, (גּוּלְגוּלֵת, skull, Exod. 16:16), answering to our poll. The Greek words properly rendered man are: Anth'-ro-pos (ἄνθρωπος, man-faced), and so a human being, and an'-ayr (ἄνhr̄p, a male), as distinguished from a woman.

It is noteworthy that the title Son of man, which Christ applied to himself, refers to man in this broadest and most comprehensive sense, and thus expresses the relationship he bears to every human being. For fuller presentation of terms and their force see Young's Concordance, also lexicons of Gesenius, Liddell and Scott, etc., etc. It is to be borne in mind, however, that while the precise force of these terms must be understood for accurate interpretation, the Bible doctrine concerning man is so presented that its most general and important features may be otherwise easily discovered.

2. Origin. Man is the most excellent of God's creatures upon earth. He came into existence not through the operation of natural causes, but by a distinct act of creation. He bore originally, and in an important sense still bears, the image and likeness of God. While with respect to his bodily organism he belongs to the animal world, he possesses a spiritual nature which gives him a most exalted rank above all animals. He alone of all creatures upon earth is truly a rational and moral and religious being, and is capable of communion with God. He alone is represented as sinful, yet the object of redemption. Before him is the certainty of future judgment and an immortal destiny (see Gen. 1:26-28; 9:6; Exod. 4:11; Job 35:10; Psa. 8:4-8; 94:9; Matt. 6:29-33; 12:12; 25:31-46; Rom. 5:12-21, and many other places). See CREATION; IMAGE OF GOD; IMMORTALITY; ATONEMENT; JUDGMENT.

3. Unity. Man's original unity, or that the whole of mankind has descended from one human pair, is one of the obvious teachings of Scripture (see Gen. 1:27; 2:21-25; Matt. 19:4; Acts 17:26; Rom. 5:12; 1 Cor. 15:21, 47-49). While denied by certain natural philosophers, this doctrine is generally accepted not only by orthodox theologians, but by such distinguished scientists as Buffon, Linnaeus, Blumenbach, A. Von Humboldt, and many others. This doctrine is of religious and ethical importance inasmuch as it is related to man's noble origin, the reality of human brotherhood, the universality of sin and of redemption.

4. Antiquity. With respect to the antiquity of man, the Scripture chronology appears to date his origin back about six thousand years. To what extent our understanding of the Scriptures at this point is beset with difficulties, and how such difficulties should be treated, it is not practicable here to consider. It is to be noted, nevertheless, that natural science agrees with the Scriptures in regarding man as the most recent in origin of all creatures dwelling upon the earth.

LITERATURE.—Van Oosterzee, Christ. Dogm., vol. i, p. 359, sq.; Dorner, Syst. Christ. Doct., ii, 66-68, 92-95, 107, 219, 221; Hodge, Syst. Theol., vol. ii, 2-130; J. Laidlaw, The Bible Doctrine of Man; Oehler, Theologie der Alt. Test., 219, sq., 225, sq.; the Duke of Argyll, Primeval Man.

MAN OF SIN (Gr. ὁ ἀνθρώπος τῆς ἀμαρτίας, 2 Thess. 2:3). Not sinful man merely, but he "of whom sin is the special characteristic and attribute, and in whom it is as it were impersonated and incarnate." See in the "Man of sin" a parallelism of Satan with Christ. "Even as Christ is now spiritually present in his Church, to be personally revealed hereafter, even so the power of Antichrist is now secretly at work, but will hereafter be made manifest in a definite and distinctive bodily personality" (Ellicott, Com., in loc.). Weiss (Bib. Theol. of N. T., p. 308) thinks that "reference is made to some Jewish pseudo-Messiah, who as the incarnation of the enmity to the true Messiah should set himself up as a lying imitation in opposition to him." In the same passage he is called also "the son of perdition," i. e., he who stands in the sort of relation to it (perdition) that a son does to a father, and who falls under its power and domination. This awful term ("son of perdition") is applied to Judas (John 17:12).

MAN, SON OF (Gr. ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου). This title was evidently taken from Dan. 7:13, where everlasting dominion is ascribed to the Messiah under that title. It was assumed by Christ himself, and though occurring sixty-one times in the gospels, is only used by Christ himself. It occurs once in the Acts (7:56), and is employed by Stephen. It is clear that from the corresponding term, "the Son of God," this title belongs to Christ by virtue of superiority; and that both taken together decidedly prove that Christ, in some manner unknown to us, united in his person both the human and the divine nature. "In this name there surely lies above everything actual humanity. Jesus knew himself to be a perfect personal man, and would not have been able to call himself Son of man if he only knew himself to be a manifest action of God. . . . The phrase must also signify, especially with the definite article, the opposite to imperfection and defacement, the truth of man, i. e., the realization of his idea. If he only meant to express by the name that he was a real man like others, the definite article would be inexplicable. The definite article points in that direction, that he was also conscious of his humanity not as a merely ordinary or faulty humanity, but as the perfect manifestation of its truth as well as of its realization" (Dorner, Christ. Doct., iii, 169, sq.; also Weiss, Bib. Theol. of N. T., 144; Miley, Sys. Theol., ii, p. 23, sq.; Bloomfield, Greek Test., Matt. 8:20).

MAN'AEN (Gr. Μανᾶν, man-ah-ane'), a Christian prophet or teacher who had been an associate (συντροφός) of Herod the tetrarch in his youth, and was one who assisted at Antioch in ordaining Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13:1).

MAN'AHATH (Heb. מַנְחָתִיתַי, man-nakh'-ath, rest), the second of the five sons of Shobal, the son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40), B. C. about 1850.

MANAHETHITES (Heb. מְנַחְתִּיטִּים, ham-men-oo-khoth', A. V. marg. "Menuchoth," R. V. "Menuhoth;" 1 Chron. 2:54, מְנַחְתִּיטִּים, ham-mau-nakh-tee', R. V. "Manahathites"), a term usually taken to mean inhabitants of Manahath, which is commonly identified with a town of that name in Judah. But in 1 Chron. 8:6, where only Manahath is mentioned, it is in connection with Benjamite genealogies. The expression "they removed them," however, may imply a removal beyond the circle of Benjamite towns; comp. v. 8, where the land of Moab is mentioned. The tribal lines were not always sharply drawn in the early ages, as we have seen under MACHIRITES. And the hostility between Judah and Benjamin, adduced in Smith's Bible Dictionary, included the other tribes as well as Judah, and must have been largely ignored from simple necessity, since Benjamin could not live alone and intermarriages with other tribes must have been frequent for a time. We incline, therefore, to the ordinary view, which is favored by Gesenius (Heb. Lex., 12th edition). But the difference in the Hebrew printing is hard to explain, and some identify the town with the מְנַחְתִּיטִּים of Judg. 20:48 (A. V. "with ease;" R. V. "at their resting place," marg. "at Menulah"). It may be that 1 Chron. 2:52 and 54 refer to entirely different persons. In Gen. 36: 23; 1 Chron. 1:40, Manahath is son of Shobal, son of Seir. The Manahathites in both verses are among the posterity of Caleb, and this is interesting in connection with the possible Edomite descent of Caleb noticed under "Kenezite."—W. H.

MANASSEH (Heb. מְנַשֶּׁה, men-ash-sheh', forgetting).

1. The Patriarch. The elder son of Joseph and his Egyptian wife Asenath (Gen. 41:51; 46: 20), B. C. about 2000. Manasseh and his brother were both adopted by Jacob upon his deathbed, who however gave the first place and the birthright blessing to Ephraim (48:1, sq.). Nothing is known of Manasseh's personal history. His wife's name is not mentioned, nor is it certain that he had one. Machir, the son of an Aramite concubine (1 Chron. 7:14), was probably his only son and sole founder of his house. See MANASSITES.

2. Given in Judg. 18:30, as the father of Gershom, whose son Jonathan acted as priest to the Danites when they set up a graven image. It is generally thought that the reading is suspicious, and that it should be rendered "Moses," as in the Vulgate and many copies of the Septuagint.

3. The Fourteenth King of Judah. Manasseh was the son of King Hezekiah by his wife Hephzi-bah, and was born B. C. 702, twelve years before his father's death (2 Kings 21:1; 2 Chron. 33:1). Of Manasseh very few facts are given, although his was the longest reign in the annals of Judah. (1) Sin. Ascending the throne at the early age of twelve years, he yielded to the influence of the idolatrous or Abaz party, and became in time a determined and even fanatical idolater; and as he grew up took delight in introducing into his kingdom the superstitions of every heathen country. The high places were restored, the groves replanted, the altars of Baal and Astarte rebuilt, and the sun, moon, and all the host of heaven were worshiped. "The gods of Ammon, of Moab, and of Edom were zealously worshiped everywhere. Babylonian and Egyptian paganism was rife; incense and offerings rose on the roofs of the houses to the fabled deities of the heights; wizards practiced their enchantments, . . . and the valley of Hinnom was once more disgraced by the hideous statue of Moloch, to whom parents offered up their children as burnt sacrifices. In the very temple of the Lord stood an image of Astarte; and in the entrance of the court were placed white horses harnessed to a splendid chariot sacred to the sun" (Rothschild, Hist. and Lit. of the Israelites, p. 615). This apostasy did not go unrebuked by the prophets, whom the king endeavored to silence by the fiercest persecution recorded in the annals of Israel (2 Kings 21:16; 24:3, sq.). Fuller particulars are preserved by Josephus, who says that executions took place every day (Ant., x, 3, § 1). According to rabbinical tradition Isaiah was sawn asunder by order of Manasseh, and after his death the prophetic voice was no more heard till the reign of Josiah. (2) Retribution. The crimes of Manasseh were not long left unavenged. The Philistines, Moabites, and Ammonites, who had been tributary to Hezekiah, seem to have revolted during Manasseh's reign (Zeph. 2:4-9; Jer. chaps. 47-49).

But the great blow was inflicted by Assyria, from whence an army came to Judea, and taking Manasseh prisoner, conveyed him to Babylon (2 Chron. 33:11). (3) Reformation. Manasseh was brought to repentance, and "humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers." God heard his prayer, and restored him to his kingdom at Jerusalem. His captivity is supposed to have lasted about a year, and after his return Manasseh took measures to secure his kingdom, and especially the capital, against hostile attacks. He removed, the idols and the statues from the house of the Lord, and caused the idolatrous altars which he had built upon the temple hill and in Jerusalem to be cast forth from the city. He repaired the altar of Jehovah, and called upon the people to serve the Lord God of Israel. But the people still sacrificed on the high places, "yet unto the Lord their God only." The next Scripture mention of Manasseh is his death and burial in the garden of Uzzah (2 Kings 21:18, 26; 2 Chron. 33:20), B. C. 641.

4. A descendant (or resident) of Pahath-moab, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:30), B. C. 456.

5. An Israelite of the family of Hashum, who did the same (Ezra 10:33), B. C. 456.

MANASSES (Gr. Ἰορὴν, Mavaσσῆς, man-assace', of MANASSEH).

1. The king of Judah (Matt. 1:10).

2. The son of Joseph (Rev. 7:6, in some editions).

MANASSITES (Heb. מְנַשְּׁתִים, men-ash-sheh', in Judg. 12:4; elsewhere מְנַשְּׁתֵי, ham-men-ash-shee'), descendants of Manasseh, the elder son of Joseph. The relation between Manasseh and Ephraim seems to have been a little like that between Jacob and Esau, the younger brother having priority of influence, while the elder retained the birthright of material prosperity. The great national leader, Joshua, was an Ephraimite. The territory of Ephraim was rich and well situated for traffic and communication, and, besides Joshua's inheritance, it contained Ebal, Gerizim, Shiloh, Shechem, and Samaria. "Samuel, though a Levite, was a native of Ramah in Mount Ephraim, and Saul belonged to a tribe closely allied to the family of Joseph" (see MACHIRITES, and if, as some think, Jabesh-gilead belonged to Manasseh, see still more Judg. 21:10-14); "so that during the priesthood of the former and the reign of the latter the supremacy of Ephraim may be said to have been practically maintained" (Smith, "Ephraim"). And after the division of the kingdom Ephraim formed the essential part of the northern kingdom (Id., ib., where see more).

Manasseh's population was also great. In the first census at Sinai Manasseh numbered 32,200 (Num. 1:10, 35; 2:20, 21; 7:54-59) and Ephraim 40,500. But fifty years later (Num. 26:34, 37) Manasseh takes its place in the catalogue as the eldest, and numbers 52,700 to Ephraim's 32,500. When David was crowned at Hebron, while Ephraim sent 20,800 men, western Manasseh alone sent 18,000, and eastern Manasseh with Reuben and Gad sent 120,000, "with all manner of instruments of war for the battle," out of a total muster of 336,000 for the whole country (1 Chron. 12:23-38).

The tribe of Manasseh was divided, probably on account of difference of habit and occupation. One section was devoted to the pursuits of husbandry; they sought a quiet, peaceful region, with rich soil and genial climate, and they found these in the fertile vales and plains of central Palestine. Another, and apparently much larger, section was pastoral in its tendencies. It was also warlike—trained to arms and inured to fatigue. Manasseh east—The descendants of Machir, son of Manasseh, invaded northern Gilead and Bashan, ruled by King Og, drove out the Amorites, and occupied the whole kingdom (Num. 32:39–42; Deut. 3:13–15). Manasseh west—This territory was small and not accurately defined in the Bible. It lay on the north side of Ephraim, and included the northern section of the hills of Samaria, a region of great beauty and fertility.

The children of Manasseh, Machir (Josh. 17:1), Jair (Deut. 3:14), and probably Nobah (Num. 32:42), were mighty men of war, of whom it is nowhere hinted that they were unable to drive out the inhabitants of any land which they chose to attack. "The district which these ancient warriors, east of Jordan, conquered was among the most difficult, if not the most difficult, in the whole country. It embraced the hills of Gilead with their inaccessible heights and impassable ravines, and the almost impregnable tract of Argob, which derives its modern name of Lejeah from the secure 'asylum' it affords to those who have taken 'refuge' within its natural fortifications" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v. "Manasseh").

In general it was Ephraim which mingled in public affairs; yet of fifteen judges Manasseh furnished four, Gideon, Abimelech, Jair, and Jephthah. Gideon has been thought the greatest of the judges; and he might have been a king and the founder of a dynasty if he had been willing (Judg. 8:8). But, being detached from the great body of Israel, they probably spread themselves like desert nomads over the wide regions whence they had expelled the Hagarites (1 Chron. 5:19). Thus they fell into idolatry (v. 25). Whether their fall was more rapid or deeper than that of western Israel does not appear, for perhaps their exposed position might explain the fact that they were carried away in the first captivity (v. 26). The notices of Manasseh in the reforms of Asa (2 Chron. 15:9), Hezekiah (30:1, 10, 11, 18; 31:1), and Josiah (34:6, 9) leave rather a favorable impression, but they seem to refer to west Manasseh only.—W. MANDRAKE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

MANEH, the rendering in Ezek. 45:12 of the Heb. מָנֶה, maw-neh', elsewhere translated "pound." See METROLOGY, IV.

MANGER (Gr. φάτνη, fat'-nay, crib, Luke 2:7, 12; 13:15, "stall"). The Greek word means both stall and manger, from which cattle were fed. Probably it here refers to that portion of the inn which was used as a stable. In the East the cattle were shut up in an open yard inclosed by a rough fence of stones or other material. Poor travelers, or those excluded from the house through want of room, would share with their animals these humble quarters. Several of the Christian fathers assert that the stable itself was a cave. The identical manger in which the infant Jesus is traditionally stated to have lain is still shown; but probably it is only a superstition, resulting on the one hand from the common custom in the East of using caves for stables, and on the other from a mistaken application to the Messiah of Isa. 33:16, "He shall dwell in a lofty cave," quoted by Justin (Godet, Com., on Luke).

MANNA (Heb. מָן, mawn, what? Gr. μάννα, man'-nah), the name given by the Israelites to the miraculous food furnished them during their wanderings in the desert. When they saw it lying on the ground "they said one to another, what is it? for they knew not what it was" (Exod. 16:15). The most important passages in the Old Testament on this topic are the following: Exod. 16:14–36; Num. 11:7–9; Deut. 8:3, 16; Josh. 5:12; Psa. 78:24, 25; Wisd. 16:20, 21. From these passages we learn that the manna came every morning, except the Sabbath, in the form of a small round seed resembling the hoar frost; that it must be gathered early, before the sun became so hot as to melt it; that it must be gathered every day, except the Sabbath; that the attempt to lay aside for a succeeding day, except on the day immediately preceding the Sabbath, failed by the substance becoming wormy and offensive; that it was prepared for food by grinding and baking; that its taste was like fresh oil, and like wafers made with honey, equally agreeable to all palates; that the whole nation subsisted upon it for forty years; that it suddenly ceased when they first got the new corn of the land of Canaan; and that it was always regarded as a miraculous gift directly from God, and not as a product of nature.

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (9:4) includes a "golden pot that had manna" among the contents of the ark of the covenant for a memorial. "It was a constant tradition of the Jews that the ark, the tables of stone, Aaron's rod, the holy anointing oil, and the pot of manna were hidden by Josiah when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans; these would be restored by the Messiah. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM; also SUPPLEMENT.

Figurative. Manna is the emblem or symbol of immortality; "I will give him to eat of the hidden manna" (Rev. 2:17; comp. John 6:8, sq.).

MANO'AH (Heb. מָנוֹחַ, maw-no'-akh, rest), the father of Samson, a Danite of Zorah. When his wife told him of the announcement that a son should be born to them, Manoah prayed to the Lord that he would send the messenger again to teach them how they should treat him. This prayer was granted; but when he knew that it was God's angel, Manoah feared that he and his wife would die, because they had "seen God." But his wife quieted his fears, assuring him of God's pleasure by his acceptance of their sacrifice (Judg. 13:2–23), B. C. before 1060. We hear of Manoah once again in connection with the marriage of Samson, when both parents remonstrated with their son on his choice of a wife, but to no purpose (14:2, 3). They accompanied him to Timnath, both at the betrothal and the wedding (v. 5, 10), but are not named later. The probability is that Manoah did not survive Samson, who was buried "between Zorah and Eshtaol in the burying place of Manoah."

MANSIONS. See GLOSSARY.

MANSLAYER (Heb. מַרְצִיחַ, raw-tsakh', to kill; Gr. ἀνδροφόνος, an-drof-on'-os), one who by accident strikes another so as to kill (Num. 35:6, 12; 1 Tim. 1:9). The cases of manslaughter mentioned appear to be a sufficient sample of the intention of the lawgiver: (1) Death by a blow in a sudden quarrel (Num. 35:22). (2) Death by a stone or missile thrown at random (vers. 22, 23). (3) By the blade of an ax flying from its handle (Deut. 19:5). (4) Whether the case of a person killed by falling from a roof unprovided with a parapet involved the guilt of manslaughter on the owner is not clear, but the law seems intended to prevent the imputation of malice in any such case by preventing as far as possible the occurrence of the fact itself (22:8). In all these and the like cases the manslayer was allowed to retire to a city of refuge (q. v.). Besides these the following may be mentioned as cases of homicide: (1) An animal not known to be vicious causing death to a human being was to be put to death and regarded as unclean. But if it was known to be vicious the owner also was liable to fine, or even death (Exod. 21:28, 31). (2) A thief overtaken at night in the act might lawfully be put to death, but if the sun had risen the act of killing him was to be regarded as murder (22:2, 3). See MURDER.

MA'OCH (Heb. מַאוֹךְ, maw-oke', oppressed), the father of Achish, the king of Gath, to whom David fled from Saul (1 Sam. 27:2). B. C. about 1004.

MA'ON (Heb. מַאוֹן, maw-ohn', dwelling).

1. The son of Shammai, of the family of Caleb and tribe of Judah. He was the "father" (founder) of Beth-zur (1 Chron. 2:45).

2. An elevated town in the tribe of Judah seven miles S. from Hebron, where David hid himself from Saul (1 Sam. 23:24, 25), and near which Nebal's possessions were (25:2); probably now Tell Main, a small heap of ruins.

MA'ONITES (Heb. מַאוֹנִי, maw-ohn', same form as Maon), oppressors of Israel, mentioned only in Judg. 10:12, where they are named in connection with the Egyptians, Amorites, children of Ammon, Philistines, Zidonians, and Amalekites. The name agrees well with the plural, MEHUNIM (q. v.), but no mention is made of any previous invasion of Israel by the Mehunim. And Midian, whose yoke had been so heavy and so lately borne, is not mentioned in the list. These facts have led some to receive the reading "Midian" (Madián), which is given in both the great manuscripts of the LXX. If the reading "Maonites" be retained we may suppose Maon in Judah to have been originally occupied by this people and to have taken its name from them. Maon was mentioned in connection with Ziph and Carmel. The modern Main is seven miles S. of Hebron.—W. H.

MAR'A (Heb. מַרְאָה, maw-raw', bitter), the name chosen for herself by Naomi, as being more appropriate to her by reason of her afflictions than her former name, which signifies "my delight" (Ruth 1:20).

MAR'AH (Heb. מַרְאָה, maw-raw', bitterness), the sixth station of the desert wandering of Israel (Exod. 15:23, 24; Num. 33:8). Here the waters were miraculously sweetened by casting a tree into them, as directed by God. It is identified as Ain Hawarah, forty-seven miles from Ayûn Mousa.

MAR'ALAH (Heb. מַרְאֵלָה, mar-al-aw', trembling, earthquake), a place four miles from Nazareth, on the southern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:11), apparently within the bounds of Issachar, west of Sarid and east of Dabbasheth.

MARAN-ATH'A (Gr. μαρὰν ἀθά, mar'-an ath'-ah; Chald. מַרְאָתָא, our Lord cometh), an expression used by Paul at the conclusion of his First Epistle to the Corinthians: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha" (16:22). It is thought to have been used as a watchword, common to all believers in the first age. Coupled here with an anathema, or curse, it is the Christian's reminder as he waits the advent of the judge to execute the anathema.

MARBLE. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

MAR'CUS (Col. 4:10; Philem., v. 24; 1 Pet. 5:13). See MARK.

MARE'SHAH (Heb. מַרְשָׁה, mar-ay-shaw', summit).

1. A person named as the "father" of Hebron, among the descendants of Judah. From the position his name occupies he is supposed to be the brother of Mesha, Caleb's firstborn (1 Chron. 2:42), B. C. about 1190.

2. A son of, or, more probably, a city founded by, Laadah, of the family of Shelah (1 Chron. 4:21).

3. A town of Judah mentioned with Keilah and Achzib (Josh. 15:44), rebuilt by Laadan (1 Chron. 4:21) and fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:8). It was the native place of the prophet Eliezer (20:37), and near the valley of Zephathah, where the Ethiopians under Zerah were defeated (14:9-13). Here Micah prophesied (1:15). Authorities differ as to its site.

MARINER (Heb. מַרְיָן, mal-lawkh', Ezek. 27:9, 27, 29; to shoot, row, 27:8), a sailor. See SHIP.

MARISHES, an old form of MARSH (q. v.).

MARK (Gr. Μάρκος, mar'-kos, Anglicized Markus in Col. 4:10; Philem., v. 24; 1 Pet. 5:13), the evangelist, and probably the same as "John, whose surname was Mark" (Acts 12:12, 25), was the son of a certain Mary in Jerusalem (12:12), and was, therefore, presumably a native of that city. He was of Jewish parentage, his mother being a relative of Barnabas (Col. 4:10). It was to her house that Peter went when released from prison by the angel (Acts 12:12), A. D. 44. That apostle styles him his son (1 Pet. 5:13), probably because he was converted under his ministry. He accompanied Paul and Barnabas on their first journey (Acts 12:25; 13:5), but left them at Perga and returned to Jerusalem (13:13). Whatever the reason for this act was it seems to have been sufficient in Paul's estimation to justify him in refusing to allow Mark to accompany him on his second journey. Barnabas was determined to take him, and thus Mark was the cause of a "sharp contention" between them and a separation (Acts 15:36-39). This did not completely estrange him from Paul, for we find Mark with the apostle in his first imprisonment at Rome (Col. 4:10; Philem., v. 24). Later he was at Babylon, and unites with Peter in sending salutations (1 Pet. 5:13). He seems to have been with Timothy at Ephesus when Paul wrote to him during his second imprisonment, and urged him to bring Mark to Rome (2 Tim. 4:11), A. D. 66. Tradition states that Mark was sent on a mission to Egypt by Peter, that he founded the Church of Alexandria, of which he became bishop, and suffered as a martyr in the eighth year of Nero. According to the legend, his remains were obtained by the Venetians through a pious fraud, and conveyed to Venice, A. D. 827. "The body was put into a basket and covered with herbs and flesh of swine. The porters, as they carried the basket to the vessel, cried khawzir, pork, which the Mussulman detests, and thus avoided suspicion." In the gospel of Mark "his record is emphatically 'the Gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God' (Mark 1:1), living and working among men, and developing the mission more in acts than by words."

MARK. 1. "The Lord set a mark upon Cain" (Heb. מַרְקָה, dh, Gen. 4:15) that no one might kill him. This was not a visible mark or brand upon his forehead, but some sign or token of assurance that his life should be preserved. What it was is impossible to determine.

2. In the sense of a target (Heb. מַרְקָה, mat-law-rav', watched, 1 Sam. 20:20; Job 16:12; Lam. 3:12).

3. God commands the man with writing materials to "set a mark upon the foreheads" of all persons in Jerusalem, that they might be spared in the time of judgment (Ezek. 9:4, 6). The Hebrew letter מ (aww), the last of the alphabet, was used as a mark (Job 31:35, marg. "my sign"), and in early times was written in the form of a cross. The mark (Gr. χαραγμα, khar'-ag-mah, stamp) was stamped on the right hand or the forehead as the badge of the followers of Antichrist (Rev. 13:16, sq.; 14:9, 11; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4).

4. The goal or end one has in view, from the Greek σκοπός, something watched (Phil. 3:14).

5. In Lev. 19:28 we find two prohibitions of an unnatural disfigurement of the body: "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you." The latter (Heb. מַרְקָה, kah-ak-ah', incision) refers to tattooing, and has no reference to idolatrous usages, but was intended to inculcate upon the Israelites a proper reverence for God's creation (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

6. In Gal. 6:17 Paul writes, "Henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus Christ," i. e., the brand of my master, Jesus Christ. The Greek στιγμα (stif'-mah) is the common word for the brand or mark with which masters marked their slaves. "From the very numerous records (on fragments of marble) of manumissions at Delphi and other shrines in Greece we have learned the legal process by which a slave gained his own liberty. He went to the temple of the god, and there paid his money to the priests; they then with his money bought the slave from his master, on the part of the god. He became for the rest of his life a slave to the god, which meant practically freedom, subject to certain periodical duties. If at any time his master or his master's heirs sought to reclaim him he had the record of the transaction in the temple.

"But on one point these documents are silent: If he traveled, if he were far away from home and were seized as a runaway slave, what security could he have? I believe St. Paul gives us the solution. When liberated at the temple, the priest, if he desired it, branded him with the 'stigmata' of his new master. Now St. Paul's words acquire a new and striking application. He had been the slave of sin; but he had been purchased by Christ, and his new liberty consisted in his being the slave of Christ. Henceforth, he says, let no man attempt to reclaim me; I have been marked on my body with the brand of my new master, Jesus Christ. Probably he referred to the many scars he bore of his persecutions" (Professor Mahaffy, in Christian Work).

MARK, GOSPEL OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF; GOSPELS.

MARKET (Heb. מַרְקָה, mah-ar-awb'), a mercantile term found only in Ezek., ch. 27 (rendered "merchandise," except in vers. 13, 17, 19, 25). It appears to have been used in several senses: (1) Barter (v. 9, 27); (2) place of trade (marg., v. 12, 13, 17, 19); (3) gain acquired by trade (v. 27, 34). In the New Testament the Greek word ἀγορά (ag-or-ah') is rendered market and market place, and denotes generally any place of public resort in towns or cities where trials are held (Acts 16:19), where citizens resort (17:17), and where commodities are exposed for sale (Mark 7:4). From this is derived ἀγοραῖος (ag-or-ah'-yos), "relating to the market place," and rendered "fellows of the baser sort" (literally, "loungers about the market," Acts 17:5). It is improperly rendered "law" in Acts 19:38, where it refers to judicial days or assemblies (A. V., marg., court days). Markets in the East were held at or near the gates of cities, where goods were exposed either in tents or the open air (2 Kings 7:18).

MA'ROTH (Heb. מַרְוֹת, maw-roth', bitterness), a town in the west of Judah, not far from Jerusalem, on the route of the invading Assyrian army from Lachish (Mic. 1:12).

MARRIAGE, the rendering of several words and phrases in the Hebrew and Greek, meaning to be master; to take, i. e., a wife; to magnify, or lift up a woman; to contract; to duell together; to perform the duty of a brother; to become, i. e., the wife of one. In all the Hebrew Scriptures there is no single word for the estate of marriage, or to express the abstract idea of wedlock.

1. Origin, etc. Marriage is a divine institution, designed to form a permanent union between man and woman that they might be helpful to one another (Gen. 2:18). Moses presents it as the deepest corporeal and spiritual unity of man and woman, and monogamy as the form of marriage ordained by God (Gen. 2:24; comp Matt 19:5).

Without the conjugal tie the inhabitants of this world would have been a mixed multitude. The family circle, family instruction, parental love and care would have been altogether unknown.

2. Temporary reactions. At an early period the original law, as made known to Adam, was violated through the degeneracy of his descendants, and concubinage and polygamy became common. The patriarchs themselves took more than one wife. Abraham, at the instigation of Sarah, took her maid as his subordinate wife. Jacob was inveigled, through the duplicity of Laban, into taking Leah first, and then Rachel, to whom he had been betrothed; and afterward, through the rivalry of the sisters, he took both their handmaids. "From these facts it has been inferred that polygamy was not wrong in ancient times, nor at all opposed to the divine law as revealed to the Jews. But this is an unwarrantable conclusion. It is true indeed, respect being had to the state of religious knowledge, the rude condition of society, and the views prevalent in the world, that the practice could not infer, in the case of individuals, the same amount of criminality as would necessarily adhere to it now, amid the clear light of Gospel times. But still all along it was a departure from the divine law."

For the reasons given above it was tolerated, but never with God's approval. Jesus told the Jews that "Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so" (Matt. 19: 3-8). The Mosaic law aimed at mitigating, rather than removing evils which were inseparable from the state of society in that day. Its enactments were directed (1) to the discouragement of polygamy; (2) to obviate the injustice frequently consequent upon the exercise of the rights of a father or a master; (3) to bring divorce under some restriction; and (4) to enforce purity of life during the maintenance of the matrimonial bond.

3. Laws of Intermarriage. An important feature of the law of Moses is the restraint which it imposes upon marriage within certain degrees of relationship and affinity: (1) Between an Israelite and a foreigner. The only distinct prohibition in the Mosaic law refers to the Canaanites, with whom the Israelites were not to marry, on the ground that it would lead them to idolatry (Exod. 34:15; Deut. 7:3, 4). The legal disabilities resting upon the Ammonites and the Moabites (Deut. 23:3) totally forbade marriage between them and Israelite women, but permitted that of Israelites with Moabite women (Ruth 1:4). The prohibition against marriages with the Edomites and Egyptians was less stringent, as a male of those nations received the right of marriage on his admission to full citizenship in the third generation of proselytism (Deut. 23:7, 8). Thus the prohibition was total in regard to Canaanites on either side, total on the side of males in regard to the Ammonites and Moabites, and temporary on the side of males in regard to the Edomites and Egyptians. In the case of wives proselytism was not necessary, but it was so in the case of a husband. (2) Between Israelites and Israelites. The law began (Lev. 18:6-8) with the general prohibition against marriage between a man and the "flesh of his flesh."

This was followed by special prohibitions against marriage with (1) a mother; (2) stepmother; (3) sister or half-sister; (4) granddaughter; (5) daughter of a stepmother; (6) aunt; (7) wife of uncle on the father's side; (8) daughter-in-law; (9) brother's wife, unless he died childless (see MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE); (10) a woman and her daughter, whether both together or in succession, or a woman and her granddaughter; (11) two sisters at the same time; (12) mother-in-law. The case of a daughter being taken in marriage is not mentioned, simply because it was regarded as very unlikely to occur; that of a full sister is included in No. 3, and of a mother-in-law in No. 10. Breaches of Nos. 1, 2, 3, 8, and 12 were to be followed by the death or extermination of the offender (Deut. 27:20, 22, 23), while the threat held out against 6, 7, and 9 was that the guilty parties should "bear their iniquity" and "die childless" (Lev. 12:12-18; 20:19-21). These prohibitions were based upon (1) moral propriety, (2) heathen practices, (3) social convenience.

In addition to the above, there were special prohibitions: (1) The high priest was forbidden to marry any one except a virgin selected from among his own people (Lev. 21:13, 14). (2) The priests were forbidden to marry prostitutes and divorced women (21:7). (3) Heiresses were prohibited from marrying outside of their own tribe (Num. 36:5-9; comp. Tob. vii, 10). (4) Persons defective in physical powers were not to intermarry with Israelites (Deut. 23:1). In the Christian Church we find the following prohibitions: (1) Bishops and deacons from having more than one wife, probably referring to second marriage of any kind. A similar prohibition applied to those entered upon the church records as widows (q. v.). They must have been the wife of one man, i. e., probably, not remarried. (2) A wife divorced by her husband and married to another man, if her second husband died or divorced her, could not revert to her first husband (Deut. 24:2-4). Such a marriage would lower the dignity of the woman, and make her appear too much like property. Such prohibition was also intended to prevent a frivolous severance of the marriage tie, and fortify the marital bond.

4. Marriage Customs. (1) Age of marriage. With regard to age, no restriction is pronounced in the Bible. Early marriage is spoken of with approval in several passages (Prov. 2:17; 5:18; Isa. 62:5), and in reducing this general statement to the more definite one of years, we must take into account the very early age at which persons arrive at puberty in oriental countries. In modern Egypt marriage takes place in general before the bride has attained the age of sixteen, frequently when she is twelve or thirteen, and occasionally when she is only ten. The Talmudists forbade marriage in the case of a man under thirteen years and a day, and in the case of a woman under twelve years and a day. The usual age appears to have been higher, about eighteen years. (2) Selection of bride. Perhaps in imitation of the Father of the universe, who provided Adam with a wife, fathers from the beginning considered it their duty and prerogative to secure wives for their sons (Gen. 24:3; 38:6). In the absence of the father the selection devolved upon the mother (Gen. 21:21). In some cases the proposal was made by the father of the maid (Exod. 2:21). Occasionally the whole business of selecting the wife was committed to a friend. (3) The betrothal. The selection of the bride was followed by the espousal, which was not altogether like our "engagement," but was a formal proceeding, undertaken by a friend or legal representative on the part of the bridegroom, and by the parents on the part of the bride; it was confirmed by oaths, and accompanied with presents to the bride. These presents were described by different terms, that to the bride by mo'-har (Heb. מוהר, A. V. "dowry"), and that to the relations by mat-tawn' (Heb. מתנות, present). Thus Shechem offers "never so much dowry and gift" (Gen. 34:12), the former for the bride, the latter for the relations. It has been supposed, indeed, that the mohar was a price paid down to the father for the sale of his daughter. Such a custom undoubtedly prevails in certain parts of the East at the present day, but it does not appear to have been the case with free women in patriarchal times. It would undoubtedly be expected that the mohar should be proportioned to the position of the bride, and that a poor man could not on that account afford to marry a rich wife (1 Sam. 18:23). A "settlement," in the modern sense of the term, i. e., a written document securing property to the wife, did not come into use until the post-Babylonian period: the only instance we have of one is in Tob. vii, 14, where it is described as an "instrument." The Talmudists styled it a ketubah, and have laid down minute directions as to the disposal of the sum secured, in a treatise of the Mishna expressly on that subject. The act of betrothal was celebrated by a feast, and among the more modern Jews it is the custom in some parts for the bridegroom to place a ring on the bride's finger. Some writers have endeavored to prove that the rings noticed in the Old Testament (Exod. 35:22; Isa. 3:21) were nuptial rings, but there is not the slightest evidence of this. The ring was nevertheless regarded among the Hebrews as a token of fidelity (Gen. 41:42), and of adoption into a family (Luke 15:22). (4) Marriage ceremonies. Before the time of Moses, when the proposal was accepted, the marriage price paid, and the gifts distributed, the bridegroom was at liberty to remove at once the bride to his own home (Gen. 24:63-67). This was an unusual case, because of the bride being secured at a distance, while the bridegroom remained at home. Usually the marriage took place at the home of the bride's parents, and was celebrated by a feast, to which friends and neighbors were invited and which lasted seven days (Gen. 29:22, 27). The word "wedding" does not occur in the A. V. of the Old Testament; but it is probable that some ratification of the espousal with an oath took place (see Prov. 2:17; Ezek. 16:8; Mal. 2:14), and that a blessing was pronounced (Gen. 24:60; Ruth 4:11, 12). But the essence of the ceremony consisted in the removal of the bride from her father's house to that of the bridegroom or his father. There seems, indeed, to be a literal truth in the Hebrew expression "to take" a wife (Num. 12:1; 1 Chron. 2:21, marg.), for the ceremony appears to have mainly consisted in the taking. After putting on a festive dress, placing a handsome turban on his head (Isa. 61:10, A. V. "ornaments") and a nuptial crown (Cant. 3:11), the bridegroom set forth from his house, attended by his groomsmen (A. V. "companions," Judg. 14:11; "children of the bride-chamber," Matt. 9:15), preceded by a band of musicians or singers (Gen. 31:27; Jer. 7:34; 16:9; 1 Macc. 9:39), and accompanied by persons bearing flambeaus (2 Esdr. 10:2; Matt. 25:7; comp. Jer. 25:10; Rev. 18:23, "the light of a candle"). Having reached the house of the bride, who with her maidens anxiously expected his arrival (Matt. 25:6), he conducted the whole party back to his own or his father's house, with every demonstration of gladness (Psa. 45:15). On their way back they were joined by a party of maidens, friends of the bride and bridegroom, who were in waiting to catch the procession as it passed (Matt. 25:6). The inhabitants of the place pressed out into the streets to watch the procession (Cant. 3:11). At the house a feast was prepared, to which all the friends and neighbors were invited (Gen. 29:22; Matt. 22:1-10; Luke 14:8; John 2:2), and the festivities were protracted for seven, or even fourteen, days (Judg. 14:12; Tob. 8:19). The guests were provided by the host with fitting robes (Matt. 22:11), and the feast was enlivened with riddles (Judg. 14:12) and other amusements. The bridegroom now entered into direct communication with the bride, and the joy of the friend was "fulfilled" at hearing the voice of the bridegroom (John 3:29) conversing with her, which he regarded as a satisfactory testimony of the success of his share in the work. The last act in the ceremonial was the conducting of the bride to the bridal chamber, khel'-der (Heb. חדר, Judg. 15:1; Joel 2:16), where a canopy, named khoo'-paw', was prepared (Heb. חופה, Psa. 19:5; Joel 2:16). The bride was still completely veiled, so that the deception practiced on Jacob (Gen. 29:23) was very possible. A newly married man was exempt from military service, or from any public business which might draw him away from his home, for the space of a year (Deut. 24:5). A similar privilege was granted to him who was betrothed (Deut. 20:7).

5. Marriage Relation. In considering the social and domestic conditions of married life among the Hebrews, we must, in the first place, take into account the position assigned to women generally in their social scale. There is abundant evidence that women, whether married or unmarried, went about with their faces unveiled (Gen. 12:14; 24:16, 65; 29:11; 1 Sam. 1:13). Women not unfrequently held important offices. They took their part in matters of public interest (Exod. 15:20; 1 Sam. 18:6, 7); in short, they enjoyed as much freedom in ordinary life as the women of our own country. If such was her general position, it is certain that the wife must have exercised an important influence in her own home. She appears to have taken her part in family affairs, and even to have enjoyed a considerable amount of independence (2 Kings 4:8; Judg. 4:18; 1 Sam. 25:14, etc.). (1) Dependence of the wife. And yet the dependence of the wife on her husband is shown by the Hebrew appellation for husband (bah'-al, Exod. 21:3, 22), literally lord, master; and is seen in the conduct of Sarah, who speaks of her husband Abraham as my lord (Gen. 18:12). From this mastery of the husband over the wife arose the different standard of virtue which obtained in married life. The wife, subject to her husband as master, was obliged to regard the sanctity of the marriage relation, and any unchastity on her part was visited with death. The husband could take any unmarried woman he chose, and violate the laws of chastity, as we understand them, with impunity (Gen. 38:24). This absolute sanctity of marriage on the part of the wife was acknowledged by other nations of antiquity, as Egypt (Gen. 12:15-19) and Philistia (20:1-18; 26:9-11). Arising from the previously existing inequality of husband and wife, and the prevailing notion that the husband was lord over his wife, Moses could neither impose the same obligation of fidelity nor confer the same right on both. This is evident from the following facts: (1) The husband in the case of the wife's infidelity could command her death as well as that of her paramour (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22; Ezek. 16:38-40; John 8:3-5). (2) If he became suspicious of his wife he could bring her to the priest and have administered to her the water of jealousy (Num. 5:12-31). But if the husband was guilty of criminal intercourse with an unmarried woman, no statute enabled the wife to arraign him for a breach of marriage or infringement of her or their rights. Should he sin with a married woman, it was the injured husband that could demand the death of the seducer, not the wife of the criminal. (3) If the wife vowed anything to the Lord, or imposed upon herself voluntary obligations to Jehovah, her husband could nullify them (Num. 30:6-8). (4) The husband could divorce his wife if it so pleased him (Deut. 24:1-4). (2) Protection of the wife. The woman was protected by the following laws: (a) The daughter of an Israelite sold by her father as a maidservant (i. e., housekeeper and concubine), who did not please her master, was not to be treated as menservants, viz., be sent away free at the end of six years; but she was provided for as follows: She could be redeemed, i. e., another Israelite could buy her for a concubine, but she could not be sold to an alien (Exod. 21:7, 8). She might be given to her purchaser's son, in which case she was to be treated as a daughter. If he gives the son an additional wife, "her food, her raiment, and her duty of marriage, shall he not diminish" (vers. 9, 10). If these three things were not provided, then she was to "go out free, without money" (v. 11). (b) If her husband maliciously charges a newly married woman with lack of chastity, he is to be scourged, and loses his right of divorce (Deut. 22:13-19). (c) If she has children they must render equal obedience to her as to the father (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 27:16). (d) As has already been stated, the husband must not vex his wife by marrying her sister (Lev. 18:18). (e) The husband was forbidden to transfer the primogeniture from the son of a less beloved wife to the child of his favorite wife. (f) If her husband dislikes her, he is not arbitrarily to dismiss her, but to give her a "bill of divorcement" (Deut. 24:1). (g) If divorced, or her husband dies, the woman is free and at liberty to marry another (Deut. 24:2).

6. Social and Domestic Conditions. In early times the oriental woman appears to have enjoyed much freedom. She, whether married or single, went about with her face unveiled (Gen. 12:14; 24:16, 65; 29:11; 1 Sam. 1:13); she might meet and converse with men, even strangers, in a public place (Gen. 24:25, 45-47; 29:9-12; 1 Sam. 9:11); she might be found alone in the country without any reflection on her character (Deut. 22:25-27); or she might appear in a court of justice (Num. 27:1, sq.). If such was her general position, we can readily accord her a considerable amount of independence and influence at home. Thus we find her entertaining guests (2 Kings 4:8) in the absence of her husband (Judg. 4:18), and even against his wishes (1 Sam. 25:14, sq.); she conferred with her husband respecting the marriage of her children (Gen. 27:46), and even sharply criticised the conduct of her husband (1 Sam. 25:25; 2 Sam. 6:20). The ideal relations between husband and wife appear to have been those of tenderness and affection. Thus the husband is called the "friend" of his wife (Jer. 3:20, marg.; Hos. 3:1); while frequent notice is made of his love for her (Gen. 24:67; 29:18). The wife was the husband's consolation in bereavement (Gen. 24:67), and her grief at his loss presented a picture of the most abject woe (Joel 1:8). Polygamy, of course, produced jealousies and quarrels (Gen. 21:11; 1 Sam. 1:6), while purchase of wives and the small liberties allowed daughters in the choice of husbands must have resulted in many unhappy unions. In the New Testament the mutual relations of husband and wife are a subject of frequent exhortation (Eph. 5:22-33; Col. 3:18, 19; Tit. 2:4, 5; 1 Pet. 3:1-7).

7. Duties. In a Hebrew household the wife had general superintendence of the domestic arrangements, such as cooking (Gen. 18:6; 2 Sam. 13:8, 9), the distribution of food at the meals (Prov. 31:15), the manufacture of cloth and clothing (Prov. 31:13, 21, 22).

8. Figurative. Marriage is illustrative of God's union with Israel (Isa. 54:5; 62:4; Jer. 3:14; Hos. 2:19-20). In the New Testament the image of the bridegroom is transferred from Jehovah to Christ (Matt. 9:15; John 3:29), and that of the bride to the Church (2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:23, 24, 32; Rev. 19:7; 21:2, 9; 22:17).

MARRIAGE, CHRISTIAN. Christianity confirms, simplifies, and vindicates from abuse the original and sacred ordinance of marriage. The stability and purity of the Church and State have been proportionate to the popular and legal stability of the marriage relationship. The original appointment of monogamy is confirmed (Matt. 19:6; Mark 10:6-8). The presence of Jesus at the wedding in Cana happily illustrates the feeling and teaching of Christianity respecting marriage. Christ taught the divine origin and sacredness of this institution. It is more than filial duty; it is unifying; the husband and wife become one through the purity and intensity of mutual love; common interests are necessitated by common affection (Matt. 19:5, 6; Eph. 5:31); only one single ground for divorce is lawful (Matt. 19:9). The utmost that may be inferred from the expression "which made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake" (Matt. 19:12) is that marriage is not binding upon every member of the race; and that devotion or discretion may make it expedient to renounce or defer it. The example of Peter (Matt. 8:14; Mark 1:30; Luke 4:38), and the express teaching of New Testament writers (1 Tim. 4:3; 5:14; Heb. 13:4), are in harmony with the conduct of Christ respecting the sanctity of the marriage relation. The counsel of St. Paul to the Corinthian Church (1 Cor., ch. 7), evidently in reply to their request, is entirely consistent with the general doctrine of the New Testament. He guards marriage so carefully that even to those who are joined to unbelievers the advice is given not to disturb their relationship except by mutual consent and for mutual good. "According to the principles thus laid down, marriage is not merely a civil contract: the Scriptures make it the most sacred relation of life; and nothing can be imagined more contrary to their spirit than the notion that a personal agreement, ratified in a human court, satisfies the obligation of this ordinance."

The Roman Catholic Church teaches that "marriage is a sacrament of the new law, and as such confers grace. Christians who are in mortal sin may contract a valid marriage, but they receive no grace, though they do receive the sacrament; and, therefore, have a claim and title to the sacramental grace when they have amended their lives by sincere repentance. Christians, on the other hand, who contract marriage with due dispositions, receive an increase of sanctifying grace, and, besides, special grace to live in mutual and enduring affection. . . and to bring up children, whom God may give them, in his fear and love" (Cath. Dict., s. v.).

Matrimony was elevated to the dignity of the sacrament mainly on the ground of the apostle's words, "This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the Church" (Eph. 5:32); in the Vulgate the Greek being rendered sacramentum. "It is not this that is conveyed by the passage, as indeed, in general, marriage 'has from Christ neither a sacramental institution, nor form, nor substance, nor end,' but it is rather the sacredly ideal and deeply moral character, which is forever assured to marriage by this typical significance in the Christian view" (Meyer, Com., in loc.; Pope, Christ. Theol., iii, pp. 237-243, 308; Bennett, Christ. Arch., p. 462, sq.).

MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE (from Lat. levir, a brother-in-law), the marriage of a man with his deceased brother's widow, in the event of his dying childless. The first instance of this custom occurs in the patriarchal period, where Onan is called upon to marry his brother Er's widow (Gen. 38:8). The Levirate marriage was not peculiar to the Jews; it has been found to exist in many Eastern countries, particularly in Arabia and among the tribes of the Caucasus. The Mosaic provision was as follows: If brothers (on the father's side) lived together, i. e., in the same place, and one of them died childless, the wife was not to go outside and marry a stranger; but the surviving brother was to take her to wife. The firstborn son by her took the name of the deceased, i. e., continued his name in the family register, that his name perished not out of Israel. In case the brother-in-law did not wish to marry the widow, she might cite him legally before the elders of the place. If, after conference with them, he still persisted in declaring his unwillingness, he was not compelled to do the duty of a brother-in-law. But he was obliged to submit to the humiliation of having his shoe plucked off by his sister-in-law in the presence of the elders, and of having his face spit upon; the one act denoting that he thus gave up all claim to his deceased brother's estate, the other an act expressive of contempt (Deut. 25:5-10). From Ruth 4:1-10, it would appear that in case of the refusal of the brother-in-law to take the widow, then the next male relative had the right to do so. The divine sanction which the Mosaic law gave to levirate marriage is not to be regarded as merely an accommodation to a popular prejudice. Such marriage was not strictly commanded, but it was considered a duty of love, the non-fulfillment of which brought reproach and ridicule on the man and his house. It did not abolish the general prohibition of marriage with a brother's wife, but proceeded from one and the same principle with it. By the prohibition the brother's house is preserved in its integrity; by this command it is raised to a permanent condition. In both cases the dead brother is honored, and fraternal love preserved as the moral foundation of his house. Based upon such a marriage as this was the ground for the question asked of our Lord by the Sadducees (Matt. 22:23, sq.). The rabbins taught that in the next world a widow who had been taken by her brother-in-law reverted to her first husband at the resurrection. Christ answered both parties by the declaration that "in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage."

MARROW (Heb. מֶרֶךְ, mo'-akh, Job 21:24; מֶרֶךְ, maw-khaw', to mix with marrow, Isa. 25:6; Gr. μωρός, moo-el-os', Heb. 4:12), the soft oleaginous substance contained in the hollow bones of animals. The other terms so rendered are kheh'leb (Heb. כֶּהֶלֶב, Ps. 63:5, the richest or choice part, and shik-koo'-ee (Heb. שִׁיקִי, Prov. 3:8, moisture).

Figurative. "Fat things full of marrow" (Isa. 25:6) is an expression symbolizing the full enjoyment of blessedness in the perfected kingdom of God. "Marrow" in Heb. 4:12 is used figuratively for the most secret thoughts of a person.

MAR'SENSA (Heb. מַרְסֵנָא, mar-sen-aw', perhaps nobleman), one of the "seven princes (satraps or viziers) of Persia and Media" in the time of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:14), B. C. about 519.

MARS' HILL (Gr. Ἄρειος Πάγος, ar'-ios pag'os, Acts 17:22), another name for the AREOPAGUS (q. v.).

MARSH (Heb. מַרְשָׁה, geh'-beh, a reservoir, Ezek. 47:11), a swamp or wet piece of land. The place referred to by Ezekiel is the "Valley of Salt," near the Dead Sea; for there the Kidron, the course of which the prophet describes the holy waters as following, empties.

MART (Heb. מַרְתָּ, saw-khar', to go about as a merchant, Isa. 23:3). "The means of gain, the source of profit or provision to whole nations." Others render the word "emporium, but saw-khar' cannot have this meaning" (Delitzsch, Com., in loc.).

MARTHA (Gr. Μάρθα, mar'-thah, mistress), the sister of Lazarus and Mary, who all resided in the same house at Bethany (Luke 10:38, 40, 41; John 11:1-39; 12:2). Martha appears to have been at the head of the household (Luke 10:38) and from that circumstance has been thought to have been a widow. This is, however, uncertain, and it is generally supposed that the two sisters (unmarried) managed the household for their brother. The incident narrated by Luke (10:38-42) shows that Jesus was intimate with the family and was at home in their house; and also brings out the contrary dispositions of the two sisters. Martha hastens to provide suitable entertainment for their friend and his followers, while Mary sits at his feet listening to his gracious discourse. The busy, anxious Martha, annoyed at the inactivity of Mary, complains impatiently to Jesus, "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me." This brought from the master the oft-quoted reply, "But one thing is needful; Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her." At the death of Lazarus their respective characters are portrayed: Martha active, Mary meditative; Martha reproachful and objecting, Mary silent but immediately obedient to the summons of Jesus; Martha accepting Jesus as the Christ, and sharing in the belief of a resurrection, but not believing, as Mary did, in Jesus as "the Life." All that is recorded of Martha in addition is that at a supper given to Jesus and his disciples at Bethany, at which Lazarus was present, she, as usual, busied herself with serving. "According to tradition, she went with her brother and other disciples to Marseilles, gathered round her a society of devout women, and, true to her former character, led them a life of active ministrations."

MARTYR (Gr. μάρτυς, mar'-toos, so rendered only in Acts 22:20; Rev. 2:13 and 17:6), a witness (q. v.), and generally so given. The meaning of the word martyr, which has now become the most usual, is one who has proved the strength and genuineness of his faith in Christ by undergoing a violent death. ΣΤΕΦΑΝΟΣ (q. v.) in this sense was the first martyr, and the spiritual honors of his death tended in no small degree to raise to the most extravagant estimation, in the early Church, the value of the testimony of blood. Eventually a martyr's death was supposed, on the alleged authority of the following texts, to cancel the sins of the past life (Mark 10:39; Luke 12:50), to answer for baptism, and at once to secure admission into paradise (Matt. 5:10-12).

MARVEL (Heb. מַרְבֵּל, paw-law', to separate, to distinguish), something great, unaccountable, a miracle; and so that which excites wonder (Exod. 34:10); "marvelous works" (1 Chron. 16:12, 24; Job 5:9; 10:16; Ps. 9:1, 17:7, etc.). See MIRACLE.

MARY (Gr. Μαρία, mar-ee'-ah, or Μαριάμ, mar-ee-am'; from Heb. מַרְיָם, meer-yawm', rebellion).

1. The Mother of Jesus. Mary was the daughter of Heli, of the tribe of Judah and of the lineage of David, hence in the royal line. (1) The annunciation. In the summer of the year known as B. C. 5 Mary was living at Nazareth, a maiden, but betrothed to Joseph. At this time the angel Gabriel came to her with a message from God, and announced to her that she was to be the mother of the long-expected Messiah—that by the power of the Holy Ghost the everlasting Son of the Father should be born of her (Luke 1:26-35; comp. Rom. 1:3). (2) Visit to Elizabeth. Informed by the angel that her cousin Elizabeth was within three months of being delivered of a child, Mary set off to visit her, either at Hebron or Juttah. Immediately upon her entrance into the house she was saluted by Elizabeth as the mother of her Lord, and had evidence of the truth of the angel's saying with regard to her cousin. Mary abode with her cousin about three months, and returned to her own house (1:36-56). (3) Married to Joseph. In a few months Joseph found that Mary was with child, and determined to give her a bill of divorce (see Deut. 24:1), instead of yielding her up to the law to suffer the penalty he supposed she had incurred (Deut. 22:23, 24); but being assured of the truth by an angel he took her to wife (Matt. 1:18-25). (4) Mother of Jesus. Soon after Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem to be enrolled for the taxing, and while there Christ was born and laid in a manger (Luke 2:1, 7). On the eighth day Jesus was circumcised, and on the fortieth day after the nativity—until which time she could not leave the house (Lev. 12:2-4)—the Virgin presented herself with her babe for their purification in the temple. The poverty of Joseph and Mary is alluded to in the mention of their offering, "a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons." There she met Simeon and the prophetess Anna, heard their thanksgiving and prophecy. Returning to Bethlehem, Mary and Joseph were warned of the purpose of Herod, and fled to Egypt. Returning the next year, they went to Nazareth (Matt. 2:11-23). At the age of twelve years Jesus accompanied his family to Jerusalem, and Mary was temporarily separated from him (Luke 2:42, sq.), A. D. 8. (5) Subsequent mention of Mary. "Four times only," after our Lord's ministry commenced, "is the veil removed, which, not surely without a reason, is thrown over her." These four occasions are: the marriage at Cana, where Jesus solemnly withdraws himself from the authority of his earthly mother (John 2:1-4); at Capernaum, where at a public gathering Mary desired to speak to Jesus, and he seems to refuse to admit any authority on the part of his relatives, or any privilege on account of their relationship (John 2:12; Matt. 12:46-50); at the crucifixion, where Christ with almost his last words commended his mother to the care of the disciple whom he loved, and from that hour St. John assures us that he took her to his abode (John 19:25-27); after the ascension, engaged in prayer in the upper room in Jerusalem, with other faithful followers of the Lord. The Scriptures leave Mary engaged in prayer (Acts 1:14). Tradition and speculation have conceived her as kept from actual sin by the grace of God, the prevailing opinion of the twelfth century. In the thirteenth century it was maintained that, though conceived in sin, she was cleansed from it before her birth. Early in the fourteenth century Scotus threw out as a possibility the idea of an immaculate conception, which developed into the decree of December 8, 1854 (Smith). (8) Character. "Her faith and humility exhibit themselves in her immediate surrender of herself to the divine will, though ignorant how that was to be accomplished (Luke 1:38); her energy and earnestness in her journey from Nazareth to Hebron (v. 39); her happy thankfulness in her song of joy (v. 48); her silent, musing thoughtfulness in her pondering over the shepherds' visit (2:19), and in her keeping her Son's words in her heart (v. 51), though she could not fully understand their import. In a word, so far as Mary is portrayed to us in Scripture, she is, as we should have expected, the most tender, the most faithful, humble, patient, and loving of women, but a woman still" (Smith, Dict.).

NOTE.—Was Mary the mother of any other children than Jesus? is a question that has caused almost endless controversy. Of course, the advocates of her perpetual virginity assert that she was not. From the accounts in Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3, it would seem more than likely that she had a number of children. This presumption is increased by the fact that the persons named as the "brethren" of Jesus are mentioned in connection and in company with his sisters and mother. Indeed, the denial of the natural interpretation of these passages owes its origin, in all probability, to the tradition of perpetual virginity, the offspring of the false notion of the superior sanctity of celibacy.

2. Mary Magdalene (Gr. Μαγδαληνή, magdal-ay-nay, a woman of Magdala). (1) Name. Of this there are four explanations: 1. The most natural is that she came from the town of Magdala (a tower or fortress), probably situated on the western shore of Lake Tiberias, and the same with that of the modern village of El-Mejdel (Stanley). 2. The Talmudists make mention of a Miriam Megaddela (מגדל), "Miriam with the braided locks," which Lightfoot considers as identical with "the woman that was a sinner" (Luke 7:37). 3. Jerome sees in her name and that of her town the old Migdol (watch-tower), and says that the name denotes the steadfastness of her faith. 4. "Origen, looking to the more common meaning of מגדל (gaw-dal', to be great), sees in her name a prophecy of her spiritual greatness as having ministered to her Lord and been the first witness of the resurrection." (2) Personal history. Mary Magdalene enters the Gospel narrative, with certain other women, as "ministering to Jesus of their substance" (Luke 8:2); all of them being moved by gratitude for their deliverance from "evil spirits and infirmities." Of Mary it is said that "seven demons (δαίμονια) went out of her" (v. 2; Mark 16:9). This life of ministration brought Mary Magdalene into companionship of the closest nature with Salome, the mother of James and John (Mark 15:40), and also with Mary, the mother of the Lord (John 19:25). They "stood afar off, beholding these things" (Luke 23:49), during the closing hours of the agony on the cross. The same close association which drew them together there is seen afterward. She remained by the cross till all was over, and waited till the body was taken down and wrapped in the linen cloth and placed in the garden sepulcher of Joseph of Arimathea (Matt. 27:61; Mark 15:47; Luke 23:55). She, with Salome and Mary, the mother of James, "brought sweet spices that they might anoint" the body (Mark 16:1). The next morning, accordingly, in the earliest dawn (Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2), they came to the sepulcher. Mary Magdalene had been to the tomb, had found it empty, and had seen the "vision of angels" (Matt. 28:5; Mark 16:5). She went with her cry of sorrow to Peter and John (Luke 24:10; John 20:1, 2), and, returning with them, tarried after they went back. Looking into the sepulcher, she saw the angels, and replied to their question as to her reason for weeping, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." Turning back, she saw Jesus, but did not at first recognize him. Recalled to consciousness by his utterance of her name, she exclaimed "Rabboni," and rushed forward to embrace his feet. But she must now learn that spiritual dependence upon Christ which can live without his visible presence. And that lesson is taught in the words, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my father." Mary then went to the disciples, and told them what she had seen and heard (John 20:11-18), and passes out of history.

NOTE.—Mary Magdalene has long been in popular tradition equivalent to "Mary the sinner," and been identified with the penitent who anointed Jesus. There were probably two anointings recorded in the gospels, the acts of two different women: one in some city unnamed, during our Lord's Galilean ministry (Luke 7); the other at Bethany, before the last entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 26, Mark 14, John 12), by the sister of Lazarus. There is no reliable evidence to connect Mary Magdalene with either anointing. (1) When her name appears in Luke 8:2 there is not one word to connect it with the history that immediately precedes. (2) The belief that Mary of Bethany and Mary Magdalene are identical is yet more startling. The epithet Magdalene, whatever may be its meaning, seems chosen for the express purpose of distinguishing her from all other Marys. No one evangelist gives the slightest hint of identity. Nor is this lack of evidence in the New Testament itself compensated by any such weight of authority as would indicate a really trustworthy tradition (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

3. Mary, Sister of Lazarus. The facts strictly personal to her are but few. She and her sister Martha appear in Luke 10:38, sq., as receiving Christ in their house. Mary sat listening eagerly for every word that fell from the Divine Teacher, and was commended by Jesus as having "chosen that good part," the "one thing needful," while "Martha was cumbered about much serving." The next mention of Mary is in connection with the raising of Lazarus. She sat still in the house until Martha came to her secretly and said, "The master is come, and calleth for thee," when she arose hastily to go and meet him. At first she gives way to complaint, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died;" but the great joy and love revived upon her brother's return to life, and found expression in the anointing at the last feast of Bethany (Matt. 26:6, sq.; Mark 14:3, sq.; John 11; 12:1-9). Matthew and Mark do not mention her by name. Of her subsequent history we know nothing, the ecclesiastical traditions about her being based on the unfounded hypothesis of her identity with Mary Magdalene.

4. Mary, the Wife of Clopas (Gr. Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ, A. V. "of Cleophas"). In St. John's gospel we read that "there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene" (John 19:25). The same group of women is described by St. Matthew as consisting of "Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Josès, and the mother of Zebedee's children" (Matt. 27:56); and by St. Mark as "Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the Little and of Josès, and Salome" (Mark 16:40). From a comparison of these passages it appears that Mary of Clopas and Mary the mother of James the Little and of Josès are the same person, and that she was the sister of Mary the Virgin. In answer to the alleged improbability of two sisters having the same name, it may be said that Miriam, the sister of Moses, may have been the holy woman after whom Jewish mothers called their daughters. This is on the hypothesis that the two names are identical, but on a close examination of the Greek text we find that it is possible that this was not the case. Mary the Virgin is Μαριάμ; her sister is Μαρία. Mary of Clopas was probably the elder sister of the Lord's mother. Mary is brought before us for the first time on the day of the crucifixion—in the parallel passages already quoted from St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. John. In the evening of the same day we find her sitting desolately at the tomb with Mary Magdalene (Matt. 27:61; Mark 15:47), and at the dawn of Easter morning she was again there with sweet spices, which she had prepared on the Friday night (Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:1; Luke 23:56), and was one of those who had "a vision of angels, which said that He was alive" (Luke 24:23). It is probable that Clopas was dead, and that the two widowed sisters lived together in one house.

5. Mary, Mother of Mark, also sister to Barnabas (Col. 4:10). It would appear from Acts 4:37, 12:12, that while the brother disposed of his property for the benefit of the Church, the sister gave up her house as one of the places of meeting. The fact that Peter goes to that house on his release from prison indicates that there was some special intimacy (Acts 12:12) between them, and this is confirmed by the language which he uses toward Mark as being his "son" (1 Pet. 5:13). "It has been surmised that filial anxiety about her welfare during the persecutions and the famine which harassed the Church at Jerusalem was the chief cause of Mark's withdrawal from the missionary labors of Paul and Barnabas."

6. A Christian woman at Rome to whom Paul sent greetings, as to one "who bestowed much labor on us" (Rom. 16:6).

MASCHIL. See MUSICAL TERMS.

MASH (Heb. מַשַׁח, mesh, meaning unknown), one of the sons of Aram, the son of Shem (Gen. 10:23). In 1 Chron. 1:17 the name appears as Meshech.

MA'SHAL (Heb. מַשָּׁל, mas-shaw', entreaty), a Levitical town in Asher (1 Chron. 6:74). It was assigned to the Gershonite Levites. Called Mishal in Josh. 21:30.

MASON. See HANDICRAFTS.

MAS'REKAH (Heb. מַסְרֵקָה, mas-ray-kaw', vineyard), a city in Idumæa, and the native place of Samlah, an Edomitish king (Gen. 36:36; 1 Chron. 1:47).

MAS'SA (Heb. מַסָּא, mas-saw', burden), a son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30). His descendants were not improbably the Masaui, who are placed by Ptolemy in the east of Arabia, near the borders of Babylonia.

MAS'SAH (Heb. מַסָּה, mas-saw', trial, temptation), a name given to the place where the Israelites murmured for want of water (Exod. 17:7; Deut. 6:16; 9:22; 33:8); called also MERIBAH (q. v.).

MAST. See SHIP.

MASTER, the rendering in the A. V. of the following Hebrew and Greek words. See GLOSSARY.

1. Aw-done' (Heb. אֲדוֹנָי, Gr. κύριος, koo'-ree-os), properly lord, and usually so rendered; of frequent occurrence.

2. Bah'-al (Heb. בַּעַל, owner), master in the prevalent sense, e. g., "the master of the house" (Exod. 22:8; Judg. 19:22).

3. Rab (Heb. רַב, abundant, and so great), great or chief, usually in combination, "the master of the eunuchs" (Dan. 1:3).

4. Sar (Heb. שָׂר, a head person), used only in speaking of CHENANIAH (q. v.), "the master of the song" (1 Chron. 15:27); in the Greek (ἐπιστάτης, epi-sta'-tal'-ace, Luke 5:5; 8:24, 45; 17:13).

5. Oor (Heb. עֹר, to wake), only so rendered in Mal. 2:12, "the master and the scholar;" marg. "him that waketh and him that answereth." The thought then would be, the master as stimulating by questioning and admonishing his scholars. K. and D. (Com., in loc.) think the phrase to be taken from the night watchman.

6. Oy-kod-es-pol'-ace (Gr. οἰκοδεσπότης, "master of the house"), the head of the family (Matt. 10:25; Luke 13:25; 14:21).

7. Did-as'-kal-os (Gr. διδάσκαλος, "master"), in the sense of instructor, was often applied to our Lord, both by his disciples and others.

8. Kath-ay-ay-tace' (Gr. καθηγητής, "one is your master," Matt. 23:8, 10). Here "master" is used of a leader in the scholastic sense, i. e., a teacher.

9. Ep-is-tal'-ace (Gr. ἐπιστάτης, appointed over) is used of any sort of superintendent or overseer. It is used for RABBI (q. v.) by the disciples when addressing Jesus (Luke 5:5; 8:24, 25; 9:33, 49; 17:13).

10. "Master" is the rendering of the Gr. κυβερνήτης, koo-ber-nay'-tace (Acts 27:11), a sailing master; rendered "shipmaster" in Rev. 18:17.

MATHU'SALA (Luke 3:37). See METHUSELAH.

MA'TRED (Heb. מַתְרֵד, mat-rade', propelling), a daughter of Mezahab and mother of Mehetabel, who was wife of Hadar (or Hadad) of Pau, king of Edom (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50).

MA'TRI (Heb. מַתְרֵי, mat-ree', rain of Jehovah), a Benjamite, and head of the family to which Saul, the king of Israel, belonged (1 Sam. 10:21), B. C. considerably before 1030.

MATRIMONY. See MARRIAGE.

MATTAN (Heb. מַטָּן, mat-taw'n, a gift).

1. The priest of Baal slain before his altars in the idol temple at Jerusalem (2 Kings 11:18; 2 Chron. 23:17), B. C. 836. He probably accompanied Athaliah, the queen mother, from Samaria.

2. The father of Shephatiah, one of the princes who charged Jeremiah with treason and afterward cast him into prison (Jer. 38:1-6), B. C. before 588.

MATTANAH (Heb. מַטָּנָה, mat-taw-naw', a gift), the fifty-third station of Israel, on the north side of Arnon (Num. 21:18, 19), "twelve miles S. E. of Medabah, and probably to be seen in Tedón, a place now lying in ruins, near the source of the Lejum."

MATTANIAH (Heb. מַטָּנְיָהוּ, mat-tan-yaw', gift of Jah; מַטָּנְיָהוּ, mat-tan-yaw'-hoo, in 1 Chron. 25:4, 16; 2 Chron. 29:13).

1. The original name of ZEDEKIAH (q. v.), king of Judah, which was changed when Nebuchadnezzar placed him on the throne instead of his nephew Jehoiachin (2 Kings 24:17).

2. A Levite singer of the family of Asaph, resident at Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:15), B. C. about 440. He is described as the son of Micah (Micha, Neh. 11:17; Michaiah, 12:35), and after the return from Babylon lived in the villages of the Netophathlites (1 Chron. 9:16), or Netophathi (Neh. 12:28), which the singers had built in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (12:29). As leader of the temple choir after its restoration (11:17; 12:8) in the time of Nehemiah, he took part in the musical service which accompanied the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12:35). We find him among the Levites of the second rank, "keepers of the thresholds" (Neh. 12:25).

3. One of the fourteen sons of Heman, whose office it was to blow the horns in the temple service as appointed by David. He had charge of the ninth division of musicians (1 Chron. 25:4, 16), B. C. about 960. He is possibly the same with the father of Jeiel, and descendant of Asaph, and ancestor of Jahaziel the Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 20:14).

4. A descendant of Asaph, the Levite minstrel, who assisted in the purification of the temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13), B. C. 719.

5. An Israelite "of the sons of Elam" who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:26), B. C. 456.

6-8. Three Israelites—one a descendant (or resident) of Zattu (Ezra 10:27); another, "of the sons" (i. e., inhabitants) of Pahath-moab (10:30); and still another, a descendant (or resident) of Bani (10:37)—who put away their Gentile wives after the captivity, B. C. 456.

9. A Levite, father of Zaccur and grandfather of Hanan, the under treasurer who had charge of the offerings for the Levites in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 13:13), B. C. considerably before 444.

MATTATHA (Luke 3:31). See MATTATHAH, 1.

MATTATHAH (Heb. מַטָּתָה, mat-tat-taw', gift of Jah).

1. (A. V. "Mattatha.") The son of Nathan and grandson of David, among the ancestry of our Lord (Luke 3:31).

2. An Israelite of the "sons" (inhabitants) of Hashum who put away his foreign wife in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:33), B. C. 456.

MATTATHI'AS (Gr. Marrathias, mat-tath-ee'-as).

1. The son of Amos and father of Joseph, in the genealogy of our Lord (Luke 3:25).

2. The son of Semei in the same catalogue (Luke 3:26). "As no such name appears in the parallel passages of the Old Testament, and would here unduly protract the interval limited by other intimations of the generations, it is probably interpolated from No. 1" (Strong, Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, p. 16).

MATTENAI (Heb. מַטְנֵי, mat-ten-ah'ee, lib. eral; probably a contraction of Mattaniah).

1, 2. Israelites, one a son (or citizen) of Hashum (Ezra 10:33), and the other of Bani (10:37), who put away their heathen wives after the captivity, B. C. 456.

3. A priest of the family of Joiarib, who lived in the time of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua (Neh. 12:19), B. C. after 536.

MATTER. See GLOSSARY.

MATTAN (Gr. Marbán, mat-than'), the son of Eleazar and father of Jacob, which last was father of Joseph, "the husband of Mary" (Matt. 1:15), B. C. considerably before 40.

MATTATH (Gr. Marthár, mat-that').

1. The son of Levi, and father of Heli, who was the father of the Virgin Mary (Luke 3:24), B. C. before 22.

2. The son of another Levi, and father of Jorim (Luke 3:29).

MATTHEW.—1. Name and Family. (Gr. Ματθαῖος, mat-thah'-yos, contraction of Mattathias, a gift of Jehovah.) The son of a certain Alpheus, and surnamed Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). It is not known whether his father was the same with the Alpheus named as the father of James the Less, but he was probably another.

2. Personal History. (1) Residence and profession. Matthew's residence was at Capernaum, and he was a publican. There was at that time a large population surrounding the Lake of Gennesaret; its fisheries supplied a source of livelihood, and its surface was alive with a busy navigation and traffic. A customhouse was established at Capernaum by the Romans, and Matthew was tax collector. The publicans proper were usually Romans of rank and wealth, who farmed or let out the business of collecting to resident deputies, who were called portitors. It was to this class that Matthew belonged. (2) His call. While Matthew was thus occupied, "sitting at the receipt of custom," Jesus said to him, "Follow me." He probably already knew Jesus, for he immediately "arose and followed him" (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27, 28). Shortly after Matthew made "a great feast in his own house" in honor of Jesus (Luke 5:29; Matt. 9:10; Mark 2:15), and perhaps as a farewell to his old associates, for "many publicans and sinners came and sat down" (Matt. 9:10). After this we find no mention of him save in the catalogues of the apostles (Luke 6:15), and his presence in the "upper room" in Jerusalem after our Lord's ascension (Acts 1:13). The gospel which bears his name was written by the apostle, according to the testimony of all antiquity. Tradition relates that Matthew preached in Judea after the ascension for a number of years (twelve or fifteen), and then went to foreign nations.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

MATTHIAS (Gr. Μαθθίας, mat-thee'-as, gift of Jehovah). Of the family of Matthias no account is given, and of his life we have no account, excepting the incident narrated in Acts 1:15-26, viz., his being chosen an apostle. The one hundred and twenty were assembled at Jerusalem, waiting for the baptism of the Holy Ghost; and, at the suggestion and under the supervision of Peter, proceeded to fill the place among the twelve left vacant by the defection and death of Judas Iscariot. Peter "laid down" the essential qualifications for the apostolic office—the having been one of the companions of Christ from his baptism by John till his ascension—and declared the object of the election "to be a witness with us of his resurrection" (5:21, 22). Two such men were chosen, but the ultimate decision was referred to God himself by the sacred trial of the lot, accompanied by prayer. The two were Joseph, called Barsabas, and surnamed the Just; and Matthias, upon the latter of whom the lot fell. He was straightway numbered among the apostles. Nothing reliable is recorded of his after life. He is not mentioned again in the New Testament. Eusebius and Epiphanius believed him to be one of the seventy disciples. One tradition says that he preached the Gospel in Judea, and was then stoned to death by the Jews. Others make him a martyr—by crucifixion—in Ethiopia or Colchis. An apocryphal gospel was published under his name, and Clement of Alexandria quotes from the Traditions of Matthias (Kitto, Smith).

The Lot. According to Grotius, this was taken by means of two urns. In one they placed two rolls of paper, with the names of Joseph and Matthias written within them, and in the other two rolls, one with the word "apostle" and the other blank; and one roll was drawn from each urn simultaneously. Clarke (Com.) thinks that the selection was by ballot, the Lord directing the mind of the majority to vote for Matthias. In the case of selection by lot there was no chance, for "the lot is cast into the lap (properly urn); but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord" (Prov. 16:33).

MATTITHIAH (Heb. מתיחיה, mat-tith-yaw', gift of Jehovah; prolonged from מתיחיהו, mat-tith-yaw'-hoo, in 1 Chron. 15:18, 21; 25:3, 21).

1. A Levite, the eldest son of Shallum the Korahite, who had charge of the baked offerings, "things that were made in the pans" (1 Chron. 9:31), probably after the exile, B. C. about 445.

2. One of the sons of Jeduthun, a Levite appointed by David chief of the fourteenth division of the temple musicians (1 Chron. 25:3, 21). He is probably the same as the one appointed to assist in the musical service at the removal of the ark to Jerusalem, and to act as doorkeeper (15:18, 21; 16:5), B. C. about 988.

3. An Israelite, one of the "sons" (residents) of Nebo, who put away his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:43), B. C. 456.

4. One of those who stood at the right hand of Ezra when he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), B. C. about 445.

MATTOCK, an agricultural implement like a pickax, with a wide point for grubbing up and digging out roots and stones. It is the rendering of three Hebrew words:

1. Makh-ar-ay-shaw' (Heb. מַחֲרֵשׁוֹ, 1 Sam. 13:20, 21), the meaning of which is quite obscure, as the word might denote any kind of edged tool, even a plowshare; but the fact that it is coupled with the ax favors its being a hoe.

2. Khel'-reb (Heb. חֶלֶבֶב). The expression "with their mattocks round about" (2 Chron. 34:6, marg. "maul") is thought by some to mean "in their ruins," etc. Others understand a hoe or spade.

3. Mah-dare' (Heb. מַחֲדָרֵה, Isa. 7:25), a weeding hook or hoe.

MAUL, or MALL (Heb. מַלְיָעַץ, may-feet's, a breaker), only in Prov. 25:18, "A man that beareth false witness against his neighbor is a maul." The language of Solomon suggests that he probably meant some weapon of war, in which case it might represent a mace or battleax. See ARMOR.

MAW (Heb. מַעֲוֵה, kay-baw', hollow), the rought, i. e., the fourth stomach of ruminating animals, in which the digestion of the food is completed. It was esteemed (like tripe) a great delicacy among the ancients. This, with the shoulder and the cheeks of a sacrificial animal, was given to the priest (Deut. 18:3).

MAZ'ZAROTH (Heb. מַזְזָרוֹת, maz-zaw-roth', only in Job 38:32), the twelve signs of the zodiac, which were imagined as menazil, i. e., lodging houses; or burug, strongholds, in which one after another the sun lodges as it describes the circle of the year. The question, "Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season?" means, Canst thou bring forth the zodiacal sign for each month, so that it becomes visible after sunset and is visible before sunset? To these priests offered incense; were abolished by Josiah (2 Kings 23:5).

MEADOW, the rendering of two Hebrew words, neither of which appears to have this meaning:

1. Aw'-khood (Heb. מַדְבָּר, Gen. 41:2, 18), probably an Egyptian term. The same form is retained by the Coptic version. Its use in Job 8:11 (A. V. "flag") seems to show that it is not a "meadow," but some kind of reed or water plant. But as during high inundations of the Nile—such inundations as are the cause of fruitful years—the whole of the land on either side is a marsh, and as the cultivation extends up to the very lip of the river, is it not possible that it may denote the herbage of the growing crops?

2. Mah-ar-eh' (Heb. מַדְבָּר, stripped, Judg. 20:3, "the meadows of Gibeah"). This term is uncertain in its meaning, but probably stands for a region stripped of wood, a treeless district.

ME'AH (Heb. מאה, may-aw', a hundred), one of the towers on the wall of Jerusalem, rebuilt by Nehemiah (3:1; 12:39), near to the sheep gate, which Porter thinks adjoined the temple on the north. The Castle Antonia afterward occupied the same position (see HANANEEL).

MEAL. 1. Kel'-makh (Heb. מַלְא, marrow), the fatness of wheat or barley, i. e., its ground substance (Num. 5:15; 1 Kings 4:22, etc.).

2. Kel'-makh so'-leth (Heb. מַלְא, Gen. 18:6, "fine meal"; Gr. ἀλευρον, al'-yoo-ron, Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:21), the finest portion of flour (q. v.).

MEALS, MEAL TIME. See FOOD, 5 (4).

MEAN. See GLOSSARY.

MEARAH (Heb. מְעָרָה, meh-aw-raw', a cave), a place between Tyre and Sidon (Josh. 13:4). Possibly only a cave, although extensive ruins are thought by Robinson possibly to be those of "Mearah of the Sidonians."

MEASURE. See METROLOGY.

MEASURING LINE. See METROLOGY, 1.

MEAT. This word does not appear to be used in the Bible in the sense of animal food, which is denoted uniformly by "flesh." Perhaps the following may be exceptions: "Savory meat" (Gen. 27:4); "corn and bread and meat" (45:23). The only real and inconvenient ambiguity caused by the change which has taken place in the meaning of the word is in the case of the "meat offering," which consisted solely of flour and oil, sacrifices of flesh being confined to the other offerings. Several other words, distinct in the original, are rendered "meat;" but none of them presents any special interest except teh'-ref (Heb. תֵּהֲרֵף, something trorn). This word would be perhaps more accurately rendered "prey," or "booty." Its use in Psa. 111:5, especially when taken in connection with the word rendered "good understanding" in v. 10, which would rather be, as in the margin, "good success," throws a new and unexpected light over the familiar phrases of that beautiful psalm. In the New Testament the variety of the Greek words thus rendered is equally great. See FOOD; GLOSSARY.

MEAT OFFERING. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERINGS.

MEBUN'NAI (Heb. מְבֻנָּי, meh-oon-nah'ee, construction). In this form appears, in one passage only (2 Sam. 23:27), the name of one of David's guard, who is elsewhere called Sibbechai (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chron. 20:4), or Sibbecai (1 Chron. 11:29; 27:11), in the A. V. The reading "Sibbechai" is evidently the true one.

MECHE'RATHITE (Heb. מְכֵרָתִי, mek-ay-raw-thee', from the word meaning a sword), a native or inhabitant of Mecherah (1 Chron. 11:36); from 2 Sam. 23:34 it would appear to be a corruption for Maachathite.

MEDAD (Heb. מֵדָד, may-dawd', loving), one of the seventy elders chosen to assist Moses in the government of the people. He and Eldad remained behind in the camp, and were not among the rest of the seventy at the tabernacle. When the Spirit came upon these it descended also upon Medad and Eldad, so that they prophesied. A lad reported the matter to Moses, who did not forbid them, as requested by Joshua, but replied, "Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets," etc. (Num. 11:26, sq.), B. C. 1209.

MEDAN (Heb. מֵדָן, med-awn', contention), the third son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32), B. C. after 2250.

MEDE (Heb. מֵדָה, maw-dah'ee), an inhabitant of MEDIA (q. v.).

MED'EBÁ (Heb. מְדֵבָה, may-deb-aw', water of quiet), a city of great antiquity in Moab (Num. 21:30), belonging to Reuben (Josh. 13:16). It was a sanctuary of the Moabites in the days of Ahaz, and is named as one of the cities of Moab in the prophetic curse recorded in Isa. 15:2. When the Ammonites were defeated by Joab they found refuge in Medeba (1 Chron. 19:1-15). The ruins, about eighteen miles E. of the Dead Sea, still remain, those of a large temple and extensive cisterns being important. Possibly the name is derived from these cisterns. Roads and streets can still be traced. See SUPPLEMENT.

MEDIA (Heb. מְדָי, rendered "Madai," Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5; "Media," Esth. 1:3, 14, 18; 10:2; Isa. 21:2; Dan. 8:20; "Median," Dan. 5:31; מְדָי, "Media," R. V. Ezra 6:2; elsewhere Mede(s)), a country southwest of the Caspian Sea. (The abbreviations in parenthesis are of authorities quoted at close of article.)

1. Physical Features. (1) Boundaries. The Median empire in its palmy days, just before the Persian uprising in 559 B. C., extended from the Halys to the borders of Afghanistan, and from the Caspian Sea to the Persian Gulf (Spr., pl. ii). Media proper was bounded north by Armenia, northeast by the mountains along the Caspian, east and southeast by Hyrcania and Parthia, south by Elam (Susiana), and west by Assyria.

(2) Extent. Its length from northeast to southwest was about 600 miles, its breadth 250; its area, about 150,000 square miles (R., 255; S. B. D., "Media"), was almost exactly that of our united Virginia and Carolinas (150,200; R. and M., 15).

Media may be likened to our California, with its 158,360 square miles, its parallel mountain ranges, its oblong form and curved coast (though convex instead of concave), its relative proportion of land and water (155,980 to 2,380; R. and M., 160), its latitude, and its range of temperature, the figures being for Red Bluff in northern California 18° to 112° (R. and M., l. c.), and for Azerbaijan in Media zero to 100° (R., 285).

(3) Divisions. The usual division was into Atropatene (Azerbaijan), in the northwest, and in the southeast Media Magna, corresponding to Irak-Ajemi and Ardelan, though some would extend it south to include Luristan. Atropatene may have been the original home of the Medes. Perhaps it was the Varena of the Vendidad, its capital often being called Vara or Vera. The district may be the Assyrian Bikan (R., 262), which name may represent the "bijan" of Azerbaijan (id. 192, note 5). Athrapaiti means "lord of fire;" Athrapata, "one protected by fire" (D., 74). In middle Persian the name is Aturpatkan; modern Persian, Aderbeijan, which means "protected by fire." "The naphtha springs must have caused this region to appear as one highly favored by the gods in the eyes of such zealous worshippers of fire as the Arians of Iran" (D., 271).

(4) Climate. Media Atropatene (Azerbaijan) is an Alpine region in the latitude of San Francisco, with a climate resembling that of northern New England (R., 284-5). The plateau has a snowy winter from early December to March. In range of temperature it is comparable to Sacramento (19° to 108°; R. and M., 160). It has little rain or dew, and is subject to hot and cold gusts, and to various wonderful optical illusions (R., 287, 288). The Zagros region has a great variety of climate, from the seven months' winter and cool summer of the mountains to the sultry, unhealthy climate of the river valleys.

(5) Character of the country. As a whole it is comparatively sterile, being watered by scanty streams, mostly running in valleys too deep for irrigating purposes, and sometimes salt. It is a land of ranges of bare rock with flat arid plains of gravel and clay. But in April and May, after the spring rains, the land clothes itself with verdure; and in some places, as in the river valleys and about Lake Urumiyeh, it is green the year round.

(a) Mountains. Atropatene, whose valleys are from 4,000 to 5,000 feet above the sea (R., 284), is "shut in by mighty summits, which reach a height of more than 12,000 feet" (D., 270-1). Along the Caspian Sea lay the Caspian (Elburz) range, with Mount Coronus (Demavend) near the north-eastern frontier, towering to a height of over 20,000 feet, probably "the highest summit in Asia west of the Himalayas" (R., 252, and note 1, and 253). On the southwest lay the six or seven ridges of the Zagros, with an elevation of 18,000 feet. Thus was Media walled in by mountains on three sides. (b) Rivers. The Kizil Uzen (Amardus) after meandering 490 miles in a direct distance of 220, and draining a tract 180 miles long and 150 broad, flows through the Elburz range into the Caspian (R., 258). The parallel Jaghetu and Tatan, from Mount Zagros, water the rich plain of Miyandab south east of Lake Urumiyeh. The Aji-Su, farther north, is salt.

One of the most valuable of all the Median rivers is the Zenderud. From the eastern flank of the Kuhizedr (Yellow Mountain) it flows easterly "past the great city of Ispahan—so long the capital of Persia—into the desert country beyond, where it is absorbed in irrigation." Though but 120 or 130 miles in length, it is a large river, and gives "to this part of Iran a sylvan character scarcely found elsewhere on the plateau." Lake Urumiyeh (ancient Spanta, Arn. Kapotan Zow, from its blue color), 4,200 feet above the sea, is about eighty miles long (N. N. E. to S. S. W.) by twenty-five wide. It is never over four fathoms deep, and its average of two fathoms is rarely attained within two miles of the shore. It is salt, heavy, and destitute of fish, like the Dead Sea.

(6) Productions. The mineral productions of Media were various, especially the celebrated Tabriz marble, which is sometimes cut so thin as to be used for window glass; salt in abundance from saline springs and streams, and also in the form of rock salt, saltpeter, sulphur, alum, naphtha, gypsum, and talc (R., 293, 294); metals, iron, copper, and native steel, with indications of lead and arsenic, and with traditions of gold and silver near Takht-i-Sulciman (id., ib.).

Vegetation is abundant where there is water. The valleys and hillsides yield the ordinary kinds of grain and vegetables, with rice and cotton. "The usual timber trees of the country" are the poplar, which is most in demand for building; the oriental plane, which "is preferred for furniture;" the willow, and the walnut. In addition, the ash and the terebinth, or turpentine tree, are common in Zagros, and in the watered parts of the plateau the cypress, elm, and cedar are found. Orchards thrive where there is water, but the unwatered parts of the plateau yield only "the tamarisk and a few other sapless shrubs," such as the soapwort (R., 289, sq.).

Fish are not abundant, the waters mostly being oversalt or else failing in summer. Reptiles, as lizards, snakes, and scorpions, are common enough, and so are insects, especially the mosquito and the destructive locust. Birds are well represented by the eagle, bustard, pelican, stork, pheasant, quail, several kinds of partridges, and many smaller birds, like swallows and sparrows (R., 296-300).

The most common wild animals are of course the jackal, then the stag, wild goat (ibex), and wild boar, then the bear, antelope, and many others.

The principal domestic animals are the camel, of three varieties, the low, two-humped Bactrian, the taller, lighter Arabian, and a highly valued cross between the two; the horse, also of three varieties, the large, powerful, enduring, long-legged, light-bodied, big-headed Turkoman, the lighter, but perfectly formed Arabian, and a cross between the two which is called "wind-footed," and is most prized of all; the dog, especially a large greyhound, perhaps of Macedonian origin, which is used in conjunction with the falcon in hunting the antelope; the useful mule, and an inferior variety of ass; the cat, and the buffalo (R., 300-302). Media was famous in the olden time as a nursery of valiant men and excellent horses (D., 268, quoting Polybius), the latter apparently the Turkoman breed mentioned above.

(7) Cities. (a) Ecbatana, the Achmetha (Heb. עֲבָתָנָא) of Ezra 6:2, the Ecbatana (Gr. Ἐκβάρανα) and perhaps the Agbatana (Ἀγβάρανα) of the Greeks, the Hangmatána (T., 408; 12 G., 851; comp. D., 307) or Hagmatan (R., 262) of the Medes and Persians, the modern Hamadan, was built on a plain at the foot of Mount Orontes (Elwend). It was probably unwalled, like most Median and Persian cities. The description in Judith 1:2-4 may refer to the northern Ecbatana (Gaza). The Ecbatana of 2 Macc. 9:3 is Hamadan. The distinguishing feature of this Ecbatana was the royal palace, one thousand four hundred and twenty yards in circuit (Polyb., x, 27, §9), and not far off was the strong citadel. (b) Gaza, called also Gazaca, Cauzaca (Takht-i-Suleiman), the chief city of northern Media, is thought by some to have been called Ecbatana, and to have been the Agbatana of Hd., i, 98, 99. This city was built on and about a conical hill. At the top were the royal palace and the treasuries. The slopes were occupied by seven walls with battlements of different colors. Outside were the other buildings of the town. This remained an important city down to the thirteenth century of our era. (c) Raga, or Rlhages, in the extreme east of Media, near the Caspian Gates. In the first Fargard of the Vendidad Raghā is the twelfth of the primitive Aryan settlements, "and one in which the faithful were mingled with unbelievers" (R., 272, note 1). Its celebrity appears from Tobit 1:14; 4:1; 9:1, etc.; Judith 1:5, 15 (id., notes 2 and 3). It gave name to a province (Rlhagiana), and is mentioned as late as the time of Alexander the Great. (d) Aspadana was the modern Ispahan. (e) Bagistan (Behistun) derives its renown from its rock on which were inscribed the brave deeds of monarchs, from Semiramis (traditionally) down to the Parthians in the reign of Claudius, especially by Darius in his famous Behistun inscription. The name Bagistan, "place of God," reminds us of the Hebrew Beth-el, "house of God."

Other towns were Adrapan (Arteman), "on the southern face of Elwend near its base," and Concohar (the modern Kungawaz), not far off, on the road to Bagistan (R., 278). But, as a whole, "the towns of Media were few and of no great account. The Medes did not love to congregate in large cities, but preferred to scatter themselves in villages over their broad and varied territory." Indeed, the only towns of importance were the capital, Gazaca, and Rhages. Walls were "not required by a people whose country was full of natural fastnesses." Their largest cities were of moderate size, with little "architectural splendor;" their buildings were of "perishable material;" "and in the whole of Media modern researches have failed to bring to light a single edifice which can be assigned with any show of probability to the period of the empire" (R., 277); much less to the ruder times preceding.

2. Tribes. According to Herodotus, there were six Median tribes, the Arizanti, Busæ, Struchates, Budii, Parætaceni, and Magi. Ragozin (Story of Media, 267, 268) translates the first "Aryan people" (Pers. Ariazantu), and the others, except Magi, "natives," "nomads," "dwellers in tents," and "owners of the soil," and holds that only the first were Aryans, the others being subject races, mostly Turanian.

3. History. The extreme antiquity of the Medians is attested by the appearance of Madai (Heb. מַדַּי), which everywhere else means Mede(s), Media(n) among the sons of Japheth, in Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5. Berosus, also, a priest of Belus at Babylon, born during the reign of Alexander the Great, and an excellent authority on Babylonian history, records a dynasty of eight Median kings who reigned at Babylon for two hundred and twenty-four years, B. C. 2458-2234 (Tiele, 93; though Rawlinson, 376, gives 2286-2052). Our knowledge of this early Median expansion is mostly confined to the following fragment of Berosus: "After these, who held the kingdom in unbroken succession, he says that suddenly the Medes, having collected their forces, took Babylon, and there set up kings (tyrannos) of their own people. Hence he gives also the names of eight Median kings (tyrannorum), and their years twenty-four over two hundred."

There are Aryan traces in the reading of some early Chaldean ideographs, and possibly in the name Ari-och in Gen. 14:1. According to Strabo, the Medes took their name from Medus, son of the famous Medea and Ægeus. This tends to confirm their great antiquity.

Traces are found of a western expansion of the Medes "in the Mat-ieni of Zagrus and Cappadocia, in the Sauro-matæ (or northern Medes) of the country between the Palus Mæotis and the Caspian, in the Metæ or Mæotæ of the tract about the mouth of the Don, and in the Mædi of Thrace" (R., 374, 375). Of course, conclusions founded on the agreement of a single syllable must be received with caution. But it is interesting to find that the Sigynnæ, still farther west, between the Danube and the Adriatic, wore Median dress, and declared that they were colonists of the Medes (Μήδων ἀποικοί, Hd., 5, 9). That a race of mountaineers should have spread themselves toward the west at that early period without founding any very long-enduring dominion accords quite well with the history of the powerful but short-lived Median empire of Cyaxares and Astyages.

Shalmaneser II in his twenty-fourth year (836 B. C.; T., 203) made an expedition into Media. This was repeated by his son, Shamschirammân, in his third year (about 821 B. C.). The conquest of Media was a leading object with his son Rammânirâri III (811-783). Tiglath-pileser II received tribute from Median princes in 744, and in Media he carried on war between 739 and 735. Sargon II reckoned Media the most eastern part of his dominions. Thither he carried some of his Samaritan captives (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11), perhaps deporting Medes to make room for them. About 710 he reduced twenty-eight Median governors of cities (Stadtvrögten; T., 263). Operations in Media were continued by Sennacherib, perhaps about 702 B. C. Esar-haddon, about 671, pentrated farther into Media than any of his predecessors, and received presents from princes still more remote.

But the power of Media was rapidly crystallizing. Ashurbanipal (B. C. 668—about 626) tells of no Median expeditions. According to Herodotus (i, 96—100), the first king, Deioeces, was chosen about 710 B. C., on account of the fame which he had acquired for justice and wisdom. The chronology of Herodotus is as follows (S. B. M., "Deioeces"):

Deioeces from 710-709 to 657-656 = 53 years.
Phraortes from 657-656 to 635-634 = 22 "
Cyaxares from 635-634 to 595-594 = 40 "
Astyages from 595-594 to 560-559 = 35 "

But Tiele (407, 408) makes Herodotus place the accession of Deioeces (perhaps Dayaukku, which name, however, he regards as a title, like Pharaoh, rather than a proper name) about 700 B. C., in the reign of Sennacherib; and some, building partly on Josephus (Ant., x, 2, §2), connect the uprising of Media with the destruction of Sennacherib's army (2 Kings 19:35; 2 Chron. 32:21; Isa. 37:36).

The discrepancy between Herodotus and the Assyrian accounts of conquests in Media may not be as great as it looks. As has been said, the Medes were scattered over their extensive territory in small independent villages. On the side toward Assyria these must have been for the most part mountain fastnesses, with land for pasture and tillage. The princes were commanders or head men of these strongholds, to whom Tiele (263, 334, etc.) gives the title Stadtvoigt (bailiff or provost). The Assyrian conquests would be the capture of these villages, either singly or in local confederacies. As a result more distant towns would send presents to buy off the invader or to gain his support as an ally. These operations seemed large to the Assyrian kings, because they were accomplished by hard marching and fighting, because they were valuable as a means of training the Assyrian armies, and because they augmented the extent and the fame of the empire. But they had little influence on the development of the Median nation.

On the other hand, the account in Herodotus points to a gradual growth, beginning on a small scale with such towns as could be reached by the personal influence or the reputation of Deioeces. This fact, together with the fact that the Medes were Aryans like the Greeks, and lived on the Greek plan of town autonomy, and that the story was told by a Greek, may explain the Greek flavor noticed in it by Grote, iii, 228. The setting up of Deioeces may remind us a little of the anointing of David at Hebron in 2 Sam. 2:4. And the time from 710 or 700 B. C. is quite short enough, even with the aid of a supposed fresh Aryan migration, to account for so mighty a growth of the Median power; for about 634 the Median army, Minervallike, sprung without warning from the passes of Zagrus to the rich Assyrian lands below. This first army was totally defeated by Ashurbanipal, and the king, Phraortes (Fravartis), slain (Hd., i, 102). His son and successor, Cyaxares (Uvakshatra), united and improved the army, which had before consisted of separate tribal contingents under the command of their chiefs. Then he returned to the attack, defeated the Assyrians in the field, and was advancing to the siege of Nineveh, when he was suddenly recalled to defend his home from the Scythians. He was defeated, and Media became tributary to the Scythians. But the rugged country had little to detain hungry invaders, and they pressed on to fairer regions. Their sway had been irritating rather than injurious. In time the Medes took courage, slew many of the Scythians at a feast, and after a while expelled the rest (R., 388-391).

Cyaxares now allied himself with Elam and Chaldea. The Assyrian general, Nabopolassar, went over to the Medes, receiving the daughter of Cyaxares as a wife for his son Nebuchadnezzar. The story of the last struggle of Assyria is told by Ctesias (Diod. Sic., ii, 25-28). According to this account, the allied army of four hundred thousand Medes, Babylonians, Persians (who had been reduced to subjection by Phraortes, Grote, iii, 230), and Arabs was thrice defeated. Then, being reinforced from Bactria, it surprised the Assyrians by night, and drove them in confusion to Nineveh, to which, after two more victories, it laid regular siege. After two full years an unusual overflow of the Tigris swept away so much of the wall that it could not be repaired. Then the Assyrian king, despairing of further resistance, burned himself and his household, with his chief treasures, in his palace (R., 394, 395). This "is a narrative that hangs well together, and that suits both the relations of the parties and the localities. Moreover, it is confirmed in one or two points by authorities of the highest order."

The fall of Nineveh must have occurred between 608 and 605, thus about 607-6. This is the usual date (606 according to Clinton, Grote, iii, note on p. 226; Grote himself says "about 600"), though Rawlinson, 391, inclines to 625 or 624.

In the division of the Assyrian empire Nabopolassar took Babylonia, Chaldea, and Susiana (Dan. 8:2, 27), the Euphrates valley and the lands toward the south and west, to the frontier of Egypt. Cyaxares and the Medes took Assyria and its northern and eastern dependencies. But Cyaxares did not rest on his laurels. He extended his dominions to the river Halys on the west, to the Black and Caspian Seas and perhaps to the Caucasus on the north, to the Tigris and the Persian Gulf on the south, and to the desert and the border of Afghanistan on the east. This extension may have been in part voluntary submission made to escape the inroads of the Scythians and general anarchy.

The rise of Media was also accompanied by an influx of Aryans, who overpowered the old Turanian masters of Armenia and Cappadocia. This, too, might have paved the way for Median supremacy.

The next object of attack was Lydia, which had grown strong and united by the patriotic war of Alyattes for the expulsion of the Cimmerians from Asia Minor. This war was waged with great numbers and great zeal for six years. The two kingdoms were left as they were when the war broke out; but Cyaxares gained a friend and an ally where he had previously had a jealous enemy. For it was agreed that the two kings should swear friendship, and that to cement the alliance Alyattes should give his daughter Aryënis in marriage to Astyages, the son of Cyaxares. Thus the territory from the Ægean Sea to the Persian Gulf was ruled by three related and harmonious kings, thus :

Under this triple crown these lands were at rest from the date of the peace between Alyattes and Cyaxares (probably 610 B. C.) for "nearly half a century," except as disturbed by Nec(h)o's three years' possession of Idumæa, Palestine, Phœnicia, and Syria, in the days of Josiah, B. C. about 608-606 (2 Kings 23:29; 24:7; 2 Chron. 35:23). Seven or eight years later the Median king sent a contingent with Nebuchadnezzar when he marched to quell disturbances in the same quarter (Jer. 46).

Cyaxares died, according to Herodotus, in 593, after a reign of forty years, and was succeeded by his son, Astyages (Ishtuvëg; T., 621). Cyaxaer was a bold, ambitious warrior rather than a statesman. Astyages was said to be remarkably handsome, cautious, and of an easy and generous temper. He kept a brilliant court, and was content with the empire transmitted to him, except that he is said to have reached the Caspian by taking in the Cadusians. According to Herodotus, i, 107, and Xenophon, Cyr., i, 2, §1, his daughter Mandane was married to Cambyses, a Persian, and became the mother of CYRUS THE GREAT (q. v.).

The greatest extent of the Median empire may have been five hundred thousand square miles, "as large as Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal put together" (R., 428). The weakness of Media, aside from the effects of luxury, is attributed to its lack of organization. The Median empire was a "congeries of kingdoms" never fused into a single nation. "The Medes, we are told, only claimed direct suzerainty over the nations immediately upon their borders; remote tribes they placed under these, and looked to them to collect and remit the tribute of the outlying country" (R., 429, where the truth of the statement is not guaranteed). "It is doubtful if they called on the subject nations for any contingents of troops. We never hear of their doing so. Probably, like the Assyrians, they made their conquests with armies composed entirely of native soldiers, or of these combined with such forces as were sent to their aid by princes in alliance with them" (id., ib.).

"Of all the ancient oriental monarchies the Median was the shortest in duration." But this is, perhaps, not so much due to any exceeding weakness of that empire itself as to its fortune in coming into contact so soon with so masterful an antagonist as Cyrus, and to the fact that the Medes and Persians were so near akin that the change of sovereignty was not violent. Indeed, it was only a change from Medes and Persians to Persians and Medes. If Cyrus was really the grandson of Astyages, the outside world saw only a palace revolution. And as Astyages seems to have had no son, Cyrus might easily have been regarded as his rightful heir. These things, together with the remoteness of Lydia and the change of sovereignty at Babylon, may explain how it was that Media received no assistance from either of its allies (R., 427).

With the capture of Astyages, "if Media descended from her preeminent rank, it was to occupy a station only a little below the highest, and one which left her a very distinct superiority over all the subject races" (R., 427). Nor was the valor of the Medes lost. "Originally equal, if not superior, to their close kindred, the Persians, they were throughout the whole period of Persian supremacy only second to them in courage and warlike qualities," and in the 4th century of our era they were still warlike and formidable ("pugnatrix natio et formidanda," Amm. Marc., xxiii, 6; see R., 309, and note 12). Subsequent Median history belongs to the history of Persia.

4. Manners and Customs. The Medes "were brave, energetic, enterprising," and when brought into contact with civilization they became nearly as highly civilized as the Assyrians; but they were rather more barbaric, and displayed no great originality beyond "a stately dress and a new style of architecture" (R., §11). "The world is scarcely indebted to them for a single important addition to the general stock of its ideas" (id. §12). But we must not forget that the Medes and Persians did a great work in preparing the way for the diffusion of Greek language and thought under Alexander the Great and his successors.

The Medes greatly resembled the Persians. In our only sculptured representation, the Behistun bas relief, the artist makes no special difference. We may take the sculptures of the Achæmænian kings as specimens of both Medes and Persians, assuming the Medes to have been the ruler of the two. These sculptures "exhibit to us a very noble variety of the human species—a tall form, graceful and stately; a physiognomy handsome and pleasing, often somewhat resembling the Greek; the forehead high and straight, the nose nearly in the same line, long and well formed, sometimes markedly aquiline; the upper lip short, commonly shaded by a mustache; the chin rounded, and generally covered with a curly beard. The hair evidently grew in great plenty, and the race was proud of it. On the top of the head it was worn smooth, but it was drawn back from the forehead and twisted into a row of crisp curls, while at the same time it was arranged with a large mass of similar small, close ringlets at the back of the head and over the ears" (R., 307). But there is in the Assyrian face a rugged strength which we do not find in the Persian.

The Median women were famed for size and beauty. "The Aryan races seem in the olden times to have treated women with a certain chivalry which allowed the full development of their physical powers, and rendered them specially attractive alike to their own husbands and to the men of other nations" (R., 308).

In later times the Medes were armed like the Persians; but it is believed that at first they were a nation of horse archers, winning victories by their skill in raining arrows from their "clouds of horse," advancing, retreating, gathering, dispersing in Scythian or Parthian fashion. The bow was "short and very much curved," the arrows not more than three feet in length. They used a spear (Jer. 6:23) six or seven feet long. The short sword was little more than a dagger, and hung from the belt over the right thigh (comp. Psa. 45: 8). The shield was of metal or wood, round or oval (R., 312-315).

The Median dress was a long, flowing robe, closely fitting the shoulders and chest, and belted about the waist. The sleeves were long and loose. Below the waist it was "remarkably full and ample, drooping in two clusters of perpendicular folds at the two sides, and between these hanging in festoons like a curtain." At the ankles it was "met by a high shoe, or low boot, opening in front and secured by buttons." The robes were of various colors—purple, scarlet, crimson, or gray, and sometimes apparently striped, white and purple. Sometimes they were of silk. The undergarments were "a sleeved shirt, or tunic, of a purple color, and embroidered drawers, or trousers (ποικίλας ἀναξυρίδας)" (R., 316, andnote 6).

The Medes were specially fond of personal adornments, and much given to wearing golden ornaments, such as chains or collars and bracelets. Earrings were common. They used cosmetics and false hair, and employed devices "to enhance the brilliancy of the eyes and give them greater apparent size and softness" (R., 317). They wore on their heads, both indoors and out, either "felt caps (πίλοι) like the Persians," or the tiara, a high crowned hat made of felt or cloth, either stiff or flexible, and dyed to suit the taste.

Their banquets were luxurious and elaborate, having, besides meat, bread, and wines, "a vast number of side dishes, together with a great variety of sauces" (R., 317). They ate with their fingers, and used napkins (χειρόμακτρα, R., 318). Wine was drunk during and after the meal, often to excess.

There was an elaborate court ceremonial. The chief court amusement was hunting, but it does not appear that the king often took part (R., 318). Polygamy was practiced among the wealthy, as well as by the sovereign.

Perhaps the only genuine relic of Median art is a part of a colossal lion at Hamadan. In it the serene majesty of the Assyrian sculptures seems to have been somewhat softened, and it was represented in a different position from the Assyrian.

5. Religion. Our limits allow but the briefest possible treatment of this part of the subject. More elaborate studies of the old Median and Persian religious development may be found in the works of Rawlinson and Ragozin. With Rawlinson, 344, we may distinguish three stages: (1) "A simple and highly spiritual creed, remarkable for its distinct assertion of monotheism, its hatred of idolatry, and the strongly marked antithesis which it maintained between good and evil." (2) "A natural corruption of the first, dualism, complicated by the importance which it ascribed to angelic beings, verging upon polytheism." (3) Magism, adoration of the four elements. "Anterior to the rise of the Iranic, Median, or Persian system," in the oldest parts of the Zendavesta (properly Avesta Zend for Avesta u Zend, "Text and Comment"), we find a polytheistic nature-worship, an adoration of independent nature powers. The first Fargard of Vendidad must have been composed before the great migration of the Medes southward from the Caspian region. The Gáthas are older still. Several of them are traditionally ascribed to Zoroaster (Zarathustra), whose date was anterior to B. C. 2000, according to Berossus, and whom other writers place still earlier. In truth, estimates vary from B. C. 6000 to 500. And more, "Hermippus of Smyrna puts Zoroaster five thousand years before the Trojan war." "Endoxus of Chidus, the contemporary of Plato" (B. C. 347) "thought that Zoroaster lived six thousand years before the death of Plato. According to Pliny, Aristotle ascribed him the same antiquity, and, as we learn from Diogenes Laertius, maintained that the Magians were older than the Egyptians" (D., p. 77). Duncker, 105, thinks B. C. 1000 safe; and, in the face of so much higher estimates, the B. C. 2000 of Berossus will seem moderate. On the other hand, Professor A. V. W. Jackson, in a work just published (1899, p. 16), following the Persian tradition, places the era of Zoroaster at B. C. 660-683.

(1) Monotheism. The old "Iranic, Median, or Persian system" "is a revolt from this sensuous and superficial nature-worship," or a remnant of a primitive monotheism. Probably it was both, a latent spark of primitive monotheism fanned to a flame by disgust at a prevalent polytheism.

This system of religion deals with personal, spiritual intelligences, good (Ahuras which is Zend for the Sanskrit Asuras, "living" or "spiritual ones") and evil (Devas). We see that they have, perhaps from hostility, reversed the Hindu order, which made the devas gods and the asuras demons. Some of the devas, however, were placed among the Izeds, or angels.

At the head of good spirits stood Ahurô-mazdâo (Ormazd), the highest object of adoration, the true creator, preserver, and governor of the universe. This system "sets before the soul a single being as the source of all good and the proper object of the highest worship." "He is 'the creator of life, the earthly and the spiritual.'" "He is 'good,' 'holy,' 'pure,' 'true,' 'the Holy God'" (the Zend has no distinction of capital and small letters), "'the Holiest,' 'the essence of truth,' etc." (R., 324). "From him comes all good to man; on the pious and the righteous he bestows not only earthly advantages, but precious spiritual gifts—truth, devotion, 'the good mind,' and everlasting happiness;" he rewards the good, and is less often represented as punishing the bad.

"Less spiritual and less awful than Jehovah," the two were yet so nearly alike that the Persians and Jews recognized each other as worshippers of the same God (comp. Isa. 44:28-45:6 with 2 Chron. 36:23; Ezra 1:2, 3; 6:10). At the same time note the twice-made declaration, "though thou hast not known me" (Isa. 45:4, 5).

Moreover, the religion of Ormazd was intolerant of idols. Thus there was a twofold bond of sympathy. "The Jews, so impatient generally of a foreign yoke, never revolted from the Persians; and the Persians, so intolerant, for the most part, of religions other than their own, respected and protected Judaism" (R., 326). Thus the captivity proved to the Jews a blessing in disguise. From the very first, even from the time of Abraham, they had been vexed by polytheism and idolatry, within and without, on all sides. Now they saw an ancient nation, powerful enough to seize the scepter from their idolatrous oppressors, enthusiastic worshippers of one God and haters of idols.

In this ancient Iranic system there were "a number of angels." Some were like personified attributes of the deity. Sraosha, or Serosh, was the messenger of Ormazd. Armaiti was the genius of the earth and the goddess of piety, since "the early Ormazd worshippers were agriculturists, and viewed the cultivation of the soil as a religious duty enjoined upon them by God."

And there were hosts of evil spirits, foes of men, especially of Ormazd worshippers, and particularly given to "destroying" and "lying." But there was "no single superior intelligence, no great principle of evil was placed at their heads. Far less is there any graduated hierarchy of evil, surrounding a prince of darkness with a sort of court." But "the distinction between good and evil is strongly and sharply marked in the Gáthás." The authors were impressed and oppressed by it. Everywhere they saw a struggle between good and bad so fierce that it hid from their eyes the order and harmony of the universe. They personified the good and bad. But their white spirit (Cpento-mainyus) and the dark spirit (Angrô-mainyus, Ahriman) are poetic personifications rather than actually existing intelligences (R., 331, 332).
